"You again," the Duke of Unrelenting Landslide said, voice sounding like a thousand stones grinding against each other. "It seems you did learn to fear your betters last time, orc."

Hakram Deadhand rolled his shoulder, limbering the muscle he'd almost just pulled, and bared his fangs at his foe.

"Yes," the Adjutant growled, "let us talk, fae, of betters."

tkjarrah

best thing about fighting fae is how they give you setup for all the coolest lines

dadycoool

They also deliver them, like the Fae Cat got in a duel with. That was a badass boast.

TeK

I mean it's really easy when you fight someone who is literally hardwired to have a flair for theatrics.

Javvies

Hakram is awesome, as ever.

Dysfunctional Heroes. That's no real surprise, especially since it's Mirror Knight and non-Procerans.

Still so many questions about the Maddened Keeper. But it's not surprising that she and Hakram aren't going to get along. It's an open question as to how she and Cat would get along.

WuseMajor

Hmmm... Maddened Keeper is the third traitor?

nimelennar

Too obvious. I'd be more inclined to suspect someone is manipulating the Blade of Mercy's naive idealism.

TeK

Because Gods forbid readers actually predict something about the story.

Liliet

I'd say more because "the standoffish one is the traitor" is a trope that is at the height of being normally subverted, and in this Very Classic Band of Heroes I'd expect EE to go with that.

TeK

On the other hand, hadn't we got to a point where subversion of tropes had become it's own trope that is ought to be subverted?

Liliet

Note my point about this band being The Classic Band of Traditional Classicness.

There's time and place and narrative pacing for everything.

TeK

True. I am just never sure of anything.

Decius

The time to subvert your expectations is when you ARE sure.

Which is why the rest of the story will be told in interludes.

TeK

But I saw too many people predict the rest of the book will be in interludes, which should mean there would never be an interlude again.

Black Spiral Dancer

Maybe

Can we start rumors that Grey was raised with necromancy tho?

Too obvious, probably not.

RoflCat

As the others have said, it'd be too obvious.

If anything she's CALLOWAN, she's more likely to be a reverse Artificer given the nature of the different bands at each location (and the Cath/Hakram as their 'leader') i.e. She took up the task/role of a traitor Bard set up only to betray Bard at the last second by helping Arsenal because fuck Bard for trying to put Callow in the pit again.

On that line of thought that there's someone on each band that's kind of a mirror of the other...

Archer – Vagrant Spear. One a free-spirited whimsical person who's learning to mend the old rift, the other bound by the way of Blood and learning to avoid opening new ones (i.e. that moment with Hakram)

Maddened Keeper – Poet. One on the merry joy side but likely lacking any deep motives, the other cold and apathetic and you can be sure as hell there's some hidden final goal she's aiming for.

Hakram – Cath. The orderly orc (a rather un-orc like) who lacks the charm to make his band work and the half-drunk Warlord (a very orc title) that strangely charm both enemies and allies.

Artificer – Magister. Two people who rejected their origins.

Rogue – Blade. One a man of smoke, mirror and daggers who's never truly belong in that field but manage by, the other a boy who 'should' be at his home in the field but always in over his head.

Mirror – Monk. One a guy so lacking in self-reflection (yes I'm going to keep using that joke) that he get manipulated by more sinister masterminds, the other a willing backstabber.

Probably pushing it, but it's two Band of Fives so there's probably always going to be some alignment somewhere.

Oshi

Please stop saying Cath shudder....it hurts me.

TeK

But it's cathartic!

Mith

I assumed they were referencing Cat taking the piss out of the opposition.

onedollargum

She's certainly doing the team dynamic no favours.

Sylfa

"It's an open question as to how she and Cat would get along." Like a house on fire? All green glow and goblin-like cackling...

Jworks

I expect a Hierophant and Kingfisher Prince interlude before we get back to Cat, hopefully sooner.

Cicero

I love how the Adjutant cannot help himself, he has to try and fix things, just a little. And I also like how the Spear and the Repentant Magister both have started to realize that he is the effective leader of their party.

Liliet

Y e p.

He's deferring to Christophe but the gap in ability is just too large.

(Victoria and Breakthrough)

Oshi

Like a bear herding cubs. I'm just surprised they are so... inexperienced. It's been a few year's. Although tbh the three in the group who've spent actual time with people of real skill are more self aware then the two who are not.

Insanenoodlyguy

Cat doing a good impression of Dead King is probably giving an accurate read. He's a great weapon, but Mirror Knight is the type who gets pointed in a direction and told to kick ass. He's very good at that, and not very experienced at much else. Has likely fallen into the trap of assuming that as the best ass-kicker he's the best leader.

LarsBlitzer

It's one of the drawbacks of being on the side of Light: Providence is a crutch, so the limp is very noticeable to others who haven't had the benefit of Above keeping their thumb on the scales. The Heroes may not even see it as such, just that it's "The natural order of things" or some such bullshit. At least, until there's something that can block it and I've got a suspicion that either Dead King or the Fae would have some sort of counter or be able to nullify it. A blindfold for the gods, in way. We'll see that particular rug pulled out from under them soon enough. The schadenfreude will be palpable.

Mental Mouse

"He's the sinister villain henchman of the treacherous Black Queen! We must be wary of him backstabbing us and turning us against each other!"

Hakram: "They call this a Band of Five? I'd better give them a little help..."

<an hour later> "WTF, he's resolving our conflicts? And our leader's asking him for advice?"

Mental Mouse

Though as Captain Amazing points out way below, resolving their conflicts might actually be sabotaging them on the story level.

TeK

Doubt he is doing it conscientiously though. It was stated that they don't really look at the world through stories like Cat does.

Liliet

You mean consciously. I'm sure we can all agree Hakam does everything conscientiously, right?

TeK

Yeah. My autocorrect does not agree with me.

Mental Mouse

That's why I've been teaching mine that its proper name is autocowreck. 😊

Frankly, I don't do comment sections on my iPad if I can help it – that, and the number of taps it takes to do italics or the like.

TeK

I don't have a PC, so I am kind of stuck.

hakureireimu

Who does the epigraph applies to?

Razorfloss razor

Sounds like something saint would say.

Anonymous

Adjutant. And how the Maddened Keeper is treating him.

Morgenstern

I like how there are multiple fae that can be applied, too – will we yet see some betrayal in their ranks as well?

Morgenstern

... to whom that can... (ugh, wordpress)

IDKWhoitis

So im just going to bet on Masego getting the last interlude before Cat jumps back in. Alternatively, we can take a peak at what Black is up to... (yes wishful thinking on my part).

Also, I'm suspicious of the Keeper, but I don't think she is a traitor. At least not with the Bard. She might be a Cat's paw for DK or some other agenda.

The distinct lack of reaction from Hakrams Name suggests either this is an asynchronous time line, or Cat isn't close to dead. He would have felt something was wrong otherwise...

Sparsebeard

The real question is, what does she keep and is it what maddened her?

Gibborim

My assumption was knowledge/secrets.

TeK

Funnily enough, Maddened Keeper is also a keeper that had something he kept stolen, and so now he is mad. As in, angry.

Big I

It was mentioned in her first appearance that she's the living seal on a Hell Egg.

Konstantin von Karstein

Where?

talene1

From Book 6 Chapter 14

" The Maddened Keeper looked instead like a perennially exhausted woman in her early twenties, skin drawn and pale and her dark hair ratty. Her threadbare robes ever rumpled and she was thin, but there was a sense of... menace about her. Not like a snake coiling but rather like a diseased thing, the sight of which had you withdraw your hand out of fear and disgust. She was host, it was rumoured, to a great many old secrets that should have stayed unknown – and had even turned herself into a living seal on a Hell Egg from Triumphant's days. "

Konstantin von Karstein

Thanks 😊

Sun Dog

That may go a long way towards explaining the touch hazard and her inhaling that cloud of decay with no problem.

Liliet

I'd boldly guess "close" doesn't even register for him anymore.

He'd probably know if she was ACTUALLY dead though, which rules out a couple of possibilities (in a synchronous timeline anyway).

Oshi

Agreed. He's too much a part of her not to know if she was gone. But like I've said before...Cat has a tendency to be dead and back again pretty quickly.

Mental Mouse

Agreed that Hakram would know if Cat was dead. For the Keeper, I wouldn't worry about "traitor" so much as "loose cannon".

what informs her insights?

Is Hakram's pebble game common knowlege in the army? MK also knew about Losara title.

Agent J

Pretty sure it's a Named thing. However she happens upon that information it's probably by more mystical means than legion gossip.

Liliet

I think she's just a seer type. She WAS "the eyes" in the library encounter.

Big I

"Towers" became popular amongst Wasteland elite after Hakram became the Adjutant. From there it spread to all the people spying on the Wasteland, like the Tyrant. MKs probably using some oracle BS though.

Mental Mouse

Um, we have two very different MKs in this party. Maybe refer to them as Keeper and Knight?

Liliet

omfg too true

Do0d

Maybe her demon whispers partial truths in her ear.

Juff

Typo Thread:

an arms > an arm
even the wake > even in the wake would digging > would be digging enough the > enough of the court actively spiting (strange wording. maybe "actively court her spite" or "be actively spiting it") sparse > parse mortals mind > mortal minds much, they'd > much; they'd
In a senses > In a sense (though maybe you should remove it, since "in the sense" appears later in the sentence) back of band > back of the band carved form > carved from best of the > best if the make through > make it through at a leisurely (missing word)
Adjutant brought up (extra space)

Adrian_V

So of course we jump to the other storyline, I know is necessary and all but i think Erra still derives some twisted sadistic pleasure in making us sweat to know what happened to Cat.

Someone said the Maddened Keeper is too obvious a traitor, i think that even if she is not a traitor she is a ticking time bomb planted to explode.

TeK

He had mastered Dao of Cliffhangers.

Liliet

Actually to me Keeper seems like one of the more stable/reliable members of this band. She's mostly unwilling to take part in what's going on, but the 2.5 things she DOES do, she does well.

And it's not 'twisted sadistic pleasure'... well, it is, but that kind is just called "good writing".

If we found out it was a fakeout immediately, the whole thing would be MUCH less immersive and would give us much less understanding of what the context and impact of Cat's plan (whatever it is) is.

Adrian_V

To me she is either the representation of "things was not meant to know" ready to explode, or the tragic heroine that will suffer because of her powers, also there are many demon things implied with her, nothing good can come out of it.

superkeaton

Hakram a best. And I love that he can't stand how disorganized the group is, how inefficient. It reminds me of Black. The Keeper's a weird one. She seems to have some kind of clarity, like the Tyrant's Wish, but I'm not sure what she actually does. Also, lol, Mirror lost some of his powers cause he fucked. Indrani would make total sport out of him.

laguz24

I don't know maybe he exaggerated his powers and if he did screw up, how and by whom.

Liliet

He slept with the Cleves Prince's daughter, it was a whole thing with the fucking-drow-over beat.

Tom

Sometimes I wonder if you work as an assistant to EE or something, because the number of little details you recall is kind of ridiculous XD

Liliet

no im just a nerd

i have the wog document downloaded as pdf on my desktop, for scale reference

caoimhinh

I think that's a reference to the Arthurian Legend. Christophe had an oath of celibate like the one Lancelot had. Which made him stronger so long as he was a virgin. In Lancelot's case it was physical prowess and skill while Christophe's case seemed to be immunity to Glamour.

Lancelot, like Christophe, was associated with the Faerie/Elfin Dame of the Lake (such that Lancelot was called Lancelot du Lac, meaning Lancelot of the Lake) and he is said to have weakened after he broke his vow of chastity either in sleeping with Elaine (mother of his son Galahad) or Guinevere (King Arthur's wife).

I wonder if Christophe will also cause the downfall of a principate due to that affair, lol.

TeK

Well, she is a living seal on Hell Egg, which seems that her Role must be Containment. She is a metaphorical lid on the Can of Evil, and her presence here means that something soon will need to be contained

anon

Would lol if her aspects turned out to be Secure, Contain and Protect.

Liliet

YES

Oshi

Also pertinent is that she seems to be able to use the power of what she contains Naruto style. I'm wondering if she is meant to die and blow up the arsenal as another contingency.

TeK

Now I am thinking that Maddened Keeper will turn out to be a person who reforms a demon through a power of friendship.

Mental Mouse

The question is, what kind of demon is she containing?

TeK

Does anyone noticed that apparently Cristoph had superpowers from being a virgin and he apparently lost them? Sex better be fucking worth it.

Agent J

The girl in question is trying to get him to betray the entire Drow race, their goddesses, and the Black Queen. She's bad for his powers and super bad for his health.

TeK

I kinda sympathize with him though now.

laguz24

You know that brings me to a question if I were a group of immortal powerful beings and I had the power to grant heroism to mortals why on earth would I make those powers contingent based on not doing one of the most common acts associated with mortals, serious design flaw.

TeK

Proof of willpower and ability for self-sacrifice, I imagine. Go against your basic instincts and such. Plus I sense it is much more predicated on cultural belief, rather than common sense. Procer has an influential House of Light, which seem to be very much a Catholic Church, if with less pedophilia, it kinda feels that Heroes of Procer should be aspiring to an ideal preached by the House. You don't see Levantine Heroes have powers contingent on not having sex, although I imagine their obsession with honor and such can't be broken without consequences easily.

thearpox23

Because some of the strongest powers draw their strength from sacrifice or struggle? And even outside of narrativium logic such sacrifices are a proof of commitment to a cause. And besides besides that said immortal beings don't even necessarily have the mortals best interests in mind, so things going tits up isn't necessarily even a flaw.

caoimhinh

Just to troll them, of course.

Mental Mouse

That's a reference to real-world magical/religious tradition:

1) Personal taboos in general are an old and widespread tradition for generating power or maintaining a consecrated state. My go-to example is the Jewish laws – not just the dietary rules, but the various other prohibitions like mixed fabrics and (male) homosexuality. Pop-sociology aside, those laws are explicitly stated to set Jews apart as the Chosen People of their god.

2) Sex in particular is very magical, so sexual taboos (both private and public) have inordinate power. The priestly chastity of Catholicism is the classic example there, but there are innumerable other examples in anthropology and sociology. This is also why so many people get crazy when the subject of homosexuality comes up, or for that matter any unfamiliar sexual practices.

speakup

MK broke his vows, and so lost (some?) of his powers.

>Kaleidoscope VI

>Sidonia, as the other Chosen insisted they all call her in private, seemed unruffled by the darkness besieging them. Christophe admired this greatly, as she had been returned from the side of the Gods Above for nary an hour. The Pilgrim's power had breathed life back into her still body so recently, yet she returned to their holy struggle without hesitation. The strength of her resolve was worthy of praise. No all the Grey Pilgrim had returned had been so unflinching in their devotion. There was no trace of daze and confusion in her eyes, only certainty, and the Mirror Knight wrestled with the strange thing that was attraction towards a Levantine. Had his vows not forbidden it... He cleared his throat, cheeks flashing with embarrassment."

TeK

Shit, that is quite important and also explains a lot. All this time guy was going through puberty. Now here's a clue as to why he annoys people so. Even I see a bit of myself in him.

This is why taking an oath of chastity before thoroughly enjoying sex is an idea almost sure to backfire.

Mental Mouse

I don't think we've seen any sign that he actually lost too much of his powers, and he's certainly still pretty badass. We saw that he took some random noble's daughter as a lover, with no hint that the encounter in question was a "Betrayed My Name" thing.

At a guess, he had an oath of chastity which granted him immunity to glamour, but lost it offscreen, allowing him to sleep around without further consequence – or the protection may have been broken otherwise. Also, the Vagrant Spear is an asshole. 😊

TeK

He didn't lost much, he probably lost exactly what he gained by an oath of chastity plus maybe interest.

Also Vagrant Spear probably was after his chastity too, at least at some point, but apparently lost.

Xinci

I mean him breaking that oath and his whole general weak spots being a mix of arrogance and ignorance paints a pretty good picture of how he could die. To have broken an oath at all is rather important

Mental Mouse

Also, there's the question of just how he came to break that oath, given the stakes... and the point that the oaths came with an immunity to magical manipulation. I'll eat a virtual hat if neither the Dead King nor the Bard was involved with that.

TeK

I doubt he broke his oath to get some though. I am pretty sure there are feelings involved.

It's just... I've been thinking about, and I can't really hate Mirror now. His everything paints picture of a confused teenager trying his best. However unlike Cat (which is kinda arrogant of her not to notice) he never had a patient dedicated mentor to clean up and pick things up after him.

He is literally and figuratively thrown at the deep end of the well and just kinda expected to behave, but never explained how or why he is wrong. I wrote this somewhere down in the comments, but the reaction of heroes to him is one of annoyed tolerance. He is not loved nor liked, but he is strong so he is used. Literally the only hero that actually looks up to him is another confused teenager from Procer.

To have broken an oath is important, but, as with Lancelot, I think it's more of a tragic love story.

Liliet

Well, Cat HAS already had the realization that nobody ever bothered to explain things to him.

She's seriously failing to really take into account the headstart Black gave her, it's true. Check your privilege and all that XD

Mental Mouse

Also, she's a villain, so she's not so eager to educate her opponents. Especially after trying it once with Pilgrim.

caoimhinh

It was the same as Lancelot du Lac.
Having sex weakened him after breaking his vow of chastity, and his affair with King Arthur's wife condemned the Kingdom of Camelot to ruin, with everyone involved either dead or in a life of sadness after the event.
Definitely not worth it.

But hey, as colloquial wisdom in Latin-America puts it: "an erect dick believes in no God".

TeK

Yeah well, now that I thought about it, Lancelot didn't fuck Guinevere because his balls itched, it was a tragic forbidden love and a choice between a love and an oath.

Given the obvious parallels between Mirror and Lancie, there's love involved too, only from his side. And to choose maybe love over his oaths requires inexperience and general lack of love in his life. First is a given, but second is quite a curious revelation.

I know most people here have a zero tolerance policy towards Heroes, but they are humans too.

alele

No one is going to comment on MK's possible virginity powers? Which makes all the plotting future betrayals in bed out of wedlock some sort of fall from grace? Anyone else?

TeK

Now I wait for EE to include school of magic that grants you Gift for magic if you are still virgin after 30.

grzecho2222

And it we know how Masego regains his Gift.

grzecho2222

*now

Walter

We saw dude in bed with a lady during the Crow's visions, right? Possibly that's when he broke his oath and lost his protection from glamour.

Mental Mouse

My problem with that is, why would some random noble girl be able to seduce him if he was still both sworn to chastity and immune to manipulation? I think he had to have lost it beforehand.

TeK

Maybe she was really pretty.

Javvies

She's also the daughter (possibly only child? Don't remember) of a Proceran Prince.

And Mirror Knight isn't the smartest or most self aware idiot Hero in Above's lineup.

TeK

I doubt Mirror is conceited like that to care about titles an whatnot. It's just plan inexperience in any kind of (sexual) relationship. Some things you just can't learn without repeatedly screwing up.

Or maybe I am just an idiot and everyone else never did something stupid when it comes to sex and love.

Javvies

I'm pretty sure he is. At least, if they are Proceran titles.

Remember, this is also the guy who has repeatedly tried to justify atrocities committed by Procer against other countries because they were committed by Procer, which automatically makes them the right thing to have done. To people from (or closely aligned with) those places victimized by Procer.

There's a reason basically all of the non-Proceran Heroes don't like him as a person.

Javvies

Though he is a naive and clueless idiot, I'll agree with that.

I'm not saying that her being the daughter of a Prince was the single most important deciding factor in his decision to break his oath and have sex with her, but it most assuredly helped.

TeK

Quite honestly I attribute it to the fact that he was in a war last few years, constantly on the frontlines, constantly risking his life in the thick of it.

Princess only got to him because she was near and shrewd enough to exploit his need to intimacy.

Or maybe she loves him too, heck.

Mental Mouse

It's not a matter of "never did something stupid", but we're watching the story-patterns here.

Someone compared him to Lancelot – but Lancelot was in love with Arthur's queen, and IIRC that had been set up from their first meeting. I remember a notable bit of slapstick (from de Troyes?) where when he first comes to Camelot, he has to fight another knight in the courtyard... but he's considerably hampered by craning his neck to look at Gwenevere, who's watching the fight from a palace window. That's some serious Story!

We haven't seen anything like that for the Mirror Knight (and that would have been sufficient reason in itself to give him a POV Interlude!). It's not at all clear to me that a some random princess who hadn't previously shown up in the main story, would have enough weight to break Mirror Knight's oaths. I mean, she's not even a King's daughter, just that of one of the many Proceran Princes. How does she get to hamstring one of the top Heroes of the region?

Javvies

Eh, I would not call Mirror Knight one of the top Heroes.

That said, as for how/why she pulled off seducing him offscreen ... we don't know much about the plot to betray the deal made with the Drow other than that it exists and she was trying to recruit Mirror Knight to it. It is entirely in character with Procer, so it could be entirely homegrown.

On the other hand, Malicia could be trying to discretely help it along to cause problems for the Alliance.

Or, Bard could be involved because the deal would presumably involve peace between the Drow and Procer ... it would be a massive change in the status quo in all the wrong ways for Bard. She could well be trying to push along the betrayal with the intent to take out the Dead King and replace him with the Drow as far as the rest of Calernia is concerned.

Plus, he's stupid, and has an extra helping of Proceran arrogance. She's a Proceran noble, the daughter of a Prince. He grew up a sickly weakling. Also, he's young, dumb, and full of cum. So to speak. In addition to all of the other factors.

TeK

Maybe the reason it wasn't shown was because it's important reveal later on. It is gradually hinted at, but as with any proper foreshadowing, you can dismiss the hints at first as unimportant.

How does she get to indeed. Personally I hold to "wrong place, wrong time" theory. As in, she isn't special, just lucky. War can be pretty taxing mentally. And Sidonia was with Archer at the time. I am shipping them now, after rereading Kaleidoscope. After initial vows are broken, he has less reason not to pursue Vagrant Spear, while she slowly finds herself jealous of whatever lucky wrench that got to him first. There is some good love story buried there somewhere.

Mental Mouse

>There is some good love story buried there somewhere.

Or a Greek tragedy....

TeK

Admittedly, I can't recall Greek tragedy without a love story.

Mental Mouse

Which invariably turns to shit as the gears of Destiny grind everybody into paste. 😊

Mental Mouse

I'll note also that "wrong place, wrong time" is real-world logic. In this world, accidents and coincidences involving Named are subject to manipulation.

TeK

Well, stories have to be realistic. Even if nothing Named is accidental, it still has to look like it. There are limits to providence and it can't rewrite reality, as Black had been demonstrating over sixty years by now.

WealthyAardvark

The Prince of Cleves had at least two sons during the prologue of Book 6. But it's been two years of war since then, who knows if they still live?

Auston Varner

I think it only made him immune to magical manipulation. Plain old psychological manipulation of an inexperienced virgin by an attractive person trained in politicking? It was probably child's play for the princess

Liliet

Immune to magical glamour, not mundane manipulation.

dadycoool

Lol, Cat and Hakram paired with the most dysfunctional groups. At least he seems to have a similar, if lesser, effect as her.

thearpox23

And it is interesting to see the difference in their dysfunctionality.

In Cat's case they just forgoed the synergy and decided to bank on their two heavy-weights to carry, trusting themselves to not only handle the fae but ALSO any knife in their back.

Liliet

IMHO there are three principle differences at the core of it:

1) Cat's more meta aware, while Hakram works more with the object level. He thinks "gee this will take a lot of providence" while Cat would probably be like "yep the more dysfunctional they are the more providence they get, this looks like a very potent mixture";

2) Hakram works through low key subtlety, guiding the currents, while Catherine just makes her own... and doesn't really have the capacity for subtlety. Hakram can join different conversations without immediately derailing them completely, Catherine naturally makes everything about herself just by being in the vicinity. She wouldn't either need to or have the capacity to work with nuances of who defers to who and who seems to want to fuck who. With her around... well, what Hakram commented on Maddened Keeper not providing would be in place;

3) This band is actually meant to work straightforwardly, while Cat's band had an undefined (three, apparently) number of traitors in it. The only real "band" part was her and Roland, with the two of them keeping a wary eye out for everyone else. She even split the party with an eye to who is likely to reveal themselves where rather than anything to do with combat effectiveness.

TeK

Wait who is the third traitor in Cat's band, is it Cat herself?

SpacyRicochet

Liliet means that Cat picked Roland as the definite not-traitor that could help her suss out the actual traitors.

The other three were maybe-traitors, of which we now appear to have two actual-traitors and one manipulated-but-not-a-traitor.

TeK

Oh, ok. I didn't get it.

Liliet

...I didnt even realize there was a reading of what i wrote where it parsed lmao it parses, but actually i just wrote 'three' instead of 'two' because ????

Liliet

...two. Two traitors.

Me and basic arithmetic, we're not always best friends.

dadycoool

1: "The crazier the plan, the more likely it is to work."

2: "What does the hierarchy matter? I'm here."

Wonder

This much interludes can only mean one thing, something very significant happened to The Queen of Lost and Found.

Liliet

Well, she's faking her death... It would be pretty cheap to reveal that immediately, wouldn't it?

(The longer we go without clarification the more confident I am in that assessment)

TeK

It also just may be that EE wanted an excuse to do interludes (which are much more numerous lately and tangle wider array of characters, compared to first books) and since he kinda established that interludes are used when Cat is somehow incapacitated (i.e. hanging on a cliff), he has to pretend to kill her off.

On the other hand, so much harder it would strike if Cat would be much more permanently incapacitated. Her disappearance for a long period of time would be interesting influence on character dynamic. For one, once she would be gone, everyone will understand how useful she was and wish her back.

Wonder

Next interlude is Heirophant

Mental Mouse

> ... so much harder it would strike if Cat would be much more permanently incapacitated.

<blink> ESL, or auto-co-wreck? Either way that sentence needs some help. 😊

TeK

Autocorrect, although quite honestly it's mostly blatant apathy, because I usually can't be bothered to proofread my comments. The longer they are, the less I am inclined

Burlyraven

Okay, so thoughts:

Archer is getting respect, respect. Makes a story involving her defying Ranger all the more likely.

Hakram is best boy, as always.

I'm concerned for the Magister. Hakram seems to approve of her becoming a consort to Cat, and by extension a moral anchor, but I don't know if she survives this situation. It'd be a shame, considering she and Adjutant would make a fine angel and devil (also funny since both are slightly shifted towards center on morality, if from opposite sides).

The Keeper is... concerning. The overarching story has plenty of individuals with knowledge of things they should not know that manage to hold on to their minds, so what is it exactly that makes the Keeper the Keeper? A bound demon? A direct oath to a Choir? Both? She seems the obvious traitor, but that's a cord that's been pulled more than a few times in recent chapters, so it'd be kind of disappointing here.

The Blade of Mercy might be a traitor. He's simple, and honorable, but he's of the old breed of heroes; the kind that most trust the Bard.

TeK

On the other hand, didn't Cat already collect all the traitors? Why would you need more? Heroes seem perfectly disfunctional to screw things up without an overarching grand masterplan. In fact, this is why they are here. Betrayal can be predicted and prepared for, as we've seen with Cat, but plain human stupidity, just like Gods, works in mysterious ways, and can blindside you even more.

Keeper is the Named analogy of radioactive waste disposal site. She does not know things she shouldn't know because they would be useful, she knows them because no one else can know them, and it would be hard to dispose of said secrets. In short, they may not even be overly useful secrets, or secrets that can be controlled with any degree of moderation. They are just too dangerous, and that is only thing that matters. I assume she is here at the very best, as contingency for the worst case scenario, if Arsenal goes caboomy. Worst case scenario is that something is very much planned to go caboomy and she is there to contain the aftermath. She seems kinda as a goat's fifth leg, because her purpose is yet to come.

Blade of Mercy is inherently incapable of any kind of deceit, he is so much not a traitor. He may have been worked on and influenced by Bard, but he is not a traitor in the sense of the word.

Burlyraven

See, that's how traitors get the protag in stories like this, especially when there's been confirmation of more than one. There's always that one extra lurking in the background, waiting for their moment or their master's signal.

TeK

Dunno, feels like overplaying a trope. I wrote already about that kind of one-upping in previous chapters, but "always one more traitor" gets a tad repetitive after a while. From both narrative and inverse standpoint much more effective to create an illusion of "always one more" to keep both the target and readers on edge, guessing and paranoid, without investing more resources into actual traitors. With a heavy sack of human stupidity ready to smack you while you search the shadows.

Burlyraven

I honestly kind of hope you're right. It might just be that I find Blade kind of annoying and Keeper is a fantastic example of an inherently unnerving character. This just also feels like the kind of story where tropes get overplayed intentionally for meta reasons.

TeK

The situation also doesn't call for that kind of overplaying.

Now if it was Tyrant they were against, I would expect backstabbing chairs and eavesdropping pillows, who are secretly gargoyles. And there is just always one more. Just as you killed everyone around you, you realise that you were traitor to yourself all along.

Oshi

Always one more traitor overplayed! How dare you! The Dread Emperor will have words with you!

TeK

But it is. The only reason Tyrant died was to avoid being boring.

Liliet

> With a heavy sack of human stupidity ready to smack you while you search the shadows.

t h i s lmao

Mental Mouse

Interesting take on the Keeper, though I'd think being a living seal for a demon would be enough to make anybody insane. I still want to know what kind of demon that was.

Regarding the traitors, someone commented on a previous chapter that if there's at least two, then there's probably five. Perhaps a pseudo-band of five people actually working for the Bard, plus an unknown number of dupes.

TeK

It's just, being only a living seal doesn't fit. It's a very impressive feat which kinda ends the story. Now the question is, which story was ended, a story of a Maddened Keeper, or a person she was before? Either she wouldn't had a Role after that, retiring in obscurity like a used McGuffin, or she would gain a calling from that, using her experience to actively pursue similar things and keep them away from the world.

Mental Mouse

It seems clear that she did gain or advance the calling she now has. Sealing the demon might well have represented the completion of her Name (perhaps her third aspect), and/or her graduation from a transitional Name.

thearpox23

So do we think it is the demon of Absense that she sealed? Because that would make her possibly the only person with memories of that time the Woe and 14 heroes teamed up to contain the egg.

Javvies

It was said that she predated the Conquest. So, it can't be the Absence Demon from Harrow.

We have very little to go on when it comes to the Maddened Keeper.

thearpox23

- 1: A name with a thirst for information comes along for the Crusade
- 2: A hell egg appears and she comes along
- 3: Things get out of hand
- 4: She glomps the egg, becoming the Maddened Keeper
- 5: Now everyone remembers her as the Maddened Keeper all along

Usually when I make a point I have some sort of evidence to back up my claim, but this is just pure speculation in this case. You're right that we have very little to go on. The whole thing reminds me of the companions you can recruit in Sunless Sea.

Mental Mouse

Well, if they remember the Woe joining in the fight, that's a problem. 😊 Cat tipped off the heroes to the Egg's existence and location, as a show of good faith. But she and the Woe stayed the Hell away from it, while Pilgrim assured them "don't worry, we have ways to deal with that".

I was thinking Absence from the way the Keeper could soak up magical doom; Liliet seems to think it was Madness, which is plausible given she's the Maddened Keeper. I've come to think that it's simply "not yet revealed".

Narratively, Rogue Sorcerer had a "mysterious" tag – he was one of the few major players where we hadn't seen their origin and aspects. EE seems to be stripping away that tag, so he may have wanted to transfer it to a new character.

thearpox23

I deduced that they joined in the fight from the way Catherine's memories were wonky during the Battle of the Camps. It's not a great leap of logic to assume that whatever they planned, things somehow escalated and the Woe got involved.

Mental Mouse

The thing is, they'd at least remember going there, and both sides were pretty clear that the villains didn't want to get near the thing, while the heroes were perfectly happy to go smite a demon. And hey, they only lost a couple out of more than a dozen.

(Did anyone figure out which Names got disappeared?)

Cat's headache and some of the memory issues could adequately be explained by two of the heroes getting disappeared. Other memory issues would be covered by, you know, Winter Fae overdrive, getting hammered into a coma (I forget the exact details) and then possessed by Akua.

An aside: They say that as you get older, memory is the second thing to go... I forget what the first thing was. 😊

WealthyAardvark

There's probably at least one more traitor around. Consider Chapter 14: Audience

"I will not unmask our friend in these walls so that you might silence them and hide the next sin from our eyes," the Mirror Knight harshly replied. "Queen you might be, Catherine Foundling, but you are no queen of mine."

The Mirror Knight is speaking in anger, and does not strike me as a skilled liar. The 'friend' was the one who told his group that the Red Axe was going to be murdered by Cat. Cat notes that such a message would almost certainly have had to have been sent before the Wicked Enchanter died.

Unless this plot is horribly convoluted, the 'friend' wouldn't be the Poet. He literally just arrived as part of the group. Conceivably the Bard could have told him to lie and say he received a message from the Arsenal, but like I said: convoluted.

The Fallen Monk was technically in the Arsenal before the killing, but for like at most half of an hour. Not enough time for it to be significantly before the murder as to allow the Mirror Knight's group to arrive when it did. Also, as far as we know he wields no magic or miracles to pass a message with.

No, more likely there's a traitor among the 10 Named who are permanently based in the Arsenal. Cat noted in Chapter 15 that most of these Named would have likely have a way to communicate with the outside world outside of official channels.

TeK

That makes sense. Thematically as well. One traitor came from Archer's group, one from Knight's, one from the Arsenal.

Liliet

I agree with TeK here (that seems to happen a lot lately, huh). This band's narrative thread is not about any of them being traitors, it's about them being fucking idiots yet somehow bumbling their way through fights anyway – ie your typical DnD party. Keeper is... I like the 'radioactive waste disposal site' analogy, though I'd argue her propensity for knowing secrets is less to do with every secret she finds being too dangerous for everyone else, and more with a built-in radar for finding bad shit so she can take it in if necessary. She's containment/death touch/seer... huh. Three Aspects, huh.

Burlyraven

That's very likely, honestly. But going with the DnD party metaphor, Blade of Mercy feels a little like the character played by the dudebro that's on his phone the whole time, so more than a little bit of my suspicion might be coming from annoyance.

Cicero

It is possible that Blade of Mercy is the "traitor" due to being an idiot rather than due to a reasoned decision to betray the alliance.

It could be as simple as him thinking Bard = Hero = Good and trustworthy, and Catherine = Villain = Bad and untrustworthy and not taking the time to consider that Catherine is their ally against the Dead King and that thus any plot attacking Cat is helping the Dead King.

Basically he's just Lawful Stupid, not crafty betrayer.

"help" bleh.

"You again," Parahumans 2 said, voice sounding like a boring convoluted unreadable mess. "It seems you did learn to fear your betters last time, orc."

Hakram Deadhand rolled his shoulder, limbering the muscle he'd almost just pulled, and bared his fangs at his foe.

"Yes," the Adjutant growled, "let us talk, of voting on topwebfiction.com."

topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil

Auston Varner

You know, putting down other stories doesn't make this one look better, it makes it look like pgte can't stand on its own merit without you defending it. Which isn't the case, this is easily my favorite web novel, and one of my favorite stories ever. But seriously, the people who are going to be mad about PH2 beating Guide in rankings (if it is) will be mad without your reminder, and anybody who likes both stories will just be annoyed. Either way, probably not actually going to inspire enough people to vote to make a difference. Also, that's just a particularly uninspired example of a quote reminder. I tend to be in favor of them, as being at least theoretically more interesting than a simple link but if you're going to go to the effort of picking out and altering a quote, try to actually make it good.

Thanks for the link though. Ironically, I'm going to vote when I usually wouldn't bother, mostly because I don't usually feel like putting in the effort. But, since I'm already putting in the effort of critiquing your comment, I may as well.

... I'm probably going to regret making this comment when I wake up tomorrow, but for now I'm too tired and grumpy to care.

SpeckofStardust

Honestly The heroes may have been brought in by Bard but I don't think their as traitors but as accelerants. they make the boom bigger/contained.

Liliet

This.

TeK

"One hundred and twenty-five: under no circumstances should you trust anyone who has the title of chancellor, vizier or duke. While they will always be powerful and competent, keep in mind they will also inevitably turn out to be in some way treacherous."

Now it just may be my CK2 infested brain, but I just can't reconcile duke and chancellor/vizier as a the same category of titles. Mainly because chancellor is a function and duke is rank, for the lack of better explanation. Evil Chancellor is very much a trope, evil duke is not so much, and mostly because they double as a chancellor, given that it is usually a duke who is powerful enough vassal in a Kingdom to be granted such title and oh my god where am I going with it.

Earl ofPurple

Dukes are as high as you can get before you hit royalty. If someone is plotting in a Good aligned kingdom like Callow, the dukes have the best chance of replacing the rightful king. Particularly since many dukes have more than a smidgen of royal blood.

TeK

Oh yeah, that makes sense.

Decius

You let anyone under the rank of viceroy serve on your council?

TeK

I usually play marriage game as a duke, without going for more land or higher titles for myself. It's more fun this way. By the time you are able to give away viceroyalties, game loses any challenge.

Decius

I'm currently trying to expand the Mali Empire and West African Reformed faith as much as possible without declaring war myself or changing religion or culture.

I've had some success acquiring heirs in raids, converting them during childhood, and then releasing them to inherit. I've had more success with my vassal kings declaring holy wars that my raiding retinue wins, but that's started to make them think they could take the throne.

Eldership succession lets me arrange for said kings to inherit the empire title, then spin off their (former) kingdom as a viceroyalty.

Sir Nil

Odd that Hakram had his interlude first, though that pretty much confirms that Cats not dead. If she is, then the Adjutant would've felt something and we would've gotten his perspective of it. Unless we have another Hakram interlude later on.

Decius

He did feel something. He just attributed it to his current band.

Oshi

Nah, Hakram is very self aware. It's his whole being. You can't be that devoid of emotions and stay sane without knowing where things are coming from. Cat wasn't the source of his unease the band was. He'd feel it if she was dead for good.

Decius

What makes you think Hakram is sane? What makes you think it's possible for Hakram to be sane?

Aotrs Commander

"Honour to the dishonourable is like gold thrown into a river."

slow clap

Christophope, that is geuniely the first smart thing you have ever said, in tandem with not dismissing ambushes for the sake of pride, basically. There's almost help for you yet.

Oshi

He's gonna get glamoured and die to the DK. Don't get too attached.

Aotrs Commander

Thgere is ZERO chance of me getting attached; this is literally the first thing I've ever seen him do that doesn't instantly make me want to see him die anyway. But apparently, even a stopped clock can be right occasionally.

TeK

Now that is a little too mean. Sure he isn't a nicest man alive, but many of his failing are a consequence of upbringing and ignorance. Not a failure of character.

Besides, as he continues to be used by everyone around him, without real respect (even heroes apparently view him only as a particularly tough brick to be thrown at opposition), I kinda feel sorry for him.

No wonder when someone pretended to see him as a person he was willing to break his oath of chastity. Yet he was being used once again.

ArkhoneX

I know this is unrelated t9 this specific chapter, but 0 bring it up because it is relevant overall. Do you think it is possible that Catherine isn't supposed to be resurrected, and is going to have to pull a Triumphant (May she never return) and fight her way through hell to get back?

TeK

Not really. EE mentioned before that afterlife wasn't any kind of physical certainty in Guideverse, so this would go against established rules of reality.

Liliet

What TeK said. The Triumphant thing is just a meme / urban legend, that anyone who knows their shit only ever repeats for cultural/social reasons.

NerfGlaistigUaine

Can someone give me a word count for this story? Broken down by books if possible?

Darkening

The entire woe shipping cat with nephele is just adorable. I look forward to seeing masego commenting on it in some vague fashion next interlude lol. The header about treacherous dukes is interesting considering we're introduced to a Duke and a duchess at the end of the chapter. Wonder how they'll prove treacherous.

TeK

I believe that does not apply to Fae, at least not to ones not of Winter.

Auston Varner

I don't know, it's well-known enough in universe

Auston Varner

*to be a consistent part of the fae courts.
Wordpress really does need an edit function

Mental Mouse

Yeah, fae are gonna be treacherous regardless of their particular titles.

Captain Amazing

Didn't Hanno say something about his people being invulnerable so long as they were bickering? Telling the Spear they'll have time afterwards is like loudly declaring your imminent retirement. Warlock said something similar to Masego before he died. Hakram moved unresolved sexual tension into a tragic love interest plot. He hanged a subtle red flag on the Vagrant Spear. The Blade of Mercy's jackassery actually helps alleviate this at the end but the Spear is still the most vulnerable. Might be I'm reading too much into this.

laguz24

That was when the tyrant was going all Saturday morning cartoon villain here not this fae invasion which is about as serious as you can get. In an absurd adventure comedic bickering keeps you alive in this bickering is what gets you killed. Also for the remainder, possibly but I don't know enough but I would say you have caught a bad case of shipping goggles.

Auston Varner

Hakram literally said the squabbling between MK and VS was probably something to do with sex. I don't know that trusting the current narrator's judgment is the same as wearing shipping goggles. You could argue that Hakram is wrong, but even then, that would imply that HE'S the one wearing the goggles, not commenters who believe him (what would they be wearing? Unreliable narrator blinders? That's a pretty clunky term, there has to be a better one...)

Liliet

Mirror Knight musing about 'attraction to a Levantine' back at Camps has been quoted on this page lmao

Mental Mouse

There's also the point that Hakram isn't actually one of them, rather he's Cat's agent, so he might in fact be sabotaging them on the story level. I've seen at least one person going "oh, Hakram doesn't attend to that sort of stuff", but that smells to me of "big dumb orc", and as Keeper pointed out (while staying well clear of the others!), the Adjutant may be big, but he ain't dumb. Not to mention that he is the Name-bonded second to the greatest mortal storyworker of the age...

Earl of Purple

Hanno's band in the Free Cities was invulnerable so long as they were bickering because that was Champion and Hedge Witch good-naturedly bantering about how ghosts work and basically a scholar getting frustrated by the barbarian misunderstanding everything. That put them in 'comic relief' territory and ensured they matched the tone set by the Tyrant of Helike.

This isn't that kind of bickering. This is nearly meanspirited and a sign of tension underneath the surface that might come to the surface with unfortunate consequences.

WealthyAardvark

It occurs to me that it's a very good thing that Cat set up the Adjutant to accompany this band of five, and that Hakram is doing his best to help it function.

After the Mirror Knight got out of the lockdown he and his fellows were subjected to, someone influenced him to assemble this band and then go to the Miscellaneous Stacks. The Exalted Poet no longer accompanies them, so it's not like they ran there immediately after being cleared by the scrying of the White Knight and picked up whoever they ran into along the way to fill out the band.

The planned story that Cat deduced the Bard had set up was that the Mirror Knight would confront the Black Queen, evidence of an evil plot surrounding her, and the conflict would escalate into a full civil war between all of the Heroes and Villains in the Arsenal. After the conflict started all 12 heroes would be involved, way too many to qualify as a band of five even with the Sixth Ranger taken into account.

That is to say: this band was assembled by the Bard and her traitors to perform a single mission! They're not meant to be functional in even the medium term, let alone the long term. Cat has repurposed the band for her narrative, but she never got the chance to assess its strength and see how brittle it is.

So please, Hakram, do what you can to grease the workings of this band, lest the wheels fall off of Cat's plan.

Interlude: Concert

"A problem that cannot be solved by brute strength can still be destroyed by it."

– Dread Empress Massacre

The Duke of Unrelenting Landslide struck like a mountain made hammer, his stride shaking the earth and his war cry echoing as if sung through a gorge.

Hakram Deadhand stood before him in his burnt plate, armed only with a shield and a long axe, and breathed in deep of the cool air of this place. Fear, fear did not come. It should have, for his foe was a godling in the flesh while he was nothing but old steel and arrogance, but all that Adjutant felt was a quickening of the blood. A stirring. His enemy roared out a challenge, but the orc did not answer: the time for taunt and boast was past.

Instead the Adjutant breathed in deep, and even as the Duke of Faerie brought down his morningstar he moved. A step to the side, as the mace shattered stone, and with keen eyes he darted forth. Axe high he struck, but the great fae batted his blow aside with his bare hand and laughed.

The morningstar swept across and Adjutant was not swift enough to leap over the blow, his shield taking it head on as he stood his ground. The whisper of the word was with him, and it had been but a casual stroke, and still he was sent flying a dozen feet back as his shield bent. Hakram barrelled into a horse, toppling it, and rolled away as the morningstar came down and splashed the mount's entrails over rock. Twice now he'd escaped death narrowly, and yet where was the fear? No, instead a strange and wistful joy had come over him. Like he had come home, after a long journey, or found an old place once beloved. His voice escaped his throat, neither challenge nor scream, instead softly and almost sadly singing in the Kharsum of his youth.

"I sing of spring, come winter deep
I sing of a dream beyond sleep."

Adjutant stepped to the side, the lilting and bittersweet pace of The Old Raider guiding his feet. Down the morningstar went, the Duke roaring in implacable anger, but Hakram was not there.

"The world was fair, when I was young," he sang.

The wind screamed, the morningstar sweeping, but Adjutant had begin moving before it. Under he went, knees creaking, and rose to his feet as the Duke turned to him in surprise.

"My grip was strong, my fang was long," the orc sang.

The proud creature did not shy away when he approached, pitting its own strength against the curve of Adjutant's axe, but this time when the Duke slapped away the blow Hakram flicked his blade with Name-strength and the fae screamed. Its hand was bloody, and a finger fell onto broken sone.

"And never," Hakram of the Howling Wolves sang, "did my axe falter."

—

The Archer sped up the stairs, steps soft as the breeze as her aspect warmed her bones like noonday sun: she could Stride to the end of the world, never faltering nor lost, so long as it shone within her.

She'd already strung her longbow, felt the enchanted wood tighten against her finger as she pricked her ear for the sounds of fighting above. There were five beats to the song, three and two at odds, and the fae were on the side with the numbers. A woman let out a hoarse scream of pain – the Blessed Artificer, Archer guessed – and so made it clear that the fae were on the winning side as well. She must hurry, she thought, reaching for the quiver at her side. Her fingers brushed through the touch of magic that would keep dust and water away from the wood, thumb sifting through the fletching until it found strix feathers and extracting that particular arrow. Black alder wood for the shaft, two centuries old so that the taste for shade and quiet would seep into the ambient magic, and an arrowhead of steel forged by a blacksmith born mute. It was a lurker's arrow, a slayer's arrow.

The strix feathers were simply a fancy of Archer's: the great flesh-eating owls of Waning Woods, after all, preferred to hunt by moonless night.

Her boots touched the second story moments later, arrow loosely nocked as she slipped in the shadow of tall pillars. The foes were righting on the footbridge that tied the hanging spire of crystal to the sides of the Belfry, though the fae wove in and out as was their way. Roland and the Artificer stood on one side, the black-skinned woman bleeding from a long cut across her chest and the Rogue looking like he was so deep in an aspect migraine he could barely see. Against them: a child of straw, an antlered huntress and what could only be a traitor. The Exalted Poet, Archer recalled. Caster, but in a tricky way and not entirely vulnerable up close. Very much human, however. The Archer carefully chose her vantage even as sorcery and Light, past trying to win, desperately tried to keep the two from dying against the three. She would only strike in complete surprise once, and so the shot must be made to count.

Angling herself so that the pillar would hide her from the side but she had a good view of the enemy's side, Archer breathed out. In the beat that followed, she fluidly drew the arrow past her ear and loosed in a single gesture. The lurker's arrow flew without making a sound or drawing the eye in any way, a wisp passing behind a flying tuft of straw from one fae being cleaved in two but inevitably, unerringly finding its target. Steel tore right through the Exalted Poet's throat, avoiding the spine but shredding the vocal cords. The man began choking on his own blood but Archer was already moving, slipping from shadow to shadow as her enemies fell into disarray.

One, the Archer counted

—

His insides were aching, the roughness of continued Use having taken him past raw and into bleeding. Worse, Roland was beginning to lack precision: he could not longer properly seize artefacts or sorcery, sometimes fumbling and losing a precious few moments before finally succeeding. It was the sort of time a man in his position – in over his head – simply could not afford to lose if he was to keep avoiding an unfortunate end.

“No wall, no gate, no mighty keep.”

The Exalted Poet’s rasping voice called out another spurt of what a generous man might call poetry – a far cry from the fine verses of Candide Farstride or those of the princess-poetess Luna Trastanes, what was being inflicted on Roland’s ears – and the Rogue Sorcerer answered with the quickest thing he had at hand, a sizzling Liessen Chisel that spurted out from his sleeve. The Callowan spell was a ward-breaker by design, but it kicked like a horse and it would have shut up the Poet if it’d hit. If. The Lord of Plentiful Harvest leapt into the path, and thought the chisel split him in two it was straw and not blood that went flying: just another false body.

“Will turn away slumber’s cr-”

An arrowhead bloomed in the Exalted Poet’s throat, stealing his breath in a red gasp, and Roland de Beaumaraais felt a startled, nervous giggle leave his throat.

“Rogue, what was that?” the Blessed Artificer asked.

Both fae scattered before she was done speaking, faces startled at the sudden bloodletting.

“The tune turns about, my friend,” the Rogue Sorcerer said, grin tugging at his lips.

The tightening of the Helikean bronze burr into the flesh of his flank warned him that power was being directed at his back and Roland threw himself down, scrabbling for a sharp enough blade that he’d be able to make some damage. That unexpectedly lethal jet of acid from the Dominion hedge mage, or perhaps hellflame confiscated from one of the Eyes? Golden power shivered above him, biting into the railing and sending shards of white-hot metal and stone flying every which way. His coat took most of it, three layers of impact-negation enchantment blown through in the blink of an eye, but it couldn’t cover everything. He swallowed a scream when a piece of shrapnel shredded through his cheek and the corner of his lip, his aspect stumbling into the use of another power.

“Bite,” the Rogue Sorcerer shouted.

Ice erupted with a shrill cry, singing of death.

—

“The days were long in summer sun,” Hakram sang.

There was Adjutant, and there was all that went on around him. In the coolness of his mind, he found himself able to follow both without trouble.

The Duke of Unrelenting Landslide stamped his foot against the stone, the air shivering of the power as a rippled went through the ground as if a pond had been struck. Hakram swiftly circled to the side, waiting until he had come near one of the remaining lancers and the fae struck out at him by sword to measuredly leap up. The lancer's blade rasped against his plate, burnt by fires mightier than any of those burning here today, and Hakram dropped his axe to catch the fae by the wrist and toss him to the side, right onto the downwards arc of the morningstar come to pulp him. He landed in a crouch, blood flecked all over him, and snatched up his axe.

Light flashed, the Blade of Mercy screaming as his greatsword shattered the spear of the Countess of Still Amber, drawing from the fae a scream of rage as he swept her down from her horse with pure strength. The Vagrant Spear whooped madly as she leapt sideways, smashing a bare foot into one of the distorted pale fae's face and an elbow into the others' neck. The three of them stumbled to the ground in a pile, even as one of the lancers made to run through the now-prone heroine only for a tight circle of red sorcery to form around his neck and choke him with his own momentum, buying just enough time for the Mirror Knight to lightly dance away from the Prince of Fallen Leavens and casually split the head from the body in a single stroke.

"Even sorrow sweet, in battles won," Hakram sang.

The Duchess of Red Sunset burned with power, grown incandescent, and the Adjutant could not touch her. None of them could. Tough she was weaker in power than the prince himself, in some ways the nature of that power was harder to deal with. Now it was only a matter of time until she unleashed the fires, and those might turn the tide. Her attention needed to be drawn, focused. The orc retreated towards her, stoking the Duke's anger even further as he found himself denied his foe.

"Coward," the Duke of Unrelenting Landslide screamed

The insult passed over him like water on a duck's back. The Duchess saw him coming, not blinded by her own works, and even as behind him the Duke roared and smashed into the melee like an angry bull she struck at him. A whip of flame lashed out from behind the blinding incandescence, unnaturally twisting over his raised shield and sweeping down to seize his hand. But the whip found only bone there, crafted by a Warlock of which there had been few equals, and there was no pain to loosen his grip. Hakram Deadhand lunged forward and struck at the fae within burning light, only to be driven back. It did not matter, for he'd heard her snarl in anger at his insolence. These were predictable creatures, once their nature was grasped.

The whip withdrew.

"And never did my hand linger," Hakram sang.

The fires of a setting sun swallowed him whole, but Adjutant had followed the rhythm: quick as the Duchess was, she was not so quick that his soul did not first echo with the will to Stand.

—

The huntress had come to hunt her, Archer saw with blade-sharp amusement.

She was a tall one, that fae, painted red and white with antlers tearing out of the sides of her head and a long spear of bone in her hand. Light-footed, almost reluctant to use her wings, and now striding across the stone floors of the Belfry in search of the archer who'd fired at her ally from behind. Ear to ear and eye to eye, Archer knew, the fae's senses were likely better than hers. In a game of shadows, at first glance it might seem like the huntress had the advantage. Of course, that perception relied on one assumption: that, when she heard the string of the bow being pulled, the fae could move faster than Archer could loose. The Named's fingers went drifting through her quiver once more, finding the arrow she sought by the soft touch of the bellhawk feather fletching. Prodigiously loud birds, bellhawks, known to use their cry to startle animals into leaving their hiding places.

The purpose of the matched arrow was a little different, but not dissimilar in essence.

Crouched atop the stacks, overlooking the huntress from the distance, the Archer drew and loosed before a single breath's span could pass. The antlered fae's head swivelled, but before she could finish finding the arrow from the whistling sound the enchantment carved into the birch shaft was awakened by the touch of wind and a deafening cry erupted. The huntress winced in pain, her unnaturally sharpened senses coming back to haunt her, and that delay cost her. While the fae narrowly managed to recover in time to catch the small glint of light on steel and swat aside the arrow, the second one – tipped in cold iron, a precaution she'd originally taken in case the Wild Hunt grew rebellious – that Archer had drawn and fired under the cover of the first found her thigh and struck true. The trick had been in the angle, aimed just so that the fae's peripheral vision would miss the second shot until it was too late. Even if the fae were magic made flesh, as Masego insisted, so long as they used human shape they shared the limitations of human eyes.

Two, the Archer counted.

The huntress screamed as the touch of cold iron spread through her veins like poison, ripping out the arrow only too late. It would not kill her, but she was slowed now. Weakened. And when the antlered fae looked atop the stacks, ready to unleash her wrath, she found only shadows there. Archer was gone, had been since the heartbeat that followed the second loosing. She did not need to stay to know whether her arrows had struck true.

It was with something like wariness that the huntress now eyed the open space before her.

—

The Rogue Sorcerer could feel it in the air, like a scent in the wind: the tide, it was turning.

The Lord of Plentiful Harvest snarled in anger, having been just a beat of the song too slow to escape the sudden blooming of the ice. His foot was frozen up to the knee, and with his childlike body even given his physical strength he was having a hard time finding the right angle to rip himself free. Roland was still panting even as he rose, he wouldn't make it in time, but he was not fighting alone. Adanna of Smyrna, bloodied but unbowed, turned a dark glare unto the fae they had each killed a dozen times only to see straw fly instead of blood. She was nearing exhaustion as well, sweat beading her brow and staining her clothes, but it was with a steady hand that she raised up a simple bundle of four twigs and crushed it in her grip. Four bolts of Light screamed to life, grasped tight and reflecting on her spectacles.

"Four," the Blessed Artificer said, "will be plenty enough for you."

Not bad, Roland, mused even as Adanna's hand came down and the Light thundered. It was well-known among Chosen that speaking the right phrase or challenge could nudge the odds of a blow landing in your favour, and this seemed like it might just pass muster. The Lord of Plentiful Harvest had already lost an arm to Adanna earlier, and today she was to be his bane for the four streaks Light melded together into a single great spear that tore through his chest, burning its way through flesh and bone and whatever deceit lay at the heart of fae. The Rogue Sorcerer, sensing that the end of this was to come soon one way or another, touched a finger to one of the runes in his pocket. The bottom of the Slow Regret, that despicable piece of Stygian work, slapped against his palm and he withdrew the small clay statue depicting a crane.

"You insects," the Lord of Plentiful Harvest snarled, body visibly boiling in the wake of his wound. "I will see you annihilated for this."

He'd begun shedding strands of straw from the sides of the gaping hole the Artificer had burned, and with a shudder he contracted onto himself: becoming significantly smaller, yet whole again. Have we been destroying true pieces of him this entire time? Regardless Roland touched his bloody cheek and rubbed some of the redness against the side of the statue, watching it sink into the clay without a trace, then grimaced. The part that came after was not one he enjoyed.

The Rogue Sorcerer produced a knife, the same he'd used to bleed dry the Count of Green Apples, and with a ragged war cry ran towards the fae.

—

The flames of a dying sun seared him, scorched him, devoured him whole.

Hakram Deadhand should have been made ash, dust scattered on the wind, but he stood unbowed in the face of the wrath of the Duchess of Red Sunset. Like a statue made of conceit, he refused the fae's verdict and his aspect came smooth and deep at the call. It too, disapproved of the utter arrogance of that creature in believing her will was enough to end him. He bowed his neck to one woman only, and she had sent him out today to win. The fires waned, as all fires had and ever would, and when the last ember died the Adjutant stood still. Unmoved.

"I bore a crown once, of iron hewn," Hakram sang, and struck.

Through the blinding light still at the heart of the fae, Adjutant saw the recoil of dismay. His axe's edge cut through a whip of flame, a pretty trick but poor in defence, and found flesh beneath. The Duchess cried out in pain and he hammered her down on the ground, teeth bared. The orc felt a strong grip squeeze around his ankle, the Repentant Magister's enchantment warning him he was now under glamour. Without missing a beat, Hakram stepped back and closed his eyes. Find, he thought. Find me my foe. The aspect pulsed within him and blindly he swung, letting Creation guide his hand. The blow glanced off the side of a spear of ivory, a pale-skinned fae coming into existence with a sound like a shattered mirror.

"Flicker," the Blade of Mercy yelled.

In the heartbeat that followed he smashed into the pale fae's side, made entirely out of Light — it was a simulacrum, Hakram understood only when after cutting through the spear and tackling the glowing Blade winked out. The orc took the opening, shield smashing the Duchess' face when she tried to rise before he knelt atop her, axe rising. The incandescence flared, tossing him away in a torrent of flame but it had been enough. Already coming down, one eye wide open and burning from the refusal to close, the Vagrant Spear rammed her spear through the fae's open mouth, screaming in triumph. Hakram landed on his feet, steel boots shooting sparks as he slid to a halt.

"Earned riding," Hakram sang, "under autumn moon."

As if spellbound, the head of every single fae swivelled towards him. Unexpected, the Adjutant thought, but he could work with this. He rolled his shoulder, loosening it before all the howling Hells came for him.

"And never did my heart waver," Hakram Deadhand hummed.

—

Archer savoured the hesitation in the huntress' steps like fine wine, knowing it was the closest fae could come to true fear: the implicit recognition that there was something out there that could kill them, if it wanted to.

It was time to bring this to an end. First she allowed her boots to drag against the floor, the fae near instantly turning towards the noise and tossing a spear of blood-red power at the pillar Archer had been hiding behind. Stone shards and dust blew everywhere, but she'd already been moving. One, two, three steps even as the bellhawk arrow she'd reached for was knocked and loosed. The huntress went wild, charging forward, and though she parried the arrow in question with her bare hand the Archer had already released that second pulsing tension within her. The Flow that went beyond what earthly hands could master, hers to borrow for the shortest of whiles. Sometimes she wondered if that was what it felt like, to be the Lady. When everything fit perfectly, and you could place yourself within the parts of the world exactly the way you wanted.

There were twenty feet between the Archer and the huntress. Before one had been crossed, the second arrow was loosed: a slender thing of birch, that would have torn through the fae's left ankle were it not slapped aside by spear. Archer loosed the third arrow before the huntress was even done moving, and the cold iron tip tore through the fae's right shoulder. The enemy screamed in excruciating pain but strode forward. Seventeen feet left. The huntress had learned the trick, now, but it did not matter: Archer had killed things like here before. Much as the fae wanted to ignore the fourth arrow she could not, for it was of cold iron and headed right for her throat. She twisted around, ducking low as she moved — fifteen feet — but the fifth arrow ripped right through her left knee before the spear could adjust to the lowered height. The huntress stumbled but stubbornly carried on.

The sixth arrow was loosed low, at her midriff, and the fae's back erupted with red wings. One bat of them was enough for the fae to drag herself up, the shot passing under her as she forced her body straight – ten feet – but the seventh tore through the left wing and her flight swivelled downwards. The huntress hit the ground but struck at the stone with the butt of her spear first, so that she would remain half-standing and half-stumbling forward when her feet touched down. Eight feet. A simple trajectory, and the spear was already occupied: the eighth arrow, the last cold iron tip Archer carried, punched through the fae's ribcage and into her heart. She stumbled forward a few steps, gasping, and raised her spear in a last effort. The Archer felt the flow leave her, the world become clumsy and blind once more, but even at her least she could see the span of that death.

Nonchalantly, she stepped to the side of the huntress blow and waited for the antlered fae to drop down with a plaintive scream of pain. Unmoved, Archer took another two steps forward and knocked a mundane arrow before turning. The blood-red power the huntress had gathered above her head did not defend her from the shot the Archer loosed a heartbeat after turning, punching through the back of the fae's skull.

—

One of the Rogue Sorcerer's ribs shattered as the little fae slapped his side, throwing him away like a ragdoll, and he screamed in pain. It wouldn't be enough, damn him, damn this damned statue and the damned sorcerer whose damned soul had thought it was a clever damned thing to make. At least some sort of spell could have been woven in to numb the pain but no, Stygian sorcerers were all bloody sadists. Exception made for Nephele, of course, was a delight unless she had a few drinks in her and reason to be displeased. Roland landed on the stone footbridge, which was not great for his already bruised back, and tried to hack away at the fae that'd flown over to him and was now dropping down. Sadly his knifeplay had gone somewhat rusty of late, and the Lord of Plentiful Harvest snapped the wrist holding the knife before landing on his ribs and shattering another few. Gods, the pain.

"Duck," the Blessed Artificer screamed.

Sadly, between the excruciating amount of pain he was in and the fact that the fae was standing atop his abdomen it had been fated that Roland de Beaumaraais was going nowhere. Which proved something of an issue when a bolt of Light struck him and not the Lord of Plentiful Harvest, who had been in a position to heed Adanna's advice. With a breathless scream of pain, the Rogue Sorcerer felt the power scythe through the last two layers of protection on his shirt and sear his skin. Not deeply, but he comforted himself with the knowledge that at least properties would be maintained.

"Cower," the childlike fae ordered, tossing a disk of golden power at the Blessed Artificer.

He then turned cruel eyes at the Rogue Sorcerer, freshly back on his feet, who met him gallantly with a raised knife.

"Adanna," he called out. "Still alive?"

"Yes," the Blessed Artificer panted back.

"Then prepare your sharpest blade," Roland de Beaumaraais said. "This ends."

"In this," the Lord of Plentiful Harvest beatifically smiled, "you are correct. This ends, and it ends with you screaming."

The Rogue Sorcerer smiled, deeply relieved.

"Say what you will about Theodosian," Roland said, "but the little bastard would have seen it coming."

On that scathing assessment his fingers closed around the clay statue artefact still in his pocket, the Slow Regret. With a grunt he shattered the clay with his grip and pointed a single finger at the childlike fae. Before his foe could even blink a small thread of translucent sorcery connected them, and Roland screamed once more as his ribs unsnapped. The Lord of Plentiful Harvest turned surprised, pained eye on the Rogue Sorcerer, who grinned back mockingly. Roland's seared skin healed, while the fae screamed as the burning touch of Light ate at its chest.

"Artificer," he yelled. "Now is-"

"Soon," Adanna yelled back, tone distracted.

The Rogue Sorcerer's ribs unshattered once more, as the last of the wounds he'd taken since binding himself to the Slow Regret flowed through, and the fae broke out of the enchantment with a yell of triumph.

"Now," the Lord of Plentiful Harvest said, "you-"

He paused, looking up, and Roland followed his gaze. Above them, the crackling web of Light that had been preventing the fae from going up was gone. Instead a hundred glinting swords of Light hung in the air, while the Blessed Artificer grinned a devil's grin at them both.

"Boom," Roland helpfully said, flicking a finger at the fae.

The swords came down and the world went white.

"Spring passed into summer song," Hakram sang.

His ankle was still being squeezed, a reminder that he was under glamour and could not trust all that his eyes told him. Yet he saw much, in the moment where the Court of Autumn tried to destroy him. The Maddened Keeper, laying the lightest of touches on one of the pale fae – it melted from the inside in the beat that followed, in too much pain to even scream. The Repentant Magister, throwing a bauble of silver at the Countess of Still Amber that froze her in place just long enough for the Blade of Mercy to cleave her in two. And Hakram saw, too, the wrath headed his way: a cloud of rot and decay, from the Prince of Fallen Leaves' hand, and single smooth pebble from the Duke of Unrelenting Landslide. Adjutant knew the latter would carry with it the strength of an entire avalanche and was likely to kill him on impact even if the former did not.

The Mirror Knight, unflinching, stood between the orc and the onslaught. Straight-backed, shield raised, the hero widened his stance.

"Withstand," Christophe de Pavanie said.

And though death struck at the Mirror Knight, he looked upon it in disdain and let it wash over him. It was an opening, Hakram thought as the rot split around the Proceran. They would not see him coming, not through that. The Adjutant did not embrace fury, for the Red Rage had never been in his blood. He reached instead for the cold, for the frozen bite, and let it flow through his veins. Strength filled his limbs, and he knew the Rampage had begun.

"Then summer into fall, headlong," Hakram sang.

The rot ate at his flesh as he leapt through it, but in the throes of his aspect that meant nothing. It was back, and he emerged from the cloud with his axe raised high. The Duke of Unrelenting Landslide blinked in surprise, but swung down the morningstar without hesitation. A step to the side, as the stone broke. The morningstar swung, but Adjutant had the measure of his foe now. And the swiftness to act on that measure. He leapt over the swing, and with all his might smashed his shield in the Duke's face. The fae rocked back, in pain, and took a hand off the morningstar to blindly swipe. Adjutant began to duck the moment he landed, smooth and measured, and his axe sliced through the fae's heel. The Duke screamed out in pain, falling onto his knee, and there the orc was waiting.

"And I know what waits after," Hakram Deadhand sang, axe smashing through the Duke of Unrelenting Landslide's forehead.

Again and again he ripped free and swung, making a red mess of the fae's head, until the giant toppled at his feet and he breathed out. He chanced a look around him, finding that now only the Prince of Fallen Leaves still stood and that the band of five was surrounding him. Yet Hakram's ankle was still squeezed tight: a heartbeat later Sidonia struck at the fae, only for the illusion to shatter, and the orc grasped that there was worst yet ahead.

The prince was in the wind, and there was no one protecting the sword meant to slay the Dead King. The last two lines of the old song came to him, like a mournful warning.

*I sing of spring, come winter deep
I sing of a dream beyond sleep*

ErraticErrata

Later than I would have liked and still a little raw, but there it is. Enjoy!

caoimhinh

It was an awesome chapter, don't you worry about that.

Hope you get better soon, health is of paramount importance at all times.

Jessica Day

Bravo! Encore, encore!

Arctruth

Absolutely brilliant chapter. Wound up fitting Hakram's words to Avi Kaplan's Change on the Rise while I read. Honestly this is one of the best fight scenes I've ever read.

DrD

Wow... that was... wow. 0_0

NerfContessa

Indeed.

Terribilis

I adore your poetic chapters EE.

I hope you feel better soon!

Cap'n Smurfy

Really nice to see Archer in action from her own perspective. She has a surprising amount of variety in her arsenal of arrows.

dadycoool

And it shows just how much time and effort went into each piece of her equipment.

Liliet

Surprising? 😊

Cap'n Smurfy

Yeah I was expecting her to have just regular, well-made arrows plus a few specialised ones like her mage killers. Not a custom made highly magical arrow for each and every scenario.

Liliet

I figure she has just, like, five to ten kinds in total. She just has a lot of each because when she needs them she needs many at once.

Shikkarasu

I assume the opposite. She mentioned running out of Mage-Takers after 5-10 shots the first time she used them. Between that and the fact that she still has Cold Iron years after her last tangle with the Fae suggests she has dozens of different kinds and occasionally adds 10ish of a new type of arrow to her collection as and when she has the opportunity/need.

It's also an example of her deceptively calculating mind. She acts like her plans are haphazard, but she's always ready for anything.

WuseMajor

"The trick, young Archer, is not to plan for everything."

"Huh?"

"The trick is to be ready for anything."

"Ohhhh..."

Liliet

Yeah, but she won't have all of them in her quiver at the same time. It's got limited size.

That said, YEP.

(and she wrote out a list of names she could call Akua, I will never be over that)

Cap'n Smurfy

That is still more magic arrows than I assumed. This surprised me. I am surprised. Behold my surprised face: 😲

laguz24

Now, what would the bard need severance for? Aside from the obvious. Also, this is what I need in a life going to places I do not know.

Sir Nil

Probably just to destroy it, which forces the Alliance to use the Judgement corpse instead against the Dead King. Which, we still don't know the cost of yet. All we know was that is was enough to make the Augur go against the Bard.

Oshi

It's never so easy. Better still to poison it or bend it into uselessness.

Sir Nil

I see this as an attempt by the Bard to drag Calernia back into the Age of Wonder. Which is her playing field instead of the Age of Order Cat has made. The story the Bard was originally trying to pull was one of the desperate Warden of the West unleashing a super weapon to slay the Dead King. Very classic Age of Wonder, instead Kairos slew the Age of Wonder by crippling the weapon. Kairos wasn't kidding when he said he'd slain it, by throwing the Hierarch into Judgement, he may have crippled the Judgement weapon or changed its nature. Especially if we consider the fact that the Hierarch, a Named who believed all to be equal was the one that silenced Judgement. If the Judgement weapon is activated, I can almost guarantee that the Hierarch will have some hand in its after effects.

Mental Mouse

The thing is, Severance is pretty much a super-weapon in its own right, albeit a heroic version. The thing is, there are also ways it could go wrong... and Bard might have her own opinions about how safe it is. In particular... what happens if it succeeds... but then it's still around? Would possessing it be a balance-of-power issue in its own right? Then too, there's that old saw about never placing your trust in an artifact...

Sir Nil

The thing is, is that it isn't the only weapon the Arsenal was developing. Sure it's one of the main ones, but the fact that there are multiple weapons being developed against the Dead King is another blade barred at the old Age of Wonder. The Age of Wonder was the Age of Heroes and Villains, and it seems to love simplifying conflicts into just that. A Hero vs a Villain, but Severance is a weapon that had hands from both Good and Evil in creating and controlling it. It is more Order than Wonder because of that.

I also personally suspect that whatever drawback the Judgement Corpse might've originally had, was something the Bard was counting on happening. I theorise the original drawback of the Judgement Corpse was causing the Eye of Judgement to be cast on everyone Calernia, like what would've happened with the Contrition Corpse but on a much larger scale. If that happened, it would've effectively turned the entirety of Calernia Good because Judgement killed that everyone that wasn't.

Sir Nil

As for the power balance, as we're not sure what Bard's exact motivations are, we won't know what her opinions are, but I suspect she only cares about power balance if it benefits her in some way.

Sir Nil

A single heroic band of 5 can beat the Dead King, but that is an old method, that has a steep cost of life and doing so would enforce the previous Age of Wonder mindset as opposed to the the Age of Order Cat is trying to build. In trying to shatter the Truce and Terms, the Bard is trying to force an old method of victory as opposed to the new one Cat is trying to make. If Cat successfully kills the Dead King with both Evil and Good named, then she sets an unbreakable precedent for her future Liesse Accords. That of a powerful named using great powers getting drowned by multitudes of named.

ByVectron!

To get free of the story, maybe? To cut that thread connecting her to the mortal realms.

MrRigger

Well now, isn't that a problem? Or rather, an opening for Cat to make her reappearance stymieing the Prince. And I can't help but think how some of the Heroes around him took the sight of the Adjutant fighting and singing, cause that was awesome.

Big I

Just a shame they can't understand Kharsum.

caoimhinh

Indeed.

I'm kind of hoping for a glimpse into the POV of one of the Heroes around Hakram, and them going like "The Adjutant growled strangely in that eerie tongue of the Orcs, all soft grunts and throaty rasp, but Gods Above, it sounded like he was singing. With a strangely fitting cadence that matched his steps."

Kinda like when the Drow went to battle and Itima's son was freaked out by the foreign chant of "Rumenarumenarumena".

Sir Nil

Oh dear, Adjutant singing a similar song to Cat? Archer being in the role of the hunter? If this wasn't meant to mirror Cat then I'd eat my foot.

Burnsy

"No one protecting the sword meant to slay the Dead King."

I know where Cat went.

Liliet

Same

Shikkarasu

The poor Prince is about to get a face-full of the late and Lately Queen of Callow.

Liliet

y e s

ATLRoyal

Anyone wanna take some time to compose the full song Hakram sung w/o the rest of the text between it all?

Auston Varner

Here you go!

I sing of spring, come winter deep
I sing of a dream beyond sleep

The world was fair, when I was young
My grip was strong, my fang was long
And never did my axe falter

The days were long in summer sun
Even sorrow sweet, in battles won
And never did my hand linger

I bore a crown once, of iron hewn
Earned riding under autumn moon
And never did my heart waver

Spring passed into summer song
Then summer into fall, headlong
And I know what waits after

I sing of spring, come winter deep
I sing of a dream beyond sleep

Sulomund

Good stuff.

RandomIntenetStranger

God i was shaking through the whole thing and while some of it may have been because of the cold it was mostly due to excitement.

Frivolous

I kept worrying Hakram was dead because he was singing, because orcs sing death-songs. Thank goodness he lived through this episode.

Javvies

Hakram's been doing the battlesong/chanting thing for years. So him doing it again isn't exactly a sign of anything. Fortunately. Or unfortunately, depending.

dadycool

"Dead the man and dead the hand" from the war against Summer comes to mind.

Letouriste

This is not him singing. He sung several times in the story, the first one being in the extra chapters.

Nuke_The_Earth

I'd love a list of all the parts where he sings, or all the songs he sings. Orcish chants just have a strong feel to them.

beleester

I think the only times we've actually seen it are here, and in Conspiracy II (Extra chapter). It's mentioned that he took down a Revenant while reciting poetry during the timeskip, but it doesn't happen "on camera."

Honorable mentions:

"Dead the Hand" (about Hakram, but not Orcish) is in Chapter 25: Intent

"Ruin, Sown" (not Hakram, but Orcish) is the epigraph to Interlude: Congregation III

The Riddle of Power (Orcish, but not poetry) is in Chapter 23: Recoup

beleester

Missed one more bit of Kharsum poetry: A group of Orcs about to get killed recite "The Chant of the Dead" in Heroic Interlude: Balestra.

hakureireimu

They also sing not-death songs.

Auston Varner

I believe they call those "death for other people" songs 😊

Eleron M Pfoutz

It was a death-song. Just not HIS death-song.

WuseMajor

"Today is a good day for SOMEONE ELSE to die!"

Eleron M Pfoutz

Exactly!

Javvies

Archer in action. I don't think we've ever gotten such a good look at her working like this before.

That's a nifty last trick the Rogue Sorcerer used. But it's easy to understand why he doesn't like that one.

Hakram the battlesinger/chanter. Excellent as always.
Wonder how the Heroes will react to his performance.

hakureireimu

Late Regret?

dadycoool

Huh. Roland pulling out all the stops today. Too bad the Fae are making him use it early.

Mental Mouse

Well, it's not like it was wasted – even with it, it took the Artificer's "sharpest knife" to deal the final blow, and that's after everybody had been chipping away at his straw bodies and hammering his main body as well. That dude was one badass boss – but unfortunately, not the final one.

I suspect Roland mostly was regretting that he had to use it at all, and no wonder!

dadycoool

I was referring to the fact that he used it against non-undead. When you're in a war with the Dead King, you need every blade pointed North, which actually illustrates the tragedy that is this infighting-filled arc.

hakureireimu

I actually think EE is reusing names, unintentionally or not.

Mental Mouse

"Every blade pointed north" is a rallying cry for Cat's potential allies. It in no way prevents nor binds other enemies from getting in the way. Really, fae aren't really part of Calernian politics, so much as a natural hazard and potential resource. Now, if Cat were able to turn an entire court of Arcadia against DK, that would be useful!

ciara

Damn these derivative villains, always re-using old badass names for their new curses. No one appreciates the theatricality anymore!

dadycoool

This chapter is really cementing the thought that Cat's Name will be a music-based one, considering she and Hakram were singing songs while wrecking their opponents and Archer thought of the encounter in terms of beats.

Speaking of the songs, Hakram with the flex!

TeK

Heartbeats though. Bur yeah, Catbard confirmed.

dadycool

Have people been talking about the possibility of Cat actually transitioning into inheriting the name of Bard, the way she was slated to become one of the Knights as Squire?

TeK

Not really more like taking upon her Role instead. With a possible name of Guide or something.

dadycool

Now that Name would be Meta AF.

Mental Mouse

Or Cat may become Bard's Eternal Opponent, the trickster spoiling her plans and rewriting the stories.

WuseMajor

Honestly, I've been suspecting that Bard's real plan this entire time has been to Retire/Die for Good, but, because the stupid pointless conflict between Heaven and Hell needs a Referee/Emissary, she can't. So, she's been grooming a replacement. Someone who wants to

1) Put a stop to the forever war.

AND

2) Wants to murder the Bard for good.

AND

3) Has an amazing instinct for Stories.

All are required. Three so she can do the job, two so she's motivated to end the Bard's endless existence, and one so the karmic punishment for two can snap shut around her and bind her to the Bard's endless task and put her in the same unending hell the Bard is in, destroying everything she tried to create and keeping all the crabs in the bucket until she can pawn it off on another girl.

dadycool

Considering it's Cat, I think she has the skills, support, and Protagonist Armor to do that and avoid the punishment. I almost wonder if Bard became the Intercessor by accident/punishment and her replacement wouldn't necessarily have the exact same circumstances/result.

laguz24

You know I'm really worried about how spring will be required to respond to mirror autumn. Who will make the deal with them and how?

Javvies

So far, based on what we know, this isn't a situation where Spring would need to mirror Autumn.

Autumn is not at war with an outside party. Autumn is launching a raid for the redemption of debts owed to (Hunted Magician) and by the Court (to Bard). Plus, the Arsenal may or may not qualify as sufficiently of Creation anyways.

Mental Mouse

Sure looks pretty warlike to me... But the autumn/spring dynamic might not be the same as Winter/Summer was, especially since the merger.

Javvies

They're not doing anything that would permanently change the balance of power between the Courts.

They're here as debt collectors (Hunted Magician) and in the process will pay off a debt incurred (Bard) to locate him. Then they'll leave.

They're not trying to annex part of Creation. For that matter, the Arsenal might not qualify as sufficiently part of Creation to count.

As far as we know, anyways.

Daniel E

I can't recall a time when we ever saw a Named use all 3 Aspects more or less back to back.

Black opened the second siege of :Liesse with both Lead and Conquer, and ended his argument with Malicia with Destroy. That ended with him knocked out for days, so, given that the other three times we saw that were Lone Swordsman in a duel with Catherine during first Liesse, the Hedge Wizard getting baited and killed by the Warlock and the Stalwart Paladin just before Catherine stole him from his angels, I suspect using up all the power they grant might strongly suggest the end of one's story as well.

nick012000

There was also the time that Akua fought the fae right after she became the Diabolist.

Mental Mouse

In addition to "Underscore"'s list, We have seen a lot of fights where one side was trying to bait out their opponent's Aspects, as many as they could. Not only do the most powerful aspects have limited uses, but even if they don't, revealing them may give the opponent a chance to come up with a specific counter.

For a Named to use all three Aspects in the same fight normally qualifies as "shooting their wad" – it seems to imply that the Named is pushed to their limit and may well be overmatched. (Ranger, as usual, is an exception.)

byzantine279

Since Ranger's Aspects are passive rather than active they don't count for this. I suspect this counting trick only works at all with Named that have 3 active aspects.

Thanatoss

Ranger Aspects are: Learn, Perfect, and Transcend.

Why more Named do not attempt to get this broken overpowered combination of Aspects when they are undefinied? Cat did get Learn when she was actively taught by Black. So it shouldn't be impossible to get at least Learn and Perfect, that would make any normal martial Named or mage Named OP on the spot.

Javvies

Ranger's version of Learn lets her learn stuff in combat. Squire Cat's version of Learn did not allow her to learn stuff in combat. Only when doing focused study or actively being taught.

Same term, different emphasis. I expect that the tradeoff for Ranger's Learn is that it is less useful, if at all, for noncombat, utility, or academic applications, whereas Cat's Learn let her pick up all kinds of things from studying or being taught.

And, also? Getting a Learn type Aspect similar to Squire Cat's ow probably relatively common for transitional Names, or academically focused.
Getting Perfect? That's going to be difficult.

Plus, Aspects are usually something you need to shore up a weakness or need in the moment, or something that epitomizes you or what you do, doubling down and enhancing something you already have or have done.

Juff

Typo Thread:

breathed in deep (appears twice in quick succession) begin moving > begun moving slipped in > slipped into righting > fighting from the side (maybe remove this) Archer counted > Archer counted. out form > out from make some damage (maybe do some damage) rippled > ripple
by sword > with sword others' > other's Tough she was > Though she was Landslide screamed > Landslide screamed.
Archer was gone, had (extra space) rose, he > rose; he straw form > straw from They part > The part glowing Blade winked out (something's wrong here) like here before > like her before huntress blow > huntress' blow was a delight > who was a delight properties > proprieties
this," the Lord of Plentiful Harvest beatifically smiled, "you > this"—the Lord of Plentiful Harvest beatifically smiled—"you finer > finger last if the > last of the and single > and a single

Nuke_The_Earth

"The world was fair, when I was young,
My grip was strong, my fang was long,
And never did my axe falter."

This part specifically struck a chord in me pretty strongly. I've always had a sort of affinity for warrior cultures, and this, to me, sings of what it is to be an Orc.

Loki

Username checks out.

Rey d`Tutto

Warrior-Poet Hakram Deadhand. Awesome scene.

Not to say I didn't enjoy the little details of Rogue Sorcerer's or Archer's styles of fighting, but Warrior-Poet.

dadycoool

People who can kick your ass and simultaneously sing a ballad about it are a special type.

'Ladi Williams

Get well soon EE...this was awesome.

Once again I say this would make an awesome series if we can get a good studio to produce it...

I would pay extra to watch the deadhand scenes over and over again.

Wonder

The moment Deadhand started singing, I knew the Duke was dead.

TeK

He really duked it out, eh?

Mammon

Damn Archer, one can tell you're not too experienced in this dramatic poetry stuff. All owls eat flesh and most to all hunt at night. That's just nonsensical.

Burlyraven

I love it when the war chants and songs come out, and it's been far too long since we've seen either Hakram or Archer be badass.

I know Cat is the obvious choice for defender of the sword, but I have to wonder if we might not see Kingfisher make an appearance, possibly as a last second save, or even as the main champion. His aspects are still largely unknown to the story.

Javvies

Kingfisher Prince is mostly out of play, as he's babysitting Red Axe somewhere hidden.

Burlyraven

Not a guarantee with all this going on. Besides, there are hints that Red Axe might still have even more value to the current story possessing Arsenal, so Hakram and Mirror 5 might find themselves stumbling upon the pair.

TeK

Violets are red
Roses are blue
You have an arrow
Stuck in you

TeK

The orcs are green
The drow are grey
I have penetrated
The Fey

'Ladi Williams

Why does everyone think Cat's gone to defend the sword.
Have you all forgotten the Hierophant?
First of his name...Seer of wonders...Witness extraordinaire...Rebucker of gods...
He's more than enough to swat down one errant fae.
Puh-lease

Raved Thrad

I can just see Masego chortling in glee. "A prince of the fae? For me? Oh Catherine, you're too good to me. Just think of all the experiments I can run, because we don't have to give this one back."

Big Brother

A Heiropgant does not chortle. At most, he'd let out a pleased "hmph" before imprisoning the Prince.

Raved Thrad

I doubt that Masego's outgrown his ability to rollick with raucous laughter. His sheer enjoyment of the irony (or is that stupidity?) that was the Exiled Prince showed that.

Morgenstern

Also, of one of the breeds he very much wanted to have for his Quartered Seasons theory. =D

Mike E.

Hopefully Heiropgant is in his quarters ready to defend the not-so-public stuff he is working on, and NOT at the badass sword.

Mental Mouse

Quibble: IIRC, Hierophant isn't the first of his name, it's just a rare one. And against a Prince of the Fae, without his sorcery, even he's going to have trouble. I figure he'll win, for a whole bunch of reasons, but it'll be a fight. Remember too that his Quartered Seasons workshop is believed to be a target in its own right, so he doesn't just have to win, he needs to protect his work. That said, his work includes a lot of stuff that specifically deals with fae power – the Prince might well end up as a captive. Dunno if the Prince is dumb enough to try and wield the sword...

Daniel E

I give up. I don't know why my comments need moderation and subsequently get lost half the time 😞

dadycool

Language? The only time mine have needed moderation was because of swearing.

Daniel E

It's consistent though. The above post needed moderation, it just started one day for no discernible reason.

Daniel E

And this post in turn also needed moderation. I believe that deserves a 'wtf'? 😞

thearpox23

I guess that depends on what system erra uses for moderation. If it's some offsite/wordpress mods, then it's probably just some small man trying to feel big. If it's only erra himself doing the moderation, the system probably either has 'moderation' listed as a problematic word OR you're just much more likely to get hit by software once you've been caught by it once.

Daniel E

The latter seems likely, though I can't fathom what started it in the first place. Welp, I can still read the comments at least, even if timely posting is now beyond me.

dadycool

Or maybe someone or something basically said "Fuck Daniel in particular."

James, Mostly Harmless

Maybe the Bard is working against you?

James, Mostly Harmless

On a more serious note: are you logged into your WordPress account on the device that you used to post these comments?

Daniel E

Yes, just my home PC. Registered here and sign in with Google like usual.

Mental Mouse

Have you tried contacting WordPress tech support? I don't know that it'll help, but it's worth a try.

TeK

Christophe de Pavanie said

Pavanie: Asian freak with deep dimples and big eyes

WuseMajor

I used to be a Fae Noble, until I took an arrow to the knee. And the other knee. And the stomach. And the heart. And the brain.

WuseMajor

Also, is anyone else suddenly worried that the Fae are just a distraction? Something powerful enough to ensure that all the Named blow their wads here and are left powerless and in the hospital when the Dead King's minions arrive tomorrow? Or Spring? Or something?

I mean, we might not have uncovered all the betrayers yet.

RoflCat

So since something like Roland's Late Regret exist, what's the chance Catherine had some trick like that prepared since she KNEW she will get betrayed?

We have Akua who previously did the whole 'soul outside the body but can still exhibit Name power' back in Liese.

So far after the knife moment there was 'billion of Night' from Roland's POV (since Count of Green Apple made his appearance there it means this happen after Catherine made the wager) And Archer finds only a single corpse with a knife she recognize stuck in it.

Count of Green Apple got knifed by Roland.
The 3 Archer found were the straw guy, huntress and the traitor poet.
Count of Ravenous Flame got the chop so he's 'out'.
Monk is most likely that corpse.

Which leave the Duchess of Rash Tempest still mysteriously missing despite her oath to the Bard.

308924810a

Cross posting, but while I was rereading chunks in preparation to write fan fiction for this I had an idea:
I was rereading book 4 chapter 34: abyss, and I had a sudden insight that makes a bunch of the Bard's nonsensical actions/the nonsensical actions that are attributed to her influence, tie together.

In the chapter Akua mentions that winter Cat could have been granting titles and assembling a court, and that none of the heroes on the continent would be able to escalate in strength fast enough to stand against her, but that would have caused intervention from the Gods Above to level the playing field, then the Gods Below would have intervened to counter, and things would have gone into an escalation spiral.

The Bard's supposed influence to make the Crusade go east rather than north, her effort to make a Named rule Procer, and her effort to break up the Truce and Terms can all be tied together with the assumption that she wants an escalation spiral, where the side that is clearly Good is losing, so the Gods Above step in, then the Gods below step in, and things escalate from there. It also explains the Dead King's exclamation that people would turn against the Bard If they knew what she wanted, because planning to wipe out most of Procer with divine mutually assured destruction is one of the few things I think could turn heroes against her at this point.

It might even explain what the heck was going on with the Fey courts unexpectedly invading Callow, because the bard set up a story that would put their power in the hands of a local in the hopes of provoking an escalation spiral.

The Dead King's invitation to Cat to go to Keter had little to do with a bidding war, and potentially even little to do with pitting her against Malicia, but it had everything to do with convincing her that her critical interests were secure enough that she didn't need to start granting titles and start that escalation spiral.

However I think something changed around the time of Kairos and the Heirarch's intervention to convince him that he no longer needs to worry about a godly intervention escalation spiral.

Whether he's actually convinced that the hierarch ruined whichever plan the Bard had that had required an escalation spiral, or whether it's actually Cat allying with Procer and muddying the clear Good VS Evil narrative that made him get confident, he feels he has both the opportunity and the strategic need to either take or at least cripple enough of Calernia that the next crusade can't just finish him.

Now why the Bard wants an escalation spiral I have no clear guess.

sengachi

Holy hells and hallowed bells, there was a poetry to this chapter.

Interlude: Threads

"The finest exercise of war is to interrupt the enemy's plan. Therefore, the general without a plan is also without peer."
– Isabella the Mad, Proceran general

"Archer," Roland smiled. "It's damned good to see you."

Indrani flicked a glance at the ripped-up footbridge, large chunks of it either torched, cut or otherwise savaged beyond recognition.

"Same to you, Rogue," she replied. "You've had an interesting day, by the looks of it."

The rueful smile she got in answer to that was classic Roland, a touch of nonchalance facing the constant messes he seemed to get himself into. A tall, dark-skinned woman with those famous Wasteland golden eyes made her approach, skittish as a cat.

"Greetings, Archer," the Blessed Artificer stiffly said. "I am—"

"I know who you are," Indrani informed her.

She was not hostile in tone, even though the heroine seemed physically unable to help herself from picking fights with Masego whenever they were in the same room. Archer had no need to fight Hierophant's battles for him. Besides, she'd made some inquiries and judged that Adanna of Smyrna would stay within acceptable bounds even if she got the upper hand — nothing permanent, nothing crippling. If nothing else, the Artificer would serve to make sure that Masego didn't got too soft during his years away from the front.

"Pick up the Poet and bring him down," Archer ordered them. "I want to ask him a few questions."

"You have a healer?" Roland asked, sounding relieved.

Someone had done a nasty turn on his cheek – heated metal, by the charred and bloody looks of that wound – so she could see why he'd be. The Artificer was bleeding as well, but it looked mostly like shallow cuts. Both heroes were exhausted, though, maybe a quarter hour away from the sense of danger fading and the shakes settling in instead. The Rogue Sorcerer had a few potions to delay that further, she knew, but odds were Cocky would have better stuff below.

"I brought the Concocter," Indrani said. "She's down there, examining the body."

"Only the one?" Roland probed, sounding surprised.

"It is the Black Queen's," the Blessed Artificer bluntly told her. "The fae said that she died and they cannot lie."

"Knowingly," Archer corrected. "They cannot lie knowingly. There's a body down there, sure, but I've my doubts."

If Indrani was right, though, it begged the question of where the Hells Catherine actually was. She wouldn't have left Roland and the Artificer to face enemies outnumbered without a good reason, or even just disappeared at all for that matter. Indrani had been sent out to get answers and she'd yet to bring them back.

"There will be another prisoner," Roland volunteered. "I crippled the Count of Green Apples and tossed him into the stacks on the western side of the first story."

Archer let out a low whistle, genuinely impressed. Fae didn't usually leg it when they'd come for a reason, as these clearly had, so if the Count hadn't come back then crippled must be something of an understatement.

"I'll pick him up, then," Indrani said. "Can the two of you handle the Exalted Poet?"

The Blessed Artificer was already kneeling at the man's side, she noted with approval, already getting down to work. Except the dark-skinned woman was grimacing in dismay, finger on the side of the traitor's neck.

"He's dead," Adanna of Smyrna said. "He has no pulse."

Archer blinked in surprise. She'd shot him in the throat, true, but she'd avoided the spine. She'd buy unconscious, she'd been banking on it really, but dead?

"Isn't he a Levantine hero?" Indrani said.

"He was a Levantine poet, Archer," Roland reminded her. "An occupation not habitually known for its physical fortitude."

"It isn't as if being born in the Dominion lends someone greater vitality," the Blessed Artificer waspishly said. "Though to my passing knowledge of medicine, he appears to have died from choking on his blood."

"Hells," Archer cursed. "I wanted to interrogate him. How dead is he, would you say?"

"... averagely dead?" Adanna of Smyrna hazarded.

"Not fresh gone," Roland noted. "If you're thinking of fanning a last spark with tonics, I'd say that stallion has left the pen."

Damn it, just when she finally had someone at hand who had those sorts of brews.

"Just toss him down, then," Indrani sighed. "Can't leave the body unattended, not with the number of potential necromancers in this place."

"He's a hero," the Blessed Artificer bit out angrily. "We can't just-"

"He was a traitor," Archer flatly interrupted, "and now he's a corpse. Carry him down in a tender embrace, if you feel like it, but I've no intention of lending an ear to your praise of a failed turncoat."

She shot a look at Roland.

"Don't linger," she said. "That's a nasty wound, best to get it seen to as soon as possible."

Archer did not bother with goodbyes, instead leaving them to make their decision on their own as she headed for the stairs. Much as it rubbed her the wrong way not to remove her arrows from the corpses, given how precious they were, it would have to wait. After going one story down she made her way around the side of the Belfry and found the fae the Rogue Sorcerer had handled, brow rising when she saw one of the Fair Folk outright unconscious. She'd seen their like wounded and dead by the hundreds, but unconscious? That was much rarer. What had Roland done to screw with it that badly? Screw with him, it turned out as Archer got close, but when she turned over the body – a longknife in hand, just in case – she started at the face.

"I know you," Archer muttered, brow creasing.

Whatshisname from the Battle of Dormer, wasn't he? The fucker who'd kept throwing fire at her and nearly burned Vivienne to death when he caught her flatfooted. The Duke of Something Something. Green Trees, Green Yews – no, that was some other bastard Cat and Hakram had murdered while she'd been out in southern Callow with Zeze – oh, Green Orchards! So the last time she'd seen that face it'd been on a Duke of Summer, one who should be thoroughly dead by now. Cat had been in a black mood that night and people didn't tend to walk those off. Much less turn up a few years later with a different name, yet here we were. That had implications, according to some of what she'd picked up lately.

Indrani had honestly paid only passing attention to this Quartered Season racket that Masego and Catherine had going on, doing her due diligence of going through everybody's things more out of habit than genuine interest, but she'd picked up a thing or two. The principle, as she understood it, had come from a theory Zeze put forward after the Twilight Ways were born and he got rid of the petty god in the back of his head: that the Court of Arcadia Resplendent, the one born from the wedding of Summer and Winter, was an entirely new entity and not something flowing directly from either Winter or Summer.

There were a bunch of complicated explanation for why that was, best left for others to dig into, but the heart of it was a division being made between 'power' and 'crowns', the former being the good stuff and the latter the formal mantle. Masego believed that Arcadia was one crown and Twilight another. Which meant that regardless of where 'power' had been accrued – mostly Arcadia with Twilight and the Crows splitting the difference, the theory went – there were still two 'crowns' up for grabs. It didn't matter if there wasn't much 'power' left behind either, the way Masego put it, because it was still a functioning godhead. Dried up, sure, but functional.

What he and Cat meant to make of it had been straight out of that brand of outrageous that tended to spring up whenever they collaborated on something: vicious to the bone and too clever by half. Instead of making a giant sharper or even a fine arrow for their good pal Indrani, they'd decided to make a gift. So what did it mean, this old face with a new name? Someone else would have to figure it out, she supposed, because it was beyond her.

"Might as well bring you down," Indrani mused, gazing down at the fae.

She was wary of waking up one of the fae and interrogating them without a warding specialist at hand, but Roland with a few potions in him might do in a pinch. There was a need for answers. She hoisted the fae over her shoulder, forcing her bow to the side, and finished the trek back at the bottom of the Belfry. Cocky was kneeling on the floor, silver knife in hand as she studied the insides of the dead body she'd been left with, and only vaguely gestured in greeting when Indrani dropped the unconscious count.

"So?" Archer probed.

The Concocter withdrew her hands, stripping them of some sort of gauzy transparent film they'd been coated in and throwing it aside. It melted a beat later, leaving behind only the filth and blood it'd soaked up.

"I was going to have to ask you if the Black Queen was misassigned, but it won't be necessary," Cocky bluntly said. "Whoever this boy was, he was not finished going through puberty."

Indrani felt her shoulders loosen. She'd believed, she had. Believed that Cat wouldn't go out like this, to a nobody and a few fae, that this plan had been of her own making and that meant she still had hands to play. But Archer also remembered the stillness of ice around her, the utter silence of creeping death, and shed known that sometimes there just wasn't anything you could do. Sometimes the world got the last laugh, and all you could do was take it. But not today, she thought, breathing out. She wouldn't be losing anyone today.

"Keep that between us," Archer said. "You couldn't identify the body."

"I know the Rogue Sorcerer professionally," Cocky pointed out. "He is aware I am not, in fact, a complete imbecile."

Indrani swallowed the theatrical my Gods, how long have you been lying to him? that'd come to her tongue unbidden, an old habit not quite shed, and forced herself to focus.

"He'll also know to keep his mouth shut," Archer replied. "We understand each other."

While the dark-haired Named had no idea why Cat wanted to pass herself off as dead, she didn't feel all that inclined to spread knowledge of the trick around now that she'd figured it out. Presumably there were reasons for this, another round of deep games that Indrani had long given up trying to figure out. Archer could catch the scent a story when it was around, and she'd been taught how to avoid those that'd get her killed, but she just didn't have the knack for that sort of thinking that Catherine did. It took a peculiar sort of madness, to master those arts, and not of a sort she envied.

"Did you get another prisoner upstairs?" the Concocter asked. "I have serums readied, if it is the case."

"He, uh, died," Indrani said.

A beat passed.

"You killed him, didn't you?" Cocky said, and it wasn't really a question.

"Let's not get hung up on who did what," Archer evaded. "Do you have something that would compel fae to speak?"

Her brow rose, and she now seemed interested.

"Magically compel, no," the Concocter said. "But there are other ways. I have a substance than should be able to lull him into a pleasant trance and make him receptive to inquiries."

"That'd do it," Indrani approved. "They're hard to break with pain, but they're not immune to gentler methods. Thanks, Cocky."

The purpled-eyed woman eyed her with something like wary surprise, as if expecting a barb to follow, and only nodded after a few moments had passed.

"I can wake him up now, if you'd like," the Concocter said, gesturing at the prisoner.

"Best to wait for the Rogue Sorcerer for containment," Archer replied.

As it happened it was not long before Roland and the Artificer were there, the two of them carrying the Exalted Poet's corpse by the arms and legs. The arrow had been removed, but the wound was visible.

"Really, Indrani? An arrow to the throat?" Cocky murmured. "Quite the capture method."

"He's Dominion," Archer defended, "they're supposed to be hardy."

"I'm sure that fact was a great comfort while he choked to death on his own blood," the Concocter replied, sounding deeply amused.

Everyone was getting snippy, these days. The heroes set down the corpse without much ceremony – it was heavy and they were tired – before Roland straightened his coat and the Artificer wiped her hands clean on her apron.

"Rogue Sorcerer," Cocky greeted the Proceran as she rose to her feet

She let a full moment pass.

"Artificer."

Indrani, no stranger to the art of petty slights, had to smother a smile at the refinement of that particular bit of pettiness.

"Concocter," the Blessed Artificer replied, tone flat.

"Let's get that cheek healed up," Archer cheerfully said. "Maybe something for the fatigue as well, unless Rogue's been drinking?"

"I refrained," Roland said. "I would be in your debt, Concocter, if you would oblige."

That stroked Cocky's fur the right way, as courtesies tended to, and she got to work without quibbling. It was quick work sewing up the cheek with needle and thread then applying the salve and having him drink the potion that back in Refuge they'd called the Pardon. It was red and thick, almost more molasses than liquid, and it smelled of death – which is was partly made of, Indrani suspected, or at least flesh – but within moments of drinking it Roland was looking better. The bleeding on his cheek ceased and the charred skin began to flake, though this wasn't a miracle brew: skin did not grow back, and it'd take more than a drink to fix his carved cheek muscles.

The Artificer got seen to as well, if less comprehensively, with a small vial ending the bleeding in her cuts and an elongated pill for the pain. The heroine grimaced as she swallowed the latter, not without reason: Cocky didn't coat hers in honey or extracts, unlike a lot of medicine-peddlers.

"Feeling up to a bit of a talk, Sorcerer?" Indrani asked.

"What about?" Roland asked.

"Not you and me," she laughed, then pointed a boot at the unconscious fae. "I've questions for our friend here."

"I can run containment, if you want," the Rogue Sorcerer said, "but it should not be necessary. He should barely be more physically capable than a human, at the moment."

Archer's brow rose. While she was damned curious about how he'd pulled that off – everyone and their sister knew Roland had sticky fingers when it came to tricks and artefacts, but there was quite a leap between that and hollowing out a Count of Autumn – that seemed like it might infringe on the nature of his aspects, and that... just wasn't something you asked. It was fair game if heard, or fought, but asking someone to just hand out one of three words at the heart of them a different story.

"Keep an eye out anyway," Indrani said. "Cocky, the fae's all yours."

"Joy," the Concocter muttered, rolling her eyes.

Backtalk or not, it was with poorly veiled eagerness she knelt at the Count of Green Apples' side and forced his mouth open. Odds were she didn't often get to ply her trade on the likes of him, Archer mused. Her own eyes wandered a bit, coming to rest on the dead body that was not Catherine's. Roland hadn't asked, though she suspected that when they got a moment to talk without people to overhear he would, and evidently the Blessed Artificer still believed herself to be correct. Whose body was it? It couldn't be the Fallen Monk's, she thought, even though it was his knife that Cocky had taken out from the neck and laid down next to the body.

Wait, why was the knife there?

Indrani could recognize it on sight, she'd seen it make quite a few cuts. The Monk had always been sharp in a bad way, but she hadn't thought that he would... Well, you couldn't always see it coming. There were nights ahead of her where Archer would examine whether she ought to have seen that betrayal coming, but not now. Last blood had not been spilled. The knife was placed here so I could see it, Indrani decided. The rest of her band was here, but dispersed and unlikely to come here in the Belfry without reason. Cat must have left it there as a message. Not recrimination, that wasn't her style. It'd been stuck in the corpse, though, so what was it that was important about the corpse?

Oh, Indrani thought, and put it together. You're listening through it, aren't you? You're waiting for my report and for whatever we dig up here. Breathing out, Archer knelt by Cocky's side even as the fae's eyes fluttered open – glazed, unseeing – and Roland took position behind the Count of Green Apples.

"It's working?" she asked the Concocter.

"It should," Cocky said, finger forcing open an eye and looking at the dilation. "Try asking him a question."

"Who are you?" Archer asked.

"I am the Count of Green Apples, of course," the fae said, sounding surprised.

"Dreamlike state," Cocky said, sounding satisfied. "It took hold properly."

Indrani nodded her thanks, then took to interrogation.

"Who sent you here?"

"The Prince of Falling Leaves," the fae said.

The Blessed Artificer flinched at the words, all eyes save the Count's turning to her in surprise.

"Care to share?" Archer lightly said.

"The Hunted Magician," Adanna of Smyrna replied. "He's had dealings with that creature before."

Fuck, Indrani thought. This better not end up being blamed on Cat because a villain had been the way in and not one of Above's shiny helmets. Interesting that the Artificer would know that, though. She'd have to remember to look into it later.

"Why did you come to the Belfry in particular?" Archer asked.

"To destroy the works of the Hierophant," the Count said. "And so settle half our debt."

Indrani's fingers clenched in triumph. That sounded like a proper scapegoat being set out for her, didn't it?

"Who is the debt owed to?"

"The Wandering Bard."

Cocky stiffened at her side, beginning to grasp the depths of how badly she'd miscalculated by making a bargain with the Intercessor. The Artificer looked mostly confused, Roland grim.

"Where did the prince go?" Indrani asked.

"To get his due," the Count of Green Apples proudly said. "To break the sword."

And there it was, Autumn's plan laid out. The dark-haired killer rose to her feet, stretching as she did.

"Archer?" the Rogue Sorcerer tried.

"Knock him out and bind him," Indrani ordered. "We're got work to do."

Now, Archer thought, how was she going to keep giving her report to a dead body subtle? Any notion of her guess there being wrong was put to rest, after all, by the way the corpse's neck had slightly turned so it would be able to watch the interrogation.

—

Christophe de Pavanie took the blow without flinching, angling his shield so that it would slide to the side and giving answer with a slice of his sword. The fae drew back with a scream, having tasted of the Light running along the blade's edge and found it to be a thing of pain, and in a flash of orange-red wings it withdrew. The creature fled down the hallway to the right, the faint squeeze against the hero's ankle informing him glamour had been woven against him, but the Mirror Knight did not pursue. He halted his steps, for though Christophe himself was not tired in the slightest the same could not be said of all his companions.

Lady Eliade was suffering the worst of it, by his reckoning. Between the wounded leg, the fresh break of her shoulder by one of the Lords of Dwindling Warmth and the exhaustion of continued spellcasting, she was reaching the end of what her body could take. She might be able to use a few more trinkets, but no more great spells. The Repentant Magister was not like the Witch of the Woods, a war mage meant for the killing fields. Her gifts were gentler in nature, for all her sordid past, and she grew exhausted significantly more quickly than her savage counterpart. Sidonia was helping her keep pace, the Vagrant Spear the only one among them confident she could react swiftly to ambush even one-handed. Frustratingly, Sidonia had also refused healing after looking directly at the Duchess of Red Sunset with an eye that was now a blackened ruin.

Christophe was not certain whether she was refusing because he'd been the one to suggest healing or because some fool Dominion code of honour forbade it, but neither answer would do anything to abate his anger over the matter.

Antoine was keeping pace for now, slightly behind and to the Mirror Knight's left as was their habit, but he could recognize that his compatriot was quickly headed towards collapse as well. The Blade of Mercy's nature was to prove dangerous beyond his years, as was only proper of a young man the Saint of Swords herself had once deemed 'built for killing Damned', but though his strength was explosive it was also short-lived. He'd used Kindle earlier, so by now he should be drawing on true Light and not the one contained within his aspect: the way Antoine heavily relied on Light and Choosing to move and react meant he was now headed faster towards collapse with every fight. He'd used up Flicker as an offensive strike, too, so he wouldn't be able to use it as a life-saving trick. That fact would be weighing on him, a lingering distracting fear.

The man Antoine had used the boon to protect was near spent as well, Christophe suspected, though the Adjutant hid it better than most. The orc had to have called on at least two aspects when tangling with the Fair Folk in that last melee, and he was slower on his feet now if you knew what to look for: the Adjutant was simply tall enough that even slowed his stride was quicker than most humans'. That was ill news, as the Mirror Knight was aware that Hakram Deadhand had not been a stranger to their successes thus far. The orc could not be called silvertongued, he did not have the... cunning mien for that, but he had a calming and orderly way about him. Christophe, who half the time seemed to infuriate when he meant compliment and praise when he meant to insult, could only envy that.

He even envied the man's Name, he would admit to himself. Though like him the Adjutant had been blessed with endurance, unlike him the orc was just as deadly on the attack. It was an impious thought, to envy one of the Damned, and half-heartedly Christophe chided himself for it. A lot of what he'd believed to be truth in the beautiful shade of the lakeside of orchards of Pavanie had not taken well to the harsher glare of the world beyond them.

Of the Maddened Keeper he thought little, knowing from Cleves that she hardly ever tired – it was as if her body resisted any change at all, be it good or bad. Christophe also knew that she was no comrade in the shield wall, no sister-in-arms. She would come and go as she wished, and though she did the work of Above in swallowing whole the evils that she did the manner in which she bound those within her made her not unlike the carrier of a sickness: there was nothing that the Keeper kept within her that was not a mere finger's touch away from Creation. Had she not been in the city when he gathered Chosen to head out to the Arsenal and end the plot revealed to him, he likely would not have sought her out. Yet she'd been invaluable in navigating the Twilight Ways and finding a path into the Arsenal that would not take them months and months to travel. In some ways he sympathized with the Keeper: her Choosing, like his, had made her into someone to use instead of someone to honour.

"Keep your guard up," the Mirror Knight said. "We should be nearing the Severance."

"It might have been broken by the time we arrive," Antoine said, tone bleak.

"They would not still be ambushing us if that were the case," Adjutant said, his voice rough as stone.

A far cry from that eerie, beautiful tune he'd sung in some Praesi tongue as the fae stormed around them.

"They must be buying time for the prince to break through the wards," the Repentant Magister said. "Those were put up by the finest mages in the Arsenal, they won't fall easily."

Obvious. That had been obvious, so why hadn't he seen it? All these blessings, but what were they really worth in his hands? The Dames had chosen him, back home, but he'd wandered a long way from that home. Would they choose him again, he wondered?

Somehow he doubted it.

"We push on with all haste," the Mirror Knight grimly said. "We cannot allow a weapon that might be able to take the Dead King's head to be broken."

No life here was worth that price. That blade might save hundreds of thousands of lives, millions. Some of the Named would balk at what he'd said, or perhaps how bluntly he'd said, but it was the truth nonetheless. What was one Chosen, in the face of that many innocents? Or even all five of them, and the Damned one too. It might rub them raw, to hear it starkly said, but it was Christophe's people who were dying in droves holding the fronts. It was his countrymen who'd been forced to flee their homes and now sickened and despaired in great refugee camps, who gave up harvest and coin to keep Calernia from Keter's reaching grasp. So often he'd had to watch his people beggar themselves with gratitude as the foreign armies that'd come to lend their aid, and the sight of it sickened him.

Whose lands was it that were burning, bleeding, trod upon by the dead? The Principate had been made into the shield of the rest of the continent, just like he'd been made the shield for the rest of the Chosen: they were both expected to keep taking the hits and keep their mouth shut, as if it were an honour. No, the Mirror Knight would spend every life here without hesitating a beat if it meant saving the innocent. There was more to being Chosen than Light and tricks: it was a burden as well as a privilege. Too often only the privilege was remembered.

"We don't all have your... stamina," the Vagrant Spear said, tone faintly mocking.

Or was it lurid? He itched to answer but took hold of himself. Now was not the time for this.

"Then some of us will pull ahead, and the others will have to catch up," Christophe said. "I do not like splitting our numbers, but it must be done. We will draw the attention of the fae as we advance, which will flush out ambushes."

"Unless they slip behind with the intent to strike at the laggards," the Repentant Magister pointed out.

"You are free to retreat, if that is your wish," the Mirror Knight replied. "I expect they will not follow."

"Perhaps," Antoine hesitantly said, "Lady Eliade could seek reinforcements?"

"That would be wise," Christophe agreed, cursing himself for not having thought of such a delicate way to send her away.

Must he always give insult? It had not been meant as one even if it sounded like an accusation.

"Vagrant Spear, Adjutant, Keeper, with me," the Mirror Knight said.

"Christophe?" Antoine said, blinking in utter surprise.

"You're nearing the end of your rope," he replied. "I can't take you into the thick of it. Besides, someone needs to see to Lady Eliade's protection."

"I am still fit to fight," Antoine insisted. "I promise you-"

Anger flared.

"Don't promise me anything," Christophe forced out, "just do as I say."

The stricken look on the younger man's face had him regretting his tone immediately, but did the Blade not realize what he was doing by arguing with him in front of the others? How could they heed his orders when his own second contradicted him? The Vagrant Spear, uninterested, instead cast an uneasy look at the woman she'd been supporting for some time now.

"Nephele-" she said.

"Go," the Repentant Magister said. "I am sure the Blade of Mercy will see grandly to my safety. We will make haste and return with help."

"The Forlorn Paladin won't be far," Sidonia said. "He's an odd duck, but steady. He'll listen."

"I'm sure," the sorcerers smiled. "Shall we, Antoine?"

The Blade of Mercy cast him a look and Christophe nodded jerkily, hoping his eyes could carry the apology he could not allow himself to speak before this company.

"It would be my pleasure, Lady Eliade," the Blade of Mercy stiffly replied.

The Adjutant was watching them all, face unreadable, but the orc said nothing. Christophe did not know whether he should be disappointed or grateful for that.

"Form up," the Mirror Knight said. "We must move quickly."

They would kill the Prince of Falling Leaves, he swore it. And if none of their blades could do it...

Christophe of Pavanie would do what he must.

—

She was not surprised to find herself awaited.

Deftly, the other woman began to shuffle a deck of cards and cocked a sardonic eyebrow.

"You took your time," she said.

Slowly, careful not to aggravate her injury, she lowered herself into the seat across the table before replying.

"I had some catching up to do," Catherine Foundling replied, making herself comfortable. "But I'm about ready to begin. You?"

"Just about," the Intercessor smiled, and began to deal out the cards.

Sir Nil

Well I'm glad to see my theory on Quartered Seasons was correct. The Maddened Keeper doesn't tire huh, I'm guessing she is a bit like Catherine when she was waist deep in winter, except with demons somehow. Bard is a fan of the classics I guess, though I wonder if she has realised the Dead King has already won against the house.

Sir Nil

The corpse seems like a trick somehow, Archer interpreted it as Cat wanting to hear the interrogation but Cat already knows all the useful information. So who planted the corpse? Dead King? Or is it Bard trying to create more misinformation? Are the traitors and fey really the only attacks going on at the moment?

laguz24

No, the corpse was the scorched apostate's. Also, Christophe's starting to learn about some humility he just needs some sociability to go along with it. The sheer irony that Procer is getting the Callow/ Rhenia treatment with large attacks every generation.

Liliet

The corpse is Tancred's, and Cat at the very least needed a way to know how that altercation would end up going. Also, y'know, the results of Concocter's interrogation – sure it didn't yield much new or useful, but Cat wouldn't have known that for sure ahead of the time.

Shveiran

Also, in the end Indrani muses about how to give her report to a corpse without being obvious and says "Any notion of her guess there being wrong was put to rest, after all, by the way the corpse's neck had slightly turned so it would be able to watch the interrogation."

Her report is not the interrogation: she is going to brief Cat about what has happened before the battle while they were divided: what she got from Cocky is likely going to be of use to the Black Queen, and is going to be reported off-screen.

Mental Mouse

Yes, the Corpse is the Scorched Apostate's... but the thing is... Archer may not know that the Dead King briefly held that corpse as a Revenant. The Monk used a line from the Dead King's book, and it was his knife left behind. But then, it was clearly Cat who left corpse and knife alike... Circles within circles, schemes within schemes.

And now, Cat and the Bard face each other at a card table. I wonder, what stakes will they wager, and what will each win or lose?

boballab

A Name. Remember Cat was on the cusp of a Name the last we saw her. What if she is on the cusp of taking the Bard's Name? She already got something from the Bard according to an earlier chapter, what if she can now take the rest?

Miles

Taking the Bard's Name would effectively kill Cat, since the Name overwrites their memories and goals.

Thanatoss

No, it was not stated that Bard/Intercessor Name does overwrite memories.
However she would be able to interact only with Named, and possibly be unable to hurt anyone, that would be problematic.

tkjarrah

uh cat? now might be a good time to recall certain idioms about playing games with fate and/or death

Zggt

The shape things are taking:

The Wandering Bard called in favors to make sure she has the power to destroy Cat's plans when they meet. Lets assume that she's using her thousands of years of experience and has the amount of force necessary to accomplish that. She also knows that Cat has to assume this.

Cat knows she cannot out-talk the Wandering Bard. She also knows that for every trap like this there is a way out which will require a sacrifice on her part; these are the only victories to be had against the forces of Above. The Wandering Bard will naturally use the one card we know to be at the core of Cat's being: her wish for peace. Cat has already seen the seeds of the war after the Dead King set with people already thinking of a campaign against the Drow, and Malicia is a knife at the back of the rest of the continent, waiting for them to deplete themselves and crush the shattered remains.

So the Bard will inevitably offer that after the Dead King's demise she can ensure a peace under control of Above. They Grand Alliance gets to keep the weapons, the Drow will fight the chain of hunger and will be left alone, and the rest, after they crush Praes, will be under the benevolent guidance of Heroes to lead them to an era of stability in which everyone will thrive. It will be Redemption through Noble Sacrifice in the fight against Evil, a message which will resonate throughout the next age the way the Miezian occupation did through this one.

I expected Malicia to be the first to do this kind of move, with something in the flavor of Below (we'll join the fight, on your side, use all the horrors you know Praes has to wield... or we'll offer sanctuary to villains considering how inherently expendable everyone sees them, and so Praes will be strong enough to win once the current war is over). In essence, it's giving Cat all she ever wanted except one thing: humanity being in charge of humanity, rather than Named being in charge of humanity.

One can point out that human nature means there will always be representation for both Above and Below (with varying success). Therefore anything that does not end in a resolution where their feud won't inherently have armies involved is doomed to eventually collapse. In a world where it is a matter of time until another Triumphant comes along, Elves decide "this offends me" somewhere important, another nation decides to conquer the backwater continent and use the locals as labor to strip it of resources, or when someone gets the continent nuked from flying machines because someone invented the printing press, "an era" can be a generation or two.

That's still more than Cat has managed to achieve so far in her life. That's a huge temptation, and while she may strive for a more complete solution, she isn't Black, and will have to weigh her chances to do better if she refuses assuming the Bard and Malicia will be against her every step of the way. The problem is that at least one of them is going to be against her no matter what, and the other may as well add "Chancellor" as a prefix to their Name.

The ideal solution would be to play Malicia and the Bard against each other. It's a nice theoretical balance like in the Prisoner's Dilemma, complicated by the fact that there's a third person here. Game theory implies that making the first move (making the offer) is probably the strongest approach available to each, but if both make the move at the same time they both lose. Malicia is taking a gamble here that Cat will refuse and completely alienate the Bard.

Now, how far down this train of thought did Cat already go? She's already had experience with powerful people with powerful plans manipulating everything to achieve their goals, and arguably is one of the smartest at dealing with those who try to force her into a box and do specific things. The next chapter is going to be very interesting, one way or another.

Those games are where Cat truly excels at. The way she sees the world as a living thing is arguably her greatest strength here. Now we might finally get some insight as to how the Bard sees things (or at least to how Cat thinks she does).

Liliet

Bard also knows there cannot be a temporary solution though... Why not just go with Cat's plan?

erebus42

Probably because while she may be compelled to do her job she has another goal, (as Kairos had said) one which the gods went to great pains to try to make sure she never reaches.

Liliet

Kairos was speculating. SOME of it is going to be off base.

Just a a note.

erebus42

A fair point but considering this was Kairos during peak monologue over a game of Shatranj, I would still bet on him being more on base than off.

Shveiran

As they say, the Bard is in the details.

Liliet

Yeah but he said a lot of things there. MOST of it being true still leaves room for the key detail springing from his interpretation of players' motivations being wrong (as the players' motivations are the most speculative parts and the most drama-important parts)

RoflCat

Actually, as someone whose 'job' is to ensure the Stories are keeping tracks, wouldn't she have an incentive to KEEP IT GOING? To ensure her continued existence and also gain power the deeper the Stories weight there are.

After all, if the game of the Gods end, why would they bother to keep her around?

I feel like the best case scenario for Bard is a 'reset' of the game at this point.

Dead King has gotten too big on the Below side, and now she will use an equally big move (final desperate move when all else fell) from Above side to 'equalize' that and leave herself a fresh new board with a bunch of 'clueless' and 'weak' people she can manipulate and keep her scheme going.

Sure the amount of survivors might be down to single digits, but there's the Ragnarok case (after a big all around showdown of all the major factions, of the humans 2 will survive to repopulate the world...you can also just look up Odin's Sphere true end)

Javvies

Except that this only applies to Calernia. There's still the rest of the world, including ... what's it called? The place with a joint Hero and Villain rulership arrangement. Think they're vaguely Chinese inspired?

The Cat would redirect Calernia into a course more akin to that.

Cat and the Accords don't end the game. They merely limit the collateral damage caused by Named.

Oshi

Which has no bearing on what Bard wants. She has her goals and limiting damage to creation is not part of them. She is just as much married to her own will as the dead king is to his. No matter what happens any endgame with either of them in place is not one where Cat/calernia will prosper for long.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

"The place with a joint Hero and Villain rulership arrangement."

The Yan Tei is what they're called.

Liliet

Nobody's ending the game of Gods. They're just adding rules to it.

Also,

> To ensure her continued existence ironically, in Guide, this is not a particularly widespread motivation, and given how much we know about how much Bard's life sucks,

(But yes, literally nothing is threatening her continued existence. Stories will keep happening, heroes and villains will keep existing, it's just the consequences that will be shifted, and the Gods never cared about that part in the first place)

Zggt

The Bard in her interlude said that she saw progress; slow, but progress throughout the ages. Throughout thousands of years with a Name that forces her to be at important decision points and then see the ripples throughout her endless life, in which one of those ripples is the rise of the Dead King, her perspective is by definition not human; part of being human means you die at the end. The Bard believes she can control the effects of a story she writes on this scale, and she is doubtlessly good enough at her job now that another Dead King probably can't happen, and therefore this will change the balance between Above and Below in the long term within her realm of responsibility.

None of the Bard's reasons have anything to do with specific people, but with the shape of humanity on the continent. She knows that if a lot will die, they will rebuild things better in a few centuries, and in a thousand years it will be nothing more than a footnote in a history book. She let Akua loose just to get at Cat, and she all but said in her interlude that any amount of deaths to get her would be worth it.

A lot of this is because of the horror of Bard's power, never giving her enough time to get to really know regular people as she's whisked away from mission to mission. By any human standard her perspective is completely warped. Cat on the other hand makes people a part of her life, not a part of her story, which in this specific case is the polar opposite view: there are real people with real problems that need to be addressed at a higher priority than whatever story is going on right now. Think of it as a matter of approach, Bard is about doing it right, while Cat is about doing the most. The Grand Alliance, a regulatory body over Named, non-named governments, these are solutions that do not fit into the Bard's view which was forged by her abilities; over long enough time, slow and regulated change with Above's approval is the way to go. She had trouble with Black and Malicia, and knows that Cat might actually make something stick for the long term.

That's my take on why the Bard is willing to send hundreds of thousands of people to their deaths to get her way.

Liliet

I agree with most of what you lay out here, with the exception of this:

>these are solutions that do not fit into the Bard's view which was forged by her abilities; over long enough time, slow and regulated change with Above's approval is the way to go

The "Above's approval" thing is... without evidence backing it that I can see. All the heroes currently helping Cat have Above's approval by definition due to being heroes; Above does not either give or withhold approval based on specific plans. Bard's a mastermind all of her own.

Furthermore, allow me to present a quote from Epilogue III:

> "But I made your Name, sweetcakes. Back in the days before I knew better."

> "Prokopia Lakene was rightfully elected," the Hierarch frowned.

> "Right's a pretty broad word, when it comes down to it," the Bard said. "She was silvertongued like you wouldn't believe, true, but that's where I went wrong. The moment the tongue was gone, so was the Name."

> "The League survived her," he said.

> "The League's skin deep," the Bard said. "None of the forces behind moved any differently after it was formed."

Bard has tried what was essentially the same solution Cat is going for now, and it was not sufficiently effectual in the long term – not sufficiently effectual in the exact way Cat's going for now, by changing the flow of forces by arranging an alliance.

That's my take on why Bard is willing to burn her reputation and her resources on shoring up Catherine's project until it really can stand on its own, long term.

FatUnicorn

I think that an important fact which you missed is what none of us know, the true intention of Bard. As I gathered, you think its the victory of Above. In my opinion the Bard is the representation of goddess of strife, meddling in affairs of mortals and creating never ending conflict. If gods created creation as an experiment, Bard is the variable pertaining the status quo, and so never ending the experiment. Why is she doing this is the real question, what is she truly trying to escape?

DrD

Is the Intercessor really a Hero? Is she even Named in the way other Named are?

She does have a Role. She is a thing of the gods, the intercessor between gods and creation, both those above AND below, as we saw from her interceding for the gods below when the crows made their deal to save the drow.

Do people assume she's a Hero because she likes them to think that? Because she can put a story behind her actions the same as the Chosen, or because she has taken up that role opposite the Dead King for so long? Her Name isn't the Wandering Bard, yet even the Pilgrim who can see through lies calls her that and didn't fully understand her nature til Cat informed him of all the details.

Thanatoss

I basically agree with you at all points. Untill we discover Bard's goal we can't deduce what is her desired outcome. Also Bard lives for so long that her Name simply changed meaning due to cultural changes in language etc. I belive. That is why both Names are correct and Pilgrim doesn't detect lie in any of them.

NerfContessa

Circles. Within circles indeed.

Another grand chapter.

Mental Mouse

But now, Cat has graduated to the point where she really is a player – newest to the game, but still gaining power and skill.

Shikkarasu

Book1: Sits across from Juniper and talks her way into victory

Book2: Sits across from Akua and talks her way into victory

Book3: Sits across from Thief and talks her way into victory. Tried the same with Malicia, but was interrupted.

Book4: Sits across from Sve Noc and talks her way into victory

Book5: Sits across from Kairos and talks her way into victory

Book6: Sits across from the Wandering Bard.

This is going to be good

Eleron M Pfoutz

Hold on... This is a LONG, LONG TERM Pattern... Book 1: Bard Foils Cat by leading Akua and her henchies to the Demon Egg's significance (She wouldn't have shown up if that Egg wasn't something NASTY powerful, even by Outsider standards in this setting.

Book 5: Cat Foils Bard by signing up with Grand Alliance.

Book 6: We find out if the rule holds or is broken like the system it enforces.

Liliet

HOT DAMN

I did not expect this ♥

Oshi

I told you there would be a revel!

Liliet

[Vote] before Cocky gets upset at lack of recognition!

Anomandris

Oof that ending!!

Also, I am kinda been getting a bettering opinion of MK in these fights. He doesn't seem to be Saint of Swords' level fanatical in the whole Good vs Evil thing, nor just plainly naive like the Blade of Mercy. Seems more like a guy over his head rather than anything...

Oshi

Dude, hes gonna kill himself or everyone there unless Cat can stop him. It's just the way it's stacked. Bard has been shaping him off screen. This will be...interesting.

Jworks

Yea, but at the same time it seems like a personality trait that makes him so intolerable, not a result of his bestowal. I'd be more sympathetic if it was a part of his bestowal.

TeK

Funny, it's the other way around for me. Maybe because it means that he can learn, he can change and he can be better. I am much more sympathetic to the reason s like "he is a jerk cause he is human" then "he is a jerk cause plot convenience", which is what being a result of a Bestowal kinda ends up being. Plus I am big on personal responsibility, so not having an excuse for being a jerk is much more sympathetic to me.

dadycool

Humans (and other races, to be inclusive) can learn. Card-carrying Heroes and Villains can't. Masego learning how to be sociable changes him as a person, as did Cat's lessons on how to be a Queen/High Priestess, and GP's experience in his backstory.

On the other hand, we saw waaay back when Cat first set something on Goblinfire that if something goes against a person's Name, they're essentially prevented from doing it.

TeK

Well yeah? And I personally can sympathize more with a human who can change, rather than card-carrying NPC.

Mental Mouse

I do appreciate how Rogue Sorcerer is being all modest and then after the fight he's like "oh, btw I crippled a fae too, he's downstairs", and Archer's like whoa, you did what?...

RS is pretty badass. Understated, quiet badass.

Mental Mouse

Oy vey WordPress. I made a point of posting that in the main reply box, and WP's like oh no, you were going to reply to someone else yesterday, your comment is going into the middle of the thread. And just for good measure, we'll stick it in the way of someone else's reply.

Liliet

Yeah, same. He is Trying, he is learning before our own eyes.

He just... never had the opportunity before.

Shveiran

Of course he had, he just never took it.

There is no point in vilifying him for it, as it is common both in story and in the real world (heck, I need not look further than myself) but "not growing beyond your flaws" is not the world's fault. Let's call an apple an apple, shall we?

Liliet

I don't see it as a fault is the problem.
Yes, most people don't. That's the neutral default.

Liliet

He didn't have a push that he'd have resisted (or gone with), is where I draw the line.

Shveiran

Is being violent a fault, then? Or abusive, or racist, or rude? These can all be a problem, and they can all be a result of what you are and how you grew up, and they all need you to take steps yourself to fix them.

I don't mean to be argumentative, here, but if we adopt that criteria we are saying that a lot of people are not at fault for a lot of things that hurt a lot of victims.

Theitzal

Funny you should mention vilification, at the beginning of this book Cat mused on the difference between heroes and villains after the Scorched Apostates death, in her terms a hero is one who trusts to Above and is rewarded for it, a villain is one who,"does what needs to be done.” The mirror knight is echoing that line unknowingly in his mind in this chapter.

Mental Mouse

yeah, foreshadowing. The problem is, if he goes over to Below, I’m pretty sure he forfeits his accumulated power. Probably... at least he’s not a Choir hero.

Theitzal

Just thought of something, Amadaeus is working towards dred emporer and Cat is working to another name but you know what name is open? What if MK becomes the next Black Knight?

Jworks

I’m saying I’d be more sympathetic if it was part of his Bestowal because it would be an inherent trait of his personality brought on by the Name. He clearly wants to change to some degree, so imagine him truly wanting to change but being denied time after time because of a set personality trait given to him by the gods. Him being denied the ability to change is what would make me sympathetic, right now he wants to change and he just isn’t going through with it. I find that a little shallower than being denied by fate personally.

Mental Mouse

The thing is, just because you want to change, that doesn’t mean its easy to do. Learning takes time and experience. Like they say, “good judgement comes from experience, and all too often, the experience comes from bad judgement”.

TeK

I am deeply sympathetic to trying and failing because most of my life can be ascribed as such.

Liliet

Yup.

“How do I say things the way I think them and not the way everyone else would be thinking them???”

Frivolous

Really nice update.

The corpse is probably Scorched Apostate.

EE whetted our appetites with teeny tiny details of what Quartered Seasons is and what it does. A gift of what? A gift for whom? It's interesting that Indrani describes QS as vicious to the bone and too clever by half.

I'm confused by how Mirror Knight thought it unfortunate that Blade of Mercy's Flicker had been used already in an offensive manner. The implication was that BoM could not use Flicker again today, or at least not in a defensive manner.

Don't Named get to use an Aspect 3x a day, or am I misremembering?

Lastly, why is the Intercessor playing cards? She's never done that before. Is it solitaire, or is she playing against Catherine?

Oshi

My guess. Cat wants to trap DK/Bard in some kind of preplanned outer planar eternal war outside of creation. Binding them to never return. What you cannot defeat you seal away.

WuseMajor

I mean, if you could force the Dead King to become the King of Autumn, then he'd at least potentially end up in the same trap the King of Winter was in, bound by all the Fae rules and laws and forced to ...well, do whatever it is Autumn does. War against Spring maybe, I dunno.

Same goes for the Bard.

Alternately, it's possible they're taking the Crown and mixing it with some kind of iron explosive, so that a few moments after you become Fae and the apotheosis turns you into one, you die from a massive iron overdose.

I suspect this is similar to the sword that was a prayer.

Decius

Except you can't ever seal someone away 'forever'. You can only seal them away until some unlikely or distant event.

There are a lot of things that were sealed away until some distant or unlikely event... like "Until death itself dies and Above and Below join together".

Sir Nil

3x a day was just with the Lone Swordsman's Rise, however, there are other limits to aspects. Blacks Destroy and Tyrants Rend both took a lot out of stamina out of them. It seems that the general rule is that most aspects can only be used once per fight or day, with some exceptions.

Shveiran

Some Aspects can be used thrice, some only one, some can be activated several times but take a lot out of you and some other still have a constant effect.

caoimhinh

That has been explored before, in fact.
There are broadly two types of Aspects:

-Explosively powerful ones that can only be used once per day normally (though circumstances might allow for re-use, like stepping into the appropriate story).

Examples of this include: Forgive, Fall, Destroy, Confiscate, Rend, Struggle, Triumph.

-Convenient and useful ones that are relatively weaker but can be used a few times. and these can even be half-used or "leaned into" to slightly get the benefits of them without real expenditure. Although it's important to notice that some of these Aspects might have consequences to the Named (like a burn in stamina, life-force, or just pain).

Examples of these include: Learn, Find, Behold, Wish, See, Use, Rise

Then of course there's Ranger, who apparently has her 3 Aspects (Learn, Perfect, Transcend) constantly active and lives in them. Which is one of the reasons she is so OP.

P.S: some Aspects have conditions attached to them due to the nature of the Bestowal and the Named that has them. Like Hanno's coin needing the Choir of Judgement.

Liliet

I think Confiscate's more the second type.

Mental Mouse

Surely so, given how Rogue was using it in Liesse III.

Liliet

Yeah, that's what i was thinking too.

Sir Nil

Bard's card thing is probably a callback to how she told the Dead King how the house always wins during the battle to make Twilight Paths.

laguz24

Or the tarot cards she showed William before the siege of Liesse.

Cicero

Depends on the Aspect. The Grey Pilgrim's resurrection aspect "Forgive" could only be used once a day.

Frivolous

I'd forgotten Forgive. Thank you.

Big I

Quartered Seasons is meant to take out the Bard, according to Cat. Maybe also the Dead King as well, since there's two crowns floating around.

Liliet

No, it's meant for the Dead King. It also can be dangerous to Bard, but that's a background note.

Mammon

The way that they said Flicker couldn't be used to save his life rather than at all suggests that MK refers to the Narrative use of Aspects. Not an actual limit of the Aspect to be used, rather than the narrative Story-weight of an Aspect being used for the first time that day and fight.

For example, though indeed partly a matter of stamina, if a hero or villain uses their Aspect for the first time then it would turn the tide, but the second time against similar odds it would maybe force a stalemate, and the third time and onwards it would be a desperate and insufficient defence to stall for time. This has been shown and suggested several times throughout the story, that an Aspect is kept in reserve to be used the first time because the first time packs that greater punch, or that it wasn't the showstopper and tide-turner it should be because it has been used before that day/fight.

Some Aspects such as Rogue's Use and Adjutant's Find are meant for continuous spamming, but others are meant to be used sparingly if not just the one time. They decrease in power, such as how Cat's and William's Rise wouldn't quite heal as much as fast the second and third time, but more importantly they wouldn't hold the same Story weight.

So because Flicker had been used already for an offensive move, if Blade would find himself in a pinch and use it defensively or as a tide-turner even with his stamina fully recovered, it's quite likely that the enemy would find but strings instead of steel cables of Providence pulling at them. They could bat Flick aside and kill him, or otherwise find themselves able to stay in the fight, recover or not be completely overwhelmed in that critical moment. That's the issue that MK was likely referring to.

Liliet

Oh, also likely!

Cicero

Hmm... so Cat is confronting the Intercessor.

Interesting that the Mirror Knight is not completely unreflective, just... very dull.

Mental Mouse

Well, he is trying. (Some might retort "yes, he's very trying".

and growth to progress from reflecting everyone else, to reflecting on yourself.

jamesc9

> , just... very dull

That was punny.

"help" bleh.

"I had some catching up to do," Catherine Foundling replied, making herself comfortable. "But I'm about ready to begin voting on topwebfiction. You?"

<http://topwebfiction.com/?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

(Vote guys were down to number 3!!

RubberBandMan

Hrm. The last chapter was concert, while this chapter was Threads. While Cat has been personafied by music and beats to a song, Bard has been Called LongStrings and a distant manipulator making plots from afar. Sort of a weaver, if you will.

Could last chapter, Concert, be Cat's plays being shown, while this one, Threads, is more of Bards gambits/replies?

Liliet

Catherine has had association with fabric and threads too.
Remember weaver/woven?

Mental Mouse

But now they're trading symbolism. Hmm!

Liliet

We've had THREE mastermind metaphor mediums in two interludes: music, fabric and card game.

hakureireimu

I don't understand this part:

"I know the Rogue Sorcerer professionally," Cocky pointed out.
"He is aware I am not, in fact, a complete imbecile."

Why does Indrani thinks that Concocter was lying to Roland?

laguz24

She knows her and she is not as smart as she thinks she is.

Liliet

I'd say it's more an urge to be reflexively mean, considering the bar set is 'not a complete imbecile'.

TeK

Which is a high bar to set, admittedly.

Oshi

It's a joke.

Cocky says Hey he knows I'm good.

Archer answers Liar in a theatrical manner

Liliet

"How long have you been pretending to not be a complete imbecile? What acting skills!"

TeK

"Do you wantt me to teach you?"

Liliet

"...Nah, I got it down"

Burnsy

It's not that she actually thinks the Concocter has been lying in a serious way, she's just fighting the urge to reflexively be a dick for no reason. Catherine's influence

Shveiran

Actually, no: Indrani has always acted this way in Refuge, has we learned in Interludes past. Cat's influence, this time, if anything has mollified her.

TeK

Yeah, although part of reason she is taken to Cat so much, is because her usual propensity to barbs was never deemed confrontational.

Liliet

Mm!

byzantine279

The fighting the urge is Cat's influence, I think.

Mental Mouse

> Cat's influence, this time, if anything has mollified her.

I think that's what Burnsy was saying.

Juff

Typo Thread:

"Archer," > "Archer."
got too soft > get too soft complicated explanation > complicated explanations back at the bottom > back to the bottom shed known > she'd known scent a story > scent of a story purpled-eyed > purple-eyed as she rose to her feet (missing fullstop) which is was > which it was them a different > there was a different "We're got > "We've got gratitude as the (maybe to? for?) sorcerers > sorceress about," the > about." The Barthumphries

One bat of them was enough for the fae to drag herself up
Change bat to beat.
There are also other typos.

Burnsy

Bard: "Hmmm.... got any methods of deification you're remaking into weapons?"
Cat: "Go Fish."

Decius

Technically correct. In that all of the methods of deification that Cat has are not being made into weapons; they either have been made into weapons or are being studied to determine IF they can be made into weapons.

Setrak

In addition, Severence is literally in a lake.

Ninestrings

It's a good thing the Mirror Knight is pretty cause boy howdy there is not much else going on up there.

Also hell yeah time for some cards with the devil!

Liliet

He's Doing His Best

Mental Mouse

Ahem. We're getting to watch him learn here. If he survives this war, I suspect he might gain real wisdom in his adulthood.

Auston Varner

To echo and expand on Liliet and Mental Mouse, he's a young man, previously very sheltered, who was fed a particular (inaccurate) narrative about how the world works for a long time. He's breaking out of it, but it takes time, and it seems like associating with Adjutant is doing him a world of good, causing him to seriously re-examine how he thinks about Named associated with Below, and perhaps eventually non-Procerans in general (after all, even with his explicit racism against everyone outside of Procer, he's concluded that Hakram, who is from a species mostly known for savagery and being the Dread Empire's foot soldiers, is a good man and even someone to envy. From there, it's not much of a leap to "Hey, maybe the other humans I know aren't so bad either")

Wonder

Well, if there is anybody about there who wishes to take on the Keeper, all they have to know is that they should be ready for some Mutually Assured Destruction. Because that Chosen is one hell of a prison you don't want broken.

Big I

So Maddened Keeper is probably working for the Bard, since the Keeper's the only reason Mirror Knight's band of idiots got there in time to do anything. My guess is that the Keeper is the Bard's nuclear option in case her plan goes to shite.

Mirror Knight seems like he's on the way to becoming a full blown angsty anime protagonist. Hope Adjutant and the Vagrant Spear can save him from himself with the power of friendship.

I can't help but wonder if the Blade of Mercy's being set up romantically with the Repentant Magister. That'd make for a juicy love triangle with the Black Queen.

Dome Zasrekh

Keeper does not have to actively work for Bard just a dangerous person who can shake things up in multiple ways. ...And you really think BoM is a mach for Cat's charms???

TeK

Well, the boy does have a big sword...

caoimhinh

But you know what they say about those who carry big toys and flaunt them around: overcompensating. :v

Seriously though, I see nothing that remotely resembles a romantic set-up for Blade and Repentant. Plus, we already have it from multiple PoV that she is into Cat and vice-versa.

Big I

Just thinking of romantic clichés. Opposites attract, and all that. He starts off antagonistic to her, then they're sent from the battlefield, her wounded, under his protection. They're one tense life and death situation away from realising how their "pride and prejudice" are affecting their judgement.

Shveiran

With that said, right now Repentant doesn't really have anything going to ever be more than a fling.

TeK

Yeah, I don't too. But nothing stops a threesome. Or hell, a foursome if Archer deigns to join.

The boy does know how to use his big sword.

Shveiran

Of course. One thing about teenage boys is that they always know how to use their "sword", this is well known.

Mental Mouse

Not to mention Hanno's quasi-paternal role.

Liliet

I think he's too much of a kid for Nephele to be interested...

Burlyraven

Well, it's not a resurrection, but at least the boy is getting some use. Depending on how exactly Cat's managed to necromance Tancred, there could be some side effects, but I think she lost the learning zombie power with Winter.

I'm still very concerned for the MK/Adjutant squad, especially the members that left to seek help. There's been too many injuries and exhausted aspects and wounded egos. If the Kingfisher isn't revealed to have a death defying trump card of a power and inexplicable last second hero timing, I dunno if there's a happy ending to be found.

Of course, Cat settling in for her match with Bard will likely result in a series of mysterious boons and curses for all parties, so who knows.

Burlyraven

Doesn't have to be the Kingfisher, admittedly. There are more than a few barely expounded upon players in the Arsenal.

Anonymous

>If the Kingfisher isn't revealed to have a death defying trump card of a power
He probably does have one, considering he became named by sheer refusal to die..

Oshi

When did he do that? He's a ruler name. He'll have things that are more command oriented.

Shveiran

But he got his Name holding a bastion against hope. Prince Otto Redcrown said that they lost two fortresses to the Dead King on the first days after the Truce and would have lost the third as well if the Kingfisher Prince hadn't got a Name by simply refusing to die.

That was the Epilogue of the last Book, if I'm not mistaken.

TeK

So. It's nice to see that my sympathy for MK wasn't misplaced, he really is just clueless but well-meaning. And more importantly, gradually self-aware. As a fellow social awkwarder, I sympathize very much. At least there would no longer be so much hate for him after this chapter. He just needs to be taught. And what do we know, he seem to slowly warm up to a certain green charmer.

My guess for MK (the other kind) being "nuclear waste disposal site" was essentially indirectly confirmed too, which is double nice. Seems like CSP are not too far behind.

Cat is not dead, obviously, and she used Tankred as a stand in, as was one of my theories as well. So that's three guesses being right, I am feeling good today.

Of course, now everything comes to the conclusion as this arc seems to draw to an end, which mens something about to go terribly wrong. MK&MK&co seemingly spent go to fight for the Sword, with MK (the first kind) seemingly willing to actually grab the sword and swing it if needs be. Given the theorised cost of an arm and a leg, it is time for the boy to bleed into man. Garcher seems to try and re-establish her severed bonds, which has nice potential for a tragic death, as they draw near Severance. And still no hint of neither the man of a day, Hunted Magician, not another man of the day, Hierophant. Which kinda begs the question of dafuq.

And as Cat is getting ready to play a game of cards, I am reminded that she didn't do so previously, so that might just be as hilariously glorious as her match against Tyrant in shatranj.

caoimhinh

Hmm, I personally think that Christophe starting to fall into Villainy.

He broke his vows and now has those dark thoughts constantly. Not only about sacrifice and killing, but also about others not being grateful for what he (and Procer) do. That's not a heroic combination.

He is also constantly doubting himself and thinking himself unworthy of his Name, instead of self-evaluating himself in search of improvement, he is kicking himself and being depressed about it. The last person we saw with that kind of self-pity and existential doubts, Vivienne, lost her Name as a result.

I doubt Chris will be left Nameless, but after the breaking of vows and dark thoughts, it might very well come a fall from grace. Just like Lancelot du Lac who had his time as a villain against Camelot (he killed some of his fellow Knights of the Round Table and waged war on Arthur, weakening the kingdom, which was taken advantage of by Mordred to destroy it and kill Arthur, etc)

TeK

Yeah, he probably doesn't have a good fate for him in store. Thing is, Saint all the way back in Book 4 mentioned that the guy seemed to be a weapon sharpened by a Creation in advance for some incredibly strong opponent, and admitted that he would overtake her in time. Which kinda implied he was to be a sword against Dead King. And look who doesn't want any other weapon against Dead King left to be used.

Which means that someone who will be antagonistic to that hypothetical person trying to turn his story into something without a good end, will instead attempt to turn it the good way. And that someone might well just succeed, given that it is a protagonist.

So I will hold my bet for Chris yet.

caoimhinh

It was Hanno who said Christophe was a weapon destined to fight something great. Saint commented he would overtake her in 10 years due to the effect of his Aspect of Dawn that makes him a bit stronger every morning.

My bet is still that he is a weapon Above prepared to fight Sve Noc.

TeK

Ok, my memory is a bit patchy I guess.

Isn't Keter called Crown of Dawn though?

caoimhinh

Keter is the Crown of the Dead

Javvies

Nah, Sve Noc was out of play for centuries when Mirror Knight got his Name. And they'd still be out of play indefinitely for centuries more, were it not for the repeated series of improbable events known as Catherine Foundling's career. I mean, honestly, there were so many times Cat just barely avoided losing for good, and she was targeted by Bard. No, Above would have had no reason to empower Mirror Knight to go after Sve Noc. Besides, none of his Aspects would particularly help him against the drow, far less the Sisters themselves – look at how Winter!Cat fared, and she's stronger, more unkillable, smarter, and has more and more flexible powers.

I think it's more likely that Mirror Knight was going to be aimed at Ranger – remember, he'd have gotten his Name not so very long after the Conquest, in which Ranger had played a part. And Saint said that given time he'd have been stronger than her, and she had lost badly to Ranger, so Above would need someone stronger than her to get Ranger.

Shveiran

I like this theory.

caoimhinh

The Conquest was over 20 years ago, definitely happened before Christophe was born. Or at the very least he was a little child when it happened. He had just gotten his Name when the 10th Crusade started.

Plus, Heroes don't need to be stronger to kill an OP foe, they just need the right set of tools and a Story on their backs.

Mirror Knight's ability to fully restore his strength and grow more powerful at dawn is exactly the kind of thing that a Hero fighting the Goddesses of Night would need to end them at the end of a confrontation.

Visualize the battle:

The Hero faces the Drow, they grow in strength at night so the battle is hard, but he has the endurance to withstand until the end of the night through the desperate fight. Just as all seems lost, dawn comes and the Drow are weakened, just as the Hero emerges stronger than ever, thus managing to turn the tide and kill the Evil Goddesses of Night.

That's a story of heroic victory right there, kinda like Gandalf arriving at dawn to reinforce the war and several other examples seen both in manga and books.

And Sve Noc is arrogant enough to put themselves at risk facing an enemy their legions could handle (they now have Cat to advise them against such endeavors, luckily for them).

Additionally, is not like Heroes only work against one Villain. Sure, they have some customization, but they are meant to fight many enemies over the course of their life. So Mirror Knight's skillset being suitable both to fight Sve Noc and catch up to Ranger seems plausible to me.

Mental Mouse

> And they'd still be out of play indefinitely for centuries more, were it not for the repeated series of improbable events known as Catherine Foundling's career.

Actually Sve Noc (or at least the Drow) would shortly be dead if not for Cat's interference in the Dwarf/Drow War.

Shveiran

Shortly being the key term, here, considering the dwarfs' frame of reference. I thought avoiding a long campaign was the key objective for the Herald of the Depths, and how long is "long" for the dwarves is unknown.

Still, this is arguing semantics: for all intents and purposes, the drow were very likely goners, as Mental mouse says.

Javvies

True enough.

The point, however, is that whether the drow were doomed outright by the dwarves or the dwarves were likely to stall out after making gains, but before getting to the core of the drow remnants and Sve Noc, the drow were entirely out of play and going to stay that way for as far as the surface, and Mirror Knight, would be able to tell.

That is, the drow weren't going to be doing anything that would bring Mirror Knight into contact or conflict with them. No matter what the result of the dwarven campaign actually was or how long it took. And that means that the drow and Sve Noc weren't the target Mirror Knight was crafted to oppose.

Shveiran

Great chapter, as always.

We finally had the Mirror Knight PoV I wanted, though I must say I'm not really impressed with what we saw; self-righteous much? He sounds like he is mad at the injustice of it all but is hard-pressed to explain what the injustice actually is: he complains that Procer has been forced to pay the cost of the war in ravaged lands and ruined lives, and he sounds so bitter about it... which, I mean, is totally fair, but he seems bitter at those helping Procer, like it was somehow their choice that the war was not fought elsewhere, or maybe like this was a sacrifice Procer willingly made to protect everyone somehow.

Now, personally? I think if my country did its utmost to piss in the international porridge for generations, having pretty much everyone stepping in to help us fight is something I'd receive with gratitude.

But you know, if he thinks "they are just doing it to help themselves, after all, if the Dead King wins everyone loses"... I disagree, but it's not like it is a totally unreasonable stance. There is some truth there, right.

But to go even further and be bitter at them? What are you complaining about, dude? That they are not somehow teleporting all the undeads away from your homeland? they are already there bleeding for the cause, it's kind of hard to one-up that.

The fact that he is warming up to Hakram somewhat kind of irritates me, honestly. Sure, Hakram could charm Malicia's favorite stone tile given a couple hours, but still... it has been two years, this boy was on the frontline fighting side by side with Villains, not being betrayed and he still spewed all that wild, conspiracy-theory bullshit two hours ago like he believed it. He was willing to draw on it! He was willing to draw on the Black Motherburning Queen of all people, with all attached consequences!

Personally, I am not going to jump on the "oh, see, he can change!" wagon anytime soon. There is a lot of soul searching there, and I hope this doesn't end like Cordelia. There is very little payoff in this series that left me short of completely satisfied, very little but Pilgrm and Cordelia "allied status" was the big one. I really hope Cristophe's isn't another.

TeK

Funny. And now I am finding myself defending the guy. I seem to be doing it a lot across the series, picking some Hero that is not particularly well liked by the cast, which seems to bleed out into the comments something fierce. I did with Pilgrim, I did it with Saint, I am fairly sure I'd've done it with William, but I joined the Guide at Book 3.

I don't know where you saw self-righteousness, the guy seemed just bitter if anything. He does not glorify himself, he seems, if anything, pointedly aware of what a giant mess he is.

He seemed bitter at how he should be grateful for everyone helping them against Procer, when they bleed and die to keep the dead from others. If anything, it should be the other way around, others should be grateful for their sacrifice, and suffering, and he sees their armies as an attempt for self-preservation that it is. It's not like they help Procer because they like it much, they help it because if it's overrun, it's Goodbye Calernia. And yet he should be grateful for his country bleeding for others sake? Now that is exactly Catherine's entire reason for being angry at Heroes back at Book 4 and mind you, she was being invaded so had an inherent moral high ground, but the sentiment is not so different to not be understandable.

He is also bitter for being used as a particularly tough brick to throw on opposition, which I already said in earlier chapters, and he probably wonders if others even see him as a person. He was never explained that he was wrong, because, well, why would you sit down and talk with a tool?

I am not saying he is one hundred percent right, and he is very willfully blind to similarities between his own country's situation and other examples. But his position is very much understandable and born not out of inherent malice, but rather a certain perspective.

Because history is... highly subjective. If you look at history books of different nations, you will be amused by how often both sides by their own admission were completely in the right and the other side were evil virus of Satan. Simultaneously.

And all the comments on Procer history we got from sources rather antagonistic to Procer. Like we never heard their point of view. For all I know, it may very well be that Scouring of Vaccei really was necessary. Probably not, but we should recognise our inherent bias towards his attitude, being that EXACTLY THE SAME BIAS forms his wildly despised attitude.

He is not bitter at the help, he is bitter at the lack of gratitude for sacrifices by the people of Procer. He probably thinks that sending armies is something others should have done, out of gratitude for their struggle, and is incomprehending how come they are the ones that should be grateful ones instead, without being owed gratitude in return for dying in tens of thousands.

I can totally get where he is coming from, which is why I just can't find it in myself to dislike him.

About Hakram and the like. Again, the guy had been fighting in the thickest, non-stop for two years, and not back-to-back with Villains at all as you seem to imply. He was always with one Hero or another, and even then he wasn't fighting back to back, he was used as a shield and tolerated for his usefulness. On a different front from Black Queen. His only interaction with her was when she was a gal who made people eat their fingers and casually attempted to summon Dead King and enslave an entire race. Which was, again, entirely understandable from her perspective at the time, just as Chris' behaviour is to him no doubt. The point is, this could not have left a good impression on anyone, much less a guy that had a lake dropped onto him. His distrust is understandable and well warranted. Even though it is wrong.

Also I doubt there weren't previous instances of betrayal by Villains, it's just that they were all killed offscreen by Cat. However the guy is probably in the dark about that detail, because why would anyone bother to explain anything to this nationalist narrow-minded idiot? Honestly, no reason to talk to him at all, just throw him at Dead King's hordes, it's all he's good for anyway.

Also also, can you explain what you didn't like about Cordelia and Pilgrim?

Shveiran

→ I don't know where you saw self-righteousness, the guy seemed just bitter if anything. He does not glorify himself, he seems, if anything, pointedly aware of what a giant mess he is.

He doesn't glorify himself, but you don't need to have a huge ego to be self-righteous: you just need to be convinced you and yours are in the right, and cast judgment on others without understanding or wishing to understand their positions. I refer you to my previous post with regards to why I think he does that if need be, and doing that is why I call him self-righteous in turn.

→ And yet he should be grateful for his country bleeding for others sake? Now that is exactly Catherine's entire reason for being angry at Heroes back at Book 4 and mind you, she was being invaded so had an inherent moral high ground, but the sentiment is not so different to not be understandable.

Woah, big leap here. Catherine and Christophe's sentiments are not alike. She was mad at the invaders, whereas Cristophe is mad at his allies.

That's not the same, in any way.

If he was brooding about the DK, you would have a point. But he is bitter at those trying to pull his country out of the ditch.

With that said, he shouldn't be GRATEFUL that a tragedy is happening, but that tragedy is not caused by his allies. It is hindered by them, so being bitter at them makes no sense. He wants to think they help out of fear for the DK and thus deserve no gratitude? As I said, fair, but that justifies a neutral stance, not resentment.

-> "He is also bitter for being used as a particularly tough brick to throw on the opposition, which I already said in earlier chapters, and he probably wonders if others even see him as a person. He was never explained that he was wrong, because, well, why would you sit down and talk with a tool?"

He is one of the very few Proceran heroes, with too many victories to count under his belt, who is universally recognized as a big weight and that also beds a Princess. If he wanted to look for information or to be taught anything from Named or from normal people, he has so many avenues to pursue that I can't even count them.

Are you telling me you honestly believe that Cat, Hanno, and Pilgrim one and all are being mean to him for no reason when they have always acted otherwise with nearly anyone and have every possible motivation to try and bring him into the fold? Not to mention no personal enmity that could curb their tongue?

Hell, if there ever was a mentor-shaped hole in his story, the Pilgrim is Name-bound to appear in it! It's what he does, it's what he has spent these two years doing. I don't see him making an exception for, again, one of the most powerful Named involved in the war.

If he doesn't like being just a warrior, he is the one taking no step to address it, I'm sorry. He is literally swimming in means, so if this persists the cause is internal.

-> "I am not saying he is one hundred percent right, and he is very willfully blind to similarities between his own country's situation and other examples. But his position is very much understandable and born not out of inherent malice, but rather a certain perspective.

Because history is... highly subjective. If you look at history books of different nations, you will be amused by how often both sides by their own admission were completely in the right and the other side were evil virus of Satan. Simultaneously.

And all the comments on Procer history we got from sources rather antagonistic to Procer. Like we never heard their point of view. For all I know, it may very well be that Scouring of Vaccei really was necessary. Probably not, but we should recognise our inherent bias towards his attitude, being that EXACTLY THE SAME BIAS forms his wildly despised attitude.

He is not bitter at the help, he is bitter at the lack of gratitude for sacrifices by the people of Procer. He probably thinks that sending armies is something others should have done, out of gratitude for their struggle, and is incomprehending how come they are the ones that should be grateful ones instead, without being owed gratitude in return for dying in tens of thousands.

I can totally get where he is coming from, which is why I just can't find it in myself to dislike him."

Again, I have no idea what you are building this argument on. Procer is not MAKING A SACRIFICE, this was not a CHOICE. The Dead King invaded, and they are the invadee. It sucks, it's sad, I can get he is mad about it, but there is no SACRIFICE involved.

There is also no FAULT involved save that which can be laid at the feet of Neshamah. Is this the Dominion's doing? Is it Callow's? There is no perspective here, it's a FACT: they are not the ones invading Procer, they are the ones defending it. There is nothing understandable about being mad at them. It doesn't matter how many Proceran orphanages are on fire, because everyone he's being mad at did not light the fires and is in fact trying to put them out, at great personal risk.

Again, you want to say "no gratitude required, they just don't want the fire to spread"? I disagree, but even that stance doesn't justify moving all the way from gratitude and into plain resentment.

If someone stabbed me, of course I'd be mad, but I'd not be mad at the random guy who tried to save me.

→"About Hakram and the like. Again, the guy had been fighting in the thickest, non-stop for two years, and not back-to-back with Villains at all as you seem to imply. He was always with one Hero or another, and even then he wasn't fighting back to back, he was used as a shield and tolerated for his usefulness. On a different front from Black Queen. His only interaction with her was when she was a gal who made people eat their fingers and casually attempted to summon Dead King and enslave an entire race. Which was, again, entirely understandable from her perspective at the time, just as Chris' behaviour is to him no doubt. The point is, this could not have left a good impression on anyone, much less a guy that had a lake dropped onto him. His distrust is understandable and well warranted. Even though it is wrong."

Why would you think he is not fighting with Villains? Villains and Heroes mingle at the Arsenal, and in the Archer's roving band. I'll grant you that we have no clear evidence that my version is true, but why would you think Cristophe's front is only made of Heroes? That seems to run against the spirit of the T&T and also be bad tactics, since Heroes and Villains have different strong suits and you'd likely want a broader toolbox everywhere that Neshamah has a harder time outmaneuvering.

--> "Also also, can you explain what you didn't like about Cordelia and Pilgrim?"

Oh, boy, we don't want to open that can of worm again, we'd be here all week.

Suffice to say, because I feel it's uncouth not to answer, that I felt we got the worst of both worlds: they had to be "broken" out of the conflict, dealt with from a position of strength, almost conquered, yet they were never humbled: they never apologized for causing the conflict in the first place and keeping it going, never asked forgiveness for anything, never admitted they may, in fact, have been wrong, and never lost anything as a result of losing to Cat. So that didn't scratch my "Cat has beaten this enemy" itch.

At the same time, there was no real reconciliation (again, no admission, no forgiveness asked, no reparation) and they still act like recalcitrant allies at best: see Pilgrim and the WB, see Cordelia not even disclosing the nature of the weapon and even now keeping her cards close to her chest regarding the conspiracy even if, you know, there is no guarantee she'll survive the next month so it's not like this doesn't concern Cat and the drow.

So that doesn't scratch my "A peaceful solution to the problem has been found and now someone new and interesting has joined the family" itch, either.

Darkening

Yeaah, I'm still a bit bitter about those conversations between Cat and Cordelia before Cat went to meet with the Dead King. Cordelia's just such a hypocrite about Cat coming to power by killing her own countrymen after she literally did the same thing in the proceran civil war with the only difference being that she was born into royalty. Jeez. And then just going on into, "You and your people don't matter because you're not strong enough to stop me." territory. Ugh. Even that scene where she went down on one knee to beg Cat to help her country against the Dead King wasn't an actual apology, just her asking for help.

ethericsentinel

Cordelia learned that she couldn't push a peace treaty through without throwing away her position, and then she took the hard line against Cat because it was that or be replaced by someone worse for Procer. There's no might-makes-right there. Just my-country-centrism, which is, to be honest, pretty common for a medieval ruler.

Javvies

About what?

The Exalted Poet? He's a dead traitor.

In medieval times in the real world, he'd be lucky to get buried in unconsecrated ground. More likely, his body would be displayed and left for the crows or given/left to animals.

For that matter, probably don't have to go back to medieval times for that kind of practice to be common.

Under the circumstances, his corpse is going to get tossed into a pyre. In the part for "enemy dead".

The condition of his corpse isn't really going to matter to anyone.

Javvies

Dammit wordpress.

Mental Mouse

> He seemed bitter at how he should be grateful

A line I learned decades ago from another classic story, the early Pern books: "Gratitude is an ill-fitting tunic, it chafes if worn too long". That applies all around. Mirror Knight needs to learn that this all goes turnabout by turns... he spent his early years as a tool – but now he is leading a band, and being aided by others. Soon enough it will turn again, and he will need to stand with the others against the greater foe.

Morgenstern

He was still getting thrown at the monsters like a particularly large brick by the older heroes in this book, to be fair. It's just here in the Arsenal, being YET AGAIN used (this time by the Bard, who seems to threaten to destroy him by using Severity/Severance here, as no one else seems capable of using that thing without shredded before even being able to use it once), that he is "leading" a band – and he isn't, not really, at least not since Hakram showed up. And before that, there was the Kingfisher Prince he also had to defer to, right after he got there with his little group and tried to make his cause (promptly being shut up (not that that wasn't the right move, of course, from our more informed standpoint ^^)). He IS a tool and he is not wrong in realizing everyone IS using him as such, and oftentimes not really in the way you would normally "make use of" a PERSON... he got literally hurled into stuff (and all-around treated) like a (non-feeling) cannonball (and no matter how tough he is, that's probably gonna 'chafe' in more ways than one).

Even the one person that seemed nice to him ... was again just trying to use him to plot.

He might not be very likable, but if one tries to take his standpoint, there are at least SOME points one can see and potentially agree how he COULD be bitter, especially with not being the brightest mind.

Oshi

It's literally what he signed up for. It's what Saint did for decades. That he chafes at is because hes young and stupid. Perspective fixes everything. It just depends on how many mistakes it will take for him to learn.

Shveiran

I really, really think that people are taking this "being thrown at enemies" thing to deduce a lot of consequences and... I can't say I follow the reasoning.

IN COMBAT, he is playing the tank. So what? Is that using him because he is supernaturally more resilient than anyone else, and can only fight in the melee row to begin with because his whole thing is sword and board? Really, casters hiding behind him to fight is using him? Come on, everyone who played a tank in a MMORPG or a tabletop RPG has found himself bearing the brunt of the enemy assault while everyone else came out smelling like a rose... but guess what, that's the job description. The sniper snips, the healer heals, the mage manipulates the fundamental laws of the universe and the tank stops people from stabbing them by drawing fire. It's the job! Granted, throwing him at monster is a step beyond that; but again, in the example above, sometimes you eat a fireball because you will survive that but the party may not survive the mob of mooks taking another turn. And you know what, if it bothers you, you can always talk about it afterward? I'm not a huge fan of the WotW, but I seriously doubt that if confronted about it, she'd have kept doing it and antagonize her allies. You know, because she is neither malicious nor a moron.

OUT OF COMBAT... again, what does that prove? Being the tank in combat correlates absolutely zero with how much respect you get. If anything, stepping out of the carved-up stomach of the undead abomination earns you point! It is a staple of heroic tradition!

Heck, Catherine has been leading from the front since the very beginning; did anyone ever looked like they thought her carving up devils was a reason why she shouldn't also being the one making the battle plans? Or deciding the over-arching priorities? Stabbing and getting stabbed was never a disqualification!

You think strategists enjoy super-powerful individuals that change the course of battle to be out of the loop? If they drop the ball the battle is at risk, he is more important than most commanders simply because he can stop the gargantuan abomination in its step.

If he is out of the loop, it is because he doesn't take steps to address it.

caoimhinh

I agree with you, and I personally think Christophe is starting to walk his path towards a fall from grace and becoming a Villain. He already broke vows he made when becoming a Hero, and now this constant chain of dark thoughts paints a bad image.

Also, what you pointed out is one of the disappointments I have with this unnecessary time skip of 2 years: They haven't grown and developed in those 2 years. Everyone is either the same or dumber.

We have seen that Heroes are still stubbornly refusing to acknowledge that Villains can be nice people too, and that people like Aquiline and Razin somehow got stupid enough to be trying to offend Catherine and risk themselves disobeying orders, when they by all accounts should be long past that point, after two years on the frontline of a hellish war against the undead.

It really doesn't seem like 2 years have passed, nor does it feel like they have been through a horrible war (and still fighting in it) during those years. They simply don't act like it, besides Cat been a bit stressed and mentally fatigued. Compare it to how all the Procerans characters changed after spending a few weeks fighting the undead invasion. Add to that the fact that Cat was having an easy time strolling the countryside instead of coordinating the frontlines, and a little whisper of the Bard was enough to have here 21 freaking Named away from the war. Which contradicts how dire the current state of the war is supposed to be. They shouldn't have been able to pull back this much manpower at all.

TeK

The war is one the hold for now, or at least, in the same kind of defensive stalemate that was WW1. Both sides are currently preparing for major assault, so war's gone quiet for a bit.

The time skip was necessary to establish the Truce'n'Terms into a working condition and set up a stage for the next ark, without boring readers with mostly inconsequential details.

And I don't see as much of a problem as you do. Sure, some Heroes refuse to acknowledge Villains to b nice guys. Not all of them, heck, not even a majority. Who else besides MK even? Artificer sleeps with one for Gods sake. Kingfisher flirts with Cat, Roland and Hanno and Tariq are given, Spear likes Archer, Magister likes Cat and Hakram, somewhat at least, and everyone else is at least cooperative. Which is a huge turnaround, not a minor one, who can it even be a minor one, the guys went merrily Crusading against the guys not to long ago, it's like Richard the Lionheart and Salah al-Din uniting to fight the Mongols, there are a lot of grudges and having them cooperate after only two years is already downright improbable if anything.

Aquiline and Razin getting stupid is exactly what I expected to happen in two years. Before the scars of Prince's Graveyard were to fresh, but now they faded and Cat was established as some roughly on the same side. Which is the only prerequisite for those minor bouts of insubordination. You just don't do that with infant-eating monster, you do it with someone you consider to be a reasonable human being and for Cat to be considered that by someone that hated her with passion just measly two years ago is nothing to scoff at.

You yourself said how Christophe is all dark and depressed, you saw how Heroes snap at each other constantly, and not in a good way either, yet you don't see how there are any scars left by the war?

Also, characters that changed were unNamed, which might've contributed to the swiftness, or rather the Namedness contributed to the lack of one.

Shveiran

On the whole, I like the time-skip a lot, and have been on record saying that.
And I stand by it.

Yet there are a few problems, yes. Aquiline and Razin are one (though minor in my book) disappointment, Heroes like Mirror Knight and Blade of Mercy are another. Though that particular problem is much smaller for me ever since it seemed like Nephele and Artificer were not “against Villains” but more “against Masego”. That makes it very different to me.

Shveiran

Also, a lot of these Named are not here because of WB. Some work here (masego, artificer, Roland, hunted magician, concocter), some are passing by on their own (archer's band) and some are here for the reunion (Cat and Hakram) while some still are coming here to prevent WB's disaster (Kingfisher's prince)

Liliet

Kingfisher Prince is there for the conference too.

Javvies

Yes and no.

That's his official reason for being at the Arsenal.

On the other hand, the timing and location of his arrival suggests that he was at least partially guided by Augur.

Especially since he could probably have made do by going to the Salia conference center, and that likely would have been a shorter and faster trip, plus more or less on the way.

Plus his conversation with Cat would tend to support his being sent by Augur to disrupt Bard's plots against Cat, the Alliance, the Truce and Terms, and the future Accords.

Liliet

It was mentioned in Terms that Frederic would be coming to the Arsenal.

Javvies

Augur could easily have let him know he should go to the Arsenal for the conference ahead of time. Or nudged things in ways to make him decide to go.

For that matter, even if he would have gone to the Arsenal anyways, it's likely that Augur gave him some kind of warning/direction, based the fortuitous timing and nature of his arrival, and his chat with Cat.

He's certainly been warned about Bard/Intercessor, and he believes those warnings enough to take Cat's lead and indirect references to Bard.

Point is, I'm fairly certain that whatever official reasoning he gave for attending the conference via the Arsenal, there are ulterior and alternate motives for him doing so – at least some of which are most likely because Augur wanted to put him into a position to stop Bard from ruining things. Also, I'm pretty sure that he really wanted to meet Cat and thank her for her efforts.

Liliet

The problem is, while all of that is possible – and there is no evidence it didn't happen – it's not necessary. Providence for arriving in the exact right moment is just that, Providence. Roles generate it automatically. Augur is not NEEDED.

And it's been two years since the Salian coup attempt. It sounds like Augur shared the information and everyone with the need to know was brought in on it. Frederic is one of those people, being a ruling Named.

Re: meeting Cat, yeah I'd estimate like 75% prior that he'd have wanted to do that XD

caoimhinh

Hm, Nephele (Repentant Magister) is not against Masego, although it seems the whispers of the Bard got to her too, making her start to be suspicious of Masego, but not taking hostile actions against him so much as double-checking to make sure he is not against them. Blessed Artificer, on the other hand, is the one with a problem with him. Though this is a shared thing, as we got from Masego's PoV when his very Name was urging him to thoroughly crush her works. Though I dislike Artificer because she has that conceited and arrogant attitude of Praesi Highborn mixed with the self-righteousness of inexperienced Heroes.

Mammon

As usual, Cat and Zeze were planning to turn it into a sharper, crafting a plan and weapon with brute finesse and just a little too clever. Instead of, you know, turning it into an arrow for me.

godsDamned, Archer, who's the simpleminded one here?

—

Cat: Needs a body

Cat: Remembers she has the body of Tancred in her shadow-pocket.

Cat: Realises that Providence has given her a body for probably this very situation days ago, and decided that this body had to be of a adolescent boy to be of the right size.

Cat: Well fuck you too, Creation.

TeK

Huh, I didn't think about an insult implied but got damn that was a burn.

Darkening

Wow, that theory actually hurts quite a bit.

Javvies

Mirror Knight ... you're a dumbass. People don't like you because you (try to) justify the atrocities Procer has habitually committed against the rest of Calernia. Those atrocities, and their associated expansionist tendencies, do a large part to contribute to why the rest of Calernia doesn't particularly like Procer either.

And, called it that the knifed body was that of Scorched Apostate. Which means Fallen Monk's corpse is somewhere ... maybe the Night, unless it got vaporized.

Hmm. Wonder what happened to the knife wound in Cat's throat? Archer thinks Cat doesn't have the self-healing/regeneration tricks of Night.

Man, Archer really needs to recalibrate how tough people are if she thinks an arrow to the throat is a reliable capture method.

Artificer ... why'd you slow yourself down carrying the traitor down the stairs instead of tossing him over the edge? It's not like he's going to get an honorable burial, where you want the body to look good for the services.

Mental Mouse

> Artificer ... why'd you slow yourself down carrying the traitor down the stairs instead of tossing him over the edge?

Because they might yet be able to do something with the corpse, and whatever it is will be that much harder if the corpse has been smashed by a long fall!

Javvies

Except doing anything with the corpse would involve necromancy.

And necromancy is a Villainous practice. And therefore not something Blessed Artificer is okay with.

Liliet

> Artificer ... why'd you slow yourself down carrying the traitor down the stairs instead of tossing him over the edge?

Because that'd just be rude?

Javvies

It's a traitor's corpse. Courtesy is not required.
As long as it doesn't land on anybody, or anything important ... who is going to care?

Unless you're referring to whomever the poor fellows are who will have to clean things up after the battle is over.

Liliet

Adanna cares?

Javvies

About what?

The Exalted Poet? He's a dead traitor.

In medieval times in the real world, he'd be lucky to get buried in unconsecrated ground. More likely, his body would be displayed and left for the crows or given/left to animals.

For that matter, probably don't have to go back to medieval times for that kind of practice to be common.

Under the circumstances, his corpse is going to get tossed into a pyre. In the part for "enemy dead".

The condition of his corpse isn't really going to matter to anyone.

Liliet

You're repeating Archer's argument. Which she said in response to Adanna's protests.

Shveiran

And?

Adanna clearly thinks he deserves respect, but that doesn't make that position reasonable. Her support of this position is not, in itself, an argument for its validity.

Liliet

I mean, 'a person deserves respect in death' seems like a valid position to me regardless of who the person is. Kind of a universal default that can be overridden by circumstances, necessity and personal emotions, but when it's not, that's by definition better.

Shveiran

well, I agree in principle. I just have an hard time coming up with more relevant circumstances for changing dead bodies protocols than "we are being invaded, this is a treacherous, super-powered individual that knows a lot and also necromancy is both real and kind of key in this huge war we are fighting, and handling it disrespectfully is faster while time is of the essence". It's not that Adanna's stance is weird in principle. But it's kind of out of place in these circumstances.

Liliet

Eh. I don't think time was THAT of essence. They were just two floors up

Morgenstern

To be 'fair', I don't think Archer was thinking of a capture method at the time... but rather not really thinking at all XD Going instead with an "in the moment" gut feeling (unconscious decision stemming from previous experience (about heroes, and Levantines even more so)) about how to shut him up without outright killing him while making her only one hidden shot count (seeing how it took multiple iron arrows to get down a fae, it's at least a bit understandable how going for the Hero (who usually don't die all that easily, either) seemed safer/more worth it). Forgetting (in the heat of the fight going on for a bit of time longer, bc there were more than just one opponent) about after which time that would end up being a problem, if no one healed him of course (which other heroes in a usual hero group probably would have, but... well, yeah, no, the fae weren't gonna).

dadycoool

Well, this chapter was nice.

Oh, look! There they both are!

Aotrs Commander

Oh, Indrani.

Only you could consider and AN ARROW TO THE THROAT a nonlethal attack.

Never change...

(Somewhere, across multiple continuities, Hawkeye (both of them), Green Arrow, Speedy, Red Arrow, Arsenal and Artemis all just simultaneously face-palmed.)

erebus42

In her defense, most of the people she usually fights would probably just walk off an arrow in the throat.

Mental Mouse

Notably everyone else she was fighting at the moment.

Liliet

Y u p

TeK

Tis' just a flesh wound!

Shveiran

Incidentally, Interlude:Concert does not appear in the table of contents

NerfGlaistigUaine

Ah fuck, now you've made me feel for the Mirror Knight. Sure he's an incompetent dick but he's like Elhokar from Stormlight – he knows it. And he's trying to do the right thing and be a good leader even though he's not suited for it. Poor bastard.

Is it strange that the thought of a corpse turning its head in curiosity made me giggle?

Mental Mouse

What made me giggle was that setup for another "That's my Cat!" moment. "Hmm, why would she leave the corpse? Probably looking through it to see who comes to check it out... yep, it's looking at us all right!"

Letouriste

@EE: it seems you forgot to put last Interlude in the table of contents 😊

Hellarion Angelus

Actually, there is a good chance that the artificier is lying and the poet is still alive, just faking his death with her help, and that's why Archer is surprised she killed him. It would fit on why she stopped them from throwing his body, she was the one who checked the pulse, Roland had carried him by his legs...

laguz24

No, that kind of double treachery is way too subtle for the inexperienced artificer. Since all the traitors were revealed providence would not work like this.

Mental Mouse

To what end? Archer intended to interrogate him, and odds are good she (or at least Cat) would have let him bargain for his life.

Aranaya

"Hells," Archer cursed. "I wanted to interrogate him. How dead is he, would you say?"

Only one thing you can do; go through his clothes and look for loose change

Aranaya

if it is formless, then the deepest spy cannot discern it, nor the wise make plans against it (Sun Tzu)

Ah, Tancred.

Interlude: Set Them Up

*"The Vales we held with valour
And swept clear the Wasaliti
But spring returns the enemy
As we grow old in armour."*

– Duncan Threefingers, Callowan poet

Catherine Foundling leaned back into her seat, neck yet bloody but her sharp smile unwavering. On her brow sat a crown, blackly won, and she wore a mantle made of many woes. Facing her, sprawled on her seat like a languid cat, the Wandering Bard shuffled a worn deck of cards. Trickster's fingers danced, below light blue eyes and a smile that had seen many a kingdom turn to dust. At her side waited a badly-strung lute and before her a flask of silver lay open. Both women were smiling in that way people did, when sharpening knives behind their back.

"So, what are we drinking?" Catherine asked, flicking a glance at the flask.

The Wandering Bard, whose name was now Marguerite, chuckled and set down the cards. She took a delicate glass from the side and snatched her flask, pouring a finger for the other woman.

"Ashuran haralm," the Bard replied, tone whimsical. "Some call it the very elixir of life."

"Nice touch," Catherine admitted. "But, as you might be aware, I have recently been stabbed."

"I may have heard of this unfortunate happenstance," the Bard said. "Do you mean to say you won't be drinking after all?"

The Black Queen snorted.

"Crows no," she said. "It means make it a double, my neck still hurts like you wouldn't believe."

"That's the spirit," the Wandering Bard grinned, and poured again.

The tanned queen picked up her glass, swirling the hard liquor within as if she were appreciating the bouquet of a fine wine instead of playing with shipborne rotgut.

"So cards, huh," Catherine said. "I wouldn't have pegged you for the type."

"I enjoy the underlying truths of the game," the Bard demurred.

"Illuminate me, by all means," the Black Queen invited, sipping at her drink.

Unlike the last time they'd shared it, she did not choke. Marguerite of Baillons deftly began shuffling the cards again, a smooth and soothing cut from hand to hand.

"Cards are unfair," the Intercessor said. "Cards about luck and lies, and sometimes there's simply no way to win."

"That usually means you're not playing the right game," the Carrion's Lord apprentice replied.

"Are you?" the Wandering Bard smiled.

Catherine drank, the liquor warming her guts.

"Hard to tell until the end," she said. "What did you have in mind?"

"How kind of you," the Bard mused, the undertone skeptical, "to let me choose this uncontested."

"Can't win if there's no game," the Black Queen grinned, all teeth and malice.

"Can't cheat without rules, is it?" the Wandering Bard smiled back, reaching for her flask. "Fair enough. Have you ever played Affray, Catherine?"

"That drunk's game?" the dark-eyed queen said, brow rising.

The Intercessor cast a look at the now quarter empty glass in her hand, then raised her flask for a silent toast.

"It's medicinal," Catherine Foundling protested, meaning point taken.

"Back in the day it was used as peacemaking ritual, in the lands that became Lange and Salia," the Bard confided as she shuffled. "It was your Queen of Blades that brought it east, after she went about the business of carving an empire across the Whitecaps."

It was a simple enough game, one that could be played with any tarot deck's Major Arcana. The first player would set down a card from their hand, opening an 'affray': players could set down cards one after another, with the cumulative value of the cards of any of the twenty one Major Arcana put down used to count who the winner of that affray was. To win an affray granted a player one point. The trick was that there could be up to five affrays – or more or less, depending on variants – on the table at any time, and a player could declare their loss and clear out the affray by conceding the point. For that concession they would gain the right to take back one of the cards they'd put down in said affray.

"Nowadays it's a tavern game for people too drunk for more complicated ones," Catherine snorted.

"The Langeni used clay tablets instead of cards," the Bard told her. "Each of them standing for a life sworn to the resolution of the strife."

"That's just a battle without the steel," the Black Queen said. "Nothing more or less."

The Intercessor drank of her flask and did not disagree.

"While we're having this pleasant little chat, one pal to another," Catherine said. "I've got a question to ask you."

"I delight in giving answers," the Bard replied.

"You see, I've had this song stuck in my head all day," the orphan queen said. "I don't suppose you'd know anything about that?"

"Sounds troubling," the Intercessor said, glint of triumph in her eye. "But you are in luck, as I happen to be something of an authority when it comes to songs. Which one is it that haunts you?"

The Black Queen hummed the first few bars of 'The Girl Who Climbed The Tower' and saw the way the glint died, smiling at the sight.

"Ah," Catherine Foundling said. "So there it is. Never you mind, Marguerite, I withdraw my question."

They matched eyes in silence, a moment passing.

"Seven cards each," the Wandering Bard said. "Draw on drop, five affrays."

"I await your pleasure," Catherine Foundling replied. "Hells, you can even open the game."

"Your kindness is without bounds," the Bard praised.

With light fingers she began to deal. One each, back and forth.

"Kindness?" the Black Queen said. "No. I'm just recognizing that you drew first blood, that's all there is to it."

The last card was hardly down that they both took up their hands. Each looked at their own, seeing how once more Creation had seen to the details, and with a flourish the Wandering Bard set down her first card and in the same gesture drew. What she revealed was a fair-haired woman subduing a lion, Strength. The older name for that card, and the truer one today, was Fortitude.

"The Mirror Knight," the Intercessor said. "Lost and angry and feeling it all slip away from his grasp. He'll take up the sword because it fixes all he despises about himself."

A card was set down over it, without missing a beat: a crowned and dark-skinned man on a barren throne, the Emperor.

"The Adjutant," the Black Queen said. "Faith with a cold eye, patience without hesitation. He will steer them all away from the rocks, because it is in his nature to mend what is broken."

—

The Prince of Falling Leaves had lost patience, Christophe de Pavanie saw.

Hammering at the wards hadn't borne fruit – the enchanted steel gates were still shut – so instead he had unleashed the fullness of his wrath on the stone around them. Some clever soul had seen to it this would be no solution, and even now that the cube of rock surrounded by water holding the Severance had been peeled open of protection by rot some invisible barrier still prevented the fae from entering the room. Yet the prince of the Fair Folk had grown darkly ruthless in his pursuit of entry, snatching up Arsenal armsmen and making puppets of them before throwing them across the unseen divide. The poor soldiers were slowly forcing open the enchanted doors from the inside, using their blades to pry them apart as they groaned in protest.

"Forward," the Mirror Knight bellowed, sword high.

The Vagrant Spear whooped, quickening her pace as she claimed the vanguard. The royal fae's gaggle of attendants were sent out by him and swept forth against the three Named, lords and ladies carved out of frenzied dreams and wielding powers outlandish, but the Mirror Knight and the Adjutant stood like tall stones as the tide washed around them. There could be no strategy to this, no cunning: it was only a parade of sneering faces and blades that Christophe must strike at, cutting when he could and forcing through their blows as if they were but summer rain. Yet his blade bit fae flesh too little, the Adjutant was tiring and Sidonia was still half-blind. The Vagrant Spear took the first wound, a deep slash across the face that added red to the savage paints on her face, but the orc was not far behind in having a barbed spear pierce into the side of his leg. On the sides, all the hallways leading to this godforsaken place, fae were pouring in. The wayfinders were returning, heeding the call of their lord and prince. Before long, Christophe of Pavanie knew, he would be standing alone surrounded by corpses.

Again. Too slow, too weak, too stupid, again.

"Cross the wards," Hakram Deadhand roared.

None knew if they would be allowed through, for the Repentant Magister was not there to speak of it – and who was it that had sent her away? Christophe of Pavanie, once more the gravedigger of finer souls – but what choice did they have? The Adjutant was the first to reach where once stone had stood, before it frittered away into pebbles and dust, and after resisting for a heartbeat the wards let him through. Without hesitation the orc limped towards the enchanted soldiers, axe raised. Sidonia was halfway to safety, when some wild-looking fae ran her through the side with a slender rapier of bone. Christophe swelled with anger, screaming, and tore his way through the Fair Folk to get to her side. The fae parted like mist wherever he struck, and though their strikes glanced off his sides and shield with barely any effort the Mirror Knight had never felt more impotent than in that moment.

Sidonia had rammed a knife through the hollow of the fae's chin, by the time he got there, even as the warrior twisted his grip and ran through her lung. The Mirror Knight smashed down the animal with his shield, fury boiling out, and dropped his blade to pick up the Vagrant Spear even as the fae swarmed him like flies. Step by step, keeping Sidonia safe under the shield, he retreated to the safety of the wards as the Fair Folk harassed him. It was onto wet stone he stood, a wounded friend clutched tight in his arms, and Gods forgive him but he had sent away their only healer. He would have wept of it, but what would weeping do? Sidonia could still make it through this, if the fae were scattered and help sought. But could he abandon the Severance for the sake of one soul, to its likely destruction?

No, he thought as he laid her down, he could not.

To the side, the Adjutant slew the third struggling soldier with a clean stroke through the neck but it had been a moment too late. The doors had been open, just a finger's worth, and the crack the steel gave as it did had the ring of the inexorable to it.

—

"I didn't think you'd send the Deadhand out with that valiant lot right from the start," the Bard acknowledged. "You usually keep him in reserve for longer."

"He was the only one who could do it," Catherine shrugged. "Can you imagine if I'd sent Archer with them instead?"

The Intercessor chuckled.

"That would have been my affray before long, true enough," she said. "He's a steady sort, your man, I won't argue that. But he can't spin gold from straw, Catherine. The Mirror Knight has been left to fester for too long, the sickness sunk into the bones."

"I'll not speak to Christophe of Pavanie," the Black Queen said. "He's not one of mine, and I know him little. But I have put my faith in Hakram Deadhand many a time, when the day grew dark, and I was never once disappointed."

"Your father's daughter indeed," the Wandering Bard said, and it was a compliment to neither. "I told him then and I'll tell you now: love always fucks you over."

"If you want the right to lecture me," Catherine Foundling replied, unmoved, "win."

As if prompted by the words, the Bard set down her second card. A black spire of stone piercing even the clouds, as pale lightning struck at it: the Tower.

"Ruin onto your Truce and Terms," the Intercessor said. "The Red Axe slain in blind revenge, heroes and villains at each other's throats beyond what can be mended."

The other woman gave answer without batting an eye, her card dropped atop the other with insolent nonchalance. It showed a fair prince, riding a chariot pulled by horses both black and white: the Chariot.

"The Kingfisher Prince," the Black Queen said. "Alamans iron forged in a Lycaonese forge, daring with duty holding the reins. Authority and trust, crowns earthly and not."

Under her breath, barely noticing it, she hummed the tune to a familiar song that spoke of foxes and kings.

—

"It appears we've run into a spot of trouble, my friend," Prince Frederic of Brus jovially said.

Soldiers crowded both ends of the hallway, perhaps sixty in whole? Not a small amount, considering the garrison of the Arsenal should not surpass three hundred in whole. By the looks of them it was a mix of bearded Levantines and the latest issue of the mold buried at the heart of Callow that kept churning out gruff, middle-aged soldiers with hard eyes. No Named or creatures, by the looks of it, but Frederic's eyes were not so fine he would trust them without condition.

"Let me go," the Red Axe grunted. "I'll make it out on my own."

Doubtful, considering she was currently bereft of the weapon that'd earned her the Choosing, but admittedly it sometimes paid to keep your coin on Chosen when the odds were long. Regardless it was simply out of question that he might let an unarmed, shoeless and manacled woman be captured by a band of soldiers. The sheer dishonour of such a thing would force him to abdicate, shorn his hair in contrition and never again enjoy a vintage more than a year old.

The Prince of Brus might even have to drink wine from Callow in penance, which was simply too horrid a fate to contemplate.

"No need for that," Frederic assured her. "I do happen to have a smattering of royal blood in my veins, which comes in useful on occasion. I should be able to talk our way out of this."

From the corner of his eye, he caught the sight of an approaching half-company of crossbowmen. It seemed to have been what the surrounding soldiers were waiting for, as a moment later a captain in Dominion armour and paint hailed them.

"You are surrounded and were caught red-handed helping a prisoner escape," the Dominion warrior said. "Surrender now or be served the sword."

Whoever it was who'd arranged this, Frederic thought, had been careful. There was not a single Proceran soldier here, someone who might have trusted or deferred to a prince of the blood – on the contrary, trying such a thing with this lot was a lot more likely to have them using those crossbows. The Callowans in particular still remembered being at war with the Principate and were a famously touchy lot when it came to foreigners. Not without reason, but in the current circumstances that was rather unfortunate.

At least it smoothed away any notion he might have developed of this being a betrayal by the Black Queen. Cordelia had told him once that Queen Catherine had a fondness for soldiers and the common folk, sometimes at the expense of those of higher births, which given the First Prince's diplomatic tendencies likely meant that the Black Queen would bake an entire pie out of dukes to feed an urchin child from the street without batting an eye. She was not the kind of woman who would sacrifice her own countrymen, her own soldiers, to carry out so petty a scheme.

Like as not, Frederic mused, this was part of the trap. A Proceran prince, the sole Chosen among them, slaughtering Callowan soldiers to help a killer escape justice – even if Queen Catherine came out in his support, which would be... delicate, the mere appearances of this would have the Army of Callow brought to a boil. Someone, Frederic Goethal thought, was trying to sow dissension within the Grand Alliance at a time where unity was one of the few things standing between them and annihilation.

Someone was going to have to die, evidently.

"I understand that you have a duty," the Kingfisher Prince called out. "Yet so do I, and I have reason to believe that this woman's life is in danger. That is why I sprung her from her cell."

"I don't care if you've got duty or if you've got the clap, princeling," the Dominion captain said. "Drop your sword and kneel, now."

"I will do this, on my honour," the Prince of Brus replied, "if you can assure me that I will be placed in the same cell as the Red Axe, and that my sword will be returned to me when I am in that cell."

It was possible that Frederic would be able to fight his way through this, though far from certain – Dominion foot was hardy and sharpened by years of raiding, while the Callowans were veterans from half a dozen ludicrously brutal wars – but it would be a slaughter. Against such numbers, it would be vanity to attempt anything but his utmost. That meant killing blows, and the full might of his Choosing behind him.

"I must not have been clear," the Dominion captain shouted, "this isn't a negotiation, princeling. But it's your last warning, though, so drop that fucking sword."

If it came to a fight, Frederic Goethal thought, in a very real sense he had already lost. What did he have he could bargain with, here? Should he simply surrender, and from a visible and reassuring position of weakness try to make his case then?

"You shouldn't have come," the Red Axe whispered. "It'll make it all worse. Just step back and act strange, I'll say I used my Bestowal to make you do it."

"I do not believe I could ever come to enjoy Dormer reds," Frederic confessed, "so I shall have to decline."

"Hold," another voice called out. "What's this all about, then?"

It was a Callowan lieutenant who'd spoken out, a stout orc with a scarred face and a wary look about him.

"Stay out of this, Inger," the Dominion captain said. "You are outranked."

Ah, how embarrassing – about her, the prince silently corrected.

"Outrank my ass, Hassar," the orc growled. "I'm not shooting a fucking war hero without at least asking why first."

That, the Kingfisher Prince decided, sounded like a way to turn this around.

—

"Agnes continues to hold a grudge, I see," the Wandering Bard said. "She really ought to know better than to meddle by now. It never helps."

"It's a tired old game, this one," Catherine Foundling said. "This pretence that you know better, that you are the natural mistress of all our fates and we do offence by pulling our own strings. I'd oppose you for that alone, even if you were all you try to pass for."

"You oppose me because there is no part of you that can tolerate being used instead of user," the Intercessor replied. "Everything else you add atop of that is a justification attempting to be just."

"Have you ever been beaten twice in the same century before?" the Black Queen mused. "Gods, twice in the same decade? The Tyrant of the Augur, and maybe now a third headed your way. It has to sting, that your grip is growing loose after all these years."

The Intercessor laughed.

"How very badly you want me to be your enemy," she said, as if awed. "To be malicious, out to get you. As if I was not simply snuffing out fires before they swallowed too much, no small number lit by your hand."

"You feed on agency, Intercessor," the Black Queen said, tone cold. "You are a parasite sucking the blood out of all you touch. Whatever you might once have been, that is what you are now: mad as any Tyrant, callously make use of all the world to fight your war on Keter."

"Yours is a rout, Catherine," the Intercessor said. "I watched, for two years. I waited. And what do you have to show for it? You teased out a few of his tricks and buried a kingdom's worth of dead as the price. You are out of your league. You are failing."

"You lie as easily as you breathe," the Black Queen replied. "These plans have been years in the making, you did not wait a whit. You simply cannot tolerate that this war can be fought in any way but with your hand at the helm."

"Where are the devils, Catherine?" the Intercessor said. "Where are the hosts that darken the skies, and the demons he has kept leashed for centuries? Where are the rituals that poison the land and the sorceries never before seen? I'll tell you the truth of it."

She leaned forward, eyes hooded.

"Your alliance is not great enough a threat to warrant the use of any of those," the Intercessor said. "You do not worry him."

"You must know, deep down, that the truth of you is unpalatable to any who grasp it," the Black Queen said, hard-eyed. "Why else would you remain half-hidden, pulling strings instead of serving as an advisor to the greats of this age? You talk about the Dead King, again and again, as if the horror of him in any way excuses what you are."

"As is your habit, you talk of-"

"Gods, have I had enough of that," the orphan girl snarled. "This insistence that we don't understand while you don't explain, that we are ignorant when you do not teach, that we are blind when you keep us in the dark. You are not somehow beyond us, you leech. You're not too important, too big to be judged – not when you spend our lives like coppers. Being old and hard to kill does no exempt you from consequence, and even if it's the last thing I do I will carve the truth of that into your fucking skull."

"How many times I've been in this seat, the subject of that same indignation spoken through a different tongue," the Intercessor said. "And do you know how it comes to happen, that I am lectured again?"

She smiled mirthlessly.

"Because I do what is necessary anyway," the Wandering Bard said.

"You might be fighting a monster," the Black Queen said, "but what of it? The rest of us are, after all, fighting two."

The other woman softly laughed.

"A leech and a scavenger," the Wandering Bard mused. "My, but what a pair we make. So, my friend, from one bottom-feeder to another – shall we settle the order of precedence among the base and hungry?"

A card was put down on the table, smoothly but without gentleness. Grey-clad and tanned, bearing a lantern and a staff: the Hermit.

"Fear and treason, conspiracy," the Intercessor said. "Your fishing rod of crowns untouched but the fisherman drowned by the tide anyway. The Hierophant, slain."

It was carefully, almost delicately, that a card was placed over the last. Two figures crowned with roses and holding hands, a radiant sun above them: the Lovers.

"Archer," Catherine Foundling said, her voice clear as a frozen pond, fury gone cold. "Love like greed and feet unrelenting – Gods have mercy on whoever you sent after him, because she will make them into meat."

—

It had taken Indrani longer to figure that she needed to go after Masego than to figure out where he actually would be.

Cat had been no help at all, disappearing from the corpse the moment she heard what there'd been to say, but eventually Archer had pieced it all together. She'd gone to the Belfry because she figured Catherine would be there, and she'd been right, but that'd been true for a reason: Cat had come here to keep Autumn's grubby little hands off of the stuff in Masego's quarters. This debt business the fae talked about, it was about breaking the most promising stuff in the Arsenal – the Bard, for some no doubt godawful reason, must have wanted it gone. Except the fae that'd gone for Quartered Seasons had gotten slaughtered wholesale, and presumably two traitors had died in the failure as well: the Poet and the Monk, both gone. It seemed like a right mess for the Bard's side, but who the fuck ever knew with that one? She was all twists and turns and nipping at her own tail.

The bottom line of it, though, was that it'd been a pretty shit plan to send a bunch of fae after what was probably one of the single most warded rooms in the entire Arsenal. Indrani figured that even if the Artificer hadn't bottled up the fairies near the bottom of the Belfry they would have been stuck hammering at that door for at least an hour, if not more. Fae were infamously shit at dealing with thresholds, and while Olowe's Theorem suggested that a bastard realm like the Arsenal would only have weaker versions of creational laws like those weak didn't mean absent. For a supposed weaver of wiles like the Wandering Bard, it was a lackluster effort. It'd tied up a lot of Named, though. And when Indrani had considered Quartered Seasons with a cold eye, thinking about how she would have scuppered that ship, the answer had been pretty obvious: Hierophant.

The material stuff could be built up again, but if Masego was dead that project was dead in the water. It was his theories, his rituals, his methods from beginning to start. Even if his notes got passed to someone else, it was doubtful they'd be able to keep going. There just weren't that many mages with that kind of talent in Calernia. So, that must have been the play then: striking loud at the front gate, then slipping through the back to slide the knife. Zeze wasn't helpless, but he wasn't exactly invincible either. More worryingly he had some pretty dangerous weaknesses, for someone who knew where to look.

After that it'd just been a matter of figuring out where he was, since he obviously wasn't in his rooms. Archer had almost smacked herself in the back of the head when she'd realized she was making this a lot more complicated than it needed to be: the outer wards of the Arsenal had been broken through by Autumn, and Hierophant had been one of the mages to set those foundations down. He wouldn't be holed up or spoiling for a fight right now, he'd be fixing those wards and making sure that the entire Arsenal didn't start splitting in pieces between multiple layers of the Pattern. Which, uh, would be... unpleasant to anyone happening to be in one of those pieces when they split. Archer didn't need four Named to watch Masego's back, though, and there'd be other fires to put out. So she sent Roland and Cocky where she figured they'd be most useful, and went on with only the Blessed Artificer at her side.

Adanna of Smyrna was exhausted, grumpy and running out of Light baubles to use but she have did one very important thing to contribute: she was one of the few keyed into the wards that surrounded the Chancel, the part of the Arsenal where the central warding array was.

They cut in through the Alcazar's tunnels, since they were deserted and a shortcut, and got through the first checkpoint smoothly enough. It'd been stripped of guards, which boded ill but might well have a mundane explanation given that the Arsenal was currently under attack. The two of them passed by the restricted stacks, Indrani feeling the hum of those heavy wards against her skin, and then the large room called the Mirage. Yet before they arrived at the bottom of the stairs leading to the second of three checkpoints protecting the central array, Archer caught a familiar scent in the air. Blood. Somewhere close to here someone had spilled blood, and recently. She raised a hand, signaling for the Blessed Artificer to halt. The other woman did, after a beat.

"We're not alone," Archer murmured. "Assume an enemy, blood was spilled."

"Do you think the Hierophant is wounded?" the Blessed Artificer whispered back.

"There'd be a lot more holes in the everything, if someone stuck him," Indrani decided. "But it might be where the guards are gone."

She gestured for the Blessed Artificer to follow her, quiet as she could, and they withdrew some. The smell had been coming from the near the Arsenal treasury offices, Indrani figured, so it was worth a look.

Archer caught the reflection of magelights on steel just before the blade slid between her ribs.

—

Catherine Foundling drained her glass dry and leaned forward. Hands hidden beneath a cloak laden with many victories, eyes cold, she cracked her neck the saw way she had back when she'd still fought for silvers in the Pit.

"I'd say it's about time to get started in earnest, isn't it?" the Black Queen said, smiling the smile of a woman who'd ransacked a shatranj board before coming there.

Hands carelessly plucking at the strings of the badly-strung lute on her lap the Wandering Bard hummed, fingers too deft for the clumsy sounds they brought and eyes looking at places that were not in this room.

"I couldn't agree more," the Intercessor said, smiling the smile of someone whose sleeves were filled with half a dozen decks of cards.

Insanenoodlyguy

"You shouldn't have come," the Red Axe whispered. "It'll make it all worse. Just step back and vote for PGTE on Topwebfiction, I'll say I used my reminder to make you do it."

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil-yettofindaname>

Hi, I just finished reading PGTE for the first time, and I saw talk of a discord server a few chapters ago, does anyone have the link?
(It was frequently in the vote thread, so I'm leaving my reply here)

Dsylexic Wofl

<https://discord.gg/jkangV>

There you go fam.

tkjarrah

always fun when we get a little reminder of how much booksmarts indrani really has

Liliet

casually int 16 ♥

thearpox23

It's her dump stat.

Shveiran

...godsdamn it, it actually is, isn't it?

WuseMajor

I mean, if she intentionally wanted her Wisdom to be 6, does it really count as a dump stat?

Shveiran

With her Perception and Insight? That stat is not low, my friend: her recklessness does not come from her not knowing any better, it comes from a deliberate choice to do it ANYWAY.

naturalnuke

Ah yes, high wisdom Chaotic Neutral.

thearpox23

If you want to analyze, Indrani is actually absurdly highly stated.

