"We cannot disagree with you, not past a certain line," he said. "That is the unspoken law of the Woe. Crossing that line gets you cut off, left behind."

"You're the one who told me I should act like was in charge of the band, on our way to Keter," I said. "And now you're complaining that I did?"

He hesitated.

"Gods, to hear you talk I was poison in the blood," I said. "Still am. And I'll not deny there were times I stumbled, but Burning Hells – who is it that could live up to your idol of the Perfect Catherine?"

My stomach clenched.

"Not me," I thickly said. "And you should have known better. I've never pretended to be more than what I am."

And if that'd never been enough, then burn him.

"You did things right too," Hakram gravelled. "That's not..."

He looked angry.

"You pull people in," he said. "And you take care of them, as much as you can, and they don't want to leave. But you pull them into your wake, not at your side."

"You had a place there," I coldly replied. "You're the one who walked away."

So you could go play saviour, I bit down on adding.

"But I wasn't at your side," Hakram frustratedly said. "That's what you refuse to see. I was under you."

I glared.

"Just because-"

"Listen," he growled. "Maybe you don't want to admit you think that way, but you do. You can love us, but you could never be in love with any of us. The way you are with Akua Sahelian. Because, unlike her, we are not your equals."

I rocked back, like he'd slapped me.

"This mad plan you built up around her laid it out plain," Hakram said as he slowly rose to his feet. "Even when she was a powerless prisoner, you treated her as more of a peer than us."

"Fuck you," I hissed. "For even thinking that-"

"You would have killed her for any of us," he said. "But that's not the same thing. And I'm not going to be Scribe, Catherine, not even for you. I still remember what a single aspect withering was like. What the Carrion Lord did to her, after decades together..."

I'm not him, I wanted to scream. I would never have set you aside. He shook his head.

"No," the Warlord said. "I learned her lesson. My own inheritance from a Calamity."

And that more, than the rest, had rage burn in my blood.

"You goddamn coward," I spat. "I scraped my hands raw trying to find ways we could stay together, ways to live with the changes, but what was any of it worth? I'm the one who can't be fucking swayed, Hakram? Me?"

Smoke billowed, as if conjured by my rising tone.

"Who is it that ran away across half the Empire before making his choice?" I said. "Who is it that sat on all of this until he left instead of just telling me?"

I could have fought this, fixed it. If I'd known. But instead he'd held his peace and here we were: beyond taking any of it back. Too late.

"And what should I have done?" Hakram challenged. "Asked you to change who you are?"

"YES," I shouted.

He stepped back at the vehemence of my voice.

"I would have done that, for you," I cursed. "I gave you the right to ask."

For the first time since we'd begun to talk, I saw him genuinely taken aback.

"It doesn't have to..." he hesitantly tried. "I cannot be the Adjutant, but-"

The anger went out of me at the sight. Dead in a moment, like a fire stripped of air. It was beginning to sink in, at last, that this was finished. That the page had turned.

"You were supposed to be the one who stayed," I tiredly said. "The one I'd journey on with. It's dead, Hakram."

And now they were all going to leave. Indrani to her horizons, Masego to his research, Vivienne to her kingdom and Hakram to his people. I would end this journey as I had begun it, that night my father had found me in the alley. Standing alone.

Silence hung. I was not the one to break it.

"They need me," the Warlord quietly said.

"I needed you too," I replied, knowing it was unfair. "And maybe it's the right choice you made. The principled one, whatever that's worth."

I breathed out.

"But it was still a choice," I said. "And those have prices."

"Aye," he quietly said, "they do."

His fangs clicked together.

"It doesn't have to be the end of us," Hakram said.

I felt my pulse quicken. That was it, I thought. The pus had been lanced, the ugliness dragged into the light of day so it might burn and turn to smoke. And still he offered a hand. Not quite in forgiveness, but at least in understanding. In willingness to keep on sharing a road. It would be the easiest thing in the world, I thought, to just take that offered hand and let it drag me into the current. I could see it in my mind's eye, clear as day: we would sit and talk and eat and laugh. It would be not quite like old times, but it would have the sweetness of them. An old friendship changing shape. And I craved it down to the marrow of my bone, because I could barely remember who I'd even been before Hakram had come into my life. I just recalled a lot of fear and anger, fingers tight on the grip of my sword as I watched the world from behind a blade. I'd become who I was with him at my side.

The thought of losing that for good made me nauseous.

But he'd not been wrong, to talk of rot. Of things left unsaid and how they had come back to haunt us. And worst of all was that, if I held my tongue now, I would make him right when he'd said I did not think of them as equals. As people capable of handling the bitter sting of truth. How many times, I thought, can you build a tower on the same quicksand before it is called madness? Once had been too much already, I thought. There were only so many times I was willing to bleed myself dry. That left only one path forward, I knew that, and yet my mouth would not move. My arms were trembling. I bit the inside of my cheek until it burned. I'd called him a coward, was I going to be the one living up to the word?

I slowly straightened my back and met his gaze head on.

"In Ater," I plainly said, "I made the choice to murder you."

His face closed. He'd known that already, I thought, but it was another thing to hear it voiced out loud.

"I had a choice between your life, my father's life, and what I thought would win us the war," I said. "And you'd avoided me, cornered me until there was no middle way. Either I took up the knife or the Intercessor won."

I smiled thinly.

"So I took up the knife," I said.

I clenched my fingers, then unclenched them.

"I only ended up killing one of you that night," I said. "But I made the choice anyway."

His dark eyes were unblinking.

"I'm not saying this to be cruel," I told him. "I'm saying this because you need to know that I still see that choice every time I look at your face."

I almost turned away there but stubbornness saw me through.

"And I don't regret it," I quietly said. "I didn't work as we thought it would, but it did work. And it might yet win us this war. So I don't regret it, and I'd make the same choice again."

I breathed out, slowly.

"And that's how we got here, isn't it?" I said. "Me making the choices. So I guess it's your turn now."

I looked away at last.

"I told you all I have to say," I said. "Now it's in your hands."

I searched his face but saw no answers. I might as well have been looking at stone.

"You know where I am," I said.

I limped out of the woods, leaving him behind with the roasting pig, and he did not stop me.

—

My mind felt restless for the rest of the afternoon, twisting this way and that. It was obvious enough Vivienne commented on it after we held council, though she was graceful enough not to ask how my conversation with Hakram had gone. I told her anyway.

"It's in his hands now," I said. "I don't get to decide how it ends."

She slowly nodded, visibly hesitating. She was curious but didn't want to push too far. I almost flinched at the sight. We are not your equals, Hakram had said. Had he been right? I led the Woe, it'd been like that from the start, but I was not their queen. I'd always thought of it as a company, not a kingdom. And while they did things for me when I asked, they were not beholden. Only it hadn't been anything as clear cut as my wearing a crown that he'd been talking about, had it?

"Vivienne," I said, "did you ever..."

Blue-grey eyes watched me patiently as I trailed off and an uncomfortable silence took hold. I wasn't sure why I'd started to speak. I wasn't even sure what I wanted to ask.

"Are we friends?" I artlessly asked.

She frowned.

"Gods," she said. "It really did a number on you, didn't it?"

"That's not an answer," I said.

Vivienne sighed.

"Of course we're friends," she said. "You're one of the most important people in my life, Cat. In some ways the most. You can't use you and Hakram as a measuring stick for everyone else."

I leaned back into my seat.

"And why's that?" I asked.

She looked at me for a long time.

"He's first person you ever really trusted, isn't he?" Vivienne quietly asked.

My fingers clenched. I did not answer.

"Maybe the only person you ever trusted, at least that deeply," she said. "It always cuts deeper when it's closer to home, Catherine."

"He said things," I admitted, "that I'm not sure are wrong."

"I wouldn't be so sure about that," Vivienne said. "The one blind spot he's had as long as I've known him is his relationship with you."

Maybe you're right, I thought, but that doesn't mean he's wrong. I shook myself. The coin was still spinning. There were greater concerns to speak of.

"I don't like that we're not sure what the First Prince is planning," I said, changing the subject.

Vivienne tactfully went along with it.

"I think she knows she loses if she does nothing so she's rolling the dice," the Princess said. "It explains why the Jacks have seen her reach out to princes. She'll be going to the hero council in force, with her backing there to impress."

I wasn't sure how much having the princes behind her would impress heroes, but having the armies those few represented supporting her might sway some. Enough to beat Hanno on his own stage?

"I don't think that's enough for her to win," I said. "Or even tie. And that begs the question that we've avoided voicing out loud so far."

Vivienne grimaced.

"What does the First Prince do if she sees she's lost?" she asked.

I had a great deal of respect for Cordelia Hasenbach, but I was not blind to her occasional bouts of ruthlessness. On the contrary, they were part of why I respected her. The problem was what that ruthlessness might lead her to do, if she thought Hanno was about to become Warden of the West and doom us all. I liked to think that the Lycaonese princess would be careful of avoiding doing anything that might destroy our chances at taking Keter, but she was desperate. Cornered. That was not when people made their finest decisions, claimants especially. I rubbed the bridge of my nose.

"I can't just show up and tell them to play nice," I said. "I almost want to, Viv, but it'd be too direct an intervention. I'd get a rap on the knuckles from Above for sure and my lot isn't in any position to ensure that love tap doesn't disintegrate my entire arm."

"It might be out of our hands, Catherine," Vivienne said. "I know you don't like the thought, and to be honest I don't either, but--"

"-it might be a situation where acting has worse consequences than not acting," I completed. "Yeah, the thought's occurred."

We talked a while longer after that, but there were only so many words to say. My problem was that the two of them had moved quicker than I thought but I couldn't actually do anything about it. And I'd yet to reconcile with Hanno, which as Indrani had pointed out might turn to be a problem if he became Warden of the West tonight. And I'm not sure I liked the idea of going after Keter with unfulfilled oaths. Seemed like the kind of mistake Neshamah would use to bury me. We sent out spies and feelers and tried to get a grasp on what was happening as I struggled to find a way out of the mess, but I couldn't find one. The well of ideas was dry and my mind was... slow, today.

By the time the sun began to dip the tension in my shoulders had metamorphosed into a knot of dread in my stomach. I'd not felt this powerless in a while and it was never a feeling I'd enjoyed. Which was, naturally, when Akua chose that moment to reappear. I'd not seen her in two days. She came and went as she wished, and I had no call on her hours. She might be one of my advisors once more, but I knew better than to try to ask too much of her. It might just give her the reason to leave I suspected she was still looking for.

The balcony where I'd been wracking my brain overlooked a small statuary garden where servants had already lit lanterns, though I'd come out here more for the fresh air than the view. Akua drifted in through the room behind me with the same gliding grace she'd had as a shade, bringing with her two glasses of wine. She pressed one into my hand and came to lean against the stone railing, sipping at her own. No jewelry, I saw. Not that she needed any: even in the simple red and gold gown she wore, Akua Sahelian had the presence of a queen.

"It promises to be a beautiful night," she said.

I sipped at the wine. Red and full-mouthed, a little too bitter for me. From Cantal, maybe? There were so many damned wines in Procer that I could spend a lifetime learning and still miss a few.

"I can't afford to savour it," I said. "There's trouble in the distance."

"I heard," Akua languidly replied. "The Sword and the Princess rushing their conclusion, is it?"

I nodded.

"And I'm sure the Bard has her fingers in it too," I grunted. "Not put there recently, I don't think she can do much except mute Below's stories right now, but this has her scent all over it."

"The spoiled liquor stench is rather distinctive," Akua noted.

I snorted, but the amusement passed quickly.

"I'm no sure what I can do," I admitted.

"It is their choice to hurry the confrontation," Akua said. "A mistake I would expect of Hasenbach, but less so of the Sword of Judgement. He should know that power left to ripen is all the fuller for it."

"They both think the other will fuck it up," I sighed. "So they're pushing hard. And I'm starting to think this one is just a loss."

Golden eyes turned to me, curious.

"I think I might be able to nudge it one way or another," I said. "I have just the right leverage for it. So what's left is picking whoever I think is the better candidate."

"Yet you consider that a defeat," Akua said.

"Because the Bard gets what she wants," I replied. "We lose something. The Warden of the West is weaker, maybe it screws us against Keter down the line. Why the Intercessor would want that I can only guess, but I hate giving it to her anyway."

"I have come to believe," Akua murmured, "that the Intercessor's designs are best grasped by who she chooses to move."

I flicked her an interested glance.

"You were only moved against when you became a threat," the golden-eyed sorceress said. "So you can safely be considered to be inconsequential to her actual plan. As far as I can see, her actions cluster around three souls: Kairos Theodosian, Hanno of Arwad and Cordelia Hasenbach."

One dead, two now claimants and at odds.

"So you think this conflict is larger," I said.

"I am not yet sure," Akua gracefully shrugged. "But ultimately it is irrelevant."

"There's a bold take," I drily said. "How's that?"

"Because," Akua calmly said, "this is beneath you."

I raised my glass.

"Evidently not," I said, "else I wouldn't be here."

"This... fatalism," she said. "The pretence that you are bound to let your enemy's scheme succeed. It is beneath you."

"I can't intervene, Akua," I bit out. "If I could-"

"So find another way," Akua said. "Has that not been your favourite trick since the very beginning?"

She waved amusedly.

"Cornered is when you are most dangerous, dearest," she said. "When they have you surrounded by dead ends. The pit has always been, Catherine, where you shine."

I looked away.

"Well's run dry," I said, oddly ashamed. "I have nothing."

"I don't believe that's true."

Irritated, I turned to glare but was caught by a soft smile instead.

"You have been burned," Akua said. "And now you hesitate. Discard this."

She circled the rim of her glass with a finger.

"Let the fear fall away and you will find an answer," Akua said. "You always do."

I breathed out shallowly.

"Why are you helping?"

I'd been the one, I realized, to ask the question. Golden eyes studied me.

"Do you know," Akua asked me, "the difference between a knot and a noose?"

"There isn't," I said. "A noose is a knot."

"Only," she smilingly said, "if there is a corpse."

I blinked in confusion. I was missing something here, a kernel that would allow me to understand.

"I will choose what it is I do," Akua said. "Not you. Not her. Not my mother's shade. Me."

She leaned in closer, and warm lips were pressed against the side of my neck. I shivered.

"Now go, Catherine," she said. "Go out there and win."

She left and took the warmth she had brought with her. I stayed out there on the balcony, alone with my silence. Thinking for the Gods only knew how long.

Huh.

Maybe I did have an idea, after all.

—

Three hours later the sky opened as the wind howled around me. High Lady Abreha had been accommodating when I'd decided to use one of the assets brought from Ater early, not even asking why. As the clouds parted and light danced across the sky, I sat on the throne atop the great tower as it began crashing towards the ground north of the capital. The air screamed around us and the night crackled with thunder, sorcery lashing out around us in great flares. It wasn't quite a flying fortress, those would come with the second wave, but the sight of this cutting across the night sky certainly ought to catch people's attention.

And when had heroes ever been able to resist poking at a beehive?

Droughtbringer

<https://topwebfiction.com/listings/a-practical-guide-to-evil/>

Steven Silver

"Will you vote?" I artlessly asked.

She frowned.

"Gods," she said. "It really did a number on you, didn't it?"

"That's not an answer," I said.

Vivienne sighed.

"Of course I'll vote," she said.

Handful Ujjain

"I will choose what it is I will do. Not you. Not her. Not my mother's shade. Not a copy pasted comment. Me."

Sulo

Poor Hakram. 😞

Cicero

I agree with Cat. Maybe Hakram is fight, and Cat didn't trust them to be her equal. But Hakram didn't trust himself to be her equal either. Seems poor form to blame her for a flaw he held himself.

Sulo

And which is more tragic? That someone did wrong by him, or that he believed someone had and did wrong by them in response and regrets it? I stand by my pity~

shikkarasu

They both acted poorly to one another. Hakram had serious concerns and grievances, but emotionally torturing your loved ones and calling it a test is super toxic. This conversation needed to happen years ago, but I can certainly see why he didn't want to have it and why Cat didn't think it was needed until it was too late.

I feel for them both.

The Ignorant Student

Also, as cruel as it may sound, Harlan was the Adjunct, which is not a Role that makes an equal. As best, he could be a trusted subordinate in a Story, but however they felt personally, their roles were pushing them into a superior/subordinate relationship. The fallout between Cat/Hakram AND Black/Scribe only came about when the subordinate Named started trying to make serious decisions against the wishes of their superior.

From a pure narrative perspective, Cat and Black did nothing wrong. Hakram and Scribe betrayed their trust.

When a CEO finds out their PA has been making company wide rescissions without approval, it's not on the CEO for failing to trust their PA

Of course, as people, yeah they both made mistakes, and they both have good points, and they both need to work to repair the broken trust between them.

Skaddix

I don't think Cordelia thought out her plan well. And by that I mean having a bunch of Proceran Princes backing your claim and a few Proceran Heroes. Is not very persuasive when all Foreign Heroes basically hate Procer. Cat noted the issue with this herself...its one thing to be a Warden of the West from Procer quite another thing to be a Proceran Warden of the West. And Cordelia is kinda walking right into that trap. Not accounting for most Heroes being commoners who might not be inclined to love Nobles anyway. As for her flipping the table I presume it have to involve her Angel Weapon.

Still at the base level of Cordelia is she has a very weak base of Heroic Support. it doesn't help that she hates Heroes but I have seen no plan for her to grow her Heroic Support. Augur never hangs out with her fellow Heroes and Frederic well he is not exactly the most respected. Also I am not sure if the whole Red Axe zombie is public but I don't imagine that help Cordelia. Hanno has the heroic support and plenty of military rank and file support and quite frankly most governments will be quite fine if Hanno mostly keeps his hands off and delivers on the battle front.

Hmm I am not sure who Bard wants to win you figure it be Hanno cause well she first appeared with him. However, Hanno is not exactly inclined to do anything Bard wants involving her Angel Laser since he never trusted her anyway. Cordelia though she will actually fire it. I kinda actually wanted POV from Cordelia and Hanno on this Warden Issue.

Akua gives good advice, I have no idea where Cat is going with this plot. I mean Akua I buy that line more you no if you were just passive at the end of the Ater arc. I mean I suppose it delays the meeting if they have to rally to stop this crisis. As for Hakram x Cat well that hurt.

dadycool

I think the conflict is what Bard is after, not necessarily who the winner is.

Liliet

It doesn't matter which of them wins, either of them LOSING is the loss where it matters.

caoimhinh

It was stated before that Bard wanted Cordelia as Warden of the West, that was the whole point of the Salia's attempted Coup d'etat mini-arc. Only the Augur's intervention gave the chance for Cordelia to refuse becoming Warden of the West.

Isn't she making a claim for it now just setting the Bard's plan in motion again?

I can't help but see Cat's objections to Hanno being Warden of the West as anything but selfish and kinda hypocritical. Hanno taking actions into his own hands when he sees others aren't making advances is Catherine's whole theme, she has always been making high stakes bets with lots of things on the line but she simply balks at another doing the same.

Plus, her other objection when she had a sort of epiphany where she could see that Hanno would not disagree with her in most things, but would have lines that he would not cross, principles he would not break, seems a lot better than the alternative she envisioned with Cordelia: a Warden that would fight her tooth and nail for everything but could be made to compromise and wanted sort of the same things as Cat in the long run, or at least is willing to bribe Catherine with the things she wants (like signing on the Liesse Accords).

Hanno is what the Warden of the West is supposed to be, a mirror to the Warden of the East. A peer, but not the same. He won't use the same methods Cat uses, because his duty is different, on account of the people that he must herd being different than the ones Cat must keep in line.

And the very fact that Cordelia is trying to use the signing of the Liesse Accords as a bribe, when she had already agreed to sign it, shows how she is and the same kind of attitude that she showed back in the Red Axe Case: backing off from an agreement the moment it becomes politically inconvenient for her or Procer.

Like, what is she implying with that offer to sign now? Will Procer not sign the Accords if Cat doesn't agree with what Cordelia wants?

Deworld

When Bard wanted Cordelia as a Warden of the West it was a totally different Name. It was supposed to be something purely political, similar to Hierarch I think. Now, however, after the Warden of the East came in Cat, this Name would mean a lot more – authority over half of the continent and half of the Named isn't what Bard wanted to put on Cordelia's shoulders originally. So the argument "Bard wanted Cordelia as Warden of the West" can't be really applied here I think.

The Ignorant Student

That brings up the interesting problem that is: did the Augur not tell Cordelia about the Bard's attempt to make her take up a Name? It feels like Cordelia has no clue what she's doing when it comes to Named which is a big problem considering she's gone from straight up refusing the Name to all but begging for it. That's got narrative significance. That's someone who's wishy-washy.

Miles

Both claimants are unfit for the Role.

This message was approved by Abigail for Warden.

Ben Serreau-Raskin

A painful break from Hakram but perhaps necessary. The Warden can't be relying on someone to bring their ideas to fruition after the fact. Catherine's first steps without leaning on a person like a crutch are going to be interesting to see.

Also: Flying fortresses without a villainous lose attached is going to be so cool to watch.

Zach

It's not necessarily a break from Hakram. Catherine didn't reject his offer; she just said it was now in his hands. Catherine basically listened to what Hakram had said about her making all the significant decisions and decided that choosing whether to accept his proposal would just be a continuation of that.

dadycoool

Augh! It hurts to watch Cat rip her own heart out like that. Hakram said something interesting: "The way you are with Akua Sahelian. Because, unlike her, we are not your equals." That reeks of foreshadowing, especially since she then proceeded to stand next to her and, in a way, help plan out her next step and practically took the reins of making her decision. Warden Akua is looking mighty likely from my perspective.

SpeckofStardust

Only of the east after cat kicks the bucket.

Sinead

Blows dust off of Cat takes the Twilight Crown theory

Soronel Haetir

I don't know, Akua has been acting much more the Hero lately. It would very much wreck things to have Below's representative in Creation be of Above.

Sinead

I mean, fair point. Depending on the story beats, I do suspect that Cat will not get a happy ending. And I don't know if Akua will be a full Hero, or the Reformed Villain in the style that is likely the end goal of the Accords.

Akua is intimately aware of the impact of legacy, after all...

Darael

I don't know. Having two Wardens of the East would provide a counterbalance which might make it narratively easier to share the Wardenship of the West between Cordelia and Hanno... or Akua could become the Warden of the North, following through on the plan to have her contain Neshamah in a modified form and mirroring Cat's role for Praes, and Hanno the Warden of the South, representing both the Crusade to defend the living lands and his time further south in the Titanomachy. Four Wardens, for four cardinal directions, and the city of Cardinal as a pivot... it's a shape that could work.

zenanii

Okay that would actually be very cool. The Warden of the West being a hero turned villain and the Warden of the East being a villain turned hero.

Miles

But there are no villains turned Hero.

Redemption arcs end in death.

Hargabga

This is a really depressing chapter. It stinks of things broken and lost. But also, like hope? Hakram is not where Cat wanted him to be, and neither is Aqua. Two of the most important people to her. I still feel weird how our resident Hitler didn't get her carmic comeuppance, but, uh, maybe she will? I don't know, this whole chapter sits ill with me, like things best left buried and forgotten. Maybe I am reading too much into everything.

Albert Wen

Karma doesn't make sense for people with body counts in the hundreds of thousands. No single entity is capable of receiving that much negative karma.

ninegardens

I mean... she could send the delightful duo a memo saying "Yo, Bard be fucking with you. Don't do anything rash. Don't lose sight of the real enemy".

It would be a good starting point.

Linnus42

You know the Hakram x Cat situation on Love/Friendship reminds me of Berserk a lot. Reminds me of Griffith giving his speech on what makes a True Friend that Guts overhears and leads to the breaking of the Band of the Hawk. And the Golden Age descending into Darkness. Though obviously I don't think things will go that bad in this story. But still I get that feeling reading it. So this is like Griffith's speech to Charlotte and the duel before Guts leave combined to me.

As for Cordelia, well I think the main flaw in her plan is she has done nothing to sure up Heroic Support. Which is part of the role. I mean maybe Otto and Frederic are willing to go all the way for Cordelia if she flips the table but I don't think Rozala or the Blood are. They might all prefer Cordelia to win but I don't think they will be especially mad if it goes the other way. Cordelia's moves and plans make her look like Proceran Warden and not a Warden from Proceran.

Also I don't think there is enough justification for Cordelia to flip the table like Cat thinks she might. Maybe we need some Cordelia POV? Cause I don't have the most favorable view of Cordelia but I am not seeing complaints about Hanno that justify such an extreme reaction from Cordelia. Like okay he is not going to make sacrifices for Procer that you want, he is not as good at politics as you and you think Heroes need to be checked. Those issues have not been painted as bad enough to justify such an extreme reaction from Cordelia in my book.

Ci

Cordelia is responding to the acts of the Sword Saint. That's who soured Cordelia on Heroes. After that, it's not so much that Hanno has acted outrageously like the Sword Saint, but he's acted with enough of the same disregard of political realities that a hyper sensitive Cordelia now sees it as something intrinsic to Heroes.

Sure, maybe Hanno himself will be okay, even Cordelia admits that. But what of his successor? Unlike a villian, Heroes die of old age, so there will be another Warden of the West after him. What if someday a Sword Saint rises to that position? Cordelia wants there to be institutions that will resist someone like that and prevent the Warden from doing something crazy, like decide to sacrifice Procer to establish a story to empower the eventual defeat of the Dead King.

wadeingintheriver

I was thinking just the same, regarding the shades of the Eclipse that hung over that conversation. I think the conversation between Cat and Hakram actually cuts deeper than the confrontation between Griffith and Guts (taken in the void, without knowledge of what's to come), because Cat sincerely views Hakram as a confidant and friend, instead of a piece on the board as I think Griffith always saw everybody. It also helps that both Cat and Hakram have a capacity for self-reflection that neither the narcissistic Griffith nor the blunt instrument Guts possessed, so both are able to understand criticism of their actions without immediately rejecting them.

Also, I think there's still hope for both Cat and Hakram, because Cat was able to actually extend a hand after the confrontation, which Griffith was not, and because I doubt that, even if Cat were to sacrifice her true companions, it would be for a reason as nakedly selfish and self-serving as Griffith's wish. So we haven't fully reached Behelit territory yet, I think.

Sugar Roll

Akua is such a tease. Isn't there a rule where no one leaves the room unfucked after getting kissed on the neck?

Liliet

I mean, Cat's the one who refuses to fuck her.

Sugar Roll

True, true. The appropriate response was supposed be physically stopping her from leaving while asking "Where do you think you're going?"

Juff

Typo Thread:

nothing may cost > nothing might cost Catherine" > Catherine."
handling he > handling the
I didn't work > It didn't work
He's first person > He's the first person
I liked the idea > I like the idea out her more > out here more

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Minor addition: most of the series, people have been saying godsdamn. Godsdamn this, godsdamn you, godsdamn this godsdamned thing, etc. It's pluralized. Here we see several non-pluralized GDs, and I'm fairly certain they've been unpluralized in previous chapters this book as well.

ohJohN

I've been noticing this as well, recently – the 's' used to be so prevalent that the occasional omissions seemed like typos, now its inclusion is becoming the exception.

I can't tell if it's a stylistic choice to move away from the nonstandard-English-but-internally-consistent form, if it's an intentional indicator of a change in Cat's thinking (though a conversion to monotheism seems... unlikely), or the writing/editing process has changed to make these harder to notice before posting.

Sinead

Keep in mind that even if you added a plural 'godsdamn' into your Word spell checker, it probably wouldn't catch any slip-up on your end. So if you are doing a scan, it would be easy to miss (I know I do not tend to notice this error).

Liliet

Oh my god please tell me Cat brought Tenebrous. Please tell me Cat brought Tenebrous. Please tell me Cat brought Tenebrous.

Anyway, HELL YEAH on the Hakram conversation. And half a hell yeah on the Vivienne conversation. CONTINUE THAT SOMETIME CAT

Isi Arnott-Campbell

I don't know anything you don't, but since you asked nicely and I also want it to be true: Cat brought Tenebrous.

shikkarasu

It sounds just a little bit like Cat brought a few floors of the Tower. I would call this hubris, but we've outgrown such a weak word. This is gestures in vain to find an appropriate term Theodosian.

pirateddesigns

"Theodosian" is decidedly my new favorite adjective.

erebus42

I like it. Especially since it carries undercurrents of calculation and self awareness about what you are doing.

shikkarasu

It is a very specific and nuanced adjective. A real state of being.

JIC

I don't think she would. An undead could be easily taken over by the Hidden Horror

Liliet

So far Cat is 1:0 with Neshamah on who steals whose toys

shikkarasu

I think stealing Masego for a few months should count. He isn't Cat's toy, he's Archer's, but that's beside the point.

I'ma call it 1:1:1; Cat:Nessie:Ma'Drani. I do want a Tenebrous Tiebreaker, tho.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Ma'Drani sounds like an Elder Scrolls character. Might use that.

nick012000

sigh

I see that Masego's going to need to have another talk with Cat about how they're not their parents, and he's not planning on abandoning her to his researches.

dadycool

Yeah, at this point Masego and Indrani are the two least likely to leave her, which of course perfectly inverts what happened with the Calamities. Not only was Cat their first friend, she's also practically the outer core of their very selves. Hakram used to be that way too, except then bits and pieces kept getting carved away. Now Masego and Indrani essentially only have each other and her.

KiltedBastich

Exactly. Masego doesn't care where he does his research, as long as he gets to do it. I can see him happily setting up shop in Cardinal, frankly. I mean, the center of name lore for the continent? A magical university? Where else is he going to go?

And Indrani will leave, but she will always come back. That's the difference for her, from Ranger. It will never be "goodbye", always "until we meet again". Which is exactly how things are now, so, no problem. Heck, I could see Concocter settling in Cardinal too, which would give Indrani yet another reason to stick around.

Liliet

Unlike Wekesa, who started literally on the run, Masego had had comfy research to sit with since the end of book 2. And yet every time Cat wanted something of him he said "okay" threw on his coat and walked out.

dadycool

The "Wizard's Tower" for Masego was always just a wing of Cat's palace, and that sums their relationship up perfectly.

Liliet

He also actually had the actual wizard tower in Marchford! Which he then abandoned and moved to Laure with her. And then to Cardinal.

Liliet

* to the Arsenal but you get my point

RoflCat

Well, that IS one way to stop a conflict.

Create another, bigger situation so both parties has to stop fighting.

Which means something is about to get set on fire tonight.

Miles

It's technically treason to call the Queen an arsonist.

sidehammer056302

I'm sorry, did Cat just ride in on a falling magical tower? XD

And finally the confrontation. Very glad that both parties share in the fault and it wasn't just turned on Cat. So heartbreaking, though, I knew this would crush her. I still believe in Hakram, though. I think he'll come through. He'll reach out again, regardless of her murder statement. He's an orc, what's a little murder between best friends?

Ooh, but asking Viv if they were friends. That cut deeeeeeeep. Viv responded well, too. I'm starting to see a little light at the end of the tunnel, something to counter the spiraling I predicted for Cat later down the line. They'll come back. I think it's that simple. Just when things are at their darkest, Indrani, Masego, Viv and Hakram will all come back and prove that while things are dark, there's still hope.

And damn, Akua flicking Cat in the nose to get her back on track, I really loved that. It's "beneath" her, lol! Bombasticity is Cat's trump card yet again, it appears! XD

Silverking

I'm seeing some similarities between the conversation between Cat and Hakram and an earlier conversation between Archer and Concoctor back at the Arsenal. The main similarity that stuck out to me was one party stopping the other dead in their tracks by saying, "Yes, there were real problems and personality clashes, and maybe we could or couldn't have resolved them, but you never bothered to even ASK!"

As for the flying fortress, this might be Cat changing the conversation about the Warden, to the tune of "Forget the dwarves, forget the Dead King, the real problem is that you're fighting to become my counterpart and peer, but NEITHER of you are really at my level."

sidehammer056302

Ohmergerdyesplz!

"You think you're on MY level...? Good luck..."

Reader in the Night

Aaah, Cat is going to use her villainous prerogative and pull a Kairos Theodosian to force Hanno and Cordelia to team up and work together, thus resolving their differences! Genius Stuff!

Of course, for it to work, she has to be the Over-the-Top, hammy Evil of villains of yore (while also providing a credible enough Evil threat that Hanno and Cordy will be forced to work together to stop her). Thus: Pulling a Kairos Theodosian.

It'll burn her with both of them, but I suspect she'll take it if it's the cost for getting them to work together.

shikkarasu

Oh ye GODS; what that why Bard wanted him dead? Because Kairos was a catalyst for bringing the Heroes together?

letouriste

This is so well written, my gods. It was everything we could have hoped this chapter to be. kudos EE

M0och123

Wait, they flying fortresses coming for support?!

I guess it is Praes...

Darkening

The dead king doesn't have proper heroes to inevitably destroy them either! And there's no story for them to fall either with the Bard breaking them lol. So they can actually be effective!

Deworld

That's the best thing about the "Villain vs Villain" conflict. We can see all their tricks in full power without Providence-led heroes who would ruin all the fun. I wish we had more on Drow vs Dead King war.

Daniel E

Villains are not bound by Stories. Every single trope in the universe is now legit; flying fortress, monologue, taunting, offering Heroes a turncoat deal, throwing said Heroes off a cliff. I sincerely hope that EE allows Cat some major indulgences here.

David

Though throwing a hero off a cliff would still have them survive – the survival is tied to a heroic story, after all. It's probably more that the villain won't feel the strong urge to throw them off a cliff, or leave them in a slow deathtrap.

ChillyPepper

The only suitable person for Warden of the West is Akua, she is her equal. Or one of those twice god darned gargoyles, they are acting a bit smarter than the rest of candidates!

erebus42

Honestly the "Doom of Liesse" being made Warden of the West would be quite amusing given it's delightful irony and the fact that it would probably give like 90% of the Heroes an anyerism. Also who doesn't love a bit of the old pining across opposing lines.

David

The absence of a third candidate for Warden of the West has been bugging me all along, given stories, so I'd wonder if what Cat is going to do here is over-the-toply villainously provide her own candidate to derail the entire confrontation.

john

Hakram: Feelings are complicated, good communication is hard.
Vivienne: Doing anything at all might make things even worse!
Akua: Have you tried turning your villainy off and then on again?
Cat: Of course I already... wait, no, that cleared it right up.
Huh.

Miyamoto Musashi:

"To renew" applies when we are fighting with the enemy, and an entangled spirit arises where there is no possible resolution. We must abandon our efforts, think of the situation in a fresh spirit then win in the new rhythm. To renew, when we are deadlocked with the enemy, means that without changing our circumstance we change our spirit and win through a different technique.

Someperson

Well, going full villain certainly ought to get their attention.

Don't like the nature of the current pivot over dwarven policy? Then drop a new and more pressing conflict on them in the form of a sorcerous tower falling from the sky and hold the contest for Warden of the West on your own terms.

Neshamah isn't the only one whose power limiters got removed.

Deworld

Oh yeah. Catherine using a flying fortress of all things means one of the two things: either the world went mad, or her. Neither is good news.

Mincheriit

Thanks for the juicy chapter. Wow that campfire between cat and hakram really got some use with that smoke. So much emotion in that moment.

Cat just used the flying fortress card to get attention of the heroes... well i guess thats an old time classic thats going to backfire in just the right way cat wants lol.

Evgeny Permyakov

Ah, sweet irony. First Cat was the defiant one and now Akua is. Also, defiant Akua. This is going to be good.

MadeThisAccountJustForYou \(@MadeThi54U\)

This chapter was wonky as hell, I'm sorry. Hakram and Cat's firepit was pure soap opera, conversation not because you'd figured out how to have it but just so that you could. What are they hashing out there? That the woe hitched their wagons to Cat's leadership because she was the only one with the nerve to take the reins is beyond well-tread at this point, apparently now that he's done Hakram's done the same thing (and, if memory serves, with the knowledge that he was just walking a similar path with taking responsibility for the path his people were taking because nobody else seemed to be able to) He was having his whinge about an aspect withering seemingly in abject ignorance of the fact that Cat had an aspect CUT OUT because nobody could give her a better idea.

All that and we still seem to be all having to suspend out disbelief so hard that White's plan isn't obvious garbage. He's going to take a bunch of Grand Alliance assets, force open a gate to the kingdom under and start trespassing?! With everything that's been established about the kingdom under that's an invasion pure and simple and the sheer dizzying stupidity of that plan still hasn't been so much as narrated about. So yeah, wonky as hell imo.

I write all of this not because it makes me happy, but because I don't want to see years of work fall apart in an avoidable heap. I love your work, I've loved it for years, but I'm not going to let that love blind me to what might wreck a fitting finale

Lord Haart

Disagree on both counts.

Hakram is right that Cat has massive trust issues and hasn't ever respected the judgement of the Woe except in a few specific cases. The whole thing with Akua really proved that IMO.

Hanno's plan could backfire in theory (and Cat said as much) but he does have Providence backing him still so odds of that are low. More likely he'll at least improve their position with the Dwarves if not get their support for free.

I also think EE is just as good as ever about answering these sorts of story worries in subsequent chapters. The Web Serial format does demand a bit of adaptive thinking and forgiveness to the author for not explaining every detail since they only have limited time to edit.

superkeaton

Naturally, the solution to all of Cat's problems is to give herself more enemies. I had a feeling this would happen.

Zanydruoid

Finally caught up

Chapter 38: Salvo

"It's a matter of principle for me never to have railings built on anything, Chancellor. It saves on both construction costs and retirement pensions."

– Dread Emperor Inimical, the Miser

The flying tower hit the ground with a thunderous sound, earth rippling and breaking under the impact as we 'landed'.

It was like an old god had just had a slugging match with the earth, and it sure as Hells wasn't the earth winning. The foundations of the tower stolen from the broken remnants of Ater groaned, their reinforcing enchantments struggling with the load, but in the end they held. Not that you could tell there'd been doubts, from my comfortable throne under the stars. The viewing platform was so heavily warded not even a gnat could come through without permission and not so much as a shake had made it to my seat. I leaned back against the cushion, sipping at the Vale summer wine I'd sent for. Iridescent strands of magic still skittered across the sky, announcing our presence to anyone who cared to look.

Well, that and the massive amount of Night I'd been accumulating for the better part of an hour now. I figured even onlooking angels had to be a mite worried about that, given that there was now so much of the power roiling around me that the tower itself was beginning to be wreathed in shadow. I figured it'd make for a nice touch, you know, when the heroes showed up: dying lights above, a desolate empty plain around us and a lone tower swallowed by writhing, malicious darkness. The war had killed or seasoned all our greenhorns, but I figured that a few of the younger ones ought to balk at least. I finished my glass and set it down a pearl-encrusted table.

"If I were a maniacal laughter kind of girl," I noted, "that would have been a good time for it."

"Wow," Archer said, sounding impressed. "The power is going straight to your head."

I cocked an eyebrow at her.

"It's kind of hot," she admitted. "It's a Praesi flying tower, you know, so I'm sure if we look there's gotta be a least one revealing dress to-"

I raised a hand at the height of my chest.

"This is where you are right now," I said, then waited a beat. "And this is the expendable asset zone."

She squinted at me.

"You didn't move your hand," she pointed out.

"No, I did not," I pleasantly smiled. "So are you sure that downwards is the direction you want to keep digging?"

I'd never gotten to throw anyone down a tower before. I felt like doing it at least the once would allow me to better understand the people that I represented as Warden of the East, which was definitely the main reason I wanted to do that and not because it seemed like everyone else had gotten to. Just in case I began eyeing the rampart and working out the angles.

"Message received," Archer cheerfully replied.

She then knelt and made a melodramatically sombre face, because she'd always been a wench and always would be.

"What are your orders, Your Dark Mistrastery?" she sinisterly asked.

Wait, had she just pushed together mistress and maj- no, Catherine, don't let yourself be sucked into her pace.

"I need you to go to the edge of the rampart and look at how long we've got before they show up," I said, then paused. "Also, send for a refill. My glass is empty."

Indrani eyed me skeptically.

"And you can't walk the like ten feet to the edge of the wall to look yourself, because..." she trailed off.

My lips thinned.

"Disloyalty is severely punished in this outfit, wench," I warned her.

She studied me for a long moment, then suddenly grinned.

"You can't get up, can you?" Indrani said.

Shit.

"Of course I can," I lied.

"Do it," she challenged. "Just for two heartbeats. Do it and I'll speak entirely in rhyme for an entire month."

I shifted in my seat.

"Look," I defensively said, "it's not my fault the mages built this damn thing so that all the channelling arteries end up right under the throne. If I stop touching it-"

"You lose control of a bunch of the power you've gathered," Archer said grin, widening. "Oh Gods, you're literally stuck in that seat until they show up aren't you?"

"How far are they?" I whined. "The back of my knee itches and I don't want to have to take off the armour bending around on the chair."

"You're a tragedy," Indrani amusedly told me.

She went to have a look, though, so I let it pass without censure.

"So?"

"We've got a dozen riding hard our way," Archer said. "And that cloak is pretty hard to mistake: Shiny Boots is in the lead."

I hummed.

"Is the Witch of the Woods with them?" I asked.

"I would have mentioned the giant monster wolf, Cat," she snorted.

Good. We'd been pretty sure she wouldn't be there, since she was supposed to be fixing a breach in the wards up north, but it was hard to be sure with her. The Witch avoided cities and even towns like the plague whenever she could, so it was even more difficult to keep track of her than your average Named. I'd had a backup plan in case she did end up being there, but I was happier not having to use it. Since Cordelia had taken to using the ealamal like a goddamn party trick the boundary with Arcadia had damned hard to breach in the region. Tabula rasa, Masego called the effect. Pissing angel light all over the land fixed the accumulated damage in the fabric of Creation.

Two breaches in a single evening would have taken more out of me than I'd like.

"The First Prince?" I pressed.

"Nowhere in sight," Indrani said. "Told you it was long odds."

I waved a hand.

"She's not the one I want to talk to anyway," I said. "And I've already gotten most of what I want."

"Breaking up a party," Indrani solemnly said. "Shame on you, Cat. You used to be fun."

"It was a Good party," I argued. "They would have all drunk responsibly and there'd have been no brawling."

Except for the Levantines, I mentally corrected. They definitely would have drunk too much and brawled. Indrani snorted, then her eyes turned serious even as the smile remained.

"You think it'll be enough?" she asked. "It's not even half of them riding here."

I suspected that probably had more to do with the number of horses fit for a hard ride they'd had on hand than interest, but that hadn't been the thrust of her thought.

"Hanno left," I said. "That kills his plan as well as whatever Hasenbach was cooking up to match him."

"He could just do it tomorrow morning," Indrani said.

I'll have gotten my licks in before then, I thought. I still answered, because it would have been arrogance to assume what I intended was guaranteed to work.

"A repeat?" I dismissively shrugged. "He's free to try. Won't have the same weight, though. I stole that by slapping down a gauntlet through the clouds and daring him to pick it up. My bet is he'll push it back a day or two, trying to gather momentum again, but by then it'll be a different game."

"It's coming close to supporting Hasenbach," Archer said.

I smiled, cold and lean.

"If she gets something out of tonight, good for her," I said. "But I'm not doing it on her behalf. When I laid down the gauntlet, I was completely serious."

Archer slowly nodded.

"You'd really do it?" she asked.

I clenched my fingers, then unclenched them.

"I will, 'Drani," I said. "If Hanno doesn't give me a good reason not to, I'll eat the Book of Some Things."

I'd not gathered all this Night on a lark. Indrani hummed.

"At this rate," she told me, "Shiny Boots and attendants will be there in two hours."

I cursed in Mthethwa.

"You're going to have to help me out of my armour," I told her. "And send for the damn bottle, would you?"

—

A warband of heroes approached my tower on half-dead horses.

Picking out the faces and Names, they'd come ready for a fight. They had the steel: Vagrant Spear, Mirror Knight, Myrmidon, Bloody Sword and Valiant Champion. A balance of Light and magic for their backline: Forsworn Healer, Blessed Artificer, Apprentice and the Wise Astrologer. Then a pair of specialists, the Bitter Blacksmith and the Painted Knife, with Hanno himself the last of the lot. Exactly twelve in all. They rode across the yellow grass towards the tower's gate, their silhouettes cast in moonlight as shadows roiled before them.

Twelve heroes to the seven villains lying in wait. Most of them of better calibre too. It was a good thing I had no intention of picking a fair fight.

I was watching them all through eyes of Night I'd seeded into the writhing darkness embracing the tower, using it as cover. At a long distance I'd been forced to rely on Indrani's eyes, but up close these would do just fine. Hanno was leading them to the gate, in front with the Astrologer and the Champion, but aside from that they were pretty loosely arranged. Most of the Levantines were clustered in the back, talking excitedly in one of their languages as they pointed at the tower. The Sword of Judgement rode ahead of his two companions, white cloak trailing behind him as he stared up with hard eyes.

"Warden of the East," he called out, "open your gates. You owe explanation."

I snorted, up on my throne, as I began to mould the Night within the tower. Yeah, like that was going to work. I still couldn't leave my seat, but thankfully I had assigned a gatekeeper. He'd gotten his latest orders from Indrani, who had proclaimed herself my herald safe in the knowledge that I couldn't get up to contradict her. Given even that minute amount of authority she had immediately become a hedonistic tyrant, as everyone even remotely knowing her had seen coming. Still, I did wonder how Ishaq was going to interpret 'slow them down, without fighting if possible'.

"To pass this gate," a ghastly voice answered from an arrowslit above the gate, "you must answer my riddles three."

