

Book 6

Prologue

"And so Dread Emperor Heinous thus addressed his court: 'Are we not rulers of devils and dead, princes among usurpers? Why then should we suffer another to call himself king of our demesne?' All agreed in this, and so war was declared upon Keter."

– Extract from the Scroll of Vainglory, thirty-ninth of the Secret Histories of Praes (destroyed by order of Dread Empress Maleficent II, only partial texts remain)

They'd had three months of reprieve, to the day.

Prince Otto Reitzenberg, who his people yet called Redcrown, had prepared for the hour the truce would end without pause or rest. He'd slept as little as he could, and when he did he'd found himself plagued by nightmares. Unable to meet the solemn and silent faces of his sisters, of his father, of the all the Reitzenbergs that'd died keeping dawn from failing for one more night as they stared at him unblinking. All the shades he had come so close to failing. The Morgentor, the last fortress still in the hands of the living in Twilight's Pass, had been mere weeks away from falling when the Black Queen had tricked a truce out of the Enemy. Otto Redcrown, last of his line, had done all he could to keep the Dead penned up in the pass but the doom of his people had been writ in the stars. Yet for this inadequacy he had somehow been rewarded with three more months to prepare, and knowing the end was coming the Prince of Bremen had worked himself raw.

Frederic at his side, they'd squeezed the full worth out of every heartbeat. Soldiers allowed to rest, yes, but some put to work other than war. Supply lines were opened anew and refurbished, wagons filled with the necessities of war. First Prince Cordelia herself secured gold and foodstuffs and steel, striking deals with half the continent to secure supplies and reinforcements. She had not forgot, Otto had been moved to see. Rhenia's favourite daughter had not come home when Keter marched, but never once had she forgot her kin. She'd stayed south to make sure the south would come to their aid, that famously unbending Hasenbach backbone lent to all Procer. Just as importantly, the young and the old of Lycaonese lands had been sent south to safety under the protection of Frederic's cousin and heiress in Lyonis when the dead ceased their raiding into the lowlands. The future of his people was now safeguarded under the kin of his friend. Then a hard choice had been posed to Otto, as was so often the way in these times.

Should he send all soldiers save those holding the Morgentor into northern Lyonis, to ready the fight there for when Twilight's Pass fell and the Lycaonese lowlands followed, or should every sword in the land be brought to Morning's Gate to spit one last defiance in the Enemy's eye? It had burned him to even consider it, but he must see to the future of his people beyond the cast of pride. Yet he'd been a fool, Otto realized the first time a warband of haggard souls bearing ill-fitting mail and hard eyes marched into the sprawling camp at the bottom of the Morgentor. They had come. Alone and in pairs, in bands of twenty or a hundred. Through wind and snow and treacherous mountain paths. Farmers and miners and shepherds, innkeepers and drapers, scribes and carpenters and a hundred other things. Yet Lycaonese all, so they came wearing the steel handed down families since the days of the Iron Kings and there would be no talk of retreat.

Twilight's Pass was the last lock on the door that might keep the Dead King from devouring the world, and so it would hold until there were none left to hold it. Their numbers had swelled with every band of volunteers, to almost one hundred thousand, and though the Enemy's might was without question, the Morgentor was no less mighty a fortress. It would hold, Otto Redcrown had sworn. It would hold whatever might come. They had prepared, sharpened their steel, and they stood atop perhaps the second finest fortifications in all Calernia – only the cliff-city of Rhenia or Keter itself might claim to surpass Morning's Gate, now that Hannover had fallen. Odds were never good, against the Dead King, but this was perhaps the finest they'd been in Otto's lifetime.

Then of the three tower-fortresses of the Morgentor, the Three Peaks, they lost two on the first day.

If Frederic had not come into his Choosing they might have lost the third tower as well, the central one, and that would have been a disaster there'd be no recovering from. The Kingfisher Prince had held a buckling line by sheer dint of refusing to die and reclaimed the top of the walls from the Enemy long enough to set everything aflame with pitch. It'd cut off the dead within the fallen towers from steady reinforcements long enough to take them back as well, though it'd meant twelve hours of bloody uphill fighting. Otto Redcrown had scraped together an army of one hundred thousand, his people assembled from every corner of Lycaonese lands, and on the first day of the Dead's resumed offensive he had lost near twenty thousand of them. The Reitzenberg would have wept at that, if there were any tears in him left to shed, but there were none. All there was left was duty, and so he let duty devour him whole.

The Dead came and Otto Redcrown met them with steel and fire unrelenting. When half an army of ghouls crawled up icy walls like they were treading open road, massive iron scythes were freed to swing through the lot of them. When flocks of winged abominations dropped down like a flood of locusts, they were dragged down with nets and kept there for the mages to scour in flame. Plague-seeding rats, clouds of poison, even a rain of fire: every night the Enemy tried a fresh devilry and the last of the Reitzenberg grit his teeth before standing his ground. The days belonged to Frederic but the nights were his, though as the siege continued time became meaningless. There was only the sea of death lapping at the walls, the relentless assaults through every hour of every day. And though the cracks were spreading through the army, the fault lines of terror and sleeplessness and a fight that could not truly be won, still every dusk and dawn soldiers climbed up the stairs to fight for the ramparts of the Morgentor.

It was an honourable way to die, the Prince of Bremen had decided. If the days of the Lycaonese were fated to end, Otto thought, let them end with the last of them standing straight-backed in the Enemy's way. He'd been sleeping for barely three hours when he was brought out of a forming nightmare, shaken awake in his cot at the bottom of the Herzhaupt, and though bone-tired and bleary-eyed the Prince of Bremen rose without protest. The captain that had come for him, one of Frederic's men, awaited outside and bowed low when Otto emerged with his armour already being strapped tight.

"Which peak is falling?" Otto Redcrown bluntly asked.

There were not many reasons why he'd be woken now, and so soon after going to rest besides.

"Begging your pardon, Your Grace, but it is quite the opposite," the captain replied, bowing again. "We have reinforcements."

The dark-haired prince blinked in surprise. It could not have been another warband of his people drifting in: it still happened every few days, though the gap was spreading as time passed, and was not so unusual as to require him being awoken.

"Who?" he asked, then added, "and where's Prince Frederic?"

"Awaiting you at the Prinztopf so that you might greet them together, Your Grace," the captain replied. "And the simple answer would be that they are... from the Grand Alliance."

Clapping the man on the back, Otto wasted no more time on quibbling. He trusted Frederic Goethal not to have ordered him roused without good reason, though it had taken some convincing before the Alamans prince was sold on 'obtaining a rare bottle of wine and wanting to share it' not being one of these. An escort of sworn swords followed him without a word as he headed towards the massive camp raised in the shadow of the Three Peaks, as they did everywhere since a Revenant had been sent to claim his head as he slept. Frederic was not difficult to find, as the man surrounded by the usual swarm of courtiers. Otto could not muster even a speck of contempt for these, however, for though their silks and bon mots were trying they belonged to men and women he'd once seen savagely fight their way through two beorns and a crippled Revenant merely to snatch the banner carried by the latter. It'd emerged three days later as a dishwashing rag in the Ostenhaupt kitchens, for the Alamans were making a game of finding the most insulting use possible for the Dead King's banners.

They were mad one and all, which was undoubtedly why the rest of the host had grown so fond of them.

"Otto, my friend!" Prince Frederic Goethal of Brus greeted them. "It has been too long since we shared daylight."

The clasped arms, though Frederic's insistence on cheek-kissing as they did remained just as unsettling as it'd been the first time the Prince of Bremen was subjected to it.

"Your man was vague when I asked who's come," Otto said.

"I can understand why," the Prince of Brus replied, sounding amused. "None of the etiquette we've been taught applies here."

They left the large iron-reinforced tent soldiers called the Prinztopf – the prince pot, it meant, for it was where they held councils in camp and the odd shape of the tent was evocative – behind them and Otto allowed himself to be led, enjoying the warmth of the spring sun on his skin. When they found their guests, the reason why the Alamans were at such loss was made evident. Of the five people in the tent they'd entered, only three were human and only one was Proceran. The gold and white robes of the Holies were not unknown ever this far north.

"His Grace, Prince Otto Reitzenberg of Bremen, styled the Redcrown," Frederic introduced him in Chantant.

"Prince Frederic of Brus," Otto said, returning the favour in the same. "Chosen. The Kingfisher Prince. We share command here."

"I am-" the priest began, but was immediately interrupted.

"One of the idiots who figured overthrowing Hasenbach was a good idea," the old woman with painted face said. "You've been sent here to die by Keter instead of noose, Proceran, no one cares about your name. I am Lady Itima Ifriqui of Vaccei. My Blood is that of the Vengeful Brigand and I bring ten thousand warriors. I am told your people have been struggling with raids on your supply lines, coming down from Hocheben Heights."

She grinned, and it was not a pleasant sight.

"I have come to lend my expertise in such matters, Procerans," Lady Itima said.

The stunning redhead in good armour that was standing by the pair of goblins looked faintly amused but passed no comment before introducing herself.

"Special Tribune Kilian of the Green Stretch, Army of Callow," she said, her Chantant strangely accented. "By the order of my queen I bring twenty mage lines, including some of our foremost warding and scrying specialists. I've been tasked with ensuring the Morgentor is both warded up to Callowan standard and brought into the Grand Alliance scrying relay system."

She was in the Black Queen's service? He would not have guessed at a look.

"We are most thankful for your assistance," Prince Frederic said. "Though it appears introductions are not yet complete?"

One of the goblins, Otto saw, was scribbling with a charcoal pen on parchment. The other one spoke for it, voice narrowly revealing it was male even though it was the smaller of the two.

"Special Tribune Robber," the goblin introduced himself, malevolently grinning. "I'm told you folk could benefit from a little sabotage of the opposition. As it happens, I'm not unfamiliar with-

"Sapper-General Pickler," the other goblin interrupted, revealing herself female. "I'm told some cretin talked you lot in using dwarven engines for the defence of your fortresses."

"We make some defences of our own," Prince Otto replied, unmoved by the rudeness. "Though few proper engines."

"Good, that'll make useful hands to borrow," Sapper-General Pickler said, sounding approving. "I've been tasked with raising your siege capacity to something that wouldn't make a goblin simpleton weep as well as crafting apparatuses specifically to deal with the creatures you've named 'wyrms' and 'beorns'."

Frederic looked uncomfortable, though he was too polite to grimace. His people, especially the highborn, were taught that even subtly referring to coin in conversation was quite crude.

"Even with our current loans, we don't have the coin to afford this," Otto frankly told the goblin general.

"Congratulations," the goblin replied, "as per arrangements struck with the First Prince of Procer, you've been granted conditional loans by the crown of Callow over this matter."

The Prince of Bremen blinked.

"And what conditions would these be?" he asked.

"Is this going to be useful?" Sapper-General Pickler grinned, revealing rows and rows of needle-like teeth.

Otto Redcrown, last of the House of Reitzenberg, grinned back. Oh, this would do. This would do nicely indeed.

Rozala would never grow to like Gaspard Langevin, she mused as she watched the growing shape of the man's capital in the distance.

The Prince of Cleves was prickly, of resentful temper yet swift to offer insult himself, and seemingly convinced that the ancient beginnings of his line meant that he belonged to a sort of nobility within nobility. The Princess of Aequitan knew well her histories and had even, as a youth, snuck in a reading of Princess Eliza Alaguer's ever contentious The Labyrinth Empire so she'd been darkly amused to learn of this. After all, most of the ancient Alamans tribes would have been appalled at the very notion of nobility: tribes elected their chieftains, whose authority was even then shared with the tribe's high priest or priestess of the Hallowed. It was her own Arlesite forbears who'd brought princely rule to the Principate, as before the founding of Procer the greatest of the fortress-holding reales had already come to exact oaths of fealty from their lesser kindred – and so arguably become the first princes and princesses as the word was understood in modern parlance.

Yet these days it was the Alamans that orated of ancient blood, while Arlesites had been taught the virtues of bringing in the fresh sort onto thrones by the constant warfare on the southern and eastern borders. Rozala's own line, the Malanzas, had not always been royalty. It'd been great victories in Levant and a ruthless streak at home that saw them rise to bear a crown when the previous ruling line of Aequitan grew weak. That 'lowly' origin was no secret, and so part of the reason that as far as the Prince of Cleves was concerned Rozala Malanza was still more a general than princess. It was no surprise that during the Great War his principality had supported the bid of Princess Constance of Aisne instead of Rozala's own mother. Still, for all the disdain they shared for each other – only sharpened by Prince Gaspard's personal and political antipathy to the faction Prince Amadis had formed in the Highest Assembly, of which Rozala had openly been part before rising to command it – they were well-bred enough to remain cordial.

To his honour, Prince Gaspard had never once been sparing nor stingy in supporting the armies that had come to fight in the defence of Cleves. Though the man rarely took the field himself, he'd charged his eldest son and heir with command of his army as well as bought the service of every fantassin company north of Cantal not already under contract. Between this and the supplies being brought into Cleves the prince had gone deeply into debt, though he was keeping up appearances with admirable Alamans aplomb. He should be able to dig himself out of the pit, after the war. Cordelia Hasenbach had wrought some sort of financial wizardry that'd greatly lessen the debt burdens incurred defending Procer. Something about bundling together the debts of many principalities and slicing that mixed greater debt apart before selling the slices to the Merchant Lords and banks of Mercantis, and promised yet more aid to come. Her mind was drifting once again, the Princess of Aequitan realized.

Perhaps it was only to be expected. The Twilight Ways invited deep reflections, she felt, the eternal starry night sky somehow giving an impression of solitude even when one was surrounded by thousands. Even two days out of those eldritch paths Rozala's mood and that of the forces under her command remained rather restrained. For some, like the princess herself, the disposition had lingered at the thought that after witnessing fresh horrors south they were now returning to the familiar ones of Cleves. The dark-haired princess had not been able to sleep on a cot since leaving the Ways, unwilling to let herself be unconscious without being certain that digging beneath would wake her. For others, though, it would be the first fresh taste of what war against the Dead King looked like. Rozala was pleased to have gotten Lord Yannu Marave when the Levantines armies were split between fronts, and not only for the heavy infantry the Lord of Alava brought with him: his cool, calculating manner would serve him well when the terror began. The other allies she was bringing to Cleves were harder to read, not that the Princess of Aequitan was all that inclined to try: sometimes she was almost as wary of them as the Dead.

Forcing herself to attend to the present instead of sinking into her thoughts again – anything to avoid remembering the sound of digging, digging beneath her feet, which she sometimes still heard even though she was hearing nothing of the sort – the Princess of Aequitan spurred on her horse forward and her mounted escorts followed. Clevans called the sparsely paved road beneath the hooves of her horse la route aux chandelles, the candle road, because of the stone markers on the side of it: each had been set down at the length it would take for a candle to melt from the last marker, allowing travellers and merchants to gauge how long they had left before reaching the capital. It linked the city to the southern walled town of Jurivan, itself a destination for roads coming out of Brabant and Lyonis, and so was rightfully seen as the trade artery of the principality. It was also the largest road in Cleves, made so that three wagons at once could use it, one of the reasons Rozala had chosen it for the path of her armies.

The last stretch of the candle road was nearly flat ground until the foot of the capital itself was reached, if flanked by a low plateau to the east, and so the Princess of Aquitan was not surprised when ahead she saw tall banners and a company of riders heading towards her. Prince Gaspard had been warned of her coming by scrying ritual, and by the looks of the tallest banner had come out to greet her himself. The pale unicorn on azure, crowned by a six-petalled flower – one petal for every crusade in which a ruling Langevin had personally fought – was the Prince of Cleves' personal banner, which meant he was of the approaching company. Reining in her horse, the dark-haired Arlesite slowed until she could easily turn back. It would be impolitic of her to meet with the Prince of Cleves without bringing along the other two generals of this grand coalition of theirs. Lord Yannu was not difficult to find, for the Levantine lord was himself riding out to meet her, and so was the natural beginning.

"Princess Rozala," the Lord of Alava greeted her, reining in his horse.

"Lord Yannu," the Princess of Aquitan replied with a nod. "Our host rides out to meet us."

"Armies have a way of commanding courtesy," the large man bluntly said.

It was true enough, though rather uncouth to voice it.

"My outriders on the left flank have lost sight of our friends," Rozala admitted. "I don't suppose yours had sharper eyes?"

"Somewhere in the hills to the west is the most I can give you," Yannu Marave said. "They've proved arduous to follow."

Then the two of them would proceed without their third peer, the dark-haired woman decided. Lapses in etiquette were unlikely to matter much to that lot regardless. The two aristocrats waited for their honour guards to gather before riding out together, going down the road at a brisk trot. They were met by the sound of drums and flutes playing the stirring tune of the Roving Minstrel's famous Marching on Keter, the banner of the Langevins of Cleves flying high with those of the lesser highborn beneath. Prince Gaspard himself brought his horse out ahead and took the initiative to greet them.

"Your Grace," Gaspard Langevin said, meeting Rozala's eyes and bowing. "It is a pleasure to see you returned to Cleves."

"Our work here is not yet finished," Rozala Malanza said. "I look forward to keeping your council once more, Your Grace."

And even though she held no love for the man that courtesy had not been entirely untrue. For all his pettier traits, Gaspard Langevin was an able man. Rozala would rather take council from a man she disliked but respected than the opposite.

"It has been one hundred and twelve years since one of the Champion's Blood has last honoured Cleves by being a guest, Lord Marave," Prince Gaspard continued. "I am pleased to end this unfortunate course today."

"The Dominion honours its oaths," Lord Yannu replied in his very good Chantant. "War on Keter, war to the knife."

The Prince of Cleves inclined his head in further thanks, not having been given much to work with. Rozala was dimly amused, for once she had also found it necessary to adapt to the bluntness of the Levantines in such matters.

"I was given to understand," the Prince of Cleves delicately continued, "that there would be a third."

"It is so," Princess Rozala agreed. "Though General Rumena-"

"Can speak for itself."

Rumena the Tomb-Maker – and oh, that even the Black Queen named it this has been enough to make Rozala very wary – was the sole visibly old drow the dark-eyed princess had ever seen. Though tall it had grown stooped and its skin deeply creased, disdaining weapons and attired in a long belted tunic of obsidian rings not unlike chain mail. Its long hair was pure white and its eyes a shade of silver that seemed almost blue in some lights. At the Graveyard, that drow had scored a draw against the Regicide without even using a blade. Now none of the startled riders, many of which now reached for their blades, had even noticed it approaching. It was as if it had been spat out by the rocks, without warning.

"You have corpses wandering your lands, Unicorn Prince," General Rumena continued, its Chantant eerily good.

Given how the drow were rumoured to learn such things, the fact that the old monster had a distinct Bayeux accent was distressing.

"Well met, General Rumena of the Empire Ever Dark," Prince Gaspard said with what she deemed to be remarkable poise. "You speak truly. Keter has found unseen paths from the coast and warbands now wander the land."

"Rest easy, Unicorn Prince," General Rumena grinned. "Now so do we."

Lord Yannu let out a bark of appreciative laughter. Princess Rozala Malanza met the eyes of the ruler of Cleves when he hesitantly turned to her and inclined her head. Monsters, Gaspard, make no mistake, she tried to silently convey. They are monsters. And Gods forgive us all, but Keter will rue the day they lent their fangs to the cause of our survival.

Prince Klaus Papenheim spat into the melting snow, abandoning the reins of his mount to wipe the wetness from his lips after. Ratbiter was placid horse for a Bremen stampfen, to his old rider at least, and so he'd not taken to misbehaving even after the arm Klaus lost in the fall of Hainaut had made him a clumsier horseman. Leaning against his stirrups to remain straight-backed, the Prince of Hannover – prince of ruins, ghosts and exiles these days – unclasped his helmet and ripped it off before wedging it into the crook of his arm. Sweats-soaked hair slipped down onto his brow and the old man let out an exhausted breath before mastering himself.

The day was coming to an end, but that would bring no relief: in the darkness his soldiers would slow and stumble, exhausted and blind. The dead would not share those weaknesses, and relentlessly pursue so that dawn would find half his host had been slaughtered whimpering in the dark. It was a favoured tactic of the Enemy, the reason his ancestors had taken to raising walls and fortresses instead of meeting the Dead on the field. Unlike the ratlings, who were best met and broken on prepared killing grounds before they could cross the rivers and slip into the Hannover lowlands, the Dead King's legions were always risky to confront in open battle.

All it took was for the living to lose once and the Enemy would turn setback into disaster before hounding even that all the way to annihilation. One of his own guard rode to his side, as exhausted as he but hiding it better for her lesser burden of years.

"My prince," Captain Karolina Leisberg said, "I would ask for your permission to reinforce the rearguard."

Dirty blonde hair peeked under the rim of her helm as the other soldier forced her words to come out steady though she'd just volunteered for a duty that was likely to see her and everyone she brought with her dead before night fell. Klaus spat again into the snow, though the taste of blood and grime could not seem to leave the roof of his mouth.

"No," the Iron Prince replied. "I'm not throwing horse into that hungry maw, captain. It'd be raised and sent back to hound us after dark: I'll not hand Old Bones riders to bleed us."

One of the few saving graces of fighting the Dead was the thrift of horsemen, not that Keter had not tried to make up that lack by killing and raising any cavalry it could get its hands on. Klaus Papenheim had no intention of tossing a good company of four hundred Lycaonese horse into the embrace of the Enemy, even to save twice that in foot. Not when the cost in foot ridden down afterwards might easily dwarf what had been saved, for none had known true pursuit until they'd been chased by riders whose horses did not tire. Not that the retreat from the Hainaut lowlands hadn't been bound to be a messy affair regardless, as abandoning the defences of the southern castles of the principality for the sloping plains leading into Brabant had been as good as a written invitation for Keter to strike at them.

There'd been no choice, though, Klaus and Princess Beatrice had agreed. They were losing too many soldiers trying to keep the lines of defence standing, it was only a matter of time until Keter ground them to dust by attrition. They'd been in talks with Prince Étienne of Brabant for near three months now, arranging the line of hastily-raised defences where they would retreat to, but it looked like the losses in getting there might be more dire than even the Iron Prince's bleakest predictions. Their plan had been sound, Klaus still believed, and nearly worked: a sudden offensive on the Dead King's western flank, as if they were trying to break away and join the armies in Cleves, had drawn the Enemy's strength away from the fortresses for a time.

The wounded had been evacuated from the southern fortresses first, and then the garrisons under the command of Princess Mathilda, and so the better part of the military strength in Hainaut would be preserved and able to stiffen the defence of northern Brabant. But the distraction force that Klaus and Princess Beatrice had led west to sell the lie by their very presence had found stiffer resistance than expected: they'd retaken the fortress at Luciennerie easily enough, for the Enemy had torn down the walls taking it, but heading into the hilly highlands afterwards they'd found a force Klaus had once believed to be an old legend: the Grey Legion, led by the silent and implacable Prince of Bones.

No petty skeletons, these, but undead whose ancient bones had been surrounded by a body of wrought iron and steel. Though slow and lumbering, the seven thousand abominations were near unbreakable by force of arms, a crushing steel fist before which all men crumbled. Their long axes entirely made of steel had reaped near two thousand lives before the Prince of Hannover understood who it was they were facing, and by then the Prince of Bones had entered the fray. It was said in Lycaonese legends that the Revenant who held sway over the Grey Legion was an ancient Iron King, slain by the Dead King's own hand and raised anew, but in Hannover the tale was slightly different – it was, Klaus's own father had told him as a child, their ancient ancestor Albrecht Papenheim. The Lord of Last Stands, the Lone Sentinel.

The same man who'd stubbornly held Twilight's Pass with only a bare bones garrison for a year even as an Alamans foray into Bremen was driven out. He'd died, the stories said, standing alone as the last of his army on the same dawn the armies that'd beaten back the southerners began marching north for the Pass. True to his charge 'til the last breath. Whatever the truth of who the Prince of Bones had once been, he'd since been made into an implacable servant of Keter: the Silent Guardian and the Blade of Mercy had both sallied out to meet him in battle and been swept aside almost contemptuously. The Painted Knife had struck it from the back trying to cut through the neck – a practical girl, that one, Klaus rather liked her – and found that below the armour was only a sea of furious sorcery that'd violently lashed out and blown her away. If the Repentant Magister had not been able to trap him within a circle of flames for an hour, the defeat they were inflicted that day might have been an outright rout. Not that their retreat south towards Brabant had been anything but a succession of losses since that first defeat.

Three days, that was the worst of it. Another three days and their host would have made it to the freshly raised fort at Engrenon and been able to dig in to await reinforcements. The way the day was going, though, it was not to be. Not unless hard decisions were made. A short trumpet call told the Iron Prince that the woman he'd been waiting for had arrived, and Princess Beatrice Volignac rode in with her personal guard at a brisk trot. The latest Princess of Hainaut looked rather ludicrous, at first glance: her considerable girth was coated in mail and heavy furs, and from a distance she looked like a bloated waterskin forcefully strapped atop a horse. Younger sister to Princess Julienne, she had the same green eyes and coal-black hair but unlike her late sister's they were set on a narrow, pinched face with too-large lips. Klaus had thought little of her at first, he'd admit as much. For anyone to grow fat as Princess Beatrice was would have been considered a shameful thing back home, thoughtless indulgence and selfishness. To eat so much meant that either another went hungry or granaries were taken from.

He'd been wrong though, even in his lazy assumption that her weight meant she'd be a poor rider. She was a better horsewoman than even her sister had been, and a finer lance as well. More importantly, Beatrice Volignac had a searing fire inside her that made her one of the most driven people the Prince of Hannover had ever met. She hardly slept, and Klaus had found her so proficient a captain of men he'd effectively ceded command of all Alamans forces to her. She had a defter touch with them, and under her command they'd risen to become almost as fierce fighters as his own soldiers.

"Her Grace Beatrice Volignac, Princess of Hainaut," the herald announced.

The woman in question reined in her horse by his side, gesturing for her escort to withdraw. Klaus glanced at his own riders and nodded. Without a word they did the same.

"Prince Klaus," the dark-haired woman said.

"Princess Beatrice," he replied. "I'll be blunt: the rearguard is failing and if we reinforce it we'll lose our entire host."

The Alamans princess grimaced.

"I'd begun to suspect as much," she admitted. "The lesser dead are slowing them down too much, it's only a matter of time until the Grey Legion catches up."

And a pitched battle against that, neither needed to say, was a fool's errand. They'd tried to send for the Witch of the Woods, whose sorceries might be a match for those relentless steel killers, but there was no telling if the riders had made it to a scrying station – or whether she'd arrive in time, even should she be reached.

"We've twenty thousand men to care for," the Prince of Hannover said, knowing it was likely closer to seventeen now. "Those soldiers who hold our back have proved brave and true, and this is poor repayment, but we cannot throw away the other sixteen thousand trying to save that four."

The Princess of Hainaut looked disgusted with herself, but she did not disagree.

"Weeping Heavens," she murmured, "what ugly creatures this war makes of us all."

Klaus's gaze turned to behind them, where the sprawl of their column could be made from atop the hill where they both sat. His own horse had scythed through the packs of ghouls that'd sprung from the snow and earth to ambush the flanks of the column's centre stretch, freeing it to resume its advance, but Keter had still gotten its due: the temporary slowing had been enough to force the rearguard to fully engage the undead skirmishers that'd been pursuing them all day. Though these were little more than skeletons with javelins and swords, wearing not a single piece of armour, the 'naked' skirmishers were damned fast and tireless, and one of the Dead King's favourite manners of tying down foot so that his heavier forces could catch up to them. It would be so here, the first battalions of sword and board corpses bearing old ringmail already beginning to emerge above nearby hilltops. The rearguard's shield wall was spreading out, preparing for the brutal melee heading towards it.

"Someone will have to take command there," Klaus said. "Else they'll break too soon."

There was no contempt in his tone as he spoke, for though the soldiers in the rear were mostly Arlesites his own brethren would behave little differently. Men often found great courage when they knew there was no avoiding death, but when there was still hope for life – as there would be, should those in the back of the shield wall break and run before too many of the dead arrived – it was only natural to find one's feet itching to flee. It was the duty of a good captain to make their soldiers understand why there was a need to stand and fight even when there would be no leaving the field alive.

"Agreed," Princess Beatrice said.

A heartbeat later they both began to speak-

"I'lll-"

A twin look of surprise was shared, and Klaus Papenheim let out a rueful chuckle.

"I'm at the end of my rope, Volignac," he bluntly said. "I'm an old cripple a long way from home, fading out no matter how much the priests fight it. You've still decades in you, and your sister's sons to raise."

"You're the Iron Prince," she flatly replied. "Your reputation is the reason this is a retreat and not a rout. So long as you still breathe our host believes it might survive this march. I'll entrust the safety of my nephews to you and beg you might request of the First Prince that she'll allow them to attend her in Salia."

Before he could dismiss that for the foolishness it was – how trite a trade, to keep alive an old sack of bones like him for a few more years when she might serve the cause for decades yet – when they were interrupted by the sound of swords unsheathing as one. Princess Beatrice's guards and his were all looking at a strange gash in the air. Through the opening Klaus glimpsed a night sky and eerily enough felt warm breeze drift out. What came out with it, though was more familiar a sight.

"Sheathe your swords," the Iron Prince ordered, then inclined his head in greeting. "White Knight. It's been some time."

"Prince Klaus," the Sword of Judgement replied, inclining his head in return.

"Come to join our little stand, have you?" Princess Beatrice said. "You're welcome to a few battalions. Plenty to spare."

"Indeed," the dark-skinned hero agreed. "Though I come bearing request on behalf of another, in truth."

"Indeed?" Klaus drily repeated.

"It is requested that your rearguard pull back by a hundred feet and any spears and pikes you have might be brought to its fore," the White Knight said, impervious to sarcasm.

"And who requests this, pray tell?" Princess Beatrice demanded.

It was a sound like cloth ripping, if it were a cloth so large as to cover half the world. Klaus Papenheim caught sight of the rippling gates and the soldiers that strode out of them. On the left side of the shield wall, painted soldiers bearing hooked swords and shields rushed out. On the other, rows and rows of shining steel marched out in cadence, shields raised and tightly packed. Legionaries. Army of Callow, by the banner: stark cloth, bearing the Miezian numerals for three.

"The Black Queen," Klaus Papenheim said, and it was not a question.

Gates kept opening, some as small as a single man while others were making room for engines of war being dragged out by wagon, and soldiers kept pouring out.

"Today it is our turn, Iron Prince, to go on the offensive," the Sword of Judgement smiled.

The Prince of Hannover's remaining hand reached for the pommel of the sword at his hip, clutching it tight. Another gate opened atop a hill to the west and, banners streaming behind them, a company of knights rode out to form a wedge aimed at the Enemy's flank. At their head was a single silhouette in a colourful patchwork cloak, twin great crows perched on her shoulders. A horn sounded: one, twice, thrice. Lances went down and the last knights of Callow began their charge, their warlord queen at the tip of the spear. Klaus Papenheim smiled a wolf's smile, fierce and toothy and so very eager to finally sink his fangs in the Enemy's throat.

"Then let's turn this army around, Princess Beatrice," the Iron Prince said, meeting his comrade's eye. "And remind Ol' Bones this war has yet to find a victor."

Test, test ... Is this working? I think it is. Right? Well, let's give whoever is in the top spot a gentle ass whooping, cause whoever is in the top isn't that Practical.

Aston Whiteman

I'll vote when the story finishes. Just like Wrm.

Seriously, constant reminders are annoying.

Unless you're actually the Bard in disguise.

Vo... Nah.

BritishTeaLover

Votes expire after a week, so only voting at the end of the story doesn't help it much as it won't keep it in the rankings whilst its being written when it needs the support.

eatenbypie

Agreed, it's getting old. Those who vote don't need the reminder, those who plan on voting when it's finished have a set opinion, and those who just read and don't vote don't really care. When it comes to those who irregularly vote, all these wannabe witty voting posts accomplish is deterring the stubborn types (like myself). It's gotten beyond obnoxious seeing this every time.

I did however make a point to vote today since it's the first update of the book, regardless of the well intentioned idiots.

Snowy

Yeah I used to vote every now and then when I saw a particularly inspired chapter but now I more or less stopped because of these posts.

I don't like being sold things, much less by shoddy salesmen. Even just the vote links were much less obnoxious.

sengachi

And I appreciate the reminder and the commentary to go with it typically amuses me.

If these comments don't inspire you to vote, simply pay them no mind. They have a purpose they serve, it's just not for you.

Kristina Adams

Awww that was a awesome chapter... your on fire !!!! what a way to come back. Thanks

Wow, your entitlement is impressive. You're getting this story, and the author asks for nothing. Yet you're spamming the comments with your whingeing about people posting a fun reminder to click a link. Scroll past the link, holy shit.

Jan Horáček

I do my self vote when reminded. 😊

SpacyRicochet

Yup, the reminders help me to actually vote!

Don't speak for everyone, I appreciate the reminders. Moreover, if these posts are enough to convince you to not vote, then clearly you didn't care that much in the first place. The "vote" posts are completely ignorable if you don't like them.

Aston Whiteman

TWI has no vote reminders yet stays at the top.

I come for EE storytelling not vote fans.

Unless more votes=more money for EE.

Presumably Erratic didn't want to delay the promised start of the last book by one day just to fit in with the new schedule. By the sounds of things the schedule change wasn't decided until he was already on break.

Daniel

I feel like the voting line is a party of the story now.

Insanenoodlyguy

I really doubt that you'd be a dedicated voter without the likes of us. Truthfully you are no great loss. The standing of this novel on tobwebfiction suggests that we are either successful or benign on the whole. Which means we are gonna keep going at it, since it's not so stupid after all.

Stephen M

I actually like the reminders to vote. Saves me a click when voting.

Otherwise it was good to remember that the Drow are intending to defend this action but to win it.

Keep wondering why the Bard doesn't lend a hand with that in mind unless she has grown fond of the existence of Keter.

Good to see K again. Leading mage lines too.

Jessica Day

Please stop this, most of us seem to appreciate the vote link and reminder. Voting is counted on a weekly basis so voting often is the intention of the system. Having this story appear at the top of the list brings attention to the author who relies on community support so everything is going to be helpful.

I honestly don't mean to be rude but your position is the minority one so please leave the rest of us alone when we participate in voting.

It looks like we're going right into the thick of things this time. We're seeing the front of the war. On the one hand, it's a wonder to see everybody as united as they are. On the other hand, it does make me worry about what's simmering beneath the surface, given how spread out everybody is and how political concerns haven't all been taken care of yet.

Adrian V

One word: AWESOME!!!!

Loved this chapter, i can't wait to see the other heroes interact with Cat, and seeing their reactions to Cat and Hanno's interactions (i would say relationship but is better not to jinx it xD)

Adrian V

Time for a comment that talks more about my impressions now that i have sleep and re read xD

Not only do i love how this all started and what we were shown but the things that were mentioned and others that were implied for the future, for example on the first front (i will use the order the POV appeared) we have Killiam and Robber, the later more or less assures a POV at some point since he is a favorite for the interludes and Killiam being there we could see more of her since the last 2 books have barely mentioned her and i missed her!!!

I also think Otto will eventually get a name and he and Frederick will continue to be those 2 guys, maybe even go down in history as some duo xD

On the second we have Malaza that also gives us a posible way to see what happens later and Rumena who will surely kick ass and throw snark everywhere.

And lastly we have Cat charging on the front directly!!! Maybe this book will open with her battling this lord of bones, we needed to see more fights since she returned where she used direct application of force, this is important because she needs to project force to her allies and what better way than to kill/rekill an revenant that defeated and maybe killed at least 3 heroes.

Now a quick question: wich heroes are confirmed dead? i meant i think the "liked" part (plus chaotic explosions of sorcery) leaves it pretty clear at least she was maimed if not killed.

burguulkodar

I don't understand why Kingfisher Prince would be a valid hero name. What is the kingfisher meaning here? Does he like to fish? Is his banner that of a kingfisher? Is it metaphorical? If so, then what the hell is a kingfisher a metaphor for?

Ben

It's not a metaphor about kingfishers. The kingfisher is the symbol, or sigil, I guess, of that dude's Principdom. All of his soldiers fight under the Kingfisher banner, and thus associate it with whatever virtues and ideals are valued among fighting men from that principality. There's an earlier chapter about him where he and the cavalry under his command drink some toasts before charging down a cliff to attack an undead dragon or something, and one of those toasts was something like "To the Kingfisher, and may we never shame it." As the prince he's presumably supposed to embody the virtues and ideals of his principality, which the kingfisher is taken to represent—and now I guess he far more literally embodies them.

I'm guessing that last scene with dozens of gates ripping open and reinforcements stepping through was at least partly inspired by Avengers: Endgame.

Nice.

konstantinvoncarstein

I had the same thought 😬

dadycool

The moment I finished reading, I went back, turned on the soundtrack, and reread it. It's a glorious combination.

Ed

Depending what sort of writer EE is, that scene may have been planned since the first book was written. Even if he's a discovery writer probably still been planned since he worked out Cat could use portals and was going to end up in this war, which was long before Endgame.

Reinforcements appearing from portals is always just a potentially awesome scene 😊

Javvies

Sweet. It's back.

Yes ... the arrival of your unexpected reinforcements is a pleasant surprise to be woken up to.

So Killian is alive, for all those wondering about where she disappeared to.

Pickler has been set loose to build war engines with a functionally unlimited budget as long as what she builds is useful. That's going to be ... effective.

It sounds like Robber and the goblins are going to get along disturbingly well with the Kingfisher's Alamans – I mean, charging out to grab a banner to use it for dishwashing? Robber and his lot will approve.

Heh. Rumena is a joy as ever. Meetings of the generals on that front are going to be fun.

Ah. Klaus is alive. His interactions with Cat are going to be interesting.

Also, yes, fall back so the surprise reinforcements have room to get up to speed in their charge. Always a good thing to give them room to work with. Though ... I suspect that the Knights will be less effective against the undead than the living, since undead don't exactly break or have fear the way living troops do. And the biggest value in conventional cavalry charges is that the troops on the receiving end are likely to break formation, since an unbroken formation of infantry is not something even trained warhorses are going to want to run into.

hakureireimu

Except the Knights are also good against sorcery, and the undead are raised using sorcery.

Mammon

Probably not the same kind of sorcery. The knight's armours have engraved runes that make the sorceries fall apart, fail to penetrate and/or dissipate. Mostly used against raw or non-solid magic being thrown at them to destroy, rend or ward off.

While this indeed also worked against the Grim Binder creatures, those solid beings were conjured out of thin air and thus still relying on sorceries to exist and retain form at all. Throwing a platemail at that will indeed make it fall apart. The undead though, those are still a 'natural' physical component animated with magic but for their lethal effects not reliant on sorceries.

Some ancient magicks like bones so crumbled to dust that they'd fall apart were it not for magic, those would indeed falter when facing the knights of Callow same as a wraith would. But most undead would likely find themselves just as capable of killing these knights with spear formations and arrows as regular soldiers.

With their relentless morale and numbers allowing them to be alike the iron flanks to stop and tear apart the charges if the knights were to attack more dense parts of the army, knight charges are probably even going to be less effective against them. Charges rely in good part on shock and awe and routing the enemy, but horses can only stampede through so much before they're halted.

So against the Grey Legion, whose shell and weapons are ordinary steel, the knights would only ride themselves to death. They resist sorcery, but if they cannot get to the sorcery hidden beneath that steel then they'll find the enemy slaughtering them before they can slaughter the enemy.

Insanenoodlyguy

You really think fighting praes that callowan knights are unfamiliar with undead combat? The remnants and such will be a new and unpleasant thing to start learning, but the en masse hordes? Those are familiar

Mammon

I commented on the idea that Knights = effective against sorcery and undead = sorcery was so simple and clear-cut that the knights would just auto-win. See comment I commented upon. And that has nothing to do with Callow's experience with undead, but with this reader's anticipation of what the story will do next.

Wonder

I believe you are underestimating the knights . Do you really believe they would ride down on the undead army while aware of their own vulnerability without a plan? And not to even mention the warlord herself at the tip of the Calvary, It speaks for itself, if the Black Queen is at the front of the charge then I don't believe everything is as simple as it seems.

Mammon

See my reply on InsaneNoodleGuy right above your comment.

Mental Mouse

What makes you so sure they don't know anything about the Gray Legion? Or for that matter, that the Greys' iron armor is just ordinary armor, when it's containing a seething mass of sorcery? I'd bet the knights' weapons are enchanted/ invested with divine power as much as their armor.

Mammon

Winter IV specified that there was sorcery directly underneath the plate that was not clear, sensed or doing anything before being pierced through. As such, while the plate needs not be unenchanted, it has already been told that the sorcery lies underneath the plate rather than in it. In terms of these regular steel or iron shells the Grey Legion is wearing, the Callowan lances are just thinner pieces of ordinary steel. Once pierced through, if pierced through, only then the lashing out of sorcery will have the enchanted protections make a difference.

On the intent everyone seems to read in my comment for some reason, see my reply on InsaneNoodleGuy in the comment above the comment above your comment.

Javvies

Yeah ... but typical undead aren't exactly the kind of active magic that they're functionally immune to. They (presumably) can't just walk up to an undead and break the animating magics by brief physical contact.

They might well have other tricks up their vambraces for dealing with undead, and probably actually do, but they're going to be relying on special abilities/equipment to break the undead that they have because they're the super special counter magic Knights of Callow, not the mental shock power of being heavy cavalry charging at insufficiently disciplined infantry.

That is, living infantry can break in the face of a cavalry charge if insufficiently disciplined because it isn't easy to stand still in the face of several tons of horses wearing people preceded by pointy objects charging at you faster than you can run. That opens up the formation which means the horses can and will just keep going rather than stop or turn away because they can't jump over the obstacle in their path that would cripple them if they ran into it. Undead aren't going to break formation.

> the stone markers on the side of it: each had been set down at the length it would take for a candle to melt from the last marker,

Certainly it makes sense to have markers set at a given distance from each other, and the burn time of a standard candle is an ancient measure of time. That said, if said candle is moving – being carried in a coach or wagon, let alone on horseback – well, its burn time is going to be far short of standard!

I assume that they are placed such that it takes the same time to walk/ride from one stone candle to the next as it would for a standard candle to burn down, assuming some standardized walking or riding speed. That way you can roughly estimate the time by the number of candles you have passed instead of having to carry a burning candle with you.

RanVor

The hype is real, people.

RanVor

Hey guys, it's been a while since I last commented here. Don't worry, though, this doesn't necessarily mean I'm back for good. I still haven't decided if I'll ever be returning to regular commenting. You're still safe, at least for a while.

Insanenoodlyguy

I'm curious, after everything, if you still hate the direction cat took. I assume since you are here at all that you still find yourself wanting to read this...

RanVor

I wouldn't say I hated it, exactly. I found the change of direction at the end of Book VI to be abrupt and disappointing in some ways, and I still like pre-Winter Cat more than the current one, but it makes sense for her to act this way and she's actually managed to get the all the idiots to listen to reason, which is always a plus. Also, she's still crazy and that's what matters the most, right?

RanVor

And by Book VI I mean Book IV, of course. Stupid Roman numerals.

dadycoool

Yeah, I miss the badass, unstoppable force of nature that was a teenaged Cat, but I also miss the cheerful, physically fit, and not-a-mushroom that was teenaged dadycoool. The sad fact is: not only did she grow up and gain new, big responsibilities, but the world changed around her and she adapted to match it. ngl, I very much agree with you. I didn't like it when she became an unfeeling Fae and I didn't like the extreme restraint she's been using, but it is what it is.

btw, if this kind of paragraph-length reply is what happens when I open my mouth, maybe I should keep it shut.

Dr.D

OH HELLS YEAH! Now THAT'S a chapter to come back with! Welcome back EE. 😊

Good to see Rumena being the menacing ancient monster that he is. And to see our dearly beloved Cat (even if only briefly from the back) doing what she does best, bringing in the cavalry to save the day. I is a happy bunny.

Fern

Oh man, I'm getting awfully excited about this. This is what this story promised from day one: two huge armies fighting an apocalyptic dance to the death led by razor sharp minds very, very skilled at manipulating storytelling beats. Best of all, they've both got nothing to lose. Hell, these power liches are just the opening salvo from neshemah, who knows what other nasty shit he's got waiting in the wings.

Shoddi

EE, thank you for such a well written and engaging story. I'm glad it's back! That being said, of all the fantastic imagery you've set forth in this chapter, this passage is the one that amuses me the most:

" Cordelia Hasenbach had wrought some sort of financial wizardry that'd greatly lessen the debt burdens incurred defending Procer. Something about bundling together the debts of many principalities and slicing that mixed greater debt apart before selling the slices to the Merchant Lords and banks of Mercantis, and promised yet more aid to come. "

So, she's funding the war effort with "mort-gage" backed securities. Clever, so very clever.

Oshi

Yay! Someone else who noticed this. If she has done it right she can pull a JPMorgan and when some of it inevitably goes belly up she can reap plenty of profits at Mecantis's expense. Utter genius.

greatwyrmgold

Hopefully this doesn't encourage lenders to make loans to nobles unlikely to be able to be able to pay them back and bundle them with debt from more reputable borrowers. That seems pretty unlikely, though. Who'd be stupid enough to participate in that kind of scheme?

Til

It's back baby! Missed this story so much.

Wait, in which chapter did Klaus lose his arm? Am I just dumb?

Chapter 1: Recommence

"In the conduct of war offence is commonly preferable to defence; for in attacking a general acts according to their own designs, while in defence they act according to the designs of the enemy."
– Extract from the 'Ars Tactica', famed military treatise of Dread Emperor Terribilis the First

The afternoon sun stared down blearily at our backs, banners flapping in the wind as we watched the soldiers on the field below. These were good flat grounds; my men had had time to set up and there were fewer than five hundred undead facing them: this was as close to a safe skirmish as we'd ever get in a war like this one.

I had no intention of wasting such a rare opportunity even if it'd been tragedy that dropped it into my lap. Hakram himself had handpicked the lines that made up the formation of three hundred legionaries, with an eye to ensuring they were greenhorns – as much as the Army of Callow still had any of those – instead of veterans. We wouldn't always have the luxury of well-trained soldiers to draw on, and if the assault companies were to be a success on the northern fields then we'd need to plan for the lowest fare of what we'd be able to field and not the finest. Even after only two months of training, though, my countrymen did me proud. Spears were hammered into the ground at a sharp angle, as if a line of long stakes, and behind them the first rank stepped forward in orderly manner: greatshield-bearing soldiers in heavy plate and short swords, a veritable wall on legs. Behind them the second rank set up, soldiers in mail coats handling halberds and the long hammers known as 'raven beaks'. The third and fourth ranks wielded the same mixture, though with heavier lean towards halberds, and behind them were kept in reserve our specialists.

We might not have the mage numbers the Legions of Terror could boast of, but we more than made up for that in priests. The House Insurgent had absolutely no qualms about using Light as much to burn undead as their more traditional colleagues used it for healing.

The commanding officer of our trial assault formation was a young man from Ankou by the name of Algernon Beesbury, who'd swiftly climbed up the ranks by virtue of having both a solid tactical acumen and a facility with languages. He'd been fluent in Chantant before even enrolling, as it happened, and served as one of General Hune's favourite vanguards during the Proceran campaign only to make it to tribune rank shortly after the Princes' Graveyard. Adjutant spoke well of his wits, too, which was even higher praise than Hune's several official commendations as far as I was concerned. Tribune Beesbury was not disappointing me so far, as he ordered a spreading of the formation when the undead pack began to splinter. The zombies would keep moving swiftly and purposefully so long as the Binds within their number remained unbroken, though compared to the skeleton waves I found the fleshier undead to have a certain... feral way about them. Their bite tended to be poisonous, too. The process that saw zombies rise anew made their gums bleed as they died and keep suppurating blood and pus for weeks after they were dead.

Though it might take a while to kill, foul blood in a wound was poison all the same.

"How many Binds in the lot, do you think?" I said.

"I'd say no more than five, Your Majesty," Grandmaster Brandon Talbot replied.

Keen-eyed as he watched the unfolding skirmish through his open visor, the commander of the Order of the Broken Bells was careful not to bring his own mount too close to mine. Zombie liked to snap at other horses and given that she smelled like Winter and death it tended to unnerve even Callowan war mounts. Glancing at the man I marvelled that his beard was still so neatly cut: the aristocrat seemed to make it a point of pride to remain nobly groomed even when out on campaign as we'd been for half a month now.

"They are looking pretty sloppy," I conceded, the two of us eyeing the dead as they closed the last of the distance.

When there were more Binds the necromancy binding the dead together was... tighter according to Masego, though he'd gotten a little lost in a greater metaphor about how the Dead King used necromancy entirely when explaining it. Regardless, in practice the presence of more Binds allowed those same undead more control over their lesser brethren, and finer control as well. Given that the Binds still had soul bound to their dead frames, hence the name, that tended to mean better tactics for the pack than simply rushing at whatever living were closest. Talbot and I kept our eyes on the zombies as they hit the outer line. To my pleasure, just as they'd been meant to they staked themselves on the spears. Not all of them did, for some avoided the jutting steel or simply tumbled forward with great enough speed they either broke the spear or ripped free of the point, but it broke the dead's momentum across the line.

"It would not work as well against skeletons," Captain Karolina Leisberg said, her Chantant accented in that attractively sharp Lycaonese way.

Where Grandmaster Talbot sat mounted at my right, the Iron Prince's representative sat the same at my left. Prince Klaus Papenheim had proved very much interested in our attempts to adjust war doctrine to the realities of war against Keter, to the extent that he'd sent one of the captains of his personal guard to have a look at this skirmish after I'd given him advance notice it would be taking place. That and I assumed he'd wanted eyes he trusted assessing how much damage the Dead King's latest nasty surprise had managed to sow behind our main lines. Gods, we were just lucky Tariq had caught the infiltrators before they made it into Brabant. If the fucking things had made it into one of those cramped refugee camps instead of being forced to prey on the isolated towns and villages of southern Hainaut instead, the damage would have been staggering in scope.

"It'll still slow them by simple virtue of being in the way," I reminded Captain Leisberg. "The object is to sap their momentum before the lines hit, not score kills."

We'd learned the hard way that a wave of armoured skeletons could topple even a proper Legion shield wall by simple virtue of being so damned heavy, if it got enough room for a proper charge.

"And it seems to be working as intended," Brandon Talbot noted.

Eyes returning to the skirmish, I caught sight of exactly what he meant. I'd missed the first exchange, but the results left in its wake spoke for themselves: a long line of zombies, pulped or hacked down by the polearms and long hammers while the line of greatshields anchored against the ground effortlessly bounced off the few dead that made it close to enough to scrabble at the wall of steel. The dead slowly forced their way behind the line of jutting spears but they were repeatedly butchered as they did until the mangled corpses were tall enough a pile that some of the zombies began using it as a way to leap above. There the halberds proved their worth over the raven beaks, a forest of jutting points that speared the few leapers clean through. Tribune Beesbury barked out an order and whistles were sounded by the sergeants. The mages and priests at the rear lashed out with flame and Light, providing cover to the rank of greatshields as it rose and retreated five paces before setting down again. They were adding depth to the killing floor to avoid further leapers,

I noted approvingly. Hune's man was living up to her commendations.

"A pack is splitting off from the rest," Captain Leisberg pointed out.

Eyes flicking to the side of the skirmish, I saw the Lycaonese was right. Maybe thirty zombies and what must have been a Bind within the lot were peeling off from the slaughter on the plain, heading southwest. There were villages there, as I recalled, though not large ones – likely the reason they'd not been hit in the initial wave of contamination when two neighbouring small towns had. The infiltrators had aimed for numbers above all else, perhaps understanding that weaponless zombies would require as much to make a dent in a line of proper soldiery.

"Shall I send out one of the Order's wings, my queen?" Grandmaster Talbot offered.

I mulled on that a moment, even as the assault formation on the plains continued its methodical savaging of the remaining undead. This might be the least of the infantry the Dead King could field, but I was still rather encouraged by the day's results.

"That village we sent Lord Tanja to, what was it called again?" I asked.

"Pierreplate, I believe," Brandon Talbot replied.

"About half a bell away," I said. "And the one Lady Osená was meant to get moving was maybe another half bell further west."

"The Levantines should be returning, then," Captain Leisberg said, quickly catching on to my meaning.

Lord Razin Tanja, who was now truly the Lord of Malaga instead of merely the heir designate – his kin back in Levant had found a technicality that allowed him to claim the title without physically returning to the Dominion – should already have been back, truth be told. I rather suspected he'd waited for Lady Aquiline to finish covering the grounds I'd assigned her and catch up to him before heading back together. I was not one to grudge a young man his fancy for a lithe-limbed whirlwind of swagger and knives, especially when said whirlwind had legs like Aquiline Osená's, but if Tanja was under the impression that he could use our hours on the field to flirt with his betrothed he was in dire need of instructional sparring with Adjutant.

"Send a pair of riders to warn them, just in case they got sloppy with their own scouting," I ordered Talbot, eyes following the fleeing undead.

The Levantines, particularly the Tartessos foot, were actually better hand at this sort of thing than any of mine save for goblins so it was likely an unnecessary warning. Still, why indulge in a gamble when a sure thing was close at hand?

"By your will, Your Majesty," the grandmaster said, bowing his head.

He guided his horse away, leaving to pass along my command, but I kept my attention on the undead. They were using the shoddy dirt road headed southwest instead of just running across broken terrain, I noted, so there was definitely a Bind doing their thinking for them. Not that it'd help them much, given the region and season. The borderlands between southern Hainaut and northern Brabant were a strange place, to my eyes: flat stony plains were broken up by valley-like dips in the ground where greenery grew almost aggressively, though the part I'd grown to despise was the damned bogs. They were everywhere, though they always spread like the clap in an army camp after winter snows melted. For a few months every year the entire region became the favourite piss bowl of the Gods, which made campaigning around it deeply unpleasant. The only part that was mildly tolerable about the bogs was the way so many birds flocked to them, which made for good hunting and a change of fare when catches were made. The road southwest was half-flooded by such a bog, which had lapped up at a turn already quite cramped up against a rocky hill.

It was half-expectantly that I watched that narrow passage as the dead neared it. If I'd been trying to lay an ambush around here, that was where I would have done it. Painted faces crested the hill and a heartbeat later a volley of javelins scythed through the flank of the zombie pack. Wouldn't be enough to put any of those down for good, but it'd pin and tumble quite a few as well as disrupt their 'formation'. I was not the only one looking, though, I noted.

"That'd be the Tartessos foot," I told Captain Leisberg. "Those call themselves slayers in honour of the Silent Slayer, the heroine that founded the ruling line of the city."

Lady Aquiline herself claimed direct descent from the woman, and for all I knew it might even be true. I'd never seen any people half so obsessed with Blood as the Levantines, save for actual Praesi blood mages.

"They are wearing almost as much paint as armour, and most of that leather," Karolina Leisberg skeptically said.

Lycaonese, I had found, held what I could only deem a very reasonable sort of respect for the virtues of putting on good steel armour whenever it was even remotely possible to get away with it. The way some of the Levantines disdained it was utterly baffling to them, and unfortunately that was one of the least contentious ways their cultures seemed to rub each other wrong. The way the Dominion held single combat as a glorious thing, in particular, had a way of earning aggressive contempt from the northerners. It was, I'd come to believe, the difference between a people that held war as an honourable duty and one that held war as honourable, period. There were no frills to Lycaonese ways: if it worked, it did not matter how ugly or unfair or harsh the way of getting it done was. Captain Leisberg hadn't come across an honour duel, at least. Those always made the Lycaonese fall into black temper. There was a reason I'd ensured they were encamped at opposite ends whenever I could even though it was a headache to organize. These days I sometimes felt more like a juggler than a general or a queen. And the moment I drop a single ball, I thought, people will die.

It was a sobering thought, and the source of much of my patience these days.

"Slayers are monster-killers by training, not line infantry," I told her. "They're used to fighting things that consider plate little more than the crunchy part of the meal. I expect that when we finally get the Unravellers they'll be the ones fielding them for our front."

The woman's eyes brightened, for I'd said the magic word: Unravellers. The sheer intensity of the lust the Lycaonese held for those artefacts surprised me almost every time, though perhaps it shouldn't. We'd been fighting the alchemical monstrosities of the Dead King for not even two years while their kind had been the proverbial rock in Keter's boot for centuries.

"I'd heard the Workshop deemed them unfeasible," Captain Leisberg said.

Unfeasible wasn't exactly the right word. The first few attempts at making artefacts that disrupted necromancy had either been violently explosive failures or run into what Masego deemed a 'proportioning' problem, namely that those first attempts simply didn't have enough sorcery or Light in them to successfully unravel something like a wyrm or a beorn. Our people had eventually succeeded at making an artefact that could hold that much power, but it'd been a material solution. As in, the materials used in the making of that thing were about as expensive as arming two cohorts in full Legion standard. That'd been bad enough, but they'd also been quite rare: in particular, the kind of eldritch lumber they'd used grew only in the southern stretches of the Waning Woods. Which meant importing it in large quantities was a half-baked daydream. The Belfry had since claimed a breakthrough in figuring out a structural workaround, though, and fresh plans had been passed along to the Workshop a month past. We'd learn if they were truly functional soon enough, at least in principle.

I'd only venture to call it a true success after shoving a spear inside one of those fucking undead dragons collapsed the whole thing, instead of requiring three Named and a full mage contingent to get that job done.

"Might not be, after all," I said. "Though I'll not count the chickens before they're ha- Razin Tanja, you shit."

It'd been a beautiful little ambush, pretty as a pearl: javelins first, then a dozen Malaga foot had emerged to block the road, raising a shield wall the zombies promptly threw themselves against. The slayers had leapt into the chaotic melee and scythed through the lesser undead with almost laughable ease, Lady Aquiline Osená among them. Quick enough all that was left from the massacre was the Bind that'd led the pack. They should have killed it first, by my reckoning, since the zombies would regress to almost animal thoughtlessness after it was broken, but the reason why they hadn't had become rather clear when Razin Tanja stepped forward in chainmail and leather, a hooked sword in hand. The Levantines formed a circle around the two, those with shields in front, and took to shoving the undead back into the middle of the makeshift battle circle when it strayed too far from the Lord of Malaga.

"Foolish," the Lycaonese captain said at the sight, and I grunted in agreement.

Not that Aquiline was any better when it came to this sort of stuff: if anything she was much, much worse. The Grey Pilgrim had made clear that the two lordlings were to listen to my orders, so at least they usually obeyed when I was there to keep an eye on them, but when I wasn't this sort of inanity still cropped up with depressing regularity. It was like someone had chopped out the part of their brains where common sense was and replaced it with glorious single combat instead. Gods, I supposed I should be glad at least they weren't stabbing each other. Apparently the sole Dominion aristocrat killed at the Graveyard – Razin's own father – had not been slain by one of mine or the Tyrant's but instead by the Lord of Alava. I was rather glad that one had ended up on Malanza's front, even if he'd been somewhat easy on the eyes. On the plains the assault company under Tribune Beesbury was cleaning up the last of the zombies with admirable thoroughness and without much trouble, so I decided the Levantines were due the first visit. I could personally praise Beesbury and his three hundred for their work later.

"Grandmaster Talbot," I called out.

Zombie moved under the pressure of my knees almost eagerly, and I could tell she was itching for a flight. I patted her mane fondly.

"Later," I told her.

The leader of the Broken Bells was not long in attending me after the summons, and as a sign that he was getting used to my ways he'd come riding with twenty knights and my banner instead of a courtier's manners.

"Good man," I smiled at him, then turned to my knights. "Lord Tanja seems intent on putting on a spectacle. Wouldn't it be poor manners to fail to indulge him?"

There were a few smiles, and even a laugh. Though Levant's soldiery was not hated among my people, neither was it liked. It had not been forgot that a campaign had been fought against them in Iserre, or that they'd been part of the Grand Alliance back when it was still just a pack of hounds baying for fresh meat. Callowan meat, at least in part. I flicked a questioning glance at Captain Leisberg, to see if she wanted to accompany us, but she shook her head. With a courteous dip of mine I took my leave, staff of yew laid across Zombie's back as we took the lead on our ride down the hill. I kept a brisk pace and made no pretence of hiding my approach, so the Levantines saw us long before we came. Tanja finished his opponent before I got close enough to hail him, a clean blow that carved through the Bind's spine under the throat. The head, still wrapped in leathery but seemingly living flesh, tumbled to the ground. The Levantines let out a cheer. Hiding my irritation, I spurred Zombie onwards quicker, not slowing as I came upon the ring of soldiers surrounding the victorious young Lord of Malaga.

The warriors had to hastily scatter out of my way and instead of pulling on my reins I let Zombie enter the ring at a trot, circling Tanja. So maybe I wasn't hiding my irritation that much, all things considered. By the time Zombie had slowed to a halt, there was only silence surrounding me.

"Hail, Black Queen," Lady Aquiline called out.

"We'll get to you in a moment, Lady Osená," I flatly replied.

Lord Razin Tanja looked up at me with defiant eyes, his tanned skin and coal-black hair framed tight by his helm. It wouldn't do to upbraid him like a child in front of his own men and his betrothed, I reminded myself, even though it was tempting to allow myself to spit out a few scathing lines that'd cut him down to size. On the other hand, it wouldn't do to simply let this go either. He and Osená had been testing me more often lately, as if pushing to see how much I'd take from them. If I gave them an inch now, they'd be reaching for another before day's end. I stared down the Lord of Malaga without blinking until, reluctantly, he opened his mouth.

"Hail, Black Queen," Razin Tanja greeted me.

"And to you, Lord Razin," I calmly replied. "Now, would you care to explain to me why you were tormenting what is most likely the soul of an ancient crusader bound by dark sorcery into unwilling service to the Hidden Horror?"

Ah, the embarrassed silence of someone who'd not quite considered the implications of what they were doing. How nostalgic. I could see why people had done this to me so often, if it was always this darkly satisfying to be standing on this side of the exercise.

"Well?" I prompted amicably. "Do go on. I'm sure your reasons will be... enlightening."

That was just twisting the knife but then I wasn't Razin's mother. I had absolutely no interest in caring for his bruises, be they on his skin or his pride.

"The Volignac companies are already back at camp, last I heard," I casually said. "Because they saw no need to play around with corpses, they're having first crack at the ale rations that just got shipped in from Brabant."

I'd ordered some set aside for the assault formation too, as either reward or comfort for the way the skirmish went, but I saw no pressing need to mention that. Knowledge they'd be laying claim only to what the Procerans saw fit to leave behind went over with the Levantines about as well as I'd figured it would. There wasn't an army on the continent that didn't run on drink and brothels, save perhaps the one we were pitted against.

"It was a good kill," Lady Aquiline said, rallying to the defence of her betrothed.

Gallantly, some might have argued. Some but not me. My eyes flicked to her painted face, hardening.

"Made by a man half a bell late on his march back to camp," I said. "I don't suppose you have anything to say about that, Lady Osen?"

Embarrassment once more, and matching silence. And she should be damn well be embarrassed: they'd been sent out to ensure none of the zombie-makers had gotten or could get at villages, not to mess about. And considering they'd gone out with two hundred warriors each and there couldn't be more than fifty here with them right now, they couldn't even pretend with the parchment-thin claim they'd linked up for safety in numbers. For now, I'd generously assume the other warriors were left behind to be thorough in ensuring the safety of the evacuating Proceran civilians, though I'd be sure to ask pointed questions about this later. I was making no friends among the Levantines here by asserting my authority so bluntly, but then I didn't need to be liked by these people. Only obeyed, and they'd been growing lax about that lately.

"Return to camp," I said, eyes sweeping across the ranks. "I'll expect a distinct lack of detours, this time."

It felt like I was spanking unruly children, which was all the more galling for not being entirely untrue. Neither of them were all that far from me in age, though sometimes I felt more like tired old Klaus Papenheim than the woman of twenty-three I truly was. I could understand why Tariq wanted me to keep an eye on them, too, to both meanings of that. For all their sloppy habits and general recklessness, the two Levantine nobles made for a very charismatic pair when they weren't straining my patience. Both brave and skilled at arms, and while Aquiline was a finer blade and the most popular of the two it was Razin I'd found had the firmer grasp on politics. If the Grey Pilgrim was in the market for successors to keep the Dominion stable after he died, then these two were by far his best bet from the current crop of the Blood.

Sadly, this did not in any way make them less of a trial to deal with.

I didn't linger around the Levantines any longer, guiding Zombie out of the battle circle as my knightly escort and Grandmaster Talbot fell in. The man who'd once been the heir to Marchford rode up to my side as we returned to the hill that'd served as our earlier vantage point.

"The Levantine fondness for duels truly is a tawdry habit," Brandon Talbot said. "It has no place in proper war-making."

"Duels are useful when they can be used to demoralize the enemy," I disagreed.

I'd myself duelled in the past, after all, and sent others to do the same on my behalf. Usually I'd done it to kill a Named foe before they could inflict great losses on my soldiers, or eliminate a titled fae before they could unleash a large working, but there was a reason I didn't use that method unless there was no other choice. Fighting on the front bound your soldiers to you in ways that could be hard to explain – it'd been my willingness to fight on the frontlines that'd first won me loyalty in the Fifteenth – but there was a difference between that and seeking out every duel there was to be had out there. One was sharing risk, the other courting death. Even the Lady of the Lake picked her fights and fled when they turned south on her.

"The dead have no morale," the Grandmaster said, and I didn't disagree. "Which makes all this posturing rather puerile."

"Lord Tanja is young and in need of proving himself to his warriors," I said. "Lady Osená's bloodline is famous for such duels, so there is a reputation to uphold."

"Facts which did not seem to hinder you in the slightest from disciplining them," the older man said, sounding faintly amused.

"Because if they pull something like that against a Revenant after these little victories let them think they're champions, they'll get themselves slaughtered like lambs," I grimly said. "And while it might be a fool's errand to expect Levantines to discard centuries of customs, I'll expect them to at least bend those to accommodate the realities of the war for survival we're fighting."

Neshamah could afford to toss fifty thousand Binds in a pit and forget about them until Last Dusk, if he felt like it. If half the visions the Sisters shared with me of the drow front in the deep north were accurate, then that was the kind of force he was willing to throw away on a fucking distraction. On the other hand, if either of the Dominion nobles got themselves killed the Grand Alliance had a damned mess on its hands. Whether it was about succession, command of their armies or even the casting of blame that'd no doubt follow there would be no part of it that wouldn't end up a nasty turn. So when I saw them playing duellist with undead, you might say my temper rose just a tad at the sight. Even in the wildest streaks of my days as Squire I'd never been reckless for recklessness' sake, much less acted so blithely unaware of the stakes at play.

"Doesn't matter," I finally sighed. "They're only in my charge until we've swept the region clean. We'll be moving on to other things afterwards, and the Pilgrim can shepherd his own cats."

"Another day's march south and we'll have reached into Brabantine lands proper," the bearded knight said. "We ought to be encountering the first of Prince Étienne's forward patrols come morning, and soon after our duty will be discharged."

"Looking forward to a stay in a proper city?" I teased.

"A warm bath," Brandon Talbot reverently said, "and food not cooked in a cauldron. The Heavens smile upon us indeed."

I chuckled. It was funny, the way months in the field could turn the simplest of things into luxuries. I was, myself, looking forward to finally getting a decent drink as well as a full night's sleep: wherever lay diplomacy also lay quality wine and wards good enough I wouldn't need to sleep with one eye open. Hanno was due back from out west, too, which would be nice. It was always easier when he was there to foist off chores o— share the burdens with, I'd of course meant, in an absolutely equal and unbiased manner.

"Let's get this business over with, then," I said. "I've had about as much as I can stomach of spring in these parts and the walking dead do nothing to improve the scenery."

"I'd hardly noticed a difference," Brandon Talbot drily said.

Let it not be said that one of my people had ever willingly let an occasion to rag on Procer pass them by. We returned to the hilltop only to learn that Captain Leisberg had already taken her leave and headed back to camp, from where she'd be changing mounts and riding straight for Prince Klaus' forces further north by the main roads. While I was somewhat irked she'd not stayed around long enough to discuss her impressions of the day's skirmish and the performance of the assault formation, she was not under my command and owed me nothing save perhaps the occasional courtesy. Odds were I'd need to have that talk with the Iron Prince himself, which truth be told I hardly minded. The First Prince's uncle was an old soldier of a breed that was deeply familiar to me: I'd spent most of my life either serving them drinks, fighting them or leading them in battle. If the man had known a few rebel songs and told a story about some wound he took during the Conquest, it might have been enough to make me homesick.

It was brisk business after my return, organizing the return of our soldiers to camp and sending out riders to check on the forces we'd sent further out. While we'd be keeping a force of knights here in case an undead force had slipped our notice and reinforcements were needed by one of our detachments, there was no real need for me to stay here to supervise in person. Grandmaster Talbot was perfectly capable of handling this without my breathing down his neck. Consequently, I'd been preparing to ride away with an escort when Zombie suddenly shivered in discomfort. She'd only ever done that around a single man, which meant it was no deep mystery as to who had finally emerged from the wilds again. It was hard to tell how old the man was, or where he came from, though Indrani had once told me he was only a few years older than her.

Between the tan and the filth, though he could have been from anywhere from twenty to forty and passed as anything but Soninke. I'd expected a Named of his bent to be athletic, but instead he was built like a bear: tall and broad-framed but undeniably heavyset. His clothes were thick leather, save for the fur boots and the beautiful hood he always kept up: lined in ermine and made of fox, it was beautifully sown and it seemed a waste it would be pressed up against long matted brown hair. A long knife and a hatchet at his side, the man might have passed for a warrior of some sort if not for the most eye-catching thing about him: the two great falcons seated on his shoulders, watching me with unnatural poise.

"Beastmaster," I greeted him, turning and betraying no hint of surprise at his sudden presence.

"Black Queen," the man rasped out. "I have found you a quarry."

My eyes narrowed. I'd not expected there to truly be one born from this crisis, as we'd been swift in crushing it. It was worrying it had anyway, even though I'd known the possibility was there. Events were quickening at brisker a pace than even our worst predictions.

"Where are they?" I asked.

"He," the Beastmaster said. "East."

"Where east?" I impatiently said.

"It will be easy to find," the Beastmaster replied, hacking out a laugh. "It is the only village on fire."

Shit, I thought. Couldn't I, just the once, get an easy Named to bring into the fold?

tkjarrah

interesting... ngl this timeskip feels a lot longer than three months, in terms of changes and developments, so when cat said they'd been fighting the dead king's forces for nigh on two years i almost thought that meant that we'd skipped forward two years and had a small heart attack

tkjarrah

also cat's only 23? i thought she was like 26 ish now geez, she's not wrong about how old she seems

Liliet

Let's play "count the time passing"!

Catherine was eighteen during the spring/summer campaign of Book 3. Then the next winter was the one where the heroes came and tried to kill her en masse while Callow rebuilt, and the very next spring was the Crusade's invasion. Black was sitting at Vales that whole time for the exact reason it was about to happen, he didn't spend over a year idle. Also, see again: the one, specific, rebuilding and heroes winter. This makes Catherine nineteen for the time period before the following winter, which is one within which she and Malicia bargained with the Dead King, whereupon she came to Everdark. In Everdark we have our next concrete time marker, because she asserts she is not twenty-one yet. Unless an additional year passed, she has to be no more than twenty, but it technically fits.

This is where the true fuckery starts, though, because we have a concrete marker of one (1) winter of fighting Keter so far: the one titular in Hanno's extra chapters. Book 5 was during that winter.

This is the spring directly after that winter – months of the truce plus the mentioned half a month on campaign. Technically you can tack on more time because it's not specified how long it took between the end of the truce and the arrival of reinforcements in the Prologue, although that makes it incredibly questionable why the fuck it's still spring – the weather was getting spring-y in southern Procer at least three and a half months ago. I suppose we can imagine southern Procer gets spring in no more than a month after the winter solistice, which would give us an additional approximate one and a half months before the end of calendar spring. Assuming seasons last three months in Guideverse, which at this point I'm no longer willing to just assume lmao

All of that said, for Catherine to be twenty-three now, considering the concrete age marker during Book 3, it would have had to be approximately three years. She would have to have taken THREE YEARS to get to the campaign since the truce ended.

Yeah, I. I have nothing.

Or, alternatively, seasons could come less frequently than once per year in Guideverse. Maybe erratic's taking a page out of Discworld's book or ASOIAF's book. Maybe it took over two years-as-counted-in-universe for Catherine to gather her army in Everdark and get through the Iserran campaign until the Prince's Graveyard whereupon the truce started.

That was one LONG winter.

Liliet

P.S. the "three" and "two and a half" years calculations also assume that somehow it took a year and a half between the start of the Crusade and mid-Everdark.

caoimhinh

Another consideration:

Cat was 15 years old at the beginning of Book 1, so to get to the age of 18 by Book 3, at least 2 years and a couple months should have passed, yet Book 1 was only like 3 months, right? I don't think 2 years passed across Book 2. I believe it was a year and a half, tops.

Crash

Nah, I think this is an interpretation problem with the "not yet 2 years of fighting in this chapter".

The way this was written implies that we time skipped after the prologue.

Now, the concret time marker of the everdark is neat for us. Not yet 21, okay. Written like this, I'm prone to believing she didn't just get to 20, she simply hasn't gotten to 21 yet. So let's take the medium spot and assume she is 20 years and 6 months old, or around that marker.

Now, we get some interludes telling us Cat has spent the better part of a year away, and when she returns she likes to use that phrasing when referring to the time spent so far. Which makes me think that as of her return, past the Everdark, we have "not yet 21" + "the better part of a year" which, I think we can take to mean she got to 21 now. So let's assume that at the meetings in Salia she is indeed 21.

Okay, now we got the 3 months of truce plus give or take a few weeks and that leads us to the prologue where the armies walk out of the Twilight Ways.

In this chapter, we become aware of yet another timeskip which is the "not yet 2 years of fighting the Dead." Thus neatly getting us to Cat's 23 years of age if put together to the 3 months of truce and the unspecified amount of time spent in the Prince's Graveyard and return from the Everdark debacle.

Additionally, this explains how Beastmaster could be here at all since presumably Indrani would have had to fetch him and she has said before that he is not always guaranteed to be at Refuge.

caoimhinh

Well, she could have been 18 during the Fae Campaign and be 19 by the time of the Crusade's attack (depends on when exactly is Cat's birthday or how she is marking the time. We have seen some characters, like a Lycaonese girl in an interlude, count their age by the number of Winters they have lived).

By my count, Cat was 20 when she went to the Ever Dark, and they spent somewhere between 6 months and 10 months there. Although Cat counts that as a whole year on more than one occasion, with expressions like "one year ago" and "last year".

She should, nevertheless, be between 21 and 22 right now, not 23.

Liliet

Latest timeline updates, as of recent dedicated archeology work.

(Format note: I know Guideverse uses different months. Since we never got a full calendar, I'm going with our months instead. Just assume 'that 1/3rd of the season')

Catherine's birthday is in late May.
Book 1 begins in mid-May: late enough for Catherine to call it 'summer' when complaining about the heat, early enough that there's still at least a week before her birthday.

The Liesse Rebellion starts in approximately February. Summerholm's in April and Marchford's in May; approximately a month passes between Killian and Cat hooking up post-Summerholm and Three Hills. In Marchford it is STILL SPRING yet Catherine is ALREADY SEVENTEEN.

(This is how we know her birthday. As of Interlude: Precipitation, according to Amadeus, she "has been at this for two years"; Precipitation is in summer after Triumph, which is next spring after that; that makes a full two years and change.)

Catherine returns from Everdark in late winter / early spring before her 19th birthday.

The exact next turn of winter to spring is the Northern Crusade, Catherine is 19 at the time and turns 20 later in spring (either right before the journey to Keter or during it). She is 20 throughout Everdark, which lasts until winter that year, and Book 5, which ends at the end of the same winter.

The projected end of truce with the Dead King is at around the same time as her birthday; she joins the fight soon after (but with enough delay that Otto has time to despair).

Then there's a two year timeskip (repeatedly confirmed in text as two years specifically), and currently is late May/early June: Catherine's birthday has already happened, but the weather is still that of springtime (unpleasantly wet) (it makes sense for spring to be late in the north, which is where they are) and it has not yet been two years since Catherine's forces entered the fray against the Dead King.

Catherine is 23.

Yep, that matches with the age I had of Catherine being 21. Then this timeskip happened (which I do not like), but yeah. She is 23. It was the weird 2-year skip what threw most of us off.

P.S: So far it's been detrimental, in my opinion. Important things of the current plot got stagnated (like the war, where they haven't advanced the Proceran front lines in 2 whole years, despite the combined efforts of most of the continent) while a bunch of background stuff moved without actually having an impact except as supportive or secondary plot whose real meaningful repercussions will be felt just now. There were a lot of characters' personal affairs reaching a climax before the timeskip (Indrani's trauma with death, Masego's answer to her feelings, Catherine's promised talk with the Woe, the initial interactions of Heroes and Villains allying, Malicia's reaction to Amadeus's continuous rebellion, etc) and that was just skipped, and now we will have to learn about it inside one of Cat's mental musings instead of actually watching it happen; all this, just to gain the ability to pull things out of a hat and say "this was built during the past 2 years". I think it was a bad choice.

Liliet

I would argue that the timeskip was the best solution actually. I think Erratic came up with the timeline of events – how this war develops – first, THEN decided how to cover them in the actual book.

I would not have minded getting detailed and extensive endless serial of daily life during this war up to now, yes, I love slice of life. But that's what it would have been – a whole lot of routine and construction (like the industrial novels of the soviet times, which I adore shamelessly), approximately no actual plot.

Erratic chose to skip forward to when the plot picks up the pace again, and I honestly support that decision.

Masego and Indrani weren't going to NOT get along; I'm glad Erratic chose not to milk that for drama and instead skipped forward to a nice cozy status quo. (I wonder if they actually talked. I bet they didn't tbh, Masego wouldn't realize something is non-obvious and Indrani's still skittish)

The talk with the WoE? When was that promised and about what?

Malicia's reaction is absolutely going to come up yet. We don't even know what it will be T0. I mean, we got her initial reaction, what more was there to see up till now?

Indrani's trauma with death was I think quite thoroughly finished and packed away during the Twilight arc. Any immediate further development would be fairly artificial and forced imho.

At the end of Book 5, I was confused about what was going to happen next, and almost wasn't looking forward to Book 6, except in the most abstract sense: things just seemed... finished. All the plot threads packed away, character relationships covered, even heroic reactions to Catherine encompassed in between Antigone, Hanno and Tariq – in the interlude where we got Hanno's POV on the way to the trial town, the reaction after he got hurt, and Tariq's POV in the Epilogue. It was all just... covered. Complete. It was slice of life steady whirr going forward, unless something went seriously wrong, and...

And I expect GREAT things out of the Amadeus situation. Whatever the fuck it actually is 0.0

I disagree.

Why do people keep saying that if we hadn't gotten the 2-year timeskip we would have gotten a bunch of boring daily life chapters? We have NEVER had one of those, the closest were those chapters where Catherine had conversations with Akua, and those were deemed "character development". We always just get glimpses of their duties and daily lives only as a passing matter while they are carrying a greater purpose.

This whole series of books has always used short timeskips to move forward without wasting time in meaningless things while focusing on the developments of the plot, but always showing us the causes and effects of things. For example, we always skipped the time of travel until something interesting happen during the trip. When Cat orders something done, constructed or prepared, we don't see the process of it being done, BUT we do see what made Cat reach that point, her mental process for deciding to order it, and we actually see her making the order. Even when the thing was something secret, we still got to know something was being done. Never was it done as with the Arsenal now.

Imagine what it would have been like if we had never seen Cat carrying her dark staff, seen her putting Night in there, or Kairos mentioning it, and then Catherine had suddenly pulled that sword out of her Night and killed the Saint of Swords with it. Bad, right?

Now, we wouldn't have been shown the construction of the Arsenal day-by-day, nor the organization of the Belfry and the Workshop and their menial task, that's absurd, what makes you think that?

Have we ever been shown the Sappers working on their new siege engines, or the Legionaries while they are building the palisades for a fight? Are we shown their sparring session and their drills? No, but we know those things happen because we are shown when the orders are given and a glimpse from the distance as they are being done and the story follows Catherine while she does other things and orders more to be done.

And the construction of the Arsenal was not the only thing happening, they were in the middle of a war suffering casualties, not calmly sight-seeing. There were lots of hard battles, in some of them they even lost Named, so it's not like there wasn't any action to show.

We should have seen the first battles of the Allied counterattack after Callow and the Drow joined, the casualties and setbacks suffered, the realization that they needed more than just numbers and strength to beat the Army of Keter, ordering the construction of the Arsenal, facing the Heroes as allies for the first time, the reactions of the Heroes having to work with Villains, the first internal conflicts between Heroes and Villains, the first assassination attempts and Cat's realization that hard measures had to be taken, etc.

And so many more things that happened during that 2-year timeskip that are just now mentioned as passing thoughts. That's not a slice of life, nor boring daily menial tasks, that's the plot!

This, though... it is just wrong.

Because this timeskip didn't advance what was necessary and skipped what we needed to see. Timeskips are useful for giving the characters time to prepare for a challenge, yeah. But you don't make a timeskip in the middle of a war and then say "2 years have passed, we haven't advanced at all. But fear not! For with this new thing that wasn't mentioned before the timeskip and was developed during it, we will finally be able to advance!" No, that's just... no.

The talk with the Woe?

Catherine promised Hakram that she would sit with him and the rest of the Woe to explain what had happened in the Ever Dark, what had changed about her, her deal with Sve Noc, the new situation with Akua, and also for Cat to know what had happened with the others during her absence. Plus pretty much just getting a get-together moment after all the mess they had been living. That was either skipped or never happened.

Malicia's reaction ALREADY HAPPENED BECAUSE IT WAS 2 YEARS AGO. The Legions of Terror reaction to both Malicia's mind control and Amadeus declared rebellion was also skipped. There's been a civil war in Praes for 2 years, do you think nothing relevant or worthy of being shown in a chapter has happened? Not to mention the whole mess with the Goblin Federation and the traitorous High Lady Abreha. All that was skipped.

"Indrani's trauma with death was I think quite thoroughly finished and packed away during the Twilight arc."

Not at all. In fact, Catherine strongly got the feeling that such a thing would only be worse after Indrani's actual death. She had constantly been saying that she would speak with Indrani when they got the time for it, and now 2 years have passed, completely disregarding that bit of personal matter.

"At the end of Book 5, I was confused about what was going to happen next, and almost wasn't looking forward to Book 6, except in the most abstract sense: things just seemed... finished. All the plot threads packed away, character relationships covered, even heroic reactions to Catherine"

Not really.

Hanno, Tariq, and Antigone are among the most well-behaved Heroes. They have great self-control (though we have seen they are all capable of great destruction and death). Their reactions are important, but far from the only ones that would happen among the Heroes when they learned they had to work side by side with Villains. Even then, those were the initial reactions to meeting them, that's a whole different thing to having to actually spend time with someone. Meeting someone in a business reunion is not the same as working in the same office as them or sharing an apartment with them. Hugely different things.

The plot threads were pretty much open, as I pointed out before, because there was A LOT of things happening in the personal life of the characters besides the big plot: Hanno had to learn to live with the Seraphim being silent; Masego and Indrani were supposed to have a personal talk about their feelings (I highly doubt Indrani is still skittish about it after 2 years, as you suggested); Pilgrim had to clear his name from doubts about him being partial towards -or being influenced by- the Black Queen; those are just the big ones. 2 years have passed, people keep living, which means they interact with others, relationships are formed and ended, people grow and mature, every single relevant character still alive is continuing their life in ways we don't know, and every single one of them is facing the horrors of the undead army of Keter, which means a good portion of them is traumatized now or dealing with it in some way, which is a thing that affects the army at large and has to be dealt with by the leaders.

All of this was just... skipped. And we will just learn of the aftermath and conclusions of all this, instead of seeing it develop.

Also, the current of events was moving EVERYWHERE, not just in the North of Procer.

Praes had a civil war brewing with many factions involved; Procer was dealing with unrest, political reorganization after the attempted Coup, refugees and hunger; the Dwarves were expanding in the lands of the Ever Dark and making commercial deals with the Grand Alliance, while watching for the moment to join the military offensive; Callow apparently had to deal with civil unrest after Akua's revelation; the League of Free Cities is at war, with General Basilia maybe on her way to become new Tyrant of Helike; and who knows what else was happening that will be revealed as just another afterthought in one of Catherine's musings.

Not to mention that apparently both Catherine and Amadeus have been Claimants for over 2 years without making the transition.

Liliet

> We should have seen the first battles of the Allied counterattack after Callow and the Drow joined, the casualties and setbacks suffered, the realization that they needed more than just numbers and strength to beat the Army of Keter, ordering the construction of the Arsenal

You think they didn't immediately during first strategic planning realize they needed the Arsenal?

Some things just... don't need drama.

> facing the Heroes as allies for the first time, the reactions of the Heroes having to work with Villains, the first internal conflicts between Heroes and Villains, the first assassination attempts and Cat's realization that hard measures had to be taken, etc.

But nothing much changed – we get all the same dynamics now! We're not missing anything.

> The talk with the Woe?

> Catherine promised Hakram that she would sit with him and the rest of the Woe to explain what had happened in the Ever Dark, what had changed about her, her deal with Sve Noc, the new situation with Akua, and also for Cat to know what had happened with the others during her absence. Plus pretty much just getting a get-together moment after all the mess they had been living. That was either skipped or never happened.

Look, I like recap chapters too. But most people actually don't, so uh no I don't blame Erratic for this)=

> The Legions of Terror reaction to both Malicia's mind control and Amadeus declared rebellion was also skipped.

Most of the reaction will still be ongoing now. I do not consider a chapter with a no-name character's perspective on an antagonist's actions to be particularly valuable no.

> Hanno had to learn to live with the Seraphim being silent; Masego and Indrani were supposed to have a personal talk about their feelings (I highly doubt Indrani is still skittish about it after 2 years, as you suggested); Pilgrim had to clear his name from doubts about him being partial towards - or being influenced by- the Black Queen;

We are still getting answers to all of those, in person.

> All of this was just... skipped. And we will just learn of the aftermath and conclusions of all this, instead of seeing it develop.

Yep!

'Slice of life' is not an insult. I love slice of life. It covers the exact kind of thing you're talking about.

It's not the genre that PGTE is.

> Praes had a civil war brewing with many factions involved; Procer was dealing with unrest, political reorganization after the attempted Coup, refugees and hunger; the Dwarves were expanding in the lands of the Ever Dark and making commercial deals with the Grand Alliance, while watching for the moment to join the military offensive; Callow apparently had to deal with civil unrest after Akua's revelation; the League of Free Cities is at war, with General Basilia maybe on her way to become new Tyrant of Helike; and who knows what else was happening that will be revealed as just another afterthought in one of Catherine's musings.

Yep, and all of these things are not our main plot!

I have had an allergy to "side character #14 is not getting the spotlight they deserve" since late homestuck discourse. There are many stories to tell in the world for sure; the specific book is telling THIS ONE. The rest is what fanfiction is for.

> Not to mention that apparently both Catherine and Amadeus have been Claimants for over 2 years without making the transition.

Yep, and I expect that to pay off.

(I never did like the idea of Amadeus becoming DE. The fact that that's not what happened so far fills me with unholy glee)

WealthyAardvark

Cat might be counting the years she accrued while aging the Saint of Swords to death.

Oh shit timeskip

I'm pretty sure we did skip forward almost two years. She was barely 21 last book, right?

Adrian_V

Good question, but i doubt they could be at war for 2 years and survive, or at least without pushing and reclaiming more territory.

caoimhinh

Hmm, I don't think so, I think it's just half a month compared to the Prologue, as evidenced in this line:

[the aristocrat seemed to make it a point of pride to remain nobly groomed even when *out on campaign as we'd been for half a month now.]

The part of "almost two years now" probably refers to the amount of time that has passed since the start of the Dead King invasion.

Otherwise, it seems weird that they are barely starting to adjust the war doctrine and improvising after 2 whole years with the armies still learning to cooperate, while being still in the outermost territories taken by the Dead King (Northern Brabant and Southern Hainaut).

Besides the attitude Cat shows over Razin and Aquiline shows that they are still getting used to being supervised by her, and the conversations also show that they are just getting started with the advancements.

Crash

I personally took this 1 month of campaign to be referring to this specific spot they're fighting at instead of the full time elapsed in the Dead King campaign simply because the wording didn't make sense otherwise

Althought I am catching up now so hopefully the timeline is back to making sense on the next few chapters.

caoimhinh

Also, notice how Catherine was explaining the troops from Tartessos and Malaga to Captain Leisberg, how they fight and why they wear leather armor instead of steel. Something that would not happen if Captain Leisberg had been familiar with them. Considering Leisberg is one of the members of Klaus's personal team, if they had been fighting together for nearly 2 years then she would be familiar with the Dominion's troops sent to their front by now.

This time skip is of only about half a month, and the timeskip between last book's Epilogue and this book's Prologue being close to two months.

Liliet

See my comment above. The timeline nonsensicality is WILD.

Miles

A void demon is eating the years

JJR

Those are purely theoretical constructs. No one has ever observed a Demon of Absence or left records of them, so clearly they don't actually exist.

=P

Yeah, it's probably only a bad choice of words from EE

testalacon2017

There is another timeskip between prologue and chapter 1, two years this time

burguulkodar

No, there is not.

Aston Whiteman

Thanks EE. Great writings.

ruduen

I'd still bet that Cat's birds would have a larger impact than a couple of falcons.

Gunslinger

Is that a two year timeskip? Not complaining, definitely smooths things out in terms of packing.

It also looks like the war against the dead king will be the backdrop for a while as Cat deals with other issues. Again, really promising stuff.

burguulkodar

No timeskip but 2 months since book 5 and half-month from prologue.

Grug

Interesting indeed. Have we ever seen this Beastmaster character before? I don't seem to recall him.

caoimhinh

He's one of the Named disciples of Ranger (5 in total if I recall correctly).

Indrani mentioned him way back in Book 2, during their first encounter with a Demon.

caoimhinh

Correction: Indrani mentioned him in Book 4 Chapter 24: Invitation (Redux), when they were considering options of allies for Callow, right before they decided to go to Keter.

"I could go to Refuge," Archer offered. "Most pupils will be gone, especially the heroes – last I heard Silver signed up with the White Knight – but there's bound to be one or two left I can beat into joining. Lady Ranger probably won't care enough to get involved."

I worried my lip with my teeth.

"Even by gate, it'd take most entire preparation time to get there and back," I finally said. "I wouldn't sneer at more Named, but I doubt they'll be enough to turn the tide unless some real powerhouses have been keeping quiet."

Sir Banana Hammock

I'm so hyped for this new book, any ideas on what Cat's Name is going to be?

caoimhinh

It could be anything at this point, honestly.

Most of the fandom is supporting either the Name of Dread Empress or a brand new Name related to being a Guide. I'm one of the latter, but it could be anything, Tariq mentioned a Name starting to take shape in the end of last book, but that was at Catherine's statement of "I will get the east in order the hard way." if Praes sallies forth against them, yet it could still come to nothing, like what happened with the Name of Black Queen, even if the Name takes shape and presents itself, it can still be refused or the process interrupted (like Cordelia and the Name of Warden of the West).

That said, EE has made a point through the last couple of books that having Catherine as a Named in all but name is kind of the thing now.

TeK

He kinda made a point that Names are not necessarily the best outcome.

caoimhinh

Yeah, kind of.

I mean, for all that talk about not having a Name meaning you have “no strings attached”, Catherine pretty much still lives and acts the way a Named does.

She is still personally and directly affected by stories, which forces her to think in those terms if she wants to win and outright survive even when having a conversation with a Hero; she still gets into Patterns of Three with Heroes; can be part of a Band of Five; Callow as a whole is still tied to her by Story, and the Heroes still see her as a Villain.

There hasn't been much difference except that she no longer has the boost of strength and agelessness of Villains, and even then Cat found a way to circumvent that by having a Fae Title and now being First Under the Night. She has periods now, though.

The only supposed advantage was that the Intercessor couldn't get to her directly and influence her the way she does to other Named, yet we already saw that such is not exactly the case, as we have seen the Bard appear and talk to others so long as there's another Named present, and Cat's mere mention of the Wandering Bard was enough to get her caught in a Time Bubble for a private chat with the Intercessor.

So what exactly is the difference?

Even her approach of “without Named rulers, countries won't have to fight each other for their battles” that's still what happens with Nameless rulers, Named simply have more personal involvement in such things. As long as rulers exist there will be whole countries affected by their decisions and armies dying when fighting their battles.

So it kind of defeats the purpose of avoiding a Name if she still is pretty much a Named, just without the official tag. And the rest of Calernia doesn't care either, they still treat her as if she had a Name.

TeK

I think she trailblazing the precedent of participating in the Plot without having a Name. Because everything you said is true. She is as important as a Named, and yet has no Name. So what sets her apart from "common folk"?

hakureireimu

Cat's working out a Mom-mode for wrangling Razin and Aquiline. Though Razin has disappointed me with this dueling nonsense. I thought he'd learned better.

Yes, the Lycaonese are going to be way more practical and pragmatic when it comes to warfighting than Levantines. The Levantines are all glory hounds first. Even the smarter ones.

'Ladi Williams

I suspect he's trying to gather rep from his soldiers by showing no fear...due to his young age.

Jacob McNeer

He's learned not to enter into honor duels against allies, he still needs to learn that they aren't a very good idea against enemies either.

Aston Whiteman

I suppose the joke about how a guy and girl only need to be in the same room for people to start shipping them applies here.

Agent J

Guy and Girl? In the same room? Do you think my shipping so feeble a thing it requires such senseless limitations?

I happily ship Indrani x Agnes, thank you very much. We all know the Augur is a sweet and kindly girl that needs a bit of wildness in her life. Someone to playfully pester her out of her shell.

Adrian_V

Ok i need to know how they managed to get the Beastmaster to come, it seems a lot happened between books, last i remember Idrani dismissed him because he wouldn't want to help them or something, although i wouldn't be surprised if The Raned ordered those in refuge to help, or maybe the prospect of this war was enough to entice him to come out? I mean many people have mentioned how this whole business would make the old monster come out and all (monster being people/beings with power).

Also what is the Workshop?

caoimhinh

Indrani said Beastmaster wouldn't help Callow fight against the Crusaders, fighting against the Dead King is a different matter.

As for the two organizations named this chapter with only the barest of context, I would say the Belfry is the group of Priests and the Workshop the unified mage/alchemist troop of the Grand Alliance. That's my hypothesis, anyway.

"This is treason," the man screamed.

"This is inevitability," Amadeus replied.

Some of the crowd rose. Swords were unsheathed, incantations whispered. It would be for naught.

"Some of you," the Black Knight said, "will fight this. Will cling to the old order, futile as it may be. For you I come bearing the word of the Empress."

Isaac Martinez

Is Cat counting on the years she used to kill The Saint?

Isaac Martinez

How old is Cat now?

Onos

Depends. If the years from her not-a-sword count (I think 11?) she's 34. If the 2ish years she spent as Winter don't count she's either 21 or 32. She's probably also spent long enough in Arcadia or thereabouts to throw things off slightly between her physical and chronological birthdays, but I wouldn't imagine by terribly much yet.

She did note that her not-a-sword didn't seem to affect her so hopefully we get an Interlude with someone musing on her age/appearance soon.

Mental Mouse

Well, everyone outside herself are counting years strictly by the calendar, and Cat knows that. So from their point of view, she's 23, no matter whether she looks like a 20-year-old (most likely) or a 30-year-old.

'Ladi Williams

What does he mean by a "quarry" in this case?

The way Cat thot about it. Seems it's a major issue...

Fayhem

Basically, the war against the dead has started popping up new Named and the Beastmaster has been scouting out when they show up so they can be properly incorporated into the war effort. He just reported that he found one to Cat, and she's mad because the new Named she has to go recruit into the army already sounds like a pain who will probably start fires she'll get blamed for.

ninegardens

To me it sounded like someone has recently come into a name, and Cat is planning to go recruit them.

caoimhinh

And that would also mean the guy is most likely a Villain. A Hero coming to his Name during the war on Keter would need no encouragement to join their campaign against the Dead King.

Fayhem

Well, they wouldn't need any encouragement to fight the Dead King. Doing so as part of an organized campaign where they take orders from other people (where leadership's a mix of Heroes, Villains, and non-Named to boot) is where it tends to get sticky with Named.

ActionKermit

Here we go, Cat's now fighting her way through a zombie infested bog just like she did when she got her first Name!

Wasn't it a single winter, and then three more months?

TeK

I am confused about the timeline and her age since she was sixteen.

Daniel E

Something occurred to me upon the introduction of Beast Master here (not counting the 1-line mention from way back). Every single Villain we have seen thus far has been a main character, or otherwise directly affiliated with one, whereas random Heroes are popping up all over the place. Are there no minor Villains in the realm? I imagine there have to be at least a few people who get their powers from the Gods Below, but simply aren't in the spotlight. Like a Villain equivalent of Painted Knife and all the other newbies from Camps.

Kini

I think it's more an artifact of Cat not really paying attention to any villains that aren't her direct peers/rivals than anything else

Dresden 67

The Ghastly Marauder and an unspecified villain sorceress were mentioned by the Pilgrim and Black during 'Peers'.

Apparently the Marauder refused to get involved in the war out of fear of the Saint, while the sorceress was killed by the Tyrant; purely because it amused him.

Daniel E

Good catch. Though that is still quite a disparity in numbers.

Fayhem

It's been brought up in canon that Saint and Pilgrim between them were doing to villains in the rest of Calernia what Black and the Calamities were doing to heroes in Callow. I.e., snuffing them out pretty damn quick.

Hydrargentium

One might think that Praes would produce a decent share of villains, but it may very well be that Black dealt with most of those to prevent challenges to his order, the same way that he and Wakesa both challenged their predecessors. It may also be that the Empress Malicia, First of Her Name, has such a strong hold of the goings-on inside her empire that few even get the chance to become Named in the first place – the noble mentioned in the last Epilogue who had been “only a few moves away from becoming Chancellor”, being a possible example of that, if we assume that Chancellor is a Name.

Well, Praes did produce a decent share of villains – the Calamities. All the traditional Praes Names (bar Chancellor ofc) were already represented – Black Knight, Dread Empress, Warlock – with a handful of supporting Names as well, meaning Captain, Assassin, and Scribe. And good ol' Heiress, tho she obv was not part of that power structure.

I don't get the sense that individual nations tend to produce huge number of Named, at least at any single point in time – the Crusade only managed to scrape so many together by adding up practically the whole continent outside of Callow + Praes. With so many casualties in the Calamities it seems possible there could be new claimants to those Names in Praes now though, which could be interesting.

All that said, it is also true that being Named and unaligned with the existing power structure/regime might not be... amazing for long-term health in Praes. So that's a fair point as well.

Chapter 2: Enlistment

“My lords and ladies, have I not always been a firm believer in second chances?”

– Dread Empress Malevolent II, announcing her second (and penultimate) invasion of Callow

This would be the fifth one I brought in, so to speak.

The first time I’d come across a new Named was maybe two weeks after the first proper battle that’d followed Callow entering the war, which one of my own soldiers had jauntily named the ‘Scrap at the Gap’ only to see the quip tumble down into the pages of history. It’d been our first use of a pharos device, and the proliferation of gates out of the Twilight Ways had allowed us to take the dead flatfooted. The soldiers under Volignac and Papenheim had rallied with burning rage in their bellies, and we’d turned the chase around on Keter: we’d forced the dead to retreat and even dented the Grey Legion.

At the time we’d believed we could reclaim all of Hainaut if we struck out aggressively enough, so we’d concentrated on reclaiming the roads and strongholds of the western region of principality: the aim had been to establish a solid defensive line all the way to the border with Cleves and after solidifying root out the dead as we moved north in a Hainaut-wide curtain. No one had expected there to be anything still living in the region, for Keter had had the run of it for months, which was why when the Tartessos scouts had begun finding the remains of small undead raiding packs we’d expected a monster and not a half-feral woman in her seventies.

The Stained Sister had shattered Hakram's shoulder and nearly blinded him when we'd gone out to find what might be lurking in the hills. She'd been one of Hanno's, not mine, for even three days buried up to her neck in the corpses of everyone she'd ever known had not been enough to break her faith in Above. She'd listened anyway, when I laid down the law as it had been agreed on: so long as Named were willing to take up arms against Keter, they would fall under the aegis of the Truce and Terms.

Amnesty was offered to all willing to join the war against extinction, and peace would be kept between villains and heroes until the Dead King was no more. For those who were sworn to Above, the White Knight stood as representative in councils and first among equals. For those that dwelled in Below's shadow, the same duties fell to me. It was a simple enough arrangement, in principle. In practice it'd been as about as horribly complex and strenuous a state of affairs as I'd expected it to be, and it'd been a very long time since I was last called an optimist.

I'd picked up two more during our offensive to take back the capital late last summer, the two of them pretty middling villains – one lowlife gambler who'd managed to survive by stealing other people's luck and using it to avoid and escape the dead, the other a hedge mage who'd slit open her own brother's throat to fuel an enchantment that made her invisible to Dead King's armies but was now beset by his furious shade. Half-starved and almost pathetically grateful to be given shelter, the two of them had accepted the Truce and Terms without batting an eye. Unsurprisingly, getting them to toe the line afterwards had been more difficult.

The Pilfering Dicer now had nine fingers to illustrate the point that stealing the luck of my soldiers wasn't something you could talk your way out of, but at least I'd pawned off the mage to Indrani for her roving band and gotten only praise about her since. The Dicer I'd sent instead to the First Prince, as his talents were best suited for the sort of battles she was fighting on our behalf. The fourth had been both the easiest and the worst, in some ways, for though he'd come to me instead of the other way around it would be very much a delusion to claim I had any sort of control over the Beastmaster.

As I could not help but be reminded when the man opened his eyes, breathing out deeply.

"There are still a few," Beastmaster said. "Three or four. Less than earlier."

I looked at the great blaze across the half-dug dry moat and grimaced. It was rather surprised anyone but the fresh Named was still living.

"And you didn't consider helping them flee when you first noticed?" I replied, tone curt.

"And risk the ire of a green Named who could already do this?" Beastmaster snorted, gesturing towards the village.

The falcon that'd flown over the nameless village returned to its master's shoulder, undisturbed at having leant him its eyes while it was still up there. The Named at my side might not be anywhere as proficient a combatant as someone like Indrani or Hanno, but his talents were surprisingly broad in application and it'd be a rough affair to put him down if it came to that: I'd seen some of the creatures the Beastmaster used as mounts, and none of them were beasts to take lightly even without a rider on their back. More than anything else the man had proved his worth as eyes up in the sky even in regions where scrying might be disrupted, as was becoming increasingly common. His stable of birds of prey currently had a better record at tracking people than our sorcery, since even young Names could sometimes disrupt scrying ritual. There was a reason I kept the man close, and it wasn't his charm or sunny disposition.

"If he meant to kill them, they'd already be," I said, tone grown sharp.

Matted hair pressed against the side of his eyebrow, thick with filth, the man shrugged apathetically. I wasn't sure whether Beastmaster had been born a prick or he'd been taught the ancient ways of prickery by one of the finest practitioners of the art alive – the Ranger herself – but his utter unwillingness to risk so much as the tip of his toe for another's sake had a way of raising my hackles. Even when Indrani had been fresh out of Refuge and the Lady's tutelage she'd not been this... savagely unconcerned with everything that went on around her.

"Fine," I said. "Tell my knights where the survivors are, they'll help them out. Where's the boy?"

"The House of Light," Beastmaster said.

If this was going to be one of the religious ones, I really hoped it'd made it this far north that the Salian Conclave had struck down its decree naming me the Arch-heretic of the East. If I was lucky, they might even have heard that instead the Dead King had been proclaimed Arch-heretic Eternal. Lucky, huh. That'd be the fucking day. I whistled loudly, Grandmaster Talbot riding up without missing a beat or betraying irritation at the somewhat undignified summons.

"Beastmaster had eyes on survivors," I told the knight. "Have some your people get them out. Our healers are fresh?"

"Good as, my liege," Brandon Talbot replied. "Though I'll caution once more they are not the finest of that trade."

Yeah, the House Insurgent did tend to have that little defect. You couldn't learn to burn with Light without missing out on the deeper secrets of healing, apparently. The Grey Pilgrim had once told me it was more a consequence of mindset than a hard limit of ability, but then there was no one alive who could use Light the way Tariq Fleetfoot did – not even Hanno, who had the shade of near every dead hero up in the library shelves of his head.

"Have them do what they can," I grimly said.

Burns were nasty way to go.

"I'll be seeing to the hero," I added a moment later. "Hurry with the survivors, Talbot."

The man nodded, and after a nod to the Beastmaster – who bothered himself to return it, though seemingly with great effort – I rode out. This place must have been a nice little village, once upon a time. How many people had lived here? One hundred, two hundred? Couldn't be more than that. There was rarely such a thing as a proper street in places like this, even a dirt one, and this village was no exception. There were a tighter cluster of once-thatched houses now blazing up trails of smoke surrounding what might have once been a village market, but aside from that houses and shops had been raised rather haphazardly. They were scarcer on the outskirts, with the house nearest to the unfinished ditch standing entirely alone.

Zombie did not even need to jump over the trench, as a quick walk around the edge of what had been dug accomplished the same result rather less dramatically. It'd been poor sense, trying to dig a dry moat in so wide a circle. The villagers would have done better trying the same further in, or better yet raising a palisade instead. There was no way the work could have been finished in time to repel the dead, not with the numbers they had. What I'd been looking for was a mere three steps away from the edge of the finished ditch, slumped and still. I slowed my mount, frowning as I leant down to turn the corpse with the tip of my staff. At first glance the killing looked like it'd been done with Light, a hole torn right through the chest of the still-living woman, but the edges were too blackened. Charred.

Light was cleaner than this when used on living people, even those corrupted by curses and sorcery. Light and fire threaded together? Unusual. I would have thought someone more prone into coming a Name apt to wielding that if they'd been forged from a great fire, not the source of one. Hooves sounded against the ground behind me, a belated escort of knights. It was still a reflex for me to argue against the necessity of one, but there'd been twenty-three different assassination attempts against me in the last year. Few had even come close, but I'd been taught the virtues of having eyes other than mine and armoured bodies in the way of harm.

"I'll be entering the House alone," I spoke without turning. "I'll not have numbers spooking our friend."

"If you so order, my queen," Grandmaster Talbot replied, the genteel disapproval in his tone clear.

I rolled my eyes. If the boy who'd done this still had fighting on his mind it was a lot more likely I'd end up protecting my escort than the other way around. I let the body I'd been examining slump back against the ground and spurred Zombie onwards. We passed through the outskirts briskly, though I slowed once more to verify the sort of injuries on other corpses were the same as the first before heading deeper in. Towards what should have been the market, as well as the small dirt path beyond it and led to the sole building in the village that was tall stone with a tiled slate roof: the House of Light. There the Named would be waiting, I knew, though I would not cross the threshold before figuring out exactly what it was I was dealing with here. Whether the boy was a hero, a villain or of those whose Role tread that narrow path where circumstance could cast you as either did not matter so much as the fact that he'd seemingly butchered an entire village.

If he was a hero, as the use of Light to kill would imply, he was unlikely to be the kind I got along with.

We closed in on the market, where the roar of the flames was almost deafening. Wary of entering the central grounds, where heat had hardened and cracked the muddy grounds, I led Zombie into lingering at the edge of the circle in one of the larger gaps. There'd been an inn among the lot of them, I noted, though it was hard to tell exactly how large it'd once been. It'd been hit hardest of all the village: the walls had been torn through with great blasts of Light, then the ceiling had fallen and caught fire. Even that rubble, though, was not enough to hide the sheer number of corpses there'd been inside. Those the flames had not yet devoured were close to the door, some even just out into the 'street'. They, I saw, had been hit in the back. The Grandmaster of the Order of the Broken Bells caught up to me as I sat studying the burning inn, face betraying utter disgust what he beheld.

"Gods," Brandon Talbot rasped out. "Even the children."

Only one of those was untouched by flame, pale brown hair fanning her face like a veil but doing nothing to hide the black-rimmed hole that'd torn through the middle of her back. There were bones I could see in the embers and flame, though, that even blackened could not be mistaken for those of a grown man. And yet. Gods, and yet.

"Do you still remember that skirmish just a week away from the capital, last summer?" I quietly said. "What happened to that company of Volignac outriders, when they found that little village tucked away in the reeds."

"The dead wearing the guises of children," the bearded knight said, tone sickened. "I'd heard. I do not blame them for fleeing, Your Majesty. I am not certain if I could have done it myself, striking down infants with knight's steel."

And so Neshamah's abominations would have torn you down from your horse and clawed out your throat, I thought, the way they did too many of those honourable outriders. Honour has no place on this field. Not against the kind of foe we face. My voice came out cool, a warning under the swirling columns of smoke.

"This is not a war, Brandon Talbot, where hurried judgements thrive. Do not forget that."

Yet sometimes I wondered if that was not Below's game, lurking behind everything else. Even if we won against Keter what kind of creatures would we have become when we emerged from the crucible? Already I'd grown wary of castigating the slaughter of children without knowing more of how it'd come to be, and we'd yet to even step into the Dead King's lands. There was an old saying about the dangers of looking into the abyss that most peoples of Calernia held some form or another of. It'd been taught to me at the orphanage as 'beware of matching horror's eyes, lest it gaze back into yours', one of those Old Miezian sentences turned into proverbs only nobles and priests ever seemed to quote. The thing, though, was that horror wasn't sickness. It wasn't something that tainted you from watching it or fighting it, like ink or filth or oil.

Horror, horror was a pit.

It was a deep dark hole the world pushed you into, remorseless. Sometimes the only way through was to wade through the deeps of it, do whatever it took, and there lay the trouble: even if you got to climb out, after, who you'd been in that pit would never leave you. Gods, it'd be reassuring if it was a taint that'd made the decision for you, but it wasn't. Not really. It was just you, when you were scared and cold and desperate and didn't want to die. That tended to be an uglier sight than devils, in my experience. Nowadays Calernia was being dragged into the pit, one inch after another, and there were nights where that thought kept me from sleeping. Lessons learned in the deeps of pit were long in being unlearned, if they ever were at all. What kind of a world was it, that Cordelia Hasenbach and I would end up raising out of the ashes of the old?

"I sometimes wonder if even heroes are worth it," Grandmaster Talbot softly said, "if they must always be born of such grief."

"Men murder men," I said. "They rob and cheat and lie. From all I know we've done so since the First Dawn and will keep on doing it until the Last Dusk. Don't blame the blade for the heat of the forge, Talbot."

I bared my teeth.

"Blame the fucker who lit the furnace."

Though in this case, I thought, the two might just be the same. My gaze had moved on from the inn, swept across the rest of this would-be marketplace, and a story had unfolded before my eyes. It'd begun with the inn. There had been a gathering there, with perhaps as many as a hundred packed tight inside. The Named had let loose his power, moved to violence by something, and then the nightmare had begun. The villagers had been packed too tightly: panic and stampede began to kill them just as much as the power unleashed. The place had caught fire, smoke and heat further stirring the pot, and even as some tried to escape through the back the Named had left by the front to strike down the few that'd successfully escaped. The relief inside was short-lived, as the roof collapsed not long after.

From there, the tale grew murkier. I'd wager that the noise and escapees had moved those few villagers with a weapon to try to kill the Named, and he'd reacted... harshly. I'd yet to catch sight of him going for anything but a killing blow. From there it looked like the boy had swept through the village, heading to wherever he saw movement and killing until there was no one left save for a handful of hidden survivors. He'd then limped back to the House of Light, either exhausted or wounded or both. I breathed out, almost comforted by what I'd grasped. I was not dealing with coldblooded thrill-killer or a broken bird grown dragon's claws: wildly wandering around striking down those who moved in a panic was a mark of lapsed control. Lack of premeditation, too.

This was too much fear and too much power, not the first atrocity of a great monster in the making.

"You seem grieved, my queen," the knight quietly said, voice almost drowned out by the blaze.

"Better it had been a monster, Talbot," I tiredly said. "One of those I would have been able to use without guilt."

Zombie pulled ahead, answering my mood before my knee gave the order. The breeze shifted: like raking claws, threads of smoke were blown across our path. We rode through and broke the ghostly shackles, flanked by the unforgiving blaze on both sides as my mount's hooves broke the hardened mud beneath them. And then, quick as a stolen kiss, the heat and smoke were gone. We tread then the path to the House of Light, where flame had not reached. Yet blood had, for it was smeared over the wooden door left slightly ajar. I dismounted smoothly, though not so smoothly that I did not hiss in pain when my bad leg touched the ground, and lay a light slap against Zombie's rump. She left to wander, gait unhurried, and a last look over my shoulder quelled any thought my knights might have held of following me inside. The Mantle of Woe trailing behind me, leaning on my staff of yew as I limped forward, I cracked the door open just enough to slip in and entered the temple.

There was a skylight. That was the first thing I noticed. Though a village like this was too poor to afford glass windows and so the walls had been full stone, a clever trick of architecture had allowed for the making of a skylight in what I'd taken to be just a lightly angled roof. And it had been cleverly done, too, as it was carved to allow for the sun's journey through the day. The stone floor had been painted with scenes from the Book of All Things and different times of the day would see light fall on different parts. It had been most ingeniously built, for a temple in the middle of nowhere. Procerans: so much to hold in contempt, so much to admire. Light fell from above on the painted scene of Gods in black and white standing on both sides of the wan silhouette of a woman, theirs hands held out. A choice offered.

The drying trail of blood that'd trickled down all the way to the woman was one of those vicious little ironies Creation was so fond of offering.

My staff struck the floor as I limped up, sounding obscenely loud in the silence of this place. At my sides roughly hewn benches, some of which had been toppled by struggle or negligence, only made it more palpable how empty the House was. At the very back, behind the painted scenes and the light, two bodies lay slumped. One was that of a priest, still clad in his pale robes. He was dead, a long cut-like wound opened from one shoulder to the opposite hip – and though it still bled blood, all the way to the painted stone, the outer edges of it were charred. Eyes wide open and unseeing of the sun pouring through the skylight, the back of his head lay against the altar he'd once tended to. Against the other side of the altar, bloodied and burned, lay the young boy who'd butchered more than a hundred souls beyond the gates of this place.

His face was a charred ruin. Stories, when they spoke of burns at all, delighted in telling of villains whose burn scars were disfiguring marks warning of wickedness. In a few there was even shoddy symbolism attempted: a face half-burned, the duality of a man's soul, Good and Evil at war. The boy's face just looked like someone had held it down against a fucking fire, and there was nothing elegant or symbolic about that. It was just pain and ugliness and pus, having devoured an uneven two-thirds of the face of a kid who couldn't be more sixteen. It'd taken an eye with it, or close enough, as it had grown a clouded grey instead of whatever colour it'd once held. On the right side, on the part left untouched by fire, a lone blue eye and closely cut black hair were almost incongruously healthy compared to the rest of the young Named.

The boy wore a leather jerkin and woolen trousers, both so worn as to be near rags, and his shoes were little more than leather strips wrapped around a flat wooden sole. The wound I'd suspected he might have proved to be a knife slash on his leg, though not near anything that'd kill him. It'd still gone untreated and soaked the wool red. Not that infection was likely to kill him, now that he was Named. It was exhaustion, pain and horror keeping him down.

"Are you to be my punishment?" the boy rasped out. "I have sinned and do not deny it."

Gods, I thought, stricken. He sounded so very resigned.

"Have you?" I said, making myself sound only mildly interested. "Tell me about it."

"I am-"

"That is yet to be determined," I mildly said, cutting in. "Tell me about the killings."

The Alamans boy – and he must be that, for his accent in Chantant had that lakeside twang to it – forced himself to focus. His blue eye fluttered and the cloudy one turned to me as well, some thought returning to the gaze. He watched me and I returned the look, leaning on my dead staff of yew.

"You are not," the Named said, "an angel."

My answering smile was thin and sharp.

"Not," I agreed, "in any sense of the word."

"Who are you, then?" the boy rasped out.

"The judge, child," I said. "And if comes to that, the other two as well."

The Named laughed, though the convulsion twisted him in pain.

"A fitting end," he said. "I took their lives, stranger. I blinded and burned until nothing was left. How do you judge that?"

"Sloppy," I said, tone cool. "The inn was the correct place to begin, but to let loose while you were still inside? Sloppy is almost too kind a word. Packed that tight, all it took was a stroke of luck and any one of them might have caved your head in. You should have left, barred the doors and only then started the flames."

The boy's face twisted with rage at my indifference.

"I couldn't know if they were all-"

He stopped, biting his tongue. Ah, I thought. There it is. He'd wanted me to splatter him across the stones, justice swiftly done and harshly meted. But there'd been something more about this, a part still obscured. And where gentleness would unearth nothing this wounded child wanted buried, calculated callousness might just bait it out.

"You're not from here, are you?" I mused. "You've got that lakeside twang, like you're always chewing. It's a long way south, for a boy of no great means."

Lack of boots meant his family had never been even remotely wealthy. Refugee, it had me guessing. From one of the later waves, long after soldiery had ceased escorting civilians south.

"What does it matter?" the boy asked.

"Means either you came with someone," I said, "or you were capable of making it alone."

"Did you not see my work outside, stranger?" the Named mocked.

Confirmed, then, that the power wielded there was something he'd had for some time.

"I saw your convulsing terror burned across a few hundred people," I agreed. "So what is it that had you so scared, boy?"

The Named grit his teeth.

"I am-"

"Meat, until I deem it otherwise," I interrupted once more, tone gone cold. "So speak, boy."

I saw anger, in eyes both blue and clouded, and anger was an anchor. I knew that as bone deep as I knew my limp and the sound Liesse had made when it broke. It would keep him grounded in the here and now, at least long enough for our talk.

"It was too late," he snarled. "The disease was in them, same as it was in Maman. And I told them, told them I could see it and they needed to send for a real priest, but they just wouldn't listen-"

His mouth closed with a snap.

"I do not beg for my life," the boy said. "I do not quibble nor defend."

And it fell into place, just like that. The ditch begun but abandoned, the way so many of them had been gathered in the same place.

"They were going to leave," I said.

I saw I had the right of it in the boy's eyes, even if he denied me an answer. A makeshift caravan of some sort, most likely, headed further south for one of the great refugee camps. When I'd last gotten a report on the seeded plague from the Grey Pilgrim, he'd mentioned his worry that there might yet be carriers in who the disease would be sleeping. Lying in wait. He'd caught the infiltrators headed for Brabant himself, but not even heroes could be everywhere. If the boy was right and the villagers had slipped further south without being caught? Thousands dead, should we be lucky. And we'd be putting out that fire for months instead of heading north as we needed to, losing a good chunk of the war season. This might not be the only village where it was attempted, I thought. If it was attempted all, I also considered, and the boy did not simply go mad with enough will it became... more.

I'd need Akua to study the bodies as well few survivors we'd pulled out. More than that, if this was the plan within the Dead King's plan then I needed to put out a warning there might be other villages like this out there. Villages that'd not had the mixed of luck of being stumbled upon by a Named.

"I couldn't let them," the boy said. "And they weren't real miracles, I know the priests said so, but they worked."

My gaze moved to the priest, dead and cold, the wound that was bloody but hardly mortal. If you could heal, anyway, use the Light. The boy was no natural wielder of Light, I realized, smiled upon by the Heavens and bestowed some manner of searing holy flame. But he did have a power he'd been born with. An eye for recognizing a magically seeded disease, the ability to wield highly concentrated light and flame in short bursts while losing control of it upon release? Those were the marks of a wild talent, a born mage. And one of great power, to have torn through a village while so unschooled. How badly you must have wanted to be anything but a mage, I thought, for the only magic you ever used to be such a close mimicry of the Light. It was heartbreaking. That he'd been warped into this, that he'd been broken after even that and then forced to look a truth in the eye: he had the power to fight back against horror, just this once.

So long as he was willing to make a horror of his own.

"It was," I mused, "an easy mistake to make."

The blue eye fixed me with burning contempt.

"It was not," the boy replied. "And so mistake is either too feeble a word, or entirely mistaken."

"I was speaking," I replied, "of the mistake I made. I came in here, you see, expecting you to be one of Hanno's."

The Saint of Swords come again, my mind whispered. Necessity that bleeds the grip, the hard deed that keeps the night at bay. The bottom of my staff whispered against the stone as I limped forward and the young Named tensed, though truth be told he'd be too exhausted to put up a fight if taking his life was my intent. Instead, leaning against the yew I knelt in front of him – and, miracles of miracles, the pain in my leg was barely a whisper. Meeting the mismatched gaze, the clouded eye and burning blue, I reached out and gently tipped up his chin.

"My mistake," I quietly repeated. "No, from the beginning you were one of mine."

The gentleness, I thought, was what unmade him. A shiver went through his frame, turning into a tortured convulsion and only then a ragged sob tore its way out of his throat.

"I'm a monster," the boy wept. "Gods forgive, oh Gods forgive me."

My hand went down to his shoulder, comforting.

"Of course you are," I gently said. "That's what makes you one of mine. We're the wicked ones, you see."

"I don't want to be wicked," he rasped. "I just- I just couldn't..."

"We never can," I softly told him. "That's how we end up wicked, I think. Because we can't stand to be good, if it also means we must let it go."

"I didn't want to kill them," the boy whispered, "but what else could I do? If I'd had the Light, the real one, I could have healed them. Helped them. Instead..."

I drew back my hand and leaned on the yew I'd received in the depths of Liesse, born anew under twilit sky. I rose, the light behind me drawing the eye to the snaking crimson blood of the dead priest on painted stone. You are a child, I thought.

"That is not the gift you were given," I said.

"My gift is death," he spat.

"Aye," I said. "So it is. Either accept that truth or die under the weight of your utter inconsequence."

The boy-Named flinched. He had, perhaps, expected comfort. Maybe a better woman would have offered it.

"The corpses smouldering outside were good, as much as most people are ever good," I said. "What do you think sets you apart from them?"

"Death," he said.

"Will," I corrected. "The belief, deep down, that you know what is right and you'll see it done."

He hesitated.

"It is the mark of Named," I said. "And why, even now, some part of you wonders – wasn't I right? Didn't it need to be done?"

"Did it?" the boy asked, prayed, pleaded.

You are a child, I thought once more, almost ashamed.

"What's your Name?" I asked.

"I am Tan- no, that is not the sort of name you meant at all, is it?" the boy whispered.

His fingers clenched.

"I am the Scorched Apostate," the boy said.

I nodded in approval.

"Come along, then," I said. "You have much to learn, and this war won't fight itself."

I did not wait for an answer, simply turning around and limping away without once looking back. One, two, three heartbeats: the Scorched Apostate dragged himself up to his feet and followed behind me, quickening his steps to catch up. You are a child, I thought once more. But we're in the pit, now, and if Keter is to fall then this is the least of the horrors I'll need to stomach.

We left the House of Light to its dead priest.

Neither of us looked back.

New Named! NEW NAMED! Huzzah, a new Villain!

Liliet

New coming of the Saint of Swords, Cat said. Granted he's not wielding Light, but neither was Saint.

I think everyone in-universe is growing increasingly confused about what villains even are, if this one's pegged as one.

Indignantpup

A hero would have been given the tools needed for the situation or possibly just tool, a Villain can and will lose. A hero might have saved them, but a villain can only make a large loss into a smaller one.

Darkening

I'm pretty sure she was saying that she'd thought he was another in the mold of the Saint, but then she realized he was a villain, not a hero.

Mammon

Or maybe he really was a new Saint, and she cleverly nope'd that with a few Story strings tugged and the Narrative subtly diverted to turn this would-be Grim Hero that would become a new Saint into a Villain instead to avoid that hassle.

medailyfun

One can do something like this before the Name was gained, not after

Ahad Mahmood

Whilst you can't change them immediately, Vivian and Indrani had semi heroic names. Vivian specifically was clearly a hero and whilst her journey with Cat eventually led to her relinquishing her name, such a journey could equally have led into a different name etc.

Mental Mouse

Except Viv didn't lose her name when she first signed up with Cat... not until she turned to administration and diplomacy, and stopped being a Thief.

Mammon

Shrödingers Cat. If he previously said his Name and no one relevant is around to hear it, did the fallen Hero really make a sound? Before a Named or otherwise relevant Role observes and concludes whether he's a Hero or Villain, perhaps he's both and neither at the same time. Perhaps Cat didn't allow him to say his Name before twisting the Narrative in the right way, because with all who knew his Name being dead or irrelevant what he is wasn't yet defined until she'd define it.

onedollargum

With that eye and the way he convulsed I thought he was the second coming of the Tyrant.

Insanenoodlyguy

No, just an echo. Tyrant told her the "villain because they do what must be done as others flinch" was a groove she was carving into the world, and that it would spawn consequences. How fitting the first such one cat sees echos Kairos in the eyes as much as the ears

Nuke_The_Earth

I like that, it was poetic.

flashburn283

Nah, not inconvenient or annoying enough to be the next Tyrant.

Akuabestgurl

I'm pretty sure she's thinking that SHE's the new saint of swords. Having to do horrible things to keep the world turning

crysjal

The difference between the two was never an idea of good or bad, though it came to appear to be that eventually due to the effect of the Narrative. Good was about faith, trust and accepting the will of the Gods Above and obeying their mandates. Evil was about free will and choice. This named had will, he made a judgement and exercised his will by his own choice. That's what made him a Villain.

hakureireimu

But WTF is the even will of the Gods Above in this case? How do you know he's not fulfilling them?

Chancellor

The Name he took was the Scorched Apostate. The definition of Apostate is "a person who renounces a religious or political belief or principle."

He wanted an actual priest who could use Light to show up and went to the local House of Light for help but the priest there was a fake, which is why he stabbed him and told the fake priest to heal himself. Everything we know about the Apostate so far is that he wanted to be able to use Light to heal more than anything but instead he was born with the Gift. He had the gift for a while but instead of using it, he sought Light to cure this illness. Up until he learned that the town was going to go elsewhere and spread this sickness. The will of the Gods Above can be seen in the lack of both the fake priest and the Scorched Apostate ability to use the Light to heal. And Scorched took his name from renouncing the idea that the Gods Above will provide and taking matters into his own scorched hands.

Mammon

Did he have a will, or did Cat phrase it as such? As she was likely the first relevant and surviving to hear his Name, what he was, a Hero or Villain, might've been undefined. She might've taken this clear providence from Above to land a Hero here to stop the plague and birth a new Saint, and after the act of providence was done nope'd him telling her his Name until she changed the narrative of their conversation to make him a Villain instead. Being one that threads the line, the power of such a powerful and defining Name* like Cat to be his mentor could've been a big if not sole decision of what he'd truly be.

*I know her being Named is still a point of contest and yet to be re-Named.

crysja1

The difference is that he didn't ask for help. It wasn't that he didn't know what to do, he knew what he needed to do and acted on the choice put to him regardless of how horrible it may have been. He didn't decide that a higher power should make the call for him such as the old woman Hero mentioned earlier in the chapter, he made the decision on his own. That's the whole point of what below endorses.

I feel you're trying to read too deeply into Cat being able to read and manipulate the Narrative here. You're also assuming Cat wouldn't want a new Saint, a monster to throw at the Dead King. She seemed pretty upset that this was ultimately just a kid she'd have to train up and involve in this whole affair.

Josh

A sense of right and wrong is in a very literal sense in this universe, a higher power. Most of the heroes we've seen came from a place of defiance to what is for what could be, and only after the initial act do the Gods take notice and make a bid for the person. I could easily see this going the other way and the kid receiving a bid from Contrition and him latching on in an attempt to justify his actions to himself. Its the same putch Cat gave, but instead of at the end mentioning that he should live with who he is, its he should live with being who he needs to be.

The second point is that he didn't ask for help before he made his choice, but he was begging for help and a reason to justify what he did afterward from Cat. Like in the everdark I think it was when Akua and Cat were talking and Akua said something along the lines of "that's who you are." And Cat reflected that asking Akua who she is would be giving Akua hella power over herself to define whatever she wanted.

Also I think it's significant that it's only after he mentions his name did he "leave the house of light to its dead priest" as an apostate. Beforehand he was begging for forgiveness at the altar of the gods that he supposedly already abandoned? That doesn't make much sense to me.

At the same time though, Cat mentioning that he was always one of hers seems an odd way of manipulating him into a Villian. She coulda said that solely for the sake of the kid and lied through her teeth, but I don't imagine that if she did have the ability to shape a new Named that she really needed to lie to him about that. Could have skipped that part and went directly into helping him come to terms with his atrocity.

But I'm pretty convinced right now that the commertors are right that she did something to shape the kid into being evil.

Hell, I was going to end this on a bad pun about her being a "guide to evil" for this kid, but can't find the exact words.

Liliet

"The difference between the two was never an idea of good or bad"

WOG says otherwise.

The issue is that what the Gods are like doesn't map directly onto what their followers are like, only vaguely corresponds through arcane criteria.

Tenthyr

He was willing to murder a village because he knew what the plague would do if unchecked. Cat and the Saint are two sides of the same coin: Cat does the horror because she wants to make a better world, Saint because there is no compromise with the Enemy.

It it wasn't obvious, the reason Cathrine hated the Saint so easy is because she saw herself.

Mental Mouse

Note that Pilgrim himself murdered a village....

Unoriginal

I always felt that the comparison between Tariq and Catherine was much more compelling. In another time-line Catherine could have easily been blessed by the choir of mercy. She acts towards the perceived benefit of many at the expense of the few, oftentimes sacrificing or risking on a personal level to see it through. In many ways the Pilgrim who's primary goal is to reduce the amount of suffering in the system and works under the same paradigm. Sacrifice the few for the many, no hesitation in regards to personal sacrifice or suffering.

It took me two more episodes to work out what I think that the good plan was.

I don't think that he had the credibility to achieve it, but here goes. They agree to stay together, and keep others with them who accidentally join. He goes ahead to warn the refugee camp, so that they have a welcoming party of actually effective healers.

Yes, it's brittle as anything. Would anyone like to turn it into a reliable plan?

From the very start, some of the earliest discussions Cat had with Black centered around whether Heros and Villains really correlated to Right and Wrong, or even Good and Evil. Black argued that a Villain could do just as much Right (practically) as those claiming to be a Heros, and that a Hero could do just as Wrong while claiming to be Good, and everyone on that dubious "Good" side would just nod along in agreement purely because of their Name being Good or Evil. The fact is that often times the Hero's actions have cost more lives, and caused more suffering than the Villain's – in reality, some Hero's actions were Wrong.

The Pilgrim's creation of a plague that killed an entire lakeside coastline to capture Black come to mind. He might have done it for with Good reasons, yet no one debated tat what he did was Wrong. Cat never worshipped any God's and yet apparently the gods below bestowed her with an Evil Name, and yet all she ever wanted was Good for others, right from day one.

So much of what Black did was to make things better for people of Calernia (as he saw it) and he actively pushed Cat to take it further. He knew he was limited and trained Cat to break the story, to push the boundaries of her Name, of what it meant to be a Villain, to make things better for others, to be a Good Villain; to be practically Evil not for Evils sake, but to do Right and to not let people suffer needlessly (unless they were nobles!).

The crusade is a good example. Cat was finally getting things better for people, the first prince selfishly decides it would be good for her politically to start a crusade, screw all the people in Callow, and every Hero jumps on the bandwagon, even while knowing this whole thing, including Cat being made the arch heretic was for Wrong reasons that to my mind that smell decidedly of... Evil.

Good does not necessarily mean Right, and Evil does not always mean Wrong.

I know I'd rather see things put right even if the reasoning behind it is a little "ends justify the means" like Cat's.

But yeah, b

Black and Cat are an exception to the rule. Most Villains are Evil for Evils sake, as Akua springs to mind.

Javvies

Eh, to be fair, the domestic political advantages Cordelia thought a Crusade would generate weren't the only reason she wanted a Crusade.

As I understand it, she wanted a Crusade to liberate Callow from Praes, knock Praes down for a while, and restore Callow as a buffer state against Praes ... which would allow everyone else to go after the Dead King. That is, Cordelia's endgame when it came to the Crusade was going after the Dead King with as much of Calernia united in that goal as possible while not needing to worry about the Dread Empire or other Evil-aligned nations.

So, I probably wouldn't hammer Cordelia too harshly over wanting a Crusade – just about how she went about it.

stevenneiman

Distinctions I've seen:

Heroes: serve something greater, with the authority to decide right and wrong.

Villains: know what they think should be, and let any who disagree try to stop them

Heroes: Triumph in the pivotal moment.

Villains: hold unbeatable power until the pivotal moment, and if they're lucky achieve their aims even after the inevitable defeat

Heroes: Have the power to do what needs done

Villains: Do what needs done to have the power

Heroes: Conquer their flaws before conquering the challenges before them

Villains: revel in their flaws, or hone them into weapons.

Heroes: Lean into stories, knowing that the proper story can carry them through any hardship

Villains: Twist stories to their favor, hoping to turn what should doom them into a sort of salvation.

Andrew Mitchell

Thanks for posting these distinctions. Although I could quibble here and there, what you've written captures the broad essence of the difference.

spamdesu

Right now it looks like he might be best served with having some time with masego, given how he still is the most learned Mage-Scholar of Calernia.

Knowledge in Aboves and Belows Working could really help the Apostate get control a bit more

Shikkarasu

And maybe even learn more of the Light, since Zeze was able to craft Miracles without being a priest. They have very different reasons for it, but Scorch and Hierophant have similar goals.

Ahad Mahmood

Just because he follows Cat doesn't automatically make him a villain. I believe that he attempts to serve above but may eventually become adrift.

NerfContessa

And another deep, grimly focused look on the horror that is calernia.

Ahad Mahmood

Whilst you can't change them immediately, Vivian and Indrani had semi heroic names. Vivian specifically was clearly a hero and whilst her journey with Cat eventually led to her relinquishing her name, such a journey could equally have led into a different name etc.

Ahad Mahmood

Wait how does one delete a comment, this is wrongly placed here

Isi Arnott-Campbell

You can't. Inconvenient, I know.

Insanenoodlyguy

what in the text makes you think that's now established as the case?

Zarquon

23 assassinations in the last year.

Insanenoodlyguy

That means nothing. It specifically said most of them hadn't come close. This is background stuff. She didn't say "My last year out here in the field" or anything. She's probably counting a lot of attempts that the Jack's found and dealt with in their infancies.

Liliet

With the new (old) timeline evidence rounded up on discord, it turns out erratic WAS keeping track of the timeline/Cat's age the whole time. So if she said she was 23 last chapter, it's worth assuming she IS 23, and there's been... a three year time skip. Because in the spring of the truce, she was 20.

And because the truce started at the end of winter, lasted three months, and now's spring, it couldn't have been less than a year. "Last summer" speaks to that, too.

Nah, she's got a great example in Grey for this. She's going to be the type that is helpful and pop's in with advice, but does not become a permanent fixture in his life, in order to insure she doesn't doom herself with a mentor story.

HOW IS EVERY CHAPTER SO DARN GOOD?

erebus42

Damn...

Zggt

Yeah, named should be popping up everywhere for a huge clash of Good and Evil. Good to see Cat is on the ball in using every tool available, first of all because it's important to show she needs to do this to not lose horribly, but mostly because she's offering people what she had always wanted: a clear way to help. Villains can really use that.

daegone823

OMG I was wondering why more named werent popping up. Guess like a snowball they needed more time to gather.

The Matron.

Mammon

That does fit the drow part of her current leadership as First under the Night, their leaders tend to be called Matrons too. But as I don't think Erratica puts much emphasis on that nor bases the story on D&D that much, I actually doubt Cat will become Matron as opposed to something more important to her as a main character as opposed to a support/mentor. She has been one to do things herself rather than delegate it to others, after all. Protagonist, eh?

Na

Maybe, but that's got goblin vibes in Calernia.

Mammon

Unless this greater number of inexperienced and not as Story-important Named will inevitably lead to the Dead King gaining more Revenants and/or proving to be unstoppable in the second act. Nothing as dangerous for a hero and villain alike than a more powerful and beloved hero or villain with greater ties to the Story, and compared to Cat and other already defined Named either these new Named or the barely introduced Heroes under Hanno should be wary.

Decius

Gotta have secondary characters to provide the necessary narrative weight to the losses. Cat's running out of parts of herself, and she's already died so many times that it's not notable anymore.

NZPIEFACE

Imagine if Cat gets turned into a Revenant near the end, but then does the same thing she did to Akua.

That isn't necessarily a sign of a (capital-v) Villain, just a Named.

Adrian_V

Queen of Lost and Found indeed.

Real interesting chapter here, i can hope they heal his burns somewhat, it could even represent him accepting what he did or something, because burns are ugly, in the sense that they could never really heal, soemtimes with pus always, etc.

And a year since the last book? at least some months since the prologue.

Liliet

The prologue was spring and now is spring again, meaning it was at least a year. More likely three, for Catherine's age to line up.

caoimhinh

Yeah, the timeline gets more confusing every chapter. Now Cat even mentioned that they made an offensive to take back the capital (of Brabant, I assume) late last summer, yet they are now in spring according to last chapter.

So apparently at least a year has passed since their counteroffensive started (A.K.A when Callow joined the war against Keter). That or there was a mistake in last chapter's mention of it being spring now...

Or EE lost sight of the timeline (during the hiatus he was working on his coming project, so this could happen, even if it's unlikely)and thus this confusion happened.

Either way, a clearer establishment of the timeline and exactly how much time has passed would be nice.

lennymaster

The timeline was discussed in discord and it seems Eraticerrata definitely has kept track of time.

caoimhinh

Could you share that timeline here, please? A screenshot or just a summary would be enough.

How much time has passed exactly according to the official version given by EE?

I doubt, with a Name like Scorched Apostate, that they can ever be healed fully.

caoimhinh

Yeah, although Names can change, so there might be hope. The scorching also doesn't need to be literal to be meaningful and effective.

A mark or scar is very likely to remain at the very least, given what we know about Names and their meaningful wounds.

Insanenoodlyguy

In some ways you want to avoid that. He will be scorched. Better to keep as much of it on the outside as he can, least the inside decide to compensate. Maybe he could get a functional eye or something, but trying to heal him completely outside of very careful situations (likely transition to another name kinds) would find him either torn up by his own "you don't deserve to look human" guilt or some helpful new personal tragedy to keep the levels even.

Mental Mouse

Unfortunately, as a Villain he's probably stuck with his disfigurement.

konstantinvoncarstein

Poor boy...

ruduen

I'm not sure if I'm anticipating or dreading the day in which the Pilfering Dicer and the Fortunate Fool are put together in the same room.

Probably dreading, given who probably has more control in that situation.

erebus42

I suppose it depends on the context. If they were apposed to eachother especially in a situation that their respective talents would lend themselves to (a game of chance for instance), you would probably get something like a game of Push from the Magicians (Books and TV series) where the laws of probability basically just start having a seizure. If they were collaborating on the other hand, you might get a situation where potentially infinite luck was shared between the two as the Dicer continously took from the Fool while the Fool's luck continously replenished itself.

RoflCat

Catherine, I don't think picking up a Named whose power is all about burning is going to help your fire-related reputation.

Decius

I don't know, I think it's going to make her fire-related reputation better.

It used to be that cities burned in her wake; now, they burn before she even gets there!

shadw21

City burning is now subcontracted out and I've told them not to do any city burning for the time being...

Now stop blaming me for the fires!

Liliet

Welp, this answers my question.

Catherine somehow thinks the new coming of the Saint of Swords is a villain, OR she claims a hero as one of her own ♥

caoimhinh

I think she actually meant that she had initially thought that, but then realized the boy wasn't a Hero who made hard choices, but rather a Villain with good intentions.

"...I came in here, you see, expecting you to be one of Hanno's."

The Saint of Swords come again. Necessity that bleeds the grip, the hard deed that keeps the night at bay.

hakureireimu

But what is even the difference between the 2 ?????

lennymaster

That is the question, is it not? What makes a Hero aside from Heavens approval? What marks a Villian aside a Bargain struck?

sivarajan

Heroes and Villains (capitalized) are well-defined allegiances, to Above and Below respectively. Is there a reason, other than the deliberately misleading terms, to expect them to mean something more?

RoflCat

Story-wise.

Heroes who made hard choices are rewarded/forgiven for their deeds. (see Pilgrim killing that village to capture Black)

While villains with good intentions will pretty much always end with feeling of tragedies because the result isn't something they intended and/or aimed for (heroes making hard choices aimed for those result)

See: Cat's history, or in this kid's case his self-loathing at not being able to save those people because he doesn't have the real Light to use.

Mammon

Or maybe he really was a new Saint, and she cleverly nope'd that with a few Story strings tugged and the Narrative subtly diverted to turn this would-be Grim Hero that would become a new Saint into a Villain instead to avoid that hassle.

As she was likely the first relevant and surviving person to hear his Name, what he was; a Hero or Villain, might've been undefined. It probably was providence from Above to land a Hero here to stop the plague and birth a new Saint, but with the act of providence done yet with his Name untold Cat negated this by nope'ing him telling her his Name until she changed the narrative of their conversation to make him a Villain instead. As she said before in this same chapter, some thread a thin line with but decisions and acts deciding whether they come out a Hero or Villain. With her experience, Cat might've been able to manipulate this to her advantage.

On the mage thing, this might be Shrödinger's Cat. Until someone relevant narrates it in their internal monologue, is it Light or Magic? Until Cat opened that box by making a hard all, the fire-light might've been both. We don't know how much Creation is fluent in this to allow for Providence to have it's control and power over it, or for more realistic manipulation to practically the same, so perhaps she quite literally defined what happened simply by observing it and adding her own definitions.

*I know her being Named is still a point of contest and yet to be re-Named.

Burnsy17

It is sad, in a way, that Kat sees him as a boy. For he is about sixteen, or about the same age she was when Black offered her the knife only seven years ago.⁸

Darkening

Man, now I almost want the story to end with her handing someone her knife.

Decius

Blade first, in the heart, just like Black did so long ago.

Insanenoodlyguy

Oh I'm 90% sure that's the last chapter of this epic series. Stories don't like repetition, but bookends, that's a different story.

superkeaton

Well, no one said playing Calernia's baby sitter would be fun, did they? Maybe Rogue or Masego can help him guide his fire.

Decius

Masego lacks the patience or tact needed to deal with such a fragile person; he'd say something because it was true and the Apostate would end up killing himself either directly or indirectly.

He needs someone who can understand what it's like being an unrepentant mass killer, and how to shape someone's psyche. And Akua is right there.

konstantinvoncarstein

You mean a repentant mass killer?

superkeaton

I suppose, but Akua tends to take more of a backline, administrative role these days. Still, it's an interaction I'd love to see happen. I'd also like him to meet White, given that he's someone Apostate so desperately wants to be like.

Darkening

Gods, I just can't get over how great EE is at setting a scene and enrapturing me. It's always incredible to see these moments, these pivots for lack of a non story word to describe them. Seeing the moments in a life that will forever shape them into something new. Whatever happens to him, the Scorched Apostate will never be the same for having met the Black Queen, and I can't wait for more.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

No-one can save us from this. No protection can hold against this scourge forever. This is the true Hidden Horror our brave heroes and wily villains must unite against.

That's a good idea about Recall, though. If I ever find myself at a point in life where I'd write erotic fanfiction I'll have to remember it.

spamdesu

Reblogged this on highpriestoffluff.

Javvies

The timeline is fucking weird as hell.

The Scorched Apostate. Now there's an interesting Name. And a useful fellow – especially if his knack at using the Gift to emulate Light is not a Named-trick, and is instead something that can be learned by other mages. Even if it can't be, another mage Named is going to be useful anyway.

Dresden 67

I'm betting his ability to use the Gift will always be somewhat narrow, and focused on offensive, fire based magic.

Like the Red Mage back in the Prologue of Book 4, who couldn't use any shielding spells at all.

Javvies

Whether or not he's going to be much good at defensive or utility magics is yet to be determined. However, I will note that it's indicated that he can heal people, at least of the supernatural plague, full extent of that ability is unknown.

At any rate, it's also worth keeping in mind that he has thus far been entirely untrained, and will likely receive instruction from both Akua and Masego. The insights of the Hierophant are likely to be of great value to the Scorched Apostate's emulation of Light. And the kid's abilities are only going to grow and expand.

Besides, even if the kid's greatest value is as an offensive mage asset, he's another Named Mage, and his biggest trick thus far is using his mage abilities to emulate aspects of the Light of Above. The first would be useful all by itself in any sort of war, and the second is going to be even more useful considering that they're fighting the Dead King and armies of undead.

Ultimate procrastinator

He said he couldn't heal them, and that if his magic were actual Light he could have. Maybe that's foreshadowing of him learning healing later, but between his agreement with the priest that his abilities are "not real miracles" and the aside near the beginning about priests of the House Insurgent being worse at healing as a result of learning to burn with the Light, I tend to think it's indicating that he is not a healer

So far only Heroic Names have put hard limits on magic. That seems like it might be an above thing to me. Below is more about breaking rules for power than submitting to them.

Earl of Purple

We've also seen more Heroic Mage Names than Villain Mage Names. And the Villains we've seen have all had Names that are quite broad about magic- Warlock, Apprentice, Hierophant and Diabolist are all either generalists or specialised as a personal thing, not a Name thing. Warlock was able to counter the Witch of the Woods quite effectively, and she's noted to be the most powerful Heroic Mage in the Grand Alliance. Most Heroic Mages we've seen just aren't that tier; we haven't seen any Villain Mages that haven't been that tier (except Apprentice, who had a Transitional Name).

Scorched Apostate and this unknown hedge witch haunted by her dead brother are more powerful than Killian or other un-Named mages, but aren't that tier (probably).

Can we start rumors that Grey was raised with necromancy tho?

If this guy is a villain than so is Pilgrim and Saint of Swords.

NZPIEFACE

The definition of a Villain and Hero in this story hasn't been clearly stated yet. The closest we've ever got is "Which side gives you the power", but then we still get people whose Names can go either way, e.g. Thief.

konstantinvoncarstein

No. Villains receive their power from Below, Heroes from Above. The exact criteria that makes one or the other give said power is not yet understood. But SoS and the pilgrim are definitely heroes

Onos

I'm wondering if the final push comes from the nascent Named's own perception of their actions/motivations/whatever. Cat saw Heros get crushed by Black, so thought power to enact change came from Evil. Apostate is sickened by what he's done and personally sees it as Evil, whereas Pilgrim sees the necessity in such an action and deems it Good.

I would hazard that in these "borderline" cases the soul in question could reach out to either set of Gods in their defining moment, thereby setting their path. We already know that Named's own perceptions influence their appearance and the manifestation of aspects so being able to influence the nature of the source of their power doesn't seem entirely unreasonable.

For everyone arguing about whether he is a hero or a villain, his name is the Scorched Apostate. An apostate is someone who defects, or refuses to follow a religion. Seems pretty villainous to me.

Ask and you shall receive, I suppose. In the previous chapter, I was musing that we had not seen any side character Villains, while random Heroes were popping out of the woodwork (sometimes literally). Starting chapter 2 and we get a couple of low-life Named. Not exactly front line material those two, but still cool. I keep reading, and think that perhaps the nature of Villains is such we simply don't get any heavy-hitters outside that generation's core group.

Cue end of chapter, and we're presented with a powerhouse of a Villain, wielding a bastardized combination of Light & Magic (poor SOB, I actually feel bad for him). So minor characters as relatively major Villains are a thing. Book 6 is shaping up to be a fun ride indeed.

Earl of Purple

Really interested in that Pilfering Dicer. He's the kind of villain that, I think, could probably escape notice pretty much indefinitely, if he played his cards right. I doubt he's the type to play cards, or be cautious, but his ability to steal luck would make him pretty hard to fight, I think. Unless you're a hero/villain capable of fighting through a bit of bad luck and still hitting somebody with good luck.

Scorched Apostate's another interesting guy; his bastardised Light- if it truly is Light, and not just particularly hot and glowy pyromancy- will be very useful, whilst simultaneously upsetting a lot of priests and true Light-using heroes.

Draconic

He forgot to ask the most important question in this situation.
"You're a monster, aren't you?"
"The very worst kind."

caoimhinh

It's because there was already no doubt about it.
Catherine stated that she was a monster too before he could even ask.

"My mistake," I quietly repeated. "No, from the beginning you were one of mine."

The gentleness, I thought, was what unmade him. A shiver went through his frame, turning into a tortured convulsion and only then a ragged sob tore its way out of his throat.

"I'm a monster," the boy wept. "Gods forgive, oh Gods forgive me."

My hand went down to his shoulder, comforting.

"Of course you are," I gently said. "That's what makes you one of mine. We're the wicked ones, you see."

"I don't want to be wicked," he rasped. "I just- I just couldn't..."

"We never can," I softly told him. "That's how we end up wicked, I think. Because we can't stand to be good, if it also means we must let it go."

Draconic

She only said that he is a monster, and that they are both wicked. Besides, sometimes questions need to be asked, even if you already know the answer.

I'm a bit rusty, hope this works. Also, thought I'd use the epigraph this time to see if it'd bother fewer people.

"My lords and ladies, have I not always been a firm believer in voting for A Practical Guide to Evil?"

– Dread Empress Malevolent II, announcing her second (and penultimate) vote for PGtE.

Exec

I'm not sure if it's a typo, but something about that Epigraph feels really off.

"her second invasion (and penultimate) of Callow"

Shouldn't it be "her second (and penultimate) invasion of Callow"?

Heavy breathing Where is my chapter.....

Satan

A hero like Saint would have believed deep down that they were acting for the "greater good," while Scorch at best thinks he's a "lesser evil." Is it the righteousness that separates heroes and villains? The Pilgrim seems to be in between the two camps, which might explain his colour being grey instead of black or white. I suspect the Seraphim would never think of themselves as anything but Good, no matter how evil their acts.

lunt27

So I caught up to current with this series just recently. Going back to this chapter to say that this actually made me cry. Poor scorchy, I hope people write fanfics about him in the future.

Chapter 3: Standard

"The tragedy of our time, of every time, is that while there is power in knowledge there can be just as much in ignorance."
– First Princess Eugénie of Lange

I watched the Scorched Apostate sit in silence, face solemn, as the two healers from the House Insurgent finished seeing to the wound on his leg and moved to the larger task of his heavy burns. I'd had him brought away from where the last four survivors of the nameless village were being looked at by another priest. Grandmaster Talbot spoke with the priestess in question – a fair-haired Liessen girl in her late twenties – before trudging his way to me through boggy grounds. With his helmet removed, Brandon Talbot's neatness was even more apparent than usual, all the more glaring for the contrast with his worn armour. He sketched a bow and I flicked an impatient hand to tell him to cut it out. I'd made my peace with a lot of the formalities having put on a fancy hat meant for me, but they had no place out in the field.

"My queen," the knight said. "Sister Cecily says the survivors are physically healthy and without disease."

If the boy was right about the seeded plague and his eyes were sharp as I suspected they were, he might have spared them for that very reason. Or it might be he'd simply missed them before exhaustion caught up with him and he ended up retreating to the temple.

"Send a rider ahead to Lord Adjutant, informing him he is prepare a quarantined tent for them," I ordered. "Then have them sent back on some of your spare mounts, under escort."

"By your will, Your Majesty," he said, then hesitated. "Though it is unlikely they will know how to ride."

"Tie them on, if need be," I flatly said. "They're in no state to walk and I'll not have them rubbing elbows with this one."

The last two words were married to a jerky nod of the head towards the young villain I'd found.

"Agreed," Grandmaster Talbot said, tone heavy with distaste. "I'll see to it."

I let him handle the arrangements, gaze lingering on the Named. Two healers from the House Insurgent spent thirty heartbeats trying to heal the burns, but to no avail. There was less bleeding beneath the blackened skin, but no other difference to speak of. The charred ruin that'd been made of the Scorched Apostate's face was not something Light or sorcery would be able mend, I suspected. I limped up to the three of them, the two priests ending their attempts as I approached and falling into deep bows. The House Insurgent's priests always seemed to be trying to make up for the my significantly more nuanced relationship with the House Constant by open displays of esteem and allegiance, which I still wasn't quite sure how to deal with. Over my years of ruling Callow I'd had good working relationships with a few brothers and sisters of the House, but genuine deference from people sworn to Above was still something I struggled with.

"A gallant effort," I said, "but those are beyond Light's ability to mend."

The boy's eyes betrayed no disappointment at my words, only a sort of cynical satisfaction. He'd not believed for a moment he'd be freed from the burns.

"I can only apologize our failure," the older of the priests said, and seemed intent to continue along that line until I briskly shook my head.

"There is no need for that. It is a natural thing, and not unknown to me," I said. "I once had such a scar as well."

A long red cut that went all the way across my chest, where the Lone Swordsman had gutted me before leaving me to die.

"Once?" the boy spoke up, picking up on the implication. "No longer?"

"It took a death, but I was rid of it," I agreed. "But you're rather too young to be thinking of trifling with angels."

It'd taken snatching a resurrection from Contrition to wipe the scar away, and I was not truly certain it'd been the angelic touch and not the victory before it that'd actually done the trick there. I'd ask Tariq to have a look at the boy regardless, just in case Mercy might feel like living up to the virtue it claimed, but his Name seemed like it might just resist the change tooth and nail: he wasn't called the Lightly Singed Apostate.

"Thank you," I told the priests. "I would speak with him alone, if you don't mind."

Deeps bows once more, and murmurs of agreement.

"Congratulations," I told the Scorched Apostate. "You are Named, and the first of this spring to be brought into a treaty backed by almost every crown on Calernia."

He blinked with his blue eye, uncomprehending.

"There's a proper formal name for it," I idly continued, "but most of us call it the Truce and the Terms."

"A treaty about what?" the boy asked.

"Not hanging boys like you when we find them," I said.

"I'm not a boy," the boy insisted. "I'm fourteen."

I did not betray my surprise. The burns had made it hard to tell his age and he was tall for a boy of fourteen. Especially a peasant one. Fourteen, I thought with muted grief, and already hundreds of corpses to your name. There were some among the Named he'd be rubbing elbows with that would be impressed by this. They wouldn't even all be villains.

"That's the part that trips you up?" I still asked, dimly amused. "Not the hanging, being called a boy?"

"You can call me Tancred instead," the young villain said. "Or Scorched."

I did not quite have the heart to tell him no one would ever call him the latter save as mockery, though I suspected even Archer would feel a little bad about making sport of someone so painfully earnest.

"Tancred," I said, a half-hearted concession. "You are Named, and though there will be an investigation about what took place in this nameless village-"

"Marserac," the boy interrupted, tone heavy. "It is called Marserac."

I forced myself not to look at the burning wrecks in the distance behind us. Only a handful of far-flung houses would survive of what had been called Marserac.

"Do not interrupt me again," I said, tone calm but firm.

Tancred bit the sole part of his lip that was not a blackened ruin, looking like I'd slapped him. I made my heart ache, but it needed to be done. I was not his mother or his friend: I was his patroness, and perhaps on occasion I'd be his teacher. Boundaries needed to be set from the very beginning.

"As the Scorched Apostate, you have been approached by one of the Grand Alliance's high officers and extended the chance to sign and abide by the Truce and Terms," I said. "Though what took place in Marserac will be investigated by my people, and your claim of a seeded plague looked into, even if you are mistaken in that claim you'll still fall under the blanket amnesty that comes with agreeing to abide by the treaty."

Tancred's sole blue eye burned with indignation and he looked about to boil over, but he kept his tongue. My lips quirked in approval. Good. If he could master himself on this day, of all days, then he had some promise.

"Speak," I said.

"That's rotten," the Scorched Apostate burst out before I'd even finished the word. "That I'd still get away with it if I'd just-"

He shivered, and I could almost see his mind shying away from fully looking at what it was he'd done today. There would be a need to nip that habit in the bud – failing to recognize what you were was a dangerous thing, for a villain – but even now I still had enough mercy in me to leave that for another day.

"- if it'd just been slaughter for slaughter's sake," Tancred forced out, "murder for sport. That's rotten."

The boy hesitated.

"Sir," he hesitantly tacked on, half as a question.

"That'll do," I said. "And it's not a pretty thing, you're not wrong about that. The business of survival never is."

The indignation had yet to abate, so I flicked out a hand in permission for him to speak once more.

"They say we're winning the war, though," the Apostate said. "Last summer the Black Queen and the Iron Prince almost took back the capital in Hainaut, and since then the attack midwinter was beaten back. Why does there need to be an amnesty for villains?"

"For heroes as well," I plainly said. "We've no sole claim on bloody swords."

It was somewhat refreshing not to have been recognized, I found, but this perception that we'd achieved anything but a bloody stalemate against the Dead King – the ruling champion of wars of attrition – needed to be put to rest. This summer we might just begin turning the tide, Gods willing or out of my damned way, but the sole front that could be said to have truly gained victories until now was the Lycaonese one. Those hard fuckers up in Twilight's Pass were making all of us proud.

"There is a truce, Tancred, because that first summer offensive in Hainaut nearly lost us the war," I said, tone serious. "Because the midwinter attacks would have broken through the defensive line if the Fortunate Fool hadn't sacrificed himself to take out the Lord of Ghouls, or if the Witch of the Woods hadn't flattened one of our own fortresses with two thousand of our soldiers still in it. Because we need every Named, even the worst of them, and each one that hides from us out fear might end up raised into the Dead King's ranks instead if he gets his hands on them."

The young villain looked at me as if he'd never seen me before. My assessment had been stark, true, but I'd wager that was not the reason: I was not speaking as an officer would, but as someone who had a seat at the kind of table where there were precious few warranting one.

"So crimes committed before joining the treaty are granted amnesty, no matter how foul," I said. "Heroes and villains are to observe the peace of the Truce with each other until Keter falls, no matter past enmities. Should conflicts arise, or accusations need to be made about breaches of the Truce, they are to be brought to their representative under the Terms."

I nodded at his inquisitive look, granting leave to speak. Indignation had gutted out, looked like, as it tended to when it was cast against the abstract instead of something you could see or hear. Curiosity was more tempting a mistress than arguing with me, at least for now.

"And who are they?" the Scorched Apostate asked.

"The White Knight, for heroes," I said. "The Black Queen, for villains. Those who claim to be neither can choose who they would appeal to. A band was assembled under the Archer that has a degree of legal authority as well, but they are wanderers."

Tancred slowly nodded, seemingly not unfamiliar with the Name. Indrani's reputation had made it this far north, then. She'd be pleased to hear it, vain creature that she was.

"Under the Terms are also set out obligations that must be fulfilled to remain protected by the Truce," I continued. "I'll let you paw through the lot of them later – actually, can you read?"

Tancred looked away, then shook his head.

"Something else to see to, then," I said. "They'll be read to you in detail by a sworn representative until you can read them yourself. The crux of them is simple: follow the laws of the land and serve in the war against the Dead King. If there are lesser grievances or breaches, punishment will be meted out by your representative under the Terms."

Quite a few of the heroes had howled at that last detail, a few like the Blade of Mercy and the Blessed Artificer even threatening to walk if it was upheld, but with both the White Knight and the Grey Pilgrim in my corner we'd had the clout to ram it through. Not that Tariq hadn't had his reservations, but we were all aware that precious few villains would even consider Truce if joining it meant they were under heroic jurisdiction. On my side of the deal the trouble had been making it clear to the Named that I was actually serious about enforcing the Terms. The Pilfering Dicer hadn't really believed me, and so Hakram had held out his hand on a stump as I hacked a finger off as chastisement. There'd been another sort of challenge too, unsurprisingly: two other villains had lost little time before trying to take my place as representative by force of arms.

The Barrow Sword had been pleasantly straightforward about it, telling me outright he intended to use me as a stepping stone to rise high enough he could bargain with the Dominion to be named as the founder of a line of Blood. He'd just as straightforwardly submitted when I'd struck him hard enough with Night to blast him through two carts and a palisade. We'd had drinks after, and while he was a ruthless bastard he was also halfway decent company if you didn't get him started on the Silent Slayer's line. The Red Reaver had not been so respectable in his ambition. He'd tried to slit my throat in my sleep only to be caught by Indrani while trying to slip through my tent's wards, and after that I'd... made an example. A warning to anyone else who might have similar ambition and lack of sense. There had not been a challenge since, though I'd no doubt that the longer this war lasted the more I'd end up having to face.

"I will fight the Hidden Horror," the Scorched Apostate solemnly said, "on that you have my oath. I will march north and face the dead."

"You'll be headed to the Belfry for a few months, Tancred, unless there's a pressing need for your talents," I drily told him.

While the smouldering remnants of Marserac behind us were testament to the power the young villain was capable of wielding, I had no intention of sending a mage so spectacularly untaught straight into the nightmare of the northern defensive line. That was a recipe for either losing a company to an uncontrolled blaze or serving up Keter a fresh Revenant. Named lost a great deal of power after the Dead King got to them, and some aspects Neshamah either could not or would not maintain in death, but a Revenant spellcaster with this much of a bite to him would be a rough ride to deal with even if he ended up having only one trick.

"The Belfry, sir?" the boy hesitantly asked.

"This isn't the kind of war that can be won with boots on the ground alone, Tancred," I said. "The Grand Alliance understood that well before it began mobilizing. There would be a need for fresh sorceries, for unprecedented warding schemes and artefacts. A safe haven would have to be built for those scholars who would study the Hidden Horror's tricks and learn how to unmake them, too, one beyond his reach. And so the Arsenal was ordered raised."

I let a moment pass, gauging how much I should truly say. There'd been some of us, at the beginning, who'd argued that the Arsenal's existence should be kept a secret. Princess Rozala had been one of the more ardent partisans of that belief, arguing that against Keter the best defence was secrecy, and the Grey Pilgrim had backed her – which meant the Blood had as well. In private with me, Tariq had argued that by keeping the Arsenal secret now we would later get the benefit of revealing it when tipping a pivot one way or another, but I'd been unconvinced then and I was unconvinced now. As it happened Hasenbach and I had, for once, been in complete and utter agreement. Even if one was willing to write off the effects on morale that knowing such a place existed would have on the rank and file of the Grand Alliance, which neither of us was, the fact remained that practically speaking keeping it secret would be near impossible.

Too many people would be involved in its construction and its upkeep. Whether it be building the towers and laboratories, bringing in food by cart or even something as simple as making the beds in the rooms there would be a need for workers and servants to handle the labour. That we'd gathered some of the finest magical minds in Procer, Callow and Levant before going further by bringing in scholars, priests and artisans meant that numbers alone would make disappearances glaringly obvious anyway.

And it wasn't like the Dead King wasn't going to expect us to have such a facility. No, better to lay false trails by the dozen and keep the location secret rather than attempt the improbable outcome of utter secrecy.

"There are two societies within it, the Workshop and the Belfry," I continued. "The Workshop concerns itself with the making of artefacts, armaments and alchemies. The Belfry's mandate is broader in scope: study of the Dead King's creatures, war magic and warding, experimental research."

I let a beat pass so the details could sink in. The part that mattered most I'd consciously split from the rest.

"The Belfry also concerns itself with teaching mages," I told the boy.

It'd been a struggle to pull away Masego from his attempts to establish his proof of concept for Quartered Seasons and the other half dozen projects he'd picked up, but the results had been well worth the hassle: he'd trained up a few talented Proceran practitioners to what he called 'acceptable' scrying ritual standards, which was maybe two decades ahead of what anyone west of the Whitecaps had previously been capable of. That cadre now served as permanent teachers for the hedge talents the First Prince was sifting through Procer for, sent in by bands of twenty for teaching. The scrying network for the Grand Alliance was arguably the largest and widest-reaching on the continent at the moment, if likely still inferior in quality and reliability to Praes'. Communications grew harder the closer we were to active warfare against Keter, too, now that Neshamah had begun using disruptive rituals.

Adjusting our rituals so that the disruptions wouldn't affect them was exactly the kind of puzzle the Belfry had been assembled to solve, though, so we'd see how long that lasted.

Getting a training camp running for war magic had been a great deal less successful, unfortunately. Even after lowering the bar of used sorcery to the standard of the Legions of Terror we'd proved incapable of reliably training up mages in that manner. We were running thin on instructors, true, but at the end of the day the unpleasant truth was that there was simply a limited amount of people in Procer with a Gift that was strong enough to be useful for war. The total number of mages living in the Principate was likely higher than that in the Empire, by simple dint of population, but the quality of those talents was the trouble. Massed sorcery remained beyond our grasp for now, though at least training up a handful ritual cadres had proved a workable alternative. Standardization remained the largest issue there, since no two cadres were capable of doing the same things and there was only haphazard overlap.

"Are you not going to teach me?" the boy quietly asked.

His face was hard to read, which I supposed was a feeble silver lining to the scorching of his face. His voice, though, his stance? He was fourteen and, Named or not, he'd seen precious little of the world. He might as well be an open book to me.

"There are things you'll learn from me," I said. "Magic, however, isn't one of them. I don't have the Gift. I do happen to be acquainted with a few of the finest practitioners of it alive, though, so rustling up a good tutor for you shouldn't be all that difficult."

Who to send him to would be something to consider. Masego's interest in teaching could best be described as passing, though he was a rather able tutor when talked into it. Hierophant also had so much on his plate the meal could feed two and he'd lost the ability to practice magic. Roland might be a better fit, anyway, given that his tendency to be a generalist meant he always had common grounds with pupils. The Rogue Sorcerer was a hero, though, and the way he ended up saddled with the work that no one else was particularly good at meant his days were nearly as filled as Masego's. The Hunted Magician owed Indrani a favour which I might be able to call in for this, but the Proceran villain was an enchanter for the Workshop and just... generally unpleasant. I'd rather the Scorched Apostate be taught by a Named mage instead of a Nameless one, but we'd have to see.

"But I will be sent to this Belfry," Tancred said, hesitant.

"Not alone," I replied, taking a measure of pity on him. "I'm to head south myself before long, and I meant to pass through the Arsenal. I'll be accompanying you there, at least."

Indrani had been riding me about physically setting foot at the Arsenal for a few months now, though until today I'd been on the fence about taking the detour there after the council. This settled it, though, since I'd want to settle the boy comfortably under someone able to teach him before moving on. Archer wasn't wrong, either, when she said that it was sloppy of me to have never met so many Named on our side, including villains I represented under the Terms. How many were there nowadays, between the Workshop and the Belfry? Ten, twelve? Less than half of that were of mine, since it was harder to find villains willing to play nice with others than heroes, but even getting a good look at the currents of the place might not be a bad idea. If we lost the Arsenal, the war would begin a death spiral downwards in a matter of months: best to make sure it wouldn't shatter itself from within.

"Good," the Scorched Apostate said, perking up. "I have-"

I wasn't riding Zombie this time so her discomfort could not serve as warning for the closeness of the Beastmaster, but the old trick I'd once taught Vivienne still worked. Someone had been looking at me intently, too intently. It'd been an attempt to sneak up on me, I decided, and there were few who'd attempt that against me in broad daylight.

"Beastmaster," I interrupted, "have you grown shy? Come out properly, introduce yourself."

The man bedecked in furs and leather let out a grunt and circled away from my back, only then catching Tancred's notice. Only one hawk was still on his shoulder.

"Your pet witch sent word," Beastmaster said. "She makes haste, as you ordered."

"Have you called her that to her face?" I asked, morbidly curious.

I almost hoped he hadn't, just so he might try it before me: it'd been too long since I'd seen Akua flay someone alive with her tongue. The Beastmaster spat to the side.

"Better to embrace vipers than speak with witches," the Named dismissively said.

So, I thought amusedly, you've most definitely called her that to her face and the predictable ensued. Slow learner, was he? Not that he'd been the first. It never ceased to amaze me that some people somehow ended up thinking Akua Sahelian would be an easy prey for barbs or bluster just because she did not have a Name while they did. It was like sticking your hand in a wolf's maw and expecting the teeth not to wound because they weren't a bear's.

"That hawk," Tancred said. "I've seen it before."

"She saw you," Beastmaster replied.

Since apparently Ranger's education in Refuge had not extended to basic courtesies – and Gods, I'd meant that as a jab but now that I thought about it – I saw to the introductions myself.

"Tancred, this is the Beastmaster," I said. "He's a former pupil of the Lady of the Lake, and now a mercenary in the service of the Grand Alliance."

Paid not in coin, which I would almost have preferred. The Beastmaster had instead bargained for certain rights and permissions, as well as guides to be provided to show him paths to ancient places in the depths of Brocelian Forest. Coin meant little to the Named of Refuge, used as they were to barter instead, and the relative modesty of the man's demands meant he'd gotten near everything he'd asked for. He'd simply been too useful an asset to be carelessly tossed aside, and even with Refuge having effectively collapsed it wasn't like he'd not had other places to go. The fighting in the Free Cities was far from over, despite General Basilia's streak of victories.

"Greetings," Tancred said, though he was frowning.

"Beastmaster, this is the Scorched Apostate," I said. "He has agreed to abide by the Truce and the Terms."

The older Named looked the younger up and down, seeing no longer the villain who'd caused the blaze in the distance but a boy a fourteen with most his face lost to burns and clothes that were well on their way to being rags. He was visibly unimpressed.

"Another one plucked out of the mud?" Beastmaster said with a hard bark of laughter. "At least this one has fight in him."

"Not half an hour ago," I mildly reminded him, "you were wary of him. Did you boldness perhaps travel by foot, to be arriving so late after the rest of you?"

His face darkened. I met his gaze squarely. Like Archer in the early days, he'd take any attempt at diplomacy as weakness and continue to push his luck. But he wasn't Indrani, and I was not a Squire well out of her depth. I'd killed harder men than him and done it with a great deal less power than I could now call on. Confident in his strength as he might be, he'd be looking at the trail of corpses left in my wake and be forced to admit that were Named among the lot that would have butchered him without batting an eye. And so he backed down, or at least as close to that as his character could afford to let him.

"There is nothing left to hunt," the Beastmaster said. "I take my leave of you."

I could sting him further, but there would be no point to it save passing pleasure. Not that I'd let the retreat pass entirely without comment, lest he take that as relief on my part.

"By all means," I replied. "The conversation was getting stale."

Beastmaster's lips thinned, but he strode away without speaking any further. I glanced at Tancred, who'd been following all of it with wide eyes and now was looking at me a little guiltily.

"I'm sorry," the Scorched Apostate said. "I didn't mean to get you in trouble."

"Trouble?" I echoed.

"Won't he complain to the Black Queen?" the boy asked. "You've made an enemy of a powerful Named on my behalf."

He seemed genuinely worried, which was a little touching.

"You seem to have misunderstood the nature of my relationship with him," I said, smoothing away any trace of my amusement.

Tancred looked appalled, and a little sickened.

"I am sorry, sir," he said. "I did not mean to insult your lover."

I choked. Beastmaster, of all men? Gods, I'd rather sleep with the Mirror Knight. The man might be an insufferable prick, but at least he bathed regularly.

"He's not my lover, he's my subordinate," I said.

In the boy's defence, he seemed pretty mortified by the mistake. His embarrassment passed soon enough, though, and left behind only the latest hint in a series of them that'd been growing the longer we spoke.

"Those priests and horsemen," the young villain said. "They were Callowan. And yet they bowed to you."

"So they did," I agreed.

My hand reached within my cloak to extricate the long dragonbone pipe Masego had gifted me so many years ago, then producing a satchel of Orense bitterleaf from another pocket. Sadly the bitterleaf enough had come to replace wakeleaf as my vice of choice as it was much easier to get your hands on this far north. The smoke was heavier than wakeleaf's, and it was often mixed with sweeter herbs to take the edge of the sourness off, but it scratched the itch well enough when stuffed in a pipe.

"You implied you were a high officer of the Grand Alliance," the Scorched Apostate continued. "But that's not all you are, is it?"

I passed my palm over the pipe, flames flickering within through a twist of the Night, and pulled at the mouth a few times before spewing out a steam of smoke.

"Who are you?" Tancred asked.

"The Firstborn named me Losara, the Queen of Lost and Found," I lazily replied. "To the Wasteland I was the Squire, the Carrion Lord's sole apprentice. The fae knew me by many names, though the last I ever bore was that of Sovereign of Moonless Nights. On this side of the Whitecaps, though? It's a simple name I am known by."

"The Black Queen," the boy whispered hoarsely. "The leader of the Woe."

"Aye," I said, with a crooked smile. "And now let's find you some boots, because I refuse to keep wincing every time I look at your shoes."

a lot to chew over this chapter! quartered seasons, the arsenal and the belfry (which tbh seems like the alpha test for cardinal, or the research parts of it at any rate), Refuge no longer being a thing...

The Apostate is a precious cinnamon roll- too good for this word.

Liliet

But he's a viiiiillllainnnnnnn

I'm fucking dying @ what this classification is turning into, too beautiful~

TeK

He did slaughter a village, men and women and children, on what can be technically described as a guess. He could have tried to tell someone instead, even if he did not know the army was nearby. Being tragic does not make you good.

Liliet

"What can be technically described as a guess"

No, he didn't know the army was nearby, and if he'd left to go fetch someone else from further away they'd leave for the refugee camps and it would be too late.

He could reasonably expect his leaving to end up with, as Cat gently put it, "thousands dead, if we're lucky".

There is a difference between 'morally good' and 'good at this particular job'.

TeK

That is something correct you just said. I just struggle to understand why Cat said he is a Villain.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Remember that Good and Evil are not good and evil. Heroism is more about obedience to the Heavens than moral fiber and Evil is more about an unwillingness to be trod upon than destructive intentions.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

The instant I posted this I noticed that I'd repeated "Evil" instead of saying "villainy," but it's too late to edit. Ugh.

Liliet

Because she wanted him to be, either because it was more convenient to her / played into her plans, or because she thought it was better for him than being a SoS-style hero, or both. Or because she confused herself, but I think intentional messing is more likely.

^ My analysis of the whole system sparked by this discussion :3

Mengha

This analysis is genius, and I appreciate that.

It seems to fit with what EE has written so far, and that underlying genius in their writing is also appreciated

Liliet

Thank you ^^

I do fucking adore the genius in EE's writing, that WAS the motivational force behind this analysis ♥ ♥

NerfContessa

Amazing analysis.
As long as the chapter though could have been said in much concise ways.

Not by me, I ramble just as much once I get going, mind. 😊

onedollargum

For me it's this:

"I do not beg for my life," the boy said. "I do not quibble nor defend."

Justification only matters to the Just.

Liliet

His point in that context is that she should kill him.

SpeckofStardust

Most likely because he started it off by killing the man who disagreed with him that there was a plague/ need for a better healer.

Mitrhe

He almost seems like the villainous counterpart to Tariq. What's interesting is that both seem to ascribe to the philosophy of Utilitarianism, doing the greatest amount of good for the greatest amount of people, at the expense of the unfortunate few. I always felt that the only reason Tariq was a hero and not a villain was his adherence to the choir of Mercy, and that had he followed the same path without them that he would be a villain in truth.

What is interesting is that the gods above and the gods below are diametrically opposed, but not along the lines of good and evil as so many in the story assume, rather the gods above represent order, rigid adherence to existing laws at any cost, obedience to your betters, and regular worship, the gods below on the other hand represent a far more hands off, mercantile point of view. Every request you make of the gods below is a bargain, an exchange of services rendered, a clear cut transaction. Where the gods above believe in the purest form of order, the gods below believe in near perfect chaos, where the only thing binding people to agreements is their word and whatever leverage you have over them.

Neither side is inherently good or evil, although if I had to pick I would say that the gods above trend more towards evil than the gods below, but that's simply my belief that personal freedoms are more important than strict adherence to tradition, and thus entirely subjective.

Navi-Hank

It's rather like the difference between Law and Chaos in SMT

Mental Mouse

The Scorched Apostate is a 14 year old boy. OK, it's a world where that's old enough to be treated as an adult, but even so, I sincerely doubt he has a considered philosophy. Rather, he was forced by circumstance to commit an atrocity for the sake of preventing disaster, and is still in the process of owning his own actions.

Note that he didn't have the practical influence or magical training to do anything more subtle than slaughtering the infected – "telling someone" outside the town was clearly beyond his reach, and he couldn't persuade the townsfolk nor dominate them either.

Given the nature of his power (I'd guess he has at most a single Aspect), I suspect more such horrors are in his future. How he reconciles himself to that will shape what kind of Villain he turns out to be... and naturally, Cat wants her hand and her experience on the scales for that.

lennymaster

He told the villagers. He explicitly told them to send for a better healer, instead of the local Priest who could not even call on enough Light to heal his as Cat classified: serious, but to a healer far from mortal wound. They refused to listen and intended to head for the nearest refugee camp.

Miles

I choked. Beastmaster, of all men? Gods, I'd rather sleep with the Mirror Knight. The man might be an insufferable prick, but at least he voted for pgte.

Yeah, kid, this war is ugly. And you're going to need to grow up fast.

But first, you're going to school.

Masego will probably be interested in the Scorched Apostate's emulation of Light.

Rogue Sorcerer, being a decent sort, will probably feel sorry for the kid, and even sorrier that he wound up a Villain – kid drew a very short straw.

The Blessed Artificer? Now that sounds like a potentially very useful sort of person in this war.

caoimhinh

Blessed Artificer is probably bound to a work station chair in the Workshop to keep working 24/7, hahahaha.

Raved Thrad

"Hey, Arty, 'nother Belfry class is graduating in a week, so we'll need another batch of sparklers."

"Godsdammit, why the ever living fuck do we need goblinfire sparklers every time a batch of new Named graduate?"

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Raved Thrad

At this point in the game, Klaus Papenheim getting the Name "Iron Uncle" would be all sorts of cool. And strange. But mostly cool.

Liliet

Maybe not best mentor, but definitely contending for Best Dad.

Second place mentor after Uncle Iroh.

Sugar Roll

Who knows, maybe her new Name is the Mother.

TeK

The amount of her new Names theorised can feel a small book.
The amount people got right so far is zero.

piratedesigns

I'm not putting money on it, but based on the end of Book 5 and other continuous references, I will be delightedly unsurprised if/when she comes into the Name Triumphant.

TeK

They call it First and Only of her Name for a reason bro.

Mental Mouse

I'm pretty sure Triumphant wasn't a Name, but the epithet for the first Dread Tyrant (Emperor/Empress) of Praes.

If Cat does end up getting caught by a name, Mother of Night would be pretty badass.

Liliet

Well, if it's Black Queen, I'll be saying I called it.

Even if it wasn't my favorite option in Book 5.

TeK

I am pretty sure that unless EE deliberately went through every comment here, on Discord and Reddit, made a least of Names that were theorised, and then picked one that wasn't in the said list, there's still a chance that someone called it.

Hah! It's about time she got a Grey Pilgrim moment. This feels like the start of the series, but she's Black this time.

onedollargum

My thoughts exactly. A parent-child story has its roots planted.

Raved Thrad

Pretty much what it felt like to me, too.

onedollargum

Damn, Cat, you found a kid and you want to "settle down" at the academy, take him under your wing and give him shoes? That's downright parental of you.

Death Knight

Tancred is not long for this world. Cat is long overdue losing someone she cared for in the quest to defeat the Ultimate Evil.

TeK

Introducing new characters to kill of instead of properly dealing with a loss of someone we knew for several books is a mark of a lesser writer.

IDKWhoitis

Well, losing both the apprentice and a longtime friend would definitely give Cat the narrative weight to fuck over the Dead King, so...

TeK

So she would orchestrate it, because hard times and all the jazz?

Mental Mouse

Cat wouldn't orchestrate it, but if it happens she'll damn well take advantage of it.

Frivolous

Yet more annoying hints about Masego's inability to practice magic and yet he's dangerous (according to Antigone the Witch of the Woods) and also able to teach mages (according to Catherine here).

Which doesn't make a lot of sense. How can he teach mages unless he can demonstrate magic? How can he defend himself against a powerful untrained mage? Does he use just his Aspects to do so?

I want an update heavily featuring Masego in teaching mode so I can get to the bottom of this puzzle. I was upset when I learned he'd lost his magic, and I have no idea exactly how true this is.

Big Brother

Remember, there's Theoretical and Practical teaching, on top of the fact Masego can "piggyback", for lack of a better term, another caster's magic and make it his own.

Frivolous

If he's only able to wield/steal another's magic, how would he be dangerous to Hanno?

Antigone clearly indicated that Masego was dangerous to both her and Hanno, not just her. So it doesn't have to do (only) with other casters.

I don't expect a really good answer here. Just expressing my frustration with not knowing exactly what is going on with Hierophant.

Liliet

I'd guess he can still imitate miracles without using sorcery for it. It's less flexible than sorcery since it just leaves him with an array of specific tricks rather than a programming language, but in a fight...

Big Brother

Correct me if I'm wrong here EE, but isn't one of Masego's Aspects Usurp? Or am I misremembering that from a quote? "Usurpation is the heart of magic" or some such?

sutortyrannus

While I'm by no means EE, the aspect is Wrest.

Big Brother

That is more than a fair correction. I was misremembering it and confused it with the quote.

medailyfun

with the proper story backing his aspects can be very dangerous

Mental Mouse

Consider if he figures out Hanno's trick of using a bit of light to redirect a working entirely...

Mammon

He can still throw a fey sun at Hanno, that's technically not magic as in his now lost Gift.

Mental Mouse

Masego may not be a sorcerer, but neither was Amadeus, nor are Ranger, Cat herself, Pilgrim, the White Knight, the Mirror Knight, etc. By which I mean that even without his sorcery, he's still a continental-class Named, who furthermore retains his unparalleled knowledge and experience in sorcerous matters.

Shikkarasu

Let us not forget the time he Ruined the Skein's whole demiplane. He can destroy any Named that misstep near him, and he can do it with a single word. Zeze is still dangerous.

Death Knight

This is correct. Even though Masego can no longer wield magic of his own, he still has his insights. Insights he can share with mages. Think taking an exam on Complex analysis with the Professor standing next to you whispering instructions on how you can go about solving the problem at hand.

If that fails he can simply instruct the mage to begin casting and then guide their magic so they can see how it suppose to..."flow"?

I don't know how magic works in this setting. I really wish EE would release his notes on how magic functions in his world. Or failing that, just state the fundamental laws which are invariable and hold everywhere, like the conservation of mass and energy in our world.

TeK

I think that while hard magic systems have their place, soft magic is much more "magical", but harder to pull off consistently, without resorting to asspulls.

TeK

By which I mean "No, don't release the rules, it'll take out the charm"

Adrian_V

He has the theory down and he can wield/steal magic, is more like he can't produce his own, think of it like he is only a conductor rather than a battery xD

Sun Dog

How does anyone ever teach someone about electricity or gravity without the ability to wield the fundamental forces of the cosmos? By explaining them, with metaphor or visualization. Masego is like an expert mechanic who lost the use of his hands, he still knows an awful lot on the subject and can tell people what they're doing wrong.

As for how dangerous he is, he's still a Named themed around dissecting and stealing the use of miracles. He still has Ruin, Witness, and Wrest for Aspects. So he can corrupt/destroy, see the past, and usurp command of any magic in his vicinity. That's all plenty dangerous.

Adrian_V

God I loved this chapter, brilliant way of introducing world exposition using Tancred as an audience substitute for our questions, plus I am liking him, I would have liked him for everything so far including the way he and Cat interact (like how he obviously arouses protective feelings in her) but he jumped right in my top five characters with that Cat x Beastmaster comment xD, I just laughed at Cat so hard then.

I can't wait for other interludes or extra chapters to see more of what happened and is happening first hand either, and lastly i wonder what happened in refuge? It could be some problem but i bet is just that without Ranger there for an extended period of time the whole thing dissolved into true anarchy with a good dosis of slugfest xD

H.

Aaahh seeing Cat do the famous elder villian thing is cute. She learned so well from when Black did it to her. Complete with the moment of 'oh shit that's who this is'.

Liliet

TBF Amadeus's identity was called out like 5 seconds after he arrived on the scene. He didn't get nearly this good an opportunity.

Cat, now, Cat's been milking the 'you can't guess who I am mwahahaha' thing since War College.

Poor Tancred missed the hint Cat provided in "You're not one of Hanno's but one of mine". Then again, he probably doesn't know the White Knight's Name ;u;

Liliet

* name. Jeez, fingers,

rednoserudolph

Wow, Scorched is so "young protagonist" that it almost hurts.

Can we start rumors that Grey was raised with necromancy tho?

"Gods willing or out of my damned way" and "I am sorry, sir, i did not mean to insult your lover."

I cant decide which one of these i like best. Both of them are just amazing.

Mental Mouse

They're both cool, but I still like "... he wasn't called the Lightly Singed Apostate."

Raved Thrad

Tancred's just so adorable. He's about as bright-eyed and bushy-tailed as you can get for a newly-minted Villain. Not even Catherine was this innocent when she started out as the Squire.

As mentioned elsewhere, it really does feel like it's Catherine's turn to be Black to a young, new Villain. And considering just how nurturing Catherine really is (though she'll deny it very very loudly) just how far is this relationship going to go? I can foresee a mentor-student relationship, but I can just as easily see poor little Tancred finding his first serious crush in Catherine. I mean the poor guy's lost everything: he's already said his mother died to the plague, and with the destruction of Marserac we can posit that he's lost any meager belongings he might have still had with most (but probably not all) of the remaining shreds of his innocence. He's so emotionally fragile that he's already reaching out and latching onto whoever will provide him any sort of human touch.

If Tancred does end up in any sort of medium- or long-term interaction with Catherine, basic training at the Arsenal notwithstanding, then I can't wait to see how the Crows react to him. Might they see him as a postulant under the wing of the Priestess of the Young Night?

And speaking of training, what're the odds that it'll be Akua Sahelian who ends up instructing the lad in magic? That, right there, is a scary proposition.

Raved Thrad

Random horrid thought: what if it's Vivienne Tancred ends up having a thing for? That would be the Vader/Padme echo to end all Vader/Padme echoes.

Right now Vivienne is basically being an unpowered princess punching above her weight class, so if Tancred's first words to her are anything resembling "are you an angel?" and the Black Queen ends up being Qui-Gontherine to his Anakin, then we know the war against Neshamalpatine is going to go to bantha poodoo.

Fayhem

Literally every single thing about this comment triggered me. That's impressively thorough.

Raved Thrad

Mental Mouse

Viv is a lot older than Tancred, and has been around the block a few times. I doubt she'd be falling for a disfigured and callow (ordinary meaning) kid.

Raved Thrad

Isn't Vivs supposed to be around Catherine's age? If she's mid-20s-ish to Tancred's 14, then it's within reach of the Vader/Padme age gap.

Mental Mouse

I forget, I had thought she was a bit older than that. But she's also a more restrained type, which is why even with equal ages, I'd still be betting on Abigail.

Liliet

I doubt her main objection to hooking up with a 14 year old will be his appearance.

Raved Thrad

"Are you an angel?" the new Named asked her earnestly. Vivienne shuddered as images inundated her. Of heated glances, and furtive kisses. Of fumblings in the dark. Of being with child. Of dying, a hole burned in her chest, as the Apostate screamed at her in crazed rage.

"Uh, no, I haven't been on the side of the angels in a while. Hey, look, it's the Grey Pilgrim."

Vivienne pointed off to the side, and when the Scorched Apostate turned to look, she ran.

Mental Mouse

Remember, (1) this is a world where that's old enough to function as an adult – Cat herself was only 15 when she got her Call to Adventure. (2) He is also Named, not to mention blooded, and (3) Abigail isn't that old herself, and has specifically mentioned her taste for younger men – though she usually prefers them "pretty".

Upshot being that I wouldn't bet too heavily against that ship.

Barthumphries

Calling it now, the boy is the Dead King in disguise. The face was burned so that nobody could recognize him, so that the Dead King wouldn't have to work so hard to try to pretend to be who he is. That's why the boy is a villain and not a hero. This is just Neshamah working to get a free trip to the secret location.