Her Dexterity is sky high and her highest stat. Her second highest stat is probably Charisma, as she is extremely good looking, and even though she isn't very diplomatic, everyone seems to like her. (Or at least lets her get away with all sorts of shit.) Even her old buddies from refuge only hate her because she didn't want to be friends with them. Then it's between Strength and Wisdom. On one hand she can overpower Hakram, but she is also extremely perceptive, as was shown on many occasions. Really, the only other stat you could argue isn't extremely high is her Constitution, and even that is by comparison to those that can tank falling mountains and near Antarctic colds, meaning it is still probably higher than 16.

shikkarasu

She overpowers Hakram by way of AC and To-Hit bonus. Also, she's good with Con saves, but she doesn't tend to get hit very often. I figure her Str/Con is around 12-14 and she maxed Dex. She probably has 16 Wis/Int, but I don't think she has that much Charisma. She gets Bluff bonuses by playing up her devil-may-care attitude and downplaying her intellect.

I played a character like that in 3.5. She was almost as awesome as Archer.

Liliet

Indrani's Str is absurd. By the calculations made on the discord server, to send an arrow the size of hers the distance that was indicated in one of the chapters (without counting wind resistance and assuming perfect transference of energy from arm to bow to arrow, which both result in lowballing) Indrani needed to draw ~300kg.

No, DnD characters cannot do that.

thearpox23

My memory is fuzzy, but doesn't she enjoy overpowering Hakram via wrestling? I half-recall her arm-wrestling him as well.

Also, her Wis is waayyy higher than her Int, she is scary good at reading people, and it consistently mentioned to have superior intuition to outright computation power.

When it comes to Charisma, I want you to consider her attitude and the shit she gets away with again, then try to imagine someone else pulling it. High Cha doesn't mean good attitude or that she isn't a murder-hobo. Bluff skill is irrelevant to anything.

Shveiran

DnD characters can do anything the DM feels fit the campaign, as the rules as written are designed to exist only until demanded by the game arbiter.

Considering how much the Gods seem to like big explosion, I feel safe to say that if this was a DnD campaign no rule would stand in the way of her giant-ass bow.

Big Brother

Cat and Bard are the best match for hero (Villain) and villain (Old Monster), a vicious dichotomy I've always loved seeing since I first read Spawn.

Big Brother

Also, quick question, was this chapter the first Affray of five, or three? I honestly have an interest in this game now, and want to play it.

Liliet

Three affrays started out of five.

Big Brother

Then I'm curious which affray will be conceded first, and what the final 2 shall be.

As to what's in the hands/deck, I'm certain the fool can be disregarded as it was stated Affray is played with the 21 High Arcana of a Tarot deck, while the Fool is marked as 0.

1, the Magician, is in the Bard's hand, for the Hunted Magician is still one of her on-going plans.

2, the High Priestess, is either in Cat's hand or the deck, and will most likely be the final card of the final affray, deciding the game.

3, the Empress, is in the Bard's hand, for Malicia still sits the Tower, the last remnants of the Age of Wonders

5, the Hierophant, is in Cat's hand, whose fate will be decided in the 4th Affray

8, Justice, Bard's hand, to bring ruin to the T&T by the death of the Red Axe

10, the Wheel, is in Bard's hand, a perpetuation of the cycle, and the continuation of the way things have always been

12, the Hanged Man, Bard's hand, for Black is still unaccounted for 13, Death, is in Cat's hand, as her plan is a new beginning for Calernia

14, Temperance, lies also in Cat's hand, with Severance/the Severing showing the way to killing immortals

15, the Devil, is in Bard's hand, for deals that have been struck, and those yet to be made

17, the Stars, Cat's hand, Quartered Seasons, to contain the Fae/Dead King

18, the Moon, Cat's hand, her knowledge of the Story revealing Bard for the monster that she is.

19, the Sun, Bard's hand, the false hopes she has filled the Heroes with, and the "good" they perform at her request

20, Judgement, Cat's hand, with the Sword of Mercy being shown by the Choir that Cat is not the Villain of this tale

21, the World, final card of the deck, to be drawn by Bard but countered by Cat, with the Bard's lies revealed for all to see.

Big Brother

Though fair warning, my meaning of the cards is taken from my dark Tarot deck, not a typical Tarot deck, as I felt the lovecraftian tone of my deck would fit this story better.

Decius

22: Goblinfire

Because whoever wins the game being played with the cards is going to get set on fire.

shikkarasu

Nah, Goblin Fire is 0, the Fool. It excuses you from playing by the rules in French Tarot. (Highest Scoring card, doesn't need to follow suite, you keep the points even if you lose the trick.)

There's a reason Bard chose a game that didn't include it. It is Catherine made cardboard. 😊

Vagabond

Wouldn't you have to keep in mind the numbers for the tally of the game too? So confusing!

beleester

It's a little confusing, because the rules imply that you can put multiple cards into an affray, but they seem to each be playing one and then moving on.

Liliet

Yeah I think that's just them.

Sckarred

From what I'm understanding, the affray doesn't need to be considered done before someone starts another

Liliet

Mhm.

nimelennar

Five affrays, and we've seen three. Battles for the Severance, for Masego, and for the Red Axe.

One affray must surely be a diplomatic one, for the Thief has yet to be played. But what is the fifth, and who shall she play to win it? Herself?

Ninestrings

It would be interesting to see which Major Arcana represents Cat.

The High Priestess?

I assume The Wandering Bard is The Fool .

Mental Mouse

Kinda has to be – the Empress is taken, and the court cards aren't in play here.

Oshi

Nope. Thief isn't part of this. This is purely an arsenal game. I'm waiting to see what the other plays are. Trump cards are Bard's things and Cat always cheats. I'm going to be sad if this is when EE decides to kill someone.

shikkarasu

Don't forget they each have 7 cards. That they can forfeit an Affray to get one back suggests that they can play more than one per affray. The whole game is full of potential for activated Trap Cards.

danh3107

Easily one of the best chapters this whole book, if not the best. Absolutely solid and clever writing.

Tenthyr

Cats rage is so pure. But I hope it doesn't tip over into that villainous tunnel vision the Bard clearly would like— Cat is walking the terribly fine line between icy, ruthless domination and the villain reaching the apex of their power... And making a fateful misstep.

Liliet

I think "love always fucks you over" is quite sufficient setup to make sure she doesn't XD

shikkarasu

She's not Named, yet, so this may count as the first step of her Plan. Doubly so if she gets her Name from winning 3+ Affrays.

Ben Serreau-Raskin

I'm loving this use of an external viewpoint for a chapter about a story duel between two people who are essentially competing for the right to be Calernia's narrator.

erebus42

Or perhaps whether or not Calernia should even have narrator?

Oshi

+1 that right there erebus

caoimhinh

Yeah, and even the name of the game they are playing is fitting.

Affray: "In many legal jurisdictions related to English common law, affray is a public order offense consisting of the fighting of one or more persons in a public place to the terror of ordinary people."

That really describes the fights of the top people in Calernia, like the Bard and Dead King playing continental shatranj with each other.

Liliet

00000 yes n i c e

Ninestrings

Two layers of traitors? it seems wild that the Blessed Artificer would help take out the other traitors only to turn now.

Unless she is a knife aimed at Masego? that would explain why she was practicing blocking his magic earlier...

Liliet

...oh, I didn't realize that might be Adanna. RIP.

I just... dont think so for out of text reasons.

Ninestrings

Not explicitly stated but it was just the two of them, unless whoever it was took her out with literally zero sound.

Archer is sharp, the odds of something sneaking up on her is low, betrayal seems far more likely to land the knife with her.

Liliet

> unless whoever it was took her out with literally zero sound.

we dont happen to have someone like that around do we? 😊

Shveiran

We do, yet that someone is also someone Archer observed closely. To be honest, I kind of assumed Indrani stole a page out of Cat's book here (which is really Black's) and has a plan to kill (and defend against) most people she met.

Didn't Tariq comment along these lines in Book 5, while they were climbing together?

Liliet

oooo let me check ty for the reason to reread that sequence ♥

im guessing you're referring to the part where he comments on how she's ready to kill him personally? he doesnt actually comment on whether it extends to everyone and i dont think the implication is there lol considering his position at that time

Shveiran

Oh, I didn't mean that Indrani has Black's level of "thou has entereth the room and therefore I have seven plus plans and / or contingencies to ensure your demise should it prove necessary ready" paranoia (though is it paranoia if they re out to get you? Discuss) just that she is the type that watches out for ambushes and that knows the allies of today may very well be the enemies of tomorrow.

She had no reason to believe that the folks on her band were always going to be allies, and she knows Cat expects betrayals here, so... I don't know, I feel like Indrani wouldn't get caught with her pants down, especially after seeing the Monk's dagger in NotCat's throat. She's not invincible and I'd not be disappointed too much if her contingency failed, but I'd expect her to have one.

Liliet

Indrani got caught pants down by the Monk's betrayal AND by the fact Concocter actually was in fact collaborating with Bard.

That said, I do agree that after two in a row she'd be more cautious lmao

Dsylexic Wofl

Im assuming we are going by D&D metrics? In which case Her worst stat would be Charisma, as Charisma doesnt dictate how pretty or beautiful you are. Strength and Constitution dictate that. Charisma is essentially your presence, your diplomatic skills as well as your bluffing. Indrani Charisma is her lowest, but not by a lot, she just has high Bluff and Intimidate, instead of Diplomacy.

Liliet

I'm guessing you were trying to reply to another message?

Anyway my estimation of DnD stats for Indrani
Str: 40 (yes dnd doesnt let it go that high but) (Indrani can bench press a rhino. we did math on discord that says that) (from how far her bow can send an arrow) (this is p much lowballing)

Con: UHHH WE'RE ABOUT TO FIND OUT LOL (generally speaking probably 20+ tho cause again martial Named are automatically past normal person abilities)

Dex: 30 (I'm going with a lower estimate than Str only because 30 is already absurd)

Int: 17 (we've all noticed, right?)

Wis: DEPENDS ON HOW WE COUNT but tbh with Drani's general self-awareness and ability to swallow unpleasant truths I'd put this around 17 too

Cha: 14 or so? Note: Charisma also dictates willpower, like the result of a staring contest and shit.

...Yeah, Cha is the dump stat.

Decius

Archer has a plan to kill everyone she meets, but she copied that out of Ranger's book. The fact that Cat copied Black's copy of that same page is part of how they haven't killed each other.

thearpox23

I haven't bothered to make a compilation of which Named are currently in the Arsenal with the notes marking where they currently are, but maybe somebody else can point out which Named is out that has a chance of sneaking up on Archer?

Because Adanna has the opportunity but it would be weird for her to stage the betrayal now, I refuse to believe that a regular person would be able to sneak up on Archer, which leaves either a fae or one of the Named at the Arsenal.

No point in speculating of the fae, but regarding the Named... Haunted Magician? Maddened Keeper? I'm sure I am missing someone.

Liliet

we dont actually know whre the Fallen Monk went

thearpox23

I think that's the one agent we can discount. No way Cat would let him pull that shit twice.

Liliet

I'm not so sure

AceOfSword

We never saw a bidy, it's nit safe to assume that a Named is dead unless you can confirm it.

Catherine faked her death for the fae, she might have had to let the Fallen Monk get away in order to do that: he stabs her, she explodes with night-fire, he avoids the worst of it only getting some burns, there's a charred corpse with a knife in it's neck. The fae think she's dead and go up, the Fallen Monk goes to kill Masego.

Shveiran

I see you point. But if you tried to slay the Black Queen, would you really expect her Swan Song to have no casualties?

As a trick, it works better annihilating the Monk on the spot, is what I'm saying.

Liliet

If you were trying to slay the Black Queen, wouldn't you have prepared a trick to slip out of blast radius instantly?

Shveiran

Well, duh, but I frankly doubt my patron would expect it to work.

My return would make them more dubious about my success, is what I'm saying.

Liliet

I'm pretty sure Fallen Monk is an ideology guy, not a patron having guy.

thearpox23

Liliet, you're missing the most important thing. Even IF the Monk survived his attempt, and even IF he managed to escape in working condition, do you really think Catherine would have left him unattended? I'm not even talking about tailing him through the Arsenal, let's just assume he escaped and covered all his tracks. She already left a body at the crime scene as a message, she'd find a way to let at least Archer know what to be wary off.

Leaving an backstabbing enemy alive so that he can backstab one more time, and that would in turn shift other threads in the story, which would give her an advantage in the end is just not her story. And never against someone like the Bard. I'd expect shit like that from Malicia or Akua(Books 1-3), or maybe even Black. But even they wouldn't dare it against the Bard.

thearpox23

PS: Now that I think about it, I know which character would dare that trick against the Bard.

Dread Emperor Traitorous would absolutely do it, but then... he would also be the traitor, and also I am poisoned.

thearpox23

PPS: "is just not her story" Read 'story' as 'style'.

I know I have many typos, and I try to ignore them, but sometimes I typo something important.
Insert obligatory comment about the need to be able to edit our comments

Liliet

(replying here cause of the depth limit)

Catherine DID leave Archer a warning to be wary of him. That's what the knife in the neck and the fact his body isn't lying around imply when put together.

thearpox23

Missed that. Good catch. Could mean something else, but I'll tentatively give you the 'if X and X and X are true then' it could happen.

Would also mean that Archer missed the message, so good on ya Cat. Screwed that one up.

Liliet

i dont think she did, she was the one saying the knife is a message to her if it was about 'neener neener one of yours was a traitor' Cat could damn well tell her that later

thearpox23

She said it was a message, and concluded that Cat was listening to the interrogation.

If she was thinking Monk was on the loose and still a danger she would have absolutely mentioned it to RogueS team.

So either he isn't a threat, OR Cat didn't leave a message, OR Archer missed the memo.

Liliet

Missed the memo, sounds like.

Probably took it too personally that one of her own was a traitor to realize WHY Cat would be telling her that lmao

Cicero

I took that to be an ambush not a backstab

Liliet

Same

Morgenstern

Second that. She was snooping around where she thought the danger might be...

Sulomund

And now, we wait.

:c

medailyfun

Just noticed the similarity :)))

I'm one of a few survivors
I'm a drawer labelled "lost and found"
Moon travelers and deep sea divers
Whose oxygen supply ran out
Now maybe if their gods be willing They'll give us something, fill our empty cups

Sit down in the boat, don't spill it
Or we'll just have to line back up

And wait
So we wait
We wait
Yes we wait
And we wait
And we wait
We will wait
'Til we

Cardigans "Godspell"

M0och123

This was such a great chapter, OMG.

I bet Cat's trump card is the White Knight.
Some other cards in her hand should be the Hunted Magician and Sve Noc.
Robber? Maybe. (I would love to see Robber appear to blow some things up, goblin style!
Any others?

Also, any ideas as to what cards the Bard has in hand?

Big I

I assume Akua is one of Cat's trumps. The Bard could literally have anything.

SpacyRicochet

"By the way, Robber is a big fan. He wanted you to have this."

As the rest of The Black Queen's hand went flying in The Intercessor's face, a special sharper joined the flicks of paper in the air.

Mental Mouse

The problem is, there aren't enough Trumps in the deck to cover all the characters, we don't even have the court cards here. I think at least we can assume that only those characters present are represented, though DK might yet get a presence in. The Hunted Magician would likely be the Magician, and Sve Noc would probably be the Moon (representing Night).

alele

Given the "take a card back if you declare a loss" as a Chekhov Gun, any guesses on who gets to withdraw and fight again?

domboy

imma guess its betrayal at least from the Bard, and Archer from Cat

Liliet

On Cat's side – Adjutant, possibly. The stakes aren't quite clear on the Christophe thing, it might be that's one Cat can concede without fear.

On Bard's side – oh boy... 😊

Decius

Bard will try to force Cat to make some kind of hard choice about who to save, and then Cat will cheat. Goblinfire will be involved, and it won't technically be Cat's fault.

Hellspirit

This was precisely what I wanted!!!!
Cat and Bard playing out the cards in narrative against each other.

grzecho2222

Bard: "Ha, and what will you do now?"

Cat: Lays five cards.

Bard: "Exodia, uh it's not possible! No one's ever been able to call him!"

Sparsebeard

I still wonder if the DK and Cat aren't somehow still working together, unbeknownst to Cat.

After all, there was a part of the meeting between The Three Amigos missing and I don't think the cost of the war against the DK is above what Cat is ready to pay for her ambitions.

It would also explain why the DK isn't going all out as the Intercessor so aptly remarks.

Liliet

> the cost of the war against the DK that would seem to be half the continent, multiple times worse than the Doom of Liesse, so uh

I don't think so

Sparsebeard

Isn't what's been taken up till now basically what she was gonna offer the DK in order to repel the crusade though.

And Cat pretty much admitted that this war against the DK is necessary to unite the nations of Calernia.

It's a practical guide to evil after all, and if it can help her goals, I'm pretty sure Cat would consider costs (so far) acceptable.

Liliet

Cat was offering this to the DK as a target of invasion that she would then help repel after backstabbing him.

Sparsebeard

Which is pretty much what is happening now.

I'm not saying that Cat would let the DK keep the lost principalities, she needs land for the drow and a victory would help cement the terms.

Doesn't mean that DK and Cat didn't have a chat about screwing the bard over despite fighting each other. DK seems to care a lot more about Bard than the whole alliance while Cat needs the war to make heroes and villains collaborate.

Still, I think narratively, it's pretty clear that the Bard is the main antagonist. I mean, DK was introduced much later and had much less impact on the story.

Liliet

I mean, I think narratively it's pretty clear the plot isn't about either Bard or the Dead King. They're pieces of the puzzle, and the challenge is to assemble it. Bard is notably not out to genocide the continent; that makes her a lesser problem regardless of how early or late in the plot she appeared.

Sparsebeard

The war against the DK is pretty straightforward and all in all, his existence isn't even detrimental to Cat's goals. Quite the contrary in fact since without him the terms would have been much harder to agree to.

The Intercessor on the other hand seems like she absolutely has to go in order for Cat's long term goals to be achieved. And we know the DK also wants her gone.

As for continental genocide... was that even ever truly an option with heroes popping up whenever the continent is truly in danger and using whatever desperate means to triumph?

I mean, ultimately, wasn't even the DK himself the WB's doing?

Defeating the DK seems like a much easier task than getting rid of the Bard. I mean, he's been defeated countless times before and he doesn't NEED to be utterly destroyed, simply pushing him back would suffice.

But frankly, even if we are talking about total destruction, destroying the DK seems harduous and much less important to the plot than destroying the Bard.

Liliet

His existence is detrimental to Cat's goals of

- showing what the new cool unprecedented alliance can do in the form of getting rid of him
- settling the drow
- making the world better by getting rid of him also no his existence is not WB's doing lol it was the opposite – something she failed to prevent

Sparsebeard

Just pushing back the DK would be sufficient to accomplish all those goals. Cat isn't a hero on a quest to eliminate the DK's evil!

On the other hand, the Bard has opposed Cat's designs and been the antagonist of the story countless times:

- Opposed Black
- Manipulated William
- Facilitated Akua's Folly (that thing with the elves fading away)
- Got SoB to put pressure on the crusade and the Prince of Procer
- Got Sabah killed by Champion
- Engineered obstruction and treason with the Band of Five against the DK
- Screwed over the drows
- Tried to influence the free cities but was denied by Hierarch
- Tried to force the Prince of Procer into a Role by initiating a coup

- Organised an attack on the Arsenal
- Etc, etc.

And that's only part of the things WE KNOW ABOUT.

DK on the other hand is this arc's antagonist, but no more than William, Akua, the Sisters, Cordelia, the Fea, etc, were. I mean, we even skipped the first two years of the war to come back just before the Bard enter the fray again.

Liliet

> Cat isn't a hero on a quest to eliminate the DK's evil!

Is she not? :3

Liliet

(meanwhile destroying the Bard is utterly unnecessary)

Shveiran

Sez you, based on nothing substantial.

I'm not saying it's impossible that you are right; it isn't.

But the Bard is a mystery wrapped in an enigma and cloaked in questions. We suspect much, and we know next to nothing; a good proof of this is how wildly opinions on what we do in fact know about the Bard vary wildly.

You want to argue that Bard is not necessarily an enemy? Fine and dandy, it's a perfectly possible theory.

You want to say this is somehow proven or factually based? I'm sorry, but there just isn't any substantial evidence to sustain that.

Liliet

Fair, very fair.

thearpox23

"It's a tired old game, this one," Catherine Foundling said.

"This pretence that you know better, that you are the natural mistress of all our fates and we do offence by pulling our own strings. I'd oppose you for that alone, even if you were all you try to pass for."

"Gods, have I had enough of that," the orphan girl snarled. "This insistence that we don't understand while you don't explain, that we are ignorant when you do not teach, that we are blind when you keep us in the dark. You are not somehow beyond us, you leech. You're not too important, too big to be judged ? not when you spend our lives like coppers. Being old and hard to kill does no exempt you from consequence, and even if it's the last thing I do I will carve the truth of that into your fucking skull."

Represents my sentiments perfectly. Frankly shocking how few stories even touch this attitude, despite having characters acting like the Bard, and those that channel it so well are much fewer still.

It is personally one of my biggest peeves many stories I read, as I absolutely despise the attitude of creatures like the Bard, and when the author does not address it, that majorly alienates me from the story.

Shveiran

The best part, in my opinion, is that this sentiment is channeled through a character like Catherine and not, say, one like Anaxeres.

This frames the attack to direct it at manipulation, puppeteering, profiting from the misery of many and the like while never doubting the need for order, authority, and laws to prevent the world from spiraling into chaos.

For me, attacking the first without sparing the second is cathartic in the moment yet icky in the long run. I keep having all these "yes, but" in my brain that alienates me from the narrative.

The balance is kind of a tricky landing, and this is one of the few stories that I've ever seen sticking it.

thearpox23

Hear, hear. I fear many authors try to place different perspectives into the story, yet fail to fully think them through themselves. So they succeed in putting forth the implications, yet the actual clash is lackluster or absent entirely. And that is enough for most readers, with some works even elevated to great status, because most people don't care to analyze too much.

That said, which other stories have you read that have stuck the balance? Because off the top of my head I cannot think of a single one that does it better. I can think of stories that address it circumstantially, by virtue of good writing, but not directly, not as well.

Shveiran

Sanderson would be my go-to artist for these kinds of themes. Both the Mistborn and the Stormlight saga address the topic of absolutism, delegation, and rebellion with a lot of depth (which is somewhat helped by how long the novels are, but if you're here you likely also see it as a feature and not a bug XD).

Besides him... Well, sir Pratchett did address it in the Watchmen saga, and very eloquently, though I personally didn't like his conclusion much. It splendidly fit the theme of the sagas, but in a vacuum, I feel it's a bit cheating.

thearpox23

Been many years since I read Pratchett! I remember reading him as a kid, never took his philosophizing seriously. Was easy to write it off, because it's such a clown setting. (I guess I also didn't like his conclusions and just focused on the comedy rather than sabotage my own reading experience.) I guess if I read his works again I'd pick up a bunch of stuff I didn't before.

Sanderson was one of the authors I considered, but was never entirely sold on, and then forgot about. All I know is that he's a good writer, addressed many themes, and has long books.

Since we're chatting, can you tell me what the setting, the atmosphere is like and the overall story is about? For example I don't like the Wild West as a setting, or Fallout-esque dystopias, or even stuff that is too bleak and fatalistic. And then you have G.R.R.Martin who makes great characters but is incompetent at world lore, and can't form a coherent story with his own characters to save his life. So I'd like to know what I'd be getting myself into, and I don't mind spoilers if that's relevant at all.

Shveiran

Oh, my, now I have to win you over. Brandon Sanderson is my favorite author, bar none. But I'll try to be at least somewhat impartial here.

Mistborn is a three book saga composed by the Last Empire, the Well of Ascension and the Hero of Ages. (there is also the independent novels set in the world's future, so be careful not to start with those)
The set-up is basically that a man has been ruined by the God King of the evil empire that spans all known lands, but since he is a rogue and not a general, he will stick it to him by robbing him blind rather than leading a rebellion. Sort of.

What follows is an amazing ride that involves a great heist, plans within plans within plans, political intrigue between the noble houses, magic ninjas dueling in the mist above the unsuspecting cities, and one of the best mentor-apprentice relationships I've read. And all that it's just book one. Nay, it's actually the first two-thirds of it, really.

One of the most distinguishing features is the magic system, which, as is the norm for Sanderson, is developed as a small series of clearly defined powers that are measurable, so much so that you know precisely what each one does and what it doesn't, its limits and its functioning. And then you spend three books reading about people using those simple, defined powers and combining them into crazy, mind-blowing combinations that you never saw coming and that you are nevertheless forced to admit make perfect sense.

Long story short: amazing worldbuilding, good plot twists that you don't see coming but feel inevitable after the fact, and characters I'm fond of to this day. I can't recommend it enough: pick up the Last Empire, and you won't regret it. I'm sure of it.

As for Stormlight... oh, boy, it's amazing, but you kinda need to go in trusting the author, because the beginning is... kind of peculiar.

My suggestion is to try Mistborn first, and if you like it, then you can rest assured Stormlight will hook you in as well.

But as a teaser, it has knights wielding superpowered armors and ten-foot long swords, and in a context that forces me, a HEMA enthusiast, to admit that it makes perfect sense in context.

Liliet

Also note: it's possible to really dislike Mistborn but very much like Stormlight Archives.

thearpox23

We both know that is a useless comment to leave, bordering on tautology.

thearpox23

Well, that actually sounds really exciting. I'll probably make it my next big read then. Congrats on being seemingly the only person on the internet capable of selling something they are a fan on, and not just screech "Shut up and read/watch that!".

What about his other books? The guy has like a dozen novels + a bunch of short stories and novellas + a bunch of other novels that aren't counted in the first list for some reason(?).

So far from your post I've gathered that he's got two main fantasy worlds he's working on. Where does of his stuff fall? And how is the quality?

Auston Varner

Regarding the two lists of novels, many of Sanderson's works are set in a shared universe called the Cosmere, where different series take place on different worlds and have different magic systems, but all the magic stems from (kind of) the same source, and some characters can travel between worlds (that's an important but relatively minor detail in Stormlight, pretty much just background info for the rest). His books tend to be divided into Cosmere and non-Cosmere works for that reason

Shveiran

As Auston Varner said.

Also, it should be noted that some of his stuff is meant for a younger audience. Steelheart, Firefight and Calamity are pleasant, but you can tell they are not meant for you. They lack the same punch; I'd say pick them up if you fall in love with the guy like I did, but don't make them a priority read. The same goes for the Rithmatist saga.

As a stand-alone, Warbreaker is pretty neat. I'd recommend it as an author card, though he really shines more when he has more time to develop stuff and character; he is very consistent and always has an endgame plan, so the longer the story goes the more invested you become.

Elantris is also very good... as a first novel. I still enjoyed it, but it is a poor way to judge his skills. It's still got an original setting, interesting characters and a nice plot though, so I'd still recommend it.

Legion is... strange but cool. Much shorter and set in our world, but a very interesting concept. Good fun.

Band of Mourning, Shadows of Self and the Alloy of Law I enjoyed a lot despite my dislike for gunslinging, so that should probably count for something; but admittedly I was hooked the moment I got to find out how Mistborn's world evolved after Well of Ascension. They are novellas set after the Mistborn saga, after the death of the original cast; but yeah, one shouldn't read them before Mistborn, obviously.

Edgedancer is a neat expansion on a minor character of the Stormlight Archive; fun, but... again, it's an extra.

As for quality... well, my own opinion is that it's top notch. Now, I have no way to tell if he somehow pushes all my buttons or he is, objectively, amazing (if objective amazingness even exists) but I never closed one book of his without getting the shivers, and I'd kind of always pick up something of his if given the choice.

Bottom line, no author is for everyone; but for the value it has... if one asks me to recommend a fantasy read, I'll always fall on his bibliography.

thearpox23

Alright, thanks for the listing. I'll be sure to use it as a guide. Who knows, maybe his books will supplant this novel and The Witcher Saga as my favorite novels.

Cicero

One thing I'd say about Brandon Sanderson is that he is consistent and produces good quality books at an amazing rate. Louis L'Amour is only other author I can think of who produced at the rate Sanderson does.

LarsBlitzer

"I fear many authors try to place different perspectives into the story, yet fail to fully think them through themselves."

I think the reason for that happening is mostly because the writer has a specific outcome they want, and following a given initially unconsidered perspective may turn out to be either irrelevant to the narrative, or likely to hijack the story entirely. I suspect that's part of the reason the Game of Thrones TV series is done, while the books are unfinished. The Mountain That Doesn't Write still has some of that "Mereenese Knot" to unravel. He's been lost in the weeds for a while, juggling everything he can. At least he knows one of the possible endings wouldn't be satisfactory. I suppose something along the lines of making the last two or three seasons "A mere Green Dream of what might have been, but now we're down the other leg of the Trousers of Time so we don't have to worry about that, Bran." or similar handwaving. But I digress.

I don't think many writers are better, certainly none that I can think of right now.

thearpox23

G.R.R.Martin's problem is so rare he is almost a unicorn in the field, and shouldn't be used as an example for anything. It takes real skill to create such fleshed out characters, yet be so incompetent at guiding said characters towards an outcome, that he is effectively guiding cats. And then to guide the first cats he makes more cats, and that works for like a chapter or two, but these cats eventually go off on their own as well, creating a never-ending cycle. And then sometimes alpha cats emerge, and start actually guiding the other cats forward, but they usually then get shot for short-term catharsis at the cost of all the cats breaking off on their own again. (I do just really enjoy ragging on Martin, but I'll stop there, before this grows into an essay.)

Can't speak for the second half of the paragraph you wrote, but I will note that I had to reread it around ten times to even get an approximation of your point. I assume you were referencing the GoT TV Show which I haven't watched. Maybe it'd make sense to a fan, but between random name drops, sudden quotes, lack of transitions, or paragraph breaks, it is confusing.

On a serious note though, you seem to confuse fleshing out the competing philosophies and perspectives of the characters with following them around for extended period of the plot. No, you just have to keep solid the parts where they are present in the story, and if their perspective is relevant, give them the opportunity to express and test their convictions. Keep in mind that such things are often central conflicts to the plot; like the clash between order and chaos, or the classic 'what makes a human?' to give two common examples.

The former are often extremely simplistic, and the most frequent failure of the latter is to just (effectively) put humans in robot bodies, have them act as humans, and then pretend that they're AIs and there is any sort of moral quandary to be had.

Or to give another side of this, consider every time a character spouts a plan or a vision that is impractical and can be debunked by two minutes, or when an long-running civilization that was build on such a vision and has existed for over a millennia gets ruined by something that was bound to happen within a decade of its existence. The author is effectively trying to sell you the idea that "Hey, this ridiculous thing Can and Has worked! If only you poor hero haven't acted like a regular human being it wouldn't have completely collapsed on its own!"

It is true that authors usually have different priorities, like character drama, but it doesn't change my point that they don't think fully through the stuff put into the story. It's not about how much of it goes into the story mate, it's about them understanding the subjects they're touching in general.

Javvies

The Game of Thrones TV series was at its best when it was closest to the books. So the early seasons. The further away from the books the show got, the worse the quality of the story got. Might have been a few exceptions, mostly around expanding/amplifying things that happened in the background in the books where there was no PoV, but generally? No.

And once they moved past where the books had covered, they replaced story with visual spectacle.

Don't get me wrong – there were amazing visual spectacles and cinematography ... but tossing story out the window just to make a specific visual spectacle happen? No.

And dragging out and extending the lifespan of certain characters because they're popular with the fanbase. Or whatever the fuck happened with the Dornish.

GRRM screwed up when he ditched the five year gap/ timeskip that was going to be needed for the Essos storylines because most of the Westeros storylines didn't provide for one. Or, rather, some of the critical Westeros storylines wouldn't reasonably allow for one. Specially the Iron Throne-centric storylines, ie Cersei's. Maybe if Kevan Lannister hadn't died, he'd have been able to maintain an uneasy equilibrium in most of Westeros for long enough to get the Essos storylines handled faster.

Still can't comment on a show I haven't watched or care about.

"GRRM screwed up when..."

GRRM screwed up when it became a viable reading strategy to read all the chapters in the book from a single perspective first, then second perspective, et cetera, and miss almost nothing. Or even just skip a couple perspectives entirely. Not kidding when I say I'd actually recommend that and that it'd probably make for a more enjoyable and wholesome reading experience. If you like Dany for example, you can just binge her perspective books 2-5 (dropped series after book 5) and forget the whole Westeros nonsense and be left with a well paced story that doesn't feel lacking.

But his bigger screw-up was bungling the whole main narrative enough that in order to resolve it he keeps introducing important characters/factions/mcguffins not just past book two, but actually with increasing frequency. It is the basics of good storytelling to first introduce your factions, then let them duke it out. Every late-comer should be well set-up, make sense, and not overshadow our main factions that we care about the most. Instead we get an exhausting "let's care about the Dormer now" interruption because pacing isn't a thing. Past a certain point the whole thing starts to feel like a vampire novel where the author goes "You know what, Werewolves ALSO exist. And also Demons exist. And also Angels are a thing. And also Ghosts. And you also have Oriental Mystics. And Mages. And a secret Mason society. And also and also and also..."

The whole five year time skip is frankly a gigantic red herring. It is one of the narrative tools he could have used to direct his story, perhaps not the greatest, but certainly not alone. I maintain that the Red Wedding was the single biggest mistake that Martin made in the series, and put the story cohesion into a death spiral. The chapter itself might've been cathartic, but it'd be like if Erra killed off Cordelia after the Battle of the Camps, and we'd have to have two to three books following individual princes as they run around like headless chickens. Of course it'd only be two to three books if you were to devote full chapter perspectives to each prince for as long as they remained in the game, but you have to structure the plot around your writing style.

Javvies

Not having watched the show means you didn't miss anything. IMO.

I admit, I never bothered to watch the final season. They'd gone too far off the rails and totally abandoned story and internal consistency by the time I couldn't force myself to continue watching. IMO.

True, the ever expanding list of characters and factions and agendas is a major issue. Some of it is acceptable, ie, can't really introduce anything in Slaver's Bay until somebody gets there or is gathering information about the place in anticipation of going there.

Also, I'm pretty sure that he's massively underestimating how much story there is to go. Especially since the battles of Mereen and the Lake were supposedly supposed to fit into the end of Dance, and will now have to be shoehorned into the beginning of Winds. Plus he's dumped Dany back into the hands of the Dothraki, so her story isn't going anywhere fast (on the other hand, maybe by the time she gets back to Slaver's Bay, there won't be anything left to keep her there).

You think the Red Wedding was his biggest mistake? That's ... probably controversial. What about it do you think makes it's his biggest mistake?

thearpox23

Biggest single mistake if we're talking about specific events, and yes, I know it's controversial, and that's because standalone the chapter is really good. I already mostly explained why. When you have kingdom-size narrative-driven story, you are relying on a few strong and interesting personalities to drive your narrative. Every time you remove one of them the focus either shifts to the other main characters, or you need some secondary character(s) to fill the shoes. Either way it is a narrative shift.

The first one was Ned's death, which kicked off the civil war, and set-up the picture of the conflict. Another was the death of the Khan, which let Dany take over the mongol horde.

The difference with the Red Wedding and later Lannister nonsense is that instead of setting up the conflict they fragmented it, making the situation hard to follow, indescribable in just several sentences, and most importantly leaving it without any charismatic figureheads for us to care about. The second most prominent army was left without a single character attached to it, and several still alive characters attached to it now split apart from it, giving us yet another thread to keep track of.

Before the event the story was mostly cohesive: with the Starks on the one side of the civil war, Lannisters on the other, the Wall and the Dorthraki to the sides, and several other houses staying on the sidelines for the time being. But after the event the so-called opposing factions were essentially split entirely. I have already mentioned that it's possible to read only chapters for a single location and miss very little, but it was the Red Wedding that fully drove that spike. You could no longer say 'If Dany were to go north right now she'd join up with the main event,' because the main event no longer exists.

Every parallel narrative is interesting to read for two reasons. The first is because we care about the parallel narrative for its own merits, and the second for how it is/will connect to the main story once they join back up. Once you destroy the main theater of action you greatly sabotage the second reason.

In many real world wars, and in fact with every conflict in the Guide, each faction rep. could harbor the optimism that 'If we defeat Cat/Black/Procer here and here we'll be able to get the advantage, cement our position here, and then push on to win the war.' Past the Red Wedding that line of thought is absent in the books, and so the main conflict loses its luster as well. We now have to care for the individual local struggles more because there is nothing to care about with the main event.

I hope you're satisfied with my explanation. I don't exactly hang around on GoT forums so I don't know how common of a sentiment that is. But one final thing "I'm pretty sure that he's massively underestimating how much story there is to go." I have already told you that he is herding cats. To understand what is going on, you have to get that into your brain. Whenever Martin imagines how much there is for him to write, it ends up being little more than a suggestion for his independent and willful clowder.

Javvies

Yeah, I can see where you're coming from with that.

I'm not sure I entirely agree. Or that I entirely disagree.

It is, unquestionably a pivotal moment.

On the one hand, it sure looks like it could be one hell of a mistake looking back in from the quagmire he seems to have written himself into. Offing Robb in the Red Wedding shortstops anywhere he was going, and left the Lannisters without ongoing overt opposition in Westeros, other than the largely ineffective Ironborn, and Stannis who hasn't managed to get much done since Renly died.

On the other hand ... I think that the intention of the Red Wedding, and its consequences, was to set things up for later, and delay others.

I'm not yet ready to commit on the Red Wedding having been the single biggest mistake he's made – there's too much story left, too many balls set into motion by the Red Wedding and it's consequences.

And part of the problem might be the way that things are dragging so long. The long delay between books definitely hasn't helped.

thearpox23

I can understand that the pivotal moment was not entirely without purpose, setting up certain things and delaying others as you said. All the same there is a giant question mark of whether the story even needed a pivotal moment anywhere near there. The event may have happened early compared to what has already been written, but the brick of text before it wasn't short. At what point do you have to start delivering on the things you set up already instead of setting up things even more. Even if some of the balls set into motion by the event eventually pay off, there is still the opportunity cost to account for.

As it is, it was the most prominent point for my gradual loss of interest in the saga, ending with me dropping the series after book five.

You are entirely correct that the things dragging on and the delay is a part of the problem, and for my side I feel entirely justified to judge an event twenty-odd years and several brick-sized tomes after its publishing. Writer's block or not, I am not an Ent or an Elf to consider two decades a passing breeze.

And while I respect your decision to hold your opinion, I do encourage you to consider the opportunity cost for any payoff in your final judgement.

dadycool

It's a somewhat classic Revolution Aftermath type of story. Sure, the wicked monarch has been overthrown by the Hero, but what'll happen to the kingdom and its people now that the central order has been removed? The power-vacuum alone would decimate everyone.

Thankfully, Cat understands this and has been preparing for her own absence and the other "What comes next" stuff, like the T&T.

thearpox23

This series dealt with the Revolution Aftermath type of story as well, more so in the first few volumes, but that's really not the type of conflict at play in this instance. The wicked monarch, tyrant, emperor or whatever have legal worldly authority they have obtained via generally conventional means.

The Bard holds no crown, has no claim on anything, and at most can sometimes hold up a badge as an emissary of the gods above or below. But it isn't even a rebellion against the gods, just against a tool of theirs. The only things enabling the Bard are her abilities and experience, and her entire skill-set centers on the removal of agency, whereas the above-mentioned tyrant is focused on achieving their own goals, and the issue with them is just their abuse of their authority.

Winning against the Bard is no revolution or even any change on its own, it would merely ease the changes that would come. That Cat has already envisioned the Liesse Accords is great and will open a new age, but that is the reason why Bard is so hostile towards her, not the other way around. The Liesse Accords are not a way for Cat to maintain civilization past Bard's passing, but rather it is the Bard herself putting herself forward as the enemy because the Liesse Accords are show the agency she cannot bear.

If you want an example of a type of a story where such a character is not done well, and which probably inspired this whole examination: Pick any story where a character taunts the protagonist, mock him, and gives out fragments of information while behaving as if the protagonist has no agency. Then the protagonist acts exactly as the character predicted and the thing acts all smug about it. No, it then revealing it was all part of its master plan and getting beaten in a boss battle does not address the issue. Or if the story is different it becomes a companion/friend and the whole thing is forgotten without any self-reflection or an insulting "Sorry about that, but it was all for your own good and it's in the past so let's move on now."

Liliet

Ooof yeah.

Who else didn't like Howl's Moving Castle: the book?

thearpox23

I only watched the anime, which like all Miyazaki's works, was a triumph of style over function, along with having so many trope similarities with all his other movies I didn't believe at first it wasn't his original work. Also the second half was a mess.

So what's the deal with the book?

Liliet

Basically the entire plot is a conspiracy behind the protagonist's back with implication that her worries, concerns and fears were stupid/silly because see, all these people were secretly on her side and perfectly okay all along! You know, secretly.

thearpox23

TO BE FAIR, some women(men as well(?who?)) find that hot FOR THEIR OWN REASONS WHICH I RESPECT. Damn, I would rage if it didn't have an appropriate tag and I read it by accident. Stuff like this is why fan-fictions are a thing.

Juniper

Ah... the book came first, by Diana Wynne Jones. They made a movie out of the book.

Liliet

Revolution Aftermath is Black's entire story since he won his civil war 😊

Liliet

AGREED 100%

Mental Mouse

Except the abyss below that is named Hubris.

Juff

Typo Thread:

spirit," the > spirit." The Cards about > Cards are about Carrion's Lord > Carrion Lord's you?" the > you?" The game," the > game." The is it?" the > is it?" The down that they > down before they gaggled > gaggle trough > through her struck > he struck been open > been opened do it," > do it."
forged in a Lycaonese forge (maybe reword one of the forges) sixty in whole (maybe remove "in whole" as it's repeated in the next sentence) shorn > shear
what thee > what the them an annihilation > them and annihilation Tyrant of the Augur > Tyrant and the Augur does no exempt > does not exempt the near the > near the saw way > same way

Anomandris

I know people have had this thought before, but Gods, this story is so Malazanesque. And that's the highest praise I can give to any Fantasy.

A reading from the Deck of Dragons, anyone?

caoimhinh

Oh, and the older version of Affray used clay tablets so... they were Tiles, no?

That's quite a reference right there.

AceOfSword

And the chapter is called "set them up" which is usually followed by "knock them down". Makes me wonder if the original game of Affray had anything involving the clay tablets knocking each other down. That could give an entirely new dimension to the fact that you can remove one when you concede a loss. Taking away a tile could stop the chain reaction.

Frivolous

The Emperor of all Major Arcana representing Hakram? Not what I expected. The Emperor is the card of the master, whereas Hakram is the Adjutant.

I found the last section very intriguing. Cat 'ransacked a shatranj board' while the Intercessor 'filled with half a dozen decks of cards'.

The implication is that the Intercessor is playing cards while Cat is playing shatranj. I hope that means that Cat is not playing the game the Intercessor thinks she's playing.

I dearly hope that means Cat is fooling and out-maneuvering the Intercessor.

Oshi

Authority, establishment, structure, a father figure

That's the classical meaning. Hakram is a symbol of all that and her lessons from her father in trusting love.

Liliet

Cat even says "he fixes things" which is also Amadeus's theme.

Dome Zasrekh

When did Cat ever play the game others were expecting?

Decius

Fighting in the pit.

In the war school games she cheated at the same game everyone else was playing.

AceOfSword

Cat has said several times that Hakram is a prince among men though.

Also knowing Cat, who wouldn't be surprised if she actually has shatranj pieces on her that she's planning to use in the game?
Raises hand

beleester

Cat isn't that good at shatranj, actually – her game against the Tyrant consisted of her cheating like the dickens and still losing, and then blowing up the board in response.

Liliet

She doesn't need to be good at shatranj if the game is affray. Really now.

Decius

Both of them know that the game that they are playing is only a interlude to the fight that they will have.

Liliet

Raises hand

JJR

Raises hand

I'm thinking, one of Bard's limitations is that she can only work through Named (with some wiggle room). The cards up her sleeve are probably all the Named that she has secretly working for her in the Arsenal (possibly some of them represent the fae too).

Cat has no such limitation, and if you ransack a Shatranj board one thing that you'll get is a LOT of pawns. The ordinary, not doom driven, mortals who live and work in the Arsenal. I think Cat's plan is ultimately to move the game to a field the Bard can't reach directly, the hearts and minds of the unnamed.

Liliet

Note that Kingfisher Prince is currently up against mortals... I don't think Bard really has that limitation 😡

JJR

He is, but I don't think that the card Bard played refers to them. "The Red Axe slain in blind revenge." Sounds more like some villain is going to show up and try to kill Red Axe to avenge the villain that she killed.

There's a couple other instances of her meddling with non-named too. Both Black and Cat got a visit despite not having Names anymore. But they were former Named and both still had a great deal of narrative weight behind them.

This game will probably out the truth one way or the other. I think it will be, "I know your weakness." Though it might be, "I am not left handed."

Do0d

When Bard spoke to Amadeus when he was a captive, wasn't she acting as the Intercessor ? And wasn't he a claimant already ?

Liliet

There is not a clear division of her 'acting as Intercessor' and not.

Do0d

I thought she was able to meet the sisters (who were not Named) because she was acting in her role as intercessor for the purpose of offering them the deal.

Liliet

I think she always acts as the Intercessor is the thing, be it by bringing people offers or joining bands. Ultimately the mechanic "is the story weight enough to anchor her here" is the same.

Do0d

From the scene and what Bard says, I believe that the Named Bard acted on is the Red Axe herself. Furthermore I would posit that she was to be slain by a mundane soldier blindly avenging a friend she killed while escaping.

Adrian_V

So who just stabbed Archer? I doubt is Artificer by this point. Maybe it was the Hunted Magician, we don't know enough to discard the use of knives by him and being saved from Autumn may be enough to goad him.

Oshi

She put down a card for betrayal remember. Someone got stabbed by I'm guessing the Hunted Magician or something like that.

Liliet

Fallen Monk might have had enough smarts to leg it immediately after stabbing Cat.

Zggt

Welp, this is going more or less as expected so far... except the twist of The Girl that Climbed the Tower. I guess it's time to dive into that song a bit deeper, and how it is going to work out. On the surface, it's a song about becoming the Dread Empress. That being said, the second layer of this story is that it's not talking about the actual Tower, but about what it represents to the Girl; she does not actually have to grasp the physical tower to become a what a Dread Empress represents: the strongest of her realm. As such, it can be seen as a song about the combination of self-actualization and maturation going hand in hand.

The metaphor of the first phase is pretty straightforward. You must first give up your delusions and lies you tell yourself. If one of your motivations is helping people and the other is to survive, and your survival is a higher priority, you will be forced to make choices that prove that. If you climb for revenge, you will have to set aside everything else. If you are on the path to self actualization, this test is inevitable. Both the literal and metaphorical fires aplenty, literal and metaphorical killings of and removals of parts of herself, and culminating in willingly giving up her power to the Crows.

In the second verse things get a lot more complicated. The restless dead can mean a lot here. The first thing is the most literal; corpses (restless meaning they'd be uncomfortable with this) and walking under them when they are buried, and that the longest part is in essence going underground. In this case, Cat checked this box of literal interpretation plenty of times, but the clearest case is with the Drow.

The next meaning for restless dead is those that have died without actualization; in this case it could mean that here she is still below those who have tried and failed in their life, and as such the girl in the poem must understand what each one actually did accomplish, why they failed, and the such. What it means is that you must learn not only from your successes and mistakes, but from those of others. It boils down to a message of learning wisdom once you have let go of your lies. In many ways, Catherine is still in the process here, but you could argue that on the learning from successes and mistakes of others she's already swimming in that like a fish through water.

Another important meaning for the restless dead here is those that are yet to die in her service or under her rule before she achieves her actualization. This is surprisingly a more common metaphor when analyzing Eastern poetry, but it fits so nicely here. The metaphor is that the stepping stones for climbing the ladder are the those that died for her rise. That she must carry the weight of their lives, of their futures, on her back, to understand the weight of the trust people put in her. As such, her duty must become above herself.

The combination of meanings of the second verse combines in a lot of different ways. If the first part of the path to actualization requires removing your delusions, then the second part requires changing yourself for what you want and reach a balance which you can live with. The second part in this case is a metaphor for the teen years early adulthood, or when pushed to the extreme of rising to the peak of what you can, is a process that will take the rest of your life.

Now we reach the third step. We return to less amorphous and more direct meanings here. The meeting under a full moon here implies a want of privacy from others and the want of them to see each other. The romantic interpretation (using the words love and kiss) and a knife in the back as a reward for trust is pretty clear. The next one is a private meeting with a ally, rewarded by betrayal and death. Finally there is also the inverted meaning of each, that the Girl is the traitor, that the Girl did the stabbing. It means understanding both sides of this confrontation.

The death here is personal, meaning that the breach of trust forced a complete reevaluation of the self. On a personal level, most people go through some form of this and it is one of the sad parts about growing up and learning that you need to protect yourself. It's also about admitting to yourself that you were on both sides of important issues.

The final step is actually claiming the actualization. But in essence, who you were before this process is already gone. You had to change enough until what you were before becoming the Dread Empress is now well and truly gone. You can make the case that Black's usage of her checks this box, and she quite literally stabbed him for that. But on the other hand you could say that either Adjutant against her wishes will die for her success (which would actually hurt her in a way that might be worse for her than Captain's death to Black, if we look at the Bard's methodology), or Archer will betray her trust completely (which the Bard, by playing on her love of Masego, might be able to achieve), or something of that scale may already be happening. Also, Akua's shocking but inevitable betrayal.

The thing with these metaphors is that you can pin each one on major events that fit through certain interpretations. While the first two steps are well and truly under her belt through and through, the third still doesn't have something that you can cap it off and say "nailed it" quite as clearly as the other two, though her dealing with the Winter Court and Akua are pretty close. Which might be taken to mean that what we are witnessing is a strike which will burn out whatever is left of Cat from before meeting Black.

That being said, it does not imply that the Bard wins. Nor does it imply that Cat will regret it. On the contrary, it means that Bard's plans which are already in motion may be the thing that turns Cat from the Black Queen into something utterly horrifying like Triumphant (though to be fair, Cat probably won't; she isn't a win-at-all-costs person, though this may change soon). The Bard really didn't like it when Cat named this specific song, meaning that she recognized that Cat has a way out of here that continues her rise at the very least.

thearpox23

Mate, Cat lied about the song.

Zggt

Yeah, I know. I can say "it's basically the recipe Below gave for success just as much as the Book of All Things is that for Above", and that Cat used this to in essence say "bitch, I don't need your cooperation to win, you want to forge someone greater than Malicia and the Dead King combined then I'm willing to pay the price". Which is probably the sword option in Cat's version of diplomacy, now all that's left is the horrible drink option for the Bard to swallow down.

But really, I've been itching to do a deep dive into something poetic of the story and this just felt like a time I could and remain kinda in context, and really, all we have interesting about foxes in the context of Cat is Winter's metaphor of the fox willing to chew off its own leg to free itself from a trap, and I could probably scrounge up only 2-3 paragraphs on that one without really reaching.

Liliet

I really like your analysis! You wouldn't happen to feel like posting it on the subreddit, would you?

That said, I think Cat's choice of the song is only that it's the other one of the clearly-mystically-significant two.

thearpox23

"Cat used this to in essence say "bitch, I don't need your cooperation to win...."

No one is so much as considering cooperation or even referring to it. The two are already irreconcilable, both know it, Cat simply reaffirmed it once again. As far as their dialogue, the Bard is trying to destabilize Cat through many layers of sophistry, and Cat is trying to mislead the Bard about herself while also venting. There is no proverbial wine Cat brought to this table, or at least I have yet to see any. Not that she won't make an offer that'd require the Bard to concede a core part of her identity, but the thought that the Bard will bend has not yet been a consideration in this story.

By lying about the song Cat either tried to deceive the Bard about the tactics she would use to oppose her. Either by banking on the cultural divide between Callow and Praes, or by banking on the divide between 'Outwit' (Or make the campaign too costly) and 'Replace'. Humming different themes would naturally cause Cat's tactics to be different, although in what way that difference would show I am yet uncertain. I'd probably have to reread the entire arc to figure that one out.

Mental Mouse

Also, strangely enough it's the Bard bringing the literal jug and figurative sword to this table.

Jesse Coombs

The bard asked her what song haunts her. Cat was answering that question not telling the bard which song she had stuck in her head. Cat could get away with this even while she was functionally fae.

Konstantin von Karstein

Cat lied, the song in her head was that about the fox.

Jesse Coombs

She didn't lie. The bard asked what song haunted her. Cat answered. She could get away with that even when she was fae and literally unable to knowingly lie. It is a song that has haunted her.

"A shiver went through me as he rose to his feet. He knew the song. Gods Below, he knew the song. Two years that question of where I knew it from had plagued me." – Book II, Chapter 49

Dome Zasrekh

I don't think Akua will betray Cat, the best part of her character is that she has been the villain and now knows better. I think it will be shocking to most people that she won't fall back to her past self.

Zggt

I'm really hoping she'll have her redemption arc complete, showing that even those of the most traitorous and wicked of origins can be redeemed... but too many people know about this story option, Cat's giving her a lot of trust and power over time, and Akua's life was built in the shape of a knife in the back. I'd like to think that her transition to Above would be the ultimate show that they are of the same cloth, but just because of that there are so many forces that won't allow it to happen... so I think it's knife in the back still, though one more aware than before (which is a massive step from "mustache twirling villain of evilness" towards "redeemed", but not nearly there yet). Or we could actually see her redemption arc about her realizing her loyalty to Cat is real and the story of the Girl Who Climbed the Tower becomes about her finally having what it takes to be Empress with that realization, and that be her redemption arc. Or she could be the one to stab Cat in the back, the trust rewarded with a deal between her and the Bard/Malicia.

Whatever is going on with her has got to be one of the biggest question marks in the story now.

Liliet

I think Akua's arc has been laid out clear as water in books 3-4, with book 5 giving us cursory glances confirming that that's still happening and book 6 giving a glimpse of confirmed continuation (the choice of black swan as a form).

mamm0nn

Personally I think she chose the swan over the choices like the dead-crow whatever that Cat assumed, because swans are pretty and crows are not. She's still Akua, the symbolism might've just been a convenient addition to a choice that came down to 'It's pretty, black and can fly.'

Liliet

I mean, there were uh. A lot of options there. That were not a swan.

Big I

So I'm guessing that the Rogue Sorcerer and the Concoctor were sent to back up the Mirror Knight, which would bring them back up to five if we ignore the Maddened Keeper. Suspiciously no mention of her this chapter.

Presumably the next chapter will be titled "Knock Them Down".

ninegardens

>"Cards are unfair," the Intercessor said. "Cards about luck and lies, and sometimes there's simply no way to win."

>"That usually means you're not playing the right game," the Carrion's Lord apprentice replied.

>"I'd say it's about time to get started in earnest, isn't it?" the Black Queen said, smiling the smile of a woman who'd ransacked a shatranj board before coming there.

>"I couldn't agree more," the Intercessor said, smiling the smile of someone whose sleeves were filled with half a dozen decks of cards.

Can't help but feel like these are interlinked. Hint being that Bard prepared for the "correct" game before coming, and Black queen the wrong one... but who that advantages/disadvantages is unclear.

Also:

I do like WB argument that Cat's war isn't WORKING, that it isn't ENOUGH... and the argument sounds ever so reasonable.... until you remember that Bard is setting fire to a bunch of their plans rather than HELPING them.

Also also; Hunted magician. Clearly a card that Bard was planning to play/use... but Cat knows about him, and has fairy powers, so what side is he going to come down on?

Is he the one who stabbed Archer? Seems likely that he would be one of the ones with access to the wards that could go for Masego, and that Bard might have offered him escape in exchange for his service.....

Or potentially he is still in Cat's service, in one way or another... Hmmmmmm...

Liliet

> Hint being that Bard prepared for the "correct" game before coming, and Black queen the wrong one...

Nah mate, it's the Bard who prepared for the wrong one 😊

I love Catherine "fucking meme" Foundling who cheats at cards by using chess pieces.

dadycool

I stand at the precipice of anticipation. So much back-and-forth. Fortunately, there's nothing resembling equal rivalry here, which means Cat's exactly where she wants to be: on one knee, blood-covered face tilted upward at a superior opponent, spitting venom with a growing grin as she rocks herself onto her feet with a second wind in her breath.

Liliet

YUP

LarsBlitzer

Well, "Struggle" was one of her aspects when she was the Squire, so the parts of herself that call to it are still there.

dadycoool

From what I remember from in-story explanations, Aspects are extensions and magnifications of the Name and Named. She developed Struggle because that's who she is and she developed Learn because she was Squire, a student-type Name. Later, as Squire II, I remember Black talking about how anything she can't Take, she would Break, giving her two personality-based Aspects. When she lost Learn, she remarked to herself that things were easier to learn when she had it, but for example, she's essentially been 'Taking' everyone she's spent more than five minutes with, as Hanno mentioned during their clandestine night-meetings. And when he didn't allow himself to be Taken, he was Broken, to some degree.

Wonder

I have just been Wondering, are they in some metaphysical astral plane where they have like chessboard vision looking vdown at their story pieces?

If Cat becomes Dread Empress Losara may she always resurrect, does that make Adjutant's Name grow into Chancellor?

Is it a Chancellor's bane to always back stab their Dread Empresses?

Dome Zasrekh

That is just a mold, and you know the fate of those!

Big I

Cat told the Pilgrim that if she became Empress her name would be Victorious. And I'd say Chancellors don't always have to betray their Empress since Malicia seriously considered becoming Black's Chancellor.

ohJohN

right, and their relationship is strong to this day! no yawning chasm of divergent goals and broken trust lies between them, no siree

Shveiran

Well, nothing lasts forever... 40+ years in a stressful job are not bad as a track record, honestly. It's far more than what most people ever experience. It's far longer than the Augur/Cordelia "I'll always trust you" thing, for instance. Or Cat/Hakram. 5 years in, Black/Malicia had no wrinkle in their partnership either, did they?

But also... if we are discussing Name traps, "considered becoming" is really not quite the same as "was" the Chancellor.

sengachi

"You're not too important, too big to be judged-"

Damn if that isn't part of the soul of the story right there. No one is too big or important to be judged. Not even the emissary of the Gods, not even the Gods themselves.

Letouriste

Anaxares is the soul of the story then?

ninegardens

Tyrant is the soul. Anaxares is the Thematically shapped cudgel that Tyrant used to beat the story into submission.

Burlyraven

One thing I'm noticing, is all the names the Bard and Cat are being identified by. This is very likely the story that finally cements Cat's Name, and the Trickster versus the god/old one/etc is an old story.

The Bard being identified as the trickster already is slightly concerning, but two Tricksters in an immortal duel is another fantastic old story.

Zoe

I was noticing that too! I wonder if the different names represent the way that different potential/unformed stories are swirling round in this encounter, ready to take shape. 'Scruffy trickster against mighty queen' is a story with very different paths to 'plucky orphan against ancient monster' and Cat and the Bard will both be trying to manipulate that.

Liliet

Oooo nice

Dread Emperor Ridiculous

Ever notice how much 'Intercessor' sounds like 'interloper'?

Clmineith

I think Archer made a mistake when she took Artificer, who has a grudge against Hierophant, to save Hierophant.

And now I wonder if that grudge, that we don't know because Cat never took time for it, is not the Bard doing.

And if it was not Cat's mistake to not take enough time to speak with Artificer about it.

Liliet

Bard def contributed to the crack there, but Indrani is implied to have seen something surprising, that she would have reacted to if she had the time, before being knifed. And Adanna was supposed to be behind her.

Liliet

(I think Bard exploited Name-induced hostility that Masego identified by feeding Artificer hints about Masego being up to something wicked, but it wasn't enough to turn her, just enough to stir the pot)

ninegardens

^This.

Seems like Bard probably was setting up like... 15 people on "path to betrayal". Some of those worked, some of them didn't... and some of them probably would have worked EVENTUALLY, if this whole mess hadn't been triggered already.

pedant

I think you meant Tarot Minor Arcana? Minor Arcana are numbered cards (precursors to modern playing cards). Major Arcana cards are Names.

Javvies

Huh.

Somebody managed to stick a knife in Archer by surprise. She's not going to be happy about that.

But the stabber is probably working with someone else – one from the Arsenal to provide access, one from presumably Archer's roving group to provide muscle.

Not enough info to put Names to these traitors yet.
Could also be a more subtle Fae. In that case, they probably are trying to leverage Hunted Magician's debt to them to gain access. But he'd probably be slow walking it trying to buy time.

Rogue Sorcerer and Concocter are likely en route to Severance, which should also contribute to spiking Bard's play with Mirror Knight.

I really want to see how Tariq reacts when he finds out about all this and that Bard was behind it. And I want Cat to rub his face into Bard's untrustworthiness with a massive "I told you so". I also wonder what would happen if Hanno flipped the Judgement Coin on Bard.

Bard and Cat are playing different games. It's to be expected that Bard cheats at cards. Question is, will Cat's ability to be playing a different game overcome Bard's card tricks, and at what cost?

ActionKermit

Why do I get the feeling that the Bard set up this exchange literally just to get Cat to tell her the plan so it can be countered?

Liliet

Cat's not telling her the plan, she's illustrating it as it happens, and Bard could see that much anyway.

Anonymous

You know, the "Set them up -> knock them down" naming convention combined with this card game and chess game theming leaves me feeling that we're not far off from Zap Brannigan's tortured mixed metaphors like "If we hit that bullseye, the rest of the dominoes will fall like a house of cards. Checkmate."

Liliet

That's just Cat playing board games.

Captain Amazing

Kingfisher's description of Cat's socio-politics was oddly adorable. It's one of the most amusing ways I've heard to say "champion of the poor". Probably from her orcish influence :D. The Bard is definitely in a villain guise for this. Bard mentioned that when she's a villain she does what is necessary when she tried to murder Catherine after the Prince's Graveyard. The fisherman comment confirms the chapter title metaphor referred to Cat's success and not the inevitability of fate. The "tides" part refers to a Dread Empress' last words. Something like "Ours is the tide that will drown Creation. With each madman we get a little bit closer." right before the Queen of Blades kills her and brings down the Tower.

I think the fifth one has the Bard trying to reveal the mental influence she has from the Arcadia echo only to be countered by the Doddering Sage. Bard then sacrifices every losing fight to ram home her head-fuckery. No idea how Catherine responds.

Liliet

Oh nice!

Liliet

(I also love how he drew that conclusion from Cordelia's diplomacy-speak and how it ended up meaning that the presence of Callowans means there is no way the Queen of Callow is behind this) (logic!)

beleester

If the point values of the Arcana are the same as in our world, then Cat's losing all three Affrays:

Strength (8) vs The Emperor (4)

The Tower (16) vs The Chariot (7)

The Hermit (9) vs The Lovers (6)

There are still more cards to play, of course, but it's not a great start. As the Bard mentions, sometimes you just don't get the cards you need.

(Come to think of it, I think every time Catherine has played a game with her current nemesis she's lost. There's probably some symbolism there.)

Eternal Payne

Perhaps this is where Cat's Shatranj gives her the upper hand? It doesn't matter what the strength of the cards says, under Shatranj rules the attacking piece always wins.

Noldo

Wouldn't those values mean that if Cat would cede the Sword, it would give Cat enough points to play in order to save Masego by playing Emperor (Adjutant) to that pile? Or am I reading the rules wrong?

mamm0nn

Bard: For the fourth stack, I play the Magician card to summon the Haunted Magician, for he-

Cat: The Twins.

Bard: That card isn't even in the deck...

Cat: Don't care, this is about him sleeping with at least two women now.

Somewhere nearby

Haunted Magician: Yes, soon my plans will come to fruit- Gets boner, loses focus and with a shudder he suddenly feels like both his lovers are converging to his location.

Back at the table

Bard: ...

Bard: Well, th-

Cat: The fifth stack will be the Sinister Physician.

Bard: What's the symbolism?

Cat: Don't know, don't care. I played him.

Bard: Then I concede that deck so that I can-

Cat: Can't. You haven't played a card on that deck yet, so you can't withdraw one from it either. Thus, you cannot collapse that deck yet.

Bard: Fine, I'll leave it for now. Back to the first stack, I play the World for your precious Lieutenant is buried in more fey than he can deal with by stamina alone.

Cat: I play Death.

Bard: Oh, so you admit that you're dealing with the Dead King and are wil-

Cat: Nope.

Bard: Then pray tell, who else can fill that card's symbolism?

Elsewhere

Mirror Knight: Stay behind me! One way or another we will persev-

Zombie IV cool-aid's through the wall

Table again

Bard: I feel like you're not taking this serious.

Cat (who was drunk already, and the Ashuran haralm didn't help): You given me the power to make people appear and do stuff by playing some cards, and you think I'm going to play by hiccup your rules?

Bard: Well I-

Cat: I cast fist. Stabs Bard's deck-holding hand to the table

dadycoool

Oh, yeah. she is at this point borderline blackout drunk. Really, it's Bard's own fault for trying to play a semi-logical game against someone who can't be logical at the moment and never cared about the rules in the first place except for knowing how best to break them.

AceOfSword

"I cast fist!" Proceed to stab opponent

I love everything about this. But especially that bit.

FabulusFab

Something is bothering me. Cat currently is not Named, she is about to be again but not yet. So how come the Bard can interact with her ? Is it because she was Named ? And all previously Named character is fair game for the Bard (that means also Black). Because the Bard talked to Black when she informed him he was not the Black Knight anymore. Or is it because she has the potential to be the next Intercessor and in that case the Bard is allowed to sort of "coach" her ? When Cordelia had a budding Name, the Bard did not talk to her but to the Augur.

mamm0nn

Former Names are probably still with potential and Story weight. It might not be that Bard can only act towards and see Names rather than Providence and the Story, and we've seen that Black and Cat are by no stretch of the imagination excluded from that after they lost their Names. So them being important in a way that pivots and weaves the story strings can be what she needs, the Bard => Names might be a simplification or misinterpretation from that.

And we don't know for sure that she couldn't converse with Cordelia. She's not able to teleport around at will to wherever she wants to be whenever she wants to be. She's still bound to rules regarding to that, and it has been firmly established that there's no such thing like true teleportation, both somewhere in books 1 and 2. She was trapped by Augur using a few ritual, not expecting her to 'betray' the Bard and her expectations for she didn't yet know that Augur was against her at that point.

mamm0nn

*Fey ritual

Xinci

So just a sidenote, I am surprised no one else was interested in Cat more or less telling us that Fortitude as a Choir may have once just been Strength. Which does kinda imply the Choirs change over time to match virtues, similar to Names?

ninegardens

It was Cat saying that the Tarot card "Strength" used to be called "Fortitude". It's not the choir whose name has drift, they stay the same, its the name of the tarot deck.

ninegardens

Also, can I just say how beautiful and tragic the characterization of the mirror knight is here?

Like, it's repeatedly mentioned how indestructible he is, but just the realization of what that means, of how many times he must have been the last one standing, with all his allies dead, of the weight of survivors' guilt, and the fact that HE KNOWS he isn't smart enough, or good enough, or wise enough. All he has is the fact that he is hard to kill, and severance gives him a chance to USE that... though the consequences be ruin. Hell, you can't even hate him for that- that one is just entirely reasonable.

Liliet

There's also the sheer isolation.

His internal monologue is so far off on how everyone else thinks, it sounds like he hasn't had an actual conversation with another Named approximately since he first got his Name, also known as "ever" 😡

(No, hate-flirting doesn't count as an actual conversation)

Aranaya

A card was put down on the table, smoothly but without gentleness. Grey-clad and tanned, bearing a lantern and a staff: the Hermit.

I have to admit I'm confused why the card standing for Hierophant is Hermit, rather than, well, Hierophant.

Mental Mouse

The Hierophant card would indicate the keeper and guardian of the Mysteries, and that's not how Zeze rolls. The Hermit card indicates the solitary seeker after truth, which is more what he's about.

Interlude: Knock Them Down

*"The henhouse stands unlatched
All within, by the fox snatched
So here they go, once again
Chasing a red tail into the glen*

*But we know, oh we know,
That in the woods, the fox is king
Yes we know, oh we know
That in the woods, the fox is king*

*Run the hounds, rides the hunter
His spear in hand, banner aflutter
Charging that way, this one baying
Trampling the paths, again raging*

*But we know, oh we know,
That in the woods, the fox is king
Yes we know, oh we know
That in the woods, the fox is king*

*Over the hills, across the glade
Where the sun rests in the shade
He hides and waits, until the day
When the hunts are chased away*

*For we know, oh we know
That in the woods, the fox is king
Yes we know, oh we know
That in the woods, the fox is king."*

-"The Fox in the Woods", a Callowan rebel song from the latter years of the Proceran occupation

The Wandering Bard set down her card with telltale nonchalance, to the side of the three affrays that had already been opened. Though there had once been many appearances for this one for hundreds years now one had come to dominate all the others: a dark and faceless woman, holding a red banner, and at her feet letters were written large – TRIUMPH. The Empress. The Bard withdrew her hand and smiled, gesturing for her opponent to act in turn.

"Silence?" the Black Queen said. "That's a new one for you."

"I have not a single new game," the Intercessor smiled. "Only a legion of old ones, given fresh faces."

"Stingy," the orphan queen complained. "You haven't revealed who it is that's the little helper you've still got running around the place, either."

The Miscellaneous Stacks had burned, but before that those who dwelled within had been forced to slumber by a gaseous poison. The hand that'd opened those bottles had yet to be revealed.

"You still go about this as if you were a general, Catherine," the Bard said. "Seeing battles and sending soldiers out to fight them until some nebulous war can be won."

"Doing it all wrong, am I?" the Black Queen mused. "By all means, Marguerite, educate me."

"Your teacher, in truth, is a finer hand at this than any might suspect," the Wandering Bard said. "So I shall borrow his words, spoken once to another: it is all objects in motion, Catherine. If you can see the trajectories of the spheres in the void, all that is required from you is the first nudge."

"Been talking to him?" the woman who had once been a girl said.

Even as the words left her lips, she grew vexed. The airiness she had affected as she spoke had been too sweet on the tongue for either of them to swallow it.

"He has no use for the likes of me, that enterprising blackguard," the Intercessor said. "But he seems to be having a great deal of fun out there, having every part the Wasteland hacking at the other as they try to catch his shadow."

"How pleasant for him," the tired general replied.

"But look at me, jabbering on about things so very far way," the Bard said, salting the wound. "It is your turn to lead the dance, Catherine."

"I'm just biding my time," the Black Queen shrugged.

"Archer is bleeding," the Wandering Bard told her. "Adjutant is spent."

"When you came up," the woman who had once been a girl said, eyes sharp, "it was alone, wasn't it? You weren't part of a band."

"Stories were not as... forgiving, back then," the Intercessor said, half a concession. "But I have been part of many bands, Catherine."

"No," the Black Queen quietly said, "you haven't. Not in the way that really matters."

"Do you think I've never loved?" the Intercessor disdainfully said. "That I've never craved, never lost? I am more human than anyone ever has been, or ever will be. All that is it to be that, I have been a thousand times over."

She leaned forward, a flush to her cheek that had nothing to do with drink.

"When I tell you that loves fucks always fucks you over, I no not speak in contempt or in ignorance," the Intercessor said. "I speak, Catherine Foundling, from pity."

The Black Queen, her hand certain and her fingers deft, place a single black pawn on the table from the shatranj she had stripped bare.

"One," the Queen of Lost and Found stated.

Her mind thrummed with an old song, the beat of it eerily resonant.

"You still believe they can't be touched just because you love them," the Wandering Bard said, almost disbelieving. "You cannot be that naïve. That is not trust, it is fantasy."

"It's fine line, between that and faith," Catherine Foundling said.

"The game goes on, whether you play it or not," Marguerite said, eyes moving to the wooden pawn painted black with something like wariness. "Whatever else you might be playing."

She slid a card above the Chariot, obscuring it. A man holding a broken scepter, at his side a golden cup filled to the brim: the Magician.

"Why now," the Black Queen murmured, "that's almost an admission, isn't it?"

"I will not hold your hand through all of this," the Bard chided.

"That's fine," Catherine said. "I've got better uses for mine."

A card was gently placed atop the last one, elaborate in appearance. A crowned man on a throne, seven nooses and one around his head and a sword in his right hand: Justice.

—

During his time observing that most of the foreign soldiery seemed to dislike his countrymen, not entirely without reason, Prince Frederic of Brus now realized he might have underestimated the extent to which they also disliked each other.

"I gave you an order, Inger," the Levantine captain – Hassar – shouted at the orc. "Get back in the damned ranks."

"You don't give me fucking orders, Dominion," Inger the orc snarled. "Don't you have sheep to go raiding your cousins for? Let the professionals handle this."

"Slight my honour again and we'll settle this steel in hand," Captain Hassar harshly said.

"I'd like to see you try," the orc said, to the cheers of her fellows. "Clear that scabbard and we'll give you another Sarcella."

"You ran from us across half of Procer before the Black Queen stepped in to save your hides," Captain Hassar mocked, to the cheers of the Levantines. "Try to give us a Sarcella without her, orc, see how that ends for you."

"I'll tell you how: with a lot less mercy, feet-dragger," the orc lieutenant jeered.

The Callowan legionaries banged their shields, the Dominion warriors shouted in anger and Frederic decided now was not the time to remind these fine people that Sarcella had been a Proceran city stuck in the middle of their fighting without much of a choice in the matter. Not unlike him, truth be told.

"If I might claim your attention once more," Frederic said, tone cheerful. "I would be much obliged if no blood was spilled tonight, my friends. We are, if I might remind you, yet under attack by common foes."

"Then throw down your sword, prince," Captain Hassar said. "You were caught red-handed, no talking will get you out of that."

"I was charged with the protection of the Red Axe from assassination by the current ranking authority in the Arsenal, Queen Catherine of Callow," the fair-haired prince said. "I understand you may doubt my word, but I do not require great concession – only that you allow me to see to her safety by sharing her confinement."

It was not ideal, but at least he seemed to have flushed out part of the Bird of Misfortune's schemes. And should his terms of surrender be accepted, he could use the walk to the holding cells as an opportunity to find out – perhaps from Lieutenant Inger, who seemed friendly enough in that orc way – who it was that'd sent all these soldiers after him. Learning that Name would likely unmask an agent of their great foe within. Yet Frederic's words were not met with understanding or consideration, but instead a great deal of anger from both the Callowans and the Levantines.

"You'll be dead before you take the first swing," Captain Hassar said. "CROSSBOWS, at the ready."

The lieutenant did not gainsay the Dominion officer, to Frederic's surprise, and the soldiers called at obeyed without qualms. Something was wrong here. Had his words been misheard? Suspecting the worse, he unsheathed his sword and set it down on the floor. There was no reaction from the soldiers.

"This is your last warning," the painted captain snarled. "One more step and-"

An illusion, Frederic grasped. Someone had laid an illusion on the soldiers and through the lie was misleading them to attack. The enemy was already here.

"My lady of Red," the Kingfisher Prince said, "might I trouble you to chase away the enchantment bedevilling these soldiers?"

"I can't," the Red Axe said, tone tormented. "It only protects me, not others."

Reluctantly, Frederic began to consider reaching for the sword he'd placed down. He would try to abstain from killing as much as possible and cease the moment it appeared the illusion might be faltering, but he would not fail in the charge that had been given onto him. The Red Axe would be good as dead if surrounded by soldiers under an enemy's spells, unarmed and still shackled. If the political consequences of this were focused onto him instead of the Principate, Frederic Goethal thought, and he was 'made' to abdicate by the First Prince, the Grand Alliance might yet survive the blow without sundering. Henriette would rule well in his stead, it would do no disservice to the people of Brus to crown her princess in his stead.

Breathing out, the Kingfisher Prince crouched to take back his sword.

"Stop," a woman screamed. "Stops this right now."

The soldiers stirred, turning to watch the two unexpected arrivals behind the Dominion swords: a woman of the Free Cities, visibly bloodied from hard fighting, and a young man that Frederic was more familiar with. The Blade of Mercy, Antoine of Lange. One of the two countrymen Cordelia had asked him to take in hand when she suggested she came to the Arsenal. The young man's greatsword was recognizable enough, and by the reaction of the soldiers the woman Free Cities was even better known.

"Lady Eliade," Captain Hassar said, "with all due respect-"

"With all due respect, captain, you are currently under an illusion," the Repentant Magister said. "If you would simply allow me to dispel it, the truth of this will be revealed."

Frederic Goethal was not above accepting salvation, particularly when it was so gallantly offered. He was not above the occasional theatrics, either, and so he rose to his full height and left his sword on the ground. It would make a more striking image that way. A moment later the painted captain grudgingly gave his assent, and the Repentant Magister raised her hand.

Sorcery bloomed, and there was a sound like a mirror shattering.

—

“Tricky, tricky,” the Wandering Bard said, eyes faraway. “How did you know it would clever little Nephele that stumbled into this mess?”

“Objects in motion, wasn’t it?” the Black Queen replied, lips quirking savagely. “She’s got maybe half the power to throw around that Hierophant had at his speak, and she uses it mostly on tricks and defensive spells – and she’s in a band, which means she’ll be using any spell she puts out six times whenever she uses it. A running battle against fae, of higher mettle than the one I tangled with? It was a given she’d be the first to grow exhausted.”

“That is hardly a guarantee she would end up there,” the Bard leadingly said, glancing at the other affrays.

“Archer’s was always going to be a fight, and she just left the other mess,” the Black Queen said. “Providence good as ensured she was going to end up where she could actually save the day. I can’t ride that horse, most the time, but a heroine like her sure as Hells can.”

“Those do not sound like the words of a villain,” the Intercessor smiled.

“The world’s changing, Bard,” the Black Queen said. “Whether you like it or not.”

“Such a brash one, you are,” the Wandering Bard chuckled.

She shrugged, cards peeking out the edge of her sleeve.

“But not without skill, I suppose,” she continued, then rapped a knuckle atop Justice. “I concede the affray.”

Trickster’s fingers went looking for a card she had set down – the Tower, the other glimpsed before the card was made to disappear with a flourish of the wrist – and she gallantly gestured for the opposition to proceed.

“One point to me,” Catherine said, eyes narrowing as she cleared out the rest of the pile.

Warily, she set her card down as the first of another affray. It depicted wings of bronze holding aloft a faceless entity wielding a pale sword, at its feet kneeling a humbled prince, priest and merchant: Judgement.

“Well now,” the Wandering Bard grinned. “What might that be about?”

"Silence for silence," the Black Queen retorted. "It will matter when it matters."

"How exciting," the Intercessor praised. "But I suppose it is up to me to get this game back on the right path, isn't it?"

The card she laid down over the Lovers was austere to the eye. A priestess in penitent's robes, pouring water from one cup into the wine of another: Temperance.

"It's not that she means to be a traitor, our dear Artificer," the Bard said. "It's simply that given what she is and where she is, she might as well be – she who tinkers with Light knows neither doubt nor restraint."

—

Indrani swung around, blinding striking at whoever it was that'd knifed her – and had suspicions, foolish as they might be – and the blade slid out as the attempted assassin withdrew before she could hit anything. She clenched her teeth from the pain, but at least she was fairly sure it'd not punctured the lung. That would have been a bloody and embarrassing way to die.

"Archer," the Blessed Artificer called out in fear and anger, "DUCK."

With a curse Indrani did, the sound of a twig snapping being followed by a strike of sizzling Light above her. The lack of even a grunt of pain was the only warning she got, and she didn't act quite quickly enough. Even as she began moving, the bolt of Light curved down and struck her back. Screaming as she coat gave, feeling aftershocks of Light going through her body even as the space between her shoulders was turned into a burned and bloody mess, Archer was smashed into the floor.

"Adanna, don't-" Indrani croaked out, but Light bloomed again.

A collar of the burning glare formed around the neck of the man looming standing behind her – and by the size of him, Archer's outlandish thought had come true – but a moment later it the Light was instead nailing Indrani's arm to the stone floor, having formed into a spike and burned through flesh and muscle just above her elbow. Fuck. She wouldn't be able to shoot like that or use both of her blades. The Fallen Monk eyed her for a moment, a serenely calm face over a bulging belly, but only bothered to kick her in the face before he flickered out of sight again. How was the man still alive, after getting Catherine to make darkglass out of a stone floor? Indrani had seen him fail to manipulate the works of Below before, she shouldn't have cut it against Night. Light bloomed again, as the Monk reappeared close to the Artificer and the green heroines panicked.

"Fuck," Archer cursed again, rolling to the side as the defensive net of Light that'd popped up was turn into a rain of deadly shard headed for her.

A few caught the edge of her wounded arm, but her mail turned what would have been a hard turn into mild burns. She ripped her coat rising to her feet, though, as one of the shards had nailed the edge of it down.

"Stop using Light, you fool," Archer shouted, unsheathing one of her blades.

Just in time to see the Fallen Monk slug the Artificer in the stomach, her hasty attempt at a guard blown through. Indrani grit her teeth and aimed before she could think, her longknife spinning as it sailed through the air. But the Monk slid behind the heroine, Indrani's throw missing him by inches, and he nudged up the Blessed Artificer's chin with his bloody knife. Archer already had her other blade in hand, but no opening to use it: frozen in fear, Adanna of Smyrna had gone still.

"Drop the blade," the Fallen Monk said. "Or I slit her throat."

"Shit, you got me," Archer lied, and without hesitation advanced.

The Monk withdrew his hand from Adanna's apron, producing a twig and snapping with his free hand. Light erupted and curved out in two staggered arcs towards Archer. She'd seen it coming this time, though, and it was not good enough a trick to take her by surprise. She quickened her step to pass the first arc, darted back to let the second pass before her and in the beat that followed she'd closed the distance entirely. Still reaching for another bauble inside the Artificer's stash, the Monk was surprised when she got hold of herself and elbowed him in the guts. His fat meant it barely stung, but the surprise bought Archer a moment – she carved at the man's wrist, and though he darted away with viperous quickness he had to leave Adanna behind.

Indrani had blood on her blade, now, and she fully intended to get more. Did the Monk think he'd been the only one to study the weaknesses of the Named in her band?

"Listen close, Artificer," Indrani said. "I have a plan to kill the bastard."

—

"So how's that one working out for you?" the leader of the Woe smilingly asked.

The Wandering Bard sighed, which was answer enough.

"All of Ranger's pupils are absurdly hard to kill," she complained. "She stayed out of that sort of thing until recently, you know, it's your bloody teacher who gave her the taste for it. Among other things."

The leer there was painted on, put there to irritate, but like most barbs of that hand it struck true.

"One can't account for taste, I suppose," Catherine said, wrinkling her nose.

"Gotta agree with you there," Marguerite said. "She's a looker, mind you, but everything else?"

"Funny," the Black Queen mused, "since I consider the two of you to have quite a lot in common."

"Harsh," the Wandering Bard replied, appreciative.

The other woman offered a shallow smile, amusement so thin a finger run across it would reveal dislike.

"I've been wondering," Catherine Foundling said. "Now that you're Alamans-"

"This is going to get uncivil, isn't it?" the Bard sighed.

"- does that fill with wine more often, or does it stay the same swill?" Catherine Foundling finished, gesturing at the silver flask.

The Intercessor considered the other woman, for a moment.

"The limp," she replied, "does it come and go the way you want it to?"

The other woman did not answer. Instead she reached within her mantle and pulled out a second painted black pawn. She set it down next to the first, the ring it gave as it hit the wood echoed of the word mistake.

"Two," the Queen of Lost and Found stated.

"Feigning a deeper game will not get you out of this," the Wandering Bard said.

The Callowan queen hummed under her breath, knowing that now the ugliness was to come, and the Intercessor eyed the pawns with cold eyes.

"We are not yet done," the Bard said, and set down a card.

It fell over the Severance's affray, over the Emperor, and obscured the card beneath it. It depicted a tall and well-formed person, with chains around their neck going to the border of the card. Two details gave away the truth: claws at the end of fingers and red eyes. The Devil.

"Violence," the Wandering Bard said. "Violence bringing about the inexorable."

—

Adjutant's jaw tightened as he grasped that he had been just a little too late.

The soldiers the fae had enchanted had forced open the doors of the room using their blades and that was the beginning of the end. The steel doors had only been pried open a crack, but it would be enough: already his attempts to draw them shut were failing, the implacable strength of a great noble of the fae pulling against him. Now that the enemy had a way to cross the wards it came down to strength, and their strength had waned. The Vagrant Spear had been bloodied and could barely stand, much less fight, while the Mirror Knight had lost his blade saving the heroine and now had a look in his eyes — like a horse that'd smelled blood, fear and fervour all mixed up together. Hakram pulled at the doors again, but against the massive strength on the other side he failed: they pulled further open.

Snatching up the axe and shield he'd thrown to the side to struggle, he retreated just before a cloud of rot and decay hissed through the opening.

The fae began to hammer at the steel, shaking the doors and forcing them open inch by inch. Behind Adjutant, the Mirror Knight had retreated across the holy water through a path that'd risen up and was now carrying Sidonia into the stone cube where the sword was kept. Hakram followed, forcing down the throbbing pain in his leg where a spear had torn flesh, and was nearly across when the doors broke and the tide of fae poured in. A spear flew at him, and the orc's fangs clicked together in dismay — he would not be fast enough. Yet a hand jutted out from behind the wards of the cube, grabbing him by the arm and forcefully dragging him to safety. The Mirror Knight released him as the spear shattered on the wards, the way they shivered a warning that they would not hold forever.

"Thank you," Hakram said, and meant it.

The spear would not have killed him, but such a wound might well have been permanent. Some things neither sorcery nor Light could heal.

"Think nothing of it," the Mirror Knight said, eyes on the roiling fae outside.

The Prince of Falling Leaves was gathering them into an array of war, readying to batter at the wards keeping them from their prize. The Severance, sleeping in the pool of water in the back of the room. The surface of the water ever shivered, as if some wind that did not exist was caressing it. Both of them found their steps drifting closer to it.

"We will have to wait for reinforcements," Adjutant admitted. "We cannot fight them off alone."

"If we do," the Mirror Knight quietly said, "Sidonia will die."

"I can speak for myself," the Vagrant Spear wetly coughed, from where she lay propped up against the wall. "It will be an honourable death, Christophe. One worthy of being added to the rolls. Hold until the others come."

"Will they come?" the Mirror Knight softly asked. "Who is it that would relieve us, Sidonia?"

He shook his head, eyes hardening, and he took the last step up to the edge of the pond.

"No," the Proceran said. "We stand alone."

That growing iron in the man's eyes was a dangerous thing, the orc thought. It must be averted before it grew tempered, for it reeked of desperate decisions. How? His eyes found Sidonia, her breathing broken by a wet cough. A punctured lung, the orc judged. Yet even wounded and prone, she remained the key to salvaging this.

"Archer will be coming," the Adjutant said. "The other war party was a lesser one, it will have been wiped out by now. She must be headed our way already."

"See?" Sidonia rasped. "The Lady will see to it. She might even be dragging the Physician along by the ear."

The second part had been tacked on with more effort than skill, but for all that the Mirror Knight hesitated. Adjutant breathed out. If it came to a fight, the hero would win. That much was set in stone. But it would not come to that, and he could still prevent some foolish decision from –

–

The Black Queen paled, knuckles turning white from the strength of her grip. She rapped them against the last card placed down, the Devil.

"I concede the affray," Catherine said.

Without waiting for an answer she leaned forward and her fingers grasped the edge of the Emperor, trying to extract him from the pile.

"That's not how it goes," the Intercessor gently said. "You're playing the game, right now, but you're not playing the Game."

The old thing with a young face offered a half-hearted smile.

"He's not going to leave, Catherine," she said. "That's not the kind of man you made him into."

She shrugged.

"Take the card, if you want," the Intercessor said. "It doesn't mean anything. But as a last piece of advice—"

Even as the Black Queen, lips thinned, began to remove her card the Wandering Bard set down one of her own. Catherine's hand ceased, as she tried to look at the fresh card and found she could not.

"It's a damned scary trick," the Bard said. "For a damned scary woman. Think back, Catherine — how many cards are there, in the Major Arcana?"

Twenty-one, the Black Queen almost said, but she held her tongue. Now that her eyed had been drawn to the oddness she could feel out the shape of it, if not fill the void. It was as if what had lain there was now absent.

"The Moon," the Wandering Bard said. "The Maddened Keeper: the seal on darkness, who partakes of its powers. You did not remember her, or her card, because Creation finds her to be absent."

"Demon," the Black Queen said. "I remember her being added to the rolls, some months ago, but nothing more recent."

Her fingers clenched.

"How many does she hold, Bard?" Catherine Foundling asked.

"Seven and one," the Wandering Bard said.

Fingers clenched even tighter.

"I warned you," the Intercessor said. "Love always fucks you. You can't be... this and love them all the while, Catherine. It will hollow you out from the inside."

Catherine Foundling took the card, her mouth tasting of ashes.

"-might even be dragging the Physician along by the ear," Sidonia assured him.

Even she did not sound entirely like she believed it, but Christophe could see the sense in what she and the Adjutant had said. He could not find it in himself to wait long, but to not even attempt to put his faith in his comrades would be almost as grievous as sin. The fae hammered at the wards, the cube shaking around them, but these were not the works of middling wizards. They would hold for some time yet.

"We should prepare for the assault of the fae," the Mirror Knight said. "There is only one entrance, so-"

Before he could finish speaking, as if to mock him, a creature appeared. A strange woman, with long unkempt hair and a sickly mien. She was standing behind the Adjutant, and without a word she reached out towards the orc.

"Adjutant," Christophe screamed, and he would have done more but he had no sword, "behind-"

The woman's hands touched the orc's side and his flesh boiled, from the arm all down to his foot, as the reek of demonic corruption spread through the room. The Mirror Knight's hand plunged into the waters, seizing the sheathed blade within even as some eldritch force tore at his armour until only the bare skin of his hand was left – itself stronger than steel, from all the dawns it had seen. Sidonia threw her spear, and the enemy moved back even as the Adjutant dropped with a blood-curling scream, but the Vagrant Spear's aim had suffered from the wounding.

Christophe's did not.

The Severance came clear of the scabbard with a faint scream, as if it were cutting the very air, and in three steps the Mirror Knight was before the villainess who had struck at his orc companion. She raised her hand to protect herself, unarmed for all her monstrous power, and offered a faint smile even as Christophe swung and cut through both the arm and the head behind it with barely any resistance.

"Disappear," the Mirror Knight snarled, as she dropped lifeless to the ground.

But there was no time to waste, he knew. Hakram Deadhand lay on the ground, twisted in pain as corruption began to spread through his body. If the Mirror Knight did not act, the orc would be dead – or much, much worse.

"Gods forgive me," Christophe prayed, and like a butcher he hacked.

The arm, the leg, most of the side – he cut before the demonic taint could spread, and left his ally broken and bleeding. Unconscious. But it was done, he thought. Now there were only the fae left and –

“Christophe,” Sidonia screamed, “the corpse!’”

The stranger’s remains convulsed, once, twice, and a heartbeat later the Hells broke loose.

The first thing to go was the wards, and it was all downhill from there.

—

Silence reigned for a long moment. The Black Queen, gripping the card close, set down the Emperor above the sole affray she’d opened.

“Ah,” the Wandering Bard murmured, “so that’s where the Concocter went. If you’re lucky, she’ll be able to save your Adjutant, true. Or at least keep him alive.”

“The Mirror Knight is many things, but a poor fighter is not one of them,” the Black Queen said, voice tight. “He’ll slaughter her a way through the thick of it, come what may.”

She cleared away the affray she had already conceded, her every movement speaking to barely controlled rage.

“One to one,” the Wandering Bard said. “Let’s hasten this along, shall we?”

One affray had still lain untouched, the one she had never explained, and with a hum the Intercessor took out the Tower once more and placed it above that very affray, obscuring the Empress. The Black Queen’s eyes narrowed.

“You are trying to drown my first victory,” she said.

“I am succeeding,” the Wandering Bard corrected. “The Empress was from the beginning our old friend Cordelia Hasenbach, who is still headed this way. There are many ways to skin a cat, Catherine, and I know every last one of them.”

—

The illusion broke and Frederic Goethal smiled at the wave of exclamations from the soldiers, who saw the truth of his offered surrender laid bare by the sword at his feet. He turned to offer the Repentant Magister a bow but found that her eyes were widening.

He turned to find the Red Axe with his sword in hand, just as the blade hacked into the side of his neck.

—

The Black Queen's eyes strayed to the last remaining of the initial affrays, where Temperance still led the dance. The Intercessor caught her out and her lips quirked.

"Worried about Archer?" the Wandering Bard said. "Have a little faith."

"Funny thing about the Magician," the Black Queen said. "I happen to have one as well."

She dropped it atop Temperance, cocking an eyebrow.

"Must have been a mistake of some sort," Catherine Foundling said. "I would never accuse you of cheating."

"Quite right," the Wandering Bard grinned, stuffing cards back into her sleeves.

—

Archer put her useless side in the way, letting the knife blow through so that she might get a good strike in for her trouble. The blade tore through her coat but slid against the mail, the Fallen Monk trying to tackle her down but letting out a grunt when she stabbed him in the shoulder twice. He was strong, though, and heavy. If it kept up he'd be able to force her down, and then she'd be in trouble – save if Adanna... and there she was. The Blessed Artificer threw herself at the Fallen Monk's legs, trying to snare them with her arms and refusing to give even when the man kicked her and her spectacles gave with a crack. Indrani took the opportunity to push him down, toppling atop of him as he fell and stabbing away still. That cursed fat, it made hard to get at the parts that actually mattered. Half a dozen bleeding wounds, not a single one that would kill a Named.

The three of them were in a messy, writhing pile of violence but another kick finally pushed Adanna away, sending her rolling as she groaned in pain, and though Indrani got in a good knifing through the Monk's armpit the man still struck her across the face with his full strength. Archer felt her nose break and she rolled away, just in time to see the Fallen Monk crawl to his feet. She dropped her knife, snatching his ankle through the robe, and with her own full strength squeezed. Bone broke and the man screamed, but he tore out of her grasp and winked out of sight. Fuck, Indrani thought. That'd been their shot, and it wouldn't work twice. The Monk was in a bad place, but so were they and she couldn't use her bow one-handed.

"Auréole."

Indrani, wondering if she was going mad, found that her body was softly glowing. So was Adanna's, who was moaning as she tried to get up with trembling knees. So was the silhouette of an overweight man, glowing where there would otherwise seemingly be only air.

"Roland, you clever little artefact princess you," Archer praised, swallowing a scream as she rose to her feet with her knife in hand.

The Rogue Sorcerer, some wooden casting rod in one hand and a handful of shining rings on the other, was standing his ground as the silhouette of the Fallen Monk rushed him. The rod went up, there was a blasting sound and the Monk was forced back a mere foot. It didn't matter, because Indrani was moving too and she was fucking done with this one. The man reappeared in his entirety for the blink of an eye as he turned towards her just in time for his mouth to open in surprise as her extended arm slid the longknife just under his chin and all the way through this throat. He gurgled wetly, for a moment, and with a pained scream Archer turned her wrist and ripped her way out in a spray of blood.

"There," Indrani panted. "Try to walk that off, Monk."

She then slumped to her knees, eyes closing.

"If I might offer healing, Archer?" the Rogue Sorcerer gently asked.

"Why are you here, Roland?" Indrani asked. "You should be headed for the Severance with Cocky."

"I began to head there at first," the man agreed, "but halfway there realized that no one had stabilized the wards. It would be a shame to all die in the immediate wake of our victory, yes?"

"Zeze should be fixing them," Archer said. "It's probably already done."

"I checked moments ago," the Rogue Sorcerer said. "No work has been done."

Indrani went still. Where, then was Masego?

—

The Wandering Bard's head wrenched from faraway, returning to the small room she was sharing with her foe. Catherine Foundling offered her a hard smile and slowly, surely placed a third black pawn on the table.

"Three," the Queen of Lost and Found state. "Now it ends."

"Some affrays have yet to end," the Wandering Bard said. "You are-"

"I have no interest in your game," Catherine said.

Disdainful, she slapped the table's surface and the piles of cards blended in chaos.

"Your first mistake," Catherine said, knocking down a pawn with a flicked finger, "was believing you understand what it means to be part of a band of five. You don't. Like Ranger, you drift in and out of stories and bands without ever really being part of them. It's temporary to you, not something you give yourself over to. I'll wager you never had a moment like I did at the Battle of Dormer, when the Woe blended together and became part of a greater whole."

"If you want the right to lecture me," the Bard mockingly echoed, "w-"

"Your second mistake," Catherine said, knocking down a pawn with a flicked finger, "was telling me what you wanted. The song I already knew had stuck too much in my head to be a coincidence, but then you told me the exact nature of you what you were after by drawing the comparison between us. The Doddering Sage warned me: rival, thief, successor. You've been trying to make my Name into one shaped by opposition to you."

"And why would I ever want that?" the Intercessor said, tone calm.

"Because if it's that, it's not something else," Catherine smiled. "Whatever it is growing into, slowly but surely. And that is a balm onto my heart, Intercessor, because for you to intervene means that outside the walls of this place we are winning."

"You very much want that to be true, don't you?" the Wandering Bard said. "But-"

"Your third mistake," Catherine said, knocking down the last pawn with a flicked finger, "was never asking the right question until it was too late. Until I'd earned my way to this, one pawn at a time."

"And what would that be?" the Intercessor asked.

"Why haven't you been using the Night since you came in?" Catherine Foundling smiled, all teeth and malice.

The Wandering Bard went still.

"Hierophant," she said.

The Black Queen threw the card going by the same name on the table, contemptuous.

"There," she said. "And choke on it. We have what we need, Masego."

The darkness in the back of the room peeled away, its control long wrested away from the Black Queen, and revealed a tall man with blind and burning eyes.

"Finally," the Hierophant said. "My preparations are finished."

"Odds?" the Black Queen asked.

"Half and half, I'd say," the vivisector of miracles said. "And that is without considering your end of things."

"Quite the trick," the Intercessor admitted. "But it means nothing."

"I thought so too, at first," the Black Queen said. "But then, you're not the goddess of stories are you? You don't have a mantle, just a duty. In the end, you are still Named. The oldest and trickiest of our kind, but that does not change the nature of what you are."

"This is getting tedious," the Wandering Bard said, and blinked her eyes.

Silence was broken only by the sound of Catherine Foundling smiling a blackguard's smile.

"Your tricks can be learned," the Black Queen said. "They can be blocked. And you're in our little corner of the Pattern now."

"You've won nothing," the Wandering Bard said, tone arctic. "The affrays-"

"You were playing a game," Catherine Foundling chided, "while I was playing the Game. You bled us, but I have three mistakes now. We earned this, through that victory and the weight of what you did to us."

The Black Queen rose to her feet, leaning forward over the table as the Wandering Bard leaned back.

"Eyes open, Hierophant," the Carrion Lord's daughter said. "If she still has a miracle up her sleeve, be ready to kill it next time."

Her wrist flicked, a knife falling into her palm, and ever as the Intercessor opened her mouth to speak Catherine Foundling slit her throat. Marguerite of Baillons twitched, clutching her wound, and cards went flying from her sleeves as two of the Woe coldly watched. It was only Catherine that thought, for a moment, that there had been a strange glint in the Intercessor's eyes. Relieved, triumphant, afraid?

Eventually, the body ceased moving.

"So?" the Black Queen asked.

"I could not catch the soul," the Hierophant said, "but even when in danger she cannot leave my bindings. It is possible she is dead and has gone Beyond."

Catherine Foundling looked at the corpse for a long time, clenching her fingers and unclenching them.

"No," she decided, "this isn't the last we've seen of her."

She dragged herself up, tired but knowing there was still chaos to put to order.

"We've got work to do, Masego," the Black Queen said. "Let's get to it."

Neither of them looked back, as they left, and so neither saw that by the sheerest of coincidence the struggle had left untouched one of the affrays – the Empress, the Tower – save for one card that'd fallen from the Bard's sleeve in her death throes.

Judgement lay with the Tower between it and the Empress, speckled with blood.

—

She breathed out and opened her eyes, a starry sky sprawled above her.

In and out, slowly. Unmistakably. She was still alive, though no longer Marguerite de Baillons. The Wandering Bard, the Keeper of Stories, closed her eyes and repressed the urge to scream until her voice went hoarse.

"I did it all right," she said. "And still? Still?"

Her nails dug into her palms until they bled.

"Fine," she whispered. "Fine. The hard way it is, then, and on your heads be it." boy i really wish i knew what literally any tarot card meant cool visual though!

tkjarrah

Stable

Yeah. If the Empress is Cordelia, maybe judgement could be the White Knight? And the Tower could be leadership.

Or if card meanings can change, perhaps Malicia and another Knight are going to find the tower separating them,

Gamer7956

Traditionally speaking, the tower refers to the Tower of Babel in biblical mythology. In tarot, it's main meaning is ruin or a loss of power. Hence why it referred to the Grand Alliance falling apart.

Judgement is so blatantly Hanno that nothing more needs to be said.

Empress is probably the result of the Wasteland, but it could also be Cat herself, could it not? And her fighting Hanno would end the alliance...

Cedrick the Sojourner

Actually, Catherine's Judgement is The Concoctor, so it's possible that the Bard slipping it there in her death throes might mean that saving Fredrick will delay The Concoctor and prevent her from reaching Hakram.

KingJulius

I am too worried to read further today for fear you are correct.

Theitzal

Tv shows like to use the death card to portray something bad happening but the death represents change and isn't necessarily a bad (or good) thing.

The tower however is what said shows should be using because it represents tragedy and is not something you ever want to see in a prediction.

TeK

Tower isn't all bad either. Sometimes you have to wipe the slate clean before starting anew.

jubilee23

"Destruction leads to a very rough road, but it also breeds creation," – Red Hot Chili Peppers, "Californication"

Javvies

I am concerned about Hakram. The guy keeps losing body parts. Also, he just lost an arm, leg, and chunk of his torso. He's tough, but still, that's not something that's going to be easy to get over.

Also, that Severance did the cutting suggests that attaching replacement parts or healing is going to be difficult.

Also ... Maddened Keeper's fate is concerning. Fortunately there are Heroes present to stab whatever she was containing.

I'm also worried about Frederic, the Kingfisher Prince.

And Red Axe did the stabbing? Hmm. I wonder if that's because of whatever illusion was cast (if so, by whom?) ... or if it's because she's an active traitor (which still leaves the question about who is responsible for the illusion).

Bard might have gotten her to be an active traitor because Wicked Enchanter was protected by the Truce and Terms.

Just_a_Potato

The Maddened Keeper and the Keeper of Stories, I'm sensing a connection there. Seven and one demons, maybe to create a realm where the Keeper of Stories can retreat to. Or maybe by using demons instead of human princes she's trying to attain true Godhood.

mamm0nn

I think it's more a matter of seven and one being a number with weight to it, similar to a band of five. We're not completely sure what it is, the pattern could be as simple as 'completion' or 'apex' in the Story. As in, the Maddened Keeper by having seven (Increasingly greater challenges meant to be won) and one (final boss to be lost against / mutual death), has ended her own story and surviving against the odds.

The seven and one likely refer to demons, and the number perhaps to control or the one being a demon that controls her or her being in control of them. We've already seen her use two demons' powers, corruption and absence, and for all that they've become the weaker first-book foe in our minds by now they shouldn't be underestimated. Especially in how elemental they are especially in being nigh impossible to be controlled.

Letsira

I wonder if the Judgement card symbolizes Hanno. The Bard seems to imply that the Judgement Cathrine played might symbolize the Concocter, and while Cat doesn't deny it, she doesn't directly confirm it either. Regardless, the Magician card demonstrates that both sides can play the same card to represent different actors. So I wonder, does the Tower at the end represent the Tower of Praes, or does it represent the pure ruin it did the first time Bard played it? Does the Bard's dying play foreshadow the death of Hanno? The Empress represents Cordelia, and the tower either symbolizes pure ruin or possibly even Malicia, so Bard is probably trying to either put the two into (near-) direct conflict or just trying to destroy Cordelia (literally or metaphorically). Does the bloody Judgement mean that neither leader will be judged for their actions in the end, that judgement will befall them cruelly and violently, or that Hanno might die in the conflict? Or maybe the Tower is the Dead King? On another note, I find it interesting how the Bard chastises Cat for not "playing the Game" just to have the same line turned back on her. The Bard cheated her way through her game, and even broke the spiritual meaning behind it when she tried(?) to off Hakram. Cat played a different game, and won while not once breaking the spirit of the Bard's game (upon discarding it, however, potential disaster was forewarned). Bard is too used to playing against lesser foes, and even in her attempts to treat Cat like the threat she is, she just can't, and it costs her the game.

Sorry for the wall of text. And thank you Erraticerrata for the amazing chapter.

JJR

I think the bloody judgment at the end symbolizes the choir. With the blood being Hierarchs presence inside it.

Konstantin von Karstein

I doubt that, it looks more like a foreshadowing.

JJR

I want to say that it might be foreshadowing Hierarch/ choir of judgment showing up in the story again. Possibly through the angel in the lake. But I'm pretty bad about predicting things in this story so far.

TeK

Calling it now: when the Judgement-corpse will be used, they will get giant Hierarch instead "So you are the King of Death? Who decided that? By the Article 37.5 subarticle "b" citizens are forbidden to die unless as a result of a voting by a quorum of no less than 40% of the population"

NerfContessa

Sadly, nope.

But. Dang, that would be sooo funny.
Maybe as an alternate interlude?

Liliet

Bard was clearly disappointed by still being alive after this.

jamesc9

Disappointed, I agree.

Was it foreshadowed that she wanted to die? If so, surely she and the DK could have cooperated to arrange it.

Liliet

Part of why I think she cares about more things than just dying.

Sir Nil

Or maybe the Red Axe had already been killed and replaced by the Hunted Magician, it would certainly explain why Bard put the Magician card to counter the Chariot.

Liliet

Oof.

Liliet

Wait, didn't she just get revealed to have her fucking axe?

Valkyria

No, she stabbed Frederick with his own sword, not an axe.

Liliet

Oops.

shikkarasu

Let's not forget that the first bit of Hakram to be lost was at the edge of the Penitent's Blade. That which is cut by an Angel Feather stays cut; it's the whole reason he couldn't have his old hand put back on. It's why Cat had a nasty scar until she became a god.

His second hand was removed by his own choice, which Pilgrim confirmed is a huge deal in this setting and makes it hard to undo. He didn't even want that one replaced. He still got a Ghost Hand to pair with his Bone Hand.

Maybe Severance can do what Angels and Narrative failed to, but I doubt it. He's the OG mirror knight, being thrown at demon summoning mages because he can be expected to Stand up afterwards.

Draeysine

Hakram must be trying to audition for a star wars role.

KingJulius

I for one welcome Darth Hakram with his energy sword able to cut almost anything, the ability to move things telekinetically, the ability to choke people from long range, at least minor future sight in battle.

AL

Saint wal all "cut the limb to save the whole" it would be weird if a sword made by her condemned those it cut to save from Corruption

moongazer13

If Hakram survives, and I kinda doubt that he will, because its been a while since someone important to Cat has been killed, they will have to give him replacement limbs. Forget Deadhand, he will be Deadhalf. But considering that the Maddened Keeper has 8 demons (7 & 1) in her, it will be a full on miracle if he survives untainted. and while i doubt the Keeper is fully dead, its possible, since why else would she explode like that.

I'm pretty sure the Magician on the Bard's side is the Haunted Magician, as Cat herself said earlier he had a high potential to be a traitor and I don't think we have been introduced to anyone else that has the ability to cast spells to that degree. Except possibly the Bitter Blacksmith, but considering that Magician is in his name, him being a traitor fits better.

As for Red Axe, its more likely shes a traitor then under enchantment, since one of her powers is not being affected by magic.

tithin

this chapter was fucking incredible

the only thing I don't quite get is the symbolism of the last affray, but I need to re-read it.
Bravo.

Big I

Judgement (probably the White Knight) is all what stands between the Tower (either general doom, or maybe the Wasteland) and the Empress (the First Prince).

Stable

I like this, but the Tower separates Judgement and the Empress. So Cordelia vs. White Knight?

Yitzhak Kornbluth

Read it again: The tower is in the middle, separating Judgement and The Empress.

Dsylexic Wofl

It seems more to me that the Tower (imo the Wasteland/Malicia), and since it wasn't specified I'm assuming it was played upwards, so it means disaster, will cause Cordelia to die, while the White Knight either kills Malicia or gets brought into a plan like the one the Hierarch had. After all, Judgement is out of the game, if there was ever a time to strike at the White Knight is now.

Dsylexic Wofl

Although if I'm going by what I said before, on the cards being upwards and not reversed, then this bails well for the White Knight, as the upwards Judgement implies that your path will lead to victory, the decision has already been made and you only need to walk forward and receive your just reward.

If EE wanted us to think whomever the judgment represents is going to suffer here, he should have played it in reverse.

Ataldu

Long time lurker. First time involving myself in a discussion. But was Cordelia not messing around with an angel corpse of judgement that got Corrupted along with judgement as a whole? One that would ruin them all to use? The flawed weapon the whole arsenal is trying to replace?

jamesc9

@DW, I am not confident that Judgement is out of the game. It just has to conform to Belerophan law in order to act.

Miles

The tower stands between Above and Cordelia?

Anonymous

What makes you so certain Mr "I do not judge" is Judgment? He can't invoke the choir's judgment either.

BritishTeaLover

Could Judgement here so refer to the Choir? We haven't heard much from them lately, and the imagery of them discarded speckled in blood is telling for what might end up happening to the Choir of Judgement (or, it's champion).

TeK

How does everyone forgot about a bloody WMD made put of Judgement-corpse that is in Cordelia hands?

Drunken Dwarf

I believe that means the Judgement intercepted the Tower's attempt to kill the Empress.

I wonder if the Bard did that on purpose or if the gods gave that victory away so the Bard could slip away. I wouldn't be surprised if they did given what the Bard said after her death.

shikkarasu

I think we are all over thinking that last Affray. Empress (Cordelia) + Judgement + Tower (Sh!t going poorly), unopposed.

What choir was the Angel in Lake Artoise again? I'm about 80% sure it was an Angel of Judgement.

Tom

I agree; the Judgment card there with the Empress and the Tower seems to me to foreshadow the dead Choir of Justice angel in Lake Artoise. It's this enormous Chekhov's gun that's been hanging over things for ages. It would be very odd if it doesn't have a significant role to come.

Also, notably the Judgment card was the one that literally flew out of WB's sleeve as she was killed, right? As in literally the last card up her sleeve that she can play, with her own lifeblood on these cards on the table? So WB will be finding some way to get that thing into action herself.

TeK

Welcome to PGtE comments. We are always all over, but never in the right.

And yes, it was Judgement corpse. And Tyrant specifically blocked Judgement so that Judgement-corpse could be wielded without Judgement itself. It was one of the most important plot points of previous book.

shikkarasu

Oh, THAT's why the Dead King was so happy after the trial. I missed the implications of the Choir going silent regarding the Corpse That is Not a Corpse. Yeah, DK knows exactly what is going to go wrong with that, even if we don't. It also doesn't bode well that WB also seems to be backing that project. I am now 3X as nervous as I was before.

TeK

"What happens when a Judgement-corpse is wielded, if Judgement is dead?"

The right question, as he had expected. She had yet to disappoint.

"Truth of truths, my friend," he chortled, "I already gave you the only answer to that question worthy of being spoken."

A Rochelant, when they had first begun this dance of theirs.

"That's the entire point," she softly quoted, "finding out."

caoimhinh

Judgement (meaning unknown yet) lay with the Tower ("Ruin to the Truce and Terms, heroes and villains at each other's throats beyond what can be mended") between it and the Empress (Cordelia, according to the Bard), speckled with blood.

So, "Judgement" speckled with blood, and the violence that will make the T&T fall apart is between that "Judgement" and Cordelia.

The key to this will be what exactly is Judgement. It's easy to say it's Hanno, but could be other things. I wonder if Hanno will be the one to ultimately execute the Red Axe.

moongazer13

I agree with the idea that Hanno executes the Red Axe, since she appears to be the only remaining traitor on the Heroes side that is alive, and she has clearly attempted to kill or has killed the Kingfisher Prince. Someone needs to be punished for this, and like it or not she tried to kill another Hero.

Also, one thing to remember is that while Cordelia denied a union, its not impossible she doesn't have some degree of affection for Kingfisher based on his backstory, and will want the Red Axe killed if she is the one responsible for his death. Plus, it probably won't be good for unity/morale if a war hero like him dies.

caoimhinh

True.

I really hope he is still alive. He's been an interesting character all this time, even before he got his Name (back then he was this weird but brave prince who liked to have a cup of wine at all times).

Liliet

I think the last thing is deliberately unclear.

TeK

No shit. There was much teasing about big-picture stuff, but nit much revealed.

Cicero

Wow... so the whole time the Bard was trying to lose?!

Ninestrings

Nah she was pretty pissed off, looks like she just has to go to Plan B now.

Dave

She might have been trying to die for real. That's the way that I interpreted it.

thearpox23

We knew that ever since her conversation with the Hierarch.

Insanenoodlyguy

Either way: She lost. She unmistakably did not get what she wanted. Her infailability has been broken.

Will

I suspect that is because she survived regardless though. She lost, and lost hard, yet there were no real consequences for her. I think she's looking for an end, be it death or replacement through succession and she "did it all right" to get that end. The gloves are off now though, cause one of the surest ways to die here is to become the villain of the story, and she's competing with the dead king for that honor.

Liliet

We'll see who the "hard way" will be hard for XD

TeK

My way is hard, Catherine. Can you feel it?

Stephen

I kept waiting for Kat to be able to reach in and take one of the bard's aspects after killing her.

Ninestrings

Hakram Deadbody really doesn't sound as cool as Hakram Deadhand.

Also how many people have wanted to be Cat's nemesis now? Is this her third hate-suitor?

tithin

First was William, dead through pattern of three.
Next came Akua, dead and turned to subservience.
Last came The Wandering Bard, presumably turned purely to subservience?

Liliet

You forgot Tariq.

tithin

First came William, dead through judicious use of a pattern of three.
Next came Akua, dead from vengeance and turned subservient in death.

There's a pattern here – someone will be the third, and their rivalry will be ended with willing subservience to Cat, possibly.

tithin

sorry for the double reply, I didn't think the first post went through..

Stable

Or the inversion. Cat subservient.

caoimhinh

Third was the Pilgrim, remember?

That's why they were entering the Pattern of Three that had Cathering making all those aerobics in the Princes' Graveyard. They were considered rivals/nemeses by Creation and Narrative, so if she had reached a draw with him there, the Pattern would have been set.

Tenthyr

I have the horrible feeling this nearly cost everything.

But god, it feels good to know the Bard really, actually got utterly destroyed at her own game.

I wonder what Cathrines name could crystalize into, now she's made sure it can't be in opposition to the Bards.

Pethrai D'arkos

Probably something like Black Fox due to her sides tendency to have Black in the titles (Black Queen anyone). It could be something like Fox Queen except she has been pretty adamant about abdicating the crown.

However it could just as easily be something like Departed Fox with her taking a ship across the Tyrian (I think that's how it's spelled) Sea to pull a King In The Mountain bit. I can just see stories in a hundred years that go something like this:

"The Black Queen, Sovereign of Moonless Nights, Departed Fox. Cathrine Foundling is known by many names, all earned by dread and woe. It is said that she stole from angels, drowned entire armies, and through a secret ritual gave birth to the crows which even now the army claims as patron. She was a villain as great as Triumphant and all the more terrible, for rather than spreading it out to all she saw she bottled up the terror to be unleashed all at once. But make no mistake lad, she was OUR villain. One day Callow will need someone like that to once more sit on the throne, and on that day she will come back.”

dadycoool

Honestly? This. 100% this.

agumentic

Come on, we just got the confirmation that the whole Fox song was Bard’s play, and that Cat sidestepped it. Her name is not going to be fox-anything.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Would you say that Bard has been outfoxed?

TeK

Cat the Fox had ourfoxed by thinking outside the box.

caoimhinh

It’s not gonna be Fox anything. The song thing was something the Bard was attempting, and Cat prevented it. Now Cat will get her Name properly.

I’m still betting on the Guide. Not only for the Metanarrative of it relating to the title of the novel, but because that’s what she has been doing since the beginning: steering the continent away from destruction and pioneering a path out of their vicious cycles.

Her current latent Name started to form when she spoke and meant the words “I will get the east in order the hard way” (in the hypothetical scenario where Praes were to sally forth against them, possibly with Amadeus defeated). which could be interpreted as Cat becoming Dread Empress, but could be something else.

The Truce and Terms, The Liesse Accords, Villains and Heroes working together in Bands of Five, Good and Evil Nations all over the continent being part of the Grand Alliance, and the re-emergence of the Empire Ever Dark but not as a threat but as an ally to those on the surface.

All these are momentous changes brought by her hand.

After the death of the Age of Wonders, Catherine is guiding Calernia towards a new era. An era that has already been baptized by Amadeus as The Age of Order.

Evgeny Permyakov

>I'm still betting on the Guide.

Changer of Ways.

Dan Lawrence

Maybe she'll get seven Names and one.

Zim the Vixen

I don't care what anyone else says, as a fox, I'd be fucking ecstatic if Catherine got a fox Name.

TeK

Foxxxy Cat

TeK

Gone wild

Mental Mouse

She doesn't need to cross the ocean, just to go live with her Drow in Keter-that-was.

Miles

Pattern Breaker

TeK

Giga Pattern Breaker

Big I

Cat's got a lot of Odin imagery/association going on (two crows, staff, cloak, commanded the Wild Hunt, probably others I'm not thinking of). Odin's a war god, Cat's done a lot of war, and her sort of adopting Viv might sorta be like Odin and Loki. So something Odin adjacent? Makes me wonder if Hakram is supposed to be Tyr.

TeK

She also got a pretty unique horse, and traded a permanent injury for wisdom. Never thought about it really, for me lack of lack of one eye was always a definitive answer.

amc

NO SPOILERS, PLEASE!

hakureireimu

Well it looks like Hakram's adventuring days is at an end. Maybe he switches place with Akua in the band of 5?

forsheen

Or this sets him up to become the Cyborc.

erebus42

I mean they're in a place filled with maker and healer Named wielding both magic and miracle. Cyborc is looking increasingly likely.

Ninestrings

Time to graft Severance into Hakram.

I can just picture Masego standing there, looking at the sword... then at Hakram... then the sword...then at Hakram....

mamm0nn

We can rebuild him, we have the technol- scrap metal. We have scrap metal.

But, that's sufficient for orcs, right? The wastelands tends to rebuild them with sand and pointy stones.

daegone823

Shadow of war come on

Nobody played shadow of war

He comes back bigger and badder.

Masego will literally pick up body parts. Similar to the mantle of woe Hakram will be composed of Cathrines enemies

Hakram the Many

(Hand of ghost, bone of Warlock, lego of Fae, chest of a demon)

sivarajan

That sounds like a Red Letter idea.

Maddy

Wandering Bard is going to EFF UP SOME GODS yessss

Liliet

That's how I read this too tbh XD

llined

what a sore loser

Darkening

My personal reading of this is that she set things up so that either she'd win in the Arsenal, a win for her, or Cat would manage to kill her, another win for her since she views her immortality as more curse than blessing. So no, she's not mad that Cat beat her, she's pissed that the gods didn't let her die when she'd set it up so well.

agumentic

At this rate, by the end of the story, Harkam will have no flesh left.

tithin

Hakram Half-Slain is a beautiful new name.

Relyt118

Hmm, sounds like some more proof for the "Bard just wants to die" theory. It would explain why she 1) is building Cat as her rival 2) is coming at the Alliance with power not overwhelming. Let's be real, Cat can skirmish with the Bard, but letting the Bard coordinate and execute and ambush/blitzkrieg? Cat's just not on that level. Yet.

laguz24

Personally, I think that she can at least hold her own on that level. This book is the culmination of all their power and experience. She should be able to dance with the bard and maybe even break even sometimes.

Liliet

The real skill is in knowing when not to fight. As Bard said – objects in motion. Her setting herself in Catherine's path... Well.

:3

dadycool

Dead the man and dead the body. He'll strike quite the imposing image now.

Whew, Cat! And Masego, too? The Power of Friendship was a great boon here.

Such badass pawns. Cat's over here playing 6D shatranj while everyone else is playing roulette.

Well, things are gonna get REAL soon, but Cat'll take it on the same way she always has, with all her friends by her side.

MorningShine

Wait, I just remembered, where is Akua?

caoimhinh

What if the Judgement Card represents Akua, not Hanno?

I mean, Akua is still awaiting her judgement by the hand of Catherine.

Liliet

Hasn't been mentioned since Cat left for Arsenal. Possibly with the Third Army.

edrey

Judgment is the concoter, so the prince is saved, then hakram? The bard wants to die, but how is the hard way now? Way too many questions

hakureireimu

I think the Judgement at the very end might be Hanno instead, coming to judge the Red Axe, since it's creation that's shuffling them there.

Adrian_V

Hakran's Deadhand will be updraded, like he will come out stronger maybe, and who wants to bet the sword is now broken or at least damaged (as in maybe is more fragile now)

And until we know how he survived before i won't count the Fallen Monk out until then.

And last i really hope Frederic isn't dead, but the Red Axe just gave Cat a favour by that, no one will complain when she is executed now

mamm0nn

Yes, Red Axe's betrayal ties up the Terms' survival with a neat little bow. This almost seems TOO GOOD to be true.

Shveiran

If that is the Red Axe, though. Someone is casting the illusion, and I'm not completely sure the Red Axe has not been replaced.

Repentant saw through an illusion, but maybe there was a second one (a disguise) underneath that, and the caster just stabbed (lovely) Frederick.

Mateo

Looks like Masego replaced his magic with Night, a pretty convenient repowerup. Bard tried to kill herself but ended up failing. Glint in her eyes, relieved, afraid, as her throat is cut, and then pissed when she wakes up again. The game of cards with High Arcana seems quite contrived to me, but I think the symbolism is worth it (and it's certainly great fun to read). Bravo, great chapter, and I look forward to seeing how this concludes.

Xinci

Looks like he just took control over the Night with wield then changed some dimensional rules. So not really a powerup, just him using a temporary power source he can only use with Cat.

Liliet

I read it that way too. Cat just... lent him Night. He's better at wielding it anyway.

alele

So is it just me or are the proceran heroes dropping like flies? Mirror Knight and Kingfisher are the two biggest I think. Mirror dies due to Severance, Kingfisher is up in the air but I think he bites it too.

laguz24

No, they are too awesome and still have too much story left.

Shveiran

Well, one of them is.

tithin

Has it ever been stated explicitly that severance kills its wielder?

Entrerist

It was stated that severance is so powerful that it would probably kill the wielder. Masego and Roland thought about building a suit of armor to use it. The mirror knight is probably the only one who can use it without hurting himself too much.

Shveiran

It was also implied by the Bard that MK picking it up was one of her plans, so something is going to go wrong there.

moongazer13

I feel like, by the Mirror Knight using the Severance, its power will be depleted to the point it will no longer be a weapon capable of killing the Dead King. Because WB wanted all their options for killing the Dead King destroyed. I doubt that the Mirror Knight is the only character that could use the sword (with enough time Masego and everyone else could find another option like the armor), and if that was the case WB would have targeted him for death in some other way. She set it up so he would be forced to use the sword. WB wants the alliance in tatters and all other options destroyed so Cordelia has to use the Judgement Corpse.

Mental Mouse

As someone else (Liliet?) said, "you can't kill a god with a used macguffin!"

Insanenoodlyguy

Surgeon has yet to be tapped, even though he was introduced. That Chekov's gun is going to need to go off and presumably it will be to save one of the people who should be dying but are not quite dead yet.

Liliet

I think they'll both survive this.

Entrerist

And he will be called Hakram Deadman.

TeK

Dead the hand and dead the leg.
And another hand is dead.
Dead a shoulder, dead a foot.
Half a torso dead to boot.

laguz24

Wow, WB you really don't know how to lose. Also, I'm more worried about the long term. Assuming WK stopped the assassination attempt on Cordelia. Then how will the truce and terms fare now, since apparently there are traitors everywhere? Though now, WB's credibility is gone for good this time. That will cost her dearly, in ways she can't even imagine it.

Insanenoodlyguy

someone else pointed things out up above, but "Hard Way" Might be fueled by this as a contingency. How do you ensure you can die? By being the biggest, baddest villain around. Dead King has taken great time and pain to avoid the pitfalls of this. But what if you had a glorious bitch who rode it harder then Tyrant ever did deliberately? The plan might only be HELPED by all the heroes now realizing she wants to destroy them and uniting against her. After all, it take everybody working together to kill the ultimate threat.

dadycool

When someone with her level of meta-knowledge is trying to die, there are several ways to go about it. She could become a sacrificial mentor, but she doesn't care enough about the people around her and also can't Die For Real. She could be the Protagonist that topples the Big Bad in a Pyrrhic victory, but Triumphant, may she never return, and the Dead King are the only ones who could possible qualify, but here DK was the only one she could consider an equal and he made sure to never at any point in history be anything other than a far-off force of nature whose wrath can only be kindled in self-defense. The only option available that I can see is to check off every entry in the Biggest Bad checklist so a plucky Hero has to Kill her off For Real, facilitated by getting the whole world to unite against its oppressor, like as if Triumphant...now that's a scary thought: WB bringing back Triumphant.

Liliet

Triumphant is dead. Gone. Beyond. Won't return. She's history. She's an ex-Triumphant.

Rey d`Tutto

Triumphant is pining for the Fjords.

dadycool

I heard she was a "permanent" resident of a hell, with an unspecified number of Legions. I also heard there was enough uncertainty that she's still terrifying to think about.

TeK

We got a WoG that afterlife is not definitive in Guideverse, having Triumphant returning would be messy pandering, that breaks established rules. Besides, it's the last book, Triumphant does not have enough development to be a proper end-villain, she would not cut it.

dadycoool

I kinda feel like I could site DK owning his own hell and Warlock being able to escape a hell by exiting through another one, but you're right, it would be too much of a "Surprise! The real enemy was Hitler all along!"

Darkening

Just because there are hells full of demons that people can visit and return from, doesn't mean that's where souls go when they die. Hell, if that is where souls go when they die I imagine Warlock'd have tapped into that resource to power something long since. With very few exceptions, death is not cheap in the Guideverse. Pilgrim being one of those exceptions and now even that's been closed off.

TeK

Hell isn't an afterlife though. It's where devils and demons lived. That is why I quoted God... Well, EE. He was asked the question along the same lines and said that it's unknown where exactly souls go.

"After all, faith would be pretty meaningless if afterlife was a physical certainty."

He does have a way with word. It's not even an epigraph, but stuck in my head nonetheless. I swear, those epigraphs though are like half the reason I fell in love with a story.

Liliet

I actually genuinely cannot tell if you're memeing or confused. This fucking fandom.

Liliet

I'm pretty sure the hard way refers to her not dying from this.

I can't wait what the fuck that WOULD BE lmao

mamm0nn

"Been talking to him?" the woman who had once been a girl said.

Wait, who are we talking about here? This is literally every adult woman.

Thinks

Ah, Nods sagely it must be Inger the orc lieutenant, on her way to becoming a new fan favourite. Yes, makes sense.

But seriously, for all that these are two great chapters, the way they're continuously describing Cat by any stretch is starting to get ridiculous. It's like those writers that try any synonym and variation like 'she exclaimed' to avoid saying 'she said' repeatedly.

agumentic

It was clearly done on purpose, not just to avoid repetitions. Probably to indicate how many roads

agumentic

...for development of Cat's name there is.

PS: Typing on phone can be really annoying.

Liliet

Def on purpose. Erratic doesn't normally write like this, the narration was confusingly whirling around because in-universe narrative was confusingly whirling around.

Jordan Leighton

It's a reference to her relationship with Black. It's right there. Exactly how it's being done I'll leave to interpretation, but look back with that lenses and it makes perfect sense

TeK

I thought it was reference for "The girl who climbed the tower" thong.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Interesting typo there. Color me intrigued.

knockoffnikolai

Cat's going up against the Wandering Bard. Every one of those descriptors implied a story about Cat.

mamm0nn

Do not worry, I shall dispel the illusion so that the truth shall be unveiled.

Fake Kingfisher disappears.

Ah, I see. It's-

The illusion Kingfisher's glorious moustache disappears to show his unhaired lip

Proceran gasp!

Kingfisher: Menacing Had I failed to save the Red Axe, I would've willingly go into impoverished exile for my failures. Had I struck down many a soldier, I would've accepted my abdication by the First Prince. But this- This... I'm afraid I cannot let anyone leave now that you've witnessed a truth that should've remained hidden... Slowly picks up sword.

TeK

That is why you wear fake mustache, you bloody amateur.

Juff

Typo Thread:

Wandering part > Wandering Bard hundreds years now > hundreds of years, now time," the > time." The
that is it > that it is loves fucks always > love always no not speak > do not speak stead, it > stead; it Stops this > Stop this woman Free Cities > woman of the Free Cities know it would clever > know it would be clever his speak > his peak villain," the > villain." The are," the > are." The she coat gave > the coat gave it the Light > the Light she shouldn't have > he shouldn't have turn into a rain of deadly shard > turned into a rain of deadly shards hard turn (not sure what this should be) her eyed > her eyes
Where, then was > Where, then, was Found state. > Found stated.
you what you > what you else," Catherine > else." Catherine

caoimhinh

Too bad, Bard. You lost in all senses, Cat beat you and you still couldn't die.

You Lost The Game

Liliet

I cannot fucking wait for what she means by 'the hard way' lmao

RoflCat

The way I understand it, on the assumption that Bard's goal is relieve from her Name:

She was a very competent worker that the superiors keep throwing all kind of works onto her, and they kept refusing to let her leave.

So she decided to train someone to be as competent at the job as her, and 'screw up' so the superiors might see this new girl and replace her position.

But they still have her keep her position.

So now it's time to burn the whole fucking office down for freedom.

Liliet

Yep, that's kind of my read too.

TIME TO SEE THE WORLD BURN, BARD EDITION

caoimhinh

What's your hypothesis for a possible "hard way" of the Bard? It could easily be messing with them on a whole new level to force more drastic measures.

Considering that this whole mess was done by new characters not even mentioned in previous books (except the Bard), it could continue with that trend, though it could be "the hard way" is something that had been glimpsed but not used before.

Assuming it won't be pulled out of the 2-years-time-skip's ass, I think there are 4 options from strong factions that have been named but not touched during previous chapters:

-Causing trouble with the Gigantes (Maybe sabotaging the meeting with the Gigantes representative)

-Making the Elves move. The Bard has history with them, though they are isolationists so this one is unlikely, yet we have seen them on the move before (they tried to prevent Akua's Folly but the Bard stopped them).

-Messing with Malicia, having her take a more active role in the war, though we already saw she is making a move, hence Vivi and Cordelia wanting to meet Cat soon.

-Bringing a threat from out of the Continent. (this one is highly unlikely, considering EE said the rest of the world won't be explored in this series and there are plenty of ways to mess with Cat without bringing an overseas empire at play now)

Liliet

I don't think it's Cat Bard's going to be messing with now. One, narratively that would be kind of ehh – Cat's already taken this personal step, rehashing it again won't be interesting or necessary. Bard is NOT Cat's story rival, we just established that.

Two, messing with Cat was "doing it all right". Whatever "the hard way" is, it's most definitely not more of the same 😊

TeK

She already had a plan that had continent-wrecking consequences, the use of a bloody Judgement-corpse. How do people ignore that?

SpeckofStardust

I would assume that 'the hard way' means she will no longer play games.

As in her duties are now the priority rather than her wish.

She can't die or get a replacement so that she can die.

Which leaves her with her job. After all...

She was not talking at Cat when she said the hard way, she was Talking to her bosses.

Liliet

I like the "burn the office down" hypothesis :3

Eileen

Well she must guide stories in creation... no creation no stories right? No more toys for the gods either.

Liliet

That's one version, but I think Bard cares about things outside of herself more than that.

JJR

"Gather round peasants, and I'll teach you the ancient secrets of Natural Philosophy."

ominous gnome noises

Anonymous

I wonder how many people here are familiar with The Game.

Liliet

So this has been fucking awesome.

I'm going to count "Bard did not want to win" in my corner for this one.

I hope Frederic is okay =x

Insanenoodlyguy

She still failed though. By whichever way her motivations truly ran, she failed. Tyrant was a minor mistake, but this was a major one. Her unbeatability has been cracked, and if cat won't grow into the person who can keep up with her, she's going to grow into a person beyond her.

ninegardens

Sounds a heck of a lot like the gods offered her an out: get Catherine to replace you, and your time is done.

That, or she thought she could make Cat into her new rival, so that the dance between her and DK would be allowed to finish.

Also: random question;

If Cat doesn't want to be set up/trapped as WB rival then ummmm... is playing games with her and then trapping her and slitting her throat a good idea? Seems like leaning into it to me.

Insanenoodlyguy

because it wasn't shaped yet. The idea would be to make Cat have a name opposing Bard, then killing Bard would slot her neatly into the complementary role. The rival, thief, successor, a title taken by combat and conquering. But instead, Cat skipped that middle part and just BEAT her. Now Bard is just another person she's stomped down. You don't get made the successor of some bitch you stomped down.

Liliet

The mistake was, I think, hoping that Catherine would be able to kill her.

The thing about trying to achieve effects on this level, it's not really about pitting your strength against the opposition. It's about making sure your opposition's efforts are channeled in a way that helps you in the first place. Opposition, what opposition?

(See: Malicia, Cordelia and the Truebloods)

TeK

I think she hoped that killing her would be enough for Cat to succeed her Name, as for Villains that particular method is par the course. But Gods refused to let her go because they dislike whatever the outcome would be of Cat being the resident nudger.

So she was hoping that there would be enough weight for Cat to have succeeded her, which would've killed her as sure as dawn. And that is not an unreasonable assumption, given that many real reader theorised very much the same. She failed to account for Chekhov's theorem of unresolved plotlines however. If there is a gun hanging on a wall in the first act, a person who supposed to shoot it in the third act can't leave the story in the second. By assuring the existence of a contingency she made it near certainty that it would have to be used.

Liliet

> But Gods refused to let her go because they dislike whatever the outcome would be of Cat being the resident nudger.

I don't think the Gods were interfering or making any decisions here. This one was baked into her Name and Role from the start: either this would be enough to free her, or not. It wasn't.

TeK

Well she sure blames someone else for that.

Liliet

I mean. Gods were presumably the ones who baked it into there. Or responsible for it with some degree of distance anyway.

TeK

So they did interfere or made a decision there, because otherwise she wouldn't blame them, right?

And personally, I would reserve a condition to pick a successor when he is born, if such a condition existed at all. It's not like the Gods could not have helped her and made Cat into Bard 2.0, it's just that they didn't.

Liliet

Why wouldn't she blame them for a decision that had been made millenia ago and she found out just now?

TeK

That sounds like a poor HR. Rather than choosing a successor thousands years in advance, long before culture that would shape him/her is even born, would not make more sense to review applications as they come?

Liliet

Huh?

That's not what I mean.

I mean when Bard first got her employment contract there was small print about whether or not she's allowed to get successor'd at all, and Bard's only finding out NOW that the answer had been 'no lol' all along.

TeK

Oh. Well that is kinda hilarious, she just can't take the joke.

TeK

Amateur move really, she should've used Abigail's maneuver: act so incompetent they would have no chance but to lay you off. She should've arranged for Cordelia and Amaya to fall in love and legalise same-sex marriage by uniting their realms through the wedlock. With Tyrant undercutting Ranger in the fight of Black's affections. Make Calernia such a clusterfuck of bad writing, the Gods would've facepalmed her to death.

Liliet

We have no evidence she hasn't tried this before.

I'm just saying.

TeK

And then she used the Demon of Absence.

Liliet

Nah, that's the real origin of the Free Cities

(She lated tried to fix it with Hierarch. It didn't work.)

Liliet

Also, same-sex marriage is legal, as evidenced by Wekesa and Tiko. Clear proof.

TeK

To be fair, laws of Praes also legalised cannibalism at one point. Can't judge everyone by Praesi standards, they are clearly much more progressive than the rest of Calernia.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

I know you're joking, but same-sex marriage is almost guaranteed to already be legal. We have yet to see a culture in the Guideverse that stigmatizes same-sex relationships, and when Talbot's efforts to get Cat to start a dynasty were still being given screentime he mentioned that they can use miracles to enable same-sex couples to reproduce together.

I'll grant you that, as you pointed out, the one marriage of this sort we've seen for sure is an atypical one in an atypical country, but so far as I can tell homophobia has just straight up never been invented in-universe, so...

Scout

You forgot the dwarf pair who are only restricted due to rank, rather than gender.

TeK

True. However I did not really thought about same sex when I written this example, it was more of a “irreconcilable enemies” part. There are much more same sex rivalries in this story than not. Didn’t occur to me that it would be such a sticking point.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Fair enough.

ciara

Weird that your definition of bad writing is “marriage equality” (also Abigail’s maneuver has yet to succeed for poor Abigail herself)

TeK

More of an improbable marriage really. You can swap it to my old theory that Dead King wanted to marry Cat.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Yeah, that theory hasn’t aged super well.

TeK

I kinda like ot, in the absurd sort of way. It’s like cheese. The mold makes it even tastier 😊

Isi Arnott-Campbell

I see what you mean.

Oshi

I will not be happy until I know what they do to Hakram. I have this stupid theory that Cat comes into her name with what she does with/for him. Everything about Hakram is tied to Cat and he can’t follow her into where she’s going the way he is now.

Jessica Day

This chapter and the last are riveting.

Wonder

It stands to reason the only person to wield Severance without it striking him dead is the Mirror Knight.

So Cat picked Masego along when she was heading to the Intercessor and he hid in the Night.

That is a lot of heroes turning traitors to their side. I can only hope that Cat rubs it in their faces the next time a hero tries to preach righteousness.

It seems the Grey Pilgrim and the White Knight were right to worry about Cat's Name at the end of last book. It appears to be something that can contend with the Dead King and the Wandering Bard.

How long are we going to wait until it grows fully? Cat's old Name didn't take this long ,did it?

Masego is the vivisector of Miracles, does that mean even without magic ,he can create and wield those miracles he has seen? That would be so badass.

Liliet

Note: Maddened Keeper was not, in fact, a hero. Also seems to have killed herself in this for some godforsaken personal reason.

My guess as to Cat's Name: Black Queen. V 2.0

Masego used Night in this one – not the replica, the original. Cat's power that she lent him / that he Wrested from her. Borrowing her stuff was how he got the Aspect in the first place, remember? ^^

Oshi

We don't know the Keeper is dead. I won't believe it until the story confirms it. All the hints are that her physical form is not very important to her existence. I keep thinking maybe she has a form per seal and they only destroyed one of them?

Liliet

I think the hints are that her death is a Really Fucking Bad Thing 😊

hakureireimu

She got cut by Severance, made with the Saint's aspect that managed to cut Winter.

Darkening

Yeah, I figured something weird was going on with Keeper when Cat thought of her as a villain and the Mirror Knight described her as heroically containing evil things. Didn't think it was gonna turn out quite this extreme though. I imagine serving as the personal seal for 8 demons isn't exactly pleasant, so maybe Bard just said to her, "Hey, go here and do this and you'll die in a way that doesn't end up killing massive numbers of innocent people since they'll be able to kill the demons using the magic sword." And thus she gets to set her burden down. Would be an interesting mirror of the Bard's motivations as well.

Liliet

Huh, yeah.

TeK

She got a helpful stab by someone with an older Name and a right to appoint a successor.

Holy shit, was that whole arc just Bard's way of stabbing Cat to get her to the Name?

nick012000

What I want to know is who the Keeper of Stories is talking to at the end, there. Is she talking to Cat, or to the Gods Above and/or Below?

Liliet

I somehow just don't think it's Cat 😊

Xinci

So it looks like the Gods weren't satisfied with the depth of that victory. Fair enough I suppose, it didn't show complete methodological domination in all the functions Bard plays in their wager.

Also, the arcana having the same number as the numbered Hells is quite interesting. It seems that similar to Winter if things with domains are tied to a soul they can be affected by Creational patterns.

Liliet

I think Gods didn't give a shit. Maybe Bard hoped she would, but nope.

jack

Oh just _die_ you old bitch.

Liliet

Bard: WHAT DOES IT LOOK LIKE I'M TRYING TO DO YOU WHIPPERSNAPPER

Burlyraven

Listen, my boy Frederic better not be dead. Hakram's almost definitely alive (but damn, what a price), but I've gotten really attached to the Kingfisher Prince. And the Red Axe is almost certainly acting of her own volition (at least as much as a pawn of the Bard can), considering her supposed immunities.

There is a small chance that this could be her "helping", however, as she is an anti-mage.

Jworks

Did I read that wrong, or did Cat call Archer a Heroine?

Liliet

Where?

If it's in the section with Nephele, I think Cat's saying Nephele wasn't going to go where Archer is because she'll be exhausted and that'll be a fight.

That said, Indrani is Neutral, aka can fill the shoes of either.

sivarajan

Yes, you did; I did too. The "heroine like her" refers to the Repentant Magister, Nephele.

Oshi

Judgement lay with the Tower between it and the Empress, speckled with blood.

You guys think Catherine is Judgement?

TeK

I AM THE LAW!

TeK

Judging by the pattern, by the end of the book all that's left of Hakram would be a talking head.

Judgement, Tower and Empress are all appropriately ominous, given that both Judgement-corpse and Named Cordelia were Bard's plots that were, as we assume, thwarted. Except the thwartment of her plans left both the weapon and the hand on the trigger without a way for Gods to influence the outcome, be it through Name or Angels.

So Cordelia will fire Judgement-corpse, and that is Bard's final play. Divine Judgement without Divine guidance in mortal hands. Now that sets up a precedent, doesn't it? I wonder how that would kill her, if that is her game. That does seem a tad shallow and not enough though, as it does not fall under what Dead King would deem as "something that will make them all come after you". Although he could be meaning not mortals and Named, but rather Gods, and so she perhaps plans to do something to the Gods and the Fate?

And if she is the nudge of Gods onto Creation, does she perhaps want to bind them by their very rules to be unable to interfere with a Creation at all? Chess pieces conspiring to kill the players does have a rather poetic bent, doesn't it? Except unless that is exactly what Gods were after all along. The genuine spark of self-awareness stocked through conflict and fanned through the rebellion? With all due respect, any question having but two answers reeks of human perspective.

TeK

And given that this loss is likely the start of the Pattern of Three, Bard is owed a victory in a particularly gruesome way. Unless of course she plans to turn Bard's owed victory against Dead King, since she probably decided to tie him up as a gift for her retirement. Something along the lines of using that weapon against the Dead King, with the use of it bitterly opposed by Cat will count as victory enough. And if truly pressed, Boner can give some sweet deal against Bard Cat knows she will be tempted by, so having a guaranteed win will help Bard deny Neshie this chance. Moreover, allying herself with him will give Bard a clean shot.

Unless she actually secretly sympathises Bard and is planning to give her even stronger win against the Gods. There is a reason we have Interludes right now, as being privy to her plans right now would lessen the impact of whatever unexpected twist is yet to come.

Liliet

> And given that this loss is likely the start of the Pattern of Three It's specifically not. Cat denied the rivalry.

TeK

While playing Bard on her chosen field, using her chosen tools, acknowledging that she can be a rival, and winning? Nobody asked Cat if she wants to be considered a rival, it's for Creation to decide. Like with Pilgrim, she did not really had a choice in recognizing him as a rival, with Aqua she didn't even know she had a Pattern at all.

Mind you we still don't know her plans or even her goals, and my experience of three years with novel tells me that it is explicitly NOT what anyone thinks. Or at least, I've yet to read a correct prediction of major plot twist.

Liliet

Nah, Cat specifically used different tools than Bard's chosen. Notably she relied on a friend's help and physical stabbing.

TeK

And yet you can't deny that she rivaled Bard on her field. That she dunwanna be a Bard's rival is inconsequential. There may not be any pattern of three, but rivals they very much are.

Liliet

Nope.

"As good as" and "rivals" are not the same story, and one only implies the other if the two are opposed / trying to do the same thing at the same time.

TeK

They are opposed, they are very much alike. There is more rivalry going on between them than with Cat and any other of her nemesises. They both fight against the same enemy, but disagree on particulars, like with William. They both represent a particular approach to the way stories go, and a winner will establish narrative for decades to come, like with Aqua. And like with Pilgrim, they are both representative leaders of their side of the fence, striving against each other. And well, given how it went is Tariq, it can be argued that Cat is owed a third Pattern of Three to finish the narrative.

Liliet

You are taking "they are opposed" as gospel here.

TeK

Then that is the crux of an issue. I consider them opposed. You don't. Either way there is an irreconcilable difference in perspective. They would be rivals if they were opposed, right?

Liliet

Opposition is a funny thing. They're working on a high enough meta level where "are we opposed" is just one of the variables they can play with.

TeK

I guess that's too meta for me. I just don't see it. Unless she pulls "we where allies all along", for me opposition is undeniable.

Liliet

I very much expect Bard to have been helping Cat in highly questionable ways all along – since Second Liesse, to the degree that that counted as help. (One could argue it was better for Cat to not have become that version of The Black Queen.) (Bard's not motivated by Cat's best interest either way so the point is moot, Cat's a convenient tool that does what Bard wants, especially if shaped and nudged properly)

TeK

Quite.

TeK

Perhaps we differently interpreted some parts of chapter. Namely where Cat says that Bard tries to twist her Name into one in opposition to her, instead of something she naturally evolves into. And then implied thwartment of those plans.

I however see that what was denied not the fact that Cat's in opposition to Bard, for that indeed would be hard to deny, but rather, the shaping of a Name into something that would be a "rival, thief, successor" to Bard's Name. It was not a denial of rivalry, just the Name part of it, and Cat already had a Pattern of Three without a Name, so no reason for Pattern to disappear now.

Liliet

There... wasn't a pattern of three?

And Cat denied the whole thing. Bard was trying to shape her Role, and that encompasses both the Name and any patterns Cat's a part of. Cat won the struggle over the story period, here.

TeK

That doesn't mean she is not her rival. She defeated Bard in story-fu for crying out loud. Cat denied a Name revolved around being an eternal partner of Bards, a partisan just like Alistair the Fox, a perpetual underdog. A Name that would require Bard to continue living no less. She did not denied being in opposition to Bard.

Liliet

I'd say she went "you are not my rival because you are pathetic and not on my level"

TeK

Well that is patently untrue. She scraped a victory, but not the kind that will let her talk like that. We still see the repercussions playing out

Auston Varner

A regular, healthy orc head atop a skeletal/ghostly body would be quite a sight

TeK

Not on top of the body, but in the jar, like in Futurama.

Draconic

But we know, oh we know,
That in the night, the cat is queen
Yes we know, oh we know
That in the night, the cat is queen

Zim the Vixen

Hmmm.

I'm curious about Bard's motivation behind her use of Judgement. Arguably, this was a contingency she set into place in the very likely case that Cat couldn't kill her. But, what if Cat had killed her?

She'd be setting fire to the world and telling us to fuck ourselves as she left the (im)mortal coil. Does she really feel that much contempt for the world? Does she simply value her death over everything else? Is this something that she expected Cat to handle, if Bard weren't around to fan the flames? Or was this her Name literally and metaphorically forcing her hand in case she disappeared?

Also, I'm hecking pumped for getting the entire song being about foxes 😊

Letouriste

A great chapter but it was hard on the nerves, hakram in that state, the prince maybe dead, several traitors still around, the whole cat/bard thing etc..

I was scared for a second cat's Name was Trickster given the T and she could have transitioned without realizing, she was close after all

Darkening

Heh, I had to go back and reread the whole chapter at one point looking to see if she was referred to by name because if it kept vague I was sure she'd have a name reveal at the end of it.

Daniel E

As of this writing, not a single comment as mentioned- poor Adjutant 😞 I wonder if his spirit hand trick works on his leg.

Daniel E

Hey look at that, I can post in real time again, no more * moderation! I'll take this opportunity to revive a crazy conspiracy theory I had several books ago; Bard is actually The Story incarnate, all of the metaphysical rules of Gods & Providence made manifest. To what end, I have no idea, but there it is.

TeK

Having your story try kill yourself juat so it would end (please) is a considerable self-burn.

Shveiran

A dead Adjutant was not what I wanted for my birthday, but still, this was one heck of a chapter.

As always, nicely done. Thank you for all you have gifted us.

Daniel E

Not dead, but his dancing days are over.

TeK

And he was never much of a ballet enthusiast.

Shveiran

I mean, he has lost half his body to a weapon that's sharper than Juniper's salute, there is no healer around, he is out of Stands, and Catherine clearly mentioned that "they", which I read as Woe, paid a price. Mutilation could be it, but I feel that would be too little. I fear our Adjutant could be a goner.

Thanatoss

Now we all know few things:

1. Bard wants to die.
2. Hierophant and Cat can not stop her infinite rebirths.
3. Maddened Keeper was traitor and dying fcked over Mirror Knight and Adjutant, but MK can wield Severence.

Now question is, how well can Cat help them, we know she will risk all to save MK and Adjutant, unless she sends Masego there...
Hmmm I can't wait.

Great chapter

flashburn283

Good lord, the Bard is harder to kill than Deadpool and Rasputin combined.

If Above is not setting her up to be locked in permanent combat with the Dead King in some tiny extra-dimensional prison, what the hell are they doing?

Daniel E

Wait wait, something just occurred to me. How in the nine Hells is Masego doing any of this? He still has his knowledge of magic, but lacks the power to use it. He shouldn't be capable of fixing wards or catching a soul.

laguz24

He was hijacking night and I suppose the wavelengths are similar enough to magic that he can.

TeK

Also he did it once already, and that is arguably how he fell into an aspect in the first place.

tithin

He is still named, he still has aspects so while he might not be able to use magic implicitly, he can use it explicitly via Wrest – which is what Cat hinted at very strongly.

onedollargum

Did Cat just break the Accords?

Javvies

Nope.

First, the Accords don't exist yet.

Second, Bard would not fall under the protection of the Accords because she keeps dragging other people onto things.

Third, even under the Accords, Named are going to be allowed to kill each other, there are just limits on the means and methods they can use and restrictions on involving other people.

If you meant the Truce and Terms, again, no, Cat hasn't broken them.

First, Bard hasn't signed on to them, and so would not be entitled to any protection from them.

Second, even if Bard had signed onto the Truce and Terms, she would have violated the fuck out of them, and so Cat's actions against Bard would constitute enforcing the Truce and Terms.

Third, Bard was in the middle of attacking the Arsenal and the Truce and Terms themselves, so principles of immediate self defense apply, and it's not like Bard can be stopped with nonlethal methods.

Eleron Pfoutz

Cat has won this Pattern of Three. This bodes either terrifyingly badly for the War for Calernia and equally greatly for Cat, or vice versa.

Shveiran

Not everything is a Pattern of Three. There is no reason to believe this is the start of one.

sivarajan

"Carrion Lord's daughter." That's never gonna stop being heartwarming.

0pointmass

Creation is just an experiment/piss fight for the gods Above and Below. The Choirs and the demonic forces are 'in' the framework of the system they created and it revolves and resolves itself with no actual interference except the interferences of Providence which we all have seen and that of the "last dues" which was clearly shown Hierophant's father when he destroyed Thalassina. Now I believe that the systems rules change or evolve according to the age (eg Age of Wonders) by the collective psyche of the beings that inhabit creation. That essentially means that Catherine while ushering the Age of Order will have to be put against each and every crazy thing defined the Age of Wonders like the WB and the DK before the Age of Order is truly cemented by her Accords.

As for the WB she has said before that " when the time is kind I am also kind and when it's not..i do what's necessary. When it is mine, itry to find the story that will save creation." So she really just wants creation to escape Above's and Below's grasp. But she can only act through stories... So she has her work cut out for her.

Dead King is just the megalomaniac arrogant big bad ruler that he seems to be. And well.... He did kind of created his own system of magic and arrived at the godhead all on his own so he kinda has the qualifications...

Conclusion as pertaining to this chapter: probably the hard way refers to WB unloading the Age of Wonders baddies she has held captives aka Dread empress Triumphant who by the way is The most Renowned diabolist to have ever graced creation. Or at least I hope if only for the epicness that will follow...

P. S. Sorry for the big comment.

P. S2 E.E. keep up the good work

Aranaya

"Hierophant," she said.

Oh, THAT'S why

Aranaya

the struggle had left untouched one of the affrays – the Empress, the Tower – save for one card that'd fallen from the Bard's sleeve in her death throes.

I guess that's it for Frederic Goethal then? Still don't understand what Red Axe was doing there or why.

Chapter 23: Repercussions

"Giving battle is as being made to wed one of two ugly sisters—even if you get the prettier of the bargains to be had, it is still a dreadful affair all around."

– Princess Clothilde of Arans, the Cautious

It was a subtle thing, but when you were looking for it the change was noticeable. There was now a certain weight to the place that'd not been there before, a resistance to power that'd earlier waned. My steps stuttered and Masego moved halfway towards glancing at me in question, though in truth his eyes of glass were merely staring at me through his own head.

"I think the wards were just restored," I said.

"Possible," Hierophant acknowledged. "May I?"

I nodded, suppressing a grimace, and the air shivered with the power of his aspect. The Hierophant used his will to Wrest the Night away from me, as he had earlier when we'd trapped the Intercessor, and I gave token resistance before letting him win. We'd found out if worked better if he got control by winning a conflict, even the resistance was largely ceremonial. I didn't much enjoy the sensation of having my power stripped from me, or of losing for that matter – I'd never been one to enjoy defeat even when the real victory was in throwing the fight. Masego shaped the Night into small pinpricks, gathering dewlike drops of it with a finesse I could not replicate despite my best efforts, and detonated them one after another. He varied the size of the pinpricks according to some eldritch arithmetic, observing the detonations with care, and only when the last had vanished did he slowly nod.

"Someone has activated the emergency wards," Hierophant told me. "Repairing the true arrays will take time and mage cabals, but these will be enough to prevent further incursions by extradimensional entities."

"Will it keep them in?" I asked.

"So long as they do not force one of the designated gates, yes," Masego said. "Though I do not speak in absolutes, as sufficiently powerful fae can brute force their way through such things and demons usually require wards tailored to them."

"We might have eight demons on the loose, Zeze," I cursed. "They need to be contained, and quick."

The tall mage offered me a reassuring smile.

"Don't worry about them escaping into Creation," he said. "In nearly all observed cases, they will first devour the entire pocket dimension before trying to move beyond it."

"And," I slowly said, just to confirm, "by 'pocket dimension', in this case you mean the Arsenal?"

"Yes," he smiled, visibly pleased by my understanding.

"The Arsenal, where we and a lot of people and priceless artefacts are?" I continued.

"Yes," Masego agreed once more. "So do not worry, since if the demons do get into Creation we will be long dead – or at least no longer truly aware, as living vectors of demonic infection."

The whole reassuring thing was a bit of a work in progress with him, I mused, but at least his heart was in the right place.

"Well, that's certainly something," I muttered. "Would you mind releasing the Night?"

"Of course," Hierophant agreed.

Much as he immediately complied when I asked him that, I thought it telling that he always kept the Night until that very moment. Indrani had told me he'd taken the loss of his magic well, and from what I'd seen of him I'd tended to agree, but no one took that harsh a loss without it leaving some scars. No one liked losing power, especially if you'd been skilled at using it, and there had been few mages more skilled than Masego.

"Let's go," I said. "The sooner we get to the Knot the better."

"I still do not know why we are headed there," Masego reminded me.

He got walking, though, and I got limping. It'd do.

"The Sinister Physician is there," I said.

I'd made sure of that, assigning him healing duties at the crossroads of the Arsenal before disappearing.

"He has already seen to your wound," Hierophant pointed out.

My hand almost went to the still-blood mark on my neck where the Fallen Monk's knife had sunk into my flesh. That'd been a nasty surprise. I wasn't a fool, I'd suspected that a traitor was going to come after me, but the metaphysical Night tripwires I'd put up on the stairs after the Poet and the Monk went up hadn't warned me of the coming backstab at all. I'd lost all hold on Night, maybe because of some aspect of the Monk's, and it'd poured out of me as a sea of blackflame. It'd gone around the Fallen Monk, though I'd felt him try and fail to seize control of it, but still singed him some just by the heat and killed every fae at the bottom of the Belfry besides. That'd been enough to spook him into fleeing, thank the Crows, because if he'd actually stuck around...

I'd had little to no control over the Night for an uncomfortable amount of time after the blow, and I'd come closer than I liked to admit to simply bleeding out. Even when I'd achieved mastery once more, the best I'd been able to do was prevent the cut veins from killing me by freezing blood flow and limp my way to the closest healer, the Sinister Physician. Roland might have been able to help, but with fae still up there and other potential traitors it would have been a risk – easier to feign my own death, and slide the Monk's knife into the corpse most closely resembling me I had at hand. I'd figured it would warn Archer when she came to try to find me, and I'd been right: she'd grasped my intentions without a word ever being spoken between us.

"Catherine?" Masego gently said.

I shook my head. My thoughts were drifting, as much from the blood loss as the exhaustion.

"I sent him there as a beacon of sorts," I told Zeze. "He is a healer, in a known and easily accessible position. Any Named from my indirect conflicts with the Intercessor-"

"These affrays," Hierophant carefully said, as if trying out the word.

"I was trying to protect things, or people, and she was trying to break them," I agreed. "But if anyone got seriously hurt and they aren't dead, they'll be headed to the Knot and the Sinister Physician – because he's there and visible and obviously helpful."

"A beacon to gather people," Masego frowned, eyes swivelling as he thought. "So by heading there now, we will learn what has happened in your 'affrays'."

"I have some idea," I said. "If the cards were truthful, anyway. But it should get me the information quickly and in depth, yeah. There's also another use."

He half-turned towards me but said nothing, the invitation silent.

"There'll be mages and soldiers there," I said, "as well as Named. If we're going to contain the demons and the fae before this gets any worse, we're going to need all of those."

I was not looking forward to tangling with demons again. Hopefully Hakram wouldn't be too gravely wounded from whatever it was the Bard had arranged to hurt him, I thought, fingers clenching. A leg lost, an arm or perhaps an eye? Gods, why was he always the one who ended paying in flesh for our mistakes? The Mirror Knight would have taken up the sword, so if we were lucky he'd cut down parts of the opposition before we got there. If we were unlucky, well... Best be prepared to put down a corrupted Christophe of Pavanie, wielding a sword that'd been made to kill a lesser god. As much as you could ever prepare for something like that, anyway. The grim thoughts stayed with me as we passed through stone hallways nearly indistinguishable from one another, hurrying as much as we could without running outright.

The Knot was a riot of activity when we stumbled in from one of the upper halls, the Sinister Physician having organized what looked like an impressive field infirmary from Arsenal supplies. Half the cots were filled with soldiers, only the most lightly wounded of them kept awake instead of placed under a sleeping spell. Priests and mages were swarming all around but the Sinister Physician himself was seeing to a pair of cots set apart from the rest and from each other. In more ways than one, I thought, since one of the people on the cots was bound by leather straps and had half a tenth of crossbowmen trained on her at all times. That did not bode well. The healers in spell and Light parted for the two of us, offering words I only paid half attention to as we headed towards the Physician and my fear was confirmed.

"Fuck," I muttered under my breath.

One of those two wounded was Frederic Goethal, the Prince of Brus. The Kingfisher Prince as well, but it was the other princely title that'd be trouble in the coming days.

"Your Majesty," the Sinister Physician greeted me. "I am glad to see you in good health."

"As I am glad to be," I replied. "Would I be correct in assuming the woman tied down is the Red Axe?"

"She is," Masego said, before the other villain could.

The Physician eyed Hierophant with mild irritation but nodded.

"Her peculiarities mean initial treatment had to be done by priests, naturally," the Physician told me. "But I have been continuing the work with alchemies, which she does not seem to affect."

"How bad?" I asked.

"Prince Frederic will have scarring on the side of his neck, but no more than that," he replied. "Part of it was the Magister's stabilizing intervention, but there appears to have been another manner of interference. He was struck with his own sword, which seems to have sorcery laid into the steel that made it reluctant – if not incapable – to kill its own wielder. The blow was deep but avoided the jugular."

I glanced at Masego, who nodded.

"The Bitter Blacksmith, by which I mean not Helmgard but her brother, would be capable of this," Hierophant said. "He has the Gift, and skill with it."

Thank the Gods for him, then. I rather liked the Prince of Brus, and that aside his death would have been a political mess of legendary proportion.

"And the Red Axe?" I asked.

"Hovering at the edge of life and death," the sallow-skinned man frankly said. "She was shot by twenty-three crossbow bolts, including one that pierced her liver and two that went in her lungs. If another had been half an inch to the side, it would have taken her through the heart and she would have died before getting here."

My eyes moved to the woman in question, prone in her cot. She didn't look like much, not that people ever did when they'd lost that much blood. Brown hair, tanned skin, muscled arms. Not tall, either, even prone I could tell as much. A lot of trouble for such a small package. When I tore away my gaze, I found the Sinister Physician was studying me closely.

"Despite my best efforts and those of the priests," the Sinister Physician mildly said, "it is, of course, possible she will die. These things do happen, Your Majesty."

It was an offer, however indirectly made.

If I were a better woman, I would have refused it outright. Without hesitation. Instead I considered the notion. If the heroine died bedridden, shot by soldiers, I would not need to have her executed and deal with the outrage from Above's crowd over the matter. It would also nip in the bud the mess that would come from a Named having tried to murder a ruling prince of Procer, and how that was simply not something Cordelia Hasenbach would be able to let go. It'd be murder, of course. Sure, the Physician would be the one carrying out the deed for me, but the order would have been mine. The weight of this would be on my shoulders. But what was one more life, these days, one more splash of blood on the stone? How many had I killed by my hand or by my words?

I was a little late for scruples, wasn't it?

If it were found out, though, it's be a disaster. I'd be breaking the Truce and Terms and given my position in that arrangement the very foundation of them would be rocked. So long as the Sisters were with me, though, I was beyond truthtelling even if the heroes had suspicions. It's a secret, and the Arsenal is a gathering place of Named. Yet that was not an absolute rule, a certainty. If dark deeds were done cleverly, and cleverly hidden, they could remain secret. I clenched my fingers and unclenched them, looking at the Red Axe once more as the silence grew long. I should have felt pity for her, I thought, or perhaps sympathy – she had been forged in pain, like most Named, and it had led a pitiless ancient to make use of her. Yet I did not. All I could see was the consequences of her actions, all the way down to Keter swallowing this continent whole. There was no place for pity in that vision.

Yet I had made rules, hadn't I? Rules to govern these conflicts between heroes and villains, between Named and laws. The Truce and Terms had been raised in no small part by my hand, and they had been my design since their inception. They were, in the end, the first step towards the Liesse Accords becoming truth instead of remaining ink. If I broke those rules, if I didn't have faith in them, then who would? Who should? How could I ask anyone to follow them when I broke them at my own leisure whenever I thought it best? One of the Old Tyrants, Terribilis the Second, had once written that you should never make a law you did not intend to enforce – because allowing it to be broken lessened all other laws.

I would be lessening all I had built if I did this. Even if I got away with it.

"It would be best," I finally said, "if she made it through."

"I am sure she will, Your Majesty," the Sinister Physician said, just as mildly as he had offered her death. "I will return to my duties, if you have no further questions."

"Please do," I replied.

I watched him walk away, Hierophant standing at my side.

"Did he just offer to murder the Red Axe?" Zeze leaned in to ask, sounding puzzled.

"Quiet," I murmured, but nodded.

"He could have made it plainer what it was he was saying," Masego resentfully muttered.

He wasn't all that troubled at the notion of the killing, or that I'd seriously considered it, but then for all that his family had made him essentially untouchable Hierophant had spent much of his childhood and adolescence in Praes. People killed themselves over theatre seats, there. Politics saw enough red flow to rival rivers. I realized a moment later that I did still have a question for the Physician, though I supposed asking one of the officers would serve just as well. The villain had mentioned that Nephele's sorcery had kept the Kingfisher Prince alive long enough for him to be brought to a healer whose metaphorical gourd wasn't running empty, but I'd never actually learned where she went after that.

A slower, more careful look around told me there was less of a force to muster here than I would have liked. Maybe thirty soldiers, from those a few of mine and more from the Dominion. A dozen priests were seeing to the wounded, with half that in mages – most of them Proceran, by the looks of it, so barely passable as war casters – and it wasn't like I could strip them from the infirmary without endangering those being seen to. The lightly wounded would survive that, but those who'd lost a limb or worse would be at risk. We'll all be at risk if demons devour this place, I reminded myself, and none of the soldiers here will do much difference if a Duke of Autumn finds this place.

I'd moved on to considering which officer to approach, as the ranking one here seemed to be a Levantine captain but my natural leaning was to rustle up a few Army sergeants and get my people forming up, when the first question I would have asked answered itself. The Repentant Magister emerged from one of the side halls, escorted by a good forty soldiers – two full lines from the Army of Callow – and the Blade of Mercy. Her eyes found mine and I nodded a greeting, watching as she thanked the ranking lieutenant with courtesy and headed straight towards me. Us, I was reminded when Masego shuffled silently at my side.

"She is on the very edge of burning out," Hierophant told me. "And nearly out of trinkets."

I nodded in acknowledgement, then pitch my voice low.

"If you wrested her sorcery from her grasp," I quietly asked, "would she still be at risk of that when you used it?"

"I am uncertain," he admitted after a moment. "The nature of the Night and your own prodigious affinity for it make you a poor subject to use as the base of a theory."

"You haven't experimented with the aspect?" I said, genuinely surprised.

He'd been the one who pushed me hardest to experiment with the limits of my mantle, when I'd been Sovereign of Moonless Nights.

"Not in a manner that would physically cripple or kill anyone should I misstep," Masego chided me. "There is much that can still be studied before only these mysteries remain."

Fair enough, I mused. The Repentant Magister was upon us, so the conversation ended, and though in other circumstances I would have been less than pleased to see the Blade of Mercy at her heels today I was even glad to see him.

"Your Majesty," Nephele greeted me, offering a bow. "Lord Hierophant."

"Nephele," Masego replied.

"Lady Eliade," I replied. "Blade of Mercy."

The boy hesitated but received an almost admonishing glance from the sorceress.

"Queen Catherine," the hero said, curtly bowing as well.

He did not greet Masego, not that Zeze cared in the slightest. By the fade of the glare behind his eyecloth, he was actually looking elsewhere while pretending to be paying attention.

"I understand I have you to thank for saving the life of the Kingfisher Prince, Lady Eliade," I said.

"I cannot claim to have saved him, only delayed until salvation came by other hands," the Repentant Magister replied. "But I receive your sentiment gratefully regardless."

"It's true, then," the Blade of Mercy said. "It was you who sent Prince Frederic to protect the Red Axe."

He was speaking somewhat rudely, but I could live with a little rudeness. Now was not the time to have a fit over manners.

"The Red Axe was used to sunder the Truce and Terms by a foe that kills through plots, the ancient creature known as the Wandering Bard," I replied. "I have been trying to warn people of her for years, but there has been... opposition from your side of the fence to having her declared an enemy. We are all paying the price for that dithering today."

There was no way the Grey Pilgrim would be able to keep fighting my push to have the Bard declared a foreign and hostile entity, one it would be treason to deal with, after the events of the last night and day. That didn't mean I wouldn't have him pay a tithe of blood and pride over this, though, or darken the Intercessor's name as thoroughly as I could with anyone who'd listen.

"Then your reputation was attainted without reason, and I offer apology for it," the Blade of Mercy stiffly said. "It was believed that you were attempting to use this affair to make the Chosen into your vassals, using the deeds of the Red Axe as a pretext to extend your influence."

It wasn't like he'd suddenly come to believe I was a good woman or ally, I thought as I studied him, but rather that he was perfectly willing to believe that there was another Evil out there who had been using the Red Axe for their own nefarious plot. Rubies to piglets he was already thinking of the Bard as villain in his head.

"It takes character to own to a mistake," I replied, offering a nod and nothing more. "But if I may dispense with idle talk, there is a peril we need to address. I've reason to believe that there are demons loose in the Arsenal."

"Gods be good," Nephele hoarsely whispered. "Demons, plural?"

I nodded, appreciating her grasp of the gravity of the situation. Not that I'd expected otherwise of her. Coming from Stygia – and from the Magisterium at that, whose ranks boasted the finest diabolists of the Free Cities – she should have a decent idea of how nasty even a single demon could get.

"Where?" the Blade of Mercy sharply said.

"Near the Severity," I said. "There might be as many as eight."

"The wards will not contain them forever, even if they were unleashed inside them, which we do not know for certain," Hierophant warned, having resumed interest in the conversation. "The anchors are on the inside, as the pattern was primarily designed to resist assault from the outside. Eventually they will corrupt or destroy the anchors, and the wards will collapse."

"We need to contain them before it gets to that," I bluntly said. "Blade, are you capable of destroying their kind?"

Not all heroes could, I had learned, but the boy used Light and lots of it. The odds were good he was one of those with the ability.

"Yes," the Blade of Mercy said. "In principle. I have never encountered one before."

Gods, but I had the strangest headache. Was I forgetting something? No matter.

"Then we will do what we can to set up those kills," I said. "My priority is containment, so that we can gather numbers and Named to deal with this more safely, but none can be allowed to run wild."

"You'll be needing wards for that," Nephele seriously said. "And while in other circumstances I might be able to provide-"

"You are close to overdrawing," Hierophant interrupted. "We are aware. I have trained none of the mage around us here, which means none should be capable of the required work, but Catherine _"

"I'll conscript half so you can borrow their power," I agreed.

Or at least however many of the six weren't close to burning out themselves. The priests would have been able to see to most wounds, so it shouldn't be the case, but mages in an infirmary did a lot more than healing spells – the way so many of the gravely wounded men were spelled to sleep made that plain enough.

"I will choose them myself," Hierophant said.

"Use my name if you have to," I shrugged. "Lady Eliade, if you'd accompany him?"

Couldn't hurt to have a gentler touch along when gathering a few mandated volunteers.

"It would be my pleasure," the heroine replied with a smile.

Good, then she got my meaning by sending her along. I cast a look at the Blade of Mercy, noticing his hesitant look. He wanted to stick by the Repentant Magister's side but couldn't think of a reason why he should. Gods, how old was he? He couldn't be older than twenty. It was easy to hate the sneer and the accusations, too easy to forget that I was actually looking at a kid.

"With me," I said. "We're going to procure a few soldiers."

The boy jerkily nodded, falling in at my side.

"How old are you, Antoine of Lange?" I asked.

The boy offered me a mulish look.

"Nineteen," he still said. "There is no need to use my personal name, Blade will suffice."

A lie, I decided, or at least an exaggeration. He must be younger; it was a rare thing for that lie to be spoken the other way around.

"I was seventeen, the first time I fought a demon," I quietly said. "I'd fought devils before, and Named of some power, so I figured I knew what I was in for."

That, at last, got his undivided attention. His eyes were wide and went still.

"The fight itself was a terror," I said, "like few things before or since, but it was the aftermath that scraped me raw. The demon laid seeds of corruption within some of my soldiers. Brave men and women, who'd done nothing but their duty."

"What happened to them?" the Blade of Mercy softly asked.

"We killed all those who'd been corrupted," I said. "As gently as we could, but they were no less dead for it."

The boy swallowed.

"Why are you telling me this?" Antoine asked.

"The Mirror Knight is your friend, as I heard it," I said. "So I'm telling you now when you can still prepare yourself. He might be lost, Blade of Mercy. Corruption spares no one, and all it takes is a drop."

"He is strong," the boy insisted.

"Then pray they've not made something warped of him," I said. "Else that strength will be turned against us."

I left him to think on that, limping my way to the two lines that'd been Nephele's earlier escort. One of regulars I noted, and one that was a mix: on tenth of crossbows, another of heavies. The senior lieutenant was an orc, who introduced himself proudly as I approached.

"Lieutenant Inger, ma'am, it's an honour."

Herself, then. My mistake.

"Lieutenant," I replied, nodding amiably. "I've a task for you and your soldiers."

"I am at your pleasure," she replied, fangs bared eagerly.

"Before I forget, though," I said. "Where were you escorting Lady Eliade?"

"She meant to head towards the Chancel, so that the wards might be fixed," the lieutenant told me. "Yet she sensed them being established again on the way, so we turned back."

I hummed in approval. A good call by Nephele on both parts: a good use of her expertise and exhausted state, then a decisive cut of her losses when her effort proved unnecessary. From the corner of my eye I saw the Blade of Mercy coming closer, though the boy remained far enough he wasn't exactly standing with me so much as in my extended vicinity.

"This will be for volunteers only," I told Lieutenant Inger. "If you'd allow me to address your men?"

"You'll find no dragging feet among us, Warlord," the orc assured me. "But to have you address them would be a privilege."

Masego and the Magister looked nearly done, two mages already following them, so I didn't have long if I didn't want to start wasting time in a situation where it was precious. But I owed my soldiers, given what I was about to ask of them, what honesty I could offer. Lieutenant Inger barked out an order and my legionaries fell into ranks crisply, offering hearty salutes as I limped up in front of them. Rows of expectant, eager faces waiting for some stirring speech I could not offer. I'd not do them the insult of cloaking this with the appearance of glory where there was none to be found.

"I'll be brief," I told them, "and blunt. Chaos has the run of this place, and it will get worse from here: demons were loosed and we don't know how many or how contained they are."

That sobered them right quick, though not as much as it should have. I have won too many unexpected victories, I thought. It was the foundation of my reign, this ability to snatch victory from the jaws of defeat, but it had grown into a legend I was not always the equal to. There was no clever plan that would keep demons from melting them like wax, no surprising turnabout to reveal at the last moment. I could see in their eyes that they believed there was one, that the Black Queen would come through once more no matter the enemy, and it tasted like ash in my mouth.

"I'll be heading out with Lord Masego and the two heroes you've been escorting, as well as three mages," I told them. "We mean to contain this madness until sufficient strength can be assembled to destroy it outright."

In other circumstances I'd settle for a binding and a very deep hole, but if we had the might to outright annihilate a few demons I'd take the opportunity without complain.

"There will be fae and Named, some of them might be corrupted already," I said. "Not knowing the face and nature of our enemies, there can be no guarantees that our methods will be able to contain them. And so I ask you all to come with us, into the dark"

There was a roar of approval, and blades were smacked against shields, but I raised a hand to quell it. I would take them with me, because they would be useful – needed – but I would not let them pretend this was some sort of glorious adventure.

"I will take only volunteers," I said, and my hand rose once more to end the clamour of volunteering about to erupt, "but let me be perfectly clear about what I am asking of you. None of you can kill a demon. Swords and arrows cannot do it. What I am asking you is to stand between the mages and the horrors, to buy them the precious time that will make the difference."

I'd asked silence of them, and silence they gave me.

"Even those of you who survive," I said, "will likely be lessened in some way. That is the ugly truth of fighting demons, that there cannot ever be a real victory. There is no cowardice in avoiding this fight: I would, if I could."

I met their gazes, breathing out.

"But I cannot, and so I ask for volunteers," I simply said.

I could see the fear in them now and I knew I'd put it there. For a moment I wondered if I had been too candid but regretted the thought almost instantly. I could and had spent the lives of my men, those who had sworn oaths to me, but I'd not do it while lying to their faces. There were some who called me a soldier queen, and deep down I knew there was truth to the sobriquet.

If I was queen of anything at all, it was the likes of these soldiers before me.

"You'll go, won't you?" Lieutenant Inger asked, gravelly voice cutting sharp across the silence.

"I will," I said.

"You always go," the orc said, eyes hard, hands clenched. "And so we follow. I volunteer."

And so they went, one after the other, even after my every warning.

Forty soldiers, and I was left to wonder at how sometimes pride could feel like grieving.

TeK

Welp, fuck.

TeK

By the way, what happened to those three Demons back from Liesse? We never really got any explanation either way. Also the Demon of Corruption was just kinda gone too, even though Masego was supposed to have it. And now Maddened Keeper has another Demon of Corruption inside of it. Coincidence?

TeK

It was implied that he shaped Demon of Corruption into Demon-shaped prison for other three, given how Demons don't affect each other or anything already affected by another Demon, but that also implies that there is somewhere a dimensional prison with four Demons inside, of which Masego has the keys, and nobody mentioned it all this time.

Well, nobody mentioned anything all this time, and given how we know Narrator is Unreliable, that doesn't bode well.

Are we sure time problems of the novel are really just EE being bad with timelines and not, say, Demon of Time? What a terrifying thought. Also a get out of jail free card, but that is unlikely.

haihappen

A demon of Absence would make everyone forget it exists, together with whatever or whoever it extends its influence to.

But the Prison (capitalized for emphasis) is likely a pocket dimension that contains 4 demons that are perpetually preventing each other from escaping because they want to escape itself, like the crabs in a bucket.

TeK

Not each other, they are enveloped in corruption from one Demon Masego has control over.

It's nothing definitive, mind you, I am just curious. It is plausible that Keeper is former Heroin who took Absence inside and then stole more Demons using power of "nothing to see here". Possibly with Bard's guidance/interference.

Thorium

I am pretty sure that prison eventually broke and Masego ended up dumping the last 3(?) demons into the middle of the battlefield, resulting in a whole lot of death. Gonna have to go back and reread Second Liesse to be sure though.

TeK

No, actually, only Masego reappeared (and a storm of Corruption)

Caerulea

If I recall correctly, the demons were 'summoned' which meant that they were brought to creation conditionally, with the spell that brought them in being the condition. Masago, after bring them into the pocket dimension, used the binding spell to attack the mages with corruption, and then dismissed the demons back to hell.

TeK

That makes sense alright, but what about Corruption Demon?

Sylfa

He used the ichor of corruption he had in his skin, but did he ever actually use the demon egg there? I can't recall what happened to it precisely other than it was confirmed gone at some point.

dadycoool

The demon got put back in its bottle (aka the banner) and I'm pretty sure he used the banner-bound demon as material for the prison. I seriously doubt he'd actually summoned the thing.

NerfContessa

That.... Would be horrible.
What a thought.

And cat and orks continue to go together like goblinfire and goats, or steak and salad, or Whisky and anything.

limwanya

I don't think there is only one demon of corruption

TeK

Not in the world, but really, what are the chances? Demons aren't exactly commonplace.

TeK

Keeper is Callowan, it is not impossible she stole Cat's demons somehow and then Absented them later. We know less than nothing about her after all, and there is damning lack of mentioning of those Demons Masego had, one of which, mind you, Corrupted him.

amit27592

What is Cat forgetting? Any theories?

TeK

He said he never encountered one, yet he was part of the band that something the Demon of Absence near Harrow back in the Crusade.

Tenthyr

Cat already knows there's an Absence demon about though, so hopefully it's not an issue...

... Unless she forgot she knew. Ahhh.

Big I

Huh, nice catch, I assumed it meant the Maddened Keeper was still alive and being forgettable.

Point Point

I assume that her ability to be forgettable is a result of the Demon of Absence demon she may have eaten during the crusade.

TeK

And given that he is one of the Heroes who actually can kill Demons, he would've been part of that band

chris S

Don't you mean: "He was part of the band that / /"?

TeK

No, / / is knowledge loss that exists, a hole in a memory, while influence of Absence is more like an absence of a hole.

Ninestrings

I mean if we're going maximum sad? Adjutant.

Liliet

Thaaat's where my mind went too =x

Dsylexic Wofl

I mean, lets be honest here, im already crying this chapter, and by the wsy things are going Adjutant isnt only in the splash zone, Hakram is pacient zero, the Keeper was almost GLUED to him.

IDKWhoitis

The Demon of Absence, it causes people to forget its existence. In all likelihood, the Keeper had it, so now its out and about (probably the One of the Seven and One)

Cicero

The Adjutant?

The Maddened Keeper? That she's likely dead and that's why the demons are loose?

If one of the demons is a Demon of Absence...

Liliet

There's no "if" to it. It's what she used to disguise her presence.

shikkarasu

She's forgetting the Maddened Keeper. Bard outright said that Cat would not be able to remember her. It's also why she forgot about The Moon and thought there were only 21 Major Arcana.

Maddened Keeper has a Demon of Absence and uses it to Keep a low profile.

moongazer13

There was a demon of Absence back towards the start of Book 4 that Catherine warned the Crusaders was bound to a hell egg. There were 14 heroes at the start of the incursion and 12 after they "dealt" with the Hell egg and Cat started getting the headaches. Plus, when we first meet the Keeper in chapter 14 it states "and had even turned herself into a living seal on a Hell Egg from Triumphant's days."

Ninestrings

What did you forget Cat?!

WHAT DID YOU FORGET

Rey d`Tutto

I dunno, the entry in her memory seems to be ABSENT.

Auston Varner

Really hope nobody tries to make a vote reminder out of that last line. Any other line in the chapter, fine by me, especially if it's amusing, but the mere thought of twisting the ending to be about voting has me very strongly sympathizing with the side which argues that it defiles the story.

TeK

I know have kind of petty desire to do just that, but I will persevere.

Truly, I am a paragon of virtue.

Auston Varner

Indeed, your forbearance is most admirable 😊

Liliet

I also hope!

Miles

Best be prepared to put down a corrupted Line, wielding a call to “vote!” that’d been made to kill a lesser story.

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

TeK

Originally it was implied they lost two Heroes in the ordeal, although it’s just that suddenly there was always only twelve Heroes instead of fourteen, but now I wonder if one of those lost wasn’t Maddened Keeper.

Drunken Dwarf

Hell the other one might have just been the Wandering Bard with how much the Pilgrim covers for her.

Quite Possibly A Cat

Yeah, the Maddened Keeper being one of them makes way too much sense. She probably ate it and wandered off with it.

Alex

Cat’s “strangest headache” – a reference to the Hell Egg with the absence demon the heroes killed offscreen near Harrow in book 4?

They went from referencing 14 heroes to 12 and Cat had headaches when that change occurred.

Ninestrings

That would line up with the Mirror Knight and the Vagrant Spear who are trapped in the demon zone.

ruduen

That sounds likely. I think the Blade was in the group which took out the first demon, so the headache might come from processing the comment of, “I have never encountered one before.” It’s entirely possible that he did encounter it as part of the band that took it out offscreen, but that entire encounter was wiped out.

For those who want the references: From <https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2018/04/20/chapter-4-warpath/>

“‘Wasn’t able to get all the Names,’ Thief said. ‘But I do have a number for you: there’s fourteen of them.’”

Compared to later on, from <https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2018/05/07/chapter-10-allegro/>

“‘It’s just twelve heroes,’ Archer shrugged. ‘Nothing to worry about. Worse comes to worse, I shoot a few in the eye and run away.’”

Strange, it hadn’t occurred to me before now that the muster of heroes on the other side was essentially a tenth and two officers. I had been tired, and there’d been a few days a while back where I’d had vicious headaches. Must have been the lack of sleep having unforeseen consequences. “

Big I

Anyone else wondering about Inger being mistaken by both Cat and the Kingfisher? Now I’m wondering if she’s the Hunted Magician in disguise

TeK

Unless he went the way of Traitorous and underwent plastic surgery for the kicks, given how Magister’s trade is illusions and dispelling them, and that she was shot to almost death by crossbows, it’s a safe bet she really is Red Axe.

Cicero

Yeah, I think that the truth is simpler. The Red Axe is the third traitor in the Arsenal. The Bard offered her a chance to get back at the Named that raped her, who was otherwise protected by the Truce and Terms – thus making her susceptible to supporting a plan that broke those.

She didn’t want to kill the Kingfisher Prince, but when it looked like he might keep the Truce and Terms alive, she decided she had to strike at him.

TeK

I mean, plastic surgery is still possible, just unlikely.

Miles

I think it's even simpler than that. She heard him say he was working for her, assumed this meant she was in for a fate worse than death, and attacked him to try to escape.

Big I

I was talking about the orc Lieutenant , but the points the same, I guess the Magister would have seen through any magic disguise

Liliet

Inger is probably transgender.

TeK

Or you were reading too much of The Gods are Bastards.

Liliet

No, that's Ingvar.

TeK

It's just that there may be parallels where there are none.

Liliet

This wasn't even my idea, it was brought up on Discord immediately as a potential explanation for why Frederic made the mistake.

TeK

What mistake? Pronouns? Inger is an orc though, another species, and good chances it's first time Fred met one. He met goblins, but it's not given about orcs.

I thought about the same, and it was my personal explanation for my assumptions.

Liliet

He had Callowan reinforcements at Twilight's Pass.

And if it'd been the first time he met one, he wouldn't have reacted to the name.

TeK

Somehow it just skipped my attention.

TeK

I don't tend to operate in the "I was actually right" realm of possibility.

Miles

Pgte has had references to transgender characters before, even an extra who was called out directly.

Liliet

Two characters are confirmed transgender – Basilia the helikean general and Simon the house of light spymaster – and one confirmed non-binary (Raphael-who-flirted-with-Cat) (you might see it as transgender or not, I've no horse in this race).

Point Point

Might be, might not. Whether or not, she clearly looks like a man (at least in uniform) and sounds like a woman.

I wouldn't say it's a strong indication that she's trans, but it does seem like an unusual detail to mention twice in such an indirect manner.

Liliet

Frederic did not realize she was female from her voice but from her introduction. Inger is a female name and he recognized that, as presumably did Cat.

Shveiran

Probably? Possibly for sure, but even now it is far easier to just meet someone with an unfortunate face than to meet someone who has gone through the full process of changing gender.

We know it is possible (with House of Light rituals, and likely with mage ones as well) but isn't it more likely that Inger has been served both bravery and ugliness at birth? For every Aqua there is a Quasimodo, and thus is balance restored to the Average Look.

Liliet

Possibly, fair.

That said, the "full process of changing gender" is just changing your name and (most of the time) manner of clothing and telling everyone, it seems, in the guideverse.

TeK

Also orcs are generally have very little in term of gender bodymorphism, as far as I know males and females are the same slab of solid muscle.

thearpox23

I absolutely despise it when modern norms, schisms, and politics, move on to the turf of ancient fantasy story tropes. The language becomes loaded, old and accepted terms become replaced by new ones for no reason, and comments like to get heated over semantics.

I have no idea where you're drawing your conclusions from, Liliet, but sometimes it feels like you're score-keeping, eager to jump to your preferred conclusion whenever the story hints to lean that way. With Inger, say, she could just be wearing a helmet and heavy armor for all we know. No information one way or another, but at least it being Haunted Magician in disguise is funny as a thought.

Liliet

I mean, I don't disagree that it's funny.

And Guide explicitly doesn't have modern politics around assigned gender and changing it lol

thearpox23

And props to Erra where props are due, he tends to avoid immersion breaking anachronisms. I was referring to the lit sphere in general, and the comments section in particular. You cannot tell there weren't some strange arguments here in the past, including over lexicon.

My point is that you, Liliet, seem to be drawn to these subjects of gender/representation/et cetera, (I think it was you that drew attention to Malicia's skin color during the fallout with Black?) and I cannot fathom why. It just seems like an odd thing to focus on in a fantasy setting.

PS: If I read you wrong, or you want to keep this private or move to PMs, I'll respect that.

Liliet

It wasn't me, but I agreed with the person who did.

I don't focus on these things in a fantasy setting, I focus on them IRL, where you and I are, where Guide exists as a work of fiction that we, real world humans, read, and another real world human wrote it.

These subjects matter to me. And sure, I go to fiction to escape the world where things are shitty... and to me, THIS is a necessary part of things NOT being shitty.

thearpox23

Fair enough.

I somewhat forgot with all the corruption, attention-seeking, and author harassment mobs going on that some people just want these subjects as a part of their escapism. You do you, and I hope that IRL wherever you are gets better.

Liliet

Thanks, me too lmao.

Kingfisher Stan

I think the fog in her head might be Archer and Adjutant, as she mentioned checking up on Hakram and the other Named used in affrays earlier on BUT she forgot the moment she stepped foot into the infirmary. All I'm saying is if either Indrani Hakram is dead I'm serving hands.

Liliet

Indrani's with Roland elsewhere, and Cat knows the wards got restored which would be Roland's work. She's thoroughly not an urgent priority, and also nowhere near the demons as far as we know.

superkeaton

I'm wondering if Cat's headache is as "simple" as demonic influence leaking through the wards, but knowing dear EE it's something I've overlooked in a prior chapter.

Jworks

I think it's caused by her forgetting Hakram, who is such a part of her that not acknowledging him is hurting Cat. I'm pretty sure one type of demon has the ability to unmake things so completely that their isn't even a memory of them... really hope im wrong, but that would be a really cool way to kill of a character. Kill them so utterly that they are not even thought of again.

Ninestrings

It's definitely possible. It seems pointless that he got all carved up the previous chapter though if that's the case.

If so though let's pour one out for ol' whatshisname.

Miles

For whom? Why would we waste good booze on a stranger who's not even around to have a drink with?

General Chaos

It is implied that Blade of Mercy fought an Absence Demon before the Battle of the Camps. There was a Hell Egg containing an Absence Demon in Harrow, Cat informs the Grey Pilgrim about this and the 14 heroes the Crusaders brought north were retconned into 12. Cat gets a similar headache when talking about this after the event as well.

Liliet

I really REALLY hope that's what this is.

Jwirks

I think it's caused by her forgetting Hakram, who is such a part of her that not acknowledging him is hurting Cat. I'm pretty sure one type of demon has the ability to unmake things so completely that their isn't even a memory of them... really hope im wrong, but that would be a really cool way to kill of a character. Kill them so utterly that they are not even thought of again.

Liliet

To be fair, it appears that Absence is more focused on erasing information than actual people, considering its influence can be wielded defensively (see: DK's Revenants and Maddened Keeper)

Agent J

Cat had vicious headaches when two heroes she's literally never met went Absent. It doesn't take Haks' death to cause this. And this headache is far too mild to foreshadow the first death in the Woe. Hakram's fine, carved up like a Swiss ham, but fine.

Jworks

No other fantasy realm has scratched my patriotic itch as well as the Callowans. First into the breach every time.

TeK

Yeah good for you. The closest my nation got to representation are Drow. Who have pretty much nothing in common aside from living in the north in the ruin of the formerly glorious empire they kinda fucked up on their own and everything is shitty.

Heh, it is Eastern Europe to a T.

Liliet

Callowans, orcs included :3

IDKWhoitis

I listened to [Light of Aidan – Lament] (<https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=m9ocAUQnNdE>) when I heard Cat warn the soldiers, and it was creepy how fitting the song was for that scene.

Cheetah724

Cat is basically asking them to drop feet first into hell.

Jordan Leighton

That last line, god damn

amc

Do you think there's a cognomen coming? This line seems too good to waste...

Agent J

Cognomen don't go to lines, only Armies and Legions. Thus far, only the Third Army has one among Cat's forces.

TeK

It's been two years, I am betting half an opened can of cow anuses in marinade that some other Army also got itself a cognomen.

Rey d`Tutto

So Hotdogs?

Rey d`Tutto

Nah, my bad. You said "can"...
Vienna Sausages.

Burlyraven

Alright, so I'm really hoping that headache was Cat not-remembering the absence demon from the missing chapter and not Cat not-remembering Hakram.

Also, if the fates have aligned enough for Cat to come into her new Name, now would be the perfect time for a fresh Aspect to form, because this expedition is going to need all the miracles (light, dark, and any in between) it can get.

Liliet

YUP

Smr

I'm dissappointed. Kairos would have known to say that Mirror knight couldn't possibly have survived uncorrupted. Also something about this being a last stand without him.

Liliet

No, this kind of thing is a double-edged sword. Between causing things to happen by saying them and causing things to NOT happen by saying them, If Cat said it while hoping it would undo it, dramatic irony might just nudge it in the BAD direction =x

Shveiran

Yeah, as Liliet says. It doesn't work if you do it on purpose, unless you are Kairos and you are using it to screw with someone else by betraying them.

Liliet

It works if it working makes a good story in itself.

Mental Mouse

Again, story-fu doesn't work on demons.

Hagtan

Wait, it doesn't? I understand they're a violation of reality and the groves of fate, but do we have actual examples of Plot in motion getting upended by one? Also, what about Triumphant bullying them into her story?

Liliet

That's object level magic, not story-fu.

mamm0nn

Demons seem to be an absolute, more physics than beings. Where angels might be Providence kinda somehow, these guys are entropy or the void itself. There is no cure for corruption, not even Story-bound. There is no way to retrieve that which is Absent, not even by a Named.

A scientist like Masego or someone specifically made for demons like the Keeper can manipulate and control it, even for prolonged times, and Story aids the Named in fighting demons, but from everything we've seen thus far demons in their essence aren't controlled by Story and their effects are absolutes. What's done is permanent and Story alone won't carry against them.

Mental Mouse

I think Javvies has the right of it...

Sir Nil

Once more, into the breach.

Juff

Typo Thread:

out if worked > out it worked even the resistance > even if the resistance Zeze," > Zeze."
"Yes," he > "Yes." He still-blood > still-bloody blood flow and limp > the blood flow and limping
I had at hand > I'd had at hand people," Masego > people." Masego it's be a > it'd be a do much difference (either do much, or make much of a difference) then pitch my > then pitched my none of the mage > none of the mages to," I shrugged. > to." I shrugged.
I figured I > I'd figured I the dark" (missing fullstop)

Adrian_V

If the worse Adjutant is a victim of is absense then he has hope, since that one continent was forgotten and then remembered we know that ones effects are at least finite somehow, all the others not so much, although i suppose a demon of Order could alter things in a weird way that actually helps (remember people demons aren't strictly speaking evil) but just how lucky would he need to be?...or maybe all those lost body parts and being somewhat of a cosmic chew toy were preparation for this to actually be the time he gets lucky?

Speaking of the severity MK did cut their vessel and maybe them in half so some may be already destroyed or damaged?

TeK

Are you implying that Cat got lucky and we have a best case scenario?

Liliet

I mean. She IS kind of a hero in this situation.

TeK

She is the kind of "of course the McGuffin is in the most dangerous place imaginable" type of Heroes.

Adrian V

And adjutant, and on another note, something i forgot is that i hope that little speech (including Inger's retort) was heard by a lot of people, maybe it will even get into the BoM skull to start thinking and really see her character, i can dream right?

TeK

Well, aren't you a sweet summer child. Everyone will probably remember that Masego was last known owner of at least one Demon, and would you look at that!

TeK

Probably it's her scheme to smear the good name of poor Bard. The lows she would sink to, that Black Queen.

Nairne .01

A likely outcome, which makes me doubt it will happen in the way it sounds.

Liliet

yeah I think BoM will see the 'soldier queen' thing already the 'i was seventeen' thing got his attention

Morgenstern

Last seen he was lingering in her shadow, not quite daring to openly take the position of faithful do... student, but seemingly wanting to. =P

Liliet

Heheheh.

Liliet

(Now I'm picturing Cat and Christophe co-parenting BoM)

Tubes

It is a little strange. Usually if it's a case of gender identity there's some kind of context clue, and while orcs trend towards the androgynous for their species compared to humans I feel like it's been made pretty clear in the past that that's only a mistake people who haven't spent any significant amount of time around them make. There's no set up for some kind of "she's got a mustache" joke either. Given all the chapters she's in involve glamour or absence demon fuckery I'd be willing to believe something is up there.

TeK

Ok, this is the end of the Arsenal, no doubt about it. Because we all know what eight Demons casually released signify.

Bard's done playing nice, and that is just the first step of her "hard way".

Liliet

Nah, this was before the "hard way" declaration.

And that one wasn't directed at Cat anyway.

TeK

I kinda see it as her taking of kids gloves. First step is getting rid of Arsenal by exploding not one but A-bombs in a middle "just to be sure". I did say it was a first step. Or to be more precise, her contingency in case she lost.

Liliet

Yeah, I'm HIGH KEY not seeing it as that.

TeK

But convenient that it's happening after she lost, eh? If it was intended as a final "fuck you" from Bard, it would be unnecessarily petty, and I don't think she is that kind of person.

Liliet

I'm not seeing the 'convenient' you're referring to. Honestly I'm not sure it was even Bard's plot, Keeper sounds like a wild card.

TeK

She sounds like a can of Evil long in preparation, also the best way of containing those Demons, ironically, is to turn Arsenal into a giant prison. Demons are not Pokemons, to get this many, you need a helpful nudge.

Nairne .01

If this was such a gesture then it was very villainesque of her.

Konstantin von Karstein

For me, it sounded more like she would set other plans in action. And the Maddened Keeper was slain (and the demons let loose) during the card game between Bard and Cat, before the former knew she had lost.

Aston Whiteman

Inger!

Disguise/Cloak etc...

Danger Will Robinson...

Well played EE.

Adrian_V

Nahh, too many wards slowing the infection, like even when they get out of thsoe guarding the severity every section is kind of warded and there are other project, secrets, weapons etc, and the sheer weight of named guaranties there are mroe than 1 hero capable of slaying demons, and there are sure more coming like WK.

TeK

Except there are eight Demons. Who notoriously cannot be contained in a sense of the word. Eight, my man. Half the Arsenal would be corrupted and they would probably have to evacuate another, as a best case scenario.

Shveiran

So it is an overwhelming threat that cannot possibly be defeated of contained, dropped right in front of a gaggle of Named who have no place working together.

Those Demons could be eighty and not stand a chance.

TeK

That... Is actually a good point. But also there is something Cat said. There is no true victory against Demons. Even against Corruption they executed like a tenth of those fighting after.

Demon's Advocate

This is not actually the case. Demons are not of Creation and do not follow its rules. They're especially dangerous because heroic stories do not work on them at all. Providence can't really interact with them.

Mental Mouse

Story-fu explicitly doesn't work against demons.

Daniel E

I just wanted to say that I love the concept of story-fu. At the end of the day, that is what Bard & Cat use to fight each other.

Javvies

The Narrative won't give Demons any penalties, sure. But it can still give Named some bonuses when they're fighting Demons.

Of course, you're not going to get as much of a relative boost, and you can't just ride the Story to automatic victory the way a lot of Heroes (and Named in general) are/were used to ...

The Narrative can give Named more of a chance than if they didn't have a supporting Story ... but they still have to put full effort in and carry through to take advantage of the opportunity(ies) they're given.

It's ... a bit like the difference between Custer's Last Stand, the Alamo, and the Bellau(sp?) Woods*. Custer went in stupid (relying purely on the Story), the defenders of the Alamo just didn't have enough to win/last long enough to be relieved, and the Marines gritted it out and survived long enough for reinforcements to relieve them.

*I think that's the battle I'm thinking of ... I'm pretty sure my point is sufficiently clear, even if it's not.

What qualifies as a Victory Condition gets more flexible when Demons are in play.

Konstantin von Karstein

The problem is that it was explicitly said that demons are not subjected to Providence, because they warp Creation itself. So it's theoretically possible that everyone in the Arsenal is sentenced to death (even if practically speaking it's not)

thearpox23

And so comes the beginning of the end of Cat's vacation hijinks. Truly, a welcome respite from the monotony of the front.

Liliet

Do not let Absence demons eat your votes!

TeK

Say who is that Hakram characters you guys keep bringing up?

sivarajan

I remember the song "Dead the Hand." Surely it referred to someone?

Javvies

This is not hopeful.

On the other hand, Mirror Knight did grab the sword and was in a last stand in defense of exhausted/downed allies (Hakram and Vagrant Spear) type of situation.

So ... I'm thinking he probably could have bought them time to escape if they could or pull a Boromir and keep trying to defend them throughout excessively mortal injuries.

But I suspect that the sword won't survive his loss or be useable by anyone else in the event he survives. And fighting the demons might leave the sword broken or out of power or something.

Hmm. Anybody think that recovering all the pieces of Willy's angel feather sword is doable? It might be able to kill the Dead King too, if restored.

Liliet

Lolno. Cat put EFFORT into that breaking.

Javvies

She broke it and scattered the various pieces into rivers in Callow, so as to make finding the pieces and restoring it impractical to the point of borderline impossible and not worth the effort in any sort of reasonable timeframe, certainly not without somebody noticing.

So yeah, it sure wouldn't be easy, and restoring the angel feather sword would almost certainly carry risks of its own. On the other hand, it's got to be safer than the angel corpse, probably less hazardous to the wielder than Severance, and presumably not part of any of Bard's current plots. And it'd probably work on the Dead King.