Goddamnit, Ishaq. The Barrow Sword had been handed an enchanted necklace that'd lace his voice with horror, an old Praesi favourite, but that wasn't going to be enough to carry this. There was a pregnant pause from the heroic side. Getting the Night in place was taking longer than I'd thought it would, even with the tower mostly emptied so I wouldn't have to worry about collateral damage. He better keep them busy for a while still or this wasn't going to work.

"We won't be doing that," Hanno politely replied. "Stop trying to buy time and open the gate."

"Lord," the Vagrant Spear cut in, sounding appalled.

All the Levantines except the Painted Knife, who was rolling her eyes, seemed to agree. Sidonia looked up at the arrowslit.

"Speak your riddles, gatekeeper," the Vagrant Spear called out.

... I took it back, Ishaq had at least a vague idea of what he was doing. He began to give them his first riddle and I kept half an eye on the situation as I continued moulding the Night, layering it carefully, and noticed that the Wise Astrologer was quietly talking with the Apprentice. Who looked a little uncomfortable as he nodded. Ugh, the Astrologer. She was barely even a mage, I was pretty sure at least half a fraud, and I didn't care that – the older Ashuran heroine pointed her finger, the Apprentice's magic flashed in fire and I lost one of the Night eyes I'd hidden. I lost another four in quick succession, almost half the ones I'd seeded. My flesh eye narrowed.

"Dicer," I spoke into the Night. "Hit the Astrologer."

The Pilfering Dicer was a rather minor villain I'd assigned to the First Prince's service after having disciplined him for bad behaviour. He had, you see, stolen luck from my soldiers. That was his trick, stealing luck from others. And tonight, with no story hanging above our heads to punish us for overstepping, I had no hesitation in using him against heroes. I got a hesitant nod from the young man in reply and he dipped into his Name a moment later. Three heartbeats later, the Astrologer's horse saw something move in the grass it got spooked. She got shaken right off the saddle, landing on her back with strength enough it would bruise.

I coldly smiled.

"Well done," I praised through the Night, even as Hanno's face hardened.

"That was an attack," he called out at the gate. "I felt it. Enough of these games."

Even as the Levantines protested he bared his sword, but he was just a little too slow. The Mirror Knight had already dismounted, and with a few quick strides he stood before the steel-barded gates of the tower. Sighing, he took a sharp step forward and slammed his helmeted head into the gate. It groaned. Another and it cracked. A third and it broke. On the fourth, the steel bars keeping it closed snapped and the gate flew open. The human-shaped battering ram took a step back, brushing away wooden shards.

"There," Christophe de Pavanie said. "Shall we get on with it?"

That was a little impressive, but the Barrow Sword had done exactly what I'd asked of him: he'd bought me enough time to finish my preparations.

"Cursed are you who broke the pact of entrance," Ishaq told them in that horrifying voice. "You will know no rest in this world or the next."

Now that was just dedication to the job, I approvingly thought. Even better, some of the Levantines looked like they were taking him seriously.

"Astrologer?" Hanno asked.

"I've never seen so much Night in one place before," the Ashuran told him, grimacing. "It is difficult to tell what it is meant for."

"Then we press on," Hanno grimly replied.

"I could hammer at the tower," the Blessed Artificer offered, "I have prepared-"

"Warning shot," I ordered through the Night.

The black arrow streaked down, landing less than a hair's breadth away from the end of Adanna of Smyrna's left foot. She wore good leather boots, but not so good they'd stop an arrow fired by Archer. She yelped and flinched away, but it wasn't her I'd been looking at. Hanno's eyes narrowed. A message received, then. I was only going to play nice so long as they did. The moment the gloves came off for them, I stopped holding back.

"We press on," Hanno repeated, voice firmer. "Prepare yourselves, we are awaited."

They must have talked tactics on the ride over, because they got into a formation without much jostling. Hanno and the Mirror Knight in front, Champion and Myrmidon out back, their strikers distributed according to range and their most vulnerable Named safely encircled by steel. It was pretty well thought out, I noted as they passed the threshold of the broken gates and entered the bottom floor of the tower. It'd be difficult to crack in a fight, especially considering the small number of villains I'd judged safe to bring into this. A shame for them it wouldn't matter. Within a heartbeat of the entire warband having ventured into the dark, I pressed down with all my might and the Night I'd been moulding obeyed.

There floor under their feet broke and all of them were dropped into Arcadia. Separated.

And best of all, I could finally get up from the throne.

—

I'd not known for sure how many would come, so ten cells had seemed a safe bet.

Not that I meant 'cells' in the sense of iron bars, of course, since throwing a hero in a dungeon was a recipe to have them rampaging all over your fortress before the day was done. I had instead made sure that they ended up in different, distant parts of Arcadia. The difficulty was that I needed to move them towards one destination or another while they were transitioning, and naturally the opiniated little bastards fought me over it. Fine, it wouldn't be a perfect spread then. I'd still mostly get my way.

I dropped the Myrmidon and the Bloody Sword on a sunny island in the middle of a deep lake, keeping a single eye on them from the shadow of the trees. Neither was hurt, and I could now consider them pretty much out of the game: both of them were a whirlwind of pain when you let them get in lose, but they had no mobility trick and no deep experience with Arcadia. Let them swim their way to the shore and wander around, it'd take them hours and even providence couldn't magically bring them to another hero able to guide them.

I tossed the Painted Knife into a swamp near a fae tower, betting that she'd get curious and waste her time there. If allowed to wander she had the potential to be a pain, as a stealthy Named, but between the mud and the distraction she should keep out of my hair. The Blessed Artificer would need careful handling, so I dropped her into a natural well. It was a deep stone shaft with even deeper water at the bottom, in a mountain valley, so while she was in no real danger she'd have to be careful about blowing her way out if she didn't want to bring half a mountain down on her head. Most likely she'd burn through a bunch of her smaller Light trinkets to carve steps, which I had no issue with. While it might be the massive workings that made her a real threat, in practice she only had a handful of those to call on. Disarming her of the rest would do much to box her in.

The Forsworn Healer was the first to fight me off successfully. I'd meant to dump him in the middle of an open and empty plain, let him wander around, but my nudge was slapped aside and he clung to the Valiant Champion instead. That wasn't great, I thought, but neither was it horrible. I'd sent her into the broken echo of an old battle, the massacre of some Alamans tribe by what had to be Triumphant's ancient Legions of Terror, and while the ghosts wouldn't be able to hurt them getting out of a shard like that could be tricky. The Healer might be able to guide them out, though, so the Champion would be back in play sooner than I would have liked.

That could be dealt with.

"Harrowed Witch," I called out.

The answer came promptly through the Night.

"Yes, ma'am?"

"Draw fae to the battlefield shard," I ordered. "That hunting party out in the woods ought to do nicely."

Only one noble there, Indrani had told me, and not a powerful one. Even if one of them did end up wounded, well, they had a healer along. Hopefully they'd enjoy tangling with a pack of fae in the middle of what was essentially a violent illusory field, I thought with just a drop of viciousness. I did manage to split the Astrologer and the Apprentice, putting my back into it, but the fucking Astrologer managed to wiggle her way into falling along with the Vagrant Spear. I'd chosen for them low hills that looked like Twilight, banking on confusion, but that wouldn't work. And the Astrologer pointed at my eyes within moments, the Spear killing them in bursts of Light.

I'd lost sight on them, which was potentially problematic.

The Apprentice I nudged towards a beautiful golden apple orchard, since she was a good kid and she'd looked a little hungry. She, uh, fell through a bunch of branches on her way down which I'd not meant her to but she seemed to walk off with only bruises. I'd known from the start that moving the Mirror Knight would be like trying to punch a rock barehanded, so him I just let fall straight down. He landed on an old raised stone, which he cracked bouncing off, and got his footing almost immediately. Already he'd be able to see my tower's Arcadian reflection in the distance, but I had plans to slow him down.

A heartbeat after him the Bitter Blacksmith followed him down, landing in the grass with a thump. The Mirror Knight would be able to run full tilt the whole way to the tower in full plate, he was that kind of ridiculous, but the Blacksmith definitely could not. She was built like one of her trade: for effort, not long runs. Christophe wouldn't abandon her alone in Arcadia, so they'd be moving at her pace instead of his. It wasn't perfect, but it bought me time. And time was what I needed, I thought as I angled Hanno for his own fall. Light flared for a moment as he burned away the Night, but a heartbeat later he realized I was sending him exactly where he wanted to go and stopped.

Like a falling star, white cloak trailing behind him, the Sword of Judgement fell before the roiling darkness of my tower. Knees bending as he landed in crouch, he rose smoothly with his sword in hand and did not bat an eye before beginning to advance. Best get the reception ready, else he'd be on me before I'd finished the last of my preparations.

"Barrow Sword," I spoke into the Night. "Entertain our guest."

"Of course," Ishaq lightly agreed. "Rules?"

"Nothing permanent," I said. "Withdraw if it gets too heated."

"Understood."

I moved my will through the Night, finding another villain.

"Hunted Magician," I said.

"You have my attention, Warden," the man easily replied.

"The Barrow Sword and our favourite guest are about to fight in the gatehouse," I said. "Be a dear and shoot the White Knight in the back while he's busy, would you?"

I got a delighted laugh back.

"Your Excellency," the Hunted Magician replied, "it will be my very great pleasure."

I didn't even bother to tell him to keep it nonlethal. The Magician was a predictable sort of a creature: he'd not want to risk the backlash of killing Hanno even if I had given him such an order. That ought to keep Shiny Boots busy for a while, even if it'd definitely not turn him away. Opening my eye, I ripped off the globe of Night I'd burrowed my head in and dispersed it. The strands of darkness slithered around my skin, going down below my seat where the channel would lead them to the heart of the tower. The preliminaries were finished, all the forces in movement and accounted for. I could begin my ritual with a degree of assurance that I wouldn't be jumped.

Finally, I rose from my throne. Reaching out with my hand without looking, I found my staff of yew waiting. Rolling my shoulders, I adjusted the Mantle of Woe and began limping my way to the stairs. Barely three steps in, there was a tug at the Night. I flicked my wrist and circle of Night appeared by my head as I kept moving.

"Archer," I said. "I'm listening."

"Painted Knife is loose," Indrani said. "She captured the fae tower keeper and cut off fingers until he gave her directions. She's headed straight for the tower."

Well, that'd gotten out of hand impressively quick.

"She's still in the swamps, right?" I asked.

"Yeah," Indrani replied. "I'm keeping an eye on her from a distance."

"I'll handle it," I said. "Astrologer and Vagrant Spear are in the hills and they killed my eyes, I want you to look in on them."

"Gotcha."

I'd put the Painted Knife near the edge of the swamp not only because that was where the tower was. It was also because there was a little spot of trouble deeper in. I moved my will through the Night and found the villain I was looking for.

"Dicer," I said.

"Ma'am," he replied, sounding wary.

No doubt he'd been hoping that after stepping in once he'd be able to stay out of it. The little bastard wasn't that lucky, though. At least not yet.

"Steal the Painted Knife's luck," I ordered. "As much of it as you can."

"Is it, er, all right if I run away afterwards?" the Pilfering Dicer.

"I'd actually prefer it," I honestly replied.

With a sigh of relief on his part, the conversation ended. The Dicer's little trick ought to compensate for providence enough that the house-sized and very territorial heron in the swamps would pick up on the sudden scent of blood in its territory. That ought to keep the Painted Knife busy for a while longer. I'd barely taken another three steps before Archer was tugging at the Night again.

"Cat," she said the moment the circle formed next to my head. "You sent a hunting party after the Champion and the Healer, right?"

"Asked the Witch to lure one in, yes," I corrected. "And?"

"Half of the fae are dead, they stole two horses and now they're riding out of the battle echo at a gallop," Indrani bluntly said.

I rubbed the bridge of my nose. Fine. Fucking fae, and to think they'd been so reliably awful when I started out. Those two were a genuine problem if they got to Hanno, they'd be able to support him well enough he'd blow straight to the chamber where I was keeping the Book. Worse, I realized as I closed my eye and visualized the path they'd be taking, they'd be coming through the plains where the Mirror Knight and the Blacksmith were walking. If they gave a horse to the Mirror Knight, this was going to head downhill real quick. Although, wait, technically to the east of them...

"Hold on a moment," I said, plunging my head into the circle of Night.

I found the eye I was looking for, the one in the swamp where the Painted Knife had landed. While I couldn't see either her or the Pilfering Dicer, I could see the very large and very angry red heron storming through the swamp. Yeah, that could work. I withdrew my head from the circle.

"I'm going to have the Witch light up the swamp, it'll draw their attention to a fight brewing there," I said. "Should delay them long enough."

Then I paused.

"How good at flying are herons, do you know?" I asked.

"Average, I'd think?" Indrani replied.

Yeah, I wasn't taking the chance.

"See the giant red bird?" I asked.

A moment passed.

"Found it," she replied.

"Shoot one of the wings," I said. "Something the Forsworn Healer won't be able to heal. And I still want you on the Astrologer and Sidonia when you have a moment, so keep moving."

"I hear ya, Your Dreadsome Majority."

I rolled my eye at her, even knowing she wouldn't be able to see it. Taking a wing would make it an easier fight for them, but I wasn't going to have this end in the three heroes riding the giant bird to the tower. It was easy enough to call on the Harrowed Witch and have her cast a lightshow around the swamps, which had the added benefit of making the heron significantly angrier. I got to the bottom of the stairs, at least, before the next set of bad news. From the Royal Conjurer, this time, whom I'd been hoping to keep back until the last moment.

"Your Excellency," the old man said. "The Blessed Artificer is drowning."

I rubbed the bridge of my nose.

"She tried to blow her way out through the fucking mountain, didn't she?" I guessed.

"That appears to be the case," the Royal Conjurer agreed.

Goddamn Adanna. She was actually going to be the first one to take someone on my side off the board by sheer virtue of having put herself into such a bad situation. I'd kept the Conjuror near the valley as a precaution in case she got out too early, not thinking she'd get herself killed.

"Get her out," I sighed. "You won't make it back in time for the reception, but it can't be helped."

Leaving her to die would push this further than I was willing to take it. Even if it weakened my second line of defence more than I'd like. Aspasie will have to do instead.

"And should she attack me after she's been rescued?" the old man mildly asked.

I snorted.

"I said get her out," I replied. "Never said anything about her being conscious. Our charity has limits."

"Indeed," the Royal Conjuror lightly replied, and I would have bet good money he was smirking.

That did some to improve my mood, at least until Archer tugged at the Night again.

"Let me guess," I sighed, "they seduced the goddamn King of Arcadia and he's giving them a ride to the tower on his personal flying chariot?"

"Good news or bad news?" Archer asked.

"Good news," I said.

Could so with some of those.

"The Astrologer helped Sidonia to some strange Light trick and she shot up a pillar in the sky as a signal," Indrani said. "I'm pretty sure only two people saw it, though, the Mirror Knight and the Bitter Blacksmith. They're trying to link up, but looking at it Sidonia and the Ashuran are going the wrong way entirely."

Which would slow down the heroic battering ram even more. The hills were to the east of the region where I'd dispersed the heroes, it was very much going off-road for the pair that'd been in a straight line to the tower since the start.

"The bad news?" I asked.

"Only the Blacksmith is headed that way," Indrani cheerfully said. "The Mirror Knight is now running after the tower like it stole his glistening codpiece."

I swore. So when they'd figured there were other heroes close by good ol' Christophe had felt comfortable pawing off the Blacksmith in their general direction. That was a problem.

"Pull back to the tower," I said. "We're starting early."

"You got something in mind for handling Polished Ponce?" Archer curiously asked.

"He's shit with illusions," I said. "I'm going to have to tie down the Harrowed Witch keeping him out, but it's a worthwhile trade."

And there went my backup for the second line of defence, not that the woman in question seemed to mind. If anything, Aspasie seemed relieved when I gave the order. She'd be sitting out the rest of this, after all: her only duty would be hiding herself and making the Mirror Knight believe the tower was in another direction entirely. It was a good bet that sooner or later a comrade would run into him and help him out of the illusion, but that'd take a while. Not as long as I'd like, but that was why plans had to be kept flexible. And mine was, in a manner of speaking. See, since I knew that the heroes had kept their stories but my side didn't it was much easier to predict how events would unfold.

Like if I were to say, begin a ritual to eat the Book of Some Things?

Everyone would converge on the tower immediately and Hanno would begin smashing whoever was in his way at the time. I could have put everyone on fighting him from the start, sure, but it would have been a mistake. It would all be a single 'fight' that he'd blow through when I began the ritual and providence put a finger to the scale so he could stop me in time. And if I didn't begin the ritual, then providence would begin nudging every hero to get there to reinforce him in time – which was still a loss condition for me. No, much as it ran against my instinct to disperse my forces what I needed was a second line of defence after he got his. Fortunately, she was already on her way back to the tower. I would have liked for the Royal Conjuror or at least the Harrowed Witch to back Archer up, but we'd have to do without.

The butt of my staff rapped against the stone floor as I entered the chamber where all the writhing strands of Night converged, stone walls covered with carvings and runes humming with power. On a pedestal awaited an unimpressive leather-bound book. There was nothing special about it, until you noticed that no shadow seemed to be able to come within precisely seven inches of it. Mind you, for anything with a shred of a sense for power the Book of Some Things felt like a storm shoved into a teacup.

"You know," I told the Book, "there's usually rules about this. Like, don't eat unknown magic or you'll blow up. Don't double-cross devils for kicks or try to cannibalize gods."

Wood on stone, a gentle rap as I limped forward.

"Only they're not rules so much as stories," I said. "And those are out of the game, at the moment. So it's still a risk, just between you me, and I won't pretend otherwise. But it's a risk and not a risk, you get me?"

I leaned forward.

"So I'll admit that I'm a little curious," I murmured. "I know my teeth are sharp, but are they that sharp?"

I smiled, drawing back, and reached out. Strands of Night began to flow from the walls to my hand, returning to me. By my ear, I felt bare fangs as an old friend grinned her approval. I sank into the shadows one last time, and saw through my eyes on the tower. In the distance, I glimpsed riders. Coming closer. Not many, but not few. At their head rode the Kingfisher Prince, but their leading banner was not his: it was a mountain crowned in bronze on a field dark blue. The heraldry of Rhenia, the First Prince's banner. So you're going to show up as well, Cordelia, I smiled. Good. It's better this way. My eye opened and I looked down at the stolen stories of Good made into an artefact.

"Let's find out," I grinned, and the Night howled.

Insanenoodlyguy

"Let me guess," I sighed, "they linked the goddamn King of Arcadia and he's giving them a votes for PTTE on his personal gaming desktop?"

topwebfiction.com/listings/a-practical-guide-to-evil

moonmoon

bruh there was 1 chapter where no1 put a stupid god damn annoying changed quote to vote in the comments and it was glorious. your actively lowering enjoyment of the story for people. plus the repeated spam buys you no sympathy or willingness to do what you say.

ISiejek

There were plenty of chapters with none, and while admittedly I'm not too keen on this one, the best ones are really good to read, I.e., an improvement

anoxymoron

I love these comments, and using the unscientific method of counting votes in the comments, that seems like the majority opinion. How hard is it to just not read things that annoy you?

Insanenoodlyguy

If my or anybody's silly little quote reminder is enough to put you off doing something that helps the webnovel, I suspect you were too lazy to do it in the first place, and so highly doubt I incurred a net loss for Erratic here. If I actually hurt your story enjoyment, with a comment you don't even see until you have finished reading the story, I question how much you were enjoying the story. In short I apologize for nothing and intend to do this again should the opportunity arise to do so.

jamesc9

Yes, somewhere along the way, I became too lazy.

I suspect that the changes in how topwebfiction voting worked were part of it.

This conflict is also part of it.

The leading proponent of one side of the conflict explained why it mattered to them. Do you want me to look back and link to it?

Rabblrouser

What a weird thing to cry about.

Shaerick 68

Speak for yourself dude, you are not forced to read them and many readers find them humorous.

j

It's cooled by liquid ice.

Why wouldn't the bard just turn the Evil stories back on at the worst possible moment for Cat?

Insanenoodlyguy

She might. I have a feeling that cat has an unspoken plan for just that.

Linnus42

Ah so Barrow is going to get his chance to fight Hanno. I am not sure that is going to be as fun as he wants it to be. Curious to see what Cat does with the Book. And what the consequences of this mess will be. Still I kinda want Hanno and Cordelia POV. If they are the main competitors then it be nice to get in their head.

Insanenoodlyguy

Nah, it probably will. He's not trying to kill him. That'd get him killed, villian story pause or not a hero with that boost against the first line of defense in the evil fortress would shred him apart. But he's not doing that, he's stalling. She WANTS Hanno to make it to her, But at the right moment. The key is keeping it one on one to ensure the right kind of timing. With that, the Barrow Sword can make it take just as long as necessary, getting a lick or two in and taking 2-3 back, but probably able to have fun with this, and when it starts to turn say something pithy as he withdraws. Might not go that way but his odds are decent.

Linnus42

I meant more Cat should be more worried about Barrow holding out then she is Barrow hurting Hanno. Hanno holding back crushed Mirror Knight. So there are decent odds holding back isn't nearly as much of limitation on Hanno as it is Ishaq. I suppose the main factors are how much not having Name makes Hanno weaker and how much damage he is willing to do to Barrow to get it done quickly. Depends on how good the healers are really.

shikkarasu

He still has a wisp of White Knight left, Cat mentioned that she is pretty sure he can still use Recall to some extent, and he is Claimant to Warden. He should still have a fair amount of juice, he just needs to be canny about it. Like how Amadeus fought smart and not hard when he went up against Hanno.

And that's why Cat ordered him shot.

beleester

Barrow is a pretty durable hero. Like, we haven't really seen him do astonishing things in combat, but he's a competent bodyguard, he wears magic armor, and he can come back from the dead if necessary. Probably her best choice for keeping Hanno busy without losing anyone.

Nairne .01

Those would be nice interludes.

dadycoool

That was fun. It's always a hoot to watch Cat dance, and we even got to glimpse her Name-wolf at the end.

Nairne .01

I really like the way you called it even though I always imagined it as something more savage and coiling inside, yet still warg-like in appearance.

The way it shows its face makes me think of a dragon opening its eye when something interesting is happening so it can have a better look.

Agent J

It always struck me as a tiger. All instinct and malice.

moonmoon

does it then sniff distainingly, roll over, and go back to sleep if whatever's happening isn't interesting enough or ends?

ohJohN

Huh, I also thought it was a wolf, but now I can't remember if that was explicit in the text or just something I assumed.

We do know it has fur, at least (Cat pulls herself up by it in... Wolof, I think?).

Cicero

Well... that escalated quickly.

I guess "stop having a pissing match and keep the villain from eating all the Heroic Stories" is an effective means of reconciling Cordelia and Hanno.

Max Anonymous

oh my god I am loving this arc this is amazing. Cat playing the part of a proper Evil Empress is so much fun holy shit I can't wait for the next chapter.

Also that final line made me think...
What do heroes know?

Do they know things?
Lets find out!

Axel Rafael

Mr. Peanutbutter in the house? 😊

Bojack Horseman is such an underrated show.

erebus42

Awww! That was rather maternal of Cat looking after the Apprentice like that.
She has always been good at making good use of her people and their skills but this is a rather impressive showing.
I'm still trying to figure out how this will potentially turn Hanno down a better path though.

erebus42

*Hanno and or Cordelia

Insanenoodlyguy

Hanno and Cordelia were moving in specifically contrary directions. Normally, as Cat noted, one wins and the other is pragmatic and good aligned enough to take the loss and say "okay, not my ideal outcome, but your warden, how can I help you save the continent?" But instead each is doing something that dicks over the other, and whoever wins they've still been fucked over, and fucked the other worse, and now their ability to work together is significantly reduced. Cat suspects Bard directly aimed for that. She doesn't have the juice, the charisma or even the time to get them both to just stop and sit down and talk, they are both moving ahead full steam and it's too important to stop now. So cat pulled out the ultimate distraction. Big bad is making the power play that dooms all, personal quests are paused and since the hero and villian always end up taking during these things anyway, Cat now has that time to sort things with Hanno. But it went even better then she'd hoped:

But heroes about to irrevocably about to fuck things up for each other have one solid Providence for exactly this situation: just before the point of no return, the real threat shows up, clearly evil and requiring everybody to stop their shit and work together. And in the process of working together or immediately afterwards they find the common ground that lets them solve things to the benefit of all. Except the villian, they are fucked. But that last part not today.

ninegardens

... is Cat going to force these kids to work together? Is that her wild plan?

Or just change the game to "Whoever rescues the book wins. Screw all this philosophy bullshit?"

Cause if that the case... she foiled Hannos plan, but then parked the game FIRMLY in his wheelhouse in terms of doing things.

Silverking

No, her conversation earlier in the chapter indicated that this little exercise is intended as a delay, not a true pivot. I feel this is more calling Hanno out. "You wanna be the Warden of the West? You claim to be my equal? Show me what you got, because what I've seen doesn't put you on MY level, let alone the Dead King's." Cat's going to show that she's good enough at this game that the "finger on the scales" isn't going to enough, that Hanno is going to have to change his approach if he wants to have a chance of winning the REAL battle.

Miles

Cat: It's eight o'clock, and I'm callin' you out!

Hanno: It's not eight yet!

Cat: It is by my watch! Let's settle this once and for all, runt! Or ain't you got the gumption?

Juff

Typo Thread:

had damned > had been damned
The rode > They rode as he nodded > as she nodded
There floor > The floor opiniated > opinionated Sidonia to some > Sidonia do some side didn't > side hadn't or t least > or at least you me > you and me field dark blue > field of dark blue

Sinead

"Who looked a little uncomfortable as he nodded. Ugh, the Astrologer."

he -> she, since it's Astrologer and Apprentice in this context. Unless 'he' is someone completely different?

ohJohn

Almost definitely meant to refer to the Apprentice: she's mentioned at the very end of the previous sentence; she then starts sending fireballs where the Astrologer points, implying the nod was her agreeing to do so; and it makes sense she'd be a little uncomfortable about it, since she's on good terms with Cat.

Adrian V

A bit of fridge brilliance (maybe) but maybe the fae are so useless here is because being dependent on stories so much the muting of half of them affected them a lot.

Also poor Addanna they are never letting her live this one down lol

Reader in the Night

Ah, I see Cat's pulling an Irritant: making losing her win-condition to game Providence into giving her exactly what she wants.

Also, where the hell is Akua to witness Dread Empress Cat hamming it up with the best of them? She would get such a kick out of this.

And yeah, if the two Warden claimants can't stop the Evil Villain from eating the Book of Some Things, they don't deserve it in the first place. Which means Cat will be inevitably stopped, but maybe Providence will knock Hanno and Cordelia's heads together and tell them to play nice in process?

Rey d`Tutto

After storming the Dread Tower, both Claimants will see their personal plans in Ruins, and Cooperate to forge a Better Solution.

Old Trope. Bronze Age.

And Cat just got an Opportunity to Monologue.
Nay, a Good Story expectation of a Villainous Monologue.

Which is what she needed from the get-go.

Brilliant writing. Awesome Trope/Story-fu. Both within the Fiction, as well as the World-building of the Fiction.

Meta-Appause for a Metaverse at the ISMETA epitaph level.

Sir Nil

I love that the Levantine heroes and villains got really into it. Barrow Sword pulling out them riddles while the heroes protested just slamming down the door. With all the practical evil nonsense few people would have had a chance to have a good ol raiding the dark tower of evil spar.

Reader in the Night

My headcanon is now that all the Levantines are basically very enthusiastic LARPers when it comes to Named shenanigans.

dadycoool

So, every Levantine Blood Name is just dressing up in their ancestors' outfits?

Actually, this could work with the whole Face Paint thing the Levantines have going. How many cosplayers IRL paint their face to be more in character? Never mind how many dye their hair.

LarsBlitzer

Well, when the LARP in question can and will lead to the possibility of pulling off some impressive "Crouching Tiger, Hidden Dragon" wu xia shit if you play well enough and be fortunate to be born into the right family, you'll start taking it seriously. Hell, I've seen some truly Machiavellian scheming go down in real life LARPS over who gets to have an extra slice of pizza or XP point.

beleester

The Levantines are very much the D&D adventurer type of heroes. They explore the dangerous wilderness, fight monsters, raid barrows for ancient treasure, etc. Of course they wouldn't just skip past a dungeon puzzle.

ohJohn

I interpreted it as some shared cultural belief among Levantines, along the lines of "bypassing riddles gets you killed" (probably related to barrows and/or the Brocelian). That's how Ishaq knew it would be an effective stall, that's why even the Champion – who is Hanno's best friend and canonically hates riddles – is among those appalled by Hanno refusing to engage, and that's why some of them take Ishaq's parting "y'all're cursed now" seriously.

(fr tho, Rafaella "fucking hate[s] riddles" 😏: <https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2021/05/04/interlude-north-i/>)

Rey d`Tutto

I love your due diligence of posting the link.

nimelennar

Dammit, Cat. Stories or not, you have to remember rule 22: No matter how tempted I am with the prospect of unlimited power, I will not consume any energy field bigger than my head.

It's just common sense.

Sinead

The book is not that big...

Silverking

Good, Cat, unleash your inner Tyrant! "I know this is probably a bad idea and won't work...but what if it did? I have to at least try, both for my own satisfaction, and to see the look on Hanno's face!"

dadycool

She's basically grabbing a copper pole, going to the top of a mountain and saying "Do it. You won't, pussy." at the sky. "Sure, this'll probably zap me into a guided tour of every hell, but what if it doesn't?"

shikkarasu

Sweet Sisters of Night, I am using that exact taunt in my next DnD session.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

She literally spends the first part of the chapter with her head submerged in a floating Night bubble, and later sticks her head into another one to more effectively monitor the heroes. I feel like the fact that she's generating rather than consuming them is beside the point.

Rey d`Tutto

The Book of Some Things is a Tome, not a trade paperback. Think Research Book in a big Library. A Foot to half a Meter high and wide, and Thick. Is it bigger than her head? In at least 2(two) dimensions, I'd say.

WuseMajor

Well that's the thing. Villains aren't bound by stories right now. So Hubris doesn't get automatically Punished anymore.

shikkarasu

Hubris is just insufficient planning and Catherine's plan is well thought out and flexible. Look, look how those F00LS have struggled against her and all they have accomplished is burying the Artificer under a mountain. They cannot POSSIBLY escape her BRILLIANTmeanwhile, in the void

Bard: Why do I feel like I should be rolling over in my grave? It's like I'm missing... something.

ninegardens

Is Cat going to monolouge?

Like, is she just going to go full ham and take the chance to monolouge while there are no stories around to punish her for it?

shikkarasu

If she doesn't I will be cross. She gets to toss out a 'Sorry, Dad, but I'm taking this' into the void, but she better get that peak drama out of her system in a safe environment. I live vicariously through her and I need this in my life.

Rey d`Tutto

With both Hanno and Cordy present to endure her Monologue?

I haven't read ahead, but I'll call it as I sees it. She will monologue, and the Heroes will "upset" her plans in the most Practical Good outcome.

shikkarasu

Hah! You think my head isn't big enough? All the power has gone to it! It's HUGE.

Miles

LOL

She's setting up a story for a final showdown between herself and Abigail whoever her heroic counterpart turns out to be.

Frivolous

At this point or soon, I would expect the Intercessor to appear and make a mess of things, to try to salvage her scheme to ruin the heroes in general and the candidates for Warden of the West in particular.

That is the reason why I think someone important is missing: Masego. I think the Hierophant is being held in reserve to deal with the Intercessor if she dares to appear.

Jdburger

Yea but I think the Intercessor cannot... She used her 3 shots during the Praesi campaign to stop Cat and has to contain the Evil stories. I the plot with the Warden of the West has just been continuing by its own momentum so far so ultimately Cat just needs to derail the story for now

Liliet

So Cat said she had seven villains, right?

Warden of the East
Pilfering Dicer
Barrow Sword
Archer
Harrowed Witch
Royal Conjuror
Hunted Magician
yep sounds like all of them!

shikkarasu

I expect one or both of the following twists:

- 7 Villains was not counting herself; Catherin is the 'and one'
- Akua may be called Lady Warlock, but she never did get the Name. She is not a Villain per se, and it would be so very Irritant of Cat to play on that technicality within her own inner monologue.

Liliet

Cat did mention she had no intention of playing fair...

But really, the point here is not for Cat to find a clever way to win against Hanno. The point is... I have no fucking idea what the point is to be quite honest. Not that though.

beleester

The goal is to draw Hanno into a one-on-one fight. The secondary villains are being used to keep the other heroes from reinforcing Hanno in the nick of time. So it's some form of "prove you're worthy to carry the book or I'll eat it and nobody gets to be my rival."

I'm not exactly sure what the benefit is, though – she still has to make a choice between Hanno and Cordelia, and throwing it into the hands of fate doesn't really change the fact that one or the other is going to lose this fight. I guess maybe the benefit is that the question is settled with a straight-up dungeon crawl instead of getting tangled up in the dwarven negotiations?

shikkarasu

Actually, I think the point is to beat Hanno in an elaborate chess metaphor, not a 1 on 1 fight. Cat having only 7 Villains(and one?) versus Hanno's force of 12 shows that he is not her equal as a leader of Named. If he can't stop her from eating the Book he isn't on her level and he loses the "I am the better War Leader" argument.

Suddenly Cordelia looks like a better candidate since she isn't good at leading Bands, but at least she's a politician. If Cordelia shows up and also fails? Well then both parties need to seriously reconsider why they think they should be the Warden.

Reader in the Night

I think the point is more to knock the wind out of the Dwarves plotline's sails. Like someone else said before, Cordelia's and Hanno's approach to the Dwarves issue aren't mutually exclusive, just the way they were going about it.

By redirecting their enmity to a fight against her/competition for the Book, she buys time and spends the story momentum of them coming to blows early, so they can approach the dwarves thing as an united front.

Linnus42

I think you are missing some obvious factors. Cat got to use prep to setup this whole situation in terms of time and place with elaborate plans for her merry band of Damned. Where Hanno was not prepping for anything nearly this random and out of the blue. Also needing to 2 to 1 odds to win an assault on an enemy base is not historically unusual.

ohJohn

Well, she had all of... an afternoon, maybe? It's the same day as the last chapter, she had the idea after talking with Hakram and then, later, Vivienne, and I can't imagine Hanno scheduled his meeting too late at night.

Linnus42

That does not address my points. She had time to prep this trap and set things up. Hanno wasn't planning to lead a heroic squad to do anything tonight.

shikkarasu

My point is that traps are how Villains operate and dealing with them unexpectedly is how Heroes operate. Villains also normally have many more minions than the Band has members. It's supposed to be an unwinnable fight that they triumph over anyway. Asymmetrical warfare, if you will. She is at a slight disadvantage thematically and the Theme is what is important, here.

Also, Reader in the Night is right about this disrupting the Dwarf situation, I just think that the gauntlet being thrown down is, at least in part, a test that she is expecting them to fail. "Can't beat be with only half your numbers and a non-lethal villainous plot? You do realize that DK is shooting to kill, right?"

ohJohn

If it wasn't clear: I think you're overstating how significant that prep time was. I went back and checked the previous chapter – there were 3 hours between Cat first having the idea and the tower touching down. Hanno then had a 2+ hour ride to think of how to use his (stronger & more numerous) party of heroes effectively.

I won't deny she caught him off guard, or that forcing him to storm the tower is a tactical advantage. But this isn't like Second Llesse, the culmination of a villain's entire life spent crafting and refining an elaborate plan – it's just what Cat could slap together in 3 hours.

Agent J

If she wanted to get Hanno in a one-on-one fight, she'd not have called the Hunted Magician to shoot him in the back while Ishaq distracts him with a duel.

I think she wants him in her presence but not actively trying to stab her. Which is also why she doesn't want him having back up that might embolden such an attempt.

> "If Hanno doesn't give me a good reason not to, I'll eat the Book of Some Things."

Seems more like she wants to finally have a talk that with him.

Tariq: Please work things out with Hanno.

Cat: Slap a millennium old Dark Tower down on Salia and bully him into making nice with me and Cordelia. Got it.

Tariq: If I had a grave, I'd be rolling in it right now.

beleester

I figured the Hunted Magician was just Cat taking Hanno seriously instead of throwing a single B-lister at him.

>Seems more like she wants to finally have a talk that with him.

She already talked to him, and if she wanted a second talk it wouldn't have been very hard to arrange. Smashing down a flying fortress means she wants Hanno to be trying to stab her when they have their talk. (Which is an odd way to reconcile, but I think a running theme in this book has been that you can't treat someone as an equal unless you let them oppose you.)

Liliet

Cat said her objective was to TALK to Hanno.

Alien4ngel

Neither Cordy or Shiny Boots gets the name. Akua eats the book, her role as warden was foreshadowed for eons.

Curtopolis

Hakram did just say that akua was the only one cat considered her equal. And she has become all about that redemption arc lately....

Tim

Archer isn't a villain

Liliet

She is for the purposes of this count, usually. She's under Cat in the T&T and everything.

mindsword2

If the Hierophant isn't there to watch, I'll be shocked.

Liliet

He's busy inventing a way to turn the stories back on with Roland.

Daniel E

None of this would be possible without Sve Noc. Cat's Name hasn't granted her anything special yet (Speak, and maybe kind of see Stories). At this point, her ability to use Night feels like a cheap magical battery that nobody appreciates, especially given the deteriorating conditions up North. It's easy to forget that all the power she wields is not actually her own.

letouriste

well, she still needs to gain aspects. As far as I know, she has none because the little sun ability was broken and stems from something she already had.

shikkarasu

I think she hasn't had any need for Aspects, so she hasn't gotten any. The stars seem like more of a Name trick than Aspect, like how she and Amadeus could control their shadows.

She probably should have gotten something in the confrontation with her father and Hakram, but he called in his Dues to ensure that she wouldn't save him, so the Gods Below wouldn't exactly go out of their way to give her any new toys in that moment.

I expect some pivotal, weighty moment in the near future to grant her her first Aspect. I'm still expecting Rein (but not Reign), and Collect.

letouriste

ok, that was a delight to read. I didn't expect that plan but it totally makes sense in retrospect

wadeingintheriver

I love maternal Cat taking care to put the Apprentice down in an orchard 'cause she looked a bit peckish... But not as much as I love the ever hilarious interactions between Cat and Archer! Man, that would be infuriating, being unable to get out of your evil throne but that one place you can't reach itches! Truly, Cat has already been punished for this night's evilness!

ohJohN

I have to wonder how kind that actually was – we know Arcadian water is unsafe to drink, the fruit that grows there might also be inherently toxic. And even if it's not, it would be extremely on-brand for fae to plant an orchard of apples that make you sleep for a century, or turn you into a tree, or render you mute, etc.

Rey d`Tutto

The Apprentice is a Hero.

That fruit will be at the very least nutritious, and at best some Mythic Bonus type object that will allow the Apprentice to intervene at the appropriate junction, and/or provide an ongoing enhancement to her Name.

iamwaitingtocompile

I'm surprised that nobody else seems to think this is what I think it is: Cat is trying to control the shape of the Warden of the West. If the warden comes into their name through politics, then tha'll be their role. If, on the other hand, The Warden comes into their name by assaulting a magically fortified location and stopping a powerful villan from enacting their grand ritual, then that's the kind of name that's going to be useful for the final assault on the dead king

Tim

I must say, one of the biggest disappointments of this entire epic story is we don't get that month of Archer speaking in rhyme. I am experiencing great grief right now.

Sugar Roll

I gotta say, I love Cat's idea of a teambuilding exercise.

Silverking

I know that it's not nearly as eye-catching as some other things this chapter, but it seem that the Mirror Knight has finally mellowed out a bit since the last time he was in the spotlight.

Arsenal Mirror Knight: I am the guiding light, the true arbiter of Good and Evil! All who oppose me have been corrupted and must be purged!

Current Mirror Knight: I am the blunt force object. It's a thankless job, but somebody's got to do it.

Barrendur

I had really begun to dislike Cat during the interminable Everdark episode, as her burgeoning smugness and grandiosity made her ever more annoying and less sympathetic to read about. By the time that chapter was concluded, I no longer wanted Cat to win; I just wanted to see her suffer the consequences of her arrogance and narcissism.

Inertia and curiosity kept me reading the updates, but Cat didn't improve... and now, with her blatant and misplaced meddling in the Naming of the Warden of the West – which really, really, REALLY isn't any of her affair – I've realised I actually detest her. Stubborn to the point of monomania, hypocritical to the level of delusion, utterly convinced of her own infalliability and fixated on crafting laughably elaborate “clever strategies” to achieve goals that are moral and meaningful only to Catherine... and now she’s attacked the Heroes, because “Catherine has a cunning plan,” and “Cat knows best.”

I hope the Gnomes forceably stuff her away in the Golden Bloom Home for the Irrelevant and Obnoxious.

Lord Haart

I mean those are real flaws of hers but they are also half of what makes her so fun to read so your point? 😊

Mincheriit

Thanks for the chapter. My take on cat’s plan is to force a detour on hanno and cordelia while also delivering an ultimatum of sorts. If the warden of the east is ‘achieved’ by such a destructive loss to their side overall, (the loss of either cordelia or hanno and the fallout of their clash), then whoever wins doesnt deserve the book and cat will use its power herself for w/e. If they manage to convince her not to eat the book then good for them. They also have to stop their current plans and come stop cat, forcing them to have a chat essentially.

Abnaxis

Cat: “I just killed my father because Warden of the East has to command both Named and Kings, not one or the other.”

Cordelia: “Screw leading named, I’m only going to worry about leading Princes and make all the Named be ruled by Princes.”

Hanno: “Screw being political, I’m just going to be a figurehead for named and screw all those Princes unless they get in my way.”

Cat: “FINE! If neither of you wants to do your entire damn job I’ll just eat the Book of Some Things and do all the Wardening my own damn self.”

Interlude: Occidental I

“Seventy-five: you should never be too friendly or too hostile to a rival. Too friendly means you cannot put aside your rivalry to defeat a common foe; too hostile may drive them to join that very foe.”

-“Two Hundred Heroic Axioms”, author unknown

Hanno had already learned better than to receive that blade with a full parry: he had no intention of allowing a second notch onto the edge of his sword. Instead he nudged the blow aside, quickening his movement with Light, and stepped in close as he pivoted. His armoured elbow caught the enemy's helmeted cheek from the left, but the villain took the blow without batting an eye. Hanno danced back before a bronze-clad boot could smash into his knee, leaning back an inch to let that wicked blade pass just before his eyes. The dark-skinned hero withdrew even further, making space as his brow furrowed.

The fight was lasting longer than he'd wanted, in no small part because the Barrow Sword was proving significantly harder to handle than he'd expected. Not that the villain had announced himself, or even talked since that debacle with the riddles.

But the hellish landscape that Night had made of this tower had not been enough to obscure the identity of the man facing him, and neither had been the black paint half-heartedly slapped over a very distinct set of bronze armour. Still, Hanno would admit that the shadows were... disquieting. The way they moved just at the corner of your eye, hinting at faces and fanged maws, flapping wings and unblinking eyes. Looking at them too long was disorienting, the movements invited belief into depth and angles that did not exist – rooms seemed smaller or larger, crooked where they should be straight or flat when they were sloped.

And through the dark the Warden of the East watched them all, her intentions still inscrutable. Hanno flexed the stumps of his crippled hands, watching his opponent's loose stance. The Barrow Sword was not aiming to win, he decided, but to delay.

“This does not have to end in violence,” Hanno said. “Take me to her, Barrow Sword. I will go with my sword sheathed, not to fight but to treat in good faith.”

The other man watched him through the slits of the bronze helm, face impassive for a long moment until it split into a broad grin. The kind some might have called nasty.

“What if we want to fight, hero?”

The voice was distorted, laced with sorcery. It made the air shiver, though focus let him ignore the pull at his mind.

“I do not believe you do,” Hanno evenly said. “So far your side has acted with restr-”

It was only instinct that led him to take a step to the side instead of backwards, which made the difference between life and death. The thrust of that eerie bronze sword – it felt Ligurian to his senses, but deeper somehow – cut the edge of his cheek, drawing blood from a thin wound. If he'd moved too slowly, or backwards, it would have punctured his throat.

"Your side keeps talking," the Barrow Sword snorted. "Speeches and schemes, like all that strutting about isn't what made you a lord in the first place. Even now you're trying to get one over the Rhenian, like this is the world's saddest pissing match."

The villain flicked his wrist, blood slapping down against cool stone.

"Well, congratulations," the Barrow Sword grinned. "You kept at it long enough the Warden lost her temper. Get in line, Ashuran, or get stepped on."

Hanno's eyes narrowed. Light pulsed under his skin. Perhaps this was more serious a situation than he'd thought. He needed to finish this fight quickly, so he should set out bait.

"There are limits to what I will tolerate," he warned, "no matter the intentions."

The man laughed in his face, loudly and scathingly.

"Tolerate?" the Barrow Sword mocked. "You can't even get past me. What claim have you got on higher honour?"

That ought to do it, Hanno thought. Light flared as his back foot hit the floor, lending him an explosive start. Three steps in the blink of an eye, the villain belatedly raising his sword to strike. Parrying would be a mistake, so he did not. He bent low instead, caught the kick aimed to sweep him to the side and sent it back. The Barrow Sword's footing stumbled and Hanno smoothly rose, catching the arm holding the sword before it could properly swing back and pivoting sharply. The throw he'd learned through one of the Sages of the West flowed smoothly, the villain's armoured back slamming against the stone. Best to break the wrist of his sword arm, Hanno decided. He'd be less of a threat without the enchanted blade.