Mammon

Oh, now there's a thought no one has voiced yet. Probably not, but who knows?

konstantinvoncarstein

Neshamah would never expose himself like this. Anyway, Tancred was bathed in Light, so no necromancy

Andrew Mitchell

Fake light made by sorcery.

konstantinvoncarstein

You forgot the 2 priests 😊

Andrew Mitchell

I thought that as well. But you get all the kudos if it works out that way.

Mental Mouse

I'm pretty sure even a fresh body wouldn't hide Neshamah's presence from Cat.

Barthumphries

It's a sharf in his head, just like when he was in Masego.

Mammon

Everyone's getting caught up in Apostate's comment on Cat x Beastmaster. Why is everyone getting caught up on that when... Nevermind. Of course everyone conveniently and luckily forgot the whole part of there now being a terrifying behemoth of a Revenant. Such is the power of the Fortunate Fool, that even his corpse can manipulate the audience itself to overlook his existence when convenient.

P

All Katwas that he sacrificed himself to take out a Revenant, not that his body was lost to the Dead King. The one doesn't necessarily follow from the other, his sacrifice could have been what was needed to turn the battle, with his corpse properly cremated afterwards.

Mammon

That's what he conveniently wants you to assume!

Also in case it wasn't clear my initial comment was drenched thickly in sarcasm and lightheartedness, no actual thought should be invested on putting this theory under scrutiny.

Ezario Gerion

Oh god, I can't wait for the other members of Woe to point out Catherine's obvious motherly actions that she loudly denies. When would we hear the ironic "Like mother like son"?

Raved Thrad

How soon before we get a Tancred interlude where he finds himself referring to Catherine as "Mother?" 😊

Andrew Mitchell

♥ ♥ ♥

Liliet

Took Cat about three years...

Ezario Gerion

Also, Tancred is going to meet with Hanno at some point, isn't he? Thought of this gives me Berserk flashbacks.

Magicturtle

Guys come on, 1 or 2 voting reminders are fine but 5? Please show a little consideration for people. I voted (followed the first link) but it was pretty annoying to have to scroll through so many comments that wanted me to vote, before getting to the meat of the comments. Besides EE isn't that desperate for votes, seeing how he dominates 1st place

KageLupus

Is it annoying? I've never really minded it or saw the problem with it. Sure this chapter had more than normal, but that feels like people wanting to get the Guide back up in the polls after the long break. And to a lesser extent jumping on this "change a section of the chapter to be about voting" bandwagon.

I kind of like reading the different attempts people make at the voting posts, if they are creative enough. Even with as many as were in this chapter it is still only five posts out of dozens.

Magicturtle

Sure some of them is creative, it is still annoying to scroll through so many reminders, especially on the phone though. The guide is on the top with twice as many votes as the number 2 so its not cause people dont recognise this story for the piece of art that it is. Maybe its just me, but seeing so many comments saying the same thing just makes it a bit tedious. I dont want to step on any toes, just wonder if 1 or 2 comments demanding that we isnt enough? To vote shouldnt be a chore or something you have to, its just a nice thing to do for the author. The Guide have allready cemented its place as a cult fiction, i feel, so its not like it doesnt get the respect that it deserve. Would it really be such a big problem, to cut back a little bit on those types of comments?

Liliet

People can't see if others have posted vote reminders until they refresh. Not everyone thinks to.

Magicturtle

That is an excellent point that i didnt realise. I would delete or the very least edit my other comments, where it possible 😊

Liliet

I see you understood the part of my point I didn't say, too XD

NZPIEFACE

i feel dumb for forgetting ranger was the lady of the lake. amadeus is literally arthur.

Fayhem

ಠ_ಠ

Take my upvote, you damn savage.

Frivolous

Hmm. I hope that when Cath killed the Barrow Sword she got some good Aspect-items out of the corpse.

Maybe she got some out of the Fortunate Fool, too. Who knows? Though really the Alliance should have some kind of general order to save any Named corpses for Catherine to loot.

Frivolous

Er, the Red Reaver, I meant, not the Barrow Sword.

Mental Mouse

It's a shame that, iirc, Cat never got to grab an aspect from Saint. Can't actually blame her, between Pilgrim being right there and the Crown running riot, but still.

TeK

We can't be sure she didn't. She did return later to pluck out Pilgrim's Forgive, no reason for her to not get Saber's aspect.

Mental Mouse

Aside from having a Choir in the room – and Saint was after all a hero. Grabbing from Saint would have been seriously pushy in that context.

TeK

But we don't know what happened after she resurrected Tariq, so the answer should be "whatever plot demands".

Mental Mouse

Indeed, but what does the plot demand? We know that Cat prevailed with the Choir by invoking their own nature. We also know that the Choirs are immensely powerful, and all three times we've seen them stymied was by someone who had managed to attain a privileged narrative position.

Consider that by this point, Cat had already fought and bled for her position as "the moral Villain", the one who gets to call out Heroes on their moral failings. Going for an aspect from Saint at any of the three possible points would have blown that badly.

First, Saint had gone off the rails, so when Cat fought her Cat had a massive plot advantage: Saint had fallen into the antagonist role in a story where the party had well and truly earned their win; Cat was not only the party leader, but she'd predicted the betrayal and prepared a weapon specifically for that opponent... and so she won – the extreme of calling out the wayward Hero. But immediately after that fight, there was another crisis at hand, the rogue Crown. Saint's powers weren't relevant to dealing with the Crown, so taking an aspect would have meant Cat turning her attention away from that crisis to rob the corpse for her own personal benefit. Whoops...

Instead, she did the “proper” thing, which was trying for the crown (and being stymied in that by the other two heroes). So then that crisis was settled, but robbing the corpse would still have been using necromancy on a Hero’s corpse for her own personal benefit, and there was still a Hero in the room to stand witness.

So, she goes to get a walking-stick, and comes back to face the Choir of Mercy. Because she passed the first two chances and turned down the Sword of Callow, she’s still the “moral Villain”, so the Choir doesn’t blast her on sight, and she gets to argue that “resurrecting him will greatly serve the cause of Mercy, surely you can overlook the necromancy and presumption...”.

But then turning around and doing the same necromancy on Saint, for her own profit, with the Choir still in the room... that would have utterly cheapened and disrespected Mercy’s forbearance, leaving her as just a powerful Villain robbing a Hero’s corpse – with both the Choir and their now-living champion in the room. That... does not sound to me like a good survival strategy, much less maintaining her “moral Villain” role.

Liliet

tl;dr it would be fucking rude of her

Mental Mouse

Also, she’d get exactly one from each corpse. And she tends to use them upfront, probably because that leaves less room for “that artifact you were counting on has failed you”.

Shikkarasu

I want to know what she got from the Stalwart Paladin. I know she plucked out an aspect when she killed him. She sassed an Choir for that trinket. This has been bugging me for nearly two years.

superkeaton

Fine, I’ll admit it, he’s adorable.

Mental Mouse

> ... he wasn’t called the Lightly Singed Apostate.

LOL!

Liliet

Tancred is TOO ADORABLE AND PURE

I love his indignation at potentially getting away with being wrong... and worry about getting Cat in trouble...

Yeah, definitely a villain... definitely... it is definitely not just for the reason of Cat claiming him... no cognitive dissonance going on here at all~

Raved Thrad

Hey, Tancred's an orphan now, and they found him all alone, so does that mean he's a foundling? 😊

Ultimate procrastinator

"Yes, I'm the Black Queen, Catherine Foundling. This is my student, Tancred Foundling – no relation – and we're... what? Why are you looking at me like that?"

Raved Thrad

"What is it, Mother?"

"It's nothing, Tan... what did you just call me?"

John

Maybe the only thing stopping her from legally adopting him into House Foundling is the political fallout of adding another villain to Callow's very short line of royal succession.

Mental Mouse

Also the fallout of adding a Proceran to the line of succession. Not to mention that she, personally, is still carrying the flag for "no Named rulers"!

Mental Mouse

And Cat blows a raspberry to Above...

IDKWhoitis

Well this makes Black a sort of a grandpa doesn't it?

If Tancred proceeds to have a college arc with Cat hiding his Name while putting him into school, I'll have a good laugh.

Bet she wouldn't even see the parallels until Masego points it out. Or she would deny it repeatedly.

On another note, when will we see Hanno and Cat together again? Because that's bound to be a fun chapter.

GuloGulos

That last quote gave me chills....literal chills.

Want the story of the fortunate fool for next months bones

How would someone with that power even sacrifice themselves?

Javvies

Throwing themselves into things where even "luck" can't help them.

Remember what happened to the Bumbling Conjuror? He was protected from Apprentice (and mundanes), but Warlock oneshot him seemingly casually.

There are limits to the amount of protection that kind of Name power can grant.

Maybe it was purely enemy action, maybe he stretched it too far from enemy action to survive an explosion in close proximity (maybe he ran up and grappled to plant a bag of sharpeners on the Revenant or something).

Raved Thrad

"Hah, fear the power of my Aspects: (I) Win, (you) Lose, and (rocks) Fall (and everyone dies)!"

Mental Mouse

But you can only use that last Aspect once... 😊

Raved Thrad

And so he did. 😊

Raved Thrad

I wonder where that "commend is awaiting moderation" thing came from. >_>

Alegio

I cant wait for the boy to get a mission, something catches fire (probably goblin fire), and then everybody ends like "Just like Cat" even though it was not his fault.

Oh, and also some interactions of him and Abigail acting as an older sister that knows how ot feels to be teased by Cat.

Mental Mouse

I wouldn't bet on "older sister", given Abigail's known temperament. That would actually be a hilarious match, but poor Abigail! Bad enough she worries about being hung for desertion, but to get a lover who's totally besotted, yet could still fry her by accident?

Raved Thrad

Actually, I expect Cat to make some offhand comment to Abigail like "Look out for him, would you?" which will drive her to utter distraction. 😊

Mental Mouse

Agreed, that's also likely, though I'm pretty sure a Named wouldn't actually be placed under the command of a non-Named human.

Liliet

I don't think Abigil would go for a 14 year old.

Shikkarasu

Ya, aside from all of the nope involved, that doesn't seem like the sort of thing that EE would write into any of the characters.

Aranaya

Damn, she's really enjoying this I Have Many Names bit.

Chapter 4: Shadowed

"By my own hand I have made my enemies, and so own them just as a craftsman owns his craft."

– Dread Emperor Nihilis I, the Tanner

Dusk was shyly peeking over the horizon when Akua Sahelian arrived.

Tancred's exhaustion had caught up to him before long, and he now lay curled under a blanket on the closest thing to dry land we'd been able to find: a large flat stone. The boy was resting his head against a rolled-up horse blanket, too-large boots dangling out of the covers, and drooling into the coarse cloth. He was dreaming, though from way he sometimes clenched his teeth it must have been a nightmare. Hardly a surprise, after the storm of fire and death he'd unleashed on Marserac: it would take a colder soul than this one possessed to sleep restfully after that kind of butchery. I tore away my gaze from the boy, knowing that if stared any longer I'd find it more difficult to resist soothing his sleep. I'd always had a hard time picking my attachments, and though that'd saved my life more than once in the past it would not always remain that way. Though I was only a claimant, even after two years in the crucible, it could not be denied I was once more on the path to being Named.

That meant an apprentice – a real apprentice, not an occasional pupil or a child under patronage – might just be the first step on the road to an early grave. There were ways around it, at least. The Lady of the Lake was the example to emulate there, for once. Ranger had been a teacher for decades in Refuge without ever falling to that peril. In my more charitable moments I wondered if the way she'd been so harsh with all she taught was not in that sense a way of preserving her own life, but that charity was ever passing. Regardless, there were parts of her methods worth emulating. Teaching many students, teaching a general method more than passing one's own signature talents, not allowing yourself to be drawn into the stories of one's pupils. All were rules to consider when seeing to the youngest villains in my charge, and perhaps even when Cardinal itself would be raised. Much as I intended to be sitting on the council arbitrating the Liesse Accords instead of teaching, I might be moved to dabble on occasion. It might prove necessary, should we be thin on the ground for teachers in the early years.

Regardless, I must step carefully until I grasped the nature of the Name I was moving towards. I had opponents still out there that would slit my throat through even the slightest of missteps. One in particular had been most noticeable by her absence, though I was not so foolish as to believe that just because I'd not heard of the Wandering Bard she'd not been busy weaving her nets. But we were busy too, and though the Dead King was our enemy I'd not forgotten his parting short at the Peace of Salia. There is a place in the heart of Levant, the Hidden Horror had told us, where the first pilgrim of grey slew many men. And there, he'd claimed, there would be a secret buried that would tell us how Kairos Theodosian had saved all our lives. The Dead King had claimed that Tariq would know of the place, and that'd proved true enough: it was valley in the depths of southern Levant known as the Verdant Hollow. Finding the truths buried there had not been anywhere as simple as the King of Death had implied, though.

For one, the White Knight's aspect could not see into what had taken place within the bounds of the valley during the first Grey Pilgrim's life. It had not stopped us following the thread, but it'd certainly slowed us down. Soon, though, I thought. Vivienne's reports was clear about that. With Tariq's influence backing us we'd been able to bargain with the Holy Seljun for access to the secret records of the Isbili and using those another trail had been found. I'd winced at the number and calibre of Named we'd had to send to follow it, but the band of five under the Painted Knife had found success in the form of a secret they'd refused to entrust to scrying rituals. A knot of hope and fear had laid nest in my stomach ever since I'd read the report. The truth they were bringing north would not be a gentle one. Yet the grim cast of my thoughts was dismissed by the beat of wings on the wind. I turned, having felt her presence nearing in the Night long before either ear or eye afforded the same, and felt the same clench of the heart I always did when I saw the span of those black wings on the wind.

Akua had taken to embracing the changeable nature that her strange half-life lent her – in part because emphasizing her unearthly nature helped my reputation, making her seem more as a bound spirit than the Doom of Liesse now keeping my council – so it'd been expected that she would start shapechanging for reasons both practical and entirely dramatic. I'd even expected that it came to choosing a shape that could fly she would not settle for a paler imitation of Sve Noc. Yet I'd expected some mimicry of a Wasteland legend, like the rain-birds the Taghreb claimed the Miezans had hunted to extinction or the red-feathered ibis whose croaks at dusk were said to be prophetic by Soninke myths. What she had chosen, instead, was a black swan. Swans were not native to the Wasteland: they were Callowan beasts, most known to nest in the south. Liesse had been called the City of Swans, once upon a time. That the woman who'd once been the Doom of Liesse would take the shape of an ebony-black swan was a gesture of many nuances, and one I still had difficulty parsing.

The few knights still with me, no more than a score, turned hard gazes towards the nearing bird almost to the last. The revelation that the Advisor Kivule was in truth the Doom of Liesse bound to my service had been ill-received, though it'd been a strangely fascinating exercise to see why and by who. The House Insurgent had in fact praised my efforts to redeem the former Diabolist in their sermons, nearly sidestepping the issue that we were both villains of disputable retirement, and the eastern parts of my armies had been largely indifferent. The Order of the Broken Bells, and indeed most Callowan highborn among my armies, had not been so blithe in their indifference. I'd had petitions to allow her to stand trial before either a military tribunal or a noble one that'd gotten increasingly pressing as time went on, and even my blunt reply that I still had a use of Akua had not been enough to put the matter to rest. It was a black mark on my record for a lot of my countrymen, and if not for the constant pressure of Keter to the north I suspected the backlash would have been a lot worse.

As it was, there'd still been desertions. Not many, but given how few of those I'd suffered since the first campaign of the Fifteenth it had stung in ways that were hard to explain. That was a candle to the bonfire that'd been the reaction back in Callow, though. Vivienne had appointed Duchess Kegan Iarsmai of Daoine to the office of Governess-General of Callow before leaving the kingdom for the Proceran campaign which had been, and in many ways still was, good sense. The Duchess' armies were the largest military force left in Callow, she had the clout and pedigree to keep the northern nobles in line and most of all there was absolutely no doubt that Kegan Iarsmai would reply to secret offers from the Tower by steel and public hangings. Duchess Kegan was also the ruler of the Deoraithe, whose ancestral spirits had been stolen and used as a glorified fuel for the doomsday fortress at the heart of Akua's Folly. The news that I now kept the eponymous Akua in my service, even as a shade, had... not been well received.

What few gains in trust I'd made with Daoine had gone the way of thin air, and there was now little doubt that when the war with Keter was settled Duchess Kegan would exercise the right I'd promised her when I'd first bargained for her aid: namely, that the freshly-elevated Grand Duchy of Daoine would be allowed to secede from the Kingdom of Callow while remaining a military ally and suffering no loss of trading rights or privileges with the kingdom. At least the northern baronies hadn't agitated over it beyond some expected opportunistic posturing: they'd least felt the taste of both the Praesi occupation and Akua's span of folly, so truth be told they'd had little to agitate with. And that was only the reaction of nobles, who as the Hierarch had once reminded me were but a few to the many. Though news travelled slow and the shifting nature of rumours gave the hydra a hundred different heads, my reputation had taken a hit back home as well.

A lot of my appeal to the people as a ruler, Hakram had noted in that clear-eyed way of his, had come from how harshly I'd dealt with the Folly and the fae incursions. Akua's survival was a complication in what had had previously been a straightforward story, and people rarely took well to such added twists and turns. There'd not been riots, at least, but there'd been open unrest in the growing southern towns. Many of the former refugees settled there had lost kin in Liesse, and having had my name associated with years of food and shelter in the wake of the ravaging of the south had only helped quell the tensions so much. The House Constant had stayed aloof, as if usually did when it came to worldly affairs, but the Jacks had made it clear that most of the small factions that'd been leaning the way of the House Insurgent now had second thoughts. No, the revelation had cost me a great deal of trust that I would likely never regain: a decade of good rule might see this turn into nothing but a bump in the road, but I didn't have a decade of rule ahead of me.

I fully intended to abdicate in the wake of the war against Keter, so at this point it was more important to gild Vivienne's reputation than glue back a few lost feathers onto mine. As a silver lining that'd proved almost ludicrously easy. Before my thoughts could wander down that rabbit hole, though, elegant talons touched the ground beneath open wings and darkness shifted from swan to woman. Akua had perfected the process: it looked like she was rising from a kneeling position, sweeping up gracefully. Her first attempts, Archer assured me, had looked a lot more like a kid failing at a pirouette. The Doom of Liesse rose to her full height, skirts sweeping around her, and tastefully curtsied.

"My queen," Akua greeted me.

The hard eyes of my knights remained on her back and, I almost imagined, on mine. It made me feel restless, and as it happened I had decent reason to indulge the urge to move: I'd sent for Akua because I needed answers about what had taken place in Marserac, and the village in question was ahead.

"Walk with me," I said.

She did, without missing a beat. We'd had these walks often enough, over the last two years, that it felt like a natural thing for her to fall perfectly in step with my limp. There was a lot that felt natural these days about having her at my side, which I needed no warning to know was a dangerous thing.

"You heard about what happened here," I said, brusquely gesturing towards the burning village.

Unlike me, whose limp was forcing to slog through the wet grounds inelegantly, she was not dipping in so much as a toe. I could probably achieve the same thing by calling on the Night, but she needed not such thing – where once her body had been a soul given flesh by Winter, she now used the power of Sve Noc for the same effect. She didn't need to draw on Night, per se, as she was made of Night – changing the properties of her physical shell was child's play to her, like playing with clay.

"I did," Akua acknowledged. "And from the looks of that sleeping boy under a Callowan blanket, you have gathered another stray to your hearth."

"The Scorched Apostate," I said.

She let out a sigh of sympathy.

"An unfortunate Name in many ways," Akua said. "Those marks will not be easily shed even should he stay at your feet."

"He won't, not for long," I said. "He's headed for the Belfry."

"Mage?" she inferred, interest rising. "He does not have the look of one from a wealthy household."

"Talent is not distributed according to land holdings," I grunted back.

The shade glanced at me, seemingly amused. Akua Sahelian was a lovely sight in any light I would care to name, even more so now that she had discarded the veils she had worn as 'Advisor Kivule', but I'd grown partial to the way she looked under spreading twilight. Shapely as she was – tall and full-breasted yet slender, an almost hourglass shape I'd believed belonged only in stories before first witnessing the unearthly beauty of Wasteland highborn with my own eyes – there was no time of the day that would do her figure disservice, much less in the tight and high-waisted dress of black and scarlet she'd chosen to wear, but twilight always lent her a certain... It was the golden eyes, I thought, and the sharp bones of her face. Under dusk's cast she looked as gorgeous and terrible as the old tales had promised the fae would be. She felt me stare, no doubt, but said nothing of it. It wouldn't be the first time, nor would it be the last.

"Magic is not an inexpensive art to train in, heart of my heart," she said. "I cast not unkind auspice on the boy's talent, but merely express surprise that one with such a powerful Gift did not burn themselves out long before they could become Named."

I wasn't ignorant of the dangers of having a powerful magical talent without being taught, of course. The War Collage had gone into some detail about it, and Black had made certain I read the highborn screeds about the matter like Sorcerous' Bequest and The Burden of Privilege. Praesi highborn often used the death rates as a justification for the ways High Seats plucked out young mages from their families for training and servitude. Mind you, Black had wanted to replace that with Legion schooling and at least one mandatory term of service in the ranks – he'd be much more interested in breaking the grip of the High Seats over the loyalty of the finest mages in Praes than in ensuring the freedom of practitioners. Knowing him he'd have no issue with said freedom either should it come as a consequence of his policies, though.

"He's got only the one trick, as far as I can tell," I reluctantly conceded. "And it's some sort of imitation of what Light can do in a fight."

"A limited repertoire would help," Akua confirmed. "Quite a few untaught mages end up using similar wild spells – the easiest of conjurations and illusions – regardless of where they are born with no ill effect. It is lack of control married to strong emotion that is the most common killer for hedge practitioners, but an intense obsession on a single crude formula would... restrain this danger."

She paused, afterwards.

"An imitation of the Light," she repeated, tone ambiguous. "How very Proceran."

It did not sound like a compliment, nor was it meant to be one. The distaste was not directed at Tancred, though.

"Not all peoples in the world hold magic as the gift of all gifts," I reminded her.

My own had a complicated relationship with sorcery, for one. It was a rare city in Callow that was not warded, or where a few practitioners could not be hired with coin through the Hedge Guild. Yet magic would never be held in high esteem the way steel or prayer would be, for sorcery was inherently linked to Praes for most of us. Though Wizards of the West and Wise Enchantresses had been a staple of Callowan Names for centuries, none of them had ever held so much as a regent's title – mages were advisors and retainers in Callow, never rulers.

"Nor should they," Akua said. "Though it is a great talent, it is only ever one among the many needed for one to achieve greatness. It is those calling the Gift a curse I hold in contempt."

I didn't disagree, as it happened. The reason why the power of mages had first been curbed in Procer was eminently reasonable: some of the largest wizard guilds had taken to playing kingmaker in the First Prince elections, only to get harshly disciplined when a candidate they'd opposed and even tried to depose consolidated power and began dismantling their guilds. First Prince Louis Merovins had not been bloodthirsty man, so he'd ended their power by ruinous taxes and starkly limiting guild sizes instead of brutal purges. Yet his successors had simply kept their boots on the throat of Proceran wizardry without ever reconsidering the matter, often with the House of Light's enthusiastic endorsement. Proceran mages couldn't even serve as healers, which I found absurd as magical healing could accomplish things that priestly healing simply could not. Mages were not outright hated, in the Principate, but they did tend to be viewed as keeping to a disreputable trade. I did not think it a coincidence that we'd gotten more villain Named mages out of Procer than we had heroes.

"Things will change," I said. "Hasenbach founded her Order of the Red Lion and they're just too useful to be despised. Now we're gathering and training their mages for war, which ought to gild the record even further. The Principate will have to adjust, after Keter."

A few thousand mages trained in war whose edge had been honed against the Kingdom of the Dead would not meekly bend their neck so the boot could be placed on it again. And I somehow doubted that someone with Cordelia Hasenbach's ruthless streak of practicality would simply release a force like that back into the wilds. Given how badly the higher ranks of the House of Light had blundered when backing the attempted coup against her before the Peace of Salia, I believed the First Prince might even have the pull to force through some much-needed reforms.

"It is in the nature of rot that it is not so easily removed," Akua disagreed.

I simply grunted, unwilling to dispute the point here and now. We had other cats to skin, and we'd wander far off the beaten path. Metaphorically speaking, anyway. In practice we'd reached the outskirts of Marserac and that now familiar half-dug ditch.

"The boy's also got good eyes, like as not," I said. "It's why I sent for you. He claims he found traces of the Dead King's seeded plague in the villagers."

Her brow rose, arching with irritating elegance. When I did the same thing, it just made me look kind of angry.

"A much rarer talent, this, if it is not an aspect," Akua told me. "It implies either an exceptional sensitivity to magic or a physical gift."

I had an inkling it wouldn't be an aspect. Tancred might have had the power before reaching Marserac, but the Name had gotten its weight through the choices he'd made in the village. An aspect beforehand would be putting the cart before the horse.

"Humans don't usually have the latter, as I understand it," I frowned.

One of the pleasures of conversation with Akua, as it happened, was not having to always spell out everything. Sidestepping the notion of it being an aspect was enough for the implied to be understood.

"There are always exceptions," the golden-eyed shade shrugged. "But you are largely correct. It is a gift most often achieved by twining the line with beings so blessed."

A delicate way of saying that the Scorched Apostate was either a one in a hundred thousand birth or there was nonhuman blood running through his veins. Either way there was more to his story than I would have guessed at first glance, and he'd not struck me as a simple soul from the start. Something else to dig into, though that was the kind of matter best tossed into Hakram's lap. Aside from the practical consideration of having left him in charge of serving as my go-between with the Jacks, there was the more esoteric one of avoiding taking too direct an interest in Tancred's past. Unruly curiosity had a way of carrying costs for Named. I looked down at the first corpse I'd encountered earlier, still slumped and scorched.

"Find the plague seeds if there are any to be found," I ordered. "If the Dead King really has such a weapon, we might have a situation on our hands."

It wasn't that I feared there'd be major spread beyond the initial outbreaks: we'd caught this early enough that we ought to be able to contain if not outright smother the attack. Even if one of the refugee camps was turned we'd be able to strike quick enough to prevent a disaster. The Grand Alliance's use of the Twilight Ways meant we marched and deployed significantly quicker than the dead, after all. Yet containment would occupy our armies long enough a summer offensive would become more difficult while simultaneously making us vulnerable to an offensive on the northern defence lines.

"If there is something to be found, I will," Akua replied, calmly certain.

And I believed her, too. Aisha had once warned me about the Sahelians, and this one most of all. They were always trusted, my old friend had told me, by people who ought to know better. Because they are charming, my queen, Aisha Bishara had warned me as only a fellow daughter of the Wasteland could. Because they are beautiful and fascinating and so very useful that certainly it couldn't hurt to bring them into the fold just the once. And she'd been right, I thought as I watched the woman who'd once been my bitterest enemy kneel by a corpse, weaving strands of Night with her hands. Already I could hardly imagine fighting this war without Akua at my side, and some days it would be untrue to call the amount of trust I put in her measured. If this had been achieved as it'd been in the Everdark, where I had been starved of the company of nearly all I trusted, it would have been one thing. But she had done this while the Woe were at my side, and my armies as well.

Even as a shade whose power I could strip with little more than a prayer, Akua Sahelian remained one of the most dangerous people I had ever met.

I sat on the side of the trench, staff propped up between my shoulder and my neck, and brought down the hood of the Mantle of Woe on my head before closing my eyes. Though night was creeping in, I still felt exhausted. I'd not had an empty day, that much was true, but I fancied it to be a different kind of tired. The kind that saw only days like this one writ in the horizon and could not tell how long the world would remain so. I knew, in principle, that we were reaching a turning point: I'd read the same reports as Hasenbach, had the conversation with the Iron Prince a dozen times. Within months we'd reach the peak of the Grand Alliance's fighting capacity, with Procer's industry and manpower fully turned to war and the wealth injected into every nation's war machine by Mercantis and the dwarves finally being brought to bear. This summer would be the time where we went on the offensive, when we took back every Proceran shore and dug in before the assault on Keter itself.

And still I felt so very tired. Neshamah was fighting against us the kind of war where even victory had a taste of defeat. And sometimes, sometimes we just lost. So I closed my eyes and let my mind drift, as close to sleeping as I could get without drifting into slumber, and let Akua unfold the leather bag holding the set of tool's she'd use to cut open a corpse and find out if it had been seeded with death or worse yet. I waited perhaps half an hour before I got my answer, eyes fluttering open as I heard the shade rise to her feet. Though her dress had been traded for more practical surgeon's garb – a heavy leather apron over a long-sleeved cloth shirt and fitted trousers – there was no mistaking the blood on her forearms. Or, for that matter, the small stone-like sphere she held in the bloody palm of her hand. Golden eyes met mine, gaze perfectly matched even in the shade of my hood.

"Tell me," I said.

"It is sorcerous in nature," Akua confirmed. "More specifically an enchantment, and though I cannot yet tell you the nature of it – I will need the use of my full workshop to ascertain that for sure – I can already tell you two truths. The first should be evident."

She slightly rotated the sphere, revealing a slightly scorched surface.

"The sorcery that killed this woman damaged the 'seed', and rendered it inert," she said. "Whether it was a delicate enough enchantment structure that damage was enough to disrupt it or that is a property inhering to the sorcery used by the Scorched Apostate, I cannot be sure. If it is the latter, I would urge you to hurry the boy's journey to the Belfry – the implications of that would be far-reaching indeed."

I slowly nodded. If there was a particular sort of sorcery that was damaging to the Dead King's own methods, we needed to get a precise spell formula for it as soon as possible and spread knowledge of it to every single mage in the Grand Alliance to that could learn it.

"The second truth is this 'seed' was aptly named," Akua continued. "It is not meant to permanently remain in this state, but to eventually dissolve and release another enchantment held under the outer shell."

"A plague?" I pressed.

"I cannot yet tell, Catherine," Akua said. "Without a full component kit I cannot even properly gauge how long the shell is supposed to last before dissolving, though from the lack of observable reaction to both silver and cold iron it ought to be more than a lunar month from now."

Cold iron, as I recalled, was a hindrance to weak magics while silver strengthened some and hindered others. The Dead King's necromancies, unfortunately, were not affected by it. Some of his early works likely had been, but Neshamah had not been resting on his laurels all these centuries: his necromantic magic was unlike any other on Calernia.

"Shit," I feelingly said. "It would have killed the boy if he'd ever learned, but I was half-hoping he'd gone mad. We'll need to ring the alarm, Akua. This is the first time he's managed to slip a meaningful force behind our lines since the Lord of Ghouls got offed."

"It is quite possible that Light used in the correct manner will be able to disrupt the enchantments," Akua reassured me. "If nothing else, that should relieve some of the logistical burden in weeding out the seeded."

I sighed but conceded the point with a half-nod. Priests were already everywhere in the refugee camps, if we figured out a countermeasure using Light we could further limit the casualties.

"Collect all the seeds you can find," I told her. "I want to know everything about those things we can, and spares to send the Belfry's way."

"I will see to it," the golden-eyed shade replied. "Shall I keep them until we return to camp?"

"Do," I said.

There was not much I could do with one, save asking for the opinion of Sve Noc – which I'd rather do when we were safe back in camp anyway, along with my usual nightly communion. Out here in the open, there was no telling what might be lurking. I left Akua to the labour, dragging myself up and limping away. Night had fallen in earnest, and under the starlight sky I headed back towards the boy and my knights. And the priests as well, as I'd forgot. One of them was leaning over Tancred, back hiding what his hands were doing, and I frowned. The Light had already proven unable to help, and though the House Insurgent were loyalists I'd rather not have them putting around a fresh Named with highly destructive inclinations. I hastened my steps, and only when I was within a dozen feet did the priest notice my approach. He withdrew his hand, looking embarrassed. He'd been smoothing away the boy's last tufts of hair. It was the younger of the two Brothers, I recognized that much though I'd never caught either's name.

"Don't," I said, and gestured, for him to move away.

He did with great swiftness and looked ill at ease under my glare.

"I apologize, Your Majesty," he murmured. "It's, only – I have a little brother his age, my queen. He's just a kid, isn't he? Even though he burned the village, he's just a kid."

My expression softened. I'd not noticed earlier, but the priest couldn't have been more than twenty himself. His robes were slightly askew, like they'd not been made for someone with his exact frame, and he moved a little jerkily. Embarrassed and a little intimidated, I felt it safe to assume.

"I don't fault your kindness," I said. "But after a day like this one, waking with a stranger's hand on his brow might be... ill-received."

The priest might have ended up with a black-rimmed hole in his chest, even Tancred had woken up still in the grips of his nightmare. Although, from the looks of it, that had passed. He no longer moved or flinched in his sleep, and his breath was slow. Nearly imperceptible.

"My apologies once more, Your Majesty," the priest repeated.

I waved it away.

"Hold on to the kindness," I said. "It's rarer than rubies, these days. Only add a little caution to it, would you?"

I patted his shoulder as I limped past him, feeling him go still as stone. My score of knights had dismounted, for it'd be absurd for them to remain mounted for hours, and the horses had been tied to a log in the distance. They moved as little as the rest of us, the stillness having caught up to even the animals. Brandon Talbot was long gone, but he'd left one of his officers to lead my escort. Figuring I might as well inform the man we'd be here for some time still, I picked out the man in question – George Redfern, as I recalled. Helm on, the knight was looking up at the moonless sky but even through the steel had little trouble hearing me arrive. My limp was not quiet.

"Your Majesty," the man bowed.

Starlight caught the edge of his plate armour, revealing a carved passage from the Book of All Things. And, to my mild surprise, what looked like dried blood. Talbot had not mentioned the Order fighting today.

"You're wounded," I said.

"The priests have already seen to it, my liege," he reassured me.

I clenched my fingers and unclenched them.

"Your helm, sir," I mildly said.

He stuttered out a surprised apology and hurried in taking off his helmet, revealing a reddish mustachioed face. His gorget was loose around his neck. The priest earlier had been a little off too.

"Fuck," I said. "Fuck."

Night howled through my veins as I drank deep from the well.

"My queen?" the impostor asked.

"New kind of ghoul, Neshamah?" I asked in Ashkaran.

The thing that was not George Redfern grinned.

"What gave it away?" the King of Death replied in the same

The lance of Night burned through his head in the blink of an eye, but every other knight and priest was moving. Flesh squelched and boiled as the ghouls squirmed out of the shells, turning into unnaturally flowing things with claws and gaping maws. There'd been no bodies, so they must have eaten the dead. Replaced them one by one over the span of the afternoon and evening, while I was distracted. Still, for all their vicious cleverness and sharp caution there were only a score of ghouls and one – and night had fallen. My staff struck the ground as I let loose my anger, lines of Night slithering outwards at breakneck speeds – the first ghoul I caught I speared through the flank, and when it tried to flow around the wound I detonated the strand into black flame. Two, three, four, five. Up the count went as they ran, first towards me and then away from me. I kept only the last alive, wrapping it in solid strands of Night instead of killing it. We'd need a containment box for it, but it would be headed towards the Belfry soon enough. I strode towards it, fingers clenched around my staff.

"You ought to know better than to try me by night, by now," I hissed.

The ghoul laughed, shaking in an unnatural spasm. It'd not been meant to make such a sound.

"Ought I?" the Dead King replied. "Catherine, Catherine. You never watch your back as carefully as you should."

I stilled. The priest had been standing over the Scorched Apostate, whose breathing had become so faint it almost couldn't be heard. The slight pressure I felt from the ghoul vanished, the Dead King's attention with it, and I turned my eyes to the boy on the stone. Who slowly put aside the blanket he'd been huddling under and rose to his feet in his too-large boots. His skin was pale. He was not breathing. The Scorched Apostate's hand rose and brightly shining flame gathered to it.

"I'm sorry, Tancred," I quietly said. "Gods, I'm so sorry."

I should have watched more closely, I should have moved quicker, I should have... I should have protected him.

"But it's not that kind of a war, is it?" I murmured, Night flooding my veins. "Sometimes, sometimes I just lose."

I took the part of me that felt like weeping and put it in the box.

I had a Revenant to kill.

Yes!

tkjarrah

fucking hells
i think the most disturbing part is that neshamah seems to be having fun

IDKWhoitis

Cat is like his only cough friend he likes talking to. Ranger and Bard are pests to him.

It's not even about smothering a child to him. It's that he tricked Cat and feels a high about her losing even when she avoided a bigger loss.

He can't do that with Bard or Ranger easily, or without drastic consequences.

Alex Straughan

The Bard isn't a pest to him, if anything he is too wary of her to have fun.

I see it as Cat being strong enough to be worth talking too while weak enough he's not too worried.

Mental Mouse

Malicia is a friend of sorts, Ranger at least rates pulling out her favorite foods and drinks.

Indeed, I'd say DK has more frenemies than is really good for him.

Someperson

I wonder if that's on purpose. Harder for the story to kill DK when most of the people who might be capable of ending him are "frenemies"

luminiousblu

It sort of is fun though. It's like when you read about a new chess trick and blow your buddy out of the water with it, or when you figure out a new way to filet a fish and wow your boyfriend with how fast the fish comes out of the fridge and into the pan, descaled and all.

The only disturbing part is that he's doing it on a person, but in all fairness, why would Neshamah realistically even view Tancred as a person? Neshamah is a lich. It's a little bit hard to view people as, well, people when you live dozens of times longer, are dozens of times smarter, and are thousands of times more powerful. Neshamah's made it very clear that he doesn't really view anyone but full immortals on the way to godhood or entities of similar power as equals or even really relevant partners. Do you view the fish you filet with compassion? Even if you do, does that stop you from eating it?

Thank you for a compelling description of a horrific thing. Of course it is, because you're describing the Hidden Horror.

NerfContessa

Fuck.

I liked the story that young hero told, and already thought the priest to be doing SOMETHING, but thought it was some light stupidity.

Shit.

Big Brother

NO! I Wanted to see more of Tancred!

Mammon

We didn't, but we kinda could've known that something like this would've and had to happen the moment that Cat said that Tancred had some anti-necrotic means to oppose the Dead King and that the Belfry enabled these means to be spread amongst greater numbers. If Cat had no such inclination and Scorched would've been the lone wielder of this Excalibur for a while, then Providence might've saved the Scorched in the nick of time, but no such respite for the wicked who commit the sin of pragmatically trying to optimise and upscale weaponry to minimise losses.

Jworks

I wouldn't be surprised if this isn't the last of him. Maybe he somehow resurrects himself like cat did, but it seems strange to introduce this character then kill him so quickly.

Mammon

You're not going to be surprised, there's no narrative reason nor hint that he's going to come back. Just like how the Stalward Paladin wasn't exactly a lasting character. It's the beginning of the book, where deaths tend to last.

Razorfloss razor

Oh shit didn't see that coming and god damn he got schorie that sucks. Cat is going to be in a mood for a while

Insanenoodlyguy

Which means odds are good that Akua had called it: he really did have something to pass on that'd really ruin the Dead Kings day. And now that's not a consideration anymore.

Liliet

Mhm.

magesbe

And Callow is understandably pissed that Akua is alive and if not completely free, at least able to walk around and do stuff on her own. Honestly it could have been a lot worse and if Cat did plan on continuing to rule, I think she could most past it as long as she beats the Dead King.

Aston

I'm sure the whole thing with the Dead King having a war is because the Big Bad is coming to their continent.

The war is a skirmish compared to...

Alternative worse enemy.

Like Gnomes.

Miles

There's not enough story left for another big bad. This is the last volume

Allsmart

Yep... Its a pity I liked the boy.

Darkening

Well, that was a much shorter run than I expected for him. Disappointing, danh3107

Well fuck me

IDKWhoitis

So.. That time I was mentioning Tancred dying.

I didn't mean so soon. Shit.

Well Dead King proceeds to be my favorite Bastard, getting the kid first before he can be dangerous.

Although now I wonder if Tancred was a plant, he could detect something without specialized tools...

But on the other hand, he was offed so quickly I think the Dead King was mildly threatened. He was willing to deploy a trap card early to kick Cat in the metaphorical shin, but that's petty. I think a surgical strike to smother a dangerous Name is actually why these ghouls are here.

OH, Cat's going to have to tear apart Tancred's soul to see if something can be salvaged... Because it's too useful to let lie.

Poor Cat. 😞

RoflCat

In some way, her refusal to get into a mentor role is a factor in her failing to save him.

Because Creation wouldn't like it when a pupil die before the mentor, unless it's a story of a mentor seeking revenge for slain students though usually those requires a group of students to qualify.

By refusing to pick up that thread, she herself is safer from Story shenanigans but at the same time it also means there was no Story protection for him.

IDKWhoitis

Oh man, that's some Saw level mind game right there. And we know some asshole is going to point this out...

jamesc9

Sorry, I'm exhibiting my ignorance. Could you please unpack 'Saw', so I can decide whether to engage with it?

Javvies

I presume it's a reference to the horror movie franchise.

... I think it's where people get abducted and put into deathtrap gauntlets in groups.

Unless that's a different horror movie franchise. I haven't seen them.

Shikkarasu

What Javvies said below. Specifically the mindgames references the part where each deathtrap has two solutions. The obvious one where the group lets one of their number get killed, and another, less obvious/harder solution where they find a way to save everyone.

The plot of basically every Saw movie is that they don't realise until the end that they could have gamed the system and not killed all those people.

Shikkarasu

My theory is that the Plague was a ruse. Nussy seeded a few towns to fish for Named that might hinder him and smother them/ turn them into undead spies before Cat could protect them. Cat just happened to notice a moment before DK finished. It's a natural reply to the Black Queen playing gotta Cat-ch'em all with Named.

Nessy is always 3 steps ahead.

Adrian_V

Yeah, he knows that no matter how potentially powerfull the individual no ones starts up invincible, instead of letting the story come up naturally or opose it liek Black was doing before cat he helps it along...and is prepared to off the heroes (and villains too for that matter) while they are young, worse case they hurt him by going in a blaze of lory but that is still better than letting some new name row up by directly oposing him.

Halinn

Hell, he can be farming for revenants by seeding isolated places with things that would need a Named to solve...

NerfContessa

So calernia war is Actually Neshemah playing a cross of Sims and farming simulator?

Javvies

Ouch. That's brutal.

And remarkably unfortunate. Tancred/Scorched Apostate would have been quite useful going forwards.

On the flip side, there's no longer a need to worry that he'll end up being the apprentice/successor that exposes Cat for being a mentor death.

konstantinvoncarstein

But now we have to worry about the red flags  that are Cat speaking of grooming Vivienne and what she herself will do after the war

Insanenoodlyguy

It's much safer though. That's a political appointment, and it's specifically one that's not a named. That's about leaving a legacy, which has far less risk then having a direct heir/apprentice. If she had the Name of Black Queen truly and Viv was to become the next one, it'd be different, but as it stands for now it shouldn't be a problem.

0x

The box is building, and inside is escalation incarnate!

edrey

Holy fucking fuck, i need more vocabulary for this, i was looking forward to the boy potential, and this is the third chapter, that is how you make people have a pause to breath

Adrian V

I knew something like this would happen, i mean the surest way to avoid death by mentor story would be this, but i thought it would be later or maybe if no one mentioned it we could avoid it, but the moment Cat saw the priest my heart fell, when she didn't immediately overreact it fell even more since such an out of character behaviour (Cat is what some might call a paranoid fuck xD) could only mean disaster incoming.

RIP Tancred, you probably would have been a powerhouse or dangerous enough that Nessy (DK nickname xD) obviously rushed to kill you, those hints and theories about his power mentioned here were probably spot on and that is why he decided to kill him fast. Its was such that he revealed a new kind of ghoul to do it.

I do hope ther eis another kid around that could fill the lost puppy picked kind of role for Cat xD, dialogue implies he isn't the first (and there could actually be more than 1 in fact)

dadycool

Fuck's sake, Erratic. We just met him. Sure, he's proven a significant enough threat to warrant that kind of response, but still. I suppose this may teach Cat to moderate her mentor meter, rather than suppress it all the way to avoid that story.

konstantinvoncarstein

I think Tancred's death is a narrative device to make us feel how this war is. To set the tone for the rest of the book

dadycool

Yeah. It calls to mind the times Cat's lost friends to the various wars and intrigue, like Ratface getting killed as punishment from Malicia, Nauk both times, or the Gallowborn. It's one thing to lost an army of Redshirts. It's a whole other ballgame to lose even a single friend.

I guess I thought the war was already real enough, given the various interludes, but it hadn't kicked in "onscreen" yet, considering Cat hadn't directly felt it yet. Again, 'Oh dear, three Principates, dozens or armies, and numerous Heroes were lost to the Dead King.' v. 'Oh shit, my new psudo-apprentice just got gouled!"

Death Knight

Wait till Hakram bites it.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

He's vital enough to her cause that I doubt he'll die before the climax of the book. He might end up being the last named character DK offs though, or among the last.

Also, your phrasing made me imagine Adjutant eating a ghoul.

Mental Mouse

Gotta re-establish that standard for the new Book....

Oof, that's rough. It's narratively rough enough that it's something I want to glare at the Bard for, but as always, almost everything could warrant glaring at the bard.

I do wonder how developed Scorched was as a Name. If he was at a stage where he had managed to claim his first aspect, it does mean that Cat might need to do some more graverobbing – I imagine that given the nature of his powers, it'll involve either bringing an interesting trinket to the Belfry, or gaining quite a knife.

benthelynx

Can she do that without a name?

Darkening

She ripped Shine out of the Grey Pilgrim and I think it was Ban from the Named elf revenant on the mission where the Twilight Ways were formed, so yeah, she's quite capable. Cat does say, she's the high priestess of a pair of goddesses that built their ascension on stolen power. It's kind of a thing with Night.

Javvies

She pulled Forgive out of Pilgrim, not Shine. Forgive was his ability to resurrect people. Shine is the star one.

Liliet

Welp, that was a well-executed punch to the gut.

Scorced Apostate: I'm a spellcaster.

Scorced Apostate: I- I mean, I'm a pri- Dies instantly

Decius

Dead King: Hey, I could use one of those.

Mental Mouse

Well, of those Pilgrim isn't a spellcaster, and is still primed for a Heroic Sacrifice. Rogue Sorcerer may not be a proper sorcerer, we never did get the full story on that one.

Mammon

That's why I added the kinda to Pilgrim. He's more a cleric/priest, but in terms of slinging around light he kinda overlaps with the mage's purpose in battle scenes.

And Rogue not being 'proper' doesn't matter, it seems that a magic talent/focus isn't too common even amongst Names in Calernia and that they're something special indeed. Casting magic at all and having this as his main focus categorises him a spellcaster. As seen in the moments before Tyrant's Swan Song, he's listed amongst 'the spellcasters' when they commented how bad things must be when providence sees to all these heavy-hitters being brought to bear.

Wonder

Heartbroken for Catherine , for Tancred .

Sethur

"I took the part of me that felt like weeping and put it in the box."

Oh Cat, you are so much like your father... 🙄

Darkening

Jeez, I hadn't even thought of that, but yeah, that's very Black of her.

Death Knight

"How big could it really be if it can fit in a box?"

burguulkodar

Depends on how big the box is.

konstantinvoncarstein

Not too big, so Cat can use it to hit people

shadw21

I'm sure Cat can use the Night to lift some pretty big boxes.

dadycoool

Strange thought that just occurred to me: "Would Cat become the Dread Princess if Black became the Dread Emperor?" Followed by an even more strange thought and action utterly out of character for him: "Would she become the Chancellor?"

IDKWhoitis

The Praesi would be scared shitless of her, and she has some degree of plotting under her belt. So she would be not completely unqualified. However Cat's disgust with Praesi political institutions would probably push her to hang all the high born before she would be chancellor.

Although burning highborn at the stake would definitely be a family bonding experience for her and Black.

Burlyraven

So it's totally a longshot considering he is a Villain, but I wonder if Tancred is actually dead, or more accurately, wholly defeated. There was the hint that he was already something other than human, and his power seems directly suited to countering the DK's tricks, so I'm not entirely convinced that there won't be a moment of throwing off the dark shackles, especially because we see Cat, a jaded "old" warrior, having given up on the young victim gifted with power. Just a thought. Maybe I've been watching too much Shounen anime, though.

Even if he does escape/revive/purify himself, I'm not seeing a clean victory.

Decius

He started off by mass killing.

He was never a protagonist.

Cat thought that being on Team Below would suffice. She was wrong.

He's on Team Dead.

Burlyraven

Oh, there's many reasons I'm probably wrong, but killing dozens to potentially save thousands or millions isn't one of them. That just makes him dark and/or tragic, which are perfect descriptors for an anti-villain.

Another reason I want there to be hope that this is the case, is that it may be the closest the Woe can get to a happy ending, as it makes the Woe the experienced team that acts as a group mentor to the young specialized godslayer. In that case, the Woe would act as guardians for the the living nuke, which likely gives each some epic moments and a coin flip chance of making it out alive, but also carries the slight risk of the entire planet going grey-goo.

SpeckofStardust

Ya he started off his killings to make a point, aka the priest who likely had no way to do anything better then what he did. As such him being a villain is not a question.

NerfGlaistigUaine

Nicely done. Scorched Apostate had enough development in two chapters to actually feel bad about rather than a cheap sacrificial lamb. Feel I should've seen this coming what with the "sometimes we just lose" line but I didn't so this was a nice gut punch. Hammers home how absolutely brutal this war is going to be and I'm loving it. Anyone want to take betting odds that at least one of the Woe will be dead before the story is done?

dadycool

No bet. Three of them are physically crippled, one is completely Nameless, and the last is having/just had some kind of existential crisis. Cat can't walk without a cane/staff, Masego can neither see nor practice magic, Hakram has one boney hand that can get hacked by a Necromancer if he's unlucky, Vivienne has no Name to call upon and is stuck on the throne, and Indrani is either the one most or least likely to get offed, considering she has been before.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Do Masego's magic eyeballs no longer function? I thought they still did.

konstantinvoncarstein

They still function

Death Knight

Yep. My denari is on Hakram.

Decius

Hakram will die, become a revenant, and then be destroyed. Everyone else gets an epilogue: Masego will 'retire' to a life of researching DK's wreckage. Akua will be long-priced into nonexistence, Cat will intend to become Headmistress of Hogwarts but will die when the entire school is burned by gnomefire.

Archer goes on to further adventures.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Archer becomes the protagonist of a spinoff "harem anime" type story as joked sometime prior to the start of this book by someone whose identity I've forgotten.

luminiousblu

Getting long-priced is off the table at this point. If anything Akua will just fuck off on her own. Cat spends an entire segment morosely thinking about how good Akua is at getting Cat to trust her, and this time she doesn't even spend time trying to convince herself she's still going to punish her for it.

ninegardens

"I trust you" and "You get to avoid consequences" are pretty separate things though.

Cat is going to have to make sacrifices in this war, and Akua has set herself up as a person DESERVING of being sacrificed.

I'm not placing bets either way on Akua's survival, just saying that Cat trusting her, or even forgiving her, is not necessarily enough to escape the long price.

BarthHumphries

I called it last chapter, the Scorched Apostate is the Dead King. He didn't have basic elf blood, he wasn't 1 in a million lucky, he was able to see the seeded plague because it was easy for him to see his own work.

Nashamah or whatever his name is, has a lot of people. We've seen that fights to eradicate a people create Named. It stands to reason that the Dead King would have some of his people turn into Named. He then seeded a fragment of himself into the boy, destroyed the face so that nobody could not recognize him (I know everyone from that village you say you're from and you're lying about coming from there).

This was a test. Now the Dead King knows that a gifted child will be sent to the Belfry no matter how the war effort may need that child. So he can try the same thing again but far away from where Catherine is and thus learn the secret location.

IDKWhoitis

This could be discovered when Cat goes graverobbing on Tancreds body...

But I'm personally not feeling it. I'll keep traveling down this rabbit hole because it's fun through...

To go under the radar of both Cat's 6th sense and allow Light to heal his minor wounds would be very difficult for a construct to do.

However, it is the Dead King, and he's more than a bit of a Bastard. So if the priests were picked off beforehand, then the repairs to the leg could have been controlled but the Face not work. Tancred could have had latent enchantments embedded in him, and not have known he too was infected. Or worst yet, patient zero.

Or to add to the list of weird, horrible nightmare fuel: Tancred could have been deep undercover from Sanctuary, and have been living breathing with advanced latent magical prompts and enchantments.

Barthumphries

He wasn't a construct. He was a living breathing normal human whose entire life and circumstances of birth, etc., were crafted by a millennia-old person specifically in the hopes of creating a Named such as this. Then he was disfigured so that nobody could "not recognize" him as being ostensibly where he was from, he was snuck into the town, may have been responsible for seeding the plague, then had his memory wiped.

There would have been two triggers to release the wiping, a timed trigger for a few months, and a manual trigger. This was accomplished the same way that Cat's memory was temporarily wiped to defeat the Skein.

This theory is nonsense. The reasons are so obvious I find myself too lazy to type them. Just read the chapters again, many things don't fit because it could have been done better.

This is what it seems: The Dead King (through scouts) saw the fire targeted on a village he seeded a magical plague and immediately used important resources (new type of ghoul) to nip the huge threat a new named posed while still in its infancy. In this he counted with Cat not wanting to personally mentor and guide/protect the boy because she was afraid for herself in that role.

There you have it.

superkeaton

Called it, damn me. Should have been more careful, Cat. A boy who could sniff out the Dead King's plots was worth more than his weight in gold.

Death Knight

His sorcery can still be stolen by Cat through the Night. Doesn't mean she could use it, just store it somewhere until Masego or Rogue can take a look at it.

Hells, she could probably even summon Akua who's literally walking distance away to take it on her behalf.

burguulkodar

Whatever the boy did was not an Aspect, so it can't be stolen.

Decius

The Goddess of stealing will take that as a challenge.

Death Knight

Harvesting night to get abilities is the whole shtick of the Drow. Book 4 showed us that even your garden variety humans can be stolen from. So stealing somebody's unique magic definitely is possible through the Night.

burguulkodar

You keep dreaming, kids.

DungareeDio

Well that's a real kick in the teeth to start my day with.

jack

As soon as Cat realised that the priest was fake, I knew the boy was dead.

burguulkodar

Your comment reminded me: we still do not know what spooked her (just as the Dead King was curious, so are we!)

Fayhem

Given the callout to the Lord of Ghouls earlier I suspect it's that she's seen things like this before, because this war fucking sucks.

Nathan

Both of them were suddenly a little too thin for their clothes/armor. That is what tipped her off. Presumably she saw this before.

Morgenstern

I can tell you what tipped me off:

– 1) his robes were slightly askew, like they'd not been made for someone with his exact frame

– 2) he moved a little jerkily

(Tancred: He no longer moved or flinched in his sleep, and his breath was slow. Nearly imperceptible. – After the priest just did something with his hands on the boy that Cat could not see.)

3) I patted his shoulder as I limped past him – feeling him go still as stone.

Then the blood on the knight where she KNOWS there has been no recent fight and no blood before when she last saw him. The “priest saw to it” – the same one that was off before.

Yeah, they're ALL so dead. But my hackles raised with the very first notice of the priest suddenly not fitting his clothes anymore and got worse when he moved somewhat strangely. Whereas he did NOT raise any “odd” notice before.

JRogue

If Tancred really does have a way to see through and destroy the Dead Kings “seeds” it is possible that the Dead King is about to get a surprise. Maybe even an Aspect will manifest.

Or EE just wanted to tear our hearts out and write a kickass fight scene.

Either way, I'm here for it.

Tohron

No idea what's going to happen next, but one idea that just popped into my head: what if the Scorched Apostate was a ploy by the Wandering Bard to get both Catherine and Neshemah killed?

Specifically, if Catherine fell into the Mentor role (and the Apostate seems almost crafted for that position), then that would add a lot of weight to the Dead King killing her at some point, which in turn would lock him into a plot where the Scorched Apostate eventually defeats him permanently.

Mental Mouse

So wait, DK just sandbagged 21 knights and priests, all of which have holy protections, without any of them being able to so much as alert Cat and Akua? I call shenanigans...

Also, better check those horses too...

Andrew Mitchell

> Also, better check those horses too...

Yeah, they'll need to be slaughtered too.

Morgenstern

Yep. Special armor against sorcery... (and priests wielding the Light) – I feel bad about that, too.

Daniel E

Welp, easy come easy go I suppose. On a lighter note, now taking bets about what Cat's Aspects will be. My guess; Mistake, Sarcasm, and Badgers.

Akuabestgurl

Starting it off with a weeklong kick in the nuts.

Cold EE. Cold.

Captain Amazing

I think she does the steal the dead from death thing again but Tancred loses his magic. He always wanted to be a priest but Above rejected him. So Catherine can rez him as a priest of Night. Night was about making difficult choices for survival from the beginning and the Sisters want to spread their faith to humans. His Name isn't actually about his magic and becoming a priest of Night would make him even more of an apostate. This way, Catherine gets to teach him directly too. Tancred can replace her without needing to kill her. Please author? Please?

burguulkodar

Too fanfictional.

shadw21

Cat had at the time, a freshly re-acquired, transitional name and was offered to be made queen by a Choir as she had, "A kingdom, an enemy and a claim." Her first story as a Villainous squire resolved on her death, and the second one started around her claim to the Kingdom, and her 'talk' with the Choir could be considered her Name vision quest thing like what Black put her through.

As she told the Choir, "You're not the Gods. You're part of the story too. You have to follow the rules. And if you won't give me my due, I'll Take it." and she became/confirmed herself as a Villain once more.

Nuke_The_Earth

Shit. Actual, genuine shit. Damn it all, I liked that kid.

Zengar

I just had a thought, although possibly it isn't a new one and I just missed it in a previous comment section. Warden of the West is a Name that we know exists and that we know is unclaimed. All of those with a better claim to it than Catherine either are already Named or have already rejected it. Has Cat been paying so much attention to the pitfalls of growing into a Villain Name that she missed the start of a Redemption Arc? Her falling reputation in Callow would fit right in with one of those, the darkness needs to be recognized before it can be transcended.

Black Spiral Dancer

Dream on. A priestess of a Goddess/demi-goddess from below will never ever get a Heroic Name.

seven cats

Warden of the West is a Proceran title though, I'd assume it'd go to someone with more of a cultural connection to it.

Badziew

Plot within plot within plot: Dead King deliberately allowed the seeds to be discovered, so that they would be shipped to Belfry (or any other secret place) to be researched and prodded upon... and thus reveal its location to DK or release some nasty sorcery or (most likely) do both things at once.

Can we start rumors that Grey was raised with necromancy tho?

I mean, are you really Cats apprentice if you haven't cheated death on your first day on the job?

Captain Amazing

Hahaha a fellow believer!

kilotoncake

Is Neshamah pulling a Conquest? See, if he had control over northern Procer for months, there really is no reason for anyone to be alive, unless it's part of some plan. He's laid the grounds for THE chosen Named who will defeat the King of Death to be born there, after all, why would some comfy merchant prince from Mercantis have a compelling reason to fight DK when there are orphans aplenty right there. So, any threat to him must come from there, but also he's prepared the forces to snuff them out every time like Black used to do. Sowing the seeds in his backyard to reap them all the more easily. Unlike Black, DK has inevitability. When the heroes' strength escalates, so would the level of his potential new revenants. So, unless they pulled another angel corpse from the jungles of Levant, they're gonna need some amazing firepower to beat DK.

agumentic

Rereading the chapter, it's interesting to see all the signs of things going wrong and how Cat fails to notice them.

Chapter 5: Expired

"It which does not take the knife of mistake by the grip is destined to take it by the blade instead."

– Drow saying

When I'd still been a girl of sixteen, the closest thing I ever got to a father taught me the basics of killing mages. Hit them quick, Black had said, and don't give them time to dig in. Hinder visibility and close the distance. Always go for killing strokes, a wounded mage is twice as dangerous. They'd been good lessons, time had taught me, though they shone most against Wasteland practitioners. Unfortunately, they'd been lessons meant to be used against mundane mages. Not Named. Not Revenants.

Those I'd learned to fight the hard way.

The Scorched Apostate's – no, he was just the Revenant now, lest guilt slow my hand – wrist came down jerkily and a strand of brilliant mageflame shot out towards me. It was quick for a spell of that calibre, both in casting and in movement. I breathed out and let the Night flow through my veins, chasing away the cool touch of spring and sharpening my eyesight. The properties of that spell were still unknown to me, so caution was in order. Would that I'd believed that just a bell ago, the thought came, bitter and unbidden. Dark power roiled in a circle, expanding outwards between myself and the flame as the unstable portal into Arcadia came into being with a quiet keening sound. The Revenant's other hand rose, flames gathering to it, but I wouldn't fall for this shallow a trick. I was already grasping the Night with my will when the still-moving strand went around the expanding portal, and I saw no need for great subtlety: I broke the strands that made up the edge of the portal-gate, leaving the working to violently collapse.

The detonation of Night did not disperse the flame, to my surprise, but it at least established that the Revenant's sorcery was not entirely unaffected the power I wielded: it was knocked off its trajectory. My sharpened sight picked out the way the Night seemed to unravel when in direct touch with the brightly shining flame, much as Night did when in direct contact with true Light. A consequence of source purity, Hierophant had once told me: Light was said to be a gift from Above, while Night ran from the fountainhead of Sve Noc. There was an inherent superiority to the fundamental stuff Light was made of. Magic should not have been able to mimic that effect, of course, but people kept telling me usurpation was the essence of sorcery for a reason. It didn't matter, though. This was a fresh Revenant, not a fully settled one, so when I painted surprise on my face and let the flame continue streaking towards me – swiftly joined by a second strand – it did not look any further. It did not notice the fine line of Night I had slithering along the ground, the way it formed a loose circle around it.

When the first strand of bright flame came within two feet of me, I breathed out and took a step back through a gate into the Twilight Ways before closing it. I did not look at the kinder, softer starry sky above and simply kept my mind turned to the Night strand I'd left behind in Creation. Using it as a compass, I took five brisk steps forward before raising my staff and opening a gate back into Creation. The Revenant had the time to half-turn towards me before I unleashed a torrent of raw Night from the tip of my staff, aimed straight at its head.

Decapitation wouldn't kill one of them, it'd take more damage than that to break the necromancy animating it, but it would blind it. With the sole two spells it ought to be able to control still out there it should have no – ah, clever Revenant. Even as I stepped back out into Creation, in the same heartbeat it dismissed the sorcery it'd been using and began a fresh spell right on its own face. It wasn't quite quick enough, or powerful enough: half of my torrent remained untouched and so tore right through the left half of its face.

Even the right side was damaged, because it did not quite have the control to detonate one of its spells so close to itself harmlessly, but for a Revenant such surface damage was mere cosmetic. I struck the ground with my staff, seizing the circle of Night I'd left behind and sharpening it to an edge before pulling it tight: like a razor-sharp garotte, it sprung towards the Revenant at ankle-height like I'd pulled on a noose knot. For a heartbeat the undead Named hesitated. I was close, a mere three steps behind it, and it wanted to kill me. But its legs were being threatened. It chose, and chose poorly. Two spells bloomed, one striking toward the Night-wire and the other towards my face. That single heartbeat had allowed me to take a step forward, and so before the spell towards me could shoot out I slapped away the arm with the side of staff. It knocked the Revenant askew, which disrupted its aim with the other spell as well. As it tried and fail to gain its footing back, I struck out with my free hand even as the Night-wire sliced through its too-large boots – the box's lid trembled – at ankle height.

My fingers sunk into its chest, coated with Night, and I went looking for an aspect should there be any to take. Two-half formed, I found with cool disappointment, but nothing I could make my own. I still ripped out the shapeless bundle that tasted vaguely of sight, dust trickling down my fingers as I drew back and let the Revenant hit the ground. It had, I found, decent combat sense for one so freshly raised: it'd shot out the two spells after all, and instead of trying to form others from scratch it was now guiding both strands of bright flame straight towards my torso. It would have been a proper monster, I thought, if given time to sharpen. Instead I whisked out all the Night still flowing through me, shaped it and tapped the butt of my staff against its chest once before taking a limping step back. The black flames I'd birthed ate through the flesh as if it were dry kindling, though not so fast that I did not have to take another two painful steps back to evade the strands of bright sorcery still chasing me.

The strands of flame gutted out suddenly, after the second step, but this wasn't my first Revenant fight. I left my own flame to its work until it was undeniable that more than half the body was gone, only then smothering them out with a twist of will. I breathed out, leaning against my staff, and felt my leg throb with violent pain. It was an almost welcome distraction from the way I'd taken a boy of fourteen under my protection and then he'd not even lasted through the fucking night. Though she made no sound at all, I felt Akua's presence in the Night as she hurried at my side. Too late for the fight, which had felt like it lasted an hour but in practice couldn't even have lasted a long prayer's length. The hem of her dress sweeping the wet grass and stoe as she slowed her pace, the shade came to stand at my side. She followed my gaze, which had dipped beyond Tancred's broken corpse to the mutilated remnants of the ghouls who'd eaten and impersonated my escort.

If she offered me sympathy – pity by another name – Gods forgive me, but I'd find a way to put her back into the godsdamned cloak. I was in no mood for platitudes.

"A new breed of ghouls," Akua said, tone calm. "Impersonators?"

I breathed in, breathed out. Good. Yes, there were more important matters at hand than the way I felt like screaming.

"Yes. They were slightly off," I said. "Too small, maybe? It was hard to tell."

"It might be a matter of mass," she suggested. "It tends to be one of limitations for shapeshifters."

"Sisters make it that those are too expensive to make often," I grunted back. "They weren't anything to boast of in combat, not like the war-breeds, but that's clearly what not they're meant for."

"The presage boxes the Arsenal makes can be used to weed out such impostors," Akua noted. "Assuming those ghouls are, in fact, still necromantic constructs."

"They are, the Dead King was able to speak through one. But the boxes glow when there's any undead within a hundred feet, Akua," I skeptically said. "Sure, this far behind our lines that'll work as a test but out there on campaign? I'll be damned if they don't be turn into lanterns you can't even put out."

"We might need to rely on priests until more precise instruments can be created, then," the shade said. "Regardless, as a preliminary to deeper studies you've left enough of the corpses that they can be tested for baser weaknesses."

"Back to camp, then," I said, keeping my voice steady. "We'll put the bodies in the Night. Do the same with the villagers, and some of the building materials as well. We're trying to recover more than the seeds now: we'll have to see if they can reproduce the Revenant's sorcery as well."

"Agreed," Akua said. "It can be done within half an hour, I'd wager. If you would retrieve your mount?"

I breathed in, breathed out. The horses, the one's that'd not moved much. They still hadn't, so they'd probably been killed, but I'd have to make sure.

"Yeah," I said. "Yeah, I can do that."

The golden-eyed woman stood at my side, still as only a shade could be. Waiting for me to move first. I took a step, fingers taut around the yew, and caught sight of the horse blanket still on the flat stone where the boy had been sleeping.

"Fuck," I hissed out.

Leaving my staff to stand unnaturally upright in my wake, I strode away. Even with only one woman for audience it would have felt childish to throw it down. Yet the urge to just break something was consuming my hand, the desire so strong Night was flickering around my hands without having been called upon.

"I should have caught it, Akua," I said. "I should have godsdamn caught it. I'm getting slow on the uptake. Worse yet I'm getting sloppy. I should have dragged him back to camp immediately even if he had to ride with the survivors the whole way. Instead I waited here for you and the kid got killed because I figured we could take it slightly easy just once."

I was starting to make mistakes, and I couldn't afford mistakes.

"Yes," Akua Sahelian frankly said. "You should have."

It should have angered me, the way she confirmed my disgrace without so much as a speck of hesitation, but it didn't. I wouldn't have allowed myself to lose my grip around her if I'd not been willing to suffer that sort of appraisal in the first place.

"I wouldn't fallen for something like this in Iserre," I said. "Or even in Salia. I'm losing my touch."

I'd run rings around the Pilgrim and the Tyrant, but now a pack of fresh ghouls was enough to snatch a boy under my protection? I would have called it humiliating, if the greater failure here wasn't that a kid had been slain and put down again, so instead I just called it shameful.

"The Graveyard was the span of a single night," Akua said. "Salia of a few evenings – the parts that mattered, at least."

I turned a hard glare on her, but she did not bat an eye. Why would she? She'd faced me down when I'd come at her with steel and Winter, with Name and host. She had no fear of my temper, this one.

"If you use even the sharpest sword in the world every single day, it is only a matter of time until its edge grows dull," the shade told me.

"We've all been in the same war, Diabolist," I snarled. "That's not an excuse."

Because the heroes weren't faltering, were they? Or Archer, or Hierophant, or even grizzled old Klaus Papenheim – who'd lost so much it sometimes beggared my comprehension as to how he got up in the morning.

"You have been the preeminent general in Hainaut's defence for more than year," Akua evenly replied, "while also acting as captain and peacemaker for Named or Blood of every stripe, serving as one of the chief strategists of the Grand Alliance and, all the while, being the diplomatic broker between it and the Empire Ever Dark."

"That-"

"I am by no mean excusing you, Catherine," Akua interrupted, meeting my anger without blinking. "This is a failure, and an even starker one is the way you came to make this one in the first place. You were warned by Adjutant that you could only take so much on your shoulders without running yourself ragged. You did not heed his words."

"Didn't I?" I snapped. "I as good as handed over Callow and the negotiations for the Accords to Vivienne. Hakram sifts through every single report and letter before they make it to my desk, culling what doesn't need me in particular – Hells, I haven't seen an actual list of our supply stocks in a year, only summaries. Indrani and her band are handling finding the new Named, Masego and Roland are running the Arsenal. I don't even strike beyond our defensive lines anymore: we send out bands of five!"

I panted quietly, the tirade having set my lungs aflame.

"How much more can I possibly delegate?" I asked. "I'm not whining, Akua, I'm genuinely asking – how much more of this can I possibly delegate?"

"Turn over full command of the Third Army to General Abigail," the golden-eyed shade answered without missing a beat.

"She's not there yet," I said. "Not against-"

"Then demote her, or name someone able in her stead," Akua said. "You are making, dearest, an old mistake of my people."

"Haven't raised any flying fortresses, have I?" I scoffed.

"You have warred with the same enemy for too long, fought him too often," she said, tone flat. "The Dead King is learning your back of tricks, your art of war. You are teaching your strengths and weaknesses to the Enemy, Catherine, and it is learning. That you tire, that you grow impatient, that sometimes kindness is what moves your hand instead of practicality."

The thing was, Merciless Gods, that she might just be right. I wanted to dismiss her, to ask who if not me, to tell her that insisting on seeing Creation always through the eyes of the Wasteland would lead her to mistake after mistake. Except she'd not been the one to slip-up, had she? And she might not have been the only one to notice I was getting tired, either. Was that why Razin and Aquiline had started pushing me again, testing boundaries I'd thought settled? The Dominion's nobles, as a rule, were not the kind of people who'd let a weakening warlord keep the reins. My own people hadn't said anything, but would they? To Callowans, I was still the Black Queen. If it looked like I was slipping, how many of them would simply assume a fresh game was afoot?

"You need to step back," Akua said. "Sharpen your edge once more and return to the field only on your own terms. Else you will bury yourself in a grave you insisted on digging every shovelful of yourself."

I gestured sharply at her, before limping back to my staff, and she did not say more. Adjutant, I thought, would have gently kept prodding until I either agreed or dismissed. Unlike him, Akua Sahelian was well-acquainted with the sin of pride: the shade said nothing that would further bruise mine. She would not bring this up again, I knew, for which I was almost grateful. I'd turn to Hakram for advice over this, trusting in the clarity of his gaze where mine grew muddled, but I would be able to move towards the decision on my own terms. For the grace of Akua's approach I was almost grateful, yes, but also bitterly angry. Because if I could have had this, the best of her, without the rest?

"Sometimes," I said, tone low and fierce, "I wish you..."

She'd been a master at keeping her thoughts away from her face even before she'd gained the ability to shape it at will, but the sudden stillness of it gave her away. Surprise.

"It doesn't matter," I said, shaking my head.

A hundred thousand souls, for which there would be a price long in the taking. That much was an absolute truth, a bedrock. A look passed through the golden eyes, one that straddled the line between loathing and yearning. I had, once more, offered artless cruelty. Akua Sahelian was too good a liar not to have caught it'd been genuine feeling that moved me to speak.

"I'll find my horse," I said, cutting through the stillness. "And take care of the corpses here. I'll leave Marserac to you."

Golden eyes met mine and only then did she incline her head.

"As you say," Akua Sahelian murmured.

We took the Twilight Ways back to camp, laden with corpses kept in the Night.

That sort of capacity was one of advantages the bounty of my patronesses boasted compared to the Light, which tended to be its superior in direct applications and confrontations. Dimensional pockets were usually the province of talented mages, who required significant power and resources to establish them, or of Named — Black, for example, had been able to carry quite the arsenal in his shadow when he'd still been the Black Knight. It was a rarer ability in heroes than villains, though not unheard of. The Myrmidon had one, as I recalled. Having a domain could allow Named to cheat, too, if they were clever enough and its nature allowed. It was still a rather rare skill, in the larger scheme of things, and one priests were patently incapable of learning. In contrast, knowledge of how to create such a space in the Night was considered a useful but hardly uncommon Secret among the Mighty. It required a certain amount of power not held beneath the lesser ranks of the Mighty, but aside from that little was needed to have one save knowledge of the trick.

The warm breeze of the realm I'd seen the birth of turned into outright wind, when flying on Zombie's back, but I hardly minded. The noise of it against my ears was drowning out all thoughts save for the most disjointed, too much of a distraction for a brooding mood to truly seize me. Akua, once more on swan's wings, was keeping pace with me further down. We'd used the same crack to slip through into Twilight, so like me she'd not need the use of a gate to return to Creation — or, indeed, to be guided towards an exit beyond what the starlit compass provided. It was the subtler means of using this realm, though in some ways also the most difficult of the two; for there were two ways to use the Twilight Ways for travel, at least that we'd grasped so far.

The first was rather similar in nature to using Arcadia, the making of a gate using power. The crux of the difference was in the ease of use: to enter Arcadia there'd been need of either a powerful ritual by mages taught in that branch of sorcery, or that a sufficiently powerful fae intervened. Oh, there were natural places of alignment between Arcadia and Creation where anyone could cross through freely – there was one near Refuge, and allegedly one in the deeps of the Brocelian Forest – but those were rare and the fae often made sport of those who ventured though. In contrast, the Twilight Ways had always been meant to be used for travel: they welcomed such use, encouraged it and enabled it. Mages found it easy to open a temporary small gate without even a ritual if the fabric of Creation was thin enough where they tried, and even elsewhere the amount of power needed to form such a gate was significantly smaller than if one had tried the same with Arcadia. More importantly, it required less skill. It'd been described to me as the Ways reaching out and meeting the spellcaster halfway, helping them... anchor, for lack of a better term.

And it was not only mages who could succeed at this. It was possible with Night as well, though the Mighty had admitted to me that drow seemed to need a certain knack to be able to do so no matter how powerful they were. Said knack seemed, to my amusement, to run particularly strong among the Losara Sigil as well as another band of familiar souls: the Longstride Cabal in the far north, who'd once tried to hunt me in Great Strycht. Light could open a gate as well, though once more there seemed to be some ineffable requirement we poorly understood: the Lanterns could create such gates almost to a man, while Procerans struggled greatly and my own House Insurgent had proved incapable of consistent results. No matter the provenance or power, though, all had the benefit of what some Arlesite poet had named the 'starlit compass'. Anyone entering the Twilight Ways with a clear destination in mind would feel the call of that destination ahead of them, and known where to weave a gate out. Not so accurately as I had when I'd been Sovereign of Moonless Night, but usually within a mile of where they intended to arrive.

This was also the method by which permanent gates could be established, though we'd found that to be chancy business. A physical, permanent gate tended to disrupt every other kind of gating in the region around it and they were finicky beasts besides. Hierophant had nearly lost an arm trying to make a second one, afterwards telling me that the Ways had somehow been displeased by him being the architect of more than one. The Witch of the Woods, on the other hand, had forged one on the outskirts of Salia in an afternoon's work and without any difficulty whatsoever. We still knew so little about the Ways, in the end, and perhaps come better days we'd be able to spend the scholars to plumb the depths of the secrets but as it was the Belfry had too much on its plate to be able to spend many hours on it. Besides, I was disinclined to complain too much of the eccentricities of Twilight when one of them was the realm's active antipathy for the Dead King and all his works.

The second manner of using the Ways was the one Akua and I had used tonight, which Archer – who'd effectively pioneered it, and still remained a finer practitioner of than anyone save perhaps the Grey Pilgrim himself – had named sidling. Those of us with senses that were not entirely physical could often sense where the fabric of Creation thinned, but with practice it could be learned to feel out where there were... cracks between Creation and the Twilight Ways. Cracks one could slip through when they were found, though they were ephemeral things and particularly capricious where gates of any sort had been recently used. It could take some time to find the cracks, and often required some luck as well as fine senses, which was why near everyone using the method was either Named or nonhuman. Given the difficulties involved one might be tempted to dismiss sidling as an inferior form of travel, save for two facts: sidled paths through the Ways were measurably faster and more precise than those come of gates, and there were also completely traceless.

A Twilight gate, even only a temporary one, could found by scrying, rituals or even just having a sufficiently sensitive entity close when it happened – whenever we used them to deploy troops against the Dead King, the surprise was strategic and almost never tactical. Our presence was known ahead of being seen, always. Archer, on the other hand, had once sidled out of the Ways with her entire band with only a crumbling wall between her and the Prince of Bones and the Revenant hadn't had a clue before she shot it in the back of the head. Not that it'd killed the thing, but it'd been a gallant effort. Beneath me, the black swan Akua had shapeshifted into began a graceful arc downwards and I led Zombie into the same. The wind's howl picked up, until my mount landed at a gallop and obeyed the touch of my hand by folding in her wings. I pressed down against her mane even as Akua's graceful form passed between what seemed to be two raised stones and disappeared.

Zombie navigated the slope leading down to the raised stones and slipped between them: a heartbeat later, after a sensation like a hand passing through my hair, we were on Creation again.

As a testament to the accuracy of sidling, we'd emerged a mere twenty feet away from the camp's main gate. Akua's elegant landing had seen her rise into human shape again, and she caught up to me after I reined in my horse's heady gallop to a halt. By the time the shade was once more at my side, a frown had made its way onto my face: I was looking at the camp, and not liking what I was seeing. The outer defences were untroubled, remaining both well-manned and vigilant. The army camp's layout was a recent advance, a merging of the Belfry's advances in temporary warding and the demands of military efficient: four interlocked squares, all sharing the same initial lines of defence. First a ditch dug into the ground, followed by a thin stripe of solid ground leading to a second ditch, itself leading directly into a traditional Legion palisade, bolstered by watchtowers. The stripe of solid ground between ditches had stone markers wedged in at regular intervals, carved with a runic ward that would produce a loud bell-like ringing sound as well as begin glowing should there be movement within the span of the ward.

The teeth of the defence were at the bottom of the second ditch: spikes might not do much against undead, but the gout of flame from enchanted metal rods and the Light-infused stones could turn the bottom of the palisade into a brutal killing yard.

The warding stones had not been activated, and atop the palisade the watchful gazes of a mixture of Callowan and Proceran soldiers were not something I found any fault in. It was the pulsing lights at the heart of the camp, where the four squares interlocked, that had me frowning. Each of the squares held its own separate set of three large-scale protection wards – against scrying, vermin and illusions – but they were also connected to the central array near my own tent. That array was mostly there to serve as a stabilizer, but it could also be used to forcefully purge power that accumulated in any of the wards because of imprecisions in how they were laid. Essentially it was a pressure valve we could activate before the wards started breaking down from the impurities, though the act of release itself sent out a pulse of power that tended to screw with all the lesser enchantments and wards within the camps so we very much avoided using it if we could. Yet it'd been activated tonight, that much was clear from the way there were still glimmering lights above the centre of the camp.

Likely more than once, too, for the leftover sorcery to be this visible.

"Akua?" I prompted.

"It was activated when there were no accumulated impurities to purge," the shade said, sounding displeased.

She would be, having personally set down the central array this ought to have turned into a proper mess.

"And what would that actually do?" I asked.

"Still send out a pulse of sorcery," Akua said. "Yet it would be weaker, and the sorcery would be drawn from wards that are functioning as intended. Likely it would damage them, perhaps even crack the wardstones."

I vehemently cursed in Kharsum. The materials for those were damned expensive, as you couldn't just carve runes and lay enchantments on any slab of sandstone grabbed from the side of the road if you wanted to make proper wards: you had to get materials from places where power of one sort or another had flowed for a long time. Even worse, it was the labour of weeks if not months to both anchor the ward in the stone and then align that ward with the rest of the wardstones so they'd bolster each other instead of conflict.

"Unless my general staff and Princess Beatrice suddenly went mad, they'll have an explanation for it," I said, in a tone that implied they damn well better have an explanation for it.

Ahead of us the watch had seen us lingering in front of the gate, and by the sounds of it recognized our admittedly distinctive appearances. Hails were sent out and I answered with my raised staff, which was enough to get the gates open. A group of five Lanterns, twice as many Proceran fantassins and what looked like one of the Third Army's mages bid us to approach, the mage holding a presage box in her hands.

"There is someone else with the authority to order such purging," Akua pensively said.

She was right, I considered as we entered the camp and the gates thunderously closed behind us. There was one more.

Which meant, like as not, that the White Knight was back early.

Insanenoodlyguy, what about typos?

Though she made no sound at all, I felt Akua's presence in the Night as she hurried at my side.
Change "at" to "to".

The hem of her dress sweeping the wet grass and stoe as she slowed her pace, the shade came to stand at my side.
Change stoe to stone.

There are at least 8 more typos. Can you find them all?

Thanks. Been waiting for it 😊

oh boy im worried about those corpses being in the night that definitely seems like the sort of game neshamah would pull, tricks inside tricks – something that catherine would almost certainly keep for study, poisoned or tainted to affect the night and the sisters from within

Vagabond

I didn't consider this possibility.
But it is a sound idea, since usurpation is called the essence of sorcery. And the hidden horror is probably the most capable sorcerer of the continent. And Night is one of its primary adversaries. And, in what might be foreshadowing, the usurpation being the essence of sorcery saying was repeated in this chapter. He will/does/has probably try/tried this with the Light as well (sucessfully I'd wager)...

Schemes within schemes. If your theory is correct, cat was played on so many levels here if she was a reliable narrator in this chapter. I'm honestly so excited for this book! 😊

Darkening

I mean, we saw something similar to that already with what happened when Cat raised a drow as a winter zombie and it gave Sve Noc an in to her power. But I suspect the goddesses are keeping an eye out for that sort of thing since it's a trick they themselves have used.

HannaB

This, IMHO.

Javvies

Plus, I'm pretty sure that the difference between using power to store something and using power to more intimately interact with something is a difference significant to matter for this context.

I'm more concerned about the magical examination and investigation of the seeds and their carriers than the storage of them.

Razorfloss razor

Fatigue gets the best of us. Cat is not going to like her mandatory break at all however it's very much needed.

caoimhinh

Well, she's apparently already planned a vacation South to visit the Arsenal and check on the Named there, so that might be a break.

Although this war apparently has more leisure than what Catherine says, because despite Cat listing a lot of events during the past couple of chapters, she's still here strolling the countryside instead of fighting at the frontlines where the power of Night is most needed.

HannaB

Catherine's main duties and capabilities are not in fighting. She can define the course of a skirmish, if she's lucky change the course of a battle, but to decide the campaign she needs to stay on top of administrative duties and strategic decision making, not frontline fighting. The marginal benefit is higher.

Mitrhe

Damn. Way to be brutal Cat. Akua is hunting for salvation she knows she will never receive, you should have held your tongue, but that's not you, is it?

Take that leave, sharpen yourself back up, and take that bag of bones down.

Oshi

This is going to be a slow and excruciating buildup. I was relaly hoping for a quicker one but damn...a month or two before it gets to good stuff.

caoimhinh

And we already skipped a lot of the good stuff too, as Catherine pointed out in the last couple of chapters: the battle for the attempted -and failed- retaking of Hainaut's capital, the death of the Fortunate Fool to take down the Lord of Ghouls, the construction of Arsenal to establish the Belfry and the Workshop, the battles against the Prince of Bones, the apparent collapse of Refuge, what has happened in Praes with Amadeus, and many other events.

The 2-years timeskip landed us in a brief respite of the desperate war for survival that the previous Books had been building up, apparently. I would have preferred that all those events had been shown in the chapters, even if it would have taken 30 chapters to do so. A series of short timeskips across dozens of chapters works better and flows more naturally than one big timeskip that flies over so many big events, even if bigger ones are promised for the future. Sure, it gives EE the chance to pull out things we have never seen before and state "this was prepared during the timeskip" as it's been done with all the artifacts and tricks the Workshop and Belfry developed and are going to be used now, but it still feels weird.

The tension, anticipation, and hype that was accumulated in the previous book went up smoke and turned to confusion the moment Cat said "we have been in war for 2 years" while calmly strolling the small villages away from the frontlines and thinking to go further away to visit the Arsenal, and stating that they even could send away Mages, Named and Priests away for months without apparent issue.

I mean, sure, the future chapters are probably (and hopefully) going to be filled with battles and emotions that will show us why the war against the Dead King is so dangerous and terrible. But these 5 chapters so far feel kind of lackluster since EE skipped the initial horrors of the war and landed us in the calm before the big storm that's supposed to be the end of this war, with the repercussions of all those events we skipped being about to blow up in our faces.

Tom

I see your point about how the flow from the previous book feels broken, but I'm glad EE didn't spend another book on those two years, because the plot would simply be: team living gets stuck in a stalemate with team dead for two years. I'm sure he could make it entertaining, but I would still find it frustrating to read chapter after chapter of our protagonists not making meaningful headway or suffering meaningful setbacks. If he'd written, "We'd driven the Dead King's armies back to the outskirts of Keter and were readying ourselves for the final push," I'd be right there with you, because it would plainly be skipping some important parts of the story. But I think this is all right because it lets him do a big chunk of worldbuilding without putting the story on the back burner to do so.

HannaB

This.

spamdesu

Also the thing I see coming are once again Interludes with insights into past happenings, specifically the two years had he done a series of shorter timeskips we'd have more howls about the timeline and just as many people asking for a single timeskip to neatly deal with all this.

That aside, it's not feasible i don't think. The mess with the Army of Callow alone would most likely be enough to fill up a good 20 of those 30 chapters you used as an example, furthermore this is a mess we'd have to learn about over interludes: Cat couldn't go herself, she had to be in Salia and we would be reading another good 20 chapters of diplomacy and people dragging their feet while Cat and Cordelia get increasingly fed up, Hanno has all the facial expression of a Carrot and Tariq has more platitudes than long term plans (am still not over this complete dumbass thinking they could keep a damn MageTech central hidden from the HIDDEN HORROR. Gods.) ; Then we'd be having some interludes in the League as well, so we can see what General Basilia is up to and the war mustering.

All the while, the usual malcontents will be crying about "too many interludes" this and "go back to Cat" that while we're going through some important story details.

No, I think this single giant timeskip is much more elegant a solution. Now, as we did in the later bits of the last Book after the Everdark we can instead slowly get acquainted with the changes that are actually relevant when they come up and Cat mentions then to us. And if necessary, have a couple Interludes set in the past as we have done before.

There is no way to please everyone but this, I think, is the path of least resistance.

We also have a good precedent for it in the Book 4, as said before. Give it a chance, maybe you'll change your mind.

(Wow, finally finished my re-read and caught up! The new update schedule makes me sad, used to be I had the full week with new chapters from different things. Not so anymore. Ah well, whatever is best for you EE!)

violentink

I think you go where the story is. We've been battling the King of the Dead for multiple books – I don't think we need to see marginal gains created in the initial two years of slogging war. Also, the desperate war for survival was because not everyone was fighting the dead. Last book ended with everyone (more or less) pointed the right way, heroes and villains aligned. I think this was the perfect place to start the finale and I for one am loving this new arc.

Earl of Purple

Adding to the points made by the others, I think the story is about Cat. And after two years as a claimant, smaller or less time skips would leave people wondering when she's getting her Name.

I think that this means she's not getting a front line Name, but a rulership or mentor Name. The fighter and strategist role she's filling isn't the one her Name wants her to, so she hasn't advanced the story of claiming the Name.

Konstantin von Karstein

So the TW are hostile to the DK's forces 🙄 It's probably because Tariq gave the one crown shaping it. It explains why Neshamah is not sending entire armies in the grand alliance rear, or besieging Salia.

caoimhinh

So convenient XD.

Maybe it's because the Twilight Roads were created with the purpose of moving armies against the Dead King. But yeah, since Neshamah is a far better mage than all of them, a convenient restriction like that was necessary to avoid the Army of Keter marching out through the TW and fucking them all over now that apparently the big physical gates aren't so necessary as initially believed and nearly anyone with a bit of magic or luck can access that realm.

Crash

Probably the purpose thing.

Reckon you could think of the Ways as large scale Artifact and as these things are created for a purpose/to fulfill a specific need it wouldn't make sense to have it straight up get taken over by the thing it was literally made to deal with, in this case, Nessie-boy.

That said, the Ways are a secondary dimension between Arcadia and Creation and we all know how much Stories mean to the Fae, maybe some of that trickled down and coupled with Tariq's will shaped them into something that dislikes the Dead King; It may be that this affects him alone but I suspect that, in the future, should the Grand Alliance (or more likely the signatories of the Geneva Conven—, I mean, the Liesse Accords) find themselves all waging war upon someone that someone may find the Ways are closed to them as well.

Larat, the Fae, made a crown and was the first member of a new court, giving it a tendency to stories. Tariq Fleetfoot is a sneaky wanderer and so the Twilight Ways catter to those who wander and makes it possible for them to find their way. The Grey Pilgrim, hero in service of Above, gave his crown and life to give the united peoples of Calernia a fighting chance against a great Horror.

And so, the Twilight Ways become the tool of war in the tale of the War on Death, leave cracks for those who know where to look and shows the way to those who wander.

Or, it would be deeply inconvenient if Malicia suddenly could pop her assassins right in the middle of any army she likes and Neshamah just teleported his Dragons straight into the heart of your camp. Very effective and practical, mind you. Also terrible for the plot, aye?

NZPIEFACE

I feel it distressing how you can just feel how tired Cat is in this chapter.
poor cat.

dadycoool

I was holding out hope that everything after Cat woke up was a (possibly prophetic) dream or something, but Akua's explanation makes much more sense. I suppose this will herald the rise of General Abigail, the Uncannily Lucky.

Liliet

Whew.

)=

Burlyraven

Well my longshot theory on a revival for Tancred is looking about as dead as he is, but maybe Cat will give him a funeral pyre. There's still room for that unformed aspect to be a rebirth by fire.

The updates on the Twilight Ways are interesting, though. Definitely some room for Names specifically aligned to them to arise.

Javvies

Hanno isn't an idiot these days (or, at least, not as much of one), so he probably has what he thinks is a good reason for doing what he did.

Ah, yes, Cat has fallen into the trap of being the indispensable woman, and has trouble delegating to others.

ninegardens

Huh... so if I remember correctly, the Lanterns are associated with Levant- and hence directly to the pilgrim. The Drow associated to Cat, and Sve Noc.

Archer was there at the founding also, and is high skilled, and I'd put bets that Roland is one of the best mage practitioners of the ways.

By contrast, DK had just suffered a major defeat(?) at the founding of the ways, and Heiropant also is not well liked..

The main logic of the ways seems to be how aligned people are with that particular band of five.

I'd be curious how Tyrants Horse brigade (the katarphy? The... those horse riding people) interact with the twilight ways, seems like they should have either some distinct advantage or disadvantage, depending how you interpret Tyrants role in events.

Not sure where the Witch of the wilds fits into that.

Konstantin von Karstein

Nice theory. And it's kataphraktoi 😊

KageLupus

I don't think that the Ways are tied to the original band of Five. Rather, it sounds like anyone of sufficient power and skill (minus Neshamah) can open a permanent gate, but only once. Masego was part of the first gate created and arguably was the main hand behind it. Cat supplied the power but Masego and his Wrest do most of the fine manipulation.

I would guess that if Cat tried to create a second permanent gate she would run into the same problem that Masego did. The Twilight Ways are a refuge for travelers, not a glorified subway for anyone with power. Limiting gates to a single one per person means that each one has to be personal and meaningful. It keeps the Twilight Ways from being filled with "tunnels" from location to location, and instead be more useful for individual travelers going to a general destination.

Plus, from a narrative perspective, being able to make a permanent gate anywhere and any time would be too broken and mess up the flow of the story. That provides a strong meta reason to disallow Masego making a gate whenever he feels like it, and an equally strong in-story reason since the Guideverse cares about meta narratives.

WealthyAardvark

It might be related to the sacrifice to sustain the realm. Cat thought it would just be an offering of blood, and maybe it is for a temporary gate. But perhaps a permanent gate takes something more essential, a piece of the soul or life essence or whatever? It might be that he was wounded in some way by the first sacrifice such that the second almost killed him. If so, maybe someone could recover enough to make a second permanent gate safely, maybe not.

HannaB

It feels like a democracy thing to me, in long-term perspective. The gates are going to be where many people, summed over the centuries, wanted them to be, whether they agreed on things or not. Averaged out.

If every practitioner gets only one chance to make a new gate of their own, that'll kind of encourage them to think hard about it / save it for the most necessary moment, which is precisely the kind of drama guideverse feeds on, let alone a semi-fae realm.

laguz24

I think that it is like rolling dice for helkians just like the tyrant's role. Also, I thought that it was a two-month time skip since they have been at war for two years, just not against the dead king.

NerfGlaistigUaine

Do Revenants Names change after they die? Thief of Stars, White Knight and Sage of the West would suggest not, but Lord of Ghouls and Prince of Bones sound very Revenant-y. Unless they were necromancers before being turned into Revenants. Would that count as irony? I can just imagine Neshamah bitch-slapping the poser calling himself the "Lord of Ghouls" while the Dead fucking King is in town. Also we need an extra chapter detailing the fight against the Lord of Ghouls he seems like a total badass and it's always epic when a joke character like Fortunate Fool goes CMHB + Heroic Sacrifice. For that matter, would love more backstory extra chapters, I'm actually interested in Saint of Swords beginnings like for Pilgrim. Drake Knight fight or Barrow Lord was probably amazing. And since it's been a year can't wait to see how Ranger and Black Knight have been doing. Please don't have them win/lsoe offscreen, I love seeing Black in action.

Also, which races can interbreed in Calernia? We know humans and elves and humans and fae can, but what about other pairings? If goblins and orcs have children would that create the most terrifying stabby psychos in history? WOULD they be Cat-sized?

Super tangent but this is the type of shit I wonder when I'm drunk.

Darkening

It's entirely possible that people simply don't know who those revenants are and that's just what they've been dubbed by people fighting them. I can't imagine DK is eager to reveal who they are, since that would give people an idea of their aspects, and I bet he's got some ancient revenants no one alive has ever heard of.

As for interbreeding, Fey are more concepts than flesh, so I would be entirely unsurprised if they were capable of breeding with anything or anyone. There was talk of Taghreb mixing with Djinn and other magical creatures in an effort to make better mages. As for orcs and goblins, hard to say if they can breed with any other species since most humans hate/fear/despise them and goblins are insular enough I suspect it doesn't come up much. I suppose the juniper/aisha teasing is a sign it's not impossible, but I'd think if half orcs were a thing we'd have heard of it at some point. I... don't recall hearing about demon/devilspawn, but I could be wrong and there's some Wasteland family that regularly infuses their family with infernal blood. I suppose since Talbot made a comment at one point about how they could use magic to let Cat sire a child, that if you throw enough sorcery at the problem life finds a way.

Lordy

What does Community Mental Health Board have with anything?

Sun Dog

Crowning Moment of Heroic Badassery, would be my assumption. tvtropes talk.

NerfGlaistigUaine

Actually meant Crouching Moron, Hidden Badass. Indeed a trope but also the acronym Red from Overly Sarcastic used in her video.

Sun Dog

I agree with Darkening. Cat turned down the Name of Black Queen, but is widely known by it anyways. I suspect Lord of Ghouls and Prince of Bones are what people call prominent Revenants, with no respect to their actual Names in life.

Especially if Pappenheim was right that the Prince is a distant ancestor and Proceran hero famed for his last stand against Keter.

Tyck

..Oh, dear. I wonder if the Tower is sufficiently warded to prevent Sidling. Ranger must be amazing at it. I can see Malicia establishing a gauntlet for Black to have to go through and then he and Ranger just slip out of Twilight right next to her with a 'nice Demon army. We have to talk.'

Black Spiral Dancer

Slow build-up, but necessary.

Why do I hear someone screaming in the background

Chapter 6: Equivalent

"Fairness is the refrain of the lazy, the inept, the heroic. Anyone unwilling to stack the deck and murder the judge to seize victory has no place wielding any real power."
– Dread Emperor Callous

I'd seen enough presage boxes by now I could tell who it was from the Workshop that'd made them. The Blind Maker's carved enchantments were in beautifully fluid cursive, like the High Tyrian they derived from, and they felt warm to the touch. The Bitter Blacksmith – the heroine, not her villain brother at the Morgentor – chiselled in hers with swift, impersonal precision while avoiding flourishes. She had little taste for such work and always sought to finish it as quickly as was possible without compromising quality. The Hunted Magician, whose work was being held up in front of me right now, took to the craft with the same amount of cryptic paranoia that was his signature in everything else. Though the symbols he used were some sort of ancient Mavii runes and like much of that ancient people's work they were as much art as function, within them the villain carved entirely unnecessary and unrelated symbols. Masego had told me that carving those signs in any order but what it must have originally been done in would make the box fail to function, sounding about as impressed by this as he'd been miffed.

The runes on the side, which I fancied to look like a wheel woven from winds when taken in all at once, remained inert even when brought close to me. The mage from the Third Army – a lieutenant, by the stripes – tested Akua as well before drawing back with a sharp nod at the rest of the force surrounding us. She saluted me, pointedly not looking at Akua more than she needed to. Blonde, that woman, I noted. Liessen did tend to be fair-haired.

"Your Majesty," she greeted me in Chantant. "Lieutenant Eve Baldry, tenth company. I'm currently under loan to Captain Raphael Twice-Drowned of the Ardeni Guard."

Fantassins, then, not proper Volignac foot. The ten soldiers who'd come along with the Lanterns and the lieutenant had undeniably had that look about them, it must be said. It wasn't a question of equipment, not anymore, as Cordelia had with my enthusiastic blessing begun offering to pay the mercenary companies with good steel the moment trade with the Kingdom Under opened again. Nowadays fantassins were not significantly better or worse off in equipment than Proceran regulars, though the personal armies of the princes and princesses still boasted superior arms as well as training. But where regulars and sworn men wore the colours of some royalty or another, fantassins wore marks just as garish as the names of their leaders and companies. As a rule, the more outlandish the names and colours the longer they'd been in the mercenary trade, which meant the eye-watering shades of orange and green on their feathered helms were a good sign.

Any soldiers wearing colours that bright in a war against Black's legions would get a goblin arrow in the throat before the campaign's first night was over, but the Principate had fought a different sort of wars in the days before the Dead King. The Ardeni Guard was not familiar to me as I knew only the most distinguished of the companies in Hainaut, like the Grands Routiers and Hermosa Foxes. I'd taken Klaus Papenheim's solid advice and left Princess Beatrice Volignac to handle the fantassins along with southern Procer process as a whole, which meant I was not forced to entertain half a hundred swaggering captains for meals regularly but also that I was only passingly knowledgeable about that particular slice of our forces. I cast a curious glance at the Lanterns – faces painted white and gold and built like they'd spent the better part of their lives in a shield wall instead of a temple – but got no introduction out of them, only respectful nods. The formal priesthood the Dominion answered to only the Gods Above, in principle, and not even the Holy Seljun could command something of them should they be disciplined. In practice they tended to be receptive to requests from the Blood, though not to the point of outright subservience. The only person I'd ever seen the warrior-priests take a knee for was the Grey Pilgrim.

To me they offered respect but no great deference, and to use them on the field I usually needed to pass the order down to them through Aquiline or Razin. Inconvenient, but given how brutally effective they'd proved against undead I'd keep my complaining down to a pittance.

"Well met, lieutenant," I replied in Lower Miezán. "I don't suppose you could tell me what the lights above are about?"

"Above my paygrade I'm afraid, ma'am," the blonde mage said. "I heard there was a scuffle, but my orders didn't come with a briefing attached. Captain Raphael might know, though, they're in charge of the gate for the first night rotation."

I frowned. I was more inclined to head directly to the heart of the camp and interrogate someone in charge than stop by for a chat with a fantassin captain, but the casualness of the mage's reply was surprising me. She did not seem concerned in the slightest.

"Muster wasn't sounded?" I asked.

"It wasn't," Lieutenant Baldry confirmed.

Akua hummed out in amusement.

"The White Knight has returned, hasn't he?" she asked.

The Callowán lieutenant turned a cold glare to the shade, long enough to acknowledge a question had been asked before turning to me to answer it.

"Lord White returned about half a bell ago, ma'am," Lieutenant Baldry agreed. "He's got another two Named with him, though I can't say I recognized either."

I could have said I was warned of another's coming by the sound of footsteps, but that would almost have been untrue. The sound of boots on earth was a small thing compared to the almost aggressive loudness of what the approaching soldier was wearing: there was a good coat of mail somewhere under there, and a cuirass, but it was almost hard to see under the green-and-orange striped vest that went down to their thigh, which were in turn covered by bouffant pants going down to the knees that added bright blue to the palette. None of the... frills, though, seemed to hinder movement: the pants were tucked into good steel greaves, and the vest was close enough to the body it shouldn't get caught in anything when a sword was being swung. The long dyed hair, half orange and half green with two small stripes of blue, was the finishing touch to the ensemble, framing an almost comically unremarkable face. The fantassins parted for them, which allowed me an easy guess.

"Captain Raphael?" I asked in Chantant.

Gods, let them be the captain. I was not sure my eyes could physically take the amount of garishness it would take for the captain to out-peacock this one.

"We meet once more, Black Queen," the Proceran boldly replied. "A strange turn of fate, that would see us fight side by side when we were once enemies."

I smiled blandly, wondering if I was meant to have any clue at all who this was beyond some mercenary captain. Still, it wouldn't do to let anyone know I was confused.

"Yes," I gallantly tried. "That is true."

At my side Akua's stance stiffened the slightest bit, which was the Sahelian equivalent of uproarious laughter at my expense. All right, so maybe it'd not been the finest of my illusions.

"Twice-Drowned?" I prodded, cocking my head to the side.

"When the grounds collapsed at the Battle of Trifelin, I fell into an underground well," Captain Raphael smiled. "Along with a few hundred pounds of stone. Yet it was still more pleasant an evening than being subjected to your tender mercies at the Battle of the Camps, Your Majesty."

Trifelin was, from what I recalled, a major defeat that Princess Rozala had been inflicted in the early months of her defence of Cleves the first time she'd been charged with the defence of the principality. It'd been a hard setback that could have turned into a proper disaster had heroes not held the rearguard of the retreat. Impressive they'd survived that mess when standing in the thick of it, much less the implication they'd been on the field at the Camps when I'd opened the gate into Arcadia and dropped a lake on the crusaders. Someone to keep an eye on, I decided. Survive enough scraps by the skin of your teeth, these days, and a Name might not be too far ahead.

"You may rest assured, captain, that when lakes next fall you'll be on the side welcoming it," I said, tone droll. "And as it happens, I've questions you might have the answer to."

"It would be my pleasure, Your Majesty," the captain replied with a sweeping bow.

I took a step forward, Akua falling in behind, only to find Captain Raphael had offered me their arm. How long has it been since someone tried that? I wondered, baffled and just a little charmed. I took the offered courtesy and we walked towards the closest watchtower, where a brazier was being used to roast meat in a way that would have seen a legionary of my armies harshly reprimanded for. Fantassins, though, had different standards of discipline.

"I have heard that the White Knight returned," I began.

"Indeed," the captain agreed. "Along with the Valiant Champion and a girl from parts unknown."

I forced my face to remain calm, my fingers to remain unclenched. The Valiant Champion, huh. Hanno was usually cleverer than this when bringing strays home – that I'd not skinned that so-called heroine alive and made a cloak out of the leather was already showing great restraint, as far as I was concerned. The Champion was an ally in the fight against Keter, and so would be extended all courtesies and privileges that the Truce and Terms required of me. Yet I'd rather eat my own hand than offer a thimble more to that woman, and that was not an enmity that would ever be buried.

"And it was Lord Hanno who ordered the use of the warding array?" I asked.

Raphael nodded and leaned in close, lowering their voice.

"I am told there was some manner of infiltration by the Dead King," the captain said. "It was quickly dealt with through use of the sorcery that lies at the heart of the camps, though that section still remains closed."

"Casualties?" I bluntly asked.

It wasn't that Neshamah wasn't capable of subtlety: he was, and often the costs of missing his quieter schemes were the stuff nightmares were made of. On the other hand, even if Hanno had ridden in with providence at his back to unmask the Hidden Horror's latest ploy this seemed too sloppy of an attempt to feasibly have lasted on the long term. Which meant this wasn't an infiltration attempt, it was strapping goblinfire to a sapper's back and sending him running at a gate. The Dead King was always willing to trade lives or resources for corpses, even at seemingly ruinous rates.

"I know not, Your Majesty," Captain Raphael said. "Though I was told the central camp was closed by the Deadhand's order, so your man ought to have the answers you seek."

He usually did, truth be told. I'd come to sincerely believe that the Empire's occupation of my homeland might have led to widespread chaos and rebellion within a few years, if Scribe hadn't been at my father's side. Like Black, who'd never settled in a Callowan city to rule the kingdom from, I'd been forced to discharge a great many responsibilities from a glum succession of army camps, small towns and fortresses – without Hakram keeping everything organized even as we moved, it would have all gone to shit with remarkable haste. Even now, he tended to know more about what was going on in the camp than I did.

"Then I will seek him in turn," I said. "I thank you for the conversation, Captain Raphael."

Taking the hint, they adroitly extricated their arm from mine and offered another gallant bow.

"Until fate deigns to reunite us, Black Queen," the mercenary smoothly replied.

While I wasn't always the, uh, sharpest when it came to picking up on this sort of thing I was pretty sure I was being flirted with. One hand, well, Alamans. They'd try to seduce the Choir of Contrition, if the angels showed enough leg. On the other hand, it was kind of flattering. It'd been a while since someone without a Name had tried their hand at that with me, even so superficially. It put the slightest of springs to my step as I left the fantassin captain behind. Akua did not say a word, though she did begin walking at my side instead of remaining a step behind as we headed deeper into camp.

"Hakram's on board with whatever the White Knight pulled, sounds like," I murmured.

Reassuring, that. I'd come to put a surprising degree of trust onto Hanno's shoulders, since the Peace of Salia, but it was not the kind of trust that went without questioning or disagreement. Adjutant, though, I trusted implicitly. I might as well begin questioning my own limbs, should I not. If he'd backed this there was a good reason it for it.

"The Sword of Judgement has proved a capable ally," Akua conceded. "And unlike some of his more rambunctious colleagues, he is not one to resort to collateral damage when there are other approaches to be had."

That'd been a pleasant surprise, since while heroes tended to be careful with the lives of others they tended to be a great deal less so with equipment. Even when that equipment was very, very valuable. It was a cold hard truth that there were artefacts and siege machinery in this camp that were worth more than soldiers, and though that was an ugly thing to face it came with being a professional soldier. I could send for reinforcements, if what was lost was lives, but there were only so many wardstones to distribute across all the fronts and they were not easily replaced.

"He's a solid one," I grunted in agreement.

I wouldn't have been able to pull off the Terms and Truce without him, that much couldn't be denied. There'd been heroes that simply would not have been willing to deal with a villain if he'd not leant me the weight of his seal of approval, and that would have led to deaths. Even just a few of those would have made it seem like I was trying to conscript Named into my service, which would have gone... badly. Tariq still had a lot of pull with heroes he'd helped or saved when they were younger, that much couldn't be denied, but as word of my raising him from the dead at the Graveyard had spread so had rumours that he was somehow under my influence. He was no longer the unquestioned grandfatherly fount of wisdom he'd once been to his side, though his record over the last two years had certainly begun redeeming the dip in his reputation.

The avenue leading to the heart of the camp was guarded by checkpoints at regular intervals and it was not long before we found our first one, along with a proper company of my soldiers. The captain commanding it knew about as much as Captain Raphael had, which wasn't much, but she sent a runner ahead of us along before providing us with a full line in escort. I did not need more defending inside my own camp, but twenty legionaries at your back did tend to expedite most conversations. We continued deeper in, the sparse conversation I'd shared with Akua petering out entirely. I spoke with my soldiers instead, learning with pleasure that the line's lieutenant was an old hand from the Fifteenth. He'd been from the second wave of Callowan recruits, after Three Hills and Marchford – when Black had essentially emptied the Legion training camps in the kingdom and tossed all those green men my way.

"Lost a finger at Dormer," Lieutenant Oliver told me almost eagerly. "From one of them Immortals critters, after the Hellhound sent us up the hill."

"They were hard bastards, even for fae," I said. "Summer's finest."

"Shit name though, no offence Your Majesty," the veteran snorted, and I grinned back. "After Lady Dartwick nicked those banners, they were pretty moral when the gobbos from ninth company unloaded. Finger got fixed up good anyway, one of them Soninke wizards from Afolabi's legion put it right back on."

"Not even a scar?" I teased. "All the best war stories have scars to go with them."

"Aye," Lieutenant Oliver mourned. "It tingles a little when there's magic in the air, I know it, but these fresh pups from after the Folly don't believe me. Say it's all in my head."

"Tell them you have me convinced, next time," I suggested.

"That ought to make a few of the little pricks piss their armour," Lieutenant Oliver gleefully said, then remembered who he was speaking to. "Um, Your Majesty."

I snorted, clapped the man's shoulder.

"I've spent more time on a saddle than a throne, soldier," I reminded him amusedly. "By all means, make the little pricks piss their armour."

That got a howl of laughter out of the lot of them, and it was in a better mood that I hit the second checkpoint. Where, looming tall above Osen's sworn swords, I found the key to getting answers about what had happened in the camp tonight. No amount of polish would ever remove the scorch marks Summer flame had left on Adjutant's plate, though as time passed he'd come to like the look. It was distinctive, as was his height even among his own kind. The black, fur-like hair nowadays going down to his jaw on the sides was another distinction, as it was far longer than either Legion or Army regulations would allow. Still, there was a reason he was not known as the Blacksteel: the most distinctive part of all was the fleshless hands, one of sheer bone and the other cast in pale spectral light. Hakram Deadhand had earned his sobriquet twice over, and Dead the Hand remained a favourite to sing among my soldiers.

A few lines had even been added after his scrap with the Baron of Thorns, as his brutal dismantling of the Revenant while reciting orc poetry had made something of an impression. Hakram strode through the Levantine armymen, either not noticing or caring how a few of them had to hastily move out of the way or been bowled over. His broad face looked relieved.

"Catherine," he greeted me, arm taking arm in a legionary's salute. "I'd wondered if you were ambushed. Beastmaster knew little, but it seemed likely."

"We were," I darkly replied.

Good mood gone the way of mist under morning sun, I fixed a calm look on my face before dismissing my legionary escort with a few kind words. By the considering look on Hakram's face, he'd picked up on the general vicinity of how badly my night had gone.

"So were we," Adjutant added in a low voice as we passed through the checkpoint.

He settled at my right side, so naturally I almost didn't notice, while Akua took my left. Not an unapt summation of the last two years, I thought.

"What happened?" I quietly asked. "Our defences shouldn't allow for infiltration, Hakram. We've put the stones in every gate, any enchantment he hits our people with should be disrupted."

"Ghouls slipped in," the tall orc told me. "A new kind, that can-"

"Shapeshift," Akua murmured.

Hakram shot her a considering look and she offered back a slight nod.

"Your escort," Adjutant told me, and it was not a question.

"We have the bodies in the Night," I said.

A halfwit would have put one and one together, given that much to go on, and Hakram was the very opposite.

"I'm sorry," he said. "Beastmaster said he was just a boy."

My finger clenched around my staff until the knuckles turned white.

"Sometimes we just lose," I softly replied, through teeth I did not remember clenching.

It fit, though. I felt like my entire body was clenching every time I thought of the kid I'd had to put down because of my own sloppiness.

"I'll be seeing what duties I can shake loose, to avoid repeating the mistakes that led do that loss," I forced out.

As if by coincidence, his flank leaned against mine. It was the most comfort either of us would allow him to give me in public but, trivial as it might seem, I was shamefully grateful for it.

"The presage boxes should have caught them," I said, and if my voice was a little choked all three of us pretended not to have heard it.

"We've found a weakness in our defences," Adjutant gravelled.
"The Order of Broken Bells."

Akua caught on before me, somewhat unsurprisingly. Generations of her forbears had cut their teeth on this very obstacle, after all.

"Their armour," the golden-eyed shade said. "The same hymn carvings that disrupt active sorcery prevented the ghouls from triggering the boxes."

Fuck, I thought. The weakness we could fix, the corpses we could not. I'd lost even more knights, by the sounds of it.

"Talbot?" I asked.

Losing him would be a setback. Not only was he the highest-ranking noble officer in my armies, the man had essentially put the Broken Bells together from scratch. In both politics and war, his death would be a loss keenly felt.

"Getting his eye fixed by the White Knight's fresh helper," Hakram replied. "The ghouls were caught out before they could finish what they'd been sent for."

My eyes narrowed, relief at the Grandmaster of the Broken Bells surviving being shoved at the back of my mind.

"Assassinations, but that's nothing new," I said. "Wouldn't have been worth revealing another breed of ghouls for. They went after the wardstones."

"They meant to contaminate the lesser array in the Third Army camp," the orc confirmed. "They were caught out by the White Knight, but the alarm being rung only made them strike out aggressively."

"Losses?" Akua asked.

"Light," Adjutant said. "Twenty dead, half again that wounded. They aimed for high-ranking officers but got caught before getting to them. The wardstones from the Third's camp were hit with some sort of sorcery that Senior Mage Dastardly called 'poisonous'. He had some difficulty elaborating on this, but was adamant it was a problem."

I felt Akua gaze's fall on me.

"Go," I said. "I'll want a damage assessment as soon as you can deliver."

She bowed, more for the eyes peeled on us than anything else, and without another word melted into the nearest shadows.

"So the array purge was used to flush out the 'poison'," I said, then flicked a glance at the lights in the distance.

It'd take more than one purge to have that much sorcerous aftermath left behind.

"Whatever shapeshifting trick it is the ghouls use, it is of a nature similar to enchantment," Hakram replied.

And the sorcery sent flowing out by a purge screwed with enchantments, which was why I disliked using those in the first place.

"It unmasked them," I mused. "Clever."

Sounded like Hanno, too. He preferred helping people help themselves rather than sweeping in on a white horse and fixing everything before disappearing into the sunset. Hopefully that hadn't cost us a few months of vulnerability to the Dead King's tricks, though. Gods, the vermin wards better be fucking holding at least. The atrocities Neshamah could commit with undead rats and bugs were not something I ever intended to suffer through again.

"I ordered the central camp closed as soon as we learned, but they were already inside," Hakram told me. "They eat and impersonate people at a distressing rate, Catherine. We think the Barrow Sword and the White Knight's followers cleared them out, but we're keeping the camp closed until everyone with access to the stones has been cleared with both Light and sorcery."

I grunted in approval.

"Full audit of the ranks come morning," I said. "I don't care if they grumble, there'll be no risks taken with something that dangerous. And for the Order-"

"Talbot already offered that every knight should dismount and submit to testing by Light whenever they enter camp," Hakram told me.

"We'll see if something less clumsy can be arranged," I replied.

I had clever enough people in my employ, and if nothing else I could have Razin and Aquiline cut their teeth on the logistics of it. After I shoved them back into the Pilgrim's tender embrace, they'd hold their commands without my looking over their shoulder. They needed to be prepared to deal with situations like this on their own. This deep in the camp and with Adjutant at my side, we went through the last checkpoints without anyone trying to stop us. Even though the situation had, in principle, already been handled I still wanted to at least speak with Hanno. Besides, since he'd brought in another Named I would prefer having a look at them before too long. Best not to have one of those wandering camp without being able to put a Name and face to them, even if a name wasn't always forthcoming. The last ring of defences was manned entirely by the Army of Callow, which did tend to end up with those duties by virtue of both being my personal army and the best organized of the troops. When the Iron Prince's own troops were around it was another story, but Prince Klaus was far from here, holding the northern defence line in our absence.

I got to hit three birds with one stone when the captain in command informed me that the White Knight was currently in the same tent where Grandmaster Brandon Talbot was being healed, supervising the work being done by the healer he'd brought in. It wasn't a long walk from there, and I knew my way around the camp well: a few moments later I was parting open the tent flap and passing it to Hakram before slipping into the tent. Within a heartbeat of that I saw a half-naked Brandon Talbot try to rise to his feet, to the vocal if inarticulate protest of the two heroes in the tent, but he only stopped when I sharply gestured for him to sit.

"Don't blind yourself on my account," I said. "My queenly honour will withstand your staying seated."

"Much obliged, Your Majesty," Grandmaster Talbot replied.

He was careful not to move his head this time, having been levied a heavy frown by the healer in front of him.

"The nerves were almost healed," said young girl mourned. "We'll have to start over, Sir Brandon. Please remain still, if it pleases you."

The tent flap closed behind Hakram, who had to bend his neck the slightest bit to avoid his head touching the ceiling of it.

"Catherine," the White Knight greeted me with a smile.

"Hanno," I replied, feeling my lips quirk the slightest bit.

It really was good to have him back. Even just sitting on a crate in a leather jerking, keeping an eye on his duckling, the dark-skinned man felt like an island of calm in a chaotic sea.

"I would greet you properly, Your Majesty, but I cannot stay my hand," the young girl apologized without turning.

And she was young, I saw. Scrawny and that dirty tunic she wore had seen better days, but for all that there was no denying the pulsing potency of the Light she was wielding to help my knight.

"You do me more courtesy by healing Brandon Talbot than a hundred curtsies would scrape together," I said. "White Knight?"

"Introductions can be seen to when her attention is not elsewhere demanded," Hanno said. "Though I wager you've other questions. I've news to give you, regardless."

"Do you now?" Hakram gravelled from behind me.

"Not so urgent as to need an intermediary, Adjutant," the White Knight told my second, unmoved.

The relationship between those two was best described as cordial dislike, though I'd never quite managed to put a finger on the source of it.

"What happened, Hanno?" I asked, cutting through the tension.

"After stumbling across one of the ghouls, I did what was necessary to flush out those in hiding before major damage could be done," he said. "Yet this was part of a greater scheme, Catherine. I've been speaking with Prince Klaus, and before coming here I met with the Peregrine."

My brow rose.

"Tell me," I ordered.

"The Order of the Red Lion confirmed that the dead were massing for an offensive until an hour ago," he said. "And now I fully understand why they gathered, and now no longer do."

"I don't suppose you intend to share at some point?" I drily replied.

He shot me an amused look.

"I found Pascale here," he said, gesturing towards the young girl, "with the help of the Valiant Champion after following up on a rumour that Tariq had been seen in the region."

I'd already made plain my feelings on that woman to the hero, so I saw no need to belabor the point by expressing the again now. Talk of the Pilgrim, though, sparked my interest. The Peregrine had lent his hand to none of the fronts, instead staying true to the roots of his Name and journeying wherever the Choir of Mercy deemed him to be most needed. If he'd really come here, then either we'd narrowly avoided a disaster or we were about to have one on our hands.

"It was a Revenant behind all of this," Hanno told me. "We named her the Plague-Maker, though besides her Praesi origins and talent in sorcery we know little of her."

"You found plague seeds as well," I breathed out.

"It was a scheme in two parts, as far as we can tell," the White Knight said. "First, after slipping through our defensive lines—"

"Which she shouldn't have fucking been able to do, Revenant or not," I bluntly said. "That's the reason we send the Augur all our oracles, so that she can warn us about shit like this."

"There was demonic taint on her," he told me. "Absence, Tariq believes, which might be why she blindsided us. I do not know when the Dead King might have found such a Named—"

"I do," I replied. "And if it's from when I believe, she's not the last one he'll have in store."

Malicia herself had once told me that Dread Empress Maleficent II had used demons of absence to avert the disastrous consequences of the three Secret Wars, for after failed invasions of the Serenity a counter-invasion of Ater by hellgate had been imminent. I couldn't know how many people the general who'd later become Dread Empress had throw to the dogs to avert utter calamity, but considering how ruthless Maleficent the Second had ended up being as a ruler I doubted that it'd be a small number.

Hells, considering half the continent was fighting Keter these days and we were still slowly losing I couldn't even blame her.

"A discussion to be had later, then," the White Knight said.

"Regardless, the undead plagues were meant to draw a significant fighting force south. A large force of zombies was massed around the Plague-Maker, hidden in the wilds, which I believe was meant to attack this very camp."

"The new ghouls were meant to hit our wards and leadership right before," I said.

"Exactly," Hanno nodded. "And, as a precaution, even if we won that battle handily we would be kept occupied by massive breakouts of the seeded plague in Brabant."

"Which we'd have to move to suppress, even as his armies took a swing at the northern defence line," I muttered.

It'd been, I thought, a pretty good plan. And it ought to have scrapped this summer as a season for an offensive war even if it didn't go entirely his way, all at the price of at most a single Revenant.

"You caught the Plague-Maker first, I take it," I said.

"Tariq found her in a western crossroads town, seeding refugee caravans passing through," Hanno said. "Rafaella and I caught up with him just as the confrontation began."

My eyes flicked to the young girl who was, by the looks of it, checking on Talbot's eye one last time before declaring him healed.

"That is where we found Pascale," Hanno agreed. "She'd caught on to the Plague-Maker's work."

I felt my hackles raise, though I wasn't quite sure why.

"Hale as you might hope to be, Sir Brandon," the girl – Pascale, apparently – smiled. "I am finished, if it pleases you."

"You have my most sincere thanks, Lady Apostle," the Grandmaster replied, rising to his feet. "If there is anything I can do to repay you-"

"I have already been repaid," the girl said, "in the only way that matters."

He bowed to her anyway, for he was a decent man, and offered to give me a report even as he put on a shirt before I bluntly told him to sleep off his healing and find me on the morrow. My shoulders were still tense, and I was not quite sure why. Hakram hovered close behind me, having picked up on my discomfort but being as confused as to the source of it as I was.

"I take it the Grey Pilgrim did as the Grey Pilgrim does," I said, getting the conversation going again.

"He stepped in to protect me, when I tried to heal the plague," Pascale happily told me. "My Choosing had already happened, but it is not suited to strife and I was most distressed."

"He drove the Revenant off and we caught her as she tried to escape," Hanno elaborated. "She called on the undead she'd been gathering, but we held them off long enough for the pilgrim's star to shine."

Meaning Tariq had smote into the ground what must have been at least a few hundred zombies but most likely had been a few thousand. It was easy to forget how fucking terrifying Tariq Fleetfoot could be, when he had the right story had his back.

"Lucky us you'd learned enough of the Light by then to pick up on the plague," I warmly told the girl.

She blushed.

"I had not, Your Majesty," she admitted. "My father was a wizard, who taught me of the Three Tells and the Seven Essences. Yet even so, magic would have failed. Yet my prayers were answered by Above, in our hour of need."

"You are," I slowly said, "a mage."

"I was," the young girl told me with an elated smile. "When I became the Stalwart Apostle the sorcery vanished from my veins, and the Light finally answered my prayers."

A crack resounded in the room. It had, I dimly realized, come from my staff. My grip had been too tight around it.

"Did they listen to you?" I quietly asked. "When you warned them about the plague?"

I felt the White Knight's heavy gaze on me but did not meet in. I looked only at this slip of a girl, who was so smilingly alive where the boy was dead.

"They did not," Pascale sadly said. "But the Heavens did, when I knelt and asked for guidance. And through the Light, I found the way to dissolve the plague."

This was, I told myself, nothing I should not have expected. A Named – or close enough – in the service of Evil, had been sowing death and preparing to bring about a great woe. It was only natural for the Heavens to put together a Named meant to end those designs, as the girl clearly had been.

"Ninety-nine times out of a hundred," I said, voice cold, "nine hundred and ninety-nine times out of a thousand, that act of faith would have killed dozens of thousands."

The girl looked like I'd struck her.

"Catherine," the White Knight warned me.

My fingers clenched tighter still around the staff of yew, death made into a marching stick. He'd been a wretched boy, Tancred, but he'd not been wrong. To act instead of pray, to trust his the ugly work of his hands rather than the silent Heavens. How many thousands, hundreds of thousands, millions had stood in this girl's place over the centuries and seen their faith rewarded only by a grisly death? No, the Scorched Apostate had not been wrong. He'd not been Chosen either, he'd done his own choosing. And the Heavens had damned him for it, so damn the presumptuous fucks for that in turn. Hakram's hand warmed my shoulder and I closed my eyes for a long moment.

"It's been a long day," I finally said. "We'll speak tomorrow."

There was a reason I was more than halfway fond of Hanno of Arwad: he looked at me for a heartbeat the nodded.

"Tomorrow," the White Knight softly agreed, eyes considering.

I walked out of the tent and into the night, Hakram hastening to catch up.

Tancred had not been wrong, I thought, shoulders tight and teeth gritted.

But what did that matter, when he was dead?

Aston Whiteman

Thanks EE!

taovkool

Stalwart Apostle and Scorched Apostate, huh? Two new opposing Names. Should put that on the list.

ftaku

And another example of one upsmanship by heaven. Instead of making a tough choice, miraculously having the answer given to them. This is why Black disdains heros

Zgggt

Not even that. Above gave an easy answer, removed the need to make a hard choice, and made sure that others were there to hold the new hero's hand when things get bad... And made someone who wished real hard get rewarded with something other than a cold dose of reality and a humiliating death.

TeK

Which is a bad thing somehow.

Liliet

Yeah.

I would call the Apostate and the Apostle more complementary than anything.

Also, a new mechanic for Good vs Evil. It's no longer a war, it's now a competition. One-upmanship indeed.

rabidRay

The fact that a group of people is inferior by every definition of the word is not good. If you want to point an issue into why Calernia looks the way it does, it starts there.

Fayhem

If the Gods Above were the only gods this point might possibly be a somewhat valid point? But if one person gets answered by the Gods Above and gets a good deal, and another person gets the Gods Below and gets a shitty deal, it seems to me like the rational conclusion there is that Below has shitty gods.

I mean, Cat is furious here and just all kinds of lashing out, but what exactly is the counterscenario here? That Above should also have intervened for poor Tancred? Setting aside that the proposal there is that they should have answered someone who never actually tried asking (which is not an equivalent story), that seems like it's disregarding that Guide has a Manichaeian metaphysical setup – there are two sides, and they both have an equal claim and ability to act. Cat is lashing out at Above for “damning” Tancred, but it's not Above that makes someone a villain. That's Below's purview. I mean, do we even have actual evidence that Above necessarily wouldn't have stepped in to help Tancred if Below hadn't placed their claim first? Cat likes to place the blame for bad things happening on Above one way or another and a lot of the fanbase seems eager to take her lead, but "bad things happening" is the actual specific purview of the other side – Cat's eagerness to look away from that fact is an example of how she can be an unreliable narrator, not a good example of an unbiased objective assessment that everybody reading should just accept unquestioned.

RanVor

One thing that irks me in the reasoning of all you Above defenders is the assumption that Tancred didn't try to pray, which I find highly unlikely. His characterization suggested that he used to be fairly religious before the Marserac incident (supported by his Name – an apostate is a person who renounces faith), and if I understood correctly, he mentioned his mother being infected as well. I'm sure he did pray for the Light many times. Just not in the specific moment when the Above wanted him to do it.

Fayhem

> Just not in the specific moment when the Above wanted him to do it.
AKA, the specific plot-relevant moment where a Name could have happened? Do you think Names can just happen literally whenever?

RanVor

> AKA, the specific plot-relevant moment where a Name could have happened?

Yes, that's exactly what I was referring to. Now take a look at Tancred's Name and tell me, what can drive a person to apostasy if not severe disillusionment with religion?

Fayhem

Sorry, I'm not interested enough in your point to respond meaningfully.

RanVor

I see. Okay, carry on in your willful blindness, then.

RanVor

@Fayhem

I see. Okay, carry on in your wilful blindness, then.

Fayhem

Also, one thing that irks me is that you completely dodged replying to my main point to laser-focus on an aside that was more or less a throwaway.

RanVor

That's because your main point is of little interest to me, and I wasn't replying to you specifically, but your entire side of the argument.

SilverDargon

I respect the point you're trying to make but I think you're forgetting something important. Namely the duality between the two new named.

You say that the gods below offered a shittier deal than Above and that means its their "fault," that Tancred got screwed over, but Its important to remember that someone was going to get a shit deal anyways. Its been said multiple times in the story that Above and Below have equal power to influence the world, and whenever above tips its hand, below gets a foot in the door to empower someone for their team as well. So maybe Tancred could have been a hero if he'd decided to keep praying instead of going out and trying to fix it himself, but if that had happened than Pascale would have ended up a villain. Its useless to argue about which side is at fault because its not like they both could have ended up heroes, only one person can fill a role at a time.

The practical (hehehe) effects of their naming though is that the coalition gets TWO whole named with the power to spot the plagues the Dead King is throwing around. Because Above and Below both acted, therefore keeping the balance, in theory the army gets that much more effective against a threat that both Above and Below wanted gone.

My theory is that Once the Dead King sees that there are two new named running around with the power to specifically fuck him over he figured he had to decide which one to kill. Between the Hero and the Villian, which one gets plot armor? Catherine is running up against the same issue that has Amadeus so fucked in the head. Below gets offered shit deals and has to suffer and rely on their own power and cunning while above gets near guaranteed success by sitting pretty and thinking happy thoughts. He takes it out on the Heroes in an attempt to 'prove' that they don't deserve the wins they get, and Cat see's a system that takes broken people on both sides and arbitrarily fucks one of them over.

Its not fair to blame Pascale for what happened to Tancred and Catherine KNOWS that. Its why she excused herself after snapping at her basically unprovoked. I appreciate that she's trying to be better than the Black Knight was whenever she can, even when this is obviously an emotionally trying spot for her.

Thanks for coming to my TED talk.

NerfContessa

Mostly agree.

Still hate it, the boy had story potential up the wazoo....

luminiousblu

>The fact that a group of people is inferior by every definition of the word

Welcome to, like, real life? I can't think of a single setting where this isn't true. Even if we totally ignore the good vs. evil thing going on, mages vs. nonmages is clearly not even close to equal. One of them tries their best to subvert the rules, the other utterly ignores them. Then there's people who are just born stronger (Catherine, apparently; most girls can't beat the snot out of pit fighters twice as heavy no matter how quick they are on their feet due to simple physics), born smarter (Akua), born richer (Akua again), born hotter (Malicia). What're you to do?

onedollargum

While it's "good" that above wants to help people in this manner, the problem is that they don't do so reliably. Cat is saying that less than one percent of the people would have been answered favourably in this manner. The complacency that it breeds is staggeringly deadly, as the people around those rare chosen will be inspired to emulate their example.

It's like playing the lottery instead of going out searching for a job to make ends meet except, in this case, not paying the bills means untold thousands of people die.

If every single one of Cat's soldiers were to put down their swords and pray for deliverance instead then the war with Keter would end really quickly, and only the Dead King would be happy with the result.

TeK

There is a saying "Trust in God, but do your best". I guess it's cultural thing, but for me, self-reliance and faith were never mutually exclusive concepts, so I have a hard time understanding your point.

erebus42

I believe the point they're trying to make is that in this case that self reliance aspect is missing. The Apostle is one of that rare few who when she prayed for her problems to go away, she was given an easy solution. That's all well and good for her and the people she saved, but that is not a reliable occurrence. Blind faith that things will work out if you hope hard enough can often lead to complacency and cause people to forget that only way that all will be well is by making it so. The Apostate on the other hand was not given such a neat little solution and so had to do his best with what he had. And his reward for taking the harder road and saving thousands was being murdered and damned for his troubles.

TeK

That is true and honestly I tried to argue against that point only because I didn't want to admit that I was wrong.

Which I am.

Fayhem

> And his reward for taking the harder road and saving thousands was being murdered and damned for his troubles.

No, his reward was the power of a Name. If he was "damned" by being a villain, I'll note again that it isn't Above that makes villains – that's Below's purview. And Hero or Villain are mutually exclusive claims – does anyone actually have hard evidence that Above necessarily wouldn't have helped Tancred if Below hadn't staked a claim first? As Cat noted herself, “making hard choices for the greater good” is a Role we’ve seen attached to heroes before. And he was murdered by the Dead King, who was originally empowered by – you guessed it – Below. Not to mention that Tancred did in fact get someone there who could have protected him; she just didn’t succeed (for reasons that are understandable but don’t change anything about what happened), and is now furiously externalizing her guilt at any convenient target.

tl;dr – Cat is eager to point the finger at the other side rather than the one that is still nominally her own, which she’s good at since she’s a well-written charismatic character and which is a normal human response (especially when under great strain and suffering from genuine emotional distress) but that still isn’t something that the fanbase should just up and follow her in doing IMO.

Josh

I think it helps to remember that, in general, the only reason why it can be framed in this way is because Cat is the main character. Cat is the type of grey that really rings as true to us because she operates the same way that we, being real people, understand.

But remember that Cat is such a unique breed of villain that her existence has been enough to change the foundations of the entire world. The world before Cat didn’t really operate on that logic. And, to be fair, Cat hasn’t been Named since the end of Book 2, which means she’s been able to develop without the direct influence that everyone else has had to deal with.

Fact is, from everything that we can tell, that for every other villain before her the act of being able to make a hard choice was indistinguishable from the expectation of being able to make the choice. To put it another way, the type of person in this universe who was able to take matters into their own hands became, without exception, the type of person who demanded to be able to make those decisions and fuck everyone else.

And if you are going to force a morally ambiguous standard on everyone despite that, let’s be consistent here. People who ask for help and get ignored don’t usually develop into monsters that murder thousands of people just because it’s funny. No, the type of person who could do that is already capable of doing that before they ask for help, so is it really all that horrible that a god would see that person asking and tell them to fuck off? Tragic, yes. Hypocritical, not really.

Josh

Just as a follow up because my comment may be a little confusing: you're assuming that every villian could have been a Cat if only the heroes worked with them, instead of assuming that every villian except Cat is a Dread Empress Malevolent, regardless of what the heroes do. And my contention is that, statistically, you have way more reason to assume the latter than the former.

luminiousblu

The idea that taking the harder road deserves a reward is inherently idiotic. Roads are roads, and where they lead has nothing to do with how rocky they are. Tancred, best I can tell, got fucked over, not by Below, but by Catherine dodging story bullets. Tancred was in a spot of trouble when the Mysterious and Powerful mentor character shows up to rescue him, which means that, story-wise, he should be safe for a while. Catherine explicitly refuses to slot into the role due to her fear of possible future ramifications, which means that the plot armor offered to Tancred was basically denied. At that point, reality ensues, and the uber lich kills an emerging threat. Compare what happened with Hanno, Grey, and Pascale – it's almost the exact same scenario. What do you think went differently?

Thor

That's exactly why Cat is pissed. Scorched Appostate made the hard choice to stop the plague and Good just left him to fail. Instead they decided to empower the person who made the objectively wrong choice to do nothing.

beleester

We don't know what would have happened if Pascale hadn't received an answer to her prayers. Maybe she would have done the same thing Tancred did, maybe she would have tried something else to reveal the plague, any method she chose might or might not have succeeded. But in a setting where the Gods can and do help people when they ask, there's nothing inherently foolish about prayer.

Sure, it's not guaranteed, but Evil doesn't offer any guarantees either – Tancred didn't survive past his first appearance. Sometimes you just lose.

Fayhem

Thank you for your reasonable response! Pascale getting an easy answer in response to asking for one does mean she never had to make the awful choice that Tancred did – but are we seriously claiming now that it's a good thing that Tancred had to make that awful choice? It's true that if Pascale had prayed for an answer, not gotten one, and then sat on her hands and did nothing that disaster could have ensued. But we have no actual evidence that she would have responded to a lack of answer by doing nothing, do we? We just have evidence that Above was able to save one person who reached out to them directly but couldn't save everyone, which in a Manichaeian setting where Good and Evil have equal power and check each other accordingly is going to inevitably be the case and doesn't prove that Good wouldn't like to save everyone if they could.

Honestly, it legit bothers me how eager so many people are to unhesitatingly accept all of Cat's assessments even when she's explicitly emotionally distraught, run to the raw edge of ragged, and sufficiently compromised by both things that she can even acknowledge herself (which doesn't come easy for her) that she's making mistakes and she needs to take a break because she's lashing out at targets who don't deserve it.

ayon96

But remember that she tried to warn others of the plague before turning to Above which is different than praying to Above without doing anything.

That's really one of the differences between Good and Evil.

RanVor

Except Tancred did it as well.

SpeckofStardust

Yes and after he was rejected he went and stabbed a man to prove his point that said priest had no right to disagree with him about the plague. The girl decide to so to speak asked more directly for a better healer.

RanVor

Excuse me, but I don't remember any deicide being involved. Could you clarify?

He who travels the stories

@TeK:

Of course it is a bad thing. Why? Because it is absolutely self-gratifying.

The Scorched Apostate wished for the Light so badly he turned his magic into something so close to it as possible. Do you think he did not pray for Above to give him the means to help him cure the plague, too? But they did not help him. He was left with the necessary Evil of Below.

But then Above goes and gives that girl the ability to cure the plague, turning her magic into Light. Mocking the hard decisions the Scorched Apostate had to make; somehow trying to turn THEIR lack of delivering on their promises of help in the face of Evil into HIS personal failure, he should have "just hoped a little harder".

You can not rely on Above to save you but Above has the audacity to frame not relying on them, to not have faith despite their fickleness, to search for other, more reliable ways as Evil. That is why it is a bad thing: they paint the 999 out of 1000 who did not get their help as having a personal flaw, blaming them for Above's failings. You can't reasonably expect people to rely on you when you are simply not reliable but Above does just that, pointing at that one time they helped and how well that played out, not mentioning the 999 times they failed to deliver.

AbraKadabra

This. You are correct.

Her pick fought to try and stop the plague. He got his face burned and then butchered by undead before turning into an undead.

The hero pick got the free pass, no undead ambush as she got to play hero... And she is left alive bringing the key to stop plague while Scorched got burned and died... For trying to do the same thing.

Not so much annoyed at the lives being saved, but the folks above getting to decide who gets to be saved and who

One of my favorite parts of the story is the way that stuff like this is just dropped in without being a big deal or sounding strange. Random character gets introduced as they and Cat just immediately understands that that is how pronouns works and goes with it.

My favorite is still the dwarf honor seeker murdering monsters for a marriage license, though.

Not trying to downplay it here, but also remember Cat is high priestess of an entire race who don't use the "traditional" concept of gender. It'd be more surprising if she was taken for a loop by it.

Tancred is looking to have a bigger impact than we hoped after he died, and we seriously need a list of current named, maybe in that meeting that was mentioend Cat is going to they will be mentioned, like "we have xxx and xxx in this front, these in another and we could move these others, etc".

Oh and Hakram doesn't liek Hanno wonder why that is? xD Like father like daughter xD (scribe dislikes Ranger if i remember).

This chapter tells us 2 things about cat right now: 1) she needs to get laid, 2) she needs more than get laid, as in an actual relationship with someone she can consider an equal (wich sadly wasn't the case with Kilian sicne she was always liek a subordinate), i just hope neither dies as a consequence.

And as much as i get why Cat reacted like that i can't help but feel sorry for that girl, i suppose that character development can make her the replacement goldfish for Tancred, it would be cool actually.

TeK

Sex saves lives.

Adrian_V

Things is that she needs more than sex, a lover could serve as a good sounding board and has the ability to point out her flaws, wich is something we have seen happen between Hanno and Her, on both ways, it shouldm't mirrow Black and Raner's realationship, more like Masego's parents actually. Speaking of it, if Black and Malicia would have actually developed a healthy relationship then a lot of the plot wouldn't have happened xD. Instead neither could really see the other as an equal, mostly Malicia but even Black, sure it could be said is something every willain is unable to do but we have seen Cat has learned to actually stop and consider being in the wrong among other bits of character development, and Hanno too if i remember well their talk after he woke up last book.

Point

More generally than just a lover, she really needs any other outlet for her stress than pouring herself into her work.

She failed Tancred because she is spread too thin, and offloading some of her duties will only go so far. Hakram can do a little to mitigate her stress, as we see in this chapter, but her position only allows for so much comfort.

NZPIEFACE

Regarding the new Named mentioned, I love the Bitter Blacksmiths. They're siblings with the same Name, but one is a Heroine, and one is a Villain.

Huh, EE was really shoving in the fact that Above and Below mirror each other.

Liliet

Yep, sounds like it! Bless ♥

TeK

I wonder, why don't Heavens help everyone? Is it deliberate malice on their part? Or is it the lack of strength to help everyone? It can't be indifference, they do help after all. So Cat must think it is deliberate malice then. Which is absurd. Unless she thinks that Heavens reward you only blind faith. But then what about all those whose blind fate was not rewarded?

See, I have trouble understanding her point now, except that she is angry and Above make for a convenient scapegoat.

RoflCat

>But then what about all those whose blind fate was not rewarded?

That's the point of her 99/100, 999/1000 talk. The Heavens don't always answer because they can only interfere if the Story allows, and those moments where prayers did nothing? Many died. Yet all praise Above for the one good thing they did while ignoring the ones they left behind.

TeK

I don't think you got what I meant. You said it yourself, Heavens can help only if story allows. It is not deliberate malice, nor is it indifference. So I am lost as to why any kind of blame is laid at their hands. It seems petty and entitled. It's like getting angry at the fireman that he only saved your family, and not also your stamp collection.

NZPIEFACE

It is kind of petty, but completely understandable. Cat is approaching the whole praying thing rationally. There's no point in praying if your prayers only have a tiny chance of being answered when it matters. So you should act, which means you're a Villain and now you've turned your back on Above.

She's angry about how doing the smart thing means you get fucked over by Gods.

TeK

But if you approach it rationally from the position of Heavens, this kind of triage does make sense. If you can save one kid, you would also be saving your first, even if it is kinda cruel. Moreover, in Guideverse, praying is not as useless as in our universe, and that bias might also skew perception of the matter. Because praying works. And finally, Heavens are kinda non-sentient, so blaming them for anything is extremely ludicrous. Like they actually resurrected Cat, but somehow that was taken for granted, like it was all her. But if it is a bad thing, oh those damn evil Heavens.

Now if w are being honest, the boy would've died if he did not acted. But maybe that is precisely the reason Heavens did not hold his hand: because he didn't need them. And well, after that, he did reject Heavens through his actions, he proclaimed that he is a strong independent mage who don't need no Heaven. It is not irrational to not spare a limited resource of providence on someone who explicitly rejected your help.

NZPIEFACE

That's a pretty good point. Cat still thinks its bullshit though.

TeK

She kinda has to, at that point. Not the time to doubt yourself.

willfultrooper

Your firefighter analogy is completely one-sided and leaves no room for a counter-argument or at-least a counter-argument that could use that same analogy i.e firefighters saves family but not stamp collection, on Below's behalf. I will instead hijack the firefighter part. Let's say Above are firefighters and they have the ability to save a house out of one hundred. This could be for a number of reasons not enough water (or power in above's case) as one such example. Let's say a fire happens and we know for certain homes are going to be burnt to the ground. We don't know how many and so some (not all but for arguments sake lets' say 50 left) fled their homes. Now lets say the apostate is the the one homeowner who realised that maybe the firefighters won't save him and so he takes numerous steps to save his home and fight the fires. The apostle on the other hand just sat there and believed really hard that the firefighters will save their house (let's not forget the other 48 people I have not yet mentioned who believe the same thing). In this scenario 98 out of the 100 houses burn to the ground.

The Apostate is then ridiculed and or ostracised by the firefighters (I know firefighters won't actually do this in real life but in this instance this is what above did to the apostate so just go with it) for trying to do their jobs and not having faith in them whilst the Apostle is praised for staying in her home despite the risk of the fire and the firefighters thank her for the faith she had in them. 52 are alive in this scenario, the 50 who fled and the Apostle who's home is saved and the other is the apostate. All 48 of the other homeowners who stayed are dead because the firefighters couldn't save their homes and they were thus burned alive. Despite the fact that the Apostate saved his house he is instead branded as an unfaithful member of the community for not believing in the firefighters. Whilst the Apostle who did NOTHING was showered with praise and the 48 people who died are forgotten. This I believe is the argument NZPIEFACE was trying to make.

(I know this isn't the way firefighters would have behaved, it's an analogy)

TeK

Now I have to say that yes, my firefighter analogy was entirely sophistry. I struggled when I was writing whether I should use a proper argument, but in the end I fell to the Dark Side. And I am sorry 😊

See, there is a flaw in your argument as well. The first part is alright. Let's assume (and I believe it is a reasonable assumption) that firefighters know which homeowners will fight the fire. Now let's say that fighting the fire has a 10% chance to work, and praying has 0.01% chance. And firefighters can give one house a 100% chance increase. It is only natural, if your goal is maximizing the amount of people saved, to give that increase to the praying ones. So blaming firefighters for that is absurd.

Now let's get to the part where firefighters ridicule the homeowner who fought the fire. Now first of all, we need to establish exactly what "fighting the fire" entails. Which is, apparently, slaughtering every single person inside the house in cold blood, including children and elderly. Now let's balance that by the fact that not all houses in the village caught on fire initially, and that taking the fire out by yourself saves not only your house, but an entire village. Theoretically at least. We don't know if there really was no better way. If waiting it out would certainly lead to the entire village catching fire. But let's assume so nonetheless.

So now you got a saviour with bloody hands, and Sainty Mc'Praysalot. To be more precise, we got two new recruits. One puts out fire with murder (?), another without. And look, the dastardly culprit wants to kill the both of them, and you can only save one. Moreover, your dark counterpart (the firefighter village deserve, but not the one it needs right now) is here to save the murderly one. So now again, the same situation, you can only save one, but the murderly one with the Dark Mommy has a 50% to survive, and another one is pretty screwed on her own. And again, giving her the 100% chance to survive is more efficient.

And now let's change it a little. Let's say that firefighters don't really fight fire, but bestow the fire extinguisher to the Chosen one. Now can you blame them for bestowing that extinguisher on the person who chose NOT to slaughter an entire village? And will you blame those firefighters for protecting the person you already gave your one and only extinguisher too? Say what you want, but if Tankred was chosen by Above, he would be another Saint of Swords.

Ya all hated Saint of Swords.

Fayhem

> Say what you want, but if Tankred was chosen by Above, he would be another Saint of Swords.

> Ya all hated Saint of Swords.

A GOOD POINT.

RanVor

Except he wouldn't. What he wanted was the ability to heal. Just because he was capable of slaughtering everyone doesn't mean he'd do it if presented with another option. Or that he'd still be capable of doing it after being chosen, for that matter.

Ok fair, it would be far more practical to give resources to the individual most likely to, let's say minimise collateral damage. However, continuing on with the firefighters providing a fire extinguisher analogy but I will instead change fire extinguisher with water hose for this thought exercise and will use the term trees for a substitute for a fraction of the population and the forest as a substitute of the entire population. Before we continue I'd like to state that my argument is that the Apostate is justified with his actions and also Catherine's anger towards how people treat the heavens or the heroes by proxy is also justified.

Continuing on from your previous point of the Apostle being given the water hose and the apostate stuck with "Dark Mommy" as you call Catherine, the fact that Saint was chosen as a hero clearly demonstrates that the firefighters have no qualms with choosing individuals who are ready to get down and dirty, this also includes the pilgrim if you have not forgotten his little plague that he dropped. So the fact that the firefighters did not choose the apostate for his actions (the actions being murderous yet with good intent i.e limiting casualties) are invalid, instead the reason he was not chosen was because he did not believe that the firefighters would provide him with a water hose during a forest fire and instead chose to cut down the trees with the potential to spread the fire (This is an actually valid tactic done to prevent the spread of forest fires, the cutting down or removing of trees to minimise damage done in a forest). In fact, the very reason he chose the axe was because he did not receive the water hose and instead chose to cut down trees (the villagers in this instance) choosing decisive action in order to spare the rest of the forest. Thus, his action to use the axe to cut down trees was a reaction to the firefighters not giving him the water hose resulting in trees being cut down but the rest of the forest being saved. Whereas the Apostle prayed or asked really hard and was given the water hose and she thus saved the ENTIRE forest was also a reaction being granted the water hose.

The reason why Catherine was angry was because the Apostle did nothing to earn that water hose and yet was granted the water hose by the firefighters, when we know for a fact that if the fire were to occur there were other individuals who were asking for it.

(Transitioning back to PGTE: The plague was happening, chances were that other people were asking for aid as well, if the Apostate had allowed the plague to spread hundreds of thousands would have died and so he weighed the hundreds to the countless lives that could be lost if it continued to spread and decided on the killing the villagers. He was forced to make that choice and was thus gaining a Name, earning it whilst the Apostle had her named granted to her) The anger Catherine has for the firefighters is not the fact that they gave out the water hose, but the fact that the Apostate was branded a villain for taking matters in his own hands by said firefighters and the fact that the firefighters and the Apostle were praised in proxy whilst the Apostate was left cold and instead villainised.

Fayhem

> There's no point in praying if your prayers only have a tiny chance of being answered when it matters. So you should act, which means you're a Villain and now you've turned your back on Above.

Praying isn't mutually exclusive with action. It costs nothing and a 1% chance of a free solution to an awful scenario is actually a wonderful rate of return for an investment of literally nothing. Saying there's no point to praying in Guideverse bc there's a low chance it will work is like saying you shouldn't play the lottery in a scenario where you don't have to pay to enter the lottery and it's just a giant pot of free money you have a chance at getting if you just ask for it. Stopping at the 1% chance and then not doing anything if it doesn't work is a bad plan, yes, but there's no actual evidence that would have happened with Pascale. Pascale prayed and got lucky, Tancred didn't get lucky, and the kid Cat identified with and wanted to help was the one who got the short straw in much more significant ways than this and so she's lashing out. Which I do completely agree with you in saying is kind of petty, but completely understandable.

Also, and I will keep repeating this until it looks like people are acknowledging it, there is more than one side in the Guideverse. So re: your thing about "which means you're a villain" – Below is the side that makes Villains, not Above. Being mad at Above because they only have equal power to Below and so can't help everyone feels like being mad at Above because of what Below is doing, which seems like a weird transference of responsibility to me. It honestly seems like a lot of claims against Above that the fanbase makes are based on effectively transferring arguments re: theodicy from the real world to the Guideverse, but that's erasing the fact that such objections IRL are responding to the premise of a benevolent and all-powerful Heavenly force/entity that could easily overpower Evil if it decided to. And that is explicitly not the premise of the metaphysics of the Guideverse.

RanVor

I guess time doesn't count as "something", then.

Mammon

You're thinking of the issue in two dimensions, while Cat sees the problem in three. The third one being the inevitable consequences of an approach over time. That's what she and Black (and EE) are able of seeing and about in approach. Seeing that the current Good and Evil are only temporary fixes that by success and cultural shaping make everything worse and more morally inbred in the end.

When Black conquered Callow, he didn't try to change it. He went for the quiet slow death, essentially keeping things good enough to make the people content and have Callow literally die out by old age their eternal vete with Praes. He didn't put a boot on Callow's neck to gain its riches and keep it from rising up right now, he made it so that in one generation from now Callow wouldn't want to rebel. As Cat monologued, the martial law of the legions was often a good thing by discipline and Praesi occupation was starting to become less of a blight from Below.

When she was to decide how the Drow were to reshape their ruling class, Cat mentioned how she was aware that corruption and loopholing of the system was inevitable. That in about 200 years, there would be some class that by finding methods around it would remove the intent of her system. That's why she didn't give the Drow a system that benefitted them right now against DK, but some system that would at least hopefully not corrupt too much in the centuries after.

That is Cat's problem with Above. It has forcefully shaped a dependency on Heroes that enables the stubborn and self-defeating air of Good vs Evil that allows Good to not even question their own righteousness or expect Above to fix the worst of things. But once a Hero dies of old age or doesn't show up in the nick of time, what good is that system then?

Providence and prayer don't work 99/100 times, and do 1/100 times. And sure, it may save the day that 1/100 times. But people have gotten to rely on this, too many have gotten to expect this and not do anything else. That 1/100 times is being used as the solution too many times, seen as the only option too many times.

Her issue doesn't necessarily lie with Providence (though she does clearly have a distaste for the heroes getting such aid that makes them contempt and overconfident), but how it has corrupted the Good countries. How it has made these fight Evil because Evil (Such as invading Callow for their lands- I mean Evil) and then expecting Above to save their asses if things go south. For not expecting the consequences of their actions when they feel their greedy actions were righteous, and calling it Evil when consequences do strike at them.

TeK

And if we look in four dimensions, cold-eyed murderers doing bad things for good reason can backfire pretty spectacularly too. The saying about good intentions and whatnot. I think it all comes down to a basic arithmetics: You can't add up lesser evils to a greater good.

As I wrote earlier, self-reliance and faith are not opposing concepts to me, though they do seem this way in this novel. But I just don't agree. The fact that your prayers are sometimes answered is more of a reason to pray, not less. Because I think the focus should be on the fact that she chose not to murder innocent people, and personally? I think that is the reason Heavens chose to help her.

Mammon

Cat doesn't do bad things for a good cause, she's a ruler. The big issue with this argument is that at this point, she's the representative of what morals and righteousness Callow has rather than being beholden to cultural and legal norms of others. As also seen by Cat not maintaining the cultural norms and values of the long prices for small slights, and Procer deciding that their landgrabbing of Callow after Black was dethroned was righteous and in name of Above.

Your argument no longer floats, as Cat has long since ascended past what you're referring to. She's not to make the hard calls of being the lesser evil any more. She's making the calls and has been doing this both more politically correct than many of Above, and in favour of the war and good in a way that doesn't even allow one to call it a lesser evil any more. In many regards, she has ascended in position to a point where the actions of Tariq and the likes have since made them the lesser or even greater evil by action even if not by their own perspective and believes.

And your second paragraph's argument is kinda missing the very point that others may have been making and I have been trying to make, by you making it about the person praying. Instead of the by you and others used firefighter argument I'll be using soldiers instead.

One cannot blame the soldier for doing what they're told, or blame them for the war. One should go to the generals and commanders that order the war crimes, and the politicians that started the war. You're in this comparison the republican that tries to take this argument blaming Trump and the higher-ups for committing some war crime on Afghanistan civilians, rephrase it to the soldier that did it being blamed by me, and then trying to defend the soldier by saying that they were doing what they were told. Trying to rephrase the argument to fit your narrative.

My argument of what I think Cat hates lies not with the people or even the Named (though she indeed utterly loathed f.e. Pilgrim when he confidently proclaims that Good will prevail because they've got Providence on their side, thus neither having to worry nor think of the consequences and risks), but with Above. Above created the situation where people pray to them for salvation and Heroes so blindly rely on them. Above created the situation where Heroes are needed to save the day, only to then die of old age and see to another time of troubles and rising of new Villains requiring the rising of a new Hero and the continuing of the cycle of dependency.

Above is responsible for both the Good countries' reliance on Heroes and their selfrighteousness, as well as the long-term consequences, moral inbreeding and inevitable results of what Evil would look like because of Good's doing. Above is responsible for this, responsible for changing it, and by doing neither is responsible for the fallout. And in some regard, the more experienced and guiding Named like Tariq who for so long refused to work together with Cat and see her as anything but Evil despite his side being the selfish invaders, are similarly to blame for maintaining a crappy status quo.

The upper echelons that should improve have grown stagnant and faulty, still maintaining a system that results in Villains being blamed for making the hard call even for doing the right thing, while propagating the people to pray. In that, and they do seem to be somewhat sentient or at least able to know that they're doing wrong, Above is indeed being a little bitch.

Konstantin von Karstein

The only Good country who heavily relied on Heroes was the Old Kingdom of Callow, and it was because its neighbours were madmen creating undead plagues, Flying Fortress and stealing its weather. All the other Good countries we have seen had few Heroes, or they are not playing a great role in managing the country. Tariq has an important role in the Dominion, but the Levantine are perfectly capable of managing themselves without him.

So, I don't think Above is perpetuating the situation where people need them, they are just answering distress calls and helping those in need.

And you said that the Villains are blamed for making the hard calls, but it's true only in very few case, like Cat and Tancred. For most of Calernian history, most Villains were monsters who needed to be put down.

Concerning Tariq, he is of the only school of heroism, where all Villains were madmen. Catherine is not the average Villain, she is an exception to the rule. Tariq was wrong, but his actions were comprehensible.

Peter

The Scorched Apostate did by himself what the Stalwart Apostle required Taric AND a Deus Ex Machina from Above to do. Yet the Scorched Apostate died while the Stalwart Apostle got to live, which just seems unfair.

sivarajan

"Fairness is the refrain of the lazy, the inept, the heroic. Anyone unwilling to stack the deck and murder the judge to seize victory has no place wielding any real power."

Valeren

Mainly because above and Below are not inherently about good vs evil but about submission to greater power vs personal. The idea is that above will save you, yes, if you do what they want, when, where and how they want, while below favors personal choices and ambition. Now i'm not going to pretend that Evil is not evil, the point is that one should not pretend that Above is either:

They are gods, mortals are basically like toys and pawns for them and this has been shown more than once.

What really sucks, though, is that one of the reason Tancred is dead is Cath herself refusing to get into a mentor Role.

The Stalwart Apostle was saved by the 'everyone's mentor' Tariq timely intervention.

While Cath's refusal to become Apostate's resulted in her failing to notice the danger approaching him, though given this is Below maybe she is already in the 'vengeful mentor seeking vengeance for students murdered' path.

And as much as I'd like Cath to be nicer to Apostle as part of trying to make up for what she failed for Tancred, the girl's power is Light while Cath uses Night, I highly doubt we'll get that path.

tfw you realize that the heroes have a mentor thus not dying in the crib this is literally what black did. killing problems before they start. but now the grey pilgrim is there to stop it.

dadycool

I'm really getting Cat-Tariq foil vibes. Caring mentor/Uncaring mentor, protective/vengeful, and those are just the way they're opposite. In most other ways, it's a Dark Mirror kind of relationship.

Mammon

But Pilgrim has an immunity to being killed over being the Mentor, while Cat mentioned how mentorship is an incredibly risky thing for anyone else. Just look at what happened to Black, despite Scribe's concern. Cat made a hard but important choice to not risk her own life as the Black Queen, First under the Night and so on for a newbie mage, while Pilgrim thanks to the Orphim's protection and his Role doesn't need to worry about such a Story death being likely or even inevitable.

As a result, it's not really the same. Even in hindsight, Cat made the hard but necessary call while Above once again can just ignore the rules they set by making exceptions. Kinda similar to the whole Heroes saving soldiers but ignoring the value of items in their collateral despite being more valuable than the soldiers. It might be called Evil to make that call, but practically one can call it stupid evil of Above that they work so superficially only to see Providence making it work too often for them to see this.

Konstantin von Karstein

If I remember correctly, the Heaven don't cheat concerning the Mentor-immunity of Tariq. What spooked Cat the first time she heard of him is that he is so good at story-fu that he is capable of dodging any such mentor story. It's like Black, who managed to kill countless Heroes despite being a Villain.

Mammon

I assume that in part it is also him defying this norm so often (and the first times with aid of his Choir) that he got the same immunity to it as Cat seems to be getting for telling Choirs to bugger off. His story-fu is no longer a hard requisite beyond what he does superficially.

AbraKadabra

Which probably means Cat New role will be black pilgrim.

Frivolous

Unless I'm mistaken, Captain Raphael Twice-Drowned is the first uncertain-gender character we've seen so far who isn't also a drow. And even then, the drow uses the pronoun 'it', while Raphael uses 'their'.

In other news, I wonder why Hakram and Hanno don't like each other. Could it be because Cat finds Hanno attractive, and Hakram is being all big-brother-protective of her?

Decius

The drow are not of uncertain gender. 'Drow' IS a gender. They use it/its pronouns.

dadycool

I hadn't noticed the pronouns until you mentioned them. I wonder what that was all about. Androgynous, perhaps? I like the concept of this extremely sinister-looking orc with his dead hands and black armor laying down the big-brother Talk with the shining leader of mortal Light on his Warlord's behalf.

ninegardens

>In other news, I wonder why Hakram and Hanno don't like each other. Could it be because Cat finds Hanno attractive, and Hakram is being all big-brother-protective of her?

I mean... this feels doubtful. Given what we've heard of Hakram, and given what he knows of Cat's previous... engagements.... And given that we have at least mild confirm that HannoxCat is not a thing.

Possibly Hakram sets Hanno's coin hand itching? As in Hakram is stated to be creepy- even Kairos found him weird.

Liliet

I HADNT NOTICED UNTIL YOU POINTED IT OUT

(Upon reread, there's very little pronoun use regarding them, artful on erratic's part)

Burlyraven

So now I'm thinking Tancred getting a revival might not be a good thing, if it were to happen. There's room for a story of Evil and Good coming together to face the True Enemy, with the Scorched Apostate and the Stalwart Apostle as the two sides of the same coin (possibly long lost twins), but the tone of the story is definitely tending towards Cat going down a dark path. And if so, any revivals would be pretty dark and twisted, and possibly even set Cat up as the monster to replace the Dead King.

I was prepared to say, though, that if we got more details on Tancred in another chapter past his death, it would almost be more forced to not revive him. As is, I think it might be best for everyone if he really was fridged.

NZPIEFACE

Do you think it's possible for Tancred and Pascale to work together though?

Her existence, like, as a whole, basically invalidates what he did. It's what he's built from, "doing what was necessary". How shattered do you think he'd be if he learned he was just wrong?

Decius

Work together? No.

But a cunning leader could easily place them in a rivalry to cleanse more plague than the other, and then into a rivalry to destroy more undead than the other, building to a point where one of them has a choice to either save themselves or take a great personal risk to protect the other.

Insanenoodlyguy

And then they kiss!

Burlyraven

If it did turn out that they were long lost siblings, then maybe (and there are hints that the story would allow it), but that's another reason I'm not really a fan of a revival anymore, because it's very likely that scenario ends with Cat as a mad witch type guarding the vengeful Scorched Apostate as he seeks to rid the world of the so called chosen.

TeK

Not really possible to work together, since one of them is kinda dead.

NZPIEFACE

Decius

>"Masego had told me that carving those signs in any order but what it must have originally been done in would make the box fail to function, sounding about as impressed by this as he'd been miffed."

And that was when I knew that the Dead King had created a fake box that fails to function, for the purpose of having his ghouls use it to create a sense of security and prove that they aren't.

Liliet

Oof.

TBF they have other means of detection.

dadycool

EE, You can't keep doing this to us. Our hearts can only take so much twisting, squeezing, and stabbing. Cat's already learned her lesson regarding predictability etc. You don't need to twist the knife like that.

I suppose it's already established that Villains can only truly exist as foils to Heroes, but I'd thought we were past that.

Liliet

Poor Pascale. She does not deserve this. It's not HER fault Tancred died, but Cat can't really help being emotional about the whole thing, now =x

RoflCat

It just feels awful to be the opposite side of the spectrum.

On one side, a new Named granted power she desire to answer the needs, with protective grandpa and caring sempais to help her in time of danger.

On the other side, a new Named forced to use the power he has to slaughter the 'few' to save the many, picked up by a person that refused to become his mentor despite his longing for one, and then get murdered in his sleep and murdered again by his not-mentor.

One side got everything, the other side lost everything, and she's on the latter side.

RanVor

Of course, Cat's treatment of Pascale is entirely undeserved, but let's be honest, anybody would be infuriated in a situation like that. The Stalwart Apostle's very existence is basically a huge middle finger to Tancred's tragic choice and the emotional trauma Cat has just gone through, and a stark reminder of just how much more convenient it is to be a Hero.

shadw21

I wonder if Pascale got Named at the same time, before, or after Tancred took his Name. If it was before, or at the same time, then Tancred was just Below's response/equalizing force to Pascale's being named. If it was after that, or after/ while Tancred was being killed, then Above absolutely did it to rub it in, or at best, as Providence to the side of 'Good'/the entire army as Tancred's replacement.

I wonder if Pascale is aligned with a specific Choir or not, if so there might be a fourth Choir Cat might be confronting down the road if given the chance.

Liliet

Yes, but she doesn't have to be infuriated AT the kid, you know?

So the villainous apostle gets killed in his sleep and the heroic apostle triumphs against all odds.

Even though Cat is considered a villain she technically isn't named. We do know she might be on her way to transition into a name.

Consider these facts and it feels like this is a not so subtle nudge from Order to have Cat join their side when she claims her next name.

hakureireimu

This seems like the opposite of being a Hero.

Aurelian

It caught my attention that Hakram had to hasten to catch up to Cathrine. As far as I remember, her limp is no longer mentioned since Cat knelt in front of Tancred when she met him in the temple.

The next thing that got me thinking was her staff making a cracking noise from her grip.

Theory mode on: an increase in strength and the lack of a limp could be the benefits of being named. Maybe she already is started on that road. Her passionate anger for how unfair the gods above is also a sideeffect of this. The unfairness is an old story for her and she usually is able to step outside of her shoes and analyse the situation.

As for what name it could be, I think the following can be taken as the core of the role "I should have watched more closely, I should have moved quicker, I should have... I should have protected him." In my limited knowledge I can only think of a knight or a paladin wanting to protect at their core. This doesn't quite suite Cat anymore.

However, she was the equal of the Peregrine when they were fighting and it seems that Tancred getting a rez is not out of the question, so I'd wager her role would be something like the Below version of the Grey Pilgrim.

Theory mode off.

Whatever the Name Cat is presented with to use, I am looking forward to her stepping out of her shoes and analysing the situation.

TeK

Don't you find it a little horrifying how everyone just glossed over how Tankred murdered an entire village? Like Cat says it's OK and he had no other choice and we just go "Oh, that's fine then, what a good lad"? When it was established that she is an Unreliable Narrator? But still, everyone kinda just agreed that it was perfectly normal and the village had to die. Am I the only one who finds it concerning? Is it just me? Am I crazy?

RanVor

You mean the village of terminally ill people who were about to spread a deadly plague all over the land, which he destroyed out of desperation after being denied every other possibility of counteracting the spread, an act he felt incredibly guilty about and had only been offered amnesty because it's wartime and the Grand Alliance needs every means of fighting back against the Hidden Horror available?

Tek

Wait a sec, I am just gonna go into thre nearest hospital, find the list of people with AIDS andju kill them all.

For the greater good ofc.

RanVor

Sure, go ahead. Just remember to make sure your country is at war with an invincible undead demigod out to annihilate all life before proceeding.

pretentiousinfiniteregression

Oh well, that's actually a perfect comparison. You see I wasn't so sure at first, but that comparison – which, again, is obviously a perfect one to one of Tancred's entire tragedy – really blew me away. Consider this mind changed good sir or madam.

matesbe

Wow, talk about strawmanning. First of all, people with AIDS are contagious, but only if their body fluids get in someone else's body, which is completely avoidable in day-to-day life. Secondly, these villagers either refused to admit they were sick or didn't care, which makes them far more dangerous (especially since this was probably far more contagious than AIDS).

byzantine279

It would be closer to finding out Smallpox had returned and burning the town where it was present to the ground and killing everyone in the process.

Plagues are... well, we haven't really seen one in modern times. Even the Spanish Flu back in 1918 was nothing like smallpox or the Black Death.

TeK

My point is, I feel doubtful about "every possibility of counteracting a spread". I am not blaming him, mind you. I'm just saying, shouldn't we be at least a little concerned about that?

RanVor

Interesting, because I believe Tancred was 100% to blame for his actions. He did, in fact, kill every infected person in Marserac of his own volition, if under the influence of strong emotions. It is not true, however, that he didn't do everything in his power to attempt to resolve the situation nonviolently first. He did. The choice he ended up making was the wrong one, but the fact that he had to make it at all is undeniably tragic.

Point

If he hadn't killed them, they would have evacuated and played a part in the Dead King's plans. Knowing that, was his decision really so wrong?

It may have been morally wrong, but that doesn't mean it was the wrong thing to do in that situation.

RanVor

Morally wrong is what I meant. From a purely practical standpoint, he was absolutely correct.

ninegardens

This is valid concern.

As in, Cat's argument is "Doing nothing would have resulted in MORE death and devastation, and the idea of waiting for above to save us is dangerous for EVERYONE,"

To which many would counter "Yeah, but nine times out of ten, in normal circumstance, if the best plan you can come up with is 'burn people to death', then you didn't think hard enough"

Of course we are not in normal circumstances... so the actual morality gets hazy.

Ultimate_procrastinator

Agreed, though it's worth noting that 'burn people to death' wasn't the best plan he could come up with; the best was warning people and trying to convince them not to go to the refugee camps. He only resorted to burning when they wouldn't listen (and possibly when someone shoved his face into a fire? I don't remember that being directly stated, but I feel like it was implied). In other words, he thought as hard as he could, but there's only so much a young teenager with no authority and no reason for others to believe him can do when his only actual power is burning things

ninegardens

He tried "Talk to people and failed", AFTER THAT his best plan was "Burn people to death"... even if that is the best plan you can come up with given your current information... even if thousands of lives are on the line...

Maybe you should just fail.

Just fail and hope like hell the cavalry comes. Sometimes your plan is so horrible that failure IS a option. Or set buildings on fire and ATTRACT the cavalry, without killing people.

To be clear, this is not a condemnation of him, I'm simply arguing that the argument of "Don't do evil things, even if it seems like the greater good" holds a lot of weight. Especially here, where by the looks of it Grey Pilgrim and Co blew up DK entire plague plan any, hence invalidating the need for all this death. No way for Tancred to know that of course, but um.... him killing people due assuming his knowledge was sufficient is kind of the crux of the tragedy here.

[As an aside, is it weird to think that Tancred did exactly the thing that GP would have done, for exactly the same reasons, and he's a villian?]

Ultimate_procrastinator

All of that is true; at this point, it pretty much comes down to which is more important to you morally: following principles regardless of what outcome it looks like they'll lead to, or taking the option that looks like it will cause the least pain in the long run regardless of how horrible it is. In this case, the cavalry WAS nearby, so setting the fire to attract them would have worked, but if they hadn't been, if this had just been a side story about a village far enough away from the action that no one was around, and Tancred had stuck to his principle, we'd have a very different tragedy about the problem of sticking to principles even when you have no reason to believe it will help. Of course, this is also a debate that has been going in for quite a while in ethics, pretty much exactly for this reason: you can never tell exactly what will happen. Sometimes sticking to principle saves everyone even when you had no way of knowing that would happen; sometimes trying to save more lives just kills some people needlessly even when every piece of information you have points to it being the "greater good."

In response to your aside, that is pretty weird, although it probably has to do with how GP has the Choir of Mercy whispering in his ear and telling him which decision will minimize long-term suffering, while Tancred ended up deciding on his own.

As an aside of my own, I remember once reading (probably on TVTropes) that how much sympathy we tend to have for characters who embrace a utilitarian, "for the greater good" philosophy tends to be directly related to who they expect to make sacrifices for that greater good: if they only sacrifice others while preserving themselves they get very little sympathy and are generally villainous (in the traditional storytelling sense, not the in-universe Guide sense), while expecting everyone up to and including themselves to make those sacrifices tends to get them into antihero territory at the very least

It is sad how many people fail to remember that the villagers were about to leave and Tancred had to make a decision immediately.

As for your aside, it's not weird at all. Tariq Fleetfoot is the king of bullshit.

Insanenoodlyguy

And 99/100 times, that won't work.

Tom

I'd reread chapter 2, it's hardly glossed over.

byzantine279

A village that was corrupted by what (as far as he could possibly have known) was an incurable plague that would have killed tens of thousands?

What do you think a quarantine really is? It's sacrificing the few to save the many – these days we just hav sufficient resources and tech to also try to save the few without risking the many.

reveen

ITT update were super mad at a literal child who just wants to heal people for gaining the power to do so in a way that the Protagonist doesn't approve of.

Because clearly the fact that life isn't fair is only something to be bothered about when it happens to Cat.

So i found something interesting:

|I took a step forward, Akua falling in behind, only to found Captain Raphael had offered me their arm. How long has it been since someone tried that? |I rose to my feet, swallowing a snort when the greatest abomination ever born to Calernia chivalrously offered me his arm.

My random suspicion from this chapter is that Raphael is Neshamah, there is also that Raphael is wearing large amounts of clothing, and shortly after we are told that certain enchantments block the boxes, and that Raphael apparently survived drowning in Cleves while the Dead King is attacking.

Probably wrong, but wanted to voice my thoughts.

ninegardens

Ohhhh... that is suspicious. Good catch. Cat is not being paranoid enough.

Tom

This is brilliant. Would like this if WordPress would let me...

dadycoool

Completely circumstantial, utterly illogical, and no reason to believe it to be accurate. OK, I'm convinced. The best foreshadowing is what the reader dismisses as not-foreshadowing.

ohJohN

Interesting, it at least seems possible.

I am a little surprised that Cat isn't paranoid about everyone rn. They know how the ghouls escaped detection, but don't have extensive countermeasures in place yet. And DK really wanted Tancred dead, enough to reveal the new ghouls, presumably because he could sense/destroy the plague seeds. Now there's another Named with a similar talent; even if the Plague-Maker got nuked, that doesn't necessarily mean Pascale isn't also a target.

ninegardens

>"It's been a long day," I finally said. "We'll speak tomorrow."
>There was a reason I was more than halfway fond of Hanno of Arwad: he looked at me for a heartbeat the nodded.
>"Tomorrow," the White Knight softly agreed, eyes considering.

You know... I almost kind of wonder if Hanno draws no distinction between Heroes and Villains. He's used to managing a ragtag band of misfits, who are sometimes at each others throats. Now he has to manage (on occasion) the Black Queen and other villains.... but who cares? He don't judge.

I get the feel he's more likely to disagree with the ACTIONS of certain villainous sorts... but it seems highly likely that he doesn't buy into (or even notice) the "bestowed" vs "damned" distinction.

Like, even dealing with Hierarch or Black, I don't remember ever getting the vibe he cared where their powers were coming from.

He's sort of... repeatedly blind to a bunch of social assumptions that make him ever so endearing.

... also gonna be kind of weird if Cat be frustrated about "Above rigs the game and gives nicer gifts" and he just shrugs and goes "Named are Named. Who cares about above or below? That's not my business."

Javvies

Yeah, that counts as a pretty good reason to activate the countermeasures.

Heroes and Above are bullshit.

RanVor

To me, this entire setup reeks of a play from Below to pull Cat back into their clutches. This soon after losing Tancred, the Black Queen meets another child mage with the exact same ability to detect the plague, thrust into the exact same terrible situation, only this time, the child got a magic fix from Above to spare her from having to make the hard choice. Really? That's way too contrived to be a mere coincidence. The situation is perfectly tailored to rekindle Cat's dying resentment towards Heroes, the same that has been driving Black for decades, and lead her to a new Villainous Name.

The practical Evil has slipped from the Hellgods' grasp, and they want it back.

Aurelian

Agreed. It feels like Cat getting so worked up about the unfairness of the situation is the result of the Name looming.

agesbe

You don't need a name to be upset by the unfairness of the situation. A kid who she was fond of, who made a hard decision that he greatly regretted but couldn't see a way out of, was killed and it was her fault.

Then there's this other kid who accomplished the same thing without bloodying her hands, and lived. Feeling resentment mixed with not a little bit of guilt is a completely human emotion.

Jon Ismael

Parallelisms this explicit are way too interesting not to discuss. Focusing on the Roles of Tancred and Pascale in the story against the Dead King, they were clearly the sword and shield against DK.

It fits so well even with the hero/villain dynamic, because heroes are usually reactionary (putting out fires, saving lives), while villains are proactive (starting fires, putting lives in danger). Tancred ultimately wants to save lives, but has resigned himself to the fact that he had to take it upon himself to destroy The Enemy('s seeded plague) to do that, while Pascale desperately wanted to save the lives in front of her, even if it might endanger others. It fits nicely to the theme of following Above's guidelines for doing Good vs. Below's seek to improve your current position ALWAYS.

Sure Pascale lives and is able to do what Tancred wishes he could do, but healing plagues won't defeat the Dead King or his armies. Sorcery-light serves the goal better, even if it had to be pried from Tancred's cold undead torso. Again, fitting the theme with the choice: (relative) safety in maintaining the status quo, or sacrifices in pursuit of something greater.

Kinda sucky that the pursuit of peace involves lots of dead orphans on the side that's hard-carrying this operation. (Not that the Lycaonese aren't putting in work, but they only started regaining ground after a certain side joined the fight.)

Aurelian

People on HIV effective treatment cannot pass it on or is very unlikely, as well as it is a criminal offence to infect knowingly someone with HIV. Also, they don't turn into undead and follow the commands of a necromancer.

ninegardens

Random question: Is Below on the DK side? Is Below opposed to DK.

The way I read it now is that Above is 100% behind smiting the Dead king, and Below is sort of... 50:50 supporting the local villains and supporting the dead king.

From Below's point of view, this seems like a pit fit, to the winner go the spoils, much like Cat vs Sve Noc.

Do we have any evidence either way on this one?

As far as "Is this a Below play to rope Cat back in?"... to me it feels less like that and more like... this is Below's mode of operation. They had out big shiny powerful tools, with a terrible price attached to them, and you (either Tancred or Cat) either use those tools effectively, or you screw it up. Below isn't there to ensure that you use them well.

Neither Cat nor Tancred was paranoid enough, and here we are.

Above gave the heroes different tools... I would even argue weaker tools, but also handed them much more of a user manual, in the form of good fortune.

shadw21

Below is probably just happy to see so much 'excitement' up there, lots of death and destruction, with stories being made or acted out. Below will support both sides, probably in unequal measure at any given point, in whatever ways makes the situation more interesting to them/it.

There's so much of Below that it there's not likely a real way to measure it's approval, which likely endlessly shifts as well. Whatever was in charge of the one hell that DK took over would probably like to have it back though, if there was a single devil or demon that 'ruled' over it at all before the takeover.

dadycool

Thinking about it, the only person Below was 100% behind was Kairos.

I was always under the impression that DK actually made a hell, rather than take it over. And even if he did take it over, any devil/demon that was in it at the time is now either dead or completely his. Below is Survival of the Fittest, after all.

shadw21

I can agree with that, Kairos was the last of the true 'Age of Wonders' villains, since I suspect Dead King may predated that age, though I could be wrong there.

I'm pretty sure it was said outright at one point that he'd invaded one, and was going to try for a second realm before the Bard/Intercessor got, further, involved and sent the elves after him.

Tom

> He'd been a wretched boy, Tancred, but he'd not been wrong. To act instead of pray, to trust his the ugly work of his hands rather than the silent Heavens.

How does Cat know that he didn't pray before he acted? Tancred came across as the praying type to me (quotes from chapter 2):

> Against the other side of the altar, bloodied and burned, lay the young boy who'd butchered more than a hundred souls beyond the gates of this place.

> "Are you to be my punishment?" the boy rasped out. "I have sinned and do not deny it."

> "You are not," the Named said, "an angel."

> "I'm a monster," the boy wept. "Gods forgive, oh Gods forgive me."

> "I didn't want to kill them," the boy whispered, "but what else could I do? If I'd had the Light, the real one, I could have healed them. Helped them. Instead..."

Given how he's acting after killing everyone, I find it hard to believe that he wouldn't have prayed fervently beforehand. The major difference I see between Tancred and Pascale is that Pascale's prayers were answered by Above, and Tancred's were not, so he took action. It looks like Above and Below got together, said "Hey look, a two-fer. Which one do you want?" and flipped a coin. (Not that that would piss Cat off any less.)

Anyway, I'm hoping for Tancred's return in an enchanted, heavily-armored walking sarcophagus that spews fire and pithy quotes in a deep voice. Between the Arsenal and the Belfry, they can pull it off, right? 😊

Point

As for your first question, I'd guess that he prayed, but he got nothing.

I would say that his probably prayers weren't answered because Pascale's already had been, but that argument doesn't seem to fit with the themes of the story. More likely, I'd guess that it was the faith he offered or the content of the prayer (or both) that made the difference. Maybe he prayed only as a last resort, not really believing it had a chance to help, and/or he prayed for the power to heal, rather than praying for Above to do the healing. That would do much more to highlight some differences between Above and Below (but it's a stretch to assume it given what we know of his situation and Pascale's).

But in the end, Cat doesn't know any more than us. She's pretty clearly viewing his situation through the lens of her own; she assumes that he skipped praying because that's what she would have done.

sutortyrannus

Even in death, Tancred endures.

Ultimate_procrastinator

I just realized (and forgive me if someone else has posted the same idea in the last couple hours and I haven't seen) that while this chapter highlights the Good and Evil approaches as, in essence, 'wait for the gods to fix things' vs. 'do it yourself,' it also mentions near the beginning that Hanno actually doesn't take the 'standard' Good approach:

I think it's also worth noting here that Catherine's idea of 'villain fixes it themselves' is not exactly the standard Evil approach, either; that would actually be the various flying fortresses, talking tigers, etc, a strategy that could more aptly be described as 'hope these absurd, outlandish plans call enough attention to the problem for someone actually sane and competent to fix it.'

Many comment threads on previous chapters and books have pointed out that Hanno seems to be the Practical Good counterpart to Cat's Practical Evil, and that the Cardinal system in the postwar will shift everyone more towards practicality in general. In essence, it's a paradigm shift for both Above and Below: the old dichotomy was "Pray and hope this is the one in a million times that actually works" vs "Make everything worse trying to do it yourself;" the new dichotomy is "give others what they need to fix the problem, with some hope in the heavens to back you up" vs "it's all on you and the few you trust to fix everything." Given this, and that Calernia runs on stories, and the older the stories are the harder it is to avoid falling into them, I can't help but wonder if rather than an attempt by Above or Below to tie Cat into their camp, the situation with Pascale and Tancred is essentially the backlash of the old story as Cat and Hanno dig their way out of it and carve a new rut into creation.

If this is true, we could expect that going forward, the story will present similarly mirrored situations, but with no consistent slant towards Good or Evil, and more importantly, with the less practical response ALWAYS being the one favored. For example, next time they could stumble across someone who came into a Name, tried to train their friends and families to fight the undead while heading for the refugee camps and were slaughtered, closely followed by a Named who massacred their own village, combined the corpses into a giant flesh titan, and somehow successfully defeated a legion of zombies with it (granted, EE would be a lot more creative than just 'basically the same situation with the specifics changed out', but it illustrates the point) (also, I can't actually imagine a scenario where using zombies against the Dead King goes well in the long run). Actually, thinking about it, situations wouldn't even have to be mirrored; as long as there's that definite push towards the impractical, Stupid Good/Evil response rather than the rational, Practical one, with no consistent favor towards either Evil or Good, the theory would hold. Of course, if the story doesn't meet one or both of those conditions going forward, then the theory is most likely wrong. And then hey, we get to make more theories!

...Ah, who am I kidding, we'll do that even if this one's right 😊

Hm. Curious. Two parallel "choosings" – happening BEFORE the need for those powers... and somehow everything ends up in a moral discussion here, while I keep wondering about the plot significance of TWO of those... of why we would even get two. If they are the true plot by the DK, the real "seeds". Two mages no less... Maybe I'm as off on my plot instincts as Cat currently is, but I got a whole different feeling where her "source unknown"-"something's wrong"-feeling came from, not the morality of Good vs. Evil, but that something is just off about that happening, two peeps for the same ROLE; that the real ploy of the DK might indeed not have been found, while everyone thinks it's over and done, caught before it could develop into something more. And that right after talk about how his most insidious plots are so very hard to find. Maybe I'm drawing on all the wrong strings, the wrong combination, but I suddenly feared for what the "healing" might have done to Talbot, after he just got a flag of how awful it would be to lose him. Or that big hidden workshop where young Named get sent that the DK just has to want to find out about. Mind seeds? I can't stop poking at wondering how the hell these two actually got named in the first place, by what events, to end up with TWO such same abilities. Do the Gods just like to hedge their bets?

SpeckofStardust

It's a known thing that for every direct action the God's above or Below do their other side gets to do an = action, as such the 2 named in question may have been an agreed on actions by both side's because the dead king is that much of a problem. The arguable limited scale could be due to a unknown rules.... Saying this I just got something, we know that 'great' villains tend to have gifts from the below when it comes to their own death's, what is the above's equivalent?

Point

I don't think creating names is generally a direct intervention, and looking at Tancred's death and Cat's reactions, it seems that his role in the story is less plot-related than it is related to Cat's motivations.

As for villains' ability to go out with a bang, I'd guess that it's partially balanced out by Providence and many death-related heroic tropes. For example, if a hero sacrifices his life for his friends to escape, I assume their escape is virtually guaranteed.

Daniel E

We can infer from '200 Heroic Axioms' that Heroes don't get a direct line to Above upon death, but their gifts are substantially more numerous in varied circumstances. One in particular comes to mind; "If your powers are lost, they will nearly always return greater than before so long as the appropriate moral lesson is learned. With kindness and humility comes overwhelming martial might."

superkeaton

The poor Apostle, she has no idea that the Black Queen isn't personally angry with her. Hopefully Hanno explains that to her, because it should be plenty obvious to him what Cat's mad about.

ereshkigala

IMHO, there are a few points that have yet to be brought up here:

1) Cat is angry that Above intervenes only one time in a thousand and yet gets praised by everyone, but the same happens with everyone that saves people. Philanthropists only save a tiny portion of the population with their charities and yet everyone praises them. The Red Cross doesn't save everyone that needs doctors, and yet everyone praises them.

2) Ultimately, even if someone could help everyone in the world – and we have no evidence that Above can – they are not required to do so. You can't demand others to solve your every problem as if they were your slave; they have every right to say "no" for whatever arbitrary reason. And when they do help even once you should recognize that they did so in whatever manner is appropriate.

3) There is nothing "unfair" about becoming a villain; it always gives you more power to pursue your goals, it always is power tailored to your choices/personality, it comes with agelessness and immunity to disease, and it comes without being bound to the service of the gods.

Below is not required to give you anything else, or support you in your efforts, any more than anyone else is required to give you stuff for free.

"Ninety-nine times out of a hundred," I said, voice cold, "nine hundred and ninety-nine times out of a thousand, that act of faith would have killed dozens of thousands."

Yeah but anyone named Pascale making that kind of Wager is pretty much guaranteed to win

Chapter 7: Approach

"Friend and foe know a different man."

– Helikean saying

The contents of my tent were one of the few splurges of luxury I'd ever allowed myself. The bed was from Orense, whose carpenters were famous even within the Principate, and though it could be folded in two for transport it was nothing like the cots the Legions of Terror used as their standard. It was large enough for two and topped by a good woolen mattress, as even now featherbeds were just too soft for me – I found it difficult to fall asleep in them. A pair of enchanted braziers and a set of magelight lanterns saw to heat and light, while a small sculpted table flanked by a library-box and a few trunks held my personal affairs. That part of my tent was parted from the rest by a heavy curtain sown into the ceiling, keeping it separate from the larger segment where I received others.

The broad desk, which I'd had carved out of Ashuran cedar twice struck by lightning to my exact specifications, had been was the great expense there though I believed it worth ever copper. It'd been Akua that had told me about the cleansing and healing properties of the cedar trees that grew in the shade of Mount Tyro, the mountain where the mage-doctor schools of Ashur had first been raised centuries ago. Masego had added that a lightning strike would bring such properties to the surface, and Vivienne's people in the Free Cities had found cedar that'd been struck twice being sold by a broker in Mercantis. Whatever the magic behind it, sitting at that desk never seemed to pain my leg no matter how long I did and I tired measurably slower working on it.