The question at hand is simple enough – is the effort required to find the pieces in order to restore it with the investment given the other needs of the war?

Before now, it probably wasn't ... but now? It might be, depending on what the permanent damage and other consequences of Bard's attack on the Arsenal are, mostly those related to Mirror Knight and Severance.

It might not be, too. But it's probably still worth somebody thinking about, even if it's only to realize that it's not practical.

Liliet

What would the angel feather even do?

Javvies

Optimistically, if restored, it may be a weapon capable of inflicting actual damage on the Dead King, allowing the wielder to harm, if not necessarily kill the Dead King.

Remember, what it cut stayed cut. Hakram got his dead hand because his original fleshy living hand could not be reattached after the angel feather cut it off.

The Dead King is, after all, believed to be highly resistant to attacks that don't reach certain thresholds. The Angel feather would likely constitute a weapon that would bypass much of his resistance.

I'm not going to call it equal to Severance in its efficacy against the Dead King at this point ... but it would probably be effective enough in the right hands, and would presumably enable the wielder to assist in taking down the Dead King for good.

That is, even if the restored angel feather sword isn't necessarily enough to kill the Dead King by itself, it can almost certainly be used to help set the Dead King up for whatever the lethal blow actually is.

Liliet

That's if you actually manage to face the Dead King with it.

Javvies

"They'd need to actually face the Dead King with it" is something that also applies to Severance too. And, I'd wager that any sort of ritual or magical strike would need relatively close proximity to the Dead King as well, at least for the final stages. Which gets uncomfortably close to "they'd need to actually face off against the Dead King".

Or pretty much any of their hopes to finish the Dead King off.

Also, quite possibly the objective of destroying his foothold on Creation, and blocking and guarding the gate to the Serenity. One suspects that he is likely to have objections to such an action.

Liliet

Severance has the narrative weight to find its way to hurting the Dead King. The angel feather doesn't feel like it would.

mamm0nn

Cordelia: Ah, Cat. I've decided to ignore your advice and dredge up the angel corpse after all.

Holds up a ridiculously massive broadsword

Cordelia: Remember when you were having problems with a single feather? Well, this is the whole wing.

Liliet

QUALITY

Javvies

...
What?

Are you trying to say that Severance would not need to be in close proximity to the Dead King in order to hurt him?

Or that Severance would allow the wielder to "find a way" to get close enough to the Dead King?

Or that the only reason Severance could hurt the Dead King is because Story?

And even if it could have done something in the nature of the former two ... (a) they weren't finished with it, and (b) it's been, at best, distorted by Mirror Knight's use of it through Bard's meddling ... and it's unclear as to what extent Severance has been altered or how. Point is, it's no longer free of Bard's meddling, which has unknown consequences. As for the latter, no, it's not dependent on Story/Narrative weight to hurt the Dead King.

The angel feather sword would not need any special Narrative weight itself. I'm pretty sure that its innate magical and metaphysical properties would suffice to allow it to harm the Dead King if the wielder uses it appropriately.

Cat is trying to minimize the reliance on Narrative.

And I'm pretty sure that no matter what "solution" to the problem of the Dead King is employed, getting into close proximity with him will be required.

I'm not arguing that a restored angel feather sword would solve all problems. I am suggesting that it would probably be useful against the Dead King, if restoring it were thought to be doable in a reasonable timetable and reasonably practical in terms of the resource investment. Which, admittedly, is a pretty big set of "ifs", but in light of the unknown consequences of Bard's attack on the Arsenal, with respect to Severance and the ability to continue utilizing the Arsenal to develop weapons for use against the Dead King ... restoring the angel feather sword is something they might well want to put on the table for a feasibility review.

Hell, they might want to track down some of the pieces to get insight into how one goes about turning angelbits into useable weapons – using the Judgment corpse is a terrible idea, but chopping it up for useable parts to turn into gear might be safer, if probably more blasphemous.

Liliet

> Or that Severance would allow the wielder to "find a way" to get close enough to the Dead King?

This.

And Bard isn't a demon of corruption. As long as Christophe survives today, Severance should be fine.

And yeah my point is it'd be like a decade long quest or something to restore that shit. VERY not practical.

Also an angel corpse is not actually a corpse consisting of bits. The last one was a chapel, remember? That feather was freely given.

Auston Varner

@Lilliet the angel feather sword on it's own might not have had the narrative weight to let it's wielder find their way to the dead king, but assembled as a desperate stop-gap replacement for the original weapon it just might. I mean yeah, a tool made from the corpse of the hero most insanely dedicated to destroying Evil in all it's forms has more weight than the weapon of some dead scrub from five books ago, but at the same time, the angel sword would have some weight from the Chekhov's Gun-ness of it, and probably more from needing to be reforged (the reforged sword always plays a big part in the narrative, after all) so that but of extra desperation would help the narrative along pretty nicely.

Just imagine how it might play out: with Severance and the Arsenal destroyed in a Pyrrhic victory over the eight demons, the Dead King's trickery and new tactics begin taking the lead over the Grand Alliance's research, wearing away at the main front until it is on the verge of breaking. A band of five is assembled and sent to Callow to fetch the shards of the blade as the battered armies fight a desperate holding action, but a band of Revenants slips through the Alliance lines to hunt them down. Eventually, all contact with the team goes dark, and the surviving Alliance forces prepare for a series of dramatic last stands in their few remaining fortresses, cut off from each other and surrounded. When all hope seems lost, the Dead King himself appears at the place where Cat and Hanno fight side by side to keep the dead back just a little bit longer, bringing with him the force needed for the final blow. Then, just when all hope is lost, a portal opens, the band strides through with the angel sword held high, and strikes at the old monster, forcing him to retreat...

OK, that's probably not exactly how it would go, and I can't actually see DK showing up to his enemies' last stand when they'll probably die either way, but if you want narrative weight, that would have quite a bit

Daniel E

I wonder if Night can do anything against Absence (the effect, not the entity itself). Admittedly that would be a serious Deus Ex Machina, especially when Light seems incapable of stopping it, but the Night has become grab-bag of tricks.

Terion

Night seems to offer the most protection of anything in the story so far, outside of being affected by a different demonic effect, which is only a protection in a technical sense. Catherine seems to be the only one who gets headaches and seems to realise that she might be forgetting something. Nobody else seems to be aware of the demon of Absence in any way.

sengachi

Hells. The self-sacrifice scenes in this story always hit me hard.

Hydrargentium

"I was left to wonder at how sometimes pride could feel like grieving."

Beautiful.

Hg

Terion

Does anyone have a method of protection against demons of Absence?

I had completely forgotten about the whole side-plot with the 14 to 12 heroes and the Absence hell egg.

mamm0nn

"It was easy to hate the sneer and the accusations, too easy to forget that I was actually looking at a kid of about 20."

Cat's like... 23 or something?

70-year old man: Goddamn 65 year old kids, thinking they're wise adults. Bunch of dumbasses.

Liliet

Yep.

Notably Cat has gone on record describing herself and Archer as horribly young too, so no hypocrisy here.

Satan

The Red Axe is short? She's basically a perfect match for our leader (forgive me for the treason).

Aranaya

Definitely a Good New, Bad News kind of day.

Chapter 24: Like A Hanging Sword

"Loyalty to an unworthy prince is treason against the Gods Above, for it places that prince before the teachings of the Heavens themselves."

– Extract from "The Faith of Crowns", by Sister Salienta

Four Named, three mages and forty legionaries.

It wasn't a large company to take into a demon hunt, but in hallways and narrow rooms being too many would be a disadvantage anyway. It'd be a lot more useful to be able to move swiftly and without getting in each other's way than to have another forty bodies to throw into the maw of the enemy. I'd have taken more mages if there were any to spare, mind you, but those didn't grow on trees. I'd sent runners out to gather reinforcements as quickly as possible and send them our way, but I doubted they'd arrive in time to make a difference – whether the demons got to run loose or not would probably already have been decided by the time the second wave made it to the fight.

We set out briskly even as I arranged our formation so that it wouldn't result in immediate collapse if one of the demons got the drop on us. A shield wall would be useless, so instead a tenth of regulars in a loose skirmish formation took the front. The sole tenth of heavies behind them, their tall shields meant to buy time for the soldiers behind them: crossbowmen, spread out both so they could fire from broad angle and so that Named would be able slip between them. Then came those same Named, Hierophant closer to the back where the three Gifted whose gifts he would be using stood, and behind that our rearguard of ten regulars.

The junior lieutenant was with those in the back, so that we'd still have an officer even if Lieutenant Inger died up front where she stood with the other tenth of regulars.

"For the four of us," I told the other Named, "the tactics are simple enough. I won't enquire too deeply about your bag of tricks or try to tell you how to fight with it, but I want our priorities established before we find the enemy."

Or the enemy finds us, I silently added.

"You are the seasoned battle commander among us," the Repentant Magister said, "and you've fought demons before. You will not be gainsaid."

I glanced at the Blade of Mercy, who silently nodded, and considered the potential powers struggle a done thing. Masego knew our business well enough and would not argue, though I still jabbed my elbow into his side to make sure he was actually listening.

"If we're lucky, the demons come at us from the front," I said. "Most of them are aggressive, in a tactical sense, which is where our first three lines come in: my legionaries will slow them down as much as possible."

My fingers clenched, knowing full well that the slowing would come through dead bodies and the corruption of the still-living.

"That's when we come in," I said. "After the crossbows fire, Lady Eliade and I will use what means we have to try to pin down the demon. Even if we succeed, it'll be temporary, which is when Hierophant will attempt a binding."

The Blade of Mercy shuffled on his feet, as if afraid he'd been forgot.

"There are no guarantees that will work," I said, "and even if it does, we can't simply leave the demon there: we need a killing blow, which will be provided by the Blade of Mercy."

Nods all round, until the Repentant Magister cocked her head to the side.

"I believe, Your Majesty, that your intention is not to try to slay all of these demons," she said.

It wasn't, because rolling the dice against eldritch abominations eight times in a row was a shit plan. Kind of her to indirectly reassure me she didn't believe me to be an idiot, though.

"No," I said. "We'll be trying to push through towards the room where the Severance was being kept. Hierophant, if you'd care to elaborate on why?"

I leaned a little closer.

"Simply, if you would," I murmured.

"There will likely still be ward foundations there," Masego said, "which I can use to trap the demons inside before closing the door on them."

He shot me a disgruntled look.

"Sword room good, demons go in," he peevishly added. "Much rejoicing. Was that simple enough, Catherine?"

"Rejoicing has three whole syllables," I replied without missing a beat. "A lackluster effort at best."

"Sometimes, when you fight other people, I root for you to get hit," he confessed.

"That's treason, you know," I gravely told him.

"It is not," he triumphantly said. "You kept saying that about a great many things, so I got my hands on a Callowan law codex. It's not treason to say you snore either, which you insisted to Indrani it was."

I heard the Repentant Magister politely cough into her hand to hide her laugh, while the Blade of Mercy looked away with slightly trembling shoulders.

"Tread carefully," I told him, "or I'll raise taxes on mage towers."

"I'll make it invisible," he defiantly said. "You can't collect taxes from an invisible tower."

"Don't think I won't contract it out to the fae if I have to," I warned.

He stared me down from the side of his head, before grudgingly nodding.

"Accusing you of snoring is treason," he offered.

Ah, selling out Indrani instead of admitting you were wrong. One of the classic retreat stratagems of the Woe, along with blaming anything from rain to mispronunciations on Akua's scheming.

"So is throwing wooden carvings at my court wizard," I granted him, magnanimous in my victorious tyranny.

He brightened at that, though for some reason Nephele's cheek went red. Had she thrown something at Masego's head? Curious as I was, now was hardly the time to ask. I'd leaned into the banter at least in part because it would distract the four of us – and also the soldiers all trying very hard to pretend they weren't listening – from the grimness ahead, lighten up the air some. But we were well into the Repository now and wariness was the order of the day from here on out. We passed through a sort of confluence of hallways, like a lesser Knot, where the marks of Named fighting against fae were evident. Nephele confirmed as much when I asked, as it had been her band that fought here, and added that there did not seem to be any missing bodies.

Thank the fucking Gods for that.

Hakram had fought here, I could tell from the way some tall rocklike fae had been slain, but I set the thought aside before it grew too dark. I'd done what I could by ensuring the Concocter was there for Archer to send as reinforcements. Shy of the Sinister Physician himself, she was probably the best healer in the Arsenal. We hurried along, quickening our pace to a near run, and we'd just passed the corpse of another fae when a shivering scream sounded in the distance ahead. I felt it go through my soldiers, my allies, through my own bones. It'd sounded human, or at least ripped out of a human throat, but there'd been something... wrong about it.

"At least one is out, looks like," I said, forcing my voice to sound even. "Advance with caution, swords out."

I'd offered up my calm and it was drawn from by those who needed it – there was no need for a harangue here, simple confidence would serve the same purpose better. From the corner of my eye I caught Nephele staring at the back of the neck of my soldiers, and I raised a brow. It was man, Callowan by the paleness and the flush.

"Lady Eliade?" I asked.

"Please call a halt," she quietly asked.

I did, and a moment later the Repentant Magister was at the legionary's side and asking him the permission to perform an exploratory cantrip. The light on the sorceress' fingers was barely visible and she spoke no incantation, but a moment later she withdrew her hand with a grim look on her face.

"We are facing a Host-Breaker," Nephele Eliade said.

I looked at Masego, expecting an elaboration.

"Demon of Terror," Hierophant said. "I know little of their kind, few in Praes have ever summoned them."

My fingers clenched at the words.

"They're that dangerous?" I asked, pitching my voice low.

If the Empire thought they were too risky to use, it boded very badly for our little crew.

"No," Masego replied. "But it is known they can be subsumed by Demons of Excess, which made them a highly unpopular choice among diabolists."

No doubt Wasteland nobility saw it as a faux pas, like a tasteless bracelet or using a floral poison during winter court. Nephele looked fascinated and sickened by what she'd gestured heard, but she focused on the dangers at hand.

"I know of them, Your Majesty," the Repentant Magister told me. "The Magisterium has used them for war in past years."

I nodded in appreciation, gesture for the Blade of Mercy to cease standing at the edge of the conversation and come in closer so he'd hear properly.

"What are we in for?" I asked.

"Fear, in essence," Nephele said. "It can be carried by sound or by sight, though like with all of their kind direct touch has the most powerful effect."

"That sounds dangerous and potentially lethal, but not horrifying," I said. "Which given my past experiences with demons lead me to believe means I'm missing something."

"Permanence of contamination, Catherine," Masego reminded me.

I blinked then finally put it together. He meant that the fear would never go away, and the contamination – the fear – would only grow worse with every scream or glimpse or touch. Yeah, that was closer to the kind of despicable fuckery I'd expected.

"There it is," I darkly muttered. "How quickly does the fear escalate?"

"My people say it comes in three steps," the Repentant Magister says. "Fear, which can still be treated by Light and alchemies. Dread, which puts men to flight they will never break from. And terror, which breaks the mind and ends only in death."

Charming. And it was starting to sound like fighting this would be a headache and a half.

"So we can't even look at it," I slowly said.

"There are enchantments which would protect people from the effects, if not for long and not against direct touch," she said, then bit her lip. "Yet I am in no state to lay them, not on so many. I do have an artefact whose effect is similar, but I did not make it to face demons and it will not protect nearly fifty people for more than moments. It has not the power."

"Trace the formula for the enchantment in the air," Masego said.

The Magister glanced at me and I nodded. Fine fingers left coppery traces in the air that Hierophant studied it for a moment before he sharply nodded.

"Now your artefact," he instructed.

Nephele, having discarded her hesitation, presented a ring in a pale and silvery metal, set with translucent stones whose shine was not natural.

"Ah, I see," Masego muttered. "Originally a torture spell, yes? To keep the mind from breaking under pain. The formulaic traces are still there."

The Repentant Magister, face grown ashen, silently nodded.

"It can be done," Hierophant decided. "Give me a moment."

Casually he reached towards one of the Proceran mages, seizing the man's magic with a ripple of will, and then he extracted the sorcery from the sorceress' artefact with a great deal more care. Lights spun up and formed themselves into runes – several wriggled their way out of my thoughts, which smacked of High Arcana – then rearranged themselves under Masego's dancing fingers and clucking tongue, before he finally let out a little noise of satisfaction. The runes collapsed onto themselves and formed into a series of small pinpricks of light that sunk back into the ring.

"There," the Hierophant said. "It will protect fifty people for a quarter hour, though the protection will be stripped permanently by contact with a demon. It will also break after use, Catherine, so spend it wisely."

The Repentant Magister was looking at him like he'd just knocked over a castle by blowing at it – split between disbelieving and awed. I sometimes forgot how brilliant Masego was, exceptional even among a people whose excellence in sorcery was legend. I thanked him and passed what we'd learned on to the two lieutenants, who in turn handled informing their soldiers. Advance resumed as I limped forward with the ring clutched tight between my fingers. Two corners we turned before another scream sounded and before it finished I broke the artefact – the demon sounded close enough to warrant it. There was a pulse of light and warmth, then a sensation like a wool in my mind.

"Quarter hour starts," I called out. "We finish this quickly."

The third corner we turned, mere heartbeats later, led us to the sight of the waiting abomination. It was far – knowing sight and distance worked in its favour? – and currently unmoving, at least as much as such a thing could ever be. Corruption had been a revolting twisting of flesh, but this thing was of a different mold. At its heart was a black, faded body that evoked a snake or a slug, but most of it was made up of translucent black veils that spread out like trails and tails and wings, ever moving. Five moon-round eyes, two angled on each side and a larger crowning one, stared at us like the glare of a lighthouse through the fog. Behind it I glimpsed delicate trails on the ground that were like smoke made liquid. Blood from a wound or secretions?

“Don’t step on the trails,” I warned.

It was unlikely that my soldiers got to hear the latter part of the warning, as before I was finished speaking some of the demon’s veil-like layers formed a triangular mouth between the eyes and it began screaming. I felt the protective enchantment on me begin to wane, like parchment being picked at by a swarm of insects. The screaming did not stop, for the demon needed no breath, and just like that our battle had begun. I reached for the Night even as Masego wrested power from our mages one after another in quick succession, but first blood went to my crossbowmen. Without flinching they brought up their weapons and fired a volley in good order, seven of the ten bolts fired landing on the enemy.

Four of those went through the veils, including one through the ‘mouth’, but they passed if through them as if they were smoke and ended up clattering on the stone further back. The last three shots, though, sunk into the dark flesh at the heart of the monster and remained there. The demon was unlikely to have been wounded by this but it was still moved to act even as liquid smoke began to sweat out of its flesh around where the bolts had sunk in. Layers upon layers of translucent blackness unfolded, splitting into wings and limbs and hooks as the demon skulked up the side of the wall and onto the ceiling with unnatural lightness.

“Kytima,” the Repentant Magister said, a slender wand of iron in her hand.

The metal length shivered and spat out burst of transparent sorcery that struck at the demon’s body even as I began to shape the Night I had gathered and Masego began to incant in the magetongue. The host-breaker was knocked down from the ceiling, slipping and falling but landing below with insect-like deftness. It was still screaming, and when another salvo of bolts was fired upon it instead of trying to avoid it the demon simply convulsed. The four shots that’d tasted of its flesh went flying out and I hastily abandoned the cage of Night I’d been crafting, instead forming a sweeping scythe that would slap the projectiles aside. When the roiling Night came to touch the first bloodied bolt, though, it winked out.

Sve Noc had forcefully dismissed it from my grasp before it could make contact

Oh Merciless Gods, I realized. They're the Night, or close enough. So they're afraid that the taint might seep into it, and of what that would bring when it returns to them. It was not a senseless fear, I knew, but that was a hollow and bitter thing to tell myself as I watched the four bolts unnervingly find a targets. One glanced off a shield raised just in time, but the others sunk into flesh – neck or elbow or knee, the weak parts of the armour that brute force would be able to punch through.

My soldiers screamed loud enough that not even the demon's ceaseless hollering was able to drown it out.

I glimpsed their eyes turning white, the utter panic that seized them as their mouths foamed and their own screams served to amplify the spreading infection of the demon. Swallowing a snarl of bitter rage I swung out with Night, making a thick knot of it detonate in the air by the closest soldier's ear. Whether the shockwave killed or knocked her out I couldn't know, but before I could clear out a second the bolts fired into the demon earlier found flesh and my fingers clenched in dismay.

"Stop shooting," I screamed, but cacophony overruled me.

Hierophant stood utterly still behind me, save for his moving lips.

"Kytima," the Repentant Magister yelled again, knocking back the demon once more.

I put down another soldier with a detonation but the third taken had turned to flee and when the heavies got in his way he began hacking wildly at them, still screaming at the top of his lungs. The demon had landed almost flat on the ground when knocked back by Nephele, and instead of rising at full height once more it remained there and began slithering forward like a sea of tails and tentacles creeping along the ground. Gods, just the sight of it... A heartbeat later its veils burst open, like a peacock unfolding its tail, and the bolts it'd just taken went flying back. I was ready, this time: one after the other hanging orbs of Night exploded, scattering the bolts into the walls.

I only realized I'd missed the greater threat when one of the heavies struck down the last contaminated soldier and her blood went spurting out looking like liquid smoke. The soldier in plate began screaming in turn, clutching the dead soldier as he convulsed and so spraying smoke-blood everywhere. I lost four heavies in that heartbeat, but a lot more worrying was the single drop that landed on a crossbowman's cheek. I killed him without missing a beat, teeth grinding my mouth raw, and then I saw the Blade of Mercy pass by my side at a run and hatefully cursed.

"It has to be now," the boy screamed, and charged forward with his greatsword streaming behind him.

But the demon had never ceased moving and it'd taken advantage of the chaos to push through. On veiled limbs it slipped through the last regulars of the front and through the screaming gap in the heavies. The Blade of Mercy swung his blade at it, glinting with Light and blindingly quick, but it cut only through translucent layers and the demon's body tumbled among the crossbowmen. One, two, three, four – seven orbs did I weave out of Night, detonating them in a perpetual circle I filled as soon as it broke so that the abomination would remain stuck, but tendrils shot out and the Night shattered again as Sve Noc fled the demonic taint. A thief's power, mine, not a soldier's, and now my legionaries were paying the price for it.

The creature, still screaming, struck out at still-whispering Masego but the Repentant Magister blew it back – in part, at least, for it had been expecting the blow and it merely spun about some as it was mostly translucence that was blown through. I spun Night into a vortex behind it, sucking it backwards, but with a bat of wings it stayed in place and the Repentant Magister was forced to blow back another reaching hand, screaming the same word of power in a ragged voice. The Blade of Mercy had swung round, slicing through a taken regular as he did, and now swung at the demon from the back but the thickening glare of Light ate away at my own working – the demon fell to the ground, a single long limb extending as it tore through the Repentant Magister's torso.

Nephele began to scream, face twisting in utter terror in a vision that would stay with me until I died, and the Blade of Mercy's strike faltered at the sound. The Light trembled, the demon was ripped back by the strengthening anew of the vortex I had not ended, and the limb unfolded into a dozen wings of translucent black that clawed to Antoine of Lange's sides as they were torn away. Was he... No. His armour, I thought, his armour would have been thick enough no blood was spilled.

"Dry rivers and sunder mountains," the Hierophant said, his calm voice cutting through the chaos like a blade. "Scatter chariots and snatch sunlight: I command that you will be still."

The demon froze. Immediately and utterly, as if it had been the decree of Creation itself.

"Now," I screamed through the screaming, "now, Antoine."

"Burn, you misbegotten thing," the Blade of Mercy hissed, and his blade shone bright once more as it went down.

It was blinding to look upon as it went through the Demon of Terror. The veils evaporated, the black flesh shivered and boiled and went up in smoke as the wrath of the Gods Above came down upon the abomination and eradicated it through their chosen champion. Like a sun at midday, the Light swallowed the hallway whole and chased away my Night. When it faded, there was nothing left of the demon but the aftermath. Screaming soldiers, who I knocked unconscious as gently as I could with spinning orbs, and one more yet. Nephele Eliade had slumped onto the ground and she was bleeding, but the red was turning darker. Soon, I thought, it would be as liquid smoke.

She bit her lip until it bled to swallow the scream, and unto me she turned a pleading gaze. I knew what it was she was asking.

"I'm sorry," I whispered, as I brought up my staff.

I made it quick, quick enough it'd be painless. It was the least I could do.

"Handle the contamination," I told Masego without turning. "Please."

I felt him nod without turning and left him to it, as began the roar of flames and I closed my eyes. It was a weakness, but I would allow myself it. Just this once. I only wished that, even with eyes closed, the only thing I could see was not the look of grateful relief in Nephele Eliade's eyes as I killed her. I did not allow myself more than a few moments, though. Now was not the time for indulgence. Our losses had been... harsh. Not only was the Repentant Magister dead, but we'd also consigned to ash six of our ten heavies, two of our ten crossbowmen and eight regulars. Nearly half our company had died in its first engagement.

Against a demon, that couldn't even be said to be a bad roll of the dice.

Before the ashes grew cold we moved on, carefully stepping around the rivulets of contamination the demon had left coming there. It slowed our advance, but we were close to the part of the Repository where the Severance awaited now. The slight detour we allowed ourselves was taking the hall the Demon of Terror had not at a crossroads we stumbled upon, so that we wouldn't have to keep stepping around death and worse as we tried to hurry up. I was on edge the entire time, but it wasn't a demon we ended up running into. It was a woman, with striking purple eyes and black hair pulled into a topknot. Not someone I knew from sight, but the Concocter had been described to be before and her appearance was unusual enough. It was what she was dragging behind her that had my heart rising up in my throat.

A makeshift litter with an orc on it.

It'd taken me a moment to recognize Hakram, for most of him was now a raw and bloody wound. With unnatural precision and severity his flesh had been cut, from his upper thigh to the side of his now visible ribs to the shoulder stump that'd been made of the same arm he'd once mangled for Vivienne. He looked more than half-dead, skin pale and wan as sweat covered his armour-stripped body. His wounds were not bleeding, I thought, but neither was he in any way healed.

"Gods Above," the Blade of Mercy whispered.

"Hierophant," I began, but Masego had already been moving.

He swept past the Concocter, whose face showed only relief at our arrival, and I was left to speak with her as Masego saw to our friend.

"He'll live?" I asked her, even though it was not the most pressing of matters.

"For an hour," the Concocter said. "If I get him to the Sinister Physician before that, he'll make it through."

I breathed out. At least there was that.

"Lieutenant Inger," I called out. "Our heavies are to help the Concocter carry the Lord Adjutant to the infirmary in the Knot."

"Ma'am," the orc soberly saluted, then set to passing along the orders.

"The Mirror Knight?" I asked the villainess.

"Doing his best to contain the mess," the Concocter grimaced. "When I left the Vagrant Spear was still alive, and she insisted on staying after taking a potion."

I nodded.

"How many demons?" I pressed.

"I couldn't tell," the Concocter admitted. "They got to the fae, it was..."

She shivered at the memory.

"I would not have stayed even if asked," the purple-eyed alchemist said. "We weren't pursued, so at least one of them should still be alive."

I clenched my fingers, then unclenched them. Not necessarily promising, but better than nothing. It'd have to do.

"Anything you need to keep him alive," I said, forcing myself not to look at Hakram lest my voice shake, "you have it. Use my name if you have to."

She dipped her head in acknowledgement.

"Concocter," I said, voice going low. "I am in your debt for this. I will not forget it."

She watched me, eyes considering.

"Neither will I, Your Majesty," she said.

Masego came back to me even as the Concocter and her escort of four heavies – half of them carrying the litter – left.

"He was struck by a demon, though I cannot tell which sort," Hierophant told me. "The Severance was used to cut the flesh, presumably to halt the spread of the taint. He will survive if properly tended to but there will be no reattaching the limbs."

I breathed out. Hakram would live. Masego himself had told me, and I did not doubt his words. The rest we could deal with when horror had been thrown back into the hole from which it had crawled out. We pressed on, our company thinned even further, until we had reached the threshold of madness. What I had expected to be waiting for us was two Named on the edge of annihilation, or perhaps a desperately fighting Mirror Knight devoured by grief at the loss of his companion, but what we got was different.

As we approached what had been the resting place of the Severance, we stepped into a charnel yard.

The corpses closest to us were fae, or at least had been. Several of the bodies were in hacked pieces, some of them twisted by what I recognized to be the touch of Corruption, and even those of the fae that had died without first being swallowed by demonic taint were a grisly sight. Carved through from head to groin or across the torso, spilling red or half a dozen other things as their faces remained frozen in ugly rictuses of surprise or anger. My boots waded through blood as I advanced, but other things too – red leaves, grown that as much from autumn as death, stuck to the bottom of my boots. There were precious stones and broken wooden shafts, silks and shattered dreamlike armours. The might of the Court of Autumn had come for the Mirror Knight, and he had massacred it.

Beyond those rested a thing that looked like a twisted afterbirth, hacked into and burned until it was no longer a threat. The remains of a demon, I thought as the lot of us walked through death. There was another, forced into a hole carved in the wall and both stone and corpse were scorched so thoroughly nothing could be glimpsed of the manner of demon it had been, Beyond it a few steps up led us to open steel gates and the last gasps of madness beyond. At the gates, where the Mirror Knight and the Vagrant Spear must have stood and fought, the blackened and scattered remains of another two demons could be seen. It was further in that the fighting still held, past the three stripes of burned flesh that had my heart stirring in unease to look at and the... hole that it hurt my mind to even think of. There I first found the Vagrant Spear, the Levantine heroine named Sidonia, ever barefoot and holding her tall spear as she let loose the occasional small burst of Light from it to prevent the last demon from escaping.

Christophe de Pavanie's face was calm, but his eyes hard. Armoured in polished silver plate from head to toe he was hard for the eye to follow – he was quick, quicker than a man in such heavy armour should be, and the mirror-like plate obscured his movements to even a careful eye. His shield was dazzling to look at, a perfect reflection of all it beheld, but it was the sword in his hand that had my hair raising. Whistling softly as it cut through the air even when it did not move, the Severance sliced through a twisted shape of shifting mercury like it was butter. The demon screamed and tried to flee around the hero, but the Vagrant Spear drove it back with a burst of Light. One, twice, thrice did the Mirror Knight strike, his plate burning with radiance as the demon burned into molten remains from the glare of the reflection.

I no longer had to worry about madness swallowing whole the Arsenal, it seemed, which was a relief.

Less pleasing was the fresh peril that the day had brought to my door: if I fought the Mirror Knight, now, I believed I might just lose.

ErraticErrata

First release of the month, which means extra chapter in the corresponding tab. This is one is titled "Charlatan II", the continuation of the last – and it'll end up being a three-parter instead of a two as I'd previously thought, since the text was longer than anticipated.

Ninestrings

You spoil us EE 😊

Miles

What a twist on the unbreakable shield and unstoppable sword problem. Just make the hero wield both.

Onos

Possible minor lore discrepancy? You mention here that Terror can be subsumed by Excess, but Book 3, Interlude Liesse 3 has a little bit on how Demons cannot affect one another.

goliath1303

It's correct as is imo. It's the reason why they're the only type of demon that the Praesi avoid using. I know this was mentioned at some point previously but, unfortunately, I don't remember where that mention was. It's the exception to the rule though, and therefore unique enough to warrant mention, not the example that disproved the rule.

Dorothy Carmichael

Oh thank goodness Hakram will survive. Does no reattachment mean no prosthetics, or just that the original limb can't be put back on? If he becomes the Fullmetal Adjutant that'd be pretty neat actually.

Concocter is owed a favor, oh dear, that can't end well. And now Mirror Knight is incredibly powerful, which also bodes poorly for our protagonist...

dadycool

It bodes better nowadays, considering Archer triggered a "Let's make up for our mutual past" flag. She'll never be "One of the Family", but now she could at least be "Part of the Group".

Liliet

It means no returning the original limb, NOT THAT THAT WAS AN OPTION.

It's the same as the angel feather sword wound which took his hand in Summerholm, when he got his prosthetic.

(His first prosthetic lol)

Cicero

Seeing as the Concocter cooperated with the Bard (if not entirely with full knowledge), I'm thinking the favor will be to keep her part in the disaster of the Bard's attack secret.

Morgenstern

Seeing as this one was done by the SEVERANCE, though – I wonder if this time around he will NOT get ANY replacement "limbs". If NOTHING can be attached where that thing cut. Not the original one, but also no bone or ghost ones, this tim around. Being not-quite-dying, not-bleeding, but still wounded and done for forever... (He's still got his mind – but will never fight again. That kind of ouch.)

Insanenoodlyguy

"Sometimes, when you make still more reminders to vote for practical guide to evil on topwebfiction, I root for you to get hit," he confessed.

"That's treason, you know," I gravely told him.

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Miles

So what are you saying that Hierophant wants us to vote for worm or something?

Klatn Yelox

Yes, Masego would be a fan of Worm I bet.

domboy

hey we can read both happily and not have to have enmity towards the other.

Liliet

Ok this one is good ♥

Sulomund

Hakram's finally gonna have to accept Masego's cyborg offer, yeah? :p

Tenthyr

Depends. Considering Masego knows Hakrams original limbs are likely either corrupted tumors or light-scoured ash, he likely meant that whatever the Severance cuts Can Not Be Put Back. Hakram lost lombs,. He will never again have those limbs.

Ninestrings

Not if you put enough narrative weight on the fix.

Hakram, the Orc slowly losing his organic parts, each piece replaced with unfeeling dark sorceries by the experimental mage? That's good stuff right there, creation loves that tragic monster stuff.

He does still have his wedding tackle right? is that confirmed?

Big I

I'm wondering if he's gonna go full Vader and become the Black Knight. I'm also wondering whether Mirror Knight is gonna go full dark side and become the Black Knight.

Miles

Now I'm wondering if Cat is going to become the Black Night

Floppy

Now im wondering if Robber is going to become the black knight.

NerfContessa

What do you mean, become?!

Also, adding my vote to full Vader Adjutant.

Kneeling before cat, and sayin yes my warlord.

erebus42

The limbs themselves are definitely lost to corruption but since Archer had her arm reattached after getting it sliced off by the Saint herself Hakram can at the very least get some replacement parts.

Decius

Archer got her arm sliced off by a sword that Saint was wielding, which is different from having it cut off by Severance.

Liliet

He will not have THOSE limbs, but this does not extend to prosthetics. Cannot Be Reattached is how he got the bone hand in the first place.

Liliet

> Considering Masego knows Hakrams original limbs are likely either corrupted tumors or light-scoured ash, he likely meant Masego is a pedant that always clarifies, whether it's useful/necessary or not.

Miles

Hakram deadhand, pegleg, and floatyotherhand. The hand is still in storage somewhere right?

Abrakadabra

He will be 'da supa cybork'.

Recent Widow

not nephele, not our good sis nephele... don't fucking touch me I'm mourning.

Liliet

i know right

a well-measured hit

tencko

Yeah That was a heavy blow. I actually like how, well, reasonable she was.

Javvies

...
And she just had to put the Repentant Magister, a Hero, down.

Hopefully, the Blade of Mercy will be able to help deter the Mirror Knight from precipitous action.

This could be a problem for the long term. Mirror Knight might not want to or be able to release Severance to another's custody or use. And he's not the most reliable of Heroes. Also, Bard wanted him to take up Severance which pretty much automatically means it's dubious.

Decius

Cat had to prevent demonic taint from spreading from a Magister, Mirror Knight had to prevent demonic taint from spreading through Hakram.

If Magister had plot armor, it would have been identical.

erebus42

Except for Cat lacking a magic sword and the Magister not having a clear point of infection to cut so..

Miles

The fire came after she was already dead, you can't blame Cat every time there's a little bit of flame involved.

TeK

Technically you can, it just would be untrue.

byzantine279

She was corrupted by a Demon and it was witnessed by another Hero. There will be no issues with that – any Hero that has ever fought a demon would agree what she did was mercy.

Liliet

Nephele low key asked for it, if just with body language. This is not a setting where THAT becomes a conflict.

Nathan

Don't forget he's sleeping with the daughter of the Proceran lord(prince?) that wants to Backy-Stabby the drown and the Goddesses made it clear -There must be consequences to such plans-.

Ninestrings

Woo! no one of significance lost!

I guess EE had to establish the Mirror Knight as a bit more badass as he's mostly been thrown at things up to now.

Sparsebeard

I liked the Repentant Magister.

Ninestrings

She's in a better place.

Unless she didn't repent enough I guess, but voluntarily facing demons should get you a free pass upstairs frankly.

domboy

I dunno. i've always thought fighting demons and getting corrupted corrupts your very soul and bars you from ever entering heaven. a sacrifice in body and soul. kinda like constantine.

Liliet

Demons CAN corrupt/eat souls, but Nephele was at the very least still in her right mind when Cat finished her off. Might have been in time to prevent just that ^ > no one of significance lost!

Liliet

I'm sorry but fuck you

(I know it's really more like fuck EE but you said this...)

Ninestrings

No that's fair, I hadn't really gotten attached to her but I should respect she would be liked by many.

I was mainly relieved Hakram hadn't been absenced.

Liliet

I mean me too lmao

just, phrasing -_-

()'=)

Shveiran

Yeah... I can symphatize with the feeling, I truly can, but let's not insult each other over fictional characters.

This is a very civil comment section; let's keep it that way, shall we?

Konstantin von Karstein

Yeah, it's wonderful there is so much respect here, it's not very common.

Liliet

I said sorry >x>

Isi Arnott-Campbell

I'd have said it if you hadn't (and by that I don't mean "sorry").

anon

Does this mean that the dead king could have countered the entire Drow front by unleashing demons on them?

laguz24

They do not concern him, no one does. Also unleashing demons is Villain territory that gets you killed in the long run.

erebus42

Demons are the Dirty bombs of this world. You don't just toss them around willy-nilly when you have other options. I mean you could, but not if you actually wanted to make use of anything afterwards

thearpox23

No, but it is probably one of the many tricks he is keeping in reserve. I find the idea that Neshy is somehow above the use of demons to be silly. It's a tool like any other, he will use it if it fits.

1: The Night Cat uses comes directly from Sve Noc, and flows back to her. Whether an individual Rulleh gets corrupted or not likely won't matter to Sve Noc since the corrupted night would stay with them. In other words, the drow won't get their casts disrupted by their goddesses.

1: Using demons would have likely crippled the drow, and set them on the back foot for a while, but they'd develop countermeasures (new tricks) after a couple weeks or months. Case in point, Cat was still able to find herself useful in the fight even with the limitations.

Konstantin von Karstein

Story-wise it's not a good move. It would escalate things too fast, and give Above a way to act too.

Sir Nil

This was a costly blow. Several Named lost, not to mention the human resources in the arsenal. And a Mirror Knight driven in the direction of preserving Procer as he sees it now has the potential to grab as much authority as the White Knight.

Sir Nil

Damnit I just remembered that MK sees Cat and her methods as a parasite that nestles itself in Good and has gotten the weapon literally made from the woman of cutting rot out.

Insanenoodlyguy

Nah, he doesn't. He has power, but no natural leadership. He can get people to rally behind him in a fight but at rest, at peace? No way. Now that doesn't mean he can't fuck everything up, but it won't be an authority contest, but an ass-kicking one.

Miles

Heroic authority doesn't come from pure power. The MK lacks the intelligence and leadership to wield his power in a way that gets him listened to

Liliet

This. Heroes aren't villains, they don't form hierarchy based on power.

No, Mirror Knight is a lone loose cannon.

Now Cat just has to... un-loose it.

Konstantin von Karstein

Or point him at another target 🦴

Sir Nil

Ya'll are forgetting the Procerian nobles that still have their fingers in the MK cake. MK slew 7 demons in this encounter and now wields a weapon capable of killing their largest threat. If he ends the Dead King and the Procer nobles give him the thought of not letting the Drow settle... That may not be as easy to ignore.

Sir Nil

It is not the authority with the heroes I'm too worried about, but the authority with the people that live in Procer, which I would argue may be the equivalent of most the heroes combined. If more Procerian Princes support him, he may just be dumb enough to accept because he wants to preserve Procer as it is.

I'm especially worried after the war. MK has been set up as one of the hardest to kill characters, it wouldn't be a stretch to say he survives this. Most of all, MK has a lot of trappings that can make him a second Sword Saint. He literally wields a blade made from the woman who refused Evil on all grounds. I half wonder if the Severance actually is the Sword Saint given how her Decree was that she was a Sword.

Liliet

> the authority with the people that live in Procer, which I would argue may be the equivalent of most the heroes combined Kingfisher Prince >>>> Mirror Knight.

Liliet

That girl who tried to manipulate him but failed to even talk him into considering himself owed some land to rule? They've got barely a touch on him.

Shveiran

Failed? Why is that, because the vision ended without him being fully convinced?

Manipulation doesn't need to be finished in one post-coital session to be working. Especially since it is meant to "work" after the war.

Liliet

True, more like failed to convince him in one go.

But my point is that now that Frederic has been tasked by Cordelia with knocking some sense into his head (it's in his PoV when BoM shows up) and Catherine is now paying attention to him needing guidance and mentorship (and having needed it all along), the nobles basically don't have a chance.

Shveiran

We shall see. My read of his character is rather less forgiving than yours, and that is where the heart of the matter lies. One does not draw blood from stones, no matter how much you stab it. Even if I must concede that Catherine is likely to stab it a lot, and I do have a hard time saying anything is beyond Frederic's capabilities.

His vast, dreamy, supple capabilities that are awakening within me things I never knew were there in the first place...

Ahem. As I was saying, we shall wait and see. Yes.

Liliet

To swerve the topic in a completely unrelated direction, what do you think about the Fred Axe ship? 😊

Shveiran

In his own POV chapter, Cristophe sure didn't seem to think of the drow (or even Levantines, let alone Callowans) like trusted allies, but rather ungrateful fuckers. That doesn't seem far from the "alliance of victor is like a heart in summer" mindset the Prince and her daughter seem to sponsor.

Liliet

Christophe is confused as shit, and between Cat and Frederic is about to be served a helping of gentle guidance and education.

Javvies

You do realize that that requires Mirror Knight be willing to actually listen to Frederic and Cat, right?

He might listen to Kingfisher Prince, since he's a Proceran Prince and a Hero (presumably) ... but Kingfisher Prince has spent significantly less time as a Hero than Mirror Knight, and so might not be listened to as closely as he should be.

And Cat ... is neither Proceran nor a Hero. In fact, she's basically a Villain, with Villain followers, and anything she says is thus inherently suspect to Mirror Knight.

Liliet

Christophe has already accepted Hakram as a peer and a friend. He's ignorant but not wilfully ignorant. He listens as best he can, it's just that no-one has actually talked to him so far. Cat pointed that out in her POV.

Shveiran

And you know, the more I think about it the less that makes sense to me.

I think that's kind of why I'm so mad at Cristophe, in fact. Because from my perspective there is no way he was tragically left out of the loop unless he wanted to be. I guess if it was proven that wasn't the case, I could warm up to the guy, it's just... how?

I mean, way back at the start of the War of the Dead, he was serving in the north with several other heroes, right? Among which was Hanno. Who in his own POV specifically stated the divide between Cristophe and the Levantine heroes was a problem. Who we saw actively use his pull to try and mend as many bridges as he could.

It's true that we never saw Hanno actually take action on-screen on this particular hero's mind farts, but... I really, really have a hard time believing that not only he didn't, but he also apparently forgot and failed to remember this was a thing during the last two years.

I mean, it's not like the Mirror Knight was a random Hero, he has several times been described as one of the most powerful ones.

And besides, considering how he reacted to Cat in this Book, I have a hard time believing Cristophe was never vocal about the T&T in the past.

How is it possible that both Hanno and Tariq failed to ever recognize this – nay, remember this – as a problem? Enough to warrant a chat, at the very least?

I guess I could buy the Pilgrim being told by Bard to sit this one out, but... I don't know, I really don't see it. That he was the one to never listen makes a lot more sense to me; Hanno doing nothing for years feels out of character with his comments back then.

Liliet

> It's true that we never saw Hanno actually take action on-screen on this particular hero's mind farts, but... I really, really have a hard time believing that not only he didn't, but he also apparently forgot and failed to remember this was a thing during the last two years.

Note that he only did anything about Nephele's state of mind because she was visibly falling apart right in front of him and willing to engage with him about it.

Hanno did not do anything about the Raphaella/Catherine feud, either.

He's a swell guy, but he's not very... competent? He's not a professional therapist, he's not a professional mediator like Cat in many ways is. His idea of his purpose in life is 'stab evil, not stab non-evil even if it's Evil'. It's been two years and he still pushes back against Cat saying he is an actual authority figure for heroes.

Hanno didn't "forget", he just never parsed it as something that would be his responsibility in the first place. In that conversation he did not actually bother taking Christophe aside and explaining why his words wounded, and that's when it nearly did come to a fight (which it only did because of Nephele egging them on). As long as Christophe wasn't actively picking fights Hanno would assume it was handling itself somehow. He's the "my judgement sucks" guy, the "oh hey can the Black Queen be in charge please? I know I'm supposed to be her equal and counterpart but she seems nice enough I'm sure I don't really have to be keeping tabs on her – uh what, it's been two years and she's falling apart from doing the job meant for two people alone? shit i think i fucked up" guy.

And Tariq has clearly been deliberately distancing himself from anything political in the last two years. Probably a compound effect of him being more tired than ever with a third of his Name gone along with a chunk of his soul, of his long-time friend dying before his eyes with, factually, his permission, and the given away crown meaning he had to stay away from anything even remotely resembling ruling Levant, which considering their attitudes he'd have to do actively and aggressively, and of him having been that wrong about the Black Queen.

He wasn't playing a leadership role since the founding of the Truce and Terms, he'd been murder hobo-ing it around the front mopping up messes as Ophanim led him to them. Christophe's ignorance didn't happen to be within his mandate, or at least didn't make the priority list with the whole Dead King plagues thrown around thing.

Morgenstern

Where are you getting the seven from? I only counted five, according to the bodies indicated in this chapter. That would make two still loose, unless the "hole" is another one. Do you count the "three stripes of flesh" that hurt Cat to look at?
Or do you count something from an earlier chapter?

laguz24

Oh, Hakrams alive, that's a relief. But how do they patch things up after their little disagreement along with the side effects of severance plus the anti drow plot?

Liliet

What disagreement?

sivarajan

If you're disappointed in the lack of a demon of Absence (yes, I know), read "Lost City" by Alexander Wales: alexanderwales.com/lost-city.

Miles

I don't remember anyone mentioning the hole it hurt to think about?

Mental Mouse

Presumably the Absence demon itself. I note that four of the demons have already been destroyed, presumably so that EE only needs to come up with half as many utterly unique and horrifying battle sequences. 😊

Miles

Absence demons exist only in theory. Nobody has ever encountered one.

Eleyvie

That's a nice theory, but it is absent of proof.

Decius

There are reports of every other type of demon being encountered, including ones which exist only in theory. The absence of reports of Absence Demons is proof that, whether purely theoretical or not, their powers are effective, and work pretty much the way the lack of reports say they do.

magesbe

I understand why Catherine is wary of the Mirror Knight now, but this is basically what they were looking for. A strong named who can wield the Severance. Mirror Knight won't move against Catherine unless she turns on him or is framed, at least so long as the Dead King remains a threat. Afterwards? Well she has time to convince him that she's a necessary "evil."

erebus42

You're working under the dangerous assumption that the Mirror knight will be able to see some semblance of reason. He might, but given the state he was in going into this and the whole lovely experience itself...well...he hardly needs to be corrupted by demonic taint to have been warped by this.

Liliet

He was warped by this alright... into considering Hakram a close comrade he grabbed the sword for the sake of.

Liliet

Yup. A challenge: he will be either liability or asset. It's what Cat was MADE for really.

Shveiran

Sure. Heaving an emotionally-unstable, gullible imbecile in charge of the key weapon of mass destruction is peachy, especially with one of the two Bad Guys being specialized in story manipulation.

I expect MK will prove a danger to enemy armies, and no one else. There is no red flags here, no sir, none whatsoever.

thearpox23

One of? One of?!?!?

Dead King.

Bard.

Malicia is the only one not specialized in it, but then she's specialized in manipulation period, and that's not better.

So I have no idea how you arrived at that statement unless you count as Cordelia or Sve Noc as one of the two Bad Guys, because they're honestly the only major political players that AREN'T specialized in story manipulation.

IDKWhoitis

Malica shouldn't be on the list. Her schemes, while exquisite, are strictly mundane and have no bearing on the meta level. She has shown repeatedly she has no understanding of the meta level, with Super weapons, with her treatment of Black, with her methods to win the 2nd Civil War.

She is a wonderful Chessmaster, just like Cordy, but neither are storytellers. They do not shape conflict and the theatrics of the world like DK, WB, Black, and Cat do.

thearpox23

She is explicitly relevant when it comes to such schemes as turning allies against each other, via forgery and common blackmail if nothing else. The focus here isn't here on who will get to shape the coming age, but whether MK is a liability.

Shveiran

I said story manipulation, not manipulation. Which is Bard's bread and butter.

Malicia is an extremely good schemer, but she doesn't use narrative to ensure her success.

As for the Dead King, he is narrative skills are mostly spent to avoid the traps the wrong story structure would force on him (since he is stuck in the Villainous role, stories are almost always a danger and not a resource).

I didn't say only the Bard is dangerous, merely that the most dangerous traps will come from MK being driven by the wrong story, which will happen on its own or nudged by Bard. Could the Empress' scheme also cause it? Sure. She can play people. I just said that I find the Bard the most dangerous.

thearpox23

She is the most dangerous I agree, it just wasn't what you wrote. It's a little leap between saying she's the bigger possible influencer in the situation, and saying the Dead King isn't specialized in story manipulation when that's one of the two big things he's always had going for him, the other being his magical aptitude.

Malicia's not even one of the two villains you were talking about, I just included her to show that no matter which way the flugel turns the MK can be fucked with. Doesn't matter what kind of manipulation you were referencing if any does the job.

Shveiran

That is what I said, thank you very much.
We simply have a different definition of "story manipulation".

I don't count the DK as a master because his skill is about not being manipulated, and exerting non-narrative skills in safe way (as known as, his panoply of eldritch undead horrors).

That is remarkable, but he doesn't use that skill offensively; if anything, it has been remarked he doesn't seem to understand human, emotional attachment anymore. He is not well-suited to manipulating a Hero's emotion into stepping in the wrong story. That is not his backyard, it is the Bard's.

I could be mistaken, of course. If you would care to show me one instance where he used story manipulation offensively?

thearpox23

Off the top of my head... Getting Proceran Princes to tribute their human children to him. I can't see himself establishing himself as the Eternal Big Bad as anything but offensive.

Do consider that while he appears to have a long running tally of failures, most unrecorded and unmentioned, he is also directly opposed by the Bard who is more skilled than him. So what we get for him offensive oriented plans is the following trajectory.

First, we have a plan with clear strategic long-term benefit. Something like conquering another layer of hell for example.

Then, once the Dead King starts implementing it, he finds Bard in opposition to that.

A multitude of schemes and plans later, the Bard usually wins, and the Dead King goes skulking back to his wasteland.

I don't have a ready example for him specifically corrupting a Hero, but let's be honest it's a long and unreliable way to get rid of someone, and Dead King is a utilitarian who's yet to need to resort to it. But consider the sheer variety of Revenants, That MK is bogged down in human politics, and the already seen human-disguising ghouls, and all the tools are there.

erebus42

Demons are horrifically awesome as always.

It's a shame about the Magister, she seemed like she had a good head on her shoulders.

As for the Mirror Knight, from what's been said about the Severity, unless he's become some sort of Saint of Swords (may she never return) reborn forged in horror and blood, I can't see whatever role he's been on continuing after this fight. I would guess he'll probably keel over once his momentum is spent. A legend and a monster for a day. The question now obviously is whether or not he's too far gone to see reason and if the Blade of Mercy will have to live up to his Name.

erebus42

*roll

Insanenoodlyguy

On the plus side, since Cat obviously won't be sleeping with her now, the way is clear for her to hook up with the Kingfisher Prince.

Liliet

First, ew.

Second, Catherine is already in a poly relationship, she could hook up with as many people at the same time as she liked as long as they were onboard with the premise period.

Third, ew.

thearpox23

You do not like the Prince?

Liliet

I love the Prince. I just find the concept of 'kill the third wheel' utterly and indescribably gross.

thearpox23

Eh, it's a work of literature, it's not like you're actually hurting real people. If you like a certain pairing, nothing wrong with wanting for them to get together other characters be damned. Not like you have to care about things that don't interest you. I know I often outright skip scenes with certain characters in works I find mediocre.

Used as an actual writing tool, it is often a sign that the writer is a hack, and I don't really when it is used. But that is not a moral judgement.

Liliet

That's where we get to "Catherine is in an actual poly relationship right now and I find people ignoring that kind of questionable in the first place" but yeah 'ew' was not a moral judgement just a statement of being personally grossed out 🤔

thearpox23

Because everything Cat's fling with Archer screams 'temporary'. People (in-world) wouldn't be shipping her otherwise, and Cat hasn't been someone to have multiple romances going at the same time.

Not sure 'ew' translated well to text then cause you just confused everyone.

Liliet

It's been temporary for two years now lmao. In the meantime they've settled into sugar sweet sappy domesticity, with Archer making a fucking table for her and making carvings every time she visits and Cat's officers even having their own routine around that!

Secondary relationship doesn't mean temporary and doesn't mean unimportant :3

And Cat hasn't had romances period – she loved Kilian but wasn't in love with her, and was hurt at breakup not by stopping the romantic relationship but by Kilian then saying she doesn't want to stay friends then either.

thearpox23

No one said unimportant, but I wouldn't expect Cat to keep fucking Archer if she started a thing with someone else. They'll stay a part of the Woe, and I'd expect it to be an easy break-up. I used 'romance' as a general term, and the exact fact that she hasn't had one besides the one with Kilian and Archer tells me she takes this sort of thing seriously.

You are welcome to disagree, and we could easily have an long argument, since I can actually find evidence to back up my claims. I don't wholly agree with your take on Kilian, and with Archer who knows how much of their interactions can be taken to them being a part of the Woe. But I'm not aiming to convince you here, just showing this perspective exists and is valid. Point is, if I were shipping Cat I wouldn't think of her current dynamic either since it doesn't look setup to get in the way.

Liliet

> No one said unimportant, but I wouldn't expect Cat to keep fucking Archer if she started a thing with someone else.

Archer is currently in a relationship with Masego, has been for two years. She has also been in a relationship with Cat for these same two years. They're two people who matter most to her. (But the relationship with Masego is the primary one – slightly more official)

I can see that this perspective exists, I disagree that it is valid. I think it's disrespectful and erasive of the actual polyamory representation in Guide (as well as aromantic representation, though that's another tier deeper into the rat hole).

I am very much prepared to present quotes to support my point as well.

thearpox23

>Archer is currently in a relationship with Masego, has been for two years. She has also been in a relationship with Cat for these same two years. They're two people who matter most to her. (But the relationship with Masego is the primary one – slightly more official)

None of that contradicts any of what I said though.

If you want to clarify, by all means go ahead, but for the sake of your own time please don't actually go quote-hunting.

And mate, any perspective which requires niche terminology and/or extensive quoting to disprove is valid to have. Even if the matter can be objectively proven to one side, requiring good memory and/or rereading to make 'what ifs' is just a dampener on creativity.

Also, when you're saying something is disrespectful, you're effectively saying "Hey, you're wrong about this thing. But unlike other things, being wrong about this is worse than being wrong about other things." That's just not how being wrong works, you either agree that you're wrong or you don't. The most you can get is to get others to shut up because they don't want to hurt your feelings, like how you wouldn't comment on the dress of your aging aunt who still thinks she is dressing to fashion because you don't want to hurt her feelings. You don't actually think she dresses up well, you just keep silent about it. Except in this case it's fictional characters whose feeling are hurt.

Liliet

> Except in this case it's fictional characters whose feeling are hurt.

I understand that aromantic and poly people being fictional characters is a widespread view, but it's not actually accurate. I'm not fictional, for example – easy mistake to make, I know, what with the near-complete lack of representation in either fiction or popular non-fiction, but believe it or not, it's true!

thearpox23

Wtf dude, hold your horses. Because either I suck at writing or you suck at reading, but in no way did I imply that non-conforming sexual preferences don't exist in real life. I thought it obvious I was referring to the fact that it is impossible to hurt the feelings of a fictional character. In other words, things that would be rude and disrespectful to say in real life are quite appropriate and may even form a base for an interesting fanfiction.

Liliet

I am talking about how fiction matters to real life people, and people's interpretation of fiction matters in real life, impacting other people they interact with.

I don't give a shit about you hurting Catherine Foundling's feelings. She's not real ~~and also deserves it~~. But she's acting as representation for real life minorities.

thearpox23

She can act as a representation for real-life minorities for you. But it is up to each reader to decide individually how they view her, and you are trying to put chains on that by appealing to real life interactions. As if the readers have a moral duty to read the work in a certain way, to shift their thinking/behavior solely to make life easier for (collective) you.

So you are tone-policing. And morality aside, there is a practical reason not to tone-police. There is no clear red line of what to write and what not to write. There is no defined group that gets to set the standards, but just individuals with their own quirks, morals, and beliefs. Some reasonable, some crazy, some just to troll. Follow this to it's logical concision, and you end up with toxic cesspits and echo-chambers that you are well aware are prevalent on the internet.

As for fiction mattering to real life, that conversation is usually resolved with "Okay, so this is real life and it works a little differently from fiction. Here how..." at which point no normal person will go "But that was written a work of fiction, so it must be true." Works of fiction can be used to popularize brand products or motivate people to do something they already want to do, but they don't overwrite the things people already know to be true.

So of course someone's reading of fiction can be used to stereotype their beliefs, but I wholly reject the idea that anyone's reading is invalid just because their real life beliefs might be wrong.

PS: While I did accuse you of tone-policing, do note that I do not believe you to be obnoxious about it, as you are denying the validity of my take in the politest way possible. (And I am still half-convinced that your issue with my take is a misunderstanding in itself. Of course, that is no longer relevant to this post.)

Liliet

> She can act as a representation for real-life minorities for you. But it is up to each reader to decide individually how they view her

That's not really how representation works. You cannot, for example, read PGTE and say "I headcanon Cat as straight just really confused", that's a straight-up, how do I put it, wrong reading of the text. Part of the point of representation is to introduce people to new concepts and ideas that they wouldn't have encountered in their everyday life (perhaps not so much because they don't know anyone belonging to these groups as because those people don't discuss their personal life with them, or if they do aren't honest about it, as marginalized minorities often do).

And obviously this cannot be done forcibly. If you don't want to read Catherine as being already factually in a poly relationship (and likely to continue it just as it has been for the last two in-universe years), I cannot make you. But this is a public forum, and I'm explaining not only to you, but also to anyone who happens to read this and maybe learns something new.

> So you are tone-policing.

You're a bit confused about terminology. Tone policing means telling someone that they're talking in the wrong tone, ie too hysterical or too calm or too passionate etc. That hasn't happened in this conversation. You're looking for some other phrasing of what exactly I'm doing that's wrong.

And I am not trying to instruct people on what they should write. Erratic is writing what he's writing, and the reason I hang out in this comment section and not in, I don't know, metaworld chronicles, is because he writes things I like and want to see more of. I avoid fandoms that aren't as, well, good.

Representation is not a morally neutral issue, and "real life beliefs" are not a morally neutral issue. And beliefs can be wrong and right. If I believe that England is not real and the English are all secretly robots pretending to be humans, that would be, how do I put this, factually wrong. And beliefs (factually wrong and otherwise) can engender actions that are morally wrong, which I will not go into here, but – it's not a neutral issue. Things I'm saying do need to be said.

(And "I'm sure Cat will stop fucking Indrani" IMHO really doesn't. First of all, that's a gross way to put it...)

thearpox23

"You cannot, for example, read PGTE and say "I headcanon Cat as straight just really confused", that's a straight-up, how do I put it, wrong reading of the text."

And I return to my earlier point that that the validity of an interpretation depends on how long it takes to disprove said interpretation. Proving that Cat's not straight is easy, but I'm not even arguing that she's in a poly relationship. Just viewing the finer details a little differently.

That said,
"If I believe that England is not real and the English are all secretly robots pretending to be humans, that would be, how do I put this, factually wrong."

Some shippers have a tendency to do the exact equivalent of that and I fail to see the problem. Makes it more funny than anything.

"Representation is not a morally neutral issue, and "real life beliefs" are not a morally neutral issue."

Everything is morally neutral when applied to fiction. If you're not budging on that then I think we've found the cornerstone of the disagreement. Everything else is dressing. That said, if you do for some reason want to continue this we should stop cluttering up the thread at least.

"Tone policing means..."
Yeah, my mistake.

"(.... that's a gross way to put it....)"
Didn't think it was, but I'll phrase it differently if I chat with you again.

Liliet

> Proving that Cat's not straight is easy

...unless your Personal Views are that what she is can be read as straight. It's pretty outdated by now to insist that bi people don't really exist and are either confused gay people or confused straight people, but it's still an existent position historically.

"Everything is morally neutral when applied to fiction. If you're not budging on that then I think we've found the cornerstone of the disagreement. "

See, I agree with that. I just think that once you are engaging with the fandom and other commenters, particularly in a public space, it's no longer purely about fiction.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

If the writing makes someone feel gross, then it is hurting real people. Not to the same extent as murder of course, but while it is important for art to be able to be transgressive there is nonetheless such a thing as being in poor taste.

thearpox23

Different people like different things.

Aotrs Commander

Ew why?

Liliet

"This character stood in the way of my ship, now that they're killed the way is clear!" <= ew ew ew ew ew ew ew

Liliet

(You're probably joking. It's not funny)=)

Insanenoodlyguy

I'm not sure where this really negative reaction is coming from. if you mean the "She just watched an interest die, show some tact" it's not funny, fair enough. I am of the opinion that Cat could use some comfort when this is all done and Archer being around didn't change her previous plans before this.

if it's specifically Kingfisher Prince that's the problem, then I admit I'm at a loss as to your vehement opposition.

Liliet

Nah, Frederic is fine. It's the "she just mercy killed her interest and sees the scene whenever her eyes are closed" part, plus the "Nephele Eliade just died aaaaa" part.

Miles

She claims to be bi, but she's shown a distinct lack of interest in male characters (except flashbacks) when it comes to doing more than ogling them sometimes.

Liliet

I mean, that's a subset of bi. Bi can be leaning in one direction, the qualification for the definitioin is just 'non-zero attraction to others too'.

Adrian_V

Mmmmm, i kind of makes sense the Mirror Knight seems like the kind of named that was made to fight demons, and with all the whoop the Severance has been described it stands to reason it can hurt and kill demons.

My take in this is that there being so many demons actually helped since they each got in the way of the other, the fight probably got harder after they killed half of them. Also there were 8 did anyone count so we saw 7 corpses (counting terror too)?

erebus42

Not to mention the Inverse Ninja Law which no doubt gets factored in by Providence

Liliet

Demons are immune to providence.

erebus42

I dont recall that ever being explicitly said but even if that were true Heroes are not and so you could achieve the same effect by providing a boost on their end.

Liliet

True!

Adrian_V

I was just going to point out that!, even if all seems lost all that needs to happen is for 1 hero to develop an anti demon aspect bam, wich is what i think MK did, either that or 1 evolved so to speak (unless the sword did it all)

Liliet

I'm going to guess it's the sword + what he already had.

Liliet

...I counted six.

- 1) the Demon of Terror;
- 2) Beyond those rested a thing that looked like a twisted afterbirth, hacked into and burned until it was no longer a threat. The remains of a demon, I thought as the lot of us walked through death.
- 3) There was another, forced into a hole carved in the wall and both stone and corpse were scorched so thoroughly nothing could be glimpsed of the manner of demon it had been
- 4), 5) At the gates, where the Mirror Knight and the Vagrant Spear must have stood and fought, the blackened and scattered remains of another two demons could be seen.
- 6) the one Christophe just finished off.

One more can be presumed to be Absence.
And one more... oh boy. If we're lucky the Corruption one died along with Maddened Keeper because she was using it at the moment.

TeK

>if we're lucky
I don't know, but it feels narratively that we are coming to a lowest and darkest point of the story. We haven't even started fighting DK, and Bard had implied he's not even getting serious yet.

Liliet

But that's exactly it – the lowest and darkest part of the story is still coming, we're not there yet.

caoimhinh

The 8 Demons are accounted for. Besides the six you mentioned, there's this part:

"It was further in that the fighting still held, past the three stripes of burned flesh that had my heart stirring in unease to look at and the... hole that it hurt my mind to even think of."

The "hole that hurts to look at" is obviously the remains of Absence.

And you missed "the three stripes of burned flesh that had my heart stirring in unease to look at" which would be the remains of the other Demon.

Valkyria

We don't really know that though. I agree with the Absence speculation but the three stripes of burned flesh? I don't know.

All the other corpses had a location to their description, we don't know for sure that the stripes are a different corpse. Why would you describe a single corpse like that? Also, for me "past the three stripes" implies that she already counted them before, than just "past three stripes". But before that she mentioned only two burned heaps next to the door.

Maybe I'm not right, but one could also be counting the three stripes as the demons liliet counted in her comment as 2,4,5 and the "hole" as the literal hole demon 3 got smashed into.

It would technically fit, since the fighting is going on further in the back, past all the corpses she saw.

Do0d

That was obviously a live Beast of Absence. No one can even acknowledge it's existence.

Valkyria

There has to be someone who can, since people know they do exist. You maybe forget about it or it changes/alters your memories, but someone has to be sort of immune or people would not know things like demons of Absence even exist.

theorel

The three stripes of flesh are bits of Hakram

Jose

Arent the meat stripes the cut parts of adjutant? An arm, a leg and part of the torso

Javvies

Can't be.

Hakram was inside the containment chamber for Severance when the Maddened Keeper betrayed them. Not out in the hallway.

Hakram's severed parts would logically be inside the room, more or less where he fell and Mirror Knight cut them off, not out in the hallway on the path to the chamber.

Do0d

Unless those parts tried to reattach themselves ...

Liliet

It's unclear whether it's the hallway or inside. Would be real neat if it wasn't Hakram bits, but Catherine's reaction suggests otherwise.

Liliet

No, that's Hakram's cut off leg, arm and side.

agumentic

"Leg, arm and side" are not in any way stripes of flesh, I don't remember anything about them burning and why would they lie in the middle of the battle and not where they cut off?

Liliet

Because they were cut off in the middle of where the battle then started, 'stripes of flesh' is what was left of them after corruption, and Light would have burned them to stop it spreading.

Now I do want to double check the location though you're right. Hakram got shanked by Keeper inside the stone chamber...

"eyond it a few steps up led us to open steel gates and the last gasps of madness beyond. At the gates, where the Mirror Knight and the Vagrant Spear must have stood and fought, the blackened and scattered remains of another two demons could be seen. It was further in that the fighting still held, past the three stripes of burned flesh that had my heart stirring in unease to look at and the... hole that it hurt my mind to even think of."

Hmm. It can be read either way.

Saint of Swordfish

I think the "hole it hurt to look at" was the body of the Demon of Absence. Assuming the strips of flesh on the ground were pieces of Hakram's body, this leaves one demon unaccounted for.

Also, I think that the "twisted afterbirth" might be the Demon of Corruption, as it roughly matches the description at Marchford.

Liliet

THAT WOULD BE BAD

Adrian_V

Pardon the double comment but i forgot the most important part i wanted to say: chances are that Cat's name will be either the Queen of Blades or some other manner of soldier queen name, in fact i wouldn't be surprised if it finishes coming along with an aspect to counterbalance the MK, that and she both wants and needs more power that isn't night related, we saw how she is lamenting the nature of night.

Mmmm either the aspect will be flexible meanign it can be used to protect (remember she lamented strongly she couldn't protect her soldier or Nephele) or 1 will be defense another offense.

Ninestrings

Eh any kind of power is limited in some ways, That's one of the reasons Cat jumps between mantles and roles situationally.

Adrian_V

Yeah but the nature of that power is what i meant, Night is fragile, it has been pointed out many times so i bet at least 1 of her aspect will be blunt, at least at first glance (like Sain'ts Cut).

And probably something that while usefull to attack will be stronger protecting others. Or it could be like 1 of Black's old aspects and buff her troops.

Shveiran

It won't be Queen of Blades; she is changing Calernia's face in a fundamental way, and so her Name will be a new one.

Liliet

Also she's not associated with blades in any way. She bears a staff these days, and none of her signature achievements actually involve her using a blade in a memorable way.

Raved Thrad

Oh poor Nephele. We barely knew you.

Anomandris

And whatever we knew, we kinda liked...

Adrian_V

Erra needed to kill someone, i am glad it was her and not Hakram.

And ever head towards their grace

I'm gonna be honest i was hoping hakram would die. I'm already at the point where if viv gets her head cut off, i'd believe she wouldn't have actually died. I cant remember the last time i was actually worried something would happen to any of the Woe and it seems like the last book would be the place to establish some actual danger.

It would also have been nice for the bards plans to be in any way actually doing things (even if actually dieing was the goal that also failed).

Demons are canonically outside Providence and narrative rules which means there isn't an in universe law that would necessitate him staying alive either.

Raved Thrad

The Adjutant cannot die until the Black Queen releases him from service.

Adrian_V

That actually could be worse, it would be like with Nauk where even alive he wasn't really himself anymore, or when he dies is a mercy kill.

Also of course they won't die until their deaths serve as a pivot or in the climax.

caoimhinh

Well, he really didn't need to kill more characters (we already have a high count of dead Named in this arc), and definitely not one that was completely unharmed and was just getting an interesting story (She got her own moments in two Extra Chapters and now everybody was shipping her with Cat). Her death feels... empty, meaningless beyond the "hey let's kill this character that readers are starting to like, lol".

I'm more surprised that the Vagrant Spear not only survived but is standing and fighting without issue when the last we saw of her was her barely breathing and needing medical assistance.

Concocter passed by them for a short while, but still...

Shveiran

I disagree.

Someone needed to die among MK's band and Cat's, and Nephele is the one that was in both.

Plus, she was built up enough to create attachment, but shipping aside... she was pretty much done, wasn't she? From a narrative perspective. I don't really see her getting in a meaningful relationship with Cat, nor anyone else. She is too focused on her endgame, and no one else really is, not in the same way. It could be another Killian, but not a meaningful relationship between peers.

What did they really have in common? How would that make either grow?

I'm rather glad we didn't go in that direction, to be honest.

We got an emotional gut-punch when we needed it, and that's that.

Insanenoodlyguy

I was kinda hoping as she felt better about her self and her past and alignment, she'd end up persuing Hanno more ardently. Admittely I ship a lot of people with a lot of people.

TeK

I ship Hanno with Witch, although it had been steadily implied that it's not gonna happen.

Mental Mouse

> I'm more surprised that the Vagrant Spear not only survived but is standing and fighting without issue when the last we saw of her was her barely breathing and needing medical assistance.

I'm guessing Concocter provided a "last stand" potion, similar to what Kairos used for his finale. In which case, she will die after the fight.

Liliet

She might not if given healing promptly. Concocter is good at her job, I can easily imagine her having a complement of potions that would stabilize Spear and serve as stimulator.

And Masego is right there with some battery mages. He can heal.

Vagabond

Hm, I think a death that feels meaningless is not meaningless.

Attempt to explain:

Deaths in reality are often meaningless as well. a lack of meaningless deaths in literature where there should be high risk of death often for many characters... It does reduce immersion (for me anyway) and helps foster (to my sensibilities) an ignorant picture of war and strife in readers, at least those who are for whatever reason easily influenced or are already leaning towards an attitude of "war and conflict is glorious"

Sorry for bad english.

P. S.

I loved this whole chapter. demons are terrifying! The interlude is awesome – really hyped for the third chapter!

Anomandris

RIP Magister – kinda liked her a lot.

Maybe MK's disdain towards villains have been tempered a bit by Harkram's actions in his presence. But boy, him with Severance seems like a powerful combo.

laguz24

I'm wondering what can kill him at this point. No doubt Nessie has something in the works.

Anomandris

The whole abridged Time thingy that Cat used on the Saint, maybe?

Miles

That only worked cause the sos was already ancient, and still took multiple arcs of DBZ style charging up

Saint of Swordfish

Also, the same trick never works twice, narratively. It would be anticlimactic.

Insanenoodlyguy

No, it can, but it has to be applied in a very creative way, like a variant that specifically relies on the countermeasures taken by those who knew it's previous usage or some-such. Though absoutely just straight up using the exact same tactic in a second climatic fight because it worked before is asking to get your face stomped in.

TeK

I kinda wish to see someone using the same exact tactic to win and getting away with it because "there is no way he would use the same tactic twice$

Liliet

That would honestly count as a twist specifically relying on countermeasures XD

caoimhinh

That might actually hilariously backfire on whoever tries it. He gets stronger with each passing day, so accelerating his time might just boost him.

True, it seems like it needs a new dawn to activate, but we never know. And making assumptions about a Hero's limit is not wise.

Raved Thrad

It would also be funny if, as a power interaction between his “get stronger every day” thing and the magical aging, the meta forced him to subjectively live through each and every day of however many years were applied to him. In which case, he’ll either go insane or, irony of ironies, die of starvation long before he could die of aging.

Adrian_V

Lakes, just throw him into a deep lake and he will drown eventually.

MatthewTheLucky

Lakeomancy wins again!

Shveiran

Unless he cuts the lake. There isn’t really a lot you can do against a I-cut-everything absolute. Like with most absolute.

I mean, when you get down to it, it was not really time but narrative weight that killed Saint. One could rewrite the scene in a “Laurence the Monfort is a sword, and a sword doesn’t age” if the set-up was right.

There is no clear-cut way to defeat dominions.

magesbe

Except swords can totally age? They can get brittle then break with time.

Shveiran

Yes, but not in 8 years.
That’s how long the StafSwordPrayer aged Saint, remember?

Liliet

11, but the point stands lol

Shveiran

Also, not really how steel works.

It’s the elements that could make it rust, not just spontaneous decay.

Raved Thrad

The obvious solution is to trick Christophe into cutting a fart. Since it's so blatantly unheroic, and probably unProceran, he will likely slink off in shame and die of embarrassment in some corner somewhere. 😊

Mental Mouse

Mirror Knight's Name comes from lake guardians, I would not be at all surprised if he is immune to drowning.

David Stone

But as the foremost Lakeomancer of her age, I think Catherine has dominion over lake guardians, therefore she can control the Mirror Knight.

dadycool

That how it be, sometimes. No war is clean, friends are lost, stories/Stories get cut off beyond all hope for completion, and unnameable horrors get unleashed that really ought to have stayed in the box. Like she said, losing less than half your force/friends was actually a really good outcome, especially against a foe known for exacting a massive blood price, especially one you can't even look at.

Wonder

The Night is a thief's tool. Cat's Name will be that of a Soldier queen. She needs to get her oomph back.

But if Night devoured Winter, and Cat can still Take , why can't she Break and Fall with the Night?

TeK

Now it will be a Dark Knight, mainly because EE is somewhat annoyed by any theorised Name with Knight in it.

grzecho2222

NIght Knight

TeK

That is perfect.

Letouriste

This is so tacky, I love it!

Would be lesser than priestess of Night tho

Mental Mouse

If Cat does get stuck with a Name, it's unlikely to be Queen of anything (possibly unless Queen of Lost and Found becomes a Name). As I noted on the Discord, one of Cat's distinguishing marks, (and one reason why other rulers cooperate with her) is that she's not actually interested in ruling anything – she's been fobbing the details of ruling her own kingdom off on variously Anne, Hakram, and Viv whenever she could get away with it.

Raved Thrad

The way she acts, I wouldn't be surprised if her name was some variant on "Mother of All." In which case she just might have aspects that allow her to spawn broodlings and overlords.

Haha! "Zerg Queen" as a name would be hilarious!

(and I'm joking. I hope.)

Juff

Typo Thread:

tenth of heavies > tenth of heavies was broad angle > a broad angle powers struggle > power struggle been forgot. > been forgotten.
was man > was a man gestured heard > heard a hand > at hand gesture for > and gestured for lead me > leads me studied it > studied if through > through out burst > out a burst
it instead of trying to avoid it > it, instead of trying to avoid it, a targets > targets
convulsed and so spraying (maybe remove the and so) cut only > only cut remains stuck > remain stuck wings is stayed > wings it stayed ragger > ragged began the roar of flames > the roar of flames began to be before > to me before mess," the > mess." The wall and both > wall, and both eyes hard > eyes were hard

Liliet

Nephele)=)=)=

I guess she was doomed by being a character heavily built up to be likable and having an arc with Cat but not one of the Woe and not plot critical)=

Well played erratic, well played.

Raved Thrad

I wonder if that's a sign of the times? "You've had a personal interlude. You can die now."

In which case, Roland's swan song may be coming up.

Liliet

A personal interlude?

Raved Thrad

Well, I guess they all are personal interludes. It's more a sense of "ok, I've given you character development, and you're no longer a faceless mook. Time to die."

Liliet

Nephele hasn't been faceless since the Winter extra chapters.

Frivolous

Considering how casually and often Masego used Wrest to borrow the sorcery of others, I'm beginning to suspect that he can use Wrest as many times as he'd like, not just once or 3x a day.

And yeah I'm glad that Masego and Hakram both survived.

Also, I wonder and suspect that Masego wrought a kind of back door into the Severance. I mean, he's pretty careful, and he's Praesi, so he's paranoid about betrayal. Something that dangerous should have a loophole so that it could not be used against Masego.

Gamer7956

Some aspects have active effects, some have passive effects. And some have different scales to them. For Wrest, taking the power from a willing mage or a small trinket is probably the merest flex of power. Taking the full might of an unwilling deity? That's gonna put the aspect on cooldown... (Though it is likely the true form of the aspect)

beleester

Some aspects run on an “exhaustion” mechanic rather than a cooldown. E.g., Hanno’s Recall gets slower and slower the more lives he uses in one fight, Roland gets exhausted by constant Use, Black’s Lead tires him out the more soldiers it’s spread across.

Liliet

This. I think Wrest is potentially infinite but requires exertion. Taking power from someone willing to give it is basically free real estate, it’s offensive use that ends up with a functional cooldown because Masego will be exhausted by the effort (especially if he then also uses what he took away).

TeK

Guess now he’ll be known as... Halfram.

Mental Mouse

Ow ow ow.

TeK

Disarmed and defeeted.

Burlyraven

RIP Nephele. You were gorgeous, but sadly lacking in useful demon fighting powers. Also, kinda saw it coming for a while; way too many mages in a lethal story.

What worries me is the fact that Cat really has been stepping into a trickster role, and both her established and potential moral anchors have been neutralized in significant ways. This is definitely a slippery slope situation brewing.

dadycoool

Hakram, Vivienne, Black, Akua, Hanno, GP, and Cordelia are the landmarks she uses, I think. I imagine there’s some level of “What would _____ do?” going on somewhere in her head, but they work far better when they’re present. All she’s had available to her recently have been Archer, Rouge, Masego, and a bunch of annoyances/traitors. And Nephele.

Also, Names aren’t generally handed out in a vacuum. As Squire I, she had to crawl and grasp for every inch, so she was molded to take advantage of that. As Squire II, she was established as her own power and as one who has the option of Taking everything she sees and Breaking what was denied her. When she was about to become the Black Queen, she was essentially being endorsed by Praes, so she likely would’ve been molded to fit that. Her current and imminent position look like a Story of a mortal Rising to a position where she can Break gods. In fact, I think it was implied that that is exactly what Masego was suggesting at the end of Book 5. After all, he knows how to do it now. With her being a trickster, she's always been one to peruse Bard's armory and pick out a weapon to suit the situation. Outsmarting gods is exactly what trickster gods do (Loki). What better way to attain godhood than to trick the Gods into endorsing you?

Mental Mouse

Well, Cat was always something of a trickster, finding a "third path" in what other think is a blank wall (or a sea of fire). She suffers the usual hazard as well, like any trickster she often gets caught in her own schemes.

Liliet

The ur-examples are in Book 1. Letting a hero go to start a war to advance in which she came to straight up regret for moral reasons, and tricking her way through the 5-way melee until she and Juniper were the last ones standing – and she'd been effectively 'caught in her own scheme' there at the end, with most of her company gone from Aisha's counter-betrayal, if it wasn't also for necromancy providing her a brute force way to cheat.

thearpox23

I'm mostly just confused at what the Maddened Keeper was/is going for. Just because she was Mad doesn't mean a complete lack of reason or planning, else she wouldn't have been useful to Bard as a tool. And I don't peg her to be like Black, planning out something hellishly complicated. So whatever it is/was, she'd got to be getting something out of the whole ordeal.

More Dakka

It could be as simple as a safe death. carrying so many demons would have had one hell of a toll and if the bard convinced her that if she died where she did it would stop the power of a villain who would corrupt the heart of callow (Cat) and wont allow demons to escape into creation where they could wreak destruction

Honestly she was a time bomb and this was a containable defusing. The Bard could spin her into believing it was a heroic sacrifice

Liliet

Bard doesn't need others to reason or plan to be useful to her. She runs on narrative manipulation far more than person manipulation. All it would take for Bard to know what would happen is know she was running on empty and was about to break, and arrange a narrative situation where it would inevitably happen at the worst possible moment (and then arrange for what exactly this moment would be).

thearpox23

All that is true except when the person in question has to worm herself into a party, stay nondescript, position herself at the appropriate place at the appropriate time, and then self-destruct on cue. That requires actual ability to reason. MoreDakka's hypothesis is a possibility at least.

Liliet

It's certainly a possibility, but it's also a possibility that Maddened Keeper herself was utterly ignorant of there being a plot involving her and just self-destructed because the eighth demon was one too many. Christophe invited her on his own initiative, staying quiet and unassuming is pretty easy when you're barely conscious because of an internal demon battle, and 'appropriate time appropriate place on cue' are all generously provided by Creation's propensity for drama.

thearpox23

She didn't self-destruct. She was sliced by Severance, and may or may not have died from that. That right before that she used Absence to hide and position herself and her choice of target speaks to that, nor did she display any signs of loss of control or tried to talk to any of the many experts present at the Arsenal. Whether or not she was aware of her fate does not absolve her actions of purpose.

Liliet

V true! It's a plausible suicide by cop but not necessarily.

ninegardens

Okay, so look, can we all just give MK some respect on this one:

Cat brings a small army and attempts to N vs. one ONE demon (still loses soldiers and magister).

Christoph (while injured) 1.5 vs 7s the ALL THE OTHER DEMONS.

What the heck?

... I know the sword helps, but bloody hell, the boy is a powerhouse.

A stupid, stupid, misguided powerhouse.

But a powerhouse nonetheless.

...Also, interesting seeing that THIS is Bard's victory condition for the Affray (apparently). ... not (for example) something more immediately destructive.

MatthewTheLucky

Bard does claim to be Good. Loosing demons for funzies doesn't really fit that, even in a sociopathic greater good way.

Liliet

Bard lost the overall game, and one demon escaping (what Cat cleaned up) might have been fully enough to fuck everything up. (Also, one or two demons might be missing already anyway).

And Light users have a categorical advantage over demons. The entire rest of who Cat brought with her (soldiers, herself, Nephele, Masego) were liabilities in a demon fight in a way a Light user capable of immediately protecting themselves isn't. I honestly suspect that fight could have gone better if BoM solo'd that one. Of course, that's presuming he solo'd it while protected from the taint, which is what Nephele and Masego brought to the table...

The feat of beating 5 at once (that's how many bodies are confirmed) is indeed pretty absurd, but 2 Light users (both of them clearly more skilled than BoM at actually using their weapons and working together with someone else) are a better matchup than Cat's part categorically.

Bitan

Can anyone list the various types of Demons for me?

I read it in a previous book, but I can't remember which one.

Liliet

There is a total of 23 types, and we haven't heard of all of them.

The ones we know are:

- Corruption
- Madness
- Absence
- Order
- Apathy

- Terror
- Excess

Liliet

- Time

Daniel E

Demon of Absence is gone, which is good. Mirror Knight is now arguably more powerful than Saint, which is bad, though not nearly as experienced, so Cat might still have some leverage. On a lighter note, I'm really hoping Hakram accepts the 'lightning-shooting prosthetic' now. For both his leg and arm, which would be hilarious.

IDKWhoitis

A couple things.

I'm suspicious of the Concoctor, how did she pull Hakram, a large Orc who needed 4 heavies to lift, in the middle of an area that went FUBAR? Especially with a Demon still on the loose. And with potential Fae around, corrupted or not. What is the likelihood she is corrupted? It could be a deeper madness or something from another Demon, we never clarified which ones were in play.

I think Cat already fucked up by letting her through without looking closer. Masego was busy with Hakram, and Cat was distracted.

Furthermore, I think MK will have to be put down. You don't stay in a locked box on fire with 8 demons and crawl out in any semblance of OK. Going back to the 5 types of demons that were not identified, I think we are being optimistic that they got every last one, which corpse was the Keeper's body? She is still alive or a Demon is. And following that, I think we are bound to have a room with only named soon, as I don't see the troops surviving for long after making contact with MK. They'll either die to a demon or MK.

Just listing off some fun thoughts of Demons:

- Wrath
- Hunger
- Paranoia
- Chaos
- Entropy
- Time
- Legos
- Momentum
- Imitation

Auston Varner

Concoctor could be suspicious, or she could just have dosed herself with a strength-boosting potion. It's kind of unclear just how many things her potions can do

Insanenoodlyguy

A basic strength enhancing potion, or an antigrav "anything covered with this weighs less for a while" sort of thing, either of those seems like something that'd be in her wheelhouse.

Shveiran

Plus, she is lifting only about two-thirds of Hakram. It would still be heavy, but not quite as much. And you can drag a lot more than you can carry, besides.

Shveiran

On a smooth, hard surface, at least.

Insanenoodlyguy

I mean, we should hope she's not dragging a freshly wounded limbless body around. Named or not, there has to be a point where infection or exsanguination kills you if your getting treated that roughly.

TeK

Demon of Lego...

beleester

"Half of them carrying Hakram." Only two people were needed to carry him, the others were just for escort. A stretcher normally has one person holding each end, so there's nothing unusual about the weight.

agumentic

I really like how EE reminded us just how utterly terrifying it is to fight demons, even when you are prepared and have both heroes and powerful Named on your side and then shows just how strong Mirror Knight with Severance is by murdering the fuck out seven of them. It is a simple narrative trick, but it was very expertly done.

308924810a

RIP Nephele

Also it occurs to me that the Mirror Knight's invulnerability to various things seems to come from his oaths, so it'd be possible to kill him by manipulating him into breaking whichever oath makes him immune to the effects of the sword.

I wonder if the Dead King will realize.

Also it might be a good idea for Cat to familiarize him with exactly what the Drow are doing for the war effort, so he doesn't sign off with that conspiracy.

Geno

Totally possible DK arranged for things at Cleves subtly. At this he really could be capable of anything

flashburn283

Well, after this not even the Pilgrim will be able to stop the bard from being declared an enemy.

Causing the deaths of several heroes then unleashing demons, I think the coalition just found it's next war, so nice of her to help out Cat, wouldn't you say?

Liliet

That last part, unironically.

Geno

So totally random thought that just came to me. Has anyone noticed how nobody mentions Killian anymore? I keep expecting some huge twist with that

Isi Arnott-Campbell

She's still around. It's been mentioned that Cat keeps pestering her to hang out with the rest of their shared social group and thus unintentionally persuading her to socially isolate because she can't heal enough to hang out again with Cat's anxious pestering. She's not being mentioned often because of this fact.

Liliet

Kilian was established at the Prologue to be at Morgentorn, where Kingfisher Prince is regularly stationed.

Geno

I've felt for a while now that The Woe need a proper 6th ranger/mysterious stranger. At first I suspected Hanno, but I'm started to feel like it might be the Bard

MatthewTheLucky

Um, Akua?

Morgenstern

Wait, wait, wait... "the last demon"...? I counted TWO after that one that should still be out. Unless the "hole" is meant to be a dead one. Then it's still one more... Or is the "hole" the still-living absence? Which is the second, though? Or did one get killed with the Maddened Keeper, not escaping the seal? Anyhow, we're missing one at least and possibly two. Oh dear...

Morgenstern

So.... he can wield the sword for much longer than just once.

But is he possessed or not?

Morgenstern

Mirror Knight > demon remains this chapter: 5
Cat & Co.: 1

We were told about 8. 5+1 does not make 8. Does someone count the three stripes of flesh as being a demon corpse? (I thought this was the flesh and bones cut from Hakram.) And the "hole" Cat can barely notice, but from which her mind is forced back seems to be the Demon of Absence, unsure if dead or alive. But that's still one missing from the "seven plus one", in my count, unless you actually count the three stripes.

Morgenstern

Eek. Finally my connection finished loading all the comments. So, some peeps, DO count the "hole" and the "three stripes" as two other demon corpses, interesting. I hope we'll get some clarification here or I might still be waiting for a reveal when this book is all done and over XD

Chapter 25: Sanitize

"Though it is not poor advice that one should imitate excellence, one who follows this advice alone can only ever aspire to be an imitation of excellence."

– Extract from the treatise "On Rule", author unknown (widely believed to be Prince Bastien of Arans)

As the radiance in his armour slowly faded, the Mirror Knight turned towards us.

With the echoes of Light that'd shone within his plate dispersing, the aura of power that'd hung around him should have gone the same way – and it did, some. Christophe of Pavanie no longer seemed like an implacable thing fashioned out silver and light: he looked human again, the raised visor of his barbute revealing dark locks pressed by sweat against his brow. Yet I could see the certainty he was moving with now, that certain something that came from being in your element and knowing it, and grew no less wary of the man. The softly whistling sword in his hand he sheathed without a word, sliding it home in a beautiful and heavy piece of iron, but even his putting away the Saint of Sword's cutting rectitude made blade was not enough to have my shoulders loosen.

Losing the unearthly touch had simply left behind a man, I thought, with dark green eyes and narrow lips. Flawed, yes, but not unpleasantly so. It made him seem more attainable, the stark opposite of the Exiled Prince's golden perfection back in the day – which had been beautiful but also somehow unnatural to the eye. This one, though, he looked cloaked in might but no less human for it. It was a dangerous thing, that mix of vulnerability and power. I should know, given how often I'd used it to bind people to me. Soldiers were willing to pay dues to a faraway idol, but real loyalty came from sharing in blood and mud. Christophe de Pavanie, to speak the words that had my fingers clenching in dismay, looked like someone people might rally around.

That was dangerous, when the man being rallied to bore both a sword forged for deicide and a child's understanding of politics.

The Mirror Knight had carved his way through seven demons and half a Court's worth of fae in a single evening, so there was no arguing that the man had the might to back anything he chose to say. Much as my mind wanted to argue that providence and another lesser hand had provided in this, that the Severance and Light made him uniquely suited to demonslaying, I knew those whispers for what they were – a tinge of fear and dismay. Behind them was the knowledge that, right now, the one trick I had that might still be able to curb him was beyond my reach: now that the emergency wards had come on, I could no longer try to gate the hero to his demise. The Saint could cut gates, I thought. So would it even be enough if I could still use them?

"Black Queen," Christophe de Pavanie greeted me. "One of them slipped by ua, a dreadfiend. Did your party catch it?"

Only then did his eyes slide away from me and onto the rest of our company, ignoring the legionaries and barely paying attention to the mages before lingering on Masego and at last offering the Blade of Mercy a slight nod. Even that was enough to have the younger man blooming in pleasure, whatever gilding having been knocked off the Mirror Knight today freshly plastered back on by this victory.

"It's been destroyed," I replied, voice even. "There were losses."

His face fell into dismay, the peace on it whisked away in a heartbeat.

"Lady Eliade?" he hoarsely asked.

"And sixteen of my soldiers," I replied, tone growing sharp.

I grieved Nephele's death, but power and a story had not somehow made her life worth more than those others.

"I did not mean to dismiss their deaths," he stiffly said.

I forced myself to breathe out. It'd been an unkind interpretation of his words, and I'd known it even as I spoke the words.

"My temper is not at its best," I replied, stopping short of an apology.

The Vagrant Spear, who I'd barely been paying attention to, began to pant noticeably as she suddenly went deathly pale. Earlier upright and dealing in Light, she now began to lean heavily against her spear – and even then she looked about to topple over.

"Sidonia," the Mirror Knight exclaimed, catching her elbow.

I stepped forward, though he had things seemingly in hand so I did not try to offer my own arm.

"Hierophant can provide healing, if you're willing," I offered as I kept limping forward.

Now that I was paying closer attention to her, the ironically eye-catching scorched eye was not the worst of what she'd gone through tonight. There were subtle tells of harsher wounds. For one the flush she'd had while fighting had not abated in the slightest since, and she was sweating badly enough it was making her face paint run. Some tells were less subtle, like blade marks including one puncture that would have gone through her lung by the angle. Nasty stuff, lung wounds, even for Named. Some slender blade had done it, but definitely a sword. The marks weren't bleeding, though, and even looked to be healed some: scabs had formed, though they looked bloody and crusty. The Concocter's work, no doubt.

"The second of the peddler's potions has run out," the Vagrant Spear admitted. "It was champion's brew, Black Queen, or close enough. There is little that the Hierophant can do. With a few days of rest, I should be on my feet again."

"Something can be done about the fever at least, surely," the Mirror Knight insisted.

"He's right," I said. "Consider it an order by an officer of the Truce and Terms. I might still have questions for you, so you can't disappear into sleep and avoid all the unpleasant work that'll come after this spectacular mess."

She let out a weak chuckle.

"As relentless a taskmistress as your reputation promised," the Vagrant Spear told me, though it almost sounded like a compliment.

Masego had come to stand by me, having already wrested away sorcery from a mage, and by the look on his face I suspected he would have healed Sidonia regardless of her answer. Zeze was not a foe to other people's pride, usually, but he did tend to draw the line at what he perceived to be willful stupidity.

"Close your eyes," Hierophant ordered, yellow light coming to wreath his fingers. "And if you feel muscles spasming, tell me immediately."

I heard him mutter champion's brew with a pronounced degree of distaste under his breath, then add something about calling poison what it was. I clenched my fingers and unclenched them, considering how I was now to deal with the Mirror Knight. From the corner of my eye I could see that the Blade of Mercy was hesitating to approach, likely afraid of interrupting a conversation between two people that were his social superiors, and in a snap decision I gestured for him to approach. It'd buy me a bit of time to think while they chatted, and I took the opportunity to send some regulars doubling back to get mages and priests here in all haste. I wanted every inch of this bloody place scoured clean until even layers of bedrock had gone.

Hells, if we could figure out a way how I was going to dump this entire section of the Arsenal out of here and then find a way to ensure not even a sliver of any kind of taint was able to crawl out of the destruction visited onto it.

I still had one loose end to clean up before I could pass supervision of this to competent officers and crash into a bed, though, and now I had to decide whether I wanted to take the Mirror Knight along with me when I saw to it. The man had no position under the Terms that'd warrant that, of course, and by treating him like he did I might be lending him that authority in fact. If I acted like he was important, a lot of people would follow suit. That was the argument against it. The opposite side of this was that the Terms were an abstract, an ideal: in practice, power mattered. The Mirror Knight had the Severance, he was nigh-unkillable and was also a rather famous Proceran hero – arguably the most famous of them all. The Kingfisher Prince had spent most the war up in Twilight's Pass, after all.

It was indisputable that Christophe de Pavanie would end up with clout, after tonight, so shouldn't I begin to bring him into the... fold, for lack of a better term, as soon as possible? Even if it happened that he was intent on being an enemy, it'd be best to find out early. It felt like a mistake, but then it'd be just as much of one to go the other way wouldn't it? The Intercessor knew her way around a scheme: her works left me only shades of loss to pick from. From the corner of my eye I noticed the conversation between the two Proceran heroes had come to an end, which meant my delaying must come to an end.

"Mirror Knight," I called out.

I gestured for him to follow me when he glanced my way, stepping away from the closest soldiers for a degree of privacy. I hid a wince when he came close, as the last glints of Light in his armour unsettled the Night within my body – like wind on the surface of a pond. I could understand now why Firstborn would find him deeply unsettling, being so much more deeply dyed in the Night than I could ever hope to be. But it was the sword that had me wariest of all. Even sheathed, I could feel its hostility. You know who I am, I thought, sneaking a look at it. And there's just enough of Laurence left in you to hold a grudge, isn't there?

"Black Queen," Christophe de Pavanie said. "You wanted to talk?"

His eyes were wary, but he did not strike me as spoiling for a fight. I supposed even his stamina must run out eventually, or at least dip downwards.

"This isn't over yet," I said.

He slowly nodded.

"Antoine says you have fingered the culprit behind all this," he said. "The Wandering Bard, yes? More fearsome an enemy than her Name would have one believe."

"The Bard can't act directly," I bluntly said. "Think of her as a devil or a fae: her weapons are deals and persuasion, not blades. And she had helpers in the Arsenal from the start."

The Mirror Knight's face went cold.

"Traitors," he spat. "That will need seeing to."

"Most are dead, outed by their actions during the crisis," I said. "But there is one still unaccounted for – the person who unleashed the Concocter's creations in the Miscellaneous Stacks, likely the same collaborator who tried to arrange for the Kingfisher Prince to fight guards."

"Then we are still in danger," the Mirror Knight said, side of the neck twitching as he forced himself not to look to the side.

Where Masego was seeing to wounded Vagrant Spear. Wasn't the danger to himself that was worrying him, evidently. I was going to have to look into that relationship, wasn't I? Gossip about Named tended to be a lot more useful than you'd think in figuring them out, at least when it was halfway credible.

"I don't believe the individual in question to be a current threat," I noted. "But neither do I believe in letting loose ends linger."

Dark green eyes narrowed.

"You've been vague on purpose about the traitor," the Mirror Knight said. "Are you afraid I'll take justice in my own hands?"

That edged on a challenge, and it had my blood quickening. My instinct was to slap him down, to set a tone for the coming days that established very clearly where we stood in the pecking order, but that was a risk. I'd be antagonizing a useful resource and, to be blunt, if the challenge turned to a fight the consequences of a defeat here would be disastrous. I must walk a fine line, remaining convivial without bending my neck – weakness would invite pursuit, not restraint.

"You barely know the third of what went on in the Arsenal this night," I flatly replied. "Justice is not something you're even remotely in a position to provide."

His lip curled in displeasure, but there was nothing there he could argue with.

"You could, however," I continued in a calm voice, "assist me in my duties under the Terms as witness for your side. Something I brought you aside to invite you to do."

"If there is still a traitor, this fight has not ended," Christophe of Pavanie insisted.

"This is not a battle, it is a disciplinary matter," I said. "If there are sentences to be doled out, then that will be done by the high officers of the Truce and Terms – and after discussion and trial, not by dragging people to the nearest hanging tree."

Too confrontational, I chided myself, but then what choice did I have? I could not let him believe, not even for a moment, that he had the right or authority to pass judgement over other Named. That'd be the end of the Truce and Terms, an implicit admission that its rules would always favour the side with the biggest stick. Without the perception of fairness, they were nothing but ink and air.

"I do not speak of summary executions, Black Queen," the Mirror Knight said, sounding appalled.

"Then we have no issue," I said. "Will you be accompanying me, or will I be reaching out to another Chosen?"

That particular trick I'd learned Akua. The false dilemma was an older lesson, but the little deceit of refraining from specifying something – which hero I would be reaching out to, in this case – while letting the wording do the thinking for the interlocutor. Chosen, I'd said, and there was only one other Proceran hero. The Mirror Knight's eyes flicked to the Blade of Mercy. Young, exhausted, more than a little shaken by his brush with a demon. And the older man would see the younger as in his charge, too, not exactly a subordinate but at least a responsibility. The question had decided its own answer.

"I accept your invitation to ser- stand as witness," the Mirror Knight said, hastily changing the sentence halfway through.

"Good," I said. "See to your affairs here, then prepare yourself to leave. We'll be going as soon as enough mages and priests have arrived to contain this properly."

The man nodded and briskly walked away. Fair enough. I checked in on Masego, to see how the healing was doing, but was shooed away. I did manage to slide in that I wanted him to lead containment and purge protocols here, which he agreed to without missing a beat. Our reinforcements were there before long, first a few careful squads of lightly armoured Dominion warriors sneaking in to have a look and then proper companies. Mages and priests aplenty, led by the Harrowed Witch and an earnest-faced man in armour who introduced himself as the Forlorn Paladin. Right, the hero with amnesia – one of Indrani's band. Much as their presence was appreciated, it was an old Lycaonese captain I left in charge, with a note that he should follow the recommendation of the specialists regarding containment to the letter.

With that left in good hands and the Mirror Knight having made his goodbyes to the Vagrant Spear and the Blade of Mercy, the two of us left. No escort came with us, though Lieutenant Inger offered, as I did not want to spook our target too soon. The downside of that was that I was left alone with Christophe de Pavanie, who for some godforsaken reason took it upon himself to attempt stilted small talk.

"I heard that you dealt handily with the undead plague in southern Hainaut," the Mirror Knight said.

I eyed him sideways, and seriously debated simply telling him he didn't have to do this. Good odds he'd taken as an insult, though, so I supposed we were fated to suffer through this.

"Would that we could have prevented that instead of suppressed it," I said, then made effort of my own. "I heard through the White Knight that you were part of the band that sunk a turtle-ship near Cleves – a well-done thing."

I bit my tongue a heartbeat later when I recalled what Hanno had told me of how that'd been achieved: throwing the man to my side through the shell, like some sort of eldritch trebuchet stone. His cheeks reddened and his hand slipped towards the Severance. Not to grasp its handle or threaten to unsheathe it, I thought, but... cautiously. Disbelievingly. As if to reassure himself it was there. Fuck, that might actually be worse. There were ways to handle a swaggering bully with a new toy, but this looked like a deeper thing.

"It was necessary work," the Mirror Knight said, tone steady. "Perhaps we might discuss where we are headed, and to meet whom?"

Yeah, I wasn't going to look that particular gift horse in the mouth.

"This is one of the paths to the Workshop," I said. "And we're headed towards the persona quarters of the Hunted Magician."

The dark-haired man jolted in surprise.

"One of the Damned?" he said. "I had thought..."

Wait, this entire time had he thought that I was trying to off one of the heroes and using him as a witness and helper? Had that been why he was so appalled when I mentioned hanging? Neither of those questions were something I could really ask outright, so I swallowed them and pressed on.

"My proof of his dealings with the Wandering Bard is weak," I said, "but I have enough that I should be able to startle more out of him. Besides, his troubles with Autumn came back to haunt all of us."

"He has given an oath to the Fair Folk?" the Mirror Knight asked.

"He never paid the debt," I corrected. "And Autumn came here in part to collect."

"Then every life taken by the fae is on his head," Christophe de Pavanie coldly said.

I shook my head.

"He didn't invite them, and as far as I know his enmity with them is older than his signing onto the Truce and Terms," I said. "Quite a few Named have old enemies that'd take a swing at them if they could, that's not a crime."

"Corpses strewn across the Arsenal speak otherwise," the Mirror Knight said.

"He was a tool in that, not the culprit," I flatly said.

That, to my surprise, actually seemed to strike a chord.

"But he is a traitor still," the Proceran hero said.

"That," I muttered, "I won't argue with."

And I suspected I already knew exactly what the Intercessor had bought his cooperation with, which while understandable did not make me want to burn him at the stake any less. When we actually got to the Workshop I had to ask for directions, since I didn't know where his quarters were, but the Arsenal was crawling with soldiers now so it was easily done. I shot a look at the Mirror Knight when we got to the door, waiting for his nod, and only then knocked. Before it opened I already knew he'd be behind it: the buzz of sorcery against my fingers, the telltale mark of something being warded up to its neck, assured me as much. He'd clearly made his rooms into a place where it would exceedingly difficult for enemies to find him.

The door was cracked open, the Hunted Magician carefully peering through. His eyes widened when he saw me, but he mastered his surprise and opened the door wide. Only then did he notice Christophe de Pavanie looming tall at my side, and the mask of affability he'd halfway put on lapsed into blankness. Whatever he'd believed me to be here for, the Mirror Knight being along did not fit with that belief. I used my staff to gently but firmly finish pushing open the door.

"Hunted Magician," I mildly said. "You know the Mirror Knight, I take it?"

"I know of him, Your Majesty," the Proceran mage said, inclining his head in a silent greeting. "What bring me the pleasure of your companies, if I might ask?"

"Not the sort of conversation to have in a hallway, yes?" I smiled.

"It would only be decent to offer seating and refreshments," the Mirror Knight pointedly said.

The look of pure genuine dislike they traded after that allowed me to take a look inside while they were both busy. Classic Alamans tastes, all cushions and painted wood with the furniture alone being worth as much as some houses back in Laure. We didn't pay the man nearly enough for that, but there was no telling what wealth he'd squirrelled away or favours he'd called in since.

"Alas, I only have one set of cups fit to witness royal lips," the Hunted Magician said. "I'm afraid you will have to some servant set I have lying around, Knight."

"Your hospitality matches your reputation," the Mirror Knight replied without missing a beat.

Point went to Christophe for that round, I decided.

"Oh, we won't be here for long," I said, still smiling. "I only mean to put some misunderstandings to rest, then we'll be off."

The Proceran villain glanced at the hero, brow quirking.

"I can just imagine," he thinly smiled, "what manner of misunderstanding you mean."

The Mirror Knight shot me a burning look, but if he hadn't wanted me to use his being an ass to my purposes then he shouldn't have been in the first place. We were invited to sit, myself on a seat like the Hunted Magician himself while Christophe was made to stay on a padded red footstool by my side.

"You are aware of the troubles that struck the Arsenal, of course?" I asked.

"Indeed," the Hunted Magician said. "I fought in defence of the Workshop, but found myself alone and so withdrew in the face of the enemy. I did return to help with healing at the Sinister Physician's infirmary when the immediate peril had passed, though I returned when I grew tired and my services superfluous."

He probably had done all those things, I mused. He seemed like the thorough type in some ways, so there'd likely be witnesses and everything. Unfortunately for him, I wasn't digging at the truth – I already had it. What I wanted from him was an admission.

"I did not see you at the Workshop when I fought there," the Mirror Knight accusingly said.

"There's more than one room in it, as it happens," the Hunted Magician drily replied.

"You're familiar with fae," I said. "What's your take on their presence here?"

"I see," he mused. "As you've grown to suspect, Your Majesty, our foe must have used my past dealings with their kind to muster them against the Arsenal – though I was not hunted for long, and so their true reason to have come here must be a deeper game."

Halfway believable, I thought, but still a little weak. He had to know that, so odds were he was counting on mere suspicion not being enough considering how useful he was to the Grand Alliance as an artificer and enchanter. In most circumstances that would have been a correct read of the situation, to his credit. These were not circumstances, and it was not just anyone he'd bargained with.

"That was also my conclusion," I mildly said. "And who would you name our foe?"

"It must be the Dead King," the Hunted Magician gravely assured me.

I drummed my fingers against the side of my staff, thoughtfully.

"Let's try this again," I said. "But with you being aware that I slit the Wandering Bard's throat after extracting every secret I could from her, including her multiple collaborators within these walls."

The man paled, grey-blue eyes dilating with fear.

"I understand that questions must be asked, Your Majesty, but I have never dealt with a foe of the Grand Alliance," he assured me, voice impressively calm.

"Liar," the Mirror Knight coldly said. "You stink of it."

"Do be silent, péquenaud," the Hunted Magician snarled. "I must protest at the presence of one of the hounds of the Heavens, Your Majesty, this is most-"

I sighed and slowly I reached for the long dragonbone pipe within my cloak. The eyes of the two of them on me as I slowly opened a packet of wakeleaf – Hanno's gift, amusingly – and stuffed it before passing my palm over the bowl and letting a flare of back flame light it. I breathed in deep, then leaned back into my seat and crossed one of my legs over the other. I breathed out the smoke slowly, letting it curl up around my face.

"Your Majesty," the Hunted Magician tried again. "If I may-"

"Who am I, Magician?" I patiently asked him.

"The Black Queen, as all know," the man replied. "I question not your authority under the Truce and Terms-"

"No," I said. "You just take me for a fool. Now that with the Bard's help you were able to have the prince holding your debt killed, you think you can wiggle your way out of this without too much trouble."

"I have never heard of this woman you accuse me of having made common cause with," the Hunted Magician said, exasperated.

"It must have seemed like a sweet bargain," I mused. "Open a few canisters of gas, weave an illusion or two, and just like that the great sword ever hanging over your head would go away forever. Hardly even a breach of the Terms, even if you got caught. There are others under this roof who have done the same or worse."

I breathed in the smoke. The Mirror Knight was watching me in silence, visibly eager to speak but forcing himself to remain silent anyway.

"I brought worthy concerns to you, Your Majesty," the man said. "Why would I do such a thing, were I a traitor?"

I breathed out the smoke, then leaned forward.

"Right now," I said, "the only thing standing between you and a tribunal of heroes, of angry Grand Alliance officers? It's my word, Magician. So I want you to take a moment to consider, really consider, exactly how much of an imposition on my patience you want to be after the night I've had."

The Hunted Magician fell silent.

"This was a bad bargain," I told him, tone cool and calculating. "I don't even need to lift a finger to destroy you, after this: all I need to do is stop extending my protection and they'll have you gagged and chained before the hour's out. And even if you escape, where do you go? We're half the continent, Magician, you'll be hunted like a criminal everywhere we rule. Even in the League we're owed favours, and if you somehow make it to Praes the best you can hope for is a gilded cage – though more likely they'll use you, then murder you so you cannot be used by another. You traded one faraway fairy prince as an enemy for the lasting anger of half fucking Calernia."

"This is coercion," the Hunted Magician tightly said. "Is that not an abuse of your authority, Black Queen?"

I spewed out a long stream of smoke.

"Authority," I repeated, amused. "Are you going to begin listening to me, then? The word goes both ways. You cannot hide under my wing and sink a knife in my flank at the same time – I am not so tolerant a soul as to allow that."

His appeal to my better nature – which had always been pragmatic enough to know when it was time to go for a walk and let the other one handle things – having failed, he turned to the other way out of this mess.

“What do you want?” the dark-haired mage asked, teeth gritted.

“I want a reason I should go through the effort to keep your head off a pike,” I said. “Because the more you keep wasting my time, Hunted Magician, the more I begin to consider how putting it there instead would solve so very many of my problems.”

The enthusiasm I’d spoken that last sentence with, I thought, was what tipped him over the edge.

“I know you can extract memories with Night,” he suddenly said. “So I can give you the Bard.”

“I have the Bard already,” I said, unimpressed. “Try harder.”

“I know how the Blessed Artificer and the Repentant Magister were tipped off to the existence of Quartered Seasons, and by whom,” the Hunted Magician said.

My pulse slowed. I wanted that. Most the traitors of this night had come from outside the Arsenal, and that meant the Intercessor was likely to still have helpers out there. A way to begin ripping out her influence root and stem was a decent prize to bargain with. Not, though, quite enough to tempt me.

“Better,” I said. “But sweeten the pot a little more.”

First he looked insulted by the cavalier treatment, then hesitant. He licked his lips.

“I know,” the Hunted Magician slowly said, “where to find the ruling crown of Autumn.”

I breathed in smoke so that a triumphant grin would not reveal the truth of my thoughts. And like that, the pieces fell together. If Hierophant could get his hands on it, Quartered Seasons became more than an idle notion.

“That will do,” I said.

The Hunted Magician’s relief was not as well-hidden as he probably believed it to be. I rose to my feet, brushing some ash off my cloak.

“Don’t try to leave the Arsenal,” I said, not bothering to add on a threat. “I’ll send for you when the situation calms, likely with the White Knight and other Alliance representatives sitting in.”

"As you say," the Hunted Magician said through gritted teeth.

I glanced at the Mirror Knight and saw the face of a man who was moments away from blurting out a great many opinions.

"Escort me back to my rooms, please," I said.

Christophe de Pavanie stiffly nodded, and even opened the door for me.

I suspected the conversation that was about to follow, though, would be a great deal less civil.

matesbe

Cat will have to move fast, lest she alienate the Mirror Knight even more. It may require being more open about just what the information he's providing will mean. Mirror Knight is a pretty black and white guy, but it might mollify him a bit to learn that this information might lead to the Dead King's defeat.

Hantag

Nah, you're not thinking like Cat. She's gonna use this moment to, as she put it, "bring him into the fold." She'll explain the politics he's been missing and help him pull his head out of his ass. He's halfway to the idea of pragmatic heroism: That good deeds and faith aren't enough, you need to be effective.

She's just been faced with a threat that could end her, armies and all. You haven't been paying attention if you don't think she's at least going to try to beat people around the head with it.

Zggt

I kinda think that this chapter reads a lot like a first date by two very clueless people who obviously think the other is their type. Cat was basically "damn that stupid, sexy, dangerous, man whose heart is in the right place" throughout the chapter, and it kinda reads that the Cristophe is mirroring (yes, yes) this attitude.

Insanenoodlyguy

Oh dear god. That's how she kills him. After all of this is done, she takes him to her bedroom. He falls head over heels for her, and thus ensures he will die before this war is over, probably saving her life, and rides the grief to kill Dead King. The perfect scheme!

Insanenoodlyguy

Meanwhile, on the other end, we discover that every time Hanno finishes drinking and leaves Cat's tent, he walks right over to Akua's. That first night she'd invited him in, he heistated, and she offered to flip a coin. At it like rabbits since.

It's the stupid ship I only just realized I wanted!

Nairne .01

This comment sub thread made me laugh so hard.

NerfContessa

Agreed.

Now. Cat, ask your important questions quickly, or. That traitor will likely be dead.

shikkarasu

I want Hannua so bad, now.

Mental Mouse

LOL!

Jack

That puts her in a love triangle with Mirror Knight's scheming royal lover, which in story terms is almost a 50/50 chance of Cat dying in some torrid and ridiculous manner.

Insanenoodlyguy

Nah. Scheming royal lover doesn't have the weight to keep the odds even.

Liliet

i'd say now's the time for Cat to teach some nuances to him lol. "A child's understanding of politics", as she said, is a bit of a problem.

Also, vote for Guide on topwebfiction!

Salt

Preach, dude. Cat needs to be the adult here and calmly help him along even if he yells and gets angry and says irritating things.

"The Mirror Knight" isn't some old zealot who's completely set in his ways. He's more or less just a kid who's had almost zero proper mentorship to moderate him. All the insecurity, angst, self doubt, and overzealousness we've seen from him so far + his POV shows that. He means well, but he's been handed way too much power for his level of experience, and his awkward flailing isn't doing him or anyone else any favours.

Cat knows this too, she monologued to herself at the start of this arc that no one had ever taken the time to set him straight. She mentioned that this is a failure on her and Hanno's part, that a Named with that much power was left to spin his wheels on his own for so long. Even the Bard mentioned it, how he's "lost and angry", how he's been "left to fester too long"

Cat had the luck to be taught from the start by one of the most patient, reasonable Villains on the continent. It wasn't even a decade ago she was a similarly naive kid strutting around with "justifications only matter to the just" as a catchphrase, trying to solve every problem by angrily hacking at it with her sword. It's about time she passed on that same kind of patient mentorship she got from Black, to another kid with massive potential and the best of intentions.

Liliet

...alas, she might have a better foundation, but she's maybe not even older than him. Is 23 plausibly "a kid"? In context, I'm going with yes =x

Sir Nil

Just realised something, Severance is the only Night artifact that wasn't one use only. SS put alot of work into that thing.

Liliet

That's because it's not exactly/entirely a Night artefact.

> The aspect that Catherine had extracted of the Saint of Swords' corpse had been a temperamental thing even before seven Named and one had lent their hand to making a proper artefact of it.

Edward Kim

Why would the Christophe be allowed to keep Severance?

Sir Nil

He may literally be the only one capable of using it. He had a whole story about losing his powers (glamour blocking) then gaining a new one (bf sword) at the darkest hour. In the eyes of the story Severance is already his.

Ninestrings

Yeah he literally Took Up The Sword, the only other way to get it narratively is probably from his cold dead hands.

Miles

That particular story is one that Cat needs to disrupt anyway. The sword in the pond and heroine's aspect mirrors the story of the lady of the lake granting King Arthur the right to rule.

Given the way Cat used a similar story to win against angels it may already be too late.

Ninestrings

Lots of stories involved taking up the sword, this story began with taking up a knife.

This is a magic sword destined to slay a Great Evil though, lots of momentum there it's gonna be hard to deflect, we even have a literal knight in shining armour.

Liliet

Why does she need to disrupt it?

Ninestrings

Because it's basically giving a ten year old a Kalashnikov and hoping he'll shoot a bad guy.

Liliet

As we see in this chapter and him keeping his mouth shut as Cat gives him a crash course in behind the scene dealings, not entirely! 😊

Dsylexic Wofl

Well, there is the fact that the Severance was Saint's aspect, and as seen in this chapter some of her conscience is still in there. This makes for a bad story to Cat, and one that she probably already realised, after all it was Bard that wanted to make the Mirror Knight to take up the Sword.

Morgenstern

Saint's aspect, made by 'seven and one' into an aspect... seven and one demons coming for it... Is the sword tainted or possessed now? Hmm...

Javvies

Even if there's no lingering demonic influence ... it's not what they were trying to create, because they weren't done working on it, and then there's the Story influence/taint that Bard has arranged for it and Mirror Knight.

I'm inclined towards there not being any demonic influence because Mirror Knight had already taken up the blade before Maddened Keeper started using demons she contained (and before the demons were loose).

medailyfun

An experienced woman is going to introduce the child to the wonderful world of people's relationships

Oshi

Creepiest thing I have read tonight but yep

Miles

Because it's a king's story and if a Named comes out of this as a ruler then that's it for the truce and terms, and for any similar arrangement they want to make.

Liliet

Ah.

No, yeah, I don't think that's a king's story, in context.

MadeThisAccountJustForYou \(@MadeThi54U\)

Doesn't necessarily kill Cat in the crib. Our Arthur still appears to need a Merlin

tithin

Who's going to take it from him?

Jworks

Why take it away from him? That blade is so far their best shot at killing the Dead King, and not only did they find someone who could wield it and not die, they found a wielder near impossible to kill.

RoflCat

Because so far he's been too much of a dense brick to read the bigger game.

On one hand, it makes him very much against the idea of betraying the Arsenal, thus the Bard never use him as one of her traitors.

On the other hand, he failed to notice he IS being used as a distraction to keep Catherine busy with the fake rumors of her trying to kill Red Axe (who as we've seen turns out to ALSO be a traitor) relying on his heroic bravado.

Though with the event of this night, he might improve a bit. Not the whole reading bigger game, but becoming self-aware about him being a dense brick and thus relies more on people who can see the bigger pictures on guidance (not direction, guidance, because his reputation also requires that he act like a Leader at times)

Rey d`Tutto

Who's gonna take it from him?

Insanenoodlyguy

At this point?

A. "Allowed" assumes there is anybody who could keep that Sword from him.

B. Worse yet, "Allowed" assumes there is anybody who could keep HIM from that Sword.

They both made the kind of choice you don't just withdraw. At this point even if he was convinced to give it up, It's certain that it will be a disaster to try to let anybody else use it, and it will find it's way back to his hands. If by no other means that one day at a moment of need it will simply be in his hand.

Best not to be part of any story that involves getting between them.

Decius

Who would take it from him?

onedollargum

I seem to remember that most people who try to wield it sustain serious cuts. Cristophe seems to be handling it okay, overeager to use it that he is.

Sprouting_Bud

Would you volunteer to take it from him?

Mental Mouse

First and foremost, who's capable of taking it away from him? Cat could try to use her authority, but she also knows the story-issues others have mentioned – basically, the Severance is part of Christophe's story now. The best she can do is to try to guide him away from Betrayer Of The Kingdom type stories and keep him pointed at the Dead King instead of being a loose cannon.

That said, having the Mirror Knight take up the Severance does seem to offer a way out of the "used macguffin" problem!

mamm0nn

Pretty much the whole drawing Excalibur from the rock thing. If you can do it, it's yours to keep. The acid water and literally burning plus killing those that try just made this one dangerous rock to pull from.

Edward Kim

A clarification point-

I guess I assumed that due to Cat's pivotal role in creating the Terms, Arsenal, extracting the aspect from Saint's cold dead body, Zeze's role (I think?) in forging that aspect into a physical manifestation, she would have more of a say/ownership over how it was used/in whose hands it would be best put.

That being said, I agree with all your points, like Severance being a part of Christophe's story now, etc.

Javvies

That's part of what makes the play around Severance a Bard win and a Cat loss – Bard got to pick the wielder of Severance who picked it up at a time, place, and manner of Bard's choosing.

As opposed to Cat having control over where Severance went when Masego and Roland (and whomever else was involved) finished working on it.

WealthyAardvark

I'm kind of surprised this hasn't been focused on in this group of replies, but when the sword was introduced in the Terms Interlude, Masego is careful to not stick fingers or clothes into the water it sits in lest that act alone cause them to get cut off. Then he think about drawing the sword:

> The odds were at least six in ten that anyone drawing the blade would die, after all.

Given that the Grand Alliance was only able to gather 27 Named for the crusade's invasion of Callow, even with the recruitment efforts when losses over the years are taken into account I doubt there's more than 50 Named on the GA's side in the war. Of those, 10 were permanently assigned to the Arsenal, and we know there's others like the Forgetful Librarian and the Beastmaster who don't serve on the front lines. And that's before the losses from the last few chapters are accounted for.

Frankly, there aren't enough Named around to even try to give Severance to someone else. How can Cat justify possibly killing off 10-25% of their remaining Named forces trying to find another wielder? No, better to shape the Mirror Knight into a proper wielder than that.

Insanenoodlyguy

Those are the odds to DRAW the blade without dying. It says nothing about USING the blade. That probably kills a good deal more.

Edward Kim

Yeah, I see your point. Thanks!

vernal.ancient

So... we still haven't seen what actually happened to Archer after she got stabbed, right?

Ninestrings

She killed the fallen monk afterwards I believe.

vernal.ancient

Ah, right. Thanks for the reminder

Frivolous

Does this mean Cat won the battle with the Intercessor? Because if she can identify the remaining undisclosed traitors, then she can cut out the infection in the Arsenal.

I think this episode advances the theory that Quartered Seasons involves giving a crown of the fae to an enemy and then using that crown against them.

I'm beginning to think Masego lost only a little when he lost his magic. Wrest seems to allow him regular access to sorcery anyway.

I wonder how much raw power in magic Zeze had, as opposed to sensitivity and control and knowledge. Was he very strong in magic, or was he only mediocre that way, with most of his prowess coming from his refinement?

Javvies

I believe Masego was significantly above average in the strength of his Gift, in addition to the sensitivities and control necessary to utilize High Arcana. Plus he would have had a magical education as good or better than Akua, starting in his early childhood, plus he got the Name of Apprentice quite young as well.

He had plenty of natural talent combined with top tier education and training, then he got a relevant Name. And while Warlock wasn't going to teach in a school ... he put at least a decade of dedicated, personalized tutoring into Masego.

Insanenoodlyguy

Like Cat, he's much weaker now, in a way that's made him far more dangerous.

Liliet

Yep, Cat won that fight! Not as thoroughly as the Intercessor would have liked her to, but the Arsenal is hers :3

WuseMajor

As Cat noted, the scheme was sufficiently thorough that Cat didn't really "win" so much as she "got to choose which way she lost." And even that was only partly.

Hakram is mostly dead, the Repentant Magister (someone who could have been the Mirror Knight's moral compass) is entirely dead, the Maddened Keeper is dead, the Mirror Knight is now probably the most powerful hero on the continent and his powers seem designed to kill Cat, the Bard did something tricky with Cordelia and the economic stability of the alliance, and all she has to show for it is that some of the Bard's traitors have been exposed and that more people aren't dead.

Well, that and she was able to prevent the Bard from leaving when the Bard wanted and the next time the Bard takes a swing at her, Cat will probably kill her permanently. Which....it's not nothing, but....

Konstantin von Karstein

What did the Bard do to Cordelia?

beleester

We don't know, but during the affrays, she put down The Empress, with The Tower on top of it, and said it represented Cordelia, on her way to the Arsenal.

Liliet

Hakram is fine, Nephele was not doing any such thing. I'm pretty sure the economic stability was not Bard,

Konstantin von Karstein

He had an above average strength and was very good at using it.

Anomandris

Now this is a conversation I so very much want to read. Friday can't come up soon enough.

Christophe seemed to come out a little better this chapter... Doesn't seem that the newfound power is going to his head yet. Also interesting that there was absolutely defending the bard or putting that issue to one side, like Pilgram usually does...

Insanenoodlyguy

I misread this before, but Christopher is becoming a leader now. This day has many people looking up to him, and now he'll play the part required. Thankfully, this seems to be the sort of personal growth story where he's actually getting smarter instead of the bruce force story where he's just kicking so much ass people shrug and get behind him. Before this night he would have already started a fight with Cat, tried to kill Hunted Magician without discussion, or both. Now some of that stuff that's never clicked for him is finally starting to. He's not going to become a diplomat, but his head might be getting more uses than headbutting things.

hakureireimu

People looking up to him isn't new. He's still very very far from leadership material.

Javvies

Well, Bard gave Hunted Magician a compelling case to do what little she asked of him.

On the other hand ... based on what we know of the Fae ... they'll presumably just respawn in a year/next autumn ... which sort of negates the point of killing the guy holding the debt if he's only temporarily dead.

The source on the leaks around Quartered Seasons is very important.

Mirror Knight is going to need to be handled carefully. And he'll probably still be a problem for some time to come, even in a best case scenario.

wikipedia

Maybe not, if there was a weapon that could permanently shut down fae. The severance would be it.

Insanenoodlyguy

Nah, we've seen earlier that Fae do not come back identical. The Prince of Falling Leaves is dead. Next time he comes back, he'll be something else. The debt to the Prince of Falling leaves is already void and the Duke of Buried Deciduous or whatever he is next will have no such claim, though likely would be happy to run into the Hunted Magician if he was foolish enough to make additional deals. Still, even when Autumn comes again, I expect even if he has the same name and title he simply won't be considered the prior creditor. .

Liliet

Larat came back identical every cycle, and Hye hunted him for his eye every time.

Now, the cycle is broken now...

Javvies

We only know that the Summer/Winter cycle has been changed. We don't know if they still respawn/reincarnate after being killed.

And we don't know what, if anything, the changes to the Summer/Winter Courts have affected with regards to the Spring/Autumn Courts and their respawn/reincarnation cycle.

Liliet

V true!

Nairne .01

The thing that keeps puzzling me is how did the Winter King come up with that scheme at all. Larat explained they don't learn like we do and they only mimic. Did he know a story like that already? Peace through marriage I mean. Or did he pick cat as a wild card and just roll the dice? She is literally a wild card so she might change things, that king of thing.

ninegardens

Preas and Callow.

The trecherous empire being folded into the lush kingdom.

Winter king copied Black Knight.

Konstantin von Karstein

I think it was that. He introduced Cat on the equation to make a change. He didn't care about what change, it's not like she could have kill him for real.

Liliet

Peace through marriage is a classic. The game-changer was the idea of peace period, and that one was aped from Amadeus's Praes/Callow fusion.

Shveiran

He didn't come back as exactly the same, though, there was a reset involved in the process: just like Ranger had to carve out the eye again every time because the loss was retconned, I believe any claim of THIS Prince of Falling Leaves died with him.

The story ends, the story starts anew. But it does so from scratch, even if it follows kind of the same patterns.

Also, I think seasons take a long time to change. We have so far seen just one seasonal change over several years, after all.

Liliet

This is probably true!

Insanenoodlyguy

We know Larat game back every time. Do we know that he was always the Prince of Nightfall? The King implied that he wasn't always the same. It may also simply be that the prince is one of the exceptions.

Javvies

As I noted earlier, the only known changes from one cycle to the next is which of the four Princes/Princesses is King/Queen for that cycle. They rotate ... but when they're not bearing the Crown, they always have the same Title.

Shveiran

Yes, but the King or Queen changes the stories going through the Courts. This was stated in Book 3.

Therefore, while it is true that Larat is likely the Prince of Nightfall 75% of the time (that is Winter/Summer time, so more like 37,5% of the time), it is at least suggested that the stories available change in each incarnation, which means he falls into one of a limited number of story groves, but not always the same.

For the purposes of our discussion, that seems like evidence that once a Prince falls, your debt to him is erased, because though a Prince will come back, it will be your Prince only in part.

Liliet

He would be King some of the time and Prince of Nightfall the rest.

Javvies

Based on what we know of the Fae, the only "changes" in the respawn/reincarnation cycles is which of the four Princes/Princesses of each Season is instead King/Queen for the current cycle ... and they remember who they are when they aren't in a cycle where they bear the Crown.

And that the Fae can and do retain what memories they form from one cycle to the next.

Remember, Larat remembered that Ranger kept going after him to put his eyeball on a ring every cycle since she first started doing that. And he held a grudge about that, but, since, y'know, Ranger, he hadn't been able to do anything about it.

Debts owed to or by mortals? They too would be significant enough to be retained from one cycle to the next ... even ignoring the magical compulsions around oaths and recognized debts inherent to Fae nature.

thearpox23

While everything you wrote makes sense, it also completely invalidates the whole Hunted Magician's scheme. And he hasn't been shown to be an idiot. Ergo, you must be missing something.

Javvies

There's no way of knowing how much Hunted Magician knows about the Fae respawn/reincarnation cycle or if/how it may have changed as a result of Summer and Winter unifying.

Or maybe Bard misled him, implying that the Summer/Winter unification permanently and completely broke the respawn/reincarnation cycle for Autumn/Spring as well, which it may or may not have – we have no idea if it did or not.

But previously, the only way to permakill a Fae was to capture them and drain out all of their energy and use it for something else.

So ... this move certainly seems like it's not as useful as it sounds like.

We obviously don't know everything, but ... we don't know how much Hunted Magician knew or thought he knew either ... or what Bard may have said or implied to him.

Frankly, I'm pretty sure this just gave us more questions.

vernal.ancient

Yes, because we all know intelligent people are entirely incapable of making faulty plans due to lack of information or simply overlooking an important detail /s

ninegardens

I wonder if Larat is holding a grudge against Hye.

... I wonder if he will be inclined to take it out on Amadeus... take something from her she can't get back....

Shveiran

Larat is now both mortal and not suicidal, so I'm pretty sure he is not planning that. Hye's whole thing is to hunt down things, and he is very aware he never could take her on, much less now.

TeK

I guess we all know where the Not-Fae has gone. Helping Malicia.

Shveiran

What? How? Why?

TeK

I mean there is only one obvious place...

Shveiran

So you reckon the obvious place for the smart individuals who no longer have any magical power or survivability that also saw first hand how terrifying Catherine can be, is to put themselves between her and another powerful, ruthless woman that has no real reason not to push them under the bus the first time it is convenient.

What would they even gain, revenge? It's possible they want it, but this is not a smart way to try to get it. This would be the desperate attempt of a consumed individual, not something done by smart individuals that want to live first and foremost.

Besides, in the grand scheme of things, I doubt they want Catherine to fail. Fey like playing with mortals, and a continent of corpses is a dull place to live in.

Dotar

The story ends with the death of the fae. Next Circle he might remember and have a grudge but the debt would be gone because in a story sense he is not the same person.

agumentic

>Debts owed to or by mortals? They too would be significant enough to be retained from one cycle to the next

They would be, if he "died" to Arcadia's changing of seasons or some other unrelated cause. However, this time that story played out – he came to collect his debt and got murdered, the end. He might revive during next cycle – we don't know how the marriage affected this – but he doesn't get to pretend that this story didn't happen.

Insanenoodlyguy

"Right now," I said, "the only thing standing between you and a tribunal of heroes, of angry Grand Alliance officers? It's a vote for Practical Guide to Evil on Topwebfiction, Magician. So I want you to take a moment to consider, really consider, exactly how much of an imposition on my patience you want to be after the night I've had."

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Miles

"Vote now," I said. "The only thing standing between apgte and ward, the current top story because it just finished? It's Worth the Candle, reader."

Oooff, being third

Darkening

Man, Worth the Candle is a good read, but it might be even more depressing than Worm, and the main character is nowhere near as likeable :(.

Shveiran

Would you recommend WtC as a read?
I tried reading it, but it really rubbed me the wrong way.
Does it get better, in your opinion?

Kytin

Depends on what aspect it was that irritated you. If it was the grimness of the setting, then yes I would say it gets better, especially as the characters get more powerful and therefore able to affect the world. It's still pretty dark stuff though.

If it was the main character being unlikable... Then yes he also gets better. In fact that seems to be the heart of the story. It's slow progress though.

TeK

So, since Ward is now basically a second worm, does it mean it is worth reading?

vernal.ancient

Pretty much comes down to how much you like sprawling stories with a heavy focus on the psychological states of the characters involved. If that's your jam, Ward will be a good read for you. If you prefer tight pacing and plotting and not so much psychoanalysis, it's definitely not going to be your thing. I've also heard that probably the most common complaint, excessively long arcs, is a lot less noticeable on a binge than when you're being drip-fed two chapters a week, so it probably will be a better read now it's finished than when it was in progress

Ninestrings

Cat just straight up bullying someone is a nice wind down after all the Demon-Stress.

Liliet

I love that she brought MK in on it. Political education!

laguz24

What I'm waiting for is when Cat has to broach the betray Sve Noc plan to him and how he will deal with that, though luckily Cordelia will deal with the noble half of the conspiracy and nothing more will come of it.

WealthyAardvark

Aw heck, I forgot about that. Yeah, that's going to be a thorny knot to untangle.

Liliet

Oh man, this was some delicious fucking food.

I hope the next chapter is going to be exactly what it says on the tin (the conversation between Cat and Christophe)

crueldwarf

>he looked human again, the raised visor of his barbute revealing dark locks pressed by sweat against his brow.

Barbutes do not actually have visors. They are classical greek-style hemets with T-shaped vision slits.

vernal.ancient

Might be confusion with a bascinet, which generally would have visors (though I just learned there were apparently open-faced bascinets as well). Bascinet fits the 'Knight' title better too, since barbutes were primarily infantry helmets

Sprouting_Bud

Barbutes can have a visor.

Wonder

I really hope Cat doesn't bend over backwards for this guy. And when at all is her name going to ripen, it's being two fucking years and still nothing.

Isn't Cat worried the Magician could be attacked in this now obviously msade pit of backstabbers?

Juff

Typo Thread:

out silver > out of silver
by ua > by us layers of bedrock > the layers of bedrock way how I > way how, I
I must walk > I had to walk learned Akua > learned from Akua godforsaken > godsforsaken he'd taken > he'd have taken it persona quarters > personal quarters and using him > while using him would exceedingly > would be exceedingly wood with > wood, with have to some (missing words) have been in > have been one in These were not circumstances > These were not most circumstances them on me > them were on me Magician, you'll > Magician; you'll half fucking > half of fucking
Most the traitors > Most of the traitors

Gabe

This seems like the beginning of a great romance.

Mental Mouse

Copying my comment from Discord:

> Frankly, I think if Cat can handle it, this might actually be the opportunity to "save" Christophe. He's taken up a sword... but in the same act, he's taken up a torch. Saint's beat was cleaning up the disasters from when other people's stories went really bad, and slaying 8+1 demons is a decent start. And taking up a sword is a classic rite of passage – it may be that with her sword, MK will also gain some maturity. He's surely gained more of a sense of identity!

Wonder

We have discord ? Send me a link , will ya?

Mental Mouse

I think this should work: <https://discord.gg/cwX7GwF>

mamm0nn

And now next chapter, we hopefully getting Cat telling MK that he needs to stop sleeping with that backstabbing Proceran Princess, that yes she knows of it (wonder how she'll do that without... issues?) and that the drow are carrying much more of the war's weight than MK thinks.

Shveiran

Regarding Hakram, is no one else worried about the fact that he is going to get prosthetics?

Warlock has always said that the danger of arcane replacements is that a necromancer can usurp them or turn them off, and they are going against the Dead King...

Morgenstern

After Severance/Severity cut him up good this time, I would be highly disappointed should he get ANY prosthetics at all and not just be left a suffering mess (bodily), if still usable when it comes to his super-mind.

Rey d`Tutto

Necro-Hakram? I guess MechaHakram is Out of Genere. 😞

vernal.ancient

Depends how many red letters they're willing to get

Daniel E

I wonder if there is any manner of 'Pattern of Three' that would lead to a Hero's demise, much like how Pilgrim tried to push a Redemption story on Cat. MK's relative ignorance of story, politics, and leadership could give Cat an opening to put him down.

Ninestrings

Needs to be a tragedy, last stand against an overwhelming foe, having sex with your liege lords wife, being granted absolute power and slowing becoming the thing you hated...

Tragic romance is generally a good bet for hero death though.

ChillyPepper

Was Archer caught in a demon's wake?

Daniel E

Not that we know of. All the Demons were in the hallway & room containing Severance. After the fighting near Masego's room, Archer was 'outside', looking for him in the courtyard.

ChillyPepper

My memory seems to be extremely on the fritz, I remember her heading towards Hakram as reinforcements.

Morgenstern

She was looking for Masego, thinking the enemies were coming for him, as one of the goals (mastermind of Quartered Seasons, which would die with him).

She did send the Concocter to help Hakram, after getting tangled with the Monk who tried to assassinate her, after having failed doing the same to Cat.

laguz24

I just realized something, Assassin is an Expy of agent 47. Has the power of disguises, check. Kills people in hilarious accidents or over the top methods, check. Had to kill all the other people at his school to claim his name, check. Regarded as a boogymen by everyone else, double-check. Also, we don't know his name either.

Shveiran

So, since I started another re-read (yes, yes, sue me already) I stumbled on this little pearl.
This is from Chapter 5, Book I.

"Doing nothing is worse than being Evil," I told her, striding forward. "Getting people killed because you won't compromise is worse than being Evil. I'm going to change things – maybe not all of them, but enough. And if that means getting my hands dirty, I can live with that. I don't have to be a good person to make a better world."

This was Catherine's creed 5 chapters in, and blimey, it still applies today almost to a word.

This is some consistent writing ... her motivation has not shifted one inch, she has simply been learning what those words meant. We say she has grown, but she actually has the way a person does: learning how to live by her ideals in the real world without losing them, smoothing the edges she can do without so that she won't cut underserving people and keep her blade sharp for when it counts.

Good Lord is this character consistent.

My sincere compliments, EE, once again. This is a truly magnificent work.

Mental Mouse

As I've said before, Cat @15 would be astonished by later developments, but she'd totally recognize and appreciate who she's become.

Chapter 26: Palaver

"Hold not even the least of the laws of men in contempt, for where their like is absent rule only the laws of beasts."

– Isocrates the Harsh, Atalante preacher

I'd learned over the years that there were a lot of unspoken rules in Alamans culture.

Many them seemed about social status at first glance, in a way that made every mudfoot Callowan hackle in my body rise, but I'd eventually been forced to admit it was a little more nuanced than that. The Alamans were the most populous of the three Proceran peoples – Vivienne believed that there might be as many as three times more of them than Lycaonese – and I suspected a lot of their culture had been shaped of need to keep that massive amount of people at least halfway orderly. The Ebb and Flow might be a vicious wastrel thing by anyone's standards but the Wasteland's, but not every custom should be painted with the same brush. As an example; the typical Alamans reluctance to ever contradict a social superior in public wasn't from their ways being more set in stone when it came to the aristocracy, but arguably from the opposite.

Proceran royalty worried a lot more about public opinion than I'd ever believed such a rapacious lot would, because to them it could be a lethal thing. The Alamans understanding of authority was fundamentally rooted in a ruler having the graces of the Heavens of the people, so losing either tended to have an ambitious sibling or cousin remove you for the good of the family – when it wasn't done by another noble family entirely, one which had recently proven competent and popular. That sort of thing was exceedingly rare, in Callow. Back home when rule of holdings passed to another house it was usually because the last one had died to battle or Praesi madness, or the sparse cases where the Albans and Fairfaxes had stripped a house of its titles for some manner of treason. And that last one was damned rare, since some houses had flown the rebel banner and even fought battles against the Fairfaxes while still retaining their titles after their loss.

I'd found it fascinating that while back home it was broadly assumed that Proceran peasants were starvelings constantly robbed by their princes, the common folk of Procer in truth had their rights guaranteed by law: a set of rights known as 'Salienta's Graces', which royals naturally tried to squeeze around but were very leery of outright breaking. The sole lawful check on noble abuses, in Callow, was the crown being petitioned for intervention. Sure, it was an open secret that if some baron began to trouble their people too much they were likely to one day not return from a hunt or mysteriously choke on their supper, but if violence was the only way to end a crime then there was a weakness in the law. It'd been humbling to realize some of the last remaining Callowan nobles might get outright rebellious if I tried to cram down their throats the legal rights for the commons that Proceran folk took for granted.

Not because they intended to abuse their subjects, no, but simply because the crown would be weakening their authority. Right or wrong didn't enter the equation, just the balance of power, and that was a hard thing to swallow even for me – whose opinion of Callowan nobles had long been, one might say, uncharitable. It'd also made me reconsider a lot of the conversations I'd had with Cordelia Hasenbach over the years, approaching them with fresh eyes. Her threshold for losing power in Procer had never been outright rebellion, as it could be argued to be for me, but simply growing unpopular enough that there would not be much trouble if someone of good reputation toppled her through the Highest Assembly. Hells, hadn't people tried to overthrow her with only middling backing just because it seemed like her decisions were getting unpopular? A lot of what had seemed to be hemming and hawing for its own sake back then could now be understood differently, if not necessarily be more forgivable for it.

It'd been almost as fascinating to me that lowborn Procerans tended to cling to those unspoken rules even more tightly than the nobles, as if deviating from them would be taint on their character. Christophe of Pavanie was, from what little the Jacks had been able to dig up on him – genuinely obscure origins had, there, been an even finer shield than an empire's worth of spies – of middling but not outright lowborn birth. His family would have been from the equivalent of a town's elders, in Callowan terms, but not necessarily influential or all that wealthy. Comfortable enough to ensure he'd be able to read and write, though, and evidently have some tutoring in the etiquette of the well-bred. Which was why the Mirror Knight had not spoken a single word about the conversation I'd had with the Hunted Magician, even though he was very clearly itching to.

I was a queen, you see, and a duly recognized high officer of the Grand Alliance. If I wasn't going around breaking the Truce and Terms myself, making myself into an outlaw and so throwing away all privileges, he might hate it to the bone but he'd not deny that I was his social superior. Mind you, that would only hold so long as we were out in public. And considering we'd long left behind the Workshop and entered the Alcazar, the thin barrier that'd ensured his sullen silence as we walked was soon to be stripped away. My first instinct had been to bring him to the small room where I'd received him earlier, but since it was currently filled with a mess of cards and the Wandering Bard's latest corpse I'd naturally reconsidered. There was a small private parlour in my quarters here where we ought to be able to talk, though, and it'd do just fine.

The protective working of Night I'd laid on my door had dispersed when I'd been stabbed by the Fallen Monk earlier, so all it took to open my rooms was the use of a key. I gestured for the Mirror Knight to follow me in then closed the door behind us.

"Do you drink?" I asked, unclasping my cloak.

The man looked taken aback by the question, standing awkwardly in his full plate as I tossed the Mantle of Woe atop a dresser. I could hardly mock him for that, since if I'd been wearing proper armour instead of ceremonial dress I wouldn't have gotten stabbed in the neck by the Monk. Black's insistence on wearing plate seemingly at all times had never seemed more justified.

"Er, yes," the Mirror Knight said. "Your Majesty."

"Good," I grunted. "Do take you helmet off, and stash that sword somewhere I don't have to watch it seethe at my continued existence. I'm not going to stab you in my own parlour, I assure you."

His eyes widened.

"I did not mean to imply faithlessness of you by keeping my arms," the man hastily assured me, sounding like he very much wanted to wince.

He left the Severance near the door, propping it up against the wall like it was some farmer's hoe instead of tool for deicide, and after looking around for somewhere to place his helm and failing he simply held it in the crook of his elbow.

Uncomfortably, one assumed. Meanwhile I unearthed what looked like some Proceran bottle of red from an overly fancy drink cabinet before liberating two crystal cups – a donation, I hoped, since the thought of Callowan coin going into paying for those had me more than a little displeased – and setting all three of those things on the table.

"That ought to do," I said, and flicked a glance at the helm. "Put that on a dresser, would you?"

Amusing as it might be to watch him try to juggle holding his war helm and drink at the same time, it'd bode ill to make sport of him before our conversation even began. I uncorked the bottle with a pop and had moved to pour when I caught sight of the appalled look on the hero's face from the corner of my eye. Ah, yes. I was of higher rank, so pouring was either a breach of etiquette or implied a nonexistent degree of intimacy between us. Smothering a sigh – it'd be hypocritical to benefit from useful Alamans ways then complain of their inconvenience in the same breath – I flipped my grip and offered the bottle to him. With surprising deftness for a man still wearing gauntlets, he poured first for me and then for himself. I nodded thanks and sat, while he followed suit in the latter a heartbeat later.

“You have questions,” I said.

Safer to frame them as that than objections. Someone confused could ask for clarifications without it being a threat, but to object implied a degree of authority I had no intention of allowing him in this conversation. The Mirror Knight’s lips thinned.

“You as good as solicited a bribe from the Hunted Magician and threatened to purposefully fail your responsibilities to him if one was not offered,” Christophe de Pavanie flatly accused. “Worse, when that bribe was offered you took it.”

I hummed.

“If I had simply asked questions of the Hunted Magician,” I said, “what would have happened?”

“He would have lied,” the Mirror Knight curtly said. “But you would not have disgraced yourself and the office you hold. He should have been imprisoned until a truthteller could be brought to the Arsenal.”

I wasn’t sure whether it was basic grounding in reality or a belief in the general perfidy of villains that had him aware that the Magician had no real reason to tell the truth if pressed, but I could work with it either way.

“Assume I had done this,” I allowed, to his visible surprise. “What would have followed?”

“A truthteller-”

“Who?” I pressed.

“The Peregrine,” he said, “or perhaps the Exalted Poet.”

“The Poet was a traitor who openly sided with the fae in battle,” I noted.

And thank you a hundred times over, Indrani, for passing that piece along. The dark-haired man’s face went slack in utter surprise. They’d fought on the same front, as I recalled. They must have known each other. I would have a lot more sympathy for his dismay if that friendship might not have led to the Bard getting her picked truthteller in a key position, had this all happened differently.

“I – are you quite certain?” the Mirror Knight croaked out.

"It has been confirmed by multiple witnesses," I said. "And that is not the heart of the issue, regardless: every single truth-teller in the Grand Alliance is a hero."

"I do not see the issue," he replied, sounding entirely honest.

Because that just wasn't how he saw the world in the end, was it? Heroes – the Chosen – were honourable and good, so even us wicked Damned must recognize these qualities and believe in their word when it was given. It was a shade of the same sentiment I'd so deeply despised in Tariq, that bedrock assumption that only the mad and the lost could ever choose anything but service to the Gods Above. It was a way to see the world that simply did not allow for disagreeing equals.

"The word of heroes isn't trusted by the Named I have in my charge," I bluntly said. "Most of them have fought Chosen at some point in their lives-"

"It is not a crime to have stopped crime," Christophe burst out.

"No, but it is ridiculous to ask villains to believe in the impartiality of heroes when they've almost certainly fought with one of their friends or companions in the past," I patiently said. "You yourself came into the Arsenal all but accusing me of plotting to murder the Red Axe-"

"For which I apologize," the Mirror Knight said through gritted teeth. "I was given reason to believe such a plot was afoot."

"And you believed it," I said.

He began to apologize again but I raised my hand to stop him.

"I'm not here to rake you over the coals for that," I said. "Mind you, I'll want to know why you came to believe that, but my point is that you did believe it. Because there is no trust between us."

I paused to let him digest that, taking up my cup at sipping at it. Some strong-flavoured red. From where in Procer I had no idea, but it was pleasant enough to drink.

"You are saying," the Mirror Knight slowly said, "that the lack of trust goes both ways."

I'd led him to that, true enough, but that he'd gotten there at all meant he was likely someone I could deal with. Not like the Saint, whose principles had cut both ways and never bent an inch even when they led her to facing death standing all alone. Ignorance I could mend, zealotry I could not.

"At best, using heroes to settle villain affairs would be seen as weakness on my part," I bluntly said. "At worse, it would be seen as collusion and plot."

"Whether that is true or not," Christophe said, "it remains that you threatened the Hunted Magian with withholding the protections he is due by law."

"Is he?" I said. "He plotted with the Wandering Bard to help an assault into the Arsenal – this is fact, not supposition, even though my proofs are limited. I would have been well within my rights to cut him loose and offer him up in chains to stand before a military tribunal."

"Then it is even worse," the Mirror Knight said, "for that was your duty, and you laid it aside for a bribe."

I rolled my eyes.

"I laid nothing aside," I said. "He'll still stand trial as he should under the Truce and Terms and I have received nothing from him save for words."

"Just because the bribe was not delivered-"

"I asked him for reasons his coming tribunal might have to refrain from a brisk hanging being the sum whole of the judgement rendered," I sharply said, growing irritated with the constant accusation of bribery. "Not for any sort of bribe."

I'd bloodied my hands enough for three villains, but the accusation that I might be corrupt was still enough to infuriate me. I was a cheat and a killer, but I was not godsdamned crook.

"You were promised a fairy crown," the Mirror Knight unflinchingly replied. "That did not escape me, Black Queen. The purported scheme that brought me here was your attempted seeking of queenship over Named, and this eager pursuit of Autumn's regalia does nothing to abate my fears."

I breathed out, gathered my calm.

"I don't care," I bluntly said.

He blinked in surprise.

"That entire project is being kept secret for a reason, and it's been approved by people a lot more important than you," I said. "If the White Knight wants to bring you into the circle of those aware of its nature I'll consider agreeing to it, since you've already stumbled onto the outskirts, but ultimately that's not my decision to make."

That was the pivot, I thought. I was asserting that I had little direct authority over him, which should please him, but it came with the added implication that he was still subordinate to Hanno. Those were the lines drawn by rules and agreement, though, not something immutable. If he decided to push anyway this was going to be trouble.

"Then there should be no trouble with the Hunted Magician being placed under guard until the White Knight can speak of this matter for the Chosen," the Mirror Knight said.

It wasn't an unreasonable thing to ask, when it came down to it, and in principle I had nothing to lose by agreeing to it. In principle. Practically speaking, I'd be admitting that Christophe de Pavanie was someone who had a right to ask things of me. If I gave in now, would it just invite him to push for more? On the other hand, digging my heels in over even the slightest bump in the road was a good way to ensure this went to the Hells in a handbasket. I'd have to take the risk, then, and maybe phrase it so that I wasn't actually making a concession.

"I'll consider him to be the subject of a complaint under the Terms, then," I said. "The Rogue Sorcerer can see to it that no unseemliness happens when he's freed from other duties."

Roland was not the most trusted of heroes, he was too close to me for that, but he wasn't outright distrusted by his fellows either. He'd serve as an acceptable compromise candidate since I sure as Hells wasn't putting the Blade of Mercy in charge of anything – much less guarding an experienced villain. I'd even managed to make this happen within the appearance of lawfulness, keeping to the Terms. But it was an illusion, I knew that all too well. Pick at the gold on any crown for long enough and you always found the steel that'd put the gilding on.

It was not a pleasant thing to be the side with the gilding instead of the steel, for once.

"That would be acceptable," the Mirror Knight said, and my fingers clenched.

I drank from my cup to hide my sudden urge to break his nose. Acceptable. Like he was doing me a favour by deigning to accept. The Magician was one of Below's, there was precisely no fucking part of this that Above's crowd had a right to dictate to me over. I breathed out, slowly, and forced calm. I glanced at the green-eyed man, finding him looking faintly embarrassed. Not because of me, I decided, I was not so easy to read these days.

"You look like you want to say something," I said.

"I yet remain in the dark about much of what went on during the attack," the Mirror Knight admitted. "And it occurs to me I am unlikely to find anyone more apt to tell the tale."

I hummed. After that little sentence I was less than inclined to indulge him in anything, but that he was asking at all implied a degree of trust in my word: there was no point in asking an explanation from someone you believed a liar. That belief was worth encouraging, I decided after a moment.

"To my understanding, the Wandering Bard's plot began with the Wicked Enchanter and the Red Axe," I said.

"Someone passed as the latter in Revenant form, when attacking the Stacks," Christophe said.

I watched his eyes tighten, his fingers clench, and remembered the few barbs I'd thrown his way when disguised as the Wicked Enchanter's corpse. Evidently, they'd stung deeper than I'd believed they would. I could confess to that deception, with or without revealing Indrani had been my companion, but to be frank I saw no real need to. There'd been enough chaos going around the Arsenal that it should comfortably remain a mystery, and even if it were suddenly revealed down the line by a twist of circumstance there was nothing all that damaging to reveal in the first place. Arson and skirmishing were not laudable behaviour, but given the circumstances I doubted my word would be gainsaid if I stated it'd been necessary.

"So I've heard," I said. "The object of the plot was to arrange a deep enmity between a heroine and villain, then ensure that they met where many other Named could see the violence that'd ensue."

"An attack on the Truce and Terms," the Mirror Knight nodded. "Clever, given that Damned were certain to ask for her head no matter how justified her actions were."

I wasn't going to touch that, considering how ambivalent I was feeling at having to pass down sanctions on behalf of an animal like the Wicked Enchanter. Safer to move on, I decided.

"From there, the Arsenal would become a dry bale of hay awaiting a match," I said. "The Blessed Artificer and the Repentant Magister were made privy to incomplete but dangerous information about a restricted project, while you and your fellows were summoned to fight a false plot that would still have been weeks away from existing at all when word was sent."

There I paused in significant silence, inviting him to elaborate on that. Just because I was sharing information didn't mean I wasn't going to try to learn any. The Mirror Knight frowned.

"It was a letter," he admitted. "From one of my friends within these walls, though when I arrived and sought her out she told me she had sent no such thing."

"And that friend's name?" I asked.

"You would know her as the Bitter Blacksmith," he said. "She passed through Cleves on her way to the Arsenal, and the friendship we struck then remains."

His friend had been sleeping with the Hunted Magician for some time, I immediately thought, which meant he might have been the one to send that false letter using his access to her quarters. Although that hardly fit when I considered it more deeply: the Magician's relationship with the Intercessor had been transactional, and he was unlikely to have taken a risk like leaving a parchment trail on her behalf. Especially not a letter coming out of the Arsenal, where everything is read through before it's allowed to leave. No, most likely he or another of the Bard's helpers had gotten their hands on some writing of the Bitter Blacksmith's before passing it on. Another traitor would have then forged the letter outside the Arsenal and sent it to the Mirror Knight. Considering that the Concocter had ties with the smuggling ring of this place and bargained with the Bard as well, she seemed a more likely suspect there.

I'd still ask the Grey Pilgrim to confirm the Bitter Blacksmith's words if he could, just in case.

"A forgery," I said. "One that ensured you would come here and act aggressively."

His face soured but he did not argue with my words.

"I suspect we were meant to be at each other's throats," I said, delicately skipping over the part where we actually had been. "So that when the Court of Autumn struck we would be divided and unready."

Back in the Stacks, the Mirror Knight had varied wildly between tales when addressing my impersonation of a Revenant. I'd dismissed that as stupidity, back then, but in retrospect a more charitable interpretation might have been that he'd been utterly confused as to why he was there at all. It wasn't anyone's natural leaning, not even mine, to begin by entertaining the notion that you'd been brought in because you were bound to fuck things up somehow. It made sense he would have been grasping at straw instead, desperately trying to figure what was going on around him. Yet the Intercessor had known exactly what she was doing, on the other hand: he'd been picked as much for his... inflexibility as for his potential to take up the Severance. A danger in both the short term and the long one. Gods but I hated fighting the Bard. Even when you won you lost.

At least we'd made it through better than she must have anticipated, my little trick of going directly to the Doddering Sage forcing her to use the Hunted Magician early – which ultimately came back to bite her, since it was one of the things that allowed me to figure out he'd been working with her – and the stroke of inspiration that was sending in Adjutant leading the Mirror Knight straight to my door later, no longer seeing me as an immediate foe. The memory of Hakram's body on that stretcher came back and I gritted my teeth. Inspiration had its costs. Yet when the fae had hit the Arsenal, they'd not fallen upon a pack of twitchy Named ready to blame each other but instead faced a few separate bands of five hunting down the Bard's schemes. What should have been a hard blow instead became a distraction, which I was honestly rather pleased about. If it'd really gone to shit in the Arsenal, the fae likely would have been able to make straight runs for the sword and Quartered Seasons and broken both.

"The fae went for both the Severance and the Hierophant's research, both of which represent a potential way of killing the Dead King," I said.

"But why?" the Mirror Knight quietly asked. "Why would anyone, even one of the Damned, try to doom Calernia to an eternity of undeath?"

"The Bard's been pulling strings for a long time, using a lot of different faces," I said. "She led the First Prince by the nose towards the creation of a weapon that might kill the Hidden Horror as well – the corpse of an angel of Judgement – but it has since been gleaned that the use of the weapon might have catastrophic consequences for all of Calernia. The idea of using it was laid aside, for now, but if Cordelia Hasenbach is stripped of every other option and annihilation comes to call..."

"Then the First Prince will do as she must, and sacrifice many to save the rest," the Mirror Knight said, sounding admiring. "How like the Damned, to attempt to make use of virtue as a flaw."

I didn't mention that, according to the Dead King's parting words in Salia, when the Painted Knife arrived we'd be learning the exact magnitude of the mess that would have ensued from Cordelia pulling that trigger. I suspected it was... not negligible, which might go some way in explaining why the Intercessor had struck now of all times. With her secrets about to come out, she urgently needed to cut down on the Grand Alliance's options or there would be absolutely no reason for the First Prince to even consider using the Bard's preferred path. It also explained why this had been rather open engagement, by the Intercessor's standards: if that secret being revealed would burn all the bridges that were currently aflame, she was not losing much in a longer sense. And while trying to shape my Name might have been one of her reasons for coming out, I very much doubted it was the only one: it wasn't the Intercessor's way to get only one bird per stone.

"We fought better than the Bard expected," I said, which was not exactly true but not exactly false, "so she had to tip her hand further. Her traitors within the Arsenal took action – the Hunted Magician, the Exalted Poet, the Maddened Keeper–"

Christophe's brow rose.

"Was this Maddened Keeper the one responsible for the demons?" he asked. "I did strike down a woman, after taking up the sword."

"That was most likely her," I said. "Information is sparse about how she got here or why she did anything, since there's nothing quite like a demon of Absence to obscure your trail."

"How grotesque," the Mirror Knight said, disgusted.

I wouldn't disagree, there. There wasn't really much of anything that could ever justify use of demons.

"The Fallen Monk and the Rex Axe are the last two known collaborators," I continued. "The former attempted to kill me and then the Hierophant, while the latter tried to assassinate the Kingfisher Prince after I sent him to ensure her safety."

The man started in surprise.

"You tried to ensure the protection of the Red Axe?" he said.

"She's a prisoner," I flatly said. "And therefore in our care until she has stood trial. Prince Frederic struck me as the man to see to her safety and I was not wrong in my judgement, though that task ended poorly for him."

"Antoine tells me he was wounded," the Mirror Knight tried.

"He'll live," I said. "I'd be surprised if it doesn't leave a scar on his neck, but he'll still be ridiculously pretty even with it."

The green-eyed man snorted, though he then tried to disguise it as a cough.

"It is an act of gallantry for a man to receive a scar in the defence of a woman, even if it is in the defence of herself," Christophe de Pavanie said. "I'm sure he will wear it as the badge of pride it is."

I had my doubts any sort of a prince would take to a murder attempt so lightly, but you never knew with Procerans. Not that it'd mean a thing, anyway. Whether or not the Kingfisher Prince complained under the Terms, such an egregious and open breach of them would have to be addressed. Not that we could hang her twice, anyway, though some of the Named in my charge were bound to argue for me to at least try.

"Might be," I said, noncommittal, and sipped from my glass.

The dark-haired man half-smiled and reached for his cup, until now left untouched, fingers closing around the gilded crystal rim before he froze. Slowly he looked up at me, dark green eyes narrowed.

"We wouldn't have had this conversation," the Mirror Knight quietly said, "if I'd not taken up the sword, would we?"

I hesitated for just the fraction of a moment and my mind whispered mistake as Christophe de Pavanie's face closed down. He rose to his feet, curtly bowing.

"If I might take my leave, Black Queen?" he said. "If there any need for further discussion, we can speak again after the Red Axe is released."

Wait, what? From what part of this conversation had he gotten that?

"And what do you mean by that, exactly?" I mildly asked.

"That once the White Knight comes, it must be recognized that like myself and other Chosen she was made a tool to the Wandering Bard's schemes," the Mirror Knight. "The only righteous outcome is to pardon her for her actions."

"That is not my understanding of the situation," I coldly said. "And neither do I believe it will be the White Knight's."

Christophe de Pavanie, risen to his full height, stared down at me with green eyes.

"I pray you are wrong," he said, "else I will be forced to ask a question I would rather not."

"And what would that be?" I replied, thinly smiling.

"What is the Sword of Judgement, without Judgement?" the Mirror Knight asked.

Just a sword, he didn't say, but I heard it anyway as he left with the Severance and I didn't stop him.

Just a sword, and he had one of those too.

ruduen

I'll keep it simple: Go vote!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>
Javvies

...
That ... ended badly. Not as badly as it could have, of course, but badly nonetheless.

And after such a promising (relatively speaking) start.

Red Axe isn't going to get to walk away from what she did.

Mirror Knight is still dancing to Bard's strings. That's unfortunate.

Mirror Knight is going to ask Hanno to invoke Judgment/flip the Coin on Red Axe, isn't he?
That's not going to go well.

Anomandris

Would the flip still be working with Hierarch's blockade of Judgement?

agumentic

We already seen that it does not.

JJR

He still has the coin and showed Cat in an earlier chapter (can't remember which one though). And he can flip the coin just fine now, it's just that it is a completely ordinary coin.

Frivolous

The Mirror Knight, I think, is not so invulnerable a target than Cat believes.

His main weakness, in D&D parlance, is that he tends to fail Will saves. As revealed in the earlier update, he has, through the loss of his virginity, become vulnerable to glamour and other illusions.

Therefore he can be made to destroy himself.

The main problem with that path is that he is still needed to wield the Severance and kill the DK. If not for that, the Mirror Knight could be disposed of by now.

Ninestrings

I'd argue his main weakness in dumping Wisdom is not his low will saves, but that he has no defence against a decent bluff check.

Liliet

...and Bluff checks only work if you are lying.

Cat decided not to, this chapter, and wouldn't you look at the backfire lmao

ThatOneGuy

I would say Will because he is a low born noble feed upon stories of the righteous slaying the evil villain who dare decide the righteous. He now has a magical sword making him think he is righteous and that his word is the word of above.

who cares if the "hero" broke the treaty twice because she is a hero? They should kill the villain because he broke the treaty.

He should be in charge because he has the magic sword while the white knight lost his angels. For this hero of low birth is on ascendant... And it shall not step until he is the one to save everyone that "matters" in these lands.

nothing is more dangerous than the self-righteous.

Liliet

"who cares if the "hero" broke the treaty twice because she is a hero? They should kill the villain because he broke the treaty. "

Note that at no point did he argue for both of these.

Zggt

I think that Cat decided not to hold up a mirror to him. It wouldn't end well. The truth is this: when villains betray us to Malicia, will you allow them to get away with 'they were tricked' and leave it at that, no matter how many dead, no matter that it leaves a weapon capable the slaying of the Dead King solely in the hands of an uncompromising villain with a history of influence from said party, say, a Knight? That's a good way to get dead fast. Let him fume, relax, think it through, and when there's no chance of stabbing, then slap him down for being a petulant child with his "when we do it then it's fine" attitude. Basically, she needs to treat him like an eight year old that's running around with a lightsaber until he stops behaving like one.

Shveiran

The problem is eight years old usually trust adults to know better and can be put in detention if they act unreasonably.

If she tried telling him the "what about tricked villains" line, I personally believe he would have balked.

"That is completely different" Cristophe would say "for Villains are Evil, and therefore betrayal is naught but the proof that they cannot be trusted."

Liliet

"Well yes, that's why Hunted Magician isn't walking dead, isn't it?" I believe Christophe would say.

Don't forget Cat talked him into no longer disputing she was within her rights to act as she did with Hunted.

Liliet

Alas)=

shikkarasu

Common misunderstanding, and why he skill was renamed to deception. Cat may not have outright lied, but she let Christophe believe lies he was inclined to. That part worked just fine, ironically. He still believes that she had nothing to do with the 'revenant' or the fire, for instance.

You can Deceive in many ways, and Mirror knight can only trust blindly in what he already 'knows'. What kills me, kills me, is that Cat just showed multiple times that she is willing to do whatever she must for the sake of the continent, but MK somehow came to the conclusion that she would have killed him if he hadn't picked up the sword.

....Also yes I did catch the OotS reference. Well played.

ayon96

MK doesn't think Cat would've killed her. He thinks she is trying to bring him into fold cause he has the sword and that makes him powerful. he might be right implied by Cat's hesitation.

Morgenstern

Basically, he seems annoyed that, AGAIN, someone only seems to see him in terms of his worth as a TOOL. While he is SO very clearly rooting to finally find a mentor/friend that is willing to see HIM and teach/love/like him for HIS sake, not his power's sake.

... Whatever happened to the power of friendship, Cat? Are your powers of bringing in people out of the wilds failing? Does it only work on villains because you can't see past your own blinders whenever it comes to heroes? (For reference, see how she treats every misspoke word of his in this chapter, even though he clearly does seem embarrassed (about her obviously disliking what he said).)

Did Akua steal that? 😊

... so... time for Akua to step in? =P

shikkarasu

I read this as "Oh, you are going to kill the Red Axe because she's a problem. If I wasn't necessary for the war -if I wasn't holding Severity- you would kill me as well, wouldn't you? Well in that case I'll make you spare her, just like you are sparing me."

He's trying to do something noble, using his privilege to help the less fortunate by calling upon the parallels between himself and RA. Cat can't kill RA for a crime that MK also committed; not without losing the Sword. Classic Hero move and 9/10 times it's the Right Thing to Do....

if you don't have a child's grasp of politics and a continent wide treaty on the line. I just wish he would wake up and treat with Cat instead of lob accusations and slap down ultimatums.

Liliet

...I think that's far too uncharitable a reading, considering the circumstances.

Liliet

-bows-

> MK somehow came to the conclusion that she would have killed him if he hadn't picked up the sword.

No, he came to the conclusion that she wouldn't have cared to speak to him / listen to him if he didn't have the sword, because then he wouldn't be important and his opinions would then be disregarded.

TeK

Wisdom is a dumpstat though.

Salt

It went about as well as could be expected I think. Like Cat was saying at the start, it's not much of a secret that there isn't much trust in each other. Low chances she could make him change his spots with one conversation over wine.

For now he's been made aware enough to not do anything rash and stupid before WK shows up, at which point he is officially Someone Else's Problem. There is some trust between him and Hanno by sheer virtue of both being Heroes, so it's really up to Hanno to pull his weight and bring the kid around.

If that doesn't entirely take, the Pilgrim could chip in as well. He tends to make a strong case for being practical even if it isn't necessarily Just, what with him being the spokesperson for Mercy and whatnot. MK is probably never going to call Catherine "dearest", but it's still very possible to turn him into a reasonable actor.

moongazer13

So the problem here is that MK is in direct opposition to doing anything besides letting the Red Ax go, and will strongly oppose anyone trying to stop him on that, especially since he now has enough power to back up his wishes. So lets say WK tries to convince MK to back down; as MK said himself, he will probably challenge WK for leadership of the chosen, or at least to have his will enforced in this particular regard. And considering both his newfound power from the sword and inflexibility on what he believes is right, he could probably get a decent other number of Heroes to side with him.

As for the Pilgrim dealing with MK, the problem there is that, in MKs eyes and the eyes of multiple other heroes, he has lost a lot of influence after he made a deal with Cat. She said as much herself. So i don't think the MK would be inclined to listen to him at all.

Worst case scenario, you have the heroes splitting into two different groups. One, lead by the MK that wants the Red Ax being given amnesty on the grounds that she was manipulated, and one that sides with the Villians and argues for her punishment on the grounds that she is A. a traitor and B. tried to kill the Kingfisher Prince, a fucking Proceran Noble and Hero in his own right.

Which still creates fractures within the Truce and Terms, as you now have a potentially sizeable and powerful segment of Heroes unwilling to follow the rules. Plus Cat's potential failure to have the Red Axe killed will make her seem weak to the Villians, especially if the Hunted Magician ends up getting punished/hanged for his crimes. He's the only other traitor left alive that we know of.

Cat's problem is still the double standards: if the Red Axe was a villain, the MK would be happy to see her hanged. And while yes her backstory is tragic, so is literally almost everyone's. Her origins would allow a light sentence for her killing of the Wicked Enchanter, especially given everything else that has happened recently and how the entire situation was manipulated by the WB, but she had no personal reason whatsoever to try to kill the Kingfisher Prince. She can't be manipulated by illusions per her own powers, so its obvious she tried to kill him under her own free will and should be punished as such. But since shes a Hero, it is all fine. Again.

Salt

It definitely won't go without a problem or ten, but I have to highly doubt whether he'll go so far as to take action that fractures the Truce and Terms.

He's repeatedly shown that although he can be stubborn and abrasive, he genuinely understands the need to band together against ol Nessie here, and has shown a pretty straightforward disgust toward any traitors – heroic or villainous.

Yes, at the end of the day he, like every Named, has a vision of what the world should be like. But it's been made clear that one of his lines in the sand includes a world where they lose to the Dead King.

Christophe is many things – naive, sure. Stubborn, yes. Abrasive, beyond a doubt. But a willing traitor he is not. As long as he's made to understand the consequences that some of his actions could have, he'll toe the line.

At the end of the day he is someone that genuinely is trying his best to do "Good" – however nebulous a concept that might be in his emotional young head right now – not just someone trying to win at any cost.

Morgenstern

You know, I DO keep wondering who created those illusions... and if the recent "Red Axe" is not an ILLUSION of the Red Axe that has already been replaced before the Kingfisher got to her... or at least somewhere down the line, hidden by illusions.

Many seem to be pointing to Inger..? I was actually wondering if the "Red Axe" in this scene were the one casting the illusion(s), after she tried to kill the Kingfisher Prince.

Liliet

I think it's been good as confirmed that the illusion caster was Hunted.

moongazer13

I don't think MK is going to ask Hanno to flip the coin at all, he's just going to outright say that Hanno no longer has the power of judgement, so why should he be in charge of the Heroes? MK now has the power and prestige to back up whatever he wants, and considering that his mentality is pretty much "anything Heroes do is forgivable, Villians are all evil and should never be trusted" he will probably find a fair amount of support amongst the Heroes, especially those that don't like working with Villians under the T & T.

So we're going to see the Heroes fighting amongst themselves, with accusations of influence from the Villians coming strongly from the MK. He still seems very convinced that Cat is planning to take control of everything and thinks that the WK is not strong enough to oppose her, so naturally its his job now that he has the Severance.

Sidenote, i wonder what they did with that one titled fey they captured and interrogated. If he is the same as the one that Cat/Hierophant killed back in the lands of summer, i can't imagine Cat is going to be happy to see him.

Morgenstern

To be fair, he isn't per se shown to believe that anything and everything Heroes do is forgivable (that's just CAT'S mistaken blinders-on INTERPRETATION) – he simply is still so naive, he cannot quite believe that a Hero would DO that of their free will (and NOT "fall" and become a Villain, as he obviously now thinks the Wandering Bard has...) and assumes they just "have to" have gotten manipulated and wouldn't WANT (to do) that, if only they KNEW. He is the "lost kid", wandering around cluelessly.

hakureireimu

"To my understanding, the Wandering Bard's plot began with the Wicked Enchanter and the Red Axe," I said.

should be former right?

Liliet

Or in a different order in the previous sentence XD

Ninestrings

He's getting there!

He's so close!

Ooooh drops the ball with just a couple yards to go.

I've said it before but gosh that boy is dense as can be.

RoflCat

If I may use an old joke:

He's the Mirror Knight.

Self-reflection just isn't his thing.

oaclo

Say, does that old rule about relying regularly on magical weaponry ensuring its eventual failure apply to heroes too? If so, the Severance may have been ultimately crippled by him taking it up so early.

The Bard may have been willing to compromise on setting up a story where it fails in the end against the Dead King.

Although I'm not sure whether it being made from an Aspect would make it more or less susceptible to that kind of story-based weakness.

Salt

I would guess the opposite in this case. The sword isn't so much magic as it is the distilled essence of one of the incorruptible, most unflinchingly pure Heroes that ever lived. Say what you will about the Saint, the only answer she would've given to the Hidden Horror attempting to corrupt her would be to immediately chop him in half.

We also know that she was potent enough to cut through nearly anything that exists. People, sorcery, domains, creation, mantles of power, common sense, you name it. A favorite trick of hers was to cut the sky and use the wound in Creation as a foothold, Masego complained about her cutting a door in a spell that could contain demons, and Catherine was at one point seriously worried that she had the ability to cut the future, whatever the hell that would've entailed.

All in all, the story behind the sword means it leans heavily into the old "Above always wins" axiom, and likely the only real way to deal with it is to work around it in true "but Below always gets their due" fashion.

I'd personally bet that the Bard was yet again trying to kill an entire flock of birds with one stone, by shaping a weapon that could hurt both Catherine or the Dead king. If Christophe turns on Cat, great. If not, he was still a decent distraction. Regardless, he's still going to be a pain for ol' Nessie, as the Mirror Knight has an even bigger hate-boner for the Dead King than he does for the Black Queen. Even after the war is over, you've still got a raid-boss in Christophe, who is the most traditional Proceran hero to ever Proceran.

There's a damned good reason that Catherine considers the Bard to be the final boss to end all final bosses.

Salt

Although, I didn't think of this at the time, but separating him from the sword might actually be feasible. There are variations of that trope you mentioned, where said character simply loses the tool itself, even if the tool is still perfectly fine.

The sword is immune to pretty much everything, as well as the Mirror Knight as a Name in itself, but Christophe de Pavanie as a person is full of holes. What would have happened if a stealthy traitor – like the Fallen Monk – had been around when Christophe casually left the Severance lying unattended in a corner of Catherine's room? If the Thief of Stars could steal Catherine's staff in a moment of distraction, Christophe is likely not immune either.

Anomandris

Ah, and it was going so well too...

A more naive version of the Saint with potentially more power ain't gonna be fun to deal with.

TeK

Oh come on Christie, you were so close!

dadycoool

Uh oh. I don't know what the danger is, but something just went very wrong. I wonder how he came to that conclusion.

Ninestrings

It's quite simple actually.

He's an idiot. A well meaning, colossal moron.

erebus42

Don't forget prone to potentially catastrophe-inducing dichotomous thinking.

Salt

Maybe seeing some of the Heroes argue amongst each other might help him there a bit. Judging by how he seemed repeatedly surprised at Catherine not being a pants-on-head-comically-evil tyrant, he seems to have a child's understanding of Good-aligned morality, not just politics.

If he was surprised that Catherine tried to protect the Red Axe – you know, to not sabotage her own life's work and stuff – it's going to blow his mind when he realizes that Mercy and Judgement would give wildly differing verdicts in a lot of situations.

Rey d`Tutto

It's more surprising when they agree on something.

...

Especially when it's Catherine.

TeK

Basically, HM is getting away with a bribe, why should a Hero be punished?

Konstantin von Karstein

The HM is not getting away, he offers something that can diminish his punishment at the trial that will take place. The RA offers nothing of the sort.

TeK

I was answering the question of how he came to the conclusion, not agreeing with the conclusion. Urgh.

Liliet

> he offers something that can diminish his punishment at the trial that will take place. The RA offers nothing of the sort.

...and that's nothing like justice.

Konstantin von Karstein

I am maybe wrong, but IRL if you collaborate with the police, the judge will be more lenient in some cases? And Cat has yet to interrogate her.

Liliet

yeah but that is a compromise of justice for practicality, especially when taken too far and YEAH LMAO OH MY GOD CA

Liliet

Ironically, it's exactly what Cat was worrying about every time she was wondering about giving him an inch. Does authority result from common agreement, or from the biggest stick? Cat managed to give him the (actually wrong) impression that it's the latter.

(Wrong, because the stick is a factor, but so is savviness, which he lacks entirely)

dadycoool

Yeah, Hanno isn't the Hero In Charge because he's the Sword of Judgement, he's in charge because he's got the natural (if rather oblivious) charisma to keep a herd of cats in line. I'm sure as MK witnesses this...I was about to say something charitable regarding his observational and decision-making skills. Nevermind, he'll butt heads with Hanno, splintering the Light faction and giving the Carrion Queen an opportunity to pick at the scraps that remain. Because that's exactly what he said she would do when he confronted her way back before the Autumn Invasion.

Mental Mouse

Arguably, Cat's savviness is part of her own stick. Yeah, she's got Night, but she herself still struggles to contend against WB, who's essentially savviness. (Including story-awareness.)

Liliet

Well, if he realized that that means his own stick is still rather small...

vernal.ancient

If you're referring specifically to the conclusion that Cat only talked to him because of the sword, he spent much of his viewpoint feeling bitter about being treated more as a tool to be used than a person, he likely feels that this whole conversation only happened because the sword made him a more useful tool.

Liliet

Either a more useful tool or a potential player, and clearly the wicked Black Queen has brought him into her confidence to ensure it's the former rather than the latter.

It's close enough to what's actually going on that there isn't really any evidence that would indicate to him it's not that 😊

ninegardens

Novel concept MK... but it feels kind of like... you should judge people for what they did?

Red Axe murdered one dude, and attempted murder on another.
(Why?)

You showed up and threw around some dumb accusations.
Concocter helped with smuggling that she shouldn't have.

There's a reason RA is in trouble but not you (with Cocky in between).

Also... oh god, is WK going to be dead? I'm so worried WK is dead. Possibly in defence of Cordelia. I feel like one of those two might be getting offed soon, and from Bard's point of view, Cordelia is still needed, and replacing WK with MK seems on brand.

RoflCat

The first murder he see as heroic vengeance and just action (admittedly it's hard to sympathize with Wicked Enchanter given what he did)

The second attempt murder will just be seen as her being tricked by a Damned's scheme (note how he refers to Bard as a Damned even though she's seen as part of Good before for the most part)

It feels like he might be subconsciously pushing anything 'bad' as Damned.

erebus42

Yeah, I believe Cat has speculated in the past about how many Proceran Named may have been labeled "damned" simply because they had gone against the grain.

Konstantin von Karstein

Or were in the way of a Proceran invasion.

erebus42

Dammit Christophe, and here I thought I'd written you off too soon. Oh well I guess while not every villain is a Calamity or a Woe not every Hero is going to be White Knight or even a Grey Pilgrim (on his better days).

amit27592

Though it is inconvenient for Cat, isn't what Mirror Knight saying true? Concocter & Magician also conspired with the bard, both are still alive because of their worth. Why would the Red Axe not be accorded the same?

She should be given a chance for redemption or at the very least, to explain her side of things.

RoflCat

The crimes committed are different.

Hunted Magician did some sabotages, but nothing to the level of outright betrayal, much like when Catherine threatened him he basically only did things that even if found out wouldn't get him executed.

Concocter is the same, she only made some dealings, but in term of actual actions she didn't do anything against the Arsenal outright, even come to help when she learned the truth to try and redeem herself (albeit with a push from Archer)

Red Axe intentionally killed a member of the Terms AND attempted murder of another hero, who was sent to protect her mind you. She WILL stand trial (Catherine said to ensure she's alive until then last chapter) but Catherine basically has no expectation she'll survive it.

TeK

HM arguably caused Fae to attack an Arsenal, with all that it implies.

Liliet

Very, very arguably.

TeK

Well yeah, I actually agree with Cat there. I'm just trying to point out that Mirror Knight has some points beyond "Big good hero is right"

Shveiran

No, he doesn't. Because he has a child's understanding on what made possible for the Fey to breach the Arsenal. Him opening his mouth on the subject, without ever asking someone he trusts and knows better on the subject? That makes his argument invalid. By default. It is based on nothing, and he even refuses to admit that much.

"Big good hero is right" is enough for him, and that's that.

Liliet

Mood.

Sugar Roll

Well, here's the rub. To most heroes, arguments goes into one ear and comes out of the other. No matter how sound the argument is, it doesn't matter as long as it comes out of a villain's mouth.

dadycoool

Sounds like the "Me: gives a valid argument. Parent: DISRESPECT!" meme.

Salt

That's why I have a lot of hope for Christophe to be perfectly honest. He's not perfect, but in the span of a day he admitted he was wrong, acted in everyone's best interest instead of sabotaging Catherine just out of principled and even came to a partial understanding about what exactly just transpired here, instead of stubbornly trying to lay it all at the feet of the most convenient Villain at hand.

That's... I mean he's not perfect, but it's a hell of a lot more open minded than a good half of Above aligned named and most of Procer besides.

TeK

Plus illusion cast by HM would have resulted in two Chosen corpses. He should very much go hang.

Liliet

This one, though? This one is real.

TeK

I am just saying their crimes are not that much different. Two attempted murders vs one attempted and one successful. Both warrant severe punishment, in a peace time Red Axe will get more years in a sentence, but in a wartimes...

erebus42

Eh, they have to come down hard on someone, might as well be her. I don't see her having a whole lot to bring to the table and considering she attempted to murder Frederick in cold blood I don't think this is gonna go her way. But we'll see I guess

Stable

Could it be that the mirror knight isn't the only biased one?

erebus42

Could it also be that the situations aren't equivalent?

TeK

Let's be honest, HM would have been in chains right now if not for the bribe.

erebus42

Probably yes, but this is a far more practical decision. The Magician's transgressions were far less direct and overt, and he brings far more to the table than the Axe does. She is guilty of at least one very public attempt at the premeditated murder of a Hero sent to protect her (and the successful premeditated murder of the Enchanter (though we can table that considering the whole messy debate around the mitigating factors of the situation). They need to make an example of someone and it's very unlikely she has anything to offer up (though they could ask I suppose). At this point she just seems to be more useful dead than alive.

Liliet

Unfortunately, Christophe is not wrong that justice based on who's more useful is no justice at all.

erebus42

By itself no. But but as a supplement and mitigating factor it can ensure the continued existence of a system that can promote future justice. I'm not saying it's particularly faithful to the ideal of justice on the face of it just that justice can only really become an important concern and be served in an environment that's stable enough to allow it.

TeK

Still, argument "law should be observed for all" does not work well after a shady backroom deal.

Shveiran

There is no shady backroom deal. Cat offered nothing, here, save for a trial. Which the Red Axe is also going to get.

All she gave him is that she wouldn't straight-out abandon him to the Heroes, something that is not going to happen to Red Axe either (because Hanno, duh).

There is no double standard here, just Catherine getting things she needed to help the Alliance out of the process. What laws have been infringed here, exactly?

Salt

I mean, not to take any sides here but it seems like the argument is based on a theme that'll probably come up in the actual trial too. Whether principle or utility should take precedence for the basis.

Cat is looking at it based on utility when she wants to consider his usefulness in the verdict, Christophe is based on principle when he says the punishment should fit the crime, not how much he can offer to wiggle free.

Neither one is right on its own, pure principle gets you a Laurence de Montfort and pure utility gets you a Black Knight. Cat, MK, and pretty much everyone in the grand alliance would at least agree that those extremes aren't where you want to end up for the Truce and Terms.

But as far as exactly where they want to set precedent for what might end up being a landmark trial under the Truce and Terms (and eventually the Liesse accords)? That's going to be an insanely complicated issue that'll have to take both into account, not necessarily one or the other.

agumentic

To be fair, while Hunted Magician is not literally in chains, neither is the Red Axe. And both of them are very arrested anyway.

TeK

My point exactly. Not that Chris is right, but that is his thought process.

Liliet

Mhm.

And Cat did not go into detail explaining this one.

Shveiran

Yeah, it's almost like leaving the room impaired a conversation or something.

Liliet

very true lmao

Salt

To a degree, he does have a point.

At the least, I think the trial is going to be a lot more interesting and a lot less straightforward than what a lot of the comments section seems to be leaning toward. You're going to have Catherine chiefly concerned with sustaining the Truce and Terms & avoiding showing weakness to the Villains, Hanno who's probably going to be the most concerned with the Just course of action, Tariq with the most Merciful course of action, and if grand alliance leaders get a say there's going to be a strong voice from the non-named crowd for more mundane (but no less important) concerns – namely Cordelia who will likely see the vast array of political consequences and have a completely different read of the situation. Not that anyone with a brain would ignore Cordelia Hasenbach's concerns, regardless whether or not officially supposed to have a say.

I'm expecting a banger of a four or five-way clusterfuck over the nuances of the trial, plus Christophe the pink elephant in the room, who can barely keep up but can't really be ignored now that he's taken up the sword.

Mental Mouse

"pink elephant in the room"? Christophe's certainly an "elephant in the room" – a big thing that nobody wants to quite acknowledge – but he's definitely not a drunken hallucination.

vernal.ancient

He'd be a lot easier to deal with if he was

Shveiran

If only.

JJR

““We wouldn't have had this conversation,” the Mirror Knight quietly said, “if I'd not taken up the sword, would we?””

Cat probably could have side stepped this with a, “no, we'd be dead or worse from the demons.” I'm not sure why she didn't, it seems to fit her character. Probably just didn't think of it.

Ninestrings

He was upset she was only speaking to him because he had the sword and was now a part of her plans and too powerful to ignore.

Christophe knows Cat doesn't respect him as a person, and is only listening to his opinion because she doesn't have much choice.

So realising he was in a position of power, he did the noble thing of making a demand passive-aggressively and fleeing into the night.

Insanenoodlyguy

I said last chapter, I think the way he's changed his story, he's actually getting smarter. Of course, this has been exactly smart enough to cause more trouble and not smart enough to have a good solution.

Ninestrings

A moron getting too much power is not a good story track to be in.

The villain equivalent would be screaming “I am invincible!” while absorbing an energy field bigger than their head.

Salt

Or some random orphan girl suddenly getting all the influence and power of being the apprentice Squire to the Black Knight?

Granted, Cat's early days were a horror show of mistakes, among which is one near-genocide of a city and one actual-genocide of a city, but she's living proof that it's possible to grow into the mantle of power rather than just being taken for a ride by it.

WuseMajor

Yes, but she had the Black Knight to be her teacher and mentor, someone who could rein her in if need be. Granted, he mostly didn't, but he did teach her how to think.

The Mirror Knight, as near as we can tell, has been treated as a battering ram by pretty much everyone so far. Instead of being trained or mentored, he's been told "go kill that thing" or "ok, stand here, I wanna try something."

And now he's got a degree of power that frightens the Black Queen, who has a degree of power that had Tariq willing to sacrifice a significant number of human lives in order to get a story ready to kill her.

I'd say that this is the Bard going "You're only delaying the inevitable kiddo." Also, possibly her weapon to kill Cat.

If he's going to be salvaged, he's going to need a good assistant/teacher. Someone he trusts, someone who can help him sand off those rough edges and grease his interactions with others, but without making him feel like a fool or simply doing it for him, because doing it for him would do him no favors.

And I can't help but notice that the Repentant Magister and Hakram were taken out of commission in the fight with the demons. Not that Cat would ever give up Hakram, but she might have loaned him to the Mirror Knight to help him out a bit.

Possibly the Rogue Sorcerer might be able to get through to him? Become his surrogate "big brother" or something.

Salt

Agreed, absolutely.

Personally I have my fingers crossed for Hanno, who's shown so far to have a degree of patience and moderation that flabbergasts most people who interact with him, and genuinely has the best of intentions in basically everything we've seen him do so far.

A lot of people would react badly to Christophe's brashness and naive sort of well-intentioned zeal, but Hanno might be the kind of person to disarm him there, simply by being able to turn the other cheek to almost an unbelievable degree when needed.

ninegardens

Except here, is last line is basically "Sword of justice is no longer important"

Salt

That isn't even close to what he said though?

He said IF Hanno pushes for the execution, he would have to "ask a question he would rather not". The question being "what is the sword of judgement, without judgement"

Basically meaning he doesn't want to go up against Hanno at all, but if Hanno takes a different stance then he's going to have to stand up to him based on his own beliefs.

That isn't even remotely similar to just dismissing Hanno as unimportant

Insanenoodlyguy

No, which is why he'll continue to get smarter. But first, hijinks ensue!

Shveiran

He doesn't need to grow smarter, he needs to grow less self-righteous. My God, no one is right all the time, and no one is always prepared to deal with the situation. One of the most basic parts of intelligence is realizing you are ill-prepared for a task and not attempting it.

Luckily, it's not like he is messing with the alliance of power trying to prevent the apocalypse or anything, so I'm sure we can wait for him to mature.

Insanenoodlyguy

I agree with everything you say, but I believe that he's growing smarter instead. he didn't need to grow any stronger either, but here we are. 😊

Liliet

> Cat probably could have side stepped this with a, "no, we'd be dead or worse from the demons." I'm not sure why she didn't, it seems to fit her character. Probably just didn't think of it.

She paused for a second to think of an answer, and he (more or less correctly) took it as confirmation.

WuseMajor

I feel like correct response was "Maybe. However, I'd already been thinking that you needed to learn more about how politics is played lately and this seemed like a good opportunity to teach you. Or did you think I wasn't aware that you were involved in /another/ treasonous plot?" Put him on the defensive for a second, explain what's going on with that northern princess, and, maybe, that would have gotten him to consider that he needs to learn how to be a better leader and get a better BS detector.

Mental Mouse

But working that out took her a moment. "Only for a moment, and the moment's gone...."

Tek

I feel like a correct response would be honestly...

... Because I believe that is always the correct response.

Salt

Have to agree here, she needs to be fully honest with him.

Especially since Cat is properly trading blows with the Bard now. Even not admitting her little deception in the miscellaneous stacks feels like a mistake, better to get it out now while he's receptive and the situation is under your control. Show that she's willing to be fully honest with him all the time, not just when it benefits her or when she's forced to.

If I was some sort of immortal boogeyman with a near-omniscient eye for stories and details, that's the kind of secret I'd let the mirror knight find out at the worst moment. Like when he's just at the cusp of placing some sort of trust in Catherine.

Liliet

It is, but being honest means "communicate the idea that is true" which presumes "communicate the idea fully" and for that you need to 1) be able to finish the sentence, 2)

COMMUNICATION IS A TWO-WAY STREET AND THE LISTENER'S JOB IS INTERPRETATION

so... saying "be honest" is like saying that the best way to win a war is to win it =x

TeK

Nah, being honest means "do not attempt to lie, misdirect, leave out information, omit important details, lead on, use a faulty logic, etc"

Liliet

Yeah, but it's not helpful. It tells you what NOT to do, but it doesn't help you what to do.

Also "don't omit important details" is physically impossible unless you somehow magically convey the whole volume of information at once.

TeK

Important details, not all details. It's a distinction, if a flawed one.

TeK

Also winning the war is a most reliable way to win a war, unless this is a war you don't want to win.

Liliet

I mean you're not WRONG

laguz24

That's the problem with cat, she already has her band, and is reluctant to let anyone else in. She needs to do so with the MK because he does not want to be a tool anymore.

TeK

She is in the position of authority though. She juggles many people, she can't afford to be chummy with everyone.

erebus42

As was said she can't be everyone's friend and it isn't her job to take care of every Named who's dealing with issues. And even if he's tired of just being a tool he still needs to learn to work with people and to see more than what's right in front of his nose.

Liliet

Catherine damn well tried. And that's what led to this problem, because she gave the MK the exact impression she was trying to avoid: that authority in the Grand Alliance / the Truce and Terms is based on who has the biggest stick.

Juff

Typo Thread:

Many them > Many of them of the people > or the people be taint > be a taint
Terms myself, > Terms, you helmet > your helmet of tool > of a tool cup at sipping > cup and sipping that'd put > they'd put Rex Axe > Red Axe
there any need > there is any need

ALazyMonster

It's kinda delightfully ironic that the Mirror Knight's flaw is that he never looks in the damn mirror for where the problem is. I mean he seems to think that Procer can do no wrong despite evidence to the contrary, any perceived flaw in himself is just a lack of power not the fact that he's denser than the metal of his plate mail, and he doesn't ever acknowledge the broader picture with anything more than nebulous principals of good and evil.

erebus42

Honestly he almost sounds like the main character of a tragedy...

erebus42

Honestly he almost sounds like the protagonist of a tragedy...

erebus42

Sorry for the repeat, the first response didn't show up until after I posted this one.

Liliet

Almost? 😊

vernal.ancient

I mean, he's not the main character, except of his own life. ... which would imply that his life itself is a tragedy. I don't know whether that's darkly hilarious, or just dark

Liliet

Fucking Named, amirite? :3

Big I

Can't help by think of this quote from Jehan the Wise: "One should not confuse doing good with fighting evil, lest good become the act of striking."

All the Mirror Knight is is a huge mess of self loathing and insecurity. He's the Shinji Ikari of the Guideverse.

dadycoool

"What can a mirror show?"

"Everything it sees."

"And what can a mirror see?"

"Everything."

"But not itself."

I think that mock-sage encounter is a good summary of him. He can't see things from other perspectives because his design forces him to only show things from his own perspective.

superkeaton

As soon as I noticed he kept calling the Bard a Villain, I knew this would be an issue.

Burlyraven

...And this is why I wanted Kingfisher to be the one to take up the sword. Mirror Knight just has too many issues with seeing beyond tradition and honor.

That being said, I wonder if Cat might not need to expand her own views. She's treating Mirror Knight like a cougar on a leash, and not giving him the respect that his story's started to insist he's due after years of even the heroes treating him as little more than a battering ram. If you really look at the path Mirror Knight's been on lately, it should have been obvious that the best move really would have been to fully read him in and treat him as an equal. It might have put Hanno in a precarious position, but Hanno's not the one wielding the most powerful handheld weapon in existence.

hakureireimu

Not really; Mirror is expendable, but Hanno is not. There's always the possibility that someone else can take up the sword, but there's no one who's close to replacing Hanno.

Liliet

Catherine damn well tried. This is what this chapter was: her trying.

That's why she paused when he asked, because her instinct was to tell the truth, and the truth is that yes, this specific conversation is a direct result of her being scared of how much damage he can do, otherwise she'd have gone to sleep and left his ignorance to other heroes to mend.

caoimhinh

That conclusion felt very forced.

Christophe made a complete U-turn from how he had been through the whole conversation.

I mean, it's not strange that he noticed he was only being considered important due to the Severance, nor that he would be offended by it. But it's the brusque way he shifted gears that is weird.

He was calm, listening, and agreeable after his questions had been answered; then he pauses as he was reaching for the cup, has a sudden thought and gets out of there making demands not-so-subtly threatening to use violence to get his way.

If they had traded a few more sentences after he said that before he made the demand of the Red Axe's release, or if Cat had been unreasonable thus making him get gradually angry, it would have been better. As it is, it feels like he was possessed by something mid-conversation.

Also, Cat could have attempted to reason with him further and talk more, maybe calling him out on how his declaration was something only a Damned would do, using violence to do as he pleases above the law.

But no... Cat went "I don't think so" on him and let him go without an attempt on diplomacy. Hanno was right, she really has trouble when dealing with someone not hostile if it's not from a position of authority.

Liliet

It makes perfect sense to me. Note how Cat noted he was already pushing more than she considered acceptable mid-conversation. And she let him, which ended up a misjudgement, as instead of comforting him / showing she was reasonable it pissed him off. If he can get things by pushing, cannot anyone? Is it not then his duty to push, if only just to push back against hypothetical other pushers?

And justice based on how useful someone is is no justice at all. The idea of Hunted Magician hypothetically getting off scot free after what he'd done, while Catherine's phrasing implied she did not think it was even a possibility for Red Axe... Yeah, that was a bad phrasing.

Mirror Knight is a mess of insecurities both about himself and the situation. Catherine cared about him being untaught already before he took the sword, but he doesn't know that. Catherine was not pushing back because she was trying to be diplomatic and not because she recognized his right to push, but he doesn't know that. The White Knight is the heroes' representative because of his savvy and ability to engender respect in other political players and not of his power, but he doesn't know that.

(He was, in fact, considered the head of the heroes because of the power the Heavens vested in him, which is THAT unpleasant chicken coming home to roost. The Hierarch's trial issue – heroes DO have a tendency of assuming (heroic) might implies right)

The Mirror Knight just now found himself in a lawless world where the strong push around the weak, and he's being invited in the highest circle because he's now strong, but at the same time is still expected to sit tight and listen to his betters. And he has no reassurance that it's not because they want to hold on to their own already existing power and don't want to share.

I mean, if you took off a book of an unfamiliar fantasy series off a bookshelf, opened it randomly in the middle, and what was there was this conversation but from Christophe's POV, what would you assume?

caoimhinh

Nah, the turn of mentality was so abrupt that even Catherine immediate reaction was "Wait, what?". She was caught so unaware that she couldn't muster a response to him.

I'm not saying his reaching to that conclusion is illogical (he is right, after all), what I'm saying is how abrupt it was.

He was listening to Catherine and had even seen the sense in her explanations as to why she did things and what would happen with the Hunted Magician. He had accepted that.

But then while reaching for the wine he has a sudden thought and was "oh, you bitch!" and stood up in anger, leaving the room with a threat of violence against a fellow Hero if Hanno doesn't do what he wants.

Mental Mouse

I smell the Wandering Bard's hand there.

TeK

More like he was thinking about it nonstop, wondering why Cat even deign to talk with him and walk with him, and then it just reached a point and got released.

TeK

I actually did similar thing in the conversations a few times, not proud of that.

Liliet

Yeah, that's what I saw too.

Liliet

Makes sense.

Salt

I mean it's understandable why he's not happy with only being considered after getting a big enough stick, but the irony (and almost outright hypocrisy) of it is almost comical

The only reason he's ever given Catherine any consideration, and actually the only reason she's breathing right now, is because she's powerful enough that a tenth crusade couldn't put her down. A tenth crusade in which the mirror knight actively participated. Diplomacy was only an option after she beat them back by force.

It's a bit childish for him to be miffed at her for only taking him seriously after he got a large stick, when we know for a fact that he would've cut her head off and trampled her corpse into the ground without a second thought rather than sit down for a chat over wine, if it wasn't for Catherine having a very big stick of her own.

A wise person would realize the irony of it, how shitty it is to be on the other end of that deal, and realize why it's important to enforce the truce and terms as intended rather than throwing his weight around.

But he isn't one of those, which is where our much wiser friend Hanno needs to come in, I suppose.

TeK

Not really? He isn't miffed at Cat for not recognizing him, Cat just confirmed his suspicions that NOBODY cares about his opinion and he is just a dumbfuck who is tolerated because of his power. Which is somewhat ironic, yeah, but the moment your greatest fears and anxiety build up in through the most brutal war are confirmed it is, understandably, not a time for self-reflection.

You judge him under standards basically no living human can live up to, and I don't understand the undercurrent of hostility in your tone because while he shares the blame, he shares it. Cat is the one acting like a superior with authority, and she treated him exactly like Cordelia treated Cat in the Crusade. Which is ironic on it's own, but I guess noone is able to appreciate it at the time.

If you don't remember, at the time of Crusade he basically was a footsoldier and nothing more. He can't probably doesn't even know how all the situation with Cat came to be, he was just doing what was ordered. As far as he concerned, Crusade was called after diplomacy failed.

Salt

I know you're trying to make him more sympathetic but this is really a bit of a dramatic stretch.

Continental players only caring about your opinion in major conflicts if they have a particular reason to, isn't exactly something unique to Christophe. It's not like Cordelia, Catherine, Hanno, and Tariq decided to make a cool kids club one day and leave poor Christophe out in the rain. They were in various ways at each other's throats in one form or another before being forced to acknowledge each other, all of them not just for power but for the degree of demonstrated restraint and good judgment in their own way. Christophe has never really acted in a way or in a role that lends him that same kind of respect for the latter – he's always been a foot soldier until now.