His knee was already rising when he felt magic flare behind him. It was an awkward moment, leaving him little room to maneuver. The mark of a skilled opponent. The dark-haired hero threw himself to the side, but he was too slow by a hair: the ice spike caught the side of his leg, in the weakness of the armour, and he felt sorcery spreading through his blood. A curse. Breathing out sharply, Hanno ran Light through his veins. It was an unpleasant sensation, like skin stayed close to an open flame too long, but he would not take a risk with curses. Landing in a pained crouch, he swept through the spike with a sword stroke and parried a second as he turned to watch his fresh opponent.

A man in rich dark robes, his face obscured by a spell. Too tall to be the Royal Conjurer, though too short to be the Hierophant. Hunted Magician, Hanno thought. That meant old magic, heavy on curses and enchantments, with some fae learning. Behind him the Barrow Sword was getting back up.

"I will ask the same of you as I asked of him," Hanno said to the Magician. "Take me to the Warden of the East and this can still end peacefully."

"It can end right now, that is true," the Magician easily agreed. "All that's required is your surrender."

Hanno almost sighed. Was he truly going to have to fight his way to the summit of the tower before he could speak with the Warden, as if this were a Dread Empress' lair being cracked open? He opened his mouth to reply with one last offer of diplomacy but the words never came out: the air had just shivered. Great power was being used above him, a staggering amount of Night. And it was being used to smother something, he found, eyes narrowing. Forcefully put out a light. Instinct tugged at him urgently, insistently. Whatever it was Catherine Foundling had just begun, it could not be allowed to finish. Hanno slowly raised his sword.

"Change of plans," the Sword of Judgement told the villains. "I can no longer afford to hold back."

"Tough talk," the Barrow Sword scoffed, "but--"

Hanno moved, and there was no longer time for anyone to talk.

—

The Kingfisher Prince laid a hand on the Mirror Knight's shoulder, face taut with concentration. A moment passed and then Cordelia dimly felt it: a ripple on the pond. A murmur of water against her hand. Mere months ago, she thought, she would have felt nothing at all. Even being a claimant, she had found, was as if a veil had been lifted on some part of Creation. Like she'd been allowed to peek behind the stage and see the pierced bucket used to make the rain, the mage on a ladder making lightning. Withdrawing his hand, Frederic Goethal smiled.

"He's coming back," the Prince of Brus said. "Any moment now."

Cordelia slowly nodded.

"An aspect was used," the First Prince said. "Aid, you called it?"

The fair-haired man nodded.

"Most of the time it is little more than an instinct taking me where I most need to be," Prince Frederic said, "but it has some other minor uses."

More than just that, Cordelia thought. Not once since Frederic had become Chosen had soldiers he fought alongside with been routed. His mere presence seemed to be enough to turn even the greenest of levies into stubborn, tenacious veterans. Otto, in his letters, had described it as his friend being 'a nail keeping our line in place wherever he stands'. The Prince of Bremen, ever plain in speech, had a way of turning almost poetic when it came to the Prince of Brus. The close friendship between those two had been one of the few lights brought about by this war, in Cordelia's opinion.

Were Frederic a woman, she suspected they would already be wed.

She set aside the idle thoughts as the Mirror Knight came to, his blank eyes focusing on his surroundings as he took in the sight of the riders and the starlit plain.

"Hallowed," Christophe de Pavanie cursed. "I was bespelled, wasn't I?"

"We believe so," Cordelia calmly said, her voice immediately commanding his attention. "Though we did not find the caster responsible for it."

The green-eyed Chosen grimaced.

"These are the Black Queen's picked grounds, Your Highness," he said. "We won't fight anything she doesn't want us to find. I thank you for freeing me nonetheless."

"It was my pleasure," Prince Frederic dismissed.

Christophe de Pavanie quite willingly gave out every detail of how he had gotten where he stood and why, including the number of Chosen that the Sword of Judgement had led into this mess. He did not, however, speak of what she most wanted to know. Accordingly, she took the matter in hand.

"As you can see," Cordelia said, "we come late to the evening. Can you tell us what happened to rouse the Warden of the East to such anger?"

Though it would make a great many things easier if it were a blunder by Hanno of Arwad responsible, she did not truly hope for that to be the case. The consequences of a strong falling out there would send fracture lines through the Grand Alliance. She has too many allies, too many followers, the Lycaonese princess thought. The Blood had already expressed in private their doubts that the war could be won without her, and if the Circle of Thorns was to be believed the League of Free Cities was treating her as the main negotiating partner in the Grand Alliance.

A great many things would fall apart in a matter of days, Cordelia well knew, if the unstinting support from the most dreaded figure of their age came to an end.

"She's not angry," the Mirror Knight replied.

Cordelia hid her doubt behind a smile.

"Have you grasped something, Lord Christophe?" she asked.

The man looked frustrated, fiddling with the dark locks that his helmet kept pressed against his forehead.

"I understand I'm no friend of hers," the Mirror Knight said, "and that my judgement is held in poor esteem."

Cordelia's eyes narrowed the slightest bit. That was more awareness than she'd expected of a man of his reputation. Had his time under the Grey Pilgrim truly tempered him? When the punishment had been doled out she'd thought it nonsense, just another example of the White Knight letting off his charges with a slap on the wrist after they behaved atrociously – Christophe de Pavanie had accused the Queen of Callow of cooperating with the Dead King before mutilating a high officer of the Grand Alliance – but perhaps there had been some use to it.

"But," Cordelia prompted.

"If she really were angry, Your Highness," the younger man said, "that fortress would have landed on us."

She blinked in surprise.

"And while we were broken and dying," the Mirror Knight bluntly said, "she'd have sailed it back up in the clouds, where we can't reach it."

"We'd have found a way to reach up there," Frederic said, tone calm and utterly certain. "There's always a way."

"Maybe," the Mirror Knight replied, "but we haven't had to, Kingfisher. Because she landed the tower in the middle of a plain where everyone can see it, bold as you please."

"You believe this is a challenge," Cordelia stated.

His head bobbed up and down.

"If it's not a war," Christophe de Pavanie said, "it's a spar."

A look at Frederic, who was frowning thoughtfully and not disagreeing, told her he was coming around to the thought. Cordelia's gaze moved to the tall tower in the distance, the writhing streak of darkness jutting out of the starlit grass. What is Catherine meant to accomplish with all this? And there would be a purpose, she thought. Under the thuggish swagger and the affected drawl lay a clever, calculating mind. You forced a fight, Cordelia thought. With him, and perhaps with me as well. Was it as simple as forcing them to stand together against her?

No, it would not be. There had to be a victor, that much could not be worked around. Cordelia had combed through every historical archive she could reach when looking for possible compromises, and the only recorded instances of a Name being shared were siblings. Even the Bitter Blacksmiths, while one Chosen and the other Damned, were brother and sister. There could only be one Warden of the West, which meant that any cooperation between them – even against a common foe – could only be temporary. There must be a deeper purpose, one Cordelia could not yet suss out.

"We will not learn the answer standing here," she finally said. "We must ride to the tower."

"There's no telling what will be waiting for us there, Your Highness," the Mirror Knight said. "It would be safer for you to stay behind with your soldiers. The Kingfisher Prince and I—"

"Will be escorting me to the tower," Cordelia pleasantly smiled.

The green-eyed hero turned to object, but then he caught her gaze and slowly closed his mouth. A moment passed as she watched him, unblinking, and thought of how very tired she was of having to herd Chosen instead of the man who should have been doing it all this time. His mouth stayed closed.

"Let us proceed, then," the blonde princess amicably said. "One of my retinue will cede a horse to you, Lord Christophe."

He hesitantly nodded. Her gaze turned to Frederic.

"You mentioned," Cordelia said, "that your aspect tells you where you are most needed."

The Kingfisher Prince, looking faintly amused, nodded.

"It is not always clear-cut, especially in complicated situations, but it does grant me such a sense," the Prince of Brus said.

"And where does it tell you to be now?" she asked.

He cocked his head to the side.

"South," the Kingfisher Prince said after a moment. "North to the tower pulls at well, but not as strongly."

"I saw lights south before I was bespelled," the Mirror Knight offered. "Sorcery. There might be a fight."

Cordelia took a step back from the immediate, trying to understand the broader pattern. The Chosen had been split up by Catherine as they crossed into Arcadia, likely because they were too strong a threat together. Which implied her defences were inferior to the force of heroes gathered. So what she wants is not something that can be obtained by force. If it were, she would have gathered more force. Should Cordelia then ignore the obvious step of gathering the separated Chosen to march on the tower together? If force was not to be the deciding factor, it would be a waste of time to...

No, that was a flawed approach. Though Catherine did not seem intent on using force to achieve her end, she had acted to prevent force being used against her. Which meant that Cordelia could obtain leverage by gathering the Chosen. It would come at the cost of time, ever the scarcest of resources in a time of crisis, but the blonde princess was likely buying time at this very moment: no one had caught sight of Hanno of Arwad, which meant the odds were good he had already reached the tower. She planned for that, Cordelia thought. She believes she can drive back or capture the Sword of Judgement.

Yet, for all that Cordelia Hasenbach deeply disliked the man, she would not deny he was an exceptional fighter. Handling him would take time. Time enough, perhaps, for her to gather the Chosen and prepare her own attempt to resolve the situation. Eyes still on the distant tower, Cordelia breathed out shallowly. This was not so different, she thought, from the schemes of the Highest Assembly. The rules and the pieces were different, but Cordelia had not been born knowing the rules of the Ebb and Flow. She had learned them, as she would learn the rules of Named.

"Then let us ride south," Cordelia Hasenbach smiled, "and lend our comrades a hand."

—

The stairs were hungry.

Or at least the Night slithering atop them. Something was coiled and ready to strike at his back just out of his sight, a sense of hostility like an itch between his shoulder blades. Hanno rose carefully, sword in hand and eyes ever moving. He had defeated the gatekeepers, which meant even deeper peril now awaited him. Either the Warden's own right hand or some kind of bound creature. Most likely the former, as Catherine Foundling had never known to use any monster save the ones she rode. Either the Hierophant or the Archer, Hanno believed. Vivienne Dartwick was not a villain or the kind of woman to lend her hand to this, and would be a lesser threat even she were.

The Princess was not as skilled a combatant as the rest of the Woe, and likely never would be. If that sort of confrontation had been in her nature, she would never have become the Thief. Besides, she was to be Queen of Callow one day. Catherine would not use her as sorely as she had used the two downstairs. They would live, Hanno knew. The Barrow Sword's leg could be reattached with a spell before he bled out, and the Hunted Magician would be able to cast when he finished swallowing his teeth. Hanno had broken his fingers, not his wrists, it should be enough for the man to be capable of basic healing.

Hanno's boots scuffed the stone as he passed the threshold to the second level, finding it to be a single large hall. Ornate reliefs of stone depicting devils slaying each other dripped with liquid shadow, though he saw that the shadow dripped up as well as down. There was an open gate on the other side of the hall and not a sign of anything here aside from the Night. The dark-skinned hero paused.

"This is a trap," Hanno plainly said.

"Trap," a voice behind him agreed, just as the arrow went through his back.

Biting down on a hiss of pain, he turned even as he considered the angle the arrow had punched through the plate at. Not just behind, but – Archer's boots hit his face as she finished leaping down from above the gate he'd entered through, sending him tumbling in a pained tangle of limbs. A detonation of Light against his side slowed the spin, allowing him to land in a controlled skid, but it also pushed the arrow deeper. Archer landed gracefully, coat fluttering as she nocked and loosed another arrow in the span of a single breath. His body was already moving, but he corrected in time with another burst of Light. Not a single arrow but too, the second fired just as he began to move to swat away the first.

He angled himself so the first would miss and he could parry the second, narrowly. Archer sighed.

"You're too quick in a small room," she said. "A bow won't work."

"If I had not adjusted," Hanno evenly said, "that second shot would have gone through my eye."

"I aimed for the one opposite Cat's," Archer cheerfully informed him. "You know, to fit the whole opposite Wardens thing."

A short pause, a brazen grin.

"You're welcome."

Of all the Woe, Hanno had always disliked the Archer the most. Even the Adjutant, for all his moral void and bland antipathy, was no match for the casual cruelty Archer delighted in. That she could be charming when she wished to be only made it worse, as it drew the eye away from the viciousness of her words and deeds. People, even those who should know better, forgave much of a witty woman in good humour. Hanno would not have made that mistake even if he did not have an arrow jutting out of his back. It went through plate like butter and made not a sound. Dangerous. He broke the arrow's shaft but left the head in the flesh. He could fight through the pain, it was better to wait for proper healing.

"This has gone on for long enough," Hanno curtly said. "Whatever grievance the Warden of the East has, there were better ways to handle it. If this does not end now, it will have consequences."

The Archer casually tossed away her bow and loosed her quiver's strap. There was something wrong, something off. His eyes followed her, trying to find a match for what his instincts screamed.

"Consequences, huh," the Archer said. "You know, Shiny Boots, I argued you'd make the finer Warden but the more you talk the more I think this was the right idea."

"This is sheer stupidity," he harshly retorted. "The-"

"Nah, this is just a slap across the face," the Archer cut in, amused. "You're not meant to like it. Sheer stupidity, now, that'd be trying to dig up a dwarven gate on the sly."

He went still in surprise.

"Of course we know, Hanno," Archer smiled. "We're the fucking Woe. Always assume we know."

They'd been seen through, then, despite their best efforts. Did the First Prince know as well? It had been her he meant to fool.

"So that's why," Hanno said, almost relieved. "Then this is a misunderstanding. I never int-"

"Eh," Archer shrugged, unsheathing her longknives and idly spinning them. "I don't really care."

His jaw tightened. She was baiting him.

"Then there is no more point in speaking to you," Hanno said. "This is my last warning, Archer: get out of my way."

"Shiny Boots," she patiently said, "you must be confused. Do I look like someone who gives a shit about-"

Evil's stories might be silenced, but a gloater was a gloater. He burst into movement while she was jeering, but he saw from the lack of surprise in her eyes that he'd not taken her aback. Unfortunate. He wouldn't be able to end this quickly. He struck first, high and to the side, not committing to the blow. She gave ground lightly, circling him, and continued to give it the more he pressed forward. Hanno took a step towards the gate, testing her, but she did not get in the way. She wouldn't force herself to engage on his terms even if he feigned the intention of going up without first putting her down. Archer was the most seasoned villain he'd fought since the Black Knight, and promised to be just as much of a headache.

Fine. He'd strike properly, then. His boot hit the floor and Light flared as he shot forward, feinting low and to the side to draw her blades. One did sweep down, lazily, but as he moved into his true blow – a deep thrust at belly height – she darted towards him. One moment her stance had been entirely loose, the heartbeat after her entire body was moving. Sensing the danger he hastily moved to the side, a razor-sharp blade harmless skidding against the side of his plate instead of plunging through his armpit, and shifted his footing so he could swing at her back. He'd expected her to dodge by rolling forward, using her momentum, but instead she dropped down.

The edge of his sword whispered just above her hair as she tried to sweep his legs. She was strong and the angle bade for him, so he took a step back just in time for her to rise into a blow at his throat. An opening, she'd overcommitted: he slammed his pommel onto her hand, forcing her to drop the longknife and was about to break her jaw on the second blow when he saw the glint of steel from the corner of his eye. He leaned back, the blade slicing through his cheek and lip, and before he could kick her in the stomach she darted back. But not, he saw, without first snatching up her dropped knife. Hanno's hand came up to touch the side of his face, coming away red.

He could feel the blood going down his cheek, dripping down onto his armour. Over the white cloak.

"Those reflexes are a little much, Shiny Boots," Archer complained. "That little mistake should have cost you an eye."

She was a skilled combatant, Hanno thought, but not this skilled. She'd exploited his propensity to close distance so he could use Light to quickly end a fight to very nearly land a crippling blow two exchanges into their fight. That had not been improvised.

"You've trained to kill me," Hanno calmly said.

"Figured I might have to, one of these days," she casually shrugged. "If you ever got ideas about Cat being more trouble than she's worth."

Even that, though, should not be enough. She was good, but those instincts were- Hanno's eyes narrowed as he studied her once more. The ease she handled those two longknives with, the way they just seemed to fit. Those instincts were not an Archer's instincts.

"You're becoming the Ranger," Hanno said.

"Claimant," Archer grinned, "but it's early days yet. But enough yapping, yeah? We gonna do this or-"

It did not take him by surprise when she darted forward, any more than it had taken her. He knew better than to lower his guard against Indrani the Archer. Four steps forward, quick as an arrow, and when he raised his sword she smiled. Footing switching, she suddenly drew back and if Hanno had been striking her it would have gone wide. But he was not. Instead he was taking a step forward, closing the distance, and her weight was headed the wrong way. She kept drawing away, to make distance, and it was true that by simple physical ability she was slightly faster than him. Hanno, though, did not rely on his body alone.

A burst of Light behind his left foot pushed him forward, lengthening his stride, and though it shot his footing he adjusted with another burst of Light just under his right shoulder blade. The thrust ripped through her coat at shoulder height and broke chain mail, but delivered nothing more than bruises. Archer had reacted quickly, dropping down towards the floor, but Hanno was not finished. His steel-clad boot caught her in stomach, slamming her against the stone with a pained gasp. He heard one of the lower ribs break. She wore no gauntlets, the Sword of Judgement thought as his sword rose. Cutting through both wrists should end this.

Instead he had to duck back, a longknife spinning through where his face had been a heartbeat earlier, and she rolled back into a crouch. He pressed a step forward, ignoring the knife still in the air, but she darted back before he could close the distance. Her eyes weren't even on his sword, he noticed, but on his footing. She's watching for the Light. The acceleration trick would not take her by surprise twice. Still, the exchange had cost her a broken rib and half her longknives – which he heard clatter against the stone behind him. This was not going to end quickly, as he had feared, so he'd used Light to melt the knife she had thrown. It should tip the balance in his favour.

It would be close, Hanno thought, but he would get to the Warden of the East in time. He could feel it in his – a wet, red gasp passed through his lips. Pain in his back. He'd been struck through his armour? No, the arrow. Something used the opening. Gritting his teeth, he flared Light at his back only for it to be swallowed. Devoured. Blood turning cold, Hanno turned even as he felt the spike impaling his back beginning to raise him off the ground.

Catherine Foundling, one-eyed and smiling, met his gaze.

"Did you really think you'd just get to fight your way up to me one brawl at a time?" she said. "Really, Hanno, I'm insulted."

There was a swell of power, of Night, and after a wave of pain all Hanno knew was darkness.

Linnus42

I am thinking I am might have to write a whole paper and what I don't like about treatment of Black Characters in this story. At this point its mostly about these characters going on arcs that end in truncated endings.

But lets see how Cordelia's Hero Collection Plays Out.

dadycoool

Cat's story comes to mind, given how unsatisfied I still feel about it. As a Villain, she's not eligible for Happy Ever After, but that just felt like torturing Squidward. Pain with no point.

Linnus42

I am talking about specific arcs lol. And Akua's arc in Praes left me feeling quite blueballed. She went on arc....burned down the tower and then might as well have not been there for the resolution at all. She could have stepped up and done something but instead she is back to will they wont they with Cat.

I suppose this also ties into my complaint about I don't really think Heroes perform all that great against Named Villains. But that is for another time.

Cat eh its way too far out for me to predict if she gets a happy ending quite frankly. I expect it might be bitter sweet at worse but not a bad ending. I don't think this story is going to end on a down note. So no DK killing everyone to create an Undead Paradise.

Black Spiral Dancer

You say that like it's a bad thing...

Persecuted Grey Drow

As a person living in part of the world where racial politics don't dominate my everyday life, I didn't catch any hint about racism when reading these stories. It's a story about fucking Zombie Horses, amputee Orcs, the subtle politics in a wildly fantasy world, where people with GREY skin are getting persecuted by midgets, and you choose to focus on the skin colour that was mentioned in Book 1? Jesus, everything must trigger you

zenanii

This. There is racism and xenophobia in this story, but it exclusively focuses on fantasy races/factions, like orcs vs humans, duni vs praes, praes vs callowan, dwarves vs drow, highborn vs commoners, elves vs everything else and the list goes on.

At NO point in this entire story has someones darker skin color been the source of any sort of conflict or used to suppress a character (Amadeus' lighter skin color has been the foundation of some conflict, but it has been thoroughly established that the core issue was him being duni, and his skin color merely identified him as such.

In this story skin color has been exclusively used to describe peoples appearance, no different from gender or hair color, and if people want to read into it to try and find some sort of racist message then the issue lays with them and not the story.

Miles

LOUD NOISES

Geno

There's an entire nation of evil black and brown people, but the closest to evil white people is Procer. You're just being an asshole for no reason

Linnus42

I mean I argue the issue is not per say having an entire nation of Evil Black and Brown People. But it does stand out that the only Nation of Black and Brown people is Evil.

Zach

You're ignoring the Dominion, whose people are visually similar enough to Taghreb that they can easily pass as being the same race. Also, most of the people in the story who are major characters the audience is meant to care about are black or brown.

Liliet

Levantines are still not black. Nor are Taghreb. They are Arab.

Rey d`Tutto

Arab = Brown.
Racists and "Anti-Racist" both care about skin color a great deal more than could ever be healthy.

jamesc9

@Rey, sure, provided the context doesn't strongly incent them to care.

If you want the imaginary story that enabled me to start noticing how privilege works, we can go there.

Insanenoodlyguy

I'd argue that prover at the beginning of this story was evil in all but name. You don't invade a country for political convenience and conquest and get to say your among the angels.

jamesc9

This could go to the difference between Good and good, which is an ongoing theme of the story.

Insanenoodlyguy

Akua's story isn't done yet, it's multi arc character progression and always was. She had her major moment, and it's very nature was to reject that power and influence you wanted her to have. It doesn't mean she'll never have any, but it was appropriate for her to be back burning for the rest of that climax.

KageLupus

The issue with the Heroes fighting Villains is that for the last long while, they have either been fighting Revenants or going up against Cat. In both cases the Heroes have to deal with fairly powerful enemies that are very pragmatic, and are backed by someone who knows how to twist a story to their own ends.

The Good guys had the Wandering Bard and the Grey Pilgrim for experts in Namelore, and now both of them are unavailable. So they are going to be at a natural disadvantage against enemies who have that knowledge and expertise. That only gets exasperated now that the stories for Below are being suppressed and the Bad guys don't have an extra finger on the scales tripping them up.

Basically, the Heroes are going up against strong enemies, who are better at navigating stories, and who don't have the usual push to fail that they normally do. The Heroes feel underwhelming right now because they are.

shikkarasu

I will point out quickly that Hanno beat Barrow Sword and Royal Conjurer at the same time. He also nearly beat Archer before Cat cheated. A Hero also killed Sabah. They get their licks in, but we follow Villains as our main POVs. Protagonist trumps Hero, narratively, and it's hard not to make that seem one sided.

Rey d`Tutto

Cat decided to Embrace the Suck, and has gone with the "Irritant" method of Losing to Win.
Xanatos victory conditions in effect.

Soronel Haetir

"I suppose this also ties into my complaint about I don't really think Heroes perform all that great against Named Villains", that's the villain's complaint as well. That Heroes win not because they are better but because Above puts extra weight on the scales.

caoimhinh

This story has consistently proven over and over that it has no racist undertones whatsoever, so please stop pretending and claiming that it does.

If you cannot see beyond a character's skin tone to notice the complex array of motivations, background, personality and plot development that drove them throughout their role in the story up to their conclusion, it's up to you.

Share your opinion if you don't like something or want to debate about a character's fate, but don't come saying that it happened because the character is black. That poorly-veiled accusation of racism towards an author that has always shown to have no such prejudice nor discrimination towards any group, is just ridiculous.

Memer

Oh, I was reading proper noun "Black Characters" to mean "the ones who serve Bella's ends."

If OP meant to comment on racial injustice in PGTE... good luck finding a leg to stand on. If they're commenting on the endings that Villians get, then there's a discussion to have.

Linnus42

When did I accuse EE of being racist? I have issue with some of his work on Black Characters. If I thought he was racist I wouldn't have bothered reading this series.

I can see all that and still see racial dynamics I don't care for. They are not mutually exclusive. I am not sort who wants to ignore differences of characters or people. Differences can be appreciated and not simply tolerated.

Trust me if I wanted to argue in bad faith that EE is racist I could do that easily. You don't like my opinion fine but your inability to actually comment on what I said and instead cast aspirations shows no one should ever give a single * about your opinion on Race.

jworks17

Honestly curious- where do you see problematic racial dynamics? Where do you see meaningful racial dynamics at all? It's not a thing I've even considered while reading.

captainmarcia

Personally, it's something I started really noticing with the Marchford arc, with Niln's death. The first of Cat's friends to die, and also the only major black character out of the War College team, and he turned out to be a traitor. (And honestly, up to that point I'd felt like he was the least developed of them anyway.) That left Masego as the major black character in Cat's team at the time, which is a tricky position since just one character from a group means there's no others to balance them out. It didn't help that that was also the point Cat was suspecting Masego of being corrupted and making arrangements to be able to blow him up, which brought to mind how that scenario would make things even worse.

There's also the matter of Praes in general, and Amadeus's relation to it. The fact that almost all the black characters in the story are from the one Designated Evil Nation makes things really awkward, with the in-story cultural contexts they're part of as a result. Meanwhile we've got this one guy who works to reform things, acting as a counterweight to Alaya's issues known for wanting to murder his way through the (Soninke and Taghreb) nobles, and he's part of the one white ethnic group in Praes. (The Duni are noted for being marginalized in-story, but I do not think making them white was a good call.) We've left off that arc with Cat essentially taking over Praes, leaving a humiliated Alaya to run things from death row, only as long as Cat permits.

A lot of those things make sense in-story, but all together, it looks pretty awkward. Personally, I hadn't looked much at the arcs of particular characters, but I do think it's a valid thing to consider, and I don't like how many people are jumping to shoot it down.

Ultimately, I do love Guide. But things like this are why I'm hesitant to recommend it to people as much as I wish I could. I'm not black, myself – which is probably part of why I'm able to enjoy Guide as much as I do in spite of those concerns. But they do catch my attention from time to time, and make me feel that Guide is a weaker story than it could be.

Linnus42

Wonderfully put captain. I think the issue was in making all the Black and Brown people come really only from one Nation. It was fine as long as Cat was part of Praes (protag centered morality) but when she went independent well that is a problem. If no other nation is going to have characters coded that way of a more good persuasion to balance things out.

AbraKadabra

You do realize, that Cat is not white, right? It was a plot point early on in book one that she was looking like those Daoine or something. You Just chose to forget it. Not black enough for you. It Just did not come up since then because NOBODY CARES EXCEPT YOU.

Linnus42

Do you think everyone who is browner then a paper bag is Black? Cat is not Black. She is mixed White English and Native American (which I know is big group but I don't remember what specific group she is a reference to). What do all brown people just look alike to you? I am talking specifically about Black Characters here. So no I didn't forget about Cat but its telling you jump to that.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Nitpick: Daoine is the place, not the people. The word you're looking for is Deoraithe.
More substantially: "nobody else cares" is not a valid rebuttal, nor is it true in the first place. If it were true it would still be rhetorically valueless however.

Jordan Blanch

Jeeesus christ.

Shut. Up.

Adrian_V

You do realize that is because the setting is locked in mediaval stasis? It is imposible tor each diversification in such a setting unless is soemthign like a trade city, not a nation. At some points the narration has gone out of its way to show that up until recently people almost never got to meet anyone from far away, for example Callowans wouldn't even knwo what a Lantern is much less recognize them, and confuse levantines with Taghred by sigh

jworks17

See but this is what I mean by MEANINGFUL racial dynamics though. Like do you think Erratica is trying to actually say something by making the dread empire primarily black and all those other things, or is Erratica just including black people in the story in a way that looks bad with our cultural context? In other words, do you think there was INTENT behind the placement of race, or was Erratica just trying to include different races of Mankind because different races make up Mankind?

A lot of the nations in the guide are directly analogous to real world places- the Levant, Procer, the free cities, Callow- but most of them have very little cultural parallels to those places and peoples. Could Erratica not be doing the same thing with race, implementing it without regard to our worlds contexts? Implementing it just because... humans come in different colors?

I'm not trying to be facetious by saying this, I just know that in my writing I implement different races, but I don't implement them in any meaningful way beyond there being a more realistic representation of humanity. Black people in my fictional worlds have no connection to black people in our world, for example, but black people are humans, so I give them a fictional role like the other races.

captainmarcia

"See but this is what I mean by MEANINGFUL racial dynamics though. Like do you think Erratica is trying to actually say something by making the dread empire primarily black and all those other things, or is Erratica just including black people in the story in a way that looks bad with our cultural context? In other words, do you think there was INTENT behind the placement of race, or was Erratica just trying to include different races of Mankind because different races make up Mankind?"

Those are different questions. I do not think EE intended to convey anything negative about black people with the story, but I do think there are some areas where he didn't put enough thought into how things would look from a real-world perspective, and that can still be meaningful. I'm not here to critique EE himself, I'm here to critique the story.

jworks17

Ah, I see what you mean now. In a high fantasy like this I don't even consider context to be honest, but I can see how it would be a gripe of people who do relate the story to the real world.

caoimhinh

Yep, though the issue is that one can only reach that conclusion by taking the things in the story out of their context and relating it to the real world, while isolating the racial factor, and disregarding EVERYTHING ELSE, looking only at their skin color.

It's a disingenuous thing, needing a lot of mental gymnastics and a blatant disregard of everything that makes the story and characters valuable to reduce them to "a person of X skin color".

It's like in the Interlude: A Mould Unbroken, when Amadeus announced that he will rebel against Malicia. There were a few people there saying "All I see is a white man going to kill a black woman" which is the most superficial way to look at the situation.

One needs to be deliberately malicious in their intent to look at this story through those lenses.

captainmarcia

Yeah, I think it can be helpful when writing to see how things might look from different perspectives, and if any unwanted patterns stand out, to look for a way to meaningfully disrupt those patterns.

A lot of fantasy stories have issues like that. But I think two things that call attention to it in Guide specifically – even compared to stories that are worse about those patterns – are that it does emphasize and explore in-story racial issues, and that it's really good about most social issues so the flops here are more noticeable.

zenanii

I do not know Erratics creative process, but if I would gander a guess I think it would be something like:

Let's make a evil nation!

Why are they evil?

They live in a resource starved environment which has forced them to become ruthless to survive!

Hm, what kind of environment would that be?

Let's make it a desert, where hardly anything grows.

Right, and people who live in desert = dark skin.

And if you want to really read into things, you're completely missing the mark with your analysis since the orcs (not the praesi) are the ones who most closely mirror real world black people (a faction of different complexion from the general populace, who for the longest time was used as slaves and cheap labor, who just recently has started having more rights on a similar level of that of normal people, although there are still those who view them as lesser (lone swordsman says hi) and up until recently did not hold any major positions (Names)).

Doesn't this sound a whole lot closer to that of black people compared to the actual black people in the Guide?

Zach

I've seen the future, and it's just the endless dubious moral judgement of media that is completely invisible and irrelevant to 99% of working people, as everyone continues to suffer and die under capitalism

Pogtastic

Truly, people idly posting on wordpress are most at fault for society's ills.

what kind of genius sees someone complain about a mild irritation and concludes they are the reason society is doomed?

Rey d'Tutto

So what part of me offering to mow my neighbor's lawn, after he had a stroke, and him insisting on paying for the gas and $20 for my time is offensive to you?

Capitalism isn't Corporatism. Please refrain from political comments, especially when you promote failed systems.

Sharing is Good. Taxes are a Necessary Evil, as is Government in general.

Free people are the most Productive folks. Regulation and Central Planning hinder productivity and entrench Wealth to limited folks. This is historical fact.

Law \neq Justice. Morality is Black and White and shades of Grey. Legality and Legislation are Blue and Orange and shades of Brown. They address different needs in any group of humans that call themselves a Society.

Harrison

Capitalism is an economic system driven by the capital holding class, not the exchange of currency for goods and services, or even market based economic systems. Consider the existence of market socialism, corporatism, fascism and other systems that utilise those aspects but are definitely not capitalism.

Additionally, you mention corporatism, but what I'm guessing you mean is something like corporationalism, a specific capitalist system where the capital owning class is organised primarily through corporate entities.

As far as historical fact goes, excessive regulation of economic systems does indeed typically hinder productivity and filter wealth upwards to a specific privileged class, but the same is true of a general lack of regulation, as the formation of cartels, monopolies and unchecked damaging, but individually profitable behaviour is inevitable in a system with no or little regulation.

When people refer to capitalism in a negative sense like the person you are replying to, what they typically mean is that the system that allows a small number of privileged people to control the economy through owning much of the wealth, and the hierarchies and behaviours that they create, are to blame at least partially for the issue they're discussing.

Insanenoodlyguy

Being honest, I think I'd feel the same about your paper if you get around to writing it.

j

There's already pretty much a paper right here in the comments.

And yeah, Do Not Recommend.

Liliet

> This story has consistently proven over and over that it has no racist undertones whatsoever

Not how it works, dude.

EE absolutely doesn't have A RACIST AGENDA, certainly, and in fact most definitely has an anti-racist one, we can all see it, Linnus42 included. But we all, including EE, still grew up in a culture steeped in racism, and anti-racism is a fun game of playing whack-a-mole with bullshit that snuck into our subconscious when we weren't looking.

EE is ACCIDENTALLY reproducing racist tropes. No-one's accusing him of doing it on purpose.

caoimhinh

And what are those "racist tropes" that you are talking about?

Because so far all I'm seeing in those complaining is reducing the characters to their skin color and saying "this happened to a black person" and calling it a racist thing.

Literally the most superficial way to look at them.

Big I

I'd point out that three of the Woe (Cat, Indrani, Masego) are PoC. Four if you count Hakram. Not to mention Hanno, Tariq, the Blessed Artificer, Malicia, etc. They don't all have anticlimactic endings.

Linnus42

I am talking about Black Characters specifically. So only Masego would be relevant to that.
And I would not consider 1 out of 4 a great batting average.

Kevstar

So we have Masego who's black, Cat and Indrani who's PoC, Hakram who is an orc, and Vivienne as the only Caucasian in the group.

It's a group made out of misfits from several different cultures and backgrounds. What, do you want all of them to be black? Would that be a more acceptable "batting average" for you?

Honestly dude, I don't know what your issue is. It's fine to have felt blueballed by a plotline you didn't enjoy, but I really don't see what race has to do with it. Maybe if you clarified a bit more what you meant, but at the moment it mostly comes off as whining and trying to impose your vision for what the series should be on the author.

Blue Mage Tank

The US is 13% black.

You want sensible representation? One out of four is too many.

Point Point

"Sensible" does not mean "mirroring real life."

Blue Mage Tank

It's okay to be White, and we have a right to exist.

Point Point

I agree with most of what you've said here, except for this.

There are definitely problems in the handling of race in this story, but the Woe in particular does not lack diversity.

(I realize that's not the actual point you're trying to make in this thread, but it is the point the person you replied to here was making.)

(And, on the other hand, the Woe's diversity has a problem mirroring the story at large: the only white member is also their only hero.)

'Ladi Williams

I would like to say at this juncture that I didn't even know Cat and Indrani were black.

Insanenoodlyguy

Cat, to us, would appear half Native American half Caucasian, with the former being prevalent. Idrani would appear Indian.

Abrakadabra

Yep. Something like that. But it did not come up all the time, because nobody really cares... Is it not the point? The endgame of all this antiracism is exactly this. The point where nobody even notices it, because when they look at the other person they see an oöher person not a black Or whito Or whatever. That is the goal! Or it supposed to be, but some people jusó cannot let go of the issue Just like the dog do not want to let go the old bone Or its favourite chewtoy...

Liliet

The problem is, it's easy to not notice it in fiction when you're not the one BEING noticed IRL. People who are actually the targets of prejudice don't get the luxury of ignoring its existence.

Abrakadabra

Okay. But we ARE reading fiction. So it is not Just disturbing But assholish to bring into it real world politics.

captainmarcia

Those real-world politics affect how real people experience the story, and there's nothing wrong with talking about that. It's written by and for people in our world, not people in Guide's world.

Liliet

I don't think you understand how fiction works, and has always worked, since fiction was first invented. It always rehashed real world politics, that's one of its functions. You think the anti-greenskin racism thread isn't intended as a statement relating to real-world racism? You think the lack of queerphobia is because the writer actually forgot it was a thing? You think the "one step better than our world" sexism situation isn't carefully thought through? You think all the references to real world political systems in Bellerophon and Praes and Procer are accidental?

EE is tackling real world politics obliquely in this piece of fiction. We can respect him enough to acknowledge that and work with that. (Where pointing out a minor misstep is in fact working with that) dera

I'm honestly curious : who amongst those who noticed or saw racial undertones are living in the US?
Because from an european PoV it has never been an issue in this story.

jamesc9

I live in New Zealand. The ethnocentrism in the story is quite clearly specified, and connected to physical appearance, so it fits the sociological definition of race rather than ethnicity.

hakureireimu

I agree; there should be less black characters and more Asian ones.

Magtok

Asia doesn't even exist in this setting, buddy.

Pawn

...Africa doesn't exist in this world either and Ranger is half-Asian.

My guess is Akua has something good coming up. But beyond that, geographically, black characters are Praesi. Hanno's mom kept to the gods below so pretty sure she came from praes and that's why he's half-black. The rest of the Woe have stories aligned with different geographies (Indrani a traveling foreigner, Viv the callowan princess, hakram an orc). I just don't see which characters you could reasonably expect to turn black besides the Praesi we already have. Or how to fit in more Praesi characters in order to add “good” arcs when we already have such a large supporting cast in the Praesi armies and nobility.

Of the Praesi supporting cast, I suppose some of the more interesting character arcs are taken by orcs and goblins because they’re the “colored” minorities in Praes who are fighting for recognition. Because in this world the black people of Praes are a rich villainous society who conquered societies of green and white people, aka orcs goblins and callowans, which is a world-building narrative that flips the typical white people conquering black and native populations storyline. Would it be better if black people were made the oppressed groups? Then interesting characters like hune, juniper and robber would be black, but that would also be problematic by forcing black people to take the same role of second class citizens in a fantasy world like in real life where there’s no need for them to be.

Also as a reminder this story started with just callow and praes. I suppose you could argue some part of procer could have been a black nation but like was mentioned before other ethnicities were added and praes is on the far side of callow, so it doesn’t make sense geographically for their ethnicities to mix, and as procer has grown to play a larger part in the story, albeit with few characters I imagine would meet the standards for “good” character arcs if hanno doesn’t count, there’s less chance for the smaller nation of Praes to field characters with interesting arcs, now that a lot of cat’s friends and the calamities are mostly dead.

Generally in narrative-building as well, the greater the power of a character the greater the challenges. Cat and Masego are definitely the most powerful of the Woe, and their losses help balance that narrative. Hanno is the most powerful of the heroes besides Pilgrim and Sword Saint, and maybe you’d approve of a black Tariq but I imagine a black Saint wouldn’t help matters, and Tariq is too Levantine to muck with. Cordelia’s still only a claimant. So it makes sense for Hanno to be going thru some trials and losses. He was mostly winning this chapter anyhow so im not sure what the problem is, he’s smart, strong, principled, generally a good communicator, and he’s certainly learned and grown since fighting Black and the Tyrant. I guess you could argue Witch of the Woods is more powerful but she doesn’t have a character arc to speak of so making her black wouldn’t change much.

The length of the comment is mostly due to me being up late and in an inquisitive mood btw, this isn’t a hard-line or super thought-out stance and I’m open to being convinced I’m wrong. Tho if I were going to ask for anything I'd want more gay guys but 2 and a bi demon is already more than you usually get lol.

amit27592

Yeah that was sarcasm.

Annya Smilyanova

So Yan Tei are?

Estelulu

Yeah, but you get what he means. Ranger is half elf and half Korean.

Linnus42

I find it curious your response is that there should be less Black Characters. There are not a lot of major black characters in this story period but there are plenty of White Characters. So I find it interesting your solution is simply remove the Black Characters for Asian Characters like its some zero sum game.

Insanenoodlyguy

Starting to think you are just looking for a fight.

Liliet

He isn't.

Mirror Night

its weird to me that your response to one black person complaining about story elements they don't like in regards to Black Characters is that they should be replaced with Asian Characters. As if removing Black Characters is the only possible way to get more Asian Characters in the story. One Black Person doesn't like something and your response is we should toss out Black Characters so you can get more rep? Like some weird collective punishment fetish. Just weird and unhealthy response in my book.

Sugar Roll

Instead of writing a paper no one really cares about, might I suggest focusing your efforts on writing your own story instead. That way, you get to decide what happens to your characters based on their skin color.

Linnus42

Alas my talents are not in creative writing I am terrible at it.

Vortex

So what you are saying is you are only happy in a story with good treatment of black people?

I do want to add that several of the non-black characters in this story have suffered significantly more than Masego or Hanno, yet you appeared to have no objection on those chapters.

It's only this one chapter where you pop out to take note on racial dynamics? Not when the pilgrim literally murders everyone in his own bloodline to stop the dead king or when thousands of white soldiers sacrifice themselves holding a fort against the undead? Not when Catherine literally stabs her father in the heart or when an angel literally is about to descend and enslave an entire city of Callowans into a crusade at the behest of some white dude?

But here one black guy gets stabbed in the back and knocked unconscious and here is where you decide the treatment of black people in this story is messed up and unfair?

Liliet

No, actually, this guy has been consistently presenting complaints, all of them reasonable and at least one actually followed up on by EE – because yes, they are usually reasonable, and even when they are premature or arguable, they have a reason. And yes I'd say it's pretty valid for an oppressed minority to only be comfortable reading stories where their kind is treated well.

Hargabga

What a shitshow. Of course we should give a black character a mandatory happy ending – that'll prove we're racially unbiased.

Raidman

Ikr. Creating the appearance of a problem where there is none so they can be the White Knight keyboard warrior with their virtue signalling.

Also the use of capitals as a form of emphasis is very poorly done. May as well have written 'BLaCkHaRAcTeRs'. Just makes me roll my eyes and dismiss the argument.

What do they want? Every ethnicity (which are all fictional in the story but you know. Parallels.) to be given round-table representation? The characters are the characters and the only thing even remotely close to racism I can recall in the narrative among humans is the treatment of the Duni and the Deoraithe, and the way the Praesi have their ubermensch bloodlines. None of which is ever glorified and none of which are real.

Abrakadabra

Yep. It is the same kind of trolling Ryoka did in the court of masks in the recent wandering inn chapter.

Zentalon

He's not dead

Joe Nuts

This point is just as nonsensical every time it comes up. This is a story with a variety of characters with a variety of origins and a variety of outcomes. Unless the author shows favoritism to a particular skin color (which would be racist), some of the negative outcomes will happen to characters of any skin color you pick, such as black. To map American racial politics onto a story set in a fantasy world with consistent but different ethnicities (written by someone who isn't even American, and all things considered is probably African), and complain that some of the characters that got the short end of the stick were black even though all of it is motivated purely by – and consistent with – the book's narrative, is to yourself be racist and feed it through confirmation bias. The capital B in Black has never before, to me, really meant so much as it does in the context: nobody in the book is capital-B Black, i.e. the American ethnic group that you might have strong opinions regarding; they just vaguely look like their ancestors.

Appreciate the characters for their worldviews and goals, and the story for being built on them instead of the much shallower standard antagonism model. Appreciate that the only way you could write a story this complaint couldn't be made about is if there were no black people, or if black people were always perfect top characters no matter what, or if it just pretended race didn't exist, all of which would be bad. Appreciate that this is probably the fictional story that's the most respectful of different ethnicities there's ever been (barring stories explicitly about one country), with characters e.g. giving mockery that's a pun in multiple African languages at the same time.

Onos

Oh definitely write the paper, that'll be hilarious. Think you can get as many people to give a shit as EE does? Cos I'm fairly sure you're not gonna get any more than three people reading whatever nonsense analysis you come up with.

Persecuted Grey Drow

As a person living in part of the world where racial politics don't dominate my everyday life, I didn't catch any hint about racism when reading these stories. It's a story about fucking Zombie Horses, amputee Orcs, the subtle politics in a wildly fantasy world, where people with GREY skin are getting persecuted by midgets, and you choose to focus on the skin colour that was mentioned in Book 1? Jesus, everything must trigger you

jamesc9

The comment above is a repeat.

Black Spiral Dancer

Just to point out: I never really cared or "seen" the skin tone of the characters when I'm reading, in my mind's eye. Let's not create a problem where there isn't one... what matters is the good-vs-evil problem, and each character gives off a pretty unique "energy". Vibration, if you will. Role. That is how I visualize characters in the story. Not sure if it's how the rest of readers do or just me. Perhaps each one "translates" those vibrations into physical characteristics according to their own culture? Anyhow, my 2 cents.

Liliet

> Just to point out: I never really cared or “seen” the skin tone of the characters when I’m reading, in my mind’s eye.

So I’m actually really curious about this. Does this mean you’re imagining all of them as white, or does it mean you’re imagining them as, like, grey outlines, or not imagining them at all? My imagination always presents faces as more or less blank (I’m faceblind), and occasionally all I get is the outfit, but I do regularly get hair length, color and texture, and yes skin color in what I get in my mind’s eye. And I kind of go out of my way to get all these right because damn I dislike imagining things wrong.