The seat behind was naturally the same sinfully comfortable armchair I'd stolen from a Summer count during the Arcadian campaign, my perennial favourite. A pair of less comfortable but prettily sculpted – roaring lionheads for the arms – seats sent to me by Vivienne matched it on the other side. My personal desk was only a part of the large tent, however, as it'd become inevitable that I would have to frequently 'entertain' the kind of people who expected luxuries even when at war. The first wooden table I'd used was hacked straight through during either the fourth or fifth assassination attempt of last winter – I couldn't quite recall, they rather melded into the same general sense of unpleasantness after a while – and the replacement had only lasted two months before I put the Bandit Lord's head through it, but Archer had been sufficiently amused by that last setback she'd actually carved me one herself.

That oaken stretch was the single most beautiful thing I owned, as far as I was concerned. Though it was broadly rectangular and the surface was still only half-polished, Indrani must have put half a hundred hours into the carvings that adorned it. Four snakelike legs coiled their way up, jaws opened to swallow legionaries as had truly happened when Akua unleashed devils on the Fifteenth before the Battle of Marchford. From there Archer had carved scenes as her fancy struck, without rhyme or reason. The Woe's battle with the Princess of High Noon abutted depiction of the duelling scene from the Lay of Lothian's Passing she so enjoyed, the last moments of Larat's splendid escape were wedged in between the dying gasp of the Kingdom of Sephirah and the view of the Silver Lake from her favourite Laure tavern.

It wasn't finished, perhaps only two thirds of the sides having been carved and the wood atop the table still being prepared for carvings of its own, and already it was one of the most precious possessions I'd ever owned. My officers and allies had quickly caught on to Indrani's habit of adding a few carvings whenever she passed through our camp, and it'd become a manner of entertainment for them to make a pretext to visit my tent and try to find the latest additions afterwards. The First Prince had sent a set of ten cushioned seats in matching oak as a gift, which given their delicate craftsmanship were likely worth a fortune, but coin couldn't buy what it had meant for someone as restless as Archer to have spent so many hours working on a piece meant for me.

There were other adornments to the tent, of course. Heavy tapestries hung from the sides, woven in the Callowan manner – the Hedges style, to be precise, since the thickness of those helped keep the heat in the tent during winter. My people's tapestries admittedly tended to only depict three things: hunting, the Book of All Things and war. Given that I had little taste for hunting or the Gods Above but more than a few wars under my belt, I'd settled for the last and matched that martial tendency with the grand maps I'd commissioned. Smaller ones of the fronts in Cleves and Twilight's Pass, larger ones of the Principality of Hainaut and the Kingdom of the Dead. Braziers, sprite-lanterns and a long commode that was admittedly mostly a dump for scroll and parchment stacks – as well as holding a pair of compartments filled with bottles of wine and liquor – finished the last of it.

It was a comfortable dwelling, as had been made necessary by the sheer amount of time I'd spent in it over the last two years.

I rose with dawn and broke my fast on the carved table, wolfing down eggs and rashers as I read through the damage reports from last night's troubles. Akua sat across from me and we shared a pot of tea in companionable silence as I busied myself frowning at the ink. Most of the damage was superficial but one of the wardstones from the Third Army's camp, which was where the Dead King's ghouls had found the most success, had cracked. This was not beyond our ability to fix, but the artefact the ghouls has used to try to contaminate the stone – some sort of sharp obsidian spike that just reeked of sorcery – was still stuck in it. It'd have to be either destroyed or extracted. In destroying it we'd improve our chances of repairing the wardstone, but to extract it we'd have to cut through the stone instead and effectively wreck it permanently. On the other hand, if we could figure out what the spike was we could prepare countermeasures for its next use.

Adjutant joined us just as I finished reading the last of the report, his timing as fatefully impeccable as always, and he claimed a seat at a table. He demurred when Akua offered him a cup of tea, as they'd both known he would. He hated the Nok blends, insisted they made his fangs taste of herbs for days afterwards. Akua had not once, so far, missed an occasion to try to socially maneuver him into being forced to drink a cup regardless. It was easy to tell how well they were getting along on any given day simply by how playful the shade was being about that little game. This morning, though, I gave them no time to get into it.

"Thoughts?" I prompted.

"It's only the wardstone against scrying that was affected," Hakram calmly said. "The least important of the three. Carve it, send the spike to the Belfry and lean on the Arsenal to get a replacement sent as soon as possible."

My eyes moved to Akua.

"Destroy the spike," the dark-skinned woman replied. "It costs us more than weeks or months exposed to destroy a wardstone: it also costs us the hours spent realigning the array with the replacement stone. Hours that skilled mages would otherwise spend addressing current threats or preparing for those to come."

"The Dead King seemingly believed he could sink our full ward array with the spike, Lady Akua," Hakram pointed out. "If we do not learn the nature of the threat, that might just be the case when one is next used against us."

"The Dead King has millennia of such accumulated tricks and tools to wield whenever he so pleases, Lord Adjutant," Akua replied. "We cannot and indeed should not attempt to match every single blow with an exact parrying dagger. The superior approach would be tightening security around our wardstones and instead leaning our efforts towards innovations of our own."

"Our innovations spring from Jaquinite and Trismegistan sorcery," Adjutant gravelled. "One was forged in the Dead King's shadow and he is the founding practitioner of the other. We might as well try to drown a shark."

"However potent a practitioner of sorcery, the King of Death remains a single mage," the shade argued. "While he can have helpers and acquire the knowledge of others, it is highly improbable for the Dead King's mastery of the Gift to be so superior as to eclipse every advance come out of the Arsenal."

I drummed my fingers against the table, thinking in silence. The two of them were, through the locus of an ultimately minor tactical decision, coming to stand in for the two great currents of thought among the strategists of the Grand Alliance. One school of thought, of which the most prominent advocates were Princess Rozala Malanza and Prince Otto Reitzenberg, argued that the Alliance should fight aggressively on a tactical scale but defensively on a strategic one. Stable defensive lines and regular sorties were to serve as way to grind down Keter's forces in Procer while the Empire Ever Dark held Serolen and raided through dwarven tunnels behind the lines of the dead. All of this was to serve as a method of weakening the Dead King until either the Arsenal created armaments capable of turning the tide or a strategic opportunity to strike at Keter itself was made. The ever-increasing amount of Named joining our ranks had, of late, been added to the arguments. Defence was their creed, until we took the King of Death's head in his seat of his power.

The other school of thought, which claimed Prince Klaus Papenheim and Lord Yannu Marave as leading lights, argued instead for full offensive war. Their belief was that the Grand Alliance would soon reach the peak of its capacity to wage war and would only be headed into a death spiral if it did not begin scoring decisive blows before that capacity was spent. The doctrine would begin with reclamation of northern Procer by three-pointed offensive, followed by a winter of preparation and then a joint all-fronts offensive into the Kingdom of the Dead while the Empire Ever Dark struck out from its position in Serolen. With enough victories to show for, we could bargain for open dwarven military support and offer them a clean strike at Keter while the Hidden Horror's armies were tied up on four different campaigns in other corners of his realm. There were half a dozen other variations on how the offensives should be waged, some of them not even involving the Kingdom Under, but the common tie was always the call for offensive campaigning.

Akua was, I knew, very much inclined to agree with the defensive school. Like most Praesi highborn she still saw mages at the most important part of warfare and was generally inclined to believe Named were best suited to creating the kind of breakthrough that'd deliver victory against Keter, either in a study or on the field. Hakram was not quite so clear-cut in his preferences, but for good reason his sympathies tended more the way of the offensive school. While Akua was hardly uninformed, she was not nearly as aware of how fragile the Grand Alliance's situation truly was as my second. The strain of the war against Keter was being felt across the entire coalition, but most keenly of all in Procer: high taxes, frequent requisitions and lasting restrictions on trade were causing mounting unrest. And that was without even mentioning the waves of refugees in need of settling, for whom sympathy tended to sour very quickly whenever food or room ran low and human nature took its usual course towards the ugly. Hakram tended to favour the aggressive approaches, including getting ready to fight the war now, because he was unsure how long we could keep waging it.

I leaned more towards the offensive school myself, as it happened, but only within limits. The Principality of Hainaut and the last stretches of Twilight's Pass ought to be reclaimed in full and a proper defensive line raised across all shores that'd be able to prevent large-scale invasion by the dead. Then, and only then, could further aggressive campaigning be considered. Cordelia Hasenbach agreed, as it happened, at least when it came to the reclamation of Hainaut – she was less eager to try taking back the Pass once more, considering the lair of nightmares Neshamah had turned the last fortresses of it into. Regardless, the two of us agreeing and the Grey Pilgrim not opposing us meant that a summer offensive into northern Hainaut was a certainty unless disaster struck beforehand.

As it nearly had, with that seeded plague. We were not unexpected or unseen in our designs.

"Do either of you have anything else to add?" I finally said.

"Our armies will be headed north, to the warded fortresses of the defensive line," Hakram said. "We can afford the window of vulnerability while we replace the stone."

"Expanding the ritual repertoire of our mage cadres would be more efficient a use of their time, and the potential gains from breaking the wardstone are limited," Akua calmly replied.

I sharply nodded, fingers withdrawing from the table. As things currently stood the scrying ward was incontinent but not outright broken, so while the choice shouldn't be dragged out it did not need to be made immediately either.

"I'll have a decision by Evening Bell," I said. "Hakram, what have you got for me?"

"You intended on speaking with the soldiers and officers from the assault formation," the orc reminded me. "Assembly can be had at half an hour's notice. Reports will be coming in by the Alliance scrying network at Noon Bell, including Vivienne's. Lady Aquiline and Lord Razin seek an audience, as does the White Knight."

He paused for a beat.

"Nestor Ikaroi of the Secretariat arrived during the night as well," he added. "Along with his usual scribes. He requested audience as well, and mentioned he'd been charged with diplomatic correspondence meant for you."

My eyebrow rose. I did not ask from who – if he'd known, he would have told me – but it was not from lack of curiosity.

"I've the usual disciplinary action and assignment summaries for the Third Army for you to review," Hakram added, moving on to more mundane matters. "As well as the patrol and guard roster suggestions for the coming month."

The latter parchments could not be passed on to anyone else, since if they did not have my authority behind them those suggestions would be balked at by our rowdy collation of Proceran, Levantine and Callowan captains. They'd need another read, anyway, to see if someone had tried to favour their own again. The former, though...

"You don't need to bring me the Third Army summaries anymore," I grunted. "General Abigail doesn't need me looking over her shoulder."

He flicked a considering glance at Akua, whose face was serene as a pond as she drank from her cup of tea. I did not bother to hide my irritation at that when his gaze returned to me, and he clicked his fangs apologetically.

"I doubt she'd agree if asked," Adjutant said. "I'll see to it regardless."

I hummed, sipping at my own cup thoughtfully.

"Send for Secretary Nestor first," I decided.

The Blood could wait, it'd do them some good, and when Hanno came by for our chat I'd rather have it with a drink in hand. Past Noon Bell, then, which wasn't a bad idea anyway. Though the White Knight did not get reports the way I did, relying on the First Prince for information on that scale, he did correspond with a great many heroes who, as heroes were wont to, found out all sorts of hidden things. Often what he learned there was little better than gossip, but on occasion there was treasure buried among the dross. Akua took her leave without needing to be prompted, heading out to organize the repairs of the lesser damage on the wardstones. Though Senior Mage Dastardly was still the ranking mage of the Third Army, he was suborned to Akua's authority as the informal commander of our coalition's mage cadres. Both the Proceran wizards and the Levantine binders – those Abigail hadn't slaughtered like lambs, anyway – took orders from her as well, within certain limits.

From experience I knew Secretary Nestor Ikaroi would be awake even at this hour, as the Delosi askretis hardly ever slept even at his advanced age. I was, it had to be said, rather fond of the man. He was polite, useful and his dedication to recording history accurately bordered on being principled. It was therefore with a smile that I greeted him when Hakram ushered him into the tent, half-rising from the desk where I'd migrated before inviting him to sit across. He did so after a slight bow, the shallowness of it as much a reminder of his high status in Delos as the two stripes tattooed across each of his cheeks. One black and one blue, traditionally the highest rank one could rise to within the Secretariat.

"Queen Catherine," he greeted me. "I thank you for the audience, and twice over of your promptness in granting it."

Ikaroi's long white hair was kept in a clean ponytail and his grooming was impeccable even so early, something made clear by his turning back to gesture for an attendant scribe to approach. A scroll case was passed to the Secretary, who in turn passed it to Hakram. Considering the last time someone from the Free Cities had tried to hand me something directly it'd been an assassination attempt, that particular bit of decorum had grown on me.

"The Secretariat has proved a good friend, if not outright an ally," I replied. "It's my pleasure to return the courtesy."

I glanced at the scroll case Adjutant had taken in hand but not opened.

"Although it seems that this time we aren't to discuss the submission of questions," I added.

"In truth the Secretariat has also passed along a list of inquiries, along with making funds available to me," the blue-eyed man noted.

Good news, that. The Grand Alliance's war machine was ever hungry for coin.

"Anything interesting?" I idly asked.

"Secretary Thais stills seeks to prove her theories on the source of the Stygian Spring, so a perspective in attendance of the Violet Peace's signing has been requested," he replied.

I snorted. Secretary Thais remained convinced that a secret treaty had been signed between Nicae and Stygia beyond the officially recorded peacemaking, and that it was exactly such a secret that'd allowed the Magisterium to begin aggressive attacks against Delos and Atalante a few centuries back. That assertion had yet to have even a slight indication of being historically accurate but if the old woman was willing to sink a fortune in being proved wrong, I had no objection.

"A question on Callowan history as well, for the Annals," Nestor Ikaroi said. "Seeking to ascertain if Queen Yolanda the Stern's was a villain in metaphysical sense or a merely a political one."

I hummed thoughtfully.

"Actually, I wouldn't mind knowing that as well," I admitted.

Callowan historians still debated to this day if Yolanda the Wicked had truly been one of Below's or just Proceran-born and deeply despised, but I'd never cared much either way. It was ancient history, and not the sort I need be concerned about. On the other hand, if she'd truly been a villainous Named then it occurred to me there was precedent for one of those reigning as Queen of Callow for more than a decade. While I didn't particularly want my reign to be painted with the same brush as a woman I'd once seen written of as 'barely more popular than the plague', it could serve as the foundation for a legal argument. One that lent my rule a little more legitimacy than that of a victorious warlord. That wasn't much of an issue for me, these days – not unless I started losing battles anyway – but if I didn't want Vivienne or her successors fighting a civil in twenty years then we needed a better arguments than brute force and wearing a fancy hat.

"Usual rates, you know the drill by now. I'll be speaking with the White Knight later this evening, so I'll see when it can be done," I told Nestor. "The list?"

"Timo, if you would?" the old man asked.

The young scribe passed a neatly folded parchment to Hakram. Usually the Secretariat only sent ten questions at a time, which I'd been informed by the Jacks were the subject of much internal politicking between the upper ranks of their bureaucratic ruling class. This entire affair had begun when Hanno, early into the first Hainaut offensive, had offered during an idle conversation to use his Recall aspect in order to settle a question about the size of the armies at the Battle of Lerna as recoded in the Annals. The askretis had gone wild at the potential resource that was having access to the memories of thousands of heroes going centuries back, the Secretariat even lodging a formal request with the Grand Alliance to consult with the White Knight over historical matters only to be reluctantly informed by Cordelia that the Sword of Judgement was not hers to 'lend'.

So they'd gone to Hanno himself, who like a complete chump would have simply answered their questions whenever time allowed and thought nothing more of it. Gods, heroes. It showed most of them had never had to handle a treasury, much less fund a war. So I'd had a private word with him and we'd emerged from that conversation with practical prices in coin if the Secretariat wanted to take advantage of an opportunity that might never come to them again. Most the gold went into the Grand Alliance's coffers, because Hanno was Hanno, but I'd insisted he take a cut even if he ended up spending it on other people. These days the Delosi tended to bring the questions to me, since I was often easier to find, and strangely enough he seemed to prefer it that way. Hakram set the parchment bearing the questions aside on my commode and returned to hand me the leather scroll case after having inspected it thoroughly.

"I don't suppose you know what's in that," I asked the Delosi.

"I have my suspicions," Secretary Nestor said, "but cannot know for certain. I know only that General Basilia meant it for your hand."

Yeah, I'd thought it might be from her. The woman who'd once been Kairos Theodosian's favourite general was arguably the closest thing I – and the Grand Alliance at large – had to an ally in the Free Cities, sad as it was to say. I broke open to seal and fished out the scroll, unfurling it carefully. Though the courtesies were curt they were still present, followed by a few matter of fact sentences about her latest victories on the field. The part that caught my attention, however, was right afterwards.

"Stygia's getting involved," I summarized. "One of the Helikean patrols caught some of the Magisterium's people bringing wagons of arms onto a ship whose captain was headed for Nicae."

Secretary Nestor dipped his head, seemingly unsurprised.

"It is the Secretariat's belief that the Magisterium seeks to prolong the war as much as possible," the old man said. "So long as Basileus Leo holds the city and Strategos Zenobia holds the countryside, Nicae remains divided. It is so with General Basilia's campaigns in Penthesian lands as well. Our archivist-oracles believe they will not hinder transport of supplies so long as no decisive victory is scored, but would begin sabotage immediately if General Basilia succeeded at forcing such an engagement."

Which she hadn't, and likely wouldn't. Exarch Prodocius still held on to the throne he'd won by virtue of being the last puppet standing, but his authority hardly went beyond the walls of Penthes itself. Many towns and tributary cities had declared him usurper and unfit – moved either by genuine outrage or by the very real chance of being sacked by Helike should they not – but his control on the city-state itself and a few key fortresses had not been shaken. Malicia was propping him up, if rumours of warlock 'diplomats' having joined his court were true, but for all that he was a pawn the man was not a complete fool. General Basilia's army had chewed through every Penthesian field army sent its way and taken lesser walls, but Helike did not have the siege weaponry or mages to take the city of Penthes itself. The Exarch would remain holed up behind his tall walls with the last of his armies, trying to wait out Basilia.

"For Stygia to interfere with a supply line that passes through Delosi territory might taken by some as an act of war," I mildly said.

"The Magisterium has not done such a thing," Secretary Nestor serenely replied. "The worse that can be laid at its feet is words."

I could read between the lines. The Magisters had spoken words so the Secretariat was being forthcoming with those as well, tacitly passing information to the Grand Alliance through me. It wasn't willing to escalate any further unless Stygia did first, though, their precious neutrality remaining in place. They could have gone to the First Prince with this instead, but by going to me they could better claim to have maintained an impartial approach: General Basilia was already sending me information, and Callow's openly hostile relations with Dread Empress Malicia meant I could be said to have a legitimate stake in the war. They're not helping a foreigner against the League, I sardonically thought, they're helping Helike's almost-ally against Stygia's almost-ally. With a few added steps and tortured justifications, no doubt.

"One would think that Malicia would advise against Stygian ambitions, given the civil war she's fighting," I complained. "But it's never that simple, is it?"

"Dread Empress Sepulchral has failed to gather support beyond the initial wave," the old man shrugged. "She is a threat, to be sure, but for all her clever maneuvering she has not beaten the Legions."

"The part of those that still fight for the Tower, anyway," I replied, bit bothering to hide my relish.

Though Malicia had seized the rebel old guard of Black loyalists that'd refused to bend the knee and even crucified a few, she'd underestimated both how popular my father was with the rank and file and how badly the revelation her sorcerous mind control would be received by greenskin officers. Nearly half of the former Legions-in-Exile had deserted her service at the first opportunity. A few of those joined up with Sepulchral's armies, but most had either thrown down their weapons or joined the ever-growing camp of disaffected soldiers on the edge of the Green Stretch. While Sepulchral's – once known as High Lady Abreha Mirembe – own High Seat of Aksum had followed her into rebellion and Nok had declared for her as well, most of Praes still remained in Malicia's hands.

She'd not managed to dislodge Sepulchral, though, despite Marshal Nim's best efforts, and knowledge that the Grand Alliance had opened negotiations with the rival claimant to the Tower ought to have curbed her willingness to provoke us even through surrogates. Evidently not, though. Now if only Black would come out of the woodworks – or acknowledge he was behind Dread Empress Sepulchral, as many suspected he might be – this entire nest of snakes could be put to rest. But for some reason he'd yet to tip his hand.

"Praesi will do as Praesi have always done," Secretary Nestor said, unconcerned. "It is nothing to Delos. Yet, Queen Catherine, if I might give a word of warning?"

My eyes sharpened. Not a word the man would use lightly, that.

"I'm listening," I said.

"There are strange undercurrents in Mercantis, these days," the old man warned. "Ones even the eyes and ears of the Secretariat cannot quite parse."

I kept my dismay off my face. The City of Bought and Sold was a pack of despicable profiteers, there was no denying that, yet so far they'd known how to toe the line of how much they should attempt to profit. The wealth of Mercantis' banks and merchant lords had been instrumental in keeping the Principate's industry from collapsing as the strain of curtailed trade and heavy taxes took its toll, but the city-state was almost as useful as broker capable of obtaining materials and rarities for the Arsenal. If they turned on us now, it'd be a crippling blow. Yet I couldn't quite believe even the famously avaricious merchant lords would be this foolish. What would their gold be worth, when the Dead King was at their gates? And if they pressed us now, they had to know that should we win the Grand Alliance's fury would be a black thing to behold.

"Thank you for the advice," I said, tone forcibly calm.

I'd have to speak with Cordelia, soon. She was the foremost diplomat of the Grand Alliance, by both talent and station, and I was still astounded she'd somehow managed to talk both Atalante and Delos into allowing the Helikean armies and supply train to pass their through territory. Last I'd heard from Vivienne the First Prince was looking into bringing Strategos Zenobia into the Grand Alliance's orbit without angering her current patron General Basilia in the process, so she ought to have been keeping an eye on the region. If something was going wrong with Mercantis it was Hasenbach that'd be noticing the signs, and likely she who'd have to fix it anyway. If this was a ploy from Malicia, though, that'd make two provocations from her: Stygia's growing interventionism and trying to strike at our finances. The Tower would be, to be blunt, picking a fight. If we didn't answer her in kind she'd only grow bolder, too, and that simply couldn't be allowed. On the other hand, we could hardly afford to send an army Praes' way could we?

There was no easy answer to this, as tended to be the way when dealing with Dread Empress Malicia.

"I trouble you no longer, then, Your Majesty," the old askretis said, rising only to offer another slight bow.

"Always a pleasure, Secretary Nestor," I simply replied.

I slumped into my seat, after the old man and his attendant had left. And this, I thought, had been meant to be the pleasant part of my day. Adjutant stood in silence at my side, close but not reaching out.

"All right," I sighed, opening my eyes. "Get me those rosters, Hakram. Let's get this done before some other looming disaster appears on the horizon."

One thing at a time. It could be done, if we did it one thing at a time.

I told myself I believed that, straightened my back and got to work.

in before that one guy cries about a vote thread. He/she should really just stop reading and go away. I and many others only remember to vote bc someone says. thank you for the reminder

Big Brother

So, a (potentially) Amadeus-backed Dread Empress Sepulchral has been stirring up trouble in Praes for the past 2 years. I was wondering what had happened during the time skip.

tkjarrah

more of an intermediary chapter, but good shit nevertheless, catching up with the state of things.
the praesi situation is very interesting, especially considering how smug malicia was at the end of last book. ya done played yourself, idiot

Liliet

TBF, she's still alive.

My bar might be very low lmao

NZPIEFACE

Man, I never really understood the breadth of her authority and the value of her opinion until now.

Huh, she's damn busy.

And I think it's hilarious how Hanno just hands the paperwork to her.

I'm pretty sure the next chapter will be the two Bloods then Hanno. I'm pretty sure Hanno will bring the Apostle with him, or at least talk about her.

Mammon

Hanno's still a hero. It's pretty typical for them to just hand off any paperwork to those trustworthy and capable that are willing to accept doing it for them one way or the other, even if those people are more overworked than the hero themselves. Such is the carefree and adventure-oriented way of the hero.

Jworks

I think Hanno likes going through Catherine because it forces a conversation between him and Catherine. Hanno was randomly putting up a rock wall for someone before the time skip, he doesn't seem the type to shove the small things at others.

Liliet

Yeah he probably just likes working with Catherine.

Who has forgotten that managers also get a cut, because of course she did.

Quite Possibly A Cat

Dang, that's a good money making scheme by Cat. Best use of a heroic aspect ever.

RoflCat

To paraphrase a certain merchant's teaching:
Take what you can when you can.

Said to a young girl who would casually reveal some new innovations on a whim to her 'friends'...
Let's just say the lesson sticks and quite a lot of people get shocked by what kind of things she'll charge money for...(though to be fair she also pay for quite a few things nobody ever thought of 'buying')

Halinn

What's that a reference to?

Ascendance of Bookworm

A series that start out similar to watamote in that it's not very enjoyable, but gets better if you can survive reading it. And yet it's these early parts that make you really appreciate how much the character change down the line.

delspaig

Eh, it's even older and simpler than all that. "If you're the best at what you do, never do it for free."

Cicero

Ascendance of A Bookworm.

Basically a librarian who loves books is killed when an earthquake buries her under books. Five years into her reincarnated life, a life threatening fever awakens memories of her past life. She immediately begins looking for books, only to discover that she now lives in a world that doesn't have the printing press, she is a peasant, and her father is considered highly literate for his status because he can read and write people's names. A sheet of paper and a bottle of ink cost months worth of salary, and to top it off there is no running water, the toilet is a chamber pot, and shampoo does not exist.

Thus of course she decides to try to recreate various medium for writing books while also trying to improve sanitation and food on the side. Which means she'll have to obtain an apprenticeship as a merchant, despite her father being a soldier, and her mother a dyer. In most reincarnation stories this would be a piece of cake, but poor Myne has reincarnated into a realist world, where things just are not that easy.

Think of it as a mashup between "Spice and Wolf" and "Dr. Stone," only where the protagonist is merely well read and has a lot of generalist knowledge, but no real specialized knowledge and so has to figure things out by trial and error. A lot of trial and error.

More specifically, the writing is very good. The characterization is amazing, some of the very best I've ever read. Even supporting characters feel like they are real people living their own stories that happen to be interacting with our protagonist. Plot develops slowly, which puts off some people, but it always feels like the plot is developing very naturally and organically, without anything happening specifically for a plot purpose. One of my favorite light novel series, three volumes have been released in English so far.

RoflCat

>Five years into her reincarnated life, a life threatening fever awakens memories of her past life.

Actually, the implication given was that the five years old girl DIED from that fever and her soul came to inhabit the body and 'revive' her.

>her father is considered highly literate for his status because he can read and write people's names

Wasn't it the peddler-turned-soldier who was literate? I think most people can at least read numbers since they'd need to know that to know the price of things in the market.

Cicero

Well, I don't want to get into the debates on the subject of Myne's reincarnation, as it would require spoilers, but, actually as I described it is more accurate. Though, I suppose it may depend on your point of view.

Also, yes, the peddler turned soldier is literate, at the same time Myne's father is introduced to us as being able to read and write people's names, which in Myne's new world is considered literate for his position. Informing us that most of the general populace can read numbers, a few can read and write names, and only those that require it for their jobs (such as merchants) are literate according to our standards.

A clause in the first sentence at first looks mis-aimed, but turns out not to be. "That sounds like it was lightning-struck to her specifications... oh wait, it was". 😊 But it could be phrased to avoid the garden path: "... which I'd had carved to my specifications, from Ashuran cedar twice-struck by lightning...".

she'd somehow managed to talk both Atalante and Delos into allowing the Helikean armies and supply train to pass their through territory.

Switch the order of their and through.

If Amadeus is backing Sephulcral, it's only so that he can kill her, along with all the other Wasteland nobles. Remember, that's been the core of his plan to fix Praes from the beginning.

Mammon

So same old same old for Praes, no? Black planning to backstab her once she's no longer needed is hardly new for .

Mammon

Apparently the shift+comma shift+dot symbols result in not showing anything at all. I said, hardly new for ..fill in any and every Praesi noble..

Mental Mouse

You need to use HTML entities where opening a tag would be possible:

<something> becomes <something>. Likewise > where closing a tag would be possible. And & where an ampersand could start an HTML entity.

superkeaton

Huh. Neat.

Javvies

Well, that's a nifty use of Recall.

Huh ... I wonder what happens if Hanno Recalls a Mage Named – can he use their magics?

Hmm.

Dread Empress Sepulchral. Interesting name.

Nah, Amadeus isn't particularly behind her. Though he might have informed her that he wasn't backing Malicia anymore. He's behind her to the extent that she can bleed Malicia and the remaining High Lords.

But this is Amadeus, who thinks all the High Lords would be improved by being made a head shorter, so I doubt he's going to help put an actual High Lord on top of the Tower.

Plus, he knows Cat heard the Tower's song – he might be trying to set things up such that the way will be clear for Cat to take charge of Praes in order to annex it into Callow.

Or maybe Malicia managed to capture Amadeus and he's been secretly disappeared into her custody.

Konstantin von Karstein

Hanno cannot use the magic he Recall, and cannot remember High Arcana either.

Wonder

I don't think Ranger will let Malicia get her hands on Black again.

Raved Thrad

I'm actually surprised that Black and Hye have been quiet for so long. Ranger doesn't strike me as the patient, plotting kind.

Raved Thrad

Ok this "your comment is awaiting moderation" shit is now just seriously pissing me off.

Liliet

You gotta wonder what the fuck would have happened, yeah 0.0

Sun Dog

Not exactly. Hanno doesn't have the gift for sorcery, but RECALL lets him gain some academic knowledge of its workings, and he can ape the Aspects of those he uses Recall on. Some of these Aspects might touch on Sorcery, like the Bumbling Conjuror's CAST or Warlock's IMBRICATE, which would theoretically make him a temporary caster. But he would lose that ability when he let it go.

At the end of last book, he and Cat were chatting about how to cheese RECALL, we didn't see the whole conversation, just when he admits that he forgets High Arcana pretty much instantly and Cat expressed envy for his ability to snoop, spy and learn long-dead languages.

Liliet

Any source on aping their Aspects? I got the impression it was JUST skills and knowledge, which includes generic Name tricks.

Aotrs Commander

"Senior Mage Dastardly."

I don't remember if he has been mentioned before, but... I cannot be the only one who read that and had an incredibly delightful mental image.

Please tell me that he and his immediate subordinates are specialists in attempting to disrupt enemy communications...

Liliet

Dastardly did come up before! In Sarcella, probably. The name delighted everyone back then too 😊

KageLupus

Every time he comes up it reminds me of the early books in the Malazan series. Everyone has heard stories of Nefarias Bredd, a heavy infantryman that killed fifty raiders in a single night and could carry a horse by himself. Nobody has ever actually met him though...

Shikkarasu

Once or twice, but only post-timejump. I'm looking forward to more details about them.

Shoddi

Senior Mage Dastardly was mentioned by General Abigail to Catherine in "Interlude: Beheld I".

Liliet

000000H I LIKE THIS CHAPTER VERY MUCH.

First: Catherine)= She's so good at all of this and doing so much and she's so tired. At least she's got that home for Indrani to come to that she'd wanted, even if it's portable and doesn't have a fireplace specifically, at the moment :3

God damn, that table. 'Drani's got a home and a family indeed ♥

Catherine as Hanno's agent in selling the mundane use of his Aspect is as beautiful as it is hilarious. They were truly made for one another.

Also: a border between eras. What was forgotten is being recalled, ancient knowledge being unearthed. Nothing that ever belonged to heroes is truly lost, for now. In a world defined by status quo, Recall signifies... a change.

The Free Cities situation is pleasantly only a little on fire! They're vaguely friendly and helping, which is quite excellent of them.

Praes has not in fact been eaten by a demon of absence! Although Amadeus is... that joke theory about him getting the Name of Bard and going around singing rebellion, to everyone's confusion, is no longer quite so joke-sounding. It sure is nice to know we missed nothing of import on that front for the two years :3

...but seriously, what the fuck. I'm not buying he's backing Abreha, except as a very temporary and local alliance. What the fuck is he planning / where the fuck is he stuck?

Interesting dynamics between Akua and Hakram. Drinking tea together (remember when Catherine was APPALED at how pricey it was? Yeah...), teasing, but odd undercurrents when Cat goes with Akua's suggestion about Abigail?

That said also, poor Abigail ;u; she's going to have to actually do her job and not have Catherine do it for her now! About fucking time, and her worst nightmare. RIP

Shikkarasu

Maddie is backing no-one. He doesn't have the station or the Name to do so from behind the scenes, he would need to announce his support for it to mean anything. I think he's waiting in the shadows and will assassinate someone later this book, declaring himself Dread Emperor something-or-other (please, please, please Benevolent)

Also, Hakram won't drink tea from Nok. Nauk loved tea (even if he thought that drinking leaf water was a particularly human thing to do). I don't know what the difference between the pronunciations are, but head-cannon mourning is confirmed.

Mental Mouse

"Head-canon": Enshrining it as scripture in your head.

"Head-cannon": BOOM!

MagnaMalusLupus

Excellent chapter, but I've got to wonder what's happening with the Hellhound and her scribe. We haven't gotten any mention of them in a long while unless I'm missing something.

Liliet

Juniper should be fine, considering Abigail's just in the Third Army again (and apparently refusing to even take responsibility for that much, rip ;u;)

Daniel E

Interesting stuff. Even if this book wasn't setup to showcase the climatic confrontation between Alliance & DK, the fact that everyone agrees that the Alliance is at or near its' peak potential would have me in favor of the all-out balls to the wall offensive. Coy defense is definitely the best way to start, but a war of attrition against a foe like Dead King is just silly. Human factors aside, Akua made the best point about him having a millennia of tricks, so trying to match him 1 to 1 is futile.

On a completely different note to start the weekend, still insanely curious about the thing that Dead King claims Kairos saved them from.

Frivolous

I wonder who Malicia crucified. i hope Grem is still alive. It would be a horrible waste if the greatest military mind in the Dread Empire got whacked.

I also agree with those above who have chortled at Malicia's civil war. I love that she's in trouble for all her arrogant assumptions that she'd pulled the Dread Empire from the brink of disaster.

I've been having dirty thoughts about Hanno's Ride aspect. Can Ride be used during sex?

As a corollary, I dearly hope that there is, somewhere out there, a hero (or more likely a villain) with an aspect of Fuck.

Burlyraven

I wonder what the odds are on that table becoming a true artifact? A bit harder to transport than a cloak, but it is a labor of love by a Named.

Mental Mouse

Eh – no mention of anyone using magic on it, and Archer's abilities don't seem relevant. The Cloak started out magical, then Cat added trophies from Arcadia, a soul, and possibly some Winter and/or Night mojo along the way. Let alone what Sve Noc might have done to it while she was reborn.

Ιούλιος Καίσαρας

What Mental Mouse mentioned plus ot really doesn't have any story weight nor a brand recognition to the public as the cloak.

It has been made for a specific purpose and it serves it well but untill now nothing more.

I thing the Yew stick she carries has much more of a potential.

- Offered by a Good King's spirit instead of a sword

- Death association

- More death association because it's carried by a (part)

Deothaine

- Quite visible to the masses

Burlyraven

Eh, the yew staff isn't going to last much longer. It was partially a symbol of her refusing to buy back in to the Name game, so if/when she's forced back in (which is looking like it's going to be soon), it's a goner. We've already seen hints of this in recent chapters.

And I don't remember it ever being said that artifacts needed magic to spark them. The proffered lore seemed to suggest that they were just objects that had been dragged into a Name's story groove deep enough to gather some power of their own.

Liliet

Yeah. I'm onboard with the 'artifact table' theory. If Indrani can carve a table (that is, by implication, sturdier than the previous ones Catherine had?) she probably can extend it to some supernatural-adjacent craftsmanship too. Like how her woodcraft extended to finding paths into Arcadia.

Chapter 8: Stanchion

"Friendship is as a garden: taking years to flourish, unmade by a season's negligence."

– Proceran saying

Neat rows of legionaries in polished armour stood in resounding silence as Zombie passed in front of them at a trot.

The three hundred men and women making up the assault formation that'd performed so well against the zombies yesterday – for all that the small victory had since been drowned out by bitterer defeats – had already been praised by their commander, Tribune Algernon Beesbury, and even been commended by Adjutant earlier. Hakram had also taken care to speak with the rank and file, asking what about the assault formation they felt had functioned properly and not, then passed along their answers put to ink to consider. I'd taken a glance, and while I'd read it properly later my glimpse had mostly told me the legionaries were satisfied in most respects, save that they were clamouring for more hammers. The raven beaks, as they were called, tended to be better at putting down dead than the halberds even if they lacked the flexibility of the other polearms. Reconsidering the proportions of each might be in order, though if thinned by too much the halberds would lose much of their effectiveness.

I gazed at the legionaries as I rode past them, most of the helmeted faces unfamiliar to me even after holding command in Hainaut for so long. Perhaps I ought not to be surprised, as most of these soldiers came from General Hune's command and I did tend to stay with the Third Army rather than the Second. Its soldiers and officers were not as familiar to me, as much a single woman could ever be said to be familiar with an army. A few faces among these I'd seen before, if not put a name to, but it was some time before I pulled the reins to end Zombie's stride. The leathery grey-green skin I was glimpsing through the lieutenant's open helm stirred my memory, as did the vivid red scar cutting across the face of the orc.

"I know you," I mused. "Second Liesse?"

"Yes, Warlord," she grinned, showing teeth. "I was only a legionary, then. Fresh to the Fifteenth."

I tapped a finger below my eye, mirroring the jagged bend of the red line under hers.

"Seasoned now," I replied approvingly. "That was made by wight teeth or I'll eat my hand, Lieutenant..."

"Gunborg," she proudly said, "of the Howling Wolves Clan."

Hakram's clan, that, and Marshal Grem One Eye's as well. She must have been in one of the last batches of recruits we got from the Steppes before the Empress stripped the Fifteenth of its recruitment rights.

"One of them slipped in below my shield and bit me, Warlord," Lieutenant Gunborg said, then grinned nastily. "But I bit back."

I couldn't help but grin in answer. There was something about that iron-cast martial pride that served as the backbone of the Clans that'd always rung true with me. There were parts of what came with being an orc that I'd never truly be able to understand, but the pride? I'd partaken of it eagerly, as a young girl. It'd done more to bind me to the Dread Empire than any conversation I'd ever had to Malicia.

"Looks like you got the better end of that trade, lieutenant," I laughed. "But polish your shieldwork a bit, would you? When I see you make captain, I'd prefer you not to be missing any bits."

"You have my oath, Warlord," she solemnly assured me.

With a last chuckle I set Zombie back to her walk, passing the rest of the full first rank without seeing another old comrade. At the end of the line Tribune Beesbury was waiting, a young dark-haired man with surprisingly gentle brown eyes. With the pretty curls and the delicate face, he looked more like a poet than an officer of my armies. Until one got a look at the callouses on his hands, anyway: those didn't come from quillwork.

"Tribune Beesbury," I said, pitching my voice so it could be heard as far as the back. "I appointed you to lead these assault companies while knowing little of you, because you were warmly recommended to me by General Hune and endorsed by Hakram Deadhand."

I let a moment pass.

"You have lived up to every word spoken in your praise," I said.

Though he had good mastery of his face, for one his age, he was no courtier. The flush of pleasure and brightened eyes let me know of his thoughts even as he tried to keep them from showing.

"You do me honour, Your Majesty," Tribune Beesbury replied.

I shook my head.

"You do us all honour," I said, voice rising as I turned to the assembled legionaries. "Assault formations like yours were untested, until yesterday, but you fought with prowess that cannot be denied. Not a single fatality!"

I roared out the last sentence and got a roar back in return. It was not as great a victory as I was making it sound, in truth, since zombies were the least of the dead and numbers had only been slightly larger on Keter's side. There'd been a score wounded, and without the House Insurgent there would have been two dead, but the performance had still been very promising. Enough that I was willing to invest time and coin into training legionaries in this method of making war even if was not backed by another ruler in the effort. I raised a hand and the cacophony went down, leaving me free to speak again.

"As a reward for your conduct in yesterday's skirmish, I've ordered ale and meat rations be opened to all of you for supper," I called out. "You sent the dead back to their graves, legionaries – fill your bellies tonight, and dream of doing it again!"

Cheers filled the air again, even louder than last time, and my name was even called out by some. It wasn't my finest bit of speaking, truth be told, but I'd given so many of these speeches lately I couldn't even remember how many this made. They couldn't all be fresh and stirring. Besides, ale and meat would get people cheering even if they'd come with a sermon instead of the praise I'd freely doled out. A celebration, even a small one, ought to lift some of the pall of uncertainty that'd fallen over the camp since yesterday. Hanno had caught the Enemy in time, so spirits had not taken too hard a hit, but the revelation of the existence of shapeshifting ghouls had everyone distrustful and uneasy. I had a word with the senior officers of the formation, committing names and faces to memory, but did not linger long. Razin and Aquiline ought to have been sent for by now, unless Hakram had lost his touch, so I passed Zombie's reins to a legionary and limped back to my tent.

The first hint that something was off came in the shape of a full line of legionaries whose pauldrons bore a distinctive scorched mark in the shape of a skeletal hand. Adjutant's personal command, those, grown from a single tenth when I was still the Squire to a full cohort of two hundred now. The sight of them around camp was hardly unusual, but that twenty would be standing almost skittishly around my tent most definitely was. The lieutenant in charge saluted when I approached and I hobbled up to him, about to ask the reason for this reinforced guard when my tent's entrance curtain was parted open. Hakram strolled out, leathery face offering up only forced calm.

"There has been a misunderstanding, Catherine," Adjutant said. "If you'd only give me a few moments I'll-"

My pulse quickened. Not from danger, but from something else I couldn't quite parse yet. I'd been meant to sit with the Blood, hadn't I? There were only so many people from their corner of the world that my second be struggling to prevent my talking with.

"Hakram," I blandly interrupted. "Who's in the tent?"

His face fell into an apologetic grimace, head angling to the side in an unconscious display of apology. Without another word I passed by him, staff forcing aside the curtain, and I felt my fingers clench in a spasm. Around the table Indrani was still carving me, four people were seated. Lord Razin Tanja and Lady Aquiline Osen were those who'd requested audience of me, but the other two were uninvited guests. The Barrow Sword's presence I had no real issue with. Ishaq might insist on continuing to wear the ancient bronze scale suit for reasons dubious to me, but the equally bronze sword he'd stolen from an old barrow along with the armour was a vicious piece of work especially well-suited to dealing with Revenants. The way he was rather easy on the eyes – though I remained skeptical of beards, even well-groomed ones – and had been a solid partisan of mine since we'd established the pecking order meant I tended to be well-inclined towards him.

Oh, he was still a ruthless and largely amoral bastard who'd once tried to kill me just for the perks it'd earn him among his people. Yet, compared to some of the villains I had to deal with, he was agreeably straightforward in his intentions. It was the last of the four that had my lips thinning in barely mastered anger. The Valiant Champions' name was, I'd been told, Rafaella. I'd never used it before, and did not intend to ever start. Short and stocky with a long braid going down her back, the Champion was the savage sort of cheerful that I might have appreciated in someone who hadn't fucking skinned Captain and worn her fur as a cape. My eyes flicked towards the tanned 'heroine', who gazed back without either fear or embarrassment.

"Walk out of this tent," I ordered in Chantant, tone eerily calm.

Hakram entered behind me and I could almost feel him wincing as Lady Aquiline opened her mouth.

"Queen Catherine, she is here at our-"

I'd coddled those kids too much, hadn't I? I must have been for them to be so fucking unafraid. Night flooded my veins, singing back eagerly to the call of my boiling anger. The sprite-lanterns hanging from the strips of cloth crisscrossing my tent's ceiling shone bright in the deepening shadows that swallowed everything between them, the enchanted braziers flickering as if touched by wind. A small ball of air formed above my palm, spinning, and Aquiline Osená gasped at the absence of the breath I'd just taken from her. My eyes never left the Champion.

"Walk," I softly repeated, "out of this tent."

She did not want to. Anyone with eyes could have seen that. I'd not been deft or delicate in my dismissal, and for a woman as proud as she it would rankle to have to obey. But she was in my tent, and an uninvited guest, so with a scowl the Valiant Champion got to her feet. She strode out, heading to my right since to my left Adjutant was silently standing. As she passed me, I spoke up again.

"Don't forget my warning," I murmured without looking at her. "If you ever wear that cloak again, even far from this camp, I'll know."

She left the tent without giving reply, showing she was not entirely a fool. The Barrow Sword's soft, pleased laughter escorted her out. I loosened my grip on my anger, the shadows that'd swallowed up the tent fading, and crushed the ball of breath within my fist. Lady Aquiline gasped out, her voice returned to her. Razin eyed me with open anger, hands falling to his sword, and whatever ire might have been found in his gaze was matched twice over by what lay in Aquiline's.

"You struck at-" she began.

"Bring Named into my tent uninvited again, Osená," I softly interrupted, "and you'll have to crawl on your belly to wherever Tariq's hiding for healing, your severed feet hanging around neck. Do you understand me?"

They both looked at me with fear and surprise. I'd been too soft on the pair of them, I thought, and now familiarity had bred contempt. They were in dire need of a reminder of who exactly they were dealing with.

"I asked," I hissed out, "do you understand me?"

The Lady of Tartessos' tanned face paled, as much from humiliation as fear.

"I understand, Queen Catherine," she replied through gritted teeth.

But the point hadn't quite sunk in, I mused. Maybe being made to stand for the rest of the audience would do them some good, or –

"Catherine," Hakram murmured in Kharsum. "There is discipline, and there is insult. Only one is warranted."

I breathed out shallowly. He was right, of course he was right. There was no point to further turning the knife in the wound save that vicious little twinge of satisfaction it'd give me. And that was no reason to do anything at all. I let the sudden fury that'd seized me flow out and limped around the table, going towards the head. Hakram pulled out my seat for me and I sat with my staff propped up against my shoulder, eyeing the lot of them a tad more calmly.

"Ishaq," I said, turning my steady stare to the Barrow Sword. "You, at least, ought to have known better than to bring Named uninvited into the quarters of a villain."

"I was unaware until the last moment," the bearded warrior replied, grinning crookedly. "Could have warned them, true, but then I wouldn't have gotten to see that."

He gestured a calloused hand the direction the Champion had left. Considering the Barrow Sword and Levantine heroes fought like cats and dogs whenever they were in the each other's vicinity, I had no trouble whatsoever believing he'd kept silent just to see me expel the other woman from my tent. I grunted, unamused, and turned my gaze back to the two Dominion aristocrats. They were both glaring at the villain, though that rolled off like water from a duck's back.

"You asked for an audience," I said, tone still clipped. "You have it. Speak."

"We come today to speak of the Barrow Sword," Lord Razin said, not bothering to hide his irritation towards the man in question. "Who has, once more, petitioned the Majilis and the Holy Seljun for his deeds to be recorded by the rolls."

The rolls were one of those peculiarities in the way the Dominion of Levant treated its Named. While there were highborn among the Levantines who were aristocrats purely because of their ancestry, they were ultimately all descended from Named and to their people that was the very source of being highborn. Coming into a Name would see one immediately raised to nobility, though like everywhere else on Calernia there were nobles and then there were nobles. There wasn't a lot of difference between someone like the Painted Knife and, say, a Callowan landed knight or a baronet. Often merchants were wealthier in everything but largely decorative privileges.

Bestowed, as they called their Named, were always either associated to one of the already existing lineages or, when unprecedented, entered in the rolls as the founder of their own line of the Blood. The rolls themselves, aside from serving as records of such lineages in 'Blood and Bestowal', held records of all the great deeds of Levantine Named. Those who were not villains, anyway, at least in theory. I personally believed that a few villains had slipped through the cracks by virtue of not openly keeping to Below or being tied to an originally heroic lineage in some way. It might even go deeper than that: some of the things I'd read had been done by the Vengeful Brigand, one of their founding heroes, had been genuinely nasty in a way not often seen out of the Wasteland.

The issue here, though, was that Ishaq was openly a villain. While undeniably Bestowed, he was effectively demanding he be made a noble by a country keeping to Above, one where men like him were expected to be the proving grounds of more honourable lines and nothing else. In other times he'd be laughed out of the room or ignored, should he not instead find the Grey Pilgrim politely knocking at his door one evening, but times were changing. The Llesse Accords stipulated that being a villain was not inherently a crime and, though the members of the Grand Alliance had not yet signed the Accords, the Truce and the Terms were widely seen as prelude and trial to their implementation.

It had been Cordelia Hasenbach's own notion to keep the two separate so that mistakes in one would not taint the other before it was implemented. I suspected I might have come to resent how damnably clever that woman was, if it weren't so damnably useful.

"Interesting," I mildly said. "Yet also a matter for the Dominion of Levant to resolve."

I mostly liked the Barrow Sword but I wasn't going to meddle in the brutal debacle that was Levantine politics on his behalf, much less to try to force the raising of a villain to nobility. The backlash to such an act from, well, most everyone was likely to be spectacular.

"We came to request a clarification about the Truce and the Terms," Lady Aquiline said, visibly still fuming. "And how they would apply against a decree of the Majilis."

"The Majilis voted unanimously for the Dominion to sign onto the Truce and Terms," I pointed out, frowning. "There is no conflict to be had."

"There's the trouble, Black Queen. I have been given amnesty for grave-robbing by the Terms, and my Bestowal is not itself an offence against the laws of Levant," the Barrow Sword smiled. "So by the ancient laws of the Dominion, I must be added to the rolls as the founder of the Barrow's Blood."

"Those laws were written with the understand that Below's servants would be hunted by the righteous without protection," Aquiline flatly said.

I sucked in a breath.

"The Terms bend the meaning of your laws so that you no longer have grounds to refuse him," Adjutant said, voicing my realization.

The two of the Blood nodded, while the villain leaned back in his seat with a smirk. Hence the clarification that was being requested here. They wanted me, as speaker for the villain Named of the Grand Alliance, to make it clear that the Terms couldn't force their hand.

"The Holy Seljun has expressed his intention to call the Majilis to session and change the laws to reflect the will of the Heavens," Lord Razin said. "When informed of this, the Barrow Sword-"

"The Barrow Sword told them he'd have to lodge a complaint with his representative under the Terms should the Majilis, seated halfway across the continent, try to fuck him up the ass while he's fighting in the thick of the melee against the Dead King," Ishaq said, tone hardening.

Fuck, I grimly thought. So that was why they'd come to me even though this was a Dominion matter: I'd sworn oaths under the Terms to defend the Barrow Sword and settle complaints on his behalf. It was a thorny little predicament they were bringing to me, too. On one hand, if I twisted arms for Ishaq over this then the Black Queen was intervening in the Dominion's own affairs. That was the kind of overstep that shattered coalitions. On the other hand, if I just looked away and did nothing then I was telling villains that I'd throw them under the horse the moment living up to my oaths became slightly inconvenient. That, and afterwards what Levantine villain would want to lend their power to the war if back home they were being forbidden by law the rights and privileges of other Named? Even those already fighting would think twice about keeping their oaths, if the Dominion scorned them so openly. That was the trouble, with making continent-spanning treaties: afterwards you had to deal with a continent's worth of trouble.

"To clarify," Hakram intervened, "no such complaint has been made, and no law was changed?"

"No," the Barrow Sword smilingly agreed.

"The Majilis has not yet been called," Lord Razin said. "Before the matter is to be debated, we meant to seek the insight of the Black Queen on this matter."

Meaning they wanted to know how hard I'd come out swinging for Ishaq before they made a decision that couldn't be easily walked back.

"I've also requested that a record of my deeds in Hainaut be sent to the Blood for consideration," the Barrow Sword added.

That much, at least, I had no qualms promising. Whatever the rest I'd not deny the man acknowledgement of the fierceness he'd fought against Keter with.

"That will have been put to ink and bear personal seal by dawn tomorrow," I said, flicking a meaningful glance at Hakram.

He'd be the one to write it, after all. From the rueful look in his eyes he'd understood my meaning perfectly.

"The Valiant Champion was meant to speak on this matter for Bestowed of the Dominion," Lady Aquiline told me, defiantly. "Before she was so unreasonably sent away."

"If Levantine heroes are to have a say in this dispute, that is a Dominion matter," I coldly replied. "Under the Terms, my interlocutor is the White Knight. I owe not an inch beyond that."

"How pettily you complain of another's trophy, while wearing many yourself," the Lady of Tartessos mocked.

Razin threw her an anguished look but said nothing. Trophies? Oh, I did wear those. Banners on my back and once, only once, I'd snatched the soul of a fallen foe who'd butchered an entire city in her folly. What I'd not done was mutilate the corpse of a fallen foe, made a wolf fur cloak of the woman who'd first taught me how to use a shield and – I breathed out. Sabah, Sabah had deserved better. Of all the Calamities, she'd deserved better.

"You get one warning, Osená," I quietly said. "Test me on this again and you will not enjoy what follows."

I met her gaze, the dark eyes so defiant, and did not blink. They'd been allowed too much leash, these two, and I'd be glad to see the back of them when next I met Tariq. But until then, they'd learn meekness again even if it had to be beaten back into their bones. Razin said something in one of the Levantine languages, tone flat, and only then did Aquiline of the Slayer's Blood look away.

"Your audience is at an end," I said.

Razin, often the deftest of the two when it came to matters like this, simply inclined his head.

"We can resume the discussion when a record of deeds has been written and the White Knight's insight has been sought," the Lord of Malaga replied.

In the same sentence establishing that nothing had been settled and that under the Terms they had someone to bring into this as well if I came out too hard on the Barrow Sword's side. He was turning into a decent hand at that, I mused. Being surrounded by people who usually dwarfed him in power and influence had taught him something of subtlety, smoothed away some his rawness.

"A good day to you, Lord Razin, Lady Aquiline," Hakram gravelled, standing at my side.

I blandly smiled and said nothing, letting them speak their own courtesies before leaving. The Barrow Sword made to do the same but I discreetly shook my head. I took a long look at Ishaq Deathless when he sat back down, allowing the silence to linger. With that tanned skin, strong brow and a thick – if well-maintained – beard he was a fine instance of what I'd been told was classic Alavan looks. He was broad-shouldered as an orc and not much taller than me, with for sole warpaint two long streaks of ash grey just below pale brown eyes. I'd seen him in a shirt, where the muscles under that armour had been well-moulded instead of tucked away, and I was honest enough with myself to admit I might have taken him to bed once or twice by now if he'd not been under my command and so brazenly ambitious. From his occasional lingering look I doubted it would have been all that difficult to talk him into it either.

"Your people have this saying, you told me," I said. "Kick a barrow, die stupid?"

He looked highly amused.

"Kick a barrow, die a fool," the dark-haired villain replied, half-grinning.

"That's the one," I agreeably said, then narrowed my eyes. "Ishaq, don't go around kicking barrows when we're in the middle of a war for the right to keep breathing."

"You swore oaths, Black Queen," he reminded me, carefully.

"The Truce and Terms are a vessel to help gather Named to fight the Dead King," I said. "If the ambitions one of those Named threaten that cause, the Terms have failed in that purpose."

"I'm not asking them for land, or for right of rule," the Barrow Sword protested. "I ask that my deeds not fall into obscurity simply because I do not kneel at the altar of the Ashen Gods."

"And I think that's fair," I told him. "I really do."

All else aside, if a villain was rendering a service to Grand Alliance they were due the same recognition a hero would get for those deeds. Of course, fair only went so far in this world.

"So because I've grown passing fond of you, Ishaq," I continued, tone casual, "I'll tell you right now: if I have to choose between you and eighty thousand Dominion soldiers, you are going die tragically fighting Keter."

I'd not raised my voice in the slightest, yet the hardened killer almost flinched. I smiled amicably at him.

"Ambition is a virtue, when tempered by restraint," I said. "We understand each other, yes?"

"We do, Black Queen," the Barrow Sword soberly replied.

Vinegar had been served, so the other hand must offer honey.

"Good," I nodded. "Then I'll have the record of your laudable efforts in Hainaut written up and lean on the White Knight to have it confirmed independently by heroes. If it still looks like they're being unreasonable, I'll personally take this to the Grey Pilgrim."

His expression brightened, and I could only think of the way Wasteland villains would eat the poor bastard alive. Ishaq wasn't stupid by any means, he was just... uncomplicated. He took what he could, retreated in the face of superior force and saw absolutely nothing wrong in either thing. There was a soothing clarity to that way of living I sometimes envied.

"Then I take my leave, Black Queen," the Barrow Sword smiled. "I thank you for your time."

"Keep putting down Revenants and my door's always open," I smiled back. "Fair days, Ishaq."

"Fair nights, Black Queen," the villain replied.

I waited until he'd left before letting out a long sigh. I slumped back into my seat and closed my eyes.

"So?" I asked Hakram.

"You went too hard on Aquiline," Adjutant assessed. "I know why you did, but now she'll feel she's been dishonoured until she gets some sort of victory over you. We both know that your patience is going to run out on that."

It would, which meant I'd probably have to serve her up a meaningless win over something to soothe her wounded pride. Considering I was less than well-inclined towards Aquiline Osenia at the moment, that prospect did not fill me with enthusiasm. What had she done, to deserve this from me?

"It's not the same, Hakram," I said. "The Mantle, and that abomination the Champion wore."

A beat of silence.

"Levantine take trophies," the orc said. "Especially from famous foes. It is part of who they are as a people. I expect if she could have taken armour instead of fur, she would have."

I opened my eyes, stirred to anger once more.

"But she didn't," I hissed back. "And you know that's entirely-"

He sat at my side, around the corner of the table. The chair did not creak under his weight, as Cordelia Hasenbach was not one to forget such details.

"I know, Catherine," the orc told me. "Of course I know. But I also understand that to them there is no difference, and so your anger seems frivolous to their eyes."

"Praesi highborn murder each other at the drop of a hat, Stygians practice slavery," I flatly replied. "Am I to pretend their ways are just some quaint local custom as well?"

"My people eat corpses, and sometimes the living," Hakram frankly said. "Goblins take oaths about as seriously as porridge. I would be bitterly disappointed if you only took us in because those things have yet to prick you too sharply."

That actually stung to hear, and I drew back in surprise.

"That's different," I said, "it's not..."

"It's not one of the two Calamities you've loved," Adjutant kindly finished for me. "It's not the woman who taught you to keep your shield up when you swing a sword, worn on some stranger's back."

A long moment of silence passed as I struggled with my words.

"It's not wrong, to be furious about that," I quietly replied.

"No," he agreed, "it isn't. You can carry that grudge until you die, should you want to, and you'll not be wrong."

"But the Black Queen can't?" I bitterly asked. "I don't agree with that, Hakram. Akua said something once, about wants of the woman and the needs of the queen, but no one cuts it that clean. The Praesi have tried, and it's sickened them perhaps beyond mending. I'll have no part of it."

Adjutant set against the oak the hand of bone he'd earned in my service, along with near every other wound that rent his body. It was, I thought, a statement powerful enough that it need not be spoken at all to be heard.

"I am not Akua Sahelian," Hakram said, tone almost chiding. "I swore myself to Catherine Foundling, not a Name or a crown. I've no interest in splitting my oath between your and your shadow, seen by Wasteland eyes. But I will say, Warlord, that the moment you let hate choose your path for you at last fetters were clasped around your wrist."

He bared long fangs, sharp and pale as bone.

"If you cannot tolerate the way of the world, change it," Hakram Deadhand said, sounding even now like he did not doubt for a moment that I could. "If you will not take up those arms, though, do not keep clutching them in your grasp. Creation has no patience for the half-hearted."

I leaned forward, elbows on the table as I passed tired hands through my hair.

"I'm tired, Hakram," I admitted, looking down at the half-polished wood. "I'm tired and I slipped up and just... the moment I did, the single fucking moment, a kid died. Just like that. And I'd like to think I'm not the kind of monster that would wish a fourteen-year-old kid would die just because another one did, but..."

The tall orc leaned his head against mine, softly, and said nothing. It was one of the kindest things anyone had ever done for me.

"I understand him, now," I said.

And though the anger was not on my tongue, it was even worse than that. It'd settled in my bones, in the marrow of them, and now it was a part of me. One that would never leave.

"Who?" Hakram softly asked.

"Black," I murmured. "Why even knowing he was wrong he still wanted to win. To beat them. A single breath blown on the balance of Creation, so that for just a moment you could look at it and say: this is fair. This is equal. And know that it wasn't but you made it that way."

"There's nothing at the end of that road, Catherine," Adjutant said.

"I know," I said. "Gods, I know. But every time I see their kid survives and ours dies, every time I see they get to walk around in the skin mother of three and we're in the wrong for daring to be offended by that? I understand him a little better."

In the end, though Black had wanted to even the scales by pushing down on Good. And that wasn't a victory, not really, but for all his pale skin and cold steel mind there was something about my father that was utterly Praesi: the Wasteland only ever knew victory by triumph over others. The other way, the hard way, was pushing up the other scale. And I would walk that road, that was the choice I'd made. But, I thought as my forehead pressed against the cool oak and Hakram's hand lay on my shoulder, before my feet began moving again I could... wait a while. Catch my breath. I closed my eyes, alone in my tent with the person I loved most in this world, and it was the closest I'd felt to peace in years.

It would pass, I knew. So I enjoyed it, for the little while it lasted.

I wonder and suspect that one day Catherine will simply challenge the Valiant Champion to an honor duel and exterminate her.

In other news: Really happy that Catherine is lusting after the Barrow Sword. I feel it's a pity that so far she's only had affairs with women, considering she's surrounded by so many muscular hunks of man-flesh.

Javvies

Eh, Cat isn't that big on the Levantine honour duels herself.

I suspect it's more likely that one of her allies will stab and rob Valiant Champion for her.

Sylfa

She isn't no, but she also used the words "Justification matters only to the just" for a while. When the "heroes" disregarded words of peace she dropped a lake on them. If they can't see how wearing someone's skin would be offensive then she would be okay with using the means she has at hand to teach them a lesson.

I doubt it'll get to that though, she has too much support from diplomats and schemers to need to go down that road. Also, I doubt she would actually have to skin and stuff Valiant Champion for people to realise how wearing the skin of someone could be considered disrespectful, she could just ask Razin if he would be okay with her making a cloak out of Aquiline for Barrow to wear after winning a honor duel against her. The anger he wouldn't be able to stop from welling up should be enough of a hint of why she's so angry with Champy.

Decius

The Valiant Champion has way too much power in that story. "I killed a monster, and the monster's kin challenged me to a duel over it, so I killed her too."

Better to put her in a situation where she opposes the remaining Calamities and faces a draw.

One of the things that I've noticed and is bothering me more and more, is that I don't understand what stories there are in this universe. I thought from the sword and the stone from book one that we were going to use real world stories as a baseline, but then really specific names started popping up that made me doubt that.

Names are supposed to be, from what I remember, “grooves carved into creation from repeated stories.” So how many times has someone done a “mirror knight” or a “scorched apostate.” They seem really esoteric for there to be stories about them carved into creation that they rely on. That's not to say that in universe there aren't stories that they use that we aren't privy to, but if that's the case then we are in the dark on what sorts of tropes we could be working with.

All that to say, I think the story dynamics of a duel like that can't really be known at this point. Even using our tropes as a baseline, it's entirely possible for Cat to win and it become a “student gets revenge for master” story, or a “daughter of the wolf comes back to avenge father and both kill each other” one, or even a “bloodfued/cycle of revenge” thing. There's too many tropes to pull from to make any sort of definite statement. And the longer the this story goes on, despite how well written and interesting it is, the more it becomes obvious to me that you can find an old trope from our stories to justify any outcome you want, and I don't understand why some work and others don't.

Ryan

Remember it's not about the Names it's about the Roles. The Names can change to fit the circumstances of the person who receives them But the Roles are what get carved into creation. For example these might very well be the first Scorched Apostate & Stalwart Apostle the Names would be new but the Roles would be familiar. The Role of one person in a dire situation who betrayed their faith and was punished and the one about the person who stayed faithful and was rewarded. There have probably been tons of different names who have pulled their power from a story similar to that. Sure a few Named like the Black Knight and the Grey Pilgrim get some continuity with their Names but that's only cause their specific Role kind of requires it.

You are right can pull from a large pool of Tropes when crafting your story so there is a lot of ways a duel between Catherine and VC could go but it all depends on how well they nudge those tropes to forefront that will decide what kind of story it is. The fact that Catherine is a leader in a massive coalition and VC is a valuable asset means that allowing her emotions to control her if she challenged VC to a duel would be a huge mark against her. Nudging the story in a bad direction for her.

Black Spiral Dancer

The ones that work most are the ones where a hero wins, because those stories are repeated most often by the people.

I see the outcomes as percentages (%), where the higher percentages go to those tropes more dear or most often repeated. That means in countries where evil is more culturally accepted and praised, the Evil Names would sprout more often and Good names less, because the common people usually repeat, listen or know better the tropes where evil has won. On the other hand, places like Procer only allow Evil names to sprout usually as a part of a greater story where good wins in the end.

etc, etc.

Liliet

From my understanding, Names are made from pre-existing cultural archetypes like puzzle pieces. Every story is different, and that's fine; we still understand that the Prince in Cinderella story is basically the same role as in Snow White's story, even if the specific things they do are different. So that, metaphorically speaking, gives us a Cinderella Prince Role and a Snow White Prince Role; they're both Princes but there's hair-splitting going on.

A Role can be new as a specific Role; as long as people say 'oh yeah she's the black queen / oh yeah she's a black queen' and understand exactly what they mean (and it's a conclusion from what's actually happening, as opposed to being simply inaccurate) – it's Name-generating.

ninegardens

I'm going to agree on the Name thing.

The feel I got in books 1-3 is that the names EE used really felt... well like Names carved into creation. "Black Knight" "Warlock" "The Shining Prince" "Tyrant" "Thief" "Grey Pilgrim" etc.

Every time I look at those I nod and think "Yes, this makes sense."

"The Valiant Champion" "The bumbling conjurer", okay, yes, sure, this also seems pretty legit. Not as legit, but close enough.

And then... "The Mirror knight", "The painted knife" "The kingfisher prince" "The bitter blacksmith" and (admittedly) "Adjutant" I go....

Ummm... okay? I guess that's a thing?

Basically, it feels like the essentially sensible premise has been stretched so as to accommodate a story which needs more super heroes. Which is... well, fair enough. If that's what the story needs, I'm happy for EE to do what's needed. But it still feels like a stretch.

(To be fair, "Scorched Apostate" probably falls in category two for me. Its not in the A+ story pile, but still seems pretty legit).

therealgridlock

Well the point of it is not the names, which of course are going to be silly, they're all latin and french, but the stories.

The story of the adjutant is someone so good at their job they almost have a... You could call it... Supernatural ability? 😊

The point is it takes the trope of naruto characters fighting so fast no one else can see it and turn it on its head.

For every fantasy book that describes someone as being almost supernaturally fast, or reflexes faster than humans, etc etc, that's one more slice through the narrative fabric for those people having those powers. If throughout all of time (for untold millennia) people are so good at fighting, and play out the same stories, that it's almost uncanny? Well the next one is just that much closer to actually being supernatural.

We just see the end result of this system, where everything has been codified into common rules.

"Oh yeah, they started a pattern of three, win, draw, loss, always goes like that, don't you read, like, books, man?"

"They have three aspects, three things they're good at" etc etc. (This is probably just DM limitations for balance tbh)

Every time a right hand man is really good at FIND ing things (and i have no idea whether that html tag worked or not) it adds to the narrative weight of that "find" aspect.

It's why Cat starts off with Learn as the squire, their first job is usually just to learn how to do their job, and how many books have you read where main character doofus learns so fast, or catches on with preternatural speed, or they're a natural talent at whatever? That's literally adding narrative weight to the power.

You can almost completely ignore the "name" of the name, and look entirely at what story they play out, what story created them, what stories they create, and what they do with their time.

Masego was just an apprentice warlock, good at studying, pretty alright with magic, right? Except they kept having him do harder and harder stuff, he kept having to dissect more and more miracles, he kept seeing more and more stuff showing him the other side of the veil, until finally he literally glimpsed the bits beyond and the sheer story weight burned out his eyes (also, summer fairies) and also allowed him to make cool new ones with dark vision and 360 vision. Bet he can't be flanked. His aspects all revolve around Witnessing events that show great truths about stuff, Ruining the best laid plans of the enemy, and Wrestling their tools away from them to be used by someone better at the craft. In some ways he might be better than warlock simply because he can do pantheon magic that the warlock couldn't really come close to. Shoot, his own dad became a god briefly, and his other dad became a real boy briefly. Masego has enough story weight to craft any kind of story out of that he wants. He's absolutely brimming with protagonist energy, and that's what this world runs on.

They talked about it a lot with the grey pilgrim, he is literally the party DMNPC, always swooping in to save the idiot who got in over his head and fought 15 bugbears at level 1, the weight of his passage through the story is both a representation of the cumulative weight and power of the "protective old guy" and his own actions in saving so many lives.

I for one wanna know what Kairos saw. I hope it was the audience.

Sylfa

As others have said: it's the story that matters most, not the name. But also I think it's only part of the name that matches the "groove". So not "mirror knight" but "knight", not "bumbling sorcerer" but "bumbling", not "scorched apostate" but "apostate". The other half of the name is important as well but has more to do with how the named see themselves and in what way they are unique. There are exceptions though since "gray pilgrim" always appear to be "gray", for instance.

It's also worth noting that Adjutant is quite powerful as a named even though it's a new name and both Thief and Black Knight were quite weak in their name powers despite having old names. Both had strong points but were overall quite weak compared to other named.

I think it's both a matter of how strongly they fit their role as well as how much faith or belief they have: Adjutant practically lives for his role, but Black Knight was more of a Emperor/Chancellor in behaviour, or even a General. Thief lost her faith quite early on in her role and Gray Pilgrim has never stopped believing in his role, even during the worst time of his life. Gray Pilgrim also has an entire country believing in him, along with a choir – if that matters. Adjutant has Cat's absolute faith and the admiration of all the tribes for being the first orc Named in ages.

Earl of Purple

Played right, that story might kill the Champion. "You killed my relative. I'm here to avenge her." The story that heroes always use, when a villain kills their loved one(s).

But Cat's not the one who could pull that story effectively- she's too far removed from the narrative weight, as the adopted daughter of Sabah's best friend. One of Sabah's children, though? A new person taking up the mantle of the Cursed? They might be able to pull it off.

caoimhinh

I would think it's rather more likely that Raphaella challenges Catherine to a duel, once she is fed up with this situation.

And yeah, Cat has mentioned a lot that she is bisexual and is constantly ogling at men too, despite her only sexual partners in the last seven years been women (and only 2, in fact). But I guess the matter that's more important is that, despite Catherine liking to leer, she actually only beds people who she truly likes, hence her few partners so far (and Indrani had to insist a lot plus have her in a dark cave for months before she managed to bed Cat).

Personally, I would prefer it if she just went back with Kirian. Their break up was absurd in my opinion, and Cat should have long been over her initial apprehension towards what Kirian wanted to do (and as far we know never did, because she valued Cat's opinion on the matter, despite Cat breaking up with her for just suggesting it). It's also a waste of such good character to have her simply disappear after she is no longer girlfriend of the MC.

Liliet

The problem with Cat/Killian was that Killian wanted simply more attention from Catherine. Killian was willing to put Cat above other things in her life, and wanted to; she wanted a primary relationship. And Catherine did not have space for one and wasn't willing to make space.

So no, I don't think they should get back together. Killian deserves someone who'll give her what she wants, not being relegated to secondary while she wants to be primary.

It's not actually about Cat.

therealgridlock

I for one am saddened she didn't try the obvious solution: communication and talking about your problems.

I mean, all it would take to heal the divide between Cat and Raf would be Cat sitting down with Raf over a nice cuppa and telling her about the mother of three, the best friend, her first swords teacher, the loyal companion,

Because once Rafaella sees her as a person? She will admit that she was a human, and not a monster, and that she was wrong. Not to kill her, she had her job, but to disgrace her, and disrespect the person she had been to so many people.

Once Rafaella sees what she did was wrong, was bad, not Evil, but bad, she will feel sorry and then Cat and Raf can make up. Hell, she might even apologize to black and Raf's husband and kids. I dunno.

I feel like pointing at akua and saying "tu coque" isn't quite the same thing, because captain was a human who occasionally turned into a monster, had the misfortune of being on the wrong side in a war, and occasionally did monstrous things. Akua has no such benefit, she was a monster, trained psychopath, who took dying to realize what it means to have a friend. Let that sink in. A human with a bit of monster, vs a monster with a tiny, itty bitty speck of human that took literal nose-rubbing in morality to find.

Not to mention akua is still alive and wasn't skinned for the cape. Captain gets no such benefits.

Anyone with the intelligence to outsmart the Bard should have enough intelligence to be able to talk about their feelings.

Earl of Purple

I don't think this would work. The reason why Rafaella skinned Captain was to take a trophy of the hardest fight she'd had to that point. The fact Captain was human doesn't matter, really. Rafaella sees it as a compliment to her foe- 'You were so hard to beat I'm going to skin you so I can remember the fight'.

A lesser reason is 'You were my hardest fight, now I'll wear a trophy from you so everyone I meet in the future knows that if they aren't as good as you are, they should fear me'.

Javvies

Hmm.

I get where Barrow Sword is coming from. And I suspect that Hanno is probably going to be of the opinion that the Dominion changing its laws to block Barrow and those like him from the bare minimum granted to other Levantine Named is not acceptable.

Yeah ... the kids have forgotten that Mom has rules, and the rules matter.

And Valiant Champion is going to get knifed and robbed one of these days. Especially if it comes to the attention of Robber that Cat wants the trophy Valiant took of Sabah, and Robber has the opportunity or can make one.

Tom

Would love to see Razin and Osen start calling Cat and Hakram "Mom and Dad" at some point. I don't see Cat and Hakram as a romantic thing, but other than that I think it works really well 😊

Hakram: "Cat, go easy on them. They're just kids!"

Razorfloss razor

That is going to be a hot button until the day she dies and probably even after. This was a powerful chapter and a nice show of the women instead of the black queen. God it must hurt her to admit that she finally understand why black is the way she is.

It sucks having to be the person to change an entire faction all by herself when all she wants to do is tear into the heros for the injustice of the situation.

RubberBandMan

I wonder if Cat is going to do something terribly clever and use Hanno to prove that villains were already on the rolls, and thus barrow sword should be listed, because what if his name spawns a heroic version later?

Either way, this is very back-room politicking issue, everyone in the room was discussing hypotheticals before taking this to Cat, to speak more hypotheticals. Something will be hammered out in private, or there will be a sneak political move to make the outcome forgone.

panic

Well It's been foreshadowed if nothing less. Previous chapter with questions being asked of the White Knight so he could go back and take a peak in old lives, which was pretty central to that chapter. And here today, Cat talking about how some of the heroes where not all that heroic, and some where downright nasty. It's not entirely unreasonable to assume, based on that, that Cat would go to her new boy toy and ask if there are any Levant "Heroes" he can't recall with his ability.

Adrian_V

No battle or roundbreaking revelation but i still loved this chapter, a little of world building and character development or rather construction in the case of Ishaq, something i am happy with just how much he has been mentioned, he would make an interesting POV, something to see how the villains think and react to everything Cat is doing, plus i wanna know if people are realizing just how much she needs (and wants) to get laid, i bet there are already jokes about it and how she is restraining herself xD

Also is funny how Cat doesn't realize how she stablishing that thread or not thread she will indeed defend her people (villains in this case), at least those who earn it. As for captain's fur cloak maybe she should point out that no loved ones are going to come for her neck due to hers (like seriously i am just waiting to see if one of Sabah's children to stumble into a avenger role/story, one not even 100% villainy).

Decius

"None of the people in my cloak have anyone left to avenge them" is intimidate, not diplomacy.

Trying to intimidate someone named Valiant Champion will not work.

God, wow.

I wonder what Hanno thinks about the cloak. He's been pretty neutral on it when it was mentioned briefly in his POV, so now that Catherine with her opinions is around?

I think it's a shame she didn't attempt to explain to Aquiline, but then, vulnerability, political bullshit, etc. Shame)=

Just... doing better, huh.

masterofbones

Are there really no laws against skinning people and wearing the skin? I really doubt any of the villains would be given that kind of free reign, Heh, Catherine should do that with some noble, point out that there's precedent.

Liliet

All Named were pardoned for all crimes. This applies to heroes and villains both.

Walter

It's always so weird to read about Cat saying stuff like ""Praesi highborn murder each other at the drop of a hat, Stygians practice slavery," I flatly replied. "Am I to pretend their ways are just some quaint local custom as well?"". She is literally, obviously, a murderer and a slaver, and probably the greatest and most ambitious of such in the known world. The Gallowborn. The Mantle. The thing she's so proud of where she compelled the Angel to her will. The entire plan with the Drow. Larat's whole arc. Like, making people do what she wants them to do by threat of violence is the thing at the spine of her, the core of her character.

I get that the hypocrisy is supposed to be a big point of the story, how the world everybody wants to change is made out of people trying to change it, but Cat is so clearsighted the rest of the time that the contrast keeps bopping me in the nose. I guess it is one of those 'darkest under the lighthouse' things, but she keeps on creeping right up to the point of realization and then zooming off in another direction.

She tells the dude that he better obey her or she'll murder him literally less than an hour before she sneers at the thought of tolerating a city full of people who make people obey them or they will murder them. She is outraged at the woman who wears a cloak of stolen skin while wearing one of stolen souls. Like, at some point the pin has to drop, right?

-->"It's not wrong, to be furious about that," I quietly replied.

What does Cat actually mean by 'wrong' in this statement? Maybe that's an easier way to get at the issue. Is she asking if she has a justification for being furious? Because I seem to recall those only matter to...I forget the rest. Maybe I should look it up somewhere, say on something that absolutely everyone has seen and taken into account when they try to figure out what kind of a person our protagonist is.

I worry that the greatest hope for the continent's victory against the dead is waging the war entirely bereft of self consciousness. "Why is Malicia able to make everyone think I can compel the Pilgrim? That would be ridiculous. By the by, Doom of Liesse, make me coffee, Angel, raise me from the dead. Entire Drow nation, launch an attack on Keter...".

KageLupus

The Gallowborn doesn't really count as slavery, in my mind. I get where you are coming from with it but there is a pretty big difference. They were criminals and deserters who would normally be killed. Turning them into a fighting regiment and making that execution by via battle instead of the noose isn't quite the same thing as outright slavery.

Day to day the Gallowborn were not treated any differently than the other soldiers. They were even afforded a kind of grim pride, since they were often led by Cat herself into the middle of fights that no one should have walked away from. From the time they were created until the last of them were wiped out, the Gallowborn had months or years longer to be alive compared to if Cat had dispensed the usual justice and just killed them. It isn't a great spot to be in by any means, but I really don't see it matching up with full on slavery.

Insanenoodlyguy

I'm not seeing the parallels so much. The Gallowborne not so much slaves as a sentence. We've seen the Legion and then the army of Callow is not mandatory, those troops who were abandoning signed up and then betrayed their oaths. Treason in the military has long been a capital punishment, one could argue such a deferred sentence is a mercy. Akua is a bit less clear cut but something similar. Considering they are not bought, sold, and there's been no talk of their children having any penalties, it's a far cry from slavery. Similarly, the Fey signed on for this shit. When they signed off, she made no effort to keep them beyond their terms.

The more relevant example is the Drow. Now that was slavery, even if she intended to free them some time later. But In fairness, the entire plan with the Drow is something she backpedaled on as soon as she became mortal again. The fact is though, that Grey Pilgrim was initially RIGHT until that pivot. The Cat of the day was tolerable. The Winter Queen in a few decades would have been a terrible monster he'd be right to smother in the crib as he is wont to do. But the Sovereign of Moonless nights is dead and gone, eaten by the night. The Woman bitching about fucked up Dominion practices isn't her.

Murderer, she is one of those of course. but still not a hypocrite on this I think. Her complaint is not that murder is a thing, it's that Praesi nobility murder for NO GOOD REASON. Obviously this can be debated based on moral values and all, but I think it could be argued at the least that cat feels "There was no point to further turning the knife in the wound save that vicious little twinge of satisfaction it'd give me". And that was no reason to do anything at all." is not a perspective said highborn would share, that that was a perfectly good reason to do something you could get away with.

I will agree with your last point though. She really has no cause to bitch at why people think she could have a leash on the pilgrim. Especially when she's already kinda leashed the pilgrim.

Liliet

Agreed lol

except the 'compel the Pilgrim' thing comes with 'do you want the full list of what it took for me to do before he started listening to me, because it includes the 'fought him for the right to DIE' point' which imho is emotionally valid lol

Liliet

Compelling people to do what you tell them to do – through threat or violence or otherwise – is not inherently slavery. By that logic, all government ever is slavery, laws are slavery, simple rules of courtesy are slavery.

Slavery refers to something far more specific, and even that specific concept gets universally acknowledged exceptions for criminal punishment. Which was literally the case with Gallowborne and was effectively the case with Akua – Catherine didn't exactly snatch a random soul off the street to attach to her mantle. Akua's serving a life sentence.

The drow thing horrified Catherine herself once she went back to mortal senses and values – you don't have to have never done the thing to consider it wrong and not be hypocritical about it, you just have to acknowledge it's just as wrong when you do it. Which Catherine did, even though what she did was indeed, as Indrani acknowledged, 'a little north of slavery' (the distinctions are fine but important in this case).

As for what 'right' and 'wrong' mean... Well, that's a pretty philosophical question. Ethical philosophy, specifically, I think, in this case.

Walter

I dunno why you care so much about the label. Like, these guys have a job where they:

1. Can't quit.
2. Don't get to choose what to do.
3. Don't get paid.

And it is slavery if beforehand the dictator says they broke the law that she makes? Once these words get said, the people in bondage and laboring are not slaves, but, to steal a line from a funny movie recently prisoners-with-jobs?

Draey

Gallowborn were treated no differently than any other member of the army. The only thing here is that they got reassigned, and their contracts for time in service were increased from x amount of years to 'till you drop dead holding my line'. They weren't treated like property, nor were their families. Let me ask you a question, do you consider prisoners of any kind 'slaves'?

Also compelling angels to do what you want thing is more like beating the angels at their own game. Hardly close to wearing the skin of someone.

The drow plan fell in shambles and that one was pretty close. However she clearly has a deal with Bird Goddesses, and the drow follow of their own volition (though are heavily encouraged).

Akua is paying for her a city of souls. Its not the same as wearing the skin of Captain, because Captain can't pay for her crimes whilst being a cape.

Liliet

...Yes, prison is widely considered to not be equivalent to slavery as an institution. The inherent point of slavery is the lack of freedom; that is also the intended point of prison. Ethics of how specific prison systems are run are beside the point of the specific ethical issue of depriving a person of their freedom being slotted in as "that's what you get when you do crimes".

Which guys are you talking about specifically, here?

Walter

Like, the fact that you can't tell whether I'm referring to Stygian prisoners or Callowan ones is kind of the point, yeah? The descriptors I gave refer to both.

I don't think Cat agrees with you about the bit where if you say legal stuff before you make someone serve you at the point of a spear it is not slavery. Presumably the Stygian slaves were found guilty of something or other, yeah? If the NonRepentent Magistrate showed up tomorrow and let her know that her property were all Gallowborn-equivalents you think Cat would change her mind?

The above is perhaps not as clear as it ought to be, let me try again. You posit that she's a legalist, slavery is ok if beforehand you set the laws in place to make it so. Stygia's slaver soldiers and her Gallowborn are different in this model in that (the ruling authority) she found her victims guilty beforehand and they did not bother to.

I posit instead that she's making the fundamental attribution error, where "I'm indiscrete, you leak, she is being investigated for breaching the Official Secrets Act.". When she enslaves people they get what's coming to them. When other people do it they are horrible monsters. The dif is not in the nature of the act or the legal justification, but who does it.

A fairly strong argument in favor is that when Cat visited Kether and Dead King gave her a person she was unconditionally and utterly horrified. She didn't ask whether he was serving a sentence, she full stop was skeeved out. This was even the version of Cat who was about to go and try and enslave the Drow.

I feel pretty good about this theory because it ties into the 'my cloak of souls is fine and your cloak of skin is barbaric' thing. It feels like the author is beating the 'Cat's morality is person/tribe based' drum pretty hard, where when an enemy does an atrocity it is unforgivable and when we do it is 'long prices'.

Javvies

Cat only ever had the one soul on her cloak – Akua, who was a special case in that Akua had basically put her soul into a phalactery and killing her body would just mean her soul was going to go off and possess someone else (a baby, I think it was). Also, a special case because Cat was making an example out of her for the rest of Praes. Also, I believe/think Akua's soul was originally supposed to be more or less inert and basically in state of stasis, she was supposed to be entirely unaware of what was going on around her. Every other trophy was from a defeated enemy's standard, cloak, or other piece of cloth. There's a substantive difference between trophies made of cloth or to make a point, and making trophies out of people just because.

Stygians don't use prisoners. They use slaves born of slaves. They're more or lured this universe's equivalent of the Unsullied of AGoT/ASoIaF. Also, when the Stygian slave soldiers have served 20 years, they get summarily executed.

The Gallowborne (or most of them) first entered the Legions as an alternative sentence to crimes they committed. This is a historically common practice, and one that continues to this day, though military service as an alternative sentence is admittedly less common these days and is available for fewer crimes. They then attempted to desert during wartime, practically just off the battlefield. That's something that gets you a high automatic death sentence anywhere, anytime, and usually not a clean one – that's the kind of thing that usually gets you turned into an example or disappeared. Cat commuted that automatic execution to service in a penal unit for their full term of service in the Legions and if they survived their full term their records would be cleared.

There is a substantive difference.

As for the Drow ... Cat's original plan was an alliance with their leadership. She then realized that the Drow had no national organization. In addition, she realized that the Drow didn't have a cultural imperative around personal integrity, and their only cultural goals involved gaining personal power at the expense of everyone else. Her (admittedly imperfect) solution was to attempt crude social reengineering by tethering the gain of personal power amongst her drow followers to voluntarily defined finite duration binding oaths of loyalty – and those personal power gains were both permanent and granted up front – attempting to redefine what constitutes behaviour worthy of gaining power. How all that would have played out in the long run is unclear.

Liliet

Okay first of all a cloak of skin and a cloak of banners are very different things.

Second, so is slavery and incarceration, and Catherine did not assume the guy she was offered was a criminal because that's not how slavery usually works where it's normalized.

Third, no, I don't think the Stygian spears were found guilty of something beforehand and I have no idea why you'd think that.

Javvies

Hell, I'm not sure I'd call the drow thing slavery or even all that horrible either.

Sure, she was extracting magically binding oaths from them, including oaths of obedience and loyalty ... but they were explicitly limited in duration, and the greater duration and more demanding oaths were voluntarily taken by the drow in exchange for permanently increasing their power, under her auspices, mostly using the Night of foes that she had killed. And let's not forget that the drow are functionally biologically immortal – even a few decades of not particularly onerous (by drow standards) service in exchange for significant permanent and up front power increases is a pretty good deal – and that's not including the potential for gaining power while serving.

There isn't exactly a good real world analogue for that ... but it wouldn't be overly dissimilar to a hypothetical Winter!Cat permanently granting Fae Titles to people in exchange for binding oaths of finite duration – and I don't think anybody would have called that slavery.

Liliet

TBF, Cat was also implicitly condoning the drow's existing practices that are basically slavery of the nisi... but that goes down too deep a rabbit hole lmao.

Arguably she was looking to enslave them as a culture which is more diluted because of how abstract it is but still kind of in the same category?

Basically I p much agree with you.

Decius

If you force one person to do your will, you are a kidnapper.

If you force a hundred people to do your will, you are a slaver.

If you force ten million people to do your will, you are a statesman.

Liliet

> If you force a hundred people to do your will, you are a slaver.

Or a clever marketer.

Depending on what exactly you mean by 'force' and 'your will', yes?

Zgggt

I don't get how nobody told Rafaela to stop. It's not insane so much as it requires everyone in that society to be sociopaths. Are people really going to watch people play the "we don't understand why wearing the skin of someone dear to you is making you angry" card and say "this isn't a clear sign of disrespect"?

Insanenoodlyguy

Not really sociopathy, just different standards. As said, their culture collects trophies of WORTHY foes. A bit morbid considering that this was a woman with a family, but I believe the Valiant Champion earnestly believes she is displaying her victory in a way that's showing appropriate respect to her fallen foe. Why would acknowledging Captain as one of the greatest foes she's ever faced be a sign of disrespect for the Captain? Not taking a trophy, that'd be what would be fucking disrespectful. That'd be implying she wasn't worth the trouble of remembering, that there was no glory to such an epic conquest. It's not that far-fetched there'd be a society that agreed. Especially because of where said foe came down on the man-monster scale from the perspective of people who didn't know her like Cat did. Hercules wore the coat of the Nemean Lion after slaying him, it's basically that.

Rafaela's problem, of course, is that even if she doesn't understand what Cat would feel so upset about this, she does know that Cat is upset about this and has done nothing to be diplomatic about it. Sure, being bold, brash and more than a little confrontational has WORKED for her 99 times out of 100. Leaning into this attitude, as Hanno has noted in Winter, tends to find everything working out a lot of the time, and it'd go against her type and her role to be considerate of the feelings of the bad guys on this sort of thing. Of course, that's probably not going to give her the kind of inertia she'd need to avoid a brutal ass-kicking if she pushes Cat too far, but even then the perspective would be less "Wow I got my ass kicked for being dumb" and more "Wow I got my ass kicked she is being really petty about this." same as presented in this chapter.

Liliet

Yeah I wish Cat would explain specifically to the Levantines what makes her so upset about this.

Zggt

You think someone like Cordelia Hasenbach or Gray Pilgrim or whoever hasn't already told them, and the Valiant Champion specifically, to not do that specific thing? Hanno, with his experiences of many lifetimes, would have obviously told her not to do that. No one? Not in all those years? Bringing her was there also a direct jab to Cat, and they knew it just as Cat knew that it happened because they were trying to push her. And they did that because they could hide behind culture as an excuse.

Cat would have no problems with trophies. But for this specifically to happen, to assume the Valiant Champion hadn't been asked not to do this and ignored that is unbelievably generous.

Liliet

No, I mean explain to Aquiline the difference between her mantle and Raphaella's cloak.

Zgggt

Cat is a hypocrite of the worst kind: she is violently protective of friends, and viciously violent towards enemies. Aquiline can pretend her culture doesn't differentiate, but Cat's behavior being mysterious to her is silly, because after three years under Cat's direct command and protection not only does everyone in Levant understand that specific "quirk" of hers, but quite possibly the entire continent... But if you think Cat's extreme meekness and introversion are the reason they pretended to not know, then we have been reading very different stories.

Liliet

I think Catherine never bothered to explain because she thought it was obvious.

Zggt

She. Is. Wearing. The. Skin. Of. A. Friend. She. Personally. Skinned.

There's trophies, and then there's that.

Please tell me you see the difference?

Insanenoodlyguy

It's not about me seeing the difference. Its about if VC does.

zgggt

She does, or at the very least she has been told and explained in great detail the difference by people like the White Knight or Gray Pilgrim, Cordelia Hasenbach or really any of the heroic leadership. Not only was she obviously told this many times in the past years, because not being told that by anyone over years is downright ridiculous, she probably (as we see her in the interlude) played dumb to just continue doing what she wanted despite everyone knowing she understands. And Aquiline knew that.

These are not stupid people who bask in their own ignorance, and let's not pretend that accomadating their ignorance should be the default behavior any more than we don't expect heroes to watch their dead used as meat for Orcs.

Liliet

> She does, or at the very least she has been told and explained in great detail the difference by people like the White Knight or Gray Pilgrim, Cordelia Hasenbach or really any of the heroic leadership.

Yathink?

I have a different opinion on what any of the above would prioritize doing with their time. They're not her parents or her teachers, it's not their job to explain to her what went wrong.

PhadosZahn

It's becoming increasingly apparent to me that Cat will actually fall apart without Hakram, I'm really hoping that EE isn't propping that up so she can lose him. He is her rock and her compass. We all need an Adjutant in our lives 😊

superkeaton

BB is reminding me very much of the warlock I made for a recent dnd campaign. Maybe that's why I'm so fond of him.

Looking forward to seeing the Heroic side of this exchange, I always love knowing the other side of the conflict.

Can we start rumors that Grey was raised with necromancy tho?

Man i will miss Hakram when he dies towards the end of this book.

Barrendur

My understanding was that Raphaella (the Valiant Champion) skinned the body of a monstrous wolf, not a woman. Captain was literally a raging wolf-monster when she was in combat, and Raphaella killed her as a great, shaggy WOLF. Raphaella then skinned the wolf and made a cloak of the fur, and no, I really don't think Raphaella carved the skin off a human-appearing dead woman to wear THAT as a trophy. WERE-WOLF, people... my only query is whether werewolves in Calernia turn back into humans when they're killed.

Can we start rumors that Grey was raised with necromancy tho?

Does it matter? She fought with her when she was a human as well as a monster. She is fully aware that the big wolf is a human. This is the kind of stuff that would get you hunted if the treaty had been in place.

Zaddek

Ugh, doesn't look like my previous reply went through. Not gonna retype it since most people have already covered most of the points I was going to.

One new thing I will add was a great point I read on the subreddit from Allian42: "To be fair, she is quite consistent in this. For her, taking the skin of someone and fashioning it as a coat is a very grave insult to the person and to everyone that cares for that person.

And she wanted very much to insult Skein and every one that cared for him."

Catherine's doesn't lack from self-consciousness in her perceived parallels to the Stygians or Praesi. She just doesn't view those traits as positive like they do. She tries to limit those impulses. Her cloak is in part a warning as much as it is a trophy. Especially with Akua. Taking her soul was her warning to the wasteland. "Come to Callow and pull this shit and this is your fate."

Not saying I agree with all of Catherine's choices, but I think calling her a slaver is quite disingenuous. Also, I viewed it less threatening to murder the Barrow Sword and more informing him where the line was. If he continued to push, he wouldn't have her support and she wouldn't let him endanger the continent when keeping the Dominion in the fight could mean the difference between everyone else living or dying. There are stakes and consequences to people's actions.

Liliet

Agreed on all counts.

Frivolous

I wonder if Catherine has decided to tell Tariq that she is no longer interested in keeping Aquiline Osen and Razin Tanja alive. She is doing it only as a favor to the Pilgrim, after all. It's difficult enough to keep someone as obstreperous as a Dominion noble alive throughout a war, but it's even harder when you don't like them and vice versa.

Tariq may have to choose between A and R's dignity and their lives. Because Catherine could keep them alive without having to tolerate their behavior, but they wouldn't enjoy it. For instance, she could have one of the Crows sit on their shoulder at all times.

Liliet

No, I don't think Catherine is going to do that. I mean, she's only responsible for their lives for as long as they're under her command and only to a limited degree (they ARE in a war). And she's planning to hand them off as she heads south, either way.

So there isn't really a reason for her to spoil the relationship with the Grey Pilgrim there.

Asterix

Six years and change, and this chapter still stuck with me.

I really want to see Rafaella get it. Understand that she would cheerfully parade the skin of a mother in front of her children and think nothing of it.

Not gonna happen, since the story is about to end and there is no room for it in the few chapters that are leff...But still.

Good job EE. Good job.

Asterix

(Reply, since I cannot edit)

Okay, so it's not six years, it's more like two, give or take a couple of weeks. Blame wordpress for linking chapters from 2015 like they were "previous" and "next". I have no idea why it would do that: I'm sure it's some clever algorithm thing that I care nought about, but... I care nought about it.

Ask me in five years if this chapter stuck with me: I don't think I'll change my answer.

Good job EE.

Chapter 9: Acceleration

"As sage in Nicae is a fool in Stygia."

– Free Cities saying

Afternoon Bell came and went before Hanno made his way into my tent. The bundle of reports that inevitably accompanied contact with Salia had eaten up even more of my time than I'd anticipated it would. Vivienne had been enthusiastic in her account of the progress in the talks over the Accords, writing that giving ground over whether or not scrying a foreign country could be considered an act of aggression – which both Procer very much wanted it to be, considering its massive deficiencies in both city-warding and scrying rituals compared to Callow and Levant – had allowed her to get concessions over what we'd termed 'civil diabolism', the summoning and binding of devils for purposes other than war. The rest had been more disparate a pack of news than a cohesive, though no less useful for it.

Archer had apparently been seen in the Proceran heartlands with a sixth member to her band, which meant a fresh Named had been added to our roster and would be in touch soon. The First Prince had passed along a note on the state of the Grand Alliance treasury – which remained surprisingly good, all things considered – but also cautioned that the Principality of Brabant's harvests seemed headed for catastrophe. She went on to write me that feeding this territory, and its massive numbers of refugees, would put us squarely back in the red before winter came. Pickler had sent a refinement on the rotating siege harpoon ballistae schematics she'd made up in Twilight's Pass. She also mentioned in a separate letter, sounding somewhat flattered, that Prince Otto Reitzenberg had extended a formal invitation for her to found and settle a tribe in Lycaonese lands after the war.

It was a grave misreading of my Sapper-General's interest in leadership duties so I wasn't worried about poaching, but I doubted this would be the last of it. Even the Iron Prince had expressed interest in goblin engineering and, considering that Hannover was yet in the hands of the Dead King, his people had a great deal of rebuilding ahead of them. Still, maybe a strongly worded letter to Otto Redcrown might serve as a helpful reminder that trying to recruit from my sapper corps was, at the very least, a slight to the crown of Callow. Moving on to less grounded matters, the rumours gathered in the south and east by the Jacks remained wild as ever.

The dead were said to walk the streets of Nicae, General Basilia had supposedly eaten the heart of a holy oracle and could now see the future. A band of pale spectres was haunting the Green Stretch, all the while Dread Empress Sepulchral had turned into a black-scaled dragon and ravaged the outskirts of Wolof's territory. That last one might in truth be the reappearance of General Nekheb of the Tenth Legion, though I'd also heard it said they were nesting among the ruins of the Red Flower Vales so I was less than sure. Somewhat amusingly, it was also quite a popular tale that I'd apparently brought down the sky on Refuge so that I could steal its Named away into my service.

More important than the wild stories, though was the hastily tacked-on addition from Vivienne that Duchess Kegan had passed forward Dread Empress Sepulchral's request to open formal diplomatic talks with the Grand Alliance. So far the diplomacy there had been informal and half a secret, and I'd gladly left it to my successor and Hasenbach. This, though, would require my personal attention. Joy. At least we might get enough leverage from that I might be able to wheedle out whether Sepulchral was a genuine claimant or just a horse for Black to ride. I'd better bring Akua into this as well, though that wasn't unlike asking a wolf about their opinion of the hunt. Still, even years away from the Wasteland she had a better grasp of the way functioned there than anyone else under my command.

Aisha's family was old and well-connected, after all, but ultimately minor nobility. The Sahelians lived and breathed intrigued at the very highest levels of Praes, and Akua hadn't just been any one of the lot: she'd been the heiress to Wolof, groomed for either rule of the High Seat or the claiming the Tower itself. Short of kidnapping an actual High Lord there was just no beating that. I was considering who else to bring into this – Hakram, naturally, but it might be worth bringing in some of the high-ranking officers I'd inherited from the Legions of Terror as well – when one of my guards popped in to inform me Hanno had arrived. I thank the man and rose to my feet, limping my way to the commode even as the White Knight entered.

He looked at me then sighed.

"Let it be brandy, at least," Hanno haggled.

I tapped the top of the commode, jostling a lock, and the door to left compartment popped open. I snatched out a bottle of Creusens brandy and two small silver cups. I'd been prepared. Amusingly enough it was easier to get him to drink liquor than wine, and he drank quick – if only to get it over with. He waited until my nonchalant gesture to take a seat, though I'd long told him not to bother anymore.

"Well bargained, White Knight," I solemnly said.

"You only ever say that when I've been had, Black Queen," he drily replied.

I limped back to the table, using his momentary distraction as he felt out one of Indrani's latest carvings to take a closer look at him. Even after two years of facing one brutal horror after another, the Sword of Judgement had little changed in appearance. His fuzzy hair was so closely cropped as to seem almost shaved, leaving the eye to linger instead on a plain but well-formed face. He was built like someone who worked for a living, which I'd always found appealing, and the long-sleeved grey tunic he tended to wear when out of armour had earned a few more stitches since I last saw it but still framed those muscled arms rather nicely. He wasn't a looker, not the way Ratface had been or Akua was, but he wasn't without his charms either. Not that I'd ever seriously consider going there, Crows, though apparently Tariq still suspected we were somehow secretly engaging in torrid trysts.

You'd think that after trying to mentor me into the grave the man would have a better appreciation of how much I had no intention of coming anywhere close to something that could, even vaguely while in dim light, pass for a tragic love story. Dismissing the thought I idly noted that he'd brought a small leather satchel – papers, maybe? He shouldn't need to, his memory was unusually sharp. It was a side-effect of his aspect of Recall, he'd told me, which I'd found fascinating. How many aspects had little quirks like this one, barely noticeable boons tucked away in the shade of the more prominent use? Looking back, after getting Struggle as the Squire I'd gotten rather good at assessing the skill and power of my opponents compared to me. How much of that had been my gaining experience, and how much an ancillary benefit? It was an interesting bit to consider, if at this point largely academic.

"Is that the Saint of Swords that the Archer depicted herself fighting?" Hanno asked.

I set the two silver cups on the table and went to work on the bottle's cork.

"Battle of the Camps, it was," I agreed. "They had a scrap while Masego and I were dreaming."

"Impressive," Hanno said even as I finally got the cork out with a pop. "There were not many capable of facing Laurence de Montfort's sword up close and live to tell the tale."

Indrani had privately admitted to me that she'd waited until the Saint was tired out from the battle and it'd still been a damned close thing, but I wouldn't disagree with Hanno's assessment even knowing that. Archer's talent in close quarters was only slightly helped by her Name, while the Saint had been sharpening her skills in this regard for decades. Considering how much of a terror the woman had been in her old age, I often thought we'd been damned lucky not to fight her in her prime. I poured out two cups of brandy, quirked a brow at the dark-skinned man.

"Wouldn't have you been able to check with Recall, anyway?" I asked.

He grimaced.

"The fresher the death and the stronger the personality the more it... lingers after use," the White Knight admitted. "I would not call on the Saint of Swords's life without great need."

"Lots of her tricks came from her domain, anyway," I mused. "Which you can't mimic, as far as I know."

He shot me an amused look, well used by now to the way I went about digging up everything I could about his abilities. Well, it was no mystery I'd not been raised by angels. He touched his fingers to the brandy cup, brow rising.

"Two," he said.

"Five," I replied without missing a beat.

"Three," he compromised.

Ah, an opening.

"Twelve," I boldly tried.

"Four and I'll not tell Tariq you tried to get me drunk," he suggested.

Oh Gods was I not in the market for another hesitant, indirect conversation about not 'casting doubts on the nature of the Truce and Terms through unwise indulgence'. On the other hand, apparently the Witch of the Woods had heard about those and thought the whole thing was fucking hilarious – she kept making fun of Hanno in that nonverbal Gigantes language they used with each other, with all the poses and shifts. He had a stake in this as well, I figured.

"Five and I'll stop implying in front of Secretary Nestor that your tunic's grey because you don't wash it," I retorted.

As something said by the Black Queen about the White Knight, it went into the Annals every time. Every single time.

"Four and I'll share the Workshop gossip I received with you," Hanno offered.

You shit, I thought, not without fondness. He would definitely have shared that before, but he'd hold it back now for sure just so that when we next negotiated he'd have this to point back to.

"Fine," I mercifully allowed. "Four."

I set down the bottle on the table and took my cup, offering a toast.

"May you live to bury your enemies," I said.

"Fair winds and slow rivals," Hanno replied.

We clinked our cups and drank deep, setting down in unison. It took the edge off enough I barely felt the sting when I seated myself across from him.

"Dare I ask what's in the bag?" I probed.

"It is not meant to be a mystery," he said, leaning down to take the satchel before setting it in front of me. "It is a gift, Catherine. Your twenty-third nameday happened while I was away, no?"

I blinked in surprise.

"Oh," I said. "Yes. Thank you? I'm an orphan, so I don't really have one of those – just the foundling day late in the spring."

It also didn't explain why he'd given me a gift, though I wasn't complaining.

"From your polite confusion, I take it nameday gift-giving is not a Callowan tradition," Hanno noted.

"Not really," I admitted. "For nobles sometimes, I think, but for most people gifts are given at the solstices and when you reach fifteen."

The dark-skinned man cocked his head to the side, curious.

"Fifteen?" he asked.

"Age of enrollment," I told him. "Used to be, anyway. It was kept for private noble armies under the Empire but I kicked it up to seventeen all around when I took the throne."

Keeping it at fifteen would have helped fill the ranks after our losses more quickly but, as both Ratface and Governess-General Kendal had pointed out back then, if we kept pressing the young into service there'd be no one left to practice trades and tend to the fields. A large army was no help when it was busy starving.

"How interesting," Hanno said, sounding genuine. "Ashurans are expected to give yearly nameday gifts to those they are tied to – family, friends or close collaborators. All within the same tier, naturally. For a citizen to court favour from a higher tier or display favour to a lower one would be frowned upon."

The Thalassocracy of Ashur sounded like a deeply unpleasant place to live in, as usual. Weren't there families with citizens of different tiers in them? Still, the implications there were a little flattering: I was being called both an equal and close collaborator.

"Thank you," I said again, and took the satchel this time.

It was easy to unmake the bronze buckles, and within I found in neat little cloth packets what must have been at least half a years' worth of wakeleaf.

"You know, when I told you to keep some of the Delosi coin I didn't mean for you to blow it all on enabling my worst habit," I drily said.

It'd been, though, a rather touching gesture.

"I have also been considering buying another tunic," the White Knight calmly replied. "I've been told it passes as unclean to the unskilled eye."

I swallowed a grin and clasped his wrist in appreciation. He smoothly returned the gesture.

"So when should I be looking to return a gift in kind?" I asked.

"Two days past winter solstice," he smiled.

Ought to bring him to twenty-nine, that. As I recalled he had more or less five years on me, not that it showed: he had one of those faces which would look much the same age until he started greying. I set down the satchel to the side.

"So," I said. "Business?"

"To business," he agreed.

I poured him another cup, then myself, and we knocked them back without a toast. I gestured for him to begin as soon as the burn had faded from my throat.

"The Titanomachy reached out to us through Levant," Hanno began. "They are sending an envoy north."

I sucked in a surprised breath. The Gigantes were notoriously isolationist, and though they had longstanding ties to the Dominion it'd been my understanding those were limited to exchanges of gifts and the occasional favour. They didn't even trade with humans in the traditional sense, as far as I knew.

"You don't sound all that thrilled," I noted.

His body gave what might have seemed like a twitch at first glance but I'd learned to recognize as him beginning to use that silent language he used with the Witch before stopping himself.

"It will be a complicated matter to handle," he admitted. "I am told it is Ykines Silver-on-Clouds that was sent."

"Which is," I slowly said, "... bad?"

"When I left the Titanomachy, Ykines was skope for Hushed Absence," Hanno told me. "It is... hard to describe in human terms. A skope is one charged with a message, speaking for others, but it is not exactly a position of authority. It does denote respect, however, and the Hushed Absence is the chorus that most prizes retiring from the affairs of Calernia."

"So they sent us a lesser noble from the isolationist faction at court as the envoy," I tried.

"That is untrue in every single specific yet broadly accurate in essence," the White Knight said, sounding impressed. "You have to understand, Catherine, that since Triumphant and the Seven Slayings the Gigantes have only ever spoken of ties outside their borders in terms of loss."

"The Seven Slayings," I repeated curiously. "That's the Humbling of Titans, right?"

"I would not recommend using that name around any of their kind," Hanno advised. "The Slayings soured most of their kind on humans, though the tendency had been there for ages before."

"I never did get why they're still so viscerally furious about the Hum- the Slayings," I said. "Procer struck by surprise, sure, but that's hardly a first for them. Their armies still got savaged when they got deeper in, and all the Principate got to show for those deaths was a modest stripe of land added to southern Valencis."

They'd also gotten the Titanomachy to unofficially back down from its defence pacts with the Levantine petty kingdoms, which had allowed Procer to eventually keep pushing into Levant after its conquest of Vaccei. Yet the amount of losses taken during the Humbling had supposedly kicked back that conquest by at least a decade, so in a sense the Gigantes had fulfilled their treaty obligations.

"It is not the treachery itself but what was committed through it," the brown-eyed man said. "When the Principate called for talks, it was some of the greatest left among the Gigantes who went. Three of the last elder spellsingers, the amphore for the Sublime Auspice chorus and two candidates for the Name of Stone Shaper."

My brow rose.

"Choruses are court factions," I guessed.

"Gigantes are not social in the way humans are," Hanno admitted. "You would find their cities to be empty things, and there'd be no court to be found. A chorus is more akin to an ideology, though even within a chorus there will be differing songs. The Hushed Absence, for example, will call to both those who advocate for isolation and those who curtail wonder-making by all Gigantes. Yet some will speak to one over the other or speak of both these in relative moderation. A skope will be messenger for one of the shades of belief, should it gain enough adherents within the chorus."

"So what does the Sublime Auspice sing about?" I asked.

"Guidance of younger peoples and intervention beyond the borders," the White Knight said. "In the past they were also the foremost slavers among the Titan Lords."

I grimaced. Proceran history wasn't something I'd studied in great depth, especially not when it came to the south – which had barely ever crossed Callow's path before the Principate was founded – but I had learned some broad strokes back at the orphanage. Arlesites are passionate and romantic people, fond of poetry and duels, Douglas Robinson's much maligned yet still widely used 'Peoples of East and West' described them. Their name comes from the ancient Arlesen Confederacy, which rebelled against the slaving giants. There were stories to be found there, to be sure, but I'd always had a hundred other things to attend to and never had the Titanomachy seemed likely to become relevant to my affairs. It wasn't the first time I'd been wrong and was unlikely to be the last.

"They never recovered from losing their amphore to human Named while under truce banner," Hanno continued. "And though the killing of the candidates was a grave insult in the eyes of the Gigantes – not unlike killing a Fairfax prince would be to your people – it was the death of the spellsingers that incited outright hatred. The magnitude of that loss for them as a people is not easily put into words, so I will simply say it was worth great grief and grief often turns to matching enmity."

My brow rose.

"Named did that?" I asked. "I'd heard it was just assassins."

"All were Arlesite heroes save for the White Knight of the time, who was of the Cantalii," Hanno said. "Most of those Names are dead and gone now. Of the twelve assassins to strike only the Drake Knight survived, and not even that potent blood allowed him to grow back the arm he lost."

He had that distant look on his face as he spoke, the one that told me he was drawing on memories he'd obtained through Recall.

"So you're saying that since they're sending us the isolationist skope as an envoy, we shouldn't get our hopes up about the Titanomachy entering the war," I said, drawing him back to the here and now.

"To an extent," he replied, brow creased. "From what I can remember, Ykines was of the Hushed over the Absent – that is to say, his isolationism came as consequence of his desire to restrict wonder-making. It might be he is meant to haggle down contributions, not obstruct involvement."

"I've seen the wardstones the Blood use, Hanno," I said, hands tightening with want. "They have no fucking idea of how those even work and they're still better in most regards than anything my people can make. Hells, even if they don't want to enter the war I'd take a hundred of them joining the ranks of the Arsenal and still lick their boots clean in thanks."

Metaphorically speaking, anyway. Considering their probable boot size, it seemed like a bit of hassle to get done otherwise.

"That is the complication, Catherine," he admitted. "In some ways, entering the war might be more popular. What I tell you now, I would have your oath no to repeat."

I let out a whistle. That was rare. He wasn't one to ask oaths without a reason, and I perhaps still a little charmed even now that the Sword of Judgement considered my oaths to have worth, so I gave it without argument.

"Gigantes are not ageless in the way of the elves or the drow," Hanno said.

To this day I was still uncertain as to whether he actually knew that Winter had done away with the mortal lifespan of the Firstborn or he'd simply, like most, assumed that drow were effectively immortal if not taken by strife or sickness.

"They gather power unto themselves by bathing in the light of moon and star in sacred places, by songs and patience, and this power lends them vitality," the White Knight said. "To be a spellsinger is to be born with the gift of power, to come to weave a second soul and through it be able to pluck at the chords of Creation. These are rare, and prized, as for most Gigantes to make a wonder is to craft with the very stuff of what keeps them alive."

My eyes narrowed.

"The Seven Slayings," I said. "They came after that tussle with Triumphant that's said to have made the Titan's Pond out of what used to be plains. How much of their lives did they spend to take her on?"

I'd always counted it passing odd, that a people capable of playing rough with the greatest monster to ever come out of the Wasteland had taken hits from an infant Principate without any great retaliation save for the building of the Red Snake Wall much later, after the Dominion freed itself. It made a little more sense now, especially if heroes were thrown into the mix. I knew better than most how dangerous those could be when properly motivated. Sisters bless, these days I'd come to rely on it.

"A fifth of their people died outright," Hanno frankly said. "Centuries of accumulated power were spent in an hour, and many left themselves only enough to live until they could fill themselves again – yet, even now, a great many of the Gigantes are but a decade away from death should they not observe the old rituals.”

“So they’re not going to want to spend themselves close to the grave to save Proceran lives,” I grimaced. “Harsh. The spellsingers, though, if they’re born with the Gift wouldn’t they be effectively immortal?”

“In a sense,” Hanno conceded. “Yet most of them are young, by the reckoning of the Gigantes, and so have spent but a century or two accumulating power after forging their second soul – through both celestial rituals and their own gift folded onto itself, true, but even so it remains a delicate and time-consuming process. The trouble, here, is that the Titanomachy’s greatest wonders all require the stewardship of spellsingers to some extent.”

Of course they did, because those would have been made before good ol’ Triumphant swaggered in, butchered most of their spellsingers and emptied out the vitality-power reserves of a significant chunk of their population. Much like the Firstborn after Sve Noc first bargained for survival, they must have felt like rats scuttling in the ruins of their own empire, forced to choose between their lives and seeing their greatest works fall apart. Shit, no wonder they hated the Principate like poison: to them it must have felt like Procer savagely kicked them when they were down and just starting to consider how to get back up from the last kick.

“So if they’re with us they’re not keeping their own cities functional, which is going to be less than popular at home,” I sighed. “That’s great. If they’re that tied up, Hanno, why even bother sending an envoy?”

“Because inconvenience and hatred of Procer does not mean they are willing to surrender Calernia to Keter’s grasp without having lifted a finger to fight the encroaching doom,” the White Knight said. “I imagine that our failure to drive back the Dead King has them justly worried, given the scope of the efforts employed by the Great Alliance. I fully expect the Titanomachy will try to gift us old wonders instead of agreeing to craft new ones, and strictly limit the numbers they sent north. Yet even that much would be godsent, let’s not pretend otherwise.”

It’ll be fear that got them moving too, I mused, now that the initial disappointment had passed. Procer alone and surrounded by foes, the way it’d been before the Grand Alliance steadied, that’d be acceptable to them. But Procer as the heart of a great continental alliance that included even their old allies the Levantines? They couldn’t let that happen without keeping an eye on it. I imagined the great developments of the last few years would have attracted the attention as well. It was one thing to play the hermit kingdom when your magic was beyond the wildest dreams of your neighbours, but what happened if the Arsenal put Procer on even footing in even just some regards? A Principate with a few war-making artefacts like that under its belt might not be so inclined to let it go when the Gigantes killed its people on sight near the border.

And given that the Twilight Ways were without precedent, I imagined a lot of their defensive wards would need reworking to adapt to their existence. That had to be keeping them up at night. While they might be able to access the Ways on their own, they'd need deep study before they could feel safely walled up again – and the quickest way to achieve that was sending people to the Arsenal to look through what we'd already found out. No, there were decent reasons for them to reach out even though Hanno had already succeeded at weaning me off the hope that the Titans would come in at this late hour and turn the tide of the war. Hells, if nothing else just seeing how fragile the situation on the fronts was might motivate them to send more than crumbs our way.

"I'll take what we can get," I fervently agreed. "I'm guessing this was kicked up to you because we can't use Cordelia as our diplomatic workhorse this once?"

"It would be unwise to ask the First Prince of Procer to meet Ykines Silver-on-Clouds on behalf of the Grand Alliance," he mildly agreed. "The Holy Seljun noted that Antigone and I were both mentioned by name, as even to the Hushed Absence we are known."

"Might have to be you, if they want a familiar face. Haven't heard of the Witch in a month," I said. "Not since she went up to have that gander in northern Cleves."

"From there she struck at the Enemy," Hanno informed me. "I expect you'll be getting the message from Princess Rozala late tonight. Antigone put together a band of five and intercepted a turtle-ship before it could land."

A savage grin split my lips. The Dead King marched his skeletons at the bottom of the Tomb and the Grave regularly, but it wasn't without effects on the equipment of his soldiers: you couldn't keep chain mail or a sword underwater for a month without it rusting. For the fodder that was all fine and good, but when Neshamah went to the trouble of arming a few thousand Binds in good steel he didn't then proceed to scrap it by sending them on an underwater march. For those he used ship transports, in his own horrible manner: massive turtle-barges made of bone and wood with a hollow shell protecting his elites from the elements. As tended to be the way with him, the turtle-ships were made to move by a necromantic flesh construct that was more lizard than turtle and boasted both massive claws and bags of liquid poison it could spew out in a stream.

"Godsdamn," I whistled. "Now that's something to brag about. They sunk it? I thought he'd hardened the shells to magic after Akua ripped one open last summer."

"It had the cold iron linings," Hanno confirmed. "Antigone made the tactical decision to use her available assets according to methods that had previously proved successful."

A beat passed and I cocked an unimpressed eyebrow at the hero.

"She threw the Mirror Knight real hard at it," I deadpanned.

The slightest twitch of the hero's lips was the most openly he allowed himself to be amused.

"I honestly can't remember a time where that didn't work," I pondered out loud. "Maybe she's onto something."

The Mirror Knight was, admittedly, the closest thing to unkillable I'd ever seen even amongst the distinctly hard to kill company that was heroes. During the Dead King's winter offensive, he'd lasted alone against three Revenants for an hour at Duchesne until Ishaq and I arrived. Though he'd put none of them down it was still utterly absurd that they'd not managed to put a serious wound on him either. Regardless, it was impressive he had a hard enough head that it had sent a few thousand of Neshamah's finest troops at the bottom of the Tomb. I poured us each another cup of brandy and offered another toast.

"To the Mirror Knight living to be thrown another day," I said.

"To success against the Enemy, whatever the shape of it," Hanno said, almost reproachfully.

I wasn't fooled, he found the whole thing just as hilarious as I did. The drinks went down, and the cups hit the table. A grimmer look passed across his face, afterwards, which immediately had my hackles rising.

"They did more than simply break a turtle-ship," the White Knight said. "When out there they found a hollow where the scrying disruptions didn't reach. They got a glimpse of northern Hainaut, before Keter adjusted to block them."

"Tell me," I said.

"The Hidden Horror is making a bridge across the tributary river to the Tomb," he told me, tone calm. "We'll be facing a full-on offensive within six months, and the numbers..."

I grimaced at his hesitation.

"How bad?"

"At least two hundred thousand of his finest foot is preparing to cross," Hanno replied. "He's building from both shores and building in stone – if we don't break it while unfinished, it will be warded and enchanted so thoroughly as to be near indestructible."

Fuck, I feelingly thought. On parchment a bridge wasn't much of an issue, considering Keter could walk its troops at the bottom of the lakes and ferry them across with turtle-ships, but in practice it might be a deathblow to our hopes of retaking Hainaut. The Tomb and the river limited how quickly the Hidden Horror could send his soldiers from the Kingdom of the Dead, especially considering the strong current of the tributary, and the turtle-ships were vulnerable to heroic raids. A bridge, though, meant he could just keep pouring troops into Hainaut day and night: and that wasn't a metaphor, it wasn't like the dead tired. So far we'd been keeping our edge against the massively larger numbers through superior troop quality: even a Proceran conscript could handle a few mindless zombies alone, or a pair of skeletons if their arms and armour were rusted through. Once we got full battalions of Binds to deal with, though, we'd be facing a well-armed and fully intelligent army.

If we gave them room to manoeuvre, let the Dead King deploy his full array of tricks against us, then this was the death knell of the Grand Alliance.

"Do you have dimensions for the bridge?" I said. "A notion of the timeline on its completion?"

"Antigone used one of the Repentant Magister's artefacts to capture an illusory image," he said. "And sent it south to me by a trusted hand."

Who did he – ah, and that would be why the Valiant Champion was in my camp. The three of them were supposed to be close.

"Shit," I cursed. "We need to bring this to the Alliance's high command as soon as possible. This changes our schedule for the offensive into northern Hainaut, at the very least. If we can grab it back fast enough we could put this entire mess to rest, or at least take the southern end of the bridge and defend it."

"Antigone went east to blunt another offensive against the western coast of Cleves," Hanno said. "Which means I will have to move south to speak with the Gigantes envoy myself."

"We're due a proper council anyway," I pointed out. "And a visit to the Arsenal couldn't hurt. Hells, the Painted Knife is due back soon as well, the way I hear it, and I'm curious to hear what she has to say."

"We gather it all at the Arsenal, then," Hanno agreed. "It ought not to be impossible, given the facilities there."

"It can be done in the other senses as well," I grunted. "We have the pull to ensure it."

Though the mood had grown more somber, I poured out another two cups. Hanno's eyebrow rose questioningly.

"Surrendering the last cup so soon?" he said.

"Well, if we're to have the conversation I suspect we're about to have we might as well finish the drinks first," I said. "Argument does tend to spoil the taste."

"Ah," Hanno exhaled.

He took the cup in hand and we drank. Because he was a polite sort, he waited a few heartbeats before speaking.

"You have lashed out at two heroes in two days, Black Queen," the White Knight said. "I would know why, and what happened to the Named you meant to bring back to camp."

yessssss

NerfContessa

Indeed.

Javvies

There's no plausible way that the fact that Valiant Champion skinned and is wearing Captain as a cloak is offensive to Cat is news.

Hell, Hanno was in the immediate vicinity (and an active Band of Five, less casualties, with her) when Valiant Champion first did that. And Captain was one of the Calamities, and therefore close to Cat's first mentor and father figure ... it doesn't take much thought to get to the point that Cat might dislike someone wearing a person she knew as a cloak.

Throwing the Mirror Knight at enemies. That's a classic in the making.

And it's not like most of the rest of the Named will feel a personal loss when the asshat finally gets thrown into something that he doesn't walk away from.

caoimhinh

I think it's more along the lines of "Are you ok? Stress seems to have piled up and it's taking a toll on you" rather than "why did you treat Raphaella that way?".

Hanno is concerned for Cat's mental and emotional state. He's not there to reprimand her, but to listen to her.

Liliet

Yeah, that's the impression I got as well.

Catherine is usually more diplomatic =x

Agent J

And that she snapped on the little kid is definitely questionable. I mean, we get why, but he still has no idea about Tancred. And it wasn't right to do, even knowing about Tancred.

He's noticing what Akua, Hakram, and maybe even Indrani already have. Cat's slipping and he's worried about her.

Insanenoodlyguy

Clearly the best solution to this is sex. Sex with Hanno. Since, as she pointed out, tragic love story comes from a relationship, it has to be sex devoid of meaning beyond the act itself. I'd have said invite Akua but that clearly is becoming it's own story, so lets go with that one flirty Mercenary captain for a threesome. That should do it.

Liliet

Catherine is not capable of having sex without meaningful attachment, and being possibly aromantic means sex is exactly the one thing standing between her already existing friendship with Hanno and a tragic love story.

Of course, it doesn't have to be tragic in the first place...

Insanenoodlyguy

That's why you have to throw in at least 1 third party and make it smutty lust. It's the only way. For the sake of the friendship!

Adrian_V

Yeah and is mostly for the new kid that raised his concerns, and lets be honest Cat was harsh with her, i actually feel sorry for the kid, so sorry in fact i want them to become closer now xD

kdarkdiamond

He's not surprised she's offended by the Champion. He's surprised she let her composure slip enough to act out on it. She's normally more self-controlled than that in the face of people she despises.

"You have lashed out at two heroes in two days, Black Queen," the White Knight said.

Two out of three... Is a pattern of three. Either Cat & Hanno cotton on, or it strikes home.

A sneaky Necromancer Skynet, our dear Neshamah is.

Liliet

That's not how patterns of three work, and to make a more broad rule of three a lot more initially provided narrative weight is required.

Scribe of Astor

So everyone is going to skip over the fact that Malicia has been dethroned and that there is a new Dread Empress? How did the master schemer finally fail? Who is the new Empress who did it? Was Black involved?

Earl of Purple

Dread Empress Sepulchral doesn't have the Name Dread Empress yet- she's a Claimant, nothing more. Malicia still sits in the Tower, weaving her webs and gathering her allies. Sepulchral only has a third of Praes, I believe, so Malicia isn't out of the game yet.

Nobody knows where Black is or what he's doing, though it's suspected (by Cat, with no evidence) that he's sitting behind Sepulchral and using her to focus attention away from himself, as he's also a Claimant.

Liliet

She was not dethroned. There is a civil war (if not one that is currently being actively fought by large armies). Malicia still holds the Tower, Sepulchral is a claimant operating out of IIRC Blessed Isle.

Javvies

Sepulchral is based out of Aksum, her own seat; Nok has declared for her.

The Blessed Isle would, I think, fall behind the lines of the breakaway legionnaires that are Black loyalists and really didn't like the revelations about Malicia planting mind control hooks all over the place, they're said to be camping on the edges of the Green Stretch. Those positions got started as the Legions being a de facto buffer zone between Callow and the rest of the Praes.

Also, the Blessed Isle wasn't a fortified position anymore – it never got rebuilt after it got trashed and the Paladins exterminated during the Conquest.

Liliet

Sepulchral was based out of the Blessed Isle when last we checked, Malicia had sent her there to hopefully get the Callowans to clean her up.

Javvies

Abreha got the Governorship of Blessed Isle and its environs.

She never lost her core and actual home powerbase of Aksum.

Aksum is a lot more useful than Blessed Isle for internal Praesi politics. Especially when you're the High Lady of Aksum.

Even more so when you're kicking off rebellion and civil war against someone currently sitting in the Tower as Dread Empress.

Plus, when it came up in Chapter 7 ... Aksum and Nok were mentioned as being for Sepulchral. Blessed Isle wasn't, and Blessed Isle is on the Callowan side of the Green Stretch, which is where the Black-loyalist legionaries that didn't like Malicia's mind control over their leadership are camping out – and they are described as a separate faction.

TAP_M113

Does the narrative weight restriction really apply if you only wish for a very small/subtle effect?

Patterns of three are repeated and visible on subtle little tidbits of lore, not only in the big, climatic adversarial relationships between named. In general, a pattern of three thematically relevant events seems to leave a small groove in creation, no matter how shallow.

Giving a subtle nudge to a named character flaws (anger response against fairly broad sets of maed hero behavior), amplifying something that was already here, is plausible and workable... and Neshamah is on par on age and power with the Bard.

And last time Cat interacted with the Bard, she saw how she nearly got her by subtly placing 3 overlapping losing stories, ones that would have got her killed if she hadn't took a really unorthodox action course. I would say that Neshamah isn't as terrifyingly canny when it comes to narrative, but his knack for collecting Revenants and inflicting cruelly ironic demises on them means he is a VERY fair hand at psychologically breaking people.

This is what I see here: a fair bit of preemptive assassination of a troublesome, nascent name, with some psychological and narrative warfare of opportunity, to twist the knife.

Neshamah has spoken a suspicious amount of times with Cat since the whole "War on Keter" deal, and I think he has a "meta-narrative" plot in mind when he does that.

I get the impression that tends to get the Pappenheim and other named by being conversationally "Affably Evil" and intimate with them, so that when the time comes, they are narratively easier to kill – at this point, when he comes to meet them, alone and surrounded, it is like a naked man surrendering to his inevitable death at winter's cold, welcoming embrace.

Underestimate not Old Bones – I doubt that such a canny Necromancer does any action that does not further his plans, after so many millenia. Given that he operates a fair amount of forks in parallel, does not sleep, tire or forget, at this point he is more akin to Skynet or a Seed AI than anything remotely human. Ignore this at your peril.

Liliet

A subtle nudge to get a subtle effect only works when there's not enough noise of other cause-effect chains interfering. I can see Neshamah wanting to rattle Cat period but (1) I do not believe he'd be able to predict that she would specifically "lash out against two heroes in two days", (2) Hanno interfering here will disrupt that (potential) effect before it's really begun.

To be worthwhile, narrative effects have to be strong enough to work against regular probability of events.

Halinn

The more he survives getting thrown at things, the stronger that story becomes.

ruduen

Honestly, that's fair. Cat's definitely been more temperamental after dealing with the fallout, and for better or worse, it probably helps to have someone on the Heavens' side who's not completely unreasonable to air things out with.

Death Knight

Of course he ends it there. Goddamn it EE it was just getting good 😭

Burlyraven

Well, now we're getting to a pivot. This next chapter is probably going to set the tone for the entire remainder of the book; everything else was just prelude.

wirelessgrapes

Why the fuck has Triumphant just terribly ruined everything she conquered/tried to conquer. Seriously, pretty much everything bad that has happened in Creation can be traced back to Triumphant.

Javvies

Not quite everything can be blamed on Triumphant. I'd pin a lot of the Praesi bullshit on ... the second Emperor of Praes – the one who assassinated the first Emperor of Praes, and started the pattern of succession and promotion via murdering your predecessors.

Plus, both the Dead King and Bard predate Triumphant by significant factors.

Liliet

Because she wasn't out to build, she was out to show she was the toughest girl around.

TwilightGlimmer

The Bard used her as a catspaw to kill an angel to create a weapon capable of destroying the Dead King (with a side of doom worse than what the Dead King is bringing

caoimhinh

I had always thought that the Humbling of Titans (now known to us as the Seven Slayings) had been what Triumphant had made, not a Proceran betrayal of the Titanomachy after the battle against Praes. It was the impression I got from every time it was mentioned.

What's the name of the battle against Triumphant then?

Also, the Gigantes Spell singers are kind of the equivalent of Cultivators at Nascent Soul Stage in a Xianxia story. Fascinating

nick012000

Are they really Nascent Soul cultivators? They sound more like they're stuck on Foundation Establishment, to me.

caoimhinh

Well, kind of.

A Foundation Establishment one wouldn't live past a hundred years without aging, nor would be able to perform great workings of magic. Plus the Gigantes explicitly make a second soul out of the energies of the Cosmos, so I would count it as a Nascent Soul.

Although their particular brand of magic sacrifices their Nascent Soul, so there's that big difference.

Konstantin von Karstein

I wonder if the flaw in the anti-scrying spells was involuntary or not. It would completely be in Neshamah's style to reveal a plan that could make his enemies lose, and when they are busy countering it doing something else even more dangerous. But I am maybe too paranoid.

Liliet

I think that's overthinking it a bit. Heroes get more providence the worse the foe is. This current situation is as providence-full as it gets.

AceOfSword

But Neshamah is good with stories, wouldn't he expect providence to pull some stuff like this? He adjusted the anti-scrying afterward, maybe he intentionally left the flaw to influence providence, that way he knows what his opponents know and can plan accordingly.

Or maybe he set up a target that can't be ignored, knowing that providence would focus on warning the heroes about it and that makes it less likely for his other plans to be revealed.

Liliet

True, he might be throwing resources away on affecting providence.

TAP_M113

I concur. This bridge is a single, BIG point of failure akin to flying fortresses – for someone as lore-savy as Neshamah, a plan that relies on such a flagrant narrative vulnerability doesn't parse.

Neshamah, as the biggest bad ever, WILL get rekt by narrative at the first opportunity, and the success of his career is mostly credited to his ability to mitigate villain narrative handicaps.

I suspect that this bridge is a Stalingrad, or the battle of Kursk – a strategic trap, in the military and Heroic/Villain sense.

1º) In the Military sense: the Grand Alliance army is rushed into an all-out offensive into a surrounding, entrenched defensive position. If Neshamah has a reputation, it is to be the Calernia's "General Winter" – certain doom to an entangled, surrounded foe, brutally punishing such military mistakes with absolute annihilation.

If he envelops them and cuts their retreat (what happened in Kursk), he can annihilate them.

He also is the agressed party, an unexplored tale – a more favourable one than the "Lest Dawn Falls" tale for when he is the attacker.

2º) In the Narrative sense: the Heroes get dangled a "Nefarious Plot" they can't ignore, then blunder into a "Demise of their own Making" and the Villains get thrown into an unforgiving, grinding environment where "Any Mistake is repaid with Death" and "With No Clever Escape".

3º) In the Meta-narrative sense: deathtraps are always averted by "Comic Relief" heroes... and Neshamah has been steadily killing ALL of them. Remember how the "Fortunate Fool" constantly saved the Procerans from encirclement deathtraps? He and all of his kind were forced onto "Heroic Sacrifices" these last years. By killing them, he is steadily shifting the story's tone into a "Grim, Dark Tale" where even providence can't save you, and Plot Armor has no place.

4º) In Catherine's tale sense: I think that the fact that Cat is slipping and angry is intentional on the Death King's part – he has intentionally been manouvering her (and likely others) in losing stories with soft touches via his agents. He talks a lot to his foes via Ghouls, and it doesn't make sense to fall into the risk of possible "Villain Monologue" if he wasn't doing something like that. The Tancred situation and Cat getting suddenly "Black-like Unreasonable angst at the World" are REALLY too well engineered against her background to be a coincidence. Something is up.

If the Grand Alliance retreat is dumb enough to lean into the big, fat single point of failure that is the Twilight ways, I bet you that the "Kursk trap" will pay off. Admiral Ackbar screams so.

LarsBlitzer

I can understand the narrative weight there. The bridge does scream trap to me, and it would be one of the very best kinds of traps: one that cannot be ignored. I can't see Cat or Hanno marching a full force out using the Twilight Ways though. Taking out the bridge would be on a tight schedule, and the logistics of moving an army are slow as molasses. No, my bet would be on sending a team of Named heroes and villains, volunteers all, to sabotage the bridge. In using a WWII analogy, even one based on movies, think less Stalingrad or Operation Market Garden, and more Dirty Dozen or The Guns of Navarone. Cat would be blind not to see the opportunity of narrative weight there either: Once enemies turned comrades in arms by circumstance, heroic band united by a clear objective, underdog gambling on a faint hope to destroy a Big Bad Thing (she even noted that while it isn't a floating fortress it is pretty awful,) throw in a redemption arc for one of the more dastardly villains and that'll likely kick off a Heroic Sacrifice to blow the thing to pieces. Send along a few Goblin and Orc Sappers to set the explosives and Hell, one of those might even get a name out of it.

sengachi

A trap is begging for a heroic or tragic reversal. But it doesn't have to be a trap.

An unignorable war-changing construction which forces a response still forces a response and takes attention away from other fronts, whether reacting to it is a trap or not. And even if it and a misdirection play are noticed and thwarted, the Dead King will have still forced the Alliance to commit a massive chunk of resources outside their secure supply network where their logistics can be harried and their troops bled, on terrain he'll have had a chance to prepare, against his fortified position. He'll be able to inflict worse losses than he takes, even if he loses.

And even if he loses the bridge project, it's not like he'd be handing over a tactical or strategic advantage. He'd still be able to send over troops as he is now, the Alliance won't have gained anything they can use cus the bridge either won't be built or will be his enchanted structure, and the location will still be outside the alliance's secure support network with no nearby castles.

This is what the Dead King does. He makes a move which allows for trickery, but doesn't depend on it. He makes a move which would hit hardest if unnoticed, but still works if Providence bungles that. He makes a move where when if he loses at every single step, he still bleeds his enemy harder than he gets bled. And he does so with troops he's spent centuries building up so he has spares to throw away without personal worry.

Liliet

Yeah.

TAP_M113

I mean, as you said, there are clear advantages for Neshamah if the bridge plan works... but it also doubles as a trap, because even if the bridge is destroyed, it is pulling, and likely destroying, critical Grand Alliance resources at multiple levels as they are thrown against a fully prepared killzone.

It is like a Chess grandmaster aperture – it positions their pieces to occupy all of the optimal paths available, expanding his options, losing none key peices, and denying the enemy moves.

Even the key element – the fact that Neshamah has the intitiative and dictates the battlefield and flow of the war by forcing his foes to react – is a massive strategic benefit in and on itself.

Initiative in warfare is only ceded when you are weak enough to be forced to drop it.

TAP_M113

I like the cut of your jib, but Catherine has noted that it is such a solid target – stone-built, surrounded and guarded by entire army corps – that it needs at least a “Market Garden” degree of commitment, and spoke at marching the entire army by land in a “Kursk offensive” level to get it destroyed.

“Built in stone” means no easy way to completely demolish it – if you bring down sections, the hard work on the bridge foundations remains, and it would be relatively easy to rebuild from them. For me that implicates hundreds of people on deck, at least, to bring it down for good.

But assuming that this is NOT the case, and a stealth mission to bring it down is possible, you are going to need a LOT of Named firepower, which again obviously benefits Neshamah.

As you said, it is then a “Dirty Dozen” scenario... and could the Grand Alliance afford to lose a full dozen named if things go wrong? I doubt it.

Even if not, a LOT of Names would be tied away from fronts where they are needed. Named may be more powerful than Revenants, but they are significantly outnumbered by them. Imagine multiple bullshit plans like the magical plague seeds simultaneously succeeding on several critical locations – this is the kind of thing that may allow Neshamah to spill his forces onto the highly populated Procer hearthlands, and reach criticality for necromancy reinforcement rates.

So Neshamah is proving himself quite clever – no matter the way things go, he will get a windfall out of it. Condition the entire Grand Alliance Army on a land offensive in a ground of his own choosing (“Kursk”), commit a valuable army corps through the Twilight Ways (“Market Garden”), or put an uncomfortable amount of her named eggs in a single basket (“Guns of Navarone/ Dirty Dozen”)

He may yet be defeated, but this forces again the Grand Alliance to react instead of act, and allows him to keep the initiative and choose the terrain – the historical hallmarks of a Victorious Commander.

That is what I like so much – there is magic-ruled world and a VERY imaginative, yet sensible Necromancer running an WWII-sized undead army, and EE still finds logistic and military challenges fettering it that seem like they always belonged here, and makes this as tense, yet understandable, as the Russian front situation in WWII. Kudos, EE.

Rainemetel40

See this entire war and all of the Dead Kings plans read, to me at least, like the set up for a “Too Clever for their own good” scenario.

Wherein the DK unwittingly gives the heroes the keys to his defeat. I don’t know why I feel like this but, it seems pretty likely.

Liliet

Agreed.

Ciara

I think you’re overthinking it. The bridge is just one way that Nessie can win. Contrast that to a flying fortress which is supposed to be the way you win. The narrative weight here is more of a scheme-of-the-week than ultimate weapon. If they stop it, the status remains quo.

I mean, he’s got to assume any given plan has a massive chance of being foiled, but you don’t become a villain on the level of “setting element” by NOT trying plans that give your army a massive advantage at zero risk to yourself.

Liliet

This.

Patrick Herke

I’m not so sure. The idea that it was deliberate was actually my first thought when it came up. It’s one of those things that’s so bad you almost can’t ignore it which makes it more suspicious. But at the same time, if it’s that bad you kinda have to do something.

Liliet

I like the point that it's a Scheme of the Week. If the heroes decide it's a trap and don't come, you win, because you actually for real were investing into it. If the heroes do come, why, you have a trap prepared just for that!

It's resource intensive – you have to fully invest into both possibilities for both to be effective – but if you have as many resources as the Dead King has, you can safely set up Xanatos Gambits like this.

Great lore, great relationship between White and Black Queen.

Also I was almost sure that Black is not involved with *fake new Dread Emperor.... Hmm now I am not so sure, Cat said she doesn't know. Maybe just maybe Black himself is claimant to the Tower but how does he keep it a secret?

Liliet

First it's not a secret, he kind of said it during a continent wide conference.

Second, what he's keeping secret is where the fuck he is and what the fuck he is doing. Who'd be able to tell if he is or isn't a claimant to some Name if they have no idea what his current story is at all?

Captain Amazing

I hope Hanno suggests necromancy here. He has an impressive realist streak and putting pieces back on the board is the prerogative of the head villain after all. Besides, Masego said necromancy isn't a strictly evil branch of magic.

Liliet

How exactly is necromancy supposed to help here?

TAP_M113

One of the things that I believe has been stealthily elaborated by EE, but rarely commented in depth, is at which extent Neshamah has been manipulating the culture of all nations of the Grand Alliance to subvert the narrative convention of "All Villains eventually Fall" that forms the staple of Heroic and Above's dominance.

And, by extension, how Neshamah, Catherine, Black and Triumphant work alike.

For any Villain to successfully affect the world, they must navigate a cultural substrate and belief system than extols following Above-ordained divine authority, conservative tendencies and, above all, that the actions of the individual to change the world to his liking against the majority, the root of "Villainy", is always doomed to fail. This is the basic narrative "fact" that any successful Villain must somehow navigate well enough to be able to enact a lasting impact on the world.

This begs the question of what is the Narrative.

The first answer would be "people's beliefs of what is possible for an individual/nation to achieve & what are the driving forces of history", codified by legend, historical account and folk tale.

A second, more general answer would be "Above, Below & the Unaligned Wants of Individuals", rooted in some biological substrate common to all species that drives an individual's preference for collectivism (Above-Hanno), the individual Vs Society (Below-Catherine), or the autonomous fulfillment of the self's desires (Unaligned-Archer), and his own interpretation of what "makes the world tick" across the course of history.

Of course, this means that a conflict between all individual views of "how the world works" is wont to happen, and needs to be arbitrated – which inevitable leads to demographics.

"Above" stories and Heroes tend to win in most of Calernia because the most POPULATED countries are Above-aligned; conversely, "Below" stories and Villains lose everywhere except in Praes, Bellephoron-Stygia and the Serenity, because there a VERY significant population is culturally "Below"-aligned. But there is also a long-standing tradition of "Archers", "BeastMasters" and "Rangers" everywhere, because those are universal, unaligned tales of exploration, adventure and hermit self-sufficiency that are common to all of human experience that do not map into the moral axis.

This explains why narrative tends to favour Heroes worldwide, but Villains have some narrative niche advantages in even Above-aligned countries, while Praes and other Below-aligned places were tiger papers that turn into unassailable "Afghanistans" when invaded – the cultural demographics provide a significant "home turf" advantage that can only be wiped by wholesale cultural engineering.

Orcs were only conquered by toppling their cultural milestones in a cultural genocide; Praes only held Callow when a militarily hyper-competent occupation aware of narrative coincided with the cultural acceptance of a Callow-born, overwhelmingly popular Villain (Cat) was acclaimed to the throne; Neshamah only got apotheosis when an entire civilization unflinchingly thrust him with their own very life as a savior...and later on, as a god.

Neshamah, Black and Triumphant share the common trait of having managed the most successful instances of cultural engineering. Neshamah created a populous nation that worships him as a God (granting apotheosis and a nifty buff) and convinced the entire Calernia to see him as an unbeatable bogeyman, the "death that cannot be denied". "A single man cannot vanquish the World" is the only narrative convention left standing, and has already hit "godhood", with lowercase "g"

Triumphant MADE Praes, and is its cultural staple. She overturned every opponent, defiled every temple, belief and convention that opposed her, and only run afoul of the "A single woman cannot vanquish the World" trope, which is the last narrative brake left before the metaphorical rape-train hits the GODHOOD station, with capital G.

Black & Malicia became sharply aware of the narrative weight against Praes, and how it was ultimately anchored in reality & a resources problem. They did not only be clever enough to overcome the narrative gradient with organizational davantages, they also did the long-term cultural engineering that made Callow an allied state from an ACCEPTABLE cultural, and hence narrative, standpoint.

Catherine, sweet Catherine, is onto something that may dwarf all of them. She is LEGITIMIZING and REDEFINING the very concept of "Villainy". Instead of being a classic "Villain" as someone who "rages against society and will take what is their due", she is a new Villain that "Only trusts Her Own Hands to do what needs to be done". And she is spearheading the Kantian, universallly acceptable, "ethical" Villain – the one that can have an universal appeal, to any and every demographic across Calernia.

In short? No wonder that EVERY single major narrative player across the "Above-Below" and political spectrum, from Grey Pilgrim to Neshamah, considers her a very serious threat. She is creating the biggest demographic consensus block across the entirety of history and Calernia; one in which a "Villain" tale scan be sung, its deeds cheered on as worthy of emulation, across any and every fireplace.

Catherine may well change culture, and hence narrative, across the entire Creation – and that is why both Neshamah & the Intercessor agree on trying to kill her.

She is building a new game, instead of playing the old one – and this is something that even Above & Below cannot tolerate. For at the end, they may be nothing but self-aware narrative conventions themselves.

Liliet

Since when is Bard confirmed to be trying to kill her?

(As of lately – I'm not counting First Liesse even if she wasn't lying to William because baby Cat had not had these ideas yet)

Tohron

There was her chat with Catherine immediately before she talked to the Grey Pilgrim about the Bard. In that, she first tried to persuade Catherine to follow a route she considered acceptable, but when that failed, she subtly tried to push Catherine into working against her in a manner where the Bard would have a deadly, decisive advantage.

Liliet

And Tariq pointed out it could just as easily be read as a test that Catherine passed (and that it was fairly predictable she would).

Catherine was still pissed because she did not fucking sign up for testing, but the fact remains that Bard's intentions are ambiguous.

NZPIEFACE

TAP_M113

"You have lashed out at two heroes in two days, Black Queen," the White Knight said.

Two out of three.....

SHIT, pattern of 3 incoming! So that was what Neshamah was about with the Tancred affair, making lashing against Heroes an established narrative convention about Cat!

This would be a lethal wedge to drive against the Grand Alliance. Good catch, Hanno... hope your pep-talk skills are sharp, we are going to need them for surgery.

Neshamah / narrative was a sneaky, brilliant bastard in there. Kudos to you, EE.

Liliet

I... what? I cannot tell if this is a parody of the way the fandom treats the rule of 3 or a genuine example.

TAP_M113

A Genuine example. It would make for a small impact, but subtlety is the name of the game.

Arguably, Catherine greatest strength is how she manages to make every named cooperate into a well-oiled warmachine regardless of their place in the Hero-Villain alignment axis. At this point, ingraining a short temper and a dislike for certain key heroes is a subtle narrative pivot that Neshamah could exploit to his advantage, small enough to pass unnoticed, but targeted enough to weaken Cat, and the Grand Alliance, by extension.

Never forget, the current shape of the Grand Alliance in this operation theater is a feudal coalition that critically relies on a large set of Named and troops freely gifting their loyalty to Catherine, in a feudal fashion. Impair her diplomatic abilities, and it significantly impairs the army.

"Lashed at two heroes, in two days"... This implies to me that lashing against one a third time, on the third day, makes for a rule of three.

Taking into account that this would be the kind of subtle "narrative assassination" that Bard has pulled in the past, and Neshamah is stated to be her equal, I wouldn't be surprised if this is what we are seeing here.

Liliet

I think 'two make the third follow' is too broad a rule and so only really works when the narrative weight is overwhelming – like assimilation of Fae courts. Lashing out at people after being upset is... just not on the same level. Like five people even know that Cat did that at all, you know? And out of them like two care. So no, narrative pull won't even be noticable (like how gravity strictly speaking works between all objects, but you do not notice being pulled towards the ceiling and walls).

Liliet

Another problem is that this is too specific. If Neshamah had the pull / predictive power to make it specifically two heroes in two days, this war wouldn't even be a fight at all.

What you're ignoring is that this is a result of the blanket effect – Neshamah is fucking with Catherine's head. He's making her upset, sloppy, taunting her about capitalizing on her weaknesses. This works in his favor period, whatever the exact flavor of mistake / lashing out it results in. And it works even if Hanno disrupts this particular "pattern", since at the very least it ties up resources / takes time to deal with.

Remember, a plan with more than two steps is not a plan, it's wishful thinking. This plan has just one step: 'rattle Catherine'. That's all it needs to accomplish, and that's all that Neshamah has to have predicted.

KageLupus

That is not really how the Pattern of Three works, though. It is not just "A Named does the same thing three times", and it doesn't transfer across different Named.

The Pattern happens when two Named which are narratively connected clash multiple times, and dictates what those clashes look like. The first time someone loses but survives, the second is a draw, and in the third clash the winners/losers are reversed but the losers die.

Cat had a Pattern contest with the Lone Swordsman and came out on top in the end. Akua purposefully maneuvered herself into having a Pattern with Cat early on specifically so she could leverage it when it mattered (she did end up winning the final contest, but Black and Assassin interfered afterwards). Tariq tries to trick Cat into a Pattern but she used her genre-savvy superpower to sidestep the whole thing.

None of which even kind of resembles what has happened in the last few chapters with Cat and the Champion, or the Apostle. There was no fight, not even in a subtle narrative way like Tariq. And even if there were, there wasn't a second clash where both sides took a draw. Cat yelled at a kid for being chosen by Above, and then yelled at the Champion for (when you break it down) killing someone she cared about.

There is no deeper narrative fight going on, no big clash of fate being promised or resolved. This is just Named posturing and normal social dynamics.

Earl of Purple

The loser of the third confrontation doesn't have to die. Dread Emperor Irritant used this to his advantage by confronting every hero on the continent, in such a way that he had eight or more patterns going at once. And when he ran out of patterns, he abdicated and made very good shoes, which we know worked three times.

Liliet

> Akua purposefully maneuvered herself into having a Pattern with Cat early on specifically so she could leverage it when it mattered (she did end up winning the final contest, but Black and Assassin interfered afterwards).

That's not what happened. The last confrontation of the three that Akua was fated to win was the one against Chider, and the victory was that Chider successfully ambushed Cat and took away her Name.

It just, uh, didn't stick, because of the whole 'undead' thing.

On another note, all things considered Hanno is being very polite about this.

Liliet

I think Hanno's worried about Catherine, not about Raphaella.

Frivolous

Does Hanno only manage heroes and do diplomacy with notable non-Named figures, or does he manage soldiers as well?

I don't recall ever seeing Hanno command a host, or do paperwork, or other administrative duties.

Because if Hanno only manages heroes then it occurs to me that one reason why Catherine might be deteriorating (or at least more quickly than Hanno has been deteriorating) is that she manages an entire army in addition to standing for the villains under the Truce and Terms. Cat does a lot more work.

Liliet

Yes. Yes, she is.

On the other hand, Catherine doesn't make excursions to fight herself like Hanno does. Technically there's things he does that she doesn't.

The phrase is rather Harlequin Romance, yes.

Javvies

The good news is that the next chapter should be out fairly soon as of my writing this.

The bad news is that you'll be caught up again right away. And then you'll have to suffer and wait like the rest of us.

Chapter 10: Reflections

"Men pray only to angels because their devils need no summons."
– King Edmund of Callow, the Inkhand

"See, I thought that too at first," I mused. "That I owed you some sort of explanation. But then I had another think, looked back at what I actually did. And, really, what's the worse you can put on me? I was curt with a kid. I told a Named who came in my tent uninvited to get the Hells out before I tossed her out."

I shrugged.

"I hurt a heroine's feelings," I said. "Twice. Ah, what utter perfidy."

The last sentence I uttered with a cocked brow and the driest tone I could muster.

"I suppose we'll have to get through this the usual way," I announced. "I'll bring the hammer and nails if you bring the cross, White Knight: if I'm going to be crucified over a trifle, the least you could do is go halvesies on the materials."

Hanno's face betrayed no reaction to my words as he studied me, calm as ever. No, perhaps calm was the wrong word, for it implied a degree of peace. Indolence, when at its worst. The White Knight was a creature of certainly, which leant him the appearance of calm, but there was nothing peaceful about certainty. Especially in the hands of a hero, who could so often weave from it either death or salvation.

"You've not often had an equal, have you Catherine?" the dark-skinned man pensively said. "A few superiors, I imagine: most of them unkind or untrustworthy, more marks in the making than someone whose lead was worth following. And followers by the thousands, that one is beyond denial. Not all of them truly beneath you in skill and strength, either. You might insist that the Woe are more allies than subordinates, but when has one of them ever tried to give you an order?"

I rather hoped this wasn't about to segue into a little speech about the nature of the Woe. I'd had quite a few people try their hand at those over the years, most with knowledge of the individuals involved about as deep as Keteran grave. Usually it was some sort of hackneyed comparison with the Calamities. I'd even once asked it of Black, out of morbid curiosity, to which he'd mildly answered that given the way even individuals who'd borne the same Names could vary so wildly in motivation and disposition any attempt to force precedent in groups of Named was, at best, misguided. Which had essentially been an elaborate way of telling me the Calamities were the Calamities and the Woe were the Woe, and anyone trying to hack at the truth of either to fit both into the mold of legacy was a fool. There were good reasons I remained fond of the man to this day.

"I will assume that this is meant to, eventually, reach something baring vague resemblance to a point," I said.

"If you perceive me as being subordinate to you, or allied, then you have a rather sweet temper," Hanno said, sounding rather fascinated. "Yet the moment I am seen as demanding answers from you or being set above you in some manner, you bare your fangs without hesitation. I have never seen it so neatly displayed in sequence as it was today, which I'll chalk up to exhaustion on your part. You are rarely so easy to parse."

I pushed down the toothy, slightly nasty smile I'd been about to send his way. No need to feed the metaphor.

"Most people don't enjoy being described to themselves, Hanno," I said.

Might be there was some part of truth to what he'd said, though. Adjutant saw more of me than anyone, so he'd be able to tell me – from there, it'd just be a question of how to smooth away that wrinkle. I couldn't afford to have obvious levers on my temper in my position, especially when I had a nascent Name. Mantles tended to put the best and worst of you in sharp relief, so it was all the more important to know what those were.

"You are not most people," Hanno calmly replied. "Already the measured part considers adjustment, while the one forged by your teachers begins to ponder if this is not a manner manipulation."

It wasn't difficult to manipulate who respected you, I knew. I did it all the time. His vocalization of that fact did nothing to put out the ever-burning embers of suspicion that seemed to fall asleep around fewer people every year.

"We've strayed far from whatever grievances you might want to bring to me," I said. "Which I've yet to hear, regardless."

"You were unkind to a scared and tired child of fourteen, for reasons which had little to do with her," the White Knight said. "If you could offer an apology or a reassurance so that she does not believe the foremost villain of our age had personal enmity towards her, I would appreciate it. I am, however, aware I have neither right nor means to compel this of you."

"Would you, if you did?"

I almost wondered who it was that'd asked that, before I recognize my own fool voice. The question had slipped out of me before it could be put away in the back of my mind, my lips moving of their own accord. Some part of me had expected some classical answer to come out of the White Knight's mouth before a heartbeat had passed, but that was doing Hanno disservice. The Ashuran hero considered the matter seriously, only answering when he was certain of his answer. I trusted his words more for that, twisted as the thought might be. It was one thing to say you would never but we both knew it was different when you actually had that power. I'd come up the ranks of the Empire talking of reason and compromise but later in my career, when I'd had the strength to dictate terms, how many times had I refrained from doing so? People always found it easy to dismiss the thought of drink before sweet wine was pressed to their lips.

"No," he said. "It is not a crime to be uncivil. Regardless, it is not my place to give such orders."

"You give orders to your heroes all the time," I retorted, and raised a hand to quiet him when he began to answer, "You don't get to call them requests when people listen to them every single time, Hanno."

"That is only the use of my authority as a representative under the Truce and the Terms," the White Knight told me. "It is not a personal matter."

"Yeah, so that's nonsense," I said. "We dressed it up real good, put it in ink and slapped some impressive seals onto the parchment, but pretending even for a moment that our authority isn't personal is ridiculous. Heroes don't listen to you because you're a high officer of the Grand Alliance, they listen to you because you personally command their respect – either because of your record, your Name or your character."

"That sounded almost like a compliment," Hanno said, sounding amused.

I rolled my eyes.

"Look, to keep my side in line I have to show I'm powerful, ruthless and I'm willing to send a few plumb opportunities their way should they toe the line," I said. "For you it's more like a virtue pissing match paired with your war record – and on top of that you've got just a dash of divine right to lead, since this whole mess is somewhat crusade-shaped and you're the White Knight."

"I would ask how a virtue pissing match would take place in practice, but I've learned better than to provoke your talent for the descriptive," the White Knight noted.

"I'm serious," I flatly told him. "Tariq was everyone's favourite grandfather, until he made a deal with me once. He's still digging himself out of that hole. If he pulled out the same kind of tricks right now he used to catch my teacher, I'm not sure he wouldn't get a hero after him for it. Why? 'cause he made a truce with a villain. His virtue bragging rights were put in doubt, his heroic 'reputation', so now he couldn't do the job you do even if he wanted to."

"Trust in the Peregrine ebbed because a villain was instrumental in his resurrection," Hanno corrected. "There is long precedent in corrupting magics and even necromancy being used on heroes, which means those with only glancing knowledge of those events have reason to worry about him being unduly influenced."

He paused.

"Heroes who learn of even surface details of the affair tend to dismiss such concerns entirely," he noted. "I would argue you overestimate how deeply the Princes' Graveyard affected his reputation, at least as far as faith in his judgement is concerned."

"And you don't think it's grotesque," I said, "that butchering an entire village by plague didn't get people wondering about that, but that evening did?"

"I do not judge," the White Knight replied. "Now less than ever."

"But you do, Hanno," I hissed out. "Because you chose to be part of a structure, and that structure doles out judgement all the time. It judged that your kid, the one whose answer to fucking death on the march was to get down on her knees and pray, she's the good one. She gets to live. Mine, the one who actually tried to bloody well do something? Well, he was bad. He gets to die."

His dark eyes were kind, which only strengthened the streak of anger that'd torn through me.

"How close was the mirroring?" Hanno quietly asked.

"The Scorched Apostate," I said, baring teeth. "A mage too. His sorcery mimicked Light, with a tinge of fire to it."

Tancred was the greater loss here, damn me twice for it. Healers were useful, but most were mediocre in fight against other Named unless they were part of a band of five. The Scorched Apostate would have been useful in half a dozen ways, from his eyes to his sorcery to the potential contribution to the Arsenal. What was the Stalwart Apostle going to do, except dole out Light? If the Heavens were going to pick the children they saved, they could at least pick them better.

"I take it he is dead," the White Knight asked.

"The Dead King got the drop on me," I straightforwardly said.

"Kid fell asleep, the new ghouls ate and replaced my escort while I was studying the remains of the village and turned him into a Revenant."

I saw him, saw the cast of his face and his mind as he almost asked why a village had become remains, but then he thought better of it. He had a knack for knowing when to advance and when to retreat, this one.

"I'm sorry," Hanno said. "It would have been a blow, and Pascale's survival would have been salting the wound."

"I shouldn't have been curt with your kid," I conceded. "But I will not apologize for speaking the truth to her, either."

The sooner she learned that providence was not a panacea for poor decisions, the better.

"That," the White Knight calmly said, "is where we disagree. You did not speak the truth to her, you simply spoke in anger and dismay."

"They've got it all handled, then? How lovely," I scathingly replied. "If the Heavens have it all under control, forgive me for meddling. I'll march my armies home and leave you lot to the business of winning."

"Ninety-nine times out of a hundred," Hanno quoted, "nine hundred and ninety-nine times out of a thousand, that act of faith would have killed dozens of thousands. That is what you said, word for word. Regardless of your sarcasm, I disagree."

"How many little villages did the zombies eat, to make up an army whose numbers warranted three heroes and a fourth forming to fight?" I said. "Five, ten, twenty? You really think none of the people there ever thought to pray their way out of it? They still died, White."

"You take helplessness for negligence," the dark-skinned man flatly replied. "Do you sincerely believe that, if the Heavens had been able to empower a champion during those tragedies instead, they would have stood by and done nothing? There are rules, Black. What you condemn as apathy, I mourn instead as inability."

"Gods should not need to be excused," I harshly said. "If you're to claim yourself as the source of all that is Good, then either triumph or stop strutting about. If faith is a wager, then at the very least they should have the fucking decency to acknowledge it."

"Below are deities as well," Hanno said. "While deploring that the Heavens are not omnipotent, in the same breath you rage only at the half of the Gods trying to mend-"

"I've seen the work of Choirs," I softly interrupted. "And I do not call that mending. I'll say this for the Gods Below: utter bastards that they are, they always grant the precise measure of what was bargained for. And they don't ask you to kiss their feet for it first."

"Because Below does not have agents or servants," the White Knight sharply said. "It has horses, and they are ridden 'til they break. Or are you so enamoured of the Hellgods you will not acknowledge that by the time hero's blade bites into the flesh the villain is long dead? That whatever beauty, whatever decency there might have been in what drove them at first, it ever transmutes into deaths and red madness?"

"I find it rich of you to argue this, given that before the Graveyard the two oldest heroes were the Saint and the Pilgrim," I snorted. "Which of them did not have a body count to match those of the greatest villains of their age? Above warps you just as much as Below does us, except we're supposed to pretend in your case it's a good thing. It's almost like wielding great power and rubbing elbows with unearthly entities for decades has consequences no matter what direction your prayers are headed."

Vivienne had made it plainly clear that the Dominion of Levant would rather leave the Grand Alliance than sign onto the clause I'd pushed to be added against named rulers, but I still believed in the principle: Names affected you, everyone knew that. It was just that the side dressing in white had convinced itself into believing for them it was never a bad thing.

"Would you have balked at comforting a child you scared, in the days before you became the Squire?" Hanno simply asked.

That stung, though half the sting came from the surprise. I hardly ever thought about those times, nowadays. In every way that mattered the girl Catherine Foundling had been died when I chose to take the knife Black had offered me.

"I some ways I was even worse of an ass at sixteen," I replied, unsure what the true answer to his question would be. "And you're falling into that old heroic trap, White: looking back at olden times and thinking they were a golden age instead of an age just like this one, with troubles and joys both."

"Or perhaps you are falling into that old villainous trap, Black," Hanno said, "of refusing to look back at who you were in fear of what it might make you question now."

"Funny thing, about fear," I said. "I'd wager I know it a lot better than you, Sword of Judgement. I don't get to kick my decisions upstairs when I have to make them."

"And you believe this to be easy?" Hanno said, cocking his head to the side. "That restraint, patience, faith – they are somehow easier paths to follow than those you tread?"

I bit my tongue, because even angry as I was I would not descend into petty insults. That beat of silence let him take the initiative in speaking again.

"The child you so disdain," the White Knight said, "had magic to call on. Enough she could have fled or fought the undead. Yet when death swallowed her little corner of the world, she did neither. She sought a way to heal the people who doubted her, and when all she knew failed her she still did not give up. She threw away what she was to help others, Black, and I will not let you even imply that such a decision was cowardice or laziness. It was courage, and a refusal to compromise over what she held dearest."

"And if her story had been just a little off," I said. "To the side, and it just didn't quite settle into the proper groove for a Name – would you still be praising her then? Because she would have made for a courageous corpse, true enough, but we'd have a rampant plague on our hands."

More corpses, and those would not be the sort inclined to stay in the ground. It was all nice and good to be principled, until those principles started applying mostly to the way the world should be and not the way it actually was.

"Yet that is not what happened," Hanno said.

My frustration mounted.

"But it could have-"

"It did not, nor will it," the White Knight said, sounding the faintest bit irritated as well. "She is the Stalwart Apostle, a story of faith in the dark rewarded. You were advising her to act in a manner that goes against her Role, Catherine. If she takes the wager, she'll win every time."

"She couldn't have known that in advance, Hanno," I said. "Or you, for that matter. Are you telling me we should give advice to kids that'll get them killed most of the time?"

"I believe we should advise people according to who and what they are," he replied. "Yet your objection, I see, is not with the advice some young Named benefit from being given."

"You can't tell people that praying will solve things," I flatly said. "It won't, except in one in a hundred thousand occurrences like this. If that's what you put out as a story, that's what people will do instead of acting to save themselves. People can't rely on the Heavens for that, they'll just die."

If prayer somehow summoner heroes to the peril, or called forth angels or really anything useful at all this wouldn't get stuck in my throat so much but it wasn't like attending fucking sermons at the House made you able to use the Light.

"People rely on the Heavens for more than just intervention," Hanno chided me. "Faith in Above guides a soul both on Creation and beyond; simply because it does not call a storm of fire does not make it worthless. Besides, prayer does not preclude action."

"If you've got time to kneel and mutter, you've got time to raise a palisade," I bluntly replied. "One of them's a lot more useful than the other."

"I understand that you do not keep to Above," the White Knight said, frowning. "Nor would I expect you to. Yet your insistence that faith and ability are mutually exclusive is, to say the least, insulting."

"Faith doesn't keep the dead out," I said.

"Most the time," Hanno gently said, "neither does the palisade."

But there was the gap, I thought. He was phrasing as prayer, faith, making it some grand old thing. But what it was, in practice, was sitting and hoping someone else would solve your problems for you. And I couldn't abide that, not in people I was supposed to respect, not even if it worked. Because for most people it didn't, and you couldn't call it a solution if it worked one time in a thousand. But there was no point in arguing this with him, was there? This was a man who'd embraced the role of champion for the Choir of Judgement and never looked back – he'd been able to call on the judgement of the Seraphim with the flip of a coin for years. There was no questioning that kind of closeness with the divine and telling him the only two gods I'd ever liked were the ones I'd helped make would only amuse him.

"Nothing more to be said on this, I don't think," I sighed.

"Agreed," the White Knight replied. "I do enjoy our talks, Catherine, though I doubt we'll ever change each other's mind. If your own philosophy is to be the face and method Evil takes in the decades to come, it is one I can make my peace with."

I grunted, not replying outright. Of all the heroes I'd met he was one I had most affinity for, but sweet as that could be sometimes on other it only served to bring into relief the things we deeply disagreed on. None of them, though, we worth parting ways over. I'd tolerated worst of people I respected less.

"You're not bringing me an official complaint under the Terms, am I understanding correctly?" I asked instead.

"Neither Rafaela nor Pascale sought me out for one, that is true," Hanno confirmed

I might despise the Champion, but I'd at least admit she didn't seem like the kind of woman who'd run to the White Knight after getting her pride bruised.

"I am not demanding answers of you," the dark-skinned man continued. "I am simply noting your rather famous sense of diplomacy had lapsed of late."

I rolled my eyes at that. I wasn't a diplomat, I was just good at maneuvering myself into a position where people had to listen to me or the consequences to them would be horrid. As for handling villains, that wasn't diplomacy: I was pretty sure you stopped being able to call it that after the first two times you dropped someone at the bottom of an Arcadian lake and left them there for thirty beats before taking back them out to... emphasize the importance of keeping a civil tongue.

"It has been made clear to me I've been taking on too much," I admitted. "It's taking its toll in a lot of ways, some of them more subtle than others."

Some were not subtle at all, like the fact that the White Knight had brought back to camp a recruit while I'd brought back a corpse. Hanno grimaced, the expression odd to see on his face. While he was not solemn, neither was he prone to strong expressions. I watched his arm coil as he closed his hand, reaching for something against his palm. A coin, I thought. The coin.

"I have contributed to this, Catherine, and I apologize for it," Hanno said as my brow rose in surprise. "In many matters I have deferred to you and relied on you to express to the Grand Alliance our shared opinions."

"It's not like you've been sleeping in," I drily said. "You've been either out there, training heroes or here with me since the war got going."

"You have duties I do not," he frankly said. "As a queen and a general. I have known this yet often allowed you to take the lead on shared responsibilities whenever you offered."

He slowed, looking uncomfortable for a passing beat.

"It was comfortable for me, deferring," the White Knight admitted. "In the wake of the silence left by the Hierarch's folly it was pleasant to let someone else take charge and rely on the sharpness of their vision until I got my bearings. And, after, I saw no harm in leaving matters as they were: you excelled, and I could contribute in ways that did not involve changing the way of things."

"You didn't force authority onto me," I said. "I took it, knowingly."

In those early days, even with our unsettling connection weighing on the scales I wasn't sure how much I would have trusted him anyway. By that point I'd hardly ever met a hero that hadn't tried to kill me, much less one who was actively trying to be helpful.

"And it has run you ragged, hasn't it?" Hanno murmured. "You nearly never allowed yourself to be this... raw around me. Even drunk you are guarded."

I clenched my teeth. This was starting to sound a lot like pity. Save your pity for the kid who'll never reach fifteen, I thought. I'm just tired and wicked and wary.

"I would begin handling the formal correspondence with the First Prince and Highest Assembly, if you've no objection," the White Knight firmly offered. "And, considering the many demands on your time, perhaps your end of the Origin Hunts could be passed to another villain."

"Beastmaster-" I began.

"Cannot afford to alienate the both of us," Hanno said. "And is well-aware of this. He'll collaborate with whoever you choose."

He said as much in the tone of someone who fully intended to make that prediction into a fact, blade bare if need be. The White Knight had taken to Ranger's wayward pupil even less than I had, which was how Beastmaster had ended up largely in my wheelhouse in the first place.

"I intend to withdraw from the front for some time," I admitted. "If necessity dictates that we begin preparing an all-out assault on northern Hainaut soon it'll not be as long or restful a withdrawal as I'd been considering, but as it is I'm considering heading to the Arsenal early."

Masego would be there, who I'd not seen in too long, and if I got lucky maybe Indrani would be as well – although in that sense the getting lucky would be coming after her presence was confirmed.

Gods, that'd do me some good as well. When shady, ambitious Levantine villains were starting to look tempting it meant it'd been too long. And, Hells, even if she wasn't odds were that Nephele would be there. That remained an enticing piece of unfinished business.

"You should," Hanno encouraged. "We've ended the immediate threat of the plague and the Grey Pilgrim is tracking down whatever remnants might have been seeded – he might come to take Pascale for a journey soon – so aside from military matters you should be able to hand off there's no pressing need for you to remain."

"The Blood might come to you with another beehive that got kicked," I told him.

"The Barrow Sword?" he asked.

I snorted.

"Guess," I said.

"I expect it will and in a compromise that pleases no one in particular," Hanno said. "Either separate rolls of the Blood for the villainous, or admission into the existing ones with most of the attendant privileges stripped out."

Which would be a massive gain for Ishaq anyway, though well shot of what he wanted. Much as he might protest otherwise, the Barrow Sword very much wanted a little corner of Levant to rule. One where he could begin gathering other Bestowed from our side of the fence, and began smashing his way into a degree of prominence at some other family's expense. He was not so much a fool as to think he had a chance of toppling the Isbili, but he was ambitious enough I would not put it beyond him to have an eye on taking one of the great cities belonging to another founding bloodline.

"Either way I can't let them simply bury the man," I said. "It'll close the door on any other Levantine villain joining us, and I swore oaths otherwise besides."

"I'll advise restraint and compromise, then," the White Knight replied. "Yet even that does not seem too pressing a need – scrying back and forth with Levante will take months."

"So long as the Holy Seljun and the rest of them know I'll frown on Ishaq being cheated," I said. "At the very least the man is owed recognition for the things he's actually doing."

"A sensible stance," Hanno nodded. "Is it him you'll be naming as your stand-in for the Origin Hunts?"

The Barrow Sword, serving as some poor freshly-risen Named's introduction to the Truce and the Terms? No, that had disaster written all over it. That'd need someone with a defter touch, and I wasn't sure I'd be able to spare Hakram.

"I'll probably pull the Rapacious Troubadour back from Brabant," I frowned. "He's certainly got the knack for finding hidden things."

Archer would probably have taken him into her band of five, compulsive killer or not, if she'd not already been full-up. I was rather happier with her trusting her back to the Harrowed Witch instead, even if she'd murdered her own brother – sometimes it could be slim pickings, when it came to recruiting 'trustworthy' villains. With his thirst for death and songs sated by the access the First Prince reluctantly had given him to death row prisoners, the Troubadour had nonetheless proved to be damned useful. He'd predicted the skirmishes between refugee camps and the Brabant locals months before they happened, even identifying the likely ringleaders for violence on both sides, which had allowed us to snuff that whole mess out in the crib. He'd also brought two other Named into the Truce and the Terms without there being violence involved, one of them even being a heroine, so between the instincts and the silvertongue he was probably my best bet around here.

I'd need someone to keep an eye on him, but that would also have been true if I named anyone outside the Woe.

"I don't suppose I could talk you into sending for the Hunted Magician instead," Hanno tried.

I snorted. The mage was much too useful in the Arsenal to be sent traipsing around the countryside.

"I'd thought not," the White Knight sighed. "I'd hoped it would be someone halfway respectable."

"I'll take that as a backhanded compliment," I said.

He smiled, surprised, and to my own surprise extended his arm to take the bottle of brandy in hand. He poured us each a cup with neat, measured spills that wasted not a drop.

"What are we drinking to?" I asked, taking my cup and raising it.

"Trouble waiting until tomorrow," he toasted.

Hells, I'd drink to that.

don't think there's anything particularly new in this conversation tbh, but it's always nice to see civil discussion (and less nice to see cat's still a stubborn ass with blinders but eh. she wouldn't be the cat we love if she wasn't)

Liliet

New things in this conversation:

- Catherine is slipping up;
- Catherine is FUCKING slipping up;
- Catherine is confusing pity and sympathy not just when it's from Akua;
- Catherine is slipping up BADLY;
- Hanno tries to be there for her as best he can;
- Hanno is capable of recognizing when he's being an ass on the meta level by deferring responsibilities -_-

NerfGlaistigUaine

While I agree with Cat that actions > prayer she's seriously lying to herself about her motives. She IS bitter she IS angry She IS NOT just telling the truth. In previous books she would have apologized for lashing out unfairly, in private if not in public, or sought some way to make amends not justified it. I hope it's just a continuing bad mood but believing your own lies, letting unfairness and bitterness shape how you see things... that's not a good path for someone courting Below.

Also Gods know Saint was an asshole and extremist but (unpopular opinion here) she was a better person than the Calamities. For all that Black is a charismatic affably man, he is a monster. He doesn't have good goals he's working towards, no shred of remorse, no sense of empathy or compassion save for those few he holds dear. What I'm saying here is that even the worst of heroes looks better than the villains. The Gods Above are no saints and White Knight has too rosy a view, but dear lord I can see why ppl would keep to Good given the alternative.

Liliet

Yeah.

Uh, except for the Black part. He has good goals he's working towards, he has empathy for random people he's never met before and cares about morality, he's just a big numbers utilitarian about it =x

(I have citations on all of this)

NerfGlaistigUaine

Huh. I thought his ultimate goal was to beat the Gods and everything else was for that. Can I actually have the citations for the cares about random people and morality part? If that's true I need to reevaluate how I've been seeing him.

Alex Straughan

Caring for random people might be a bit of a stretch but he's never more cruel than he needs to be and he was certainly capable of friendship and kindness. Like the painless poison offered to the rebel nobels of Callow before he crucified them. He's not someone who ever enjoyed others pain.

NerfGlaistigUaine

Oh, very much agree. My headcanon of Black is someone who is very goal-oriented and efficient, but not cruel. He doesn't enjoy suffering, he's generous when he can and has no reason not to be, and has people he genuinely cares for – but he can turn that off (mostly) too. Thing is, he's still a monster. His goal isn't nice – it's awesome maybe even laudable to rage against the Heavens but not nice – I don't think he's had a single on-screen moment of regret for the things he's done or the innocents he's killed, and maybe saying he's got no empathy or compassion is going too far, but it certainly seems quite limited.

Again, I'd be quite interested if there are scenes that prove me wrong. Characters with depth always have room for alternative interpretations and it's cool to take another look.

Shveiran

I don't think you are wrong per se, but I feel you are leaving out parts that give the whole a new meaning.

While it is true that Amadeus' ultimate goal is to spit in the eyes of the Gods Above, the path he has chosen to that end is not to lead some greenskinned horde to pillage Salia and salt the earth, nor to look for a crazy ritual that will allow him to ascend and grasp divine power.

What he does is using his monstrous energy to change the society around him. To reduce inequality, reduce conscription, reduce blood sacrifice use, reduce divisions, smother civil wars in Praes, and break the cycle of Praes-tries-to-conquer-Praes-and-eventually-fails.

And that massively saves and improves lives.

Granted, he doesn't do it because he is a good person; he does it because it works and it helps him move closer to his goal.

But then... so what? Black kills someone, saves a lot of lives.

Heroes kill someone, and save lives.

The results are not that different. Heck, the methods are not that different when you strip away the details: most heroes save folks spreading death to those they find deserving, not healing. Healers are a subset.

IN GENERAL, I agree the average Hero has a more positive impact than the average Villain.

IN PRACTICE, the idea that ALL heroes have a more positive an impact than ALL Villains is... untrue.

How much good did William ever do? Or Hunter? Or the Bumbling Conjuror? Or the Silver Prince? All they did was killing people. And those are just people we kind of know the story of.

If someone kills 100 people and saves 10000, you can call him a monster (heck, I would) but you can't really deny that they did more good than you or I will likely ever do, from an utilitarian point of view.

You'd have an hard convincing the families of those 10000 it would have been better if the monster was never born, is what I'm saying.

Granted, you might have an easier time convincing the families of the 100, but again, from an utilitarian point of view? That's a lot less families.

NerfGlaistigUaine

Everything you said is true or at least something I agree with. I would add that the difference between doing good and being good is that Black would kill those 10,000 to save 100 instead if that's what was efficient, and may do so in future circumstances. By "looks better" I do not necessarily mean their overall impact but rather who they are as a person, a far more nebulous concept, but I digress. I'm interested now in Black's character more than his impact. Liliet informed me that I'd gotten it wrong and has examples, which has piqued my interest. I do hope he/she responds.

Btw I know it sounds like I hate Black but he's actually my favorite character. I absolutely love his motives and reasoning. When Cat asks him why he's doing all this when he doesn't even like Praes or Praesi and when he launches into his Motive Rant still go into my top 5 moments.

Shveiran

Ah, I see. I'm not sure what Liliet meant, so I can't help you there.

However (and I'm just wondering out loud here) can we discuss someone's goodness of character in a vacuum?

Maybe this is my Martin Luther showing, but there is a showing in my parts that goes "if you do nothing, you do nothing wrong". Can someone's goodness be discussed without addressing the actions they choose to take? Is good something you are, or something you do?

Liliet

> Black would kill those 10,000 to save 100 instead if that's what was efficient Efficient for what, though? The word "efficient" in a vacuum holds no meaning. What's the next step, what is he actually trying to achieve?

(Isn't it just such a miraculous coincidence that it's always fewer dead people that's a more "efficient" path in Black's calculations?)

Also, in my other reply I forgot to give a source on 'cares about morality'. It's mostly a lot of little things scattered here and there (I can round more up if you're interested) but one that particularly stuck with me is this:

> "A calculated measure meant to ensure the Principate could not continue waging war as it had," he said. "The morality of it I've no intention of debating, though I'll say that if the First Prince of Procer intends to use massed levies to fight wars then she marked her peasantry as a war asset by her own hand."

The morality of it I've no intention of debating, though I'll say that (Book 5 Chapter 56: Reflections)

...and as long as I'm making a second reply I might as well link my analysis of that one Motive Rant (I love that chapter)

Hope you want to engage further :3

> I don't think he's had a single on-screen moment of regret for the things he's done or the innocents he's killed.

Not regret, no. But between "It doesn't get easier" in Chapter 1, remembering the faces of people he killed (don't remember where that was mentioned), Sabah's commentary about him never allowing others to do his dirty work for him... and the Empress and him explicitly talking about how he's doing hers in Seed II – I can swear there's more little things here and there, these are all I know for a fact where to find...

He doesn't love what he's doing, that's for sure.

(Regret is something that I think he categorically doesn't allow in his framing – there are mistakes and there are necessities, and nothing to regret ever or ~~he'll break down completely~~) (this one's more speculative but it... tracks very well)

Liliet

> these are all I know for a fact where to find (except for that one which I don't. Oops)

NerfGlaistigUaine

First of all, wow, thanks for putting so much time/effort into this. Second, thanks for gathering some of my favorite speeches/convo/quotes into a convenient reddit page. Now, I'm going to do my best to answer in this comment.

I think it's interesting how we look at same moments but get different interpretations. For example, you show Black doing little kindnesses and argue that it's empathy/compassion while I see the same and I see affable evil. To speak without troping, I see Black doing those kindnesses b/c there's no reason not to and b/c he doesn't get happiness from evil. Think he says something like being a villain is no reason to be rude when giving poison to the nobles and that's basically what I took those moments as. It's... it's like he likes being mannerly, in the same way he purposefully doesn't act smug. He finds gloating and card-carrying evil distasteful, but that doesn't mean he cares for being good or for other people. At least that's how I read it. I also think it's this rather than genuine compassion b/c we've seen Black with his loved ones and its leagues away from his other interactions. I feel that if Black actually cared then some hint of regret would get through, like Cat still shows, some morsel of pain about hurting/killing others that would show his kindness isn't just empty manners.

Now the interesting thing is you see it as Black having some sense of morality and compassion but not showing it b/c his whole efficient-machine thing which honestly, is very possible. I just don't find it as convincing b/c it feels like the simpler answer to his acts of kindness is just his manners/likes rather than emotions he suppresses. Does that make sense? Of course it's hard to be sure, b/c even if I say Black's never done any major good thing that impedes his goals, that would still be in character with your interpretation of Black too. Black is complex, and complex character motives come with ambiguity. Now if there is an example of remorse or angst on the other hand and for regular ppl I'd be very interested

Now your reddit motive rant dissection... oh dear god, that's a lot... ummm I kinda skimmed it to be honest, but... so basically I'd argue that Black's definition of winning may be different from yours. After all, he sees Triumphant as a total failure even though she kicked Good's ass for a solid decade. And the Dead King, for all his power, stayed alive so long by playing into the role of the Bigger Bad Leaking Evil in a Can role rather than fighting it. What I'm saying is that Black wants more than a temporary victory he wants to carve a groove into Creation that says Evil can win and not just temporarily win or become a looming threat, but permanently take over Good and break the usual Roles – hence what he tried to do with Callow. However, that's partly conjecture so feel free to disagree. Some other points of disagreement with your analysis of motives, other than my disagreement about what Evil victory entails and all that I've already said, is 1) Saying Black wants to fix Praes brings up the question – why would Black care about Praes? Cat actually asked this before which triggered the motive rant, but it's something that needs an answer if Rage Against Heavens isn't it. 2) Malicia seems to believe Black wants to fight against the Heavens. When she's arguing with Black about the Crusade and thinking about him later on too, she thinks that Black has a personal pissing match with the Heavens and wants to beat them even if it ruins everything, which doesn't really fit with fixing Praes as an end goal. Oh and I think it's childish to think the world is fair, but not to think it should be/want it to be. And for Black to see the unfairness and want to break it like villains do isn't something I think reeks of falsehood.

I wrote way more than I intended to. I also rambled on and digressed a lot so my apologies there. I hope it's all understandable; I didn't present my points very well, it was more stream of consciousness here, but I hope they at least make sense. I'd love to discuss this further with you, but if we're going to go real in-depth mind if I hold off for two weeks or so? It's midterm season for me and even this reply is me procrastinating on writing my report... even though this is legit >1/2 the length my report needs to be, jesus...

Liliet

> so basically I'd argue that Black's definition of winning may be different from yours. After all, he sees Triumphant as a total failure even though she kicked Good's ass for a solid decade.

That's literally my point though. What IS his definition of victory?

> Malicia seems to believe Black wants to fight against the Heavens. When she's arguing with Black about the Crusade and thinking about him later on too, she thinks that Black has a personal pissing match with the Heavens and wants to beat them even if it ruins everything, which doesn't really fit with fixing Praes as an end goal.

Blah, I wish we weren't talking on wordpress. You wouldn't happen to have a reddit account and feel like taking it to the comments on one of my posts, would you? WordPress comments cannot even be EDITED for god's sake...

Anyway, there was this one fun chapter called Starlight.

> "He cannot conceive of a word where he does not win, you said," the Peregrine reminded me.

[...]

> "Yet I have lost," Black said. "Undeniably so."

[blah blah did he lose or not]

> "You bleed," Tariq acknowledged. "You rage, frozen and bitter as that poison is. But you are not cowed. You have ruled, but what do you know of rules? Am I to believe you will now put a yoke around your neck out of sentiment?"

> The old hero eyed the aging villain with disdain.

> "There is only so much of that in you," the Pilgrim said. "And it never bore more than a feather's weight on the scales, Lord of Carrion. I have seen the laws that would be the fabric of the Accords, and I see good in them for even if the children of Above will find their hands bound in some ways it is but a pittance to what it will cost Below's favoured monsters. You will be stripped of manners of terror and brutality in myriad, forced to measure your wickedness and moderate your cruelties. You will be bound by fetters and told at the edge of the blade that ambitions cannot be without restraint. I see nothing, have seen nothing, in you that would take any of this as more than wasted ink."

> "It must be a pleasant world to live in, where any that stand opposite of you must be either grasping or grasped," Black smiled. "Either the creature of the Gods Below or their apostle in wickedness – either way, what sin can there be in breaking us?"

Thoughts on that last line of Amadeus's?

(Please, please let's take this to reddit or discord or skype or ANYWHERE that's more suited to longer discussions lmao)

(not presenting my points well immediately is a problem I struggle with too so yeah I'd prefer a format that didnt expect you to just make a single uneditable thesis statement and limit the depth of nesting)

And yeah later is fine! I'd like it if we coordinated the 'location' first though ^^;

Liliet

...I've been told recently that I should ask questions less and explain my point more, so to elaborate on the Starlight quote: Black's saying that the 'pissing match with Heavens' part of his career is over because lovely as that would have been he's lost and trying wasn't worth it – and his core goal is absolutely not mutually exclusive with Good benefitting too and being allies with Good and he's honestly kind of offended at the implication that it isn't.

And Tariq's reading of his willingness to do that as 'sentiment' is nonsense, it's fueled by his core drive, not anything surface.

Tek

By the way, it is a little annoying that noone (as far as archived reddit goes) did not point out that

Tower, in fact, did not stand since Miezens, and was brought down twice by good guiz, although I can't find a direct quote. One of those was Triumphant, who did it mostly out of spite though.

Sure, it's a little thing. But it's from the little things that casual kindness is built.

Did you know I can't reply to your last comment b/c wordpress doesn't allow replies after a certain number on a thread? Seriously, wth? And yeah, I have a reddit account, same username. I have midterms this week and a Europe tour next week (hell yeah!) but would love to discuss further in March.

Liliet

Yeah.

There's a way to reply anyway if you read the comments through the notifications. Which is even more inconvenient.

Reddit it is. Good luck with your midterms (and your trip!)

Cicero

His primary goal seems to be to create a Praes that doesn't have to choose between starvation and war with Callow every decade or so.

He also believes that the only way to truly achieve that requires killing most/all of the Praes High Lords, eliminating the very concept of High Lords, and the negotiating some sort of peaceful coexistence with Callow.

Furthermore he shares the common feeling among villains that achieving his goal means defeating the Gods. Thus he delights in sticking it to them when he can (without messing up his own goals).

I do mean the 'I have citations' part, yeah.

Thoughts, comments, objections?

luminiousblu

The question is whether or not actions actually are more important than prayers, or exclusive. Historically speaking one of the most important factors in every battle was morale, and this includes more than literal sword-swinging battles and extends to things like long voyages, business deals, or even works of art. Prayer can be seen as both a show of hope (when praying for something) and an effort at self reflection (when praying to something), and many of the more famous battles in history began with prayers on both sides (and I don't mean just in the Abrahamic world). People need something to cling to, and providing that rock, or being the one who doesn't let go of the rock, is not necessarily a bad thing, nor does it stop you from acting. Cat has this weirdly childish view of the world on a metaphysical level where she basically refuses to understand basic human nature as it relates to being 'pragmatic', despite clearly knowing all the principles behind it. It's especially dubious when she, like Black, has this way of ignoring the way Names work, and work very well, for everyone else, even if they make it their personal philosophy to try to bypass its workings.