You said it yourself. He acted as a blind foot soldier in the tenth crusade. He also wasn't a leader in most of the war against the dead king, and was just made an unwilling pawn in the bard's game to destroy the two sharpest swords bared at the Dead King, chosen specifically for his naïveté and inflexibility.

Why, then, is it so wrong for people to consider him to have the judgement of a foot soldier, when that's all he's ever shown them? What makes him so special as to warrant special consideration there that the entire rest of the continent isn't afforded?

If you continually take the role of a foot soldier, then I'm sorry but people are going to see you as a foot soldier, not a divine prophet or a wise king. That's not judging him to "a standard no human being can live up to". That's judging him by the exact same standard that everyone else has been judged up till now, at least internally in the story setting.

Shveiran

Very well-argued.

sivarajan

Now he wields a sword that can kill gods. He will be a foot soldier no more! You see why it might have been better to accord him special consideration before he got the power to demand it?

Shveiran

But he is! He is a "foot soldier", at least as much as he was before!

It doesn't matter how powerful he is, he is just a foot soldier!

He didn't suddenly become a strategist, did he? He doesn't suddenly speak for any group larger than himself, does he? He has no skill, no resource, no authority whatsoever that justifies involving him in the decision process!

The only reason to indulge him is because he is dangerous if he decides to start chopping heads; so the only reason this conversation is happening is because he is not enough of a man to admit that "this whole continental crisis and unprecedented alliance? I don't get it. It's almost like my basic education and hitting things labeled "Evil" didn't prepare me to deal with it. Perhaps I should listen to someone with more authority and experience."

But nooo, he has a magic sword, so he knows best!

Seriously, @#! Cristophe.

Liliet

...but Catherine is suddenly NOT treating him as a foot-soldier. She even called it out in her own internal monologue, that she's giving him importance where none is warranted and might be jumping the gun and creating her own problems in that. But she chose to take the risk because ultimately sharing power and bringing others in is Catherine's core impulse.

And now he's being brought in on the highest level dealings and silence is compliance.

Liliet

TBF, heroes and villains, like... really ARE different categories. "That I'm a hero is reason enough to listen to me" is NOT an entirely unreasonable stance – sure, the result of listening will not necessarily be agreement, but you really cannot buy a heroic Name in a corner shop. And the reverse goes for villains – even Catherine had admitted that it's childish to whine about everyone trying to put her down and nobody giving her the benefit of doubt when she's standing under the flag saying "Enemy Of All That Lives".

This is a cornerstone problem with the premise of the Truce and Terms and the Accords that they need to handle like it's a nuclear bomb with faulty wiring: heroes and villains aren't just opposing factions of big-endians and little-endians, heroes DO have that high ground to stand on and higher expectations to live up to. Wicked Enchanter WAS a rapist. That he was given pardon was a compromised forced by the objective situation, and T&T and Accords are this compromise made permanent.

It's necessary, but you need VERY solid and specific grounding in what's going on before you can see that yes, THAT exactly is the thing that is necessary, it's the optimum and the only possible stable solution.

I won't say that none of MK's behavior was childish here. Leaving the room after asking his question without even waiting for an answer WAS. I'd compare it with Amadeus's urge to end the conversation with Bard by bashing his head against a rock until he blacks out in Epilogue 4, which brings me to the point... well, it's a pretty high bar to set for a character to never do that XD

Aotrs Commander

Aaaaaand the Mirror Knight shows that that he's a still just stopped clock and the previous glimpses of something approaching... competence, frankly (outside of Hit With Sword) were merely nothing more than that twice a day.

dadycool

His minute of clarity has ended, and now he's back to pointing in the completely wrong direction.

SpeckofStardust

People talking about justice,
Same people who where arguing for red Axe to live though this and that be a good thing.
Also Cat is the worst person to give a HERO lessons on how to act.
Hanno assuming he isn't dead will be able to fix this.
Considering the man already taught some heroes to care about collateral damage and was in relative charge over the fighting up north he should set Mirror Knight on a less messy way.

TeK

Did you guys noticed how Cat was acting like Cordelia back in the Crusade Ark?

"You are ignorant and we are in the right, the only reason we even talk is because you fight gut, now do what I say also I am better than you"

SpeckofStardust

Pretty much, this isn't justice after all.
It's how the world works.

Shveiran

I have no idea what you are getting this from.

From the perspective of politeness, Cordelia was refusing to acknowledge Catherine as a ruler, insulting her, and straight-out blackmailing her.
Here we have Catherine explaining her reasons, pointing out she will solve this in concert with his appointed representative, even making a concession in exchange for nothing, only for him to be outraged at a moment hesitation regarding the answer to "would you bother to be explaining things to me if I was one of the hundred Named fighting and not one of the most powerful ones, considering I was ready to draw on you ten hours ago?".

They... are not the same?

From the perspective of the subject matter, Cordelia was threatening the conquest of her homeland and the slaughter of most of Catherine's friends. Here Catherine is... saying that both the HM and the RA will be put on trial with their representatives in attendance?

Again, really not the same.

Finally, from the perspective of their relationship... Cordelia was infuriating because she refused to acknowledge Catherine as a peer. Despite her being the de-facto ruler of a country – which she was invading. And also shaming her over having conquered her crown while she herself had to fought a civil war to become First Prince by killing the other claimants. That still gets me angry.

But here? Catherine is the queen of a member state of the alliance, the prophet of another, the diplomat to the Kingdom Under and the Representatives of Villains. If Cristophe dethroned Hanno, they'd still not be equals, and that hasn't happened besides.

Not to repeat myself, but... really not the same.

beleester

The downside to admitting that you're a ruthlessly practical person who's willing to do anything to win the war is that you're telling useful people they can get away with a lot of shit.

Shveiran

This webnovel is crazy good at creating characters I need to strangle. The only downside is that most of them end up getting away with it scot-free.

Salt

To be fair, the Mirror Knight here is in his early years, that's almost a given. His sort of behaviour right now is the kind that'll cause a more seasoned Mirror Knight 10 years down the road to turn a little red in embarrassment at the memory.

No doubt, if they all end up living long enough, that some of his friends are going to tease him about it for years.

Shveiran

You and several people have pointed this out, but I'm sorry, I don't think that is any excuse.

Everyone was young and stupid at least once, but this is not being disrespectful, or pulling a prank, or behaving stupidly in a relationship. This is drunkenly swinging an iron bar into the glass shop of international relationships during the greatest crisis since Triumphant.

Come on, this can't be hand-waved with a "ah, youth". He might not be as bad as the Tyrant (I can acknowledge he at least means well, if only toward his side of the aisle, which is rather narrow) but I'd pick teh Concocter or the Magician over him any day of the week. Because they didn't mean well, they were petty and dickish, they were bloody disgusting in their egoism, but at least they considered the possible ramifications of their actions before making those bad choices. I'm not absolving them, by the way, but Cristophe is both more dangerous and more stupid.

C and HM tried to skim the edge, MK assumes there is no edge and just walk straight into the chasm, dragging everyone along and reassuring himself every step of the way that it was the right choice.

Salt

I don't think anyone is denying that he has flaws or that they're somehow excusable, but I think there's genuinely more sympathy for him there as his POV interludes have been showing that he isn't intentionally ignoring consequences or being insulting. He's just so inexperienced and awkward that he physically can't help it.

Which doesn't change the fact that he IS abrasive and incompetent, but the knowledge that he understands how flawed he is and that he's so angry at himself for not being able to mend those flaws, means that it's hard not to sympathize for him a bit. It's hard not to hope that he does find a proper teacher rather than being abandoned to turn into some worthless self-absorbed zealot.

For example, the Mirror Knight's internal monologues on his tendency to spew insults:

>"That would be wise," Christophe agreed, cursing himself for not having thought of such a delicate way to send her away.

>Must he always give insult? It had not been meant as one even if it sounded like an accusation.

>The Blade of Mercy cast him a look and Christophe nodded jerkily, hoping his eyes could carry the apology he could not allow himself to speak before this company.

>The orc could not be called silvertongued, he did not have the... cunning mien for that, but he had a calming and orderly way about him. Christophe, who half the time seemed to infuriate when he meant compliment and praise when he meant to insult, could only envy that.

The Mirror Knight's internal monologues on his strategic incompetence:

>Obvious. That had been obvious, so why hadn't he seen it? All these blessings, but what were they really worth in his hands? The Dames had chosen him, back home, but he'd wandered a long way from that home. Would they choose him again, he wondered? Somehow he doubted it.

>Before long, Christophe of Pavanie knew, he would be standing alone surrounded by corpses. Again. Too slow, too weak, too stupid, again.

Christophe isn't a Saint of Swords. Not yet, anyway. We saw that Hakram convinced him with good common sense during the fight with Autumn, we saw that he genuinely held no animosity for him despite being an orc and one of the most infamous villains on the continent. We saw that in the heat of things when Hakram went down, his first instinct was to try to help him as best as he could – there was no hesitation because he was a Villain, no consideration of allowing him to die to weaken the Black Queen – the only thing that went through his mind when the chips were down was how he could help. How many Heroes, much more competent Heroes, would have simply let Hakram die to lessen the Black Queen and rid the world of a powerful Villain in one fell swoop?

His actions are as hypocritical and stupid as always. But the recent revelations shine a very new and very positive light on on his intentions and potential to change for the better. Genuine good intentions, endless self-criticism, an awareness of his own (many) faults, and a willingness to learn and become better.

Liliet

> How many Heroes, much more competent Heroes, would have simply let Hakram die to lessen the Black Queen and rid the world of a powerful Villain in one fell swoop?

None, I think. Actually.

violentink

Still think he's going to do a massive Heel turn, an Anakin Skywalker style "best and brightest turns ton the dark side." The vagrant spear just has to eat an axe to the face in circumstances that the Grand Alliance could have prevented and boom.

Big I

I could definitely see him becoming the Black Knight

Wonder

I think the MK can get away with threatening Cat for now because his Name is tailored to go up against Knight: a soldier to take out a thief.

But Cat's Name is something that has the WB worried to the extent that she tried to shape it to hers.

I believe the moment Cat gets her Name ,Christophe will lose any power he holds with Severance over her

Eurus

It's kinda funny that Christophe, despite now being one of the biggest weapons the Heavens have, doesn't actually seem to have any angels whispering to him. Not that I think more angels would improve the situation, but he might have less of a complex about the whole thing if he wasn't forced to rely on his own rather lacking instincts and social graces! XD

Ninestrings

Christophe appears to be in the mould of the Arthurian knights.

So there's a lot more pagan and celtic flavour to his power source, I wouldn't be terribly surprised if he had a fairy godmother of some sort rather than an angel on his shoulder.

308924810a

So rethinking Catherine's Liesse Accords: I think she's going to fail, because her planned multilateral enforcement of voted upon resolutions won't really work, because her idea for where to put the city she wants to build for this is bad, and because the opportunity to see a hero foil a villain's continent-spanning scheme, even when that scheme is for the better, is too much to pass up.

BUT, I think it should be remembered that even if Catherine fails at the scheme, the scheme itself doesn't have to be a failure. I've been thinking it through, and a lot of the reason that UN resolutions regarding protecting trade and arms limitations worked out was because a formerly isolationist superpower that's only really interested in making a profit (America, or potentially in PGTE, the Dwarves) was the one to push enforcement of them.

There's just too much in common between America's former diplomatic position and that of the Dwarves, it has to be deliberate. Which means the best path to victory is getting the dwarves to push this as their agenda.

They actually have a reason to do so, one of the only things that's been revealed about them is that they're having trouble dealing with the high rate of appearance of Named in their giant kingdom.

They'd also probably insist that any administrative/negotiating center of the treaty be put in Mercantis(I remember something about there being a big entrance to the Kingdom Under there), which has an actual tradition of neutrality, and the terrain to make countries want to keep it that way, unlike Catherine's proposed location.

sengachi

Ohhhh. So the Mirror Knight is who we all used to assume the White Knight was.

Shit.

Chapter 27: Nigh

"When using tigers you don't have enough time to gloat, when using rats you risk awkwardly running out of gloat before the end: true equilibrium is found in a pit of humble man-eating tapirs, beasts that have never once failed me."

– Dread Empress Atrocious, later devoured by man-eating tapirs

I woke up with a stiff back and an aching leg.

I'd courted as much by sleeping in a chair instead of a bed, but I'd not had it in me to retire to my rooms. Groaning as I shook off the last pangs of sleep and felt out the throbbing side of my leg – today wasn't going to be one of the goods days, I could already sense it – I pulled back my hand to settle my messily loose hair some. The pale glow of the magelights in the healing ward's private room was hard on the eyes, somehow harsh and cold compared to the way the light of day felt. The Arsenal was not growing on me: the endless bare hallways and the dusty air had me more restless than even the Everdark had back in the day. Below the earth, moving through caves and tunnels, it'd still felt like my feet were on the ground. Here, though, it all felt fake. Unnatural.

Swallowing a yawn and stretching, I finally made myself look at the man lying on the bed by chair. Hakram's upper body was bare and I could see his hairless and muscled chest rise and fall as he breathed, the steady rhythm ensured by the sorcery woven over his mouth and nose. A ball of spelled air, made thicker and almost translucent by the nature of the spell, was ensuring that he would keep breathing steadily even should his body fail as it already had several times. Gods, my heart still clenched every time I looked at him. I could not see the leg and the chunk of hip – including bone – he'd lost, as they were under the blanket, but there was no hiding his carved-up flank and the stump of his arm. The priests, the mages and even Masego were all in agreement: there could be no healing most of this.

In time flesh would grow back over the bared ribs and the stumps would cease to be purplish scabs, but there could be no question of attaching another limp even if we managed to get another one from an orc or even grow something through sorcery. Wounds inflicted by the Severance could be fully mended by neither sorcery nor Light. I'd already asked Hierophant to begin work on prosthetics, but the cuts through bone at the hip and leg were... Hakram's fighting days were likely over. After months of bedrest and the finest prosthetics the Arsenal could create, he might be able to walk around without help. Might. But he would no longer be fit for battle, that much couldn't be denied. I did not realize I was worrying my lip with my teeth as I looked at him until the door was cracked open and I released it.

My lips were dry, and my teeth sharp, so I tasted a fleck of blood against the roof of my mouth as I turned to see who'd intruded.

"Cat?" Archer quietly asked as she poked her face in. "Ah, good, you're awake."

She opened the door further with her foot and came in with a wooden tray. The smell from the pastries on it, some sort of Proceran pasties filled with cheese and herbs, wafted in.

"Breakfast," she announced.

"Thanks," I wanly smiled, waving her in.

I noticed a steaming mug besides the pastries, filled with something liquid and dark. Indrani crossed the room, letting the door close behind her, and passed me the tray even as she sat down in one of the seats by mine. The moment my hands were occupied supporting it she pre-emptively stole one of the pastries, which had my lips twitching, and I settled the tray on my knees with a nod of thanks. I sniffed at the mug and my brow rose when I recognized the distinct scent of the herbs Masego used to give me for pain back in the day.

"Cocky had a few," Indrani shrugged in answer when I glanced at her.

How like her, I fondly thought, to mention that in a transparent attempt to draw attention from the gesture of bringing the mug. Or from having remembered this precise recipe even years later. It was rare for her to bother with little things like this, usually when someone brought me a meal it was – the thought soured me, and I breathed out shallowly. I made myself take a bite from one of the remaining pastries, the crust falling apart in my mouth and the warm cheese drowning out the taste of the herbs. It was tasty enough, and filling, so I tore through two before stopping to breathe.

"Thanks," I told Archer. "Didn't realize how hungry I'd gotten. What time is it?"

"An hour before Morning Bell," she replied.

Past dawn, then. This would make it the longest night of sleep from the four I'd had since the culmination of the Bard's plots in the Arsenal. Indrani had not, I noted, bothered to wipe away the mess of crumbs she'd made eating her own pastry. Hiding a slightly crusty smile at the sight, I sipped at the brew. The taste was as dubious as I remembered, but it'd do wonders for my leg without needing to draw on Night.

"You don't usually wake me, much less bring me breakfast," I leadingly said.

"I did in the Everdark, sometimes," she defended.

"Like we didn't make Akua cook whenever we could," I snorted.

Indrani was a much better cook than either Akua or me, in truth, but she was also in no way above taking a nap and letting someone else handle it after a long day of marching.

"Making the only known poisoner among us handle the stew," Archer dryly said. "Yeah, that sounds about right for our little Everdark walkabout."

I snorted. That whole affair had been an exercise in recklessness, it was true, for all that in the end it'd turned out mostly well. I did not immediately answer, instead enjoying the silence as I sipped at my mug. She'd probably come for a reason, but I was in no hurry to press her for it.

"Sometimes I wonder how it would have been down there, if he'd come along like he wanted to," Indrani said, eyes going to our unconscious friend.

Not even Masego could tell us when he'd wake. There wasn't exactly a known precedent to call on for demonic taint followed by a cut of the Severance.

"We would have been better off," I said. "And Callow would have fallen to pieces."

She hummed, not exactly in agreement but not disagreeing either.

"Always thought you were much rougher on Vivienne and the Hellhound than him, for that mess we found in Iserre," Indrani suddenly said. "He had just as big a hand in it, but his chewing out was had in private."

"Juniper and Vivienne had titles, he didn't," I replied. "I wouldn't have been quite so brutal with those two if not for their blunders in 'welcoming' me, either. Couldn't afford not to, after those."

"You also like him most," Indrani frankly said.

I jolted in genuine surprise, looking askance at her.

"It's fine," she waved. "I'm not getting all jealous on you, Cat. And it's not like you really play favourites in the Woe. Hakram's been with you from start, the longest of any of us, so you two have always been the closest in some ways."

I didn't bother to argue that I didn't sleep with Hakram, since we both knew that was a different thing. Her nebulous but inarguably existing partnership with Masego involved not a speck of bedplay, as far as I knew, but that in no way took away from the importance of it to both involved.

"Sometimes I think I might be afraid of becoming Black, if we make it all through the next decade," I admitted.

She didn't immediately speak, and I appreciated the moment to gather my thoughts as I drank.

"The rest of you wandering off to see to your own lives, the way the Calamities did with him," I said. "I never had to worry about that with Hakram. I knew he'd stick with me into Cardinal and the Accords."

It was never something we'd outright discussed, but more than once common plans had been drawn for things that the two of us would be able to do when the city was raised, together. It seemed faraway now, watching him breathe on that bed. I snorted.

"He wants to make cisterns up in the mountains, you know," I said. "With canals that'd lead the water down to the city since water's going to be an issue if it gets too large."

"Wouldn't that be something to see," Indrani softly said.

"Nonsense it what it is," I smilingly said. "We should drain one the lakes up there and gate it down instead, much more practical."

How many times had we had that debate? Must have been at least a dozen, I knew all the arguments for and against by rote. It'd gotten stale, retreading the same grounds, but I'd still give a queen's ransom to tread them once more with him right now. I breathed out, looking away.

"You know you're going to have to leave him behind, don't you?" Indrani gently said.

I turned so quickly I almost dropped the tray.

"Excuse me?" I flatly said.

"He's in no state to be transported," Archer said, not cowed by my glare in the slightest. "And even if he was, the Arsenal is the best place for him to recover. He can be fitted for the prosthetics here as they're being made, and there's not a place with more or more kinds of healers on the continent. If you take him with you Cat, it won't be for his benefit. It'll be for yours."

"I can't just let him rot here," I hissed.

"Masego will be attending him," Indrani said.

"Masego will remember to attend him in between more important things," I bit out.

A moment of silence passed, Archer saying nothing.

"I didn't mean that," I finally said.

It was doing a disservice to him. Masego was sometimes forgetful, but never when it came to taking care of one of us.

"I know," Indrani said. "Like you know you won't be able to stay here by his bedside forever. There's still a war on outside, and it needs you."

"Some days I wonder," I darkly said. "We managed to chase off the Intercessor, 'Drani, but what else do we have to show for this? Entire sections of the Arsenal trashed or tainted, a pile of dead soldiers and Named, a fucking knot of politics to entangle that just got even more knotted. The Mirror Knight has the fucking sword, and he's not going to give that back even if asked nicely."

"You drove back a creature that gives even the Hidden Horror the shivers," Archer said. "If there wasn't a pack of ruins on fire left behind, Cat, I'd be a lot more worried."

I took my mug in hand and reached to set aside the tray, swallowing a hiss at the way the move pulled at my leg, but Indrani leaned over and set it on the ground instead. I gestured in thanks, which she airily dismissed.

"And Mirror Knight trying to play politics won't amount to shit," Archer continued. "Most Dominion people can't stand him, and it's not like him having a real cutty sword is going to impress Hasenbach or Malanza. And if both those two tell him to sit down and shut up, I don't care whose daughter he's fucking: there's no one in Procer who's going to argue."

"It's a sword made to kill the Dead King, Indrani," I said. "And we only have one of those. That gives him clout, whether I like it or not."

"Balls to that," Archer said. "I don't care how many Mirror Knights we throw at Keter, it's not going to get shit done. You think it's the first time the Original Abomination got some scrappy hero with powerful aspects and a fancy sword knocking at his gate? He'll snap that boy over his fucking knee, Cat. The Saint might have pulled it off, 'cause she was hard and canny and gone feral in the Heavens way, but the Mirror Knight? He's just some asshole. Not the worst I've seen, and sure he tries, but when it comes down to it he's still just some jackass with a sword."

"If he was just that, I'd have gotten him under control by now," I said.

"Way you told it to me, you treated him like Black and the Empress treated you back in the day," Indrani said. "That wasn't going to work."

"It usually does," I said through gritted teeth.

And Christophe de Pavanie wasn't an idiot: I'd shown him how I did things, and then explained why they needed to be done that way. I'd even thought it was working, for all that I was wary of him and probably not hiding it entirely. I still had no real idea what had set him off at the end, though there was no denying I'd botched my handling of his little tantrum.

"Yeah, but you're the Black Queen," Archer said. "If you're being nice to him, it's probably a plot. If you're being mean to him, it's probably a plot. If you're not being anything to him, it's probably a plot. There's a reason it's Shiny Boots in charge of the heroes and not you, Catherine. Most of them still think you're out to get them."

She might be right, but I wasn't convinced. Still, there was no denying I was in a position where trying to keep forcing the matter would do a lot more harm than good. For now all that I could do was let sleeping dogs lie – and keep an eye on the dogs, just in case.

"Shiny Boots will be coming soon, at least," I grunted. "By midday tomorrow."

"The Painted Knife and her band the day after," Indrani said, "then Vivienne and Hasenbach the day after. It's going to get lively around here."

I didn't answer, resuming sipping at my brew as I watched Hakram from the corner of my eye. Silence stretched out again, almost peaceful.

"I want to be here when he wakes up," I said. "I can't help but feel that is the least of the least I could do, 'Drani."

"The conference won't be done in a day," Archer replied.

But it wouldn't last forever either, I knew. And if it ended and Hakram had not yet woken up... Gods, how was it a harder decision to leave him behind than to send soldiers into battles where I knew many of them would die?

"Yeah," I finally said. "It won't be done in a day."

It was the coward's way out, but I still hoped it was a decision I simply wouldn't have to make. My mug was nearly empty now, so I drank down the last of the bitter brew and set it aside.

"So why is it that you came to wake me, anyway?" I asked.

"Prince Pretty is about and kicking, the Physician finally cut him loose," Indrani said. "He was looking to speak to you when you have a moment."

I groaned and began to rise to my feet.

"Might as well," I said, reaching for my staff. "I feel like I need to stretch my legs a bit."

"That's the spirit," Archer grinned. "I'll keep watch on Hakram, you go and breathe some slightly more fresh air."

—

I washed myself and changed clothes first. With a washbasin and a cloth, not a bath: the Arsenal had no source of water, which meant it had to be brought in from Creation by barrels. The practical limits to doing that meant it was permanently rationed, and though I could have probably flouted the rule I saw no real reason to. I dragged out a leather hunting doublet – which I'd never actually used for hunting – and loose black trousers I could tuck into my boots, pulling my wet hair into a braid and loosening my cloak around my neck. It wasn't exactly court clothes, or queenly ones, but I had a limited patience for both and the only way I'd ever put on full Proceran royal dress was if they dressed up my corpse. Cordelia somehow managed to make it seem natural, but I had a deep and instinctual distrust for anything involving that many ribbons and knots.

I'd asked attendants to find out where Prince Frederic was before going into my quarters, so by the time I left them the answer was awaiting me. It also had me raising an eyebrow, since I'd expected any conversation between us would be taken care of in a private audience room or either our quarters. Instead the Prince of Brus was currently breaking his fast in the meal hall where I'd found Archer on the day of my arrival. Except she'd used it when it was empty, while around this time there were bound to be more than a few full tables. Well, at least my hair would dry a tad on the way there. I'd somewhat learned my way around the Arsenal, what with all the traipsing about I'd done here, so to get to the hall I needed no guide.

It was a quick enough walk – the architects who'd designed the place had clearly known the Alcazar would be hosting the people who paid them, and so positioned it very conveniently – and I got through it briskly, the herbal brew having finally kicked in enough I could put a bit of a spring to my limp without swallowing a wince every time. The meal hall was a little over half-full, as I'd expected, offering up the sight men and women from their twenties to their dotage in three colours of robes. I would have expected some degree of clannishness but even those who most stuck to their own kind, the white-robed priests, had but a few islands of pale while most were spread out. The mages and the scholars, in red and bronze, were seated seemingly without thought to affiliation.

The closest thing there were to clans were actually the tables with Named, which everyone else avoided. In the back, near the corner, the Blade of Mercy and the Blessed Artificer were quietly speaking as they ate together. Closer to me I saw the Kingfisher Prince laughing at something Roland had said, the Harrowed Witch looking at them warily but also seemingly a little charmed. More than a few gazes turned my way when I limped in, a hush falling over the room. I said nothing, only making my way to Prince Frederic's table and clapping Roland's shoulder in thanks when he made some room for me to sit by his side.

"Your Majesty," the Harrowed Witch greeted me.

"Good morning," I said, then nodded at the others. "And to the both of you as well."

"Better yet for the pleasure of your company, Queen Catherine," Frederic Goethal smiled.

"Yes," the Rogue Sorcerer drily said. "That."

My gaze flicked to the side of the Kingfisher Prince's pale neck, where a thin red line went around with an even neatness that was somehow pleasing to the eye. Hells, if I'd not known better I would have believed it a tattoo. A rather tasteful one, at that.

"This is highly unfair," I complained. "How does the scar make you prettier? Mine just make me look like I got mauled."

I got treated to the sight of Frederic Goethal's eyes going wide in surprise, and the Prince of Brus politely coughed into his fist as Roland loudly choked. I glanced at the Witch, cocking an eyebrow and she reluctantly offered me a nod of agreement. See? It's not just me.

"I thank you for the compliment, Your Majesty," the Kingfisher Prince got out.

"Catherine," Roland muttered, aghast. "You can't just hit on a prince of the blood in the middle of the meal hall."

"I'm just stating the truth," I protested. "Look at Aspasia, she's not disagreeing is she?"

"I have finished my meal," the Harrowed Witch hastily said, "and so take my leave, with your permission."

Before said permission could either be offered or denied, she just as hastily bowed and made her escape. A cannier tactician than I'd expected, that one.

"Look what you did," Roland reproached.

"War makes beasts of us all," I solemnly said.

This time it was the Prince of Brus that choked, but in amusement. After mastering himself he poured me a cup of what looked like warm milk – with honey and something else in, maybe cloves going by the smell? – and offered it, which had my eyes sharpening. This was a rather informal setting, but he'd still poured for me. To an Alamans, which this one was for all that he'd spent the last few years being the darling of the Lycaonese, that implied either intimacy or the sort of admission of lower status that a prince of Procer would not, strictly speaking, need to offer me. Over the years First Princes had often tried to pass kingship of Callow was a rank of nobility below their own office, making it equivalent to that of the lesser western royalty instead.

Cordelia Hasenbach had never tried that with me: even back when she'd called me Your Grace instead of Your Majesty, it'd been with the implication that a proper queen of Callow would have warranted the latter appellation.

"Thank you," I slowly said, cocking my head to the side.

It was a statement, what he'd just done, and he'd chosen to do it in front of more than half a hundred people. Including several Named. The sole Named among Proceran royalty had just implied intimacy and trust in me in a subtle but very public way, which would not be something without consequence. I drank from the cup, and though it was too sweet for my tastes forced myself to swallow. Frederic Goethal had been raised to the Ebb and Flow during an era that Procerans still called the Great War, so I did not doubt he knew exactly what he'd just done. It explained why we were meeting here, even. It also left me feeling somewhat indebted to him, even if I'd not sought out the gesture, which I doubted was a coincidence.

"How is the Adjutant, if I might ask?" Roland quietly said.

I told him, and the conversation drifted towards that and other idle talk about the state of the Arsenal – there would need to be a hard look taken at the tainted parts of it before the First Prince could step foot here – that lasted until my cup and their plates ran empty. The Rogue Sorcerer skillfully took his leave after that, which left me alone with the Prince of Brus.

"I must confess to a degree of restlessness, now that I've been allowed to escape the infirmary," the Kingfisher Prince idly said.

"I can sympathize," I said.

I'd spent a lot of my early years as the Squire going from one healing ward to another.

"Then perhaps you might care to escort me to that fighting pit in the Frolic, Your Majesty," Prince Frederic suggested. "If I do not exercise my arm at least a little I might just go mad."

Mhm. A genuine request, or just an excuse for the two of us to be able to talk in a more private setting? Either way I had little reason to refuse.

"I could use the walk," I agreed.

—

It'd been idle but pleasant talk all the way to the Frolic, which was empty at this time of the day.

Mind you it was an amusingly fresh experience to pass by a brothel with a genuine Proceran prince, an establishment he couldn't possibly have missed even if he was too polite to comment on it. The fighting pit was just as deserted at the rest of this area, rafters empty and sand untouched, although by the looks of the pair of practice swords left at the edge of the stands a servant must have come through at some point. I cocked an eyebrow at the fact that there were two swords there: unless the Kingfisher Prince had ceased using a shield, that meant he expected to be exercising his arm against someone. Unhurried, the fair-haired man went down the stairs and undid the straps keeping the dull swords in place.

"The First Prince will be arriving tomorrow, along with your Lady Dartwick," Frederic Goethal told me. "Word was sent to me overnight."

Quicker than we'd thought. They'd get here the same day as the White Knight, then.

"Good to know," I cautiously replied. "We have much to talk about."

The pale-skinned man took up one of the swords, testing its weight first by holing the grip and then by a succession of swift swings.

"You and I do as well, Your Majesty," Frederic Goethal seriously said.

He tossed me the sword, which I'd half expected. It'd been well thrown so I snatched it out of the air easily. The balance was a little off for me – I preferred a heavier pommel and a longer blade – but I was out of practice anyway. It'd hardly make a difference.

"It's been some time since I used one of those," I warned him.

"So I've heard," the Prince of Brus said, eyeing me openly, "yet the instincts will still be there, and you have the fitness for it."

I might not have been entirely opposed to being looked up and down by Frederic Goethal in different circumstances, but it hadn't been that kind of look: he'd been gauging callouses and muscles, not how well I might fill my clothes.

"Swords and a chat, huh," I said. "Fair enough. I can work with that."

I made my way down the stairs, leaning on my staff, and after dulling my bad leg with a quick touch of Night leapt down and landed on the sands in a crouch, Mantle of Woe billowing around me. Prince Frederic's boots touched the pit floor a moment later with catlike grace. His loose white long-sleeved shirt – with those puffy Alamans sleeves – and silken trousers would have made him seem like some lordling who'd stumbled into the wrong place by accident, if not for the comfortable way he held his dulled blade. Idly I spun my own sword to loosen my wrist, considering how best to approach. He'd weigh more, and be quicker on his feet, but that'd been true of a lot of my opponents over the years. It was hard to decide how best to attack when I still only had vague notions of how skilled he might be.

"So the swords are bare, but what is it we're meant to be talking about?" I probed.

"We have trouble brewing," the Prince of Brus said, "of a most inconvenient kind."

Ever light on his feet he approached, and I tested his guard with a flick of the blade he allowed to touch his but otherwise ignored. The fair-haired man began to circle me rightwards, which I reciprocated in the opposite way.

"You'll have to elaborate," I said. "It's been one of those months."

The prince darted forward, sword going to the side in what I realized too late to have been a feint, but when he struck at a sharp angle that would have hit my swordholding wrist he found instead that a hard blow of my staff forced him to withdraw.

"How unsporting," Frederic Goethal boyishly grinned.

"I don't recall agreeing to swords only," I nonchalantly replied.

He laughed and we began circling each other again.

"I have decided not to press charges against the Red Axe under the Terms," the Kingfisher Prince said, and my eyes narrowed, "though I am not unaware that ultimately means little."

"There was no need for that little piece of theatre in the meal hall, if you meant to throw in with the Mirror Knight," I noted.

"It is a personal decision, not a political one," he admitted. "I have known hatred, how it can twist you. The Red Axe was done great wrongs, and the depth of the hatred born of them makes anything I have partaken of a pittance. I do not forgive or forget her attack, but neither would I see her slain on my behalf."

I slid a step to the side, sweeping low with my staff and baiting the attack I'd expected to follow. He was too quick on his feet to resist such an opening, dancing around my sweep and darting a strike out at my shoulder. Grip shifting, I grabbed the edge of my cloak with my freed fingers and swept the strike into the cloth, nearly ripping the blade out of his grasp. Yet nimbly he went, retreating out of my range before I could try to hem him in. The tricky bastard.

"It won't change that she killed the Wicked Enchanter," I said.

"Or that she tried to open my throat, lack of complaint or not," Frederic of Brus acknowledged. "Unfortunately, the latter of these might turn out to be the most trouble. Though I am of the Chosen, I am also a prince of the blood and the anointed ruler of Brus. The First Prince is of the opinion, and to my regret I cannot disagree, that my attempted killer must stand trial under Proceran law."

"By any reasonable measure she'll get the-" I almost said headsman's axe, but it would have been both ghastly and a pun, "-noose for the Enchanter, which would allow us to sidestep that issue outright."

It wasn't that I couldn't see where Cordelia was coming from, really. One of the heroes had just stuck a sword in the neck of one of her empire's ruling nobility, if she didn't act then she was legitimizing the right of heroes to pull shit like this in years to come. On the other hand, coming from the side of the Truce and Terms, we were going to see more than a few desertions if turned out that we were all subject to Proceran laws. People just didn't trust the Principate that much, and given what the Sisters had shown me of the plotting in Cleves it wasn't without reason. The unspoken conflict of authority between the officers of the Terms and the crowned heads of the Grand Alliance had been from open conflict so far, with great care, but this seemed like just the kind of mess to make it into a very spoken conflict instead.

"If the situation in the Arsenal had unfolded differently, that might have been an elegant solution," the Kingfisher Prince acknowledged. "Unfortunately, the Mirror Knight now wields the Severance and he has ties to the Langevins of Cleves. Whose loyalties have waned even as their ambitions waxed."

The Prince of Brus raised his sword high, blue eyes cool.

"If Chosen striking at royalty is left unpunished," Prince Frederic gravely said, "we believe that my neck might just have healed from the first blow struck in the Principate's next civil war."

TeK

We are the knights who say "Nigh"!

Big Brother

Not Ni, Nye. Pronunciation's a strange thing.

TheAtomicOption pretty sure the difference was purposeful 😊

NerfGlaistigUaine

What is it with man-eating tapirs being described as humble? I mean, I've never met one but what does a mute man-eating animal have to do to be renowned for humility?

TeK

It does not presume to speak out of turn.

dadycoool

It also eats whatever is placed in front of it without question or suspicion.

TeK

Truly, a most loyal subject.

shadw21

If only we could get them, or the sentient tigers, to pay taxes.

TeK

We would have to pay them a salary first to do that.

shikkarasu

What if they paid in Kind, rather than Capital? A percentage of all goods or services rendered rather than coin?

dadycoool

Fertilizer?

zfglx

Are you sure the Tapirs are mute? I seem to vaguely recall that one or more of them tried for the seat of Dread Emperor

Valkyria

No, they were considered, since whoever kills the current Dread Emperor/Empress has a legal claim to be the next one. They did not claim that for themselves though.

Valkyria

There has been an army of sentient tigers though... But I can't recall if they were able to talk. Didn't they also rebel or something?

TeK

Sentient invisible tigers did indeed rebel, which was used as a legal precedent for animals to be considered traitors. However the court ruled that while tapirs were guilty of treachery, they did not meet the requirements to be considered the next Emperor (probably because there was more than one and so no clear successor could be discerned).

Valkyria

Ah right. A most famous tale. Thank you for refreshing my memories.

Nairne .01

This is another argument for man-eating tapirs being humble.

dadycool

I predict a frustrated snarl from Cat at Politics, and not only that, but Proceran Politics, muscling in on her turf. There have been times when I've almost wondered if her insignia has been less than accurate, but then moments like this next arc happen and the sword is joined by a lead weight.

Catric confirmed? Or at least offered? He propositions her in the Proceran way, then takes her on a date that's tailored to her: a ring fight against a superior opponent.

TeK

The last person she was potentially shipped with didn't, er, survive the attempt.

dadycool

Oh. Right. And the one before her lost his Angelic Sponsor, before him was Indrani, who's a Woe and also had her own 'issues' that they had to get through last book, and before her was...the half-fae that couldn't control her powers and they broke up over several related issues.

Possible counterpoints: the half-fae (still can't remember her name) wasn't part of Cat's entourage and chafed because of it, in a way that Captain's husband didn't. Hanno needed to grow beyond merely being a vessel for angelic Judgement, and Cat's ongoing story is that anyone who doesn't immediately go to heel loses something dear to them or in some other way no longer has any other option. I remember feeling a sense of dread when he essentially said "I might join you in the future, but I can overcome the urge right now." back when they were having their nighttime walks.

Indrani's issues had always been there, they were simply boiled to the surface by her and Cat's experience and they are even better friends because of it. Finally, the Repentant Magister was exhausted, her redemption and part-of-the-group arcs were complete, and compared to Cat, Masego, and an up-and-coming Hero that's learning from both Heroic and Villainous sources, she was the expendable Named in a fight guaranteed to kill at least one Named. She might've survived as a cripple the way Cat did that first time (Squire I), but Hakram used up all the good karma, especially since Villains cost more.

Adrian V

Hanno isn't out the picture, in fact the more they try to deny it the more i ship them!!! In fact i am happy Nephele bought the farm!! It clears the way for the one true ship, she needed to die for our ship

MUAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHA*Insert Kira's evil laugh here*

Isi Arnott-Campbell

"In fact i am happy Nephele bought the farm!!"

Big disagree on principle, but whatever. You do realize that Cat's already in a poly relationship with Archer while Archer simultaneously dates Hierophant, right? Without monogamy there's no point to killing off characters for romantic reasons, and while Cat is currently only sleeping with one person she's doing it in a context that very strongly suggests that that's incidental and not a specific feature of their relationship.

Liliet

Poly Person Currently Only Having One Partner Mostly For Lack Of Trying is an excellent take and I wish there were more different poly stories that were just... many enough to be different from each other XD

Letouriste

Special Tribune Kilian . That's her name and current rank. We last seen her In the prologue of this book, on the Morgentor of Twilight Pass when reinforcement arrived. She is with Robber and Pickler.

shikkarasu

Much like Robber; I don't want Kilian in a relationship with Cat, but I desperately want her back on screen.

Insanenoodlyguy

Oh Robber x Cat would be great though. Terrible for the world by and large, but great.

iLissuin

I don't see Catric as being a thing or this chapter as proving it. All this proves is that Friederic is good at diffusing tension before delivering bad news and that Cat will check out anyone hot (especially when it's been a while), two things we already knew. Also, I thought that he was in love with Cordelia?

(Or I might just be willfully misinterpreting things because I really ship Cat with Hanno.)

dadycoool

I could be reading too deeply, too. I haven't read his Extra Chapters yet, so I don't really know who he is, beyond being an Alamans Prince that was brave enough to get a lot of support among the Lycaonese, which is basically impossible. I also like her ship with Hanno, and was really expecting it with their clandestine meetings back in Salia, though at the moment they kinda seem like a couple that are having a somewhat tense break that she's taking a spa day to ease. Or she would if the spa hadn't caught fire.

NerfGlaistigUaine

I highly recommend you read those Extra Chapters because they are amazing and will get you a lot more invested in the Kingfisher Prince. I think the Extra Chapters in general are some of EE's best chapters maybe because they're mostly focused character pieces.

dadycoool

OK. I'm invested. This guy knows what Doom looks like because he's been staring at it practically nonstop for about, what, two and a half years? Three?

Zggt

To be fair, Cat is experienced with the issue of how unreasonable it is that people are trying to murder you while you are trying to save lives. Not a bad choice to look for advice there. I'm half expecting the first line of the next chapter to be something along the lines of "have you tried burning things?"

Burlyraven

Aw, Kingfisher and Cat's first date. The Trickster protagonist and the Name partially built to handle deceivers. Should be a spicy courtship.

Also, I have to wonder what would happen if Cat commanded Hakram to get on his feet? When she commanded him to grab Scribe's throat with a hand he no longer had, his Name provided one. The demons and Severance have probably thrown too much literal and metaphorical scar tissue into the mix, but I do still have to wonder if we might not see a bit of dark heroism out of the orc (especially considering his Villainous Name already likes to bastardize heroic concepts and actions).

thearpox23

"Also, I have to wonder what would happen if Cat commanded Hakram to get on his feet?"

I imagine we'd get another Nauk. And no one wants another Nauk.

One of the central themes of these works is managing wish-lite powers so they don't screw you over, so Cat won't resort to such measures unless she's really cornered.

dadycool

I hadn't considered a deceiver-handling Name thrown into the mix. I didn't even know he has one. Honestly, that's one of those combinations that can lead to either the best Nemesis stories or the most fitting Romance stories. In a Trickster/Clairvoyant pairing, it might involve Cat getting up to her tricks and Freddy content to humor her, armed with the mutual understanding that he could dismantle her fun, but playing by her rules because it's more fun that way.

Cat is Hakram's Warlord and he is her Adjutant. If she gives a Command, he MUST obey. Even if they must together Break the rules of Creation. When you throw in "Dead the hand and Dead the man" into the mix, sooner or later he could very well become a brain in a jar, managing Cat's Empire, in whatever form it might take. Great, all of a sudden I'm imagining Darth Vader, but as a secretary/clerk/whatever.

Burlyraven

Kingfisher's Name is meant to handle the Wolves (he's designated the Dead King and the undead there), the Snakes (the other princes and courtiers), and to be a leader of men. I'm going with assumption that handling of snakes would give him some equipment for general Trickster shenanigans.

dadycool

OK. That actually sounds like a nice counterpart to Cat. Queenfisher?

TeK

Going really deep here.

Decius

Cat can't give that order unless the drama requires that Adjutant obey it.

My worry is that Pickler, or worse, the dwarves have a solution to Hakram being only mostly there.

agumentic

>they don't have to obey Procer, but that's completely different from not having to obey the country's laws

If they have to obey Proceran laws, what exactly stops Procer from passing a law that would demand obedience from all Named? They are subject to the tribunal, but it would be a tribunal of officers from the entire Grand Alliance and Truce&Terms, not any single earthly power, especially one that is still distrusted.

>He could entirely bypass the political trouble for Cordelia and prevent the civil war by doing so

How exactly would making a sharp problem of conflict between the royal authority and the personal allegiance of Named to their leaders even sharper help?

agumentic

Damn, posting from phone sucks.

Adrian_V

To me is less than she will order him and more that he will push his name into it, maybe he will even get a new name since the whole deadhand thing was suspicious and we don't know where it came from. Remember at the end of the day Severance is an aspect, so something name related even if not an aspect could defeat it.

Another angle is that Bard wants him to archive just that somehow since that would "prove" the sword is not enough to kill DK

dadycool

His Name is Adjutant, not Deadhand, the same way the Black Knight wasn't Named the Carrion Lord. It's just a title people gave him that's more "Oh, that's Hakram" rather than "It's just some glorified clerk somewhere."

Tyck

Adjutant's Name isn't going to change unless what Catherine needs from him significantly changes – his entire Name is built on complementing Catherine, that's what it is to be the Adjutant. Possibly his Aspects will take on different manifestations, or turn out to have been damaged by demonic corruption and/or being cut by Severance – I would not be super surprised if Rampage changes significantly or is no longer usable at all, metaphysically speaking, to go along with the physical damage to Hakram's body meaning he can't functionally use it anyways.

CipherSKT

As far as I know, Hakram's spectral hand is a prosthesis, not conjured by name shenanigans.

beleester

One hand is a skeletal prosthesis, but the ghostly one is a Name ability – it just appears out of nowhere when Catherine gives the order.

shikkarasu

I'm not sure she even needs to give the order anymore. He was fighting unimpeded recently, which suggests that he has full agency with both hands. I wouldn't be surprised if it turns into grounds for a new Name, though.

He failed at one of his defining character traits, the one that granted his first Aspect; his durability. It's like when Black was captured. The Black Knight is not a prisoner, so he stopped being the Black Knight. The Adjutant is a warrior-aide, so if he is cut down he is not the Adjutant.

I suspect he will get a new Name that leans hard on the whole ghost limb thing and probably focuses more on the secretarial half of his role.

Shveiran

A bit of a stretch there, in my opinion.

Black didn't lose his Name because he was captured, but because he took a long series of actions that brought him outside the shape of his Role.

It wasn't that he wasn't conquering (he hasn't been conquering since the Conquest when you get down to it) or that he wasn't destroying or leading; it was that he was no longer the Emperor's enforcer. He had become at odds with Malicia and therefore had the choice between claiming the Tower (which at the time he refused) or be human. He could no longer be the Empress' attack dog, which is pretty much what Praes' Black Knights are.

Hakram didn't fail his Role, here, because he didn't fail period.

He set out to do something his warlord deemed essential, and did it despite overwhelming opposition.

He saw her will done. That is his Role, to enforce the Black Queen's decisions and facilitate her work.

He just failed to also not be maimed by a shit-ton of Demons, which, I mean, can you blame him?

But he isn't the Undefeated Champion. Losing is not anathema to his Name.

It could have repercussions, sure, but it is not against his Role.

shikkarasu

Definitely a stretch. The most fun theories are the ones that strain probability, just like some of the best ships will never sail 😬 Not to mention, my fan theories always lean toward hoping that someone will get a giant mecha-arm, or in this case be 35% ghost-limb.

That said, there were 2-3 bits lot of foreshadowing in Books 1-3 about Villains not getting captured alive. I can't find it off hand, but I noticed them in my third re-read after Black was captured. I think EE intended for that to be what took his Name away from the start of the story, but hid the breadcrumbs well. Just like how the war with Procer was a B-plot even in the first book or how the Battle of Camps & Princes' Graveyard were referenced back in Interlude: Commanders during the Fae Campaign.

Cpt. Obvious

Black started to lose the name long before the capture. It was mentioned that even though he never had the largest pool of name power, and that he'd been pushing one of his aspects to the limit for an extended period his recuperation was taking much longer than he expected. There were also physical changes to his appearance, much like the Thief noticed her hair starting to grow as she started to lose alignment with her Name. Note that this happened before she lost the name.

Also if you think back to book one or two Cat experienced how the name powers got harder to use and less powerfull as she actively tried to act against the Name. It wsa also mentioned that this was a sign of slipping out of alignment with the Name and that she was risking losing it.

In the Black Knight's case the name probably started to vane the moment he ignored the order to return to Praes. When he realized just how close to the insanity of previous rulers of the Tower Malicia came when she more or less funded Second Liesse so she could get not only a flying city, which trumps any flying fortress, but also a doomsday weapon of ridiculous proportions it broke their bond, and when he ignored her order the name started to fade.

Xinci

Saying Laurence went feral in the way of the Heavens is a very succinct way to describe how she saw the patterns of destruction and construction societies go through(which does appear to happen in Guide).

I really am quite curious about how the Dead King would kill Christophe. Its a bit tricky, since we don't know the effect of the rest of his oaths but with what we do know.

1) It would be hard to do it with revenants as he has simply become very hard to kill at this point. He's very tough and very strong, perhaps more so than most of the DKs revenants.

2) Use of common soldierly and traps. Again runs into the toughness issue and adding in demons to the traps probably won't work since it looks like his Domain is tied to Light. Which is an issue, when it comes to methods to kill something.

3) He gets renewed at Dawn, so if you could possibly toss him into a Hell he probably wouldn't get the renewal. Given he doesn't have senses like Laurence I doubt he could sense the dimensions well enough to cut his way out there accurately. But if Dawn is tied to Creation in a continuous manner like Winter was, then chucking him across dimensions might not stop it.

4) He has lost his mental shielding since he broke an oath but Severance may kinda make up for that? There is probably an angle for killing him there. He still needs to breathe, so you could get a kill squad and maybe magic him asleep to keep him unconscious and do something like bury him alive.

Anyway, on Hakram, we saw souls will integrate foreign powers/sources, so could you theoretically remove some soulstuff from something else and use it to make a scaffold to properly fill in his missing parts?

Slight ethical issues perhaps but surely the binders know some useful creatures for something like this.

TeK

"Nooo, don't slice this McGuffin, it is the source of all my power!"

thearpox23

You kill Christophe by making him do really stupid decisions. Like having him charge alone into a burning inferno after everyone supporting him dies or betrays or seems to betray him.

You just need to make sure there is no one to rescue him at the eleventh hour, and the fucker will go down eventually. A project to be sure, but doable, and the loss of mind shield definitely makes it easier.

WirelessGrapes

The issue with that plan is that the DK would basically just be punting his big plan years down the line. That big of a sacrifice would 'cripple' him and sent him back, when he wants to take care of the botched Bard scheme. It's something he'd do in the past, but now would result in the same status quo.

thearpox23

Did your comment get moderated or something? Because the publishing time and my notification don't match.

Decius

You'd have to make the rescuer betray him, or possibly be genuine but untrusted.

A little bit of manipulation, and then have the rescue be by Archer but look like revenge for Hakram.

Konstantin von Karstein

You could send him in a sea in Arcadia/a Hell, so he would drown. You would just have to take dispositions so that no one can come save him.

beleester

The trick is getting him there. I suspect that if you tried gating Saint into Arcadia she'd cut the gate apart.

hakureireimu

Separate him from support; he's dead the first time he has to sleep. If he refuses to separate from support, attack where he isn't until he does.

Ninestrings

Fire a crossbow into his throat while he sleeps.

Any villainess with a seduction angle could cut his throat in bed too.

A Femme Fatale knocking off her powerful but naïve good boy pawn is a pretty easy story groove to slide into if you'll pardon the expression.

Konstantin von Karstein

Was the double entendre intentional? 😊

The only way the DK could pull something like that is by having people bred specifically for that need, and good luck to make them interact that closely with the MK without arousing suspicions.

dadycool

Hmm. Maybe kill an attractive woman, make her a Revenant, and put her in the right position? It was able to fool Cat long enough to kill her almost-apprentice. The kill someone and replace them, not the attractive woman part. Of course, it probably would've worked anyway.

vernal.ancient

Probably would have worked even better on Cat than the plan DK actually pulled off

Ninestrings

We don't know DK isn't currently doing that with any number of characters, not to mention faceless soldiers.

It's unlikely, but far from impossible.

Dome Zasrekh

MK has the same weakness as the Saint had: Time, something DK has a Demon for or can craft some sorcery. He is resistant to most things, but that makes him blind/vulnerable to the things he is not. And that's without him being so damn STUPID! Like man, you even know most of your flaws and turn to denial! And Hakram's greatest weapon is his mind, not his arm! hehe

Taichi22

Well, MK's not unlike Lawrence— he'll take a lot of killing but what he ultimately lacks is scope and flexibility. While that's admittedly less of a disability on a combat-focused hero, who can rely upon the heavens to cover his weaker areas, those are still liabilities to be exploited.

Consider: what if Cordelia has him tried for treason and declared persona non grata in all of the Grand Alliance? Any competent villain could make that happen to him, were he without support. Similarly, he's vulnerable now to mind control, and likely, given his inexperience and lack of mental fortitude, quite possible to be turned to a villain by someone as powerful as Ol' Bones, even temporarily. And that's before you consider that he surely, at some point, must tire. And the fact that were the Dead King simply to avoid him altogether I sincerely doubt that MK would actually be able to catch him without a story at his back.

MK's a maul, not a catch-all weapon. Nearly impossible to block, and difficult to handle in the hands of a skilled wielder, but the trick is in not blocking or parrying him; dodge, lock, bind, and go on the offensive, at which point he becomes a liability to the person wielding him.

What happens if the Dead King manipulates him against ALL of his allies? When he's the last one standing in a field of corpses of his former friends?

Mirror Knight fighting the Dead King on his own is like trying to beat a skilled swordsman with a steel bat.

ThatOneGuy

Why else do you think Old Bones is going to enjoy this new disaster? If he plays his cards right there things can happen.

1 – MK goes “true king” route with his heritage, sword, and belief he is the one to save them all. Gets into fights as he waves “heroes are better” banner playing Lawful Stupid while his supporters remove the two current candidates on the throne for him to step up and “accept” it like a good hero king. Then hero boy plays king... Or does the final charge and breaks proving “the folly of fools” moral story.

2 – heroes and villains break away due to political laws trumping treaty laws. Less heroes, more bickering, a low decline until Old Bones drops the axe on their necks or sets out his new territory and calls it a day as everyone falls back to old roles... With fewer allies and named.

3 – actively cause problem by applying pressure when MK is not near by while our old friend/enemy in the tower pulls the needed strings and funds to make everything devolve into a bloody civil war only with her and Bones bringing the clean up crew.

4 – stare in disbelief as heroes talk it out like rational level headed people... But who really expects that?

TeK

It says a lot about this fandom that we are so eager to get on “how to kill MK” train.

vernal.ancient

Well it’s an interesting thought experiment even when you don’t factor in his abrasive personality. When you do, well, that’s just fuel for the fire

hakureireimu

He’s not exactly a likable character.

erebus42

Well yeah. He’s an obstinate asshole who’s actions could potentially lead to the unnecessary deaths of countless. Not to mention he has a very unlikable personality which makes it much easier to be ok with bad things happening to him

alele

“Feral in the Heavens Way” is sorta like Cat’s “Below’s Hero”. Essentially stealing some of the other side’s tricks in specific scenarios. Saint’s conflicts were carefully curated to keep her “heroic immunity”. The way she got caught by Rumena and held hostage showed how she crumples when unable to “legally” cut the opposition. Ironically, she either needed a Band to babysit her or to be the “Final Solution” to a problem. Which is kind of sad considering how in her POV she regretted not reaching X place earlier when Heavens/Providence made sure she didn’t so as to not risk their very sharp, very specific problem-solving blade.

Miles

I think the trick is to not fight him at all. Just get him in hot water with malicias help

Sir Nil

The problem of executing a hero is now a problem of whether to execute them as a breaker of the terms or an attempted regicide. Glad to see one knot is traded for another even more knottier knot.

Konstantin von Karstein

I hope the regicide thing and Hasenbach will be enough to convince the MK.

Taichi22

The thing is, like – Cat could wash her hands of the affair now and be like, “Here, look, I did as you asked – I let her walk free.” to Mirror Knight and still have Red Axe hanging from a noose on the gallows behind her.

Honestly, she could even turn around and tell the villains, “Yeah so I chose not to try her by the Terms because I knew this would happen.” just to keep everyone happy. I suspect there are a few story beats there which might lead towards negative results, but it’s certainly a more mundane option.

Ninestrings

What if they stand on either side of her and both decapitate her at the same time.

erebus42

Truly an elegant solution

Ninestrings

Gods below can these two just cut each others clothes off already.

You wouldn’t seed severance to cut the tension here

Tom

> “If the situation in the Arsenal had unfolded differently, that might have been an elegant solution,” the Kingfisher Prince acknowledged. “Unfortunately, the Mirror Knight now wields the Severance and he has ties to the Langevins of Cleves. Whose loyalties have waned even as their ambitions waxed.”

> The Prince of Brus raised his sword high, blue eyes cool.

> “If Chosen striking at royalty is left unpunished,” Prince Frederic gravely said, “we believe that my neck might just have healed from the first blow struck in the Principate’s next civil war.”

I want to see the Dead King as kind of threatening, but his strategy seems to mostly be “wait for everyone else to kill themselves.” And apparently it’s super effective..

Miles

A heroic axiom comes to mind: Never send multiple bands of heroes to fight the same villain or they'll trip over each other and all die. With the t&t getting everyone together to fight him, they're guaranteed to prune some heroes.

Liliet

The thing about being immortal is that it makes "wait for your enemies to die on their own" a valid and effective strategy XD

thearpox23

Didn't expect Frederic to bring up the looming Clevian treachery, nor for Red Axe's trial under the Proceran Law to be an issue. You'd think being charged in a civil court for premeditated murder of someone in an allied nation doesn't mean submission to Proceran Law. T&T already requires everyone to play nice, which kinda has to include murdering allies, so the Red Axe being punished isn't unreasonable. Maybe if the conviction under Proceran Law was significantly different I could see the argument, but murder is murder. Seems like splitting hairs to me.

All that aside, the tangled mess is just growing larger every chapter, which should mean a good number of chapters in the Arsenal yet. Everyone should find time to talk to everyone, and with my gut estimate that's more twenty chapters or so.

Not that I'm complaining, but it's gonna be a tight fit if erra is aiming to finish this saga this book. Book VII hope?

dadycool

It's only been 27 chapters. Not counting the Interludes, that's the length of Book 1. Accounting for the length change, we might be up to Book 2 in length.

thearpox23

Looking at the first book is pointless. I am going by Book 5, which has 90 numbered chapters, translating to expected 110 chapters for this one.

27 current chapters + 20 Arsenal/intrigue + 20 killing Dead King + 10 killing Bard + 5 something else + 10 Malicia/Black/Praes + 10 afterstory = 102 chapters according to my totes accurate math Thinking on that, that actually works out. But then again, that is all assuming no meandering, and we've just had a surprise base defense, so I'm not betting on that.

dadycool

Yeah, the past, what, 14 numbered chapters have been about the Arsenal, which I personally had assumed would be essentially a meet-and-greet in preparation for the meeting, with maybe something cataclysmic going down due to all five Woe being there. I didn't think the meet-and-greet would BE the cataclysmic event. And all that in four days.

superkeaton

Ah, Hakram, you were just too reliable. Bard's pulling the same trick she did with Black, attack not the master, but the loyal, beloved hound. Trying to unbalance things, give her too many plates to keep spinning.

I still don't trust the Kingfisher Prince.

Konstantin von Karstein

Why? Absolutely nothing that he did was suspicious in any way.

dadycoool

Maybe that's just it? Making himself too pristine, especially after two years on the front lines, which were likely only more glorious than what we saw in Book 5? That reminds me, I never actually read his Extra Chapters. Welp, I guess I'd better get to the Backstory before he becomes a front-and-center character.

Shveiran

Not to be that guy, but are you sure it's fair to express a judgment on how pristine the character is without having read most of his POV chapters? It's pretty much half the evidence we have on the guy being actually a lowe case hero.

beleester

His Name is pretty much built on being ridiculously over-the-top gallant. And he knows this and he's leaning into it. He's kind of like a comic relief role – by being so heroic it's almost funny, he ends up shifting the tone of the story in his favor.

He might be putting up a front in the sense that even when he's not feeling super heroic he still has to act the part, but I can't imagine him turning traitor.

Konstantin von Karstein

Yes, read his backstory, it's why most people have a good opinion of him.

He's making himself pristine as a « fuck you » to the DK, showing Neshama that not even the Apocalypse will stop himself from being badass and impeccably dressed.

hakureireimu

Then why are you spending time here instead of reading his extra chapters? Why? What is wrong with you?

superkeaton

I dunno , I jist don't.

Morgenstern

Afraid of ending up liking the guy? ... or disappointed, after all the hype about him here... ^^°? 😊

superkeaton

He's just too... loyal and reliable. Too reasonable. Puts me on edge, waiting for another shoe to drop.

laguz24

I really want to see the red ax talk.

agumentic

Ah, the return of the Principate Civil War plot, with vengeance. Book 5 wasn't quite enough to deal with that. I wonder if this is the outcome of the last of Bard's affrays.

dadycoool

I think this is a possible Pivot to what the Sisters showed Cat that one night.

Zggt

I've been meaning to touch on the subject of what Cat's becoming. She's not actually had a chance to see the positive results of her actions directly since... the fourth book? It was cheesy, things like a Callowan giving an Orc thanks, but it was also inspiring; it helped Cat remind why she's not wrong on an emotional level. Heroes get inspiration from Above to have the strength to forge forward – at this point, does the war with the Dead King might probably allow an “it would have been theoretically worse under someone else” (something not necessarily true; Above's intervention alongside a competent Queen is something that was available to Cat, and she now has to live with the results).

At what point does Cat understand how trying to make everything less bad with all you have will just give more and more, with no promise of anything good coming out of it? It's been brutal watching her go down this path. At this point she's a bunch of aches and scars, both physical and metaphorical. She hasn't, and won't, get time to heal. By the time it's over, how much of the Callowan in her will even be left? Her story is that of Callow, and Callow and herself are becoming more irrelevant to one another each day that passes because there's a war against the Dead King going on and she isn't there on Callow's behalf. There's a case that at this point, whatever she was in the first books is either dead or dying, and it's been catching up with her body for a while now.

At a certain point, I had hoped that Cat would get her happy ending after setting things right. Maybe a Name like the Rogue Queen, her story being wandering around and stabbing things in the name of Callow's good with her friends while not having to worry about anything else. Now, even ignoring the fact that Black got something similar as his "next chapter after leading the forces of pragmatism against the a-holes of the world for the most important years of his life", and therefore wouldn't be Cat's path (Black was unwilling to compromise on winning and therefore his result was failure and being forced to move on, while she's clearly willing to lose to achieve her goals). The fact is that while Black wanted to beat Above, Cat doesn't really care about winning, she cares about people.

Villains can only get their redemption once they're dead. Cat might think she's made peace with that (yeah, with Struggle being so natural to her, that's a clear delusion), but at this point it feels like the metaphorical boiling frog, and Archer is the only one both perceptive enough to see it and that cares enough to help now that the one who usually does that is in a coma. It's similar to the Mad Queen ASOIAF theory (that was badly executed in the TV rendition) where her disconnect from the people she cares about (usually from them dying under her banner) and being forced to take part of greater and greater battles with bitter sacrifices each time eventually turn "remaining strong" into "inhuman monster". Cat won't allow it to come to that, but the sentiment remains.

And that's if something like "the Crows decided Cat could not do enough to stop the treachery from Above, because it seems the heroes are unable to compromise; fine, let the humans deal with the Dead King's horrors then, and we'll plan to exterminate their entire nations and see how they like consequences for their actions". Or Malicia screwing everyone over. Or most Villains jumping ship after the heroes get away with treason with a slap on the wrist. All of these options are the result of Cat's endless compromises, and all of these are looming threats which can destroy everything she's accomplished.

It feels like she's eventually going to slip and everything will just break. The last times ended with hundreds of thousands of dead. This time the stakes are so much higher. And you have got to know that when she fails, the Heroes are definitely going to blame her for being human, like they do every time. I'm feeling particularly pessimistic.

dadycoool

Yeah, I think "The Girl Who Climbed the Tower" is getting louder in her head, even if she doesn't notice it yet. Callow is upset that she merely chained up the dog that bit them rather than putting it down, so she's losing her home (Maybe Freddy will let her stay with him if she gets banished?) and she's running herself ragged trying to fight the Dead King, the herd of panthers that is the Villain faction, and the Heroes that generally refuse to see any positive side to any Villain, especially one as powerful as her.

Also, like you say, even she needs time to breathe every once in a while. At this point, EE kinda has to call it quits at the end of this book, because the escalation alone would kill Cat, nevermind the fact that stories and luck run out eventually.

Zggt

I think it's really obvious at this point that unless something radically changes, Cat is not making out of this book alive, at least, not in the current incarnation. If there's one thing I've understood now that there is literally nothing a Villain can do or want that will be accepted by those aligned to above. Cat helped wrest Callow from Praes? Oh no, she must be a deeper evil than we thought, let's send a crusade to eradicate her evil doings, because surely the result of her evil can only be greater evil. We sat by and watched all this happen for decades until you had to do something? Ah, you know, uh, how do I say it... our bad? No way anything malicious was involved in that. We're the good guys here! We would have gotten around to it eventually! You could have just waited and we'd have been right there!

I understand Black so much. It would be nice if just the once one of the Heroes would understand that good is not what you are, it is what you do. As more or less every English speaking child knows: Superman does good; you are well. Is it really that hard a concept to comprehend that if something can't be measured in reality then it has no place in a discussion about reality? Is that really such a difficult philosophical point that they'd go to war in order to not concede it? If there ever was a case for Above being a extremist theocratic dictatorship that has no care for the rights of any specific person, it is in that. And Black just wanting reality to slap them in the face just once, so they can stop saying "but according to the results, this does influence reality in a positive way because we always win" – which in essence is a flowery version of "might makes right and the game is rigged in our favor, your opinions are irrelevant".

Liliet

> If there's one thing I've understood now that there is literally nothing a Villain can do or want that will be accepted by those aligned to above.

Honestly, after two years of Cat being a figure of authority FOR and AMONG those aligned to Above, I don't know what it would take for people to drop this inane meme. For a ruler of a Good nation to kneel at her feet while acknowledging the world doesn't deserve how good she is? Oh wait, that happened 😊

caoimhinh

" coming from the side of the Truce and Terms, we were going to see more than a few desertions if turned out that we were all subject to Proceran laws."

Why would that be a problem?

Of course they are subject to the laws of the countries. They were given amnesty of previous crimes, but that doesn't mean they are above the law or don't have to answer for their actions. It's not like this is making them citizens of Procer or servants of Cordelia, they don't have to obey Procer, but that's completely different from not having to obey the country's laws, or face the retaliation when attacking a country's leadership.

Or do the Truce & Terms mean that the Heroes only answer to Hanno and Villains only answer to Catherine?

The way Cat had described it in the early chapters of this book, the 2 of them are guarantors for their respective side's behavior and enforce their abidance of the laws. Not that the laws are decided by Hanno and Cat (there's even a tribunal of high officers that Cat mentioned before) but rather they make sure that their sides obey the laws.

So in this case, YES the Red Axe is subject to Proceran law and has to be punished for the attempted murder of a prince of Procer. Hanno's duty right now is to enforce this as representative of the Heroes. Also, the Red Axe is a Proceran (from Orense), right? As a citizen of Procer she is subject to its laws.

In any case, Frederick is being a stubborn idiot for not presenting charges for his attempted murder by a traitorous Named. He could entirely bypass the political trouble for Cordelia and prevent the civil war by doing so, if he were to actually be concerned about it. Unless, of course, his purpose for this conversation is telling Cat that he is gonna be uncooperative and she has to find a solution on her own.

WuseMajor

Well, the problem is that, if he prosecutes her as a Named vs. another Named, that, again keeps Named in their own bubble where Named get to ignore temporal law, despite doing something that, were she an ordinary commoner, would probably have gotten her killed outright. Basically there's no easy way out here.

That said, I'm honestly curious why she tried to kill him. I mean, several people out there were apparently under some kind of illusion, so she could claim that in her defense. Otherwise, I'm honestly unsure what her motive was. There were enough guards there that she couldn't hope to escape and he was there to prevent her getting killed, so there's no obvious reason for wanting to harm him.

I suppose it could have been an attempt at suicide by cop, where she tried to get the guards to fill her full of crossbow bolts instead of deal with the trial.

...Alternately, she might be yet ANOTHER of the Bard's stooges.

But, whatever the reason, I want to hear her justification for her actions. Preferably from her.

Konstantin von Karstein

She received her Name after facing a Villain specialised in mind-control and illusions, and she's highly resistant to magic. She can't use that excuse.

Mental Mouse

All this is assuming that the prisoner is actually the Red Axe, as opposed to a ringer.

agumentic

To answer a correct comment:

>they don't have to obey Procer, but that's completely different from not having to obey the country's laws

If they have to obey Proceran laws, what exactly stops Procer from passing a law that would demand obedience from all Named? They are subject to the tribunal, but it would be a tribunal of officers from the entire Grand Alliance and Truce&Terms, not any single earthly power, especially one that is still distrusted.

>He could entirely bypass the political trouble for Cordelia and prevent the civil war by doing so

How exactly would making a sharp problem of conflict between the royal authority and the personal allegiance of Named to their leaders even sharper help?

thearpox23

All laws are not made equal, which is an important thing to keep in mind in general, but is especially relevant here.

Nobody cares if some Named smoke weed or violate the dress code of a country.

And should Procer or the Dominion or anyone try to pass or enforce a punitive law there would be immediate backlash and mockery of that law.

Murder, arson, rape, and similar laws are however universally recognized as crimes and bad behaviors. Even the villains who are doing them know that they are going against the social mores where they reside.

There is no controversy here with punishing them for it, save for the weight of the sentence or the perceived bias of the courts. The first is not an issue in this case, since throat slashing isn't something you expect a slap on the wrist for. As for the second one, if I were in Cat's or Hanno's position I wouldn't let one of mine be charged by a county court period because they are easily corrupted. But that ALSO should not be an issue here because the process is going to be overseen by the biggest of wigs AND the event happening in the first place is not in question.

agumentic

All laws are not equal, but they should be, in theory. And there's no exact grading which laws are important and which are not. If T&T enforces one Proceran law, where exactly do they stop? Procer and Proceran princes are influential, and can push the envelope quite far. And since many Heroes, not to mention Villains have problems with Procer, they understandably don't want to bet whether they will or will not be affected.

Besides, I am pretty sure T&T is intended to be a beta-version of the Liesse Accords, and those 100% can't enforce any nation's laws, because even heroic stories can play rough with them, forget villainous.

thearpox23

Shveiran below has a good take on this: "They would(n't) be accepting Proceran laws: murder is illegal in Callow or the Dominion too...

...This is not a matter of Proceran laws, it is a matter of jurisdiction..."

Konstantin von Karstein

On the other hand, not killing her is bad for all members of the Grand Alliance. If she's spared, it mean Named can kill any high-ranking government officials from any of the constituent nations. I really don't see the problem.

agumentic

That would be why it is a problem – they can't just accept and enforce Proceran law, but they can't leave Red Axe unpunished for the attempt either.

Konstantin von Karstein

They just have to enforce the T&T, which also means death for her. And anyway, Named will have to be subject to some mortal law, and at least those of the country they're in. It would be ridiculous to expect Named to above the law.

Here it's a bit different because the Arsenal is not Proceran ground. But they just have to apply the fucking T&T to male the problem disappear.

Shveiran

They would be accepting Proceran laws: murder is illegal in Callow or the Dominion too, is sanctioned by the Drow goddess while on campaign, and is against the T&T.

This is not a matter of Proceran laws, it is a matter of jurisdiction: who has legal authority to host the trial and enforce the sentence, when a Named and a citizen of Procer, Callow or the Dominion clash? What if they are both Named? What if royalty is involved? Does the geographical placement of the crime matter, or does the affiliation of the victim, or does that of the accused?

These are not irrelevant questions, but they are questions of jurisdiction. And they are never as dire or as clear-cut as saying "all members of the Alliance are subject to Proceran laws".

Which is why I'm frankly puzzled. I can see why this would be a sensible topic, and I have no trouble imagining Cat and Cordy sharing a migraine or being involved in a very polite, diplomatic catfight.

But I don't see it exploding like the bomb it seems to be implied as in the text. I guess we should wait and see.

Miles

Named v named is supposed to be allowed.

Also they're not in proper, they're in Callow.

Javvies

Named vs Named is supposed to be allowed under the Accords, within certain limits.

It is very explicitly not allowed under the Truce and Terms (ie, for the duration of the War, probably plus a little extra to allow for the formal negotiation of the Accords).

Juff

Typo Thread:

bed by chair > bed by the chair body fail > body fail,
another limp > another limb,
"Thanks," I wanly > "Thanks." I wanly Indrani shrugged in answer > Indrani answered with a shrug we could," I snorted. > we could." I snorted.
I snorted. That (maybe add again) quite to brutal > quite so brutal it what it > is what it one the lakes > one of the lakes instead, much > instead; much dozen, I > dozen; I kicking, the > kicking; the Archer grinned > Archer said with a grin either our > either of our sight men > sight of men Callow was > Callow as deserted at > deserted as holing the grip > holding the grip unsporting," > unsporting."
nobility, if > nobility. If had been from > had been kept from aknowledged > acknowledged

Miles

I only read half of these but half of what I read here is factually incorrect.

Javvies

Well ... that's not good.

On the upshot, Frederic is mostly aligned with Cat here, at least for the foreseeable future. Hopefully Frederic will be sufficient to counterweight Mirror Knight for most of the Heroes. The Kingfisher Prince is, after all, a Proceran Prince and a Hero. Although the Proceran Prince factor might complicate things with non-Named Procerans, especially with other Proceran Princes/Princesses who aren't traditional domestic political allies and/or belong to other factions in Proceran domestic politics.

Daniel E

From the perspective of Below, a Proceran civil war over the rights of Heroes would be great.

benthelynx

Odd that there would be a civil war during the war with the dead king. Seems a hard sell to the commoners.

beleester

The fear is after the war – once the Dead King's land is conquered and you're divvying up the territory. It's supposed to go to the drow, but some of the princes are saying "Shouldn't we get a little something for our hard work?" And those princes have the ear of the Mirror Knight.

Shveiran

Yeah, actually thinking about that it makes you wonder, doesn't it? The Principate is stretched thin as is, and we know Proceran armies rely heavily on levies (especially now that nearly all Fantassins have been bought and sent to the north front). I don't really see commoners playing along, here, or the Principate being spared famine if it happens.

Also, it kind of seems like a lose-lose situation, no? If the rebels lose, they all die horribly. If the rebels win, the mess in the north becomes their mess to fix, only they have sabotaged the Principate ability to fight that war severely. It's not like civil wars have no consequences or are neatly solved after you win them, after all.

So either the Dead King eats Procer whole, or the remnants of the Grand Alliance repel the DK and then turn south to conquer the Principat- I mean, to bring justice to those that slew their ally and compromised their efforts in the face of annihilation.

I guess they could hope the Grand Alliance repelled the DK but also was wrecked completely, but that sound like hoping you'll win the lottery twice. The GA will get wrecked for sure, but how strong can teh rebels possibly be after a civil war? If one or two Named survive the war, they are kind of screwed... and it isn't like many Named would balk at kicking in the teeth of Proceran Royals who backstabbed the Alliance.

This would make so much more sense if they just waited after the war.

So maybe that was Frederci meant?

"The civil war will become inevitable", not "the civil war will explode right away"?

sengachi

That moment of realization in the beginning, that Cat didn't mean she'd been too tired to go to her rooms but unwilling to leave Hakram alone, that cut right to the quick of my heart.

Liliet

M h m

Morgenstern

Ah. So now we know what those last cards about Cordelia and Shiny Boots were for, before the Bard died yet again, only to be "reborn". =)

Morgenstern

As an aside, dear website-manager:

The chapter link to the right side just ended up in front of chapters 23-26 instead of after them. (Was wondering where that had gone, but just found it.)

Nuke_The_Earth

Ah, yes. Here we are, back at the root of all Catherine's troubles for the past two, nearly three books: the Principate is entirely too full of asshats.

Miles

Seems to be a running theme. If it's not Praesi nobles, it's Callowan nobles, if it's not them either it's proceran nobles. Cat just hates nobles and it's her POV godsdamnit.

Except Drow nobles. Those are cool cause they basically live in the fighting pit just like she used to.

Liliet

Well, she's already made drow nobles be democratically elected every 7 years.

Chapter 28: Contend

"Diplomacy is not an art of peace or a higher calling, it is the act of nations bartering what they disdain for what they desire."

– Magister Haides Katopodis the Elder of Stygia

The sword came forward in swift thrust that I let come close, as Prince Frederic's footing told me it was just a feint.

"My people don't have a great opinion of royalty west of the Whitecaps, as a rule," I said.

Or east of the Wasiliti, south of the Hwaerte and north of Daoine. Callowans were less than fond of foreign crowns in general, was the point, though it would be impolitic to belabour it.

"Not without reason," the Prince of Brus replied.

I limped to the side, baiting an attack with an opening that was seized without hesitation – an opportunist, this one, man after my own heart – and the Kingfisher Prince's sword came swiftly from the side. I spun, putting my weight on my good leg, and swept him back with a swing he easily avoided but set him up for a longer thrust with the tip of my staff. Leaning backwards and edging his head to the side by half an inch, he narrowly avoided the second blow. It ruffled his blond locks some, and I only partly managed to catch his own blow with the crossguard of my practice sword. He was better than Ishaq with a blade, I decided, but not as physically strong. That last catch with my crossguard would have broken my wrist if I'd tried it with the Barrow Sword. The Kingfisher Prince was quicker on his feet, though, and that was a lot trickier for me to handle given my limp.

"I like to think so," I said. "Which means when even I say that I have doubts Gaspard Langevin of Cleves, whose lands are on the frontline of a war with Keter, would be enough of a fool to try something? A claim like yours begs an elaboration."

Of course, he probably hadn't meant a civil war that'd begin tomorrow. Even princes who despised Cordelia – and there were more of those than I'd once thought – wouldn't try to start one in the Principate when it was under siege from the Dead King and swarming with foreign armies it currently required to continue existing. But if this was headed where I thought it was headed, then Cordelia Hasenbach's envoy was going to make her position and intentions clear as spring water. And her offer as well, I thought, because if I knew anything about the First Prince it was that she always had one of those up her sleeves.

"Such a war would yet be on the horizon," the fair-haired prince agreed. "Yet it looms tall there. Before I elaborate, if you might permit an insolence? It has been suggested by advisers to Her Most Serene Grace that you have become aware of what stirs in Cleves."

He came in close, this time. Dropped under the swing of my staff, a half-step took him right out of the way of my sword's sideways swipe and he aimed his own blow perfectly. Unfortunately for him, I wasn't in the habit of playing fair: fingers abandoning my staff to stand perfectly still, I withdrew my hand and just in front of his face snapped my fingers. Eyes widening, he hastily withdrew with swiftness that was too smooth and sudden to have been entirely natural. I took back my staff, beginning to circle him again as absolutely nothing happened. I'd known for a while that the Pilgrim had given a pretty good accounting of my skills with Night, so I was not surprised in the least that the assessment had made it to the Principate's sole royal hero.

"A bluff," the Kingfisher Prince grinned.

"I don't know," I shrugged, keeping down a smile, "was it?"

I was, against my better judgement, enjoying myself. I'd always had a weakness for the pretty ones, especially if they could handle themselves.

"The Augur or the Thorns?" I asked.

"The Circle of Thorns," the Prince of Brus said, "noticed a sudden rise in the antipathy of certain sigils in Cleves towards Cleven forces."

The strength and weaknesses of the Firstborn in a sentence, that: skilled enough to spy on a hero, sloppy enough people who couldn't even speak their tongue could read them. The Everdark had forged them into one of those blades of obsidian they so loved: remarkably sharp in some ways, remarkably brittle in others. Neither of us commented on the fact that we'd both been spying on allies, which was for the best considering neither of us had any intention of stopping. Gods, but what I wouldn't do for spies as good as the Circle of Thorns.

The Jacks were, in truth, better than such a young and haphazard organization had any right to be. That they could operate outside Callow at all was damned impressive, all things considered, much less with the amount of success they'd had. But the Thorns were still several notches above even the best of what the Jacks could do. Imagining the kind of access their long-standing rivals, the Eyes of the Empire, must have back in Callow had caused many a worried night. Even after several purges and Scribe outing part of the network to me as appeasement back in Salia, I doubted we'd flushed all of them out.

Black and Malicia had spent two decades digging them in, it'd likely take just as long to dig them out.

"I got wind of Gaspard's ambitions to expand the boundaries of the Principate," I acknowledged. "And of how his daughter's been spending some of her evenings."

"The First Prince passes along her appreciation of how measured your response has been," the blue-eyed man told me.

I went on the offensive, this time. Came in low, sweeping with the sword so he'd have to parry, and then struck with the staff. In an impressive display of skill, at the last moment he angled his parry so that my sword would get in the way of my staff, then without missing a beat tried to trip my bad leg. I managed to pivot on myself, Mantle of Woe fluttering and hiding away my body as he withdrew his blade and tried a downwards cut. I slapped it aside with the staff and gave ground, which he graciously enough allowed.

"Don't thank me yet," I said. "Sve Noc were livid, and I have visions to share of the kind of casualties the Empire Ever Dark has taking up north to drive home exactly what kind of an ally your man in Cleves is tempting to walk away."

"Given the unpopularity of the current levies and taxes with the people, ordering Prince Gaspard's arrest might result in the current riots turning into uprisings," the Kingfisher Prince said. "I assure you, it is not apathy to the bad faith on display that has stayed the First Prince's hand."

"You know," I mused, "I even believe that. Mostly. But here's the deeper issue behind all this, Frederic of Brus."

I touched my arm with Night and struck out, viper-quick: when the prince parried he found me significantly stronger than before, and in the misaligned surprise of his parry the tip of my staff hit his shoulder once and sharply.

"A Proceran prince is scheming, which threatens the war against Keter," I flatly said. "Proceran politics prevent anyone from doing anything about it, which threatens the war against Keter."

I struck out again, even as he gave ground, and when with Name-strength he turned aside my sword and staff I abandoned the latter and spun about. When I snapped my fingers he thought of it as a bluff, at least until dark light bloomed. A closer look at the purely decorative effect gave me the barest of openings to slug him in the stomach, though he rolled with the blow and so it was barely more than a caress to a martial Named like him.

"A Proceran heroine tries to kill Proceran royalty, which threatens the war against Keter," I continued. "And then another Proceran hero snatches up a unique artefact forged through the efforts of several Named to kill the Dead King and begins making demands, which once again threatens the war against Keter."

I ceased moving, even as he got back his footing and raised his guard.

"Do you perhaps begin to divine a pattern to our troubles, Prince Frederic?" I bluntly asked.

I wasn't blind to the fact that the Dominion was having some growing pains of its own when it came to the Truce and Terms. It would have been hard to when I'd been forced to look those very troubles in the eyes through the Barrow Sword. Yet neither Ishaq nor the Blood were allowing their arguments to become a growing international crisis, so the way that Procer kept foisting its internal troubles onto everybody else was really starting to be a trial on my patience.

"That is the price to fighting this war on our lands instead of yours," the Prince of Brus bluntly replied.

He'd begun to take me halfway seriously, so instead of the almost teasing spar before I got a glimpse of what he looked like on a proper field of war: with dexterity he struck, baiting my parries into overextending and then stinging like a wasp. Even with two weapons I found myself hard-pressed and forced to give ground.

"The Principate is crumbling," the Kingfisher Prince said as he kept advancing. "What few of our youths are not needed in fields and mines are sent north to die in dwarven armour we went into debt to buy. Royalty are now forced to confiscate the necessary goods they cannot pay for, while no grain has been set aside in two years because massive armies must be fed. Horses in the fields go without horseshoes because the blacksmiths were conscripted; fish is taken from the hands of fishermen as far south as Salamans so it can be salted and put in barrels headed north."

With a flashy snap of his wrist, he batted aside my parry and cut downwards at my wrist. I didn't drop my blade, but it was a near thing and I was sure to get a bruise. If the sword had not been dulled, I'd be seeing bone. I chased him away with a swing of my staff, though he retreated at his leisure and without giving openings.

"What you condemn as our fecklessness is in truth the death rattle of a nation of millions," Prince Frederic said. "And while I confess I know little of your people, Queen Catherine, I doubt they would fare any better under this strangling grasp than we have."

"I won't deny that Procer has been taking the harshest losses in a lot of ways, or pretend that our sending coin and soldiers and grain is a true replacement for what was lost," I said. "But neither can you deny that your royalty has not been a constant thorn in the Grand Alliance's side at a time where we can ill afford that sort of foolishness."

"I do not deny it," the fair-haired man frankly said, "for it is the truth. Yet you have a reputation as a pragmatic woman, and so I expect you can recognize that regardless of what is deserved having Gaspard Langevin arrested is not a solution. It is a way to precipitate the collapse of the realm standing between Callow and the Dead King."

That was a solid retort, I had to give him that. And all of it true, if not necessarily answering my grievance.

"I didn't ask for Prince Gaspard in chains, or in a grave," I said. "What I am asking for is for the First Prince to get her people in order, before my own hands become tied and I have to act on this."

"Then the First Prince requests that you add your voice to the Red Axe standing trial before a tribunal of the Principate," Prince Frederic reluctantly asked. "As it would send a stark warning to the House of Langevin, as well see justice done."

Ah, and there we were. The reluctance told me this was more Cordelia than him, but nothing I'd heard about the Kingfisher Prince had let me to think he was a spineless lackey: if he was willing to pass along the request, then he at least saw the sense in it.

"So you approach me instead of the White Knight," I said, "since I'm more likely to be willing to deal."

It wouldn't be impossible to sell to my side of the fence that I'd simply traded the Red Axe's neck to Procer in exchange for concessions, if I could then distribute those concessions. And if she was still executed, then I genuinely shouldn't get too much trouble over this. Hanno, though? Hanno wouldn't bend the neck over this. He might be more inclined to consider if Procer goes to him with my signature already on the parchment, though, I thought, which explained with Cordelia Hasenbach was going to Below's side of the Terms first. Unfortunately, she'd misread me on this. The Truce and Terms were to be the foundation the Liesse Accords were built on, so my bottom line wasn't anywhere as flexible as she might have imagined.

"The White Knight has not ruled," the Prince of Brus said. "I admire his principles a great deal, but it does everyone a disservice to pretend that his political judgement is infallible."

"I don't disagree with him," I bluntly replied. "If the Red Axe doesn't stand trial as a Named but as a criminal under Proceran law, it erodes the foundation of the Terms."

"If Named are judged only by Named, then are two laws of the land," Frederic Goethal said.

I took a swift step forward and struck out with the blade, pressing down on his parry when he caught it.

"Oh, don't give me that shit," I said. "You're a prince of the blood, we both know that maybe in principle you get the same justice a peasant does but that's not how the world actually works."

"Yes," the Kingfisher Prince agreed, to my surprise, "which is why I am wary of enshrining near as unfair a distinction into law."

I was pushed back but slapped away his thrust with the side of my staff, losing no ground as we began circling each other again.

"You can't regulate Named like you would other people," I said. "It's not like making laws about magic or dealing with fae, you're basically dealing with wild horses – if you make the pen too small, they'll burst out. That's why the rules stay limited, not because more wouldn't be a positive change. The point is to establish a foundation, a baseline that future generations can build on."

"If Named do not answer to the same laws as even princes, not even in principle," Prince Frederic said, "then they are by objective measure set above even royalty. That would birth an age of warlords, Queen Catherine. I do not believe Christophe de Pavanie is the kind of man who would use his strength to make himself a crown, but by would other Chosen and Damned not be tempted to seize power if they are above the laws of other men? You would make Named a kind of royalty standing above all the crowns of Calernia."

"If I'd written that in the Accords, you'd be right," I said. "But it isn't there. You can hang heroes and villains alike should they break Proceran laws – so long as the law doesn't simply outlaw being a villain. It's the Truce and Terms that extend these protections, and those last only until the Dead King is dealt with."

A feint with my staff, then I tried to whip at his wrist with the blade much as he'd done with me – instead he caught it with his crossguard and tried to flip my blade out of my fingers, though I withdrew before he could.

"The Terms are the predecessor to the Accords, it is openly known," the Prince of Brus retorted. "What becomes common practice now is likely to remain regardless of what is put to ink. If Chosen and Damned refuse to enforce the parts of those treaties they dislike, those that go against what they have become used to, how are we to make them obey?"

"Force, if need be," I said. "Even the most powerful of our kind can't take on armies alone, much less armies backed by those Named who will respect the Accords as written."

"What you describe is likely to lead to a civil war that would finish breaking apart Procer even should we defeat the Dead King," Prince Frederic said. "The schemes of the Tower set our principalities tearing at themselves for decades, and now the weight of the war against Keter teaches us fresh ways to despise each other. We will not survive a third conflict, Queen Catherine, not as a single nation."

He'd advanced and struck quickly, and at an angle where it was hard to drive him back, but I joined my staff to my sword and that forced him back a step.

"It's a convincing speech you made," I said, "but we both know that ultimately half of it is guesswork and predictions. If the Augur had predicted it, you'd have led with that. So we're left to choose behind the danger I see looming, Named seeing the Terms and later the Accords as a tool for nobles to control them and so walking away, or the one you've described. One I can only see as avertable even should it come to pass."

"Your reluctance is not unforeseen," the Prince of Brus admitted. "Which is why I was asked to tell you that the First Prince is willing to sign the Liesse Accords as they currently stand should you concede in this."

I'd been angling towards his side with my sword raised, but at his words I drew back with a start of surprise.

"Lady Dartwick left me under the impression that there were still months of negotiations left to be had," I cautiously said.

"Yes," Frederic Goethal said, "and on all currently contested issues, the First Prince will concede."

Mhm. She couldn't speak for the Dominion, though, so while this was a significant concession it didn't end the negotiations outright. It'd still be a massive boon and one that put a lot of pressure on Levant to sign on as the terms were, or at least with minimal quibbling. And even should Hasenbach go to them in private to try to use them as proxy to continue negotiating – which I doubted, it'd be too starkly in bad faith – they were unlikely to champion points that favoured Procer without also helping them. It was damned tempting offer, which was nothing less than I should have expected coming from a diplomat of the First Prince's skill.

"Something to consider," I eventually replied.

There could be no serious expectation of my agreeing to this in the middle of spar, much less when I'd not spoken with Vivienne or had a recent look at the articles of the Accords still in dispute. But it was classic Hasenbach to use someone beholden to her yet on good terms with me to present her offer early, preparing the grounds before negotiations truly began – and well in advance of any rivals. Cordelia did like to win before the battles were had, when she could. I did not disapprove. Even her sort of battles could be messy and chancy things when started, no matter how well you might think the situation was in hand.

"A lot of this could be made simpler if you went out and asked for the Red Axe's head," I said. "Her attack could stand trial as both a breach of the Terms and Proceran laws, so we'd sidestep at least part of the troubles."

The fair-haired prince studied me closely.

"The two of you are more similar than either cares to admit," Prince Frederic said.

Ah. He'd gotten that speech from the other side as well, then. If Hasenbach hadn't managed to sway him, I very much doubted I'd be the one to manage it instead.

"I'll choose to that take that as a compliment," I said.

"It was," he said. "And other things as well. It is a matter a conscience, Queen Catherine. I will not ask for a death I do not believe deserved."

His sword rose and I matched it with mine. Circling began again, my eyes lingering on his footing as he tested my defences with quick flicks. Looking for an opening to score a decisive blow and end this, I'd wager.

"That's an interesting stand to take, considering what you've just said about the White Knight," I said.

A deeper lunge, but I was low on my feet and in a swirl of my cloak obscuring my movements I pivoted and let him pass by me – though I wasn't quick enough to catch his back as he passed. We were face to face once more before I could even mount a proper attack.

"On matters of politics, I can and will compromise," the Kingfisher Prince calmly said. "But not on matters of integrity."

And the thing was, I respected that. Admired it, even. But when principle got in the way of itself, a closer look usually gave away that the whole affair was really about pride. I tested his guard with a flick of my staff, found it slow and pressed on. It'd been a trap, and he tried to slide under my guard in the beat where I began to move and my bad leg slowed me, but I'd been waiting for it. Finesse wasn't going to get me anywhere, so instead I bludgeoned at him as hard and quick as I could. It took him by surprise, enough that I drew back the staff and began to press him with both arms.

"I've lived most my life in the shadow of people that would use that rope to hang you twice over," I told him, ending the sentence with a flourish of the wrist.

The strike I'd thought would bruise his shoulder was instead caught with the very end of his own blade, Name-strength compensating for the poor angle I'd forced him to parry in.

"That a principle can be used against you does not invalidate it," Frederic Goethal fiercely said, "and decency is not made worthless for the use the indecent would make of it."

Even with a touch of Night, the difference in strength allowed him to first force away my sword and then rip it out of my grasp. He did not get to take the opening that gave him, though, as I spun around his back and elbowed him harshly. He gave ground just in time to avoid the strike of my staff, and before he could turn on me I'd retreated – bending to snatch my blade up from the sand as I did.

"If the exercise of a virtue is put to the service of evil," I replied. "It is an accomplice to it, regardless of what else it might be."

The fair-haired prince had begun to use his Name more liberally, though he was keeping aspects out of this much like I was refraining from using workings of Night, so I'd have to adjust. I wouldn't be able to force my way through his guard anymore, even using both arms. Bait and flank, I decided. My staff was too long, it'd get in the way, but there were ways around that. Better wait for him to close in on me, though: my leg was beginning to throb so now was not the time to dart about.

"To put evil means in the service of good ends is still putting out evil in the world," the Kingfisher Prince replied. "We can quibble of lesser or greater evils as we wish, but averting harm is not the same as acting morally."

I'd turned this on him once or twice, so he came in careful. I took it as a mark of respect, coming from a swordsman of his calibre. A quick half-step forward, baiting out a strike of my staff that I gave him – he flowed into a high parry as he used his backfoot to quickly shoot forward, already trying to turn the first movement of his blade into the beginning of a strike at the side of my neck. I abandoned the staff, spinning to the side, but I'd used that on him twice now and he'd been waiting for it. A sharp strike of his elbow into my flank pushed me aside, putting me back into the trajectory of his swing if he finished the full arc. I dropped low and instead of pivoting anchored myself at a steady angle, ramming by shoulder into his chest even as he barrelled into me. He was light on his feet, though, impossibly so. Like he'd somehow turned into mist as he reversed his momentum, my shoulder hit nothing at all and I was instead forced into a damned awkward parry to cover my neck.

"Not the same at all," I agreed. "We just disagree on which is more important."

I saw the muscles in the prince's arm tightening as he put his back into the clash of blades and knew that in the heartbeat that followed my guard would give. So I gave with it, using the moment where he thought he'd gotten me to finally pivot around him like I'd already tried twice. I deftly flipped my grip and thrust under my armpit, though just before the tip of my practice sword could touch the ridge of his spine I found the edge of his own against my throat, ready to slit it. He must have begun reversing his swing the moment I began moving, to match my timing, and it was with a degree of admiration I realized that meant he'd read my movements without even seeing them.

"Draw?" Prince Frederic lightly offered.

"Draws are for suckers," I replied, and tried to trip him.

He let out a startled laugh and turned around as I tried to tackle him down into the sand, dropping his sword to try to wrestle mine out of my grasp. We dropped down in a tangle of limbs, and perhaps I did not struggle quite as much as I could have to prevent Frederic Goethal ending up on top of me, holding down one of my wrists. His blond locks were a mess, he smelled lightly of sweat and not even those puffy sleeves were enough to take away from my enjoyment of the muscles under them. It would be bad politics to fuck a prince of the blood, I reminded myself as I looked into very blue eyes, and besides we were on sand.

I couldn't even be sure that he was interested, besides, although... I wiggled my hips under the thin pretence of struggling and got confirmation I might not be the only one finding our position startingly arousing, swallowing a pleased gasp. That knowledge did nothing to curb the temptation, especially not when I could feel his broad chest against mine and his face was so close I'd barely have to lean up to nip at his lip.

"You could have just declined to put forward charges," I said.

The tone came out more flirtatious than I'd intended, but I wasn't exactly biting my nails over it.

"It wouldn't have been as interesting," Prince Frederic replied, voice gone slightly husky.

All right, I could at least be honest enough with myself to admit that if we weren't out in the open – or at least not in sand – I'd be flipping him over and undoing his belt right now. Shit. This, uh, might end up being something of a problem.

"Maybe I'll take that draw, after all," I made myself say.

Best to make this about politics again, I decide, since I didn't usually wonder about how politics would feel between my legs. Although he was a prince, so if I wanted to get technical about it...

"Of course," the Prince of Brus agreed.

The fair-haired man released my wrist and then the rest of me, rising to his feet and gallantly offering his hand to help me up. I took it, still much too flustered and aroused for my own good.

"I get the feeling you're no exactly enthusiastic at the First Prince's method of solving this," I made myself say.

He offered me my sword by the handle, having picked the blades up while I adjusted my cloak on my shoulders. Nonchalantly, he tugged his shirt back into a semblance of order. It still fit him very nicely, I tried not to notice and promptly failed. I reined in my gaze before it could get me into any more trouble.

"I recognize the dangers she speaks of," the Prince of Brus admitted. "But while the necessity of staying them might be clear, it does not sit well with me that we have made a woman's life into a rag doll for half the world to pull at."

She's Named, I thought. We're all rag dolls for Creation to pull at, until enough gives we're only fit to be thrown away. The lucky ones among us got to accomplish a few things. The rest died remembered only as their killer's stepping stone.

"So what is it you'd do instead?" I asked.

The man was an idealist, but he wasn't a fool. He'd know that mouthing regrets at a course without offering another was just wind. The Prince of Brus considered me silently, seemingly sobered by the seriousness of the question I'd asked.

"I would begin," Frederic Goethal finally said, "by speaking with the Red Axe."

I clenched my fingers then unclenched them.

Well, I supposed it'd make a change from all this talking about her instead.

Insanenoodlyguy

"I didn't ask for Prince Gaspard in chains, or in a grave," I said. "What I am asking for is for the First Prince to vote for practical guide to evil on topwebfiction, before my own hands become tied and I have to remind on this."

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Javvies

Well, talking to Red Axe is definitely something that needs to happen – it's not like that can realistically be delayed much longer.

Precedents, both official and unofficial are tricky things.

Procer needs to undergo long term cultural changes if it's going to be allowed to survive after the war.

Salt

That Procer needs to change is as obvious as the sun in the sky. The problem, I think, is agreement regarding the nature and method of the change.

Cat and Cordelia's relationship is... startlingly similar to Black and Malicia's at the start of their own careers. One politician, the greatest of her generation, who would preserve the nation and use or mend the flaws and rulers that exist. One warlord, the greatest of her generation, who is just so damn tired of those intertwined flaws and virtues both, and would like to rip them out root and stem. Both more similar to each other than either would like to admit, and for the moment solidly on the same time, but with surprisingly big differences in enough of the important principles to really matter.

Hopefully, Cat isn't blind to this and does better than her old teacher and accomplice did in the end.

If Catherine and Cordelia work together now, only for Cat to be to Cordelia as Amadeus was to Alaya, 30 years later? That's a tremendous waste of a once in a thousand year opportunity. Pairs of people like this – two consecutive connected generations of them – might never come again.

Ninestrings

Good pick up on the parallel.

This universe is a particularly circular one, vengeance, justice and love forming an interlocking series of gears forcing our characters into the same paths, the same grooves.

An ever turning clockwork nightmare, with the Wandering bard occasionally turning the key and lubricating the gears.

Salt

I think the key difference will be whether Cat will be able to handle doing what her adopted father and even the Wandering Bard couldn't do in the end.

Give up control. Build the foundation and let the next generations have... agency. To that end, the Liesse Accords cannot, can absolutely not, be allowed to fall into the same old paradigm of principled Good versus practical Evil. The versus part needs to be worn away at, from the root.

I suspect that, if she wants to build a foundation strong enough to withstand the weight of all creation trying to batter it back into the same old mold for decades, centuries to come? That can withstand those forces with out her hand on the scales, in the way of the Intercessor, fresh faces and names with their own visions and ideas? Catherine cannot allow herself to be the sole victor at the end of all this.

She has to complete the monumental task of not just being on top, but willing to bend her own neck and snap her pride over her knee even when no one can force her to, finding long lasting Compromise instead of a satisfying but temporary Victory.

MoNa

Why?

Salt

I thought I explained my reasoning pretty well... I'm confused by the question

Liliet

This is a bit of a tangent, but I disagree with your analysis of Amadeus. Snapping victory over the knee and going for compromise is what he's been doing since he won the civil war and acceded to Malicia's request to not exterminate every noble house in the aftermath. Giving the new generation agency was exactly what he pushed with taking on Catherine and propelling her forward, and in fact enforced despite his friends' and allies' disageement.

There's a reason his reaction to Liesse Accords was "this is beautiful"

ThatOneGuy

While it maybe a chaotic mess to tear down the old ways... It is important to remember what is being torn down and what is being preserved.

Callow had a few noble thorns and they were clipped to remove the threat even when it meant killing them through slightly underhanded but technically legal means. Callow is doing a bit better and may end up better once she leaves then when she entered.

The tower? Old rules bent on new ways. Some turned out better... But the old chains just had new dressing. Black's army? Brainwash and killed. Callow? City torched for a weapon. The nation? Killing their own allies to ensure they could not grow last what the old court wants.

Porcer? Old rules? Nobles planning a new war of conquest when they are being killed by undead... And just after they finished butchering each other in mass. The laws? Procer nobles hiding behind their laws to break a treaty when it suits them, but used it to hang everyone else.

maybe not all of it needs to burn... But you had the church try to kill the first Prince to crown themselves a puppet king and after in their own greed fueled self interest. They let some of those thorns and weeds grow far too long and gave themselves excuses while condemning other for the exact same reason.

Hunted Mage and Red Axe both betrayed everyone to Bard. Both are being put on trial for their crimes... The mage made a bargain to get a lesser punishment or for some support for his trial case.

Red Axe plays hero and politics care to nearly get out of a trial.

Now the only question is what she thinks... And if she is part of the mess or just caught up in it.

Curious to see which judgement she would prefer... Or if she is also trying to play the cards to escape punishment for her actions.

Salt

I'm gonna call it right now, the Red Axe is going to be perspective that no one has considered yet: the little guy.

The average faceless commoner who only ever gets mentioned as a casualty statistic in the bigger games that Cat & co are playing. Even here, they've considered every political nuance and issue of greater principle but never once really thought of the victims of the Wicked Enchanter, and the Red Axe is a civilian-turned-Named who had her entire life ruined by that.

Why should the Red Axe give a shit about the Liesse Accords, or the Black Queen's games? What right does the Black Queen have – as Catherine herself raged at the Intercessor for – to “act as if she is the natural mistress of all (their) fates, and (they) do offence by pulling (their) own strings?”

What, because the Black Queen “knows better”? Because she's doing what's “Necessary”? That was the justification of the Intercessor herself, for pulling on Catherine's strings, and she didn't think it was a good enough excuse. What makes Catherine any more justified in doing the same thing to the Red Axe and the Victims of the Wicked Enchanters work, when her own justifications are eerily similar to the Bards?

Liliet

Red Axe does not have any obligation to give a shit about the Black Queen's games, yes. But does she care about the next Wicked Enchanter weighing the risks and rewards and deciding to continue their spree until hunted down, or coming to join the big boys and girls the minute they're threatened?

There's a reason all politically savvy heroes are onboard with the Truce and Terms and the Accords, and it's not because they think Cat should be queen of the universe. It's her project, but it's not actually a project designed to put her on top: she's already on top, all she's doing is making use of that.

Yes, Catherine has paid less attention to the Wicked Enchanter's victims than to, say, victims and potential victims of the undead plague – both because one of those is her immediate job and the other is not, and due to disparity in numbers. But everything she's doing is ultimately designed to help “the little guy”, as abstract as that becomes on her level of power.

...So yeah, you're probably right and I cannot WAIT for RA's perspective to be brought into this ♥

Salt

Oh yes, I don't disagree with you at all.

I just think Catherine Foundling the seasoned and experienced Villain needs to take a step back and remember what it was like to be Catherine Foundling the freshly Named Squire – who would've initially felt very differently than the Black Queen today. I think we're pretty much on the same page overall

thearpox23

>What makes Catherine any more justified in doing the same thing to the Red Axe and the Victims of the Wicked Enchanters work, when her own justifications are eerily similar to the Bards?

Because Catherine holds a political office, and doesn't ignore the conventional governments when taking action. Because for all of her narrative juggling and manipulations, Catherine never once put herself above the theater she is trying to direct. And funnily enough, this specific moral quandary is entirely political and would have to be solved even if the Black Queen was an entirely conventional ruler.

The issue with the Bard were never her justifications or even motives. It were her methods, which made a mockery of the agency of others, and her lack of mandate bar that of Above and Below.

>Why should the Red Axe give a shit about the Liesse Accords, or the Black Queen's games?

If a terrorist genie locked your friends in a bus and you have to choose between letting your friends die and pressing a button that would kill millions on another continent, are you obligated to give a shit about millions of people you know nothing about? Maybe not, but an army sniper is fully justified in shooting you down before you press that button.

Salt

Lol I'm not saying Catherine isn't doing something good, I'm saying that if we put ourselves in the shoes of some know-nothing villager or the average small time Named, instead of omniscient reader-view into the innermost thoughts of one of the more secretive Villains who have an entire dark empire and a god shrouding her motives from view, it's likely going to look like a very different story.

You can't expect every random peasant that takes up a Heroic sword to avenge their loved ones to somehow know the intricacies of rule, and it would be remiss of Catherine to ignore their perspective and frustrations and fears due to convenience – the way Malicia, Cordelia, Pilgrim, Bard, and every other big name player did when Cat was that same faceless peasant orphan who took up the knife.

Catherine of all people should know better than anyone how angry and lost and frustrated the Red Axe might be feeling right now. There was a point in time where the Squire herself was in the same position, except the Red Axe doesn't have the ear of the most influential calamity on the continent to forward her complaints to, one that would talk with her about it with all the patience of an adopted father.

Of course, cat can also understand the perspective on the ruler's end now, now that she's more experienced and been through all the difficulties of those responsibilities. This doesn't, however, mean that she should repeat their mistakes, the ones that frustrated her so badly when the shoe was on the other foot.

Isn't the point, after all, to be better than them, not more of the same?

thearpox23

And I fully sympathize with the Red Axe as it pertains to the Wicked Enchanter. In fact, I would have probably done the same in her place. (Bard's intervention and her attempt on Kingfisher aside.)

I'm just not sure what difference it makes to the final decision.

I still think that it is important to talk to her, both to learn why she tried to kill Frederic and because I fully expect the conversation to lead to something new. But if just taking into account the things you brought, she'd have to bring up something more for it to have any difference as to what the correct course of action is.

MoNa

More established is the parallel between Malicia and Cordelia:

Two bigger purpose people with plans that involve screwing Callow over as a step. Check.

Courting WMDs. Check.

Fighting their struggle against each other across the continent. Check.

Babysitting the nobility. Check.

Knowing that negotiation need not always be from a position of strength. Well, check enough.

Yes this leads to your points, but I feel it's heading more towards Cordelia(the figurehead for Good country) pulling off a judgement bomb. The Malicia that couldn't be. I don't feel there is enough weight between Cordelia and Catherine for their to be anything of the sort of relationship as was between Malicia and Amadeus. Theirs was a relationship of two childhood friends with platonic attachment who rose to power and tried to forge a new Praes. Their was weight to the pairing between Malicia and Amadeus. Cordelia, I feel, just isn't an equal in weight to Catherine like Malicia was for Amadeus. Cordelia is however an equal in weight to Malicia.

Catherine and Cordelia's is a relationship of animosity (Cordelia bankrolled the rebels, then she indirectly funded the Doom of Liesse, then she waged a crusade on Callow) that has now become more pleasant due to a common enemy that is threatening to swallow Calernia. Somehow Cordelia has become romanticised by the readers because she knelt to beg Catherine's aid. The only thing that is evidence of is Cordelia being in a bad enough position to kneel. She remains the woman who refused Catherine's offer of abdication. Just because she recognizes the accord's usefulness doesn't make her the Malicia to Catherine's Amadeus.

I feel the story retains an overarching narrative between Catherine and Amadeus. That implies mirroring yes, but I don't imagine it will take any such form as this. Malicia seems to be posturing to pull a dread empress and Cordelia is preparing to pull a judgment bomb. And she probably will because Intercessor is getting serious and she has weight, and besides we have to see the impending WMD from the side of Good be set loose, and by parallels – Akua pulled of her Doom of Liesse for Evil, it's time Good does its own disaster- I feel it needs to happen. If Malicia pulls of her Dread Bomb (and by the weight behind her it will be BIG), then it follows that, seeing as Good got denied at first Liesse, and it's not done anything comparable to the Doom of Liesse, whatever Cordelia does might just end up being bigger.

I won't be surprised if the judgement bomb is something of the following magnitude: "What is the sword of judgement without the judgement" – Mirror Knight. That Hanno's coins without the judgement is just a coin. What I'm getting at is that judgement bomb could just be an indiscriminate coin flip with half a chance to kill the dead king. How far its range extends is the question. I can't speak for how disastrous what Cordelia will pull off will be, but I imagine the magnitude of sour tasting would be comparable to the example I imagined.

I think the parallel could be either Amadeus and Catherine preventing the thing or killing the culprits: Malicia and Cordelia.

TL;DR: Cordelia is in parallel with Malicia. She doesn't have the weight or the pleasant history with Catherine to make the kind of pairing Amadeus and Malicia had. She does seem to be preparing a Judgement bomb to rival Malicia's Dread bomb; which probably will be let loose because of Intercessor's weight and the fact that Good Bombs have been denied up to now and there is momentum here since Good also deserves some fireworks of its own when Evil is getting to do its Dead King invasions and Doom of Liesse's. I feel the parallel we are far likelier to see is Catherine mirroring Amadeus slaying Malicia by slaying Cordelia.

Zggt

The difference is that Cat does not see people as cogs in a machine. As opposed to Black, she does not need a Malicia to override her when she ignores the people for the plan. That's why Malicia could stop Black in the first place. Surprisingly enough, I see more of Black in Cordelia; that call for a Crusade with all the death and destruction that entails due internal issues was pure Amadeus, and something Cat just isn't. Cat learned a very painful lesson about the limits of pragmatism like that imposes on things like "basic trust".

Big Brother

Oh, the fact both of them are rather turned on by the other is an amazing reveal, and not an unwelcome one in the slightest.

caoimhinh

Well, nearly everyone is rather turned on by Catherine and vice-versa.

And the Kingfisher Prince is almost like the Shining Prince – Exiled Prince in levels of beauty.

It was more inevitable than Thanos.

Salt

Don't you dare do my boy Thanos dirty like that, them's fightin words

Liliet

I love that it apparently strained Catherine's self-control more to not transition to erotic activities with Frederic right in the fighting pit (WHICH IS IN PUBLIC, THEY ONLY DON'T HAVE AUDIENCE BECAUSE NOBODY HAPPENED TO BE THERE AT THE TIME) than the entire conversation with Mirror Knight. We didn't hear "made myself say" there at any point ;u;

Mental Mouse

Frederic knows how to flirt with a dangerous woman!

Liliet

I won't lie, they fit together very well...

NerfContessa

Agreed.

Especially since his views can offer a good base for cat to ground herself in not going to far.

I ship it. And I rarely do. 😊

He Who Hungers

I'm a sucker for the eroticism of sparring. I also think the Kingfisher Prince is awesome so this delights me.

Burlyraven

Yeah, I'm wondering how many twists (probably mostly expected, but still twists) are going to come out of a conversation with the Red Axe. There's been a lot of set up around her and her story.

And finally, outright confirmation that this is a spicy romance story between Kingfisher and Cat, and not just sport flirting. No guarantee it goes anywhere, and there's even been some hints that it could become a love triangle with the First Prince (Kingfisher did propose to Cordelia, and Cat's made it obvious that she's not blind), but hey, romance is romance.

Liliet

"Settle down, libido, settle down! We don't even know he's interested!"

"There's a way to check"

"...Shit"

Ninestrings

They would make beautiful and intelligent children.

Just a little cluster of pretty antiheroes and antivillains.

Everyone absolutely confident they are right.

EE here is your sequel series, you're welcome, no charge.

S M

INJUSTICE! To assume so boldly that such things have not been already dreamed of! The scandal! The entitlement!

Adrian V

Yes talk to her, for starters she possibly has information and we still need to know why she tried to kill him too since i think it was aluded she is immune to magic, at least to illusions.

Salt

I don't think her motivations for trying to kill Frederic were due to anything as fragile/frivolous as magic. This is a working of the Intercessor, not some Praesi whelp of a mageling – she cuts to the heart of what makes people tick.

Most likely it's as simple as pushing on her buttons regarding what was actually done to her and her friends/family before she became the Red Axe. I suspect it is nothing short of horrific, the kind of horrid mess that the Saint of Swords used to clean up back in her day.

If you are a heroine who is a heroine solely because of a particular trauma, one bad enough to put you into the role of a gritty avenging hero all on its lonesome, it probably isn't too difficult for someone with the savvy of the Bard to nudge you into thinking that anything (even temporarily or possibly) protecting the Villain who did such a thing to you is an evil in itself.

Adrian V

I meant that the HM couldn't have tricked her into doing it, or anyone else, she decided it was a good idea and we have no clue as to why.

Salt

Oh I wasn't disagreeing on that one, I just have a strong theory (personally) about why. I think if we put ourselves in the Red Axe's shoes it becomes quite obvious:

I mean, she was some ordinary person who turned into a Hero because the Wicked Enchanter mind-controlled and did some things to her and her civilian loved ones that apparently even Indrani thought was pretty sick. It was bad enough to sit ill with -Archer-.

One day after becoming named, you happen to have a chat with a passerby named Marguerite, a quite reasonable girl from a town called Ballions. It happens to come up that this awful "Wicked Enchanter" is now protected by "greater powers". The Black Queen and the First Prince and all those other high-and-mighty puppet masters would deny you the justice you deserve, not giving a whit about the suffering you went through. They want to protect and excuse this piece of shit out of mere political gods-damned convenience.

You don't know much about the Liesse Accords, what Catherine's game is, what the political situation is, and honestly you don't much care. Whatever else Truce and Terms are, they're protecting the same man that tortured and massacred your friends and family for fun and profit. So when Marguerite suggests that maybe it's about time someone brought these assholes back down to earth, you don't even question it. She's right.

Why shouldn't you be angry? Why should you care about these "great" rulers and their politics and plots when none of them gave a shit about you and your old dad and ma? What gives this Black Queen the right to do these things? Because she's powerful and somehow knows better?

No. You give the Wicked Enchanter what he damned well deserves the first chance you get. They throw you in a cell to stew in your own anger, for the crime of caring about your now dead loved ones instead of seeing them as numbers on a paper. And when you find out that this kingfisher prince was sent by the "Black Queen", that even this so-called Hero is one of them, the people who would let Villains like the Wicked Enchanter trample over common folk for their own cold designs?

You see red, and take a swing.

Javvies

Only problem with that theory is that Red Axe didn't take a go at Kingfisher Prince right after he said he was working with Cat.

Red Axe waited until after Kingfisher Prince had successfully talked down the mundane guards, and additional Named had arrived.

She waited until after it was clear that there was no imminent violence, with Kingfisher Prince having his back to her and his weapon on the ground, and talking to other Named – including other Heroes.

Salt

You make a good point! It seems much more premeditated than impulse in hindsight.

Although it's worth mentioning that she didn't exactly wait long after the very first opportunity presented itself – he only put his sword down a moment before nephele arrived to break the illusion. There was a gap in time about five or six sentences long between him laying his sword down and her attempting to behead him.

Liliet

I like your analysis overall!

Nitpick:

> did some things to her and her civilian loved ones that apparently even Indrani thought was pretty sick. It was bad enough to sit ill with -Archer-.

Indrani's childhood consisted of being groomed to be a sex slave, and the first part of her first interaction with Ranger was wondering whether she was paying attention to her because she liked kids in that way and whether she would submit or try to run and get herself killed if she pays enough to get her owner to agree to that.

I think it doesn't take much more than "yep, he's a rapist" to be personal for 'Drani, here.

It also doesn't take more than that to be a major trauma obviously, making this a nitpick lol

My suspicion about the attack on Frederic was that it was an attempt at suicide by cop: note that first she was trying to talk him into abandoning her / giving her up, prompting his thoughts on quality of callowan wine. When it became clear that wasn't working and she was about to be thoroughly protected, she took the one action she could think of that would definitely set off all the 20+ crossbows aimed at her at the moment and not have her subdued before she comes to any harm.

Why?

- Bard told her it would be a good idea;
- she doesn't want to cause trouble for the T&T and is under the impression that getting killed before the trial would dissolve the issue;
(note that Cat considered the Sinister Physician's offer to do just that, and it came down to sheer principle and personal precedent - practically speaking Red Axe dying in that encounter WOULD help)
- she feels bad about breaking her word to Archer and Co and never intended to survive the attack anyway;
- has a pathological fear of trials and judges;
- insert your own version here.

It's just the one way I can reconcile her behavior around Frederic without assuming she is a fantastic actress or mind controlled.

There's probably other explanations out there too, but currently I'm seeing this one as the simplest.

Salt

That's true, I might actually like your version of it better. That kind of story just reeks of the Wandering Bard.

Juff

Typo Thread:

in swift thrust > in a swift thrust Dropped under > Dropping under bluff," the > bluff." The know," I shrugged > know." I shrugged strength and weaknesses > strengths and weaknesses has taking > has been taking Alliance's aside > Alliance's side as well see > as well as see explained with Cordelia > explained why Cordelia then are two > then there are two but by would > but would
It was damned > It was a damned middle of spar > middle of a spar matter a conscience > matter of conscience quick a I > quick as I ramming by > ramming my you're no exactly > you're not exactly

laguz24

Oh so finally we are finally going to talk to the girl who started this whole mess. Also in response to what was above, "in addition to the cardinal school sequel". I do enjoy romantic subtext in my fights.

Big I

I've been wondering if the Red Axe becoming a Villain would be the compromise that gets her out of this alive since this mess started. I guess we'll see soon enough.

Liliet

oooooooooooooooooooo

beleester

Interesting thought, but I don't think that would help. A Villain killing another Villain is still something Catherine needs to punish to maintain discipline in the army – she can't allow a precedent of Evil backstabbing Evil. And a Villain attempting to kill Proceran royalty is still something that Procer needs to see punished.

I suppose saying "The legal system can treat a Hero as a Villain if their actions merit it" might make the Mirror Knight think twice about starting a rebellion, but I don't see how that saves the Red Axe's life.

Abrakadabra

I had similar thoughts. If it is a bad idea that the Red Axe is judged by Both sides, maybe she could be judged by Sve Noc instead. Or even sent to the drow to the norther front as a punishment.

agesbe

This is not helping my shipping goggles dangit. I actually don't think that Cat's story is going to end with her in a relationship at all, but in the meantime, I can hope.

dadycool

She seems too focused on her work to have a solid relationship, but the same could've been said of Captain and Black's Orc general. Cat also seems to have the type of story that ends with her corpse, but it's just as likely that she would in fact retire to exile. She could follow a Napoleon Bonaparte ending, a Yoda/Obi-wan ending, or any number of others, including diplomat, headmistress, mother, sentinel,...

Salt

There is still that old dream of going with Indrani in the far future, when after the end of it all she wanders off into the next great sunset, like they talked about before. I'm sure someone like Archer wouldn't exactly mind having more eye candy tag along.

Really the only way for her to have a peaceful life in the end would be to let go of political control and old stories, that act as both a sword and chains at the same time. Let Vivienne pick up the political slack, whichever next generation of Named to build on her foundation. Grab as many loved ones as she can and take a hike, maybe make another cameo later on as a deus-ex-machina wise advisor from the previous generation, in their successors time of greatest need.

Liliet

Cat doesn't really want to chase the sunset. She wants to be the one waiting at home and keeping the fire going.

Of course nobody says that home has to be on Calernia...

DreadChord

Her talk with Hakram about wanting to rule Callow for herself... That plotline might have for a while looked like it was thrown out of the window with Vivienne but the return to the Hakram roots with his being relevant enough to get a sleeping beauty treatment seems to imply that their whole warlord relationship and the story ending with Catherine being a ruler of Callow or more is back on the table. Also, that prophecy about Hakram growing into being a real terror in a few years, implies by extension that Catherine's not sailing off into any sunset.

The story has skirted around Catherine's desire for power, but there have been elements of Catherine's want for it even while the Hakram talk moment was left lingering in the back. Her anger when Juniper+Vivienne had Catherine checked for fake had an element of pride being trespassed. Her desire for rising in the ranks "for Callow" had tones of justification for power talking. She may not be spending power on luxury, but she wasn't raised for it. She appreciates power for her means to end thing, but she'll likely have to stick around for her accords to hold, which means retaining power to solidify it for long term.

Hakram may claim to follow Catherine the girl, but no, he's the Adjutant, and he follows Catherine because she enables him to be the most he can be as he likes to be. He wouldn't be following her if she sailed into the sunset or decided she was gonna be a fisherman.

The story might have been two-timing the "sailing of into the sunset" and the "wanting power" narratives but I feel at the end the people she loves are Praesi and both the "girl who climbed the tower" and the "her being more Praesi than she realises" thread lead me to believe it's the "wanting power" narrative that will get committed to. When the "man I loved most in the world" (Hakram) is involved in the "wanting power for herself" thread, that makes me believe she will be Queen or Empress or something of a major authority.

This isn't and hasn't ever been a Lord of the rings sailing of into the sunset kind of story for Catherine. The point of that was that Frodo didn't get recognition for his deeds and sailed off without the deserved recognition into the sunset to heal. From Juniper and Aisha's memoirs to the Drows yet to be written holy book, Catherine gets mentioned proudly. It's fine if you want to squeeze and match Catherine's story into LOTR pattern, but it isn't thematically Catherine's story, because as I say, if Callowans are boasting about Catherine's espionage at Keter(as is told to us in Aisha Bashiras memoirs, is a common thing), it means that contrary to that scene where Juniper and Catherine talking about them being remember if not necessarily remembered fondly, they'll be both remembered and remembered fondly. It doesn't fit the Frodo mold.

Catherine at some point said stuff about not wanting to rule because she wouldn't be a great ruler is easily contestable. She's become the best one for the job. If that thread about wanting power for herself is getting picked back up as I believe it is; then that means she is going to be both highly capable at it and also someone who wants it.

Archer may yet fit the Frodo mold and sail off into the sunset, but she isn't injured, has the woe and Masego to anchor her in Calernia, and might have grown out of her restlessness. I think the Frodo treatment will be Rangers thing. Maybe Amadeus dies, and seeing as her mother has left for the elf country, she follows because there's nothing for her left in Calernia and she wants to fight the strong people on the other continent(s).

This is a strange romanticism to demand, that Catherine not wield power and let others take the reigns. She wants it. She is the best at it. None of the "new generation" have shown to be even remotely capable of wielding it. Why wish she leave the reigns for the tired cliché of the old dying so that the new may grow? That cliché is worn out to bits, and I feel gladly left with Tolkien's twig descriptions and other tired tropes.

Salt

She doesn't want to keep power though, or at the very least she very clearly understands that she's a necessary evil but still an evil, and cannot allow herself to remain in power.

She's repeatedly, plainly mentioned that her crown ever sat ill on her brow. She had plans to abdicate as far back as the tenth crusade, and we know for a fact that those convictions only grew stronger by the very recent conversation she had with the ghost of Good King Edward Fairfax when she came back from the Everdark.

> I inclined my head.

>"One should not confuse striking at evil and doing good," I quoted.

>"Lest good become the act of striking," the Good King completed, tone approving. "You understand, then. That when your evil is no longer necessary, Black Queen, to linger would be to stray from the narrow path you have tread."

>My fingers clenched. "I know," I croaked out.

Everything she's done up till now has been for the express purpose of making sure it won't all fall apart when she's gone. When she talked with Hakram after the crusade about how their foundations are weak, how if she dies then everything falls to pieces. About how she's trying to make the Llesse accords outlive her. When she spent several volumes intentionally grooming Vivienne to be her political successor, and publicly proclaiming it in front of every major power on Calernia at the peace conference.

The story repeatedly screams that Catherine needs and wants to let go of the reins at the end of it all, while mentioning as a side note that it'll be difficult, so I'm not sure where the idea that she's going to be a Forever-Queen comes from.

DreadChord

"She doesn't want to keep power though, or at the very least she very clearly understands that she's a necessary evil but still an evil, and cannot allow herself to remain in power.”

This has never been a story rooted in platitudes as such. Amadeus and Catherine’s personal moments and individual reflections on the heros both show that neither are ones for platitudes. “She’s a necessary evil, but still an evil”. That’s a platitude if I ever saw one.

Why would you group her as evil that needs to go in the first place? Because her methods of enforcing law are brutal? The often and not entirely silently worded difference between Catherine and the stock heros in the first place is that the heros would doom large amounts of people on matters of moral behaviour and principal, yes. The underlying theme of Catherine/Amadeus brand of evil is that they’d rather hang/kill potential troublemakers than risk rebellions and conflict that leads to costlier ones in the future. To call this Evil in the first place is unfair and a thing of branding, because this is merely callous decision making. Why is killing a dozen to prevent thousands dying evil and necessary to be removed? When did matters of life and death even become the criterion for what is better or worse? It is easily arguable that a handful of people dying is worth lower taxes for a nation. Why do you assert that she’s a necessary evil that needs to go? I believe she’s the only in place inheritor of Amadeus practical evil legacy(their is no evil of the new generation of the Amadeus brand practical if Catherine sails off to Valinor).Their established practicality of the Amadeus-Catherine brand of evil hasn’t been challenged in any remarkable way except Amadeus’ little midlife crisis where his selective protectionism of Callow-Praes interests compelled him to burn down Proceran granaries and starve thousands; something that comes from his selectively protective nature. It’s hardly an argument for Catherine having to leave.

The only fault we have to particularly attribute to Catherine’s “Evil” is her aggressiveness and her shortsightedness, both of which she’s grown out of. The aggressive/shortsightedness component even being one that is partially attributable to the Squire persona (cock worship all that).

There I should have established why Catherine has no major internal fault that makes it necessary she leave.

Now for external. We have for that:

1) The hero's boner for taking out the villain queen, being a potential problem for Callow that it could do without. Handled to a fair amount with Catherine's improved rep. Also, the Truce+Terms and Liesse Accords should see to them getting a collar on the neck at that.

2) Grey Pilgrims claim that her Evil presence makes those around her Evil. Grey Pilgrim is hardly an objective person, having proven that time and time again with Intercessor that to justify his protectiveness he'd go through all sorts of Mental Gymnastics. It's probable that to justify his Black like stomping of the villains of the west the guy has been inventing for his convenience all sort of storys (and believing them to) such as this: that Evil, like a drop of ink or a horde of zombies somehow infects all those it touches and leaves the water forever tainted.

When he was making those claims and Catherine was dilemmaing about it she was under the influence of a combination of the guys old man manipulative charm+Choir of mercy Tattletale manipulative powers and her callowan preconceptions of the inherent rightness of hero's. She'd still not made her peace with the practical side. She still hasn't but she's less deluded.

Catherine has a pretentious habit of arrogating claims to personal fault wherever she can find opportunity to do so. Talbot and the Callowans want to do operation bonfire. 'No it couldn't possibly be the Callowans ingroup nature's and the simple fact of the crusade being an existential crisis. No it couldn't be that Callowans aren't really all that heroic. It must be my special aura that makes people be villains, thank Tariq for finding me yet another way to blame myself. I was having some trouble pretending I personally executed the Doom of Liesse; some of the 15th legion kept asserting I couldn't take credit for that.'

More importantly, while its probable magic auras as such might exist due to this world's story nature, wheres the evidence that Catherine's aura is turning them into Akua's instead of say Catherine brand practicals? I have already asserted that I believe that Catherine's evils are simply better than Goods platitudes because believe net benefit and surplus trump's matters of principle not only in tangible trigger buttons like trolley problems, but other practicalites such as a handful of life traded for food surplus for a few thousands being a good trade (Not that Catherine is brave enough for the latter example).

On a sidenote: would that the plotline of bloodsacrifices wasn't abandoned as it was with Amadeus' handwave of "they(the nobles) continue to practice blood sacrifices even when they don't need to". The natural direction I feel was to get into what happens when the population of Praes-Callow has reached the equilibrium with food production... that Catherine's whims of not using the life's of men fated for the gallows to fertilize the field be challenged. That she grow out of her callowan hypocrisy. Instead not only is that thread forgotten, in matters such as the Drow war of chains(averted) and the Twilight ways original blood sacrifice to use ticket(averted), Catherine fortunately and conveniently gets the easy way out of getting character growth through actually tough decisions that actually challenge her preconceptions.

3)Most importantly, would war magically up and pack away if Catherine leaves? If it was possible to stop conflict through posturing Vivienne Darthwick as successor, Calernia must really have been blundering with their rich history of countries like Procer's frequent civil wars that didn't involve named. Wars will happen despite it. Vivienne is neither weighty nor as competent as Catherine. Their will be conflict as there ever was no matter how many leashes Catherine puts around the Nameds necks. Catherine has surfed the waves of the economic and social struggles that result in war, but they didn't come to be because of her. They would therefore not cease to be despite her.

The external factors done with, all that leaves us is with Catherine, competent and charismatic, qualified as Cordelia in politics. She's caught up well to the job.

"The crown ever sat ill on her head". Maybe she should try scotch tape. Once it didn't. But I think I've already done the arguments for why Catherine is no longer an amateur at rule.

On Edard Stark the Seventh, let's forget my arguments that Catherine's brand of practical evil doesn't need to go and is infact better for Calernia to stay. Why is the undead Callowan king been treated as the wise all-knowing man? Good kings... More like all the Callowan kings should be called Kings of Platitudes. Callowan kings are somehow convinently the voice to ever affirm Catherines Callowan beliefs on Good and Evil. She gets challenged on them, sidesteps the matter, and occasionally and convinently a wise Grey Pilgrim or Good King comes over to affirm her echo chamber. I feel, by momentum,it's time, in book 6, that Catherine will finally have to face the wall of truth. It's been hinted at too long. She needs to be challenged on her Callowan qualms and her belief+justification complex that she isn't fit and doesn't want to rule because behind the veil of excuses I see that she is both very competent at it and she appreciates what power can do for her desire to enforce her will on Calernia's natural state of intra-continental conflict.

Setting up heirs and institutions is also a royalty practice to solidify one's reign. Catherine may have set it up because she wanted out to go adventuring with Archer, but the thread also goes down the path of rulers in real life history who established actual dynasties that lasted. I'm not saying necessarily Catherine's child becomes king; dynasty is the one that will happen. I'm saying any ruler who wants to rule long sets up a list of heirs and institutions to back him up.

I think I've gone at significant lengths to highlight that Catherine has in her both a veiled but present desire for power and momentum that implies she's not sailing off to Valinor but is gonna rule instead. I won't belabour that point since I think it clicks into place with the points I've stated above in this reply anyways.

Salt

Bruv, when I'm the one quoting the character Catherine Foundling and you're the one talking about how everyone including the character is wrong about her motivations, I think at that point I'm not one who's putting forward some pretty wild fan-theories here. Lol.

Casey Glick

Hakram is the Adjutant, who is there when Cat needs him, and can help her do what she cannot at any given time. Cat also needs to transition away from fighting; she is far too valuable to be on the front lines. Therefore, being at the back and doing paperwork and diplomacy is EXACTLY what Hakram needs to be doing for her.

Ninestrings

I hate to be that guy but a hero seducing a villainess gets the villainess killed about 90% of the time.

This could be a genital based assassination attempt.

dadycool

Hero and villainess falling in love, villainess either sees the error of her ways or has an “Enemy of my enemy” moment after her superior scorns her, and the villainess dies one way or another, which spurs on the hero to save the day.

Fortunately, not only does Cat not have any superiors, her entire worldview is based around what she learned from Black and subsequently confirmed with her own experiences, which included a better Above religious education than she got from the House of Light. There’s also not the classic “Ice-queen that has never felt true love before” because not only has she lost Winter, she’s had several lovers that we’ve known of, two of which either were or are within her closest circle (thinking of Killian and Indrani). Finally, her hesitation was essentially “This is politically awkward, we’re in the sand, anyone could walk in on us, and my baby is getting strangled. Maybe later.”

Liliet

Her what?

But yeah this is the ‘promiscuous warrior queen has a fling with a passing hero that either lasts until first serious disagreement or for the rest of their lives on and off extremely non-exclusively’ trope, if any, not that one.

dadycool

Hesitation was probably the wrong word. Reluctantly setting it aside, maybe? Or putting it off until later?

Or were you asking about my “her baby” comment? That’s essentially what the T&T are, right?

Yeah, this has the fragility to either collapse immediately or get fortified to an absolute amount. It’s kinda funny how Cat has had one of each on-screen.

Liliet

Oh, I meant the baby comment 😊

Dome Zasrekh

I hate it when you are That Guy too. Especialy when i soooo dont want it to bee the case!

vernal.ancient

I don’t have anything to add, but “genital based assassination attempt” is a hilarious phrase that should see more use

LaconicLoris

It's worth noting that a relationship between prominent partisans of above and below has implications, especially considering that Cat's end goal is the accords. It has symbolic weight, especially considering that Hanno is liable to be replaced, and Frederick might be a leading candidate.

sengachi

On the one hand, the politics of this was fascinating and the sword and wordplay was brilliant. I also love the explicit recognition that harm prevention and performing morality are different things, and that much of the difference between Catherine and the best heroes is rooted in that.

On the other hand this was hot as hell and Cat wriggling against Frederic just about goddamn killed me. Cat being all lust drunk on the pretty prince's skills and feeling his hardness was some good damn content.

Salt

I think the best of Good aren't blind to that, to be fair. Just that the best of them aren't necessarily the most powerful of them, too often. What was it that the old Wizard of the West used to say? A hero should not confuse striking at Evil and doing Good, lest their Good become the act of striking.

It's telling of the crucible that Catherine was forged in, that she takes to that so easily. She spent so much of her own upbringing fighting it.

But a subtle nuance here is that Catherine has her own blinders, and is too focused on making sure the principle of doing good does not become the act of striking evil.

Frederic here is a mirror along the same vein – focused on making sure that necessary evil actions do not become confused with the principle of being good.

Liliet

The problem lies rather in the “preventing short-term harm” vs “preventing long-term harm” dichotomy here. Guide has been pretty heavy with themes of trust and how necessary it is and how destructive the lack of it is, and ultimately “performing morality” is a lynchpin on that – someone who can be trusted to always do that, well, can be trusted.

Frederic does not only stand for himself, here. On the break of eras like this one, his behavior can set precedent for what is acceptable/appropriate/honorable/expected of Proceran ruler Named, like how the Levantine founder band set precedent for all Blood going forward. The stakes on him maintaining his integrity are actually VERY high, on par with the stakes in the precedent for how exactly Red Axe is handled that Catherine is looking at.

Casey Glick

One further thing that I'm surprised Cat hasn't considered, and why I'm surprised she is so resistant to "Named are subservient to non-Named justice": hasn't she been fighting for the position that Named shouldn't be rulers? This seems like a fantastic compromise, that while Named can rule a nation, they have to enforce the judgment of lay courts.

Liliet

tactically bad, will lose support of those currently willing to buy into t&t

Casey Glick

Right. Strategically necessary, tactically bad.

caoimhinh

Proceran bullshit once again making a mess of Procer and the countries around it, yep.

It's interesting that even Frederic is affected by the stubbornness of Proceran Heroes that prevents them from accepting the evils of their people and calling them for what they are. They find excuses to justify themselves and blame others for Proceran actions.

The Prince of Cleves is scheming to betray his allies, and Frederic calls it a sign of a crumbling Principate. but no it fucking isn't, that's just good old greed and ambition of nobility, not an act of desperation.

That even now he calls the Great War something that was "a scheme of the Tower" instead of recognizing the fault of Proceran royalty, lowers my stem for him. That was a bunch of idiots burning their country to the ground until they were so beaten they couldn't move, getting more and more in foreign debt to continue killing each other until Cordelia got all Lycaonese to practically conquer the rest of Procer. That civil war was over 90% due to the princes' ambition with just a bit of Praesi prodding to keep it going.

And again, he is still a stubborn idiot who wants Cat to solve the problem for him. He claims he doesn't want the death of the Red Axe so he won't press charges, so better have her on trial by Procer... which would still get her killed, just with a mess for the T&T.

Like Cat said, that's not an act of principle, it's a thing of pride. Which for a Hero shouldn't matter more than the good of the majority.

That aside... yep, this is quite a mighty ship.

He got a date right after meeting her, and now got to second base with Catherine in 4 days of knowing each other, and it's only their 3rd conversation. Smooth.

It would be a what, a Royal Armada Galleon? A strong and fast warship.

dadycoool

Huh. I hadn't thought about how it that way. Sure, Malicia was the one to poking the Jenga tower, but there were still a couple dozen Proceran royals trying to hoard blocks. All she really did was a few occasional nudges, not attach puppet strings. And people absolutely will stab allies in the back over pride, greed, or any of the big seven, with death staring them in the face, crumbling Principate or no. But I guess a Proceran is a Proceran, no matter how much we all adore him. And of course, everyone runs to Cat when they've got a problem that they either made or are too hung up on their own pride to deal with, and then likely as not "Surprised Pikachu face" when she either tells them what it takes to fix it or does it herself and leaves them reeling. Not to be That Guy, but that last bit reminds me of how the rich kid came to Jesus and walked away sorrowful.

Anyway, I'm pretty sure Cat would screw anyone that caught her eye, no matter where they were from, so long as their personality didn't grate on her too much. So far, it seems like Indrani and Killian are the only ones to have had both qualities. This date could be considered Cat working on the second with Frederic.

Liliet

Mm, but Frederic does outright acknowledge Cat has reason for her low esteem of Proceran royalty. His points about actively crumbling country are about why everything is on the verge of going to shit IN THE MIDDLE OF FIGHTING THE DEAD KING. That one of the reasons is because it's normal for the Principate is obvious to both him and Cat and they acknowledge it, which also makes it irrelevant to the conversation at hand.

And the thing about principles here, Frederic's actions right now are setting precedent for how heroic Named Proceran royalty acts. His choices on this pivot have no less story weight than Cat's and Hanno's, and might echo even longer – unfortunate legal precedents can be walked back a lot easier than unfortunate story precedents, and both can impact trust of everyone they need to buy into the T&T > Accords very strongly. Frederic's integrity is less of an immediate short-term issue, but then so is the crumbling of the Principate. There's a reason he admits that he doesn't really agree with Cordelia's approach.

He HAS a better idea. Why would he go with a worse plan over a better one?

caoimhinh

But what kind of precedent is he setting here?

Not doing what is good for the bigger picture, but instead satisfying his own sense of conscience?

Not taking the best route that causes less complications, but instead causing a political mess and then asking for others to solve it for him?

Not going through the T&T, but instead asking for a trial in Procer?

Not enforcing the agreement Villains and Heroes have signed for, but instead bargaining with political chips and trying to bribe(~~and seduce~~) a high officer of the Terms to agree to Proceran justice?

That's a shitty precedent he is setting.

Also, he does not have a plan. He is simply asking Cat to gain more information in hopes she can find a better solution.

Liliet

He's not "causing a political mess", he's just refusing to be tapped to clean up a pre-existing one in the way most convenient to his superiors.

Not all First Princes and villain representatives are going to be Cordelias and Catherines.

Salt

The princes scheming when they can't afford to IS a sign of the Principate crumbling. It has been crumbling for decades. The Intercessor good as admitted that she allowed this to happen so that Cordelia would be pushed into a corner and become Warden of the West, and take up her Judgement-corpse weapon against Nessie.

Not to mention that oftentimes, the petty scheming of the princes ARE just as much of a Praesi plot in reality, not just paranoia. It goes BOTH ways since those kinds of plots are how Cordelia and Malicia are fighting. Some of the Praesi highborn plots were base proceran intrigue too, with Cordelia plainly admitting to Cat after the Everdark arc that she accidentally bankrolled the Dook of Liesse in the process. Is it that much of a stretch for him to suspect that an indisputable genius like Malicia is matching Hasenbach blow for blow by using her own princes against her?

The part that Cordelia is right about is that the Principiate was shaped to be the ruin that it is today, and not entirely as a fault of their own people. The thing she's wrong about, and that Catherine needs to hammer into her head, is the exact same thing that Black told Malicia about Praesi culture.

"There is nothing holy about our culture, it needs to be ripped out root and stem as matter of bare survival."

The same way that the Praesi consistently "blunder so badly that (they) need to rely on demons to stay off destruction", the Principiate consistently blunders so badly that they need to rely on crusades to stay off ruin. What Cordelia needs to see here is that while she's right about the unfortunate reality of the Principiate and that it isn't necessarily wrong in principle, that isn't an excuse for allowing the state of it to continue. It's gone far past the point of acceptable losses.

Salt

*doom of liesse, not dook of liesse. Lmao autocorrect

caoimhinh

I learned a new word thanks to that typo XD

Dook: In U.K. dialect, it's a strong, untwilled linen or cotton.

Liliet

Seriously, Cat? Seriously? It took you until NOW???

I get that you're not used to structuring your day without Hakram to do it for you, but SERIOUSLY?????

Salt

The adjutant? Mo like the babysitter. Bet Catherine can't even arrange her own ceremonial dresswear without the orc holding her hand.

Liliet

ADHD is rough 🤪

MoNa

Excuse me, what was it that it “took (her) until now?”

Liliet

talking to red axe lmao

trashdragon

Lol why would she want to talk to Red Axe? It's not like interviewing the key suspect in a massively politically thorny murder case is a priority or anything.

I mean, what's the worst that could happen in the time it took her to meet up with the Prince for sparring? Her memories of the incident getting muddled? Her constructing an alibi? A third party getting to her and trying to coerce her into doing what they want or even assassinating her? Lol as if. Just ploughing ahead with the trial with minimal investigation or prep work and assuming that it's a foregone conclusion is totally fine.

agumentic

You are saying this like she spent a week lounging in her chair mopping or something. She went to sleep beside Hakram after what might have been the most exhausting day of her life, woke up, talked with Indrani who passed a message that Kingfisher Prince wanted to have a talk, which Cat understandably prioritised. She didn't exactly have a lot of chances to talk with Red Axe before now.

Liliet

It's been four days.

> Past dawn, then. This would make it the longest night of sleep from the four I'd had since the culmination of the Bard's plots in the Arsenal.

No, she didn't spend a week moping in her chair. Only half a week, apparently.

agumentic

Ouch, that is an egg on my face. At least that still leaves her actions as understandable – she just shut down for a while after her inadvertently sending her friend to maiming and it took the situation itself developing to rouse her.

Though, Red Axe herself might have been asleep from her wounds for most or all of those four days, so Cat might have not missed anything.

caoimhinh

That makes a lot of sense, actually.
Since it was said that only now after 4 days did the Physician let the Kingfisher Prince leave his bed, and he only got that non-lethal wound on his neck. I mean, sure, a lot of people would be dead from that, but he is Named and got both magical and priestly healing. He should have been up and about by the next day at most.

The Red Axe got two dozen crossbow bolts on her. So being in a coma for a couple of days wouldn't be surprising.

Liliet

No yeah, Cat just shutting the fuck down is 100% understandable.

And I'm going to shine a spotlight on it and point fingers :3

superkeaton

Well, that was deeply interesting and inevitably sexy.

Cap'n Smurfy

It occurs to me that the various Heroes went about killing Cat the wrong way. Forget redemption based stories, Pilgrim should have just thrown attractive, scantily-dressed Heroes at Cat for 'Hero seduces the Evil Queen' story. Would've been guaranteed to work.

Dome Zasrekh

No. When Cat knows you are an enemy you are done. Those heroes would have been converted before the crusade reached The WhiteCaps! It is the 'Evil Queen turns the sexy heroes into her boytoys' story.

Or they would have died in a fire, who knows!

Cap'n Smurfy

In any other given scenario I'd agree with you. In a battle of romance or seduction? Cat had shown herself to be remarkably rubbish at seduction. Every single relationship we've seen has had the other party being the instigator. The closest she's come to anything resembling seduction is in this chapter, where she wiggled her hips suggestively when a hot guy had already pinned her down. Not exactly expert level stuff.

Dome Zasrekh

She is still yet to sleep with Akua tho, and Heroes would make her just as weary of a plot as her.

Daniel E

Moments like this make me really miss Robber, and to a lesser extent, Kairos.

Noble

I went to go to the next chapter and... there isn't one. What a place to catch up!

sengachi

I just got stumbled across this line from another story: "As if principles mean shit if you only adhere to them when they come without cost."

And it strikes me as a really good distillation of the difference between Frederic and Catherine. They both grew up in circumstances where they had to learn to play an ugly, awful game to survive. And both learned to compromise principles to do what need be done. But as they grew into heroic (small h) figures, that early life lesson developed into two different philosophies.

Frederic learned that principles cost. That this is a truth of having principles, and so the act of declaring oneself to have a principle includes steeling oneself for and taking responsibility of the inevitable cost. Principles don't mean shit if you throw them aside when they cost you.

Catherine learned that principles cost. Therefore, best to not hold any too close. Better to hold in hand a scale, a goal, and knowledge of when the costs you've taken don't justify the costs you've yet to incur. Principles are best thrown aside when they cost you, so they don't mean shit in the first place.

Liliet

Agreed.

I'd add that difference in their origins would have played a role here, and I don't mean Amadeus's intervention: I mean that Frederic grew up in an environment where the cost of principles was something princes and princesses could still theoretically choose to bear and survive, while Catherine grew up, while safe herself, surrounded by the poorest and lowest struggling against starvation.

TheAtomicOption

bad politics pshaw! What's the point of being a Queen of Below if you can't bang a pretty prince?

Chapter 29: Conviction

"The advantage of fair laws is not inherent but rather in the people's appreciation of them. It is therefore just as useful to offer only the perception of fair laws, and easier to attain."

– Extract from the treatise "On Rule", author unknown (widely believed to be Prince Bastien of Arans)

I'd avoided going to speak with the Red Axe.

I'd actually even gone further than that, avoiding sending anyone I trusted to speak with her in my stead. She was in a heavily warded cell, where she would benefit from the finest care the Arsenal could offer as a full contingent of armed soldiers guarded the door day and night with orders to let no one inside. It wasn't that I was afraid of speaking with the woman, though I suspected I'd come out of that conversation feeling like the monster that these days I so often was.

It was to prevent accusations, more or less. If she did something... strange during the trial and I'd been alone in a room with her at some point, odds were it'd end up blamed on me. One of the Woe or even just a Named I was on good terms with were likely to end up facing the same sort of accusation if they went in my stead, so I'd been cautious and ensured she was isolated instead. Aside for meals and healing, the Red Axe saw no one.

Of course, the identity of the man now accompanying me meant that I'd be able to afford taking this risk. Frederic Goethal was both one of Above's and a prince of the blood, both things which would silence the Mirror Knight if he tried to kick up a fuss. If anything, the political inconvenience that was Prince Frederic refusing to ask for the Red Axe's head on a pike would only lend him greater moral credence should he vouch I'd been up to nothing. Why would the Prince of Brus enable by plot what he might have easily obtained by law and patience?

In truth I could probably have arranged an interrogation earlier, but it would likely have come at the price of Christophe de Pavanie or one of his still sparse following sitting in attendance of the talk. No so great a cost, on the surface, but the opposite on closer look. It'd be implying the that Mirror Knight and his crew had the right to oversee my activities as a high officer of the Truce and Terms.

I had no intention whatsoever of making that concession, not even in so unspoken a manner.

Over the last few days, in between bouts of thinking that some viperous tongues insisted might be brooding, I'd come to wonder if the trial ahead of the Red Axe was not just another avenue for the Intercessor to damage the Truce and Terms. I couldn't know how closely the heroine was aligned with the Bard, or even what she was truly after, but it did not take knowing either of those things to understand that the Rex Axe would be put in a room with some of the most powerful people in the Grand Alliance and allowed to speak her piece. I knew better than most how dangerous words could be if they were the right ones, spoken into the right ears. On the other hand, what else could I do but let this proceed?

If I'd let the Sinister Physician quietly dispose of her the risk would have been avoided, true, but only at the price of another, arguably worse risk. Gods, but I hated fighting the Bard. It had all the manners of unpleasantness of fighting Kairos and Akua to it, and then some nastiness all her own. I needed more information, in the end, and I now had a good opportunity to get it.

The Prince of Brus had sent for a coat before we headed out in the small nameless section where the prison cells of the Arsenal stood, conversation between us sparse as we moved. The intensity there'd been between us, down there in the sands, had cooled the further we got from them. I was not certain whether or not to be pleased by that, but the conversation I knew lay ahead of me put out any remaining embers there might have been anyway.

I was not unaware that yet another reason I'd had to avoid the Red Axe was that I'd known the necessary would become harder once I had a face and a story to match the Name. It should not be, I knew. I'd killed, both in cold blood and in the heat of battle, and this heroine was nothing to me. No one. But while the orphan girl who'd played in the streets of Laure had grown into someone else, I'd not forgotten her.

Or that she'd taken her first steps down this road slitting open the throat of a rapist, something I was now going to hang another woman for.

"It is my understanding that she travelled with Lady Archer for some time, before coming to the Arsenal," Prince Frederic quietly said as we walked.

"Archer was the one to find her, or close enough," I confirmed. "Her intention was to drop her off here at the Arsenal, where her talents could be tested until the White Knight could decide on which front she might best assist the war effort."

I'd have been consulted as well before decisions were made, at which point the Wicked Enchanter would have come up and we'd have ensured those two would be as physically far from each other as possible. Distance and well-informed officers had served us well in this regard so far, and would have again if the pieces hadn't ended up aligning in just the precise way to foster a disaster.

"Then you will be aware that there were... circumstances," the Prince of Brus delicately said.

"I knew what the Wicked Enchanter was when he was brought into the Truce," I replied. "Disgusting as his actions were, they were granted amnesty."

Didn't mean I didn't have him marked in the back of my head for when the Truce and Terms ended, though. Under the Accords I owed the man nothing, and if heroes wanted to bury him in steel and Light the moment he resumed his old habits I would have raised a damned toast to the kill.

"I do not envy your office under the Terms," the fair-haired man admitted. "I am glad it is held, as I've seen what villains can bring to bear for our side of the war, but I envy it not in the slightest. It seems like a duty that would wear away at one's soul."

My lips thinned. That'd cut a little too close to home for comfort.

"That's the thing about being taught by Praesi," I blandly said. "You learn that, for all the preaching, souls are just another commodity to bargain with."

That killed the conversation the rest of the way to the cell.

—

The Red Axe — I did not know her real name, leaving me only this to refer to her by even in my own mind — was looking rather healthy, for a woman who'd been shot by almost two dozen crossbow bolts. Fired by my legionaries looking to kill, too, not by sloppy amateurs. There were so many bandages wrapped around her torso that even through her dull brown prisoner's shift I could see them peek out. Though she was hardly in a state to walk around and I'd been told she still spent most of her days asleep, the heroine was not visibly feverish. There was a certain sickly pallor to her otherwise tan skin though, I judged, and her breathing was laboured. A heroic constitution and a swarm of priests had seen to an impressive recovery, though and when we entered her pale brown eyes were wide awake and unclouded.

"I'd get up if I could," the Red Axe greeted us in accented Chantant, "but my legs will not allow."

Even if they had, she was still shackled at her ankles. Cleverly done work with a loose enough chain she'd be able to move around some but not walk. A similar set was around her wrists, to be loosened only when she was helped to bathe once a day. She had still had the muscles arms I remembered from seeing her fresh to the infirmary, but they'd grown thinner. Even healing with Light had costs, and she'd needed a great deal of healing to pull through.

"Lady Red," the Kingfisher Prince greeted her, offering the slightest of bows.

"Prince," the heroine replied, grimacing.

"If I might introduce-" Prince Frederic began, but she interrupted him with a tired gesture.

"That cloak speaks," the Red Axe said. "Well met, Black Queen."

I did not let my frown touch my face. I'd been studying her as she spoke, but when she'd looked at me I'd not found any hostility. Was she a natural talent at obscuring her thoughts? Given that she'd come from the middle of nowhere, it seemed unlikely she would have been taught. Not impossible, though. It seemed unlike the Intercessor to linger around teaching anyone, but then I still knew depressingly little about her methods when out of my sight. There was a simpler explanation, too, but it struck me as unlikely.

"You're looking healthy," I said.

"Enough for the noose?" the Red Axe chuckled.

Blunt, but then when you were down in the pit there was rarely a point in pretending otherwise.

"The block's a lot more likely," I replied. "But there's to be a trial first."

"A trial," the brown-haired heroine said, her distaste clear. "Just get it over with, would you?"

"You have rights, Lady Red," the Prince of Brus reminded her.

"I also cut open your neck, Prince," the Red Axe said, tone calm. "Don't come in here pretending that's all forgotten. I won't have any of that."

"I have not forgot a moment of it, I assure you," the Kingfisher Prince replied, tone cool.

I noticed his hand twitch, on the side of his pale neck where the scar could be seen.

"But it does not change that you have rights and protections under Terms," Prince Frederic said.

Measuredly, the Red Axe turned to me.

"Can I renounce those, Black Queen?" she asked.

"I'm not your representative under the Terms," I said. "That's the White Knight, who'll be here soon enough."

"I remember the Archer's speeches," the heroine dismissed. "You did not answer my question."

I breathed out, studying her. She did not look angry or afraid, although there was something to her expression... Impatient, I decided. She's impatient. Yet I found none of the despair and hopelessness I would have expected of someone actively trying to hurry along their own death.

"No," I said. "Or I suppose it's more accurate to say that you could, but it'd hardly matter. You agreed to the Terms before coming here and committed breaches while a signatory. What follows will not change whether or not you renounce anything."

In principle an argument could be made that if I she signed a renunciation of her own free will before witnesses I could follow up by snapping her neck in the moment that followed without breaking the Terms, but in practice that'd just be throwing oil on an already crackling fire.

"The cogs of your bureaucracy are soaked in blood, Black Queen," the Red Axe said, offering a hard smile.

And in her eyes then, for the first time, I found something like hate. Not for me, which had been the part that tripped me up, but for the rest. I'd done her a disservice, I thought, in thinking that she could not hate the tower without also hating its architect. Something of that must have shown on my face, as the brown-haired prisoner let out a bitter chuckle.

"Sharp," the heroine said. "Sharp enough to cut yourself, Black Queen. Or everybody else."

There was pain there, I thought, and hurt. But it didn't own her, it didn't drive her. Whatever horror it was her Named had been forged out of, it had made her hate a cold and measured thing.

"You didn't kill the Wicked Enchanter in a red rage," I stated. "This was deliberate, and you know exactly what it is you're doing."

Thinking of her as a victim or an accomplice had been dead ends from the start, I was beginning to realize. It is all objects in motion, the Intercessor had told me. This wasn't the plot of an eldritch abomination in a woman's shape, not really. The Red Axe hadn't been manipulated into this. She'd wanted this, perhaps before the ever saw the Bard – if she'd ever seen her at all.

"I don't think you're a monster, Black Queen," the Red Axe told me. "A bad woman, maybe, but those aren't rare. I've seen a real monster, the bleakness at the heart of him, and I don't see it in you. I don't think the Archer could love you like she does, either, if you were like that."

"It's the Terms that are your enemy," I quietly said.

"I don't think you're a monster," the heroine repeated. "But your Truce and Terms? They're the most monstrous thing I ever saw. You took in every scrap of filth this world has to offer, knowing what they were, and you're protecting them."

"Without the Damned, we would not be alive to have this conversation," the Prince of Brus said.

I started, having almost forgotten his presence, and saw that same surprise on the prisoner's face. Frederic Goethal's silken coat had been pulled close around him as he leaned against the wall, the only overt sign of what I suspected to be discomfort.

"What was done to you..." the prince began, voice trailing off. "There is no excusing that. But the Truce and Terms are not responsible for that evil, and they are responsible for a great many saved lives."

"What was done to me," the Red Axe snorted. "Do you know, Black Queen? What it is he's tiptoeing around?"

"No," I admitted.

I had suspicions, though. Rape and torture highest among them. What sparse details we'd found of how the Wicked Enchanter had lived on the lawless outskirts of Procer had been a sickening read. The dark-eyed heroine glanced at me.

"Would it change anything, if you did?" the Red Axe asked.

I could have lied. But I was going to see her killed, one way or another, and so part of me felt like I owed her the truth.

"No," I repeated.

To my surprise, she smiled. As if obscurely proud or pleased.

"You're a cold hand, aren't you?" the heroine said. "The kind ones, like Prince here, they go all soft-touched the moment rape's even hinted at."

"You are a tragedy, Red Axe," I honestly said, "but hundreds of those come across my desk every day. Even a bleeding heart eventually bleeds dry."

And, truth be told, I'd started with a lot less blood in mine than most. The jury was still out on whether or not that'd been for the best, in the greater scheme of things.

"The Wicked Enchanter was a monster," the heroine said. "The details of it don't matter, save that what he got he deserved a hundred times over."

"If you'd decided to kill him the heartbeat the Truce was over, I would have looked away and covered my ears," I said, meaning every word. "But you didn't wait, and you took a swing at more than just the Enchanter."

"I'm not a child, Black Queen," the Red Axe said. "You don't need to take me by the hand and lead me down the path to where this is headed. I knew before I ever raised my blade how this was all going to end."

"This wasn't justice," Prince Frederic quietly said. "It was just blood, and many more lives might be lost because of it."

"You're guiltier than she is," the Red Axe said. "She's not supposed to be better than this, Kingfisher Prince. You are."

"And you?" the Prince of Brus replied. "Are you not supposed to be better than this as well, Chosen?"

"I give my life for what I believe," the heroine said. "What more is there left to squeeze out of me? I am not the one baring steel in the defense of the indefensible."

"It is defensible," I said. "Just not to you."

I was not bitter of that. How could I be? No, instead some part of me wondered if this was what the Grey Pilgrim had felt like, that day he'd looked at me and called me the culmination of old sins come back to haunt Calernia. If I was the punishment of the apathy and pettiness of the west when Callow fell, then was this woman not my own for the practical brutality lying behind the ideals of the Truce and Terms? I could not be angry or bitter, no, not when this was richly deserved.

"Don't-" she began.

"I won't take you by the hand, like you insisted, so forgive my bluntness," I calmly interrupted. "If we don't extend the amnesty part of the Truce to animals like the Wicked Enchanter, we lose Named. Those who have skeletons in their closet, who'll wonder if maybe their sins will be enough to get them the noose instead of the Truce should they come out of the woodworks. And most of those will be of mine, but there'll be some of your end of the Book too – those on the fringe, who learned to love striking at evil just a little too much. And even more costly than the lost champions, it'd mean the reliable Named would be up north, fighting the dead, while the radicals would be down south with no one left to handle them."

I breathed out and began to resist the urge to spit to the side before quelling that reflex and going through with it. It was not a pretty habit, but then nothing about this was pretty. It was blood on cogs, exactly like she'd accused.

"It's an ugly truth, and bare of morality, but in the end getting you a semblance of justice would have simply cost the war effort too much," I said. "I'd apologize, but I knew there would be people like you when I began to head down this road. I did it anyway."

I couldn't fix the world, in the end. Even if I had the power to shape it as I willed, I knew my own limitations well enough to be aware I'd likely do as much harm as good. Yet the Truce and Terms, for all their occasional dip into brutality, they worked. We'd gathered nearly seventy Named now, heroes and villains and those circumstance could cast as either. Near seventy Named, pointed at the great enemy to the north. Not even the First Crusade, when all of Calernia had risen to topple Triumphant, had fielded so many of our kind. It had not been painless or bloodless and certainly not without sweat, and neither I would not pretend that the system was without flaws, but Merciless Gods it worked. If these were kinder times, I hoped I would have been kinder as well, that what I'd built would not have been so harsh.

But there were not kind times, and I could not be more than I was. It was either the Truce and Terms or rolling the dice on the annihilation of life on Calernia.

"I don't want an apology," the Red Axe said. "I want all these swords and oaths to be defending something worth defending. You spawned a monster that cares nothing for the past and looks hungrily at the future, Black Queen. Maybe it was the best you could, for all your famous cleverness."

She laughed, the sound of it bleak to my ear.

"So think of me as the voice Creation uses to say that this is not good enough," the prisoner said. "Your Truce and Terms will break, and you'll either do better or be cast aside."

Just another hero, lighting a torch and declaring it wasn't enough without ever offering another way. There was an echo of so many I'd faced in that voice, in that castigation. The Lone Swordsman, willing to make our home a wasteland so land as it was our own banner flying above it. The Grey Pilgrim, willing to choose war over peace because it wasn't the peace he'd wanted. The Saint of Swords, eyes hard as she decided to risk the death of all Iserre rather than compromise. I'd heard this refrain before, sung by different voices or with different words.

I'd won against this many a time, and I would again.

"We're not that special, you know," I said. "Named. In the right place at the right time we're able to do things that no one else could do, it's true, but we don't matter as much as we like to think."

The Prince of Brus breathed out sharply. He was Alamans, and well-taught, so he grasped my meaning before the other.

"The Truce will hold," I said. "The Terms will hold. If they were hated, if we were facing anyone else, it might be that enough wounds would kill them. But that's not the world we live in, Red Axe. They'll hold, if only because there are simply too many people that want them to."

And I believed that, I genuinely did. Something fragile, without a proper foundation or results to point at? A mess like the one ahead would break it, sure as dawn, even if everyone was trying to keep things together. But I had bartered away kindness for sturdiness, and so my creation would withstand the storm. Some dangers were born of the same strength that allowed you to beat them back, weren't they? Creation's sense of humour had not grown any less vicious as I aged.

"You will try," the Red Axe said, and the calm certainty in her eyes was troubling. "You will fail."

I met her eyes, for a moment, and wondered what to say. I would give no apology, for any I might offer would be meaningless.

"It'll be quick," I said. "That much, at least, I can promise."

I left, after, sensing that neither of us had anything left to say.

—

The Prince of Brus stayed in the cell after my departure and I was not in a mood to wait for him. My leg was starting to pain me again, an unhappy turn, so I ambled off towards the Alcazar and counted on my slow gait being enough to ensure he'd catch up to me if he wanted to. He did so, though after long enough I'd come to believe we would be parting ways. I half-heartedly went through the usual courtesies after he joined me.

"There was little change after your departure," the Kingfisher Prince told me. "She tired of speaking to me quickly."

I grunted, noncommittal.

"It is a useful conversation to have had," I said. "I thank you for the opportunity."

"I can take pleasure in having provided that, if not the outcome of the journey," the fair-haired man said. "Have the Red Axe's words informed your opinion on other matters?"

A very polite way to ask if I was more open to taking Cordelia's offer of pushing through the Accords in exchange for ceding jurisdiction over this particular Named. Which actually seemed halfway possible, now, considering the Red Axe had tried to renounce any rights she might have under the Terms in front of a credible witness. It was a more than decent excuse to throw her at Procer, were I so inclined, though I suspected Hanno would see it otherwise. Which was why Hasenbach wanted me on her side in the first place, when it came down to it. Officially there were three crowned heads in the Grand Alliance: the First Prince of Procer, the Holy Seljun of Levant and the Queen of Callow. If she got me in on her side, not only was she securing Below's side of the Terms but also ensuring that whoever ended up speaking for the Dominion in this would be very reluctant to side against two thirds of the alliance.

"It has," I simply said.

He left it at that, as I'd thought he would. It'd be uncouth to try to press me for a quick answer on so delicate a matter.

"So what part of that was it that you wanted me to see, in specific?" I idly asked.

He did not look surprised, and though he did not deny what I'd said neither did he look abashed.

"It might be argued, given her enmity to the Truce and Terms, that she was never really a signatory," the Kingfisher Prince simply said.

Ah, clever man. If she'd been an enemy from the start, then she was not under anyone's protection. Procer would be free to have at her. It was still a relatively shaky excuse, to my eye, but before I'd met with the Red Axe I probably would have dismissed it outright. He'd read that correctly.

"To my knowledge, you never spoke with her in depth," I said.

I'd sent him to ensure her safety during the assault on the Arsenal but fleeing clandestinely through corridors was not the time for the sort of conversation that would have allowed him a solid read on her. I'd not been made aware of any visit to her since, either, and considering my orders to the guards I would have known within a quarter hour of such an attempt at most.

"I had much time to think, while recuperating," Prince Frederic said. "If she were Damned, I would have noticed. I have seen enough Named I am certain of this. Yet she was not, and still attacked me. There was a likely reason for that, given what I know of her past."

Meaning he'd deduced her antipathy was towards the Terms before we ever set foot in that room. Competence was attractive, I reluctantly admitted to myself. Especially so in attractive people. My eyes narrowed as I fit another set of details together.

"That's why you don't want to press charges under the Terms," I slowly said. "You don't believe she was actually trying to kill you."

"In a sense," the prince said. "Regardless of whether my death was meant or not, or perhaps even hers, it was not Frederic Goethal she struck. It might have been a signatory of the Terms or a prince of the blood, but for all that she has she my blood I cannot truly consider her an enemy."

"All three of those people you mentioned happen to live in the same body," I drily pointed out. "I suppose they are all of a forgiving temperament."

"I am not a saint, Queen Catherine," Prince Frederic quietly said. "I am not pleased to have been attacked by someone I was risking life and limb to save. Yet, knowing what I know of why this came to pass, I cannot in good conscience seek her death for it. I am not blind to the nature of some of those who have been protected by the Truce and Terms, or the injustice matching the expedience of enlisting their service."

"You're not an officer of the Terms," I said. "Or one of their architects. You bear no responsibility there."

"I have chosen to uphold the Terms, to participate in them, and so bear a personal responsibility," the prince replied, shaking his head.

It was torturous chain of logic, as far as I was concerned, but not entirely senseless. A little to labyrinthine, though, for the amount of passion he'd been speaking with all this time. I suspected that under all the talk of conscience and responsibility, the truth was that Frederic Goethal's heroic hindbrain believed the Red Axe was at least a little right bout all this. That would make it an utterly repulsive notion to him to ask for her death, even when it might be convenient. Perhaps even more because it'd be convenient, I mused. Where he'd be standing, it was that sort of liberties taken with justice that would have started this mess in the first place.

"I've already given my opinion of this," I said. "I doubt you've forgotten it."

"It would not dare, Your Majesty," the blue-eyed man said, a tad ruefully.

We'd gotten into the Alcazar as we talked without my even noticing, nearer to the heart of the section than my rooms but not all that far. That sudden realization had me closing my mouth, eyeing the pretty prince from the side. It wouldn't even be particularly suspect, I thought, to invite him into my rooms. Which were warded. Private. The kind of place where I'd be able to take my time peeling him out of those clothes and get at the much more interesting body beneath them. I'd not said anything, but the Prince of Brus caught the corner of my gaze and his steps stuttered for the barest fraction of a moment. Without a word being spoken either side, my blood quickened again. It wasn't a very good idea, I reminded myself

It might turn out to be a thoroughly enjoyable idea, though.

I glanced at his face and found a conflict I suspected might not be too different in nature from mine. There were quite a few temptations I considered myself apt in dealing with, more than most at least, but this sort of thing wasn't one of them. I saw movement form the corner of my eye, dark robes and a long stride, and to my relief and dismay – more dismay than relief, honesty compelled me to admit – I found Hierophant headed towards us with intent too obvious to be mistaken.

"It appears I have other claims on my time," I said.

"I can only look forward to our next meeting then, my queen," Prince Frederic replied.

Without my being entirely sure how it happened, I found my hand being kissed as smoldering blue eyes looked up at me. Fuck, I thought even as he retreated. All right, so I was probably going to end up sleeping with Frederic Goethal. I just needed to be smart in going about it, and maybe not do it too much. I could probably handle that. I wasn't looking for anything serious and he was headed back to Twilight's Pass before long anyway, so really you might even say I was being responsible about this.

"Catherine?" Masego said, interrupting my thoughts.

"Zeze?" I replied.

"Is there a particular reason you are looking at this man?"

I pondered that for a moment.

"None you'd enjoy hearing about," I honestly replied. "I take it you're looking for me?"

It was only then I took a longer look at him, and noticed how visibly exhausted he was. Physically, anyway. There was a fervour burning in him I'd long learned to recognize as him reaching a particularly interesting stretch of his research.

"I was," Masego said, then lowered his voice. "I did it, Catherine."

I cocked an eyebrow.

"Did what?"

"I found the crown of Autumn," Hierophant grinned.

Javvies

Hmm.

A finding that Red Axe to lied about agreeing to the Truce and Terms, and was always opposed to them, might just be enough legal grounds to differentiate handing her over to a Proceran court for the attempted murder of a Proceran Prince from the Truce and Terms/future Accords waiving jurisdictional primacy over Named when non-Named are involved.

And, yeah, nobody is saying Wicked Enchanter was a good person. Just that he was obeying the Truce and Terms and was contributing to the war effort, which meant that he was earning a stay of execution for the duration of the more important war against the Dead King.

Progress on Quartered Seasons.

I guess Hunted Magician has provided good information, which means Cat will work to avoid a quick death sentence for him. I wonder what they're going to do with the Crown of Autumn (and presumably its counterpart the Crown of Spring).

M0och123

Cat only offered HM the chance to argue for a lesser sentencing with her protection as Below's officer for the Truce and Terms. I might be taking the earlier conversation she had with HM the wrong way but the only thing she bartered was not letting the Heroes kill him immediately due to her withdrawing his confession. Yes, his contributions will be weighed but that will be in the fairness of the court. I don't think Cat plans to pull any strings for him. But who knows? The Cat's phrasing of her explanations did leave a little ambiguity.

Salt

Cat probably won't go very far for him if it ends up being necessary to protect the Truce and Terms. Catherine Foundling nowadays is someone who walked into that cell willing to execute a woman for a crime that Cat herself committed, as long as it's necessary for her goals. It doesn't matter how heartbreaking it for her to knowingly commit the same kind of hypocrisy that she so hated the Grey Pilgrim for committing not so long ago.

I doubt that she'll be any less ruthless when it comes to dealing with the Hunted Magician, especially considering that she has much more sway over the fates of Villains than Heroes.

Sam

On the other hand, if Masego turns around and says "I need him for Quartered Seasons", Cat would likely go to ridiculous lengths to get him a stay of execution until Masego is finished with him.

AbraKadabra

Exactly right. Red Axe believes the Truce protects villains, but she does not realize, that they protect her too. I Say, someone WHO openly spurns that protection should be stripped from that protection. Which means anyone can freely kill her. And, since her life is forfeit anyway, she can be sent to the everdark to be used gallowborne style. I think Cordelia would jump at the idea to send away someone inconvenient like that to Far Far Away, never to be heard again.

Hakram's Dead Hand

I dunno, sending a hero off against terrible odds in order to get them out of your hair has a very scary story plot line to it...

Hakram's Dead Hand

I dunno, sending a hero off against terrible odds in order to get them out of your hair seems like a direct railroad to a "Back for revenge, stronger than ever" story.

Sam

Depends on the outcome – I could see it working out well. They can say “well, we tried to execute her” and they get a more powerful hero to use going forward

Eleron Pfoutz

Tvtropes calls that a Uriah Gambit, the Trope Namer being Uriah, from the Old Testament.

<https://tvtropes.org/pmwiki/pmwiki.php/Main/UriahGambit>

Ozovio

Sending a hero away to “certain death” in productive service for acts they feel justified for? That’s far too strong story fodder to be an option.

AbraKadabra

Well, she won't be alone. She has like several hundred thousand drow to keep company, and probably a super strong Mirror Knight too, with other problem elements like Hunted Magician. 😊

thearpox23

But you the Haunted Magician help you find it Masego, or did you find it on your own?

thearpox23

Also, I was just thinking how much more moronic Mirror Knight's defense of the Red Axe sounds in defense of this conversation. “Ah yes, this person who was acting with the full knowledge of what she was doing. She was totally manipulated by the Bard and she be let go so she can take another immediate swipe at the Terms.”

Of course he did not know that that is her position when he defended her, but then that is why you hold your tongue you imbecile. The hope is that he may yet change his tune when Red Axe's position becomes known to him, for I can already feel myself groaning inside if he doesn't.

caoimhinh

Yep, that's a problem with many Heroes. Their sense of righteousness makes them morons in certain issues, no matter their competence in other areas or their cognitive abilities. And they are freaking stubborn about it. So it's hard to change their minds when they think they are doing the right thing.

TeK

To be fair, it's a common human trait. Both being self-righteous and stubborn.

caoimhinh

True, but it is heightened a huuuge lot on Heroic Named.

M0och123

I think that is in part due to the reason they became heroic named in the first place. Named become named due to two things: their narrative and their personality. The personality part is often the make or break for Above. The named needs to possess a relatively small list of certain attributes that Above approves of and not possess certain unacceptable attributes.

Some of the most common acceptable attributes is a willingness to act according to their convictions and the stubbornness to hold to their personal beliefs regardless of the presence of other opinions. All too often this leads to zealots like Sword Saint and Mirror Knight.

Salt

That really applies to both sides of the line though, Above AND Below. The only difference is that Below's brand of zealotry typically follows a different set of principles than Above's.

Look at a "moderate" hero like the grey pilgrim. Self-sacrificing, generally reasonable, one-in-a-million kind at heart. Also literally willing to murder his own family for his personal principles – Mercy.

"Moderate" Villain? Amadeus of the Green Stretch. Generally reasonable, endlessly flexible in method. Also a casual mass murderer. His first contact with Catherine wasn't in the alley where she took up the knife, one of his interludes showed that it was when he was considering smothering her in her sleep because an orphanage-overseer-spy reported her morals as "too heroic in nature". That's the kind of people that most Villains are, even the charmers.

The same old zealotry, with less self-righteousness and more mass-atrocities.

ThatOneGuy

True, but it may be awful... It is hard not to see the reasoning behind them. There is a logic to it... A cold harsh logic, but one that makes sense.

The main difference between Cat and the old guard is that like Amadues they are fighting for stability or "logic" so to speak.

Lone sword? Burnt the entire land than let anyone who doesn't follow his banner survive. He tried stealing free will to make a zealotry fueled army... Rather than to with an alternative.

Saint sword? Willing to have everyone did on principle rather than accept that perhaps this time they need to work together than let the dead king kill everyone... Because it might make heroes more tolerant of the misguided villains who are trying to do good.

Of course the villains have their share of bad apples, but you do not hear them making excuses. Right not it is a matter between someone doing something... And others complaining that it is not enough while not doing anything about it.

It is the reason who White Knight is in charge and why all the other heroes work with him as they accepted his rule without him demanding it.

It is why Mirror Knight feels more like a villain demanding what he believes what is owed to him.

Salt

The more radical Heroes' actions did have a logic to them though, they're just not agreeable to Catherine and Black. Catherine actually said it quite well – their actions are "defensible, just not to you"

Taking the Saint as an example, she's a Hero whose role was to clean up the kind of horrors that routinely made the Wicked Enchanter's work look mediocre in comparison. That's all she did, her entire life, and the world was better for it. When she refused to negotiate, it was because she genuinely believed that it was impossible for the nature of Villains to change, she'd just suffered one betrayal too many in her long lifetime and was convinced through endless harsh experience that there was no other way. That isn't any less “logical” than Black’s smothering of orphan children out of convenience.

While Catherine has more friends on Below’s side of the line because of her circumstances, it must be remembered that the crabs in the bucket are Named sworn to both Above and Below, not just one side. It’s not that Named on the other side of the fence have “no logic”, it’s simply that their logic isn’t palatable to the ones on Below’s side of the fence.

Shveiran

Not to quibble over wording, but that is not really “logic”, in my opinion. What you are describing is them having “reasons”, because they are well-written characters. But they are moved by emotion and principle, not logic: they do not take into account the practical consequences of their principled stands, and thus they have flawed approaches from a logical stand-point.

The Lone Swordsman did not consider how his rebellion was going to achieve independence from Procer or how he was going to keep Callow from famine, long before he decided to go for angelic mind-rape: I’m fairly sure his precise stance was “i’ve already fought a war to free Callow, I’m not above fighting a second one”. He didn’t discard those problems, he merely failed to consider them. They didn’t even register as variables to him.

The Saint of Swords didn’t consider how anyone could have won the war without a good-evil alliance. She looked at the dangers in the future, but didn’t offer a plan for the present; she just took a principled stance and rejected a path she thought led somewhere abhorrent, without even factoring in what path was to be taken instead.

The Red Axe, again, does not talk about what should be done instead. This is not good enough, she says, and she has reasons to say so. Yet she doesn’t offer a solution, only rejects what is currently being built. It’s not about logic, it is about emotion. “I don’t like this, this feels wrong because this part is bad”.

It’s not that she is mad, it isn’t that she has no reason to think this.
But it is a fully emotional reaction, not a logical one.

Salt

@shveiran

Not true at all. Inductive logic is no less logical than Deductive logic, there are applications to both. Within the framework of their assumptions, the Validity of the Heroes logical thought process isn't something that can be questioned. The Soundness of their assumptions can, but on that end, the Below side isn't much better.

The epistemology of logic is actually very well studied and defined to begin with. It's something that's been well studied and formalized for hundreds of years. It isn't a vague idea that can be redefined the completeness of preparations in terms of logistics. Falsely equivocating logical stances that we disagree with to emotional responses, does nothing but weaken the persuasiveness of our own positions.

Yuna

Maybe Black's way of ensuring Cat didn't turn out to be a hero was guiding her to kill that man in the alley

Salt

Probably. The spy's report also mentioned her high potential as well, so it'd be a good idea to avoid wasting that if possible.

Not to mention that for an unorthodox Villain like Black, innate heroic morals aren't necessarily the worst thing in a successor Villain anyway. He doesn't really give too much of a shit about feelings as long as it stops her from making any grievous mistakes, and heroic morals meant Catherine would be disinclined from committing any Akua's Folly type of blunders.

It paid off for him almost immediately during the tenth crusade, when Catherine vetoed Bonfire, and the accidental narrative suicide that would've entailed.

Casey Glick

Which chapter was that?

Salt

Book 1 epilogue. I only remember it because I was re-reading the earlier chapters recently.

<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2015/10/14/epilogue/>

> And grown she had, in the eight months he'd known her. The reports from his agent in the orphanage had indicated she had potential, but they'd underestimated how much. It was a good thing he hadn't had her smothered in her sleep, as the local overseer's recommendation had originally been. Morals too heroic in nature, the assessment had stated. He'd been ready to tie up that particular loose end should it prove necessary when he'd gone to deal with Mazus, but their unexpected meeting had opened a better alternative.

Salt

I mean... the Heroes ARE doing the "right" thing, this time around, just not the most convenient or practically efficient thing. Catherine herself actually agrees with them regarding how unjust and brutal her own Truce and Terms actually are. When the architect of the T&T herself describes them as blood on gears, that's probably a good sign that the Heroes kinda have a point.

The main difference is that Catherine simply puts more importance on practicality over principle – its a difference of degrees of importance rather than opposites. There's a reason that Catherine plans to step away after stabbing the current era of conflict to death; she knows better than anyone that her necessary injustices and brutality are still, in the end, injustices and brutality.

Zggt

Being fair, the Truce and Terms mean that more of the blood is Named and less are civilians. It may be brutal, but Named saying that injustice is inherent to it is turning a blind eye to the injustice of dragging people to Conquests and Crusades for the glory of their causes. Which, according to both Praes and Procer (and far more extreme: the Dead King and the Wandering Bard) is a religious debate, and therefore overrides things like "lives of subjects" in a clear way.

Truce and Terms in effect are separation of church and state in a world where said church can bring down angels or demons or a whole other host of problems. Of course some Heroes will whine about how that form of justice doesn't fit with the words of their gods, just like the Villains will with theirs. Except that this continent has been ravaged by this religious war for centuries now, and it's gotten to a point where people are getting tired of religious zealotry being rewarded despite all the power involved. Maybe especially because of all the power involved even for Named.

Salt

The problems with the old don't somehow excuse the issues with the new. If all Catherine was attempting to do was be no better than the people that came before, then that reasoning would fly; but if she's trying to "make a better world", then that lofty goal necessarily means being judged by a higher standard.

Catherine needs to acknowledge the flaws in herself and in her plans as fully and honestly as possible, none of this "but THEY were bad too" mentality. That's the mentality of Praes – "I may be a horror, but at least I'm not a self-righteous zealot". That's the mentality of Procer – "I may be a ruin, but at least I'm not a baby-sacrificing Damned".

She might not be able to fix every flaw, not by a long shot, but she sure as hells shouldn't be yet another failure of a ruler that closes her eyes to her own flaws by hiding them beneath the greater flaws of others. The moment you do that, the game is lost before it's even played.

Being above all that is how she throws it all back in their faces – the Bard, the Pilgrim, the First Princes and Dread Empresses. By showing them that she's willing to do what they gave up trying to do long ago. Not by being more of the same old tired story.

mona637

Maybe Catherine will make peace and/or become friends with the Dead King and Intercessor. Dead King can give her his argument on the war against stillness, Intercessor can tell Catherine whatever her real plan is and how it's to make a better world, then Catherine tells the two that they don't need to be at odds and can be friends. Pull out her perspective shift shenanigans that show how both can be work secretly to support each other goals. Then with the power of friendship and Catherine's indomitable wisdom+convenience in side stepping difficult problems with clever , they solve the issues that challenge the Liesse Accords:

They split Cardinal into 3 seperate schools. That way they can prevent conflict and internally work against the extremist elements, trying to limit them from inside; uniting when real threats come up. The school of good is located in Procer and has Intercessor, Grey Pilgrim and White Knight leading it. The School of Evil is located in Ater and has Dead King, Black Night and Malicia leading it. The School of unaligned has Catherine, Archer and Ranger leading it from Cardinal.

We can call the school for Good "Alfea". For the Evil School: "Cloud Tower". And for the Neutral School: "Red Fountain".

The 3 schools work to subdue the extremist cultures and narratives that afflict each of these sides; to fix the elements that result in the extremists unleashing Demons and Angels.

Cardinal acts as a buffer and the centre of the Accords, trying to limit the worst excesses of each side. Cardinal also hosts all the hot guys that both the fairies from Alfea and the witches from Cloud Tower drool over, though ofcourse it's gonna be the Winx Club girls from Alfea that get them in the end.

Sequel can be about this girl from the other continent whose parents have to Moses her off the Calernia due to a great evil. She gets adopted by a childless couple and goes to Alfea where she makes friends with the Winx Club and finds this cool guy from Red Fountain.

It will be very interesting to see that play out.

Morgenstern

I feel like some are, at this point, forgetting that the Truce and Terms are NOT Cat's true plan, but the thing all 'allied nations' came up with to go up against the DK who's threatening to wipe out all of their nations... This is NOT Cat's vision for the deal to steer Named's wars away from excessive 'mundane' casualties, the Accords are simply not a thing yet.

Morgenstern

This is a War Time thing influenced by a multitude of factions, not Cat's 'baby'. There's a reason she's all "why oh why couldn't you WAIT with your revenge till this war is over, I totally understand, but you fucking chose the wrong TIME”.

Shveiran

The T&T choose the lesser evil: condone some evil (for a while) to point it at the Dead KING in Calernia’s war of survival.

This isn’t justifying the blood in the gears saying “they were bad too”, it’s acknowledging that there is a body price to pay to prevent the death of all. It is an ugly compromise to stop an uglier state of affairs.

The Red Axe is acting like the agreement is wrong, without stopping to consider what teh alternative could be. her logic is flawed because the real world doesn’t work according to right and wrong, but in shades of better and worse.

This means you cannot judge something’s merit without comparing it to a viable alternative, whereas she isn’t even considering what that alternative could be.

Victim or no, she tried to set fire to the only bridge leading everyone out from the river, just because some people fell from it.

Salt

That’s not really the point being made. No one is saying the T&T aren’t a lesser evil/greater good or that the Red Axe is somehow correct in wanting to dismantle them at this point in time.

It’s that Catherine must be willing to stare the ugly truths of them in the eye. No deflecting or running away from the truth it by changing the subject to how bad Procer is, or any such irresponsible thing. No acting like the Dead King’s threat makes her Necessary Evils no longer Evil.

Shades of grey? I agree. This applies to Catherine too. It’s not all “protagonist good, antagonists bad”. She’s just a little less dark of a grey than the others. Taking the correct parts of the Red Axe’s perspective seriously is important, because she’s right in a way, the costs aren’t just numbers on a ledger. To the people like the Red Axe, it’s their entire world. That empathy is as much the difference between Cat and the Bard as any ultimately inconsequential detail like appearances or powers.

Catherine Foundling, as a character, does not deserve to slowly devolve into some typical YA self-righteous power fantasy.

mona637

Power fantasy?

That is exactly what you are demanding when you assert that Catherine be better than the Wandering Bard and Dread Empress's and First Princes. That she conveniently side steps hard choices with clever YA perspective shifts because she is special.

It can't be all victories. Grow up.

Salt

Uh, I suggested she be better as in more honestly self-reflective and willing to put in more work to create the "better world" that she mentioned herself a few volumes ago. We're you even reading any of the responses?

thearpox23

(Replying here because WordPress)
Because your suggestion is extremely vague and wishy-washy when everyone else is thinking in practical terms of "What decision should Catherine make?"

How would being more self-reflective here (Which I think Cat already is. She just isn't outlining every minute thing in an internal monologue because she's done that enough in previous books.) change her actual decision?

How would being more empathetic change her final judgement?

How would 'putting in more work to create a better world' change her course of action?

You speak in vague niceties. You offer up no solutions or alternatives. And then you get confused when people think you want a YA moon on a stick.

You either need to start speaking in the same language as everyone else or stop being confused that no one can figure out what the hell you're advocating for.

And if all you're want for is for the story to have more internal monologue and angst, and for Catherine to be a little nicer while still doing the exact same thing, then just say that. I'll think you're weird, but at least it won't be a long convo where you keep repeating yourself without making yourself any clearer.

Salt

This is the first time I've had to clarify on this subject so not sure why you're saying I'm repeating myself. Also not sure where the insane hostility is coming from.

I did note in other comments in the chapter what I thought she should do, I just didn't automatically repeat it in every sub thread before the topic turned to them, for obvious reasons. See below:

My thoughts? Consult Cordelia, because Frederic is right about legal precedents set by the truce and terms having a strong danger of becoming common law under the actual accords. Some don't agree with me, but my take on it is that things like magical plague aren't exactly uncommon in situations where Named are created, and there can be Named who come from obscure origins where the Llesse Accords are not well known, as well as plenty of other grey area possibilities – hence the issue of amnesty for prior action before agreeing or knowing of the Accords is likely to still be an issue after the war in Keter is over and the Accords are set in place. Take the Red Axe's point seriously and start planning ahead for how to actually address those issues, and at the least make sure there's no room for allowing these necessary compromises under the terms, becoming convenient precedents under the accords.

You can't just say "F DAT BITCH" and ignore every salient point the Red Axe made just because her conclusion was wrong. That's both irresponsible and immature, for someone in her position.

Yes the dead kings threat is still there, but those types of issues are ones that you need to address and lay legal groundwork for long before the problems come to pass; because lack of preparation leading to well intentioned laws being turned into unpleasant realities? That's the Principiate in a nutshell. Don't be a Procer.

Hence, talk to Cordelia. Take the concerns Frederic and the Red Axe brought up seriously, don't deflect because you don't like their conclusion. Use the resources you have at hand to make sure none of the Liesse Accords run into the same problems the Principiate ran into with their own legal system.

thearpox23

"Consult Cordelia ... legal precedents ... strong danger of becoming common law under the actual accords"

I somehow doubt that the Accords will have official Named representatives for good and evil, much less having them police or shield common crimes. That said, having a tea chat with Cordelia was something that already needing to happen.

"things like magical plague aren't exactly uncommon in situations where Named are created," ok...

"and there can be Named who come from obscure origins where the Liesse Accords are not well known"

So some kid from a swamp in the middle of nowhere might use ignorance as a defense after unleashing a demon or a seraph... That seems like a possible bog-standard loophole that makes money for lawyers. In no way related to the current events.

"as well as plenty of other grey area possibilities"

The Accords aren't finalized even, there are all esoteric loopholes that will come up as a matter of course.

"hence the issue of amnesty for prior action before agreeing or knowing of the Accords is ... and the Accords are set in place."

The amnesty for the Accords, whichever form one will take if at all, means that the Named won't pledge form international alliance to murder you. Unlike T&T which is a wartime document and has an actual amnesty.

"Take the Red Axe's point seriously and start planning ahead for how to actually address those issues, and at the least make sure there's no room for allowing these necessary compromises under the terms, becoming convenient precedents under the accords."

She made one point, that compromises were made to get Named aboard T&T. It wasn't news, it was necessary, and there is no reason for the accords should be affected by it.

"You can't just say "F DAT BITCH" and ignore every salient point the Red Axe made just because her conclusion was wrong. That's both irresponsible and immature, for someone in her position."

And so in summary you think that the issues Red Axe brought up should lead to a compromise. (Or no compromise depending on perspective?) And the nature of a compromise should be first discussed with Cordelia. Also Accords amnesty or something?

I did not accuse you of being extremely vague because I want to be aggressive and get a swipe at you. I did it because you are referring to salient points and compromises and issues and precedents with it being extremely unclear what they are. Even if I am responding to your points I am still half-guessing all the time.

"...those types of issues are ones ... lack of preparation leading to well intentioned laws being turned into unpleasant realities? That's the Principiate..."

'Those types' are not a descriptor. Nor does it make sense for anything to be lacking preparation considering the negotiations already took years.

"...Take the concerns Frederic and the Red Axe brought up seriously, don't deflect because you don't like their conclusion. Use the resources you have at hand to make sure none of the Liesse Accords run into the same problems the Principiate ran into with their own legal system."

And you once again mention brought-up concerns without covering what they are. You do not have to explain your whole position every paragraph but there is such a thing as a less vague choice of words.

Salt

Sure lets use direct examples. I'll be as specific as possible so you can't just keep avoiding the point by pointing the finger at me for "being vague".

Say you're some Named in the time of the Accords, off in the future.

You're the Pinister Physician. Whatever. Best of intentions, medicine oriented name. Try to cure a disease, meddle with powers beyond your understanding, accidentally cause a super plague. Should they execute you? What if the problem was in part caused by the meddling of another Named, intentional or otherwise? Should you both be found in breach of the Liesse Accords and be hanged?

Say you're some girl who accidentally unleashes some ancient horror. Call it Still Waters. From a past age. Your goal in life is to make up for your mistake, you're Rephele the Repentant Ragister. Intentional or not though, you just killed tens of thousands of people, and maybe the argument could even be made that you should've known better. It's grey. Even if you mean to do nothing but good in the world, the tens of thousands of victims of your mistake (and their surviving relatives) might not see it that way. Do you get executed, under the Liesse Accords?

Does this change if there is a crisis, not unlike the conditions the Truce and Terms were invoked in? How severe does the crisis have to be?

For SPECIFIC example, what if you're just the most irredeemable Named in the world, you caused a second Doom of Liesse on purpose, but it's quite risky to replace you in stopping an even bigger crisis. Your bargaining chip is that you're granted amnesty for your previous actions. Concede, or execute?

These aren't far-fetched situations either. The Guideverse is basically story tropes made into a setting, and those kinds of breaches of law in Morally Grey situations are a staple trope in fantasy. It's virtually guaranteed to happen, because that stuff makes for good stories.

So do you see how, even with no Dead King around, there might be situations under the Liesse Accords where it may or may not make sense to extend the same kinds of amnesty to Named in breach of the Accords? And why the Red Axe's POV is important to consider, when it's tempting to just argue for amnesty?

Do you see why, since common law is usually such a deciding factor for such cases – and I mean “common law” as in the phrase used to describe previous similar rulings which are used for guidance on judgements of current cases, not laws that are common – that Catherine cannot just act like The Red Axe and Frederic coming to a different conclusion than her means that every one of their points are just wrong?

Cat should know this kind of problem is a possibility, it's part of her job. She was just reminded in this conversation of why taking these problems into account for the future Liesse Accords is important. She's the only one with the power and resources to plan ahead for it. That's the definition of responsibility.

So even if it nettles her to concede any point at all to the Red Axe's POV, do you see why, for these purely practical specific dangers for which I have given specific practical examples as specifically as possible, that Catherine needs to do some serious thinking about how these Necessary Evils from the Truce and Terms might carry over to the Liesse Accords, and how to avoid them?

thearpox23

You've made several interesting examples that will surely happen in the future and will likely cause their own rifts. And surely the way people living then will respond to another global crisis will depend on their mettle.

What you haven't done is make a case for Red Axe's POV, once again left for me to define. Her view is a simplistic denunciation of all evil, very similar in fact to the Saint's zealotry. The kernel here is that the cost benefit analysis of giving amnesty to all including the likes of Wicked Enchanter was done two years prior and it's a bit late to go back on it now. And you still managed to not weight in on whether Red Axe should be executed for all that you wrote.

"Do you see why... Catherine cannot just act like The Red Axe and Frederic coming to a different conclusion than her means that every one of their points are just wrong?"

Red Axe and Frederic haven't even come to the same conclusion so I don't even know which course of action you support. But if the conclusion won't work, it doesn't matter who is coming to it. Catherine is next to cornered and doesn't have a lot of choice. And you haven't stated what precedent of either action Cat does would actually mean for common law. I know what common law is, but you didn't make an argument for how it affects the situation, only implications.

"She was just reminded in this conversation of why taking these problems into account for the future Liesse Accords is important."

I think you just don't understand what the Liesse Accords are. The Liesse Accords are the rule of charging heroes and villains for their crimes instead of their Name, and also a set of red lines not to cross over. Dealing with the Red Axe is a question of what to do with an ideological purist during a wartime. Things won't cross over from T&T into the Accords unless they are actually relevant, and no matter for specific your examples are. In this case having a hero kill a villain is not a crime under the Accords, period. At most you've made an argument that the next global crisis will also require some flexible moral decisions.

You speak of considering and accounting for various problems in the future, but you don't commit to a course of action. Your most concrete suggestion was still for Cat to have tea with Cordelia. It's like you're leaving all the hard brain computing to the characters while you get to harp on them for not thinking hard enough how to make a better world.

Catherine faces a set of very clear choices. Pardon Red Axe and lose the trust of all non-Woe villains under her, or Kill Red Axe and annoy the Mirror Knight and his wing. Deal with the Red Axe under the T&T and bolster the status of heroes, or hand her off to Cordelia and establish some sort of accountability to wordly powers.

The choices won't change or twist no matter how much considering and accounting Cat does, and if you have an alternative you're welcome to present it but I have yet to see even a hint of it. It's why I wrote in the first place that you want "to have more internal monologue and angst, and for Catherine to be a little nicer while still doing the exact same thing". Consider that I know how the Common Law and the Precedent works and the issue is that you never stated what you would want them to be.

Miles

Naw the only time 2 things get compared but using different standards is when you're trying to scam customers at the market or you have unacceptable reasons for one to win out over the other.

Big I

Justifications only matter to the just. I think he's on track to becoming Black Knight.

Liliet

> Of course he did not know that that is her position when he defended her, but then that is why you hold your tongue you imbecile.

Counterpoint: when Cat reacted with "lolno" to his suggestion/assumption, she didn't know this either, so... applies to both of them? 🙄

thearpox23

Not only do they consider this matter from fundamentally different principles, but Catherine was also responding to his gall in making the demand as much as the demand itself.

It would be possible for the Red Axe to have such motivations that the Mirror Knight's morality would cause him to defend her. And with enough contrivance, they could probably pass the Hanno check as well. (Something something manipulated something something the Bard is a liar.) Same excuses still do not pass the Catherine check. But then again, the main issue she had was his gall he had in trying to assert his authority.

Salt

Young Christophe may react surprisingly badly to the Red Axe's intentions, assuming he actually believes that she's genuine and not just somehow misguided.

Dude sees the world in pretty black and white terms, and we already know that he has a massive raging hate-boner for "traitors".

Oshi

Nah, paternalistic doesn't even begin to describe his moronic ass. Christophe is always going to be an obstacle to everything because he was made to be one. He's the only one who doesn't see it.

Salt

I don't know... he's old school paternalistic yes but he's also super angsty and angry about how his comrades-in-arms are dying by the droves up north against the Dead King.

It might be the battle of well-meaning ignorance vs well-meaning ignorance. Christophe is abiding by the Truce and Terms despite his disgust for all things Damned because it's a chance to save his fellow Proceran countrymen, who are as of this moment shedding their noble blood fighting The Enemy.

If I was a stubborn Christophe or Pavanie, and some wench decides to betray that alliance; make all those sacrifices into ash with no replacement solution in hand? Well, that would just get my self-righteous blood boiling.

Shveiran

I'd remind you that Cristophe was a breath away from drawing on the Representative for Below, not to mention one of the three rulers of the Alliance, over very vague suspects.

A stern defendant of the terms he is not. He is a champion of whatever he believes at the moment, and those beliefs change whenever the stupid wind.

Salt

It was actually both ways, arguably more towards Catherine being the one about to draw, at least the way it was written in the chapter.

When Frederic rode into the arsenal, Catherine was gathering Night to attack while Christophe was in the middle of spouting yet another insufferable diatribe.

Annoying? Very. Violent? No. Let's not confuse dislike for threat.

It's one thing to say he's a colossal moron – that much is true beyond a doubt – but I think it's telling of the personal bias in the comments section when so many people can't imagine any world where he's blundering into the way of someone else rather than specifically the protagonist in every scenario.

He's a character, not a plot device. Meaning as a side character who hasn't seen much screentime until now, his character can both be fleshed out and (more importantly), developed.

It's at this point in time I'd like to point out that a fairly large portion of the comments section initially regarded both Tariq and Cordelia as irredeemable antagonistic plot devices and not a thimble more, before EE finished fully fleshing out/developing those characters.

superkeaton

Hm. I still don't trust Kingfisher. Axe's talk reminds me of Lone's speeches. And the machine Cat's built, to keep the world turning, has been made to account for those like her. It's a cold thing, but at least they'll get to live to feel that coldness, which is more than the Dead King will give them.

Ninestrings

Axe is very much cut from the same lone wolf antihero cloth as the Lone Swordsman.

Interestingly that is a much less powerful story to be used against Cat at the moment, presumably because we've moved into epic territory

Salt

The fact that it's a type of story she's overcome before gives her a kind of... resistance to it, I suspect. The fact that she's beaten similar stories before will give her a distinct edge, although it'll hardly make her invincible.

We do have precedents of this kind of principle, one example is her repeated run-ins with angels. She nearly got flattened by the mere gaze of Contrition the first time around, but is now able to tell Endurance to fuck off, stand up to the full weight of Mercy's attention, and can even make the Seraphim hesitate to directly oppose her.

The Tyrant commented that every time the angels let her get away with that, she became more and more the kind of person who could get away with that. I wouldn't be surprised if it worked in similar ways with a great many narrative scenarios.

On the other hand, I imagine that patterns repeated losses may have the same effect. She'll have to be careful here, since common patterns for Catherine in particular include initial plans often going awry, and generally not getting important victories without paying an equally heavy price.

Magicturtle

You know, the red axe reminds me a lot like cat, before loss and hard choices made her the woman we see now. I didnt understand why, until i realised she saw something wrong with the world and decided to break it.

thearpox23

Nah, Cat had always considered the long-term result of her actions. "Sure, I might win the war and kick the Praesi out, but what then?" She would've never made things easier for the Dead King. The parallel you see applies to many Named with an agenda.

Magicturtle

I just cant help compare ger to cat before meeting black. Seeing someone as abhorrent as the wicke enchanter being protected, kinda reminds me of the starting whathisname evil guy. Of course there is a huge difference between a man strangeling an entire country for own gain and what cat is doing, but if you only look on the surface some similarity can be found. It also helps characterwise she seems a bit like what cat might have been if she was a hero.

thearpox23

Mazus.

It was a city, not the entire country.

And antagonizing Praes never bore any greater consequence than antagonizing Praes. No greater evil Praes was protecting Callow from.

I will give you that the Red Axe is a bit like Cat's good twin from her dreams, but then Cat was never close to her.

dadycool

She's had shortsightedness, but only in that her long-term thinking simply wasn't 5-D chess enough to properly account for the people around her, like Akua or Malicia. Overall, though, she has been looking towards final solutions. "Sure I could spark a rebellion, but that would just make a mess. Better to try and get a military education and try to earn a position that can change things." Of course, no matter how much you try, a sword will never be as good at surgery as a scalpel, which is why she'll never outwit true schemers without a Story to cheat with.

sivarajan

That's pretty much all Named. "The belief, deep down, that you know what is right and you'll see it done."

Miles

That's just one way people become villains.

sivarajan

That's pretty much all Named. "The belief, deep down, that you know what is right and you'll see it done."

Liliet

...that is far, far, far from all Named.

She certainly belongs to the same category as Catherine and Amadeus... but very few other people actually do.