Ristridin

Not the person you are responding to, but I could have said the same. I personally don’t visualize the characters at all. I’m reading words on a page, there are no images to go with that. If it hadn’t been for the comment section, I probably wouldn’t even know which skin color any character had (well, green for orcs/goblins tends to be a safe guess; I think orcs at least have been called ‘greenskins’ often enough to be reasonably certain). In general, I tend to skim over and quickly forget any visual aspects that are mentioned.

For example, I was again reminded this chapter that Cat lost an eye; if it’s not mentioned, I might as well not know. I already forgot whether she lost her left eye or her right eye. The missing eye is not central to Cat’s character (from how I interpret it anyway), so it doesn’t stick out. When the eye is mentioned, I do remember it was an arrow by the Hawk that took it, and know that it was the reason why Cat had to be woken up by Hakram working with the Grey Pilgrim (I’m pretty sure it’s Grey; if not, feel free to consider it further evidence that I don’t remember ‘visual’ details 😊). The only other visual aspects of Cat I know of, is that she’s short, with thanks to the many jokes made about that, and that she has a bad leg that occasionally reminds her of her mistakes when it hurts (my guess is it was her left leg). I don’t know her hair colour, or even whether her hair is short or long (I’m guessing reasonably long; were there any jokes about how her hair failed to dramatically wave in the wind? I can also imagine she cuts it short for reasons of practicality, so... shrugs). In terms of clothes it’s the Mantle of Woe, and now that I’m thinking of it, her dragonbone pipe, and her staff (although I haven’t heard mention of that one recently; does she still have it? Getting it was definitely a big moment for her character, so I think it would not disappear so easily).

Details I do remember are things like Hakram being an orc and having two missing hands ('Deadhand' is mentioned often enough); in contrast, when reading I have to be reminded of the missing leg (or is it legs? I know it came up a few chapters back...). If some visual aspect is repeated often enough (or a few times very prominently), it's more likely to stick of course. Alaya appears infrequently, but her 'supernatural beauty' was extremely central the first times we saw her, so I remember that she's very attractive (as an abstract point; I don't remember any concrete details).

Liliet

Huh, interesting. I get a "movie" in my head as I read, so aspects like skin color, height, manner of dress, hairstyle all stick out. And Amadeus is more than a little bit anime in my head bc of how much the PALE GREEN (from most angles in most lightning will be indistinguishable from grey!!! eye color is not super visible if you're not an anime character!!!) eyes have been brought up lmao

(We don't actually now which eye Cat lost. It's not specified, which is actually better than the situation with her hurt leg, since which it was actually changed within the 3 chapters from it happening...)

Jennah

What in the world are you on about? Skin color is mentioned extremely infrequently, has basically no relevance to the story, and zero correlation with Earth's history of racial prejudices.

I don't even know what skin color about half the human cast even has; and I often forget the other half because it's of zero significance aside from (sometimes) indicating nationality.

ruduen

If Hanno's out for the moment and she plans on also handling Cordelia...

This is going to end in a monologue in front of multiple heroic captives, isn't it. Cat has to know that'd be pushing pretty hard on the Heroic side, so I suppose it's a matter of whether or not they'll actually find something that's more than platitudes.

It's good to know that some of the simpler solutions (shared Name or forced cooperation) are looking fairly unlikely at this point.

Linnus42

I mean I can see a way this mends things between Cordelia and Hanno mostly by making Cordelia look very good at Hanno's expense.

I don't see how this mends things between Hanno and Cat with Indrani explicitly trying to inflict permanent damage for * and giggles.

Garrick

Dude your stupid

I'm sorry reading you comments all I see is hyper focus. Your wrong you know your wrong.

Don't even try debate that or you'll be proving me right every inch of the way.

My bet is this isn't the first argument you've been into.... I can even guarantee that the moment you see this you'll argue with me regardless of if I am right or wrong.

It's not about being right for you.... it's about the argument itself you need it and if givin the opportunity you'll take it.

But let's go over your comments

You try to say "no I'm not claiming this author is racist" knowing full well your comments implied just that on top of saying that you could win that argument implying that you believe the author is racist because obviously you wouldn't have the evidence you claim you have otherwise.

On top of this your comment has nothing to say about the actual chapter itself just a vague accusation you know will start an argument which is frankly made worse by the fact that it's the first comment.

Now let's cut to the chase of the accusation because that comment IS an accusation.

You claim the author is racist and when evidence is presented that it is not the case such as there being multiple characters of different ethnicities you claim that it doesn't count because only one of those characters is black.

Now I apparently need to remind you of the definition of racist "a prejudice based on the color of one's skin" which means your comment is racist and therefore you are racist.

Now I know what your going to do

Your gonna get upset and you'll probably try to argue and somewhere there will be a post full of insults and cussing like it somehow proves your point.

Now when you respond to this or don't either way I get what I want.

See I like to argue too.

So you can either engage me (which I made sure to leave some holes in my argument for you to do so)

Or you cannot which leads to you looking like a cowerd.

It's a win/win for me and a loss for you.

Liliet

> You try to say "no I'm not claiming this author is racist" knowing full well your comments implied just that

Only in the heads of people who don't actually understand how writing and tropes work.

Insanenoodlyguy

Speaking as somebody who disagrees with what the person you responded to has said, you know what's far far worse? Somebody like you. Not only being crass and rude, and worse yet, arguing like "I'm right and if you argue that proves I'm right", but doing so in the wrong comment thread. Linnus talks about being unsure how Cat and Hanno reconcile, and you start off on racism, which Linnus never accused Erratic of in the first place. You are in the completely wrong part to be giving such a response. Don't scroll up mind you, this comment would contribute nothing of value up there either. Your self masturbatory "I know all the things you could do and I get what I want no matter what" does not suggest intelligence, it suggests immaturity. It gives me the kind of vibes I'd get watching 6th graders have an argument. You claim Linnus will respond in an equally immature fashion when none of us have ever seen him do so, suggesting this is projection. Not responding to you wouldn't be cowardice, it would be having something better to do with your time then arguing with a child. Do better.

Pogtastic

Their comments just do not imply the author is racist, though? I don't really see what Linnus is complaining about, but it's quite possible for an author to just give lots of black characters unsatisfying arcs with no malice.

Also, most of your comment seems to consist of speculation on what the person you're replying will do, and the actual meat of your argument boils down to "there are nonwhite people in this story, so it cannot be racist." I don't think this story is remotely racist*, but that's an awful defence.

*except arguably when lampshading tropes about Evil Black People etc, but i think the argument would be pretty weak

Annya

I am absolutely confident that she is holding back, so, if she can seriously injure or hurt him, he has a lot bigger issues than Indrani.

Linnus42

I mean he is also holding back while having some injuries and just having fought two opponents at the same time while Indrani enters Fresh. I don't get this argument that Indrani should be some cakewalk to beat in a martial fight. The advantages for this fight are stacked in Indrani's Favor not Hanno's.

GM

Personally, I got the sense that this is where Cordelia proves she's actually more worthy of being the Warden, addressing her namelore and Hero issues, by gathering and leading them. Whereas Hanno basically ran in alone and figured he could fight his way through to her.

That said, it would be hilarious and enjoyable to see everyone captured and Cat monologuing at them.

hakureireimu

To be fair, Hanno did bought plenty of help. They simply got separated.

Darkening

And instead of acting like a leader and rallying his forces and making sure they survived, he fell back on his lone hero instincts and charged in all on his own. It's not a great look for a Name that's supposed to be about leading other heroes.

Insanenoodlyguy

He's on a time crunch and can feel cat eating the book. He knows his stories as well, there is no time he can afford to spend doing other things. Even if there is, ignoring it will hurt his story too much for it to matter.

Darkening

Note that he didn't start feeling cat eat the book until after the hunter magician showed up.

Insanenoodlyguy

She didn't start eating it before that. Also, he has no idea where his forces are, but knows they were all flung in different directions. It'd be one thing if he saw them all carried off into the next room, they've all been moved miles away.

Miles

I mean all she's doing is creating a stage where the Heroes have a chance at a pissing contest without screwing over the entire continent while doing it. The winner gets to be the WoW (warden of the west).

Unfortunately this might have put my favorite black horse candidate – Abigail – out of the running before she even had a chance to feel the existential dread of maybe getting a Name that makes her face the WoE as an equal.

Anyway the only one who seems to be acting as a WoW should right now is Christophe of all people. Hanno is transitioning to Damsel in Distress, Cordelia is questioning whether she even wants the job, and Christophe is assembling a proper band to get things done, with a proper Heroic Journey and everything.

Frivolous

Indrani was nasty enough as Archer. As Ranger, she'd be a nightmare squared.

I'd had no idea, no hint, that Hanno disliked Hakram and Indrani. Moral void, bland antipathy, casual cruelty? All this time, amazing.

I wonder what the Book of Some Things tasted like. And did Catherine eat it raw or cooked, plain or with condiments?

Everything becomes like food to me when I'm hungry.

Definite change in hero versus villain fights now that Evil has been muted. Hanno should have not had such difficulty even if she is becoming Ranger.

Linnus42

I mean Indrani is pretty elite fighter, Hanno had to win a 2 v 1 to get there and has taken damage. Indrani came in fresh and opened with an Ambush. Shouldn't she be the won winning and not struggling? Especially with being a Ranger Claimant making her more well rounded and less bow dependent.

Agent J

I mean, Hanno's a pretty elite fighter. Lol. He gently slapped down the Mirror Tank while he was wielding Murder Granny.

Linnus42

I don't disagree my point is I am not sure why one would be saying Hanno should not have difficulty with Indrani. When he had to fight a 2 v 1 to get here, Indrani ambushed him and got a shot in, when she is pretty elite herself and when he is holding back far more then she is in terms of damage. If anything Indrani should be the one getting questioned for why she is not winning quicker.

Agent J

To say it more clearly, I believe that question answers itself. Hanno is just the better fighter. Indrani treated Lawrence similarly. It's her "do not engage until noticeably worn down" strategy. Which implies a high degree of respect for his capabilities on her part.

Snappy270

Cause she is trying to delay not win. She doesnt go for killing blows or she could of really done damage with that arrow shot. They are both pulling back.

Insanenoodlyguy

If she went for the killing blow it wouldn't have worked. At least normally. I'd guess he'd still get enough of an advantage though.

Hakram's Dead Hand

You have to remember that you are talking about the strongest Hero in creation. (That we know of) Someone, that when it comes to Martial abilities, has complete backing with the Gods Above. While Indrani is insanely powerful and has proved that, she still wouldn't have tried to fight the previous best, which was the Saint. Furthermore there are two types of story effects that go on during a fight with a hero. There is the current underlying story, which consists of when in the story the fight takes place. But there is also Providence present in any fight with a hero, which is described as fate making sure you are doing the right thing at the right time.

Sure, villains are no longer fated to lose their battles, because of the Bard muting their side of stories. But that doesn't mean Heroes don't have the force of providence trying to force them to win. I think that's what's so interesting about the muting, is that we get to watch the Heroes' stories exist in a vacuum.

Liliet

I mean, this is just people pointing out how Indrani being in the same league as Hanno means she's elite as fuck.

Lord Haart

Well, Claimant vs Claimant here. And Ranger was previously the most elite fighter in Calernia so arguably means more for a duel than Warden.

Sykomantis

This is the only summarization of that fight that exists and you can't tell me otherwise

Insanenoodlyguy

It's a tower climb grind. The normal progression is that the plan works: he wins each fight but getting more exhausted, more wounded, his victories more and more narrow as each level has a harder fight on an emptier tank. Then he makes it to the final boss, exhausted, having no chance, and somehow fate still gives him a victory, or, as happens here, he does fail and the Villian captures him, but is compelled to gloat and so does not finish him off. Considering Cats current Akua'ing it up, I'm half expecting him to wake up in a death trap.

Reader in the Night

Tiger Pit! Put him on a Tiger Pit!

reckonir

Make it a taper pit!

Insanenoodlyguy

No, the tapirs remember last time. They'll have a much tighter legal defense this time, and we can't risk the Tapier Warden of the East being interested in things that aren't eating people.

caoimhinh

It was mentioned pretty early in the story that Hanno and Hakram did not get along, plus everyone with a bit of insight and cleverness realizes that Archer is extremely dangerous.

Plus, Hanno is nerfed right now as he is Nameless, even if he is still ridiculously OP by being able to use Light so masterfully, and Catherine suspects that he can still access Recall. I mean, he quickly and singlehandedly beat the shit out of two strong Named at the same time and had nothing but scratches for it.

If anything, his current level of strength is absurdly high.

Frivolous

caoimhinh: Could you please link me to the chapter or interlude where Hanno and Hakram don't get along?

Archer being dangerous was not in question; Hanno thinking Archer was a jerk was. I mean, this is the guy who famously Does Not Judge.

I don't believe Hanno can access Recall anymore. No mention of in this chapter.

What I believe he is doing is using recall (lower case), his unaugmented memory of using Recall. It suffices if your memory is good enough.

Annya

Indrani IS an asshole. But she is not just that and she is a lot smarter and complicated. But she does usually present herself as an asshole. She is like a big cat that knows that she could eat almost everything she wants and she absolutely uses that to her advantage. She survived Ranger's academy for fucked up gifted youngsters and thrived. You don't get that by being nice on the outside.

Hanno is however really disappointing in the fact that he has not observed everything else about her but so far we have seen that he has ZERO clue how to handle people who do not operate the way he expected. He doesn't understand Masego and Hakram, clearly doesn't get Indrani and is why he couldn't handle The Mirror Knight. He does not understand neurodivergant people. The Witch and the Champion are the exceptions to some extent I guess and it helps that both are AMASING at communication in their own, specific ways.

Liliet

Yeah. Hanno is really REALLY remarkably unobservant. This has badly backfired before, with Christophe reaching the boiling point that he had in the Arsenal, and then again when he failed to realize that maybe there was a reason Cat and Cordelia were insisting, and now... well. Now it's deadly dangerous if he presses his claim successfully while being Like This.

jamesc9

The angels were observing for him.

caoimhinh

I don't have the actual chapter, though I'll try to look it up.

It was in the early chapters of Book 6, and was mentioned from Catherine's perspective. She noted that they seemed to have some grudging respect and professionalism, but did not get along at all.

Also, it seems most characters outside Cat's team don't like Hakram, because he seems like a cold-blooded unambitious killer whose only purpose is to serve the Black Queen (this was shown from even Malicia's POV).

Everyone who has ever interacted with Indrani thinks she is a jerk. Everyone, except maybe Masego XD Plus, Hanno judges now, so there's that.

Cat mentioned a few chapters ago that she suspects Hanno to still have access to Recall's ability, even if to a lesser degree. We know that Hanno developed Recall while training with the Gigantes in "The Room of Many Lives" or something like that, and apparently there was a recent Extra Chapter called Strangers that shows Recall as something deeply ingrained into Hanno (I haven't read that since I'm not a Patreon, so I can't confirm this).

Liliet

> Everyone who has ever interacted with Indrani thinks she is a jerk.

Her team loves and respects her, and I do not mean the Woe. I mean the band of 5 she led during the timeskip.

Refugees know better than anyone else that she's a jerk, but even Alexis is talking to her now? Hanno is missing pretty big developments there.

caoimhinh

One thing does not remove the other.

She can be a jerk and still be loved and respected, because she has a lot of other qualities besides that, which most people who interact with her notice after a few interactions.

Just like most other characters, there are good and bad things to be said about her.

Hanno is not missing anything here, he knows how she is, and in this chapter he was simply mentally commenting on the aspect of her personality more directly relevant to the situation that he is currently in. That does not mean that he doesn't know about her good qualities.

Liliet

It sure sounds like he does, tbh. The thing that most stuck out for me here... remember how he reacted to Nephele in Winter I? She was deliberately aiming to hurt everyone who talked to her, at that time. But Hanno saw the best in her and acted on that.

With Archer... Like, I get that they're fighting right now, but that very much sounded like a more general opinion.

medailyfun

according to the extra chapter "Strangers", Hanno's Recall is not a plain Aspect but a deeper part of him, probably similar to Catherine's Take.

caoimhinh

In one of his earliest interludes, it was mentioned that Hanno developed Recall while training with the Gigantes in some places called something like "The Room of Many Lives". It was there that he trained to polish his skills before he left to adventure and formed his Band of Five to go against Kairos.

Liliet

The Chamber of Borrowed Lives. The extra chapter elaborates on that.

Big I

There was tension between Hakram and Hanno when they shared a scene, like before the Arsenal when they were all on the frontlines.

Liliet

Indrani is terrifying, it's so great.

We did know Hakram and Hanno disliked one another from the end of Book 6. But... yeah. I had definitely not expected THIS.

Linnus42

Seems kinda anticlimatic. Like we get told its a big deal where Hakram won't tell Cat what its about and its a personality clash? Seems weird that neither Hanno or Hakram would talk to Cat about it. Kinda feels like EE had a plan for it and just truncated that arc so tied it up in a rather unsatisfying way.

shikkarasu

I get the feeling that it's more that Hanno and Hakram were both willing to work with one another in good faith because they both trusted Cat. Hanno was always one of the more open to working with Villains in the early days, before the Tyrant's Trial. He might not like Hakram, but he recognises that Hakram is necessary and trusted by the other side. He Did Not Judge, but he did have quiet opinions.

Liliet

We were not told it was a big deal. I'm pretty sure Cat assumed it was a personality clash right away.

I also speculate – and speculated back then – that it's part of Hakram's toxic pattern of jealousy of people around Cat. It explains a lot if he resented her not seeing him as an equal... and resented Hanno for BEING her equal.

Linnus42

That checks out pretty well actually. Given what he said about Akua.

Liliet

Yeah, that's why I thought about it that way =x

Tenthyr

Catherine's really relishing in the chance to actually play Villain for once, I think.

Metalshop

Hanno's fighting style is anime as fuck.

Rex

I was specifically reminded of Saber's prana burst from fate stay night, and some of Azula's firebending moves from Avatar

Insanenoodlyguy

I thought that was always kinda the point? He's even got a summonable horse.

Lord Haart

1. Summonable Mount
2. Can hotswap skills
3. Can defer to a guide outside his reality (Judgement aka video game walk through) to see which dialogue options/actions to take

Yep White Knight Hanno is basically straight out of the stock standard fantasy RPG. Cat is right that he needs to bring more to the table to beat the DK.

dadycoool

Oh, this was glorious! Every part of this was amazing! I can't articulate just how much.

Sam

I totally agree. It's been ages since we have been able to have some good clean fun at the heroes expense.

Nilsn

Hanno-on-a-stick

sidehammer056302

God, It's so delicious when she gets to be Evil Overlord! XD Shes far too much the child of Amadeus of the Green Stretch to leave so cliché a trope unfucked with, lol! I love it!

Insanenoodlyguy

I am sadder then ever he is dead. He would have loved this, and part of the interlude would be him here and loving this.

shikkarasu

I think he would be keying up for another "Catherine, we've talked about this." Like, disappointed Dad vibes while she's out there killing it her own way. This is everything he's ever told her not to do, but it's working.

Now we just need to see what happens once she's firmly past the First Part of her Plan. (I know the Villain stories are napping, but I still feel anxious.)

Liliet

If Amadeus's conclusion from Catherine's First Llesse adventure was "holy shit she's awesome", he'd 100% be onboard with this.

I mean that one was literally "play hero, get killed" but it worked for her and he was BEAMING with pride. Amadeus does not do disappointed dad until and unless she actually gets seriously hurt, and this situation is not shaping up in that direction.

He's the guy who TAUGHT her to win despite the rules.

Miles

Just wait until Bard brings back Villain Tropes to trip up Cat at the worst possible moment.

jamesc9

I wonder what Cat's back-up plan is, for that. It's been discussed in comments, and I'd be surprised if there isn't one.

Insanenoodlyguy

But see, the rules have changed. The first thing that cold unfeeling machine mind of his would be doing is thinking how to adjust strategy with the scales being a lot less biased. Which is what cat is doing, using the hero tropes along with her own lower chances of failure to predict their actions. He'd be loving this. If anything he'd request a role in it somewhere, doing all the things he never was allowed. He couldn't do much fighting with Hanno as an unnamed but perhaps setting up an elaborate death trap or a lethal puzzle game or something, where he taunted them from the other side, ready to scream "just as planned!" and laugh if it was even partially successful. That or do the opposite, and be the starscream with dry sarcasm. "Hello, I am the Chancellor. Would you like to know a shortcut that will take you straight to my evil mistress' lair? This in no way serves my own nefarious plans. I am very trustworthy in this situation."

hakureireimu

You're way underestimating Amadeus if you don't think he can acquire new information and change his approach.

arcanavita15

I like the character development here Cordelia and her view on kingfisher Prince, mirror night growing up and understanding the game and actually gets a bit of what is going on, Also hannos opinions on Hakram and Indrani, which speaking of Ranger claimant I mean we all knew it was coming put this is a pretty great way to reveal it.

Insanenoodlyguy

She will get a final fight with ranger now, I think, who is scarred in many ways after the last encounter. It will be a very different kind of fight then the last one but this time Indrani will be able to win.

Black Spiral Dancer

hahah, bravo!

Silverking

...Wow, Cat's going to be able to teach a lesson to BOTH claimants with this exercise.

Hanno is going to learn what Stories CAN'T do. Up until this point, his whole guiding philosophy has been that if he commits to his role, keeps faith in Above, and follows all Two Hundred Axioms, that everything will eventually work itself out (without him having to politic or compromise on ANYTHING he doesn't want to). Of course he's going to climb the Tower, of course Cat is only one who has to be held accountable for her actions; that's how the game works. Now, he's learning that this reliance on tropes can become a crutch, and if he wants to succeed against craftier foes who no longer have a handicap, he's going to need to learn some new tricks (and maybe break a few rules).

Cordelia is going to learn what Stories CAN do. Up until this point, she has viewed Heroes as overpowered rabid dogs, followers of an illogical set of rules who need to be brought to heel. But now she's open to "learning the rules", and once she gets a Band of Five together, she'll get her first taste of Story: the momentum, the finger on the scales, the universe WANTING you to win. It may not solve all her issues, but she'll finally understand the perspective of her would-be constituents.

arcanavitae15

I really like how you put this. I think Cat is just teaching them a lesson and Christophe bloody Christophe got it first, this is a spar not a slaughter.

RoflCat

It's always the monke-est guy that come up with the most surprisingly intuitive answer.

Also see Raphaela telling Hanno "if not now, when?"

Juff

Typo Thread:

neither had been > neither had lager > larger skin stayed > skin that'd stayed exception fighter > exceptional fighter never known > never been known even she were > even if she were but too, > but two, harmless skidding > harmlessly skidding angle bade > angle bad longknife and > longknife, and up tome > up to me

Captain Amazing

In the Arsenal, at the end of the Bard's card trick, the cards were scattered with bloodied Judgement landing between the Empress and the Tower. Catherine didn't notice. This is more dramatically literal than I had thought, but this might still be part of the Bard's plan.

Insanenoodlyguy

See now, I am pretty sure that was back at the actual tower. Bard was clearly intending to kill her there cause I really don't think losing a huge part of her power was ever her plan.

shikkarasu

A fair point, except for two things:

- Bard made it clear that the Empress was Cordelia in that game, and Judgement was the Sword Of.
- This is the actual Tower. The mad lass actually did it. She turned it into a flying fortress and invaded the West. I AM SO DAMN HAPPY

A-hem, but yes, Bard was setting up some variation of this story. We should get ready for, I dunno, Bard taking her foot off of Evil's stories for 10 seconds so Hanno can get a boost or something otherwise jerk like.

RoflCat

I dunno, as much as everything you said make sense, it'd be such an insane read from Bard that it doesn't feel like it should work.

The side of Cordelia and Hanno remaining hostile to each other is the easy part because two stubborn people.

But THIS whole tower drop thing...
It needs Catherine to be doing this as THE Warden to pull both claimants under the influence Which implies Bard knew Catherine would overcome her attempt at killing Warden of the East name?
And the idea only came after Akua pulled Catherine out of her slump, and Akua's character change only came about after her chat with Hakram at the tower.
(which a part of me wonder if Akua's just enjoying some kind of twisted 'until death do us part', since a knot doesn't become a noose until there's a corpse...and tying the knot is slang for marriage)

shikkarasu

It's not about 100% perfectly predicting the future, she isn't an Augur, but Bard had knowledge of all stories on both sides Bestowal. All she really needed to do was nudge the objects in motion. This was likely not even her first option, but the one she fell back on when Ater didn't go as planned. Note how she was not remotely ruffled until Cat and Masego managed to pry the Book out of her; she clearly already knew the shape of what would happen next.

It's important to remember that Bard and Cat both work off of considering what is bound to happen and arranging events in their own favour. Like the thing with the Goblins and the Green Stretch coming to Cat for arbitration; the exact details were irrelevant. The Story will complete itself around Named and Claimants once it starts being written.

The only thing that makes this seem far-fetched to me is that it kept working after the Evil stories were put on hold. Probably just means that Bard wasn't relying too hard on Villains acting like Villains, anyway.

jamesc9

Well, a lot of the villains have been trying hard not to act like classical cackling villains for a while, so if the Bard was still relying on it, that would be a bad plan.

Tenmei

Im now also reminded that Cat suspected that the Intercessor had been brewing the split between Cordelia and Hanno for a very long time.

So this makes perfect sense!
Whether she decides to interfere though.. guess we will have to see soon..

caoimhinh

This is not something that the Bard planned so far ahead, but rather a consequence of Cordelia backtracking and making a claim for the Name of Warden of the West, which put them back into the plan the Bard had of having the First Prince of Procer as Named with the angel weapon.

The situation and events are definitely different from how the Bard envisioned them initially, but the story she was using back then is in power again.

ninegardens

Ha ha ha ha ha

Silly Hanno.

You thought you would get to fight the dragon BEFORE the big bad.

He... kind of made an ass of himself in this one. His absolute willingness to hurt and maim people based on a weird instinct of "Cat is doing a bad thing"? its a lack of trust.

Also, MK learning things and becoming a better/wiser person is low key my favourite part of this chapter.

Linnus42

Did you miss the part we tried to talk down everyone?
Or that he only did damage to them that they could heal from?
While Indrani was explicitly trying to take out his eye and deal permanent damage.

Dont see how some of that can be your takeaway without massive anti character bias.

But yes Christophe growth is nice.

ninegardens

Okay, this is fair critique. He did try to talk down everyone and.... I'm maybe not fairly accounting for the fact that unlike Christoph, he still does not seem to get that this is a spar, not a war.

I know that Niether the Barrow sword, not Indrani, nor the hunted Magician are trying to kill him (even if he seems to think they are), and its easy for that distinction to colour my interpretation of things.

Indrani "trying to deal permanent damage" I'll take with a grain of salt- Indrani is a lying liar who lies, and has a VERY good measure of how far to push things (see Ranger fights).

Linnus42

I argue if he thought this was not a spar he would not have been concerned about dealing permanent damage. I think he gets Cat is playing a game but not why and think its stupid.

Lets hope DK doesn't launch an attack during this debacle. But yes Christophe growth is nice shows Hanno's method on him worked out quite well.

ninegardens

Actually wait, I think I figured out what bothered me in Hanno's thinking.

At no point does he think "These people are dangerous too me, therefore I must hurt them to defend myself", his primary concern seems to be "Well obviously I can beat them, But I guess I'll have to chop their legs off because I am in a hurry "

I get that there's way more to it than that, but the initial read of "I'm in a hurry, no legs for you" was... super jarring.

Liliet

TBF, Hanno does trust the feeling that's telling him he HAS to be in a hurry, and for good reason. It's not steered him wrong yet, except for when he himself made mistakes.

Personally I found his estimate of the Woe more jarring. He's sure as fuck more charitable towards heroes.

Xi Cree

I would like to counter that the only one he knows Personally is Cat... who he views as the linchpin holding them all to a higher standard.

... and he's not wrong. Just missing out on their deeper character developments.

It's actually amusing how on the money he is about who they USED to be... while mistaking it for who they Are.

Liliet

Mm. Hanno is quite thoroughly ignorant of what's going on around him, including how much Indrani is liked and respected by the team she's led – heroes included – and how even Alexis has started talking to her again.

That's... a BIT of a problem? It's not like this information is deeply hidden...

SpeckofStardust

eh his view on Indrani is spot on, now he badly misreads Hakram because Hakram even before he got attached to cat 'cared' he just has problems in expressing it (his fixation on the tower building game started pre cat)

As for Indrani character development,
"Indrani," I said, "how many people have you killed this year?"

The ochre-skinned Named hummed.

"Define people," she finally asked.

"Because that," I told him. – Book 6 chapter 16
Like Indrani can and does love other people, but if she doesn't love someone well, she can and likely will leave corpses in back alleys or drag them to people she likes but wants to mess with.

Liliet

I wonder how he reconciles his view of Indrani with the love and respect she's earned from her team – you know, the one with Vagrant Spear on it. And the fact Alexis talks to her again now.

And eeyup, no excuse for Hakram. Does he just judge Hakram for disliking him or what?

SpeckofStardust

Honestly Hakram and Hanno are the same with the whole trusting a higher power (angels/Cat) to follow, both also grew out of just trusting to making their own choices (hanno via force and Hakram by choice) as such that could simply be a reaction to your mirror on the other side.
Indrani is becoming Ranger which sorta is a bad look considering how much of a butt Ranger was. And Ranger was loved by the other calamities. Someone being loved/respected doesn't mean someone is a good person.

Liliet

TBF, I don't think being an asshole is a feature of the Name. It's not a villainous one for one, that's been said repeatedly. And Indrani kind of specifically aims to be less of an asshole than Hye, which admittedly is a VERY low bar, but even just aim counts for something.

And I'm not talking about the WOE liking and respecting Indrani. I'm talking about her being put IN CHARGE (this matters) of a mixed team, and how they came out of it her friends willing to come to her and tell her things. Vagrant Spear? Forsaken Paladin? Those people.

When Hye was in charge of some kids, they came out of it with a suppressed desire to carve up her face. Indrani... has made a different showing.

Liliet

Good observation on Hakram and Hanno. They're also both still following the ideals of the entity they initially submitted to, just on their own!

Insanenoodlyguy

No, Cat told us. This only works if she follows through. She legit is trying to eat the book of something, and will if nobody can stop her. Hanno is being spurred by that because it's legit. The fact she doesn't expect it to work or even has that as her primary outcome doesn't change that she'll do it if nobody prevents her.

Liliet

> I'm maybe not fairly accounting for the fact that unlike Christoph, he still does not seem to get that this is a spar, not a war.

> Hanno's eyes narrowed. Light pulsed under his skin. Perhaps this was more serious a situation than he'd thought. He needed to finish this fight quickly, so he should set out bait.

...

> Hanno almost sighed. Was he truly going to have to fight his way to the summit of the tower before he could speak with the Warden, as if this were a Dread Empress' lair being cracked open? He opened his mouth to reply with one last offer of diplomacy but the words never came out: the air had just shivered. Great power was being used above him, a staggering amount of Night. And it was being used to smother something, he found, eyes narrowing. Forcefully put out a light. Instinct tugged at him urgently, insistently. Whatever it was Catherine Foundling had just begun, it could not be allowed to finish. Hanno slowly raised his sword.

>

> "Change of plans," the Sword of Judgement told the villains. "I can no longer afford to hold back."

Hanno understands that Catherine is not actually hostile as well as Christophe does, but he has more accurate intel on how urgent it is, and Catherine has deliberately tugged on it to make it pretty damn urgent. Christophe's insight is valuable, but Cat is also specifically for real intending to eat the Book of Some Things if Hanno doesn't stop her.

caoimhinh

What are you talking about?

Hanno explicitly noted how none of them were trying to kill him, just delaying him. He only noted that some of their moves were serious strikes that would deal lethal damage to someone less skilled than him.

Which, to be fair, is what they need to do just to buy time when fighting against someone so strong as Hanno.

Hanno only hurried here because he can physically feel that Catherine is doing something with that massive accumulation of Night, which she is, so it's not a weird instinct of "she is doing a bad thing", she is actually doing it, and declared to Indrani that she would. We even saw her last chapter and don't know if she succeeded in absorbing the Book.

SnappleFacts

I'm not convinced that Indrani shooting out his eye in this situation would be permanent. Cat's eye is permanently gone because of Revenant bullshit, but we don't actually know whether Archer would be using something that could accomplish the same. Certainly she's got something in her bag of tricks that could do it, but she's holding back—Hanno explicitly notes a moment where she chooses not to stab him in the armpit, which with a long knife would be a lethal blow or close to one.

Is it fucked up to try to shoot someone's eye out, yes, but this is a setting where magical and/or light-based healing can walk back an awful lot.

Abrakadabra

Okay, Hanno is your personal favourite because of the hue of his epidermis. We get it.

Linnus42

He is actually not at all lol. One of my favorites sure but number one, no. Its funny you assume that he is my favorite just cause of skin color though that says more about you then it does about me.

My favorite character overall still living is Hakram.

ninegardens

So, can we just pause to acknowledge the Cerebus Rollercoaster we are on?

Like, we've cut direct from "I killed my father and Dead king has murdered Procer" to "Wacky hijinx Miss Evil Overlord Maam".

This isn't a criticism, its just a... This story swings between silly game and grimdark fantasy... and has swung back and forth repeatedly.

And some of that fits (a warm fireside moment in a dark world), and some of it... is like this, and I love it, I really do, but god damn, that switch is giving me whiplash some days.

Liliet

That's honestly explicitly and specifically what I like about it.

Oshi

The only problem for me is when the roller coaster ride costs me story/pathos/time as it did with the arc in the Empire.

Liliet

Hum. It has never cost ME story or pathos.

Liliet

Never cost ME any of it -smug shrug-

Snappy270

TBF I see it more of cat cant figured out the emotional problems she been trying to deal with. So she did find a solution to this problem so she is putting her all in to distract herself cause this is what she is good at. There will probs be an emotional fall after this, since i bet she never talked to viv about it, even though they have been working together.

shikkarasu

Yep. Grief is hard and takes a long time to get over, but it is rarely complete paralysis for 3+ months. She will keep being hurt and depressed, but she can also try to keep living her life. Sometimes she will even live it. Sometimes she will even have some Dark Majitress. As a treat.

Anomandris

Huh – this chapter (well, the fallout from this rather) kinda tells me why I would never be a Hero....

Cause if I am Hanno, I would walk away from all this. He keeps getting plots, knives in his back, and broadly shit from not only his side, his counter-side as well as the big bad facing them. He hasn't shown anything so far in the story to warrant the same. He tries talking – nothing. He literally is opening up a dwarf gate for Talking!

He tries being non lethal – nothing. He goes for breaking wrists cause he knows that the war still needs the Barrow sword. In return, let's put an arrow in his back and throw night at him.

(But hey, Akua still gets to be Calernia Jesus, so who cares, am I right?)

Walk away, mate. Win or loose, let them live the consequences of their actions. Ain't heroic, but definitely human. And still more than Cat/Procer/Levant deserve.

Annya

Are we reading the same story?

Sorry, PRINCE White? He gets nothing? He makes himself a gigantic pain in the ass, creates literally half the drama with Cordelia Hasenbach in the middle of a war with the DK and he is the one whom you see as hurt and not getting the respect he deserves. He is an agent of his own actions and those actions are based on how he sees the world and his role in it. I do agree that there was a nice way of being more mature which went sideways in the engagement with MK and not just that but since then he has been escalating and deepening the divide and he honestly believes he knows better. He is a hero, so of course he does but the same goes for every other hero .

I am curious why you dragged Akua into this, honestly.

Insanenoodlyguy

If he walks away, cat eats the book. And she's told us she'd do it, that's not a bluff. All of this works because it's not a bluff. It's just that it's not her primary goal in doing this. You walk away when the stakes are this high, you live to regret it the rest of your life. That too is a story. And he wouldn't be named in the first place if he had that kind of give in the first place.

caoimhinh

Yeah, but that's not the point of what Anomandris was saying. The point is "I wouldn't be a Hero, because they kind of stuff they have to do is something I wouldn't do. I would walk away from this mess, Hanno won't."

beleester

He's trying to talk to the dwarves, yes, but going over Cordelia's head in the process. You know, the leader of the alliance, the person whose literal job is to talk to people. They can't both claim to speak for all of Calernia.

Also, Cat is being about as non-lethal as Hanno is being, so I'm willing to chalk it all up as "basically just sparring."

Reader in the Night

Cordelia isn't the Leader of the Alliance. There is no "Leader" of the Alliance, that's how alliances work. And she sure as hell doesn't have the authority to speak for all of Calernia.

Hanno doesn't, either, but when the hell has that ever stopped a Hero from invoking Moral Righteousness as justification to make choices for other people?

jamesc9

When they were a hero of something un-photogenic that involves enabling people to choose for themselves, but those ones probably don't get stories written about them.

Oshi

If this ends with Cordelia, Hanno and Cat named I wouldn't be at all surprised. Cordelia to be a voice for what Hanno and Cat could never be. Who says Balance has to be with TWO sides.

NZ

A two legged stool isn't balanced. Tripods. Or triumvirates worked for balance. Someone to break the tie.

Abrakadabra

Good thinking. It would make sense if the three of them would become a council of sorts.
Hanno idealistic good.
Cat practical evil.

Cordelia practical good.
The evil for evil sake side died with the Tyrant.

caoimhinh

To be fair, Hanno is more practical Good than Cordelia by far, and Catherine herself has noted how he is more prone to compromise and agree with her in most situations than Cordelia. The thing is, Hanno has lines that he won't cross, (because that's what having a principle means, you don't get to break it when it's inconvenient to maintain it), and thus when the time comes for standing for something, he won't yield. Which is what Catherine herself does.

Cordelia is bureaucratic Good, apparently orderly things and complex system establishment that would work wonders if properly implemented... except it won't. Because that's how Procer is. Pretty on the outside but a corrupt shitshow of bickering nobles at its core using legalese to avoid fulfilling the spirit of the law. And she is obsessed with maintaining noble privileges, and she has consistently proven that she will go back on signed agreements the moment something threatens the privileges of nobles, and will not stand for principles except the benefits of Procer, and more specifically Procer's nobility. She has also proved that she won't do what is good or sensible if it is politically inconvenient for her, as shown during the Crusades and during the Red Axe case.

Insanenoodlyguy

Cat is already named. There might be a possibility of them sharing a name, because it's never happened and so is now very possible, but the goal here is to let this resolve in a way that lets Cordy and Hanno not destroy their working relationship.

jamesc9

@Oshi; @NZ; does a three-legged stool imply that someone has backing from an entity other than the gods above and below?

SpeckofStardust

Hanno made the dimmest mistake that good or cordy got immediately, if Cat has set it up for you to "solo" her she will kick your ass.
Like on the villain scale Cats been tied with the Dead King as number 1 for like years at this point.

caoimhinh

But Hanno was explicitly and consistently trying to NOT fight. He spent the whole chapter trying to dialogue with every single person he met and fighting only when forced to. He didn't climb that tower to solo Catherine, he went there to talk. And only hurried because he needed to talk to her and stop her from what he could feel she was doing.

SpeckofStardust

He started off with a party at his back for a reason. The fact that he rushed ahead because he can "do something" is wrong, he cant do something he cant stop it solo and his presumption that he could was his mistake.

Matt

He had a party because hed called a meeting of heroes, they were with him at the time. Cat decided to crash it to stop him alnd force a fair confontation/force him to ally with cordelia. He didnt form a party to face her, her actions arent defensive. Its intetesting how when his feeling that he must act now even if solo paints him as pigheaded and stupid when Cat has done so in multiple instances of the story and its be lauded as brilliant. Guess it just proves people will carry bias for their 'team' even if theyre acting no different from the 'enemy'.

jamesc9

@caolimhinh

> [Hanno] spent the whole chapter trying to dialogue ...

Ish. It didn't extend to answering riddles.

Liliet

Nice to finally get an acknowledgement of the "share the Name" option, though it's a bit frustrating that it comes so late and as such an aside. Really should have been explained earlier IMHO, and in Cat's POV, too. Though it's interesting characterization that we learn it from Cordelia, I expect in context that it's more that Cat already knows this and finds it too obvious to remark upon, than that somehow Cordelia came up with a solution Cat didn't at all.

It IS excellent that Cordelia has thought of it, though. Points for her.

Insanenoodlyguy

Actually I think it's now a possibility, though not my first choice. Still we are told today that it definitely never ever happens, can't happen. Which means it totally could happen now.

Liliet

True!

ISiejek

Hanno is such an ass, not only is his personality shitty, he has the nerve to talk about consequences when this is blatantly only occurring as a consequence of his actions. Again!

Liliet

Honestly, I'd ordinarily disagree with Hanno's personality being shitty, but... -looks at the latest arc-
...he's been getting worse

hue hue

The Mirror Knight finally learned, Tarric gave the guy very good lessons

Rynjin

Cordelia...why the hell do you want a job where your literal only responsibility is "herding Chosen" if you're already tired of doing it in the fucking TRIAL PHASE.

ArkhnIX

I don't think Cordelia's tired of doing it. I think she's tired of doing it WHEN SHE SHOULDN'T HAVE TO. That is what makes the difference here. She sees how Hanno is running things as a problem she ends up having to wrangle when they step on her countries toes, and she wants home to do better. And if he won't Cordelia believes she can do the better job. She expresses a desire to learn namelore here, which shows she is willing to learn and work with the heroes, and understand their rules. She wouldn't do that if she didn't want to actually do the job well. She'd just rely on political authority.

For all Cordelia sees heroes as a problem, she isn't inflexible. It just takes her a bit of time and evidence to change her mind. See her opinion on the mirror knight in this chapter to show how actual work to better himself raised Cordelia's opinion of Christophe. If the other heroes can actually show they can be competent adults, and not just be a parade of problems at her door, I think Cordelia would probably respect them more.

Rynjin

Doing your duty is all well and good, but someone who is resentful of a responsibility shouldn't be taking that responsibility onto themselves. It's just going to impact their judgment, because they're not going to be making decisions with a clear head, there's always going to be that thought of "I can't believe I have to fucking do this".

john

Cat worked her way up to Warden of the East with a similar attitude. Would you rather have a leader who resents having to use their own power, and thus with care born of bitterness arranges stable solutions which won't soon result in them needing to use it again... or one who savors the use, treating any and every additional scrap of clout like a shiny new toy?

jamesc9

I would love to be convinced that real people are like this. Can you point me to some prominent people IRL who seem to live like the first option?

Abrakadabra

Because duty. That moves cordy forward.

jamesc9

Lest dawn fail.

MoR

EE, i just started reading 3 months ago and just now got to the newest chapter. I always read the comments too, and i dont think you should. They get weirder, way to entitled and toxic as your amazing story goes on. Its actual torture thou to actually wait for new chapters, i check at least twice a day. Become a patreon member too since you really, really deserve it. Maybe approach netflix for a series deal, they are desperate and the sheer amount of stories seems very profitable. Might be a solution for the decision to not publish this as a book yet, and solve the narrative breaks between chapters since it would make excellent episodes. I just really love the world you created! Dont let all these self entitled people trying to force your hand by explaining what they would absolutly not like going forward influence you in the slightest. Your way is the single best one, as you prove chapter for chapter. Keep beeing you, and thank you, like a lot.

Abrakadabra

This.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

I get where you're coming from, but I also believe that he can balance the often unreasonable input of the comments against his own priorities. He's done so thus far, after all. Shutting out all feedback is not necessarily the optimal solution, though it is always an option.

Also, you might already know this, but there's a schedule for the updates: Tuesday and Friday, every week without fail. The sheer consistency of this is a small part of why I don't think he needs to avoid the comments; if he were agonizing over feedback or doing hasty rewrites there'd be frequent delays, whereas any holdup is a rare thing for this serial.

Liliet

Personally I don't think a live action adaptation of Guide could remotely do it justice... a cartoon adaptation is actually much more likely to work, for sticking to appearance descriptions of characters, for special effects, for scenery and large scale battles...

Insanenoodlyguy

Agreed. I know it'd reach a wider audience but a live action would be a disappointing underwhelming thing unless it got a lord of the rings tier budget.

Liliet

LotR is three books adapted into three movies. PGTE, to do remote justice to the source material, would have to be a tv series. Where, like, every other episode had LotR tier budget.

Yeah. I'm dreaming of a cartoon adaptation.

Matt

I agree totally, invincible has proven that a cartoon medium can tell a very mature story incorporate the gore and still pluck emotional heartstrings.

mindsword2

The part I found most interesting was this

"When the punishment had been doled out she'd thought it nonsense, just another example of the White Knight letting off his charges with a slap on the wrist after they behaved atrociously – Christophe de Pavanie had accused the Queen of Callow of cooperating with the Dead King before mutilating a high officer of the Grand Alliance – but perhaps there had been some use to it."

It implies very interesting things about how Cordelia viewed Hanno's Judgement. We all know he was going light (ish) on Mirror but it was to keep the man alive. But the bit "another example" jumps out at me. Have we seen Hanno let any other hero off? The Red Axe was killed, just not in the way Cordelia wanted.

wadeingintheriver

I mean, going off what the historical punishments for attempting to murder royalty were, the Red Axe got off super lightly. Seeing how Procer is so French/Frankish flavored, I imagine that the legal penalty for attempting to murder a Prince must be similar to the Execution of Damiens for the attempted assassination of Louis XV.

Compared to that, the way that the Red Axe died was a total slap on the wrist, even if she did subsequently get rezzed and axed again.

mindsword2

Quite possibly, but Cordelia did not argue with the sentence of death when it was pronounced. If a more draconian death was needed, it could have been suggested. She tried that with Mirror (a month in a cell) after all.