As for good people, the reason Black is the Black Knight instead of the Zealous Reformer or the High Minister or something is because his goal has fuckall to do with actually helping the empire and everything to do with giving the finger to Above and proving to himself and his own ego that he can win, or at least force them to lose. It's quite possible he once really did care much more about the whole breadbasket problem or similar issues, but that was when he was the Squire, a Neutral name, not an Evil one.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Re: Black's Name: Zealous Reformer isn't a Name. The reason it isn't a Name (aside of course from simple authorial intent) is that it doesn't have the cultural traction to be (and why would it, in Praes? How many major, culturally significant reforms spearheaded by single individuals could it have had?). His having the Name he most recently had doesn't conclusively prove anything about him other than that he was considered by an unfeeling natural force to fit the description adequately. Moreover, Cat branded his Name and gave him an ultimatum about moral self-improvement, and it seemed to take; he subsequently lost his Name.

Liliet

> the reason Black is the Black Knight instead of the Zealous Reformer or the High Minister or something is because his goal has fuckall to do with actually helping the empire and everything to do with giving the finger to Above

Not how Names work. He was the Black Knight because he specifically set out to claim the Name. Cat wasn't The National Savior either, and Hanno isn't The Heroic Representative.

erebus42

Well yeah that's Cat for ya. And well you'd be hard pressed to find someone without blinders of some kind. Hanno's own were on good display here too.

Liliet

Ooo?

Javvies

Hmm.

Cat's not wrong that depending on prayer to solve physical problems is doomed folly barring extremely rare exceptions. Mental conundrums or philosophical uncertainty, sure, that can sometimes benefit from prayer and contemplation, but that's not what she's talking about.

I'm just not entirely sure that she's making the best presentation of her position, though.

Not that it particularly matters, since she's probably not going to be convincing Hanno anytime soon that turning to the Heavens for everything is a bad plan.

Liliet

I mean, it's a plan that works when you do it right, which also applies to every other kind of plan.

Catherine is kidding herself when she says 'not working most of the time' is what she doesn't like about prayer.

andr

>I mean, it's a plan that works when you do it right, which also applies to every other kind of plan.

What does 'do it right' mean in this context? I don't think the people who are praying successfully in PGtE are doing anything different to those who just die.

TeK

Evidently, they do. For example, they choose to not engage in practices they consider abhorrent for a chance at survival. They would rather die, but not cross arbitrary moral line, and yes, they would rather everyone died, if the price is said crossing of a semi-arbitrary line. Praying does not stop you from building the palisade. But if the palisade is breached, throwing your mother to zombies so that you and your wife can escape and procreate and continue the human line, is not about praying anymore. It's about whether you can live with certain actions, or not. And hell, I don't know what is the right decision. But Heavens don't view it as a character trait they desire to see in the populace. And Cat is outraged because she never really got on her knees properly, and so she can't help but wonder if all the death that followed couldn't be averted by one bending of a neck. She wonders if it was a practicality that drives her, saying that risking thousands of lives on a gamble with unknown odds is pure stupidity, or her own pride and hubris and unwillingness to let go of a degree (or an illusion) of control. Because arguments justifying your actions would always sound more convincing, even if you pretend to not care for those. And you have to carry on and bury those damned fears that maybe, just maybe, you are fooling yourself, and you were wrong all along, because you just too far gone, and can't afford to hesitate, can't afford to stop and ponder.

Liliet

Mm.

There's also an element there of "I have 99 problems with Above; what Below, Below doesn't count, they're more like one huge problem – but Above, Above could be BETTER and I'm going to talk about it every time especially when a kid just died and I think he wouldn't have if Heavens had been more JUST so you saying that Heavens are wonderful PISSES ME OFF"

denimcurtain

Doing it right can mean only doing it with a story at your back in this world.

Liliet

Yeah. There isn't a judge up there seeing everything and making individual calls, there's just an impersonal force that acts when conditions are met.

Which admittedly makes the faith in Above as it is preached literally wrong.

Liliet

When the circumstances are right for it =x

Djinn O'Cide

Was that a typo, or did Hanno just call her Black? Foreshadowing her new name, perhaps?

Agent J

... she's the Black Queen.

Liliet

I thought it might be a typo too, at first, but he said it repeatedly.

It makes sense as a nickname but it just sounds so weird lmao

Shveiran

I mean, she calls him White. And they are peers in their official roles under the Truce and Terms, which are about the relationships between Villains and Heroes when you get right down to it.

I kinda like the symmetry, tbh.

...But yeah, it is superweird still.

medailyfun

Usually she called him by name, and there she was calling him White, so it was a kind of retort.

caoimhinh

I notice that Hanno only called Cat "Black" in response to her calling him "White" in the sentence directly before. So it's more like he's just replying with a mirror of whatever he calls her.

Might be some Meta-story working there, as Hanno is genre-savvy and those two are equals in many senses. I don't know.

gnaruscat

Holy plotohook, I just clicked about how much of a mirror those two are.

Both were Named with divine patronage. Cat lost her Name, kept the patrons. Hanno kept the name, lost the patrons.

Artemii Semenov

And we just got a precedent of new names coming in pairs.

Shveiran

A precedent that proves things can happen in pairs does not suggest that things are likely to come in pairs, though

Darkening

Yeah, I had a very strong reaction to Hanno calling her Black lol. Especially with how the chapter thoroughly disabuses the notion that the Woe is a reflection of the Calamities. Just, I really want to see Amadeus react to her being called Black by people. It's hilarious. Congratulations Catherine, you have become your father.

Mammon

Might just be a hint that their story wasn't between people but between Named with significant Story weight and grooves to it. While they don't seem to notice it too much, aided by the fact that Cat said something villain-y before she could even stop herself there's hints that this conversation was at least in part providence or Narrative forcing a direction and progression vs practical compromise or stalemate by omission of speaking one's mind.

JRogue

I think it speaks to just how worn thin she is that she does not recognize it herself. This is providence lobbing a softball over the plate, she would normally avoid that sort of thing.

Liliet

Cat saying things before she can stop herself has been a staple of her existence before she ever had a Name, she's just managed to get more of a handle of it. Until she got this exhausted, defensive and uncontrolled, which is a theme that's been building up and exactly what Hanno came to talk about.

(ADHD she's ADHD)

ohJohn

He calls her Black 3 times. The first 2 occur immediately after she calls him White, which could be explained away as him mirroring her.

The third comes pretty soon after the second but, notably, after she speaks again without calling him White, and as part of some of the harshest words he has for Cat all chapter ("She threw away what she was to help others, Black, and I will not let you even /imply/ that such a decision was cowardice or laziness."). I'd wager this is something he calls her with some sort of regularity.

It could just be informal titles they use during arguments about the Gods, Good/Evil, or as opposing representatives under the Terms, but with Cat mentioning her "nascent Name" earlier in the chapter, my money's on it being the first part of that Name. She already explicitly rejected Black Queen, so I doubt it'd be offered again (though the moniker has certainly stuck, so it might have some traction). With Amadeus no longer having a claim to Black Knight, that seems a strong contender, but it doesn't quite fit with her decision to take the staff instead of the sword at the Princes' Graveyard. Maybe something new, or at least unseen in recent history?

(I'm still curious about the specifics of why she keeps hearing The Girl Who Climbed The Tower, but with Cat halfway across the continent from Praes and uninvolved in the civil war, Dread Empress seems very unlikely. And doesn't even have "Black" in it.)

Liliet

I think Black Queen is it, version 2.0: the story changed as her reputation did.

A different Name now than it would have been then.

Shveiran

This. I've been calling it since book 4 and by the gods I'll see it claimed or die posting.

Troubadour: one of a class of lyric poets and poet-musicians.

Is this the Wandering Bard?

Liliet

No, she goes by her own Name.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

She's also consistently presented as a woman in her various guises whereas the Troubadour's a man, but the Name itself is already enough to tell as you pointed out.

TeK

I feel like Bard's gender is one of those rules you invent and keep to, so you can break it later and catch someone by surprise.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Entirely possible. We'll see.

Liliet

She has also been consistently obviously recognizable by her props and Cat has actually interacted with the Troubadour. She also does not have any kind of 'songs and death' affinity that requires access to death row prisoners. And

...yeah, the Name's enough -_-

Darkening

I'm reasonably certain the Bard can't kill people personally and the Troubadour sounds like he's been slaughtering death row inmates.

Sun Dog

We know from very early on that there are other Bards. Cat had a whole spiel about how as default comic relief they're just the worst. I doubt all of them are body-hopping immortal referees in the battle between good and evil.

Liliet

Catherine and Hanno are cute in how they both fish from compliments from each other, bless them.

This was Hanno's attempt at the reverse of Cloaks, but unfortunately he is not as close with Cat as Cat was with Indrani. Still, he got what he wanted ♥

CATHERINE GO APOLOGIZE TO THE KID

Shveiran

That conversation will be a treasure. I so want her to bring Stalwart along instead of Tancred, there would be so much tears just waiting around the corner.

And Cat kinda needs a relationship with a fledging hero that is sweet and kind, in my opinion, especially to deal with her current hang ups.

Liliet

Yes.

Frivolous

Cat won't apologize. She doesn't like to apologize under most circumstances. Apologizing to a teenage heroine would be highly out of character for her.

It might also be dangerous, because if she ever gets into a friendly relationship with that young heroine, the Apostle might be the Luke Skywalker to her Darth Vader, i.e. a redemption story. Not a wise choice, and I think Cat would be sensitive to such nuances after Tariq tried to mentor her to death in the past.

Shveiran

There are a lot of steps between antagonizing a heroine and turning them into your personal skywalker.

I agree that Cat needs to step real light with her actions now that she is once more a claimant, but I refute the assumption that "being a dick" is somewhat required not to fall into a redemption story.

If anything, Cat chewing up the new guy was more out of character, and being the unapologetic bastard can lead to bad stories as well.

Ones where you realize the error of your ways lying in a bloody ditch, just in time to finally apologize to the heroine with your final breath and give her hope for the future.

Fixing it now makes the episode irrelevant: just a symptom of Cat's tiredness.

Doing nothing makes that interaction the one thing that connects her story to that of Stalwart; inconsequential if she remains a nobody, possibly dangerous otherwise.

Cat is not big on apologies, but is not above admitting she let her mouth run wild after a long day.

She has done it before, I hope she'll do it again.

Liliet

All of this, thank you!

luminiousblu

Being a determined prick is a fast track to narrative death anyway, since it slots you into the designated asshole character type. Combined with being one of the most powerful and important members of the army, who outranks Stalwart and is constantly butting heads with her benevolent mentor who is the only one who can stand up to her, that puts her in the role of the asshole victim who gets worked in order to show us how big of a threat Nessie is.

Liliet

Yup.

Keys to surviving the story:

- be crucial to it in a way that does not block the path to advancement of newer characters;
(Amadeus managed exactly that while trying to achieve the exact opposite result, good job)
- don't be a spotlight hog;
- don't be a fucking asshole.

(It helps to also have a writer who doesn't think killing characters off for shock value is best done in such a manner as to leave the audience as angry, confused and bewildered as possible)

Liliet

Catherine's refusal to mentor Tancred directly led to his death.

She needs to stop being a wiseass and start actually doing shit, with a new kid sidekick or not.

Also, to apologize.

Shveiran

She is doing shit. A lot of shit. Too much shit. That's kind of her problem, or at least part of it.

Though yeah, I second the apologize part. Let's not bully the new kid on the block because she resembles your dead nephew, people.

Frivolous

Thoughts:

It's really funny that Hanno is now calling Catherine 'Black', just as she calls Hanno 'White'. Even more surprising that she isn't flinching at being called by the name she used to call her virtual father Amadeus.

Really surprised that Hanno didn't lambast Catherine for threatening the Valiant Champion or Aquiline Osen. I was expecting him to press Cat to treat the VC better, given that she is a hero who was once in a 5-person band with him.

Rapacious is a nasty adjective. Also: Interesting that he, the Troubadour, is probably a bardic name, and that he has a degree of foresight.

Happy to see that Hanno is acknowledging that Cat has been doing more work than he has, as I noted in the previous chapter.

caoimhinh

I agree.

Although, I would have expected Hanno to ask Catherine to moderate herself for threatening Aquiline. He knows perfectly well her reasons for hating Raphaella, but threatening one of the Heads of the Dominion seemed to me like something more relevant, yet Hanno focused only on the two Heroes.

Oshi

Hanno is aware she knows what to do (or that Hakram will) when it comes to politics. He doesn't need to tell her anything. He is bringing up an issue and trying to determine who or what would get Catherine's goat enough that she would break her usual discipline.

Liliet

Hanno didn't even focus on Raphaella. He wanted to point out a pattern, not quibble over individual instances.

Liliet

Hanno is well aware of the reasons Cat had to talk to Raphaella like he did, and he's not a diplomat and the relationship with Bloods is not his problem – and as they established, Raphaella did not actually complain. She probably knows Cat was within her rights too.

This was a “oh shit you're not okay and I need to help more” visit, Cat just assumed he'd be scolding her because she feels bad about being Like That herself and... yeah. Took them a long sequence of tangents before Hanno actually got to his original point.

Agent J

Mommy and Daddy are fighting, but they're such Healthy Adults about it. I wonder if Ranger and Black argued like this. Nah. Ranger seems too aloof for that.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Ranger seems like the sort of person whose reason for not murdering her own friends is that she isn't bored of them (with an implicit “yet”). I imagine she'd just tell him to piss off about whatever it'd be and then wander off to harass Neshamah 'til Amadeus calmed down.

Rum0ur

I really want to know when the white knight got taken and made into a revenant, or at least my guts telling me he has..

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Hanno:

As ever a chill dude.

Dealing with Cat sounds like a pain in the ass.

ninegardens

To be clear- dealing with Cat is a pain in the Ass, but Cat is in a tricky position and has been working hard for way too long. Is understandable. Just tricky.

joie01

I'm really really loving the Hanno Catherine duo. Its rare seeing someone who Catherine can talk to as an equal. The honest conversation today is such a breath of fresh air from the scheming and facades we're all used to seeing

Liliet

Actually, this dynamic is very reminiscent of the one Cat has with the Woe, only with the added nuance that Hanno doesn't know her as well.

Vivienne has extracted oaths from her, Hakram has forced her to promise not to drink on campaign, Indrani and Masego treat orders like polite fiction (and Indrani specifically has gone against Cat's instructions before and not given a rat's ass about it).

And Cat's defensiveness is how she would have reacted to one of them approaching her to scold her – if she acknowledged they had the right to do so in that situation.

(When she doesn't, she goes cold and harsh, not on wild tangents about crucifixion and source of one's authority that end with her blurting out what had been bothering her)

(Kind of like that line she led with, only she wouldn't then immediately cave and keep talking)

I think part of the reason Hanno didn't realize that was because he didn't approach her to scold her in the first place – he wanted to check in with her, make sure she knows to take care of herself better, offer her more help and apologize that he hadn't before.

Burlyraven

I don't know whether to be happy or disappointed that this didn't end with Cat drunkenly demanding the Sisters demonstrate they're actually gods in some way.

A thought I had: Pascale is a healer. What if she's been designated as the new bearer of a resurrection power? Might really be in Cat's favor to go apologize, and maybe give her an explanation about the dead boy's corpse she's supposedly still lugging around.

Frivolous

Forgive was one of the Pilgrim's aspects; he couldn't resurrect the dead otherwise. It might take weeks or even months for the Apostle's 3 aspects to emerge. Could even Cat keep around the Apostate's corpse for that long?

Also, not sure if you were aware, Burlyraven, but there is a Zen koan asking who is it that is dragging this corpse around. Pretty sure that the koan was not meant as a practical question, but even so....

Burlyraven

Yeah, there's definitely a lot of things that would have to come true for a resurrection to be in the cards at this point (Tancred's probably just worth an interesting autopsy scene at this point, if those are a thing in universe), but it's become somewhat of a tradition for me to present a potential theory on how he could be revived with the information presented in the chapter, and I hate to disappoint.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Please continue this tradition for the rest of the book if possible.

Mammon

Jup, and I think Pilgrim's ress was limited both in once a day and dead for no longer than a day. For completely understandable and recommendable reasons EE is making sure death reversal isn't too common and easily attained/made basic equipment in this story.

Darkening

He could rez people that had been dead longer than a day, there was one point where several heroes had died and were backlogged for resurrection during the Battle of Camps, though I think the priests might have had to prep the bodies some way to preserve them? I think his corpse being turned into a Revenant might be the bigger obstacle to raising him from the dead.

Liliet

Yeah, it took an additional miracle for them to be preserved for later resurrection.

Shveiran

Might be I'm late to the party, but I must say that this book is off to a great start.

In my opinion, it takes guts to do a time skip this long in a story that has mostly followed the protagonist through her whole voyage. Sure, there have been time-jump before, especially between books, but nothing on this scale. And it's easy to imagine some readers going "but I wanted to see that" and feel cheated.

But me, I'm loving it. This solution allowed EE to deliver on the "war against Keter is a long shitshow" premise with under ten chapters (which delivered on other things besides) rather than Book after Book of horrors unleashed.

It allowed him to show us how all the things Cat has positioned herself to achieve in Books 4 and 5 were accomplished and to what extent, to introduce a plethora of new characters, to portray the "war front" setting and give us a feel for it, and to set up the rest of the novel so godsdamn neatly.

And the truth is, if he tried to do it in another way? I'm not sure it would have worked.

All those things sound awesome to read, and yet, if he had tried to show them to us one by one? It would have been a drag with little payoff.

There would have been no upping the ante, because we would have known none of it really mattered when Keter was so far on the horizon still, and so it would have been a bad picture made of beautiful strokes.

I'm loving it. And this neat, elegant solution on how to deliver on these many, many promises and narrative needs?

This is the mark of an amazing writer, in my opinion. EE's solution is downright inspiring.

Liliet

I agree incredibly.

There are right and wrong ways to do timeskips. This? This was the exact right way to do it, and the only solution that could work this well.

Now if only the timeline didn't suddenly sprout an extra unassigned year in the middle of it sometime between Book 1 and Book 5.

(To quite outline the magnitude of catastrophe, the solution that currently works best is to assert that there was an extra year in the Liesse Rebellion between William starting it in Epilogue 1 and Cat getting deployed in Chapter 1 – it contradicts no more than three or four statements about timeline made somewhere in the books, none of them plot-critical!)

Liliet

(This isn't related to the timeskip – but without the recent chapters establishing both Cat's age and the exact length of the stretch between Books 5 and 6 it became impossible to fix it by boldly asserting Cat was 19 in Everdark and said she wasn't 21 yet because she cannot count)

(This is the result of research into Books 2 and 3 done on discord and I'm just whining)

NoryNory

Am I the only one who's curious about Cat having some "enticing piece of unfinished business" with Nephele (who, if I remember correctly, is the Repentant Magister)?

Liliet

YOU ARE DEFINITELY NOT THE ONLY ONE 😊д😊😊

Mammon

One of the biggest ironies here is that Cat's argument would be mostly the same if she were a Hero, this being an argument as much of cultural differences as religious but because she's evil she's wrong. I mean, she's Callowan where the very things she says now are accepted realities and principles because people die when they expect salvation.

White Knight Catherine Foundling: No, you listen here you entitled Ashuran prick. I'm from Callow, where our people have been dealing with the constant, organised and rich threat of the fucking Wasteland. We don't have to worry about some freaking upstart Named messing up our rigid peace for a week, we deal with people that summon devils on a daily basis and see floating fortresses as classic. We deal with people led by demigods at a generation frequency.

When the orcs enter our country, we don't fall to our knees. When the devils knock on our doors, we don't pray. We take our swords from the attic and start chopping down trees. We leave the fucking prayer to those that can no longer work, while we mutter our prayers to the Heavens while we build palisades.

I don't know who and how, but for this scene I really wished there was a Callowan Hero that would've appeared and made it clear to Hanno that Cat's words are the words of a culture that knows from practice that her 999/1000 people dying when praying is the answer is not an answer from Below but from a country set in reality.

Liliet

Of course, White Knight Cat would likely have not lashed out at a kid whose big crime was praying and getting answered in a situation that was NOT time-sensitive... in the first place...

ambitionsofadequacy

Reminds me of a quote from one of the King's of Callow. Something like "Trust in the gods, but saddle your horse."

Konstantin von Karstein

Except that statistically speaking, Callow had to have a lot of Heroes who appeared after praying, given the number of Villains that attacked them throughout the centuries. And the Apostle prayed only when she saw no other solution, not right away. So you cannot say she did not try by herself.

Shveiran

Yeah, I agree with Konstantin.

Sure, Callowans deal with problems by "holding the line in the mud". But willingness to get your hands dirty to deal with a problem and prayer are not mutually exclusive, as Hanno pointed out.

You can work yourself raw fighting the uphill battle, doing anything and everything to improve your odds, and still know that unless a miracle happens, it won't be enough. So you also pray and hope to see an allied banner appear at the horizon, dreaming of the downhill charge of the Winged Hussars that will break the siege of Wien.

There is nothing not Callowan about it, or really much to condemn. Otto Redcrown is another example: he was ready to go down tooth and nail, fighting for every inch he had to give, but I don't think he complained when salvation appeared out of nowhere. And I doubt ALL his soldiers were beyond hoping, deep down, that a miracle would deliver them from the onslaught. They were willing to face that bleak demise; I doubt that means a part of them was not hoping for a miracle still, if only a small one. It is... simply human to do so. Most of us can't really work without at least some hope that we'll survive the tide.

Cat, because she is tired and depressed and has a very checkered history with heroes, is portraying praying as "handling the mess off to someone else", but that is not how praying HAS to work.

Imagine a storm is headed your way: you can try to gather people in the protected areas, do what you can to prepare shelters and resources for those that will need them after they are wounded or made homeless, but at the end of the day, when the storm does hit, won't you be hoping that it moves on quickly, or that it doesn't hit as strongly as it could? If you believe in a higher power, won't you pray that you and yours are sheltered in this time of hardship, and have the courage to see it through?

After the storm has passed, you get up and get back to the work of fixing it. That moment where you clenched your eyes and begged for the storm not being a catastrophe in no way detracts from your determination to see it done right.

I think Cat's point – the one that has merit, and that she isn't quite ready to vocalize – is a bit more nuanced.

Scorched and Stalwart found themselves facing a choice with no good answer; before them lies either monstrous action or a risky gambit. Lesser evil, or uncertain greater good.

Catherine, because of her history, is physically incapable of looking at the latter with anything but contempt: if it fails, it is a despicable loss of lives; if it works, it is a slap to the face to all the times she had to choke her own conscience to save as many as she (believed she) could.

To look at Stalwart, or any hero that gets away with it PAINS her, because then she has to wonder if all the bodies she left on her trail were actually needed. If things would have come out alright, if only she had took a chance rather than doubling down in her certainty that no help would come.

She has to wonder if the fact that help didn't come means it wouldn't have, or if it is a result of the narrative she embraced.

She has to wonder if killing Saint was actually necessary. And there is no action Above could take that she wouldn't look at in contempt: if they didn't answer the prayer, she would damn their silence; if they did, she would hate that someone else's reckless gambit paid off when she had to go through so much to and wound herself so viciously to achieve a lesser prize.

And... though Cat's vision and reasoning is muddled, I LIKE that she is like this now.

The last parts of Book 5 saw her swallow a LOT of grievances against her newfound allies that were never really acknowledged, let alone mended.

Cordelia pushing her into a corner, two choirs putting their seal of approval on a crusade that would see her people bleed, heroes killing soldiers that were just defending their homeland... that was brushed to the side, because it was either that or putting the bigger picture at risk.

Two years under this heavy a strain has seen it festering.

It's beautiful. It's relatable.

And I'll sit here giddy with anticipation, waiting for the cathartic moments that are being seeded here.

Mammon

Funny you mention the hussards, as that's pretty much showing that Callow is as I suggested it to be. They've got prayers. They carved them upon their freaking plate armour, and then charge through whatever horrors Praes threw at them relying on those prayers but also their Callowan steel and well-bred warhorses.

For the rest, that's kinda arguing against a point I nor Cat ever made. That you bare steel and then pray while defending yourself as Callow or Redcrown did is not at all something that Cat critisized or at all what I referred to. It's what you should do both in likely her opinion and my Hero Cat expression. So you're kinda just adding to my point having misread what I said as the opposite. But what seems to be Cat's issue and what I argue that even proper Heroes would know is stupid, is prostrating yourself and completely unprotected or even trying to flee/fight as you pray expecting this to lead to salvation.

Like the Stalward apostate did, exactly like that. Do nothing, not even something that a non-Named can do to save themselves or turn the tides, and expect a miracle without your efforts granting it more time to swoop in. Stalward Apostle prayed expecting everything to be resolved, Callowans fight praying until they hear the cavalry charge horns and take as many of those bastards with them as they can if no salvation shows up. That's what Good Cat would've argued for too if you ask me.

Konstantin von Karstein

Except that she didn't do nothing. She saw the plague, and tried to warn everyone. And when she failed, she didn't thought of slaughtering everyone. Can you fault her for that? She also said she was not good at fighting, so even if she had tried it would have probably failed.

Shveiran

Aside from the fact that I was replying to you as well as arguing my own points, my apologies if it seemed like it was all aimed at your own comment...

... I don't think that's the point she is making? Hypothetical HeroCat, I don't know, but VillainCat considers praying as, at best, a waste of time. Hanno is the one arguing that you can act AND pray:

"People rely on the Heavens for more than just intervention," Hanno chided me. "Faith in Above guides a soul both on Creation and beyond; simply because it does not call a storm of fire does not make it worthless. Besides, prayer does not preclude action."

And

"I understand that you do not keep to Above," the White Knight said, frowning. "Nor would I expect you to. Yet your insistence that faith and ability are mutually exclusive is, to say the least, insulting."

Whereas Cat argues it is always just wasted time, and detrimental to your efforts:

"You can't tell people that praying will solve things," I flatly said. "It won't, except in one in a hundred thousand occurrences like this. If that's what you put out as a story, that's what people will do instead of acting to save themselves. People can't rely on the Heavens for that, they'll just die."

And

"If you've got time to kneel and mutter, you've got time to raise a palisade," I bluntly replied. "One of them's a lot more useful than the other."

Cat's argument is... flawed, plain and simple.

When some of the kids I take care about fell down a bad road, I did my utmost to try to help them.

When my granny fell sick and we thought she didn't have much longer, I tried to spend as much time with her as my job would allow.

That didn't make me any less likely to pray for them in the morning.

I suppose if you don't believe in a higher power, your perspective could be that I was just wasting minutes of my day whispering to the air.

Yet if whispering to the air got me to stand up and go do the shit I had to that day, was it really wasted time?

Even if the sky was empty and my faith a scam, I'd argue it was not.

Mammon

It doesn't matter what Hanno said, he's adding standpoints that Cat wouldn't have raised arguments about. Had this been about people praying while doing something productive, then Cat wouldn't have criticized anyone. That's Hanno trying to pull the argument into a broader spectrum that he can win, because he knows that a fight only on the specific topic that Cat is arguing about is a lost cause to all that don't fully believe in Above's absolute goodness that wins even when they lose because slaughtered people go to the Heavens.

Pretty standard, and for a fictional story underhanded, means of arguing. Like FOX trying to make western companies actively keeping African countries poor to cheaply mine their natural resources about capitalism and free market. If Cat argues about there being no free market when those white colonists bought the land, then she's Evil and arguing about something that isn't part of this argument, but when Hanno talks about these companies under an umbrella term that also includes other companies that aren't extortionists and then focussing on the sob stories and more defensible situation of some small white man companies in Africa or even charity organisations somehow reeled into this argument, that's totally a good point.

This is of course an exaggeration to make the point clear, not meant to be exactly taken as it is. The point is, Cat is arguing not against all Heroes and all prayers, Hanno is making it about that to win the argument when he couldn't with the specific argument of the Stalward Apostle praying instead of acting completely and irresponsibly. If there were one Hero in that tent to interject against that umbrella argument that puts their readiness to act in the same wheelhouse as a girl that did nothing but pray while people got killed, then Hanno's whole Good vs Evil argument would've fallen apart.

And lets not make this about real religion, whether it is true or not is an argument for other forums. If you're religious then that's your choice. Here in this story it is verifiably real and with defined limitations and parameters. These gods aren't fully in power, so we're not talking about a calvinistic religion; that everything and everyone's fate is predetermined regardless of their actions/their actions too were predetermined. The people have already been proven to be in control of their own fate to an extend, being able to defy the narrative even if Named and Story can make it difficult to do so.

When there's no such Story afoot, then their own actions and abilities matter solely. To what extend we don't know as this is off-camera events which thus haven't been included in the story due to irrelevance. As Cat's argument includes, if someone were to pray during such an event, which would be the other 999 times they pray expecting salvation, then no Hero will show up and no miracle will occur. For every time the Named can intervene and praying pays off (or is a placebo because those Named would've saved the day regardless), if the people believe in prayer saving them then those prayers will see them killed more often. Without prayer solely instead of action, the amount of people dying who could've saved themselves outweighs the amount of people being saved.

And that's without assuming that as many people would be saved by Named if no one prayed during crisis at all because Named seem to be a matter of faith and stories rather than prayer.

Shveiran

I feel like you just chastised Hanno for trying to "pull the argument into a broader spectrum", while also bringing in colonialism yourself.
I'm not sure I follow.

Regardless, if we are arguing the specific case, like you suggested?

The specific case is about a 14 year old.

I don't know about your teen years, but if that had been 14-years old me? I don't know what I could have done in that situation except hoping real hard something would fix it.

Comparing it to Tancred is a false analogy: Tancred is ANOTHER 1 in 10000 occurrences, because he got a Name too and was able to carry out his slaughter only because of it.

The rest of the 9999 14 years old that tried to wipe out a village and didn't get a Name?

They died accomplishing nothing as well as the 9999 that prayed real hard but didn't get a Name like Stalwart.

She is a goddamn 14 years old, for pity's sake.

What kind of standard are you holding her up to that this is somehow her mess to clean up?

Mammon

The colonialism was a comparison, and as said afterwards not to be taken too literal. I meant it as in, people especially in extremely polarised camps like Republicans vs Democrats or Good vs Evil will always seek to twist the argument in their favour or even blatantly lie by omission or twisted presentation. They probably don't even notice it if the polarisation is strong enough. Hanno probably doesn't notice the hypocrisy that Above's words have since inbred themselves into, same as how Pilgrim didn't see the irony of himself being a Role villain trying to so stubbornly doing what he thought was Good because Cat is Evil.

I same as Cat wasn't talking about this one specific occassion, but this one specific facet of Good vs Evil. Not about a 14 year old girl, because the moment we're talking fiction and Names such an age hardly matters. There are shows where 10-year olds are scheming plans at a 3D chess level just because the writer wants to. This is about White and Black arguing about a philosophical issue in Creation, not about Hanno and Cat arguing about the specifics especially if those specifics are case-specific when they wouldn't be the other 999/1000 times.

This is about anyone, regardless of age or having a Name, doing something about it themselves (Below) vs praying and expecting salvation to be sent their way to repay their virtue (Above). Which in reality is so obviously in Below's favour this time that Above tries to make it about virtue in general instead of virtue over action at all.

Black criticizes the system that will make people that aren't just the 14 year olds but also the adults and the real priests and the real warriors pray instead of fighting because it worked for them a scarce few times, while White tries to salvage it and the fact that many Heroes too wouldn't sit still and pray while people died by trying to broaden the scope to something he can win. Hanno probably doesn't even notice it, same as how Cat right now doesn't notice her tongue having Story strings tugging it.

Shveiran

If you want to debate the implications of what happened to these two teens faced with something larger than them, I'm game.

If you want to debate Good and Evil in a vacuum, I don't see the point.

They are not an observable phenomenon, they are concepts that we see in the actions of specific characters. If we ignore those, there is nothing meaningful we can tell to each other that is more than our own opinions projected onto the issue. No data means no common ground, and thus no satisfying end to the discussion.

You want me to admit that sitting pretty and hoping someone fixes your mess for you is not productive? Done.

But that was never my argument, or Hanno's, or Above.

Mammon

It's indeed not your argument, or Hanno's, but it is Above's. Below expects its people to take action to attain what they want and earn it, Above expects its people to be virtuous to be granted their boons by virtue.

That's in the simplest form exactly and precisely what separates the two camps in this story. This is the philosophy of Good vs Evil in essence in this story. This is indirectly what Black and White have been arguing about, even if Cat and Hanno didn't. And while with providence one can make a case for Above for itself, it doesn't work when there are powerful and even providence-defying people like the Dead King about.

For Callow it doesn't even work if there are partisans of Below who'll capitalise on indecisiveness and lack of action in the first two acts before being beaten in the third act. When the country is already in shambles and the population decimated before the Hero beats the Villain. And while Procer and Ashur can usually survive a pure Above philosophy and approach vs their villains for a week schemes like those Villains that are now appearing or the enemies that we saw in f.e. Pilgrim's origins like the Barrow King, for a large organised foe like DK the philosophy has to be changed in Cat's eyes lest it sees to too many people dying by waiting for salvation. Too little salvation to go around right now, too much bad for the good to show up for even half the prayers. Time for some Callowan praying, as in holding a sword and go out swinging while you pray.

Shveiran

Also, I was not bringing my faith in as a way to win the argument.

I was just bringing in a personal exemple to show that there is no real incompatibility between praying for a solution to a problem you can't solve and still doing all you can to try to solve it yourself.

Like Hanno is arguing.

Mammon

Oh no, that's not what I meant. Reading it back a day later I see my tone is a bit aggressively defensive there, not intended but I cannot edit my posts to fix it. My intent which was lost in the version I wrote is

"I have no issue with you being religious and praying in real life, but in real life there's so many facets of uncertainty and A LOT of polarised and downright de-civilised religious argumenting that this topic would color everything we'd discuss. Let's not make this about real world religion because, even if no third party that takes it too seriously jumps in and makes it all about real religion, this is a kind of topic that is bound to end as an unproductive stalemate even if not turning into a dung-flinging match."

As is unfortunately my experience with religious discussion on the internet even when it starts between two respectful and civilised people.

Shveiran

It's ok, I didn't find your tone offensive.

I was just pointing out that I brought it up to try and illustrate a point.

To show that really, when Hanno says people pray to Above for reasons different than intervention? He has a point, one I feel you and Cat are dismissing.

If "kneeling in the mud" is what gives you the courage to defend that palisade, so to say, is it really such a bad thing?

I can see how someone would be more inclined to praise the one capable of going through it all without relying on something external. Yet the fact is that most people, faced with bleak, certain demise? They break.

If some of those are able to pull through because praying and hoping in a salvation that maybe will never come gives them strength... are we saying that's bad? Because... the alternative isn't them relying on themselves, the alternative is them having nothing to rely on when their resolve falters.

Liliet

> Had this been about people praying while doing something productive, then Cat wouldn't have criticized anyone.

Was it not, though? We don't know Pascale's backup plan in case prayer didn't work was "sit down and cry". She was not on such a tight timescale that she couldn't afford several minutes to center herself and make a rhetorical request.

Cat's problem was not "Pascale, specifically, failed those people" (even though that's what she actually said out loud – what she said out loud was nonsense that did not follow from anything and she's not even arguing that point specifically, I suspect because she forgot the exact phrasing). Cat's problem, ultimately, is "Praising Heavens is wrong because Heavens suck actually". That's the point she's actually arguing.

She never did get to clarifying that from "people I respect don't ask for help" (which is nonsensical by itself, Catherine knows better than that)

Mammon

Cat dislikes Talbot for his etiquette and expected manners of his Queen. I haven't caught a whiff of Cat having any distaste towards these very Above knights or the Callowan priests. Or really any priests that contribute to the fight on the front lines. It's not about praying to the above, which they do very literally, it's prayer instead of action. We've practically seen that those that solve a problem they can solve themselves while asking aid in the problems they cannot solve don't incur her wrath or annoyance.

Liliet

Mm, Cat very rarely has problems with Above -it's just irrelevant, and being pleasant with people is a bigger priority. Cat IS a natural diplomat, and this doesn't really bother her particularly much.

It just... bubbled to the surface in this story in particular.

Liliet

I would suggest that another point buried somewhere in Cat's angry confusion is this:

If the Above – the part that answers prayers – is a sentient, omnipotent force that makes an individual decision to answer, or not, each prayer, their judgement sucks and they are either stupid or not benevolent.

If the Above is not one of the above (either not omnipotent as Hanno suggests, or not sentient as I would argue – the part that answers prayers is an automated system, not Gods making personal decisions), people really should stop talking as if they are.

If the Above is a sentient, omnipotent, benevolent and wise force, there is no justification for acting like Tancred did (I think this is still more about him than about Cat herself – Cat's a lot more willing to see the other point of view on her own actions than this). If the Above is a sentient, omnipotent, benevolent and wise force, the Apostate is a villain in the lowercase sense.

And Pascale, with her bright eyed bushy tailed exuberance about her prayer being answered, was, to Cat, a representative and proponent of that point of view. You should pray, and if it doesn't work, well – clearly it's for the best, as Above is wise and if it lets someone die that's what should happen.

Nevermind that Pascale never uttered that exact sentence and was just ecstatic from her one in a million chance coming true, that's what Cat heard, not just from her statement but from the entire implication of that story that she'd have heard a million times before: the good girl and the bad boy, a teaching example of the righteous getting rewarded and those who stray from the path dying.

To her, the story itself is a vile lie, and she forgot that Pascale was a character in it, not the storyteller.

Mammon

Even before being Named, the Stalward Apostle has (suggested at least) priestly powers. She wasn't a helpless girl, she was a priest who could've done more than others. She was one of the most capable people in that village to deal with this threat most likely, yet she chose to pray for salvation instead of doing something more statistically likely productive. And that's just irresponsible.

Remember, no one gets a Name without the skills for it. William was already a great swordfighter, Vivienne learned and honed thieving skills, Hakram was already a great secretary who also knew how to handle an axe. So the argument that all Heroes get their powers through prayer actually goes directly against already established lore of this world.

They have events that aren't necessarily heroic or action packed, such as William's murder of his sibling and hiding the body, but I don't recall anyone shying away from the call to arms or doing the direct proper thing to instead pray first. We know not how the Saint of Swords came into her Name, but it's nigh certain that this happened mid-swing after she stormed evil without hesitation. Not after she let a devil kill three people whilst she said her hail Mary before attacking.

As much as this conversation is meant to symbolise Good vs Evil philosophy, ironically with a White Knight whose origins are pretty mundane action-wise and involved him running away and signing away his own insight to fully submit to someone else's judgements, practically it falls apart when you look that had this system actually been implemented as they said, then Evil would've won a long time ago. Most Heroes would balk at the Stalward Apostate's indecisiveness too if they wouldn't be hypocrits believing in the complete goodness of their side and methods.

Konstantin von Karstein

"Did they listen to you?" I quietly asked. "When you warned them about the plague?"[...]

"They did not," Pascale sadly said. "But the Heavens did, when I knelt and asked for guidance. And through the Light, I found the way to dissolve the plague."

She was a mage, not a priest. She gained Light after her Choosing. And she first tried to convince others of the existence of that plague. Only after it failed did she prayed. She did try something more productive first. The Apostate slaughtered the entire village, but you cannot fault the Apostle for not thinking to do that, she is only 14. Would you have killed dozens of people like that at her age?

Valla

"It was too late," he snarled. "The disease was in them, same as it was in Maman. And I told them, told them I could see it and they needed to send for a real priest, but they just wouldn't listen-"

So did Tancred they didn't listen to him either and they were both 14. The only real difference between the two stories is the ending. Tancred had the means to do something so he did, you can argue till day grows cold about weather it was the right thing to do or not.

As for the whole Praying thing, I think the bigger question, at least for me, isn't weather what she did was right or wrong but, what would she have done if the gods hand't answered her prayers?

Liliet

Note: we don't actually have that answer.

Mammon

She didn't do anything, and instead of Pilgrim who probably killed a thousand ghouls by Cat's reckoning because the old man is that much of a powerhouse, a different Named showed up. Or she became Named without back-up. Sheer numbers and the Dead King's influence would've killed her and quite likely the other Named.

Hanno might've successfully fled, but not save the day by himself. He's not the kind of aoe fighter to deal with large groups, or prevent ghouls to fan out in all directions while others bog him down. While he'd fight while losing due to no perfect containment, the Apostate would've likely been a new Revenant added to the fight or DK's collection. The ghouls would rampage uncontrolled with every missed group slipping through causing hundreds of more deaths and requiring dozens more Named interventions which could've been situated elsewhere to further defeat DK.

If it weren't for Pilgrim, then DK would've seen to the Alliance having to rebuild, regroup and recover instead of having any offensive potential. All the lands conquered could've been fortified by then, the bridge built and all a for him very profitable investment. If it weren't for the right Named to have been there, this would've been DK's moment of the darkest day event making victory seem impossible. Meanwhile Below was messier and not as pretty in how they resolved it, but they resolved it without massive risks and losses. They kept the casualties to a minimum and without these souls first being bound in undead before going to the heavens.

Good is to be praised because they stopped a situation that already got waaaay out of hand with ghouls so numerous that had they not been stopped by literal pilgrim Choir Ex Machina they would've dealt a blow to the campaign that could've seen to DK's victory or at least years of setback. They stopped a situation after it got out of control, after it should've been stopped. But they're totally just for letting it get that far.

Evil is bad, because by decisive and pragmatic action, they slaughtered a whole village before it turned into ghouls and ran out of control. Evil took control of its own destiny, resulting in a tightly maintained outbreak that didn't spread to several villages before being stopped. Less people died, but they died to the hand of their protector before they turned into absolute evil undead. And therefore it is Evil, for not waiting for Above to aid them by letting these ghouls grow more numerous but being slain after they're clearly morally just to be smitten down.

Shveiran

You need to decide who you are criticizing here: Above or Stalwart.

Above empowered a 14 year old that fixed a mess; Below empowered another 14 years old and he fixed another mess. The gods pretty much double-timed the Dead King like this was a tag match, so I don't get what Above did that was so horrible here.

THEY made no gamble; they handed someone the precise power needed to fix a mess. The mess was fixed. Same as with Tancred and Below.

What did they do wrong again?

As for Stalwart... well, as soon as she WAS Stalwart, she acted as her Roel allowed her to and fixed the mess. I don't see any slack there.

Before becoming Stalwart? She was a pious teen with some mage powers and a mess she had no way to solve, no responsibility for creating, no back up, no emotional maturity, no training, no Name, no nothing that justifies EXPECTING her to fix the mess.

She did... what wrong, exactly?

Liliet

Pascale – nothing, IMHO.

But regarding what “Above” “did wrong”...

That’s a reconstruction of Catherine’s possible angry thoughts, not a critique to Above’s actions in this instance. They are a nice reconstruction and fit her emotional state, but from a logical point of view they aren’t very...on point.

It isn’t quite saying Above did something wrong, but rather saying that Above should have acted in thousands of other instances as well. Without proving that it was an option, what it boils down is “I wish you took action in this instance and not that other one”.
“I wish Apostle was left to die and Scorched survived.”

If we are discussing right or wrong, I think this doesn’t really add much.

Liliet

I mean, I don’t think there was a conscious decision on part of the Gods Above involved at any stage of the process, it was an automated process. Praying to it is like trying to shove a coin in a rickety ticket selling machine: maybe it’ll work and maybe it’ll roll back out. Nothing much to praise, though it’s certainly better than Below’s (which works every time but will chop off your finger along with the coin).

Konstantin von Karstein

Above and Below use different methods but the plague was stopped in both case. Except that thanks to Below’s method an entire village was slaughtered for it and Tancred died, while Above’s ensured less deaths. So yes, I think we can praise Above more than Below. It is unfair to criticise Tancred for what he did, he had no choice, but you can criticise Below’s methods.

Mammon

Thousands of ghouls. The village was at most a hundred and some, while Pilgrim apparently took down a lot more. Above got more people killed, by allowing the infected to turn into ghouls first and infect more before turning. Tancred never allowed the infected to spread out to new villages and thus effectively saved more lives. He even saved two or three people of that village who weren't infected yet.

A bit similar to back in (I think) book 1 the demon of Corruption. Good would've tried to save the corrupted folk and let corruption fester because of it, Evil made the hard call of dragging any affected soldiers aside and killing them. Grimdark, but there's no greater amount of corruption and a few more being infected by waiting for things to grow enough out of hand that fighting it would be the just and kind thing to do.

Shveiran

I'm sorry, but this is... all over the map.

Above killed none of those people. The Dead King did. You know, the one making ghouls?

Unless you can prove that Above could snap their fingers and make Keter disappear, I'm not sure what your argument is.

Do you believe there are omnipotent beings sitting in petty indifference while the story unfolds, that could fix it all but can't be bothered? I'm not sure that makes for a good story, frankly.

You do realize that if that premise holds the only thing that allows us to have a story in the first place is that indifference? That if your premise holds, at any moment Above could step up, wave their metaphorical, nonexistant hands and make all problems ever disappear?

I don't know WHY or to WHAT POINT, but it's clear there are limits to what they can do, or we wouldn't have a story. We wouldn't have CAT, incidentally; I doubt they would not have splattered her on the countryside after she mugged an angel. Why wouldn't they? Why would Triumphant have ever been a thing?

Maybe you are arguing Above could have fixed this mess in particular, but not the other ones. But I'm not sure why you'd think that, and if it had a cost why they'd pay it. This mess was no more risky than the ones the Dead King attempted in the last month. Also... they kind of fixed it. They empowered someone to fix it in time.

The bit about the demons, I don't even know what to say except... no?

Why would you think that?

The only instance we know of demons being fought by heroes ended with no collateral damage (Book 4, the Absence Hell Egg).

I strongly doubt either Saint or Tariq would have balked at containing the corruption through whatever means necessary. Some maybe would have... but most Villains would have run rather than took a stand like Cat did, so this is really more about single characters than the side they are on.

Heck, Archer was planning on running away and only stayed because Catherine shamed her into doing so; Heiress let the demon out in the first place, for crying out loud. Cat and Black are not the only Villains.

I was mad at the heroes for not recognizing they weren't like the rest, but let's not swing the pendulum too far the other way, shall we? Not all Villains are willing to take a stand to protect lives.

Liliet

You seem to be assuming the people in Pascale's village turned? That's not what happened. Pascale's Gift allowed her to heal the infected, and they all survived, except for those killed by the ghouls that came from elsewhere. Tariq came in time to ensure Pascale's safety as she healed the locals.

Shveiran

Stalwart was a MAGE, not a PRIEST.

And considering she was a PROCERAN, FOURTEEN YEARS OLD mage, she was likely a very poor mage, unlikely to have any great power or schooling in the gift.

What could she have done, precisely?

Tried and murder a few? Probably, yeah.

But aside from the fact that unless she got a Name out of it like Tancred she was unlikely to succeed in wiping out all the village and the plague with it, are we really saying the fourteen years old is somewhat GUILTY because she didn't think of exterminating all she knew and loved rather than trying to bargain with the gods Above?

I mean, it's not like she isn't certain they actually EXIST and CAN HELP.

So, when faced with a problem she couldn't possibly solve on her own (and I mean that, because even if she considered killing them all an untrained, unnamed mage from Procer did not have the power to kill a village. Tancred would have failed too if he didn't get a Name from Below) she got on her knees and begged for help: I'll do anything, I'll give you anything, just please, please let me fix this. And Above answered.

It could have failed. Yeah, big times. But so what? She didn't cause the problem, and it was not her responsibility to fix it. She tried her goddamn best and THIS was her best. And yeah, she got lucky whereas Tancred would have had to live disfigured and heartbroken because he had been unwilling to take the gamble.

But that poor boy's fate is no fault of Stalwart.

Liliet

Note: if the Above DIDN'T answer, there was nothing stopping her from THEN turning to more extreme solutions. She was not actually pressed for time on the timescale of seconds (or minutes, or honestly even hours).

Yeah that's pretty much how I expected that conversation to go though.

Something I think Cat should have brought up: The last time Cat argued for caution and Hanno argued for faith, Hanno got the last word and then proceeded to break a Choir because he was wrong and he should have been more careful than faithful.

iLissuin

While she certainly could have brought that up, I understand why she did not. She could have smirked at Hanno in that way that makes people want to punch her in the face and said that the last time he chose prayer over her decisive plan, he lost the Choir. However, Cat and Hanno treated this conversation more civilly. Neither went for low blows, and it's because this was a conversation between equals. Neither was trying to "win." Which for Cat is exceptionally rare. Even talking to other members of the Woe, Cat always tries to be right and to bind them more closely to her. This is one of many reasons why I love their dynamic.

Pantokrator

"What you condemn as apathy I mourn as inability" So Hanno does not disagree with Catherine that 999/1000 the Gods Above would not intervene by answering prayers, he disagrees as to the reason it happens.

"If faith is a wager [...] they should acknowledge it" Catherine's argument is that Good claims to offer protection to the 'worthy' that ask for it, and that it is a lie, since the Gods Above had not intervened to stop the zombie horde from forming when villages that probably prayed to them were added to the horde. She later adds that this lie is detrimental to the war effort since instead of praying, people under attack could be putting up palisades.

"Below are deities as well" Hanno does not deny the previous argument but instead uses whataboutism, turning the topic to the Gods Below, whom he sees as the reason Catherine is arguing against Good.

"Below has horses that they ride until they break" He considers Below worse because they harm the recipient of their 'assistance' by warping their every aspect.

"The work of Above [...] is not 'mending'" Catherine on the other hand says that Above is just as bad judging by their means of conduct, but that Above is hypocritically claiming to be better. "The Saint and the Pilgrim [...] have body counts to match the greatest villains" Catherine is again condemning the means of the heroes, focusing on body count instead of reasoning or ends. "Above warps you just as much as Below does" responding to a previous argument, Catherine claims that it is not the Evil nature of Below that is responsible for the warping of a Named's personality, but their divine nature, which is also a characteristic of Above and that heroes are warped the same.

Catherine up to this point does not so much try to argue that Below is good as that Above is just as bad. Which is why most of her arguments are some form of whataboutism.

"Would you [act this way], in the days before you became the Squire?" Hanno then appeals to emotion and uses an example that will sting Catherine. This is done to make her better understand his position and maybe realise that Below changes a person for worse in a way she has to concede to.

"In some ways I was worse [back then]" Catherine argues that change is not always for the worse and then accuses heroes of considering change itself bad, attacking the opposition's credibility since she offers no basis for her claim.

Hanno retorts that villains fear looking back because they know deep down they will not like the whole objective view of the path they have chosen, also indirectly attacking the opposition's credibility since he himself offers no basis.

"I'd wager I know [fear] a lot better than you" Catherine grabs onto a single word in that argument and changes the subject to something she despises about heroes; that they surrender choice to a greater power.

"And you believe that restraint, patience, faith are somehow easier?" Hanno denies the accusation by claiming that faith is not an easy path to take; that surrendering choice might be simpler but not what an individual would want on their own. "She could have fled or fought", "She gave up what she was", "She sought a way to heal the people who doubted her" Hanno ties his argument to the Apostle by using her as an example; he claims she never lost faith even in the most extreme adversities, that she asked Above for an altruistic sacrifice of her magic and that this was an action that required courage, not laziness as Catherine claims.

"If her story had been just a little off, [...] we'd have a rampant plague on our hands." Catherine does not rebuke Hanno's claim but argues that prayer is a less reliable measure than action, since the requirements for its success are more complex; that not expecting salvation from Above but instead erecting palisades would be better since Above is extremely picky about interfering.

"It did not [happen], nor will it" Hanno says that regardless of how things came to be Above is lending its help through the Apostle in a way that makes prayer a reliable means to an end. He does not make any comment on whether the choice really could have turned out as Catherine hypothesised or on whether it was a choice to be replicated.

"She couldn't have known that in advance" Catherine insists on an unanswered argument that due to the unreliable nature of Above prayer is not a reliable enough defence as to be encouraged. She argues that this lesson of asking Above for assistance cannot apply universally and thus should not be taught.

"I believe we should advise people according to who and what they are" Hanno states that a lesson does not have to be universally applicable to be worth teaching.

"People rely on the Heavens for more than just intervention"

Hanno points out that Catherine has considered prayer only as a means to a strategic end, and so her arguments have only addressed part of a prayer's function while saying nothing against prayer as a guide to Good and good behaviour. While not countering her arguments for the strategic application of prayer he defends praying as a whole. This point of view sees prayer and by extension the surrender to a greater power as more than a means to an end, it considers prayer by itself beneficial due to the positive guidance it provides, both passively and actively. "Prayer does not preclude action" Hanno, again, points out that Catherine's arguments have taken for granted things that are objectively not true in general situations; a person who regularly prays does not necessarily remain inactive during a crisis.

"If you've got time to kneel and mutter, you've got time to raise a palisade" Catherine condemns praying in the specific case of a crisis, where praying most of the time is equivalent to inaction.

"Faith and ability are [not] mutually exclusive" Hanno talks about the general concepts of faith and ability instead of the specific prayer and palisade. He expresses again that one does not preclude the other, but expands the discussion to two general characteristics of a person instead of two stances in a specific situation. This is not necessarily derailing the conversation since the specific case was used throughout the conversation to thinly veil the greater conflict created by villains assigning more value in ability and heroes in faith.

"Faith doesn't keep the dead out"

"Most the time, neither does the palisade."

This is more clearly showcasing the aforementioned conflict, and in the following thoughts of Catherine the argument is shown to have boiled down to the most fundamental differences in Cat and Hanno's views and thus no further argument could be made. She also contemplates that her base reason to hate the faith approach is not that faith is not useful or that palisades work more often, as Hanno refutes, but that a person has to act on their own in order to be deserving of salvation.

During the argument Catherine condemns the means of Good, a stance to which Hanno does not voice any clear disagreement. But her main focus is either the difference in judgement each side suffers or the unworthiness of Good people due to having surrendered their choice to a greater power. Her main opinions are that Good is hypocritical and that faith is not only lesser to ability and action but detrimental in nature.

Hanno has, throughout this conversation, appealed to emotion and showed a great degree of loyalty to Above. His entire stance is legitimised only if one considers emotion and virtue to be acceptable motive for any action. This is not inherently a bad opinion, especially if you are a hero, since it is basically their main drive to do Good and good; to act in a way that benefits Above and to act in a way that benefits the most and brings the least harm to others.

This argument brings to mind some arguments from our world that it is only through Faith in God that a person can be good. While I definitely disagree with that, it is true that believing in a good greater power inspires someone to be good. My point is that though Hanno lacks objective reasoning and is far too vague in the benefits of faith, he acts and argues in accordance with religious dogmas, which themselves generally have a beneficial influence on a person's morality if followed properly. Though I don't argue that the effects of religion on morality can vary greatly depending on which aspects of religion one is subjected to.

Catherine on the other hand is generally objective and pragmatic in her opinions, arguing with specific examples and making a solid case against faith instead of appealing to emotion even though she is herself emotional throughout the conversation. However I feel she has a few contradicting opinions. Specifically on the means of operation. She considers the heroes' "ends justify the means" morally wrong but this does not fit with her general personality. Not that it's bad writing, everyone has some conflicting beliefs they are blind to. But she has always shown a stern acceptance to the ugliness of doing good which she does not tolerate for people who do ugly things in the name of Good and who do not differentiate between the two. She also is obviously driven to some opinions by emotion alone, without that impacting her ability to argue objectively. Faith in particular is something I don't think she would condemn so absolutely if she was not in such an emotional state.

So as I was reading this I knew that it was one of those chapters I would be reading multiple times before the next update. Then I read some of the comments stating one or the other was wrong and disagreeing.

I made this post to hopefully facilitate conversation by breaking down the points of the argument as objectively as I could. And then I added my view.

I do not personally fully support one or the other, I agree with some approaches by either character and disagree with others while I mostly find both general stances acceptable. Pardon any poor English.

Please post your disagreements.

Holy shit. God bless your work (with full irony on the phrasing)

> She also contemplates that her base reason to hate the faith approach is not that faith is not useful or that palisades work more often, as Hanno refutes, but that a person has to act on their own in order to be deserving of salvation.

This is certainly what she says sounds like, but I would say Catherine did not follow this thought through properly. She doesn't actually think that specifically – that to be worthy of salvation, a person has to act on their own. She's out to save people who don't, too.

The issue is just slightly off to the side – it's with asking Above specifically for salvation, and not just the asking itself (again, Catherine did not follow this thought through), but the argument that it is the only virtuous and correct action to take and anything else is extraneous – oh, and if you didn't do it and just went for another course of action, you're evil and damned and wrong.

Which is not a statement either Pascale or Hanno made, but – it's a story often repeated in our world and it sounds like it is in Guide's world too.

The more despicable form is Just World Fallacy, only actually literally articulated as religion: if Above didn't help you, you weren't worthy of help – and there is a shade of that in Tancred's story, too, since he prayed to have Light instead of sorcery and his request was not considered worthy of being granted... which led directly to what happened.

The milder form is a gotcha – if Tancred didn't pray, clearly that is sufficient reason for him to be damned. The story itself does not imply it, but the mirroring Names, Apostle and Apostate... well, if there's a conscious entity being a storyteller for this story, that's what they're saying.

Whether it's one or the other depends on whether Tancred did pray before doing what he did – we don't actually know that. Catherine's argument is that either is nonsense, and one cannot be condemned for not praying.

Which is not what Pascale or Hanno said, and not what Catherine explicitly argued against either.

But I'd argue this is the actual source of her indignation.

Shveiran

There is a problem with that: Tancred was not Damned because he didn't pray.

Aside from the fact that he seemed to have been a pious boy (he prayed to have light until the pivot came) a lot of people don't pray to Above in the guide. Since most still aren't Named, that equivalence is false.

The point is that when the hour grew darkest, when all seemed lost, one kept to Above, remained strong in her faith that someone was watching over her and would help these people, and believed it so strongly she was able to become the STALWART APOSTLE, a Name rooted in holding on to your faith when everything screams it's stupid and pointless. She is stalwart in being an apostle, it's in the goddamn Name.

Tancred, at that same pivot, went "screw you guys, if you won't do anything I'll do it myself! Even if it is awful!" and so he became the Scrched Apostate, because he renounced his faith, renounced waiting for salvation, and instead decided to claim for himself the strength to do what he felt was needed.

But that is what a Villain is.

And the real point is... Above and Below have little to do with Tancred's fate.

Scorched and Stalwart both survived their first crucible. And Tancred's was terrible and unfair and crippling, but they both survived.

Afterwards?

After that, ghouls came for them both.

The heroine was protected by a hero.

The villain was not protected by the Villainess.

We can rage at the Heavens, we can say the two stories are bullshit, we can say a lot of stuff. But a boy was turned to a Revenant because Cat screwed up, and a girl wasn't because Tariq was on the ball.

At the end of the day, Above and Below have little to do with it. Catherine can't even rage at providence, because she was forewarned and got there in time.

Then she simply made a mistake, for no fault of the gods Above.

Liliet

Yes, but that's not what the in-universe memes say.

The in-universe memes say that the villains are Damned and the heroes are Chosen; that one is inherently morally superior to the other...

...and Tancred and Pascale's story matches 1:1 the kind of horrible preachy tale for children that matches up a good child who did things right and was rewarded by providence, with a bad child who did things wrong and was punished by providence.

You gotta understand, too, what providence is. It's coincidences. Catherine just so happened to lapse in the exact minute she was supposed to be protecting Tancred. That she lapsed at all was on her shoulders, but she did not specifically choose to not protect Tancred (I have a hypothesis that actually she did, but has yet to come up in-universe). Providence is not literal light shining from Above, it's the right person being in the right place at the right time.

And a lot of it is just on people – Catherine failed to be that right person.

But at the same time...

That story is a popular one, judging from how Catherine recoiled from seeing the other half.

Shveiran

If I understand your point correctly, are you saying that Catherine wants to believe Tancred's death is the Meme's fault, because that way it is not her own?

I mean... I could buy that, actually.

Liliet

No, the same thing can be equally the fault of multiple people. Catherine was at fault, she does not deny that and she would not deny that. But there was another factor.

It's kind of like Second Llesse is the fault of, in order of decreasing relevance, Akua, all the Truebloods, Malicia, Cordelia Hasenbach, and a little bit Cat for failing to prevent it.

Tancred's death was, in order of decreasing relevance, the fault of the Dead King, Catherine herself, then the narrative, then everyone who failed to stop Catherine from overworking herself.

Or narrative before Catherine, it's kind of hard to gauge at that point.

Liliet

P.S. Black's on the list for Second Llesse too, both for trusting Alaya and for conquering Callow in the first place, btw.

fbt

No one really mentioned that while Cat's overall POV has a certain ideological justification to it (at least in terms of it twisting her tail), her arguments here seem to be a mix of strawmen, red herrings, and so on. Crazy people talk like that; exaggeration, aggression, distraction, attacks to avoid a point, etc. She's not only been messing up, she's messing up right here right now; being less civil than usual to a major ally that she likes and respects while butchering her representation of her own POV. This is very very far from the clever, often kind, fundamentally decent, subtle, funny, clever, and successfully manipulative Cat to date. This looks a lot like Cat crashing and burning to me, idk. She's never shied away from hard choices, but lately she's just angrily thrashing. The stress and fatigue may be turning her into an a-hole unable to lead. It's well written, ofc. This arc bothers me as I really like Cat. Over time behavior like this...well, folks that got on board rooting for the plucky gal doing the villian gig for good reasons may have trouble continuing to relate to her as a protag (both IRL and in the story). Just a random though, I may ofc be completely wrong.

Shveiran

I get what you are coming from, but I feel this was necessary: it shows us how frayed Cat's burden has made her. It's necessary to compensate for all the victory she had and make the battle uphill again. She'll get her shit back together, you and I will both read through pretending we are not crying, and then we'll get to see her stride back into ass-kicking territory. And it will be all the more awesome for it.

Liliet

This whole conversation is a masterpiece of "two very different conversations going on at the same time".

Hanno came to check on Catherine. Both Pascale and Raphaella are examples to point to, not actual issues – although he'd like Catherine to apologize to Pascale, that's incidental to his central point.

His central point is “Catherine, holy shit, are you okay? What happened? I’m so sorry; how can I help?”

Meanwhile what Catherine hears from the start, from the line in the previous chapter, is: “Catherine, you’re awful and terrible and not living up to your responsibilities. Not only did you fail Tancred, you kept on making it worse by being an ass to heroes, too. I despise your inability to handle your responsibilities.”

No, that’s not what Hanno said or intended to say. But see the crucifix line? That’s what Catherine was responding to.

Notably, Hanno said that in her brain because she actually sees him as a valid authority – an equal, like the Woe, who has the right to scold and judge her. She was defensive; when people she doesn’t consider worthy of judging her try to, she’s not defensive, she goes on the attack.

So yeah Catherine sent the conversation on every tangent she could find, because she actually cares about Hanno’s opinion and didn’t want to hear [the thing he never intended to say but Catherine’s jerkbrain insisted he would] from him.

(She did not shut down the conversation though – when Hanno pivoted into “do you have authority issues, Catherine?” she did not tell him off and tell him to get out of her tent, she answered properly and let the conversation continue, eventually segueing from one of her tangents into what the actual issue was)

Incidentally, I don’t think Hanno actually getting to the “holy shit, are you okay, how can I help?” point is going to shut down Catherine’s jerkbrain on this. It’s just going to insist he thinks [the thing she felt like she was saying] and is just being nice about it because that’s just how nice he is.

This whole conversation is a beautiful dance of insecurities, failure to quite figure out your broader philosophical points, and a whole lot of patience (on Hanno’s part), trust (on Catherine’s) and mutual respect.

Hanno calling Cat “Black” gives me a pleasant feeling.

Danica Bihlmaier

Wondering if we should consider the three times “Black” not as in “Black Queen”, but what kind of Name she might be a claimant to... It’s open again, after all... and she was the Squire, not so long ago (even though it might feel very long indeed, storywise).

Morgenstern

...or maybe bc she sounded so much like her ‘father’ in another famous “rant” – but I dunno if that would work out... Has Hanno heard it at all?

Anyway, it was highly disturbing to suddenly have those nicknames introduced here, when all the while they had been calling each other just by their normal names so far.

Morgenstern

‘Black Knight’ / ‘White Knight’ pair in my understanding being warped into the two protectores of the Accords (Truce and Terms, was it?), which would be ... regent to them, so to speak. Although, there are some parallels in her shunting off more and more of the political stuff to her successor Queen-to-be, as Black did to Alaya, thus refusing the Emperor title, both mainly retaining warfare as their shtick.

Chapter 11: Veer

“A dog to the brave, a wolf to the craven.”

– Arlesite saying

I would head for the Arsenal tomorrow, I decided after the White Knight left.

There were still decisions to be made and responsibilities to discharge, so I put my back into it instead of leaning backing into my seat and sleeping for a few months the way I wanted to. It was tempting to simply say I could take the bundle of reports and letters with me, but if I wanted to keep a decent pace while on the move I couldn’t afford to have wagons of affairs and a crowd of attendants with me. That meant answering every bit of correspondence I’d received – or left to languish, honesty compelled me to admit – over an afternoon’s span, Hakram flitting in and out of my tent like some big green bureaucratic butterfly after I’d told him of my intention. I’d left Baron Henry Darlington’s complaint about the continued Deoraithe presence in the northern baronies unanswered for two months, considering the shit knew very well it'd been at Vivienne's order that Duchess Kegan had sent her soldiers to hold our end of the Passage. He was just trying to extract concessions for the supply convoys passing through his territory to feed the host there, the rapacious prick.

I penned an amicable reply inviting him to propose a plan to field a force apt to replace Kegan's, if his objections to the Deoraithe were so deeply felt. No doubt he'd enjoy that, it was the kind of thing that could be used to muster up some support and influence among the few remaining nobles of Callow. I added that he should forward such a plan to 'Heiress-Designate to the Crown Vivienne Dartwick' as soon as it was done, which he'd enjoy a great deal less. Did he really think I'd not noticed he was trying to go over Vivienne's head by calling directly on me over something she'd already ordered? I might be the Queen of Callow, but I wasn't fool enough to start undermining my own chosen successor's authority. The invitation from the Closed Circle of Mercantis to attend one of their auctions had already expired by the time I got it, in a practical sense, given that the auction had already been held when I got the letter. I'd been meant a mark of honour than a real expectation I'd leave the front, though, so I wrote a polite refusal anyways.

It always paid to be polite to people you owed money to, even if the 'you' here was the Grand Alliance and not me personally.

The offer by the Holy Seljun of Levant, one Wazim Isbili – who was, to my understanding, Tariq's grand-nephew – to formally send an ambassador to the Callowan court and receive one from us in Levante in turn was rather more pressing. It was heartening to see that the Dominion was willing to establish closer ties with my kingdom, and to an extent rarely sought given the distance between the two realms, but there were... complications. For one, I didn't really have anyone to send as an ambassador. In the Old Kingdom that'd been a role for the highest ranks of nobility, which had been quite thoroughly exterminated in the decades since the Conquest. My father being the viciously meticulous bastard that he was, he'd also done all he could to stamp out what one might call diplomatic apprenticeships. Almost like he'd wanted to make sure Callow was isolated and incapable of properly reaching out. It was a sad but undeniable fact that most 'diplomats' I could send would be Praesi officers of noble birth from my army, with as other option maybe Brandon Talbot. Who I needed in command of the Order of Broken Bells anyway, making him highly unsuitable for the task.

I kicked that decision back to Vivienne, after pondering the matter a bit, along with a note outlining that she'd be in charge of finding a suitable ambassador if she decided to accept. I also suggested that a potential Levantine ambassador should be received by her in Salia rather than at my 'court' in Laure, and lastly stipulated that no ambassador of ours could be related to Duchess Kegan. There was already enough discontent at the way the Duchess of Daoine kept naming kin and vassals to key court and bureaucratic positions, she needed no encouragement. Especially if a decade from now the Duchy of Daoine was to be independent, complicating the loyalties of all such appointees by a great deal. More recently, the Iron Prince had sent a missive describing the way the dead beyond the defensive lines had massed for assault before suddenly withdrawing and asking if I had an explanation.

I spent the better part of an hour describing the Dead King's latest plot to tie us here down south while he went on the offensive again. Klaus Papenheim had added a note that his envoy had spoken glowingly of the results of the assault formation on the field – somewhat to my surprise, given that she'd not expressed such enthusiasm before me – and that he would want to pit a formation against a more traditional mixed force of Bones and Binds before committing to that doctrine but he was definitely interested. Amusing enough, he also warned me that Otto Redcrown had extended an offer of settling in Lycaonese land to Sapper-General Pickler but that no offence should be taken by it. Any such offers made in the future would pass by me first. It was enough for me to soften my language when I wrote to the Prince of Bremen over the matter, mentioning that I was willing to serve as intermediary between the Lycaonese and the Confederation of the Grey Eyries if they wanted to extend that offer to the Tribes instead of to troops sworn to my service.

The rest was minor correspondence, mostly from my commanders on other fronts, including the usual letter written in Crepuscular from General Rumena that turned out to bear some insulting nuance to a native speaker I wouldn't get without asking for help. Hence getting me insulted in front of an audience every single time. The old bastard never actually bothered to send me proper reports, given that Sve Noc saw to it we spoke in 'person' regularly. I'd be due that tonight, I thought. Not necessarily a conversation with Rumena, but communion with my patronesses. Last time they'd brought me in for a waking dream it'd been to show me the sigils of the Exodus raising the foundations of a hidden city in the depths of Serolen, though also to make a point that warfare around the edges of the Gloom reborn was growing... rougher. The Dead King was getting serious about dislodging them from their positions, not just trying to erode them one corpse at a time. I set those drifting thoughts – a sure sign I'd been going through these chores for a while – aside when Hakram flitted back in, wasting no time to bring another folded parchment to me. I took it with a sigh.

"What am I looking at?" I asked, eyes begin to scan the cramped lines.

"The proposed numbers and composition of our escort to the Arsenal," he said.

I frowned.

"I don't need knights," I said. "They're a lot more useful out here."

"You're the Queen of Callow," Hakram pointed out. "Knights are expected. They expect is as well, Catherine."

"I've no personal guard," I said. "There will be no second Gallowborne. If the Order of Broken Bells understands this differently, Talbot is in need of being disciplined."

These days I was not quite so prone to leaping into the fire, but what mortal guard could possibly be expected to survive the kind of messes I got into? No, there would be no revisiting that old blunder under a different name.

"And cut that number in half," I added. "I want us riding briskly."

"Wagons don't ride briskly, Catherine," Adjutant gravelled.

"Then they can catch up at the Arsenal," I said. "I'll not double the length of the trip for comfort."

"Let me requisition packhorses, at least," the orc said.

I waved my hand.

"So long as we don't slow," I said. "And send for Akua, will you?"

He nodded.

"You'll also need to personally write to the Rapacious Troubadour, if you want him to take up Origin Hunting without feeling slighted," he reminded me before leaving.

Ugh, and I'd been just about done too. That letter I took my time in writing, since he was a prickly thing for a bandier of words and not half-bad with a knife. Mind you, when he'd admitted he stole songs from those he killed I probably shouldn't have replied 'surely you mean souls' in a dry tone. He hadn't taken that well. Still, vicious bastard or not he'd sniff out any Named popping out in this neck of the woods and ease them into the Truce – and I'd make it clear that Hanno was in the area too, which ought to keep him honest when it came to his more unsavoury tendencies. I was up and limping about looking for my seal when my right hand and my left arrived. I waved in their direction, pushing aside sheaths of parchment with a frown.

"It's in your desk," Hakram said.

"I looked in my desk, thank you very much," I waspishly replied.
"It's not in-"

Having stepped around my desk and opened one of the drawers even as I spoke, he produced my personal seal – the Crown and Sword, as it'd come to be known – and said nothing. His silence was, admittedly, quite damning enough on its own.

"Must have been under something," I weakly said.

"Walnut shells, mostly," the orc reproached.

I winced.

"Look, sometimes it's late and I'm not hungry enough for a meal," I defended.

"And so the Black Queen so spoke to her dark legions," Akua intoned. "Bring me walnuts, my wicked servants. But don't tell Adjutant, for he gets snippy about the mess."

I flipped a finger at her and hobbled to the side of the desk, picking up the bar of grey wax I'd set next to the letter before forming black flames against the side. Wax dripped and I dismissed the fire, extending my free hand and receiving my seal from Hakram. With a firm push the seal was affixed and I set the letter aside.

"Right," I said. "So I considered it, and we'll be scrapping the wardstone to get the obsidian spike."

I gave a heartbeat of room for Akua to protest, but of course she'd been taught better than that.

"I'm not comfortable going on campaign against Keter with a repaired wardstone anyway," I told the shade. "So we might as well get another weapon to study out of it."

"You no longer speak in the theoretical," Akua noted.

When it came to a summer campaign? No, no I did not. That little revelation about the bridge had ensured as much. We couldn't afford to ignore that.

"Talks with the White Knight were fruitful," I grunted. "I'll need to speak with the rest of the Grand Alliance leaders, but an offensive campaign in Hainaut is now a certainty – the only thing up in the air is the timing of it."

"I'll see to extracting the spike immediately, then," Akua decisively said. "If you'll excuse me?"

I nodded my thanks, she returned them with a smile and just as quick as she'd come she was gone. The tent flap closed behind her, cutting through the slice of dusk it'd bared. She must have appreciated the courtesy of being told in person, I supposed, even if ultimately I'd not taken her advice.

"Tell me when it's done," I said, eyes turning to the tent flap. "I'll have a look at it myself."

"And until then?" Hakram asked, sounding curious.

"It's getting dark out," I said. "Time to speak with the Crows."

At the exact moment night fell, I was seated alone in the dark of my tent.

The sprite-lanterns had been hooded, the braziers put out, and I'd dragged my fae seat away from the desk so that there'd be more room around. I'd long grown familiar with weaving silencing strands of Night around my tent that would prevent eavesdropping, be it physical or otherwise, and even my guards had been told to step further away. My pipe in hand, breathing in the wakeleaf I'd been gifted, I watched the burning red brand that was the only light inside and spat out a long stream of acrid smoke. The only sign that Sve Noc had deigned to join me was a slight breath of breeze, almost like an exhale, and then they were there. Perched on either side of me, on the back of the seat, great crows feathered in darkness so deep and even the dark of the tent seemed bright in comparison. Long, sharp talons dug into the wood of the armchair with a sound like steel scraping bone.

"First Under the Night," Andronike said, voice cool.

Like stone far below where the sun never shone, like a deep lake whose waters were as a veil.

"Losara Queen," Komena said, voice sharp.

Like the ring of steel against steel, like pride and hate and all the things that made men go mad.

"Sve Noc," I replied, dipping my head in respect.

Two years was perhaps not so long a span, as gods would have it, but it had made a world of difference with these two. They were no longer taking their first stumbling steps past the threshold of apotheosis: these were goddesses in all the arrogant vigour of their youth, casting a covetous eye upon the world. And I was, on most days, the closest thing they possessed to restraint. I breathed in the smoke, held it in my throat and blew it back out. I ought, perhaps, to be afraid of those sharp-clawed patronesses of mine. I'd never quite managed, though. That might just be the reason they took my advice still.

"General Rumena brings ill tidings back to the Night," Komena croaked.

"Do they?" I mused. "I've not had the displeasure to hear them."

"Watch," Andronike ordered. "Listen."

The darkness within shifted as the Sisters seized the darkness for their own, made it as a domain forced onto Creation. It was one of their lesser tricks – a paltry thing, compared to the waking dreams that saw me tread grounds halfway across the continent and speak with others as if I were there – but it was still a casual display of power. Similar end could be achieved with sorcery, true. But it would be the work of years, not moments. I saw now, from my seat, two different fractured memories given unto the Night by willing Firstborn.

A human, a prince, an Alamans. All three and no longer young, seated with another crowned head: Rozala Malanza, vulgar in form to drow eye yet respected for its mettle. Not so its companion, this Prince of Cleves who could not preserve its sigil yet had not seen it stripped from its grasp.

"- this talk of leaving all conquered lands to the dark elves," Prince Gaspard of Cleves snorted. "A kingdom's worth, for a paltry few thousand raiders? It is madness, Princess Rozala."

"The greater might of the Empire Ever Dark fights in the deep north," Princess Rozala replied.

"And let them keep it, by all means," Prince Gaspard dismissed. "But the lands south of Hannover's height should be brought into the fold: some of them would make good farmland, after a proper cleansing. It would be a waste to surrender them to these lesser elven cousins."

A human, a killer, the Dawnstride: Mirror Knight, humans called it. Unsettling, its power like the sting of morning, and harder to kill than Savanov Hundred-Lives. But like most cattle, its guard lowered when it was busy mating with another of its kind. The other one in the bed: human, the daughter of a prince, Langevin. Carine, daughter of the Gaspard. They spoke after spending themselves.

"You really should consider it, Christophe," Carine Langevin said, fingers trailing naked flesh.

"The war's not won, Carine," the Mirror Knight replied.

"But when it is, all those lands will need proper stewardship," Carine Langevin insisted. "And who better than one of the Chosen who fought to reclaim it?"

"I wouldn't know the first thing about ruling," the Mirror Knight said.

"It would be my honour to help you, of course," Carine Langevin smiled.

I let out a shallow gasp, closing my eyes. How very Proceran, I thought, to begin divvying the spoils of victory before the end of a war we were currently losing. Malanza had seemed lukewarm at the notion, at least, so I didn't have to revise my opinion of her by too much. That she'd not stamped out this petty scheming immediately, though, got stuck in my throat. Hadn't they learned by now that it was exactly this sort of habitual treachery that'd nearly seen them stand against the Dead King alone? What exactly did they think was going to happen next time a calamity like this struck and Procer had a record of backstabbing even the people who fought to save it? I brought the pipe to my lips and breathed in the wakeleaf, ordering my thoughts as I let the burn in my throat sharpen my attention, and spat it out.

"That's one prince," I finally said. "It would have been too much to ask for that all of that lot be kept honest by even the looming prospect of annihilation."

And if it'd been going to happen anywhere, it was going to be Cleves. Between the Firstborn forces under Rumena, the veteran Dominion reinforcements under Lord Yannu Marave and Rozala Malanza's practiced hand guiding the fight, it was the front that'd arguably least suffered. While the Dead King's raiding parties frequently slipped the coastal defences and warfare around the lakeside fortresses was an almost permanent fixture, it was the most 'stable' of the fronts. The city of Cleves had not suffered a third siege, the supply lines remained wide open and the Named there were proving capable of dealing with Revenants – at least defensively, as the Stormcaller still had the run of all western Lake Pavin and we had no one that could touch her in the water. No, if anyone was going to start getting ideas it was the royals in Cleves. They'd not been afraid for their lives in too long.

"Does it go any further up?" I asked. "If they can't even bring Malanza into the plot, it's dead in the water."

"If they continued down this path," Komena said, "they will be as well."

"More sinister than humorous, but not half bad," I absent-mindedly praised.

Yeah, that the literal goddesses of murder and theft that were my patronesses would not look kindly upon their so-called allies planning to turn on them had been a given. I was not unaware, either, that they were in no way above calling back the forces under Rumena from Cleves and leaving the Procerans high to dry. It'd be a disaster both militarily and diplomatically speaking, but the Crows had no interest in playing nice with people sizing them up for a knife in the back. They'd cut ties with the Principate without batting an eye, if it came to that.

"The First Prince was told," Andronike said.

My fingers clenched around the arms of my chair.

"You're sure?" I asked.

The shadows shifted once more.

Humans, bearing the emblem of a red lion. Magelings, surrounding the Princess Malanza. They speak into the scrying bowl, believing themselves safe behind their wards. They are not, for the Lord of Silent Steps has brought great knowledge into the Night as to treading through without tripping.

"Gaspard is pushing hard, Your Highness," Princess Rozala said. "But he's toed the line carefully so I've no grounds to come down him. He's still gathering support but the notion is a popular one."

"It would permanently alienate the Empire Ever Dark," the First Prince of Procer's voice replied. "And perhaps Callow as well. If the Black Queen did not slaughter everyone involved first, that is. I do not suppose he spoke to this?"

"There's a lot of heroes who don't believe she'll survive the war," Princess Rozala said. "And with his daughter in the Mirror Knight's bed, he gets to hear every rumour going around the Chosen. Callow under Vivienne Dartwick is a beast with a lot less bite, Gaspard argues."

A long silence.

"I cannot step in," the First Prince said. "Already the heartlands are chafing under the taxes and levies, there will be accusations of tyranny if I begin imprisoning princes over mere words. Let them plot, Princess Rozala. It will be seen to at a time of our choosing."

It took a moment to gather my bearings. That turned to anger quickly enough, that Hasenbach was once more failing as an ally because of the Principate's fucking internal politics. I mastered myself, though, and took a calming drag from my pipe. Procer was, undeniably, bearing the worst of the weight of the fight against the Dead King. It was its lands being ravaged, its people being conscripted and its traders being taxed into poverty. It was even its princes falling into debt. Callow and Levant, meanwhile, had sent north largely professional armies and while we'd felt the burden of war neither had suffered attacks from Keter. Procer, I then silently corrected, was bearing the worst of the weight among human nations. The Firstborn had been fighting against Keter in earnest for two years, and they'd had no reinforcements for any of it. But they were also fighting very far away, and people were people.

Sacrifices earned less gratitude when you didn't get to see them happening.

"The two most prominent women in Procer don't back the plot," I said. "And it's years away, besides. You've reason to be angry, and I'll be taking up the issue when I next see Hasenbach, but it's hardly a crisis."

"An undeniable and weighty precedent for the Firstborn being reasonable, restrained actors," Andronike said, mimicking my voice perfectly as I repeated words I'd once spoken to the Sisters.

"When we refrained from taking Twilight, you promised us our restraint would bring forth results," Komena croaked.

"I'd have you fight this war in a manner that doesn't guarantee having to fight another one in twenty years with your current allies," Andronike said, eerily imitating my every intonation from back then without flaw.

"And yet," the youngest of the sisters said.

They were questioning the value of playing nice when faced with allies like these, whose actions might very well lead to that war in a few decades regardless of what the drow did. It went back to the lessons they'd been taught while still mortals: that restraint would always be seen as weakness, that only the strong were bargained with and strength came without mercy. Of course, they were wrong in this.

"You did get that," I pointed out without hesitation. "Sure, we might need to arrange an accident for Gaspard of Cleves in a way that can't be traced back to us a few years from now, but you're missing the point: the two most powerful people in Procer want to shut him down and will at the first good opportunity. The Empire Ever Dark is seen as valuable, something not to antagonize without reason. Considering the general amoral ruthlessness of Proceran diplomacy over the last centuries, that's basically weaving you a crown of flowers and asking if you're going to the fair with anyone."

I'd, uh, maybe gotten a little too enthusiastic with that last metaphor.

"Were you going to the fair with anyone?" Andronike asked, tone too serene for her not to be fucking with me.

Great, they were still missing the mark half the time with sarcasm but naturally they'd be the finest of students when it came to learning how to pull my leg.

"I had a shift at the Rat's Nest anyway," I said.

I felt Komena's gaze descend on me, somehow coming across as skeptical even coming from a bird.

"Fine," I grumpily admitted, "Duncan Brech did not, in fact, ask me to the fair."

He'd asked Lily from one of the other rooms at the orphanage, whose... charms had developed quicker and more amply than mine. Mind you if I'd had my pick of the litter I might have chosen Lily as well, so I could hardly blame him.

"Procer has not asked us to the fair either," Andronike comfortingly said.

See, if it'd been her sister I might have thought that halfway genuine but coming from her I just knew she was just having me on.

"Very droll," I said. "Thank you for passing this along, then. I'll be seeking out Hasenbach to bury it for good."

Preferably without dead bodies being involved, but that depended on how reasonable Prince Gaspard intended to be. If he was willing to bend his neck and make reparations for overreaching in this way, I'd leave it at that. Otherwise I was going to have to take some measures to express my irritation, less than subtly. If even that didn't make the point sink in, then I'd have to put some thought into how best to have him disappear without entangling the Mirror Knight into this mess. Tricky but not impossible, if I leaned on the White Knight to get him moved to another front and he'd not confused sleeping with the pretty Langevin girl for true love. Hells, though, why couldn't he just have stayed out of this mess? The prince would not have been so bold without a Chosen to back him. Why was it that the only Proceran hero to have any degree of sense was Roland and he was the one I couldn't have on the field? The Gods were pricks, as usual.

"How's Serolen?" I asked.

There really wasn't a proper, commonly accepted name for the massive forest in between Lake Netzach and the Chalice. Most maps ended at the bottom of the Kingdom of the Dead, and few people had an interest in what went on north of the human nations of Calernia. I'd seen it called the – inventively-named – Dead Wilds, the Forest of Ghosts and rather more poetically the Bleak Weald. Mapmakers tended to call it whatever they felt like, and there was no one to contradict them: it wasn't like the Dead King's legions had shared their name for it, if they even had one. Serolen was what the Firstborn had come to name the forest, and in Crepuscular it more or less meant the Duskwood. The Firstborn had fought nine battles and a hundred skirmishes before claiming the greater span of the woods, securing them enough that Sve Noc could bring down the Gloom around the edges and plunge the territory in permanent dusk.

Neshamah was perhaps the greatest sorcerer Calernia had ever known, so of course he'd found ways to pierce through the Gloom. They weren't perfect, though, and it'd enabled the Firstborn to secure their frontline and begin settling in the depths of Serolen. The first drow city on the surface still shared its name with the Duskwood, for now, but I expected that would change with time. I'd already filled the ears of the Crows with rants about why Proceran principalities and capitals sharing their name was highly inconvenient in half a dozen senses, so you might even say it'd be a religious obligation. I'd shove that in the holy book if I had to, they knew damn well.

"See for yourself," Komena said, open pride in her voice.

The shadows shifted, but this time it was not a memory that was offered up for me to tear through. I dragged myself up to my feet, teeth keeping my pipe in place, and walked over what had been made to seem like the evening sky. Below me, misty woods shrouded in shadow spread out as far as the eye could see. The ground fell beneath my feet as we closed in on the Duskwood, my old calcified fear of heights sending a familiar pang up my leg. What I found beneath the mists had me smiling, though. The sigils of the Everdark had come together under the Ten Generals and their great cabal of the Exodus, whose founders were Sve Noc themselves, and the results were a wonder. An empire's worth of looted wealth had been made into a city at the heart of the gloomy woods, temples of stone and millennia-old steles held up by trees coaxed through Night to serve as stairs and roads and a hundred other things. Within the bark had been nestled precious stones and obsidian, while leaves around the sacred places were painted with colourful prayers and poems.

It was a city like none I'd ever seen, like no one had ever seen, made up from the stolen parts of half a dozen cities who'd once been among the most glorious of this land. And everywhere among the labyrinthine lay of its 'streets' the Firstborn were living. Sleeping and haggling and brewing their horrid drinks, making lizardscale clothes and harvesting the mushrooms from the deeps that'd spread like the plague. Waters had been diverted from half a dozen streams, and stolen lakes brought from their ancient homes, making the entire span richly watered and leading into an artificial lake at the heart of Serolen. There the great temple that had once been the soul of the Empire Ever Dark, the seat of the Twilight Sages and where Sve Noc had struck their ill-fated bargain with Below, stood tall. Entire flocks of crows like the ones on my shoulders perched there, ever-hungry and ever-watchful shards of godhood. I let out a low, impressed whistle after taking my pipe in hand.

"That's new," I said, pointing towards the great temple. "I didn't know you'd looted that."

"All of Holy Tvarigu is within us," Andronike replied.

"It's coming along nicely," I approved. "Do you intend to keep a strong presence up here even after the war?"

"There would be advantages," Komena said. "Like the nearness of the Chain of Hunger."

Words to make a Lycaonese choke, that, but it made sense. To the drow, yearly ratling raids would be like a fresh harvest of Night coming over and asking to be scythed through.

"We've got time yet," I said. "Might be worth speaking with the First Prince when you decide on where you'll raise your cities. She'll be better placed than I to point out the northern trade arteries of Procer."

I received no acknowledgement of my words save for the two of them taking flight and landing on my shoulders, sharp talons digging into my flesh. I put my pipe back into my mouth and took a drag, spewing the smoke upwards just to spite them. It was time, it seemed.

"All right," I said afterward. "Show me the war."

I steeled myself and the shadows spun.

Horror swallowed me whole.

Javvies

Idiot Procerans.

And they might need to find something particularly unpleasant to throw Mirror Knight into.

Hanno will not be pleased to hear that some of the Procerans are planning to betray their allies, especially with the involvement of another Hero. Neither will Tariq. And neither will Antigone – she'll definitely beat the stupid out of Mirror Knight, or at least give it a solid try.

Zggt

Call me a conspiracy theorist, but as you've pointed out this isn't a very Heroic line of thought, then perhaps it originated elsewhere. I feel like Malicia is involved somehow. The focus on the aftermath rather than the war and creating strife between Cat and Procer really advances her agenda.

Javvies

Eh ... it's a classically Proceran move, though.

I mean, Malicia could be connected to it, sure, but it could very easily be entirely homegrown and have nothing to do with Malicia whatsoever.

Adrian_V

I agree with Jav, i doubt Malicia created this....but if Cat found out then it sure as hell is posible for Malicia to find out and use wich is much worse than if it was fabricated.

Shikkarasu

It's perfectly in line with the "Good Guys"

"See, Catherine, there was nothing to it," he smiled, sharp and cold. "The ordeal would only have stung were you a heretic, which makes wanton use of it perfectly permissible. Indeed, how dare any of us question the Wandering Bard's right to pursue our demise whenever the whim takes her? How very impious."

-Book 4, Chapter 69: Repute

Drow are evil, therefore why shouldn't we do terrible things to them? They don't deserve the rewards like we do.

Shveiran

If you want to bring in quotes to sustain your view on how heroes, Above and good-aligned nations think, may I suggest quoting them and not Amadeus during one of his unventing phases?

I love the guy, but he is not, shall we say, impartial. What he says shouldn't be taken for gospel, especially not when he is explicitly trying to pull an Hero's pigtaileds with his words.

Shikkarasu

Fair point. I am definitely being petty, not witty.

flashburn283

Do not attribute to Malicia what can be explained by stupidity

sengachi

But also watch for Malicia funding the stupid and their idiotic, coalition-destroying plans. She likes to that.

Frivolous

It's the Mirror Knight's glory that his body becomes better with time, stronger, swifter, tougher.

It's the Mirror Knight's tragedy that his mind remains the same, stupid and closed and gullible.

Shveiran

Though he never struck me as particularly smart, it might be he isn't quite planning on betraying anyone. Aside from the fact that he hasn't quite agreed yet (though granted, "I'd make for a poor ruler" kind of implies he is debating the practicalities rather than the moral side of things) he might just be thinking of a small change of plans.

Like, say, a few lands close to Cleves being annexed, in exchange for other concessions.
It would be a plot, and it would be a betrayal, but not quite “thanks for helping us out, now go die in a ditch somewhere before we conquer you, bye!” treachery.

What I’m saying is, it reflects poorly on his judgment, but... it might not amount to much. Maybe.

Liliet

It’s also possible he has no idea that the lands were supposed to go to the drow. He’s not a politician and not a strategist. I’ll assume he has no idea what the fuck is going on before I assume he’s being malicious, here.

Frivolous

Ah, I neglected to clarify: If the Mirror Knight is openly disdainful towards Levantines, how much more disdainful can he be towards an Evil non-human race?

It’s pretty logical that the MK would favor Procerans over the Empire Ever Dark.

AbraKadabra

The guy wants practically half of The kingdom of The dead.

hakureireimu

To be fair MK tried to refuse both times, without even a “I’ll think about it” polite refusal.

luminiousblu

Mirror Knight strikes me as a Lawrence of Arabia type, not as a Balfour type. He’s the boots on the ground doing what he can to get things sorted out. He’s not aware of the plots back home, or at least not the depths of them and likely doesn’t understand the political situation, because he’s a combat-focused hero who gets stronger and stronger and apparently is indestructible. Politicians back home make things messy for him, but that doesn’t make him part of it.

caoimhinh

It’s good that they are finally taking notice of the Mirror Knight as a potential threat. I find it weird that no one in the story has Mirror Knight’s abilities oppose those of the Night. Catherine at least should have noticed.

This might relate to the “great future threat” that Christophe is meant to face, which Hanno had predicted after observing how Dawn made Mirror Knight grow stronger every day. Hanno said that the Heavens had made him to fight something strong, and horrific. My theory: he is meant to fight the Drow. And this thing of tying Christophe to the Cleves Principality might be the first step towards turning him to that story, with the next being -of course- Cleves starting war against the Drow near its lands.

Cat must be very careful and veer Sve Noc away from Story Traps. Making war against a Hero so seemingly tailor-made against their powers would be very dangerous. They must, at the very least, avoid falling into the role of the bad guys in that story.

caoimhinh

I skipped a word.

I find it weird that no one in the story has noticed Mirror Knight's abilities oppose those of the Night.

Shveiran

Would that story be on Mirror's side though?

I mean, if he was the plotter and the inciting incident, then... he is the story's villain. An heroic mighty would liberate his people from the threat of Proceran greed. It doesn't look like the grove would help Cristophe.

He isn't, though, his would-be father in law is. Add to that the standard heroic coincidences and the combination of procerans' attitude with drow's idea of politics, and the tragedy might just write itself for him to avenge.

caoimhinh

Yeah, and with Cat already plotting to have Prince Gaspard "have an accident" she might just make a self-fulfilling prophecy.

Killing the guy to avoid his intentions of war only to have his Hero son-in-law go on a quest for revenge. I would expect Catherine to be more Genre Savvy than to think that such assassination wouldn't be find out by the Hero later and probably at the most crucial and inconvenient time

Shveiran

A revenge story kind of requires a deep connection to the one you are avenging, IMO.
It might work if his daughter stumbles into the incident and is murdered, but unless that happens it sounds kind of weak.

Unless Cristophe starts raving about how the Prince is like the father he never had and also make amazing muffins, I'd say Cat is in the clear.

caoimhinh

There's also the matter that it would be the Queen of Callow and High Priestess of the Empire Ever Dark having one of the Princes of Procer murdered.

A lot can go wrong right there. It would be a political mess unchaining a war, and Heroes need much less than that to have the Story helping them.

delspaig

He's definitely been enjoying his daughter's "muffins" for a while :v

caoimhinh

The problem is that even the slightest pretense can serve as help for the Heroes, as we have seen so far.

The crusade against Callow was a purely political thing that aimed at killing Catherine just for being a Villain (even without the Name) while the Procerans were already thinking how to divide the land of Callow among themselves. The Heroes were an invading force, yet the story was on their side because they were part of a Crusade that after beating Callow would fight against Praes. Catherine won, but not thanks to help of Providence.

When the Saint of Swords decided that she would rather risk everything by destroying the Twilight Crown than let someone use it, she was losing and about to be restrained by the combined efforts of Cat, Tariq, Indrani, and Roland, yet Kairos simply said "we are invincible!" and that was enough to turn the tables and empower the Saint.

That's why Providence is mostly seen helping Heroes, they don't need much to have it on their side, a Villain like Catherine needs a lot of planning and careful steps, a Hero just trust their instincts and needs the smallest pretense on being the good guy to have a boost.

Hence what I said: Cat needs to be very careful in how she handles this. They can't afford to leave even the smallest doubt that they are the ones on the right.

Shveiran

I'm not sure I agree with your analysis, not completely.

The Heroic crusaders were infuriatingly turning a blind eye to the practicalities of their involvement, and the very use of the word hero loses all meaning when applied to them IMO, yet they got no help from providence.

Cat may have played her hand smart and done her homework, but when you get down to it she was facing an invading force more than twice her numbers, with more mages if less skilled, a shitton of priests, and three times her Named, among which two of the oldest beasts in the continent.

She still won, didn't she? And it isn't like the opposition played like morons on the field.

I'm game for throwing shade on the crusaders, but from my point of view Providence sat that one out.

As for Saint, sure, that happened.

Yet I'd argue it happened as the third betrayal of Kairos fucking Theodosian, who leaned in the pattern, something he was able to do thanks to the involvement of the Bard in the first place.

That's a lot of tropes to add to the "invincible until you aren't" cliché.

Hero Bulshit was not the only culprit, IMO.

Liliet

> The Heroes were an invading force, yet the story was on their side because they were part of a Crusade that after beating Callow would fight against Praes. Catherine won, but not thanks to help of Providence.

Not true. Tariq and Laurence spell out at Camps that actually Providence is audibly (to them) favoring Catherine in that battle.

Mental Mouse

It may suffice to let Cordelia know, that the Black Queen knows exactly what certain Proceran lords are plotting against their allies....

Shveiran

I was thinking Cat might want to test Cordelia on this, in her current frame of mind. You know, give her a chance to inform her of the problem herself, pretending she doesn't know.

Just a thought.

Jeremy Cliff Armstrong

Cordelia would need to be a raving lunatic to even think of sharing this with Cat. Sure, we know that Cat already knows and would see the reveal as laudable. But Cordelia doesn't know Cat knows... else why would she be sharing knowledge of the plot with Cat?

The problem, is that Cordelia can't know with certainty how Cat will react. The possibility that Cat would be infuriated by it and lash out cannot be dismissed. Not when the lives of tens of thousands of Proceran soldiers and the shattering of the grand alliance (and, by extension, the annihilation of Procer) might be the butcher's bill. Cordelia thinks she can handle this in-house and is actively pursuing that end. Without the knowledge that Cat already knows, it's just too big a gamble for her to tell Cat.

Unfortunately... both Cat and Cordelia are going to end up being wrong. The Drow will be betrayed and the crows will lose faith in Cat... and it will be costly all around. The shape of that story is clear to me.

Mental Mouse

Ahem? When has Cat been the first one to "lash out" during negotiations, or punished truth? She's certainly walked away from negotiations when the other party was trying to jerk her around, and when faced with attack has given as good as she's gotten.

Also, she can open with a hint: "The Sisters of Night have brought me troubling reports of Prince Gaspard... anything you want to tell me there?" You know, play the "spooky goddesses tell me stuff, without revealing just how much she knows....

She can also mention that the Drow have already settled into the forest, and are looking forward to chewing on the Ratlings....

Sun Dog

My thoughts near exactly. I imagine Cat popping in and saying something like "the drow are pitching a fit, wanting to bow out of the war. Seems Rumena got the idea Procer, in particular Prince Gaspard, is preparing to betray them and take their new homeland. Before I go assure them there's nothing to it, it would sure help if I knew there was actually nothing to it."

Given how powerful the Mighty are, I wonder how the Dead King's legions of zombies could possibly hold out against them. Diabolism? I wonder if the usage of Night would let them pilfer traits from demons and devils without getting corrupted.

Javvies

Sheer numbers.

Plus the undead aren't hindered by sunlight or the dawn. Or, if they are, they aren't affected anywhere near as much as the drow are.

Remember, Cat said something about the Dead King tossing fifty thousand Binds away as a distraction against the drow, just a couple chapters ago.

Also, monsters.

Plus, the Night doesn't grant the drow the inherent advantages that Light-wielders have (priests and Heroes) against the Dead King's forces.

Konstantin von Karstein

Revenants could be useful too.

Shikkarasu

Sod the devils, what kind of Night can they drain from the Revenants? They can steal from other races as shown by their plan to harvest the Chain of Hunger, they can steal from corpses, and even if corpses normally lose their night over time the ones who retain their memories should keep their Secrets at least.

The northern front is bleeding numbers, but the overall strength of the army might be growing.

Shveiran

fearless numbers have a quality of their own, though. Plus, Cat's Everdark Adventures showed that you need a body to take Night: I bet Neshamah is capitalizing on that, trying to destroy undead and drow bodies so that the Night itself slowly weakens as well. It sounds like his style.

Mental Mouse

Aside from what javvies says below. Nessie clearly has magic to argue directly with the Night.

So first (literally writing this as i read so i don't forget to ask) the Rapacious Trobadour felt insulted and attacked Cat when snarked about him stealing songs?

And procer being procer of course, never mind everything Cat said, having that out is like asking for Malicia or someone to use it to seed discord among the alliance.

Personally i think Cat should find a way to record some of those conversations and the Drow front of the war, the first can be used as evidence and the second to show just how a bad idea it is.

danh3107

Great chapter, good way to do exposition. Now on to what's bugging me (lol)

I love Crows, I did research on corvids for three years, but I really dislike that they're being associated with night here, capital Night too. Corvids are entirely Diurnal birds, they have almost 0 nightvision and are most active when the sun is high in the sky. They also don't have talons, those are claws, they mostly use them to perch on things and walk on the ground. They aren't very sharp.

Now I know all of this literally doesn't matter, I just needed to get it off my chest. Now I'll never have to complain about it to myself ever again!

Bladesmith

Yeah, I've had some of the same thoughts. I justify it by telling myself that that is what you get when crows are imitated by goddesses who've been underground for the last few thousand years.

Wonder

I also justify it by saying this is an alternate universe, Fantasyland , something like that and not everything will be the same.

Mental Mouse

Alas, the way of the Guideverse is that Story matters more than Reality. 😊

Shikkarasu

As a fellow Corvid enthusiast I agree. Bats would make more sense; nightvision not much better, but still a nocturnal creature.

As a Mythology enthusiast, however, I'm loving Cat's whole Odin thing. Magic spear staff, Unnaturally awesome mount, ~~lost~~-eye crippled leg, and a pair of crows that grant wisdom.

Mith

I think they are crows because they are carrion eaters and clever tricksters, more than being nocturnal birds. Sve Noc is seizing power through might and trickery.

Just thinking that since all Drow are hallowed priests (all Drow are born with Night), I wonder if Sve Noc could make all drow Night be returned to Them upon death, meaning that you could only get zombies out of the corpses.

Frivolous

I wonder why many heroes are believing that Cat won't survive the war. Why is that? Wishful thinking, or something more?

Also, I wish there was less use of the double negative. Classy but so confusing especially if used so often.

ninegardens

They are probably running on story logic. Either as a Redemption story, or a heroic sacrifice- from the point of view of "Heroic" stories, Black Queen is ill placed to survive.

They might not even be thinking "Story logic" the way Black or Grey do- just looking at the situation, and looking at history and going "Oh, great dark generals seldom get to retire. That's interesting"

Zee

Been asking this myself. I think some heroes say that about Cat because of her nascent Name. We don't know if it's public knowledge, but I bet it is amongst the heroes and princes. They probably have a clue of what the Name is about and feel they can tie a story where Cat dies in it.

Liliet

Story logic yeah. I mean in Book 5 Cat herself admitted she doesn't have great odds of not having to make a heroic sacrifice to tie the whole thing together and ensure its success before the war is over.

ninegardens

Do you remember what chapter this was in? Or even which Arc? I'd be tempted to go check it out.

Cicero

Well, discussions about yearly harvesting of the Ratlings is certainly a way to get a Lycaonese First Prince thinking that permanent friendship with the Drow might be a good idea.

caoimhinh

It has always seemed to me like the Lycaonese would be the most welcoming to both Callow and the Drow. Many instances have confirmed it through their interactions, they respect people with backbone and are willing to fight to the bitter end against the Enemy.

Adding now that the Empire Ever Dark wishes to help against the Rattlings and even looks at it positively, would be a very good thing for the Lycaonese.

Stuart Hemming

Hell a few years of being sieged by Rattlings then being rescued by Drow raiders eager to fight and the Lycaonese will treat them like blood kin

308924810a

So one problem is that the Drow are fairly likely to raid everyone around them, including the Lycaonese and other bordering principalities.

On the other hand, while both Drow and the Dead King Want corpses out of the Procerans, the Drow don't want live children, and would be willing to give the bodies back after they've extracted the Night.

So it might be that they form a mercenary relationship with the Lycaonese, selling mercenaries against the Chain of Hunger in exchange for Night, while simultaneously having a more hostile raiding relationship with the southern principalities.

Liliet

I'll note there's clear natural borders between DK and DK's neighbours – raiding isn't as easy as crossing an arbitrary principality border.

And if the crows take Cat's advice, they'll, ah, limit that, if not ban it altogether.

Shveiran

The like could be somewhat effective, but mountains and fortresses on the passes won't. Drow climb like geckos.

Agreed on the rest though

Burlyraven

Okay, this is probably one of my favorite recent chapters. And the concept of Cat manipulating the Sisters into reviving Tancred is still on the table, although I do doubt she'll take the opportunity. It'd be damnably easy for them, though.

caoimhinh

It's impossible at this point. Tancred was a fledgling Villain who was killed before his story got strong, and then was raised as an undead, and then was destroyed by Night sorceries wielded by Cat. Nothing can revive him. Even Angels would be hard-pressed to do it, as a resurrection doesn't just happen, it needs to have the weight of a story behind it. There are rules and conditions that apply.

That said, I agree with you that this is one of the best recent chapters.

Burlyraven

See, it amazes me that people still don't seem to realize that I'm essentially just meming at this point (at the request of others that frequent the comics). It also amazes (and this one is totally serious) me that most people that try to shut me down have weak arguments like this.

We're still getting in chapter discussions of a dead character, from an emotionally exhausted villain with the bent ears of two fledgling gods with a strong desire to exercise their power. The story is there; it's just not a happy one.

Burlyraven

*comments, not comics

caoimhinh

"I set those drifting thoughts – a sure sign I'd been going through these chores for a while – aside when Hakram flitted back in"

Don't worry Cat, that's caused by the misplaced 2-year timeskip which forces you to recollect events of the recent past each time you look at something and muse over stuff every time you meet people.

It will pass, eventually, when we are caught up with all the info we missed.

Liliet

No, I'm pretty sure that's ACTUALLY in-character, and it's also convenient for us to catch up with because Erratic is a good writer.

Like 5 events happened during those 2 years, which is entirely realistic because this war is a long and horrible slog and that's the entire point. Putting them into actual books would make for a HORRIBLE story.

And really, Cat no longer going off on random tangents mid-thought? In what world would that happen?

caoimhinh

No, it isn't.

Catherine has spent these last 11 chapters recollecting events of the past 2 years through musings that get triggered by things like meeting someone, instead of describing what's happening in the present through the narration. There's a big difference.

The latter is what Cat usually did in previous books (and what happens in Chapter 12, for example, with Cat describing what's happening around her), while the first is what the 2-year timeskip forces her to do in order to provide the readers with the info we are missing. It's not in Cat's character to go into flashbacks and reminiscence over everything someone has done in the past 2 years, that's only happening in this book because there's a gap of information that needs to be filled.

Liliet

I think Cat remembered old things triggered by random shit in-universe in previous books too, we the readers just didn't get treated to it much like how we don't get treated to the narration of her going to pee.

Tailoring what you show to what the audience has to be told about is like writer 101

Frivolous

Not sure if a lot of people have noted this section:

Humans, bearing the emblem of a red lion. Magelings, surrounding the Princess Malanza. They speak into the scrying bowl, believing themselves safe behind their wards. They are not, for the Lord of Silent Steps has brought great knowledge into the Night as to treading through without tripping.

Especially in contrast with this section:

"- this talk of leaving all conquered lands to the dark elves," Prince Gaspard of Cleves snorted. "A kingdom's worth, for a paltry few thousand raiders? It is madness, Princess Rozala."

Analysis: Gaspard and probably many other people believe the might of the Empire Ever Dark can be defined by their numbers alone.

In contrast, Ivah the Lord of Silent Steps has apparently taught numerous other Firstborn how to bypass wards (at least the Proceran ones) and spy on people invisibly, giving the Empire Ever Dark matchless supernatural spies and assassins.

Could that be why Cat isn't bothered by Rozala saying that many heroes don't believe Cat will survive the war – because she is hiding the greater part of her actual strength?

Certainly Cat probably hasn't told many people (maybe not even Hakram) about Serolen, or that Sve Noc has become more powerful and experienced since her/their apotheosis, or that she's been spying on her allies.

Last but not least: Sve Noc apparently teleported their entire temple to the surface. Amazing and probably horrifying to anyone who isn't drow.

hakureireimu

It does seem like the allies know about Serolen from chapter 7.

Earl ofPurple

I don't think it was teleportation, technically. I think it was put in an extradimensional space, moved to the surface, and taken out again. Still an impressive feat, but something many Named and mages can do on a much smaller scale.

Mental Mouse

Size matters... It's one thing to stash corpses and handy items in a personal domain, but keeping entire cities and lakes in there? It's comparable to when Thief yolked Arcadia's sun... and that stunt could only have been made possible by riding a major story, and then only in Arcadia.

"Exiles we may be, but we did not abandon our cities. We brought them with us...". Those Procerans definitely need "another think coming" about the wisdom of backstabbing the people of Night.

Liliet

It's also kind of hilarious how 'fifty' is now 'few'.

(As in, thousand raiders)

Shveiran

I know right? And they all see in the dark, and several are basically Named with less story bullshit!
What kind of world does one need to live in to say something like that?

Liliet

A very convenient world that reshapes itself to fit whatever sentiment you would like to express at the time! Lots of people in that one.

Wonder

I think it was more of pocket dimensions (or is it night dimensions?) Shenanigans like how Cat said Black has many weapons in Name shadows.

Konstantin von Karstein

Let's be realistic, every member of the Grand Alliance is spying (or trying) on all the others.

Mental Mouse

Yeah, but for most of them it's a matter of trying to intercept communications and eavesdrop on meetings, and occasionally succeeding. Not listening in on a top Chosen's pillow talk!

Barthumphries

Bard plans to remove the White Knight temporarily so that the Black Queen is seen going after the Mirror Knight's lover and family, sundering the Alliance.

laguz24

No, the bard wants the dead king dead. This is her best opportunity to do so and her manipulations won't get far with cat around.

Insanenoodlyguy

This. Now that the truce has gotten through, infighting will only weaken a story she no longer has full control over. Oh sure, if Cat just goes full Kairos and betrays the rest at a critical moment, seemingly removing all hope, she could work with that, but there's no value in sundering the alliance over infighting. There's already at least two people on the top that would know exactly why Cat went after the Prince, which will blunt a "unite against the betrayer and then win despite all hope being lost" story. Now it's best to ride this horse. Once Nessie is gone, might be a different story, but first thing first

308924810a

What the bard really needs is a way of uniting all of the fence-sitting countries to participate in this war. Titanomachy seems to be joining in, now we just need the elves and the Chain of hunger somehow.

Shikkarasu

Anyone else low-key worried that Liliet still hasn't commented yet? At this point they're practically a part of the Practical brand.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Seen a few comments with Liliet's like on 'em. They're present and accounted for, though the lack of direct commentary is unusual. I still fondly recall insinuating that they'd end up in Cat's position due to a handful of shared traits.

Sovereign under the moonless night gave Mighty titles that allowed increased power and very potent Secrets like Lord of Silent Steps being top assassin scout spy and basically drow Adjutant , Lord of Shallow Graves(?) Can Save Noc do the same?

How powerful is the Losara Sigil compared to the rest? Is Mighty Jindrich the Battering Vanguard of Drow might a member of Losara Cabal?

I sure hope that Catherine's name have an aspect for title buffing people.

Interesting, mirror knight was that weirdo who gets stronger every day. Definitely seems like some confrontation will happen there.

Chapter 12: Contest

"The enemy's come to die on this field, my friends, for an awful prince and terrible pay. We, on the other hand, have come to die on this field for a terrible prince and awful pay. That the Heavens are on our side ought to be evident."

– Captain Thierry the Acerbic, addressing his company before the infamously bloody Battle of Motte-aux-Foins Anticipation hung in the air like smoke.

The sigil of the Seventh General, Vesena Spear-Biter, was painted on thousands of stretches of dark cloth hanging from arms and armour and even hair: two jagged, monstrous fangs tearing at what looked like a thunderbolt of iron. Red and white set on black, it was eye-catching and when the breeze blew through the outskirts of Serolen a sea of pale teeth biting into iron stirred with it. These were not the drow from the Outer Rings I'd once fought, the dregs of the dreg-empire. No, the Vesena came armoured in iron and obsidian, bearing polished cuirasses and helmets shaped like angled bat wings. Tough tezkuze leather, those massive hard-skinned blind lizards who could eat even Mighty should they prove reckless, had been fashioned into trousers and long-sleeved vests touched by tinkling bracelets and sculpted greaves of stone or dull iron. There was an order to this host of the Firstborn, unlike in most of their kind, for in the days of the old Empire Ever Dark the Mighty Vesena Spear-Biter had been known as the 'Relentless General Whose Victories Flow Like A River'.

The Vesena were not so much a sigil as they were the last field army of the ancient Empire Ever Dark, kept standing through the ages by sheer dint of the Spear-Biter's brutal murder of all rivals and naysayers. Time had taken its toll, and warriors now stood where once soldiers had, but there was no closer among the Firstborn to a professional army than the Vesena Sigil. It had occupied the whole of the city of Great Noglof, before leaving with the Exodus, and made the entire city into a bustling army camp – kept going by the plunder in Night and gifts and food that was brought back by the fighting drow of the sigil after every campaign. Even now, a discerning eye could make out what had been the components of a field army simply from the way the warriors were equipped.

First came long stretches of skirmishers, bearing hard bucklers of iron painted with their sigil while long barbed javelins hung from their backs and short blades were kept at their hips. Dzulu, most of them, but the Vesena were one of the rare sigils that taught Secrets to their own and so they all shared a deadly blackflame trick that allowed them to have quite the sting to them. Behind them came hunters, those that would have been infantry regulars in olden days. These stood in companies of nine times nine each led by the least of the Mighty, an ispe, and were armed as I had only ever seen the Watch be armed: though they bore long swords of Night-forged steel on the flanks, they also held horn bows. Short, stout and curved these little wonders were no match for a good Deoraithe longbow but they fired at surprising range – regular arrows would be next to useless against the dead, of course, so the Vesena had adapted by infusing obsidian arrowheads with Night in a way that made them burst on impact.

At heart of the army stood the finest warriors of the Vesena, three thousand hulking towering shapes whose shells of iron-joined obsidian left no opening at all from head to toe. The Ebonclad were a cabal of their own within the Vesena, each and everyone a jawor that drew on Night to breathe and see through the sealed armour and wield their large stone-and-steel maces. As another exotic addition, the Vesena Sigil also boasted no less than ten of the hulking things called zanikzen, the famed annihilation-engines that Mighty Ysengral had gone to war nine times to steal only to be driven back every time. House-sized and made entirely of bone and onyx, they looked like two-wheeled carts holding up the fused bones of a hundred ancient drow whose wretched half-seen silhouettes ended up pointing their hands towards the horizon and forming a gaping maw filled with spear-like spikes of onyx. As field siege engines I deemed to be inferior to what the Empire and Callow used, but they'd been murderously proficient at defending tunnels.

And in the very middle of the army, seated atop a writhing living throne made of once-Mighty foes stripped of Night so thoroughly they became nisi, Mighty Vesena the Spear-Biter waited. Though it would have been as ravaged by age as Rumena in appearance, being its senior, the long stripe scars going down its face made it impossible to tell what it might once have looked like. It wore an armoured cuirass of obsidian over flowing pale cloth, needles of bone woven into its pale long hair to keep it in an elaborate bun. It claimed for only a weapon a long-handled axe – so long as to be half as tall as they – whose head was steel so deeply imbued with Night it flickered around it like smoke. Around it an honour guard of rylleh stood, clad in bright colours, but the lesser Mighty had been spread among the host as commanders of dzulu. The Sisters had once told me that most titles among the Mighty had once been military ranks in the Empire Ever Dark, for the soldiers had been among the first to thrive in the nights after the end of the Twilight Sages, and the Vesena in a way kept closest that that old truth.

There were twenty thousand, all in all: but a fifth of the might of the Vesena Sigil, but its sharpest fangs were all bared here, spread amongst the trees. Facing them was only deep darkness and the mists of the Gloom. Open grounds for six hundred feet after the end of the forest, which struck me as having been the Dead King's picked battlefield: the dead fared poorly in the woods. Against, drow, anyway.

"They haven't even dug ditches," I frowned. "Sloppy. Ysengral would have done better."

Mighty Ysengral, the Cradle of Steel, had distinguished themselves to my eye as the finest of the Firstborn generals even if they were towards the lower end of the Ten Generals when it came to raw power. Considering it was debatable where Rumena would rank second or third among them, though, that was still nothing to sneer at.

"Ysengral was defending the Wilting March from another breakthrough," Komena said, and I almost shivered.

Standing to my left, eyes silver-blue and form little more than flickering shadow, the image of what had once been a mortal woman was sharing the sights with me. Before I took my eye off her, every time I glimpsed a long-fanged skull beneath the shadows that was always gone if I tried to find it. There was a twang of something like iron and blood to her voice, something I could not help but taste against the roof of my mouth. Komena wore armour, and a sword at her hip. She was the Youngest Night.

"We did not foresee the Hidden Horror until it was edging into the Gloom," Andronike said, her voice coming from my right.

Her eyes, too, burned pale blue. But over her face flickered the shape of the iron mask she had once worn as one of the Twilight Sages, and the thick billowing cloak she had decked herself in almost seemed like dark-feathered wings whenever she moved. There were strings twined among her fingers, which she ever twined. The affect to her words was subtler, like a drink thought harmless until your tongue was felt to be numb. She was the Oldest Night.

"You didn't get time to dig in," I put together. "Vesena was the closest?"

"Kurosiv," Komena replied, shaking her head. "But its horde was spread out. Vesena was ready for war."

"He's able to slip past your scouts with entire armies now," I whispered.

Shit. If they could only tell that the Dead King was attacking when he was beginning to breach the Gloom, then that gave them what – half a day to mobilize at most? They'd either have to permanently garrison a significant portion of their forces to defend all the southern stretches of Serolen, which would cripple their ability raid into Keter's territory, or start breaking through whatever means he used to obscure the movements of his armies on this front. I would have pursued the matter in conversation, but was robbed of the opportunity: the battle was beginning. It started with a sound like the whistle of a falling arrow, though utterly deafening. Then flashes of blinding light scythed through the mist in five places, like a titan's raking claws, and for a moment the passage between Keter and Serolen was forced open by the sorceries of the Dead King. In that heartbeat, long ladders of steel with spiked ends fell through the open space and buried deep in the ground, the runes carved on the glowing bright. Like a steel road, one meant to keep the gap open.

"Second through sixth," Mighty Vesena said, voice ringing out. "Wail."

The Crows and I were standing by its side and so we'd seen its eyes had not blinked, not even when the light had been at its brightest. Five of the massive zanikzen lit up, thousands of glyphs in Crepuscular craved into the bones unveiled, and as crews attended to the large engines I saw heat waft of the surface and half the body of a nisi too close to the maw turn to ash. Heat shimmered between the onyx spikes, near-invisible lances of impossibly hot air shooting out and lashing out at the ladders in a lazy, low arc. The needles went abruptly still afterwards, forcing out a strange sound like a hundred inhuman wails. The first to get hit dented, and its front melted like summer snow, but the dead had moved quick enough to contest three of the remaining four. Ghouls who'd moved forward like lightning threw themselves in the way, embracing annihilation to curb the blow, and though one of the lances tore through and broke a ladder's end in a spray of earth the other two held. The dead had three beachheads. Further down the line, another five bursts of light signaled that Keter was broadening its offensive.

"Two by breach," Mighty Vesena ordered.

Even as the drow annihilation-engines began hammering at the fresh beachheads, the Vesena Sigil began its advance without needing to be told.

"They're impressively disciplined, for a sigil," I admitted, eyes remaining on the battle.

"Vesena made of the old western army regulation a set of holy rites," Komena told me, sounding fond. "All who break them are said to have broken faith with the sigil and are free to be slain."

I'd gathered that Vesena Spear-Biter was a darling of hers, which didn't surprise me all that much. Komena did tend to favour the old warhorses who'd survived the collapse of the Empire Ever Dark.

The ever-relentless dead had wasted no time getting through their protection for the three ladders that'd landed: shield-soldiers the size of ogres in heavy plate, protecting in a ring the more vulnerable mages putting up translucent shields of sorcery preventing repeating fire from the engines from getting through. With the second wave, if Keter's usual northern doctrine held, would come another circle of corpse-mages to attempt to raise rough but swiftly functional wards that'd make it hard work dislodging the dead from that position. The Firstborn were well aware of that, of course. Even as the first rank of a shield wall formed beyond the beachheads the drow skirmishers finished closing in the distance. Javelins flew whistling, the drow never breaking stride or slowing as they threw, the barbed ends hitting the shields of the dead with dull thumps before exploding in black flames of Night.

The shield walls broke, shattered like overripe fruits as the the first line of skirmishers unsheathed swords and wading into close combat. The lines behind disrupted the gathering dead with further throws, enabling the nimble drow to slip through the gaps in the defences of the dead. Mighty Vesena had been, I gathered, one of the few Firstborn generals to win victories against the dwarves during the war that broke the Empire Ever Dark. It had typically won those victories by hitting the heavy-armoured but slow-moving dwarven armies with crippling blows while they were in movement, never allowing them to deploy the siege engines and harsh sorceries that'd shattered so many drow armies. Traces of that mindset could still be seen here I decided as I watched the drow skirmishers of what the expanding assault of the Dead King had made the right wing slink their way deeper behind the lines of Keter.

Their objective here was clear: hitting the dead mages putting up shields before a second wave could set up wards, then prying away the Dead King's breaches from him one after another. It was a much more aggressive defence than Ysengral was prone to waging, or even the other general I was most familiar with: Radosa. The Hushing Dread actually preferred letting the greater strength of the dead past the Gloom before striking at the weakened defences of the breaches, picking off the enemies at its leisure within the forest. Its battles lasted twice as long as everyone else's, but then it also counted about a third of the casualties most the time.

"He's fought Vesena before," I grimaced. "And no one else uses the blackflame skirmishers. If you use the same tricks against the Hidden Horror too many times..."

In the distance another set of blinding lights shone. And again. And again. You're going to run out of skirmishers before he runs out of cabals capable of making those, Vesena, I grimaced. And I would give the Spear-Biter its due, the first three breaches the Dead King had forced through were swept back. The skirmishers were just a little too slow, a flow of reinforcing armoured Binds pulling them down and slaughtering them to the last, but, a second wave of longsword bearing warriors carved their way to the mages before the second wave could put up wards, helped through by the focused arrow-fire of their brethren. They slipped into shadow and danced around the bone-giants, artists at their work, but what was three beachheads when another ten had just dropped in the span it took to clear them? The right flank had gone quiet, but the wailing of the zanikzen was the herald of strife spreading to the left and the centre. The Vesena redeployed with impressive swiftness, as a well-oiled machine, but this time when the skirmishers hit the first wave of beachheads they found they were expected.

Through the black flames leapt out slender, almost insect-like silhouettes.

"Hexenghouls," I whispered.

Shit, Neshamah really wasn't pulling punches here. Those nasty little things weren't like most ghouls: swift and passingly intelligent in a way that allowed them serve as both harassers and a sort of replacement for the Dead King's general lack of cavalry. No, these were almost as smart as people. Hexenghoul, named by the Lycaonese, were good at two things only: killing, and disrupting magic by their mere presence. They had hardened bronze rods instead of bones, enchanted in a way that Masego told me destabilized the structure of spell formulas when they got close enough. Those vicious beasts were the reason Lycaonese mages were relatively rare while as a people they had much reason to keep magical bloodlines going. Every year, scaling through passes and mountains, those monsters made it into the lowlands and went hunting. Tonight, deployed in numbers I'd rarely before seen, they went through the skirmishers like a sickle through wheat. The few dzulu who were quick enough to call on Night found they couldn't focus it properly and were massacred within moments.

Night was not sorcery, but evidently the Dead King had been adjusting what he ordered carved onto those bronze rods.

The second wave of longswords drove them back, even if they destroyed but a handful, but by the time the hexenghoul retreated behind them stood a heavy shield wall of skeletons. Too heavy to punch through in time: valiantly the warriors threw themselves against it, but Neshamah's second wave of mages came through. Wards came up and then, with a position finally secure, the dead began unleashing their real offensives. Beorns tumbled through, carelessly stamping through the skeletons, and spat out the corpses they held within them in the middle of drow ranks. Dzulu could do nothing against the likes of those, much less the even more heavily armoured 'tusks'. Those were a recent addition to Keter's arsenal, rarely seen on my front: catapult-sized necromantic constructs shaped rather like boards, unlike many of the Hidden Horror's creations they held within then no lesser dead. They were instead filled with rocks, and in front of them jagged tusks of steel were meant to make them into moving battering rams designed to crack open shield walls.

Going against drow foot? They trampled straight through those lines like they weren't even there.

"Now," I murmured, "for the tug-of-war."

With a slew of fresh casualties, Night and necromancy came out. Even as the officers-Mighty destroyed the war-constructs or died trying, the mage cadres of Keter competed with drow as to whether corpses would get up as undead or be emptied of Night first. The undead drow could not use Night, but they would explode with what they'd held when their corpses were shattered. It wreaked havoc on the attempt to keep a battle line going to have your own dead blow up on you when you drove them back. Not that there was much of a battle line: at best it could be said that there was a line where the Vesena and the dead met. And where half a hundred Firstborn must have died with every passing beat. Behind it was an ugly chaos of Mighty and war-constructs tangling in duels that paid no heed to the warriors around them. For all that Vesena Spear-Biter had mimicked the ways of the old armies of the Empire Ever Dark, it was only that: a mimicry. The Mighty were not true officers, they were chieftains who ceased paying mind to their own companies the moment there was a great foe for them to fight.

"Using the Mighty as construct-killers instead of officers works better," I noted, brow creasing at the sight. "If the Spear-Biter sent packs of pravnat and jawor after the beorns and the tusks they could be put down much quicker. Instead they keep running into isolated ispe and pravnat and overwhelming them."

Vesena's strategy being a success had depended on breaking through the initial defence of the breaches and shutting them down before casualties could mount, but that'd failed. Now the attempt by its sigil to push through the dead was turning into the sort of meat grinder that could utterly destroy an army if a general got stubborn. With the centre and the left wing taking such a beating, the Vesena were forced to thin their right flank to reinforce the lines that'd been devastated by constructs. And even then, the remaining skirmishers were now pointless going around through the woods in a far-flung circle that might allow them to eventually flank the left wing of the dead but practically speaking would just take them out of the battle for the rest of its span. Mistake, that. They'd have been more useful kept anchoring the thinning right flank in my opinion.

"The Vesena are inflicting great losses on the dead," Andronike replied.

"Sure," I dismissed. "Those officer-Mighty are pure slaughter against Keter's Bones and Binds. No denying that."

It was hard to, when all it took was for even an ispe, the lowest of the Mighty, to reach the shield wall of the dead to contemptuously crack it open.

"And I don't mean to dismiss what's being achieved here," I continued. "At this point Mighty Vesena had lost what, three or four thousand?"

"Closer to four," Komena told me.

"And it's cost the Dead King more than three score of his finest war-constructs, on top of at least thrice that in foot," I said. "The problem here is that while Vesena's sigil is killing the enemy, it's not doing it in a way that wins the battle."

I pointed at the worst of the slaughter, where the lines were going back and forth.

"They've been gaining and losing the same thirty feet since the battle started in earnest," I pointed out. "Maybe this battle can be won, at this exchange rate of lives for undead, but it'd be pissing away the war to keep fighting it this way. Packs of Mighty striking together allows for decisive blows in a way spreading them out cannot."

"General Rumena said much the same," Andronike said. "Though it did mention that Vesena's methods would function significantly better when on the offensive instead."

I narrowed my eyes. Yeah, I could maybe see that. As an offensive army they'd be smashing through whatever forces the Dead King could put in their way, which tended to be light on war-constructs, and if they ran into a few of those then the same rylleh that'd yet to move so much as an inch would be able to handle them.

"Might be," I muttered.

The battle was going badly for the Vesena, even a fool could have seen it, but to the Spear-Biter it must seem like it could still be turned around. The zanikzen had polished off every breach they could, leaving only the four whose wards had been raised, so they began pounding at the dead instead. Every burst of burning heat swatted down entire companies, and the crews prudently aimed them far behind the fighting so there'd be no risk of hitting their own. They wouldn't be able to handle that rate of fire for long, not without risking the engines blowing up, but then they'd didn't really need to. The superbly aimed hits slackened the pressure of the dead against the drow and, sensing an opening, Mighty Vesena sent in its finest. The Ebonclad advanced, flowing forward silently as if they were gliding over the ground. Signals went up in the sky, woven in Night, and a corridor was opened for them to strike cleanly at the dead. The sight of it was... I let out a sharp breath, genuinely impressed. It was like watching a hammer strike at an egg: clad in ebony armours sealed by melted iron, the Ebonclad were untouchable to the dead. Their large war maces, on the other hands, released waves of Night whenever they struck and so pulped the dead straight through their armour.

The tusks and beorns that'd not been handled were struck at in groups of then, methodically and cleanly if with little regard to the collateral damage against the dzulu. That armour did not seem to hinder them sinking into pools of shadows, and they even seemed to have greater control over the trick than most: they sometimes slunk up the beasts and let only the upper half of their body emerge from the shadow, striking at the necromantic constructs with impunity.

"Impressed?" Komena asked.

"They're exceptional," I acknowledged. "But Vesena just got played the fool."

It'd been baited into committing its finest troops before Keter slapped its last cards on the table.

"Oh?" Andronike hummed.

This battle had already taken place, so they knew what had taken place while I was left to guess. But while Akua might have pointed out to me that the Dead King had grown to learn my tricks, the opposite was true as well.

"We haven't seen Revenants yet," I said. "When we do, I wager things will swiftly proceed downhill."

The Ebonclad smashed their way through the dead on two of the breaches and began making serious assaults on two of the warded beachheads, but I bade my time and counted up to seventeen before my cynicism was 'rewarded'.

Like great raking claws, five lights burned again where the battle had begun. On the right flank that'd been so weakened reinforcing the others.

"Vesena just lost this battle," I grimly said.

Though the zanikzen were on the edge of breaking apart, they still fired unflinching at the fresh breaches. Two per breach, as Mighty Vesena had early ordered. Or so they attempted. Three of the annihilation-engines went up in storms of ashen heat, killing the crews instantly, and one aborted its shot. Still, every breach received a direct shot just as the rune-inscribed ladders came down and one even received two. That one broke. The other four held, protected by what looked like swarms of ghouls nailed to the ends as a grisly shield. With the army already too committed down the line, it would have been a disaster to try to redeploy. So instead Mighty Vesena sent into the breaches what few regulars it had left, and with them sent its hardest hitters: it sent out rylleh. Unfortunately, the Dead King had picked his timing exquisitely. Before the rylleh were halfway there, Revenants strode out of the warded breaches and tore into the Ebonclad. Half of the rylleh had to be recalled, which made a mess of things.

"So that's where the Stitcher went," I muttered.

A castle-sized abomination made from the bodies of half a dozen horrors put together – the scales and bones of a dragon, what looked like the heads of at least three sea snakes, the heavy fur and leather of rattling Ancient Ones – was butchering its way through the Ebonclad, even swatted down a rylleh that got too close. The Revenant was inside, and damnably hard to put down. We hadn't seen her in a year, so I'd hoped the Blade of Mercy had damaged her beyond use in their last tangle, but it seemed not. Hanno was convinced she'd been a healer before the Hidden Horror got his hands on her, which somehow made it all even more horrifying. Even as I watched, Mighty Vesena tried to stabilize the situation by firing its remaining annihilation-engines directly into the Revenants, but that caught only one and killed a few hundred of the Ebonclad in the exchange. Bad trade, the Seventh General was losing its cool.

Even worse the rylleh who reached the fresh beachheads were not, to their surprise and mine, greeted by swarms of ghouls or skeletons. Awaiting them were dead mages and large pots of metal, heated and filled with two things: necromantic sorcery and steel scraps. Like sharpeners they blew, the cursed metals ignoring most defenses that could be put up by Night, and I winced when I saw not one but three rylleh go down. They got up shortly, of course: rylleh were harder to kill than that, and even if one had actually died that probably wouldn't have kept drow of that tier out of the battle for long. But the corpse-mages were bearing strange metal staffs, and though I could see no visible mark of sorcery being employed the three rylleh that'd been struck down... stayed down.

"Weeping Heavens," I murmured. "Has he found a way to shut down the Night?"

"Not quite," Andronike said, voice grown cold. "Those staffs were made of an alloy of tin and antimony, and strangely enchanted – they did not disrupt Night, or end it, which we could have fought. They directed it away from our warriors, down into the earth."

And moments later, petty ghouls they would otherwise have been able to slaughter by the hundreds began tearing into the downed rylleh. They devoured their flesh so that they would never recover from that death. Gods, I fucking hated fighting the Dead King. There was always another nasty trick just waiting to be unveiled. Binds began pouring of the breaches, forming up under arrow fire by the increasingly outnumbered and outflanked Vesena. This was going to turn from a defeat into a disaster, if something wasn't done soon, and I wasn't the only one to see it.

The Seventh General, Vesena Spear-Biter, took the field personally.

I did not even seen them move until they were standing before the Stitcher, long axe resting against the shoulder.

"Sa vrede?" Mighty Vesena asked of the Revenant.

Are you worthy? I shivered to hear my words spoken by one of the ancient monsters of the Firstborn, taken as writ of faith. Whether in fear or thrill – or perhaps both – I could not be certain. Vesena received no answer, and as the stitched up necks and heads of sea snakes struck out at it the Seventh General vanished into shadows and emerged atop the monster. The axe came down, head biting into the dragon scales, and inside the beast a sea of Night cut through. Split in two, the Stitcher's monster poured out blood, guts and strange liquids of many colours. Inside a dead young woman screamed and the corpses of the drow began gathering to her, forming another shell, but Mighty Vesena landed before the Revenant and stood knee-deep in guts and blood. Its shoulder twitched, once, twice and then it proved why it had earned the sobriquet of Spear-Biter. I'd thought it a reference to mere spears, once, but that was not the case. Vesena had once warred against an ancient sigil-holder that'd unearthed and partially repaired one of the ancient wonders of the Empire Ever Dark, a great tower of arcane-forged steel that gathered lightning into itself and spewed it in a constant storm around itself. The steel walls had been thirty feet deep, surrounded by constant death, and the way the tower jutted out from a deep pit in the Inner Ring had led Firstborn to call it the Spear.

Night pouring out of it as it twitched, Mighty Vesena screamed in pain and its mouth unhinged, revealing a bestial maw as large as the sigil-holder itself had been. Bat-like wings tore out of its back, and even as the Stitcher tried to form a grisly homunculus of drow corpses roiling with Night the horrid creature Vesena had turned itself onto unhinged its great jaw even further and revealed glinting fangs – before biting straight through the corpses and Revenant, as it once had through thirty feet of solid steel, and swallowed the Stitcher and a bloody swath of her work whole.

Officers began calling for a retreat, heeding some unseen order, and the Vesena obeyed in largely good order. Their sigil-holder continued to sow destruction left and right, covering the retreat along with the remaining rylleh, and I slowly breathed out.

"After?" I asked.

"They pulled back and Kurosiv drowned the invaders in violence, sweeping them back to the breaches, then broke the wards personally," Andronike said, her voice betraying little of her opinion of that Mighty.

Mighty Kurosiv the All-Knowing, the Second General. It rarely bothered with deeper tactics than throwing warriors at the enemy but given the absurd amount of those within its sigil that tended to work regardless. I found the way it benefited from the deaths of its own and so encouraged them to be rather disgusting, and I suspected the Sisters felt rather the same for different reasons: Kurosiv had found a way to grow fat as a parasite nestled in the heart of the Night, exploiting the system they had built as no one else had before or since. Rumena had allegedly taken it as enough of a threat it'd exterminated its first five sigils, earning the epithet of Tomb-maker in the process, but it was telling that in the end it was not Kurosiv that'd settled in the Outer Rings.

"Three other battles were fought that very same night, Queen of Lost and Found," Komena said.

The images flickered quickly through my mind, almost a memory shared but not quite.

Ysengral the Cradle of Steel, the Eighth General: a lipless grin and tittering laughter hiding a mind like a steel trap. And traps did it wield, mazes and madness and traps behind which stood soldiers in steel and machine of war that worked on and fed of and spat out Night. Endless bands of dead slipping through the Gloom, testing the defences day and night.

Ishabog the Adversary, the Fourth General: ever-moving, ever-restless, a spear and song on the lip and a glint in its eye. Only Mighty may have the right to call themselves of the Ishabog, and mighty was their calling: always one against ten, ten against a hundred, a hundred against a thousand. Vicious creatures made of dead flesh hunting through darkened woods in packs, hunted in turn.

Radhoste the Dreamer, the Sixth General: a bed of stone like a sepulcher, carried by rigid in dread. Eyes closed but seeing, a mind that spans miles and sifts through the sleeping and the dead. A hundred battles fought with the Enemy like a fencer on the field, back and forth ever going for the throat as a thousand die with every hour.

All happening, all being fought.

"Remind Cordelia Hasenbach that she will be fighting those battles as well, if she does not leash her lackeys," Komena hissed in my ear.

And in the heartbeat that followed, they were gone. Dawn shyly peeked through the flaps of my tent, and I eyed my shaking hands before sighing.

So much for getting a good night's sleep before leaving.

The Tiste Andii...I mean, the Drow are awesome!

Even ignoring plot, that was sheer brilliant writing... The words conveying perfectly the ebb and flow of the battle and hammering in just how much horror we haven't seen and how it still is being met.

superkeaton

Lovely look at the Empire Ever-dark at war, and just as horrifying as I'd expected.

Javvies

Shitballs. The Dead King is adapting to the drow way too much. That bodes poorly for the long term outlook on the drow front. Especially since I don't think the undead are useful as sources of Night.

And yeah ... that's not something the Procerans want to be fighting. Either side of that battle.

Frivolous

Undead do serve as sources of Night. Link here:

<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2018/09/07/chapter-53-gloom/>

Quote here:

"Killing undead," I said. "Would it also grow the Night?"

The drow paled.

"Speak not of the Hidden Horror," Ivah whispered. "For its crown is dawn, and that pale light is the end of all things. Only the mad would enter the eye of the Host of Death."

"It does, doesn't it," I said. "The necromancy that keeps its army walking, you can claim it for the Night."

"I say no more," Ivah insisted. "It sees all. It hears all."

Analysis: Therefore the reason why the drow don't drain Night from the destroyed undead of the DK must be because they aren't given the opportunity to. They have to flee the battlefield or something.

Thanatoss

No, draining Dead King's necromancy for Night would give HIM a degree of influence over Night and Sve Noc don't want that at any cost.

That source above. It is literally said there.

Godsdamn. The goblins may be the most fun of the Guide's races but the drow are definitely my favorite.

I'm guessing Kurosiv the All-Knowing has the power to automatically drain NIGT from anyone in its sigil who dies.

I'm also guessing Kurosiv's sigil has the most number of children, because it must have its followers breed constantly to replenish its numbers.

Radhoste the Dreamer is interesting. The power of near-omniscience in a wide radius around its body, I guess, and mass telepathy with its followers.

In other news: I dearly hope Robber gets some Night in his system soon. I really want Mighty Robber.

samshadar

I wonder if Robber's not actually achieved a Name by now and just... Slipped through

Liliet

Probably not.

Walter

He doesn't Rob though. Like, Names stem from roles. Vivienne lost Thief when she stopped stealing. Amadeus lost Black Knight when he ducked the White Knight's challenge. If Robber wants to become his namesake he'd need to, minimum, quit his day job of being a soldier and start making his living by stealing stuff.

caoimhinh

While I agree with you that he doesn't have a Name, I must point out that Robber is, in fact, a robber. Both as a hobby and in his service to Catherine.

It has been said since the early chapters that he sneaked around and robbed people in Praes and Callow, his job as Special Tribune consisted mostly of raiding, ambushing and sabotaging operations.

And his cohort's motto is "Kill them, take their stuff", so... yeah, he is a robber, and an infamous one at that.

Liliet

We actually specifically have WoG that Robber is not enough of a robber to have that as a Name, as of Book 2 or 3 I think.

Razorfloss razor

This right here is why the dead king is fucking horrifying. Its one thing to be a necromancer but it is another thing entirely to be a necromancer that has lived so long to have seen everything and prepared for it.

danh3107

I'm not going to lie, this whole chapter while very cool and fun to read left me a bit, I dunno hollow feeling. The previous book spent chapters developing how badass and cool Rumena is, then showed us. These other 9 generals just feel like generic anime bosses that we're told are just as cool and badass, and they came out of thin air too with no forewarning. I guess this serves as that but the build up isn't really there.

Liliet

I mean, this isn't exactly the main plot. This is a glimpse of what is going on elsewhere out there. There's no buildup because it doesn't really concern Catherine and her front, except as a factor in what she can and cannot allow to happen.

Letouriste

Well, we knew what we have seen of the drows until then were merely the outer ring. a part of it actually. Make sense rumena is not the only one special among drows. I assume we will have more development for them later on. EE put this chapter right there because he could not delay it: relevant in the next arc.

Hardcore Heathen

This was an interesting chapter. There's a lot of cool imagery and moments. The battle itself was really cool, and all of the Drow Generals have interesting legends. But...

It falls flat. I don't feel like any of it properly hits home. We've introduced five (of ten!) new Generals here. It's happened cold, and I have no recollection of the existence of any of these characters ever being mentioned before. So it's very jarring when you effectively conjure, from nowhere, ten characters and tell me that they're all on the level of Rumena. Rumena, who we spent numerous scenes building up, who is a figure of legend and renown, the military leader of the Firstborn (and their representative to the Grand Alliance). And apparently he's actually not even as strong as these new characters? To the point that his badass sobriquet 'Tomb-Maker' was earned in the process of failing to kill one of them?

Even separated from that, the introduction of Vesena's legend was underwhelming. I don't have a very good picture of what the Spear looked like, or why it was important, or who it belonged to. The description of the legend isn't written in a particularly stirring manner either; it lacks the poeticism that carries most of Guide's great moments. Compare it to the introduction of the Sixth Legion's cognomen, Ironsides, in Book One.

You're also trying to establish that these Generals are ultra-badasses and the cream of the Empire Ever Dark in the same scene that you have them job to an undead army that isn't personally led/accompanied by anyone we've ever heard of, which is not a recipe for success.

Finally, it's just... very strange to introduce new important characters at this point in the story. We're on (theoretically) the last Book of Practical Guide. All the pieces are supposed to already be in place, and I'm genuinely unsure what is gained by introducing this new degree of complexity. Lord of the Rings doesn't introduce the Rohirrim in Return of the King, though maybe the Nazgul are a better example, considering Cat's allegiance to Below.

I just really feel like every expository element of this chapter was a misstep.

Liliet

They're not new characters. They're like gnomes, in that we learn they exist just to get a sense of scale for how badly things can go if the equilibrium is broken, but they aren't going to actually be a part of the plot. We're not supposed to care.

Also, I think they were only specified to be above Rumena in sheer power, not in strategic skill. They definitely don't get as much political influence.

caoimhinh

There was a sentence there that said Rumena would be around 2nd or 3rd of the Generals if it were to be among their group

(it has a special position outside their ranks, as commander of the Southern Expedition).

Though I have always wondered what Rumena was doing living in the Outer Ring if it was so strong and ancient, plus being called "Komena's favorite General".
It's a bit weird.

Liliet

It was specifically in terms of raw Night power iirc.

And yeah, I do want to know more about, like, ALLLLL of that

hhesselmann

Maybe it'd be a good idea to insert a paragraph where Cat lays out her considerations of rumena, kindrich, ivah and herself in relation to these, to us readers, newly introduced generals in terms of power, influence and capabilities. Surely this was a topic Cat has thought about in depth. Maybe talked about with others, their perspective and derisive/respectful/sarcastic/calculating might help readers to regain a feeling of coherence. (is that the right word?)

Personally I, while feeling a slight disconnect from this (to me) issue, loved this chapter and will now reread it gladly to further digest the new information. (I'm slow like that^^)

Thank you author for another wonderful chapter.

Shveiran

We need an idea of what is happening on the other fronts of the war, or we'll end up at Keter's doors and wonder "wait, what were all these other people doing back then?"

The Empire Ever Dark has a lot of monsters, empowered by a lower-g goddesses, and several old strategists to lead its assault. It is fighting Keter on their own front and it is failing to win. Keter has ways to deal with Night, and is learning all their best tricks.

This information is what we need.

The flashy battle is a bonus, the legend is gravy for those like me that like that kind of stuff: the point is for the readers to get a glimpse of the war farther north, not to grow attached to the single generals.

We just need to know they are around, otherwise how is it possible that the Dead King can handle all these Named but doesn't prevail against the drows?

Mith

To me it's not as bad, because you had the encounter with the Longstrider Cabal, and a show of how Rumera had little concerns with walking among them even if those others displayed power that it did not. That was Cat disturbing the surface of what is now brought forth.

Thoughts:

Do the Sisters get all secrets of the Drow such that they know how the All Knowing has achieved it's power? I am wondering if drow Night is lost or is it is ceded to the Sisters if not claimed by another.

TeK

Sisters ARE the Night, all of it. And notion of Kurosiv is a simple one. I wondered back in the Everdark arc why noone tried to exploit a breeding loophole for a potentially unlimited power, and now I know that someone did. That is why Sisters view him as a parasite, this is why Rumena tried to kill him. I suspect he has a Secret that infuses part of his Night in others, and claims it as his own should they die. That means that his hordes are not just a convenient breeding fodder which provide an infinite amount of Night as long as food is had, they double as a savepoints for him. That is, unless every single drow he invested in had been killed, he will live on, his Night always coming back to him.

KageLupus

I'm with Liliet on this one. The new Generals don't feel like fully fleshed out characters because they aren't. What they are really doing is driving home a couple of important points, without having a direct impact on the main story with Cat.

1. Cat didn't really get that much of a view of the Drow in the last book. What we saw was the very dregs of their society and none of the VIPs other than Rumena. Since then there was a timeskip where Cat learned things that we didn't, and this chapter shows some of that.

2. The Drow are kind of bad at fighting. They have some very heavy hitters in their ranks, but this chapter really drives home why they didn't fight the Dead King earlier. Their tactics aren't much better than throwing bodies at the problem and fighting that kind of attrition war against Keter is a losing prospect. Even their "generals" are kind of crap at using tactics, as Cat points out during her commentary.

3. Fighting the Dead King sucks. This was established in previous interludes, but now that the war is in full swing this chapter helps to reinforce just how bad it is. Go back and read about the Stitcher revenant again. "A castle-sized abomination made from the bodies of half a dozen horrors..." The fact that DK has something like that in his back pocket is absolutely horrifying. The fact that the Drow were able to take care of it instead of it rolling over an army in Procer crystalizes just how badly the Alliance needs to keep the Drow happy and in the war.

4. This is a stretch, but I feel like this chapter shows Sve Noc having a subtle influence on Cat's mind. Cat gets much more flowery in general when thinking about the Drow but this chapter she sounded like nearly poetic when talking about the different Generals. Considering that Sve Noc was inside of her mind showing her a high-def recording of the first fight and then flashes of the rest of them, I think it is at least possible that some of their mannerisms bled through that link. How important that is, or if I am reading too much into things, isn't clear yet.

caoimhinh

Hadn't you noticed that since the beginning of Book 5, Catherine now swears in Sve Noc's name?

She has been saying stuff like "Sisters grant it", "Sisters damn it", "For Sve Noc's sake", and other such phrases more and more often, both out loud and in her internal monologue. They are definitely affecting her mind.

Liliet

I'd say it's just Cat being a dork and leaning into the 'priestess' thing. I don't think it's subtle mind control any more than being around other people just... naturally is.

Mental Mouse

It had previously been noted that her swearing by the Gods Above seems inappropriate, and swearing by the Gods Below makes her Villain friends... nervous. So she was basically looking for something to swear by...

Walter

Practiguide has always kind of marched to the beat of its own drum in that regard. Like, I get the substance of your grievance, but I feel like if you are still here at this point you kind of must enjoy this sort of thing? We are, as you say, in the last book.

Hardcore Heathen

I stuck around for Game of Thrones all the way to Season 8, and Season 8 was still a dumpster fire. Past quality does not guarantee current or future quality.

Shveiran

Past quality does not guarantee future quality, I agree with this.

With that said, I see no indication that EE has lost his stride. Like, at all.

To me, this whole flash-forward set up is brilliant. It neatly solves the issue on how to set the stage of the terrible draining war to the north without having to read about frustrating battle after battle.

It sets the stage magnificently for the finale.

This glimpse of the drow campaign is just that. It's not meant to create attachment to the Generals, it is not meant to make you tense at the stakes of this battle.

It's a way for you to see that there is more than one front in this war, to see how the DK adapts to the drow, that Cat is coordinating with the Sisters, how Sve Noc see the war, and all the rest of the little details you need to make sense of what is to come.

Is a set up, nothing more.

That's why it's flashy, and short.

To me, it is a nice example of the "Subtle art of the infodump" done right.

Some disagree, and that's perfectly fine; but even if someone feels like that, it is just one chapter. It's not a narrative arch or something like that.

I guarantee you this is not the end of the slippery slope, it's just a way to set up the rest of the book.

Point Point

[Very minor spoilers regarding the subject matter of the next chapter (no details or plot-relevant information).]

Once we have a few more chapters, I think this chapter will fit much better.

The first eleven chapters established how much time has passed, what Catherine and her associates have been up to, and introduced some new conflicts for the story to follow.

Now, with this chapter, we're establishing where the draw stand in the war and reinforcing how the Dead King fights. This could have been done as an interlude, but Practical Guide doesn't actually use all that many interludes outside of special sequences, and the next chapter's interlude is much more useful for setting up another side of the war effort than this chapter would have been as an interlude.

Besides the generally low number of interludes, I can think of a few other reasons this might be better as a regular chapter rather than an interlude. First, it keeps Catherine in focus, showing that she has this information and is well-apprised of the war in the north. Second, it means the author doesn't need to develop Vesena's personality beyond the bare minimum (or write the perspective of a high-ranking Mighty), freeing time to work on other things.

The biggest issue, I think, is that this chapter feels a bit like a weird half-interlude, with Catherine observing someone else's actions. She is primarily an observer, which leaves the chapter feeling somewhat unusual.

If I was editing the story for print publication, I might suggest making this chapter an interlude from the perspective of Vesena or a member of its Sigil, and moving much of Catherine's exposition about the other generals to the end of the previous chapter. The biggest downside to this is that we lose some of Catherine's observations during the battle, which provide a much more useful point of reference for us than a Drow's descriptions of the battle might have. Maybe having Akua as the point-of-view character would work, but it might be tricky to do without exposing whether she is or isn't plotting against Catherine (even if she's plotting to, for instance, break free of Catherine and serve Sve Noc).

caoimhinh

Kind of feels like an Interlude or one of those "Lycaonese Extra Chapters" of the previous books, right?

hakureireimu

I wonder why the sisters haven't done something about it.

Liliet

Because they'd have to make an explicit rule banning that specifically, and until they come up with something that does not restrict that which they DO want and also combines seamlessly with their other rules... They're pretty Lawful in their approach to managing their people, judging by how they've handled Catherine coming up with new scripture last book – applying it immediately right back to her and all.

hakureireimu

Murder Goddess needs to follow rules?

Liliet

They decided they're going to, and that's that. Up to them, you know?

Shveiran

Because the point of pre-winter Night was to combine powers in any way possible, brute forcing the research of a way to escape the twilight sages' mistakes and the need for continued slaughter as a sacrifice to Below.

Versatility was prized above morality, because morality would not save their people and versatility, through the discovery of an unforeseen application of Night, could.

Which is why, at the time, the Sisters didn't do anything; not for a self imposed limitation, but because they had other priorities.

Now the Sisters have achieved apotheosis and have been reminded of what they are about; they can afford to care once more. Yet I believe they value what this General can achieve for the empire above a few more drow death in this desperate war against Keter.

Walter

Hierophant, a Named of no particular power, was able to threaten to credibly threaten to mangle the sisters. He didn't have a story behind him, was literally cut off from his magic, and he was like "what if I used an aspect to annihilate you?".

The Crows are, appropriately enough for Cat's gods, mostly big talk and shadows on the wall. Named are above them. The only people that they can bully with impunity are the Drow/Cat, who partake fully of their power and can be stripped of it.

Consequently they have to be incredibly careful about killing these assets, particularly as the war with DK is rapidly grinding them down. They won't get rid of Kurosiv, they need him to keep them safe from the Saints of the world.

Draylen

Heiropant also has advantages in this regard most Named don't, though – Zeze's whole Name is about the Promethean, stealing the Divine and giving to Man. Yes, without his sorcery he is less dangerous, but to a God he can reach out and physically rip, he might be one of few things able to end their existence.

Heirarch was in a similar place, but is currently stuck in Heaven arguing the Seraphim to death, Judging the Judges. So he's kind of occupied.

Grey could probably fuck Sve Noc's shit right the fuck up, but that's because he is a ludicrously powerful priest with access to a thousand kinds of Holy that are their equal and opposite, with more power backing it than they have at their disposal.

And Saint could probably cleave them, but the only reason she couldn't cleave through reality was because she didn't want to? And I'm not sure she didn't cut things like Dimension, I'd have to reread the scenes she was in. She did cut a Domain, at least once.

I think that's about all the Named that we've seen with actual ability to truly harm Sve Noc as they are now? And even that last one is a possibility, not a certainty, and somewhat remote despite her power.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

IIRC Saint had a mobility trick where she'd slash empty air and use it as leverage as if it were solid. Sounds like cutting reality to me.

caoimhinh

Named are above pretty much anyone but the capital-G Gods. Choirs of Angels and Demons can be killed, imprisoned, and who knows what else by Named (and also by mages). Lower-G gods have been killed by Named plenty of times: Warlock kept a few of their corpses in his laboratory, Sabah killed one in her process to become Captain, the Sword of the Free killed one of the god birds of Stygia before founding Bellerophon, etc.

During the confrontation between Sve Noc and Hierophant, he explicitly told them that he had known Winter long before it became a part of them, and threatened to rip it out of "the stitches in their bellies" which hints to the fact they hadn't yet assimilated Winter completely into the Night (something that Catherine had already pointed out at that point), plus Masego's entire Role and Story as a Named is understanding and confronting gods, he had also just returned from being possessed by the Dead King and learning truths about how the gods are made, which taught him in turn how they can be unmade.

And if you think Masego is a Named of "no particular power" you need to check again, Witch of the Woods would disagree with that assessment. Masego's current lack of sorcery weakened him, but that doesn't mean he is weak. Who knows, maybe he even recovered his Gift during the timeskip.

Liliet

I'd say it's less that Named are above everything, and more that they can credibly kill anything. They're the top of the food chain, not the champion in strength. A lion is stronger than a human.

But... yeah. They're the top of the food chain. Masego being able to credibly threaten the crow goddesses doesn't tell us anything other than that his personal Role is still going strong.

Liliet

Masego's entire Role is the story behind him killing any lowercase g god he likes. It's what he DOES, what his Name is ABOUT.

And he's really, really high tier in power. He has more or less confirmed to Cat that he could achieve apotheosis any time he liked, and hasn't yet p much just because he prefers sticking with his family for the moment.

Mental Mouse

Cat could drain its Night, but that would deprive the Host of Night of one of their most powerful generals.

Liliet

Well, this was a nice and horrifying little chapter.

– a reminder that the drow ARE Evil and act like it, as a society;

– new characters around Rumena's level! Wish we got a clearer explanation of relative hierarchy and history there. At the very least Rumena seems to be the closest to the crows personally?

– a cool battle scene with Catherine's analysis! Love to remember she's a competent general, if not quite as into it as Rumena and its like are;

...and that's about it, actually. Not much this time!

A good glimpse of what's going on elsewhere though =x

Liliet

P.S. Dear Sisters,
what the fuck.

Do you two realize how much you're contributing to Catherine's exhaustion?

Shveiran

I'm going to need you to explain that to me.

is it that they don't let her sleep?

Because of all the possible duties, communing with the Sisters to coordinate the two battlefronts is one the First Under the Night really really really cannot delegate.

Liliet

She wasn't doing a lot of coordination there, was she?

They didn't let her sleep, and I wonder, uh, how often they do that. And how many of those are really necessary.

Shveiran

She doesn't coordinate the battles on the north front; she coordinates the ones on her own front, and to do that effectively she needs as much information as she can get her hands on about all that is going on pertaining the war.

This shows her DK's tactics against the drow, how much he is learning, how he is reacting to what the drow can bring to the table. It allows her to learn about him at a faster pace than just learning from the defeats he inflicts her and hers, and that is invaluable to someone like Cat that is de facto the loudest voice at the table that determines the Grand Alliance's deployment.

Draining? Yeah.

But unless someone trustworthy give themselves to the Night and can commune with goddesses far, far away from the battlefield, that is something only Cat can do.

Unlike being Abigail's training wheel, this is something she can't hand to someone else; nor something she can give up on.

Every battle allows her to study her enemy, and understanding Neshamah is how she'll win this.

Liliet

Note that Rumena can, and is, also doing this.

Shveiran

True, yet my point stands.

Rumena sits at the table, but the surface-dwellers don't listen to it very much. The strongest voice is Cat's, ergo everyone is served better by her seeing as much of the war as possible, because she is, if not the one making the decision, certainly the single most influencing person at that table.

She needs the data.

Of all the duties she had, this is a vital one that no one else can do (Rumena's existence forces me to rephrase in "no one else can do in a way that matters", because even if the drow General got her a report it is not the same as seeing for herself and looking for blind spots or hints in the DK strategy).

Going out to rescue young Named? That is something Heroes and Villains can do without her.
This is on Cat's desk, plain and simple.

Liliet

Yeah but I feel like this could still be organized better like make an agreement with the Sisters beforehand 'ok this night we're gonna commune at length so I'm clearing my schedule for the morning and afternoon so I can sleep AFTER'

Admittedly I'm making it sound like it's on Cat and not on them, but LISTEN so MANY things are already on Cat and they are fucking GODDESSES they can handle making sure their priestess SLEEPS SOMETIMES

Petter

The charter itself was as usual well done and fun to read. Really cool seeing how the army of the dead is still a very deadly threat and even the drow and the night needs to be careful. Which matches nicely to the reaction Cat got when she mentioned having walked the street of Keeter way back when she was still in winter mode.

I do however find myself agreeing with what others have mentioned, it makes Rumena feel less important. Not because the Empire Everdark has more remnants of the old way or generals.

But that his moniker is based on actions he failed at. Sure he destroyed the sigls but failed and that's what gave him his moniker? The name really felt bigger, that he before the sisters took over had destroyed countless enemies, crushed armies etc on a much larger and more important scale.

I get a similar feeling to the mythos around Nick Furry and his ruined eye. It seemed like a huge thing and character moment but instead it was cheapened in a later movie. Clearly this chapter isn't on that level it just gives me similar vibes.

Liliet

IDK, if you think about it it's the kind of legendary action that makes myths and gods. Like how Hephaestus has a bad leg bc his parents threw him down from Olympus upon being born? Rumena got his moniker while fighting another one of THESE.

Liliet

*its

Mental Mouse

Quibble: Hera threw Hephaestus down because he was born with a clubfoot. He was supposed to be her proof that she could make a kid without any damn man involved (trying to trump Zeus's gestation of Dionysus), and when he came out imperfect, she was pissed...

Liliet

Ooh, thanks for the clarification!

I believe this supports my point.

JRogue

We talk about it a lot, but this right here is why The Dawn Knight exists.

These elder horrors need an opposite. Instead of 10 Hero's to oppose the 10 Generals of the Empire Ever Dark, we get 1 Hero that is ridiculously strong. Put him in a Band of Five and, well, it's a wrap.

WuseMajor

The Dead King is one of the few beings in this universe that could factually say "I am no mere GOD!" and then proceed to survive saying that. However, he's also way too canny to actually raise that kind of death flag.

Xinci

Well, this shows some more issues with Sve's visionary facsimile(though to be fair she was rather pressured when she made it). Other beings being able to steal from your power being a big risk in sticking to a "cannibalistic" style of power accumulation and then coming into an environment with multiple competing factions, all competing for resources. I seriously hope Cat will work with them or at least delegate some other people to work with them to help iterate some better large scale adaptations. Sve's back in the pit and her self-mutilation will only help so much versus someone like the Dead King, who has also been honing his ability to escape mortality for eons. I do wonder what kind of composition Kurosov's accumulation of Night has that makes him not worth killing. Though given how the Night seems to be a microcosm of Below's practices it could be they generally couldn't interfere and what agents they could use (Rumena, the Longstrides) weren't good enough to beat his methods.

It is also interesting to see how the Night can bind souls or at least keep a semblance of them within specific formats. That it could indeed keep such information was already confirmed by the secret of many lives but good to see more on how it interacts with souls.

I do still wonder what kinds of glass the Drow could make or really rare metalloids given they may use the Night to forge. Could they store material in the Night to put it into a stasis like a state or change its temperature? Many possibilities there to be honest. It feels like they could be making far better materials than just iron for iron and such.

The DK using a Revenant to presumably bind herself through healing methods to a large number of bodies was pretty interesting. If such abilities may remain in a Revenant could the night be used to transpose such abilities into a another form through the use of modulated Night? Mainly I wonder how him destabilizing and usurping the information or properties of the Night could be applied to Revenants like that.

Liliet

I think the Revenant was inside the construct, piloting it like a mecha, not part of it.

Storm

this chapter was wayyyy to descriptive at the beginning. took a 6 month break because of just how much description there was.

Interlude: Truce

"Raise the price by a coin of gold and you make enemies; raise the price by a copper and you make losses. Profit lies in silver: moderation without timidity."

– Extract from 'Discourse on Nature and Man', by Merchant Princess Adorabella

Cordelia sometimes thought of that painting, when the days grew long. At first, when she grew from girlhood into womanhood, she had remembered it for the stories her uncle had had told her about it. Of how her father, a man she'd never known, had despised it ever since he was a boy and had it taken down the same day he became Prince of Rhenia. He'd been known to claim he would sell it to some art-hungry Alamans princeling in the south and use the gold to buy a few more dwarven engines, though he'd never gotten around to it before his untimely death. Cordelia's mother had eventually ordered it put back up, being rather fond of it, though she'd called the motif 'Konrad Getting Beat By A Bald Bear' instead. Sometimes Cordelia thought she'd only ever truly known her parents through the stories of others, for even though she'd been fourteen when her mother passed away Cordelia had only been graced to know a meagre few facets of Margaret Papenheim.

Now that years had passed, though, she thought more of the motif. Not of Old King Konrad, whose stories told had let all eight of his children die rather than surrender Twilight's Pass, but of what lay at a heart of it: a prince, wrestling with duty. Was that not, in a way, what lay at the heart of rule? To bear a crown was to swear yourself to making order out of chaos, law out of anarchy, prosperity out of ruin. Cordelia had been orderly even as a little girl, for Mother had never been prone to coddling: it had been up to her to decide how her hours would be spent when she was not seeing to her duties. She'd taken on seneschal duties for the fortress-city by the age of twelve and extended her authority to Rhenia's dependencies by the age of thirteen, and as her writ ran further her hours became ever more precious and in need of careful parcelling. Those habits had followed her into adulthood, into the Salia and her rule as First Prince of Procer, and she was grateful for it.

There was simply so much to do and too little time for all of it. Cordelia would try anyway and parcel out ever ounce of her so that, at least, all that she could do was done. The First Prince of Procer delicately nibbled at the caramelized poultry she'd been served, then took a sip of no more than two beats from her cup of water – obeying court etiquette to the letter. The two men seated across from her, who had patiently been waiting for her to finish her bite and rinse it down, only then began speaking again.

"Merchant Prince Fabianus has signalled he will not involve himself in matters of Proceran debt," Louis of Sartrons told her.

"We've established this is a firm commitment, and not a bargaining position."

The old spy's face had always struck her as being rather skeletal, skin pulled taut against the bones of an aristocratic face and only topped by ever-receding tufts of hair. He was not a physically striking man, looking more like a well-born coin counter than what he truly was: the foremost patron of the Circle of Thorns, the secretive society whose agents were the eyes and ears of the Principate abroad. Louis of Sartons was not a close ally of hers, for the Circle preferred to maintain a degree of distance so that it would not be swept into internal struggles and so suffer in a way that blinded Procer to its enemies, but he had come out boldly to support her when a coup had been attempted against Cordelia. For this he'd earned a degree of trust, and a freer hand than she'd allowed him before. The news he was bringing, however, were not pleasant ones.

"That is a blade that bites both ways," Cordelia mused.

Most of the Merchant Princes and Princesses that ruled Mercantis were not Named, and rarely more than influential firsts among equals, yet their value as intermediaries with the banks and merchant houses of the city they ruled was priceless – if always priced. That Fabianus was had formally stepped back from intervening in the matter massive loans that Mercantis had extended both Procer and the Grand Alliance meant he would not demand that the sums, lenders and borrowers be made public within the Consortium as a growing number of merchants now demanded. It also meant, however, that he would no longer facilitate those arrangements as he had until now.

"The Circle believes he remains in favour of the arrangements but has grown to fear assassination by his opposition if he does not bend," Louis informed her. "Recusing himself allows him to give them an inch without slighting us outright."

Wiggling out was the mark of an eel, not a prince, Cordelia uncharitably thought, but what else was to be expected from Mercantis? Not that the merchants were entirely without reason to be worried of the loans extended, for the First Prince had woven there a maze to obscure exactly how badly the finances of the Principate were faring. By obtaining the permission of the Highest Assembly to seek loans in the name of its individuals princes and princesses – all marked down, and to be repaid by the Principate to the individuals in years to come – she'd been able to seek smaller loans from multiple royals in a shared 'bundle' from different banks and merchants, effectively spreading out debts in a way that made it nearly impossible to assess from the side of the lenders. The key to this had been requiring secrecy from the lenders in exchange of higher interest, something she'd had the Circle of Thorns strictly enforce.

The first two merchants who'd tried to break their written oaths had been promptly assassinated, using some of the most painful poisons the Circle knew of. None had tried after, not individually anyway: through the great merchant guild known as the Consortium, which Mercantis counted as both a court of law and ruling body second only to their Merchant Prince, pressured was being applied for the hidden information being made available not to individuals but to the Consortium 'itself'. It was a legal fiction, given that nearly all those who'd signed to secrecy were also members of the Consortium, but one that might hold up under the few treaties Mercantis kept with Procer. That even Merchant Prince Fabianus was beginning to give way was bad omen for the Grand Alliance's fortunes in the city. Possibly quite literally.

"This is no longer a purely Proceran matter," the First Prince eventually said.

The older man bowed his head in acknowledgement, and with a look Cordelia made for one of her attendants to approach. The young woman curtsied, then silently awaited instructions.

"Please request of Ingrid that she inquire whether Lady Dartwick would be amenable to having tea," she began, and for a heartbeat considered when she could first spare the time, "tomorrow, an hour past Noon Bell."

"Immediately, Your Most Serene Highness," her attendant replied.

Ghislaine, Cordelia suddenly remembered, repeating the name in her mind to better commit it to memory.

"Thank you, Ghislaine," she smiled, and the woman curtsied again.

Vivienne Dartwick would not have the authority or influence to settle such a matter herself, but needed to be brought into the issue as the first step into bringing in Catherine Foundling. The Black Queen, Cordelia thought a touch guiltily, really was such a useful large club to threaten people with. Where law and diplomacy failed to make a mark, Queen Catherine's scowls and fearsome reputation had a way of bringing out sweet reason from the most unreasonable of souls. Callow would, besides, need to be told of the developments regardless: its treasury was guarantor to some of the loans extended to the Grand Alliance and it was the second-largest contributor to the war chest besides. Not that Lady Dartwick had not ensured the kingdom would not benefit from the process. If anything, she'd proved frighteningly cunning in finding ways of seeing to that.

The notion of allowing repayment in nature for extended loans had, for one, effectively erased twenty years of damage to Callowan horse-rearing while simultaneously thinning the hordes of their traditional greatest rivals in the trade, the Arlesite princes of the south. If Queen Vivienne was to be her neighbour to the east, one day, Cordelia would not make the mistake of taking her lightly. The former Chosen might in truth have better gifts for ruling in years of peace than the woman who'd chosen her for a successor. The blonde princess had another bite of poultry, savouring the subtle aftertaste of the sauce, and then a nibble of those perfectly steamed and spiced carrots. It was washed away with a sip of water, afterwards, and even as she dabbed her lips with an embroidered cloth the First Prince cleared her mind of unnecessary thoughts.

The matters that would be brought to her attention by Brother Simon of Gorgeault, formerly the head of the Holy Society and nowadays the Lord Inquisitor of Procer, would require her full attention as well. Though the well-formed man with the hair grown silver was no longer the leader of the society of highborn lay brothers and sisters, it was because at Cordelia's incitation the Highest Assembly had charged him instead to root out corruption and wickedness within the ranks of the House of Light, granting him worldly authority over the priests until his inquisition was at an end. It was reform at the edge of a sword, all knew this, but after so many of the Holies had been caught publicly backing her deposal the House had not had room to argue.

"The House of Light has formally decided to accept your latest set of suggestions," Brother Simon said, a tad drily. "The lands will be ceded to the throne, under condition that they are to be ceded in turn to the appropriate crowns."

Cordelia was too well-mannered to smile in triumph, so instead she drank a sip of water. With that last concession, it could be said that she had subdued the Holies and the uglier aspects of the House of Light they represented. Even after the public disgrace of the House during the Salian coup attempt, it would have been a grave overreach to come down too hard on it where the people could see: it would restore public sympathy, and feed into the perception that she had a tyrant's grip on the Principate. Instead, she had struck more subtly. First she'd abolished every ritual power the House had over the office of First Prince and the Highest Assembly itself, save for the right to directly petition the latter – one of the oldest and more importantly the most well-known of the House's privileges. Then, with the fetters of tradition removed, she'd gone after the coin. The House was invited to divest itself of all its merchant interests, donating such wealth to the feeding of the refugees in the heartlands. The House was invited to accept taxation on its holdings, if only while the Principate was at war. And now, the Lord Inquisitor had confirmed that all the lands of the House whose purpose was commercial in nature – vineyards, orchards, mines – were to be ceded to the throne of Procer, which itself would then cede them back to the appropriate princes and princesses.

For a price, which Cordelia would mercifully offer to be paid through writing off any debt the treasury of the Principate might owe any such royalty. In the same stroke she'd ensured that her office would not go bankrupt after the war, curried favour with her subjects by restoring lands to them and ensured the Holies would never again have the wealth to ensure the degree of influence they'd been boasting for the last century.

"The wisdom of the House illuminates the way in these dark times," Cordelia Hasenbach replied, long practice allowing her to keep even the faintest hint of irony out of her voice.

This would devour hours and hours of her days for weeks to come, but it was worth it: with a little inventiveness, she should be able to shuffle around debts and debtors to secure another round of loans abroad.

"It shines what light it can," the Lord Inquisitor agreed, both praise and warning in the same elegant turn of phrase.

Simon of Gorgeault, she sometimes thought, would have made a better prince than most if fate had deigned to grant him that birthright.

"Furthermore," Brother Simon continued, "though numbers will only arrive tomorrow, I can already tell you that another company of priests has volunteered for service on the fronts."

This, at least, Cordelia would give the honour it was due. Every Lycaonese child was taught that there could be no greater service to one's own than to put your life between them and the Enemy.

"If you have names for me, the lists can be read to the people again," Cordelia offered.

It was both a gesture of respect and a way to raise morale, which in turn tended to lead to volunteers.

"I will extend the offer to House," the Lord Inquisitor said, tone grown warmer.

That saw to the immediate matters, she grasped, and just in time. With one last touch of her fork, she brought a bite of poultry to her mouth and swallowed, washing it down with water just before the first ringing of Noon Bell in the distance. The two spies took their leave with the proper courtesies, which she duly returned, and only then did Cordelia allow her brow to crease as she looked down at her plate. There were still two mouthfuls of poultry left, and one of sides. Her timing had been off: imprecision, chaos, had won a small victory. The First Prince left the meal unfinished, and allowed herself to be led to the antechamber down the hall – where she was deftly undressed by her handmaids and helped into a dress more practical than the powder blue court regalia she'd donned for her duties of the day until now. Grey velvet was laced at her back and paired with matching shawl bordered in golden brocade in deference to the chill that occasionally seized parts of the palace.

Her escort to what her councillors had taken to naming l'archive en vogue – the Vogue Archive – was a familiar face. Captain Lois had been a simple guardsman, when Cordelia had thrown herself down a windowsill, and proved to be a man of his oath. He'd been among those that helped her escape, and he'd killed to ensure she would not be dragged back to Balthazar Serigny's feet as a prisoner. There were some, after the coup, who'd said that the ancient palace of the Merovins should be emptied of all Salians and only trustworthy Lycaonese be kept in her service. These calls she'd resisted, and instead ensured both honours and promotions for all the Salians who had proved loyal. She was not First Prince of the Lycaonese but of Procer, and she would not let fear taint who she was: leal service must ever be met with reward.

"If you would allow me the honour, Your Most Serene Highness?" Captain Lois offered along with his arm.

Cordelia did, though lending an arm was as far as she intended to ever indulge the flirtation. She'd had discreet liaisons over the years, with men and rather more rarely women, but becoming involved with one in her service would be... uncouth in many ways. Her own people's traditions encouraged sharing a bed with one of the 'pleasant trade' rather than involvement with one's fellow soldiers but this far south it was seen as frivolous for an unmarried woman of her rank to dally with courtesans of any gender. Especially if there were lands in line to inherit, as was the case with her. The Rhenian princess had therefore been forced to be most careful in her dalliances, indulging only in the company of those who might never be a hazard to her position or reputation. The affairs had been rare, and after the first heart-wrenching time she'd had to part from a man she held deep affections for Cordelia had never again allowed them to linger.

Still, that did not mean she could not appreciate a well-formed calf or a muscled arm.

The First Prince's guards moved aside when they reached the threshold of the Vogue Archive, for access to what within was restricted by both ancient enchantments and much more recent wards. Cordelia parted with her escort with a courteous smile, pressing her palm against the heavy oaken door before her. Sorcery crackled against her skin, like a minuscule gust of wind, and the door opened without a sound as the old enchantment recognized her right to enter. The wards buzzed against her ears as she crossed the threshold, but the blonde Lycaonese paid it little mind: already her mind was on the sight awaiting her. This had been a great salon, once, where the Merovins had entertained others in the sort of amusements where none were expected to be wearing clothes by the end of the evening and the company of the beautiful was much encouraged.

The need for discretion – the people of Salia would have raised brows upon hearing of the diversions of their rulers – had seen enchantments laid on the doors leading into the room, restricting for whom they would open. That and the size of the salon had been the deciding factors in Cordelia ordering the beating heart of administration settled within, and there was no trace left to see of the original trivial purpose of the Vogue Archive. Great tables covered in sprawling maps of the different regions of the Pirnicpate as well as broader Calernia had been set down, each matched with bureaus seeing to the reports from such regions and foreign locales. The maps themselves were adorned with sculpted stones and silk ribbons representing trade arteries and supply lines, garrisons and crucial resources.

The Order of the Red Lion, whose mages swept in and out of the room regularly, kept reports and notes as fresh – en vogue – as was possible, resulting in a living and breathing map of the Principate of Procer that had allowed Cordelia and her councillors to avert enough crises over the previous two years that she could not remember when anyone had last argued to cut funding for the Archive. Trusted and thoroughly vetted scholars, traders and officials swarmed the great hall like ants in an anthill, filling scrolls of their own as they read through reports. Those scrolls headed to the very back of the hall, where on a raised dais the keen minds the First Prince had appointed as her foremost analysts had been granted desks of their own. Theirs was the task to sift through the mass of reports and identify the disasters that would plague Procer and the Grand Alliance before they came to pass, warning Cordelia so that they might be averted.

The Rhenian princess's entrance was met with a pause in the intricate dance of duties as bows and curtsies were offered, though when she returned them with a nod the sudden hush broke and activity resumed. Cordelia took the time to pass by some of the tables and speak, as she'd scheduled for, praising the Segovian bureau for the sea supply lines to Bremen they'd successfully forged and encouraging the Aisne bureau to redouble its efforts to find a way to keep that principality's granaries and treasury afloat after the ravages the Carrion Lord had inflicted there. Callowan grain would not be able to feed the heartland forever. The Levantine bureau approached her with an intercepted communication from the Holy Seljun of Levant trying to formalize diplomatic relations with the Kingdom of Callow through ambassadors as well as a list of the most likely individuals the Dominion might send should such an offer be accepted, which made for interesting reading.

She thanked the young woman who'd brought her the scroll and requested a more comprehensive report be made over the matter and sent to her. That would see to a third of the quarter-bell that Cordelia had allowed herself for reading this evening, by her own estimation, which was an acceptable way to spend the time. The First Prince's feet took her up the low steps and onto the dais, where the three appointed analysts that were currently awake and serving were awaiting her. One was a distinguished merchant of low birth, Maria Fernanda of Treville, who'd turned the ailing fruit trading family business she'd inherited into one of the foremost trade societies of the south by virtue of being able to read trends in demand in time to capitalize on them. The second was Brother Alphonse of the Montresor monastery in Creusens, who Simon of Gorgeault had personally recommended as being the finest policy hound of the Holies prior to their fall.

The third and last in attendance was more complex a presence than a merchant and a priest: the Forgetful Librarian was undeniably a brilliant woman, but she was also Damned and largely unwilling to entertain the notion of someone having authority over her. That she'd been born to a family distant kin to the House of Brogloise ruling in Cantal had only encouraged what Cordelia suspected was an instinctive resentment of anyone who might have a claim on her hours, not to mention seen her wealthy enough a villain few had suspected her of even being one before the Archer had caught her in the middle of trying to steal manuscripts from Mercantis bought at auction and headed for the Belfry. A great many dead hired swords and several bruises later, the Forgetful Librarian had accepted the Truce and the Terms and been assigned to Salia by the Black Queen at Cordelia's own request. There were good reasons for that, though on some days it was necessary for the Rhenian princess to reminder herself of this more than once.

"Your Most Serene Highness," Brother Alphonse greeted her, hastily rising to his feet and bowing.

Maria Fernande mirrored him, but a heartbeat slower on the draw, but the Librarian had yet to raise her eyes from the book she'd been reading. Only when she turned the page did she look up, and sharply nodded.

"First Prince," the mousy-looking woman said. "Right on time. Shall we get to it?"

Cordelia ignored her, smiling and gesturing for the other two to return to their seats before taking her own.

"Librarian," she said, tone mild. "You have something to report?"

"You might say that, Your Highness," the Damned said, closing the book. "Maria read through the reports on trade through with the League and the Dominion, and I matched this with the records of tariffs between principalities south of Salia. The numbers I arrived at are worrying, when the substance of the Principate's debts is taken into consideration."

"And why is that?" Cordelia asked.

"We suspect," Maria Fernanda intervened, shooting a warning look at the Damned, "that the Principate had become fragile, Your Most Serene Highness."

Brother Alphonse cleared his throat.

"It is our conclusion that, unless regular trade routes are opened anew with League and Ashur," the priest delicately said, "Should Mercantis cease propping up the treasury Procer the entire Principate might come down like a house of cards."

A talk might be required, Cordelia faintly thought as the explanation continued, with the Black Queen.

"Half past the hour would suit me better," Vivienne replied. "Though if it is a matter of great urgency, something might be arranged."

"We would not dare impose on your time in such a haphazard manner, Lady Dartwick," the tall woman facing her said. "I will relay your answer to Her Highness and see to it that your staff is kept informed of any and all developments."

Lady Vivienne Dartwick, heiress-designate to the Kingdom of Callow, watched with a bland expression as the First Prince's own chamberlain bowed and retired. She was not blind to the courtesy Hasenbach was extending by sending the very head of her household, Ingrid Backhaus, to arrange a meeting to 'drink tea'. Neither was she particularly moved by it, though. For the First Prince to be seeking out such an arrangement meant that the ruler of Procer needed to address something by informal channels of diplomacy – given that Vivienne did not yet have an idea of what was in need of addressing, she was inclined to chalk any courtesies up to the woman trying to butter her up before the talks. Cordelia Hasenbach wielded pleasantness and courtesy with an uncomfortable degree of effectiveness, Vivienne had found, so it was best to remain wary.

It was a delicate line to walk, between being Hasenbach's friend and her foe. Never to trust too deep or to give offence unprovoked, and though the dark-haired woman knew she was not half bad at these games she had not been born to them as the opposition so often was. Catherine could afford to ignore most of this, swagger in with a drink and quip and turn everybody's plans inside out, because she had the charm and the raw power for it. Vivienne had neither, so instead she tread as carefully as she had when she'd been the Thief and the evening air had smelled of ambush. She leaned back into her seat and let out a long breath, wondering if she should send for the Jacks now or later: whatever had moved Hasenbach to seek a meeting, it'd be best if she knew of it before that meeting.

"Let us resume, Henrietta," she finally said. "Word from the Observatory, you said?"

Henrietta Morley was heiress to the Barony of Harrow, Ainsley Morley's eldest daughter, and so the proper address would have been Lady Henrietta. They'd grown close enough to dispose with much of the formalities in private, however, as was only necessary if the heiress to Harrow was to remain as her secretary and advisor. That she was a thoroughly competent was only to be expected, given that Baroness Ainsley could not afford a weak successor given her rambunctious vassals, but even if she'd been a moonstruck fool Vivienne would still have found some place for her in her Salian 'court'. Ties to the baronies of the north, the last great landed nobles in Callow save for Duchess Kegan herself, were important in keeping the latter constrained.

Naming Henrietta her personal secretary had been a sign to the disposed nobles stripped of their lands by the Conquest and the Liesse Rebellion, too, that Vivienne was not as determined as Catherine to keep the highborn at a distance – after all, while Cat had used nobles and even appointed some to great offices she'd never kept any of them close. That'd been reserved for the Fifteenth, for the Woe, for those who'd borne steel in her name. But Vivienne saw these same man and women as a valuable resource: educated, often still wealthy by lowborn standards and often influential those nobles could be used instead of slowly ushered into oblivion. It'd be a waste to let them stay unused, where any rebellious hand might pick them up besides.

Besides, if the former thief was to be queen one day it wouldn't hurt to have a good relation with the future Baroness of Harrow.

"Fresh as of an hour ago," Henrietta agreed, tucking back her hair. "Lady Fadila has deemed the contents of the missive she passes on to be demanding of your immediate attention."

Vivienne's brow rose. Fadila Mbafeno was something of a liability, in her eyes – she'd once been a servant to Akua Sahelian, which as far as she was concerned was disqualification enough from holding office anywhere in Callow – but she'd remained as the informal head of the Observatory by virtue of being effectively impossible to replace and more than slightly competent. The dark-haired Callowan might not like the Soninke sorceress, but she did respect her judgement.

"Whose missive is it?" Vivienne asked.

"Our friend in the east," Henrietta delicately replied.

Ah, and there went her day. That meant Dread Empress Sepulchral, that ruthless old bat from Askum, who the heiress-designate to Callow trusted about as, well, a Dread Empress of Praes. Sepulchral was repugnant in nearly all regards, but too useful as a check on Malicia to ignore. In appearance, at least. The 'civil war' in the Wasteland had been going on too long and too oddly for Vivienne to take the surface stirrings of it as face value anymore. That the former High Lady Abreha was foe to the Tower was beyond doubt, however, and regardless of all the rest that made her useful. Sepulchral had naturally gone out of her way to cultivate her usefulness to both the Grand Alliance at large and Callow in particular with typical Wasteland canniness. That often involved passing on information that neither the Jacks nor the Circle of Thorns would have gotten anywhere near otherwise.

"You've the transcribed message?" Vivienne asked.

"Translated from the cypher and ready for your perusal," Henrietta agreed.

The scroll she presented held a seal in dark blue wax, the Observatory's own. The wax was enchanted to turn to dust the moment the seal was broken, which made it clear whether the message had been spied upon on its way to the hands it was meant for.

"Thank you," she replied, taking the scroll.

The wax frittered into fine blue dust as she broke the seal, and she blew it off the edge of her desk before turning sharp eye to what had been written.

"Dire news, my lady?" Henrietta asked.

Vivienne grimaced.

"Our friend sends us a timely warning," she replied. "Malicia is about to bite our fingers off in Mercantis."

And wasn't that going to sting, a kick in the Grand Alliance's moneybags? Something needed to be done before the fingers felt the teeth closing in, and for that Vivienne required more than what she had at hand. Fortunately, last word had Catherine on her way to the Arsenal.

Vivienne was overdue a visit, she decided.

I like this fandom's priorities greatly and agree with them 100%

dadycoool

We've been given an opening. All aboard the Cat/Cordellia!

Catelia stan #1

Choo choooooooooo!

Anomandris

I genuinely don't know what I am rooting for – Cat/Cordy or Cat/Hanno – both seem full of so much potential...

xland44

why not both

Cloud_Striker (Earth Mem Inhabitant)

Both is good.

Here's How Catdelia Can Still Win

Vagabond

I ctrl+f searched the chapter for someone whose name starts with bi. Multiple times. Lol. Should there be another reader of comments slow on the uptake: bidelia > cordelia is bisexual ^^

Clinton Orebajo

Huh? What does that mean?

tkjarrah

bi(sexual) + cordelia = bidelia look im aware its not the best of portmanteaus but i work with what ive got

Anomandris

I sometimes wonder at the extent the Grand Alliance seems to be dependent on Cat. "Want Named working together? Let's follow Cat's plan" " Problem with the finances? Need Cat to handle this one". Its like that one overworked employee in every office who is invariably dragged into everything because the business won't run without her.

agumentic

When you made yourself the biggest hammer on the continent, it only makes sense for everyone to call on you to deal with every nail-like problem. And there's plenty of those in their troubled times.

Senator Fish

I mean when your the most powerful villain sense Triumphant you tend to be interwoven into pretty much everything.

Liliet

This is literally what's happening, yep.

dadycool

Cat: "I feel overworked."

Yeah, it's almost as if everything is revolving around you or something.

Sanctus Obscurum

The Black Queen built the Grand Alliance from a crusade aimed at her. The Black Queen snatched back Callow from Praes and triggered the first united action by the western powers in decades. The Black Queen has the entire might of the Drow at her beck and call (as far as the rest of the world sees). The Black Queen bested the Fey. The Black Queen controls some of the most potent magics in the world and all the best mages outside Praes and living. Cat is the most dangerous, intimidating, financially powerful, and influential person in the Alliance. It's like she's a full five levels above the rest of her D&D party: they could maybe function without her, but it is infinitely simpler to draw her into everything.

Liliet

TBF Cordelia made the Grand Alliance for the Crusade, Cat just picked it up.

But yeah your point on the whole is ENTIRELY ACCURATE.

Shveiran

TBF, Cordelia made a Crusade to kick in Cat's teeth as an afterthought. Cat spanked them all and then said "I'd rather not break your spine over the knee of either myself or my eldritch allies, so how about you let me in your secret club and also all my friends? Your alliance could actually accomplish something this way.

Oh, by the way, completely unrelated but you just lost Ashur and your only remaining member of the Alliance was about to go home, maybe you could use this Gray Pilgrim I ressed? It's no big. Also, Neshamah is going to swallow you whole unless you somehow get a truce and a way to move armies faster from where you currently put them. Which I just gave you.

As I was saying, this is totally your Alliance, Cordy. I'm totally not in charge.

Now go clean my pipe.

Liliet

Hey, Catherine genuinely WAS uncomfortable when Cordelia did the kneeling thing.

I fucking love that that is canon.

xland44

what. when did she kneel?

Liliet

"“You must understand, now, that I do not have a single thing to threaten you with,” she quietly said. “I have no armies to send forth, no coin to cajole or coerce with and my alliances are weaker than yours. Besides, those allies I do have would not war on you for my sake, for you have them bound by debt and respect. I have through steel and insult ended any inclination between us that could now be called on, much less between our respective peoples.”

The thing was, there was a part of me that was savouring the words. The same part that remembered my every desperate plea to this same woman to call off her armies and rapacious princes. That remembered every spurned offer of peace, every sentence of scathing dismissal and barely-veiled contempt. She'd been so godsdamned arrogant, telling me she could choose the fate of Callow because she had the swords and the righteousness and that I should just go into exile like a good little thug after shutting my mouth and abdicating. And now she needed me. They all did, her entire alliance and the heroes behind them too. Even the Grey Pilgrim had good as admitted to it. They had sneered and spat and tried to kill me, and now I fucking had them. Cordelia Hasenbach had laid out before me the death of her nation and her people, and yet I could not help but think that they'd brought this all on themselves. That if they'd left Callow alone, that if they'd let me fix it instead of hounding me every step for their own hungry purposes, they wouldn't be tumbling down the cliff right now.