Agent J

She most certainly does not. Both Black and Cat keep an eye in the future. On what comes after. Neither will flinch at tearing down what they think is wrong, but always with a plan on building a better world afterwards.

Red Axe is just an idiot with a torch and an axe to grind. She has nothing to contribute save flames and murder.

RoflCat

And to add, both of them look at the practical/realistic situations, not just spout out 'do better' without any concrete BS. Which I think is the main difference between Cat and Red is that one is 'only' idealistic, while the other actually think about how to make that dream into reality.

When Cat told the Drow they can be better, she is also guiding them on how to be better, she actually take actions and make results (The 9 years oath system + the introduction of Losara 'priesthood' to be the impartial keeper of it)

She want the Accord to become widely adopted and used, but she's also aware of the resistance she'll face and take a few steps at a time to introduce it.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

"an axe to grind"

A... RED Axe? Eh?

Liliet

Amadeus's first plan for dealing with the Praesi nobility was "kill them all, including children over the age of six".

The difference is quantitative (namely, they have a larger quality of information and understanding), not qualitative.

Agent J

Amadeus' first plan is to rip the corrupt feudal system out root and stem and replace it all with centralized institutions.

The Red Axe's plan is to destroy the T&T and let the chips fall where they may.

That's a qualitative difference.

Liliet

Amadeus's first plan was a bloody civil war that would leave Praes broken for a generation.

I get that it's not the same, I really do. But I see it as the same basic drive. Like, when Amadeus was talking about how he "doesn't take guidance from heroes" and martyrdom not being a virtue, he was talking damn near personally about Red Axe. It's something that's close enough to his and Catherine's thing they have to specifically brace to not fall into it.

Agent J

On that, I agree wholeheartedly.

Liliet

"there but for the grace of a higher Int score go I"

Sir Nil

Hunted Magician will be kicking his leg if Maesego found the Crown on his own.

Jworks

THE SHIP SETS SAIL

Letouriste

Actually, he did so last chapter. Now it looks for the nearest port town

Abrakadabra

Yes, and they are both soooo ready for docking. The ship is slowly, almost sensuously, but also inexorably, with a rigid certainty approaches, to penetrate The confines of The dock.

dadycoool

It's an interesting truth that no system will have a 100% approval rate, even among the group that it's protecting/empowering or the group that signs off on it. The Red Axe was certainly justified in her opinions and actions, even her impatience at all the pomp and circumstance that will go into her death. It's just too bad that the innocent get trampled under the wheels of necessity in cases like this.

Letouriste

She's not innocent. Been way too decisive in her actions for that.

dadycoool

She isn't now, but what about all the others who were his victims that weren't allowed justice under the T&T? I was also talking a little about the real world where murderers etc. get deals for cooperation/information. The same applies for monsters that also happen to be rich/powerful and prey on those who aren't legally allowed to get justice because the law favors the attackers.

Javvies

The Truce and Terms gave Wicked Enchanter a stay of execution for the duration of the way against the Dead King as long as the Wicked Enchanter obeyed them Truce and Terms and contributed to the war effort.
Not a pardon for his previous crimes.

It's not like anybody was saying Wicked Enchanter was a good person or that his actions would get a pass under the Accords, just that while he was obeying the Truce and Terms and contributing to the war effort, doing anything about him was not as important as the war against the Dead King, and he wasn't worth hazarding the war effort and/or Calernia over.

And I'm entirely confident that Wicked Enchanter was following the rules and contributing to the war effort to the best of his ability. He knows full well that given an excuse the Heroes would push for his execution on the slightest grounds to go for it, and it's not like he's going to find much sympathy from other Villains, and most of what support from other Villains is going to be automatic pushback against the Hero's wanting to kill a Villain, but with some legitimate basis to ground a case against him, his support will be weak, at best.

Cat herself says that Wicked Enchanter was on one of her lists for after the war. I expect that he wasn't just on a "Do Not Mourn" list, but he was probably also on the lists of Named to watch and kill if the opportunity arose. In addition, I fully expect that multiple Heroes are keeping lists of Villains who join up and taking notes about each of them and their abilities – and what they've done before signing up. I expect that Wicked Enchanter was on the hit lists of multiple Heroes for after the Truce and Terms end. And quite possibly on the to do lists for several Villains as well.

Wicked Enchanter is, after all, hardly the ideal candidate for making the case that Villains can be productive members of society and shouldn't be killed on discovery. Plus, there are probably more than a few Villains who'd kill him for what he did anyways.

Tek

Are you sure that's what "amnesty" means?

Javvies

They may be getting a "we're not going to file legal charges against you" for acts prior to signing up ... but the Truce and Terms, and their moratorium on Named on Named violence, are not permanent. Also, being a Villain is no longer automatically a crime, which is the more important part.

Once the war is over and the Accords implemented, Named can start killing each other again.

Wicked Enchanter was getting a pass for the duration of the war ... but nobody is forgetting what he did before, or what he'll likely do again after the war is over.

In modern legal equivalents ... Wicked Enchanter made a plea deal, and sentencing is getting delayed until after he done helping the prosecution with the cases he agreed to help with (ie, the war), to see how cooperative he was and how valuable his assistance was to the prosecutors (Grand Alliance), in order to determine how valuable his contributions were and how much they offset the sentence for his crimes.

I rather suspect that if Red Axe had been kept away from Wicked Enchanter for the duration, she'd have been given a fair bit of assistance in tracking him down afterwards.

Tek

I do not argue that Named on Named action will not be stopped by Accords, I just was under an impression that T&T wiped the slate clean so to speak, with your prior crimes being written off for joining up and Heroes promising not to hunt you for your past misdeeds. That is the impression I've got from reading and the word "amnesty". They will be prosecuted for their future crimes if there would be such, but it makes no sense that they would go by the route of "join fighting the DK and we'll kill you after", even if it's a maybe.

As Cat said, that just would result in (generally distrustful) Villains sitting this out entirely, of the best they can get is a stay of execution and a hypothetical lightening of a sentence. If there was no actual amnesty, like "past deed are written off" kind of amnesty, I doubt T&T would be as successful.

Now WE would be probably hunted down by a group of Heroes afterwards, but not in any official and legal capacity, instead in a personal vendetta and settling of scores. Unless he commits crimes again.

Javvies

Traditionally, being a Villain is all that any Hero needs to kill one. Also being a Villain is illegal, and puts one outside the bounds of legal protections and law.

That's the largest part of the amnesty. You don't get hunted just because your Name is empowered by Below instead of Above.

There may or may not officially be a clean slate for most purposes.

On the other hand, Wicked Enchanter's Name is based on the shit that he did to other people.

I guarantee that at minimum, that he's on multiple lists of people to track and keep an eye on after the war for when they cross the line again.

I fully expect that he's on more than a few people's hit lists, no matter what the situation is officially with respect to prewar actions. He's no longer just some asshole that is only known about by locals and can hide in relative anonymity when it comes to dealing with the wider world. He's known, now. What he's done is known.

Oshi

There is no clean slate just an suspension in violence. Everyone has to deal with what they came in with before the war afterwards. Cat mainly did it to set the idea that there can be working rules between named. She only cares so much about what form the precursor rules take on. Just so long as after the war the Accords stop thee tide of horrific mass murders.

TeK

My point was that I can swear I read about there being an amnesty to Villains who join the T&T, which makes sense because Cat would need some kind of incentive to make Villains join both it and the Accords. "We won't kill you now" is not a good incentive for risking your life, not for a Villain.

TeK

I don't think the "we will not kill you for being who you are" is enough of the concession to bring Villains into the fold. I mean Cat herself probably would've spat at such "magnanimity" and went her own way.

Liliet

My understanding is there's an amnesty... AND, separately, a promise of protection from vengeful heroes. The first one is an 'instantaneous' effect – from a legal point of view, the slate is wiped clean.

The second one lasts as long as the T&T do. Sure, he won't be prosecuted for his past crimes once the T&T is over. But neither will anyone look twice at the Red Axe for going after him then.

Salt

The main flaw with this line of argument is that Frederick made a very good point about how "temporary" measures very often end up being not so temporary, in the end. That was why he was so against setting a precedent where not everyone is judged by the same laws, and Catherine didn't entirely disagree.

Not every measure can be justified by calling it temporary, common law precedents matter. For problems like this, Catherine is NOT the best judge of situation here, that crown would likely land on Cordelia's head.

I wouldn't be surprised if many of the Principate's unbelievably labyrinthine and oftentimes self-destructive laws had origins in situations like this.

For example, one ticking time bomb related to this issue that hasn't been addressed is the immediate fallout following a victory against the dead king – or hell, if victory even looks reasonably feasible. Named aren't all idiots, and many with skeletons in their closet will start to wonder if the Dead King's fall will be followed by their swift and brutal beheadings.

At which point a difficult choice will have to be made: extend to a certain degree the same amnesties under the T&Ts to the Accords, or deal with possibly tens of rabid extremist Named unleashed upon the defenceless greater continent at a point in time where the most powerful moderates are weary, spent, or just outright incapacitated. It's not difficult to see how easy it would be to keep putting on temporary patches out of necessity until those patches can no longer be removed without ripping the whole cloth apart.

And as far as the likelihood of the situation getting bad enough that those kinds of extended measures might look tempting? Let's not kid ourselves, it's a war against the Dead King plus a simultaneous hidden war against the Intercessor. The continent will be lucky if it ONLY gets that bad.

Javvies

The Truce and Terms blanket prohibition on Named versus Named conflict is inherently temporary and unsustainable, simply by the nature of Named. That's why the Accords are based on imposing limits on acceptable methods and rules of engagement intended to limit the collateral damage of Named conflict.

There isn't going to be a situation where there moderates are exhausted from fighting the Dead King while the fringe radicals and extremists aren't exhausted from doing the same.

They're all going to be more or less equally exhausted from the war.

Plus, I'm fairly certain that the Truce and Terms will extend for a period after the war ends to allow for final negotiation and implementation of the Accords, and probably also covering the rest of the post-war negotiations.

And probably a few days grace period, after that to allow people to depart in peace.

Salt

On the contrary, the amnesty for actions prior to signing up to the T&T are both sustainable and necessary in order for the Accords to work at all. The circumstances that create Named are rarely controlled at the best of times, and it's impossible to expect all the continent to know the finer details of the Accords. Meaning that future equivalents of the Wicked Enchanter may have skeletons in their closet from as early as the moment of their bestowal, and must by necessity be given some degree of amnesty under the Accords for any actions committed before signing up. None of the radicals that need controlling will agree to start following the Accords after gaining a Name, if death is the final outcome regardless.

Not to mention, the difference between an exhausted radical and an exhausted moderate at the end of the war on Keter is fairly simple. The exhausted radical that doesn't care for the Accords only needs to survive and flee to any hole-in-the-ground to recover by preying on civilians, or a nation that doesn't recognize the Accords, such as potentially Praes, which is still a massive superpower. The grand alliance will be in absolutely no shape for a war on Praes immediately following a war on the Dead King, and Black actually taking Malicia's head is nothing assured.

Any gap in time between the threat of the dead king no longer hanging over everyone's head and the Accords not being near-universally adopted is a massive window of vulnerability. You can't simply extend the T&T when the primary method of enforcement has stopped existing, and even if you could, there's zero guarantee that negotiations for signing the Accords would be short by any means. Petty international disputes alone could drag them out for weeks or months. The only way to avoid this problem is extending temporary solutions, which is dangerous, or having the Accords signed before the war is over.

Javvies

... You're missing the point.

The point of the Accords is to ensure that Named conflict has minimal collateral damage. And also that simply being a Villain, bearing a Name empowered by Below isn't inherently illegal or grounds to get hunted and killed.

A Wicked Enchanter who emerged under the Accords won't get hunted and killed for being a Villain. They'll be hunted and killed for being a mind controlling, rapist asshole.

You don't have to do things that are terrible or evil in order to get a Name empowered by Below instead of Above.

Also, I fully expect that the Truce and Terms are explicitly designed to last for the duration of the war and for the duration of the negotiations immediately following, the result of which will presumably be the Accords, which I suspect are also quietly and perhaps unofficially being worked on during the war.

The Dead King is not an enforcement measure for the Truce and Terms. Sure, he's an important motivator for the creation of the Truce and Terms. But some kind of formal Truce would have been required to negotiate the Accords anyways.

Salt

You're the one missing the point, you're seeing only the idealized picture of the Accords. In reality, they're going to be a hell of a lot messier than that. Why do you think the exact terms of the Accords haven't even been mentioned in the story yet? It'd be too much going on all at once, and it'd ruin the narrative pacing.

For example, what happens to Named who are in breach of the Accords due to the event that caused them to become Named in the first place? Do you provide them amnesty for that? What about Named from backgrounds of lesser education or obscurity that might be in breach of the Accords, until however long it takes them to learn of them? What about Named who are on the surface in breach of the Accords by action but have more than good intentions, whose circumstances block them from truth tellers? What about Named like Akua who decide to turn over a new leaf after initially being in breach, who might still make up for their damage upon the world?

These aren't even all the grey-area possibilities, just some of the most likely ones.

For such cases, do you have them hunted under the Accords without ever having a proper chance to agree to them, and thus give them no incentive to follow the Accords in the first place? Or do you give them amnesty for prior actions – however conditional – perpetuating a gross injustice for the length of the Accords existence?

That's the point I'm making. Difficult legal grey areas are going to exist all over the damn place in the Accords, and every single decision made under their predecessor – the Truce and Terms – has a potential for becoming a permanent common law basis. Those dangers cannot just be hand-waved away, we'll-cross-that-bridge-when-we-get-there style, nor can we pretend that those dangers – which have existed in every single legal system or diplomatic agreement anywhere – simply don't exist.

As for the Truce and Terms themselves, the Dead King IS the lynchpin holding them all together. Yes the truces are the bones of it, but the threat of immediate continental annihilation without such truces in place is what's causing people and nations who would otherwise be bitterly opposed to such terms to uphold the truces. Once that's gone, they can go ahead and break the Truce and Terms, and the consequence won't be the death of all life on the continent so much as some very unhappy people.

The truce isn't going to hold for long when the threat that's causing the truce to exist is gone. The Accords need to be signed and problems like Praes need to be resolved before the end of the war. War on Keter is just a temporary window of opportunity for Catherine to do the real work in making the Accords a reality, and after that there'll be decades of major legal grey areas to sort through, with all the moral conundrums that apply. The real work has barely even started on the Accords.

hakureireimu

The Accords are very minimal; it only prohibits superweapons like magical plague and flying fortress so there's going to be very little grey area. It doesn't care about ordinary crimes like rapes and torture. So no, very few people are going to be in breach of the Accords.

Shveiran

Precisely. There will be no amnesty in the Accords, because they will not cover ordinary crimes. That remains the purview of the signatory kingdoms.

The objective is to change the way the war between good and evil is waged, to stop those conflicts from involving armies and dragging countries in their wake, or to toy with forces best left alone. If you stab a fool in Callow, Callowan laws will decide whether you are guilty or not. The Accords don't get into it unless you are using a demon to hold the weapon.

5th Holy Sheeprabbit, Kilimanjaro Estelion Sharlulu Asheel Vinchance Celenalia di ef Falufiluu'Luufilaafee \(The 35th\) da ne!

They can wait until the Dead King is dealt with, and then kill him when they're not risking hundreds of thousands for a personal vendetta.

erebus42

The innocence of the Red Axe is questionable at best, but in principle you are correct it is a shame. The problem is innocent people will get hurt regardless, so when the choice is between having countless innocents get trampled or having fewer innocent people get trampled well...

Salt

The Grey Pilgrim would probably agree with that logic and kill that innocent without a moment's hesitation, if not necessarily for lack of anguish. A very large number of civilians would likely cheer him on.

It was that exact logic that he used to justify the Tenth Crusade and his attempts to kill Catherine, after all.

A younger Catherine Foundling would probably fight that verdict tooth and nail, if only for the arrogant presumption of someone to think they had the right to choose that road for her. It's one thing to choose to sacrifice yourself for others, another to have the choice made for you.

erebus42

That is always the main concern: whether a necessary evil is truly necessary. That is why it is always important to keep an open mind to new possibilities and pivot when necessary. That being said at the end of the day tough choices do have to be made and often times no matter what you do there are unfortunate consequences. However refusing to choose and letting more innocent people suffer than is necessary or that can be avoided does not make you more righteous. It makes you a stupid selfish coward.

Salt

I don't disagree. I'm just pointing out that it's interesting how this justification for Catherine's actions now is the exact same as the one of the Tenth Crusade. Only now the roles are reversed, and Catherine herself is the one trying to sacrifice someone else for the Greater Good/as a Lesser Evil. If that logic actually flies, it ends up putting the Pilgrim, Saint, Mirror Knight, and the rest of the crusaders from the tenth crusade solidly on the "right" side of things, at least based on what they knew at the time.

Which leaves us with the question: are Heroes of Above actually more Justified in their seeming high-handed arrogance than it appears from Catherine's perspective, or is both the Tenth Crusade and the current Black Queen in the wrong?

erebus42

The Mirror Knight , the Saint, and even (to a certain extent) the Pilgrim's concept of the "greater good" were rooted in nebulous ideals, belief in their own infallibility as Heroes, and the idea that things will just work out instead of around the actual consequences of their actions. They offered very little in regards to actually trying to fix anything and instead focused on tearing down something they found unpalatable based on the aforementioned nebulous ideals. Cat is willing to at least consider the bigger picture and take alternatives-unfortunately most other alternatives are shit. The situations are certainly similar enough to add a touch of irony to it but they're not quite as equivalent as you're presenting them as. The justification of the "greater good" may be the same but the meaning of that justification, as well as the context and facts of the situation are key differentiating factors here.

Salt

You could argue that for the non-Named, but the Named Heroes in the Crusade had direction from the closest thing in Calernia to an all-seeing omniscient eye in the sky for minimizing losses – the Choir of Mercy.

We know for a fact through Tariq's interludes that Mercy has been able to see situations where the Pilgrim could minimize harm from nearly anywhere on the continent, and the minimum level of power needed to obscure their vision even for a specific individual is outright godhood – the Sisters, the Dead King, and the Intercessor. We also know that they're not a big fan of explaining their intentions in detail, and the Pilgrim often only found out what big crisis he actually averted later on.

As far as guide-verse canon goes, if you're Above aligned then the Pilgrim is one of the closest things possible to an absolute assurance that what you're doing at the least has the potential to be huge Greater Good. Mercy itself is one of the most morally grey of the Choirs, fully willing to work with Villains like Catherine without missing a beat if they think it'll minimize suffering, so it's not as if they'll allow some sort of extra loss of life on principle.

So if you don't have to have a high opinion of Providence or the Choirs, that's understandable. If you think l they're far less infallible than the Heroes seem to believe, you're probably right. If what they did doesn't make you like them very much, I'd agree with that sentiment on the spot.

But to say that the Heroes in the Tenth Crusade were just attacking Catherine because of some vague dislike for her, or that they didn't have some clear Greater Good in mind is just outright incorrect. They were operating on the closest thing they can get to Above-provided iron certainty, as far as Above-aligned people are concerned.

Heroes in the guide-verse have an uncountable number of flaws to criticize already, we don't need to make up new ones to criticize them with.

hakureireimu

The 10th Crusade was sold publicly as a defensive war against permanent hell gates, and privately as a land grab. Very much not a necessary evil thing.

hakureireimu

No, a younger Catherine Foundling would look at the big picture and realize that she can't risk the safety of her country for justice for a single Villain.

Andrew Smith

The same Young Catherine who manipulated the Lone swordsman into army rebellion from his small party (where he tried a redemption plot on Cat)

Ninestrings

The Red Axe is like one of those DnD players with the very edgy backstory that has nothing to do with the plot you're trying to tell as a DM.

Danica Bihlmaier

Well... that's why the group should sit together BEFORE starting a campaign and/or /the DM gets to say "No" to character concepts that don't fit the decided-on route everyone wants to play – while the players get to walk away from groups/GM's campaign offers that don't fit what they want.

Danica Bihlmaier

But that's the whole problem here, isn't it? Calernia has multiple would-be GMs that don't agree on way too much =P

Miles

The DM doesn't get to say no for random bs reasons like that. It's literally in the dm guide.

edrey

They should just seal her name away and send her to cordelia saying is not their jurisdiction and asking for her head, mazego should be able to do the ritual and the arsenal must have the tools too. Then the truce will hold because she isn't named

sivarajan

That's a clear violation of the spirit of the Terms, and acting so clearly in bad faith will break them.

edrey

You should read the several debates in the story and the people reading it, again. It's not a perfect system, they are humans, what's more important, morality or avoiding damage, and how it was said in the previous chapter 'at its core is only pride'. Millions of lives or the illusion of a utopia is the question here.

sivarajan

Who said anything about morality? The whole point of the Terms is to get Villains to cooperate, since appealing to their better nature, asking them to consider "millions of lives" won't work; if Cat starts poking loopholes in them for herself, they will break.

edrey

The truce and term are temporary and even the accord just put a base line with just limitations, the spirit of the law will break and not just the villains will do it, this is a gradual change for the future, killing red axe that way won't destroy the truce because the whole point is making named learn they are not above mortal law, if cordelia, cat and the blood ask for her head it would fall. The terms are just a temporal tool for that. Now i think about it. Cat should just contact them directly and tell them that she is a enemy of the GA and deal with her not with procer law but of the three nations

TeK

Oh come on. What kind of logic is "the system isn't perfect so let's BURN IT ALL DOWN TO THE GROUND"? She didn't even had to do anything, just wait a few years and she would be free to kill him anyway! I can't even find any sympathy for her, the whole "my wants outweigh the needs of everyone else lol" worldview is unforgivable no matter what happened to her.

Ninestrings

Red Axe is a revenger, she's going about it in a pretty cold way but her story is fundamentally retributive one.

A wrong is done to her, and she redresses it. Even Cat acknowledges she understands where she's coming from.

In any other telling of this, a woman tracking down her abuser across half the continent and finding him sheltered by a corrupt system that she dies striking against you'd be cheering for her, but she's not our protagonist, and our story isn't that simple.

Rey d`Tutto

I'll give you the premise but for one thing.
Actually one Named. The Dead King.

Continental Threat.

She deliberately decided her pain was worth wrecking the Continent.

F that B.

Liliet

It's pretty human to not understand the scale of a threat that's beyond any precedent.

Aotrs Commander

"Being human" is not a blanket excuse for any amount of wilful stupidity.

If it was, it'd be a strong argument in favour of the Dead King, to be honest.

Salt

We currently live in an era where large groups of people are actively protesting for their right to get infected with a plague. If anything, the level of stupidity in this web novel is a pale facsimile of everyday human stupidity.

Pretty realistic, all in all. Could use more angry Proceran peasants rioting to let the Dead King kill and raise everyone because he's "a straight shooter that tells it like it is". 9/10 realism, EE.

Shveiran

Well, yes, but is this meant as a reply to Aotrs? Because her attitude being realistic doesn't make it any more defensible, in my opinion.

Aotrs Commander

Precisely.

Salt

The fact that the characters have fairly realistic flaws as well as virtues is good writing. Unrealistically virtuous caricatures of people for characters does not typically make for a very good story.

If you mean moral defensibility, her Aotrs point still doesn't hold up. Near every character in the serial is a relatively complex one, no real one-dimensional antagonists or protagonists, and the Red Axe isn't an exception. Her final conclusion on the T&T being wrong doesn't mean at least parts of her rationale aren't correct, or at a minimum understandable.

Miles

The dead king had plenty of precedent. That's how everyone else knows he's a threat.

Liliet

The Dead King has established precedent mostly for raiding. Everyone "knows" he's "a" threat, very few people REALLY know WHAT kind of threat he is.

sivarajan

Is a continent that grants amnesty to the Wicked Enchanter worth protecting against the Dead King?

erebus42

Yes, because it is full of people who are not the wicked Enchanter

sivarajan

Then you hate the Wicked Enchanter less than the Red Axe did. Her perspective was, presumably that she would break anything, anybody who got in her way, whether they be gods or kings or all the armies in Creation.

erebus42

As the chapter showed this was more about the Terms and what they stood for in her mind and not wholly about the Enchanter. I also feel like you're not taking the context of that line into account and are trying to draw a false equivalency between her and Cat. She said that in regards to the protection of her home and people. If anything the Red Axe is far more comparable to William or the Saint. It's not about protecting people or building things. For them its about destroying what they find unpalatable based off of nebulous ideals and without regard to collateral damage.

Shveiran

Her perspective is also that it doesn't matter if her mum, her nieces, all her childhood friends and also all puppies and orphans on Calernia died and were turned into zombies, so long as she got to kill the Wicked Enchanter.

I really can't symphatize with that.

Ninestrings

Random question but do we know the Dead King is a Name? or just a title?

He's effectively reached apotheosis, he may be beyond Names.

Salt

Presumably, but we don't know for sure. I don't believe he's ever used an aspect in the story. This could mean he has no aspects, that he has only passive aspects like Ranger, or that he's hiding his aspects in the longest long-game ever. All pretty much guesswork at this point.

Miles

Technically most or all villains are immortal, except their one weakness: lethal injuries.

Meaning they don't age, and live forever until stopped by violence, usually of the heroic persuasion.

Or lose their Name, I guess, which is basically just suicide by that point so it doesn't count.

TeK

I am not easily entrapped by narrative no matter the side represented. Thanks in no small part to PGtE, tbh.

I do not cheer for revenge. Punitive system should serve to prevent crimes, punishment is a side-effect, not an intended consequence.

Liliet

I'm here with you, but I also see Red Axe's perspective. It's fallacious but what the fallacy is founded on is actually trust in Catherine and the leadership of the GA, ironically. She doesn't believe the T&T as they are can possibly be NECESSARY. She believes they surely have power to make something BETTER, and they must be pushed into it. It's... very idealistic, and the flaw in her perspective is that she's not intimidated enough.

That's... honestly sympathetic to me from an angry teenager.

TeK

Oh yeah. I acknowledge my own bias, because all my life I was usually T00 intimidated. Also pessimistic. In her position I would probably think that if I fuck everything up, the new alternative would be even worse, lol.

M0och123

No longer being able to be trapped by the narrative is an (unfortunate/fortunate I don't know which) side effect of reading PGtE that is true.

I also like your point about punitive systems and their goals. A recurring problem in this story is Named not seeing the actual goal of an action and freaking out and completely ignoring the explanation in favour of good ol' stabby stabby. shrug

sivarajan

The conflict you're describing is the classic deontology ("good ol' stabby stabby") vs. utilitarianism, seeing the good final goal of (usually evil, or at the very least morally dubious) actions.

sivarajan

There ARE different perspectives on the purpose of a punitive "justice" system; you are wrong, but in an understandable way.

sivarajan

Crimes will happen anyway. The state punishes criminals because the weak typically cannot revenge themselves upon the strong.

Justice and law are different. What you describe may be law, but justice is usually proportionate revenge.

Salt

Justice in the guide-verse has been alluded to as being far more complex than eye for an eye style revenge, by the Hanno perspectives that show what the Seraphim see. Hanno looked at an irredeemable asshole criminal and the Seraphim showed him their POV, the cause and effect of every action/circumstance in the criminal's life that led to the crime as well as every action of every forefather of that criminal. It nearly burned Hanno's mind into cinders just to witness it.

Probably won't ever be defined in specifics though, considering how much of a moral quagmire that could turn into for a writer to seriously attempt defining Justice as a broad term.

TeK

Yes they will happen anyway, how does it in any way argues against the intended purpose of a system. Like yeah, people get sick and die anyway, yet the purpose of wearing masks is not to instill slave instincts in the populace.

TeK

Justice is an inherently selfish egotistical indulgence, nothing more.

Mental Mouse

Yeah – no matter how sympathetic her personal cause, she's a loose cannon in the fight against the Dead King.

Big I

I'm worried for Cat. Her confidence in her own victory is reminding me of Malicia. I think this chapter, and the book in general so far, is foreshadowing the failure of the Truce and Terms, and the necessity (hah) of some radical, half chocked, reckless plan from her to make the Accords a reality.

Salt

It'll probably be a narrative battle more than anything. Catherine is right that she's beaten the old "lighting a torch without an alternative solution in mind" story plenty of times before. However she's also been on the other end of "the underdog beats Goliath who is attempting to sacrifice them for their political convenience" story equally often. Cat vs the Lone swordsman in the Liesse rebellions, Cat vs the Grey Pilgrim in the Tenth Crusade, Cat vs the Saint in the ruins of Liesse, Cat vs Cordelia throughout the better part of four volumes, Cat vs the Bard just now.

If she does win, she'll need to make sure she stays on the former side of the story and not get caught on the latter side. Whether she necessarily deserves to win? The jury is out on that one, fierce debates in comments to follow.

Juff

Typo Thread:

No so > Not so the that > that the out in the > out to the had still had the muscles arms > still had the muscled arms if I she > if she before the ever > before she ever neither I would not > I would not But there were > But these were so land as it > so long as it she has she my blood (not sure what this should be) to labyrinthine, > too labyrinthine, right bout > right about

"It would not > "I would not reminded myself (missing fullstop) movement form > movement from stretch if his > stretch of his Autumn," > Autumn."

theorel

she has she[d] my blood took me a bit to figure that one out too.

Naeddyr

She's gonna get pregnant, it's gonna be twins, one of them ends up as a Hero and the other a Villain, calling it now.

Decius

Twins, but one ends up being an old-school monologing flying fortress, and the other one is a more practical version that gets goblins and dwarves to coordinate on anti-air artillery.

Both are ambiguous between good and evil.

Mental Mouse

Not until the epilogue, she's not! Between narrative and Sve Noc's oversight...

Burnsy

So far Cat's crammed one crown into Sve Noc and made a pair of murder goddesses, and turned the other one into an entire domain/pocket universe. Can't wait to see what she does with #3.

I also have absolutely no doubt that Cat is gonna sleep with Kingfisher and in doing so completely undermine his credibility in the eyes of MK and his followers. Win some, lose some I guess

Adrian_V

"I did it, Catherine."

I cocked an eyebrow.

"Did what?"

"I just ended it on a cliffhanger!"

M0och123

Just an observation... I absolutely love the comment section of this series!
Cheers to Lilith and Konstatin for always commenting their interesting insights!
I almost look forward to reading the comment section as much as the actual chapter.

Konstantin von Karstein

Thanks! 😊 It's exactly the same for me. And the fact that everyone is so respectful is a big plus.

trashdragon

I kind of love how the Red Axe is very clearly NOT talking about Names or Villains or Evil or Below but unjust systems and the victims of them that the people at the top of them just brush off as acceptable losses and it just completely flies over Cat's head because she's all about Names, and Stories and her dick waving contest with stoopid, poppyhead heroes, and has never actually herself been on the receiving end of the injustices of Praes, which is fact has one way or another has been patronizing her her whole life.

I really do get the idea that Cat BELIEVES that her way is the best way to stop conflict and chaos and defeat the Dead King. But in that belief she's just as stubborn and bull-headed than any of the heroes, and as much as she talks about compromises, she refuses to make compromises in any way that pulls things in the opposite direction from her brutal, hard woman making hard choices system.

And then people like Cat wonder why OTHER people end up radicalized lol.

Abrakadabra

Fair point. People do get radicalized a lot more if the system is inflexible.

erebus42

You're never going to get a system completely free of injustice. And while it's fine to get angry about it when you don't have anything actually constructive to contribute or provide any better realistic alternative well...

Miles

Red axe has a point though. Its not like life is just on pause while the t&t are in effect. While the amnesty is in effect people are building up their power bases. Given the situation if Red hadn't at least tried she'd likely have lost her Name.

Severely weakened it and hurt her later chances at the very least.

Burlyraven

Considering I have the theory from the monthly bonus chapters that we're seeing the Wicked Enchanter's origin, and the nagging suspicion that the main female character therein may be the Wicked Enchanter's first victim, and the fact that said female character is a minor noble, it would certainly make things far more complicated if Red Axe were to be revealed as having the same name as said female character.

Miles

Too bad the crown rightfully belongs to the Mirror Knight, who recovered the sword of the lady from the lake.

It would be cool to have an artifact for the villain to keep this duality going but when there's a hero with a sword and a villain with a crown the only way it ends is going to leave the truce in flames.

Too bad the MK is going to die and the sword returned to the lake.

Salt

Isn't Catherine's staff already her Artifact anyway?

She was offered the Good King's sword after the Twilight Ways were made. She decided to give up on swords and asked his grave for something to help her stay on the right path, at which point the tree he was buried under snapped off a branch in response.

We know the thing is semi-sentient already, judging by how it threw a minor tantrum when Cat tried to illusion it into looking like the Wicked Enchanter's staff with Night. She had to calm it down by talking to it, of all things, which narratively just screams early stages legendary artifact.

Drunken Dwarf

Well the Red Axe not being worried is bad. Cat seems to think it's cause she is cut from the same cloth as the Lone Swordsman but the Wandering Bard has gotten a lot more involved since that one.

I wonder if the Red Axe will actually end up being that Constance person the Doddering Sage got Cat to promise to protect. It might not be enough to break the Terms but it might provide enough of an opening for the Mirror Knight to rebel.

Sam

Oh, I caught up. Now what am I going to binge read?

Chapter 30: Quarters

"Admittedly, it was my fault for not specifying the flying fortress had to be able to fly in directions other than up. Oh, it can fly down as well? Splendid. Guards, drag the Lord Warlock beneath my fortress. It'd be a shame not to use it at least once."

– Dread Emperor Inimical, the Miser

"Walk me through it," I said, then added, "metaphorically speaking."

Masego's mouth snapped shut. His quarters were larger than I'd expected, but I was rather familiar with the way it got filled from our years together. It was unusual, by Wasteland standards. Given how sorcery tended to come with some degree of wealth and influence, at least in Praes, the rooms of most mages I'd seen tended to be tasteful and well-furnished. Many even had a corner set aside to receive guests and a few impressive-looking magical trinkets to impress the uninitiated. Research or actual practice of sorcery would take place not there but in workshops and mage towers, behind heavy wards and away from the prying eyes of rivals. Masego, on the other hand, had never seen sorcery as something he practiced. He was a mage first and foremost, even without his magic, so in his mind there was nothing to separate his living quarters from a workshop. Our surroundings made that exceedingly clear.

Where my own quarters in the Arsenal had a parlour to entertain guests, he instead had a neat and well-organized library whose shelves went from floor to ceiling. A comfortable scribing desk – I'd actually seen cushions like this one's on Alcazar furniture and the red didn't match the wood, so Indrani had probably stolen it – with enough leg room for him to sit reading without feeling cramped was the only concession to this being somewhere actually lived in. The same couldn't be said of the larger room deeper in, where I found the mixture of lazy chaos and almost rigid orderliness to be a nostalgic sight: like his tents out on campaign, or his rooms in Laure. While dirty clothes, plates with half-eaten meals on them and the blade cleaning kit Hakram had gifted Indrani a few years back had been strewn around without a care, it actually only served to contrast with the parts Zeze did care to keep clean.

Like a long table with half a dozen leather-bound manuscripts, the sole open one revealing Masego's finicky calligraphy in ink, also boasting several reference books I dimly recognized from my continuing lessons on sorcery with Akua. All were laden with bookmarks, though none more so than the heavy tome titled Metaphysics of Realms from some ancient Warlock by the name of Olowe. Stacked scrolls and carefully folded parchments along with a nice leather armchair told me this was likely where Zeze sat to work, and there was not a single crumb or speck of dust on that table to be found. Another nook looked like a small alchemy lab, another like an enchanting table and yet another was covered in glass domes constraining pulsing luminous mushrooms. Experiments, I rather hoped. Around those islands of order even the wood shavings from the wooden carvings Indrani had carelessly sown around everywhere else seemed reluctant to enter.

I wouldn't but it above Masego to have warded them.

The large bed in the corner, which evidently neither he nor Indrani had bothered to make, seemed to have been placed there almost like an afterthought – fitted in there after the important stuff had been, half-heartedly wedged in where there was still room. My suspicions that he might have forgot to put actual furniture in there at first were deepened by the way the dressers were on opposite sides of the room and the closet was awkwardly close to a cupboard opening the opposite way. It went from suspicion to standing assumption when I noticed that the small table where they ate meals – by the amount of dirty plates – was clearly Archer's work by the look of the carvings. Zeze was not particularly fond of tapestries, so I assumed the few hung on the walls were there at Indrani's addition, but the sheer amount of magelights and candles was all him. Beautiful and elaborate carpets clearly from the Wasteland – no one wove those quite like the Taghreb – added a splash of colour that livened up the room into a place where it might actually be pleasant to live.

Yet it was a small room behind all this where we stood, though, behind a steel door warded tightly so none of the influences from the other parts of his quarters could drift in and contaminate the workings. Here the walls were bare stone and even the tables and chairs polished granite, with only his work on the Quartered Seasons breaking up the stony monotony. Half a dozen copper boxes with glass lids and water held in crystal spheres – an improvement on the traditional scrying bowl, though significantly more fragile – revealed shifting colourful shapes from places beyond Creation, while on the left wall a great slate covered in markings and formulas depicting the secrets that the Hierophant had successfully teased out of the Pattern. I'd been invited so sit on one of the granite chairs but instead elected to stand at his side, looking at the slate.

I gestured for Hierophant to begin, and with sharp nod he moved closer to the slate. He found a corner of it without writing, then paused and turned towards me. With his full body not, just his eyes, which got my attention.

"I will begin by noting that the Hunted Magician's information was the definitive factor in this success," Masego said.

My brow rose. I'd suspected that it'd be useful stuff, but this was much stronger praise than I'd anticipated. Hierophant was in no way shy about claiming intellectual successes when he believed himself their author, and to this day still utterly disinterested with politics, so if he was talking up the Magician then every word spoken was true.

"I hear he's come across some trouble under the Terms?" Masego continued.

"He worked with the Bard, among other things," I said. "I'm not eager to press for an execution, given his uses, but letting him off with a slap on the wrist isn't in the cards."

"I've little interest in those matters," Masego admitted. "But since you told me he gave what he knew as part of an arrangement for leniency, I'll specify that his information saved me possibly literal years of work. I was looking in entirely the wrong places."

That'd weigh on the scales, though less than Zeze might expect. The way I saw it, the Hunted Magician couldn't be allowed to buy his way out of consequences no matter what he offered up. All that he floated us and ended up panning out, though, should be put together as a case for why certain punishments should be sought instead of others.

"I'll pass that along to his tribunal," I said. "And I might need you to put it in writing at some point."

He nodded.

"Duly noted."

From the look on his face, he was already tossing the entire matter into the pile of things he felt no particular need to remember. To my eye it was still an improvement that he'd bothered to speak to the subject at all instead of simply assuming I'd handle it, so if anything I was rather pleased.

"The crux of the matter is a question that concerns one of the few commendable books on sorcery to come out of the Principate, Madeline de Jolicoeur's work 'Essences of the Fey,'" Masego said, charmingly taken by his subject.

He drew a small circle on the slate, his long fingers deft. It was always heartwarming to see him genuinely in his element. I frowned a heartbeat later, though.

"I'm pretty sure I've heard that name before," I told him.

Where? Obviously it was from Proceran history, but my studies of that had been rather skewed. I'd focused on the major wars and turning points, along with Cordelia Hasenbach's rise and reign. Considering the sheer size of the Principate, even though the state hadn't even existed for half the time Callow had that still meant a staggering number of things would have slipped through the cracks of my learning.

"I believe she was also known by her contemporaries as the Fey Enchantress," Masego said.

Ah, her. Leave it to Zeze to primarily remember the villainess that'd taken over most of Cantal and Iserre only to fail at toppling Salia and the Highest Assembly for her apparently impressive magical research.

"Lady Madeline was part fae herself, and familiar with the Courts of Arcadia, which eventually led her to ask the question of what happens when fae are killed," Masego said. "Her work was the first to suggest that fae cannot truly die, and that the changing of the seasons is the mechanism through which the Courts renew themselves."

"So fae don't die," I said. "You told me that several times in the past, and I've seen the proof of it myself. What's useful about this?"

"When the physical body of a fae is slain, they are not destroyed," Masego said. "We know their essence continues to exist, as it will be spun anew into another fae come the changing of seasons. Where, then, does that essence go?"

Huh. I'd not considered that, actually. Fairies didn't have souls, so it wasn't like they'd pass into beyond and then be resurrected when they were needed by their endless cycle again.

"It could lapse back to the crown of their respective court," I eventually said. "Some fae are dukes one cycle and princes another, so we know there's a variance in power to some extent. It might be the 'crown' is a system for apportioning that power into different fae."

Masego turned burning eyes towards me, noticeable even under the eyecloth.

"Akua has been very good for you," he seriously said.

Words to make half of Callow faint in rage, but I decided to let him finish his thought before settling on a reaction.

"You've always been clever," Zeze continued, "but now your instincts are grounded in knowledge. I am glad she has been tutoring you, even if your closeness makes Vivienne unhappy."

"More than just Vivienne," I reminded him, and left it at that.

He shrugged, unconcerned with the broader ramifications. Most days I wished I could be as well, given how much simpler it'd make my life.

"A return to the crown was my first theory as well," Hierophant told me. "Which led to the creation of the copper eyes. Through a process you are not educated enough to understand even if I explain, I created power that would behave similarly to Spring or Autumn and released it in different places with the aim of tracing it back to the crowns."

This part I'd known about, though not the reasoning behind it. The 'copper eyes', the scrying boxes in the room with us, were meant to follow the power he was releasing into the wilds and so find the location of the crowns. They were linked to measuring devices that'd been put out in different layers of Creation and adjoining realms, with great difficulty, but for all the trouble last I'd heard that avenue had proved to be something of a dead end.

"It didn't work, though," I said.

"It worked perfectly," Masego contradicted. "It simply found nothing. My theory when facing those results was that I was simply not releasing the power in the correct places, which was not improbable given the size of Arcadia alone – much less the full spectrum of the search."

"So what changed?" I asked.

"To understand that, first consider a more recent theory introduced by my own father," Masego said, drawing a second circle on the slate. "Namely, that all of Arcadia – even the fae themselves – are of the same fundamental matter, with the differences between a stone and a duchess being essentially cosmetic. Father suggested that fae cannot truly die not because of an effective immortality of essence, but instead because they are not truly alive."

He spoke of Warlock with a tinge of wistfulness, but the grief had visibly faded. I wasn't too surprised. When the Dead King wasn't riding in the back of his head, Masego actually tended deal with his emotions better than most of the Woe. I set that aside and considered his actual words instead, the theory the Sovereign of the Red Skies had put forward. I wasn't quite sure I bought it, not after some of the things I'd seen.

"If the fae were entirely self-contained in their story cycles, I'd agree with that," I noted. "But that theory doesn't explain Larat."

Who had walked away from kingship Twilight and become something else. If fae were not more thinking than a trebuchet or a water wheel, merely more complex, how could his actions be explained?

"A fascinating contradiction," Masego warmly agreed. "Are Larat and your former Wild Hunt then the first fae to have ever lived, or by virtue of living do they cease being fae at all?"

"Which links to Quartered Seasons how?" I asked.

"It doesn't," Hierophant replied without missing a beat. "I simply find it a gripping mystery."

I, uh, should have seen that coming. Honestly it was a sign of how engaged he was with this subject that he'd only ended up going down a side path the once.

"Returning to the theoretical framework," Masego happily said, "if we believe both Lady Madeline and Father we are led to a particular state of affairs. Fae are not destroyed when their body is slain, return cyclically, and are not fundamentally distinguishable from the rest of Arcadia."

My eyes narrowed.

"A return to the earth," I said. "That's what you're getting at. Like Arcadia itself is a pool of water, and when they 'die' the water just returns to the pool."

"Precisely," Hierophant grinned. "From there I draw not on the work of others but on my own, if you'll forgive the intellectual vanity."

"I'll magnanimously deign to do so," I replied.

He eyed me sideways, knowing there'd been sarcasm in that sentence but with little interest in deciphering where and why. He still drew a third circle, below and in between the first two.

"My own Quartered Seasons theory was built on the back of the two older theories I've introduced you to," Masego said. "Madeline de Jolicoeur suggested that the changing of seasons was a way for the courts to renew themselves, but I would venture to go further. The existence of the seasons themselves is a mechanism for that very purpose, allowing a set of two seasons to be active while the other two become ambient and begin condensing into their coming shape. Your own vision, Catherine, made it clear that the transitions between seasons were not instantaneous. Given Arcadia's otherwise loose accord with creational laws, there must be a mechanical reason for this to be so."

"You're losing me," I admitted. "I thought that your theory was about the separation between a court's 'crown' and its 'power'."

"It is," Masego said. "Think of Arcadia as the pool of water you mentioned."

He drew a large circle in the centre of the space.

"Each Court is, for lack of a better term, a smaller pond that will be filled through a canal at regular intervals."

His hand moved again, depicting four lines leading out of the large circle and leading into four smaller circles.

"All power is limited," Hierophant stated, idly filling in the large circle with 'water'. "I believe that, for reasons of stability and coherence, only two ponds can ever be safely filled from the pool's water. That leaves two ponds' worth of power returned to ambient Arcadia, slowly shaping themselves into the coming seasons. If all four ponds are filled..."

"The pool would be empty," I frowned. "And so Arcadia would grow thin. That seems dangerous."

"It would be, which is why I believe a deeper mechanism ensures that only two ponds can be full at a time," Masego said. "The decay in victory of Winter or Summer until they become Spring and Autumn, which you saw in vision, would be the visible part of that mechanism in action."

"So the water is the power, that I get," I said. "That still leaves out the crowns."

He nodded, pleased, and methodically drew little crowns above each of the four smaller circles, the 'ponds'.

"The crowns are, in effect, simply the shape of the pond the water is poured into," Masego said. "Given the cosmic scope of these 'waters', however, this had still made them godheads in every meaningful sense."

I watched the slate board, fingers clenching and unclenching. He'd not kept talking, which meant he'd given me the rules of this as he knew them. It also meant that I might be able to figure it out, at least in part. It was a sloppy habit to have all this explained to me all the time, one that might come back to bite me in the future, so I forced myself to think.

"When the King of Winter and the Queen of Summer wed," I said, "neither of them lost their crown. They didn't stop being royalty, just became the royalty of something new."

"Correct," Masego said.

He drew a line through two of the found crowns. On opposite ends of the pool, as Hierophant was nothing if not precise even in his doodles.

"But I know they didn't get to keep the power of Winter, because I got my hands on it," I said. "And then Sve Noc ate it, to stabilize the Night into something that won't destroy their entire species if it collapses."

He drew a line through one of ponds already bereft of a crown.

"I am still uncertain whether the lack of corresponding crown to go with the power you inherited is what kept you largely sane or was instead the very reason for your troubles with principle alienation," Masego admitted. "Regardless, it is undoubtedly why you were only ever able to command but the barest fraction of that power."

"If your 'deeper mechanism' was working right, when the newborn Court of Arcadia Resplendent was formed there would have been two ponds back in the pool," I slowly said. "The power of Spring and Autumn."

His lips quirked. I'd underestimated how much and how long he'd been wanting to talk to someone about this, I thought. The secrecy meant neither of us had brought in even the Woe fully, though Hakram knew some things and no doubt Indrani had gone looking through everybody's papers as was her wont. Masego drew lines through two ponds, the same who still had their crowns.

"Given that in this state their very purpose is to be shaped anew for a coming cycle, it would explain the ease by which this unprecedented Court of Arcadia Resplendent was formed," Masego agreed. "And we look at two crowns' worth of control for two ponds' worth of power, which would lead to a highly stable arrangement explaining why we've not heard of collapse in Arcadia since."

"Winter's power went into Night," I said. "Which means it has to be Summer that went into Twilight, it's the only pond of power that was still free. Except we had no call on that power, Zeze."

"We did not," Hierophant agreed. "Yet you struck a bargain with the Prince of Nightfall, who did."

What I'd promised him was seven mortal crowns and one, though, and while we'd undeniably both been at war with Summer at the time neither of us had held a right to its power. Although hadn't the imprisoned Princess of High Noon gone spare when I'd told her about the bargain with Larat? She must have seen something looming on the horizon even that far back.

"I can't see how we got our hands on it, even then," I admitted.

"Though I cannot be certain, I believe it to have been a matter of blind mechanics having worked to our advantaged," Masego said. "Larat was fae, and so his ritualized apotheosis called to power of a fae nature. It made the water go down the canal, so speak, and there was only one pond's worth of water left to flow."

"And the seven crowns and one?" I asked.

"When trying to force such a powerful mechanism to work, some manner of power must be spent," Hierophant suggested. "It is telling that the same fae who escaped the foundation of united Arcadia asked for this specific bounty, among all those that could be asked."

That many crowns would have a weight to them, undeniably. Was that what the Princess of High Noon had seen and panicked about? Not necessarily that Larat would eventually use up the very stuff of Summer, I doubted even fae could be that farsighted, but that he was aiming to make a Court of his own. It fit, I had to admit. If there was a recipe to make a Court, it made sense that royalty on both sides of the fence would be at least vaguely aware of it.

"So that leaves the crowns of Spring and Autumn up for grabs, like we thought," I said. "Where were they, that the Hunted Magician was able to help you – wait, actually, what about the fae we fought here in the Arsenal?"

My brow knotted. I'd almost forgotten those, but they were a stick in the wheel of what had been explained to me so far.

"They were Autumn," I said. "There shouldn't be an Autumn left, Masego, by your theory."

"The answer to this was obtained by Roland, though unknowingly on his part," Hierophant said. "He captured alive one of the fae, whose physical body it turns out we've destroyed before. The Duke of Green Orchards, who was slain in Dormer, though he now goes by Count of Green Apples."

So I'd not been wrong, I thought, when I'd noticed an eerie similarity.

"I saw him," I admitted. "Noticed his face. So you're saying all those fae that attacked the Arsenal are, what, salvaged corpses?"

"Those entities whose bodies were slain can never be made anew with a new Winter or Summer, as there will never again be either of these," Masego said. "That leaves them existing, yet purposeless. Some must have bound themselves to the crown of Autumn to acquire that purpose. There will be some of other natures, kept into existence by outside ties like contracts or debts, but I imagine much of the roster will be those killed in the Arcadian Campaign. For all those that anchored themselves to Autumn or Spring, I expect ten times as many went wild and are now partaking of sundry powers on Creation or elsewhere to sustain their existence."

The Prince of Falling Leaves, then would have continued existing because of the Hunted Magician's unpaid debt. That had a sharp little irony to it I could not help but find amusing – that man really was prone to shooting himself in the foot, wasn't he? Actually, now that I was considering this, was my pact for the crowns with the Prince of Nightfall what'd allowed him not to become one of the subject princes of Arcadia in the first place? Larat, I thought with reluctant admiration. You cleverest of foxes.

"So fae fell through the cracks of our mess and now suckle at whatever they can find, including Autumn," I summarized.

That sounded like it'd be an issue in the long term, fae loose in the world and grown hungry, but right now we had more pressing cats to skin. And it was now occurring to me that if the dead fae from my old campaign were excluded from the newborn Court that'd followed it, then most of Winter and Summer's royalty had been removed. The very same kind of entities that might be rivals for whoever sat the newborn thrones.

Somewhere, I suspected, the creature that had once been the King of Winter was smiling.

"More or less," Masego agreed. "And to answer the question you never finished asking, what the Hunted Magician provided was not exactly a location. There is, if you'll forgive the metaphor, no buried treasure to unearth. That was what he clarified for me, that I could not find a crown because in a very real sense it does not currently exist. What he gave us is a set of circumstances that will coalesce the crown of Autumn into being. More specifically, a ritual to be used in a particular place and alignment."

"So when you said you found the crown of Autumn," I leadingly said.

"An artistic flourish," Masego proudly said. "I have merely confirmed the ritual will function and located an appropriate ritual site and date."

I let out a noise of appreciation.

"Well done," I said. "What kind of a timeline are we looking at?"

Considering how much about the fae had to do with seasons, I'd guess somewhere around a year. Maybe the autumn solstice or something else along those lines.

"Thirty-one days," Hierophant said.

I blinked in surprise, lapsing into a stunned silence.

"I could make the attempt tomorrow," Masego said, misinterpreting the reason for my quiet, "but to both travel and prepare for the ritual over so small a span would significantly increase the chances of failure."

"That..." I began, almost at a loss for words. "That changes things. The location, the resources you need, it's all set?"

"I'll have to significantly empty the Arsenal reserves of gems and precious metals as well as require of the services of at least two hundred mages – three hundred would be more comfortable, it would allow for replacements and adjustments – but in principle all needed is at hand," Masego said.

Noticing my surprise, he smiled.

"You have helped create one of the grandest magical sites of learning and magic on Calernia, Catherine," he said. "Do not then be surprised that it serves that purpose with distinction."

I coughed, slightly embarrassed.

"The ritual site itself will be familiar to you, as the Princes' Graveyard was fought near it," he continued.

"The Mavian prayers on the hill?" I asked.

"Indeed," Masego said. "There are other locations with perhaps more precise alignments, but this one benefits from being the seat of a permanent Twilight gate. The logistical benefits are obvious."

I could definitely believe that tumulus would work as a ritual site, at least. I still remembered walking the tall raised stones and feeling the echoes of long-faded might, the call they'd made to the last wisps of fae power in me.

"The ritual could fail," I said.

"All rituals can fail," Masego pointed out.

"Allow me to rephrase that," I said. "If the ritual fails, what are the consequences?"

"The ritual site will be obliterated, a significant portion of the mages involved will die or go mad, the fabric of Creation on a regional scale will be weakened for several centuries," Hierophant calmly listed.

My fingers clenched. That was not negligible losses.

"The Twilight gate?" I made myself ask.

"Three in five odds of withstanding the damages and keeping full functionality," Masego said. "No chance of destruction, or that partial functionality will not remain. We did not craft a fragile artefact, Catherine."

Considering the sheer amount of Night we'd wielded that day and the way he'd come into an aspect halfway through, I was not inclined to doubt him.

"Odds of success?" I pressed.

"Tomorrow, perhaps one in five," Hierophant mused. "Likely a little less. By my suggested timeline, I'd say somewhere between seven and eight in ten. Closer to eight, by my calculations."

"If we wait longer can you bump that up?" I asked.

He frowned, staying silent for a long moment.

"With another two months, perhaps a little over eight," Masego finally said. "With a full contingent of Wasteland mages and a month to teach them we could near nine in ten, though I believe that Dread Empress Malicia might be disinclined to lend us these."

By the tone of his voice, that was very petty of her. I suppressed a smile. Indeed, how dare international politics and all these wars get in the way of one of the great magical feats of the century?

"I'm currently inclined to wait the three months and get all the sureties we can," I said. "But I'll discuss it with our allies, since Quartered Seasons is starting to become a genuine war asset."

If nothing else, having this kind of a tool in our pocket would greatly strengthen the case of those commanders among the Grand Alliance who favoured the defensive strategy to this war. Princess Rozala and Prince Otto Reitzenberg had been arguing from the start that so long as we held our defensible borders, time would be on our side – either because of the amount of Named we'd accrue, or because the Arsenal would eventually produce a weapon capable of turning around the war on a strategic scale. The crown of Autumn might just qualify, since while it had no real use against field armies it could potentially allow us to deal with Neshamah himself. Not destroy him, mind you, that'd been what the Severance was for, but neutering him as a threat was more important than outright destruction.

"Assuming you successfully coalesce the crown," I said, "will it be a physical artefact?"

Masego nodded.

"One not unlike the crown of Twilight when it was formed," he said. "Though the strength of the godhead is in the concept and not the material."

"And once we have the physical artefact," I said, "you can begin shaping it."

"I've had the appropriate workshop for the work built in the Arsenal for some time, though it is currently sealed," Hierophant said. "It is difficult to estimate how long it would take me to shape the godhead, as even the Dead King's work in Keter bears only passing similarities for me to draw on. It is safe to assume at least several months."

I hummed. We wouldn't need the crown to take back Hainaut, anyhow, which in my opinion was a prerequisite to taking a swing at Keter itself. We simply couldn't afford to thin land defences against his armies the way we'd need to in order to make a serious crack at the Crown of the Dead, the risk of collapse was too high. Pushing Keter back beyond the lakes would allow us to dig in, though, and muster the armies properly for an assault on the Hidden Horror's capital next spring or summer.

"We can afford that," I said. "Especially if it wins us the war, which it will if we can make him lose control over the undead."

That was, after all, what lay at the very heart of Quartered Seasons. Something like the Severance, an offensive artefact, it could be resisted. Which was why we wouldn't be attacking the Dead King, we'd be giving him the crown – not in a way he could refuse, but still as a gift of godhead. That'd slip right through the overwhelming majority of his defences, by Masego's reckoning, and Hierophant had spent most of the year with Neshamah riding in the back of his head. He knew the Dead King, understood him in ways most of us could only dimly grasp. The trick was that we wouldn't just be tossing him the crown of Autumn, Hierophant would be shaping it first. It had to remain powerful, or it'd wiggle out of the groove of being a gift, but we'd get to choose what power was given. And what strictures accompanied it, of course, because the mantle of godhood could hardly come without costs.

I was more than comfortable making the Dead King physically indestructible if that power came at the expense of, say, his ability to command the dead.

I jolted myself out of my thoughts, since there still remained a question I'd forgotten to ask.

"Spring's crown will still be out there," I said. "That strikes me as a dangerous thing to leave simply lying around."

Not the highest priority, but given my personal role in shattering the old order of Arcadia it'd be irresponsible to simply hide my head in the sand when it came to Spring.

"I agree," Hierophant calmly said. "And since me might not have need of it for the war efforts, I've been considering how else it might be used."

My lips thinned. I knew where that was headed. It wasn't like Masego had ever made it a secret that he still intended on apotheosis, though he'd set those pursuits aside temporarily in deference to the horrors currently trying to sweep over the continent.

"I'm not sure I have the pull to allow you to get your hands on that," I admitted. "Not after that mess in Iserre before the peace. I've been having trouble with heroes as well, so to be frank your pursuing godhood might end up the proverbial match in the munitions warehouse."

"I believe that power is even less in your hands that you know, Catherine," Hierophant said. "I attempted to narrow down possible ritual locations for Spring's crown, so that I might test them for essence resonance, but out of the five locations I scried three repelled my spell."

I breathed in sharply. While Masego might not currently have direct access to the Observatory, arguably the finest scrying facility in existence bar none, he was still one of the finest living practitioners of that art and sitting on a treasure trove of resources. There weren't a lot of people, of defences, that could just repel him.

"The Dead King?" I asked, tone gone grim.

If Neshamah got his hands on a godhead, he'd make anything we might make out of one look like child's play.

"No," Masego sad, shaking his head. "On the third attempt I was ready for the opposition and salvaged a glimpse before my scrying sphere was shattered. I'll show you."

Walking over to one of the granite tables, as I watched he opened a compartment and took out what appeared to be a small sphere of silver glittering with sorcery. His aspect pulsed and he wrested it out, weaving for my eyes an illusion. The background was unclear, though I thought a tall streak of grey might be stone and the muddled green perhaps a field, but the forefront was crisp. A tall, slender and inhuman shape turned and watched with too-large eyes. It did not move, but the spell broke less than a heartbeat later. Silence held the room for a moment before I let out a long sigh.

That, unfortunately, had been an elf.

laguz24

Oh, the rabbit-eared sissies have made their return, drat.

unoriginalwritings

Rabbit-eared sure, But considering the setting and the character of the Elves of the Golden Bloom sissies are not the word I'd use. Genocidal Supremacists with no small capability to make good on their threat on the other hand...

Or: What the Thalmor wish they could be.

RoflCat

Well, they lost their homeland to the less racial-supremacist group and had to escape to Calernia...

Morgenstern

Who says this one is one of the Golden Bloom racists? It might actually be the original ones that kicked them out.

Javvies

Because the non racist Elves are off on another continent.

The Elves of the Golden Bloom are the only ones known with a permanent presence on Calernia.

They've also been sitting around doing almost nothing.

Both conventional logic and story logic point to it being the Golden Bloom, rather than the non racist Elves from another continent.

Plus, I'm pretty sure that Masego has previously commented on the localized nature of Arcadia, that Calernian Arcadia has major differences from the Arcadia of other continents, and vice versa ... that they're distinct enough that the changes to Calernian Arcadia have little or no affect on non-Calernian Arcadia.

goliath1303

There's also the fact that the withdrawn from Creation for the 1st time since Triumphant's day. And where did they withdraw to?

goliath1303

Oops. Here's how that comment was supposed to end: F AE

... withdraw to? Yep, Arcadia.

So not only are they on the right continent, they were already in the realm of the Fae.

sengachi

You typed 'rabbit ear sissies', did you mean 'immortal racist ninja terminators'?

TeK

Can't be racist if there is no other race.

ValhallaGH

That is simply untrue. The presence, or absence, of a thing has no bearing on your attitudes and power structures towards a thing.

Do you have a zombie plan?

Zombies do not exist but that question has meaning.

Same principle.

LordSchulz

Racism is the strong believe that there are races in existens and that they are distinguishable by traits of any kind.

An actual existens is not required.

See humanity.

Cuckoo's Hatchling

Technically, we're mixing racism and specieism here. Humans on our world are racist, Elves on Calernia are simply highly specieist. The latter is slightly more defensible than the former, species are far more fundamentally different than races.

shikkarasu

Humans do not have distinct races. The term is just a holdover from back when people actually believed that we were all different species, or different breeds. What we tend to call "Other Races" are not genetically distinct enough to qualify in any literal sense.

Don't look into it unless you want to scream at your monitor. We truly live in the dumbest timeline.

NerfContessa

Indeed.

That's. An unpleasant ending to this incredible chapter.

Well done once more.

Ninestrings

Well with the drow coming into play it was only a matter of time before creation brought in the regular elves as a countermeasure.

This universe does love it's binary opposites.

erebus42

That it does. I've been rather looking forward to a Drow V. Elf smackdown. Mainly because from what we've seen of them, the Elves seem like the worst sort of arrogant assholes and in need of a good and thorough humbling.

WuseMajor

Not that the Drow are particularly better people.

erebus42

Eh maybe not, but for me a sanctimonious misplaced sense of self-righteousness has always been far more odious than simple malice or sadism. Also the Drow are cooler than the few elves we've seen so far so they've got that going for them.

Someperson

The drow are becoming better, in my estimation. I doubt the same could be said for the elves.

Also the drow in this universe technically aren't "dark elves" which is a thing that I really appreciate.

Aeon Diablo

I've always considered the binary opposite of elves to be the ratlings rather than the drow. Although this is based mainly on how both elves and ratlings get stronger the older they get, and seemingly live until killed

CoyoteSpeaks

I agree. Ratlings and Elves seem to be dark reflections of one another, in the same way the Drow and Gigantes are both "conditionally immortal beings kept alive only by soul-manipulating ritual".

naturalnuke

Oh shit, we really did forget about the ratlings didn't we?

Velrix

Ok... So Nemesha no longer need is breeding farm in hell, he now possess the largest breeding farm on calernia. The chain of hunger.
Fu

Javvies

They'll need to be very careful with what powers they shape the Autumn Crown into providing the Dead King before they give it to him. And, preferably, have a way to permakill him afterwards, because if he's immortal or unkillable, he'll eventually become a threat again.

Well ... the Elves were bound to come back into this in some way. I'm not sure of their antipathy towards Bard will help or hurt. I bet they're trying to get their hands on Spring in order to counter the curse they've been under since conquering and genociding the ancient Deoraithe out of their lands.

Salt

Their rivalry with the Bard probably won't be helpful so much as convenient in a the-enemy-of-my-enemy-isn't-my-friend-but-it's-nice-to-see-someone-else-get-fucked-by-the-Bard-for-once sort of way

We know the Bard still holds a grudge against them for not taking a side and playing at being a poor man's Anaxares, back in Triumphant's day, when they temporarily evacuated the Golden Bloom to Arcadia. She probably won't be enthused that they're trying to do the same this time, except while also trying to steal a piece of the pie while they're at it. She did, after all, warn them that the next time they tried to meddle in her game she would make them "rue the day". That's actually a pretty severe threat for a genre saavy character like the Bard, who knows exactly how much of a double edged sword an ultimatum can be.

goliath1303

7 I

dadycoool

I almost feel like Masego is EE's Author SI. He knows so much lore about the world, magic, and the workings of both, and has been itching to be able to share with everyone. Thing is, for me at least, it's so complex that it sails right over my head for the most part. Maybe when I eventually reread the whole thing I'll be able to wrap my head around it.

zenanii

The dilemma of making a world that is complex enough to be interesting, yet simple enough for the readers to follow.

The take-away from this (as I understood it) is that there are four eternal sources of power that makes up arcadia, and after Cat (and the king of winter) permanently broke arcadias cycle all four sources became up for grabs.

Cat got Winter which she later gave to Sve Noc
Cat later forged Summer into the crown of twilight, which was then used to create the twilight ways.

Masego has tracked down Autumn's power which he and Cats plan to use to override the dead kings power (for instance, instead of making him the king of th dead they could give him a crown that would make him the king of increadibly tasty bagels).

The power of spring is currently unclaimed, but it seems the elves are after it.

Konstantin von Karstein

Masego tracked Autumn's power? So what happened to the Winter King and Summer Queen? What power have they?

TeK

Ok, so here it is: there are total of four pond of power, and Arcadian pool that is also Arcadia itself always holds two. At the moment of formation, Arcadia held power from Autumn and Spring ponds, while Winter and Summer ponds were semi-independent. When they married, they took control over those bonded ponds from Arcadia itself, while leaving Winter and Summer leaderless. The Crowns of Winter and Summer belong to Arcadian court, so do ponds of Autumn and Spring, but they are formless. Masego tracked Autumn Crown, not Autumn power, which is basically a "right to rule", without an accompanying pond. There is currently no available free pond of power, they were both used for Night and Twilight, but there are still two Crowns up for grabs.

Konstantin von Karstein

Okay, it's much clearer now. Thanks

edrey

In the end there was one point that wasn't clear, the elves had taken spring before the new arcadia was formed? Then it would be two crowns controlling one pond, because spring was already taken.
and the wild hunt from where its power come from, a lesser pond? So even when the four are taken it won't collapse the next second

Matthew Wells

They retained their raw magic, represented in the metaphor as water, and gained entirely new crowns through the sheer weight of the story Cat forced on them.

Konstantin von Karstein

I think it's the reverse. They kept their Crowns, but took the power (water) of Autumn and Spring.

Matthew Wells

I mean to say that they retain crowns, but those crowns are now the crowns of Arcadia Resplendent- made of the same metaphysical stuff, but no longer capable of shaping the water into the ponds that are Summer and Winter.

[5th Holy Sheeprabbit, Kilimanjaro Estelion Sharlulu Asheel
Vinchance Celenalia di ef Falufiluu'Luufilaafee \(The 35th\) da ne!](#)

> The King of Incredibly Tasty Bagels
Ah, not the Hero Calernia needs, but the one that they deserve

Sir Nil

Damn elves, Cat was stealing fey crowns before it was cool.

alele

If Masego and Cat can swing this into Spring vs Autumn eternal fight they get an extra "cork" on the Dead King. Switch their curse from being barren to an eternal fight against the and Undying Dead King.

doominator10

Can someone give me a reminder on the significance of that being an elf? Weren't they just holding up in their forest around Callow last we heard of them?

superkeaton

They're turbo nazis who despise non-elves. If they're trying to gather Spring's crown, that could lead to Bad Things.

erebus42

Compound that with the fact that they're apparently pretty OP (at least compared to normal humans). I do hope some Drow can be spared to ruin some of their days.

Konstantin von Karstein

And they're ninja-terminators. According to Cordelia (not really prone to exaggeration), 12 Elves can kill a company (100?) of humans soldiers without casualties, and an Emerald Sword (whoever they are) can do the same by himself.

Miles

>whoever's they are

Cat fought one while vacationing in Keter

Konstantin von Karstein

It was a Named, the Spellblade, who was the Forever King's son. I think they are more of an elite unit, they were sent to kill Ranger.

TeK

You mean Good things, surely.

Javvies

They kill everyone except Heroes who get within bowshot of their borders.

Also, they got the forest by genociding the ancient Deoraithe, who still hold a grudge and want their forest back. Said genocide also caused the land to curse them with infertility, and so they haven't had any kids for millennia.

Also, they sent two high level Elves to take out Diabolist before she could pull anything, but Bard stopped them.

Also, Bard pointed them at the Dead King and got the Elven Crown Prince killed and turned into a Revenant.

zenanii

They're supposedly incredibly powerful (although I can't say I was super impressed with th revenant that Cat fought twice, who was the prince of elves.

Also they've been trying (and failing) to kill Ranger for her whole life.

Apart from the super speed/strength package they have the ability to ignore one creational law (interpret that as you will)

Konstantin von Karstein

It's only the older Elves that can ignore a law. For exemple, they can decide that Creation doesn't show them, and become undetectable.

Javvies

Yeah, but I'm pretty sure that all the Elves of the Golden Bloom are old enough for that trick.

Since, y'know, they were all born on another continent before they invaded the Golden Bloom, and none have been born to them since then.

Now, there are definitely non-genocidal Elves back in the multiracial empire they have on another continent that aren't old enough for the ignore a law of Creation trick, but they don't really count for this.

TeK

Remember that big part of Rangers power comes from being a half-elf.

Matthew Wells

I wonder if this is related to her conspicuous lack of assassinating Malicia?

TeK

How were you not impressed by Spellblade? The guy spank the Woe so hard they barely manage to escape with their lives! He was killed by Saint true, but I think the death she got really underwhelmed how fucking terrifying of a grandma Laurence was.

thearpox23

Apparently if you can't solo Ranger you're not impressive, because this is DBZ. And if you can't even go solo the Dead King and his 5000+ Revenants and survive then pft what kind of weakling are you I can't even.

Mental Mouse

He was killed by Saint after Cat used one of his own aspects to take out the other. And even then it took her several blows...

Tenthyr

The elves of Calernia are residents of the golden bloom, a home they gained by genociding the original dioraithe inhabitants and forcing them to flee. Unlike the elves of the main continent these ones take the idea of Good to a disgusting level and consider all mortal races irredeemable filth. The elves are sort of like day in that they're in tune with stories and are extremely powerful.

The only thing that basically holds them back is that the Golden Bloom cursed them with complete infertility in response to murdering the Dioraithe. Something that could be negated by, say...

The Godhead of spring, season of renewal and birth.

mamm0nn

From what we're told about the Emerald Blades, they are effectively as powerful as a middling Name considering the amount of soldiers they were claimed to be able to kill without a sweat isn't something to scoff at in this series. No- I mean less extreme- inverse ninja law here. The likes of Cat or Archer can likely slap around two, maybe three, but they might be as strong as the Radiant Blade or even our Kingfisher Prince. (Who's stronger in a purely physical spar, but hardly equal to Cat in a real fight.)

Of course, those are the elites of the elves, and the Revenant prince we've seen is a Named of a higher tier. But still, that combined with their immortal infertile issue suggests that they are as powerful (or more powerful but less numerous) than the drow. And the drow Mighty were scarily powerful and numerous, if you recall book 4.

Salt

If the Bard is to be believed, the elves in the Golden Bloom burned the Everdark to the ground before genociding the Deoraithe

" Armada of white ships lands under the Everdark, pretty little elves burn it immediately. You go into the woods and genocide your way through the Deoraithe until you own the land. I told myself 'old girl, these ones mean business'."

If we assume the current Empire Ever Dark is roughly on par with the heights they were at back then – most of their old culture/techniques lost, but with a godhead behind them and alliances aboveground – the Golden Bloom presumably is still capable of easily winning in an outright brawl.

This goes double since Cat mentioned Night is more suited for stealing of power in victory than actual combat, and tends to lose against both Light or Sorcery in a 1:1. The Drow will have to be flexible, rather than strong, likely in the "Below always gets their due" style as a mirror to the Golden Bloom's "Above always wins" line

superkeaton

Been a minute since the elves were relevant. Welp, time to deal with the Golden Bloom.

agumentic

Oh hey, elves. Last time we heard about them, I believe it was that they were still hiding in their pocket dimension. I wonder what caused them to come out?

I guess kicking their ass would be one way for Cat to restore her relations with the Daoine.

erebus42

From what we've heard about their relationships with literally anyone who isn't an elf my guess is kicking their asses might just win her points in everyone's books.

Burlyraven

Giving the Dead King a tainted apotheosis is the kind of logic adjacent plan that gets the heroes up in arms against the villains. It's of the type that the heroes end up going "Oh, wait, that's actually the right thing to do, our bad", but this is really feeling like it's going to end up with Cat dramatically begging her new heroic lover, Kingfisher, to trust her and let her finish the ritual as he and Roland do their best to hold back the Mirror Knight in order to give her a chance to explain.

I like the mental image, but it's still worrying.

Big I

Cat making the Dead King invulnerable to harm is exactly the sort of thing the idiot brigade (i.e. the Mirror Knight and his posse) will mistake as being her Evil Plan (TM) All Along.

Burlyraven

Exactly. And because the Mirror Knight's story's weight is increasing, any accusations he levels are going to be all the more damaging.

Big I

So the Golden Bloom elves probably want the crown to cure their infertility, which makes thematic sense since it's the crown of Spring. I've been hoping that Catherine kicks those pricks out of the Bloom and returns it to Daoine, that'd be great.

Reading this chapter it struck me that Catherine's hopes come down to a Crown and Sword, like on her personal banner. Which sucks, because on her banner the sword outweighs the crown. Damn you Mirror Knight. Damn you foreshadowing.

Letouriste

How exactly ascending to godhood would give them their fertility back?

Don't get me wrong, now you said it i can feel this is the reason but I struggle with the logistics.

Javvies

Well ... Spring is traditionally the season of birth/rebirth and new growth, e.t.c.. A season of new life. There's plenty of potential there.

They may or may not have a concrete plan for how to go about breaking the curse the land put on them.

They probably have at least some ideas.

But also, there's a lot of power backing even a single Court. They might figure they could just brute force their way into breaking the curse.

Alternatively ... the Elves are after the Crown of Spring because Bard told them to go after it, possibly telling them out could be used to break the curse, which may or may not be entirely accurate. And even if true, it's highly doubtful that Bard told them everything they needed to know to do so. Bard does, after all, apparently know at least something about the existence of Quartered Seasons, and may or may not be aware that the intent is to put a crippling Crown on the Dead King as opposed to putting an empowering Crown on Cat/someone of Cat's choosing. And that Hunted Magician knew stuff about the Autumn Court, so they're likely to use the Autumn Crown.

And prepping the Elves to go after Spring as a contingency to counter Cat gaining control of Autumn would probably be right up Bard's alley, despite their antipathy towards her.

edrey

Well, there is also the possibility that they already have the crown with them and they made their little corner of arcadia with it, they cut a part of arcadia with the crown. The curse should be something like you can only have children with humans and not with another elf, Ranger exist after all.

mamm0nn

That's actually pretty logical, considering they now have the narrative balance of Winter having been used to stabilise the Night as Cat said this very chapter. Where before they couldn't do this, now Spring might be able to return them to their fertile glorious selves and stop being isolationists, due to the drow doing it first.

Big Brother

I LOVE when Masego gets technical. It helps me understand this world more on a fundamental level, compared to the political level we see through almost everyone else. Interactions between subrealities and the underlying currents of their very essence tells a great deal about the main reality they're branched off of.

sengachi

I loved the back and forth discussion Catherine and Masego had here. It's difficult to make this kind of exposition into something engaging, but you definitely did so here.

"I was more than comfortable making the Dead King physically indestructible if that power came at the expense of, say, his ability to command the dead." This had me delightedly cackling out loud.

Also, uhhhhhh. Wow. Okay. The immortal racist ninja terminators are going for apotheosis. Frankly the Dead King is such a threat and the Dread Empress operates on such a high level that the thought of adding a third threat apocalyptic threat to the mix hadn't ever occurred to me. I mean, what on Calernia could possibly rival them?

But yeah. Yeah the immortal racist ninja terminators getting access to Spring titles and a god would do that. The echo of one of their Named was a goddamn nightmare to fight, and the higher Fae titled play in the same leagues as three-aspected Named. A Prince and some Dukes/Duchesses were a credible threat to a five-man band of full-realized Named, even though they're about as vulnerable to Named as anything in existence. Throw the Duchess or Princess titles on an elf and that's ...

I mean. Okay. Elves and fae are both incredibly vulnerable to the Narrative. I feel like fae elves would be eaten alive by Calernia's Heroes in due time. But uhhhhh ... in due time might not be on the table with the Dead King and the Dread Empress in play. And the time it would take for the right Named to be spawned against army killers like that probably has a cost measured in genocides.

Shiiiiiiiiiiiiit.

Konstantin von Karstein

Are we sure Elves are more vulnerable to Narrative?

thearpox23

And with that every single faction on Calernia is now engaged. Uncork your champagne bottles and raise up a glass everyone, this is a moment of celebration years in the making.

Mad respect to every other rumored to be more advanced continents for politely staying out of this and letting Calernia descend into total world war on its own. After all, would be a shame if the Elven Empire got dragged in due to the Golden Bloom overstepping their bounds and stretched this story by several more books, he he he.

Speaking of books, I am growing more and more curious when the announcement that there will be an 7th book will come. This chapter, next, maybe in three months? Because let's be honest, dealing with the Golden Bloom will take more than a paragraph.

TeK

More advanced continents probably have their own more advanced world wars.

Also we already got one book split in two, I think EE will just constantly use Interludes, so that he can justify enormously long book by saying "But we're still only on chapter 41!".

khazan7

Why is everyone forgetting the ratlings? I can still vividly remember the fight against the Skein, and he was just one of the Horned Lords. I am sure there are some more out there...

thearpox23

Holy Shit! Well well wasn't that embarrassing.

I stand corrected.

vernal.ancient

Wasn't he stated to be the last one? Granted, even if that was the case, it would only be according to Catherine's knowledge, so there might still be, but it seems unlikely

Juff

Typo Thread:

but it above > put it above wall a great > wall was a great invited so sit > invited to sit with sharp nod > with a sharp nod full body not, > full body, not tended deal > tended to deal kingship Twilight > kingship of Twilight empty," I > empty." I clenching an unclenching > clenching and unclenching sat the newborn > sat on the newborn since me might > since we might

limwanya

Is Sve Noc a Name? Does she have a Name?

TeK

They don't.

edrey

It is. The first chat with cat in the everdark show us that is a name

dadycoool

Pretty sure the two sisters individually have their names, but together they have the "Name" Sve Noc. I put Name in quotes because it's like saying the Choirs or Demons have Names. Sve Noc is the title the two collectively have, like the Choirs are made up of individual angels that may have their own names, like Heirophant. (I can't remember his name, or I'd have used it.)

Mental Mouse

I think "Sve Noc" is just the Crepuscular for "Sisters of Night".

Konstantin von Karstein

They had a Name (the Priestess of Night), but I suppose that after their apotheosis they lost it.

Miles

It's butchered Russian for "all the night"

It's a name but not a Name.

Shveiran

It was a Name. Now it is the name of a low "g" goddess.

TeK

I've been waiting for YEARS on those Chekhov's elves finally paying off! By this point I frankly thought that bit about Forever King in summary was summarily ignored by everyone. Also, the community will be ecstatic at a chance to rant about how Above has literal Nazis on a payroll.

WuseMajor

Elves are on the side of Above? Where did we learn this?

TeK

In yearly books. They kill everyone except Heroes, whom they tolerate, which clearly implies they are rooting for Above.

Black Spiral Dancer

Having read Dostoievski book, I still don't understand wth Chekhov's got to do with elves.

TeK

He hanged them on the wall, so we shot them.

Konstantin von Karstein

It's a trope. Here's the explanation

<https://tvtropes.org/pmwiki/pmwiki.php/Main/ChekhovsGun>

edrey

Now looking forward the talk of the forever king and his son via Wk

Well, some theoretical questions, since the new arcadia formed by crowns of S and W and with the power A and Sp that means the incompatibility of S and W was between the power and not the crowns, then all four powers return to the same pool? The nature of W didnt change with cat or the night and S was pretty explosive with W. Also you explain why there is A court but not the power, those fae were powerful and the other pools have owners. From where was that power?

Thanks for a great chapter and the new magic theory

TeK

Arcadia was always there, and it still is. The dimension itself is also the very pool of power. There are not four powers, there are four ponds and not enough water to fill all four simultaneously, which is why only two can be filled at any moment. Power takes shape of the pond, the same water in Winter pond will explode if it meets the same water from Summer pond. Doesn't change the fact that it's water. Think of pond as colored glass, and power as light, which is also water: the light goes through colored glass and becomes colored light, but it's still light. Power is one, crowns are different. Crowns are shape and not the power. What Sve Noc and Larat used weren't powers, it was a metaphorical shape of, respectively, Winter and Summer. New crown of Arcadia didn't use either crown of Winter, nor Summer, nor any other season, instead just taking pure power and shaping a new pond for themselves. Which still uses power from the common pool, which is the dimension of Arcadia itself. Everything is in the manual, really.

TeK

Actually wrong, Arcadian court used Crowns of Winter and Summer to take control of ponds of Autumn and Spring that made up Arcadia at the moment of their wedding.

thearpox23

Seems like either way you twist it, you're still stretching the Arcadia thin.

Arcadia Resplendent is still using power from the common pool.

Sve Noc is using at least a portion of Winter.

Twilight Ways I have no idea actually. I assume proving fast travel for the continent isn't non-negligible, but who knows. So I suppose because of that mess the Crowns of Autumn and Spring have been stuck in limbo on the edge of forming because there isn't enough free power flowing?

By forcing the two crowns into being aren't you inviting the exact kind of mess that the whole system is explicitly designed to prevent?

TeK

No, I was wrong in my previous post somewhat. So there are totally four ponds of Arcadian power. Two ponds worth must be in Arcadia itself, unless it destabilises. So there are at all times only two ponds allowed to be "independent". There are also four crowns, which are basically give control over one pond worth of Arcadian power. King of Winter and Queen of Summer did not lose their Crowns, they just changed which two ponds of power they controlled. Winter pond and Summer pond were left leaderless, because proper procedure wasn't followed, they did not take control of the other ponds. Instead, ponds were used by Sve Noc and by Larat. One completed apotheosis, another formed Twilight dimension. Crowns remain, but they are essentially powerless. Fae are finite and semi-sentient bundles of Arcadian power that are also shaped depending on a Crown they are attached to. But since there are still two ponds controlled by two crowns, technically the system is fine, and the mechanism that changes seasons isn't triggered.

thearpox23

Wouldn't be a point in giving someone a powerless crown, so my understanding is that the rituals Masego/Elves want to go through would give them access to a pool of power. At which point you would still have five independent entities simultaneously using Arcadia.

DK(Crown of Autumn)
Elves(Crown of Spring)
Sve Nox(previously Winter)
Twilight Ways(Crown(?) and pool of Summer)
Arcadia Respendent (Pools of Autumn and Spring according to you.)

Even if the system was sound before, this seems unprecedented.

TeK

You misunderstand. The Arcadian power itself is shapeless. The Crowns are what shape them. So by giving DK a Crown, the plan is to shape him.

The point is exactly to give a powerless Crown. Noone wants to give Neshie more power, but a Crown is akin to a colored glass, which gives shape to power. As Warlock put it, godhead is a trick of perspective. That is what apotheosis and crown is: a way to look, a perspective, a window. And if you change how Neshamah perceives the world, you will change who he is, because the two are the same.

Sve Noc had their own perspective, they didn't need a Crown, what they lacked was weight, because Night was finite and they couldn't easily get more. That weight was provided by a pool of Winter, which was already colored by a Winter Crown, which is why it had Winter properties. The Winter power was already shaped, but that doesn't make it inherently shaped.

The realm of Twilight and its Crown were created, without a precedent, but they used the unclaimed pond of Summer, probably abusing the mechanism of creating new Seasons. And through doing that, the last bit of power was used. There is no free Arcadian power to give, even if it was the plan. But "the way to shape the power", which is the Crown, and also "the way to perceive the world", which is a trick of perspective, a godhead, is still out there, in a metaphorical limbo.

To summarize: Court of Arcadia (two dormant ponds of Spring and Autumn that form Arcadia itself plus two Crowns of Winter and Summer), Sve Noc (former pond of Winter, already shaped by a Crown of Winter, but without a Crown), Court of Twilight (former pond of Summer plus a brand new Crown of Twilight), and two Crowns of Autumn and Spring, with Spring apparently being claimed by Elves.

thearpox23

Alright, this part: "The trick was that we wouldn't just be tossing him the crown of Autumn, Hierophant would be shaping it first. It had to remain powerful, or it'd wiggle out of the groove of being a gift, but we'd get to choose what power was given."

The part where they stated that 'it had to remain powerful' led me to believe it wasn't just a bind but an addition.

But I can see the sense of what you are saying. So I'll go with your interpretation for now.

TeK

It is powerful in a sense that it is still a godhead. It is a "right to have power", so to speak. For example, if Cat had such a Crown, she would be able to use all of Winter without any backlash, she would change the power, instead of being changed by the power.

It has to remain powerful in a sense that it has to be more than an empty set of chains, otherwise it would not fit the story of it being a gift, Dead King needs to gain something from it. It would just be not a raw power, but a higher degree of control.

Like Cat said, when talking to dwarves, she held power, but now wields it instead, and that made her more dangerous. Yet again, Dead King said that her trading more control for less power made her a potential peer to them. Bard was an example he used, for she holds not much power, but wields extreme control. Hierophant traded his own power for a right to wrest control any power.

It is a theme of series, again and again control was superior to power, for if the user does not control the power (as WinterCat didn't), the power will control the user. Black traded raw power for control, Cat did the same, Warlock, mad lad as he was focused on pure control at expense of raw power, as did his son, and so on and so forth.

Crowns are a set of rules, but also a way to apply rules. Power is just power. Shaped by Arcadia it's Arcadia, shaped by fae it's fae, shaped by the Crown of Winter, it's Winter. So if Dead King will be gifted a Crown, he will be shaped by a Crown. And those shapings can be all negative, or it would not be a gift, but there still must be a trade, and Cat can decide what that trade would be, getting a degree of control over Dead King. Compare it to Severance (and Mirror Knight), both hold power, incredible one, but little control over both. Christophe is bounced by the tidings of life, flowing from one confrontation to another like a log and a river, and Severity is a literal sword.

Konstantin von Karstein

Excellent overview of the serie!

'Ladi Williams

I'm liking your explanation... But it seems to me there would still be four draws on Arcadia at the same time.

Nessie. Sve Noc. Court Resplendent. Twilight. And now the spring crown.

Won't that tear Arcadia apart?

TeK

Nah. Sve Noc took her part. It's devoured, it's gone. Twilight does not draw on Arcadia, it draws on a Summer pond. Which is also had been used up to make up the Twilight realm. Arcadia is made up from two ponds, claimed by two crowns. Two different ponds from either Summer or Winter. On which neither Sve Noc, nor Twilight cannot lay a claim. Two crowns, two ponds, that is a simple system. Which is very stable. To contest that claim, someone would need to at least collect two other Crowns. Can it be done? Yes. Can Arcadia be torn apart? Yeah. But there is no draw. The pool is closed.

agumentic

The new Court is the Court of Arcadia Resplendent. It doesn't draw on Arcadia because in a sense it is Arcadia.

Anomandris

This is going down paths so interesting....

Also, what's happening with Black v Malicia? Seems so long that we've gotten news there. And seems strange that DK hasn't made use of the praesi alliance...

thearpox23

We got an update at the start of the volume. For all the shenanigans not much time has passed since then. Looks like Erra is trying to keep the story focused, which I respect him for. When the authors try to keep track of every character of every expanding conflict it always ends up in a mess. I'm hoping for an eventual side volume.

Wonder

Everyone has said almost everything I got to say(well the magical theory went way over my head so there's that.)

The Golden Bloom pricks want the Spring crown, Heiropphant wants it.

I want Sve Noc to aim for it so that they can use it to mitigate the sunlight weakness of their drows, though that would out Cat in a conflict of interests position , between helping a fellow Woe and her Patrons, though I guess She can just tell them to fuck off.

Cat has been backtalking Choirs of Angels , and that is going to feature in her nascent Name, will the appropriation of Arcadia crowns also bear an Influence on her Name?

Konstantin von Karstein

Story-wise, lessening the Drow's weakness to sun would make them too overpowered, so I don't think Sve Noc could manage to do that.

Miles

They're really not that powerful just unusual enough that nobody knows how to deal with them yet.

They'll have figured it out by the end of the war.

Konstantin von Karstein

Re-read the chapter where Sve Noc shows to Cat what the Drows have to fight, they definitely are that powerful. And it's called « Night », I doubt anything could make it resistant to sunlight.

medd

One of the ways you could pass sentences on heroes, is by imprisoning them for the rest of the war and writing down in history books that, when the nations were faced with ultimate destruction that, person/hero/fallen/named have worked against it.

Making them unable to help cos they behaved badly is how you deal with self-righteous people.

Shveiran

It's poetic, but also a resource sink to keep them contained or sand in the gears if you leave them free to do whatever (as Named will do something, likely throwing a wrench in the plans you made without them).

Daniel E

Dwarves have been in play for awhile now, the Elves are back in opposition to our cast. I'm really really hoping we get to see a surprise appearance by the Gnomes.

Drunken Dwarf

Maybe that's how Black takes out the Dread Empire. They already received two Red Letters so the third isn't out of the question.

Ιούλιος Καίσαρας

The gnomes don't just dismantle a political entity that had send a third red letter.
They glass the whole land it occupies.
So, no he won't.

Decius

And "the whole land it occupies" wouldn't be "Praes", it would be "Calernia".

Shveiran

Possible, yet not certain. The one intervention we have on record is them nuking a civilization based on an island and their colonies. We have no clue whether they tried not to hit their neighbors or if said neighbors were simply out of the blast zone.

thearpox23

We also have no clue whether receiving the third Red Letter is actually meaningful. The civ that got nuked has famously ignored all three warnings, while Praes has actually been on the up and up. It could instead be like a website receiving a DMCA from a vindictive publisher, where you could receive a hundred of them to no legal repercussions so long as you remove the material.

Tom

raises hand So, uhhh... This chapter's not going to be on the exam, right?

Chapter 31: Pursuits

"The man who sleeps with virtue finds the bed has no room for a third."

– Proceran saying

"Fuck," I said.

Ever eloquent in times of trouble, that was me.

"I thought that might be your reaction," Masego noted.

I closed my eyes. Was there anything we could do about this? I wasn't exactly overjoyed at the prospect of the elves getting their paws on the crown of Spring, assuming they hadn't already. On the other hand, I couldn't think of anything the Grand Alliance needed less right now than picking a fight with a power as strong as the Golden Bloom. I didn't know anywhere near enough to be sure what to think about this. What did they want the crown for, how important was it to them? A decision on that scale couldn't be made without at least a solid guess at the answers to those questions, and it wouldn't be made by me alone anyway.

"Right," I said, opening my eyes. "I need you to keep digging into this, Hierophant. It's higher priority than Quartered Seasons, at least for the next few days."

The ritual wouldn't be happening anytime soon anyway: I doubted the First Prince would accept even the slightest unnecessary risk to the countryside of Procer. Not when the timeline to stacking the odds in our favour as much as possible was perfectly acceptable from a strategic view.

"There are limits to what I can accomplish," Masego said.

"I want you to find out if they already have the Spring crown," I said. "And at least check on the ritual sites, to guess at how much force they've actually deployed out there."

Likely on Proceran territory, too, not that elves tended to be particularly concerned with any borders save their own. But of I was going to have to break it to Cordelia Hasenbach that the Forever King had sent agents into the Principate, I'd prefer to at least like to have some estimates to offer her about how many of those there were.

"The latter I can assure, if not the former," Zeze said, pushing back one of his elaborate braids. "They're likely to resist my probing attempts, however."

The implied question there was, in essence, about how insistent he was allowed to be in the face of that resistance.

"Don't harm anyone," I said. "Try to avoid damage, if you can, and whatever you do avoid starting a fight. Other than that, you're free to use whatever means you want."

"It ought to be an interesting intellectual exercise, at least," Masego mused. "The nature of their defences is unique, which will force a degree of unorthodoxy to my approach."

"I'm sure you'll figure something out," I said, meaning every word.

I cleared my throat, after, hesitant to speak what I wanted to say.

"I don't need to tell you to stay safe, do I?" I eventually asked.

He smiled.

"I'll take precautions, Catherine, there is no need to worry," Masego said.

"We might have other ways to get to that information," I reminded him. "You, on the other hand, can't be replaced."

"I am fond of you as well, Cat," the blind man easily replied. "Now do be off. I'll not have you hovering about as I work, your presence alone is enough to disturb all my precision instruments."

Probably true, though that didn't mean that he wasn't just itching to get me out of here just so he could get started on the latest challenging task I'd presented him.

"Take care, Zeze," I quietly said.

To my surprise he placed a hand on my shoulder, if only fleetingly.

"And you as well," Masego seriously said. "Hakram is wounded but you are not alone. We are here if you need us."

I breathed out, since I was a grown woman and getting moist eyes over something this simple would be a little shameful. I left before another burst of that disarming earnestness could scrape me even more raw, returning to the cold halls of the Arsenal and the ever-increasing amount of troubles awaiting me.

—

When I went to relieve Indrani from her watch over Hakram's bedside it was past Noon Bell, so I returned her earlier kindness and brought a meal with me.

Pork with garlic sauce, a loaf of brown bread and a large saucer of some strange mix of oil, vinegar and olives. They were all Arlesite staples, the mixture in the saucer meant for the bread to be dipped in, and I'd grabbed a pair of apples to round the meal out. Archer was carefully carving an arrow when I entered, eyes on the wood and the knife in her hand carefully precise. Back in Callow this sort of work tended to be done out of logs with an eye to making many and quickly, but Indrani was rather more discerning with her own arrows: she picked the branches herself, when she could, and saw to their carving personally. Considering the rarity of some of the woods she used, that was only to be expected. She tended to treat mass-made arrows with the same disdain Masego reserved for massed Legion sorcery, and for much the same reasons.

"I get to be served by a queen," Indrani bragged, even as I began unpacking the meal. "How many people can boast that, I wonder?"

Out of petty spite, I left her half of the meal on the table and only arranged mine on a plate. I offered her a pretty smile.

"Not you, for one," I sweetly said, and sat down with plate.

Huh, I'd been skeptical about the oil and vinegar but it was actually pretty good. Made the brown bread better than butter would have, for sure, and while I wouldn't trust Procerans to make a halfway decent stew they were admittedly good at roasts like the pork one.

"You're a terrible friend," Indrani complained, rising to her feet.

"You taught me well," I agreed.

She helped herself to her meal with a snort, the two of us settling comfortably in our seats. We were both hungry enough that conversation waited until we'd polished off our meals, though even as I tore into the pork I found my eyes drifting to Hakram's unconscious body. I missed him even more sharply now that I needed advice. Him and Akua, I was forced to admit, as I'd come to rely on the two of them quite a bit in Hainaut. Bringing Akua Sahelian into the Arsenal would have been ill-advised, though, and not just because it'd strip the Hainaut front of its sole high calibre spellcaster – it'd been as much the number of heroes awaiting here and the rulers I'd be meeting as the strategic considerations that'd guided my decision.

"You look glum again," Indrani said, licking the garlic sauce off her fingers.

"Quartered Seasons had a major breakthrough," I admitted. "But it's also looking very likely that the elves are trying for a fae crown."

She let out a lot whistle.

"A nasty people, the elves," Archer opined. "They never came after Ranger while I was in Refuge, but about a decade earlier a few of the Emerald Swords tried to ambush her in Bayeux."

The Emerald Swords, huh? Hadn't ever really given those any thought, to be honest. Their strength was quite literally legend, though there were rumoured to be no more than ten. Each was supposed to be worth a small army, the Forever King's blunt instruments in eradicating what he could not stand. They supposedly rarely left the Golden Bloom, like most elves.

"I don't know what they want the crown for, but it worries me," I admitted.

"Also irks you something fierce, I'd wager," Indrani smiled. "They're scavenging power they had no hand in laying low."

I did not answer, looking away. She wasn't wrong. That the Forever King thought he could sit out the war against the Dead King and use the chaos to go grabbing mantles of power while we were busy fighting for Calernia's survival was not endearing the man to me. If the elves had played a role in the end of the old Courts of Arcadia I would have kept my mouth shut, but they were just being opportunistic vultures.

"We can't afford to push the Golden Bloom too far," I reluctantly said. "They could make keeping what we still hold in Hainaut a nightmare with little effort and if they send out the Emerald Swords we'd have to pull our best fighting Named from the fronts to be able to handle them."

"I figure the prick out in the Bloom thinks the same, Cat," Indrani said. "Remember, the Dead King made their king's son into a Revenant that you put down at Third Liesse. There's no love there, and the elves have to know that if the screw with the Alliance too much they're helping along 'Ol Bones."

"They're elves, Indrani," I said. "Their take on foreign policy is shooting even the birds that come within a mile of their forest. I'm not saying they're idiots, but I'm honestly not convinced the Forever King wouldn't be in favour of a few million uppity humans being eaten before the Hidden Horror is driven back."

"They haven't brought their lands back into Creation, so maybe you're right," Archer said. "Mind you, there's at least one upside to that."

My brow rose questioningly. I couldn't really see one, to be honest. The Grand Alliance had neither the leverage nor the strength to spare to do anything about this, while just letting it happen seemed like a mistake.

"Might be Duchess Kegan won't be so eager for Daoine to go independent, when she hears about this," Indrani said. "Elves were bad enough on their own, but elves with a godhead? I don't care how large the Watch gets, it'll be like fielding as shield wall of goblins against a pack of ogres."

I mulled on that a moment, even as I chewed on the bread. The Deoraithe were masters of defensive and irregular warfare, but as a rule they tended to be weaker on the offence. Restraint and their isolationist streak had still earned them an impressive military reputation, but the era where a duchy's army could stand up to those of the greater powers of Calernia was coming to an end. The Conquest had proved that massed mages and siege engines combined with heavy infantry could crush armies in the mould of the Old Kingdom's, and the rest of Calernia hadn't lain asleep in the decades that followed. Procer had fielded large units of priests and mages with its field armies during the Tenth Crusade, a significant departure from their old way of making war, and the years of fighting against Keter were further refining their methods.

Even the Dominion was starting to change its doctrine, using its limited numbers of Lanterns and Binders to crack open enemy lines much in the same way that the Legions of Terror used scorpions and goblin munitions.

That was the death knell of Daoine's military relevance, whether Duchess Kegan realized it or not. Putting together the Army of Callow had taught me how damned expensive an army of that kind was to raise and keep in fighting fit, and it simply wasn't a financial burden that the Duchy of Daoine's revenues was capable of supporting. The Watch were devils on the field, and arguably some of the finest foot on Calernia, but you couldn't win a war with them. House Iarsmai's historical military prudence was, at least in part, flowing from that realization. The issue was that, when everybody's military doctrine was done with its growing pains in twenty years, the Watch wouldn't even allow Daoine to win battles. Throw in that the enemy whose destruction was at the heart of their culture might raise its ruler to a form of lesser godhood, and Indrani could very well be correct.

The Grand Duchy of Daoine might just find the world outside a lot colder than expected, after leaving the Kingdom of Callow's protective embrace.

"If we can keep Daoine in the fold I won't complain," I said. "Though that should be Vivienne's situation to handle, in the end."

If we weren't all dead, by then I was likely to have abdicated. Besides, if Vivienne could begin her reign with the diplomatic feather in her cap of having kept the Deoraithe part of the kingdom she'd have an easier run of things going forward. I'd taught the last remains of Callowan nobility the dangers of trying to go against a popular queen backed by a powerful royal army.

"She seems to have a handle on things so far," Indrani shrugged. "And if we win against the Hidden Horror, it'll be a long time before the shine of that wears off. Hells, we might actually get a few decades of peace."

I was not nearly so optimistic. Too many parts of Calernia had only heard of the Dead King without ever catching sight of his armies or his monsters. The League of Free Cities hadn't even bothered to stop warring against itself as thousands of soldiers from an large coalition died to hold the defences to the north, and Praes was knee-deep in a civil war being prosecuted at what I could only call a languid pace. The rulers who'd seen the worst of the war would come out of it reluctant to war against those who'd been their comrades in the face of annihilation, but that'd only go so far. One of my hopes was that the construction of Cardinal would sap interest in resuming old skirmishes, given the many opportunities it represented, and that the city-state's territory would serve to settle at least some of the people whose lives had been upended by the wars.

"We'll see," I replied. "Even the peace years ought to be quite a ride, after a war like this one."

The afternoon passed slowly, after that, as the two of us sat and talked. Several messengers came to find me over the following bell, as I'd made it clear that the infirmary would be where I stayed, but there was nothing truly urgent to see to. Some concerns about the current tonnage of water that my rank obligated the stewards to inform me about, then a bold request for funding by a Proceran mage that I sent to Roland after skimming and finding the idea worth investigation. The closest thing to a crisis came an hour before Evening Bell, when I was informed that someone had been caught trying to enter one of the restricted zones of the Arsenal. It turned out to be a young couple trying to sneak off for a tryst, and I was informed they were very apologetic when they learned they'd triggered an alarm ward in their attempt to find a dark corner.

Their pays were docked, and in a fit of mercy I spared the two men the necessity of having to explain themselves to me in person. I sent written note warning that a repetition of the mistake would see them suspected of espionage, which should have them thinking twice about where they sneaking off.

"You're enjoying this," Indrani accused, afterwards.

My lips twitched treacherous.

"It's been a long time since I was asked to weigh in on things so..." I trailed off.

"Easy?" she suggested.

"Straightforward," I corrected. "The lower stakes are a relief."

The knowledge that the worse I courted if I made a mistake was passing embarrassment instead of the usual lives lost by the hundred. I enjoyed the calm all the more for the knowledge it was soon to come to an end. While the Arsenal might be its own little hermit kingdom, isolated from much that went on beyond its walls, the broader world was coming towards it. Tomorrow would bring the First Prince and the White Knight, and with them a great many troubles that for now still seemed on the horizon. The Painted Knife was nearing, too, and the envoys of the Titanomachy. Any of those visits would have been an event, but all of them in swift succession promised to be more of a circus. While I lost myself in thought, Indrani groaned and rose to her feet.

"Headed somewhere?" I asked.

"Having supper with Masego," she said. "You're welcome to come along but I'll be carving and he'll be reading."

"When you put it like that, how could I resist," I said, rolling my eyes. "Go on, have fun."

It left a strange taste in my mouth to say that. It wasn't jealousy, it'd essentially be the same as getting jealous Vivienne was having dinner with Hakram, but it was... odd. The ease she'd said that with, the way she'd not needed to check he'd be there or even just inclined to have dinner with her – all those things spoke of a habit. It wasn't the first time they were doing it, and they'd been doing it for long enough they considered it a given it'd happen. It was oddly domestic, given who they were. I waved out Indrani, and idly wondered if perhaps I was a little jealous after all. Not of either of them, but perhaps of what they had. It'd been a long time since I'd had that level of intimacy with someone.

Not since Kilian.

I wasn't sure if I wanted that, and I knew I simply didn't have the time to afford something like it these days. Yet the easy way that Indrani had displayed a sort of intimacy I'd have not believed her capable of when we first met had me uneasy. My friends were changing and making lives for themselves while I swung my sword at the world trying to make it a little more like I wanted. My eyes moved to Hakram's, his chest rising and falling in steady rhythm as the spell took care of keeping his lungs going. Sometimes the changes weren't for the best. A knock on the door – too respectful to be Archer's – caught my attention and I invited in the messenger. A report from the captain of the garrison, I noted with a raised brow, and one that bore his official seal.

I cracked it open and as I scanned the lines I had to forcefully keep my fingers from clenching. The Mirror Knight had tried to enter the Red Axe's cell, insisting even when the guards refused to let him in. It'd come close to violence before he walked away. I folded the parchment, ignoring the messenger's nervous gaze. Someone had informed Christophe de Pavanie that I'd gone to speak with the Red Axe with Prince Frederic, I decided. This was not a coincidence. It also meant the Mirror Knight had friends within these walls that were willing to stretch the bounds of propriety to help him. I put away the parchment and dismissed the messenger without sending an answer to the report. I'd been warned of the incident, and since it'd not come to violence for now there was little I could do.

Not, that wasn't true. There were more than a few things I could do, but there was nothing I should do. At this point, overreaching would be dangerous. Restraint now could be used later to make the point to the White Knight that I'd tried patience only to find it ever more stringently tested.

Restless at the inaction, I rose to my feet and after patting Hakram's shoulder took to the halls. I had no precise destination in mind, though that parchment was burning a hole in pocket. I'd not been the only one to go to speak with the Red Axe, I considered. Maybe I should mention this to the Prince of Brus as well. I'd already been headed vaguely in the direction of the Alcazar, anyway. Halfway there I forced myself to admit that I wasn't going there to tell him about that report, or at least not only that. It'd do me no good to pretend otherwise. There were risks, although it wouldn't be difficult to weave an illusion around myself that'd ensure I wasn't seen going there. And if I was going to do this, which the way my teeth were worrying at my lip were telling me I was, then now would be the time. Before Hasenbach got here and the Arsenal was swarmed with guards and watching eyes.

I felt myself reach for the Night, beginning to weave an illusion, and admitted to myself I'd already made my choice.

I made sure to be seen returning to my rooms before backtracking under veil of Night, remembering the way to the Prince of Brus' quarters well enough from the last time I'd visited. If I'd been a few years younger I might have hesitated before knocking on the door, but in that sense Indrani had been good for me. A few moments passed and I felt a little like a fool. He might not be there at all, given that it was not so late. Perhaps it might be better if I left. Then the door was cracked open and Frederic Goethal curiously looked out, blue eyes slightly widening in surprise as he saw me. His blond locks were slightly dishevelled, and above the belt he wore only a loosely buttoned white cotton shirt that did nothing to hide the kind of muscles that came only from a warrior's life.

"May I come in?" I asked, doing nothing at all to hide the way I was looking at him.

Frederic of Brus's eyes darkened with something that I was rather looking forward to seeing unleashed.

"Please do," he replied.

The door closed hurriedly behind me and I came closer, noting he was just tall enough I had to lean up to kiss him. His hand found my hip, but it was my lips that found his in a soft, tentative kiss as I tiptoed upwards. A brief thing, and I withdrew to find his eyes still closed.

"You'll do," I decided, pushing him back against the wall.

There was nothing tentative at all about what followed.

—

I woke up not long past Midnight Bell, pleurably spent and sweaty. Frederic, still deliciously naked under the twisted-up sheets, was still asleep at my side. It'd be a mistake to spend the night, given the risk of being seen, so reluctantly I wriggled out of his embrace and sat up on the bed. It was enough to wake him and he stretched out in a way that pleasantly captured my interest for a few moments. Getting my hands on his body had done nothing to damper my appreciation for it. Much the opposite, as it happened.

"Restless or leaving?" he asked, voice still husky from sleep.

"Leaving," I said. "As soon as I can find my clothes, anyway."

Where they'd ended up had not been a priority around the time I was taking them off.

"How soon you dispose of me," Frederic teased. "Did I disappoint?"

"I was vocal enough with my opinion you shouldn't need to fish for compliments," I drily said.

"One enjoys hearing those anyway," he grinned.

It'd been a while since I'd been with a man, but I'd definitely enjoyed returning to that brand of diversion. Thinking of it was enough to stir my interest again.

"Considering you're Alamans, I expect I won't have to mention that this is best kept under wraps," I said.

He looked rather amused.

"This is hardly my first tryst, though it has certainly been a... vividly memorable one," Frederic said, sitting up in the bed as well. "I understand that some passions are meant to remain discreet. I'll not moon after you like a green boy either, if that is your worry."

"I'd tolerate a bit of mooning," I grinned. "It'd be rather flattering. But only a bit."

"I'll see what I can arrange," he quietly laughed.

It really was shame it'd be genuinely terrible politics for even the suspicion of an affair between us to fall on either, I mused. I'd have thoroughly enjoyed more than one visit to this bed. Safer to cut this after one night, though, I knew. I'd taken risks enough already. On the other hand, I mused as I tossed aside the sheets and pushed him back against the headboard and got on top of him, the night wasn't quite over yet.

"One more for the road," I suggested.

The gasp that followed was not one of disagreement.

—

The following day, the First Prince and her escort arrived several hours before the White Knight and still Hanno set foot in the Arsenal before Cordelia Hasenbach.

With the wards back in order scrying relays to Creation had been established again, so the Procerans had known in advance that we'd had not only a fae incursion but several demons running loose not so long ago. Considering that the First Prince would be a great deal easier to kill than Hanno and the that magnitude of the political crisis that'd followed would be... significant, I'd not been offended when her personal guards had not taken me to my word when I'd told them the Arsenal was secure. A company of mages and soldiers had swept through the attainted areas with a fine comb, though I doubted that any mundane mage out of the Principate would able to catch something that the likes of Masego or Roland hadn't.

While I debated heading to the Arcadian waystation where the First Prince was awaiting the word to go on ahead from her people, I ultimately decided against it. Hasenbach liked her ceremony, and I might as well ensure I had her in as pleasant a mood as I could before the negotiations started. There was precious little of what I wanted to discuss with her that could be spoken about in such a public place, anyway. To my disappointment I learned that Vivienne would only be arriving tomorrow, having been slowed on the march by sudden rains that'd flooded the roads, but I'd lived without seeing her for several months already. A day more or less wouldn't make much of a difference.

Besides, I kept busy: while security was an issue for Hasenbach the White Knight breezed right past her after a few greetings and proceeded straight into the Arsenal. I dragged Archer with me to watch my back, leaving as a lookout as I limped my way down a long set of stairs. The White Knight came out of the translocation ritual in the same wide room where the Mirror Knight had nearly drawn on me less than a week ago, a single mage in Arsenal livery at his side. Hanno looked tired, eyes pulled tight, and was leading his horse by the reins. He'd ridden hard, I decided, after hearing about the attack. Even odds he'd even ridden through the night on the last stretch, for him to be visibly tired: it wasn't something that came easy, in Named of his calibre.

"Black Queen," he greeted me.

"White Knight," I replied. "I'm pleased you came quickly."

"I can only wish I'd been there when the attack happened," Hanno frankly said. "None of the affairs that kept me from travelling with you were even near important enough, seen in retrospective."

"Hindsight's no cure for bad luck," I shrugged.

A sharp whistle sounded from the heights above, a sign from Archer we were about to have company. Indrani wouldn't have bothered for guards or diplomats, which meant Named.

"I'd wager that's my latest headache trudging towards us," I said. "I tried my hand at handling it and failed, White Knight, so it'll be yours to deal with."

Hanno's brow rose.

"I thank you for your assistance," he said, turning to offer the mage a smile.

She blushed, much to my amusement, and replied by espousing the virtues of duty before scurrying away. However nicely phrased, it'd very much been a dismissal. I eyed him speculatively. Heroes tended to be popular with women – and men, when so inclined – but I'd never know him to keep company. I didn't believe him to be like Masego, disinclined towards the act, but neither did I believe him so discreet he would have been able to keep a bedmate quiet.

"I received some interesting missives from the First Prince, when I passed by a scrying relay yesterday," Hanno said. "Including a subtle but rather firm request that I take Christophe of Pavanie 'in hand'. I've rarely known you to be in such swift accord with Cordelia Hasenbach, Catherine."

Well now, wasn't that interesting? Frederic hadn't been exaggerating when he'd said that the First Prince saw the Mirror Knight as a potential threat because of his closeness – and occasional nakedness – with the House of Langevin. If she was willing to start putting pressure on the White Knight to intervene before he'd even gotten to the Arsenal, then she was serious about curbing dear Christophe. While I'd only extend so much trust to Cordelia over much of anything, I was rather pleased at the notion that for once she might be entirely on my side – if largely for her own reasons.

"He still has the sword, and now he's making demands," I grunted.

"I've never known him to be prone to overstepping, only clumsy in expressing himself," the White Knight calmly said. "As for the Severance, while it should be temporarily returned to the Arsenal I can see no better wielder for it."

I could think of several, including the very man speaking to me. Those two had shared a front in Cleves, I recalled, before the Salian Peace and Callow joining the Grand Alliance. There might be a degree of trust there, the sort earned in battle. It didn't worry me overmuch, in truth, considering that Hanno was remarkably clear-eyed when it came to most things. Still, a warning was in order.

"Be careful with him," I said. "I don't think you'll find him all that pliable."

"Pliable is something a lord wants in a vassal," Hanno said. "I am not one, nor he the other. All I need of him is reason and a willing ear, neither of which he's ever failed to offer."

Our little chat was interrupted by armoured boots on stone as the Mirror Knight, in full armour and with the Severance at his hip, briskly began to make his way down the stairs. Looking rather uncomfortable and noticeably unarmed, the Blade of Mercy followed behind him. Christophe de Pavanie's green gaze was distinctly unfriendly as he took in my presence, though it stopped short of a glare and he began to pointedly ignore my presence. The boy at his side looked away from me when I glanced.

"White Knight," the Mirror Knight began the moment his boots reached the bottom of the stairs. "Your presence gladdens me."

A long moment of silence followed when Hanno did not reply. The White Knight eventually cocked his head to the side.

"I had assumed," Hanno slowly said, "that you were not done in your greetings. Was I incorrect?"

Huh. I threw him an appreciative glance for that even as Christophe's cheeks reddened.

"Wouldn't be the first lack of manners from him," I idly said. "I doubt it'll be the last. We'll speak later, White Knight."

"Until later then, Queen Catherine," Hanno replied with a slight bow.

I began to limp away, without further ado, and though the Mirror Knight began to say something that might have been a belated greeting I did not turn to hear it or bother to lend an ear. I was almost hoping he tried to pull something of the sort in front of Proceran diplomats, who'd be genuinely appalled at the sight. They were known to be polite to even people they despised, after all. Archer was awaiting at the top of the stairs, leaning against a wall. She'd kept the room below in sight the whole time, taking her duty of watching my back just as seriously in this place as she had in the tunnels of the Everdark. Different dangers here, perhaps, but barely fewer.

"So?" I asked as she pushed off.

"They were hurrying," Indrani said. "So they weren't just coming to greet Shiny Boots, I'd bet."

That soured the pleasant mood the night's exertions had left me in, even after this little interlude. They'd hurried because they'd heard I myself was there to receive Hanno, then. For them to have been forewarned, it meant they had more friends in the Arsenal than I'd hoped they would have. Not necessarily Named, as the Mirror Knight's slaying of no less than seven demons had earned him a great deal of admiration with soldiers and mages from the rank and file, but I wouldn't dismiss the notion outright either.

"With Hasenbach joining us tonight the number of soldiers in here will swell," I said. "We'll be able to spare some for more private duties. Reach out to Lieutenant Inger, Archer. I require some eyes."

With the First Prince's arrival, I finally had a pretext to meddle with the garrison without raising an eyebrow – given that Hasenbach would have a soldier escort of her own, it'd raise no eyebrows if I arranged one for myself out of garrison troops. I didn't intend to use mine guarding doors, though. I wanted to know who the Mirror Knight would speak with, and when. It would be imprudent to begin acting on anything before making sure how much support he had, exactly.

"I'll take care of it," Indrani said, pushing off the wall. "While you were down there a messenger came by for you, though. I took the message for you."

She fished out of her coat a small folded parchment, handing it over.

"And what's inside?" I asked.

Neither of us bothered to pretend she wouldn't have opened that without the slightest hint of hesitation.

"The First Prince of Procer is inviting you to dinner," Indrani said, waggling her eyebrows lasciviously.

Considering I could no longer claim to have never slept with Proceran royalty, answering that insinuation with even mock indignation would have, uh, weaker foundation than I might be used to.

"Well," I said, "I suppose I'm about due to have an exquisite meal spoiled by politics."

ruduen

And I will be inviting everybody to vote.

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Patrick Herke

Honestly everytime I see the vote comment I'm just reminded of how glad I am that I wrote a little python script to do that for me. No need to worry about forgetting or messing with it

Frivolous

Yay! Catherine got laid, and by a man this time. Good for her. I'm happy for her.

308924810a

Yet I feel a strange worry that this romance is some prelude to the redemption story that the heroes think Catherine is heading into, and that for that purpose Nephele would have been better for her, and the romance both more supportive and less likely to blow up in her face.

WuseMajor

I'm inclined to agree. Might be why Bard got her killed.

Insanenoodlyguy

Nah, that'd be Hanno. Kingfisher is specifically somebody she likes, and she might make it a more than once things, but for now and as long as she stays cautious he's clearly a FWB type. She should be safe from that sort of trap. Though the blowing up part is valid; always a risk of a scandal.

Ninestrings

Masego learning to read and express feelings has been one of the most heartwarming character arcs in the whole series.

Javvies

Mirror Knight is a problem ... and he's only going to get worse.

And I'm not sure Hanno truly realizes, recognizes, or understands the kind of problem Mirror Knight is and is becoming.

Which itself could easily become another problem.

Javvies

... dammit wordpress.

Gibborim

I imagine that the Severance is having a direct effect on his limp personality.

Insanenoodlyguy

Also the change in perception. Even if they got the sword away from him (and it'd find it's way back anyhow), he's on a different story now. The kind of story where people rally behind him, so he's become a more rally-able figure.

Salt

Hopefully not too much of an effect. That thing is the Crystallization of Laurence de Montfort. The old bat earned her stripes, sure, she was respectable in her own way. It doesn't change that she was neurotically paranoid of all things black cloaked, no matter how understandably so.

If it actually imparts her outlook on life to the wielder, it might as well be a cursed sword rather than a holy one.

shikkarasu

I wonder if there is a chance of him transitioning into the Saint of Swords, considering he is holding 1/3 of the name in his right hand....

It's definately influencing him, like Moonless Nights affected Catherine "No more than the mantle of [her] Name."

NerfContessa

Soo.... The Saint of mirrors and swords?

Bart

Zeze has known how to read for years...
(;

dadycoool

I can now say that Cat has slept her way across Calernia. Only laterally, east to west, since she hasn't slept with anyone from the southern countries, but still.

laguz24

She can always attend the festival of many sighs.

308924810a

She doesn't just need someone from the south, she also needs someone from the north to also do so vertically. Which might be more out of character, though not necessarily more of an obstacle.

Burlyraven

I don't know if it's been pointed out or not, but Catfish is an entirely viable ship name for Cat and Kingfisher. Just saying.

Also, I am so glad to see Mirror Knight get a little extra dose of humility from White Knight. I genuinely wonder if there might not have been a demon of pride or some related concept in the seven he slew

Ninestrings

If this relationship turns out to be an evil plot and Cat was Catfished that is some crazy long set up for a bad pun.

I absolutely wouldn't put it past EE either.

Tohron

Especially bad since Catherine HATES puns.

vernal.ancient

All the more appropriate then

laguz24

Oh I am so ready for Chrisophe to get metaphorically tanned.

Ninestrings

I'm just picturing White Knight looking him over, sighing, and then taking off his belt...

erebus42

My mind made that image way more sexual than it needed to be.

Ninestrings

I realised it after I posted the comment but stand by my wording.

Not my fault this whole fandom is full of sin.

erebus42

Sin is the spice of life

Matthew Wells

If we weren't looking to practice sin, why even read this in the first place?

Javvies

Mirror Knight is a problem ... and he's only going to get worse.

And I'm not sure Hanno truly realizes, recognizes, or understands the kind of problem Mirror Knight is and is becoming. Which itself could easily become another problem.

Salt

I think the Mirror Knight has a clearer read on his character than Cat, to be perfectly honest. Christophe handles himself like an absolute ass but his POV showed that he's mind-bogglingly awkward and insecure instead, and is also super sensitive about being used instead of respected.

Hanno's methodology, from what we've seen so far, is to somehow empathize with the kid and genuinely treat him like an adult or a peer instead of a vassal or a tool.

Hanno might actually be the perfect fit for the problem here.

Christophe has the best of intentions, ruined by his being a colossally awkward moron, and has a frightfully shallow understanding of what "justice" means.

Hanno can usually empathize with people like some sort of telepath (probably because he's been in so many dead people's heads), is endlessly patient/understanding in the face of insult, and spent years under the wing of the choir that likely has the one of most nuanced, complex views of "justice" out of any entity on the continent.

Salt

The white knight* not the mirror knight. Damn it. It's late.

M0och123

Yet we all know what the road to hell is paved with.

Possibly in a literal sense due to who they are fighting.

Salt

So the best case is Hanno reasons some sense into him, and the worst case is he paves way to an assault on the Serenity?

I see this as an absolute win

hakureireimu

Somehow I doubt the Mirror Knight problem will be resolved so easily.

Shveiran

Although I agree in principle, I'd point out that Hanno has been aware of this issue for three books now, and still failed to address it.

The current problem is, if not his fault, something he failed to fix for a long time.

Salt

I mean, he's only been in charge of the kid for half a volume to be fair. It isn't like a garbage understanding of politics and morality mattered much prior to that, when they were just collaborating to kill endless waves of undead. His whole schtick at the time was "I do not judge", with the Pilgrim having a near monopoly on the Heroic mentorship Role prior to the Terms.

Cat did mention that it was an oversight that no one ever had a proper chat with the Mirror Knight after the Truce and Terms were established though, that is fair. I believe she mentioned it in passing at the start of the Arsenal arc.

Mental Mouse

Even after the Trial, Hanno is still not so good at listening to Cat's advice.

Miles

>Considering I could no longer claim to have never slept with Proceran royalty, answering that insinuation with even mock indignation would have, uh, weaker foundation than I might be used to.

And now Archer knows

M0och123

Archer and Masego could potentially have been scrying the two last night.

Salt

Archer insisting that this is important, with Masego patiently explaining in the background a list of all the things that are objectively more important

NerfGlaistigUaine

So is the bed small or is virtue "big-boned"?

caoimhinh

Maybe Virtue is a jealous, yandere mistress?

nick012000

So, a Queen having a one-night stand with a Prince, and both of them are Named.

Odds Catherine just got pregnant with a royal bastard?

dadycoool

I'd actually been thinking about that before. a) She's too careful for that, b) I'm pretty sure pregnancy among Legion soldiers is forbidden, so she'd have to take herself off the war effort in any meaningful way, having to account for the kid and all, c) the scandal for sleeping with him would be light compared to the scandal of a pregnant Cat, and d) a lesser reason is that Cat having a child would give her an heir other than Vivienne, which would splinter the line of succession, even if the child spent its whole life in Freddy's territory.

So yeah, I've formed a storyline in my head, tried to address these points, and found my addressing to be unlikely. Not to say EE won't go the Royal Bastard route, but every head-story I've ever come up with while reading PGtE, trying to predict the future, has been off the mark.

thearpox23

Between Masego and literally any other skilled mage or healer found in the entire grand alliance, the chances of not performing a successful abortion are nill. Your 'c' point might still be relevant, and I would put it past the spy network to notice something is off, but Catherine isn't nearly emotionally driven enough to implode everything because of an unborn kid. Would cause some mood swings though.

Don't expect the story to go there though.

dadycool

I wouldn't expect Cat to go full "I'm a mother now, which means I and my spawn are made of glass", nor would her magic suffer very much, but thinking about the physiological aspects of pregnancy and young motherhood, for 6-10 months she'd be forced into a non-physical role and, let's be honest, when a woman is pregnant, she's at her most vulnerable by far. I suppose she could hand the kid off to a wet nurse so she could go off murderizing, but while I don't see her as actively going out of her way to collect a family, I don't believe she would reject one. She never asked for the Woe, the Gallowborn, or the Legions that adore her, but she would and has given everything for each of them. I'd actually expect her to drag around a crib alongside that comfy chair if our theorized plot pans out, just so she could keep an eye on the kid and keep it close.

Addressing the abortion option, you're right. Masego amputated AN ASPECT when it got corrupted, back when he was the Apprentice. If Cat were to decide that abortion were the way to go and it doesn't spark a nasty Story, that'd be downright easy for him. If nothing else, he could Wrest it from her, but that might not be a good idea, for multiple reasons.

Not that we expect her to actually get pregnant.

magesbe

I'd guess extremely low. Catherine is the kind of person who'd be very careful about that kind of blunder.

MagicalContraception

Given their level of technology/magic, I doubt she'd be on magical contraception if she hadn't been with men... since before Chapter 1 of Book 1.

vernal.ancient

While I'm in no way an expert on contraceptives, my understanding is that every culture that makes the sex=pregnancy connection figures out a way around it, regardless of technology level. It may not be as reliable as modern methods, but there will be one. Now this particular culture may rely on magic for it, but Cat could potentially figure out something with the Night for that

Insanenoodlyguy

Her patron god came about by the act of stealing life from the unborn. The night in it's weakest, unshaped form could do that. What do you think it can do now? Even assuming she didn't use whatever they regularly use in the legion to prevent that sort of thing, or assuming the story makes sure it doesn't work, I'm quite sure Sve Noc can make sure she doesn't get shunted into that highly dangerous story. That kid could literally kill their entire coalition after all, if fate decides it's worth letting them all die just so this child can grow up in the Calnerian post-apocalypse and rise to destroy the Dead King and avenge all his ancestors.

AbraKadabra

Now, that is an interesting thought. If the child does Born, probably will have access to night, despite not being drow. The implications of that can be tremendous.

Salt

Extremely unlikely I'd say, mostly because it would narratively just be really weird. Suddenly bringing in new experiences of motherhood and family relationships into the eve of a climactic war with ancient, terrifyingly powerful entities is rather jarring.

I mean it definitely wouldn't be off the table to make an absolute banger of an arc looking into the foundling line and see if she falls into that old trope of amazing people being terrible parents, but the timing is just all wrong.

The main character getting partially taken out of a continental level brawl in high fantasy by bad contraceptives? Bruh

AbraKadabra

I bet Masego can put a stasis on it, to delay it from being Born. Because magic. It will born after the dead King bites the dust.

Salt

Feasible only if Catherine does not go near the Dead King or any of his undead for the remaining duration of the war, I'd wager.

The risk of putting an enchantment inside your body is... rather high, when the monster you're fighting invented the system of magic that arguably the most magically advanced nation on the continent uses.

Putting a spell inside your body in the presence of the Dead King is like swallowing a bunch of sharpeners just before getting punched in the gut.

Abrakadabra

Eh, no. Because on that note she should just avoid DK altogether, because she has night in her body, and using any artifact, for example the severance in the vicinity of DK would be just as dangerous if not more.

Salt

Night is something entirely different from sorcery in the first place, it's not a type of sorcery.

A stasis spell on the other hand, especially one casted by someone like Masego who specializes in Trismegistan sorcery, would be insanely vulnerable to the Dead King who is quite literally the original Archmage Trismegistus.

It's a situation where you make yourself reliant on a method that originates from the Dead King in the first place, and one he's mastered more thoroughly than anyone currently alive.

It would be not unlike fighting Malicia while being reliant on political plots, or getting into a sword fight with the Saint while being very vulnerable to being cut.

The Severance isn't sorcery either. It's an Aspect pulled out of one of the most narratively stubborn, uncompromising Heroes that ever lived. The entire reason it has weight is because the Saint was, by every measure we've seen so far, completely incorruptible when facing The Enemy.

RoflCat

I'm pretty sure Named can't accidentally get pregnant unless a Story makes them to.

Which admittedly the memento child where the father die soon after the one night stand is a thing...

I sincerely hope Frederick doesn't end up dying to prevent MK from becoming Saint 2.0.

Not so soon after Nephele :<

Cicero

Huh... that's... actually possible.

If being Named (and a Villian in particular) makes it unlikely to get pregnant (a likely possibility) it's possible that it might have slipped Cat's mind that she actually isn't Named right now.

Mental Mouse

She did complain about getting her "monthlies" in Everdark.

caoimhinh

I really would love to see from Hanno's POV some of the things about to unfold.

WuseMajor

Me too.

NerfGlaistigUaine

I have an honors thesis meeting in six hours and I'm reading PGTE at one in the morning. What is wrong with me?

Dome Zasrekh

Nothing.

M0och123

^^^

Death Knight

Alright, Christophe needs to die. Here's what I'm thinking, Cat, Masego and Sve Noc gate the Mirror Knight to Keter. Mirror Knight uses his shiny sword of Severance to kill everything in Keter or dies trying. Win win all around. Cat then uses her political clout with Hasenbach to smother the situation in the crib. Boomshitaki, war over or a lot more winnable.

Ninestrings

I think this is shaping up to a hero showdown between the white knight and the mirror knight.

MK overwhelmingly powerful, at the peak of his ability and wielding a sword that can cut anything

VS

WK, a humble hero with no magical gear and deprived of most of his powers.

WK would tear him apart.

thearpox23

Usually in that story the hero with fading powers is conceited and publicly goes for a direct confrontation while also trying to rig everything behind the scenes. Then the up and coming hero pulls through anyway while also revealing everything, intentionally or unintentionally, and signals the turnaround of a corrupt system.

I need not explain how the above script is off, and I think the diplomatic side of how this gets resolved will be more interesting and have more weight to it than whatever duel might happen.

Ninestrings

Yeah but there's no way Hanno tries to rig it, so it becomes a straight up "underdog versus the monster in a one on one match" Hanno either wins, or dies and inspires someone else to kick MK's arse.

thearpox23

Hanno makes for a poor underdog, and MK still doesn't quite cut it as a monster either. There's no narrative weight here, and there's not even any inherent weight to the duel itself because neither of them are Levantine.

So like it or not the path I outlined is the closest to what the Mirror Knight has to follow to succeed, at least it would conform to his vision of the situation if nothing else. But the part with rigging the duel is just one of the five things that are obviously wrong with the script, which leaves it lacking in weight as well.

A duel in and of itself is a specific story trope. For it to happen at all a story path is desired. For it to be inevitable even more so. For it to be effective, triply so, and Bard isn't around at the moment to exploit everything, so Hanno can maintain his position even after losing. Once again, they're not Levantine or Villains to crown the one with the biggest stick, so while showdown of some sort is coming, things would have to change for a duel to be the biggest factor.

Salt

Agreed, underdog stories don't tend to hold well for someone like Hanno who has historically been in the superior position. If anything, a fight might become disaster, as the narrative could easily become the culmination of the Mirror Knight's own underdog story – growing and finally surpassing his previous superiors.

Politically the fight itself would also create divisions between Heroes that agree with one or the other, and start a precedent for challenge of leadership by force – which would be terrible.

If a fight was forced though, it would be best for Hanno to lean hard into the role of a wiser mentor and try to leverage a conciliatory position instead.

Something along the lines of a 'strong but unskilled youth vs experienced master past his physical prime' type of trope. This kind of story would be bolstered if he attempted a non-lethal takedown with greater skill (which Recall gives him plenty of access to) instead of aiming to cause real harm with force, since it further specializes him into the role of a wiser veteran teaching a harsh-but-necessary lesson to a promising talent. Go for one of the classics, like putting more importance on how you use your power than how much power you have, which both fits the situation and their respective personalities.

In a mundane sense it would be an easy way to defuse any anger and make him more receptive, if Christophe starts the fight and Hanno extends an olive branch after winning the fight. Moderation/kindness extended from a victorious position tends to take the edge off animosity, and that line of action would be in-character for him anyway, avoiding the same kinds of suspicions that came out of Catherine's abrupt change in attitude when she tried her hand at reconciliation.

Politically it would potentially turn a danger into a boon, if he managed to reconcile this way. The precedent would then change to show that duels for leadership are foolish and shallow, and that the whole thing was an exercise in youthful immaturity that was well-handled by the current leadership.

Salt

I'd honestly prefer if Hanno was successful in talking Christophe down, and pointed him in the direction of the elves or something.

What I wouldn't give to see the showdown of the insufferable: the Mirror Knight vs an Emerald Sword. They'd both offend each other instantly and look so far down their noses at each other that their necks would be in danger of snapping.

The Emerald Sword would be incensed at human vermin daring to be so arrogant, and Christophe would somehow rationalize the elf as a Villain before the first verbal joust is over.

Mental Mouse

Hanno has not been "deprived of most of his powers"! He's lost his coin-flip aspect yes, but he still has Recall to learn the secrets of essentially every hero before his time (and IIRC duplicate their light-shaping). And Ride to provide Light to shape. But as I've said before, his greatest powers are tongue and heart, and he's a lot smarter than Christophe! to boot.

Javvies

Is the Coin of Judgement even an Aspect?

I thought it was a very specialized artifact provided by the Titans.

Though, with the Coin presumably nonfunctional, he can't flip it for the bonuses riding the Judgement train. Which is, admittedly, a definite downgrade, although the Coin wouldn't necessarily help him when dealing with Mirror Knight, and he almost certainly wouldn't invoke it upon Mirror Knight even if it were fully functional. Ditto for Bard, probably.

Although, he most likely could've used it on the Dead King, but I'm not sure how much that'd actually help.

Salt

Definitely not an aspect, it's basically an ordinary coin right now, without the angels on his shoulder. He flipped it to demonstrate this to Cat, when they were chatting about what it was like to be cut off from the Seraphim. I was also under the impression that he's still the White Knight as far as Role and aspects go.

The coin isn't really a weapon though, as far as Hanno is concerned. For him it's just how he figures out whether the Seraphim consider an action/person Justified or not.

I suspect he'd flip it without hesitation on literally anyone and anything – including any Hero, any Villain, any civilian, the Bard, Rulers, Countries, or even inanimate ideas/decisions – that he considers to be questionably 'Just'.

After all, we know from the Kairos POV when he viewed everyone with Wish that nothing quite matters to Hanno as much as "I want to be Just".

Mental Mouse

Bard said it was an Aspect, she called it a "formulaic Aspect". He had a different gift from the Gigantes, the shapechanging sword that Black destroyed, but that was basically a convenience to help out with his Recall aspect.

vernal.ancient

Unless he becomes a revenant, still wielding the severance

JJR

If Mirror Knight fails this task the coalition gets to face him as a revenant, possibly still wielding severance. It depends on whether Dead Kings ability to usurp magic is stronger than Saint of Swords lingering essence's ability to perceive such an attempt and self destruct. I'd put my money on the Dead King though. There's also the issue of his Dawn aspect. If DK gets his phalanges on Mirror Knight with that intact, then it's just a matter of waiting a little bit (from an immortal liche's point of view) and he has an unstoppable warrior. One that story might not even be able to step in to stop. It would be a story of the alliance's chickens coming home to roost after all.

It just seems like a bad idea all round.

LizAris

I am ridiculously happy that Cat finally got to bang Fred (They would make a cute couple politics aside, ngl)

YES HANNO way to have Cat's back...to think I didn't even like White when we first met him

Mirror boy needs to seriously back off– I hope we get to see lovely Cordelia destroy him with some polite conversation real soon

Wonder

I am willing to do whatever it takes to be a fly on the wall or anything else ,just to see Cat sweaty and spent and hear her vocal opinions of the Fisher .

Of only we come some exclusives on this kind of things that Cat gets up to.

That sweaty scene is not getting out of my head anytime soon.

vernal.ancient

Guarantee someone is working on that fanfic already

Juff

Typo Thread:

But of I > But if I wager," Indrani > wager." Indrani if the screw > if they screw fielding as shield > fielding a shield far," Indrani > far." Indrani from an large > from a large sent written > sent a written hole in pocket > hole in my pocket anyway," he > anyway." He mooning," I > mooning." I was shame > was a shame
the that > that that'd followed > that'd follow leaving as a lookout > leaving her as a lookout luck," I > luck." I

Big I

So does this make Cat the femme fatale of the Kingfisher Prince's story? Or vice versa?

I anticipate this liason is going to be used to sour the Mirror Knight on the Prince. I remember him saying "you've broken the Gray Pilgrim and fooled the White Knight", and now she's seduced the Kingfisher Prince. In his mind I'm sure he's the lone voice of reason in a world gone mad.

thearpox23

It's such a beautiful reasoning lock, one of the most beautiful we humans have. Consider a target to be a vector of corruption, and you can immediately discredit every person who have come into contact with the target and considers them reasonable. Meanwhile every person who didn't come into contact with the target yet is ignorant, and can be discredited just as well. It's just so hellishly difficult to disprove.

I am rather forgetful with terminology, but it strikes me that English likely has a term for this.

Salt

The funny thing is that Christophe would actually be half correct.

The Pilgrim and the White Knight both saw it – Tariq called Cat a “thresher”, which Hanno describes as having a pull that pulls people into her orbit – either as followers or as wreckage. They actually fourth-walled her character archetype there.

Her current pulled-into-orbit count consists of: all the Woe, Juniper, most of the legions, half the goblins (who volunteer for the Army of Callow just because of Catherine), the sisters, all the drow, Cordelia, the Pilgrim, Roland, Talbot, Akua, the entire grand alliance, nearly all the Villains under the Truce and Terms, and a shit ton of side characters. Am I missing anyone?

The half he’s wrong about would be Cat having a nefarious master plan underneath it all that viciously... undoes her own life’s work. I guess.

Kind of a big thing to be wrong about, but the first part at least is a pretty spot-on read of her from Christophe,

dadycool

I kind of want a confrontation where she’s accused of trying to rule the entire continent and she says something like “Yes, I am on my way to ruling the world. By proxy, with lots of advisors able to keep my head on straight. I WILL bring this world into a new era of peace and prosperity, under the direction of the rulers that know what’s best for their people.” I think that sidesteps a lot of the pitfalls such a Glorious Villainous Authoritarian Speech would have for the one giving it.

Mental Mouse

Funny thing, in a Hero that’s usually called “leadership”.

vernal.ancient

Sounds like a subset of confirmation bias, not sure if there’s a more specific name

Cicero

Isn’t it just a form of “begging the question?”

In other words, you assume the conclusion, which assumption then provides the evidence supporting the conclusion.

thearpox23

We know the Black Queen is a dangerous schemer, because many people support her?

I suppose that kind of works, but MK is actually ready to answer the question of "How do we know she is a schemer?" with "She is a Villain and isn't trying to murder us directly." which is actually a good answer considering his world-view. And the nature of villains is explained by his scriptures and cultural knowledge.

Considering that "begging the question" seems to refer to a specific argumentation tactic, this seems a tad more complicated than that. More of a cult mentality, but that seems more of a general concept than something specific.

Salt

That seems rather severely biased towards Catherine. Christophe's evaluation of her as a "dangerous schemer" is, if anything, understating it. The part he's actually wrong about is something else entirely – that she necessarily must have bad intentions, or that it's impossible for them to be anything but enemies.

Otherwise though? Of course you treat the Carrion Lord's successor as a potential danger. Of course you consider her an insanely competent schemer, given her impressively long list of publicly known victories by scheming, since the Everdark arc.

She's not the squire anymore, and the color of her cloak is no longer the only reason to be wary or outright afraid of her. She's already become the kind of entity that can squash armies by stomping her foot. Anyone but very strong Named, heads of state, and literal gods should worry about her potentially ending you faster than you can say "high priestess of a murder-god worshipping Drow religion".

thearpox23

You're missing the forest for the trees again.

My post wasn't an evaluation of Catherine, it was an attempt to phrase it using the Begging the Question fallacy, which I found lacking. I could've found a couple better matching words, but that wasn't going to fix the overall issue of using that fallacy.

And even my first reply wasn't about what Mirror Knight's perceptive is. It was about the kind of circular reasoning that could be potentially used to discredit anyone who disagrees with him. Used in real life as well.

Salt

Fair enough, I misunderstood your point.

Hellspirit

Mmm, I'm not sure whether the Mirror Knight is justified in his behavior on the larger scale, but to my eye he's very much the Protagonist Hero in a typical story.

I just hope it turns out well. I really want to see him grow into someone I can like in This story.

Salt

It would actually be a fantastic redemption story if he eventually grew into the person the Saint could've been, if her Role wasn't a purely Avenging type that was always too late to save anything.

Could you imagine how much of a boon the old terror granny could've been in this situation, if she hadn't had every speck of kindness purged out of her with decades of losses and horrors? It would've been amazing watching her trade barbs with revenants before swiftly chopping them in half.

M0och123

Luckily this is Pgte where literally anything could happen.

Big I

Mirror Knight strikes me as a tragic hero destined to turn evil. I'm expecting him to be the next Black Knight.

jalexanderb

I hope Cordelia will bring up the point about the Severance that I haven't noticed Cat even thinking about, which is that they (collectively) own the damn thing. They paid for the resources and funding, and there is no way in hell Cordy is going to let "but I picked it up so its mine now" be the whole reason MK gets the sword.

Obviously Cat trying to pull something like that would've got her slapped down Narratively but that's what we love about about an unnamed ruler. God, I hope Cordelia just obliterates the idiot verbally.

dadycool

As the kind of person that rejects Religious/Named morality for mortal Law and Order, that would absolutely be in character for her. "Um, excuse me. We made that sword to be used in a fight against Keter, not in a civil war with doom on our doorstep. It wasn't commissioned for you or anyone else. And picking it up out of the armory doesn't make it yours any more than if a foot soldier picked up a lance he had neither the training nor equipment to properly use." She'd say it far more elegantly, of course.

Salt

The Principiate must honor alliances and be honest to its faithful allies (we can't afford to break alliance right now, idiot), and acknowledges the Empire Ever Dark's efforts in keeping the Enemy at bay (especially not with the Everdark). The Crown would like to recognize the Black Queen for her faithful service in the war effort (I have like, ten irons in the fire that I need to draw on her influence for), and would like to extend invitation for further negotiations, as to further mutual interests under the fairest of terms (I need to negotiate, stop weakening my bargaining position)

All of which would promptly fly over his head, greatly saddening him that even the First Prince isn't immune to the Black Queens treacherous corruption.

agumentic

"Unnamed" doesn't mean "Exempt from the narrative", as we've seen in Book 5. Anyone just trying to take Severance away from Mirror Knight would fail, I think. If he is to lose it, that would be by himself, either by willingly relinquishing it or by losing his head to the power of the sword.

Salt

I think it's a moot point, honestly. Christophe's identity as a person is so classically Proceran – the peoples who are generally appalled at even the notion of not following the letter of the law, even while ignoring the intent of it – that it's virtually impossible for him to even want to ignore the First Prince.

He might consider her tricked by Villainous treachery at worst, but he's still the same kid who got awkward at the sight of Catherine the ~royal~ breaking etiquette around him.

If Cordelia Hasenbach actually got pissed off enough to openly denounce him, the boy would likely cry himself to sleep out of shame, and we'd get a half a chapter of him being very upset at once again proving himself unworthy of the mantle.

Cap'n Smurfy

I suspect Mirror Knight got saw caught up in rushing to greet Hanno he genuinely forgot to acknowledge Catherine.

Salt

Also wait, did we just get a hint about Black's overall plan in his civil war with Malicia?

Cat mentioned that it was proceeding at a languid pace. That probably isn't an accident, that's Black intentionally taking it slow, knowing that the civil war itself is a form of containment. He's essentially a sword at Malicia's back for as long as the civil war is ongoing, and she can't go full throttle at Catherine until he's dealt with.

If that's the case, then he might be narratively tightening the noose around Malicia's neck, by just sitting there and dragging it out. He knows Malicia, knows her well, that she tends to tunnel on trying to win every fight. She said it herself at the end of the peace conference – that she always, always wins. Does that sound similar to you, like a certain Light-clad mirror to the good ol Hellgods?

If Black allows Malicia to slowly choke the life out of this Dread Empress Sepulchral that he's set up as a rival, but achieves one of his goals anyway by buying Catherine time? Then he puts himself in a narrative where Alaya always wins, but Amadeus always gets his due. He shapes the narrative so Malicia is adopting Above's methodology while he adopts Below's, in a war over who gets to be Below's favored champion.

He's letting her walk right into that Sepulchral tomb he prepared for her by taking yet another page out of Catherine's playbook and very patiently, very slowly... surrendering the battle to win the war.

ninegardens

I mean... him taking things slowly means that Alay-bells isn't going to mess up the grand alliance, true... but it also means the Legions can't show up to HELP the grand alliance... which is something of a problem.

Salt

Logistically true, but narratively there are advantages of being late to the party anyway. Rushing to an ally's aid in their hour of greatest need is a pretty big gust of wind in your story sails.

Works better as a Hero, but leaning on the father rushing to save an adopted daughter line is arguably even stronger, albeit one with more death flags attached.

Sparsebeard

Now, why would the Elves, a barren people, want the crown that symbolizes rebirth... such an enigma!

Abrakadabra

I think it is an enigma. Because it is not a common knowledge, the elf being barren that is. Bard knew about it but WHO else?

Sparsebeard

I thought it was relatively common knowledge.

Still, I do think it's the reason they want the crown rather than just a grab for more power. If that's the case, there is a parallel to be made with the drow.

whaljan whaljan a0814cc162 <https://wakelet.com/wake/2DgNPF1ncaFKPCWMHdj-A>

Chapter 32: Convened

"Let priests offer forgiveness before the hanging, a queen can only afford it after."

– Queen Yolanda of Callow, the Wicked (known as 'the Stern' in contemporary histories)

I found out, to my mild surprise, that there were not one but three private dining rooms in the Alcazar. I'd not even been aware that were any, though it made sense upon refection: it was the part of the Arsenal meant to host important guests, essentially the facility's diplomatic quarters. In my experience a great deal of diplomacy was had over meals and drinks, compared to the great formal conferences I'd envisioned as a girl. One of the two smaller rooms was where the First Prince of Procer received me, having brought her own private cooks to prepare the meal in the Arsenal kitchens. I appreciate the restraint of not having gone for the formal banquet hall, which was large enough that any meal taken there would bring with it a tiring amount of pageantry.

Instead we sat in an elegant and comfortable dining room whose walls were covered by panels of painted wood that I vaguely remembered being donated by the recently ascended Princess of Cantal. Lovely work with a touch of warmth to it. It was a pleasant departure from the bare stone that was so prevalent everywhere in the Arsenal. The meal itself was of the quality I'd come to expect from Cordelia Hasenbach's personal cooks, which was to say both delicious and almost unnecessarily elaborate. Four services, each with a paired cup of wine – I noticed she drank on sparsely from hers – and ranging from some sort of potage whose ingredients came from a garden first planted by the founder of the Principate to a roasted bird that ate only enchanted seeds and was illegal for anyone but royalty to eat in most of Procer.

Unlike me, it seemed that Hasenbach had something of a sweet tooth. Though she'd eaten with measured grace throughout the meal, she dug into the fourth and final serving of a strawberry-topped custard tart sprinkled with slivers of marzipan with discreet enthusiasm. I ate enough of mine to be polite but found myself much more interested in the bottle of wine that'd been provided to me: Vale summer wine. Slightly cooled in a chillbox, as was the custom this side of the Whitecaps, it proved a pleasurable way to end the finest meal I'd had in a long time.

"I suppose it would be unpatriotic of me to admit I'm growing fond of Proceran cuisine," I mused.

"I will refrain from spreading it around," the First Prince drily replied.

I'd actually put on a dress for once, given that any fighting taking place tonight was unlikely to involved swords. One the downsides to being known as a soldier queen was that there was a expectation I'd show up to everything looking like I was fit for battle, something that was rarely compatible with the sort of cotton summer dress I remained fond of wearing. Not that I could put on one of those when meeting with the likes of Cordelia Hasenbach, sadly. The Arsenal was too cold anyway. Instead I'd put on a long-sleeved dress in black velvet, discreetly embroidered with my heraldry in silver thread on the sides. I'd not bothered with jewelry aside from a set of intricate silver bracelets set with grey agates I'd received as a diplomatic gift from Hasenbach herself a year or two back.

My own small preparations were, naturally, nothing compared to the spectacle that was the First Prince of Procer receiving foreign royalty. The intricate brocade dress in gold and pale she must have been helped into – it was too tightly fitted to her frame for it to be anything but laced in the back – ended in long skirts that matched the length of the light ermine-collared cloak in the same colours she wore over the dress. A long, slender golden necklace set with sapphires reached well below her throat and over the cloak, calling attention to the narrowness of her waist by contrast. A clever trick of perspective, that, helped along by the way the skirts expanded swiftly outwards. It made her look like slender girl instead of the woman with the Lycaonese warrior frame she actually was. The cape hid the broad shoulders too, I'd noticed, which was a recurring pattern with her.

Still, with all the intricate layers and the way for once her long golden locks had been allowed to tumble down her back – in a very careful and artistic pretence of – carelessly I felt like you might be able to fit two of me in her.

"Much appreciated," I drawled. "So, if it's not too indiscreet to ask, how was it that you learned my favourite wine? I cannot help but feel deeply amused the prospect the famous Circle of Thorns going digging for that."

"It was learned by happenstance during the Liesse Rebellion," the First Prince idly replied, polishing off the last of her dessert. "A certain Hasan Qara used smugglers with which the Circle has ties to obtain a large enough quantity of the vintage that questions were raised."

I breathed out slowly, startled by the way the grief had jumped out at me. It'd been some time since I'd last thought of Ratface. Who'd trusted me and followed me, only to die by an assassin's blade on the night that Malicia had ensured that this could only end with one of us dead.

"I seem to have given offence," Cordelia softly said. "My apologies."

I mastered myself and waved it away.

"He was a good friend," I said. "He died during the Night of Knives and I miss him still."

The First Prince slowly nodded.

"If not for Agnes' foresight and the protection it affords, I would have lost much of my family to the Tower's assassins over the years," the fair-haired Lycaonese said. "I can only offer my sympathies for your loss."

I wasn't sure if she was simply that polished a speaker or if she genuinely meant it, but it made no difference. Ratface's corpse had been given a Legion funeral, in Laure, and one day I would settle his last accounts on his behalf. I could offer no more than that, though it would still be too small a thing for all that he'd freely given.

"We'll lose more before this is over," I simply said. "Tears are best kept for when the swords return to the sheath."

"A sentiment my people are more than passingly fond of," Cordelia said, faintly rueful.

Our conversation paused as an attendant came to take her empty plate, another bringing in an elegant porcelain teapot to replace it. The First Prince gestured for the woman to pour and she filled a cup with a dark tea fragrant enough I caught the scent from my seat – it was distinctly bitter, as Hasenbach seemed to prefer her brews. The attendants withdrew again after one filled my half-empty glass anew, leaving behind the bottle. Within moments we were alone in the room, and the tension began to rise. After the meal and the idle talk that'd accompanied it, we would finally be getting at the meat of why she'd wanted this meeting.

"We have a great deal to discuss, Queen Catherine," the First Prince said. "This was true before I left Salia, and circumstance has since added to the heap of troubles ahead of us."

"The Prince of Brus conveyed your opinions and offer to me," I carefully said. "Yet I would take council with Lady Dartwick before speaking more to the subject."

Hasenbach lightly sipped at her tea, never making a sound.

"Jurisdiction over the Red Axe is one matter," she said. "The Mirror Knight and his involvement with the House of Langevin are another. Yet even further abroad we are not without ill news."

I frowned.

"Mercantis?" I asked.

Vivienne had recently warned me the situation there was bad and about to get worse, mentioning that we'd speak more of it in person, but I'd not believed it to have gotten to the point of 'ill news'. The Secretariat had warned me even earlier of going on there as well, through Secretary Nestor, but they'd been vague and I was not in the habit of flinching from shadows. I'd been skeptical then and remained skeptical now. The City of Bought and Sold might have gained some leverage over the Grand Alliance by its merchant lords and banks becoming the foremost lenders to the war effort, but they had to be aware that there were limits to how much they could push that. Given that most of the mercenary armies they relied on for protection were either six feet deep or under contract, these days, they were also rather vulnerable to directly expressed displeasure.

Also known as violence.

"There is a limit to the papers I can provide you on the matter," Cordelia said, surprisingly forthright, "as they contain privileged information on the Principate's capacities of production and trade. I will have what I can sent to your quarters, however, and I would myself convey the conclusions of my staff if you have no objection."

I hid my surprise. This was a lot more serious than I'd expected.

"Please do," I replied.

"To summarize, unprecedented burdens and the interruption of near all our usual trade routes have effectively ended Procer's ability to sustain itself without outside help," Cordelia Hasenbach said. "Conscription and the previous drains on our treasuries are shaping what would have been a dire crisis into a risk of outright collapse."

Coming from the woman ruling what was still the most powerful nation on the surface of Calernia, that was stark thing to hear.

"You should still be able to trade with Callow and Levant," I pointed out.

It wasn't that I doubted her, but rather more that I was surprised. I'd been reading the treasury reports for the Grand Alliance assiduously, and though there'd been dips they'd never been long-lasting. I'd believed we were staying afloat, if not necessarily by much.

"The profits to be found there are smaller than those our merchants are accustomed to," the First Prince delicately replied.

Meaning the Kingdom of Callow and the Dominion of Levant, the two allies who'd not closed their doors to Proceran traders, were simply too poor for their trade to sustain Procer. That, I grimly thought, actually sounded about right. I'd been shocked at the wealth of even minor cities in the heartlands of the Principate for a reason.

"And within your own borders the trade is failing," I said, cocking an eyebrow.

"Prices have gone up for nearly all goods," Cordelia said. "To protect their own tradesmen and prevent other principalities from buying up their reserves, princes have been raising increasingly stiff tariffs."

Which was reasonable enough, I thought, but with an eye on the Principate as a whole it must be crippling. Maybe Procer at its peak could withstand every principality becoming as an island and cutting off trading ties, but it wasn't at its peak right now. Whole swaths of it had been ravaged by Black during his ill-fated march, the north had been turned into a series of ravaged war fronts and there was a mass of displaced refugees to care for in the heartlands. All those were drains that Procer simply wouldn't be able to sustain if all its principalities were closed-off and trying for subsistence instead of prosperity.

"Prince Frederic mentioned confiscations, when we discussed the state of affairs in Procer in passing," I slowly said. "How bad is it really?"

"They have become common practice even south of Lange, now," the blue-eyed princess replied. "If princes attempted to keep to their war quotas without resorting to them, nearly two thirds of the Principate would begin toppling into bankruptcy."

Oh fuck. That was... Hells, we were scraping through at rough cost and with only a little hope in the distance right now, but that was with the full weight of the Principate of Procer behind us. If it collapsed behind us the Dead King wouldn't even need to crack our defence lines: we simply wouldn't be able to field and feed large enough armies to keep him back. At that point we'd be forced to retreat, otherwise we were just feeding him well-armed corpses to march south with.

"But the Mercantis loans are keeping you afloat," I said.

"It is not sustainable in the long term," the First Prince said. "We will need increasingly larger loans to remain standing where we are the longer this continues. Yet you are correct, at the moment the coin from Mercantis had allowed us to ward off the spiral downwards."

I drank deep of my cup, barely even enjoying the taste of my favourite wine.

"Are they aware of that?" I asked.

Meaning, was awareness of the not negligible leverage this represented the reason they were pushing us now?

"I am uncertain," Cordelia said. "Given the unfortunate amount of success the Eyes of the Empire have had in infiltrating the Principate, however, I believe that on the other hand Dread Empress Malicia is."

Of course she godsdamned was. This wasn't the kind of knowledge she was just going to sit on either. Considering that she couldn't really spare military forces to stir up trouble at the moment, the possibility of going for the Grand Alliance's moneybags using her preferred weapons of knives and influence was the kind of opportunity she'd dig into with relish.

"For a woman fighting a civil war she's remaining unpleasantly active abroad," I growled.

The First Prince sipped at her tea.

"Lady Dartwick informed me that our... friend out east warned the Tower will soon take action in Mercantis," Cordelia said.

Yeah, she'd told me that as well. Our friend out east, huh. My lips twitched. A pretty little euphemism, that, used to refer to Dread Empress Sepulchral. I'd known her as High Lady Abreha Mirembe of Aksum back in the day, though our acquaintance had only been middling – I'd strong-armed her into backing the creating of the Ruling Council of Callow using her nephew as leverage, but we'd not really crossed paths since. She'd risen to prominence in the years that followed mostly by virtue of ruling one of the few High Seats whose holdings had not been touched by civil war or foreign incursions. She'd failed to ride the wave of discontent against Malicia that'd welled up after the destruction of Thalassina all the way to the Tower, but against all expectations her eventual rebellion had not been brutally snuffed out by loyalist legions.

The two empresses past the Wasaliti were still grappling even now, and though Malicia's position was the stronger Sepulchral's own was in no immediate danger of collapse.

"I'd count that as good information," I said. "Malicia scoring victories against foes abroad will strengthen her position with the nobles, so it's in Sepulchral's interests to see her thwarted."

"You had some involvement with Sepulchral when she was still High Lady of Aksum, as I understand it," the First Prince said. "Did you form an opinion of her?"

"Her nephew's the one I had the most dealings with, and he was a follower of the Diabolist with waning ties to his aunt," I cautioned. "But Abreha Mirembe..."

Black had considered her one of the most dangerous nobles in the Empire, considering the amount of blood she'd shed to claim Aksum, but it was not my father's opinion being sought.

"In a lot of ways, she's emblematic of Wasteland upper nobility as a whole," I eventually said. "Cunning, even brilliant in some regards, but also appallingly callous. Abreha Mirembe does not have ideals – or perhaps it might be more accurate to say that her ideal is the acquisition of power no matter the costs."

"The Circle judged her to be hard and opportunistic even by Praesi standards," Cordelia shared.

"Praesi in her rarefied circle of nobility are expected to exalt cruelty in the same way that your princes are expected to show off their piety," I frankly said. "That she not only survived but outright thrived in that environment should tell you a lot about her. She can be relied on to slide a knife into Malicia's back every chance she gets, but not much else."

We'd strayed from our original discussion Mercantis, though, so I subtly changed the subject back to it.

"Mercantis," I said. "I doubt you would have brought it up to me without having some sort of a solution in mind."

The First Prince drank from her cup, taking her time, and set it down so delicately I barely heard the clink of porcelain on porcelain.

"Diplomacy will not be enough to settle that matter," Cordelia Hasenbach said. "It is unfortunate, but no less true for it."

My brow rose. Well now, that was bold of her. And a far cry from her usual methods.

"I can't commit my troops still in Callow to an attack on the city," I warned. "Even if I could afford the vulnerability to Praes that'd bring, only a fool would try an assault on Mercantis without a proper fleet."

Which the Kingdom of Callow did not have. In theory it might be possible to requisition river barges and fishing boats up the Hwaerte until there were enough floating rafts to manage a crossing with, but considering that Mercantis had a small but professional fleet of dedicated warships trying that would just be pissing away an army at the bottom of the Great Lake.

"Nothing quite so significant is required," the fair-haired princess replied. "A few Chosen and Damned, however, would make the point felt quite clearly."

I grimaced. It'd be less of a headache trying to shake a few of those free than trying to shuffle around troops, admittedly, but it'd still be a headache. The real issue was that at least one of those Named would need to have a reputation as a genuine threat to something the size of a city-state if they were to serve as a potable warning against overreach. We had few Named of that calibre, and they were best used up north on the fronts. Pulling one off for what someone unaware of the nuances might think to just be petty politics would not be popular, aside from the actual martial considerations in pulling out such a war asset.

"I could reach out to the Kingdom Under," I suggested.

Mercantis was under their protection, and the dwarves had a vested interest in the Grand Alliance continuing to make a dent in the forces of the Dead King.

"If the King Under the Mountains can be convinced to intervene, it will have a significant impact," Cordelia agreed. "Yet the dwarves have traditionally been reluctant to involve themselves in such matters."

Which was probably why she'd not opened by requesting I try that – she didn't believe the Kingdom Under would actually move even if asked. She might not be wrong, since they were a pretty mercenary people and they didn't exactly owe me any favours at the moment. Those had been spent keeping the drow fed on their exodus, amongst other things. Might as well find out, though, there wasn't much to lose in asking.

"I'll draft a letter," I said, drumming my fingers against the table.

"Thank you," she smiled. "While I would ask you to consider the practicalities of sending Chosen to Mercantis, such a measure would yet be distant. I have arranged a conference with representatives of the Consortium here in the Arsenal. I would be pleased if you could attend it."

Impressing the merchants with a look at the Arsenal, huh? A pretty simple tactic, but it'd probably still be somewhat effective considering how unearthly and impressive this place could look. It wasn't like this place wasn't going to turn into a major diplomatic artery for a month or two anyway, we might as well make use of it properly.

"I'll be there," I agreed. "Have the details sent to my people."

I let a moment pass.

"To be sure," I slowly said, "you do want me in that room to scare them, correct?"

The First Prince of Procer was too self-controlled to be visibly embarrassed by my laying out the truth so bluntly, but I doubted it was a coincidence she chose that moment to take a sip of tea.

"Your reputation carries a great deal of weight, Queen Catherine," the blue-eyed princess carefully said. "Your displeasure would not be courted lightly."

Meaning that those representatives were a lot less likely to try to push the Grand Alliance if I made it clear that such a mistake would lead to my gating in with a few thousand drow one evening and expressing my displeasure. Fair enough. I'd have hesitated to be the rabid hound of this play more if there were likely to be long term diplomatic consequences for Callow, but my abdication should see to the worse of that. Besides, by then my home should be a lot less afraid of Mercantis' displeasure: if trade with Praes and Procer was open, then the Consortium's usefulness as a middleman waned significantly.

"I'm sure they can be made to understand that if their greed ends up feeding Calernia to Keter, before the end I'll personally lead my armies to raze Mercantis to the ground and salt the ashes," I mildly said.

"The very sort of talk that might give the ambitious pause," Cordelia delicately admitted. "The imprudence in relying too heavily on the Consortium has been made clear, however, which demands other measures be taken. Bringing peace to even part of the Free Cities would allow for the resumption of trade, and so lessen the burden on the southern principalities."

"In principle I'm very much in favour," I said. "I simply don't see a practical way to achieve peace in the region anytime soon."

The wars in the League of Free Cities had reached a point of stalemate, more or less. Basileus Leo Trakas still ruled in the city of Nicae itself, but he'd lost the countryside to Strategos Zenobia and neither could afford to dislodge the other. Penthes' armies had been whipped on the field by General Basilia, who'd managed to get Helike in order behind her, but after the casualties of the Proceran campaign and half her army leaving to serve under the Grand Alliance she didn't have the siege or mages to take Penthes itself – whose much-despised Exarch Prodocius was rumoured to be propped up by Malicia directly. Stygia was quietly feeding the flames, hoping to expand after everyone was spent, and neither Atalante nor Bellerophon seemed inclined to get involved.

Only Delos was keeping an eye on things, but while the Secretariat had passed information to me in the past it was also very reluctant to surrender its current neutrality. The askretis had no interest in a war after the way their last one had gone.

"Though there will be difficulties," Cordelia Hasenbach said, "if the signatories Grand Alliance were to wield their clout in accord it would not be impossible to effect change."

I watched her and drank from my cup, noncommittal. There'd been good reasons for the Grand Alliance being so reluctant to involve itself in the wars of the League, and though what I'd learned about the darkening of Procer changed the situation some I was still inclined to caution there. Any resources spent on trying to plug that sinking boat might very well end up wasted with nothing to show for it, leaving us even worse off than before.

"A shared recognition of Strategos Zenobia as the legitimate ruler of Nicae, for example, would strengthen her support," she suggested.

"Not enough to topple Leo Trakas," I pointed out.

Which would make the gesture entirely pointless, as far as I was concerned.

"Perhaps so, if paired with a severing of all ties with territory under the rule of the Basileus," Cordelia said.

That'd put pressure, though not an enormous amount: with sea trade in the Samite Gulf good as dead, Nicae wouldn't be taking any real losses by this. It'd still be made a pariah to a large coalition, though, and that might make some nobles in the city turn on the Basileus out of fear the sanctions would remain even when things calmed. It was also, however, something that might just backfire spectacularly if the people of Nicae were moved to anger by the foreign interference into their affairs. Something that the First Prince would be well aware of, which meant there was another angle there.

"Under what pretext?" I asked.

"I would have the Grand Alliance name Leo Trakas a friend to the Dead King, and so an enemy to all the living," the First Prince said.

My hands clenched. I forced them to loosen, then drank again from the cup as I gathered my thoughts. The refusal on the tip of my tongue had been instant, but it had been more a thing of instinct than thought. This entire proposal smacked of the House of Light declaring me Arch-heretic of the East to me, only even more shamelessly political. Basileus Leo Trakas was inconvenient to us, and circumstances might well have forced him into some degree of alliance with the Tower, but it was going a step too far to call him an ally of the Dead King. I calmly set down my cup.

"I don't like the precedent this sets," I said. "We're an alliance, not the ruling lords of Calernia. And while this sort of denunciation might be taken as face value by a lot of people, given the war we're in, we both know that Leo Trakas is mostly trying to stay alive at the moment. I've little pity to spare for the man, but I'm not comfortable using titles like 'friend to the Dead King' as a diplomatic stick."

It was the sort of thing that made a man genuinely desperate, and a Basileus with both nothing left to lose and helpful Wasteland friends was a recipe for disaster.

"I understand your hesitation," the First Prince said. "It does not please me to have to resort to such a method. My advisors suggested the same manoeuvre be used to exert pressure on Penthes, in truth, but I balked. It would be an overreach."

So Exarch Prodocius, arguably by far the worse man of the two for having helped Malicia arrange a use of Still Water, would be spared the same epithet. Because Cordelia was trying to put together the western half of the League as a mostly stable trading bloc for the Principate, not the east. The naked truth laid bare by what she must have considered to be a demonstration of restraint only made me more uneasy. Some of that must have shown on my face, as she pressed forward.

"As you have yourself pointed out, we otherwise lack the means to truly affect matters in the Free Cities," the fair-haired princess said.

"I still think that even in putting out the fire in Nicae you'd be laying the foundations for a worse blaze down the line," I said. "Did you go to Levant about this?"

"The Holy Seljun was willing to agree," she replied. "Though only after a formal vote of signatory members, and only should that vote be unanimous."

Ah, so Wazim Isbili was cleverer than his reputation implied. That way Tariq's distant nephew could let me refuse Procer on his behalf instead of having to do his own dirty work. That trick of procedure, though, spoke to me of a smaller nation used to existing in Procer's shadow and wary of helping it gain too much influence even in a crisis. Those passed, after all, while influence gained during them lingered a lot longer. Of course, if I could figure this much out then Hasenbach could as well. I cocked a silent eyebrow at her.

"As I said," the First Prince of Procer repeated, "I understand your hesitation. Perhaps a more cautious approach would better suit? A private mock-vote can be had, and should it be unanimous a letter of warning can be sent to Leo Trakas as to what will follow."

I didn't like having even the pretence of my seal of approval on this, but unfortunately she was right that we weren't flush with ways to settle the mess in the League. It might not be avoidable for me to get my hands dirty here. And I can always change my vote when it comes to actually going through with this.

"You're leveraging him," I said, implicitly agreeing. "So what is it you're trying to leverage him into?"

"Opening the gates of Nicae to Strategos Zenobia, who by law is the senior ruler of the city-state," Cordelia said. "This would be under guarantee of safety for him and his partisans, naturally. I have been corresponding with Zenobia and she is amenable to those terms."

I couldn't help but notice she'd not mentioned General Basilia, who'd been the one to raise Zenobia up in the first place. Mostly as a way to keep Nicae off her back while she went after Penthes, but it couldn't be denied the two were aligned with Basilia the distinct greater of that alliance.

"I could get Helike to accept those terms," I said, "if Zenobia is willing to turn on Penthes."

The First Prince's eyes narrowed as she watched me closely.

"In what sense?" she asked. "The city will have little force to field after this."

"It will have ships," I said. "The lack of which is one of the reasons Basilia can't siege the coastal fortresses properly."

Able to cut them off from the sea, the Helikean general might be able to starve them out even if she couldn't take the walls. Or at least make a good enough threat of it that Prodocius' army would have to either give battle or face the prospect of losing every holdout outside the walls of Penthes. Considering that Basilia seemed a lot more interested in winning her wars than cementing influence over Nicae, I suspected she'd take naval support from Nicae over Leo Trakas' head on a pike. He'd made for a pretty middling rival, anyway.

"I will have to contact the Strategos," Cordelia said, "yet I suspect she will be amenable to such terms."

I suspected that Hasenbach would push for acceptance, regardless of whether or not Zenobia liked the deal. It was compounding gain with gain, from the Proceran perspective: with a fleet on her side, Basilia would be able to become a serious headache for another ally of the Tower. More importantly she'd be doing that fighting in the eastern territories of the League, far from anything Hasenbach currently cared about. Considering that while I might be the effective patron of Basilia's Helike the Principate had a much more contentious relationship with her, keeping the general busy in the east might even be considered yet another gain. I nodded sharply.

"Stygia's going to be an issue," I said. "Lukewarm as they might be on the Tower, they're not going to let alliances firm up the western League without taking measures."

"I concur," the Lycaonese princess said. "And it so happens I have a few thoughts on how to check them."

We must have spoken for at least an hour more after that, breaking only for a bit when we had to send for maps – I was trying to make the point of why a Nicaean support fleet would practically double the size of what Basilia could field in soldiers just because of the supply line they represented – and Hasenbach excusing herself to use the privy. It was turning out to be a thoroughly productive evening, and though the suggestion of sponsoring defensive pacts between cities against Stygia in particular would be dead in the water without Atalante or Delos being brought on, it was a solid notion we could keep pushing without a significant investment of resources on our part.

In time the subject was exhausted, at least in the sense that more could not be discussed without the both of us having sought answers outside and read through reports. I was just starting on my third cup of Vale summer wine by then, though I'd been slow in drinking it, so I was largely sober and feeling rather vivified by how much we'd gotten done. In a concession to my own consumption Hasenbach had sent for a cup of hydromel she'd been nursing ever since she'd finished the tea, and it was that she set down when the conversation hit a low ebb.

"I believe we have discussed the matter exhaustively enough for the night," the First Prince said.

"Agreed," I said.

I sighed, leaning back into my seat.

"So let's talk about the troubles closer to home."

tithin

I'm looking at that Chekhov's gun of her going to the privy with suspicion

Ninestrings

Chekhov's privy really? you think she's gonna Corleone her?

Miles

She switched with a spy! The Wandering Bard in disguise! Or maybe she just stuffed that dress with explosives! Using Cat's dead goats trick against her. That dastardly Dead King is there any low he won't stoop to?

shikkarasu

You can't kill Cat with a dynamite dress. Cat had to write an entire paper on the topic after Marchford. If you're going to dress to kill it will have to be metaphorically; she's still quite susceptible to that.

onedollargum

I like the implication that Catherine doesn't need to use the toilet. When one is named, or better yet, First of Night... XD

TeK

She can just gate it, lol

Mental Mouse

Sve Noc: <ahem>

Ninestrings

When you poop into the abyss, the abyss also poops into you.

NerfContessa

Staaap..... My lungs....

You 3 just made my neighbors ask if I was alright...

Ahahaha

General Chaos

She got real horny for Cat doing Diplomacy and had to go to do some... petting of her cat.

laguz24

I do love these political speeches, and if Catherine's plan works mercantis is not going to enjoy its traditional value for much longer despite the debts.

Javvies

The economic problems of Procer are bad news.
And a compelling argument against delaying action against Keter any longer than absolutely necessary.
If Procer's economy collapses, the war is effectively lost, until/unless the right Story path starts ... which is what Saint wanted and very few other more reasonable people do.

I agree with Cat, Malicia is way too active in external affairs for someone who is supposed to be fighting a bitter civil war.

And we have to wait for the next chapter (at least) to find out more about the internal issues of the Grand Alliance/Procer, and the Named and the bullshit Bard pulled.

Salt

To be honest I don't like the shape of it, the thing with Malicia. The entire situation reeks of a trap to me. I'm wondering if maybe her supposed action in Mercantis is a ruse to bait Cat and Cordelia into making a mistake and offending Mercantis.

What if Cat's first instinct was correct, and Malicia appears too active for a woman fighting a bitter civil war because that's exactly what she is: just putting up the appearance of being active. If her resources are stretched too thin to strike a real blow, it would make perfect sense to make your enemies trip over themselves by overreacting to a non-existent blow, such as attacking Mercantis or overstepping their bounds in meddling with the Free cities. Let them make enemies out of their own allies for no real reason, and even if they found out the scheme later, revealing it would sound like the worst excuse ever constructed. "Oh, Malicia tricked us into thinking you were going to screw us over first, Mercantis, whoopsie sorry for threatening your sovereignty with overwhelming violence."

It would fit Malicia's MO – plots within plots, and would take a hell of a lot less resources to pull off than actually turning anyone against the Grand Alliance.

Remember that this entire thing is based on a missive from Sepulchral, not directly from their own intelligence networks, which is again a vastly easier to do than fully infiltrating the Jacks or the Circle of Thorns. All she'd have to do is have a halfway decent idea of their reliance on foreign trade, and find a way to send a fake missive "from Dread Empress Sepulchral".

Not only will the Grand Alliance have little reason to doubt it – as it is supposed to be a top secret/secure form of correspondence from a contact that has all the right motives for sending such a letter – they'll WANT to believe it. They'll be expecting a blow from Malicia sooner or later, and they will WANT to believe that this once they've caught onto Malicia's game ahead of time. That just this once they're beating her to the punch, when in reality they're just sabotaging themselves by playing right into her hand.

Salt

I mean hell, the missives from Sepulchral could've been Malicia missives from the beginning. It'd be insanely risky for anyone to poke too much into the matter – open collaboration of any degree with a Dread Empress of Praes would spark minor rebellions if found out, especially considering Praes is allied to the Dead King – and Malicia could just make it believable by revealing moderately harmful information about her own moves to the Grand Alliance, before dropping a truly devastating lie after trust was already gained.

caoimhinh

True. It wouldn't even be the first time Praesi Intelligence infiltrated and falsified reports and correspondence of foreign countries. Procer and Callow being particularly susceptible to this. Malicia has been doing such things to Procer since as early as their civil war decades years ago and all the Princes taking loans from the Pravus Bank, and she held control of Callow for 20 years, and she has been toying with Praesi Nobility for over 40 years.

Infiltrating Abreha's agents is something Malicia probably dozens of years ago. So she seems pretty capable of falsifying a report from Abreha's agents to Cat and Cordelia.

hakureireimu

But the plot would fail once the Alliance had a talk with Mercantis, unless their representative is also compromised.

Salt

If Mercantis really was planning to betray them to Praes for the sake of profit, they wouldn't exactly tell the Grand Alliance about their plans to betray the Grand Alliance. It's not as if Catherine could walk up to their merchants and ask "are you planning to secretly stab us in the back?"

Gaunt

It's talk like this that makes me miss the Tyrant of Helike just a little bit.

Salt

LMAO

Rest in anything but peace, Kairos Theodosian. You died on your feet.

jamesc9

I was going to say that he was busy, rather than resting, but of course the busy person is Anaxares of Bellerophon, who gained employment with the Choir of Justice.

agumentic

Well, Circle of Thorns was telling Cordelia that Mercantis was pushing to disclose the debts and fuck over Procer/Grand Alliance before Vivienne told her about the message from Sepulchral, so I think that is solid information. It's not like it would take Malicia a lot of resources to push that angle – she just needs to guide certain people to certain information and then normal human greed will do the deed.

Also, I believe that Scribe has joined Sepulchral, so infiltrating her networks and intercepting the missives to the Grand Alliance might be pretty hard.

Salt

I think that's the beauty of it though, you're right it is also a very real possibility that Malicia has actually gotten to one of the Merchant Princes that facilitated Cordelia's little accounting trick. They can't be sure, because while it'd be difficult for Malicia to get to they can't exactly say 100% that a woman of her brilliance didn't find a shortcut that most people wouldn't be able to fathom. So Cat and Cordelia can't take things slow at all – they need to move on this now.

But that's the genius behind the plan:

If Malicia IS making a move and they do nothing – the Merchants find out about the sheer size of Proceran debt and stops offering any more loans, cutting off Procer's funding.

If Malicia ISN'T making a move but they respond as if she is, Mercantis takes it as sign that Procer is getting ready to default on what they already suspect to be a massive debt that the First Prince has clearly gone out of her way to obscure the scope of, and stops offering any more loans, cutting off Procer's funding.

To either ascertain what Malicia has planned or to take mitigating measures is within their power, but it requires such immediate attention that the Grand Alliance can't afford to look Malicia's way if she starts truly winning the Wasteland's civil war.

I'm actually thinking that instead of solving the internal problem (the civil war) so she can tackle the external one (the grand alliance), Malicia is looking to tie up the external problem to bring the hammer down on the internal one without external repercussion.

If the Wasteland civil war starts heating up as soon as the Mercantis politics really get going, then we know that Malicia has already won this battle regardless whether or not Cat and Cordelia guess correctly. If Cat and Cordelia guess wrong, that's a win for Malicia on two political fronts.

caoimhinh

Yeah, but it makes sense that she is able to do that, as Malicia has a strong base for foreign monetary intervention through Mercantis, the Pravus Bank (which she used to fund Procer's civil war). Praes is one of the richest countries in matters of precious gems and metals like gold, plus artifacts (what they lack is food products, fertile land for planting, and ranching), so even if she is having to fight internally, she has the money to move things abroad. In fact, for Praes it is a matter of bare survival to have money to use abroad as Black's lessons to Catherine showed.

On the other hand, I'm a bit dubious about Procer's approaching collapse. I'm a bit confused about what exactly is happening and what caused it. The summary is "the war against Keter takes its toll" but the devil is in the details.

I thought they had problems due to not having enough food reserves (that was mentioned chapters ago), but Cordelia is making it seem like they are lacking coin as she only talked about loans of coin, not resources like food.

Then again, considering it's been over 2 years since Amadeus's burning march through Eastern Procer, the blow from that should have already been received and those lands affected reused, new harvest should be coming from there even if a great number of the population is up North as soldiers. And even if not, Procer has other Principalities that should be able to feed it. Iserre having problems due to Black's raids would make sense, not so the whole of Procer.

But the problem Procer should be having is a lack of manpower to tend the fields, rather than lack of money. I'd be surprised if Cordelia hasn't enforced laboring the fields just like she has enforced conscription. Civilian population staying in the cities at a time like this will cause losses due to so many mouths eating and no one producing food.

Also, since allegedly Procer needs loans of money to buy food, I wonder where the food is going to come from. It's not from Callow nor Levant, definitely not Praes (they buy a lot of their food from Procer, Callow and co.), and Mercantis is an intermediary for trade between countries, they are a small island, they are not the ones producing the food Procer needs. So that leaves the League or Ashur as the suppliers of the food Procer wants to buy. Unless they plan to buy from outside of Calernia?

P.S: Princes making matters worse by rising tariffs and stopping trade, yeah, those guys are suuuch geniuses. To be fair, though, that's kind of how the wealthy investors and stockholders in our world react when rumors of crisis circulate: withdraw their money, refuse to circulate thus making the value of stocks drop... which in turn creates the crisis.

Speculation and panic are the real cause of the crisis.

mamm0nn

From what I understand, it's the issue with reserves and fielding the food to the front lines. The latter is likely a huge drain that takes a lot of manpower on top of a lot of food, while the former cannot slowly build up some fat again. Especially considering the reserves in the granaries and such would be the same long-lasting foods that would have to be sent to the front lines.

The people are likely relying on their cabbage patches and other vegetables that don't remain long-lasting without canning which this setting doesn't have yet. Which means plenty of local food most of the time, but tough winters where the farmers are scraping by likely by tapping into their cattle's meat and poaching are making things dangerous. And it means virtually no trade, while the agriculture that could generate trade is being almost completely used up by the supply lines to the northern front and the scraps are taken as tariffs (which are likely in produce rather than gold if possible).

For the lacking gold, this is both a matter of inflation and deflation happening in unison. Inflation because everything vital; food, metal and manpower, is getting scarce and expensive while things like luxuries have to move along to remain luxuries, and deflation because the Kingdom Down Under is a constant gold drain without returns (other than loans) that continuously remove gold from the economy. So there's less gold and silver to go around and you can buy less with it.

mamm0nn

Really annoyed that WordPress doesn't allow me to edit afterwards

The situation is dangerous because people are annually having rough winters of famine, and nothing makes the people riot like starvation. Everything else can make them form a mob, but starvation is an absolute that presses people against the wall and makes them riot even if it costs their life because they and their families are dying anyway and they can do nothing else against it. Famine means that riots will preserve even in the face of armies and Named until the famine is resolved.

And, agriculture is always a huge part of the economy. Always. It's mass goods and everyone needs it. Most of the economy will be crippled when this falls away, meaning that a lot of merchants are currently out of a job or fighting over scraps while no one's buying from the luxuries merchants. In situations like these, it's likely that any merchant that can make a living through different means no matter how parasitic will do so to maintain their wealth and lifestyle, while those that can't will bottle up their money and further grind down the economy.

Salt

They're buying food from under Calernia I believe, not outside of it. The dwarves offered them essentially an unlimited amount of food and weapons as long as they can afford it, when Cat negotiated terms with the Herald at the end of the Everdark arc. It makes sense that coin is all they care about when they're basically dumping it all underground for supplies. 2/10ths cost on steel and at cost for food.

There was also mention of protecting their supply lines that way as well, since going underground through Dwarven territory would make their supply lines untouchable, provided they could pay for it.

The Kingdom Under was also trying to strangle them with predatory loans this way, offering loans to go with. Those, Cat warned Cordelia not to take because the terms were so bad.

I believe it was revealed back during in the first chat Cat and Cordelia had after the Twilight Ways arc.

SpeckofStardust

Yep easy talk out of the way the real discussion shall begin.

Salt

I find it kind of hilarious that Cordelia and Catherine are adopting a Good Cop/Bad Cop routine, with Cordelia being so unused to solving complex problems with a blunt instrument that she's a little embarrassed to even admit it outright. Like the proudest master fencer admitting that she'd like to use a hammer, just this once.

Although, the foreshadowing there is anything but hilarious, when the chapter ended on the conversation ending in a "low ebb". What was it that they called political warfare in Procer, the ebb and flow?

I have a suspicion the flow might very soon end up being more of a tsunami

edrey

Now i have the idea of selling that angel remain to the kingdom under for a insane amount of gold, well not for them they are too rich for that. That solve the problem of money, the bard and probably the DK, the bard wouldnt mind as long keter is finished right?

Burlyraven

The talk of sending a party of five to Mercantis sounds like an excellent date for Cat and Kingfisher. They can bring Archer and Zeze and call it a double date. Probably Roland as well, to keep the scales balanced, and maybe the fated sixth can save him from fifth-wheeling.

dadycool

As long as Masego can finish preparing for his prior engagement first, he might be down for spending time with his ladies. Problem is, every second he spends away from his workshop is a second wasted. Cat and Freddy, on the other hand, probably desperately need a break from the Front and it's probably easier to avoid a scandal out in the wild than in a fortress.

It just generally goes back to one of Cat's gripes about sending a group: anyone suitable is already needed where they are.

Juff

Typo Thread:

I appreciate the > I appreciated the drank on sparsely > drank sparsely (or only sparsely) me to I'm > me to say I'm One the > One of the a expectation > an expectation look like slender > look like a slender the all the > all the of – carelessly I > of carelessness – I the prospect the > at the prospect of the was stark thing > was a stark thing form buying > from buying discussion Mercantis > discussion of Mercantis potable warning (potent? potential? palpable?)

though, there > though; there you," she > you." She anyway, we > anyway; we signatories Grand > signatories of the Grand the drank > then drank taken as face > taken at face

Catherine's inner monologue

We'd strayed from our original discussion voting for a practical guide to evil, though, so I subtly changed the subject back to it.

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Adrian V

I have this strange feeling Cat or Viv will be travelling to Nicae or Penthes, whoever gives them more trouble (AKA gets desperate) for a little diplomacy

mamm0nn

A Practical Guide to Evil, where the politics are intriguing rather than boring, and boy is there a lot of politics.

SpacyRicochet

It's getting close to "too much politics" for my taste. This chapter wasn't all that interesting to me. Though I'm glad it helps with putting future decisions in perspective.

Charlie Hegarty

I enjoy economics, I like seeing the rest of this world continue to be fleshed out. I'm excited to see more of and to find out what Malicia is going to do, as she is one of the characters I most enjoy reading about.

But, the more the story focuses on issues like economics, feeding your country, home dissent to draconian measures and the like, and tries to convince me that Procer is in danger of collapse, the harder it is for me to gloss over the question of why Callow, which has gone through worse, hasn't collapsed yet.

Shveiran

Because it is smaller, mostly united, and the damage dealt to its productive capacity has been paired with a reduction of the populace for every generation. It also supports a specialized army which absorbs a smaller portion of its populace.

In comparison, Procer has been facing less numerical problem but a much longer one, is losing the most profitable trade avenues, and relies on armies largely levied from the populace. This has a much harsher effect on its industry and wealth, not to mention its capacity to produce food.

Callow is streamlined; it is not doing good, but it has a lot of farms and the arms to tend to them: it can feed itself and is in no danger to collapse.

Procer is a much more complex machine that lost a greater portion of its workforce and has to keep it fed on the front. It's more fragile, it turns slower, and risks tipping over.

Salt

Not to mention that while the Principiate has spent the last several decades prior to the Crusade scheming against and bleeding themselves, the Evil Praesi occupation (ironically enough) was economically much less damaging. Callow was in rather stable economic condition, run by an efficient centralized government, at the start of the story.

Politically and culturally suppressed as the nation was, it was also ruled-in-all-but-name by a man who spent much of his life studying and implementing mundane institutions effective enough to replace the old madness of the East; and who fully intended to make Callow stable enough to not want to rebel, rather than crushing them into "a pack of plundered provinces" with no ability to do so. I think it's safe to assume that the internal workings of the nation functioned a lot more efficiently in the first place than the pack of rabid cats that Cordelia has been trying to herd for most of her life.

Their insane national unity, as you briefly mentioned already, is nothing to joke about either. We've seen from Callowan soldiers' POVs so far that while the Black Queen might be a bit too black if it were peacetime, wartime is another matter entirely. Any perceived external threat has the nation closing ranks immediately, and their culture has been so conditioned to protect their own from a nonstop stream of external invasions that the crown receives near-absolute support from its populace in wartime, for as long as it's seen to be protecting the nation from possible invaders.

Essentially: it's mostly just good luck. Callow had the most administratively responsible oppressor imaginable in the Black Knight, was warred on so frequently that the nation and culture were suited for a state of total war in the first place, and had a convenient and wildly popular national war hero-turned-monarch to rally around.

TeK

Also, unlike Procer, Callow had been in a state of a total war for quite a few times during it's history, while for Procer this kind of crisis is unprecedented.

vernal.ancient

Seems at this point that it's mostly a matter of having a more centralized government than Procer. The latter still has a massive aristocracy, each ruling their own lands with little outside control except the things Cordelia can explicitly make into law, which if I'm remembering right requires votes in the Assembly? Callow, on the other hand, lost most of their aristocracy in the Conquest, and most of what they do have left is working directly for the monarchy as either officials or soldiers. Thus, while they deal with the same pressures, Procer has the additional pressure of a large nobility acting in self interest rather than the interest of the whole, while Callow's government is more able to take a big picture approach to their problems

Daniel E

I am looking forward to Catherine's meeting with the Mercantics reps. I really hope we'll see her take the opportunity to ham it up, really go 'old school Villain' on them.

Baron

"I suppose it would be unpatriotic of me to I'm growing fond of Proceran cuisine," I mused.

Admit has been omitted

jalexanderb

"Meaning that those representatives were a lot less likely to try to push the Grand Alliance if I made it clear that such a mistake would lead to my gating in with a few thousand drow one evening and expressing my displeasure."

Queen Catherine 'fuck around and find out!' Foundling strikes again

Alexis

Upon refection? I'm not sure if that's a typo, or a glorious pun!

>> I found out, to my mild surprise, that there were not one but three private dining rooms in the Alcazar. I'd not even been aware that were any, though it made sense upon refection

edrey

As side note, someone know what did happen with ashur?, they lost the second and third tier of the ruling class but anything else?

Hakram's Dead Hand

R.I.P. Ratface. I still miss you. 😞

Chapter 33: Convenience

"Thirty-seven: theft in the service of Above is not a sin. It is, however, still a crime. Be discreet."

– "Two Hundred Heroic Axioms", author unknown

"Shall we begin with the least contentious of the subjects to be broached?"

Her Most Serene Highness Cordelia Hasenbach, First Prince of Procer, Warden of the West and Protector of the Realms of Man, struck me as looking rather cautious right now. Wary of angering me? Might be, depending on what she considered to be the least contentious of the things we needed to talk about. It was always relative, when it came to stuff like this – the least murderous of three High Lords still usually had an unfortunate amount of murder under their belt. I took a long sip from my cup, letting the pleasant taste of my favourite wine linger against my palate.

"I'm all ears," I said.

"There are, from the reports I have received about the incident at the Arsenal, two Damned who will need to face punishment," the First Prince said. "Namely, the Concocter and the Hunted Magician."

I smothered a grimace at the pun, which I would generously assume to have been unintentional.

"All other villains who were involved are dead," I agreed.

So that was why she'd been cautious, huh. Dealing with villains was my legal responsibility, in the end. The Hunted Magician would stand trial before a tribunal, since he'd actively helped along an invasion of the Arsenal and the Arsenal was an interest of all the signatory states of the Grand Alliance, but the tribunal itself couldn't actually sentence him to anything. Only I could, as his representative under the Terms. In theory, at least. In practice, if I outright ignored the recommendations given out by a tribunal that'd count the White Knight and representatives for both Procer and Levant, I'd be asking for a diplomatic shitstorm.

Hanno would be in the same situation when it came to the Red Axe. I'd have a seat on her tribunal as well, as both the representative for both Callow and Below's lot, but I wouldn't have the right to pass a sentence on her any more than the First Prince or whoever the Dominion ended up sending. There were good reasons for that. In my case, for example, if I had the authority to sentence heroes it'd lead to the rebellion of more than a few before the day was out. Hanno of Arwad was trusted as an adjudicator, and only him. Though while he had the same right to outright ignore anything the rest of the tribunal would say, when it came down to it he'd also have the same considerations as me to deal with.

Hasenbach was treading carefully here because, after pushing for the Red Axe to be tried by Procer and not under the Terms, she did not want me to mistake her asking about my current leanings on punishing my charges as an attempt on her part to keep usurping authority over the Terms.

"May I be blunt?" I asked.

Something like an amused flicker passed through those blue eyes.

"Have you not been?" the First Prince of Procer asked.

Well now, I thought, lips twitching. Get another few drinks into that one and she might actually be fun.

"I don't think you're trying to get your hands on the Terms," I frankly said. "Only an idiot would try to make that many Named into a personal army, and even back when negotiating with you regularly drove me to screaming I did not believe you to be one. You don't need to tread lightly for fear of offending me there. If I consider you to be overstepping I will say as much, but I am not looking to be offended."

Blue eyes considered me, weighing the extent of my honesty in speaking, then she nodded.

"A lengthy trial for the Hunted Magician would be damaging," Cordelia said. "And your intentions when it comes to the Concocter remain unclear. I would establish as soon as possible what you intend, so that the affair can be solved swiftly when it comes to deliberation."

"You won't be alone in that tribunal," I pointed out. "And, now that I think of it, will it be you personally or a representative?"

"I might have nominated Princess Rozala if we could afford to pull her from the front, but as circumstances stand I will personally represent the Principate," she said. "And while I will freely profess to be unable to account for the White Knight, Lord Yannu Marave's interests are well known to me."

Ah, so Juniper's old foe from the Champion's Blood was the one the Dominion has sent. Considering the Cleves front was supposed to be holding steady at the moment I supposed he was the natural pick. My own two Levantines might represent a significant bloc in the Dominion now that they were betrothed, but they were both still a little young for this sort of game. The Lord of Alava had a weightier reputation than either and probably better understood how to preserve the interests of Levant.

"What does Levant want out of this?" I asked, genuinely curious.

"To ensure punishment is dealt," the First Prince said, "and to avoid, at all costs, even the shadow of a precedent that might force them to ennoble one of their Damned."

Yeah, that sounded about right. Aside from the Grey Pilgrim, whose concerns tended to extend far from the borders of the Dominion, in my experience the Blood tended to hardly care about what went on beyond their borders. So long as their anger wasn't actively courted, they were unlikely to take a stand.

"Neither should be an issue," I said. "When it comes to the Hunted Magician, considering his cooperation with the Wandering Bard it's a given that he loses the right to object to assignments for the remainder of the duration of the Terms."

"Yet, given the nature of his talents, he would still be best employed at the Arsenal," Cordelia skeptically noted.

Meaning it was an empty punishment, as far as she was concerned, since he wouldn't be going anywhere or be losing anything.

"That'd be the basic consequence of dealing with an enemy, not the punishment," I replied. "For that, I'm currently leaning towards a fine. Within the next three days we should have estimates of what the damages to the Arsenal will cost to repair. A fine of that amount will be given."

I paused.

"Once for each signatory nation of the Grand Alliance," I said. "In addition, he will personally have to repay the pensions any of our nations give to the families of soldiers who died during the attack."

The First Prince's brow rose, ever so slightly.

"That would be a considerable sum," she said.

More than any man could repay in a lifetime, though admittedly the occasional villain got more than that. With a debt like that over his head the Magician was a lot more likely to leg it to the Free Cities after the war than stick around and repay it. I'd considered that, of course. The trick was in how it'd be paid back.

"It would be up to the nations to decide in what nature they might prefer that repayment," I said. "The Kingdom of Callow, however, will accept it in artefact-crafting and enchanting work."

Meaning Vivienne would have a fortune's worth of labour from one of the finest mages on the continent to call on when her reign began, already paid for. The Rhenian princess considered me for a moment, remaining silent as her well-honed mind parsed out all the implications.

"While heavily in debt, to a sum total comparable to a prince's treasury if not greater, the Magician will also have direct ties to the rulers of three great nations," Cordelia quietly said. "In the world of the Accords, that would be the sort of protection one of the Damned might well kill for."

It really was. So long as three crowns had a fortune's worth of highly valuable and difficult labour left to extract out of the Hunted Magicians' hide, none of them were likely to let the man get his head cut off by an overzealous hero or bar their door to him. I was still making the man a beggar for at least a decade, forcing him to largely live on the charity of the patrons he'd work for, so it wasn't like I was letting him off easy. But it was the sort of punishment that would win me points with the cleverer among my kind and avoid alienating the Magician entirely.

"The Concocter deserves less punishment," I said, "and I don't intend to convene a tribunal over it. She'll lose the right to refuse assignments, like the Magician, but aside from that I only intend to have her personally brew tailored potions for every lastingly wounded soldier in the Arsenal or the family of any deceased. The ingredients will, of course, come out of her pocket."

A princely gift, in the sense that few aside from princes would otherwise be able to afford the Concocter brewing for them personally. I owed the woman a favour for having kept Hakram alive, so I intended to offer to quietly float her a loan from my own funds to pay for the ingredients. If it just so happened that I forgot to ask for interest or a fixed timeline for repayment, well, so be it. Hakram was worth a lot more to me than the coin, and it would have still been a bargain for a hundred times the price.

"A harsh price, given the paucity of her involvement," Cordelia said, "but that will win you esteem from Lord Yannu. You foresee no complications there?"

"None," I said.

"I had expected that I would have to push for harsher sentences," the First Prince admitted. "In that I did you disservice, for you have struck an admirable balance between stern and sufferable."

I snorted.

"I have weaknesses as a queen, glaring ones," I said, "but I've been a warlord and leader of Named since I was seventeen. When it comes to that, you can expect a steady hand of me."

It wasn't the same, handing out a sentence as a queen and as the leader of a band. No ruler in the world had absolute authority, true enough, but it was an even more tenuous thing Named. Too loose a hand and they would run wild, too firm and they would leave. I'd believed my father to have been as a lord over the Calamities, when I'd been younger, and half-believed it a fault when I later grasped he was anything but. Being a representative under Terms had forced me to understand, though, how delicate a balancing act his leadership of that band had really been. I'd done this for many more Named than Black had ever led, but I'd also done it for scarcely two years and with literal Death knocking at the door up north. He, on the other hand, had kept the Calamities largely sane and safe for several decades even with few outside threats to keep them together.

"Talent is distributed blind to titles and breeding," Cordelia said.

I'd take that for the backhanded compliment that it was. I doubted Hasenbach and I would ever see eye to eye on a lot of things – it'd be hard to, when she would always put Procer first and I Callow – but that'd not prevented a degree of respect from emerging as our working relationship grew less venomous. I would not soon forget how many of my soldiers had died in a war I'd not wanted to fight, or the burning anger of having peace refused again and again, but I had less unpleasant things to add to the tally now. She'd turned out too damn useful over the last two years for the old anger to be the only thing I associated with her now.

"Flattery," I said. "Which tells me we've gotten to more contentious territory. Which poison will be your pick, Your Highness: the fool with the god-killing sword or the threefold nightmare of jurisdiction?"

The blonde Lycaonese sipped at her mead, the largest I'd yet seen her take. She'd be laughed out of a Callowan tavern as lightweight, I suspected, but then she didn't strike me as the kind of woman to step into a tavern in the first place.

"I have concerns about the Mirror Knight, as Prince Frederic made known to you," Cordelia said. "I understand that you have some of your own."

Much as I would have enjoyed venting about Christophe de Pavanie, I wasn't having a drink with Indrani. Petulance would get me nowhere, so it'd be best to keep this concise.

"The extent of my concerns will depend on his actions over the coming few days," I said. "He has made demands wildly beyond his authority – a full pardon for the Red Axe – and that he's made demands at all is alarming, but so far that's only been words. So long as it doesn't go further than that, I'm willing to let a lot of it be water under the bridge."

The Mirror Knight had turned what would have been certain death for Hakram into something less immediately mortal, though if the Concocter hadn't been on her way Adjutant would have died regardless. I owed him significantly less than I did the Concocter, but I owed him still. So I'd swallow my anger and let bygones be bygones, so long as he behaved. Hasenbach's eyes went sharp.

"You do not believe he will necessarily defer to the White Knight," the First Prince stated.

It was not a question and neither of us pretended otherwise.

"I've difficulty putting my finger on how messy that might get," I admitted. "But if they disagree, the Mirror Knight will not simply capitulate."

"A coup, even a soft one, would be unacceptable to the Principate," Cordelia coolly said. "The Terms as signed do not have provisions for the White Knight to be replaced, save should he die."

"The legalities won't kill this," I said. "Not with heroes, Hasenbach. Villains you can cow or bribe, but that won't work with Above's lot. They'll hold to doing the right thing even when it's an anchor around their neck – or everybody else's, for that matter."

She did not reply for a long moment and I bit my tongue. It'd come out just a little too caustic to have sounded entirely objective, which I regretted already. Anger would win me no points with this one, even if she decided it was justified anger.

"Would you be opposed to my intervening in the matter as First Prince?" she asked. "While this cannot be termed as an entirely Proceran issue, given those involved, it can not be denied that my subjects are at the heart of it."

"If you can disarm him with words I'll applaud," I said. "But this could turn on you right quick. If you're seen as interceding on my behalf that'll taint you by association, and in a way that might not be reparable."

It shouldn't be forgotten that the Mirror Knight would be her problem a lot longer than mine, assuming we all survived the war. He was a powerful Proceran hero with ties to a royal house, there'd be no disappearing into countryside obscurity for him.

"I will take your warning under consideration," the First Prince mildly said.

Meaning that I was trying to teach a knight how to ride, but very politely implied. Fair enough.

"The Severance remains the most salient issue concerning him," she continued.

My eyes narrowed.

"And what is Procer's stance on that?" I asked.

"Given that it was forged with materials that the Kingdom of Callow provided on Arsenal grounds and as part of an Arsenal undertaking, the artefact is to be considered a war asset of the Grand Alliance," the First Prince replied, the answer smooth and easy.

Practiced as well, no doubt. While Callow arguably had the best claim to the sword since I'd provided the initial material of it – though it shouldn't be forgot it was an aspect ripped out of a woman at least in theory a Proceran subject – my interest in securing it for the kingdom after the war was lukewarm at best. The First Prince's stance here was nuanced enough I wouldn't outright be renouncing the claim I hardly cared about, just weakening it, but it came with the upside of having the Severance designated as a war asset of the Grand Alliance. That meant we could strip it and assign it wherever we wanted, so long as the three signatory nations weren't stuck in an impasse.

"I'm amenable to those terms," I said.

She was just a tad too slow in suppressing her surprise. The eyes gave it away. Hadn't expected me to give my inch quite so swiftly, huh? If there'd been a Named back home that was a good fit for the sword I might have fought harder, but there simply wasn't one.

"Then we are in agreement," Cordelia faintly smiled. "I expect that Lord Yannu will be of a like mind, as it happens."