Linnus42

I think Cordelia is mostly mad at 4 Heroes. Red Axe, Mirror Knight, Grey Pilgrim, White Knight.

Arsenal had some other extra traitors on both sides but they all died so hard to get a harsher sentence.

Red Axe I think has been covered didn't get a light sentence, had a fairly justifiable motivation and was already turned before she got there. Got the Death Penalty. Christophe is a major war asset and got reformed seems fair. Tariq didn't get punished at all but he much like Frederic has dual status. And I think he dies before most of this system was formalized. Also its not like Cordelia had a solution to stop Black from starving all of Procer. I don't think Cordelia even logged a formal complaint about Tariq anyway just stewed about it.

Hanno well he is hardly going to punish himself. But he was following the letter of the law. Cordelia needed compromise and special requests to solve political issues at home.

And I should not for Red Axe and Tariq the trigger for their actions was an actual Villain. While Christophe got tricked by Bard and was being worked on to betray the Drow by Princes (Cordelia's Domain) but he had not agreed to any such betrayal at the time.

Liliet

Tariq died at the end of book 6, long after the Arsenal clusterfuck.

Reader in the Night

Ouch. Every single time Cordelia compares the Heroes unfavorably with the Highest Assembly I just – I can't. One group is composed of mostly selfish idiots with a few well-intentioned folks (Cordelia, Rolanza, Otto, Frederic); the other group is composed of mostly well-intentioned folks with a few idiots (Red Axe, Christophe). That Cordelia somehow has this flipped around is just physically painful to me.

Even the one persistent gripe that Cordelia has with Heroes: the Red Axe situation. We have a woman who killed her rapist and the man who destroyed her village, and then attacked a Hero who was trying to talk her down and happened to be Proceran Royalty, all while being explicitly manipulated by the Bard. And that's bad, because that kind of internal conflict puts the entire continent at risk, as we know.

And then in Interlude Grand, we have a significant part of the Highest Assembly plotting to have Cordelia assassinated because they didn't like her TAXATION POLICY! The taxation that was necessary to win the War for all of Mankind!

Proceran Royalty habitually sinks their own people into civil war as a form of political showboating or backstab each other for sport, and call it "the Ebb and Flow"! When Catherine demanded their crowns for the common good of the people they purport to rule, all but one balked. Proceran Royalty Sucks.

And that Cordelia can compare the Heroic Named to that and be "annoyed" that she has to wrangle them just smacks of such huge hypocrisy. I can't help but feel like Cordelia is only happy when she's in control, and the reason she was annoyed at Heroes was because she couldn't just bully them with procedure like she does the Highest Assembly.

Linnus42

I do think Cordelia wants to be a control freak. But also she is kinda blind to the issues caused by Nobility because well she has always been one. Kinda like to the fish being in water is the natural experience.

kinigget

The difference is that Cordelia is used to the Highest Assembly, and also knows how to make them do what she wants. While at the same time, she sees heroes as completely intractable and prone to lashing out anything that doesn't meet their moral judgement.

And, well, she's not entirely wrong, but her experiences are very much coloring her views here.

Jdburger

So Cordelia's big hero issue is actually from Saint of Swords at first. If I remember correctly she... and I believe Saint threatens her and ultimately tells her she is powerless to stop her. Then we double down with Tariq whom unilaterally decides sacrificing an entire village is worth it to get the Black Knight. The Mirror Knight and Red Axe just further reinforce the point that Heroic names do not seem to consider how their actions affect non-named.

Even Hanno, mostly because judgement messed him up, is another example Red Axe is executed per the Accords, but he did not consider how this affects the signatories since the Kingfisher is both named and still a ruling noble of Procer. This is another example to Cordelia where the named take precedence over the unnamed.

To Cordelia there is no framework of control or accountability for Heroic Names. Even Villainous names have accountability for their actions in the form of Heroes who will hunt them down. Yes, Procer nobles are duplicitous children, but there are laws that can be exerted if they decide to massacre a village.

ninegardens

^ This

Xinci

To be fair on those, Saint just told her that the rot was too deep into Procer to remove it. Which Cordelia kinda realizes herself later. She didn't actually threaten Cordelia, mostly told her the truth of how things go later Tariq sacrificed a Village while Cordelia was planning to sacrifice a entire city.

When it comes to the Red Axe, it was only an issue due to the aforementioned rot meaning Procer couldn't actually back up its support of a international compact.

She can blame them for getting in her way, but a lot of the reasons are because Procer itself was lacking.

Jdburger

I think the Red Ace issue is a bit more complicated than just corrupt and rotten nobles. Cordelia is not an absolute monarch so depends on work with her nobles to get things done, and if they decide not to obey her... well we get glimpse of it this arc. Cordellia agreed to the accords because she believe it was needed to successfully win the war, but there is no guarantee that if she dies or get deposed the next first prince will not leave the alliance. Thus when Red Axe wounded a noble of Procer – her nobility expected not only justice but judgement carried out by Procer. If Cordellia backed down and accepted Hanno's judgement as final the nobles whose land were not on the front lines would become even more recalcitrant and potentially seek a new first Prince.

You can claim this is selfish and symbolic of rot in Proceran Nobility, but it also shows the inherent issue with many of the heroes in the story. Tariq slew a village to capture Black, if not for Cat and other named the Choir of Mercy would have killed multiple world leaders to slay the Tyrant preparing the way for the Dead King to win. Hanno's development was stunted by completely giving himself over to the Choir of Judgement. The Lone Swordsman was willing to martyr an entire city to bleed Praes. Even Red Axe believes that the Accords are wrong because they protect the Rapacious Enchanter, but does not consider how to make them better, only tells Cat to make it so, nor does Red Axe consider why they were done. Effectively several of the big Heroes act as if as long as they operate according to their own morality Providence will take care of the rest. It is this attitude that triggers Cordellia's distrust but I think

Linnus42

I mean Cordelia signed a deal where Hanno and Cat got sole discretion to deal with those Named in their camps. There were zero exceptions for if a Prince of Procer got injured or almost killed. Cordelia wanted the rules changed because she needed help dealing with a Proceran Problem. A deal is not going to last if everyone is going to be carving out political exceptions because their poll numbers are bad on the homefront.

I will however agree that Red Axe issue was not really caused by Nobles. Red Axe is simply a very likely outcome in a system like the Truce and Terms where Villains get free passes for all crimes committed before they sign up. I argue Red Axe was flaw that would inevitably cause issues down the line. And I am not going to condemn Hanno for not stopping her when he didn't meet her until after she did her acts. Nor am I going to condemn a rape victim who saw her whole village massacred for not being especially concerned about a system that she views as protecting monsters. Is it for the Greater Good, sure but Red Axe's reaction is perfectly natural given the trauma she suffered and the fact Bard got to her first. Also Red Axe is not a big Hero.

Tariq slew a village to stop Amadeus from starving all of Procer by destroying the crop supplies. If anything Tariq resolved the issue with minimal loss of life, considering Cordelia's plan involved sacrificing an entire city to stop Amadeus. Not that she was close to executing that plan. Beggars cannot really be choosers in this situation. Cordelia is more mad that Tariq didn't do her plan than anything else. Even if she claims its because he unilaterally decided to kill Procerans. But I will take the plan that kills less civilians overall.

Lone Swordsmen is irrelevant to Cordelia's complaints. Hanno was already covered above. Red Axe was also.

Jdburger

Cordellia is not an absolute monarch – she is not capable of forcing the other Proceran nobles to follow her orders. She must negotiate and bargain with them and generally rules by having the strongest support. So Cordellia I believe signed the Accords in her role as First Prince and the rest of nobles of Procer are going along with it because it more beneficial or less problematic to do so. When Red Axe assaulted or could have potentially killed the Kingfisher who was still a noble of Procer... the other Princes of Procer now have to worry if abiding these Accords will weaken their rights and protections. If so they might decide the benefits of the Accords are outweighed by the drawbacks. Cordellia realizes that and so yea she needed to ensure the Princes got their justice or else Procer as an united front goes away. This is why I am saying the issue is more complicated then just she made an agreement and is reneging on it.

To the Tariq issue if I remember correctly I was pretty sure Black was retreating back to friendly territory at that point. Furthermore unleashing a plague on a village versus having Black assault a city... I am not sure which is worse. You may technically be right and it resulted in fewer casualties in this instance, but in generally both sides have less control over a plague then a siege / assault. Which I think is the big issue here aside from assurance from the Choir of Mercy could Tariq be sure that the plague may not spread to the rest of Procer? We already know the the Choir of Judgement is willingly to atomize someone who dares to Judge them and the Choir of Mercy is willing to kill a lot of other people to uphold Tariq oath towards the Tyrant.

For Red Axe I agree up to a point... my main issue with her actions is when she attacked the Kingfisher for attempting to protect her! There is no good reason for her to have done so... she already had her vengeance and Hanno could execute with no problem. The only reason she did so was because of the Bards plan – a plan that required the Hero to harm an innocent.

Liliet

> To the Tariq issue if I remember correctly I was pretty sure Black was retreating back to friendly territory at that point.

Nope, he was going DEEPER into Proceran territory. Amadeus didn't actually have friendly territory available to retreat to in that campaign – well, there was the Stairwell, but he was going in a completely different direction from the start. He did not have a planned way out of there, at all.

> Furthermore unleashing a plague on a village versus having Black assault a city... I am not sure which is worse.

It wasn't having him assault a city. Cordelia had specifically given orders to let him into the city then set it on fire with civilians still inside, specifically blocking exits for them so they would also prevent the military from organizing and putting out the fire or leaving.

> For Red Axe I agree up to a point... my main issue with her actions is when she attacked the Kingfisher for attempting to protect her! There is no good reason for her to have done so... she already had her vengeance and Hanno could execute with no problem. The only reason she did so was because of the Bards plan – a plan that required the Hero to harm an innocent.

Well, Frederic is not exactly a non-combatant. He also went along with the plan that Red Axe viewed as fundamentally unjust – the T&T – and so was complicit in her eyes.

hakureireimu

Saint didn't just tell what the future will be. She active works to ensure that future (end of Procer) becomes reality by making it difficult otherwise (peace with Cat). And then she says that burning down Procer is a good thing.

Xinci

Even now Procer is fragmenting, they did indeed lose at first, and newer systems are coming out of it dying. Even this current state is under a similar paradigm to how it would go. You can say this is due to Bard, but Saint was calling out a fairly accurate pattern for the death of empires. The existence of a particular group or culture is never inviolable or perpetual.

Konstantin von Karstein

That's true, but it's not the only thing SoS did. She voluntarily sabotaged the war effort against Keter by trying to prevent any alliance between Callow and the West, and fully acknowledged it could mean the death of millions.

Reader in the Night

To everyone saying that Cordelia's beef with Heroes is that they will all just do whatever they feel is best and hang everything else: You're all absolutely correct. And Heroes do exactly that.

But so does Cordelia, all of the goddamn time. Cordelia habitually does unspeakable things to Proceran law, twisting it, exploiting it, or having it changed by trickery and deceit, when she's not outright breaking it, like when she ordered a failed attack on herself to frame a Proceran Noble for treason (she ordered a Villainous Named to attack said Noble, too. That she had no issue with).

It seems to me that Cordelia's issue with the Heroes isn't that they're unaccountable: The proceran nobles are pretty unaccountable themselves, and Cordelia most of them all, and she's fine with that. Her problem is that she, Cordelia Hasenbach, isn't personally in control of them the way she can Highest Assembly. She's too used to winning, and the Heroes are actors that she can't browbeat into compliance.

In that sense, Cordelia truly deserves a Heroic Name, because that sense of "Justice is whatever the fuck I determine it to be, and hang everybody else's opinion" is exactly what Heroes run on: personal conviction. The problem is that she's very eager to hypocritically condemn all other Heroes for the very same thing she habitually does, while vying for the right to pass judgment on Heroes everywhere. And that can only end poorly.

Jdburger

So I am pretty sure Cordellia does not have control of the High Assembly. That's one of the major issues we see when we look at Procer is that the nobles are acting as an antagonist to Cordellia. To achieve her goals against the nobility she does often exploit their own laws and sometimes violate them.... But the laws exist to govern Procer. Those same laws give the nobles recourse to select a new first Prince – since I believe Cordellia has worried about getting ousted before.

On the other hand there are no laws really to govern Heroes – only stories.

The second issue is scale of power when comes to accountability. Cordellia is confined to “mundane-ish” options to achieve goals. Yes she can hire an assassin, named or not, but so could any other noble or rich person really. Ultimately anything she could do is possible by any regular person (assuming similar resources – which would include wealthy merchants or nobles in different countries)

A Heroic names though have a lot more power that trumps unnamed abilities. Remember Tariq create a plague and bound the Tyrant to tell only the truth under pain of Choir nuke. I am pretty sure given what we seen throwing the Mirror Knight in front of an army – the Mirror Knight might still have good odds to survive. Hell when the White Knight is called out for his actions – the Hierarch gets blasted by the Choir of Judgement.

If Cordellia had the same unaccountability as Heroes in this story and the degree of control over the High Assembly that the Heroes have over their own actions. Most of her plot items would have been resolved quickly. All Malicia’s plots to stymie Procer would have failed because Cordellia is First Prince and she would execute the treasonous nobles. She would not have to have closed Assembly with only her allies enough people to make it legitimate force through edicts – she would have just commanded it be so.

Liliet

Cordelia actually very rarely twists laws, and only in extremely desperate situations. You’re referring to her actions in Grand, but that’s basically Cordelia snapping and going “no more ms nice gal” towards people who were trying to have HER assassinated while she was trying to lose the war with DK for all their necks at least a little bit slower. For years before then she was upholding both the letter and spirit of law.

Matt

Agree.

zenanii

Good to see that Cats plan for amending her friendship with Hanno is coming along nicely.

nick

Throwing a hero off a tower is prerequisite for any good friendship with a villain:)

Interlude: Occidental II

"Intelligence, Chancellor, is understanding that alligator moats never work against heroes. Cleverness is paying an alchemist for water-coloured acid instead."

– Dread Emperor Venal

The world was upside down.

Hanno could not recall ever waking up hanging from his feet before, at least not in his own body. It would have been disorienting even if the strands of solid shadow binding his feet weren't slowly turning, spinning his body with them. His wrists were behind his back and, he found out after flexing his muscles, tightly secured. Two layers of steel manacles and one of Night, if he was feeling it right. How characteristically thorough of Catherine. He was also, to his mild discomfort, naked from the belt up.

The room was chillier than he would like.

"Hey, look who's up," Archer's voice cheerfully called out.

Now that the spinning was allowing to see more than a screen of Night and glimpses of the stone floor, Hanno found to his mild bemusement that he was being held in what looked like a dungeon. Like spider legs on glass, he felt an instinct skitter across his mind. A wrongness. Hanno cocked his head to the side.

"Is that an iron maiden?" he asked, genuinely curious.

Archer shrugged, seated on top of the open iron cabinet full of spikes. Her legs were wrapped around the head of a screaming ghost, keeping her in place.

"Came with the tower," she told him. "You know Praesi."

Hanno did not, save through memories not truly his own. Perhaps he was lucky, considering what he was looking at. A dozen torture racks, manacles to hang people up against the wall at twisted angles and some sort of... wheel with ropes? He spent a moment trying to work out where the person would go on the device, coming away with the conclusion that no matter where that was the exercise would be deeply painful. He pulled at his bindings again, but the steel did not give in the slightest. He then reached for Light, but while he could sense it Hanno could not seem to move it.

It was as if a deep and dark pit lay between his will and the gift of Above, not forbidding contact so much as keeping out of reach. It was, he thought, a much harder restraint to break than a simple forbidding would have been. Focusing, he tried to seize the smallest possible sliver of Light.

"I have been healed," Hanno said, as silence would make his work obvious.

The absence of pain on his cheek and back had been noticeable enough, though he could not look to see if the wounds were closed.

"Some," Archer said, wagging a finger in direction. "Mostly we kept it from getting worse, so don't you go getting ideas."

It worked. Hanno felt a well of satisfaction as a mote of Light moved just as he'd willed it. The binding is not perfect, he thought. At a guess, there was a lower bound to the quantity of Light he could be prevented from seizing. It was a common enough weakness in workings, given that most human minds had difficulty grasping the level of precision that was the given of the divine. Carefully, Hanno moved his mote slightly to the side before releasing it. It did not move.

The turning hid his pleased smile, and it was gone by the time he was facing his captor again.

"It is traditional for one to escape when held in a torture dungeon," he reminded Archer.

"I could hamstring you if you want," she offered with a sharp smile. "It'd take care of those pesky traditions for you."

It was difficult, careful work. Hanno's forehead beaded with sweat as, one mote at a time, he wove the Light into a chord. One that was stretching out, slowly but surely, towards him.

"You haven't, though," he mused. "Why, Archer? If the Warden truly intends to devour the Book of Some Things, as you said, why would she not take all possible measures to ensure I could not get in her way?"

Catherine Foundling was giving him, Hanno thought, a shot at stopping her. A pause. No, he thought, perhaps not him alone: he would be surprised if the First Prince were not already on her way to the tower. She had the spies to learn of this and Frederic would no doubt help her.

"Do I strike you as the woman with the plan, Shiny Boots?" Archer drawled. "I'm just obeying orders."

He doubted that, but there was no point in pushing for answers she would not give. The chord lengthened and lengthened, his back shining with sweat from the work. It had been some time since he'd had to maintain so minute a focus for so long. These days his manipulations of Light tended for the large, not the small. A lesson to be learned, Hanno considered. Growing in power had caused him to lean towards the ram instead of the key when presented with a closed gate, but that might be a mistake.

A lesson, Hanno considered, brow creasing as he rotated away from his captor. Was that the entire purpose of this theatrical tantrum? To teach them a lesson? Spider legs pattered across the glass, the wrongness still crawling all over his mind. He was missing something.

"It won't work," he said. "Giving us a common enemy. Forcing us to work together."

"Shit," Indrani sighed. "You twat, I had ten silvers riding on you not figuring it out until Cordy showed up."

It should have been beneath Hanno to derive even a crumb of satisfaction from having made the smug villainess lose something, but he was only human.

"Unfortunate," Hanno lied, moving on immediately. "This is short-sighted of her, Archer. My differences with Hasenbach are not going to be ended by an evening of making common cause. We already have a common cause."

The Grand Alliance, and beyond that Good. Cordelia Hasenbach, however, intended to suborn heroes to laws and crowns after having spent the last few years repeatedly demonstrating that both failed to serve their stated purpose even when the stakes were the highest possible ones. Hanno simply could not understand how someone could look at the behaviour of the Highest Assembly during and before the war then conclude that the likes of them should be given more power over heroes. There needed to be changes, that was true, but what was truly needed was an intermediary between Above's champions and earthly powers.

Someone who could steer away from conflicts between them, not serve as some crown-appointed governor of heroes. It simply would not work, and it should not: heroes often found their Names fighting against corrupt authority, it was absurd that an entire system should be built around punishing them should they do this. Absurd and doomed to failure. Named would not bend to those laws, it would run against their nature. All it would accomplish was make heroes into outlaws so that another pack of vultures could feel a little safer plotting in their palaces.

The chord was stretching ever close to him, to his will, providence's nudge making the efforts just a little easier. He must be approaching the close of his conversation with Archer, which would end with his breaking out of his bindings.

"I do not believe she is evil, Archer," Hanno said. "But we disagree fundamentally on how the world should be. That is not something over which there can be compromise and it cannot be papered over by an evening of fighting side by side."

"Well, you got us right pegged," Archer mourned. "Guess we'll just lose then."

The chord connected even as she finished the last word, Light flooding through Hanno's veins, and in the instant that followed the illusion shattered. Like a pane of glass being smashed.

Hanno was not in a dungeon and Archer was not sitting atop an iron maiden.

She was perched on a raised stone covered by runes and glyphs, an arrow loosely nocked to the bow on her knee, but it was not her the illusion had been meant to veil. It was their surroundings. They were in the great room that was the heart of the tower, the nexus where all the power converged, and here shadow dwelled like a living thing. Currents of Night flowed from channels in the walls and floor, rivers crossing the air, and everywhere copper gutters sprawled in esoteric patterns that stung his eyes. Glyphs covered every inch of stone, pulsing with something unseen that moved the tendrils of Night streaming down as if some great beast was breathing in and out.

Now that he was no longer blinded by the illusion, Hanno found the sheer amount of power flowing through the room suffocating. How was Archer unaffected? The darkness swirled lazily around her like smoke, almost playfully, and she gave no sign of feeling ill. His eyes moved past her, following the gutters inevitably leading towards the centre of the room. There lay a raised dais, on which a pedestal had been raised. And on that pedestal a simple leather book had been set down, one that would have seemed a simple manuscript if not for the way Hanno's soul sang whenever he gazed at it. And in front of the artefact stood the third person in the tower heart.

The Warden of the East, leaning against her staff on the dais and wreathed in so much Night she seemed entirely made of it, cast a disgruntled glance in his direction and snapped her fingers. The darkness he'd woven the Light chord through deepened, grew longer, and the chord shattered in a thousand small motes. Utter surprise stilled him. That should not have been possible, Hanno knew. Night always broke when matched with Light. He'd thought his memory of it being devoured when he was captured was mistaken, that there'd been a misunderstanding on his part – an artefact had been used, perhaps.

"The fucking Sisters made that Light trap," Catherine Foundling said, sounding both admiring and disgusted. "And you figured a way through in, what, eighty heartbeats at most? While hanging upside down and talking the whole time."

She shook her head, muttering something that sounded like fucking heroes under her breath.

"We were at the good part," Archer smiled at him. "Go on, Shiny Boots, tell us more about how you've figured all this out."

He was still frozen, dripping with sweat and struggling with the surprise. Was it a trick, another illusion? It should not have been possible for Night to do this.

"What have you done, Warden?" Hanno harshly asked. "What is this?"

It was more than simply his own Light being suppressed, he realized. The Book he now saw, was fighting darkness encroaching from all sides. He'd not seen it at first because of the gloom, but there were thin strands of Night coming down from the ceiling and walls and trying to touch the holy artefact. They were being kept back by a presence that came in the form of an invisible globe – six, seven inches wide – but Hanno could feel the pressure against it. It was as if the entire tower and all its Night was bearing down on the Book through the tendrils, its weight slowly crushing the artefact. Snuffing out the Light within.

Night, he thought once more, should not have been able to do that. It should have dispersed, vanished, given ground.

"Are you," Catherine Foundling idly asked, "asking me to tell you all about my Evil plan?"

It would not be a deal with a devil, she saw those as beneath her. Had Below itself blessed her with strength? Hanno's stomach clenched. It was unlike the Hellgods to act so blatantly, but these were the end times. Rules grew weaker in the eyes of men and gods alike.

"How many patrons can a single lifetime fit, Catherine?" Hanno asked, hoping pricking her pride would loosen her tongue. "After this one, how many more do you have waiting in the wings?"

He got an amused glance back.

"That would absolutely have worked on me when I was seventeen," the Warden admitted.

Archer loudly cleared her throat.

"Fine," she corrected. "Maybe for a little while after too."

He was not learning anything, but even a delay was worth buying. Soon the First Prince and others would – Hanno's stomach clenched. Even as she had been speaking with him, he realized she had kept the ritual going. How? He found that sole eye watching him, amused. His thoughts must have been plain on his face.

"The first thing I did when this began," the Warden of the East told him, "was figure out a ritual that I'd be able to walk away from before it ends. Made this whole affair longer than it had to be, all bludgeon and no finesse, but that way it accounted for you crashing the party. A worthwhile trade-off, yeah?"

Good, if he could get her talking...

"If you knew I would act stop you," Hanno said, "then, on some level, you know this shouldn't be done. You can still stop, Catherine. There have been no deaths and-"

"And I'm not breaking any laws," she replied, tone mild. "Landing the tower was impolite, I suppose, but that's not why you're really here. What claim do you realistically have on the Book of Some Things, Hanno? You didn't make it and it was ripped out of the Bard, not one of your charges. It has nothing to do with you."

It was not happenstance, that Catherine Foundling had ensured she was both the Queen of Callow and the Warden of the East. It was her favourite tactic to use one title as cover for actions she took as the other: shaking Callowan swords and Grand Alliance laws at him now even as this room held more Night than he'd ever seen gathered in a single place. Bandyng words with her would be pointless, Hanno thought, she could talk in circles until the Last Dusk. Directness was the only way through, stripping the fig leaf.

"It belongs," he plainly said, "to the Warden of the West. Good's stories in Good hands."

The light of the room dimmed, shadows roiling as the invisible globe around the Book groaned.

"That's nice," the Warden of the East praised. "Good turn of phrase, very heroic."

She leaned forward, the movement casting her sharp cheekbones even more harshly. One eye under a cloth as dark as Night, the other eerily knowing. Shadows melded into the long dark hair, threaded themselves around the forlorn staff of dead yew. There was not a man or woman of Calernia that would have seen her in that moment and not known her to be Below's favourite daughter.

"Now tell me, Hanno of Arwad," Catherine curiously asked, "what exactly is it that compels me to obey you?"

He blinked, honestly taken aback.

"You would destroy the Accords by denying this," he slowly said. "Accords that you have-"

"No," the Warden cut in. "They'll still all sign, the nations, and they're the part that matters. Even if the heroes balk – and a lot of them won't – then most of what I want will be achieved. Try again."

Gods Above, what was this?

"You would play these games when we prepare to march on the Crown of the Dead?" he asked, incredulous.

It might be that some would sign the Liesse Accords nonetheless, as she'd said, but they could not truly succeed without the support of the heroes. If too many refused the rules, they meant nothing. What was the point of this petty posturing when Calernia teetered on the brink of annihilation? The Dead King was loose.

"Yeah, we are about to do that aren't we?" Archer drawled. "Cat, you must have forgot."

Hanno himself had forgot she was there. Archer was someone who called attention to herself, but she was a candle to Catherine Foundling's bonfire.

"Got distracted, I guess. Maybe it was all the concerned diplomats knocking at my door," the Warden sharply smiled. "You know, so they could tell me their worries about the pissing match between Prince White and the First Prince sinking the Grand Alliance before it even began to march."

Archer let out an overdone noise of understanding, all the while smiling like a cat playing with a crippled bird.

"Sorry, Shiny Boots, I interrupted," Archer solicitously said. "You were saying something about games, the siege of Keter coming up?"

His jaw tightened. Catherine could have been lying about the diplomats, but he doubted it. It was usually her preference to use the truth as her knife. The implied reproach was not without merit if his rivalry with the First Prince was shaking the confidence of allies to such an extent.

"How many?" Hanno asked.

"Even if it had been only one," the Warden of the East said, "it would have been too many."

That was, he considered, true. He had not been wrong to step forward and act, but he had not tended to the situation as well as he should have. Authority was trust made action, and he had been wasting trust. All involved lost from this.

"I have been at fault," Hanno frankly replied. "My error must be mended and will be."

He then flicked a hard look around him.

"But my faults, whatever they might be, excuse none of this."

"Excuse?" the Warden of the East laughed. "You seem to be misunderstanding something, Hanno. I have no need to excuse anything."

The Night in the room billowed, like cloth in the wind, as if answering its mistress's harsh laughter.

"Who is it that's going to call me to account tomorrow?" she asked. "You?"

She looked him up and down, dismissive.

"How's that working out?"

Then she gestured dismissively at the distance.

"Cordelia?" she continued. "She's so badly in my debt she'd break an entire wagon of shovels digging her way back to daylight. Besides, neither of you actually commands a damned thing."

Yet another reason the First Prince could not be the Warden of the West. She was too tightly bound to Procer and the debts of gratitude it would Callow – and that kingdom's Black Queen, even after her abdication. The one-eyed priestess shrugged.

"You've split up Procer with your Prince White business," the Warden said. "And she's got her own loyalists in the heroes. You're coming to me with threats and warnings, Hanno, while your fucking house is on fire."

A fire that would be put out the moment he became Warden of the West. The First Prince would know better than to try to exploit heroes for political gains the way she had when he had been the White Knight. A Warden, unlike a Knight, would be able to refuse her when she next tried to mutilate a young girl's corpse to appease the unappeasable. Besides, the dark-skinned hero was still a high officer of the Grand Alliance. She could not capture him like this without breaking the treaties she had signed.

"Unless you intend to keep me imprisoned until the end of this war," Hanno flatly replied, "there will be consequences to this."

It was only his own inclination to end this peacefully that would keep her from being scraped raw for this, and he was steadily losing it.

"No," she bluntly said, "there won't be."

He stared at her in disbelief. Did she think herself invincible because Below's stories had been silenced?

"You both need me too badly to pick that fight," the Warden said. "See, if you actually do go after me it's not going to be kept quiet. It's going to come out, word's going to spread. And what exactly do you think's going to happen when people learn you're coming after me to steal an artefact that was already in my possession?"

Hanno's blood ran cold as he genuinely considered it. Even if he was the Warden by then, the amount of damage that conflict would cause just as they prepared to march on Keter...

"You would kill this entire continent for your pride?" he challenged.

"See, now we get to it," Catherine Foundling mused. "You're holding Calernia hostage, pretending you can't bend but I should. She does the same, in her own way. And that's the part that actually pisses me off, you know? That you're both taking charity from me, depending on my goodwill, and then I for some godforsaken reason I have to pretend one of you is my equal."

There was a cold, burning indignation in that dark eye that Hanno knew was too blistering to be feigned.

"You have not earned it," Catherine Foundling said, smiling thin and sharp, "and this offends me."

A blade-like smile, he thought. He'd seen it before on another face and liked it no better then.

"This is not," Hanno slowly said, "posturing, is it?"

He'd seen from the start that Catherine was playing a game, that she was enforcing rules and preventing deaths. He had thought it to mean that she was not serious, but it was beginning to sink in that he'd been wrong.

It might be a game she was playing, but the Warden was deadly serious.

"I've played nice with you fine folk," Catherine nonchalantly said. "But it looks like you need the same wake up call Tariq did."

Night surged, swelled, the shapes of thousands of crows flapping their wings filling every surface. Cruel beaks and talons reached out for flesh to slice.

"My help is a decision," the Warden of the East said. "It is not a right or a given. And the moment you begin to delude yourself otherwise, I will bury you in a shallow fucking grave."

Hanno breathed out, sought his calm. The situation had deteriorated far beyond what he'd thought possible, but all was not lost. She was still talking and he was still alive. This was not yet over.

"Yet you have not," he said. "So this is still a negotiation."

Her haze hardened, and immediately he knew he had made a mistake.

"You're not learning the lesson, Hanno," Catherine Foundling mildly said. "See, for one you still think that you got me to monologue. That I was trying to hide any of this."

The Book of Some Things screamed, pinpricks of Night beginning to slither through cracks in the globe. Tendrils of darkness were stretching out towards the artefact, hungry and foul. It was like hearing a child be beaten, a painting get ripped: ugly and impossible to take back.

"I didn't need to bargain to eat the Book," the one-eyed priestess said. "Or to shackle you. The difference between you and I, Hanno of Arwad, is that I'm the Warden of the East."

She raised a hand, strands of Night coalescing around it as if they were eager.

"I murdered my own father for that Name," the Warden said. "I've mutilated people I love, scarred my own flesh. That's what I wield every time I call on Night, that's the foundation of my authority."

Darkness pulsed across the room, the breath of some gargantuan beast.

"And you think that your half-assed claim is equal to that?" she scorned. "What is it you've given up, Hanno, that you've sacrificed?"

"You have known tragedies," Hanno acknowledged. "But how many of them were of your own making, Catherine?"

He met her eye.

"You think they are something to boast of?"

As pain raised one above others, made them worthy. It was the philosophy of the whip, both the master's and the flagellant's. Nothing more. Being hurt didn't make you better. It just made you hurt.

"They're something," the Warden said. "They're weight. Was it you put up against them, Hanno, what's your foundation?"

She snorted.

"No longer having your hand held by angels," she said. "Giving up the pretense you're above petty mortal disputes. You're standing where everyone else started and calling it a journey."

Hanno's fists clenched. How small his doubts and troubles seemed, made into a single turn of phrase. The globe cracked, groaned.

"You've never believed in anything but your right to climb," Hanno harshly said. "I am not surprised you cannot grasp what faith means or what it costs but talk of it coming from you is like a fish speaking of flight."

She smiled unpleasantly.

"Hey, maybe you're right," the Warden said. "Let's find out. Which is stronger, between Light and Night?"

He stilled. Glimpsing what she was about to say before she said it.

"Light, huh," the Warden said. "I wonder why I can shackle you then."

Her eye burned cold.

"Between my authority and yours, Hanno of Arwad, there is no contest. Talk about faith all you want: it will keep ringing hollow as long as you hang up there."

It fell into place. It was not some fresh power that had let her do this but the mantle she had claimed in the East. His mind spun, considering the enormity of that, but soon he realized she was not so strong as she pretended. There was a reason the Warden had chosen to ride a tower, to draw him into it: here, they were under her roof. A place under her authority, her power. And under that roof the Warden of the East could bend the rules her way, decree that Night would triumph over Light. He found his calm, the quiet place at the heart of him.

It was further away than he remembered, and smaller.

"You embraced your mantle first, that is all it means," Hanno said. "Anything more is wishful paint over your regrets."

"And Gods know I have a great many of those," the Warden of the East said. "An army's worth of ghosts. I have learned my failures, if only because they so lovingly haunt me. You, though?"

She shrugged casually, cuttingly.

"Hells, Hanno," the Warden said, "now you're telling me you want the Warden to guide to heroes the way you did as the White Knight. Can you even hear yourself talking? We've been down this road before."

The one-eyed priestess raised her free hand, wiggling it mockingly.

"How many fingers is the next Mirror Knight going to cost you?" she said.

"Fingers for a life are not a trade I regret," Hanno evenly replied. "Or ever will."

"Then you'll run out of those long before I run out of eyes," the Warden replied. "Of course, it'll all implode far quicker than that. Your house of cards comes down the moment you run into another Red Axe."

His jaw clenched.

"Should I dig her up so she can be cut a third time?" Hanno bit out. "Maybe you can use the spectacle to buy back a deserter prince for a moon's turn. And why stop there? We can dig up a whole graveyard of heroes to shame the full Highest Assembly into showing up the once. They can vote to leave and return to their palaces."

The words were acid on his tongue, acid in his belly, but out they came anyway. He felt no cleaner for it, not relieved in the slightest. Spite lessened both the speaker and listener.

"There it is," the Warden of the East smiled. "They're heroes so they're Good, and that means even their mistakes are always well intended. They shouldn't be strangled with petty mortal laws, just helped out of their messes and allowed to waddle on into the next one. That's the take you bring to the table, isn't it? Or at least what it comes down to, when all the pretty words are stripped off."

"It is one of your worst habits," Hanno evenly replied, "to poison every well you do not own."

He forced himself to be calm, to be steady. To not lean into the anger that burned in his belly.

"You pretend that villains and heroes are the same, that their difference is a simple matter of... abstract philosophy," he said, "but it is not. Even the most vicious of us are trying to end evil, not spread it. You stand instead for rapists, cannibals and callous murderers. Our exceptions are your rule. You are indignant that I would free heroes to act because it would harm villains – but villains are only harmed by those actions because they choose to do evil."

It was almost a relief to simply say it out loud. To do away with the pretence that there was something laudable about protecting Evil, that it was anything more than a compromise to allow it.

"The second chances you scorn are given, Catherine, because there is a difference between recklessness and malice," Hanno said. "Heroes are not always right, always good. But they all can be, if they're given help."

The claps he received were openly mocking.

"Pretty speech," the Warden of the East said. "Heroes would love it, I'm sure."

A pause.

"But how about everybody else?"

He started in surprise.

"You cann-"

"What do you think the difference is for someone between getting killed by a cannibal murderer or the Saint of Swords?" the one-eyed priestess interrupted. "Nothing, Hanno. They're still dead. And that's the part you refuse to understand. They're sick of my side, and right to be. But they're sick of your side too."

She leaned forward, eye cold.

"Do you think claimants grow on trees, Hanno?" she said. "That Cordelia just lucked into having a shot at being the Warden of the West? It's almost like not everyone agrees with that little speech. The fucking arrogance of it, from you who's never ruled so much as a village or had to do anything in a war but fight."

The choices don't stay nice and clean when you have to think about more than a hundred people at a time. How very convenient that you've limited how many you need to care about to that number."

He barely heard the latter half of the tirade. She was right, Hanno thought with muted dismay. Not about what she thought, but she was right. In some way, he'd thought that Cordelia Hasenbach had become a claimant because she was the First Prince. Because she was powerful and prominent and one of the titles adorning her crown was 'Warden of the West'. It had been a comfortable thought, one that fit with his opinion of the woman. It was also not how Names worked. That silent realization stilled his tongue. He could not speak until he'd swallowed it, as if it'd filled his throat.

"Ah," the Warden smiled. "There we are. Catching up at last."

"I-" Hanno started, then hesitated.

"You want the Book but you don't have the law on your side," Catherine Foundling said. "You don't have the story either, and if you're going to try to take it anyway what does that leave?"

A hard, cold smile.

"Just violence," the Warden of the East said. "And I'm better at it than you."

She looked him up and down, then shook her head.

"Throw him out of the tower, Archer," she said.

"Cat?" Archer said, sounding surprised.

The Warden of the East met his eyes with her own.

"There's nothing left to beat," Catherine Foundling calmly said. "We're done here."

The words stung more than being tossed out into the grass, though Archer tried her best. Hanno was not surprised.

They had the ring of truth to them.

Droughtbringer

<https://topwebfiction.com/listings/a-practical-guide-to-evil/>

Salt

I'll be honest this hasn't been nearly as compelling as a lot of the previous more philosophical arcs because the setup isn't there, it's a writing problem.

I don't mean as in it needed more chapters to set it up – the development for the themes was done in the six volumes leading up to it – I mean that it hasn't adequately utilized said development. It feels "rushed" and "lacking in setup" because most of the chapters in the mini arc completely threw out a lot of the previous 6 volumes of world building in terms of the whole Hanno vs Cordelia thing – particularly the problem with mundane rulership.

Half the books/arcs in the story leading up to this has been about problems with Heroes, and the other half about problems with Politicians and rulers. There have been so many major politicians/rulers for antagonists that it's nuts: Akua – a ruling noble, Malicia – a queen, Cordelia – a prince, Milenan – prince, every Praesi noble, and every Proceran noble. None of those were major antagonists because they had big scary aspects, they were antagonists because they had big projected political power that they were abusing at the expense of the common people.

Hell, even the original Antagonist that kicked it all off was governor Mazus, the likes of whom oppressed the common people so badly that Cat took the knife in the first place. It wasn't because Heroes were killing too many people. Just the last major arc centered around Amadeus bringing down the Tower to end a corrupt political institution that's been ruining Praes.

Problem is, even though the story has been about conflicts with corrupt politicians with no checks on their power as much as it has been about conflicts with Heroes, it doesn't show in any of Cat's & co's reactions for the arc. The entire arc so far has been Catherine having selective amnesia about the political half and basically just pinning every problem on Heroes being too self righteous; after how many arcs and interludes about Praesi/Proceran politics and bending of the law often being worse than both Villains or Heroes?

The reason this arc hasn't been as compelling is that it's supposed to need little setup other than a basic reiteration, because it's the culmination of six volumes worth of themes. Instead it's been pretty one sided because it's forgotten half the themes in said previous six volumes, and only brought them in briefly this chapter before throwing them out, which is why it seems like the conclusions haven't had much setup.

Salt

Also didn't mean to make this a reply to a post... oops...
delete and repost button where?

Rey d`Tutto

Nope on a Rope.
Ain't no retraction without another post.

Welcome to WordPress chat

Linnus42

Amen Great Post and I totally agree.
I also don't think any Hero has initiated a significant conflict. I don't count Bard as either Hero or Villain. They certainly made it worse but if you look at the crisis in this series the roots have been corrupt politicians, villains or both.

Cicero

Saint of Swords.

That's why Coredlia is the alternative. Saint of Swords created a conflict inside Procer that had the express purpose of destroying Procer and allowing the Dead King to eat it. She explicitly told Cordelia so. All for the Greater Good.

That's what set Cordelia down the path of no longer trusting heroes. That's what created the weight to a story of placing Heroes under the Law.

Of course, the Saint was prodded into it by the Bard, but that's no excuse, the Saint accepted that path fully understanding that it would destroy Procer and result in the death of thousands of innocents. All because she believed that the greater good of purging Procer of it's imperfections was worth it. That the end result of the Dead King "winning" was to sow the seeds of his future defeat.

caoimhinh

Actually no, it was Cordelia herself who started that conflict, remember?

It just grew out of her control (practically right away) because it was a freaking Crusade, not a simple military incursion.

Cordelia threw the Crusade wanting to use it as a political tool, thinking it was just like any other invasion or military campaign.

It was also not the Saint of Swords who escalated it either, that was the Bard, who got the priests of the House of Light of many countries to make a conclave and declare Catherine the Archheretic of the East. The Saint was just the mouthpiece who explained the situation to Cordelia. And yes, the Saint was okay with it, but it was still a mess of Cordelia's own making, as she was the one who started the Crusade without understanding its implications.

What's more, even afterwards, Cordelia could have stopped the Crusade, but it was politically inconvenient for her to do so, which in Cordelia's dictionary means that something can absolutely not be done, even if thousands must die as a result.

So the Tenth Crusade was a conflict that Cordelia started because of political reasons, and which she was then forced to keep going because of political reasons. It only ended once Catherine had beaten them over and over again and then the Dead King invaded which provided them with a politically convenient reason to end the Crusade.

Neubia

This can't be happening. It can't be. I've... I've... I've caught up... Noooooooooooooooooooooo.

TheCelestialEquation

Um... Mirror knight?? XD

Ciel Morgenstern

Tariq killing a whole innocent village to infect the Carrion Lord's men comes to mind if we're talking about what "Heroes" do wrong just as much as Villains... "Mercy"'s take on "for the greater good" has been a whole lot nasty to countless normal people who are neither Named nor politicians.

Ciel Morgenstern

My point being that there IS a point in considering reining in not just politicians OR Named, but both, on ALL sides. Isn't that what the Accords are truly meant to be about? At least putting a maximum stop to the awful that's all around everywhere?

Anonymous

Throwing out my two cents after enjoying this chapter a lot:

Remember how Cat realised that she had almost been tricked into choosing either the political side or the Named side of becoming the Warden of the East, and to actually meaningfully claim the Name she had to do /both/. This is the same issue being faced with Cordelia and Hanno—practically that Cordelia wants to bring Heroes to heel at the hands of governments, and Hanno wants to bring governments to heel at the hands of Heroes. Any acceptable outcome will have to be both and neither, somehow (and Cat's been having issues with both stances so far proposed by the two). The comment I'm replying to seems to be taking issue with Cat crying out against Heroes while forgetting the problems with governments, but that's because she's criticising Hanno's stance which favours Heroes over governments—talking to Cordelia (which we may yet get to see!) it wouldn't/won't be surprising if the points she's arguing are against governments in contrast with Named/Roles. The interesting thing will be seeing what sort of third-choice outcome gets built in the end... have I mentioned I love third-choice outcomes which resolve false dichotomies?

Oshi

I've been saying. Three is a better number than two. Why should there be two wardens? Because there is only two sides to a coin? How'd that work out?

onedollargum

And some one always ends up flipping that coin.

ohJohn

Ever since Cat started referring to the WoTW situation as a spinning coin, I've been expecting the eventual resolution of the metaphor to be the coin landing on its edge.

ruduen

I think that metaphor was already used for the description of how the Tyrant works in Five Stories. That'd be something that's unlikely, but still within the realm of pre-existing stories.

Personally, I prefer something which shows that they're willing to try to change the system as much as possible. Closer to the metaphor of cutting the coin in half, and doing whatever they want with the pieces.

Rynjin

Exactly this. I assume we'll soon see how Catherine tears down Cordelia's position. I wonder if Cordelia realizes that her path could likely be the death of Heroes as a concept? Hanno is not precisely wrong in this regard, that a Hero who is ruled, truly and completely, cannot be a Hero. They're just another tool of the State, and any Names which don't fit that narrow, constrained state of being will not be able to exist in Cordelia's world.

Ciel Morgenstern

Yeah, my take on Hanno's side to these interludes as well. This is just ONE SIDE to Cat's plan for interfering. It's about teaching BOTH the necessary lesson so that one or the other or both (does she even care which one?) finally DOES reach the conclusion that BOTH sides are necessary for this new Name and they should friggin take into consideration what they themselves are lacking that the other one has to fit those shoes.

Kirook

To be fair, we haven't heard how she plans to address Cordelia yet and it may be that the reason she's eliding the problems with political power is that she's talking to Hanno, who already understands them. If she has a conversation like this with Cordelia it will probably be very different.

caoimhinh

I hope so, because so far Catherine just seems to be a hypocrite who is leaning on Cordelia's side because of her own personal reasons while everything indicates Hanno would be the best choice for Warden of the West, yet Cordelia seems more likely to give Cat what she wants, so Cat is leaning on her.

Catherine had been stalling and not interfering one way or the other because she has been putting the wants of the woman over the needs of the queen; when this whole time she has always known that it is the other way around.

She let her own personal desires make her hesitate, otherwise Hanno would already be Warden of the West.

Zach

I have no idea where you're getting the idea that Hanno would be a good choice. The precedent he would set would be terrible; Heroes would be given preference over non-Named and would essentially be "above the law."

The Red Axe situation is a perfect example of this; Hanno sees Red Axe as a person and makes his decision based off of that, ignoring the consequences to countless other people from that decision. That one decision – and the fact that he still thinks it would have been right – is incredibly damning. He has never taken on the responsibility necessary of a major leader, instead just making choices in accordance with his own personal morality.