Then, to my surprise, she pushed back her seat and rose. Not well, in opposition to the understated elegance of her every other movement. It was clear her leg had been broken and not finished healing. The pain had her lips thinning as Cordelia Hasenbach, First Prince of Procer and Warden of the West, knelt before me.

"I have a responsibility," Cordelia said, "to the people of the Principate. To rule, to guide and to protect. To ease their worst inclinations and spur their finest ones. I have failed them in this."

She was proud, Hasenbach. Not the kind of person something like this would come easily to. Not someone to do it unless she believed it to be necessary. Rozala was halfway to her feet, protesting her ruler kneeling before a foreign queen, but neither of us paid her attention.

"I have no right to ask grace of you now, and no might to compel it," the First Prince said. "So I can only beg that you act as I did not, and help those I cannot."

That I'd savoured this, for even a moment, tasted like ashes in my mouth. Because it wasn't her or her reign she was begging for. It was her people. And while I might not be leading a crusade into Procer, I could not deny it felt poisonous that I could be in this moment and begged at instead of begging. Not because I enjoyed the helplessness of it, but because I'd never liked to think of myself as someone who would need to be implored to save lives.

"Get up," I said, voice rough. "Enough. There was no need for this."

I pushed back my own chair, rising to my feet, and the eyes of both Malanza and Brother Simon went to me. Watching, weighing.

“Get up, Hasenbach,” I said. “You and I are going for a walk.””

Did I need to quote all that? No. Is there any reason for me not to? Absolutely not.

I fucking love that moment.

Shveiran

Personally, I found it really unsatisfying. Or maybe not that, but insufficient considering what followed.

I never felt like Cordelia capitulated or asked forgiveness, given how she acted in the following chapter. That made it an empty gesture and I’m disappointed it left an impression on Catherine.

Liliet

Cordelia cannot actually capitulate and surrender the rulership of Procer to Catherine, or say “no yeah if you want to kill us all that’s fair”. She just... cannot. It’s outside the bounds of what she’s allowed to do. If she has to be somewhat shitty to Catherine to make sure her land survives, that’s what she has to do. Kneeling was a personal gesture, as much of an apology as she was able to make – the rest is politics and necessity.

zenanii

To be fair, half of Cat’s plan for entering the grand alliance was basically “make myself so useful they can’t pass up relying on me.”

Liliet

Yep.

And it probably wouldn’t have worked otherwise... but THERE ARE NEGATIVE SIDE EFFECTS

Hmm. Is Cat going to need to "visit" Mercantis? Or perhaps merely imply/threaten to do so to the intermediaries from Mercantis?

And it seems that Cordelia/her people haven't picked up on the plot to betray the Drow ... which is definitely not going to put Cat in the most cooperative mood.

Liliet

I think this is slightly out of order – this is before all the messages Cat gets in that one chapter are sent, meaning the information about the plot is the next day.

We literally see Rozala talk to Cordelia about it, remember?

Adrian_V

"There were still two mouthfuls of poultry left, and one of sides. Her timing had been off: imprecision, chaos, had won a small victory. "...OCD much Cordelia?

Another Malicia vs Cordelia match? Nice!! Although i swear Viv is going to remind everyone she was the thief, like maybe she will pay Mercantis with solid gold bars, made at least partially from stolen old from their vaults or something xD

Like the idea is to demonstrate they could screw them a lot if they wanted (or at least appear to) and the stolen merchants are those that traded in bad faith, or worse faith if they all do it liek that.

Liliet

> ...OCD much Cordelia?

Huh. An interesting theory. I don't think she is – I think she's just run this haggard – but... anyone else have thoughts?

dadycoool

It could be an induced thing. Her entire slice of the continent is basically falling apart and these lunch meetings are basically "How much of the forest burned today?" She literally needs some way to be able to say to herself "My life is not entirely out of control. There really are islands of Peace in this hurricane of Chaos. Namaste." After all, Cat isn't the only one with sore shoulders.

Liliet

Mhm.

Not all control issues are OCD.

Shveiran

I wouldn't venture a diagnosis, but I'd argue this isn't exactly new for her.

She has always put a lot of importance on doing things the proper way; she imposes order unto her days and hours, and follows the protocols closely, so much so that she can turn those into weapons.

I am not really surprised that she has a ritual for eating.

Liliet

I don't think she normally leaves food on her plate because she didn't schedule extra seconds to finish it.

Shveiran

Exactly. She usually eats exactly that amount in the time she has allocated for that purpose.

That's why failing to do so has her irritated and musing her control is slipping.

Shikkarasu

I remember playing the OG Spiro trilogy. I was very bad at parts like the races or the skateboarding challenges. So I replayed the same part over and over and over, resetting the second I made the slightest misstep, because I knew nothing short of a personal best at every moment was going to see me through whatever challenge was giving me so much trouble.

This is what I'm reading into Cordelia, that she is demanding perfection of herself because there just isn't enough time in the day for anything less. (note that she opted to not eat the rest of her food, where OCD might force her to finish it) The fact that she failed to get the time-management right for one literal plate implies (to her) that she might not be able to handle the hundred metaphorical ones, all wobbling around her threatening to fall if she can't keep them spinning.

Liliet

mhm =x

Liliet

also thats 100% how i play racing games

Adrian_V

...it was a joke people xD

Liliet

Well, you learned something!

(Namely, that it's not a joke, inherently speaking)

Adrian_V

Errr, actually the main proof that that wasn't real OCD is that it was contained to her lunch, OCD is spread into every aspect of that person life, the point being they can't control those impulses, and some OCD are subtle actually, little more than routines on the surface.

Liliet

Yeah, this didn't read like it to me either, not really.

Konstantin von Karstein

Still, that did not mean she could not appreciate a well-formed calf or a muscled arm.

Catherine has a bad influence on Cordelia 😊

Liliet

Cordelia had her spies sending her reports on how good Lady Itima's sons were in bed before she ever met Catherine.

Shveiran

More likely her spies included that in the report of their own volition because they just happened to have first-hand insights in those regards.

Liliet

I mean yes but she didn't tell them not to is the thing
dadycoool

I think I spy a Danger (or at least Plot) Flag: Masego is based in the Arsenal, Catherine is headed there, Hakram goes pretty much wherever she goes, and Vivienne is also headed there. If Indrani decides to head there, the entire Woe will be reunited, possibly for the first time since they joined the war. That kind of meeting has Narrative Weight, and if the three of them walk in on Masego and Indrani chatting (or something else ;)), then all my internal alarms are gonna go off.

Shveiran

Cat commented Archer will be there.

And... yeah, that's going to happen. And for good reasons. I want me some Woe!

Wonder

And most threads converge at the Arsenal.

dadycoool

Yeah. Isn't it terrifying to have so much attention be paid to the R&D department of the war?

Liliet

If by 'terrifying' you mean 'hell yes best thing ever' 😊

Shveiran

Can't it be both? XD

Liliet

100% yes it can

Dread Emperor Ridiculous

I wish this chapter wasn't so short.

Stirrings in the Wasteland, hmm? Either Amadeus or Abreha is rooking someone, somehow. I hope the next interlude is from Sepulchral's perspective.

hhesselmann

My mind:

It's not short though? The guides chapters are gloriously long – and exactly the right length for a web serial in my opinion.

My heart: it's way too short! Moar!!!!

Sadly Mother of Learning is completed, so I only have the gods are bastards and the practical guide to look forward to. Anyone have recommendations on (new) high quality web serials to share? I would be most grateful! 😊

MrRigger

I recently found The Wandering Inn, and I kinda want to read it again after I finished reading it the first time. Multiple PoV story, primarily focusing around Erin Solstice, a human girl from Earth who ends up transported to a fantasy world full of monsters and heroes... and becomes an Innkeeper. It's fantastic.

Konstantin von Karstein

Did you tried « the Wandering Inn »? It's very good too.

Eduardo

I second "The Wandering Inn".

Sykomantis

The Deathworlders perhaps?

winterbrass

I don't ever recommend the Deathworlders without pointing out that there are disappointingly regressive tropes woven into the narrative; it's Star Trek for dudes who unironically believe that Western men are being "feminized" and the entire series is a paean to hypermasculine violence. For what it is, it's fine – but I would boycott a movie and not purchase a printed copy because I don't support the author due to the personal beliefs he's inserted into what could have been a much better work.

"For what it is, it's fine – but I would boycott a movie and not purchase a printed copy because I don't support the author due to the personal beliefs he's inserted into what could have been a much better work."

Someone could -and most probably does- declare the same for PGTE. 😊
Each with his/her taste and all that.

Liliet

I mean who? Homophobic people? What controversy is there that you see in PGTE?

All sides are not equally valid in conflicts like this, actually.

Yikes!

reddit.com/r/litrpg fields this question at least once a week or so, and responses often include works I've not seen mentioned elsewhere.

PGtE, MoL, and GaB set an awfully high bar that few others meet. Wandering Inn certainly does, but isn't "new". For something less than a year old take a look at "He Who Fights With Monsters" and "The Infinite Labyrinth."

Kel the Seer

Also endorse The Wandering Inn and He Who Fights With Monsters.

Not new, but would add Not All Heroes

Onos

The Zombie Knight series is pretty good, and I'd also recommend the Wandering Inn.
Kill Six Billion Demons is also kick-ass, though it's a comic rather than a serial.

JT

Metaworld Chronicles is very good

You know, for all her whining about how the old dread leaders were short-sighted morons, Malicia is in the running to be one of the worst.

She COULD stand to the side, let everyone weaken themselves fighting the dead king, then polish off everyone once the war is over.

She COULD help the alliance, earning her a shitload of leaverage to use in the future to ensure Praes will always be in a good spot.

INSTEAD, she has made certain that if the Alliance wins, they will do everything they can to burn her to the ground, and if the Dead win, they will just sweep Praes like everybody else.

There is no winning for Praes in this situation.

laguz24

Personally, I think that it is the subtle influence of the dread empress Name, when the story says that you should be short-sighted, yes you will be. When Amadeus finally gets around to claiming the tower, he will bring it and the entire nobility crashing down preferably with goblin fire.

flashburn283

Can fate really be giving her blinders big enough that she doesn't realize she is acting just like EVERY other dread ruler in history?

Liliet

I think the issue is that [she thought that] she couldn't really 'stand aside and let the alliance do things' without declaring for Amadeus – audibly to her nobility confirming that he gets to control what she does by choosing his alliances even when they go against her previous actions.

And she prioritized asserting independence from him over... literally every other consideration in the situation.

Ah, trauma. Isn't it fun!

sengachi

I'm not actually sure she could wait for the Dead King to be pushed back and then come in to mop up.

Think about it, at the end of the Dead King conflict it's practically certain (if he loses) that there will be a whole posy of new heroes who just reached their absolute peak by pushing back (or killing!) the Dead Freaking King. If she comes in with some backstabbing right after that, that makes her Saruman in the Lord of the Rings epilogue. The far weaker, much less powerful villain who messed up the heroes' homeland while they destroyed the great evil, who now gets casually mopped up as part of the falling action.

That's not a good Story for Malicia.

Liliet

...and if the alternative to backstabbing would most definitely have ended up being conceding to Cat's demand that she abdicate, because Cat would 100% demand that.

Shveiran

Honestly, I don't think Malicia has that many options right now.

Her plan was – I think – to have everyone weaken themselves against the DK while preserving enough of her strength that taking her down at the end of the Bone War was simply not an option. That was made rather harder by Amadeus' decision and the Civil War she is stuck in.

Right now, I think she sees her goal have a much smaller margin of error (aka, how weak the Alliance has to be while also managing to not lose to the DK) but is still a possible mark to hit; so she goes at it through the Mercantis plot.

Point is, though that is certainly playing with fire, I don't think she has many options.

If she turned against the DK, the Alliance would not forget her part in causing all of this. She'd be taken down eventually, there is no walking away from that.

As for standing quietly to the side, I think she would if she thought that the Alliance would win by a narrow enough margin without her intervention; my guess is (purely speculation here) that she doesn't believe that to be the case.

Bottom line... I don't think Malicia is making "dread empress induced" stupid mistakes. My beef with her actions is because of their morality, not their stupidity. I disagree with her goals and priorities, but if I accept them as valid I see nothing stupid in the way she pursues them.

Little did the first prince realize that the Revenant known as the Cold Poultry slain centuries earlier, had infiltrated Salia. Through cunning guile and wicked planning it had disguised itself as an innocent afternoon meal. It Successfully ruined her schedule on that specific day by being two portions to large All according to the Hidden Horror's design. This small victory in the name of its dark master would spell doom for the continent.

Walter

It is intensely weird to me that the economy of Procer is still reliant on Mercantis coinage to function, in the sense that there is still an economy of Procer. Like, at some level, somewhere in the pipes, for the lack of coinage to matter someone must be like "I won't give you, the Grand Alliance, these war materials, unless you pay me. I'll sit here on these swords/armor/wagons/food/whatever until the Dead slaughter myself and my family."

Like, are there Dead King Denialists? Surely in the face of 'a literal army of the Dead is coming to commit genocide, they have so declared and enacted in the north already, you are surrounded by the refugees of their past slaughters' folks would all pitch in. I totally get the Mirror Prince plan of getting ready to backstab your unwelcome allies after the fact, that makes sense, but the fact that they still need to pay folks in any coin other than 'we are dying to defend you and once we are gone so are you' is pretty severe.

It makes me think Malicia is at work in bigger ways than we've had hinted. She may have convinced the Mercanti that they can do a deal like hers with DK and he'll let them live and pay them even more gold.

sengachi

Welcome to the perils of Game Theory. There will always be some asshole willing to bet that the great and terrible universal problem can be solved without them, and they'll be in a better position at the end of it if they don't pitch in.

Liliet

My guess for who's demanding the coin is: Southern principalities, possibly Levant and Free Cities (Mercantis selling weapons, etc).

And yes, they're absolutely being assholes about it, but it sort of makes sense: AFTER the Dead King is beaten (they're all presuming he obviously WILL be), who's left with what? They all want to be the one standing with the most advantage, note that even Vivienne is maneuvering to come out on top at the end – not because she's not willing to give it her all, but because otherwise Callow will get eaten after the war.

Anyone who's not playing this game will get eaten after the war if even one person/entity did. It's the shittiest Prisoner's Dilemma ever, where even one person defecting will fuck everyone else over if they don't all defect too, and there are too many players for any guarantees.

Shveiran

"The spice must flow."

It doesn't have to be about denialists or profiteers; it can be about people needing money to live. It's not necessarily about people telling Procer "I won't sell you these here hens to feed your troops".

It's about them needing money to continue to give them hens tomorrow.

Because hens need to heat, need warmth and shelter.

If you don't sell the hens, but gift them, how are you going to pay the woodcutters that give you the wood to warm yourself and your hens? How are you going to pay what you feed the animals? How are you going to pay the guy that repays the roof? Are they all going to work for free because you give the hens for free to Procer?

If they do, how are they then warming, feeding and clothing themselves and their families to keep doing that work through time?

Thing is, this war isn't a one-time sacrifice; you can't chip in once and be done with it.

It is a continued effort and it must be sustained through time; to be sustained, it has to be SUSTAINABLE.

Economics is complicated, and everything is connected. If the system goes through stress it becomes fragile, brittle. That's what's happening here, I think. Not assholes being assholes (though there could be some, sure: there are always some assholes) but people needing coin to live and the system being vexed by the war efforts.

To make war against the dead abomination of all that is good and pure, "the spice must flow".

Ιούλιος Καίσαρας

Yes, in a case like this, a war of extermination, even in a medieval setting we would have a command economy emerging. Even moreso. Satan and his army of the damned are invading. Money and debt would have a place but it would be subservient to the war effort, used as units of measurement.

I wonder if there are watsonian reasons for this or the doylist reason that the author adheres to the paramount importance of credit and cash flows.

I'm not pessimistic about it, the author has time and again surprised me positively.

Point Point

There are a few issues with a command economy on Calernia.

First, there is no centralized government of the Grand Alliance that can issue unquestioned orders. Maybe Catherine could issue arbitrary orders to Callow and expect them to be followed, but her situation is unique in that most of Callow's ruling class was wiped out, so much of the nation is now managed by a government that Catherine set up herself, and she has the power to punish anyone who disobeys.

We have a much better idea of Cordelia's limits, especially since the coup. She can only do so much without the assent of the Highest Assembly, and that includes ordering the other Princes and Princesses to fund the war effort. And with the war ongoing, she also needs to make sure that she doesn't burn so many resources that Procer is unable to make more.

Second, each member of the Grand Alliance wants to ensure that they can survive after the war. If Catherine did order all of Callow's resources put into the war, she would be leaving it vulnerable to yet another Praesi invasion, and at a time when all of Callow's allies would be just as vulnerable, and likely unable to lend significant support.

And to deal with those, they need to trade with external entities, which really wouldn't be part of any command economy.

Of course, they still need to focus everything on the war as much as possible. This chapter gives us a look at what that means: extensive loans and deals that enable Cordelia to continuously funnel resources into the war effort, while preventing Procer from falling apart.

Speck of Stardust

eh everyone who isn't directly on the front lines still believe the heroes will win the day.

Like the Dead king himself wasn't planning on trying to win until the end of the last book because he didn't think he could. Frankly unless the Allies start losing rather than simply 'holding' nobody is going to change their tone.

Liliet

Command economy? How?

There is not a unified Calernian government, and any government – Proceran, Callowan, Levantine – depends on passive consent of the governed.

Some people are shitty and/or idiots, and they're enough to ruin it for everyone else. See also: Rozala being deeply, deeply disappointed in her fellow rulers at Princes' Graveyard.

I really loved this chapter. Seeing snippets of all these characters and getting caught up in the rush of politics is really wonderful to read.

Interlude: Terms

"The doom of carefully laid plans is two unfeeling sisters by the names of mishap and surprise."

– King Pater of Callow, the Unheeding

"She'll be here in two days, we believe."

Masego thoughtfully peered down at the blade, insofar as it could truly be called that.

Though Helmgard had eventually been able to forge a sheath for it, an ornate affair of enameled steel, even that skilled heroine's finest work had not proved sufficient for full containment. The sheathed blade was being kept in a deep pool of ice cold water so that the power it constantly emanated would be dispersed, though to his practiced eyes it seemed like there would be need for more liquid: as matters stood, the surface of the pool subtly stirred as if touched by winds and the Hierophant believed that someone dipping a finger into the water was near certain to lose it. The aspect that Catherine had extracted of the Saint of Swords' corpse had been a temperamental thing even before seven Named and one had lent their hand to making a proper artefact of it. Masego was careful not to stand too close to the edge of the pool, for the edge of his robes would be no more immune to the power than flesh, and he frowned. Though the capacity of what had been forged here could not be denied, he suspected that he might well be scolded for the unfortunate impracticalities of certain aspects of it.

The odds were at least six in ten that anyone drawing the blade would die, after all.

"And you're not listening to me in the slightest, are you?" the Rogue Sorcerer sighed.

"Perhaps if we made a suit of armour," Masego considered. "That allows one to withstand using it."

Though in principle he supposed use would be 'withstood', if at the likely loss of limb and or head. It was all a matter of defining the acceptable boundaries of loss. It would take significant time and effort to create such a suit of armour, however, and a wielder for the blade would have to be decided upon first. Such matter, to his admittedly half-hearted understanding of the politics involved, might become somewhat contentious.

"You could at least deny it," the Rogue Sorcerer complained.

What were they talking about again? Hierophant vaguely remember talk about hearings, and beliefs. A trial of some sort, he decided.

"I agree," Masego said, which usually got him out of these situations.

A heartbeat passed.

"Yet we should discuss it in greater detail with the others," he cunningly added.

It would not do to accidentally approve of another bout of foolishness like a wine cellar being added to the Workshop, even if acceding to that request had ended up making the Hunted Magician unusually agreeable for a few weeks. Either that or drunk, Masego could sometimes find it hard to tell.

"You only ever say that when you haven't been listening, Masego," Roland said. "It's the single most transparent evasion in an arsenal made of particularly thin air."

Hierophant's brow furrowed. He'd been seen through, then. Fortunately, Indrani had taught him how to escape this sort of situations flawlessly. Pushing down his general dislike of physical contact with anyone but a few, he laid a hand on Roland's shoulder and put on a sympathetic expression.

"I am flattered by your interest," he said, "but I do not reciprocate the attraction."

Roland looked down at the hand, then back up at him. It would probably take a few heartbeats to work, Masego mused. Referring even obliquely to sex made people skittish, which made sense as it seemed like a lot of trouble for middling returns. It wasn't like children couldn't be made with the proper alchemies, either, though admittedly the lack of soul might be off-putting to some.

"It is important to me, my friend," the Rogue Sorcerer slowly said, "that you understand the Archer is not an appropriate person to take cues from."

Masego's brow rose, loosening the silken blindfold before this glass eyes.

"In what context?" he asked.

"In any context," Roland feelingly said.

That sounded rather dubious but then, for all his intelligence and learning, the man was a hero. And Proceran as well, which some of the bolder treatises about bloodlines from the ninth century considered to be a birth defect. Masego withdrew his hand, having left it there quite long enough.

"As you no doubt already knew," Roland said, tone rather pointed for some reason, "Queen Catherine has reached out to one of the boundary stations and informed the garrison that she will be arriving within two days."

It would take the better part of a day to get to the Arsenal proper from any boundary station as well, Masego knew. He'd never known the translocation to happen in less than six hours, and it had to be initiated at the proper time besides.

"It will be good to see her," Hierophant agreed.

"It will," Roland sighed, then muttered under his breath about herding cats.

That was a notoriously difficult activity, Masego knew, which meant the other scholar had likely reached a dead end in one of his research ventures. Hierophant could sympathize, given that proving his Quartered Seasons theory had become increasingly difficult. If there was truly a fourth realm of power out there, or even the husk of one, it was resisting his best efforts to locate and measure it. Yet Catherine's return, he thought with a brightened mood, would – as if often did – open up the option of using overwhelming brute force against a complex problem.

"Is this why Tomas and Helmgard have been holed up in their private workshops for two days?" he suddenly frowned. "Catherine wouldn't insist on running them ragged to finish the last touches on the Mirage, she's always found the Observatory quite sufficient for all her needs."

Masego allowed himself a degree of pride over that last truth, for he'd known granting his request to build in those first months after her coronation had been an extension of trust on her part. It was deeply pleasant to know he'd not failed that trust. Besides, while she knew neither the Blind Maker nor the Bitter Blacksmith he doubted Catherine would want them to face consecutive sleepless nights on her behalf.

"It's not for her personal use, it's for a full council session of the Grand Alliance's highest officers," Roland said, as if he ought to already know this. "Twilight's Pass sent the Kingfisher Prince to speak in its name, but neither Princes Rozala nor the Iron Prince will be able to make the journey. That means the Mirage will have to be fully functional or we'll be relying on constant scrying-chains."

Hierophant idly wondered if he should start paying more attention at the daily evening briefings of the Belfry. Maybe, since he'd had no notion of any of this. Would he? Probably not.

"The Order cadres in Salia would prove sufficient for the task, when it comes to Vivienne and the First Prince," Masego said.

It was a little unseemly, resorting to such slick wiles to ascertain if either of these would be coming. Yet to do otherwise would shatter the illusion he'd been maintaining that he devoted his full attentions to any part of those meetings that was not about funding or the attribution of staff.

"It won't be necessary, with both of them here in person," Roland replied. "Mind you, there might be as much as a week between Queen Catherine and the arrival of the rest of them so we're not out of time quite yet."

"It would be best to be ready ahead of time in case of any surprises, though," Masego caught on. "That is reasonable. I'll take a look at the complex myself."

"That would be appreciated," Roland said, inclining his head.

Hierophant briskly nodded but cast a lingering look at the sheathed sword within the waters. When the other Named moved he willed one of the glass orbs within his skull to pivot and watch him, noting the short-sleeved cloth shirt and simple trousers the other man wore. Tinkering clothes, the kind that would not get caught on things and would not be a significant monetary loss were they irreparably damaged. The shorter Named strode up the five steps to the edge of the pool, only there ending his advance. Out of politeness Masego kept an eye on him, even if he did not turn his head.

"We still haven't agreed on a name for her, have we?" the Rogue Sorcerer mused.

"It is not a sentient artefact, it cannot have a gender," Hierophant noted. "And I remain in favour of Severance."

"Severity has the better ring to it, as far as I'm concerned," Roland replied.

"It hardly matters," Masego said, "unless one adheres to that Pelagian nonsense about term resonance."

Though Procer's sorcery was largely of the unfortunate Jaquinite mold, there were several enclaves in the Arlesite territories where older methods were at work. The Pelagian theory of magic was a child's mimicry of what the Gigantes could do with Ligurian methods, liberally seasoned with ignorant mysticism and rites more religious than magical. Pelagia herself had been famous in her time for her splendid enchantments, and some of that talent still remained in those who claimed to be the inheritors of her ways, but the few shards of truth to be found there buried in a sea of drivel.

"I do believe in it," Roland reminded him.

Ah. He'd quite forgot that, admittedly.

"Naming something cannot stabilize its 'nature', which is a rather dubious concept in any case," Masego bluntly said. "There has been no dependable evidence of this being the case."

"When it comes to most things, I would agree," the Rogue Sorcerer said, then he flicked a glance at the blade in the water.

Ever-roiling, as if waiting for the hand that would wield it.

"But there are bodies in Creation that obey different rules as the rest," he said. "How can I not believe that, having seen it with my own eyes?"

"We are all ignorant children trying to piece together the truths of titans," Masego said, "but the moment, Roland, that was we are satisfied with an explanation we are lost. Observation is not understanding, and is there anything as hateful as willfully lingering in your own ignorance?"

The other man's lips quirked.

"You've a surprisingly poetic bent, on occasion," the Rogue Sorcerer said. "But in the end, my friend, you are a scholar of the Gift while I remain a mere practitioner. If I only ever used what I understand, I would use nothing at all."

"You are deepening your faults beyond the reasonable," Hierophant informed him. "Though on occasion you act more like a collector than a mage, you've also used sorcery from every extant theory of magic without going stark-raving mad."

That was, as far as Masego knew, largely unprecedented. At best one of the Gifted would borrow insights from other approaches to sorcery, as delving deep into another after already being taught tended to learn to severe mental sicknesses as well as deeper spiritual weaknesses. In this matter Hierophant suspected that it was one of the Rogue Sorcerer's own aspects that shielded him from the backlash inherent in genuinely believing often fundamentally opposing facts about magic, the same that allowed him to flawlessly wield any sort of magical artefact he touched: Use, simply termed for how frightfully deep the waters of it ran.

"Collector's accurate enough," Roland quietly said. "Though I like to believe myself a principled specimen of the breed."

The man was in an odd mood, one Masego found it hard to decipher, so he decided to press forward.

"Would you accompany me to the Mirage?" Hierophant asked. "If I find defects in the work, I'll have to seek you out regardless."

"If that is agreeable," Roland replied. "Shall we?"

Masego nodded. A few steps took them away from the pool where the blade that once been an aspect lay sheathed and seething, and the pulsing runes carved into the otherwise bare stone walls shone brighter as the pair of them left the room before winking out. Behind them, enchanted doors barred themselves shut and they continued across the granite walkway leading them further from the cube they'd been inside of. The holy water within, regularly blessed by priests, swept over the walkway the moment their feet reached the other side: the wretched Blessed Artificer, though utterly unpleasant in most regards, had been somewhat helpful in providing mechanisms that would allow the walkway to rise and lower without relying on sorcery the blessed water might disrupt. The precautions were, in the end, warranted: that blade was, so far, the closest to a weapon capable of destroying the Dead King the Arsenal had come to making.

Another set of enchanted doors closed behind them as the pair entered the Depository proper, which Masego tended to think of as an overly grandiose name for what was in effect a glorified warehouse. There were parts of it more protected and restricted than others, the one they were leaving most of all, but the least secure parts were typically large rooms full of crates awaiting shipping out and not some mysterious maze of wonders. The nature of the men and women the two Named encountered after passing another three protective chokepoints reflected this. There were few of the scholars in red, white or bronze – Gifted, priests, academics – that were everywhere in the branches of the Belfry. Instead it was armed guards, handpicked from the different hosts of the Grand Alliance in equal numbers, and workers that they came across. Most bowed, though unlike scholars they tended to aim the courtesy more towards Roland than himself.

Masego asked of his companion's latest venture, a runic seal meant to be able to impress that same rune into cloth or wood and have it magically functional, as they walked and found himself engrossed in the pleasant conversation as they made their way out of the Depository, through the curling hallways of the Knot and through that oft-messy and crowded crossroads up warded stairs and into the silent hush of the Chancel. There only a few were allowed entry, and the wards guarding the sanctum had been of his own design. Though the Chancel was the smallest section of the Arsenal, it held within its walls several matters of variable importance: the central warding array, the restricted stacks and the offices of the Arsenal treasury. It also held the reason the two Name had come: the great enchanted room called the Mirage, which Masego suspected might just be the first example of the sorcery that would come to replace scrying.

The lower level belonged to the treasury and the restricted stacks, the latter of which being warded and guarded, but the Mirage and the central warding array were further above and even more heavily restricted. At least the Mirage was not the furthest level up, where the array awaited: the guards here, heavily armed and armoured as they were, were not allowed beyond the first checkpoint. The second gate would open only for a drop of the proper blood, fresh from the body, and would fill the hallway with hellflame should it not be provided quickly enough. The last and seemingly third gate was kept closed unless one of a limited set of keys was used, though depending on which was another action was required beyond it – else a mounting accumulation of power in a hidden enchantment would grow to trigger an alarm ward. The Mirage was meant to be used, however, and restricting access too much would be inconvenient.

A series of comprehensive checks and another set of wards were all the two Named had to wait through before entering, though the guard captain supervising notified them there were already people within.

“Scholars?” Roland asked, brow rising.

Masego strode past the two of them, mildly curious but rather more interested in inspecting the latest refinements of the Mirage. The room itself was not so large, a circle of a mere two hundred feet in diameter, but it had still taken a colossal amount of work to ensure that not so much as speck of the floor, walls and ceiling would offer magical interference with the delicate sorceries meant to be worked within. For that reason the great round table at the heart had been made of stone as well, as materials that had previously been alive had been judged risky, though the parts worthy of admiration were not these. Around the table, exactly twenty armchairs of stone had been placed within boxes of glass just slightly apart from each other. Linked to the scrying pool hidden beneath the table, ropes of a dozen different purified metals – including grey adamant, which only the Gigantes knew how to make – connected to different parts of the ritual arrays hidden under the floor of the seats, connected to the glass of the boxes through a superbly clever bridging enchantment of the Repentant Magister’s invention.

The result was a nearly perfect illusion carried by the glass: with the proper preparations made on both sides, anyone seated at the table of the Mirage would be within an illusion perfectly mimicking the immediate surroundings and individual of whoever was being scryed by the central ritual. When Catherine would claim her seat here, she’d be able to converse with the likes of Rozala Malanza and the Iron Prince as if they were all truly in the same room. The difficult part had been creating the portable kits that’d allow the illusion to carry from the other side, and there imprecisions remained in need of fixing. But an elementary kit for connection had already been provided to all three fronts, and at this point the burden of work was largely on the Arsenal's side: it was the room here that needed to be flawless so that everything would function. Which was why Masego's lips thinned when he saw that one of the glass boxes had been opened, the seat within removed and the tile of stone covering the hidden arrays taken out.

Of the three people already in the room, two were kneeling and digging into the entrails of the array while the last was on his feet and looking down with apparent indifference. The Hunted Magician, as the only one not occupied, was the first to notice Hierophant's entrance. The dark-haired man in ornate court dress took a bow.

"Lord Hierophant," the Magician said. "An unexpected pleasure."

The sound of boots scuffing stone informed Masego that Roland had caught up, and the Rogue Sorcerer answered before he bothered to.

"Magician," Roland said. "Shouldn't you be working on a replacement wardstone for the Army of Callow?"

The distaste between those two had been instant and instantly shared, which Hierophant found a waste given that they were the two finest Proceran practitioners he'd met.

"Have my hours suddenly become accountable to the likes of you, Sorcerer?" the Magician nonchalantly replied.

"A pleasure to see you as well, Lord Magician," Masego finally replied.

If he was lucky, his intervention might even end the bickering before it truly began.

"Roland, kindly abstain," one of the kneeling pair called out. "I was the one who requested his assistance."

The Repentant Magister rose to her feet after speaking, smoothing down her robes.

"Assistance with what?" Masego asked.

"Worry has been expressed that the Black Queen's mere strength in the Night might serve as a disruption of the Mirage," the Hunted Magician said. "And so there was a need to get at the lower arrays for testing."

The Proceran villain had been the one to design the enchantment that kept the stone tiles in place, so both his presence and the way he'd merely been waiting around when Masego entered were explained in a single stroke. Yet a question was begged by what he'd been told.

"And when it comes to matters of Night," Hierophant said, turning his head towards the Magister, "you did not come to consult me?"

"She didn't need to," the last person in the room said, rising to her feet.

The Blessed Artificer smiled tightly in his direction. Her dark skin and golden eyes, the signature of Wasteland highborn of the oldest and most powerful lines, were always jarring to behold when paired with the truth of what she was: a priest with a blacksmith's hammer, an ignorant meddler of the worst sort. Masego was not Roland, to let his irrationally strong dislike of the other Named affect his judgement, but neither would he deny that something in him always itched to crush her work utterly whenever he caught sight of it. It was quite distressingly visceral a reaction.

"After all, she already had an expert on hand," the Blessed Artificer said.

"You have never even encountered Night," Masego replied in clipped tones. "And you hardly have the proper academic frame to even begin to conceive of it."

"You're a Praesi miscarriage of a person," the Artificer smiled. "You've no proper frame to conceive of anything at all."

Her hand slipped into her tunic, fingers closing around some half-seen device, Light bloomed and then Masego saw nothing at all. Not that he'd fallen into unconsciousness, but rather that some sort of device was interfering with the sight of his eyes. How deeply unpleasant of her.

"Adanna," the Rogue Sorcerer reproached.

Witness, Masego thought, and his Name sang. His eyes burned behind the blindfold, with Summer flame and something entirely his own, and in the Artificer's grasp he found the whirling device of steel and Light she'd used to blind him.

"Wrest," the Hierophant coldly said, raising a hand.

The Light ripped out of the device, uncontested for the lack of will behind it, and it formed into a ball above the palm of his hand. He closed his fingers into a fist. When he opened his palm again, it was to reveal dispersing wisps of Light.

"You broke my device," the Blessed Artificer harshly said.

"Be thankful it was not your spine," the Hierophant replied, just as harshly.

Both eyes on the heroine, he did not catch sight of the sculpture until it bounced off the side of his head with a perfect bopping sound.

On most days, Indrani was all for the amount of pretty people in this room getting all red-cheeked and flustered but sadly this looked a lot more likely to end up in the Eleventh Crusade than clothes hitting the floor. Something had to be done, so Archer turned to a method that had never failed her: throwing things at people until they did what she wanted. The wooden sculpture she'd been working on over the last wander just because it made Alder and Aspasia embarrassed bounced off Zeze's head magnificently, catching the eye of all five other Named in their secret hush-hush magic room.

"Is that a naked woman?" the Repentant Magister asked, cocking her head to the side.

"Is that Catherine?" Masego asked, sounding rather curious.

Bless his soul, Indrani fondly thought, he no longer even bothered to comment on her tossing things at him.

"You've seen the Black Queen naked?" Roland asked, sounding shocked.

Indrani swaggered up to her paramour, throwing an arm around his shoulder so he'd be too distracted to mention it was the faint scar carved across the belly and not the nice ass that'd revealed the identity of the woman she'd been carving.

"He's been in her quite a bit, Ro-ro," Indrani told the Rogue Sorcerer, wagging her eyebrows.

"Quite regularly, during the Tenth Crusade," Masego agreed absent-mindedly, which was just perfect.

The Repentant Magister – Nephele, wasn't it? – cast a look at her carving that bore curiosity of more than merely academic nature, so Indrani almost patted herself on the back for being such a good friend. The Stygian heroine was quite the beauty, with those curls and curves, so one might even argue she was being a very good friend. Indrani's intentions to keep stirring the pot for entertainment and also the sake of peace, she supposed, were neatly waylaid by utter surprise when Masego turned and put a hand on her shoulder. He stood almost a head taller than she, Indrani froze when he leaned down and pressed a soft kiss on her right cheek and then the left. His lips were soft. He smelled of ink and cool stone.

She was not blushing.

"Welcome back, Indrani," Masego warmly said.

"Er, yes," she said. "Lovely to welcome you too. Back. You know what I mean."

"Not particularly," Masego cheerfully admitted.

He extricated himself from their embrace and she let him – she'd known from the start it would be best to let him set the boundaries of their involvement, when it came to physicality – only after they'd separated tugging down her tunic.

"You can keep the sculpture," Archer told the Magister, winking. "You know, for comparison purposes."

The Stygian reddened, speaking a denial in tradertalk that shouldn't fool anyone with any sense.

"What a delight to have you among us once more, Lady Archer," the Hunted Magician smiled at her.

Ah, yet another pretty one. That one was all about the chase, though, as Alamans tended to be – the way he was simultaneously pursuing the Bitter Blacksmith and the Blessed Artificer spoke to that. Both of them looked they wanted to cave in his head, on most occasion Indrani had seen, but also there seemed to be a lot of feeling reluctantly flattered. Right on time, the Blessed Artificer shot the man an unimpressed sideways look.

"Same, Mags," she drawled. "Brought in a new girl for you lot, so put on your fairday best."

"I would not dare to disappoint, Lady Archer," he drily replied.

"New girl, you said. A mage?" Roland asked.

He looked all hopeful now, which made it all the more a pleasure to crush his happiness. In her defence, Archer wouldn't have kept picking on the man if it wasn't so fun.

"She's called the Red Axe," Indrani grinned. "And she screws with magic just by being around it."

"That would be interesting to study," Zeze agreed, blind to the disappointed look on Roland's face.

"Brought in the rest of my band too," Archer idly mentioned.

"Rest and recovery, until we head out again. Magister, you know the Vagrant Spear right?"

"We fought together in Cleves," the heroine agreed. "Though I would not consider us closely acquainted."

The way Indrani had heard it Nephele had been pretty much a twat up there in Cleves, before she got her shit together, so she wasn't surprised to hear it. Then again, Cat did like the catty ones so it checked out.

"You'll be staying for some time, then?" Masego asked her.

"At least a week," Archer shrugged. "Why?"

"Catherine will be arriving in two days," he told her. "I'll have your affairs moved to my quarters."

Indrani suppressed a smile. It was pleasant to sleep in the same bed, and even more so when he seemed to enjoy that intimacy as well.

"You could buy me a drink first, at least," she said, fanning herself.

"A wine cellar has been added to the Workshop, so that shouldn't be necessary," Masego revealed.

Indrani flicked a look at the Hunted Magician, whose lips twitched, and she bestowed upon the man a nod of solemn approval. It was heartening to see at least one of these people had their priorities straight.

"That'll be fun to break into," Indrani mused, the eyes the calmed situation in the room and decided that if she left all the ingredients here the brew was likely to start boiling again. "Come with me to have a look at the Red Axe, would you? I want to know if the poor girl will be locked into a room for the rest of this or if she can wander around some."

To her appreciative surprise, Masego not only agreed but offered her his arm. Considering she'd made it clear that he shouldn't offer physical contact unless he wanted it, a lesser woman might have been chuffed by how unhesitatingly he extended the unspoken offer. Not Indrani of course, unless you squinted a lot in the right light. She threaded her arm through hers and offered the rest of the Named a nonchalant wave, allowing herself to be escorted back out.

"So, is it me or do you have even more Named kicked around than before?" she asked as they began their way down the stairs.

"It isn't you," Masego replied. "The First Prince got her hands on the Forgetful Librarian, but we've added two since your last visit: the Blind Maker and the Doddering Sage."

"Heroes?" Indrani idly asked.

"We are not certain for the Sage," he admitted. "His moments of clarity are rare, if incredibly useful. We've also a guest in the person of the Wicked Enchanter, though he'll not be staying. He's more a hedge mage than a true practitioner, even if he has mastered some lesser arts, so his value outside the field is limited."

"Anything fun?" Archer said, mildly curious.

"Mind control, though rather imperfect," Zeze replied. "Some elemental conjuring as well, but his arsenal is essentially varied methods of domination."

Indrani's steps stuttered.

"The Wicked Enchanter," she slowly said. "Where did he come from?"

"Valencis originally," Masego said, "though he spent some years in Helike and lately in -"

"- Orense," Indrani finished. "He was in Orense, where he slew and robbed and raped his fill in the villages around the outskirts of the Brocelian."

"You have heard of him before," Masego realized.

"I just spent two months travelling with the heroine he made," she grimly replied. "So we best hurry and keep them apart, or there'll be blood on the floor."

They were too late.

Archer realized, with a sinking feeling, that she might just have helped make a very large mess.

Big Brother

Ooh, I think a Villain might be dead...
At least, I dearly hope so. That asshole sounds like he deserves it.

Tohron

If the heroine in question is the Red Axe, the ability balance would definitely be in her favor.

Shveiran

On one hand, damn right he does.

On the other...

this is a mess. It is a blatant breach of the Truce and Terms. Now Cat will either have to ask for the head of (what could realistically turn out to be) a rape victim that took revenge on her abuser after the system let him go scot free, or suffer an emhorrhage of Villains.

It's... not a pretty picture.

Liliet

Maybe not necessarily head. There's got to be SOME demonstrative reparations demanded, enough for villains to feel like heroes do in fact have a strong incentive to NOT touch them under the new system.

Shveiran

In theory, I can agree with you, yet what reparation could possibly be enough? This measure is meant to reassure people that superpowered zealots that could have both personal enmity to them and a divine mandate to clean off scum like them won't harm them.

It is either that, or any villain offered to join for an amnesty plays along only so long as they think they can't make a clean escape and make the heroes lose their tail while the white cloaks are very much occupied.

I don't think there is much that could work besides an unbending rule.

After all, Heroes are often all about personal sacrifice for the greater good. If there is a penalty to pay to get the bad guy, they'll pay it. Death may be harsh, yet... what else may suffice?

Liliet

That's a great question, and largely depends imho on what actually happened and how Cat manages to sell it.

Adrian V

Also remember the last conversation between Cat and the Barrow sword, so long as is practical to the war effort she will do what is necessary, thing is that part of it is the witness, even if she wants to and it's the most practical approach she has to respect the letter of the accords if not the spirit (which is what she prefers to do, follow the spirit of the accords that is), but I know this will actually be used for the benefit of the accords, I mean do you people seriously think something like this wasn't thought of? There must be clauses and whatever to deal with messes like this.....if there isn't a name for lawyers already there will most definitely be one soon enough xD

ninegardens

And thus it was, that Hakram's superior editing skill and foresight dealt with the current problem 8 months before it actually happened.

Shveiran

Rules lawyering this won't work. I'm pretty sure there are rules about this sort of things; I'm also pretty sure those rules involve the death penalty. Of course someone must have considered the possibility, but that doesn't change the fact that loopholes won't cut it: saying "look, we don't want to execute this kid" or "aha, but this word in this line actually refers to the ancient Arlesite precedent of the Renowned Twat, and thus raping made on Thursdays are exempt from the amnesty."

It won't satisfy the black shirts watching; if you ruleslawyer the T&T, they will do so themselves; they'll skirt the line of duty, they'll leave people to die, they'll curb their initiatives until you come back crawling to them because Villains do that shit better than the opposition. And Cat will have no ground to call them out on it because she would have done it first.

It doesn't matter if a clause exist; using it means a white cloak gets away with it, and once that happens there is no placating the fear that she was just the first instance.

Javvies

Yeah, there are basically only two ways that Red Axe would get to walk away from killing Wicked Enchanter. Option one – there's some sort of loophole in the pardon system, ie you only get pardoned for stuff that you selfreport or otherwise own up to and Wicked Enchanter left some significant stuff out. This is ... unlikely, because if you're getting an automatic pardon for anything you say you did, there's effectively hff a zero point in leaving anything out. Especially if leaving something out would be grounds for you to not be covered by said pardon.

Option two – the Wicked Enchanter just did something in this encounter to seriously provoke the Red Axe in such a way that a lethal response is warranted, even under the Truce and Terms. This is perhaps even more unlikely, as that is both an incredibly high bar, and remarkably stupid.

Basically the best chance for the Red Axe to get away with killing the Wicked Enchanter would be if the Red Axe had witnessed the Wicked Enchanter having dealings with the Dead King or Malicia, or more likely an envoy or scrying link.

However, I fully expect that the Wicked Enchanter managed to push just about all of the Red Axe's buttons, but I also expect that he limited himself to verbal provocations and perhaps crude and/or suggestive gestures as provocations – or, in other words, staying clear of anything that could be grounds under the Truce and Terms for the Red Axe to attack him.

Liliet

There exists in the world a legal concept of “fighting words” – as in, a sufficient verbal provocation that the person who said it first counts as starting the fight.

Shveiran

Sure. However, including such a cause in the Truce and Terms would be ridiculous; this many cultures rubbing each other the wrong way? We saw heroes nearly drawing on each other, the T&T supposedly held for years without Named on the opposite sides snuffing one another.

Anything close to a “fighting words” clause would be abused to no end.

Plus, didn't Cat say to Tancred that grievances had to be reported, not acted upon?

Liliet

“Fighting words” is one thing, “fighting touching someone you'd previously raped” is another and yes Catherine did say that, but there are different degrees of offense

SMR

He wasn't part of the Truce or Terms. Masego described him as a guest, rather than a member.

Liliet

A guest at the Arsenal because he'll be more useful in the field. He is absolutely part of the T&T.

Alex Straughan

I don't see that villain as a volunteer.

He was likely forcibly and violently conscripted into the army to fight undead on pain of death.

That's hardly 'scot free'.

And describing the Truce and Terms, as the system is a little disingenuous. It's not a court, it's a desperate measure to prevent an ascended lich from eating the continent.

Shveiran

Sure.

But try to step in Red Axe's shoes. Granted, we know next to nothing to her, but her story is closely bound to that of a Killgrave style enchanter that uses his skills to "kill, pillage and rape" as per Archer's description.

She is not necessarily a rape victim or the fiancée/sibling/friend of one such person, but since her Name is based on disrupting magic and bloodied weapons, I think it is a safe bet that that her coming into her Name was closely bound to that of the Wicked Enchanter.

She'd see him as a monster. The monster, maybe.

And now, rather than putting him out of his misery... the system tells him "if you fight the good fight, the slate is clean". Basically, from a heroine point of view, in exchange for doing what any decent living Named ought to do in the first place, something she may see as a moral imperative, he gets to be forgiven?

I think the T&T are the right idea, the only idea; but let's be real about it: the amnesty is always going to be an hard (if necessary) sell.

And though it is easy to recognize it as a necessity when you are not involved, that's harder when the monsters played a part in your own tragic backstory.

NerfContessa

Archer makes the best messes though.

And dang, I have missed zeze. In my youth I had a similar if lesser outlook to him, albeit focussed on physics instead. Sadly my mind was not made for higher level physics. Luckily my social prowess improved 8n the last decade. :p

Mental Mouse

> Archer makes the best messes though.

Oh, you have (had) no idea (yet). Read on...

Darkening

Roland and Masego are a really fun contrast in a lot of ways. The man that can cast any magic, but doesn't really understand them, and the man that can't cast any magic, but understands them deeply. A hero and a villain, the fact that roland seems to be a decent people person and masego is decidedly not... The list probably goes on lol. On another note, if that hero killed a villain that's going to be a delightful clusterfuck. Looking forward to seeing how the Terms are going to be enforced there. Does a hero killing a Villain mean the White Knight is obligated to kill the hero?

Oshi

It's a quieter part of Catherine's success. They are writing a story too. It's one of those subtler things I've noticed. Each time we see the glimpses of how the Accords are working you notice patterns of villains/heroes who complement each other along wwith ones who oppose.

RoflCat

Doubt it, to kill one for killing another would be a waste of manpower.

Furthermore, if she killed him out of personal revenge, it means she is unlikely to do it again since the only target of her revenge is now dead.

Which to be fair, it's surprising it took this long for this to happen considering it's a pretty well established fact by now that villain presence in an area will give birth to heroes, as Black can testify with all the ones he buried.

I think the most likely option is extra harsh deployment or something, though obviously after she's been trained enough she wouldn't ends up being +1 Revanant for Dead King.

hakureireimu

But if the sentence isn't harsh enough; that will be the end of the Truce and Terms, as no new Villain will join, and some of the existing ones might leave also.

Flameburst

Your points are entirely irrelevant. Not killing her sets the precedent that under the terms heroes may kill villains. That will immediately lead to the majority of villains abandoning the war.

Basically, if the terms are to be upheld, Hanno has no choice but to have the Red Axe executed. Problem is, that would feel like injustice to him, making it anathema to his core beliefs. And if he doesn't do it, cat can't either, or it will be seen as a villain killing a hero in retribution. A real catch 22...

Javvies

On the other hand, the Wicked Enchanter would have aligned onto the Truce and Terms/proto-Accords ... which explicitly includes a pardon for all previous crimes. Maybe there's a loophole there that you can only get a pass for stuff that you self-reported, and the Wicked Enchanter left something out that directly involved the Red Axe.

But ... I think as much as Hanno dislikes the necessity of giving blanket pardons to Villains, even when they've done straight up terrible things that under other circumstances would get them murdered even by other Villains ... Hanno would recognize that once they've been pardoned for past acts, doing anything or allowing anything to be done to them over those same past acts that they've gotten pardons for isn't justice for them.

This is an absolutely ugly situation that's a harsh test of the Truce and Terms and people's commitments to them.

If the Red Axe has killed the Wicked Enchanter ... however justified she might have been, however repulsive his actions were, it's a blatant and severe violation of the Truce and Terms ... and it can only end with the Red Axe being executed for that violation.

There might be a bit of wiggle room if he can be resurrected somehow (unlikely), or if he did something specific to provoke her in this most recent encounter.

Liliet

Why executed specifically???

Shveiran

Because no other price is steep enough. If you'd argue against this, please present at least one alternative option that you believe would satisfy the villains.

Liliet

That's a great fucking question. Luckily, I'm not Catherine whose job it actually is to come up with those 😊

Shikkarasu

Make her into an Akua-style puppet. Perhaps bound to something other than the Mantle of Woe so other Heroes could summon her into the fray.

Pros:

- Is a severe punishment
- Relatively small loss assets
- Isn't an end to her existence
- Why is the holy-warrior ghost not a trope? People were buried in the floor/walls of churches for that exact reason! It's like the coolest thing real world lore that we just aren't using in fic... A-hem, I mean, potential for Name growth

Cons:

- Something that Winter!Cat would do
- Justifications -will- matter to the Sword of Justice

Liliet

Note: it's Hanno's job to punish her, not Cat's. He's her representative. Cat's job is to demand justice from him, his is to mete it out.

Shveiran

if you can't picture a sustainable alternative, then why do you insist execution is not necessary?

Liliet

Because Catherine's (and Hanno's!) goal will be to avoid it, and Catherine tends to find ways get what she is aiming for.

Meta reasoning, really.

Javvies

Not exactly.

I'm pretty sure neither of them will emotionally want to execute the Red Axe for killing the Wicked Enchanter.

But they won't have a choice.

Barring clear and convincing reasons to the contrary, Red Axe will need to be executed for such a blatant violation of the Truce and Terms in front of lots of both Heroic and Villainous witnesses.

Maybe, just maybe, if this had happened without so many witnesses, they could try to rules lawyer around maximum punishment for the Red Axe. But in the circumstances under which her attempt to use lethal force against a Villain covered under the Truce and Terms? They can't. Cat has to be seen as standing up for the rights and protection of Villains who are abiding by the Truce and Terms. For that matter, Hanno has to stand up for the principle that Heroes keep their word once given, and enforce the principle that if Villains are abiding by the Truce and Terms, the Heroes have to too.

Remember, none of this is happening in a vacuum. The Truce and Terms are helping to lay the groundwork and precedent to support the Accords. Plus, there's still that matter of the apparently existential war against the Dead King – and if the Villains think that the Truce and Terms aren't going to be enforced when a Hero violates them, they have little reason to stick to the rules themselves.

Liliet

I would like to note that we don't even know anyone is dead yet.

Javvies

Ergh.

Or, rather, their Priority won't, and cannot, be protecting the Red Axe.

Cat and Hanno have to prioritize protecting the Truce and Terms.

Liliet

Here's the thing: if something sounds Very Wrong about the situation that will likely be exceedingly common in the long run, then it will continue to sound Very Wrong in the future as well.

I wouldn't be surprised if there was a literal exemption for sufficiently harsh personal scores – with a promise of protection but no promise of punishment.

Javvies

Thing is, the Truce and Terms after going to be of finite, albeit unspecified, duration. Until some amount of time after these war is over and the Accords can be negotiated and implemented. At which point, as long as you stay within the constraints of the Accords, it's open season on other Named.

The Truce and Terms are about making sure everybody works together to defeat the Dead King. Nothing can be allowed to interfere with that objective. And if someone doesn't have the self control to prioritize the war against the Dead King over personal issues (however justified), they're both a liability and an active threat to the war effort and the Truce and Terms.

I very much doubt that there's an exception in the Truce and Terms for nemesis-related acts. That runs counter to the very concept of "sign on and you'll get a pardon for past misdeeds and protection from other Named for the duration of the war".

Liliet

Mm, true.

We'll see 😊

Javvies

If the Red Axe has actually killed the Wicked Enchanter, and he didn't do anything to specifically provoke her in this specific encounter (that is, after both are signed onto the Truce and Terms), she will have violated the Truce and Terms in order to kill a signatory of the Truce and Terms.

That's effectively a soldier murdering a fellow soldier in a warzone. That's a death sentence in real life.

More to the point, if she doesn't get executed, the enforcement clauses of the Truce and Terms will not have sufficient teeth to both satisfy the Villains that they are actually going to be safe from the Heroes if they follow the rules, and convince the Villains that they should follow the rules and that they won't be able to get away with murdering Heroes who are subject to the Truce and Terms.

If Cat and Hanno are lucky, there's going to be a loophole in the pardon system (ie, you only get pardoned for stuff you selfreported and the Wicked Enchanter left some nasty stuff out) or extenuating circumstances of the moment that they can use to mitigate the punishment, but ... the enforcement of the Truce and Terms has to be strict and impartial.

Just like in real life, if a rape victim killed their attacker three months after they were attacked, nobody would like it, but they'd still have to charge the former with the murder of the latter, barring extenuating circumstances in the encounter when the murder happened (ie, the attacker tried to do it again, or some other grounds for self defense). Admittedly, in real life, the original rape victim would probably have decent odds of being able to get a sentence on the lower side or a reasonably favorable deal from prosecutors, or so one would hope.

It's an ugly situation, at best.

Liliet

I don't think the pardon requires reporting stuff.

However, I expect him to NOT have behaved perfectly without stain towards her, and there being some kind of "provocation" argument insertable.

Yep. It's ugly as fuck 😊

Shveiran

Provocations short of assault won't be enough. And given how he is being presented, that doesn't seem likely.

If you can kill signatories and live to tell the tale, this won't be the last incident.

Liliet

It was never going to be. You think there won't be heroes willing to sacrifice their own lives to bring down particularly nasty villains?

Shveiran

No.

Do I expect them to keep their sword in their pants while everyone is feuding on the Megalich and the living are treading in a house of glass? Yes.

That is what the T&T are about.

It's a temporary truce while a grave situation persists. And the thing about a truce is, they can break; if you don't stick the course, if you shelter those that don't, it all falls down. One can emphasize with Red Axe, most certainly, but she screwed up; she pulled a nega-Carrot and decided (possibly just in that moment of rage) that personal meant important.

This won't be the last time? Possibly. But that is beside the point.

For the Villains to trust the system, they need to know that the culprits will be dealt with most harshly, every time; this tells them the system has their back, and they need to watch out for just looners with a vigilante agenda.

It's either that, or lose half your Named manpower.

Mental Mouse

> Admittedly, in real life, the original rape victim would probably have decent odds of being able to get a sentence on the lower side

That's a pretty recent development, and even now it's not such a sure thing. And there's still a lot of women serving life sentences (or the moral equivalent) for killing their abusers.

Mental Mouse

> Admittedly, in real life, the original rape victim would probably have decent odds of being able to get a sentence on the lower side or a reasonably favorable deal from prosecutors,

Extending my other reply: In fact, women are still sometimes prosecuted for killing someone who was actually trying to rape them, or preparing to do so imminently. There's at least one of those currently in the news.

Mental Mouse

- 1) With the silence of Judgement, Hanno is learning to do more than just kill or walk away.
- 2) The amnesty applies to organized punishments and force-of-law stuff. Responding to personal victimization is likely to warrant more sophisticated response.

Bluntly, they'll have to do something, but not necessarily kill the Red Axe.

Liliet

Yeah, this.

Shveiran

Imagine if Squire Catherine and Swordsman William joined under the truce and terms. Heck, let's say Diabolist did after Liesse (yes, yes, I know, but play along), and Laurence with her.

These are the kind of enmities the Truce and Terms need to regulate. Named have stories and stories have MORE THAN ONE CHARACTER. Red Axe's situation is unlikely to be unique.

Several of these Named may have crossed path before, and chances are that happened in strife.

What penalty short of death would have ensured that this hypothetical Catherine would not try to kill Diabolist? What penalty could have stayed William's hand or that of teh Saint fo Swords? It could be argued even death is insufficient.

Either the Terms are inviolable, or they are nothing. There is no wiggle room, not for something this new, this unprecedented, this fragile. Not for something many Villains likely already want to wiggle out of: fighting the DK is not fun, and some of them are not interested in glorious combat.

If you's argue other options could work, please provvide one. I do not wish to be pedantic, but I feel the burden of proof lies on your side this time.

Liliet

Note that a large argument for villains to join up is “you do that or we kill you”.

Sure, there’s also deliberately set up incentive for those who would join on their own, but fucks at the level of Wicked Enchanter? This was basically Gallowborne equivalent for him.

Shveiran

These are Named.

You can conscript them at swordpoint, sure; but you can’t make them stay unless you convince them that they are better off sticking to it.

If the amnesty doesn’t hold, the villains will leg it as soon as they are able.

If they are watched, you can’t deploy them effectively because they can’t be alone, and as soon as they can shoot their guardian in the leg and leave them to the Revenants, they will.

Most of the Villains are not overly powerful. No incentive is worth sticking in the war if you know the likes of the White Knight or the Gray Pilgrim can slit your throat in your bed without the Black Queen flipping the table for it.

It’s a sucker’s bet, it’s a martyr’s sacrifice, and these are the VILLAINS. I’m not completely sure CATHERINE would accept this kind of bullshit.

It’s not about the Wicked Enchanter not being a monster, is about the amnesty being a guarantee or not. It’s about a heroine killing a villain under truce and surviving.

Maybe a few, like the Barrow Sword, will go “come and get me, bitches”, but most will flee. I have my doubts even on him, frankly, and he is fucking Levantine.

Liliet

The amnesty is from the government and from the officials of the Grand Alliance – Black Queen and Grey Pilgrim indeed.

There’s a hell of a distance between that and ‘a heroine this villain literally made by his actions’.

I wonder how detailed the Truce & Terms are 😊

Shveiran

You'll have to explain this one to me a bit more, I'm afraid.

A heroine signed the terms.

A Heroine broke the Truce.

That heroine must be executed, or everyone will see that the truce and terms both don't prevent them from acting out if they wish to and don't protect them from being attacked by their temporary allies.

What does Red Axe not being a head of state means?
The T&T are also about Named, and she was a signee!

Liliet

Eh, nobody says execution specifically has to be the punishment. It has to be something severe enough to serve as a demonstration, but death does not really have to be it IMHO.

Mental Mouse

Consider the two named attacks on Catherine herself – the guy who tried slipping into her tent to slit her throat got “made an example”.... But for the straightforward one, who was open about trying to kill his way to the top, she just kicked his butt.

RoflCat

Because death is a release. The ‘criminal’ learned nothing, repent nothing, repaid nothing, they’re now ‘free’ from the crime they committed.

That’s why Cath is still keeping Akua around with some kind of plan for her ot eventually repay for the 100,000 souls she killed.

Shveiran

You are arguing for sanctions as a re-education of the convict.

For domestic crimes, you’d be right (or at least, you’d have several philosophers arguing the same point, as well as my own much less impressive approval).

This is not a domestic crime.

Sanctions have also a different objective: to discourage the repetition of the infraction through the fear the sanction provokes and to make the convict unable to commit the infraction twice.

This is an international treaty.

Re-educating the convict is not a priority, here.
The priority is enforcing sanctions that force partners to keep playing nice and prevents them from sinking the boat.

RoflCat

Well, if they set precedent of killing = death, guess what, it might actually have OPPOSITE effect.
Because if you know you're going to die after you kill one, what stops you from just going on a rampage and killing more while going out in a blaze of glory (applies to both Heroes and Villains btw)?
Is the side that suffer going to demand your side sacrifice unrelated people just to balance the scale? Unlikely since that's going to raise a whole different issue.

If Cath want to keep the Named in line, the punishment can't be severe enough to tilt them over the edge.

Javvies

The Red Axe has to be turned into an example.

This means an execution, and probably a brutal one, not something clean like beheading. But it still has to be quick enough that Aspects or other Name tricks can't be used to escape. So maybe beheading after all.
Her corpse may or may not end up getting nailed to a cross after.

Especially since the Red Axe committed a major and blatant violation in front of all kinds of witnesses from both sides and people from all members of the Alliance.

And, because this is (presumably) the first such incident.

Examples have to be made to deter repeats.

And, sure, it's possible that a sufficiently determined Heroic type would consider the cost worth it and/or take the mandatory death penalty as motivation for going to kill multiple Villains in quick succession. However, that is not going to be the normal response.

Plus, it's not just about how the Heroes react – the Villain reaction is equally important, and they aren't going to accept anything less than the death of a Hero who breaks the rules to kill one of them who was (presumably) following them.

RoflCat

Yes she need to be an example, one that doesn't cause that blaze of glory death story down the line.

>However, that is not going to be the normal response.

Except Named are NOT normal.

It does not matter if it's rare, as long as that option exist, it WILL happen eventually, and when it does the whole Accord goes out the window when one person pull that mass killing before dying thing.

Heck, even before the Terms exist we had example in Saint of Swords already, and we've also seen Names trying to skirt the edge of what's allowed from both sides.

Javvies

The point of the Accords is to lay down rules of engagement and the equivalent of the Geneva Conventions for Named conflict. Enforced by everybody uniting to come down hard on anyone who breaks the rules.

The point of the Truce and Terms is to both lay groundwork and foundation for the Accords after the war, but also to keep everybody pointed at the Dead King during the war.

You're missing the point — sure, a single Hero trying to kill as many Villains as they can before they get stopped hard (or vice versa), is not going to be the standard Named reaction to ther Accords/ Truce and Terms.

That is an extreme outlier scenario, and would be resolved with extreme prejudice, ideally by a unified team of Heroes and Villains working together to stop the offender. And the offender would be turned into an example, most likely ending up dead, if not worse.

And as long as that kind of action remains an extreme outlier scenario, and gets dealt with firmly by both Heroes and Villains in unity, the Truce and Terms, and ultimately the Accords, will hold up.

The Truce and Terms prohibit Hero/Villain conflict during the war against the Dead King (and presumably also in the inevitable intervention against Malicia), not forever. After the war, the Accords will allow for Hero/Villain conflict, as long as it falls within certain conduct constraints.

Shveiran

Spot on.

RoflCat

And surely executing someone for breaking it will TOTALLY keep everyone in line....because controlling through fear always go well....

Seriously, we're this far into the series and your first thought was execution? Is EE such a boring kind of writer?

Other options, that has been shown in the series, that everyone else would see as pretty severe punishment that isn't execution includes:

1. Since it just got mentioned, Severance/Severity. Basically have Red Axe be the test dummy for whatever method they plan for getting someone to be able to wield the blade.
2. Related to above: Have an Aspect ripped out of Red Axe and turned into an artefact for use in the war. She'll live, but a loss of an Aspect is definitely something both Heroes and Villains can see as harsh.

Liliet

This, agreed. Overly harsh punishments result in perverse incentives.

Shveiran

insufficiently harsh ones, however, fail to guide behaviors.

We are talking about rules needed to prevent Named individuals that may have strong personal enmities focused on the big bad for as long as it takes. Considering imprisoning them would be costly in resources (again, Named) and likely to fail, what punishment could possibly be effective as a deterrent, not a logistical nightmare and non a slap on the wrist without being death?

RoflCat

Well, since it just got mention in this very chapter: Ripping out an Aspect and turning it into an artefact.

The 'criminal' will forever be a crippled Name-wise, while the item will be useful for the war.

Losing an Aspect is definitely something both Heroes and Villains can agree to be a very severe punishment.

Liliet

Well, we're about to see 😊

Note that Catherine did not say "no extenuating circumstances", she said "there better be good ones"

Liliet

A simple and reasonable punishment I have come up with:

An oath of service / obedience (to someone specific, willing to take the responsibility, from the other side) / non-aggression for a limited period. Serves as well as confinement for limiting unwanted behavior in the future, does not present logistical difficulties if the person being punished is willing to go along with it and there is someone willing to take responsibility for them (which both of the above need to be the case for execution to not be the only reasonable solution, yes), the likes of Mirror Knight and Blade of Mercy would avoid like the plague, serves the Red Axe situation as long as she's willing to put her money where her mouth is and pledge herself to Indrani (or Masego or Catherine if Indrani isn't villain enough for this) in a non-optional way.

Javvies

Her word isn't going to be worth anything to the Villains. She did after all just break the oath she'd sworn to obey and uphold the Truce and Terms (presumably).

Swearing new oaths as punishment isn't useful as punishment since her sworn word is in doubt.

Alex Straughan

How have people not caught on to the Rogue Sorcerers deal yet? He does not and never has had the Gift. He's a Named that is pretending to be a wizard using Aspects. He can take and control the magic of others but can't cast any spells of his own. Hence his love of artifacts. Tyrant: "What's another lie at the heart of who you are?" Himself: "Collector is accurate."

Konstantin von Karstein

So he would have managed to fool everyone in the Belfry (a magical research center) while participating to the research's during months? It seems unlikely.

Alex Straughan

It's a fine distinction. He can use magic and control that which already exists but he cant cast it. There are lots of clues though. Remember when he applied that ointment to his and Archer's eyes that let the ungifted see magic?

Liliet

He straight up says he's no scholar. And he has tricks at his disposal that are useful. Note that Masego doesn't currently have the ability to produce sorcery either and that doesn't get in his way.

Mental Mouse

Just so. Rogue may not be a sorcerer, but he's still a magically-oriented Named. And probably has some very useful Aspects for studying, using and manipulating magical devices.

Liliet

Mhm. With the abilities he has, having or not having the Gift is splitting abstract hairs.

Even if he has a complex about it 😊

Well that was a delightful little exchange.
Good gods the Blessed Artificer seems like a real asshole though.
I guess you can take the named out of Praes but you can't take the Praes out of the named. Though arrogance and hubris are just as much heroic flaws as villainous ones so I guess there's that too.

Javvies

Blessed Artificer is Proceran, not Praesi.

hakureireimu

She's Praesi

Javvies

Huh. Missed that somehow.

She'd pretty much have to be descended of expats/exiles, then. Otherwise she almost certainly wouldn't be a worshiper of Above or a Hero, nor is it likely that she'd still be alive.

So ... of Praesi descent, but almost certainly born and raised (and Named) outside of the Dread Empire. Probably Procer or the League.

And probably at least the second generation away from Praes.

Culturally, I don't she can count as Praesi in such a scenario.

Javvies

Oh ... wait.

Since it's a small world ... perhaps she's a child or grandchild of that relative of Akua's who ran away from Praes into self imposed exile only to get assassinated later.

sivarajan

Thandiwe Sahelian, Akua's great-uncle.

Jago

A little more than an asshole.

1) She attacked another member of the Alliance, a violation of Truce and Terms;

2) Where she has got the time and money to make her artifact?

As its workings were aimed specifically at Masego I doubt it was part of the approved projects. I would suspect misappropriation of funds for a personal project. Again one aimed at another member of the alliance.

So we have a hero attacking a villain. If, as implied, the Red Axe has attacked another Villain we have the basis of a huge crisis.

The Wandering bard had a meeting with some Heroes and prepared a crisis for the Alliance?

dadycool

Indrani just loves playing with Goblinfire. Too bad she just accidentally set some loose.

She and Masego are an utter delight to have in one place.

Shveiran

To be fair, the mess happened on her watch but not because of her. She brought the Red Axe here as she was meant to, then left her alone for half an hour. It was, unfortunately, enough for a story to grab her.

Adrian_V

I just love seeing Zeze and Idarani, the genuine love we see is heartening, and i just know more than a few heroes that witness it for the first time have their mind boogling, and villains too, i mean they are wicked and all but so sweet and innocent at the same time that they give me caries xD

And my god Erra you almost gave me a heart attack at the end of Masego's POV, like i thought "betrayal" then "shit Roland not only was there but in position", glad i was so wrong.

Liliet

What the fuck does the word "wicked" even mean?

* by any other name

Well, for one, I'm pretty sure it means you can't stand to be good, if it also means you must let it go.

For another, it means you are a monster – and thus one of Catherine's.

It's all there in the manual. 😊

Liliet

That is not how most people use the word, though I'm not quite clear on how they DO.

Adrian V

Evil, perverse, perverted, or at leasts they are supposed to be all that, wich is what makes their "tastes like diabetes" romance so funny xD

♥

Oshi

"I am flattered by your interest," he said, "but I do not reciprocate the attraction."

I've fallen over and I can't get up. Worth the wait indeed.

Mental Mouse

It's effing hilarious how Masego thinks he's being so sly and sophisticated. And that's coming from a fellow spectrumite...

Liliet

TBF all of this might have worked on people who know him less well. The attraction thing is hilarious and would have worked in most situations on most people, by my estimation.

Just... tough crowd.

(He should not be trying to fool Roland, specifically)

Mental Mouse

Well, the thing is, one of the classic weaknesses of spectrumites is dealing with context – identifying the current context, adapting to it, recognizing when it changes. That's exactly what he was so spectacularly failing at here, using individual responses that might have done for a party, in a workshop discussion, and not picking up when they weren't working.

Liliet

And that's why he ASKED Roland to help him calibrate, and Roland REFUSED. TFW your friend is neurotypical)=

Catherine is much better at giving specific conditional directions!

Liliet

(Indrani, of course, did not clarify on purpose)

Mental Mouse

I suspect Indrani might say something like "I was teaching him how to deal with annoying folks blathering while he's thinking, not how to be polite!" 😊

Javvies

I have acquired a near instant dislike for the Blessed Artificer. She is immensely fortunate that Masego listens to Cat and knows that Cat wants the various Heroes and Villians to get along. Masego has quite literally killed people over less than what she just did. Remember the Interlude where Masego boiled the blood of two Praesi for insulting the Woe (and For Science!/Magic!)?

And Aspect ripping from the Saint of Swords is confirmed. Gonna be a bitch to wield that artifact, though. And will probably need to be a Hero, lest it react poorly and/or trigger the "vital artifact fails" trope.

And, whoops. Red Axe and Wicked Enchanter ... at least one of them is probably probably about to end up dead, or at least severely injured. And I'd say the Red Axe probably has the advantage, between being a Hero and becoming a Hero to oppose the Wicked Enchanter. This could easily elevate to a major Accords dispute, especially since the Wicked Enchanter will have signed onto the proto-Accords, and the Red Axe has presumably also been informed and signed on. Fortunately, Cat and Hanno will be arriving soonish.

Shveiran

The wicked Enchanter has the story trope "sly villain gets away after being defeated" though. regardless, my interpretation of the "too late " line is that WE is already dead.

Mental Mouse

> And Aspect ripping from the Saint of Swords is confirmed.

Also confirmed that they may yet regret this.... I wonder if Tariq knows?

Shveiran

Undoubtedly. He is involved at the highest level, and this must be a high profile project. There is no keeping him in the dark even without behold.

Liliet

The only period of time when Catherine was 1 on 1 with the Saint of Swords' body not on-screen was after resurrecting Tariq, so yes, presumably he gave his consent to this.

Burlyraven

Not gonna lie, we've seen a lot of villains with mitigating motivations/backstories, but I'm really hoping this Wicked Enchanter is dead and in little pieces. I'm not seeing much use for a rapist whose only real powers center around dominating humans in a fight against the undead, except to show what a badass the heroine meant to counter him actually is.

Liliet

Keep in mind there's also Malicia etc.

But, uh, yeah.

(Of course Cat cannot act like this, she needs villains to join willingly, regardless of how useful they expect to be)

But, uh, yeah.

Zgggt

... why could someone blind Masego and get away with it? Other than the clear slight of Cat in that action, it's wartime and such acts should clearly be tried as at best assault of a superior officer if generous, treason at worst.

Cat really fucked up if the authority Masego represents is such a joke. I mean, even if this is a part of a grand conspiracy involving the biggest names, this is humiliating disrespect. It creates a narrative in which the Woe are done as a power, and are about to be butchered just as much as Black's cohort once people stopped thinking of his reach and just how terrifying they are when attacking his friends.

Konstantin von Karstein

He just break her toy without any effort, and he could not kill her because she is too useful for the war effort. I think it's a bit stretching it to think it's the beginning of a Story where the Woes are slaughtered.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

I don't think his use of an aspect to break it constitutes a lack of effort. But yeah.

Liliet

To be fair, Masego broke that right back, and I don't think if he didn't others would just stand by and not stop her. This is more of a shitty-ass prank than anything.

I AM very much impressed by Masego's restraint and sweetness, considering he thinks his dislike of her is irrational. I mean I believe him that there's an instinctive Role-driven component to it – likely why SHE did that – but holy shit separating that out and restraining himself when she's like THIS? Hot dang.

I don't think the issue is the lack of authority. Note that Masego did not try to assert any only to be ignored, or anything. Just... someone can be both your subordinate and an asshole to you. Catherine did not teach him the best of habits alas XD

Mental Mouse

As Liliet pointed out, this was basically a nasty prank, which Masego slapped down hard and pointed out that he could have done worse. On the one hand, we readers see villains showing far more forbearance than heroes, but then we're mostly following the villains' POV.

The flip side is the point that someone like the Wicked Enchanter was actually allowed to survive by anyone – running into one of his prior victims without supervision, was his bad luck.

Liliet

Y e p

Liliet

...well I am excited 😊

Important facts we learned this chapter:

- Roland and Masego are both trying to herd cats as best they can, even if Masego doesn't call it that;
- heroes can be ASSHOLES holy shit and Masego is sweet as fuck actually;
- Indrani's sense of humor is as horrible as ever, god bless her;
- Indrani absolutely ships Catherine with everyone in sight and considers it being a good friend and BLESS;
- Nephele is no longer a twat, apparently ♥
- Masego and Indrani EEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEEE;

- oh yes Indrani is nOT aro no matter what Catherine might have wondered;
- SO MUCH COOL SHIT IN THE ARSENAL;
- Mirage is like Star Wars tier cool;
- no but Indrani carved a naked sculpture of Catherine and - oh my fucking god I wonder if Catherine ever learns of this;
- ah yes, the perils of recruiting villains 😊

Shveiran

More like the perils of recruiting villains and forcing them to work with heroes, some of whom may have visceral enmity with others. But yeah, I mostly agree.

medailyfun

I wonder what kind of naked sculpture can actually make ppl blush. Definitely not "oscar statue"

Liliet

I'm pretty sure a naked statuette of a person you know will make people blush regardless of pose.

Trebar

Pretty sure the "herding cats" comment that Roland made was about keeping Masego focused, lol

Liliet

Like he's the only one like that in an institution comprised out of scholars, mages and artisans 🤪 and they are both trying to prevent / dissolve conflicts where they can

ninegardens

So... just to be clear here... Archer totally just waltzed past ALL the wards they have on that place- yes?

I mean, I know that she is apparently Expert tier user of the twilight ways, but um... that still seems like maybe a bad sign regarding the ward levels?

Also, like.... phone calls are nice, but it seems weird that one of the main artifacts they are working on is an improved teleconference lounge. Given that they ALREADY have scrying connection, it seems... odd.

Darkening

Seems like this is a direct connection instead of needing to have a chain of mages extending the scrying links, so maybe it'll free up manpower from communications to go do other things? As for the wards maybe she slipped in right behind Roland and Masego before the wards went up again?

Liliet

Archer probably has permission to go in, duh.

ninegardens

....

Admittedly, given her sudden arrival, and general propensity for being sneaky and ambushfull... I had not even considered the possibility that she had gotten in legitimately.

I'm honestly not sure if this is is more or less horrifying. Just imagine lounging on Cat's shoulder while she's on a conference call to Klaus and Cordelia.

Javvies

Actually, I expect that Archer is the expert on Night that the Blessed Artificer mentioned was on hand.

Liliet

That is 100% going to happen at some point and you know it.

caoimhinh

Yeah, it's odd. But I guess what they mean to do is to have a multiple scrying connection instead of a 2-ways one.

They are basically going from phone calls to group chats in Discord.

Liliet

Sounds right!

Ashley Sage

I'm thankful for the offline e-book of the Practical Guide.

Wait..too early by a few years?

Best interlude for a long time

Hot sexy Masego!

Onos

After that lovely conversation about how Hanno can't mimic Saint's tricks, we have her aspect lying around in the form of a magical sword...kind of like the one Hanno used to wield, which fell under the "associated artifact" trope rather than the "turns at the last moment" trope. 3 guesses as to who gets Severance.

An (in Masegos opinion) ignorant, unpleasant, living, Light-wielding Sahelian (surely) on one side, an educated, charming, dead, Night-wielding Sahelian on...well the same side technically. The Blessed Artificer ought to be interesting.

The Mirage surely has higher security and range than ordinary scrying, otherwise it does seem like a bit of a waste of resources. If Nessie can't spy on their leaders having conference calls though that's pretty handy.

Rampant speculation aside, I seem to have missed something regarding Zeze's Quartered Seasons theory if anyone could clarify? Winter was given to Night, Summer became Twilight, yes? Yet Masego is looking for a fourth Season. Did Spring/Autumn get involved at some point and I completely missed it?

Darkening

The king of winter and queen of summer married and formed a single, unified court formed out of spring and/or autumn. That's 3, and he's theorizing there's a 4th out there somewhere. Cat speculated the new court might be made of both when she was talking down Sve Noc from taking the Twilight Crown, but it's entirely possible there's a whole other realm out there somewhere.

Draylen

Spring and Autumn Courts technically stopped existing in book 2, if I'm remembering right, when the King and Queen wedded and properly joined Winter and Summer into a single Court.

Which means there are six known Realms, and Zeze is theorizing a seventh (which makes a lot of sense). We have:

Heaven

Earth

Hell

Arcadia (United Courts)

Night (the hollowed corpse of Winter)

Twilight (the hollowed corpse of Liese stuck inside Maybe-Summer and solidified by the exKing of the Wyld Hunt being just, the most wonderful terrible trickster to exist)

Unknowable (the antiArcadia?)

We also had a couple blink-and-miss-it scenes when Cat was still the Last Sovereign and she went through a couple of the joined Fortresses. I think the last one was on the way up to Neshamah? But that I don't remember so well. I might have to reread it.

Mental Mouse

The Serenity might qualify as a Realm by now.

caoimhinh

Quartered Seasons doesn't necessarily mean that it is related to the 4 seasons nor the 4 Courts of the Fae. I think that's a failed train of thought that keeps people looking the wrong way.

The first time this was mentioned was when Catherine decided she needed to kill the Wandering Bard, and there was no context nor previous mention about what it is about, just the implication that it would help them face the Intercessor.

Now, as we just got another glimpse of it: It's about "realms of power", they know 3 but Masego has theorized the existence of a 4th, which has yet to be accessed.

My current hypothesis is that the 3 "realms of power" currently known are:

- Heaven (where the Choirs of Angels reside)
- The Hells (where the Demons and Devils reside, also where the Serenity is located)
- Arcadia Resplendent (where the Fae live, home of the Courts -now a unified Court after the union of Winter and Summer, preventing the appearance of Spring and Autumn- and a fragment of which was used to create the Twilight Ways)

From those 3 planes of existence, power can be drawn by a practitioner, priest or Named, so they would fit to be called Realms of Power.

Acclaration:

- Light and Night are manifestations of the energies from Above and Below, not realms by themselves.
- Winter and the other Courts of Fae were fragments of Arcadia, not proper realms, and were even constantly destroyed and recreated in the endless cycle that the Fae were trapped in (Winter vs Summer / Spring vs Autumn) until the Winter King and Summer Queen married.
- The Serenity is a layer of Hell conquered by the Dead King, repurposed and terraformed to have people living there.
- The Twilight Ways is a shard of Arcadia transformed to serve as a means of transportation.

Now, the question would be what's the fourth.
My guess is that the 4th and unknown "realm of power" is the Nowhere.

That place that has been referenced multiple times when mentioning the Bard and also the song "The Girl Who Climbed the Tower" is said to come from there. It's also the place where the Intercessor goes to when not in Creation and what allows her to teleport across Creation (she also said she hates it).

It would make sense that reaching out to the realm where the Bard goes to escape harm would be an effective way to truly harm her, and that being what Catherine wanted by financing Masego's research of this.

Oshi

This is an interesting theory. A 4th real that might serve as a prison rather than a kill zone.

Mental Mouse

Regarding Hanno's sword, it may not have turned on him, but eventually an opponent (Black, I think?) did decide to Deal With That, and summarily broke it.

Frivolous

I wonder if perhaps the Mirror Knight could pick up Severity and survive; after all, he was very durable before, and he's had 2 years to grow more indestructible since.

Indrani would be more embarrassing if she made wooden replicas of a male Bestowed, especially if they were anatomically correct and to scale.

Liliet

No, Cat is max embarrassing because of how high her position is and how scared everyone is of her.

Mental Mouse

The question is just how the Mirror Knight's indestructibility works. Remember, SoS was known for being able to Sever high-indestructible things, not to mention the fabric of reality.

SpeckofStardust

Everyone- The villain must be dead the worse case would be the hero dying after the villain defended himself.-myself

Shveiran

You mean, Red Axe being dead and Wicked Enchanter surviving?

Uh, it could be. Though it wouldn't really be worse. The terms would be clear: either he did something despicable NOW after meeting her, or he would have been justified in his actions. Some may grumble, but there is no difficult decision: he was attacked, the hero is dead, things proceed. Some would grumble, but that wouldn't really be worse than the conflict already ongoing.

Having to kill the victim no one wants to off would be much more controversial, in my opinion.

jbanastacio@yahoo.com

I think that is not in fact the worst case.

I think the Wicked Enchanter might have dominated some of the other denizens of the Arsenal, maybe even other Bestowed, and commanded them to defend him from the Red Axe. So Masego and Indrani would come across a pitched battle, with WE's mind controlled minions on one side and the Red Axe and everyone else on the other.

Frivolous

I think that is not in fact the worst case.

I think the Wicked Enchanter might have dominated some of the other denizens of the Arsenal, maybe even other Bestowed, and commanded them to defend him from the Red Axe. So Masego and Indrani would come across a pitched battle, with WE's mind controlled minions on one side and the Red Axe and everyone else on the other.

Tyckspoon

If Red Axe really is the hero created to stop the Wicked Enchanter this would go exceptionally poorly for the Enchanter – Not only are Red Axe's abilities going to be uniquely suited to defeat him, she'd be riding a story in which she is fighting to free/defend his unwilling victims.

And then politically, there would be cover for reducing Enchanter's protection under the Terms (he used his abilities to put innocent/uninvolved/non-Named people in danger and/or attacked another Named) or mitigating circumstances to Red Axe's actions (she was acting to remove an active threat to others, not taking vengeance for the prior actions that Enchanter was already granted pardon for.)

Liliet

Nope, that's what one calls "the problem took care of itself", politically speaking.

Morgenstern

My "worst case" interpretation of this "oh shit" moment cut-off to the chapter was actually "oh noes.... they destroyed a lot of the stuff in the Arsenal and left a body count of 'collateral damage' aka bloodshed already?". But yeah, I guess one of the two being dead, making it a political conundrum could also be a massive clusterfuck.

Daniel E

"Masego has been in the Black Queen quite a bit" "Regularly during the tenth crusade"; I am in tears from laughing. Him & Indrani are just the best.

caoimhinh

I find it interesting that they consider the Tenth Crusade to be over, not repurposed and aimed against the Dead King. Sure, their original target was Praes and Callow, but after turning around and marching North, I thought they would still consider it part of the same Crusade.

If there's one thing worthy of being called Crusade, it would be this war of nearly the whole continent vs the Kingdom of the Dead, right? Though Crusades have never before worked that much against Keter, so there's that.

Shveiran

I'd argue most of the Villains would balk at being part of one as much as the Heroes and priest would to let them (and drows, and somewhat Praes) in.

caoimhinh

Maybe, but there's something grand about the number 10. I had thought they would go for the narrative of "The Crusade that changed it all", something along the lines of "the greatest Crusade, the one that united Heroes and Villains against the true threat to Calernia".

And also because the Crusade wasn't over when the Dead King invaded, and all the parties involved in it are now going against Keter, so it wouldn't be much of a stretch to say that the current war is the 10th Crusade reaimed. Though of course, the current Grand Alliance is vaster than the one before, when they first launched the Crusade.

Shveiran

I think they will milk it... only after the war, to avoid the mess that is having this be a formal crusade, with all its baggage attached.

Oshi

Political not a good idea. You saw what happened to Cordelia when the crusade got out of control. Crusades are stories and not the ones where everyone works in harmony to defeat the Dead King kind.

Liliet

Actually as I understand they're exactly this kind of story. It's when the enemy is not in fact Dead King tier of Definitely Bad and everyone is NOT in harmony that you get it falling apart with the narrative pissing on the ashes.

Shveiran

they aren't successful stories, though. No crusade ever won.

Though I suppose that depends on how you define winning, since the DK may have been forced back in the Serenity before.

Mhm.

Konstantin von Karstein

Only the first was won

Liliet

...the one against Triumphant won?

And the couple after that iirc

Odd

Anyone detect the hand of the mostly absent Bard in this series of Named related coincidences?

Liliet

What coincidences?

Water flows downhill, stories happen around Named. Not all narrative fuckery needs Bard to facilitate it, especially when someone else (Catherine) is deliberately stirring the pot and putting all ingredients together.

John Anderson

My favorite Cat-ship, CatLand, gets a bit of wind in its sails simply by how much he gets along with Zeze.

Ultimate_procrastinator

I had not seriously considered that ship until this moment, but the name alone has me 10,000% on board

Alex Straughan

Sure it's possible, but why?
She wants the Dead King to be beaten. Destroying the Truce and Terms doesn't help with that.

Adrian_V

People are forgetting the accords are big, think of it as a constitution with lots of clauses, with how Cat alone thinks not to mention the people that helped make them i just know this sort of situation is covered and there is a procedure to follow

Liliet

Truce and Terms aren't full on Accords but yeah most def.

superkeaton

I'm so glad Roland and Masego are friendly. They make for good buddies. The Wicked Enchanter sounds nasty, but in the face of annihilation, all hands on deck.

Severity is functionally a nuke, or an equivalent to the Fellblade. Wonder who's going to be sacrificed to make the strike?

Liliet

...consider: Akua

superkeaton

Given Akua's lack of corporeal status, I'm iffy.

Liliet

She's as tangible as she likes.

laguz24

I have a problem with this chapter is the fact that there seems to be no direction beyond uphold the truce and terms and kill the dead king who is such a distant threat that he is rather unconvincing. I need a story here not just cat running around and keeping the entire alliance from falling apart.

Liliet

I mean – I find the plot of “prevent universal annihilation and also build a new social system from scratch” to be more than sufficiently compelling. Different strokes for different folks?

nipi

Legions of undead at your doorstep is a “distant threat”?

Mikasi

I’m going to let everyone else have a go at the whole thing between Red Axe and the other guy.

I just want to outright appreciate the relationship Masego and Indrani have. The fact that it’s about as pure ‘extrovert loving an introvert’ as it can be, along with all the other small things, like letting him pace the intimacy and physical touch, which shows that she’s so very pleased that he’s letting her touch him so much, and also that he’s growing more and more comfortable with it, if only specifically with her. God I love this bit, and I cannot get enough of it.

Liliet

SO FUCKING GOOD????

the perfect bopping sound, Indrani acting like she doesn’t care but internally just fucking melting into a puddle, Masego kissing her on the cheek, , ,

TheItzal

So Jessica Jones caught up with the Purple Man and things did not go well

AndromedaStar

I know that part of it might be since this is Masego’s POV, but the Blessed Artificer really annoys me here. Acting like you’re some great expert on something you’ve NEVER EVEN SEEN because you have a personal grudge against the person who’s an actual expert? That’s the sort of arrogance that gets people killed when they try to use your devices.

Also, having the audacity to be angry that he broke your device... that you literally built to blind him!? Even somebody who’s not a “Praesi miscarriage of a person” would react the same way. What was he supposed to do?

This type of Heroic arrogance really rubs me the wrong way. “We are just because we follow the Heavens, and they are just” and all that.

Javvies

I believe that she was referring to Archer when Blessed Artificer said they didn't need Masego because they already had an expert.

Admittedly, the way she said it is particularly prone to misunderstandings, especially if you haven't noticed Archer is in the room already.

So ... not necessarily (officially) intended as an insult, but incredibly easy to hear as one, and perhaps leaving it so easy to take as an insult was intentional.

But the blinding device ... that's definitely not acceptable. And Blessed Artificer is incredibly fortunate that Masego usually listens to Cat and follows her lead when the subject isn't magic/magic-adjacent, because he has quite literally killed over far less.

nipi

Wonder if Cat can rip out aspects out of living named without killing them. Would work as an effective deterrent/punishment. Probably not enough of one if a named just died though.

Jessica Day

This chapter was particularly good.

Chapter 13: Ingress

"One must not look down on tricks that deceive only fools, my son, as the better part of the people of the world are patently foolish."

– Extract from the infamous 'Sensible Testament' of Basilea Chrysanthé of Nicae

It'd once been a delicate balance, keeping Zombie walking at a pace that Hakram could easily match, not anymore. She'd grown used to it and was quite capable of understanding without me pulling on the reins that I wanted to keep pace with my towering second-in-command. Sometimes I wondered exactly how intelligent the undead horse was, or even if she was truly still that at all. The necromancy I'd used when Sovereign of Moonless Nights had been... off. The dead Akua had raised in my place at the Battle of the Camps had famously ignored holy water, and I'd noticed myself that the longer they remained raised the more intelligent they seemed to become. That was not, I'd been told, something typically associated with necromantic sorcery. It was with the summoning arts, though, and some days I could not help but wonder whether I was riding a corpse or a bound spirit. I stroked the mare's mane softly, and she neighed softly in approval.

"The White Knight is five days behind," Hakram said, breaking me out of my thoughts. "He found it difficult to arrange for a trustworthy replacement in seeking fresh Named."

Trustworthy was unlikely to be the problem with Hanno arranging for someone to stand in his place. Even the worst pricks on his side of the fence tended to be at least well-meaning. I'd guess that the trouble had been finding someone who wouldn't pull a blade on a fresh villain or talk in a way that got a blade pulled on them instead. Heroes with a diplomatic bent didn't grow on trees, though if I ever caught so much as whiff of such a thing growing anywhere I'd been sending a band of five after it faster than you could say 'oh Gods please, just please'.

"Do we know who he picked?" I asked.

"The Silver Huntress," Hakram gravelled.

Approvingly, I noted. I was more ambivalent over that particular heroine, as though she was undeniably competent in all manners of ways she also fought like cats and dogs with Indrani whenever they got even remotely near each other. Archer had, to no one's surprise, regularly 'sparred' with the heroine back when they'd both been pupils of the Lady of the Lake. The Huntress was eager at the notion of settling that old debt, and very sensitive to the perception that she might be getting forced back over anything by her old bully. Between that and the two of them being Named with a preference for bows, there were quite enough grounds there for seething hostility to be the name of the game.

"She'll get it done," I evenly replied.

And on that we set the matter aside, both of us having noticed the approach of the outriders headed our way. The fortress where we were headed went by the name of Saregnac, though fortress was something of a misnomer: it'd been as much a jail as a castle, which a less diplomatic woman might have said meant it'd been a pretty shitty castle. Gods, look at that curtail wall: the bastard thing wasn't even crenellated, it was like they were just asking to be stormed.

"It's all over your face," Hakram said.

"I could take this place with five goblins and a scarecrow," I muttered back. "I've seen the costs to the treasury, they could have at least sprung for a place with a proper moat."

"How good of a scarecrow are we talking?" Adjutant asked, sounding interested.

I flicked another glance at those walls: barely twenty feet tall, and I'd seen thicker ogres.

"Below average," I decided.

"I could do with three, it it's a really good scarecrow," Hakram said, the fangs he allowed to peek slightly through his lips implying mocking challenge.

"Please," I snorted, "any idiot could do it with that good a scarecrow. Just dress it up like Black and bait them into a field full of munitions. Scarecrow quality is the crux of the difficulty here."

The outriders from Saregnac reached the vanguard of our little caravan, though in truth our entire group was ahead of the slower-moving wagons as unlike those we could cut through the countryside without risking wheels coming off. The line of legionaries ahead of us spoke with the Procerans and shortly after a lieutenant peeled off from the rest to pass along the message. Saregnac, he told us, was ready for our arrival and the Arsenal had been told of our coming. We were lucky, as it happened, as one of the functional times for translocation was one hour before Noon Bell and we were nearing it. The wagons would have to stay behind and wait until one past Afternoon Bell, but if our little group picked up the pace we'd get there with time to spare.

"Send a messenger back to Captain Forfeit," I ordered Adjutant. "We'll be going on ahead."

The Soninke would approve of resting the horse teams for the wagons beneath the shade of Saregnac's walls, I suspected, however unimpressive the walls in question. She'd probably enjoy a halfway decent meal and cold water as well, I mused, the spring days were much warmer in southern Brabant. Even as a messenger peeled off, the rest of us returned to the journey. It wasn't long before we were back on the Proceran country roads – which, though it pained me to admit it, were better than anything in Callow save for the royal roads and what little highway we'd inherited from the Miezens – which I was coming to suspect were the reason Saregnac had been chosen as a boundary station for the Arsenal. The defences might not be anything to praise, but the place did seem eminently accessible. That was almost as useful, though in all honesty I would have preferred the northernmost of the Arsenal entrances to be a stronger holdfast.

The gatehouse was respectable, at least, with a drawbridge over a shallow dry moat leading to a well-maintained portcullis that was already up when we arrived. The commander of the forces holding Saregnac came out to meet me personally. Some middle-aged cousin of Prince Etienne of Brabant, which was the unfortunately not an unexpected amount of nepotism when it came to Proceran soldiery. They weren't usually stupid about raising up kin, though, so there ought to be – ah, and there was the man actually in charged. A former fantassin, by the looks of the garishly dyed red and yellow hair, but he'd clearly not gotten the scar under his eye in garrison duty. I requested the man in question – Lucien of Pitrerin, as it turned out – to be my escort, pawning off the royal relative to Hakram, and was rewarded by a blunt assessment of the situation as we were escorted deeper into Saregnac by impressively well-drilled soldiers.

"We can't hold the walls if we're seriously tested, Your Majesty," the man agreed without hesitation. "I wouldn't even try. The place was a prison for nobles, so it was never meant to withstand a proper storm."

"I don't mean to impugn your efforts here," I said. "But that's not the answer I was looking for, Master Lucien."

"We have truly defensible grounds, Your Majesty, they're simply not the walls," the man told me. "The barbican deeper in is what the place was built around, and it's from the early days of the Principate. That I could hold against an army for days, and the room where the magic circle is was dug beneath into bedrock."

That was good to hear, I thought, though I still had concerns. While losing one of the boundary stations to the Dead King wouldn't necessarily mean losing the Arsenal – there were further precautions – it'd be a hard blow. While it'd be a waste to send a Named to stand guard here, there were things that could be done without resorting to that.

"I'll see if I can't shake loose a company of sappers and send it your way," I replied. "Not permanently, but at least long enough to turn those outer defences into something it doesn't wound me to think about."

"My most humble thanks, Your Majesty," Lucien of Pitrerin said, sounding genuinely thankful.

I waved a hand, somewhat embarrassed.

"We're all in the same boat, soldier," I said. "Gods forbid it capsizes."

"I hear that," the man muttered back.

By the time we reached the barbican the soldier had told me about – which was a solid little bastion, I'd admit to that, though hiding the arrowslits under gargoyles was good as, practically speaking, not hiding them at all – Hakram was back in the fold, his royal lamprey in tow. I almost had to admire the dedication to social climbing of a Proceran willing to fawn over an orc. It was oddly inspiring to see petty ambition triumphing over bigotry, kind of like if I'd seen an imp knife a Beast of Hierarchy. The nearing turn of the hour served as sufficient excuse to escape an invitation to a meal with the man, and reluctantly we were led into the barbican and then through a broad downwards tunnel into bedrock. A few wards and fortified doors later, we stood in an otherwise bare ritual room large enough to accommodate maybe a hundred people at a time. Rituals arrays, a dizzying tapestry of circles and squares and interlocked arcane shapes that would give me a migraine if I looked at them too long, had been craved directly into the floor.

The mages stationed here were mostly Procerans, though there were two of twenty that were on loan from the Army of Callow. I was attended to by them – Callowans both, I learned, fresh to the service but both taught personally by Masego at the Arsenal – as my escort and I were herded into the proper locations and finally asked to avoid leaving the circles we were standing in. Some larger shapes, probably meant for wagons and the like, remained empty. The ritual itself was not long, half an hour of incantations in sequence as the arrays were methodically powered, and then with a shiver we were all standing within an almost identical stone room without the mages who'd sent us here. The air here had that particular taste to it I knew well: Twilight's subtle sweetness, or perhaps freshness. Arrowslits in the walls around us were the first indication that any intruders would find this a well-prepared killing ground, though when red-robed mages from the Arsenal entered the room to invite us to follow them I was quick to see that was only the beginning of it.

The corridor beyond had been built with seemingly two things in mind: for supply wagons to be able to pass through and the ability to wage a stubborn defence against anyone entering through the array room. Spike-bearing steel bars could be brought down to anchor makeshift palisades, portcullises were set in the ceiling every thirty feet and I even caught sight of runes and ritual arrays carved into the walls, awaiting someone to wield them. Soldiers in red, the Arsenal's own garrison drawn from every army of the Grand Alliance, watched in silence as we passed through ward after ward. This place, I thought with approval, would be a bloody grinder if the Dead King ever reached it. Which he shouldn't be able to, as it'd begun as a simple cavern within a mountain in the Twilight Ways before being expanded into this: no full route to the surface had ever been opened. At the other end of the corridor, we reached another ritual room that would take us to the last stopover before we reached the Arsenal proper.

To my surprise, though, it was not only red-robes mages awaiting us in there: pushing himself off the wall he'd been leaning against as he waited, Roland de Beaumarais – also known as the Rogue Sorcerer – stood up at my approach. His inevitable long leather coat swirling behind him, he made to bow until I caught his arm and pulled him into an embrace instead.

"Roland," I smiled, "Weeping Heavens, it's good to see you."

He looked about to say something, his still-tanned face beginning a frown, but instead he returned my smile in kind.

"And you as well, Catherine," the Rogue Sorcerer said. "It's been too long."

Over a year now: he'd not set foot outside the Arsenal since its construction that I knew of, at least not on Creation. The half-realms allowing entry to our little house of wonders didn't count. Hakram stepped up and the two of them clasped arms, the orc towering over the human.

"Rogue," Adjutant gravelled. "Always a pleasure."

"Deadhand," Roland replied with quirked lips. "Glad to see the Stained Sister didn't leave you with a limp."

I was a little sad Indrani wasn't there to hear that, since she would have been able to make something damned filthy out of that.

"Is something wrong?" I asked. "I'm always glad to see you, but I'd not expected to run into any of you until we reached the Threshold."

Which was on the other side of that complicated array in front of us, as it happened.

"There's been some trouble," Roland grimaced. "I judged it necessary to give you advance warning."

My brow rose.

"Not Keter," I slowly said.

We'd be having a rather more urgent conversation were that the case. It wasn't that I believed it to be impossible for the Dead King to reach this place – I couldn't think of a way out of hand, given that we were using the Twilight Ways as way to keep his creatures out, but that hardly meant there wasn't actually one – but rather that if he did get to the Arsenal, it would be for a killing stroke. I couldn't see Neshamah revealing his hand over anything less than a good chance of outright destroying the place: a raid would just lead us to tighten the defences, after the frankly ridiculous amount of Named within the halls drove it back.

"There has been killing," the hero told me, sounding like someone trying very hard to avoid saying the word murder.

If there'd been blood spilled by the mundane staff of the Arsenal, I thought, he wouldn't be standing in front of me offering advance warning. It would not be my place to address a knife fight between guards or a scholarly rivalry gone red. Which meant this wasn't about the killing so much as who had done the killing.

"Who?"

"A villain by the Name of the Wicked Enchanter was slain," Roland told me, pitching his voice low.

"And one of you lot did the slaying," I deduced.

My fingers clenched, though I would not hasten to judgement. I'd given a bleeding boy surrounded by the corpses he'd made the benefit of the doubt, and it was not a principle if it only applied to people you felt for.

"The Red Axe," he tacitly agreed. "I will not argue for breach of the Terms, Catherine, but there were... extenuating circumstances."

"The Enchanter has – had – a certain reputation," Hakram told me. "Though he was also considered a promising lead in usurping control of lesser dead from Keter."

"I hope they're damned good circumstances, Roland," I bluntly said. "Otherwise this ends with gallows and a noose."

I leaned a little closer.

"This is known?" I softly asked. "It was seen?"

"It was done as our people were heading out for midday meal, an openly fought battle," Roland murmured back.

Shit. Whatever happened now, there would be no keeping that from spreading. The Arsenal might be isolated from Creation and we read the letters going in and out, but given the amount of people that lived within its walls there would be no way a Named fight would stay secret forever.

"How many Named are there in the Arsenal right now?" Hakram asked.

Good, I'd been wondering that myself.

"Archer arrived two days past with her full band and the Red Axe," the Rogue Sorcerer replied. "Which brings us at sixteen – eighteen including you and Adjutant, Catherine."

In other words, I was about to walk into a warehouse full of goblin munitions after someone had tossed a torch into it. Fuck. Better it be me than anyone else I could think of, and even better that Hanno was on his way, but still. In the immortal words of Queen Catherine Foundling, first of her name: fuck. And there were more of us coming, too. The White Knight for one, but the Painted Knife and her own band were headed our way at a brisk pace. I genuinely could not remember reading of such a large amount of Named in the same place at the same time, at least not outside a crusading army marching on Keter itself.

"Tell me it didn't get out of control after that," I demanded.

He hesitated.

"Tell me no one else died after that," I said, haggling with disaster.

"Accusations were thrown that the Chosen were attempting a purge, and Archer had to pull the Vagrant Spear off of the Hunted Magician. Bruises and a cut, but nothing lasting."

I repressed the urge to swear under my breath, knowing my soldiers were close enough they'd be able to hear. The Vagrant Spear was one of Indrani's crew, so I wasn't worried there, but all my reports about the Arsenal mentioned the Hunted Magician as being fairly influential among the villains there. Masego could have edged him out of the unofficial leadership fairly easily, as either more or equally powerful as well as significantly better-connected, but Masego would have no interest in playing court games as long as the Magician let him have his way on the things that actually mattered to him. And if he'd been good enough to survive as a Procer mage villain while the Saint and the Pilgrim were still kicking around, then it was safe to assume he was at least that smart. Fuck, I thought once more. Why was it that, of the two Proceran spellcasters with social skills, it was the one supposedly on my side that was most likely to become a headache?

This had the making of a pivot, and not one I liked the looks of.

"Get me there, Roland," I said. "Before the fucking Eleventh Crusade starts in our backyard."

"Your Majesty," the Rogue Sorcerer replied, inclining his head.

He was one of the few heroes that'd never actually sounded at least a little mocking coming from, yet another reason I'd seriously considered asking Masego if it was possible to make more of him. With a Named wizard taking over the ritual, the second translocation was a breeze: Roland outright dismissed the attendant mages and handled it all himself, taking us into one of the larger wagon circles and muttering the incantation under his breath. With a sensation like having a stiff wind suddenly blown over my entire body, we went through after a mere quarter hour of chanting and when my eyes opened it was to the sight of a slab of stone standing surrounded by nothing. Behind us was only void and ahead of us was another slab of stone, but only one.

"I took us through a shortcut," Roland told me. "Otherwise we'd be stuck going through several checkpoints."

"What is it with wizards and not putting up railings?" I wondered out loud, looking at the empty void surrounding us.

There was some quiet snickering from my soldiers, to my own amusement.

"Your horse can fly," Roland pointed out.

"My horse is only coming through with the wagons, so I am distinctly lacking wings at the moment," I replied. "Crows, at least it doesn't rain in here."

Just the thought of treading slippery-slick wet stone with only nothingness around was enough to have me want to wince. I'd worked through most of my old fear of heights, but half-finished dimensions like this were in a category of their own.

"I'll be sure bring up your complaints at the next monthly assembly," the Rogue Sorcerer amusedly said.

He took the lead, walking assuredly through the first stone slab and then not pausing as he reached the end of the second. With reason, as there was another slab in place under his foot before it could be put down. I looked back, wondering if the first slab would disappear, but it was still there. This was unlikely to be a conjuration, I decided – it'd take a massive amount of power to make something like stone slab out of seemingly nothing – but odds were this was from too esoteric a branch of sorcery for me to be able to make a proper guess besides. I simply followed, as did my personal guard, and Roland led us through a walk of perhaps half an hour in a straight line before we reached a significantly larger slab, where a circle of silvery light the size of a door was hanging in the air.

"The shortcut leads into the most heavily defended part of the Arsenal," Roland told us. "Do not be alarmed by the steel and spells awaiting you on the other side, they are a mere precaution."

"Reassuring," Hakram drily replied.

While the defences were slowing our way, even with a shortcut being what we took, I could not help but approve of how thoroughly the safety of the Arsenal was being seen to. I was one of the few who'd been brought in on the nature of the place, so I was aware that the Arsenal itself was in neither the Twilight Ways, Arcadia or even Creation: Hierophant had, using Warlock's old research and what he'd learned by stealing the ruins of Liesse, hung a fortress in a stable dimension somewhere between Twilight and Creation. The Witch of the Woods had then gone a step further and grafted on the Threshold, less dimensional pockets between the Arsenal and everything else. That was where we were right now, and that gate ahead ought to be the last hurdle in getting in. Roland saw to it quickly, tracing the hanging edge with his fingers until it filled silver and speaking in cadenced mage tongue until the circle had become a rectangular door anchored on the ground.

"I'll have to be last to cross," he told us. "But the way is open, go ahead."

"See you on the other side, then," I shrugged.

I limped through, ignoring a half-hearted protest by my escort that one of them should be first to cross. It wasn't all that different from a fairy gate, I decided as I crossed, though somehow more... precise. Travelling Arcadia or the Ways was a journey, while this was more like... walking up or down stairs. The other side was, I found out, a beautifully designed killing field. Flat stone grounds overlooked by tall structures leading into corridors, bristling with soldiers and engines of war, and even just striding through and onto the stone I could already feel the sorcery buzzing in the air. Wards and enchantments and half a dozen other things too. My escort followed me through as I limped forward, at least a hundred soldiers looking down on us, and I noted that the only way through was a stairway wedged between the heights. I waited until Roland crossed as well, the gate closing behind him, and only then noticed that someone was coming down the stairs. I smiled, recognizing him immediately.

Though Masego was tall as ever, he'd gained some weight since I last saw him. Nowhere near what he'd worn when he was still young, but at least enough he no longer seemed thin – though he was still built like a scholar, not a warrior, as there was not much muscle to his frame. The long braids going down his back had shed some of the ornaments they'd down, now limited to one ring per braid. Most of them gold but a few silver and even bronze. All of them carved with runes. His robes were no longer the old black ones he'd taken to wearing after becoming the Hierophant, instead a more ornate grey set touched with tiles of pale green and paler gold. The cloth band that covered his eyes matched the grey of the robes, though it was not broad enough to hide the glimmering light of Summer's sun still dwelling within his glass eyes. Masego looked, well, hale and happy. To my admitted surprise.

I'd not exactly expected him to waste away here, but I had expected that without one of us to keep an eye on him he'd go through an obsessive phase the way he had after the Observatory was first built – only without Indrani around to force him to eat and actually talk to people. Evidently I'd been wrong, and I was pleased to learn it. Masego swept down the stairs and, to my deepening surprise, brought me in for a short embrace before leaning down and kissing my cheeks one after the other.

"I, uh," I eloquently said. "Hello, Masego. It's good to see you."

Hierophant looked rather pleased with himself, standing a little straighter.

"And it is good to see you, Catherine," he said. "We have much to talk about."

A pause of a heartbeat.

"I would also enjoy catching up," he mused.

I choked on a startled burst of laughter before coughing into my fist, though I found myself grinning like a fool. Some things never changed, huh? It just wouldn't be Masego without the effortless praise and insults, neither of which were entirely meant to be offered.

"I have missed you, Zeze," I admitted.

I patted the side of his elbow and he withdrew, straightening his perfectly straight robes. While I'd been distracted Adjutant had come to stand at my side, and the dark-skinned practitioner tuned to him afterwards.

"Hakram," Masego smiled. "Good. I have been meaning-"

"Win a shatranj and I'll consider changing the hand," the orc replied.

"I have been practicing," Masego swore. "And I have this lovely artefact, which has fingers but also shoots lightning and -"

"Shoots lightning?" I mused. "Hakram, you should reconsider."

I was only halfway screwing with him, since I could think of a lot of situations where shooting lightning might be useful. Like, a solid half of all the conversations I'd ever had in my life.

"Masego, please stop bartering away ancient Mavii artefacts," Roland sighed. "Especially when our ownership of them is dubious to begin with."

"It was my understanding that grave-robbing is allowed when a hero is the one doing it," Masego replied, sounding surprised. "Surely that is not invalidated simply because it was a heroine instead."

His tone implied a degree of appalment at the discrimination involved, which had me breathing in sharply so I would not laugh.

"That's not," the Rogue Sorcerer began, "I mean – you ought to... we can discuss this later, Hierophant."

I suppressed my grin. Masego's occasional bouts of well-meaning earnestness had always been near impossible to ward against, in my experience. The humour faded, though, when I considered what was still ahead.

"So," I said, eyes on Masego, "I hear from Roland we've got a bit of a situation on our hands."

Hierophant's face brightened.

"Oh," he said. "That reminds me: I have been asked by the Hunted Magician to arrange an audience with you at your earliest convenience."

I did not groan, because I was a grown woman – sadly enough, as grown as I'd ever get – and a queen and I'd not yet found a way to pawn this off to anyone else.

"Lovely," I muttered.

"The Blessed Artificer also requests such an audience," Roland said, coming up behind me. "She wants to lodge a complaint under the Terms."

My brow rose.

"What about?" I asked.

The Rogue Sorcerer looked meaningfully at Masego, who looked unimpressed.

"The device blinded me," he said. "I will not apologize for breaking it."

The device had what? If some fucking heroine thought she could take a swing at Masego and that I'd then make him apologize for it just to keep the peace, then someone was in need of a rude awakening. My friend might not be the deftest of hands when it came to avoiding giving offence, but on the other hand I'd almost never seen him resort to violence without dire provocation himself.

"Who did what now?" I asked, lips thinning.

"I'll not get into it without her being there," Roland said. "There is little point. Something to discuss when we are not standing in the middle of the translocation area, yes?"

Fair enough, I silently conceded. I wasn't like we were in anyone's way, but I should settle in my guards and take up quarters of my own instead of standing around. Besides, considering the treasury of Callow had pitched in to pay for building this place I was rather due a tour of this Arsenal. I would have preferred to visit when the Named here weren't at each other's throats, but if wishes were horses than beggars would ride.

"You have me there," I easily said. "Which of you fine gentlemen volunteers to-"

A silver rectangle opened behind us, though more than ten feet to the left of where own door out of the Threshold had stood.

"Roland," I said. "Was anyone else supposed to come today?"

By the shortcut, too, if I was correct.

"No that I know of," the Rogue Sorcerer grimly replied.

"To the stairs," I barked at my guards.

We'd only barley begun to withdraw when a silhouette came out. My staff rose, until I caught sight of the perfectly polished shield the figure bore. The Mirror Knight gathered his bearings, then started in surprise when he caught sight of me. I ought to have been the one surprised, really: after all, he was meant to be in Cleves right now.

So what the Hells was he doing here?

matesbe

Well this is a jolly clusterfuck. Heads are going to roll, and I might not be being metaphorical.

Also, I expect we're getting the Mirror Knight's sub-arc out of the way.

panic

And so the treason begins

Javvies

What the fuck is the Mirror Knight doing here? That's a problem. In multiple ways. Not just because he's an asshole who isn't supposed to be here. It's the how did he get in there question and problem. Plus Roland took a shortcut. Plus he's an asshole who will likely make the situation worse, not better. And he's not supposed to be anywhere near here.

This has clusterfuck, maneuvering, and setup written all over it.

Blessed Artificer probably doesn't have any room to stand on if her complaint is solely about Masego breaking her toy that she used to blind him.

dadycoool

This is the kind of thing I was scared of when I realized the Woe was getting back together. The most powerful Band of Five (from our perspective) has gathered without a threat to face. That means an even worse threat will show up to make the gathering worth it.

Wonder

Is Thief coming to the Arsenal too?

RoflCat

Not physically, I believe. I think she and Cordelia will be using Mirage to have a conference later, well, at least that was the plan anyway.

dadycoool

My original comment a few chapters ago was filled with dread at four of the five getting together, only to be told in a reply that Vivienne would be there, too. I didn't check, but her being part of the conference call makes more sense.

Agent J

> "The Order cadres in Salia would prove sufficient for the task, when it comes to Vivienne and the First Prince," Masego said.

It was a little unseemly, resorting to such slick wiles to ascertain if either of these would be coming.

> "It won't be necessary, with both of them here in person," Roland replied.

It was literally the last chapter.

dadycoool

...-_- facepalm One of these days, I'm gonna have to binge these again, like I had when I first found this story. Maybe then it'll settle in my head enough that my memory can be reliable. I won't be offended if people ignore every word that comes out of my mouth.

Jago

As I said in the last chapter, this sound as the Wandering Bard doing.
Plenti of "coincidences" moving toward a major crisis.

The last chapter mentioned both her and Cordelia coming to the Arsenal in person.

Sethur

Now, now people, I am sure there is a perfectly good explanation for the mirror knight being here. Like... The Witch of the Woods threw him so hard at something that a portal to the arsenal was created.

Shveiran

You say that as if it was somehow unlikely.

Cicero

He does seem to be surprised, so this may not be intentional on his behalf.

Mental Mouse

Inb4 we find out for real: "I've been seeing these black crows at the corners of my mind, even while I'm in bed with a woman... maybe you know something about that, hmm?" 😊

Hellspirit

I call bard! She's also probably responsible for that pairs hero-villian dynamic, producing the clusterfuckery.

hakureireimu

I am wondering how the epigraph relates to the rest of the chapter.

Liliet

If I have to guess?

"Welcome to hell, Catherine: yes, all of these people are idiots"

Big I

I'm really curious what a Beast of Hierarchy is now. Some type of devil from the context? Is the Hierarch a devil now? Has he declared war on the Hells? So many questions.

hakureireimu

It's just another name for the order demon.

ninegardens

And Hanno is 5 days away. 😞

He is probably the one person with the moral authority to sort this out on the heroes side of things.

caoimhinh

True, though I don't think it is the Heroes' side the one that needs to be placated here, it's the Villains' side, since one of them was the one killed and it is them that will be raising complaints and asking for retributions.

IDKWhoitis

Well the problem is settling the complaints without involving the heroes. Catherine can't exactly take up the slack every time a Hero does a stupid. Either Cat subdues the Hero and waits for Hanno, or she might have to apply the a quite literal application of Alexander's solution to this Gordian knot.

Shveiran

Well, it isn't now.

Cat seems inclined toward the removal of the Red Axe, though, at least for the time being. I reckon if she ends up taking that scene (which I fully expect her to, yet it is not a given) the heroic side could understandably have a few pointed words on the matter.

I'm curious about how these new heroes will approach Cat, personally.

My perception in Book 6 so far is that Heroes and nobles have kind of forgotten who they are dealing with and think her soft, given were we were two years ago and how they act now. I'll admit however that this is something I like being angry about, so I may be seeing phantasms of my own creation? We shall see.

The demimondes allowing entry to our little house of wonders didn't count.

It should be:

The demimondes allowed entry to our little house of wonders didn't count.

Konstantin von Karstein

I think « allowing » is the good option. It is the demimondes that are allowing entry that didn't count

caoimhinh

Oh, EE edited it. It no longer says "demimondes", which I now see was supposed to be "demimundi" or "semi-worlds".

Now it says: "The half-realms allowing entry to our little house of wonders didn't count."

A whole other meaning now, as "Demimondes" are a class of women kept by wealthy protectors, more concretely female prostitutes.

That's why I was like "the prostitutes do not allow entry to the Arsenal, they are allowed entry there for the entertainment of the people inside." and I was already starting to question their security standards if they were allowing hookers inside such a secret location.

Konstantin von Karstein

I didn't know that « demimondes » where prostitutes 😊
French is my native language, so for me it was obvious it was meant to say « half-world »

M0och123

Ahh yeah demi and monde.
Makes sense!
Hadn't heard that word before in french...

Mental Mouse

Not quite – a "demimonde" is the subculture and/or ghetto associated with prostitutes, or with other "outcast" groups (e.g., drug dealers would count). And yes, "half-worlds" is the original sense – the idea that these people are living in their hidden realm, not quite part of the daylight world. Given the connotations, "half-realm" is indeed better for this literal usage.

flashburn283

Great, I figured somebody was going to have to get their head bashed in over this, but now the friggin unkillable man is here everything just got loads worse, hell this is going to be bad.

50 to 1 keter is behind this.

Liliet

I'll take that.

It's a perfectly natural self-brewing disaster. The Dead King is utterly unnecessary to villains and heroes getting along like a house on literal fire, lots of it.

Oshi

Don't discount the Bard...this has all the trappings of politics mixed with story shenanigans. It's totally within the Bard's wheelhouse. Doesn't even have to do much but delay the White Knight long enough to force Catherine to do some harsh shit.

Tohron

Question is, does the Bard actually want Catherine to alienate a bunch of people right now? We haven't seen anything of her since the Auger undermined her long-term plan and Neshamah decided to take the opportunity to go for the kill. If she's as desperate as seems to be the case, then she can't really afford to do anything that doesn't weaken the Dead King's position somehow.

caoimhinh

On the other hand, the Bard doesn't like Catherine's changing of the game. She didn't even like Amadeus and Alaya's changing of it, and theirs was less reaching and lasting than the change Catherine is bringing.

This might be one of those situations where the 3rd party says "I want Party 1 to win, but not by too much. I want them wounded and tired after defeating Party 2". The Intercessor might be on board with the Grand Alliance killing Neshamah, but not with them creating a new way in which Heroes and Villains interact on Calernia. She would be rooting for it to collapse right after ending the Dead King.

Miles

She's not so shortsighted as to allow the dead King a chance to win just to make sure Catharine doesn't also win.

Shveiran

She may be farsighted enough to aim for a greater victory, though: a Calernia that defeats the Dead King, but whose Grand Alliance has already sown the seeds of its defeat, so that the game may resume as it was.

If that's what she wants.

We don't really know.

Jago

It all depends on how her Name works.
If it is linked to Celernia she would want it to endure and she doesn't want it to change, as both things can damage her.
If her Name doesn't depend on Celernia's existence, sacrificing it so that some non-regional power would intervene and fight the DK could be acceptable for her.
Black said that of all the nations in Celernia only the Dwarves aren't a regional power. Maybe he hadn't included the DK in that, but probably there are stronger powers than the DK around the world.

Liliet

Why do people act like story shenanigans just don't happen when Bard isn't there?

They do. She's just one player, and she's a player with a pretty specific agenda, which we know about and which this does not match.

(The agenda is "kill DK")

Shveiran

And we know that because...?

Bard is an enigma wrapped in a mystery.
If anything, we KNOW that the Bard's agenda is not JUST killing DK, or Neshamah would not be convinced he "needs but to tell them" to have the people of Calernia choose him over the Bard.

The WB reply to that wasn't "you are deluded", it was "yeah, but I'll kill this part of you so no one will actually find out".

Heck, bard is older than DK. I really doubt she had no goal prior to his ascension.
She may WANT the DK gone, but that is not the sum whole of her.

Liliet

Bard's method of killing him, as he understood, involved the angel weapon that was apparently THAT destructive.
Painted Knife is currently checking that out with her band.

And if he was wrong about how bad people of Calernia would find it, well, why would she disabuse him of the notion?

dadycool

I had more fun reading this chapter than I have in a long time. I never realized how much I missed the Woe being together. Masego is a joy to be around, especially with the others to bounce off of. Of course, the same applies to the rest, like Cat and Hakram discussing how they would go about storming the castle. Or how he was able to read her like a book. A few chapters ago, I expressed worry about the five of them reuniting, but I had forgotten. This chapter and the way it reminded me what the Woe really is makes the hells that are about to be unleashed worth it.

Wonder

Dun Dun Dun!!!!!!! We have a potentially messy situation on our hands.

Cat is going to grow into her Name very soon if the Mirror Knight is here.

About the Name, does she get a transitional one like Squire or she gets a full blown mature Name?

Also what flavour is her Name going to take considering she is a priestess(wielder of prayers and miracles)

, queen (dueling with words and maneuvering political minefields) and Warlord(crushing armies with steel and goblinfire, leading an army herself)

Insanenoodlyguy

She will get a full name for all of those reasons. She's too big, too center stage.

Miles

She'll be the Harried Diplomat.

Or maybe the Short Conqueror

Cicero

You are all missing the obvious:

Insanenoodlyguy

Oh hell, your not wrong. That's his part in the story. He's going to have to make a big ass call before this is done.

Wonder

I am hoping Cat gets aspects that can create simulacrums of her, that she can use as goat bombs.

It will be nice to see her get Seek back. Something tells me the odd way her necromancy works is important.

Mental Mouse

> I am hoping Cat gets aspects that can create simulacrums of her,

Cat: "What I really need is a way to be in three places at once!"

Name Inchoate: Can do!

Mith

If this happens are we able to say that she is heavily Mirroring the Wandering Bard?

- Cannot die (especially if she gets a simulacrum abilities)
- Commits to a cause above all else
- Manipulates forces on both sides of the Board.
- Massively cross cultural influence

Mammon

I think that Cat would balk at getting such a power. For a Hero it could be great, but a Villain with metasense would know it's a death trap. It's not quite as debilitating as having your minions wear face-covering masks or helmets, but having more than one of yourself greatly diminishes your Story weight and power.

That simulacrum might be very powerful compared to normal people, but if a Hero has trouble fighting it the first time and then defeats it the second time, it's pretty much a stepping stone bringing them closer to defeating the real deal. Doubly so because the connection to fighting and defeating the simulacrum would give Story weight points for the Hero to defeat Cat, while being easier to defeat than the real deal because it's not the real deal, and stringing a Story that will see to Cat's defeat despite Cat herself never having met the Hero face to face. The way that Providence doesn't play fair, it probably doesn't even need to have the Hero be in the same room during the Villain wins first act to create a narrative aimed at killing her and strengthening the Hero when they do face Cat.

Burlyraven

There are a lot of stories gathering in one place here. This is the kind of situation where the impossible and the unfortunate tend to happen.

Also, yay to dead rapists! Boo to political manipulations!

Frivolous

So we're all agreeing that this will result in a fight, yes? Because, as everyone knows, the MK is a very undiplomatic Proceran, and his talents are all in the physical in general and physical combat in particular, which means his usual solution to everything is to hit it.

In other news: Does anyone know how to contact erraticerrata privately, without using Patreon and/or becoming a Patreon patron?

ninegardens

Can't answer the second question... but something of potential note:

It has been hypothesized (can't remember when), that Mirror Knight was created by above as a direct counter to Sve Noc. Given that Cat is an agent of the great Svees, this may be a problem.

Frivolous

I have a terrible, awful idea: The Mirror Knight might have come to kill everyone else in the Arsenal and claim all its magics for the greater good of Procer.

I mean, it fits, right? He really can kill everyone else, and he's too useful to be sent away from the front lines for anything but this, a hostile takeover.

Plus I don't believe he can leave any witnesses alive, because the White Knight would eventually find out if he did. Hanno would never countenance mass murder of their allies, but Christophe could, because he really is that stupid.

If I'm correct, then the next several updates will be like the Alien movie, only instead of being hunted by an indestructible horrible xenomorph, they'll be hunted by an indestructible handsome patriotic bigot.

TeK

Nah, he isn't that stupid.

ninegardens

>If I'm correct, then the next several updates will be like the Alien movie, only instead of being hunted by an indestructible horrible xenomorph, they'll be hunted by an indestructible handsome patriotic bigot.

This is hilarious. I don't actually believe its a thing, but its hilarious.

There's also the point that like... MK is tough, but... they are literally hiding inside Masego's personal realm effectively.

Heck, I'm not even sure that Sve Noc has any power here. My estimate is that in Arsenal, Masego is large and in charge.

Mental Mouse

Not only is he not that stupid (see his response to that attempt to suborn him in bed), but even those who might have sent him have to be smarter than "take all the magic weapons... and kill the unique characters folks who made and maintain them".

Sun Dog

I'm going with "he somehow heard there was a brawl between Named and rushed over to make sure the good guys won."

Rustndusty

He can't kill any heroic witnesses without Hanno finding out either.

Insanenoodlyguy

If he started killing a place stocked with innocent civilians and heroes just to make a poorly thought out power grab, he'd A. Stop being a hero, even if the name doesn't change, and B. Would ensure his death.

An isolated area, no easy way in or out, and an unstoppable lunatic is stalking the halls killing everybody he can. You just made this a horror. But that's the kind of horror that MAKES heroes, let alone puts already established ones in the situation. We have a small army of "last survivors" here! Even if a few of them fall to set things up, this is absolutely the sort of story where at least one survivor kills the lunatic and lives, and is more likely going to shift into a group victory with a healthy number of mook unnamed mages killed so Mirror Knight can spout a few horrible lines before they scooby-doo trap his ass. Nah, Sun dog has it right. He has the much simpler idea of "Make sure my side 'wins' this." .

Javvies

Eh, I've always thought that the Mirror Knight is more likely to be intended to go after Ranger than Sve Noc. For that matter, I'm not sure where the idea that he'd be intended to go after Sve Noc even came from.

His Dawn Aspect makes him little bit stronger and tougher every day, and even Saint said that in 10 years he'd be on her level.

Ranger gets better all the time, but her rate of improvement is very slight these days.

Mirror Knight gets better all the time but much faster, so even though he's starting out from real far behind, he gets to close the gap.

> Trustworthy was unlikely to be the problem with Hanno arranging for someone to stand in his place. Even the worst pricks on his side of the fence tended to be at least well-meaning. I'd guess that the trouble had been finding someone who wouldn't pull a blade on a fresh villain or talk in a way that got a blade pulled on them instead.

As for that, "trustworthy" is exactly the problem. Trust is about many things, including self-restraint and competence. Someone who can't be trusted to keep their blade and tongue in the scabbard while recruiting a villain, is not someone who should be recruiting.

And yes, this is totally a pivot – three conflicts presented at once, and the Mirror Knight showing up to match the Black Queen, that's a hut full of goblinfire waiting for a match.

Liliet

Yep, different kinds of trust: in one's intent, and in one's judgement -_-

Sun Dog

Eh, you can trust someone generally but not trust them to do a specific task for which they are ill-suited. Cat had to reach to find someone who isn't treacherous, while Hanno is surrounded by righteous face-stabbers he 100% trusts to have his back in battle, to the very gates of Keter, but who aren't the best pick for delicate diplomatic things like indicting new villains.

Liliet

Oh this is brewing up to be an UTTERLY DELIGHTFUL clusterfuck.

If I'm lucky, this won't even turn out to have been orchestrated or even nudged along by either of the Evil antagonist: no Dead King, no Malicia, entirely natural dynamics of trying to get villains and heroes to work together 😊

God I love grown-up Masego... god I love Masego learning physical affection... (also still aro af lmao, his favorite cousin gets the same treatment as his girlfriend) god I love Catherine being huggy... god I love Roland... god I love his dynamic with Masego... god I love Cat bantering with Hakram... god I love Super Cool Magic Defenses nerdery.... ;u;

Oshi

The whole natural dynamics thing smacks of Bard interference. I've been smelling a rat since the MK was mentioned as sleeping with a Procern princess.

Liliet

Why? What do you think is off about that without Bard involved?

Shveiran

Personally, I don't.

I just think it's odd that Bard has no stake in this cake after being so active before, and now she has been silent for two years. The Painted Knife is coming back with her big secret (allegedly) I can't imagine she'll sit this one out.

Also, it's the last book. At least one between DK and WB will be involved.

Considering EE usually has three arcs, I find it more likely WB will appear than not.

Liliet

True enough.

justsomeguy

I can't wait for Cat to get her Name already.

caoimhinh

"The demimondes allowed entry to our little house of wonders didn't count."

Of course, why keep a supremely secure location that could decide the fate of the continent, if you are not allowed to bring hookers inside?

Nothing could go wrong there, right?

Also, I bet it was the Haunted Magician who told Masego about kissing both cheeks in greeting. Both Indrani and Catherine looked very surprised at the gesture, so it must be new. Plus, that's a Proceran gesture (if I recall correctly, one of the Interludes showed Otto Redcrown mentally complaining about the Kingfisher Prince's tendency of using that greeting), and the Haunted Magician is a handsome Proceran Villain who Indrani noted to be a womanizer, so it would fit.

if someone who is an accomplished Mage and successful with women gave Masego a piece of advice, then it would be in Zeze's character to at least test it out (he seemed pleased by Cat's reaction, too).

Sanctus Obscurum

"The Mirror Knight gathered his bearings, then started in surprise when he caught sight of me. I ought to have been the one surprised, really: after all, he was meant to be voting right now."

We are behind Ward currently, this must not stand.

ThatOneGuy

Complicated mess at its best. At the base of is a hero killing a rapist murdered who did both to her home. She would probably be given a pass due to her ability to mess with magic and having a good reason.

Problem is politics. Team "hero" is standing by her and throwing their weight in with it as they give a few villains a few strikes because they are villains or they just do not like them. They have reason, but none of them good ones.

Like artifice and our favorite mage. Petty conflict with flash of egos, but not important enough to make a conflict or to murder one another. Still they will add their weight saying it is discrimination against heroes because villains are being evil.

Mirror Knight on the other hand is... A gullible idiot. Important enough to be the next Grand Hero after white knight, but lacks political awareness for the more political minds to feed him a "good vs evil" line to justify what they want and why he should back them... Instead of it actually being "petty and greedy" which would fly over his head.

So yes... I see mirror knight as the well meaning, but easily tricked hero and someone on team politics thought to bring him there knowing what would happen when a certain hero and a certain villain would meet.

Maybe not Evil with a capital E... But political jerk with the moral center of a rapid hyena. Good is good while it lines the pockets and weakens the enemy. Those who had yet to become the enemy just need to be weakened before they are declared.

Say what you want about the undead king... You have to admire how he managed to get rid of most of the political problems that normally infest most places.

laguz24

Yes, being a living god and turning all of your closest allies into undead does have that effect.

Cicero

My thought is that the best way to handle it is to de-escalate from being a hero villain thing to a simple revenge killing.

"Oh, okay, you killed him because he raped you. That means it's not a hero purging villain thing. Hanno what is the punishment for murder when the murderer was raped by the murderer?"

"Hmm... the punishment for murder is death, but when the murderer was a victim like this the penalty is reduced. X Years of hard labor."

"Okay good. Red Axe you are now Cordelia's slave until your sentence is completed, you don't get any of the benefits of being a Chosen either."

I don't know, something like that.

Shveiran

You are trying to paint this as something other than a T&T breach to find a better solution.

IMO, this won't work because whatever else this is, it is ALSO a major breach of the T&T. All its signee will be watching. Finding an out of the box solution leaning on something other from the T&T won't work.

It doesn't matter whether or not the solution makes sense if you squint or change your perspective: it won't be enough when everyone considers this a test of the T&T primarily.

And the T&T were always bound to be simple, given what they were meant to achieve, so I wouldn't hold my breath for "sexual assault" clauses and exceptions. It isn't a code of laws, it's a treaty cobbled together during the largest nightmare war of the millennia.

Morgenstern

Maybe it's high time then that they DO get some clauses/exceptions, if they are meant to work after said war as well 😊

Javvies

They're not. Not really.

The Truce and Terms are a measure to get everyone pointed at the Dead King and working more or less together without any real backstabbing for the duration of the war, probably plus a little extra.

They're also intended to lay the groundwork and foundations and serve as a trust building measure for the negotiation and implementation of the Accords after the war is over.

The Truce and Terms are not a permanent measure – they are by nature finite in duration. They're a stopgap measure to hold off the emergency and to allow a longer term solution to be put into place after the crisis is over.

Mental Mouse

Mirror Knight may be earnest, but I suspect dismissing him as an idiot would be a Mistake.

laguz24

Ok, here is where things are beginning to pick up speed. I really just can't wait for MK to get slapped around verbally by the crows, he deserves it.

RoflCat

Well, given that there's at least 1 Drow listening to him and that princess from Procer, I think it might be... 'interesting' to hear what the Crows might say to him.

"Only your hardness is worth appreciating"
"She was pretending to enjoy it" etc.

Insanenoodlyguy

I'll call it now. Bard has been hanging back after Cat's warning, no doubt deciding the next time her presence could be seen it was gonna be something big.

This is now far too much FUBAR to be coincidence. The odds are too long now. This is a big ol story powder keg and I suspect she's holding the fuse and a match.

ohJohN

Last chapter, when Severance/Severity was introduced and Masego was thinking about who could survive wielding it, my first thought was: Mirror Knight, obviously! His whole thing is taking abuse, Cat describes him as nigh unkillable. Masego even speculated about special armor that could allow someone to withstand the blade, and MK conveniently already has special armor!

Him showing up unexpectedly soon after sure smells like story shenanigans, too, and "a newly forged weapon that could turn the tide of the war, if only someone could wield it" is definitely a big story.

Morgenstern

Yup. My first thought as to who might wield it as well.

superkeaton

Uhoh.

Mental Mouse

>“Archer arrived two days past with her full band and the Red Axe,” the Rogue Sorcerer replied. “Which brings us at seventeen – eighteen with you, Catherine.”

Hakram: “<clears throat>”

Mirror Knight: “O Hai.”

Mental Mouse

The question is what number is significant here – 20, as a round score? 21, as three sevens?

An army of five teams of five would be pretty wild too.

Morgenstern

What’s significant is that the Rogue (or the author) seemingly forgot to count HAKRAM as a Named, too. Because if they were 17 before Cat arriving – it should be 19 after her arrival, seeing as she brought Hakram Deadhand with her, directly on her toes.

Mental Mouse

That’s noticable (thus my prior comment), but perhaps understandable – firstly, Hakram is currently doing the “shadow at Cat’s back” thing, which would tend to make him socially invisible like many another secretary or assistant. Then too, he’s a non-human, and it wouldn’t be surprising if RS has some unconscious racism happening – which would feed directly into looking past Cat’s assistant.

sengachi

You know, it is oddly inspiring to see a Proceran putting petty ambition above bigotry. Because that really is a big way that you get political winds to shift around bigotry, with situations that ensure ladder-climbing less-than-saintly politicians get more out of leaving the bigotry at the door than they do trumpeting it.

Dresdenflame

Point of order, we don’t know that she’s older than DK, just that she was alive around the same time he was

Timothy Nemet

If I recall correctly she was around prior to the Dead King. As she had knowledge of the immortal civilizations that existed and stagnated prior to the Gods implementing Humanity to play their games.

Mental Mouse

If you're talking about the Wandering Bard, I'm pretty sure we've seen explicit statements that she was already old and experienced when DK reached apotheosis.

Timothy Nemet

Hey All I have a question regarding Masego/Hieorphant in this chapter.

I thought his magic was destroyed, so how was he able to hang the arsenal in between Twilight and Creation without it?

Is it named shenanigans, something else, or did I forget some key plot point?

Mental Mouse

His sorcery was destroyed, he still has his Name, and a collection of miracles to play with.

Chapter 14: Audience

"To boast of an opinion unchanged is to boast of wearing child's clothing."

– Atalantian saying

The Mirror Knight's appearance had me surprised, but the three other Named that followed him out pushed that over the edge and into consternation.

One of those I was already familiar with: the Blade of Mercy's youth and greatsword would have made him memorable enough even if I'd not once ripped out his arm to throw it in another hero's face as a distraction. Another Alamans, like the Mirror Knight, and one who'd strenuously argued against the Terms before they were forced through with the Pilgrim and the White Knight's backing. The other two took me a moment to place, as I'd only ever heard of them through reports. But heard of them I had, and they were not unknown quantities. Short, stocky and painted in colours that belonged to no Blood, the Exalted Poet looked like he belonged in a Dominion shield wall instead of the pleasure palaces of Levante he was said to have been conscripted from. Archer had mentioned to me he'd once been among the Hidden Poets, some highly prestigious Levantine society of poets and singers, until he'd somehow touched upon some truth of the Heavens through his words. Yet for all that he did not wield Light – he was a spellcaster, if a middling one, and likely how the band had come through.

The last of the four was a Callowan, though she wasn't one of mine in any sense. She'd allegedly fled in the early years after the Conquest, and she was the only one who did not openly consider herself one of Above's champions. The Maddened Keeper looked instead like a perennially exhausted woman in her early twenties, skin drawn and pale and her dark hair ratty. Her threadbare robes ever rumpled and she was thin, but there was a sense of... menace about her. Not like a snake coiling but rather like a diseased thing, the sight of which had you withdraw your hand out of fear and disgust. She was host, it was rumoured, to a great many old secrets that should have stayed unknown – and had even turned herself into a living seal on a Hell Egg from Triumphant's days. After the Mirror Knight himself she was the one of that bunch I'd be most wary of fighting. I knew from personal experience that one didn't rub elbows with entities on the darker side of the fence without learning some rather nasty tricks.

"Mirror Knight," I said, tone cool. "I was under the impression your duties kept you in Cleves."

Adjutant fell on my left side to cover by bad leg, as naturally as taking a breath, and he did not need to reach for a blade for the heroes to tense. Christophe, for that was the Mirror Knight's name, looked as surprised to see me as I was to see him. The Blade of Mercy's hands closed around the handle of his greatsword so strongly the metal creaked as he stared me down with pale eyes and clenched teeth. I was meant to be respectable, these days, so I refrained from asking him how his arm was doing. The Poet looked calm, and had even warily stepped away from the Blade, but the Maddened Keeper was looking at me blearily through the long strands of her ratty hair.

"And I was under the impression I need not answer to you, Black Queen," the Mirror Knight replied, back straightening.

"Christophe, you speak to the anointed queen of Callow," the Rogue Sorcerer mildly said. "Have you forgotten your courtesies?"

Roland had stepped between myself and the newcomers, while I was studying them, and though he seemed calm I recognized the tension to his stance from the last time he and I had been in a mess together. He'd not known about this either, then. I'd not expected him to, but these days my trust came slower and died more swiftly than ever before. The world had gotten larger, the older I got, and ever more complex. There were fewer certainties left in my life than I'd like. To my surprise, Roland's admonishment actually seemed to strike true with the Mirror Knight. A flicker of something like regret passed across his face, and the man offered me what a generous soul might call a bow.

"That was not one of the usual portals," Masego suddenly said, voice cutting through the room. "And there is more coming."

The glass eyes beneath the cloth were staring at what I would have thought to be nothingness, but then I was not the Hierophant. There were only three other Named with Christophe, I noted once more. I'd thought him one short of a band of five, and that a good sign, but was he really?

"What are you doing here, Mirror Knight?" I asked, tone grown colder. "The Arsenal is not a hostel anyone can visit when the whim strikes. Explain yourself."

My gaze swept by the armoured hero and onto the rest of his companions, flat and unfriendly.

"That question stands for the rest of you," I said. "Two of you ought to be in Cleves, and the —"

"Hooves," the Maddened Keeper suddenly said. "Someone rides."

My brow rose. That implied whatever was coming was not with them, which only further added to my confusion. Supplies, maybe? There would be carriages and wagons for those. It should be too early for it to be my own, though I supposed time did tend to get rather fluid when it came to places like this. No telling what it was.

"You tneed to ask why I am here, Queen of Faithlessness?" the Mirror Knight sneered. "Fine, play your games if you must. I am here to prevent the murder you've plotted."

The what now? Wait, was he talking about the way Prince Gaspard of Cleves might bargain himself into a slit throat if he didn't curb his ambitions? Because I'd not even begun to pursue that, choosing instead to delay until I spoke with the First Prince before beginning to act.

"Have we been plotting murder?" Masego asked, sounding a little bemused. "People never tell me these things. You should write more often, Catherine."

I closed my eyes and sighed. The last part was probably true, I'd give him that at least.

"See, even the Hierophant admits it," the Blade of Mercy triumphed. "A murder here in the Arsenal, where no word will escape of it—"

"This is absurd," Roland flatly said, "and beneath you as well, Antoine. Are we now nothing more than a pack of street thugs throwing around wild accusations? We set down rules to address suspicions like the one you have brought, and swore to follow them."

"Va te faire foutre, Sorcier," the Blade of Mercy cursed in a hiss. "You might have forgotten the butchery at the Camps so you can get comfortable playing the wizard in your little tower, but we are not all so eager to be bought out of our principles."

"What principles would these be?" Hakram gravelled. "All I see is a handful of Named who were caught breaking agreements and now spin unlikely tales to dig their way out."

"It is no breach of the Terms to come to the Arsenal," the Exalted Poet said in Chantant, and I started at how gorgeous his voice was.

Warm and full-throated, like honey for the ear. I could understand why he'd never had to work a day in his life, with a voice like that: people would have thrown coppers at him just to hear him list out the chores of the day.

"That may be true. Lacing your voice with sorcery when speaking to other Named is, however," Hierophant said, tone gone icy.

The warmth left me, gone as if by a snap of the finger. I frowned, eyeing the Poet rather more warily than before.

"Who throws wild accusations now?" the Blade of Mercy said.

"Keep your lackeys in hand, Black Queen," the Mirror Knight ordered me. "This is disgraceful."

My fingers clenched around my staff of yew.

"What," I asked very gently, "did you just say to me?"

"Did I perhaps stutter?" the Mirror Knight smiled.

I breathed out, mastered the frozen vicious thing that was roaring in my veins. At seventeen, you arrogant little shit, I would have answered that sword in hand. But now I had responsibilities, and no matter how fucking satisfying it would be to make the prick spit out his teeth it would also be a major incident. The Truce and the Terms, I knew, would already be stretched to a breaking point by the killing of a villain no matter how the matter was resolved. If the representative for Below's lot assaulted the most famous Proceran hero alive the same week, they might just snap. I told myself this again and again until the anticipation of that smirking jackass bleeding from the mouth had left my knuckles, and only then spoke again.

"Under the Terms, I judge your presence here to be suspect and your behaviour needlessly provocative," I said, voice cool. "You will be held under guard until the White Knight is here to speak on your behalf."

Outrage was the answer, and the Blade of Mercy laughed scornfully, but I was not finished,

"Set your weapons down on the ground, right now," I said. "All of you. You will use neither sorcery, Light nor Name until it is made explicitly clear to you it is permissible once more."

"I did not mean to breach the Terms," the Exalted Poet said, raising his hands, "and will not add further insult to the injury."

The voice was just as gorgeous as before, I thought, but it wasn't so... attention-grabbing anymore. Huh, interesting. A little like fae glamour, then? That made him an odd duck compared to the usual Dominion lot, who rarely resorted to tricks on the more subtle side.

"You bloody coward," the Blade of Mercy swore. "Have you no pride?"

"Roland," the Mirror Knight gravely said, "did you not hear her speak? Hear the threat she threw at our feet like challenger's glove?"

The Rogue Sorcerer's face was a blank mask.

"If Hanno had given the order to a group of Named, I would have backed him without hesitation," Roland replied. "Christophe, swallow your damned pride for an hour. It is not worth what your swaggering threatens to bring down upon all our heads. I do not know what brings you here, but I have been here all this time and I tell you now that you are mistaken."

The Mirror Knight hesitated. I kept my mouth shut, even though by all fucking rights in the eyes of Gods and crowns just my giving the order here should have been enough, because I was not so enamoured of my pride that I'd knife a method that seemed to be working.

"It was a villain that was slain," Roland continued, "and-"

"See," the Blade of Mercy spat, "see? It is exactly as we learned. Some wizard rapist got nothing more than he deserved and now they would slay a Chosen in cold blood for it."

"And how did you learn this, I wonder?" Adjutant asked, voice calm.

"Orcs have-" the Blade of Mercy began-

"Finish that sentence," I mildly said. "And I will have to answer it."

I met his eyes, pale blue, and idly ran a finger just to the side of my shoulder. About where I'd ripped his out with my bare hands, the last time we'd fought. The boy flinched, until his eyes glowed with Light and he leaned forward instead.

"Answer the Adjutant's question, Christophe," Roland said. "Something is afoot."

"I will not unmask our friend in these walls so that you might silence them and hide the next sin from our eyes," the Mirror Knight harshly replied. "Queen you might be, Catherine Foundling, but you are no queen of mine."

Was I supposed to be stung by that? I sometimes pitied Cordelia Hasenbach for the fact that the blunders of her nation's heroes inevitably reflected on her and counted my blessings that the closest thing to a hero I had to answer for was Vivienne Dartwick. Once in a while, I supposed, I did get a stroke of luck.

"I didn't ask you to kneel," I said. "But I did ask you to put your fucking sword on the ground, Christophe. I can't help but notice you haven't even managed that much."

"And what will you do, if I do not deign to indulge you?" the man smirked.

"Do not think," I softly said, "that I will not beat some sense into your empty head, if you leave me no other choice."

"What do I have to fear of Night?" the Mirror Knight chuckled. "Perhaps this is for the best, yes? Too long have better souls tread softly around your pride for fear of your power. You are in dire need of a--"

I'd have to aim it carefully, to finish it one blow. Just tossing Night around like some Secret-drunk ispe wouldn't do anything, the man had survived being submerged in acid with only light discomfort. The trick to it would be-- "Hooves," the Maddened Keeper sighed. "I told you."

The portal's opening was silent, though the shiver of power was not. A rider came through, leaning low against the neck of the horse to avoid hitting their head, and there was no missing the power wafting off of them. Another one?

"Weeping Heavens," I swore, throwing up my hands. "Is this a secret magic fortress or a bloody fish market?"

"We do have ponds," Masego helpfully told me in a whisper, "and some of them have fish."

"Thank you, Masego," I sighed. "But the fish weren't the point of the comparison."

"It's not a very good comparison, then," he informed me.

I did not answer that, because I had better things to do and also I couldn't think of anything that'd be a match for that serious earnestness he'd spoken with. For a moment, looking at the rider straightening in the saddle, I was genuinely unsure whether I was looking at a man or a woman. But then I caught sight of the ornate kingfishers carved into the armour and put one and one together. Frederic Goethal, the Prince of Brus. More importantly, the Kingfisher Prince: the only ruler Named in Procer I'd ever heard about outside old legends. Prince Frederic, I decided as I took in the perfect blond hair, slender jaw and fair skin, was ridiculously pretty. The mass of ribbons in his hair would have looked ridiculous, I thought, if a closer look did not reveal they were purple and silver. The Dead King's banners, torn up and made into vain ornaments.

The Prince of Brus had style, I had to give him that.

"My, it seemed I've stumbled onto quite the assembly," Prince Frederic laughed. "I dare not claim it was sent for on my behalf."

Eyes just a little too sharp for me to find them beautiful lingered on me, and the Prince of Brus offered me a theatrical bow from atop his horse.

"Queen Catherine, I must say it is a fine pleasure to meet you in person at last," he said. "I am, one might say, an admirer of your work up in Hainault."

The heroes I'd been about to draw on looked utterly befuddled by a Named prince of Procer quite literally riding into the middle of the confrontation. It calmed the waters some, took the edge off the stormy urgency everyone had been feeling in their air.

"I hear good things of you from my people, Prince Frederic," I replied, meaning every word. "Or do you prefer your Name instead?"

"There is less difference between one and the other than I would have thought," the man mused. "But Frederic is all I would require of you, Queen of Callow."

"How forward," I said, smothering a grin, but did not outright deny him.

It was just an Alamans thing, the grandiose manners and bold suggestions, but it was still flattering in its own way. Dismounting smoothly, the Prince of Brus set foot on the stone and offered a sweeping bow to the rest of the Named here.

"I am Frederic of the House of Goethal, Prince of Brus," he introduced himself.

"Did we invade that?" I heard Masego ask Hakram in a whisper. "He's very polite, if we invaded that."

"We haven't," Hakram replied in a whisper. "Too far north. And technically speaking we never invaded Procer. We were invited into Iserre by Prince Amadis Milenan."

"Oh, I get it," Masego said, tone brightening. "We never killed any Procerans either, we just stabbed them and then an unrelated death ensued. Politics is all about ignoring causality."

I decided, after a moment, to pretend I'd never heard that. The Kingfisher Prince greeted several the other two Proceran heroes by both Name and name, which seemed to rather move them, and charmed his way through introductions with the Poet and the Keeper. Who was, if I was not mistaken, blushing. Roland stood at my side, a rueful look on his face, and shrugged when I raised an eyebrow as if to say, Alamans, what can you do? The glance I traded with Hakram was more laden with meaning. Retreat, I asked him with my eyes, or press forward? He studied the heroes and the Prince of Brus for a moment, then nodded. Forward, he was saying. I was inclined to agree. Though in principle the Mirror Knight and the Blade of Mercy were of equal standing to the Kingfisher Prince, in matters of Truce and Terms at least, the way they behaved spoke differently. They were deferring, treating the man a superior whether they were conscious of it or not.

And I'd been around Alamans long enough now to learn that their culture frowned on making a scene when a superior was there to see. The trait was even more pronounced in highborn, who would be expected to 'remain graceful' to the extent that they'd have to face even an utter disaster with a smile and a pithy phrase instead of genuine emotion. It galled me that I'd have to use someone authority's as well as my own, but not so much that I wouldn't actually do it. I stepped into the circle, Hakram and Masego trailing behind, inserting myself into the ongoing conversation.

"- it was the of the Bitter Blacksmith's make as it happens, though not the one here," the Prince of Brus said, touching the sword at his hip with a smile. "The younger brother of the pair. His blades are in high demand, and Revenants have learned to fear their sight."

"I am sure that stories would be best traded in comfortable a place than this room," I said. "Your horse will need stabling as well, Prince Frederic."

"Every time title is used, Queen Catherine, my heart breaks a little more," the man said, hand over his heart.

"Frederic, then," I smiled, against my own better judgement, but the mirth went away as I turned to the four unexpected guests. "As was discussed earlier, your unexpected presence at the Arsenal means you'll have to remand yourself to the custody the guards until the White Knight can be scryed. I expect you've no issue with this?"

"None at all, Black Queen," the Exalted Poet immediately conceded.

"A place with little light, please," the Maddened Keeper said. "Queen of Lost and Found."

My eyes narrowed as I looked at the haggard woman. That was not one of my better-known titles, much less by someone who should not have ever gone anywhere the Firstborn. This one was worth keeping an eye on. I smiled at the Mirror Knight and the Blade of Mercy, who were both doing poorly at hiding their anger. But they were only two against many, and likely to disgrace themselves in everyone's eyes if they fought back against my very reasonable request.

"Of course," the Mirror Knight said. "We will do what is right."

"We always do," the Blade of Mercy said, looking at me defiantly.

I glanced at Roland, who nodded. I'd trust him with seeing to that, then. I knew not the officers that must be spoken to or the places the heroes would have to be stashed away until Hanno could either free my hands to deal with this mess or deal with it himself.

"I'm sure one of the guards can show you to the stables," I told Frederic Goethal. "I'm afraid I cannot claim the same."

"Every hour parted from you will be a torment," the Prince of Brus assured me, "but I may be able to withstand it, for the promise of a cup of wine shared at a later date?"

"Best you bring the bottle," I told him, tacitly accepting, "I know little of Proceran wines."

Even when it came to Callowan bottles, I only knew so much. Gods, I realized with some amusement, I could name more sorts of liquor than wine.

"A journey of discovery is always a pleasant evening to share, Queen Catherine," the Kingfisher Prince smiled, and with a bow took his leave.

A charmer, that one, I considered. That made him that dangerous, if rather pleasant. The heroes left, until the only ones here in this strange room in this strange place were of the Woe: Masego and Hakram, who I would trust so long as I still had it in me to trust anything at all. I breathed out, then, appreciating how close to fighting this had come. The heroes were bucking the Terms and bucking them hard. Those two Proceran hotheads were trouble, had been from the start, but I'd thought that Hanno's word would be enough to keep them in line. That belief was starting to wane, unfortunately, and if words failed then there was only one way left.

"Fuck," I muttered. "This is going to get worse, isn't it?"

I knew better than to believe house arrest would keep a hero contained. Which meant I now had to take this situation in hand before the fucking idiots broke the agreements that were keeping Named pointed north at Keter instead of squabbling.

"Find me a room I can receive people in, Zeze," I asked Masego. "And then get me the Hunted Magician."

"Are you not going to settle into your quarters?" Hierophant asked, cocking his head to the side.

"I'll rest when I'm dead," I sighed.

Better that than everyone else dying, I supposed.

"And Hakram-" I began.

"I'll see what bottles I can rustle up," the orc agreed.

Ah, Adjutant, that prince among men. What would I do without him?

I'd expected to end up in a glorified scholar's nook, but perhaps that'd been naïve of me. After all the Arsenal had been built on the Grand Alliance's gold with the understanding that it would be receiving some of the finest minds from three nations as well as packs of Named. Moreover, for something like the Mirage – that great enchanted room that'd been sold to me as the sorcerous step beyond scrying – to be worth making, there would have to be fitting accommodations for the few people on Calernia that would actually be allowed to use that room. That meant that an entire wing of the Arsenal, named the Alcazar, had been built for that purpose. There were luxurious private quarters, there, and private dining rooms, but also the kind of parlour where a prince or a queen could receive important guests away from prying ears.

Masego had cut me loose in the wing after bringing me there, admitting he was less than familiar with the place and so of limited use, and instead gone off to find the Hunted Magician. The attendants here, though, had sorted me out. I'd requested something 'intimate', which was what rich people called small, since I'd not brought a household with me and the villain I was going to receive was both Proceran and mostly likely highborn. Better the lack of personal attendants be taken as preference for privacy than an admission I'd simply not brought any. Or had any, to be honest. Even when I'd spent most my time in Laure, I'd kept a rather modest house by royal standards. Enough that Anne Kendall had once praised me for my frugality, and that thought had me reaching for the bottle of aragh that Hakram had somehow gotten his hands on.

I'd been a while since I'd last thought of the once Baroness of Dormer, who'd been my Governess-General and died so senselessly in the Night of Knives. Her and people dearer to me, like Ratface, whose death Malicia would one day answer for.

I gulped down the thimble I'd filled, the roaring warmth of the Taghrebi liquor spreading down my throat, and leaned back into the cushiony Proceran sofa I'd claimed as my seat. The parlour was not large, two sofas and a low table taking up the greater part of the room while service tables and tapestries took up the rest. It would serve for my purposes, as would the bottle of aragh set on that nice polished table along with one wet thimble and one still dry. Adjutant stood behind my seat, to the side, since he was here as my second and not a villain his own right. I'd not expected for Masego to return with the Hunted Magician, since he'd see little point in walking back and forth the Arsenal for courtesies he only dimly paid attention to, so I was not surprised when it was only the Magician that was announced by attendants. The man was ushered in, and as he bowed I took the time to study the man that Hierophant's indifference to matters of status had allowed to become chief among the villains of the Arsenal.

Nearing or past thirty, I decided, well-dressed in fine robes but leaning towards the practical – and I did mean well dressed, not richly dressed, which smelled of nobility to me. Good-looking and well-groomed, the stubble on his face sculpted, he was dark of hair and his eyes straddled the line between grey and blue. No one knew his name, only his Name, and the mystery around him had so far remained inscrutable. He cleaned up nicely, I thought, but that wasn't why I kept staring at him. There was something about the Hunted Magician, something strangely familiar. It was on the tip of my tongue and it was irritating me I couldn't quite spell it out.

"Queen Catherine, it is my honour," the Hunted Magician said, bowing respectfully.

I stared at him, some part of me feeling like I could just order him to kneel and he would. The certainty of that thought was what surprised me, because there was no room for so much as the shadow of a doubt in it and that was not something that came upon me often. Not anymore, thank the Gods. And just like that, it fell into place.

"Oh," I said, "you poor dumb bastard. Which Court is it that you sold your name to?"

The man twitched, then looked at me what I could only call naked fear. I was almost surprised Masego hadn't noticed it, but then I supposed that was not he part of fae nature Hierophant was familiar with: he'd studied fae, made use of them, but he'd never felt that power coursing through his veins. He knew it like a rider knew a horse, while I knew it like the horse knows the stride.

"I-" the Hunted Magician began, mouth gone dry. "I do not know what you mean, Your Majesty."

"I can smell it, Magician," I said. "They've still got a claim on you, and a debt like that can be pulled at by more than the true debtor. Can't be Summer, or I'd feel like smashing your skull open, and if it was Winter you would have physically balked at lying to me. So, which is it: Autumn or Spring?"

"It is true, then," he quietly said. "You were, for a time, queen amongst the Fae."

"I scavenged that crown," I said, "and it ever sat ill on my brow. I was glad to be rid of it. Answer my question, Hunted Magician."

I did not Speak – I'd lost the talent when I ceased being the Squire, and my new Name was not so close to coalescing that I could call on old tricks – but he shivered anyway. There was an echo of power there that had a call on him, much as he would like to deny it.

"Autumn," the villain answered. "It was Autumn I bargained with."

And you use Maviii runes that not even Masego can seem to figure it out, I thought, so I don't really need to ask what you bargained for, do I? Ancient knowledge seemed a petty thing to sell your name for, but then that'd never been my calling.

"Good," I smiled. "Then I have a use for you, Magician."

"I have evaded the eye of the Prince of Falling Leaves, remaining free of eternal servitude," the Hunted Magician angrily said, "I'll not suffer the yoke of the Black Queen instead."

"I'm not going to make you into a puppet," I snorted, "I'm going to speak to Hierophant so that you might be brought in onto a project of ours that the Kingdom of Callow backs above all others. You have the potential to greatly contribute, and so be greatly rewarded."

Masego had been running into trouble proving his Quartered Seasons theory, but if we could bring into the work someone who had a lasting tie to Autumn then doors would open. And I'd just discovered I could squeeze the Hunted Magician rather hard if I felt like it, so I was even fairly comfortable bringing him in. Already my mood was improving.

"That can wait for later, though," I dismissed. "You wanted an audience, Magician. Well, you have it."

I gestured vaguely, inviting him to proceed. The man straightened in his seat.

"The death of the Wicked Enchanter was not happenstance, a stroke of fateful misfortune," the Hunted Magician told me. "This is a plot, Black Queen, and we are all in danger."

Javvies

Or they could be at cross purposes here.
Or Bard could be using Malicia's efforts, helping parts of them along, and twisting the results to some other end.

After all, when it comes to Bard, we really don't know what her actual goals are. Plus, she's basically an instance of bullshit ex machina.

Shveiran

Kinda, yeah.

I can't wait for us to read what Painted Knife found.

beleester

Evidence for the Bard: Plan relies on numerous Named showing up at exactly the wrong place at the wrong time. Plan seems designed to blow up the Truce and Terms which would otherwise limit her control of Named. Malicia no longer has the influence she used to without Scribe.

Evidence for Malicia: Plan seems like it will blow up the Arsenal, the foremost weapon against the Dead King – something that goes against the Bard's interests. Malicia has a history of manipulating Procer to her benefit. Plan apparently relies on sorcery, as the Hunted Magician managed to sniff it out.

I'm leaning towards Malicia, but the sheer number of Named here definitely smells of Bard.

Liliet

You do realize that these Named weren't brought there by Bard, most of them just, like, live there? And that narrativium ensures drama swirls up around Named autonomously, meaning all the problems happening at the same time is basically the law of the universe?

It does not require an agent to bring it together deliberately. Hell, if Bard has a stake in this, half of it might actually be messing with her plan.

Shveiran

There is no guarantee that Bard is involved.

However, as the most esteemed mistress of story-fu and narrative manipulation of her time (which is a long time, I believe it is at the very least a possibility she may be nudging this mess along.

Considering how important the pie is, for good or ill it's almost a given (though not quite a certainty) that she'll be involved: she is bound to have a stake in what happens here, because this will shape what follows and she has a stake in that for certain.

While I acknowledge it is possible she is sitting this one out, or that she will step in to help the lead, I find it more likely that this toxic brew of heroic idiocy and coincidence (two of her usual tools) has been helped along.

If nothing else, because this could have been prevented with subtle interventions before, and wasn't.

Liliet

Note that the whole thing did not in fact break down before, during the previous two years.

Now THAT is almost suspicious, considering the amount of toxicity in the air.

JRogue

We only named two of the three likely individuals capable of both wanting to plot against this and being able to.

The Dead King is the third. He could be manipulating this. Instead of a direct assault on the Arsenal and the Terms he is planting seeds of doubt among the Hero's that already WANT to misunderstand Cat. She said that MK and The Blade were already bucking them.

My bet is still on Bard tho

Shveiran

A possibility.

However, that is something one achieves with talks and dialogue rather than with undeads and rituals.

Considering how hard it was for Squire!Cat and Queen!Cat to get Heroes to talk, I find it unlikely they are entertaining guests from the Serenity while they are at war with it.

All in all, I'd say it's unlikely.

erebus42

Gods Procer really does breed the biggest pricks in Calernia. I wonder whom this particular plot belongs to. It's certainly on brand for Malicia but something makes me think this is someone else's doing.

Insanenoodlyguy

Not counting Bard out yet. This could be shaped into a story of "Well we killed our valuable ally, but we had to, they were evil. Somehow, we will find a way!" which might give them enough inertia to put things back on her track, especially if she can now interfere directly and regularly again.

Liliet

Reminder that “no direct touch” is a limitation that has nothing to do with Cat :3

Insanenoodlyguy

Directly in the sense of “Don’t have to care if anybody knows I was involved in this.” Whereas right now, there’s a hanging threat that if she’s doing something Cat notices and perceives as threatening the T&T she’s going to Dread Empress this situation.

Liliet

That’s not what the metaphysical “no direct touch” limitation is about, that was around long before Cat came around.

Also, she obviously didnt care if anyone knew she was involved with the Liesse Rebellion and Hanno’s band in Free Cities, since both are in fact open information nobody ever kept any kind of secret.

So no, that’s not what that limitation means either.

sengachi

Hmmm. I feel like Catherine might have her Name by the end of this debacle, if just because of meta-narrative logic. There’s only so much space in this book and she’s either likely going to hit all three aspects before the end or get her Name only at the very end.

But that attention being drawn to Chekov’s Gun this chapter (“my new Name was not so close to coalescing that I could call on old tricks”) makes me think her Name isn’t being saved for the very end. And if she’s going to have three aspects by the end of the book she needs to get started now.

So ... Catherine might get Named soon!

I am both really excited by that possibility and enjoying having a story with such explicit in-universe narrative that can make a thought exercise like this feel like a proper part of the story and not just meta stuff.

Mental Mouse

And triggering Catherine’s Name would be very much in the Wandering Bard’s wheelhouse.

Javvies

Well, the Magician is probably right.
The appearance of so many Heroes out of nowhere who are supposed to be on the battlefield, in addition to their foreknowledge of events that even Cat was just hearing about, that's definitely premeditated and planned by somebody. Plus their use of a shortcut entrance ...

The only question is who is responsible for this plot. Or if it's multiple people behind it. And if there's only one agenda in play other than Cat. I suspect that the Kingfisher Prince might not have been put into motion by the same agenda as Mirror Knight and company, because his arrival headed off the imminent fight. This is big enough that Bard almost has to have some kind of connection. The only question is what that connection is.

Darkening

Given his chapter today, I'm pretty certain that the Kingfisher Prince would violently murder anyone that tried to do anything to sabotage the war against the Dead King, so he's probably gonna be an ally of Cat in keeping things from erupting into open war between named.

Javvies

I tend to agree.
From what we know of him and his personality, Frederick knows and recognizes that without Cat and her efforts, he'd be dead and all of his people would be dead, and while he might not mind dying if that's what victory required, he'd really much rather live to see his people prosper and not fail them. I think he's more of a reasonable/practical good, however flamboyant on a personal level. Or, rather, he may be idealistic, but his implementation of his ideals are tempered by realism and pragmatism. And he's definitely fully onboard with the Truce and Terms. Although, he'll probably end up objecting to the no Named Rulers clause that Cat wants in the Accords, but I think he'd be largely in favor of them as well.

I suspect that his arrival was orchestrated by someone/something who doesn't want what Mirror Knight and company are engaged in to work out the way they want it to. But he was presumably on the Lycaonese front ... which makes his arrival even more of a surprise than Mirror Knight, albeit a more pleasant one. Something is definitely up. I suspect Pilgrim might also be on the way, either directly to the Arsenal or to rendezvous with someone else who is already on the way to the Arsenal, perhaps Hanno.

Shveiran

My bet is on Pilgrim being how the Kingfisher got here so soon and at the right time. Ophanim's insights and the Twilight Ways

Liliet

> This is big enough that Bard almost has to have some kind of connection. The only question is what that connection is.

I agree that it would be increasingly odd if at this point Bard did not get drawn into it, but I argue she's not likely to be the origin, if only just for the staggering amount of weight for OTHER points of origin that aren't her.

Javvies

I'm referring to the decidedly suspicious arrival of Mirror Knight and Company plus the Kingfisher Prince.

Everything else that happened prior to their arrival (ie, Red Axe killing Wicked Enchanter and that generating a clusterfuck inside the Arsenal), is something that needs no outside intervention.

But for all of them to show up suddenly, and nigh simultaneously, through a shortcut entrance, and the necessary travel times from where they're supposed to be, plus apparent foreknowledge of events ... that is massively suggestive of third party intervention by at least one entity possessed of the capacity and necessary influence/political capital to get them to move and arrive when they did ... and anyone with that would also need motive.

For that matter, the Kingfisher Prince almost certainly has an agenda at odds with Mirror Knight and company. So he could easily have been sent by someone who became aware of Mirror Knight and company and that agenda who is in opposition to them and their agenda and whomever sent them.

Wandering Bard is basically automatically at the tops of the lists of those who meet any of those criteria, much less all of them. On the other hand, Wandering Bard would also know that Cat's going to be incredibly suspicious ... and that Wandering Bard not fucking things up is enforced by the Grey Pilgrim on penalty of his own death.

Augur could have been responsible for sending the Kingfisher Prince if he's there to support Cat in upholding the Truce and Terms, as seems likely. Augur would not have sent Mirror Knight and company in unless her plan was for them to discredit themselves and remove themselves as political and influential factors moving forwards or to get some of them killed – which is to say, Augur would only have sent them if she were setting them up for failure ... which is possible, and potentially in character, considering her play with the coup attempt.

Liliet

I do agree that it would be odd for Bard to not intervene at SOME point, and the scenario where she tips off Frederic to come in time is not unlikely – though it does seem Augur's style as well, judging from what happened with the Salian coup – however, MK's "friend" is imho extremely likely to be just that – a pissy/sabotaging faction within Arsenal itself.

Liliet

Note:

– time is fluid in "places like this" (c) Cat, and in Arcadia and likely in Arcadia-derivative dismensions it's fluid specifically in service of the story. If Frederic was going to arrive 'around then', his arrival would inevitably gravitate towards the maximum impact moment;

– Cat assumes it's the Poet who let MK through the shortcut entrance, meaning it does not in fact require a mysterious third party.

Javvies

The foreknowledge absolutely requires a third party.

I do not believe we have any basis to believe that time is sufficiently inconstant so as to allow Mirror Knight and company to leave the battlefield, arrive at the Arsenal, and pass through the outer defenses (which Cat said would take about a day) in the amount of time since Red Axe first attacked Wicked Enchanter.

Liliet

Note: it's been two days since Red Axe attacked the Wicked Enchanter.

But yeah no you're most definitely right, that specific thing is a plot.

It's just that the only entry requirements are:

- be able to arrange a provocation with Red Axe killing Wicked Enchanter (how complicated that would have been we have yet to learn)
- have Mirror Knight's ear

With ~20 Named in there... we have a lot of candidates.

Javvies

Nobody inside the Arsenal knew Red Axe was coming in with Archer or her history with Wicked Enchanter, and one of the very first things that happened after they arrived was Red Axe killing Wicked Enchanter.

It has to be someone from outside the Arsenal.

In addition, I'm pretty sure that for something this sensitive, no one would be entrusting communications to magical means that can be overheard without the knowledge of anyone in the call. Plus, I'd bet that there's tracking and monitoring for any unscheduled magical communications in or out of the Arsenal.

No.

Passing through the outer defenses takes a full day, in either direction. Mirror Knight and company had to be in motion long before Archer and Red Axe even arrived at the Arsenal. Which means no one inside could have tipped them off.

Mirror Knight and company have to be the work of a third party, and one outside the Arsenal. Kingfisher Prince is almost certainly the work of a different third party, most likely one opposed to the third party responsible for Mirror Knight and company.

Wandering Bard is at or near the top of the list of those who could be responsible for Mirror Knight and company. She could instead be responsible for Kingfisher Prince if she doesn't like whatever plan Mirror Knight and company are following, but she is probably not responsible for both.

Augur is a strong possibility for Kingfisher Prince, no matter who sent Mirror Knight and company. She could have sent Mirror Knight and company if her intent was for them to fail miserably.

Liliet

> Nobody inside the Arsenal knew Red Axe was coming in with Archer or her history with Wicked Enchanter,

How do we know this?

> Wandering Bard is at or near the top of the list of those who could be responsible for Mirror Knight and company. She could instead be responsible for Kingfisher Prince if she doesn't like whatever plan Mirror Knight and company are following, but she is probably not responsible for both.

Reminder that Bard does not really set events in motion – no 'direct touch'. She only nudges them. Even if she's involved (which I will grant is not unlikely SOMEWHERE in this mess), she is not the one who started this.

Shveiran

And this could not have been set in motion with words because...?

I mean, that's what the Bard does. I'm not sure what you are arguing here.

Liliet

It's not like she's forbidden from touching people? She's hugged William and has explicitly mentioned having sex.

That's not what 'direct touch' means.

Insanenoodlyguy

Floating this now Somebody Named is going to die very soon. Only this time we'll have no clue who did it, save that we and Cat will know that it's an attempt to take a hammer to this blasting cap.

Put your theories out now for possible bragging rights later! I submit Red Axe is going to die within a fortnight, because she's the optimal choice to get everybody paranoid.

dadycoool

The Plot has only just been mentioned, yet it has thickened. I hope Cat can do what she does best: kick ass, take names, smoke like a chimney, and drink like a fish, all while Breaking the foundations of what her enemies hold dear.

Masego is a gem, too precious for us.

I see Freddy has similar taste in personal decoration to Cat. I wonder if they'll bond over that.

Next chapter:
Beat.

"And its not mine, just in case" said the Hunted Magician. xD Between this and the extra chapter i think i am going to like Frederic even more. And sadly this was going to happen sooner or later, the need to make it clear the Terms can and will be enforced is what will determine if they succed or not. Pity the blade of mercy didn't die, i mean so far every major fight he ahs been or been mentioned has ended with him defeated right?

PD; winter extra chapters (i think he appeared) don't count since that was more of the new everyday fight kind of thing.

Wonder

There is a slight possibility Scribe is in Arsenal.

Konstantin von Karstein

She would not sabotage the Grand Alliance, she has enough on her plate with Praes.

Mental Mouse

Sabotaging enemies and competitors alike is what Scribe does.

Agent J

Grand Alliance is not an enemy to Black. In fact, they tacitly support him over all other Praesi players (largely at Cat's insistence). And so, they are not an enemy of Scribe's. I can't see her actively sabotaging them. What would even be the goal there?

Shveiran

This. Combined with the fact that pissing in Cat's porridge is not something Scribe would survive, and throwing away her life is most definitely a disservice to Amadeus as well.

Liliet

SO GREAT

TFW you're Named and you cannot take a vacation without stumbling onto a plot)=

ofc that also means providence sent Cat there right in time to counter the plot, so y'know that's good

Insanenoodlyguy

Nah. I mean she probably will counter the plot, but I think the plot is happening BECAUSE she is there. She didn't stumble into it, it's charging at her!

Liliet

IDK, the decision to head to the Arsenal was recent and spontaneous as I understood

SpacyRicochet

But also, a relatively easy part of any narrative. The protagonist moving to a place of great importance, only to find sudden upheaval happening? That's a story right there.

Don't forget, she already suspecting this debacle to be a pivot of some kind.

Liliet

y e p

Insanenoodlyguy

But inevitably she was going to. Whom ever did this knew how to get people who weren't supposed to be there to be there. Just had to wait for a good shot

Liliet

Or, y'know, they were trying to pull this before anyone of importance showed up, so they'd come to smoking ruins and a lot of bodies.

Insanenoodlyguy

I dont' think so. This is happening just as all the major players are set to convene in one location. If the place is a flaming wreck, all the big players won't be coming. Since we can reasonably conclude whomever the plotters are have no love for the Grand Alliance, at least as it stands now, I'd be this plan is rather hoping Cordelia, Hanno, Cat, and all these big players in the Named are in one convincingly volatile place. This is coming together too well to be an accidental stumble. Somebody saw this as a pivot, and/or made it one.

Liliet

> This is coming together too well to be an accidental stumble.

I think you're completely losing sight of how narrativium works.

Like, this is GUIDEVERSE. Where Amadeus just so happened to be passing through the exact dark alley where the one kid he was planning to check on just so happened to be right here and now needing rescue from a fight. And no part of it is surprising because THAT'S WHAT HAPPENS WHEN YOU HAVE A ROLE.

We have 20+ Named in one place. The way their toast burns at breakfast is going to be 'accidentally' geared towards maximum drama.

It's like gravity, and we're in a WELL of it.

Shveiran

You are completely right. The part where I disagree – no, not even that, in truth, just add a little bit – is the consideration that this is known to some players.

Bard or DK or other genre savvy players could use the fact you just mentioned to further their agenda, setting up the mess while being aware that a lot of Names means narratives picking up steam.

Liliet

I'll complicate things further: this is known to ALL players whose savvy is greater than that of a jellyfish, and maybe even to MK & BM. This is actual in-universe common knowledge.

Shveiran

I can count a dozen players that have used narrative logic with consistency, and some of them are dead.

"Common knowledge" is a bit of a stretch.

Liliet

Remember Iason and Co?

I'm not accusing whoever started this of competence by any means.

Agent J

Mirror Prick & Co. were surprised to see her there. I'm betting her sudden decision took the plotters off guard.

Insanenoodlyguy

Nah. The plotters are the ones that have to know she was on her way, not the pawns.

Liliet

Catherine decided it like two days ago. It would take about as much for Cristophe to get there, and that's how long ago the Wicked Enchanter died. The timing suggests the plotters were not any more aware of Catherine's impending arrival at the point all the rest was sent in motion than Catherine herself was (which is to say, not).

Emily

weren't you pro it not being a plot?

Liliet

Okay, I'll grant you that the funniest option is that there is no plot afoot at all, just a lot of people being idiots individually with some miscommunication on top.

SO MANY POSSIBILITIES~

(I am pro- this not being in control of any particular mastermind. There can easily be a local low level plot involved, or a dozen)

Burlyraven

I'm getting some serious vibes that Frederic might end up at the core of the endgame band of five versus the Dead King, even excluding a lot of the extra attention he's been getting. The bigger question is whether Cat's going to be on that one or if her story is going to force her to focus on Malicia before everything finishes on the war front.

Liliet

Why does everyone think there will be a core endgame band of five against the Dead King??? He doesn't seem like that kind of antagonist at all..

Burlyraven

I mean, there's usually a main group no matter the genre, but there's definitely room for a different endgame.

Mental Mouse

The end of the DK would actually be a good place to pull out a meta-band of five bands of five, with the individual bands also representing the roles of band members wrt the whole.

Liliet

A distinct possibility!

Liliet

Yeah but the group will not necessarily be a band of 5 of adventuring Named. It might be a group of mages/casters, or a group of politicians/generals hemming him in, or – you know.

Shveiran

I think it is a fair bet that you kill Neshamah only through Narrative weight; a band of Five is not a save-all end-all measure, yet is a pattern with a very strong groove.

I'd say, at the very least, it is more likely for him to be killed by a Band of Five than for him to be killed by anything else.

Liliet

I don't think a band of five is the right narrative weight for that. Mind that narrative itself takes logistics into account, and not always inversely: there's a reason why Dorian of Helike died so comically.

I'd put my money on Quartered Seasons as a large part of the finale, and if there IS a band of five formed to finish matters at the end, it'll be more of a logistically convenient last second ragtag matchup we can't predict because it WON'T consist of the people who matter up to that point. IMHO.

Agent J

Are you suggesting C-listers are gonna be the ones to put Nessie down for good? As opposed to the real heavy hitters of the Grand Alliance?

Liliet

Yes, because the real heavy hitters are going to be sitting in their laboratories / war tents / diplomacy parlors and doing the important background work.

Shveiran

In the Endgame? Unlikely, in my opinion.
It makes sense for them to work off-site right now, but then?

So far, we always saw rituals as complicated magic that often needs last minute adjustments and must be deployed on site.

If a big magic boom is involved, a powerful mage will have to wield that ritual up to Keter's gate himself/herself.

Liliet

> must be deployed on site.
...on the site of the ritual, not the site of effect.

Shveiran

Granted. Now, would you care to name an instance where the two didn't coincide in the series?

Liliet

Shveiran, easily: Akua's doom fortress would be able to open a Hellgate anywhere on the continent. It just opened one right next to itself because that's where Akua needed one. By technical capabilities it was nuke level of universal threat.

Shveiran

Unproven. It had the capacity, certainly, but it was never said it didn't have a range.

The weapon was simply also a flying fortress, so of course it had the capacity to, say, open one in Salia. I'd expect the fortress would have needed to move closer to Salia first, though.

To be frank, if that wasn't the case the fortress was a danger to anyone anywhere, not just Calernia, including the powers beyond the sea. The scale would have gotten much bigger in the aftermath.

ravedthrad

And Catherine and Frederic meet at last. I can't help but wonder, if Frederic were to present Catherine with a rose, would Brus and Callow unite into a new kingdom – let's call it "Solamnia" – and birth three new knightly orders?

Jeremy Cliff Armstrong

So long as the mage with the golden hour-glass eyes stays out of the realm of the gods we'll be ok.

Liliet

The Chinese-Finnish border is peaceful?

ravedthrad

In Dragonlance, the kingfisher was one of the main symbols of the Knights of Solamnia, who were organized into three related orders of knighthood: the knights of the Crown, the knights of the Sword, and the knights of the Rose.

Liliet

Nice!

My point about the Chinese-Finnish border, and the distance between Brus and Callow, remains 😊

ravedthrad

Well, I'll be the first to admit to being geographically-challenged. My Ryouga Syndrome is bad enough that I have gotten lost in a friend's house going to the toilet.

Liliet

(There are maps on the website)

ravedthrad

You underestimate the power of Ryouga Syndrome. 😊

Ben

It's a good point. But possibilities abound with the creation of the Twilight Ways.

Liliet

Oh, I do not disagree in any way 😊

Shveiran

So, in chapters past I have expressed a (lukewarm) defense of the Mirror Knight.

...can I take it back now?

I'm going to take it back. Thanks.

Liliet

TBF, his perspective is understandable if you account for him being an idiot.

...I am a very generous person.

Shveiran

Well, yes, (assuming you are willing to squint a lot) I can see your point.

But, well, "it is reasonable so long as you ignore all the facts they are purposely deciding not to take into account" is kind of a low bar to clear.

I'll admit I have very poor patience for idiots determined to light match next to the gasoline tank.

I mean, come on! Just... just come on!

I don't care if he and Mercy are still hung up on the Saint's death or some such, or over being swatted around during the Battle of the Camps, or if they are being manipulated by an outside force to believe that this is the start of a purge.

This is SILLY.

Anyone who has fought in the north CANNOT not know that the war would have been lost without the Twilight Ways and the Callowan and drow reinforcements; let alone if they not only didn't join but also gave the crusader the battle they actively sought before leaving.

Anyone with two brain cells must know that if there is one person that is keeping it all together is Catherine: without her you likely lose Callow, the drow, the Villains...

And they risk this for what, posturing? If you kill her, if you humiliate her, if you antagonize her, it could all go up in smoke?

Just... come on!

There is being young and idealistically naïve, and there is being morons.

Don't be morons, guys.

dadycool

As I considered a reply to this comment, my mind went back to what Hanno told Cat as part of his reprimand for her behavior towards (that one girl that was the Scorched Apostate's Light Mirror). If I'm remembering correctly, he essentially said not to fault the girl for following her Name-based nature and that trying to act counter to it would be detrimental to her well-being. I also remember various points in Cat's time as Squire that she tried to act contrary to her Name and got punished for it.

Possible summary: These are Heroes being Heroes because they're Heroes. Any old-style card-carrying Villain /will/ end up cackling and monologuing simply because they're driven to. Any Paragon-style Hero /will/ go on about the Power of Friendship or something and fight the Villain because they're the Villain. This means they're either evil or Evil and absolutely cannot be tolerated.

The Power of Protagonism means anyone who opposes the person we're following is either the enemy or an idiot, which completely negates any virtue such an attitude would have. ("From my point of view, the Jedi are evil!" or "Harry needed to grow up in an abusive household because I didn't want him to be too confident or have too much will to live. All for the Greater Good, of course.")

Shveiran

You may have a point in theory, but let us consider the roles in question: the Mirror Knight is meant to reflect evil back to evil, and the Blade of Mercy I have no clue.

Regardless, I see no evidence that their roles require them to oppose all evil at all times: they sure didn't mind the ratlings and Keter while they were busy helping the Proceran trying to annex Call- I MEAN, helping them crusading.

So they CAN choose which evil they oppose and focus on the rest at a later date without falling out of their roles' shapes.

Hence, they are CHOOSING to oppose "the Evil Black Queen, who must be doing something wrong somewhere somehow because, well, she is Evil" over the friggin Dead King.

I can see they don't want anything like the T&T or the Accords, and find it revulsive to make a truce with the Villains.

That is still a battle for tomorrow to fight, assuming the world makes it that far. Forcing it here and now is still moronic.

Insanenoodlyguy

Not if they see this is a pivot.

taking into account they are stupid but not hopeless lets set this up. They get word, however they did (though presumably from a plotter or more direct pawn of the plotters in the armory), that the Black Queen is going to have the Red Axe killed. Now, the key isn't to hide all the fact, just to alter the flavor. This is all coming together too suspiciously to be coincidence, and most heroes are going to see that. But what they are being sold is that it's CAT'S PLOT. That Red Axe was put with the rapist who created her as a pretext. The hero wins, it's a breaking of the Truce and the hero will be killed for it, just as planned. The Villian wins, they were "Defending themselves" while abusing the T&T and a hero will be killed for it, just as planned. Either way, it's obviously an Evil plot to make the hero's break the letter of the law while shamelessly abusing the spirit, and prove the T&T was a bad idea to begin with. Well, fuck that. They are not going to use this plot to see a hero killed, not while Mirror Knight and Blade of Mercy have anything to say about it! Best to just charge right into this trap so it works out for the best! And look, there's a magic user that can help them get there! Oh this is all coming together now. Charge!

And of course, the Black Queen is making a big show of appearing "reasonable" but she's also disarming them and meanwhile, Red Axe is about to be killed, so maybe it's go time right now!

At this point I suspect that Red Axe will end up dead, probably with the help of whomever warned Mirror Knight. Red Axe is going to end up dead.

Liliet

What I want/expect to see is for Indrani to be protecting Red Axe thoroughly enough that an attempt at that fails.

Underhanded plotting that underestimates (1) the Woe's commitment to what they DO commit to, (2) their power = I want 😊

Shveiran

Yeah, but the point remains.

Even if one buys all that and it turns out it was true, you are putting at risk everything living to try to save one Heroine which is included in the "everything living" in the first place.

Worse, they are not just rolling the dice, they are just waiting to see how they will lose.

>They win by killing the Black Queen?

Even though they likely don't know about the dwarves, there is no one else that has even an amiable relationship with the drows, who are fighting half this war on their own.

There is also no other villain with her pull and commitment to this cause, so there is no one to fill her cloak as Representative in a satisfying way, and you still established the precedent that Heroes will slay Villains if they think it's ok and the Truce is dust.

-> Neshamah eats everything, including the Heroine.

> They bully the Black Queen into doing what they want?

Her reputation is weakened; her ability to keep the Villains in line is compromised; the system of the Representatives is turned into a joke; the Truce has still been broken by the death of one Villain scot-free; Heroes have both proven unwilling to uphold the Truce and able to bully the Villains out of their agreed rights and guarantees.

Villains could walk, trust between allies is fractured for good, chain of command is compromised. Also, though we know it's impossible but they don't, there is a chance the Black Queen takes her shit and goes home as the wicked Villainess she is.

→ Neshamah not necessarily eats everything (including the heroine) but is certainly more likely to do so.

> They try and lose?

Even if the Black Queen doesn't kill them, which from their perspective cannot be a given, trust is still broken, the Truce is still put into question, and with such a flagrant breach of terms either gallows are employed and we lose several good Heroes, which is followed by a massive outcry from the Heroic community, or they get away with it, followed by a massive outcry from the Villain community and a loss of face for both Cat and the T&T.

→ Neshamah not necessarily eats everything (including the heroine) but is certainly more likely to do so.

There is nothing to gain here even from their warped perspective, and a lot to lose.

Pressing on means being angry teens with too much power, and I'm appalled by how many times that seems to be the only thing under a hero's golden paint.

This needs more Frederic, damnit.

hakureireimu

No one is accusing the Mirror Knight of using his brain too often.

Liliet

> the drows, who are fighting half this war on their own.

(note: plural of drow is drow)

Does Mirror Knight really KNOW that the drow are fighting half this war on their own? Does he really understand the size of their contribution in Cleves? Note also that they are fighting that half of the war because they have to – Cat or no Cat, they actually don't have anywhere else to go.

> There is also no other villain with her pull and commitment to this cause, so there is no one to fill her cloak as Representative in a satisfying way, and you still established the precedent that Heroes will slay Villains if they think it's ok and the Truce is dust.

No, see, the Truce and Terms are evil in the first place, an abhorrent compromise forced by the Black Queen. Nothing of value will be lost by shaking villains loose of the cause, and much will be gained since villains won't be doing all of that sabotaging they no doubt are doing riight over there out of sight. He hasn't seen any but his buddy told him there was some, and who could really doubt that? They're VILLAINS, everyone knows what that means. It's like doubting water flows downhill.

> Pressing on means being angry teens with too much power, and I'm appalled by how many times that seems to be the only thing under a hero's golden paint.