I snorted. Yeah, I'd heard that Mirror Knight wasn't all that popular with the Levantines. They were a touchy lot, especially when it came to their history with the Principate, and Christophe de Pavanie had been cursed with the twin disadvantages of being Proceran and prone to giving offence.

"The little I heard of the White Knight was in partial agreement to this," I noted. "Though he mentioned that he considers the Mirror Knight the best fit for the sword when it is assigned."

"It would be doing a disservice to the other Chosen to refrain from even considering their candidature," the blue-eyed princess diplomatically replied.

Meaning she really wasn't eager to leave it with good ol' Christophe. Music to my ears. I supposed from her perspective it'd be handing both a powerful weapon and a powerful symbol to hero already tied to a rival power within her borders, something that was bound to come back to bite her down the line. Mind you, the damned thing was a sword meant to be used so it couldn't all be about the politics.

"Come the time to assault Keter, if he's truly the best pick then I'll swallow my tongue and do what needs to be done," I admitted. "Until then I'd prefer him nowhere near that blade."

"Establishing the precedent that the Grand Alliance can strip and assign the sword is more important than the hands holding it at the moment," the First Prince said. "Though I will not deny that removing it as a symbol will be helpful considering he appears to be, as you have said, trying to arrange a pardon for the Red Axe."

And so we finally got to the thorniest of the knots.

"I imagine your stance on that won't have changed since it was conveyed to me," I said.

Meaning that she wanted the Red Axe tried under Proceran law for the attempted regicide of Frederic Goethal, regardless of any other claim there might be on the heroine's life.

"In essence it has not," Cordelia calmly said. "I am sure that, as a ruler yourself, you can understand the difficulty in being unable to hold a trial over the attempted assassination of one of my princes. An attempt that took place before more than half a hundred witnesses, no less."

"Her slaying of the Wicked Enchanter was done in front of more than twice that," I pointed out.

Which wasn't the issue, I knew even as I quibbled on the detail. Her issue was that the First Prince of Procer was finding herself unable to punish or even imprison someone who'd tried to kill a sitting member of the Highest Assembly, which must admittedly be infuriating.

"I do not deny that her breach of Terms also deserves punishment," she said. "Simply that her actions against the Principate take precedence."

"We can't try a corpse," I frankly said. "Which is what her actions would fetch, though I'm not sure what manner of execution follows attempted regicide in Brus."

"Boiled alive in oil," the First Prince replied without batting an eye.

Grisly, but hardly any worse than the drawing and quartering it would earn in Callow – and even that bloody practice was well shy of the ancient atrocity known as red hangings I preferred not to think too much about.

"Charming," I drily said. "Might hinder the process of questioning some, if you ask me, though on the upside at least it'll be a quick trial."

"If I were to concede that a trial could be held under the Terms before the sentence to the Principate's own was applied, would that remedy your objection?" the blonde princess asked.

That was already a better look for the whole affair, but it was also strictly that: a look. In substance, we'd still be establishing the jurisdiction of Proceran law over the Named serving under the Terms.

"What kind of a trial would you be holding, exactly?" I asked, frowning. "I'm familiar with Salienta's Graces, but I recall there's some sort of exception for matters of treason that explains why your people have two kinds of magistrates."

"Treason, heresy and royal dues fall under the authority of the crowns and not the rights of the people of Procer," Hasenbach clarified. "Given the unfeasibility of princes personally seeing to such judgements over their entire holdings, royal magistrates might be appointed to do so in their stead. In this particular case, however, Prince Frederic would be entitled by royal prerogative to render judgement himself."

Which would actually play out decently with villains, I thought. It'd be a heroic mess cleaned up by a heroic blade. I'd have to posture a bit and agitate in the Wicked Enchanter's name, but the Kingfisher Prince beheading the Red Axe would settle this halfway agreeably for everyone. Which made it all the more galling that he wasn't going to be doing that. That lovely thing he did with his hips wasn't anywhere near enough to excuse the headaches he was causing me.

"Yet he won't," I grunted, not hiding my displeasure. "So where does it go from there?"

"A formal trial by the Highest Assembly," Cordelia said. "Which I will admit would have... uses in settling other troubles."

It took me a moment to put the pieces together, as I was not used to putting myself in the shoes of the First Prince. Ah, she could use this whole affair to turn the screws on Prince Gaspard Langevin. The man would be fraying his ties to the Mirror Knight if he voted to have the Red Axe killed, since the hero wanted her pardoned, but it'd still be better than the alternative. Should he vote for acquittal after all, or even a lesser punishment, he'd be fraying ties to every single prince and princess of Procer. No one, after all, was denying that the Red Axe had tried to kill Frederic. Considering how popular the Prince of Brus was in the north, actually, even if simply ended up abstaining he'd be damaging his reputation a great deal in the region.

I could admire the cleverness of it, and I was pleased Hasenbach was taking the Langevin problem seriously, but the nature of my own objections to this mess had not changed either.

"I understand why you want your trial, I really do," I admitted. "In your place, I'd be pushing for the same thing."

"Yet you are not in my place," the blue-eyed woman said, smiling thinly.

"No, I'm not," I said. "I'm speaking as the representative for Below's champions. And Procer simply isn't trusted enough for them to be comfortable with it having the authority to hang them."

Hasenbach actually tended to be held in high esteem by the more intellectual of my lot, as a ruler whose knack for legal manoeuvring and diplomacy had led to remarkable achievements involving relatively little warfare, but not even the most admiring would want the Highest Assembly to have so much as a speck of authority over them. Even the other side of the fence, Hanno's crowd, was unlikely to have a much better opinion of such a measure. Heroes tended to see laws and crowns as obstructive, when they weren't the ones behind them, and Procer's rulers still had spectacularly bad reputation abroad for the most part.

"That reluctance is not unearned," Cordelia said, "yet it, too, must have limits. Minor crimes such as theft and assault I will not balk at leaving to the Terms, in the same way that an army in the field is subject to military justice and not that of a prince. Yet I cannot allow attempted regicide on Proceran soil without having it face Proceran justice. It would undermine the peace of the entire realm, establishing for all to see that Chosen and Damned live under different laws than the rest."

And that would go over significantly worse in the Principate than it would back home, where centuries of Good Kings and Wizards of the West had associated Names with authority, or even Praes – where being in a realm of your own, untouchable by your lessers, was half the draw of being Named in the first place. In Procer the people had an expectation that the law would apply to even rulers, if perhaps not quite as comprehensively, so the Red Axe slipping the net would be sure to cause resentment. It was still better than the alternative, in my opinion.

"They do live under different laws, until the war is over," I bluntly said. "They're called the Terms. They are unfair, set apart their members from everyone else and even offer amnesty to monsters, but they are also what has allowed us to muster more than seventy Named to the defence of Procer. There's a price to bringing in that kind of help, especially given the lack of trust between most parties involved. Going back on the nature of the Terms now will cause desertions. 'You will be under the protection of the Terms' does not have quite the same ring to it when 'unless it becomes politically inconvenient' gets added."

Heroes would at least take infringement there better than villains, who'd see this as Procer preparing the grounds for purges following the fall of Keter, but I suspected that tolerance would not survive for long. The Dominion heroes who'd not immediately balk at being subject to Proceran law – something the founders of Levant had actively warred against! – would sour on it the moment it put them in a situation where they had to willingly take punishment by a prince. The contingent from the Free Cities wouldn't be quite as incensed, but they were likely to band together for protection and it would all go to the Hells if the rulers of Procer started courting native heroes to bring into their personal orbit.

"I am no stranger to the tyranny of convenience, Catherine Foundling," Cordelia Hasenbach quietly said, "but that blade has ever cut both ways. You fear desertions? I fear riots. You fear the collapse of the fronts? I fear the collapse of everything behind them."

"Armies won't be enough to breach the walls of Keter, Cordelia Hasenbach," I quietly replied. "You'll need Named, bands of five that can triumph against impossible odds and the finest killers on Calernia to bring an end to the Dead King himself. Don't throw away your chance of winning the war from fear of having already lost it."

I matched her gaze, unflinching. She was not wrong, I thought, not really. But then neither was I. And behind the tension of the present I glimpsed something deeper. The legacy that this golden-haired daughter of the north wanted to leave behind, a nation of laws and trade and peace that would at last thrive without attempting to devour all it beheld. Its edges would scrape against those of my own craved-for legacy, if we were not careful. I wanted order forced onto the old war, the first war, the war that had begun the moment Creation did: Above and Below, the spinning coin of the divine wager. It was rules for those unearthly champions of black and white I wanted to set down, rules that went beyond borders and thrones, but my finest intentions would have to share the world with those same thrones they sought to surpass.

I did not hate what it was that Cordelia Hasenbach wanted to build, but I would not strip bare my own dream to gild hers.

"It has been some time," the First Prince eventually said, "since I have last been quite so thoroughly refused."

She'd not expected me to fold, tonight, but neither had she expected that I'd not be moved even an inch. I was not surprised, considering the boon she'd offered me if I saw things her way: accepting the Liesse Accords as they now stood, without further contest. It was something I would have paid dearly for, and might still. Yet in the end I was no more willing to weaken the foundation of the Accords before they were even signed than she had been willing to let the Choir of Judgement cast down a sentence on the very floor of the Highest Assembly.

"It gives me no pleasure to rebuff you," I honestly said. "But there are some days, some choices, where the only thing to be had is your pick of the shade of bleakness ahead."

The First Prince of Procer drank deep of her cup, her calm face like a too-small mask that exhaustion was peeking around the edges of. She saw, I thought as she turned her gaze to me, something to match that on my own face. The sum of too many half-nights, too many hard choices, too many victories that felt like defeats and defeats that felt like wounds. Sometimes it felt like I was sharp only because the world had whittled away everything but the sharpness. Rueful, she half-raised her cup towards me and I returned the gesture. We drank, for what else was there to do? The glasses were lowered all too soon.

"Is it easier," Cordelia softly asked, "when you are not born to it?"

Born to the crown, to the sword, to power. I looked down into my cup at the pale wine still remaining. I thought of the friends I'd buried, of the decisions that still sometimes haunted me in the dark of night. There were more of either than I wanted there to be.

"No," I faintly replied. "Not unless you are an even harder woman than I thought."

The silence lingered for long moment between us, not entirely comfortable but neither unpleasant. I looked up at the painted ceiling, letting out a long breath.

"But if not us, then who?" I asked, a smile quirking my lips.

I lowered my head to find her studying me quite closely, face grown serious.

"You might yet be my enemy, I think," the First Prince said.

It was true, so I did not deny it. In the end there was peace and then there was peace. It was not yet decided which of these we would have when the dust settled from Keter's fall.

"And still I find it easier to trust you than many I would call allies," Cordelia continued. "What a strange thing that is."

I almost laughed, for I knew exactly what she meant. Even if the day came where we were allies without doom having marched north to cement the pact, I'd consider her just as much of an opponent. A rival, perhaps, in the strangest of ways. The sky was not so large that there would be enough room for the full span of both our ambitions, and neither of us was above jostling.

"I imagine that on some nights," I half-smiled, "when we were girls, without ever knowing it we looked up at the same stars from different lands."

She inclined her head by the smallest of measures, and we left it at that.

Yet there was a whisper in my ear as the silence fell, pleased yet indistinct. Like a curl of smoke. And for the barest of moments I felt a warm breath against the back of my neck. A trick of the light had deepened the darkness in the corners of the hall and I fancied, just for that fleeting moment, that I glimpsed the silhouette of a great beast cast there from the shadows.

Ah, I thought, smiling a secret smile. Are you back, old friend?

My Name did not answer.

Not yet.

ErraticErrata

First update of the month, which means an extra chapter in the tab of the same name. This one is titled "Charlatan III", the continuation of the first two. There will, uh, actually be a fourth part since this chapter ended up almost thrice the size of the usual update and so got cut in two. I can at least tell you the fourth part will be the last, though 😊

TeK

Just face it already, seventh book is inevitable.

shikkarasu

Oh no. Another volume of exquisitely well written fantasy. However will we survive. Gasp. The horror.

TeK

To be fair, the better the series, the trickier the ending is to write. A good ending to be precise. Game of Thrones and Kingkiller's Chronicles as more obvious examples (I honestly forgot how many years I am waiting for the next book on those), and more relevant, recently finished Mother of Learning, author went from one chapter per week to one chapter per month to one chapter per two months as he got closer to the end.

Salt

True, but I have fairly high hopes for this one to be honest.

There's some obvious improvisation in reaction to fan sentiment in the smaller details, but the greater setting seems too detailed and too coherent to be anything but planned out (at least partially) in advance. Normally when authors plan poorly you get some rather glaring retcon for plot holes, or economies of scale getting real funky as the story progresses; especially considering that this is a partially 4th-wall breaking setting that actively uses common fantasy tropes as plot devices.

There's also some pretty far-reaching foreshadowing in the earlier chapters that points towards planning too, like Black once mentioning the Tenets of Night in passing, I believe when Cat was still the Squire.

At any rate, I'm rather cautiously optimistic. Wouldn't be surprised to hear the dude went into it largely knowing what kind of story he wanted to write in the first place.

TeK

Oh, I don't doubt that. We had Cat off-handly mention how adorably ineffective Bards are in the first book, the end is certainly planned (and probably cleverly foreshadowed in the way we don't get yet). Having at least some end point in mind is a necessary part of writing a good story.

The point is that while authors of any good series start with an ending point in mind, the more amazing story is, the more pressure there is on the author to end it properly. To give a satisfying, nay, great ending for the great story. Which scales up with story's epicness and complexity. And this is a superb fantasy, hence the difficulty.

Plus I suspect EE has great many details created about the world, and since the books end with leaving this universe, he must fight the urge to share more and more of his creation with others.

mavant

I mean, there's a lot more that I would happily read from this universe that doesn't directly impact Cat's story. I'd love to hear more about the gnomes, or the country across the Tyrian sea, or Triumphant, or the Miezens.

magetite

Ngl, I'm hoping for, after this continent is settled, somewhat, for us to zoom out and see some of the bigger picture,

'The woe go on holiday, volume 2, when zeze achieves apotheosis'

NerfContessa

Indeed, how could you do this to us, you monster!!

^^

Adrian_V

This is like the wheel of time all over again xD

TeK

I didn't mention it because author didn't, er, end well.

Insanenoodlyguy

"I have weaknesses as a queen, glaring ones," I said, "but I've been a warlord and linker of topwebfiction since I was seventeen. When it comes to that, you can expect a steady vote of me."

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

RubberBandMan

I thought the town was supposed to be on fire in this chapter. Is Oliver making it hard to set the town on fire? Is he just dragging things out and refusing to let EE get to the conclusion where everything is on fire? Oliver is the right sort of twisty bastard to to say 'just half a page more, I swear it'll all be on fire then' until the word count swells too large.

dadycool

I think you somehow commented on the wrong chapter.

TeK

He probably meant to comment on EE's "I swear this is the last time" shenanigans.

dadycool

It's nice how comfortable and companionable the two are together.

Tenthyr

Stirring names.

Jworks

So her Name will take the same form as it was when she was the Squire? That's interesting, I always assumed the black beast was attached to the Name, not the bearer of it.

Darkening

I doubt Cat's Name would have shifted feeling to a machine of gears and clockwork like Black had, even if she ascended to Black Knight herself. It's more a reflection of personality. I know this was discussed in story at one point but that was many books ago.

Jworks

I do remember reading something along those lines awhile back, but I'd say as of right now Cat's personality is closer to Black's shifting gears than it is to a wild beast. Everything she does and has done for awhile has been calculated, she sees events and the people involved in them as pieces in a game with the price being Cardinal. She controls her anger, sets aside her personal wants, and gives concessions with an end goal in mind. Hardly reflective of what her Name used to be.

TeK

Now, she still fundamentally seething at the world, and while she managed to marry that anger after a lot of blunders to a cold purpose, it is still essential to her very core. She doesn't put it in the box as an inconvenience, she relishes it. It's just that the beast grew up to be a calculative predator, doesn't make him a machine.

Jworks

True, and if anything it seems that's what the beast has become now that I think about it. She hasn't come into her Name yet, the beast remains in the background until she proves herself entirely worthy of the Name. It's hedging it's bets.

haihappen

The beast has learned patience just as Cat has. It will not barge into the room, take a shit on the table, and then collapse because it is yet too weak and over-excerted itself. No. It waits for the Name to grow, to mature, and for Cat to make the groove deep and strong. Then, their time will have come, and again, Cat will ride the beast.

I am hoping for the last part to literally happen, e.g., the Beast manifesting as an expression of her domain.

Salt

Any beast associated with Catherine is likely to be on fire, explosive, and bearing an uncanny resemblance to a goat. Not sure if that makes for good riding, although I guess that depends if you're asking Kairos or not.

TeK

I dunno, a burning undead horse-sized goat is suitably terrifying.

dadycool

Similar, but she's more human and less machine than Black. She seems to be trying more for cool and regal, as befits a Queen, rather than cold and calculating, as would befit a Darth Vader-esque character. Maybe a more mature and experienced Queen Amidala, since I'm already making Star Wars comparisons?

Zggt

She's more Harry Seldon (from Asimov's Foundation in case anyone hasn't read it... you're in for a treat) than any most other fictional scifi/fantasy characters. Now, he's more calculating than her in approach, but fundamentally they start by assuming that one person, given a long enough scale, can only influence as much as one person can. Their approaches on how to deal with it may wildly differ, but in essence their presumptive role in their respective worlds is similar; the one who saw the rotting foundations for what they were and decided to do better within the limits of what they could achieve.

That being said, I find Cat's approach of "fire and stabbing generally work best" more fun.

Cicero

There are clever beasts just as much as powerful ones. And the clever sort of beasts can be quite terrifying.

Cicero

The elephant for example, is quite intelligent. Yet it is also a terrifying beast when enraged.

She Who Rides the Elephant?

Salt

Catherine would commit immediate suicide if her Name turned out to be something that obvious of a euphemism. Indrani would never let her live it down, assuming she didn't suffocate from laughter first.

"Hey Cat, did you have fun riding Frederick's elephant?
Wink WINK"

TeK

That, but she actually says "Wink" out loud.

caoimhinh

She is now a young woman with more experience than the teenager Squire had.
She has honed her instincts and sharpened her anger. The beast is the same, but it has grown.

Her Name is not a savage, maddened beast. It is a predator with a hunter's instincts, a monster's claws and fangs, and a cunning mind to catch its prey.

someguy

Whatever for it will take, I can't wait to see whatever it is already!

vernal.ancient

Catdelia intensifies

hakureireimu

Ok, how does the epigraph relates to this chapter? What is being stolen here?

agumentic

It relates to the Named, even Heroes, not taking well to the laws.

TeK

A law is that thing put in there for some comic relief when you get in jail and have to be bailed out, many funs.

TeK

"Well now, I thought, lips twitching. Get another few drinks into that one and she might actually be fun."

Wait Cat, you already got royally fucked, don't make it worse.

"And still I find it easier to trust you than many I would call allies," Cordelia continued. "What a strange thing that is."

"I imagine that on some nights," I half-smiled, "when we were girls, without ever knowing it we looked up at the same stars from different lands."

God fucking damnit.

dadycoool

And with the pleasant parts of this conversation, my tentative 'maybe?' regarding a threesome turns into a full-on expectation. Frankly, I think Cat might start trying for a Zero Approval Gambit at some point to ease Vivienne's coronation, so getting in bed with an attractive not-a-couple that have a "maybe later" stance on each other, a couple that are a pair of Proceran royalty, wouldn't be all bad in her eyes.

TeK

Royal orgy. Get the blood into it too, and I am sure some Praesi nobility would be welcome. They are bread for looks.

caoimhinh

Just tell the Praesi that there will be poison and they will come. Then after the orgy is over when they find out there actually wasn't any poison, reveal it as a plot to have fucked them.

They will actually respect you and leave satisfied.
Win-Win.

TeK

To be fair, I would not be surprised if they use condoms dipped in poison and oh well this conversation is getting out of hand, I should probably shut up.

Salt

The condoms are actually sentient man-eating condoms, as is Praesi tradition.

Earl of Purple

I doubt anyone, Praesi or not, would willingly wear something described as a 'man-eating condom'. Sentient ones, maybe, though it depends how smart. Think about it too hard, and it is either bestiality or a threesome.

dadycool

Maybe she should get these two and two more royals to get a band of five in her bed. Maybe even a "three crowns and one" scenario.

TeK

You mean seven and one, surely.

caoimhinh

-And so, the Black Queen screwed seven royals and one.

-Like, beating them in the field or having sex with them?

-Yes.

dadycoool

Well, I wouldn't say no to that, but you'd have trouble finding eight royals she'd screw. Four was pushing it, and the two others I was thinking of were, and don't hate me for this, but Rozala and DK. Hear me out: The three Proceran royals she has any respect for each put a crown on one of the four bedposts, with the Dead Crown on the fourth, binding all four of them to her authority by willingly submitting themselves to her. I know it's a stretch, to the point of absurdity, but it was only a passing fancy. I was also taking liberties with what we understand about "Significant number" and "Other significant number", but if Cat can make two Angelic Choirs submit to her through sheer force of will, as well as orchestrate everything that happened in Iserre, then her saying to Cordelia, Freddy, Rozala, and DK "Hey, you want some fuk?" and getting them to put down their crowns and be bottoms to her isn't so impossible. IMO, at least.

laguz24

The quote is something every d&d rogue should live by, that and apply common sense when doing so.

TeK

>apply common sense
In my DnD campaign? Heresy.

Salt

The most common D&D personality is being oblivious to obvious plot hooks, in favor of murder hoboing in the direction of whatever appears to hold the juiciest loot.

Kleptomania with all the subtlety of a rampaging elephant is a given, while anyone stealing from you is treated with the same degree of animosity as a BBEG that literally eats babies.

TeK

I remember one time one of our players decided to participate in a orgy for the dark gods with some lepers, so... he caught leprosy, but the magic kind. To cure him, we had to castrate him with a hot iron bar.

Good times.

Salt

It says something about D&D players that I'm genuinely unsure if a flaming castration would stop one from a repeat attempt at participating in a ritual leper orgy. For all I know, a player that'd do that in the first place would make it his life's mission to obtain a... prosthetic.

Tek

It was not to stop him from repeating, it was to cure his STD. Also the orgy sadly wasn't a one night stand, so repeated participation wasn't in the cards... And even if it was, he (and me) were the only ones who went to it. I just watched, which is why I avoided the worst. DM had enough of his antics, so that was his punishment. Castration with half a chance of success or death. It says something that demonic orgy with lepers wasn't the worst thing he did that day. Still, that magical ability was worth all the necrophilia.

Also you guessed exactly what he tried to do next. A sentient fungal prosthetic to be correct.

Salt

I find it interesting that the whisper of Catherine's Name came at the exact moment of mutual acknowledgement between her and Cordelia as rivals to each other. The fact that their similarity/rivalry was so heavily established this chapter, and the fact that it was blatantly said out just before the whisper of her Name came back, has me thinking this is some pretty blatant foreshadowing. Anyone want to take guesses on exactly what it'd be?

Probably not the Black Queen as is – it was given up once already which takes away from its weight, and the fact that it was just a whisper of a mirror rather than coming into full force means that it isn't likely a direct mirror as far as straight up being a ruler goes.

Also likely not something too martially inclined either. Doesn't necessarily have to be subtle – she wasn't always the best at that anyway – but she metaphorically and literally gave up the sword when she took up that twilight walking stick of hers instead of the Good King's sword. Her characterization has been pushing too hard away from a combat oriented Role to go back on it now – she's more the type to wield those Named than to be one of them nowadays.

I'm going to say something not dissimilar to Cordelia's old Warden of the West. Probably something inclined more towards issues of Named vs mundane rather than a specific region of rule as Hasenbach would've been, and probably with an aspect well suited to keeping the peace/creating peace/destroying things that threaten the peace. Has to be something to do with Peace, either in Name or Role, considering that's been arguably the primary focus of her entire life. After all, the Tyrant viewed her with Wish and found it hilarious that a massive heroic hard-on for Peace was the most fervent wish of one of Below's greatest champions.

I'm going to guess that she gets it either during the course of the trial or an consequential event stemming from it – probably right when something is on the brink of really fucking up the foundation for the Accords. Most likely with a first Aspect that lets her pull yet another miraculous victory out of thin air and preserve them.

Salt

I did not mean for this to be a reply to another comment... whoops. This site is easy to fuck up navigating on a phone I guess...

dadycoool

Advocate? Magistrate? Actual Intercessor, which is currently simply something DK calls WB? I'm pretty sure I heard someone say "Warden" or "Warden of the Dead" a long time ago.

Salt

Advocate actually sounds rather plausible. It isn't a direct rival/successor to the Intercessor, which we know it won't be since Cat caught out the Bard in attempting to do that during their most recent run-in. It would also be diametrically opposed to the Intercessor though, since Intercessor is typically a mediator/negotiator in meaning while Advocate is instead someone pushing for a specific position. Not to mention, she's already the advocate for Villains under the Accords, the advocate for the Empire Ever Dark in negotiations on behalf of the Sisters, and the advocate for Named concerns where Cordelia and Vivienne are advocates for the mundane ones.

It makes sense if the Intercessor is by nature one that negotiates on behalf of Above/Below to keep people in the game rather than pushing for any specific Victor – which fits how she failed to handle Anaxares, how she did handle Amadeus, and how she was able to deal with Sve Noc before they were Sve Noc – who weren't Named but were people of significant weight looking to make a deal with Below.

Cat would avoid becoming an accidental successor but still work against her if she was to be instead advocating for people to avoid playing the game that the Bard is negotiating for in the first place, which is exactly what she did recently with the Sisters when she got them on her side, and what she's temporarily accomplished with the Truce and Terms.

caoimhinh

The Guide.

And one of her Aspects will be Regulate.

That has been on my mind ever since I read her first conversation with the Grey Pilgrim back in Book 4 Chapter 8: Dialogue.

"My teacher dedicated his entire life to breaking this game, but that's a reflection of his flaw – he can't conceive a world where he doesn't win. I'm willing to settle for the lesser prize. What I can't break, I would regulate."

Considering how the contents of this conversation haunted Catherine all the way through Book 4 and up to Book 5, it's a pretty important and influential conversation. Plus, it is a pivot, since it's the first time Catherine sat with a Hero and set rules of engagement.

This also reflects nicely with how back when she was Squire it was said that the things she didn't like of Creation she would break, which became one of her renovated Aspects later on, Break.

MrMaturity

And I like how that would fit with the title of the series, It really is about a practical Guide to evil...

Salt

Man I have zero idea how accurate that will be, but I really like the sound of that.

Has the current more mature touch that Catherine tends to lean toward too. Not some uncompromising victory that ensures equal retaliation a decade down the line, but a softer regulation that makes everyone equally unhappy – but acceptably so – and prevents the worst of damages. Very in-theme with her recent character development.

Necarion

"The Practical Guide" seems like the most fitting name you could give her. I don't think she would be a guide to evil, just to sensibility and people working together.

Salt

Eh, I feel like she falls pretty solidly into the category of "Necessary Evil" at this point. More of the Below version of the Pilgrim as far as moralizing goes, doing pretty evil things because the alternative just sucks that much more – only she gets her wisdom through shit tons of mistakes and shit tons of corpses to go with, rather than a bunch of semi-omniscient angels on her shoulder.

Evil isn't something that's mutually exclusive with a degree of sensibility, the same way Good isn't mutually exclusive with restraint, and I wouldn't take either sensibility or restraint as proof that a character is overall Good or Evil, there's other considerations to be had.

Not saying I'm not rooting for her; but I'm not convinced that the same ruler who is by her own admission regularly perverting justice and fairness in every meaningful sense of the word for the sake of Necessity, is neutral instead of a Necessary Evil.

hakureireimu

I have been predicting Arch Villain since Princes' Graveyard, as it's generic enough to encompass everything she's can be doing.

Sir Nil

Glad to see they are taking the political threat of the Mirror Knight seriously.

Javvies

Yeah.

Frederic declining to push for Red Axe's punishment is a problem. Hell, damned near everything to do with Red Axe is a problem. Falling back on the "she lied about accepting the Truce and Terms" argument thus "she isn't entitled to any protections under the Truce and Terms" might end up being the only way out.

Mirror Knight is gonna be a huge problem. He's not going to want to accept that the artifact sword Severance isn't his to keep.

TeK

"Uhm, king Arthur, that sword you pulled? From the rock? Well you see, the rock was on the John's farm, so technically the sword should legally also belong to him, so he should be the one who is made king. So please, give up your crown, I hope you are not upset, good luck next time!"

Salt

Yeah, saying he'll be upset about anyone trying to take it away is an understatement. The Bard mentioned that "He'll take up the sword because it fixes all he despises about himself." back during her little face off with Catherine.

Taking the sword away from him right when he finally found something to make up for being "too slow, too weak, too stupid, again", as Christophe himself put so succinctly, is going to be a possible disaster. I'm not sure Cat or Cordelia have any conception of how much it matters to the kid, considering they haven't had the reader privilege of peering into his head.

The best hope of salvaging this from becoming some sort of unbelievable clusterfuck is Hanno, who has such an ability to empathize that he might read this from chatting with him.

Unfortunately, Hanno is also (possibly) going to be an authority figure that Christophe is rebelling against, which is just the worst possible coincidence. It actually reeks of a danger of Christophe rebelling at the last moment, if they're not VERY careful in handling him. Please tread lightly, Cordelia, even by your usual standards. Might want to frame it as a need to make it some sort of shared tool for the purpose of doing Good, rather than even letting him dwell on the idea of mundane authority figures taking it away from him.

TeK

I wish I could be angry on him for seeking external solutions to his internal problems, but I have this exact same flaw, so I guess, you who without sin cast the first stone.

Salt

It's one of the most common human traits, honestly. External crutches are relied on insanely often in all manner of things, sometimes justifiably and sometimes not.

If I was Christophe of Pavanie, and I genuinely believed that I was losing my one shot at fixing all my most hated flaws, at a time where those flaws were literally and routinely causing me to fail my comrades-in-arms? That my own weakness and stupidity was causing the death of people I wanted to protect, and that this magic sword was the solution to all those issues? I'd likely fight tooth and nail to keep it too. Dear lord it's not an easy thing to get through your head at that age that these things need time and effort, and that no magic sword will really cut it, pun fully intended.

Unfortunately the Mirror Knight comes off just SO BADLY in communication that there's quite a good chance his reluctance will be interpreted as typical Proceran arrogance and entitlement, rather than an insecure kid with good intentions, somewhat desperately clinging to what he considers a long sought-after solution to irredeemable flaws about himself.

Kind of a problem, when this political situation has the potential to blow up in everyone's faces even when handled with the most delicate of touches.

maximillian999

MK's story time this point really feels like that of a paladin or Jedi who is heading straight over the cliff and about to Fall.

TeK

From my point of view, I have the highground!

Rogos

The problem is, if you're careful with him, Christophe will take it as a sign that YES he IS important and YES he CAN make demands, otherwise people wouldn't try to handle him so cautiously. But at the same time if you're not careful and you try to cow him with superior authority, he'll also lash out. Damned if you do, damned if you don't, like with Archer's words ("If you're being nice to him, it's probably a plot. If you're being mean to him, it's probably a plot. If you're not being anything to him, it's probably a plot.").

Hanno won't have exactly the same problem but from Christophe's POV it could be something like that : "He is being nice to me : he is afraid of what I can do and is trying to placate me with nice words. He is being mean to me : he is afraid and is trying to frighten me in turn. He is not being anything to me : he is afraid and trying not to show it so I'll think he doesn't fear me."

Cat must be growing tired of all these balancing acts...

Curse you, Bard !

agumentic

Now that was a beautiful conversation. I really hope we see more interaction between Cordelia and Cat, perhaps even from Cordelia's perspective. It's just do great, in every way.

Also, it looks like Cat really does like her Name and wouldn't mind at all getting it.

dadycool

I think her time as Winter Queen gave her more appreciation for being able to not be completely chained by Stories, so she was probably reluctant for a long time to put shackles back on her wrists, even if the chains weren't attached to anything, allowing her to use them as weapons. Of course, with the shackles comes other gear, the familiar weight of which she has definitely missed.

Salt

It was mentioned by Catherine and several others that Names tend to severely emphasize both your strengths and weaknesses.

I'm wondering if that means Catherine might start hitting as hard as the Dead King and the Intercessor scheme-wise, at the cost of losing a lot of raw physical ability and quite possibly companions, in the process. As in her limp becoming a crippling disadvantage in a fight and more of the Woe getting taken out of action, but no longer needing to engage in so many acrobatics because she's just THAT good at winning the battle before it's even fought.

Literally leaning into the old trope of characters with physical disabilities being insane badasses in other ways to make up for it.

dadycool

Yeah, that checks out. And it's been a long time since we've actually seen the Woe fight, apart from the Arsenal Siege. Masego is being a scholar far more than the Powerhouse he once was, Vivienne has been Acting Queen since the Woe first split, Hakram has always been a glorified clerk, but the recent battle was the first fight he's been in in a while, Archer kinda can't be anything other than a sniper, but she's been a scout/recruiter recently, and like you say, Cat's limp has been a hindrance since her reappearance as First Under the Night. I'm now reminded of how much she enjoyed being DE Traitorous for an evening in Iserre. Also, if the leader reflects the group they lead, which I can't say it doesn't, then this could take the Woe in an interesting direction that I can't foresee.

Ben Serreau-Raskin

Some real crunchy politicking, always a treat. Also a hint of the nature of Cat's new name. It's making itself known while she's doing backroom deals and real politik diplomacy, Whatever specific verbiage she ends up with, its going to be attached to a rulership role, one built on schemes and hard choices.

Wonder

But Catherine wants a Name that can bolster the lack of Firepower of Night.

Perhaps a Warrior Queen's Name would be perfect for her more than a pure diplomatic Name.

Salt

To be fair, in this setting genre-savvyness and power are often the same thing anyway. The Night is effective more because of the weight it has as a power bequeathed by a minor deity and her strong ties to said deity, as much as its ability to cause physical harm.

Back when she was the Squire, all the mundane firepower in the world ended in the Lone Swordsman quite literally beheading her, while pretending to pull a sword from a stone had her returning the favor as well as forcing Contrition to resurrect her.

If she gets something with zero direct firepower but gives her the ability to more directly influence the narrative, she might be at her most "powerful" yet.

Eleron Pfoutz

The Temperate Queen.

'Ladi Williams

I sincerely believe having EE as an opposing diplomat during negotiations would be a scary thing to behold.

Burlyraven

So Cat's story is seemingly pushing for her Name to be of the Trickster Priestess variety that typically evolves into a somewhat neutral Old Power in later years, even outside of Bards influence. The fact that her Name would still be represented by a beast in such a situation is actually kind of interesting, as her beast was of the behemoth breed, not a slinking panther or wily fox.

It's also somewhat concerning as far as the Catfish ship goes, because if she's meant to remain a predatory beast in nature, that can be interpreted as direct opposition to possibly a second of Kingfisher's aspects, if one counts her trickster side as snake-like.

Burlyraven

And I'm really unsure of what to make of her nascent Name reacting to that specific comment.

dadycool

Interesting thing about couples being opposing, it can either go really good or really bad. After all, it depends on compatibility rather than being very alike. See Indrani and Masego.

Juff

Typo Thread:

thing Named > thing with Named house, there'd > house; there'd agreement," Cordelia > agreement." Cordelia symbol to hero > symbol to a hero if simply > if he simply spectacularly bad reputation > a spectacularly bad reputation for long moment > for a long moment nights," I half-smiled, "when > nights"—I half-smiled—"when

Nairne .01

Many thanks for this delight.

Daniel E

I wonder how her Name will be react with her powers as First Under Night. Is she planning to remain High Priestess after the war? Perhaps Sve Noc will make that sliver of God-power permanent as a parting gift.

Salt

I feel like they could probably keep their partnership going even after the war, unless there's a specific reason not to. It's very mutually beneficial for the both of them.

On the Sisters side, Catherine is a fully-trusted second opinion on their decisions. A trusted anything is ridiculously difficult to come by for entities of their stature, and I doubt that a minor god as greedy as they are would be willing to let go of such a prize without very good reason. Even during peacetime, the availability of a herald/envoy/diplomat to the rest of the burning lands that has no culture barrier and all the influence that a living legend provides is convenient to the extreme.

On Catherine's end, she has a very vested interest in making sure the Drow largely prosper and don't make any major mistakes while rebuilding their civilization. They're her cork in the awful that is the Dead King, and a big boon in maintaining a balance of power for the Accords. Having the backing of an empire full of things that go bump in the night is convenient as well, as an annoyance repellent. Many ambitious nobles and baby Named will think twice about provoking you when you're the high priest of a fanatically religious race, and have the active patronage of the unfathomable eldritch-horror-things that said race worships.

onedollargum

"Yet I cannot allow attempted regicide on Proceran soil without having it face Proceran justice."

Aren't they literally on another plane of existence? I thought the Arsenal was carved out of an Arcadian mountain and built on a demiplane. Seems like that would be enough to soften the ability to apply Proceran law to it.

thearpox23

I just chalked it up to the First Prince being frustrated and Cat missing the slip-up, since Arsenal is explicitly not Proceran ground as specified by treaties, and the Mirror Knight has already been mocked for forgetting that. Or a mistake by Erra, but either way, should probably be edited.

That said, it doesn't really matter for Hasenbach as far as the future riots are concerned. Angry McSmasher isn't going to care for the fine print. (Still find it weird a jurisdiction technicality is described to necessarily have such far-reaching effects, but whatever, Erra made his ruling. Last time I felt this way about Guide politics was when Erra was treating solid metal currency like modern day paper money.)

Earl of Purple

I thought it might have fallen into tricky ground, regarding territory. Since all the known entrances are on Proceran soil. Plus the victim and criminal are both citizens of Procer, I think.

thearpox23

There is no maybe about it. I'm not going fishing for a quote, but the Arsenal not being on Proceran soil was something explicitly stated previously. As far as the victim and criminal's identity, they weren't what Cordelia mentioned. Could work as an editing fix though.

Salt

That's an easy one, I got u

> "You are on Proceran land," the Mirror Knight said through gritted teeth.

>"Do tell the First Prince that, preferably when I'm in the room," I drily replied. "I've never seen her blush in utter embarrassment before."

>The Arsenal was not in Creation and had been made explicitly beyond Proceran rule by multiple treaties besides. Actual laws here were a complicated issue, with nations being responsible for the people they provided and Named themselves falling largely under the Terms.

Cordelia in-character would know this and avoid even saying something that could be interpreted as considering the Arsenal legally Proceran land. I was chalking it up to EE being human and making a typo.

Regardless it doesn't change outcomes, since Procer would technically have a claim to jurisdiction as the kingfisher prince is both Named and Proceran royalty, likely with the two statuses being separate legal entities. This would mean he falls under the both categories of "people that the individual nation is responsible for" AND "Named that the Terms are responsible for"

I'm actually a bit surprised as well that a legal agreement between three major countries operating on neutral ground wouldn't have language for order of precedent in cases of overlapping jurisdiction, but not enough to be severely bothered in terms of suspension of disbelief since it would be a contentious topic to start and there wasn't much time for deliberation with a crisis around the corner. Could easily see that kind of thing getting shelved for another time and said 'another time' never coming to pass.

Earl of Purple

Would also require a situation in which somebody took a swing at someone important. The Truce and Terms were supposed to stop that kind of thing, and if it occurred everyone would be covered by it- or national law. Frederic is literally the only person who has a Name and a status separate from that Name, because Procer doesn't have Named rulers- at least, not traditionally. If someone tried to kill Named Callowan royalty, Cat would use the Truce and Terms to prove they work. If someone tried to kill Named Levantine royalty, chances are it was an honour duel, in which case it was likely an accident.

TeK

They also could have squabbled about the order for two years. Such things take years even if it isn't on the international level.

mavant

I haven't noticed any quantitative easing in the narrative...

mavant

Although I will grant that Cordelia seems to have recently invented tranch collateralized debt obligations, which is rather modern.

thearpox23

Book 4, chapter 1:

““So long as nearly half the coinage in Callow is from the Imperial Mint, the Tower can break the realm's coffers at will,” Ratface said. “All the Empress needs to do is devalue her currency and the south goes up in flames. It's a knife at our throat, Catherine. I understand the Hellhound is riding you about funding for the army, but another thousand men will make no difference if we can't pay those soldiers.”

“Our own coin is slowly displacing the others,” Baroness Kendall pointed out. “Patience might be the wisest answer.”

The Taghreb shook his head.

“We're replacing old Callowan coinages,” he said. “We barely touched the Wasteland portion. The Carrion Lord spent decades making certain Callow was dependent on Imperial coin for trade, it is not work that can be undone in a few years' span. Not unless we plan and invest.”

“There has to be an alternative to just taking the Empress' gold off the streets by emptying our coffers, Ratface,” I said. “That'd be as good as raising a banner in her eyes. There would be immediate retaliation.””

Here you go. One of the weirdest passages in the entire series, where I had to question if Erra even knows what a metal based currency even is. And the most frustrating things about it is that the mistakes can't even be explained succinctly, there are just so many things to unpack here.

mavant

Yeah, that certainly makes more sense in a world where the face value is more than the cost of production. And more still when it has an enforced exchange rate to some stabler asset.

I suppose we could recover a bit by saying Wasteland currency is enchanted in some way to be difficult to counterfeit, and therefore the face value is greater than the weight of the gold alone, and can perhaps be redeemed at the Tower Treasury for a more massive ingot. Then Malicia has a couple of plausible levers for devaluing Wastelandbucks.

If only the wasteland were an island, we could hypothesize that it's like the CNH/CNY distinction.

thearpox23

"and can perhaps be redeemed at the Tower Treasury for a more massive ingot"

Name me a single example in history where that was a thing before the governments started trying to replace metal with paper.

If the face value is significantly greater than the value of gold, it becomes a legitimate way to make money for Praes to literally start buying up the other currencies for their gold and remelting then into Wasteland coinage. Your attempt to explain that nonsense was basically just a different way of saying that Wasteland is already using a paper currency, except replace 'paper' with 'enchantment'. So I guess you could cause deflation if you were a mage by running around and casting 'dispel magic' on random businesses, pardon my sense of humor.

But even taking that aside, the effectiveness of any currency manipulation by Malicia would hit the Wasteland first and take months before it'd filter to Callow through merchants. AND EVEN THEN, it'd just be the Wasteland luxury goods increasing in prices, something of an issue for Catherine sure, but why'd the South go down in flames because of that?

Again, there isn't a single thing wrong here. Any direction you try to look at it from, you'll find something doesn't add up.

M0och123

Ahhh yes...

I believe that we have found one of the tricky undercurrents in this river of story through which we wade. Not the deepest. Nor the quickest. But dangerous and deadly nonetheless.

And the serpent we thought dead is waiting beneath the murky water. Staring at our treading feet and watching for the moment we misstep.

And all along our eyes are drawn from the creature up ahead and towards the treacherous waters in which we move.

Satan

Tl;dr:

Cat will have to wait until after she really abdicates to enter the bone-zone with Cordelia.

Interlude: Paragons

"To offer forgiveness to the unrepentant is as the sheep embracing the wolf."

– Hektor the Ecclesiast, Atalante preacher

Hanno had underestimated the depth of the troubles in the Arsenal.

It had already been an unpleasant surprise for providence to have failed him, not offering even the slightest of nudges otherwise when he'd decided to wait a few days before heading towards the Arsenal, but now it seemed that initial mistake had allowed several streaks of unpleasantness to take root. That Catherine would be as a scalded cat was only to be expected, given that she'd pitted her wits against the Wandering Bard and there was no victory to be had without a cost there. That could be worked around until it passed, which he trusted it would. That there would be distrust and discontent boiling up within the heroes as was not something he'd foreseen, at least not to such a grave extent. That Christophe de Pavanie's name never seemed to be far behind whenever a spot of discord was there to be found was even more unfortunate.

It had become the White Knight's habit to arrange for a great talk with all the heroes of a region whenever his travels allowed, so that they might vent their grievances before they could grow into formal complaints and frictions of character could be caught before they escalated, and it was without hesitation he followed the habit after coming to the Arsenal. There were nine heroes within these walls who bore Names, and most made good time when he sent for them. Still, extracting themselves from their occupations took longer for some than others. Hanno was not displeased by that, as them coming with waves allowed him to take a look at the currents binding them to one another. Roland, for example, came with the Vagrant Spear and the Forlorn Paladin.

The latter two of those three had spent more than a year as part of the Archer's band, while the Rogue Sorcerer was perhaps the hero who best got along with the Woe in particular and villains as a whole. There were some who called him soft on Below because of that, though his distinguished record had ensured it was just idle talk. That the Dominion heroine would keep company with Roland and the Forlorn Paladin was interesting, however. If she had felt uncomfortable under the Archer, starved of respectable company or mistreated, she would not have chosen those particular companions. As for the Forlorn Paladin himself, though he remained improbably cheerful despite his Name it was clear that he felt lost and that the Vagrant Spear was serving as an anchor. Hanno sympathized.

He had more memories than any man alive, and their loss was something he dreaded like little else.

The White Knight spoke with the first three heroes to arrive, little more than small talk about what they'd seen and done since their last parting, but before long others began to wander in. Though the Kingfisher Prince was not someone Hanno had ever met in person before, the Prince of Brus was hard to mistake for another – between the fanciful Alamans clothing and the elaborate hair ribbons, there was simply no other hero he could be mistaken for. The man had a reputation for charm that must have been true at least in part, for the often-taciturn Bitter Blacksmith was laughing as some unheard jest as he gallantly opened the door for her.

Though Hanno did not particularly consider himself the host of this gathering – he had not fetched the refreshments himself, or done anything at all save requesting the help of messengers and attendants – he still welcomed the pair into the room, returning the Prince of Brus' firm arm clasp and congratulating Helmgard for her impressive work on the sword he was not learning had been named the Severance. A shame. He'd been rather partial to the 'Severity', himself. It seemed a truer homage to the woman it had been forged from. There was hardly a ripple as the two Named joined the others, cordial smiles being offered up by those whose character so inclined them.

The Mirror Knight arrived rather late, considering that Christophe had been eager for a meeting like this one when they'd last spoken, but it was easy to see why. When the dark-haired hero arrived, it was with the Blessed Artificer and the Blade of Mercy at his side. He must have wanted the three of them to come together and so waited, though Hanno found that the Mirror Knight looked rather jittery underneath his attempt so seem calm. The White Knight almost frowned when he saw how uncomfortable young Antoine was, avoiding looking at the end of the table where Roland and the two heroines he'd come in with sat. Not, not Roland, Hanno decided. It was Sidonia in particular the younger man was avoiding looking at.

The Vagrant Spear did not gaze in their direction at all, as if noticing them was beneath her.

The Blessed Artificer strode forward with little apparent awareness of her companions' discomfort, offering Hanno himself a nod before settling in the chair by the Bitter Blacksmith's side. The two began to talk animatedly, and Christophe look almost miffed before he came to make his greetings. The White Knight took the time to speak with young Antoine for a bit, but the Blade of Mercy remained stiff and tight-lipped. Twice, in mere idle conversation, he redirected a casual question of Hanno's to the Mirror Knight. The Ashuran filed that away, refraining from making assumptions but equally disinclined to simply ignore an oddity.

The Blind Maker was the last to arrive, the older man having been in the middle of delicate work when the messenger came and so unable to extract himself easily. He apologized, but no one felt slighted and so the matter was waved away. Hanno caught himself looking at the door, as if still waiting, and felt a pang of grief when he understood why. Nephele would not be coming, for she was dead. She'd perished in the fight against a demon, mere days ago, and so Hanno would never see his friend again. Hear her laugh, enjoy the sight of how she had come to thrive in the very place she had died defending. The dark-skinned man did not shy away from the grief, instead leaning into it. Let it pass through him.

The White Knight could not change what had been done, but he could keep Nephele alive within himself. Hanno's mother had been fond of a verse from her homeland, one that claimed all were born to two deaths: one in the flesh, one in the memories of those left behind. It was not in the Ashuran knight's ability to unmake the end of flesh, but in memory at least he could honour the woman who had been the Repentant Magister. Yet there was a time for grief and a time for the present, and now Hanno was called upon by the latter to set aside the former. He did so.

"I see were all here," the White Knight said, standing at the head of the table. "I am not unaware that there are many demands on your time, and so I thank you for indulging my request."

"We were long overdue a council of the Chosen, anyhow," the Blessed Artificer said.

Adanna of Smyrna had spoken with characteristic bluntness and so Hanno knew better than to take offence, though that did not stop some from eyeing her with irritation. Or dislike. Heroes were not above the vagaries of human interaction in the slightest. They were, if anything, more prone to falling into them. A consequence of strong personalities, Hanno had often thought, which were those that tended to come into Names to begin with.

"A council over what?" the Forlorn Paladin asked. "The messenger never said."

From the corners of his eye, Hanno saw that the Kingfisher Prince was carefully studying the heroes in the room. Looking, the White Knight suspected, for the invisible web of alliances and enmities that Alamans considered to be the foundation of all society. This one was a hero, the White Knight thought, but a prince as well. It would not do to forget that. The blue-eyed Prince of Brus caught Hanno's own watchful eye, and with a quirk of the lips offered a wink.

"This is to discuss the fate of the Red Axe, obviously," the Mirror Knight said.

"What is there to discuss, exactly?" the Rogue Sorcerer flatly asked.

"These talks are meant to allow you all to air grievances and worries," Hanno cut in as he sat down, voice serene. "If such worries concern the matter of the Red Axe, you are of course free to voice them."

"There's grievances enough for twenty to be aired," the Blessed Artificer said. "Most of them about the Black Queen's atrocious behaviour."

Hanno cocked his head to the side.

"The reports I received must have been incomplete, then," he said. "For I have read them and found little to fault her with."

That made a stir, though not a large one. He'd hardly said anything incendiary, besides. If Catherine had genuinely been at fault, it would have been his duty to act on it. If he had not, the reason why ought to be self-evident.

"This is ridiculous," Roland said. "We heroes in our little hidden room, discussing the Black Queen like we're some sort of secret cabal. If it came out, we'd be a laughingstock – or worse."

"You worry too much of how things might look, Rogue Sorcerer," the Mirror Knight said, contempt clear in his voice.

"You don't worry enough, Christophe," the Bitter Blacksmith sneered. "I don't care if she stepped on your toes, she's also sent troops to fight up in Twilight's Pass. You don't get to fuck that just because no one bothered to beat humility into you as a child."

The Mirror Knight looked not only surprised by Helmgard's words, but almost hurt. They were friends, the White Knight distantly recalled. But right now the Bitter Blacksmith was just seeing yet another Alamans posturing while her people died in droves, and that pulled on an older and deeper loyalty that anything friendship might earn of her.

"I choose not to believe that expecting civility of each other is being too ambitious," Hanno calmly said.

The Blacksmith looked away, but not without embarrassment first painting itself across her face. Christophe looked pleased and almost vindicated, though, which had not been Hanno's intent at all. It worried him that the other man seemed convinced that there were sides to take instead of disagreements to be had. The difference might slight, at first, but the longer the path was the starker the difference would grow.

"Impugning each other's character is no more civil than insults," the White Knight plainly said. "I will add, however, that expecting Catherine Foundling to withdraw the aid she has offered because her actions are being questioned is not a defence of her. It is, in fact, the contrary."

The Kingfisher Prince cleared his throat.

"Considering grievances have been mentioned, I am curious to hear them," Prince Frederic Goethal said. "I was part of the defence myself, after all."

"You failed to hide the Red Axe from mere guards, then were laid down by your own ward," the Blessed Artificer said. "Hardly a participation."

Every single Alamans at the table looked appalled at her words, Hanno noted, though not necessarily because they disagreed with them. The Prince of Brus had an impressive martial reputation in the north, but he'd worked with few other Named and his showing during the assault on the Arsenal had been lackluster by some ways of looking at it. Hanno's esteem of the man had raised at his restraint when faced with bare swords and threats, but even on the side of Above there were some who measured success largely through body counts.

"Adanna, you're being insulting," the Bitter Blacksmith told her. The golden-eyed artificer looked surprised.

"I meant no insult," she assured the prince. "Only that-"

Mercifully, Helmgard elbowed her before she could launch into an explanation that Hanno suspected would offer several additional insults. The dark-skinned man actually sympathized with Adanna a great deal, since he understood exactly where her occasional maladroitness came from: it was rather typical of Ashurans in general and citizens from higher tiers in particular. High Tyrian was a highly blunt language, compared to some on the continent, and most Ashurans who learned a second tongue had to unlearn habits that made them come across as very rude. Those born to higher tiers were also raised into believing that criticism of lower tiers was a civic duty, which could combine in unfortunate ways with other Ashuran customs. Captains, traders and diplomats were naturally taught how to avoid those pitfalls, but the Blessed Artificer was unlikely to have rubbed elbows with any of these in Smyrna – she would have moved in different, higher circles.

"No offence was taken," the Kingfisher Prince said, and it he was lying he hid it well. "Yet my question stands."

"I am curious as well," the White Knight said. "Though I want it to be clear that you are all free to speak, and I will not take you words as a formal complaint under the Terms unless you explicitly state otherwise."

"I was threatened with execution," the Blessed Artificer said.

The Rogue Sorcerer laughed, and not kindly.

"Tell them why," Roland said.

"It hardly matters," Adanna said. "The threat is the reason of my complaint."

"She nosed about an Arsenal project the Grand Alliance is going out of its way to keep secret, and then tried to bully the Black Queen into speaking about it in front of what turned out to be at least two traitors," Roland his aggressively even tone making it clear what he thought of the entire affair. "The specific threat then involved first gaining the approval of the Grand Alliance for your execution by the lawful means, as I recall."

Hanno's brow almost rose. It had been a misjudgement on Adanna's part to believe that the Black Queen would respond to this sort of a pressure, and an even greater misjudgement to resort to this sort of thing against an ally at all. He'd expected better of her.

"I can confirm there are projects under such stark secrecy that exist," the Kingfisher Prince said, "though I am not conversant with their exact nature."

The Blessed Artificer's lips thinned, though she did not argue.

"I have a complaint of my own," the Mirror Knight said.

Eyes moved to him and the dark-haired man smiled thinly.

"About the Rogue Sorcerer, and how he might as well be the mouthpiece of the Black Queen in this room," Christophe continued. "Go where you belong, Sorcerer. Go sit at her side, and let us get on with our duties at last without your help."

Roland's fingers clenched at his face paled in anger. Hanno genuinely could not remember ever seeing the mild-mannered man this furious.

"I do not know you, Alamans," the Blind Maker calmly said, his thick Arlesite accent tinging the words, "but your words fall well short of the chivalry your Choosing boasts of."

"That was ill-said," the Forlorn Paladin agreed, face grown serious.

Some were less courteous in their chiding.

"Fuck you, Christophe," Sidonia hissed. "I've been with the Lady for more than a year now, does that make me traitor too? Who the Hells are you to tell anyone to leave?"

Hanno pulled on his Name the slightest bit, then slapped his hand against the table. The sound was like a thunderclap in the small hall, and it drew shocked silence from all in it.

"Civility," the White Knight reminded them. "Be clearer on the nature of your complaint, Mirror Knight. Are you accusing the Rogue Sorcerer of having fallen from grace and become one of the Damned?"

That would, in fact, be a valid reason to ask for Roland's exclusion from this meeting. In practice it would be difficult to prove either way, but it hardly mattered since Hanno doubted the Mirror Knight would pursue his hasty words to the end. It was a profoundly serious accusation and there would be consequences to using so frivolously. That the Principate had used such methods frequently against heroes of opposing nations was one of the reasons it had such a poor reputation with Named, and for a Proceran hero in particular to be seen using the same means would see him made a pariah among their kind.

"I did not speak those words," Christophe de Pavanie stiffly said.

"Then you should be more careful when you address others," Hanno frankly said. "If you did not mean to make that accusation, then all you did was offer an insult."

The Mirror Knight looked like he'd been slapped, but then he'd offered the same to the Rogue Sorcerer with intent nowhere as kindly meant. He must be made to understand that he should be choosing his words more carefully, not blurting out offences and then apologizing for them.

"Everyone knows the Sorcerer's thick as thieves with the Woe," the Blade of Mercy spoke up. "It's not a crime to say that, is it?"

"No," Hanno serenely replied. "Though neither is it a crime to have a cordial rapport with an ally, Antoine."

In truth, it would be a poison to this alliance if heroes came to believe that being on good terms with villains was a sort of betrayal. Perhaps if bands of five had remained entirely Below's or Above's it could have been borne, but that had not been the case for some time now. The ability to forge a band out of Named of all allegiances was simply too potent a tool in the war against Keter to be easily discarded, and that meant heroes and villains must be able to maintain a degree of respect for each other.

"I have a grievance of my own, as it happens," the Rogue Sorcerer coldly said.

The anger was still in him, the White Knight saw. That boded ill, for Roland was sharper with wits and tongue than many were with steel.

"Why is Christophe of Pavanie still strutting about with the Severance?" Roland asked. "More than half a dozen of us worked on it, and a fortune was spent forging it. The peril has passed, Mirror Knight, so why do you still carry that priceless artefact with you like some ceremonial blade?"

"I am safekeeping it," the Mirror Knight harshly said.

"We've found no one else capable of using it," the Blessed Artificer shrugged. "Where else should it go?"

"It's an artefact meant to kill the Hidden Horror," the Bitter Blacksmith disagreed, "it should be under lock and behind wards, not lugged around."

"It hasn't been observed since it was taken up, has it?" the Blind Maker mused. "It should be, or we will not know how it takes to being used."

"It was taken up in a battle against great foes," the Vagrant Spear said. "And used worthily. It would be a grave dishonour to claim it back now."

The Mirror Knight threw her a look as surprised as it was grateful.

"Hear hear," the Forlorn Paladin said. "It is not a deed to be lightly gainsaid."

"Seven demons were slain with the blade in the Mirror Knight's hand," the Blade of Mercy fervently reminded them. "Seven. What fool would now give it to another, or put it back to rest?"

"I agree that Christophe is most fit to wield the Severance, given its temperament and his own talents," Hanno said. "I have already informed the Black Queen as much."

There was a moment of stillness in the room. Dismay on the Rogue Sorcerer's face, triumph on the Mirror Knight's – or was it relief?

"It must be returned, however," the White Knight continued. "It was taken up during a crisis for laudable reasons, but the crisis has passed. Until it is formally bestowed upon someone, it belongs to the Grand Alliance."

The scene of a moment earlier, reversed. Nothing about this, Hanno thought, ought to be taken personally. Diplomacy was setting the beat to the tune, not lesser and pettier considerations. He knew better than to believe it would not be taken personally regardless.

"The First Prince shares that belief," the Kingfisher Prince said. "I do as well, for that matter. You've fought mostly in Cleves, Mirror Knight, while the sword might be needed elsewhere. That front is the mildest of the three."

Christophe cast the prince an unfriendly glance, then turned to Hanno.

"Is this an order, White Knight?" he challenged.

He wanted, the dark-skinned man sensed, a confrontation. To make this about the two of them. That was disturbing, considering the White Knight had no enmity towards Christophe de Pavanie and had believe the opposite to be just as true.

"No," Hanno said. "I have told you my opinion. It will become an order if the signatory members of the Grand Alliance so decide, likely by vote. I expect the Severance will be assigned in the same manner."

The Vagrant Spear laughed.

"Should have been more careful who you insulted, Christophe," she said. "Even if your First Prince takes a shine to you, that's two out of three who'd rather burn than back you."

"I am sure Her Most Serene Highness will see reason, when properly made aware of the facts," the Mirror Knight said.

There was a certainty to his voice that Hanno would have found admirable were he not certain it was unwarranted. Though the White Knight had not lost the respect he'd found for the First Prince during the defense of Cleves, he'd since tempered it with appropriate caution. He could respect Cordelia Hasenbach without losing sight of the truth that she loved Procer more than she did most anything. It was why she now wanted the Red Axe to stand trial before the Highest Assembly, ignoring the protection promised the heroine by the Terms. The First Prince would not find many allies in this, unless he'd gravely misread Catherine so at the moment she was also highly unlikely to take a chance on championing Christophe de Pavanie.

"The Hasenbach will do what needs to be done," the Bitter Blacksmith bluntly said. "Whether it pleases you or not. That is their way."

There was an undertone of pride to the words, not quite hidden. Christophe looked upset, which led Hanno to suspect he had come into this hall expecting that Helmgard would support him in all things. The Ashuran was not the only one to notice.

"Is it because you've been fuckin Damned that you're so traitorous?" the Blade of Mercy bit out.

There was a beat of silence, the half a dozen people started talking at the same time. Sidonia was loudly laughing instead, Hanno noted, while the Kingfisher Prince was looking rather interested even as he kept his silence. The White Knight struck his palm against the table once more.

"Order," Hanno said. "Antoine, please apologize."

"I think not," the Blade of Mercy coldly said. "What did I say, save the truth?"

"So she took the Hunted Magician to bed," the Blessed Artificer replied, dismissive. "What of it? He's a comely man, and rather skilled in bedplay."

Several of the heroes choked in surprise. Hanno did not share their shock, benefitting from the perspective of a shared homeland. Adanna of Smyrna would likely equate having sex with a villain to a citizen of a higher tier doing the same with one of a lower tier, and so see nothing there to raise an eyebrow over. Considering marriages across tiers were exceedingly rare such affairs were usually purely physical, and the Blessed Artificer would be highly insulted should someone imply her judgement – or that of a friend, which Helmgard was – might be affected by such a thing.

“Is he?” the Vagrant Spear asked, leaning forward eagerly.
“Elaborate.”

The White Knight could not blame the Archer for that behaviour, sadly. She’d been this way since they first met and actually tended to be significantly worse when Rafaella was around for them rile each other up. The Dominion spirit of competition did not exclude revels.

“Adanna?” the Mirror Knight said, sounding horrified.

“I took up with him myself, for a while,” the Blessed Artificer said.

“He thought we didn’t know,” Helmgard grinned. “We kept making appointments at the same time, you should have seen him panic and make those tortured excuses.”

The White Knight cleared his throat.

“How any of us choose to share our beds is not anyone else’s concern,” Hanno said. “And not to be subject to insult. Antoine, apologize.”

For the first time that day, his voice hardened. The younger man froze at the sound, eyes going wide.

“He meant no insult, Helmgard,” the Mirror Knight said, addressing the heroine directly.

The Bitter Blacksmith spat to the side.

“Only a boy needs others to speak for himself,” she said, but curtly nodded.

Hanno caught her eye, raising an eyebrow in question, but she shook her head in denial. If she was satisfied, then he would pursue the matter no further.

“Are there any further grievances?” the White Knight asked.

“The Black Queen should not be a high officer of the Grand Alliance,” the Mirror Knight flatly said.

The entire room went silent, as if breathing in simultaneously.

“That is not a grievance,” Hanno noted.

"She's corrupt," Christophe de Pavanie said. "She made a deal with the Hunted Magician to let him off-"

"The Hunted Magician is to stand trial within the week," the White Knight corrected. "I am to be a member of the tribunal."

"Don't be obtuse," the Mirror Knight insisted, "she alone gets to decide the sentence, and she was arrogant enough to take her bribe while I was in the room. She thinks herself untouchable, White Knight."

"She alone stands as judge over the Damned, by the Terms we all agreed on," the Kingfisher Prince said. "To argue against that is to argue against their very existence."

Which by the way his tone had cooled, was not a stance that would endear anyone to the prince.

"What meaning is there in the Terms, if the one enforcing them on villains abuses her office?" the Mirror Knight said. "We've offered amnesty to a parade of rapists and murderers but the Damned holding their leash is just as corrupt. Is it any wonder that the likes of the Red Axe strike against us?"

Christophe de Pavanie rose to his feet, animated and angry. The emotion did him no favours with some at the table, but it caught the attention of others. There had been doubts about the Terms from the beginning, after all, and two of the heroes who'd most stringently argued against their current form were in this hall – both Adanna and Christophe had been deeply opposed to the principle of villains policing themselves through the Black Queen. Enough that they'd threatened to walk, though it'd been an empty threat. It had been a point of principle back then, however. It'd since grown into a genuine belief for the Mirror Knight, it was plain to Hanno's eyes.

"We are losing the mandate of the Heavens," the Mirror Knight warned. "Every time we care more about the letter of a treaty than doing good, we lose ourselves a little more. That is Below's subtlest scheme: to make us embrace one evil in seeking the destruction of another."

Hanno had heard many people claim they understood the designs of the Heavens, over the years, and what their mandate for their children was. It was unfortunate that no degree of certainty seemed to prevent them from error, or mutual exclusivity in their claims. His attention, beyond the words being spoken, was on the heroes in the room. Some were skeptical, the White Knight thought as he studied the Named, but others were visibly in agreement. The Blade of Mercy, the Blessed Artificer. Reluctantly, the Bitter Blacksmith. Given the deep enmity she had with her brother, Hanno suspected that her leanings there were personally driven. She must be troubled by the thought that the reason she'd refrained from fighting her brother to the death, the Terms, might have been some trick of the Gods Below.

"Horseshit," the Vagrant Spear said. "The Red Axe killed the Wicked Enchanter. He was an animal of the worst kind, but what does that change? She gave her word. We all did. And now you're trying to wriggle out of it, like a worm on the hook."

"She got Nephele killed," Christophe de Pavanie hissed.

"No," the Blade of Mercy burst out.

Astonished, the Mirror Knight turned towards the younger man.

"I was there, it wasn't like that," Antoine insisted. "She lost soldiers, too, and it was the Hierophant who caught the demon. Not her, not us, him."

"Hierophant hasn't enough interest in people to get them killed on purpose," the Bitter Blacksmith grunted. "And he liked Nephele, I remember."

"Praesi hide their intentions skillfully," Adanna said.

She then withered under Helmgard's skeptical gaze.

"It is perhaps unlikely," she conceded. "And though she is a vicious brute, I'll admit I have some doubts the Black Queen would have attempted to arrange the death of an ally in the middle of a fight with a demon. She is a practical sort of monster, and more careful with her life than her cavalier manners would make you believe."

On the account of the pragmatism and cavalier manners, Hanno tended to agree. Catherine was also savagely protective of those she considered in her care, whether they were objectively deserving of that protection or not, so that she might have arranged for Nephele to die was... improbable. Not impossible, of course, and he was willing to hear out Christophe, but he was more inclined to believe in a misunderstanding than a conspiracy.

"What leads you to believe that the Repentant Magister was the victim of a plot?" the White Knight asked.

The Mirror Knight blinked, biting his lip.

"A library was burned, and in it there were two false Revenants who attacked us as we tried to rescue the Doddering Sage," he said. "It must have been the Black Queen and one of her servants, who else could it have been?"

"Even if you were right, how would that lead to scheming Nephele's murder?" the Rogue Sorcerer asked.

"She lied to us," Christophe said. "Do you not see?"

The Blind Maker cleared his throat. The Mirror Knight's face tightened with anger.

"And now you mock me, just as she did," he said. "Does no one else understand what she's doing to us even now?"

Hanno chose his words carefully, but perhaps too slowly. He was not the first to answer.

"So here we are," the Rogue Sorcerer quietly said. "The truth comes out at last. Nephele died and your pride was hurt, so now you're throwing a tantrum painted over with righteous speech. The part that disgusts me most, Knight, is that you are pretending you actually knew her. The way us here at the Arsenal did, we who shared years with her. You swagger around arrogating the loss of others, as if it makes you important and worth listening to."

Roland cast a look of icy contempt at the other hero.

"All it makes you is the most despicable sort of braggart," the Rogue Sorcerer said. "Have the decency of silence, Mirror Knight, and sit in your fucking chair."

"Roland," Hanno sharply said. "That's enough. Being insulted is no reason to return the treatment in kind, not amongst allies."

"You're a disgrace, Sorcerer," the Blade of Mercy spat.

"Swallow your tongue, boy," the Bitter Blacksmith harshly said. "You have already given away your right to speak."

"I will not speak to the Rogue Sorcerer's anger," the Forlorn Paladin said, "but his doubts I'll admit to sharing. You cast grave accusations, Mirror Knight, but offer no proof. Even a villain is due more than that."

"This is all pointless talk, anyway," the Vagrant Spear exasperatedly said. "Even if every word you spoke was true, Christophe, what is it that could be done? You want to spank the Black Queen's bottoms until she learns about virtue? The moment one of us – any of us – attacks her, the Kingdom of Callow's armies will leave and let Procer burn to the ground."

"They have a duty," Christophe tightly said. "And I do not speak of forcing her to abdicate her crown, Sidonia. Is Lady Vivienne Dartwick not her heir? Let her replace the crooked queen as representative for the Damned, then."

"That is enough of that," Hanno said.

Eyes turned him.

"We do not rule the Grand Alliance," the White Knight evenly said. "We do not settle its affairs for it, much less meddle with its constituent crowns. We are servants of the Gods Above who have sworn an oath of war against the Hidden Horror."

Hanno swept his gaze across the room.

"We must remain aware of our limits," the White Knight said. "We are not deciding the fate of the Queen of Callow between us, or the fate of the Severance, much less who the representative for villains would be under rules that we have already given our oath to observe. If you have concerns, I will hear them. If you have grievances, I will act on them. But do not delude yourselves, not for a moment, that we can dictate terms to half of Calernia bound in alliance."

Few looked like they wanted to object, and none who dwelled in the Arsenal. They understood best, Hanno thought, the actual scale of something like the Grand Alliance. They'd seen it at work, when this unearthly place had been carved out of nothing in less than a year. The others knew only their front, their battle, their struggle. It was human nature, Hanno knew, to reduce things to something that was easier to grasp. That did not make you uncomfortable about how very small you were. The Seraphim had stripped him of that, among their many gifts. The White Knight perfectly understood how insignificant a speck of dust he truly was, and that had allowed him a certain... clarity of sight, in some ways.

"You're going to kill the Red Axe."

Hanno turned a calm gaze to the Mirror Knight, whose green eyes had gone cold.

"I am," the White Knight agreed. "If a law cannot be borne, let it not be borne. I will not worship at the altar of our imperfections and pretend it is infallible. But if it is to stand, if it is to be heeded, there cannot be exceptions."

Hanno did not judge, for that was not his place even bereft the guidance of the Seraphim, but he was neither blind nor deaf. He would act as he must, knowing his actions to be blind and imperfect. Christophe de Pavanie rose to his feet. Slowly, inexorably.

"No," the Mirror Knight harshly said. "I will not allow it."

Those were not, the White Knight thought, words that could be taken back.

Insanenoodlyguy

"These talks are meant to allow you all to air grievances and worries," Hanno cut in as he sat down, voice serene. "If such worries concern the matter of the story's ranking, you are of course free to vote here."

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

TeK

Christophe de Pavanie rose to his feet. Slowly, inexorably.

"No," the Mirror Knight harshly said. "I will not vote."

Those were not, the White Knight thought, words that could be taken back.

thearpox23

It is always a little weird to me when there is a request to vote on a website I never use for a purpose that's never relevant to me.

I don't ever use topwebfiction. I only heard of it on this blog. The other works there don't particularly interest me, and if I am ever searching for something to read I won't ever be using it for recommendations.

You'd think the rankings would be decided by the userbase. If I were to actually vote I'd feel like that guy that goes into a cafe, fills out a survey for what drinks they prefer, then never actually buys anything or visits it again.

TeK

It's more of a reminder honestly. As if, those who want to vote, but may have forgotten will click the link and those who don't want will not. Everything is very much liberal, you do what you think is right.

Nairne .01

I agree

No one is forcing you to vote thearpox23.

TeK

We will find out where you live if you don't vote though...

shikkarasu

I love too many different stories in the Rankings to pick a favourite, but I do love the ever creative reminders.

Tom

You can vote for more than one story. You could vote for every one on the page if you wanted. 😊 I'm pretty sure it was put together that way so that you don't have to choose a single favorite.

aisard

Mayhap the purpose and relevancy is only in how it effects apgte's popularity and thus monetary compensation.

Topwebfiction only exists as a platform that ties together disparate blogs and sites that host their own fiction anyways. By reading apgte, you are in fact the user base Topwebfiction is aiming for.

Either way, it's more like going to vote in a poll organized by a Coffee Lovers organization whose sole purpose is making coffee polls. Hoping that your vote will boost the sales of your favorite local cafe. Benefitting the people who actually follow the polls, whilst also expanding their reach.

But also at this point its just a good meme :p

impolitic

You're reading this wonderful story for free. It's not an unreasonable hardship to suggest that you promote the story if you've enjoyed it.

Whether you use topwebfiction or not, plenty of other readers do. A high ranking on that page makes it more likely that some of those users will come here, read the story, and become fans in turn, thus building the market for EE's eventual commercialization of his work.

You sound like Mr. Pink explaining why he doesn't tip the waitress in the diner.

thearpox23

Voting inherently implies making a choice. Picking a favorite if you will.

And without reading or even glancing at the other works, I don't know if the Guide is better than them. It feels disingenuous to simply go to some site and engage in a shouting match of 'my thing is better than the other things' when that is my only relation to that site.

Abolish tipping.

TeK

Tipping is objectively cancer.

impolitic

Your entire argument can be dismissed with the observation that you can vote for as many stories as you like. Voting does not express a preference for one story over another, it's simply a recommendation that this story is good. You don't have to decide anything about whether other stories are worth reading, much less whether they're more or less worth reading than this one, in order to make the simple recommendation that this one is.

thearpox23

"Your entire argument can be dismissed with the observation that you can vote for as many stories as you like."

You say that like it was obvious.

Then it's just an overly complicated way of having an 'most popular stories this week' datamine, where instead of monitoring traffic you're monitoring a dedicated subset of fans. (And my assumption is that the ratios of the these are going to be similar across the stories.) Kind of like novelupdates activity stats and reading lists, except that the novelupdates actually has the series description, releases history, reviews, et cetera. You know, where the website has actual usability aside from being a shouting room.

Honestly, we should just petition novelupdates or some similar website to open a web fiction section. Because when I compare the two, novelupdates does all the things topwebfiction does but better and in a less awkward way.

Estelulu

Please stop lol. Nobody really needed you to pontificate about why your opinion is so special and different, and why you don't want to support a free story that I can only assume you enjoy.

Just don't vote and leave it at that. Your replies are starting to look kind of crazed and desperately defensive.

thearpox23

Doesn't telling someone to 'please stop lol' after the discussion has probably already ended achieve the opposite purpose? You sure discouraged me from replying by throwing a bunch of stuff I disagree with at me. And nobody really needed you pontificating about why my pontification is you get the point.

For my part, I actually enjoyed expressing my dislike of the whole process and of the website's relative worthlessness, even if WonderDuckie ultimately put his point forth much better than I did mine. If you mind my statements crazed and desperately defensive that funny, but that just means I'm not very eloquent. Something best fixed with practice.

Estelulu

It's insurance for the future.

anonymous4968

Novel Updates DOES have a segment for western novels, it's called ScribbleHub. Where do you think those three sidebar novels come from? Also, other sites exist too, RoyalRoad and to a lesser extent Wattpad.

<https://www.scribblehub.com/>

WebNovel can go die in the harshest of nuclear empowered goblinfire.

Dome Zasrekh

You dont vote becouse you think its better than the others, you vote cos you think its good

KlatnYelox

There is a difference. You can vote for as many web fictions as you want on that list. Its more of a statement "I like this one" than a claim that "this one is the best."

heffalumps

or you could go contribute to the author's Patreon, which is linked in various places from this website, which does actually give money to the actual author directly, instead of constantly banging on this damn "go vote!" drum, which might make some money for the author... somehow? in some abstract way? maybe? without actually giving any money to the author, or to anybody at all?

I come to the comment section to read comments about the chapter I just read, and I get damn tired of having to wade through a score of screens about "go vote!" "don't tell me what to do!" "this is equivalent to giving the author money!" before getting to anything actually relevant.

(and for the record, I am contributing actual money to the author's actual Patreon, and I have never voted in the pointless poll and never will.)

WonderDuckie

Not to mention topwebfiction is a relic of a bygone era of armature web novels. It has extremely low user traffic now a days. Mostly just bot's or people from this specific website. To be honest I see no glory in reaching the number 1 spot on a largely inactive poll that barely anyone realizes exists anymore outside of a few tiny circles.

That being said there is nothing wrong with voting on it if that's what makes a few readers happy. Tho if your reason is "it shows my support for the novel" then go support their pateron. Something that actually makes a meaningful impact for are beloved author. No one seems to ever encourage readers to do that in the comments for some reason.

TeK

This is a very good point.

Vortex

I found practical guide to evil and dozens of other stories on that website. Even if you do not use it, surely you can see how it would be helpful to the author to increase traffic to your site.

Also if you are looking for high quality fiction to read, topwebfiction is usually a pretty good source.

thecorinthianman

Ooooooh, this is gonna be good.

NerfContessa

These are a villains words, not a heroes.

Careful, morror knight with that sword you'd make a good. Black knight in Jon Amadeus ways.

Dave

Boy do I want Christophe to die. FFS

Jordan Leighton

I did call that the Heroes side would be the side to fall apart. Fits too well with the tone/theme of the story for anything else.

Curious about how Hanno will handle this one.

Salt

I'm actually not sure if Hanno would even be willing to compromise at this point. I mean he's generally one of the most moderate of the lot, but he is still the Sword of Justice. He's by nature as completely and utterly uncompromising as the Pilgrim or the Saint, when it comes to his most prized principle. Him being so normally reasonable makes it easy to forget that this dude used to walk around flipping a coin and beheading civilians without batting an eyelash, if the Seraphim said they were Unjust enough to warrant it.

The fact that he gave a flat answer for pushing for execution, especially with such an absolutist phrasing, makes me suspect that of all things it'll be the Mirror Knight's inconsistency in following the laws that's going to be the roadblock. Not the insults, not the immaturity, or the arrogance, or plain being a pain in the ass, just the fact that he's taking a stand against what Hanno thinks is Just.

Darkening

Judgement, not Justice. There is a difference.

Salt

Ah, sorry typo, you're right.

Although, to be honest I'm not sure there practically is a difference as far as Hanno is concerned. Canonically we know the deepest desire of his heart is to be Just, and he's outright stated in the past that he considers the "judgement of power" to be evil because it isn't Just.

ThatOneGuy

When you spend a good amount of your life working as the blade for the angels in charge of JUSTICE you learn a thing or two about what is right and wrong.

It may not be pretty and some methods seem heavy handed to even seemingly giving up one's own free will... But White Knight stands by his beliefs and his actions.

He may not like it, but that is what justice and the law demands. Mirror Knight on the other hand... Stands by what he says when it suits him. He really didn't care for the reformed villain turned hero in his party and only took offense by blaming her death on someone he didn't like.

He took claim of a valuable sword, planned war on his own allies during a war, and now takes issue when he doesn't get his way.

Some heroes are brash, some blunt, and others... Hard to work with.

MK is just like lone swordsman. Willing to preach about good, honor, and insert line... But just as willing to brainwash everyone around them to become suicidal soldiers when he doesn't get his way.

MK has not done it... But he might cause a bigger blunder if he tries to kill White Knight and take claim of the position of "leader of the heroes"

medailyfun

Nephele was not villain before, just a Stygian mage

Sam

She wasn't a Villain, but it's hard to argue that she wasn't a villain.

Agent J

You're selling William short. Where GP is about No Unnecessary Suffering and SoS was about No Compromise with the Enemy, Billy's core principles were simply Free Callow, as his sister desired, and Atone for My Sins in the doing. Everything else was heroic dressing. He was, honestly, more similar to Saint of Swords in his willingness to bring great harm to his own countrymen in accomplishing his core principles. And, Hells, even the Grey Pilgrim is up for a minor spot of genocide in the pursuit of his.

Mirror Knight, by contrast, is not fighting for the Red Axe because of any such principles. That could have been argued when she killed the Wicked Enchanter, but all arguments flew out the window when she try to murder the Hero and Prince who's only job was to protect her from harm.

Right now, he's fighting for her to massage his own bruised ego. "I was wrongfully manipulated like she was. If I am innocent, so is she. If she is not... what am I?"

Even William was better than that.

beleester

I would argue that judging based on just the facts and the law, rather than your personal dislike of the person being judged, is the definition of fair judgement.

One of Hanno's major character traits is his willingness to obey civilian laws, even to his detriment. He doesn't simply believe in his own judgement, or the judgement of the Seraphim, he believes in Law – the idea that society should have rules that apply to everyone equally. Like all Named, he's not going to budge on that principle, but it's very much his own thing, not the Seraphim speaking through him. The Seraphim don't have laws, they only judge "is it better for this person to be alive or dead?"

(If anything, this principle is what stops him from calling on the Seraphim – you don't face judgement without committing a crime.)

Salt

Ah, but there's the mistake. All choirs focus on a single virtue, and as good as each virtue is, they're not all encompassing or fully correct on their own.

I'd argue that Judgement as we've seen it does not care a single whit about "is it better for this person to be alive or dead"? That's Mercy's way of thinking. Judgement seems to care about "is it justified for this person to be alive or dead", which is completely different in that it focuses on the principle of the matter rather than Mercy's consequentialist view of ethics.

Are the Seraphim perfectly Just? I wouldn't doubt it. Is being perfectly Just the same thing as being perfectly Good? Not in every situation, not by a long shot, even if it is still quite Good in many.

Hanno has his own blinders. He'll be the one most often correct when you ask him if the law was followed, and how it should be followed. He'll be the one most often useless when questions such as "what matters more, the outcome or the law?" get raised – which is where the other choirs come in for the many myriad other ethical basis that go into making a decision.

The point of what I was trying to say isn't that Hanno is unjust. The point was to caution that for all his temperate likability as a character, when push comes to shove he is a character who by Role sees the world through a very particular lens.

Fate

So far as his particular lens: keep in mind, Hanno has been blessed by enduring karma blindness. Speaking practically, much of his ability to collaborate with Catherine over the past few years originates from his cautious ambiguity towards Judgement. This is diametrically opposed to the standard interpretation of his Name; the catch is, Hanno has always been ambiguous on judgement, and took on the role atypically with the use of his trademark "leave it to fate" rituals granting him the certainty other Knights have by nature.

While he had Judgement at hand, their relationship was much more ambiguous, and more or less predicated on Catherine being the least of pressing evils. Since they've been blinded, he can't consult the Choir, and he is forced to make his own calls based on his humility, his experience, and his ability to reason, turning him from the fateful zealot into a veritable knight of 'practicality,' the same practicality that runs deep in the current Black Knight (thus completing yet another mirror, like the White 'Prince' / Black Queen parity that was just reinforced a few chapters ago.)

This strain of practicality and humility is exactly what has allowed Hanno and Catherine to transition from "temporary allies, fated enemies, but friends" into "enduring allies, fated rivals, but friends" for years and years, fighting off the Hidden Horror. Even once the Choir returns, that change will be challenging to reverse.

Actually, Hanno may be at risk of losing his Name entirely, or transitioning into a new one. His consistent understanding of fallibility and the consequences of his actions may indeed have him questioning the virtues of Judgement for the sake of Judgement, especially if the fallout from the Choir doing its job "right" is the horrific situation that the continent is currently trapped in.

Actually, have we divined what Choir the Bard supposedly answers to, if any?

Agent J

She answers to the Gods, both Above and Below, not any petty Choirs.

Mental Mouse

> the same practicality that runs deep in the current Black Knight

Ahem, most recent Black Knight, who has since lost his Name.

beleester

The Seraphim explicitly judge “Would it be better for this person to be dead or not?” When Hanno first becomes the White Knight, the Seraphim give him the Riddle of Fault and show him all the consequences that unfold from each possible decision, both good and bad – the lesson being that no human can predict all the consequences of their actions, but the Seraphim can, and therefore only they should pass judgement. That’s consequentialism, not deontology.

Salt

The seraphim showed him both the cause and the effect of each action. They went backwards in time as well as forwards. Consequentialism doesn’t place heavy emphasis on motive like the Seraphim do. You can’t just ignore half of what they showed him. See below:

> The impossible lay of action and consequence, of motive and result. It was too much.

They showed him how even his “good and faithful actions” were flawed precisely because of the prideful, selfish, and lustful intentions behind them. See below, you’ll notice that a majority of what they consider contemptuous about Hanno aren’t that his actions hurt people so much as his ugly intentions and beliefs – ones that could be found behind even Good Actions like showing kindness “for his own pleasure”

> Who could see Creation with eyes instead of scrolls. Disgust and fear at tierless beggars. The ugly press of reassurance when violence was dealt to make them leave his sight. Pride at his skill with a quill, at his cleverness and memory. The unadmitted contempt for those less blessed. Kindness offered only for his own pleasure, for the thrill of knowing himself good. Taking bread from his father’s portion, telling himself he had earned it more.

I don't even understand how you can interpret him as a consequentialist character when his entire backstory is based on ethics regarding justification of fault despite consequence. His eye opening experience was realizing that he wasn't qualified to judge people who did things that were plainly harmful – like needlessly sending his mother to the quarantined district and causing grief by not properly laying his father to rest – because he couldn't consider the full lay of motive, intent, and history that led up to the action.

His answer to the riddle of fault wasn't based on a consequentialist interpretation of how bad the result of the maid and noble woman's actions was, it was a value based interpretation that says the king is incapable of administering justice because he cannot understand the full intent and history that led up to the crime.

Nearly everything about Prosecution I and II denies pure consequentialism as a sufficient standard for a system of ethics

Cicero

Justice is blind, and judges by the scale, not by personal preference.

The Mirror Knight has essentially declared his intent to subvert justice. Also, he intends to enforce it by stealing the sword meant to kill the Dead King and using it to smite everyone he thinks deserves it.

Yeah... White Knight is going kill the Mirror Knight.

And a majority of the heroes are going to side with the White Knight.

In fact, right now I think only the Blade of Mercy will side with the Mirror Knight.

Do0d

I think MK will give Hanno a bad time and BoM will stop him.

Javvies

Oh, fuck.

This isn't going to end well.

Hanno probably should have had private meetings before the group meeting. He might have been able to come up with a plan to deal with Mirror Knight.

And Mirror Knight pushed a lot harder and faster than I expected that he would. And on factors and issues I didn't expect him to push on.

I'm starting to doubt that he's truly just clueless dumbass who got played.

He might have decided to fully throw in with Bard's agenda. Or some variation thereof.

Kingfisher Prince might have to change his mind on charging Red Axe for trying to kill him in order to hold the Heroes together. Which is something I'm still not entirely sure why he decided against in the first place.

Insanenoodlyguy

After killing Seven Demons in one day, the perception of him by the others, named and mundane alike, changed. Which means his story is changing. Which means HE is changing. Not necessarily for the better, but I put forth the idea that for all his ineptitude, he's actually smarter and more capable, at least of expressing and having his own opinion and direction, then he was before the battle for Arsenal.

dadycool

He just has a, if not simply wrong, then at least unrestrained and impatient opinion. Sure, bribery is bad, but there are things he refuses to see that make it a usable course of action, especially for someone who doesn't mind getting her hands dirty and acknowledging how dirty they are, unlike some people.

Javvies

It's not even bribery. It's a plea deal in order to avoid an automatic death sentence.

On the other hand, Mirror Knight has no knowledge or experience with how the judicial system, government, ruling, and/or leadership actually works.

dadycool

For someone who wouldn't fathom the concept of a plea deal, I guess it would look like bribery. Of course, he also refuses to understand anything beyond his narrow view and pats himself on the back for refusing to see.

TeK

To be fair I am not sure a plea deal is something that is that prevalent in Calernian judicial system. So he's lack of knowledge is understandable.

dadycoool

Yeah, I think it's actually a fairly modern judicial method, though I don't want to get put on a list by googling it.

thearpox23

A plea deal IS bribery. It is just that we have long since internalized the long and complicated argument for why it can be a good practice. I suppose thinking "It's not bribery" is easier than "it's a subset of bribery that can be beneficial".

TeK

That. I actually agree with the sentiment very much. It's ironic because "it's a bribery but a good one vs it's not a bribery" is a discussion of nuance vs monochrome, which very much applies to Mirror Knight himself.

Javvies

Eh, I'd argue that a plea deal is sufficiently different enough in degree that it effectively constitutes a difference in kind.

Like ... the difference between a holiday fireworks launcher filled for a fireworks display and a multiple launch rocket system loaded with live artillery rockets.

Technically they're the same sort of thing in the same sense that a plea deal is bribery. In practice, however, they are very different and not the same thing at all.

TeK

That was kind of an extreme case and not an equivalent analogy at all, but I'll let it slide because I like to do exaggerated analogies too. Both bribery and plea deal can be reduced to "provide us a reason why we shouldn't apply to you standard of justice we apply to everyone by default". Only difference is while in plea deal "us" is the society as a whole, in bribery "us" is a small group of people with power to change said standard of justice.

thearpox23

And by "society as a whole" half the time it is:
The lawyers who wants a good record, The judge who doesn't want to work overtime, and the defendant who has to go to work tomorrow.

And while there are many ways a plea deal can work in practice, what Catherine did with the Hunter Magician was very much a bribe to the Grand Alliance in the form of the Crown of Autumn.

Shveiran

This isn't a small difference at all.

Bribery is the exchange of money or other benefit so that a public servant will act against his duties and in the donor's favor.

A plea deal is the accused renouncing part of his rights in exchange for a lesser sentence, with the system being the scale used to measure whether or not the balance is beneficial or not.

There is just no comparing the two unless you only go skin deep, because a bribery is about the bribed benefitting at the expense of the system and a plea deal is the system choosing between different possible benefits to itself.

Comparing the two is not unlike comparing self defense to premeditated murder: you are still shooting someone, but when you look deeper than that there aren't many similarities to be found.

sivarajan

That was my first instinct too, but upon consideration, no: bribery is the most charitable interpretation of plea deals, only applicable if you presume guilt. If your "justice" system presumes innocence, it's actually extortion, threatening the risk of a much harsher sentence if one doesn't plead guilty.

Javvies

Depends on the nature of the plea deal.
If it's just "plead guilty for a lighter sentence than if you go to trial and get convicted" ... it can be that if and when the system isn't working right and an innocent person thinks that they are in serious danger of being falsely convicted if they go to trial. Which, admittedly, happens way too often.
But the system is nominally supposed to be aligned towards it being better to let a hundred guilty people go free than falsely convict one innocent. In theory, anyways, in practice it doesn't work out like that far too often.

If, however, the plea deal is about "I'll give you the evidence I have on someone who did something worse than what I did or other information the court will find valuable in another case, or otherwise cooperate with prosecutors in exchange for leniency on the stuff I'm guilty of and believe that you have more than enough to convict me on" ... then not so much.

thearpox23

The enforcers are engaging in extortion. (When operating maliciously.)
The victim is bribing them off.

Both things can be true at once, and the guilt isn't necessarily a factor. The intent of enforcement is independent of whether or not you've done something wrong.

origamiflame

Well, a mirror isn't meant to see. Simply reflects without understanding.

Nairne .01

And that is its failing.

TeK

"Working as intended."

– Devteam of Above

LarsBlitzer

I agree that it seems his story is changing. He pulled a magic sword from a pool in a time of great crisis. You can't ask for a more iconic footnote from Joseph Campbell. I fear he won't be up for the task, but no, he's not stupid. Intelligence isn't his dump stat; Wisdom is though and that spells disaster. The showdown will come next chapter and it will be a doozy.

Insanenoodlyguy

Oh absolutely. I could have been clearer, I completely agree with you. He's gotten some bonuses to intelligence and Charisma checks, but his wisdom penalty is as prevalent as ever

dadycool

I think he refrained as Prince Frederic helping the First Prince, not as Kingfisher Prince.

MK seems to me to be like Bitter Blacksmith said, simply too arrogant, also too much of a young Saint of Swords, which is likely why she chose him: she saw a kindred spirit who mistakes fighting Evil for doing Good and refuses to entertain the concept of grey areas.

Javvies

Except by Kingfisher Prince not pushing to punish Red Axe for trying to kill him under the Truce and Terms makes things more complicated for Cordelia, Cat, and (now) Hanno.

If Frederic charged Red Axe under the Truce and Terms for trying to kill him, that's sufficient grounds to execute her by itself, which means the other Heroes (ie Mirror Knight) don't have room to say she shouldn't get executed because Wicked Enchanter was a Villain who did terrible things before the Truce and Terms, and the issue of trying to kill a Proceran Prince gets subsumed because Red Axe already has a death sentence for violating the Truce and Terms, and she can only get executed once.

Red Axe getting tried by the Assembly helps Cordelia in the short term (driving a wedge between Mirror Knight and his Proceran noble allies) but complicates things for the Truce and Terms and the Accords in the long run.

dadycool

Sounds like a battle between two long terms. The long term of not having Procer burn to the ground regardless of DK and the long term of lasting, meaningful peace across Calernia.

TeK

Nay, I say there isn't much difference between Saint and Mirror beyond pure superficial ones. Saints ardent believes were forged after actually offering forgiveness and trying to coexist and being burned time and again, after fighting and facing the vilest and darkest parts of Below for so long, she could no longer unsee them even in more moderate Villain. Her believes may have been wrong, but they were grounded in precedent and decades of experience, and still she recognised that failing in herself, acknowledged it and deferred to Pilgrim for most of the decisions because she knew she had bias.

That is far, far more than I can say about Cristophe at the moment. It is a haughty mix of arrogance, ignorance and self-righteousness. Nothing else.

Still, I can't miss the obvious parallels between Saint and Mirror and Pilgrim and Hanno. They are too numerous to count. I hope that Christophe will learn to trust Hanno's judgement and will grow more mature. I kinda hope they will be successors to Laurence&Tariq tag team. They worked very well together all things considered.

TeK

I meant to say there isn't much similarities between Mirror and Saint beyond superficial ones, curse my laziness and lack of proofreading.

Salt

Agreed. The Saint in her latter years was a stubborn ass and jaded beyond belief, but she was also the furthest thing from a fool.

We know for a fact that her early days involved actively sparing Villains like the Salutory Alchemist simply because she believed they had the best of intentions. A slap on the wrist, a promise to avoid crossing lines, and if Tariq is to be believed she left it at that and actually just trusted the kid when he nodded and promised to be a good boy. If anything, the young Saint of Swords from the Pilgrim's memory seems more like a Rogue Sorcerer or Vagrant Spear than a Mirror Knight.

I suspect that the Severance chose Christophe precisely because he's nothing at all like a young Saint of Swords. It chose him because he's in some ways strikingly similar to the elderly Saint of Swords – uncompromising and distrustful of Villains to a ridiculous degree. Whatever's left of the old bat sees a kid who probably won't make the same "mistakes" she made by attempting to trust Villains.

The problem is that the stakes right now do not make for a safe learning environment. The best case scenario here is Hanno whipping humility and moderation into him. The worst case is "character development by ruinous mistake of your own making", which tends to be followed by either a sharp redemption or going even further off the rails. Considering the situation, I don't think it takes much to imagine how bad that kind of fallout could be.

Here's hoping the kid learns a necessary life lesson by way of getting his ass handed to him.

Adrian V

I think the rush is that he is smart enough to notice he was losing the argument, so he went all manchild coupled with the need to make a stand (and the inability to admit even to himself he is wrong)

Ninestrings

The more we see of Christophe, the more I am struck by how incredibly childish he is.

I know he gets basically launched at monsters for a living but emotionally he's been coddled way way too much.

He seems to be confusing being physically capable with being emotionally developed.

Abrakadabra

I guess he is taken over by the Severance. He is acting exactly like the woman it was made of. No compromise on the smallest things even if the world would suffer for it.

Nairne .01

I'm inclined to agree. Names have power, literally in this story. And it is the Severance. Coupled with his natural predispositions it is itching to sever what he doesn't like. It is an aspect made manifest. And he is too immature to keep it in check.

KageLupus

I don't think it is anything as esoteric as that. This is just the result of the Wandering Bard being extremely familiar with the nature of Named, and setting up Mirror Knight for conflict.

Everything that is happening right now is due to the constant feelings of inadequacy that Mirror Knight has. The man fumbles every social interaction that he finds himself in, and is aware of it after the fact every time. He is not entirely wrong in thinking that people only keep him around because of his Name and the power it gives him.

Those feelings came to a serious head when he was talking with Catherine and realized that she was only engaging with him because he had the Severance. So once again his only importance comes from the power that he wields and nothing personal to himself. Christophe has decided to lean into that role, in an admittedly childish manner. If all he is good for is power, and he has all of this power, then he might as well use it to push for what he thinks is right. Which in this case is saving the Red Axe from the wicked Black Queen.

TeK

The most unrealistic thing about this chapter is how allegedly bad at social stuff Cristophe has all the cool lines and never once was like "I uh, have, uh, like, uh, well, you know, I mean I don't think we should, uh, well, like, uh, trust the Black Queen, you know?"

Agent J

How often do real people stumble and stutter during regular speech? Misspeak or forget a word they wanted to use and struggle to find it? Nevermind when tensions are this heightened. Have we seen that ever in this series?

I've a running theory that everyone in Guide is made more eloquent in speech, because what kind of shitty dialogue has people fumbling over their words all the time? Who wants to read that shit?

Cicero

Christophe isn't bad at social because he speaks poorly, or lacks charisma.

He's bad at social because he speaks well and has a lot of charisma, but fundamentally struggles with empathy – particularly with those unlike him. Which leads him to continuously attribute malicious intent to others because what other reason could they possibly have for disagreeing with the obvious and right course of action?

You saw he repeatedly make that same mistake during this meeting. Assuming that others must have bad motives if they don't agree with him.

The reason he gets along so well with the Blade of Mercy is that Antoine has the same flaw, and so unlike most others, Christophe can actually empathize more with him than he can with others.

Nairne .01

Antoine, unlike Christoph is not a lost cause yet. At least I hope so.

TeK

I agree. But it is still weird to see someone like Christophe to not stumble and remain so well-spoken under such confusing and tense situation. He was utterly surprised quite a few times, yet it did nothing to his speech.

Cicero

Not really. Have you really not known someone who was good with words, and was well spoken, but for some reason never said the right words?

Instead their eloquence makes things worse, because it's so much harder for them to take it back later by pleading confusion and shock.

Tek

True. I meant it more as a broader statement applying to everyone in the series, I just took Cristophe as an example, and I shouldn't have.

Ahad Mahmood

A potential explanation may be people less articulate, like Antoine in this case, choosing not to articulate themselves. There have been incidences of characters being spoken over or being silent and whilst that doesn't inherently prove anything, it can imply that in a high pressure environment the characters that struggle to articulate themselves pick silence. There have definitely been accounts of characters blushing or becoming flustered and then becoming silent so that may be a possible explanation. I do agree that the lack of stammering is quite noticeable in hindsight.

Salt

It could honestly be both, I don't think it has to be one way or the other. If the weapon did have such an effect on mindset, for the Bard a person with that kind of stubbornness to begin with would be the ideal target to give it to.

They wouldn't resist the effects since it's in line with their tendencies anyway, and people wouldn't immediately be suspicious at someone being "more stubborn than normal", whereas someone being "stubborn when they usually aren't" would raise alarm bells immediately.

Not dissimilar to hiding a poisonous mushroom among the edible stock of mushrooms, rather than in a pile of carrots.

heffalumps

oooooh, very good catch, this makes a lot of his actions and reactions make a lot more sense to me suddenly. yikes.

Salt

No, no it's not. If Christophe really tries to force a pardon through, Hanno is going to see that as outright evil. He may have just crossed the singular hard bottom line that Hanno actually has.

I think the vision of himself doing what Christophe is doing, from the Seraphim's initial test of Hanno's character, says everything we need to know about how well he's going to react to the Mirror Knight trying to get his way by force.

> I charge you, he heard himself say, with cruelty and indifference. I charge you with choosing law over right, with embracing blindness. As as his eyes shone, they could not weather the Light that came with it. Blindness embraced embraced them in return. He left that courtyard a righteous man, and brought that righteousness to all of Ashur.

>"No," Hanno said. "That, too, is evil."

>The boy he watched bore power, but he was not just. To mete out retribution upon those he found at fault was no different than what he had despised, in the end. It was only the judgement of power. The rule of strength, bereft of equity. There was no sin in law or the defiance of it, but to clothe retribution in the guise of justice was a thing of evil. What justice could there be, in the blind exertion of violence? To do such a thing would make him unworthy of the very strength being used.

Salt

To clarify, I'm agreeing with you. I may have just pulled a mirror knight and worded it kind I'm disagreeing lmao

Point Point

I think it's too late for the Prince I change his mind. Now, the Mirror Knight would just see it as him siding with Hanno.

Javvies

Eh ... not unless Mirror Knight already knows that Kingfisher Prince had decided against charging Red Axe under the Truce and Terms. Which he probably shouldn't.

I think it would be very difficult to argue that Kingfisher Prince can not or should not charge Red Axe under the Truce and Terms, and likely equally difficult to argue that she shouldn't be punished for that. Well, argue successfully, anyways. Mirror Knight might still try, but he'll look like even more of a dumbass as he fails to convince anyone.

Unnamed Goose

uh oh seems like the choosen are about to have a schism, or at least a fight.

TeK

I am the Bishop of Rome, the holiest man alive, second under God, a successor of the apostle, you all should clearly listen to me!

nimelennar

We are, all of us, bishops and patriarchs! We are all successors of the apostles! If you are first among us, you are first among equals as a mark of respect for the history of your bishopric! You are not above us, and we will not be treated as if it were so!

mordered

Bishops and holy men do not speak for me, let the voice of the people rule supreme! If the gods want to have a voice they better send an envoy to parliament to sit with the representatives of the people!

Dera

Well yes, but then the Gods will be subject to the law, which has a lot of peculiar implications... Just ask Bellerophon 😊

Jordan Leighton

I find it super interesting how the pre-quotes seem to apply to chapters afterwards. Like MK in this scene is representing all the reasons why the previous chapter's quote about Bring Good but not Speaking for who is true.

vernal.ancient

Oddly enough, seeing things from Hanno's non-judgmental perspective actually makes Christophe even less likable, by throwing into relief just how stubbornly blind he's being

dadycool

Yeah, it's like "Where is your evidence?" "I just know! She uses different methods than us and she couldn't possibly have good reasons for any of it! I'm too much of a hammer to see subtleties and she's a Villain, so she couldn't possibly have good intentions!" "You're being emotional."

TeK

I am not emotional, you're emotional!

vernal.ancient

"I can't be emotional because the Black Queen manipulates emotions, so clearly you're lack of emoting shows that she's already gotten to you and is trying to hide it!"

Adrian_V

You all get a like from me, continue!!

nimelennar

It's also a matter of, well, we can't really blame Christophe too much for being a dick to Catherine. He's a hero, she's a villain, and he has some legitimate grievances about the way she runs things.

When he treats other heroes, especially Hanno, the same way, though, there's really no excuse. Especially when we can see the kind of negative influence he's having on the Blade of Mercy.

vernal.ancient

True, although I actually think we've overestimated how much influence he really has on BoM. Granted, the younger hero looks up to MK, but he definitely doesn't see Christophe as infallible, and I get the feeling that he's heading for a broken pedestal moment pretty soon. His harsher comments towards the other heroes seems less like Christophe's influence specifically, and more Antoine being young, naive, and in way over his head with this whole "politicking" and "working with differing viewpoints" thing

Salt

Absolutely. The Blade of Mercy seems less inherently arrogant and more just shaped by growing up around a particular mindset.

Him being willing to both support Christophe when he thinks he's right and directly contradict him when he thinks he's wrong, all in the span of the same conversation, speaks volumes about his innate character.

I mean, consider this for a second. The guy probably lived most of his life around people who genuinely believed that the Black Queen was the most treacherous traitor to ever engage in treachery. His first impression of her was shaped by fighting a murderous Winter Catherine, followed immediately by fighting Akua fucking Sahelian pretending to be a murderous Winter Catherine. That's about as shit of a first impression as you could realistically get.

A single direct interaction that proved otherwise, and the kid is already starting to show signs of reconsidering if some of his assumptions were wrong. He might be low-key a very respectable character, although we'll have to see if he can break out from the shadow of Christophe and establish himself as a proper Hero on his own merit.

antichri5

Pretty sure their first encounter was Cat ripping off his fucking arm.

dadycool

Well, things seem to have officially boiled over. This Heroic infighting will be interesting to see, especially since the nine of them are the only ones that can participate, otherwise whoever joins will be considered intruding on an internal affair.

Salt

Wait. What if the external interference isn't with the conflict or any of the people involved? What if this is shaping up to be a Story that lets someone set Judgement loose from the Hierarchy, right in the middle of the whole mess? Such as certain incredibly important character who's close to regaining their Name?

You'd have a Narrative where the gods damned Choir of Judgement is showing up at the last minute in both a moment of dire crisis AND a landmark trial, to help their chosen champion deliver a Just sentence. It'd be made more possible just by being an incredibly fitting narrative, and conceivably would be one of the few things that could confront a Mirror Knight wielding his sword from the lake in a fight.

Hanno with the Seraphim back on his shoulder becomes at minimum an equal candidate to wield the sword, Catherine would have a massive vested interest in him winning both for the Terms and a way to mitigate the potential disaster of the Judgement corpse being used while Judgement is out of commission, and it remains an Above-only internal spat for political purposes. No Hero could seriously file a complaint about a wicked Villainous plot to... set a literal choir of angels loose from their prison.

agumentic

Dead King mentioned that Judgement corpse not being used when Judgement was online actually saved everyone from some yet unspecified catastrophe – and I am inclined to believe him, it wasn't a situation where he would lie easily.

Casey Glick

You know, this might be a situation in which Hierarch and the Seraphim could agree on a course of action.

TeK

"Ok, so we start by getting everyone in the Arsenal to cast a vote on how to cast a vote..."

vernal.ancient

"Actually, wait, there are multiple Foreign Despots present in the arsenal. We must first vote on a means of ensuring they cannot influence the vote, and then we can... wait, where are you going? We're all on the same metaphysical plane here, don't think you can just walk away! THE PEOPLE DID NOT VOTE TO ABJURE!... I'll just put you all down as 'abstained from voting,' then."

TeK

Nooo. I hoped against hope that Christophe will learn from his mistakes and be better, not double down on them once critique was offered. But that seems less and less likely, and now I kinda lost hope. Why do you have to make it so realistic EE? I want some fantasy in my fantasy, not a grim portrayal of the reality of a human nature. It is a Bard striking out against the Alliance, and she was hyped up enough to make that believable, but fuck.

Although, to be completely fair, I doubted that Christophe will learn his mistakes without fucking up and causing deaths of a hundred thousand people. He is hardly that smarter than the Catherine. I still hope that in the end he will see the light and understand the stupidity of his youth, if too late at that.

TeK

And obviously I hope that he loves and repents and strives to be better. That not only will he recognize his own failure, he will own up to that and will make it his lifes mission to recognise that failing in the young Heroes and help them to avoid it where he failed. Maybe even becoming a teacher in the Arsenal, with a heavy shadow forever weighing on his shoulders.

I do not want him to be discarded like a wooden prop after he served his purpose as a source of conflict in the story. I am way too invested for that. Although he can also be stopped before he causes any real damage, I highly doubt that would really be the case.

Salt

For real. Catherine really started understanding “how few problems get solved by having a bigger hammer” at the end of the Tenth Crusade. That’s even as an exceptionally sensible Villain with an exceptionally good teacher. It took the doom of Liesse, getting turned into a Catherine-shaped-imprint in the mantle of Winter, winning a war with said mantle of Winter, and finding out that everything is still on fire and terrible, even though she finally had a big enough sword to win any brawl.

But hey, Above’s side tends to have things a bit easier sometimes. Let’s hope his lesson involves a firm hand by Hanno, rather than succeeding in overthrowing Hanno and having to personally experience the incredible fallout that’ll result from this latest bout of stupidity. Maybe providence will go easy on how harsh his lessons needs to be, it’ll be a mercy for everyone involved.

Even Catherine probably won’t complain about how heroes don’t have to pay long prices for their mistakes, if it means tens of thousands of people don’t die for the sake of Christophe’s growth as a Hero.

Nairne .01

I really think he might be shaping to become a villain though.

TeK

By holding to everything Above wants in it’s servants?

Salt

Everything Procer* thinks Above wants in their servants, at any rate.

Many other regions’ opinion on the Proceran interpretation of Above’s intentions can be accurately summed up by Sidonia’s very nuanced and elegant argument of “fuck you, Christophe”.

TeK

You mean that some backwater barbarian provinces have heretical views? Go figure.

Joking aside, I meant more abstract traits that are really summarised by Aqua: "Above liked it's pawns strong but rather dim." And by Black in "blindness and certainty, I always wondered what's the difference."

Salt

Don't let the Levantines hear you say that.

At any rate, I'd take those descriptions with a grain of salt, considering they come from a man who spent most of his career primarily motivated by a personal vendetta against Above, and the gods damned Diabolist. Trusting Akua's view of Heroes is like trusting the Saint's view of Villains. Not entirely wrong, but uh, with some heavy personal bias mixed in.

I think it's safe to say that Christophe's utter lack of nuance is actually not a great representation of what it means to be ideally Good, when the criticisms in this chapter aren't coming from Villains so much as a literal room full of Above-fellators – one of which is directly endorsed by a choir of Above.

superkeaton

Damn good chapter, and with minimal grammar/spelling errors too! Hanno's discovering the miserable joylessness of being an online forum moderator.

vernal.ancient

Let's be honest, "the miserable joylessness of being an online forum moderator" has been Hanno's life since he started interacting with other heroes

TeK

He isn't even that. He is online forum moderator without a banhammer.

lsdf

I am so done with Cristophe. Can he be dead now?

TeK

Yeah, I mean he certainly is someone deserving of death, how dare he not only disagree with main character, but also be overall unpleasant and bad at social stuff? Not like Aqua, who is pretty and witty and smart and look those cheeks, how can you punish someone like that?

Agent J

People like the witty and charming fictional character more than literal sandpaper? Shock! Gasp! What a strange and terrible fanbase. Better snark them to death.

TeK

I was arguing against advocating for death of people terrible at social interactions. But you are right, we should just kill him, not like it is something people can learn and grow out of.

Agent J

Boiling the problems with MK down to “bad at social stuff” is grossly disingenuous.

TeK

True. But calling for death of someone who can be taught better and wishes to be better is far far worse. I do not disagree with most of the critique on Mirror Knight, and I think a good beating may be for the best. But I am appalled at people calling for his death.

Javvies

Thing is, I’m not sure Mirror Knight actually can be taught.

Also, his view of how “better” is defined does not seem to be in line with pretty much anybody else’s.

Mirror Knight isn’t going accept being taught by someone who he views as lesser than him (which is damned near everyone) or who he thinks is wrong, mistaken, or otherwise disagrees with him. And certainly not anyone who isn’t a clearly Above Aligned Named. And anybody who he thinks is somehow influenced by a Villain is also going to be disqualified.

Especially since he’s throwing down a gauntlet with Hanno over Red Axe standing trial and the inevitable mandatory death sentence.

And I’m pretty sure that Mirror Knight is one of the people who thinks Tariq got compromised by Cat after the Prince’s Graveyard, which means the experienced mentor-Hero won’t have any sway with Mirror Knight either.

TeK

That is sadly true. I just don’t want to believe it.

LizAris

I wouldn't be upset at Christophe getting killed. He's the old brand of heroism that the Saint of Swords was, and we know how far that got her. Catherine's whole shtick and the "peace" wish depends on completely overhauling his way of thinking, and there's an incredible amount of deeply ingrained villain-hatred there that's more instinct than logic. On the other hand, if EE can turn this character around I will be surprised and happy to read it.

Thank the gods above and below for Hanno. Love this dude, surprisingly the backing of a choir made him more clear sighted than a lot of his contemporaries. And as always go Roland! He's been opposed to Christophe's brand of stubbornness since Llesse 3.

Spear calling Archer "the Lady" makes my heart sing ugh SOO cute.

Hearing the Artificer's and the Blacksmith's take on Magician (and how causal they were about it) was great especially since Cat thought that was such a bad idea. Also Frederic looking "interested" at the whole sleeping with a villain thing is hilarious.

Salt

Lmao yes, my evaluation of the Mirror Knight dropped a few notches here but my opinion of the rest of the heroes rose a few instead. The Blacksmith might be one of my new favorites.

Burlyraven

So Mirror Knight is going to do something drastic, by the looks of things, but there's a chance he'll be standing alone, as even the Blade of Mercy isn't a blind follower. That said, discontent with the alliance is growing among the heroes as a result of the gauntlet he just threw.

I also wonder if Rogue Sorcerer and Kingfisher know they're more or less on the same side yet. As it stands, they're the two heroes meant to wade partially in the territory of Below, and they've bonded in their own ways with Catherine. If it comes to it, they may yet be forced into the role of devil's advocates, and likely with drawn blades instead of words alone.

Salt

Yep, mass discontent at a minimum. It might even get worse than that very quickly.

Heroes might be as a whole better for average civilians/the general continent than Villains, due to their collective hardon for Virtue, but that same quality makes them an even bigger pain in the ass when you shove a bunch of them in the same room without a common enemy.

Virtue tends to be rather bad for unity when every single one of them champions different virtues to start with. If this little insurrection doesn't get nipped in the bud, it could end up becoming a small scale civil war among heroes as they start aligning with each other by virtue.

cyborgCnidarian

Severence is exerting influence on Christophe. The Saint of Swords wasn't known to have the most flexible moral framework, and it seems like her personality is influencing Christophe, amplifying his black-and-white morality. In his POV, we saw how he is unsure of himself internally, prone to questioning his speech and actions. Since taking up the sword, he has become even more stubborn and even more like the SoS. Her will lives on in the sword, and is vying to use him as a vessel to carry it out. He can't even bring himself to separate from the dang thing.

TeK

So you are saying a weapon from the Above corrupts it's user's will?

Also that is a good point. I hope people around him will recognise that he is not entirely acting as himself.

Salt

Considering Contrition actively removes your will, Judgement breaks your will, and Mercy asks you to give up your will, a legendary Above-oriented artifact having a degree of mental corruption doesn't sound super far fetched.

The Saint was unique not just because of her power, but because of how harsh the crucible that shaped her was and how incredibly singleminded she turned out to be as a result of it. It wouldn't be out of theme for essence of Laurence in the shape of a sword to lend her... prejudices as well as her strength.

Hanno wasn't wrong, when he said "Severity" is a better description of the person that Laurence was.

Nairne .01

The thing is, it is not Laurence he is talking about but the sword.

Severity means "how grave something is", "how important". Severance is plainly removing connections, severing them.

Names have power, and the artifact has been named to as a remover of connections. No wonder MK is being influenced in this way, what he is attempting to do is literally to sever connections.

TeK

That is an interesting point. What if the process of a narrative growth for Christophe (let me dream) would be changing what he bears from Severance (as in, cutting ties with anyone remotely close to him through bruttishness and lack of tact) to Severity (a recognition of how his action affect the world as a whole and that his actions can have potentially dire consequences and he should always consider them before acting).

Salt

“Severity” simply means the state of being “severe”, which has two distinct meanings, not just one. It describes either how very important/intense something is, or how harsh/strict something is.

Considering the Saint of Swords was primarily characterized by being a very severe person and severing things with her sword, I’m inclined to believe it makes far more sense to interpret “severity” it with the second common meaning of “harshness/strictness”.

This would mean that Hanno preferring severity over severance implies he thought her rigid and uncompromising ideology was more fundamental to who she was, rather than her tendency to solve problems by cutting them down.

Xinci

To be fair Salt, no agent of above actually removes will, rather they just influence it. Contrition for instance showed William the scope of all his actions and how they caused suffering. The angels seem to show an unveiled view of what impacts your actions have had, could have had, and may still have. Most people frankly, arent really prepared to understand how much hurt they cause by small actions, nor big. However, an aspect of human psychology is that if people know a result will be good, they will by far, be more willing to do it even in a hampered mental or physical state. So if you show someone the actions that may get a good result, it isn’t surprising that so many take up their cause. It’s just a difference in held information between their usual states and the ones their states once given perspective on a larger, more long term scale.

Also yeah Severity would probably have the dedication/mental aspects more fit for making a hero who needed unbreakable mental and emotional fortitude against the worst horrors of the world.

Salt

True, you make a good point. I was thinking more of what calling contrition down on Creation would've done, but I guess that's more of an exception than a rule. It would be less brainwashing and more a humbling-into-repentance in a sense for their Heroes.

It's interesting that Above seems to corrupt as much as Below, just in a very different way. Below has the standard kind of crossing lines and spiralling down slippery slopes that you'd normally expect, whereas too strong an influence from Above has you tunnelling too hard on a single set of Virtues at the cost of many others. It makes for Named with mental fortitude in ways that Below can never truly match, at the expense of being way too rigid when it comes to the particular set of virtues they've had their eyes "opened" to

Which I guess is one of the underlying reasons that Heroes often see Villains as untrustworthy blights, and Villains often see Heroes as inflexible idiots. They're both pretty correct when you look at it from their respective mindsets, if not necessarily objectively.

Entrerist

In agree the sword has a influence on him. It's probably whispering in his ear what to say.

Christopher Davis

Ah, You were at my side, all along. My true mentor. My guiding moonlight. I can totally see Christophe going all Ludwig on us.

agumentic

For all the purported inflexibility of Saint of Swords, I would like to remind everyone she didn't just accept Grey Pilgrim's decision for the truce, it took her all of one journey with Catherine to say "Okay, maybe just this time truce with the enemy won't backfire". Let's not forget that even when she started acting on her own, she did not aim to kill either Catherine or Archer. The greatest tragedy of her death is that I do not think she was, in the end, completely beyond reason. Maybe if Kairos didn't decide to kill her for shit and giggles, she might have found herself living in a better world, like she hoped others would. Maybe not, but I feel the possibility was there.

So, I think people are overestimating just how much the trace of the Saint of Swords in the Severance (Apropos of nothing, I agree that Severity is the better name) influences MK's current shitbaggery.

Shveiran

=> it took her all of one journey with Catherine to say "Okay, maybe just this time truce with the enemy won't backfire"

Personally, I don't think the sword needs to be influencing him at all; this development feels pretty natural for Cristophe.

But this comment about Saint is not quite right. Or at least, it is incomplete. She said "ok, maybe this time it wouldn't backfire BUT WE CAN'T HAVE ONE ANYWAY."

It's... kind of a big difference. Saint would not have seen the T&T as a better world. It was just not who she was. Granted, if she had lived it was possible for her to change – but I personally find it very unlikely. She was old, and she had held on to her beliefs strongly enough for all her life that she could use them to have a Domain. Kairos may have ensured her death, but her taking that stand was an act of freely determined will.

agumentic

Who knows, at this point. I think moving from "Truce with the enemy will backfire in all cases" to "Truce with the enemy will backfire in 99% of cases" is already a significant movement that showed the possibility of Saint of Swords changing further. Maybe she would continue to stand on her position that continuing the truce will ensure worse future. Or maybe she could've accepted the current Truce&Terms as the one that won't backfire, and then one more, and then one more until an agreement on rules of engagement wouldn't seem like a sin.

But the point is, I think Saint of Sword was a more considerate and thoughtful person than current MK, and so it's unlikely that it's the sword made of her that influences him to behave like he is.

Tek

She never denied that some Villains can be cooperated with. She argued that ultimately such a precedent wasn't worth establishing, because far more people would be hurt by Villains weaseling in under the pretence of cooperation and slowly corrupting the society from inside by abusing human inherent flaws to keep away from a heroic eye.

agumentic

She denied that before the Third Llesse. Her argument at the end of it was the one you just said, and, like I mentioned in my post, I think that opinion could've changed as well.

TeK

I am going by my memory hear, but I don't think she never discarded possibility that one in a thousand Villains can be worked with. She said there never should be a truce with an Enemy, not that there never could be one.

agumentic

No, she was pretty insistent that truce with the villains will backfire due to their actions afterwards. It's only after their journey she amended that to "It will backfire if we take the actions of the future generations into the account".

TeK

That doesn't sound like she changed her views on cooperation with Villains, it sounds like she changed her views on Catherine.

agumentic

Changing from "There are no villains we can cooperate with and not get burned" to "There are almost no villains we can cooperate with and not get burned" sounds like a change in views on cooperation with villains to me. It still lead her to the same conclusion, but they are not the same.

TeK

She, uh, didn't think she won't get burned by cooperating with Cat in the end. That's, uh, was the whole reason she died.

TeK

Also, Saint had such strong beliefs that they allowed her to replace the laws of Creation and you think that those beliefs could not possibly influence a young adult without any real beliefs in desperate need for clarity and certainty?

agumentic

They can, possibly. I just don't think that this possibility is true. MK is not doing anything just having a powerful sword couldn't do.

Salt

I think what he's trying to get at is that the Saint having had such strong beliefs makes it more likely that the beliefs themselves are part of the Sword, not just her abilities.

agumentic

I understand – Cat herself said that she felt something like a grudge from a sword, so a trace of Saint of Swords remaining in it is likely. I just don't think that this trace bears much of a responsibility for MK's behaviour.

Sam

The sword isn't Lawrence, though. It's Sever. It's the harshest, sharpest edge of Lawrence, distilled into a sword. It's hardly out of the question that it's missing the considerate, thoughtful bits of her personality, while keeping the harder aspects.

'Ladi Williams

Lol. She isn't influencing him.

He's just a weak willed indecisive waste of grace who's power set and shiny armor made him have some influence on the younger heros that don't know wassup...that is too dumb to even realise what he is.

Now that he's found a powerful sword. He bliv that validates all his delusions to grandeur and a way to correct every imagined slight he feels has been offered to him.

He blivs might makes right and so bcos I have the "baddest" sword and shiniest armor...I must be right and and know the will of "above" and so therefore you must all listen to me and follow what I say.

Unfortunately.

TeK

To be fair, this is a world where narrative turns into a reality. "I was given power by luck therefore I am chosen by Heavens: is not such a ridiculous position when Heavens manipulating luck is an established fact.

erebus42

Fair, but there's no sign of that being a sure thing so that sort of thinking like much heroic thinking can easily get very tautological. It makes me think of #34 of the Two Hundred Heroic Axioms, "It's not grave robbing if it was your destiny to have that artifact, just proactive inheritance"

TeK

No sign of that being a sure thing? Have we been reading the same story?

erebus42

Yes but what I'm saying is that we have seen luck change hands between parties with opposing goals and have had heroes who have worked at cross purposes so while things have worked out in certain ways it doesn't necessarily mean that it was the "will of the heavens".

laguz24

I really hope that when Christophe plans on drawing the sword it remains stuck and he loses the one thing that gave him this delusion of grandeur. I also love Hanno being the voice of reason.

MsEvildoom

I wouldn't hold out hope. If there's any of Saint left in the sword, she will completely support anyone who refuses to compromise with Below, and damn the consequences. Actually, has anyone asked if the sword could be influencing its wielder?

Nairne .01

That would honestly be a very interesting twist.

Adrian_V

Wow, is this like watching a train wreck? At least we see most of them would side against MK in this, hell with that last low blow of using Nephele's death he may have actually put more doubts into BoM's head and lost him (also nice to see he at least has that much of a spine).

Oh and i really wanted to meet Helmgard, and she didn't dissappoint, her relationship with Adanna is funny as hell, and oh god Archer is so going to find out thanks to VS about how they led the HM around xD, i can see her and Cat's reaction xD

zenanii

I would like to see MK trying to talk Viv into turning on Cat. She has already followed one idiot waving around a magic sword while spouting the virtues of righteousness, another one is not going to impress her.

zenanii

Hm, didn't mean for this to be a reply.

Salt

We might get to see him attempt talking "sense" into Cordelia Hasenbach as well. I'd be very much interested to see how the most practically competent First Prince the country has had in a hundred years, would react to a large child with a sword trying "educate her on the facts".

Mental Mouse

Also, he really doesn't understand how things work – Viv was a Hero who then lost her Name, and he wants her to be the judge and adjudicator for the Villains? he seems to be figuring that "she's on the same side as Cat, therefore she's obviously just as much a Villain as Cat, and everyone who disagrees with Me is obviously wrong..."

Frivolous

Hero vs Hero fight! Hero vs Hero fight! Hero vs Hero fight!

There are more Proceran heroes that I expected. We already knew about the Mirror Knight and the Rogue Sorcerer, but the Bitter Blacksmith and the Blind Maker also appear to be Proceran.

vernal.ancient

"She lied to us," Christophe said. "Do you not see?"

The Blind Maker cleared his throat.

Very embarrassed I missed that joke first time around, assumed Christophe's reaction was just him being an uptight idiot as usual. Granted, he's still being an uptight idiot, but there was an actual joke there to misinterpret rather than just him flying off the handle at someone clearing their throat

LizAris

Okay that went completely over my head but it's hilarious now. Poor Maker. Nothing more insufferable than a hero who doesn't have a sense of humor

vernal.ancient

I have nothing to base this off of except that one quote, but I'm now imagining Blind Maker as an old, male Toph Beifong in terms of personality, who constantly finds himself surrounded by people who either don't get his blind jokes or just get huffy over them instead of seeing the humor 😊

TeK

Yeah, I had to reread that part because I was confused why he would say he was mocked.

wabbitking

OH boy here we go place your bets now folks.

grzecho2222

I bet that Kingfishers and Cat secret will come out at the most funny moment

nick012000

Looks like the Mirror Knight is planning on being the heroic version of the "flying castle" Villains that the Accords are intended to put down by ganging up on them with a combined force of Heroes and Villains.

Nairne .01

There is nothing heroic about him at this point. Sure slapping 7 demons around was heroic and brave, but now he is on the cusp of being an Oathbreaker. Good for him.

Frivolous

It occurs to me that, if this meeting devolves into an outright battle between heroes, that Below is winning.

Below is winning not, as you may think, because it's in the interest of Evil for Good to fight itself, but because (I assume) Good's precept is that Right Makes Might. On the other hand, if a fight breaks out, , clearly the victors will set policy, and therefore Might Makes Right,

That's Christophe's worst mistake at this junction. By turning a peaceful meeting into a battle where virtue does not matter and only the strongest prevail, he is unwittingly following Below's precepts, not Above's. He might as well be Praesi and believe in Amadeus's saying of Only one grace, victory, and only one sin, defeat.

zhaláad

The sword is heavier than the crown, innit

vernal.ancient

Agreed, though of course anyone who does believe that Right Makes Might will simply argue that the winners were victorious because they were the "true" heroes and thus were granted the power to achieve victory by providence/ The Gods Above. Isn't it a lovely logical conundrum? Justifies pretty much anything for the hero who doesn't think too hard

Abrakadabra

It is the same argument the British empire used in their conquest. We won, therefore God was on our side, because nothing can happen against his will. Which justifies the conquest itself. The same argument is used by a bunch of rich people nowadays, claiming that they are rich BECAUSE God is with them, and poor people therefore deserve their lot in life, since everything is ordained by God to be that way. That is predestination for you in a nutshell.

Nairne .01

That's like a serial killer saying "I was able to kill so many people, and God allowed me to so aim not bad"

TeK

You guys do realise that unlike in our world, in Guideverse Gods are an objective reality?

vernal.ancient

Yes, though as Hanno states in this chapter, quite a few people make mutually exclusive claims about the will of the gods, and are often quite certain about it. Just because the gods exist doesn't mean that whoever won the latest fight is automatically in their favor

thearpox23

>He might as well be Praesi
no

>and believe in Amadeus's doubly no

>saying of Only one grace, victory, and only one sin, defeat. The whole point behind the saying was that the methods do not matter so long as the proper outcome is reached. Alienating everyone is as far away as can be from securing a victory, and has nothing in common with Amadeus.

He could maybe be compared to your standard Black Knight, but even then Praesi are well known for deriving strength to be deceit, and MK hasn't coated his blade is nearly enough poison.

KpaxMaJI

He killed seven demons, sure. But, he is the one who brought them into the Arsenal in the first place. Why is no one asking him where did the demons come from? And frankly he is to blame for the Repentant Magisters death.

WuseMajor

Thanks to the Absence, no-one remembers where the demons came from and they keep forgetting to go back and try to figure it out.

Though....hmmm.... It's at least theoretically possible that he's blaming the Black Queen because if it's HER fault, then it's not HIS fault and this is the only way he can avoid falling into a pit of despair and self pity.

Well, and the Bard is still playing him like her fiddle.

Bart

I honestly hate all this talk about wishing Christophe dead. That's Black Knight thinking – if it doesn't fit, kill it.

The Mirror Knight is a representation of things that will be genuine threats to Cat's dreams. Heroes who won't abide by the Accords without being in control – heroes who won't trust villains who've made explicit attempts to craft personas of trickery and violence.

We get to see Cat from the inside. Hanno, Roland, and The Prince all have deep relationships with the Woe that let them understand the nuance. But Christophe only has his doubt, his fear, and his understanding that this is a Villain who seems to be able to let other villains off the hook for arranging an attack that left hundreds dead while a woman who killed her rapist is to be executed. Yes, he's short sighted and yes he seems almost wilfully blind to what's going on in the grand scheme – but that's hardly his fault.

If Cat can't bring someone like Christophe on side, her dreams are dead on arrival.

Frivolous

Cat's dreams were always based on deterring the behavior of and eventually removing "from play" the villains and heroes that were too destructive, the ones who couldn't play well with others.

The Saint of Swords was clearly never going to accede to the Liesse Accords if she were alive. Christophe is turning out to be the same type.

You could say that eliminating someone like Christophe from existence was her goal all along, though I don't know if the intransigence and the willingness to burn the village in order to save it come from his mere personality or is a function of his Name.

If it comes from his Name, Catherine's goal would likely remove the Name of Mirror Knight from appearing at all.

Reference: <https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2019/09/13/chapter-75-analog/>

"This is more than rules of engagement," the White Knight said, "this is a blade swung at the most callous servants of Above and Below. Within a few generations of grand gestures being harshly answered by all other powers, you would excise that entire manner of thinking from the Named on Calernia."

Bart

Right – within generations. And Saint was only killed after she explicitly attacked Cat. Not when she was difficult to deal with, not when she disagreed, when she tried to kill Cat.

You don't get rid of a way of thinking by killing those who think it. You get rid of a way of thinking by proving it wrong. After the Accords are signed, that can include leading large groups of people who already believe the idea is wrong and striking at those who break the rules.

But in the interim? She can't use what will happen in generations to try and strike Christophe down. She can't just kill him. He's Big Shiny Leader With Artifact Sword. That's got so much power in it – and the story that others here will be twisted if Cat isn't there to guide it. If she kills him, even with good reason, there will be lots of heroes who only hear the first part. Little Christophe's who use that death as more evidence.

But if they can get him on side, Christophe can help guide all the potential Saints down another path.

Truthhut

I personally don't want MK killed, but I desperately want him humbled. Which is why much of this chapter has been very cathartic, at least to me. Whether or not MK can be remodeled into something actually useful, he still deserves a good smack upside the head.

Bart

Humbled is good – but I want a humbling that's productive, which I don't think this was. Catharsis is what we want, but in our chase to get it we often forget what we need

vernal.ancient

I agree with basically everything except the idea that him being willfully blind isn't his fault. It is, by definition. That's what makes it willful

Bart

When I said 'almost willfully blind' I could have found a better term.

What I meant was it LOOKS like he's being wilfully ignorant, but it's more about his name/upbringing than him making the conscious choice of it.

Like, I don't think he says to himself 'The bribe is probably an overall good thing but I'm going to ignore that', and I don't think he says 'Cat is actually making the right choice by accepting the bribe in the big picture but I'm going to ignore that'.

I think those things are just... Impossible for him to grasp without assistance that he's not getting.

Nafram

This here is the final Affray, the card that fell out of the Bard's sleeve, the one neither Masego nor Cat noticed. And I hope that the abomination loses it

Captain Amazing

I think Hakram is going to wake up and talk Christophe out of doing something stupid. At the last hour the hero recovers and saves the day! Also, "Christophe" literally has Christ in it and is likely derived from it. This is interesting as I don't think any other biblical names have been used such as Joseph, Luke, or Mary. These "gods" probably kidnapped people a thousand or so years ago and aped their beliefs; all the nonhumans have notably distinct appellations. Levant says we need to strive to serve the faith which is one of the pillars of Islam. Christophe's name seems to be an outlier in this as it directly references older beliefs instead of the usurpers.

TeK

I don't think you need to bother about etymology in the word where principalities of Brabant, Hainaut, Aquitaine, Bremen, Bayeux and Tenerife are a thing, there are towns such as Aksum and Kahtan in Praes (admittedly Praesi names are much less on the nose than Principate ones, well, at least he tried), there are polises of Nicae, Helike and in the Dominion of Levant (already a reference to a real world place) there are towns of Malaga and Alava, and so on and so forth.

Name Catherine has very much Christian origins too.

Draylen

As a point, while the name Christopher (and its derivatives, such as Kristoff – or Christophe, here – , a very common German name) does come from Christ, that wasn't a name. Christ was a title, or I suppose a Name, which translates to Anointed One, and mostly translated to Prophet.

Of course, it probably has different etymology here, although it's also fair to point out that Christophe was anointed by the Lady of the Lake and asserted other fae(?) Things. Point being, it isn't actually biblical here, so there isn't a major connection in that way.

vernal.ancient

Eh, that's the same etymology problem that came up with the Tenth Crusade, where crusade relates to the Cross when there's no indications of a major religious figure getting crucified in Calernia's history. Seems less an intentional bit of world building and more just it being difficult to completely avoid words with etymologies based in Christianity

Shveiran

That was justified, actually: the first crusade was born to fight Triumphant, and Triumphant crucified people. The Empress brought the punishment from Praes to the rest of Calernia.

The cross was adopted as a symbol by the crusaders because of tha, which serves as a justification for the name "crusade".

TeK

EE even said that crucifixion was brought in by Miezans and it was a punishment for rowdy slaves. Given that Miezans are pretty much Romans, and Romans used that exact same punishment for mostly the same reason, well, guess what.

TeK

But, if we are talking etymology, let's look at his last name. De Pavanie. Hmm. There is a word in French (which is who Alamans are based on, and MK is Alaman) Pavane, which means "strut about".

Hmm...

Nairne .01

How fitting.

Abrakadabra

I Just guess our tortured mutilated orc full with prosthetics Just walks up to MK and sais to him: "Christoph, I am your father."

TheAtomicOption

So much for getting The Severance back. I'm genuinely pissed off at the mirrored idiot to the point that I had to stop reading and walk around for a bit before I could finish. There are going to be some nasty twists to this story because of that moron.

hakureireimu

Ok...so how does the epigraph relates to this chapter?

vernal.ancient

Well, Christophe would argue that it applies to Catherine, while Hanno probably needs to see that it really applies to Christophe, who is being unrepentant in idiocy and intentionally destabilizing the Terms that he swore an oath to uphold

TeK

I feel like it's a jab at people who continue to defend Cristophe despite, well, Cristophe. I feel personally attacked.

Darkening

It could also be referring to how, if they forgave the unrepentant red axe and let her go as Christophe wants, she would definitely start murdering more villains, like a wolf in a flock of sheep.

Raved Thrad

Ah, Christophe, Christophe, I so love to hate you. You may not be a Proceran noble, but you're every bit as bad.

If the Heroes were to break faith and Callow marched home, Christophe would be exactly the kind of person to sit wallowing in the ashes of Procer wailing at the injustice of it all, and how the people he'd insulted and offended should have stayed to back him up and die for him.

Maybe this kind of stupid arrogance is a sexually-transmitted disease?

Frivolous

Speaking of sex... I think much of this episode could have been averted if Catherine had simply had the foresight to request a sexy girl villain to seduce Christophe and Antoine and fuck their brains out.

Their self-righteousness is in part due to their priggishness. They might be much more congenial towards villains if a villain gave them orgasms. They could even have an MFM threesome. That way Antoine could gaze into Christophe's eyes while screwing and thus fulfill his probable homoerotic ardor for the older hero.

Raved Thrad

Unfortunately, I can see that ending in blood as soon as the girl's Villain status was revealed.

"What? What do you mean you're a Villain?"

"Did you actually think 'Sexy Fucker' was a Hero Name?"

"You Damned whore!" stabbity-stab with the Severance

Afterward, looking down at the mangled, dismembered body:

"Aaaah! I have been tricked by Below! It can't possibly have been my fault for being an arrogant, intolerant bigot! Aaaah! I MUST KILL EVERYONE!"

sutortyrannus

Well, this was an adventure.

framfrit

Does anyone else find it amusing that Cat was just complaining about the Procrean policies for character besmirching what with the arch heretic and friend to the dead king stuff and here MK does the same with Roland WK sympathises and notes its one reason why they distrust Procer

Drunken Dwarf

Ok guys let's stop bullying Mirror Knight for a second and just think about the chapter here. Like just wow. That was Mirror Knight with providence on his side.

Oshi

Not it very much wasn't That was the Mirror Knight dooing everything in his power to make a play for the authority to lead the heroes. He wanted a confrontation with the White Knight. This is how he plans to force eevryone to break with th T&T. It was Bar'ds intent to make sure MK was as broken as possible before taking up the sword so he could break what Catherine made.

WuseMajor

I find it darkly amusing that Christophe is, arguably, the only living person (other than the Bard) who bears the responsibility for getting the Repentant Magister killed, seeing as he brought the Maddened Keeper there.

Of course, no-one remembers that because of the demon, so he gets to be all high and mighty about it.

I do wish that they'd go back over the timeline and events that happened in order to try to get some idea of what the demon might have erased, since that might actually pinpoint his involvement (without her skills there's basically no way the Mirror Knight could have gotten here uninvited, and an exploration of that might trace things in a useful way), but it's probably difficult to do when you keep forgetting that you need to handle it.

Nairne .01

Also it was he that let the demon that killed her slip from him so in truth he fucked up twice.

Konstantin von Karstein

To be fair, there was 7 others, so he was a little busy at the moment.

Anonymous

So, Hakram is probably going to save the day, isn't he? And it seems we're still due for the revelation that Red Axe is Constance.

IIRC the Doddering Sage also hinted at the slow-cooking revelation that Catherine is actually the long-lost daughter of King Robert. Well, there have been a number of hints to that effect for a long time, one of the earlier (but not earliest) hints being Catherine drawing the sword from the stone, a story where the sword can only be pulled from the stone by the rightful heir to Callow, and the Black Knight's claim wasn't rightful by any means, but if Catherine was the unwitting orphan daughter of the late king, she would've come into that story extremely hard.

grzecho2222

I'm not sure about her being daughter of king, but there sure is some weird thing/ revelation about Cats family. From missing bell in Book 2 to strange interactions with duchess and her family.

Anonymous

There have been a lot of hints to that effect, including multiple mentions of speculation that she might've been the daughter of Robert. And one of the blinding factors is that being the orphan daughter of the late king does not fit as a villain's backstory, but she was originally seeded by Above to be the heroine who would lead the fight for Callow's freedom. She took an unusual road and became a villain instead, but that only changes the present and future, not the past. She has a heroine's backstory, not a villain's.

grzecho2222

Still Kegan and others act very weird around her, in way that doesn't look like Cat is related to the late King, but more like she is somehow related to them, like her being Villain is a personal insult to them

Anonymous

Cat is half-Deoraithe. She is likely related to both of them, in a way that would give her considerable authority. She was originally intended to unify Callow beneath her banner.

grzecho2222

Question is who remains in story that could spring that revelation and why?

Javvies

As to how someone could have learned about Cat's biological family origins ... it likely would have been or would be simple enough for someone to summon another blood imp or whatever it was that Warlock summoned to identify the Deoraithe Cat and company captured after Lone Swordsman and idiots tried to burn down the city and Warlock's tower to get a shot at assassinating Warlock.

There may or may not also be other methods of magically determining lineage that would be applicable.

As for who did it and why, that would probably be dependent on when it was done.

I could totally see Amadeus as having Warlock do it when Cat was being healed after her first dabbling in autonecromantic ambulation, and then leaving that a secret to be revealed later.

I don't think Heiress/Diabolist would have done it because she likely would have attacked Cat more directly if she had a sample of Cat's blood, although trying to track down Cat's biofamily to use as leverage would also have been in character.

Malicia could easily have had it done, which might contribute to her lack of trust in Amadeus's plan for Cat and Callow.

Anonymous

Doddering Sage, at least. Maybe Augur too. Wandering Bard, if she was aware of it and up to weird shit, but I doubt that or she would've handled Catherine very differently. Scribe, if she's been researching Catherine while offscreen. I feel like the Truce & Terms (as well as the Liesse Accords) would naturally attract her, but who knows. And in Callow, there are plenty of ways for someone to appear who has found out her genealogy. Maybe even the orphanage's matron knows a concealed thing or two about her past.

As for why, the legitimacy of Catherine's rule is being tested and Catherine is about to come into her own Name. I mean this chapter gives us one solid scenario why. Mirror Knight sends into motion an effort to discredit the legitimacy of Catherine's rule. Maybe Malicia will get in on that too.

grzecho2222

True, Cat being revealed to be Lost Heir while MK is trying to kick her out would be funny, but still not seeing who could have reason to reveal something like this and potential ability to learn this

Javvies

Akua would have had motive to investigate Cat's biological family back when she was Heiress or Diabolist.

Duchess Kegan Iarsme of Daoine has had plenty of motivation to investigate Cat's biological family.

Amadeus and/or Scribe, could already know and just be sitting on the information until a useful time to reveal it.

Malicia could have found out, which likely would have contributed to her distrust of Amadeus's plan for Cat and Callow.

Hakram could perhaps use Find to investigate Cat's biofamily, if he wanted to or had some reason to do so.

As for how, remember how Warlock summoned a blood imp or whatever it was to find out that the Deoraithe that Cat and company captured in the wake of Lone Swordsman and company's failed assassination attempt on Warlock.

It'd probably take someone with Praesi magical training – certainly nobody from the Above aligned places is likely to have the knowledge or training to summon a blood imp.

However, I would not be surprised to learn that there were other magical methods of determining lineage that others could more readily utilize.

Cordelia would be interested in the knowledge, though I suspect that none of her intelligence services could have found out, although Augur probably could have.

Tariq might have been able to find out via Behold and/or the Ophanim.

Bard would probably have tried to find out, though it's not clear what kind of information sources she has access to, and she's an incredibly unreliable source, and likely would not share that information unless it served her purposes somehow.

grzecho2222

I know that there are several parties that can get that info, but I was talking more about reason for such reveal since it wouldn't change situation a lot

Callow would still stand by Cat

Procer would be what – bit less rude maybe?
Praes wouldn't care
Levant the same
Named – aside from Keeper, none seems to be from Callow (weird), so they also wouldn't care

vernal.ancient

Who's Constance?

Anonymous

>"It's not for you, Constance," the Doddering Sage told me.
"You're much too young, and this is a fool's vice besides."
>
>"Shit," Archer muttered. "Not a good day."
>
> [...]
>
>"That boy of yours, the one with the deadly earnestness, he'll be a terror one day," the Sage said, "but he's a few years short still. That's why an old sack of bones like me are brought in even when there are all these swaggering youths. I can look, yes I can. But you'll not hurt Constance, will you? Promise me."
>
>His lip trembled in sudden emotion, and something in me clenched. He looked fragile, in that moment, though the truth of his fragility was hidden from him. Pity welled up, but I pushed it down. You could be playing me, I thought. And so I'll offer kindness where I can, but never without keeping a knife in hand.
>
>"I won't," I said. "I promise."
>
>"Good," he muttered. "Good. You do remind me of him, you know. Robert. He was kind, but he was not soft."
>
>I said nothing, for there was nothing to say.

Chapter 16: Divine

Oshi

I'm not loving the direction this is going. From a narrative perspective it feels like EE is going to diminish the White Knight in order to get Catherine in enough trouble. I don't think that's good reading. I hope EE decides to go a different route but so far it's exactly on track to where I thought it would be.
sighs

Letouriste

Weird, I see it as the exact opposite. EE is reinforcing Hano. The part about him still trying to be just without his angels backing him and also him getting the Severance sword after this mess is dealt with. Would set a precedent where the Heroic leader wield the Severance and it get transmitted to each future generation.

zenanii

I would like to see MK trying to talk Viv into turning on Cat. She has already followed one idiot waving around a magic sword while spouting the virtues of righteousness, another one is not going to impress her.

Raved Thrad

Also, he's so Proceran that he thinks he can force Callowans to die for him and his country. Vivienne is patriotic and Callowan enough that I can see her trying to arrange for him to be assassinated just for that.

Salt

Hilariously enough, Callowans would hate him because they're just as rabidly nationalistic as he is. Any perception of a Proceran anything trying to push around anointed rulers of Callow would have every man, woman, and child in a frothing rage.

Raved Thrad

In a frothing rage for generations.

vernal.ancient

Honestly, I want Christophe to survive and have kids now, just so the epilogue can leap forward eighty years to his teenage grandson getting punched out by a random Callowan who heard about the crap MK pulled and decided "Ya know what? I'm just the person to answer that"

Raved Thrad

"Michel de Pavanie?"

From where he was bent over inspecting the wheel on his wagon, Michel looked up to see a man, a foreigner by the looks of him, holding what appeared to be a rolled-up piece of parchment. Noticing the man looking on at him expectantly, he replied. "Yes, I am Michel de Pavanie."

The blow that laid him out on his back, head spinning from the impact, came out of nowhere.

"Your grandfather was an asshole."

Groaning, looking up from where he had fallen, he saw the stranger make a mark on the parchment before he wandered off, muttering about finding the next person on the list.

mamm0nn

We haven't been getting enough Long Prices for Small Sights lately. I actually expected a Callowan Hero that supports his queen Catherine, but who maintains that motto and thus causes political problems for her to have shown up by now.

Nairne .01

Can't wait to see how this will unfold.

Aotrs Commander

I think pretty much everyone has already said everything that I would have said on That Moron, so I will instead focus on something else:

AHAHAHAHAHAHAHAHA! Blacksmith and Artificer were winding up the Hunted Magician this whole time! That's fuckin' (literally) priceless!

(Seriously, though, a few more heroes with some more mischief in 'em makes them more likeable than the failure of Certain Other Quarters. Who would be enough to make Superman want to punch them out. He wouldn't of course (more's the pity), but he gosh-darned well would want to...)

Daniel E

This chapter warms the cackles of my little evil heart. grabs popcorn

Big I

I can't help but see Hanno as Obi Wan and Christophe as Anakin. I guess that makes the Blade of Mercy Ahsoka?

So I guess Mirror Knight is going to challenge White Knight for the job of representative. If Mirror Knight wins it'll be a godawful mess because he's probably the least suitable person for the job, and every thing about it would frustrate him anyway. And if he loses, he stewes in his own bitterness and insecurity. Either way he's on the road to the darkside.

I predict that the Blade of Mercy will be the one to take down the Mirror Knight when he goes full blown Tyrant.

TeK

But who's the younglings?

Dak

Nephele is. Since Christophe got her killed.

RoflCat

Nah, Nephele is more of Mace Windu if we consider Bard as Palpatine.

mavant

Were there seven-and-one demons locked up inside the Maddened Keeper? 7 for Christophe and one for Masego?

I feel like every time I see seven of something in this story there must be an "and one" not long to follow.

Big I

There were 8 eight demons, the Wandering Bard said so.

mamm0nn

Seven slain by MK, one slain by Cat and co. Remember the fear demon?

Letouriste

I'm running out of popcorn 🍿

flashburn283

Please, to whatever Choir is listening, make the MK DK fight be a mutual kill so, crazy idea about MK. Namely, that he might be getting screwed over by his own aspect in being made into an asshole.

JackSlainXIX

The logic goes like this: the heavens are said to be entirely static. The number of angels and choirs don't change, and what they represent doesn't change either. They also represent different kinds of ideals: Mercy is the Greater Good, Judgment is Justice, Contrition is Repentance, and so on. Light is the power of the heavens, made into a rawer and unaligned form handed out to mortals. That means that it's nature is informed by the nature of the heavens. As an aside, this explains how Light based healing works and it's limitations: it's trying to bring an individual to a more ideal state of healthiness as understood by the priest wielding the Light.

MK's most important aspect is Dawn, which infuses his body with a small bit of light every day. My theory is that what that light is doing is less making him strong and more bringing him closer to an "ideal" form, as he understood it at the time the aspect appeared. It also makes him more resistant to deviation from that ideal, which is what makes him so durable: his ideal form doesn't include injuries so his body resists those.

The thing is, is that power always has a downside or flaw. In MK's case, I suspect that the light isn't just altering his body but also his mind, bringing it closer to what MK believed to be an "ideal" state of mind or mindset when he first started. He probably didn't consider that part of the effect too much though, and therefore didn't cover any personality flaws (like arrogance or not knowing how to talk to people). The real danger here is the resistance to change. As he grows in power, his mindset becomes more and more set in stone. Symptoms would include a growing inability to change his mind once a decision has been reached, inability to learn new things, and inability to understand or consider other points of view from his own. Of course, I could be completely off base and he's just that much of an asshole.

Shveiran

Or, you know, he could just be an asshole.

I don't mean to put down your theory, honestly; but assholes exists. He could be one without any real metaphysical explanation being required.

JackSlainXIX

certainly possible. It's just something that occurred to me because all the other asshole heroes we've seen so far have, in my eyes, at least an understandable aspect to the assholery/stupidity. The two main ones that come to mind are the lone swordsman and the saint of swords. William's came primarily in the shape of his racism and no restraint, which I felt is at least understandable as the residue of centuries of war leaving behind attitudes (racism doesn't disappear just because the environment changes, as in real life) combined with the view of "i'm damned anyway so no need to be overly moral" mixed with "no truce or surrender to evil". The saint of swords has basically been dealing with heiress wannabes and lookalikes (metaphorically) for decades, and to be fair princes were kinda overly ambitious assholes before DK got moving (the two main demonstrations of assholery on her part from our perspective).

MK however, doesn't have either of those to explain his assholery here. There's no background to him being so unreasonable as far as I can see (and feel free to correct me) beyond "I'm an overly self-righteous stereotype of procer and will not compromise just because". And sure, it's possible that he's just that kind of asshole by character, but I feel that that would make him the first character in APGtE that lacks depth to his motivations.

Hitogami

That cliff at the end! Wow!
Thanks for such a damn good chapter.

ninegardens

So... its been mentioned that MK is like... super ultra indestructible...
And also that he USED TO BE immune to glamours, until he broke his oath of chastity or whatever....

So I wonder, are any of his other power ups oath based? And if they are, which oaths are they based upon... and is breaking those oaths the way to bring him down?

Javvies

I think that was an additional buff, in addition to, and not reliant upon, his Name.
That is, a blessing from the Lady of the Lake to help him in his duties, so as to not require his Name to burn an Aspect or power on glamour resistance/immunity.
There may or may not be additional such powers/defenses/blessings that he received that rely on him following certain behavioral rules.

They would, however, be in addition to what his Name gives him. The biggest booster he's got that we're know of is his Dawn Aspect, which makes him a little stronger and tougher every single Dawn.

I suspect that if he broke any other oaths/strictures governing any buff s he's got he'd still be a powerhouse because of his Name.

Unless said oath, stricture, rule, e.t.c was a prerequisite for gaining the Name Mirror Knight in the first place. Which probably wouldn't be impossible ... and might be related to why he's so gung ho to trash things – he already broke the rules on not getting laid, he might be worried that if he doesn't do what he's doing he'll break another, more serious rule, or cross some sort of threshold that would inflict greater penalties or loss of powers/defenses/blessings on him, possibly going as far as losing the Name of Mirror Knight.

mamm0nn

Just to put it out there: Evil's mantra is Might makes Right vs good's Right makes Might. And right now, Mirror Knight is using his Might to enforce what he considers Right and brute-forcing his due and opinion, instead of being aided and strengthened in Might by doing Right.

MK is not just failing to see and work with politics, and can be excused because it's all greys and complicated. He's a Hero properly educated in how Chosen and Good work, but he's ignoring the core principle of being Chosen. And by using his Might he's by no stretch of the imagination just unaware of or overlooking his faults or can be excused for not understanding it, he's actively putting his opinion and desires over principles and systems that he does understand.

There's no 'Oh, he's just an idiot.' excuse for him any more, he's gone too far into being in the wrong here.

Mental Mouse

Indeed, he's on the edge of becoming a Fallen Hero. Alas, I don't think he can be the next Black Knight, because that's a Praesi Name.

ChillyPepper

I can say many things about Erraticerrata writing, but the way s/he writes heroes to be so gut boiling aggravating shows enough about it.

God damn it, man, why do you have to make me this angry against fictional entities?

Adrian_V

Next chapter: villain's meeting

Cat: Alright people we are here for something extremely important

Random villain: We are going to spy on the heroes meeting right?

Cat: Yep!!

mamm0nn

Wait, I thought we only rubbed out hands menacingly and lisp 'Yesss...' for a couple of hours during these meetings while monologueing to one another? Throws a questioning glance at chairman Hierophant who usually organises the Villain meetings

Adrian_V

And practice our mad laughs in a safe enviroment!!

NerfGlaistigUaine

Mirror Knight thinks Callow's forces would keep fighting if heroes force the Black Queen to step down? In the defense of Procer? Out of duty? Good lord what has this man been smoking and where can I get some?

Black Spiral Dancer

Just passing here to congratulate. After some lukewarm chapters, this one had my blood boiling again as usual.

Also very nice discussion in the comments, I would advise anyone to give them a read this time.

Interlude: Epitomes

"For though the Gods Above laid down the path of righteousness for all to see, so did the Gods Below then lay down a hundred others that look just like it."

– Extract from the 'Truths of the Shore', a collection of the teachings of Arianna Galadon (considered holy text only in Procer)

Hanno would have to be very careful, to ensure Christophe de Pavanie was alive by the end of this.

Even as half a dozen shouts erupted in the wake of the Mirror Knight's challenge, the dark-skinned man wondered if he should first have spoken with the other knight alone. No, he decided. That, too, would have been a mistake. It would have been treating Christophe like a sickness to be quarantined instead of comrade whose doubts needed to be allayed. Hanno was no more lord over heroes than heroes were lords over Creation, and though the demands of experience often saw him walk the fine line between stewardship and government he must never cross it willingly.

"Sit down, Christophe," the Vagrant Spear called out, "this is-"

"-ful Gods, I will punch the sense back int-"

"Silence," the White Knight said.

The ripple of power in his voice sucked the cacophony out of the room, as if by magic. The Mirror Knight stood ramrod straight, as if the outpouring of anger had been a matter of indifference to him, but the slight hunch to his shoulders spoke otherwise.

Still, for all the red colouring his cheeks Christophe did not desist. Pride was the stone around his neck, and now Hanno would have to find a way to ensure it did not end up drowning him. First, however, the venom must be drawn out. The White Knight did not rise to his feet, or react beyond turning his head to properly address the other Named. Christophe watched him with strained eyes, his light brown hair harried.

The angle of his arms ensured the polished bracers he wore on his wrists reflected only a muddled haze.

"Let us avoid misunderstandings," Hanno calmly said. "What is it that you mean, Christophe, by 'I will not allow it'?"

"How many of us need to die before you face the truth of what you made us part of?" the Mirror Knight said. "The Exalted Poet was shot in the back by one of the Woe, and who here has said even a word of it?"

"He was a traitor," the Blessed Artificer coldly said. "Good riddance."

She looked more conflicted than her words might indicate, Hanno thought, but here and now she'd chosen anger over qualms. Few in the rooms shared her apprehensions, given that the man had been seen working with the fae of the Court of Autumn. Whatever his reasons, he'd sided with creatures that had slain soldiers and broken works dedicated to the end of the Dead King. That in the process he'd tried to betray two heroes had seen his memory grow increasingly reviled: the Vagrant Spear's face had gone icy at the mention of the Name, for she was Levantine as well and had taken the betrayal as a slight on the honour of Levant as a whole.

"Traitor to what, exactly?" Christophe de Pavanie said, voice just short of a shout. "To the rules and designs of a Damned? To 'terms' that would see us murder a woman for slaying her own rapist?"

"You have not answered the White Knight's question," the Kingfisher Prince cut in, voice measured. "Are you threatening to take up arms to enforce your will, Christophe de Pavanie?"

The fair-haired prince's hand had slipped, ever so slightly towards the sword at his hip. Hanno thought better of his comrades than to expect they would brawl like tavern drunks but, should there be fighting, he suspected it was not the Prince of Brus that would be the victor there. The Kingfisher Prince's role was a martial one, but also soldierly in nature. He could turn a company of riders into an unbreakable lance or fight as a champion for his host, but he would not be the equal of the Mirror Knight in a duel.

"Let him speak," the Forlorn Paladin hesitantly said. "Or has it now become a sin to even speak against the Terms?"

"Why bother? This isn't a vote," the Bitter Blacksmith bluntly replied. "No point in pretending otherwise, the Terms are there to stay. We can whine about it all we like, but at the end of the day I'd rather share a room with a villain than a Revenant."

"How often are we going to be made to bow our heads using that argument?" the Mirror Knight asked, turning to her and sweeping the room with his gaze. "Accept this, or the Dead King takes us all. So first we welcome crooks. Then we welcome thieves, then rapists, then murderers – and Gods only know what comes after that. What single thing can we not be made to swallow, when it is put to contrast with the end of days?"

"Spoken like a child of summer," the Bitter Blacksmith said, tone gone hard. "There is no bargain to be had with the night: do what needs to be done or disappear."

She was not the only here there to have doubts, though Christophe's appeal had not been without impact. Neither was it without sense, Hanno knew. It was all too easy to justify all manners of cruelty by drawing some invisible path linking their avoidance to the victory of Keter. Yet that was no excuse to ignore what still lay just beyond the horizon, waiting for a misstep. It did not surprise the Ashuran that it was Roland who gave further answer, for few among them better understood what still lay ahead of them all.

"We contrast with the end of days," the Rogue Sorcerer thinly said, "because the end of days is looming. It is not a rhetorical device, Mirror Knight. It's what happens this winter if we make too many mistakes."

"We've won wars like this one before," the Blessed Artificer disagreed. "And won them without destroying what we are."

"We haven't," the Vagrant Spear said. "This many soldiers, this many Bestowed, and all we can do is hold? No one's had a war like this in, maybe not since the Empress Most Dread."

Even in Levant the memory of Triumphant had not quite faded. Hundreds of thousands had died in the creation of the Titan's Pond, and most of them had not been Gigantes. Neither had they been Levantines, not exactly, but they had been kin to those tribes that would one day become the Dominion of Levant. It was a good conversation to have, what was being said, and a necessary one. Yet it had strayed from the words that first set it into motion. This was not happenstance.

"Fear, Christophe," Hanno said, and his voice cut through the room. "That is what I see now. You spoke words, and now you fear them."

The green-eyed man turned a burning glare towards him.

"You can retract them," the Ashuran man continued. "Spoken in heat, they can be set aside as the heat fades. Or you can stand by them, if that is your choice. But this pretence that they were not spoken is beneath everyone in this room. Let it end."

He simply could not leave the venom to linger in the flesh, much as it would be painful to squeeze it out. Else Christophe would leave this room believing that he could keep challenging the powers of the Grand Alliance without consequence, that a Name and a sword made him invincible. He was failing to see the power of the enemies he was making, how even the popular sentiment attached to his fame could turn with the wind. If the Army of Callow and the Firstborn left the fronts over his affronts and it was made known why, how long would it take for every throat from Rhenia to Tenerife to begin howling for the blood of Christophe de Pavanie? There were some who believed that the Black Queen had gone tame, lost her bite, but the White Knight knew better.

There was a saying, in Ashur, that a lioness in her lair was twice as deadly as one in the field.

"I will not allow anyone to kill the Red Axe," the Mirror Knight said, "not when-"

"That is treason," the Kingfisher Prince flatly interrupted. "You would be taking up arms against the First Prince and the Highest Assembly, never mind the rest of the Grand Alliance."

It was a mark of the respect afforded the man by those in the room that no one had even considered complaining that he was the First Prince's eyes and ears here, even though he'd more often mentioned the opinion of Cordelia Hasenbach than his own. Of course, those that did not notice would be more inclined to take it as their man in Highest Assembly sharing knowledge with them than the other way around. Which made it all the more pointed that the Rogue Sorcerer, by simple virtue of speaking up for restraint and the Terms, had been accused of being Catherine's creature. The taint associated with magic in these lands was, the White Knight had often thought, one of the most insidious poisons he'd ever seen.

"Taking up arms?" Roland quietly said. "No. Taking up arms is for an army, or at least an armed band. When a single man does it, that's just called committing a crime."

He'd meant to impress the pointlessness of such a stand, perhaps, but for once the other hero had misread the room. It'd been taken as a challenge instead and Named were taught to answer challenges only one way. Another chair clattered back.

"He would not be alone," the Blade of Mercy said.

The young man looked both thrilled and terrified, taking a stand with someone he admired yet uncertain as to the consequences. The heat was rising in the room, and even those not all that inclined to agree with Christophe's arguments would be feeling a strange leaning towards him right now. Adanna, Sidonia and even the Forlorn Paladin looked troubled by the turn things had taken. We are trained to this, Hanno thought. Conditioned. To side with the underdog, the dark horse. Most of us have been in that place, once in our lives, and it calls to us still. This, though, he could and would nip in the bud.

"How," the White Knight calmly said, "will you prevent the execution of the Red Axe?"

There was a heartbeat of stillness. Hanno deliberately looked at the pommel of the Severance, leaving his gaze to linger.

"Is that how?" he asked. "Will you cut me down, Christophe?"

"I will not kill you," the Mirror Knight said, "unless you force me to."

And like that, he lost the room and the story along with it. He was no longer the rebel fighting tyranny: he was a man threatening to kill a comrade to get his way.

"Do you so badly crave to be part of injustice, Hanno of Arwad?" the Mirror Knight said. "They wouldn't even let me speak with the Red Axe, did you know? Black Queen's orders. She's to be butchered in some dark room-"

"After a trial is held," the White Knight calmly replied. "After I listen to the evidence, determine guilt, pass my sentence and carry it out. Which will be, almost certainly, death. That she killed the Wicked Enchanter and attempted to kill the Kingfisher Prince is not in doubt, it is established fact."

The latter man was keeping a close eye on them all, Hanno found. He'd spoken little but missed nothing. Frederic Goethal, the White Knight decided, had not come today to steer the conversation one way or another but to mark the positions and allegiances of his fellow heroes. And while the man was as canny as any prince of Procer, Hanno had no doubt that this was the stratagem of shrewder mind still. Cordelia Hasenbach liked to know the full lay of the board, before she cast her dice.

"She was used by the Wandering Bard," the Mirror Knight said, "as many of us were. And yet Chosen must die for this offence, while the Black Queen will let off her Damned with a slap on the wrist. And these are the rules you would have us heed?"

Hanno cocked his head to the side. There was no point, he thought, in continuing to argue that Catherine had yet to render any judgement and that she would be holding trials over rather different breaches of the Terms besides. Continuing to drown in details would resolve nothing, for the Mirror Knight was not truly looking to debate anything. His fingers were grasping for a stone to throw, not an answer to consider.

"Yes," Hanno said.

Christophe visibly stalled at the unexpected reply.

"I will pass judgement over the Red Axe, and carry out the sentence," the White Knight explicitly stated. "In this matter I cannot be swayed or bargained with. It will be done, that is all. Do you now intend to kill me, Christophe? I will not be fighting you, if that is your choice, so strike at your leisure."

The eyes of every single person in the room went to the Mirror Knight, whose face had gone red. His hand was on the pommel of the sword, but he'd not unsheathed it. Even the Blade of Mercy took a step back from him. Antoine was not the sort of young man to let even admiration overcome a reluctance to kill in cold blood.

"Let us assume you do kill me," Hanno gently said. "What happens then, do you think? Will the Grand Alliance let the Red Axe go free?"

"It is the representative for the Chosen that would pass sentence over her," the Mirror Knight harshly said. "Do not now pretend otherwise."

"And killing me would make you the representative?" Hanno asked.

The dark-haired knight took a step back, as if struck.

"They would have to," he said, stumbling over the word. "It would be obvious that..."

"You would need the agreement of every constituent crown of the Grand Alliance," Hanno said. "Given that you believe the Black Queen to be scheming against us, why would she agree?"

The dark-skinned man leaned forward over the table.

"If she refuses," Hanno asked, "will you kill her too?"

"She's Damned," the Mirror Knight defended.

He took a step back anyway. Giving ground it had become impossible to defend. He would feel it, the way the room was turning against him. Even those he had considered to be his own followers, warped as such a thought was to even entertain.

"And if the First Prince refuses?" Hanno continued. "If the Holy Seljun does, after that? What then, Christophe? How many heads will you have to take before no one is left to argue with you?"

"I haven't killed anyone," the Mirror Knight said, voice gone faint. "It doesn't have to be me, the representative. It could be any of us so long as they see what you won't. What you can't, anymore."

The dark-haired knight's fingers tightened around the hilt of the sword. Hanno did not tense. Why would he? At the end of the day, he simply did not believe that he was facing someone capable of killing an unarmed man in cold blood.

"You are no longer the Sword of Judgement, White Knight," Christophe de Pavanie said. "The Seraphim have gone silent, you do not speak with their blessing. What sets you apart from any of us now, Hanno of Arwad?"

And there was his mistake, laid bare. The belief that the justice had ever been in Hanno, when it had always been in the Seraphim. Hanno had not become any blinder, by simple virtue of always having been blind.

"What sets us apart," Hanno of Arwad replied, "is that you are on your feet, with your hand on your sword."

The Mirror Knight flinched, fingers leaving the hilt of the Severance as if burned. It would be enough, Hanno prayed. Being shown himself in a mirror, bereft of all the little lies people told themselves to soften the edges of the world, it would be enough. Christophe was not a bad man, even at his worse. His mistakes were sculpted by pride and fear, but they rose from a bedrock of good intentions. And if it ended here, if Hanno had correctly walked the line once more, then this could end without any blood being spilled. Catherine would return to her usual mercenary pragmatism the moment she no longer felt cornered, the First Prince would withdraw if she felt the situation handled and there was simply no one else that would care to contest with him over Christophe. Hanno caught sight of his own face on the Mirror Knight's bracers, the reflection fleeting but troublingly vivid for the moment it lasted. He had looked calm, the dark-skinned man thought, but also aloof. Almost indifferent.

The Ashuran felt the turn of the tide in the air, even thousands of miles away from any sea at all.

"You are not the only one allowed principles, White Knight," Christophe said. "You are willing to die over this? So am I. And if you will not free the Red Axe, I will."

The Severance cleared the scabbard with a rising whistling sound, as if it were cutting the very air of the hall. The Mirror Knight's sleeve tore with fine cuts that looked like veins, but his polished braces remained untouched. Already he was learning to use the artefact, Hanno thought, though if not for the whistling the Severance would hardly have looked like one. The arming sword, for all its power, was not a fantastical sight. Its steel was fine and touched with small, shadowy patterns like trails of smoke that could hardly be seen with the naked eye, but it neither glowed nor shone, or boasted some fanciful enchantment. The guard was straight, the pommel an angular globe, and the handle covered by an iron grip. The sheath was an ornate thing, but the sword? No, the sword would not have suffered ornament. There was still enough of Laurence de Montfort in there such frivolity would have been carved right through.

Three people rose to their feet in quick order – Sidonia, first, then the Kingfisher Prince and lastly Roland – but Hanno was not of them. He only met Christophe's green eyes, unblinking.

"Nothing of what you seek can be obtained using that," he said, gesturing towards the blade.

"You've drawn steel on allies," the Vagrant Spear said, tone icy as she palmed a knife. "Sheathe now, or you will be treated as a foe."

The Kingfisher Prince drew as well, sword coming out with a muted ring, and Roland pushed back his chair so he could have a clear line of fire for his sorceries. The Blade of Mercy had only a hunting knife at his hip but he drew that, falling to Mirror Knight's side and covering his flank.

"This is madness," the Blind Maker said. "We are Chosen, not-"

"Sheathe the sword, Mirror Knight," the Kingfisher Prince coolly interrupted. "And put it on the table: you have proved unfit to bear it."

"Enough," the White Knight said, finally rising to his feet. "Christophe-"

Hanno saw, from the corner of his eye, Helmgard's eyes go flinty as she glared at the Mirror Knight. He was, damn him, still just a little too slow. The Bitter Blacksmith kicked the table into Christophe, half-flipping it, and the Hells broke loose. Hanno tried to catch it but it slipped through his fingers, and before he could do anything more the Severance had carved an eerily neat path through it. The Vagrant Spear was halfway into a leap, knife raised, but the Blade of Mercy made to stop her even as the Blind Maker scrambled to get out of the way. Helmgard had already snatched up half the table and she swung it with little skill but enough strength to shatter stone – the White Knight, Light flickering around his hand, shattered it in her grip.

Antoine made to avoid the blind old man between himself and Sidonia and succeeded but at the cost of a stumble. The Vagrant Spear's foot hit his jaw and the young man went down, but before Sidonia could try to move on the Mirror Knight a streak of Light tossed by Adanna passed in front of her – it hit the edge of Christophe's left brace and most of it careened away, though the metal glowed with heat. The Kingfisher Prince weaved through the chaos with a dancer's grace, ducking under a flailing Helmgard and coming up against the Mirror Knight's flank. Sword met and the Alamans prince parried adeptly enough his sword was not simply sliced through, but in matters of might he was outmatched and had to take a step back.

Hanno did not let him press his attack, grabbing him by the back of the neck – the man started in complete surprise – and tossing him towards the back of the hall unceremoniously. The Blade of Mercy had gotten back on his feet and he tried to force back the Vagrant Spear but she turned the blow, caught his shoulder in a hold and forced him to his knees. Passing the knife into her free hand she twirled it as she readied a blow. Hanno, from where he stood, could see she meant to strike Antoine's temple with the pommel of her knife after flipping it. Yet from where the Mirror Knight stood, all that could be seen was the Blade of Mercy on his knees and the Vagrant Spear drawing back her arm for a blow.

The White Knight saw it all come together, as if he were looking down at it from above. Christophe's wrist rising as he prepared his own blow, stepping forward through flying shards of wood. Sidonia seeing the movement at the edge of her peripheral vision and her body trying to react – she lost her rhythm, and what would have been a blow of the pommel as it went down instead remained a strike with the point of the knife. And in turning towards the blow, what would have been a cut through her wrist instead passed through the front half of her face. It would kill her, sure as day, even if it had not been meant to.

The window to act would be slight, for all here were Named, but he was not among the least skilled of his kind. The White Knight moved with purpose, balancing it all on the span of a single breath. His left hand caught Sidonia's wrist before it could come all the way down, leaving to prick Antoine's skin just lightly enough no blood was drawn. And with his right he turned aside the Severance, forcing it to the side so that no life would be taken. The edge of the sword carved through the first two phalanges of his middle finger and through his ring and little finger before veering off, the Mirror Knight ending the blow before it cut into the ground.

Hanno had yet to draw his sword.

"No," Christophe hoarsely shouted, drawing back.

The White Knight's fingers dropped to the ground. The cut had been clean and painless, but it might still kill him if – Hanno resorted to an old trick let out a pulse of blinding Light, brute forcing the healing and hardening the skin irreparably. There'd be no mending what the Severance had cut, anyhow.

"Sheathe your blades," Hanno said, and his tone brooked no argument. "Every last one of you."

It had taken more than just Christophe de Pavanie for it to come to this.

"I-" the Mirror Knight stammered, "I didn't mean to-"

And before anyone could speak so much as a word, he bolted for the door. Hanno almost cursed. He'd expected anguish, not flight. This was potentially much worse. The door opened the other way but it had not been meant to resist Named and it broke with barely a touch as the Mirror Knight pushed through, the White Knight forcing aside the Vagrant Spear as she moved into his way. He flicked a glance back to the assembled heroes.

"By my authority under the Terms, I order that you all return to your quarters and remain there until sent for," Hanno said, tone forcefully calm.

He did not stay long enough for anybody to begin arguing, instead stepping into the halls of the Alcazar and catching sight of the Mirror Knight turning the corner. Christophe would have no destination, right now, but Hanno knew that the longer he ran with the sight of burning bridges at his back the more the Mirror Knight would look for a way to justify all of this, any of this. And that mean, right now, the Red Axe. If Christophe hurt or even accidentally killed guards breaking her out, Hanno knew there would be no saving his life. There would be no deal to be made, no bargain when so many heroes had broken so many roles. The tolerance from the Grand Alliance would run dry.

As things stood, there was only one way to settle this.

The White Knight breathed out and let Light flood his veins, hastening his steps. He scarred the stone as he turned the corner, Christophe not far ahead, and unclasped his sheathed sword from his belt. The Mirror Knight glanced back just in time to see the strike coming and twist around to face the White

Knight, narrowly avoiding the blow at the back of his knee that would have had him tumbling.

"It didn't have to be like this," Christophe pleadingly said. "You could have listened, and you can still-"

"I'm sorry," Hanno said. "But now it has to end a certain way."

If I do not show them I am capable of handling you physically, this can only end in your death. Christophe did not truly want to fight, even if his body reacted to being attacked, so his initial reaction was sloppy. The Severance was swung quickly and powerfully but with little skill, trying to cut through Hanno's own sheathed blade, but strength without precisions was meaningless. The White Knight took half a step back, then use the backfoot and a flicker of Light in what had once been the Flawless Fencer's favourite trick: the side of his sheath struck the Mirror Knight on the left cheek, smashing him to the side. The pain returned Christophe de Pavanie to the there and then, his eyes hardening.

"You lost a hand," the Mirror said. "Retire, before I must hurt you."

Hanno had lived through so many memories he hardly recalled whether he's originally been left-handed or right-handed, not that it mattered. He was perfectly capable of using either hand to wield a sword.

"Your worry does you honour," Hanno evenly said, "but it is unnecessary."

Something like anger flickered across the other knights' face and he rushed forward. A simple swing forced the White Knight back and with a half step he feigned use of the same trick – yet when Christophe threw a punch where his face would have been were he reiterating, instead the other man caught the Mirror Knight's wrist with the hand he'd freed by dropping his sheathed sword. Light scouring his veins, Hanno clenched his fingers around the bracers until they crumpled and threw his hip. Lifting Christophe de Pavanie, he smashed the other hero into the ground like a mace. The stone cracked rather than the Mirror Knight, but the tremor toppled several of the magelights hanging above. They toppled, several cracking and the light of the hall began flickering. Christophe shouted, Light glimmering over him, but Hanno called on it as well and threaded the two together.

Before the Mirror Knight understood what was happening, he seized the now single-entity Light and used it to strengthen both his kneecaps as Implacable Monk had been fond of doing – he then hammered his boot down into Christophe's throat, knowing that the Mirror Knight was too tough for it to kill him. The other man choked and Hanno repeated the process thrice, each time increasing strength as the stone fractured beneath them and the ground shook. The Mirror Knight's hand seized his ankle after the third time and he swung the Severance upwards and half-blind. Hanno leaned down, snatched up his sheathed sword and pragmatically slapped the other man in the eyes with the side of the sheath. Christophe yelled and released the foot, which returned to kick his chin at full strength.

The White Knight had not strengthened his kneecap this time, unfortunately, so while the strengthening on his limb held fine he felt the bone of his knee crack.

Pushing down the wave of pain he drew back a step, waiting for the Mirror Knight to get up on his knee before sweeping it – and, this time, smashing down on the wrist with his sheathed sword. The Severance clattered on the floor and Christophe screamed in pain and anger, catching the sheathed sword in his grip and effortlessly crushing it. Hanno released the hilt, but not quickly enough: he was tugged down enough that the Mirror Knight caught his tabard and dragged him even further down. Aware that wrestling with a man who might as well be made of steel would be foolish, the White Knight used his still-bloody mutilated hand to hook a finger into the Mirror Knight's mouth and drag the other man's face straight into his knee.

Christophe's nose broke, but so did Hanno's kneecap.

It bought him long enough, however. Catching the bloodied man by the back of the neck even as he dropped to his knees in pain, Hanno let the Light run loose through his veins until he could feel it filling him to the brim. He smashed the Mirror Knight's head into the ground, repeatedly, as Christophe struggled against the other hand keeping him from turning properly to fight. Hanno felt several of his bones fracture from the other hero's twisting about, but on the sixth impact Christophe de Pavanie finally fell unconscious. The Light slowly left him, leaving behind only waves of pain as the lights continued flickering and casting the fractured and bloodied stone into strange reliefs. The White Knight breathed in and out slowly for some time, but the sound of boots forced him to open them again. Gingerly, he took the sheath of the Severance from the Mirror Knight's side and slid the artefact back into it at the costs of only a few shallow cuts on his fingers.

Soldiers poured into the hallway from both sides, staying in the steady lights.

The legionaries of the Army of Callow were the easiest to recognize, the painted shields and red tabards that heralded some of the finest professional soldiers of Calernia putting a name to them just as surely as the unique mixture of orcs and humans of different hues. Yet there were other soldiers there, in colours less straightforward to place even though their long mail coats, coiffe and broad rim helm marked them as Proceran. Swords and spears came to the fore in good order, the now infamously deadly Callowan crossbowmen spreading out in the back. Quite a lot of trouble, Hanno thought, for only two men – only one of which was conscious, besides. Admittedly, he tiredly thought, they had made something of a ruckus.

Unfriendly eyes remained steady on him as he rose to his feet with a swallowed moan of pain, but the White Knight was hailed by no officer. He'd not expected to be, as it happened. There were only two people in the Arsenal who would have had the authority to mobilize troops like this, and it was unlike the First Prince of Procer to be so heavy-handed. With the crisp sound of steel-clad boots hitting stone, the legionaries smoothly split to the sides and a shadowed silhouette began limping her way towards him. Even through the helmets Hanno could glimpse the burning, violent devotion those soldiers had for Catherine Foundling. It was in the way they looked at her as she moved past them, in the way they stood taller and with straighter backs for her mere presence.

Some of the White Knight's colleagues worried of the Black Queen's power, of her fearsome mastery of Night, but that'd never been anything to him. It was strength, and strength failed. But the look in those soldiers' eyes, those orcs and Taghreb and Soninke and Callowans? That was a dangerous thing. Hanno knew faith when he saw it, after all. Faith in their saint of impossible victories, in their hard-handed goddess of blood and mud. That look in their eyes would still matter long after strength had faded into irrelevance.

Catherine Foundling limped forward, the uneven steps somehow ominous even without the sharp contrast of her absent staff against stone. The Queen of Callow was, to his great surprise, wearing a dress. Long-sleeved and lightly touched with silver thread, the black velvet suited her well and was even accented with a set of silver bracelets. The dark fabric complimented the tan of her skin, and her braid was rather more elaborate than the simple ponytail she usually kept her hair in. It was an odd sight, in the sense that he was unaccustomed to it, but it was returned to a semblance of normalcy by what followed.

The Archer, who sometimes filled Catherine's shadow in place of the Adjutant, stepped out from behind her queen and flicked her hand. A small packet was caught by the Queen of Callow, who then produced seemingly from nowhere a long pipe of Hanno suspected to be genuine dragonbone and began stuffing it with wakeleaf. The White Knight studied the Archer, whose bow was not yet strung, and decided this would not be a confrontation. Deadly as the Ranger's most famous pupil was with her blades, it was a paltry thing compared to the threat she was with a bow in hand. Falling in slightly behind the Black Queen, the hard smile the Archer was offering him was revealed by the sudden flicker of flame of Catherine lighting her pipe. Within moments, she spat out a thick stream of acid smoke as the red embers lit up her face.

Wreathed by shadows and smoke, Catherine studied him with cool eyes as she closed the last of the distance. A moment of silence took hold between them, and she was the one to break it,

"Busy night?" the Black Queen asked, smiling as if she'd spoken a jest only she knew.

Wealthy Aardvark

I really like the three beat of Christophe's bracers and how they function as a mirror.

" Christophe watched him with strained eyes, his light brown hair harried.

The angle of his arms ensured the polished bracers he wore on his wrists reflected only a muddled haze. "

First we see Christophe in them. He's still running around and making leaps of logic, trying to make sense of what's happening around him. He's coming off as muddled or addled to his companions.

" Hanno caught sight of his own face on the Mirror Knight's bracers, the reflection fleeting but troublingly vivid for the moment it lasted. He had looked calm, the dark-skinned man thought, but also aloof. Almost indifferent.

The Ashuran felt the turn of the tide in the air, even thousands of miles away from any sea at all.

"You are not the only one allowed principles, White Knight," Christophe said. "You are willing to die over this? So am I. And if you will not free the Red Axe, I will." "

Hanno realizes how the Mirror Knight and (and perhaps the other heroes) see him, too late to correct his course.

" Light scouring his veins, Hanno clenched his fingers around the bracers until they crumpled and threw his hip. "

Finally, Hanno breaks the mirrors during his scuffle with the Mirror Knight.

Nicely done, E.E.

Wealthy Aardvark

Also, I'm amazed to find that I was giving the Mirror Knight too much credit. I thought after the last chapter that he had seen Catherine (one of the creators of the Truce and Terms) being "corrupt" and had thus decided to fight against the T&T just like the Red Axe.

But no, it's not even that. He thinks that the representative for the Damned is letting her people off easy but the representative for the Chosen isn't and that this is unfair, so he wants to (somehow) become the representative for the Chosen so he can be partial to the Chosen instead of impartial like Hanno is. And because he's still a brute who thinks this whole enterprise is held together by personality and force of arms instead of politics and rule of law, he thinks he can just become the new representative by slaying the old one!!

Ugh. I could have respected him like the Saint of Swords and the Red Axe for taking a stand against the new order, but no. He's just a fool who doesn't understand what's happening around him.

fbt

This is really well done. I mostly stopped following/supporting PG2E as it went from funny and cynically hopeful with great banter to endlessly dreary (the next chapters address this somewhat, I'm thrilled to see); just too dark for me. But still, very well done, if no longer my cup of tea. Great writing, really.

ByVectron!

If you haven't come back already, the current chapters are simply amazing.

dadycoool

Yeah, the beginning of this book was horrid, in a "Doom and Gloom" kind of way. Even rereading it was hard, never mind when all we got for a month was the bleakness without Vivi, Zeze, and 'Drani to balance it all out. That, I think, was the worst part: that the Woe had been splintered for two years at that point. Much worse than the Everdark arc.

aerandriak

I can barely recall the last time I both cared about the outcome of a conflict in fiction, and did not know how it would turn out. I was on the edge of my seat this whole chapter, completely unsure how things would turn out.

Cat's fights are a joy in their own way, but we're rarely left wondering if she'll survive the night. I really thought Hanno might die here, and I'm glad he didn't.

Chapter 34: Quickening

"If you want something done right, steal it from someone who did."

– Dread Emperor Malevolent I, the Unhallowed

I'd become unfortunately familiar with a certain feeling over the years that was hard to describe, at least in Lower Miezán.

It was that mixture of relief and wincing that came from looking at a debacle but knowing at least it wasn't a catastrophe. Like if you came back one evening to find your barn was on fire, but at least the livestock wasn't in it. I'd told Akua this, once, after one too many times looking at the near wipe of a forward patrol that'd still caught a probe from Keter before it could do damage, and she'd answered with amusement that there was in fact an expression in Mthethwa for it. Kutofa ushidi, which more or less translated to 'victory in failure'. It was a recurring theme in Praesi plays, particularly their comedies, with the traditional protagonist of those being Dread Emperor Baneful – who'd never actually been emperor, only one of the claimants during the War of Thirteen Tyrants and One. He was notable mostly for somehow having managed to hang on until nearly the end with only a string of mitigated defeats to his name.

Akua could actually quote some passages from one of the more famous plays, The Long Road to Ater, and it'd been as endearing as it had been surreal to hear her chortle about Baneful accidentally poisoning his cousin instead of his husband – only to later find out that she'd been about to betray him. He had, Akua had gleefully explained, avoided his own assassination but only at the price of a feud with his distinctly unimpressed warlock brother-in-law, who promptly cursed him. Any play with that much murder in it would probably have been a tragedy instead, in Callow. Except if it were foreigners doing the dying. Which was why I had rather mixed feelings, looking at the mutilated White Knight and the bloodied, unconscious body of the Mirror Knight. The Severance had been returned to the sheath and was now in Hanno's hands, but there was less of those than there used to be.

Three fingers lost on his right hand, though at least he'd kept the thumb and index. He'd still be able to write with it even as he waited for a prosthetic, though I did believe he was ambidextrous regardless.

"You might say that," the White Knight serenely replied.

Not quite so serene he was able to hide how he was trying not to put too much weight on his knees, gingerly shifting his footing. Though the cracked stone floor and the lack of cuts spoke to an overwhelming victory by Hanno of Arwad, I suspected it'd been a closer thing than it seemed. How many bones had he cracked just by hitting the other man? If the Mirror Knight had not fallen unconscious, it would have been the beginning of a downwards slide for the Sword of Judgement: I knew for a fact that his healing was shoddy, and not without adverse effects. Mind you, I thought as I pulled at my pipe and eyed Christophe de Pavanie's blatantly broken nose, he'd still won. And without using a blade, by the looks of it, which was impressive. You were making a statement, I thought, studying him openly. That you can handle him on your own, and so there is no need for anyone to step in.

It was about three fingers too late for that.

Indrani, who'd been at my back this whole time, let out a low whistle.

"Nice scrap," she praised. "But you missed a spot."

The way she trailed a finger across her throat while looking at the Mirror Knight made it clear what she meant by that. I didn't correct her, or indeed say anything at all, simply watching Hanno. I'd be a grave misstep for me to have even the slightest and most indirect of hands in the death of Christophe de Pavanie, as even the appearance of my involvement with the killing of a heroic opponent of mine would blow up in my face like a crate of sharpeners. If the White Knight was the one who took his head, though, that was a different story. While an argument could be made that the Mirror Knight was simply too useful and powerful a Named to execute, I was lukewarm to the prospect of keeping the man alive. Part of that was that he was a very direct threat to me, but there was also the fact that he'd just fucking cut up the representative for the heroes under the Terms.

The White Knight hadn't said anything, but after days at Hakram's bedside I was painfully familiar with what cuts made by the Severance looked like.

"The Mirror Knight breached the Terms," Hanno said, ignoring Indrani outright and looking straight at me. "But he has been subdued without lasting harm being done. I will now take him into custody, if you have no objection."

I spewed out a stream of smoke, watching it spin and writhe before me. I didn't want – and couldn't afford – my hands on any of this, but I balked at simply leaving the Mirror Knight in a cell without further supervision than what Hanno might judge fit to provide. On the other hand, what were my alternatives? I couldn't put him under a guard of my own without it looking like a villain had taken a hero prisoner and I sure as Hells wasn't going to leave him loose in the Arsenal. Besides, the White Knight might have asked if I had objections but he wasn't simply going to do whatever I asked. He'd listen to any grievances I had and try to address them, but Hanno wasn't going to roll over something like this and I had little appetite for picking a fight. I still tapped the side of my own hand, where the dark-skinned hero was now missing fingers.

"That requires consequences," I warned. "And do not expect to find much mercy in me."

Or Hasenbach, for that matter, I thought. The First Prince would have taken it a greater victory to bring the Mirror Knight to her way of seeing things than to quell him, until now, but this little episode would change things. The baggage he'd be bringing with him when going under her wing would begin outweighing his uses, to such a canny princess' eyes: anything he did after becoming an ally would reflect on her, and her position was too delicate to be able to afford much bumbling. Considering I spoke for Callow as well as Below's lot and the Dominion had little reason to be fond of the Mirror Knight, that boded ill for the man in question. Hanno would be the one to pass the sentence, in the end, but the White Knight no more operated in a vacuum than I did.

Hanno did not blink in the face of my stare, unmoved.

"The Terms will be upheld," the White Knight answered. "I will not let intentions excuse actions."

But, I thought, for though his eyes were calm they had hardened.

"But make no mistake, Catherine," the Sword of Judgement continued. "I will not sacrifice a good man for the sake of convenience. The Terms constrain, but they also protect."

"At three fingers the chance taken on a fool, you'll run out of one long before the other," Archer sardonically said.

Well, she wasn't wrong. I breathed in a mouthful of wakeleaf, savouring the burn I'd not allowed myself to indulge in when sharing a room with the First Prince out of politeness. Through flickering lights, rows of soldiers on both sides awaiting only my command to bare steel, I watched the White Knight. Even without armour, even without either of the swords on him having left their scabbards, he felt dangerous. Not like a blade at my throat, for there was not a speck of hostility in his stance, but like a sharp stone under water. It didn't look like much until you tried to step on it, and by the time you felt the pain it was already too late. I'd trust him, I decided, at least for tonight. He had yet to disappoint me, and I'd not break that streak by forcing a fight that was not necessary. I hoped it would never be. But if it ever were, I would pick my grounds better than this.

I spat out the smoke, making my choice.

"I won't war over what might be," I said. "Take him, Hanno. But don't forget how many eyes are on you, either."

He inclined his head the slightest bit, not in concession but in acknowledgement.

"Have the Severance back in its room before night's over," I said, and it was not a suggestion.

On that I left him to his bloodied and bloody fool, Archer offering a singsong and almost taunting good night, and limped back to the ranks of my legionaries. They closed behind me seamlessly and I took aside the commanding officer long enough to order a line be sent to escort the White Knight as he carried the other Named to his holding cell. Some Proceran soldiers, I saw, were missing.

Cordelia would be getting a report soon enough, and tomorrow would bring consequences for all.

—

I woke up around what would have been dawn, were we still in Creation.

For all the weight of what had taken place yesterday — as much my conversations with the First Prince as the Mirror Knight's beating and imprisonment — I found relatively little to do when I woke. I broke my fast quickly and retreated to Hakram's room in the infirmary to see to what few affairs I had. I penned a recommendation to the First Army's general staff for Lieutenant Inger to be promoted to captain, for her exemplary service when commanding against a demon, knowing it'd likely end up on Juniper's desk. The First Army had been gutted to fill all sorts of needs, from garrisoning the Arsenal to organizing training camps and providing escorts for supply trains, which my marshal had been less than pleased by. It'd still been the natural pick, even she had admitted that, considering that Juniper still couldn't work for more than a few hours a day without having... episodes.

Malicia had a lot to answer for. Tariq had seen to my old friend personally and assured me that eventually the damage that'd been done to her mind by the Empress' planted controls would mend itself, but that it would take time. The Hellhound still got more done in a slice of a day than most people did with a full one, and had violently resisted the notion of resting more fully even though it'd accelerate her recovery, but these days she was forced to rely on her general staff too much for the First to be a functional battlefield command. I could have named someone else to serve as general under her and lead on the field, but why offer that insult when I had need of soldiers for all sorts of detached duties? At this point even if tomorrow she was healed her soldiers would still be more useful in their current assignments, so it'd change nothing. Mind you, if we were to assault northern Hainaut come summer I'd want her to be part of the planning so she might have to leave her staff behind for a bit. Aisha would be politely furious at me for making her travel, but there was no helping it.

I saw to some minor correspondence after that, the sort that seemed to accrue like dust wherever I stayed for more than a day, and wrote a formal request for the Arsenal to begin working on prosthetics for Adjutant. I'd already gone to the Named directly and found both the Blind Maker and the Hunted Magician highly amenable – the latter in particular, since he wanted to buy his way back into my good graces – but it would be easier to shake loose rare substances if this was made formal. As Queen of Callow I had no problem paying for any of this from my treasury, but a lot of the more precious materials in the Arsenal were bought through the Grand Alliance instead of anyone's personal agents. It was half past Morning Bell that Archer strolled in to tell me of the day's first arrival, which I'd been expecting for some time: Vivienne was, at last, about to get here.

To my surprise, Masego had roused himself to welcome her in person as well. The three of us set out together, which drew eyes enough as we made our way through the halls. The Woe had something of a reputation.

"I'm glad you made time for this," I told Zeze. "It's been a while since you've seen her, right?"

"We scribed a fortnight ago," Masego contradicted.

He was, I supposed, technically correct. He usually was, especially so when it was most annoying for everyone else.

"In person, I mean," I specified.

I'd not seen Vivienne in person for... a little over a year, now? There'd been that conference in the Brabantine heartlands last winter, when I'd gone down in person to hasten along the negotiations over how the refugees were to be settled – the new

Prince of Lyonis had been pushing for forced conscription of all those of fighting age, which would have been a disaster – when she'd sent word the process was being stalled. In all fairness, the Procerans hadn't even been the most obstructive people in that conference. That honour had belonged to the delegates for the Dominion, who'd been trying to argue that the mass of displaced were an issue of the Principate alone and not worth discussion by the Grand Alliance at all.

We'd been in the same small city, Malben, for about a week before I returned north to prepare for the offensive. We'd spent a few hours together on several evenings, aside from the time duty ensured we'd spend side by side, but in truth we'd simply been too damned busy to spend much time together. She just as much as I, which not that many people could claim. I'd effectively dropped all Callowan affairs and foreign diplomacy into Vivienne's lap, and while she'd taken to both admirably in tidier times both those duties would have warranted different appointments by sheer virtue of the work they represented. There was a reason that her personal staff had swelled by more than a dozen times over but I'd never once balked at signing onto the costs involved.

"Under those terms, it has been seventeen months," Hierophant replied. "Not since her official visit to the Arsenal."

"She actually likes the place, unlike some," Indrani said, glancing at me sideways. "Mind you, that might just be the Thief in her salivating at so much nifty stuff being kept in the same place."

"Vivienne would not steal from the Arsenal," Masego firmly said.

Aw, I thought, looking at him fondly. The faith there was a little touching.

"Given the authority Catherine has granted her, it would only count as a requisition," Hierophant told us.

A little less touching now, admittedly. Indrani snickered.

"Don't Procerans have a saying about thieves and crowns?" she said.

"Petty thieves hang, the great wear crowns," I quoted in Chantant.

Archer grinned at me.

"Give it a few years," she said, "and we'll proving that true."

I snorted, mildly amused. I'd never made a mystery of my intention to abdicate in favour of Vivienne after the war, at least not among the Woe – though it wasn't common knowledge outside them, to this day. It'd been with a mixture of pleasure and irritation that I'd realized that few of them actually cared. Archer was largely indifferent to crowns, and I suspected she fully intended on continuing send up bills to the royal palace even after it became Viv's, while Masego had actually been pleased. It'd give me more time to help him with a few things, he'd been happy to tell me. We'd never made a proper study of Night, and since I'd have no use for all that power I wielded he did have a few projects that could use the fuel... At least it'd not been too difficult to talk him into setting up shop at Cardinal when it was raised, which as a side-benefit ensured Indrani would have a permanent anchor there no matter where the wind ended up taking her.

"I'm still glad you made time," I told Zeze. "Unlike some here, you're actually busy."

"Don't be so hard on yourself, Cat," Indrani blithely said, "I'm sure that whole queen thing will pay off eventually."

"It pays for you, sullen wench," I grunted back. "Though I'm beginning to question the wisdom of that."

"I've never bought a drop of anything with Grand Alliance gold," she righteously assured me.

I raised an eyebrow. Did she really expect I'd fall for that?

"How about silver?" I pointedly asked.

A heartbeat of silence passed.

"Zeze's only here because he accidentally broke his spheres bothering elves," Archer said, shamelessly selling him out without even a speck of hesitation.

I mouthed at her she was not yet out of the woods, then turned a cocked brow to Masego.

"I made the spheres," Hierophant told me, a tad smugly. "And the spell that broke them. Therefore I did, in a sense, make time."

Huh. I'd be damned. Compared to his usual brand of sneakiness, that was positively devious. I was inclined to blame Roland for this. The Rogue Sorcerer was pretty tricky sort, for a man who went around in a leather coat shooting fire at people.

"You're spending too much time with Alamans," I told him.

"The only thing you should listen to them about is the kissing," Indrani agreed.

I shot her an amused look. Having recently basked in the luxury of displays of affections from her partner, it looked like she wasn't willing lose the goods quite to soon. The braided mage cocked his head to the side.

"But it was from two of you I learned to dissemble," Masego said, looking puzzled.

I swallowed a startled noise that was as appalled as it had been amused, because he'd been completely earnest about that. It was truly his most dangerous magic, I thought, that damned disarming earnestness.

"Catherine's a bad influence," Indrani told him. "The Grey Pilgrim said so that once, and that's basically just like angels saying it."

"Hear that?" I said, and allowed for a moment of silence. "That's the sound of your discretionary funds getting audited, Archer."

Naturally, she called me a brutal tyrant and the three of us managed to keep bickering all the way to the plaza where Vivienne would be translating in. Gods, but it was good to be home. It wasn't the same with just Indrani or Hakram, though they tried. We'd simply gone through too many crucibles as a band of five for it to ever feel truly complete without all of the Woe there. Not that we would be, even when Vivienne got here. Adjutant had yet to wake. With that thought dampening what had been a rising mood, I found myself limping down the same bloody set of stairs for what felt like the hundredth time. Wasn't there another access point without quite so many of those?

"It should all be slopes," I muttered under my breath. "Nice, gentle slopes."

The murderholes, siege engines and well-armed soldiers could stay, though. Those were always a good investment, in my experience. Indrani pretended she hadn't heard me, hiding her smile in her scarf, and the three of us settled at the bottom to wait for Vivienne. It would have been convenient for her to arrive immediately, but instead it took long enough we ended up playing dice on the floor to make the wait tolerable. Masego cheated with sorcery borrowed from one of the silver trinkets in his braids, but that was fine: they were Indrani's dice anyway, so they were loaded, and I'd yet to throw them without first weaving an illusion guaranteeing me the numbers I wanted.

Lady Vivienne Dartwick, heiress-designate to the crown of the Kingdom of Callow, arrived to the sadly not unprecedented sight of the Archer threatening to rise in rebellion if I didn't stop abusing my powers to make her roll snake eyes – only to then roll another pair, as Masego was evidently finding her anger quite amusing and wasn't above using an aspect for petty indulgence.

"This is Grand Alliance property, you filthy gambling vagrants," Vivienne called out. "I'll have you tossed out."

The four mages that'd made the translation with her looked terrified, at least until I began laughing.

"She's cheating, too," Indrani complained. "It is a sad day indeed for the House of Foundling, that its head would resort to such sordid treachery."

"We were all cheating," Masego happily said, "you were simply the worst at it."

An offended squawk was his answer and I left them to it, instead turning to have a better look at my friend. I was struck, once more, with how little she now resembled the woman I'd first met in Summerholm all those years ago. In principle not much had changed: her hair was still dark brown, her eyes that pleasant blue-grey tone and her slender frame had yet to thicken. The hair was even longer than when I'd last seen her, and as was her habit kept in a milkmaid braid that evoked a crown, but it was the little details that made all the difference. She'd aged, not by much but enough that her face had grown mature. And though she was visibly tired, even in her blue riding dress and trousers there was a lightness to her that was the burning opposite of the anger she'd carried with her everywhere during her eyes as the Thief.

Losing her Name had been good for her in a lot of ways.

I limped up to her, leaning on my staff, and she met me halfway. I pulled her in close for a hug, enjoying how she was one of the few people close enough to me in height it felt like there was little difference there. Her grip was firm when she returned the embrace, and I noted with approval she'd kept in shape. Just because she'd traded the respectable form of theft that was burglary on rooftops for the organized form of theft that was taxation from a palace was no reason to let herself go. Mind you, Vivienne had always been whip-lean in a way that was from breeding as much as an active nightlife of skulking through alleys.

"Catherine," she smiled, after drawing back. "It's good to see you."

It'd been a while since I'd last felt pangs of attraction towards Vivienne, but now and then when she smiled like that I remembered why I'd felt them. It was a done thing, but not unsweet to look back on for all that it'd been entirely one-sided.

"And you," I replied. "Would that you could have gotten here sooner. I heard something about rains?"

She nodded.

"They flooded the roads," Vivienne said. "There were levees but they broke – no plot there, simply gone unrepaired for too long."

I grimaced. I doubted it'd be the only place where something like that had happened. Considering the dark picture that Hasenbach and Frederic had painted for me on the state of the Principate, I suspected that a truly staggering amount of maintenance work must have gone undone because there were more pressing needs to fill.

"We'll have our fill of plotting in here anyway, I think," I sighed. "Things had been moving quickly enough in here that I suspect even you won't have heard all of it."

The Jacks had people in the Arsenal, naturally, as did the Circle of Thorns. The Dominion did not have designated spies so much as captains sending regular reports, which was perhaps not too surprising – it was a lot less centralized than either Callow or Procer, and if I'd learned anything about spies since becoming queen it was that they cost a lot of fucking money. A lot more than, say, one of the major Levantine lords would be able to afford tossing into such an enterprise if they didn't want to fall behind their neighbours when it came to fielding soldiers. The Old Kingdom hadn't been all that different, even though the Fairfaxes hadn't been the largely symbolic leaders the Isbili still were. Nowadays we could afford the Jacks in part because nobility wasn't there to drain the pot anymore, so to speak. Callow hadn't gotten much richer, but a lot of more of its gold ended up in the royal treasury than before.