Linnus42

Hanno had no issue executing Red Axe. Was he sympathetic to her back story, sure who would not be. But he still swung the sword on her.

He simply didn't bend to Cordelia's desire for Proceran Show Trial because Cordelia once again needed a bailout on checking her Prince Issue. And under the agreement the GA signed Hanno didn't have to bend as punishment for Heroes is under his sole discretion. You can argue Hanno should have cut a deal with Cordelia but legally speaking he was not required to.

caoimhinh

How can you say that Hanno's actions during the Red Axe situation are Hanno acting above the law?

He literally enforced the law right there, it was the signed agreement of the Truce and Terms that Named would be judged by the T&T tribunal.

What's more, Catherine agreed on him there, only Cordelia wanted to have the Red Axe judged by the Highest Assembly in order to have a show of power that anyone taking a swing at Procer's princes would be judged by Procer, plus threaten the Prince that was manipulating Mirror Knight into submission by showing him that Named could be punished by her.

The thing is, Catherine agreed that Red Axe had to be executed by Hanno, it is explicitly said over and over, and she makes no move to support Cordelia in her claim, because doing so would weaken the foundations of the Liesse Accords, setting the precedent of Procer being able to back off from the signed agreement whenever politically inconvenient.

So Catherine agreed with Hanno in enforcing the law, and would have even opposed it if he had been amenable to granting Cordelia's request.

Their disagreement comes from what she did to Red Axe's corpse, raising her as an undead so she could be judged by the Highest Assembly for Procer's game of politics. Which Catherine did behind his back, thus breaking trust and damaging her friendship with Hanno.

Hanno's disagreement with Cordelia has always been that he has fulfilled his part of the deal, and done his part, whereas Cordelia wants to bend the rules and go back on agreements due to political stuff, putting Procer's Highest Assembly's interests above everything else and then she comes pretending that she is defending law, when she has consistently shown that realpolitik is the thing that moves her and dictates her course.

Ciel Morgenstern

Cordelia's should be the mirror opposite to this conversation, because she lacks exactly what Hanno has too much of and vice versa. Maybe criticize the arc AFTER it's actually done, not in the middle of it?

Vortex

Hard disagree. Several root conflicts were created by heroes and named.

For example, the first antagonist Cat really fought was the lone swordsman who almost called down an angel to enslave a whole city of her people into a crusade.

Another major antagonist was the saint of swords, who refused to compromise for her existence. And the grey pilgrim, who chose to endorse Cordelia's crusade over any chance of her existence.

I would not at all blame politicians for all the problems Cat had. They were just one of many issues.

Vortex

And of course one of the final antagonists, the intercessor, is a hero abusing their power. She is one of Hanno's ex-comrades actually and he has repeatedly suggested negotiating with her in the past.

Linnus42

I argue the cause of William even trying that is Black for invading and conquering Callow. Or you could even say its Cat who kicked a Civil War into high gear in order to get a faster promotion when she let William escape.

The root of the crusade goes to Cordelia then right? She is the one who called for the Crusade to handle domestic problems in Procer. There is no indication Saint or GP were planning to call one.

As for Bard she is not a really a Hero or Villain considering she works for both sets of Gods.

Two dozen snakes

Your argument is Hanno's argument. And it is the problem Cat has always had with heroes: sure, it's all black's fault. So what? Because it's black's fault, it's now fine for the hero to brainwash an entire city via angel? Kill hundred of thousands, most of whom were actually doing quite alright and didn't particularly care, or have to care, about who was in charge? The whole point of the warden is to have someone that will do what's best for the continent right now, which unfortunately for Hanno is not necessarily the same as what Good thinks is best for the continent. Hanno's take on the role is as a guide, his belief is that Good stories are inherently good and therefore beneficial to the people in the long run. And therefore need no oversight, interference or compromise. No matter that said benefits will start showing 20 years in the future and in the meanwhile will cost the lives of thousands. Which is Cat's line in the sand – which means Hanno becoming Warden with that outlook WILL lead to a catastrophic breakdown in relationship between Good and Evil at some point, plunging Calernia into another Crusade. That's why she's airing her personal grievances here, that's the point she's making when she says Hanno hasn't earned his role and his side have been taking her cooperation for granted. And Hanno still didn't really care about that. What broke him was the realization that his outlook is not 100% correct, because Cordelia whose outlook is the opposite of his is also a claimant

Vortex

I agree with this statement. And I would go even further – just as heroes exist for good reasons, so too do villains. Black exists because of a specific set of circumstances shaping his beliefs and ideas. Without the messed up, evil country of Praes raising him, there would be no Black. If Praes were a well-run, stable country not constantly on the verge of starvation, subject to the whims of tyrants and despots, Black would almost certainly not have become a villain. He is shaped by the same forces that shaped heroes.

So when Hanno asserts that heroes deserve to act as they see fit, he is really just acting as a mouthpiece for the Bard, whose sole purpose of existence is to shape a world where heroes and villains are locked in an eternal struggle regardless of the cost to the people around them.

jamesc9

@Vortex @Linnus24,

I'm not sure how much William can be blamed for, when Cat defeated him and gave him instructions, which he was following. A case could be made, that he ought to have followed our conception of liberal non-awfulness rather than the dictates of his name, but following her plan rather than her name wasn't good for Cat, and really isn't normal behaviour for Named in this setting.

Salt

I don't really see how the pilgrim endorsing the crusade Cordelia started gives him more responsibility for starting the crusade than Cordelia, who quite literally started the crusade. The root cause of the hundreds of thousands dead in the Tenth crusade was the First Prince of Procer not giving a shit about what happens to Callow and the people in it, not the Pilgrim being idealistic.

Why did she start the crusade? Greedy Princes of Procer pushing her into it, so she could keep Procer stable. Non-named, mundane princes.

Why is Praes a ruin? The tower as an institution. Why did Malicia allow Akua to create a hellgate despite knowing of her plan long before it occurred? Her need for political leverage over the other nations. Why did Catherine even plan to go to the war college to begin with? To change the rulership Callow was under from the inside. Why is Callow so militaristic and xenophobic? Constant attacks from the East AND the west due to greedy Praesi rulership and greedy Proceran rulership, the first three volumes go on endlessly about how it's shaped their entire national identity. Helike? Kairos, enough said.

Absolutely none of those have anything to do with the Mirror Knights of the world being morons or to idealistically Good.

Sure, the Lone Swordsmen and Mirror Knights of the world will do a lot of damage. The conditions that create Mirror Knights and Lone Swordsmen in the first place? Mundane Crowns and Villains. Honestly, more often the former than the latter, because a lot of the rulers and nobles we've seen so far put most actual Villains to shame, or have outright been bad enough to be capital-V Villains.

Linnus42

I mean lets not forget the endgame plan for Callow and Praes if they Crusade had gone as planned. They would have taken control of all the land and deported or killed all the Praesi in a mass genocide. That is pretty dang awful.

Now Cordelia didn't support that plan and sure she probably wanted to stop it but she wasn't concerned about it to have an actual plan to stop it just figured she could eventually.

Zach

Hanno should have taken a note from Pilgrim, who was at least honest with himself and learned from his experiences with Catherine in the Prince's Graveyard arc. Same with Bard; even though it took some time, he changed his mind about her when presented with proof of her motivations.

Grey Pilgrim during the war (and before his death) was probably the single Named closest to Catherine in terms of goals and perspective. After his time with Tariq, I wouldn't be surprised if Mirror Knight actually has his shit together more than Hanno.

The Ignorant Student

I disagree. I feel that this arc has its flaws to be sure, but when you get down to it, it's about comparing Cat's journey to Warden with Hanno and Cordelia, both of them have actively been damaging the alliance to advance their own personal agenda, and I feel that if we want to say that this is the climax, it's well done. The confrontation with Cordelia is still to come, but Hanno has been shown the error of his ways, and while his revelation is sort of just jammed in at end, I think the way Cat explains just how badly they fucked up is fantastic, especially since this is probably just part one of three (Cat confronts Cordelia, and then lays down the law on whoever becomes Warden).

GoodGirlJW

This has been amazing and I have no idea what you're talking about.

Voiceoftheriders

Crazy idea here, but with the discussion on who might be an alternative warden instead of Cordy or Hanno, but what if Cat would change her name and become the sole warden.

Korr4K

That would have been possible only if Cat became the new Bard, but she clearly has no intention to be a part of Good

I'm not really appreciating this arc because it's too much telegraphed. PGTE has always been great because you could never really know where the story was going with certainty, not now tho.

It has been clear since many chapters ago that both claimants will become the new Warden and after today any possible doubt should be discarded. Hanno is going to meet with Cordelia and many other heroes outside the Tower, he has been beaten up to the point that he is now ready to cooperate.

It's not a bad epilogue per se, just too obvious and "easy" for the heroes.. It took Cat years to gain her Name, she lost and sacrificed so much, and now she even has to help the heroes mitigate the consequences of their side? I think that the story would have been more balanced if the price for the title of WoW was the life of one of the two claimants

Liliet

Holy shit.

We're actually addressing what Hanno has not been noticing???

dadycoool

Maybe Occidental III will be addressing what Cordelia has not been noticing?

ninegardens

Does that mean Occidental IV will be addressing what Cat has not been noticing?

boballab

I think with her it will have to do with how The Bard and Saint basically told her to be a good little girl and let her people die so there would be that nice storyline for the Hero's to be Hero's. Ever since then she really doesn't trust them anymore and for the most part seems to see them as nothing but villains in hero's clothing.

Liliet

P L E A S E

Miles

Hope for Abigail for Warden!

She doesn't want it

She's not even part of the contest.

But she can stand by Cat's side as an equal because providence has been her best skill since she was introduced, and she doesn't even need above's help to use it! (For what else would you call her uncanny ability to make the right call for the wrong reasons at the precisely correct moment while trying to accomplish the wrong goal?)

jamesc9

I'm beginning to wonder if she's ready.

How many people has she killed stupidly by making the wrong call, and how did she pull herself back together?

I think we need that to happen before she becomes WotW, because having her not pull herself back together after getting the top job would be bad.

Linnus42

I mean argue the difference is what Hanno said it is. Heroes try to make the World Better even if you disagree with their actions that is the goal, you have to follow the blueprint from the Gods Above or you fall. Villains on the other hand don't have to make the world better. For Cat's point to be legit you need to point to Saint killing some innocents for no reason besides she wanted to eat them. Its a False Equivalency and I hate those.

Also god EE needs to do more setup. I have seen no evidence to suggest that most of the people are annoyed with the Heroes. Princes and Nobles sure but I have seen no evidence the average Peasant is annoyed at the Heroes. Quite frankly I have seen more evidence they are annoyed at their Princes and terrified of getting killed. After all Hanno had a whole Province begging to save him and high support among Army Rank and File. That is not even reason Cordelia is getting backing from Nobles. Nor does it make any sense for Cordelia to complain about Hanno always letting Heroes off easy last Chapter. When there is no evidence of that and her only example is what Mirror Knight? Honestly, I think we needed some sort of walkabout like Akua and Black did in the Praes arc where we actually got some prospective on the lay person. Cause Cat's points are lacking in textual evidence in my book.

Overall Hanno's point is correct. Heroes mostly serve and come into existence due to some flaw in the existing system so putting them under government control.

Liliet

This isn't about backlash from the common people. Heroes have good PR, for the most part. That they're liked by the peasant majority in Good countries is not much evidence of anything considering it's LITERALLY THEIR RELIGION.

Catherine's point is that HEROES ARE NOT ALWAYS RIGHT. They do not always KNOW BEST. Yes, they always try their best, sure.

But sometimes their best sucks as much as William's did. And sometimes the fate of the war effort hangs on breaking a law and tweaking procedure, and the hero in charge does not notice or understand that, and refuses to listen.

Linnus42

My point is Cat's argument is Cordelia is getting the Name cause people are fed up with Heroes. The implication seems to be its more then just the Nobles having that opinion. However, there has been no evidence that such a thing is common thing outside of the major Nobles. And I argue Nobles are not inclined to like Heroes they cannot control anyway because as Hanno notes Heroes tend to serve as a major check on Nobles

Tenthyr

And like they just said, that's not actually the point. Hanno just found out he entirely and completely decided his way was right without either attempting to lead nations not attempting to find new solutions. He decided that Cordelia's methods were unfit without any attempt to understand or correct them in a way that worked. It's hollow words, lacking in story or the weight of the actual world behind him. Catherine is sending out her challenge to the world, demanding that there be a good that is the match to the weight she has bourne into her evil. Hanno utterly failed to do that, and so she broke him.

Linnus42

That argument would be a lot more sound if there was any easy route for a commoner to get to run a Nation no? Most people in this story are at the top of Nations because they were born to the right parents...or would you prefer Hanno goes out and conquers a Nation? Point being Cat makes a good point it just a whole lot weaker in universe then it is out of universe.

Konstantin von Karstein

What does Hanno conquering nations has to do with the argument? The point is that while rulers can possibly be held accountable for their actions (Highest Assembly, rebellion, ...) Heroes can't.

Linnus42

I am saying Cat's saying Hanno doesn't have experience running Nations, Provinces, Cities, etc. That argument works better when say in our world you can run for office easily. That doesn't apply in most countries in this world where people run stuff cause they had the right parents or they conquered something. Hanno is from Ashur with an absurd caste system and he was near the bottom going to be hard to get that exp in context, no?

The point is sound in a vacuum, its just a lot less sound in this world.

Rey d`Tutto

He doesn't understand the impact he has on common folk while he is "doing Good".

This is a Fail for a Warden Candidate.

shikkarasu

I don't think your argument is a point against Cat, here. Hanno not knowing what he's doing is a valid concern. It isn't his fault, but blame hardly matters when you are responsible for half a continent. You don't get to complain that you were not adequately trained when you try to take that kind of power, you either self teach, or listen when someone shows you what you are doing wrong. Hanno needed to be tied up and monologued at to get to that 2nd part. Now that he knows what he's missing he can try to start learning.

Zach

I mean, it kind of is his fault, since he hasn't made any real effort during all of this time to learn these things. He even admitted to himself at one point that he was letting Catherine take most of the responsibility for anything beyond "fighting stuff."

The Red Axe situation perfectly illustrates his issue. He made no effort to really consider the broader consequences of his choice (and was 100% unwilling to change his mind under any circumstances).

Knight

"The first Albans were seneschals of Laure long before they were kings," he told me. "And Eleonor, for all her virtues, was born a mere knightess. There is no shame in one's birth. We are what we bring into this world, not what brought us into it."

King Edward would disagree.

Aero

On that point about Hanno, "(going) out and (conquering) a nation," until the recent chapters, heroes were always immediately made nobles and added to the scrolls in the Dominion. The ability to lead a land/people/company was always there if heroes just went to the Dominion. Just because a hero chooses not to doesn't mean the opportunity wasn't there. He definitely could've led the Magisterium if he had been inclined to back then, but he didn't and those chapters before Sabah's death show his blind spot when it comes to the politics of nations. In regards to someone's comment on not seeing commoners upset with heroes let's not even get started about Bellorophon, Abigail's chapters or the interludes for the Procerans(specifically the Rogue Sorcerer ones).

Sugar Roll

Born to the right parents? This story is full of examples of people rising to the top. Catherine was a waitress. Malicia was the daughter of an innkeeper. Amadeus led rebels and murdered his way to the top. Basilia led armies to become the Empress of the Free Cities. Hakram came from nowhere and is now the leader of the Clans.

Outside of fighting, what has Hanno done? The age of order is upon them and what does he have to offer?

Linnus42

Look at the Good Nations how does one get in power in those sorts of Nations. By being born to the right parents. I have noted the other route is conquest. Hakram actually had the least bloody route funny enough. Basillia got her job by committing atrocities for fun.

Sugar Roll

Have you forgotten about the story of the Kingfisher Prince? He was not born from family that was the first in line to the throne but he was the most capable one. Do you think the Iron Prince was the leader of Hannoven because he was simply born into the right family? What about Rozala? Being born to the right parents is an advantage for sure but you need to bring more than that if you are to be a leader.

Hanno is being called Prince White now because he has something to offer to Procer but if he wants to become one of the leaders of the coming age, he needs to bring so much more. The Warden of East is not only leading the villains and their nations, she is also bringing the accords and has promised to raise a new city in the center of the continent. The Warden of the West will be measured against that.

Linnus42

The point is you don't have a shot without the right bloodline. Unless you are truly exceptional. Its essentially impossible to get to the top without having the right bloodline as a prerequisite. So yes all those people did some work to become Prince or Princess some more then other but they would not have gotten the shot without having the right bloodline.

Its not like its a democratic system where you can run for office.

Sugar Roll

Hanno is getting his shot right now. Why do you think he is being called Prince White? He may as well end up being a prince of Procer after this war but is he Warden of West material as he is now? The answer is no and Cat is calling him out on that. The Warden of the West is more than just a leader of heroes, you also need to be a leader of nations.

Hanno needs to embrace becoming a Prince in truth and need to make decisions and be responsible for all the people under his care. He needs a vision on where he's going to take all those people in the coming age.

Evgeny Permyakov

>The point is you don't have a shot without the right bloodline.

Yes you do. You will have hard time getting land without bloodline (though it is still possible in right circumstances), but getting position of authority is possible. Church, city councils and army would work as an entry point.

Beyond that, Hanno is a political figure because he herds Heroes. His authority is over Heroes, but his actions indirectly affect much more people. He never even considered what his goals as a Warden would be beyond "do good".

Insanenoodlyguy

You aren't wrong,
But I'm not sure why that matters at all here.

shikkarasu

Cat literally got her position through merit. She is an orphan with no known bloodline who was talent-scouted and then proceeded to win uphill battles for the next 10 years. Masego was the same, in that he was adopted by Warlock due to his talent.

As for having the right family being easy-mode, sure it is, but Democracy doesn't fix that problem either. How many penniless orphans do you see running countries IRL? It's unfair, and Cat knows&hates this about the world, but society is not on trial right now, Hanno and Cordelia are.

Abrakadabra

You are always doing this. For some reason You always start harping about nobles and peasants and social justice. But it is MEANINGLESS because those kind of ideals are not part of this world. It is the same thing as berating the romans for noö acting according to our standards. Standards that were made literalli a thousand year after the roman empire fallen. Projecting Back modern ideas into the lives of people WHO cannot have a knowledge of them is supremely stupid. And know we Just do it to a different fictional world, no less!

jamesc9

@Sugar Roll,
berating the other side of the coin from your replies above, those are Evil nations so, in Black's words, if there's something that you want to do and you have the power to do it, then do it.

I'm not sure what the equivalent sentence for good nations is, and whether it inherently justifies inherited authority, but there does seem to be a correlation.

Sugar Roll

First of all, I'm not berating the other side of the coin. I'm merely stating facts in response to a claim by Linnus42 where he said, "Most people in this story are at the top of Nations because they were born to the right parents" which is clearly untrue given the fact that the leaders of at least half the continent rose to the top on their own merits.

And second of all, you have to forgive me, but what exactly are you trying to point out? I'm not following your train of thought.

jamesc9

[Replying to myself to avoid increasing the nesting level; I think that you will see notice of an update in the thread.]

I think that I was replying to:
<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2021/09/17/interlude-occidental-ii/comment-page-1/#comment-95178>

Your argument, to that point, was incomplete, because you did not have examples from Good countries, who ran the kind of order which was most likely to lead to inherited/annointed roles.

You addressed that weakness later.

Annya

No. The argument is that Cordelia sees this DIFFERENTLY and she is STILL getting the name.

Additionally, there is no false equivalence. Of course eating a baby because somebody wants to do so is not the same as a hero killing somebody but the difference is when somebody comes for the baby eater. And who comes for the hero? When the person who would be in charge of it would never do anything about it, because the hero is "Good"? If the rules are applied only to the people defined as evil and the rest get a slap on the wrist, you have a system that is going to simply keep breeding Lone Swordsmen type of people. And that won't do.

The idea of Cat is that there should be rules and consequences.

Linnus42

When has Hanno ever suggested that there should be no consequences for Heroes who do something wrong? Hanno is not opposed to rules for Heroes, he is opposed to every National government basically having their own Avengers team.

Miles

And also opposed to anyone stopping a hero from doing what they're doing. It's literally in this chapter and every one with his view point since this arc began.

Trashbandit

Well he barely did anything to the mirror knight when the mirror knight conspired with a noble to try and kill and let the drow who were fighting the dead king die. He wanted nothing to happen to the red axe who committed first degree attempted murder of another hero

Linnus42

He had no issue convicting Red Axe whatsoever.

Are we convicting Mirror Knight for thought crimes here?

He never agreed to betray the Drow at all. The princess was trying to convince him but even in the vision that Sve Noc showed Cat he had not at all agreed to it.

Meanwhile, Cordelia didn't have a plan to deal with that issue Pre Arsenal Mess and was actively stonewalling Cat and Sve Noc on that Prince.

Annya

The entire Red Axe storyline and the Saint of swords illustrated that perfectly but Hanno himself just literally said that: "You are indignant that I would free heroes to act because it would harm villains – but villains are only harmed by those actions because they choose to do evil." "Heroes are not always right, always good. But they all can be, if they're given help."

HELP. Not consequences. So if a fuckup does not end in consequences, what is stopping the person from repeating that? People act and escalate the longer something is tolerated. And when there are no consequences, only help, the take is, you were right and the issue was optics or how you went about it. Not that the thing done was not okay. "I am a hero. Evrftything I do is right, good, just and moral, because I am doing it". And we have multiple examples of good and heroes doing objectively shitty things that did not help anyone and anything with the heroes truly believing they were in the right. Hell, the Saint of swords is the end result of that and she happened even while Tariq was there and was trying to help her. Helping is not enough. Not when it reinforces the idea that you are by definition better and your actions have an excuse, because you are on the correct side.

The whole story indicates over and over again how not having to seriously question yourself because you are Good does a disservice to the heroes and makes them shortsighted.

jamesc9

Further to this comment, please may I point people who have adequate sources of moral and psychological security toward "People of the Lie" by M Scott Peck.

Insanenoodlyguy

He is, but he believes heroes should be the sole arbiters of wayward heroes. We know he will take that to very serious penalties, and would probably do a good job as far as that's concerned, but it doesn't exist in a vacuum. Because the Red Axe wasn't just a hero problem. It was a political problem for Procer. And Hanno refused to treat it as one, because he believed it shouldn't be. But a Warden, who managed both the names and mundane can't do that. And as he's just finally realized, it has been hurting him in ways that don't just work out in the end.

Tariq Really posed the best example and is referenced here for a reason. Yes he took down the Carrion Lord. Yes he made sure he suffered in equal amounts to those innocent he killed. Yes the angels of mercy agreed with this. Now consider a son from that place who had gone off and found work in a larger city. One day, he finds out his mothers, his brother and sister and nieces and nephews are all dead? Killed in horrific fashion by a hero as a "necessary evil?" Do you think he cares all that much that a hero did it instead of the carrion lord, or does he care all his loved ones are dead?

Cordelia, recognizing the politics and the threat to the north, had to sit on this. In other circumstances this would have started a war with Levant when she came for his head. And her people would absolutely back her going after a foreigner wiping out villages in her kingdom.

Hanno would, if perhaps not make those mistakes, deal with them in ways that would cause those problems. Cat is right, his reign falls apart on the next Red Axe incident, when he burns already eroded bridges he needs and people go home because despite the threat they refuse to work with him. Or when somebody does something iffy like Tariq did without being so essential and the local government decides Hanno doesn't get to make those consequences and can shove his higher authority where the light can't reach. He might be able to weather all that, but it will weaken his role significantly. And this is not the time for weakness in that role. Especially since as the first of this new incarnation of it he's setting the shape of it.

Cordelia of course has a ton of problems on the other end, but something tells me we are getting to her.

Miles

Cat's argument is Hanno can't have the Name because he's not worthy of it. I highly doubt cordelia is going to be any better.

Chrisophe seems to be the most likely candidate imo.

Insanenoodlyguy

Pretty sure he turn down the role at this point, he's already had it broken down why he's not a good choice, and Willie has grown his reputation is still a problem and he knows it. But I don't think cat is trying to make Hanno or Cordelia unworthy. She does think they both are bad fits right now, But heroes have ascensions during crisis. She's crushing these coal rocks till she gets a diamond.

Zach

lmao, while I doubt this will happen it's something I actually considered as well. We haven't heard much from Mirror Knight after his time with Tariq, but he's probably changed a lot. Since Tariq, by the point the Christophe traveled with him, was probably the single wisest and most reasonable hero in the story – and his whole Role is specifically characterized by “mentoring heroes to be better” – it wouldn't be that strange for Christophe to be a really good guy now.

The main reason I doubt this will actually happen, though, is that Christophe has basically zero large-scale leadership experience.

Liliet

I mean, the House of Light in Callow wanted to denounce all the Heroes with the Crusade as Evil. That says something.

Miles

Remember what William almost did with the hashmallim? It pretty much answers all of the concerns you mentioned.

In fact the whole story is filled with examples. Heroes kill some dude and leave behind a power vacuum that's worse than what was there. Over and over.

Hanno flipping a coin and killing some random merchant means entire towns can't get the metal they need to fix their plows and swords, probably causes bad years for entire regions just by the consequences but he doesn't even notice.

William tried to summon a thing that was going to mind control an entire city to turn them into lemmings.

Every time Cordelia used the angel entire sections of the city died because they weren't "Good" enough.

The list goes on and on.

Konstantin von Karstein

Agreed for most of what you said, but you're wrong concerning Cordelia in this specific instance. Sure a few people died from the weapon, but the alternative was a fucking Hellgate opening in the middle of Procer and everyone dying, instead of just those few.

Konstantin von Karstein

Everyone in Salia, I mean. So hundreds of thousands.

nimmo

This is the exact issue being discussed, when heroes act for the greater good they don't consider their actions and the effects they have. Sure no one disagrees that Cordelia needed to activate the angel, and all those people dying was a worthy sacrifice for the greater good, but its the little things that are at issue. She did not inform all the villains it was going to happen and there was a bit about there being a number of close calls that Cat was pretty unhappy with i believe. That's the core issue, the heroes are not even trying to clean up the mess they make, cuz the mess they fix is so much bigger.

Konstantin von Karstein

What? She explicitly evacuated all the Villains present in the city. Also, she's Procer's head of state, to whom should she have asked permission? It's not different from a ruler deciding to sacrifice some villages because they can't afford to send troops there.

And she is not even Named and never was, only Claimant. Do you think Cat would have reacted any differently?

MoreBeer

What happens when your head of state announces to the general public: we're about to activate a defensive weapon that may kill a few of the most evil people in the city?

Kletanio

Agreed. Cordelia's actions are not a preemptive "well the ends will justify this terrible decision after we are victorious," so much as "if we don't do this, everybody dies, right now." The immediacy of the thing makes a big difference. (It's why murder done in the heat of the moment is also treated somewhat more leniently by the courts than murder planned out in advance (and why killing in self-defense is not murder))

shikkarasu

I also side with Cordelia, but the point is not that all Heroes are bastards, it's that there needs to be oversight. Cordelia is an example of responsible Angel-Cannon use, but something like half of all Heroes can do things like that if they live long enough and they need to be held accountable. A few bad apples spoil the bunch, so if you want people to respect and trust Heroes you need hard consequences for their Llesse-sized screw ups. Heroes must be held to a higher standard, not lower.

If commoners and Nobles would be executed for something? Heroes should as well. Not because execution is good, but because the double standard is bad.

Konstantin von Karstein

I completely agree with that. I was just objecting the fact that this post was presenting Cordelia's decision in the same light as what the Red Axe did.

jamesc9

> If commoners and Nobles would be executed for something? Heroes should as well.

Rebelling unsuccessfully against a corrupt state.

The corrupt state is the core of what causes heroes, so rebelling against it is close to being their raison e'tre / reason for being.

I think that a maximally successful Liesse Accords would punish for damage to civilians, rather than for the rebellion itself. I think that rulers would like to pull it toward punishing the rebellion.

shikkarasu

You seem to have missed the 2nd half: Not because execution is good, but because the double standard is bad.

I don't actually agree with execution. I think it fails to solve any of the underlying issues that caused the crime in the first place. That said, if one narrow group is immune to that punishment while the rest are told that their death is only to be expected, that is one of those underlying issue that needs to be solved. If you don't want to execute Heroes you need to stop executing the rest of the population and you do not get the right to act surprised when you learn that they resent you.

Zach

Yeah, the fact that Hanno hasn't ever looked at the whole "flipping the coin and killing people" thing he used to do (before Judgement went silent) and realized that it was fucked up and wrong is pretty damning.

Trashbandit

I think you can point at the grey pilgrim killing a whole village to try and kill the black knight when he invaded procer ir William trying to call the angels to turn a whole city into mindless people ready to do battle. Who are they to decide what those people want to do. The black knight didn't pillage and kill all those people, I doubt they all wanted to be sacrificed. I doubt all the people living in the city wanted to go to war, all the children and old people. I think what they are getting at is Hanno was so self-confident and thought everyone supported his view and Cordelia "lucked" into her claimant but what cat is revealing is that for Cordelia to be a claimant she has to have a story backing her. Her ideal of being a boundary between heros and villains from doing whatever they want no matter how hood intentioned without a care for individuals involved in collateral damage has to have backing and teeth from a sizable population of people.

Teddy

> For Cat's point to be legit you need to point to Saint killing some innocents for no reason besides she wanted to eat them.

Are we forgetting the time Tariq killed an entire village of innocents with a painful plague for the Greater Good?

The angels told him to do it, but I doubt that mattered very much to the peasants just trying to live their lives.

Linnus42

Tariq doesn't do that and the other options was Black causes everyone to starve to death and get mowed down by DK or Cordelia's plan where they burn a whole city with Black and the Legions inside. Those were the options in the story which one would you prefer?

And are you down for prosecuting Cordelia for War Crimes just as you are for Tariq? If they went with her plan.

Practicalfanofevil

The point cats trying to make isnt that people are annoyed with the heroes. Its that they are annoyed by people that holds the power of life and death over them through acts like contrition rituals or demon summonings or even the deluge that cat uses. And through the books we see this idea expressed by whichever prince holds the pov but it doesnt mean that every single soldier in the armies doesnt share the same thought. And honestly i cant believe you would think there isnt enough setup. I mean the entire story of the fifteenth is to kills gods and devils with mortal men and to show them that their games are not wanted. Which is a direct paralel to everyone else being sick of heroes and villains both.

AceOfSword

The Saint of Sword probably killed her fair share of criminals who'd turned to evil out of desperation, and what does that actually fix?

Like, yeah, sure thanks for wiping out that bandit camp, they were murderers who deserved to die for sure.

But did that actually fix anything, or did you just create a vacuum that other desperate people will want to fill? Because at some point it might start to feel less like you're trying to fix things and more like you're just sating your own bloodlust on acceptable targets.

I mean, look at what Hanno used to do: just spin a coin for anyone, and if they got the wrong result he'd just kill them immediately. Oh he was happy to comply with the laws, he even accepted going on trial and being judged by his peers. But for other people? Nah, they don't need another trial, the Angels already found them guilty!

Matt

Looks to me like both claimants will be broken and lose their claim. I think it will be Prince Frederick who will be in a position to step up.

AceOfSword

I think Cordelia will have to face some harsh truths and be broken down, but I don't think either of them will automatically lose their claim.

I think whichever manages to adapt to the criticism and broaden the scope of their vision first will get to become the Warden.

beleester

Hanno specifically said that he doesn't spin the coin for just anyone. That you don't stand trial without committing a crime, just like any other court. He had a whole conversation about that with Cat!

AceOfSword

What about that time he spun the coin for a merchant whose store was being looted? I don't think she was committing any crime at the time, unless you're counting being the victim of a crime as participating in it.

Insanenoodlyguy

I mean for all she needed to die, I don't really think we can blame seen a swords for that sort of thing. Yeah I'm sure she made some power vacuums and that was a problem but like wiping out the band camp is what she's therefore. It's not really a mark against her that she doesn't know how to reform the system so criminals don't re-emerge that's a tall order and that's not her role. The problem is the more ambiguous targets, and as if not more importantly, the implied authority. Who the hell is this lady that she can just come and kill the local mayor? Even if the law of the land ends up agreeing he committed crimes, even ones worthy of execution, why is this sword wielding hardass empowered to make those decisions? Because the first thought when you hear somebody just showed up and started killing people, it's not "oh a hero must have dispensed justice" it's "oh fuck we have a murderous lunatic running rampant here!" And Saint herself notes, heroes can turn, can go mad, or even sometimes comes the day they make a mistake, best of intentions but just plain screw up and kill the wrong person, or there is collateral damage? Why are they given a "oops, well you were trying to do the right thing" when anybody else would be hunted down for this? Because Hanno would make that call, at least on occasion. Like cat said, there's some people out there who are sick of the heroes shit.

SpacyRicochet

So basically, we're arguing that the common people don't have an issue with Heroes, because the ones with cause to dislike them have been wiped from the face of Creation, along with all their neighbors? This is true, I suppose.

The only ones left complaining about Tariq's village are Nobles and other authority figures.

Zggt

Remember when The Gray Pilgrim did a war crime (literal biological warfare) to save time? Or smothered a child in his sleep because said child might grow up to be good, but not good in a way he wanted? Or justified another brutal conquest of Callow for no other reason other than political expediency (Cat was willing to give him everything, including stepping down after helping to conquer Praes, which he failed to do because of said choice, bringing us to this point)? The Bard nearly succeeded in her plan of "heroic genocide of an entire continent via Angel". Warlock was brought down through heroic genocidal horror as well. The list does go on.

"Good" is not "good for the people", it's "what the Gods Above deem a part of their plan". That's literally in the prologue. There is a big difference between the two. Heroes keep on trying to create a Good future, but are completely blind to the fact that there will always be Villains because that's how humans work.

They're not wrong in wanting to stop the worst of them. But they are wrong in not trying to work with some. Mentioned in passing that Yan Tei, a successful empire on a different continent, where their rulers are always a Hero and a Villain, so it seems that there exists a possibility of working together. But other than Cat trying to create rules of engagement, this has largely not even imagined in Calernia.

During the Conquest, for the majority of Callowans, taxes were lower. There were no bloody wars. And all that ended because of intervention of outside forces, by Good (via a doomed to fail rebellion, the Courts of the Fae, and a Crusade) as well as Evil. After Procerean clergy called Cat arch-heretic, it seems that the definition of Good is also at least somewhat politically motivated.

Hanno is correct in as much as the Choirs are concerned. But we have an advantage of perspective he does not. The first books made a point of saying, repeatedly, through both metaphor and directly, that the people themselves can create change on a deeper level than Named can. And Callowans, with their streak of vindictiveness, are probably fed up with Heroes not of their own. And rightly so.

The people who gave them back their self-rule, dignity, and strength back were by and large Villains, in spite of Heroes. And we all know that Callowans are big on spite.

beleester

>Or smothered a child in his sleep because said child might grow up to be good, but not good in a way he wanted?

The "good" the child intended, as I recall, was to wage a war against Procer because they had his mother assassinated. Which is, well, a questionable decision whether you're judging by Goodness or Practicality.

>Warlock was brought down through heroic genocidal horror as well. The list does go on.

Warlock was brought down because he turned the entire city he was defending into a nuke in order to destroy the weird God-thing the Ashurans had brought with them. We don't know anything about what it would have done, let alone that it was genocidal. All we know is that it nearly killed his son and that was enough reason to go all-out.

shikkarasu

Yep, self sacrifice to save a loved one from an extra-dimensional invader. Frankly I think Warlock's last action was pretty Heroic, and if he had survived there should have been repercussions no matter what gods he kept to.

goldstar971

He was dying though. The god thing had inflicted mortal injuries on him he couldn't heal. So it wasn't really self-sacrifice. Below never gives power until you are dying/about to die.

Unrecovered

“even if you disagree with their actions that is the goal, you have to follow the blueprint from the Gods Above or you fall”

Yeah, like when Choir of Contrition mindcontrolled a full fucking CITY to join the Crusade and die on the walls of Keter. How's this for a blueprint? Oh, they tried to make the world better alright. But it's the result that counts, and result of that Crusade was Dead King getting stronger, having alot of new additions to his army and heroes. And alot of people dying.

I've said it before, it's not Good vs Evil, it's Above vs Below. The contest of whoever can come up with a better story.

Rey d`Tutto

Common Sapient Morality & Laws are based on an idea of “Black vs White w/Grey shades aplenty”.
Above and Below are “Orange vs Blue (w/Shades of Brown)”.

This is the conflict Cat is trying to resolve, and any potential WotW needs to grok this.

Vortex

I think the peasants who love heroes might have had second thoughts if they were in the room when the Saint of Swords told Cordelia that the Chosen of Heaven were perfectly happy to sacrifice the entire country of Procer to evil and let it burn down for the greater good to win out in the end.

Just because the average peasant has a good impression of heroes doesn't mean that every hero has their best interests in mind. Some of the heroes in the story were quite nasty in their own way. The Red Axe was perfectly happy to sacrifice hundreds of thousands of people in the war against the dead king so she could kill the guy who wronged her.

Bishop

In Callow the priesthood split because Procer tried to name Cat Arch-heretic. The “Good” Callowan people were also pissed that Proceran heroes were coming to “save” them from their villainous queen.

Also the Praesi were proud of Akua an honored to have fought on her side. They may not have understood the whole situation, but the same can be said of the peasants not knowing how Tariq killed a village to get the jump on Black. Perhaps due to ignorance the local heroes or villains get the support of the populace. Hanno as he was would still back crusades into Praes and Callow, thinking backlash against heroes was simply ignorance of the heroes good intentions, but now he might actually rethink it.

Bishop

It would be a false equivalence if villains only sought to kill people and heroes only sought to save people. However, the issue is that egocentric leaders and Named, whether good or evil, treat common people as collateral damage. How many patriotic Callowan soldiers did the Proceran heroes kill in their Crusade? Heroes would argue it couldn't be helped, but they could have just invaded Callow as a band of five and avoided making trouble for the citizens, like the first group we saw attempt to assassinate Cat. But then they would have lost, like that group did. So heroes will do anything to win, even if it means ordinary people suffer, and that makes them equivalent to villains. Heck, villains might not even kill people to win, but save or prolong their lives, like the alchemist the Saint of Swords spared, then killed. In the end they're just collateral damage – but the Warden is a leader for ordinary people and Named, and Hanno needs to be able to hold heroes to task if they act against the people's interests, which he doesn't grasp.

Idk if it's intentional but it might be a metaphor to his understanding of how to build a wall – he sees the stones as the most important so he thinks stones is all it needs, and Cat needs to teach him without mortar the stones won't hold.

jamesc9

I like the wall metaphor, especially if we can stretch it so it covers the other thread, where non-named make more difference to the world in the long run.

Kiara

It's not a false equivalency.

Almost all people – Heroes and Villains as well as real world “villains” think they have good motives.

Think of the story (this is bad since I don't recall their Names) of the two kids who took parallel paths to try and save their villages, one was Good because she prayed and was lucky enough to be answered. One was Evil because he killed everyone who could stop the plague (notably feeling horrible about it but succeeding in saving more lives). That's bullshit to call his motives inherently bad.

Black and Malicia and co were also motivated by trying to save Praes.

As the saying goes, there's no one as dangerous as someone who believes their acting for a moral cause, and the heroes keep proving this.

Knight

"My tutors taught me that's called a false equivalence," Vivienne said conversationally. "The pretence that the obvious failings in the customs of a people that slaughter each other and their neighbours for sport every other decade are somehow the same as the flaws in the customs of Callow.

You're thinking like Viv 3.0. We're on Viv 5.0 now though, you should consider upgrading to the newest model.

Linnus42

I mean why did this whole mess occur? Sure Bard got involved but what shattered the Grand Alliance is a Villain deciding to rape a girl and murder a whole village for * and giggles. Bard exploited it but she is not the catalyst. You can say the cracks between Cordelia and Hanno were already there and that a Villain doing that to some village was basically inevitable as a flaw built into the T&T. However, its interesting that is rarely acknowledged when two characters debate about the issues in the GA.

Not to mention you don't see any Heroes giving less then 100% on the front unlike say Princes still during an apocalypse trying to dodge Taxes. Have Heroes played a roll in crisis sure during this war but when you look at the root cause its mostly been Princes and Villains.

Liliet

I mean, Hanno IS still right about a lot of things, and Cordelia's way cannot work the way she presented it in all honesty. It ain't over 'till the fat lady sings.

dadycoool

Yeah, while Hanno is very wrong, so is Cordelia. Until now, we've had two flawed and unsuitable Claimants thinking themselves completely right and the other to be completely wrong. We've shown one of them the grey, now we just need to show the other and see what happens.

Linnus42

My issue is more I think this feels a bit like railroading where Cat is making some major False Equivalencies that just go uncountered. Though I suppose it might tie into her Justifications only matter to the Just Ethos. So she only cares about the End Result...my point is I think even if you don't think the why a Hero does something matter...the cause of most these GA related messes does. And that Cause has primarily been a Corrupt Prince or a Villain.

Miles

I think you're making a bunch of false equivalences and then blaming Cat.

It's the goblin fire incident all over again.

But no, just because there was a corrupt leader somewhere doesn't mean the correct move is to murder them and then leave to let the situation devolve into a war zone. If it were as easy as that they wouldn't have been in power in the first place.

Albert Wen

Okay, but that's not relevant to Catherine's argument at all. The flaw in Hanno's worldview, which is also the flaw in your argument, is that the good intentions of a hero somehow excuse the damage they do. That the Red Axe was a hero (with good intentions, I'll remind you) didn't stop her from deliberately sabotaging the the entire Grand Alliance, looking to throw all of Procer to the Dead King, just like the Saint of Swords, because she thought the Truce and Terms was a worse outcome.

Jdburger

So I think the first issue here is Cat's speech is tailored for Hanno. She is using it to teach him a lesson so going into Cordelia's flaw without her present is not helpful for teaching.

Two she is right about him charging of to confront here about the Book of Somethings. Cat took it from the Bard who was both an enemy Named and servant of the Above and Below. You can argue that the Book is properly of the Warden's since their role is to oversee Named, but with Cat being the only Warden at the moment that means she has the only word that matters. Hanno and Cordellia have a claim to the name, but that does not matter until they have the name. So his justification for charging the Tower ultimately falls flat.

The third point is Cat is taking a long view on this and the Wardenship. Not all of Cat's problems and regular people's problem with Hero can be tied to corruption / villains.

The attempt to use the Choir of Contrition to force a Crusade in Callow, one historically and one failed – would have sent thousands to their death, young, old, hale, or infirm. It would not have matter to the Hero only that these people were doing "Good".

The Heroic bands who showed up in Callow following the Doom to depose Catherine who was a servant of the Below. From what we could tell Catherine was doing right by Callow and the people were content-ish. The bands came to depose the lawfully appointed non-corrupt ruler of a country and when giving the option to leave peacefully chose to fight her, and why because she belonged to the Below.

Saint of Swords was going to ensure the Crusade continued against Callow which would devastate it and kill hundreds of thousands – and why because they supported a Below name (because I am pretty sure Cat's abdication had already been offered at that point).

Tariq's plague upon a village to capture Black. Just because Cordellia's plan, that was not implemented, would have been worst does not mean his actions were justified nor the mortals are still dead.

I am going to skip Red Axe since this has been overly tread upon for now. Effectively in a story about villains we have multiple instances where Heroes in the pursuit of "Good" go too far by their own actions and decisions.

Insanenoodlyguy

Cat has long regretted that axiom on her banner.

But I think cat herself is a good representation. She did good for her kingdom. She was a villan, yes. But did the kingdom need saving? She improved quality of life, she wasn't sacrificing virgins or taking every firstborn child for her army or summoning demons or any of those atrocities. She was doing ruthless things, but the sort of things that Queen of Blades probably got up to and that one was called a hero. Cat was doing a good job, and we've seen the people's perspective that agree she's doing a good job. The heroes in that were somewhat disturbed by the populace but didn't take the real message from it: nobody here was crying out to be Saved. But she was a villian and so she must go, and after? Well things would work out.

They were good people, giving 100% to do the right thing. And Cat was right to kill them after it was clear they could not be reasoned with. And Hanno as he is can't understand that, many heroes can't understand that, and that is a problem.

hakureireimu

The Villain destroyed a few villages. The Hero tried to destroy the whole alliance. It's obvious who would do more damage.

Linnus42

Let me ask you a question Haku? Lets say you got raped and saw your whole village and everyone you know brutally murdered in front of your eyes? And lets say you have what a few weeks at most to get over this trauma before seeing your tormentor? How logical is your decision making going when someone shows up right after that trauma and tells you about their plan to destroy such a corrupt institution in your mind that is protecting monsters. Try some empathy....killing a village and raping people for fun aint the same as Red Axe's motivation.

hakureireimu

Red Axe would have been fine if he only killed the Wicked Enchanter. But she tried to kill Frederick and the T&T too, both in cold blood. She's an attempted mass murderer. Being raped does not entitle you to do mass murder.

Linnus42

Really you think the Villains would have been fine at large with Cat not demanding the death penalty? After Red Axe killed one of their own. If so I suggest you go read up on the pressure Cat was under.

hakureireimu

Fine in the sense that she did the right thing and isn't worse than her rapist. Of course she still deserves death penalty for breaking the law. That's what law means. By trying to destroy the T&T, she's worse than her rapist because she literally tried to do far more damage than he did.

aurikdomi

Haku then you agree with Cat's point/where Hanno disagrees. there needs to be laws that can apply to heroes...