...you are? 0.0

Liliet

> Pressing on means being angry teens with too much power, and I'm appalled by how many times that seems to be the only thing under a hero's golden paint.

That's the whole THING with Named? They are more often than not kids who stumble into way too much power. Neither Above nor Below are deliberately choosing them, the stories just happen. It's horrifying and unfair and it's the law of the universe, and part of the change the academy will make is... ameliorating that, specifically.

Did you notice how William, Akua and Catherine were all 16-18 during their three-way clash?

Insanenoodlyguy

Lillith already chimed in with most of the stuff I'd have said anyway, but as to the rest:

-Even if one buys all that and it turns out it was true, you are putting at risk everything living to try to save one Heroine which is included in the "everything living" in the first place.

They. Are. HEROES. Which means their default setting is often "no compromise." Yes, stopping the Black Queen here is a huge risk. But letting her kill a fellow hero is unacceptable, which means it's a risk worth taking. Better that than let evil have it's way, even once (and it's never just once!). It only emboldens them and next time it will be worse. No, you draw the line at the beginning, and you'll never have to worry it's gone too far.

As I said, the whole thing could be made into a "We'll find a way!" Story. I think they'd agree that taking away the Black Queen and all her allies makes the situation appear hopeless. And that's great for them. That's how they win. By making it impossible to win by doing the right thing without compromise, their victory is assured! (And do remember that 99% of the time that's exactly how it would go. the Dead King is a great example of the other 1%, but obviously they aren't expecting that to be the case)

From their perspective, the only way to lose for sure is by doing nothing. So goddamit, they are going to do something. And since they really have no idea what's going on, killing the biggest bad guy in the room is probably a great place to start!

Liliet

You are definitely and 100% not wrong lmao

tithin

Getting strong Death alarm vibes from the deadhand here, by which I mean he is likely going to die.

Liliet

What exactly are the death flags?

Everyone keeps saying this about Hakram, and I keep not seeing it.

tithin

Catherine has thought several times in the last few chapters, of how heavily she relies on him now – she is extremely reliant on him. She's thought that several times throughout the series, but never so often and in such a short time.

You want to cripple cat, you want to break her and her alliance, Hakram's the weak point, the link in the chain that is the woe and the thing that may very well push her over the edge of her new name.

Shveiran

Granted, that was always a possibility, but I can't say I've noticed an increase of such remarks.

If anything, I suppose since we are drawing closer to the endgame the dramatic draw of loss could pose more danger for Adjutant. But it is nothing new.

dadycool

The first step to Black's rebellion and climb of the Tower was the death of Captain. Hakram fills a similar role for Cat, so maybe she'll start eyeing the Tower in the not-exactly-distant future? I'm most definitely spouting nonsense, but two people have heard the Song onscreen and both their Names start with Black.

Shveiran

Again. I can't say I see your point here: Cat has heard the song ever since she was the Squire. I can't imagine how Hakram's death would push her to climb the tower, even if Malicia does it with her own bare hands; she already wants the Empress dead, climbing the Tower is a whole other beast.

dadycool

Thinking about it, she's always been "open" about how much she relies on him. This really isn't anything new.

Captain's death wasn't enough to get Black to climb the Tower, either, nor was Warlock's. But with each death in his Cabinet, as it were (including the generals and eventually the Legions in Exile), he was made more alone, which I believe is one of the requirements as stated in the Song. Another thing, Black waited ~25 years before he decided to actually make the commitment, largely due to his relationship with Malicia. Villains have Eternal Youth. Cat has time. I'm not saying she absolutely will, but I can't say she won't, either. After all, Black thought he wouldn't and look where we last saw him.

Mental Mouse

By the same token, an attack on Hakram would simply be part of an attack on Cat. Killing Hakram would fit in a story-slot where Cat would otherwise be maimed.

Liliet

Mmmh.

Yes, okay, I see the reasoning)=

Insanenoodlyguy

Hmmm. I don't see it happening just yet. But while I keep guessing Red Axe is going to die, I could definitely now see somebody TRYING to kill Deadhand. But we haven't even learned the full deal with his new hand yet. It's not time.

I wouldn't be shocked if he loses his artificial arm though and just starts ghost-handing it dual wield style.

cakeofdoom

Wait is he the Hunted Magician or the Haunted Magician? because both are being used.

hakureireimu

That is false (thanks to the power of edit). There's only Hunted Magician now

negagardens

Oh wow- the hunted Magician is like... the perfect minion. If needed, she has a pretty sharp leash on him... but as long as she is reasonable and doesn't USE it, he can presumably be persuaded to play ball.

AND he thinks for himself and actively provides information. Horray!

Also: nice job Frederick. What a hero (again)

negagardens

Also, seriously- The PRince of falling leaves ain't never coming back, and that's Cat's doing. HM totally owes her BIG time... not that this probably counts for heaps for a villian.

Alex Straughan

Or he's now around forever, having replaced Larat. Arcadia United has not been explained at all. We know nothing about it's rules other than it seems isolationist so far.

Insanenoodlyguy

That sounds like an Autumn name to me. I think the Prince of Falling leaves is in fact in huge danger of coming around.

blubber

oh for fucks sake..dont tell me the heroes got the backing of more than just one noble...if you remember the night and its story, its hardly surprising there might be more in the works...

this is gonna end in tears and i doubt they will be catherines. And if you tell me, autumn wont utilise their claim in the most secret place of the alliance, with all of their leading names assembled..boi you gonna be surprised. Been wondering what the king and queen where up to, it seems to me we will soon see it... fuck

Mental Mouse

I note that the very intervention of MK & friends may well force Cat to kill the Red Knife, when she was looking for a way out of that...

Liliet

How so?

Indrani's there to be a big demonstrative 'do not fuck with my people' club. I don't think Cat's hand is forced so easily.

Mental Mouse

I was thinking more of the politics – now if she goes easy on the offenders, it would at least look from outside like MK and friends went in and leaned on her. Of course that depends (inter alia) on how widely known his little expedition is.

That said, Frederic is positioned for the save in this respect also. "That idiot MK and his idiot friends charged in where they had no business, they were about to push Cat into doing something intemperate, but I managed to defuse things...". Which also has the advantage of being pretty much the plain truth. 😊

Liliet

I must say after seeing him again I am even more curious about exactly how the Blade of Mercy serves mercy? Is he guided like Tariq or is he supposed to be their fist when they need more force? I would expect him to be closely tied to Tariq due to that, to be honest.

Also interesting that the deal Hunted made was with a Prince. I wonder if he gave away his actual name as part of the deal.

erebus42

In regards to selling his name that would be an interesting situation. It reminds me of a situation from Pact by Wildbow (MAJOR SPOILERS) When a certain character gets tricked by one of the fae into selling them her name. They end up taking her place in the world and she nearly falls through the cracks of reality. I wonder if the Prince of Falling leaves is out there somewhere playing the role of (whatever the Hunted Magician's name is). If that is the case than his Name would probably be one of his only tethers and it would probably be very bad if he were to lose it.

Liliet

I'm guessing Blade of Mercy is unrelated to the Choir.

And yes, it sounds like his actual literal given name was what was traded away.

Tinfoilhat

My little pet theory is that the Hunted magician is actually part of the ex-wild hunt... if not Lariat himself. That would also explain his ancient knowledge of runes and perhaps he is implicated in the shortcut to Twilights, having made the place and all.

ninegardens

This is a super cute theory... but given that Cat's like "Right, so you can't be Winter, because otherwise you would have had your ass kicked just now", it seems less likely.

Liliet

Larat is no longer subordinate to Catherine, nor any of his. The specific thing that tipped Catherine off – the potential she felt to order him around – is exactly what wouldn't be happening with that lot.

ninegardens

I can really think of only one politically feasible way out of this, and I don't see it happening.

Sit the Red Axe down.

Tell her:

"What you did was right. We know it is right. We believe in you. But we also believe that unless you are put to death for this, a whole lot of people are going to suffer.

We know you don't deserve it... but for the sake of maintaining the truce and the terms... are you willing to give your life?"

laguz24

Her answer will probably be no. He deserved it because nothing gets wrapped up that easily.

Agent J

Also, define 'right'? Because I'm not willing to just hand that to her unless she was attacked and very clearly acting in self-defence. Otherwise, birthing this monumental clusterfuck was not right by any means.

Jeremy Cliff Armstrong

Agreed. Morality is about consequences... not the past. That he was an monster is beyond doubt. But that cannot justify anything in a moral context. Not that it shouldn't. It actually cannot. As in "it's a fundamental law of the universe" cannot. Any other perspective is simply an attempt to justify what isn't justified or a complete failure to understand the difference between right and wrong.

The reason we punish people for past actions, then, is the implicit worry of them comiting those actions again unless steps are taken. Weighing that possibility against the certainty that the Truce and Terms would be at risk and the tens of thousands that will die if it fails... all the Red Axe accomplished by killing him is putting herself in the same category of monster as he was.

Javvies

Arguably, she's worse.

He at least knew when to stop and follow the rules to fight the Dead King (presumably).

Liliet

> all the Red Axe accomplished by killing him is putting herself in the same category of monster as he was.

Most decidedly not the same category.

Shveiran

It's really about points of view, with this kind of stakes.

I mean, say that because of this innocent the Terms go up in smoke, Catherine dies, and the whole shebang is turned upside down. The Dead King wins and everybody loses. It won't happen, but that is a possibility in theory, no?

At that point, how many lives would have been destroyed compared to how many the Enchanter ruined?

I can't stress this enough, I AM NOT DEFENDING RAPE, here.

I'm just saying... let's not defend causing the slaughters of millions, either? Because that's what sneezing on the house of cards could cause.

Liliet

Different categories still, in whichever direction you'd stack the comparison.

Also, probability of outcome should be multiplied by its severity, for proper weighting. The probability of harming someone by raping them is as close to 100% as to be functionally indistinguishable, and has no upside. The probability of losing the whole war by killing this one guy is... not that, AND has the added weight of "preventing future rapes" with some probability (the probability that the Enchanter would commit future rapes summed over the timeline with the corresponding probability).

I'd say the sum's still negative, and Red Axe fucked up badly.

But it's not... "the same category of monster". Like, no system of categorization puts those together, even if you insist on absolutes: Wicked Enchanter's actions were not, in fact, going to lose everyone the war with the Dead King.

Yes, I'm quibbling the phrasing here most of all. No matter what point of view you take on this, THAT way of putting it is not correct 0.0

Javvies

Yeah, anything other than immediate self defense and the inability to stop her attacker without killing him is not adequate grounds for using lethal force herself. Maybe if he were in the middle of actively betraying everyone to the Dead King ... but that's unlikely.

Liliet

Won't help disprove the heroes' point that the whole thing is bullshit.

What would actually help resolve this situation is coming up with a method of discipline that does not in fact kill Red Axe but also makes it clear to both villains and heroes that it is not, in fact, open season.

Forced oaths is one idea I have: have Red Axe swear to something for a limited time period that would in fact be something the likes of Mirror Knight would strongly like to avoid while not actually being 'savagery toward the poor victim',

Javvies

Her word isn't going to be worth anything to the Villains. She did after all break the oath she'd sworn to obey and uphold the Truce and Terms (presumably).

Swearing new oaths as punishment isn't useful as punishment since her sworn word is in doubt.

Liliet

No, not a regular word given. One of THOSE oaths. A blood oath, of the kind that you physically CANNOT break.

Javvies

...
Cat's not a Fae Sovereign capable of creating magically enforced and binding oaths anymore.

Still, even if a magically enforced and binding oath were possible ... I'm pretty sure that such oaths need to be willingly taken ... you can't just impose them on somebody, they actually have to make the oath themselves.

Liliet

Yes, exactly. That's what I said.

The person who broke the Truce&Terms gets to choose between execution (assuming no further alternative is found) and making a specifically worded binding oath. It's up to them, really!

And Cat and Akua made binding oaths to each other just fine in First Llesse. Fae are not necessary to the process.

Darkening

Fae magic isn't necessary for a binding oath, Cat and Akua made a blood oath with each other at the end of book two after Cat got Resurrected. Remember, the whole, "You can't spill a drop of my blood!" "I don't have to."
Cat breaking all of Akua's bones without breaking the skin sequence. Though admittedly the rules of magic oaths are vague and not super explored. They even brought up a couple other potential binding oaths in that same bit with Cat refusing to swear on the gods below and a couple other things as I recall.

Liliet

Akua was the one who refused to swear to the Gods Below iirc

Liliet

(I'm guessing there's more kinds than the blood oath, but a blood oath has been confirmed to work and be unavoidably binding, as of Cat and Akua at First Llesse)

ninegardens

Actually, as a question, was the blood oath unbreakable, or was it just the idea that breaking such an oath would have consequences, in terms of the story hating you and wanting to screw you over afterwards.

Liliet

Cat had a 'bracelet' on her hand squeezing it if she so much as thought of trying to weasel her way out of it, and she trusted Akua to keep her word, so, it's either literally unbreakable or a 'you die instantly if you break it' unbreakable.

Shveiran

So you suggest the punishment for breaking the Truce is being forced by oath not to do it again?

Or did I read that wrong, and you are suggesting instead that they have all Heroes and Villains swear they'll uphold the Truce and Terms?

I'm not sure either would fly that well, honestly.

The first is insufficient from the Villains POV; I can totally see them going "Well, since that is alright let's kill a bunch of the non combat Heroes and then pinky swear we won't do it again. Everyone is cool with that, right?

The second won't be agreed by the Heroes, because even now they (some, let's be honest) believe the Red Axe was right. If they felt it was ok to bind everyone's hands this way, this wouldn't be happening in the first place.

Javvies

I'm pretty sure swearing to uphold the Truce and Terms is a requirement of being brought into them.

Which means anyone who violates them will have already shown themselves to be an oath breaker, and therefore inherently untrustworthy.

Liliet

There are oaths and oaths.

Any oaths made by the fae are automagically binding, but humans are capable of making those as well. The magically enforced oaths are nasty and unpleasant and literally limit your freedom of action, they are easily comparable to imprisonment.

Only, unlike imprisonment, they ARE actually reliable and DO still allow the person to contribute to the war effort.

Of course, unlike imprisonment, they need to be submitted to willingly, but it's not like the Grand Alliance lacks the capacity to go 😊 do

Liliet

Neither, exactly.

The punishment for breaking the Truce and Terms is swearing to stricter terms. Service / obedience / never raising a hand to a person known to them as a [hero/villain] again. For a limited duration, unless the sentence says 'lifetime'.

Liliet

* Where by 'never raising a hand' I mean along the lines of 'unconditionally' 'yes, even if they are attacking you right now with deadly force' 'we just don't trust your judgement anymore buddy'

Shveiran

I don't know about you, but I would not be willing to turn my back on a former enemy that I'm sure wishes me harm if I thought the only consequence he'd face for stabbing me would be a magical compulsion not to stab more allies. I'd still have been stabbed, possibly fatally, so that is not a big damn consolation, is it?

We are back to this: <https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2020/03/03/chapter-14-audience/comment-page-1/#comment-63365>

Either you make the terms magically binding (which the Heroes won't agree to) or you enforce magical binding oaths as retribution for a breach (which the Villain won't agree to).

It's not gonna cut it. Breaking the terms must be impossible or something met with harsh consequence, or no one will be able to trust the Named that stand by their side.

Liliet

> a magical compulsion not to stab more allies.

Obviously insufficient, yes. To get proper disincentive potential you need to make it one or more of the following:

- excessive (you cannot so much as be rude to a representative of the other side, which would not have been a breach of T&T and they are fully free to do to YOU, but you're no longer allowed because punishment for breach);
- humbling/humiliating (you are now sworn to OBEY one of the [stupid heroes/wicked villains]).

Villains are not, in fact, babies. Cat doesn't need to nanny them THAT much.

Liliet

> I'd still have been stabbed, possibly fatally, so that is not a big damn consolation, is it?

...the same is true if the punishment is death fyi

Shveiran

Of course them dying doesn't bring me back to life, I'm not arguing that.

The difference is the extent the sanction discourages the action and preserves the balance of strength.

Let's say NotRaphaela looks at NotBarrowSword and thinks he threatens all that NotLevante stands for.

And she starts thinking: "well, maybe I should do something before it's too late".

The right sanction is something that gives her pause.

With the death penalty, she may consider that if she tries to kill him, the very best outcome is they both die. But it isn't a given that will happen: perhaps he will survive, but she will still die. And who will check on him then?

Moreover, there is a war against the BigBad going on: she might consider his contribution not very significant because Villain and other nonsense, but she knows HER efforts are valuable at least. If she strikes, her efforts won't be a contribution anymore. And so she may consider that waiting for the end of the truce is the better option.

It is not a given she would think that way, of course; she can still strike. But there are good incentives to consider how you doing this is bad for the reason you are striking in the first place, which may make you stop.

Let's consider the oaths instead.

Raphaella (that being NotRaphaella, of course) may dislike the oaths; but in the end, the oaths are contingent to the truce, and thus a temporary measure; she would still be an asset to the war effort, she'd still be deployed, she'd still help.

Meanwhile, the threat she perceived (if she succeed in her attempt) will be permanently checked.

NotBarrowSword can't break traditions anymore, because he is dead. There is one less Villain, which is good, but there is still the same numbers of Heroes.

The oath is humiliating, frustrating, and prevents her from doing it twice, but it still ultimately just a temporary sanction she just has to endure; the only troublesome part is she can't strike again if another Villain tries the same shit, but that is no reason not to act the first time one such Villain appears.

After all, the very worst case is that you are back to square one with one less villain around, no?

Of course, they might kill you, but that was always a problem, and if you fail to kill them you can't try again; but all that pushes you to do, if you think they must die, is act carefully and decidedly.

This is why you need the death penalty.

I'm against it in real life, but a fragile truce between superpowered, idealistic beings you can't afford to see broken kind a changes the situation.

Liliet

Again, the oath needs to be TO A VILLAIN. It prevents this hero from responding to hypothetical BIGGER future threats – let's be honest, Barrow Sword is not a big deal to the actual heroes of Levant. Not was big as they worry villains might get if completely unchecked.

Consider also extenuating circumstances. It's completely valid to go "well if this was actually unprovoked FOR being a villain we'd kill her but since this was personal and traumatic and he really should have known better than to provoke her, we're going to go with a milder penalty."

This does assume he provoked her, for this particular phrasing. My point is it's a sliding scale.

Agent J

I think you're focused more on finding a solution that the heroes would begrudgingly accept, but they are only one side of the coin. Why would the villains begrudgingly accept such a compromise?

Swearing more oaths, stricter or otherwise, is less of a punishment and more of a preventative measure to assure the oath breaking idiot doesn't shit the bed again. How does that satisfy a villain's concerns? They are still being treated as though their lives are expendable.

Because let's not even pretend the Enchanter would've gotten the same consideration were the reverse to have happened. Catherine would have brutally murdered him with little fanfare. She does not pussyfoot around when it comes to keeping her side in line.

Don't be mistaken here, both the heroes and villains are watching this with rapt attention. And there's only a single question on all of their minds. "If a Hero won't be held to account for this, when will they be?"

Shveiran

Couldn't say it any better.

I should know, I tried.

Liliet

> Because let's not even pretend the Enchanter would've gotten the same consideration were the reverse to have happened. Catherine would have brutally murdered him with little fanfare. She does not pussyfoot around when it comes to keeping her side in line.

Really? Really? How sure are you?

Because I'm not at all sure. Catherine is harsh when it comes to people trying to murder her at night, but Barrow Sword challenged her in public and got a little roughed up and that was it.

This 100% needs to apply to both sides.

Agent J

Barrow Sword's actions are in no way related to what Red Axe did. He came to Cat up front (point one), made the case that villains would not and should not be expected to follow a weak leader (point two), and then took his defeat on the chin like a trooper (point three). His actions are right up Cat's alley and perfectly legal within the framework of the Truce & Terms.

If he, fuelled by ire of a past altercation, killed a hero in a situation where his life was not in immediate jeopardy? Yea, no, Cat would sooner put him down like a rabid dog than let him shake the already fragile foundations of Truce & Terms.

Hells, his case against the Levantine nobles, Cat agrees is entirely legitimate and fair. She still threatened to get him killed off quietly than let him weaponize the T&T in a way that might lose her the Levantine soldiers.

Liliet

Consider the hypothetical: Tancred gets in a fight with a hero and kills them. You think Cat wouldn't look into extenuating circumstances?

Shveiran

Of course she would LOOK, that is not the point.

The question is what she'd consider to BE an extenuating circumstance.

What we are arguing is that once the answer to "did they start the fight to the death or did you?" came out negative, she would string him up. And she would cry, and she'd whip her back bloody, but she would still make the hard choice because if the Truce becomes a joke this all goes up in flame.

Liliet

Escalation tends to be gradual.

And I don't think T&T is fragile to that in particular. The question of 'what exactly do the rules say' is less important than 'so does one person breaking the rules lead to the whole thing breaking down'. Note that Barrow Sword tolerated Cat basically telling him that his ~rights by her own law~ got trumped by political expediency any day and he should keep that in mind. As long as what they get out of following the law is better than the alternative, they're going to accept what the big bad Black Queen says.

JJR

One idea I had for an alternative to hanging them punishment is sending them to the northern front. They oath breaker in question can still do some good for the alliance, and gets a new perspective on why it's so necessary against the Dead King.

Liliet

The problem with this is that it's already the default for those who join T&T, it's not an additional punishment.

Consider a Mirror Knight style fucker, and also Mirror Knight himself. Whatever the punishment is, it has to be convincing disincentive for someone like THAT.

JJR

Sorry I should have been more clear. I don't mean the north of Procer norther front. I mean the Way North Drow front. You know the meat grinder that is currently supported by a pair of Night Gods and is still slowly losing. The place where the Dead King might actually be fighting seriously and does things like throw away tens of thousands of binds to act as distractions. Powerful named from coming in from the south, unless they were bigger ones like Grey Pilgrim or White Knight, would probably find themselves to be below average fish in an ocean.

It would almost certainly end up being a death sentence, just with a certain amount of deniability for everyone involved.

Liliet

Oh wow, ouch

Insanenoodlyguy

I think a hero named Red Axe is going to be pretty "Oh fuck that shit." in response to such an approach.

laguz24

Also, did the MK just lose a couple dozen brain cells from getting thrown all the time because he seems way more stupid than when we got his perspective at the battle of the camps, I think that is right.

Liliet

He seems more ill-informed than stupid per se, to me. Not smart enough to seek out information that would verify/disconfirm his assumptions.

Shveiran

This isn't lack of information, this is unwillingness to consider the consequences of his actions.

That is stupidity, not ignorance.

Liliet

Consequences of actions are not obvious when you are not the one juggling everything. Surely the Grand Alliance can handle itself just fine, and the Black Queen wickedly forced her way into it by threatening to stab them in the back?

It's not like HE was one of the generals going "so anyway if this keeps going we're dead within 3 months" while looking at complete tactical maps of the entire North.

Shveiran

He doesn't need a deep awareness of all that's going on, he needs nothing but open eyes.

The guy fought the DK for almost three years, and he saw first-hand how dire the situation was before Callow became an ally!

He never even left the front, so far as we know! He has so much empirical evidence that the situation is better now and it was a nightmare then that ignoring it requires a conscious effort! He is turning a blind eye to so much stuff that I'm surprised he can find his shoes in the morning!

Liliet

He is not a leader of armies.

They were fighting then and they are fighting now. It does not require WILFUL ignorance to fail to track the strategic situation, especially when you have friends a la Prince Gaspard explaining to you what is going on in liberal interpretation – you DO know what's going on!

Shveiran

Come now, this is getting ridiculous.

Are you honestly telling me you expect the Mirror Knight not to know that Keter is out in force now and wasn't then, and not to notice they regained ground rather than keep losing it as they had been doing before the Truce?

If you were arguing this about a random peasant, a few leagues from the front... I could get behind it, really.

But him? Someone that has been in more battle than most?

There is no way he may have failed to notice that he has seen only DEFEATS before the truce, and that now it's actually a battle. Do you remember how low the spirits were during the interlude Winter I? You don't need to be a General to notice your battles have stopped always ending in a desperate retreat, come on! Especially not if you are always the bloody rearguard!

Liliet

Sure, the tide shifted now that the Levantine forces came to aid too. And sure, the Black Queen helped with that (suspicious) truce, but who knows what she's plotting NOW?

flashburn283

Looks like Hanno is going to have to execute the mirror knight for working with the enemy. Damn shame.

Popcorn anyone?

Liliet

Why tf is everyone talking as though execution is the only option for punishment here???

Shveiran

For starters, because those arguing it isn't are proposing alternatives that are not a slap on the wrists.

Shveiran

AREN'T Curse you, lack of edit function! If it wasn't for the Truce, your ass would be grass!

Liliet

Note: Catherine has mentioned 'those had better be damn good circumstances' already, implying the execution outcome is, in fact, conditional on there not being any.

Shveiran

>> The Red Axe," he tacitly agreed. "I will not argue for breach of the Terms, Catherine, but there were... extenuating circumstances."

"The Enchanter has – had – a certain reputation," Hakram told me. "Though he was also considered a promising lead in usurping control of lesser dead from Keter."

"I hope they're damned good circumstances, Roland," I bluntly said. "Otherwise this ends with gallows and a noose."

I can honestly read this in no other way than as "unless he attacked her under truce, we'll have to kill her."

Liliet

Keep in mind Catherine has no idea who Red Axe is or her origin story, yet. She just knows "one of the heroes" and at this point it sounds to her like "a Mirror Knight type".

"Damned good circumstances" can very easily include "irresistible impulse because of previous trauma".

And yes, it does mean the Named who want to be safe under T&T will be expected to stay out of the way of the people they'd previously harshly traumatized. I doubt they'll find that a particularly unreasonable condition.

Shveiran

You are talking about the same woman that after rejecting her darker sides STILL looked in the eye the ugly truth that she could not get the Alliance, Pilgrim and Tyrant to stop being stupid without giving them a bloody eye in battle; and proceeded to send tens of thousands of man into battle, accepting the loss of lives involved as the cost of doing business.

That's Cat: a woman that may feel sorry for all those poor Proceran peasants and Levantine soldiers brainwashed into thinking she is Triumphant in a fancy cloak and weeping for their deaths but still ordering their superpowered troops to mow them down, because the hard truth is that their deaths have become a necessity for the greater good.

And you are telling me that she'd look in the eye the danger of the Truce going into flame and she would take that rather than killing one heroine, traumatized or not?

She'll do what is necessary. And the politics of it make slapping that woman on the wrist suicidal. She won't take that risk, and she will look at the greater good.

Liliet

I am not saying she would not choose the Truce over one woman.

I am however saying the Truce does not require her death.

Insanenoodlyguy

I'd imagine a Gallowborne style-sentence might be optimal here. You send Rex Axe on a crucial, important mission... that's completely and blatantly suicidal. If she emerges alive, she's done her job.

This isn't perfect but she can argue to the heroes she's given her a chance, and argue to the villains if Red Axe comes back alive and thus in the clear "Guys, I didn't expect her to actually return alive, and fuck, I gave my word! Yeah, I know some of you are that kind of villain as well, that guy, over there, he gets it. This happens sometimes. Fucking heroes, right?" There'd be grumbling but something like that'd probably pass with the T&T intact.

flashburn283

Because the mirror knight is an asshole and nobody like him.

ChillyPepper

So, Mirror Knight is the guy that keeps power up'ing every dawn, or am I confusing him with another named?

If I wasn't then I wonder if this is the "task" that he was supposed to do, since it was mentioned his task wasn't the Dead King, but something greater.

Javvies

Yep, he's the guy with the Aspect of Dawn that makes him a little bit stronger and tougher every day.

I always figured that Above planned to throw him at Ranger in a decade or two.

ChillyPepper

The way I'm thinking at the moment, you've got almost all of the woe in one spot, and a band of five (despite them being four at the moment, I suspect,) heroes.

Sounds like a story.

Insanenoodlyguy

Considering one of his aspects is "Dawn," the Drow reaction to him, and his own statement that he specifically doesn't fear the night, the theory is that he's thematically tailored to have opposed Sve Noc. This is the blade that would have cut her down if she had killed Cat and went up to the Surface world in-charge herself, making the arrogant mistakes a god makes that Cat warned her about.

Javvies

His Dawn Aspect is his power up Aspect.

I don't buy that he was created to deal with the Drow. Pre-Cat, the Drow were being (slowly) ground down by the Dwarves. A Named custom built to take on the drow would be expected in the Dwarves. The drow involvement and Cat going to the drow are consequences of a series of extremely low probability events involving multiple entities protected against supernatural perceptions and future sight abilities. No, the Drow are not why Mirror Knight was raised up with the abilities he has.

I lean towards thinking that he was made to aim at Ranger in retaliation for her part in Black's rise to power and the Conquest of Callow. Also, as a contingency for when the forces aligned with Above moved to retake Callow, defeat Praes, and kill Amadeus.

Sudden note of realization –

“The last of the four was a Callowan, though she wasn’t one of mine in any sense. She’d allegedly fled in the early years after the Conquest, and she was the only one who did not openly consider herself one of Above’s champions. The Maddened Keeper looked instead like a perennially exhausted woman in her early twenties, skin drawn and pale and her dark hair ratty. Her threadbare robes ever rumpled and she was thin, but there was a sense of... menace about her. Not like a snake coiling but rather like a diseased thing, the sight of which had you withdraw your hand out of fear and disgust. She was host, it was rumoured, to a great many old secrets that should have stayed unknown – and had even turned herself into a living seal on a Hell Egg from Triumphant’s days. ”

So that’s where the demon of absence went.

Huh... and here was me just assuming that it was... absent...

Chapter 15: Machinations

“A ruler should always join regicide plots: is the finest possible teacher for a locksmith not a thief?”

– Dread Emperor Traitorous

I poured myself another finger of aragh, since it was quite evidently going to be one of those days.

“A bold claim,” I said, “but I am open to the notion.”

The Hunted Magician would, by my reckoning, have spent Gods only knew how many years pursued by a prince of the fae. Most likely through agents as there would have been... waves if a fae noble of that calibre came into Creation to collect a debt, but the old Courts of Arcadia had come by their reputation of always getting their due honestly. It would have been a constant ordeal of enemies hidden under glamour, pursuit that could not be shaken off by simple distance and terrifying visions both sleeping and waking. The occasional complaints I’d gotten about the man being cryptic, distrustful and generally unpleasant now had an explanation. Living in a world where there might be an enemy hidden behind any smiling face, with forced servitude as the consequence of making even a single mistake, had a way of making people paranoid to the bone.

The thing was that the kind of enemies I was up against did actually warrant that level of caution. The Dead King had been three steps ahead of the rest of the world this entire war, the Intercessor had been out of sight for an unsettling amount of time and that was setting aside the most dangerous enemy of all: simple, petty human nature. The trouble here would not be the paranoia itself but figuring out if the Hunted Magician's paranoia was the right sort of paranoia.

"Two weeks ago, the Blessed Artificer received news that troubled her a great deal," the Hunted Magician told me. "I know not what they were, but I do know that some of the other Chosen here began acting oddly around the same time."

"And how would you know that?" I mildly asked.

"The Bitter Blacksmith was herself unchanged, and did not seem to notice any difference," the Magician said.

I traced the rim of my cup with a finger.

"You misunderstand me," I said, and perhaps on purpose, I did not speak out loud. "How do you know that the Blessed Artificer received such news?"

The man did not answer, his face turning into a pleasant mask that was just a little too sloppy to be believed. It didn't reach the eyes, which to a Praesi would be counted as a beginner's mistake. He did not trust me, which was fine, but that distrust was getting in the way of my finding answers and that was not acceptable. Using coercion here would only make things worse, I decided. Threats would serve to make me an enemy and that was not the role I wanted to play in this conversation. Another approach would be needed.

"I am observant," the Hunted Magician replied.

"So you are," I mused. "You must work closely with the Artificer?"

His eyes narrowed.

"On occasion," he said.

"This is unrelated to the current conversation," I elaborated. "I'm told she wishes to lodge a complaint under the Terms about some device being broken, and I would like some understanding of the technicalities involved coming from someone else than the plaintiff."

A chance to exert influence, which I knew he'd want to take: one did not become the informal speaker for villains in the Arsenal by accident. It was ambition, and ambition was a familiar beast.

"It is not my field of speciality, but I do have some insights," the Hunted Magician said.

"Do you know what it was meant to accomplish?" I said. "Or at least what it might have been based on?"

"The underlying principles had some similarity to an artefact displayed by the Repentant Magister last year," the Magician said, "though I am unsure whether or not you'd be familiar with it."

Underlying principles, huh. No, that could still be shop talk between colleagues.

"Made of the same materials?" I asked, pitching my voice in surprise.

The Proceran mage suppressed a smirk. That's right, I thought, I'm just some uneducated mudfoot from Callow. Lord your knowledge of me, you know you want to. I'd bet rubies to piglets the man was highborn, and some of that stayed in the marrow even when you left the life behind.

"Light favours different materials than sorcery," the Hunted Magician told me. "She chose them accordingly."

"So you saw the device as it was being built," I said.

The man went still as stone.

"Adjutant," I mused. "Do remind me – can projects without official sanction be built in the official crafting rooms of the Workshop?"

"They cannot," Hakram gravelled. "Though it is allowed in one's private quarters, on their own time."

A beat passed.

"So," I smiled, "you've been sleeping with the Blessed Artificer."

"I was simply visiting-"

"I would invite you," I mildly said, "to consider very carefully whether or not you want to lie to me."

The Haunted Magician's mouth closed. Yeah, I'd thought as much.

"I like to operate by a simple rule, when it comes to keeping an eye on my Damned fellows," I told him amicably. "Don't make it my problem, and I won't treat it like one."

Looming behind me, a tower of muscles and fangs in burnt plate, Hakram stared the man down.

"Are you going to be a problem, Haunted Magician?" Adjutant growled.

"I came to lend aid," the man protested.

Good, he was off-balance. Time to press.

"So aid me," I smiled. "Have you been sleeping with the Bitter Blacksmith as well?"

He did not immediately answer, and I had to hide my utter surprise. Godsdamn, that'd been a shot in the dark since he'd specifically named her as well: I'd actually wanted him to deny it so I could twist it into a confirmation he was sleeping with the Artificer. The silence was as good as an admission, though. I cocked my head to the side, studying him carefully.

"I am impressed," I said, and he smirked, "that you haven't gotten your head caved in."

Would you look at that, the smirk was gone. Probably helped that neither of those heroines were fighting Named, I mused, though that hardly made them shyly blushing maidens. Still if he'd tried to pull something like that with, say, the Painted Knife and the Vagrant Spear? There'd be a mistake-shaped corpse propped up in front of me instead of a living man.

"That makes you a useful source of information," I mused.

That reassured him as it was meant to, though he tried to hide it. If I'd tried to assure him I held no ill intentions towards him he wouldn't have bought it for a second, but from villain to another an open admission of usefulness was one of the most prized guarantees of safety.

"You said the Artificer was troubled," I said, "and others began acting oddly. Expand on this."

"She put an end to our trysts, irregular as they were," the Hunted Magician admitted. "And I saw her speaking with the Repentant Magister frequently afterwards, when they have never been close."

Shit, Nephele too? She'd not struck me as the scheming type when we last met, but a flirty acquaintance wasn't exactly understanding in depth.

"And the oddness?" I asked.

"They've several times gone to the general archives, both together and separately," the Magician said, "and the two times I spied on them it was the old assembly transcripts they were going through. Specifically, those of the monthly sessions."

What were those for again? Roland had not long ago joked about bringing up my complaint about lack of railings in one, but they couldn't be just a general venting of complaints. It'd be a waste of time to make the ten Named based at the Arsenal sit through these. Of course, asking would make me look like I'd missed what he was implying. Which I had, but he didn't need to know that. Cowing people stopped working when they saw you stumble.

"Allocation of personnel and resources, general financing," Hakram said. "Do you have a notion of what they were trying to piece together?"

Ah, Adjutant to the rescue. So, going scavenging through the records of what and who had been allocated to projects those two had been trying to figure out the nature of one they hadn't been brought in on. There weren't many of those, only three. As I recalled the Hunted Magician and the Sinister Physician – who was also one of mine – were working on a 'plague' that would affect undead, under the appellation of Late Regret. Roland and the Concocter were working on a brew that'd affect undead like holy water and could feasibly be produced in sufficient quantity to contaminate the northern lakes, called Sudden Abjuration. The last was actually under debate to be opened to all Named, an attempt by Blind Maker and the Repentant Magister to make an artefact that'd prevent the Dead King from actively possessing undead within a certain range.

Only the last of the three was showing promising results, though it was also the one whose success would be hardest to prove: Neshamah was clever enough to pretend it was working to take us by surprise after we'd come to rely on it. The Haunted Magician hesitated, and not because it was Adjutant who'd asked the question. It was well-known to everyone by now that when Hakram spoke it was with my voice.

"I believe," he finally said, "that they were not interested in what was in the records so much as what was not."

My face remained calm, because it was not the first time an ugly surprise had been sprung on me today. Hells, it wasn't even the first time today. I reached for my cup of aragh and sipped. Shit. Was this about Quartered Seasons, then? Hierophant was the only Named on that and we'd kept it very, very quiet. Hasenbach knew the name and that it could yield a potential tool for decide, but on the Dominion side the only one I'd told was Tariq since Levantine nobles had famously loose lips. I'd wanted the Pilgrim to be able to vouch someone from Levant had been told and picked him in particular because it'd put out any talk of dishonour the moment the Peregrine's involvement was mentioned. It was even true that the funding and resources for Quartered Seasons wouldn't be discussed in their little Named councils, since I'd made it clear to Masego that if need be the crown of Callow would fund it entirely on its own.

But there's only many so people within the Arsenal, and for some parts he would have needed helping hands, I thought. For drudgework and fetching records or even assembling mundane objects. Hells, just the use of limited ritual resources like high quality scrying tools or rare substances were trails that could be followed if you knew where to look – which Nephele would, since she was in on one of the quiet projects. The two heroines had been trying to figure out what had been used by figuring out what hadn't been allocated in the actual sessions: resources and staff that mysteriously never made it to the discussion, unexplained holes in the budget. Even if they had managed to pull it all together it still wouldn't be enough to actually know what Masego was trying to accomplish, but it might be enough to allow them to make a few educated guesses. Which as lot more dangerous than them actually knowing, in my opinion.

"Interesting," I finally said, putting down my cup. "But it's the killing of the Wicked Enchanter you mentioned when making claim of a plot."

"There have been rising tensions for weeks," the Hunted Magician said. "Incidents occur more and more frequently, and become graver – and then, in a fortress the size of the Arsenal, the Red Axe and the Wicked Enchanted simply happen to meet. Someone filled the cup, Black Queen, and then arranged for the drop that would make it run over."

And the thing was, that made perfect sense to me. But then I was speaking to a man for who paranoia had been the path to survival for years and coming back from fighting on a front against the Hidden Horror for two straight years. I was inclined to believe him because I'd grown used to death hiding in every shadow, which meant my judgement was not unbiased. And if I tighten my grip too strongly around honest mistakes by heroes, I thought, I might just cause the incident I am trying to avoid. There were more than twenty Named in the Arsenal, if I – a villain, however respected I was in some quarters – acted like I was trying to cover up something then someone was going to do something stupid. And when the first stone in the avalanche came down, it'd be beyond my power to turn the tide back.

"That is speculation, not proof of anything," I said.

The man's face fell into a mask again, this time trying to hide his anger.

"But I dislike the shape and timing of this," I conceded. "You were right to bring this to my attention. I'll take the situation in hand personally."

Anger was gone, a mix of relief and wariness in him instead. He must have been halfway decent at this at some point, I thought, since the reflexes were there. He was badly out of practice, though, and he'd learned some self-defeating habits since. Another detail adding an entry to the 'highborn who fled from the consequences of his actions' tally I was mentally keeping.

"Then I can only thank you for granting me this audience, Black Queen," the Hunted Magician said, bowing in his seat.

I didn't invite him to stay and share a drink, though it would have been good politics, as my mind was already considering what needed to be done and I was reluctant to let the pot keep boiling while I played courtesy games. Instead I rose to escort him out, then closed the door behind him and leaned against the wooden frame. Hakram poured himself a finger aragh in the cup the Magician had not used, then sat down on the edge of the sofa to sip at it.

"Two Named, if not more, were led to start digging around one of our most dangerous secrets," I said. "Another two Named, between who conflict is good as certain, happened to run into each other here. And now the Mirror Knight was sent here to prevent a 'murder', when even with the fluidity of time in the Ways it's near certain he was warned about the circumstances before they took place."

I grit my teeth.

"Once is accident, twice is coincidence," I began-

"Thrice is enemy action," Hakram finished.

Except that, when it came to Named, coincidences were nothing of the sort. Which meant my enemy had drawn first blood and then struck again before I even realized I was in a fight, so I was in dire need of catching up. I limped back to low table and took my drink in hand, tossing the rest of it back in a single swallow.

"You have a plan," Adjutant said.

"I have a step," I corrected. "What I need is someone with utter disregard for other people's privacy, an inveterate hunger for juicy gossip and a pathological need to screw with everyone until it's clear what makes them tick."

"Wouldn't it have been simpler," Hakram asked, "just to say Archer?"

I'd meant for Indrani to come to us but apparently she was currently eating, not all that inclined to move and the attendant we'd sent to fetch her was afraid of her. Which, in all honesty, was probably smart of him. So instead I limped my way down to the meal hall with Hakram at my side, the two of us and our guide passing through corridors ghostly empty. The Alcazar, the part of the Arsenal meant to host important guests, was apparently connected to quite a few other sections by private halls not meant to be used by anyone else. It made sense, I supposed. If Cordelia Hasenbach needed to use the Mirage, she wouldn't want half the scholars in this place to watch her every time she headed there. I learned from our chatty guide that Archer had ignored her own guest rooms in the Alcazar to bunk elsewhere – Masego's quarters in the Belfry, at a guess – and that she'd never bothered to use the private eatery in there. She was eating the same commissary fare as everyone else, which I found odd given her appreciation for luxury.

It all made a great deal more sense when we entered a hall that could have seated four hundred and I saw she was the only person in it, sprawled lazily on a bench as she dipped pieces of bread in melted cheese and popped them into her mouth. Indrani did not need decadence to be brought to her, she brought decadence wherever she was.

"Did you make the kitchens cook this for you alone?" I called out. "I'd call it abuse of power, but honestly by your standards this is almost reasonable."

Practically inhaling another dipped piece of bread, Indrani swung around and rose to her feet in a single fluid gesture. It would have been a lot more impressive if she didn't have a string of melted cheese hanging off the corner of her mouth.

"Your Queenly Majesticness," Archer solemnly bowed, smothering a grin, "your most humble servant hath returned. I now pray most faithfully that Your Great Regality will smile on—"

With great pleasure, I stopped leaning on my staff just long enough to smack her on the crown of the head – or would have, if she'd not twisted around and caught the yew before pulling. Before I could so much as insult her I was made to stumble, caught by the waist and led into a dip before she kissed me. If I put a hand behind her neck it was purely to hang on, not because I was trying to lean into it and feel a little more of her. She withdrew with a smug grin, leaving my lips pleasantly bruised.

"You smell like cheese," I told her.

"You sound a little breathless," she replied, the smugness deepening.

"From trying not to breathe it in," I scorned, then parted from her with a step to the side.

"That aragh I got from you?" she asked, sounding interested.

I leaned forward and stole a piece of bread from her plate, dipping it and deftly popping it into my mouth. Huh, that really was quite good. Adjutant cleared his throat, reminding Archer that he was also there. The attendant had retired during my passing moment of distraction, though the more honest word for it might have been fled.

"I'm happy to see you too, big guy," Indrani warmly said, clasping his arm. "But you've got too much teeth for a dip of your own, if that's what you're hinting at."

"You've got too little to warrant a hint," Hakram replied without missing a beat. "But it's good to see you too, 'Drani."

Even as I laughed at the casual verbal backhand she'd received with a stunned oof, the tall orc picked her up in a hug as easily as if she were bag of turnips. She shrieked in laughter, her 'surprised struggling' somehow ending up with him being smacked on the side of the face quite a lot. She was put down on the long table little bird and tried to bat away my continuing pillaging of her meal – there was some Arlesite sausage there, the good stuff with the spices from the Free Cities, so I'd gleefully helped myself – only to be ignored by right of queenly prerogative.

"Did you come all the way here just to eat my food?" she complained.

"Callow pays for part of the food budget," I said, chewing on a mouthful, "so in a sense it was really always my food."

"It's sad how power will go to the head of even the most sensible of women," Archer sighed. "And you too, I guess, but-"

I threw a stripe of mustarded venison at her, though as expected she caught it. I'd been hungrier than I'd thought, I mused as I stole a stripe for myself. There was a sweet taste to the sauce as well that was delicious, and I let out a little noise of pleasure. In a sense the way I'd been when I'd still been Sovereign of Moonless Nights, requiring neither sleep nor food, had been better. It'd certainly been more efficient. But I still remembered the nights where it had all been like ashes in my mouth, when nothing but the hardest of liquors had tasted of anything at all, and I could only count my blessings that I was now rid of those times.

"Is no one going to offer me anything?" Hakam drily asked.

We ignored him, since it wasn't that large a plate.

"We have something of a problem," I told Indrani.

She nodded.

"I brought the killer in from the cold and didn't keep close enough a watch on her, that's on me," Archer frankly said. "Mind you, the man had it coming if even half the stories I heard are true."

The Wicked Enchanter had been, from what I beginning to grasp, broadly disliked and held in disgust. It shouldn't be difficult to find out exactly why, though likely unpleasant, but that wasn't what caught my attention. He'd been a villain even other villains were lukewarm about, one the heroes would be able to hold up as the kind of monster deserving the headman's block instead of the protection of the Truce. That was a problem, since it meant this wasn't just a thorny little mess to arbitrate: it was a knife someone had aimed at the Truce and the Terms themselves.

If the Red Axe was killed over this, I suspected the heroes would riot. If the Red Axe wasn't killed over this, I knew sure as I knew my own breath that the villains would riot. And on top of that, just adding more more disastrous insult to the injury one of the heroes I'd find it most difficult to beat into humility without killing him, the Mirror Knight, had just blown in with supporters and no warning to meddle. If it even looked like I was lenient on the Red Axe, the perception among the villains I spoke for would be that I'd been leaned on by one of the luminaries of the other side and given ground.

I'd look weak and Below's champions did not follow weakness, much less obey it.

"We're in a fight, 'Drani," I murmured. "And it's starting to look like we showed up to it already bleeding. I'm going to need you."

Archer's hazelnut eyes turned serious as she leaned forward.

"You have me," she said. "Are the heroes taking a swing?"

"I don't know yet," I grimly replied. "But we're in a story, Archer, make no mistake. And it's one meant to cut us deep."

And it might just be my imagination, I thought, the habit of seeing a grinning skull in every dark corner... but I can almost the smell the cheap booze in the air, hear the mocking tune from the badly strung lute. I took the pretty silver knife on the side of Archer's plate, idly flipping it through my knuckles as I stepped back from the table.

"There are now," I said, "twenty-three Named within these walls."

That we knew of. Certainty was a necessity for Named, if you wanted to ever be more than a middling swordhand in the middle of nowhere, but this early and when the game afoot was still shrouded it would be a mistake to believe we knew everything about the board there was to be known.

"The Arsenal usually counts five heroes, three villains and two Named of unclear allegiance," Hakram said.

I took to tapping the flat of the silver blade against the side of my fist, thoughtful.

"The Concocter's one of ours," Archer said. "She keeps it quiet but the things that end up in her cauldrons aren't always the sort the Heavens would approve of, if you catch my drift."

Charming. Five to four, then, and with the Doddering Sage being the only uncertain – though more because his bouts of lucidity were rare than because of any reluctance to pick a side, as I understood it. That was still ten Named who stayed in the Arsenal on a more or less permanent basis, and most of them would have ways to communicate with the outside world beyond those the Grand Alliance had made available to them.

"You've got four," I said, eyes turning to Archer.

"Half and half," she cheerfully said.

And she'd brought in the Red Axe as well, who was now being held in a cell. Then another five Named after that: the Mirror Knight and his close friend the Blade of Mercy, the seemingly cautious Exalted Poet and the ambiguous Maddened Keeper, and last of all the gallant but decidedly dangerous Kingfisher Prince. Throwing in Adjutant and more generously my own nascent Name brought us at twenty-three. Twelve heroes, nine villains and two whose nature was not so clear-cut. Enough that the villains would feel outnumbered, and dangerously so since one of them had just been killed. Yet the heroes would feel pressured as well, given the quality of the opposition: four of the Woe were here, and our reputation was a weighty thing. The two poor bastards in between would be seen as potentially decisive in any clash, and so worth forcing the allegiance of – either to get rid of liabilities before blades came out or to secure a nasty surprise to spring on the opposition when they did.

It was a murderous brew someone was pressing to the lips of the entire Truce and Terms, and all it'd take was for one fool to be scared enough to drink.

"The Arsenal regulars are the thread that should be quickest to unwind," Adjutant said. "Someone set the Repentant Magister and the Blessed Artificer after a secret – it may truly be Quartered Seasons, it may be something else. But they were contacted, and that is a concrete thing.”

There were five under Above in these Arsenal ‘regulars’: Roland, the Blind Maker, the Repentant Magister, the Blessed Artificer and the Bitter Blacksmith. The Hunted Magician had implied that his ‘close study’ of the Blacksmith had revealed no change in mood around the time the Magister and the Artificer began digging, so she was not a likely suspect. I closed my eyes to think.

“So we find them in their rooms and make them spit out a name,” Indrani mused.

“As it happens, the Blessed Artificer has already requested an audience to lodge a complaint under the Terms,” Adjutant gravelled, pleased.

Something about that had me begin tapping the side of the blade against my knuckles, the coolness of the silver against my skin grounding me.

“It’s bullshit,” Indrani flatly said. “She was pushing Zeze, not the other way around. I don’t think she meant to actually blind him – she looked surprised by how harsh his reaction was – but she was definitely trying something.”

“What he means is that we should now consider ourselves watched at all times,” I said without opening my eyes, “and that an audience she requested is a reason to meet in private with her not even the heroes can grumble about.”

As it happens, Hakram had said. That was what had raised my hackles. It’d happened and it’d happened in a fight where coincidence was nothing more the flimsiest of the lies at play. A story had been offered up to us: Adjutant, Archer and the Black Queen met with the Blessed Artificer. It was the only the first step, though, the air of the tune. Through guile and reason those three would reveal the machinations hidden in the shadows of the Arsenal, to prevent madness from seizing the halls and keep the peace. It was a pretty story, true, and for more than a few Named it’d be a serviceable horse to ride. For us, though? I was a warlord, a killer and maker of pacts. Adjutant was my right hand and guardian, Archer was my blade and my eyes. It was a good horse but one for which we’d make poor riders, which made it a shit horse in every way that mattered. After all, no matter how good the horse if an ass was riding it’d still lose the race. We’d been offered that hook so we might bite it and be reeled in to our defeat.

Another angle was required here. The villains? There were four among them that were Arsenal regulars: Masego, the Hunted Magician, the Sinister Physician and, if Indrani was correct, the Concocter. I was inclined to believe her, given that they'd known each other back in Refuge when they'd been pupils of the Lady of the Lake. But no, it was still the same story from a different angle. We'd shake the tree until truths came tumbling out, and they would. I was not so naïve as to assume that if some plot was afoot there would not be at least one of mine involved. The Hunted Magician himself was not exempt from the suspicion for having brought this to me in the first place, for though I doubted he had the skill or know-how to hook me onto a losing story that did not mean he was not the tool of someone who was. Trouble was, we only had so much to go on here and following any of those threads would take us back to the end I was trying to avoid it.

"It's a shit horse," I muttered. "But it's the only one we've got, isn't it?"

Ah, but that was my mistake. I was trying to win according to the rules when I should be trying to win despite them. If you were forced to run a race you could only lose, then the only way to win was to cheat. I opened my eyes and found both Hakram and Indrani were watching me in silence. Waiting, knowing from experience that if I'd emerged from inside my head it was with an idea.

"This is a story," I repeated, and smiled.

I twirled the knife across my knuckles, enjoying the blur of silver and movement that danced according to my will.

"And we might not know how it goes, not exactly, but we know the shape of it," I mused.

We three curious souls would learn things from our first step that only caused more questions, struggle and search and perhaps even tangle with a mysterious or misguided opponent. It'd go downhill from there, though, but when it all seemed like it was going to fall apart we'd get a moment of revelation from an unlikely source that flipped it all upside down and allowed us to turn it around at the last moment. We wouldn't, of course, because we were not the heroes of his story. I was likely to be executing the Red Axe before long, so it'd be like a chicken trying to fly in a sparrow's tracks if I tried to act like I had the right to that sort of providence.

"The thing about providence, though, is that once you understand how it works you can predict it," I told them with a smile. "It can't do something out of nothing, and it uses the most appropriate tool for the job."

And of the ten Arsenal regulars, who was it that was the best fit for a revelation at the edge of disaster? I caught the knife and flicked it down, smiling when it bit into the table with a satisfyingly sharp thunk.

"We're going to speak to the Doddering Sage," I said. "To see if going backwards from the revelation allows us to quicken the pace."

Disaster was on the horizon, I thought, I was in over my head and even the trusted companions at my side might not be enough to get us through this unscathed. And still, as I hummed the first few notes to the old rebel song The Fox In the Woods, I found myself smiling.

Gods, but it was good to be home.

Javvies

Yep, this is a situation rife with problems.

And yeah ... Bard is almost certainly tied into this in some way, shape, or form.

And there's confirmation of third party involvement and meddling.

hakureireimu

Cat basically called her out:

dadycoool

Honestly, if she weren't the Intercessor, I'd say someone needs to give her a hug. All these years she's been chained to this life, constantly decaying, just sounds like a very bad time. But then she goes and ruins it by being herself.

erebus42

Oh. That is a good way to fuck up a conspiracy story. The sage is the one everyone would ignore until he spouts off some crucial insight that sets the stage for the final act.

Tenthyr

The Bard is back. I do wonder how long it'll take before her ultimate aims are revealed. I'm honestly surprised the dead king hasn't belled it into the universe by now, just to be rid of her.

Javvies

If the Dead King said it, who would believe him?
He pretty much has zero credibility with almost everyone.
Anything he claimed would be nigh automatically dismissed as lies and deceptions, and any evidence supporting his claims that was later uncovered or otherwise found out would be viewed in the same light.

Oshi

He already set up for his revelation. Remember the thing cat is hunting among the Dominion's past. That is where he will start. The Bard knows it and I'm betting this is her play to counter his.

Javvies

The Dead King cannot just tell anybody whatever information he has.

He has to set them up to find it out on their own.

If the Painted KNife doesn't end up appearing just to play this role, I'll eat my keyboard. Cat was even playing with a knife as she said it XD

RoflCat

Considering what the Arsenal and the Terms stand for, my guess is: her goal this time is to break the rising 'peace' between Heroes and Villains.

We have the Hunted Magician as an example of that, he's managed to bed at least two heroines who in normal circumstances would likely smash his skull in asap.

But with this slowly built up peace between them, if left alone some day the Named might stop caring about Heroes and Villains and only punish the ones doing bad things, Heroes or not.

Which means the end of many old Stories, and in a sense Bard's influence.

So Bard need to poke the biggest "WE GOOD" Hero and stab the biggest "I BAD" Villain to try and stir hostility between them. And hey, we got one dead Enchanter whose crimes are so bad everyone, even Villains, detest him. And here's Mirror Knight, the ultimate Good (read: stupid) Hero oh so easy to use even Procer nobles are doing it.

Wonder

But why? Why? Why would Hard sabotage the very thing keeping all powers focused on Keter's war? Isn't she an enemy of TDK?

Shveiran

Bard has more than one objective, though which they are is everyone's guess. She has been around for a very long time, and I doubt she cares only about Keter.

Either she cares about something else more, or she believes she can crumble the Truce and still lure the DK in a snare that will end him.

Liliet

This is a FANTASTIC setup for Cat's paranoia to blow up in her face and for her to find out in the end that actually the person she assumed was an antagonist by definition without bothering to even try to assess her actual motives, was not in fact an antagonist in this one.

Cat has been known to jump to conclusions in things like this before.

A confirmed false guess: at the start of the fae invastion Cat was convinced Akua was behind it.

Shveiran

It's not that you are wrong, but I'd point out that Cat is mainly doing her thing.

If the Intercessor is an ally, she won't sabotage her. If she sabotages her, she isn't.

I mean, it's not like Cat was preemptively trying to slay the sleeping dragons, creating an enemy out of her fears. She is just taking into account the existance of a powerful player whose objectives are still an unknown.

That's not really paranoia, is it?

She sees Catherine as the greater threat. I seem to remember she wanted TDK to “eat” her a couple of books back.

Sir Nil

Cat is sidestepping the story... again. I have to wonder, if whoever plotted this accounted for it. For Cat is predictable in the way she never rides the story.

Sir Nil

Well, stories that she doesn't win anyways. Just remembered Contrition. Still, Cat getting served a story she doesn't win is very suspicious.

dadycool

This is the environment she's supposed to be in. Not a position of ultimate power where things tend to go right (she's not a Hero), not a million-and-one-step scheme where ten thousand people each have a slice and can't interact (though that was a really fun moment last book), not even an even fight. Her environment is uphill battles. She can only truly succeed if every deck is stacked against her, she's surrounded by enemies, and there's no hope for survival. Then, she can Struggle. It's good to have OG Cat back. Especially when she can play with her Archer.

>Ah, but that was my mistake. I was trying to win according to the rules when I should be trying to win despite them.

Finally, she remember that one thing that help her through so many impossible odds: Screw the rules.

Now let's see how she'll put that Mirror Knight in his stupid place for getting manipulated so easily.

Frivolous

I'm kind of surprised that Cat isn't worried about killing the Mirror Knight. She seems confident that she can; she worries instead about stopping him without killing him.

Makes me wonder what set of tactics with the Night she has planned that can zap MK. Maybe putting him into a domain, exiling him into outer space?

We keep getting hints that there is more than one Bitter Blacksmith, and that they are siblings. How is that possible? I thought there was only ever one holder of a Name.

Really wish I knew what Quartered Seasons was about. I didn't anticipate it would turn out to be a weapon, and yet Cat thinks it can be used for decide.

I love the Name Sinister Physician. So cool.

Shveiran

Honestly, whatever else she has become, she is still Black's pupil: just because she has been working with the Heroes for a long time, I doubt she doesn't have a plan to take down every single one of them if the need ever arises.

Tony Stark preparing to clone Thor ever since the first Avenger meeting has NOTHING on Black and Cat.

And to think she used to say she didn't have this sort of mindset and never would have. Ah, they grow up so fast...

Mammon

Heavenly Artificer and Bitter Blacksmith are siblings of one another. One good, one evil.

Quartered Seasons is probably that if there's a Summer, Winter, Spring and Autumn, that's a consistent number. Either they haven't found Spring yet, or the Book 2-3 stuff now merged Summer and Winter or dissolved them completely to require 1-2 new realms. One is Twilight, the other might be undiscovered. Maybe good, maybe something akin the Shadowvale, maybe the Drow's Gloom will end up becoming it. Or maybe the elves stole Spring turning it into the Bloom, thus leaving it undiscovered.

Liliet

> Heavenly Artificer and Bitter Blacksmith are siblings of one another. One good, one evil.

No, you're wrong. For one Blessed Artificer is Soninke and Bitter Blacksmith the female is named Helmgard, which is decidedly not a Soninke name. For the other we have repeated mentions of a 'younger brother' who is a villain and currently located at Twilight's Pass. Like, it's explicit. While this one is specifically mentioned as a hero.

Liliet

> We keep getting hints that there is more than one Bitter Blacksmith, and that they are siblings. How is that possible? I thought there was only ever one holder of a Name.

I think it's not hints, it's blatant text at this point.

We've had twin Soninke candidates for a Name in the Squire arc in Book 1 (though it was revealed only in WoG that they were twins) and there are the Sisters (who likely had the Name of Priestess of Night until their apotheosis with Cat's help).

It looks like siblings can, in fact, share a Name.

Frivolous

I'd agree, but I keep/kept wondering if maybe there was some kind of mistake, maybe a typo or continuity error.

Liliet

No, it was pretty explicit from the start that a heroic sister and a villainous brother by the same Name exist.

Like, the whole context in which it first came first was Cat clarifying “this Bitter Blacksmith, not that other one”.

Ze Mighty Vegetable

Maybe the Bard wants to trap Catherine in a Name? Names are Roles. Some have built in limitations. We know the Bard chooses the stories. Or maybe she fears what Catherine’s nascent Name could become. She might want to lock Catherine in a Name to prevent her from getting a more dangerous Name. Who knows? Catherine could have the potential to get a Name whose schtick is affecting the stories themselves. The Bard might fear this. Or she could be training Catherine as her replacement. Maybe Catherine’s story mirror the Bard’s origins. Who knows? The only certainty is that I can’t wait to read more.

Matthew

That was what I think, what better name for an enemy you hate, releasing yourself and stopping her from directly leading or interfering again... Cat would still catch on to how use it well very quickly I dare say

Mental Mouse

It makes me think of quantum exclusion: Siblings can share a Name, but they still have to be differentiated – say, one Hero, one Villain. I wonder if one of those twin Squire candidates would have followed the White Knight instead of Black?

Liliet

That seems definitely wrong. They were both fighting William, they were running on twin telepathy, and our other likely example (the Sisters) did not have a differentiation like that either.

Miles

Remember when Masego got his Name and made an exclamation about understanding the nature of Gods, after witnessing the fae sun attack from ground zero? That’s what quartered seasons is. They’re trying to something something Gods by something something Fae

“This is a story,” I repeated, and smiled.

I twirled the knife across my knuckles, enjoying the blur of silver and movement that danced according to my will.

Burlyraven

Look, just resurrect Tancred and use him to even the numbers some (I kid, I kid).

Seriously, though, in stories where the villain needs the hero to discover a truth for themselves, it's usually best for them to drop hints for a sometimes allied hero. Roland actually would fit that story perfectly, as he's an unimpeachable hero that seems "permitted" to work with agents of Below, even outside of extenuating circumstances. He has been noted as taking on the wizard in the tower role, though, so there may be some ambiguity there.

Liliet

...Huh. Cat's failing to properly take on the mastermind mantle, isn't she? Her best story bet should be guiding one of the heroes towards these same revelations, and Roland would make an excellent candidate... but it seems she's not there yet skill-wise 😊

beleester

The trouble is the mastermind is usually also a suspect in a mystery like this.

onedollargum

Or ends up as the person with the shady past risking (and losing) their life to save the hero in a noble redemptive sacrifice.

Cat's deadset against redemption because redemption would set her dead.

Liliet

I mean, Cat's already a suspect – for MK no-one else, and likely for Nephele and Blessed too. But she is in fact innocent, so...

Shveiran

The mastermind in a conspiracy story does not win. The protagonist does.

In some stories, the mastermind dies "while misunderstood".

I think she has it right in staying clear of those roles.

Liliet

The mastermind can win if they were in the right all along.

We might have different pools of examples, I'll give you that.

Shveiran

I think it's more that you are thinking in terms of "can work means Cat could make it work", whereas with this many Named around I think more in terms of "can work means can fail, and there is too many variables for Cat to choose to ride this particular horse".

As in, you see her going Pilgrim (stories lend me strength, so I embrace the right ones) whereas I think she'd go more Black in this instance (stories carry risks, so I stay clear of the wrong ones).

Liliet

Cat doesn't really go for Amadeus's approach. She rides stories that suit her and twists ones that don't until they do.

"Framed party on the run trying to goad the heroic investigators into the real truth" is a quality variation ^^

Shveiran

→If the Red Axe was killed over this, I suspected the heroes would riot. If the Red Axe wasn't killed over this, I knew sure as I knew my own breath that the villains would riot.

→ We wouldn't, of course, because we were not the heroes of his story. I was likely to be executing the Red Axe before long, so it'd be like a chicken trying to fly in a sparrow's tracks if I tried to act like I had the right to that sort of providence.

Confirmation we were on the right track, it seems.

Liliet

Right track indeed, but we've yet to see how this shakes out :3

Thanatoss

I feel like this Story may shape her new Name. It will end in some epic line where she comes fully into her Name.

But yeah Intercessor is very likely to be involved here, or maybe not, maybe Dead King is making it look like Bard?

Liliet

Or maybe Cat's just paranoid. There's a reason why she caught herself and told Hunted his guesses were only guesses.

Mental Mouse

It's not paranoia if they really are out to get you! It's "heightened watchfulness", aka "security mindset".

pagesbe

Enough things are lining up in a world where coincidences rarely are actual coincidences. And Bard has the means to set this up (we don't know the motive, but she could do it), and the DK has the motive and unlikely but possibly the means.

I would be absolutely shocked if this was just a series of unrelated events. I'll follow Occam's Razor on this one and say that it's more likely these events are related than each one of these things happens to be a complete coincidence. Not to mention, SOMEONE tipped MK off about what was going to happen... before it happened.

Liliet

> in a world where coincidences rarely are actual coincidences.

...except for when they usually are. Again, narrativium makes sure everything COINCIDES in maximum drama way.

I mean yeah odds are this is all related somehow, but there are degrees of related that are not 'there is a puppetmaster directing every single weird event individually'.

Shveiran

... In Book 6?

Liliet

I mean, 'puppetmaster directing every single event without any unexpected interference popping up from people just being idiots/assholes in a general way' is straight up bad writing regardless of what Book it's in, so there's that.

Shveiran

Sure, but there is no need to go that route.

For a while, Aqua served as the “puppetmistress” opposed to Cat’s “brute” role.

EE handled it by showing us that Aqua’s defeats in Book I were red herrings (she was never really planning to become the squire or win a Legion) or that they were bumps in the road that she could, nevertheless, work with because she had secured some of her objectives (Aqua getting mauled at First Liesse, yet securing at least the governorship that would allow her to start the preparations for her ritual array).

Bard (or Malicia, or DK) would not need to have foresaw all of this since its inception. They’d merely need to be able to say “this protagonist induced change causes stress to the system/narrative here, here and here.

With the many subtle, secret yet narratively established tools, how can I prod these sensible parts to shape this mess in a way that is profitable to my own long term objectives?

I mean, really; Malicia spending these two years making a study of heroes and their mind frame to find ways to manipulate them would really be out of character or a bad twist, considering how many spells there are in her treasure trove? I wouldn’t find it contrived in the slightest.

Granted, I’d want the novel to explain to me how it happened, but that’s kind of a given for anything.

And of the three of them, Malicia is probably the one will LESS secret weapons.

serpentrose

Regardless of whether she had a hand in instigating this situation, I can’t see the Wandering Bard not getting involved at some point. It’s too important for her to sit out.

Which gave me an odd thought: Scribe is behind this and is planning to trap the Wandering Bard.

Arden

I well I think it would be fun if Cat gets a Hero NAME in all this mess. That would make a lot of Charakters totally shocked and therefore likely 😊

Mel the Seer

Or Bard is meddling and using this to shape Cat’s new Name, plus setting up a strong enough story for Cat to finally cross that final hump. It has been pointed out that the Intercessor has less influence on those without Names.

Cat has been ruining stories, orchestrating the Truce (which would effectively flip the chess table Bard has been playing on for millenia), and running an arguably successful war against the DK all while the Intercessor has little more than a light grasp on how to steer her.

UnNamed Cat is a threat, the DK is a long term opponent. By forcing Cat into a Name that is "acceptable" to Bard, there is a handle to use to tilt the story in a way where Cat and the Dead King either destroy each other or at least weaken each other enough for their easier demise. In Cat's case, the Intercessor then gets to end the Truce and keep creation functioning as Above and Below intended.

AceOfSpade

We have two named whose allegiances aren't clearcut, Below or the Heavens? The Doddering Sage and the Maddened Keeper.

And at a glance you'd think it would be somewhat easy to put them both on opposing sides because they mirror each other somewhat: they both have access to important knowledge, but they're mostly cryptic and only reveal important stuff somewhat randomly. The Maddened Keeper because she's... well mad, and the Doddering Sage because he's senile. And from there you'd put the Maddened Keeper with Below because madness seems like a villain thing and she's the one dealing with forbidden knowledge, while the Doddering Sage seems to be a harmless senile scholar that Providence would love to use to drop important information when it is most useful to the heroes.

But I'd like to point out that "doddering" actually describes a condition of physical frailty more than a mental decline. And while Villains stop aging once they get their name... they can be of any age. So I'm thinking that the Doddering Sage might be a villain pretending to be a harmless senile old man.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Nice catch.

So the analysis that murder is necessary, as well as the analysis that Bard is likely to be involved, is backed up by Cat's opinion so far.

Of course, Cat's looking for a way out of the whole thing, and she's been wrong in assuming a known antagonist to be behind a new problem before. We'll see 😊

So far my bet is that a lot of people are going to end up involved ^^

...come to think of it this would be an excellent (awful) setup for "Catherine I was trying to work with you I was literally offering you a straight road to walk (that would have coincidentally cast you as more of a hero, don't look in that corner please that's a long-term setup that doesn't concern you really honest) there IS NO CATCH" from Bard ;u;

Daniel E

Looks like Black told Catherine about 'cheating providence' reasoning, likely as thanks for 'blowing up a perfectly good warhorse' trick. I wonder what Cat will use as her proverbial 'decoy stuffed with explosives' in this situation.

Jurai

I'd wager it probably won't be an undead goat.

> and that was setting aside the most dangerous enemy of all: simple, petty human nature.

"Against stupidity, the gods themselves contend in vain".

WuseMajor

I'm honestly curious what kind of heroine the Red Axe is. Is she the type who says "screw the rules, I do what I want," or the type who says "I know it was against the rules, but it had to be done and I accept the consequences."

Either of those could be a problem. The first one would make a big stink about things and pull the Mirror Knight into making a stink about things, regardless of the fact that she's legally in the wrong. The second one would be a nobly suffering martyr which is very sympathetic and very likely to generate providence to help her get out and bad press if she does get executed.

But yeah, this is a situation where a hero is morally in the right and legally in the wrong. Those stories tend never to go well for those tasked with upholding the law.

Jeremy Cliff Armstrong

I reject that she's morally in the right. She might be... if she can prove that the Wicked Enchanter was still engaging in the same behavior under the truce and terms. Or if she could prove he was going to return to the same behavior in the future. Otherwise what she's done is nothing more than petty vengeance... and vengeance is not a virtue. What the Wicked Enchanter did in the past is irrelevant to morality. The past is always irrelevant to morality... except in so far as it informs our understanding of likely futures.

Morgenstern

Following that line of thought, doesn't that make ALL "justice" (randomized punishment for past deeds, if you so will) the same as "vengeance"? Aka... there never is ANY justice at all?

(At least not in the sense that most would understand, as in some kind of ... compensation / reparation for the victim / heinous deeds someone committed.)

So, it's moral to (try to) defend yourself against, say, a rapist. If you succeed – and that means, he ends up dead – so be it, all fine and moral. If you do NOT succeed, however, because the other is too strong / you ended up in shock / whatever – you're simply fucked?

(Trying to find out the application of (this understanding of) "morality" in a general sense – that is, no longer related to this specific case here, where the argument is not about morality at all, but about how a sense of morality is juxtaposed to a specific set of terms/laws (the Terms and Truce). As you seemed to make the case that morality is somehow absolute and always comes along in the sense of "the past is ALWAYS irrelevant to morality, only the future ever counts".)

Morgenstern

To clarify, I actually came up with the exact same understanding some years ago. That it seems as if all "justice after the fact" seems to be simply "vengeance", because it's all about punishing some past deed, giving some sense of satisfaction to the victim(s) by whatever reparations/punishments thus incurred... But if I turn this on its head... I always end up with the question: Then what about the victims?

We do not KNOW about the future, CAN never know – we can only ever judge by past deeds. A rapist might turn into a self-sacrificing martyr afterwards, trying to make up for what he did – or he might not and just go on like he did before. We don't know and can only ever know AFTER the fact... So there seems to be no "safe way" to judge a perpetrator.

But what about the victim? Do we just go on because of said conundrum we have in the person of the perpetrator and tell the victim to "shut up and live with it"? How do we 'make good on' the victim?

Morality that says the past doesn't count seems to totally forget about the victim. While the kind of justice that seems more vengeance... is maybe too much centered on the victim.

Is there no standpoint in between these two extremes? If there is, what would it be... =/

Morgenstern

Also, "past" and "present" are rather mixed concepts when it comes to certain crimes. From other viewpoints, the deed might be rather fixedly in the past – but for the victim? It's all too often the DAILY REALITY they live in. It's their PRESENT; not their past. How to alleviate that, without at least punishing the perpetrator and telling people "this is NOT okay"?

It doesn't seem quite "moral" to leave out the victim and their reality out of such thoughts or even concepts, now does it. =/

Morgenstern

The Truce and Terms are presently a clusterfuck because it's total amnesty for whatever. The concept seems somewhat too absolute to me to still be "human(e)" and thus something that simply WILL turn into a clusterfuck at certain points (like this case here), if not amended via some exceptions where some kind of non-total amnesty comes in.

Not killing, of course. But some kind of "making up for what you did" – as well as some kind of leniency in cases of highly emotional confrontations, like "murder" and "killing in moment of unmanagable emotion" (lacking the correct word) are usually different things in our modern law systems.

Of course, that's still a whole new kind of clusterfuck as edges get muddled, but... aren't the Truce and Terms already all about alleviating the biggest problem into something a bit more manageable, cutting off the utmost extremes into some kind of ... less extreme behavior to each other?

Morgenstern

(Yes, in this present case, serving the war is the "making up for it" – but that leaves out the other part of the equation: the leniency in situations where overboiling emotions come into the equation, as seems to have been the case with the Red Axe. Killing as a way to solve all such conflicts that ended in more or less "accidental", out-of-the-moment killing is no solution that fixes the problem, as Cat has stated, that will only lead to one side foaming from the mouth – and that is full well knowing that leniency regulations might lead to people trying to exploit them, as in any law system. Just like there will always be some people arguing for making the law fiercer vs. more lax – but what's the solution? Extremes and absolutes certainly don't seem to lessen the problem, least of all solve it.)

ninegardens

Okay, so I have a plan to get out of this.... all their going to need is a scarecrow of sufficiently quality..... dressed as the Red Axe...

Honestly, I don't see the big deal.

Why would that wood figurine provide Nephele with a more powerful focus than she could have obtained from a talented carver?

Chapter 16: Divine

"Biting the hand that feeds you is another way to feed."

– Dread Emperor Vindictive II

There were seventeen different repositories of books in the Arsenal.

It was a frankly absurd amount and that number didn't even account the private collections some scholars, priests, mages and sundry Named had brought with them. The amount of knowledge held within these walls could be staggering to think about. There were a few places on Calernia where there might be greater collections, like the Tower in Ater or the House of Ink and Parchment in Delos, but those were fewer than five and even those would not draw from so many places and scholarly traditions as the Arsenal had. Several of the libraries were restricted to individuals assigned to official Grand Alliance projects and some held knowledge dangerous enough only a handful of people would ever be allowed to enter them, but we were not headed into the depths of this maze of a hidden fortress: the miscellaneous stacks were, in fact, a repository even guards had access to.

"People around here call them the Stacks of This and That," Archer told me.

She'd fallen into to my right and Adjutant to my left as the three of us abandoned the eating hall and headed towards where the Doddering Sage was most likely to be at this hour.

"So it's the dumping grounds for everything that doesn't fit into another repository," I said.

And wasn't either potentially useful or dangerous, I didn't add. Those books our people were most careful about leaving lying around.

"Might have started out this way, but it's a different beast now," Archer said. "It's one of the largest rooms in the Arsenal and it's filled with little alcoves. Now there's half a hundred little secret nooks where people can sit with a cup of something, hide for a secret talk or a fuck or even just a quiet nap."

"Wouldn't the custodians put an end to that?" I said, eyebrow cocked.

While I found it oddly charming that even in a place as alien as the Arsenal people were finding ways to claw back a piece of normality from the world, at the end of the day the stacks had an actual purpose.

"I expect there aren't enough of them to make a proper attempt," Adjutant said. "There's been two written requests to increase the people assigned to these stacks, since they frequently get their people temporarily poached for other work."

I'd probably seen one of those requests and simply put it out of my mind within moments of reading it, I silently admitted to myself. Throwing more coin and people at something like the miscellaneous stacks wouldn't have even warranted a second look when there were only so many of either those to go around and so many more important matters requiring them.

"It doesn't seem to be causing trouble," I finally said.

I was willing to let sleeping dogs lie, if the only consequence of letting this go on was the existence a few discreet places for people to wind down. Gods knew even Hasenbach's financial wizardry had its limits, and I wasn't going to be sending more coin this way if I could avoid it. The Arsenal cost near as much as one of the war fronts to maintain, which was a damned burden on the treasury even if it was a necessary one. The three of us kept a brisk pace as we passed through the central nest of winding hallways that was the Knot, the occasional pack of scholars in coloured robes falling silent as we passed by. A few recognized Indrani and greeted her, either through actual greetings or hastily taking a turn leading away from her, but to my amusement Hakram drew the eye more than I. I wasn't wearing the Mantle of Woe and my face was not well-known here, while he was a towering orc in attention-catching blackened plate.

We headed down through a set of broad stairs towards the part of the Arsenal known as the Stump. Named for its stout build, low ceilings and the fact that it was where the leftovers of more important places ended up, it reminded me of the old Proceran keeps sometimes found up north. Except the stone here was new and utterly bare, like it'd been conjured up out of thin air, and there was a... scent in the air. Almost like metal, but not quite. It was everywhere in the Arsenal, I thought, but stronger here than anywhere else. It smelled of work done through sorcery, and the taste of it had seeped into every breath I took. We took a right on a crossroads where the other path would have, as the carving on the wall indicated, led us to the Repository.

"You've met the Doddering Sage before," I said, breaking the silence.

I glanced at Archer and found the trace of a frown on her brow.

"Met is a strong word," Indrani shrugged. "It wasn't one of his good days."

"He grows... confused, as I understand it," I said.

"He's an interesting fellow," she replied, "but his conversation loops back around after a bit. He does not realize. Sharp, though, when he's there. Or so Zeze says, anyway. He must have been quite something in his prime."

Or he was a skilled liar and thought it in his interest for others to believe him as past said prime, I thought. Though Indrani could be frightfully perceptive at times, she was not flawless in her judgements. None of us were.

"Anything I should worry of?" I asked.

She considered that for a moment.

"I can't place his accent," Indrani said. "More like he doesn't have one, and he speaks at least four languages."

Maybe not Proceran, then. Most Named tended to be polyglots, but in that regard both heroes and villains from the Principate tended to be lacking. It wasn't a reflection of any inherent inferiority but rather of the fact that most of them tended to be regional and might genuinely never meet someone who didn't speak their native tongue throughout their entire life. Then again the old man was a sage, even if a doddering one, and that implied a certain knack for the scholarly. Something to keep in mind, anyway. A walk down a stunted little corridor brought us to broad open doors, and a carving in the wall spelling out Miscellaneous Works Repository in three languages: Chantant, Lower Miezan and Ceseo. There was a bureau buried under an avalanche of books just past the doors, and a harried-looking young man behind it who was frowning at an open volume by magelight. Someone had written department of this and that in chalk on the side, as well as the even cheekier ring if you need a custodian, we would like one as well I noted with a suppressed smile. We entered and as Archer took the initiative to go speak to the young man I took a moment to study our surroundings.

After the description of this being dumping grounds for every other library, I'd expected some sort of rampant chaos with but it wasn't anything like that. The magelight globes hanging from the low ceiling shone instead down on cramped but neat paths of shelves filled to the brim with books of all shapes and sizes, Chalk slates haphazardly distributing revealing some arcane library reference symbols and broad themes to swaths of the collection to which I saw no rhyme nor reason: history of fish, probably untrue sat side by side with Arlesite romance and both were across an entire stack filled with travel journal, but metaphorical. There was not a single lit flame within here, but magelights in glass globes had been tied to tongs of leather in a way that made it so they could both be worn and used as a handheld lantern. The impressive part, though, was the size of this place.

It was larger than the throne room in Laure, at the very least, and every spare inch seemed to be used by either stacks or wagon-sized wicker baskets filled with books not yet classed. I could hide an entire company of legionaries in here, I thought, and not a soul would notice until the goblins got bored. While I'd been lost in my contemplations, Archer had apparently gotten what she needed from the young man at the bureau – who was now, I noticed, staring at me with fear and awe while trying very hard to pretend he'd gone back to reading his book. I winked at him, then turned to Indrani.

"So?" I asked.

"He's in there," Archer said. "Though Gods only know where. Last sighting was apparently near the 'fluorescent, neither flora nor fauna' stacks."

"Stacks," I repeated. "As in, we have multiple of those?"

"It's important to look on the bright side of life, Catherine," Indrani grinned at me, then winked. "You know, 'cause fluorescent means-"

"You are the worst person I know," I informed her in disgust.

Ugh, puns. At least when the sappers made one of those, something usually exploded not long after. That was as close as redeeming such atrocity against the laws of Gods and men could be had. It was a true shame the Sisters weren't willing to allow that in the holy book, but I'd just have to keep suggesting it. Maybe some sort of appendix, I mused.

"But I don't expect we'll have too hard a time finding him," I continued, "will we, Adjutant?"

"That's about as clever as her pun," Hakram told me. "You just didn't wink afterwards, so it was less glaringly terrible."

We both ignored Indrani's outraged noises.

"Everybody's a fucking critic these days," I muttered. "Fine. My lord Adjutant, kindly use your aspect to search for the Doddering Sage until we have obtained his presence."

"Well, since you asked so nicely," Adjutant gravelled, sounding amused.

I found I was swallowing a grin. Gods, how was it that I'd missed those assholes so much? Without any more need for verbally jostling, Adjutant called on one of three crystallized manifestations of his Name. Find was Adjutant's most subtle aspect, and in truth one of the most nuanced I'd ever heard of: much like with Hakram himself, the apparent simplicity hid remarkable depth. While it could be used to significantly accelerate searched for anything material, whether living or not, it had more abstract uses as well. They tied into the way the aspect itself functioned, in my opinion. For example, after we hit the first crossroads Hakram closed his eyes and called on his aspect again before taking a swift left. This was not the act of finding information from a book where we knew it was or picking out a woman from a crowd: he was, in effect, going on nothing. And still he'd get us to the Doddering Sage, I had no worry whatsoever about that.

Masego had theorized – and Akua seemed to think it a reasonable inference – that what Adjutant was doing was a phenomenon known among diabolists as tapering. It was apparently common among the most intelligent of devils, when they grew ancient enough. It was an inherently inhuman degree of perception born from the fact that such devils could notice and remember ever detail in a way that humans could not and call on a sheer amount of experience physically unattainable by mortals. It allowed those creatures to adapt to wildly different surroundings, people and situations with seeming flawlessness by taking in everything around them and then refining the possibilities to what was the most likely truth. Tapering the noise until all that was left was the true tune. It was why an incubus could take over a Praesi seraglio just as easily as it could break apart a Stygian line-match.

The devil had a degree of perception that could not be matched by humans, and it was helped along by decades if not centuries of learning about the ins and outs of human nature. It was the opinion of those two that Hakram's aspect essentially allowed him to tap into a similar state for a small amount of time.

Vivienne, on the other hand, had noted she'd seen similar behaviour from the Bumbling Conjuror: providence's golden son, whose every debacle turned out to be a masterstroke until he ran into a villain so far beyond him providence was buried along with him. I was actually inclined to side with her on this. To my eye, Find looked a lot like discount providence put together for one of Below's: luck put together from the possible, but only ever a story's sort of luck. It could get us closer to what we needed, or what was already within our grasp, but it was not a panacea for all our ills and relying on it for answers was putting our lives into the hands of fickle, fickle luck. Regardless of who had the truth of it, though, in practice Adjutant guided us through twists and turns until we were deep within the maze.

Twice we passed hidden nooks, one occupied by a snoring priest on an armchair and the other by an impressive collection of bottles from I confiscated what looked like genuine Harrow brandy in the name of the throne of Callow, until Hakram's steps slowed. I cocked my head to the side, taking a whiff of the air. Was that what I thought it was? Huh. I took the lead in turning the corner, stumbling onto my first sight of the Doddering Sage. The old man looked haggard, I thought, taking in the rumpled grey robes and ratty cloth shoes, but somehow there was a sense of power to it. A mane of shoulder-length grey hair mixed with what would have been a long and luxurious beard, were it not unkempt. The Doddering Sage licked wet red lips and narrowed his amber brown eyes as he caught sight of me in turn, leaning back into a ratty brown armchair. In his hands was the source of the smell I'd caught: a polished little wooden pipe filled with freshly-lit wakeleaf.

"It's not for you, Constance," the Doddering Sage told me. "You're much too young, and this is a fool's vice besides."

"Shit," Archer muttered. "Not a good day."

I stepped forward, ignoring the comment, and came to lean against the stacks at his side.

"Tell me about it," I sighed, reached for the pipe I carried in my tunic. "I get headaches if I don't smoke at least once, nowadays."

The Doddering Sage watched me produce a small packet of my own wakeleaf – Hanno's gift, still with me – and stuff my own pipe before passing a palm over it to light it with a touch of black flame.

"Dragonbone," the old man said, eyes narrowing further. "Expensive. Rare. Dangerous. You are not Constance."

I breathed in, swallowing the smoke and spat it back out.

"I'm not," I said. "I'm the Black Queen, and you have answers for me."

"Do I?" the Doddering Sage said. "How good of me."

He brusquely snorted, then pulled at his own pipe. I could only watch in envy as he blew a smoke ring, then further showed off by blowing a smaller ring into it.

"Damn, but that is impressive," I admitted.

"I have a few years of practice on you, Foundling Queen," the old man smiled, face wreathed in the last wisps of his smoke. "You come to me for my eyes, I take it."

"Do I?" I asked.

When completely out of my depth, I was in no way above smiling meaningfully and saying something mildly cryptic. A truly ridiculous amount of people were almost eager to fall for that.

"That boy of yours, the one with the deadly earnestness, he'll be a terror one day," the Sage said, "but he's a few years short still. That's why an old sack of bones like me are brought in even when there are all these swaggering youths. I can look, yes I can. But you'll not hurt Constance, will you? Promise me."

His lip trembled in sudden emotion, and something in me clenched. He looked fragile, in that moment, though the truth of his fragility was hidden from him. Pity welled up, but I pushed it down. You could be playing me, I thought. And so I'll offer kindness where I can, but never without keeping a knife in hand.

"I won't," I said. "I promise."

"Good," he muttered. "Good. You do remind me of him, you know. Robert. He was kind, but he was not soft."

I said nothing, for there was nothing to say.

"Perceive," the Doddering Sage said, and Creation shivered.

I watched him, and saw his eyes had turned pure white – he looked blind, but only a fool would have made that mistake. I felt something skittering across my soul, like a spider against glass, and the old man exhaled.

"Twinned," he said. "Incipient. You make your own Role, and the Name walks hand in hand with another. I cannot see them, there is... refusal."

I shivered, fingers clenching around my pipe, and did not believe this for a moment to be the mad ramblings of an old man. Not when my very soul was shivering along with the rest of me, lost and reaching. The Doddering Sage turned towards me abruptly, so quick I thought his head might snap.

"More?" he said, sounding surprised. "You... how? It isn't yours, where did you take it?"

"What?" I said, leaning forward. "What did I take?"

"A rival?" he muttered. "A thief? A successor? You keep stories within you that neither your ear nor eye ever knew. Shapes and beats and the sound of the knife kissing flesh."

My pipe tumbled across the floor, though I did not remember dropping it – or catching the Sage's robes, fists tightening around them as I pulled him closer.

"Focus," I ordered, voice ringing with power. "The stories, where do they come from?"

My hand was shaking, and the answer was on the tip of my tongue. I knew this, I'd had it since/

/and my eyes were blinking. I pushed down the surge of rage that seize hold of me at the way I just couldn't seem to remember what I wanted. I would be mistress of my own mind, even if I had to rip out the parts that misbehaved.

"Sage," I said, "tell me."

"Reflection," he whispered, sounding awed. "No, an echo. You stole from her echo, and now it's in your head. How did you not break?"

I released his robes, stumbling back. Oh. Oh. And at last I remembered, what it was that Masego and I had done in the depths of Arcadia, when we'd harvested the echoes left behind by things that would become gods. He'd learned dark secrets from that, deep magics. And I had/ no you fucking don't, it's my mind and I there is only one ruler here. I wrenched the world back from the blankness, wrestled it back into submission. I was kneeling, gasping, and Adjutant's worried hand was on my shoulder. But it didn't matter, even as I convulsed and threw up at the feet of the Doddering Sage.

"Cat," Hakram quietly asked, "can you hear me?"

"Yes," I laughed. "Yes, I can hear you. And I remember now, what it is I got from the Intercessor."

The shape of a thousand stories, the tune of the song if not the words. An instinct, one that'd sharpened something already existing into a blade capable of upending old monsters and empires. I wiped my mouth and an apology to the Sage was halfway to my lips when I realized his eyes were closed and he was, seemingly, sleeping. Unearthing what had been waiting in the back of my head had knocked him out, looked like. I rose to my feet, slowly, and allowed Hakram to tuck my cleaned pipe back into my tunic as I leaned against his arm.

"Catherine," Indrani quietly said, "what the Hells was that?"

"I forced myself to remember something my mind didn't know how to cope with," I said. "But it was worth it. I know what's in the back of my head, and now that I know it can't be used against me."

The Augur had told us that the Bard saw in stories, saw all the stories, and that when dealing with Named she was nigh untouchable. But she could be beaten, because the more we knew of her the less power she held over us. And one of these days I would find a set of shackles even her smug immortal ass couldn't slither her way out of. The first step to that was realizing I'd stolen part of her and made it my own: that was on less surprise for her to pull on me when the time came. With surprising gentleness, Indrani reached out and took my face in hand. She withdrew after touching under my nose, fingers coming away flecked with blood.

"Don't think too hard, Cat," she said, sounding worried. "You're not made of Winter anymore: some things you won't get back up from."

"The more I bleed now," I replied, "the less I'll bleed when the knives really come out."

Still, I winced as I wiped away the blood beneath my nostrils. I had the most horrible headache. A glance at the Doddering Sage told me he was still out, so there'd be no more to learn here.

"Find out who the Constance he was talking about is," I quietly told Hakram. "If she's still alive, see to it she doesn't want for anything. If she's not, see to her descendants."

I owed the man, for this, and I'd pay my debt in full. He'd have a warm place to stay in after the war, be it in Callow or at Cardinal. That much I could repay, for what I'd learned today and what it had cost him to tell me.

"I'll see to it," Adjutant promised.

"I hate to be that girl," Archer said, "but we're in the shit now, aren't we? You said we were here for a revelation, but there wasn't anything about this that helps us figure out what's going on here."

I pushed off of Hakram and took my staff from the stacks where I'd left it propped up against, rolling my shoulder to loosen it. She wasn't wrong about that, though she wasn't exactly right either. I found the bottle of Harrow brandy I'd liberated from oppression earlier pressed into my hand, uncorked, and Indrani gave me a steady look.

"Your breath still smells like, you know," she told me, not unkindly.

Ah. That. Fair enough. I took a long swallow from the bottle, then another until the taste of vomit was quite gone and a pleasant warmth was beginning to settle into my belly.

"Good stuff," I muttered, passing it back. "Right, so us being the shit. True enough, 'Drani, but she actually told us exactly what we needed to know before we dipped into my little... gift."

"He told us things about your Name," Archer skeptically said. "Which I've been curious about, true, but it doesn't get us out of this mess."

"Sure it does," I said, "if you consider that, should we have followed the story as it was offered to us, we'd be learning this quite late. This is our revelation, Archer. We can go back from it."

Hakram cleared his throat.

"You're doing that thing again," he told me, "where you talk to yourself in your head and then expect us to keep up."

"You usually do, though," I muttered. "Fine, hear me out then. The three of us are bold investigators for truth and justice—"

"Hungering Gods," Hakram swore under his breath.

"Yes," Indrani jeered, "and let them kneel before us, begging abjectly for mercy we will always deny!"

"I'm not going to touch that," I decided, "so, by going down that road we bite into a story. One that got set out for us to bite because we're a bad fit for it, so we'll fail."

"And we are a bad fit for it, because?" Hakram asked.

"Indrani," I said, "how many people have you killed this year?"

The ochre-skinned Named hummed.

"Define people," she finally asked.

"Because that," I told him.

"So we are avoiding this story," Adjutant said.

"No," I said, "if I had something else to slap down instead I might, mind you, but I've got nothing. But that doesn't mean we can't cheat. The thing is, Hakram, that is a functional story. If we were a band of heroes, we could ride it to the finish."

"Now you're just making it too easy," Indrani reproached.

"For the trap to work," Adjutant slowly said, "the story has to be... functional for lack of a better term. It is simply us who would not function with it."

"Yeah," I said, "which is why we went directly for the Doddering Sage. He was my guess for the guy who, when it looks like we're about to lose for good, reveals a truth to us and allows us to turn it all around."

"As heroes are wont to," the orc nodded.

"Hate to break it to you, Cat, but he didn't say shit about conspiracies," Archer pointed out.

"Yes," I agreed. "He talked, instead, about my Name. Which means someone's trying to fuck with my Name, or maybe the one 'twinned' to it."

A poetic way to talk about a nemesis, but it fit. For every villain with Destroy, there was a hero with Protect. That was the way the Game of the Gods was played, and I'd be no exception. I cleared my throat.

"Without sounding arrogant-"

"That'd be a first," Indrani mused.

I flipped her off.

"- at least part of this is meant as a swing at me as well as a broader attack on the Truce and Terms," I said. "And that rather narrows down who it is we might be fighting against."

"If you cannot name the swordsman, name the sword," Archer snorted. "Fair. Only so many people who'd come swinging at you this way. So we're in a scrap with the Wandering Bard, are we?"

"She's come out of the woodworks at last," I grunted in agreement. "And she took her sweet time before she did, 'Drani, so this isn't going to be some sloppy half-baked attempt. She's come for blood, and at the moment she's winning."

"The Truce and the Terms are holding," Adjutant said. "And you have learned valuable information."

Yeah, I had. Which I would have taken for a victory, if I'd not just learned that part of the instincts that'd driven me to this decision had been ripped out of the old monster I was now facing. Which meant I was about to get taken for a ride, because she'd known about that and until now I hadn't.

"The Sage is unconscious," Archer suddenly said.

"But obviously alive, and not a hero besides," Hakram said. "If stirring conflict is the purpose, that is a weak hand."

"Shut up," I said, "both of you. Use your Name."

I called on Night instead, sharpening my senses to the very limit of what I could bear, and that was when I heard it: hissing sounds. Like a gas being released. At least ten, probably more.

"There is something in the air," Adjutant growled.

"And I don't hear anyone out there moving," Archer said.

Was everyone else out there dead? It might simply be a curse or a deep sleep instead, I mused, though death would likely be easier to arrange. I could not afford to take a moment and ponder how many innocents had likely just been snuffed out as part of a scheme, not when there were more lives on the line, so I tucked that away cleanly.

"The Concocter would be capable of making a brew that can do this," I said.

"I've known her to work with gases, sometimes," Indrani hesitantly agreed. "But she wouldn't, Cat."

"It doesn't need to be her plan," I murmured, "just her work. It being used will be quite enough, when heroes stumble into this."

Because that'd be the logical move, wouldn't it? If someone was trying to start a fight between Named in the Arsenal, what better way to have a pack of heroes stumble unto me and two of the Woe surrounded by corpses and an unconscious Named. Hells, it was going to be the Mirror Knight and his band wasn't it? That was the reason that little fucker was here at all: so that the Intercessor would have someone capable of rallying the heroic side of the Arsenal but having no interest in talking this out with me instead of drawing a sword. Any moment now he and the worst possible combination of Named the Bard could muster were going to come in, and I needed to think how I could wiggle out of this mess. The moment the Mirror Knight and the Black Queen came face to face, I decided, this was no longer recoverable. It'd become a conflict between the two of us, and people would have to take sides: even if I won and showed restraint, there was a decent chance the Truce and Terms would collapse in the aftermath of this debacle.

I needed someone to distract the Named coming, and then I needed to start tugging at the other threads of this story until it all came tumbling down and the Intercessor had nothing left to work with.

"People just came in," Archer murmured, then paused as she pricked her ear. "Five, two in armour."

"Hakram," I said, "I need you to do something for me."

The orc looked at me, then sharply nodded.

"It was my plot," he agreed. "Will you have already arrested me, or are we fighting?"

I clenched my fist, then slugged him in the side of the face.

"The day I throw any of you under the wheels like that is the day I slit my own throat," I hissed. "You, Adjutant, are investigating this on the behalf of the Black Queen. You're going to them for help, because you caught sight of two people running. Do what you can from the inside."

He took a step back, staggered more by the words than the hit.

"Archer and I are going to make a run for it," I said. "Make it look good."

If the Intercessor wanted to make me the villain of this fucking story, then she ought to have been more careful what she wished for.

I don't have any idea what you just said, but I agree wholeheartedly. Cat being a smartass Murderhobo spitting in the DM's face is always a good time.

"I've known her to work with gazes, sometimes," Indrani hesitantly agreed. "But she wouldn't, Cat."

I'm pretty sure that should be "gasses" there.

greycat

It's "gases", actually. But "gasses" is better than "gazes", I guess.

Barthumphries

Oh good, I was about to go look up what clothing item a cloth shie was.

Nice just! Also, when you only include a couple words, it can be a little difficult to place them in the story. Great work!

Abodmuthkat

Idle thought: did we have the Red Axe's name? I've only seen them get called by their Name.

Might be Constance.

Liliet

That's EXACTLY what I thought 😊

SpeckofStardust

Considering that Archer has been in a band with red Axe and knew her well enough to know the villain that spawned her she propyl would have said something by now. Further more Cat was first mistaken to be Constnace.

Kel the Seer

Constance could be the hero with Cat's twinned Name. It would explain the confusion.

ninegardens

Constance is a synonym for Stillness.

"Stillness" is a name given to the Bard by both Nessie and Hierarch.

Constance is totally the Bard.

Trebar

Well... that's an interesting little theory there. That could be interesting to see play out.

therealgridlock

And wouldn't you know it, cat let her paranoia drop and promised not to hurt her

Wanna bet that was the point of all this, to get cat to promise not to hurt whoever this constance is? Bard or not?

Funny how these things work out. She promised not to hurt her, so it's gonna have to be someone she needs to hurt.

Insanenoodlyguy

Oh god, this could work. Brute forcing the issue till you stumble into the real truth at the last minute is an easy alteration to the ill-fitting hero story she was almost trapped in! So why not use that? Be the wrong runaway they start chasing and let them charge right into the actual plot. Even if they think the wrong people are behind it they'll still promptly start unraveling the plan!

caoimhinh

I had thought she would just recruit some Heroes to form the investigative Band of Five. I mean, since her trio wasn't fit for that story, she could add 2 who were and then maybe it would work.

Right now she is risking a lot by embracing the role of the seemingly guilty party, as that kind of misunderstanding is the key to causing the bloodshed. There doesn't even need to be a villainous plot at play, just to make Heroes think there is one, for them to take arms and react violently.

pagesbe

Cat is smart, so I'm assuming that she dismissed that possibility for a reason other than "I didn't think of it." When it comes to manipulating stories, she's top tier in the book.

Liliet

Cat's pretty sure there ARE guilty parties and there IS a plot and at least some villains will be involved.

And "framed party trying to lead the heroic detective to the truth through hints" isn't all that bad a role. Especially when Cat's too powerful personally to get easily killed at the last minute.

caoimhinh

Yeah, true.

But the problem is that whether or not she is guilty of something is nearly irrelevant. She only needs to look like she is up to some Evil scheme and the Heroes will riot. This goes beyond whether someone is right or wrong, as that will not matter once there is bloodshed.

The real threat of this situation is towards the Truce and Terms, towards the fragile trust and temporal peace that was achieved between Heroes and Villains working together.

What you mentioned is indeed not a bad story for Catherine's survival, but it is a HUGE risk for the peace between Heroes and Villains. Because the target of this scheme is not Cat's life, it's the T&T.

Even if the Angels were to come down and clear Cat's name saying that she did nothing wrong, it would not matter if the Heroes and Villains are no longer willing to work together.

beleester

"The moment the Mirror Knight and the Black Queen came face to face, I decided, this was no longer recoverable. It'd become a conflict between the two of us, and people would have to take sides: even if I won and showed restraint, there was a decent chance the Truce and Terms would collapse in the aftermath of this debacle."

She thinks that the Mirror Knight is already convinced of her guilt, so she's running away to avoid a violent confrontation. She wants to buy time, keep running away from the Mirror Knight until the rest of the heroes (and villains) can investigate properly. Ideally, the story works in her favor, and the heroes discover the real villain just in time to stop the Mirror Knight from killing her.

Insanenoodlyguy

Yeah. It rarely goes this smoothly, but in the more conventional version of this story as Cat is guiding it, it goes something like:

Mirror Knight: *standing over the wreckage of the conspirator/s" Your plan has failed! We have stopped this plot! *turns to Black Queen" And now that the pawn is destroyed, time to deal with the mastermind!"

Some hero Mirror Trusts, running in: Waitttttttttttttt!
explanation of what really happened ensues

Shveiran

The real treath is to the T&T, but by provviding the heroes with a plot to uncover, she is delaying any extreme action on the heroes' part.

Sure, they are convinced Villains are plotting nefarious things, but there is forms to follow: you don't start the purge before you have UNCOVERED THE PLOT.

Therefore, so long as she avoids a direct confrontation, nothing irreparable happens to the T&T.

Unless something changes, obviously, but she is making this up as she goes.

Liliet

As Catherine has pointed out, this is a solid story that should get the heroes to the end with the correct conclusion.

Shveiran

She is taking on the physical role of the fugitive, while using the Adjutant to shape the narrative so that the BlackQueenTeam is also investigating the nefarious plot. So long as that is up, the Black Queen is not the Villain, but the unlikely ally.

A stopgap measure, to be sure. Yet the deadliest part of this whole venture is how much the table was tilted before Catherine even noticed: time is precisely what she needs to turn it around, and so long as she doesn't interact with the other parties the story can't cement its shape.

ninegardens

The story can totally cement its shape without her. ESPECIALLY if her agents are around and visible.

Shveiran

Only if her agents act as her limbs, it's not enough for them to be there. By claiming a role in the story, she becomes a key element; the bonds go both ways, the story will TRY to force itself out of the stasis and find a way to bring her back into the spotlight, but it cannot progress without her being in the spotlight.

She is trading in the certainty to be brought into the spotlight eventually for the guarantee things will stall until she is; this buys her time, without binding herself to an ending.

Brilliant yet risky, which is pretty much Cat in nutshell.

Insanenoodlyguy

yes, but she's COUNTING on that. The way she sees it, no matter how well she defends herself now, there are people who won't believe her and a confrontation will be inevitable. Especially since somebody will move the plot along. Even if she starts talking them down a crossbow bolt will catch somebody in the back or something. So instead, she's siccing the dogs on them. See, the heroes WANT to uncover the plot. The problem is, they think Cat is behind said plot. So, they look for Cat, take her down, and probably uncover the real plot at the same time. Or Cat fights them off, they uncover the plot after a lot of broken bones and hard feelings, and the T&T is fucked.

Instead, Cat's pushing the story along another acceptable groove. They "know" Adjutant is there to help with the bullshit. Black Queen is behind this plot! And where the hell is the black queen? Off running the plot, of course! Time to find this damn plot and root it out!

And so, they will. They will, by skill or by luck, end up right in the middle of whatever the real plan is, and immediately start stamping it out. During the course of this, said plan should be revealed, and can lead to a "Wait, so the Black Queen really didn't have anything to do with this?!" moment when none of the strings end up attached to her. Why prove your own innocence when you can make your accusers do so?

Justsomeguy

So, Cat is being measured for the role of intercessor's nemesis? That twinned could be someone else but I think the bard fits best right now.

dadycoool

When Cat was in Issere, the thought came into my head that her Name ought to be Narrator or something. My ongoing theory is at some point she'll Erase someone, probably Narrate a scenario to Hells and back, and, idk, Retcon something out of ever existing. (Think the forest that Tiber Septum Dreamed out of ever existing in The Elder Scrolls. I could be misremembering that.)

Raivshard

Narrator would be too similar to The Bard's own purpose, I think. If Cat's new Name is to be oppositional in some form, then it should be something that screws with the Game.

The Judge/Adjudicator, perhaps? Able to decide that a person is unfit or unworthy of a Name, and remove it from them or seal it away, or somesuch.

RoflCat

The Carver.

If Stories are grooves carved into Creation, and she is 'carving' open new grooves to create her peace. While Bard is merely someone retelling of those existing grooves.

Basically she's the force of changes while Bard is trying to push things back into the same old.

And of course she's carved up some fools in her time so it work as double entrende for her warlord way too.

Noldo

Has Cat realized that the pivot in this story is not the mystery or potential confrontation between Cat and Mirror but the formation of Cat's name?

Javvies

Bard.

And an active conspiracy to keep making things worse inside the Arsenal. Not just Bard having put pieces into motion long before and letting them play out.

Hakram, this is Cat. You're one of her people, and a personal friend. She's not going to treat you as expendable, much less throw you away as a decoy for dumbass Heroes. You should know this.

Earl of Purple

And if she did use Hakram as a decoy, who'd believe that his plot to kill Wicked Enchanter to give the villains an excuse to kick the heroes out of the Arsenal didn't come from Cat? He speaks with Cat's voice, most of the time, and is her one true, trusted friend and ally. He's her shadow, her right hand, her left hand and her pen on the paper. He's been empowered by Below to support Cat in all she does. Sure, he might betray her, but... More likely he's been put up to it by her.

WealthyAardvark

They're fighting a war, and it's life or death. The Truce and Terms shattering would be death assured. As we saw in the prologue, sometimes someone needs to volunteer to lead the doomed rearguard that keeps all from being lost. Hakram's a soldier, and that is a story he knows. Thankfully Cat once again has a better option.

Tenthyr

I find it very funny that the intercessor forgot that Cats specialty when playing the villian is causing atrocious amounts of carnage till everyone's plan is in pieces but hers.

Point Point

But in this scenario, carnage will make the situation worse, so the bard may think she has the upper hand. And by Catherine's own admission, she has had an edge up until this point, plus some two years of preparaton.

Tenthyr

That's the thing though: cat is currently playing the Mystery Villian On The Run. She's working the story from both sides. And now she's going to play a very, very good chase scene.

WuseMajor

See, I was wondering about the possibility that that Bard is grooming Cat to be her replacement. Or that becoming the new Bard is the punishment for upsetting the game between Heaven and Hell. I'm glad that the Sage raised the point.

Also, I'm concerned that she already got played here and that Constance is the Red Axe. Or at least someone else she'll have to have killed. And a Promise to a Named is not broken lightly.

Big I

Cat would never break a promise. She's "a woman of her word, however terrible that word might be. Let all Creation witness it."

Liliet

Yep, it's very very likely that Constance is the Red Axe 😊

ninegardens

Or the Bard

pirateddesigns

Wandering Bard is currently Marguerite of Bayeux ("Alamans? Really?").

I do think Constance is likely the Red Axe – it makes for a good Story twist that puts Cat in a bind and forces a decision between a) upholding her duty to be the villains' champion under T&T, or b) keeping her promise to the Doddering Sage.

Thorium

Two years ago, when we last saw her, she was Marguerite. That doesn't mean she is still her. She has a history of switching identity when leaving a Story, meaning there is a good chance she isn't Marguerite anymore.

talenel

What if Constance is Bard's original name? Something that even the Bard herself has forgotten after all this time.

Liliet

Ehhhh

Shveiran

"His lip trembled in sudden emotion, and something in me clenched. He looked fragile, in that moment, though the truth of his fragility was hidden from him. Pity welled up, but I pushed it down. You could be playing me, I thought. And so I'll offer kindness where I can, but never without keeping a knife in hand."

This is what she said literally after making the promise.

I don't know which one, but she has a loophole in hand. That much I know.

Shveiran

*literally before.

Curse you wordpress, you made my literally literally wrong.

Frivolous

Cat can kill Constance without hurting her. She just has to do it painlessly.

This is the same woman who totally wrecked Akua without shedding any blood, so there's even a sort of precedent.

Morgenstern

A promise of "I will not hurt person X" has multiple potential loopholes. Some centering around "hurt", some around "I" come to mind first.

Konstantin von Karstein

Just like Amadeus did with Akua's father

Hierenius

O god this is so awesome. That twist!

Big I

So let's speculate on the Sage's cryptic pronouncements:

The "earnest boy" is probably Masego, since the Sage has Percieve and Hierophant has Witness.

"Robert" might be her birth father, someone with a Name? The Shining Prince or the Good King maybe? She was a plucky orphan to start with.

"Thief, rival, successor" is probably about Cat replacing the Bard, which would suck for her and I really don't want to happen.

Oshi

Robert is the King of Callow. The dead one that Nessie held.

Liliet

That was Edward.

Liliet

I'm guessing Robert would be the last Good King of Callow 😊

> "Thief, rival, successor" is probably about Cat replacing the Bard, which would suck for her and I really don't want to happen.

OOOF YEAH

Shveiran

Yeah, Book I talks about a Good King Robert killed during the Conquest

Liliet

...yep, so that tracks 😊

Wonder

.i think all three might be the flavours of the aspects of her not yet crystalized Name.

Barthumphries

> "Thief, rival, successor" is probably about Cat replacing the Bard

Hunh. I thought he was taking about Vivienne going from The Thief to Cat's rival to her successor on the throne of Callow.

Big I

Re-reading this chapter and it just struck me that the Doddering Sage might be the Wizard of the West. Do we know if Warlock killed the one during the Conquest?

dadycoool

I am cackling in my chair. Cat's insight has just gotten a boost, she knows her enemy, she's on the run, and she's making up a plan as she goes along. This is gonna be FUN!

Seeing an above comment, I'm not even gonna touch the Sage's message. I just hope my brain won't dismiss it as beyond any hope of comprehension and forget it all.

ayon96

Twinned is prbly meaning Akua. Akua is getting a Hero Name while Cat is getting a Villain Name both Name are prbly intertwined.

hakureireimu

Akua isn't Cat's rival; that ship has sailed long ago.

Evgeny Permyakov

Intertwinning doesn't mean literal rivalry, and rivalry does not need to be antagonistic. However much Akua is under Cat's thumb, Akua is Cat's foil in that Cat has a goal and (arguably) a higher moral ground, while Akua doesn't and play the hero shtick for fun.

They are quite literally opposite of each other: a villain for the the greater good and a hero for no good. Them molding each other into mutually opposite and rivaling yet mutually complementing (from story perspective) roles could be an interesting twist.

dadycoool

I like that "villain for the the greater good and a hero for no good". That'd be quite the twist: the arguable Scourge of this Generation, the Diabolist, taking on the role of Hero. Wasn't Akua the first person in this story to actually invoke the Power of Friendship back in the Everdark?

hakureireimu

Except that Cat does interpret it as "a poetic way to talk about a nemesis." I mean you can argue that she's wrong, but I wouldn't take that bet.

Burlyraven

Ah, and now Cat begins the dangerous game of staying one step ahead of the heroes while leading them to the truth, which culminates (hopefully) with Cat standing near the real truth, begging Roland to trust her after he's stepped into the role of lead investigator, all the while holding the Mirror Knight and his squad back so they don't kill Cat. Hakram takes the role of suspicious/evil teammate for the heroic investigators, who will likely be discovering the details Cat has to ignore in her haste.

Or something like that. It's a modern classic of a story, but a good one.

Oshi

The Kingfisher Prince is the spoiler in all this. The rest of the plot makes sense. He's the added soup. The Prince always comes to the rescue. Besides we've seen from interludes he's the most clear-sighted of them all. He knows conspiracies but is truly honorable. He's either the one meant to die or the one to witness/unravel it all.

Shveiran

And I'm ok with that, I need more Frederic.

Mental Mouse

Hopefully, Cat is planning to hand him a nearly-completed plot for him to "figure out" and preside over the parlor scene.

Trebar

So are you saying Cat got it wrong? She tried to jump to the Doddering Sage as the end of the story, but the big reveal is actually supposed to come from the Kingfisher Prince and so she missed it?

Oshi

No, the reveal is from the sage. The Prince is her trump card. He's the one that was supposed to clean it all up after the bard killed off the T&T. Now Cat will use him to shape the story in another way. He's a Prince. He needs someone to save. Wonder who that could be?

Liliet

Yeah ♥

Cold Air

Why not just tell the heroes about Bard, and her attitude..?
Sure, probably they would not believe, but would they not become harder for her to manipulate?

Liliet

Right now? Because, as Cat said, the minute she and Mirror Knight come face to face, this is a confrontation, and that's what she wants to avoid.

Oshi

The opposite. It would be like attacking a friend (you know she is their friend at this point). No ones inclined to believe you and it just makes them seem even more guilty. The MK is too dumb to think beyond classical villain tropes.

That Other Guy

After the last episode I was convinced Cat would get an aspect that unravelled and rewrite stories, something akin to Skien's Unwind.

Now I'm more sure than ever.

Akua can't come into a name again because she's actually being played by Kairos in disguise. She's actually possessed a goblin and has snuck off to join with Black and usurp the throne when things go Shakespearingly pear-shaped.

Frivolous

I think I agree. I suspect that Cat's Name will be something like Unraveler of Tales or Incisive Critic. Critic in this case is like Atropos with the shears; she cuts down stories that she finds unworthy. Example: She cut through Pilgrim's attempt to trap her into a pattern of three.

Or she could be Named Dark Intercessor, because she intervenes on behalf of villains, Look at how she contests with and intimidates Choirs of angels.

I really hope Hakram isn't killed outright by the heroes. He is an orc and a villain, and the Mirror Knight especially just might cut him down.

Sykomantis

I'm thinking her Name will be Unreliable Narrator, and her first aspect will be Decide: getting to choose what kind of story is going on.

Insanenoodlyguy

He's dumb but not that dumb. If your Ally, however shaky, runs up to you and says "Two people! Running that way! Lets go!" one of two things is about to happen.

1. They mean it. Lets get after those bastards!

2. It's really him, this is a trap... so lets get after those bastards! The best place for a hero to be when there's a trap is jumping right into it, springing it and taking down whomever is surprised you are still standing.

Now on the other hand, stabbing your ally in bad faith, not such a good story, unless there's some obvious thing wrong with the story that you can explain to your allies immediately afterwards when they are all freaking out. Mirror Knight does that, he just might not survive this. I've no doubt he'll consider just wasting the Arch-Heretics right hand man, but he won't actually start the fight until he has something concrete, like the trap he might well believe is up ahead. And if they instead do find fleeing people, well, now the momentum has moved us back to #1.

Lartek

Oh.

Oh.

So the Sage is the Wizard of the West, that's pretty much confirmed.

Firstly, she called herself the Black Queen, and he corrected her by calling her the "Foundling" Queen, because it's technically the title that matters to a Callowan vassal. She's Queen Catherine of the House Foundling of Callow, after all.

Secondly, because it's the defining trait of all good Good Kings of Callow as the Revenant King said: kind, but not soft.

The last king's name was Edward, but who's to say his father wasn't named Robert?

Now who's Constance, I wonder?

Shikkarasu

Does anyone remember the other time that//happened? I know it did in one or two chapters, but I can't place where.

doominator10

Demon of absence?

Gamer7956

It happened when the Skein used Spool, and when Masego undid it. It's EE's way of showing sudden discontinuity.

Mental Mouse

Cognitive break – in this case, she's no-sells a "surge of rage" pitfall, literally interrupting her own thoughts.

Shoddi

It also happened in Chapter 5, "Interlude: Mirror". Louis de Sartrons tried to study Scribe but could only recall "ink-stained hands".

Zaddek

Cat had at least one other instance I can remember, during one of her talks with Karos. I think it was the one the dead king sat in on? I also feel like she had a second one but I'm drawing a blank as to what section it was in.

Zaddek

Ha! I remembered correctly. Chapter 81: Devotional

"...Hierophant had plundered the thoughts of still-mortal Neshamah but I'd seen// . Still, this was a rather clear indication of our coming guest's identity..."

Shikkarasu

That's the one! I remember Mirror and Spool now that the others mention them, but this is the one I was thinking about.

+10 internet points

Shveiran

Good catch! Her brain was likely going toward something close to "but I'd seen inside the brain of the Wandering Bard" and that thought was too much to process; so it aborted that line of thought and went back to the closest safe spot to branch off.

"Still, this was a rather clear..."

Walter

The implication seems to be that Cat has a Named opposite out there, but I think it's the other way round. Cat is the Wandering Bard's opposite, long overdue. Bard starts stories, Cat ends them.

I dunno, it doesn't quite fit, but I feel like something about that is at least truth-adjacent.

Oshi

Bard spins stories into being and forces them into her view of things. Cat unravels stories and never let's them be one view of things.

Cat's Rashomon to Bard's Cinderella.

moonwatcher13

I think its a bit different. The Bard stands for keeping things as they are, not allowing real progress by maintaining the status quo of Heroes vs Villians, which is why she so opposes the Truce and Terms because they rob her, and the Gods, of leverage.

Cat stands for progress, for breaking the old order to make the new, something she professed as multiple times. She wants peace and order, and will stand against everything that seeks to disrupt that by dragging people back to the way things were.

Wonder

Who the is Robert ,Constance? If this is the benefit of stealing the echo of the Intercessor, then how about Cat goes back and steals some more from the Dead King as well? That should give her some boost , right?

KageLupus

I really like the idea of Cat becoming the successor to the Bard, and think that it is the obvious ending to her story.

The Bard is an eternal balancer, a character in service not of Above or Below, but of the Story itself. She is the finger on the scales that makes sure no one pushes things too far and ruins the Game of the Gods before they are ready for it to end. She has fought Black and Cat, sure, but she also prevented a couple of Elves from murdering Akua so that Liesse could be doomed and the Black Queen would be born. She is constantly playing both sides to keep the conflict running, and if she tends to help out the Heroes it is probably because the Villains are better at cheating to get the upperhand.

Cat is setting herself up for a mirrored role in the new world order she is attempting to build. She works with Villains and Heroes to reach her goals, and if she tends to help out the Villains more it is because the Heroes are better at cheating via Providence to get an upperhand. There is an open question on just how mortal Cat is anymore but she has for sure been brought back from the dead by both Above and Below. So her becoming an immortal mediator for both sides doesn't seem that unreasonable.

The big conflict between Cat and the Bard really boils down to keeping the status quo versus changing it. The Bard represents a world where Good and Evil are lines in the sand and all of the Knights are Black or White. Cat represents a world where Named of all stripes can work together when they need to, where Heroes as well as Villains can be called out for mass murder, where summoning an angel is just as bad as summoning a devil. You still need some big mythical individual to keep things moving in the right direction in both cases. But the actual direction is going to be wildly different depending on who comes out on top during the current conflicts.

Kel the Seer

Cat excels by throwing everything into chaos because she is better at riding that chaos to victory than any opponent so far? One of the much earlier chapter quotes from the hellhound says as much. Thus, rewriting the narrative to throw the plot askew is where her best chances for success in this current Story lie.

Additionally, I can definitely see Cat as a rival for the Intercessor.

Creation itself literally runs on an underlying Story of Above vs Below. The Intercessor is the adjudicator of this Story, and thus immortal as long as it continues. Which is why she is service to neither side, instead keeping them in a rough balance by helping out both sides and ensuring that the countless other stories play out.

Cat is the Render of Stories. Having learned their importance from Black, and that they can be avoided or interrupted, she has learned to spot ongoing or potential Stories and either use them as weapons (becoming a fae noble, etc) or dodge them (GP's multiple plots to kill her during the 10th Crusade). Her personal story is of her learning to harness, escape, or take over stories to undermine the one central to this world.

Aspects like Rewrite (like Steal, but for Stories), Narrative, and Snip (to end them before completion) would make sense as part of her Name. It would also make her one of the most powerful beings in Creation and able to unmake both the Dead King and Wandering Bard.

However, what does it mean for Creation when Cat's crowning achievement is to end the Good vs Evil story with her Truce and Terms? What if WB's tapdancing these many millenia was not for her own survival, but to keep the Gods of Above and Below entertained enough to not cancel this world and start over?

What happens when Cat is the Villain whose success ends the world in that scenario?

Mental Mouse

I note that when the Gods gave up on Arcadia, they did not in fact destroy it, but left it around for later use. If they create a new world, I suspect things will be much the same.

Oshi

Cat's crowning achievement isn't to end the game. It's to change the game. Her rules and her path has always been to make the game less of a blight on creation. She wants heroes/villains to play out their shit without making it impossible for everyone else to live without being involved in some way.

This whole over-the-top detective bit starting to play out has suddenly reminded me of the Futurama jewel heist: "In the end, the deadliest animal of all, was the Zoo Keeper".

Letouriste

Well, I finally caught up!
Will cat burn the whole library? These books are not particularly important after all. I assume someone will anyway given she is meant to be framed and fire is what she is known for. Specially green and black fire

Oshi

Oh god...another fire. She would.

Collide

Oh man, this is really fun seeing Cat running around messing with Name fuckery again. As cool as the warfare stuff is, I missed this more personal type of conflict.

ninegardens

Okay, so disturbing thoughts:

"“I have a theory,” he said. “You see, for someone to truly make a mess on this board, they would need certain qualities. Perception, affinity, knowledge. A combination thereof. You understand my meaning, yes?”

“An awareness of patterns,” I said.

“Exactly so,” Kairos replied. “And, plague as I am by a suspicious nature, it occurred to me that these qualities are as rare as they are useful. That neither Above nor Below are prone to waste in such regards." "

-chapter-8-veracity

And also:

""A rival? A thief? A successor? " "

And also... Cat just picked herself up a huge bottle of terrible booze.

Yeah... something (maybe the bard, maybe just the lay of creation) looks like its setting Cat up to be the new Bard. Which potentially means that Bard is trying to suicide (by deliberately passing her role off and losing immortality), or that Creation is doing this, and Cat feeling Bard nearby is the nascent threat of her BECOMING Bard.

Or, potentially Bard can detect her successor and is trying to prevent that name from happening. It's really really hard to tell with that one.

moongazer13

So I agree with almost everything you said, with one exception.

I don't think Cat is the Bard's successor, i think she is going to become her opposing Named, her Nemesis. Because The Dead King isn't the Bard's nemesis, not really. The Dead King's aim (as far as i can tell) seems to be usurping the gods and/or making himself a god. He wants to either recreate Creation in his own image, or take over Creation. Whereas the Bard and Cat just want to keep things going, with some changes.

The Bard wants to keep things to mostly the same forever: Heroes fighting Villains, the Gods Above and Below untouched, with the Bard whispering in every ear and shaping every story. Cat wants things to get better, to break the power of those on top and make things more equal. Her entire story has been about revolution against the established powers, whether they be gods or kings or all the armies in creation.

Oshi

Fuck I missed the booze and throw up bit. I was hooping she would go for rival but..oh hell.

Xinci

Well, its nice to finally get a source for how Providence was probably derived. Tapering explains how it might have changed over time and how it is so flexible amongst different kinds of Named yet not quite iterative enough to be an intelligence. Still unsure on the exact nature of Fate at the moment but this does give sources for most of the later iterated stuff(Angels from Demons, Providence from Tapering, Fae from Devils). Also good to see how that shard impacted Cat while also seeing what came before Masego.

Someone finally acknowledging Cat as a potential successor to the Bard is great, since it gives us a definitive reason in truth for their conflict. Its been a thing for a while, but good to have someone say it straight out. I was rather curious at Cat potentially having a twinned Name, given her current goal of regulation. I suppose once shes shifted Calernia into a new age its a new stage of testing, so things are set up to keep going after she dies.

Oshi

Cat can't kill the name of Bard until she kills the Bard. Once she's in place she destroys thee name and the world goes on without Dead King or Bard.

If the Intercessor wanted to make me the villain of this fucking story, then she ought to have voted for pgte

You know, Cat could have turned this right on it's head if she took a different stance. She has yet to do anything wrong in this case so all she had to do was tell mirror knight she was in the process of contacting Hanno and Hasinbach for a tribunal and she wanted to appoint his people as investigators to figure out what happened. Boom now there's someone much more fitting to the narrative in place and everything starts falling apart.

Shveiran

Betting on a story crafted by the Bard being so weak that as to unravel simply because she is actually innocent is a poor bet, I'm afraid.

I don't know how, but it would likely have backfired.

Javvies

The incoming Mirror Knight and friends (presumably) would most likely simply assume that Cat is at fault and immediately attack (or attempt to), without waiting for an explanation, far less an actual investigation.

Remember, they were just about to throw down with Cat when the Kingfisher Prince arrived and threw them off their game. They're already primed to assume Cat is to blame and want to put a stop to her evil plots ... and her.

Theitzal

No mirror knight was ready to throw down, the others not so much and that's where the trick comes in, a legal ruler appointing a hero investigator, really lay it on about how everyone will trust an impartial review, maybe put Hakrim on his team like she just did to review his findings and point out legalities. Play to his pride and his own pride will have him making sure the law of the land is upheld. What's more as far as we know no one has done anything wrong other than a hero killing a villain who was once her tormentor. And remember, secrets will out when a hero is looking for information, Cat deliberately makes sure her secrets aren't the kind that will screw her over because of that which leaves only the "secret" that the Bard is trying to break the coalition fighting the greatest evil on the continent because she doesn't like the potential results of it's existence.

Barthumphries

> Cat deliberately makes sure her secrets aren't the kind that will screw her over

Except for, you know, the secret that they mentioned in this very chapter that they never want the heroes to know? The one that Masego is investigating? The one with secret funding? Yeah, that secret is going to come out at the worst possible time.

Daniel E

Why the heck do all of my comments require moderation approval now? I lost the one I posted yesterday 😞 As an aside, Hakram's cursing about becoming investigators for truth & justice was hilarious.

Steven Silver

Why has no one said Cat's name twin is Cordelia yet? She's the only character I know who's refused a name on screen. Unless that refers to Black refusing Dread Emperor.

And the rival, thief, and successor could all be different stories she's coopted. Akua was a rival she now keeps close. Hierarch has stolen a bunch of stuff. And Vivienne is her successor. This part doesn't have to be about the Bard, though it likely is.

Probably the good end all things considered. I mean she is the villain here, were you guys expecting her to live happily ever after?

So, considering how Cat tried to make a deal with the Dead King to let him out at the beginning of this arc, is it wrong for me to hope for that to be found out at the end of this one and see her hanged for it. I know the Dead King tried to out her at one point but no one bought that one. I'm not asking for a dramatic fight where she gets killed at the end. Just a trial that goes like "Did you go to Dead King with the intention of releasing him for your own gains?", "Yeah fam sorry about that but Malicia got to him first so we cool yeah?", "uhh no. Hang her boys"

Chapter 17: Felonious

"Crimes against a crown are treason, crimes by a crown are a reign."

– Dread Emperor Reprobate the First

And then we were two.

Part of me might have been more comfortable keeping Adjutant at my side instead of Archer, but it'd be a mistake: she was the one who knew her way around this place and the Named within it.

"We need to make an escape," I said.

"Like we used to say in Refuge," Indrani cheerfully told me, "the best kind of invisibility is killing all the witnesses."

She was probably messing with me, but then that did sound like something Ranger might say.

"We can't kill anyone," I told her.

"That sounds like a terrible plan," Archer complained.

"But we're probably going to have to fight," I frankly added.

"I never doubted you for a moment," she assured me.

This was hauntingly familiar, I mused, although we weren't in a tunnel surrounded by dead drow with the entire invading army of the Kingdom Under behind us. We must have been skulking through the labyrinthine stacks for almost eighty heartbeats now, but I kept us going what I – probably mistakenly – believed to be west. It was, at the very least, vaguely leftwards.

“The thing is,” I said, “neither the Black Queen nor the Archer can fight any of these fine heroes coming to foil the plots afoot.”

If the Mirror Knight saw me flee a room filled with dead bodies while leaving an unconscious old man Named behind then there really would be no talking him into the possibility that might not, in fact, trying to undo my own life’s work and doom Calernia because of my inherent dastardliness. Fucking heroes, I uncharitably thought.

“I get it,” Indrani said, with enthusiasm that surprised me. “So we, like, put on masks and we’re these mysterious villainesses of cryptic intent. I will be the Peerless Beauty, whose legendary good looks eclipse the sun itself-”

“So we’re going to pretend we’re dead bodies,” I interrupted with great relish.

See, when I’d known Archer for only a few months I might have been tempted to chide her for joking around when this was a rather deadly situation, all things considered, and one that could have drastic consequences for the entire continent. Except that now I knew her well enough to know that, while she did very much enjoy being mocking even rapidly approaching doom, she did these kinds of things for a reason. The back and forth was calming me, I was not above admitting, and back when I’d been made of smoke and mirrors it’d been one of the few things that had me feeling human for a bit. I knew this, she knew I knew this, and I doubted either of us would ever admit it out loud. That did not mean in the slightest that I did not thoroughly enjoy shutting every door on her metaphorical fingers that I could.

“Cat,” she said, sounding betrayed.

“Revenants, to be exact,” I blithely continued. “My glamour hasn’t gotten all that better since it stopped being that and became Night instead, but it should still fool anyone without eyes out of the ordinary.”

“Which they’ll have,” Archer noted.

We tread around the messy pile of books left by a shelf that’d collapsed, and I grunted in agreement. This would be the Mirror Knight’s band, and with the amount of heroes there were in this place he’d be able to draw the most useful talents from a rather large lineup he was even halfway clever. And even if he wasn’t, he should still end up with at least one hero of extraordinary perception: mages and mystics tended to have a trick or two to see to that, given the nature of the threats and villains they were born to face.

"Which is why I'll need you to take them out of the fight before they can catch on," I said. "We'll be springing an ambush."

"We're good, but not that good," Archer said. "Not if we're staying quiet."

"If we're taking a swing at a band of five on war footing, maybe even with Hakram backing them up, then no we're not," I replied. "So we're not going to do that."

Indrani peered at me for a moment, then smugly smirked.

"We're going to set something on fire, aren't we?"

I coughed.

"It's not the only thing we're going to do," I defended. "It's just, you know, a part-"

"A part that is on fire," Archer sagely continued. "A fire hat you set. You monster."

"Hey," I weakly replied. "I wouldn't keep using it if didn't work all the time. It's not like I have a preference for it, it's just that so many things out there are flammable."

"Inflammable," Indrani haughtily corrected.

"Fuck off," I retorted, "Akua already pulled this bit on me, flammable is right."

"You're taking language lessons from a ghost, and I'm the dubious one?" she replied without missing a beat.

Even as the latest bit of back and forth was spoken, we reached what I was fairly sure to be the western wall of the Miscellaneous Stacks. We weren't quite at the back of the great room, but we ought to be pretty deep in by my understanding. And far enough from the Doddering Sage that he shouldn't be at risk of being hurt before one of the heroes rescued him – and he wouldn't be forgotten about, either, not with Hakram joining them. The Mirror Knight was actually the reason I considered setting a fire here to be a valid tactic when I did not yet know if the gas that'd been released had killed the custodians or simply put them asleep. A more... nuanced Named might have been tempted to make the hard decision of sacrificing the people for the chase, but though Christophe was a stubborn ass with half the wits one of those should have, that was simply not his nature. He did not seem himself as someone who'd make that choice, so he wouldn't, and as the leader of his band he'd give the order to start with a rescue. Sure as providence, we'd probably run into one or more of the heroes and whoever had good eyes was near certain to be of that lot.

But it wouldn't be a band of five, which meant Archer and I would have a lot more leeway to deal with them without tipping our hands.

"Fresh faces first," I said, slowing to a stop.

"Revenants, huh," Indrani mused. "So you want to slap the Dead King's name on this?"

"They won't necessarily buy that," I noted, "but at this point I'm not trying to convince them of something so much as trying to convince them they don't know anything."

"Lies and violence," Archer fondly said.

At least there wasn't anyone there to here, I grudgingly thought. One of these days, though, she'd say that in front of some chronicler and it'd be written down and it would all be downhill from there. If those ended up being taken as the words of House Foundling, I was going to drown her in a vat of ink.

"For you I'm thinking the Black Sickle," I said. "Word is Tariq torched his ass good a few months back after catching him sneaking around near Sommont, but he was never actually confirmed destroyed."

And the Revenant in question had, while being somewhat taller than Indrani from what I could remember, used a pair of eerie dark sickles as his weapons of choice. That much I couldn't replicate but while Archer didn't have her bow and even if she did using it would be a dead giveaway, she'd most definitely have knives.

"Do you have any other blades than your-" I started, before closing my mouth.

Of course she did, she was Archer. She had enough blades on her that half the time I got her undressed her actual clothes made as much noise hitting the floor as her mail.

"Stupid question," I finished, "I withdraw it. Just don't use the longknives."

They were not her signature and odds were none of the Mirror Knight's band would have ever seen Archer fight regardless, but it was a risk when Indrani had brought her band into the Arsenal: those knew her arms well, and half of them were heroes. I cast her a searching look, wondering what best to anchor the working on.

"You mind if I use your scarf for this?" I asked.

"Don't," she said. "The coat would do, right?"

Considering she wasn't wearing her mail at the moment it was the part of her most likely to be hit – and I couldn't be sure a good enough hit with Light wouldn't break my illusion – but that scarf was one of the material possessions she cared about so I didn't insist.

"Belt would be better," I said, shaking my head.

She conceded with a nod. As for my face, I did actually have an idea that had the potential to get Christophe running in the wrong direction with a great deal of certainty.

"You've seen the Wicked Enchanter, right?" I asked.

"Alive?" Indrani replied. "No. But I did get a good look at his still-warm corpse."

"That might be even better, actually," I mused. "Mind letting me have a look at the memory?"

"Go ahead," she shrugged, leaning forward.

I put a hand against her temple and reached for the Night, letting it flow through me and ever so gently into her. I closed my eyes, sunk into the darkness.

"Think of it," I softly asked.

A moment later she did, with vivid sharpness, and I saw what she saw. The Enchanter had looked rather young, to my surprise. Perhaps in his mid-twenties, though for a villain such appearances didn't necessarily speak much to the truth of their age. Tanned, dark-haired, athletically fit and actually rather handsome he was not the emaciated and sinister figure I'd somehow imagined he would be. But upon closer look, his handsomeness was a little too neat. Too symmetrical, and somewhat unnatural for it. Not unlike the Exiled Prince's had been, all those years go. Name vanity, I thought with disdain. The gruesome axe wound that'd split him open from the bottom left of his neck to his belly button had spilled blood and guts all over what looked like it might have been a nicely-tailored set of green tunic and trousers with silver linings, the kind of thing a minor Proceran highborn or a wealthy merchant would wear more than a villain.

"Did he use any tools?" I quietly pressed.

An intricate casting rod appeared in my mind, stained with blood and bitten into by a blade. To my distaste, it appeared to have been sculpted in longer homage to the ceremonial baton that Cordelia Hasenbach used on some formal occasions. Her was sculpted as a bundle of twigs tied together by a string, though, while the Wicked Enchanter's casting rod was instead a knot of snakes eating each other and encircled by chains. I remembered when he'd been brought into the Terms, I'd read the report, and it had mentioned that he was middling conjurer but skilled in 'domination magics'. From the beginning he'd been noted as a potential problem, though also as being something of a coward and so unlikely to misbehave if kept an eye on.

"Thanks," I said, withdrawing the Night back into me.

Keeping the image firmly in mind, I laid a hand against my belt and felt the cool touch of Night wash over my skin. I reached again and tightened my fingers around my staff – which would give away my identity in moments, if it kept looking like itself – but the Night struggled to sink in.

"None of that, now," I muttered. "I did not snatch you from that tree so I'd get mouthed off to."

As if reluctantly, somehow giving off the impression of ill-grace, the resistance ceased and I was left to hold the illusion of the dead villain's casting rod. It wasn't an exact fit, as my staff had been longer, but it'd serve. I wasted no time in laying a hand on Indrani's belt, ignoring the suggestive eyebrow-wagging it earned me. Night seeped into the leather, and as I watched Archer was replaced by a slender figure in ragged robes and a hood that revealed only dark skin and a mouth sown shut. Her knives I didn't change, since it'd frankly be more trouble than it was worth to try and make them look like sickles. I exhaled and gathered Night into me once more time, as I could no longer afford delays: the moment I'd begun using Night, I would have tipped off the heroes as to our presence. I traced a finger against the wood stacks closest to me, leaving behind a trail of flame – natural, not of Night. Blackflame would be a dead giveaway, but it also meant I couldn't outright throw fire around. I dipped a thick leather-bound book into the growing flames and tossed it at Archer, who caught it without missing a beat.

"Spread it around some," I ordered. "We need a proper blaze."

"Gotcha," she nodded, then cocked her head to the side. "And after?"

"Hit and run," I said. "I trust you to set up your ambush."

"I'll see what I can do," she said, airily waving my words away.

She didn't fool me even a little: Indrani was a little pleased as the spoken acknowledgement of something we'd both known to be true, and not putting all that much of an effort into hiding it. It had been some time since we last fought side by side, I mused, that was true. But her duties would have kept her sharp and working with her on the field had always come easy. I saw no reason why that should have changed in the last two years.

"Don't keep me waiting," I smiled, waving her off.

She was gone in a moment, silent as a ghost, and I sighed as I cast a look at the fire springing up to my side. Burning books, damn me: I might as well be burning silver, miscellaneous stacks or not. Still I picked up a heavy tome from the opposite stack and fed it to the flames long enough for it to catch before putting some spring to my step. It'd be quicker with Night, but it'd also risk giving away where I currently was. Another three sources on top of what Archer cooked up ought to do the trick without putting anyone in too much danger, I mused. By the time I'd gone down another two shelves and started a fresh blaze on the other side, a shout of dismay in the distance told me the game was properly afoot.

"Now," I muttered as I hastened my steps and started another fire, "you split up."

Hakram ought to have run into them by now, and if that'd ended up in brawl, I would have heard it. Which meant that in the best case they would be tacitly accepting him as an ally, and in the worst they'd be considering him an enemy best brought with them to keep an eye until he could be counted on to cackle and reveal the depths his perfidy in a surprisingly informative speech. I'd considered villains who actually indulged in monologues to be complete idiots, when I started out, and my father had encouraged that perception. Not without reason. I had a lot more sympathy for villains who indulged now that I'd spent a few years around heroes, though. Some days you just wanted to rub their utter fucking idiocy in their faces, like forcing a dog to look at its vomit.

That, uh, burst of opinion aside, Hakram would be sure to mention the Doddering Sage's presence if it wasn't brought up. That meant at least one of the five, headed straight for the unconscious Named. Adjutant wouldn't go along, since that'd carry the risk of the Sage waking up and recognizing him, so that left a group of five. There should be one, maybe to who took care of the custodians – be they corpses or unconscious, and actually I now that I thought about it I should be able to answer that question right now. Was it worth revealing my position for? Yes, I decided, absent-mindedly starting another fire as I kept walking forward. If only so that I could more accurately predict how the heroes moved. Sinking into Night, I reached out for the nearest corpse to raise and found nothing that would serve. Good, all alive then. That meant I could definitely count on at least one hero going off to save them rather than coming after me, bringing them down to a peak of four. Most likely three, though, I mused. Less likely to have accidental casualties that way. Which meant the real question was whether or not Hakram would be one of the three. Time to draw them in close and find out, I reckoned.

I tossed the book into stacks to my right and kept moving without bothering to check if it'd started another blaze or not. By now, when standing at the right angle between some stacks I could see the smoke from where Archer had started fires of her own. Not the flames themselves, given that the ceiling was low the vision obscure and I might, possibly, not be the tallest person alive. The smoke would serve well enough, though, since it told me where she'd headed. Apparently while I'd been headed in a straight line south, she'd gone south-east and been messy about fostering flame: it didn't give a trajectory to follow, not like I had with my straightforward march down. Now, if the opposition was made of fools they'd follow the burning arrow I was lighting for them and wait for me at the bottom. But they weren't fools, or this war would have killed them by now. Well, they weren't fools in this particular way, more like, I mentally corrected.

They'd have to send someone there, but the Mirror Knight would be headed into the burning mess Archer had just made. Which meant it was also where I needed to go. It was possible, in theory, that the person who'd be waiting for me at the end of the line I'd drawn in fire would be Hakram, and so I'd be free to just put him through a few shelves and get out while leaving him plausible deniability. In practice, I was the opposition and facing a band of five so it was the eyes that'd be waiting for me there – but close enough to come quick when the scuffle started elsewhere, just in time to stumble onto the scene and unmask me. That sounded like a bad thing, at first glance, but it wasn't. It meant I could dictate the location, make-up and tempo of that encounter. If I couldn't scrap together a win with that on my side, I might as well just slit my wrists and join up with Keter.

A sharp turn to the right saw me heading towards Archer's devouring blaze with a song stuck in my throat. The smoke and heat were licking at my sides, and still I hummed out the tune and words.

"Run the hounds, rides the hunter

His spear in hand, banner aflutter."

It was an old one, this one, though not so old as Here They Come Again or Red The Flowers. It'd come later, when the struggle against Proceran occupation had begun turning in the favour of Callowan partisans – but not yet so much that the cities were in their hands again, and so there'd been a need to be circumspect where princes' men might be listening.

"Charging that way, this one baying Trampling the paths, again raging."

Before me, a bonfire of wood and parchment roared. Loud enough it was almost deafening, which meant I wouldn't be able to call on my sharpened senses. But neither would the opposition, and I was the one with something to hide. The smoke would help mitigate visibility, and it was something I'd be able to wield to great use, considering the functional goal here was escape and not actually winning the fight. The heat itself was no great trouble to me, though I felt it rather more keenly than I would have with the Mantle of Woe on my back. I picked out, after a moment to consider, exactly where I was to be 'caught' by the heroes. Further in, between two tall racks already touched by flame but not yet consumed. Enough fire and smoke ahead and behind that I would be half-veiled, but not so much that I would choke. One, two, three times did I lay my hand and only then counted myself satisfied.

On a whim, I snatched up a book from the shelves and smiled when I read the title, written in Chantant: The Life and Lies of Monsieur Montfailli, A Monk No Longer. Suitably absurd, I decided, for what was about to unfold. One, two, three times did I lay my hand and seed Night, only then counting myself satisfied. I was ready to begin.

They came for me through the smoke, two of them, even as the refrain of the song caught up with me at last.

"But we know, oh we know,

That in the woods, the fox is king

Yes we know, oh we know

That in the woods, the fox is king."

Alistair the Fox was the closest thing to a trickster-king my home had ever had to boast of, though at times he'd been little more than a bold bandit in good armour. The Mirror Knight advanced with his sword already in hand, silver shield up and living up to the Name. He wore no helm, and his hair was pressed close to his brow by sweat. At his side was the Blade of Mercy, whose hand snapped out as soon as he saw me to clasp the handle of his greatsword and slide it out of the leather straps on his back.

"Who are you?" the Mirror Knight snarled. "Why did you do this?"

The book in my hands I snapped shut, turning to face them entirely and watching both their faces pale when they saw the grisly wound that'd killed the Wicked Enchanter. I'd never heard the man speak, of course. Neither had Indrani, so I couldn't even attempt to imitate his voice. But then, it wasn't necessarily the Enchanter himself I was pretending to be, was it? The Dead King I was a passing hand at impersonating, from all those lovely little talks he and I kept having at the edge of the world.

"Late again, Mirror Knight," I said. "Do you not tire of always needing better Chosen to take you by the hand?"

"We'll stop you, monster," the Blade of Mercy said, voice shaking. "I don't know what pact you've made with the Black Queen, but-

Oh, come on. Really, now I was conspiring with the damned Dead King to sabotage the same Arsenal I'd shelled out gold to help build? At some point these assholes were going to have to explain to me exactly what my plot was supposed to be here.

"- it won't be enough," the Mirror Knight grimly said, sword rising higher. "Powerful you may be, but your vessel was not. Even the King of Death cannot grow the dead."

"With men such as you," I said, tone contemptuous, "why would I need to?"

First touch, and it would be the most subtle. Just a palm I'd pressed against the back of the stacks to my left, seeding the slightest bit of Night. And as I gestured my veiled staff, I ripped it right out. There was a crack, which was enough to have the Mirror Knight shooting forward at impressive speed for a man in plate while Light engulfed the Blade of Mercy's weapon. The Night hadn't been much, really the barest of seedlings, but then the wood was already burning and breaking down. It was more than enough. The entire set of shelves collapsed, spewing out debris and burning books in a flood even as the Mirror Knight passed. Wouldn't do anything to actually hurt the man, of course. He was the closest thing the Heavens had been able to rustle up to a fortress on legs. But then his strength came from resistance, not, necessarily physical power, and that meant he was still a human-shaped thing of human weight and subject to the same sort of creational forces that would affect these. The point of breaking the shelves had not been hurting him, it'd been blinding him.

I took a single, measured step to the left.

The Mirror Knight burst out of the fire and debris, still under the impression I was right in front of him, but now he was a man in plate running blindly and very much intent on stabbing me with his sword. If I'd swung at him with even my full power in the Night, I honestly doubted I'd be able to crack that shining shield of his. But that wasn't my game, not here and tonight. The second touch I'd laid was running my fingers across a stretch of about one foot and a half on the ground, against the warm stone, making the oiliest residue of Night that I could. So the Mirror Knight slipped, shouting, and stumbled forward and past me with a precise slap of my staff against the back of his armour I tipped him all the way into falling into a pack of shelves already on fire. Now that left the other pest, arguably the most dangerous of the two in the current circumstances – one hit in the wrong place from that sword of his and the illusion making me look like the Enchanter was gone.

“Keeper,” the Blade shouted, “it’s the Dead King, he’s overpowering us!”

The Maddened Keeper, huh? Not who I would have guessed. That might get real tricky if I wasn’t careful. The Blade of Mercy was not content with merely calling for reinforcements, naturally. A little more careful than the Mirror Knight, he sliced through a library stack and then caught the side of it with the flat of his sword, tossing it towards me with a mighty heave. It was a beautiful display of dexterity and skill, the sort no human without a Name would really be able to replicate. It was also a showman’s attack, so obvious in the coming I would hesitate to call that anticipating. And actually, with a little bit of movement. I took one step back to call his aim where I wanted it at the right moment in the swing, then two swifter steps to the right. The Mirror Knight, freshly back on his feet, ate fresh wooden debris right in the face. As for the Blade, who’d followed-up the toss with a dash forward, I almost sighed.

He was moving too quickly, his large and heavy sword dragging behind him. It was sloppy swordsmanship, the mark of a boy who relied on his Name for the kill instead of proper footwork and technique. I’d indulge him with a lesson on how a projectile should actually be used in a fight between Named, out of the goodness of my heart. I leaned forward, waiting until he’d closed distance, and the book I still held in my free hand was tossed at his face. Light flashed over his skin, some sort of protection, but it wouldn’t help: the Night within the book I’d already called on, and the detonation of heat looked close enough to a fireball that it ought to pass. More importantly the flames that went out were not, strictly speaking, magic or Night. Just regular fire, against which Light was no protection. Flame and debris went into the boy’s eyes even as I cast half a glance behind me, adjusted my angle as I took two steps forward and with the side of my staff struck at the Blade’s side. I didn’t hurt his momentum, just redirected it.

The Blade of Mercy tumbled into the risen Mirror Knight, and the two tumbled back into the fire.

It should be about time for the Maddened Keeper to show up, which was good as I was running out of petty tricks. I began to walk away, hearing the roar of power behind me as the heroes extricated themselves from the mess in a fury. The flames had spread, while we skirmished, so it was unpleasant to the ear to sharpen my hearing but no less necessary. Footsteps could hardly be discerned, but hardly was enough. By the time the heroes were – more cautiously than before – headed towards me once more, I ended the sharpening and waited for what had been arranged to take its course once more. My steps slowed, just as a flickering silhouetted passed the edge of soot-touched stacks with a glinting knife in hand and struck out – missing, for I'd ceased to advance the side of the stacks blocked the deeper angle of the blow. It wasn't the knife that worried me, though, even if it was a Named wielding it. The Maddened Keeper's eyes would be a lot more dangerous to me than her blade right now.

Fortunately, I still had a card up my sleeve.

The long-haired Named withdrew her hand lightning-quick and took half a step into the alley where I stood, prompting shouts of triumph from the Proceran Named behind me, but those were short-lived. With calculated brutality, Archer leapt down from the top of the stacks and her boots tore into the side of the Maddened Keeper's face. The slender woman fell, taken utterly by surprise, and Archer leaned over after landing on her torso to make two quick cuts with her knives. She didn't cut the eyes themselves, as there might be complications in healing that, but instead just above them. The blood would drip down and blind her, but just to be sure Indrani smeared what was already flowing into the to the Keeper's hoarse shout of pain. I turned, cast a disdainful look at the Proceran heroes who were frozen with fear and anger.

"Take care of the rabble," I told Archer. "They cannot be allowed to interfere with what we came for."

Indrani, still hidden as the Black Sickle, did not nod. Revenants were sometimes capable of such things, but the Sickle had not been. I'd pitched my voice just loud enough that the Mirror Knight and his companion should be able to hear me, and watched them from the corner of my eye. That's right, I thought as Christophe's gaze narrowed, you overheard me saying too much in my utter contempt for you lot. Now figure out that I'm here for something properly nefarious, like turning the Doddering Sage into a Revenant or somesuch.

"He's here for Hakram Deadhand," the Mirror Knight said. "Blade, run to him. The Dead King's trying to frame us for murdering the Black Queen's second."

That... was not what I would have gotten from that, but Hells I'd take it. Even odds he still thought the Black Queen was conspiring with 'me', though. Well, I got what I'd come for. Now I just had to follow the most honoured of villainous traditions and turn a clear pair of heels to this situation. Archer would delay them for a bit and slip out, there weren't any of them here who were her rivals in those arts. I just needed to make a sufficiently clean break, which without using Night might be... ah, this would do. I turned a corner around shelves already merrily burning and, discreetly hit it pretty hard with my staff.

It collapsed, and as the fire flooded my back I legged my way out of there.

Right, onto the next part of this. I needed to steal a dead body, then see someone about having a chat with it.

Great Chapter as always!
Keep up the great work!

flashburn283

And once again, being neigh-invincible robs you of brainpower. How is it fair that a moron like the knight is unbeatable when a hero with brains and the ability to actually do good in the world, like the Sage, has to watch their back at every moment.

Agent J

Neigh-invincible is a great pun cuz he's a stubborn ass.

RoflCat

Well, there's only so many stat points you can spread around.

And sadly most Good heroes tend to drop Intelligence and Wisdom in favor of more Vit/Str because who need to think when the Heaven will do it for you.

The ones that do have Int/Wis build tend to be lacking in Str/Vit so they're easy for sneaky rogue/assassin type to snipe them off.

Mental Mouse

Hanno manages a good balance, and he's got some Dex/Cha in there too.

Hanno is Roy from OotS. I'm accepting constructive criticism.

Liliet

I'd say we're past the point of reasonable doubt tbh

RoflCat

Hanno basically has the Hero build i.e. points in everything.

And think of each +1 to a certain stat cost more stat points than the point before it. So while Hanno might not be the strongest or the smartest, his combined total stat is quite high due to not overly focusing on one stat.

Though on the other hand, the min-max heroes really sacrifice a LOT of other stat to squeeze that tiny bit more into their forte.

Halinn

Because the gods don't want anyone actually capable of changing the board

Tenthyr

Easy to forget just how dangerous Cat is until she comes up against actual Named. She's just heads and shoulders above that rabble.

Javvies

Huh.

Smoothly done, presuming Archer does, in fact, get out safely and without blowing her cover.

Good gods, Mirror Knight is a dumbass.

He thinks Cat is working with the Dead King. Or something. Maybe he didn't think she was working with the Dead King before she gave him the idea; but still, what the hell does Cat possibly gain by betraying the Truce and Terms and the Alliance that she came up with and basically blackmailed the previously Grand Alliance and the Heroes into accepting. She's not fucking Kairos out to stab everyone in the back just to say she did.

JJR

Maybe he's not quite as dumb as he looks here. The accusation might have been an attempt to pull out a monologue. Even Cat has felt the urge to, "rub their utter fucking idiocy in their faces". And the greater the idiocy the greater the urge probably is. So always accuse the villain of the most off the wall and idiotic plot that you can think of, the villain might be so incensed that you were so mistaken about their super artful and perfect plot that they'll tell you exactly how thick you are to have missed it.

This won't work against old horrors like the Dead King or people who trained under Black if course, but it could be a habit.

Or Mirror Knight just is that thick.

Mental Mouse

> Maybe he's not quite as dumb as he looks here. The accusation might have been an attempt to pull out a monologue.

Or just poking at reality.... In our world, it would be a probe, "do they actually have a plan, or are they playing me?" (which she is, mind you).

In the Guideverse, from a powerful Hero, that might well coerce a lesser villain into the Knight's chosen story.... Bad habit to get into though, and it wouldn't do much against DK.

Liliet

> She's not fucking Kairos out to stab everyone in the back just to say she did.

And how does he know that?

Javvies

Among other reasons, she's basically single handedly responsible for the battlefronts and the Grand Alliance not having collapsed in defeat.

There's also her entire history ever since she became Named the first time.

There's also the precedent of her having provided the Crusaders with knowledge about the Hell Egg, and her desire to not have it opened.

Also, there's Pilgrim having Beheld Cat (before he died and was resurrected by Cat's intervention) and her greatest desire being peace.

Also, most Villains have some kind of plan that can be figured out – that is, most Villains have a discernable agenda. Kairos was an extreme anomaly, doing shit because he could, with negligible impulse control.

As noted, what the hell kind of plot could Cat conceivably have that would involve turning against the Truce and Terms and New Alliance that she leveraged the Heroes and Grand Alliance/Crusaders into joining with her, after saving them from imminent defeat, and spending over two years faithfully upholding them and fighting the Dead King.

It's not that hard to recognize that Cat, Villain though she may be, is a very different sort of Villain from Kairos.

Motivations, temperament, integrity, personality, impulse control ... pretty much every metric is clearly and obviously different.

JJR

Given that it was a demon of absence inside that egg, it might well be that no one even remembers she did that. I agree with the rest though.

Shveiran

Can we stop with the “how could he possibly know argument?”

I mean, there are instances where there is a tragic misunderstanding and casualties follow, but this is not one of them.

I was all for giving him a chance, before he started talking a few chapters ago. Now... let's not pretend is ignorance isn't voluntary, please.

Ignoring all contrary evidence is a choice, not a tragic misunderstanding. One that cannot be justified in someone that decides to take a blade in hand to carve the world into a better place. It's akin to a surgeon regularly operating under the influence.

Liliet

My position is basically “he is a fucking idiot, and I can basically read his fucking mind as I understand exactly what is going on in it”

Javvies

Being an idiot only “excuses” so much.

At this point, any Hero and/or remotely informed person in a position of any kind of power, influence, and/or connections (ie, any noble, and probably a lot of the higher ranking commoners in the bureaucracy and merchants) would basically have to be willfully disregarding a huge amount of information to think Cat is interested in betraying the Truce and Terms or the Alliance to the Dead King.

Hell, I'm pretty sure that even Saint of Swords would disagree with Mirror Knight and company. At least, as far as their apparent motives – Saint of Swords would perhaps agree with trying to take out Cat and all the Villains in the Arsenal on the basis that not immediately stabbing a Villain, even when they're helping fight the Dead King, is bad precedent to set for when the Dead King isn't invading, especially if they're sincere about things. On the other hand, Saint of Swords would be straightforward and up front about disagreeing with the entire premise of the Truce and Terms and refusing to agree to sign on with them.

Saint of Swords would be trying to kill Cat and torch the Truce and Terms because she recognized that Cat meant it and was sincere about them, not because she thought that Cat was trying to betray them.

Mirror Knight is either both a dumbass and willfully disregarding a lot of information, or he's lying about his motives and what he thinks Cat's motives are. Neither is a good thing.

Liliet

I'm pretty sure heroes don't get written reports on geopolitics.

And the one person we know of who'd be in position to inform him, well... Wouldn't be interested in clarifying exactly how much the Black Queen is doing for the Grand Alliance.

Javvies

...
He's a Hero, who has, presumably, been spending the vast majority of his time since the Dead King invaded on the battlefield.

It doesn't take detailed briefings. It's frigging relatively commonly known that Cat got the Alliance the three months of ceasefire from the Dead King, joined the Alliance, came up with the Truce and Terms, and has thrown her weight, connections, nation, and followers into the war effort.

He's a Hero, not some peasant laborer in southern Procer who has never been further from his farm than the closest village market. As a Hero, he's got nigh automatic access to the highest nobles in Procer, the leaders of the Allied Armies (especially the battlefield generals and their staffs), the other Heroes, and access to most information the Alliance has, especially if it's more or less general knowledge – basically there only things he doesn't have relatively easy access to, if not borderline automatic access to is stuff like compartmentalized information, ongoing high level negotiations, internal Drow details, e.t.c.

Plus, he definitely knows enough to know that a deal has been made with the Drow, to grant territorial claims on the surface. There's no way that you can know about that deal and not know any of the context around it.

Plus, presumably somebody had to talk him into initially signing on with the Truce and Terms in the first place. From his demonstrated behavior, that would have required a compelling case behind it in order to overcome his racial prejudices and his inherent "Heroic" opposition to anything Villainous, Villain-adjacent, or remotely connected to a Villain.

Being an dumbass idiot only goes so far. Especially since there's been at least two years of more or less stalemate and status quo.

Liliet

> and has thrown her weight, connections, nation, and followers into the war effort.

this part? absolutely is not. what people say about politician aligns with actual reality of they are doing NOT A LOT

> As a Hero, he's got nigh automatic access to the highest nobles in Procer, the leaders of the Allied Armies (especially the battlefront generals and their staffs) no he doesn't, who the fuck has got the time to brief some random hero? especially when said hero spends his days fighting and not fishing for geopolitical information? oh yeah that girl he sleeps with, wouldn't she?

> he definitely knows enough to know that a deal has been made with the Drow, to grant territorial claims on the surface.

I'm not seeing why you're so sure he would know that

> Plus, presumably somebody had to talk him into initially signing on with the Truce and Terms in the first place. From his demonstrated behavior, that would have required a compelling case behind it in order to overcome his racial prejudices and his inherent "Heroic" opposition to anything Villainous, Villain-adjacent, or remotely connected to a Villain.

we know he was opposed but Hanno talked him into it

That Other Guy

Let's not forge that the Wandering Bard is pulling his strings. She is most adept at leading heroes by the nose. MK will make decisions based on the information provided. If that I formation is laced with innuendo and half-truths, or presents the truth with a bias, MK will be as susceptible to that bias as anyone else.

Belief trumps critical thinking any day of the week.

Konstantin von Karstein

« and has thrown her weight, connections, nation, and followers into the war effort.
this part? absolutely is not. what people say about politician aligns with actual reality of they are doing NOT A LOT »

He knows that Callow and the Drow entered the GA thanks to Cat.

« he definitely knows enough to know that a deal has been made with the Drow, to grant territorial claims on the surface.

I'm not seeing why you're so sure he would know that »

Because he sleep with the stupid princess who asked him to rule said drow-given land with her.

« Plus, presumably somebody had to talk him into initially signing on with the Truce and Terms in the first place. From his demonstrated behavior, that would have required a compelling case behind it in order to overcome his racial prejudices and his inherent "Heroic" opposition to anything Villainous, Villain-adjacent, or remotely connected to a Villain.

we know he was opposed but Hanno talked him into it »

So Hanno still had to convince him

Liliet

> He knows that Callow and the Drow entered the GA thanks to Cat.

For all he knows, they were going to regardless, and Cat cleverly maneuvered herself into position of the facilitator so she can reap benefits from something that was happening either way.

Kel the Seer

I am reminded of a line from Spaceballs when I think of MK and his lap the blade. "And this is why Evil will always win. Because Food is dumb" Before anyone spends their time quoting the archive chapters, I don't mean all good Named, but those two seem to have definitely used Int as a dump stat. They assume Cat as Evil is up to something, because "Villains bad". So a judge from WB spends them here, abandoning a front in the middle of a war to stop her evil plot.

They already don't want to follow the Truce, and do so only grudgingly, and have likely convinced themselves that it is all some plot because Cat pushed it. Likely to hobble Heroes or something similarly simplistic.

The question is whether these chuckleheads decide to be "Truly Good" by splitting with WK and GP as having been usurped, duped, or in thrall to Cat after this fiasco is settled and draw other similarly intractable Heroes to their cause, creating yet another threat to the Truce and Terms.

Threaten the Truce if the story works, threaten the Truce if the story fails, and guide Cat's forming name down one of a few "acceptable" paths. The Intercessor shows why she is the Gods' enforcer. Never do something for only one reason when you can layer the plot so multiple outcomes are to your benefit.

Shveiran

@Liliet: for all he knows, this was all a conspiracy of the Elves to acquire a monopoly on the production of biscuits in Calernia.

I mean, really. This isn't "protagonist logic", not by this point in the series. The Black Queen is the lynchpin of the war against the Dead King, and the war is the most important event of the century.

To show this kind of willful ignorance in the matter and still break into the motherloving Arsenal is... I don't even have a simile for how stupid that is!

Like bullying and plotting and buying your way into imposing an education reform, then going "say, what is this new 'book' technology I hear so much these days? And students are born literate, right?"

The only way he could not know all of this is if he kept his head under the water all the time and screamed "lalalalalalalala" everytime he met a fish.

Konstantin von Karstein

Nice analogy 🙄

Abnaxis

For what it's worth, motivated reasoning is a thing that exists and is quite common. I wouldn't call MK so much stupid as indoctrinated. His world view is built on a set of beliefs that villains can only be unforgivably Evil-like cult followers IRL any evidence to the contrary will only push him further in good beliefs, lest his entire sense of self collapse.

erebus42

I've always had a soft spot for tricksters so hearing a reference to an at least borderline one and seeing Cat engage in outright trickster tactics is a real treat.

She should however be careful. The way she so easily danced in circles around them may give her away.

Also given the revelation from the previous chapter that song, while appropriate, was a little disconcerting.

dadycool

A pseudo-bard singing a song? She's already got the drinking habits down. Let's all just hope she doesn't ever pull out a lute or something.

Letouriste

She would not even need to play well at all. The wandering bard was horrible at that

TeK

She wasn't when she wanted to. I believe it was in the chapter when Hanno's band confronted the Tyrant. She played and played she did good.

JJR

Potentially they just consider it to be their inevitable first loss in a pattern of three.

If they do, hopefully they don't end up going into what they think is a third encounter guaranteed victory and end up losing hard.

Liliet

Depends on who it is against 😊

Myainse

Wow. We know Cat's name has a "twin," she has shown a remarkable affinity for songs lately, and she's playing the story, not the actors.
Her nascent name will totally oppose the Intercessor.

Liliet

I have been saying for a while that Cat is a "stage magician" brand of bard and has always been.

Which is to say, she has an affinity for songs and stories and Cha-based fights in general (we kind of get introduced to her via her taunting a dude larger than her in the arena and then kicking his ass bc he falls for it), but she is also a gleeful and stylish stage magician in all her approach. Watch the hands!

Mental Mouse

> her taunting a dude larger than her in the arena and then kicking his ass bc he falls for it Actually, she didn't win that fight – even had to get her eye healed afterwards.

Liliet

She did win that fight! Yes, she needed to heal a bruise, but she paid for that from her winnings.

> I'd done this before and it would be brutal but Radiant Heavens I was not going to lose – I rammed my knee into his gut and Fenn dropped. Another kick sent him sprawling to the ground, and now the fight was as good as won: I stomped down on his ankle and it broke with a sickening crack. Fenn let out a hoarse scream and I felt a twinge of guilt but mercy was the kind of thing the Pit beat out of you. I was about to cave in a few ribs with another stomp when he raised his hand and panted out his surrender. For a moment all I heard was the sound of blood pounding in my ears but it passed and the numbness turned into the clamor of the masses going wild. I wiped the blood dripping off the corner of my mouth with the bandages around my hand and made my way out of the earthen pit where I'd just broken a man's bones for gold. Well, gold in a manner of speaking: they usually paid me in Imperial silver denarii, which somehow made the whole thing feel even more wretched. The fatigue settling into my bones left me disinclined to mingle with the gamblers who'd struck good betting on me, though I forced a smile anyway.

Shveiran

Patterns of three also require weight and personal rivalry to form, not mere repetition.
This was learned from Amadeus in Book 3.

hakureireimu

For a pattern of 3 to form, the Villain has to strike first; this isn't what happened, assuming the Bard counts as a Heroine.

Liliet

Are you sure? I got the impression a pattern of 3 can be created in either direction, though admittedly it's been that in every case so far, huh.

JJR

I'm not talking about a real pattern of three though. I only mean to say it might be what the heroes think is happening to explain why they lost the way they did.

The real reason they lost so hard is actually because they were up against Cathrine. Hopefully Mirror Knight doesn't recognize the fighting style from the last time he fought against her.

Mental Mouse

> The way she so easily danced in circles around them may give her away.

The Trickster's eternal hazard is running afoul of their own scheme.

Agent J

Gods, I miss Kairos. These heroes are just so... hero-y. Heroic? Heroic. It's great. They'd be instinctually feeding him the exact lines he wants them to say. And every time he thought he accounted for their stupidity, they'd bravely, heroically, prove him wrong by doing something so unbelievably brain dead.

He would love it. He'd eat them alive and he would love it. Rest in piece you magnificent bastard.

I love whenever we get these the hammy villain trope moments. That are always gloriously hilarious and show just how incompetent the heroes are because they are used to the story doing everything for them.

dadycoool

"Providence dictates I can't possibly lose to this Bastion of Evil!"

Five minutes of interaction with Cat/Kairos/DK later

"What just happened?"

dadycoool

This was so much fun. It's good to allow Cat to cut loose every once in a while, especially now that the shape of her "True Power" can be glimpsed. We still have yet to behold her True Power, but she's unlocked enough perks to play puppetmaster with a bunch of idiot Heroes.

"We're going to set something on fire, aren't we?" Pure gold, refined and shaped into a gorgeous figurine by the following exchange. This is what I've missed most, the Woe interacting with each other. And hey, when all you have is a match, the world looks like it's made of kindling.

boballab

Now all we need is some goats...

Liliet

guess who's salty as fuck about BURNING BOOKS (it's me)

but this was hilarious (even if it involved burning books)

Cat's a real star and I loved the backup she has from a Callowan story here (I wonder if Alistair the Fox ever burned any books. probably yes i guess) that clumsiness on the Blade of Mercy's part is literally reverse providence – the exact opposite of what Cat noted during her fight against devils early in Twilight. A clever hero would by this point notice that clever heroes would be able to take away A LOT from this encounter really:

- Cat's not trying to actually hurt them, and is in fact careful not to (Archer's careful cut ABOVE the eyes was hilarious in context fight me) (even if it was among burning books)
- Cat has definitely got Providence on HER side here and they get nothing (apparently book burning is insufficiently felonious to make her the bad guy here)
- CAT IS NOT THE FUCKING DEAD KING COME THE UNHOLY FUCK ON ;u;

other notes: the custodians aren't dead, which means the person behind this is either a hero or a villain who knows the value of bogging down the opposition with logistics

(even if there's Bard in there she'd be the person behind the person, not the immediate plan maker, we all know that, right?)

(burning books)=)

Oshi

The burning books thing is so painful to read. I'm super surprised there isn't fire suppressant magic here though or a mundane way to manage it.

I'm starting to think this whole business has both a Hero and a Villain in it. It's way too...nice and political.

Liliet

Agreed.

TBF they're in a stone chamber and all the lights are magic. It WOULD have to be deliberate arson, and Arsenal isn't exactly open to the public.

And then Cat goes and just... AAAUGH

Liliet

Also I love the "please someone explain what my plot is supposed to BE here" part ♥ ♥ ♥

dadycoool

Yeah, I love how they were like "He's trying to kill Deadhand and frame us! Stop him!" And Cat's like "Wut?"

Liliet

There is a great deal of appeal to watching the "heroes doing their best but actually guessing blindly and being most entirely wrong" plot from the other side.

I hate it from the inside, but Cat's POV is FANTASTIC.

wipncrowell

It makes me think that Mirror Knight's problem is being jealous/afraid of strong villain Black Queen/Cat.

ninegardens

To be fair- this is actually a pretty reasonable guess, and (at the very least) shows a great deal of respect for the Deadhand.

Burlyraven

This chapter really drives home the fact that when Cat's really been Cat, she's definitely leaned towards the Trickster role. While her tenure under Winter did produce some awesome action sequences, part of the inherent wrongness of it was her being dragged towards brute force solutions. Her powers have always been strongest when centered around cunning and absurdity.

I'm calling "Fox Queen" as her new Name, after that Alistair reference.

Mental Mouse

Which makes it a little weird that Winter dragged her so much towards brute-force – while Winter and Summer has massive power, Winter at least was a schemer as well. Perhaps she was just overwhelmed by the power jump.

Cap'n Smurfy

I really want to see a Mirror Knight pov interlude. I imagine the convoluted thing he calls a thought process will be morbidly fascinating.

Liliet

I... really don't think so. See one fallacy, see all of them. Human beings are excellent at making reality fit pre-selected narratives, and we all do it in approximately the same painfully boring & cringy ways.

Though it would be neat to know where he got the info from.

Shveiran

On the other hand, he is currently very unlikeable. Seeing from his eyes may help us see him as something other than a moron.

... I don't find it likely, by this point, but EE could maybe do it?

I don't know, I'm conflicted. There is a huge part of me that is still screaming "STOP BEING WRONG ALL THE TIME, YOU DAMN DUMBASS, OR AT LEAST OWN UP TO IT!" whenever a Hero is in a scene.

Like, by default, unless the Hero in question redeemed himself somehow.

It's like they have the burden of proof to show me they aren't morons, by this point.

It's greatly cathartic to see Cat play them for fools, but I know they aren't going to die, and so they'll end up on the protagonist's side in the end, but I think I'll still despise most of them when they do.

And that worries me, because it's not... satisfying as a conclusion?

They still feel so... dumb? Wrong? Bad?

I think I need to stop seeing people like Frederic, Hanno and Roland as the exceptions here or I'll never be happy.

So maybe I want a MK chapter? I dunno anymore.

Liliet

I just feel like "fucking idiot" and "a bad person" are two different qualifiers, and frankly, Mirror Knight might be kind of both at this point, but the distinction is still important. We have no evidence that Antoine (the Blade of Mercy) is a bad person, though he's definitely an idiot. And the Keeper and the Poet might actually be smart, just... underinformed.

Shveiran

Any "fucking idiot" that chooses to go around swinging his sword is also a "bad person" in my book.

Killing people without any real understanding of who they are, what is going on, what the consequences are, is not something that has no weight on the moral scale. Especially because if you have doubts about what you are doing, your Name weakens => anyone like Antoine that is still lifting libraries with the tip of his sword must be rather convinced that everything he did was overall alright.

Liliet

Who killed who now?

Auston Varner

Tbh, his thought process strikes me as less convoluted and more sloppy. Like, convoluted would mean he takes a lot of steps and twists and turns, probably bringing in info that's not immediately relevant, but I get the distinct impression that the problem with Cristoph's thought process is that he skips a lot of necessary steps; specifically, all the ones to do with questioning his basic assumptions and the reliability of the information he has. A pov chapter for him might be amusing for the sheer number of idiotic and unfounded assumptions, as well as for how blatantly poor a judge of character he is (honestly, now I want to see that just to see if he decides that Hakram must be unreliable even to Catherine, because that would be pretty funny), but it would probably be infuriating for all the same reasons

Liliet

This. He just goes from point A to point Z without bothering with points B, C and so on.

Mental Mouse

The thing is, was he always that dumb, that much of a loose cannon? He may well be under somebody's influence (aside from being caught up in a WB story).

Auston Varner

That's a good question. While I don't have enough information on him to be certain, I would say that he probably is under someone's influence, and they picked him for that specifically because he is that much of a dumb loose cannon. Heck, we saw a few chapters back that getting in bed with a pretty girl was apparently all it took to have him thinking about betraying the drow who are currently handling one entire front on their own and lending raiders to another, with no apparent thought to the political ramifications. Honestly, while I don't think there's enough evidence in the text to be sure as of yet, I would not be remotely surprised if he turns out to be what tvtropes calls a Tautological Templar: "What I do is right because I'm doing it, and if you oppose me you're automatically wrong." Though admittedly, with heroes in the Guideverse it's usually safe to assume that's what they are until proven otherwise, so it's not a particularly bold prediction here

RoflCat

Well, he IS the Mirror Knight.

Self-reflection just isn't his thing.

Auston Varner

That's awful, have a like 😂

Bellaco

For a moment I thought that the Mirror Knight was saying that Hakram is dead.

Aotrs Commander

Now, Cat, you know what it's like being a DM...

John

There's no need for a simile, she IS a dungeon master right now. This whole fight is literally happening inside an extradimensional dungeon, and among the international coalition which came together to build the place, she's the highest-ranking leader on-site at the moment.

ciara

AND she's making the story up as she goes!

Isaac Martinez

Burning things is not an obsession. It's an acquired taste.

Daniel E

Seeing Cat back in her element got me thinking; What if the Bard isn't really gunning for her? Bard knows that Cat has started slipping, and victory again DK is less certain than preferred. So Bard concocts a scheme to forcefully push Cat back into a proper form.

Liliet

100% an option

Hungering Gods, I see it now. Cat is turning into the Wandering Bard's arch-nemesis, the Constant Critic.

Is it too late to label Mirror Knight's group of 5 "MK Uktra"?

Liliet

No. No, it's not.

laguz24

You know I wonder whenever someone gets a report about this and reads fire, along with all the other information then why didn't they immediately suspect cat had something up her sleeve. I also really want to see what the maddened keeper is about, she sounds interesting.

laguz24

Oh, yes and I forgot, I bet WB will get thrown for a loop since she likes very predictable stories and now they are full steam ahead into unknown territory where heroes and villains team up for lengthy periods of time, not temporary team-ups where the villains betray the heroes the minute they get the chance.

Liliet

> I bet WB will get thrown for a loop since she likes very predictable stories

TeK

I believe that Mirror is secretly a very good schemer, that fooled everyone into believing that he is not. Brilliant.

Ernest Pereira

I am very much not a fan of the return to the old way of 'the heroes are really, REALLY stupid motherfuckers who are handed heavenly strength'. I want more of Roland, Tariq, and Hanno, plz.

Liliet

Consider the difference though: now Cat's trying to guide them into figuring shit out / not getting themselves killed, instead of killing them! This is a MUCH better take ^^

Mental Mouse

Next up... Cat tries to lead the villains away from their side of the precipice, only to be reminded that's a whole 'nother clowder of cat-herding...

Wandering Bard: "See how both sides are plumb idiots ? Perhaps now you can consider not only the artistry, but the skill and sheer effort involved in my work! Just in time, because I've got a job for you... mine. Heh heh heh..."

Well, probably wouldn't be quite like that... 😊

Clmineith

I, too, think that the Cat's nemesis will be the Wandering Bard (or the reverse). But the WB real Name is the Intercessor.

You know, the antonymous of Intercessor is Adversary. Which would be a great Name for Cat.

And the Adversary is a name for Satan.

Just saying.

Mental Mouse

Over at The Gods Are Bastards, I'd already drawn a link between Cat and their Goddess of cunning (and exile from the Pantheon, aka "devil")... Cat's style is very much in the vein of Elilial's Cunning. (And of course, what creature is the very archetype of cunning?)

Chapter 18: Clout

"You bargained for my soul, dear devil, and that is what you received. Is it my fault you did not stipulate it was to be my original one?"

– Dread Emperor Traitorous, trading the soul of a single gnat for infernal enlightenment

We shed the illusions like one would shed a cloak.

We'd get more use out of us being the Black Queen and the Archer right now, though there was also an aspect here of knowing I should not press my luck too much. I was a villain who'd just finished the first part of her plan, securing the expected victory, which meant I was due a nasty surprise if I kept going down the path. Best to shake off this story and embrace another before the teeth of it could come around to bite me. Gods forgive me, but tonight I would be following down the path Kairos Theodosian had so brazenly blazed through while he lived: always scheming, always at odds, so that very same thing that should be burying you instead kept you alive. I did not miss the Tyrant of Helike himself, for he'd been cruel and feckless and admirable only in his qualities turned against others, but sometimes I did miss the times I associated him with in my memory. The days where my foes had breathed and there had been an end to them.

"So what are we doing now?" Archer asked.

She'd caught up to me quickly enough, swift on the stride as she was, and shrugged when I'd asked if she had any difficulty shaking off the opposition. I would have given her good odds of pulling this off even without Creation's favour blowing into our sails, so I was not surprised. None of the Named I'd seen of the band of five so far were made for the subtle side of things – well, neither of the Procerans anyways. I still knew distressingly little about the Maddened Keeper.

"When you asked me for the Harrowed Witch for your band," I said, "you gave me two reasons. The first was that her stealth sorceries were impressive. The other was–"

"Aspasie is good at calling up the dead to chat with," Indrani finished. "Which has been worth more than gold, Named being Named. So who is it we're going to be chatting with?"

"The same man whose body we need to make disappear," I said. "If the Wicked Enchanter has been seen walking around but his corpse is still on a slab, fingers will start being pointed."

"We get my witch or your dead body first?" Archer asked.

She was a practical woman, my Indrani, and I really did enjoy that. Not the kind that would balk at either borrowing – it wasn't stealing if you were a queen, probably – a dead body or calling on the spirits of the dead for questioning. Much as I liked, say, Hanno I suspected he'd not be up for a spot of corpse robbery without several serious questions first being asked.

"The corpse," I mused. "Quiet-like, yeah? The point is to get it to the Harrowed Witch, so we'll avoid being seen bringing her there."

If we showed up there with a known necromancer in tow we'd be giving away the game. I cast a sideways look at Indrani.

"Her dead brother's still haunting her?" I asked.

"Sure, but it's more nuisance than trouble," Archer shrugged. "And I'll answer the question you're building up to before you ask it, spare us both some trouble. She can be trusted, Cat. She's not Woe, won't ever be, but she knows who to close ranks with."

It'd have to do. It wasn't like the villains we'd picked up since declaring the Truce and the Terms were all black-hearted treacherous devils, though admittedly we had picked up a few of those. It was just that, as a rule, they tended to be a lot less preoccupied with other people's wellbeing than the White Knight's lot. Villains, I'd learned, were not beyond loyalty. But they had the loyalty of wolves, to the pack that bit and bled for them, while heroes instead had the loyalty of knights: to oath and realm and Good. It didn't necessarily make the champions of the Heavens pleasant people, but on the other hand I couldn't deny that Hanno's side of the fence counted not a single rapist or thrill-killer. There were days, when the likes of the Mirror Knight's ingratitude and ignorance became so very grating, that it was tempting to forget things like that. Tempting to forget that there was more to villains than the Woe and the Calamities, that the banner I'd chosen to bear had flown tall over millennia of dark deeds.

I couldn't afford to close my eyes to that, going forward. Not if the Truce and Terms were to one day be remembered as the prelude to the Liesse Accords, as I so badly wanted them to be.

"I'll take your word on it," I said. "We need to get a move on, 'Drani. There's at least one of that band that'll remember to go look for the Enchanter's corpse as soon as nobody's in danger anymore."

She snorted.

"Wouldn't count on that," she said.

I shook my head. Tempting as it was to take the Mirror Knight and his ilk as all Light and no brains, it'd be a mistake.

"Wind was out our back and the sun in their eyes in there," I reminded her. "We get in scrap with them again, and we'll get what Revenants get. A third time and it'll be us with the wind in our faces."

"Won't make them any smarter," Indrani pointed out.

"We fought their two frontliners and ambushed the eyes," I said. "Someone serves as the thinking head of that band, we just haven't run into them yet. Any cart's a bad cart if you take off half the wheels."

Hopefully Adjutant would be keeping whoever that was pointed in the right direction, cleaning up behind any mistakes Indrani and I might have made. Not that we'd be the ones having made the greater share of mistakes in there. The two Procerans here, in particular, had proved significantly easier to handle than I'd expected. It made a horrible sort of sense, now that I thought about it, because though I heard about things the Mirror Knight had done all the time I couldn't honestly recall a single story where he'd been the leader. He wasn't even a band's second, most the time: he was the brawns to the Witch of the Woods' magic, Hanno's vanguard or bait for the Silver Huntress. Was this a blunder of our own making, I wondered? The man's an ignorant ass, but has anyone actually tried to set him straight and teach him to recognize what's going on around him? It ought to have been his responsibility to see to that, sure, for he was a grown man and few of us had gotten to have our hands held through the process of gaining power. But then was it not undeniably a blunder to let a hero with that kind of power stew in a puddle of his own obtuseness, growing ever more frustrated and wary?

Something to consider more in depth later, I decided. It would be Hanno's failure more than mine, but I'd never spoken a word about it either and that made for shared responsibility. Indrani and I had been moving even as we talked and quickened our pace further as we fell into silence, her longer stride letting her take the lead as she guided me through the hallways of the Arsenal. I inquired as to our destination and learned that after the Wicked Enchanter was butchered before half a hundred people, his body had been taken away to the Depository. I'd been a little surprised to hear that, considering that was the part of the Arsenal where all the weapons and artefacts were kept in crates until they could be shipped to the fronts: it was a storehouse, more or less. But it was apparently a storehouse with some fairly secure sections, and as one of the parts of this place where no Named resided it'd been deemed as the least provocative of the places to stash a villain's dead body.

"There's going to be guards," I said.

"Of course," Indrani agreed. "But people aren't allowed in and it's a sealed room."

Meaning that if we went in and, after a few moments, popped back out asking the guards where the Hells the body was there shouldn't be anyone able to gainsay us. I could dump the corpse in the Night until we got it to the Harrowed Witch, so we wouldn't essentially be blatantly lying with a dead body strapped onto Archer's back. When we got there the whole affair turned out to be, well, surprisingly straightforward. There was a full line of guards by the door, Lycaonese by the looks of them, and their commanding officer had the key to the wards. I was recognized, even without my cloak, and when I requested entry they didn't even bother to ask me why before accepting. Obviously I had the right, since this was a dead villain and I'd been his representative under the Terms, but I was somewhat surprised at how utterly indifferent the Lycaonese were to the whole thing.

The key to the wards was a simple stone disk that unmade the sealing enchantment on the steel-barded door when pressed into a slot above the handle and it remained in there even as I opened it and slipped inside. The tingle of other wards washed over me as I did – probably a few to prevent coming in by Arcadia and Twilight, and perhaps to prevent summoning within – but there was no other defence. The dead body was in the back, on what was very clearly four wooden shipping crates covered by a slab of steel, thought at least someone had placed a white shroud over it. There was no corpse-stench in the bare stone room, which meant the corpse had been preserved. By alchemy and not enchantment, I noted, since the sharp tang of embalming fluid and something more like flowers was lingering in the air. Good, the Night wouldn't disrupt anything when I took the body then.

I checked it was the Enchanter under the shroud, sought Indrani's confirmation it was the right man and received it with a nod, then I seized Night a heartbeat later. The body sunk into the darkness I wove under it, and I breathed in through my mouth as I began choosing my words.

Time to raise a ruckus about the theft of the body I'd just stolen.

The damned song just wouldn't leave my head, I mused as I poured myself a fresh finger of aragh and knocked it back.

"The henhouse stands unlatched

All within, by the fox snatched."

A fresh change of clothes had done me some good, though that wasn't the main reason I'd done it and ordered Indrani to do the same before sending her out. Smoke had a particular scent to it, and not one easy to hide. At least one Named was bound to notice if we kept wearing garments smelling of a fire we weren't supposed to have been anywhere near. I dressed formally, or at least what passed as formal for me: having a soldier queen's reputation meant I could dispense with a lot of the finery some other crowned heads might be stuck wearing. The heart of it was a high-collared and long-sleeved tunic of dark green, bordered in deep gold and going down to my calves. It was split all the way down to my belly by more elaborate embroidery in the same golden colour, though buttons kept it closed and close against me all the way up to the hollow of my throat – where the sole button I'd left unmade prevented the tunic from digging into my skin.

A broader belt that I was used to in good leather was kept in a complicated knot I'd taken me ages to learn how to make without Hakram's help and ended in a long stripe going down to slightly below the hem of my tunic. The buckles were gilded and a few patches as well though they were inscribed with the Crown and Sword instead of simply polished, lending the whole thing a rather ceremonial look. Trousers of the same good cloth and colour ended in knee-high boots of fine make, which I'd insisted have enough room for a knife to be slipped in. Up the sleeve of my tunic, an old gift from Pickler I more rarely wore these days had been made to serve a again: a complicated set of knots and leather strings that could have a knife falling into my palm a beat later if I flicked my wrist just right. With the Mantle of Woe on my back, my hair pulled back into a long braid and a bare circlet of gold that sat high on brow as my crown, for once I looked like a queen and not a soldier with a looted crown.

There might be more truth to the second of these, in the end, but appearances were too useful a tool to be discarded.

I'd abandoned my rooms not long after making use of them, preferring instead to return to that same small parlour in the Alcazar I'd used to entertain the Hunted Magician. The half-empty bottle of aragh from earlier had been pining for me there, along with what looked like little slices of bread with some sort of mousse on them. It smelled like meat and spices and it tasted delicious, so I polished off a few while waiting for Archer to return with the Harrowed Witch in tow. I was careful with crumbs and stains, since I was not going to go through all the trouble of dressing up regally only for the impression being ruined by mousse on the corner of my lips. The song stayed with me, and as I hummed absent-mindedly my brow rose: someone had knocked at my door. That wasn't Indrani, who would not have bothered herself with courtesy like knocking before entering a room in general, much less a room I was in. I discreetly brushed off some crumbs from my cloak and gathered myself on the sofa.

"Enter," I called out.

So here they go, once again, I hummed under my breath. Chasing a red tail into the glen.

Adjutant was the first to step into the room, giving me a bow that told me two things: this was a formal visit, and he did not trust whoever was with him with even the light knowledge of our usual informality with each other. Considering who it was I'd sent him out with, I could understand why. The Mirror Knight entered behind him and I noted with approval he'd been made to relegate his sword and shield before coming into my presence. The staff of yew laid lightly on my shoulder was a comforting weight, even though it was more a focus of my powers than a weapon. Behind good ol' Christophe was not his perennial shadow the Blade of Mercy, to my surprise, but instead a more familiar sight.

The Repentant Magister, Nephele Eliade, was the very painting of what people thought of when talking of a Free Cities beauty. Though her face was sharp in cast and her nose strong, pale grey eyes and luxurious long dark hair would have made her worth a second look even if she'd not been a supple and curvy woman. There was a highborn look to her, in the way she stood and spoke, that'd made it easy to believe she had been born to the highest reaches of the Magisterium of Stygia. The Eliade, I'd been told, remained one of the most influential families in the city-state to this day.

I'd first encountered Nephele in Hainaut, as in the early days of the war against Keter she'd already been our foremost authority on the Dead King's necromantic constructs. Even Akua had expressed admiration when she'd read her work on ghouls, and the shade was rather stingier with praise than Masego. In those days there'd not yet been an Arsenal, so the Repentant Magister had moved wherever there was a need for her. Her presence was always an easy sell, given that while she was not an impressive combat mage she was an extremely talented healer and capable of making artefacts that more than made up for her lacking offensive spellcraft. I'd found her rather pleasant, and not only because she usually wore tight velour dresses with dipping necklines. I would have expected someone emerged heroic from the horrors of Stygia to be eager to distance themselves from anything and anyone bearing Below's mark, but she'd turned out to be almost serene about it.