"I've no difficulty believing that," Vivienne grimly replied.

We parted ways entirely just in time for Indrani to squeeze in between us, throwing out her arms around our shoulders.

"Vivi," she grinned. "Long time no see."

The former thief snorted.

"Last time you gave me that grin it was after emptying my liquor cabinet," Vivienne said. "Though I'll admit it was a nice touch to fill the bottles back up with water."

"A lot harder than you'd think, too," Archer cheerfully said. "Especially considering how drunk I got from drinking all your liquor."

Masego's long fingers were laid on Indrani's shoulders and he gently moved her aside, freeing Vivienne at the price of leaving me stuck with a pouting Archer. Hierophant offered her a smile and, as 'Drani and I watched expectantly, bent down to kiss Vivienne's cheeks one after the other. She froze, not answering even when Masego welcomed her to the Arsenal. The flabbergasted look on my fellow Callowan's face had been well worth the wait, I decided. She threw Indrani a confused and almost pleading look, which Archer answered with her usual shit-eating grin. She turned towards me after, perhaps expecting a greater degree of helpfulness coming from there.

"Zeze's been rubbing elbows with Alamans," I sagely said.

Which explained the kissing, at least, though the initiative to start doing it was all him.

"People keep repeating variations on that sentence," Masego said, sounding peeved. "As if it were some sort of conversational panacea. Shall I obtain such an elbow and carry it around so that I can behave outlandishly without facing questions?"

"There's probably a few still lying around the Graveyard," Indrani mused. "Couldn't be that hard to get our hands on one."

"I see that in some ways remarkably little has changed," Vivienne drily said, catching my eye.

I shrugged, offering her a small grin. If her days were anything like mine, and they most likely were, then this... lightness must be a balm on the soul. After hours of deciding life and death for thousands, of making ugly compromises and closing your eye to small evils, there was nothing quite like ribbing and idle talk with people you loved to remind yourself you were alive. A person, too, not just a collection of necessary decisions given a frame to inhabit. The four mages that'd translated with Vivienne had given us a wide berth, accurately guessing that the reunion of four of the Woe wasn't something to just stand around listening to, but she left us for a bit to thank them and request that she be informed when her personal affairs arrived. She'd come with several wagons, apparently, and only pulled ahead of them and her entourage when it came to crossing into the Arsenal itself. Zeze and Indrani took the lead in going up the stairs, leaving us behind in a conversation that was unlikely to be of much interest to either.

"We've got lots around the corner," I told her as we began our way up. "And it'll be coming at us quick."

"The trials, for one," Vivienne agreed.

She'd know about two, the Red Axe and the Hunted Magician, but there might be a third on the horizon she wouldn't have heard about. Whether the Mirror Knight would end up before a tribunal or not I couldn't be sure, but I suspected he would. Hanno would want the Grand Alliance to have the opportunity to speak, if not sentence.

"The war council, too, which will start when Lord Marave gets here," I said.

She nodded.

"I take it the First Prince has spoken to you on the subject of the Mercantis troubles as well?" my heiress asked.

"She did. Their envoys due here in a few days, Hasenbach and I are to dazzle and scare them so they continue coughing up coin," I replied. "You heard about the Gigantes?"

"The Arsenal seemed like the natural location to entertain their envoy, this Ykines," she confirmed. "Considering they requested the White Knight personally it was almost a given it would have to happen now, before the two of you return to the front."

"I've limited hopes there, but even their scraps would be damnably useful," I said. "Talked about them with the White Knight, he has good insight. Hard to say when they'll get there, but I'm betting after the trials."

"Quite a few weeks," Vivienne drily said. "And to think we used to have the occasional restful month, you and I, where there was no especially urgent fire to put out."

"A lot more ground to cover these days," I mused, "and a lot more fires with it. There's also a last thing, now that I think of it, which ought to be soon-"

Behind us sorcery roiled as another translation into the Arsenal began. Ah, of course Creation would deign indulge me now. A moment later the Painted Knife and her band of five passed through the gate, bringing with them a secret the Dead King believed would chill our blood.

Well, I supposed it'd make something to chat about over lunch.

Insanenoodlyguy

"I've limited hopes there, but even their votes would be damnably useful," I said. "Talked about them with the White Knight, he has good insight. Hard to say when they'll get there, but I'm betting after the reminders."

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Ninestrings

So... whats our rampant speculation for what the Painted Knife has discovered?

Y'all think the Dead King has mastered Undead goat bombs?

vernal.ancient

A massive, undead dragon with ribs that swing open to drop a payload of undead goat bombs, mixed with other zombies to follow up on the chaos

dadycoool

Oh dear. Now I'm imagining it, and maybe that's one of the tricks Bard was talking about, that he'd unleash if/when he finally decides to take it serious.

Ninestrings

Too easily negated, one decent explosive or fireball would send the whole thing up in one big goresplosion.

Big expensive death machines with one small exploitable weakness is exactly the sort of trap the Dead King avoids.

Ninestrings

If a "One in a million" shot will take it down, heroes will reliably hit it ten times out of ten.

vernal.ancient

True, though most super weapons get one successful use where the heroes are helpless to stop them. Used properly, that could still be devastating before it has to be shelved.

agumentic

It's something related to the use of the Judgement "corpse", so undead is probably not the right direction to speculate about.

Cloud_Striker (Earth Mem Inhabitant)

Unless...

Salt

Precedent is my guess. Use of Choir corpses are unprecedented in known history, but the Dead King probably predates most of the known histories by a fair margin.

I'm betting that there's some sort of permanent wound on Creation. Some feature of Calernia that tends to cause endless problems, one that most people believed to be the natural lay of things, proving to actually be a wound leftover from the last time around. Maybe for example, Demons aren't something natural so much as an aspect of creation that was supposed to be beneficial, but was damaged beyond mending by a similar event.

Salt

Whoops, didn't mean to hit post yet. 2/2:

It's always been a bit off to me that Above and Below are supposed to be perfect mirror opposites of each other, but the Angels don't have a true mirror in the Devils. The Choirs are obviously virtues incarnate, based on classic Christian theology, so that begs the question: where the hells are the classic Sins? Pride, Wrath, Greed, etc...

The actual capital-H Hells seem to just be a collection of monsters more than any particular theology of Below. Maybe they once did have a direction, and instead of expanding endlessly and aimlessly, there was a real theology behind them as a true mirror to the angelic choirs.

Maybe devils are the substance, left over and separated from demons which are the wreckage of what used to be the ideologies of the Sins. It then makes sense how demons are all based on specific capital-letter concepts instead of just being big scary monsters – Absence, Fear, etc...

Xinci

Personally, I presume all three creatures(Angels, Demons, and Devils) are just aspects of the Gods experimenting in making concepts. I presume the Demons came first as they and their Hells seem to more or less be dimensional laws that want to spread themselves. Devils are more fragmentary versions of Demons to a degree, their concepts being wider and possibly smaller in scope in some ways. Though if given time like Tikloshe they can grow quite a bit. Devils too are immortal in a fashion as killing them just disperses them back to shapelessness and they are constantly being made in the Hells. Or at least the Hells are constantly generating and as such Devils cannot be exterminated just as Angels may not be exterminated. Angels actually seem to be sort of like Demons but aligned to a virtuous concept instead of a more physically aligned ones like Time or Apathy. The choir itself remains constant, it cannot be added to or taken from, which kind of makes me think of how Demons Hells don't go away. Given the Gods have worked to make sure their servants cant escape the bounds of their test I suspect that Angels don't grow for the same reason the Deorai the placed bindings on their gestalt. So that it couldn't easily be usurped by others. The choir retains its power even if a physical body is killed as it can never be separated, which is an interesting similarity to how Winter itself was noted to never be separate regardless of time and space. Basically saying all of them seem to be different creations made as the Gods refined their test. Demons for the building blocks, Devils randomly being made in the Hells for ideas of what they could do with those blocks, and Angels to guide people down avenues aligning to specific concepts.

mamm0nn

I don't think so with the demons. While they are indeed not mirroring the angels that well, in truth they do. Angels and Demons are made to be a threat that cannot be destroyed by the Damned and Chosen respectively too easily, or they would've already been destroyed millennia ago.

Angels cannot be assassinated, for the Choir gets stronger if one is slain. Nothing is lost, the remaining angels merely grow equally stronger and become a greater threat to Evil than they were before. Likely the remaining ones are both those proven in battle and intrigue, as granted enough power to simply nope most Villains who plot to slay one. Angels are, in their design, not meant to be defeated by Villains, not even in the first act as a sacrificial lamb to the Villain before said Villain is slain by the Hero in act three.

Meanwhile Demons cannot 'just' be defeated. They can be defeated, for telling a Hero that they cannot possibly win or stand only but the smallest of chances is equal to making it more likely for them to prevail. Instead, though Demons can be defeated they cannot be defeated forever (They merely reform in Hell and/or new ones spawn) and their battle remains even after being slain. Where the White Knight may heal his broken kneecaps soon enough, a demon is like his fingers being severed. It won't be reversed ever, no matter the Story or situation.

A hero cannot win against demons easily, cannot have a shining victory instead of tons of misery and hard choices. A demon of corruption leaves behind corrupted people that have to be put down, no matter the Hero's ideals or the cuteness of that little now corrupted girl. If the Hero disagrees and tries to do the hard but good decision of saving these people, all the better for it will make everything worse by the Hero's arrogance.

Once a Villain summons the demon, often not the finale they're destined to lose rather than the beginning they're destined to win, there's no winning for the Hero even if they win. In that, the Demons are a fundamental anathema to Chosen despite not being unbeatable. In this, the seven sins just don't lend themselves well thematically so EE probably chose against using them.

nick012000

I think you've gotten the relationship between Demons, Angels, and Named precisely backwards. Heroes are the only ones who can kill Demons; Villains can merely bind them away. Conversely, Villains can cause Angels to fall.

Salt

That's what I'm saying though – Demons do mirror the Angels in a way, but if I recall correctly the known Evil-equivalent mirror to the angels are supposed to be the Devils, not the Demons.

From what I remember the Devils are the direct Evil-equivalent mirror to the Angels that occupy nearly the entirety of the ever-expanding Hells, while Demons sort of just exist in the Hells, occupying several fixed layers of them (I don't recall the actual number).

The choirs are also supposed to be fixed rather than getting stronger if an angel is slain – angel corpses are supposed to be the stuff of nonsense, logically, because apparently killing one doesn't diminish either the overall power or the actual number of them.

The Devils mirror the Angels in being endlessly growing in number to their unchanging nature, but they don't really appear to have much in the way of actually mirroring the ideologies that the angels – they're not the "below always gets their due" opposite to the angels tendency to "above always wins" in a straight up confrontation; the damage done by Devils is apparently not permanent and can be healed or recovered. The ideological mirror seems to be Demons, which are the other way around. They don't properly mirror the Angels in only occupying a set number of the Hells rather than being endless like the devils, but any victory against a Demon isn't a true victory as the damage is done and permanent the moment they set foot in Creation. They always get their due, even if they lose.

It just seems to me that any true Evil-equivalent opposite to the Choirs should be some combination of what the Devils and the Demons are, rather than apparently just the Devils by themselves.

TeK

You miss more metalayer, I think. Below, fundamentally, does not deal in virtue – as in the set of inviolable moral principles rigidly defining good and evil. They, insted, operate in “as long as it works, it’s good”, basically “might makes right” taken to the logical extreme. In that, devils can’t represent any kind of “opposing sin” as you would expect from making obvious Christianic parallels.

Talking about Christianic parallels, in Christianity, sin and virtue are, though opposing, also fundamentally different concepts. Sins are nature. They are not some kind of creation of Satan, they are inherent characteristic of human and inhuman beings i.e. “original sin”. Virtue is, however, something that can only be found in following the teachings of the Church, and the words of the God. Unlike sin, virtue is fundamentally outside of humanity. We have to reach for it.

To put into perspective, we already know that Demons represent at least some of christian sins: Sloth (Apathy), Gluttony (Hunger), Wroth (Anger), so it is quite reasonable to assume all seven of them made it into the twenty three of the hells. Along with other things like Terror and Madness, along with Order and Time and Absence, my headcannon is that Demons are the stuff Creation was made out of, or a leftovers after the Creation was made. Or maybe, more creatively, they were the specifically crafted “brushes with paint” that were used to make Creation. No matter the reason, they are inherent to the Creation itself. This is why their “taint” is so pervasive, Creation is like a painting, so if a new layer of paint is put over, it will hid all that was under it forever. And why can’t they paint over each other? Because Demons are both brushes and paint. Not only do they paint things, but everything painted in their color becomes also part of a brush, which paints futher, which... you get it. And well, it ties also neatly into why Light is able to fight Demons and Demonic taint – to get the paint from the picture you need an eraser to just scrap it away. Of course, you can’t really get what was painted over that way, but you can scrap away all the paint.

Angels, coming over on the second place, are a direct outside attempt to influence those inherent elements of Creation. This is why they are of Creation, but not in Creation – they are also a set of brushes, in that they can paint over the picture, but they can’t be in the picture, because they are not the paint, the angel by itself is just a brush, with a Choir being the source of paint. This is how they can be killed and fallen without Choir diminishing. We know that the Creation is a wager, so Angels are the way to win, by just painting over the Creation whatever Above wants. They are fundamentally the tools for the Gods themselves. Although the number of Choirs may very well be unlimited, they are just the number of paints that a painter can think of while making a painting, they represent what the author wants to see Devils, however, do not represent any rigid set of concept. They are not limited by Below's desire to see something, because Below does not want to paint over the Creation. Instead, Devils are a set of tools given to the denizens of the Creation to paint whatever they want. The number of fundamental concepts Devils represent is infinite, because they represent every mortal concept that can be thought of. Not something as all-encompassing and bland as virtue of Compassion or Endurance. It can be just "desire", or can be specifically "hunger for fresh blood".

So they mirror Angels perfectly, because they are their opposite by the very nature. Angels represent a limited set of rules, used by Above to make Creation how it should be, while Devils represent a freedom of expression, used by people of Creation to make it how they want it to be. I personally think that the wager was about which method is more effective, with Above very smartly and pragmatically taking the "good" concepts, that most denizens of Creation would agree that are worth following. It is like them saying: look, these creatures don't need free will anyway: we are perfectly capable of making the right choice for them, the choice they would've made for themselves anyway. While Below probably argue that there are things Above couldn't think of ever while being outside of the picture. This is why they conceded to give Above chance to pick the "best" concepts, because they believe that inherent ingenuity and freedom will still be Chosen by the people of Creation in the end, that they can live their lives just ok without living up to the ideal and unrealistic standards of virtue that were made up by other people anyway.

Well that's my headcannon at the moment, but I am probably wrong anyway.

beleester

He said it dates back to the first Grey Pilgrim, and that Tariq would know what the secret was, so it can't be that old. I also don't think it's another angel corpse – the Pilgrim said that only two Praesi ever managed to harm a choir, and both of those are accounted for.

Maybe a fragment of the gods, like the one that attacked Thalassina? That would fit with the Dead King's comment that it would be interesting to the Hierophant.

That, or something related to the Bard, which is usually a pretty safe bet when you see something you can't explain but you know it'll be terrible for everyone.

Salt

To be fair anything related to Demons is a coinflip for recordkeeping – any time Absence is involved it becomes largely impossible to fully account for anything at all.

I do think it'll be something more directly related to Above and Below or the balance of them than something mundane, regardless of potency. There's too much narrative relation to Above and Below for an angel corpse, for the consequences to be wholly unrelated.

Cpt. Obvious

I'm way to confused to comment on most of the post, but I kind of remember something about demons not being of Creation whilst devils were. This suggests that demons either predates creation or at least weren't intended to interact with creation. Whatever the case it speaks against there being a connection between the two. In a way demons are more primitive, more primal forces than devils are. They are said to lack true intelligence and not being able to learn. Devils on the other hand start out with a animal class intelligence but grows more intelligent the longer they live.

Having said that makes me wonder about the demon that were bound to to serve gatekeeper for The Tower. It not only spoke, but had over the centuries learned a semblance of Praesi humor, as dark as that is.

And while I'm of on a tangent I wonder if that might be something that will be retconned as it was described in book 1 and it's possible that the "rules" for demons weren't quite finished when that was written. The fact that up until Hierophant no one was supposed to be able to counter or stop the taint that demons spread also makes the gatekeeper suspect.

Aaand I have no idea what I was trying to say here so I better stop.

Javvies

Could be something about Bard and her true agenda.

vernal.ancient

"The war council, too, which will start when Lord Marave gets here," I said.

She nodded. Vivienne was not

Last sentence is missing its ending

Cicero

Well that was an ominous cliffhanger.

Laguz24

Oh, it's not APGTE if it doesn't end on a suitably ominous cliffhanger to keep us in suspense all the way to Tuesday.

dadycoool

It's interesting how entertaining the image of Cat, Zeze, and 'Drani playing cheating, loaded dice is. The Woe really does need each other, in ways that are frankly surprising to realize. It's like they're each other's ties to their own humanity or something.

Konstantin von Karstein

In that, they are the true heirs of the Calamity!

LizAris

Yes this reminded me SO much of Sing We of Rage when Warlock described how the Calamities literally can't play any kind of game without all cheating. it's absolutely adorable but at the same time makes me heartsick for all Black has lost...

dadycoool

That's why climbing the Tower is the greatest tragedy that can happen to someone. The first step is losing everything/ one dear to them.

Juff

Typo Thread:

at leas the > at least the I'd be a grave > It'd be a grave roll over something > roll over for something princess' eyes > princess's eyes
At three fingers the chance taken on a fool (is this correct?)
we'll proving > we'll be proving was pretty tricky > was a pretty tricky willing lose > willing to lose quite to soon > quite too soon from two of you > from the two of you that "Catherine," she smiled > "Catherine." She smiled

I think," I sighed > I think." I sighed envoys due > envoys are due deign indulge > deign to indulge

'Ladi Williams

Yeah. The three fingers sentence seems to be correct.
Means the cost of taking a chance was three fingers...

Burlyraven

I wonder what Vivienne's reaction to Hakram will be. They were getting along better last we were informed, but they definitely had the weakest bonds of the quintet.

Adrian_V

Not again!!! How many tiems will you makes us wait anxiously for the next chapter?!!

As for the chapter i can only say this: I SIMPLY LOVED IT!!!!

Seeing Masego's character development is simply beatiful among other things.

Adrian_V

In case it wasn't obvious the exasperation is comically exaggerated, complete with anime tears xD

Although i do think you derive a certain sadistic pleasure with these cliffhangers...

ninegardens

See... here's the thing I'm trying to figure out with the judgement corpse:

How does EE make this interesting.

If its "Oh yeah, the angel corpse is used to nuke/mindcontrol/judge the entire continent", It's like "Yeah, okay, sure, we expected that."

So What is it that makes it MORE upsetting then "Yup, that's a superweapon".

Is it a superweapon where you gotta sacrifice 1000 innocent kittens first?

And how's it supposed to work? Its not like Angels haven't taken a swipe and Nessie before, so presumably there needs to be something more to it.

alele

I think it's the "oh shit!" Calernia Reset button. Leave a couple thousand "good souls" on the continent, "cleanse" the rest. New people and new stories to answer the "riddle of creation", none of the pesky non-complying people and cultures you have now.

Insanenoodlyguy

I think you're onto something. What if it effectively flips the coin in its area of influence? Contrition made a crusade, maybe Judgement makes a purge. So all the evil in the area is destroyed, but so is a vast majority of everything else. Only the most sinless left over, in much smaller numbers. Death of nations. And Bard wanted it because she knew shed be on the chopping block after all she's done

mamm0nn

Cordelia: Soooooooooooo.... We've got a problem.

Shows the angel's corpse.

Carved into the angel's chest: I have died permanently so that Dread Empress Triumphant may never return. Revive or destroy my body, and she too shall rise again.

Cordelia: Puppy-dog eyes to Cat If we use this corpse, would you defeat Empress Triumphant for us? You're the goddess of blood and dirt, you can do it...

Cat points at the P.S.

Carved into the chest as well: P.S. Remember that Dread Emperor who's now the moon? Yeah, he'd return too if I'm raised. And he's not going to leave the moon behind.

Cat: Yeah, no.

Konstantin von Karstein

What's the name of the emperor who is the moon? Sorcerous?

mamm0nn

Pretty sure it's Dread Emperor Mooooon~ now. I honestly wouldn't know, book 1 is so long ago for me...

TeK

Dread Empress Malicia, First of Her Name, tugged her modest cotton nightgown closer together and watched the crescent moon from her rooms above the clouds, near the summit of the Tower. Soninke called it Sorcerous' Grin, for the eldritch rituals the Emperor had concocted in its light had not been seen since the days of the Miezans. Some said a sliver of the man was still up there, scheming his escape from death.

Konstantin von Karstein

Thanks:)

Lox

It's Dread Empress Yue.

Javvies

That looks like confirmation that Mirror Knight is going to have trouble from more than just Hanno over his behavior.

It's good to see Viv again, and good that the Woe is getting back together at last.

Juniper still hasn't fully recovered from Malicia's mindfuckery? Dammit, Juniper, take the time to finish healing. You're going to need to be at the very top of your game for the offensive against the Dead King – and I'm certain you're going to want to be involved in getting revenge on Malicia.

I kind of expect that this secret the Dead King is spilling is likely to be related to Bard and the secrets he learned about her.

If there ever was a time he'd be able to find someone to listen to what he has to say about Bard, now is it. Which makes me wonder, just how many of the Grand Alliance's secrets did Bard leak or arrange to be exposed where the Dead King would learn?

Salt

The Bard probably leaked just enough that the Grand Alliance would be driven into a corner by the Dead King, but not enough to truly give him an edge in defeating the Grand Alliance.

The Bard is actually enemy to the Dead King as well, so I expect that she's more of a hand on the scales keeping the balance more than anything. She might even be a temporary boon, if Neshamah starts to get too much of an upper hand, I suspect that she acts as a rather heavy restraint on the Dead King just by existing, that stops him from pulling out many of his nastiest tricks.

As far as Malicia goes, Juniper being so heavily affected by her commands may be a slight advantage for Catherine in the long run. Poetic Justice/deserved retribution tends to give you a little bit of an edge in many stories, and every bit could make the difference. Simply wounding your opponents in a way that causes great suffering but doesn't cause a lasting permanent loss tends to be a liability that way.

Cat used it against the Bard herself recently, where her victory was cemented both by the Bard making three mistakes and "the weight of what you did to us".

308924810a

So, these people are back from checking up on a battlefield where the first Grey Pilgrim killed a great many men. Something that the Dead King thought would chill them, and make them thankful for Kairos' actions.

'Ladi Williams

Wait. I think i missed the part of the story where this was... What did the dead king do to point them in a direction and how does it concern the first Grey pilgrim. Just point me towards the chapter please if you can.

hakureireimu

"There is a place," the last king of Sephirah said, "in the heart of Levant, where the first pilgrim of grey slew many men."

Red embers lit the hollow sockets, as the Dead King finally spoke.

c84: Declaration

ninegardens

"By the Grace of Kairos Theodosian"
-"Grace" and "Kairos" Words no one ever expected to see placed in the same sentence.

Gods bless that trecherous little gargoye.

May he look upon Creation from the Afterlife, and find amusement.

aurikdomi

is the plague Grey Pilgrim did somehow related to the angel corpse?

mamm0nn

No no, a previous Grey Pilgrim. Specifically the first. The one we know is but one in a string of many. Many Names are like that, almost like the avatar in that there's ever only one at a time though in this case not with a new one appearing the moment the old one dies.

lemyosotisbleu

When EE said that Alamans are more or less french people I was reticent until I saw that the population defended their rights like mad people and now I see la bise c:

sengachi

It's one of those things which goes without much commentary for obvious reasons, but the chapters in which tension gets to unwind are really a key component to why PGtE is so good. The pacing they provide is masterfully done, and the characterization and humanization and warmth in them gives the story something it wouldn't be the same without.

Daniel E

I was wondering how that bit with Malicia's mind control played out. Also, so hyped to see the secret that DK warned them about during Kairos' trial.

BritishTeaLover

I must have missed it, I remember Malicia having implanted orders in high ranking officers, but I can't remember Juniper being affected (I remember her suspecting she might have been, but not it being confirmed), and I can't remember these episodes/consequences for the mind control?

Can anyone give me a link back to when it was mentioned?

Liliet

this is the first elaboration on that, actually, you're not missing anything

Daniel E

Juniper had herself arrested as she suspected that she was influenced. Although only the Legions of Terror heeded the call to return to the Tower, Malicia's mind control might have still messed with the Callow loyalty in other ways. This is the first time we're seeing any mention of it after Cat's discussion with Pilgrim about removing it.

Xinci

Well, it seems Cat retains some semblance of her mentors relationships in how she interacts with Hanno. Using trust as a bridge to make a great institution to reform longstanding issues reminds me of Black and Malicia for sure. I just hope it doesn't end as tragically here when one of them doesn't take the leap of faith.

Insanenoodlyguy

I think you're onto something. What if it effectively flips the coin in its area of influence? Contrition made a crusade, maybe Judgement makes a purge. So all the evil in the area is destroyed, but so is a vast majority of everything else. Only the most sinless left over, in much smaller numbers. Death of nations. And Bard wanted it because she knew shed be on the chopping block after all she's done

Laguz24

The real question is what does the angel corpse of judgment do? When judgment is blocked? Kairos Theodosian.

Tom

> The Rogue Sorcerer was pretty tricky sort, for a man who went around in a leather coat shooting fire at people.

Put it that way and Harry Dresden comes to mind.

Big Brother

Little bit of hidden foreshadowing I haven't seen anyone mention. When Cat's thinking about Juniper, she brings up that Jun will have plenty of time to heal as the First is currently more beneficial, spread out as they are in noncombative roles, but that would quickly change if they had to march on the Hainaut in the summer.

spencer

> the respectable form of theft that was burglary on rooftops for the organized form of theft that was taxation from a palace

Is a libertarian queen a self-contradiction?

Mental Mouse

>Is a libertarian queen a self-contradiction?

Oh, no. Per Chesterson: "The poor have sometimes objected to being governed badly, but aristocrats always object to being governed at all".

sivarajan

Thinking taxation is basically theft doesn't mean she's a libertarian, just than she thinks. She also needs to be against it, which she isn't.

sengachi

Honestly I'm guessing Catherine's opinion on the matter would be:

"Oh yeah, taxation is absolutely theft. It's very necessary theft however, which benefits people if done for the right reasons and is the cornerstone of any working civilization. Of course the existing incentive structures of nobility typically ensure that the benefits of taxation are only marginally returned to the working class insofar as it maintains their taxable productivity and levy capabilities..." and that's where she launches into an hour-long lecture at Cardinal.

The lecture series is called: Taxation, Theft, Trade, and Tyranny – A Helpful How-To.

sivarajan

"Taxation, Theft, and Tyranny – A Helpful How-To," aka "A Practical Guide to Evil."

Chapter 35: Portents

"One who rears a tiger should not complain of stripes."
– Soninke saying

The Painted Knife's band had been one of the first we'd assembled, back in the first days under the Truce and Terms.

I'd been a given that a hero would have to lead it, as even with Hanno and the Pilgrim backing the Terms there would have been desertions if a villain had been put in charge of Above's precious little bastards. The Painted Knife, whose name was Kallia, was a tall woman who wore elaborate red face paint and had been Tariq's personal recommendation for the task. A heroine but not from one of the Dominion's great lines, and one who tended to be more comfortable on the prowl than standing shoulder to shoulder in a shield wall. I'd wedged in a Proceran villain I'd thought it best to keep out of sight for a while, the Poisoner, since amnesty or not she'd killed a lot of nobles. She was a decent alchemist besides, which tended to be useful in all sorts of ways, though naturally to keep an eye on her the heroes had pushed for a Proceran hardcase known as the Relentless Magistrate to be added to the band.

The man was deeply unpleasant to anyone he considered to be a criminal but obsessed with respecting the letter of the law and a prodigious investigator, so I'd made my peace with it. To add a bit of bite to the band we'd rustled up the Grizzled Fantassin, though we'd had to appropriately pad her retirement fund to get her on board, and since I wasn't sending anyone hunting for old secrets without a dedicated mage I'd reluctantly parted with the Royal Conjurer. The Helikean mage was an escapee from Kairos' rise to power and remarkably flexible in ability – he was a more than decent combat mage as well as capable of subtler touches – so it'd been a real loss sending him out. He would have been a good fit at the Arsenal, or any of the fronts for that matter, but in my experience sending a band of five digging into ancient mysteries without some sort of magical support tended to result mostly in corpses.

Yet they'd returned, at long last, and all five of them were alive. Not without some missing parts – I saw with dismay that the Grizzled Fantassin was missing a finger, and from what I remembered of her contract that was going to put a dent in someone's savings – but the way they held themselves as they strolled out onto the expanse of stone caught my eye. Wary, yes, but that wariness was aimed outwards. The Poisoner, a plump and smiling middle-aged woman, stood close to the skinny and permanently stubbled Relentless Magistrate whose gaze was sweeping their surroundings without an eye being kept on the criminal he'd once been so scathing about. The Royal Conjurer was trusted to stand at the back without anyone feeling nervous, and the Grizzled Fantassin was standing next to the Painted Knife instead of slightly behind so that she'd be the one to eat an arrow if they got ambushed.

I knew that look, that way of standing together. How could I not, when the mere presence of three of the Woe at my side had me feeling lighter on my feet than I'd had in months? Those five gone through the crucible and come out on the other side changed. Bound to each other in some intangible way, and though it wouldn't make them like each other it had brought trust with it. A lot more precious a thing, that, in my opinion.

I liked a lot of people, after all, but trusted only a handful.

I wasn't the only one to see it. Vivienne had turned when I did, but it wasn't her who let out a low whistle. Archer, ever more perceptive than she seemed, was watching the five Named with narrowed eyes.

"Those five have had an interesting year, I bet," Indrani murmured.

I'd expected the Royal Conjurer would be eager for a different assignment, after this, but now I doubted it. A proper debrief would be needed, at some point, but I was personally more inclined to find something else important to send a proper band of five at than try to break it up. Practical considerations aside, my heart clenched in excitement. A band, a real band, with villains in it. That was... there were precedents for temporary truces, even the occasional cooperation, but never anything like this. Not that I knew of, anyway, and I'd made it my business to know.

"Catherine's associate is making his way here," Masego noted.

I flicked a glance upwards and found him at the top of the stairs, burning glass eyes staring at the unseen through the walls of the Arsenal.

"Which one?" I asked.

"The tolerable Ashuran one," Hierophant said, then added, "By which I do not meant the Blessed Artificer, to be clear."

Three amused looks were turned onto Zeze. His continuing feud with Adanna of Smyrna, now drained of the dangerous underlying tensions, had resumed being entertainingly petty. He meant Hanno, presumably, who I really should have expected to turn up the moment the Painted Knife's band came through. The White Knight had a general knack for being in the right place at the right time, even more so than most heroes. Mind you, providence was not absolute. It could be gamed, if you knew the right tricks. I looked down at the gathering Named, speaking with the mages who'd spelled them through, and grimaced as I realized it'd be rude not to greet them down there and instead continue up and wait there. Which meant I was going to have to go up and down these fucking stairs again.

Forget the Dead King: if I didn't get to take a sledgehammer to these... tyrannical stones before I died, I might just have to come back as a vengeful spectre.

"Drani, go tell him to get a move on," I said. "Vivienne, do you remember their Names?"

Blue-grey eyes turned to me and she grimaced the slightest bit.

"All but one," she admitted. "The smiling one who looks like the village baker?"

"The Poisoner," I said, enjoying her slight wince. "One of mine."

"You don't say," Vivienne drily replied.

Admittedly the Name was not one that, uh, invited nuanced interpretation. The

"I don't know any of them," Masego informed us.

Neither of us bothered to pretend we were surprised. Painted Knife and her companions had begun the walk across the floor but we got to the bottom of the stairs before they did. The red-painted heroine offered me a salute, a fist against the chest, that I vaguely remembered being a gesture of respectful acknowledgement among Levantines.

"Black Queen," the Painted Knife greeted me. "We return."

"And I am glad of it," I replied, offering her a nod before turning my gaze on the others. "What you have found is eagerly awaited."

Especially since they'd refused to commit it to either scrying or letters, which would have gotten it to us months ago.

"Ah," a voice came from above. "I had been wondering why I was here."

Hanno looked pleased but not entirely surprised as he came down, Indrani idling at his side and only parting ways at the bottom to throw an arm around a tolerant Hierophant's shoulder.

"White Knight," the Painted Knife greeted, significantly warmer.

Still the same salute, though, so I decided not to feel too insulted. The Grizzled Fantassin cleared her throat, freeing her grey hair by removing her helm.

"This is all lovely, but after this long on the road I'd knife an angel for bed and a warm meal," she said, her Arlesite accent light and pleasant.

"Contrition's your choir," Archer advised. "Steer clear of Mercy, though, they're a little..."

I cleared my throat. The old soldier looked mostly amused, and Hanno patiently forgiving, but the Painted Knife was waiting to see if the Peregrine's own Choir was about to get insulted. Would a Levantine fight an honour duel over an angelic choir's reputation? It said a lot about the Dominion that I could not reply with an immediate and definitive no, to be honest.

"We'll get you settled in," I said. "But for a few hours at most. There will be a council to receive your findings by Afternoon Bell at the latest."

Considering how the First Prince tended to pack her hours even more tightly than I did, I suspected she'd have trouble shaking loose the time for a proper debriefing before then anyway.

"Will Kallia speak for all of you?" Hanno asked. "Or will the report be given as a group?"

"As a group," the Painted Knife said, and there were nods all around.

I caught the Royal Conjuror's eye, cocking an eyebrow in question, but the tanned old man discreetly shook his head. No need for a separate talk between us, then.

"Good, it will simplify matters," I said. "Messengers will be sent to your rooms to inform you of when the council will take place."

I paused for a moment.

"Water's rationed in the Arsenal, but feel free to ask to be drawn a hot bath anyway," I said. "Under my authority, if need be,"

Groans of anticipatory pleasure were my answer.

"Many are temptations of Evil," the Relentless Magistrate gravely said.

His tone was serious, but the slight quirk of his lips gave the humour away.

"I assure you," the Poisoner said, "evil paid much better than the Grand Alliance."

Fair, I admitted even as the band let out the kind of small chuckles a fond but worn joke would get after a few months or a year of being bandied about. Exhausted as they were, we didn't linger around for small talk.

Ultimately my pride was my downfall, as I decided that asking Masego to levitate me over those fucking stairs would be too undignified.

—

I'd either overestimated how full Cordelia Hasenbach's schedule was or I'd underestimated how much she wanted to hear the report from the Painted Knife's band, because as soon as an hour past Noon Bell our little council was seated in one of the formal halls of the Arsenal.

We'd kept the numbers relatively low, since this was unlikely to be the sort of thing we wanted spread around and numbers were always the death of secrecy. There were three seats filled as a given — mine, Hanno's and Hasenbach's — but after that it'd been on strict basis of need. Vivienne, while tired and fresh off her own travels, was my heiress-designate so she'd naturally been brought in. Masego was as well, as my advisor on sorcery and the eldritch, and he'd not even needed to be talked into it. Hierophant had no interest in politics, but he'd always been like a magpie when it came to secrets. Hanno had brought in Roland and the Blessed Artificer, both of which had been hard to argue with. The Rogue Sorcerer was a generalist, when it came to magic, and Adanna of Smyrna understood Light in ways few others could.

I was pretty sure that the only reason she and Masego weren't trying to stare each other down was that the Artificer knew he didn't blink.

The First Prince had brought in Frederic, and I'd had a hard time placing why at first. The Prince of Brus was popular and a Hasenbach loyalist, but he wasn't exactly in the running for the throne even if she stepped down from it. Malanza was all but certain to get the chair, if it came to that. I liked Frederic, our little affair aside, but as far as I knew he didn't bring much to the table. Except, I realized after a moment, security. He was a Named that the First Prince knew would be on her side, if anything went wrong in this room where no guards would be allowed in. Given that he was a prince it was hard to argue with his presence, regardless, and one might argue that anyhow I'd already put my faith in the... discretion of the Kingfisher Prince. Hasenbach's other seat had been given to a middle-aged man by the name of Alvaro Corrales, who was introduced as a scholar and one of her secretaries.

He'd be taking the formal notes for the session, though Vivienne would be taking notes for my side as well.

Since Lord Yannu Marave had yet to arrive, the Dominion would go without a representative today. It wasn't ideal, but to be honest there simply wasn't anyone high-ranking enough from Levant on the premises. Anyone brought in – one of the few captains, most likely – would be lost for most of the conversation and require access to several more well-kept secrets just to understand most of what was going on. It wasn't going to be happening, Hasenbach and I had agreed. We'd keep the Painted Knife and her band here long enough that the Lord of Alava could hear the same report we had, if a little later, and maybe offer a polite apology for the haste. Not a very sincere one, though. No one had been particularly inclined to delay until Marave got here, given the potential importance of the report and how long we'd been waiting for it. Sparse small talk was had as a courtesy for the short while we waited after the coming Named, but it'd barely gotten past greetings by the time the five were brought in.

A few hours of rest had visibly done them some good, I thought. Months on the road couldn't be cured with a catnap, but at least it'd taken the edge off and allowed them to change into clean clothes. By habit my eye sought weapons and found none, not that Named could ever truly be harmless. After the attendants escorted them down to the lower table – ours was up on platform, in a bit of pageantry – and the Painted Knife offered greetings for the band as a whole. Hasenbach took the lead in answering, even as I studied the five Named. The Poisoner looked uncomfortable, which was only to be expected since she'd once accepted a tidy sum to kill the First Prince even if she'd ultimately failed, but that the Relentless Magistrate looked the same caught my attention.

Whatever it was they'd found, it didn't sit well with the man.

"- if my fellow high officers have no objection?"

I'd kept half an ear on the talk, so I wasn't caught unawares. Cordelia was trying to move this along.

"None," I said.

"Agreed," Hanno replied.

The Painted Knife breathed out, and I wondered how much nervousness the thick face paint was actually hiding. The people in this room, the people she'd be addressing, were not without power or influence in the wider world.

"The mandate given us by the White Knight and the Black Queen was to find the truth of what took place long ago in the place known as the Verdant Hollow," Kallia of the Knife's Blood began.

It was Neshamah himself, during the conference in Salia, who'd suggested we should look into a place where the first Grey Pilgrim would have 'slain many men'. Paired with the insinuation that we owed Kairos Theodosian all our lives and that the Wandering Bard had been playing us for fools, it'd warranted investigation. Tariq himself had known of the existence of the hidden valley, this Verdant Hollow, and even negotiated with the Holy Seljun on our behalf to access the records of the secret records Isbili when it turned out that the White Knight could not see a single thing that'd taken place within the valley grounds through his aspect. After a look through the records the band of five had chased after the trail like bloodhounds, but I'd heard very little of how they'd gone about it.

"We first tried the Verdant Hollow ourselves, using sorcery to try to bring forth a shade from those ancient days," the Painted Knife said. "It did not succeed."

She glanced at the Royal Conjurer, who cleared his throat and asked for permission to speak.

"Granted," I said.

"Old battlefields and sites of slaughter usually have stray spirits even when shades have faded, as the former often feed on the latter," the old man said, offering a grandfatherly smile. "There was not a trace of either, however, and my attempts to conjure up the dead failed in a manner that can only be called absolute."

At my left, I saw Masego lean forward in his seat.

"Tabula rasa?" Hierophant asked.

The wrinkled old mage nodded.

"Indeed, Lord Hierophant," he replied. "I drew the obvious conclusion."

"Angelic intervention," Roland said, voice quiet and troubled.

I sagely nodded, as if I'd known that all along. Although, the tabula rasa thing did vaguely ring a bell. Akua had once mentioned that the touch of angels on Creation tended to 'renew' the fabric of the Pattern, often erasing old damage, which was why even though Callow had been subjected to more than a few rituals it wasn't up to its neck in fae and devils all the time. Still, this was hardly a great revelation. If the first Pilgrim had called on an angel to tip the scales against a villain, it wasn't exactly unprecedented.

"It was clear there would be no shortcut, so we followed our other lead," Kallia of the Knife's Blood said. "The records of the Pilgrim's Blood spoke of survivors that fled north, into the Alavan hills, carrying wounded with them. We looked for graves along that path, combing the countryside."

A sideways look at the Grizzled Fantassin saw the older woman salute – towards Cordelia in particular, I noted – and speak out in a cadenced tone I recognized from my own years on campaign.

"There weren't any Dominion graves, Your Highness, but I recognized old markers in the tradition of the southern companies," she said. "It was my kind that got butchered in that valley, and they buried their own as best they could while running away."

I'd not guessed it would be fantassins that'd gotten killed by the first Pilgrim, but that it would be Procerans had been something of a given. The founders of the Blood, immortalized in the epic poetry of the Anthem of Smoke, had been rebels against Proceran occupation.

"We attempted to summon forth the spirits from the graves, but there was a complication," the Painted Knife said.

"Someone had beaten us to it," the Royal Conjuror said, sounding amused. "Necromancy had already been used there, and recently."

"How recently?" Masego asked. "For how many corpses?"

"A month, five corpses," the old Helikean mage replied.

Zeze scoffed, and I let out a low whistle myself.

"That's a hell of a bleed," I said.

From the corner of my eye I saw Roland lean to the side to explain to the First Prince in a whisper what I'd learned from my own lessons in the Art. Usually the turn of the moon dispersed weak magical residue, so for it to still have been detectable after a month when there'd only been five corpses to raise meant that the caster had grossly overcast their spell. Usually either the mark of the incompetent and ignorant – Masego's own conclusion, obviously – or of people with a lot of power but little control.

"Fortunately, we were able to track the risen dead through the gift Bestowed upon of one of our own," the Painted Knife said.

The Relentless Magistrate, who I could not help but not had yet to shave, rose to offer us all a stiff bow.

"We followed the trail to a fishing village south of Malaga before it went cold," the man said, his strong Alamans accent showing even when speaking Chantant. "Upon investigation, Your Highness and Majesty, it turned out that villages in the region all had a few missing individuals. While the locals were disinclined to answer the questions of a Proceran magistrate, Lady Kallia's stature as one of the Blood bridged the gap and we figured out the common link was access to boats."

My brow rose.

"The Royal Conjurer and my humble self meanwhile found out that graves were being robbed in the area," the Poisoner tittered. "Which painted a damning picture, yes?"

Considering I'd heard that poisonous things tended to grow around Dominion barrows, I decided not to ask exactly what they'd been doing when finding that out.

"When another young man was abducted we followed," the Painted Knife said, "and after borrowing a boat and sailing across the Pond we made shore south of the Brocelian."

Which was, from what I recalled, one of the last largely unexplored stretches of Calernia by virtue of most people going into it dying ugly deaths. Ventures in there were profitable if you could handle yourself, though, given the amount of magical creatures and rare resources. The city of Tartessos should be an impoverished hole in the ground, going by simple geography, but trading in Brocelian goods had instead made it one of the great cities of Levant.

"Didn't even get to find our way before we got ambushed by undead," the Grizzled Fantassin sighed. "Although that was still better than the damned boat reeking of fish."

"It was clear we were on the right path, if the enemy was attempting to obstruct us," the Relentless Magistrate smiled, a small slice of teeth and malice.

"The Brocelian is not a forest to be tried without preparations," Hanno said. "Did you seek a guide?"

"One of the ambushers was a living man," the Painted Knife said. "And though terrified of his 'master' he agreed to serve as our guide after some convincing."

The Poisoner tittered, smiling girlishly.

"It is easier to bargain when one has the only antidote to be found for a thousand miles," she said.

That'd been an impressively creepy titter, I mulled to myself. The woman was talented.

"Ten silvers it was some Named undead trying to gather an army on the sly," I muttered under my breath.

"I will take that," Masego decided. "No one with that much bleed could possibly be competent enough to lead an army."

Ha, the sucker. Although it'd better not come out of the Arsenal budget, since that'd just be cycling my own coin around.

"Twenty it was trying to take over Levant," Vivienne offered under her own breath.

The White Knight turned a steady gaze onto us, and I felt vaguely ashamed at having been caught betting on this.

"I'll take the bet on the twenty," Hanno softly said, leaning towards us. "And thirty it has Barrow in the Name."

It was probably some sort of heresy to gamble with the White Knight, I thought, but then I had been Arch-heretic of the East. They couldn't reasonably expect me not to dabble at least a little.

"I'll take that bet," I snorted. "We've already got a Barrow Sword, the Gods Below wouldn't be that uninspired."

"It's Levant," Hanno drily replied, "there's always a barrow involved somehow."

A few gazes had turned towards us at the continued whispers, so I painted a solemn look onto my face. It'd been a serious, professional conversation we'd be having and there was no reason to even suspect otherwise.

"We pushed on into the woods, meeting little opposition as we went," the Painted Knife said.

"About a hundred zombies and just the most horrid manticore," the Grizzled Fantassin corrected.

"It was unusually unpleasant even by manticore standards," the Royal Conjuror agreed.

"We then found an army of the dead being gathered in the depths of the Brocelian, thousands of corpses being armed in the shade of the trees," the Painted Knife continued.

I cocked an eyebrow at Masego who looked mightily disgruntled at the revelation. Ten silvers for me, that was.

"We knocked out the prisoner and infiltrated the camp, where we learned that it was one of the Bestowed who was gathering a host," Kallia of the Knife's Blood said. "Though long dead, it had once been of the Tanja and wanted to claim rule of Malaga once more – Lord Razin Tanja was only titled through a loophole, it argued, and so it would rise the same."

It made me feel a little dirty inside to refer to Praes laws on anything, but for once the Dread Empire might just be the leading light there: it had pretty strict laws cutting out the undead of both inheritance and holding titles at all. It'd only taken like three civil wars to get there, too, which by Praesi standards was basically unanimous consent. Hanno glanced at Vivienne, who was to embarrassed to curse in front of the Sword of Judgement but looked like she very much wanted to. Malaga wasn't all of Levant, after all.

"He had proclaimed himself to be lord of the dead," the Relentless Magistrate said, sounding offended by the pretension.

"She," the Poisoner corrected.

"They named themselves the Barrow Lord," the Painted Knife cut in.

I cursed in Kharsum, which drew some gazes. Including the First Prince's. Really, Below? That was why Good kept winning, because they were such shits about it all. Now the White Knight was the one who'd won the most out of this whole blasphemous sidebar, and let that be a lesson: Above would always win so long as Below wasn't willing to spring for some proper Names. Barrow Lord, I scathingly thought. They might as well have just named the poor bastard 'Grave Noble', it was about as clever in the greater scheme of things. People were still looking at me, so I cleared my throat.

"I grieve for the people of Levant," I said, which strictly speaking wasn't a lie.

"I thank you for your kindness," the Painted Knife said, sounding surprised. "But the five of us were able to defeat the old dead. Though it refused to rest even when broken, the Poisoner was able to find a way to destroy it."

"Manticore venom is a powerful acid, when mixed with blood and rhododendron," the Poisoner smiled.

Well, that was an image. Masego and Roland both looked interested but were aware enough not to indulge their curiosity just now.

"And the corpses you had come there to find?" the First Prince calmly asked.

"We had destroyed several without knowing it," the Painted Knife admitted, "but the fifth made itself known."

"It proclaimed itself the new Barrow Lord," the Grizzled Fantassin snorted. "Which several other undead saw fit to argue with. It was all very Highest Ass-"

The older woman paled.

"-League of Free Cities," she hastily corrected, glancing sideways at the First Prince of Procer.

I was rather amused she did not so much as glance at Frederic, who was a sitting member of the Assembly as well.

"You captured your corpse, however, I take it?" Hanno asked.

Subtle laughter rippled through most of the band.

"I arrested him," the Relentless Magistrate defiantly said. "For false arrogation of noble title, which is a crime under Proceran law."

I choked at the bold assertion and was not alone in my surprise.

"Dead or not, he was a Proceran subject," the man insisted.

I was a little disturbed to see that Cordelia Hasenbach was beaming down at him, or at least as close to that as her face would allow.

"Is it actually illegal to be undead under Proceran law?" I asked, cocking an eyebrow.

"It would fall under the heresy laws, in most cases," the First Prince told me. "Though in the four northern principalities undeath is considered high treason and acted upon as such."

"It's illegal for undead to do manual labour under the Accords, by the latest draft," Vivienne noted.

"We're going to need to make sure I don't accidentally qualify under the wording, given how often I've died," I told her under my breath.

"The ancient dead was convinced to surrender to the authority of the magistrate," the Painted Knife said. "After some aggressive persuasion. And after we ran away with him tied to the Grizzled Fantassin's back, we finally had our answers."

That caught everyone's attention.

"The mercenary companies were led by the White Knight of the time, a woman of Procer," Kallia of the Knife's Blood said, "and had been hunting the Grey Pilgrim for some time. They caught up to him and his fellow rebels in the Verdant Hollow."

Wait, it was a heroine he'd been fighting? I'd known that in the past the Principate had fielded the occasional hero when taking a swing at its neighbours, but I'd not expected a damned White Knight to end up serving as a bloodhound for insurgents. By the look on Hanno's face, he was less than happy to hear this but not outright surprised. I supposed he'd seen too many of the lives of his predecessors to hold any illusions about their infallibility.

"The fight went in the favour of the Pilgrim," the Painted Knife said. "Yet the White Knight would not have it. When defeat seemed to be looming, she called on the help of a Choir."

Oh, fuck. I did not like where this was headed. I did not like it at all.

"Which one?" Hanno calmly asked.

"Mercy," the Relentless Magistrate quietly said. "I... glimpsed, and it must have been Mercy."

Considering how brutal Tariq could get in the pursuit of greater goods, I could actually believe the ancient White Knight had been backed by the Ophanim in her quest. Suppress the rebellion and reform from the inside, maybe? It was an uncomfortably familiar refrain, and it might just be I was painting my own history on a blank canvas there. But she'd led fantassins instead of regulars, so perhaps it had been unkind to assume she'd been with the rapacious princes occupying Levant back then.

"And what happened after that?"

"Angels came," Kallia of the Knife's Blood said. "But a woman stepped in, and then the angels left."

tkjarrah

> the Relentless Magistrate

do not forget my Name!
do not forget me!
Two four six oh oooooone...

caoimhinh

When the Relentless Magistrate said "I arrested him" my first thought was "That's actually his Aspect, isn't it? This guy went and Arrested the undead. This is a guy that is physically empowered by the laws he enforces."

Nairne .01

I like it.

ATRDCI

Unstoppable Force vs Immovable Object: Relentless Magistrate arresting Mirror Knight the next time he tries some B.S.

Mirror Knight will already be disgusted by and/or think the Heroes of the band have been tainted given they trust their Villain members

caoimhinh

Ah, now that I read the chapter again, I noticed another thing.

"Mercy," the Relentless Magistrate quietly said. "I... glimpsed, and it must have been Mercy."

Is Glimpse one of his Aspects?

If the Conjuror had been the one to glimpse at the Choir it wouldn't be strange, but it was the Magistrate who did it.

Catherine called him "a prodigious investigator" and he wasn't described as a Mage, so how did he "glimpse" at the Choir of Mercy from hundreds of years ago? It must have been an Aspect. Which further reinforces my hypothesis of this guy being a Named supercop.

Salt

An incredibly legalistic supercop, apparently.

I'm not actually sure if he'd be best friends or worst enemies with Masego. On one hand they apparently have a shared love of completely frivolous technicalities, but on the other hand the sets of technicalities they follow are likely completely different.

The dude may actually be able to subject Masego to petty punishments for breaches of obscure bylaw, given how much Masego hates to be technically incorrect about anything. Hierophant could probably be convinced to arrest himself for several minutes, followed by subsequently spending several evenings angrily reading volumes on Proceran law for the sake of equally petty revenge.

KLAH

That would actually be quite the hilarious plot thread to read

NerfContessa

Agreed.

And shit, the bard can make a. Choir back down?

And mercy, wasn't the pilgrims choir back then?

Doubly interesting.

Darius Drake

I doubt that Glimpse is the name of his aspect, though "Investigate", "Perceive", "Confirm", "Review" or something else along those lines might be. That pause seems to be him about to use the Aspect's Name, and deciding it was a stupid thing to do at the moment, and thus purposefully avoiding it.

tynam

I have to agree. "Don't tell Catherine your aspect for free" is pretty much smart hero behaviour 101, and the magistrate definitely seems to understand that.

Edward Kim

That's gotta be Ranger, right?!

Corrections

"even the Lady of the Lake doesn't mess around with angels"

-Archer, book 3

StormCow

Ranger's not that old, it's most likely Bard

Dave

My guess is the Bard tbh

Megaprr

Or the Bard. My gut reaction was Triumphant, but she would be dead by this point.

Hellspirit

Didn't she march her armies into hell? Rather than being killed?

Javvies

No, it's just that she went down with a bunch of her Legions at the same time, presumably all ending up in the same afterlife-Hell, which would then be at risk of her taking the place over.

Also, she dropped a lot of demons and devils on the Crusaders on her doorstep at about the same time.

Liliet

notably Hells are also not actually afterlife, which people who actually work with them (or talk to people who work with them) know, but common parlance doesn't

Javvies

Well ... there is apparently an afterlife for Heroes (if not necessarily anybody else) that gets called the Heavens, or part of them.

It's not an unreasonable extrapolation that Villains would go to a place that gets called part of or one of the Hells, no matter what the actual truth is.

Especially since I'm pretty sure that the immediately post-Triumphant Praes was occupied and turned into Crusader kingdoms, and that lasted until Terribilis the First came along and kicked them out.

So the entire "may she never return" thing could be a legacy of the Crusaders.

Liliet

> Well ... there is apparently an afterlife for Heroes (if not necessarily anybody else) that gets called the Heavens

That's what people say, but it's not actually known for certain, we have multiple instances of WoG confirming that. Hells are more... physically accessible than Heavens so that part of "the dead go to Heavens or Hells" is disconfirmed while the other one isn't, but Masego and the like use different terms for where souls go after death.

Javvies

Back when Pilgrim could resurrect people, he said that they didn't come back quite the same because he was pulling them from the glories and perfection of Heaven back to the flawed and tarnished realm of Creation.

Whether or not that is actually what's going on is entirely irrelevant to what he thinks and says is going on, and this what everybody else thinks it's going on. Though, since he's got a direct line to the Choir of Mercy, he's either accurately informed or being fed Above's official stance on the afterlife.

Also, I'm pretty sure that the House of Light doctrine and holy books claims that there's an afterlife associated with the Heavens for Heroes and good people, and one associated with the Hells for Villains and evil people/sinners.

Point is, it doesn't actually need to be true, just what Above has told people to say or write down.

Liliet

> Though, since he's got a direct line to the Choir of Mercy, he's either accurately informed or being fed Above's official stance on the afterlife.

Or the Choir just never answered this question. They're known to do this.

People generally make things they believe are Above's word wholesale, as multiple heroes have called out.

Javvies

Well, I would expect that Tariq asked what happened when the first person he resurrected didn't come back the same.

So ... presumably the Ophanim either gave him an answer or pointed him to preexisting House of Light doctrine. Which means that's the official line from Above ... or at least the version that the Choir of Mercy endorses.

And if he didn't ask the Choir, his belief must be based on information he received from elsewhere, which would presumably be House of Light doctrine and/or writings by prior Heroes and/or other holy texts.

Point is, it doesn't need to be objectively true ... the worshipers of Above need only believe it to be true.

Liliet

...or on "everyone knows that's just common sense"
lol

Also I'm not sure what they need to believe it for?

Javvies

I suspect that any case of "everybody thinks that way" would have its origins in House of Light doctrine, the writings of Choir-backed Heroes and/or other holy texts.

That is, the beliefs about the afterlife are not simply spontaneous, but one or more of the Choirs started it in purpose.

I floated the hypothesis that the "may she never return" thing could, at least in part, be a legacy of the immediately post-Triumphant Crusader occupations and Crusader kingdoms.

Liliet

I disagree because that's not how I see Choirs. They're not the origin of the Book of All Things, they're not teachers and leaders. They're force multipliers for the heroes they choose to back, and that's pretty much all they're... programmed to do.

Note that conspicuously similar beliefs about afterlife also exist in our world, where as far as anyone's aware there aren't Choirs for them to originate from. It's almost like they are naturally generated by human psychology or something :3

Javvies

""
In a world where Above literally and provably exists and is demonstrably and historically active, and can and does semi-regularly step in to express its opinion on some things, including literally granting power to (some of) its followers, I would not call it a stretch to suggest that any beliefs about the afterlife that the followers of its faith may have are likely inspired by the explicit actions and/or statements made by Above or its duly authorized and empowered representatives, and have, at minimum, been explicitly or implicitly condoned and endorsed by Above and its fully authorized and empowered representatives.
Whether or not they're actually objectively true is irrelevant.

Liliet

> is demonstrably and historically active, and can and does semi-regularly step in to express its opinion on some things, including literally granting power to (some of) its followers

Not... exactly.

Granting power to some of its followers is literally the only thing it does is the thing. And the opinions it purportedly expresses thought this frequently contradict themselves, see: priests on both sides of the Crusade and see: the White Knight and the Grey Pilgrim at the founding of Levant.

Above's "statements" are clear as mud, and Hanno and Laurence both dunked on the clergy for "speaking for the silent Heavens" – among followers of Above, one with millenia of heroic memories to draw on and the other with a lifetime of personal experience, it's a known fact that the House of Light mostly just makes things up.

sivarajan

From the Book of All Things (fifth verse of the second hymn), "beyond the veil of death lies a land of always plenty, which will only be open to the just."

therealgridlock

Hold on. Hold on hold on hold on.

Do we have confirmed evidence of when the Bard became a thing? Triumphant's been a thing for 1000 years, I forget the rough chronology of events...

No, triumphant did some dealing/fighting/talking with the dead king, and since that means dead king is older than triumphant, and bard is older than dead king, triumphant can't possibly be bard.

But damn, if that wouldn't be the biggest ABSOLUTE plot twist.

Pethrai D'arkos

Ranger is old, but she isn't that old.

onedollargum

I don't know if our Ranger's that old, but she wasn't able to beat Summer by herself. I don't see her turning back a choir.

The Intercessor's more likely I think.

Zggt

Or it could be a villain too stubborn to lose who actually managed to disconnect angels from reality, like Heirarch did

wec

Given context, almost certainly the Wandering Bard.

vin_kaos

I'm guessing the Wandering Bard...

Matthew Wells

Too early, I think. It's the Bard.

TeK

Obviously crossdressing Traitorous.

Nairne .01

Or a disguised man-eating tapir?

sengachi

The two are not necessarily mutually exclusive.

Insanenoodlyguy

In a suppressed bit of Prasei history, Traitorous did name an heir: a man eating Tapir trained to dress in his clothes and to target the fanciest looking person in the room. This actually allowed him to technically hold the throne for 2 and a half weeks, as eating the fanciest person in the room allowed it to successfully thwart the first 5 usurpation attempts.

Hellspirit

I literally can't tell whether that's genuine or you just made that up =D

Caerulea

The woman who stepped in? No, it's the Intercessor guaranteed.

Nordvegr

Wait, so you're saying the woman... Interceded?

Miles

Bard

Laguz24

I want to know when those five manage to find out about the mirror knight and severance. The impression of outsiders on this mess would be rather interesting.

Salt

They might achieve the rare condition of being incredibly impressed and incredibly disappointed at the same time.

Impressed that someone could wield that thing without it beheading you for daring to try wielding it, as well as simultaneously slaughtering an entire court of Fae and seven demons.

Disappointed at the colossal bout of stupidity that followed, especially since he also shot himself in the foot by making it impossible for the GA to let him keep the sword at the moment, even if they wanted to.

Although Hanno might end up taking the spotlight for some of them. It's ridiculously impressive that he could turn aside the sword barehanded, followed by thrashing the Mirror Knight without even drawing his own sword. It's ridiculous to a degree that would invite complete disbelief, and could propel him into "what the fuck" levels of admiration in the eyes of many, on par with the kind of fear/intimidation that Catherine commands.

Zach

The notable thing about the whole Mirror Knight situation is that, in the end, I don't think any of the heroes aside from Blade of Mercy sided with him (and Blade of Mercy isn't really a bad guy; he's just a dumb kid who has spent most of his time around Mirror Knight, and he's likely starting to have some cognitive dissonance due to stuff like Mirror Knight lying about what happened with Repentant Magister).

While some heroes might approve of Mirror Knight having the Severance or dislike Catherine, it appears that very few are actually okay with directly rebelling against the Truce and Terms.

JJR

"“Angels came,” Kallia of the Knife’s Blood said. “But a woman stepped in, and then the angels left.””

Time traveling Cat confirmed.

Corrections

Finally! Someone gets it!

onedollargum

She ate part of the Bard’s echo, so she was sort of there, I guess?

Hitogami

This is the best comment.

onedollargum

Bards wander where angels fear to tread.

dadycoool

Oh, shit! Cat’s got a precedent for smacking down Choirs! It’s not just her treading new ground! Sure, she’s having to retread a smoothed-over path, but the path is still there.

I bet it was so satisfying for Cat to see the camaraderie between that Band of Five.

And that’s what you get for being such a Heretic, Cat. You knew better than to make a bet with a White Knight, yet you made it anyway.

Gibborim

I doubt the Bard fought the choir. Probably told them they were interfering with the greater good and to piss off.

Konstantin von Karstein

Which makes her even more terrifying.

dadycoool

Cat's never fought a Choir either. She dictated Mercy twice in the last book, once to get Tariq resurrected and once at the Trial. Come to think of it, "told them they were interfering with the greater good and to piss off" is exactly what she did at the Trial. "Yeah, sure, this guy needs to die, but don't kill the leaders of half the continent to do it " It would explain why they folded so fast: they've done so before.

NanoMecha

I mean, she did also bully Contrition into giving her a resurrection whiost they tried to crush her under the weight of her sins, and said "Fuck off, you bottom feeders" to Endurance as they tried to claim the Stalwart Paladin. So she has fought a couple in her time.

Salt

Not so much fight in the conventional sense, as hiding behind story technicalities and alliances of convenience. Past-Catherine likely would've been smited into the finest ash if she ever truly exchanged blows with a choir – she won against them by avoiding the need to fight the battle at all.

Contrition and Endurance weren't even allowed to fight back because the story rules said Catherine technically already won, and Angels aren't allowed to break the rules. Mercy just let it go both times because she made her own goals roughly align with theirs – resurrecting the Pilgrim with no strings attached, as well as protecting innocent bystanders while only delaying their deep-frying of Kairos long enough to get said bystanders out of the way.

It was less of an "oh no, we've been felled on the field of battle" from the Choirs, so much as "ugh, fine, I guess we'll to do it your way this time"

dadycoool

Kairos' opinion on that was kinda foreboding. "The more you let her get away with dictating terms to you, the more she can do it"? I half expect her to start calling down plagues at some point. She's already experienced with Miracles, like freezing the water so her troops can cross, so that wouldn't be throwing her in the deep end.

Juff

Typo Thread:

I'd been a given > It'd been a given
A heroine but > A heroine, but Magistrate whose > Magistrate, whose five gone > five had gone added, "By > added, "by do not meant > do not mean interpretation. The (missing words or extraneous the) for bed > for a bed to you rooms > to your rooms if need be," > if need be."
are temptations > are the temptations Prince even > Prince, even records of the secret records Isbili (something wrong here) spirits form > spirits from upon of one > upon one help but not had > help but notice had us," the > us." The we'd be having > we'd been having rhododendron," the > rhododendron." The

Unnamed Goose

Gods Above I just about fell to my death over that huge cliff there.

LizAris

Urgh tell me about it I kept scrolling down in disbelief for a few seconds after finishing cuz that was damnably unfair

Incrya

Just claim to be a Hero, you'll survive guaranteed!

erebus42

Doublely so if someone claims how "no one could have possibly survived that" or "that's the last we'll be seeing of them"

Salt

What happens if one bystander comments "no one could possibly have survived that" and another comments "he's invincible, there's no way he could be killed by that"

Do they become schrodinger's hero or something?
Simultaneously dead and alive until someone triggers the next flag to decide the tiebreaker?

TeK

They probably cancel each other out. But it's funny how pessimism actually saves lives in Guideverse. I wish in real world I was like "she is out of my league, there is no way it'll work out" and then it would work out. I would be, like, a god or something.

Jworks

So whoever it was, probably Bard, they have the authority to command Choirs. I don't think we've ever been provided with the hierarchy of Above, but someone that can command Choirs must be pretty high up in it.

caoimhinh

Hmm, maybe not command, but rather persuade.
Angels can be made to do things by exploiting their rules, and they can be beaten too. So to make them leave you don't necessarily need to have command over them.

dadycool

Cat basically said to Contrition "Hey, fuck off and rez me!"
when she was a teenager, then a few years later said to Mercy
"Excuse me, but I think you should bring your Champion back, or step aside and let me do it." and "Hey, cool it! the rest of us are here, too!"

TeK

And she also said to Endurance "lol no"

Big Brother

Small nitpick: Fortitude, not Endurance. The Stalwart Paladin served the Choir of Fortitude

Andrew Smith

The white knight referred to that choir as endurance during the wicked chapter

flashburn283

Ok, seriously, ANGELS listen to the damn bard. Am I missing something here? Because from what we have seen she is a bit of a schemer and a shitload of petty, but nowhere near powerful enough to dictate terms to A CHOIR.

Gods it is going to take a 3 layer hellegg to seal her away isn't it.

RoflCat

Assuming that Bard's desire is her retirement/death and her latest failure in doing so with that attack on Arsenal...

It'll take Heaven's Fall for her to be gone.

Because at this point the Gods themselves are keeping her around.

c_b

It's not about power. The Bard never does anything by being powerful enough. She does stuff by ensuring that narrative convention guarantees that she will get her way. Y'know, like Cat coercing the Choir of Mercy to resurrect her by manipulating events such that she was a princess pulling a sword from a stone to make war on Callow's enemies.

If this was the Bard, she was able to dictate terms on that kind of basis, not by winning a slugging match.

caoimhinh

True. Story is what matters the most when dealing with the great powers in Creation.

P.S: it was Contrition who resurrected Catherine, not Mercy.

c_b

Whups >.<

TeK

... Choir of Contrition, not Mercy. She bullied Mercy on arguably two other occasions.

Shveiran

Argued 😊

She definitely did during the trial, but raising Tariq was not really bullying anyone.

She just went and said: "look you want to do a thing and I want to do that thing, but you can't do the thing yourself because of the rules and I can't do it unless you agree because it's your turf. So let me step in your turf and I'll get the thing done, 'k?"

It was an important milestone, but it was one of cooperation, not strength.

wabbitking

Really? It's going to be illegal for undead to do manual labor. That's about half the use for regular zombies and skeletons besides arrow-fodder.

A travesty I say!

On the other hand I can see some future undead villain being a real smart-ass about it.

Undead villain: Really dear I'd love to help you dig your friends out of that rubble but sadly its against the law Oho-ho-ho-ho-ho-ho-ho!

TeK

Agreed. It is a sad to see necromancy so unjustly oppressed in every fantasy I've read. Undead workers can be so useful, but nooo, let's make peasants work themselves half to death over our dubious moral grandstanding. It's not like they are real people anyway.

Decius

It's protection for the living. When laborers' wages are more expensive than raising them as undead, the laborers get worried.

Salt

This is also the Guideverse, so it's literal protection for the living too. If a Villain usurping control over common undead workers could cause a catastrophe, it's virtually guaranteed to happen eventually.

Decius

That Villain would just kill the peasants and raise their corpses for the army anyway. But villains raising armies of the undead merely cut swathes through the peasantry once a generation or so. If undead were cheaper than living labor everyone would end up undead.

Salt

It has nothing to do with logistics, it has to do with the narrative. The latter is everything in the Guideverse.

Having magically-controlled undead workers everywhere is a potentially extremely large danger with a single point of vulnerability. That narrative itself means that Creation will essentially bend over backwards to eventually allow some Villain specialized in usurpation to grant themselves widespread control over such. It becomes more dangerous simply because stealing control of such tools is such a common story trope.

Much like Heroes in common fantasy stories being virtually guaranteed to destroy weapons that have a single point of failure, Villains tend to be virtually guaranteed to exploit beneficial systems that have a single point of vulnerability. Disaster caused by the failing of a system that people were over-reliant on, or some horror committed by a wide-scale beneficial work that was twisted to nefarious purposes, are two of the most common tropes in the book.

If you're living in a universe where tropes are power, you definitely should avoid things like undead labor especially if they become more common. There's more than half a chance that you'll become the sole survivor that gives the Heroic band of five convenient background context, having coincidentally avoided said disaster due to petty paranoia.

TeK

By this point metal tools is a way to bring forward the apocalypse. I mean if you use the wheel, eventually someone will try use it's power for nefarious designs. Really, we shouldn't even use sharp rocks – the narrative will ensure they will be used to bash people's had in!

Of course someone will weaponise it. But this level of fun-police reminds me of dwarves. You argue that (well you don't really, but it's a nice turn of phrase, let me have it, please?) people will die more because of undead cheap labor, I'll argue people will die less. On average prosperity will massively overshadow any damage from occasional catastrophe, and every loophole used by a Villain will be plugged, making it harder to create said catastrophes, and make them lesser in scope when they do

Salt

You can't exactly conflate metal tools and rocks with literal magic, in a story-trope sense. The whole argument you're making falls apart when we examine one key difference:

There are TONS of stories and tropes about well-intentioned magic or necromancy gone wrong. Magical devices or sorceries getting corrupted is one of the most common fantasy themes that exist. Not so much for sharp rocks and shovels.

You could call it fun-police if you want, but that argument applies exactly the same way to Black replacing blood sacrifices and flying fortresses with bureaucracy and mundane institutions, or Catherine trying to replace demon summoning and angelic intervention with an international diplomatic treaty and geopolitical deterrents.

The entire point trying to orchestrate the death of the age of wonders is that while large scale works of magic or necromancy tend to be worth it on paper, disaster by fiction tropes get in the way so often that in practice the most down-to-earth, mundane methodologies tend to be the most stable for the general populace.

TeK

There are tons of stories about average non-magical inventions gone wrong. Because the key trope here is not "magic bad", but "progress bad". You will find that one of the most common tropes in sci-fi is "tech gone Wong". Why? Well, because some people try to justify "we want to live in stone age" whatever way they want. So if we follow that principle to the logical end, anything more advanced than unclipped nails should be feared because "don't play god".

I mean let's be real, magic is technology we don't understand, and widespread undead labor is exactly widespread automatisations. Now, I do understand that it will backfire. Duh. I argue that the benefit to the society as a whole would outdo any damage by orders of magnitude. Think about everything good Industrial Revolution brought, but add to that not getting glassed by some paranoid aliens for developing it.

Your other examples do not bring anywhere near the same level of long-term benefit as this. Blood sacrifice? Literally sacrificing long-term for short-term. Obviously get rid of it the moment you can. Flying fortress? Inefficient. Angelic intervention? Literally mass murder at best. Demons? Irreparable damage to the fabric of reality is as long-term as it gets.

Devils though? As long as you stick to minor breaches and some general restraint, they can drastically reduce amount of human (and inhuman) casualties in warfare. Which again, makes everyone's life better.

Again, down-to-earth doesn't mean "no magic" it means "no overambitious grand projects with a single point of failure". Introduction of undead labor is not that, because you can only use it on the most basic and hazardous jobs, and split them in small groups to ensure no way for all of them to be corrupted at once.

They just need to get over their bias and instead of blanket ban on everything that is "unorthodox" try and address all the practical problems, and I bet that the end result, no matter how tame would be ways better than "no necromancy because bad".

Salt

I mean we can go back and forth all day coming up with a thousand predictions about the technical details of how necromancy works, but at the end of the day this is a setting where metagaming story tropes matters a lot.

You're seeing it as senseless bias against necromancy. I'm seeing it as it being historically justified in the setting. That's the difference, at the end of the day.

I argue that allowing openings for those catastrophes won't be worth it. The risk is too high and it's a senseless one besides, when the same thing can be done with slow, mundane economic development. Progress doesn't just mean that everything new is good – the large majority of attempted innovations were absolute failures. You can't just paint undead labor as somehow progress, as if it's a given that it'll end up beneficial in the end, simply by being new.

Progress just means learning from your past mistakes, and not putting enough importance on narrative patterns is a huge mistake in this setting. We can't just write off story trope related problems as things that can probably be dealt with. They're by definition impossible coincidences or an outright bending of reality that causes specific patterns to repeat; and wide-scale necromancy often inviting disaster is one of the most common patterns there is.

TeK

And I would argue that the bias against necromancy is a very cultural basis for the story enforcing evil necromancers. This is the world where the narrative matters. I'd argue that working on changing the narrative instead of adhering to it would be more productive. Otherwise it is very much "thought changes reality". By blanket banning necromancy you ensure that the only use for it would be evil.

Secondly is that the Guideverse has hard cap on it's technological level: which means, that without changes taken, things will not go anywhere. Any amount of ecological growth will be stopped cold at that particular wall.

In the end I think that narrative matters, but can be and have to be changed. I personally think that this is what Black and Cat had been doing. Not bowing to stories of old because they always had been here, but with a rational eye judge which parts of the past should be left, and which ones should be carved out. Callow and Praes always fight, so making peace between them would surely end up in disaster. Right?

sivarajan

You might like this comic about caveman science fiction: dresdencodak.com/2009/09/22/caveman-science-fiction/

TeK

I know it, don't worry 😊

But thanks anyway.

Salt

I think the core issue we are disagreeing on is that you believe the narrative is driven by a cultural idea of necromancy being unethical. I think the narrative is driven by the folly of widespread use of semi-autonomous constructs.

My argument for the risk being too high, narratively, actually has nothing to do with the level of magical technology or the ethics of necromancy, is what I'm (apparently poorly) trying to get across. The level of magical technology used in this could be described as just a reapplication of the basics, nothing groundbreaking

However I would say it is still undoubtedly a huge folly regardless, because the objection has nothing to do with ethics or technology. It wouldn't matter if it was a relatively simple golem made with trismegistan sorcery instead a zombie with dark rituals, it would be far too risky.

The problem is that you have wide scale use of semi-autonomous constructs, which are narratively far far FAR more prone to being usurped in control than your previous comparison of, say, a sharp rock. It is a specific risk associated with the specific trope of becoming overly dependent on uniform constructs or enchantments where an issue with one unit could be replicated broadly, combined with semi-autonomous constructs having a very frequent tendency to become twisted away from their intended function.

It is an incredibly strong story trope driven by it being a theme that's wildly popular with fantasy writers for the virtue of being an interesting premise in and of itself, not some high-handed moral argument.

Specific uses by major characters or one offs tend to come with little risk, as competent supervision can be ensured, but wide scale applications will result in eventual catastrophe by incompetence or catastrophe by circumventing of intended use, so often that it's ridiculous.

You're still getting hung up on the technical logistics when that's not the objection that's being pointed out. I'm saying that in a story setting where failure can be guaranteed simply by not metagaming the story tropes hard enough, leaning into a story trope that typically invites disaster 9/10 times is insanely risky, despite whatever technical protections you put into place.

What you need isn't an assumption that catastrophic narrative consequences can be averted by way of technical protections. What you need is narrative protections to make sure the story of your undead labor force can never fall into one that invites disaster in the first place, and I'm not seeing a reasonable way for that to happen in the current setting.

It isn't bowing to authority to avoid common historic pitfalls, and it isn't some cowardly shying away from a challenge to avoid introducing new risks if you can help it. It's just application of less-proud, less-grand, and more-sensible practicality. Sometimes what you need isn't some glorious ambition to overthrow the old yoke of Above-oriented bias, so much as just a mundane, common sense compromise if an ideal solution isn't currently on the table.

Javvies

Hell, semi-autonomous automated labor (or other usage) forces don't have to be actively subverted by a hostile third party to have Story issues. They can go rogue.

AI and/or robotic forces developing intelligence and wanting their independence and freedom is a classic Story trope all by itself. And undead are basically magic robots using a corpse for their body instead of a constructed one.

TeK

I do believe that narrative is established culturally, from people's beliefs, not from outside by Gods. The reason why Calernia (specifically) has Western fantasy tropes, is not because they are hardwired into the fabric of Creation to be prevalent, but out of sheer accident and the fact that Calernia is, um, pretty Western.

From my first assumption comes another: if narrative is cultural, then it can be changed. It takes centuries and is a hard work, but it can be done. If you are clever about it, you can avoid disaster by taking things slowly enough the very concept of disaster coming from this is erased from popular subconscious.

That being said, ugh, I concede another points. The tropes at hand have little to do with necromancy itself, so removing cultural bias against it would not remove the core problem.

Arguably, even if necromancy was perfectly acceptable and ethical, such wide-scale project would still be extremely dangerous because it's basically stealing Callow's weather, or, in more recent examples, using angels corpse. It doesn't matter if it's wicked or righteous thing to do, it still has a very high chance of backfiring.

But I think that since this problem touches every magical solution to problems, and since noone had much objection against Arsenal, which would be spitting out such projects if not in the field of necromancy with alarming consistency even after the war (or at least I bet it will), there is no reason to exclude particularly necromancy from the array of considered projects.

Because, as far as I see it, there is no other alternative. Automation through pure technology is out of the window, and if golemmaking was useful, it would already see widespread use. As things stand, necromancy is the only thing that will say roughly 80% of population from working themselves half to death from dawn till dusk just so that they won't starve.

TeK

It is argument for education of peasantry for more skill-intence labor, not mass genocide. Dead can't breed, so appeasing populace is still necessary. Even Dead Kind does it in a roundabout way.

Andrew Smith

Except as show undead can do any job that a human can.

Of course while you teach them where are they earning money to live from and build the schools and pay the teachers

Like in the long run it might work but you need a good start up cost and well any necromancer can steal control of the dead see how cat and thee crows were able to steal control of the dead kings undead from him

TeK

I am talking specifically long term, but my main argument is against "no undead labor ever" without even some small-scale tryouts. Like who cares, the peasants are the ones suffering anyway, so let's be righteous, we are not paying the price.

beleester

In a setting where disembodied souls and restless dead exist, desecrating a corpse is not necessarily a victimless crime – the previous owner of the body might be very upset about being ripped from their grave.

I also suspect it's being banned on storyline grounds – “an army of undead slaves” is the sort of thing that tends to attract disaster, as a giant force of evil centered around a few powerful mages. E.g., the necromancer dies and all his undead slaves go out of control and start eating people.

TeK

The attitude towards posthumanous use of your body is entirely cultural, and hence, can be changed. But educating peasants would be too expensive, right? This is where cheap undead labor comes in.

Also, viewing necromancy as evil, in the world so heavily driven by narrative essentially makes all necromancy evil. Change of perspective would go a long way to change reality there.

Liliet

Deoraithe already do non-Evil necromancy.

TeK

Also Drow, before the whole Undying Ponzi Scheme, but really, the one who is truly at fault there was centralisation of power without internal checks for it.

Salt

The Deoraithe had their gestalt stolen and bound by Akua to power up the biggest genocide/doomsday weapon the continent has seen since Triumphant.

The Drow nearly caused the extinction of their entire race, followed by millennia of cannibalism and the total ruin of their civilization.

Necromancy being unethical can be debated – neither of those events had to do with moral issues – but those two aren't exactly good arguments for considering widescale application of necromancy as low-risk.

If anything, the deoraithe and the drow reinforce the old trope that relying heavily on necromancy will invite disaster sooner or later.

TeK

It's not necessary for necromancy to be some grand large scale ritual to be implemented, although I see your point. But that is again, not a point against necromancy, but against any grand overambitious project. Tower of Babel, but like, again and again, cause we can.

TeK

But I concede one thing. I do underestimate what you call "narrative forces" because of my personal bias. I utterly despise any "hubris" tragedies. So my natural instinct when someone says "no, you be playing god" is to, er, play god. So I have some massive bias over here and I apologize for it's influence on our discussion.

Salt

For my part, I haven't taken any offense. I think it's been about equal intense on both sides, and it isn't as if you haven't made good points. So any apology you'd make is reciprocated.

That being said, I don't think your logic for why it could work is wrong – I never really disagreed on the methodology being sound in theory.

My argument is that contrary to the logic of it, story tropes enforcing themselves are by definition completely illogical. Impossible coincidences, skewed laws of physics, ridiculous statistical outliers, and every coinflip coming up tails. In most other fiction settings the logistics could govern, but in this setting if you're not using story elements to balance out story-risk, no amount of logical preparation is going to be enough.

TeK

And I argue that not only my methodology is applicable inverse, it, in fact, had been done already by protagonist no less. I would even go so far as to argue that necromancy was forbidden out of purely political reasons – sheer populism. You can't really have the truce enforced by the opposition to Dead King allowing necromancy, can you? Procer will surely riot. Again.

Salt

My objection is that specifically, semi autonomous constructs like undead carry inherent story-related risks, no different than a Flying Fortress sometimes succeeding but still in general having inherent risks. Mass use of uniform ones only amplifies said risk, and not by just a little.

It isn't an objection to technology in general or some moralistic objection, I don't personally have any real concern on either front, and in general basic skeletons are pretty low on the magical complexity scale anyway. I won't buy an argument saying it's good just because it's new, but I also won't object just because it's new, and that isn't the point I'm trying to (badly) get across anyway.

No, my objection is related specifically to undead as a type of story device that mimics life or mimics sentience, combined with the wide scale uniform application of it. It doesn't matter if it's a stone golem, or a skeleton, or an artificial spirit, or whatever, if it's magical and in some way semi-sentiently resembling life (especially human life), there's gonna be a thousand fiction tropes related to it backfiring horribly on their makers. Either by oversight or by sabotage. That makes it inherently risky as heck unless you have a very good exception in play.

If I was a player playing in a D&D setting with the same rules as the guideverse, I'd probably object to a party member proposing a wide scale permanent application of such in most cases; mostly because it's a setting where it's mandatory to metagame fiction tropes, and I'm not seeing a meta solution that more or less guarantees that the campaign setting wouldn't find a way to completely screw us for being on the wrong side of a very commonly ruinous fiction trope.

I'm saying there's a high chance that it'd be akin to casting lightning bolt on a large black pudding, not that paladins are correct about lawful neutral necromancy.

Salt

I guess a good analogy in hindsight would be like discussing whether a plan would work in D&D. Your necromancer would be – in many campaigns – correct to say that undead used for neutral purposes could arguably be no different than any other application of magic, and it's not uncommon for savvy players to debate if the ethics of necromancy are innately evil in the first place. Good GMs in most settings would entertain that kind of thing no problem.

But this all changes if your GM has made it a point that this is a genre-savvy campaign setting that gives large bonuses on rolls for RP that follows common fantasy tropes, and large penalties for being on the wrong side of those tropes. Even moreso if he's intentionally encouraging players to metagame this mechanic as hard as they wish for an advantage, or warning them to ignore it at their own peril.

At that point, it's more that you just have a unique campaign setting for considering "is this a good plan or not". The necromancer then needs to RP accordingly so that his plans fit into the setting for those fat bonuses instead of suffering from horrible penalties. Which is probably going to be quite challenging, if it really goes against the grain in the first place.

It's a factor that could shift a plan from "usually reasonable" to "I'm not so sure about this, dude", unless said player is very VERY good at this kind of RP.

TeK

The problem with this analogy (and our debate to lesser extent) that unlike with GM, we can only guess at how the narrative rules would work in this case. I think the danger is overestimated, you evidently think not, and unless EE will personally break the tie, I don't think we can move forward with this 😊

Salt

I guess a good analogy in hindsight would be like discussing whether a plan would work in D&D. Your necromancer would be – in many campaigns – correct to say that undead used for neutral purposes could arguably be no different than any other application of magic, and it's not uncommon for savvy players to debate if the ethics of necromancy are innately evil in the first place. Good GMs in most settings would entertain that kind of thing no problem.

But this all changes if your GM has made it a point that this is a genre-savvy campaign setting that gives large bonuses on rolls for RP that follows common fantasy tropes, and large penalties for being on the wrong side of those tropes. Even moreso if he's intentionally encouraging players to metagame this mechanic as hard as they wish for an advantage, or warning them to ignore it at their own peril.

At that point, it's more that you just have a unique campaign setting for considering "is this a good plan or not". The necromancer then needs to RP accordingly so that his plans fit into the setting for those fat bonuses instead of suffering from horrible penalties. Which is probably going to be quite challenging, if it really goes against the grain in the first place.

It's a factor that could shift a plan from "usually reasonable" to "I'm not so sure about this, dude", unless said player is very VERY good at this kind of RP.

Salt

Wow ok apparently I managed to double post and incorrectly type my email into the box in one fell swoop. Whoops.

TeK

And now I wonder if you have seen my reply which was addressed to a different Salt apparently.

TeK

And exclusion of undead from offices of power is straight up discrimination.

#DeadLivesMatter

Nairne .01

Think about Zombie...

Casey Glick

I don't know that it is permanent here. It is almost certainly a war-based rule, as it's pretty clear Neshemah can commandeer basically anyone's undead. Having unsupervised undead doing work seems...ill-advised.

vernal.ancient

They mentioned it was part of the Accords, which are intended for after the Dead King's defeat

LizAris

Well that's great—more Bard to deal with, it looks like. She better not touch another hair on any of the woe

On the other hand, Knife's band is such a cute combo of heroes and villains, and Hanno joining in on the bet made me cackle. The (former) Black and White are so well written...I love that Cat's continually surrounded by Knights as her strongest allies/most annoying enemies even though she's long lost name of Squire

Konstantin von Karstein

Except for the Poisoner, are they any other Villain in that band?

TeK

Fantassin arguably fits the bill.

LizAris

Hmm I might be totally off but I somehow got the idea the Royal Conjuror was? Cat spoke about "parting with him" and did send him a glance to silently ask if they needed to talk. Also he escaped from Helike/Kairos which is primarily an Evil city, but that could also be interpreted that he's a hero... yeah idk

Earl of Purple

Helike is a Good city, on the whole. He was the Royal Conjuror, which means he probably predated Kairos. The Tyrant did not use the style King of Helike. He's a Hero, I think.

She didn't part with him because he's one of hers, but possibly because he served alongside the Army of Callow. And would have been useful just about anywhere the Grand Alliance could put him.

erebus42

Helike flips like the coin. It could easily be either a heroic or villainous name. Honestly it could be like Archer or Ranger and fulfill either or ambiguous roles.

Cicero

The Royal Conjurer – came from The Tyrant’s Court. Clearly a villain, note that Cat checked with him to see if there was a need for a private word (villain to villain).

Grizzled Fantassin sounds like a neutral name, but probably passes as a hero.

Adrian_V

Oh this journey i bet it was full of tears, laughs and noodles!!!

Cat may as well had said “they grow so fast” when seeing the band, even if at least one is twice or even more her age xD

Loved the little bet too, and can’t wait for the enxt chapter to finish the tale.

Also i ship the poisoner and the magistrate, because i am horrible like that xD

TeK

The unfortunate implication here is twofold: Bard wanted Levant to appear (probably as a counterweight to Procer) and persuaded Gigantes to help them, and asecond is that apparently we missee another agent Bard can act through – angels.

Nairne .01

Why? The White Knight was there and so was the Gray Pilgrim...

TeK

I don’t understand what you mean.

framfrit

bard seems to be limited so that she can only mainly interact around named there were a few hints like her second shown body appearing and being sure that the white knight was nearby but main evidence being from the dead king himself if i remember right he basically implied procer serves as a battlefield between the two where he tries to keep named out of key roles and the bard pushes for it ala plot for hasenbach to get a name

Salt

The Bard only being able to act through Named was the Black Knight’s hypothesis, and it was proven to be wrong. She showed up after Amadeus fully lost the mantle of Black Knight, as well as to the sisters when they were mortals instead of the capital-S Sisters.

> "It was my theory that you could only work through Named," Amadeus said. "I find it rather horrifying that you are evidently not so restricted."

The prevailing story-theory is Catherine's own, which by latest account during her chat with Kairos is that the Bard simply appears whenever there is sufficient narrative weight warrant it

> "She was not sent for," I said. "She was sent. Audience was bought and paid: desperation, blood and need."

>His good eye narrowed. "And?" he pressed.

>"There was a lot to lose," I said. "You could call it weight."

I interpreted what Tek was saying as it's a new confirmation that the Bard can interact directly with Angels, where previously we only had confirmation that she could interact with mortals (Named or not)

Snappy

He saying that we were neglecting another agent of the wandering bards – angels. If she can act through angels she has even more influence on all angel people/things.

While she can talk to white knight and grey pilgrim, she still needs to convince them or catch them in a story. But if she can to to them through angels, she can effectively dictate to them what she wants.

Burlyraven

Frederic's story is throwing its weight around, getting him invited to this meeting and all. He'd be right on the edge anyway, as far as invites go, but his presence definitely feels... placed.

I'm also unreasonably happy to see a literal mercenary Name with the Grizzled Fantassin, although I do have to wonder if the Name has any tradition behind it, or if she's the first. If she's not the first, then I wonder how many people become Fantassins with the goal of obtaining that Name (and her devotion to Cordelia is almost cute).

WuseMajor

I think they're trying to attain the position of Old Soldier, even if they're not actually trying for the Name. Since, well, if you're not going to become an Old Soldier, there's really only one other option.

John

There are Old Soldiers, and there are Bold Soldiers, but I'm not sure we've ever seen any three-word Names.

Burlyraven

All soldiers are trying to be old soldiers, but the Grizzled Fantassin is the old soldier.

Black Spiral Dancer

The name reminded me of Solid Snake and The Boss from Metal Gear...

MrMaturity

I don't get it. Why does this mean that Kairos saved everyone or that the Bard is playing everyone?

TeK

Well obviously the thing you need to understand is...

TO BE CONTINUED

Bakkasama

Kairos stopped the choir of Mercy from intervening against Hierarch during the trial and this story shows that the Bard can influence Mercy. So presumably he stopped her from using it against them there.

Big I

Makes me wonder if the original Pilgrim was a Villain, if Mercy was backing the other side.

ninegardens

He is, after all, the GREY pilgrim.

Konstantin von Karstein

The Grey Pilgrim is basically Gandalf on steroids, and a Villain using the Morningstar as theme seems unlikely.

Javvies

The Shine Aspect was said to be a universal Grey Pilgrim Aspect – one that every iteration of the Name had, and it's quite clearly an expression of Light.

Besides, the first Grey Pilgrim being a Hero wouldn't preclude a Proceran Hero from fighting him.

After all, we know that Procer has had a historical habit of calling every Named who opposed their expansive and imperialist tendencies a Villain.

Plus, just look at the history with Callow – plenty of Callowan Named have fought Procer and vice versa. Hell, excepting the last 20 or so years (since the Conquest), the Crown of Callow usually came with a Heroic Name, and basically always had allied quasi-subordinate Heroic Named as well, but that never stopped the Procerans from trying to conquer and annex Callow over their dead bodies.

Although, I remember Cat quietly speculating that not all the Founders of the Dominion were Heroes, and not all of their successors were Heroes either, and thinking about asking Hanno to use his Recall Aspect to discreetly investigate the matter ... it would be a useful precedent that Barrow Sword could benefit from, among other things.

Salt

Uh wait hold on. Hold on. Super wild theory here. Are the Grey Pilgrim and the Choir of Mercy potentially traitors? Is Tariq Isbili setting off the Judgement Corpse weapon right now, even as this meeting is happening? Who the hell is available to stop him right now if he is?

All the Woe are in the Arsenal meeting. Cordelia, Vivienne, the White Knight, Mirror Knight, Kingfisher Prince, basically every single Named or Major Character in the Grand Alliance that has the clout or experience to stop the Pilgrim from doing what he wants is currently INSIDE the Arsenal.

The Drow are all on the front lines against the Dead King. Black and Malicia are tied up in their civil war, the Tyrant is dead. Juniper is partially incapacitated, Basilia is preoccupied.

We know the Pilgrim heeds the Bard's orders (when she made him pause just long enough for Saint to cut into the Twilight Crown, intentionally not stopping her in time), and that he has a strangely high opinion of her. We found out just now that the Bard offered Mercy such a convincing argument that they feasibly left one of their own champions to perish at the hands of the original Grey Pilgrim, which might feasibly mean that they judged the Bards big plan merciful enough to have a long-term working relationship with her. We know that, if "tabula rasa" was done by Mercy that the choir actively covered their association with the Bard up and that Tariq also covered it up – there's no way he wouldn't have known considering he's the Grey Pilgrim and Mercy is his choir. We know that Tariq is also better at navigating the Twilight ways than almost anyone currently alive, and would this have no issue being in just the right place at just the right time whenever he so wishes. We know that Tariq will commit whatever evils he needs to if he thinks a much greater good will come of it.

So we know that Tariq and Mercy are both extremely positive towards the Bard, who wants the weapon set off, and to an extent will heed her orders, and are some of the least likely to be bothered by crossing lines if there is a reason for it. We know that every character that could feasibly stop them right now is currently far away or in the Arsenal listening to this report at this very instant. We know that the Pilgrim could navigate anywhere necessary through the twilight ways which he forged with his own crown. We know that between the Bard and Mercy, he has enough Above-oriented power and knowledge to know exactly where the weapon is and how to set it off.

They have the motive, the tools, and the perfect circumstance right now.

What if the real important secret here is that the entire Choir of Mercy and the Grey Pilgrim are potentially traitors, but by taking the time to be briefed on it all at once, it's already too late?

MrMaturity

Big oofs here. That has the feel of being right.....

Daltos

This, this right here. 100 silver, on the table. Any takers?

ninegardens

I'd bet against it. Tariq's character development arc wouldn't feel right with this level of treachery; I'm expecting to see a positive payoff for Cat ressurecting him. And not expecting to see direct trouble from the Bard again until she's had a chance to recuperate and set up. Also, Auger would parry this.

While the theory is cool it is SUPER specific; I'll happily bet against most things this specific.

Salt

Note the Augur likely doesn't have the ability to parry this, it was mentioned that the Pilgrim is shielded from oracular vision similarly to Catherine, back when they were fighting the Skein in Liesse. He mentioned that both he and Cat would hinder oracles, while the Saint was outright immune to them. The Pilgrim being muddled in the Augur's sight wouldn't even be a cause for alarm, it would just be par for the course.

In my opinion I think it'd be rather in character for him – considering his characterization is centered around lesser evils for the greater good, he's a habitual oath-breaker if he sees the need for it, and he generally takes the direction of Mercy as the be-all and end-all of knowing if the lesser evil is worth it or not. If it was him alone, chances are he'd be one of the more trustworthy members of the GA. If the choir of Mercy truly is compromised though, he'll likely take their direction as law, even over his own personal judgement.

But hey it is just a theory, could very easily be wrong.

I'm just (personally speaking) a bit suspicious of Mercy specifically, right now, because it feels like there's a reason for them being the choir mentioned here. Judgement would've made more sense otherwise as it's use of a corpse from Judgement that the revelation is supposed to be about, or it could've been made unclear which choir it was if it didn't matter – but it was Mercy that was specified.

Ninestrings

I got ten silver on The Relentless Magistrate and The Poisoner knocking boots by the end of this.

ninegardens

I've got ten silvers on them having already done so.

talenel

Ten The Poisoner has been secretly sleeping with the whole band without any of the other knowing.

Tom

50 silver on them having done so right before this scene:

> The Relentless Magistrate, who I could not help but not had yet to shave, rose to offer us all a stiff bow.

ninegardens

Gotta say, I'm really loving hearing the hijinx of this off-screen band of five. It's like... totally familiar, but also condensed enough that it doesn't feel like a drag... in any other story it would feel silly and/or cheap, but given the way PGtE rolls, it just works.

ninegardens

So, is the big secret that Nessie was referring to the fact that no matter who pulled the trigger, Bard was going to be the one who got to aim the weapon?

Javvies

Bard.
As expected.

We already knew that she was responsible for the creation of the League.

Now she's deeply involved with the creation of the Dominion. Though, considering the Dominion was founded by a Band of Five, that shouldn't really be a surprise. Although the nature of her involvement is troubling.

I wouldn't be surprised to learn that Bard was responsible for pushing the betrayal and usurpation of the first, original Dread Emperor of Praes, establishing the cycle of betrayal and murder that has ruled Praes for its entire existence. Also, I suspect that she's been involved in the problems every Dread Emperor/ Empress who tried to create an internal solution to the Praesi overpopulation/insufficient food production problems.

mamm0nn

So, a lot of expectation that the woman that stepped in might be the Bard, but it might just be one of the Gigantes that stepped in and began their aid to Levant in earnest at that point. Or Treacherous in a wig, of course, seducing the angels with his luscious melons.

Bellaco

It was probably Traitorous. It's always Traitorous.

erebus42

Except when it's Irritant

JJR

I've never seen Traitorous and Irritant in the same room together before, have you?

Andrew Smith

but we have seen Traitorous and Traitorous in a room so that proves nothing

Xinci

Well, I am glad to finally get a confirmation that Angels being of Creation would have them reinforce its effects. It's also rather amusing to me to also get a that Fantassins death counts are possibly so prolific that one being able to retire is standard for a Name. Or at least indicates a Fantassin that has gone through so much stuff and is capable of retirement is able to beNamed, kinda reminds me of the Horned Lords.

Tom

This feels too simple to be correct, but I think there's enough overlap between the roles that Cat and WB play for Cat to end up stealing WB's Name... Or something along those lines. Plus Cat has precedents for that kind of stealing, and WB clearly doesn't want to be doing it anymore.

But! That then begs the question of how Cat would deal with the despair that WB has sunk into over the millenia. So maybe instead of stealing the Name for herself, Cat would steal it and imbue it into Cardinal in some way with Masego's help, sort of like how they crafted the Severity. But in this case the entire capacity of the Name would be tied to an institution that fills the role that the Bard previously did, rather than a simple magic sword.

I think there are also precedents for binding such things into lasting institutions, like with that goofy bunch north of Callow that bound a bunch of souls into a thing that Akua ended up stealing. Bellerephon also comes to mind, though I suppose that was a more organic origin.

Liliet

This was already a whole thing: "thief, rival, successor". Wandering Bard was trying to slot Catherine into a Role mirror/parallel/directly opposed/similar to hers (arguably all of these can be the same thing), that would possibly then straight up usurp hers. Probably because she wants to be done with her job, though any number of other reasons are possible (it would lock Catherine down in gods' rules, it would lock Catherine's Accords in reliably through her being their eternal guardian, there is a secret quest that must be done that's unlocked by having a new person take the position, literally whatever).

Catherine was opposed to the idea, though the question is whether it's (1) because of general caution about other people picking things for her, (2) contrariness 'whatever the Bard wants must be bad', (3) specific understanding of what the Role is and wanting nothing to do with it. Well, probably some combination of the three, really.

But there is a definite parallel in Bard getting a Choir to back off and what Catherine has been able to do.

Frivolous

I agree with the parallel of WB having an aspect that allows her to intercede with Choirs, and Cat having gotten angels to back off. That's one of the strongest parallels I've seen between the 2 women so far.

If my vote counted, I'd vote for #2 as being the most relevant. Cat is just horribly contrary. She never satisfies the expectations of others.

Dominic Corbin

So I was struck by a thought, but I haven't gone to check at all if this makes sense. Apologies if this has already been mooted about.

Could the Bard BE Triumphant?

Triumphant comes up all the time as one of the most successful villains until her mysterious disappearance, and has never been confirmed as dead. "May she never return" is uttered almost always in conjunction with her name, and I have to think that sets up a story that practically guarantees her return at some point. It's a shoe that's been waiting to drop for several books at least.

Where it may break down is timeline. I'm not sure if the Dead King was established before or after Triumphant, I just can't recall all the history we've learned. I suppose it's also possible Triumphant could be one of the roles the Intercessor has played over the centuries.

Any thoughts?

Javvies

The Dead King predated Triumphant. By a lot.

She was the last person to come close to achieving a true apotheosis, before Cat.

He was cautiously hopeful that Triumphant would succeed, and disappointed when she failed.

IIRC, anyways.

The Dead King predated the first Dread Emperor of Praes. He's been around a long damned time.

And I'm quite confident that Bard did not play the role of Triumphant, though I would not be surprised in the slightest to learn that Bard played some kind of a role in both Triumphant's rise and in her fall.

Shveiran

This.

Also, while the Bard is obviously very powerful, her mastery is over indirect power.

Triumphant was as much of a blunt instrument as a magic wielder can be; she was an overwhelming force, not a careful schemer. I seriously doubt the Bard has the personal power to enact Triumphant's specific deeds, mostly because if she had the Empress Most Dread ability to nuke and summon as well as her own experience and aptitude for plots and narrative, well, there is no point to even try taking her on.

Triumphant required a Calernia-wide rebellion and two other superpowers to be brought down, and if that was Bard having fun acting as a blunt instrument, that means she never really lost.

Salt

Yep. Even if the Bard wanted to try playacting as something that isn't the Intercessor, it likely wouldn't work since:

A) that's the kind of juicy secret that just screams "uncover me by Heroic coincidence at the worst possible time" and

B) if the Tyrant is correct, two of the three things "she always flees" is direct touch and promised death

I think it would've been rather comical and impossible to cover up if Triumphant had a habit of popping out of existence every time her life was remotely threatened.

308924810a

Soo hey, @Erraticerrata why is the Fortress Morgentor at twilight's pass relevant? If the Dead King holds Rhenia and Hannoven can't he just march troops into the Lycaonese lowlands underwater along the bottom of Lake Pavin from Hannoven, or underwater along the coast from Rhenia? Is it all a multi-century deception by the Dead King to ensure he can defeat the Lycaonese whenever he wants to?

And on that note it sort of feels like a fleet on the lakes being used to intercept undead turtle ships, or as platforms to cast spells/create holy water against subsurface undead could be useful to the war effort. And it might be possible to just shift the Proceran navy through the Twilight Paths or Faerie into the lakes. And countering such ships would almost require that the Dead King to invest in specialized forces that, should they gain superiority in the Lakes, the Grand alliance could afford to just bypass, with their lines of supply and march running through the Twilight Paths and the underground routes of the Dwarves.

Earl of Purple

Same reason he's building a bridge- water is corrosive. If not to the undead armies, certainly to their gear. He could equip them with bronze swords and armour (which wouldn't rust), but then they'd be at a disadvantage against troops with modern steel weaponry. Also they wouldn't be able to bring any bows or crossbows with them; the wood would rot, but more importantly the bowstrings would get soaked and stretch, losing their tautness. He can and he does march forces over the lake's bed, but those forces rely on surprise- and there's other forts on the lake's banks as well.

Chapter 36: Trepidation

"It is traditional to kill to preserve your secrets, but I have found it more efficient to instead kill everyone who would be offended by the revelation."

– Dread Empress Massacre

A claim like that required elaboration and it was had. The long-dead fantassin had apparently been quite the chatty fellow once he got talking, so even though the Relentless Magistrate had only been cut into a few of his memories a fairly complete picture of the events could be had. None of us were all that concerned with the history of it all, though, not right now. So when the floor was opened for questions, it began with Hasenbach asking for more details about the intervention by the 'unknown woman'.

It was the Bard. Of course it was the fucking Bard, and I wasn't sure why any of us were wasting our time pretending otherwise.

"The White Knight called on the Brighteyed Lords," the Painted Knife said. "Those you know as the Ophanim. And they came down in a wave of burning light, to strike down the Grey Pilgrim, but even among the blinding radiance a silhouette could be seen to have appeared."

That had Intercessor written all over it, as far as I was concerned. There weren't a lot of people who could take a hit from an angel – I certainly couldn't, at least not without Sve Noc and the right story behind me – but the Wandering Bard was certain to be one of them. Even if it killed her, it wasn't like she'd stay dead.

"Was the woman ever identified, by either your prisoner or any others in the valley?" Hanno asked.

I snorted, ignoring the looks I got from some in the room.

"We all know who that is," I said, "and faces don't matter a whit to her. She'd had more of those than we've had meals."

"If I can hear even a fake name, I can search through old lives for a connection," the White Knight reminded me.

"I think you underestimate how good the old bird is at hiding her tracks," I bluntly replied. "But be my guest."

I'd have to remember to ask if they still had the dead fantassin about, though, since I could probably take those memories through Night and make of them something that could be seen by multiple people. Could be useful. The Painted Knife had patiently waited for us to finish speaking, but it was actually the Magistrate that she bid to answer Hanno's question.

"The prisoner never saw a face, though the silhouette was definitely a woman's and the timbre of her voice supports this," the Relentless Magistrate seriously said. "The Grey Pilgrim was not in the field of vision of the prisoner when this took place, as he was looking at the White Knight, which leaves us instead with an impression of her face as she reacted."

My brow rose. They'd been very thorough, I noted appreciatively, and they weren't hiding the imperfections of their results as some might be tempted to in front of such an influential audience.

"She looked surprised," the Relentless Magistrate said. "And she spoke, though the noise of Mercy's descent drowned it out. I believe, however, that by reading her lips I have pieced together what the word was. It is not, however, a certainty."

"Your work has been exemplary so far," the First Prince said, "and certainty is a rare thing indeed, in these matters."

"Agreed," I said, drumming my fingers against the tabletop. "On both counts."

The Royal Conjurer looked pleased, though the Poisoner was harder to read. My approval was something of a mixed bag for the rest, not unexpectedly.

"It was in Chantant," the Relentless Magistrate said. "Trouveur."

Which meant 'finder'. Huh, not exactly something I'd associate with the Bard. Not all at the high table seemed to share my opinion, though. At a glance both Proceran royals, Roland and the White Knight all seemed to be varying between grimness and understanding.

"I'm guessing I missed something," I noted.

Considering only the native speakers and Hanno – a filthy cheating cheater who cheated, because his aspect was bullshit – seemed to have caught it, I'd guess it was something Proceran. Probably specifically Alamans, as the scholar with the Arlesite name didn't seem to know about it either.

"In older Alamans traditions, a trouveur was something like a troubadour," the Rogue Sorcerer told me.

Oh, Roland. Both reliably competent and socially skilled, why hadn't Zeze figured out a way to make more of him yet? Still, would you just look at that. It might be a few centuries late but we'd caught the tail of the Wandering Bard at last. Whatever it was that'd gone down in the Verdant Hollow, she'd clearly not wanted anyone to know about it.

"I will attempt to confirm this independently," the White Knight said. "It may take some time, but it should not be impossible to learn more. Until then, however..."

"I am willing to operate on the assumption that it is the Intercessor we are dealing with," Cordelia agreed. "Queen Catherine?"

"I was sold the moment someone stepped in on Mercy in smiting mood," I drily replied. "But consider me formally in agreement, if that's what you're after."

It was, so we moved on with little ceremony. Masego had questions but no burning desire to ask them himself – at least not right now – so I did on his behalf.

"On the subject of the Ophanim being made to 'leave'," I said. "I've inquiries about some of the details."

It was the Magistrate who fielded answers once more, and he began by striking a cautious tone.

"The prisoner saw nothing of what took place after that, not until the light had dispersed and the soldiers fled," the dark-haired hero said.

Which their report had made clear enough. The fantassins led by the White Knight had skirmished with the warrior band led by the Grey Pilgrim over the span of an afternoon before it turned into a proper battle over a grassy slope. The battle had turned in the favour of the Levantines. Their training and equipment were both flatly inferior but they were much better at skirmishing than the mercenaries, so they'd softened up the fantassins over the afternoon.

When the fight had gone south for the Procerans, the White Knight had stepped back from the frontline and called on Mercy, which was when our old friend had stepped in. Our sole witness had gone temporarily blind and only got his bearings later, running away with the survivors and wounded after they found the Levantines had not taken the opportunity to slaughter them while they were blind. Hierophant didn't want me to fill in the blanks in the history, though, he was after something else.

"I understand that," I said. "But, to be clear, even after the silhouette was seen the light did intensify?"

The man frowned, collecting his thoughts for a moment.

"That is correct, Your Majesty," the Relentless Magistrate said.

Masego let out what someone who loved him less than I did might have called a cackle.

"A limitation," Zeze said in Mtethwa. "Finally."

A surprising amount of people spoke that tongue, considering the side of the Whitecaps we were on, but it was still far from a full roster. I cleared my throat.

"Lord Hierophant has deduced something of import from the detail," I said. "Which he will now share with us."

Masego's Chantant was significantly better when listening than speaking, so it was in Lower Miezana he addressed the high table.

"The Choir of Mercy did strike at the valley," Hierophant said. "It explains the presence tabula rasa effect observed in the valley by the Royal Conjuror, which would not have been there if the Ophanim had not fully aligned with Creation."

Hanno was fairly learned in matters of sorcery, at least as much as someone without the Gift could be, but unlike me he didn't have the benefit of being familiar with the Praesi parlance in the art.

"If I understand correctly, Hierophant," the White Knight slowly said, "you are stating that Mercy did smite the Grey Pilgrim?"

"Yes," Masego bluntly replied.

Surprise flickered across half a dozen faces and from the corner of my eye I found that the Painted Knife was grinning, muttering honour to the Blood with an awed look on her face. Must have been nice for the national pride that the original Pilgrim had walked off Mercy's attentions – and where Procerans would have considered it an indication of virtue, with the Dominion it was a flip of the coin if they'd decide it'd been about pure strength instead. I was pretty sure we were about to get into the specifics of being smote by angels, which should run afoul of at least one Proceran heresy law, so I decided to give a warning.

"Deeper explanation will require drawing on learning that some deem to be blasphemous," I said. "I tend to find the academic tone there refreshing, but I'm not unaware that others differ in opinion."

Cordelia flicked a discreet glance at her secretary, who ceased writing.

"Given the situation, I believe such objections can be set aside," the First Prince of Procer mildly said. "Lord White?"

"I've no objection," Hanno said, sounding faintly amused.

Considering he'd once told me his own mother had kept to Below, I suspected he'd be harder to shock theologically than people would expect of him.

"Try to keep it concise," I told Masego in Kharsum. "And please don't talk about dissecting anything someone prays to."

"My children will eat your goats," he replied in the same, sounding a little miffed.

I threw him an offended look. There'd been no need for that sort of language, I was just giving advice. Given how important cattle was to the Tribes, that was actually a pretty brutal putdown for them – I'd seen orcs brawl over less. I bet it was Robber who'd taught him that one, though. The malevolent imp had an almost encyclopedic knowledge of taunts and insults in every tongue he was even slightly proficient in. I caught Hanno covering his mouth as if to hide a yawn – or a chuckle, I realized, since I'd forgotten he actually knew Kharsum.

"Angelic power is fundamentally like any other," Masego told everyone. "It has fixed rules and properties, however esoteric, which allows it to be measured and predicted. In this case, the tabula rasa observed means that there was a strike in the valley. That it does not seem to have caused any deaths means a property of that power was amended."

The First Prince of Procer observed him carefully.

"And that is... feasible, even for one who is Named?" she probed.

"I cannot think of another who could do this," Hanno admitted.

The Fallen Monk had been able to screw with Light, from what I recalled, but having fought him my opinion was that a scrap between him and an angel would have begun and ended with the sound 'splat'. The Intercessor wasn't some second-stringer with a grudge against priests, though.

"She's not like other Named," I said. "We've known that for some time. It's the reason we're tugging at threads that are literally centuries old."

Mind you, if it wasn't an aspect that let her do that I'd eat my own fingers. The Intercessor might be in a class of her own in some regards, but she wasn't beyond the constraints of being Named. Beating her thrice forced her away, she'd avoided the Hierarch like the plague and my money was on her having only three aspects just like the rest of us. One was the wandering trick, coming and going everywhere, and another had to be her sight for stories. That left whatever the Hells this was to look out for.

"Yet it is telling that the strike did land," Masego continued. "As she clearly did not want it to. It implies she does not have the ability to outright command angelic entities."

Which was the good news. So now came the bad ones.

"It does seem, however, that she is able to affect the properties of angelic power," Hierophant continued. "Be it directly or indirectly. Which property in particular was tinkered with I cannot say, as there are too many possibilities. Reduced potency, different parameters for harm, different manners of harm..."

He trailed off, shrugging, as he'd made his point. The specifics didn't actually matter all that much when it came down to it. Whatever the form it was a problem, to say the least, that if a metaphorical angelic arrow got shot the Bard could decide what kind of an arrow it became.

"Are you saying that the Intercessor has the ability to... reforge angels as she wills?" the First Prince said, sounding appalled.

"No," Masego said. "In a sense it is impossible to affect an angel directly – even those that are said to be 'dead' and have left behind a corpse remain in their Choir and unchanged. The Choirs are fixed entities. As befitting the way that she has been named an intercessor, I would theorize that what she affects are the 'senses' of angels. Not unlike coloured glass tinting one's perception of the world when that world itself remains objectively unchanged."

"So Mercy struck," I said. "But it didn't kill anyone, because simultaneously it saw that there was no one it should be killing."

"In essence," Hierophant agreed.

If the lever could be pulled down on that, though, it could also be pulled up. Which would be something of an issue if someone had, say, an angel corpse lying around that they'd unwisely made a weapon out of, Cordelia. That wasn't a conversation that needed to be had in front of the Painted Knife and her fellows, though, so instead I asked if anyone still had questions for the band. The First Prince apparently shared my curiosity as to the fate of the dead fantassin, but we were both to be disappointed: it'd been the sorceries of the Barrow Lord that kept him moving and aware, so within a few days of the villains' destruction the corpse had begun breaking down. The aftermath of necromancy tended to be rough on bodies, from what I recalled. Made sense. You could only shove so much magic into even a living body before things started going south and corpses were even less flexible.

"He was given a marked grave in the way of the southern companies," the Grizzled Fantassin said, almost challengingly. "He kept his contract to the end, and deserves the long peace same as any of us."

It might have been possible to extract a few things out of the remains of the remains, in practice, but it honestly wasn't worth the effort considering it'd require either myself, Akua or one of few oldest Mighty in Cleves to see to that extraction in person. Being halfway decent people, the rest of the high table weren't inclined to argue in favour of graverobbing anyway. Hanno made plain to the three heroes that he'd want a more in-depth talk about their investigation at some point, and I casually informed my pair of the same, but aside from that we were done here. With the questions, anyway. They were released to rest and recreation, and within moments of the door closing we were dealing in state secrets.

"The crown of Callow has already made known its concerns regarding Procer's continued custody of the corpse of an angel," Vivienne said, leading the offensive. "After today, the dangers of continuing down that path should be even clearer."

Not what Hasenbach wanted to hear, I saw on her face – practiced a diplomat as she was, she'd spent too much time around me. Enough I'd learned some of her tricks, and that pleasant yet distant smile on her face tended to come out when she was feeling pressed.

"Secretary Corrales," the First Prince said, "if you would speak the appropriate part from the transcript of the Dead King's words at the end of the Salian conference?"

The tanned man sharply nodded. Idly I noted that Hasenbach had not said read and that the man was not looking at any papers. She was fond of precision, the First Prince.

"-and it will tell you, should you be clever enough, of the doom you all so narrowly escaped by the grace of Kairos Theodosian," the secretary quoted.

"Thank you," Cordelia smiled. "Now, should we take the Hidden Horror at his word then there seems to be different trouble here than the risks inherent to the Principate's possession of a large-scale defensive weapon."

Hasenbach wasn't a fool, much as her insistence to keep the corpse still angered me. It wasn't like I didn't understand the temptation of keeping the angelic weapon around. She'd only seriously consider using it if the Grand Alliance were already collapsing, anyhow, so from her perspective there really wasn't anything to lose in keeping it except some unease from my camp. It was a card up her sleeve in case the night got too dark for the dawn to pierce through, and unlike Named and coalition armies it was also something she had complete control over. No one would be pulling that trigger without her say-so, at least in theory. That had to be reassuring, considering that in practice Cordelia Hasenbach was sharing the reins over the war that would decide the survival of her nation with more people than any ruler would like.

My issue with this whole blunder had previously been that doomsday weapons were disaster magnets no one could ever really control – and were prone to backfiring massively – but with Zeze's words there was fresh unease to add to the brew. A weapon that answered to someone else first was best snapped over your knee.

"The Dead King implied that Kairos spared us something," I agreed, "which fits with the end of the Salian Peace. The angelic remains dredged up are allegedly from one of the Seraphim-"

"They are," Hanno flatly said. "You may take my word on it."

This might be a tad of a sensitive subject for the Sword of Judgement, I thought, but there weren't ways to tiptoe around it that I could see.

"I will," I agreeably replied. "So we've got a Seraphim corpse and a confirmation that the Intercessor can affect angels. The Tyrant of Helike then masterminds the Hierarch rising to... obstruct the Choir of Judgement, so to speak, and in the wake of that the Dead King speaks of us being spared doom by Kairos Theodosian's actions. The picture there is pretty clear, as far as I'm concerned."

If Cordelia had pulled the trigger on the Judgement corpse before Judgement got walled off by Bellerophon's maddest son, the Bard would have had a degree of control over what happened. Now, though, the corpse could have no tie to the Choir – even Hanno, its champion on Creation, could not get a peep out of them as far as I knew. If Masego was right and the Bard worked over angels by screwing with their 'senses', then the current state of the weapon was a dead end for her. She couldn't trick an inanimate object, after all. The Tyrant of Helike had, true to form, solved an old headache by leaving us with a fresh one: right now, no one had any fucking idea what would actually happen if Cordelia pulled the trigger. Gods, but sometimes I wished I'd killed the little bastard myself. It'd at least give me something to look back to fondly when still dealing with the fallout of his actions several years after his death.

"By the Dead King's own admission, the danger has been averted," the First Prince noted.

"Are we now to take the word of the Hidden Horror for truth, Your Highness?" Roland politely asked. "Let us not pretend the creature will not serve its own interests above all."

"If the weapon is a threat to the Dead King, his interest is in discrediting it," the Kingfisher Prince pointed out. "Which he has not, strictly speaking, accomplished here."

In the sense that the Bard wouldn't currently be holding the reins, he had a point. On the other hand, Neshamah had neatly soured us on the Bard with this and further deepened my already deep objections to Hasenbach keeping that looming disaster of a weapon around. He'd gotten his gains, as he tended to.

"He hates the Intercessor like poison," I said. "Insofar as he's damaging her in our eyes, I'd tend to take him at his word. He's too canny of an old thing to try a lie there, there's too many Named in play for one of those to actually work for long."

The Intercessor herself would delight in revealing the inaccuracies, if only to further establish herself as the Dead King's ancient sworn enemy that we should all be listening to. After all, if the Hidden Horror was going out of his way to discredit her then she must be a threat. Truth be told, I did believe her to be that. Only to more than just Neshamah.

"Adanna," Hanno said, voice clear and calm. "If the remains of the Seraphim were used in a ritual and the Wandering Bard amplified the effects as much as she could, what sort of a scale would we be looking at?"

"I am uncertain," the Blessed Artificer reluctantly admitted. "Though as a rule, the greater the quantity of Light the simpler the purpose it can carry. At a greater than regional scale, harm is likely the sole effect that could reliably be had. I do not have the proper references to hazard a guess at the scale of propagation."

From the corner of my eye I saw Masego finishing a flourish of the wrist with a wooden stylus that's somehow written in dark letters over the tabletop. I leaned in closer, glancing at equations that were giving me a headache just to try to parse.

"Masego?" I asked.

He breathed out a little noise of triumph.

"The Whitecaps are the limiting factor," Hierophant called out. "Assuming there is a hard limit to the power a Choir can wield and the source would be in central Procer, we are looking at an estimated two thirds of Calernia being affected. Rhenia and parts of Hannover would be untouched, up north, while the eastern limit would be the Whitecaps down to the Stygian border with Delos. Assuming a dilution effect by large bodies of water-"

"At such a scale, there would not be," the Blessed Artificer told him. "A higher threshold of propagation, but that's all."

Masego let out a noise of grudging appreciation.

"In that case," he continued, "the city of Levante might be unaffected, and the mountainous parts of the Titanomachy would certainly be. Everything else would be within range."

"Ashur?" I faintly asked.

He shrugged.

"Fifty-fifty odds," he admitted. "The sea is an unpredictable boundary."

Utter silence followed in the aftermath of his words. Putting together the words of Masego and the Artificer, the picture painted was... horrifying, for lack of a stronger word. More than nine tenths of Procer and Levant dead, the better part of the Free Cities – including its two largest cities, Helike and Nicae – and even odds on the complete annihilation of the Thalassocracy. An end to the ratlings, and at the moment the Firstborn as well. Callow and Praes would get to hide behind the mountains and four of the Free Cities were far enough east to be spared, but the sheer loss of life... Fuck.

"It would end the armies of the Dead King as well," the Blessed Artificer quietly said. "And most likely destroy the Hellgate in Keter."

At the cost of what, two thirds of the population of Calernia? The Dominion wasn't densely populated, but Procer sure as Hells was and the Free Cities were aptly named. No wonder the Hidden Horror had believed everyone would turn on the Bard after learning this.

"Removing the hard limit in power, the Whitecaps will eventually be vaporized and we're looking at full saturation of the continent," Masego noted. "Including through the ground into the Kingdom Under, though that will take up to days longer."

"Even under your limited model the crater in central Procer is likely to touch dwarven tunnels," the Blessed Artificer condescendingly said, "and they'd be looking at the loss of a few principalities' worth of territory as well."

Ah, I thought with fixed smile on my face, would you look at that. They'd actually made it worse, which I'd doubted was possible. Now we also had to worry about the dwarves considering the weapon a threat and deciding to strike first.

"Merciless Gods, Hasenbach," I feelingly said. "How much more will it take to convince you to drop that fucking thing at the bottom of the Skiron Ocean?"

"The Kingdom of Callow has grave concerns about the keeping of such a potentially calamitous weapon," Vivienne said, translating my words into something more diplomatic.

"Much of what was said here is speculation," the First Prince mildly replied. "And even this speculation points to the risk having passed."

"If a proper method to wield the remains is created, it is the sort of weapon that could win us this war," the Blessed Artificer agreed.

"Or it could kill us all," the Rogue Sorcerer gently reminded her.

"You have personally patronized the Quartered Seasons weapon, Queen Catherine," Cordelia reminded me. "Which carries great risks as well, to my recollection."

"I've limited information on it, but it's ultimately a Grand Alliance initiative and not a purely Callowan one," I replied. "I've been preparing the results for perusal, as a matter of fact, now that tangible progress has been made. I can't say the same about that corpse you're dragging around."

"Then your issue is the lack of Callowan observers, not the weapon itself," the First Prince said.

My brow rose. This kind of wordplay might be useful in a place like the Highest Assembly, where appearances were everything and such little victories counted, but she ought to know better than to try to finagle me. I was in no way above using a bloody hatchet where a stiletto failed to get the point across.

"No," I bluntly said. "My issue is with anyone's possession of a weapon that could potentially wipe out two thirds of Calernia. There's no equivalence to be drawn there, First Prince. If Quartered Seasons goes wrong it'll be a disaster, but a survivable one. Your 'large-scale defensive weapon' is a blade put to the throat of millions, and I did not torch such a weapon in Praesi hands only to meekly accept your keeping the same."

A bit of an exaggeration there, since Black had been the one to destroy Liesse while I'd actually been inclined to side with Malicia in the heat of the moment, but it wasn't like anyone else here knew that. Blue eyes stayed on me as Hasenbach attempted to gauge how serious I was being, and I hid nothing: this was genuinely unacceptable. It'd been a liability before, but now it was something a lot worse.

"We have gone far beyond the remit of this council," the First Prince eventually said. "If there are grievances to be had, there are mechanisms to address them under the treaties binding the Grand Alliance."

My eyes narrowed. The diplomatic thing here would have been implying it was up for negotiation before brushing me off, opening the path for later private talks if she wasn't willing to hash this out in the open here. The First Prince had not done that. She was sending the message there wasn't room for compromise there, and coming from a diplomat of her calibre that surprised me. What was driving her to keep her finger on that trigger at all costs? I glanced at the White Knight and found him looking remote, almost absent-minded. Whether it was because Judgement had been spoken of or because he saw the disputes of crown as beyond him, I could not be certain. Either way it was less than helpful.

"It might allay some unease if specialists were allowed to take a look at this weapon and ascertain its possible effects," Vivienne suggested.

A fair suggestion, I thought, but not a tempting one for Procer. In our case said specialist would be Masego, which I somehow doubted they would go for. They weren't idiots, they had to know that letting the Hierophant riffle through anything miraculous was as good as allowing him to shut it down at will.

"Something to discuss under different circumstances, Lady Dartwick," the First Prince politely replied.

Huh. Really not giving even the shadow of an inch, was she?

"White Knight?" I tried.

If he wasn't going to step in by himself, I'd drag him into the melee by the scruff of the neck.

"It would be unwise to further debate this without having sought more information," Hanno eventually said. "This council has served its purpose, I believe, and need not be further prolonged."

I hid my displeasure. Not what I'd wanted to hear, though I supposed it was much like him to keep silent until he'd dug through enough memories he had a better idea of what he was dealing with. The White Knight disliked rushing to decision when there were still cards yet to be revealed. Though he didn't show it, I suspected he was a lot warier of making mistakes now that the Seraphim were no longer looking over his shoulder. With both Hasenbach and Hanno supporting this all coming to an end there was little point in pursuing the opposite, so I folded and we called the meeting to an end. The First Prince caught my eye as we began to disperse, however, and her secretary passed along an invitation to walk with her a span. Before long we were sharing a stretch of hallway between my limp and her measured stride, Vivienne and the Kingfisher Prince trailing behind us.

"I have concerns," the First Prince told me with unusual forthrightness.

For her to drop the more elegant methods she preferred, they had to be some pretty dire fucking concerns.

"You've heard mine," I said, frowning. "I'm all ears for yours."

"The Truce and Terms are proving to be highly unstable," Cordelia Hasenbach said. "An uncomfortable number of collaborators were found by the Intercessor among both Chosen and Damned, and now the White Knight himself was mutilated by one of his subordinates. I am forced to wonder if these trials are not simply the act of gilding a sinking boat."

Fuck, I thought. All this time I'd been worried about keeping my villains in line and Hanno's lot from stepping on mine, but I'd not stopped to think about how the Principate would see it all. Hasenbach was still being asked to ignore attempted regicide of one of her princes so that the authority of increasingly bloodied Terms might be preserved. The more their credibility was damaged by little things like the Mirror Knight cutting up a high officer of the Grand Alliance, the less she'd be inclined to bend her neck. I studied her from the corner of my eye. Given how useful Named still were to the fronts, she was exaggerating to some extent there. Even if the Terms had been much worse, from a pragmatic perspective they'd still be a net advantage when it came to survival – and that was the way Hasenbach had to think, right now. She was drawing my attention to this to make a point elsewhere.

Considering what we'd just finished having a council about, it was not hard to guess.

"There are some matters that can be gambled with," I slowly said. "There are others where the simple act of implying a gaming mood loses trust in a way that cannot be mended."

I would not haggle over the custody of the doomsday corpse, not when it'd been made clear that there might be millions of lives hanging in the balance.

"I will not allow policy to be dictated by pissing matches among Named, Queen Catherine," Cordelia Hasenbach coolly said.

It was the crudest thing I'd ever heard come out of her mouth, and that was enough to give me pause.

"The coming trials will clarify whether Chosen and Damned can be trusted to oversee themselves," the First Prince of Procer warned. "And if your kind proves to be running wild unchecked, Black Queen, if they cannot be counted on?"

She met my eyes.

"Then the Principate will do what it must to survive, no matter whose feathers it ruffles. On that point there can be no negotiation."

Anomandris

It's like reading a Domsday game of chickens, isn't it?

"Both reliably competent and socially skilled, why hadn't Zeze figured out a way to make more of him yet? "

I wonder that all the time too, Cat....

Adrian

Wow, Cordelia. I know Catherine won't just up and leave, bringing all of Callow and destroying the framework that has allowed them to gather so many Named, but I almost wish she could just out of spite. Striking at the Terms (from which she has massively benefitted, btw) to negotiate custody of the WMD is a direct slap to Catherine's face, and I'd argue is almost to the point of acting in bad faith.

agesbe

Cordelia tries to strike a strong stance... but if she comes down too hard on Named, no matter how morally justified she is or at least thinks she is, they'll bail and the entirety of Procer will be up a creek without a paddle.

Oh sure a lot of Named will stay, particularly though not exclusively the heroes. It's still the Dead King after all. But a lot, mostly villains but probably a handful of heroes too, will leave. And if that happens, the front which is already barely hanging on will get worse.

Also why is she holding onto the doomsday device with both hands as hard as she can?

Anomandris

I think the answer to your question is kinda the point you are making in the first para.

hakureireimu

I think she's saying that she'll yield on the trial question but keep the Doomsday weapon.

Decius

She's received an offer from the Intercessor.

DrMajesticPhD

The Intercessor can't directly interact with un-Named or non Name claimants. That's why she was trying to get Cordelia to claim the Name "First Prince" in the last book, and why Cat doesn't like Named royalty.

Dredcor

The Name was Warden of the West actually, iirc.

masterofbones

If there's one thing that heroes are good at, its stopping lunatics with doomsday devices. Catherine and Hanno have an army of heroes, and Cordelia thinks she has any sort of power on this front?

But this is how I've always felt about her. She has no real power, but assumes that her throne makes her a true peer of the people she speaks to, and that her petty concerns are equal to those of the rest of the world.

TLDR: Procer needs to burn, the Dead King has the right idea.

Lox

"Power resides where men believe it resides," eh?

ByVectron!

Especially when, from the sounds of it, that Doomsday weapon would vaporize HER people and lands, while leaving Callow and the Dread Empire untouched.

Liliet

Would have, had it been used with Judgement active.

just some dude

More likely outcome than Named abandoning Procer, is that they will take down Hasenbach herself if she proves to be a threat to the country.

imagesbe

Also is Cordelia trying to say, "if Named can't be counted on, then I'll use this definitely more reliable and controllable superweapon that I know at least one ancient powerful being wants to turn into a freakin' doomsday device." Because that just doesn't line up.

The only explanation behind her holding onto it so hard is that she's convinced she can control it or at least wield it reliably. But I can't think of any reason this would actually be the case.

hakureireimu

She doesn't know storyfu; so she doesn't know that the very existence of the weapon makes it more likely for it to be needed.

M0och123

It is surprisising that someone of her intelligence would believe that introducing a literal continent destroying weapon to the equation will actually help though...

I mean I understand the reasoning of MAD (Mutually Assured Destruction) that she is using but that only works when you know exactly what your superweapon is going to do. If there is even a chance of it not working the way you want (i.e. Bard) it becomes a fatal liability.

TeK

To be fair, I think it's more of spite. If we fall, we are dragging the D(ic)K with us.

Salt

Cordelia's intelligence I suspect IS what's causing her to fail to understand the gravity of the problem.

She isn't Catherine. Catherine's roots were burned into her by a man who lives and breathes story tropes as his own personal arsenal of weapons.

Cordelia is an incredibly intelligent schemer who is used to nearly every problem she's ever faced being overcome in the end by her own brilliant schemes. She has no roots and no formal training in stories. She's never experienced ripping resurrection from the hands of Angels by pulling a sword from a stone, but she has experienced avoiding lots of outcomes that other people said were unavoidable disasters, by being just clever enough.

Catherine is basically trying to convince one of the greatest schemers who ever lived that her latest scheme is sure to blow up in her face, because of some esoteric semi-magical laws of fictional tropes that said schemer understands little of and believes in even less.

sivarajan

You're implying she's Malicia to Cat's Black.

Daltos

That fits so well, actually!

NerfContessa

Has been stated before, and it still fits,. Sadly.

I mean honestly, Cordelia. Ask augur, ask Hanno, and Act on the result, before all that remains of the continent is a wasteland. So dead not even a fallout game can happen in it...

Cpt. Obvious

OK, two years late to the discussion and all, but doesn't it appear that the Wandering Bard isn't really out to destroy Calernia or even the Dead King? Well at least not primarily?

Look back at the aftermath of that little game of Tarot Catherine, no in this case The Black Queen and The Wandering Bard played recently.

It was all orchestrated, the attack on everything and especially the one person that Cat loves. It was a planned set of events that guaranteed Catherine would do her outmost to really kill the Bard once and for all.

And she tried. She had Masego ward the place all the way to hell to stop the Bard from escaping death, which is one of her aspects or powers, but also trying to catch or destroy the bard's essence as Catherine slit the bard's throat.

The wards might have worked at least partially, as the Bard didn't escape the knife. But if this power is an aspect then it's not sure she even tried to use it. However they failed to catch or destroy the essence of the Bard.

Now comes the interesting part. When the Bard opened her eyes again she was disappointed. Not in having her body slain again, but in surviving it yet again.

Face it, she's been arranging this war to unleash some power or powers that are able to kill her once and for all. She's been wandering Creation for who knows how many millenia. She's seen every single person she's learned to know die. Heroes, Villains, they all die. Entire civilizations has come and gone, and yet she's still here. Her oldest acquaintance is the Dead King, and he is only a few millenia old, and dead.

She's tiered. She's seen it all. Heroes being heroic, Villains being villainous and the mundane going about living their short lives, loving, hating, building families, fighting wars, helping the unfortunate and preying on the weak. And she is tired of it all. She wants to die, and if all of Creation has to be destroyed to achieve this then so be it. If it's just the major part of Calernia that's destroyed why would she care? She doesn't just want to die, but be totally destroyed or some clever necromancer like the Dead King might bring her back. Which is probably why she chose to set him up as the big bad.

RoflCat

AND will likely breakdown/backfire to create 'darkest hour' for Heroes to save the day. Cordelia rejecting becoming the Warden pretty much guarantee that the Story will make it that way.

She is basically the general/president ordering a nuke to be fired and now the (super)Heroes has to stop it from exploding whatever it was aimed at to avoid the catastrophic collateral damage.

TeK

Avengers intensifies

mamm0nn

Which would make it all the more terrible if it turns out she didn't have an angel's corpse and this is all an elaborate bluff against the Dead King to not make Procer a cornered animal. We haven't actually seen it yet, after all, only hearing of dredging operations.

Tom

I like this, but it would have to be a pretty spectacular bluff to have fooled so many for so long.

Rey d'Tutto

Hanno says it's an Judgement corpse, so it's an Judgement corpse.

Salt

It's disturbing how the details of Cordelia and Catherine's stances are beginning to mirror Black and Malicia's old arguments over the Second Liesse doomsday weapon. Which is horrifying considering Catherine is also playing a similar Role in the GA that the Black Knight did in Praes, while Cordelia is playing a similar Role to Malicia in the same.

Malicia argued for the creation and keeping of the doomsday device as a deterrent, because she was convinced that Black's mundane methods were "insufficient". "The Legions will fail, the Calamities will fail. Your ramshackle attempts at successors will fail." "The only way to survive is to not fight at all, and for that I needed a tool."

Black argued against, because stories dictate that this is always a bad idea, no matter how sound it seems on the surface. That it's "Some godsdamned throwback from the Age of Wonders that will go down in flames and take the Empire with it.". He made his case from a Narrative perspective that Malicia simply doesn't put as much stock in.

Right now, Cordelia is arguing for keeping the doomsday device as a deterrent, because she's beginning to believe Catherine's mundane methods are insufficient. The Terms will fail, the Woe will fail. Her ramshackle attempts and binding together Named will fail. The only way to survive may be to not fight at all, and for that she needs a tool.

Cat just made the same argument as Black did for the same reasons to the same kind of person who somewhat understands but doesn't truly appreciate how narratively terrible this actually is, and got nowhere with it just like he did.

The trial over the Red Axe is going to be a climax to top them all so far, I'm betting. If Catherine doesn't tread lightly here and straight up do better than even her old teacher did, then it might be a lot more than a single city and partnership that'll be a smoking hole in the ground by the end of it.

TeK

I think it is actually worse, because this corpse pretty clearly did NOT work as a deterrent. The only use for it that I can see is some kind of suicidal "take him down with us" position.

Also this analogy fills me with hope instead. Like, ok, we all know that the, uhm, arguable Good will triumph at the end, but the fact that Cat is playing Black in the exact situation where Black had failed is good, because she is his successor and she learnt on his mistakes and she already did better than him. So the situation is kind of narratively obligated to end happily. More or less...

Salt

I... want? To believe that is true?

But I'm almost scared to make an optimistic prediction about it (or believe one), because half the time I do this story ends up with a surprise plot twist in which everything completely goes to shit before very arguably getting better.

Maybe it's better for this to be more than just Catherine's victory in the end though, so it could be a good thing that other characters are pushing back at her. Catherine's personal story tends to have her personal victories come at equally ruinous personal cost, and what the cost of winning against the Dead King or the Intercessor would be is something that's depressing to imagine. This pattern might be mitigated a lot if it's a shared victory with as much of capital-G Good as possible, which is the side that's narratively supposed to win and live happily ever after anyway.

TeK

Well to be fair, Cat will most likely die or be forced to something equal to death (banishment from continent). Or she could take WB place for an eternity of nothingness and loss and schemes.

If you think about it, the Woe has pretty amazing narrative potential roles they can fill. Archer is Ranger's star pupil and is already called the Lady. Hierophant came as close as one can to the Neshie's personal apprentice. And Cat had shaped up to be Bard's rival/successor too. So if we assume that DK and Bard will die or be gone from Calernia, and Ranger will somehow vanish due to Praesi fuckery, it's pretty obvious who will step up to fill each shoe of immortal superpeople of Calernia.

Like Woe do not have just a potential to be some regional power, they can be THE power. Of course, Vivi is future queen of Callow, and Hakram will probably take Cat's place at realising her Accords, and Cardinal and other shit. Archer is pretty clearly going to leave Calernia too, Masego will become god and possibly accompany Archer (though doubtful, he will probably stay on Calernia, anchoring Indrani) and there is also interesting parallel between somewhat cordial relationship between Neshamah and Ranger.

Or, well, Hakram will die, Cat will die, Archer will die, Masego will realise his divine ambition only to realise that he wants his friends back more, and, well, two-thirds of Calernia will end up glassed, with Vivi scrambling to fight Amadeus everything admirable about whom was stripped by the demands of the crown.

Or something in between.

Salt

Actually, the two extremes of "rocks fall, everyone dies" and "they all lived happily ever after" is exactly what I think is on the table right now.

As in the Intercessor really did create a way to turn the continent into a smoking hole in the ground, and that it's exactly as horribly awful as it seems on the surface, because that's the entire point. I think she's counting on Above and Below getting so pissed off at how terrible the outcome is, that they have no choice but to destroy her and finally let her Rest In Peace.

Clearly, they didn't decide to replace her with Catherine as her successor/rival/thief, despite her best efforts at being nice about it. So she resorts to doing it the "hard way", by playing genocidal chicken with the lives of most of the continent, to blackmail them into letting her die for good.

You flinch first, you pieces of shit, or I really am going to turn your Above/Below pissing match that is Calernia into a flaming sheet of glass.

TeK

For me, one of the main morals of the story was "compromise". So I actually fully expect the ending to reflect it. To be good... But not perfect. Realistic. Somewhere you win, somewhere you lose. A compromise between a Downer Ending and Happy Ending, to create something bittersweet. A Practical Ending, if you will.

Konstantin von Karstein

Well, shit.

Laguz24

I think one of the problems is the fact that Cordelia doesn't know how to make it a victory for others as well. Seriously, this crusade idea was hers and that backfired due to the story groove that crusades usually fail, since they are goods way of pushing past the balance point. I also don't see a single enemy or adversary she turned into an ally or at least none that weren't on her side to begin with. She needs to learn how not just how to manage Procer but to gain allies in the wider world.

Liliet

Actually, Levant was high key NOT Procer's ally. Like, there was a low key border feud going on that she diplomanced into an alliance. Also, literally nobody except the Lycaonese wanted a Lycaonese on the throne at the start of her involvement in the civil war. And I don't get the impression Ashur and Procer were all buddy-buddy before her Grand Alliance either, with Ashur being Levant's (second) patron against Procer usually.

Javvies

It won't be the trial over Red Axe that causes critical problems.

Remember, Hanno has already told the Heroes that he was going to convict and kill Red Axe himself. Then Mirror Knight objected and got his ass beaten into unconsciousness by Hanno.

There's no ground to stand on over anybody getting upset about the Heroic representative for the Truce and Terms deciding one of his fellow Heroes, specifically Red Axe, heads committed acts that require her to die.

The problem is going to come from two places – the first is Mirror Knight, his actions while at the Arsenal (and his presence at the Arsenal in the first place), and the fact that almost nobody likes him (except perhaps for those using/manipulating him for personal gain), plus his intimate relationship with Proceran Nobles plotting treason and betrayal. And Hanno's determination to keep him alive might not have stopped Mirror Knight before he went too far for Cat, Cordelia, and others to readily tolerate without significant repercussions. Mirror Knight's probably going to be whiny and want the sword back, too.

The second place we can expect problems is people (probably mostly Heroes) who object to how Cat handles Hunted Magician in light of his substantive assistance to the extremely classified and need to know secret project that is Quartered Seasons.

Salt

Ok the contrary I think the problem with the Principiate and the Red Axe is THE central critical problem. It's a problem that is not dependent on whether the Red Axe actually gets executed or not, so much as who has the right to decide whether she should be executed her or not.

The White Knight being determined to kill her does nothing to resolve it, because the entire issue is a debate on whether it should be the White Knight's decision or the highest assembly's.

The thing is that if the Principiate folds, it essentially undermines its own sovereignty. Having your own royalty nearly murdered and not even having the ability to try and sentence the criminal under your own legal system is about as politically terrible as it gets.

The Terms also can't fold, because they're built on the foundation of absolute political immunity. If said immunity is actually not immunity, and the Terms are seen to allow Proceran courts are allowed to try and hang Named, they'll balk. The terms fall apart, because what sensible Villain would agree to binding terms that could allow the gods-damned Principiate to hang them?

It's even worse because it has the potential to open up a schism between the Principiate and the Terms, when the Principiate was just revealed to have a continent-killing bomb in hand. One that Cordelia is considering keeping precisely because she is losing faith in the Terms.

The Red Axe is now, indirectly, a landmine that could result in the death of most of the life on the entire continent. As much of an annoying pissant as the Mirror Knight currently is, he's not quite on the level of a problem that could result in a legendary mistake that no one walks away from.

Javvies

Hanno executing the Red Axe for her Truce and Terms violations shortstops the Proceran desire to have her tried and executed by Proceran court – it demonstrates that Hanno is serious about enforcing the rules on the Heroes and is capable of doing so. Also, since nobody is going to resurrect Red Axe or turn her into an undead, she can only be executed once.

Remember, Cordelia wanted Red Axe in front of a Proceran prosecution to drive a wedge between Mirror Knight and the Proceran nobles he's involved with.

Mirror Knight is the larger problem because the Grand Alliance has an interest in him being hammered harder than Hanno apparently wants to.

Also, Mirror Knight is intimately involved with Proceran nobles plotting betrayal and treason. Though it's not clear that Cordelia or Cat has enough concrete evidence of that or of sufficiently serious actions other than just talk in order to convince Hanno to take Mirror Knight to task over that involvement and plotting.

Salt

It was actually stated outright in "Convenience" that because it entailed the attempted murder of a proper Prince, just having her executed under the terms was specifically not good enough for Cordelia, or for Procer as a whole. She needed a trial and sentence under Proceran Law, whereas Catherine specifically could not allow a trial and sentence under Proceran law. It actually doesn't matter even if both trials call for the exact same verdict, Cordelia needs a trial by Procer regardless and Catherine cannot allow a trial by anything other than the Terms.

Wanting a way to strike against Langevins was a nice side benefit, but the crux of it was whether she faced a Proceran Sentence/Execution or a Sentence/Execution under the Terms.

Ironically enough, the White Knight would likely understand better than most of the Named why it matters so much whose sentence it is, rather than what the sentence is. His answer to the Seraphim's riddle of fault was to refuse to answer what the sentence should be, and focusing entirely on who should have the authority to determine justice in the first place, after all.

Cordelia on wanting a trial under Proceran law, regardless what happens under the terms:

> "If I were to concede that a trial could be held under the Terms before the sentence to the Principate's own was applied, would that remedy your objection?" the blonde princess asked.

>That was already a better look for the whole affair, but it was also strictly that: a look. In substance, we'd still be establishing the jurisdiction of Proceran law over the Named serving under the Terms.

Cordelia on the key being the Red Axe seeing Proceran Justice, not just Justice or Justice under the terms, because the problem is the optics of it for the people of Procer:

> "That reluctance is not unearned," Cordelia said, "yet it, too, must have limits. Minor crimes such as theft and assault I will not balk at leaving to the Terms, in the same way that an army in the field is subject to military justice and not that of a prince. Yet I cannot allow attempted regicide on Proceran soil without having it face Proceran justice. It would undermine the peace of the entire realm, establishing for all to see that Chosen and Damned live under different laws than the rest."

Catherine on understanding this but still disagreeing that any trial by Procer can't be allowed, because it's a question of authority, not the punishment itself:

> "I understand why you want your trial, I really do," I admitted. "In your place, I'd be pushing for the same thing."

>"Yet you are not in my place," the blue-eyed woman said, smiling thinly.

>"No, I'm not," I said. "I'm speaking as the representative for Below's champions. And Procer simply isn't trusted enough for them to be comfortable with it having the authority to hang them."

Jago

> As much of an annoying pissant as the Mirror Knight currently is, he's not quite on the level of a problem that could result in a legendary mistake that no one walks away from.

Till his allies help him and the Red Axe escape from prison, steal the Severance, all that while killing several Heroes and Villains. Then they will go and get the WMD to kill the DK and trigger a continent killing disaster (and no one has taken into account the effect of the nuclear winter following the use of WMD, so probably an extinction level event) .

Decius

The only way I see Red Axe's sentencing going well is for the Truce and Terms sentence to be that RA forfeits the protection of T&T and is to be turned over to regular authorities for attempted regicide.

Liliet

ooooo. That sounds like it might work, especially when it comes up that Red Axe signed on to the T&T in bad faith in the first place.

Pandacrator

I don't think it is about reliability. I interpret it as "Named are a good defense but they threaten my authority so I need a plan B that only I control in case they turn against the nobility of Procer" which puts her in a position of not being entirely reliant on Heroes. This way they can't claim they should be excused for everything, because they are no longer irreplaceable.

Liliet

> The only explanation behind her holding onto it so hard is that she's convinced she can control it or at least wield it reliably. But I can't think of any reason this would actually be the case.

I can't think of a specific reason it wouldn't.

We just found out about one, which is clearly extraordinary and fairly unique in scope – Intercessor influencing a Choir is pretty exotic.

That one is no longer active. Leaving her with a cadre of mages and priests working on figuring it out and answering to her.

danh3107

Fucking hells

Tenthyr

The Bards attacks are still unwinding, even if Catherine drove her off for a time. Looks like they'll come to a head with whatever this trials result is.

Liliet

Welp, this is getting fun.

Aaand everyone who guessed this guessed it right: full nuke for Procer. Although that's a bit... further than I'd been guessing myself 0.0

TeK

Didn't they just established that the Procer would be wiped out if they use it? How is that survival?

Anomandris

It's more of a Mutually Assured Destruction kinda thing in my view for her. It would make the Alliance help Procer (otherwise Boom), probably make DK wary of pushing the fight too much to Procer (otherwise Boom).

TeK

Drawing on parallels with Malicia! Good!

Ugh, small problem: Dead King knows about that weapon and is still attacking. MAD failed before it had started.

Nairne .01

Also it won't be functional until the business with Hierarch is resolved.

TeK

It would be, that was rather the point

WuseMajor

I believe that the main point of the above story is that it won't be controllable until the business with Hierarch is concluded. If set off now, it will either have no connection to heaven and do nothing or the connection to heaven will apparently act like opening the plug in the bottom of a lake and wash this continent away.

Hellspirit

Either that or that lack of control will mean that the Dead King will be able to hijack it instead of the Bard.

2xMachina

Dead king, and a dead angel eh.

Liliet

> If set off now, it will either have no connection to heaven and do nothing or the connection to heaven will apparently act like opening the plug in the bottom of a lake and wash this continent away.

I don't see any indication of the latter. The 'wash away the continent' scenario was if Bard exploited its link with the Seraphim (which is no longer there) to turn the crank all the way up. It's not a guess as to what will happen now, only a potential hypothetical what-if worst case scenario.

Liliet

Actually, it was said nobody knows how it'd function now. "Opening a plug at the bottom of a lake" was in case Intercessor cranked up the intensity through the Seraphim which is no longer doable.

mamm0nn

That's probably why Tyrant saved the day: Bard might've been able to use it to destroy DK the moment it was dredged up otherwise, using the massive power of the Choir and a more refined form of Light rather than just the corpse. Without it, DK will too likely survive the blast.

caoimhinh

Also, let's not forget that the Dead King's real body is another freaking dimension A.K.A the Serenity, which is in Hell.

That's why he is pretty chill about it. No matter how freaking destructive that nuke can be, it's still doubtful it will harm his real domains. The only way for it to happen is for them to first go through the hordes of Undead that have been ravaging over Procer for years.

That weapon poses more danger for Procer than the rest of Calernia, and even less danger to Neshamah.

agumentic

I think it's been mentioned that if the Dead King loses Keter, it's essentially the end for him. He goes from immortal First Monster in the north to evil in a can – and those get smashed to hell and back by the story the moment they try to do anything.

Konstantin von Karstein

It's true, but is it possible to open a Greater Breach from the infernal side of the fence? Because if it is the case, Neshamah has no reason to care about the Angel weapon, at least in its present state. Especially because he knew about the weapon for a long time and have prepared countermeasures.

Insanenoodlyguy

Doesn't matter. Once Keter is lost, he's evil in a can. Even if he's evil in a can with a large force, that's an established flavor of evil in a can. "Once I open a new breach, my armies will march in creation and I shall rule again!?" As stated, the sorts of people with that as a plan die all the time to teenagers who haven't even finished their full heroic journey yet.

ayon96

Speculation! They don't know for sure and First prince is willing to gamble.

TeK

She is willing to gamble that nuke strong enough to evaporate the whole of Keter, Dead King and his armies will spare Procer because... why?

caoimhinh

Cordelia has always been desperate to hold on to her power, for all that she pretends otherwise. She has at every chapter from her POV being worried about being revoked from the position of First Prince by the Highest Assembly.

Sure, her strongest wish is duty, but let's not forget that she sees herself as the only one capable of fulfilling that duty. And she is always afraid of losing control of Procer. She is not thinking things through but rather is now attempting to force Catherine into backing her keeping of the weapon by threatening the Truce and Terms (which is a mistake), willfully ignoring the undeniable fact that Named have always regulated themselves. Heroes kill Villains and Villains kill Heroes, the pretense that the nations actually held control over them is just Proceran Bullshit on Cordelia's part. Heroes can be moved into action by a cause or a story, but not because a Head of State commanded it.

Named can control countries but countries can't control Named.

Cordelia should have learned that already after the Tenth Crusade got out of her control. But her emotions are getting the best of her here.

In a sense, the way Cordelia is acting is similar to the Mirror Knight holding unto the Severance as it gave him security, power and a sense of importance. Cordelia will not let go of the Angel Corpse Weapon because it is ultimately a Proceran weapon under her control, it doesn't matter how dangerous it could be if it went out of hand or malfunction.

It's a similar policy with every country in our world that has Nuclear Weapons, they are simply not going to get rid of them because that's a deterrent weapon for their nation.

Konstantin von Karstein

She doesn't hope it will spare Procer. She plan to use it only if Procer is dead anyway.

caoimhinh

I also believe she plans to hold onto that weapon even after the war is over. It's a powerful weapon to have, and it's a mighty deterrent.

Also, if it can be further refined into something more stable and controllable...

Well, that will keep Procer safe and Cordelia at its head, the way she has always intended.

TeK

Wouldn't she be forced to scrap it under Accords?

caoimhinh

Maybe. But the Accords are still under discussion.

Cordelia seems to be working on a big amount of wishful thinking right now. Along with her own desperation and control-issues, this will make her come up with all kinds of excuses to not give up on the weapon for as long as possible.

She is acting on emotions, not on logic. She might perform a lot of mental gymnastics to justify her actions, but that's fear talking.

TeK

Well, she could've make that more clear. Why can't she speak straight?

Liliet

This. The discussion is not about using it, it's about keeping it. Even Catherine immediately thinks Cordelia would only turn to it as an absolute last resort.

Also, angel strikes ARE normaly aimed. The 'nuke everything' option is if the power lever is cranked all the way up and they no longer can.

ayon96

Dead king's armies is also gonna be nuked and the hellgate is gonna get destroyed in it.

Liliet

Because it's not a nuke.

It'll function as one above a certain threshold of power but it's not meant to reach that and it's certainly not meant to go off at the source point.

imagesbe

Cordelia's argument is that if used as the Bard intended it would be a doomsday weapon for a good portion of the continent, but with Judgement out of the picture the Bard [i]presumably[/i] can't control it anymore. Thus it simply becomes a powerful weapon that can be controlled to not doom the entire continent. Supposedly. Catherine is shrieking internally and a little externally that a weapon capable of wiping out most of a continent should just flat out not be used.

M0och123

It would almost be impossible for the story to allow a doomsday weapon like this is to actually be used. Especially considering that there exists a type of people (Named) whose sole purpose is to prevent such a thing from happening.

While I don't doubt that Bard could create such a scenario, I am fairly certain even she doesn't want the annihilation of the continent.

TeK

>I am fairly certain even she doesn't want the annihilation of the continent

Oh, you sweet summer child.

Konstantin von Karstein

It's so cute! 😊 You really think Bard would balk at sacrificing 2/3 of Calernia if it could kill the DK?

caoimhinh

Yep, she wouldn't want that. But might as well attempt it on the hopes of getting killed.

It may be her way to get into a Story where she is the villain attempting to destroy the world, such guys don't often get to survive.

And Bard really wants to die. So...

John Pratt

Nah, she definitely wants the annihilation of a continent. Especially an angel driven annihilation that will leave that actual lands essentially untouched, or even cleansed of previous taint via the tabula rasa effect. That leaves Praes and Callow to expand into continental superpowers, which gives her the narrative juice to weld the rest of the world into a broad coalition of Above against the nascent Evil Empire. The author already as much as spelled out that the Bard already tried a variation of this plan by sponsoring the rise of Triumphant.

Liliet

> The author already as much as spelled out that the Bard already tried a variation of this plan by sponsoring the rise of Triumphant.

I'm sorry, what?

Can you provide... any citation for this?

Last I recall, Bard was pretty miffed at the elves' non-interference in the Triumphant situation, and the Dead King used her rise to manipulate the formation of Procer, a non-Named led disunited counry at his border.

Triumphant was a successful ANTI-Bard operation.

LarsBlitzer

Like TeK implied, the Bard would be rather uniquely disposed to be perfectly okay with annihilating 2/3rds of the continent. They're just people and cities and kingdoms. Nothing terribly important to a being who has lived for thousands of years and has seen countless civilizations rise and fall. She's not even terribly attached to any of her incarnations except for the most shallow of reasons such as looks. As long as DK and Keter is wiped off the map she'll gladly roll the dice and buff the SHIT out of the Angelic MacGuffin.

Thing is, to Cordelia it hasn't been confirmed beyond a shadow of a doubt that it was the Bard who did the Whammy, nor is she convinced that anyone could do it either, and certainly not to the extent where she's willing to stop the Manhattan Project. She'll be under pressure from her fellow nobles to get it done. To stop would undermine her support to stay First Prince and she'd be out on her ear.

No, this is inevitable.

Liliet

> She'll be under pressure from her fellow nobles to get it done.

Pretty sure it's a secret project her nobles don't know about, for reasons including but not limited to the potential of this.

Laguz24

I think that the Cordelia is currently holding on to the superweapon to regain a sense of control over the situation, she dislikes having to deal with named that make mockeries of rules wherever they go. This is also coming from the place where she refused a name in the highest assembly chamber.

Frivolous

I agree that that is probably Hasenbach's motivation. She's a control freak; she wants to feel like she has a lever to use.

I think she is overestimating the danger from Catherine's villains, though. She should worry far more about Hanno's heroes.

I mean, although Catherine has tender feelings about the situation, most villains and Callowans would probably be quite okay with Procer annihilating itself.

On the other hand, the Grey Pilgrim and the Ophanim might decide to assassinate Hasenbach or steal the Judgement-corpse. Tariq and his angelic patrons have a history of murdering people to save others. And all Levantine heroes would agree with him.

Also, if there is any risk at all of genocide to the Firstborn? Sve Noc will simply snuff Hasenbach out. I don't think Hasenbach has a realistic chance of surviving Sve Noc.

In other news: I wonder what the Augur would make out of all this.

M0och123

Hasenbach could only be eliminated with the proper story behind her, and such stories that involve the assassination of the First Prince that end well are very few and far in between. I think that is another thing Bard may be going for is for such an attempt to play out and for it to fail miserably.

Frivolous

Why would you say that Hasenbach can only be eliminated with a proper story?

People die all the time. She's not even a hero (yet).

The Augur might protect her from the heroes, but the Augur cannot see Sve Noc.

Tek

Nah, Cordelia has guaranteed survival until her hand is on trigger and she has to make a choice. Like how Bard couldn't die because she had a horrifying contingency of a back-up plan, and well, it wouldn't make for a good and climactic ending if she just died in the beginning of the book.

Salt

Yep. Killing off of important, beloved major characters that have been developed over many many arcs, is only done for a good reason and only if there's some sort of impactful payoff. Something on the level of a Fitting End or a huge Plot Twist.

Doing so for little reason other than just subverting expectations is a Weiss and Benioff folly, and it tends to result in a massively unhappy and angry fanbase. It should only be applied in moderation for minor characters, like the old Exiled Prince.

EE has thus far shown to be too competent of a writer to do something as silly as having a plot-critical character randomly perish by tripping and breaking their neck on an exposed brick, to be replaced by some minor side character that isn't properly fleshed out/one the audience is not invested or interested in.

sivarajan

A plot-critical character "randomly" perishing by tripping and breaking her neck is EXACTLY Assassin's M.O.

Salt

What I'm trying to get at is that this is a very intentionally meta setting where literary devices and literary purposes are often noticed by characters in the story, or even outright interacted with.

A huge change in the story like removing an old major character should always have a purpose, not "just because". Subverting expectations is for adding to the story, not something to be done at all costs even if it detracts instead.

In a case where the major premise is partially breaking the 4th wall by having tropes be actual plot devices – to be noticed and interacted with by the characters – means that any event THAT significant is likely going to have some visible tropes or meta plot hooks leading up to it, not a meteor out of a clear blue sky because lol random.

M0och123

Ahem

Last Jedi anyone?

(Leah AND Ackbar being replaced by a complete unknown...)

TeK

Subverting expectations based on an assumption that author us competent is not something you would want to do.

Mental Mouse

Yeah, Cordy's making noises about Cat's Villains getting out of line... but she's projecting so hard she could invent the movie theater for Calernia!

At nearly every step since Cat got to the Arsenal, the Heroes have been making at least as much trouble as the Villains.

Okay, during the big fight there were Bard-betrayals by villains along with heroes – Fallen Monk, Concocter, Maddened Keeper, along with Exalted Poet (actually I forget, was he H or V?) and Blessed Artificer. But that whole mess started with Red Axe, whose behavior has been just damn weird.

And Mirror Knight showed up spoiling for a fight – when he got one, he may have half-saved Hakram from Keeper's betrayal, but he also opened her can of worms in the process. And having won the field against the demons he went on to challenge the White Knight, if not the Terms themselves.

Liliet

Is she making noise about villains? I'm pretty sure she's making noise about Named as a whole.

TeK

"Then the Principate will do what it must to survive, no matter whose feathers it ruffles. On that point there can be no negotiation."

Also, feathers. Get it? Cause, cause...

I'll see myself out.

Indignantpup

I like how she says for the survival of the Principate after being told that the weapon she's holding would wipe it from the face of Calernia. Wait is Calernia the whole world or is it just the continent that they're on?

TeK

Just the continent, and it won't be wiped out entirely, just meager two thirds of it. Really, pretty worth it in the end.

I mean, ethics aside, doesn't nuking the continent sounds like fun?

Javvies

That is all kinds of bad news.

How the fuck does she even get an Aspect like that?
And, even worse, since it works on Angels, and if Bard/Intercessor is truly nominally unaligned, would it have theoretical applications on demons?

Cordelia ... Angel corpses are bad news at the best of times. When Bard can control Angelic manifestations they're even worse. When Bard wants the Angel corpse to be your only option ... that's incredibly bad.

When the Angel corpse can blow up two thirds of Calernia, including blasting a massive crater into the dwarven realms, in the optimistic assessment ...

Secure the Angel corpse so that Bard cannot use it ... but work on figuring out how to safely dispose of it.

Maybe toss it through the Hellgate, or park it right in front of the Hellgate ... but don't even think about actually actively using it.

The trials are going to be critically important. We all saw that coming.

caoimhinh

Well, we know the Bard has the power to affect perception of time, at the very least. She has used that on Amadeus, Catherine, and I'm willing to say that's what she used to talk with the Dead King inside Masego's head.

What do you think would be the Aspects of the Intercessor.
My nominated 3 are Wander, Read, and Interfere.

For the teleportation, story prediction, and manipulation of perception, respectively.

About the nuke, I wonder if they will ever find a way to use the Twilight Ways to get to Keter. Kairos mentioned he had originally been looking into the practicalities of throwing the whole shard of Arcadia into the Serenity, maybe they can do something along those lines?

I mean, the only way to use that thing in any measure of safety is by activating the weapon on the other side of the Hellgate. And even then we don't know if the destruction could spread into Creation through that portal.

TeK

I think it would be Intercede instead, but the rest checks out.

Liliet

Wander, Listen, Tell.

I think it's fairly likely the Keeper of Stories hails from a time of oral tradition, nominating Listen as the Aspect about knowing stories – see also how a same name one allowed Saint to “hear the beat of the universe” in a way that gave her heightened story sense according to Pilgrim – and Tell as the Aspect about imposing them on reality.

It'd fit an intercessor's aspects as well – a negotiator listens, then talks.

Tell would cover the in-a-span-of-a-second discussion she had with Catherine in her mind, the Speaking-Lite Amadeus speculated was a property of bardic Names (making people stop and listen even when it's a terrible idea conceptually), the ability to impose perception filters on angels.

aurikdomi

Would her immortality the park of wander? Should the word be something different to encompass that?

aurikdomi

Be part of*

caoimhinh

Well, her soul transfers from one body to another, so I think wander covers it.

robertctaylorfamfrit

Even worse since this aspect seems to be along the lines of can even affect angels rather than only effect angels that makes a lot of past scenes where she's been in the background but only noticed by a single character like the Pilgrim or Cat suddenly a lot more ominous.

M0och123

Here's a lesson for you all kids...

DON'T F*CK AROUND WITH DOOMSDAY WEAPONS IN YOUR OWN BACKYARD. ESPECIALLY WHEN THERE EXISTS PEOPLE WHO ARE LITERALLY DRIVEN BY FATE AND DESTINY TO SCREW AROUND WITH YOUR SCREWING AROUND.

That about sums it up.

Also, I just had a few unpleasant thoughts about the Gnomes and the various innovations happening in the Arsenal. Not saying a visit by the Gnomes is likely at this stage in the game but considering literally every single other power on Calernia is now involved in this struggle in some way (excluding the rats, they don't really get involved in anything except eating.).

I am surprised that someone as smart as Hasenbach is actually considering such a doomsday weapon a serious option. The story pattern for Doomsday weapons always end the same way and yet she insists on keeping one of the only things that will ensure that Procer is entirely destroyed. Even more than the Dead King due to the fact that at least some Procerans will be able to escape to the Kingdom and Dominion and Free Cities. With such a weapon there is literally no where to run.

caoimhinh

At this point, I'm expecting Procer to get a Red Letter like the one Praes got.

Surely if a Tribe of Goblins experimenting to make gunpowder got them one, then a Weapon of Mass Destruction should earn it?

Javvies

Gunpowder is science.
Angel corpses are magic.

Gnomes don't seem to care about magical developments, they only seem to care about mundane scientific advancement. They objected to an improvement in mundane farming equipment – that was the Dread Empire's first Red Letter in the past century.

WuseMajor

The Gnomes don't seem to care about magic derived weapons, only technology advancing beyond a certain point.

This implies that the Gnomes think that their Science can defeat any Magic, but that Science might enable them to fight on the Gnome's level.

Given the crazy shit we've seen magic do and presumably the Gnomes have been watching that too, this honestly scares me as to the kinds of things the Gnomes might be able to accomplish. I kind of wonder if the reason Heaven and Hell fight so hard here is because they've been kicked out of everywhere else on the planet.

Liliet

I expect Gnomes to have magitec – nothing about this setting so much as remotely suggests magic and technology being non-synergistic paths of development. Mass education of mages, mass production of artefacts, be scared.

Also I'm pretty sure they're still subject to the Gods' wager and have their own internal heroes and villains. Powerful NPCs don't get to kick out the programmers. Even if their power is over 9000, to the programmer it's still just zeros and ones arranged in a pattern on their hard drive.

Aotrs Commander

I'm pretty convinced that the gnomes are there solely to ensure that the god's little playground stay in status quo. The big difference between science and magic is that the latter remains in the hands of a finite number of people who the narrative can deal with. But technological advancement is a buff for EVERYONE and will fundamentally change the way things work that WILL break the status quo. Was not one of the Red Letters because someone developed a new piece of a farming machinery or something? That? Could solve the Praesi starvation problems and so THAT needed to be stomped on hard.

Wiping 2/3 of Calernia doesn't matter to the gnomes; if anything it would definitely keep the status quo going, as Callow becoming the New Procer, presumably (after an appropriate Story of breaking free from evil tyanny, once it is the only underdog with no allies...) and then it would naturally ease back to status quo over the centuries, depending on how long it took for Procer et al to become habitable again (I mean, it might be immediately, but it would still take time to be occupied).

(Metanarrativily, the gnomes allow EE to have a plausible reason why technology has not advanced in the thousands of years when it otherwise would have. It's a lampshade hanging, maybe, but it's one with more credibility than basically almost every other fantasy world I've seen had.)

Liliet

I'm personally in favor of the more mundane explanation that gnomes just genuinely non-meta aim to maintain their own technological supremacy, and the Gods don't give a shit one way or the other.

Jago

> (Metanarratively, the gnomes allow EE to have a plausible reason why technology has not advanced in the thousands of years when it otherwise would have. It's a lampshade hanging, maybe, but it's one with more credibility than basically almost every other fantasy world I've seen had.)

Another good one is "widespread technology makes people less reliant on gods, so we (the gods) will get less faith energy, and that is needed to protect the world from the horrors from outer space".

Big I

So the Bard's plan was to nuke Procer and the Free Cities, and I guess let the Dominion settle the ruins in the following centuries? Since protecting the first Pilgrim meant there would BE a Dominion? That's definitely got a D&D vibe to it, ancient ruins and fallen civilisations, and the Dominion is already all about killing monsters from blighted wilderness and undead from barrows.

Callow and Praes stay in their bucket, the dwarves get served a big "eff you", any survivors from the border region with Keter become mountain barbarians, and the League ends or becomes irrelevant. How diabolical.

Salt

On the contrary, I think the entire point of the Bard's plan is that it has zero redeeming qualities. The continent will never recover, no matter what anyone tries – the Bard intentionally gave it the most atrociously awful outcome possible.

Above and Below won't let her die and Rest In Peace, so I think she's planning to force them to, by blackmailing them in a continental game of chicken.

If she can't convince them that Catherine Foundling is a good enough rival/thief/successor to take her place? Fine, let's do it the hard way.

Let's make myself such a horrible liability to creation itself, with such a horrible liability of a plan, that it forces Above and Below to boot my ass out the door and end this miserable existence.

Which would be, uh, bad news bears for everyone else. If neither the Intercessor nor the Gods actually flinch in this little game of chicken, it basically means the continent actually does get turned into a sheet of glass.

Insanenoodlyguy

That, or there's a huge but still finite range of her influence/resurrection. If there's no life on the continent, there's no reason for a bard on the continent, so she dies and stays dead. It's the sort of thing we'd expect of her. "If you let me do this, it means I win, which means I die. So I need to be stopped, which means I die, which means I win."

Ninestrings

I wonder who they've got tinkering with the angel corpse?

There must be some Oppenheimer equivalent in there, perhaps the Hierophant's Shadow Archetype?

TeK

I'd argue that Hierophant is probably the Shadow.

Ninestrings

Hierophant isn't planning to nuke the continent thought.

Well not anytime soon at least.

TeK

Yeah, but I doubt that it's out of any strong moral objection towards continent-nuking.

Decius

Most of his friends live on the continent, and lots of interesting things to study would be destroyed.

TeK

"I don't condone mass genocide because some people I like will die" is not the most, er, admirable position to take.

Shveiran

It isn't, yet it is several steps removed on the admirable scale from "Mass genocide you say? I probably have to hold on at least one way to cause it, just in case". Not to mention "Oh, that sounds like a good thursday to me."

TeK

Well, I feel uncomfortable with this conversation, when I live in the country that bases a significant part of it's foreign diplomacy on "we're gonna hold onto this method of mass genocide just in case".

sivarajan

THE country? There are at least eight countries with that foreign policy.

TeK

Mine boasts the biggest amount of mass genocide tools and boasts the policy of "if anyone nukes us, we nuke everybody". But yeah, it's not particularly original.

caoimhinh

Yeah, I have been wondering the same.

Procer doesn't have the mages for it. It has strong Priests, but they did not obey Cordelia so who did she get to modify the Seraph's corpse? She already had that thing before the failed coup.

Such a thing must require quite a degree of knowledge, power, and skill. So it's highly suspicious. Who made that weapon?

caoimhinh

Upon more thought, I remembered that it might not even be an actual weapon or artifact, but rather it could very well be a ritual that makes use of the corpse of the Seraph.

It was summoned by some priests before Triumphant killed it, so it might be Cordelia is planning to use some priests from that branch of Faith to perform the ritual.

From Book 5 Interlude: A Hundred Battles.

"In glorious old days," Kairos Theodosian wistfully said, "there was once a woman who broke in Evil as one would break in a stallion. From triumph to triumph did she march, west and ever pursuing, until by the shores of a great lake she met in strife a hundred priests-elect of the Hallowed. And these holy souls did scour themselves to bring forth the great spirit they worshipped, one that cast judgement upon all it beheld, and behold her it did.”

Ah, what he would not have done for a glimpse of that grand moment. Truly, there never had been nor ever would be a match to Dread Empress Triumphant.

“For that presumption she slew it,” The Tyrant ferally grinned, sharp teeth bared, “bearing tall banner, and wrote her rage in blood across a hundred trembling tribes. That which was not a corpse sunk into deep waters, turning into bones that dreamt, and there was left to slumber. Some across the years learned of this, and of the great works that might wrought from such a thing, but none were so bold as to attempt to make a sword out hallowing petrified.”

Ah, but heroes lacked for such beautiful ambitions. The living kin of that dreaming thing came too easily to their help, he’d always thought, and so there was no need for ingenuity unleashed.

“That hoped-for boldness still escapes our kind,” he mourned, “but a lesser manner of soul did grow desperate enough.”

Kairos called it a “sword” but that might be a metaphor, much like Catherine has always referred to that Angel’s corpse as an “arrow”. In this chapter they discussed using it as a ritual (with the consequences being akin to a nuke from Earth) but not as an artifact.

A priestly ritual by some secluded tradition on central Procer would make sense and be more consistent with the fact that Procer lacks mages capable of creating such OP artifact and Cordelia lacked control of the House of Light. She might just be planning to use priests from that region (Priest-elect of the Hallowed, Kairos called them).

Liliet

That’s what I’ve always assumed.

flashburn283

Hasenbach is going for the Fulda Gap gambit, nuke yourself to fuck the enemy. THIS IS NOT GOING TO END WELL SOMEBODY IS GOING TO DIE WITH THEIR FINGER ON THE TRIGGER.

Liliet

With Judgement and their ability to direct the result personally – which can then be hijacked by the Bard – out of the picture, this actually shouldn’t inevitably nuke Procer.

Burlyraven

Great, so Cordelia has a holy hydrogen bomb, and she's not even letting the others read the warning labels. I wonder if we'll hear anything from the gnomes, or if they're content to let the backwater continent purge itself.

I really need to know what had Hanno so quiet, though. I'm kind of concerned he might be so desperate for his choir to speak to him again, that he might try to speak to the "dead" angel. While he is a hero, that's a tragedy in the making, from what I can tell.

TeK

Magical nuke is a-ok. As long as it's not an actual A-bomb, it can be more powerful than it, and they won't care.

caoimhinh

Now that I think about it, it might not even be that Cordelia had an actual artifact made out of the Angel's corpse. That was Catherine's metaphor for it.

It's more likely to be a ritual that uses the corpse.

caoimhinh

I think Hanno was Recalling things right there. He might have left immediately to keep digging for info on the matter and more specifically on the Intercessor.

Also, Hanno doesn't seem to be in much despair, he seems to have made his peace with the silence of the Seraphim.

Razorfloss razor

Jesus Christ they have a fucking nuke!!!! If the dwaves find out porcer is fucking done along with this war.

Jworks

I just had this thought, someone tell me why it's wrong: If chapters have spelling errors in them, does that mean Erratica writes a single draft for each chapter and it's consistently this good? That's incredible if so, my first drafts of anything make me question whether or not english is my first language while editing.

TeK

Practice makes perfect. It is pretty established that he did redact earlier chapters. And how many did he wrote of just PGtE already?

Juff

Typo Thread:

She'd had > She's had
The battled > The battle less that I > less than I presence tabula > presence of the tabula which should run afoul > which would run afoul villains' destruction > villain's destruction favour graverobbing > favour of graverobbing that' pleasant > that 'pleasant you," Cordelia > you." Cordelia that's somehow written > that had somehow written anyone' possession > anyone's possession

ChronoMager

sill dealing > still dealing to walk with her a span > to walk with her for a span (?)

Frivolous

I have thought it over some more, and I think Cordelia is bluffing about using the angel corpse.

I think her main motivation is to bully the heroes and the villains into behaving. That's all. I don't think she has any intention of actually using it. This is the same woman who only 2 years ago knelt to Catherine in order to get her to support Procer against the DK and prevent Proceran genocide.

Why would she now try to genocide most Procerans herself? It makes no sense. Also, Hasenbach must know that if she uses the angel corpse, its neighbors will invade and probably kill all Procerans anyway.

One more thought, that I don't think has been mentioned yet in this comments section: Remember that Catherine's new Name is coming, and soon. It may come with the trials, or it may come in a confrontation with Hasenbach.

Catherine's new Name -started- to come, as you may recall, when she declared that Praes would be put in order. Hasenbach is now proving to be a danger, just like Malicia has been. The new Name will probably have something to do with that.

I don't know if Hasenbach has ever been subjected to a Named with the aspect of Rule before. Has she?

I mention this because I strongly suspect that one of Catherine's aspects will be Rule. In which case Catherine may simply Speak to Cordelia and tell her not to do it.

Frivolous

On second thought, maybe Catherine's aspect will not be Rule. Instead it might be Order. After all, the new age will be the Age of Order, yes? So Order would be appropriate.

Liliet

Her paperwork will never be buried under nut shells again!...

...Yeah, I don't think that's an Aspect she has the narrative chops for -_-

Nairne .01

While I don't see that aspect part, I think your observation of when her name started to sprout is interesting.

hakureireimu

The Angel corpse is a secret weapon, so the only one she could bully with it are the people in that room.

marillius

I'm getting tired and bored of Hasenbach. Once again she proves she's learned nothing. Distrust of Callow's Queen has turned now to distrust of Cat's work, instead. And rather than pay attention like a smart politician, 'the bard wanted the accords to be destroyed', 'the bard wanted me to use the angel corpse', 'ergo the bard thinks the accords can win this fight', 'plus these trials are literally the bards latest attacks but I'm going to use them to politically attack my ally who has forgiven me of horrible things I did to her people thus teaching her she shouldn't have.'

She's supposed to be smart, right? When do we get to see that again?

agesbe

Firstly, smart people are not immune from stupid decisions. Look at Malacia who despite her vast intellect also created pretty much every problem she's had to scheme her way out of.

Secondly Frivolous had a theory that I like, about how this angel corpse is mostly planned as a tool to try and get the Named to get their act together. Can't be sure of course, but even Cat noted that Cordelia was being unusually immovable on the issue.

Liliet

> 'the bard wanted the accords to be destroyed', 'the bard wanted me to use the angel corpse', 'ergo the bard thinks the accords can win this fight'

Doesn't necessarily follow, unfortunately.

Quite Possibly A Cat

I wonder if she is keeping the Angel corpse around as a sort of MAD? If the Dead King is about to eat everyone she pops the angel corpse. Therefore simply having that option means the Dead King will never try and eat everyone.

Liliet

A general pointing out to the comment section: the function of the Judgement corpse that could potentially nuke the continent is predicated on Bard screwing with the Seraphim, who now cannot be reached, presumably even for this.

Putting aside story concerns (because that's not how Cordelia thinks), consider the situation. You have this potentially incredibly powerful artefact that you've already sunk quite a bit of cost and effort into securing, which importantly means you cannot really get another like it in time if it turns out you need one. You don't actually know what it'll do, which means it needs research and a lot of careful tinkering before activating in any way, which is exactly what you intend to do. It's impossible to actually destroy it, what you're being asked to do is put it out of reach – for yourself and probably the next couple of generations. Sooner or later someone will find it again, and it might just regain the currently disabled continentnuke functionality you just learned about by then...

What part of this sounds like a good idea?

Now, letting Hierophant examine it would be the best option from the point of workplace safety, but the Black Queen is known for bullying her way through problems if she gets it in her head something is one and this is the, like, one thing you have that you can use as a threat/deterrent if need be. Giving her the "off" button might as well be handing her keys to the kingdom.

Now the protagonist-loving comment section doesn't see the problem with that, and honestly Catherine has already proven herself benevolent enough for it to not be a completely stupid suicidal move, but Procer is trying to be a superpower, and superpowers don't hand other nations activation codes for their nukes. Keep in mind Procer isn't Cordelia's lump of clay to shape as she wills the way Catherine thinks about Callow and Amadeus about Praes. She's already gone pretty far in reforming it and curtailing its ambitions going forward, willingly giving away what few fangs it still can scrounge up might just count as betrayal at this point.

It's the crab bucket problem, and there isn't really any nice way out of it. If Cordelia tries to climb out, someone else from her own nation will pull her down. She has to play the game to stay at the table.

I hope Catherine doesn't do something rash in response, because there are good reasons for the harshness of her stance on this too =x

TeK

Oh, I can definitely see why Cordelia would do it, but you'd think the revelation that the artifact can potentially glass two thirds of Calernia will make er more cooperative, not less.

But I'll admit that protagonist-centered morality had been a scary thing in this novel. I never quite noticed it before in such effect.

Liliet

Keep in mind she's already looking at the potential of two thirds of Calernia being made into a very bustling graveyard. While the hypothetical of "this is a worst case scenario of malicious misdirection and unlimited power" is something she'd see as a hypothetical theoretical, not a near-guarantee the way Catherine-schooled-by-her-paranoid-father does.

TeK

Why exactly is he attacking though? Like what is his endgame? Cordelia seems perfectly fine believing that he attacks "cuse mah ivil", but that seems rather shallow. The one weapon he feared was broken, is it because he fears progress as speculated? Seems to shallow for such a monster. I would be banking on integrating myself back into the system, not setting myself up to be a corpse out of which the system is carved.

What does he gain? Maybe he wants Cordelia to use the corpse while Judgement is blocked to rid Intercessor of her weapon? Not enough. It is probably a side-goal, but this is war on arguably unprecedented scale. He must be after some real change on Calernian scene, but he can't possibly want to make it all his, this would be setting himself up for failure. Why now? Why war?

Liliet

> but he can't possibly want to make it all his, this would be setting himself up for failure

You're taking the genre savviness of "everything except the protagonist's course of action is doomed to failure while the protagonist is guaranteed to succeed" too far, I think.

Neshamah had established himself as a threat to all living (any at a time, if not all at once necessarily) by being willing and able to kill off an entire kingdom at once. Regardless of his long-term next step goal (regardless of if he has one or if he's fine where he is and just wants to keep going like that), he needs to be too tough to take down, because the living will take the first opportunity they have to do just that (particularly with Intercessor in the picture ensuring he won't wriggle his way out of it diplomatically).

This opportunity is coming at an increasing pace, and his one option for overcoming it and jumping up to where that kind is no longer a threat to him, is taking over the continent. Both story-wise (setting precedent for how powerful he is and how it's hubristic to try and go against him) and practically (that's how many dead he can now have, that's how far he can now spread his isolated loyal population, and that's how many resources he now has access to).

The weapon is a specific focused threat, but while he might believe that this particular alliance is not yet dangerous enough to seriously imperil him, he knows that the next one will be closer, and the next one after that will be closer still, if he allows them to happen.

TeK

Uhm, I hadn't actually used the "protag always wins" logic. I used regular old "Villains who are too powerful to be defeated don't have long life-expectancy". Even DK himself acknowledged it, when Cat answered his speech about how futile struggle is with "so you are saying you are invincible and can't possibly fail" with "ha, good catch, but no, I wouldn't be caught dead doing something like this".

There is a difference between "an evil in a can" and "holy shit this is a world-class threat". One gets you practical narrative invincibility because you are a stage prop, not an actor. Second, well, it is a nice tale of the world uniting despite it's differences to annihilate a threat to all.

On the other hand, what if he used Triumphant to iron out all the design flaws in his continent conquering plan? Scary thought. If EE manages to enter a passage about how the world powers outside Calernia are currently in some major squabble and can't look around for now, I'd be shitting my pants, uh, metaphorically speaking.

I am not saying he doesn't have a long-term plan, I am wondering what is it. He had seen firsthand how conquering the continent plays out, I don't think he is willing to risk so much for just being a target for some bigger threats.

Liliet

You have a good point about world powers having come in to nuke Triumphant. I think though that that scenario can be avoided without them necessarily being in a larger squabble, just by being more low-key than she was (I wouldn't be surprised if it turned out she antagonized them actively through the Ashuran naval access); and in any case, that's problem # next.

Tek

You don't just "hope world powers will not notice your attempt to conquer Australia". That's bad craftsmanship.

vernal.ancient

... this might be my new favorite comment

Liliet

Eh. Worked for the Golden Bloom elves.

Mental Mouse

ITSR that in fact she did in fact get pushy overseas, which led directly to hew downfall.

Liliet

(Also, "villains too powerful to be defeated don't have a long life expectancy" is only separate from "the protagonist always wins" through guide's meta-filter. At its origin, it's a derivative of the same rule)

Tek

Not necessarily, because Heroes aren't always protagonists, or rather, well, in the world of Guideverse there is either no protagonist or everyone is a potential protagonist, with Named becoming those.

Catherine aside of course, that is a little too meta. The point is that this connection works only if you conclude that only Heroes can be protagonists, which, well, that's what they want you to think.

Liliet

I'm talking about the IRL origin of tropes.

TeK

I doubt IRL exists in Guideverse 😊

Liliet

Yes it does, cause it's the actual origin of the tropes involved 😊

TeK

That's blasphemy, not proven, and may as well be the other way around besides.

agumentic

Triumphant became a target of empires from beyond the sea because she was actively planning to go and conquer the rest of the world. From the moment she decided that, coalitions of other countries would inevitably form for both the story and practical reasons. But if the Dead King doesn't decide to conquer the world, I think he may well get away with conquering Calernia – Gods will just update the setting and mark Calernia as "Continent of Death", and it will become new status quo. It might face resistance from other continents, but it wouldn't be nearly as hopeless of a story as "Villain on the way to conquer the world".

Liliet

This.

It's like how the rest of Calernia didn't really band together to defeat the Kingdom of the Dead until a powerful and ambitious alliance-builder-on-the-rise decided it would be a convenient step towards her long-term goals. While he was already actively attacking.

SpeckofStardust

The dead king wants to win. This has been his first possible chance to make progress on his end goal of winning, he might lose but the thing is he might win.

Which is why he is doing this.

TeK

Win what? That is what I was asking. Like he obviously trying to imitate the Gods and Creation in the Serenity, is he trying to achieve "true" godhood? Join the Below as newly minted God of Death?

Liliet

So far I'm going with the default of "live forever" as a simple, convenient and ongoing goal.

TeK

He doesn't have to war on people to achieve that.

Liliet

At this point he does.

TeK

I thought he had "living forever" pretty much in hand

Liliet

Not with as many enemies as he's got.

In particular note the dwarves who went fighting the drow just to encircle him and the drow who straight up want his stuff.

SpeckofStardust

He. kinda does at this point.

their are 3/2 steps to never dying.

1. Don't die due to old age.
2. Don't die due to people trying to kill you.
3. Don't die due by removing the ability to die.
(Considering how magic seems to work 3 isn't really in the cards)

The Dead king can no longer die due to old age, however he can still die due to someone killing him.

He has 3 ways to deal with this.

1. Have no one remember him.
2. Have no one want to kill him.
3. Kill everyone that might want to kill him.

Bard has made it impossible for him to be forgotten, And every major power that we have seen in story wants him to be removed from being. Even the Kingdom-Under has apparently been in an forever war with him at all times the dead king isn't fighting a war on the surface. the fact that he is currently busy is why they had such timing for attacking the Drow that Cat went to the underdark.

TeK

Isn't it theorised that he can't die because he is now the knowledge rather than a person?

alele

To be fair Cat has been playing Cassandra for a while, her secession and peace offers and the Angel Trial come to mind. But Political Expedience in the High Assembly(your crab bucket) has consistently royally(ha-ha) fucked everyone over. Remember that the Crusade and Dead King reappearance was essentially the result of a political ploy to solidify the Good Alliance with a common enemy, quell banditry by employing the excessive number of Fantassins after the Civil War ("A good sword will find a use, or make one.") and riding that success into maintaining Hasenbach in power and passing reforms. Of course, it comes as a response to Malicia's meddling but calling the "Crusade" seems to be the tipping point into permitting Dead King resurgence, by upping the Story scale of the conflict into "Good vs Evil". The Story keeps screwing Hasenbach over and she still hasn't learned how to operate while treating it as a factor.

Liliet

Mhm.

Liliet

Ideally for Catherine, Cordelia's last statement means "okay, if the trials work out to my satisfaction I'll throw it away." Optimistically but slightly more realistically, this means "okay, if the trials work out to my satisfaction, I'll give you the off button".

Worst case scenario, it means "if the trials work out to my satisfaction I'm keepign the status quo, if they don't I'm despairing and pushing the red button." Which is very stupid and unlikely tho.

Most realistically, it means "I'm not committing to anything, and I will revisit my stance in the future depending on where the chips fall from here". That's... most definitely what it means, alas for the drama of the declaration.

hakureireimu

Considering the epigraph, is it saying that the secret will get out and fuck them over?

Liliet

I see it as more of a meditation on omnicide as a political stance.

TeK

Well, the best way to solve politics is to kill all politicians.

Liliet

That's exactly Massacre's point!

mamm0nn

Oh, the sass from EE that 'Of course it's the fucking Bard.' on last chapter's discussions. You don't fool me, I know it was Traitorous in a wig seeding deception and ruses to mess with people that won't even be born for centuries to fight an ancient monster in a war that he could only glimpse would rock Creation.

TeK

That is totally Erratic's fault though. He trained us to think "well obviously it's X, therefore it's literally anything but X"

vernal.ancient

Ah, but that was his plan all along! Once your readers expect the twist, the real twist is that there is no twist!
– Dread EEmperor Irritant the Oddly Successful, on his little-known stint as a novelist

WuseMajor

I'm honestly starting to wonder if she hasn't decommissioned it already and is just using it as a scare tactic. Because...I don't see how she can think of herself as a servant of her people otherwise. Activating that weapon presumably needs several people, likely powerful Priests, and any of them might well get ideas above their station at any time. I find it difficult to buy that Cordy could trust anyone else with this.

Alternately, there's actually some reason she can't decommission it. Like it's tied to her life force or something.

I suppose there's also the option where she thinks that Callow is trying for an advantage here, instead of just not wanting anyone to have a continent destroying superweapon and has basically stopped listening to anyone but the advisers who are telling her "no, no, this will work." However, that seems unlike her.

Ultimately, I think there's something weird going on here. Possibly it is just her using her last big bargaining chip to try to feel like she has some control over things. But...I dunno, I think it's more than that

ninegardens

So... Is it just me or is our boy Hanno planning to steal an angel?

Cause he seriously seems like he is planning to intercept the problem at the source.

Liliet

I... don't think he'd go for that before trying to side with Catherine and pressure Cordelia that way.

I suspect a coordinated assault of "ALL Named who know their shit think it's a terrible idea" would be a more persuasive argument than just Catherine with her mixed allegiances and motivations and like 5 roles she's trying to play at the same time.

ninegardens

I ain't saying "Steal the angel" is going to be his FIRST port of call... but he is a hero, and its a doomsday weapon, and his personal connection to the Serephim in particular has been called out in this chapter. I ain't saying he won't try other things first, I'm just... story wise, he is much better placed to deal with this challenge than say... Cat and Sve Noc.

Probably the only one better placed for this is Zeze.

Liliet

That would be breaking the Truce and Terms, though.

pagesbe

But how would it do that? Like, using angels is of course against the Liesse Accords, but those aren't in effect yet, and the Truce and Terms don't have provisions against using that kind of stuff.

Liliet

I mean stealing from Cordelia.

pagesbe

While stealing from Cordelia is probably a crime in Procer, it is not a violation of the Truce and Terms (unless it is, in which case I'm gonna need a quote). It is also not something either Heroes or Villains would hesitate to do if they thought she was going to activate a Doomsday weapon.

Liliet

One of the Grand Alliance members getting ready to activate a doomsday weapon without consent of the rest and provoking heroes and villains into going after them is already presumably a violation of the T&T on their part.

The Truce & Terms is a wartime let's-work-together agreement. I fail to see how doing a break and enter on your ally would be permitted by it, and I'm going to turn the request for citations right back on you – what makes you think respect for each other's property is not baked in?

pagesbe

To my knowledge, the Truce and Terms basically state this: Both Heroes and Villains will be pardoned from all past sins. They will only be subject to their leader, either the White Knight or the Black Queen. Said leader will be responsible for their actions and will hold them responsible for them. Acts of violence between members of the Truce and Terms is forbidden on punishment from their leader.

The Truce and Terms is a Named thing. It's not a general alliance, it's a policy of how to treat Named. It is very pointedly not the Accords, it's a limited prototype based on regulating Named behavior. Why WOULD the Truce and Terms have provisions for stealing from an outside sovereign power?

I mean... stealing is a crime. You don't need that baked into a Named accord, it's illegal on its own merits. If the Truce and Terms were disbanded, do you think it'd suddenly be legal to steal from Cordelia? Of course not, that'd be stupid.

pagesbe

Honestly a Named committing crimes under the terms, including but not limited to theft, would result in the respective leader providing punishment under most cases. If the leader was the one who committed the crime, then it would be the other leader and the leaders of the Grand Alliance who would judge them. If both leaders were in on it, the Truce and Terms are probably fucked anyways.

Liliet

The Truce and Terms specifically state that Named are not subject to mundane laws for the duration. That's the point of contention between Cordelia and Cat&Hanno right now: she wants to prosecute treason, they cannot allow her to do so because the Truce & Terms give immunity from everything that isn't themselves.

Liliet

> Honestly a Named committing crimes under the terms, including but not limited to theft, would result in the respective leader providing punishment under most cases. If the leader was the one who committed the crime, then it would be the other leader and the leaders of the Grand Alliance who would judge them.

Yes? That's what I'm saying?

Hanno would not go for stealing because it'd upset the fragile unity that the First Prince was talking about – the idea that Named can be trusted to govern themselves and cooperate with earthly authorities (the Grand Alliance) in an orderly manner.

Such an action on his part, even more so than on the part of any Named under him, would be sticking a sack of dynamite under that and lighting it up.

pagesbe

And I'm saying that in the face of a doomsday device being activated, both the White Knight and the Black Queen would push through that. And if they could get the support of the other major players of the Grand Alliance, which is mostly Levant to be honest, the Truce and Terms might even survive it. A Cordelia who just had her doomsday device stolen/broken and whose nation is currently being chomped on by the Dead King would not be able to stand politically or otherwise against a united front of every other leader.

Frivolous

Magesbe is correct. Stealing from Cordelia won't break the Truce and Terms, except in that it would cause Procer to cease granting immunity to heroes and villains.

But that would hardly matter. If Catherine and Hanno, not even counting yet the other nations, were united in denying Procer the angel corpse? Cordelia could scream a lot, and maybe refuse to accede to the later Liesse Accords, but she could do nothing about it.

Ironically, the Liesse Accords might benefit if Cordelia used the angel corpse and detonated Procer. Catherine wouldn't have to sweet-talk the First Prince if there was no Procer to be ruler of.

Sugar Roll

Wiping out 2/3 of the continent to take out the Dead King? That's got to be a cheap price to pay in the Bard eyes. I don't see it happening though.

Sanctvs obscvrvvm

So... the fantasy Americans now have a fantasy nuke. And a teleporting immortal intercessor may plan to use it to destroy millions.

Daniel E

Just adding my conspiracy theory to the pile: Hasenbach uses the Angel nuke at the very end, and that is the catalyst for Catherine's Name, with her first Aspect being something that will change the nuke into a 'does not destroy the world' effect.

Frivolous

I think Catherine's Name emerges long before the end. Less than a week from the current time is my conservative guess.

superkeaton

Cordelia still doesn't seem to grasp the importance of Stories

Konstantin von Karstein

Cat and Tariq should have had a serious conversation with her when they were at Salia after the peace conference, and give her an lesson in Story-fu

Frivolous

Can't be Tariq. Remember, Cordelia hates him for seeding a plague in Proceran territory.

Unfortunately, I don't believe there are any other heroes with serious story-fu left, I don't recall Hanno showing expertise in the matter yet.

Catherine does have serious story-fu, but Cordelia doesn't trust her opinion on the matter.

The ideal opinion would come from the Augur, Agnes Hasenbach, but Augur is so cuckoo that I'm not sure she can really teach Cordelia what she needs to know.

Siobhan

Look at how Hanno handled the Council of Chosen.

The issue isn't his "story-fu"

He just has different priorities than Cat has when it comes to managing the Patterns involved.

Liliet

Hanno is very good at story-fu. See: the "danger just proves we'll be unharmed" against Kairos, wielding providence to get Amadeus to fight him (sure, it was clumsy and didn't work, but the approach was there), sending comic relief team members into danger first because they'll trip over everything dangerous while remaining unharmed (how many people can effectively use a Fortunate Fool on a team?!)... and most interestingly, grasping the long-term narrative shift implications of Catherine's designs for the Accords where even Amadeus didn't.

Also, y'know, the memories of a thousand heroes studied for insight, for where all that's coming from.

I think Cat should listen to him more.

Frivolous

On the other hand, Hanno is also the guy who walked into Kairos's trap for Judgement and lost completely, despite Catherine's warning that his smugness was a non-verbal form of "I am invincible!"..

So I'm not nearly as certain about Hanno's story-fu. He has definite blind spots.

Salt

He is, I suspect, strong in typical or historically prevalent story tropes, and all-but-blind to new stories or tropes.

Recall gives him the ability to avoid any mistake that any previous Hero has made – it really a bit of a cheat – but the fact that it is so strong of an aspect means that it necessarily takes up more capacity. Nothing comes without a price, and it seems fitting that near-omniscient hindsight would be paired with cripplingly deficient foresight.

It would explain why he's a borderline Mary Sue in terms of typical engagements, but fell flat on his face with the Hierarch. There was no Hierarch-equivalent experience for him to draw on with Recall.

Frivolous

Interesting analysis, and I suspect also shrewd. Thank you, Salt.

ninegardens

I'd almost go so far as to say, WK has TOO MUCH story-fu. He leans on it a lot, and is very aware and careful about it... which means that when he is dealing with opponents who are Story savvy (Black), he can get out maneuvered by the actual physical non-story-related reality.

And yeah, Kiaros slammed him by pretending to be a text book villain, while also janking up his chances by rolling 5 stories concurrently etc.

The fact that Kiaros was aiming for a POTENTIAL victory, as opposed to WK and BK who often aim for the "certain" victory also probably tilted the the fates in his favour- the story more willing to lend a hand to someone who rolled the dice.

Liliet

Catherine has pointed out back during the Summer campaign that it was only for villains that gloating was a form of suicide. She commented that was how she could tell Archer wasn't a villain.

And everyone has blind spots.

Mental Mouse

Adding to Liliet's "Hanno does have story-fu" catalogue, there was the whole debate and fight against the Mirror Knight, where he essentially took on and prevailed against the Bard's final affray.

Necarion

And don't forget everything he did with Mirror Knight, where he knew he had to beat MK by physical force to (a) preserve his authority, and (b) keep MK from dying or becoming a fallen hero. Those two chapters were all about Hanno observing and managing the flow of the story to keep everyone alive.

Jarandhel Dreamsinger

If only there was someone whose Name was fueled by (Self)-Righteous Anger whose person and Kingdom were directly endangered by the existence of the Weapon, and who had it within their Aspects and abilities to solve the problem with a simple "Yoink!"

Cicero

There is another way to interpret Cordelia's position:

"Prove the Terms will work in controlling Named, and I will surrender the the doomsday weapon."

Liliet

"Or at least consider it. I'm a diplomat, I never promise anything if I can help it."

LizAris

Well, all this political conflict and angel-corpsing aside, the sheer amount of snark in this chapter was incredibly refreshing.

Daniel E

My children will eat your goats, you flat-toothed mongrel.

Tom

Cat says here that she thinks one of the Bard's aspects is her sight for stories: "my money was on her having only three aspects just like the rest of us. One was the wandering trick, coming and going everywhere, and another had to be her sight for stories."

I was wondering if that was distinct from what Cat shoved into her soul (with Masego's help) from the Arcadian echo of the Intercessor, but then I read it again: "The shape of a thousand stories, the tune of the song if not the words. An instinct, one that'd sharpened something already existing into a blade capable of upending old monsters and empires." (from <https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2020/03/10/chapter-16-divine/>)

The key part being "An instinct, one that'd sharpened something already existing..." where the "something" is presumably WB's aspect for stories.

Anyway, nice 😊

Liliet

I think the "something" refers to Cat's pre-existing knack for using the story as a blunt weapon.

NerfGlaistigUaine

Ok, we have to be missing something here. Cordelia wanting to keep her hands on Fantasy Nuke on Crack is understandable, but the blunt and rigid measures are OOC. She's not giving an inch even when she knows the weapon is superly unreliable and the entire Alliance is standing on thin ice. There's got to be some other factor we're not seeing, which is terrifying b/c it's already such a massive clusterfuck.

Necarion

Why would the Wandering Bard want to wipe out 90% of the continent? If the Judgment Corpse is sufficient to kill the Dead King, why would she amplify its power to catastrophic levels? Or is it a way to ensure that there is enough narrative weight to kill the Dead King?

One possibility: if the Judgment Corpse by itself has a 20-30% chance of killing DK, then WB might want to amplify it. If there is a collective sacrifice of everyone on Calernia, then the Story would accept that as sufficient to make the odds 100%.

One question that has been bugging me for a while. Does the Wandering Bard actually want the Dead King destroyed? Obviously she's been fighting against him for at least 1000 years, but nothing has been sufficient to stop him, and has actually dragged Calernia down in the process. The scene that bothers me most is from the end of "Interludes: Empires" at the end of Book IV. <https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2018/08/24/interlude-empires/>

After talking about their past interactions ("Lines had to be drawn, we were still establishing the rules," the Intercessor smiled. "Both of us played rougher back then") (note the comments about "playing"), the Bard tells the joke about the Dead King eating the baby:

""

"So you do know it," she said. "Should have told me at the start, I got way into it."

"I assume," the Dead King said, "that this atrocity – and I do not use this word lightly, believe me – of a story had a purpose?"

The Intercessor grinned.

"Of course," she said, wine red as blood trickling down her chin. "Eat the baby, King of Death. Just this once, I'll allow it."
""

This doesn't sound like implacable foes. What is her game?