Albert Wen

Yes, that's what everyone except Linnus has been saying. We're all in agreement that Hanno was wrong and this chapter made sense.

Jdburger

I am sorry what.... The issue with Red Axe was not here Death. Hanno was already onboard with executing her, without including the attempt on Kingfisher. He even had a conversation with the other heroes on-site explaining his decision.

The issue with Red Axe is similar to what Hanno complains about in this chapter. Kingfisher has two hats, like Cat, he is both named and regional noble. When Red Axe attempts to kill Kingfisher she tried to kill both a hero but a ruler of Procer. This creates a conflict between both Cordellia and Hanno because both have to ensure justice is served and the people they represent are satisfied. If Cat had not acted by raising the corpse of Red Axe – Procer would be denied justice for Red Axes crime and established a precedence that named taken priority over governments.

To give you a modern day example – I believe if a criminal commits murder in multiple USA states each state has the right to try them even if one has already determined they should receive the death penalty.

Annya

You are missing the point by a mile. “Your village got destroyed by villains”. The villains would be brought to justice/killed. “Your village got destroyed by the heroes”. Let them go, don’t punish them, they did it for the greater good.

These two consequences are not the same, are they? And yet, the village is gone and the people are dead. If you will argue that one is more morally justified and some of the corpses would agree with that, okay but that’s objectively not changing the situation.

Linnus42

Ah but the point is under the Truce and Terms. The Villain would never have been punished at all. Unless he committed another crime later and even then it might not have been death penalty worthy. The Truce and Terms gives total amnesty to Villains for all crimes committed before they sign up. There would have been no justice for Red Axe’s Village or herself whatsoever. That is the flaw in the system, a necessary flaw you can argue but nonetheless its present. Hence a Red Axe would have always arisen eventually.

Annya

Then you need to check again what the T&T say because your whole argument sets on a false premise of no consequences for the villains. Signing into them gives them a clean slate but everything AFTER that is counted.

The concept of amnesty is not new and there are stricter rules under T&T than out of them. Because the Red Axe was horribly victimised and was raped and a whole village destroyed... and then nothing happened to the person who caused it, under existing way of handling things. I understand her having an issue with that but she literally tried to destroy the thing that intends to handle that kind of shit from now on so there would be consequences for events like that in the future? She basically fought to have the status quo, which literally led to her situation and to the lack of consequences, instead of having the model changed in a way that would help avoid or handle situations like that in the future? Where is the logic there for you? I absolutely understand emotionally the Red Axe and I absolutely understand why she is wrong. Destroying an attempt of handling an issue better in the future in a way that does not achieve anything but reinforcing the current system is just pointless. The Red Axe was manipulated and either she was perfectly fine with it because she chose her own hurt over the long-term positive consequences or she didn't fully understand the consequences of her actions, the end result is that it perfectly illustrates that good has an issue with shortsightedness. She remained a hero until the end even though her actions were objectively long-term worse than the T&T. And Hanno has the gall to complain about heroes experiencing consequences for trying to destabilise the whole continent and trying to murder other heroes, because the individual person prioritised her trauma over everybody else. One can understand the Axe and still understand why it is not right. Hanno does not even want to admit that. Because she is Good and a hero. He is doing exactly what he is criticising the villains of. "even the worse of us are not malicious" is what he said. Sorry, but this is really not true and the Axe illustrated that you don't have to be intentionally malicious for your actions to be beyond that as far as consequences go.

Malek_Deneith

Truce and Terms are only in effect for duration of the war. If my memory serves me right Cat even explicitly mentioned she'd have no issues with Enchanter being hunted down afterwards.

Agent J

There was no justice for the village Tariq plagued either. No, his Good intentions don't excuse that. No, the fields and granaries Black burnt do not justify it.

Neither does the Red Axe's trauma excuse trying to collapse the war after holding back THE LITERAL APOCALYPSE! You're mistaking 'sympathetic' with 'just'. You are, in many ways, doing exactly what Hanno does.

Acting like the Accords are about making a compromise with Evil. That Good, whatever harm it causes, can and should be excused because at least they're not intentionally malicious like Evil. This is the problem. Their intentions are no balm for the people harmed by their action. If Red Axe had succeeded, broken the T&T, shattered the Grand Alliance, and DK swallows Procer whole... do you think the dying continent would give one iota of a fuck about her tragic backstory? Do you think the innocent civilians that were massacred by Tariq the Plaguebearer care one whit about the trolley dilemma he always seems to view the world through?

Hanno wants to be a Warden when he doesn't even understand what the Accords are about.

It's not a compromise with Evil, it's a compromise with Named.

jamesc9

I wonder if a retrospectively revised T&T needed to allow duelling, so that people who are aggrieved by events before other people joined can seek a managed private remedy.

ninegardens

I mean, we all remember that time Tariq Killed a Village right?
And NO ONE got to call him on it.

And like... his logic was good, and I even like the guy.
BUT... He killed a village and was above the law, and that is kinda messed up.

Linnus42

I mean Cordelia's solution was trap the Legion in a city and burn it down with Civilians inside.
Black's plan was break them by burning up the country side leaving them to starve and DK gets an easy win.

Tariq took the least bad option of the bunch.
Considering Cordelia's plan was going to kill more people I don't put much stock in her rage. Being really about the poor villagers being killed and more about Tariq didn't do what she wanted even if her plan was worse.

ninegardens

Absolutely!

I agree with! Tariq DID prevent unnecessary suffering. It was good and right.

... and he should still be put on trial for it. The trial might find him innocent. Or it might find him guilty and decide to let him free anyway. I do not think he should be damned for what he did. I just think that he should be answerable to someone.

Linnus42

I am fine with your argument if you think Cordelia would need to be put on trial if they went with her plan to burn a whole city down with the Legion and Civilians inside killing even more people.

Reader in the Night

Cordelia is answerable: To the Highest Assembly. She can be voted out at any moment.

Insanenoodlyguy

That's her call as a ruler. She was elected to make the hard decisions. And she'd understand why some would never forgive her for that. Tariq is an outsider who answered to no one and just because his call was lesser doesn't mean it was his call to make. If he'd gone to Cordelia and said "I have a plan. It's horrible but it will stop him for minimal Loss" she might have even supported it! But he didn't. It wouldn't have even occurred to him to do it, because maybe he'd be refused and why would he need to ask in the first place? He's a god blessed hero. And this hurt his relationship with Cordelia in a way a warden of the west couldn't afford to do with a big powers ruler, and a way Hanno absolutely would do or allow. He recognized this chapter how he'd eroded trust he needs. It'd have taken a lot more, time they don't have to realize it himself.

Linnus42

She was elected from among a pool of Princes by her fellow Princes. Princes inherit their power based on having the right bloodline primarily with some other secondary factors.

The average civilian in the village Tariq plagued or the city she wanted to burn has no control over the government in Procer. If they wanted justice and the other Princes didn't vote to remove her they basically need to start a coup well their relatives would they all be dead.

Legality doesn't mean Moral. And no I don't agree if she was elected by the People and the law technically grants her that power its make her in the right. Even if she was in a democracy and not an oligarchy.

Insanenoodlyguy

But if it's not her decision to make, what makes it Tariq's?

Konstantin von Karstein

No one is saying otherwise. Everyone was thinking that the Enchanter do served to be killed. The problem is that her death was necessary for the T&T, and with them the whole continent. Sure the morality of that is awful, but one of the theme of the Guide is that practicality wins.

Abrakadabra

And Kingfisher Just happened to deserve the almost decapitation because of what exactly? Because another man was an evil killer? Or because Red Axe decided that to destroy truce and terms the death of Kingfisher was worth it? See, she Just treated Kingfishers life as collateral damage, no not even that, as a tool.

Sir Nil

This felt like it needed more setup.

Liliet

I don't think this is over yet.

dadycoool

She just BROKE his Story! She was able to tell him exactly how he's wrong and did so in a way that stuck, and that's amazing! Now if she can cut the ground out from Cordelia's feet, too, she'll have made way for a Claimant who hasn't been involved in this pissing match.

Adrian_V

Nahh, the whole point is seeing wich of these 2 can change and grow as a person, because both were unwilling or unable to do that, and that was the danger, this is new age and the wardens should represent that change.

RoflCat

Also hinting at them what I said before:

The Warden of the East came to be BECAUSE she has BOTH the Nation and the Names.

The current claimants of the West are EITHER Nation OR Names, not both. So neither are her 'equal'.

This is Catherine teaching them that they need to have both.

Adrian_V

Yeah, that and if they only have 1 even if they somehow get the name they would be weaker than Cat, there would be a fatal flaw in the system creating an imbalance, not sure how that would affect the story but the warden of the West would be weaker for sure.

Kletanio

Stick your Claim where the Light shineth not, Hanno.

ninegardens

I mean.... this is Hanno right? How sure are we that the Light Shineth not from his hindquarters? Pretty sure he could manage it.

Tenthyr

God DAMN Cat tore into him.

I wonder if Hanno is far enough out of his own ass now to realise what she just did was give him a chance to heroically learn his lesson and claim his true power.

arcanavitae15

Holy shit I loved that just god, so that is what the warden of the East looks like I just god damn. I loved that argument it was a long time coming and I like how it was handled with both of them making good point, I like how Catherine pointed a lot of things that needs to be said the same with hanno, I hope they both grow from this, looking forward to more.

*arcanavita*15

I also like how Catherine quoted Amadeus, "you have not earned it and this offends me"

Reader in the Night

This is gonna be one of those chapters from the Guide I come back to read once in a while just because it's so awesome. Catherine quoting Black was... shivers.

Raved Thrad

Hanno doesn't wear a helm, right? Otherwise that ringing he thought was truth might just have been Indrani's mailed glove smacking him on the back of the head. 😊

Frivolous

If you're naked from the belt up when you're hanging upside down, does that mean you're wearing no shirt or no pants?

I hope it's no pants

boballab

Sorry that isn't Hanno, that is Jason Asano in "He Who Fights With Monsters" that hangs up side down without pants.

SpeckofStardust

To quote cat.

"My help is a decision,"

Named have power, they make choices, and when those choices cause problems they like every other group need to be reprimanded.

This very argument has been set up from the start.

Heroes causing less problems is irrelevant if your unwillingly to punish them for the problems they do cause. The warden and accord system is to set up people who can carry those punishments out before it gets out of hand.

The wardens are meant to protect the unnamed from the Named or to at least migrate the damage to those who aren't named from Named actions.

boballab

That's the thing though, there is multiple chapters and story arcs that show that Hero's don't cause less problems. The problems they cause have been swept under the rug of "The Villain made me do it". William going to turn an entire city into mindless fanatics to start the 10th Crusade all because the Hero's couldn't get things going in Callow. The Bard and Saint telling Cordy that she needs to let a huge chunk of her people die to bring in a new golden age for Hero's in Procer.

In the regular course of events after the Hero's half destroy a city or village to get the Villain they don't stay around and help rebuild or help bury the dead. It's something that has been pointed out about Superhero comics for a long time, you never see the hero stick around or pay the price of picking up some working stiff's car and throwing it at the villain, and knocking him through the same stiff's place of work. Great you got the villain but it doesn't help that ordinary guy who no longer has a car or a job anymore.

Raved Thrad

That superhero argument reminds me of "Kingdom Come."

SpeckofStardust

Just because you have a hate on for heroes doesn't mean they cause more problems. Like for below's sake there is a reason villains are 'evil' but heroes are 'good' PR only gets you so far. And as we saw during the flashbacks to the Dead King's time before being the dead king below wasn't 'evil' and above wasn't 'good'.

Going at my they cause "less problems" as me giving them a blank check was missing my point.
Cat having more problems with heroes does not mean heroes cause more problem to the average person.

boballab

Hate to break the news to ya but I don't have a hate on for hero's but they do cause just as many problems and it is because they work for control freaks... or did you forget the whole reason the gods split was not over "good" and "evil" (those were mortal terms) but over how the gods should interact with mortals.

SpeckofStardust

Yes the guide vs control, which considering the relative lack of guiding from the Below in the story leads me to believe that the above isn't simply the control crowd. (of the thought that above and below don't follow the divide that simply).

Adrian V

"You have not earned it," Catherine Foundling said, smiling thin and sharp, "and this offends me."

In some extraplanar level of hell Amadeus of the Green Stretch is seeing this and going all "see this my little girl is quoting me" to all the surrounding demons and tortured souls xD

And yeah i was right both Hanno and Cordelia need character development, or rather grow, the one that is able to grow more or quicker is the one that should be warden since both of their methods/ideologies are doomed, the whole premise of the new age is change, some named it the Age of Order but all it boils down to is the world changing and if they can't change with it then they aren't fit for it.

Also this was Hanno's chastising lets see if Cordelia gets one too, to her face that is

sidehammer056302

I always liked Hanno, so it hurt to see him so utterly torn apart, but goddamn did it feel good watching Cat thrive in her element.

"All that's left is violence. And I'm better at it than you..."

XD

Frivolous

Where the hell is Masego? He should be present to Witness. He should have demanded to be present.

The Book of Some Things is being eaten, and he should be fascinated by it. Either he should be using someone else's Wrested magic to observe the procedure, or he should be running itself with Wrested Night.

sengachi

Hmm, that's a good point. I'd guess:

- 1) He is watching, just from a remote viewing location with better equipment than he could fit into the ritual room itself.
- 2) Cat needs him for something else, which he's doing or waiting to do right now.
- 3) They are still fighting the Dead King after all, and no matter how much he wants to see this, he's needed to close a Greater Breach or something.

shikkarasu

Cat can always let him view her memory. We know he can Witness through other people's eyes. It was how he gained Witness in the first place en route to Keter and later how he attempted to recreate his father. He just needs a goo, reliable point of view. The woman who did the thing should suffice.

They are long past issues with copy/pasting memories between one another. It just comes with a migraine sometimes.

Isaac Martinez

Cat has her dream of throwing people from towers realized, and evades the story of the chained monster, or damsel in need of rescue. Yup.

Kletanio

Such a shame that Hanno is For Sure Dead from being thrown off the tower. There is no way he survived, and there is no way he will possibly recover from this defeat. Woe unto him.

Linnus42

Oh one more thing I say the argument about well you have to National Support and experience running a town, city, province, country, etc would work a whole lot better in a world where you know most people don't get that position by dint of being born from the right pair of Loins. Though he does have experience running a military and Heroes but the point stands I suppose.

I mean Cat didn't need to but getting to her current position was a lot of hardwork and being adopted by the right person. Hanno was not liable to be in such position to run anything in Ashur given how low he started in their rigid caste system. Even if sure the overall point is sound, its a lot less sound when its not as easy as run for an election and win.

Funny enough he could have gotten such experience you know if Cordelia didn't stop him from getting made Prince by the ascent of the people.

Konstantin von Karstein

And how would he have won experience governing while in the middle of the apocalypse? Even if he was made a Prince he would still basically do the same things he was doing. Even if he tried to actually rule while fighting the End Times, he wouldn't have been good at it, which the GA can't afford.

Linnus42

Indeed that is kinda my point though Cat makes a good point in practice though its basically an impossible ask lol in context. Though we don't know how good he be after some time, just that they don't have the time.

nimmo

The issue isn't entirely to do with governing. It's to do with leading. Hanno is a leader of small bands and never of more than that.

"The choices don't stay nice and clean when you have to think about more than a hundred people at a time. How very convenient that you've limited how many you need to care about to that number.""

Hanno has never stepped up and lead anything more than a group of heroes and it shows. Sure they are in the middle of a big old war and so he cant take a throne but why not an army? Hanno has been at the front lines of every battle but Cat has planned her fights AND then fought from the front. That's the difference, a Warden is not just a Name with a big stick, it's a Name that leads other Names, all other Names and Hanno does not have that big picture experience.

Two dozen snakes

You're not getting it. Cat's not criticizing Hanno because he has no experience ruling, she's criticizing him because he has no interest in doing so. She just pointed out the flaws in his way of handling the job as Hero-in-charge of the GA, and the fact that as WotW he intends to just keep doing what he's doing. Hanno treats Heroes and Villains like they exist in a vacuum, ignoring the effect their actions have on the people of Calernia as a whole. And that's unacceptable, because the whole point of the Accords and the Wardens is to limit the effect of their actions on the common people. The actions of the Red Axe are entirely understandable, justified even for her, but doesn't change the sheer damage she nearly caused. And for Hanno to completely ignore the social and political ramifications, refusing to bend to the reality of the situation and nearly causing the collapse of the GA is unacceptable. The WotW is supposed to be in charge of Good, they can't be someone who looks the other way while a hero starts the next continental war just because the hero is Good. Hanno's blind spot is that the consequences of a hero's actions aren't automatically "everyone lived happily ever after", and so the Warden can't be someone who won't step in to stop them before that happens, or unwilling to take actions to prevent the situation from spiraling out of control after the fact. This isn't about right or wrong, the moral/ethical choice over the unethical one. It's about ensuring the least amount of damage to the continent. The Name is WARDEN, not Guide or Paragon...

nimelennar

I can't help but worry that this breaks her promise to Tariq, though. From Book 6, Chapter 75:

"I'd already sworn oath to Tariq that I'd not meddle with how the White Knight overcame his doubts, and that meant not letting myself be drawn into too pivotal a conversation."

Maybe Hanno has already had his pivot (by becoming Prince White), so this is inflicting doubts and not overcoming them? But if that was the case, I'd have expected to have seen the fulfilment of the promise acknowledged.

ninegardens

““I'd already sworn oath to Tariq that I'd not meddle with how the White Knight overcame his doubts, and that meant not letting myself be drawn into too pivotal a conversation.””

Cat Got released from that promise.

At the end of the last book, Tariq was all like “Okay, you can stop steering clear of Hanno now. Go be pals again. Also, I need you to babysit for me, and I'll borrow Robber for a bit”

nimelennar

“‘Make peace with the White Knight,’ Tariq asked. ‘That this civility may one day pass to all in service of Above and Bellow.’”

I mean, that /might/ be giving her permission to interfere with the White Knight overcoming his doubts, but it doesn't read that way to me.

Jdburger

I think we did see the the fulfillment of the promise in Claimant (Repeat). Hanno has overcomes his doubts – taking a role of leadership and announced his beliefs upon what the Role of the Warden of the West is.

With Hanno no longer plagued by doubt and trying to make a decisive decision that will affect Calernia she can set in. Furthermore she is kind of stepping in as the harsh teacher / mentor role make him realize his failings... but I would argue that is the mentor figure Cat is most familiar with.

nimelennar

Yeah, that might be the pivot, too. I'm just unclear why it wouldn't have been acknowledged as releasing her from her promise if it was.

Avandar

A point that often gets forgotten is that “Heroes” are way more subjective than Hanno likes to admit. How many people die when the Choir of Contrition gets involved?

A hero from one nation could very likely be viewed as a villain by another nation. Levantines, based on what both named and non-named have said in the books, don't have a great view of Proceran heroes. Remember in Hanno's POV arc, he was constantly mediating between the heroes in his band of five? The Levantines clearly viewed the Proceran heroes as enemies, even though they were both "Good" nations.

Recall that William the Lone Swordsman butchered his sister and became a hero, while the Barrow Sword is a villain because of... grave robbing? Arthur Foundling's epiphany about the difference between right vs. wrong and above vs. below is what I hope Hanno arrives at. Aside from fighting, we don't often see Hanno making a positive difference for the world.

A final point from Interlude: Wicked – "The Queen of Callow still bore one of the strongest wishes he had ever seen, pulsing with her heartbeat: peace, peace, peace. It was like watching a flower bloom anew with every beat. Even now it was all he could do not to laugh until his throat bled, for what an exquisite jest it was that one of Below's finest servants in the long history of Calernia was at heart one of Above's!"

Silverking

I think I recall Cat saying that she knows that monologue are generally hazardous to her health, but that she had often felt the urge to really lay into them "like rubbing a dog's nose into the mess they made on the carpet." As for the argument "Heroes are generally better intentioned than Villains, so having them answerable to authority is counterproductive", there's a few contentious examples that spring to mind.

The Saint of Swords smiled at the thought of Procer burning in order to bring forth "a better world from the ashes", and decided that she would rather let the sky fall and crush 3 full armies on the eve of the war against the Dead King rather than enter a bargain with a Villain for a microsecond. While the Red Axe had a true grievance against the Wicked Enchanter, her murder was a cold calculated strike against the Accords, and she tried to kill the innocent Kingfisher Prince for no other reason than to stir the pot further. These people weren't misguided or confused; they performed their actions with eyes wide open, even with the knowledge that it could make things worse for a lot more people. At some point, you've got to bring the hammer down, and the Role of "Guiding Counselor" that Hanno is forming may not actually be good at that.

I think the main thing that Cat was trying to convey (or at least, the main thing that Hanno took from the meeting) was that, regardless of what's actually true or not, the perception of Heroes as "the people who will get others killed for their ideals instead of their appetites" has permeated the fabric of Story to the degree that someone who feels that Heroes should be brought to heel is deemed a possible claimant to the name of Warden. Put it another way "If you're 100% right, and she's 100% wrong, then why does the glass slipper fit BOTH of you?"

agumentic

>she would rather let the sky fall and crush 3 full armies on the eve of the war against the Dead King rather than enter a bargain with a Villain for a microsecond

Being fair to old Laurence, she was willing to risk that, not simply let it happen.

Gabe Meadow

Well, a key element of her stated attitude was that she figured 'Good will win in the end.' That there's no way her uncompromising stance could possibly endanger all of Calernia, could it?

Which adds another element of the issue with Hanno and the heroic mindset – not just that being Good and in the service of Above immunizes them from consequences morally/legally – but that Providence immunizes them on a practical level. That they can't truly fail or make things worse.

I know people before have mentioned the vacuum belief, but it's this second element that in particular needs emphasizing. Because it's wrong.

A long time ago, from Interlude: Nemeses in vol. 2:

"It doesn't matter if she summons a whole army, though she didn't do any summoning at all. Heiress loses, in the end. That's her story. She makes a mess, but in the end she can't win. These... practical Evil types. They can win, if we let them."

"It wouldn't be the first time Evil wins," the hero said grimly. "Nor will it be the last, if we should be defeated."

"They don't win like this, William," Almorava said quietly. "This monstrosity of a plan the madman and the tyrant have cooked up? It changes things. Opens a door that can't be closed ever again."

From the Wandering Bard herself. And while she's completely unreliable, we've seen it demonstrated throughout the story. From everything Cat's done, to Kairos' trap for Judgement, to the end of vol. 6 where Magnificent Undead Bastard Neshamah uses Tariq's angelic Heroic Sacrifice as narrative justification to unleash his Ultra-Hellgate Surprise, and lock Providence out of the equation.

Because as explained when Kairos delivered his fatal lie:

"Stories were such a funny thing, weren't they? Like, say, 'wicked villain is sentenced never to lie again by the champion of a Choir, then in a moment of delightful hubris speaks such a lie'. It was the kind of story that'd need a thundering, righteous Choir to smite that uppity servant of Below. Not the sort of thing you could do while simultaneously serving as the hidden knife of the Heavens in someone else's tale. It wouldn't matter that the Choir had the capacity to serve in both roles concurrently. Fate would punish such lackluster commitment with failure on both fronts."

The hero mindset Hanno's espoused implicitly believes Fate is inherently on their side. It's not. Villains can get Fate on their side too. And Fate trumps both Choirs and Providence.

And that builds to Hanno's realization about Cordelia being a claimant. Not just that perception and stories have built up that take a jaundiced view of heroes, but that Fate declared it valid means it's not a heroic cheerleader.

jamesc9

> the perception of Heroes as "the people who will get others killed for their ideals instead of their appetites"

Thank you; that's a very nice summary.

Juff

Typo Thread:

allowing to see > allowing him to see act stop > act to stop it would Callow > it owed Callow then I for some > then for some
Her haze > Her gaze
As pain raised > As if pain raised
Was it you put up (something wrong here) learned my > learned from my guide to heroes > guide heroes (or be a guide)

CharcoalSpider

So this seems very much "Cat good and smart, heroes always dumb." I mean, Hanno could have easily responded to most of Cat's arguments, especially the one about Cat being there "as a decision." Every hero that joined the defense of Procer did so without having to be corralled like Cat did to the villains. The fact that this was enough to somehow “beat” Hanno is pretty disappointing, especially when a large number of the troubles before and during the war can laid at Cat’s feet.

I was kinda that this event would have been a huge mis-play from Cat; that Hanno and Cordelia were really trying to find some way to (individually) work out their differences, or that someone would take Cat to task for how much her hubris and need to control everything led to so many issues that everyone is currently facing. But alas, my prediction is that she will find Cordelia, lay the same verbal smackdown on her and Cordelia will simply be unable to respond in any way, and then Cat will dictate what will happen to the Name of Warden.

ninegardens

>> “The fact that this was enough to somehow “beat” Hanno is pretty disappointing,”

I think you missing the crux of the argument here. She wasn’t saying “I choose to be here, therefore I have the moral high ground over you”, she was saying “I choose to be here and you lot are taking that for granted”

ohJohn

re: corralling

@ninegardens already addressed the main point, but beyond that I think this is a mischaracterization.

Villains have their own motivation to oppose the DK taking over Procer/Calernia – namely that the Hidden Horror would kill them just as dead as the heroes, should he succeed. It’s historically common for villains to (temporarily) team up against a stronger villain. And even the Berserker, who was not the sharpest of their lot, recognized that the Accords would be advantageous for her. The main deterrent to them joining the war at first was the assumption that heroes would try to kill them if they showed their faces; once the T&T granted amnesty for past crimes and protected them from heroic attacks, they joined in droves. Removing that strong disincentive is hardly ‘corralling’, and it seems weird to pat the heroes on the head for not having been affected by it in the first place?

It’s also worth pointing out that the heroes absolutely did need to be corralled for the sake of the war effort – like, uh, everything that happened at the Arsenal – so this would be an extremely hypocritical point for Hanno to raise. Even ignoring the Red Axe, the Mirror Knight tried to steal a critical war asset, opposed one high officer and tried to depose another, incited a brawl between heroes where he almost killed one and mutilated another, and in the end Hanno had to beat the absolute ever-loving shit out of him.

IDKWhoitis

Soooo, I felt like this confrontation was a long time coming. Could a couple of Cat's points be argued with (or outright a trick of perspective)? Yeah, but the big thing is the smack down on Hanno for not really changing or learning from the tectonic shifts that have occurred around him. For all that Cat has flaws (we are in the seventh book of exploring them for Below's sake) she did point out that Cordy and Hanno have been nothing but slowly pulling apart the foundation of the Grand Alliance. Each one more preoccupied with the other's authority or power, slowly rotting the core and faith in Heroes and seeing the next day.

Cat was faced with the harder problem, of instilling enough discipline into the Villains that most people are accepting of their contributions and presence. She is unquestionably the leader, and they do follow her commands, and she did this without murdering one of them or racing to the bottom of the barrel. Cat is a Warden of Evil.

Cordy has failed, not on her own accord, the odds were really stacked against her. Procer as a concept is slowly bleeding out on the floor. The princes are in revolt (the pricks), the supplies and reinforcements are delayed (or nonexistent) and the ability of the crown's word to be taken seriously is at an all time low. The faith in the government is in an all time low. Her authority is very questionable at the moment, only being held together by a desperate deal with her princes.

This does not leave Hanno clear either, as with the failures compounding on Cordy's head, the one place that people should be turning to in their hour of need are the Heroes. But it's not in Hanno's (or any other heroes') shadow they look for respite. They are turning to Villains, to Cat specifically. By the limited the scope and responsibilities that Heroes have, losing the faith and hope of people is a crippling failure on their part. It can't even be excused because the Dead King has been a particular brand of bastard, because against all odds Heroes are supposed to Hold the Line. They are supposed to triumph and capture the imagination of the common soldiers and folk into believing that the end of days can be turned back. But given the state of things that Cat has walked back into at Salia, with everyone huddling together in the muck praying in despair for an end, I would make the case the Heroes, and Hanno included, have failed. There is a schism in faith, and a house divided will not stand.

Because in the end, Hanno and Cordy spent more time strategically positioning themselves to benefit at each other's expense. It was not a simple competition (as much as they want to beautify it), because the whole time, everything was burning around them.

Neither emerged as a leader, only deeping cracks, and fortifying trenches, hoping that SOMEONE would tilt things to their favor. Because it was "the right thing to do" or for a fucking bribe. This whole rant is to say, if they needed Cat to hand over a book to prove themselves the leader of a side, they really can't be seen as a worthwhile leader at all. Cordy schemed and Hanno demanded, but ultimately both their positions are too weak a foundation for an actual Warden.

This isn't a case of Cat is cheating or melodrama. This is not a case of false weights and trading in on old fuck ups. The failure in character, on display, is both Hanno's and Cordy's to bear. The Book should burn, or be handed to a third party. I willing to entertain a crack theory of Akua, Roland, or Gods Above help him, Frederick become the Warden. Frederick actually inspired and held together a neat little coalition, and Cordy is only really even a claimant because he put duty above personal gain.

I am happy of this chapter, it felt like some of the good stuff from a couple books ago. It made me happy to tune in at midnight on Friday again.

Linnus42

I mean I think most of your points are sound even if you are more charitable to Cordelia then Hanno. I would also argue Villains can be kept inline with sufficient Force, Force alone does not keep Heroes and Princes inline. But I get the major point.

However why should Frederic get Warden. As both a Prince and Hero should he not be trying to mitigate any rift between the White Knight and First Prince. And yet when has he ever acted to do so? As you note all Frederic ever does in a conflict between Cordelia and Hanno is back Cordelia immediately. He doesn't try to get them to come to a table together or try to convince either one that the other side isn't as bad as they think. He does as you note nothing because of duty...which is weird cause when we saw his flashback he initially rejected joining the Civil War even when Cordelia begged. That suggested a much more independent spirit then the current version.

I would also argue his choices surrounding Red Axe be it his failure to not get jumped by her, him helping to start a Hero brawl against MK and primarily his refusal to charge Red Axe at all helped create this crisis. For a man who supposedly trained in Politics and has the experience Cat says should be needed, he has been terrible at diplomacy.

IDKWhoitis

By his honor code, there isn't a question about backing Cordy. He isn't a zealot, he is a prince, and she's not Evil.

Thus in any conflict, he doesn't try to overcomplicate it, there's a right and wrong action laid out by a clear logic (Of a lawful good prince). I made another comment expanding on my analysis of Frederick. I wouldn't blame him for getting attacked by Red Axe, she was literally under an illusion and he was tasked to protect her, literally with his back to her.

My charity to Cordy is more out of apathy of "ah shucks" because I don't take her claimant status too seriously. She played the best she could being dealt a particularly shit hand (Black burning the fields, DK going nuclear, Human nature and Vultures circling overhead).

I'm going to sleep, but might reply late tomorrow.

IDKWhoitis

And damn the lack of an edit button.

It wasn't his responsibility to mend a rift, who was he to try? It would be stepping over bounds. But Frederick did at least support a resolution, by backing Cordy and helping get the support of the other princes.

Linnus42

He was a Prince and Hero. He is probably in the best position to try to mend the rift seeing as he is on both sides and knows both well enough. Surely if he should be Warden he should step and do something to stop this thing from blowing up. But there is no implication he did anything but quickly take Cordelia's side.

As for Red Axe, the issue is not getting jumped per se. It's the fact that despite having the qualities Cat implies one should have, he is a failure. He is trained in politics and diplomacy yet along with Roland and Christophe provokes a heroic brawl, should he not know better and be the adult in the room? Hanno even notes that Frederic was itching to go for his sword. He doesn't de-escalate, he provokes the conflict. As for Red Axe, he didn't consider the political situation in Procer when he decided to bring no charges against Red Axe. If he had made the charges and swung the sword to execute her this current issue is unlikely to occur at all (maybe there is some other trigger but one he played a big roll in). Sure maybe not charging Red Axe was honorable but isn't Hanno being shredded for not being Practical, putting personal code first and seeing the bigger picture by Cat here? The difference is Frederic checks all Cat's boxes and is supposed to be trained for War and Politics but never shows it.

The funny thing is Frederic is the perfect example of what Cat is suggesting on paper but when you look at his record its the opposite. He ruins her argument.

Sinead

Minor question: Does Fredric ruin Cat's argument, or does he just not actually fit her criteria of applying politics to Heros?

He seems to keep the two worlds separate, which leads to his failings here.

I'm just asking because it reads as a jump from listing Fredric's failings to 'Cat is entirely wrong' but I could easily be missing a key detail here.

Linnus42

That is one possible interpretation. Not mine but I can see how you get to that conclusion.

Sinead

I wasn't clear then.

My question is 'Would you elaborate on your interpretation?' Because I see how Fredric 'checks all the boxes on paper, but still fails'. I do not see how your last line of 'He ruins her argument' stands as just because Fredric doesn't uphold the standard doesn't mean Cat's argument is invalid. Unless that is your point?

IDKWhoitis

Really thinking about it, Frederick has played his role loyally, and pretty straight through on what a Hero should be while balancing the responsibilities of authority and pragmatic realities. I am very much in favor of him becoming Warden. He isn't just Cat with a better coat of paint, but rather someone who looks at what MUST be done, and without debating or pushing, just leaps in front of it. He's not particularly zealous, but he doesn't scorn others for pursuing other avenues. Even when stabbed by the Red Axe, if I remember, he didn't want her dead. He wept for his own assassin.

Yeah, I can really throw my support behind him. I think the other princes would be a little more motivated to elevate him, even if it is to snub Cordy...But he does have the proper training, mindset, and prestige. The people of the North, behind Redcrown, would likely bend the knee. And he is of the South, embodying every flamboyant trait and flaw. And lets not pretend that Cat's a little sweet on him, for totally pragmatic reasons, willing to work together.

Frederick for Warden of the West!

sengachi

The most fascinating thing for me, in this chapter, is the realization of just how thoroughly the Heroes have come to rely on Cat playing nice. Like, I knew she was playing nice with them, obviously. I knew they took it for granted, obviously. But even so, wow, I really wasn't seeing the magnitude of that.

You know what this chapter really drove home for me? Catherine has a new tier of Evil meta-Name, leads the freaking Woe, controls the strongest (living) military power on the continent (and has the next two strongest powers, the Drow and the Praesi, under her authority), has the ur-artifact of Good in her possession, is backed by gods famous for eating power ... and not a single person on Good's side was freaking out about it until she did her tower thing.

Because everyone on Good's side trusts her not to abuse that power.

Every single one of Hanno's actions here was predicated on the idea that Cat would meekly stay beaten if he won. That she wouldn't jeopardize the greater good if she lost. That she would carefully evaluate the political picture and avoid retaliatory plays which might disrupt too much if she won.

Good has come to take so much for granted from her, and wow, did this chapter ever drive that home.

IDKWhoitis

I fully believe she was entitled to that Monologue for the past 3 books and counting, but her staying quiet is saving no one. If there's a time to lance the wound, it's now.

Kletanio

She wanted to gloat so badly when Cordelia knelt before her and acknowledged how badly Procer had fucked up. And instead, Cat told her to get back up. Because it was the right thing to do.

Hanno, in contrast, never actually acknowledged that Cat has been right about a lot of stuff, that he's been put in charge of the Heroes in the T&T mostly by virtue of Cat needing there to be a hero people would listen to, not because Hanno was ever her true equal. And then Hanno starts lecturing here.

Yeah, she has the story at her back now. Of course she's going to rub it in.

nimelennar

It probably would have caused no end of problems in keeping the the rest of the Alliance on-side... but I can't help but feel that "Arch-Heretic of the East" would have been a more kick-ass, appropriate, and earned Name for Cat, with basically the same connotations.

sengachi

This is something I think is worth dissecting.

"You pretend that villains and heroes are the same, that their difference is a simple matter of... abstract philosophy," he said, "but it is not. Even the most vicious of us are trying to end evil, not spread it. You stand instead for rapists, cannibals and callous murderers."

On the one hand Hanno is right. But also ... this kind of shows how he doesn't get it. Cat doesn't stand for those people and those actions. It is her job to manage the people who do those actions, through whatever mix of incentives and consequences does the trick. But Hanno doesn't see the job as managing Named at all, he sees it as representing them. And that, above all else, might be why he doesn't deserve the job.

IDKWhoitis

I think a fair amount of Asymmetry is to be expected in the Warden roles and how they exert authority and power. My issue with Hanno really gets to his lack of understanding, or any meaningful attempts to. For the Wardens to function, it's a give and take relationship, based on trust, willing to limit the worst aspects of their own sides. His whole makeup fundamentally rejects that on several accounts, and without some character growth speed run, he can't be a Warden.

Because if you read carefully, he afraid of the Villains to revert to their base nature and Cat to not do much, because that was what he was going to do on some level for the Heroes.

sengachi

You're definitely right about the asymmetry. And Hanno really fails to see that asymmetry. He's judging Cat as if her Role is the Role he'd prefer to take as Warden. But that's just not how she plays the game.

beleester

Yeah, I think this is the crux of it. Like, we can all debate on how well this or that hero is living up to their ideals in specific instances, but Hanno is right that the Warden of the West isn't just going to be the Warden of the East with a different coat of paint. You can't ask someone to be the Leader of Heroes and then get upset that they promote traditional heroic things like forgiveness, moral inflexibility, or a willingness to bet on faith and luck instead of ruthless certainty.

sengachi

Well, I mean, clearly you can, because there's another option on the table (Cordelia) who is very willing to do things differently.

Reader in the Night

W000! That was SAVAGE! Nice to finally see everything wrong with Cordelia's perspective I've been pointing out acknowledged through Hanno's point of view, and then having Hanno himself be called out on the fact that he's so deep into the Stories, he forgot muggles get to have an opinion too.

When basically your entire social life is composed of Named as far back as you can remember, you sort of forget that the commoner folk is more than just window dressing for Heroics.

Now to see Cordelia called out on her casual prejudice towards Heroes.

Two dozen snakes

Ultimately one of Cat's salient points is that she IS Warden of the East, whereas Hanno(and Cordy) are merely claimants. Therefore, the WotW must be someone who counterbalances her. It can't be an extremist who will put their principles above her grievances, because if Cat has a serious grievance she might not be able or even willing to bend herself, and what happens if the Wardens can't come to a compromise over a serious enough issue?

sengachi

This is Hanno's fundamental problem, I think. He's not treating the Warden position as a management position, where the point is controlling one's Named and compromising with the other Warden to avoid damage to the common folk. He views the point as championing his Named's interests and narratives above all else, being the purest representative of them possible.

He's entirely missing the point of this new position, treating it like White Knight+. And Cat is finally not having it.

Orby

Rule of Law(Cordelia) vs. Libertarianism(Hanno)

ChillyPepper

I'm reminded of the name dream Cat had. with her good and bad sides fighting her human side? and I'm beginning to wonder if that was the whole replace the Bard dream, and she is breaking the mold.

Also, Akua for Cat's equal. (Or one of those Gargoyles, I'm not picky, EE.)

Daniel E

Catherine's quip about normal folks being sick of Heroes just as much as they are of Villains got me thinking; perhaps the Age of Order is meant to do away with the supernatural in this world. Starting with a decline in the power & relevance of Named, until eventually even magic & Light are but distant memories.

Konstantin von Karstein

I don't think so. You don't have to be Named to use either of them. And as long as the Gnomes continue to enforce their ban, magic and Light are the only way to significantly improve their technology and society. That's also the only way to feed such a massive population. There's no way any ruler is trying to forbid both of them and stay in power.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

I don't think what he was suggesting was a ban so much as people just sort of being weaned off of reliance on such things, perhaps even unintentionally; but I agree that that seems unlikely, both for the reasons you stated and simply because learning to use tools and resources responsibly is easier and more effective than discarding them. Plus, Names and those who hold them are clearly not going away, they're merely being rendered accountable whereas they were previously above any authority save that of one another in most cases. The advent of the new Age has already resulted in a net increase in the total number of Names that exist for the people of Calernia to potentially claim.

RoflCat

So I think Cat is going for either:

1. The 'preferred' option – Teach both Cord and Hanno that they need BOTH Nation and Names to be her proper equivalent, and neither of them has that at the moment.

2. If both fail to rise, she will just eat the fucking book and become Warden of Calernia. After all, as she pointed out here the Nations of the West would support her right now, and eating the book would give her power over the Names.

Either option would let them be done with this internal conflict and get back to dealing with the still very much advancing army of Dead King.

ChillyPepper

Option three: Providence will see both claimants failing, and will get a solid third claimant, powered with story and claim, to grab the book before she devours it!

superkeaton

Now, I wonder, what she has in store for Cordelia. Or if being forced to work face-to-face with heroes who aren't interested in politics will be trial enough.

IDKWhoitis

This is my ongoing assumption for how Cordy's claimancy is going to end, the Named won't follow her or will keep treating her like a Rookie (which in many ways, she is). However, given the nature of the role in question, one cannot simply be an administrator nor a judge, but rather an active participant in the war. Cordy has never struck me as particularly martial nor zealous.

Mincheriit

Thanks for the chapter. Damn i really hope theres cordelia side counterpart to this ch. I feel like theres been less problems openly caused by heroes than corrupt/abusive rulers but imo that kinda makes sense, theres less heroes than rulers n the like. It seems like the hero caused issues also tend to be less... direct and straightforward.

On another note, cats plan is basically if they cant get their shit together and theres no warden 'equal'to her, there doesnt need to be a shit warden either and theres better odds she can do something after consuming the book of some things. Rough tldr. I think...

kinigget

Well for starters, that all happened well before the Truce and Terms, so saying that it's what shattered the Grand Alliance is not only factually incorrect, but kind of insulting. Red Axe looked at the T&T, decided they didn't meet her own moral judgement, and purposefully went about trying to kill them. You may remember that Cat even said that had she killed the Wicked Enchanter in pretty much any other way she would have turned a blind eye and done what she could to cover.

The worst part though?

Red Axe never presented any alternative. She just told Cat she had to do better. As if her principles would absolve her of responsibility for whatever fallout there might be of the T&T collapsing.

And all I see from you is more of the same.

Linnus42

Do you really expect a random farm girl in a what medieval setting to be able to hammer out the complex issues that make up the Truce and Terms and Grand Alliance?

sengachi

Alright, I'm gonna talk more about Hanno, because godsdamn this chapter inspires essays.

I think I've finally put my finger on the key hypocrisy of Hanno's arguments this last chapter. Which is that he insists on rhetorically treating Cat's position as one thing, but then by his actions treats her completely differently, and he's not actually prepared to deal with a Cat who is what he claims he is.

Because his actions treat her as this reasonable person who actively restrains the worst impulses of the Evil side. He treats her as someone who would rather take a loss than blow up the Grand Alliance when they're fighting the Dead King. He takes it for granted that she'll have already figured out all the political stuff, so there won't be any messy fallout from her actions. He assumes she'll be reasonable and, working from that assumption, takes it as license to be unreasonable.

Like, she is a freaking Evil ruler descending from the sky in a dark tower to eat an artifact of Good, and he takes it totally for granted that he can walk into her tower, kick her ass, take the artifact, and that she will accept the loss, keep fighting alongside him, and even actively soothe over political consequences of the fight. Like, holy shit, there are precious few Heroes in this story who could be so blithely assumed to be so compromising about that. Maybe none who would be so if it was a Villain that did that to them.

But the thing is, his moral license to take shit from her and push her around is that she's in the position of being the Representative of Evil and he has no fucking idea what he would do if she actually was that. His whole plan for confronting her is based on her not being the thing he paints her as. So when she says, "haha, no, fuck you, I refuse to be the reasonable one who compromises, I have the power here, you compromise" ... he has no plan.

Hanno, the guy whose whole schtick is being the uncompromising champion of Good, doesn't actually have any fucking clue what to do with Evil that can choose not to compromise with him and still win.

It's, you know, a bit of a problem with his ideology.

ninegardens

On the one hand, I agree with this, on the other hand, Cat repeatedly REPRESENTS her position in one way, while actually her position is another.

For example now: She went out of her way to land a flying fortress, attack the book of some things, and paint 50 ft high letters of fire saying "Dungeon fortress, Oh no, heroes better not enter".

And then afterwards she captures Hanno and is all like "Dude, why you invading my fortress? You being a dick and trying to illegally steal my mystical artifact?" Which would... like... ring a lot less hollow if that wasn't the entire point of her actions.

Like, if I put a sign on my house saying "Secret pitfighting ring", and then stand around in a boxing ring downstairs, and then put my fists up when people enter, I don't really have the right to complain if someone throws a punch at me.

And to be clear- this isn't here MAIN argument, but I totally don't blame Hanno for not always taking Cat seriously, when she has consistently proven that she is a lying liar who lies. Cat is a crazy person pretending to be a reasonable person pretending to be a crazy person (or maybe its R->C->R->C->R, who knows). About half the shit that she is saying and doing here is deliberately sarcastic and arguing in bad faith, in that she is putting on a show of being an asshole and then throwing that back in Hanno's face as "Your stuff is similar."

... but like... if you are going out of your way to pretend to be an asshole, sometimes people are going to treat you like you're an asshole. Even if deep down they believe you are a reasonable person.

avandartheservant

sengachi, you have nailed the point that I think the chapter is trying to make. Hanno's hypocrisy is what Cat has such a deep issue with. The utter reliance on Cat being "good" without the capital, so they can pretend to be "Good". Heroes are not TRYING to end evil. They just want to ride a story and pay lip service to ending it. Cat and the Woe, and the Calamities before them are/were making a conscious, deliberate attempt at making the world a better place, using methods that the Wandering Bard and the Grey Pilgrim employ regularly.