That calm certainty, the knowledge of her place in the world, had been damned attractive and I'd begun making polite inquiries about her preferences – flexible, thank the Gods – to what I'd thought might just be a receptive audience when she'd left Hainaut to help found the Arsenal. Unfinished business, all in all, but not unpleasantly so. The kind that might even be picked up should the situation allow. Now, though, I had to consider her in an entirely different way. Already the Hunted Magician had told me that Nephele was part of whatever the Blessed Artificer was up to, only for her to be turning up here as well? I couldn't be sure she was part of the Mirror Knight's band of five, not yet, but neither would be it an unwarranted assumption. What is it you're actually up to, Nephele? No third hero followed the first two, which I found interesting. It meant there were still three of them out there, out of my sight.

"Your Majesty," Hakram greeted me. "If I may?"

"Proceed, Adjutant," I granted, leaning back into the sofa.

"I present Christophe of Pavanie, the Mirror Knight," the orc said, "and Lady Nephele Eliade of Stygia, the Repentant Magister. They would humbly request audience of you."

The Mirror Knight looked like he'd swallowed a lemon, but he didn't actually contradict Hakram. Huh, I'd not believed he had it in him. Nephele's face was unreadable, not trace of our previous acquaintance there to be found. I poured myself another splash of aragh. Was that a bit of a sting I felt? We're never as charming as we think we are, Catherine, I reminded myself.

"Then be seated," I said. "I expect this'll be interesting."

"Thank you, Your Majesty," the Repentant Magister said, bowing slightly.

Gods, that accent. Helikeans sounded like they were spitting out every other word in Chantant, but the Stygian accent was like silk in the ear. Didn't hurt that she had one of those smooth, throaty voices either. The Mirror Knight offered a curt nod and seated himself briskly, the heroine following suit more gracefully a moment later. Hakram stepped back, standing behind the sofa they occupied and looming as only an orc of his towering height could.

"There is a traitor in the Arsenal," the Mirror Knight gravely said.

My eyes moved to Adjutant, who nodded, then returned to the other two as I cocked a brow.

"I take it you have evidence for such a claim," I said.

"Two Revenants were allowed past the wards," the hero said, "which is impossible without someone on this side letting them in."

My eyes flicked to Nephele, who bowed her head.

"I believe they were not truly Revenants," the dark-haired heroine evenly said, "but instead masking their true identities through an illusion. Which does not change the truth of what Christophe has said: there is a traitor in the Arsenal, and likely more than one."

Well now, wasn't that interesting? Not the revelation itself, as it was a conclusion I'd been inching towards myself for some time – the Bard would need boots on the ground to pull off something like this, there was only so much that could be done without willing hands – but that they'd bring it to me of all people. Nephele had allegedly been sniffing around Quartered Seasons, which for someone with only cursory knowledge of my intentions might very well look like an attempt at apotheosis, and the Mirror Knight both disliked and distrusted me. I sipped at my aragh, considering, and delicately set down the cup.

"I am surprised," I said, "that a man who accused me of plotting murder not a bell ago would now come to me with such tidings. Unless, of course, you mean to accuse me."

The Proceran hero grit his teeth and did not look away from my gaze, dark green eyes matching my own.

"I see what you are, Black Queen," the Mirror Knight said, tone curt. "You have fooled the White Knight and broken the Grey Pilgrim, but I see you. Carrion Queen, heiress to a lord of the same: you burrow into the heart and then claim the body for yourself. You stole the armies of Praes, the Kingdom of Callow, the Tenth Crusade and now you would do the same to the Grand Alliance itself. I will not let you make yourself queen of the Chosen and Damned, Gods preserve me in this."

"But," Nephele mildly said.

"But," the Mirror Knight continued, tone reluctant, "you are foe to the Dead King and all his works. This I... recognize."

How kind of him. I was a little skeptical, though, considering that when I'd been veiled as the Wicked Enchanter he'd accused 'me' of having made a pact with the Black Queen. Unless he'd been baiting a monologue? Possible, though he didn't seem like the sort. As far as I knew most of the foes he'd faced since becoming Named had been Revenants, and there was very little subtlety required in dealing with those.

"All well and good," I said. "But it doesn't tell me what brings you here."

"We require your understanding, Queen Catherine, in dealing with these troubles," the Repentant Magister said. "We are aware that there are... tensions within the Arsenal, but the situation requires investigation nonetheless."

"You want my permission to run your own Chosen inquisition," I said.

My tone expressed exactly what I thought of that without needing to say anything more.

"You are on Proceran land," the Mirror Knight said through gritted teeth.

"Do tell the First Prince that, preferably when I'm in the room," I drily replied. "I've never seen her blush in utter embarrassment before."

The Arsenal was not in Creation and had been made explicitly beyond Proceran rule by multiple treaties besides. Actual laws here were a complicated issue, with nations being responsible for the people they provided and Named themselves falling largely under the Terms.

"We believe," Nephele said, "that your second has already been a target."

My brow rose and I looked at Hakram before returning to her.

"I'm listening," I said.

"You have heard of the fire in the Miscellaneous Stacks?" she asked.

"I have," I cautiously said. "You are arguing that the Revenants were responsible for this?"

"It was an assassination attempt on the Adjutant," the Mirror Knight bluntly said. "You sent him to question the Doddering Sage discreetly, and it was seen as an opening. If my companions and I had not arrived in time he'd be dead."

Huh. Well, Hakram clearly ought to be grateful at having his life preserved in such a manner by upstanding ladies and gentlemen, I mused.

"That was the plot, Queen Catherine," the Repentant Magister quietly said. "Your second dead on the ground, and only heroes there among the ashes. Someone is trying to set us against one another."

She was very much correct about that but given that I was seated across from two of the blades the Wandering Bard was currently swinging at me I couldn't exactly come out and tell her as much. Still, this was a pleasing turn. I seemed to have accidentally stumbled into the role of authority figure these enterprising investigating rogues might somewhat answer to, which was something I could work with.

"You'll understand," I said, "that while I might believe you speak the truth at least in part, I also have sworn responsibilities. Letting Chosen run amok in the Arsenal and interrogate my lot without supervision would be a gross failure of those oaths."

Nephele was clever enough to see through that, but then she'd been clever before entering this room: she would have known that their request for my blessing to hunt as they wished had no chance of being accepted without some alterations to what had been proposed.

"What if we had one of the Damned with us as well?" the Mirror Knight said. "Someone you can trust."

"You have a name for me, I take it?" I asked, brow raised.

He looked back at Hakram. The same orc whose life he had 'saved', who he would have sent to save unconscious custodians and not been failed by. That decision made itself, didn't it?

"The Adjutant is a good man," Christophe firmly said. "It would not be an injury to count him among our number."

But we know, oh we know, I almost hummed, that in the woods, the fox is king.

This would do, I decided. With Hakram following them and serving as my voice I could count on them keeping out of my way while I expunged the Bard's influence from this fortress one pawn at a time. With a little luck, they might even actually unearth a real conspiracy that I'd missed.

"Where would you begin?" I said, tacitly accepting.

The Repentant Magister released a long breath, though the Mirror Knight only nodded as this was expected. His due. Dislike cannot dictate policy, I reminded myself, or I would have been at war with every other Calernian nation within a year of my coronation.

"The Hunted Magician has been seen going in and out of the Workshop at odd hours," the Mirror Knight told me.

Because he's been carrying on two love affairs with heroines, I thought, the most impressive part of this being that he's yet to lose a limb. Mind you, if I was the Intercessor I'd consider the Hunted Magician as a good in for the Arsenal: he had an enemy he'd probably do next to anything to avoid being found by, and precious few scruples as a person. If they wanted to dig there they had my blessing.

"It's start," I agreed. "Come back to me when you've found something. I might even have insights of my own to share, as I'm looking into a few things as well."

"It might be," Nephele softly said, "that some of your own trusted have not proved entirely deserving of that trust."

Well now, that was something. A warning, if I read her right. And considering she was one of the Arsenal regulars and there was only one of the Woe who shared that state of affairs? She was warning me about Hierophant. Quartered Seasons, I decided. She's dug up something about Quartered Seasons, and she's decided that Masego is deceiving me somehow. Or she was trying to sow dissent between myself and Hierophant. Either way, it was a swing and a miss. Zeze honestly didn't care enough about my approval to lie, it wasn't how his head worked. He'd either go through with it anyway or decide it wasn't worth the trouble, deception wouldn't be part of the recipe either way. That the Repentant Magister had said that at all, though, was telling. Masego was fairly open about his intention to one day reach apotheosis on his own terms and Quartered Seasons might be seen as a way to that. The Repentant Magister, and likely the Blessed Artificer as well, knew enough about the project to misunderstand. That put the alleged blinding of Masego by the Blessed Artificer in a rather more sinister light.

Someone had just shot up the list of problems I needed to handle.

"I am not," I said, "in the habit of leaving stones unturned. Go, you two. I'll speak with Adjutant a moment and send him after you."

It got a nod from the Mirror Knight and a proper bow from Nephele, though she also carefully studied my face as she moved. I do not know what she found there, but she left looking satisfied. The doors was barely closed and the courtesies done when I turned a steady gaze to Hakram.

"Who's the fifth?" I asked.

Mirror Knight, Blade of Mercy, Maddened Keeper and Repentant Magister. That made four, which meant there was one left I'd not seen. I would have bet the Exalted Poet, before Nephele's presence was revealed, but now I had doubts. Bands of five were rarely so heavy on Gifted.

"The Vagrant Spear," Hakram replied.

Shit, Archer's second? That explained why she'd not heard armour, but we were lucky we'd not run into her: she likely would have recognized Indrani, glamour or not. Fuck, we actually gotten pretty lucky on that. If I'd not acted to split the band of five, Archer would probably have been outed. The first step never fails, huh? I'd been so worried about good eyes I'd missed the greater threat of simple familiarity. A reminder the victory was rarely quite as triumphant as it felt when it was happening.

"What's she after?" I asked.

"I believe she is trying to keep the Red Axe alive," he said. "And was drawn in by the Mirror Knight's impassioned defence of her right to break the Terms for a revenge killing."

The Red Axe had travelled with Archer's band to come here, hadn't she? And as I recalled, the Spear had almost begun a fight with the Hunted Magician over the Enchanter's corpse. I'd need to ask Indrani about this, looked like. The way that Adjutant had phrased his answer told me both what I'd asked and his own opinion of the matter, which was rather helpful of him given how little time we had. I'd need to cut him loose soon else his new companions would ask questions, but I still had a bit more.

"Mirror Knight," I said. "Your opinion of him?"

"There is more him than I had anticipated," the orc gravelled. "Genuinely unambitious, but he clearly sees himself as the flagbearer of Proceran heroism with all that entails. And he's on the edge, Catherine. Sometimes he snaps at the Blade of Mercy and the boy always looks surprised, so it can't be habitual."

I slowly nodded. That made the man even more dangerous, truth be told. People did stupid and dangerous things when they felt they had no other choice. I was glad I'd asked, since that would change how the Knight would need to be handled: carefully, in a word.

"On your end?" Hakram asked.

"Going to ask the Wicked Enchanter some questions," I replied.
"Indrani should be here any moment."

"Then I'll leave, they might be waiting for me outside," Hakram said.

And we would not want them to run into each other. I got up to clasp his arm before sending him out, and when the door closed I closed my eyes and breathed out. The song hadn't quite left me, I found as the hum left my lips.

"Yes we know, oh we know

That in the woods, the fox is king."

can't get that taste, out of your mouth, can't get the pawprints, out of the henhouse now

tkjarrah

there's another twist here, there has to be. the vagrant spear just happening to be absent is a sign of something being up if ive ever seen one

Liliet

A better question, possibly: so if the Exalted Poet is not with them, where is he?

Shveiran

It's not that it is a bad question, but a LOT of Named are unaccounted for right now. Like, a dozen or so.

Liliet

Riddle me this: why did he COME here? His Name is bardic, not artifact-making and not magic-theoretical. If he's not with Christophe, what's he doing in the Arsenal in the first place?

Shikkarasu

Oh... Oh that's good. I didn't even consider the ramifications of EP not being in the Band of 5. I suppose he could have been traded out for someone nearby once he was apprehended two updates ago, but how often is a Band broken that easily?

Liliet

What is he DOING in the meanwhile? Why did he come if he's not sticking with them?

Javvies

So the Vagrant Spear is either fully onboard or being played. Also ... possibly being used as cover for Wandering Bard's involvement if Red Axe had expressed her desire to kill the Wicked Enchanter prior to their arrival at the Arsenal. Or could plausibly have done so and they lie about it.

Nothing about this situation is particularly good.

The song impulse is drawing parallels to Cat hearing the Tower's call to climb it in song. And it's concerning me. Might be an indicator of whatever Name she's becoming a claimant to, or connected to it in some way.

haihappen

There are a lot of In's for the Bard. I suspect there are two: One that It contacted directly, and one that is only influenced indirectly.

The latter is probably the Mirror Knight. For the first one, it is probably a villain. The Haunted Magician is a reasonably good bet, assuming he is an excellent actor in playing a bad liar.

I also assume that if push comes to shove, she will use the "reveal" of the 4/4 Seasons project to tip the story at a critical point.

ActionKermit

During the Fae arc, Cat dressed up in a fox-themed outfit intended for the Princess of High Noon, and stepped into a story where the Princess was supposed to challenge the Duke of Violent Squalls to a duel, fail and be trapped. As we all know, Cat refused to play by the rules and turned the chase inside-out, killing the Duke and taking his place in Court. My guess is that the Bard knows the original story but not how it got subverted this time around.

Mental Mouse

Oooh,,,,, heh heh heh.

Toddmeister1422

I worry about the significance of that little earworm of hers....

haihappen

Maybe she is slipping into the groove of a Trickster role. Wasn't the Fox King the Guideverse's variant of Robin Hood or something like that?

A random thought of mine was that the Bard may try to influence the Name she is getting, or tries to stop it. Or, inadvertently, is speeding up the Name-forming.

Cicero

He sounded more like the Swamp Fox to me...

Cicero

Swamp Fox even has a song:

www\(dot\)youtube\(dot\)com/watch?v=ADesK3Wa_D0youtube(dot)com/watch?v=ADesK3Wa_D0)

Isaac Martinez

I wonder.

Songs are important to people as is story.

So if Cat gaining power from her habit of humming songs (in war, in from of the great Council, and even in Aqua's Folly after living 4 extra lives) I think is a good thing.

Also, Cat will give up her crown to Vivienne soon, so I think is imposible that a song will change that. So a song about a fox in the woods can't be the same as the Girl who climbed the Tower.

Liliet

agreed very gleefully

Ben Serreau-Raskin

That was fantastic. These longer chapters are well worth the reduced update schedule.

I love that Cat think she's "accidentally" ended up in the role of an authority figure as though her pattern in this story hasn't been to end up in charge of any group she interacts with in an even mildly cordial manner.

dadycoool

Yeah, MK was right about how she stole the Prasi armies, etc. It reminds me of something Black once said, about how anything she can't Take, she will Break. It's almost like it happens naturally nowadays, like when Hanno refused to join her at first: he needed to be brought to a point where he would have no choice, so he lost his Choir.

Liliet

A different angle on the same thing 😊

dadycoool

It's very ominous to have a Song stuck in your head, especially when you're on the edge of a Name.

And someone needs to take the Plot off the stove, 'cause it's getting pretty thick.

samshadar

Indeed.

The way she's been handling things: gaining knowledge about the roles, the stories, the machinations – and then applying it... She is playing the game on the level of the Bard and the Dead King. Or she's aspiring to anyway. It may well be that her Name will reflect that.

And what are songs if not stories?

Tohron

So, Alistair the Fox was basically a trickster king of Callow, wonder if Catherine's heading toward the name of Fox Queen?

Big I

That would tie into her command of the Wild Hunt, the "clever foxes" as she called them. Not so sure bout the Queen part of that name though since her long term plan is abdication. Maybe just "the Fox"? Also sounds neutral enough that it can fit into both Hero and Villain stories, like Ranger is supposed to be able to do.

breakingamber

That song... someone's going to recognize that it is the same song from the library. That's going to get her in big trouble.

Mirror Knight is 'genuinely unambitious?' Huh.

Liliet

She was humming it, not singing it out loud, and that's in the middle of a fire. No-one heard it (unless the Maddened Keeper has not only sharp eyes...)

Agent J

I should hope not, given she's Callowan and would likely recognize the tune.

Shikkarasu

Let's not forget, any Named can sharpen their ears. They don't need to be the Saint, or anything. That said, I agree; it probably won't come back to bite her. This time.

Some Smartass

...So, how sure are we that Alistair the Fox is still in his tomb?

A stressed shield, a vengeful spear, a repentant mage, one possessed and possibly failing soul... With a self-righteous blade.

this is the making of a disaster instead of a heroic five or villainous alliance. This is going to end with the arsenal falling as sometimes you just need to trick someone to carry a bomb instead of having them sabotage anything.

Answers that are left are simply left up to those who stand after the ashes fall. So Bard can easily spin whatever tale she wishes of one arsenal and some unwanted pieces were simply... Forgotten.

Our little keeper is unknown and our dear leader forgot about the Demon who erases history having been told to the heroic band... Before the king of the dead declared his war.

Adrian_V

She is so going to get a new name, this many references to songs remind me to the "girl who climbed the tower" thing.

Also i was totally expecting the body to already be gone, glad that didn't happen, another thing is that i could have sworn it was the blade of mercy who accused Cat not the MK? was that an error the previous chapter?

Oh and what do you think is mor eprobably: that the Vagrant Spear and Red Axe are lovers, a sort of duo (as in those 2 guys kind of thing) or even a sort of mentor disciple thing (like Cat was supposed to have with the apostle RIP)?

Adrian_V

Arggg i forgot the most important but: my bet is on the Blade of Mercy being the Mole for the Bard, he hates Cat way to much bordering on obsesion, and like i said i remember he was the one throwing wild accusations last chapter, plus that tip bit Hakram mentioned could be that he is behaving different and is bothering the MK.

Liliet

the other way around: MK is snapping at BoM and BoM is surprised

Liliet

They both were behind the accusation, doesn't matter who said it specifically.

Adrian_V

Actually for me it matters, since if it originates from the BoM then it explains why MK is on the party leader role: he fits the criteria for it plus doesn't have enough experience to see through the bullshit, meanin can be lead around, also worth noting that it was MK who came to the conclusion Hakram was the target rather fast, that tells me he wasn't really believing Cat was the culprit here

Liliet

Huh, yeah.

BoM also was the one who was rude about orcs iirc

Liliet

oh my god this is such an archetypical story and Catherine is in such a specific role in it GOD BLESS HER the best part is the ending, but wow I'm loving every minute of it.

Also, prolonged and deep thanks to Erratic for not putting emphasis on the lying and rasing a ruckus parts. Valid plot elements, awful to actually experience reading about in detail.

Can't wait for the heroes to dig up Cat did all of that! We all know that's coming, right? 😊

Big I

How awesome is that Traitorous quote at the beginning of the chapter? He may be edging out Irritant as my favourite Emperor.

gnaruscat

Don't you just love Traitorous? So frustratingly awesome

Burlyraven

I'm curious as to what the dynamic between the Repentant Magister and Cat is going to do to this situation. Right now, we the audience know they have a mutual interest in one another, despite their apparent inability to see it in the other, but they also seem to be pretty blatantly opposed on many integral parts of this particular story. This might be setting the Magister up as a slow burn romance into Cat's moral anchor, which would be important if Cat's Name ends up being a Trickster type.

Side note: one fun thing about Tricksters is that they're one of the few types that can reliably win (or at least not lose) even when they're in a villainous role.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Their dynamic will prompt the Scorched Apostate to spontaneously crawl out of hell, even more scorched and powered up, no? "Slow burn" in multiple senses.

Adrian_V

My hopes are that we will at least see his ghost, i mean Cat still has his corpse right?

Burlyraven

There's been no direct mention of a removal, so I'm expecting some variety of shenanigans to occur, especially now that she's added yet another body to the Night.

Burlyraven

I just had a very dark thought that involves Wicked Enchanter and Red Axe both being Dead King plants, and this entire situation being a convoluted setup to get Cat to pull the Enchanter's "corpse" into the Night.

But that's getting into red string conspiracy theory territory.

ninegardens

So wait...

Cat has a song stuck in her head...

in a situation, where two of her likely enemies include a poet, and a bard.

: |

Oh no.

Sykomantis

Does rap exist in Calernia?

Adrian_V

Yes, remember the drows rap game xD

dadycoool

Oh, God. Queen of Rap?

Lurch

So, a few things people have said above have got me thinking about what kind of name Catherine is coming into. Someone mentioned how she tends to take control of groups she has been in, whether she intends to or not, and usually despite her own intentions. How many times has what she was accused of been her ultimate end, often despite the intent to do anything but that. How many times has she been accused of reaching for power and, despite her own initial lack of willingness to do so, ended up having that power by the end. Often because no-one else could, or should, have taken up the roles she plays. Sometimes, more often recently, she's seen the way things are heading and accepted that role. Because someone needs to do it gods dammit and if no-one else will pull their finger out she will.

And someone else mentioned the idea of her becoming the Fox Queen (or perhaps some other cunning ruler name, it might not be exactly that). This sounds pretty damn plausible, especially with the song stuck in her head. And they also pointed out that that could well be a name that fits as both Villain and Hero depending on where they need to fit into the story.

And the Mirror Knight has now outright accused her of planning to "...make (her)self queen of the Chosen and Damned..."

Catherine already has the title of "Queen of Lost and Found". Lost? Villains could be said to have lost their way. Found? Heroes are often said to have found themselves, or found purpose. And even though she is definitely going to be stepping down from the throne of Callow, that doesn't mean she might not still have a throne. As a (rather frustrated) leader and arbiter of Named, being neither Hero nor Villain. The finger on the balance of the Accords, tipping either way as needed to keep things in check. Trusted just enough to not truly be one of Theirs, even if she's not really one of Ours. Because it seems like someone needs to do a job like that to keep Named in line. And no-one else is going to do it properly...

dadycoool

I remember Kairos laughing right before his Final Monologue because every time the Choir of Mercy bends to her will, the more that becomes a precedent. Between that and the words of this chapter, it makes you wonder just how high she'll go.

Walter

I think one of the band of five isn't really part of it. At a guess, Repentent Magister is only an ally, Bard is the actual fifth, and Hakram being assigned to their band is the next step in her plan.

ActionKermit

I recall that during the Fae arc Catherine went to the Duke of Violent Squalls' ball in an outfit with a Fox mask. This may be a reprise in the mortal world of the events there.

Mike E.

Haven't even read the chapter yet, but just need to say that the opening epitaph is awesome.

Liliet

epigraph

Auston Varner

"It didn't necessarily make the champions of the Heavens pleasant people, but on the other hand I couldn't deny that Hanno's side of the fence counted not a single rapist or thrill-killer. There were days, when the likes of the Mirror Knight's ingratitude and ignorance became so very grating, that it was tempting to forget things like that."

That's, what, the second or third time in this book that the narration has called out the comment section? Although this is also acknowledging that yeah, MK is pretty annoying at times. I actually kind of liked him this chapter though? Like, he definitely is way too stuck on the old ways of hero vs villain with no regard for the details, but he still has some sense of priorities and can bend, just slightly, when he absolutely has to. Doesn't make him particularly easy to like, nor does it mean he's a particularly good person, but it's a potential seed of character development. Reminds me a little of GP, actually; he starts out absolutely opposed to Cat, and ends up deciding that she's not so bad after all

Yes, but GP was able to talk to her for five minutes and MK is stuck in a groove where bard can use him and then lose him to her heart's content.

WuseMajor

I'm honestly not sure that you can say that the heavens don't have any "thrill killers" among their heroes. Some of them seem a little too gung ho at the "smiting anything they perceive as evil" for me and they're often prone to moral absolutism and charging into situations half cocked. All of that is a good recipe for creating problems and doing evil.

dadycool

Saint of Swords, anyone?

erebus42

Yeah, I agree that that's probably a load of horseshit. The fact that they usually focus on acceptable targets like monsters, undead, and Villains would just mean that their predilections would go under the radar.

dadycoool

It can be very hard to remember how evil Dark can get when we're constantly shown essentially the Batman of Calernia. Just because someone adopted the darkness doesn't mean the people born in it, molded by it, aren't far worse.

Shveiran

Worse is comparative. Worse than what, the Heroes?

I think that comparing categories in a vacuum is not really helpful. If all we had was say, serial killer Villains on the prowl and detective Heroes hunting them down to stop them, sure. Who cares if the detective roughs up a few witnesses, if he stops the serial killers from killing again? And even one who cared wouldn't go so far as to argue they are worse than serial killers.

But that is not how the game of the gods works. We saw there are Good and Evil COUNTRIES, and countries are made of people. When you have Heroes and Villains warring on one another, and Good is not always the invaded, and most of what Named do is either enabling their side to kill more people more effectively, or kill a lot of people on their own... is there really a difference?

There is no comparing a Hero going to repel ratlings in the north to someone like the Hunted Magician that just looks after himself. Of course there isn't.

But that is not what most heroes spend the most time and energy doing, is it? Because those stories are boring, and thus the narrative pushes them to seek something else to fight. And when you have these huge conflicts, and invaded countries with Named spearheading the assault or the guerrilla resistance... can you really say "this side good, that side bad"? Or even "that side better?"

On average, as a category, the Heroes are probably doing more good than the Villains. But really... it doesn't look like that big a margin.

Someone that goes around murdering, pillaging and raping like the Wicked Enchanter sounds terrible (and, well, is), but when you consider how much murdering, pillaging and raping can be caused by a pack of Heroes enabling an expansionist Good country to invade another (invasion of Callow, Humbling of Titans...) you need a LOT of small-time Villains to come even.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

The thick plottens.

beleester

I feel like the traitor has to be someone Catherine knows or trusts. A common trope in these stories is that the authority figure has a blind spot towards the villain and that's why the hero can see something that the authorities can't.

Now, clearly Masego isn't the traitor – all the Woe are loyal, and as Cat notes, Masego doesn't lie. And we've already done the "Masego has fallen to the dark side and we have to retrieve him" bit, anyway. But Quartered Seasons is still a major source of suspicion. It's something that the Bard could easily turn into a story against Cat – she admits it looks like another attempt to claim godhood. And it's something completely off the books, where Catherine is basically just signing the checks and not looking at the details.

What I'm saying is, just because Quartered Seasons is a legitimate, Catherine-backed project with worthy goals doesn't mean it can't also be something that was corrupted by a dastardly traitor.

Shveiran

Corrupting Masego's project without him noticing (unless he is under the influence and you are freaking Dead King besides) sounds kind of impossible, honestly.

Either Masego has personally twisted the project which I don't buy for a minute – or it's working as intended.

It being misinterpreted is, of course, completely possible.

IDKWhoitis

I'm willing to bet that Mirror is bound to take a swing at Masego. He probably gets told by his friends about Quartered seasons, and then he decides Cat is either stupid or in on it, so she won't grant permission anyways.

The actual question becomes if Masego and possibly Idrani are enough to survive heroic assault. With gifted who have been building counter Masego artifacts.

JRogue

A "counter Masego artifact" is exactly what I thought when that whole thing went down.

Why, of them all, did they single our Masego to use that light on? I'll tell you why, to test it, to see the limits of what his glass eyes and abilities can do. I think they want to assault him over what they perceive is Masego going rogue. Even the Repentant Magister hinted at the betrayal, which Cay knows better.

4/4 Seasons being "off the books" make Hierophant look very suspicious. If it were the White Knight or Grey Pilgram there, they would know better, because they know what Masego went through, but not these people.

Another possibility is that the Repentant Magister is a lot sneakier than she is letting on, either for or against Cat. I think she is like the Rogue Sorceror, and willing to operate in a grayer area, seeing the bigger picture and does not have the bias of MK.

I am enjoying this arc a whole lot, feels like it back to basics.

Why isn't this a published novel yet?

jesdynf

Man, I'm just thinking of all the people this trick wouldn't've worked on.

"Masego, who set the fire?"

"Catherine, of course," he replied, then paused. "What fire?"

superkeaton

Wheels within wheels, Cat. There's more to this. The murder feels like a smokescreen, I'm betting Quartered Seasons is the real target.

Shveiran

Not a smokescreen; a stage.

Isaac Martinez

The Red Axe. I wonder if it will end with a cursed heroine. They can't kill her, that would arise heroic insurrection, but let her get away is not an option, that would break the Terms.

Maybe it will end with Cain's Curse, or something like that. She will no longer gain help from signatories of the Terms, nor protected, but whoever damages her will receive double the pain until the Dead King's war ends.

hakureireimu

MK is failing his sense motive check so hard...

samshadar

I don't know about that. Hakram is very much a very good man, just maybe not a Good one. 😊
And he does indeed want the investigation to succeed. That is, succeed in uncovering the real killer and the real plot...

Liliet

Nah, he's actually passing it, for once. Hakram IS a good dude.

Shveiran

Not... really? He's a great friend, but he doesn't seem to be overly concerned for the well being of people just because they are people.

He's not out to help those around him, is what I mean. He cares about his own buddies, which is what most do. He is awesome, but... he is not really how to improve the world nor anything.

Liliet

Actually Cat fired him up by getting him angry at the world's injustice and that's his basic motivation? He didn't just fall in love with her or something, her opposition just pissed him off and he decided to show them all.

Hakram also held Cat back from something she would later have been horrified by when he stopped her from killing the Helikean cataphracts. He has a pretty fine discernment for what ethics are, even if he's mostly following them for other reasons, he IS following them.

Consider the low, low, low bar for villains that Kairos, Wicked Enchanter and their ilk set.

Shveiran

Again, all true, yet...

... he got angry at a very specific injustice, he's not out to ensure the well-being of people. I'm just saying, if this makes him a good guy then anyone that has a cause other than himself qualify. Very few of those think it's not helping someone.

... Hakram held back Cat from making decisions in anger that would have sabotaged her long term or that she'd have regretted making down the line. He was looking out for her, nothing less, and nothing more.

Cat's own morality was the paradigm he used, not morality itself.

Liliet

> ... he got angry at a very specific injustice, he's not out to ensure the well-being of people. I'm just saying, if this makes him a good guy then anyone that has a cause other than himself qualify.

...yes?

hiya EE – just dropping into say that I've been reading this work since it was still in Book 1 (so four and a half, coming up on five years now?) and I've never ceased to be impressed with each and every new update. haven't commented before because, well, that's just not my usual style. but now that the end of the journey's in sight, I'd be remiss to not drop in to voice my appreciation.

also, I made you some art. took forever to finish it (over two years) cause life's wack but I think it was worth it in the end.
<https://www.artstation.com/artwork/8lJlxE> really eager to see how this story pans out and will definitely be following whatever you decide to work on next!

Shveiran

Very nice, well done

Mental Mouse

Ohh, nice – if you haven't already, you oughta put that on the Wiki and/or the Discord's art channel.

onedollargum

Cat being unable to get rid of songs is not a good sign for how she's handling the shadow of the wandering bard.

mamm0nn

Hm, I've never noticed EE adapt the story this much based on the comments from the previous chapter. Guess he didn't expect people to dislike Mirror Knight this much for his actions to so often add subtlilities and spreading of responsibility and guilt around.

hakureireimu

I seriously doubt that; how do you know that's not how the was going in the first place.

Mammon

Because while usually the comments and the story that follow aren't too conjoined, this time I noticed some things that didn't seem that much in EE's ordinary writing style and didn't quite fit the pace and flow of the story. Kinda just, adding them in. Making me think that maybe EE read the comments and saw a trend that he never intended, thus patching it up quickly after reading comments like 'Before it was a matter of perspective, but now I'm fed up with the Mirror Knight, he's beyond redemption now.' or whatever. In response EE might've written things like

"Was this a blunder of our own making, I wondered? The man's an ignorant ass, but has anyone actually tried to set him straight and teach him to recognize what's going on around him? It ought to have been his responsibility to see to that, sure, for he was a grown man and few of us had gotten to have our hands held through the process of gaining power. But then was it not undeniably a blunder to let a hero with that kind of power stew in a puddle of his own obtuseness, growing ever more frustrated and wary?"

Especially the italics (which unfortunately weren't copied along) sounded very out of place for the pace and tone of the story that EE has been setting up here. To so openly and suddenly step out of the story to address something that happens to align a lot with the comments of the previous chapter and which contrasts the tale Cat is in now and her Role and mindset, it seems like our comments might've been the cause of these additions to avoid MK to be too ostracized. And there were a few other places in this chapter where I noticed such subtle diversions, though none as clear as this one I think.

Letouriste

It's sloppy writing to adapt a story based on what the readers think. It's somewhat ok to not kill a specific character because of his fanbase (so long it make sense and he still is relevant to the plot).

EE would not do this. Actually I would be surprised if he did not have 10 of so chapters made in advance to keep his sanity intact

Mammon

See my post to Haru on the foundations. But there's a difference between adapting a story on what the readers think, and seeing in the comments that you unintentionally screwed up someone's reputation to something that shouldn't be this negative and viewed in the way that it was. There were several parts in this chapter in too stark contrast and fitting the last chapter's comments too well to be truly natural. I think EE never intended to have Mirror Knight be dropped by the audience as an outright idiotic pariah instead of just a frustratingly heroic lad like Pilgrim was. Which events like him asking if Cat were working with the Dead King solicited from the audience last chapter, only to see in this chapter that they refer to that with a hinted solution to hopefully redeem things a bit back into an acceptable grey.

And it needs not be a completely rehaul, just some sentences added to an already written chapter.

eamondemarsh

gotta say, as much as people in the comments sometimes forget just how evil below tends to be, its not that the mirror knight is annoying, it's that he was seconds away from drawing swords on cat, had left his post in the middle of a war, was going to deliberately break the Truce and Terms over someone who had previously done so as well, and Start a heroic inquisition with no authorization from Hanno inside a weapons factory staffed almost entirely by non-combat names.

like there's a whole host of valid reasons for people to hate his ass beyond "his personality bad"

gnaruscat

Interesting that Cat jumped to Hierophant as the possible traitor, completely ignoring Archer.
I doubt Archer is a traitor, but Cat doesn't even consider the possibility

Mammon

Repentant said it was a regular of the Assembly, and Archer is a visitor same as Cat and Adjudant. Only Hierophant is a regular staff member of this place. Going on what RM said he was the only Woe that fit, Cat hasn't gotten any Name advice from anyone about the other two. When talking about a traitor in general then Cat might suspect Archer as 'quickly' as Zeze, but for the specific clue and context given there's no reason to suspect her based on what Repentant said. And Cat wouldn't have considered Zeze at all either if it weren't for that hint to begin with.

Personally, if there's a traitor in the Woe then it might be Adjutant. While Cat is completely unaware and unwilling to entertain the thought, Vivienne's extra chapters and some hints sprinkled through other extra chapters and interludes actually hinted at (their suspicion of) him being a schemer and inevitable traitor to be.

Javvies

If Adjutant has treacherous schemes and plots going on ... they aren't aimed at hurting Cat.

He got his Name based on helping her and facilitating her desires. I'm fairly confident that knowingly and/or intentionally betraying her, in addition to being wildly out of character, would damage his ability to use his Name.

At worst, Hakram is likely to do something that he thinks is in Cat's best interests without telling her about it or even against her implied or stated wishes. Ie, the interlude/extra chapter where Hakram goes to have a chat with Thief after Cat makes her an offer after (re)taking Laure, in the process terrifying the hell out of Viv, and laying the groundwork for Hakram cutting off his hand to reassure Viv post the Woe's expedition to Keter while Cat and Archer are in the Everdark. Or the extra chapters that involve the attempted assassination of Hakram and some of the other members of the 15th's leadership cadre close to Cat in Ater, and their attempt to deal with it without getting Cat involved (who they thought would likely react poorly and overreact).

Shveiran

Agreed.

Personally, even that I find extremely unlikely after they got to see Black and Scribe falling out because of that kind of mess. I doubt he'd follow in her footsteps, especially since her actions didn't actually get him anything good.

Mammon

You should read Vivienne's Extra Chapters again. Adjutant scheming against Cat seems to be exactly what EE is hinting at, even if this may be a red herring or Vivi being misdirected or even seeing ghosts that aren't there. However, she and others (I think Tyrant and Akua but I could be wrong) have hinted at there at least being the possibility in EE's mind and thus the story.

gnaruscat

Oops, misread or misremembered the implication. Never mind

laguz24

The real question here is who is the fox? Bard or Cat?

Liliet

I'm still going with 'they are the same side, Bard is just neglecting to inform Catherine about that'

violentink

NO CAT!!!! You do not want to slip into the role of disliked authority figure to a band oof maverick heroes investigating a conspiracy... not when you are lying and hiding things from them. Because the story will MAKE THEM UNCOVER THAT. Genre savvy on noir fiction she is not...

Shveiran

...the revelation of what she is hiding actually absolves her, so... it's not really an issue?

You have greater faith in the reasonableness of the mirror knight et al. than I do.

Chapter 19: Spectral

"I'm afraid that that old saying about resting when you're dead has proved overly optimistic, my good fellows."

– Dread Empress Malevolent III

Having a dead body splayed on a table in an otherwise nice room was oddly nostalgic, I'd admit. It made me miss my sappers, who back in the old days had brought me the corpses of my enemies much like cats brought home chewed-up birds. It'd been too long since I'd sat down with Robber and Pickler in person, though in truth I might be able to see them before too long: if we went on the offensive in Hainaut to take back its capital and secure the shores, I'd want them both as part of the attacking army. There wasn't anyone quite like them when it came to getting the job done.

"The spirit still has ties to the body," the Harrowed Witch told us. "I can summon it back for a time, Your Majesty, if that is your wish."

The villainess looked nervous around me, as she'd been ever since I'd made it clear I could see through the enchantments she used to hide. I couldn't, actually, but the Crows could and I was not above the occasional lie to obscure the true scope of my abilities. Brown-eyed, brown-haired and rather drab in both clothes and conversation the other woman had a slight hunch in her shoulders that never quite went away – like she was expecting someone to slap her hard in the back at any moment. As I understood it the brother she'd murdered and now haunted her could not directly touch her, but as his strength waxed and waned the wraith was capable of speaking to her and sometimes even throw small objects.

Archer was inexplicably fond of this one, though I supposed Aspasia might be an acquired taste. Indrani herself was lounging on the edge of the sofa, having stolen the last of my bottle along with the nice little snacks the servants had put out during my absence. Admittedly the Wicked Enchanter's corpse had taken up the table where the plate had been waiting, but that was no excuse to just steal the whole thing and begin tearing through them.

"Is it actually the soul you call back?" I asked, genuinely curious.

In theory, necromancy was capable of doing that. In practice necromancers tended to prefer setting up wards to prevent the souls from passing on or even outright binding the soul to the body before killing the individual – as Masego had once done for me, before First Liesse – since calling back a soul gone past the veil of death was tricky at the best of times. The only mages I'd ever heard of regularly doing such a thing were the Twilight Sages of the drow, who were long gone and their knowledge destroyed. The Sisters had seen to that, and thoroughly.

"The priests say it isn't," the Harrowed Witch hedged. "That it's just some spirit called up from the death and the echo of the mind."

Said priests had declared me an abomination in a Salian conclave after I'd tricked a resurrection out of the Hashmallim, so I was inclined to take their assertions with a grain of salt. Though calling back a soul was hardly resurrection the House of Light in the west had always jealously guarded what it saw as the sole domain of the Heavens, and thus theirs. Proceran mages having been squeezed out of the healing trade was proof enough of that.

"And what do you believe?" I asked.

"Even if they're right," she shrugged, "there's not much difference, is there? Whether the spirit's fresh or old, it's still got the same stuffing."

"Praesi believe it's the soul," Archer told me. "And that the imperfect memory is because you can't drag one back without damaging it some, not unless the formula is perfect in a way no one's managed."

Yeah, well, just as the Proceran priesthood had a vested interest in claiming this to be spirit-work it could be said that the Praesi had an interested in claiming the opposite. The Wasteland was fond of claiming its ways would make you as a god, if you were good enough at them. And if someone could master life and death, while it might not make you a God shouldn't it make you at least the lesser kind?

"So long as I get my own questions answered, that one we can leave to the Wasteland and the priests," I said. "Do it, Witch."

"By your will, Black Queen," the villainess bowed.

She knelt by the Wicked Enchanter's corpse and laid hands on his face, peeling open the sightless eyes and prying open his mouth. Two fingers she pressed against the black and swollen tongue, whispering urgently in the mage tongue, and the same again on the ear of the left side and then the right.

"Three black pearls were granted unto me by the spirits of the land, and I bestow upon you their use this hour," the Harrowed Witch said, her Chantant fluid and beautiful and ringing of something that was not Chantant at all. "One that you may hear, and in death obey. One that you may speak, as I bid you now. One that you may know once more, heedful and waking. I know the secrets of the sleeping stones and I have heard the echoes that outlived the word: I am mistress among the lost, and I command you to return."

The last word reverberated with power, with will, and though it was neither aspect nor Speaking it was the culmination of a skilled witch's craft: the weight of it was not to be trifled with. A burst of cold wind passed through the parlour even as the Wicked Enchanter's corpse took a ragged gasp, as if the corpse had somehow sucked in the air, the brown-haired witch laid a hand atop the corpses' brow. The shadows in the well-lit room somehow seemed longer to me, and deeper in their darkness.

"I have him," she said, brow furrowed in concentration. "Ask your questions, and swiftly: he struggles against the call."

I cast a look at Indrani, who seemed only mildly interested by all of this. Not her first time up close to such a thing, I imagined. Well, might as well get this over with.

"Are you the Wicked Enchanter?" I asked.

"I am," the corpse rasped.

He twitched, as if trying to say more but being prevented by the Witch's firm grasp.

"Have you ever spoken with, or been spoken at by, a woman named Marguerite of Baillons?"

"I have not," the corpse rasped.

I frowned. Had the Wandering Bard changed face and name once more? No, perhaps my mistake had been of a different sort.

"Have you ever spoken with, or been spoken at by, the Wandering Bard?" I asked.

"Yes," the corpse rasped.

My veins thrummed with something that was neither fear nor excitement, for though I was not cowed by the notion of tangling with the Intercessor neither was I looked forward to it. I already had too many deadly enemies. And yet I would not deny that I was also relieved. Until that single word, it'd been possible that I was just putting up my own fears on a blank slate. Now I knew my enemy, and the war could begin in earnest.

"What did she tell you?"

"She warned me that I had been noticed," the Wicked Enchanter's shade told us. "And that my joys in the wilds would come to an end."

As I recalled, the dead villain had been the one to seek out the Grand Alliance and not the other way around, though there'd been some rumours of his existence in the far south.

"And this convinced you to seek out the Truce and Terms?" I pressed.

"Eventually. I brought my court to another three villages first."

So there it was, I mused. There was a story, back home, about one of the petty kings that'd ruled in Callow before the Albans united the realm. An old man, said in some tales to have ruled over Liesse and others in Dormer, but all agreed he'd been as harsh a tyrant as they come. But his knights had stayed loyal, and kept him from knives in the back, and for subtler threats he had bargained with a wizard. For great favours he'd won an enchanted amulet that would glow when in the presence of poisons, and so for many years the tyrant had ruled safely in his castle. Until one day a clever cook, whose kin had been killed on the tyrant's whim, arranged for a particular plate to be served: grilled mushrooms, the savoury kind growing in stone shadows known as the 'False Wings'.

The tyrant ate, for the amulet had not glowed, and then drank of his favourite mead as he every meal. The mushrooms, the False Wings, were not a poison. Neither was the mead. Yet mixed together, as they were in the tyrant's belly, they became a deadly mixture. The story went that the tyrant did not die of the poison, actually, but went so mad from the pain eating his insides he'd thrown himself off the highest tower of his keep.

The Wicked Enchanter was not, by himself, poison for the Truce and Terms. Scum, there was no denying that, but even scum was worth marshalling when the King of Death was on the march. The Truce being extended to the likes of him was the price of being able to pull in villains not quite so vile, who otherwise might wonder exactly where the line was drawn and elicit to instead remain in hiding – or, worse, make troubles at our back. And it's necessary for what is to come, I thought. The Liesse Accords must apply to everyone, even the worst of us, and if their predecessor-treaty had been used as a way to execute villains many of Below's would see them as a tool of heroic control and nothing more. Yet the Wicked Enchanter would have been tolerated, if he lent his Name and skills to the war against Keter.

He only became poison when the Red Axe was added to the meal: a heroine born of his very depredations, fated by her Role to slay him. And when she'd fulfilled that role, well... There would be time to consider the full breadth of that blow later, I told myself. First there was one last piece of information that I must extract from the dead. While it was possible the Bard would have relied on mere chance to have the two fated foes encounter each other, and chance did tend towards a certain theatrical certainty when it came to Named, the way the killing had been described to me smacked of it being arranged. It'd taken place in the Knot, the central halls of the Arsenal, when they were filled with people and other Named were not too far – yet not so close that they might be able to intervene.

The Intercessor had boots on the ground, like as not, and I wanted to know who was filling them.

"When you encountered the Red Axe," I said, "where were you headed?"

"To the Repository."

My brow rose.

"Why?" I asked him.

"A supply convoy had come the day before," the corpse rasped. "The red orchid I paid for would be stashed in the usual crate."

"I can't hold much longer," the Harrowed Witch hoarsely said.

I nodded in acknowledgement. Smuggling, huh. I supposed I shouldn't be surprised: this place might be a wonder, but in the end people were people. I'd see to it this leak was plugged and whoever was involved got the noose, but what had been mentioned was not familiar to me. Red orchid, was it? I cast a curious look at Archer, whose own brow rose.

"Drug," she told me. "Hard stuff, expensive and from the Free Cities. Hard to kick when the hooks are in, too."

Probably illegal in Procer, I mused. An addiction – particularly one to a substance even Indrani seemed wary of – was an obvious lever for the Bard to use, I thought, but there would have been need for another Named to arrange the practical aspects of it. Possible well in advance, I thought, which was a disquieting notion.

"How did you hear about smuggler?" I asked the corpse.

"I was told by the Concocter," the shade of the Wicked Enchanter rasped.

And there went the last detail I'd needed to know.

"Thank you for your service," I told the dead thing. "You will receive your dues under the Terms, even from the grave."

And not an inch more, I thought. I gestured at the brown-haired witch, signifying I was done.

"Kill the girl," the corpse hissed. "Killkillkillkill-"

"I release you," the Harrowed Witch gasped. "Begone."

Wind blew out violently, rustling my cloak and pushing back strands of my hair, but in its wake the room seemed settled. There'd been a weight in the air, a tension, that had now been released. Sweat beaded the villainess brow, and she was panting like she'd just fought for her life.

"What a charmer, that one," I nonchalantly said. "But at least he was talkative, thanks to you. You've done me a good turn, Harrowed Witch."

"I know to keep my mouth shut, Your Majesty," she weakly replied. "There is no need to present the stick now that you've dangled the carrot."

"Archer's already vouched for you," I said, "else I would not have asked you at all."

Aspasie shot Indrani a surprised look. I sympathized with her there, as Archer's actual affections tended to be rather opaque. I tended to blame that on the Lady of the Lake, but honesty compelled me to admit it might have been in part natural inclination as well. Indrani replied with a smile, or at least tried to: she'd stuffed the last snack whole in her mouth, so her bulging cheeks rather undid the intended effect until she swallowed.

"I meant what I said," I told the witch. "Consider how you'd like the favour repaid and return to me when you are certain."

"You're powerful enough to simply compel my service," Aspasia said, sounding genuinely bewildered. "Why make this offer when you have nothing to gain?"

Because if you never reward siding with you, the only rewards to be won are in siding against you, I thought.

"Forced service is always mediocre," I said. "And I've no patience for such things. I'll use you, I won't deny that or pretend we are equals, but you will also gain from the use."

The Harrowed Witch slowly nodded, looking abashed, and hesitantly rose to her feet.

"I will keep your words in mind, Your Majesty," she said. "And return to you with an answer."

Archer from the side, finished licking up the last of the mousse on her fingers and snatched up my bottle of aragh. She tossed it at the brown-eyed witch, though she was too slow and only caught it after it'd hit her sternum and dropped into her outstretched hands.

"Archer," she complained.

"I know how your head gets after a restless calling," Indrani said, almost gentle. "Drink up, or you'll have a pounding headache by the time you get to your rooms."

"I'll still have one if I drink this," the Harrowed Witch said, "I'll simply be drunk as well."

"It'll take the edge off, at least," Archer snorted. "You still got your fancy herbs?"

"Julien scattered them," she mourned.

Her brother, I took it. The realization seemingly drove the decision to pull at the bottle, though she choked on the Praesi hard liquor and had to force herself to gulp it down.

"What is this, the Dead King's piss?" the Witch moaned, then had a moment of panic when she looked at me. "Um, I mean, Your Majesty--"

"Taghreb delicacy," I told her amusedly. "Consider yourself lucky you never tried dragon's milk."

"I might have something for your head," Indrani mused, "I'll pass by your rooms later."

"If you're just bringing a hammer again, that ceased being even slightly funny after the third time," the brown-haired woman complained.

I smothered my chuckle with all the practice of a woman well-acquainted with Indrani. It was a dismissal, even if one delivered by Archer instead of myself, and the villainess treated it like one. She made her courtesies and departed swiftly, my bottle still in hand. I blew out a long breath after Archer closed the door behind her.

"The Concocter, huh," I said.

"She'd a shady, haughty prig," Indrani said, "always has been, but I don't think she's your traitor Cat. Hells, what would the Bard have to even offer her? She doesn't care about politics, only that she can keep making her potions."

I wasn't inclined to romanticize the Concocter having joined us without prompting, myself. Much like the Beastmaster she'd only come to us because Refuge had collapsed after Ranger's disappearance, though her concerns had been more direct than Beastmaster's: without a pack of Named to trade with, the Waning Woods had lost much of their appeal for her. It wasn't like she was going to be hunting for manticore hearts or elderwood snake fangs herself. The Arsenal had been what she was after, the funding and books and safety of it, and she'd certainly thrived there. She'd gone from trading healing poultices in the woods to being able to order her pick of ingredients from Mercantis through Proceran envoys, and she'd been judged useful enough to be made the informal lead of one of the secret projects: Sudden Abjuration might also be under Roland, who was higher in the pecking order of the Arsenal, but it was ultimately an alchemical pursuit and so her word carried more weight than his.

"She's involved with the smuggling, at least," I replied. "And she brought in the Enchanter. I'm not saying she's an ardent partisan of the Bard, but do you really think she's above cutting a deal?"

The Intercessor had been studying human nature since the days where Calernia used bronze. She was a very, very skilled temptress when she put her mind to it.

"Dunno," Indrani reluctantly admitted. "The Lady was always keen on reminding us that fucking around with your betters was a sure way to get burned, and we all learned that lesson some, but the Concocter was always clever. She got ahead just by trading, and she used what she had to get away with a lot. It's always been her, then everybody else. I don't think even Lady Ranger knew her real name."

"I have questions for her," I said. "How nicely they'll be asked, that depends on her."

Indrani put up her hands in appeasement.

"Don't misunderstand, Cat," she said. "We shared a camp years ago, that's all there is to it. If you want to cut off a few fingers to set the mood, I'm not protesting. I'm just saying that the Arsenal is a wet dream come true for her, so she'd be careful about not mucking it up too much."

I grunted in acknowledgement. To my understanding having shared the tutelage of the Ranger wasn't really the kind of shared history that bound people together closely, save perhaps in shared mingled fear and admiration of the woman, but I still knew precious little about Indrani's years there. She was rather tight-lipped about it, save for a few well-worn amusing stories she was always ready to dust off around a campfire when the drinks got flowing.

"Would she say more if you went knocking alone?" I asked.

"Would she be less wary if the wasn't the fucking Black Queen popping up unannounced?" Indrani said, sounding amused. "Who knows? It might just be one of those unsolvable mysteries of life."

I sighed.

"Fine," I said. "Go ahead, see what you can get out of her. But 'Drani, I need those answers. If you don't think you can-"

"I can," Archer assured me.

I searched her face for a moment, to see if it was stung pride talking, but she seemed certain.

"I'll get harsh if I have to," Indrani continued when I did not answer. "Cat, you can trust me with this."

But this was important, I almost said. This was the Bard, and I could not take risks, and... You were warned by Adjutant that you could only take so much on your shoulders without running yourself ragged, Akua's voice echoed, over the broken corpse of a boy and the bitter taste of failure. You did not heed his words. I couldn't handle this alone, guiding every moving part. Hells, having trusted allies might genuinely be the single absolute advantage I held over the Intercessor. And still it felt like a mistake to let Archer go alone, because what if she made a mistake? There was trusting someone, and then there was trusting them to win. I clenched my fists. This is fear, I thought. This fear speaking through my lips, a worm slipped into my mind through my ear. And once fear rules, she is the mother of defeat.

"Go," I said. "And ask about the gas in the Miscellaneous Stacks as well. There are others here who could make those, but she would be the best hand for the work."

"I'll get it out of her," Archer promised. "I know that look, though. Where are you headed?"

"A pretty blonde invited me for a drink," I told her. "Figured now as good a time as any."

"You're pulling my leg, you wench," she grinned.

"I speak no lie," I grinned back. "If I'm not here, then look for me in the rooms of the Prince of Brus."

Now, I'd never actually paid all that much attention to the arcane rules governing Proceran wine drinking so I had to wonder: which was it that went with asking a stranger to commit what was technically a spot of treason, a red or a white?

"And you say this liquor is called aragh?" Prince Frederic Goethal said, sounding delighted.

I made a mental note to order a raise for the Callowan quartermaster here who'd ensured there would be a decent reserve of Legions and Army liquors. The Taghreb drink was actually a favourite among even my countrymen these days, the taste for it having spread from the former Legions officers to the men and women they'd trained.

"Indeed," I replied. "I developed a taste for it when I trained at the War College. It was quite popular amongst the cadets there."

The Prince of Brus was no longer in armour, having instead traded it for a riot of silk in red and blue whose shape and cut somehow evoked wings splayed across the Proceran warrior-prince's chest. I availed myself of what was being displayed, namely some very nicely muscles on an otherwise slender body. The accompanying silken trousers were tight enough they made clear the calves under them were iron-hard, which they were very clearly meant to. Prince Frederic had been quite surprised by my unannounced visit but proved to be an amicable host, leading us to the little salon attached to his rooms and dismissing the servants so that we might speak alone.

"Ah, the famous War College," the blond mused. "I have heard many tales of it, most of them I suspect of being splendid lies."

He popped open the bottle and laid down the cork on the table between us – once again a low one between two sofas, the Proceran basics had very clearly been used as a standard for decoration across the Arsenal – before offering me a smile.

"Unless, Your Majesty, it is true that you once defeated an army with an exploding goat?"

I coughed.

"It was only a company, and the goats were part of a greater strategy," I confessed.

"Dear Gods," Frederic Goethal mused, "if I return home with word that Special Tribune Robber is not a complete and utter liar, the Morgentor itself might well fall over from the shock."

That little shit, I thought, not entirely angrily. A quarter of the continent away, and still he was finding ways to be a pain in my ass.

"Tell me he's not doing plays anymore, at least," I asked.

"Their all-goblin rendition of 'The Election of Blessed Clothor' saw several of my courtiers weep openly," the Prince of Brus cheerfully denied.

I noted he did not specify whether the weeping was at the beauty of it or the sheer horror. Truly, the man was a skilled diplomat. I gestured to offer to pour from the bottle and he conceded, rising instead to fetch the very crystal glasses with gold rims. Gods, I hoped those were his and not the Arsenal's. If my kingdom's taxes had ended up pitching for gold-rimmed glasses, someone on my side had been botching their job. I poured him a generous measure, and a smaller one for myself – I'd already had a few, after all. Besides, from what I recalled Proceran court etiquette dictated that women should drink daintier cups of strong spirits. Larger cups of wine, though, strangely enough. Something about men having stronger stomachs but women better palates.

"Prince Frederic," I began.

"Frederic," he insisted. "I've told you before, Your Majesty."

"Catherine, then," I replied.

It was a false closeness, this, but not one that was particularly unpleasant to me. I suspected that if I got to know this man, I might actually grow to like him.

"It would be my pleasure," the Prince of Brus smiled, perfect white teeth and stunning eyes taking me aback. "Might I offer a toast, Catherine? To the Grand Alliance!"

He raised his cup.

"To old enemies, and new friends," I replied, touching his glass with mine.

We both drank, and I noted with approval that he did not choke and his eyes did not water. It was always pleasing when a man knew how to hold his liquor. Our glasses touched the table, and the Prince of Brus leaned back.

"I believe," he said, "that I might have interrupted you. I offer apology, and willing ear."

I mulled over that a moment, choosing how the subject was to be broached,

"Are you fond of stories, Frederic?" I asked.

"A complicated question," the Prince of Brus said. "As a boy I would have mocked it, but I have learned better in the years that followed. It would be a lie to speak of like or dislike, perhaps. In the end I take stories to be much like the finest of paintings: a thousand men and women can look at the same and find different sight, yet none of them are entirely right or wrong."

"Ah," I mused, "but there lies the power of it all: for a thousand men and women, there was something there to be found."

"I have known the right truth to give a man wings, Catherine," Frederic Goethal quietly said. "I do not deny the power of stories."

"That is comforting to hear," I said. "Now, if I spoke of intercession to you, would the word mean anything?"

The Grand Alliance was aware of the Wandering Bard, the enigmatic Named that had not joined the Truce and Terms and could not be trusted – I would have had her known as a foe outright, but the Grey Pilgrim had been bitterly opposed. Knowledge of the Intercessor, though, was more sparse. I had shared much of what I knew with Cordelia Hasenbach, and in turn she had shared the insights of the Augur, but I did not know how broadly she had spread that knowledge. Considering Frederic Goethal was both a prince of Procer and Named, though, he struck me as likelier to be warned than most.

"It would," the man murmured. "Agnes Hasenbach is a woman of deep and painful wisdom, whose word I will not gainsay."

"Knowing both these things," I said, "do you understand how a ruler who is Named might sometimes act according to rules that are not the rules of Creation's shallows?"

I'd asked Vivienne about Prince Frederic Goethal, about his reputation in Procer, before he became Named. He'd garnered some interest from me since he was the only southern royal to have marched his armies north instead of south. The report had mentioned some things that were well-known, like the fact that he was wildly popular among Lycaonese as well as northwestern Alamans and apparently considered to be among the finest warriors and generals in Procer, as well as more discreet truths. He was considered to be one of Cordelia's fiercest loyalists and had once proposed to her, but within the Highest Assembly and Proceran royalty at large he was considered rather indifferent to politics. He'd survived this long dealing with cutthroat princes though, I thought, so he wouldn't be slow on the uptake. In the highest reaches of Procer, even standing still required a great deal of cunning.

"The kind of action," Prince Frederic slowly said, "that an unenlightened observer might consider... harmful to one's position, I imagine. Yet most sensible according to a different set of rules."

Gods, but I did enjoy dealing with intelligent allies. It was always a treat not to have to drag people to the right conclusion kicking and screaming.

"I would not want a request for such an action," I said, "to be taken as having another, baser purpose."

"I am not blind to the corpses you have left behind you, Queen Catherine," the Prince of Brus softly said, "or to fell deeds done by your hands. But I also remember the stench on the fields of Aisne, and that men had never needed Below or Tower to make butchery of themselves. I also know that if it is the destruction of Procer that you sought, the most required of you was not to do a thing at all. We are allies, Catherine Foundling. If you need my help, I will do what I can."

I looked at him steadily and tried not to let out that I was actually rather impressed with the man. After a moment I cleared my throat.

"I'll be direct, then," I said. "I need you to break out the Red Axe from where she is currently being held, then protect her from what is coming."

"And what is it that is coming?" the Kingfisher Prince asked, eyes gone hard as steel.

"I cannot yet name it," I said, "but I know this: were stand atop a mound of sharpeners, and the death of the Red Axe is how the match is struck."

Frivolous

Really good update. Nice and enlightening depictions for the first time of the Harrowed Witch, Aspasia, and again of Frederic, the Kingfisher Prince, who really does seem to be a jolly good fellow. Cat would be difficult to fool at this point, her judgment is pretty good.

Also I like that Cat has (I believe correctly) deduced that killing the Red Axe is the aim of the Intercessor.

Javvies

No, killing the Red Axe isn't Bard's goal. But likely just means to the end goal of destroying the Truce and Terms, any hope of establishing the Accords, and most likely killing Cat.

Frivolous

Sorry, I thought it went without saying that the Red Axe is not the ultimate goal of the Intercessor, just a way station on the way to the doom of Cat's hopes and the Age of Order.

Let me clarify, then: I think the Intercessor's ultimate goal is to avoid having to learn to navigate an entirely different set of stories than the one she has spent millennia learning, the set of stories typical of the Age of Wonders.

Cat's Age of Order (so named by Amadeus) would be very different in terms of the stories it would favor and the ones it would disallow, and the Intercessor would fear and hate that. She'd be rendered at least a little bit irrelevant, because her instincts would be all wrong. Like re-learning to run when the rules of physics you've known all your life have changed.

Liliet

Yeah, I'm still onboard the 'she's helping, honest' train 😊

TeK

What if WB was the good guy all along?

Shikkarasu

Just because you are Good Guy, doesn't mean you are good guy.

Liliet

That's basically what I'm going with :3

NerfContessa

Yeah, she's only been halping for 3 millennia, obviously....

And the prince continues to be my favored hero and proceran.

Sakul_A

I would even go farther.

The Intercessor role is to keep the balance of power within the Age of wonder.

The moment the age of order truly manifests this role will be lost and this would mark the end of the purpose of the Intercessor.

Cat is in the process of becoming named again and we learned that there is some connection of succession at play.

It might be possible that under the accords a new name will be born to keep the balance and that Cat might replace the Intercessor.

So to allow Cat to become Named again she first has to win against the Intercessor. With this the Age of Order wins over the Age of Wonder.

Javvies

In this vein, Cat may be being lined up for a mantle of power along the lines of "Arbitrator" instead of "Intercessor".

The Intercessor maintained the status quo of the Age of Wonders, while the Arbitrator will establish and enforce the Age of Order.

Although, as a successor to the Intercessor, the Arbitrator might not be a normal Name as we understand it.

erebus42

Frederic seems like an intelligent and reasonable sort which is quite refreshing. His presence is a bit perplexing though. It seems like the work of providence but it would appear to work against WB's plan. That would seem to imply that two opposing stories were being pushed or at least that an out was provided. But by whom? I was under the impression that while she could nudge things along and broker deals on behalf of the Gods, WB was incapable of working at cross purposes with them. Maybe Frederic is really a hidden ace in the hole for WB. Maybe WB made a miscalculation. Maybe the Gods are just stirring the pot on a whim. I'm sure all will eventually be revealed in appropriately dramatic fashion.

Javvies

I'm pretty sure that Frederic is here because Augur sent him here, most likely with the intent of stopping Bard's plots and helping Cat protect the Truce and Terms.

Liliet

Consider: what if Bard's goal is in fact to set Cat up to handle the sharper before it explodes in a worse way without her around?

Like... come on. The nemesis problem was going to come up INEVITABLY. Bard's not arranging something that WOULD NEVER HAPPEN WITHOUT HER MEDDLING, here.

Shveiran

This pretty much boils down to the old argument of Bard actually being on Cat side. A different take on Tariq's own speech back in book 5: "the Bard put you to the test, but because you survived that's proof she thinks you are a good person and thus is on our side".

Likewise, the argument here is (simplifying, obviously) that since WB is the mistress of schemes and plots and narrative and Cat has been sailing those winds to victory time and again, doesn't it make more sense that she is doing with Bard's help behind the curtains rather than against her will?

And I mean... it's not like it is a flawed argument. I don't find it persuasive, but it's not like there are objectively wrong things in that reasoning. Basically, we know so very little about the Bard for certain, that most theories can make sense if you take a little time explaining all her known actions in the novel so far.

I'd argue this from a meta point of view, though: would that twist be satisfying?

Because... honestly... I don't see how it could ever be.

Bard's fingerprints have been all over the story ever since book 3: if it turns out Bard is working against Cat, winning is Cat's triumph; if Bard is working with Catherine unbeknownst to her, this becomes Bard's triumph through Cat. We know she has been dueling the DK as an equal, if she is on the Alliance's side... it's not Catherine's victory anymore.

It's the Bard either finding a good horse or outright breeding one to finally win.

Maybe, if there were more books coming, I could see your twist working. But now? Even if Bard was to bit it in this narrative arc, that still steals the thunder from everything Cat has achieved so far, and leaves us so very little time for her to step up to the challenge and have a satisfying conclusion.

I'm sorry, I just don't see it working from a narrative perspective. It would be so very unsatisfying.

Liliet

We'll just have to see, because I find the narrative of "Bard cannot actually do shit without someone doing all the actual work of their own will" pretty compelling in potentia.

mamm0nn

I don't think providence has been shown to be that absolute, with foresight and complexity. William couldn't be beaten by normal foes and was likely even more protected against Black, back when Cat was destined to be killed by him, but with Tyrants swan song Providence kinda just gathered a lot of Named in one place from which most were not used at all.

Providence can influence but not completely control, lest you let it. Frederic might be just one of those Named gathered here just to have another playing piece nearby if needed, simply attracted to the weight of events same as Tyrants swan song. Or his intended Role might have just been interrupting a premature fight between Cat and MK, without providence assuring he would leave immediately after.

Mental Mouse

Frederic seems to have been sent by the Oracle, who is a known ally against Bard's manipulations. I think he's meant to be a spoiler for the fight plot – a charismatic, smart hero who even the Mirror Knight will back down for, and who Cat can recruit for “solving the mystery” and the associated parlor scene.

WealthyAardvark

In all likelihood he’s here for the all-staff meeting. Everyone is coming, and those who can’t are being scried with the Mirage. Archer and Catherine were merely the first to arrive.

...It occurs to me that we saw the Repentant Magister and Blessed Artificer mucking about in the depths of the Mirage during the Terms interlude (supposedly having something to do with Cat and Night), but Masego left without doing the inspection he intended to do. I’m suddenly worried that if Cat enters the Mirage there could be disastrous consequences.

Agent J

I’ve been eyeing that gun on Chekhov’s wall for some time now. That the Artificer blinded Masego when he came is highly suspicious for a slew of reasons.

Mammon

We were already told that because of that action the Artificer is filing a compliant, Cat essentially has a free pass to talk to her now (one on one if need be) and be accusing towards the Artificer’s whole schtick with legitimate cause of items, her attacking her superior unprovoked, etc., without this being illogical or mere Good vs Evil, though quite likely this could be a Bard scheme same as luring Cat into the library just before it getting gassed.

WealthyAardvark

Ah, it’s beyond likelihood. I just glanced at the Terms interlude and found this line.

“Twilight’s Pass sent the Kingfisher Prince to speak in its name, but neither Princes Rozala nor the Iron Prince will be able to make the journey.

So he does have a legitimate reason to be here. While it’s still possible he is here as part of a scheme, I see no reason to suspect him of anything at the moment.

Shveiran

Uh, good catch. I’d missed that. Than providence factors in just the timing – which, you know, is a hero’s due.

Taylor

The last line is almost poetry, I love it

Nuke_The_Earth

It is so fucking refreshing to meet a guy on the other side who knows when to shut his mouth and Get Shit Done.

Anomandris

Might still be a trap....

JJR

I wonder if we're about to see some symmetry breaking in the Above Below dichotomy. Until recently there was only the good/evil axis. Perhaps going forward we get to see a law/chaos axis form.

Anomandris

Somehow, Robber putting on plays didn't surprise me at all.

Beware the Goats!!

mamm0nn

Why are you using dog actors for the goats when you have goats you're using as horses? What strange goblin theatrics, such exotic culture.

Halinn

The subtleties and intricacies of a goblin play are truly enough to make a grown man cry

Javvies

Fucking Bard.

And, I think that is likely confirmation (or as close as we're likely to get) that Frederic was probably sent by Augur to spike Bard's plots and assist Cat in the maintaining of the Truce and Terms.

Fucking Bard.

ravedthrad

Based on all that's happened, here, I think it would be interesting if it turns out that it's the Red Axe who will go on to kill the Wandering Bard.

Mental Mouse

It would be ironic, but I'm afraid that's the only thing it has going for it. By either our sotry or (inferred) status in the Guideverse, Red Axe is a bit character who popped out of nowhere to kill another bit character. Which is fine for setting up a trap for Cat, but not remotely in the league for "finally kills off the Eternal Kibitzer after 10,000 years".

flashburn283

That would be the one thing she didn't see coming, what kind of story is it where a no lines bit part suddenly cuts the knot?

It's not a story at all, it is plain old reality coming in and doing what it wants, and the Intercessor has no defense against that.

Mental Mouse

Just so – it's our world's reality, not the Story-bound metacausality of the Guideverse. Probably not an option for Cat, or the Bard either.

RoflCat

Physical death doesn't stop Bard, she'll simply get a new identity each time.

As much as Severance/Severity has been sitting there like a Chekhov's Gun for a while now, unless Cath's punishment for Red Axe is to be a test subject for 'how to wield the sword made of angry grandma' I doubt Red Axe will get to use it.

Also it'd require Cath (or more likely, Frederick here) to somehow convince Red Axe that her being Bard-led into killing her tormentor was a 'bad' thing and that she should take revenge for it.

Isaac Martinez

"Forced service is always mediocre," I said. "And I've no patience for such things. I'll use you, I won't deny that or pretend we are equals, but you will also gain from the use."

Do you think that this form of thinking was what gave form to the not-undead when she was the Ice Queen?

mamm0nn

The not-undead were likely fey spirits. Not quite fey with a body and Name, more alike the commoners of their realm. It was a fey thing, not a Cat thing.

Okay, so... seriously, Cat? You did not see this coming?

The poison metaphor is great, but two nemeses being both brought in on the agreement is not exactly an unlikely combination? Like, the king wouldn't have ever eaten those two things together if the cook hadn't set it up, but THIS WAS GOING TO HAPPEN INEVITABLY AT SOME POINT. Bard accelerated the timetable and likely determined the precise time and place of the explosion, but – CAT. WOULD. HAVE. NEEDED. TO. DEAL. WITH. THIS. EITHER. WAY

JEEZ CATHERINE

anyway yeah I love how Frederic is awesome and I love how he understands that Catherine is an ally ♥ of course he of all people would ♥ (also Cat still kind of sucks at subtle, but that might just be me) luv this next step of hers, too :3

hakureireimu

It became a problem only because it happened in the Arsenal with too many witnesses. Otherwise if the Wicked Enchanter is killed out in the boonies they can just cover it up, assuming they even find out in the first place.

Liliet

“Covering it up” is not a long-term solution to a systemic problem. “So what happens if I run into the person I swore to kill” is a legitimate question for heroes to ask upon joining, and “so what happens if I run into the person who swore to kill me” is a legitimate question for villains.

John

Truce and Terms are meant as a temporary measure, only needing to last until the Dead King has been dealt with and a de facto unified Calernian government is established. There is no time or money for eternal perfection during an all-out war, and so the adequate fix would normally be to compile a roster of who’s feuding with who, then simply assign them duties within the larger military machine such that they need never interact with each other.

The longer-term system is likely to tolerate personal vendettas – or at least consider them a local, rather than strategic, concern – so long as they end with a nice tidy duel and maybe some weregild, rather than burning cities or otherwise needlessly endangering innocent bystanders.

Javvies

More specifically, the Truce and Terms are really only supposed to last for the duration of the war plus a finite period of time to negotiate a post war order, which will include the Accords.

And under the Accords, Heroes and Villains can and will be able to go after each other, with some limitations on what they can do and to what extent they can pull non-Named people into disputes between Named.

That is, the Truce and Terms are intended to keep everyone focused on the Dead King, without needing to worry about getting stabbed in the back by their supposed allies. The Truce and Terms aren’t supposed to stop all Named conflicts. They’re just supposed to put them on hold while dealing with the far greater mutual and existential threat that is the Dead King, plus some extra time to allow for negotiations to take place about post war international structures and rules governing post war Named conflict. Plus a degree of trust building measures so that those post war negotiations and the Accords are more viable.

As a real world analogy, think World War 2 China – the communists and the nationalists mostly stopped fighting each other when the Japanese invaded. They focused their efforts on fighting Japan, until Japan had been defeated, and then postwar negotiations between the communists and nationalists collapsed and the civil war restarted. The Truce and Terms are a formalization of a similar truce and de facto alliance against a greater mutual threat, here in the form of the Dead King, and hopefully lay stronger foundations for additional and more successful post war negotiations and agreements.

The long term, hopefully permanent, Accords cannot, will not, and were never supposed to prohibit all Named conflicts, just put restrictions on them to minimize collateral damage.

Oh, I'll grant that if/when Cardinal is established, there'll probably be strictly enforced rules about Named conflict within its bounds, above and beyond those that apply elsewhere, but there'll also be a dispute resolution mechanism for those covered by those extra restrictions.

And, sure, maybe the Accords will include clauses that allow for reactivation of a temporary prohibition on Calernian Named conflict in the event of a major threat to Calernia as a whole.

But again, that kind of prohibition on Named conflict is always going to be of finite (if not necessarily always pre-, or easily, determined) duration and everybody knows, or should know, that to be the case.

Mental Mouse

> The long term, hopefully permanent, Accords cannot, will not, and were never supposed to prohibit all Named conflicts, just put restrictions on them to minimize collateral damage.

> Oh, I'll grant that if/when Cardinal is established, there'll probably be strictly enforced rules about Named conflict within its bounds, above and beyond those that apply elsewhere, but there'll also be a dispute resolution mechanism for those covered by those extra restrictions.

The other thing that the Accords will provide is a method and structure for judging cases and deciding who gets to deal with violations.

E.g., Some lord comes by saying: "The Prasi lord that attacked my land threatened that if I didn't pay them protection, they'd summon a demon against me..." Somebody needs to check the credibility and truth of the allegation, if upheld then they decide who gets to go and take out the demon-summoner.

Essentially they're trying to upgrade things from individual vendettas, to at least the level of vigilance committees.

Liliet

> compile a roster of who's feuding with who, then simply assign them duties within the larger military machine such that they need never interact with each other.

and is it Intercessor's fault that they did not do that?

Mental Mouse

That's not just professional, but expert, personnel management – in context, Name-level.
Not so easy, nor consistently available.

Shveiran

Plus, Red Axe is a newcomer and information sharing is still limited with regards to wandering murderous vagrants- I MEAN Bands of Five. Indrani knew about the Wicked Enchanter – Red Axe issue, but she didn't know that WE would be at the Arsenal.

This is not a flawed system (or rather, it isn't a system with a big flaw someone should have seen coming), it's just a system that has several mobile parts required to deal with the DK and the war, that even when willing to have logistical difficulties talking to each other. Things slip through the crack.

With that said, the system is just meant to make it easier to put grudges aside.
When the system fails, it's not like you are forced to act on it: it is still a choice.

So we are back to the fact that at the end of the day the Red Axe dropped the ball. I can sympathize with her conundrum, but the moment where she drew her weapon was the one she decided that killing that SOB was more important than the Truce that's keeping the continent afloat.

And I don't know about Heroes, but that is not what a hero does.

Liliet

We still don't know how the confrontation actually went. I don't DISAGREE with you per se, just that there's several moving parts in it that might impact the overall estimation of Red Axe's actions.

Mental Mouse

I'm with hakureireimu: Something of the sort was inevitable, but having it happen just as Cat arrives, with a full party of heroes warned in advance and showing up on cue... that's pure Story.

Shveiran

Yes. Simply imagine it happening in a way that allows Hanno and Cat to discuss the matter and taking action together. It would still be a thorny issue, but far less dangerous.

Liliet

Yeah, now imagine it happening when neither Hanno nor Catherine are there. Which, given that this is Cat's first visit to the Arsenal in two years...

Mental Mouse

If it comes in as a report, that goes right to the Hanno & Cat showmeeting. Routine if regrettable business, optionally with mystery sideplot, but our buddies are ready for it.

Way different from "Hello—" "Shh! There's been a murder. Come around the back way." "HALT MISCREANTS!" "Who are you calling miscreants, barging in here like that?" "Ahem. What's all this then?" 😊

Liliet

We'll see how much of a powderkeg this place is.

Liliet

Just... I am not sure this would actually go better as a report to Cat&Hanno. Going to be like 'so a hero killed a villain and then everyone else killed each other and the place burned down despite being made of stone. sorry'

Mental Mouse

The point is, that wouldn't be a story in itself, it would basically be "sling and arrows of outrageous fate", sent to divert Cat's attention from the main fight, or at least open a new front (and we're late in the game for that).

But this is in fact her story, so instead, it kicks off just when she shows up, for her to deal with in realtime, not just investigate in retrospect.

Shveiran

I'm with Mental Mouse. This happening here and now has momentum, a gang of fanatical heroes serendipitously appearing on the scene "to prevent a murder that has just been even considered", the presence of the creator of the T&T, secret investigations over Fantasy-Manhattan project, and an incoming gathering of the bigwigs.

Without all this?

What gets to C&H table is not the report of a mass murder that destroyed the Arsenal, but rather a breach of Terms with a body on the floor.

That ends with a "You broke the Terms and killed an ally; is there something we can do to make you more comfortable before executing you?" talk, and even the fanatical heroes are stuck arguing with the Blade of Judgment over what is right rather than accusing the former Archeretic of the East.

Really not quite the same.

Liliet

Remember how Vagrant Spear had to be pulled off Hunted Magician?

Auston Varner

It seems less like she didn't see the nemesis thing coming at all, and more that she didn't predict the extremes of it. Another aspect of the story: if the mushrooms and mead had been mixed before the king ate them, it wouldn't have been a problem, because the goblet would have lit up to indicate the poison. Similarly, most of the time, nemeses could have been kept apart or convinced not to kill each other until the fight with the Dead King is over, but having such utter scum as the Wicked Enchanter run into a heroine who witnessed and may have been personally victimized by him, with no preparation, in an area full of named where the conflicts would be less expected to turn violent (after all, combat named like the Red Axe, who would usually be the type to swear vengeance, would generally be expected to show up at the war camps, not the Arsenal) is an unexpected problem. I can legitimately see the idea of nemeses itself coming up as a "we'll cross that bridge when we come to it" problem for the Terms, only to arrive at the bridge and see that it's already on fire with a pack of monsters on the other side and more coming up behind you.

Liliet

Yes, surely without Bard's intervention the best case scenario would have happened ;|

Auston Varner

Fair point, though I would argue that while Bard's involvement isn't necessary to make a mess of this, it most likely would have been much less of a mess without WB. The thing I personally find most unbelievable about this scenario isn't that the Terms as written didn't include a measure for this particular situation, but rather that this hasn't come up in the whole, what, two or three years thus far since the agreement was signed. Like, getting longstanding enemies with a variety of viewpoints and cultures working together is always going to be difficult, and I could easily see this being something that came up at the negotiating table only to have a pin put in it due to disagreements over how it should be handled threatening to derail the talks; "we'll work something out for this when it's not getting in the way of working everything else out," or something along those lines. After all, even without the difficulties mentioned above, they were on a deadline for the fight with the Dead King resuming. But nemeses never killing or trying to kill each other this whole time seems very far-fetched to me. That might just be that EE didn't think about it (they tend to catch most important details, but nobody's perfect), but I can also see it being meant to imply that they had some sort of workaround that kept problems to a minimum until now. Or, alternatively, the Truce and Terms might actually be a very bare-bones agreement with provisions for frequent amendments; that would actually fit well with their role as a prototype for the final Accords, as a good way to prototype is to start as simple as possible, then figure out solutions to problems as they come up, and once the rate of new problems has slowed you go back, refine everything, and integrate the various solutions with each other so the final product isn't a cobbled-together mess. I don't think that's actually what's going on here, because I've gotten the impression that the Truce and the Terms are pretty in-depth, but I couldn't make a citation to back that impression up, so it could be an option. Or you could be right and Cat actually just didn't think about it. Wouldn't match well with how thorough she was being about the Accords, but everyone has dumb moments

Liliet

I honestly get the impression it's bare bones yeah.

And honestly the fact nothing blew up until Cat went to the Arsenal for some downtime is part of what is suggesting to me that Bard is helping, here. As in, is actually being helpful from the sidelines.

Auston Varner

That does make a lot of sense. I mean, the Bard has been fighting DK longer than anyone, and if I'm remembering correctly, he got something he could use against her when he was controlling Masego, so this could be her attempt to rebalance the scales.

ninegardens

And then we found out WB had spent the last two years preventing this pot from boiling over, and finally got sick of it and was like "Fine, we'll boil it over when Cat is there to clean up the bloody mess.... now who deserves an execution this week?"

Liliet

That was likely his knowledge of the angel weapon plan.

Halinn

> also Cat still kind of sucks at subtle, but that might just be me

What are you talking about? She's amazing at taking subtle and smashing it to bits

Burlyraven

It really does feel like Frederic is here as an outsider to the current story, but not necessarily in a forced way. My best guess is that he was sent by someone like Augur to be a disruptive influence. He's cunning and informed enough that he could possibly have seen around a story even Cat might have missed, heroic and noble enough to have beneficial if sometimes unpredictable reactions to events, and even handsome enough to play passive spoiler to any honey pots the Bard might set (like the Repentant Magister, say). While I don't necessarily hate the story it seems Cat's being goaded towards, it's still very likely a story of the Bard's construction, and therefore very unlikely to be good for Cat's health.

Mental Mouse

Oh, he's an Outsider in the current story all right – specifically, he's the Golden Hero sent by the Oracle to Save the Day™, with background chops and personality to properly fill those boots.

Captain Amazing

Hanno doesn't judge. He is the designated arbiter for the heroes and. He. Does. Not. Judge. The villains can only view this as a betrayal, especially with the Mirror Knight running around saying she must be spared. The Red Axe isn't meant to die at all. She's meant to live. I think Red has to be convinced into a heroic sacrifice against that bridge Neshamah is building. Along with maybe the Bard's mole if they're a hero. Possibly the Poet, considering the circumstances of their arrival? Anyway, if Catherine says something about wastefulness the villains will be appeased. Execution by heroic sacrifice bites against the heroes too. The heroes would also be fine as she voluntarily went there and so obviously wasn't executed.

Shveiran

"I am not blind to the corpses you have left behind you, Queen Catherine," the Prince of Brus softly said, "or to fell deeds done by your hands. But I also remember the stench on the fields of Aisne, and that men had never needed Below or Tower to make butchery of themselves. I also know that if it is the destruction of Procer that you sought, the most required of you was not to do a thing at all. We are allies, Catherine Foundling. If you need my help, I will do what I can."

Finally.

Finally, FINALLY, FI-NA-LLY, Fiiiiiiiiiiiiiiiiiiiiinally, fiNAlly, F.I.N.A.L.L.Y, finally, finally, FINALLY.

Fuck.

I mean, I think I've been waiting 4 Books for this. Possibly 5, and maybe even 6.

Was that too hard, godsdamnit? Was this too high a bar to clear? WAS IT? WAS IT REALLY???

I'm good now.

Thank you, Frederic, for cleaning up after all the other imbecilles in your team. That would be all, I believe, take the day off and enjoy the aragh. Your job is done.

Mental Mouse

Yup. Is it too soon to start shipping Foundric? 🤔

Liliet

Nah, a pretty good time really.

Shveiran

It is. Because I ship Frederic with myself and I will not tolerate rivals.

I will absolutely write awful self-insert fan-fiction if need be.

Eh, who am I kidding? I already have.

Mental Mouse

So..., after the war's over she could retire up north with him, close to her Drow and far enough from Callow to still qualify as The Queen ~~Under The Mountain~~ Up North. Maybe even produce an Offspring of Doom or two. 😊

Liliet

Amen.

P.S. don't forget to take Red Axe with you first! XD

Morgenstern

Hm. I wonder if the summoning of a spirit in this place could be enough to give the DK a sliver of access to the Arsenal... (If so: Ouch.)

Mental Mouse

Probably not, since it's her Aspect rather than a spell of his tainted school.

Liliet

She's a witch. DK doesn't hold domain over all necromancy.

Mental Mouse

Frederic may also redeem Cat's view of Proceran heroes. The one's she's met before now have not impressed her...

Chapter 20: Hook

"Fate is not the river but the fisherman: run wild as you will, it will reel you in before the end."

– Queen Edda Norland of Summerholm, shortly before the surrender of her crown to House Alban

I was a city girl at heart so hunting had never been something I thought all that fondly of.

Not that I hated it, either. Out in the country, away from walls and merchants, a good stag or a few geese were a good way for my people to feed their families. One that'd become increasingly common after the Conquest, actually: with the removal of most nobles in the kingdom, there were no longer great forests and fields reserved for the sole hunting right of aristocrats. The Empire had required a yearly fee in silver for the right to hunt in a governor's jurisdiction, but otherwise been largely indifferent to the practice. I'd maintained the policy, and why wouldn't I? It was a good way for my subjects to put meat on the table, especially those who might not have otherwise been able to afford it. But that'd been in the country, not in Laure.

There hunting had been a leisurely pursuit for the wealthy and the noble, practiced by great trains of riders and multiple packs of hounds. Sometimes the animals being hunted were not even edible: by ancient law foxes could not be hunted for sport in Callow, but wolves and bears could and frequently were. It'd been a great deal of pageantry and gold pissed away on reminding people that even under the rule of the Dread Empire the rich and highborn were still important and worthy of awe. The coin would have been better spent ensuring that the basins the street drains emptied in near Nelly's Alley didn't fill up after rain and so end up becoming an open-air sewer that stank up a good dozen city blocks like you wouldn't believe come summer sun, in my humble opinion, but what the Hells did I know?

I'd had them properly dug anew and done during my first year as queen, even though Ratface had howled about the costs.

Still, general distaste for the spectacle or not it'd been impossible not to pick up a few things about hunting being born in Callow. It wasn't as simple business as riding a swift horse after a stag and running it down with a spear, else highborn would not get to be so bloody pretentious about the whole thing. You had to tire out the beast, set dogs after it so it'd run itself to exhaustion. Only when it was on the edge of collapse would it turn and fight, antlers down as fear turned to despair, and only then was the kill to be made. If the nobles had gone after the stag themselves from the start, their horses would have tired out long before the stag would. I was after a beast of my own, here in the Arsenal, so I'd used a method not so dissimilar to that of my countrymen: to get the enemy running, I'd sent out a pack of baying hounds.

The Mirror Knight's band was even now chasing down a conspiracy to bring it into the light, though perhaps not the conspiracy they believed they were. They were a cacophonous bunch, but for all that I believed they'd be able to shake something loose. They certainly had the power and numbers for it: four heroes and the Maddened Keeper, with Adjutant to keep an eye on them and ensure they did not end up misusing the authority I'd granted them.

They'd begun their investigation with the Hunted Magician who, all things aside, we could all agree was a shifty fellow. Whether or not he'd been up to any sort of wickedness was not of too great import, as far as I was concerned: more crucial was that the heroes would be seen digging, and word would soon after spread it was with my blessing. There was someone in the Arsenal with something to hide, and ruby to piglets that little tale would get them moving. With such fine hounds out in the woods someone's never was going to crack, and they'd want to make sure their tracks were covered.

Following them should neatly reveal exactly what it was that was being covered up.

Mind you, the hand behind the opposition was not some ingrate prince with more greed than sense or a heroine fresh off her first nemesis' death and looking to sink her teeth into another victory: it was the Intercessor pulling the strings here. Just because she'd already struck blows didn't mean she was going to stop hitting me below the belt. If anything, it'd be the opposite. So I had to see to my own defences, which meant keeping the goblinfire away from any open flames. The Red Axe was a natural target there but seeing to her protection myself would make me directly involved in her death if it happened, which would be considerably worse than her simply dying. No, someone else needed to be charged with that else I was running into the risk that my personal involvement had been the desired object from the start.

The Kingfisher Prince was of high rank, popular with heroes and his word would mean a great deal to the likes of the Mirror Knight if he vouched for me. That he'd been demonstrably competent and receptive to the concept of the manner of war being fought over the Arsenal had sold me on the notion for good, and so off he went to see the Red Axe with a signed set of orders from me granting him permission to do so under the Terms. Gods help him, mine and maybe even Above if they were to share a win instead of pissing in the communal porridge bowl out of principle.

Now, it wouldn't be enough to simply wait and see now that the hunt had been sounded. Which was why Archer was hitting up her old acquaintance the Concocter for answers, a conversation that should end up with the latter spitting out a part of the Wandering Bard's design here. It had to have been a long-term scheme, I figured: the Red Axe and the Wicked Enchanter had been tools of opportunity, but the tools to use them had already been in place. The smuggling, the precise timing used to guide the Enchanter onto the path of the heroine that'd kill him? That'd been arranged long before, one of no doubt many levers to nudge along the happenings within the Arsenal. After that it was just a matter of the Intercessor getting the right Named close enough, and she could get it all to begin rolling downhill.

The Concocter wouldn't know the whole web, I was aware of that: there should be at least one outright accomplice to the Bard in here, as well as several agents unwitting and not. But by dragging into the light what she knew, I could get a glimpse of what the levers were meant to accomplish. And once I knew that, well, I could smash the Intercessor's game to pieces with a sledgehammer and force her to swallow the broken shards with a smile. So there we were, I'd considered after the Kingfisher Prince had set off. The Mirror Knight's band were out there turning over primarily – one hoped, at least – stones, Archer was finding me a thread to tug at so the net might unravel and the charming Prince Frederic was making sure this wasn't about to violently turn on me.

Now, the Bard would see those stories in motion same as I did. The question was: if I was her, where would I strike at?

Setting the Mirror Knight after the Kingfisher would have been obvious, except my little letter and Frederic being trusted had cut that disaster off before it could start looming. The Concocter wasn't officially one of mine, but with what Indrani had told me about her I could easily unmake any attempt to claim that 'the Black Queen's agent was persecuting a heroine'. The Mirror Knight's band could be tricked I figured, even with Hakram keeping an eye on them, but there wasn't a lot that could physically threaten them. At this point I'd be willing to let them encounter an early setback without intervening, anyway, since that should ensure they later brutally crushed whoever had beat them this early in the pattern.

My trouble, right now, was that I could not see an easy way the arrows I'd loosed could be made to swerve. Out in the open the Intercessor couldn't beat me, because even if I was distrusted I was still recognized. A figure of authority, backed by other figures of authority. Yet Archer should be unearthing part of her machinations where I'd sent her, and using violence to prevent her of doing that would reveal part of the machinations as well: whoever struck at Indrani would be one of the Bard's trusted hands, and pumping them for information would be even more useful than shaking some insights out of the Concocter. There probably were ways to beat my hand, but I didn't know what they were and that meant I couldn't prepare for them. Or, at least, prepare in specific.

There was going to be an answer, and I would have to react to it. While I could not prepare for the specifics for the unknown, I could prepare for the unknown. Practically speaking, that meant assembling a team to handle whatever came crawling out of the woodworks on the Intercessor's behalf. Calling back anybody I'd sent out would be a mistake, unmaking the story they were playing out, which meant if I was to gather some sort of bastard band of five I'd need to pick from the rest of the Arsenal's Named. Four comrades, huh? I could do that. First, I'd naturally needed a trusted second.

Thankfully I had a spare lying around.

"I've just had to put out a library fire," Roland of Beaumarais, also known as the Rogue Sorcerer, mildly told me as he washed his hands free of ash. "I don't suppose you'd know anything about that?"

"I know lots of things, Roland," I vaguely replied.

His hands left the now-clouded water of the basin and he methodically dried them with a cloth.

"Books, Catherine?" he said, sounding agonized. "Castles, armies, ancient architectural wonders, I can make my peace with them all. But books, Catherine? A line has to be drawn somewhere."

"If such a thing had been done, it would not have been done lightly," I said.

"You haven't even been here a whole day," he complained.

Actually, I mused, this could also work.

"You're right," I said. "I'm a reckless, dangerous woman who'll do anything to win."

He cocked his head to the side.

"Have you been drinking?" he asked.

Well, yes. But that was not related to this. I decided, for the sake of tactics, to ignore his rejoinder.

"Which is why you should come with me," I said. "Be the voice of reason, keep me out of trouble. Prevent me from burning more libraries."

A beat passed.

"Not that I've done that," I added.

Another beat passed.

"But hey, the day's young," I added with a hopeful smile.

He twitched a little. Still, under the harried exterior I could see something sharpen in his eyes. The understanding that none of this was as casual as it looked, or without calculation.

"The way Archer tells it, your last designated voice of reason once stole the entire sun," Roland said.

"She's still complaining we never got to pawn that off, isn't she?" I sighed.

"I expect sooner or later the litany will be put to verse," the Rogue Sorcerer said. "Still, large boots to fill."

He shrugged.

"I've nothing else planned for the day, however," he said. "So I supposed I might as well."

"That's exactly the kind of spirit I'm looking for," I said, clapping him on the shoulder. "Come, Roland, we have an important task ahead of us."

He shot me a steady look.

"I don't suppose you could tell me a little more, that I might equip myself accordingly?" he asked.

I hummed, then thoughtfully clasped my chin.

"We're going to cram as many potential traitors as possible into a band of five, then dabble into some stirring heroics," I replied.

"Ah," Roland of Beaumarais nonchalantly said. "We'll have to take a detour through the Workshop, then. It's where I keep my war artefacts."

Good man, I thought, and smiled.

"Her name is Adanna," Roland said as we walked, "and she was born, as she tells it, in Smyrna."

"It's got roots in Mtethwa," I noted. "Not a common Soninke name, though. You said she's highborn?"

"She certainly behaves like it," the Rogue Sorcerer said. "Though there is a distinct Ashuran bent to her manners."

"What colour are her eyes?" I asked.

"Golden," he replied. "It is quite unusual, even for a Chosen."

I let out a low whistle.

"That's not just highborn, that's from one of the old lines," I said.

Born in Smyrna, was she? It was one of the two cities of the Thalassocracy of Ashur, its capital. Hells, that must have been quite the tale. It would have been a point of pride for the Wasteland family they'd fled to have them assassinated, and old families like that tended to have a few grimoires' worth of nasty tricks to pull.

"She's made her disaster for the Dread Empire and all those who dwell within it quite clear," Roland said. "It has been one of the reasons she so frequently clashes with Hierophant."

Which was why Masego wouldn't be part of this band, among other things. I also wanted him free to be a source of knowledge and wisdom for any of the three stories I'd loosed, which he couldn't be if I was dragging him along for mine.

"Hierophant's not here," I said. "And she requested an audience with me, you said. We can have words as we move."

"I expect that was not quit what she wished for," Roland said, "but regardless, here we are."

That last part had not been an outburst of fatalism on the Blessed Artificer's behalf but instead Roland informing me we'd reached the Artificer's quarters in the Workshop. We'd already picked up the Rogue Sorcerer's artefacts, which were now stuffing his pockets and sleeves, and it'd not been a long walk from there. The bare stone hallways here were little different than anywhere else in the Arsenal, and though I would have enjoyed visiting the great workshops of the Workshop – birthplace of wonders that it was – there was no time for sightseeing. Instead we found ourselves in front of a neat wooden door, and without ceremony I knocked against it with my staff a few times. Mere moments later it was wrenched open to my surprise.

"I've told you already, I won't-"

Adanna of Smyrna, wearing small spectacles over her golden eyes and garbed in clothes I would have expected more of some kindly toymaker than a powerful Named, was visibly taken aback when she realized who it was standing at her door. Realizing that the Rogue Sorcerer was at my side did nothing to help he confusion.

"Good evening," I said. "I see that look on your face means I won't have to bother with introductions, Blessed Artificer."

"I am, yes," the dark-skinned woman said. "I know of you, Black Queen. And Roland as well."

"Splendid," I said. "I've need of your services for a bit, as it happens. I'll give you a moment to change and equip yourself."

"Equip myself?" the Blessed Artificer blinked. "For what?"

"Trouble," I vaguely said.

Yeah, looking more closely at her she had that highborn look down to the bone: quite literally, as those high cheekbones were one of those telltale marks of Soninke nobility. This Adanna of Smyrna had not quite inherited the inhuman good looks of Wasteland aristocracy, though she was far from ugly. I supposed having met Malicia in person and spent years in Akua's presence had rather skewed my standards when it came to beauty, anyway. She'd definitely not inherited the Wasteland social schooling, anyhow, as it took her a full three heartbeats before she recovered from the onrush of surprises.

"I do not recall agreeing to lend you my aid, Black Queen," the Artificer said, chin rising. "And if you believe that the Rogue Sorcerer's presence will be enough to bully me—"

"I do believe you've just indirectly called me a tool," Roland noted, though he sounded rather good-humoured about it.

"— into compliance then I assure you, you are sorely mistaken," the heroine finished.

She had that look about her, like a cat ready to hiss the moment a hand was extended, but then that in the first place she'd assume I would need Roland to bully anyone told me exactly how I needed to handle her.

"Please lend me your aid," I bluntly asked.

Ah, so she had been taught to hide her emotions some. She wasn't great at it — Gods, but they would have eaten her alive in Praes — but she did smooth out her surprise after a moment.

"It is for a noble purpose," Roland told her.

Noble might be a bit of a stretch, I mused, but did not contradict him.

"And you requested an audience, as I recall," I said. "We can see to some of that as we walk."

The golden-eyed Named hesitated.

"What is it you require of me, exactly?" she asked.

Gotcha, I smiled.

In what I hesitated to call a stroke of luck, given the amount of Named in the Arsenal, the last two Named I'd decided on were in the same place.

"You know I respect your judgement a great deal," Roland murmured, leaning towards me.

"People only ever say that sentence with a but implied," I said.

He shrugged, not denying me.

"This seems like it will make a terrible band of five," the Rogue Sorcerer assessed.

"Yes," I grinned, "just genuinely terrible, wouldn't it be?"

He cursed under his breath in what I recognized to be tradertalk.

"Last time I saw you that savagely enthusiastic, I was thrown off a balcony," he complained.

"If a villain throws you off it, it's really more of a cliff," I said, echoing an old foe.

One who'd deserved both better and worse than what she'd got, but that'd been the lesson of the Proceran campaign hadn't it? That I was not facing righteous steel things glinting of Light but people of flesh and blood, with all the complexities of character that implied. Though we'd been quiet in our little talk, we'd not been that quiet: the Blessed Artificer overheard, and was not shy in offering up her own assessments.

"One's useless, the other is drunk and useless," Adanna of Smyrna said.

Well, I couldn't deny the drunk part at least. The Arsenal held within its walls hundreds of people, who while they might not have been forced to come here had not been aware of exactly how long or where they would be. Given the concerns about the Dead King's inevitable interest in this place and the fact that relative secrecy was the Arsenal's best defence, we'd known from the beginning that people would only rarely be able to leave once they'd been brought into the fold. As a consequence, aside from what had been tacked onto the seat of Grand Alliance's research and artifact-crafting to fill its secondary role as a communication relay for rulers and high officers, thought had been given to the entertainment of all the men and women we'd cram into here possible for years on end.

That was the niche the Frolic was meant to fill, in essence. Accessible only through the central halls of the Knot – as well as a discreet tunnel coming from the Alcazar – that part of the Arsenal had been built as a sort of ring made up of diversions.

One section was essentially a sprawling tavern, another a private little brothel, a gaudy strip was a gambling house and there'd even been a fighting pit tacked on. Callowans and Procerans were fond of dogfights, but the more exotic beasts Levantines liked to throw into pits had been deemed too expensive and dangerous for consideration. Duels and brawls, though, were allowed. Only to first blood and with healers in attendance, but a few hundred people could not be squeezed in tight between walls for years without some fighting erupting.

Better to give a clear and controlled outlet for that strife than let it erupt out of sight, where there'd be no healers waiting.

What I was looking at, though, was not anger being settled with first blood. It was a crowd of maybe half a hundred cheering at one of the sloppiest fistfights I'd ever seen. The part of me that remembered fighting for coin in another pit was almost offended by how fucking terrible these people – these Named! – were at hand-to-hand combat. The three of us stood in the shadows of the entrance hall, looking down at the fighting pit and the rafter above it, and let the sound wash over us.

"Fallen," the crowd howled. "Fallen, Fallen, Fallen."

The Fallen Monk was one of Indrani's band, and one of the villains on our rolls that heroes tended to react the most violent to. That was not because his sins were so great compared to the rest of Below's lot, but because once upon a time he'd instead been known as the Merry Monk. A Proceran hero from their southern lands, whose very public fall from grace had been the talk of Salamans for year: it wasn't every day someone force-fed one of the Holies until her belly literally burst. Archer counted him as better at sneaking around than Vivienne had been back in the day, and good as a bloodhound when something needed to be found in a town. When it came to fighting, though, aside from being able to take some punishment and being quite useful against Light-users she'd never considered him anything all that special for a Named.

Fortunately for the overweight and very clearly drunk middle-aged man in cloth robes, his opponent was even worse a brawler.

The Exalted Poet's face paint, which had been a neat affair of black and red when I first saw him today, and since been damaged by a purpling black eye and an amount of sand that really could only have come from having his entire face shoved into it. His lack of shirt made it clear that they made them muscled in the Dominion, but for all that he was built like a warrior he certainly wasn't performing like one: the punch he threw at the Fallen Monk's face was met with a mirror on the other side, the two of them rocking back when they hit each other. The Monk stayed up though, if rocking on his feet, while the Poet took a dive and had to hastily push off the sandy ground of the fighting circle before he could get kicked in the ribs by the fat fallen priest. By the amount of empty bottles the audience had carelessly left around in the stands, they must have been at this for some time now.

"It is written in the Book of All Things," the Fallen Monk shouted red-cheeked for the audience, "that those who are worthy of the love of the Heavens will be blessed with their golden love. Bless me, you mighty asses!"

The watchers cheered on, and someone threw a wineskin at the villain for what was evidently not the first time this afternoon. The former priest guzzled down what looked like some pale wine, even as the Exalted Poet got back on his feet and charged – even when tackled in the belly, the Monk kept drinking as he went down.

"They are perfect," I solemnly announced. "Exactly what I was looking for."

"It cannot be that hard to find a fool and an idiot," the Blessed Artificer replied.

"The Monk has a body count of over a hundred, as I hear it," Roland noted. "Though I suspect close quarters were not involved."

Actually, the more I watched those two the less I was convinced that he was right. Sure, the Monk stumbled around a lot and got tackled and took punches. Yet, almost as if by happenstance, never at an angle that'd hurt him much: bruises might ensue, but little more. Either was damned good at taking hits, or he was a better fighter than what he was letting on here.

"If I fetch them myself, Black Queen, can we then proceed to more important matters?" the Blessed Artificer asked me. "You have yet to hear the complaint I mean to lodge."

Somehow, I suspected that if I let her handle that we'd not have five Named up here but three down there. Roland suddenly stiffened, which caught my attention, and he discreetly gestured to our common right – though somewhat behind me. Up there, sitting on a bench and leaning back against the wall, another Named was reading a book. Sallow-skinned and thin-haired, the Sinister Physician had always looked to me like the last person you'd ever want to let cut you open. His skills as a healer were beyond dispute, though, if not his occasional indulgence in taking vitality or souls as payment or even his clear obsession with immortality.

"They've observed the rules, then," I murmured at Roland. "They're meant to have a healer at hand."

I saw no need to seek the other villain out, as it happened. I'd not come for him. But that he was here, though, was interesting: at the very least, it meant he wasn't elsewhere. At first glance anyway.

"Check if it's an illusion," I told the Rogue Sorcerer.
"Discreetly."

"You are ignoring me, Black Queen," the Blessed Artificer impatiently said. "If that is all you sought me out for—"

"I'll see to it myself, Artificer," I replied.

Her open irritation I didn't particularly care about, or even the threat to leave she'd obviously been building up to. I knew an empty threat when I heard one: for all that the heroine at the very least disliked me and had some axes to grind with Roland, she was too curious about where this was headed to leave now. I'd not missed her constant not-quite-subtle glances at my staff, either. While it was my understanding that Light and miracles were her wheelhouse and the length of yew I'd retrieved from the heart of Twilight after its birth was not exactly either, neither was it simply a staff. And as there was no sorcery at the heart of that difference, perhaps her interest in that undefined otherness should have been expected. A halfway clever Named could do a lot, with the undefined.

"So?" I pressed the Rogue Sorcerer.

He released what he'd been clutching in one of his pockets, breathing out.

"Not an illusion," he confirmed.

Good, that was one more Named accounted for. Time for me to get bring in our last two comrades, then. The audience that'd been cheering for the two brawling Named all the while had not noticed the three of us, as we'd stayed in the shadows of the hall, but when I began to limp down the stairs a few caught sight of me. My face might not have been all that recognizable, but even this bare a crown and the Mantle of Woe were enough for exclamations of Black Queen to shiver through the crowd. I ignored the attention and made my way to the edge of the pit, looking down at the two Named whose brawling had ceased when silence spread. I flicked a look at the people up here.

"Dismissed," I said, voice ringing.

Not one argued otherwise, and they filed out with a rather subdued mood hanging over them. Of the two Named below, only the Exalted Poet looked embarrassed at having been caught slugging it out in the sand with a stranger.

"Your Majesty," the Fallen Monk jovially greeted me, his Lower Miezan crisp and perfect, "a pleasure to meet you in person."

He raised a wineskin, not even the same one I'd seen thrown at him earlier.

"I hear from a common friend you're partial to the pales, so it would be my honour to surrender this triumphant bounty to you," he continued.

I snorted.

"Tempting," I said, "but I've had enough to drink for a while. I'm here to inform you that Archer has lost you to me at cards."

The middle-aged man cocked an almost incongruously delicate eyebrow.

"On a good hand at least, I hope," he said.

"Half a good hand," I said, then added, "seen double."

That startled a laugh out of him.

"I am in your service for the day, then," the Fallen Monk bowed, adroit for all his impressive girth. "Though I cannot think of what you might require an old priest like me for."

"You'd be surprised," I said, and turned my stare to the Exalted Poet.

Sadly enough, he'd put a shirt on again. He bowed very graciously, though, so I'd allow it.

"We meet again, Black Queen," the Levantine hero said.

Yeah, that voice was still like getting honey poured in my ear – and drawing on Night just the slightest bit ensured there was no sorcery adding on to the impression this time.

"So we do," I replied. "As it happens, our common acquaintance the Monk was not the only man I am here to look for. I've a need for your particular skills."

"Indeed?" the Poet replied, sounding surprised. "I am most flattered, Honoured Queen, yet also befuddled. What is it you might need them for?"

I reached for my pipe, in the inner pockets of my cloak, and took it in hand while I went fishing for a packet of wakeleaf. I was about to tear it open, when a tremor went through the Arsenal. A second happened a moment later, stronger, and I felt the very stone around us shiver. You horrid wench, I thought towards the Bard, you could have waited until I actually lit the damned pipe.

"Don't you hate it when a question answers itself?" I said, matching the Exalted Poet's eyes.

I had my answer about how it was the Intercessor would avoid the story arrows I'd loosed at her, at least.

If you couldn't move the arrows, I supposed instead you could move everything else.

breakingamber

So, new 'traitorous' Band of Five consists of the Fallen Monk, who is an ex-Hero and had his Name changed – I wonder if he got new Aspects? – the Blessed Artificer, whom we know and love, the Exalted Poet, who is as smooth-tongued and attractive as the Repentant Magister, the Sinister Physician, who is sinister, a physician, and apparently has some skill with illusion, and ... the Rogue Sorcerer? She did say traitorous...

Roland suspects Cat of burning down the library? Wonder if he'll let that slip by accident.

Wonder what the Bard is actually doing. Might it be the Dead King, even?

devildragon777

Roland less suspects and more knows that Cat lit the library on fire. He's also aware that Cat did it for a reason, which puts him head and shoulders above most Named =P

ThatOneGuy

He also got away with stealing our favorite mage's magic. The lie spoken of so long ago might end up hitting him from behind during this conflict.

Only question is how many unwanted secrets will end up being spilt here?

Letouriste

What? What do you mean?

It's not the dead king who stole masego's magic?

Liliet

It is, and not stole but destroyed.

There was a hypothetical plan where Roland would take it, but that never happened. I think people are just confused.

Liliet

...And on reread, he knows because he asked and she answered. "You wouldn't happen to know anything about that?" could conceivably be answered with "no actually that wasn't me", Cat's the one who essentially confirmed it with her answer.

hakureireimu

Cat is part of the band, and the Sinister Physician is not.

ruduen

I believe Catherine's including herself, so the Sinister Physician isn't being included in the band of 5. I also think it's too early to qualify as a 6th addition for this line, so the Physician is more likely to be either a red herring or to have a different role soon.

As it stands, I believe the arrangement is Catherine, Sorcerer, Artificer, Monk, and Poet.

Mengha

I believe the Sinister Physician may be the "Sixth Power-Ranger" here.

ayon96

the Sinister Physician isnt part of the Band

onedollargum

Not yet, but if Cat steps out then he's good to fill the gap.

Shveiran

Not necessarily? It's not like all Bands of Five are actually Bands of Six. That's why they are called Bands of Five. I think she could bring him in if she wanted, sure, but it's not like she has to and my read is that she is not planning on doing so.

Insanenoodlyguy

No see, it's not that he's the sixth ranger, but there's a decent chance he's the replacement.

They are, after all, looking for a traitor. We know for sure it's not Cat, the rest are still suspect. If one of the others does indeed prove to be unsuitable, oh look, there's another named who happened to be around who can take their place on the team. WHAT A STORY.

Liliet

Roland knows exactly what Cat did, and it seems he knows exactly what she did in Twilight, too. Give or take specifics. He reads her very well, bless the entirety of him ♥

Theitzal

Ah no from what I can tell the other 3 are the potential traitors, when looking for Roland she mentioned she needed a lieutenant she could trust to watch her back

Konstantin von Karstein

I doubt Roland is traitorous, but I hope we will learn more about him, especially what lie the Tyrant saw in him. And also why he is called the « Rogue » Sorcerer.

EmptyPockets

Roland is called the Rogue Sorcerer because he is a "Rogue" that is also a "Sorcerer". In this case Rogue is a synonym for "Thief", not for "Independent". He steals magic, that's why his arsenal of magic is frequently commented on as being impossibly diverse.

Alex Straughan

The answer to both of your questions is that he is in fact not a sorcerer at all.

Konstantin von Karstein

We don't know that

Miles

We know that he can't use magic except by stealing it. What don't we know about it?

Konstantin von Karstein

We know that he can steal magic, not that he can't use his own. I think he is a true mage, probably not that powerful, but who can also steal that of others.

Liliet

Yeah, the 'not Gifted' is a common theory, and one I buy into personally, but it's not actually confirmed unambiguously.

Konstantin von Karstein

We know that he can steal magic. Nowhere is it said that he can't do magic on his own, it's only a supposition. He could be a true mage, who happens to be able to steal other's magic.

Javvies

Indeed.

The only thing we know definitively that he cannot do is utilize High Arcana, but then, neither can most mages.

And, let's be realistic, Roland's Name is, at the very least, definitely a mage/mage-adjacent type Name, not one that's more ambivalent about the skillset of the Named. I suspect that it would be very difficult to get a mage Name without being able to use magic before/without the Name itself. One wouldn't necessarily have to be very strongly Gifted, knowledgeable, well trained, or proficient, but something would need to be there. And I also suspect that a hypothetical Name that allowed a non-mage to pass as a true mage would most likely be a Villain type Name gained after successfully making people believe that one truly was a mage ... not a Heroic type Name.

Burlyraven

It would make sense, considering fate seems to have decided she and Masego are meant to be rivals. I'm hoping for her sake that she does have hidden depths, as I don't know if she has the chops to be either the ditz or the straight woman comedy relief in the story to come.

Liliet

I think "straight woman" + "actually straightforwardly competent at the specific thing that's her job" should do it tbh.

It'll also be funny if she ends up being the only one there who DOESN'T have a hidden agenda (or just her and Roland)

erebus42

I do believe Cat is attempting to Ragtag her way through whatever dastardly surprises the Bard decides to throw at her

boballab

I think she is going for one of the 101 Axioms: Send in the comic relief first, the Gods won't allow them to die that easily.

Shikkarasu

exactly

Big Brother

The Fallen Monk. Looks like he might be a Monk of the Drunken Fist, and that's a very dangerous fighter in the party. Always appearing sloppy and unstable, but using the erratic movements to redirect, absorb or dodge blows. AND he's a Hero-turned-Villain? Hells yeah!

JJR

It makes me wonder if he became a villain to dodge a story.

LarsBlitzer

If I'm any judge, I'd say it was a tragic one. Given that he's the Fallen Monk, he must have had to swerve pretty severely to avoid a more definite fate. The Bard probably had her hand in it somewhere.

KageLupus

I doubt it. Most Named aren't as meta-sensitive as Cat, Black, and the Bard. Chances are it was just a normal bit of Story and not anything to do with dodging one.

The Merry Monk discovered some dark secret, probably not even a Dark Secret, and became disillusioned with the local House of Light. Considering what we know about the Proceran Holies and how they play at politics it doesn't seem that unreasonable. He took justice into his own hands, brutally punished the offender, and was promptly labeled a "Villain" for the trouble.

Morgenstern

... or someone just made fun of his girth / appetite one time too many. What with all the stuffing food into them until they literally explode and him ending up a Villain, major V. Would be pretty dark, though. 😊

Insanenoodlyguy

Nah, I think it's more poetic than that. "YOU ARE FEEDING OFF THE PEOPLE! EAT THEN!"

Sparsebeard

With the Bard positioning itself as the villain of this story, it can't end well for it.

Miles

The Bard is never part of the story, she's the one telling it. Since Wander lets her cheat death by making a new character sheet and another aspect only lets her exist in the interesting parts of the story, this won't be an end for her at all.

erebus42

I'm sure Kairos is looking up at her from somewhere and smiling...

Djinn O'Cide

Burlyraven

So every single member of this party is hiding some hidden cunning, Roland included. If this particular party starts running a murder mystery dinner story, I won't be surprised.

erebus42

They certainly would be vultures at the feast: Knives out, beaks bloody.

Liliet

Well, Roland isn't hiding it much, but it's certainly easy to overlook if he isn't casually revealing he knows exactly what you did right that second :3

Konstantin von Karstein

Yeah, we have seen Roland since book 4, and we don't know any of his Aspects. We don't even know if he really is a spellcaster.

Sun Dog

One Aspect, the one that lets him use any magical artifact, and as apparent byproduct allows him to employ contradictory magics. Made to thought USE was an Aspect of deceptive depths.

Konstantin von Karstein

He also has one that make him able to steal magic, not unlike Take. But we don't know exactly what it is, when we know both Tariq's and Laurence 's Aspects

Shveiran

I think we know it is, just that he uses aspects to bridge the gap?

During the Skein brawl, I remember Catherine describing his exploits as impressive but unrefined, mentioning he was bleeding a lot more energy in his workings than someone like Masego would.

He didn't have his magic rod for the fight (Tyrant) so I think it proves he is able to cast spells without trinkets... he's just not in the Big league without them.

Konstantin von Karstein

We don't know for sure, it is only an hypothesis. And when he spoke with Masego at the beginning of book 6, it was mentioned that he could use every style of magic, but no one said, even obliquely, that he could not use his own magic. So we don't know

Shveiran

Technically true, but after spending so much time under Masego's scrutiny I think the reveal that he is not a mage would have come out? If nothing else, not being a mage probably means he'd be more useful in the field rather than in the Arsenal. I feel it's safe to assume that theory has been proven true, by this point.

Liliet

Roland is useful in the Arsenal as an artifact maker, not a researcher.

And how much scrutiny do you think Masego really has to spare for something as uninteresting as people, really?
:3

And would Masego even have cared if he noticed?

Also note: yes, Roland is a spellcaster. He does, in fact, cast spells. He is a practitioner regardless of whether he has the Gift.

wabbitking

And just like that after months of reading I've finally caught up and have to wait a while for a new chapter.

I wonder what the Holy did to make the Monk mad enough to kill them like that? I wonder If it's a Seven kind of deal or the Monk just wanted to be cruel about it.

Mental Mouse

Welcome to the present! Storywise, the Holy's offense would have to be something in the way of gluttony or greed, perhaps something like "reserving" wartime food aid for the priesthood.

Liliet

Assuming the Monk was acting on a 'justifiable/ understandable' level of villainy and not Wicked Enchanter style.

Honestly, he probably was. IMHO, odds are in his favor here.

Javvies

...
So that can't be good.

I'm more than mildly concerned that Bard has managed to move the entire Arsenal. Even with inside access, prep time, and at least one coconspirator.

I'm even more concerned about where Bard might have moved the Arsenal to. Just back to Creation in the same place it left? To Arcadia proper? To the Twilight Ways? One of the Hells? Or back to Creation, but not where it came from?

I'm also somewhat worried that Bard anticipated that Cat would sidestep the first few layers of attacks the way she has (in general, not necessarily the specifics), and has laid mines for Cat to trip over in the sidestepping.

Thorium

I'm pretty sure the Arsenal wasn't actually physically moved. It was more like a metaphorical table flip, moving the entire board.

Oh dear, Cat's using Bard's own pattern of being the drunk lady assembling a ragtag band of five for a higher purpose.

RubberBandman

And of course Bard countered that by stealing Cat's gambit of just wrecking fucking everything to deal with complicated and reactive plans. It's a wonderful mirroring of them learning each other's tricks and using them to out-fox the other.

LarsBlitzer

Main difference here is that the Bard only has experience as the Bard. Even in the echo that the Woe saw she was like that. Cat, on the other hand, has years of experience flying by the seat of her pants, cobbling together an effective force out of the strays sent her way. Remember the field exercise at the War College? I'm sure she's drawing on that. I'd bet you dollars to donuts there'll be a reference to those good ol' days before long.

Shveiran

Bard has a LOT of experience being the Bard though.

I wouldn't call her at a disadvantage.

Miles

Oh dear, constantly singing, now organizing a party from a tavern-like setting,

Cat's new Name is going to be Wandering Bard, isn't it?

The ultimate trick- if you can't beat em, recruit em.

Adrian V

I wonder what tales the new named (that work with Cat) are going to end up telling, also their reactions when they figure out what is hapening and who they face (if they know the who)

pagesbe

Bard's planning is interesting. In a non-narrative based world, her plans would be absolutely terrible, so many moving components that hardly any of them would actually reach the end intact.

Being in a world where narrative controls a huge number of things makes her plans work much better... but she's still vulnerable to the spanner in the works. Like Agnes spoiling her plot to force Cordelia to become a Named, and then Cordelia rejecting the opportunity when it came. Or how Kairos, by virtue of unpredictability, foiled her plans on more than one occasion. Or the Dead King being willing to sacrifice a part of his soul to make sure he received the knowledge of the Bard's plans.

That doesn't mean she ineffective, and her plans are robust enough to survive a bit of shaking from players who she understands can act in different ways, but I'm betting that she hasn't done enough. She predicted some movements from Cat, but in the end she'll fail.

Mental Mouse

... or the Oracle tossing an extra Named in the mix who "really is all that", and can get along with Cat to boot!

JJR

"But books, Catherine? A line has to be drawn somewhere."

Liliet

Things I don't love here: aww, maybe Bard isn't helping after all
)=

Things I LOVE STRONGLY here:

– Roland knows exactly what Cat did. That time and now too. He just sees through her instantly and uses it to complain and tbh their friend chemistry is in the top half of the Woe;

– also Roland voiced the EXACT complaint I had and FUCKING BLESS;

– I LOVE ADANNE INSTANTLY. It's the spectacles that seal the deal on what archetype she is, and I could follow her as a protagonist forever and never get tired of it. Complaining, judgemental, but too curious to leave the story? BEST FOREVER;

– the Monk is probably a terrible person who didnt have a good reason for what he did (they cannot ALL be perfect aaaa - convinces myself-) but he is also so fucking delightful;

– Catherine's drunkenness seems to manifest in increased amounts of ogling and I love her forever;

– welp, there's the Poet. Let's see what the fuck is going to explode!

erebus42

You always did have a soft spot for Heroes.
As for the Monk, you never know. Given some of the behavior we've seen displayed by some of the Holies, she may have had it coming. He could also have just done it for shits and giggles, either way at least he's fun...

Liliet

See yeah exactly that person could have totally had it coming-anyway yes I love guide's Heroes 😊

Wonder

Oh come on Intercessor!! Why did you have to move the Arsenal back into the Dead King's reach?

What exactly do you even want ?

Liliet

We... don't actually know that's what happened.

Konstantin von Karstein

Procer or the Golden Bloom seem more likely

Shveiran

I'd throw in Praes as a possibility... that Narrative will need to be resolved eventually, and being relocated might offer an excuse.

Not likely, IMO, but still. A possibility.

Sir Nil

I really hope the traitor in the end isn't Masego or something. The downside of having the Princes Graveyard get broadcasted by heaven itself is that everyone knows of the story where the Hierophant is manipulated by a god like entity while doing something that is slightly related to Apotheosis. The souls of Liesse had enough weight to reach it and Quartered Seasons was said by Cat to look like an attempt at a cursory glance.

Sir Nil

Not to mention from a meta perspective, the Blessed Artificer would fit perfectly into the source of an unexpected revelation, given that Cat doesn't trust her after she blinded Masego and I suspect she wouldn't be able to lodge her 'complaint' while the whole goddamn Arsenal is going under.

Liliet

> is that everyone knows of the story

Story weight does not, by itself, compel people in most cases. This story is not archetypical, specific and major enough for Hierophant's identity to actually impact what he does or feels like in any way.

(The opposition with Blessed Artificer is sewn much more deeply into his Role)

blubber

hold up, who has the balls to call the fucking black queen a friend. That monk suddenly is hella fucking suspicious. So whod call catherine a friend? bard, dead thing, hanno sve noc, robber, king and queen of acradia possibly, tho mostly just the king... anyone i missed? black possibly? soooo, drunk monk who despises all and himself has a common friend with the likes of the black queen, a common friend who knows her well enough to sort her by wine. Thats akua, black, grey pilgrim and hanno the dead king and bard, those are all that should know her wine tastes, well and malicia i guess, huh holy crap. This could be her instead of the bard. holy moly. still, that monk is hella suspicious. and now even with catherine is esstially warning the reader with ,hey he might be stronger than he looks.

ciara

Archer is the "common friend" that the Fallen Monk is referring to.

Morgenstern

It was even Cat who started that banter, what with telling him Archer lost him to her in a card game.

Cap'n Smurfy

Dear Gods this is the most treacherous and backwards Band of Named in existence! We've got a thieving sorcerer, an ex-Praesi priest, a fallen hero, a soul-stealing healer, a mind controlling 'hero' and of course that most heroic of Villains, Catherine Foundling herself.

I don't think anyone here could be any worse at their Roles if they tried.

Cap'n Smurfy

So, what are the odds the Arsenal has just been thrown into where ever the Golden Bloom is? If you're looking for a clusterfuck of epic proportions, that seems like the place do put it.

Konstantin von Karstein

It could also be in the middle of Procer

Mental Mouse

IIRC, the Golden Bloom goes to Arcadia. Most likely destination is the real world.

Shveiran

the physician is not part of the Band. Cat was just glad to see him because now there is one less unaccounted Named around.

Cap'n Smurfy

The band doesn't even have a healer? That's even worse (better)!

WuseMajor

Well, Of Course they couldn't pawn the Sun.

It's way too hot.

maximillian999

Go home and think about what you've done, WuseMajor.

Big I

Seems to me that Cat's putting together the comic relief. Wasn't one of the Two Hundred Axiom about how the comic relief always survives? The Artificier's obviously there as the straight man for the gags.

Interesting that foxes are a protected species in Callow. And I'm calling it that Roland's the traitor; he's friends with most of the Woe, and it's always the guy you left expect.

More_Dakka

Could be a double bluff. Spend time laying hints there is a traitor so people are paranoid and more vulnerable to other plans

In more divided groups like say a group of heroes and villains it could cause a them to kill each other out of fear and mistrust

Aotrs Commander

That would be unfortunate, since Roland is one of only two (MAYBE two-and-a-half) of the so-called Heroes that actually genuinely seems to live up the name and be an actual reasonable person and not a complete unlikeable censored expletive. And thus firmly cement the fact that Heroes Are Unilaterally Antagonists in the meta narrative.to the readers – or at least some of us anyway.

It'd be a bit akin to if you as DM set up one of the PC's NPC companions/friends/supporting cast/etc. to Have Been A Traitor All Along (for the Big Shocking Dramatic Reveal) more than once, (or at most, once in a decade or two) the players will then start to never trust/befriend/etc. any NPCs again.

I mean, this doesn't mean you're WRONG, only that it would send a meta message that would be, as I say, unfortunate.

Konstantin von Karstein

There's still Hanno, but it would indeed be bad for the Accords

Aotrs Commander

He's the MAYBE half.

Mental Mouse

I'd guess Roland as the chump. In any case, it's not like he'd sell her to the Dead King, but remember that he might not be completely convinced about the Bard's hidden eldritch-horror status.

TeK

Am I the only one who feels as if the quality is taking a bit of a nosedive?

Better than an alternative.

That is an ending.

The hardest part.

It's good you took biweekly rate now.

But maybe slow down more?

I am reading too much. I realised that hunted magician and rogue sorcerer aren't the same just this chapter. It's hard

Liliet

And when Masego mused about the two best Proceran practitioners not getting along, you assumed Roland had a split personality?
XD

Xinci

Hm good, we are starting to get a framework on how Adanna became Blessed. Above isn't above stealing power from other sources, and a child of escaped highborn is a fairly good route. What she was supposed to disrupt is a bit vague beyond a possible contingency for what Malicia was going/did do to Ashur and a general disruptor to its relationship with Praes. Though her ability to flexibly artifice miracles with constructs that can interact with and subvert principles like Summer, definitely makes the Light and presumably other forms of miracles more flexible for problems like Alchemy. Along with the nasty methods that were presumably used to attempt to assassinate her while she was young. After going through such conflict her disdain for the wasteland makes sense even if her judgment overall doesn't seem the best as of yet.

Also glad to know the method she got/created the staff did indeed not count as Sorcery. I wonder if Twilights own effusive qualities at its Creation helped it be less defined than other such dimensions/apotheotic concepts.

Liliet

> What she was supposed to disrupt is a bit vague beyond a possible contingency for what Malicia was going/did do to Ashur and a general disruptor to its relationship with Praes.

This does not seem even remotely related to her Role, considering she did not come up until now at all.

Daniel E

Roland's resigned acceptance of Cat's method's is a delight to read. In terms of relationship to Catherine, he's a perfect Heroic mirror of Masego.

ninegardens

Pretty sure Bard is doing/planning something dangerous/bad with "Severance"...

DementedLiar

So i started thinking it last chapter but with her level of meta insight, which is so strong it was mentioned early in one of the books, i think the new Name Cat has been leaning into is to become the new Intercessor.

Pethrai D'arkos

I can't believe it's been a day and nobody has brought up the obvious connection between the Blessed Artificer and Akua's great uncle. You know the one she said stole from the family vaults and then fled to Ashur.

Javvies

That's because it came up in an earlier chapter, when we first learned learned about Blessed Artificer being of Praesi descent.

And Blessed Artificer being a descendant of that relative of Akua's seems likely from a narrative sense. Especially if Blessed Artificer was being set up to oppose Heiress/Diabolist if she had beaten Cat and succeeded in her attempt to restore Praes and the Dread Empire to the Age of Wonders.

ErraticErrata

Huh, I didn't think anyone would actually catch on to that. Congrats!

Miles

No! Why? There are too many chapters to revisit and find the other such things.

Liliet

OOOH WOW.

I thought of this possibility too but didn't think it was likely! Shows what I know, NICE

Imrix

"The coin would have been better spent ensuring that the basins the street drains emptied in near Nelly's Alley didn't fill up after rain and so end up becoming an open-air sewer that stank up a good dozen city blocks like you wouldn't believe come summer sun, in my humble opinion, but what the Hells did I know?"

Funny thing, historically speaking regular hunting for nobles was actually of serious value. Serious MILITARY value, so Cat should know this; in pre-modern warfare, knowing the terrain is paramount, and studying a map just doesn't cut it. You need to know the details, where the little dips and rocky patches are, and nothing replaces first-hand experience for that. So, in turn, commanders and warriors need to practice the skill of taking in a stretch of ground and understanding the lay of it in the space of a glance. Chasing a hostile beast across untamed ground is pretty good training for that.

Shveiran

Interesting, though I'd still argue it is in character for her to feel this way: she never faced a noble opponent on their home turf where this kind of thing would have helped them, and her solution to that need is likely field exercises which we know the armies (and by extension their scouts and commanders) regularly take around Callow.

Still; I learned something new today.

Imrix

Nah, it matters even then. Any commander on the attack would want to examine the field before battle, even if all they could do was cast their eye over it from out of bowshot range while their army dresses ranks behind them. The defender would certainly have more opportunities to do so, but that just makes it all the more important to claw back as much advantage as you can – you're probably marching over that ground to get to grips with the defender, you need to know what you'll be walking on!

The War College probably replaced this with dedicated field exercises, but it still feels like something Cat would know.

Shveiran

The knowledge is necessary, the method is not.

It's interesting to learn that was not just a huge waste of time nobles indulged in, but it's not like it is the only way (or the most time and cost efficient way) to gain that knowledge and skill.

It's a given the College includes classes on the subjects (since we have seen graduates being good at this kind of stuff) and we know both the College and the Army of Callow have frequent field exercises.

If Cat was presented with a very efficient way to solve this need, it's not that strange for her not to be aware of the way the kingdom solved it before the Conquest. She can't know all, after all, and even on the subject of war, her instruction was mostly practical or self-learned. She has read on the subject of war through the centuries, sure, but it's not like that has been her main focus... and even with Learn and Fey-Not-Sleep, she has left her Tavern only a few years ago, and she has been very busy in the mid-time.

SITB

Would she though? Amadeus was pretty successful in ending Callowan nobility, and later on Cat joined the War college and was further molded by Amadeus' personal distaste for nobles. Roughly the first person to defend the usage of hunting would be Talbot, and he only became trusted around the end of book 3.

I think it's reasonable for Cat to be ignorant in this matter given her tutelage.

Liliet

Agreed with what STB said: it's perfectly in character of Catherine to be unaware of this. During her lifetime it would not have served this function any longer, given nobles where no longer leading armies in the first place in Amadeus's system.

Thanatoss

No, no, no, im very sure that Cat wanted Roland to just check if Hierophant still has his magic/gift. He didn't steal it. Dead King made sure to destroy Masego's gift.

More_Dakka

Dead king was retreating and didnt have time for a passing strike as they would kill a part of his soul. Bard timed it to ensure that Masego's gift was destroyed along with the soul piece

Bard is responsible for the loss probably to make Masego blame the dead king and plan diecide

Shveiran

Bard is responsabile, but only because she ensured the Dead King would not have been extracted before he had time to cripple Masego.

The direct cause of the harm was still Neshamah.

The Dead King is the one that hit him on the head, the Bard was the one who purposely stopped the ambulance from intervening in time for him to recover with full functionality.

Liliet

Roland isn't regardless.

Chapter 21: Line

"Turn back, Emperor, for if you venture further west the sole stretch of land you'll have of me will be six feet long and three feet deep."

– King Jehan the Wise, before the famous Battle of the Sparrows

I tapped the side of my pipe, seeding flame, and drew in a long breath of wakeleaf.

It was a good gambit, I decided as the Arsenal shuddered again. Shuddered like a wall taking trebuchet fire, like a gate being touched by the ram: someone, something was trying to force its way in. An obvious outside threat would draw in the Mirror Knight and his lot like a moth to the flame, and in the ensuing chaos a move could be made against either Archer or the Kingfisher Prince. Hells, if the mess got big enough a ruthless schemer like the Intercessor might just be intending to tie up all her loose ends through casualties. My choices in giving answer were limited, each an opportunity I could not easily discard. Fighting at the Mirror Knight's side now might earn trust I'd need down the line, but intercepting enemy action headed for Archer or Prince Frederic would pay greater and more immediate dividends. I breathed out the smoke and offered a calm glance at the Named assembled around me before turning to the side.

"Sinister Physician," I called out.

The man had closed his book and risen to his feet the moment the first shiver went through the stone around us, but aside from a small bow to me he'd shown no interest in being involved with this situation.

"My queen," the villain replied, turning and indifferent gaze on me. "How may I serve?"

"Head out to the Knot and prepare to receive wounded," I ordered. "Set up a temporary infirmary. You have my full backing to requisition whatever you might need."

A glint of interest appeared at that, though not particularly deep. Still, unpleasant as the man was he'd be able to handle this without trouble. The Knot was the centre of the Arsenal, a mess of winding hallways, but it would have the benefits of being accessible no matter where the enemy struck from and being some distance from the fighting itself: it struck me as the best location to set up our healers.

"It shall be done," the Sinister Physician said. "If I might take my leave?"

"Do," I replied. "As for the rest of you, we'll be headed elsewhere."

So, should I see to the front door or the back? I mused. Either way I'd be taking a risk. Hells, given who I was up against it might be that there was simply no good decision to be made here. Perhaps instead of thinking in terms of avoiding mistakes, I should be thinking in terms of picking the mistake whose consequences I could deal with more ably. No, that was still playing the Bard's game. Getting stuck in a story, digging in my heels. A defensive mindset would inevitably lead to my loss when facing an opponent whose understanding of the terrain was superior to my own. I'd already sent out Archer and the Kingfisher Prince, I must now trust in their skills. Where could I attack?

"A defence must be organized," the Blessed Artificer seriously said.

"Catherine?" Roland asked, eyes meeting mine.

He'd always been a sharp one. He must suspect by now we were fighting on more than one front and that I'd gathered this band of five as much to make sure it wasn't out of my sight as to make use of it. Which means heading into a fight wouldn't necessarily be the best move, I thought, but then breathed in sharply. Not, I corrected myself, it absolutely would be the best move. Sure, as a fighting band we'd be highly dysfunctional at best: both the Exalted Poet and the Fallen Monk would be better against people than the sort of things we were likely to face, and the Blessed Artificer wasn't a frontline Named. Furthermore, while the Rogue Sorcerer and I were both forces to reckon with, neither of us were in the habit of being in the thick of it these days. We'd grown used to relying on martial Names to take the frontline. But that only mattered if the objective of the fight was victory, which it wouldn't be here.

If any of these people had served or were serving as agents of the Intercessor, given the stories we had unfolding they were likely to be very difficult to kill even when by common sense they should be thrice-dead and buried. Creation would nudge things to help them might survive, so that in the last act of the play they could be unmasked by the triumphant heroes. The quickest way to ferret out an answer, I thought, would actually be taking this bunch into a fight far beyond what such a purposefully shoddy band of five would be able to handle. Good, I mused as I breathed in wakleaf and smiled, that meant I could attack and defend with the same stroke. I spat out the smoke, Roland batting it away so it wouldn't linger near his face.

"This is a distraction," I said. "We need to intercept the enemy before they get what they came for. Roland, which would you believe the most likely target for destruction among our potential war assets?"

He grimaced.

"Either the Severance or that one theoretical exercise," the Rogue Sorcerer said after a beat. "I'll add that the former is significantly better defended."

So either the weapon that might possibly end the Dead King or the first steps of Quartered Seasons. The aspect I'd taken out of the Saint of Swords' corpse and which had since been forged into a sword was unique, and thus would be irreplaceable if lost. The other was technically recoverable, since while losing Masego's set up here in the Arsenal would set us back some months the truly important part was the surveying artefacts we'd seeded across several realms. It'd be a pain to re-establish connections with those again, but hardly impossible. Of those two tools it was my opinion that only Quartered Seasons' ultimate results would feasibly be able to harm the Intercessor, but that didn't necessarily mean that was what she'd be going for. The Dead King had implied, back at the conference in Salia, that some aspect of the Intercessor's plans hinged on the corpse of Judgement the Procerans had dredged up being used.

I'd worked on Hasenbach enough that I knew she'd not pull that trigger without having no other option left, so I had to wonder if that was the Bard's game: peeling away every other alternative, until that was left was oblivion's approach and a finger on the trigger.

"The sword is in the Repository," I said. "The other is..."

"Belfry," Roland said.

Masego's quarters in that part of the Arsenal, then. He'd never quite understood why anyone would separate their life from their work, as he saw little difference between the two.

"And for those of us slower to catch on," the Fallen Monk cheerfully said, "might an explanation be provided?"

The Exalted Poet cleared his throat in support.

"Please," he politely added.

"Isn't it obvious?" the Blessed Artificer sighed. "They believe someone's making a grab for the most dangerous projects in the Arsenal: the Severity and the Hierophant's own private research."

Wait, had she called the sword the Severity? From what Roland had said, I'd thought it was the Severance. Didn't matter, I decided. Especially not given what she was trying to pull here.

"That research is secret by the order of more crowns than any of you can afford to defy," I mildly said. "Do have a care about those loose lips, Artificer."

"Light ever cleanses," the Blessed Artificer replied, uncowed. "Those who have nothing to hide have nothing to fear."

"I must have been unclear," I patiently said, "if you ever talk of that subject again, within the hour I'll have an order signed by every high officer of the Grand Alliance to have you executed without trial or appeal. You have absolutely no idea what you're trifling with, and your ignorant swaggering is a potential existential threat to this continent. Congratulations, Blessed Artificer. There aren't a lot of people alive who've had apocalypse counted as a possible consequence of their blind arrogance."

Adanna of Smyrna reared back like I'd slapped her across the face, which to be fair I essentially had. I did not regret it, for I had rather limited patience for unearned self-importance these days. Especially from heroes.

"I," she said, "I didn't-"

"Think?" I coolly replied. "Consider this matter with a thimble's worth of commonsense? Evidently not."

Harsh as I might have been right now, there had been ways to handle this other than sneaking around investigating and then trying to force my hand by talking about it publicly. If she'd brought her concerns to the White Knight earlier, or Hells even to the First Prince, then this could all have been dealt with by the mechanisms we'd put in place for that very purpose. Instead she'd blundered onwards, heroine to the bone, and become yet another ingredient in the poisonous brew the Bard was trying to pour down my throat. My gaze swept across the rest of the gathered Named.

"I expect I won't have to repeat myself," I added.

"Already forgotten," the Fallen Monk said, raising his wineskin.

"My Chantant is lacking at the best of times," the Exalted Poet said.

Roland said nothing, only inclining his head. He didn't know the specifics of what Masego was looking into, since there was no need to, but he'd been made aware since the beginning that if Hierophant required time to spend on Quartered Seasons instead of other duties he was always to be granted that request.

"Good," I said. "Now, let's get moving. The moment we've ascertained where the breach will happen, we'll--"

There are limits, Bard, I thought even as the Arsenal shuddered once more and then a massive cracking noise sounded as the wards were broken through, to having a nasty sense of humour. My senses weren't anywhere sharp enough to tell me where the breach had taken place, but then I was far from the Crows and surrounded by wards. Someone who'd helped put those up, though, would have a better idea.

"Roland?" I asked.

"West," the Rogue Sorcerer replied. "Near the Belfry and the Workshop."

Opposite of where we were, unfortunately.

"Then to the Belfry we go," I ordered. "Prepare yourselves, my friends. This could get interesting."

I let Roland see to the Artificer's rustled feathers while we moved, the two of them taking the lead as we sped through the halls as quickly as we could. I wove Night through my leg to numb the pain so I wouldn't slow us down too much, but even so I had to stay in the back with the Fallen Monk and the Exalted Poet. I didn't mind, since it was as good an occasion as any to get them talking.

"So I heard you killed one of the Holies," I told the Monk. "In a pretty grisly way, too."

The villain laughed. There'd been no deep emotional reaction to the mention, not on his face anyway, and his weight made it more difficult to gauge his body language. Especially in such thick robes when it was a man I did not know well.

"You refer to my first, though not my last," he fondly said, Arlesite accent thickening slightly. "I got my hands on three before the Saint of Swords began popping up around the region and I had to flee. I slipped into the Dominion through the Brocelian Forest, and I'd made it as far as Levante when the war up north erupted."

Ah, I thought. So that how he'd survived as a villain west of the Whitecaps contemporary to the Saint and the Grey Pilgrim. I knew for a fact the House of Light in Procer had records on both, he might just have been keeping an eye out for them from the start.

"I heard rumours," the Exalted Poet said, a little too casually to be casual, "that around this time, several lodges of Lanterns disappeared after venturing into the Brocelian."

The Fallen Monk smiled, friendly as a beloved brother, but there was something about him... there was nothing comical about his weight then, his size and lumbering demeanour. It was like looking at a predator that'd gotten large and slow by devouring, feeding again and again until it weighed him down.

"Does the Book of All Things not preach that the righteous must answer kindness with kindness and wickedness with wrath?" the Monk pleasantly said.

The Poet stiffened.

"That is blasphemy," he hissed.

"To quote the Book of All Things?" the Monk chuckled. "What interesting practices the Dominion keeps to, if that is indeed true."

It was always nice, I thought, when Named made friends. If only it weren't so fucking rare.

"Can't cast stones, I suppose," I noted, "I was proclaimed an abomination for a few years, and Arch-heretic of the East for a tad shorter. What did they do to piss you off, anyway?"

"They called themselves holy," the Fallen Monk said. "That was, all things considered, more than enough."

"A Proceran priest is still a Proceran, after all," the Exalted Poet conceded.

In a sense, was ragging on the Principate not the foundation of international diplomacy? It'd yet to fail me, anyway, not even with actual Procerans.

"Can't argue with that," I snorted. "Mind you, Hasenbach seems to be cleaning house there."

She'd named some kind of spy lay brother her Lord Inquisitor with the coup attempt as a pretext then used him to rip out the fangs of the House in the Principate, the way the Jacks told it. She'd even done it carefully enough they'd had to just lie back and take it, which was damned impressive given the pull the House of Light still had in Procer even after their leaders got caught backing a coup.

"A cleaned pigsty does not become a temple for the cleaning," the Fallen Monk shrugged. "Though I suppose peeling some jewels off the pigs is laudable work."

Godsdamn, I thought, reluctantly impressed. This one would get along splendidly with the House Insurgent if they ever got introduced.

"Lanterns know better," the Exalted Poet proudly said. "They have a single lodge in Levante, and it does not involve itself with politics."

And if you believe that, there's a house in Hannover I'd like to sell you, I thought. The Lanterns had kept themselves from being squeezed under any ruler's thumb since the founding of Levant, and that wasn't the sort of thing that could be done by keeping your hands entirely clean.

"Right," I said, keeping my skepticism off my face, "you lived there, didn't you? As one of the Hidden Poets."

The man looked surprised at even this bare bone knowledge of him, though perhaps I should not be surprised by that in turn. We had never met in person until today, and as both a recent addition to our roster and one without impressive martial skills he'd warranted precious little attention from me.

"That is true," he said. "Though I am one of them no longer, as I have left the Old Palace and taken up paying work."

"I heard of the Hidden Poets claiming an entire street's worth of brothels for their use a full day and night, when I was there," the Fallen Monk slyly said. "Though no doubt that was mere vile calumny."

"No," the Exalted Poet assured him, "it is quite true. It happens every spring, as part of the Feast of Many Sighs."

Why was it that all these southern nations seemed to have those delightful customs involving a lot of beautiful naked people, when all that Callow could measure up against them was harvest festivals where everyone got drunk and made poor decisions? It was a little unfair, in my opinion. Anyhow, the Monk had been trying to tease by relying on a cultural need for discretion in such affairs that was very Proceran in the first place. Levantines, though, were remarkably forthright about sex even by my own Callowan standards.

"So what is it that moved you to leave the Old Palace?" I asked. "Sounds like a pleasant enough life."

"It would have been shameful to remain there as Bestowed," the Exalted Poet said, "given the call to war by the Holy Seljun. Besides, I have been thinking of composing an anthem of my own."

Bold, that. If I grasped what he'd said correctly, he was referring to the Anthem of Smoke: the founding epic of the Dominion of Levant, verses recounting the legendary hero-led rebellion that'd thrown out Procer and created the nation that still stood today. Mhm. This little chat had done nothing to move me towards believing those two were or were not pawns of the Intercessor, unfortunately. The Fallen Monk's fairly open hatred of the Proceran House of Light didn't necessarily make him an ally, since it wouldn't be impossible to use the Dead King as a way to break it without breaking Calernia itself along with it. If you had the right ally, anyway. Obviously he wasn't shy about getting a little blood on his hands or even killing to make a point, but then he wasn't one of Hanno's. My lot rarely had clean hands to show.

As for the Poet, he remained opaque to me. The Dominion's distinct fondness for honour and debts meant their Named had obvious levers for the Intercessor to use, but he did not seem quite as stuck in that rut as most of his countrymen: he'd backed down instead of dug in, when I'd pushed against the Mirror Knight's band right after its unexpected arrival. In a sense that only made him harder to read, though, and considering how straightforward Dominion Named tended to be that had me warier of him than not. I knew myself to be a fair hand at assessing people, it was a skill that'd saved my life more than a few times, but I had too little to go on here. For both of them. Until I got a finger on the pulse of what it was that drove, distrust was the order of the day.

Nothing new in that, sadly enough.

The Belfry was one of the more unusual parts of the Arsenal, in the sense that its existence was only possible because of the peculiarities of this place. In one sense it was exactly what it'd been named after: a belfry tower as could be seen in most temples of the House of Light, if a particularly large one. There could be no such thing as a view of outside in the Arsenal, though, as there was no outside. The pocket dimension this place was built in was very precisely tailored to what had been needed, as anything more would have been a waste of resources. To put it simply, the entire facility had been carved out from the interior of single stolen Arcadian mountain, using existing caves that were now the Knot as the start. It accounted for strange, sprawling and yet stratified lay of the Arsenal, which had been designed in a way that would have been absurd in a place not surrounded by stone on all sides.

We'd reached the broadly square base of the Belfry a while back, and been greeted by the first sight of the Arsenal I'd really consider to be worthy of story: where in a temple's belfry there would have been an empty hollow for the rope and bell, instead hung a long sculpted stalactite of what might once have been stone but was now quite different. The material had grown translucent from the sorcery poured into it, almost like a sort of crystal, and it offered a gentle glow that I recognized from some of the magelights in the rest of the Arsenal. Fourteen floors of a great library swept upwards around the former stalactite, which now hung more like a chandelier than anything else. It was the single greatest repository of books in this Arsenal, but the lay of the stacks also filled with writing desks and research nooks and even places to sleep. A few discreet hallways on different levels even led into personal quarters carved outwards from the Belfry, one of them Masego's. The stone railings on every floor parted to allow for a stone path leading into the crystalline hanging hear, which itself had been hollowed out and could serve as both stairs upwards and way across.

The truly beautiful part, though, was the lights and sights echoing within the translucent stone. They were not from here, as it happened. Though the Belfry's tallest heights reached the summit of the mountain the Arsenal had been carved in, there would simply have been nothing to see outside the windows. Just an endless void which had been described to me as desolately empty yet somehow oppressive, like a ceiling too close to one's face. It was the kind of thing that chipped away at one's sanity if looked at long enough, regardless, so the 'windows' at the highest ring of the Belfry instead showed something entirely different: they were great silver scrying mirrors looking instead at the beautiful vistas of Arcadia and the Twilight Ways, at the seas and sky of Creation. There were smaller mirrors on lower levels showing such sights as well, all of them angled so that what they held within might echo in the central stalactite.

It was genuinely wondrous to behold, and I'd cast more than a few looks to the side in fascination even as we went up the first floor and onto the second. Masego's quarters would be on the thirteenth floor, and they where the enemy was most likely to strike, so I'd been prepared for the long hike up. My steps slowed before we could even come close to the third floor, however, same as Roland's in front of us. I cocked my head to the side, strengthening my senses with Night. The entire Arsenal was walled in by wards and had been raised in a pocket dimensions created and maintained by sorcery, which permeated the air and made sensing anything but the ambient power a difficult task, but the both of us had recognized a twinkle of what was coming up behind us.

"Enemies," Roland said. "It seems we arrived first."

"Fae," I added. "And if I can feel them from this far out, in this place? They're titled."

Not a weak title, either, which meant this was going to get rough. My otherworldly senses were too muddled by the surroundings for me to be able to put a finger on exactly what manner of fae was headed our way, but there could be no good answer to that sort of question.

"We should make our stand at the stairs leading up from the first floor," the Exalted Poet suggested, sounding rather enthusiastic. "Hold the line there."

"It'd be pointless," I grunted.

Roland nodded in agreement. I wasn't sure if he'd tangled with fae before, but at the very least he'd been in a few scraps with the Tyrant of Helike and his bloody gargoyles. The lessons to learn were not entirely dissimilar.

"Ah," the Blessed Artificer breathed out, quick to catch on. "They fly, the stories say."

Everyone's eye's turn to the empty space between the central crystalline structure and the railings. If they could go right up flying where we could only go on foot, they'd make it to Masego's quarters long before we did. Assuming they knew where those were, and that was truly where they were headed for. Wasn't a risk I could afford to take, regardless.

"Rogue Sorcerer," I said. "Head in there, find a good vantage and try to keep them from going straight up. I'm leaving."

The Blessed Artificer? Not a fighter, but potentially bearing useful tools to clear out a swarm of lesser fae. Dangerous for the same reason, though. The Fallen Monk would be next to useless save as a bodyguard – and couldn't be trusted for that anyway – while I knew much too little about the Exalted Poet's combat abilities. He had the Gift, though, and unless you were cooking up a ritual putting all your mages in the same basket was typically a bad idea.

"- the Blessed Artificer with you," I said.

She was the most likely to be able to crack open the wards Hierophant would put around his quarters, if she was the traitor.

Roland already knew I'd gathered potential traitors here, so he'd know to both keep her at hand and keep an eye out for a knife in the back.

"Understood," the Rogue Sorcerer replied, catching my gaze and dipping his head.

I did enjoy working with Roland, no two ways about it.

"I will do what must be done," the Blessed Artificer grimly said.

Fair enough, I thought, so long as that didn't involve a knife slipped between mine or the Rogue Sorcerer's ribs.

"And the three of us, Black Queen?" the Fallen Monk asked me, a theatrical gesture extending the question to include the Poet.

"You two should run down to the entrance as quick as you can, we'll contain what we can there," I said.

"You will not be coming with us?" the Exalted Poet asked.

"I'll be taking another way down," I said. "Get moving, would you? There's no time to waste."

Though I could tell neither of them were convinced, they didn't manage to talk themselves into asking about it either. Keeping a good distance from each other, as if making a point of it, they doubled back at a run towards the stairs we'd taken up to get here. As for me, I waved off Roland and the Artificer and went fishing for my pipe again. I'd not finished the wakeleaf from earlier and it had gone quite cold, but a touch of blackflame saw to that. I limped my way to the railings and propped up my staff against them, leaning forward as I pulled at my pipe. A stream of smoke left my lips as I waited, patient, for the enemy's first blow. Unlike what I assumed to be the rest of this little band, I was familiar with fighting the Courts. Though Winter and Summer had preferred very different tactics, they'd had a few in common. There were, I imagined, only so many ways to make use of similar assets.

Which was I was not surprised when, before either the Named I'd sent down could make it down to the entrance, a winged silhouette shot out of the floor below and began to ascend the gap at a breakneck pace. A titled vanguard, hard enough to take a few hits from a powerful foe but not so powerful it'd be a great loss if their heads got caved in early. Classic fae, that.

"Not a prince or a duke," I mused, gauging the amount of power wafting out of the humanoid shape. "A count or a baron?"

Hard to tell, but I'd be more inclined to bet on baron. Regardless, it was time to act. I snatched up my staff and used it to deftly pull myself atop the railing, calling on Night and beginning to weave it even as I estimated the right angle. I leapt down, pitch-black power beginning to erupt from the top of my yew staff and hurtled down towards the fae heading up. It could see it – no, her. Decked in dark brown armour styled like a coat of branches, translucent wings batting as her long golden hair flowed behind her, the fae offered me a mocking smile even as she veered off to the side and avoided me entirely. Leaving me, without a word or care, to fall towards the ground.

“Mistake,” I noted around the mouth of my pipe.

Taking my staff up by both hands I snapped it forward like a fishing rod, and so the rope of Night I had woven snapped forward as well, snatching the fae passing me by the neck and smashing her down.

“How dare-”

The golden-haired fae passed me as I continued to fall down in a descent barely slowed, mouth open to scream in anger, but I took a hand off my staff and pulled at the Night-rope. It tightened around her throat and I dragged her close even as my teeth clenched around my pipe, then gripped her throat and forced her further beneath me. Using my staff as support I shot a painful jolt of Night into her body, disrupting her wings, and used her twitch of pain to flip her around. We kept falling, but I was now above her back and holding a makeshift rein of Night to guide our descent.

“- am the-” the fae forced out before I tightened the rope again.

I eye the rapidly approaching ground beneath us, counting in my head how long we had before impact and disrupting her wings with further jolts of Night another two times as we dropped. Only when we were a mere count of two from the ground did I allow her wings to form again, and our descent to slow as I impacted her back from the gathered momentum and she swivelled down and forward a bit before stabilizing. We were a mere six feet above the ground, and in the hallway in front of us what looked like a raiding party of fae were fast approaching. Best to finish this before they got close.

I laid a hand on the Night leash and poured further power into it, turning rope to flame, and with a twist of will sent it to eagerly devour the fae’s throat. The neck turned to ash in an instant, the head plopping down unmoored and the wings winking out. The corpse dropped below and as the Mantle of Woe fluttered around me I adjusted my fall, landing on my feet a heartbeat after the corpse did – the head hit the ground a moment later with a wet sound, rolling half a foot towards me by happenstance. I brought to a halt with my boot, taking a last inhale of wakeleaf before all that was left was ash, and with my foot angled the fae's head so that I could empty my pipe into the silently screaming mouth.

I put it away after, smoothed my cloak and turned a winning smile into the incoming fairies even as the Fallen Monk and the Exalted Poet emerged from the stairs to my right.

I blew out the smoke, let it wreath my face as the fae emerged from the shadows of the hall.

"Good evening," I said. "I can't help but notice you've taken something of a wrong turn. Do you need some help in finding the way out?"

I'll take that as a no, I decided as a raging thunderstorm erupted in answer.

Anomandris

Roland's such a bro....

Blessed Artificer is foolish to keep pushing Cat. And, seriously, if she had concerns about Masego's research, why didn't she bring them to a higher ranking Hero?

Bard is using the Fae. How interesting. And depressing. I wonder what she's told them to get them to move against the Arsenal.

Thunderstorms could be either Spring or Autumn, but the description referencing bare branches makes me think Autumn is more likely.

The unified Winter/Summer Fae are unlikely, but remain possible. Their existence and creation could also be related to how Bard motivated these Fae to attack the Arsenal.

Javvies

The hell wordpress?

This was supposed to be stand alone.

Liliet

Quartered Seasons, from what we've heard of them so far, clearly involve fae power in some way. And fae seem to be going straight for that.

AceOfSword

It has to be autumn, the Hunted Magicians was running from the autumn court. The Bard didn't choose to use the fae randomly, she choose them because she could use the story.

caoimhinh

To be fair, there were wind, lightning, and storm titled Fae in both Winter and Summer, remember?

Cat got her position on the Winter Court by killing the Duke of Violent Squalls, while soon afterward she fought lightning-throwing Fae from Summer.

My bet is them being from the Unified Court, but originally from Autumn since the Hunted Magician has a debt to one of their Princes. They might be using the "coming to collect" Story as an excuse to launch their attack.

Of course, since Quartered Seasons takes up from Arcadia as one of the "Realms of Power", it might have attracted the whole Arcadian upper echelon's attention. That is potentially a weapon to kill immortal and gods, so the Fae might understandably be wary of it and Hierophant.

IDKWhoitis

Betrayal requires trust. And I'm scared of all this trust Cat is investing in Roland. I'd like to believe he would be an unwitting pawn, but we never got to know the guy...

I hope I'm just paranoid.

Sean

You notice that Roland switched his name for the sword to Severence, with Artificer calling it Severity? I wonder if that's a subconscious division for Villains and Heroes and Roland has "switched sides" with a potential for other betrayal motives there.

Bevan

Oh god this comment made me realize by story logic he would be the traitor, I really hope not that'd be unfortunate

Daemion

Badass move, Cat. That's exactly the style a ranking villain should have.

Decius

The banter is starting to get dangerously monology.

Liliet

Nah, it's still sufficiently short to pass as one-liners.

Also, Cat is fairly drunk, which I'm sure gives some leeway there~

Oh, by the gods. I had forgotten about that, that she's viewing the world around her through a slight haze. that makes everything several times better.

Even with night keeping her knee together I guess that was too much to ask for...

She did however do it all with a dragonbone pipe in her mouth, which is a significant bonus multiplier. And knocking out the ashes into the mouth of the decapitated head of your enemy was worth a truck load of cool points.

dadycoool

Cat knows the best ways to make an entrance. The perfect blend of sinister and badass, with a massive serving of Suave to finish it off. All while playing 5-D chess with Creation itself, using pieces that she knows will turn on her at the worst possible time.

erebus42

Theres nothing quite like a good entrance.
I find myself liking the Monk more and more.

boballab

Especially when dealing with the Fae, screw their story up and all that power is worthless.

KageLupus

This is going to be one of those stories about Cat that are so ridiculous everyone is going to assume it is made up. Like that time she dropped a lake on an army and drowned thousands of soldiers in minutes.

"I hear she once rode a Faerie into battle against other Faeries. And not that spooky horse either, an actual person. Faerie. Whatever."

"You are drunk and there is no way that is true."

Cat still has style right? And i hope the “newbies” (as in don’t know Cat) saw all of that because it was awesome!!!!

Mmmmm i hope this isn’t something where the traitor is the one whose betrayal hurts the most emotionally (i mean Roland if it wasn’t clear) because i am honestly drawing a blank as to who it could be, we know too little about the 2 guys and BA is too obvious (wich might just be me overhtinking it...just as the author/bard planned, maye).

And mmm BA naming the sword different could e a clue...or just something related to her name? like a part of it that lets her determine the ailities and properties of the artefact more easily? or maye she just thought the original name was lame xD

Darkening

There was mention during Masego’s perspective that the name was still up for debate among the people working on it. Severance because it cuts things, or Severity because... saint of swords.

Liliet

In addition to what Darkening said: Roland used the name Masego preferred, while Adanna used the name Roland preferred :3

Cicero

Blessed Artificer is acting like someone duped into a scheme, not a willing and knowing co-conspirator.

Mental Mouse

And of course the choice of name will have narrative effects...

Soronel Haetir

I was hoping it was going to be Larat that showed up.

Oshi

Larat is unbound and not Fae anymore. That was the whole point of his gambit. He’ll be a whole new world of nasty.

Soronel Haetir

Un-bbound I agree with but I somehow missed the not-Fae bit.

dadycoool

No, he's still Fae. He's simply learned from his Queen how to properly wield the Stories that act as chains. Personally, I'm waiting for Cat's new Name to have the Aspect Hunt, at which point Larat and his party will return with something like "Good to be back. Wanna see our new tricks?"

Zggt

I'm still kinda figuring Cat is going to be the Rogue Queen, take the place of the legendary Callow who solves riddles by stabbing people (for the good of Callow, of course). At its core is a name that fits her very well. She gave up her crown and is setting up Callow to rule itself without her, which would effectively make her a queen without a nation. Catherine will still be a queen due to the massive armies, powerful connections, the ability to change the actions of entire nations, and her repeated stabbing and/or burning of important things). She generally handles diplomacy in what can kindly be thought of as roguish rather than noble manner. And most of all, I don't think Rogue Queen is by definition a Heroic name.

There's a philosophical idea calling modern day humans Homo-Narrativus; we recontextualize our lives according to our internal monologue. In this case, there's a case that Cat has been the Rogue Queen in all but Name for a long time now.

Despite the name, she has been forging herself into her new role for years now, and the dramatic reveal will turn a sure defeat into victory at some point. Perhaps Catherine has been preparing that as a weapon of last resort, one surefire victory. And perhaps this is the Bard's play, making sure that there will be no way out for her as she takes down the Dead King, pushing her into "noble sacrifice" territory (because she knows Cat would if it came to that).

WealthyAardvark

Larat and the rest of the Wild Hunt are no longer Fae. What they are hasn't been studied or named yet as far as we know, but they're no longer Fae.

Larat held not a speck of power within him. And fae, Masego had once told me, were little more than power made flesh and shaped by stories. The inevitable conclusion of that sent a shiver up my spine.

"Do you even know," I softly asked, "what you've become?"

"Something... unprecedented," he said, smile broadening.

Next one is going to be "Sinkers." Which means either Cat is going to find out what this trap looks like with her face in it, or she's going to trigger something and get to punch the Bard.

I like how we got to see the petty naming conflict. It just grounds the story.

Javvies

Blessed Artificer is foolish to keep pushing Cat. And, seriously, if she had concerns about Masego's research, why didn't she bring them to a higher ranking Hero?

Bard is using the Fae. How interesting. And depressing. I wonder what she's told them to get them to move against the Arsenal. Thunderstorms could be either Spring or Autumn, but the description referencing bare branches makes me think Autumn is more likely.

The unified Winter/Summer Fae are unlikely, but remain possible. Their existence and creation could also be related to how Bard motivated these Fae to attack the Arsenal.

Liliet

> And, seriously, if she had concerns about Masego's research, why didn't she bring them to a higher ranking Hero?

Because heroes don't have a ranking, and the more influential ones have clearly been bamboozled by the wicked Black Queen's minions. Obviously.

Javvies

I meant higher ranking in the organization of the Grand Alliance and the organization and enforcement structure of the Truce and Terms.

Y'know, the things that are responsible for the very existence of the Arsenal and funding Masego's research.

Or, to put it another way, someone with a higher security clearance, or someone empowered to arbitrate Truce and Terms disputes.

She basically fucked up big time with how she handled her suspicions of Masego's research.

Liliet

No, agreed, I just can say that I understand exactly why.

RoflCat

Because as much as she respects Hanno, he is likely to take Cath's side (and he should be part of the know about the project)

So when that happen, when a respected Hero take a villain side, what do other Heroes do?

1. Assume they're being misled
2. CLEARLY the villain have them corrupted and under influence and thus can't be trusted (see: Pilgrim after the Twilight event)
3. I CAN HANDLE THIS ALONE

Javvies

We know that Hanno is almost certainly aware, to some extent, of Quartered Seasons.

Blessed Artificer doesn't know that. Alerting Hanno to this secret Evil project could be just what's needed to free him of the Black Queen's influence, or start the process. Or maybe if he does know about it, he knows more about it than Blessed Artificer does and can give her answers about it.

Or, she could go talk to Roland, the Rogue Sorcerer – he's the top Hero in the Arsenal, and if Heirophant is keeping this project a secret from him, that's grounds for a Truce and Terms and Grand Alliance sanctioned inquiry into this secret project and Heirophant. Alternatively, the Rogue Sorcerer is aware of the project and can tell her about it.

For that matter, Blessed Artificer is assuming that Heirophant's secret project is Evil and needs to be stopped on the basis that she doesn't know about it and he's keeping it a secret from the rest of the Arsenal.

Oathkeeper32

Night lasso...

Yippie ki yay motherfucker!

Mental Mouse

The two top heroes are both in Cat's orbit, as are several of the upcoming B-rankers.

Miles

Because the Bard mentioned something to the BA to make her think any communication to Hanno is going to get intercepted or is for some other reason a bad idea?

oracleindex

Welp, Roland is the traitor. Only thing that makes sense, story-wise.

Liliet

Not necessarily!

KageLupus

I don't see it. Roland is coming up on honorary Woe status at this point, or at the very least one of the inner circle of non-Woe. He has fought side-by-side with Cat and knows that she really is trying to make things better. He has worked side-by-side with Masego enough to know that even if he is digging into something dangerous it is almost definitely a weapon against the Dead King. And at this point he should have been part of enough conversations to know that if the Wandering Bard makes him a deal it is for her own ends and not the good of everyone.

Turning a trusted ally is going to be hard, both because of that trust and because it is such a cliché. Much easier to have someone like the Concoter setup a smuggling operation in a roundabout way, or the Panted Blade get word from some other Hero to disrupt things for Heroic Reasons.

using the argument that its a cliché, is not exactly great when it comes to the guide verse though :3 it being a cliché is, exactly why its even more likely 😊 though ofc cat has learned to navigate stories in such a way that we are still surprised despite tropes and clichés being the standard, so i think you right that it wont be him of it is, there will be something to it we didn't see coming :3

Liliet

Cat be like "hey Roland would you mind being traitor bait again?"
And Roland be like "geez okay"
Love them ♥

Mental Mouse

Which will retroactively get funnier if he is in fact the "traitor".

Liliet

'funnier' is not how i'll describe that

Letouriste

Well, that's a way to make an entrance for sure

Burlyraven

Man, that scene only gets better when you realize Cat's still in her royal-casual outfit.

Also, the casual idea drop of the Fallen Monk potentially becoming a religious leader with the House Insurgent is somewhat disturbing and awesome, because his motivations actually seem to line up with Callowan ideals. Kinda hoping he's not the traitor or hiding the type of darker appetites religious individuals can be linked to in our world.

Liliet

Oh yes, it's pretty important to remember Cat's still wearing the royal pajamas!

And is also still drunk.

(And the 'darker appetites' seem to be more along the lines of what he turned on the Holies for)

OfScience

Yeah, force-feeding someone to death seems like very pointed commentary on gluttony to me. His comment about punishing them for calling themselves holy only reinforces it.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Maybe with their combined powers they can resurrect Tankred, or Scorchio as panchoAdrenalina has dubbed him.

Burlyraven

I still haven't given up hope on that boy, but considering the story that theoretically would revive him would largely be decided by Cat's emotions at the time she starts it... let's just say I bite my nails a little every time she displays a negative emotion.

Mental Mouse

The bigger problem is that he didn't earn a resurrection nohow. Killed in his bed (and raised as a revenant) by a sneak attack, before accomplishing anything more than killing a town to save its neighbors? Nope, that's not a winning story.

Burlyraven

Back when I started meming about the idea, he had most of the markers of a shounen protagonist, but even those have fallen off, so at this point basically his only story is as Cat's monster. Maybe if she waits until the war is over he could have a second chance, but that's an even weaker story than what's happening now.

Dread Emperor Ridiculous

Pog.

Also, I keep seeing allusions to Cat's meeting with the Duke of Violent Squalls.

Catherine is badass crystalized. For a moment there I thought she was gonna Take the Baron's wings .

What an entrance...

That I think was the best entrance this book has had, bar none.

Shveiran

I refer you to her striking a match at the Princes' Graveyard.

panchoAdrenalina

the dead king killing scorchio had a bigger effect. is like "you motherfur!"

Isi Arnott-Campbell

"Scorchio"

I love it.

Agent J

Black rode in on an undead suicide stallion. This Fae didn't even explode.

Noldo

I think that the connection between Autumn court and Hunted Magister is too obvious and Hunted Magister is unknowing pawn in the game. He is the bait used by Bard (or Bard's associate) to lure fae to storm the place as a tool of opportunity (I wonder how much Bard is hating that she has to spend that asset for this plot due to Catherine's earlier actions).

So in that structure fae would be a mere distraction meant to keep Catherine busy.

I wonder whether the revelation of Masego's project to the band of five could have played a critical role here. Could we see the traitor trying to make a move towards the project because it was revealed by Blessed Artificer? That would naturally require that either Poet or the Monk would be the traitor and so far neither really fits.

Cicero

The Monk seems most likely. He's a former hero, turned villain because... because he went vigilante? That seems strange. No one objected when the Sword Saint went vigilante. Out of all the characters he's probably the one most open to a "for the greater good" argument from the Bard if she pitches it right.

Magicturtle

What i dont understand is why is the bard against cat in the first place. I know the truce/terms might be dangerous for her but it seems almost imposible to disrupt them when cat is such a high-level schemer, with super strong backing. Seems more useful to use cat to clean up DK. It only makes sense if the truce terms is something that might kill her, as she is making it easier for DK to win.

Javvies

Bard has been against Cat since Cat was the Squire. Or her actions and statements certainly imply as much.

Her explanation to William the Lone Swordsman was that Cat represented the success and heir to a new tradition of pragmatic Evil – one that could actually win. And that's why Cat the Squire was "worse" than Heiress.

Admittedly, the reliability of those statements as regards Bard's true perspective and motivations is very much in question.

Let's also remember that Bard stopped two Elves from taking out Akua while she was still toeing the line as Governor of Liesse. This was before the Fae showed up.

For that matter, we still don't actually know why the Fae invaded Callow in the first place. IIRC, it was implied that Winter followed Summer's lead into Callow, and then Winter King was able to take advantage of the opportunities posed by non Fae in breaking the status quo, but it was never truly clarified as to why the Fae started entering Callow in the first place. Bard could have meddled there as well. We don't know.

We know very little definitively about Bard, one thing we do know is that damned near everything about her is a mystery wrapped in an enigma made up of puzzles covered in lies.

> [I]t was never truly clarified as to why the Fae started entering Callow in the first place. Bard could have meddled there as well. We don't know.

We do know that the Winter King wasn't supposed to think that way in the first place, as Cat mentioned to Malicia it was scaring the other fae. You're definitely onto something, as both his behaviour and Larat's calling together the Hunt during a season it wasn't supposed to emerge are suspicious, especially from the timing.

Now I'm wondering whether the King's suicide by marriage is related to Bard's desire to escape her own purpose, and his position as an equal to the Queen is reflective of the arrangement that the Accords are leading to, if the Sage was right about the resulting Role.

Morgenstern

Summer invaded because Akua hunted them for her Liesse project, as I understood it. Winter then mirrored them and the Winter King used that opportunity for his very own play, which had nothing to do with either.

Now, why the Wandering Bard stopped the Elves ... that seems the most interesting question from my viewpoint so far.

Morgenstern

The momentary Winter King's and his most-often replacement Larat's (being Prince at this time) new thinking was at least implied to stem from Arcadia mirroring Creation = aka, being created by what Maddie and Co. started with their long-term streak of rational-practical Evil. It seems to have infused the Fae with new ideas they weren't meant to get.

Javvies

Nope.

Akua only started grabbing Fae after Summer invaded. Remember, plan (A) was the Angel corpse, plan (B) was grabbing a dozen Deoraithe of the Watch and using them to tap the power source empowering their abilities. And Plan B was working just fine from Akua's standpoint. Using the Fae started because they're pure power, which made using a noble as a sacrifice a lot more efficient than anything else.

Daniel E

I'm still not buying that Bard is legitimately taking a swing at Catherine. Yes Cat flies the banner of Below, but she's not evil in the traditional sense. Really more of an anti-hero, and I don't think that will upset the balance.

Gamer7956

That's the entire problem – she's an antihero at best, and a well intentioned extremist at worst. She's not a clear cut hero or villain. Her very existence means that the very shape of stories that occur on Calernia may soon shift dramatically. The Intercessor has spent millenia learning how to manipulate stories to get exactly the effects she wants – and we know it was a learned skill due to her screwing up with the role of Hierarch. Cat is the catalyst to thousands of years of experience being rendered useless – of course she wants to get rid of her.

To the Intercessor, the Dead King is an enemy she'll be able to beat eventually, as she has no way to truly lose. Cat poses the possibility of a significant – if not final – defeat.

Ah, thank for the tip. I assumes any/all html would be not printed (or mangled)...nice to know wordpress has a way around that.

WordPress allows for an HTML subset; B</bIUS stylings (but not, alas, super/subscript), HTML entities, selected embedding-related tags, probably more formatting stuff too.

And naturally I blew the tags.

Mammon

The Black Queen is a Villain, we must stop her!

Why?

She talked to some Villains and bad fae before and defeated a Villain who turned an entire city of hers into a wight-infested floating fortress but didn't do it in the name of Above!

We shall henceforth call her the Arch-Heretic

The Fallen Monk is okay though.

Why? Didn't he force-feed several priests until their stomachs burst open as an extremely painful and gruesome way of murdering them?

Yeah, but he did it because they call themselves holy which is sacrilegious and by choosing to be part of this organisation that doesn't give them the choice of title or the opportunity to join a different healing cleric organisation in their country due to monopoly, meaning that it's okay outside of Procer.

I see, makes sense.

Morgenstern

Whoever said the heroes are ok with the Fallen Monk turning Villain? It seems to me to have been highly implied and in places kinda been spoken out aloud that the heroes all around were/are very much NOT amused by that, but hate his guts more than Villains that were Villains from the start...?

Morgenstern

... more than the guts of Villains that... (wordpress, when will you finally "invent" being able to correct posts..)

WealthyAardvark

Literally last chapter:

The Fallen Monk was one of Indrani's band, and one of the villains on our rolls that heroes tended to react the most violent to. That was not because his sins were so great compared to the rest of Below's lot, but because once upon a time he'd instead been known as the Merry Monk.

Mammon

That was a jab at how the Poet seemed to be okay enough with the Monk's reasons because haha Procer sucks to everyone but Procer, the kind of windfall even half-hearted and as a joke like this that Cat has never received from Heroes before ever.

Agent J

We met him while he was engaged in what can only be described as an honour duel against a Levantine Hero. We learn in this very chapter that he had to flee Procer like a sick gazelle lest the Saint of Swords sinks her fangs into him.

Where are you getting the notion that heroes are in any way okay with him?

Mammon

Two comments that took my highly sarcastic comment serious? Have people spontaneously forgotten the difference between a clearly non-serious joke and genuine comments? How can you guys even see a serious comment in my initial post at all? Baffling.

Ultimate_Procrastinator

Ah, someone has never heard of Poe's Law

Hellarion Angelus

Am i the only one who keeps thinking that the Blessed Artificer getting interrupted each and every time she tries to bring that subject up is suspicious? I mean, it has the feel of the story thread 'advice/piece of information from an unlikely source' that Cat went to the doddering sage to get in the first place, meaning it can no longer function as that. Also there is the personal flaw cat got about the underserving arrogance from the heroes that keeps tripping up, and she is starting to take more and more mannerism from the black knight.

Javvies

We know that Hanno is almost certainly aware, to some extent, of Quartered Seasons.

Javvies

... dammit wordpress.
Replied to the wrong post somehow.

Mental Mouse

Cat is running into the limits of secrecy here. She is trying to maintain the project as the equivalent of Top Secret, in a world where that’s not really a thing, and so she gets to enforce it personally.

Kel the Seer

Do we have a pool going for Cat’s new name? I think that the Errant Queen is fitting. Errant both in the sense of “travelling while seeking adventure” (when was the last time she got to sleep in her own place?) and in the sense of “strays from the proper course” for her penchant to derail stories.

Someperson

Uh. After Cat stole an entire court and then fed it to some Crows, I would never bet on some Fae in a fight against Cat. She’s practically made of stories about their demise. Considering the Bard isn’t an idiot, that means this is a distraction. Probably a dangerous enough distraction that ignoring it would be disastrous, but still ultimately a distraction.

Someperson

Also, I’m guessing part of the Fae’s purpose is to be a wager. Storywise, there has to be symmetry. If Bard wins, the Terms and Truce are unmade, so Cat has to get something if she wins. In this case, what she probably gains is everything needed to move forwards with her Quartered Seasons plan, whatever that entails.

Onos

Possible minor inconsistency – an earlier chapter has Cat muse about the Arsenal being carved from a mountain of the Twilight Ways, but here it's said to be stolen from Arcadia proper.

Chapter 22: Sinker

"Know mercy for what it is: the plea of the ant to the boot."
– Queen Elizabeth Alban of Callow

They were a lovely sight, in that terribly foreign way that was the mark of the fae.

Seven of the Fair Folk attacked under cover a rain and thunder, each of them some painter's wild dream made into flesh. The vanguard came as a matching pair, swift in their stride and a pleasure for the eye to behold: their skin like honey and their eyes a pale grey, they wore cuirasses and vambraces of copper so perfectly burnished they looked like the surface of a still pond. Beneath those a long robe ending in skirts had been woven of dead grass in grey and yellow, the colours perfectly matching those of their long and flowing hair. Each bore a single long blade, fashioned whole from what seemed like a single strand of dead grass – the straight edges of the blades crooned as they touched the winds, though, as if they were so keen even the storm was cut by their touch. They were titled, both of them. I could feel it. Yet they were not among the greats of whatever Court had sent them, servants of higher powers.

One such power stood behind them. Towering in height but slender in his build, the fae was a splendid sight: an armoured and tunic of woven brass and bright-red flame, glittering with rubies, went down to his thighs, loose and long-sleeved. Below, long skirts that were a netting of gold filled with brass yet as supple as cloth swung over black-skinned bare feet. What little skin was left bare by the slender helm of brass and smouldering charcoal, its long cheek guards of carved red opal going down to a round collar of gold touched with flickering embers, was just as dark in tone. As if the two burning red eyes set in the elegant face had charred the fae entirely, I thought. In his right hand was held a rounded kite shield, woven together from frozen bright-red fire, while in his left he held a bastard sword hilted in gold and ruby but whose blade was pitch-black and smouldering.

I caught sight of the last four, before the storm swept over me, but only glimpses. A tall woman bearing a great antlered helm, or perhaps antlers, face painted with streaks of blood-red and bonewhite as she wielded a spear of twisted bone. A small figure, almost childlike, trailing long strands of straw like a dress or a cape and whisper-swift on its feet. A calm-faced man wearing a strangely nostalgic smile, sprouts of green twisting around him like a bandolier and a quiver. And behind them all, an amber-eyed woman with a sizzling grin, messy hair swept around by the wind as lightning crackled up her frame and she guided the storm. That one was the most powerful among them, I sensed, and if she was not at least a Duchess I would eat my own hand. There was no time to consider that in depth, though, for the wind and rain and lightning hit me like someone had thrown a damned wall at me.

I took half a step back, cursing, and had to shift my weight so I wouldn't be outright blown off. My mantle flapped like a banner behind me, and I dragged my crown down on my brow so it wouldn't fly off. This wouldn't do, I couldn't see a bloody thing in this wind and rain and –

"Bordel de merde," I swore in Chantant, throwing myself to the side even as lightning struck.

It still singed the edge of my face, and I grimaced at the burning of my skin. My hair might well have caught fire, if not for the rain. I rolled up into a kneel and drew deep of the Night as I brought up my staff, only to smash it down on the stone. The thing with Night was that, for all its wondrous flexibility, it tended to fare pretty badly in straight-up fights against other powers. Light most of all, but sorcery tended to come out on top as well and I suspected that the work of the fae would behave just the same. Night was the power of a thief, not a soldier, and always shone best when there was no struggle to be had. Which was why even though these days I probably had as much raw might to throw around as my current opponent, if not more, I did not try to unmake the storm. Instead a bursting bubble of darkness spreading out created an oasis of calm within it before fading but leaving the boundary maintained. I rose gingerly to my feet.

"Come now," I said. "If I know a single thing about the likes of you lot, it's that you literally cannot refuse an invitation like this. Don't be so coy, my lords and ladies."

A rich chuckle answered me as the dark-skinned fae that wore flame like cloth strode out of the storm in front of me, bare feet not even a whisper against the stone. His sword stayed pointing at the ground, his shield loose in his grip.

"It is my honour to make your acquaintance, Queen of Lost and Found," the burning-eyed fae said. "Your cavalier grave-robbing of Winter is legend among our kind."

Distraction, I mused. He might as well have it carved into his forehead – which meant the twins were either about to flank me or already using the storm as cover to burst out and make a run at Masego's quarters. If it was the latter, I could only trust in the ability of Roland and the Blessed Artificer.

"And who is it that I speak to?" I replied, clicking my tongue. "What Court boasts such poor manners?"

Dead grass, fire, harvest, hunt and storms. Though the spread of those displayed dominions was not small, it did bring a season to my mind over others. Best to have it confirmed by fae tongue, though.

"Manifold apologies, Your Majesty," the fae bowed. "I am the Count of Ravenous Flame, presently at your service and ever to that of my master, the Prince of Falling Leaves."

Fuck, I thought. So they really were here to prove the Hunted Magician's epithet was well-deserved. Yet beneath the dismay there was something like triumph: Masego, that glorious bastard, had been right once again. Somewhere out there the ruling mantle of the Court of Autumn still existed. There was evidently a lot more power left to it than we'd believed, if there were enough nobles left to call on to assault the Arsenal, but the principle of Quartered Seasons had been sound all long even if we'd been unable to prove it.

"You've given me a greater gift than you know, Count," I grinned. "So I give you this in return: if you flee now, I will not pursue."

To my surprise, the nobleman bowed.

"Your capricious arrogance was everything I hoped it would be," the Count of Ravenous Flame replied, "count no debt here, Queen of Lost and Found, for anything I might have gifted by happenstance has been repaid twice over."

The moment he began talking I knew where this was headed: as the Count spoke the last word of his superficially friendly answer, I took a sudden step back and avoided getting skewered by two crooning blades as they thrust where I had been standing a heartbeat before. By the height, the blows would have slid between two of my ribs and punctured my throat. I was almost admiring: fae were rarely so precise in their attempted murder, or so flawlessly synchronized. I was not, however, so admiring that I did not immediately punish that predictable flair for the theatrical: the rightmost of twin fae in copper and grass was smashed in the back of the head by my staff, which sent it stumbling into the other's way. They both spun away towards the Count, smooth in their recovery, so I tossed a handful of blackflame at the left one's grass skirts and watched the flame take with some satisfaction. It cut away the grass-cloth before the burn could spread, but by then I was gathering Night and our little skirmish had borne more pressing developments. The Count of Ravenous Flame entered the fray.

"A spark, a birth," the Count sang, his voice soothing like the warm crackling of bonfires.

As he strode forward, he trailed sparks. I would have interrupted whatever it was he was doing but the rightmost twin kept me busy: its wings burst to life in a flicker and it used a beating of them to help itself into a backwards leap that would have led it behind me, blade at the ready, if I'd not traced a trail of blackflame in the path. The wings beat again, ending the leap, but by then I'd positioned my staff under it and let loose with a concentrated burst of Night. I caught only its shoulder, but that much I tore right through. The fae screamed in pain, but by then then Count of Ravenous Flame had gotten just enough time to proceed unimpeded.

"A hunger, a swell," the Count sang, voice gone the way of the blaze. "I command you, dimming fire, herald of plenty to lack: devour all you behold, ravenously."

The sparks had strengthened, turned to flame, and been swept up in the thunderstorm around us. Only instead of being put out by the rain the fire had spread, as if the very wind was oil, and a howling blaze surrounded us even as the ember-eyed Count of Autumn laughed.

"Perish," he told me, "so thoroughly that naught of you is left to be lost or found."

Damn, I thought, reluctantly impressed. That was a pretty good line to kill me on, if he could pull it off. Already Night was coursing through my veins and as the Count of Ravenous Flame raised his black blade high, heat and fire swirling around it as he commanded the blazing storm, I began shaping my answer.

"The hand in greed can only clutch sand,
Even exquisite passion, the lover's brand
Is a vainglorious army headed for rout:
Ardour fall spent, the flame gutters out."

The verse was spoken in Chantant, barely more than a whisper against the roar of the blaze, and yet it slithered through the burning storm like snake. I knew the voice that'd recited it, that deep and resonant tone that was decadently pleasing to the ear, and the sorcery it was laced with ate at the gathered fires like spreading rot. Even as the Count of Ravenous Flame fought to keep hold of it, the Exalted Poet's verse tore at his work like some divine candle snuffer. An opening, I thought with a wolf's smile, and abandoned the spinning threads I'd been about to shape Night into in favour of something with a little more bite. When the twin fae came for me this time, wielding their blades of grass, I was ready for them and without a distraction to handle.

One came high, leap aided by wings as its blade whistled down towards my skull, while the other came low: knees bending low beyond what a human body would have allowed, its sword whipped out aiming for the femoral artery on my left leg. It was a close thing, spinning my staff so that the lower part went up and swatted aside the strike about to cut into my skull while the upper part going down nudged the other blow to pass harmlessly between my legs, but worth the risks: with the two fae over-extended in their strikes, neither of them were able to avoid my reply. Two small tendrils of Night sprang out of my staff, shooting out and puncturing the skin of the fae near the throat. The moment they did I dumped all the power I'd gathered, in just the right way, and I got maybe two heartbeats before the fae managed to retreat far enough the tendrils broke.

"You may consider this end," I told them, "courtesy of Mighty Urulan, once of Great Lotow."

I'd never seen anyone melt from the inside before, but considering the sheer amount of acid I'd pumped into their veins it was no surprise that within moment the two fae were bleeding, broken corpses-to-be falling apart as they tried to crawl away. As I'd thought, that was a particularly nasty trick to be on the receiving end of when your body wasn't entirely made up of smoke and mirrors.

"Dieux du ciel," the Fallen Monk hoarsely said, sounding sickened.

The Exalted Poet's trick – had that been an aspect or was he potentially more useful than I'd thought? – had killed the flame and the storm with it, restoring a broader line of sight to me. The Fallen Monk, looking more than a little singed and bleeding from messy wounds on his shoulder and belly, threw a wineskin into the path of a sapling-green arrow loosed by the fae adorned in vines I'd glimpsed earlier. The arrow sprouted wild growth as red wine sloshed all over the ground, a young tree falling on the stone and spasming a few times before it began to swiftly wither. That explained the messy wounds, I thought. The Monk had been quick enough to rip the arrows out before that could happen inside his body. Good on him, Named or not those roots would have shredded muscles. The Exalted Poet himself was bruised and battered, but there was a reason he'd been able to ply his tricks: he was currently without an opponent.

Given the lack of corpses and two missing fae – the childlike one wearing straw and the antlered huntress in blood and bone – I'd bet that they had casually slapped him down before making a run upwards. The telltale noises of battle sorcery being used further up good as confirmed it, Roland seemingly making a gallant effort of swatting the fae back down. The real threat, though, was the fae still in the back. The grinning one with the amber eyes, who'd opened the games by casually throwing an entire storm at us. She still there, grin broader than ever as she watched us struggle. You're the most powerful of this pack, I thought, so you have to be at least a Duchess. A Count would not defer to her otherwise. So why was I finding these opponents so... lacking? Perhaps it was simply that I was no longer a squire or a bastard duchess of my own, and that I'd faced greater monsters since, but I'd just ridden a Baron of Autumn down a drop and killed him without much effort.

Something was wrong here.

Boots squelching wetly as I walked through the dissolved remains of the twin fae, I rolled my shoulder to limber it.

"Poet," I said, "help the Monk. I'll be handling our friend the Count, and the kind lady out back if she'd care to introduce herself?"

A lie, I did not intend to have them fight any of these three right now if I could avoid it, but it was a useful lie so long as the grinning fae heard it.

"You presume much, mortal," the Count of Ravenous Flame chided me.

His long blade rose, and his shield rose with it. I flicked a glance at the Exalted Poet and got a nod confirming he'd heard. Good, I could put most of my attention on the last two then.

"Where's all that sweet queen talk gone, Count?" I grinned. "Still, if you keep talking for your lady I'll have to assume she's a mute – or that you have the right to choose her words for her."

The Count seemed to shrink on himself at that. Fear, I judged. That'd been hard, blood-curling fear at even the possibility that the fae behind him might take offence to his behaviour. That went some way in confirming the pecking order, at least. The Prince of Falling Leaves might be his ultimate master, but where there was a captain there was a lieutenant.

"My dear Aedon is guilty of only eagerness to serve me," the amber-eyed fae laughed. "But your point is taken, Queen of Lost and Found. You stand before the Duchess of Rash Tempest."

"Delightful name," I smiled, all pretty and friendly with just a little too much teeth. "Would you mind ordering your servants to cease attempting to murder mine as long as we are talking? It's most uncivilized."

"Alas, oath was given," the Duchess shrugged. "I cannot recall those I have sent."

"But our green-clad friend here..." I suggested, gesturing towards the fae archer facing the Poet and the Monk.

"That boon I can deliver," the Duchess of Rash Tempest grinned, "for a price."

Ah, and now we came to the bargaining. If I could keep her talking, and the two fae with her down here with us, then I might be able to send my own two companions upwards to help Roland and the Artificer before all of us came down to tangle with these three together. The key to keeping control of this would be offering terms before she could make demands, since letting fae pick their careful words was a good way to get stabbed by them.

"I'll offer you the last words of a king," I said, "and the dream of a hard-fought defeat, not a decade old."

The Duchess went still. Yeah, I've dealt with your kind before, I thought with grim amusement as something like greed seized those amber eyes. I know what your lot is hungry for.