Jarandhel Dreamsinger

>This doesn't sound like implacable foes. What is her game?

These are foes who have been at war for at least a thousand years. Arguably at this point they are closer to each other than to any other living being, because the rise and fall of whole generations have become as the ebb and flow of the tides to them. Only with each other do they have stability.

wadeingintheriver

Anybody else getting Black Company vibes from the Grizzled Fantassin? Between her insistence on the honorable treatment of the body of the long-dead mercenary (especially the phrase "buried in the manner of the southern companies") and the way she said that she'd "honored the contract and earned the long peace", as well as her competence in the previous chapter, I'm strongly reminded of the Company in the days when they were in the service of the Lady.

Dread Emperor Traitorous

Spoiler: The Bard's weakness is the musical instrument. Destroying the instrument first removes the invulnerability and perhaps name because you need the instrument to be a bard.

Chapter 37: Trying

"A man should beware of praying for justice when he truly wants vindication. He might just get what he asked for, and it is never a pretty thing when we all get exactly what we deserve."

– King Pater of Callow, the Unheeding

There were too many parts in motion for me to keep track of them all, and I did not like the feeling in the slightest.

Late in the night Lord Yannu Marave arrived in the Arsenal, though given the hour I elected not to reach out to him until morning. Now that the representative for the Dominion was there, the right amount of high officer for the Grand Alliance had gathered and the trials could begin. A round of messengers sent to all involved saw me get answers as I broke my fast with Vivienne just before Morning Bell, the two of us catching up over warm pastries by Hakram's bedside. The necessary official talk we'd gotten out of the way the day before, at least when it came to getting me up to speed about all she'd been up to, so we'd allowed ourselves the luxury of an hour or two for ourselves. It ended up being less than that, inevitably, as the last messages came while she was on the tail end of a rant about living so close to the seat of Proceran power.

"If I receive another subtle yet suggestive poem from a secret admirer, I'm going to start setting the Jacks after them," Vivienne told me, at least halfway seriously. "I'm actually pretty sure two of them actually hired the same poet to write for them because the rhymes were suspiciously similar."

I answered with an amused snort.

"Any fish work hooking in there?" I teased.

"Please," she dismissed. "Like taking a Proceran to bed wouldn't be horrible politics even if those trying their hands weren't either ambitious fools or spies."

"Terrible politics," I agreed, without the faintest hint of irony.

I'd been taught by some very fine liars, after all. And it had truly been that to dally with Frederic, admittedly. Terrible, delightful politics that did that delicious thing with their hips. I seemed to have gotten away with it, though, so I'd not get greedy and ruin it by dallying again even if the thought was occasionally tempting. A knock at the door was followed by another messenger being allowed in, passing along a written response. Hanno had been the last to answer, not by lack of punctuality but by being the hardest to find. His agreement to the first trial – the Hunted Magician's – being held half past Noon Bell was dropped by Cordelia's impressively prompt one and the Lord of Malaga's slightly slower answer.

"So?" Vivienne asked. "Are we starting today?"

"This afternoon," I replied. "All agreed."

In the wake of wrapping this up, I'd spring on them the Concocter's own punishment. None of this was supporting Hasenbach outright, but prompt and severe consequences for my Named who'd stepped out of line ought to make it clear the reins were still being held. As long as the trials for Above's didn't end up spoiling the brew, anyway. The Mirror Knight had not tried to escape imprisonment and the Severance was back under seal, but my polite inquiries had made it clear that Hanno did not see a trial as something to discuss in advance. I'd expected as much, honestly, given that I was dealing with the Sword of Judgement. I still didn't like that I'd be going in blind there, but there wasn't really anything I could do there – under the Terms this was the White Knight's show, and no trespass of mine there would go without swift and severe answer.

"Yannu Marave's considered a pragmatist by his countrymen," my dark-haired heiress said. "Not aggressive by nature, though he'll be extremely thorough in answering slights. So long as you don't end up touching the Dominion's bottom line, though, I don't see him being trouble."

Hasenbach had intimated as much, but it was good to hear the same talk coming from a source I could trust wholeheartedly.

"The crowns do matter," I admitted, "but it's the White Knight that'll be the keystone."

The Terms were, ultimately, a treaty between Named. The nations that'd signed on did so mostly as guarantors of rights and privileges, not legal authorities – Procer, Callow and Levant all had a seat in the tribunals but in the end it was the White Knight and the Black Queen that passed sentences. It'd have a lot more of an impact if Hanno had issues with my rulings than if nation did.

"True as that is," Vivienne calmly said, "what is left to do now, save pulling the trigger?"

I'd never won much arguing with the truth, so I let the conversation end on that.

—

Putting the staff together for this hadn't been all that difficult, since the members of the Arsenal could serve as a 'neutral' entity to draw people from. Not the Named, of course, but the scholars and mages and priests. I'd decided to avoid any trouble by drawing on scholars for the scribing work, and from Vivienne's own staff for the rest. The ever-useful Lady Henrietta Morley – these days no mere landless aristocrat but instead Viv's own private secretary – was recommended to me as someone capable of handling details and timing, so I put her in charge of handling transcripts and evidence.

For all that this was a formal trial under the Terms, it appeared somewhat haphazard at first glance. At the high table the tribunal sat, with Vivienne representing Callow and the rest as expected: Cordelia Hasenbach for Procer, Yannu Marave for Levant and Hanno for the heroes. They'd all been provided with a list of the accusations laid at the Hunted Magician's feet earlier today, which weren't actually all that numerous. 'Aid to an enemy of the Grand Alliance' on one count, for having cooperated with the Bard against the Arsenal, then one count of 'unprovoked assault on allies' for the gas canisters he'd opened in the Stacks and one count of 'accessory to attempted murder' for the illusions he'd woven when attempting to help the Red Axe get Frederic killed.

I'd spoken with the Concocter, who would have had a right to lodge a complain considering the gas in those canisters had been her work in the first place, but she'd declined to pursue the matter. Through me, anyway. No doubt she'd be making a deal of her own with the Magician without my being involved. Of those charges the 'aid to an enemy' was the most severe, the deceptively mild wording mostly a result of it not being possible to call it treason when there were so many different crowns and jurisdictions involved. It was still considered just as severe, though, and it'd be the driving force behind the harshest part of his sentence.

The Hunted Magician had come dressed soberly but smartly, having put on an embroidered pale green vest over a white long-sleeved shirt and loose dark trousers. Like most the times I'd seen him, he looked more like a wealthy nobleman in casual clothes than any sort of mage. It was all well-cut without being ostentatious, which was halfway clever of him: it was a shallow thing, but people tended to favour those who looked well. Look too rich, though, and pretty or not that appreciation tended to turn to antipathy with some. He'd straddled the line well, which only had me further convinced that he was highborn and not from a lesser line. In Procer in particular, the difference between those who dressed well but subtly and those who were garish with their wealth was one of the ways to tell apart those whose 'nobility' was an old thing, often preceding the Principate itself, from those who'd risen to higher station more recently by sword or coin.

I'd already been on my feet when the Hunted Magician had been escorted in, made to stand on bare stone as behind a set of wards and guards the assembled high officers of the Grand Alliance sat and watched him approach, so I only needed to limp a bit before I stood by his side. The man turned dark eyes on me, face blank, and I leaned in a little closer.

"Keep your head," I murmured. "They're not out to get you but no one here wants you to wiggle out either, least of all me, so take your lumps and walk away."

"I helped your man," the Magician murmured back. "Do not forget it."

"I forget little, Hunted Magician," I coldly replied. "And never aid given to my enemies. Best you don't forget that either, yes?"

He'd been well-taught enough not to grimace at the reminder that even the help he'd given Masego when it came to Quartered Seasons hardly made up for the hand he'd had in the storm that'd swept over the Arsenal. A great deal could have been mitigated, if he'd not decided it would be the height of cleverness to make a deal with the Wandering Bard. Mind you, if Tariq hadn't insisted we hedge our bets when it came to her such a deal might have smelled of the noose enough the Magician wouldn't have dared. Past a certain point, fault became such a many-faceted thing there was little practical point in pondering it. I turned away from my charged and faced the tribunal. Cordelia was unreadable, Hanno lightly frowning and Yannu Marave looked already bored. Vivienne, clever thing that she was, was spending more time looking at the other members of the tribunal than anything else.

"I'll not trouble you with an excess off ceremony," I said. "You've all already been made aware of the breaches of the Terms the Hunted Magician has been accused of. For the sake of formality, I will list them once more: aid to an enemy of the Grand Alliance, unprovoked assault on allies and accessory to attempted murder. As representative for the villains under the Terms, these are the charges I will lay against him. Do any of you intend to present further charges, or contest those I have laid down?"

"I do not," the First Prince calmly said.

"No," the Lord of Alava bluntly said.

Vivienne silently shook her head, but like me her eyes were on the White Knight.

"Yes," the White Knight said.

My fingers clenched around the length of dead yew in my hand.

"Elaborate, White Knight," I said.

"Your charge of 'accessory to attempted murder' would attain the Red Axe of said attempted murder before she's stood trial of her own," Hanno said.

Which was, I grimly though, actually a good point. Sure any idiot could tell I was right to call it that – there wasn't a lot of room for interpretation in the act of hacking a sword at Frederic's neck – but the Terms functioned because I passed judgement for villains and Hanno for the heroes. Neither of us could or should trespass beyond that boundary.

"I'll not withdraw the charge," I said, "but I would offer assurances that I would not consider the Red Axe in away attainted by it."

"Callow agrees with such a compromise," Vivienne calmly said.

It was a cheap trick, agreeing with me quickly to put the pressure on others, but that didn't mean it wouldn't be effective.

"Levant agrees as well," Lord Yannu dismissed.

Cordelia's cool blue eyes were slightest bit narrowed in thought, but she did not hesitate as soon as she was satisfied she'd parsed out the implications.

"The Principate is in agreement," she flatly stated.

Eyes went to Hanno, whose frown has deepened ever so slightly.

"I am wary of influencing opinion in another trial even with such a compromise," the White Knight said. "Yet I can recognize that opinion is not bound to be settled by law, and so it should not be objected to on such grounds. Under such an assurance, I withdraw my objection."

Well, first hurdle passed. From there, it was mostly a matter of presenting to the tribunal what I was making my own judgement on. By Henrietta Morley's practiced hand my witnesses were brought in one after the other, those made to present in person at least. Unprovoked assault was the easiest to prove, so I started with that: two scholars who'd been made unconscious by the gas, a healer to certify none of those affected had any lasting consequences – which would have made it more than mere unprovoked assault – and the Magician confessed to the theft of the canisters and their use when pressed.

"If the canisters were stolen, why is theft not being laid as a charge?" the First Prince asked. "I believe those were property of the Principate, as well."

The Concocter had made those as a possible tool for Cordelia to quell riots bloodlessly, apparently, and created them using Proceran coin. But I'd known about this in advance and prepared for it.

"The canisters remained the Concocter's property so long as they were in the Arsenal, and she's declined to lodge any grievances," I said. "Lady Morley?"

The noblewoman had a signed statement by said Concocter backing up my words brought forward, and after it was made clear that the loss of the canisters and their content would be folded into the repair budget for the Arsenal after the raid instead of forcing Procer to pay for the same goods twice she had no further objection. We moved on to the slightly trickier one, accessory to attempted murder. Two officers – one Levantine and one Callowan – were brought to describe the illusion woven, which had been of the Prince of Brus acting and speaking aggressively. Marave spoke up for the first time, just to make sure his countrymen would face no retribution for baring steel on a prince of the blood, and lost interest as soon as he was reassured this was the case.

My case for this was weaker, and in truth some would have folded it into 'aid to an enemy of the Grand Alliance', but I was actually doing the Magician a favour here. By making him part of someone else's attempted murder, in this case the Red Axe's, I was preventing him from being accused of having tried the same thing only on the Bard's behalf. Trying to get a prince of the blood – and hero – killed for the Intercessor would warrant steep consequences, while helping a heroine in her own fumbled attempt was not quite so grave. He wasn't a fool, and he obviously knew the Terms in and out, it was almost eagerly that the Hunted Magician confessed to an act I had only moderate proof of him having carried out. After Yannu Marave watching out for his fellow Levantines I got no interruption, and we swiftly went on to the last of the charges.

"First, I want to remind you that even at this very moment the Wandering Bard has yet to be designated an enemy of the Grand Alliance," I said. "It was not a breach of the Terms to have dealings with her when the Hunted Magician did. What was a breach, however, was how information like the location and inner dealings of the Arsenal – a secret location – were revealed to an outsider. It was when the Bard then masterminded an assault here that the Magician's actions became 'aid to an enemy'. In this light, it seems appropriate to water my wine."

"Traitors should only know one kind of mercy," Yannu Marave replied.

Most people in the room knew enough about the Dominion that he didn't have to slide a finger across his throat to actually spell out what he meant. That he didn't bother to do it anyway made him a fairly subtle man, by Levantine standards.

"It is not appropriate to speak of the sentencing before the trial is finished," the White Knight cut in, tone even. "Is there a reason for it, Black Queen?"

"Informing deliberation is part of her responsibilities as representative for Below's champions," Vivienne coolly replied. "Failing in that duty would truly be inappropriate, unlike what you're currently fretting about."

The Lord of Alava let out a chuckle, looking more interested than he'd been in the better part of an hour.

"Fighting words," he approvingly said.

I cleared my throat.

"I spoke to this to make clear that I believe the Hunted Magician's breach of the Terms was done not out of malice but out of ignorance and incompetence," I said.

The man stiffened behind me but had enough sense not to argue my words.

"Indeed?" the First Prince of Procer said, eyebrow quirking.

I suspected that, after the last few weeks, Cordelia was rather enjoying watching one of we troublesome Named squirm in discomfort.

"Absolutely," I told her. "The Magician's fault came as a result of wildly overestimating himself, when in fact his arrogance and simplicity allowed a genuinely malicious entity to make use of him as a tool."

The Magician twitched at my words but kept his mouth shut. Maybe he wasn't entirely beyond salvaging, then. Evidence over his conspiracy with the Bard was sparse as wheat fields in the Hungering Sands, but that was seen to by the simple magic of having told him in advance that if he took his fucking lumps and confessed I wouldn't need to treat him as a liability. Through gritted teeth, the Proceran confessed to having had dealings with the Bard. He left out as much as he could, as I'd expected, but even the bare bones were damning enough. His saving grace here would be that he hadn't actually killed anyone here directly, which hadn't actually been all that difficult to prove: all our dead and wounded were accounted for, the reasons for their state more or less clear. His responsibility there was indirect, which left me some wiggling room even with the gravity of the aid charge.

I'd finished making my case, so without further ado I asked the tribunal if they wanted to deliberate before recommendations were made to me. Hanno did, but no one else was in favour so he conceded and we went on straight to the tribunal offering its recommendations.

"I trust in the judgement of the Black Queen," Cordelia said, opening the game with a measured smile, "and I expect that her sentencing will be fitting."

Easier to say, I supposed, when you already knew what that sentence was. Still, she'd left herself some room to manoeuvre just in case what I'd told her I'd pass as a sentence wasn't what I'd actually say now.

"We should be fitting his head for a pike," Lord Yannu said. "But if he's just an idiot, as you say, it'd be a waste. Levant will settle for flesh instead of a skull, Black Queen."

I nodded. Not exactly a push for moderation, that, but it was signaling that the Dominion would be satisfied so long as the punishment stung. The details of that punishment, though, they hardly cared about. Vivienne did not speak, since it would have been quite the empty game if she'd pretended she had the right to speak with Callow over me, so it was Hanno that spoke next – but only after a long silence spent carefully choosing his words.

"There must be visible consequence to aiding a common enemy," the White Knight eventually said. "And given that the breaches seems to have been committed on personal grounds, the consequences should be personal as well."

Mhm. He'd been careful not to actually suggest a sentence – knowing that whether I then followed his suggestion or ignored it there'd still be trouble from some quarters – but it was clear he wanted a few metaphorical fingers broken. Nothing permanent, I meant, but at the very least lasting pain. The tribunal would have the right to comment once more once I'd offered the 'draft' of my sentence, and I suspected he was keeping his comments limited until we got there. Nothing I'd heard now went against what I'd planned, so it was a simple thing from there: I simply shared the sentence I'd already told Hasenbach I planned to hand down. Loss of the right to refuse assignments, then a fine equivalent to the sum of the damages done to the Arsenal repeated for every signatory member. Pensions for the families of the dead got a grunt of approval from Lord Marave, but otherwise he seemed skeptical of the punishment until I specified the fine could be repaid in work.

The prospect of Levant having access to a highly-skilled Named enchanter brightened his eyes, especially considering that with the established debt there wouldn't be a need to pay that enchanter.

The Hunted Magician himself looked appalled, at first, but as the initial surprise passed he looked thoughtful. He'd figured out the advantages for him, then – ties to three crowns, and good reason for each to ensure he stayed alive after the Truce and Terms ended and the Accords replaced them. Satisfied he wouldn't be a stick in my wheel going forward, I returned my attention to the tribunal. The First Prince, content I had kept to my word, gave her seal of approval promptly. The Lord of Alava was not far behind, and mostly symbolically Vivienne agreed for Callow. The last to speak was once more Hanno, and he was studying the Hunted Magician closely.

"It is a measured punishment," the White Knight said, "but it lacks consequence."

My brow rose. I'd been pretty severe already, so I wasn't exactly inclined to bite there.

"Coin is coin," Hanno said. "But such a failing should not be kept under wraps. Let his breaches be made known to all Named. Let sunlight burn out the rot, so that something wiser might replace it."

Mhm. Well, it'd be a humiliation for the Magician but it wasn't like the specifics of the assault on the Arsenal were going to stay secret forever. He couldn't lose respect the heroes already didn't give him, and my own lot would be more inclined to mock a failed plot that condemn it on moral grounds. I could actually kind of see what Hanno was going for, there: if the Named under the Terms became a community, then reputation would start being worth a lot more more. It'd become something worth taking small losses to preserve, if it was actually useful, and serve as an incentive to keep one's word. It was worth encouraging, and not unreasonable to ask.

"Agreed," I said. "The breaches and sentence will be made known to all Named under the Terms, if not the details of the trial."

He nodded in thanks, and another round of consultations got me the unanimous seal of approval from the tribunal that I did not need but had definitely wanted. This had, to my surprise, actually gone pretty well. The Concocter's own punishment wouldn't require a trial like this, but I'd wait until later to make it known to the high officers seated in the room – there was no need to muddle the waters by doing too much at once. A semi-formal occasion sometime this week would do just as well, with an opportunity to voice issues should there be any. This wasn't like hitting a tavern with friends, so when the business was done we all parted ways after the proper courtesies were offered. I'd intended on thanking the staff I'd borrowed personally, including Vivienne's own, but the White Knight lingered long enough to catch my eye so I passed that duty along to Vivs and accepted the implied invitation to go on a walk.

Considering Hanno had made it clear he wasn't going to be discussing the trials in advance, I was pretty curious about what it was he actually wanted. I was doing a lot of limping in hallways with important people these days, I mused, to discuss all sorts of concerns. I was going to have to see about getting some of this done seated, or else I'd need to arrange for more of the brew that made my leg sufferable without drawing on Night.

"Your leg is paining you," Hanno said, eyes narrowing as he studied me.

Not the start I'd expected, but true enough.

"That's what legs do," I dismissed.

"I will refrain from small talk," the White Knight told me. "We can slow, if you prefer."

"Thought you said we wouldn't be doing small talk," I grunted back.

I'd never learned to take pity all that well, even when it was kindly meant, and I was starting to feel too old to try. The dark-skinned hero didn't even blink at my bite. I supposed he was used to it, by now.

"The First Prince has approached me several times now," Hanno said. "She has several intentions, but foremost among them is securing agreement for the Red Axe being tried under Proceran law instead of the Terms."

I didn't bother to fake surprise. Even odds he'd be able to tell even if I did, and we were largely on the same side besides.

"I've heard the speech as well," I said, then after mulling it over threw him a bone, "from both her and the Kingfisher Prince."

The White Knight did not look all that surprised, but he nodded in thanks anyway. Yeah, I wasn't surprised that the First Prince hadn't tried to win him over through Frederic. The Kingfisher Prince was his subordinate, in a sense, and it would have tripped a lot of those Proceran unspoken laws to bring attention so clumsily to the divided loyalties of Prince Frederic of Brus.

"I would not impugn your character," Hanno delicately said, "yet I imagine a diplomat of Cordelia Hasenbach's skill would have not prepared an offer easy to refuse."

I decided to be amused instead of insulted, after a beat. He was asking whether or not I'd been bought by whatever it was Hasenbach had offered me for my agreement, in this case Procer's seal of approval on the Liesse Accords as they currently stood. Hanno had been right in both suspecting an offer would be made to me and that it'd be a very tempting one, so I'd forgive him on account of that and the delicacy of inquiry.

"I didn't bite," I bluntly told him. "My priorities haven't shifted, White Knight. First is winning this war, second is establishing the Liesse Accords. Most everything else is noise."

Not entirely true, since my neck would bend some when it came to the preservation of Callow, but in essence I stood by my words. I'd rather fight this war in Procer now, even if it got ruinous to my kingdom's treasury, than on Callowan borders in a decade with fewer allies and resources to call on. It wasn't going to make me popular, but I could live with that: there was a reason my abdication was set in stone.

"I believed this would be the case," Hanno admitted, "but I had to ask. The intensity of Procer's overtures over this worries me. It smells of desperation, and despair makes for a poor councillor."

"She has reason to be worried," I admitted. "We both had traitors, White. If it'd been only my lot she might have been able to write it off as Below's usual perfidy, but yours have arguably been making more trouble with her. Add to that the three fingers calling the Mirror Knight to heel cost you, and it doesn't paint a pretty picture. We're not looking all that reliable."

And, in an ironic twist, for once it was the heroes who were looking like the problem child. Between killing villains, bleeding princes and dabbling in coups, it had to be said that Above's champions had not come out of the last month looking pristine. My lot looked better in comparison, amusingly enough, but much as it pained me to admit it that might not necessarily be a good thing. Villains weren't the ones bringing the trust to the table, when it came to nations backing the Terms. A risk had been taken on Below's folk in large part because I was riding herd of them and I'd shown a lot of goodwill to the leaders of Levant and Procer. That and I'd established early on that I was perfectly willing to kill villains if they stepped out of line. In the end, though, it was the heroes that brought trustworthiness to the Truce and Terms. It was their reputations, their record, that justified all the twists and turns and compromises that were being had to keep Named mustered and pointed at Keter.

If they were no longer trusted, we had a problem.

"I have worries myself," Hanno frankly replied. "Most urgent among them the First Prince keeping the remains of one of the Seraphim. Even were she not attempting to make some sort of sordid weapon out of it, I would be troubled: such a thing is not to be trifled with."

I grimaced. Glad as I was that the White Knight shared my misgivings there, there were risks to making common front. We were already refusing Hasenbach over the Red Axe, and then we'd be trying to pry what she probably saw as her weapon of last resort from her hands. I was pretty sure Levant could be convinced to back us over this, through Tariq if nothing else, but I was wary of going through with this. Like Hanno had said, Procer was starting to smell of desperation. I'd heard in Frederic's voice and seen it on Hasenbach's face, so I was wary of pushing the Principate when it already felt cornered.

People did stupid things, when they felt cornered.

The hardest lesson I'd learned since putting on the fancy hat and eating a season had been that just because you could win a fight didn't mean you should be fighting it. There was already too much fighting going on among people who should all be on the same side, and it was like the assault on the Arsenal had shone down a light on every fracture that lay at the heart of the Grand Alliance. They were growing bigger, I could feel it, and yet caution was stilling my hand: a hasty move, now, could do untold damage. And yet waiting too long will do just the same, I thought. We needed to finish those trials as soon as possible, then tie up Mercantis and the Gigantes. Gods, all this trouble and we'd yet to even begin the godsdamned war council for the actual fucking war we were fighting.

"Give her time," I said. "She's a pragmatic creature, there's only so many bridges she'll be willing to burn over this."

"It will have to be addressed before our time at the Arsenal ends," Hanno said.

"Agreed," I reluctantly said, then cast him a dark look. "And you need to get your house in order, quick, before we lost more trust. I doubt Procer will try to outright axe the Terms, but there's lesser measures it can take. They could restrict access to cities, assign escorts – Hells they could just begin funding Named on their good side and only them. This isn't a flip of the coin, White Knight, they have more than two options."

Poor choice of words there, I realized a heartbeat later with a wince, but he did not comment on it.

"Then the Mirror Knight can stand trial tomorrow," Hanno offered instead.

"Good," I nodded. "Once that's out of the way, we can sit down with the First Prince and find a way to settle the trouble over the Red Axe."

"I will not discuss sentencing, Black Queen," the dark-eyed man flatly said. "I have already told you this."

Gods save me from heroes, all prickly as cats and half as sensible.

"Then don't," I sharply said. "Talk about how we arrange this so she doesn't have to deal with a revolt in the Highest Assembly, something that we cannot afford. I'm not great admirer of her princes, White, but your girl cut a prince of the blood that was trying to protect her from harm. They're right to be on pins and needles about it: nobody wants a young Regicide walking around, only this one protected by treaty. I won't argue to throw her to the wolves, we have to clean our own houses, but we have to give them something."

The White Knight considered me for a long moment.

"I do not see what we can, Black," he finally said.

"Then pray, hero," I said, baring my teeth. "And I'll see what I can get done down in the mud."

Insanenoodlyguy

Gods, all this trouble and we'd yet to even begin the godsdamned vote council for the actual fucking webnovel we were supporting.

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

TeK

"I won't argue to vote on the webfiction, we have to spread the word about this novel, but we have to give EE something."

The White Knight considered me for a long moment.

"I do not see what we can, Black," he finally said.

"Then pray, hero," I said, baring my teeth. "And I'll see what I can get done down in the Patreon."

Ahad Mahmood

This was beautiful

Ninestrings

If we're talking patterns (And in this story we always are) we know that these trials should form counterpoints to each other.

So this trial going well, as expected, with a plaintiff who takes his lumps with relative grace and humour....

Obviously the Mirror Knights will also go totally fine with absolutely no clusterfucks at all.

dadycool

And to think, since he's second, he'll probably be the neutral/draw/tie of the three big ones.

Ninestrings

Oh interesting point.

I was assuming this was just going to be a contrast between Hanno and Cat's management styles but it very well could be a patter of three trials.

KageLupus

Not really how that pattern of three thing works. It has to be a part of direct conflict between Named, and specifically Named that have a narrative link with each other. Cat and Tariq danced around it in the last book, but there is nothing like that going on there with the trials.

Cat and Hanno are both on the same page. Named broke the rules of the Terms and need to stand trial for it. Cordelia is pushing for the Red Axe to be tried under Proceran law, but since she rejected her Name she doesn't count when it comes to patterns of three.

You could maybe say this is all a plot by the Bard, but I don't see the trials as counting in that fight either. If you look at direct conflict then the events in the Arsenal are more likely to be part of the pattern, where Cat and the Bard put their scheming skills against one another. I would even say that Cat won that round since the Bard got killed and the Terms are still standing so far. But that is part of the trap, since getting caught up in a pattern by someone like the Bard means you are dancing to their tune. More likely Cat sidesteps that pattern altogether same way she did with the Pilgrim.

Liliet

There are other threes than the rivalry pattern, and importantly the rule works on the meta level too. It's just a tidy way to arrange the story, like picking a protagonist who doesn't die halfway through and following a cause-effect chain for plot instead of a string of unconnected random events.

Salt

In this case, less of a rule of three and more of a rule of “the readers might be pretty exhausted on legal calamities after the climax”, which means that the least contentious trials likely come first to just avoid really disjointed flow in terms of storytelling.

It’s also very convenient to set up background/remind readers about old critical details relevant to the main trial by using the simple ones to show-not-tell how the proceedings are supposed to work.

Which means that these sort of buildup chapters are actually rather interesting, after realizing how much this story loves to throw innocuous-seeming foreshadowing out there so you can have a “why didn’t I see that coming” moment later on.

Liliet

Mhm!

Miles

Like sending Axe on a suicide mission as punishment under the terms, and she’s to leave immediately after her proceran trial, with the proceran punishment to be carried out upon her return.

Nah this will never work but if the proceran executioner-assassin kills her with fire then the punishment will have been done by Cat by default, so everyone can just shut the fridge up and be happy with the result.

flashburn283

So, who will the MK try to murder, Hanno, Cat, or Yannu? The Bard has to be going to set off the holy nuke, I can’t think of anything else that will fuck over the world as much besides reviving the Saint.

mamm0nn

Saint died by old age, and Heroes cannot be revived from that. Even if revival after several years were possible, Cat killed Saint specifically in a manner that Pilgrim couldn’t undo. So the same probably goes for Bard and all Revivers out there.

Miles

I still suspect he'll be back to his old self and plead being under the influence of Saint's personality bleeding through her aspect sword sword aspect.

Miles

Saint's aspect sword's sword aspect.

Also Saint forged herself into a sword that cuts all who don't share her hard line stance against Evil long before the story started. The fact that the piece of her that was turned into an actual sword continues to do so is fitting, but not necessarily a coincidence.

What I'm saying is that Saint's strength of will was so strong that her aspect is able to influence at least the weaker-willed individuals who wield the sword.

Salt

It's especially possible since "No truce with the Enemy" isn't even something unique to the Saint. Free Willy had that as one of his catchphrases back when he was playing the gritty Heroic rival to the Squire, all the way at the beginning of the story. It's a very popular sentiment for particularly angry or hardline character types.

These things tend to be much easier, narratively, if it's amplifying or pushing along an existing tendency, rather than being something new. Especially true if you're the kind of semi-sentient artifact sword that chooses its wielder and still actively holds a grudge against Catherine.

Mental Mouse

Even "his old self" isn't smart enough for that.

Mental Mouse

Hmm, While the trials are certainly interconnected, I'm not so sure the Pattern of Three fits in well here given we don't really have a single rivalry spanning the trials. Also, all three of them are likely to represent convictions, the question is just a degree of severity and negotiation over the jurisdictions.

'Ladi Williams

Looool. OBVIOUSLY.

Salt

The Mirror Knight's I think will be pretty interesting. It was mentioned via internal monologue that his power is "the reflection of Evil against Evil, the conception of the snake biting its own tail." way back during the kaleidoscope chapters in the Tenth Crusade. I've had a personal theory for a while that some of the Mirror Knight's personality issues are partly Name-powered in the "reflection of Evil upon Evil" sense, which would mean that the MK's cooperation in settling this peacefully will largely hinge on how well each representative in the trial holds themselves back from letting their personal flaws/agenda get in the way of a fair trial in the first place.

IE everything hinges on how much or how little Evil you show for him to "mirror" at all.

If that is the case, the trial will likely proceed fairly smoothly if each representative shows total impartiality and avoids attempting to use it to further their own ends. Otherwise, any attempt at subverting Justice for their own ends will likely be mirrored via equal and opposite hostility from the Mirror Knight, and it could become a shitstorm very quickly.

I'm most worried about Cordelia fucking it up by pushing too far, with Christophe deciding that the best response is "an eye for an eye".

Floppy

Also, Hanno has started to call Cat "Black", similar to how she refers to Amadeus.

Cicero

Nice, White and Black make such a great pair.

Together they provide both pragmatism and idealism working together instead of at odds.

impolitic

There's a wonderful joke about "seeing the world in Black and White" in there somewhere, but the exact language of it is eluding me.

Casey Glick

Well, as Tariq is still alive, there aren't any shades of Grey

ohJohN

this slew me; I am slain

Salt

What's black and white and red all over?

The trial of the Red Axe

Laguz24

I love the return of black and white's banter and conversations. Though seriously this red axe bit is not getting solved. Or why couldn't the sentence for the truce and terms be to be tried by proceran law? She still ends up dead or gone either way.

Salt

National sovereignty and jurisdiction of authority, mostly.

If she's sentenced to death under Proceran law, for the crime of attempting to kill a prince, that means that the Terms don't truly protect Named from political circumstance outside the Terms. It sets a precedent where future crimes under Proceran law could be grounds to overrule the terms and hang a Named, even if the representatives under the Terms object. It makes the Terms essentially toothless when signatories are involved, making them far less lucrative to sign up for, and for anyone who doesn't trust the Principiate (read: nearly everyone), it's like a hanging sword above your head.

If she's sentenced to death under the terms, it means Procer is giving up its right to hold people accountable for trying to murder its own royalty. Imagine someone killing a congress member in the US, and the US having to let him potentially walk without punishment just because some European council said so. Now just replace US Congress with "prince of Procer" and "European council" with "the Truce and Terms". The key isn't that the Red Axe is likely to get executed here so much as once again setting a precedent where it could happen – frequently – down the line.

Tl;dr:

a Proceran trial = Proceran laws override the Terms, thus the Terms are effectively worthless, and Named desert.

Terms trial = Procer allows the Terms to override their own legal system, and the whole country implodes on itself in rioting/potential civil war.

caoimhin

Yeah, that's the gist of it. Nice explanation, by the way.

My problem with Cordelia's demand is that she knew it would be like this and it is something she signed for. She is now trying to back off from it not because of the “creating a precedent of Procer’s laws losing strength” but rather because she wants to use the Red Axe’s trial in Procer as a political tool to secure her reign. She is in the wrong here and she knows it.

P.S: Another way to see it, though using a bit of a tortured metaphor, would be to say it’s a U.S woman, more exactly an agent of the Interpol (Truce & Terms are an international force, after all), who tried to kill a U.S Congressman while collaborating with a terrorist attack on a UN Headquarters, and she is not being tried by a European Council, but rather an International Court. The U.S President is now making demands to have the traitorous agent on trial in U.S Courts, but the international treaty already states how the trial must be carried out and the U.S is a signatory of it. The President simply wants to execute the criminal through U.S laws to earn popularity for the incoming elections.

TeK

Can’t they still try this agent in the US Court and then argue about how to apply the punishment they decided on?

Salt

It wouldn’t work if the point of the treaty is that agents would only be tried by the Terms of the treaty, not by potentially any set of laws of any nation that signed them. Trying them under US law at all all, instead of only the terms of the treaty, will show the world that the treaty is toothless the moment a powerful signatory gets annoyed.

As for why said signatory even signed the damned thing when they knew this is a potential problem? Probably some combination of desperation, arrogance, and oversight from too many nights without sleep Who knows.

TeK

But if in practice none of the charges made by US court would be carried out, would it not be a legal fiction that appeases both sides? Or is the point is inability to trial at all, not just to carry out the charge? I thought that T&T acted as a temporary diplomatic immunity, not as some kind of legal invincibility. So the trial can be held, and charges passed, just they won’t be active until/unless the person loses their immunity, either due to leaving the Terms or through not being qualified to participate under them.

Salt

Not sure if that would make sense, since the Terms are meant to be temporary, while the legal immunity for actions carried out during the duration of the terms is not temporary.

It wouldn't be very appealing of a call to arms if it was "the Terms will protect you until the dead king is slain, after which you will be swiftly executed for previous crimes that weren't crimes up until the point the Terms expired".

You might make an argument for the "held" charges under Proceran law being considered null and void if the Named doesn't run afoul of the terms until they come to a natural end by the end of the war on Keter, but the optics of that would still have Proceran Law being superseded by the Terms. If they keep to the Terms until the Dead King is beaten, they're still essentially untouchable by Proceran Law in any way that matters, putting us back at square one and not actually resolving the problem.

TeK

Well I assume that the protections will carry over into the Accords, and become another reason for Named to follow those from the Terms.

I agree with the rest though.

Liliet

They cannot, because they are ridiculous in scope and untenable long term. Making Named exempt from earthly laws is the opposite of the point of the Accords, that the Terms do that is a gesture of desperation more than anything.

The amnesty is going to carry over. That's tense enough already.

caoimhinh

That would work if it were the Truce&Terms as initially described to us: a cease of hostilities between Named, stopping of criminal activities, and amnesty for previous crimes in exchange for service in the war against Keter, with Catherine and Hanno as supervisors responsible of keeping their respective sides in line and reining them in to obey the agreement.

But more recent chapters expanded on the T&T and showed it as having its own court of law where Catherine and Hanno are judge, jury, and executioner for Villains and Heroes that breach the agreement.

As initially shown, Cat's responsibility would be to watch over the Villains to make sure they didn't step out of line, but would handle them to the legal authorities of a nation if they were to break its laws after they joined the T&T. But as it currently stands, Catherine is the only one who can cast judgment and carry a sentence over a Villain, and the Grand Alliance knew that and signed for it.

So Cordelia can't come now to judge the Red Axe through different means that what was established in the agreement, doing so would weaken the T&T and show all Named that Procer can break the treaty, which would cast doubts over if the T&T can really protect them from their previous crimes. That would make lots of Villains walk away, and it's why Catherine can't back down on this.

caoimhinh

No, because there is political bullshit on the way.

If they were acting like mature and practical people, the Red Axe would be killed and that would be the end of it. But they aren't just people operating in a vacuum, they are institutions and representatives of nations, so there are bureaucracy and legislation to consider, settling of precedents, and a dozen other things that ripple out of this.

There is ambition and greed at play too, with political repercussions depending on how it is handled.

Continuing with the metaphor, the legislation and treaty that applies is quite clear. Obeying the signed agreement of where the trial must be held enforces the treaty and gives legitimacy to the institution.

The T&T are in the right, because Cordelia already signed for this, she is trying to back off now and it is too late to be trying to pull that off.

It is only her selfish reasons that are causing trouble here. This is not for Procer, this is for Cordelia. She can't come to pretend now that Named had been accountable to nations before. Named have always been dealt with by Named.

Anyways, she needs to just swallow her objections as they are nothing more than her wish to get out of responsibility to use this for political gains. But you don't get to simply back off of a treaty once the time to enforce it arrives. She is just pushing now because she wants to use the trial to strengthen her own reign (like every single other thing she gets her hands on). The trouble is that she is growing desperate, or rather, has been increasingly going that path for quite a few years actually (if you check her POV Interludes, it shows).

TeK

I don't think it's just Cordelia being selfish, she isn't, period. If she and Cat think Assembly might revolt and back out of the treaty, that is not some paranoid delusion.

In the international court, the US would have a say in the fate of the Interpol agent, but under the T&T they have no legal power to do anything. That is a perception that they need to avoid like plague.

I think...

caoimhinh

I wonder why Cordelia sees that guy as such a huge threat, she seems quite paranoid. She wants to kill the Red Axe through Proceran Law to show him that the Mirror Knight can also be killed through Proceran Law. But that seems like an unnecessary worry, since other Named would rein MK in and stop him if he were to start acting out in a irregular manner like supporting a revolt.

Plus, how is that Prince supposed to overthrow Cordelia? Did he somehow gather the support that Amadis and Malanza couldn't get? That seems unlikely.

And if he did, he doesn't need the Mirror Knight to get the votes to overthrow Cordelia, right? And also executing the Red Axe wouldn't stop him from getting the votes in his favor.

Asserting Proceran power lets Cordelia earn political points in the Assembly, but that's hardly what sways them.

TeK

You are getting really hung up on the idea that there is only one prince opposing Cordelia in the Assembly. And how is Mirror Knight is involved? The issue seems pretty self-contained to me.

caoimhinh

I'm not hung up on being only one guy opposing Cordelia. I just pointed out my surprise on him doing what Amadis and Malanza, couldn't manage (that in itself implies the power block that opposed Cordelia). And I mentioned the necessary support being gathered.

I know it is not just one guy. What I'm saying is that for Cordelia to be worried about him, that means the guy has assembled huge influence behind him. It's strange that he managed what other big players couldn't (well, Amadis already gave up his crown, so he can be counted out, but still the point stands).

The Mirror Knight involved was mentioned and implied by Cordelia and Frederic when they were talking to Catherine chapters ago, when trying to convince her to let the Red Axe be tried through Procer's Court.

Javvies

Malanza heads what is basically the wartime loyal opposition party.

That is, people who realize that while they have policy differences with Cordelia, the middle of an existential war with the Dead King is not the time to have a struggle over power, and that the deals Cordelia makes in Procer's name in order to survive and win the war need to be honored and kept afterwards, even if/when Cordelia loses power.

The group of assholes that Mirror Knight is in bed with do not believe in keeping the deals that Cordelia makes.

In addition, they have a joker in the deck in the form of one of the most prominent Proceran Heroes – Mirror Knight – being onboard with their plans and agenda. Malanza and her faction do not.

Plus, I got the impression that one part of their plan, or a relevant contingency, might be to secretly attack the drow and drag the rest of Procer in behind them and their goals when they call the drow retaliation “an unprovoked attack that must be responded to”.

Also, they're pulling that out that classic and ever popular Proceran tradition – expansionism at the expense of their neighbors.

Liliet

> This is not for Procer, this is for Cordelia.

Mmm, no. Cordelia's at the point where her interests = interests of the state, because all others she discards the moment they contradict those.

Yes, she's fighting to stay in power, because her staying in power is the necessary condition of Procer's survival. Her faction, anyway – I'm sure she'd abdicate to Rozala if necessary, which, it's no coincidence Rozala isn't pushing for that despite personal grievances: any kind of power shift would destabilise the system, and now is super not the time for that.

The people who ARE pushing Cordelia right now are the arrogant idiots who don't understand that, and also that they shouldn't plot against the goddamn Black Queen in the middle of the war she's fighting for them, on their territory. That drow episode wasn't just worldbuilding fluff.

This is an actual problem for the Grand Alliance as a whole, and it's only personally Cordelia's in that she's expected to deal with it without inconveniencing the rest of them.

Salt

Pretty much this. We have to remember that if Cordelia gets overthrown by anyone stupid enough to do so in the middle of a war on Keter, the replacement we're getting won't be Cordelia 2: electric boogaloo. It'll be the live action remake of Amadis Milenan that no one wanted but the highest assembly decided to produce anyways.

Frivolous

Yep, agree. Cordellia's strongest wish is Duty, specifically to Procer, although her understanding of the big picture and of nuances may be limited because she has no Name lore and little story-fu.

I think that if Cordelia loses her position as First Prince, her successor will act in such a way as to cause Callow and the Firstborn, as well as many heroes and most villains, to stop supporting Procer. In which case the DK wins and Procer dies.

The angel corpse might be a last resort weapon in that case. It may also be a bludgeon to threaten and frighten the Highest Assembly with, as in "If you screw up by usurping me, I'll give the order to destroy the Dead King myself. Oh, and Salia and most of your principalities will go up in a mushroom cloud, too, but you've doomed them anyway."

Liliet

For the record: that's still not an option available to deliberately choose! The overcharge that would blast everything and also DK is what Bard could possibly have done had the plan gone off as originally intended with the Seraphim around. Now she cannot do that, and it's unclear what the weapon even CAN do.

Salt

To be fair, it could still be a pretty effective stick to threaten people with, even if the exact effects are unknown. The properties of the effects were tied to the Seraphim, but the actual capacity of an angel corpse is likely inherent to the corpse itself. It's still a huge bundle of power – potentially on the order of a continent-killing bomb – regardless of whether the tie to the Seraphim exists.

If someone threatens to drop a lake on you, that's an effective threat. If what's inside the lake becomes a mystery, it's still a giant threat, on account of still having the capacity of a lake. It could be a lake of feathers or a lake of cupcakes, sure, but it could just as easily be a lake of anvils, a lake of acid, or a lake of goblinfire. Regardless, someone threatening to drop it on you still raises hairs on the back of your neck because a lake is a lake, and it makes you reconsider provoking them.

Liliet

Yeah, it just bugs me that everyone is taking Masego's calculations as "this is what Cordelia intends to set off".

Miles

Considering US politics is 90% just lies held up by the fact that the people about to vote aren't interested in the truth so much as validation of prior beliefs (seeded by more lies) the best move for Procer is to just tell everyone at home that the trial under international treaty is the US exerting power to bring a criminal to justice, and not worry about what actually happens.

Salt

The trial of the Red Axe is FAKE NEWS

The great nation of Procer has brought THE BEST justice to the terrorist axe

We are going to KEEP WINNING, by building a wall and making Keter pay for it

nimelennar

What they should have done is included a provision for extradition in the Terms. Red Axe would then get two trials: one, under the Terms, to determine whether she should be extradited to Procer for attempted regicide, and another, by Procer, for the regicide itself. Thus, neither the Terms nor Procer gets destabilized.

Sugar Roll

I don't think named would agree to that. Only named deals with named. Simple as that.

Liliet

Yeah, there should be a "her sentence under the Terms is to lose the protection of the Terms, because that is the exact manner in which she fucked up".

It does unpleasantly soften the protection the Terms provide, but Red Axe didn't just fuck up real bad, she also signed on in bad faith in the first place. Not the worst of precedents to set

Abrakadabra

Which is the heart of the matter. The arrogance of procer/ USA, that their laws are more important, Than that of other nations or even whole alliances of nations which they themselves are part of. In the case of Procer, they already agreed to the truce and terms, and NOW after the fact they want to renege on their Words. Because they are fucking procer and they presume too much.

Mental Mouse

I don't think it's too unreasonable for the T&T sentence to include "since she has violated our terms, we rule that she has forfeited our protection and should additionally be tried by Procer". The question is whether Cat & Hanno can get away with it wrt their respective crowds.

Liliet

Mhm.

Not just “violated the Terms” but “deliberately acted to sabotage them”.

You don’t like these? Well have it your way then!

sivarajan

This analogy makes me worry that the Angel-corpse/nuke will be deployed.

Rey d`Tutto

Chekhov ‘s Angel of Judgement Corpse?

Cory

If they try her under Proceran Law, it sets a clear precedent that the Truce and Terms (and, likely, the Accords to follow) are subordinate to Procer. This creates a big issue, because the Truce and Terms and Accords are meant to govern the behavior of Named across the whole of Calernia. They can’t be subordinate to the laws of any individual country, or they have no purpose.

Frivolous

I love it when Catherine and Hanno call each other White and Black in private conversation. I wonder if they will ever do so in public, too, and what the reaction from their audience would be.

I may have made a mistake in the comments section of Trepidation when I speculated that Cordelia threatened to use the angel corpse to bully the Named into behaving.

I suspect now that the reason for the angel corpse is banal Proceran politics. The Highest Assembly may be agitating to replace her with someone who wants to do away with the current agreements.

The angel corpse is a weapon she can show Highest Assembly to make them believe that she is strong, and thus keep them cooperating with Cordelia and the Truce and Terms. That is the only reason I can currently think of that would explain why both Cordelia and Frederic seem desperate while Catherine and Hanno are unaware of the reason.

I don’t think the leader of the contrary princes is Rozala. Rozala is too aware of the current perils to try to unseat Cordelia at this time. It might be Gaspard.

dadycoool

I think Rozala has shifty eyes at Cordelia, but respects her and probably Cat enough to keep her head down and her eye on the bigger picture.

caoimhinh

The current problematic Proceran Prince is the guy whose daughter slept with Mirror Knight.

Sun Dog

Like there's ever just one problem child in the highest assembly.

caoimhinh

True.

I don't mean it's just that one guy alone. But they do need to gather under one banner to overthrow Cordelia.

After all, removal of the First Prince is not simply "you are no longer the First Prince" but rather "you are getting replaced by this person here". Procer must have a ruler.

Sugar Roll

From Cordelia's perspective, the angel corpse serves to ensure Procer's survival. It's not for show. It's misguided from Cath's point of view but Procer is about to collapse and they're grasping for anything that might help them make it through this calamity. Take the weapon away and they just might break. She might be persuaded though after the results of quartered seasons are presented to her.

Liliet

Rozala straight up reported to Cordelia last time she got approached with traitorous talks. That corner seems... fine.

It's not her 😡

Salt

Rozala has no love of Cordelia considering they have some serious personal enmities, but she's at the top of the list for "princes who are LEAST likely to stage a coup during the war on Keter".

The girl basically showed serious PTSD about the war on Keter during the princes graveyard, and was the only one of the seven who willingly threw in her crown without bothering to haggle. She actually considered the permanent loss of her own right to rule a bargain, if it meant getting Named on the caliber of Catherine on her side. "cheap at twice the price." was her exact wording on the subject

No, it's definitely not Rozala that Cordelia needs to be concerned about. Rozala would likely have a physically violent fit of rage at the prospect of some idiot starting a war of succession in the Principiate's hour of desperation.

Liliet

Y u p

Love her

Mental Mouse

> both Cordelia and Frederic seem desperate while Catherine and Hanno are unaware of the reason.

Oh, they know Procer's reasons for desperation, they just recognize the larger-scale reasons why it's still a Bad Idea.

devildragon777

Hrm. The Judgement corpse bit really does have to be handled carefully, it's Bard's unseen affray after all. I wonder if they should be reaching out to Auger, she's not exactly a friend of WB and is someone who'd understand and might be willing to share with White and Cat why Cordelia's keeping an unusually tight grip over it.

Finangling the Red Axe's trial to preserve the T&T, Cordelia's grip on the Highest Assembly/Procer, and deal with the pressing issue of Judgement Nuke is...unlikely to be pretty.

Mental Mouse

Unfortunately, Auger doesn't have a place at the trials, which is probably a good deal of why Bard chose the Arsenal as the venue for this fight..

dadycool

I like seeing how the Tribunals work. "Here's the charge. Any debates? Let's haggle. Here's the punishment. Any debates? Let's haggle." With Cat or Hanno being both the prosecutor and defense for the one being charged. It could very well be done in private, maybe with a dagger in the dead of night, but it's public to give it transparency and legitimacy.

Interesting continuation of their discussion way back in the beginning of the book, with her "Then pray, hero. And I'll see what my I can get done down in the mud."

thearpox23

It's the beauty of leaning on a trusted authority figure to pass the sentences instead of the bureaucratic legalistic structures we use in the modern world. And it only works because the T&T are obviously temporary, and the cases where the trial is held rare.

I've enjoyed the tribunals in action as well. It's unique enough that I can't immediately point to any parallels I've encountered before.

Konstantin von Karstein

Hanno is being difficult here. He could just sentence her to death, and it would be resolved easily.

Liliet

Nope. He's already told the heroes he probably will, and pretty much everyone already assumes that. It solves nothing, the problem is jurisdiction.

Casey Glick

I wonder if there is an option that the punishment of the trial could be stripping the Red Axe of her protection under the T&T to stand civilian trial. It establishes a precedent of Named voluntarily submitting to national-authorities, especially since many of the general crimes for the future will be against civilians more than Named.

caoimhinh

Supposedly they can't do that because the punishment for treason must be death. So they can't leave the precedent of a traitor being given a light punishment, even if it's ultimately to handle her to another court that's guaranteed to execute her.

There's political bullshit at play that they need to be careful of, since future schemers can exploit such precedents.

WuseMajor

See, I think it could work. By her own admission, she entered the Terms under bad faith for understandable reasons. Allowing a measure of sympathy for her plight, it really feels like the "fitting" punishment should be that she be stripped of the rights and protections of the Terms...and the understanding that, without said protection, Procer will exercise its own legal rights to try her for her other crimes should temper anyone who thinks she should simply be executed.

The problem is going to be with anyone who wanted mercy for her. Since, well, by the same token, if you're going to hand her over to a government that's going to execute her, it's hard to say that not executing her now is merciful.

So...hmmm.... Possibly you could require that Procer give her a formal trial and allow the White Knight to be her advocate? The potential of a lesser sentence being found might be seen as merciful, even if she ends up being executed.

caoimhinh

But she can't play the "I was always an enemy agent so it's no treason" card here. If you join an institution and break the rules of it then you get the punishment of the institution, and if the deserved punishment is death, then just throwing her out leaves a precedent of someone walking away from the treason trial easy, even if it's done under the supposition that she will be killed in another trial.

The precedent within the institution is what matters.

The purpose of the Truce and Terms is to serve as foundation for the Liesse Accords, so they can't be weakened by bending over to Procer after Procer already signed them.

Casey Glick

The key is that she wouldn't be walking away freely. She would be explicitly handed over to civilian authorities who have asked to try her. Now, she might get let off there, but she would also forever be stripped of her protections under the T&T, assuming no Story was undertaken to make amends.

Remember that one of the major goals of the Liesse Accords is to allow groups of Named to work together to punish those who violate the rules. Merely being stripped of your rights under the Accords could be as good as death for most Named, and would deprive them of being able to rejoin civilized society. Being stripped of rights and then tried as an ordinary murderer would be even worse, but is arguably a precedent that Cat wants.

Salt

All in all not a bad solution at all, but it would need a LOT of work involved to avoid setting potentially troublesome precedents down the road. The legalities here would get messy the way legalities are always want to do. We can't treat the world of the Terms the same way as the world of the Accords, since the problem is the Terms granting legal amnesty from civilian consequences in a far-reaching way that the Accords simply do not.

The problem that comes up, is that laws of the Terms and the laws of the Signatories – as well as the sentencing under each – are likely going to be very different. Meaning that the accused might be on trial for entirely different crimes of entirely different severity, and there may be cases where said crimes and punishments associated with the crimes aren't even commensurable in the first place.

At which point the obvious issue is potentially allowing for serious crimes to essentially be absolved in practice, or vice versa, by way of stripping protection of the Terms and allowing a civilian trial. It would also lend to possible corruption down the line, if a crown was to meddle with the civilian trial – directly or indirectly enough to avoid accusation – after the trial under the Terms was waived in favor of a civilian trial.

You would necessarily need to establish some sort of equivalence in terms of crimes under the Terms vs crimes under a civilian court, then base this potential compromise around a requirement for said equivalence being in play. You'd need to do this to stop potential issues before they arise at all, instead of trying to find reactionary solutions as Cat & co are trying to do now. It would be a very messy, very contentious, and time-consuming effort, if even possible.

For an example, what happens if a Named violates the Terms by killing a Villain simply for being overly vile, which is a severe violation of the Terms but a debatable violation of civilian law, depending on the signatory involved? What happens if they reanimate their dying body to stave off death, which is blasphemously illegal in certain countries, but not under the Terms?

You'd need to make sure that this solution you suggest does not leave openings for signatories using it as common-law precedent to petition for trying said Named under their own legal system, for far different conditions than a trial under the Terms. The only way I see this being possible is if you manage to establish equivalencies of severity between each legal system and the Terms themselves, and only allow this backdoor to be considered if said equivalence is satisfied ... which starts looking like a fairly convoluted legal system, not all that far off from the Principiate's own labyrinthine set of laws. But I suspect that it's how their legal system became so messy in the first place, and it's hardly even a complex situation compared to real life courts.

robertctaylorfamfrit

Yeah pretty much this law and politics are incredibly complicated and messy things as its not just important what happens but how it happens, the appearance of both and what it may lead to due to public reaction, precedents etc. As an example in when i studied the American civil rights movement the first successful change from protesting was incredibly important because although it was pretty minor itself it set the precedent and became a source to build momentum from.

Mental Mouse

> the first successful change from protesting was incredibly important because although it was pretty minor itself it set the precedent and became a source to build momentum from.

And it's worth noting that the beginning was very much jug-and-sword diplomacy – MLK and friends offering a peaceful option, with Malcom X &co. pointing out that things didn't have to be peaceful.

WuseMajor

Hmmm... That actually could work as a solution... but the White Knight wants to actually have a fair trial, which means getting all the evidence out and all the speeches and everything, before sentencing is discussed. So, even if he's considering that sentence as an option, he's not going to allow the politics of the situation to sway what he considers the fair sentence to be and he's certainly not going to SELL the sentence beforehand, even if it might get a nuke out of the hands of an increasingly unstable government.

Possibly they could arrange things to have Cordy formally suggest that sentence (but that could be seen as bending to governmental pressure, so not doing it might be better).

Regardless, the White Knight tries very hard to be a decent person as well as a realist and he's pretty good at reading the room. I think he can thread the needle here, but he'll only actually do it if he thinks it's really the right thing to do. We can hope that Cordy will allow him the shot to do it and that he sticks the landing when he does.

Abrakadabra

I still Say the Red Axe will be sentenced to exile for life, to live among the drow in the kingdom of the dead. Under pain of death or something if she ever returns. Especially if she really turns out to be Constance.

sivarajan

Huh, I completely forgot about Cat's "won't kill Constance" promise. Her breaking it would be just typical Villainous Perfidy though, without any weight.

Juff

Typo Thread:

amount of high officer > amount of high officers
if nation > if a nation
a complain considering > a complaint considering excess off ceremony > excess of ceremony
I grimly though > I grimly thought Sure any idiot > Sure, any idiot in away > in any way were slightest bit > were the slightest bit and hero > and a hero
one of we troublesome > one of us troublesome plot that condemn > plot than condemn muddle the waters > muddy the waters Vivs > Viv to old to > too old to Proceran unspoken law > Proceran unspoken laws would have not > would not have had been taking on > had been taken on I'd heard in > I'd heard it in finish those trial > finish those trials we lost more trust > we lose more trust not great admirer > no great admirer (or not a)

Also, what a way to slip it in at the end

Burlyraven

If they put off Red Axe's trial much longer, they risk giving her the kind of story that starts in a jail cell, and any one of us that's played an Elder Scrolls game knows how crazy those can get. It's unlikely to happen, but she's already the right breed of vengeance hero that it's still a possibility.

Ninestrings

My favourite part of that story is when the hero stands in the cell without moving and shapeshifts between variations of race/species/gender/sex for two hours before going back to the default.

Anomandris

I imagine Hadvar suffers a lot from PTSD....

Raved Thrad

Makes you wonder what sort of indoctrination Nords go through while training to be part of the Imperial Army. It must take a LOT of willpower to resist going, "So, I think it's incredible that you're still on the side of the Empire even after we decided to cut off your head for no good reason." Especially for a Nord.

TeK

Imperial reason is always a good reason! Or do you disagree?

nick012000

The Stormcloaks were Thalmor puppets. If they won, they'd divide the Empire, and allow the Thalmor to conquer the continent and proceed with their plan to genocide humanity so thoroughly that they'd be erased from the Mythic. Regardless of the actions taken by individual Imperials, siding with the Imperials is the only sensible or moral course of action for the Dragonborn to take.

Raved Thrad

Lol on my last (partial) playthrough I played a Nord, and was all "Skyrim for the Nords!" I especially loved running into goose-stepping Thalmor patrols, which I would proceed to ambush.

I have yet to finish a full playthrough of Skyrim, though. So! Many! Side quests!

lauatagan

Only with perfect information, its not public knowledge.

Daniel E

Oh man, I'm having flashbacks of my addiction to modded Oblivion. Literally hundreds of hours.

Anomandris

Would Cordelia be backed into such a corner if she had taken the Name? I mean, yes, that would have potentially furthered the Bard's plans and had far graver consequences, but just from Proceran politics perspective, what would have been the result of all the shenanigans going on so far?

hakureireimu

She would have a lot stronger control over Procer at the very least. And then she would get 3 superpowers to help her out.

Salt

She and Catherine (with Callow following in tow) would have a far more hostile and distrustful relationship, considering the Accords are currently pushing for Named not holding positions of rule. It would mean that Catherine is a direct and hostile threat to her and her rule, the moment the threat of the Dead King wanes.

Levant would be outright hostile, in practice if not in name, at a Proceran Warden of the West making that country ever more powerful. Do remember that Procer is basically to Levant as Praes is to Callow – a pack of greedy invaders eyeing their people like cattle.

There would have been a fairly large mess over whether she would be the Heroic representative or the White Knight would – not even sure how Principiate law would take to their First Prince being put under a neutral authority, especially since the agreement that causes the situation is partially a Villainous one.

The Red Axe problem would be exactly the same, as it's a legal issue rather than a story fight

She may be more understanding of why a doomsaday bomb is so bad, if she had direct experience as Named.

Overall it would likely be a hell of a lot worse, politically, had she taken the Name.

matesbe

The issue of Names rulers has pretty much been dropped by Cat because Levantine point blank refuses to accept that condition.

Salt

Ah, I must have missed that part when I read it

TeK

I don't think it was written, I think what he meant is that conversation with Black, where he pointed out how unfeasible the concept was and advised to keep it in for additional concessions.

matesbe

No it was explicitly stated in this book. Admittedly I don't quite remember where exactly, but it's definitely not just Black from Book 5.

Liliet

Yeah, somewhere pre-Arsenal

Konstantin von Karstein

Named being rulers is the foundation of Levantine nobility, so the issue with Named rulers was dropped.

Javvies

The trial for Haunted Magician went more or less as planned. Of course, he decided to cooperate with the process. Plus, he did far less direct harm, and only got involved out of ignorance of the true nature of the threat that Bard is, and Cat gave a sentence that provided significant benefits to the rest of the Grand Alliance.

Mirror Knight is likely to be far less cooperative. In addition, Cordelia might well have an interest in adding to the charges against him, specifically his intimate involvement with those Proceran nobles plotting treason and betrayal. Plus, even if Cordelia doesn't escalate the charges, she, Yannu, Viv, and Cat all have some level of interest in making Mirror Knight an example. And Cat needs something that she can show to Sve Noc.

But the trial for Red Axe? On the one hand, Hanno said in the Hero meeting that he was planning to execute her for her crimes. I don't think there will be objections to that from the Grand Alliance.

Depending on how Hanno plays it, that might be enough to mollify most of the relevant concerns.

Also the fact that Red Axe lied about agreeing to the Truce and Terms might be a loophole used to exempt her from their protection ... but I don't know if Hanno knows that she confessed to lying about agreeing to them, always intending to violate them as her part of Bard's plan.

Honestly, though, I kind of think EE is head faking us that the problems will come with Red Axe's trial when they're really going to start with Mirror Knight's.

TeK

No Cordelia would not add charges of treason, lol. It is a question of appearances. Mirror Knight can be construed like HM, a poor, misunderstood victim of big bad Bard. The issue here is that the Truce needs to prove that it can enforce a fair sentence on all it's participants. And while MK has many grievances, few of them are severe, and the most severe one is Hanno's fingers. The rest is not really serious, and both his accomplishments and a lack of malicious intent will prove the sentence to be mild.

Of course, everyone knows that MK's trial is also a tryout of Red Axe's one, so they would have to avoid a lax sentence, less they convince others that Heroes can get away with stuff under Terms. But I personally think that yeah, MK's trial would be a pivot for his personal development, and I hope it will go the right way.

Salt

Cordelia might actually try for a charge of treason tbh, if only to let her make some other gain elsewhere. She's definitely not above playing dirty.

I suspect Hanno wouldn't let it slide though. Justice boy is all about consistency and being unbiased. Letting the Hunted Magician off light as an "incompetent idiot" even though he willingly made a deal with the Bard, while screwing the Mirror Knight over by labeling him a "willing traitor" when he actually is just an incompetent idiot? That's about as inconsistent and biased as you could get. It would be comically out of character for Hanno to just sit there and allow for Justice to be twisted for political convenience, instead of putting his foot down on the first squeak of it.

robertctaylorfamfrit

Let's be real here how smoothly and well MK's trial goes is directly dependent how how well he can keep his mouth shut which he's not been good at so far as he tends to shoot himself in the foot during conversations

Frivolous

I wonder if Catherine or Hanno will ever mention that MK has been obstreperous towards Catherine and stated his intention to kill her.

Cat might not bother to mention it because she can be a bit butch; she might think tattling a verbal threat is beneath her. Hanno might not mention it because he might think speaking of MK's words is unjust.

On the other hand, Cordelia and Yannu would probably be very alarmed to learn that MK wants to kill the Black Queen. They might insist on Hanno executing MK for that alone.

Javvies

Yeah ... Mirror Knight's statements and actions in the Hero meeting are something that Cordelia and Yannu cannot allow to be ignored or swept under the carpet. Especially the part where Mirror Knight effectively said he wouldn't need to kill any other leaders if they agreed with him. Which is very easily reinterpreted as Mirror Knight implying that he was willing to kill any of the Grand Alliance leadership who didn't agree with him. Yannu is a Levantine and has plenty of preexisting reasons to dislike and mistrust Mirror Knight ... and Cordelia knows that Mirror Knight is intimately involved with some of her nobles who are plotting betrayal and treason.

It's not clear that Cat knows about those threats, but it's likely that Cordelia does (most likely via Kingfisher Prince, though one or more of the other Heroes could have informed her as well), and a distinct possibility that Yannu has been informed by one or more of the Levantine Heroes who were present.

And while Cat probably doesn't know all the details (yet) she definitely knows that something serious happened.

Frivolous

I had actually forgotten about the Kingfisher Prince. You're right, Javvies: KP is probably more loyal to Cordelia than he is to Hanno or any notion of the Union of Heroes. Which means Cordelia does know of every act and every word that happened in the Hero Meeting.

I'm less certain about Yannu knowing. Levantines are so honor-crazy that I have no idea whether the Vagrant Spear would tell Yannu about events.

On the other hand, Cordelia and Yannu can rest assured that Christophe won't target them first. He'll try to kill Catherine first, so until that happens, they're reasonably safe, hahaha.

Oh, they'll still be pretty mad that MK would try to kill the woman who is Queen of Callow and the First Under the Night, but at least they won't have to worry about being - murdered- until she has.

Javvies

As nothing was mentioned about secrecy, I don't think that Vagrant Spear or any other Levantine would necessarily feel that they were required to keep quiet about it, at least to Yannu.

Especially since it is likely that one or more of them was requested to be involved in bringing Yannu up to speed on recent events inside the Arsenal.

And I rather suspect that Yannu had questions about just what the fuck happened.

It is, after all, not a secret that something serious went down at the Hero meeting, and White Knight had to beat down Mirror Knight in the hallways after losing several fingers.

For that matter, it's just as likely, if not more so, that the Levantine Heroes have, or will feel, an obligation to inform/warn Yannu that Mirror Knight verbally de facto threatened to kill him and the Seljun if they didn't agree with Mirror Knight ... and more broadly the stability/existence of the Grand Alliance itself. Most of them realize that the current situation would be a helluva lot worse if Cat wasn't running the Villains in support of the Grand Alliance – better to share a room with a Villain than a Revenant, after all. Plus ... they mostly don't like Mirror Knight, and it's probably gotten around that he has a habit of defending and promoting past Proceran atrocities committed against the Dominion (and others), which isn't going to count in his favor when it comes to Yannu's opinion.

Salt

It's likely going to end up as most of the jury members arguing against Hanno, for more severity vs more moderation, respectively.

However, I think Yannu is actually the only one who is a coinflip on whether he's hostile to the Mirror Knight or not.

Cordelia has an ulterior motive for pushing for a harsher sentence, Catherine has an ulterior motive for appeasing Cordelia instead of pushing her into a corner (plus she hates the MK's guts), and Vivienne is more of less in Catherine's pocket.

Yannu depends on how informed he is about the Mirror Knight's association with the Langevins. The Principiate has historically been to Levant as Praes has been to Callow, meaning that encouraging destabilization of the Principiate is completely within the Levantines interests. If he's well informed enough and savvy enough, he would know that it's going to be a win for Levant no matter what – either a Proceran Hero gets some rather harsh restrictions and sullies their international reputation, or a Proceran Hero gets off easy and causes internal unrest in Procer to weaken them.

Meaning the game he's likely to play is how to squeeze the best long term benefit for Levant, which might be to initially push for a harsh sentence to get on the good side of Catherine, Vivienne, and Cordelia, after which he lets himself be "convinced" by the White Knight to settle on a compromise to also make inroads with Hanno, especially if said compromises happen to have some beneficial wording for Levant. This lets him paint himself as impartial and fair in the public eye, keeps him on the relative good side of everyone, and maximizes the benefit of the trial for Levant as a nation.

Javvies

No, I'm pretty sure Yannu is also firmly in the "fuck Mirror Knight" camp.

As for Yannu potentially seeing value in destabilizing Procer ... at almost any other time, under almost any other First Prince, I'd probably agree – I certainly expect that there was little to no concern or tears over Procer's long civil war in the Dominion.

However ... this is very much not the time and not the First Prince to be destabilizing Procer.

The timing issue is obvious – a destabilized Procer is going to be very bad development for the war effort against the Dead King.

As for not destabilizing Cordelia as First Prince, that's maybe a little less obvious, but still clear enough to someone like Yannu – Cordelia is Lycaonese, and has no interest in the traditional Proceran expansionism, which is good for the Dominion, and perhaps more importantly, Cordelia is going to keep her word on the deals she makes with the rest of the Grand Alliance and the drow, and isn't going to try to screw them over unless she thinks she has no other option; she's also not going to throw Procer's armies at the Dominion after the war, while the Dominion has exhausted itself. Pretty much any other First Prince is going to be a far less reliable partner ... especially if they're dumb enough and aggressive enough to be trying to take out Cordelia in the middle of fighting the Dead King, and are already explicitly planning on betraying at least one of their allies in that fight. That's not a faction Yannu wants to have power in Procer.

Salt

No, Yannu is in the “preserve the interests of Levant” camp, and his most likely course of action will stem almost entirely from that basis. I don’t think he personally cares half as much about the mirror knight as an individual as you seem to be implying. His station necessarily requires him to look into the future and mitigate the threat of the Principiate ahead of time – it’s too late once the threat has actually come.

There’s pretty much zero reason for Yannu to think that Procer under Cordelia would be any less expansionist than they have been for the last several centuries after the war on Keter. It wasn’t even a decade ago that Cordelia launched the Tenth Crusade for no other reason than political convenience, and one of the moves she made to prepare for it was bullying Levant into submission by a military show of force, so they wouldn’t be a threat at Procer’s back. It’d be rather illogical for him to assume she wouldn’t stab the dominion in the back at the first safe opportunity to expand her borders, after she quite literally stabbed the dominion in the back five or so years ago to wage an expansionist war on Callow.

I mean for heck’s sake, the guy comes from a country who was annexed by the Principiate longer than Callow was annexed by the Empire. Their five revered noble lines are Named who went borderline Villain in terms of viciousness, rebelling against Procer. He’s never going to trust a Proceran nationalist like Cordelia farther than his children could throw her.

To a Dominion ruler like Yannu, a ridiculously competent First Prince like Cordelia is an absolute nightmare. The best case scenario for Levant is having Cordelia outright overthrown by an incompetent, the moment the war on Keter is over.

Sowing seeds of discord in the long term for the Principiate? Yes please. His perfect-world scenario is a balancing act, where the Langevins remain just strong enough to launch a rebellion once the threat of the Dead King is bottled up – it’ll either cripple Cordelia for years, or outright get rid of her as a threat.

As far as the immediate war on Keter goes – if he truly is worried about the war on Keter, that’s all the more reason for him to not push the sentencing too far. The Mirror Knight is still one of the most powerful Heroes currently alive, which they're in dire need of to begin with, and if Yannu is willing to accept literal murders, rapists, and a Hunted Magician who (out of "incompetence") made a willing deal with the Bard, then there's no reason for him to cripple a Hero who's having problems following orders.

In a purely war-on-Keter scenario, the best case is an appropriately severe punishment that puts the Mirror Knight back in line, rather than outright estranging him from the GA altogether with some ridiculously heavy sentence, for the sake of petty vengeance for the annoyance.

ltormblessed

I love how even though Hanno is shortening "Black Queen" when he talks to Cat, it is always delightful to see Catherine referred to as "Black". Does Catherine see the symbolism there? Taking Black's name but making it her own version – not the same thing but something new. Something inspired and raised by to be sure, but ultimately her own.

Tek

Ok, so I am a tad confused about legalities here. So the issue is that the victim is a Proceran prince, but the judgement isn't done under the Proceran law. And the reasoning for the Proceran law taking precedence is because they allegedly afraid a second Regicide would be walking around? But how would the precedence of Procer judging the princekillers by their own law will prevent a new Regicide walking around? Unless they are afraid that the precedent established may later see princekillers walk around unpunished for said murder.

But isn't the problem there then a murder, not a murder of a Prince? If any killer would be able to walk away from the common law by abusing Name immunity, would it not already be enough of an issue, without bringing some misplaced national pride into the mix?

And why Red Axe can't stand two trials? Since Frederic is two legal entities in one, well, first of all, does it mean that Cat had a threesome, an secondly, why Red Axe can't be judged as two separate legal entities? With the Proceran justice acting in effect in the area of Proceran jurisdiction?

Konstantin von Karstein

Frederic has 2 legal personalities, but it's a legal fiction. He is still one person. And it so would still mean that the RA is sentenced by a Proceran tribunal for killing a Named.

TeK

But not as a Named, as a regular person. Which she still technically is. The ones who are part of T&T are the Named, not the people they inhabit. If someone loses the Name, they lose the protection of the Terms. So, T&T can act as a temporary diplomatic immunity, that does not disqualify someone from being tried, but only from some parts of the charge being carried out.

Liliet

Truce and Terms are temporary indeed. If people are not protected by them from having a trial held, then the minute the war ends, all those hypothetical abusive sentences everyone's worried about are suddenly due to take effect.

Rey d`Tutto

Well, technically Cat is Queen of Callow, as well as First Under the Night, as well as Catherine Foundling. That bed was crowded...

jfstackhouse

Why hasn't MK nobly volunteered for some long-odds martyrdom by now? He's a weaponized redemption arc.

And a putz. Above's mirror really highlights the warts, huh.

(Also, hey all. Just binged my way to Now and loved the ride. One sin, one grace, happy to meet ya.)

Liliet

Because it's been all of one full day since his fuckup.

Also he's not that smart.

Also they need to hold a trial regardless.

jfstackhouse

I forgot the quotes around "volunteered", but fair point.

It would probably be more effective if he swore the oath at trial, too.

Liliet

Personally I expect AA level of courtroom drama out of this one, complete with dramatic counter-accusations and parrot testimony. What better time for Mirror Knight to make his worries heard than before a council of representatives of the Grand Alliance?

Dmitrii Suvorov

Here's a question: now that the Hunted Magician is no longer hunted by the Autumn Court (or will stop being hunted soon, when the Autumn Crown will be used for the Quartered Seasons), but is massively indebted to three major states, will his Name change to reflect that (Indentured or Indebted Magician, maybe)? Given that he is indebted to two definitely Good states, will he become more in-between when it comes to Good and Evil, like Ranger and Archer?

aerhyce

If he doesn't pay up, and instead tries to do something stupid, such as legging it, he's quickly going to become the Hunted Magician all over again.

When your bad decisions get enshrined into a Name, I don't think you can get rid of them that easily.

Mental Mouse

Well, remember that snaffling the Crown of Autumn to make a poisoned chalice for the DK is very far from a done deal. And even then, there can be many a slip between the poisoned chalice and the undead lips.

Captain Amazing

No one seems to have mentioned Hanno's addendum to the sentencing. He's loudly proclaiming to all of the fretting Named that Catherine doesn't just pardon villains under the Terms. He can directly tell the Mirror Knight about her forthright adherence to the law without stumbling over legal barriers. Hanno did her a major solid and Cat has no idea so it's never mentioned.

aurikdomi

good catch and good point.

Liliet

000000 masterofbones

I don't get White knight's aversion to talking about Red Axe's trial. Preparation beforehand is useful and important – in the US all evidence has to be shared between prosecution and defence.

Liliet

He's averse to talking about the sentence specifically, and he knows he WILL be pressured to speak on that. That's not the same thing as sharing evidence.

Salt

Yeah, Hanno is being quite reasonable lol, while Catherine is actually being unreasonable as far as a court of law is concerned. What she did with the Hunted Magician – taking steps to decide the sentence before the trial even occurs – is pretty much the same thing as rigging the trial and proceeding with more or less a farce. She literally had 2/4 members of the jury in her pocket before walking through the door, with a third jury member being influenced by Cordelia.

Convenient, and likely a solution in this particular case that everyone will be satisfied with, but it's not actually how any sane court of law is supposed to function. Especially for potentially very contentious issues, which the Hunted Magician's really was not.

Hanno is... literally obeying both the letter and the intent of the law, by avoiding deliberating on the sentence until all evidence and arguments have been formally presented at time of trial. It's exactly what he's supposed to do, and the only thing his character background allows him to do without breaking character to a suspension-of-disbelief-busting degree.

Granted, trials under the terms are more of a military tribunal than a proper established court, but it isn't unreasonable for the Hero who literally grew up working for a courthouse to uphold the principles of a proper court as best he can.

Liliet

Yep.

Cat's concerned with setting precedent for the result of a trial.

Hanno's concerned with setting precedent for the process of a trial.

...they're both right and doing good work, imho.

Liliet

...actually, rigging the trial has very little weight behind it as an idea when the judge, the defense and the prosecutor are ALL THE SAME PERSON and everyone else's role is purely advisory. There's just kind of nothing left to rig.

In light of that, my guess at Hanno's reluctance is:

1) he's not decided on the sentence because of missing some piece of information he believes might be key and that he expects to get either during the trial itself or right before it, and he actively doesn't want Catherine or Cordelia sticking their noses into whatever it is;

2) he's got a plan and he knows they WILL NOT like it, but will have to swallow it during the trial itself. IMHO unlikely, given the general dynamic here. Hanno's not the master politician and respects the ones who are;

3) he's got a plan that actually caters well to Catherine and Cordelia but he doesn't want to give even a shade of appearance of being pressured into it.

The trial is more of a thesis defense than an actual trial, and Hanno doesn't want to give spoilers. Why? Gotta be a reason.

...Alternatively, it's just his past as a court scribe rearing its head and he just really WANTS it to be as proper as possible, even when that hardly does anything practically speaking. Given how much personal psychological pressure he's under as the keystone of the Chosen... I could see that too tbh.

Aotrs Commander

So, when Cat was addressing the Haunted Magician, was I the only one thinking:

"Trust me, sir. My whole case hinges on proving you're a dork!"

...

Just me, then?

vernal.ancient

I might have thought that, had I ever seen what you're referencing 😊

doominator10

As an idea that can potentially satisfy both Procer and the Named for Red Axe's trial/execution. Allow Red Axe to be tried and executed under Proceran law, then have her soul be... requisitioned by Catherine indefinitely or until the war with the hidden horror is over.

Procer gets to have their execution, and a traitorous hero gets a punishment befitting of a story.

Mental Mouse

Nasty... "death shall not release you". On the other hand, Cat's treatment of Akua is perhaps not the best precedent.

Laguz24

With her redemption? This might work for cat, easy redemption just remove the soul of someone and shut them in a box for a while.

Liliet

And Procer can do that to anyone who attacks a prince, now can they?

IDKWhoitis

Wouldn't have the Truce and Terms trial be fine if they just list "Attempted Murder (of some degree) of Allied Leaders" under the several charges they try the Red Axe under? It would still scrape a little sovereignty off of Procer, but hardly make it a precedent to allow a Regicide go free.

Ultimately, someone is going to have to cede jurisdiction. By making the punishment of the T&T that Red Axe is excommunicated from the T&T, and subject to mortal law, Procer can still get their trial done. It would set the precedent that while the T&T are above mortal law, Named can still be called into account if their deeds are detrimental to the war effort/damaging to friendly states. Some Heroes and Villains would balk at being potentially forced to face a mortal court, but it would be a restraining factor on their actions in the future, not of the past. This ruling should be explicitly non-retroactive. Procer will throw a bitch fit at the ceded sovereignty but if all member states agree on it, its not as if Procer is being singled out. The other member states already afford their Names some degree of special privileges in this regard.

Liliet

Notably, Procer DOES have a representative at the T&T trial. Oh sure their role is purely advisory, but that doesn't matter if the advice is followed every time.

Yeah, Cordelia is going to have to fold on this.

Now, the more she puts her back into trying for the other outcome first, the more she can later make puppy eyes over an unrelated issue and go "but i made such a biiiiiig concession earlier, can't you let me have this one?..."

(No, her dignity is 100% not above that)

Frivolous

I think I can predict what Cat will do to fix Cordelia's problems with the contrary princes of Procer.

We know that all the contrary princes are outside the Arsenal, yes? And they're probably far away and separated in Creation, too, so Cat can't just gate to them. It would take too long, given she is only one woman and the trial of the Red Axe happens shortly.

So what I think will happen is that Cat will delegate to Rumena and the Losara sigil, get those Peers and Firstborn to threaten the contrary princes into not being a problem. It will be tricky to do so without also ruining things for the Cordelia and the Truce and Terms now and the Liesse Accords later, but blackmail and extortion with plausible deniability are things Cat has experience with (see how she dealt with that High Lord and High Lady of Praes by threatening to remove the souls of their heirs and give them to the Black Knight).

I'm reasonably sure that Sve Noc and Rumena and the Losara already know the identities of most of the problematic princes. They've been spying on the Mirror Knight, Rozala, and Cordelia for a long time by now.

This action will reveal the existence of and some of the power and extent of the drow spy network, but it's necessary.

As for why Cordelia did not ask for Cat to do this all before, I believe Cordelia did not want to set the precedent of depending on Cat to deal with Proceran internal matters and to shore up Cordelia's position. To do so would make Cat, a foreigner, the de facto ruler of Procer.

Also Cordelia did not know of the drow spying on everyone and making the telepathic Night equivalent of celebrity sex videos.

Salt

If they wanted to deal with the Princes with force, they could just pretend the knowledge of the scheme was passed on from Cordelia, rather than the Sisters. No one is going to blink an eye if you claim that the first prince who has not one, but three major spy networks learned it from one of her spies, rather than a pair of psychic murder-goddesses. That way, the scope of the Sisters abilities don't become public knowledge, and Cordelia gets a reputation for being unfathomably formidable in intelligence gathering, which works to her advantage.

I suspect it wouldn't work though, since Procer is such a land of laws that application of violence or unlawful threats are looked down upon, rather than looked up to like in Praes. If news of that kind of blunt strong-arming of the highest assembly – reminiscent of some authoritarian tyrant – got out, Procer may well riot on the spot.

To be honest I think the best solution might be the simplest one: talk to the Mirror Knight.

We all know he's a colossal dumbass, so what are the chances that he doesn't even properly understand the Langevins ambitions, or the potential international consequences to being in bed with them? Especially if this is a kid who just lost his virginity to one of their daughters, with said daughter intentionally showing him only one side of the picture as she whispers sweet nothings into his ear?

Has anyone actually sat him down and, like, made sure he understands how much of a problem the Langevins actually are for everyone? Maybe someone like a First Prince of Procer who would automatically have his respect for being Proceran Royalty as well as Good-aligned, not to mention a candidate for Warden of the West as a Name?

If she managed to convince his silly ass, it wouldn't be hard for her to frame his previous association with them as a foolish noble house trying to use holy Chosen for base political intrigue, and said Chosen wisely reconsidering their relationship once their treachery became clear. She hits the Langevins in losing the Mirror Knight's support, smudges their public image in the eyes of the highest assembly, and puts the Mirror Knight himself in her debt for saving his own reputation in the eyes of the greater Principiate.

Liliet

This.

Everyone's so worried about the Mirror Knight being involved with a plot, meanwhile dollars to donuts the man himself has no idea there's any kind of plot around and would be the first on the frontlines when he learned about it.

mavant

I wonder how Amadeus is doing. I miss him.

Barrendur

Personally, I'd really like to hear about how Amadeus of the Green Smirch has been stripped of all his illusions and driven to self-destruction by contemplating the extent of his failures and the wretched waste he's made of his life, and of everything that was ever important to him. I detest the character.

Liliet

I'm pretty sure that's canon as of pre-start of Book 1, considering taking a Squire was basically picking his future killer from his perspective, so... you already got your wish, technically?

Satan

Letting MK out of custody before Red Axe's trial will be interesting

Chapter 38: Tantamount

"A diplomat without a general at his back is just a polite man no one heeds."

– Exarch Acantha of Penthes

Within an hour I received a formal message asking for my agreement to hold the Mirror Knight's trial tomorrow. I sent back said agreement immediately and I must not have been the only one to be prompt, as within an hour of that the White Knight sent along the formal charges that Christophe de Pavanie would be accused of. I narrowed my eyes at the paucity of them: assault of an ally and insubordination. That was it. No mention of the fact that he'd kept the Severance at his hip long after the crisis had passed, though Hanno might make the case that since no formal demand to return it had been made of the Mirror Knight it hadn't actually been a breach of the Terms for him to keep it. It wasn't even unprovoked assault of an ally, I noted with distaste, but instead a lesser sister-charge.

I'd reserve judgement – no pun intended, Sisters preserve – until the trial took place, but I wouldn't consider this an auspicious beginning.

Intriguingly enough, I got a third message in the wake of the first two and not from someone I'd expected to be reaching out.

After I'd sat down with Vivienne to go over the possible outcomes of tomorrow with a cup of wine in hand, our talk was interrupted by a message from Lord Yannu Marave. He was overseeing the sparring of his sworn swords in the Revel's arena, and he'd invited me to come have a look. It was a threadbare excuse to have a private talk, but that he might want that talk at all surprised me. I shared the thought with Vivienne.

"They call him Careful Yannu, back home," she mused.

My brow rose.

"He did not strike me as all that careful a man, during the trial," I said. "Juniper has some respect for his skill as a general and I'll not argue there, but he's not particularly impressed me otherwise."

"The Dominion doesn't do politics like we do, Cat," Vivienne reminded me. "They often duel, when they disagree, and they're cautious with risking their honour. He didn't particularly care about the trial because by Levantine ways he shouldn't have been in the room – villains are yours to discipline, as your 'sworn men'."

My forehead creased in thought as I considered him again with fresh eyes. He'd spoken in favour of death, when the time came for recommendations, but to Levantines things like betrayals tended to be seen as matters of honour. Honour was usually settled by blood on the floor, back in Levant, so for a lord of the Dominion to express surprise this didn't start and end with putting the Magician's head on a pike made a brutal sort of sense.

"Careful Yannu, huh," I murmured.

I wasn't entirely convinced, but best to watch my step anyway. There were damned few situations where it wouldn't be a good idea to do that, so what was there to lose?

"There's an emerging pattern of the Dominion reaching out to us amicably," Vivienne thoughtfully continued. "When they suggested we arrange formal ambassadors I thought it might be leftover goodwill from your saving the Pilgrim, or perhaps courting your support in keeping their villains from making trouble, but now I'm not so sure."

"They've been wary of making deals with me," I slowly said, "but at the highest rungs of Dominion leadership they'll be aware of my eventual abdication. You're a lot more palatable, from their perspective."

A former heroine with some impressive deeds to her name, nobly born but not afraid to get her hands a little dirty? That sort of reputation would go over very well, down in Levant.

"They also remember how quickly Proceran gratitude fades," Vivienne murmured. "And how a First Prince can withdraw from the treaties signed by a predecessor. A treaty of mutual defence between our realms might appeal to their Majilis."

"I'd think it more likely they want an informal alignment within the bounds of the Grand Alliance," I told her. "They don't want it to become a vessel for Proceran interests any more than we do."

"They'll be in no hurry to seal a pact, regardless," Vivienne noted. "Bargaining done with an ally is expected to be gentler, and the negotiations over the Accords is the greatest leverage the Dominion has over us at the moment."

True enough. More than once I'd wondered if Procer and Levant were actually drawing those talks out so that they could bribe me with 'concessions' when they wanted something from me. Not a pleasant thought to entertain, but even if it turned out to be true there honestly wasn't much I could do about it.

"No reason not to take up Lord Marave on his invitation, then," I said, draining the rest of my cup before rising to my feet.

No reason to waste time, either, so I got to it.

—

I wasn't one to complain when offered up the sight of two dozen very fit men and women half-naked and laying hands on each other, but it lost some of the charm when they were doing their best to pummel each other unconscious. I'd been in a few brawls myself, back in the day, so I could tell that no one was taking it easy down there: those blows weren't being pulled in the slightest. If the personal sworn swords of Yannu of the Champion's Blood had been 'sparring' with blades instead of fists, there'd be corpses on the sand by now. As it was, I saw only blood and broken bones. A pair of young Levantine healers – who amusingly enough wouldn't be considered real priests in the Dominion even though they used Light, as unlike the Lanterns they did not battle against evil – mended the fighters during their breaks, but did not otherwise involve themselves.

Yannu Marave himself sat besides me on the rafters, drinking deeply from a waterskin. He'd been down there fighting with the others when I got there, and only come up after one of the healers set a broken finger and bathed it in Light. The Lord of Alava was still barefoot and clad in only loose trousers and a sweat-soaked tunic, neither of which hid the fact that the man was a towering slab of muscle. He was tall, for a Levantine, and unusually for one of their men close-shaven instead of bearded. His colours were not currently on his face, but instead discreetly painted in intertwined threads around his wrist. After emptying what must have been half the skin, the Lord of Alava sighed in pleasure.

"I thank you for your patience," Lord Yannu said.

"I didn't send a messenger ahead to warn of my coming," I dismissed with a shrug.

There'd been others up here when I first came, who'd invited me to take a seat on the bench where I still was, but they'd withdrawn when their lord came up. Now he glanced back at them meaningfully and they reached within the leather bags at their side, fiddling with something within. A moment later the small tingle of a ward coming down over the area passed over my skin, and I eyed the men speculatively. They wore armour, both of them, which was rare in mages aside from those in my army and the Legions – and even there it was a lighter kit than that of the regulars. They might not be mages at all, though, or just practitioners with a meagre Gift: it did not take much to wake the wardstones the Blood used. Gifts from the Gigantes, they were a wonder to behold and one I remained deeply envious of.

"Hiding stones," the Lord of Alava said, noting my interest. "We will not be heard, not even by the men carrying them."

"Useful," I said.

Hopefully it wasn't too obvious on my face that I'd trade the Blessed Isle for a reliable way to get those. Not that I currently owned the Blessed Isle, but that'd never stopped me before.

"I will not waste our time with small talk," Lord Yannu said. "We both know what this is."

I hummed, inclining my head in unspoken agreement.

"We're not happy with Procer having an ealamal," the tall man said.

"I'm not familiar with the term," I said, "but I can guess what you're referring to."

"The angel-corpse, you have called it," Lord Yannu said. "That is the word for such a thing in Murcadan."

Ealamal, huh. It had a ring to it. Less ungainly to keep mentioning, too.

"Understood," I said. "I'm not happy about it either, as you already know."

"I do," he said. "And the heads of two lines of the Blood vouch that your word has weight, so now we speak. Procer is a great but dying beast, and I do not advise forcing its lair, yet for that same reason we must act. An animal bleeding out cannot be trusted with the likes of an ealamal."

He paused there, as if to invite me to speak.

"I'd prefer the weapon scrapped," I admitted, "but I agree that no good will come out of pushing the Principate too far. The reasonable compromise would be having people of our own near it, so that it can't be used without our agreement."

The tanned man nodded.

"I speak for the entire Majilis when I say this," Yannu Marave said. "We want the ealamal to be made a weapon of the Grand Alliance, like the Severance."

"I don't see Cordelia Hasenbach going for that without assurances," I said. "At a guess, Procer keeping the most boots on the ground around it and maybe even controlling who has access."

Rubies to piglets that the First Prince would cut off a finger before letting Masego anywhere near her angelic doomsday weapon.

"We'd agree to limiting Bestowed access," the Lord of Alava said, "by making it subject to a vote needing to be unanimous. But we want Binders and Lanterns there, so that we can know the nature of the threat. I will not accept our first warning being a tide of burning light on the horizon."

"Preaching to the choir there," I grunted back. "I'd agree to limiting Named under those terms as well, but I want your support in pushing for the Rogue Sorcerer to have a look."

Roland was in that narrow category of people who were both likely to understand what they were looking at and then share that information with me. The Lord of Alava studied me closely.

"Agreed, if you support the same for the Forsworn Healer," he replied.

I hid my surprise. The man was from Atalante from what I recalled, not Levant. And he served up in Twilight's Pass, where no Named from the Dominion had been assigned. There were Levantine troops up there, though, led by Itima of the Bandit's Blood. Might be there was a tie there that'd slipped me by: there were few of my lot in Lycaonese lands, and none I was close to. Either way I had no reason to refuse his terms.

"Bargain struck," I replied, offering up my arm to clasp.

"On my honour," Yannu Marave agreed, taking the arm.

Good, that tended to be reliable in Levantines.

"All that's left is deciding how we approach her," I said. "It will have more of an impact coming from Levant, I'd say."

"If Callow is the one to approach her, she will sound us out and find the door closed," the Lord of Alava replied. "A softer creep, yes?"

"If she doesn't already know we're talking, I'll put up my crown for auction in Mercantis," I snorted. "Besides, soft won't get this done. It needs to be made clear to her she'd standing alone in this, and that her allies are not pleased."

"A common front, then," Lord Yannu said. "Wearied comrades coming to her together."

Interesting. He really didn't want to be the one to swing the sword on this, did he? Worried about the appearance of siding with a villain, or some of the undercurrents of the Dominion's own politics tying his hands? It was a shame that the Jacks knew so very little of the powers that moved Levant, but given the distance and the youth of their organization it would have been foolish to expect them to have spread their net that far.

"That could work," I conceded, sensing pushing for more would get me nowhere. "A dinner tomorrow, after the trial?"

"No point in letting her dig in," the Lord of Alava agreed, sounding amused. "I will make the arrangements, Black Queen, if you have no objection."

"I entrust my honour to your hands," I replied, nodding.

Surprise flickered across the man's face, and though he tried to hide it the courtesy had obviously flattered him.

Lord Yannu of the Champion's Blood would be less flattered if he knew I'd learned the words from the Barrow Sword, I suspected, but I had no intention of telling him.

—

I'd expected to derive some pleasure from this, to have to hide it, but when the time came I found that I got no joy from the sight of Christophe de Pavanie being pilloried.

Metaphorically so, that was. Aside from being unarmed and heavily guarded the Mirror Knight wasn't bound in any way. He still looked like a beaten dog as the Sword of Judgement briskly went through the charges laid against him, face bleak as he remained silent unless spoken to. No one wanted to drag more Named directly into this, so the testimony of heroes had been offered in written form instead and the entire affair took no more than a quarter hour. The White Knight made his case methodically, laying no accusation that could not be proven and justifying his charge of 'assault on an ally' instead of 'unprovoked assault on an ally' by specifying that there'd been some fighting between heroes and that he himself had not done as much as he could have to prevent violence from erupting.

It'd keep the Mirror Knight from more severe consequences, but even as I watched the First Prince's face subtly harden I decided it'd been a strategic mistake on Hanno's part. Admitting to heroes brawling amongst each other only helped make them seem less reliable in Hasenbach's eyes, damningly enough not without reason. That my own lot was looking better in comparison was darkly amusing, considering they tended to be significantly worse people. They were, however, much better at hiding their misdeeds. The most fire that was squeezed out of the Mirror Knight was when he was probed over his reasons to have acted in such a manner by the First Prince.

"I sought only to prevent the scapegoating and execution of a Chosen," Christophe said, voice defiant. "I took the wrong path in seeking this, I'll not deny it, but the intention itself I will not apologize for."

Cordelia warmly thanked him for his candor with a smile and he looked both surprised and rather charmed. I wasn't fooled, myself. I knew that glint in her eye, as it was cousin to one that'd often gleamed in my own. The First Prince of Procer was looking at a Heavens-ordained victor still insisting even now that his own half-baked sense of justice should trump laws and treaties, and finding indignation rising within her. I suppressed a wince. Those two sentences had probably done as much damage as the rest of this trial put together. Now she had to be asking herself how many heroes like Christophe de Pavanie there were, for each one like the White Knight.

I could only begin to imagine her horror at the thought of that sort of strength and ignorance bolstering the position of some Highest Assembly cutthroat.

With the charges fully presented and little doubt left as to the truthfulness of them, Hanno asked if the tribunal wanted to deliberate. I was still gauging the risk of being seen as overstepping if I pushed for that when the First Prince voted in favour. I quickly added my vote for to the tally and the Lord of Alava belatedly voted that way as well, looking more curious than anything else. With a majority secured the Mirror Knight was sent out of the room to a nearby one where he could wait until deliberations were finished, and within moments of his departure Arsenal mages put a privacy ward over the room. Cordelia opened the dance without being coy about it, much to my pleasure.

"Before punishment is decided by the White Knight, I have relevant facts to present to the tribunal," the First Prince said.

"By our own rules of procedure, these cannot be charges," Hanno told her.

"They are not, Lord White," she calmly replied. "If I may?"

The dark-skinned knight nodded.

"Christophe de Pavanie has involved himself with the royal family of Cleves, the House of Langevin," Cordelia said. "He has taken for a lover the daughter of Prince Gaspard Langevin and become associated with the plots of that line, though his exact degree of awareness there has not been made clear."

The drow hadn't seen him backing the plot to knife them in the back, that much was true – if Sve Noc had that kind of leverage, they would have given it to me. But he'd not outright refused either.

"Neither taking a lover nor the plotting of others is something that the Mirror Knight can be castigated for," Hanno replied, just as calmly.

Yeah, no one was going to get anywhere trying to get the Sword of Judgement to spice up a sentence according to political necessities. You might as well ask Archer to settle down or the Pilgrim to deal in casual cruelty.

"Ignoring the full circumstances when passing the sentence would be dereliction of duty," I said instead. "You've clearly established the man to be lacking in judgement through your charges, his association with known schemers has to be taken into consideration when addressing the consequences of that lack of judgement."

"Well said," the First Prince of Procer added. "Justice dealt without thought to consequence is no more than the arithmetic of law."

A little rich coming from a woman famous for her mastery of using the Highest Assembly's procedural laws against her rivals, but I'd not answer wind in the sail by poking a hole in the damned thing. Yannu Marave's face had gone cold, though I noticed only when he leaned forward.

"You both seem in agreement that Gaspard Langevin is scheming," the Lord of Alava. "What is the nature of this scheme?"

I cast a look at Cordelia, silently ceding her the right to speak. I was the closest thing the Firstborn had to a representative in this room, but the House of Langevin was her headache – and a little goodwill gift now and then helped grease the wheels of this relationship, anyway.

"Designs have made on lands that were promised to the Empire Ever Dark for its contributions to the war," the First Prince said. "Though the plans remained imprecise, and no concrete measures were ever taken."

If the Lord of Alava's expression had been cold before, it was now freezing.

"That such an honourless man still lives, much less still wears a crown, is repugnant," Lord Yannu spelled out with excruciating care. "With this scheming against allies he dishonours not only Procer but this entire alliance."

I said nothing, less than inclined to take that bolt for Procer when I pretty much agreed with the man.

"Measures are being taken," Cordelia evenly replied.

"Then let them be taken soon," Yannu of the Champion's Blood replied. "I will not lead my captains in the defence of such a man and his holdings, First Prince. We will not die by the hundreds so that your hungry princes can sink their teeth into new lands."

It would have been inappropriate to let out a whistle there, but I was tempted. The Lord of Alava was being heavy-handed, but given how much honour mattered to the Blood he might be genuinely offended by what he'd learned. Or, I mused with Vivienne's words in mind, Careful Yannu might just be preparing the grounds for our common offensive at dinner tonight. He was in full face paint today, which made reading his expression rather harder.

"We have strayed from the purpose of this deliberation," the White Knight said.

With that call to order we let the subject drop, though it would not soon be forgotten. I'd said what I'd wanted to and the First Prince had proved true to her word by actually addressing the Langevin troubles, so when the deliberations were called to an end I did not argue against. The Mirror Knight was brought back in and Hanno called for recommendations to be made by the tribunal.

"A public lashing and four fingers," Lord Yannu flatly said.

The Mirror Knight paled but did not speak.

"Reassignment to Twilight's Pass until the end of the war, subordinate to another," the First Prince suggested instead. "After his deeds being made known among all Named and a month in a cell."

He made an uglier expression at that than the prospect of losing fingers, which I supposed said much about how other heroes would respond to his action. A month was a fairly specific length of time to ask for, though. I suspected that it would line up very well with a sentence under Procer law, by mere happenstance of course.

"I'll second Twilight's Pass and the subordination," I said. "As for the rest, I'll trust in your judgement."

A month in a cell would be a waste, so I'd not argue in favour of it, but I was actually in favour of making it known Christophe had tried his hand at a coup. It would bottom out his reputation while the way Hanno had handled him would gild his own. Given the silence of the Choir of Judgement, the occasional reminder that the White Knight was not someone to fuck with had its uses. I didn't want to be seen arguing for the public shaming of an opponent, though, so it was best for Cordelia to be the one doing that – not that I'd missed she was trying to send her inconvenient native hero up in Lycaonese lands, where her support ran strongest, and squarely under the Kingfisher Prince's military command.

My eyes stayed on the White Knight, though, whose serene face I found unreadable.

"Christophe de Pavanie's breaches of the Terms will be made known to all Named," Hanno said. "He will offer apology and restitution to all those harmed by his actions, after which he will be apprenticed to the Grey Pilgrim for the span of a year so that he might learn from his mistakes."

My brow rose. Was that all? I was relieved when he began talking again.

"After the year has passed, the Grey Pilgrim will give his opinion on whether further action is required," Hanno asked. "If he believes it to be so, this tribunal will be assembled again so that appropriate sanctions might be considered."

I breathed out shallowly. Fuck me, but he'd stepped in it there. From the corner of my eye I saw Hasenbach's back go straight as a spear, and the fact that her anger was that that visible meant she must be furious. From a Named perspective, Hanno's sentence was solid work: Tariq, for all his flaws, had mentored dozens of heroes over the years and had an aspect that would allow him unearthly insight into what needed to be mended in Christophe. Honestly, after a year under Tariq I fully expected the Mirror Knight to come out of the experience a better man. But the Grey Pilgrim had also butchered an entire village of Proceran civilians in order to catch Black, back before the Salian Peace, which Hasenbach still despised him for. Now a brewing threat to her authority was being sent to learn at the foot of the same Peregrine. It... wasn't a good look.

"Wisdom was shown," Lord Yannu commented.

Yeah, none of the Blood were going to argue with a sentence that put the Pilgrim in charge of a problem child. He had a steady hand with those. Was this enough for me, though? From the corner of my eye I watched Cordelia and saw clouds looming on that horizon. Time to throw her a bone, maybe.

"I give no objection to this, so long as the Principate is also satisfied," I mildly said.

The First Prince glanced at me, accepting the gesture for what it was – a largely symbolic one, but not entirely without meaning. If she wanted to fight this, I'd lend a hand. Within reason. A long moment of silence passed, the Mirror Knight visibly getting uncomfortable the longer it lasted, until the First Prince finally spoke.

"I will accept this sentence, if the Grey Pilgrim sends monthly reports to the high officers on the subject of this 'apprenticeship'," the fair-haired princess said.

Hanno mulled over that a moment, then nodded.

"That is reasonable," he replied. "It will be so."

And so the trial of the Mirror Knight came to a close, having lasted not even a half hour from beginning to end. It didn't take long afterwards to agree that the Red Axe's own should be tomorrow, though late in the evening.

And yet, for all the smoothness, I could not help but feel there was the scent of a storm in the air.

—

It was an amusing novelty to be more at ease in a diplomatic situation than Cordelia Hasenbach.

When the Lord of Alava had said he'd make the arrangements to receive us for dinner, I'd not expected him to actually throw what looked like a genuine Levantine meal. One of the nice halls put together in the Proceran manner had been stripped of its decorations, painted shields having been hung up in their stead. The heraldries had been skillfully painted, I found. My own Crown and Sword had been perfectly presented in black and silver, while the golden towers on blue of the House of Hasenbach drew the eye with their neat arrangement. The colours of the Valiant Champion's Blood were red and orange, but to my understanding the pattern changed from ruler to ruler. Yannu Marave's own was simple but elegant, bold strokes of orange evoking a helmet with a smiling slice beneath it.

The First Prince was clearly familiar with Levantine ways, so she'd come dressed in a fine brigandine of Rhenian colours with a sword at her hip and her hair pulled back in a long three-strand braid. I'd kept to a simple grey tunic myself, though paired with bracers and greaves, and brought a short blade at Vivienne's recommendation. Hasenbach was the first to hand over her sheathed sword to the Lord of Alava when he welcomed her, only to have it handed back as gesture of trust, and though she did not fumble handling the weapon I'd noticed she was not used to having it at her hip when she walked. My own blade was returned with the same formula of 'your honour is known under this roof', which while mostly symbolic was still nice to hear.

Unlike the elaborate affair of when the First Prince had entertained me over dinner, this was to be a simpler arrangement. Levantine ways in some ways reminded me of those of the Taghreb, in the sense that hospitality mattered a great deal to them and that courtesy was demonstrated personally instead of through formal etiquette. It was an honour, for example, that there would be only the three of us at the table and no servants to pour or serve. The Lord of Alava would do so for us himself, showing much more respect than if a stranger were doing it in his stead. The fare was simple but tasty: slices of dried pork ham, a mix of beans, chickpeas and eggs touched with spices and oil, good white bread with some sort of tomato paste.

Lord Yannu was generous in pouring wine, strong red stuff from southern Levant, which did wonders for my appreciation of the meal. Conversation started light and stayed there for some time as we dug in.

"Do you actually know how to use that?" I eventually asked Hasenbach, flicking a glance at her sword.

She'd kept drinking, bound by the rules of courtesy, so I believed the flush on her cheeks to be entirely genuine.

"I can hold a wall, if need be," the Lycaonese princess replied, "I am a Hasenbach. My skill is middling, however. I was always better with a bow."

Didn't have the callouses of someone who shot regularly, though, I couldn't help but notice. Probably didn't have the time with her duties in Salia.

"Good bowmen are always useful," the Lord of Alava said in approval. "It is unfortunate they are not as useful against the undead as the living."

"Swords for the Dead, arrows for the Plague," Hasenbach quoted. "There is a proper use for all things."

That was as good a segue as we were going to get, I suspected, and I wasn't the only one to figure that out.

"Some weapons are best left in the sheath," the Levantine lord said. "And there are some who even sheathed cause the wise to be wary."

The First Prince wasn't an idiot, and not interested in pretending otherwise, so instead of playing off the comment she dabbed her lips with the cloth and washed down the last of her pork with a small mouthful of wine. Only then did she answer.

"There are many wise in Levant, I imagine," she said.

"I have known this to be true," Yannu Marave said, face pleasant but eyes cool.

The First Prince glanced at me.

"I don't claim wisdom," I said, "but wariness is dear as a sister to me."

"It pains me to see my allies troubled," Hasenbach mildly replied. "Though I am wary, myself, of troubling the princes sworn to me."

"Your princes trouble me," the Lord of Alava replied, dispensing with the pretence. "I have broken bread with Gaspard Langevin, never knowing he was plotting betrayal of an ally. I will never share a table with any of that line again."

Godsdamn, I thought. While I was fairly sure he was feeding the flame some, the spark at the heart of it struck me as a genuine thing. The twist of those lips was just a little too tight for it to be otherwise.

"You've expressed concerns about the reliability of Bestowed," I said, "and perhaps not without reason. You can understand, then, our concerns about an ealamal possibly falling in the hands of less honourable elements within Procer."

She didn't like it, I could tell, but she couldn't afford to antagonize Procer's only two allies by brushing us off. It must not have been a pleasant turn, I thought, to be the one on the outside for once. I was rather enjoying being the one with backing, though. I could get used to this.

"Let us discuss then," Cordelia Hasenbach said, "how all our concerns might be allayed."

After that, all that was left was bargaining over terms.

Beadsu Richar

This is off topic, and probably will never be relevant to the story, but what happened to Assassin? He was a cool character and i might be mistaken but I thought only a simulacrum of his was destroyed in Akua's Folly, and not really him. Anyway, an amazing chapter EE, Thanks,

Javvies

His last known location, was Ashur, roughly concurrent with Amadeus's invasion of Procer.

What Assassin has been up to since and where he's been is a complete unknown.

Laguz24

Yeah, last I heard he was in ashur. Though I think he will be making a return sometime, or he's already in the arsenal. Or he lost his name since he is no longer under the employ of the empress since that was his role (blade of the empire) and he no longer has it. Just like amadeus lost his name as the black knight after he stopped serving.

Anomandris

Imagine if he is working with Black. I mean, Ranger, Maddie AND Assassin? Malicia should just abdicate at that point....

Darkening

Black thinks to himself at one point on his trip through the twilight ways, "assassin was gone, if not from calernia than at least from his service." So I doubt assassin is still around, but I suppose he could have come back during the time skip.

Liliet

Assassin is from the Free Cities, and had his Name before he served the Praesi court.

SMR

... Black didn't lose his name after he stopped serving. He lost his name when he was defeated by a hero. The Black Knight is the Breaker of Heroes.

Salt

The Black Knight losing his Name had nothing to do with his defeat at the hands of a Hero. He lost his Name because he was at the end of the Story of the Black Knight, and was transitioning into the Role of a Claimant for Dread Emperor. Ruler instead of Ruled.

This wasn't a natural part of his Role either. Turning him into a Claimant from a Black Knight was orchestrated directly by the Bard. She said it outright when she dropped by to gloat after manipulating him into accidentally kill Captain during the fight with the White Knight.

> The Wandering Bard leapt down from the rooftop, half-falling. She came close, kneeling at his side.

> "Go home," she said. "Murder your little friend in the Tower and reign until someone puts a knife in your back. You're not as good at this game as you thought you were."

After Black was captured by the Pilgrim, she once again intervened to push him into becoming Dread Emperor, by directly convincing him to become a Claimant.

> "I am," Amadeus said, "no longer the Black Knight."

> "You don't fit that groove anymore," Marguerite said. "Powerless you ain't, Maddie. You know what you are, deep down, you just think it's beneath you."

> His fingers tightened under the knuckles were white.

> "Claimant," the Wandering Bard said. "You can have your second shot at it, you're owed that."

Liliet

You are correct, and he was mentioned since. Black sent him to Ashur to assassinate their leadership, without contact and specific plans to avoid detection by the Augur. This seems to have bitten everyone in the ass – the plot being finalized was mentioned in Cordelia's POV at the peace conference, where Augur had finally seen it and told her, but it was too late to do anything. And Black soon after – in the Epilogue, I think, it was his own POV – mentioned Assassin being either out of Calernia or at least out of his service.

No status updates since.

flashburn283

Oh, he is out there somewhere, biding his time till our dear Amadeus has need of his particular talents.

Big I

He was sent to assassinate the ruler of Ashur (Magon Hadast I think his name is?) so that his son, who has ties to the Tower, could take over. That was before Thallasinnia though. Since then the only mention is from an Amadeus POV where he thinks that "Assassin is gone, if not from this world then at least from his service".

Liliet

I think the name is right!

According to Cordelia circa peace conference, he did do that. Just when Amadeus no longer would have wanted him to...

sengachi

Oh I suspect it will be very, very important at the worst possible time. There is a character famous for nigh-impossible to survive, who is nigh-impossible to kill, who can be literally anywhere in the story, who had terrifying abilities hinted at yet not explicitly spelled out, who acts at the behest of someone known for picking the worst moments to twist the knife in, and whose Empress wants the Grand Alliance to hurt fighting the Dead King.

And the Grand Alliance is a house of cards barely keeping itself afloat.

The only case in which I can see the Assassin not busting in at the worst possible moment is if the Assassin already has and is the Red Axe somehow.

Liliet

> who acts at the behest of someone known for picking the worst moments to twist the knife in, and whose Empress unconfirmed, which is the closest to a silver lining here

The Rattle in the Book

That's the point I think. If we knew where assassin was, he wouldn't be a very good assassin now would he?

Kakavorin

I wonder if he might be the Forlorn Paladin. The one that has lost his memory.

SpaceDorf

my thoughts as well.

It would fit Assassins sense of humor to join the Truce and Terms under some assumed Name just to reap the benefits after.

maybe the whatshername Poisoner

Mental Mouse

Heh heh heh...

Kazrael Azraelis

"Let us discuss then," Cordelia Hasenbach said, "how all our votes might be given."

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Alexis

My own input was returned with the same formula of 'your votes are known under this roof', which while mostly symbolic was still nice to hear.

Javvies

I'm not sure Tariq is really the best person to oversee Mirror Knight's "rehabilitation", as I'm pretty sure Mirror Knight is also one of the people who thinks Tariq is under Cat's influence/sway, which would likely complicate Tariq's efforts.

Also ... Tariq needs to confront the fact that Bard isn't who he thought she was.

Plus ... Tariq is somebody who doesn't exactly have a promising perspective on the relative value of secular values and authorities relative to that of the Ophanim.

Mirror Knight's trial went more smoothly than I expected it would.

The lightness of the charges is a potential problem.

But now Yannu knows about the Langevin plotting and he is not pleased, as expected.

The question of the Angel corpse went surprisingly well.

Red Axe's trial is gonna be a mess. Or, rather ... the aftermath. Especially if she outright says that she lied about accepting the Truce and Terms. Major consequences for the reliability of Named, especially Heroes.

Also, if she lied, Cordelia could also try to use that as a lever to get her out from Hanno's jurisdiction and into hers, which might complicate things.

Huh. Hanno is going to need to be careful about what charges he lays against Red Axe. That's another potential problem.

Ninestrings

Very few Named have the patience to deal with his stupidity, and the power to slap him down if necessary.

Also The Blood really like that guy so denying him custody on the basis of distrust to The Grey Pilgrim may be taken as an insult to them.

Salt

Not to mention that the Mirror Knight's main problems is his stubbornness in defending a vague idea of virtue at all costs, lack of experience in worldly matters, and lack of any sort of nuance in matters of judgement.

Tariq as a person has strengths to match all of those three flaws, and has a Role/Story almost specifically designed for teaching young Heroes what they're lacking. He's nearly tailor made by Above for this kind of Role.

It probably won't hurt either that the Grey Pilgrim was one of the few people brutally principled enough to draw genuine respect for them Saint of Swords. You're never going to be held in such high esteem by Laurence de fucking Montfort without an ironclad set of virtuous principles that puts most Heroes to shame. Christophe will respect that about the "kindly" old grandfather, if nothing else.

Liliet

Yeah, this. Tariq has the advantages of:

- his Role being that of a teacher, personally speaking if not necessarily that of his Name;
- knowing EXACTLY why people listen to the Black Queen and trust her personally speaking;

- understanding clearly the balance of power behind the Truce and Terms;
- having Behold to make up for Christophe's inability to communicate clearly;
- not being Proceran and so having the perspective Christophe lacks for how his people come across to everyone else, but also being old and wise and patient enough to not just end the conversation the first time Christophe blurts out something horrifically offensive;
- being, indeed, universally respected and personally more or less beyond reproach;
- having been friends with the Saint of Swords and so both having respect for uncompromising stances and being intimately familiar with their downsides.

(Though, honestly, I don't think Christophe is a lot like Laurence. Her uncompromising-ness came from an excess of practicality – she already knows what's best and what will happen if who does what, and listening to other people / giving villains a chance is a cute idealistic thought she's no longer into based on extensive life experience. What ideals she did hold once upon a time that got beaten out of her might just be the opposite of Christophe's to the degree them both being Above-bound allows.)

KageLupus

Of all of those points, Behold is the one that I think makes the most sense. We have seen Christophe's point of view, and so we know that his biggest hangup is that he sticks his foot in his mouth almost constantly. He is always feeling like his words and his intent don't line up, which makes him feel awkward, which leads to more poor interactions.

Having a kind old grandfather who can see your intent clearly is exactly what someone like that needs to start getting over their issues. Tariq has the Aspect that will let him act as a therapist and mentor, and the years of practice to make him a good one. More than anything that is what Mirror Knight needs to stop being a pain in everyone's ass.

Liliet

Y E A H

One of Cat's biggest issue with Tariq was that he tried to act like a kindly old mentor figure to her AND SHE ALREADY HAD ONE OF THOSE THANKS THE SLOT IS FILLED.

While Cristophe's entire problem is that it's not.

hakureireimu

Tariq is the only one with Behold.

Liliet

Well, Hanno worked at court before he was a Named, and under the Choir of Judgement after. I think "careful with the charges he lays" is not going to be a problem.

Salt

I don't know, I'm a little worried that Hanno is not the right type of careful, considering that the danger is primarily a politically related one instead of one that has to do with Justice and the Law. This chapter just showed that he is basically a perfect robot with the latter, but aggressively gives no shits about politics if they're not directly related to the trial at hand.

We got some... troubling foreshadowing here where Hanno perfectly dealt with the Mirror Knight's trial as far as the letter and the intent of the law went, but basically stomped on Cordelia's toes in the process by ignoring political ramifications/personal grudges, for the sake of the most lawful and Just resolution.

It'll have to be Cordelia who'll need to be very careful about how she pushes her agenda for a Proceran trial to prevent a riot in the highest assembly, because Hanno is basically going to plow ahead exactly as his view of legal correctness and "Justice" demands. If Hanno sees her as attempting to subvert the Law under the Terms here, she's going to find out exactly what Catherine was thinking about him being a sharp rock under water.

Liliet

LMAO true, very true.

That said, this is Cordelia's bread and butter. Dealing with... strong personalities and all.

Lord Haart

I think you may be misreading Hanno here somewhat. Recall his thoughts during the heroes' meeting, he is less concerned about Justice than about the best outcome. He knows that few people could wield the Severance and he's trying to make sure that if they need to rely on MK for that (which no one else would like but which may be required in the end), that door remains open. Which is actually very pragmatic, really

Salt

Nah, I will have to disagree. While the law by itself isn't the only thing he looks at, at the end of the day there's absolutely nothing in all of Creation that Hanno is more concerned about than Justice. When the Tyrant viewed him with Wish, what he saw was "at her side that boring little thing the White Knight tread, all desires his own faded while that horrid thing intertwined with the Seraphim – I wish to be just – tainted everything."

Which is rather in-line with his character background, since Hanno's equivalent of Catherine taking up the knife for the sake of peace, was going to the temple to seek the Face of the Just. Actually his entire origin story – and the reason he's even named the White Knight at all – was about him realizing that mortals weren't capable of determining Justice in the first place. He was anointed by the Seraphim because he had such a fervent wish for Justice that he was willing to almost completely give up his own agency for the sake of being Just.

Hanno is not the Hero who cares mostly about outcomes. That's the Pilgrim, who is blatantly willing to commit lesser evils as long as it results in less suffering, let his Sister's killer live – fully admitting that it was the unjust thing to do – because it would result in less suffering, and killing his own adopted son because the outcome otherwise was an entire war worth of suffering.

Liliet

Hanno cares about justice AND about outcomes. If the outcome of justice done is disastrous, was it really justice in the first place? The Seraphim seemed to say "no" to that in Hanno's initiation vision.

Cpt. Obvious

Hano says he didn't judge, but left that up to the choir of judgement. But at the same time he did not toss the coin for everyone, and he specifically avoided doing that for people who he considered to be positive forces. Not necessarily good, but providing a net positive to the world around them.

He did that because he knows that even heroes like the Grey Pilgrim or the Mirror Knight will have broken some laws and would have been struck if judged by the choir of judgement.

Judgement isn't able to see beyond black and white. Either you are innocent, which is next to impossible for anyone but a infant, or you are guilty and will bear the full might of justice.

So though he claimed that he didn't judge, and that was technically true, Hano was effectively the one who chose whom the choir would judge. And I doubt he ever got surprised by the choir finding the accused not guilty.

And that's why I think he's a hypocrite when he claims not to have been the one to judge. On the other hand he has shown that he has a keen sense of justice and understands that sometimes what is right isn't necessarily the same as what is legal, or sometimes not even what is good. And that's why he can work with Catherine. She is technically evil, a priest of the evil gods Sve Noc, and she cheats at dice, cards, politics and warfare and fighting. But she doesn't kill for fun, tries to minimize deaths and suffering and fights FOR her people instead of oppressing them. That's more of a net positive than what a lot of the supposedly good rulers has shown.

LizAris

I actually feel pretty good about giving Mirror to ol Tariq- It's true he is fully in line with his choir and depends on them for judgment much in the same way Hanno used to (whispers in the ear etc), but as far as secular authorities he knows where he stands and where that power needs to be. He never wanted to rule Levant (even though they'd literally hand the crown to him); he's always been very open to careful consideration of enemies turned allies (he's one of the heroes most okay with joining forces with Cat, even happily sat down to talk to her when they first met, which is the kind of foresight and consideration Christophe wouldn't recognize even if it sat in his lap). He entrusted the safety of Aquiline and Razin to the Black Queen, which is definitely saying something about his respect for politics and power in Calernia, and how he didn't want his home to be left behind. All in all he's not a stupid guy and I think he's ESPECIALLY fitting for Christophe given how well he once dealt with Saint, and how much Mirror mirrors (ha) a more flawed version of her.

'Ladi Williams

"Sat down and happily talked to her".... Yeah. You do realise that was him trying to set her up for a redemption narrative where she loses her head at the end of it right? If not that Cat was story savvy...she wouldn't have dodged that bullet.

And he kept trying to off her even after that without batting an eyelid. He only gave up and truly listened when it became obvious he couldn't beat her story wise...

That said. I still agree with you that he's a good choice to put some sense into that hard head and has the required power to beat it into the said hard head.

Salt

To be fair, even after Catherine came back from the Everdark she still believed he was being genuine, despite his active attempts to kill her.

Not to mention that, if his argument with the Saint during the Princes graveyard is to be believed, Catherine was far from the first Villain to act like she had good intentions. As in he tried compromising with Villains similar to Catherine quite literally dozens of times and got burned for it every time without a single exception, before deciding to try again with Cat.

Tariq vs Laurence, from Concord:

> "Tariq, how many of these 'turnabouts' have you seen over the years?" the Saint hissed. "How many Damned made their apologies, swore they'd never meant to hurt anyone, said that they would help you keep the peace instead."

>"Dozens," the Pilgrim said.

>"And how many kept their word?"

>"None," the old man tiredly said.

> "And still you want to make bargain with her? The battle's not done, Tariq. It'll get ugly, true enough, and thousands will die. Likely one of us too. But we can still win, and though we'll be a ruin after we'll be a ruin that can recover," the Saint harshly asked. "But if we compromise, here and now? There'll never be any recovering from that. The taint will be in the cause until it runs its course. So why?"

>"Because we are not animals," Tariq softly replied. "Because we do not shy from compromise simply because it has burned us before. Because if we are willing to break armies for a point of theological purity, then that it is us that deserves the breaking. ...

Liliet

Oh, this meme that Catherine herself started in-universe when she did not believe there could possibly not be a catch. She asked the question of “how exactly could this be an assassination attempt?” and lo, it was possible.

That doesn’t mean it actually was one.

And Tariq’s first conversation with Catherine that’s being referred to here, the one at the campfire before any battles, was never referred to with anything like that, and was pretty civil and productive – they discussed what the fuck Crusaders were doing there and what Tariq could and could not do, and agreed on rules of engagement – no angels, no devils and demons, no sacking cities, no torturing prisoners, respecting surrender, etc.

LizAris

Oh there was all kinds of underhanded bullshit happening at that little talk, 100%. Perhaps “happily” was a bit sarcastic, but point being a lot of heroes wouldn’t even sit down. I’m sure saint would’ve been just as happy slicing off Cat’s head and walking away. The thing about Tariq weaving a story for her, is that she can still think her way out of it, and he leaves her room to prove herself. Tariq never WANTED to kill her as a first priority; it almost felt more like a test– if the villain can make her way out of this story, we will either definitely have to kill her or we will work with her. (on the other hand, if she can’t get out of it this kills her anyways.) Ultimately he was open to working with her if that ended up being the better choice.

ninegardens

>You do realise that was him trying to set her up for a redemption narrative where she loses her head at the end of it right?

I’m not sure how far I buy this argument.

For two reasons:

1) The only one who has the “Redemption=murder” in her head is Cat.

2) Cat is pretty much doing EXACTLY the same thing to Akua. And no ones complaining about that.

3) Pretty sure that for Pilgrim, Redemption is the GOAL. Redemption is dangerous and Risky, but he was never TRYING to hurt her. He was trying to redeem her. Even if the net result was the same (Redemption =death), the intention matters. In particular, if she had “redeemed” herself in his eyes, it seems likely that he would take great personal risks to protect her. Its still kind of patronizing, but it is very different to attempted murder.

Frivolous

I don't agree with your idea that the -only- one who thinks "redemption = murder" is Cat. I think Tariq himself believes it.

Quotes here, from Interlude: Death They Cannot Steal and also Interlude: And Pay Your Toll:

It was a bitter irony that the deaths of soldiers had been the balance's harsh swing in his favour yet the true burden he must bear had been of no consequence at all. Catherine Foundling had given the slip to every story that could bind her to an ending, and so left herself only one path: reign eternal, consumed and consuming, a herald of long prices and hard measures having made mantle of the woes of Creation.

—

If there was even a single chance that Catherine Foundling would be the keystone to the death of Calernia, Tariq must ensure it would not come to be. And so now Tariq was forced to countenance this hour of barren deaths, lest a thousandfold worse might be allowed to pass.

—

It was a draw that would take Tariq where he needed to go, arm him with the only blade left that might still be capable of killing Catherine Foundling should it prove necessary.

Analysis: Note the phrasing of 'the only blade left that might still be capable of killing Catherine Foundling'.

To use the word 'left' implies that there have been other blades capable of killing Cat, but there are no more. Redemption is therefore clearly indicated to be the blade he tried to forge earlier, with the intention to kill her.

Therefore Tariq indeed tried to use Redemption = Murder on Cat before.

Agree?

Liliet

"Bind her to and ending" != "kill her", in this context. Remember that heroes die of old age and villains are potentially immortal. A necessary thematic tie exists in-universe between morality and mortality.

And this was a “if I cannot get a way to kill her right now, no-one will ever be able to” situation. Normally “a blade that can kill a person” is anything from heroic sacrifice to time passing. Catherine becoming exempt from one after another was not about previous murder attempts, it was about her previously being mortal, period.

Grey Pilgrim didn't even necessarily need to kill her with the pattern of three, just get a way to do it. MAD doctrine and all.

(...and then Catherine was proven to be 100% not immune to heroic sacrifice after all and there went any residual worries lmao) > depends on them for judgment much in the same way Hanno used to Actually absolutely not. They give him information, but they don't give him decisions, it's the opposite of Hanno's deal if anything. We have one instance of him actually trying to ask them for practical advice (Prince's Graveyard, when he got Catherine's letter of surrender), and all he got was “we trust in you!”

Liliet

Mercy is Extremely Unhelpful in the way exactly proportionate to how active they are in his daily life. Balance and all.

(Hanno, on the other hand, did not have any communication with the Seraphim at all beyond the ‘kill/spare’ answers of his coin)

And yeah, Tariq's the embodiment of grim practicality to the point of being Amadeus's effective mirror in many ways.

mamm0nn

I agree, for all that Tariq might be a good mentor in the traditional sense, he's still a Bestowed that MK will likely defer to in judgement. Once the apprenticeship ends, MK will perhaps be less of an idiot or a defter hand but he'd still be a Bestowed with his ideals and shortsightedness fundamentally there.

He might even be more dangerous because of it, waiting until opportune moments to damn or trouble all evil perceived by him instead of blurting it out immediately. And doing the dance of politics and hierarchy just a bit better to not step on everyone's toes when he makes accusations. However I don't see Pilgrim fix the issues that caused the problem to begin with; in the end MK will probably still be that idiot that sees his ideals and his own sense of justice above everything else with no sense of the broader picture.

If anything, Pilgrim might only make that worse, looking at his own history with Cat and Villains. Being mollified towards a single Villain does not mean being inherently changed in one's teachings.

'Ladi Williams

Especially after said villian beat you all around the continent...then saved your life when your best friends stupidity got you killed while on special ops...

Liliet

> in the end MK will probably still be that idiot that sees his ideals and his own sense of justice above everything else with no sense of the broader picture.

Extremely not seeing that.

Tariq is known among heroes as The Big Picture One, if anyone at all can teach Christophe what he needs to understand about cause and effect and long-term consequences of actions, it's him. It's basically what Mercy is the Choir of, at least at his side.

mamm0nn

Hm, him showing up to invade Callow with Procer after it was liberated from the Wasteland doesn't suggest he's idiot-proof. He would've known the precedent that set, and given his stubbornness afterwards his character as suggested should've waited for a different chance or politically pressured to change the invasion to not be a Proceran invasion under a thin guise.

My point however was that Pilgrim might teach MK a thing or two, but in the end I don't think MK's fundamental problem of being that hero that sees his own ideals and opinion over everyone else's and realistic rules and restrictions to be resolved. If anything, it may even flare up stronger if he no longer feels like an idiot in other areas that tell him he may not know the whole picture. When he encounters something that ruffles his feathers after a year of mentoring, he may just press for something heroic stupid again.

The very issues that led to MK being a problem, I don't see Pilgrim resolve. If not because he'll just teach MK more of the heroic fundamentals that are known to cause the very issues that we saw him cause here, then MK might just be mollified and deferring judgement for a year only to start thinking for himself again after a year. Which doesn't necessarily mean having improved anything during that time.

I know there's no suitable mentors available and Cat is way too busy to do it, but I think MK should've been mentored by a Villain or at least Neutral for a year instead. To hammer it in that his teachings of above are not the only thing out there and when they should be more malleable. A Villain teaching him that not all Villains are complete chaotic evil would be better than a goody Pilgrim trying to teach him rigid restraint.

Liliet

the thing is, even if MK will keep the ability to be a problem in the future, as far as t&t and this war go, Grey Pilgrim can just directly teach him these things. Like he might not be able to teach MK to think right in future complicated situations, but this one right here? Worst case scenario MK's inflexibility gets flipped into defending the t&t and the Black Queen with his life.

mamm0nn

Doubtful. Pilgrim even after all that happened still turned out to be a stubborn old fool that expected Above to get the whole cake at the end of the last book, and with but a single warning not to mess with her Cat set back their whole relationship again because he apparently didn't like 'We're people to, and don't defer to your expectations of Above getting everything, you old sod.'

Don't forget, Pilgrim isn't the wise and practical man that we may remember him as after not having seen him for a while. White Knight is, but Pilgrim is and has consistently remained a flawed fool favouring Above with little realism about the shades of grey.

Liliet

> still turned out to be a stubborn old fool that expected Above to get the whole cake at the end of the last book

Elaborate?

mamm0nn

Ah, last book halfway ending. Chapter 69: Repute. Read from "Well, they were certainly the easiest kind to live up to." onward, though reading the whole chapter may prove better to jog the memory of where you are. How the Pilgrim in his stubborn heroic ways that lay in him the same foundations as MK that led to him inevitably causing conflict with whatever Villain tries diplomacy without deference or subordination.

Liliet

I unfortunately cannot see Pilgrim's logic in that chapter as wrong in any way. I can follow Catherine's if I squint, but he's not wrong.

Cat's indignation over how self-claimed bad people are not treated with automatic trust and respect is...

Well, I didn't like the speech she gave in that chapter. Notably she's 100% not even thought of going through with that threat now that the condition has been triggered. Because it was stupid.

I mean she has a point about how Bard was being an asshole with that "test", but if she gets to say "yeah well they're MY assholes and I trust them even if they're occasionally turds" so does the Pilgrim?

mamm0nn

Much of the issues of this book lie in the way that Heroes do things. They rally people on empty platitudes without a plan for keeping the country or governing it, they strike at what they consider injustice or not good enough without coming up with an alternative themselves, and they allow a lot of evil to fester or even enforce it's continued existence, because it's not Evil but just human corruption or nepotism.

If the Heroes were actually able to carry their message into reality, then sure your argument wouldn't be wrong. But now, Heroes are fallible demigods that see fit to decide the faith of thousands or stick true to their ideals as seen by them even when these are in reality infeasible. Even if they have a Choir on their shoulder, they're still acting as a Judge and Executioner just like the Villains. But unlike the Villains, they believe themselves righteous to keep preaching their own opinion in the name of something higher until they get what they want.

This issue is strong in Grey Pilgrim as well, and his insistence to snuff out or chain the Black Queen went on for much too long given Cat's actions, because of this. No, what made MK falter and be punished here, is present in Pilgrim too. As such, I don't see him teach MK to fix it.

Liliet

Heroes are correct in what they do 90 times out of 100.

The book is focused on the other 10, yes. That doesn't mean heroes are wrong as a whole.

At the time when the Pilgrim was worrying about having a way to kill the Black Queen, the last time he'd seen her (into her) was the time when she had given a killswitch to Vivienne with this exact worry. BECAUSE SHE WAS SLOWLY TURNING INTO AN ERRATIC FAE QUEEN OF ICE AND DEATH AND IT WAS A REASONABLE WORRY. (And she never told Pilgrim about the killswitch, so he didn't exactly have reason to think the issue was being handled already)

TeK

I disagree. Mirror Knight's core ideals and intentions are specifically NOT a problem.

His problem is how he goes about upholding those, as well as a consideration of what is and isn't an effective way to achieve it. I have exactly nothing against someone politely, diplomatically and legally arguing that (this is current MK picture of Red Axe atm) rape victim killing her rapist in the heat of the moment followed being manipulated and coerced into attempting to kill another person is not, in fact, someone deserving a death sentence.

Now is it a pain in the ass to deal with for the protagonist? Absolutely. But a polite, non-violent, diplomatic discussion adhering to the letter of law is ideal even if you vehemently disagree with your opponent.

Really, ironically, just like Saint, what Cristophe needs to learn most is to Listen. To others, to the world and to himself. If he will just get a correct and reasonably full picture in his head, it will solve half his problems. If he will be taught how to address the issues without swinging his sword around, but twice as effectively, it will solve another half. Since Pilgrim is a walking definition of "bigger picture stuff" guy, I can't comprehend your objections. This is quite specifically what he did for his entire life.

I genuinely lold at a bit about putting your ideals above everyone's else's. This is something everyone does, otherwise they wouldn't be called ideals. God damn it dude. Now he will benefit from being more flexible and open-minded, but his ideals are ok. Quite a lot of his crimes is caused by misapplication of his ideals due to ignorance, not a failure of the ideals themselves. But I may be wrong. Can you provide an example of which of his ideals do you consider to be inherently bad? Also why do you think those are his ideals.

Thank you for reading my wall of text regardless.

Salt

> I genuinely lold at a bit about putting your ideals above everyone's else's. This is something everyone does, otherwise they wouldn't be called ideals.

This pretty much sums up my reaction exactly. I mean it's even established in the very first chapter that Named are people who have "The belief, deep down, that they know what is right and that they'll see it done."

Strongly believing that their ideals are more correct than anyone else's is the only defining characteristic of Named in the first place, meaning exact same accusation applies to every single person with a Name who ever existed. This includes the Villains, several of which have already attempted to murder Catherine for power or just reputation.

Its not as if some of the Heroic biases against Villains are actually unjustified either. Catherine outright admitted to herself in this very chapter that her own lot are generally terrible people compared to the Heroes, and that they're just better at hiding their crimes.

Cat hasn't somehow proven everyone wrong, over the years, that Villains are just a bunch of tortured misunderstood souls. It's rather the opposite – being put in charge of managing a bunch of them has made her realize that, yes, most of them actually are a pack of giant assholes. There's a good reason that Catherine has to manages most of Below's lot with fear and threats, while Hanno usually manages Above's by... sitting them all down around a table and reasoning with them, with his typical unsalted mozzarella levels of mildness.

Liliet

> I mean it's even established in the very first chapter that Named are people who have "The belief, deep down, that they know what is right and that they'll see it done."

> Strongly believing that their ideals are more correct than anyone else's is the only defining characteristic of Named in the first place, meaning exact same accusation applies to every single person with a Name who ever existed.

Yes, definitely, all Named ever, especially the babies.

-points finger at Sabah, unsubtly-

There is very specific category of Named who are all about believing they know what's right. It's wide, and yes it includes villains too (hello Fallen Monk, out of the latest set), but it is by no means ALL NAMED.

Amadeus was, er... overgeneralizing.

(I agree with everything you're saying, I just cannot help but nitpick this one)

mamm0nn

As written, neither the rape victim nor the ideals are like that for everyone thing apply to this story.

EE wrote from (White Knight's perspective no less) that MK saw Red more as a similarity to him and that her exoneration would resolve his guilt as well. As well as the whole 'She's a Bestowed, so while we should have the right to kill a dozen Villains you guys are evil for trying to kill a single Hero.' standpoint that MK almost directly preached. I don't recall him even mentioning the specifics of her act and motivation, just that she was a Bestowed and him seeing a plot to kill her with some narrative similarities to him.

Ideals are the most important for a lot of people, but I was talking about the issue that Cat mentioned bitterly before:

"Because that just wasn't how he saw the world in the end, was it? Heroes – the Chosen – were honourable and good, so even us wicked Damned must recognise these qualities and believe in their word when it was given. It was a shade of the same sentiment I'd so deeply despised in Tariq, that bedrock assumption that only the mad and the lost could ever choose anything but service to the Gods Above. It was a way to see the world that simply did not allow for disagreeing equals.”

Chapter 26: Palaver

““I don’t want an apology,” the Red Axe said. “I want all these swords and oaths to be defending something worth defending. You spawned a monster that cares nothing for the past and looks hungrily at the future, Black Queen. Maybe it was the best you could, for all your famous cleverness.”

She laughed, the sound of it bleak to my ear.

“So think of me as the voice Creation uses to say that this is not good enough,” the prisoner said. “Your Truce and Terms will break, and you’ll either do better or be cast aside.”

Just another hero, lighting a torch and declaring it wasn’t enough without ever offering another way. There was an echo of so many I’d faced in that voice, in that castigation. The Lone Swordsman, willing to make our home a wasteland so land as it was our own banner flying above it. The Grey Pilgrim, willing to choose war over peace because it wasn’t the peace he’d wanted. The Saint of Swords, eyes hard as she decided to risk the death of all Iserre rather than compromise. I’d heard this refrain before, sung by different voices or with different words.”

Chapter 29: Conviction

Both of these fit MK to a tee. He is inherently flawed with both of the Guide’s issues regarding heroes: He considers Above to be absolutely good and therefore every shade of grey evil or to bend to his goodness if he speaks about change and morals. And he shouts about what’s wrong and needs to change, without offering a better alternative himself. Both of these lay at the foundations of his flaws and his folly during this book, and both are flaws that Pilgrim still has himself and likely cannot fix even if he didn’t have them. He didn’t fix them in Saint, and only begrudgingly changed his own for Cat and even that to only the mildest degree without doing so sufficiently or equally.

Liliet

The Mirror Knight has never spoken to the Red Axe. He has no idea she’s got ideology about this, he thinks she was tricked into attacking Frederic and killed the Wicked Enchanter in a fit of trauma induced panic or something like that. (That’s also what my first thought was when I heard about the murder, for the record, and the information contradicting that that I’ve received since, Mirror Knight didn’t) There’s no need to mention she’s a rape survivor every time she’s brought up, it’s already what everyone knows. It’s kind of the default background hum to the whole Red Axe thing.

And Catherine's own perspective is not perfectly unbiased, which she knows full well, what with periodically acknowledging that her 'flock' is by and large terrible people, where heroes, well, aren't. She complains periodically about there not being "equality" but well uh yeah there isn't. When one person has committed mass murder and the other hasn't you don't get to cry oppression when the first one is... passed by for opportunities. They aren't exactly discriminating by ethnic origin (admittedly, in the case of Praesi they occasionally might as well be, but that's pretty niche for Proceran and Levantine heroes). They're not even discriminating by religion, though at some point "my religion is Evil" maybe kind of does warrant a sideways look – they're not discriminating against orcs and non-Named Praesi, Catherine's complaining about them being oh so unfair to, uh, VILLAINS. "I've made a pact with dark powers that love murder and betrayal, what, why are you looking at me like that"

Disagreeing equals my ass, and Catherine knows it. She just doesn't care about always being 100% correct, unbiased and accurate in her inner monologue when she's annoyed.

Liliet

thissssss

Lord Haart

MK clearly puts Procerans ahead of others, and denigrates the other nations that are helping to defend Procter. He's not the only nationalist, but he's one of the few who also claim to be on the side of Above.

I have some limited sympathy for his stunted personality but ultimately his issues stem from seeing people as things. Even himself, for that matter.

Hopefully Tariq can cure that. He's probably one of the few who have a real chance to, but even there I have concerns. There's now a parallel with Cat mentoring Razin and the other Blood, and while her influence has been more useful than not, it's only had limited effect and so the same may happen with Tariq and MK.

Liliet

Cat hasn't really been mentoring them, just trying to keep them from getting themselves killed.

Miles

His sentence was a mirror of the prior trial's outcome.

A ruined reputation along with an opportunity most [villains or heroes, respectively] would happily give all their gonads for.

Liliet

lmao yeah

Mental Mouse

Regarding the lightness of the charges against MK... Cat mentions his hanging onto the Severance after the crisis. But, considering his attitude during the trial, can you imagine what he'd have said if someone tried to call him out on that? I think Hanno dodged a bullet (or shoved Cat out of its way) there.

Ninestrings

I'd read a spin off that is just The Grey Pilgrim slowly and painfully beating sense into Christophe over the course of a year.

I doubt The Grey Pilgrim would have the patience that The White Knight has with that idiot.

Laguz24

I don't know, I think GP will go full trickster mentor and die heroically to give MK some needed character development.

dadycoool

That might be a hard sell, considering the Dominion wouldn't like their not-a-king sacrificing himself for a very Proceran Hero. Maybe if it was paired with or led up to a Final Battle or something that would end DK, Bard, or both.

Anomandris

He's already died once and had to be pulled back. Be a shame of a narrative if he dies again without any additional contribution to the story.

Big I

Nah, it'll be Vader vs Obi-Wan Death Star moment.

ninegardens

Yeah, I'm pretty sure that Old Peregrine could single handedly hold back Nessie.

Not beat Nessie, but just straight up hold him off for however long was needed.

Darkening

Especially if he'd already been mortally wounded.

Liliet

Oh any hero can do that.

TeK

Since he technically already had been mortally wounded, does that make him invincible?

Liliet

Factually, yes.

No, not in the villain way. Heroes get a lot of nice perks villains don't.

TeK

I believe Tariq exists in a kind of a Limbo of Heroic tropes. It's not exactly common for elder mentor Hero to survive his Heroic Sacrifice.

Salt

He's Schrodinger's hero. Simultaneously invincible and destined to die a tragic death, until EE decides one way or another.

Liliet

Mhm. Honestly at this point Tariq exists in like. MLP-like trope space where bad things just don't happen full stop and that's that. EVERYTHING is fixable and everything gets fixed.

Mirror Knight is taking a vacation into small children cartoon land and honestly I hope it works exactly the way it would in a kids' cartoon – i.e. he learns something new and internalizes it fully.

Also something something Tariq's regular reports letters to Princess Celestia.

Mental Mouse

Tariq is unkillable until it's the proper time for his Heroic Sacrifice, probably in the same story-league as a Named waiting to finish a Pattern of Three.

Sir Nil

So far so good. Cat is furthering ties to Levant, MK gets a suitable slap on the hand while GP gets another Laurence to reminisce with, and Hasenbach is giving ground on the angel corpse. Unfortunately, this is all probably to contrast with when we finally get to the trial of the Red Axe.

'Ladi Williams

Unfortunately

Halinn

The first trial was a clear win for Cat. This one had a neutral outcome...

Miles

Not really.

First of all there was no fire.

Lord Haart

That would be a good outcome though, right?

dadycool

Gonna need a broom for the rubble that once was a bunch of pedestals, on Cordelia's part. It's just been thrown in her face that the Bestowed consider their own judgement to be higher than the laws of the land, to the point of ignoring/blowing off the law. I bet she's got a black eye from that.

It's cool how well Cat fits in with Yannu and the Dominion. The dinner was also a nice way to remind us that Cordelia is in fact a Warrior Queen of sorts, even if her hands are more used to silk than steel nowadays.

Liliet

Pretty sure she knew this already, Saint of Swords existing and all.

She just didn't love the reminder.

And hell yeah, the "I can hold a wall" moment was awesome.

The Lycaonese, the Levantines and the Callowans have a few things to bond over :3

Salt

Callowan and Levantine cultures are very, very complementary now that I think about it.

They're both traditionally good, culturally martial nations who have an isolationist national policy and have made a history of fighting off invasion from ridiculously expansionist neighbors. The Dominion has duels with giant monsters as a pastime, and Callow is so militarized in culture that they hardly have artwork of anything but war and hunting.

If anything, a Levantine and a Callowan would likely instantly bond over their mutual searing hatred of treacherous, backstabbing invaders.

Liliet

Meanwhile, Lycaonese and Callowans can instantly bond over the "yep, Evil is coming again, time to march to the wall protecting the backstabbing asshole neighbours who're ignoring it again".

Lycaonese and Levantines... have less in common, as their martial-ness is almost exactly opposite in nature (with Callowans somewhat in the middle – they have both glorious knight charges and 'down here in the mud' lionized in their culture). Still both martial though.

TeK

In a delicious twist of irony, those are also cultures that saw itself on different sides of Crusades IRL. Not that I would imply that Levantine culture was actually inspired by Levantine cultures. Since it is also heavily takes from Iberia to arrive somewhere about Al-Andalus. Which makes both of those cultures mutual invaders over the course of history. As well as invadees. Is that a word?

Liliet

It is now.

Anomandris

A Hero who is almost fanatical in dislike for Villains and working with/under the Pilgrim? Where have I heard that before??

Lord Haart

Oh, good point – MK might go off the rails when he hears more about what happened SoS.

Definitely not a low chance of him having a real go at Cat, if he continues to follow after Laurence. There's a good story backing him there too – hero coming back to kill the villain who killed their idol, amplified by the fact that the Severance was enabled and fashioned by Cat's directive – Villains always sow the seeds of their own destruction.

I'd go so far as to say that if Cat dies (again) in this story, it'll be after surviving beating Bard and DK only to wind up with Christophe turning the blade on her.

Salt

I think unlikely, since Mercy tossed around visions of the events to random people like a flower girl tossing petals at a wedding. One of the recurring visions was the climax, including Catherine killing the Saint, so I suspect pretty much everyone on the continent has a good idea of how she died. It was mentioned in Rozala's POV, when she was having a minor headache because the Ophanim apparently didn't give a shit about putting the visions in the right order before handing them out.

I suspect that part of the reason the Mirror Knight is so hostile to Cat in the first place is because he knows that she killed the Saint. If anything, it might mollify him a bit to learn that it was a lot more complicated than the initial portrayal of a treacherous villain slaying a great hero.

Liliet

The initial portrayal wasn't exactly that – the Ophanim didn't care about putting visions in the right order, but they did care about getting across the idea that the Black Queen did nothing wrong (on that particular morning).

boballab

Taking odds that the Mirror Knight does something stupid at the Red Axe's trial!

dadycool

Would he be there? He wasn't a witness in anything, nor can he provide evidence for anything. It's possible he'll gatecrash or something, but don't they have defenses against that sort of thing?

boballab

Go back and look at what it took for the White Knight to stop him, the Mirror Knight as explained is pretty much impervious to magic. You basically have to wear him down physically which means that very few things can stop him...guards and wards ain't those things. So yes I do expect him to crash the trial because as shown in his own trial he still believes his judgement is better than everyone else's. He has a hair up his butt, planted there by his lover, that Cat and the villains are going to kill the Axe for killing her rapist.. which the villains were not going to do because they thought he had it coming to him. The problem is going to be that the Red Axe tried to kill the Kingfisher Prince and the Mirror Knight hasn't even let that penetrate his skull yet, let alone think on the consequences of that. His crashing the trial trying to "save" the Axe is going to push Cordelia over the edge since it will be the last straw in her mind that the Hero's can't be trusted.

hakureireimu

Without Severance his offensive power aren't that great to be honest.

Liliet

> a hair up his butt, planted there by his lover, that Cat and the villains are going to kill the Axe for killing her rapist

No, he received a letter supposedly from the Bitter Blacksmith, who didn't send it. His lover is not involved in this one.

Mental Mouse

Also it's Cordelia (MK's national ruler) who actually wants to kill Red Axe. The thing is, the whole business with that confrontation in the hallway is fishy as hell. But Frederic and RA are at least going to get the chance to compare stories at the trial, and who know what might come out of that? (And of course, this installment, the climax of the arc, is late.... Arggh!)

'Ladi Williams

Nah. That bro is still under lock and key. He ain't gate crashing anything anytime soon.

Liliet

I expect he'll still be under arrest at that point.

boballab

He's not under arrest. Hanno didn't place him in a cell after the trial, he ordered that he has to apologize and serve an apprenticeship, the 30 day confinement was turned down by Cat.

Liliet

Prison and arrest are not the same thing. He was kept under guard since Hanno beat him down, Cat was also thinking she's not sure whether she should trust the security of what guard Hanno would place him under – but ultimately she did decide to trust in it.

Not being required to serve a prison sentence and being free to go wherever you like are not the same thing. Christophe's going to have minders around him until he gets to the Pilgrim.

Burlyraven

If Yannu wasn't known to be extremely honorable, I'd almost find his cooperation to be suspicious. It makes a lot of sense, but the number of motivations they have in common or at least in parallel are surprisingly high.

Also, Grey Pilgrim mentoring Mirror Knight shares a lot of similarities to some very intriguing stories, and not all of them involve the Mirror Knight becoming a better man. Hell, with the power and arrogance he's shown, it could even involve him pulling an Anakin and falling to the dark side. It's be fascinating to see how Cat would handle that.

erebus42

Do you mean fall as in go rogue but still remain a Hero or fall as in become a Villain? The latter could potentially lead to some amusing scenarios like Cat just wanting nothing to do with him but now having to work closer with him or the MK just refusing to acknowledge that he wasn't a Hero anymore.

"Cristoph, you can't even summon Light anymore!"

"Shut up you filthy Damned! I haven't fallen, all of you have fallen!"

Burlyraven

I mean the go full Villain route when he realizes the Heavens have too many rules. And yes, all the resulting comedy you mentioned.

TeK

I am the Heavens!

IDKWhoitis

The blood flowed away from the body, soaking the wooden floors. Christophe felt so tired, he felt as if his spirit had fallen far beyond what should have been possible. It felt like that day he recieved his Bestowal by the Dames of the Lake. He could barely even remember that day.

His shield cracked, his face a ruin, Christoph despised the reflection of himself. He had failed. Even when the heavens should have seen fit to support his cause and lend their power, they had failed him.

No, the thought had sickened him, for he had failed his oaths prior to that. His face felt hot with indignation. Then cooled in a moment as that sinking feeling returned that left him a hollow thing. Had the heavens forsaken him? Was he truly alone in this world? He had done everything within his might to make the world a better place. Whether it be opposing the Dead King and all his works, or even striking at the worst within his own ranks. How could the heavens not see the necessity in striking at the grasping devils pretending to be Princes of Prócer? They had lied and betrayed, poison to all they touched. When it was revealed to him that he had been made a fool of, to be turned into some tool for Gaspard Langevin machinations, he could not stop himself.

His thoughts were interrupted by the sound of armored boots walking towards him, with a match being struck.

IDKWhoitis

I mean, if he falls, its likely that it's because he can't accept the will of heaven as the only reason to do things. This can still mean he is self centered and thinks very highly of what he thinks needs to be done.

Of which, might make him a liability in Cat's eyes, who will break him if she can't use him.

Lord Haart

Hm. Probably too extreme, but maybe Yannu thinks he can "hack" the Ealanel to destroy most of Procer (and Keter) but leave Levant untouched?

Still seems unlikely as he'd have to know Cat would likely figure it out and come after him.

Or maybe he's working WITH DK and his anger at treason is just projection?

Liliet

Actually he's just Malicia's necromantic puppet, duh.

Frivolous

I'm surprised that Yannu is clean shaven. I don't remember reading that before.

I wonder if Levantine men are hairy chested or smooth.

I'm truly shocked that the Murcadan language has a word for the angel corpse. The only way that could happen, I believe, is if angels have been killed before in or around Levant, or else why have a word for their corpses?

Traitorous and Triumphant may have been the only Praesi to have killed angels before, but maybe the Levantines have killed more angels than the Praesi.

Ending of MK's trial was rather anticlimactic, compared to Catherine's heatedly saying she'd get down in the mud to solve Cordelia's political problems with the princes. After mention was made of Cordy and Freddy's desperation, I thought that the crisis was a lot closer in time than this episode of Tantamount shows.

Either way, Hanno chose wisely the punishment for Christophe. Tariq will be good for him. Unless Christophe decides to kill Tariq for being an undead abomination, anyway, but Tariq will Behold any attack coming.

I'm very surprised Christophe didn't mouth off more than he did at the Hero meeting. He was bizarrely meek, compared to all the rest of the times. He didn't even declare Catherine a corrupt monster and the Grand Alliance disgusting for associating with her. Why did he pick this time of all times to be polite?

Liliet

> I'm truly shocked that the Murcadan language has a word for the angel corpse. The only way that could happen, I believe, is if angels have been killed before in or around Levant, or else why have a word for their corpses?

Or they could simply have word creation rules / traditions that play nice with combining 'dead angel' into one word without even thinking about it.

Honestly, considering their consistent and reliable necromantic troubles, I wouldn't be surprised if all three of their languages had a simple suffix/prefix for "-dead body of, being used for some purpose".

I also expect the connotation to be less than pleasant, for Hasenbach.

Liliet

As for how close the crisis is, keep in mind this is a setting where travel takes weeks or months – less than that through Twilight, but that's new, and everyone's thinking will be tuned to "if the crisis is looming in half a year, if you want to be in a specific place when it hits, you had better set out right now".

LizAris

Not sure if it was politeness so much as coming a little closer to the realization that

- 1) he done fucked up (even if he believes the intentions were still good) and
- 2) he's in the presence of his queen, and in that process
- 3) he lost THE sword, is prob feeling a little rough about that and what it means if he couldn't wield it well enough (aka he's not the hero that artifact needed) to not get his ass handed to him by White

Salt

Considering that his POV chapters showed a disturbing amount of self-hate for his own mistakes/failings, his latest monumental mistake is probably causing him to be too busy despising himself to work up any zeal.

Liliet

Yup.

Bonus points if he picked up on how he was about to accidentally cause deaths of both Sidonia and Antoine if Hanno hadn't given up half his hand to stop that.

That's... a pretty significant narrative detail, too: Hanno did not lose his fingers to Christophe attacking him, he lost his fingers to stopping Christophe from accidentally causing damage to his own loved ones.

If Christophe realized what was going on, that's going to be a deeeeeep well he's down right now.

TeK

Judging by his reactions to the trial (or rather, a lack of those), I'd say he's pretty deep.

Liliet

Yeah, at some point the difference between 20m deep and 80m deep just stops being visible...

erebus42

You know the late Exalted Poet and Tariq in less reasonable moments aside, I do rather enjoy the Levantines. Their whole honor thing can be a bit much sometimes, especially when they murder each other unnecessarily over it, but even it can be a bit charming in the right situations. Granted having the Procerans to contrast against certainly helps. Also, while a bit limited, their whole binding trick is super cool. I really kinda hope we get introduced to a cool named binder (preferably someone without their head too far up their own ass).

Liliet

Yeah it's really nice how both Procerans and Levantines can make each other's customs look better by contrast XD

Liliet

Well, this was pleasantly common-sense and quick. And looks like Mirror Knight 100% learned his lesson about himself being a fucking idiot who should not be trusted with sharp objects around other people.

I'm scared of the Red Axe trial already.

Really loved the Levantine politics bits. Yannu is still highly unpleasant to me, but he's definitely an excellent coworker for Catherine – straightforward enough to mean exactly what he says without the headaches she gets in decyphering reasons behind Cordelia's displays of emotion, tricky enough to understand and respect her methods, respects and trusts her personally thanks to Tariq, generally aligned on long-term political prospects...

And Cordelia the warrior princess, even if she's not had the time to practice in probably a looong time)=

Salt

Yeah, the cleaner the other two trials go the more worried I get about the last one

Not to mention that we're not getting any clearer foreshadowing of a shitstorm inbound, than Catherine literally commenting about how she senses a storm coming

Liliet

Of course we've got a lot of plot incoming and only so much screentime with this being the last book. The storm might be the war council / Gigantes negotiations / whatever the elves are up to, not the last trial per se?

Salt

Might be, not entirely sure. The Red Axe trial has been a focal point for so many chapters that I'm near certain it'll quite important, if not necessarily overly long, but aside from that I haven't picked up on enough hints to have ideas of how the stuff afterwards will go.

Then again, the books have been getting longer with every volume, so if the same trend continues, we're due another 60 or so chapter before the end anyhow. It's not as if anyone will complain about the volume being too long – anyone who's spent the kind of time needed to read five volumes is going to be so invested already that they'll care far more about the series being given a proper ending than the number of chapters a volume is supposed to have.

Oshi

I'm genuinely scared about how smoothly this is all going. Too much of this can turn on the Red Axe's trial.

LizAris

Already anxious about Red's trial (given Cat's luck these things have gone entirely too well so far), so instead for our next chapter, I propose that Hakram wakes up (damn do I miss orcs) and we get a play by play of our First Prince showing off her martial skill. Can you imagine Cat having "swords and a chat" with Cordy instead of Fred??

Liliet

That was 100% stuck in my head when I was reading – an idea of Catheirne offering to tutor Cordelia in swordsmanship.

She has pretty valuable skills to share, after all...

mamm0nn

Cat and Cordelia showing up on the Kingfisher's doorstep and invite him for some 'sword practice'

Kingfisher: Oh, we're actually practising with swords. And why is my queen holding a bow instead of a blade? Why are you two smiling at me so viciously? If I may excuse myself, I think I'll- Eep!

James Felling

Cat more or less won the first trial, drew the second, and now the third.

I am not optimistic about the third in that pattern.

Lord Haart

At this stage I'm pretty sure that Hanno will not allow Red Ace to be executed – maybe sent to the front lines as a more practical death sentence, but not outright killed for her acts.

The first two trials, he very clearly pushed for the precedent that breaking the T&T should result in the accused having their reputation tarnished, and then putting them in a position where they are both useful and no longer likely to be a threat. Both very PRACTICAL sentences, for a Knight of Judgement.

And he tells MK he will execute Red Axe not because he means it (he does not discuss sentencing, right?) but because he needs MK to understand that Hanno might very well “be in his way” and he needs to learn to accept that.

Salt

He did discuss specifically that he will sentence her, and that the sentence will almost certainly be death

“After a trial is held,” the White Knight calmly replied. “After I listen to the evidence, determine guilt, pass my sentence and carry it out. Which will be, almost certainly, death. That she killed the Wicked Enchanter and attempted to kill the Kingfisher Prince is not in doubt, it is established fact.”

“Almost certainly” as he’s deliberately refusing to decide on a sentence until he’s heard all the evidence and arguments during the actual proper trial.

There is some possibility of new evidence or argument that sways the sentence away from death – which is why he’s only speaking in likelihood’s about sentencing – but I think it’s a poor argument to assume that the character really means exactly the opposite of everything that he’s said, to be honest.

Mental Mouse

> There is some possibility of new evidence or argument ...

And that’s the possible bomb in the toilet. As I said upthread, that whole corridor scene was fishy as hell even allowing for the Hunted Magician’s illusions. And now Frederick and Red Axe get to compare stories.

Juff

Typo Thread:

she'd standing > she's standing
Designs have made > Designs have been made

Adrian V

Honestly i am not sure how to feel about MK sentence, on one hand i know he can grow up under Tariq, but on the other he already made a big mess and i feel liek this is coming too late (as in seriously they should have paired them together for some assignement or something).

Rest of the chapter was ok, is nice that at least the angel corpse problem is being handled so fast. Next is the last trial, so we know something is going to go FUBAR, seriously they should know to not let that one for last, is like asking fate to be dramatic!!

Oh and Cat still hasn't shared the visions from the Drow battlefront right? i want to see the general reaction to that one, like "We must stop that idiot prince from fucking us all up"

Liliet

Fate's going to be dramatic no matter what they do, they might as well hold the reins.

And I think everyone important already is thinking that. Yannu has very good reasons to be cross besides: Procer double crossing allies has rich and varied history, and LEVANT IS ONE OF THE ALLIES SUPPORTING IT RIGHT NOW. Not to be subtle about it, but he's got personal offense to take to that.

Adrian V

I think he is going to be more "Fuck subtle" about it xD, procer really needs to be slapped in the face about it so they stop and notice shit is real.

Liliet

Oh, Rozala and Cordelia have noticed.

Oshi

I'm really surprised at how pressed they are. Under normal circumstances I think Rozala or Cordelia would have just killed off the Prince or found a way to break him. This is the most unstable scheming I have ever seen...

Liliet

You cannot just kill a Prince in Procer. Unstable scheming is what its whole thing is, Ebb and Flow is called that for a reason.

Konstantin von Karstein

Hanno just sentenced the Grey Pilgrim to death. A difficult, impulsive and thoughtless pupil taught by an old mentor? The Mirror Knight will probably do something extremely stupid, Tariq will sacrifice himself to stop the catastrophe it caused and Christophe will learn his lessons while crying on the Pilgrim's corpse.

Liliet

...well, he definitely didn't help Tariq's odds for living through this war, yeah.

That said, Tariq was already not planning to, and he's 80+ at the very least...

vernal.ancient

Ordinarily, yes. But Tariq's whole thing is that he survives the mentor role where others would be killed. Personally, I think he'd pull a master Shifu: looks like he's dying, Christophe rushes to his side, begins to cry, and then... "I'm not dead, you idiot! Do you know how exhausting it is to use all my aspects at my age? Quit blubbering and let me sleep!"

Konstantin von Karstein

Yeah, but here it's a long-term mentorship, when before it was only small actions.

Mental Mouse

And what happens to the sentence when Pilgrim is dead?

Konstantin von Karstein

What?

Konstantin von Karstein

The death of the GP will probably be enough to make MK achieve his character growth, and anything that can kill Tariq is bound to be very bad news. So MK will destroy it in his righteous fury and grief, helping the GA very much. The sentence will probably be annulled.

Mental Mouse

> anything that can kill Tariq is bound to be very bad news.

Unfortunately, "MK's stupidity" is high on that list.

> The sentence will probably be annulled.

Even if Tariq's Mentor Sacrifice was for MK's sake in the first place?

Konstantin von Karstein

MK's stupidity alone could not kill Tariq, it would have to use a « proxy » to do it, and said proxy has to be quite dangerous.

MK will have been changed by Tariq's sacrifice, so the sentence will not be necessary (at least I think so).

Lord Haart

What if MK kills him as vengeance for SoS? Tariq was at least partly responsible there, remember Bard making him pause before he could stop her from damaging the crown?

Liliet

...where is this whole "MK is a fan of SoS" thing coming from? The only thing they have in common is being inconvenient for Catherine, and being somehow narratively related to the Severance.

kinghaart

Well, that (Severance) is a pretty strong link – magical swords (or items in general) pushing their owner's personalities into their wielders is a very, very old and established trope.

From the time he first sets foot in the Arsenal, MK acts and talks just like SoS. He may have no personal connection but a very strong ideological one.

I'm kind of thinking it's like Ben Solo looking at Vader's helmet. Never met the guy but the influence is profound.

Liliet

The only thing connecting their ideologies is "be a prick to villains", and not even in the same way. "Gets in the protagonist's way" is not an ideological link.

Saint was completely cynical and did not believe anything like this could work. MK is overwhelmingly idealistic and thinks of structures around him as universally enduring that will hold no matter what he does.

Saint was mildly sympathetic towards Catherine and understood her increasingly well (the distrust was more towards her story and influences she was under than towards her personally), but had absolutely no intention of turning sympathy into politeness – with no intention of insult either, she just talks like that. MK sees Catherine as a mysteriously ominous blob of evil plans but makes an effort to be polite until he doesn't, which is fully intended as a deliberate insult.

Saint took practicality to matter above all, just had her own opinion of which means which lead to which ends. MK thinks things will sort themselves out as long as every individual decision is “the next right thing”.

Saint's whole problem was excessive experience with a particular class of problem making her set in her ways. MK's whole problem is overwhelming ignorance and inexperience.

They're more like opposites than anything.

Jack Reader

Wait, is it possible that wielding the Severance in the first place is what made Mirror Knight act so brashly? Not that he wasn't an opinionated idiot before, but he was self-aware enough that he tended not to challenge more experienced heroes over it. Sure, having a sword of infinite murder is probably enough to get MK feeling bold, but what if there is some sort of mental bleed effect with Laurence's personality when wielding the sword? Cat already told us that there's enough Laurence left in the blade for it to hate her, so maybe MK's insistence that the Black Queen needed to die and it needed to be now was Laurence metaphorically whispering in his ear. That might explain why he was so meek at the trial, after being striped off the blade.

Frivolous

The following is half serious, half facetious:

I do agree that the Severance might have been a factor in Christophe's personality change, but I think it's more primal and simple than Laurence's spirit altering said personality.

I think that wielding a mighty unstoppable expensive big sword made Christophe feel that his dick was bigger, and thus he would win any dick-measuring contest. Which of course made him Alpha Hero.

In contrast, losing the Severance to another man, a man who never even drew his sword, may have caused him to feel his dick was really tiny, and thus he became meek and ready to wear an Alamans maid outfit and serve tea.

The above may sound amusing, and I meant to entertain, but it may truly be simple as that. If Christophe somehow got his hand on the sword again in the near future, I think he'd revert right back.

Salt

I think similarly, but that it had less to do with alpha masculinity so much as delusion that a magic sword was heavens-mandated proof that he was Worthy. I believe it was Hanno(?) who once called him "genuinely unambitious", but we all know he has a major boner for virtue and worthiness and all that jazz.

When he got the sword I wouldn't be surprised if he took it as some Above-gilded appointment that he's right about everything and is destined for greater things, while losing the sword was interpreted as some sort of proof/punishment from Above for being a total disappointment of a Chosen.

Mental Mouse

Also, the oath he did break came back to bite him hard in his next big battle.

Liliet

Note: Laurence did not die thinking Catherine needed to die. That's kind of how Catherine survived that fight, object level.

PinkUnik0rn

I am really starting to miss the time when Catherine approach on politics and diplomacy was a fucking arrow through the head or ripping soul out of somebody. I know characters evolve and shit.. But I still hold a tiny bit of hope that she will put a fucking blade on her staff and show them why she is the Black Queen. (First pin someone to the wall, than interrogate.) I am afraid that continuing by this path, her name will be some utopist bullshit like The Equalizer, the first hero/villain, and her first aspect will be Bore to death. No disrespect. I love the story, will support the author and keep on reading it, just fucking miss the "Cat vs. the World" action.

magesbe

One of the story's major themes is that no, power cannot solve all of your problems. There's a quote from Book 4 in one of the last chapters, when Sve Noc was putting Cat through illusions of her past to get a better read on her.

> "You have the power to make changes now," the orc said. "Real changes. Necessary ones."

"Do I?" I said. "I could drown bastion in ice with a snap of my fingers, but what does that accomplish? So few of our problems can be solved with strength."

That hasn't changed. This was one of Cat's most important moments of character development. Learning that Might does not make Right, that having a big stick often cannot solve your problems. That Justifications Matter Only to the Just was a terrible motto to have.

If you want Cat to start beating politicians up and taking names, I'm afraid that you're reading the wrong story, because that's not what this story is about anymore.

Catherine is hardly toothless of course. When violence is the right solution she will use it without hesitation. But often, even usually, it's not.

Salt

Very on-point analysis, especially since that kind of brute-force solution for every problem is the hallmark of people like the Saint and the current Mirror Knight – who are often criticized for rather justifiable reasons.

Where Cat is now as a character has actually been blatantly foreshadowed starting as far back as book 2. Building up to this has been a running theme since the very beginning, with one of her early lessons being that trying to kill every liability made for poor solutions.

Quote from the Squire during the battle of Marchford (ch 26, Seek), who at the time hadn't even popped her third Aspect yet:

> "And what's your solution?" I mocked. "Let's kill everything that looks like it could be a liability and hope it turns out for the best?"

> "I already told you how we stop the fires in our backyard," the spirit smiled. "We cross the Vales, with a torch in hand. If everyone else is running from the blaze they're not making trouble for us."

> This is why Evil loses, I realized. By overreaching, by thinking you could put all of Calernia on the the defensive and not be buried by the backlash. There had to be a middle way, one between fighting the Praesi and allowing them to plunder Callow. Black understood this, I knew. He'd marginalized the nobles of the former Kingdom and gone to work on the people themselves, tried to remove any reason for rebellion rather than crush those that formed. I couldn't change Callow, I knew that deep down. I wasn't sure I should. But I could change the system that ruled over it, one victory at a time.

Lord Haart

Wow, didn't realize how directly Black's rampage through Iserre was foreshadowed!

Which makes it even more interesting that she goes on to say that he understood why that wouldn't work. And he did, but he did it anyway – almost a mix of a heroic sacrifice to buy time for those he cared about (Cat and Malicia) and also because he was cut loose by the same people.

Does anyone else think that Black isn't in Praes at all? I feel like Ranger in particular wouldn't sit back for 2 years. IMO they are planning something bigger. Like going after the Elves, or maybe off-continent (though that'd be a bit of a cop-out since it's not really foreshadowed).

Salt

That bit about him sacrificing himself for Cat seems quite correct, although never explicitly admitted to. He thought he only had a year or two left to live, after his loss to the White Knight didn't start a pattern of three. He was (at the time) actively trying to clear away as many problems as possible before his "death".

We also know that Black outright admitted to Grem that it was suicide before going ahead with it – in Red the Flowers he commented that "No villain can survive the amount of heroic focus Bonfire would have brought. The initial stages would have been a success, but within a few months a band of heroes specifically geared towards killing her would have been grown or assembled."

Which is pretty much exactly what happened to him, with a few months of huge success before being utterly defeated and captured by the Pilgrim.

Of course we know now that what ended up happening was the death of the Amadeus as the Black Knight rather than Amadeus the person, but at the time it was quite likely he stepped past the flower vases knowing he would probably return a corpse.

Liliet

Mhm. Amadeus's reaction to Captain's death and Malicia's revealed betrayal was to try to talk Cat into killing him, and I doubt that sentiment would have faded in half a year of stewing in a fortress when it'd been built up to by... since... well, he'd expected getting a Squire to kill him since he took one, so... yeah.

Obviously it'd take a form of heroic villainous sacrifice, Amadeus isn't so selfish as to try and take his own life without it bringing sizable benefits to people he cares about and also his people as a whole!

This whole post might sound like a joke, and yet this is 100% canon Guide text.

Liliet

Actually it was a thing as far as Book 1, where

- 1) Catherine did not intend to become a hero because a violent rebellion would accomplish zilch all useful
- 2) Catherine rejected her Evil Twin in the Name vision

PinkUnik0rn

I understand and I said that I'll keep trading it. I am not a total moron, but in last big battle our antihero just left the action. It was interesting, that battle of wits with intercessor, but my point is that it is like reading a comic but about Batman, who spends his time fighting crime by being diplomatic Bruce Wayne. I miss the action, love the story.

Mental Mouse

Sometimes Bruce Wayne or Clark Kent can solve problems that their costumed alter-egos simply can't fight. And the battle with Intercessor was a distillation of Cat's story-fu powers – we've seen those developing over the previous books – now they are fully developed, and the basis for Cat to be a badass on a level beyond any bruiser or sorcerer.

gingerlygrump

What if Cat is turning into The Practical Guide to Evil? We've watched her grow and mature into a brilliant, scheming tactician and leader who's bringing Villains to the table as true equals.

If you want flash and bang and evil Cat, you'll have to reread the books of her teenaged years. She's an adult now, making adult decisions.

Mental Mouse

Well, she did end that card game by cutting her opponent's throat. 😊

ohJohN

In two sentences, Cat drops "Bestowed", "ealamal", and "honourable". Either she's become suddenly infatuated with Levantine culture, or she's rubbing Cordelia's nose in their alliance against her.

Yannu getting genuinely upset at the scheming prince eased some vague background plot tension in my head, and it took me a minute to place why: the Crows were, uh, real pissed, getting close to intervening (likely in a politically disastrous fashion), and starting to reconsider their general relationship with humans. If they can't see this scene directly through Cat (given the pocket dimension) she can play it for them later, and maybe some evidence that Levant genuinely respects their alliance and has their back will help mend that rift. It kinda got lost under the mountain of more immediate problems, but keeping the drow – the Alliance's advance force bearing the brunt of the casualties – and Sve Noc – the only godhead on their side and Cat's personal benefactors – happy is really damn important. For both the war itself, and any chance at continental stability afterwards. Hopefully this buys humans some goodwill, and buys Cat some time to mud-wrestle the House of Langevin into submission.

Liliet

> Either she's become suddenly infatuated with Levantine culture, or she's rubbing Cordelia's nose in their alliance against her.

Ooh nice, I only picked up on the 'ealamal' thing and assumed it was Catherine picking up the word because it's more convenient than two words.

Bless this code-switching nerd some evidence that Levant genuinely respects their alliance and has their back

Oh it's a bit more than that: Levant and the Empire Ever Dark are in the exact same situation right now. They're Procer's allies committing resources to help it out in its hour of need.

Red Ella has already demonstrated that Levantines don't see a big difference between giving one's word to a villain and to a hero as far as implications for one's honor go. And they're kind of... on the honor system here.

It's beautiful is what it is. Crows should be watching and learning how surface politics work!

Mental Mouse

> In two sentences, Cat drops "Bestowed", "ealamal", and "honourable". Either she's become suddenly infatuated with Levantine culture, or she's rubbing Cordelia's nose in their alliance against her.

On consideration, I suspect there's also a strong hint here of deferring to Yanno –or at least making it clear that this isn't just Cat recruiting Yanno to back her up, but both of them having a stake in the matter.

Letouriste

the lack of Black in this book is starting to pain me a little, i'm deadly curious about what is happening in Praes right now.

Lord Haart

Why do you think he's in Praes? That's where Bard wanted him, and he thought that story was a mistake.

beleester

We last saw him heading east while singing "The Girl who Climbed the Tower," which implies that he's a claimant for the name of Dread Emperor.

kinghaart

Definitely implied. But I also can't imagine that he'd be able to convince Ranger to keep a low profile for 2 years.

Could he have headed to the Golden Bloom to find the Elves for some reason?

What about the Free Cities, where he could cause chaos for Malicia and block her schemes?

Something still bugs me that it's not "the Boy who climbed the Tower" for him – if he grew into power alone, that's one thing, but for his whole life so far "the Girl" was Malicia, and recently perhaps Cat. Has that truly changed?

Also, I want to know where Scribe and Assassin are. I'm concerned that Assassin is loyal to Malicia, though I suspect that if Black isn't behind Sepulchral then Scribe is (who after all hates Malicia, presumably even after her dismissal).

Liliet

When a proper schemer wants someone somewhere, they make sure doing anything other than that is the worse mistake.

onedollargum

"The fare was simple but tasty: slices of dried pork ham, a mix of beans, chickpeas and eggs touched with spices and oil, good white bread with some sort of tomato paste"

That sounds sooo good!

Mental Mouse

Oh yes, a perfect summer meal.

Chapter 39: Transliteration

"A sinking ship knows no captain."
– Ashuran saying

I wondered if Hasenbach was getting as tired of this as I was.

Probably not. Ruling in Procer involved a lot more wrangling than it did in Callow, or at least the Callow I'd risen to rule – one where most great nobles had been stripped of their lands, and the armies of all but the crown had been severely curtailed. Outside her own Rhenia, the First Prince of Procer's authority had rarely ran further than what she could sway others to grant her. Which must have made it all the more galling that, after years of staying one step ahead of her opponents at home and abroad, she was now getting cornered again and again by a bunch of yokels with swords. I supposed if I'd been fuller of myself than I was I might have started to believe that Hasenbach was losing her touch, or that I was a fine schemer indeed.

I was not so deluded, thank the Gods. The First Prince was being forced to give ground again and again because the Principate was collapsing under her, not because she'd proved to be blind or a fool. The crushing pressures within her realm were simultaneously forcing her to take unwise stands – like trying to claim the Red Axe – while robbing her of the clout that a First Prince with Procer firmly behind her would be able to wield. It was a deathly downwards spiral I'd begun to glimpse, one where to keep her head above the water she had to risk ever taller waves and even one grave misstep might be enough to see her drown.

Still, she was not the only one who had demands made of her. There were matters I could not compromise over.

Trying to keep to that while preventing Procer from bursting open like an overripe fruit was why I'd sought Cordelia Hasenbach out for a private audience and insisted that the White Knight come along. Hanno's dedication to trials under the Terms being treated as genuine exercises of justice was laudable, if occasionally inconvenient, but even he knew that worrying too much about appearances when the hour of need was upon us could only be a recipe for disaster. And so the White Knight had agreed to discuss the upcoming trial of the Red Axe, if not her sentencing, and to try to find a compromise with the First Prince. He was a reasonable man; it'd not been hard to exact that promise from him.

But I also knew that, like all Named, Hanno of Arwad would have lines that his very nature would not let him cross. Hasenbach and I, ultimately, were practical creatures. Our lines were born of practical concerns, either the feasibility of the Liesse Accords or the salvation of the Principate. The White Knight, on the other hand, was a principled man. The lines he would refuse to cross were moral ones, and while I could not find it in me to look down on that neither would I pretend that it did not make him unpredictable to deal with.

"This is nostalgic," Hanno smilingly said, setting down his cup of tea. "I've not had this brew since I was a boy."

Oh, good. Then if I got lucky I might never again have to force a smile after having a sip of this stuff. Even the Firstborn made better tea, and their version of it involved no leaves as well as more fluorescent snails than anyone should be comfortable with.

"I have an appreciation for Ashuran leaves," the First Prince smiled back. "Though I will confess this particular sort was tricky to obtain."

"I don't doubt it," Hanno snorted. "Few Ashuran merchants would willingly sell copper tea. It's not a true leaf, you see. They make from the leftovers and low-quality batches of harvests that can be sold abroad."

"Even your copper tea would sell for more than its weight in gold, back home," I shrugged. "Luxury is in the eye of the beholder."

While by the look on his face I suspected that Hanno would have genuinely enjoyed a conversation about this, it wasn't what we'd come for and so after a few more courtesies the cups went down – mine only lightly touching my lips once more out of politeness, though I did not actually drink – and we got to business.

"Neither of us is blind to the damage the Red Axe's trial could wreak on the Principate," I calmly said. "And no one wants the situation to get out of hand. We're looking into way to mitigate the issue."

I wouldn't back giving the heroine to the Highest Assembly to try, even the series of recent diplomatic reverses Procer had suffered weren't enough to get me to consider such a thing, but I'd meant it when I'd told Hanno that Hasenbach needed to be given something. The question now was what she could safely be given, and while I had my own notion of what that compromise might look like it would be... contentious. I wasn't sure either Procer or the heroes would go for it. Better to let Hasenbach out one of the contingency plans I did not doubt she had up her sleeve. The First Prince's glance at the White Knight was measuring, in the heartbeat of silence that followed.

"The Terms cannot be twisted or turned aside," the dark-skinned knight said. "That would be a severe breach of faith. Yet, as the Black Queen has said, I am aware of the difficulties this trial poses to Procer. I would not cause undue harm if there is a way to avoid it."

There, what she'd wanted: confirmation that this wasn't just me dragging Hanno in by the ear so that he might go through the motions of making nice with her. Not that she'd been inclined to think poorly of him, I believed. I'd never deeply discussed either of them with the other, but to my understanding there'd always been a degree of mutual respect there. Not closeness, though. The White Knight encouraged heroes working with the authorities, but never to the extent of becoming part of them. Even the little I knew about the Thalassocracy told me where he might have gained a taste for that distinction. As for Hasenbach, she was understandably wary of the armed Heavens-blessed demigods traipsing around her realm that considered themselves only loosely bound to its laws – and so she must be wary of their leader as well, regardless of his general amiability.

"The trouble in in the primacy of the Terms over our laws," Cordelia said, "even when applying to individuals of Procer who committed crimes against other Procerans."

The Red Axe was from the southern outskirts of the Principate, it was true. The Wicked Enchanted had been Proceran as well, and Frederic still was. All three were also Named, though, which complicated things a great deal.

"The matter of the attempted regicide, in particular, will be a contentious matter," Cordelia continued. "If even rulers anointed by the House of Light can suffer assassination attempts without Procer being able to give answer, there are some who might argue that we have all been made subservient to the Chosen."

"The Highest Assembly approved of the treaties establishing this," the White Knight reminded her.

"Those treaties were approved when it was believed that the Chosen would not resort to attempting the murder of princes," the First Prince flatly said. "We have been... disappointed, in this regard."

Harsh but fair, I thought.

"Middle ground can be found, I expect," I intervened. "The Terms were not made to last, and we did not expect they would stumble into such challenges. It'll require everyone to bend a little more than they'd like, but that's the nature of compromise. I'm sure you have suggestions, Your Highness, as to what my ally the fears of the Highest Assembly. I'd be interested to hear them."

I found her hard to read, in the moments that followed, as she studied us both. Hesitating, or gauging how far she'd be able to push this?

"As the concerns come from the forced impotence of Proceran law, I would suggest that the Red Axe be made to stand trial before the Highest Assembly," she said.

My brow rose. She wasn't a fool, so that couldn't be all of it.

"The sentence passed would, undoubtedly, be death," Cordelia said. "Its application could be suspended, however, until she has also stood trial under the Terms."

Ah, there it was. If both Procer and the White Knight condemned the Red Axe to death, who was to say what sentence was being carried out when the blade was swung? If Hanno did the deed, or a Proceran executioner, then the balance would be made to swing either way. But there was a candidate to keep the weights even, as it were.

"You'd make Prince Frederic do it," I quietly said. "Since he straddles both worlds. That way everyone can go home with a win to tell their people about."

It'd eat up the man inside, though, I thought. He'd wanted to avoid taking her life. But while I liked Frederic Goethal, his peace of mind was not worth what it would cost.

"A compromise I could live with," I said.

Some of the more paranoid among my charges would smell a rat, but with the Red Axe dead at the hand of the same hero she'd tried to kill I shouldn't get too much pushback. There would be some who'd have wanted me to bleed the heroes dry over this, but they'd be few and not popular among our kind – the likes of the Headhunter and the Red Knight were powerful, but usually without many allies.

"What is being suggested," the White Knight coldly said, "is not just."

My fingers clenched under the table. Hanno's face had gone hard as stone.

"I will not promise a sentence or an executioner before a trial has been held," the White Knight said. "This is not a compromise, it is a perversion of the oaths we all swore. It does not matter what the Red Axe has done: she has rights under the Terms, and among these is a fair trial."

A steady look was fixed onto the both of us.

"What you are speaking of," he slowly said, "is not a fair trial."

And that was that, wasn't it? As far as he was concerned that settled the matter. And for all that Hanno had gone cold, I thought, the look on Cordelia's face was no warmer.

"Compromise requires both sides to give, Lord White," the First Prince of Procer said, frigidly polite.

"There is no justice to be found in denying the rights of one to safeguard those of another," the Sword of Judgement evenly replied. "All that is accomplished is the shifting around of injustice."

"If a right is abused, then the abuser is no longer deserving of it," the First Prince said. "Else it becomes a tool of oppression."

A little rich coming from a princess of Procer, that, but most of the time I still liked that lot better than Above's so I'd let it slide. At nineteen the scene unfolding before me would have me giddy: the Principate and heroes, both bitter enemies of mine, were at each other's throat. But years had passed, and these days I had too much use for both to be glad of this.

"A mechanism has been established to deal with such abuses," the White Knight bluntly said. "It has yet to fail, in my eyes, and so your treatment of it strikes me as unwarranted."

He wasn't going to give an inch on this, I sensed. It just wasn't in his nature to give that inch over something like this, when he knew himself in the right and all those involved had taken the oaths with open eyes. And Gods, part of me agreed with him. The fucking Principate was quick to cry foul about the rights of its peoples being 'trampled' these days, but that conscience had been nowhere in sight when it'd been Callowan freedoms on the line. And even now that half the continent had gathered to keep it from burning still it insisted on throwing tantrums over gift horses, never mind looking them in the mouth. Hanno was looking after his own, people whose calling and service he respected and honoured, and aside from all the greater considerations he simply wasn't going to dent his principles over something like princes being uneasy.

The White Knight did not believe it his charge to soothe princes, and so he'd not sacrifice things that he did consider his charge in order to do so. It was a fair way of looking at it, if you were a hero.

I wasn't, though. I'd been one of Below's since age sixteen and more importantly these days I was a queen. So while the White Knight wasn't wrong, I did not believe that the First Prince was either. She wasn't throwing a fit over this for pleasure, or even for principle – if Hasenbach's objections to this were personal in nature, she would have stowed them away by now. This wasn't a winning fight for her, and the fact that she was still picking it anyway meant that she was afraid of what would ensue if she didn't. More afraid than of the consequences of the mess before my eyes, too, which was more than a little worrying. If the First Prince was coming out swinging this hard, then at a guess I'd say word about Frederic being bled had already leaked to the Assembly. There'd be pressure at her back to do something about this, and while I doubted that unseating her was in the cards there were other ways this could all go to the Hells.

If southern principalities started ignoring her orders because they no longer believed her to be a worthy leader for Procer, the Grand Alliance was in trouble. Weakened as it was, the Principate was still the main source of coin and goods for the war effort and those sure as fuck weren't coming from the war-ravaged north. And while it might have been years since Black torched the heartlands, those lands had never truly been allowed to recover: continued conscription, high taxes and rationing meant some of the richest lands in Procer had never actually gotten back to their old prosperity. No, Hasenbach wasn't worrying about things like authority and legitimacy because she was some over-proud highborn twit. She was worried about those things because if she lost them then Procer might start coming apart at the seams.

If she didn't come through for her princes, if she damaged their privileges and all the while made heavy demands of them, then why should they keep listening to her? Especially if she lacked the means to force them to.

Sentimentality had me on Hanno's side, but sentiment had to be left a door in matters like these. The needs of the queen took the victory once more, as Akua might have said. And if these two weren't going to reach a compromise by themselves, if there was no pretty stainless solution to be had, then all that was left was the cheap tricks that'd been my trade since long before I put on a crown.

"Procer could be allowed to dispose of the body as it wishes, at least," I said, and sighed when Hanno began to respond, "In the eventuality that there is a body, yes, not to make assurances either way. But if there is a corpse, White Knight, can it not at least be ceded to the Highest Assembly?"

"It would be a petty thing for a heroine's corpse to be parade like a trophy," the dark-skinned knight said, tight-lipped.

"Petty's not unlawful," I said. "So unless your feelings have become rules..."

His lips thinned even further. It'd been a hit below the belt, but then if the Gods Above had wanted me to fight clean they should have shelled out for another five inches at least.

"In principle, I would have no objection," Hanno eventually replied.

It would have been undiplomatic of Hasenbach to point out that this was such a paltry concession as to almost not be one at all, especially given that I'd secured it on her behalf, but from the cool serenity of her face I got the message anyway. She wasn't going to be appeased with a few metaphorical coppers flipped her way. If she didn't get meat to throw her princes, it would be on her they turned their fangs. I angled my face so that Hanno wouldn't see and cocked a brow at her.

"It appears we have reached the end of what can be settled today," the First Prince calmly said. "I thank you both for calling on me, but I believe there is nothing left to say on this matter."

"That seems to be correct," the White Knight said, tone regretful.

Not enough to bend his neck, though, so what did regret matter?

"While I have your ear, Your Highness, I had a few questions about the issues Mercantis," I idly said. "If you're willing, it shouldn't take too long."

Hasenbach considered it for a moment.

"I had anticipated a longer conversation," she said. "I have the time to spare if you do."

Hanno cast me a searching look and I shrugged. He and I had already talked about Mercantis some, and he'd made a suggestion I was warming to – sending the Painted Knife’s band there to keep the merchants honest – but Named arm-twisting was only a small part of the matter and he had little to do with the rest. It wasn’t his wheelhouse, and if it grew to concern him I’d make it known.

Not that I actually intended to talk about Mercantis.

I gave him nothing to work with, so the White Knight made his courtesies and left. In the silence that followed his departure I glance at the cup of tea I’d barely sipped at, choosing my words as the First Prince’s expectant gaze found me.

“There’s a way for you to get what you want,” I said. “Though I expect you won’t like it.”

Blue eyes found mine, unblinking.

“Yet here I am,” the First Prince of Procer calmly said, “listening.”

—

Murder of an ally. Attempted murder of an ally. Aid to an enemy of the Grand Alliance.

The Red Axe would stand trial accused of those three breaches of the Terms, and that the equivalent of a treason charge was the least of the three meant the affair begged for a blood end. The Wicked Enchanter had been an unrepentant monster, but until he stepped out of line again he’d been under protection: his killing must be punished, and as the representative for the villains under the Terms there was only one punishment I was willing to accept. I still had the smoldering remnants of sympathy for the heroine on trial, but she’d known how this would end before she took her first step down this road.

The Red Axe herself seemed utterly unworried when she was brought in. Unlike the Mirror Knight when he’d stood in the same place her hands were bound by shackles and she was chained to a steel ring set in the ground. Masego and Roland had personally traced the wards that would keep her out of the back half of the room should she get free, though it was a lot more likely that the crossbowmen and armed guards surrounding her would get to it first. It would have been counterproductive to gag her, I knew, but as I looked at her calmly expectant expression I found I itched to have it done anyway. There were few things more dangerous in life than someone with nothing left to lose.

I’d expected some ceremony out of Hanno, given his years as the champion of the Choir of Judgement, but instead he was brisk and business-like.

"The charges against the Red Axe have been made known to you," the White Knight said. "Do any of you intend to lay further ones, or contest those I will pursue?"

Denials all around. Mine was barely more than a mutter, my eyes remaining on the heroine.

"Then I will proceed," Hanno calmly said.

The Red Axe laughed.

"Gods, but what a pretentious waste of time," she said, her Chantant lightly accented.

The White Knight looked unmoved.

"Do you understand the charges laid against you under the Terms?" he asked.

"To the Hells with your Terms," the Red Axe said. "They're expedience made law and just as ugly as that sounds. I renounce them, and for you fine people who think you have rights over me, I add this-

She spat on the stone, offering up a hard smile.

"Are you requesting that the protections of the Terms be withdrawn from you?" the First Prince calmly asked.

Not surprising. Hasenbach would definitely try to get her hands on the heroine outright, if she could at this late hour, regardless of any deal she and I had made. What I'd offered was barely palatable, while this would smack to her of a clean win. Wouldn't work, of course. I wasn't a fucking idiot, so I'd told Hanno of my conversation with the Red Axe and made sure he spoke with her as well.

"Whether she desires this now or not is irrelevant," the White Knight said. "She agreed to the Terms as made understood to her by the Archer and had not renounced them when she committed the breaches for which she is now being charged."

"Your rules never meant a thing to me, Sword of – sword of what, these days, I ask?" the Red Axe said. "Not Judgement, and nothing I see in this room makes for a good replacement."

"That your word means little does not mean you are exempt from holding it," Hanno replied without batting an eye.

Cordelia glanced at me, but there wasn't a lot of hope on her face and I didn't add any with my own bland expression. Procer would get no help from me if she made a play for snatching now, and Lord Yannu did not speak a word to deny the White Knight's claim. Hasenbach let it go, and we moved on. The first hurdle had been passed.

"Given the number of eyewitnesses to the killing of the Wicked Enchanter, I saw no need for spoken testimony," Hanno continued. "I've selected and now provide thirty different written accounts, which should prove sufficient. If there are any doubts among the tribunal, there are more that can be sent for."

I'd already read some of those parchments and the facts were not in doubt, so I offered the writing only a few looks before setting it aside.

"I confess," the Red Axe said.

A moment of silence. Eyes went to the heroine, which only seemed to encourage her.

"I confess I put down a monster," she said. " That I killed a rapist, a murder and something worse. I confess I would have made it slower if I could, that-"

"Guards, please silence the accused until she is called on to speak again," Hanno said.

Spells wouldn't work on her, so it was a gag they had to use. She fought them, and the sight sickened my stomach – all those men in armour around a girl, alone and unarmed and tied up. Named, I reminded myself. One who'd done things that might yet kill thousands, in full knowledge of the risks. The White Knight continued to make his case, as if never interrupted. The Kingfisher Prince's personal testimony was a written one, as he'd decline to stand before the tribunal, but witnesses among my soldiers and the Levantines gave damning account of the attack on the Prince of Brus. The Sinister Physician came in to speak as to how dangerous the wound had been and was followed up by two priests who'd handled the later parts of Frederic's recovery.

With attempted murder of an ally solidly grounded in proof, it was 'aid to an enemy' that was approached. Proof was difficult to establish, when it came to the Bard, and while I recounted my conversation with the Red Axe it wouldn't be enough to damn her. Fortunately for Hanno, once relieved of her gag she was eager enough to handle that herself.

"You want to accuse me of working with the Wandering Bard," she said, amused. "It's a crime now, is it? I didn't. She worked with me."

The Red Axe shrugged.

"I wasn't tricked, if that's the story you want to spin," she said. "I knew what I wanted, and she wanted me to get it too."

None of what she told me was even a secret. It was just names and places, that's all."

"To be clear, you admit to collaboration with the Wandering Bard?" Hanno asked.

"She talked and I listened," she said. "Sometimes I talked too. Call that whatever you will. Not like it'll make a difference in your little puppet show, is it? You've already got what you need for blood."

Lord Yannu let out a harsh bark of laughter. Well, she wasn't wrong. In principle even just killing the Wicked Enchanter would be enough to get her executed, much less the rest. With yet another confession on the record, the trial was effectively at an end. Hanno asked us if we wanted to deliberate, but there were no takers. Recommendations followed.

"Death," the Lord of Alava said.

"Death," the First Prince of Procer said.

"Death," I echoed.

The Red Axe mockingly laughed. She'd not been gagged, I supposed because of discomfort at the idea of ordering this woman's death without letting her speak in answer to it.

"Half the world clamoured for her death," she said. "What an eulogy that will make."

She wanted, I felt, someone to answer her. To engage. This was the culmination of her story, wasn't it? The moment where she was sent to her death because of her principles, where defiant and dry-eyed she cursed the wicked kings doing her wrong. But no one answered. Because to the rest of us the Red Axe wasn't a righteous heroine about to shame us for our misdeeds, she was the woman who'd endangered one of the treaties keeping the Dead King from winning this war and sweeping over Calernia in a tide of death. No one here was enjoying this, I thought, but ashamed? No. We were a long way from that. So instead of a cruel jest or a justification, as she would have gotten in a story, the Red Axe got silence and then Hanno passing her sentence.

"Death," the White Knight echoed. "By beheading, to be carried out by my own hand tomorrow at Morning Bell. The accused will be granted a night to make her peace with the Gods Above, but kept detained until then."

"Pathetic," the Red Axe said. "You're all-"

Hanno called for her to be gagged again, and as soon as it was done asked for the comments from the tribunal. Lord Yannu agreed, sounding largely indifferent, but when it was my turn to speak I had more to say.

"I am satisfied with death," I said, "but today's proceedings should be put under seal instead of made known."

"On what grounds?" Hanno frowned.

"On the grounds that the details of this will make it known to every Named that has issued with the Terms that they've got an ally they can plot with," I said.

"The Wandering Bard is to be declared an enemy of the Grand Alliance regardless," the White Knight said. "What is there to hide?"

"That the Bard is after the Terms themselves, instead of the ringleader of a plot against the Arsenal," I said. "If she just helped thrash the Arsenal, no one will see her as an ally. If this was all a plot against the Terms, though? That's a banner, and those always gather people."

The White Knight cast a look at the other two members of the tribunal, who did not seem to object. I could see him weigh the costs of refusal here and then decided it wasn't worth it.

"Agreed," the White Knight said.

"I am satisfied," the First Prince calmly said.

The Red Axe, even gagged, was laughing convulsively. People did get more perceptive, when standing in the shadow of their gallows. Had she figured it all out, or just that Cordelia and I were acting in concert? Didn't matter, I thought.

It was already too late.

—

I'd not slept well, even with Indrani sharing my bed, and rose early.

I left Archer to sleep and slipped on my clothes, learning when I limped to an early breakfast that it was just shortly past Early Bell – there were still about three hours left before the execution happened. I asked for porridge, the bland but filling kind that remained a Legion staple to this day, and silently sipped at an herbal infusion that'd soothe my leg. It was an odd mood that'd taken hold of me, but I did not fight it. It'd pass soon enough, I knew, and I owed it to the woman I was about to see killed to at least look what I was doing in the eye. I ended up wandering away afterwards, eventually coming up where the killing was to be done. These were not, I thought, awe-inspiring grounds. More abattoir than gallows: a stretch of naked stone, an executioner's block and a few seats on raised platforms.

Yet for all the bare bone nature of the place I found it carried a sort of cold, impersonal dread to it. Not unlike the Terms themselves, if one chose to look at it that way. The Mantle of Woe pulled tight against me, hood up, I tucked myself away in a shadowed nook and lit a pipe. A stream of wakeleaf gently rose, and I allowed my thoughts to drift. I wasn't sure how long I stayed like that, absorbed in my silence, but when the sound of steel and leather boots came reached my ear I did not need to guess who it was that'd come. There were too many guards for it to be anyone but Cordelia Hasenbach. She approached me without escort and I flicked her a look from beneath the hood.

She'd dressed in dark colours today, if not outright black. They did not suit her well, but cosmetics and jewelry hid the fact decently enough. She came to stand by my side, reflecting my silence with her own. I'd worn no crown, and she only a simple circlet of white gold. My eyes were on the block, and without turning I somehow knew so were hers.

"She is right about one thing, at least," Hasenbach murmured. "It has been an ugly affair."

I breathed out smoke, letting it rise in curls. It was a calming sight, familiar.

"I've made a lot of ugly choices, over the years," I said. "I believed them necessary, when I made them. More often than not they truly were."

"It is the exceptions that stay with you," the First Prince said. "A hundred victories will fade, but that sole stinging defeat will sink its hooks."

I smiled bitterly.

"Can't save everyone," I said. "And if you try to, usually you don't even get to save most."

Nauk. Ratface. Farrier. Anne Kendall. There was always a price to trying to make a change. And keeping it standing, when it got done? Oh, that was even costlier.

"Duty is a bed of thorns," Cordelia quietly said, "but someone must lie in it."

"Oh, there's not enough kindness left in me to flinch at this I don't think," I mused. "I was just wondering at how things change, over the years."

"How so?"

"The first two lives I ever took were those of a rapist," I said, "and his accomplice."

She said nothing.

"I wonder if I'm still the one holding the knife," I murmured, "or if another role does not suit me better, these days."

There was a word, for those who protected the likes of the first man I'd ever killed. Accomplice.

The silence held until the room began to fill with the few dignitaries who needed to be there. The Red Axe was brought in after the White Knight had already stepped up to the block, a longsword at his hip. She wore only a brown shift, walking barefoot, and though escorted to the fore she went freely. Unafraid. The White Knight gestured for her to kneel, but she refused.

"On my feet," the Red Axe said. "To the end, on my feet."

The White Knight slowly nodded. The heroine turned towards us, gaze lingering on my hooded and smoking figure besides the First Prince's dark-clad paleness.

"I go with all my accounts settled," the Red Axe said. "And no regrets."

She did not close her eye, even when the blade went through her neck with a flash of light. A clean cut, made that way by the searing Light on the edge of the blade. She wouldn't have felt a thing. The head fell, neck burnt on both ends, and the body toppled. Hanno caught her and laid her down, unclasping his cloak and laying it over the corpse. His expression was tight as he rose to his feet, eyes searching for Hasenbach and finding her. His stride was quick.

"The corpse is now passed into the custody of the Principate, as was asked," he stiffly said.

"We thank you for the courtesy," the First Prince replied.

He grimaced.

"What will you do with it?" he asked.

"That is no longer your concern."

Hasenbach's tone was not harsh, but neither was it one that would suffer further questioning. The White Knight's eyes went to me, but I did not meet them. I breathed in the smoke, spewed it out, and waited until he'd left. The room slowly emptied, in the end leaving only the First Prince and her guards along with me. Leaning on my staff I limped up to the body veiled by the White Knight's cloak, Hasenbach keeping pace with me. I laid down a hand on it and hummed. Yes, it could be done.

"Step back, if you don't want to leave the room," I said. "It won't be easy work raising her coherent enough to stand trial before the Highest Assembly."

Insanenoodlyguy

"I wasn't tricked, if that's the story you want to spin," she said. "I knew what I wanted, and she wanted me to vote. None of what she told me was even a secret. It was just links to places, that's all."

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Javvies

Hmm, reanimation as undead?
Presumably, anyways, since true Resurrection is supposedly restricted to Above.

That's ... an interesting approach.
And I'm not sure how bringing Red Axe back to execute her again is going to play with the Heroes.
Or, considering it's almost certainly going to be an undead Red Axe, not a living one, how it's going to play with the Princes/Princesses of Procer.

It'll probably play worse with the Heroes than the Procerans, though. And might well cause problems with some of the Heroes.

I admit, reanimation as undead in order to bring Red Axe to trial before a Proceran prosecution was not something I saw coming.

Sir Nil