"A generous offer," the Duchess of Rash Tempest said, "perhaps too generous."

So she wanted to avoid being in my debt if I was judged to have overpaid, huh. Fair enough.

"I would consider us even, given the might of your servants and the feebleness of mine," I replied.

I heard the Fallen Monk let out a snort of laughter, and the Exalted Poet an indignant yelp – though he took an arrow in the thigh not long after, and I was interested to see he produced a strip of parchment as he sang a verse in what I thought might be Ceseo. Though the sprout-arrow savaged his flesh, by the time the verse had been fully recited it had turned to dust and the Poet's flesh was healed, if heavily scarred.

"Then by these terms I strike bargain with you, Queen of Lost and Found," the Duchess of Rash Tempest said.

"Bargain struck," I agreed. "You two, hurry up and help the Rogue and the Artificer with-"

There was a blinding flash of light, or perhaps Light, and something like a massive thudnerstrike sounded, followed by an inhuman scream.

"That," I completed. "Help them with that."

"At your service, mistress," the Fallen Monk said, sounding deeply amused.

"Are you certain you would not like me to remain and record-" the Poet began, then I turned a dark look onto him, "- your wisdom touches me, Black Queen, and so I promptly heed it."

They moved, and for now I put them out of my mind.

"Amusing," the Duchess of Rash Tempest said. "Yet you tarry in fulfilling our bargain."

"I would never," I smiled, then added in Crepuscular, "My crown I abdicate, and let the worthiest of you bear it."

Larat had been king for a moment, after all, even if his first and last decree had been one of abdication.

"I do not know this tongue," the Duchess hissed.

"Then you should have bargained more precisely," I chided her. "But perhaps this will be more to your taste?"

I wove a bubble of Night carefully, using strands of the vision Sve Noc had given of the battle between the Dead King and Vesena Spear-Biter's sigil, and blew it towards her. I had no intention whatsoever of giving her any of my memories, even if she might have taken that from the sentence. Disappointment flickered, but hunger won over it soon enough. The Duchess of Rash Tempest's lips opened in a sigh, as the bubble landed on her palm, and she laid delicate fingers against the Night.

The bubble popped.

I'd offered her the dream, not the right to see it, and if she had been unable to keep that dream once given that was hardly my fault, was it? The Duchess turned her amber eyes to me, her face gone frozen with hate.

"What a clever creature you are," she said.

"Nah," I denied, "you're just not as good as this as you think you are."

"Neither are you, I'm afraid," the Duchess replied.

The bowstring twanged and a green arrow whistled as it was loosed at me and I was forced to hastily duck out of the way. Ah, true. While I'd bargained for her servants to stop fighting mine we'd never said anything about them fighting me. The Count of Ravenous Flame sprung forward, bare feet unseemly quick as his eldritch sword and board came barrelling towards me.

"Hey, Duchess," I grinned, even as I gathered Night. "Wanna make a bet?"

"Why would I, when you've proved such a feckless debtor?" the amber-eyed fae replied.

The Count was on me before I could answer, sword down and pointing towards me as his shield crackled with the sound of flame. At the last moment he shifted his footing a step and a half to the right, revealing the green arrow whose whistle the crackling had been meant to hide, and clove at my side. I swallowed a curse, for it'd been clever work, but with my free hand caught the edge of the Mantle of Woe and swept it around me. It caught the arrow, but my hasty attempt to push back the cleave with a strike of my staff had me on the losing side. I was thrown back two paces, rolling only to rise into another arrow, perfectly aimed at my throat. A lash of Night erupted from my hand to torch it, but once more the Count of Ravenous Flame smashed into me from the side. A staff was not a sword, with a guard and a proper grip, so even though I caught the blow again the strength of it had the Count's blade sliding down and biting into the flesh of my hand. I half lost a finger there and felt something unpleasant slithering into my blood from the wound.

"Back," I snarled, and Night flooded my veins.

It purged the poison, feeling like ice coursing through me. I struck my staff against the ground, Night billowing out like a wave, and the arrow loosed at me was swept aside even as the Count of Ravenous Flame retreated out of range with a wing-aided leap backwards. I forced calm onto myself, even as blood dripped down my knuckles.

"I get it," I told the Duchess of Rash Tempest, "you don't believe you'd be able to get the best of me, if we had a wager. I sympathize, it's a regrettably common affliction."

"You are attempting to goad me," the amber-eyed fae said.

"I am succeeding at goading you," I corrected with an unpleasant smile. "To quote a clever creature of my own acquaintance: a well-laid trap does not rely on surprise but on the opponent's nature."

She had to accept a bet, if I offered it and it looked like she might win. Because she was better than me, greater and cleverer, and she must always get the last laugh with us poor mortals.

"You witty little thing," the Duchess laughed. "What might you even offer as a wager worthy of my time?"

"A duel with Count of Ravenous Flame," I said, "where I will be considered to have lost if I kill him with either Night or my staff."

"You insolent insect," the Count snarled.

"Those are all you have," the Duchess of Rash Tempest said, and then looked like she had swallowed a lemon. "I accept, you fool."

How unpleasant it must be, to be able to see the shape of the snare but be driven by your nature to step into it anyway.

"Should I win I want you to answer me five questions, fully and true," I said.

"Should you lose I will have your name, freely given," the Duchess replied.

Ambitious, but then if it got to that the odds were better I'd die.

"Bargain struck," I said.

"Bargain struck," she echoed. "My Count of Green Apples, do head upwards."

Count of Green Apples? No, it wasn't the same. It was the Duke of Green Orchards that we'd fought at Dormer all those years ago. And yet when my gaze found the fae in question, he offered me a sly smile before wings bloomed at his back. His face... It'd been a while since I'd thought of the opponent of that night, the creature who'd butchered my Gallowborne and burned Nauk into a mere shadow of himself, but I was nearly certain there was a resemblance there. That was troubling, considering I'd been very thorough about killing that Duke and Hierophant himself had pulverized what had been left of the remains. I didn't have the time to ponder that any further, though, because the moment the bargain had been struck my duel with the Count had begun. I breathed out, settled myself.

A duel, huh.

"Gods," I murmured, "it's been a while, hasn't it?"

The Count of Ravenous Flame advanced in his full splendour, armour glittering in the eerie light of the Belfry, a flick of his long sword gathering bright-red flame along the edge. It was tempting to watch the feet, for against all sorts of opponents the footing told a truer tale of intent than the guard, but against fae it was next to useless. Their bodies did not entirely work like those of mortals, and wings allowed them to further differ from what even Named could accomplish. My right hand was slick with blood, but the same numbing of sensation that had prevented my leg from hampering me kept the throbbing pain of it quiet, and as I widened my stance and drew a foot back I seized the long staff of yew like a spear without a tip. Far above us sorcery crackled, and voices both human and not mingled in war cries.

"Burn," the Count of Ravenous Flame hissed.

He swung his sword and a wave of flame followed, hiding him from my sight, but I'd seen that tactic used before. Used it myself, even back when I still had ice to throw around. Night gathered at the tip of my staff, forming into a full circle hovering just beyond the wood, and when the Count burst out of his own obscuring wave of flame with his sword half-swung and shining red wings behind him, it was to eat a blast of pure Night in the stomach that smashed him back. My turn. I slipped through the opening in the flame, Mantle of Woe trailing behind me, and even as Night gathered at the tip of the staff I thrust at the Count's chest. He recovered in time, though, shield covering him and the small burst of power that followed impact slid off harmlessly. He raised his shield, smashing down the point of my staff, but I deftly withdrew and slid in a strike just over the rim of his descending shield.

It was slapped away with the side of his blade, followed by a beautiful pivot to turn that slap into a backswing straight at my neck. I ducked low, swing passing overhead, but my unstable footing was punished by a hasty kick that hit my chest and had me falling backwards. I abandoned the staff to break the fall with my hands, weaving Night and leaving it to clatter against the ground even as the red-eyed Count adjusted his footing and prepared for a thrust that would go right through my throat.

"Gotcha," I smiled, pulling at the slender strings of Night connecting my hands to the staff.

The length of yew smashed through the back of the Count's feet, toppling him, and by the time he'd broken the fall with his wings the staff was in my hands and pointed right at his head. A slender arrow of Night, not powerful but quick and piercing, tore right through the golden round collar and into flesh. Not so quickly it was not slapped aside by a strike of the shield before it could go through the fae's throat, but that was the opening I'd been waiting for. In striking, he'd exposed his shield arm – the arrow released, I wielded the staff to hit his exposed elbow before releasing a small burst of Night. Not enough to hurt, but enough to continued feeding the momentum of the movement. He kept spinning, sword arm rising to stabilize his footing, and there I struck again: the piercing arrow of Night went through the wrist like a harpoon, I dragged him back in a spin and the sword the fingers had been grasping went flying.

Without hesitation I threw my staff down onto his knees, impeding his attempt to twist around. One, two, three limping steps to the side, and even as Night flowed through my veins and lent me unnatural precision the Count of Ravenous Flame turned, just in time to watch my fingers close around the hilt of his sword. Burning eyes widened in fear as I stretched out with a grunt and turned that catch into a descending thrust. The shield went up, or would have if my free hand had not pulled at the strings on the staff to smack its length down onto the fae's wrist. It slowed the defence just long enough that my thrust drove deep between those lovely red eyes, finding a deadly sheath. Silence followed in my wake, as I flicked my wrist and ripped the sword clear of the corpse.

"Damn me, but I I've missed this," I admitted with a sigh.

The enemy and I in the pit, fighting to the death, without any of the unending shades and subtleties that my life held these days. Just steel and cunning and the desperate need to live. My eyes went to the amber-eyed Duchess, finding her looking furious.

"You owe me five questions," I said.

"Ask them," the Duchess of Rash Tempest snarled.

"Who rules the Court of Autumn?" I asked.

"No one."

Which meant the mantle was laying there for the taking, if we could just find it. My blood thrummed with excitement. It could be done. The second part of Masego's theory, the one that made a weapon of the crown, it was possible. We might yet kill a god, or do something a great deal worse.

"Why have you come here?" I asked.

"To collect a debt left unpaid," the Duchess said.

I waited patiently.

"And to repay that which we owe," she added.

Been hoping I'd ask the next question before she was finished answering, huh? It wasn't my first time interrogating her kind, I wouldn't fall for that.

"Who do you owe that debt to?" I pressed.

"She who told us where the Hunted Magician is," she grimaced.
"The Wandering Bard."

Fucking finally, I thought, satisfaction welling up inside me. I'd gotten it out of the mouth of fae, entities that literally could not lie: the Intercessor had attacked a villain protected by the Terms. Even the Grey Pilgrim would have to bend his neck now. Every single Named in the Grand Alliance would get a warning about the Bard being a hostile and dangerous entity. A warning backed by the most prominent heroes of the age as well as my own not inconsiderable reputation, let her try to talk her way out of that.

"In what way are you to repay the debt?" I asked.

"We are to destroy the contents of a certain room," the Duchess of Rash Tempest said, "and break a sword."

Shit, they're going after the Severance as well, I realized. Had I been right, was the Intercessor really just trying to strip away every path out of the deeps we were swimming in except the one she'd let Hasenbach find? If so, this was just the beginning of our troubles.

"Do you have any allies in the Arsenal that are not fae?" I asked.

"Yes," the Duchess said. "Though I know not their identity, only that they can make themselves known to us through a certain phrase."

I supposed keeping the fae in the dark about the traitor Named was only natural, given the number of mages here we had that'd be able to rip that information out of them.

"Victory is transient," the Fallen Monk said, sliding a dagger into my jugular.

breakingamber

Well, that didn't take long.

How convenient. Stupid Monk.

Cat is probably going to be fine? I hope so. It would be quite a twist if the rest of the book focused on the heroes and villains attempts to solve the murder of the Black Queen, the foremost villain of their age, the Queen of Lost and Found, and stalwart opponent of both the Intercessor and the Dead King.

Insanenoodlyguy

Nah, my previous theory now seems more likely.

The Sinister Physician wasn't introduced as a scooby doo villain, seen just long enough to be recognized at the end... he's the story's provided spare. When the traitor (or at least the first traitor) is revealed and dealt with, you are going to need a new fifth member. How convenient that said member happens to be a healer.

nick012000

Cat has the Night, and one of the Night's tricks is the ability to come back from the dead, slightly weakened.

General Chaos

No way she's going to die. Hook, Line and Sinker, remember?

Miles

Murder? Nah we're coming full circle. All he did was trigger a name vision.

MadeThisAccountJustForYou \(@MadeThi54U\)

Nah, this was basically the plan. Intercessor had compromised someone and aimed them at the red axe, and they were supposed to betray Cat by implicating her in the death. But Cat drew all the most likely traitors together and narratively forced the traitor to blow the betrayal they'd have got out of the story on literally stabbing Cat in the back instead. The bard's plan for the story is successfully derailed. Or at least that's how I read it i bet the monk is about to find out that it Sure Fucking Is!

tkjarrah

Javvies

The Fallen Monk disappoints me.

On the upshot ... Cat should have access to secrets of Night based healing or whatever you want to call how the higher tiers shrug off apparently mortal wounds.

Hmm. One of the Traitors being a Villain is both good and bad. Good, because it'll give Cat the opportunity to demonstrate that she's entirely willing to kill Villains when they cross the line, that she's not just out to kill Heroes when they do and give Villains a pass. On the other hand, it's bad because it's a Villain doing the betraying, which plays into all kinds of preconceptions about the inherent untrustworthiness of Villains that Bard can utilize.

Mental Mouse

I think “preconceptions about the inherent untrustworthiness of Villains” are par for the course, Cat’s row to hoe, the albatross around her neck <ducks> okay, okay, but you get the idea. 🙄

pyrohawk21

I think you’ll find it is indeed Fallen Monk.

onedollargum

Good fight!

RubberBandMan

Oh boy, here we go again.

“My vision was blackening. I could feel life leaving my body. Serenely, I smiled.

Gotcha, I thought, and died.”

From Victory in book 2.

onedollargum

The Bard just managed to both make the rivalry official and immediately feed Cat a Victory. Will draw and defeat follow?

Insanenoodlyguy

I was wondering about that, but hasn’t Bard already fought too many times? She’s part of the party that drew against Cat already way back during The Lone Swordsman’s party, though perhaps those clashes don’t count because they were other people’s storys and now it’s a direct clash?

amit27592

They were not a mirror of each other during those clashes so they don’t count. Pattern of threes only occur in rivals. Kinda like how Grey pilgrim’s previous draw/defeat didn’t count in his pattern of three against Cat.

Tohron

Well, the Grey Pilgrim did try to start a Pattern of Three against Cat after having previously fought her in the Battle of the Camps, so it’s presumably possible.

Sir Nil

I have a theory that the seasonal courts are to some extent, regional. The continued existence of the Autumn court (and likely the Spring Court) seems to prove this. During Cat's first apotheosis, she was able to see the true nature of Summer and Winter and their dynamic, that is, Winter being a hungry thing which tries to steal Summer's prosperity to sate it's unending hunger, with Autumn and Spring continuing this dynamic in the interim. I originally thought that this matched very well with Black's description of Callow and Praes' dynamic, how the pattern of Praes is to be hungry and grasp and Callow is to be prosperous and be grasped.

It is already stated that Arcadia mirror Creation to some extent, but this implies that either the dynamic between grasped and grasping is uniform across the entire world, not just Calernia or that this dynamic is something regional to Calernia or even just Callow and Praes.

What sorta sealed the deal of this theory for me, is the original Winter King being a mirror to Black and Malicia, who are characterized by their desire to break the pattern between Good and Evil. Who accomplished this, by bringing in its Good counterpart, Callow to their side. Which was why I found it incredibly fitting, that Cat, the girl trained up by Black to be a Callowan Villain in order to solidify Praes' relationship with Callow, was the one that united Summer and Winter.

If this theory is untrue, then that means the old Winter King, was Winter King across the whole world, which either means that in every major region outside of Calernia, there are people who are exactly like Black trying to destroy the dynamic between Good and Evil, or that the Fey, have more power over choosing what sort of patterns they embody then previously implied.

caoimhinh

From Book 4, Chapter 27:

"Masego, how is this possible at all?" Hakram asked. "I was under the impression that Arcadia spanned the whole of Creation as a mirror of sorts. Was the Dead King so powerful all the world shook from his transgression?"

Hierophant clicked his tongue.

"That is a misunderstanding," he said. "Consider Arcadia as a single object being looked upon by an infinity of perspectives. To every one, it is a different realm. Across the Tyrian Sea, it likely has a completely different name and seems inhabited by completely different entities. Even the marriage of Winter and Summer is contained within the span of our gaze only, unlikely to have tremors beyond. It is so with this echo as well. Something that was momentous on our understanding of the world is not necessarily so elsewhere."

"And so Triumphant wept, for she ruled but a fraction of the world and knew it to be vast beyond her reckoning," Vivienne quoted softly.

Sir Nil

Huh, did not know that was already confirmed, either way that means there may be multiple Seasonal Courts out there, which may be why Autumn is still kicking despite supposedly being consumed to make Winter and Summer's union. Either that or the power of the seasonal courts can't be consumed or destroyed in the traditional sense. Cat combining Summer and Winter didn't consume Autumn or Spring but instead created a new power which overtook them. Perhaps this is what Quartered Seasons is, the assumption that combining or altering Seasons lead to something new, without necessarily destroying or consuming the original Season.

Miles

Spring and autumn are born from winter and summer respectively when their conflict ends. The winter king married into the summer court, taking most of the winter court too. But, cat was granted secession from winter and truce from summer as thanks for enabling the union. Technically there were still summer and winter then. The union was summer and Cat + the wild hunt was winter. Cat traded away her fae part to a being too powerful to become fae just from taking the mantle while the Wild Hunt learned from their queen and cast away their fae nature. As there are no winter fae left the conflict was finished and fall was born.

Not sure if there is a spring now. Maybe not because all fae were summer, or maybe the courts got reset to their original teams.

Anyway, fall wasn't consumed in the sense of a dog eating a bratwurst, rather, it was never going to be born again because the technical courts were under truce forever and unable to antagonize each other because of their nature and the bargains they struck.

Mental Mouse

Oh, nicely put!

Sir Nil

Huh, that was a very clear way of explaining it. But that still means that Cat effectively created 2 new courts, Twilight and Summer Winter Union, without destroying the power in the previous 4 Courts. Sure she made them inactive, but she made a net positive gain of 2 courts.

Sir Nil

Well, that is if we assume Winter and Summer are still kicking at the current moment, Twilight certainly is but that court is completely empty save for the Pilgrim's technical status as its king.

TeK

I just figured that there must be kitsune somewhere in this world. As in actual catgirls.

TeK

Well, foxgirls. Not the point.

Pethrai D'arkos

I've always been partial to huldra myself. Though given their respective mythologies it's easier to call them the Arcadian version of kitsune rather than the other way around.

caoimhinh

We can only hope.
They are probably somewhere around Yan-Tei.

erebus42

Well shit.
On a more positive note it was deeply satisfying to see Cat out-Fae the Fae

erebus42

Additionally the Poet's little contribution there was pretty cool. Very Tom Bombadil.

Liliet

Note: mortals outwitting otherworldly entities by relying on precise wording or even just twisting it so they get confused (Табличка стоит посреди двора: приходи за деньгами вчера!), is a well-worn staple of a trope.

There's a reason Diabolist was smug against the fae and Malicia considered them to be a fun diversion from the court.

That said, this was REALLY REALLY satisfying, bless this trope

erebus42

Oh it definitely is, she just seemed to be acting particularly fae-ish about it, especially in the ways she screwed them over. I guess you can't be a Faery queen for several years without picking up a few things.

Liliet

I would say there are two distinct manners in which fae screw bargainers over and in which humans screw bargainers over, and Cat did both.

Her first one was a human thing: note how the duchess worried about being left in debt if Cat offered too much, but Cat had no qualms cheating her. There are rules that only fae need to be wary of, and tricks that only humans can resort to. This is a 'clever bridge bulder letting a goat cross the bridge first' genre of trickery.

Her second one, on the other hand, was much more fae typical: make a wager that seems impossible, then just fucking brute force your way through it 'cause that's just how tough you are.

TeK

It is also a trope that Fae will fuck you over if you attempt to bargain.

As in, entire Arcadian Campaign was Cat being fucked over by Winter King plus a little bit of Larat.

ALazyMonster

I did not see that coming... I feel like I should have given the number of betrayal and mystery tropes going on here but still didn't see it coming farbeyondc

I'm 99.999% certain Cat's going to be fine.

The .001% of me that isn't is morbidly curious as to what the reaction to Cat dying here would look like, though.

Mental Mouse

> What little skin was left bare by the slender helm of brass and smouldering charcoal, its long cheek guards of carved red opal going down to a round collar of gold touched with flickering embers, was just as dark in tone.

I'm sorry, but this sentence needs to go into surgery stat, its parenthetical description of the helm is longer (and far more florid) than the actual description of the fae's skin. 😊 This chapter in particular seems notable for run-on sentences... is that the fae at work? 😊

Pethrai D'arkos

I don't see what's wrong with it. The helmet is certainly more visually interesting than the fae's skin.

Point Point

That particular sentence is rather long sentence, yes, and it could use some surgery, but I didn't notice a single run-on sentence in this chapter—even when an unusual number of clauses are joined in a single sentence or clauses are joined in unusual sequences, they are joined using proper punctuation, which makes them proper sentences.

And to nitpick that particular sentence, the parenthetical description is almost exactly as long as the non-parenthetical portion of the same sentence (if you count words, it is one shorter, and if you count letters, it is one longer). I don't think that's a problem in and of itself, but that particular construction is a little hard to read.

That sentence would be better if it described the helmet, followed by the skin revealed beneath it.

flashburn283

Well, I suppose we must give him credit for bravery. Utterly stupid about it but what can you do. First the Dead King tries to assassinate her assistant and sow discord, and now a Paresi traitor attempts to murder the queen.

Oh dear, this will galvanize all the heroes and villains into cooperating and force the Mirror Knight onto a path of good.

TeK

Fallen monk is neither Paresi nor Praesi.

Javvies

The Fallen Monk is a Proceran. He's not from the Dread Empire.

Some Smartass

There's rather less difference between them than Procerans like to pretend.

TeK

How dare you! First of all, unlike tyrannical absolutist Empire, the leader of Principate is democratically elected out of prominent local leaders and whose power is checked by the assembly of such leaders.

Second of all, unlike the warmongering Praesi, Principate is known for launching constant peacekeeping operations ensuring the stability of the nearby realms. So there. You are completely and utterly wrong.

Mammon

First off, chill. You come off very aggressive about this, way more than a fictional franchise's politics should cause.

Really more a matter of what label you slap onto it than a true difference. Nothing democratic about a literal and direct war being fought over and over again by not-democratically chosen royals until one stands on top of their own alliance of war and opportunity.

Procer isn't evil, but it certainly isn't a pure kind of good or democratic either and it's only because Cordelia tries to uphold the freedom and equality of the rules made by her predecessors that it truly feels like a democracy rather than a pretence of allowing the people you control to vote on things you allow lest you get them back elsewhere. Plus all the death conscripts, fatassins, hunger, poverty all for the greed of princes, none of which hurt any less to the actually affected because it was Good doing it.

Which, if you remember all of the non comically Evil that Praes had back when the story still lingered there, is much more alike the great Evil country than what we may remember of it now. Don't forget that there are kindness, cultures and people behind the Wasteland. Don't forget that the stories of flying fortresses, intelligent tigers and orc slavery stories were the ones memorable even after all these years while the true nature of everyday Praes may have faded from our emotional memory of the place.

Procer is a lot less good than its system suggests it should be, and Praes is a lot less evil than you're remembering it. Meaning that they are closer together than you might think.

Liliet

Ah, Poe's law.

I'm pretty sure this was transparent satire, which is what the overwrought pathos was meant to hint at. I mean the entire mention of 'peacekeeping operations' is blatantly poking at Procer's colonialism mirroring Praes, considering absolutely nobody in-universe ever used that euphemism. And "elected out of prominent local leaders and whose power is checked by the assembly of such leaders" is a description of the High Council with barely a stretch.

TeK

While I was writing it, I actually thought that Praes is more liberal than Procer. They didn't even dismissed man-eating tapirs from succession without a trial, while I doubt a peasant could ever become a First Prince.

Now granted, those are both just barely sapient animals, but the principle of the thing is so important. In Praes, everyone has a shot at being an Emperor, even a Hero. Unless it's a Duni.

And now I have a personal headcanon that Emperor Benevolent was a Hero trying to reform Praes from inside.

Liliet

Ouch, ouch, ouch lmao

And nah, Benevolent was far too selfish for that, from his quotes. "Morality is a force, not a law". He was just trying to harness the tropes into bending reality in his favor, not actually trying to do good, and the difference is audible.

NerfContessa

You both naturally mean "will be" utilizing tropes and such.

As black has not yet ascended to dread emperor status ^^

Liliet

> You both naturally mean "will be"
Why would I? "Will be" is future tense, and Benevolent existed in the past relative to the narrative.

Also, beside how obvious that is, while it's honestly up in the air if Black will be a Dread Emperor or not, one thing that's determined for certain is he's not going to be telling High Lords about how they can slip the noose with him. That's like the exact opposite of his entire thing.

Mammon

Actually, I think that Procer is just the US. Like, literally just the US as perceived by most of the outside world but in fantasyland.

Liliet

Nah, it's what Americans WISH it was perceived as.

Non-Procerans have actually uttered "Procer is the bulwark against Evil". Nobody outside the US has ever said that about the US.

Zoe

Procer's pretty obviously a fantasy-Europe as seen by an American. Like, down to different regions being coded as German, French, Spanish etc. through the use of names and place names.

This is kinda hilarious if you know the real places – Tenerife, for instance, is a Mediterranean island with a rep for boozy parties by British tourists, so I can't really take the Princess of Tenerife seriously...

TeK

I am awed at how you did not pick up on my sarcasm. I actually used the words "peacekeeping operations", and you thought I was serious?

Mammon

Ah, I see. While there are indeed parts that suggest sarcasm, be aware that the use of "First of all," is something that often suggests a serious writer and rant. If it weren't for that part, I would've indeed seen it as sarcasm based on the preceding "How dare you!" But at least from my experience, those that go firstly... (even if there's never a second following later) are quite serious in what they're saying.

Liliet

What's the point in being sarcastic if you DON'T imitate how people talk when they're actually serious? XD

Ah! Betrayal! Most unexpected and all the more foul for its most trusted source! How could anyone have ever reasonably predicted such an action?

It was nice that Cat was able to get herself trapped in a one-on-one fight with someone superior to herself. It has been a while, and I think we've all missed this.

Liliet

...well, decidedly not superior, considering she offered an actual handicap to make this remotely resemble a fair fight.

dadycoool

Several handicaps, like drunkenness, various physical disabilities, and the "no killing with my staff or Night" rule. Still, a toddler could beat up a pro wrestler if the wrestler was hogtied. The wrestler would probably still win, like here, but I think the point is still valid.

Liliet

Well, she certainly got herself trapped in a fight, and she definitely DID manage to make herself into the underdog with some creative wrangling, it's just the specific 'superior' phrasing I'm contesting XD

TeK

"Though I know not their identity, only that they can make themselves known to us through a certain phrase."

"Victory is transient"

That is an interesting choice considering the following quote:

"Victory is transient. To seek it is to remain so. I have seen the face of that which is eternal, and it stands beyond struggle." – Translation of the Kabbalis Book of Darkness, widely attributed to the young Dead King

TeK

I personally love Dead King quotes in epigraphs, they resonate with me unlike anything else.

They were probably disseminated through the Book of Darkness as a means to convey the concepts he considered formative in the teenage years he wrote it, like "I stared into the abyss and found what stared back... wanting."

TeK

Now I imagine the teenage Dead King. "The world is darkness and so am I..."

And people say it's Larat who is wielding the edge itself.

DC

It is worth pointing out that the question she asked was specifically "Do you have any allies in the Arsenal that are not fae". This question does NOT specify that the allies in question also be aligned with the Wandering Bard.

Thus, it's possible that the Monk (and anyone else using that specific phrase) has instead sold them out to the Dead King (or just been compromised by him in general) at the same time that everything else is going on.

Javvies

That would require these Fae to be working with the Dead King. And for the Dead King to be aware that the Wandering Bard was sending them into the Arsenal.

Also that the Dead King has assets inside the Arsenal in the first place and that he's willing to risk their being exposed by Fae activities. The former is unlikely, since one hopes that they've been careful about who they allow into the Arsenal, and I would expect the latter to be even more improbable, as I very much doubt that the Dead King would risk an asset that difficult to acquire and/or place inside the Arsenal on someone else's plan.

Adrian_V

Mmmm i think Bar choose that phrase for 2 reasons A)if heard it could link the dead king with all of this so it shift blame to him, B) she finds it funny to use his own phrase in this xD

Big I

Just as planned.

caoimhinh

That ending!

Burlyraven

Okay, I'm just going to type out all of the thoughts that occur to me after reading this chapter.

The Exalted Poet seems to actually be the heroic version of Masego. Both appear to have powers focused on usurpation and neutralization amplified by speaking in rhyme. While the Blessed Artificer seems to be designated as the rival of the Hierophant, I wouldn't mind seeing the world warping wrap battle that could go down between Masego and the Poet.

The Fallen Monk being the traitor is kind of disappointing in how obvious it was. The only reason I didn't want him to be the traitor was because of how entertaining his future interactions could have been, but it is true to form for a man who betrayed his own gods to keep betraying others. I'd feel satisfied in the knowledge that it's not one of the more likable Named, but the Duchess did say that they have multiple allies.

And finally, if Cat's actually killed here, then she's going to need a resurrection. The Night may provide here, but there is also the brief introduction of the Sinister Physician to consider. Either way, why just stop at one resurrection (cough Tancred cough)?

Burlyraven

Meant rap battle, not wrap battle. I do not wish to see either preparing presents for festive events.

Dome Zasrekh

NOW i do! 😊

Liliet

competitively preparing presents for festive events...

...now I want to see that...

TeK

Masego would be insulted to the very core of his being for even thinking in such vein. The Poet does not have a proper understanding of magical theory and is an artist of all people.

Dome Zasrekh

Him and BA exist only to annoy him! It will be the greatest test of his resolve yet!

Also, WHERE is Masego in all this?

ReverseMountain

I have never agreed more viscerally with a comment before this one

Liliet

For powerful Night wielders, having their throat cut barely counts as a flesh wound.

Adrian_V

I think sinker here has 2 meanings: 1 is how the Fae just can't resist the whole hook thing and always bite, the second is that this whole thing is at the core made to draw the spy out and he just did, wonder what nasty surprise Cat has prepared, i mean i bet that isn't a jnromal knife so just regeneration wouldn't be enough.

Point Point

I had a long comment written up in reply to this, but I accidentally deleted it.

In short, I think "hook, line, and sinker" could refer to two things.

First, and more obviously, there is Catherine's plot to expose the Bard's agent, which was successful in the last sentence of this chapter.

Second is a possibly plot by the Bard to kill Catherine. She may have set the situation up so that Catherine would put herself near the traitor, leading to a story of the villain's lieutenant betraying her in her moment of victory.

I think the first interpretation is stronger, but it depends on what happens next. If Catherine was prepared to be stabbed, then the traitor has fallen for her trap. If she wasn't, she's fallen for the Bard's.

Regardless of how it turns out, I think that both readings are likely intentional, even if only to leave us hanging, unsure of what will happen next.

Wonder

People, why am I not fretting about the knife in our Queen's throat?

The knife wound might have something to do with Her death in the series or she earns an aspect here .

Either way, Fallen Monk and Wandering Bard are fucked.

Thorium

It is quite interesting. The chapter litterally ends with Cat taking a killing blow yet nobody here expects her to die. Not because of plot armor but because “the Black Queen has another game afoot”.

Are we Callow now?

Mental Mouse

Also because we’re only on Chapter 22...

Liliet

TBH, considering how helpful this attack is to Cat’s research, I remain skeptical of the Bard being an actual determined antagonist here.

I’m getting the impression Cat’s getting a “now strike me down, student!” now set up properly where Amadeus utterly failed :3

Anyway, Night can heal worse wounds on weaker Mighty.

KageLupus

Yeah, my impression of the Bard this whole time has been that she is an unwilling, or at least tired, servant to the Game of the Gods and that her ultimate goal is to quit. Assuming that she can’t just get out the normal way (dying) it doesn’t seem like a stretch that the only way for her to stop being is to find some other poor schmuck to take her place.

Of course, Cat has a different idea of what that role looks like in general, and the Bard knows that. So setting Cat up as a replacement is also something of an FU to her former bosses.

Dr.D

From the mouth of the Doddering Sage – “A rival?” he muttered. “A thief? A successor? You keep stories within you that neither your ear nor eye ever knew. Shapes and beats and the sound of the knife kissing flesh.”

Now, in the original text “successor” was in italics, and only that...

Was “the knife kissing flesh” a foreshadowing to the knife in jugular being the tipping point to Cat’s new Name?

And is it a Name that somehow the Intercessor is trying to line up as being her replacement, her “successor”, or is it one that is something new and unique and totally Cat’s, as has been hinted at... or could it be both?

Was the part of the Intercessor left Cat’s mind actually become more of a seed to a Name?

We know the Bard wants a way out, wants to end seeing things over and over again like she has for the eons since creation was new.

TeK

Waiting for a Gambit Pileup.

Aha! The member of your team had stabbed you!

Aha! I saw your betrayal from the very beginning, your knife is ineffective!

Aha! I saw you preparing for his betrayal which is why I made your way of making knife ineffective ineffective!

Aha! Hiw predictable! I knew you would do so, which is why I was prepared to die and go on as a walking corpse!

Aha! Trying the same trick twice? Who the hell do you think I am? I saw your trick and preemptively sokd you out to the Dead King. Try walking now, bitch!

Aha! I knew you would conscribe him into your efforts, which is why I had made a bargain with him before you to screw you over together!

Aha! I knew you would do it which is why I had sold your private alliance to every Hero and now you are an accomplice of Dead King! Just as planned.

Aha! Trifling Wandering Bard, you dare? I knew that was your plan all along, which is why I had discussed that with heroes beforehand. Now that you had cooperated with Dead King, you are an enemy of an entire Grand Alliance!

Aha! You fool, that is what I wanted you to do! For you see...

JT

It is INCONCEIVABLE to read that without being reminded of The Princess Bride. 😊

TeK

Oh and, for the "WB is good" camp. What if she planned this attack to help Cat with Quartered Seasons, while at the same time crash-testing both the defenses of the Arsenal and the legal structure of T&T? At the same time weeding out potential weak links and possible traitors, and at the same time uniting the rest against common threat, while planting the seeds of doubt about Cat's default evilness in Heroes mind? Also maybe there is a lost hurt puppy somewhere in the Arsenal who wouldn't be found if not for all the commotion.

amit27592

Then there should not be a need for subterfuge or hiding anything from Cat/Hanno. Otherwise it's just playing games with lives for no good reason.

TeK

Maybe she is not allowed to do this directly. The Gods are tying her hands, remember?

Liliet

Bard has been antagonizing Catherine for no particular discernible reason for a while now, starting with her appearance at Second Liesse. There was literally nothing she did there except smile and wave – Cat wouldn't have known it was her and her break with Black would have been harsher according to her own words. The conversation in the campfire arc, too – Bard went all hammy villain on Cat, and honestly that had approximately no result except cementing Cat's antipathy.

Bard evidently DOES have a motivation to rile Cat up against herself, for whatever reason.

...and she seriously appears to be helping 0.0

matesbe

The question is, is she helping because of herself, or in spite of herself?

RoflCat

I think it's because a villain you know is easier to deal with than one you don't.

By revealing herself/her motive (or rather, the one she want Cath to know), Bard led Cath into certain mindset instead of remaining a loose cannon.

Much in the way she made herself 'undeniable' ally to Heroes that led Pilgrim to basically 'backstab' Cath by siding with Bard in crucial moment.

Of course Bard isn't omnipotent, as Augur and Tyrant were able to outplayed her in their way, Augur by reading what Bard want and mess up the timing so the result will be different, while Tyrant hid the Hierarch until he came to his name.

Basically Cath was an unpredictable factor, so Bard made herself the antagonist to make Cath more predictable.

Liliet

Cat would not have trusted her as an ally, but she is far more trusting in someone's antagonism... R I P

TeK

Oh and also she is getting rid of that hanging time bomb around Enchanter's neck.

Liliet

Hm?

TeK

The Fae that attacked Arsenal came after Haunted Magician. So now he gets to finally get out of his pursuit and guess whom will he owe that to?

Liliet

Hunted, not Haunted, and nobody with the Name Enchanter is involved, which is why I was confused.

Anyway, yeah, agreed. This accomplishes that alongside dissolving the potential bomb of deadly rivalry going off when Cat isn't around and can't get there in time to handle the situation.

dadycoool

By pointing the Autumn Court at Cat, she points Cat at the Autumn Court, which we all know she'll triumph over eventually, killing the owners of his name and freeing him of obligation.

daegone823

So is this fae with the bastard sword the same fae who killed all the gallowborn now he has a different title so he is happy for revenge?

Is Cat going for apotheosis again this time with a name?

If the fallen monk came back...(sob) the poet had indeed died tragically. I should have seen it when they spoke about there backstories past chapter. It was a death flag.

Is it weird that the fallen monk carried that wineskin throughout the whole fight lol. Just saying super cool sad to see him go, Cat has a reputation of killing anybody that betrays her.

Mental Mouse

> So is this fae with the bastard sword the same fae who killed all the gallowborn

Probably his son, or eldritch equivalent.

dadycoool

Oh no. A "You killed my father" flag?

JT

"I am the Count Of Green Apples. You killed my father, prepare to die" Hmmm urge to watch The Princess Bride...

dadycoool

Yes. Give in to your nostalgia.

ohJohN

I thought the fae were essentially recycled between seasons, so presumably some remnant of the Duke's essence reformed into the current Count. Didn't someone from Winter, early on in the story, mention something about past lives in previous cycles (maybe the King or Prince)?

Big I

The King of Winter mentioned that the crown goes to a different Prince or Princess each cycle. He recalled his life as a Prince when speaking to Cat.

Liliet

Why do you think the Poet died? There's no reason he'd be stopping the Monk from going back even if he's not also a traitor.

Xinci

It was the Fae with the vine arrows. He's the Fall version of the one they fought in the south earlier. He shot arrows more grew from any wood surface.

Erik V. Smykal

well.

shit.

Thank you, that was one of the best in a while, & the bar has been high.

your grasp of 'what the Fae should be' in fantasy fiction is superb.

ActionKermit

Wait, did Cat just renounce her own Crown by telling Larat's last words to the Fae? If she's the dark mirror of the Grey Pilgrim, we may have just witnessed the counterpart to the moment when he gave up the title of the Holy Sejun.

TeK

Nah.

Liliet

No? King's, not queen's, for one.

Pretty sure she is not surprised tho

Liliet

Catherine: All according to keikaku

Cicero

Wow, I actually called it that the Monk was the traitor.

TeK

So did Catherine...

Mammon

Cat: Inner monologues a couple of chapters ago that she put her sleeve-knife back in her arsenal after all these years.

Cat: I shall defeat this Count without using either my staff or Night!

Duchess: But you have no other weapons...

Me: Expects what's coming up

Cat: Kills the Count using his own sword

Me: Did... Did EE forget that he narrated that part to us before?

Liliet

Nah, it's just not a convenient weapon in a duel. Doesn't have reach that sword and staff do.

Thorium

Not like she ever started a fight by whipping it out. It is a finisher for when the enemy is off balance and expecting an empty hand.

Still more useful to keep in reserve given the density of enemies and traitors around.

Liliet

Also, finishing the fight by using the opponent's weapon is more in the spirit of the "I can beat him with my hands tied behind my back" wager, a sleeve knife is decidedly less cool.

And cool, as we all know, very much matters ^^

Relyt118

Possible explanations:

Drunk Cat is forgetful Cat.

Sleeve-knife doesn't have the "oomph" to down a Count without Night backing it up, which she can't use here.

How someone wins can be important in a story, and Fae are all about story. Pulling out a hidden knife could be clever, or it could be treacherous. Defeating your enemy with his own sword could show strength and skill. One of those is much more likely to bite you in the was story-wise than the other.

Javvies

There's also the quite likely possibility that Cat is holding onto the sleeve knives (remember, in the early models, there were at least two knives) for dealing with traitor Named.

I'm pretty sure that the only people in the Arsenal who know about Cat's sleeve knife rig are Masego and Archer. Arguably Bard has the possibility of knowing because she's full of hax and bullshit, but I don't think that Cat's ever used it where Bard definitely would know.

It's been literally years since she used it – in all honesty, the vast majority of proje in the Arsenal won't have a clue about its existence – they won't know that Cat's ever had the sleeve knife, far less that she might be carrying it now. It's a very good secret weapon/holdout for when traitors think that have the upper hand on her and/or that she's been disarmed, or for when idiots are being played and think the same.

RoflCat

Probably because, narratively, it wasn't a moment the knife's surprise reveal was meant for.

The Count fight practically guaranteed to result in her favor because she was a 'detective' working to find clues and the bet against the Fae was to get info (the 5 questions)
Now we get the reveal of the traitor, maybe a captive Batman (Catwoman?) moment while the villain gloat and THEN she can pull out the hidden knife to free herself or something like that.

ohJohN

Nobody posted the voting link yet?! I guess...

Voting is transient 😎

Xinci

Fascinating that he used the code phrase of the DK's realization after his interactions with Bard. Bit surprised Cat is surprised at seeing the same Fae again once it transitioned. Fairly sure we got several mentions of how they come back for each cycle, with the main changes being their role in the story of that cycle. Given she had a whole theory on things still being intact its a bit weird, well I guess it was Masegos and she doesn't pay that much attention to metaphysics.

agumentic

I wonder if we will see Larat again, before the story ends. His outstanding move was exceptionally sleek, and it could be nice to see his cunning, now unbound by oaths.

Dome Zasrekh

I would love to see What he become now that he is not fey! And where would he stand in this conflict? How does he handle his new freedom?

Mike E.

Cat's execution of the flame dude was awesome, and a reminder that even though she is mortal again, still a badass in one-on-one fights.

Satan

I see she didn't ask if there are any other outsiders attacking the Arsenal. Although to be fair I suspect that aspect will be mostly resolved by the time she resurrects. Seems like the type of job for Masego. I don't think MC can die this early in the story, but it would be a power move by the author if she did.

Interlude: Rogue

"It takes two hands to clasp in peace, only one fist to strike in war."

– Taghreb saying

Roland had not been forced to dig so deep into his reserves for years and had not missed the sensation it brought in the slightest: like sandpaper against his insides, his very soul rubbed raw and bloody by sore Use.

The Rogue Sorcerer pointed the dragon oak wand at the latest fae to land on the railing, the artefact grown sluggish from being fired repeatedly, and swallowed a curse. Another piece of his collection, going up in smoke. The red-veined wand trembled, the last of the dragon blood the tree's roots had once drunk unleashing its nature in the form of a narrow, powerful ray of flame. The Lord of Plentiful Harvest, childlike face serene, winked mischievously at him right before the sorcerous flame tore right through yet another damned fake made of straw. The bait was gone in a wisp of fire a moment later, as Roland dropped the wand before the angry embers it burst into could savage his hand.

If that one had been a fake, then the real Lord must be the tone trying to break through – before the dark-haired man could finish his thought, another shape bearing the Lord's appearance unleashed a torrent of golden power against the web of crackling Light that Adanna had unleashed around the spire, preventing the fae from ignoring them and simply flying up. The fae's blow stretched the web back, but as Roland mustered a hard smile he already saw how it would end: the web stretched but held, and as if made of rubber it shot back the golden power at the flabbergasted fae that'd struck with it. The Blessed Artificer it had to be said, was abrupt at the best of time and often judgemental.

She was also ridiculously brilliant.

"It is too soon to smile, mortal."

Roland did not bother to look behind him, where the voice of the Baroness of Red Hunt was coming from, instead immediately vaulting over the footbridge's railing. Beloved Gods, he prayed even as a burst of some sort of power passed just above him and set every hair on his body affright, for the curse of brag you laid on these creatures, I give many thanks. Hands already digging in his pocket, the dark-haired man fished out a small engraved copper ring and shoved it onto his finger. The old Arlesite artefact woke eagerly, itching to be used even after centuries, and Roland clenched his belly in anticipation. Though Pelagian artefacts tended to be remarkably long-lasting works, since they'd been made from an understanding of sorcery derived from the Gigantes they tended to also...

Stomach lurching as his momentum was forcefully reversed and instead of dropping down to the bottom of the Belfry, where going by the sound of it Catherine was having a merry old time slaughtering eldritch creatures older than the written word, he instead shot upwards. Roland swallowed a scream and an emerald-studded bronze bracelet on his left wrist, shaped like a snake – which many in the Free Cities considered a symbol of healing and protection – broke like a cheap bauble. Better the Stygian artefact than his spine and most his bones, as would have been the case without the harm-gathering bracelet's effect. Gigantes sorceries were effective but unfortunately they were also made for, well, Gigantes. Living titans who'd barely notice the kind of forces that would snap poor old Roland of Beaumaraais like a twig. Ligurian sorcery, and its Pelagian offspring, as a rule did not usually bother with the protective measures for the caster common to any other family of the Talent.

There was a reason the Jaquinites now held in sway in most of Procer.

Sadly, though he was going up instead of down the Rogue Sorcerer was not unaware that he was still, to used the academic parlance, damned screwed if he did not act. There was only death to be found in the air, when fighting the Fair Folk. Reluctant as he was to call on such a precious resource, Roland reached for the small orb within himself that was the sorcery that'd once belonged to the Hateful Druidess. A mere sliver was unleashed, in the shape of a burst of wind erupting from his back with precise aim that allowed him to stumblingly land back on the footbridge between the sides of the Belfry and its central crystal spire. The Baroness of Red Hunt, though, had been quicker on the move than he. Already she was there, spear of bone raised and the stripes of red going down her face grown vivid. That could prove tricky, Roland noted.

"Crouch," Adanna of Smyrna yelled.

He did, without hesitation, but alas so did the Baroness. Yet the fine line of Light that shot over his head did not simply pass beyond the fae, instead stutteringly halting over the Baroness and then shooting abruptly down onto the fairy's back. Another penitence box, Roland realized even as from the point of impact a hundred small lines of Light spread out and covered every inch of the Baroness of Red Hunt in a shining webbing before locking down. How many of those had the Artificer actually brought? She had to be running out by now. Still, this would be by him at least thirty heartbeats – though the Light cut both ways, protecting as well as imprisoning – before the penitence box broke and the Baroness was freed.

Adanna herself was in a spot of trouble, Roland saw as he turned. The Blessed Artificer used Light much as an enchanter would use sorcery, at first glance, but the Rogue Sorcerer knew better. One of the weaknesses to the blessings of priests – and Chosen – was that they lacked staying power. An object could be made to lastingly have the properties of Light, like holy water or the famous armour of Callowan knights, but Light simply could not be used the way sorcery could be through wards and enchantments. Which meant that while Adanna, like him, relied heavily on artefacts the abilities of those artefacts were nearly always temporary in nature. When the Light ran out, so would they. No trouble, when comparing a wand using magic and one using Light.

A great deal of trouble, however, when comparing the twenty three continuous layers of magical defence Roland currently had on his body compared to the single fading globe of Light that'd been all that separated the Blessed Artificer from the vicious blades and tricks of the Fair Folk. The shell vanished, and in the fading glow three silhouettes were revealed.

Adanna of Smyrna, tall and proud in her loose white button-up shirt and black vest covered by a long apron in striped shades of grey, golden eyes cold behind her spectacles. In her right hand she held a dull sword of iron, roiling with Light, and in her left a phial of coloured glass glowing like a torch. To one side the Lord of Plentiful Harvest was perched on the railing, looking small and childlike in his sweeping cloak of straw but with golden power already gathering above him in the form of a blade. The other fae perched on the other side was an unpleasant surprise, however, for it meant a third lord of the Fair Folk had joined their struggle. Wearing green vines as cloth and quiver, the green-winged fae looked eerily calm as he shaped a long spear out of what looked like young green wood. For a heartbeat, stillness held between the three of them.

Roland's hand went for the doubling of his enchanted coat, fingers closing around a small steel knife heavily inscribed with Mavii runes. A flick of the wrist spun it into the proper grip even as he went for one of his pockets and pressed his thumb on the correct rune for the pocket dimension to present him the handle of his second finest casting rod. The three-foot long rod felt warm against his palm, and even as he swung it forward in an arc began gathering blue flames.

"Mabethe," the Rogue Sorcerer roared in the tongue of the Taghreb.

Scatter, it meant. An imperious incantation for an imperious people. Streaks of blue flame thundered down along the arc he'd traced, shaped like five great furrows, and the dance began anew. The green-winged fae struck with the swiftness of a viper, green spear darting forward, but the Blessed Artificer grit her teeth and shattered the vial of coloured glass in her grip.

"Flee from the Light," she snarled.

Bloody shards dripped down, but they revealed a blooming sun of many colours – Roland was forced to close his eyes, lest he go blind, and even so the glare was burned into his pupils. The fae screamed, and when he found he was able to see again the Lord of Plentiful Harvest was seared and howling. The other, though, had merely retreated into the air past the railing. And was nocking an arrow, aiming at a still-blinking and seemingly unaware Adanna. Had she blinded herself with her own work? The Rogue Sorcerer broke into a run. His flames had been blown away by the great burst of many-coloured Light, but the ornate casting rod was still in his hand. Pulling at one of the dozens of spheres within him that had belonged to mages from the Army of Callow, the Rogue fed the sorcery through the casting rod and let the artefact shape it.

Still at a run, he slashed the length of lapis-lazuli and gold at the winged bowman. A notch of blue flame was spat out, sizzling in the air as it flew towards the fae. The creature disdainfully flew back with a beat of wings, adjusting his aim with the bow as he did, but was visibly taken aback when the blue flames followed. Adanna traced a streak of blood along the length of the dull iron sword she held, speaking soft words, and in the beat that followed Light bloomed once more: a great construct of it, shaped like a massive sword around the small one she held. The shine reflected against her spectacles, but the Blessed Artificer's hard grin was not to be mistaken for anything but feral as she turned towards the recovering Lord of Plentiful Harvest.

Even as Roland closed the distance between himself and Adanna, the green-winged fae shot a greenwood arrow into the seeking blue flames with open irritation. There was a strange growth of the wood within the blaze, which to the Rogue's disappointment was enough for both fire and arrow to peter out. As it was one of his better bread-and-butter spells, it was disheartening to see it fail so easily. Still, he'd gotten there in time. Adanna carved through a fake fae made of straw, the railing beneath it and even a chunk of the footbridge while she was at it, but the sword of Light would not dissipate on a single blow. It would last for a few more moments, at least, which left the Rogue Sorcerer free too... The arrow streaked forward, but fresh blue flames devoured it even as Roland leapt and his foot landed on the railing.

The green-winged fae was just out of reach and retreating quicker than he could catch up, damnation. He'd been just a little too slow to leap, and now-

"Sweet the sorrow, the heady rue

That has my hand aching of you."

The Exalted Poet's voice sounded like the plucking of a harp, its sorcery filling the air. It sunk into the fae effortlessly, seizing him whole.

"Thank you," the Rogue Sorcerer hollered without turning.

The bowman fae had frozen in apparently transfixing sadness for just a few heartbeats, but it was enough for the Rogue Sorcerer to tackle him in the air. The fae's garments of green vines boiled angrily as the two of them dipped in the air and Roland pressed the casting rod against the side of the fairy's neck before pushing through blue flames.

"Unwise," the fae calmly said.

Well, that'd be nothing new. Even as vines grew wildly and tore the rod out of his grasp, putting themselves between the fire and fae, Roland smiled for he'd not been holding on to the casting tool. His hand on the fairy's shoulder, ignoring the pain of biting vines that broke through the Praesi shielding tool he'd obtained at great cost, the Rogue Sorcerer rammed his steel knife into his enemy's back. A beat passed.

"Mine," Roland confessed, "is a most greedy Name."

His lot was take and keep and use, though he would never become what he had risen to correct. The Rogue Sorcerer would take only from those deserving: those who misused their talents, the gifts the Gods had given them. And there was another word, for such a thing, one that had become part of who Roland of Beaumaraais was: Confiscate, his soul whispered, and Creation whispered with it. Like a hungry leech, his aspect sunk its hooks into the power at the heart of the fae. Ah, a Count of Autumn were we? The Count Green Apples, for that was his name, struggled and trashed impotently as his very nature was exsanguinated. The Rogue Sorcerer might die or go mad, if he took too much of the power within him – especially a power so utterly alien as that of the fae – but then that was why he'd brought the knife.

The runes shone, and blood both human and fae mingled as a the greater part of the power of the Count of Green Apples passed into the steel knife.

"What are you?" the Count gasped.

The wings faded, swallowed whole. The pair began to fall, still intertwined.

"The sole charlatan among a parade of demigods," Roland told the noble. "Smoke and mirrors, my good count. Or rather smoke, mirrors and a knife."

Ripping the runic blade free, the Rogue Sorcerer kicked off from the fae and then kicked him again in the face so the creature would drop his leg. He still had a hand free, and a small window as they both fell, but there was no artefact that would quite do the trick. Gritting his teeth, Roland shaved another sliver off the Hateful Druidess' power and wove a quick wind that tossed the powerless Count of Green Apples into the first story of the Belfry over the railing, to impact with great fracas against a writing desk. The ground was swiftly hurrying towards Roland, and there seemed to be an unfortunate amount of fire down there, so he promptly began to Use the knife that'd drank so deep of the fae noble. His coat and clothes suddenly shivered, and the hand holding the knife was seized by massive pressure as he tried to coax out power from within.

A set of three enchanted black pearls on a string of dried seaweed, an Ashuran acquisition, immediately blew up as the power that tried to force metamorphosis onto his hand was kept from succeeding – the dark-haired man still cursed profusely as the many tiny shards drove through the skin of his ankle. The Rogue Sorcerer succeeded at making green wings bloom from his back, focusing through the pain, and immediately stopped drawing from the contents of the knife. The pressure faded. The knife he kept in hand, as a tool for control, flying crookedly back up to the footbridge on fae wings. For lack of knowing how to land, Roland instead positioned himself above the bridge and ceased using the knife. The wings shattered and he dropped, landing on his feet. Yet it felt like he'd forgotten something, the Rogue Sorcerer mused as he rose to his full height. It came to him a heartbeat later.

"Mautedit," Roland swore. "My casting rod."

It would have dropped all the way down and the odds it'd broken in the fall weren't low. Still, even if it'd shattered into a few pieces it could likely be repaired by Hierophant or the Blind Maker.

A heartbeat later Night billowed out at the bottom of the Belfry like a massive sea of power unleashed, lapping at the walls and the base of the spire. Roland let out a whimper. How was it that every time he fought at Catherine's side, he ended up losing a priceless and irreplaceable artefact? That casting rod had been crafted in Thalassina, which didn't even exist anymore. Gods, if she'd burned down a slice of the Belfry's library while she tangled with the fae they were going to need to have words. Cross words, even. It would have to wait, however, as now it seemed like the tide might be turning against the fae. The Baroness of Red Hunt had been freed of her prison of Light and come to reinforce the Lord of Plentiful Harvest – who was now missing an arm, and sporting a furious sneer – but now that the Exalted Poet had come, the Chosen finally had numbers on their side.

Odd, Roland thought, that Catherine would have sent up one of the Named with her but not the other. The Fallen Monk would no more be able to withstand existing in the general vicinity of the Black Queen taking a fight seriously than the Exalted Poet would have, which was why he'd assumed reinforcements had been sent at all. Both fae turned, watching him like hawks as the last wisps of his stolen wings dissipated. Yet they were not striking, and neither was the pair of Chosen facing them.

"Unmake your web, witch," the Baroness of Red Hunt said.

Adanna, in her own way a delight, took a moment to realize she was the one being addressed and not the Exalted Poet.

"I think not," the Blessed Artificer stiffly said. "I offer you this instead: surrender now and your deaths will be swift."

Roland would need to have a conversation with her about how the Grand Alliance did not, in fact, endorse the execution captives but he was willing to chalk that one up to a lack of practice in heroic banter. The Artificer was not young to her Name – she'd had it for a few years – but she had been... sheltered. Treasured for her intellect and miraculous abilities by the Thalassocracy, she'd been privileged and protected to the extent that she had faced neither a villain nor a disaster before coming to join the Tenth Crusade. No wonder her first taste of war at the Red Flower Vales had seen her shy from the frontlines and embrace the concept of the Arsenal wholeheartedly.

"You need not bleed for this," the Lord of Plentiful Harvest told them, voice warm and reassuring. "We seek no death, only to prevent a great danger that threatens us all."

The hateful sneer from earlier was gone from the childlike face, but some ugly glint of it still lingered in the fairy's eyes. Roland trusted not these creatures, and his fingers began inching towards another artefact from his trove. The polished orb of quartz he'd picked up in Dormer, imbued with three Callowan war-spells, was slippery against his sweaty palm but Roland cupped it against the side of his pocket and managed to seize it without giving away the game.

"Your fellows downstairs were not so eager to treat with us," the Exalted Poet said. "This is petty trickery: Splendid are the eldest children of deception."

"Your lives were not bargained for," the Baroness of Red Hunt said. "They will only be lost if you persist in this fool's errand. Let us through, lest we all pay for the madness of a single man."

"Whether or not your intentions are laudable no longer matters," the Rogue Sorcerer said, fingers tightening around the orb. "You have attacked the Arsenal, and in so doing become a tool of Keter and Gods knows who else. For that, there is only one end awaiting you."

"The thief speaks at last," the Lord of Plentiful Harvest jeered. "You'll have no more of us, usurper. Your words are wind, and in the end what you stole will take from you."

"What splendid diplomats you make," the Rogue Sorcerer drily replied, fully intending the second meaning. "Begone, creatures."

Will taking hold of one of the sorceries within the orb, Roland let it loose with a thought. He cut the side of his hand at the antlered baroness, a long streak of chittering lightning lashing out forward. Wessen's Fork, as it was called, had been the invention of an ancient Wizard of the West of that name. It was a clever piece of work, a bolt of lightning that – ah, and there it was. The Baroness of Red Hunt threw her spear of bone at the sorcery, but instead of being shattered by the greater power the spell split into two streaks of lightning both still headed towards the fae. A heartbeat later Adanna tossed up a disk of clay covered in High Tyrian writing, which began to spin and shot out a long blade of Light. The two fairies elected to retreat, pushing off the railings and dropping below.

The spear of bone fell into dust and vanished, but Roland wouldn't fall for that trick twice: the Baroness would have the thing in hand when she next reappeared.

"They are not attacking anew," the Blessed Artificer noted. "Perhaps they are retreating."

"That would be a stroke of luck," Roland said, implicitly disagreeing. "Poet, how fares the fight below?"

"The Black Queen triumphs," the other man shrugged. "And requires not the assistance of my verses in her struggles."

"But the Fallen Monk's fists suit her better?" Adanna said. "One cannot account for taste, I suppose."

Roland kept his eyes on the Poet as the Artificer talked, looking for a reaction. He found only indifference there, as if the matter did not truly concern him. Roland knew little of the Monk, save what Archer had mentioned in passing. The man had talents useful against those who used Light, and a knack for stepping lightly. As befitting, the Rogue Sorcerer supposed, of a villain who'd been able to very publicly murder several of the Holies and then escape Laurence de Montfort's pursuit. The dark-haired man went through his pocket, finding a slender wand of ebony. It was petty work but its sole enchantment, one that spewed out a fist-sized blow of kinetic force, tended to be useful in all sorts of situations. Roland twirled it absently around his fingers, feeling the sorcery within lapping eagerly at his skin.

"Your aid here is welcome," Roland agreeably said. "For when they will return."

"If they return," the Blessed Artificer insisted.

"I expect they will, my lady," the Exalted Poet said. "Yet I have something of my own prepared that might wound them, a fresh work inspired by what I glimpsed below."

The Rogue Sorcerer joined up with the other two, shoulder brushing past the Poet's as he kept half an eye on the empty space around them. But only half, for he had not forgotten this band's true purpose.

"I look forward to witnessing it," the Blessed Artificer said.

"I will endeavour not to disappoint," the Poet laughed. "Yet it might be a verse of some potency. Do either of you have any defences I should beware of hurting?"

"Yes," the Blessed Artificer noted. "My web is maintained by a-"

"Stop," Roland ordered, eyes on the Poet. "Leave it at that, Adanna."

There lay hidden beautiful diamond spinning top that formed the web of Light blocking the fae from going upwards would keep feeding it so long as the top kept spinning and there was Light within it. It'd been covered by illusion of his own – more accurately, of a travelling illusionist with some truly unpleasant habits Roland had briefly encountered – and had been stashed away in a nook within the spire to their side, where it should be beyond harm for now.

"If he does not know, he cannot avoid disrupting it," the Blessed Artificer lectured him.

"I do not know what I have done to earn your mistrust, Lord Sorcerer, but I can only apologize for it," the Exalted Poet told him, though he sounded at tad aggrieved.

"Why aren't the fae attacking, Poet?" Roland asked.

"Who can know the minds of the Splendid?" the Poet replied. "Perhaps they are waiting for us to be distracted, or even striking at the Black Queen's back."

Then why can't I hear any noise coming from downstairs? the Rogue Sorcerer thought. Not a single noise at all, not since there'd been that massive wave of Night.

"What did Queen Catherine say when she sent you up and not the Monk?" Roland asked.

"She simply ordered us so, and we obeyed," the man laughed. "Who dares argue with a such a woman?"

That laugh had come just a little too quickly, the Rogue Sorcerer decided. And Catherine was commanding, true, but in no way above explaining her reasonings when asked. If anything Roland had noticed she tended to think better of the people who did ask, if the situation allowed for it and the tone was not confrontational.

"Of course," Roland said, smile tugging at his lips. "I would have done the same."

His fingers tightened against the ebony wand. He could not prove it, but his instincts were screaming. There was a band of possible traitors, Catherine had made clear to him, and Roland fancied he'd just sniffed one of them out. It was the silence below that worried him. The Black Queen at war was many things, but quiet was not usually one of them.

"It has been a long day," the Rogue Sorcerer apologized. "The web is maintained by an artefact I hid under illusion, Poet, I'll allow you to glimpse through it."

He gestured, calling on one of the spheres within him, and crafted an illusion of a little box of glittering gold in the middle of the footbridge. One only the Levantine should be able to see. The Exalted Poet's eyes flicked to it, which was when Roland casually pressed the tip of his wand against the man's throat.

"Don't move," the Rogue Sorcerer mildly said.

"This is becoming absurd, Lord Sorcerer," the Poet protested.

"Roland, put that wand down," the Blessed Artificer ordered. "Your suspicions are getting out of hand."

"I do not understand what is moving you to violence," the Exalted Poet told him. "And the fae could return at any moment."

"The Count of Green Apples that nearly killed the Artificer," the dark-haired man said, "did you get sent before or after he flew up?"

Roland was not unfamiliar with clever sorts, women with glib tongues or witty men with laughing eyes. Liars of one shade or another, especially Named, were used to being able to talk themselves out of anything. That could be used. And in this particular case, the burly Levantine might have the frame of a warrior but as far as the Rogue Sorcerer knew he only had sparse fighting experience under his belt. That was a weakness in knowledge, paired with a proficiency and tendency at lying.

"After, naturally," the Exalted Poet said. "I assumed I was sent as reinforcements."

Except that Catherine would have known that the Count would get here long before anybody sent up by the stairs, considering the wings, so that decision made no tactical sense. It would have been better for her to drag back down the Count of Green Apples with Night while her two helpers kept the other fae at bay long enough for her to pull it off.

Without hesitation, Roland fired the wand right into the man's throat.

The Exalted Poet blew over the railing, toppling down with a surprised scream.

"Roland," the Blessed Artificer screamed.

He turned to find she had pointed a short stave of charred wood at him, eyes gone grave behind her spectacles.

"Two out of three are traitors," the Rogue Sorcerer noted, for the Poet had covered for the Monk with his words and the conclusion to be had was obvious. "I wonder, will it be three?"

"You're the one who just threw an ally to his death, you madman," Adanna retorted. "Put down the wand, Roland."

"If you are, your game is deep enough I can hardly glimpse it," Roland admitted. "But I will not surrender my wand, Artificer."

He would not disarm himself when the enemy was not about to return. She'd understand soon enough, anyway.

"You leave me no choice, then," she grimly replied.

A heartbeat later a spear of bone pierced up from under the footbridge, tearing through where Roland had woven the illusion of a golden box. The bait had been taken. The Baroness of Red Hunt burst through in a storm of rubble, red wings bright as Adanna's face fell.

"You laid a trap," the Blessed Artificer said, catching his eyes.

"Nothing," the fae shouted. "It was nothing, you useless worm."

"That would have been it for the web," Roland replied, ignoring the creature.

The end of the footbridge opposite the spire shivered as a glamour went down, revealing the Exalted Poet – throat visibly bruised – and the Lord of Plentiful Harvest at his side.

“It does not have to be this way,” the Poet rasped. “They are right, Artificer, you already know it. You were shown the truth, weren’t you? They play with powers beyond their understanding, and they will doom all the world.”

“Traitor,” the Blessed Artificer replied in an indignant hiss. “I stand with Above, now and always.”

A moment of tense silence passed.

“Her wonders will break if she dies, most likely,” the Exalted Poet said, tone reluctant.

The fae looked unamused, both of them.

“A pinnacle of uselessness,” the Lord of Plentiful Harvest sighed, face displaying a childish moue. “We knew this already.”

“Wrong,” the Blessed Artificer said. “You know nothing and less.”

“I know this, child: the Black Queen is dead,” the Baroness told them. “Take down your web now, if you do not wish to follow her in this.”

Roland’s fists clenched. They could not lie knowingly, he reminded himself. Which still meant there would be no reinforcements. It would be a hard fight, even with the fae lord crippled and the Poet’s throat hurt.

“I’ll take the Lord of Plentiful Harvest and another,” the Rogue Sorcerer mused. “Do you want the Poet or the Baroness?”

A wreath of blinding Light came to life around the charred stave in the Blessed Artificer’s hand, crackling like lightning and growing into a great spear.

“I’ll take both,” Adanna of Smyrna snarled.

Well, who was he to argue with a lady?

First update of the month, which means extra chapter in the eponymous tab. This one is the first half of a two-parter, titled “Charlatan I”. The POV is one I’ve not used before!

Mental Mouse

The Interlude isn't showing in the TOC – the Bonus chapters generally don't, but the Interludes usually do – just not this time.

ayon96

You forgot to add this chapter to the side bar of the site

Mental Mouse

Now the Interlude is showing in the TOC, but apparently in the wrong place, between Hook and Line. By either publication date or plot points it should be after Sinkers. (As of Sinkers, Cat hasn't sent the Poet back up.)

pagesbe

Of course we get an interlude. I am honestly not surprised. Hopefully we don't get another, though I won't hold my breath. That dang cliffhanger.

dadycool

I think they come in batches of up to...six? Either way, it'll be a couple weeks before we get back to Cat. Or whatever she's become this time. It's entirely possible that she'll be a feature in someone else's interlude, like a couple times when we've had Abigail's POV, or she could feature in the Big Reveal like in Iserre right before she went to rescue Masego. We'll just have to see.

Liliet

There are single interludes, too, though this does seem likely to be a series where we check on the rest of the clusterfuck before coming back to Cat 😊

Mental Mouse

Hmm... maybe a Hakram POV coming? Yum!

RoflCat

I'm hoping for Artificer to reveal who was the 'informant' that told her about Quartered Seasons and her eventual realization that she's been used and the anger that come with it.

The girl is in Arsenal pretty much full time, so if it's Bard then it implies Bard can intrude into Arsenal without being found out.

Liliet

YESSSSS

...Bard teleports. I don't think Arsenal is special for her, in any way other than 'easier than most because of the sheer quantity of Named in the same place'

Sparsebeard

We still need to know what happened with the other raiding party though...

Anomandris

Man, Roland's so in sync with Cat....Can we just adopt him into the Woe already?

Plus Confiscate and Use seem at first glance to have a... teaching quality. To use them well, I would assume that you need to sharpen your mind a lot over the years (instead of just throwing your power about)

Oh, and the Blessed Artificer has got to be the most naive Named we've seen in the story....

Liliet

Naivete is apparently a common heroic quality, though it would of course naturally fade with years.

Adanna is a GIFT and a DARLING, she's just so fucking pure???

Tenthyr

Masego has expressed genuine admiration and amazement at Roland's abilities, which says a lot. It's almost charming Roland thinks he's 'just' smoke and mirrors when it comes to his aspects. I would eager Cathrine would have a lot to teach him about what power being nothing but smoke and mirrors in this world is.

Liliet

(stage magician bard, that's what she is)

(while Roland identifies more as a rogue class lmao)

(NO WONDER THEY GET EACH OTHER SO WELL, SIBLINGSHIP MADE IN HEAVEN)

numberlen

I think this chapter has conclusively shown that Roland is just a rogue that pretends to be a sorcerer through UMD and lots and lots of wands and magic items.

Mental Mouse

> Roland thinks he's 'just' smoke and mirrors

Roland didn't say 'just', quite the opposite. Indeed, that line is so awesome I'll just quote it:

> "Smoke and mirrors, my good count. Or rather smoke, mirrors and a knife."

That's not dissing illusions and misdirection. That's a "prepare to die" line. I wonder why he tossed the weakened Count into the balcony rather than letting them drop into whatever was below, but there are arguments both ways given he doesn't know who's won down there.

cainerahlld777

Smoke, Mirrors &nnnd a Knife🔪

Spinner335

ROLAND IS BEST BOI!!!!

SpeckofStardust

I now like both of these heroes.

thearpox23

I spent half the chapter expecting Masego to finally wake up, walk out the back door, and put an end to this carnival. I can now only assume that he is somewhere else and I've completely forgotten where it was discussed.

Because with the Arsenal under direct attack from the front, and supposedly triple-fanged strike at its back (Quartered Seasons, Severance, and that heroine,) the arguably most heavy of heavyweights present in the area would play a significant role. Yet we seemingly have everyone important accounted for EXCEPT for him.

dadycool

Pretty sure Cat wanted him as a librarian/wise man type of resource for any band that needed info or wisdom.

thearpox23

That was to be his role in a heroic detectives story. Then a fae invasion happened, (EXPLICITLY to disrupt that,) and considering that the Arsenal is effectively his pocket space, his actions are rather integral to how that is gonna go.

Being in the role of a dispenser of wisdom doesn't suddenly null his other traits.

Morgenstern

Actually, Cat was STILL counting for that story to trump that little invasion, letting her merry little band of misfits survive what they usually could not, because they still have a story to fulfill... If that story is truly still going on and Masego is playing that role (unwillingly/unwittingly or not), he might very well still be caught up in that story fully.

thearpox23

RE: "Being in the role of a dispenser of wisdom doesn't suddenly null his other traits."

Liliet

Naw, these stories are going concurrently. "Fae invasion disrupting investigation" is still part of the investigation story.

thearpox23

Did I claim they weren't? Your point does not conflict with mine.

Liliet

> That was to be his role in a heroic detectives story. Then a fae invasion happened, (EXPLICITLY to disrupt that,)

I'm contesting this one. In my understanding the fae invasion disrupts the investigation within the framework of the investigation story, it doesn't disrupt the investigation story as a whole. A much larger calamity would be needed to derail that, and Bard either cannot or did not cause such.

thearpox23

I suppose I did imply that the Fae happened explicitly to disrupt Masego's Role. Editing mistake on my part. I was referring to Cat's counter-schemes as a whole rather than Masego specifically.

Also, you see to be fighting me on semantics. To disrupt something (in intrigue) does not mean to completely derail, it means to delay or shift the balance to where the thing loses importance. Such as the fae invasion introducing elements that reduce the importance of things Cat depended on while increasing the importance of elements she skipped out on. That disruption can lead to a shift in priorities for some Named, shift in Roles for some, (especially those that haven't yet been brought into the story,) , shift in the stakes, and so on.

Unrelated to my point, but your statement that the calamity isn't large enough to completely derail everything I find funny because that is only because it is currently failing at its goals.

If the Quartered Seasons gets sabotaged Cordelia gets cornered and Bard no longer needs her current plot. (Not that she'd stop it. She'd just have a much bigger lever.)

If Cat gets sniped the whole thing is doubly unnecessary.

If Masego gets sniped who knows what happens to the Arsenal and the fallout is worse than with Quartered Seasons.

And if enough named or regular people die here, the murder mystery won't matter as well because the Grand Alliance will lose faith in this pet project. No one wants to stay in a 'Bad Happenings Place,' and The Haunted Magician is absolutely at fault here for not revealing the danger he carried with him. From there, it is a short walk to be cautious of every mysterious Named that drops by and the whole thing falls apart.

Does the Bard expect any of those to actually come to pass? Probably not. But the threat is very real and Cat already made one mistake in this book. This is like your argument with the dagger where you ascribe regular assassins inability to murder Cat to plot armor rather than well-trained security, surrounding Named with skill points in detection, and her constant paranoia. Do remember that things like providential plot armor are crutches for those who lack the skills but still resonate with their Name.

Liliet

Catherine has specifically noted that the loss of Masego's notes on Quartered Seasons would not be irrecoverable. Now if Masego were to die, yes, but I'm not getting an impression of a threat to him so far.

Anyway, I wasn't arguing that this wasn't dangerous. I was saying the story is still happening, which is a neutral observation that-wise.

thearpox23

There are more ways to mess with the Quartered Seasons than just messing with Masego's notes. I was being general on purpose, since I don't want to turn every minor thing into an essay.

>Anyway, I wasn't arguing that this wasn't dangerous. I was saying the story is still happening, which is a neutral observation that-wise.

Yup. Investigation still (unless stuff deteriorates too much) happening overall. Still mostly put on hold for now because fighting. Still being purposefully disrupted. Will likely have tonal/leads/roles shift after disruption ends.

And if you don't have issues with any of the above sentences than I am Still not sure what your original point was. But okay.

Liliet

See, the thing is, I don't think the investigation is put on hold. Specificallly, Catherine used the fighting FOR investigation – as a means of flushing out traitors.

We, uh, don't have definite data on how well that went. But it's definitely something she did.

thearpox23

Ok, I see where our problem lay.

You have the meta narrative of Cat pulling strings while figuring out what is going on, and then you have the verse-narrative that Cat jury-rigged with the Mirror Knight in the lead role while Cat was the Authority Figure. You're mixing those up.

Stopping Cat from advancing what she knows is virtually impossible. She can twist any situation, see the lines connecting it to other things, and make deductions. Bard knows this, and therefore nothing she did was an attempt to disrupt Cat herself but to disrupt Cat's work she built up; her narrative and plot hooks. One of the win conditions would be to reach the point where Cat is screwed no matter what she knows.

I checked back to my original post and I did explicitly namedrop the "Heroic Detectives story" which obviously refers to the heroic band of five, so I think you just misread my point. Granted, I also managed to imply that the fae invasion happened to disrupt Masego role in the heroic investigation in particular, which is just a weird point to make, and I probably should have been called out on that if anything, so there's that.

Liliet

His presence would disrupt the drama so yeah he's presumably somewhere he cannot hear/sense what's going on. Narrativium takes care of those things.

Decius

He's still working on quartered seasons. If someone wanted his help they would have sent for him.

And he is going to be cross when he is interrupted.

thearpox23

In other words he can't hear the commotion going literally outside his front door? I'm not surprised he's got everything sound-proofed, I'm just surprised he didn't get himself an alert system for such events.

The invaders MUST have some plan to neutralize him though, and I'm curious as to what that is. Otherwise the whole thing amounts to a bad joke. (Cat getting stabbed aside. But having an intrusion just to snipe those who would defend against the intrusion is more of a Neshamah thing.)

Mental Mouse

Given that Masego survived eye-to-eye with Queen Summer, I'll be impressed if the invaders have a plan to avoid getting rendered down for power supplies and spell reagents.

WealthyAardvark

Quartered Seasons might be his secret top priority but it's not like he's spending all of his waking hours on it. It'd hardly be a very secret project if that was the case; people would have started asking questions about what he's up to ages ago, instead of only a couple of weeks ago after being tipped off.

And unfortunately just because there's a story afoot doesn't mean Masego's been relinquished of his normal duties at the Arsenal. There's a hundred reasons he might not be in the Belfry right now, from working in the Workshops, inspecting the Mirage for the upcoming meeting, gathering crafting materials, training new mages, or assessing the damage from the library fire.

Just because he's not right here doesn't mean he's not been up to something important. This place is huge, he could have been practically anywhere when the assault started.

WealthyAardvark

Additionally, Masego has no idea that anyone knows anything about the Quartered Seasons project that shouldn't. He sent the Hunted Magician to meet with Cat but didn't accompany him to the meeting. Cat hasn't spoken to him since she found out people had been sniffing around at QS; she's only been at the Arsenal for like at most five or six hours at this point.

As far as he knows the project is as safe as it can be in a fortress that's under assault. Maybe he ran off to protect the super-sword instead.

The Blessed Artificer continues the long standing Praesi tradition of being a superior Bitch no matter what the calling. She and Akua would hate each other and I want a dozen scenes of them bickering.

zfglx

Roland is basically Calernia's sorcerous version of Indiana Jones isn't he?

thearpox23

'This belongs in my pocket! And I'll make sure to put my essay on this in the museum as well.'

JJR

In his POCKET DIMENSION specifically.

Frivolous

"I'll take both." = Adanna wants a threesome. Who is Roland to argue with that? Especially if he gets to watch.

Adrian V

And Adanna is feeling like she was taken for a fool (by not realizing there were traitors) so now she has righteous fury on her side, those 2 are fucked xD

And of course we have Roland origin story after this, i wonder how Erra plans these things.

As a bonus either Roland was more adventurous than we thought or he has fought quite a few revenants since the war started, maybe both.

Oh and i almost forgot but i bet the angle the Bard used with these 2 is the old "things man was not made to know" thing, and they are both probably fundamentalists

dadycool

Yes! We finally get to see Roland's badassery in action! Looks like the Artificer has her own Badassery to display here, not that we should be surprised considering she was even able to blind Masego for a second. One of the questions raised by the end of last chapter got answered here, too: How did the Monk get away from the Poet?

Roland's right, though. When the Black Queen goes to battle, "quiet" is not a suitable adjective.

agumentic

Well, I believe someone called that today's update was going to be an interlude. Good call, and a very good interlude – it's nice to see Roland and his Munchkin deck of artefacts in battle directly.

Daniel E

LOL. Now that you mention it, his collection of magical gadgets does remind me of a Munchkin game. He might even surpass Kairos for random effects, if not necessarily in quantity.

Liliet

Oh my god how good is Roland's narration. This is Catherine tier of constantly funny while also having a very distinct and different voice. Wow. Just wow.

Adanna is a precious gift: naive and without combat experience (blinding herself with her own trick!) but a powerhouse and not an idiot. SO GOOD.

And they were both traitors lmao. CAT CHOSE WELL

hakureireimu

I don't see any evidence for her not being an idiot yet.

Liliet

1. She caught on to the fae striking at Roland's illusion and what it means. 2. As Roland has commented, she's a genius enchanting-wise.

Liliet

P.S. 3. She did not listen to the fae and let them through mid-fight, even though what they were saying aligned with her preconception. Yes, it's a very very low bar, but we're talking about 'not an idiot' here, so...

Liliet

Also, I find it notable how non-greedy Roland is. He spares a thought for 'why do i lose artefacts every time I fight with Catherine' but he doesn't think anything similar for the stuff he expends, only what was lost without expending the charge. He minds waste, but using up? He's clearly attached to his stuff, but not... he doesn't PRIORITIZE it in any sense.

Also, there's someone who's clever eh 😊

Mental Mouse

Well, he does seem to have an issue with dropping casting rods into a melee. (Admittedly, he did get to use the first one to the dregs.) Of course "oops, dropped my magic wand" is a basic trope for any device-based magic-user, so it's really on him to do something about it.

Liliet

Like I said: he has an issue with losing stuff. But expending its charge? He didn't even bring Catherine up in the first part of the fight.

Shveiran

Well, he is in a life and death situation, playing out in a field that could cause the destruction of the weapons the mean to use to win the war.

I mean, I'm glad he sees it this way and all, but this is not the kind of situation where you DON'T spend your single use items.

I like him, don't get me wrong; but it's a pretty low bar we are complimenting him for clearing, here, no?

Liliet

Nah, the thing is, Catherine brought him into this fight in the first place

Mental Mouse

Yes, using it up == good (thrifty, effective). Losing it when you weren't done with it yet == bad (wasteful, he's short a weapon, one of the fae might even turn it against him).

Mental Mouse

Also: Not the first time this has happened, he lost a casting rod at Liesse III. I forget if there was a similar incident at Liesse I (?) when he was on the other side...

Liliet

Battle of Camps?

At Liesse III, he didn't JUST lose a casting rod. He got robbed for everything he had because Catherine deliberately made him bait to Kairos, with twin goals of channeling Kairos into something at least predictable and getting her hands on something Roland was carrying – Amadeus's soul.

I'm getting the impression Roland is very well aware of what happened, and while he's never letting Catherine live it down, he's not holding a grudge either.

Mental Mouse

Well, that was a separate incident from dropping his rod during the demon melee.

Liliet

...demon melee? You mean devils?

His rod fell down there cause Kairos threw it away, and the reason he had it was because see above.

Mental Mouse

Having reread the section, you are correct.

I keep wondering how she is supposed to be a match for Akua as Magnificent when she has 0 points in intrigue.

Liliet

Heroes counter intrigue with brute force, typically.

RoflCat

Akua doesn't need intrigue to deal with Artificer, just her poisonous tongue that cowed the beastmaster.

Basically the latter half of this video: https:// www.youtube.com/watch?v=FDZX1z-yn7w
But with more of that smirking villainess touch.

Mental Mouse

She might be a match in story structure, certainly not in ability.

Javvies

Agreed.

Blessed Artificer versus Akua (as Heiress, Diabolist, or Dread Empress) would have had Blessed Artificer riding a truly massive Narrative/Story wave.

Not just the standard Hero bonuses, but also bonuses connected to being a family member, descended of a branch that was thought to have been ended by the family.

laguz24

One of these days bard is going to get stabbed.

Liliet

She'd be delighted, I imagine

Mental Mouse

If you remember, she just teleports or disappears when her life is threatened. Black tested it: first two times he shot at her she just blinked to elsewhere in the room, the third time she disappeared (and didn't harass him again until after he'd lost his Name).

Javvies

Huh.

Good news is that Blessed Artificer appears to not be an intentional or knowing traitor, so she was probably just played by Bard and/or Bard's proxies.

Bad news ... Bard has gotten to a lot of people inside the Arsenal. At least two knowing traitors.

On the upside, if Cat can prove that Bard is behind this, it could prove to be a key opening wedge to separate the Heroes from their automatic trust of Bard, and to weaken Bard's influence elsewhere.

I mean ... if it can be proven that Bard is responsible for traitors inside the Arsenal and helping the Fae attack it, every Grand Alliance member is going to have to put a price on her head.

Liliet

Note: this band is not exactly a representative sample of knowing traitor frequency. Cat tried.

Javvies

Sure, Cat was looking for traitors ...

But just the two that we know about constitute about 10% of the Named inside the Arsenal.

And there's probably at least one or two more Named that are working directly with Bard, not counting the ones who are being played by Bard and don't realize it.

Liliet

Honestly I'm not sure there are more. Maybe Concocter, but any more are just... not necessary.

ayon96

Someone invited the fae into the Arsenal and it can't be those two cause they were with Cat when it happened. Also things usually come as threes. So I think there is still one more willing conspirator working with bard on the loose.

WealthyAardvark

Someone tipped the Magister and Artificer off about the unexplained holes in the budget that comprise Quartered Seasons. Someone also got a message to the Mirror Knight and the other Named who arrived with him in Chapter 14 about the Wicked Enchanter and the Red Axe that was almost certainly sent before the killing happened.

The Fallen Monk is part of Archer's traveling band, and the Exalted Poet arrived with the Mirror Knight. Neither of them has been in a position for those actions. Given that it's been stated that the Concocter is probably at worst a tool of the Bard, there's going to be at least one more traitor around.

Of the heroes who are Arsenal regulars remaining we have the Blind Maker, the Repentant Magister (probably a tool), and the Bitter Blacksmith. Of the villains, the Hunted Magician (unlikely) and the Sinister Physician.

hakureireimu

That someone can be the Bard herself, since she can talk.

Liliet

Consider: non-Named personnel exists.

Also, anonymous tips have great power.

Liliet

Fae forced their way into the Arsenal, remember the whole mini-earthquake?

Mental Mouse

Yeah, but they don't show up without some cause. And there's no actual indication that they came for the Hunted Magician....

Liliet

"“Why have you come here?” I asked.

“To collect a debt left unpaid,” the Duchess said.

I waited patiently.

“And to repay that which we owe,” she added.

Been hoping I'd ask the next question before she was finished answering, huh? It wasn't my first time interrogating her kind, I wouldn't fall for that.

“Who do you owe that debt to?” I pressed.

“She who told us where the Hunted Magician is,” she grimaced. “The Wandering Bard.””

Mental Mouse

OK, so the Bard used the debt to the Magician to sic the fae on them. It's interesting to wonder how the fae incurred a debt to the Wandering Bard in the first place, but I suppose the fae are pretty easy to set up for something like that.

Javvies

These Fae owe Wandering Bard because she told them where to find the Hunted Magician and how to get inside.

Plus, it appears that she's also claiming that Quartered Seasons is an existential threat to them, and warning them about said existential threat to them, plus where and how to get at it may well constitute a debt as well.

Mental Mouse

She's not necessarily wrong about the existential threat – Masego in particular has already broken off a chunk of Arcadia, and has previously vivsected fae. (In one case with her consent, but still.)

Javvies

On the one hand, yeah, it's possible that Wandering Bard was telling the truth.

On the other, it's probably more likely that she still selectively informed them of certain specific details while leaving out others, effectively leading them to come to an exaggeration of a worst case scenario and misleading conclusions without telling an explicit and demonstrable lie.

Ie, Quartered Seasons is a project on behalf of the individual responsible for the Summer and Winter Courts no longer existing. Technically true ... bit leaves out one hell of a lot of important details.

Or, maybe Masego thinks that there's an infinitesimal chance that Quartered Sessions could kill a Court if aimed and utilized against the Court at the exact right moment under the exact right circumstances, but has explicitly not ruled out the possibility, however improbable he says it is, gets turned into "they think this can kill a Court"

Mental Mouse

Thanks to Cat's influence, Masego is slightly more considerate of collateral damage than his father, but that's not saying much. Even if he's not specifically thinking of the fae, the project itself is explicitly part of his research on how to kill a god.

It would be ironic if the point of this was in fact to make sure Quartered Seasons did in fact get turned against the fae... in response to their attack. Ironic, but foolish – I'm pretty sure story-logic (And DK's capabilities) would make a test run for such an Ultimate Weapon self-defeating, since DK would get the chance to see and analyze its effects.

Javvies

Masego is far more careful about collateral damage and deciding who to kill than Warlock was. Though, true, that wouldn't take much, and Masego can have eccentric notions about what constitutes sufficient grounds to kill someone. On the other hand, he also largely applies Cat's theories about the world working better if people aren't assholes – that's paraphrasing heavily, admittedly. Plus, I'm pretty sure Masego would subscribe to the theory that causing collateral damage means you were sloppy.

At any rate, I'm saying Bard is more likely to have heavily spun a carefully edited selection of truths into something that bears no resemblance to reality.

Ie, if Masego has said that Quartered Seasons would most likely prove entirely ineffective against a Fae Court, even under hypothetically optimal conditions in all ways, but didn't explicitly and definitively rule out even the remotest possibility of success, Bard spun that to the Fae as "this thing can kill a Court" and carrying the implication that it is intended to be used against the Fae.

Mental Mouse

Except at that point, she's simply lying, and that lie becomes a dagger to be used against her. She's too smart for that, and she's powerful and tricky enough that she doesn't have to.

Note also that destroying the sword and the contents of a room (presumed but not confirmed to be the QS workshop) are explicitly part of paying their debt, meaning those are Bard's goals. The fae's own goal is collecting the Hunted Magician's debt to them.

Javvies

Bard is fully capable of twisting the truth into a metaphorical pretzel without lying.

In doing so, she can craft her statements so as to leave the impression that Quartered Seasons is something other than what it is, and if the Fae have misinterpreted her statements, she need only not correct their misunderstandings while not confirming them.

Ie, Quartered Seasons is being supported by Cat, is easily turned into Quartered Seasons is being supported by the person who ended the cycle of the Summer and Winter Courts ... and it's not that hard to get from there to Cat could be supporting Quartered Seasons in order to end the Spring and Autumn Courts as well.

Sure, taking out Quartered Seasons is something Bard wants ... but it's entirely possible that Bard also fed them a story that would make the Fae not try to weasel out of meeting her request with a minimum effort/minimum damage technicality.

Liliet

I think they owed her for telling them where Hunted was

Opointmass

The debt that the Fae owe to the wandering bard, is simply because she told them where to find the haunted magician therefore they owed her for it. I think she was clever enough to phrase it like this: " I know where you can find the haunted magician but you will owe a debt to me which i'd like to cash in immediately, thank you very much". Or at least that's what I think went down.

ayon96

Guess Fae might have forced their way through. Someone still sent the message of murder ahead of time and arranged it to happen. Could be Concocter but she seems to obvious!

Burlyraven

So the two members of Cat's traitor party that happened to not be traitors both happen to be magic item/artifact specialists. And one of Cat's main skills is the ability to create artifacts. This particular grouping is starting to feel like a bonding exercise with more over-arching story importance than first expected.

Liliet

Ooooh nice

Mental Mouse

Well, the non-traitors are also long-term staff of the Arsenal, which for obvious reasons is packed with sorcerous gadgeteers.

Mental Mouse

As far as "bonding exercise": Let's see, we've got Rogue Sorcerer, Blessed Artificer, Cat herself, and probably Masego will come out for the next act. The question is, who'd be the fifth? Sinister Physician has been tagged and left behind already, but more to the point, they'd need a physical brawler. Archer would do, but either the Mirror Knight or the Kingfisher Prince would provide an “outsider” presence. The Red Axe would also be a possibility, offering a redemptive-sacrifice plotline for Cat’s quiver.

Burlyraven

The Kingfisher Prince and the Mirror Knight seem to be the two most likely individuals to wield Severance, so that’s where my brain was going. And I’m unsure on Masego l, really; he might be taking on a more offset role as something like the wizard in the tower that responds to the annoying sounds of battle by just kicking everyone’s ass as a matter of discipline (kinda where I’m seeing this particular arc going, honestly).

Mental Mouse

Possibly, but in this company he might not be far enough above the scrum to pull that off. Unless he uses Quartered Seasons, which as I note elsewhere would probably be a mistake.

Hmm, having both KP and MK would give them both sorts of brawlers, but at that point Archer is a candidate again.

sengachi

I love how Roland relied on the assumption of Catherine’s tactical acumen to spot out a lie. He’d sooner believe a fellow Hero is a traitor than that Catherine made a basic tactical error.

Also I love how no one I’ve seen in the comments so far even mentioned Catherine’s presumed death. It’s just taken for granted that a simple knife to the throat isn’t enough to put her down, or that the Night’s stolen resurrection tricks are enough for her to walk it off, and that’s a whole basket of fun,

SpeckofStardust

Cat dying would lead to the dead king winning. As there is yet a belief in story that they can win with everything they currently have, much less losing one of the 5 major things keeping the mega alliance in one piece. + the 5 or so major problems that caused cat to come here in addition to the 3 or so problems she’d found out when she got here. Meta? Even if she just straight up died she’s likely going to be back again.

Shequi

We have had quite a few repetitions of the simple fact: Death is not enough to stop Catherine Foundling.

If anything, dying and overcoming it again just enhances her story of overcoming death, and it's that story that has her on course to beat the King of Death.

Decius

What's her death count up to now? 3?

No, not her kill count, that's WAY higher.

Liliet

3 officially, but if you also count that one time Black fucking stabbed her, for example,

Mental Mouse

Eh, she's no Gabe and she eventually returned the favor anyway.

My very own name

I need this crossover. Feed it into my veins.

Mental Mouse

Alas I don't fic, but I was musing a while back about a Cat vs. Natchua conflict.

Liliet

I mean in her dream she was run through completely and the sword was stuck in her. People die from that. And we just never get a follow-up on what that meant physically in the material plane.

Mental Mouse

Dream-logic is a little different. IIRC it was clear that in the real world she was wounded, but not fatally.

Liliet

It wasn't clear that I remember, no. It wasn't actually clarified.

Mental Mouse

Her last estimate was "three, I think". It remains to be seen what her condition is now.

Liliet

Cat's the main character and the book ain't going to be cut this short.

thearpox23

A simple knife is perfectly capable of finishing Catherine off, but no one is concerned for the same reason you love Roland. She is one of the most consistently capable characters I have ever had the pleasure of reading, and I'd eat my boot if she made a traitor-heavy party without accounting for a possible knife in the back.

Javvies

Under the present circumstances, I am not actually sure that a simple knife actually can kill Cat, given her strength in the Night and her probable (nigh-certain, really) knowledge of at least some of the Night-based techniques for shrugging off seemingly mortal injuries, or what would be mortal injuries on someone else.

But yeah, sure, in the appropriate circumstances, where Cat's ability to use Night is significantly constrained, then, yeah, sure, a simple knife in the right spot could kill her. These are not those circumstances

Liliet

Y e p

Mental Mouse

Killing off Cat would take a blade, and a wielder, far more heavily freighted with Story. Even as an agent of the Bard and/or fae, the Fallen Monk simply doesn't have the mojo. Similarly, "traitorous henchman" just isn't enough story, especially given Cat already was looking for the traitors.

Shveiran

Please, the Fallen Monk was introduced what, four chapters ago? Five?

He has the same chances to be the one that finally kills the protagonist of the series in the first third of the sixth book than I have to adopt a dragon.

Sigh. Stupid draconic Family Ministry refusing my letters.

Draconic Family Ministry

Look, we've told you a dozen times, you need a proper lair for them, and enough of a hoard to give the hatchling a proper start. Sticking a forge in the basement just doesn't cut it, and that collection of jewelry was just pathetic!

Mental Mouse

There's also her nascent Name in play. Given that "wave of Night", I could easily believe that the fae found some way to expel all her Night... only to discover that she has yet another well of power. (That's assuming that Sve Noc haven't gotten involved directly... they could certainly rez her, they've done it before.)

Mental Mouse

And Roland was right!

Vagabond

Loved the chapter! Love Roland! Deeply satisfied to see his perspective!

Captain Amazing

These are just such great chapters omg.
If there's two traitors my guess is there's five as Bard had whole lots of time to prepare. If so I peg Sinister Physician and Red Axe as members. The Physician is greedy for immortality and Red has the obvious lever of her nemesis. The fifth member might be the Bard herself in a dramatic reveal I dunno.

JJR

"“What splendid diplomats you make,” the Rogue Sorcerer drily replied, fully intending the second meaning.”

Does anyone here know which meaning of which word is being referred to here?

WealthyAardvark

They're Splendid (Fae) diplomats, but also splendid (talented) diplomats. If Cat heard him make a pun like that she'd probably punch him in the arm.

Morgenstern

... i rather heard sarcasm in the "talented" meaning of "splendid", lower case ^^

Mental Mouse

> Gigantes sorceries were effective but unfortunately they were also made for, well, Gigantes. Living titans who'd barely notice the kind of forces that would snap poor old Roland of Beaumaraais like a twig.

BTW, that really has to be internal magic of the Gigantes. In the real world, large creatures are far more vulnerable to whole-body forces – famously falls, but this sort of sudden yanking about would certainly qualify. Q.v. Haldane’s classic essay, On Being The Right Size.

Xinci

Presumably like Dragons or Elves they have enough weight to change how the Laws of Creation interact with their bodies. Given their whole scheme is basically integrating themselves into the many many interactions of Creation it makes sense they would develop some form of intrinsic resistance to getting torn apart by such forces.

hakureireimu

Maybe the force is constant and doesn’t scale according to body mass?

Mental Mouse

Hmmm... maybe, but that would make for a rather poor fall-protection spell for a large race. In particular, those “safeguards” Roland mentions would in general be even more important for the Gigantes themselves.

I mentioned Haldane’s essay already – the basic issue here is that both functional and structural strength scale to the square of length (cross-sections of muscle and bone), whereas body mass (and thus inertia and impacts) scale to the cube.

This was also my complaint back when the Skein showed up. As I noted back there, a “30-foot tall rat” is the size of one of the sauropods, and should not be able to jump anywhere.

Xinci

I mean a bigger aspect in all of this is the trifecta of features around respiration. ie. energy, structural support(bones), and structural movers(muscles). If they can gain energy by integrating with other forces the muscle and bone structure can then have a lot of room to be shaped in ways that would be too energy-intensive for other species. Energy is the big limiter on size as structural adaptations to larger and larger sizes tend to bring issues with keeping that tissue, flesh, etc actually capable of movement and being capable of finding nutrients from other sources. Given EE did note that Horned Lords have to hibernate most of the time due to how much energy they burn I presume this to be the case.

Also in the case of Skein (and to a degree some of the other monsters), his cage probably helps circumvent certain rules that would have made things harder for him. Given we had Warlock note that certain creatures couldn't be shapeshifter into due to not following certain rules it could also be assumed that certain inset "natural" laws are tweaked or missing in effect for creatures like Horned Lords. Seems to just be part of this all being a constructed scenario

Letouriste

Nicely written!

Was a bundle of fun to see the interactions between everyone. Good fight too, as usual:)

Interlude: Archer

"The kindest mirror is an old friend, the cruellest an old foe."
– Callowan proverb

The smell was, impossibly, just the same as Archer remembered.

That sweet, high odour that came from too many different herbs being hung to dry for even a Named nose to be able to tell them apart. Deeper in, Indrani knew, the lingering potion fumes would add a lingering tang of sourness: it'd been near impossible to get rid of that even out in Refuge, where there was nothing but open air around the Concocter's workshop, and a room of stone would fare no better. Gods, it was like she'd never left Refuge. It felt like any moment now Alexis might turn the corner, covered in twigs and dirt, eyes looking for the fight her mouth wouldn't admit she was picking. Like John was just out of her sight, with those stupid bells and the tasteless tattoos he'd be so damned proud of, like Lysander would be getting a fire going for the fresh stag he'd caught with the latest beast he'd brought to heel. But there was no time for reminiscence, for memories fond and not. The smell had only come when the door was yanked open and the Concocter's dour face was revealed.

"Archer," the other woman said, general dourness turning into a proper frown. "What do you want?"

"That any way to talk to an old friend, Cocky?" Indrani smiled, all nice and toothy.

She hated being called that, always had, but then she'd refused to give out so much as a fake name to any of them. Even the Lady, who'd been amused enough at the novelty of being refused something she'd never pursued the matter. As children the other pupils had made a game of picking the Concocter a name and half a hundred must have been thrown around, few of them clever and all of them mean. She'd invited it, in much everyone else's opinion: Cocky's disposition was what a poet might call just fucking awful.

"Funny," the Concocter thinly smiled, even as her purple eyes narrowed. "Stop wasting my time. What do you want, Archer?"

It was amusing to see the eyes were purple now. When Indrani had left Refuge they'd been bright yellow, and last time she'd been at the Arsenal they'd been an unnatural shade of green. The hair was still black – had been for a few years, though the more sober colours these days would never make up for that memorable month when they'd been thirteen and Cocky had thought she could pull off platinum blonde – but it was now straight instead of curly, and long enough to be pulled into a thick topknot behind her head. The colour of her skin she'd never tinkered with, a pleasant southern tan that could be from anywhere south of the Waning Woods, but where other women might paint rouge over their lips Cocky had simply turned her own the same shade of purple as her eyes. It was one of her more striking appearances, Indrani admitted, if far from one of her wildest.

"I'm here on behalf of the Black Queen," Archer replied. "You fucked up, Cocky, and you were even sloppy enough to leave a trail. So now I've got questions and you've got answers."

Indrani let her smile harden a bit.

"It's up to you how polite my getting those is going to be," Archer said.

"She's no queen of mine," Cocky said, rolling her eyes. "My terms were reached with the Grand Alliance. If you want to ask me questions, come back tomorrow after making an –"

Indrani kept it measured: a light jab in the throat had her choking, but it wouldn't do lasting harm. The Concocter stumbled backwards and Archer elbowed the door aside, her old acquaintance tripping all over her grey robes as she tried to retreat. Wasn't this familiar too? Indrani felt a surge of grim amusement pass through her. When she'd been young and fresh off bondage, fresh into the Lady's care, she'd once done something much like this. Only instead she'd beaten the Concocter for the purpose of ransacking her stores of anything Indrani might fancy without any need to do something like trading.

Cocky had taken it when it happened, she didn't have much of a choice, but then that same night Beastmaster and the Silver Huntress had jumped Indrani in her cot and savagely beaten her within an inch of her life before returning the goods to the Concocter. They'd got paid with manticore bait and sedative for Lysander and a full set of tailored physical supplement potions for Alexis, both of which were near impossible to get from anyone else.

The Lady had said not a word, no more than she had done when Indrani robbed the Concocter. The Ranger did not play favourites.

"You've got ties with smugglers," Indrani said. "We've got proof, so you have not a damned thing to hide behind."

Cocky, one hand clutching her throat, backpedalled deeper into her rooms. Where Masego's were the amalgam of a workshop, library and bedchamber as conceived of by somehow who genuinely saw little difference between the three, these were openly a potioneer's brewing room with a small nook to sleep in. Between the seven cauldrons, the several cabinets of ingredients and the lines crisscrossing the room with herbs hung on to dry, it was a miracle a writing desk could fit in there, much less the silk panes delimiting the space where Cocky's bed and clothes trunk had been stashed. It was all real candles in here, as magelight might disrupt more delicate brewing, but enough strange humours had seeped into the wax and wick that half the flames seemed to burn in blue or green. Those flickering lights played against the Concocter's face as she tried to reach for a vial of green liquid in a rack, though she froze before she withdrew it.

Indrani's knife at her throat had seen to that.

"None of that, now," Archer said. "I told Cat I could get answers out of you alive, I'll look like a real tart if we have to call up your shade instead."

She paused, meeting purple eyes.

"But the more you try your hand at this the more I'm feeling tartish, get me?"

Cocky scoffed.

"You haven't asked a thing," she said. "You're just looking to hurt something, as usual."

"Tell me about your smuggling friends," Indrani said, taking back the blade.

"Did you think just because you shoved a few hundred people in a box they'd stop wanting things?" the Concocter snorted. "A few flake addicts from the guards were already looking to get their fix in quietly, a few strings were pulled and it got broader and organized. If your mistress had any sense, she'd look away and let it go. No one can live off only what's brought in on inspected supply wagons."

The thing was, Indrani tended to agree. Flake was pretty gentle, as far as alchemical drugs went, and the infamous side-effect of your skin flaking off in chunks when scratched only happened if you'd been taking it regularly for years. Otherwise it was just euphoria in a bottle, which might go a long way towards making daily patrols in this boring grey hell liveable. It was inevitable that people in the Arsenal would want, once in a while, to partake of a little something without it first coming across the desk of the likes of the First Prince of Procer in a list. It was healthy, even. Keeping your head down all your life, toeing the line to the letter, it killed something in your soul. On the other hand, she could see where Cat was coming from too: people were smuggling things into the dimensional fortress where all the god-killing weapons and the nasty frontline tricks were being made, and that meant risks.

The kind that you just didn't take when it came to Ol' Bones, unless you wanted a city or two to die screaming.

"And when did you get involved with them?" Archer asked.

"Well, Indrani, haven't you become just the most devoted hunting hound I ever did see," Cocky sneered "How does that work, anyway? Throw the Archer a fuck, she brings back a few corpses? I suppose even she can't stomach you for long, if she has to pass you off to the H-"

The Concocter went still as the tip of the longknife hovered a mere hair's breadth away from the surface of her left eye, afraid to even blink. Anger was good, anger was warmth in the blood and something like satisfaction when you finally butchered the thing that'd made it burn in you. But anger wasn't going to get her those answers, so Archer made an effort to master it. It wasn't true, she knew that, and it wasn't like some words from a woman long a stranger would make her doubt it. But to have someone speak in such a vile way of ties that were so important to her almost felt like a sort of defilement.

"You don't really need two of those to keep brewing," Indrani said. "And you don't need either of them to answer my questions. I wouldn't forget that if I were you, Cocky. I certainly haven't."

"You wouldn't," the Concocter said.

Indrani smiled at her, the knife's tip still as the grave.

"You know me better than that," Archer simply said. "If I have to repeat my question, I'll be taking something as recompense."

"Maybe a year ago," Cocky said. "I needed some ingredients that'd get me unwanted attention, they needed the kind of clout that comes from having a Named in your corner. We scratched each other's back, that was it."

It would have had to be something truly unpleasant, Indrani knew, for the Concocter to not have wanted to put it to ink in requisition form. There were very few lines the Grand Alliance was not willing to cross, these days. The desire to survive had lowered the standards of what people were willing to suffer to exist, or even enable. But Archer was not here for Cocky's old tricks, she had greater prey to hunt.

"You introduced the Wicked Enchanter to them," Indrani said. "Why?"

Catherine didn't know Cocky the way Archer did, didn't understand that for a stranger there really weren't a lot of levers that could be used to move a woman like that. So Cat figured that the Bard had found an ally here, but Indrani didn't. The Lady had raised all of them to know better than to make a deal with any entity you didn't know how to kill.

"Because he seemed like a man who'd use the service," Cocky said, rolling her eyes. "And he might have become useful when-"

The longknife flicked down, finely slicing through skin from below the eye to the bottom of the Concocter's cheek. Blood began to bead before the point had returned to hover above the eye, and the other Named swallowed a moan of pain.

"Lie to me again and it'll be the eye," Archer coldly said. "We called up his shade, Cocky, and we dug into things. We know a lot more than you think."

"Fine, it was a favour called in," the Concocter hissed out. "Happy?"

Indrani's face tightened in dismay. Had she really struck a deal with the Bard? Gods, one of the Lady's own? They'd been taught better than that, than to let themselves be made pawns and pieces in the Game of the Gods.

"Whose favour?"

"You know who," Cocky said. "The woman holding your leash might despise her, but half the heroes have a fond word to say."

"The Wandering Bard," Indrani quietly said.

"I heard the Peregrine has her back," the Concocter smiled. "I expect he'll speak for me as well, if you try to press this too far. Did you think you were the only one who could make friends in high places?"

Archer's fingers tightened around the hilt of the longknife.

"You have no idea who you bargained with," she tightly said. "Burning Hells, Cocky, what made you think you could bargain with a creature like that and end up ahead? We were both taught —"

The Concocter let out a burst of laughter, and Indrani had to pull back the blade or she would have pierced her eye.

"Oh, Ashen Gods," Cocky said. "Years out of Refuge, even after taking up with another band of villains, you still clutch to your blanket like a child. That blade you point so proudly at me, it's from the set she gave you isn't it? And that scarf, taken from the man who owned you while she looked on with motherly fondness."

"We all hid beneath her wing, before we could fly on our own," Indrani said. "There is no shame to be had there."

"There's always shame in being a fool," the Concocter said. "She wasn't your mother, Indrani. She wasn't any of our mothers, and she was barely even our teacher. She never gave a damn, even about you, and well all knew you were the favourite. The way you'll shatter like cheap glass if you admit that is honestly the most pathetic thing about you."

The urge was there to slice her again. Archer had sliced people for less, and she was being provoked her beyond what anyone could expect her to suffer without steel being bared. But Indrani had not come here to spill blood, she had come here for answers. And if she could not master herself long enough for get what she'd come from, if red heat and pride was all that she could bring forth, then she truly would be pathetic. Just a thug, fit for thug's work and nothing else. And the truth was that while there might have been a time where that would have been enough, when taking and bearing the consequences and doing it again and again and again until she died would have satisfied her, it no longer was. She had a hearth now, a warm place by it, and sometimes that meant bending the neck for a bit. A thirteen the thought of this would have disgusted her to the bone, but she was older now. She had learned what the world was like, when you were alone.

Indrani had come to understand why it was the world had fewer wolves than dogs.

"Gasses were used on the librarians in the Miscellaneous Stacks," Archer said. "They were rendered unconscious but not killed. Your work as well?"

Cocky was, for the first time, visibly taken aback.

"I, but – I didn't use those," the Concocter said. "They were a private commission from the Highest Assembly and the First Prince, a way to quell riots without deaths. But I only made a single batch, and it should be in the Repository awaiting shipment. I haven't attacked anyone, Archer."

She wasn't lying, Indrani decided. Not because of any particular fondness for the Concocter, but because she very much doubted that Cocky had dragged the potions and set them off in the Stacks. She wouldn't have the know-how for something that complex, much less the sneaking skills. Which meant there was at least one other traitor out there, acting knowingly on behalf of the Bard. And it'd been a traitor who'd known about a private commission being kept in the Repository, so most likely someone who worked in the Workshop and would have known about Cocky brewing something meant to ship out.

"I believe you," Archer admitted. "And will speak to that, along with the rest."

Something like surprise, and perhaps even gratitude, flickered across Cocky's face. Indrani, without wasting a moment, flipped her grip and struck her right in the fucking face with her longknife's handle. The Concocter's nose broke with a beautiful crunch, cartilage smashed and blood spraying. Archer's loosened her grip, after, and flicked her wrist as if she was shaking her knuckles.

"Consider that a reminder," Indrani said, "of lessons you should not have forgot."

And with that their business was done, she mused. If there was need for the location of the Repository crates raided for the gas receptacles, someone could be sent for ask. Besides, it was quite possible that the Concocter herself did not know. The other woman had reeled back from the blow, shouting in pain and holding her broken nose, but after her fingers came away red she turned to Indrani with cold eyes. Cocky smiled, that one nasty little number she only pulled out when she had something cutting to spit out in someone's ear.

"And there she is," the purple-eyed woman said. "Our old friend Indrani, bare of the pretences. It's a relief to see you acting without those airs you've been putting on. Still looking to just make someone bleed and then hiding behind another's cloak when consequences come."

That stung, more than it should have after the years that'd passed since she left Refuge.

"I'm not the one who's hiding behind the Terms," Indrani replied. "Or you'd be bleeding from a lot deeper in for some of the things you've said tonight, Cocky."

"Whatever happened to rules only mattering to other people, Archer?" the Concocter slyly said. "I thought you were going to be freed, unfettered. Nothing but you and the horizon, right?"

"Which of us is supposed to be clutching the Lady like a blanket again?" Indrani jeered. "Did it wound your precious little pride when she left, Cocky? Did it bite to realize that even with all your little potions and secrets in the end you just weren't that special?"

"Even now you're licking her boots," the Concocter said, tone disgusted.

"I always knew what she was," Indrani replied. "Who she was. She told us from the start. It's your own delusions that scraped you raw."

"Knew what she was?" Cocky shouted. "You sanctimonious bitch, you signed up with the first outfit that took you in. We stayed, Indrani, we stayed and she left. All these years with her, for her, and almost without a word she just left. Because we were pets to her, Archer, not people. And when you find something more interesting to do, pets get left behind."

"Whining," Indrani replied, contemptuous. "The pathetic whining of someone who was unwilling to stand on their feet and find their way outside the shelter of the Lady's shadow. You were given years as a pupil, teachings half the continent would lose a hand for, and now you complain because she was not willing to hold your hand until you breathed your last."

The Concocter snorted.

"Look at you, talking proudly like you didn't just trade one mistress for another," she mocked. "You think it makes you someone, that some girl with a crown found you fit to kill for her? You're still fetching errands for one of your betters, now you just have some fancy seal behind you instead of Ranger's reputation."

There was anger there, Indrani found, but any fool could have found that. The old hate was familiar too, in its own way, but it was the unfamiliar glint that caught Archer by surprise. Envy. And just like that, it fell into place.

"It burns you, doesn't it?" Archer said. "That I'm actually happy now."

The Concocter hadn't even flinched this hard when she'd broken the woman's nose.

"I wonder if they'd look at you the same, your Woe, if I told them what you're really like," Cocky said.

"They know," Indrani replied. "They've known from the start, and they love me anyway. That's the part that really burns you, isn't it?"

"You were vile to us," the Concocter snarled. "To everyone, any time you could get away with it. You taunted and bruised and bled us for sport, and now you're the Black Queen's enforcer?"

"We were all like that, Cocky," Indrani said. "And I don't miss it, but the lessons of those days kept me alive through worse ones."

"I still remember that night you forced Alexis into that sack full of beetles and tied it up," the purple-eyed villainess said. "Gods, the way she screamed. And the Lady just said-"

"That's one way to cure a fear," Indrani softly finished.

Casually, she'd said it. Almost amused. There'd been a time where Archer had admired that, thought that callousness was something to be cultivated instead of exactly what it claimed to be: callouses. Roughness born of use, the easiest thing in the world to accrue.

"No wonder she still wants to kill you," Cocky said. "One look at you with your Hierophant and your little queen and she will draw a fucking blade, Archer."

If she bent her neck now, Indrani thought, there might yet be something to repair here. Because they'd all hated each other at times, the Concocter was right about that, but it'd also been more complicated than that. Because it'd been them and then everyone else, and that wasn't a place you could live in for years without loving the people you shared it with. There had been warm lights shared along with the dark places. But Indrani would have to apologize. To express regret. To lie. Because the truth of it was that Archer didn't particularly regret who she'd been at thirteen. She'd make no excuses for that girl either, but Indrani could look that past in the eye without feeling all that ashamed.

Sometimes she figured that Catherine believed her to be, when they talked of Refuge. But Hells, Cat had always taken them as better people than they were. Sometimes Indrani felt a little bit of shame over that, not being the better person her friend thought she was, but those claws never dug deep. Mostly because Archer actually liked who she was, for the most part. She was comfortable with it, she'd grown comfortable with it. And that meant if the things she cared about changed in ways she might never have imaged they would when she'd been a girl, it didn't trouble her. Indrani believed in doing what she wanted, most of all, and sometimes that could be a little more complicated than just enjoying what was happening at hand.

"Refuge is dead," Archer said, "bury it, Cocky, and move on. I have."

"You don't get it, do you?" the Concocter laughed, and it was a bleak sound. "You think it's about your having found a good backer or a bedmate, or even just a place in the world. That we hate the way you thrive."

"Isn't it?" Indrani asked.

"It's the way you laugh with them, Indrani," Cocky quietly said. "The way there's no prick to the barbs. Because you love them and they love you."

Hand whipping around she viciously threw down a rack of empty vials, glass shattering over the floor, and there was a hate on her face that was like pondwater gone still and festering.

"We would have loved you too, if you'd let us," the Concocter said. "If you'd given us what you give them. But you never did. What is it that makes them so much better, Archer, so much more deserving?"

"I never had to fight them," Indrani honestly said.

They'd never been competition, the way the others had been in Refuge. There'd been jostling, growing pains, but never anything with bite to it. It'd been a hearth opened to her, not other wolves to fight for the same scraps.

"That's the thing, Archer," the Concocter tiredly said. "You never had to fight us either."

That, more than any other thing she had heard that night, gave Indrani pause. It had the unpleasant ring of truth to it. The other woman drew in on herself, bloody and somehow looking exhausted.

"Go," she said. "I have to brew myself something to fix the nose and I've seen enough of you for two lifetimes."

Indrani replied with a jerky nod, wiping her blade clean on her coat before sheathing it and abruptly turning. It felt like fleeing when she left the room, no matter how much she told herself otherwise. The door closed shut behind her and Archer let out a shallow breath. She, too, felt oddly exhausted. Leaning against the wall for a bit, she wondered if would truly leave it all at that. There were more pressing things to see to, and she needed to find Cat and pass along the answers, but somehow she thought that if she left now that conversation would be over for good. Could she live with that? Did she want to? Lips twisting, she raised a hesitant hand towards the handle.

The Arsenal shivered.

Indrani's hair rose up all over her body, the sensation of coming danger acute, and the hand went down. There was never enough time, was there? It was something you had to learn to live with, the give and take of how you were willing to spend yourself. The door was slammed open and Cocky peered out, some sort of dark poultice shining on her cheek. She caught sight of Archer a moment later.

"What was that?" she asked.

The Arsenal shivered again, like door being pounded on.

"Trouble come a 'knocking," Indrani drawled.

She cocked her head to the side, studying the other villainess.

"What?" the Concocter said, sounding irritated.

"You're going to end up on a lot of powerful people's shit list your role in this, Cat not the least of them," Archer said.

"And?" Cocky replied, unimpressed by the prediction.

"How would you like to get a head start," Indrani said, "on earning your way out of those?"

They locked gazes, hazelnut to purple, and a long moment passed. The Concocter dipped her head the slightest bit.

"I still have a field bag," Cocky said. "Give me a moment to grab it."

It wasn't much, Indrani thought. Barely anything at all. But it was something, and if she'd learned anything since she'd stumbled across the two most important people of her life in Marchford all those years ago, it was this: people who didn't plant seeds never got to grow trees.

Indrani wasn't surprised the Arsenal's wards eventually broke, even though Cocky expressed her disbelief what must have been a least three different times. It didn't matter how tall the walls were or how thick the gates when there were traitors behind both. The breach had taken place in a set of hallways between the Belfry and the Workshop, so the two of them had been close, but by the time they got there the battle had moved on. An utterly smashed workshop that'd once belonged to the Blind Maker now boasted mostly broken wood and corpses, though fresh guards had come in since what must have been the first slaughter. Archer found an officer and got asking question, Cocky lingering behind her and not bothering to offer potions to the few wounded still around. Indrani approved.

The brews she carried that'd help were expensive, and best kept for more urgent situations.

"We were crushed, Lady Archer," the Levantine captain in charge told her. "We would have all been slain if the Mirror Knight and his allies did not intervene."

"Who did the crushing?" Indrani asked.

"Fae," the captain said. "They were not many, less than thirty, but their power... it was like nothing I've ever seen."

If the Courts ever remembered the Dominion of Levant's existence it was no doubt to even more promptly forget about it, so that didn't mean much. There was no point in asking the mustachioed man if it was a princess or a count they were dealing with, it wasn't like the fairies went around announcing their titles to human rank and file.

"Mirror Boy and his band drew them away?" Indrani pressed.

"Some but not all," the captain said. "A band left the rest, heading for Belfry. And there are some among my men who say it was not the Mirror Knight that had the fae moving."

"Meaning?" Archer frowned.

"They might have been looking for someone, and that is why they let themselves be drawn towards the Repository," the captain said. "But it was battle, Lady Archer, and that makes for poor recall and wild truths."

"Thank you, captain," Indrani muttered, and the man saluted.

Cocky leaned in closer.

"The Repository is where they've been stashing that sword," she quietly said.

"Adjutant's with Looking Glass and his buddies," Indrani replied. "He'll keep them pointed at the enemy, and the enemy out of the good stuff. We're headed for the Belfry."

The Concocter's brow rose.

"Worried about your," and there she hesitated, "... lover?"

"Partner," Archer said. "No, he can look after himself just fine. But he keeps some nifty stuff in his rooms, and I don't think it's a coincidence that fae headed that way."

"We'll be too late to do much, considering the fae left some time ago," Cocky pointed out.

"We're late as first line of defence, sure," Indrani shrugged. "But we're headed out as reinforcements, and for that we're just fine."

Because a running battle against fae in the middle of the Belfry had trouble written all over it, which mean Cat would be drawn there like a moth to the flame. Probably half drunk and halfway through a terrible plan that'd somehow end up working, Indrani fondly thought, or at least close enough to working that she could pretend it'd achieved what she'd meant it to. They set out quickly, because fashionably later got results but actual late was just being sloppy. The gates into the great tower of the Belfry were wide open, but wariness wasn't why Indrani's steps stuttered. The very stone of the floor had been charred, almost turned to glass in that distinctive way that blackflame did. But this was too much, she thought, and not wielded well. Even just the shape of the burn...

She strode forward, heedless of the possibility of ambush and even the sound of fighting far above. The Night had, by the marks on the floor and the slight inclined of melted stone, billowed outwards in an explosion. But at the centre of where that explosion had begun, Archer could see a charred corpse with a knife stuck in its neck. She knew that blade, had seen it used before. No, Indrani told herself. It can't be her. She wouldn't have died from a knife. Cat might not be able to pull the regeneration tricks the drow could, or even heal with Night, but she could have kept herself from bleeding out long enough to kill the Fallen Monk and gotten to a healer. Indrani chose to ignore the treacherous whisper in the back of her mind about Night being able to hurt Catherine, when she did not properly control it.

"Cocky," Archer said, voice steady. "I need you to have a look at that corpse."

The other woman grimaced.

"Archer, that's probably..."

"If it is, I want to know for sure," Archer said. "Cut the body if you have to."

The Concocter slowly nodded.

"And you?"

Indrani reached for the bow on her back, fingers itching for an arrow, and looked up at the spire where the sounds of a fight were echoing from.

"I'm going to make someone bleed," the Archer said, and her voice rang of steel.

Insanenoodlyguy

"Whining," Indrani replied, contemptuous. "The pathetic whining of someone who was unwilling to stand on their feet and vote for Practical Guide to Evil on Topwebfiction. You were given a great story, plots half the continent would lose a hand for, and now you complain because you'll keep getting more prompts until you read your last."

What happened is Cat killed the monk with black flame, she healed with Night. Probably by praying to the crows, then put the knife in the monks neck so any Fae who looked will think she is dead and be surprised later.

Shveiran

I really liked this one

Liliet

(Yet again, cheapening a strong emotional moment)

(Can't you just pick the funny bits to use for this?)

ThatOneGuy

One body and nobody there to patch it together. That or we see the next trick or Cat coming back from the grave as she was short a death for this book... And you can not really come back easily if the king of the dead does the deed or murder.

Oh sure he can raise you, but the bindings are a bit tricky to get out of.

Miles

I'm sure we'll have one of them too. She's been through the revolving door so many times now it's part of her role and likely new Name too.

Burlyraven

Okay, even if the corpse isn't Cat, this feels like it's going to get incredibly messy before the end. Either way, Cat would have had to pull heavily on some eldritch forces, and there are always consequences to that. She'd probably avoid apotheosis a second time, and that severely limits the favorable outcomes.

Ross

We've seen that she has the ability to carry bodies in the Night. So she probably released that explosion of Night flame, swapped in a body, and slinked away before the flames went down.

Shveiran

This.

Really people, Cat put together a band of betrayers she knew would likely stab her given the chance, and she did so for the express purpose to draw them out.

She is a Mastermind whose plan has not really been ruined in any meaningful way; she was aware of the Fallen Monk's skills at least in a general way, and the methos he supposedly "did her in" with is not more complicated than "unexpected knife".

Isn't it a given she had an answer ready?

I will believe this killed Catherine Foundling only if it is confirmed in this Book's Epilogue.

Shveiran

Unless of course dying was somehow part of the plan, though I doubt that. She isn't the Squire anymore.

Liliet

...I'm not sure that's an obstacle.

Shveiran

Not an obstacle. A risk.

Dying as part of the plan means if the plan backfires you are still dead; it's all or nothing, putting all your eggs in one basket.

SquireCat did this daily, FUNCat plays it as safe as reasonably possible; and this is not an instance where dying has to be a part of the plan.

Shikkarasu

I find your lack of Faith disturbing.

Liliet

True!

Ninestrings

Calling it now, Cat returned the knife to our monk friend with interest.

If that's the case has Cat come into her name and developed fire powers? or did a third party torch him?

Burlyraven

A third party like a certain fire adept that's been stowed away in the Night for some time now, albeit presumably dead twice over?

Only half meming on this one.

Cicero

Too much evidence. I'll believe Cat is dead when a thousand years have passed and she hasn't reappeared.

dadycoool

Only a thousand? Dread Empress Triumphant, may she never return, is still feared 700 years later.

raven

lol, reminds me of the ciaphas cain novels.

the main protag in those books got reported KIA so many times that his superiors just gave up keeping track and still have him listed on active duty 20 years after his official state funeral.

Liliet

Was he alive?

Liliet

After these 20 years, I mean?

Composaurus

(not OP) I don't believe so but the author started writing books again after an 8 year hiatus and it wouldn't be out of character for him to make a 'surprise' return. The books are written out of order though so future books might just be set before he died.

Insanenoodlyguy

oh he started writing Cain again? Or just started writing? Either way glad to hear it!

ThatOneGuy

The hero of the imperium was one of the few characters who made it past the date when 40k had originally stopped so... Possibly. We have yet to get another book, but nobody would be surprised if the ship he was on before being declared dead simply popped out of the warp a bit late.

Liliet

b e a u t i f u l

LarsBlitzer

Honestly, I wouldn't put it past GW to make that happen, then have the Custodes finally mount a text-to-speech module on a certain corpse on a throne...

But yes, IF Cat was killed before she could return the favor to the Monk, and IF she passed out before being able to call on Night, and IF there was interference in doing so, well, that's an awful lot of "if."

Zahariel

No, he was very much dead. Of old age. Which, by itself, was incredibly suspicious in its own right, considering the life he lived and the universe he lived in.

Liliet

BEAUTIFUL

ethan B

nah he's dead dead.

the Administratum refused to mark him as dead because it was cheaper to continue paying his salary after his funeral. but one of the points is even dead he inspired so many people as the hero of the imperium that he could still be considered as in service from beyond the grave

Liliet

> the Administratum refused to mark him as dead because it was cheaper to continue paying his salary after his funeral.

Wait, wait, cheaper than what? I gotta hear this one!

TeK

Got a really good deal on life insurance, I imagine

Insanenoodlyguy

Bureaucracy. He became such a hero that every time he "died" it started to cost a small fortune to put the word out far and wide only to then need to retract everything with a correction. The administratum always struggled to keep up with the paperwork and finally decided on a "Screw it, we don't change his status. He's alive and on active duty, period."

Liliet

This is so beautiful...

Insanenoodlyguy

Mind you, it's not like it was always "Oh we can't find him after this fight, well, he must be dead!" it was "When last we heard from the ship, it was on fire, taking more fire, falling into the atmosphere, and the ship left a crater in the ground with no pods having been fired... I think... I think he's gone."

Then a few months later he not only shows up and he literally stumbled into the demoiic cultists who were using the orc invasion as a distraction to fulfill their own plots, ruined their day, and created a strategic opening in the orc horde while bringing back invaluable intel on their movements. Meanwhile, inside his brain it's like this.

Javvies

Hang on.

Do you have an actual source/citation for that?

Because if you don't, I'm gonna have to call BS on the "it cost too much money" theory.

This is 40k. The Administratum and the Imperium is so vast that it is common for planets to be lost. The cost associated with decorating him dead and then needing to correct then declare him alive again would have been lost in a single rounding error in Imperial budgets.

No, without a source for the monetary concern, I'm pretty sure it's because they didn't like needing to go back into their records and correct them again and again after he was declared dead. After all, if you keep him listed as alive, you never need to worry about him popping up alive and complaining about being called dead and needing to reactivate his codes and clearances.

Remember, the record keepers don't like needing to change their records to account for things not in their reports.

Insanenoodlyguy

I did also refer to the time and reasources spent. I agree any cost in crowns would be more of a "this is a ridiculous waste of money and it's making our department look bad" more than "we can't afford this." I agree that the real cost was time spent changing all the goddamn paperwork AGAIN.

Javvies

The books aren't in chronological order.

Well, each set of three (1-3, 4-6, e.t.c) is in chronological order relative to one another, as there are related aspects in a super-arc, so to speak, but each book is a standalone, and set widely apart in time. He did, after all, serve as a Commissar for over a century, plus retire to spend time as an instructor at a Schola Progenium, only to be recalled to active service multiple times.

That said, I suspect that he actually does end up dead for reals at some point, as he did get a formal state funeral, and his Inquisitor girlfriend thinks he's dead.

In fact, the books are set as his personal recollections recorded subsequent to publishing some of his memoirs, and recorded over the course of years of his retirement, not the memoir he'd published, as he wrote them, out of chronological order and no organisational process that could be determined, found on a data slate and curated and annotated by said Inquisitor girlfriend after his death for limited and classified distribution to some of her Inquisitor colleagues.

However, since early on in his career he had been declared dead only to be discovered to be alive repeatedly ... it was eventually ordered that all reports of his death were to be ignored, and the Munitorium isn't allowed to declare him dead or list him as dead on their records.

And, in one campaign, very early in his career, as described in ... book 4, chronologically the first of the full length novels, though some of the short stories are placed earlier, he got declared dead when the troop transport he was on got attacked and the section he was in was opened to vacuum, with witnesses to him not getting on the right side of the emergency bulkheads before they closed, only to turn up a few weeks later in an escape pod in orbit of the planet they were heading to, only to be attacked and seemingly shot and crashed down into enemy held territory by an Ork fighter, only to turn up a few months later at the head of an army collected and formed behind enemy lines ... and said army had been thought to be cornered and completely destroyed by the Orks based on satellite surveillance, though at the time I don't think they knew he was in charge of it.

As for what actually killed/will kill him in the end ... I don't think that's ever actually been mentioned, but we know that he had at least a century of active service, plus an indeterminate amount of retirement, though we also know that he had gotten rejuve treatments at least once. So it could be old age, though with known rejuve treatments that's questionable, even discounting that it's Warhammer 40k.

Insanenoodlyguy

The implication was he was actually dead, but he'd been certainly dead so many times the policy stuck, body in a casket or no.

Cain's whole deal is being a combo of Abigail and Bumbling Conjuror. He's got legitimate talent and ability, but his accidentally stumbling into things (he's repeatedly tried to go "Fuck no, I'm out" only to wander into the REAL plot in the process of trying to flee) makes him look like an unparalleled genius. He's got perfectly normal and sensible policies and leadership style, but in a world where religious fanaticism and martyrdom is encouraged he is seen as a father to his men, hard but fair and always doing what he can to bring his boys home. That, the aforementioned # of times he wandered home after being declared dead, and a state propaganda machine make him a God-touched living legend (note the man in comparison to his action figure) nobody would dare count out anymore.

That image is hilarious.

Actually, I think Ciaphas Cain is more like a cross between Abigail and the Fortunate Fool, rather than the Bumbling Conjurer. Only luckier.

Or, well, no, not really any of the luck based Hero types we've seen. He and Abigail are a lot closer than anything else.

Because the luck Heroes also tend to be comic relief characters, even to their fellows, and while we readers sometimes laugh, in-universe, he's broadly revered by his fellow subjects of the God-Emperor.

Also, because he's actually quite competent when he's not trying to dodge any semblance of responsibility or danger. And, hell, he's not reliant on luck-based plot armor in combat the way Bumbling Conjuror was.

He is actually good in a fight without needing to slip and fall to dodge attacks. He'd take cover like a sensible fellow, and is actually insanely good with his chainsword – like, good enough that if that were his only thing, he'd have a Name based on it in the Guideverse.

Basically, the only thing he's not good at is dodging dangerous situations.

Liliet

Protagonist luck!

dadycoool

Well, shit. That's my reaction to each part of this chapter. Backstory for Archer! Yay! At least we know Cat isn't interested in surrounding herself with Good people, just people who know restraint. And for all that Archer was aloof when they first met, she did fit in rather seamlessly.

Welp, looks like Archer is about to cut loose for the first time in a while. If anyone hurts one of her people, a lot of people pay the price. And it looks to her and us like someone managed to kill Cat. I don't imagine even DK could find anything useful left over from the aftermath of what's about to happen.

IDKWhoitis

I'm willing to bet it's a fae corpse or something. And Cat is still probably very wounded. Because it wouldn't be a proper Foundling gambit if Cat isn't crippled and dying as the set up for the show down (which would probably include words with the Bard).

dadycoool

Oh, yeah. She doesn't consider things going according to her plan unless she's bleeding on the floor, unable to pick up a weapon, and gargling on her own blood. Fortunately, this doesn't extend to her underlings, because somehow she considers herself more expendable than even a single legionnaire.

Liliet

Hey, a single legionary she doesn't feel THAT bad about. It's when it's someone she personally cares for that she gets upset, and when it's a whole fucking company that she gets guilty.

D00d

Archer recognized the knife so the corpse is the Monk with Cat's sleeve knife in his throat.

Wait, wasn't he part of her band ?

Well played EE.

Liliet

She realized Monk was there so it's Monk's knife, whoever's the body is.

Shveiran

This is, if anything, evidence that it is the Monk's body.

If Archer recognizes the dagger, it's likely a favored tool like her own swords. So if FM killed Cat, why would he leave the dagger in the body?

Whereas if Cat killed the Monk with his own knife because fuck him, she'd not care to retrieve it.

Liliet

Well if FM killed Cat then IMMEDIATELY got vaporized by Nightsplosion...

Shveiran

...which somehow vaporized his clothing and items, but not the dagger?

It's possible, granted, but...

Liliet

The dagger's stuck in Cat, who is the origin point of the explosion and something of an eye of the storm.

...actually I'd expect it to not affect her at all in that case... HMMMM 😊

numberlen

If Cat is to be a rival to the bard, then death won't even be an obstacle.

Assuming of course that is indeed her corpse.

Frivolous

Interesting that Indrani, who was protective of Masego during Kairos's Last Stand, doesn't consider him endangered enough to be needing her this time. Has he grown so powerful in the 2-year interval?

Also, Indrani was a sadistic bully in her younger years. Nasty. And she still feels little or no remorse, which is very interesting.

Liliet

I mean, she's still going to where he might be. It's just not the main reason.

> Also, Indrani was a sadistic bully in her younger years. Nasty. And she still feels little or no remorse, which is very interesting.

From what she told Cat, she very much agrees with the "nasty" epithet.

She just thought there wasn't any other way, both back then and uh, up until now. She blamed Hye for all of it, but now she's realizing it's within her power to fix it, and was within her power back then too, she just didn't realize it.

Because she came in from the wild, and Hye did not see anything wrong with her being a biting, scared mess =x

Oshi

Hye doesn't teach anything except survival. Indrani was raised a slave. Morality and self worth/love were not in her vocabulary.

Liliet

Fun fact I realized upon rereading the chapter!

Indrani's understanding was that if she didn't hurt others she would have gotten hurt in that way herself.

This is the condition upon which she:

- tells Cat about how fucked up it was;
- considers 'bending her neck' to Silver Huntress just for the sake of mending the relationship;
- muses about how she's not ashamed of being that person [who would rather hurt others-her-family than get hurt herself] [notably implying that has changed] but Cat probably expects her to be the kind of person who is.

Like, is it just me, or like, wow?

Zach

But I think she is starting to feel remorse, or at least regret. She recognized that there was some truth to what Concocter said about her being unwilling to even try treating them like a family (which they basically are, regardless of Ranger's distorted upbringing).

Liliet

Indrani had been assuming that her only choices were being the one doing the hurting or the one being hurt.

Concocter's words... pusher her further along the path to the realization that no, it was just her and the demons in her head, nobody else was playing that game.

The reason she "didn't regret who she'd been at thirteen" was because she parsed "who she'd been at thirteen" as "a person who would rather push the hurt on others than take it herself". Not as "a person who swung at shadows and didn't see what was really going on around her".

superkeaton

Nice to see Archer realize she spent her youth being a wretched bully and that her mentor never really cared about any of them. This is good character growth. Concocter seems like a deeply unpleasant miser carrying a lot of loneliness.

Liliet

Indrani already knew Hye didn't care and that she spent her youth being a wretched bully. She told Cat as much, at Camps.

No, the realization is similar to Akua's – that there was another way. That she COULD have done better.

RoflCat

And that the current Archer can do, well, at least try, it now.

She probably won't ever be fond of Cocky the same way as those two.

Assuming Cocky doesn't end up dead because she's learned the danger of being used by Bard and thus no longer a usable pawn.

Because that's likely one way Bard kept her reputation so 'clean' all these time: Bury any villains she used and tell it off as heroic trickery.

Heroes? Maybe if they stop being a blind savant, but most don't so eh.

Liliet

Mhm.

I can't wait for the spectacle that will be Archer 'bending her neck' to the Silver Huntress. Because I think Cocky's words crossed the threshold on which Archer was already considering doing that, and no matter what it ends up being, it'll be a spectacle to me. Somehow I trust erratic with pulling off "a bully apologizing" in a satisfactory way.

Here's hope it'll happen onscreen,,,

Oshi

I'm not sure it will but then I still think Indrani might die before all this is over. If it does happen on screen though I think the possibility will become a surety.

Liliet

We'll just see who's right ~~you evil jinx~~

Jurai

We're gonna see Masego go full blown ballistic if that happens

Zach

I think there's a difference between Indrani saying she realizes Ranger doesn't care and her really accepting that. It's obvious that she views Ranger as a parental figure (like Concocter points out, she still uses the knives and scarf Ranger gave her), and the stuff about her knowing Ranger doesn't care is mostly her being in denial to avoid actually confronting those feelings and what they imply about Ranger as a person.

She's also probably less willing than the other Refuge people to think poorly of Ranger because of how Ranger "rescued" her from slavery. Even if Ranger is emotionally and physically abusive towards her, she feels like she can't condemn her for it, because she owes her. So she has to rationalize things in such a way that Ranger isn't doing anything wrong (which involves internalizing Ranger's whole "might is right" philosophy).

TeK

Yeah, really hard to argue against inherently harmful philosophy when it was the only one that saved you.

Kinda goes along with the theme of the series. Like Cat said to Pilgrim, she knows they are monsters, but when she was growing up, Praes was the only game in town, and she chose the best option available.

This is how cults operate, really. When you are desperate, you can make some bad choices that you know are bad, because the alternative is even worse.

Or another example from the series. "Summoning demons is objectively the worst thing a person can do, but it feels much better than death"

Liliet

I think Indrani WAS in denial back in Refuge, but when she talks to Cat about those things in Book 4... well, Cat talks right over that denial. "It's okay to still love her" etc. And Indrani specifically told Cat she stayed with her instead of going back because Refuge wasn't home.

Wait, what were we disagreeing on?

Liliet

Oh wow.

Indrani vs old memories... and then STILL A FUCKING CLIFFHANGER

'cause Indrani's logic is my logic, this doesn't make sense (also, y'know, Cat's the protagonist) but I don't think we'll get a fakeout of 'oh yeah it's the Monk's body'?
WHAT IS GOING ON

Oshi

Cat's dead. Just need to see if it sticks this time. I'm kind of sad EE is going back to this well but then what can yah do.

Shveiran

She isn't, come on. I give this author a lot more street cred than this.

laguz24

I really want to see how MK handles Archer and her complete lack of respect, oh it will be glorious. Also, it's nice to see what those years with cat did for her.

Liliet

Mirror Knight is extremely elsewhere. Archer's going to back up Adanna and Roland.

RoflCat

.....Wait.

Rogue Artificer
Archer
Concocter
And likely Hierophant

They'd have their own Band of Five up there.

Roland being a Lancer-turned-Leader the Voltron way.
Artificer the rebellious Lancer who just got her 'oh shit I was dumb' moment.
Hierophant likely taking the Big Guy spot in this fight given his Name being good against Fae.
Archer probably take both Smart Guy and Heart in role since she's likely the only one who can translate for Masego right now.
Concocter? The tag-along kid for now.

Agent J

I dunno. Concocter did pretty well as the Heart in this chapter. Gods know it wasn't Archer.

RoflCat

The Heart role is for the band as a whole, which on the assumption Masego will be the 5th member makes it rather impossible for anyone but Archer to do so.

If anything this chapter's 'redemption' moment of Archer let her qualify as the Heart for this team.
She's already a friend to Roland.
Communicating with Masego outside of research topic is a lost cause for most people.
She just reopen the path to being a friend to Concocter.
She's definitely not going to like Artificer for a while which is fine given that Artificer is basically Zuko during the turning period right now, and Archer's a little more tolerant after Akua and Concocter here.

Liliet

Tbf Masego's got some Heart talents of his own.

Sun Dog

Zeze has the heart of an angel. It's in a jar somewhere.

nick012000

Wait, was there a Band of Five among the Ranger's pupils? Archer, Beastmaster, Concocter, Hunter, and Silver Huntress?

Liliet

I think it was mentioned at some point there were five total. Kind of weird, felt to me like there should have been more, but there we have it.

laguz24

There was no story for them to be a band of five and the hero/villain/neutral divide plus ranger's teachings would have kept them all mostly semi hating each other.

Liliet

No story, yeah.

Hero/villain/neutral divide doesn't seem like much of an obstacle IF there was a story to put them together in the first place.

And it sounds like there was a chance for them to band together, Hye was egging them on when they fought but not MAKING them fight.

Do I want Indrani to recover these relationships? Yes. Very. Very very.

nick012000

Maybe Ranger intended to have them as a backup in case something managed to kill her – five students whose teacher tragically dies, forcing them to unite and work together to survive the attacks of the minions of the Evil Overlord who killed her, and ultimately avenging her death.

Liliet

A backup for what? Hye doesn't have any goals outside the personal. There's nothing for them to complete in her absence, cause she doesn't care what happens in her absence.

She just found it entertaining to train students, after Amadeus. For a while anyway.

TeK

I could've sworn it was mentioned that there was more than five. But it is beyond me to actually search.

Liliet

I presume there was also non-Named population.

TeK

"I could go to Refuge," Archer offered. "Most pupils will be gone, especially the heroes – last I heard Silver signed up with the White Knight – but there's bound to be one or two left I can beat into joining. Lady Ranger probably won't care enough to get involved."

Heroes implies more than one and Hunter is dead, so it's Silver plus one.

"Beastmaster might qualify with the right mount, but he's not a pushover I can bully and he doesn't really give a shit about anything going on outside the Waning Woods. Also tends to disappear for months at a time, so he might not be there at all. Concocter's the only one I can be sure will be there, but her thing is potions and she uses ingredients from the woods for most her brews."

But admittedly the ground are pretty thin and those that are Named in chapter are the only ones to have a consistent appearance.

Liliet

> Most pupils will be gone, especially the heroes – last I heard Silver signed up with the White Knight – but there's bound to be one or two left I can beat into joining.

Yup, this is from where I got the impression there were more than five! If 'one or two' is the minority compared to 'most' who left, and not even the whole minority but the part of it Indrani can beat into joining...

agumentic

So, whose Interlude we are going to see on Friday, do you think? Kingfisher Prince? Mirror Knight? Someone else?

Dresden 67

Probably one of those two, yeah.

Maybe Adjutant or the Repentant Magister.

ruduen

My money's on Hierophant.

M0och123

Mine is on Adjutant

Dan Lawrence

Adjutant or Hierophant probably.

Agent J

I desperately want a Christophe pov. Was hoping we'd get it today, actually. Definitely not complaining though. This was exactly the sort of gut punch I come here for. Either way, I'm hoping the next one is MK.

Magicturtle

EE, even though i love these interludes the cliffhangers is slowly killing me :p I need answers please

Darkening

Well, time for Archer to remind everyone why she was Ranger's favorite. They're gonna wish they could get stuffed into a sack of beetles when she's done here.

Decius

It's possible that they will end up stuffed into several sacks that also have beetles in them.

Walter

Man I've totally lost the thread of this. Archer, our protag, tortured this lady, then trusted the information that she got from that, and now she's trusting her victim with what might well be Cat's body?

Mental Mouse

Both of them are traditional Villains – not Praesi-style, but more in the usual mold for Villains in general. Especially given their “upbringing” in general and their respective positions, that was practically a friendly chat... between one of the Black Queen's own band and an underling whose side business endangered the Big Plan.

Letouriste

Complicated relationships.

It holds on a rational level to let her with cat given concocter badly want a few good words for her case after the mess.

TeK

Not tortured, actually, more threatened. Although by some standards she basically sweettalked. Also you would be surprised how dependable are bonds born out of mutual abuse.

Liliet

You probably missed that they are adopted siblings.

And what TeK said.

Walter

Every time we talk we always end up in definition town. The author drops an atrocity on us and I'm like “nuts, I wish our protags weren't such garbage people” and you come past to explain that it doesn't count.

Like, our greatest hits include Cat's slavery not counting as slavery, it's just that they have to do what she says or they are killed and they can't quit and never get paid. We got Cat's person-cloak being totally dif from the antag's person-cloak. The pattern isn't super hard to suss out.

But, like, this one is literally in the same update as the comments. I can just scroll up and read the original, no clicking required. Even your denial fu can't possibly be up to this.

Archer is literally beating someone and cutting them with a knife while asking them questions! That's ‘sweet talk’? If anybody did to a protag what Indrani is currently doing to this character the entire rest of the book would be about the Woe burning down the entire world in order to take endless revenge. How you gonna say that isn't torture?

Morgenstern

I think what was meant with "by some standards she basically sweettalked" was a HEAVY focus on the definition of "some standards"... Like, for asshole X (who "makes an art out of" torture... well, in THEIR definition) that is sweettalk, whereas for any normal sane person it is already torture...

TeK

Why is it for every time I decide to be sarcastic in the comments someone writes up a rant telling me I am wrong?

Liliet

..this time it wasn't even addressed to you!

(I'm not bitter)

TeK

Maybe he just feels intimidated by me for some reason

Liliet

Okay, by "what TeK said" I actually meant the second paragraph, sorry for not clarifying. If you want to argue against the sweet talk thing, take it up with TeK.

What I meant (and was sloppy in expressing) was > Also you would be surprised how dependable are bonds born out of mutual abuse.

TeK

Torture is when you apply pain or other types of unpleasant experience to get information. Threat is when you promise to do so.

I feel like Indrani inflicting injuries was more of a response to some personal jabs, unrelated to an effort to get information. Seeing as she did it mostly after getting said information.

Although we can agree that it's intimidation if nothing else. Also, well, I was more sarcastic than anything. I mean, it was terrible, but by this point my standards for that inverse are kinda skewed.

Cocky is a drug dealer and she got her nose broken and her cheek cut. Quite honestly, wouldn't call it torture even IRL.

Shveiran

Not to mention, so far as Indrani knows, an accomplice in a plan whose purpose is to endanger the two people she loves the most and also cause the zombification of the continent.

There is "not being a murderhobo" and there is "being so convinced a pacifist you wouldn't shot Hitler". Indrani is resorting to violence (against a Named that will likely not even bear scars for it), but context matters, godsdamn it.

TeK

Not that being a murderhobo is bad, mind you. That is how my DnD party is named after all.

Zach

Have you guys been reading a different story than me?. Because last I checked, this is the story where Catherine has repeatedly commented on her friends being kind of morally dubious and Archer has a habit of literally murdering people to steal their liquor.

This chapter is basically part of a character arc of Archer coming to terms with the way Ranger's abusive upbringing affected her as a person (which includes stuff like her adopting Ranger's "killing people is fine, actually" morality).

Javvies

Complications.

I wonder – did the First Prince actually make an order for nonlethal sleepy gas from Concocter or did someone fake that request, in order to have it available for Bard's plots?

The corpse is not Cat. Or, if it is, the current condition is going to be very temporary.

On the other hand, Monk is a significantly different body type and size relative to Cat, so it's probably not him either.

Ooh, could maybe be the corpse of the Scorched Apostate that Cat knifed and dumped to fake her death, so as to be able to work around Bard's plots and assets, and spring out back to life to ruin them.

Liliet

Good question.

A nonlethal sleepy gas sounds like a good thing for a head of state to stockpile, especially in a nation -this- close to localized riots for various reasons.

Which only means it's believable, which only makes it easier to fake.

Faking a request is higher level access than stealing stuff, I'll note.

Javvies

Eh, depends on how the request was made.
Private letter directly to Concocter would be super easy.
Formal request relayed through the leadership of Arsenal?
Hard. Request relayed through a seemingly trustworthy intermediary that was actually compromised by Bard? Not too difficult.
Especially if there was also included an ask to keep things quiet.

Also, one thing that makes me suspicious?
There's only been a single batch of the stuff made, and it was supposed to be waiting to be moved out. Which means it's a recent "request" ... two plus years on. Sure, I could buy asking for sleepy gas right after the coup attempt. But the timing of just requesting such a thing now is suspicious as hell. And only in a limited amount? No. That's just a little too convenient a coincidence, I think.

Abodmuthkat

You know, it's not explicitly spelled out, but Cat probably still has the corpse of the Wicked Enchanter tucked away in the Night, after their little chat. Loose ends, and all. And the two of them were already close enough to the same shape for a glamour to work.

TeK

That is perfect and rather obvious in retrospect explanation to the corpse, shame I didn't think of that.

onedollargum

More like the Blackened Queen, am I right? ;D

TeK

As low ng as she isn't Blacked Queen.

Revenant

What do you mean?

TeK

Trust me, if you didn't get it, it's for the best.

JRogue

Hierophant is about to step out of his workshop, very upset that someone is fighting on his doorstep, and disrupting his work. Then he will own that fae duchess before being delighted to find a titled fae of the Autumn Court there for him to... experiment... on.

Draconic

I'm not too worried about Cat. Being dead never stopped her for long. If she is dead at all. She did choose members of her group because she suspected them of being traitors...

JJR

"Never make a deal with something that you don't know how to kill."

Ranger the Notoriously Unkillable

Lokesh Chandak

Well, they never made deals with her, did they. They were more at her mercy and under her... protection? That's definitely the wrong word for it.

TeK

So I've been thinking. What is Bard's justification for all of this? I mean let's be honest, we all expect Cat to get out of this bag, and she did attacked Arsenal, which is full of weapons.

Instructed Fae to go after the Dead King killing sword no less. That can have several outcomes, not one of which is that good for her. Going after Severity will have some severe consequences. She really will sever all ties with Heroes if she destroyed Severance.

So what do you think it is? I personally think she will use Hierophant as a scapegoat. Likely he is still has traces of Dead King's control. His interlude does start with him doing something with a sword. And then there are Chekhov's arrays under Mirage. And ever since the disturbances he disappeared into thin air, not really mentioned or remembered in "he is an asset that we have" sort of way". As in, he is in this fucking Arsenal and is instrumental to at least one major target of thr intruders.

Cat'n'co defend his quarters, but somehow don't remember that he exists? And then WB's agents seem to be under impression that he is the Betrayer. We have no claim as to otherwise aside from Cat's trust and she was established as an Unreliable Narrator.

The Arsenal being compromised from inside by DK seem to be like a perfect excuse to use external forces, and given that the possible perpetrator is a close and trusted ally of Queen of the Lost and Found box, it can even excuse as to why high command wasn't in the know.

As they say, perfect crime is the one you are legally bound to commit.

Liliet

I don't think Bard has a justification for all of this. I think she's deliberately and consciously ceding this one to Cat and positioning herself as everyone's enemy.

Why? Fuck knows! But it's consistent with her antagonizing Cat for no particular reason, so far.

TeK

Nah, it's more a contriving for the sake of contriving. Noone wants to be everyone's enemy, and if they did, there are far more effective ways. She had to leave herself some plausible deniability, otherwise it's just sloppy craftsmanship and that is just ain't her.

Also I would disagree with the "no reason" part. Cat had decided they were enemies for no real reason, not the other way around. What did she do, helped Heroes free the kingdom and killed her villainous auntie. Oh and she is crazy powerful. From personal enmity Cat decided to turn Bard into her nemesis, with WB just kinda rolling with it.

We don't have any evidence of her being sinister that do not come from villainous and inherently antagonistic to her sources. Neither does Cat. She just can't stomach the compromise with someone quite literally immune to the most effective methods in her arsenal.

Mental Mouse

To say that, you basically need to ignore everything Cat's said about the matter, and a good deal of what the Bard herself has said. Not to mention that the WB has worked directly against Cat several times, notably sabotaging the rescue of Masego. And then there's this latest fracas, where the fae themselves admit WB sicced them on the Arsenal, with specific instructions to destroy with two of the biggest weapons being prepared against DK.

TeK

What did Bard said that would implicate her in nefarious deeds or actions?

She actually helped Masego fight off DK, where did she sabotaged his rescue?

I don't actually remember, to be honest. She helped Lonely, sure, but aside from that when did she acted directly against Cat? To Cat's knowledge at least.

She allowed Aqua to release the Demon, but she arguably couldn't stop her. And Cat wouldn't learn about it until way later. She did prevent elves from killing Diabolist off, kick-starting Doom of Liese, but in process irreparably damaged the trust between two foremost Villains of Praes, trust that arguably, allowed Praes to become powerful enough to be worthy of Crusade. She killed Captain, but that was justifiable and not directly against Cat. She tried to make Cordelia into a Named, which... is a bad thing, I guess? Oh and she tried to kill DK. Oh and she served as an envoy from Below, but that is neither here nor there.

Can you quickly remind me, when did the enmity started and why?

doominator10

Idk how much Cat knows about it, but Bard did tell Dead King that he has her permission to kill Cat.

TeK

She said he has her permission to eat the baby. Which I assume was metaphor for going all out with the blessing from Below.

doominator10

I was pretty sure that was more explicit about Cat, but I guess that's up for debate.

TeK

That is, because I totally didn't think that at all.

Mental Mouse

Most of those are blatantly working either against Cat (and Black).

At Leiss III, she signaled Pilgrim to delay his rescue of Masego, allowing DK to take his sorcery.

TeK

And that is bad? That is personal attack against too established villains, one of which was very much corrupted by Dead King...

And Cat doesn't know about it.

How is working against Black can he considered evil? Or antagonistic to Cat, given that she very explicitly stated that she doesn't care about someone taking a swing at Black?

Hanno did, so did Pilgrim, yet she was not opposed to cooperation to this degree.

Mental Mouse

I'm sorry, but you do not seem to have been reading the same story as I have, let alone following the discussions in the comments. I am not going to recapitulate several years worth of plot and character developments to argue with someone who can't follow the game even with a scorecard.

TeK

Shit, that was impressive putdown. I just had some sudden second doubts about what I had read and impressions I had conjured out of that. No shame in second guessing yourself, though it is in making others do it for you.

Mental Mouse

It's not about putting you down, it's about recognizing a basic disconnect, and disengaging.

TeK

Eh, it's not that I don't understand your position, or even disagree much. But I did have doubts upon rethinking which I put to writing. But apparently either my memory is faulty (because I did wrote everything based on my memory of what I've read), or you don't want to recognise that someone may have made different conclusions from text presented. Or both.

Either way, there doesn't seem to be much of a compromise, so I will disengage too.

Liliet

Bard specifically taunted her, repeatedly.

When someone who could technically be your ally repeatedly deliberately antagonizes you, assuming they are in fact your enemy is kind of logical.

TeK

Well shit, now I have to review my entire modus operandi in relationships, if that is true.

Although Cat's entire surrounding specifically taunts and antagonizes her, figured she will be more tolerant.

Zach

We absolutely do have evidence of her, at the very least, having motives that do not have good results. Probably the best example is her convincing William to go through with the Contrition summoning. There's an interlude where William is starting to shift towards thinking that maybe Catherine has a point and the rebellion isn't actually good for the people of Callow, and suddenly the Wandering Bard shows up and convinces him against this. It's probably the most blatant example of the Bard directly shifting events in a malicious way.

The most generous interpretation of the Bard is that she's an agent for Good who doesn't care about the actual circumstances of the people of Calernia (like being willing to wreck Procer through use of the Angel super-weapon as long as it kills the Dead King).

There's also the basic fact that it's a really dumb idea to trust some immortal entity that refuses to actually be honest in its intentions.

TeK

You are saying like summoning an angel is a bad thing. Which is arguable. I mean yeah, an eldritch entity messing with your mind and free will may be misconstrued as some kind of forcible intervention by more squimish individuals, but it's specifically stated that they just show you who you are without all those petty lies we tell ourselves on the constant basis. With an implications being that everything else you do of your free will based on newly discovered information.

Basically they just tell you the truth and you free to do as you wish, it's just most will reliably pick up a sword and go a'crusading. I can't honestly say that it's that atrocious. Maybe for Cat, but she made a career out of not facing what she's done.

Yes she did try to murder DK wrecking Procer in the process, but all she's really done was taking Cat's entire MO and upscaling it both in size and in time. Ugly choices, yada yada, only most people are regrettably shortsighted towards consequences beyond the lifetime of their grandchildren. Not understandable by most, but most are idiots.

Quite honestly there is a huge possibility that explaining just stops at that wall between perspectives.

And noone asks to trust WB, but Cat is downright antagonistic in her treatment of Bard, and it seems oddly personal. I can't really figure out why.

> Basically they just tell you the truth and you free to do as you wish, it's just most will reliably pick up a sword and go a'crusading.

I got the impression that the Fifteenth would also get turned against the Empire if they were in range for a successful summoning, which speaks to a rather more brainwashing approach (with William just being the one whose brain it would be taking as a template for the washing)

TeK

We don't have a confirmation about what Ange will do to non-human species though, and given Williams bigotry, you may be onto something. On the other hand, we only have his words to judge whether or not it's brainwashing, which doesn't tell us much if he was...

Liliet

We have Akua and Masego's analysis though.

TeK

But they are both mildly heretic Villains.

Liliet

...exactly?

TeK

I'm just saying, anything they say about Angels is going to be mildly heretical. Just as much belief in Heavens colours your perspective, so does the opposite.

Liliet

Fair.

Shveiran

By that logic, anything a priest or a Hero ever said about a devil or demon would be unreliable.

Tek

Not entirely, but yes. I would doubt anything someone with an obvious bias says about a thing he has a bias about. Don't you?

Liliet

No, the most generous interpretation of Bard is that she's a long-view utilitarian who is really numb to short term specifics. It's not hard to imagine a logic in which the total sum of possible outcomes for First Llesse weighted by probability is better if William tries to summon Contrition than if he doesn't (key word being try: again, it's not hard to imagine a logic where that was a very low probability outcome in the first place, with Bard figuring he won't succeed either way but it'll just take the whole story in another direction).

This whole story being "a bunch of utilitarians with mostly shared goals acting against each other because each of them individually believes that's what'll make for the best outcome overall" sounds very on-brand for Guide, imho.

Ahad Mahmood

No one wants everyone to hate them – I refer to the martyr complex, and Lelouch from Code Geass as a great example to watch if you are unfamiliar.

Additionally setting yourself up to be hated is not uncommon. Especially if you're an immortal being finding a way to die which I believe Liliet has implied before. Bard has specifically stopped people from attacking Cat by referring to her as 'mine'. At the time it seemed more like my prey but on re reading doesn't seem that simple. I also feel Bard is trying to get Cat to play by Above because all it would require is one prayer. That is all. Like she never will but unlike other villains there are few things she would have to give up. Night arguably but she will eventually anyway in my opinion.

TeK

When you say she stopped people are you referencing the elves? Cause they went after Aqua.

What I mean is it's impractical or everyone to hate you. Even Lelouch had a loyal and dedicated group of people.

And I highly doubt she wants to die. That'd be boring and it's explicitly stated that she denied three things, one of which is death and another is her dream. So she wants something different, something Tyrant referred to as "glorious" and Neshie referred to as "they will all come after you if they knew"

But he is known to exaggerate.

Ahad Mahmood

Ok that is valid. I am really excited because this series has some of the best set ups and pay offs, especially in the recent two books.

Liliet

I get the impression that Bard wouldn't see herself dying as a bad thing, presuming she gets to have things set up the way she likes beforehand, but isn't actively after it.

(So kind of like Catherine, only with even less attachment to "no I would actually prefer to live actually" cause Catherine actually gets to have a good life if she survives and Bard is kind of stuck in hell)

If her position (and tools, and freedom to act) is a price for her not needing this position and tools and freedom in the future because the stuff she needed them for is going to take care of itself instead, it's a perfectly valid tradeoff.

Javvies

Eh, depends on how the request was made. Private letter directly to Concocter would be super easy. Formal request relayed through the leadership of Arsenal? Hard. Request relayed through a seemingly trustworthy intermediary that was actually compromised by Bard? Not too difficult. Especially if there was also included an ask to keep things quiet.

Also, one thing that makes me suspicious?
There's only been a single batch of the stuff made, and it was supposed to be waiting to be moved out. Which means it's a recent "request" ... two plus years on. Sure, I could buy asking for sleepy gas right after the coup attempt. But the timing of just requesting such a thing now is suspicious as hell. And only in a limited amount? No. That's just a little too convenient a coincidence, I think.

Javvies

... the fuck, wordpress?

Liliet

oh mood

Liliet

Huh, yeah.

Xinci

I do find it that Indrani noting Rangers actions and attitude as callouses seems to frame her most accurately. Most of her reactions are based on callouses gotten survival against various facets of the world. Thus she is an excellent teacher in survival, and how to not get ground down by the various other agents in Creation. However, none of her methods are meant to form a bonded group. Which Indrani only really realized later.

nick012000

Worth noting that Ranger was the only member of the Calamities who left immediately after they won.

TeK

It's one of those pesky side effects of nigh-invincibility. Hard to form deep and emotional bonds with people you know you'll outlast.

Javvies

Plus there's her biological immortality, or close enough as to make no difference. From the Name and from being a half elf.

Even if they don't get killed, Ranger will still see basically everyone she meets and knows die of old age while she keeps on existing. And she knows that she'll outlive them all and their children.

Ranger can't afford to let herself get close to people for her own protection/self-interest. Or so she's come to believe. She doesn't want the pain of losing people she cares about. The less close she is to people, the less it can hurt her when they inevitably die and leave her.

Tek

Or better yet, it is better for her to initiate break up and leave first, taking some measure of control in the way relationship ends.

Liliet

I'll note that rather than the impression of someone who tried getting attached to people, got burned and now doesn't (but / because of she knows what it's like), Ranger gives me the impression of someone who went with that logic from the start. Why bother? It's not like she NEEDS the human network of interdependence and cooperation and mutual caring for anything. She's individually too powerful for that.

And she just... never followed why anyone would. When she found out that taking care of people can be fun, she made herself a dollhouse and played with it for a while, then left the minute a better game presented itself. With loyalty simply not being a concept she ever considered as applied to herself, in either direction. She never needed it for anything, after all.

Javvies

Well, any prior attempt to care about people would have been centuries ago. So I'm not sure how one could tell the difference from this remove.

Also, it's entirely possible that not caring about others is something she started doing after one or both of her parents died. Maybe she saw how much missing her father hurt her mom. Or maybe it didn't start until she lost her mom.

Liliet

Her mom's alive, or at least was as of the Keter excursion in Regard.

And I'd say the difference is that if she had cared once she'd act more aware that other people care. To me, from the text, she comes across as genuinely oblivious of the emotions of people she interacts with – Amadeus, Indrani, etc. Alexis, too – “that's one way to cure a fear” actually it's not? She acts like someone who expects different reactions to what she says/does than what she actually gets, but cannot be assed to note the difference and correct.

Liliet

Also, if she did know what getting attached to people is like, I think she wouldn't have treated Refuge like she did. Note what we have: a smattering of children, some of them orphans who have nobody but her and some of them have parents at home, that she treats exactly the same; lessons that she doesn't actually care if they absorb – Cocky comes across as someone who never even tried, who saw Refuge as just that – a shelter – and not a school at all, and absolutely no actions towards EITHER binding them to her OR making sure they don't get overattached. It's like a fucking social experiment, 'what happens if i just don't do anything at all and don't even try to guide what relationship they have to me', only she also doesn't care about the results, because she fucked off halfway through.

I said "dollhouse" for a reason.

A person who cared and got burned is going to have strong feelings on the topic of caring in general, at least, while Ranger just... didn't. She didn't discourage Indrani from isolating herself from other kids, but she didn't discourage the rest from banding together either.

Just... nothing. No input. She was a mom of a dysfunctional family without even noticing that she was.

Like she didn't enlist another caretaker to take pressure off of herself, either. No, if they want to follow her around and imitate her closely and get themselves killed by doing that, they're free to!

Dolls. That stop being alive in her imagination the minute she puts them down and stops paying attention to the game.

TeK

Shit, that is valid interpretation. I am guilty of humanisation of unhuman character and seeing the best in people, so that possibility kinda never occurred to me.

Liliet

I am a great fan of all varieties of 'character hurt by caring' and something of a conneisseur you might say.

Akua's one of those. Kairos is one one of those.
Alaya is one of those.

(None of these are a straight example of what Ranger would be in this hypothetical but they're all examples of characters who incorporate 'and i will not go there because that way lies caring and getting hurt and that's stupid' into their decision making process)

Hye is not one of those)=

(Because she's not avoiding caring, she just picks it up and drops it as it pleases her, which is... something else)

TeK

But her unmatherly attitude may come from her own mother. Maybe it's not that she doesn't care, but rather belief that leaving them on their own is not just perfectly normal, but beneficial and good. Her mother does teach badass elves to be even more badass, and also teach how to be even even more badass. And she gets to casually defy the whole racist supremacist society like it's nothing, so I assume some sort of harsh childhood was involved.

Liliet

maybe, but the result is what it is

Tom

Calling it now, the rest of book 6 is interludes XD

Interlude: Deadhand

"One hundred and twenty-five: under no circumstances should you trust anyone who has the title of chancellor, vizier or duke. While they will always be powerful and competent, keep in mind they will also inevitably turn out to be in some way treacherous."

– "Two Hundred Heroic Axioms", author unknown

One was limping, two were nursing an arms and Adjutant had only withstood that blow from the Duke of Unrelenting Landslide's morningstar at the price of his plate being dented and the flesh beneath it torn right through.

The Repentant Magister had done what she could, and she was a skilled healer, but magical healing was less immediately potent than the priestly kind when it came to deeper wounds. All of them were Named, and so the pain and increased fragility was only a minor matter, but Hakram had considered it an interesting piece of irony that he usually received a better quality of healing with the Woe, a band of villains, than he had from a pack of Above's designated footsoldiers. The air was rife with tension as the band of five he accompanied let the Vagrant Spear guide them through the bare stone corridors, though conversation had not died down even the wake of the defeat inflicted unto them by what could only be remnants of the Court of Autumn. The calm voice in the back of Hakram's mind noted that where the Woe would be digging into their second plan of attack by now, everyone pitching even if it was Catherine who'd put it all together, these five were instead wasting their breath on largely inconsequential matters.

Adjutant decided to take his own evaluation with a grain of salt, acknowledging he would always favour his own companions whether or not he was aware of it.

They'd all been headed towards somewhere called the Spins for some time now, ominously enough without any fae harassment as they moved. Aside from Hakram's professional vexation at the way half of the Arsenal seemed to have some sort of nickname known only to the locals, on top of the already labyrinthine amount of sections within the facility, there should have been no reason for displeasure on anyone's part. Unfortunately, the lack of immediate peril meant the Mirror Knight's band of five had promptly lapsed back into open malfunction. It felt like dealing with children, Hakram thought. While that was not entirely a rare thing with heroes, who were often more preoccupied with pretty ideals than practicalities, this band of five was... remarkably unstable. It would not be impossible to make them functional, in his opinion, but it would take sustained effort to keep them that way and some truly miraculous labour to mend the root causes.

"Would you hurry, Magister?" the Blade of Mercy complained.
"We'll lose them if you keep slowing us down."

As displayed, though in his opinion the younger of the Proceran heroes was, for all that he was vastly irritating, more a symptom of the troubles than a cause. The Repentant Magister, whose true name was Nephele Eliade, visibly bit down on the sharp retort she equally visibly wanted to let out at the boy who'd been needling her for hours now. The Stygian was slow because she'd taken bad fall in the last scrap with the Prince of Fallen Leaves and magical healing could only help so much with bones, not because she was somehow lazy as was being implied. Now, that should have been the moment when the band's unspoken leader stepped in before tempers further rose. The Mirror Knight had brought these people together after all, and that implied a level of deference to his leadership. Instead, Christophe of Pavanie leaned closer to the Vagrant Spear and addressed her in a low voice. The look the Magister shot at his back was distinctly less than adoring. It must have been rather irritating, Hakram mused, deferring to something that essentially did not exist.

"How is your arm, Blade of Mercy?" Adjutant gravelled.

The redheaded boy started, constant in his surprise that Hakram could do anything but stand behind a human villain threateningly or eat village babies. Adjutant had known men and women who truly, genuinely hated his kind and so he'd not been all that ruffled by the Blade's casual bigotry. It was the way of thinking of a boy who'd been told orcs were not people and had never had occasion to question that before, not something running deeper. Hakram thought less of men who chided the likes of the Blade for speaking their opinion of his kind but privately shared in the belief, for at least the boy could be taught.

"It stings," the blue-eyed boy admitted. "But it is only pain."

"I am sure Lady Eliade could heal it further, if the sting is a distraction," Adjutant suggested.

The Blade of Mercy cast a look at the Stygian sorceress and bit his tongue, looking somewhat abashed at the implicit reminder that the only reason his arm wasn't bleeding meat was the Magister's healing touch.

"I would not ask her to waste her valuable magic on my discomfort," the Blade of Mercy stiffly said, inclining his head at the sorceress.

It was exactly the kind of answer someone with a disdain of magic trying to politely excuse themselves from healing would have used, but Adjutant suspected that when it came to the redheaded boy the words were genuine. Or close enough. Hakram had met two very different Blades of Mercy, after all. The first was a boy with Light gleaming in his eyes, spouting lines sounding suspiciously similar to those of the heroes of Proceran bodice-ripper novels and very much trying to act like one of those heroes. The other was an awkward redheaded boy, out of his depth and painfully aware of it. He found it easier to pity the latter than the former, for all that they were one and the same.

The Maddened Keeper, further behind, let out a harsh bark of laughter at the about-face but did not speak. That she did not contribute much of anything was, to Hakram's eyes, a contributing part of this mess: there was an element missing to their band, the Callowan Named's aloofness withholding an influence that would have stabilized matters even if it was negative – a designated enemy, after all, would have given the Blade someone to focus his grandstanding against. The Magister offered Adjutant a discreet incline of the head in thanks when no one else was looking, which the orc did not hesitate in returning. It was a rare thing for him to have high opinion of a heroine before meeting her, but the Repentant Magister had been an exception. How could he not hold a woman who'd spurned the slavery she was raised to in high esteem? If Catherine intended to take this one as a consort he could only approve.

"Adjutant," the Mirror Knight called out from the front, "if we might have a word?"

Hakram put some spring to his step, catching up to the two in front as the Vagrant Spear moved to the side so he might stand between them. Those two were significantly easier to read than the rest, but in a way twice as hard to understand. Adjutant, in theory, knew much of the Vagrant Spear from Indrani's reports – which, while usually written in sloppy drunk handwriting with some of the filthiest limericks he'd ever seen slipped in here and there, always seemed to cover enough the important parts thoroughly enough he couldn't actually complain about it to Catherine – and her equally informative tendency to shamelessly gossip after she had a few drinks in her.

He knew that Sidonia was from the city of Alava, from one of the lesser lines of the Blood related to spears and considered as related to the Champion's Blood even though in practice their skills had much more in common with the Slayer's Blood. A political issue, he'd been made to understand. Hakram knew that Sidonia was strictly interested in men, could kill skillfully with both hands and seemed to have some Name-driven taboo against wearing shoes of any sort. None of this, though, helped him understand the mercurial brew of affection and dislike she related to the Mirror Knight with, or why it seemed to spin the man's head around so much. Half the time the man seemed to crave her good opinion, the other half he seemed to court actively spiting it. It was probably about sex, which humans keeping to the House of Light tended to make a lot more complicated than it needed to be.

"I have heard that the Woe fought mighty battles against the Seasons of the Splendid," the Vagrant Spear said. "Do you have insights to share about the nature of our foe?"

Adjutant considered that, for a moment.

"The Prince of Fallen Leaves is weak, for one of his title," Hakram replied. "And the court he belongs to should be Autumn."

The orc cast a curious look at the Mirror Knight, who he'd expected would have known much of this. The 'Elfin Dames' living in a lake the man was supposedly sworn to defend sounded very much like fae, or something close enough it hardly mattered.

"The Fair Folk are a weakness of mine," Christophe of Pavanie boldly volunteered. "My shield will not reflect their works, and their illusory wiles are effective against even my protections."

"Your oath protects your mind from glamours and manipulations," the Vagrant Spear dismissed.

"It does not," the Mirror Knight curtly said.

Sidonia of Alava looked surprised, by Adjutant's reckoning, but not by the curtness.

"You once told me-"

"I know what I said," the Mirror Knight grunted, looking away, "yet I repeat: my oath will not protect me."

The Levantine looked confused, for a moment, then a wicked grin split her lips.

"Are you telling me you finally lost your-"

"I would recommend that the Repentant Magister provide protective enchantments against glamour, if she can," Hakram interrupted. "The stronger fae do not usually bother with deception, but once cornered they'll break habit if they lack the strength to win otherwise."

Something like gratitude gleamed in the Mirror Knight's eyes at the distraction that'd been provided.

"Have you fought Autumn before then, Adjutant?" he asked.

"No," the orc gravelled. "But it is the spawn of Summer broken, and I have fought Summer enough."

The dream that the King of Winter had seeded in Catherine after titling her in his court had been a difficult thing to sparse even though her recollection of it was vivid, because it was not truly a single dream: it was the recollection of a cycle's shape, one so old and primordial that mortals mind found it difficulty to truly grasp. There had been lessons to learn from it, though, and Hakram Deadhand had committed them to memory.

"The Lady tells marvelous tales of the battles against Summer," the Vagrant Spear agreed.

It took Hakram a moment to grasp that she was talking about Indrani, simply using the same term Indrani herself slipped into whenever talking about the Ranger. Interesting, he mused. Archer might not be interested in making a legacy for herself, but that did not mean she wouldn't end up making one regardless.

"I'll ask Nephele if she can weave such enchantments," the Mirror Knight said. "Thank you for your advice, Adjutant."

"It was my pleasure," the orc replied.

The Mirror Knight retreated further back with eagerness, leaving Adjutant alone with a still-grinning Vagrant Spear. That grin was directed at him, now, like she expected him to pat her on the back for having put the Proceran hero to flight.

"Now is not the time to make sport of him," Adjutant bluntly said. "We're headed into a hard fight."

"You said the prince was weak," Sidonia replied. "Have you not defeated stronger royalty of the Splendid?"

"As part of a band containing the Black Queen and the Hierophant," Hakram flatly replied. "And even then, it was a close thing."

And that was the thing that had his hand itching, wasn't it? Metaphorically speaking. After so many years among the Woe, where Catherine steered and inspired and mediated, having his Name attached to this walking mess was making him restless. His very nature was urging him to fix this band so that at least they'd cease bleeding each other with their sharp edges. It wouldn't even be difficult, he knew, to untie the most pressing of the knots. If the Mirror Knight ceased focusing on the Vagrant Spear he'd start taking the Blade of Mercy closer in hand, which would free the Repentant Magister to be a moderating influence on the band. All it would take was establish some sort of accord between Christophe and Sidonia, terms of interaction they could keep to instead of constantly pushing each other.

"You underestimate us," the Vagrant Spear said.

"You overestimate yourself," Adjutant frankly replied. "The only reason there hasn't been a casualty on our side so far is that the fae aren't here to fight us."

That struck her in the pride, as it'd been meant to. Indrani had coddled her four too much, they'd started to get ahead of themselves. The Vagrant Spear, the blooming pattern of blue on grey on her face tightening as she scowled, turned to him with a straightened back and tight grip on her spear. Trying to make it so he was not looming so tall above her.

"The Lady bats you around when you spar, I hear," she challenged, baring pale teeth.

Hakram Deadhand did not bare his own teeth, posture or swagger. He simply looked at Sidonia of Alava, calmly, and considered how long it'd take him to kill her if he was serious about it.

"You are not the Archer, child," the Adjutant simply said. "And if you challenge me again, I will rip your fucking throat out."

The younger woman stared at him for a long moment, then shivered.

"Apologies, Lord," the Vagrant Spear said, briskly dipping down her head. "I should not swat at him while we head into battle, it does us all disservice."

"I don't know what stands between you two," Hakram said, and raised a hand to stop her when it looked like she might tell him, "and I do not particularly want to. There will be time to pursue it after the fae are scattered, Sidonia. Until then, the Mirror Knight holds command."

The Vagrant Spear threw him a sardonic look.

"As you say, Lord Adjutant," Sidonia said, tone a tad dry.

The orc decided not to address that. There was only so much blood you could squeeze from a stone.

"Are we close?" he asked instead.

"Soon," the Vagrant Spear said. "We should get there ahead of the Splendid, if they took the main halls."

"Good," Adjutant said, baring his fangs in approval.

He slowed his stride, leaving Sidonia alone in the front and sliding into the conversation that had been forming behind him. As expected, with the Mirror Knight there to impress the Blade of Mercy was significantly more personable. Without the needling to interrupt, Lady Eliade skillfully steered the conversation away from what she'd been asked, an enchantment that would perfectly resist glamour, to make it seem like the Mirror Knight had instead requested something she could achieve, an enchantment that would allow someone to tell if they were under the throes of glamour. When properly angled, the four Named could associate without wounding each other. But there were still only four, Hakram noted, as the last member of the band of five had stayed aloof and behind all this time.

The Maddened Keeper's long and unkempt hair did much to hide her face, but Adjutant would have been able to peg her stare as cool and distant even if he'd not spent the last few years learning the nuances of human expressions. That one watched and missed nothing, but she kept her peace. She was Callowan, but from the times before the Empire had ruled it and so little like the Callowans that Hakram knew. There was a sense of... threat to her, one that had the orc's instincts apprehensive. To his senses, to his Name, she felt like a predator waiting to strike. She was no fighter, the earlier scraps with the fae had proved that, but the Maddened Keeper had also swallowed whole a cloud of decay that'd powdered rock and would likely have killed the Blade of Mercy if it'd been allowed to spread. In a senses she reminded him of Vivienne, in the sense that she was clearly familiar with violence but just as clearly not trained in it – but there ended the similarities, as no prince of the fae had ever very carefully avoided being touched by Thief even at the height of her Name.

Adjutant slowed his steps even further, slipping at the back of band and matching his stride to the Maddened Keeper. She peered at him through oily bangs, unsmiling.

"We were never properly introduced," Hakram gravelled.

"So that's what you're used for," the Maddened Keeper said, voice apathetic. "The plate and the axe, the height – it all paints the wrong picture. They don't see it coming, that your brain's the most dangerous part of you."

She was not such a tall woman, the Keeper. Skinny thing, no real muscle to her, and though she had vigor it was the feverish kind: burning but not healthy. Whether it was with his hand of bone or the spectral one, it would have been child's play to snap that sparrow-like neck. So why was Adjutant's Name screaming at him that if he laid a finger on the Keeper he'd be snuffed out in the blink of an eye?

"If we are to be at odds, so be it," Adjutant said. "There are old wounds, between your people and mine. But there are more pressing needs, Maddened Keeper."

"Necessity's son," the woman said, tone gone velvet soft. "Whispering her sweet nothings. Stack, stack, stack – move around the stones and maybe one day the game will make sense. But the tower always crumbles, doesn't it? You'll not find me so easy to steal or pile, death's hand."

She cast him an unfriendly look through the ratty curtain of hair.

"Walk away, orc," the Maddened Keeper told him. "Lest I develop an interest in pulling at your seams."

Adjutant was not above recognizing that creeping sensation going up his spine as fear or heeding its warning. There were some that were beyond his ability to corral, and so to continue an attempt was to invite sanction. Villains that did not know their limits died young, and Hakram had too many labours unfinished to be able to afford delusions about his own ability. He walked away, not with undue haste but without lingering either, moving towards the centre of the band again. Hakram caught only snippets of what was being discussed, which turned out to be heroic gossip about the lingering rumours of the White Knight and the Witch of the Woods being romantically involved. He filed it away regardless, but before the subject could change the Vagrant Spear called them to a halt with a peremptory gesture. They had reached the end of a long hallway, which Adjutant found was leading down to a broad downwards slope, spiralling inwards oddly.

"We are here," the Vagrant Spear said. "The top of the Spins."

Quietly walking to the edge of the hallway, Hakram leaned down and studied the battlefield the band had picked with a frown. The Repository was largely used as a great warehouse for all the incoming supplies for the Arsenal and outgoing artefacts feeding the war machine of the Grand Alliance, which in most situations would mean a large room spreading outwards. The Arsenal, however, had been carved from the inside of a mountain: there was no difficulty in layering several of these warehouses atop each other, so long as they could all be accessed by wagon. The Spins were likely the part meant for that very purpose, a soft-sloped spiral leading into eight different broad hallways of different heights. Most of those would lead to warehouses, though the 'central' hall was likely to be the one heading deeper into the Repository. Towards the restricted sections, where war assets were being kept and the Maddened Keeper informed them all the fae were headed – though she couldn't tell them exactly what the fae were after. Speaking of the devil, she'd come to the fore at long last.

"The fae haven't come through here," the Maddened Keeper said. "But we don't have long."

"I'll take the front," the Mirror Knight immediately said. "Lady Eliade, your sorcery will serve well from the heights and Antoine can serve as your escort. Sidonia-"

He was making mistakes, Hakram thought, planning like his magical back-up was the Witch of the Woods instead of the Repentant Magister – whose sorceries lacked bite, and the artefacts she used to make up for it tended to require shorter distance.

"I can go on the frontline with you," the Blade of Mercy interrupted, "the Vagrant Spear can see to the Magister's protection."

"I strike, I do not defend," Sidonia of Alava flatly said. "That is the nature of my Bestowal. This plan is foolish."

"Perhaps the Adjutant could see to my defence as I weave sorceries from closer," the Repentant Magister suggested. "You are well-versed in such duties, Lord Hakram, if I recall correctly?"

Catherine had begun needing a flanker once more since her return from the Everdark, so Nephele Eliade was not wrong. That said, Hakram was by far the most durable of the Named here after the Mirror Knight so frankly speaking he should be at the man's side when the fae began taking the gloves off instead of out back with the Repentant Magister.

"I am," Adjutant said. "But we have the advantage of surprise. It would be wasteful not to at least attempt an ambush."

The Mirror Knight blinked in surprise, while the Blade of Mercy stared at him in undisguised distaste.

"That would be dishonourable," the redheaded boy told him, as if addressing one slow of wit.

"The Adjutant has it right," the Vagrant Spear grunted. "You don't meet a raiding party on open ground, you turn the raid on them."

"They have the advantage in numbers," Lady Eliade noted. "It would be wise to try to remedy that as quickly as possible."

"The Levantine and the mage, arguing in favour of ambush," the Blade of Mercy sneered. "How surprising."

Christophe of Pavanie straightened.

"No chivalry was offered in the attack, none be offered in the defence," the Mirror Knight said. "It would be best of the prince could be slain swiftly, the rest might buckle."

"Christophe," the Blade of Mercy protested.

"Honour offered to the dishonourable is gold tossed into the river," the Mirror Knight replied. "Both the Adjutant and I can afford a long drop without any trouble, we might as well leap. Sidonia and Antoine flanking the hall, Lady Eliade on the slope overlooking?"

"Agreed," the Vagrant Spear nodded.

Hakram rumbled in approval himself. Keeping himself and the other heavy back might seem counterintuitive, but that way they'd be able to more easily pick out a fae high noble to tie up. There were mutters of approval from the rest.

"I will go with the Repentant Magister," the Maddened Keeper said, and none gainsaid her.

With the bare bones of the plan agreed on, all that was left was preparations.

"Gather close," Nephele Eliade ordered. "And don't move, it will make laying the enchantments much harder."

Adjutant had heard much of providence, the golden luck of heroes, but rarely had he wished for its arrival. He did today, though, because if they were to make through this without corpses on the ground a dollop of providence would very much be required.

The first fae to arrive reminded Hakram of a dragonfly.

All shiny carapace in shades of blue and long wings, with a long halberd in her hands, she cast a look around but after a long moment it appeared she could not see through the illusions that the Repentant Magister had woven around the flankers. The Lady of Cooling Nights, Adjutant recognized. Coming after the outrider, the vanguard should be next. The first fae whistled softly, the melody of it haunting, and two more fae slunk in. Though the orc was familiar with the sight of them, their titles remained unknown. Their unnaturally tall bodies and long limbs, though, could not be mistaken — neither could their skin, pale as bone, or the sharp spears of ivory they held. Pale wings bloomed and they scattered upwards, Hakram's fists tightening against the handle of his axe as he hoped none of the heroes would be spooked into striking too soon. A beat passed and none of them moved, to his relief.

The Prince of Fallen Leaves' court strolled in afterwards, riding at a leisurely on great white horses. Three lancers of what Adjutant suspected was Autumn's equivalent to the Immortals of Summer and the Sword of Waning Day for Winter, their scale armour fashioned to look like a thousand fallen leaves but their lances wickedly sharp and their horsemanship unnaturally skillful. Then the Countess of Still Amber, half a statue and dressed in her namesake from head to toe, and the Duchess of Red Sunset — blinding to look at, which had made the Mirror Knight the only one who could withstand her up closer. The company slowed, only to be joined a few moments later by two more fae. The Duke of Unrelenting Landslide, looking like his armour had been carved out of granite by an artist and his massive morningstar hefted over his shoulder, was simply too heavy for a horse to be able to bear him. He towered tall enough he could keep up with the last fae's mount, however.

The Prince of Fallen Leaves himself was of a dark grey-brown tone, wearing loose court clothes in tones of burnt orange that subtly evoked the membrane of a leaf by the cut and cloth, and on his brow rested a heavy crown of burnished copper. Bearing a slender longsword of what looked like rotting wood, he offered a permanent faint smile under pale orange eyes. Yet for all that the fae looked more like a dandy out on ride than a prince of the fae, Adjutant knew him to be wickedly fast on his feet and seemingly impossible to wound: any cut made on him would begin spilling fallen leaves, as if he were a sack filled with them, until it closed and left no scar behind. The Lady of Cooling Nights landed at the prince's feet, kneeling.

"My prince, all the halls seem to lead here," she reported. "Shall we assemble the court and sally forth?"

They'd split their forces, the orc realized. Given the sometimes maze-like lay of the Arsenal, it made sense that pathfinders would have been needed. Especially if they were after more than the sword made out of the Saint's corpse, as Hakram suspected they were. The Bard would have needed something to put them in her debt before they came here, or more likely someone. Now was the time to strike, Adjutant thought. Before some fae happened to see through their illusions, and before more of them gathered here. The Mirror Knight might cotton on to that, he considered, but there was one of their company a great deal more used to raids and that was...

The Vagrant Spear blinked into existence, grinning with all her teeth and spear screaming with the Light as it tore right through the Lady of Cooling Nights' throat.

"Honour to the Blood," Sidonia of Alava gleefully shouted.

Chaos broke out in the moment that followed, the fae all aflutter at the sudden attack. Adjutant kept a calm eye on the situation, looking for his opening. The Blade of Mercy revealed himself with a hoarse shout, greatsword glinting with Light as it carved through both a lancer and its mount in a single stroke, and a heartbeat later the Repentant Magister fired her sorcery into the mess. The power gathered to strike at their ambushers by the fae, a panoply of titles and abilities, was sucked into a small spinning orb of gold that then blew up in a pulse of pure sorcery at the height of the chest of all those mounted. Only one of the lancers was caught and blown off its mount, the others all dismounting in time, but with that trick Lady Eliade had bought the rest of the band another heartbeat of advantage.

"I will engage the prince," the Mirror Knight's voice murmured, though coming from empty air.

Adjutant simply grunted in reply, wary of being overheard himself, but picked his own target before leaping. The whistle of the wind against his face was pleasant, as to his side a thrown spear of ivory struck at what should have been emptiness – but bounced a mirror shield, revealing a steady-eyed Mirror Knight falling with his silver sword already in hand. Below them the tall, pale fae who'd not thrown its spear instead leap up on pale wings and flew towards the Magister. The two remaining lancers were stuck against the side of the hall, moved there impatiently by the greater fae around them as they made room to fight, but already the Duchess of Red Sunset was beginning to emit searing light. Adjutant looked away, guiding his fall with his shield and landing a heartbeat later on the head of the Countess of Still Amber, knocking off her horse in surprise and rolling away before her petrifying curse could begin eating at his boots.

Shield rising as he rose, Adjutant brought up his axe just in time to strike the side of a massive morningstar as it was swung down at him, pushing the blow to the side enough that it shattered the ground instead of his skull and shoulder.