In the comments some people seem to take it literally when Hanno says "Even the most vicious of us are trying to end evil, not spread it. You stand instead for rapists, cannibals and callous murderers. Our exceptions are your rule." THAT SEEMS TO BE A BLANTANT LIE.

Especially since Cat literally does everything in her power to protect people from evil and let them live their lives in peace, minimizing collateral damage; yet the HELLGODS have chosen her as their champion and most favored daughter?

Some of Below's damned barely meet any of those criteria except for "callous murderer", and the Saint of Swords and basically every other martial Above named definitely qualify.

Aside from being sponsored by "Below", what EVIL are the following characters working towards? Adjutant/Warlord, Archer, Hierophant, Barrow Sword, The Scorched Apostate, Forgetful Librarian.

ISiejek

Some people in the comments seem to think that this doesn't make sense as well as other arcs with the plot but I totally disagree, the reason the political problems aren't being spoken about as often is because the person who was put in charge of managing them is managing them! Admittedly there are some struggles and difficulties because politicians are arseholes, but the person placed in charge to manage it is doing their damned best they can, however, the guy in charge of the heroes is the one causing the problems a lot of the time! This means dealing with the bullshit hero "good "crap is more important, also in the case of many villains the villain he is not significantly worse than the repeated reckless "goodness "of the heroes.

Yeah this chapter was brilliant for me, the point actually finally in a very small way scraping its way into the brain of Hanno. Loved it.

Also because it makes me feel better to say it:
Hanno is an arse 😂

ninegardens

Okay- new claim for WotW: Anaraxes. All of Cordelia's beurocracy, all of Hanno's unyeilding idealism, AND a partisan of below. Everyone can get along with him.

jamesc9

In which case they need to resurrect Kairos to help steer him.

Interlude: Occidental III

"In the Free Cities a general has more to fear from victory than defeat."

– Aretha the Raven, Nicaean general

Cordelia was not certain which part struck her as more absurd: that house-sized herons dwelled in Arcadia or that the Valiant Champion had apparently tamed one.

"Is mine now," the Champion insisted. "Called Wizard."

"Having inspected it, I can tell you thatshe is in fact female," the Forsworn Healer note, his faint Atalante accent thickening the drawl. "Perhaps Witch would be more fitting."

How? she wondered. Is part of your Name to have magical bird taming powers? Is it an aspect? You cannot have been in the presence of that heron for more than an hour. The same heron that must weigh as much as a company of infantry and was nipping at the Levantine's shoulder lovingly.

"Wizard is genderless noun," the Valiant Champion smugly said. "You ignorant."

Cordelia's brow slightly creased before she remembered to smooth it away. The heroine put up a good front, but when she'd spoken the words there had been a glint in her eyes. Sadness, Cordelia decided, or perhaps regret. The Lycaonese princess had long wondered how much of that cheerful brutishness was a mask. Rafaella of Alava often acted like a lout, but it had not made Cordelia forget that she was both one of the longest-serving heroes and a survivor of several disastrous engagements. The Healer narrowed his eyes at the Levantine heroine, visibly irritated, and the princess stepped in before bickering could ensue.

"We need to get moving," Cordelia cut in. "I understand that five is the preferred number for a band of -Named and now we have five heroes gathered here. The tower awaits."

The Kingfisher Prince, the Valiant Champion, the Forsworn Healer, the Painted Knife and the Mirror Knight. It would have to do. Hopefully Cordelia had changed Chosen for Named quickly enough that no one had noticed the stumbling of her tongue. Though her people's terms of Chosen and Damned were not wrong, in her opinion, they were used solely by her countrymen. There was no need to remind foreign heroes that she was a ruling princess of Procer, a fact that already did much to damage her standing among them.

"There is no leader to our band," the Mirror Knight said. "It won't work."

She saw him wince a moment later, both at the implied insult to her rank – which she suspected he cared more about than any other Chosen here – and the blunt dismissal of her opinion. He tacked on a mortified 'Your Highness' afterwards, trying to make up for it. She smiled gently at him to show no offence had been taken, patiently setting aside her irritation, but the damage had already been done. The door to objections had been opened and half of authority was people not knowing they could disagree.

"Agreed," the Forsworn Healer said. "We should gather the others, aim for overwhelming might instead. I saw Apprentice land in an orchard to the southwest, I think."

"I sent Helmgard east to join up with Sidonia and the Astrologer," the Mirror Knight said. "That's three of us, so perhaps we should start there."

"The First Prince is right," the Painted Knife flatly disagreed. "The tower is what matters. The mightiest army in the world will still lose the battle if it does not show up to fight."

Frederic glanced at Cordelia sideways, as if hesitating, then joined his voice when her face remained without expression.

"The Warden of the East laid down a gauntlet through her tower," the Kingfisher Prince agreed. "Refusing to pick it up can only end in our loss."

She would have to take him aside and remind him not to balk this way again, she thought. In this company he did not owe her the deference the Prince of Brus would owe the First Prince of Procer. They were here as Chosen and claimant. On the contrary, it would be to their common disadvantage should he obey her without reason: it would create the appearance of Cordelia trying to merge together the office of First Prince and the Name of Warden of the West. The fair-haired woman knew well that the backlash to even the semblance of this would be harsh and swift.

"So both of you go with her," the Healer suggested. "Meanwhile Christophe and I can head east into the hills. The Vagrant Spear and I can use Light to mark our positions."

The priest from Atalante kept a dark eye on her as he spoke. Watching for her reactions. He has been trained, Cordelia decided. The man was said to have earned his Name by swearing away a great fortune and position in the city-state to become a wandering healer, which would explain it. Was he a foe? It was too early to tell.

"Separating would be a mistake," Cordelia said.

A few surprised looks went her way. Not, she thought, at her opinion so much as the fact she was voicing one at all. As if she had no right to. Named business, she thought scornfully, and so only Named should decide it. In their eyes her claim mattered less than her title as First Prince. She hid the sharp spike of anger.

"Lord Christophe tells me that the Myrmidon and the Blood Sword fell into a lake," she continued. "The only one we have seen is far out west, so they are unlikely to join us in time. I have already sent riders with spare horses to make the attempt, but there is little more to do."

The Painted Knife let out a hum, face considering.

"The Warden could have sent any of us that far out instead," Kallia of Levante said. "If she chose those two, it was for a reason."

"Akatha and Gernot strong but no quick," the Valiant Champion said, petting her giant heron's head. "Swim slows them. Out of battle, like First Prince said."

Though what she'd said was true, Cordelia thought, that had not been the Painted Knife's train of thought. She was asking why Catherine Foundling had chosen these two Named of all those that could be sent furthest. And in her eyes, there was one obvious common thread between the two.

"Both are warriors," Cordelia pointed out. "She might lack fighters of her own and so seek to limit the length our shield wall."

"There are plenty of Bestowed in her service than can match us in a brawl," the Painted Knife skeptically said, then snuck a sideways look at the Mirror Knight. "Most of us anyway."

Cordelia hid a smile. The heroine had not refused her turn of phrase. 'Our shield wall'. One stone after another, she would lay her foundation.

"You've never had to share a front with them, Kallia, wandering around as you have," the Forsworn Healer said. "I'd bet the First Prince is right. If the Warden wants to keep this conflict amicable few of them would be fit for it. I cannot imagine the Red Knight or the Headhunter showing restraint in a duel."

The Painted Knife frowned, then conceded with a sharp nod.

"Her strength must be indirect," Cordelia said. "Mages and tricksters."

Which meant a swift, direct assault might just yield success.

"She will have handpicked those with a fight in mind," Frederic cautioned. "It would be dangerous to assume weakness."

It would be even more dangerous to linger, in her mind. Christophe de Pavanie turned to her, mien serious.

"He's right, Your Highness," the Mirror Knight said. "The tower itself will be hard to breach regardless of defenders. We were baited in last time but now the Warden will truly defend it. I won't claim we need every Chosen we brought, but we should at least find Adanna."

The Blessed Artificer's name, a woman whose mastery of Light would admittedly be a boon when facing Night. It was a fair point.

"Do we know where the Artificer is?" Cordelia asked.

No one had seen her since the drop, but Lady Kallia had a guess.

"One of the mountains beyond the hills collapsed," the Painted Knife said. "I saw it happen from atop the lighthouse. If it wasn't the Mirror Knight responsible, it can only be her."

The man looked embarrassed but did not deny the conclusion.

"Then this will take time," the Forsworn Healer said. "Perhaps we should split up, at least temporarily. I am told you have a knack for finding those in need of aid, Kingfisher Prince?"

His eye was on her again. A foe, then, Cordelia thought. He was not simply attempting to read her, he had intentions she was being measured for.

"You might say that," Frederic smiled, brushing back his curls.

The Painted Knife stared at him, manifestly distracted by the sight. Cordelia sympathized. Frederic Goethal had long mastered the art of artless distraction and his disinclination to marry had been the despair of many a highborn lady over the years. Frederic did not elaborate and no one pressed. Cordelia had learned that inquiring in detail about another's aspects was considered exceedingly rude.

"Then you should ride out to find Adanna," the Healer suggested. "Kallia is a tracker of great skill, she can follow you into the hills and find the Vagrant Spear while there."

Cordelia's eyes imperceptibly narrowed. She knew the look in the man's eyes, the too-casual tone. She had dealt with the likes of it before. Frederic was a strong supporter and the Painted Knife had agreed with her on every broad stroke so far. She was also respected among Chosen, a captain of their kind. The Forsworn Healer was trying to send away individuals who shared her opinions. This is a trap, the princess considered. The man had offered himself undertaking that same task earlier in a manner that would be quicker. But it would split him from the group, which he would not want.

So unless he was a fool, this was a trap. Cordelia, unfortunately, could not grasp the nature of said snare. She still knew too little of namelore. Then I must flush you out, she thought.

"Your earlier suggestion of using Light as a beacon would be even faster than tracking," Cordelia idly said.

Triumph, not as well hid as he thought. She had read him correctly.

"I might be needed to heal comrades rejoining us," the dark-haired hero said. "But you are right that Light might be quicker, Your Highness. Christophe, can you still flare your plate bright enough to be seen from far away?"

"I can," the Mirror Knight said, almost eager as he looked at her. "It would be my pleasure, Your Highness."

He was after Christophe from the start, Cordelia thought. Aiming to send away to the two Proceran heroes present. It was a crude ploy but not senseless. Yet it was too small a prize for the effort he had put into the intrigue, she decided. What patterns of namelore did she know? Numbers, mostly. He means to send three Chosen in the hills and mountains, where three more await. Therefore not a 'band of five', which had been her guess. She was yet missing a detail. Cordelia did not know enough about the Chosen, what they could or could not do. She'd read reports and even spoken with some, but always as the First Prince of Procer.

She did not know them, had never been one of them. That was Hanno's strength and her weakness.

"No good to fight tower then," the Valiant Champion bluntly spoke up. "Archer there. Will fuck us up the bootocks if Mirror Knight not there to take arrows."

There was a general air at dismay at the prospect of fighting Indrani the Archer, even from the Levantines. Catherine Foundling's s lieutenant had earned the wary respect of everyone who'd ever seen her fight.

"Perhaps the time would be better spent fetching the Apprentice, then," the Forsworn Healer mildly said. "Kallia, the First Prince and I could ride out to get her. Perhaps even the Bloody Sword and the Myrmidon, as we ought to be close by then. The five of us can serve as another wedge of attack when they return."

So that had been the angle, Cordelia thought. The man did not think they would return from the trip in time and that was the entire point. He was trying to keep her out of the fight, away from the tower. He is buying time for the Sword of Judgement. His game was plainly revealed: he was a loyalist, backing his preferred candidate as best he could. The Painted Knife immediately disagreed with the proposal, arguing she was the only here capable of scaling the tower if need be, and when others jumped in every inch of progress that had been made towards a decision since the conversation began soon collapsed. The Healer did not look displeased by the turn, not that Cordelia had expected him to.

The hero believed that Hanno would win, given long enough, and so preventing a decision from being reached here was already a victory. Unfortunately for the Forsworn Healer, however, she was not a wet-behind-the-ear debutante. She would not fall apart after the first setback, and he had handed her the very key to outplaying him.

"Lady Kallia, you mentioned that a mountain collapsed," Cordelia said, cutting into the chaos. "Is this not true?"

"It is," the Painted Knife frowned.

"Then the Blessed Artificer might be in danger as we speak," the blonde princess seriously said. "For all her power, she is hardly immune to falling rocks. She could be in dire need of a healer."

The Atalantian priest stiffened.

"Is true," the Valiant Champion frowned. "Douka, you need to help."

So that was the Forsworn Healer's name? Interesting. Now for the further nail.

"And therefore is no need to further split our numbers," Cordelia smiled. "Our friend the Healer can signal the Vagrant Spear and the Astrologer as he sets out for the mountains."

"Five Bestowed," the Painted Knife appreciatively said. "A knife held back should we falter. A fine plan."

Cordelia received a respectful nod, which she returned. The Healer's calm soured.

"Arcadia can be dangerous," he said. "Perhaps an escort would be in order when I set out."

"It will not be more dangerous than trying the Black Queen's lair," the Mirror Knight frankly said. "And your going alone weakens us least."

Christophe stiffened.

"Not that I would call you weak," the Knight hastily tacked on. "But this way only one of us goes."

The Champion was still on the fence, Cordelia saw. In need of a nudge to tip her over the edge.

"If you have worries, I can lend you an escort of riders," she kindly offered. "Twenty should be enough, I would think."

It was a done thing after that. The Forsworn Healer glared at her darkly, cornered and unable to extricate himself from the snare he'd laid. His opposition to her did not come from malice. Cordelia reminded herself of that, every time she felt her stomach clench in irritation. Yet while power had swelled in the distance, the great tower of darkness pulsing as Named bickered in circles, Cordelia had not been able to help but think that this was everything she despised about heroes. The disorder, the aimlessness, the arrogance. The Forsworn Healer was perfectly willing to risk the darkness to the north getting its way simply because he believed that the Sword of Judgement would win.

Because he would not consider otherwise. Try as she might, Cordelia was seeing no thought given to making a contingency should Hanno of Arwad fail. The priest had simply decided to bet it all on the Sword of Judgement's success. Showing no hesitation in making alone a decision that might affect the lives of hundreds of thousands, if not millions.

Catherine Foundling did not play for anything but keeps.

"Let us set out promptly," Cordelia said. "The tower still awaits."

—

The Painted Knife was the first to approach her as they rode. The younger woman was not a comfortable rider, another reminder that though Kallia of Levante was nobility in name in practice she was no such thing. Coming into a Name had raised her to the higher echelons of Levante's hierarchy, but that ascension was largely decorative. All her power was personal.

"You have heard of the gathering that was to take place in Carrouges," the Painted Knife said.

It was not a question.

"I have," Cordelia replied.

She had enough eyes on the heroes and around them that there had been no question of hiding it from her. She did not believe the Sword of Judgement had even tried. Frantically setting aside the research that might yet save Calernia to prepare for such an assembly had left a bitter taste in her mouth. She'd thought to circumvent the matter entirely by going to Catherine directly, but the Warden of the East had proved reluctant. It had been frustrating, but Cordelia understood the reasons for the tacit refusal. Respected them, even.

But it had left her with only desperate measures to take, until Catherine Foundling's eye-catching entrance had rendered them all unnecessary.

"I was there when the tower parted the sky and the talks ended before they could begin," Kallia of Levante said. "And I will say this: in that swamp lay a dug-up dwarven gate."

Cordelia's breath stilled. Of course, she darkly thought. How had she dared to hope that the soldier would deign to live diplomacy to the trained diplomats? He was Prince White, beloved of people and Chosen, surely that was enough to give him the right to speak for the Grand Alliance and succeed where those who had practised diplomacy their entire lives had been stymied. The Sword of Judgement had not only summoned the heroes to crown himself Warden of the West, he'd been seeking their support to open talks with the Kingdom Under behind the back of the Grand Alliance.

Surprise had turned to cold, deep fury but Cordelia smoothed out her emotions.

"Knowledge most welcome," the fair-haired princess replied. "Though I wonder as to why you brought it to me."

The Painted Knife glanced in front of them, where the Valiant Champion rode to the side of the Mirror Knight.

"The Blood takes no side," Kallia of Levante said. "One of us stands by the Sword of Judgement's side, so balances must be struck even."

Hedging their bets, Cordelia thought, as well as keeping to a tortured line of honour. She thanked the other woman with a nod and the heroine peeled away, leaving the princess to her thoughts. Would Hanno of Arwad truly do this, Cordelia wondered? Risk everything and everyone so recklessly? She was not unaware that her growing dislike for the man was tainting her opinion, but even careful consideration led to the same conclusion: he would.

He would do it because it was right, Cordelia thought. Because he was following his principles. Because in the eyes of so many heroes, doing right was enough to give you the right. And that was the conceit that Cordelia could not stomach, because even the highest of Procer did not dare claim so high a perch. She came from a land where even royalty could be put on trial. Not easily and often not as fairly as it should be, but even the mightiest of princes could be put to trial. But who was it that called the Chosen to account, when they abused the powers the Gods had granted them?

Nobody.

When the second Levantine of their party came to ride by her side, Cordelia was not surprised. Rafaella of Alava was very much a partisan of the Sword of Judgement, one of his oldest comrades. It had only been a matter of time until one of those approached her on his behalf. Better her than the Witch of the Woods, whose importance to the defences of Salia made complicated to deal with.

"First Prince."

"Valiant Champion."

The heroine's long braid swung back and forth across her back, freed by the snarling badger helmet she held in her hands.

"I be blunt," the Champion said. "Will not work. You can-not be Warden of the West."

"A bold claim to make to a claimant," Cordelia mildly replied.

"You sneaky," the Champion said. "And clever, like fox. But you have no steel. So you can-not be Warden of the West."

"There is more to victory than swords," she evenly replied.

"Maybe," the Valiant Champion said, then flicked a look at the tower in the distance. "But Warden of the East is clever and has sword. Against her, you lose."

"Even if that were true," Cordelia said, "what makes your man better?"

"Hanno can learn sneaky," the Champion said. "You cannot learn sword. Not perfect man, but best there is. Peregrine would have been better."

"I disagree," Cordelia replied, tone cooling even further.

"Ashen Gods agree, is what matters," Rafaella shrugged. "Can't fight the sea, is why we make boats."

The princess's eyes narrowed. That was a Levantine proverb paraphrased: 'if you cannot fight the sea, build a boat'. It meant that one should make accommodations with the inevitable, make the best of what could not be changed.

"You want me to strike a deal with him," she said. "To exact terms in exchange for withdrawing my claim."

The other woman sharply nodded.

"No one is happy, everyone gets something," the Valiant Champion said. "Is politics."

"And if I were disciplined from striking such a bargain?" Cordelia calmly asked

"Should," the Champion said. "Mistake not to. Even if you clever way to Warden, won't work. Some refuse to obey after."

The dark-haired heroine eyed her frankly.

"I may be one," Rafaella of Alava told her. "So make your boat, First Prince."

Neither of them bothered with the pretence of a courteous goodbye. It was as if the world was hammering the nails in one after another, Cordelia thought. First the arrogance, and now the other side of the coin: heroes did not believe in rules. Even villains bent easier to law! After all, for most it had been a given all their lives that should they behave heinously there would be someone punishing them: the heroes. The servants of the Hellgods were often cruel and almost always selfish, but they were also governable. They were used to be governed, however indirectly, used to there being an authority above them – even if that authority was simple force.

Heroes were not. They followed their belief to the end, bolstered by the accolades that were Light and Name. Why should they doubt, when the Gods Above themselves gave them what they saw as a tacit nod of approval?

But you are not better, Cordelia sharply thought. Not really. You make mistakes too. She ought to know, having spent the last few years cleaning them up. It had been when Prince Gaspard's plot came out that she saw the heart of the trouble. The Prince of Cleves had tried to make the Mirror Knight into his puppet son-in-law, to use the hero's fame and power as fuel for his ambitions. In the wake of the affair being outed Cordelia had mended the break as best she could, and still the Firstborn had marched out of Cleves. Gaspard was forced to abdicate the moment she had the influence to see it done, but there lay the problem: while she handled the prince, the Mirror Knight was neither taught nor punished.

He was just... left to keep on going as he would.

The White Knight was meant to lead the heroes, had claimed that duty before Gods and men when he became a high officer of the Grand Alliance, but he had never taken them in hand. Cordelia could punish princes who schemed with heroes all she wished, had done so several times, but what was the point when no one punished the heroes who schemed with earthly powers? Again and again, a hundred small justices – proud, personal principles – had eaten away at the laws of the Grand Alliance from the inside as the White Knight simply watched.

The Red Axe had tried to unravel the Truce and Terms, to murder a prince of the blood, and some of the Chosen had actually agreed with her actions. The Mirror Knight had – him again! – mutilated a high officer of the Grand Alliance and was then let off with a slap on the wrist. The Peregrine had murdered an entire village of Procerans in his hunt of the Black Knight, and he had been influential enough that Cordelia had never been able to so much as chide him for it. Hanging the old monster, as he deserved to be, would have started a war. And the Saint of Swords, the first madwoman of the lot, had been the worst of them.

She'd been willing for all of Procer to burn, if the pyre might take the Dead King with it.

Cordelia had bled herself dry trying to keep the wall that stood behind Calernia and annihilation from breaking while the White Knight let his charges rip out stones without saying a word. Heroes hid behind their Light by claiming that holy duty set them apart from mortal laws and then, after rubbing elbows with those same mundane powers to disastrous effect, retreated behind that protection when consequences came knocking. One law for them, one for everyone else. And Hanno of Arwad did not believe that heroes could be called to account by anyone but the Gods, he had proven that much through his actions,

Cordelia had had enough. If no one else discharged the duty properly, then she would. And if the likes of the Forsworn Healer and the Valiant Champion insisted on getting in her way, she would sweep them aside. There was no compromise to be had with duty. Emerging from the boiling thoughts with her mind clear, sharpened, Cordelia's gaze found the tower had neared. They were close, nearly there.

"And now," the blue-eyed princess murmured, "violence."

They slowed when standing in the tower's shade, below the dark monolith whose darkness stood out even in the dark of night.

Cordelia knew better than to try to direct a fight between Named. Not yet. Instead it was Frederic who took the lead, sending the Painted Knife up the walls and assaulting the bottom of the tower. Even steel-barded wood could not long resist the strength of the Mirror Knight, and so after a shattering blow the three Chosen stepped into the dark. Cordelia would follow but not immediately. In the thick of the fight she would only be a hindrance, a potential hostage. She would be of use when it came to talking, not while the blades were out. Until then she would wait out in the plains, the moon high above and the roiling shadows all around her. It was a beautiful night, she thought, for such a dangerous one.

The noise of combat came from the inside, but curses and shouts and the sound of steel clashing, but as time passed it came from further and further away. The tower swallowed noise just as it swallowed light, Cordelia thought. The very nature of Night was taking, and more of that dark power had been gathered here than the princess had ever seen before. It hinted at the scope of the Warden of the East's ambitions. It has to be the Book of Some Things, she thought. It was the threat guaranteed to get the two claimants to the wardenship of the West knocking at her door and no small prize should it be taken, devoured? She was not sure of the method that would be employed, but the Black Queen of Callow was infamous for her skill at stealing the power of others and making it her own. Even her fearsome armies had first been taken from the Legions of Terror.

"Yet you do not believe in forcing choices where you can lose," Cordelia murmured, looking at the tower. "So what is that you gain here, should you not eat the Book?"

She would have a reason for beginning all this. Catherine was reckless, but it was a calculated sort of recklessness: leashed to her purposes, not allowed to run loose. Cordelia had first thought this was an exercise to make herself and the Sword of Judgement allies of fortune, but the longer she stood here the more she doubted it. Something was coming to an end tonight, she could feel it in her bones. Lost in her thoughts as she was, she did not notice it at first. The movement. And even when the tall grass moved, she thought it to be the wind.

It was only when the first rider fell and his horse panicked that Cordelia realized they were under attack. The riders spread out as swords were bared, two of her retinue immediately covering her sides with shields, but there was nothing around for them to fight. Only strands of shadow, of Night, rearing up from the grass to take men by their limbs and tie them to the ground. They could not win.

"Inside," Cordelia yelled out. "Send word that the Warden is attacking from the back."

Two riders tried, but the shadows caught them. Tripped the horses and bound the men. One by one her escort was disappearing into the grass, as if swallowed whole by coffins of green.

"Your Highness," her captain said with forced calm, "we need to leave. Now."

He was right. Fleeing was better than allowing herself to be taken prisoner. She nodded her agreement and pulled at her reins. East, they must head east. There were allies there. A heartbeat later a tendril of Night covered the captain's mouth, silencing the scream as he was ripped off his horse. There were so few of them left, Cordelia saw, only a handful.

"Retreat," the First Prince shouted. "East, get the other Chos-" Darkness.

Sinead

Great Chapter! And my guess that they would arrive to find Hanno on the ground is incorrect. Either he is still inside at the time of this assault (and they never make it far), or he had already left by the time they arrived.

Adrian_V

My own guess when reading the chapter is that he would fall right in front of them at some point, probably just before Cordelia was taken away

SpacyRicochet

I am still hoping for a 'Wilhelm scream' moment.

onedollargum

I'm guessing that Cordelia will be captured at the same time that Hanno is dumped out the window for symmetry purposes.

James, Mostly Harmless

The sad thing is, Cordelia is not wrong ...

caoimhinh

She is wrong in nearly everything.

She says that nobody calls Heroes into account and punishes them for their actions, which is factually a lie, as we have examples in the story from both governments and Named ordering, regulating, and punishing Heroes.

She wanted to punish Mirror Knight because of the ambitions that the Prince of Cleves had? He hadn't even done anything, Gaspard was planning to use him, but there's nothing that Mirror Knight had done that was wrong.

And despite seeing just 2 chapters ago (a few minutes for Cordelia) that Cristophe has learned and matured after spending time with Pilgrim as punishment for violently opposing to the execution of Red Axe and attacking Hanno, she forgets it right away and thinks that he wasn't punished at all. Failing to see that in both instances Cristophe had been a pawn of another person's schemes, and thus needed to learn how to not be manipulated like that, which he seems to have done to some degree.

Red Axe tried to unravel T&T, but Cordelia made the situation worse by demanding Red Axe be judged by Procer instead of by T&T as the agreement stated.

Saint of Swords was fine with Procer burning as a result of the Crusade, but who started that fire? Cordelia.

The only thing where she is not wrong is in regard to the Grey Pilgrim, and then again that's an example of influence and political authority, not personal strength. She couldn't touch Pilgrim not because he would defend himself and escape, but because Levant would rise to war the moment accusations were raised against him.

And she still fails to see how corruption and the abuse of influence is the worst thing in all of those situations, where ambition and politics were the roots of those problems and were also the main obstacle towards their resolution, preventing those involved from doing what was right or delivering justice.

Orby

Cordeila, I should note, hasn't read the last two chapters.

This is rule of law vs. libertarianism.

We have an outside, imperfect view as well. Choosing who you back for Warden, should be fine with a lot of thought.

daniel

> Cordeila, I should note, hasn't read the last two chapters.

She lived one of them and caoimhinh was quoting her own thoughts which she has since forgotten.

"Cordelia's eyes narrowed the slightest bit. That was more awareness than she'd expected of a man of his reputation. Had his time under the Grey Pilgrim truly tempered him? When the punishment had been doled out she'd thought it nonsense, just another example of the White Knight letting off his charges with a slap on the wrist after they behaved atrociously – Christophe de Pavanie had accused the Queen of Callow of cooperating with the Dead King before mutilating a high officer of the Grand Alliance – but perhaps there had been some use to it."

Annya

It was a singular, isolated sentence and context. I don't know how quickly and easily you change your mind but nothing about Cordelia speaks about jumping to conclusions and easily changing her mind because of an isolated moment.

daniel

That's a solid argument.

Fiction by the necessity of brevity deals with anecdotes so it's fair to generalise from them much more than it would in real life. I think in the context of the story of her (and Hanno's) implacability in the face of mitigating evidence is part of the Problem.

Ultimately, whether she's objectively right or not, in the fictional world she lives in we can make an educated guess that she and Hanno are both right and wrong and that third way that strikes a balance is the correct one, the story is really hammering that as the conclusion that's shaping.

I don't know whether the right-or-wrong of Calernia is interesting for others to debate when divorced from the real world, but that's what I'm doing.

Salt

I think it's actually pretty reasonable to find that debate interesting for this particular bit of fiction. EE as far as I can tell draws quite heavily from real world philosophies or schools of thought in the first place. Double whammy gives the story depth by borrowing centuries of development and makes for good discussion as well. I.E utilitarianism for Mercy, Deontology for Judgement, Poem of Force a la Simone Weil for Ranger, etc...

This is (as far as I can tell) rule of law vs divine right in terms of the aspect of authority, and moral natural law vs legal positivism in terms of flaws in the aspect of ethics. I'm inclined to believe it's intentional to at least some degree, considering how often character/faction perspectives line up almost exactly with the basic premise of major opposing schools of thought IRL.

caoimhinh

It's not really law vs libertarianism.

It's not like Hanno wants to let Heroes do whatever they want, that's just Cordelia's super biased perception.

They are two aspects of Law, and if anything it's Hanno who has enforced laws more than Cordelia, who went back on her signed agreement and made demands due to political considerations then got angry at Hanno for enforcing the stated rules that everyone had agreed on.

Cordelia wants to govern Heroes with vindictiveness, claiming that she will make rules that control them and punish them if they don't obey, but that's just her own grudges and hypocrisy moving her, besides, such an approach does not work with Heroes, and Hanno knows it. He knows very well that if someone were to try to control Heroes and attempt to command them through force, they will rise in rebellion against that and have the story on their side to end the tyranny.

Hanno doesn't want to rule Heroes, he wants to guide them, and we have consistently seen what his leadership is like. He is not forceful, he is consiliatory, a listener, and advisor. He is a guide and mentor, someone that other people look up to and respect.

And, when the time comes to bring them to heel, to stop them from getting out of line, he will do it, just like he did with Mirror Knight.

For all that Hanno is much more inflexible when it comes to enforcing law, he is more humane than Cordelia. Whereas Cordelia preaches about Procer this, Procer that, and hypocritically turns a blind eye to the huge mess that the members of the Highest Assembly have consistently made for the Grand Alliance, and for all that she claims to be planning to enforce laws, we have already seen that she balks at enforcing laws whenever it is politically inconvenient for her.

Liliet

> Red Axe tried to unravel T&T, but Cordelia made the situation worse by demanding Red Axe be judged by Procer instead of by T&T as the agreement stated. Saint of Swords was fine with Procer burning as a result of the Crusade, but who started that fire? Cordelia.

Cordelia didnt' start that fire. It was the demand of the Highest Assembly falling apart under her.

caoimhinh

Of course she did, Cordelia started the Crusade because of her own political objectives, and then kept it going because stopping at that point would cost her too much politically.

Come on, it's even in the Summary of the story: "*The greatest danger lies to the west, where the First Prince of Procer has finally claimed her throne: her people sundered, she wonders if a crusade might not be the way to secure her reign."

Liliet

I mean, Cordelia also thought it was the right thing to do
™.

And both of those are completely irrelevant to her WoTW claim.

Liliet

wait, fuck, i confused what you were replying to also you are right i thought of the demand to give over Red Axe

Lord Haart

TBF it was really decades of antagonism from Malicia that triggered the Crusade as much as anything in Cordelia's nature.

Was still the utterly wrong choice but it was as much due to Named as it was due to politics.

Flameburst

Except everything you said is wrong. Sure, MK was manipulated, but he still chose to support a plan to fuck over the people dieing to protect others, to steal a priceless relic from the alliance and to almost start a civil war amongst named, none of which he was punished for. Cordi isn't forgetting he grew as a person, it simply doesn't matter to her because MK is a criminal who is apparently above the law.

She didn't demand the red axe shouldn't be judged by the T&T, but that she also be judged by procer for the crime that specifically didn't fall under the T&T.

She doesn't fail to see that corruption and institutions were part of the problems, because she saw all of them punished for yheir wrongdoings. What galls her is that heroes aren't held to the same responsibility.

LInnus42

MK had never officially agreed to any plan to betray the Drow. You are trying to convict him for having a thought crime. Besides cleaning up Princes is Cordelia's job If Gaspard is getting that far in a plot to betray the Drow and its his idea that is Cordelia's department to sort out. Now the Heroes. He didn't steal the relic. He picked it up as a last resort during a Demon Invasion. Would you prefer he didn't pick it up and let the Demons destroy Arsenal?

It doesn't matter who Red Axe perpetuated the crime on. Any Hero's Crime is Hanno's sole department to punish. There are no exceptions required by the agreement the Grand Alliance made. Certainly not for Cordelia needing red meat to sort out Proceran Political Issues. Compromises are not required in this matter. Red Axe got the death penalty, she was punished.

Cordelia wants compromise when it aids her but doesn't want to compromise when it doesn't benefit her. Ergo she does not believe in compromise.

Annya

Because the compromise expected from her here going against their goal.

Salt

Compromise is by definition settling a dispute by making concessions, not by getting everything you want.

It wouldn't be compromise unless both sides (which would include both Hanno and Cordelia) give up on at least part of their goals.

Cicero

And Cordellia did compromise, with Cat. Because Cat was able to see her viewpoint, and got Cordellia to see her view point, and so the compromise of Cordellia "executing" the Red Axe's zombieified corpse was adopted.

Cordellia didn't get everything she wanted, nor did Cat. They compromised with each other. Hanno is the one that refused to compromise.

caoimhinh

A) Christophe didn't choose to support the plan, Gaspard's daughter was trying to sweet-talk him into agreeing, selling the deal as if Christophe would be ruling those lands with her by his side. And yet the last we saw he had not agreed to it. He can't be punished for something he did not do.

B) He didn't steal the Severance, he took it to fight against the Demons. He kept it afterwards, but nobody actually asked him to return the weapon. No crime there either.

C) He didn't almost start a civil war amongst Named, he had one fight involving the few Heroes's that were in the Arsenal at the moment and fought Hanno. And for that he was punished, publically chastised and sent to be tutored by Pilgrim while continuing his service to the war efforts because he is a powerful warrior whose value is undeniable.

D) Red Axe's actions specifically fall into the jurisdiction of the T&T because she was Named and she had signed the agreement. By the T&T, all crimes committed by Named are judged by the tribunal and the sentence decided by their representative, Hanno for Heroes and Catherine for Villains. The fact that Red Axe attacked a Proceran Prince does not make it an exception, and such a thing was definitely in the signed agreement, but Cordelia wanted to back off because it was a threat to the authority of the Highest Assembly. Catherine also stated how she could not let Cordelia have her way because it would weaken the foundations of the Liesse Accords if the T&T were not enforced. If it had indeed not been a situation contemplated in the T&T, none of them would have had a problem with having Red Axe judged by Procer.

Also, the Grey Pilgrim, the one Hero Cordelia could not touch no matter how much she hated him, was untouchable not because of his personal power or characteristics as a Hero, but because of his political influence and the support he had by the whole of Levant.

jamesc9

Re (D) above, I wonder if there could have been a plan that worked. Sentencing to Red Axe to loss of personhood under the T&T, and transfer to Procer, and if Procer mislays her still alive, we still want to kill her.

It would need a lot of explaining, the conditions under which a Named can be declared a non-person for the purposes of the T&T. It would probably have to be under the conditions where they were also effectively being sentenced to death.

TheCelestialEquation

Damn I started out reading your post sure you were wrong but you made some excellent points.

The Ignorant Student

Absolutely agree. Cordelia makes SOME good points about the arrogance of Heroes, but she actively hates them and doesn't want to take up the role of Warden so much as tyrant and torturer. If you ask me, Mirror Knight (odd as it sounds) is the best choice for Warden. He's a Named whose role is to protect and endure, he's seen the pitfalls Heroes can fall in, experienced the treachery of nobles, and actively works to better himself and correct his mistakes. He's not perfect, but he's a hell of a lot better than White (privilege) Knight, and angsty Cordelia (I can't think of a good pun but we all know what her problem is) Hasenbach.

P.S yes, i know Hanno isn't white, so before someone jumps down my throat I'm using the term because we all know what white pricked he refers to and that is definitely how Hanno is acting.

Bart

Spending time with the Grey Pilgrim isn't punishment – even if it leads to reform, it's a cushy vacation compared to what any non-hero would get.

And the Prince who would have used the Knight was stripped of all authority. A pretty fitting punishment.

Mincheriit

Thats the whole point of them both being claimants. They are noth not wrong. But its not enough to merely be not wrong, hence Cats making a play.

burnsy

I liked Cordelia as the Warden of the West from the start, but this sealed it for me. She's going to be the one to institute the concept of 'consequences for your actions' into the heroes, which is exactly what the Liesse Accords are all about.

jack

She's right, morally, but she makes a poor hero.

During the debate about who should go where, she was still playing politics instead of playing stories. For the raid on the tower, she was useless. Merely a hindrance in her own words.

Against the night ambush she couldn't do anything at all.

In the end, she's all talk.

So long as people can be convinced by words, she's great, but she's not a fighter or a leader of men.

She's not qualified.

willfultrooper

Not a leader of men? excuse me but what? When an attempted Coup occurred she managed to wrestle loyalists to her side despite the surprise of the coup. When she grasped the coin when the White Knight flipped it she all but earned the respect of everyone in that room even the White Knight.

Swinging a sword doesn't mean you're a great leader it means you can swing a sword. Augustus the First Emperor of Rome was considered a fantastic leader but he relied on his generals to win his wars. Queen Catherine the Great of Russia was seen as a fantastic leader but hardly won any battles. Winston Churchill was a politician and considered a great leader but he wasn't a general.

It is practically stated that both White Knight and Cordellia are both great leaders but just with different visions. I don't get where you think Cordellia isn't a leader from because since her first appearance Cordellia has all but shown she is a leader.

Frivolous

Yeah, I agree with willfultrooper. Jack is just mistaken.

Also you can't expect equivalent levels of contribution from a claimant and someone already holding a Name.

Rynjin

Cordelia is a terrible leader, in part because she has never LED. She has the same noble arrogance as all of the other nobility around her, she's just too blind to see it. This chapter makes it pretty clear that she sees everyone else around her as incompetent, despite being completely out of her depth. Say what you will about Catherine's ego, at least when she talks shit (or thinks it) she knows how to roll with the hit. Cordelia doesn't.

This chapter cinched it for me. Cordelia does not wish to be a leader, and never has. That's Hanno's bag, as imperfect as he is at it.

What she wishes to be, and has always wished to be is exactly what everyone in Procer has feared she would become: a Tyrant. She wants an iron-fisted grip over everything the light touches. She's made great strides on making that come true for the people of Procer, all for their "greater good". Perhaps justifiably.

Now she wishes to reach further and ensnare the Heroes as well, so she can have her own obedient army of superhumans that exist only for the will of the State.

Worse, this chapter proves that Cordelia is incredibly shortsighted. I've reamed out the Pilgrim for his massacre of those innocent villagers many a time, but summarily executing the man was something she wished to do? With no thought whatsoever save for the POLITICAL ramifications of doing so, like losing one of the most powerful Named in the world while they're in the middle of a direct conflict with what was, to her, a deranged psychopath with godlike powers.

She has time and time again proven that thought with her actions as well. Taking short term gains for long term drawbacks. Some justified (such as in the war against the Dead King), and many not. She's been trying to consolidate all the power of Procer into her own hands since before she took office, and I don't think once she's stopped to consider the ramifications of turning Procer from a flawed, corrupt oligarchy into a flawed, and potentially even MORE corrupt in the future dictatorship.

willfultrooper

Cordelia has never led? what are you talking about? She's one of the leaders of the Grand Alliance.

And guess what? Politics is a huge part of waging a war and I don't understand how you think being considerate over the political ramifications isn't being a leader. Strategy involves politics so denying the political ramifications can have on the war effort is really naïve. Have you not been reading this current volume? Cordelia and Catherine have been in talks with the Dwarves, the League, their own alliance members about how to keep the war going.

My previous post details all the leaders who would be a "Cordelia"-like leader.

What's the point of having a powerful Named if they refuse to obey orders? what if the war effort needed that powerful Named defending that city but he decides its better to defend that village instead? Cordelia wants oversight over the heroes where the White Knight puts his complete faith in them, letting them do whatever they want because they are "Good".

The reason why I favor Cordelia over the White Knight is not because I think he's incompetent or not a good leader but because PGtE all but shows that heroes can be wrong in horrific ways, William unleashing angelic mind control over a city, the Red Axe threatening the T&T (I am not claiming she is not justified in wanting to kill the villain but that she threatened the T&T), the Mirror Knight threatening the Drow Alliance.

I don't mind people supporting the White Knight their opinions are their own, but to claim Cordelia isn't a leader? come on dude, have you not been reading this fic at all?

Rynjin

As I said (maybe not clearly enough?), Cordelia does not lead. She rules. There's a stark difference between the two things, even if the concepts are sometimes used interchangeably.

She gives orders and expects to be obeyed. She would prefer not to negotiate with anyone. She does not set any good example for her people to follow, she does not inspire. She does not LEAD in either figurative or literal senses of the word. Her people fight her tooth and claw at every turn because she lacks their respect. The nobles scheme against her and the common folk find her out of touch. As we see here, the same applies to the Named she would rule over.

Certainly, she rejected the power of the Warden of the West at one point. Not because she did not want to bring Procer under her thumb, but because she believed a Named should not rule Procer. She has seemingly kept to that principle, given how she is arranging to throw away her rulership of Procer to take the Warden of the West mantle.

She still seems to have the same general plan for action as the Warden of the West, however. Consolidate power in the hands of a single person, because she believes she knows better than everyone else.

And that will have disastrous consequences down the line. As people have said against Hanno's side (and rightfully), just because Cordelia, or Hanno is a great Warden of the West using their methodology, that does not mean their successor, or successor's successor on down the line will always be so.

And personally, I think setting a precedent that the Warden of the West is a RULER of Named rather than a LEADER of Named is going to be by far the more disastrous in the long run of the two.

This is, in my eyes, the entire clash between Hanno's and Cordelia's ideologies. Rulership vs leadership, iron fist vs guiding hand. Neither is a perfect truth, applicable to all circumstances.

willfultrooper

There have been several notable leaders who've relied on the authority of their position in order to be a leader. William the Conqueror, Augustus the First Emperor of Rome, Catherine the Great, Otto Von Bismarck, Alfred the Great. Each and every single one relied on the authority gained through their position to lead their nations. Some of them even having people rebel against them.

William the Conqueror led an England with a large amount of Ethnic tensions which he suppressed with an Iron fist and still he was considered a good leader by history. Catherine the Great utterly crushed the greatest peasant uprising in her time and still she was considered a great leader. Augustus Caesar had to fight multiple civil wars because people opposed him, some of them even former allies and friends.

Each and every single one of those people relied on their positions authority to lead their nations and some of them were quite ruthless in enforcing their will and yet they're considered some of the greatest leaders of history.

Being opposed in their leadership isn't a mark of bad leadership, it just means not everyone agrees with their style of leadership. What a surprise, who knew humans can disagree with one another? A good leader isn't someone who doesn't face opposition, a good leader is someone who can face their opposition and still come out on top.

Also, Cordelia has negotiated for her position. Don't you remember how some princes were convinced by Cordelia to turn against one of the other candidates for First Prince? How she convinced a Levantine leader to turn away from raiding her lands to being an ally?

Cordelia is also quite inspiring, I mean Prince Fredrick is such a diehard supporter of Cordelia because he was inspired by her. She has the respect of a good majority of the princes of Procer and let's not forget Catherine. She's adored by the people in the city she rules.

All in all I think she's quite an effective leader, how is she not a good leader both figuratively or literally speaking? she literally does what most leaders have done throughout history. I'll be honest I have no idea about how she can be a figurative leader, if you could give me an example of how she isn't a figurative leader then I'll get back to you.

jamesc9

@Rynjin,

> Consolidate power in the hands of a single person, because she believes she knows better than everyone else.

Isn't the believing part of that basically a summary of what Heroes are?

Cicero

Except Cordellia could have made herself a tyrant by claiming the Warden of the West back when she was the only claimant. People seem to forget that arc, where she actually rejected the power of becoming a Chosen because she thought that the Prince of Procer (her) should be subject to the law too.

Rynjin

See above. She rejected the concept of being a Named tyrant, but still moved to become a more mundane one.

Daniel E

The more I read of Cordelia's PoV, the more I sympathize with her. That said, I submit for approval my own crackpot theory: After all is set and done here, she and Hanno will conclude that the only sensible decision is for Cat to become Warden of the West as well. She eats The Book and becomes ... Warden of the Weast! 😊 (or maybe just plain old Warden).

dadycoool

At some point last chapter, I started expecting this to all end with the Night succeeding in devouring the Book of Some Things, only for Cat to be caught off guard by the sudden surge and go "What just happened?" since utterly winning has never happened to her before.

Gabe Meadow

I think that just before this happens, the Rogue Sorcerer will arrive, tell Cat there has to be two Wardens, not one, end up revealing his true identity in the process of telling her why she should give him the book, and become the Warden of the West.

Hell(gods), he's already worked on the Book of Some Things with Hierophant, he would know how to use it to greater effect to begin with.

waffleblaster

Agreed. He has managed a group of Named before, he understands the need for compromise, and he has proven willing to deal with the more uh, "disagreeable" members.

masterofbones

Yeah rogue sorcerer is definitely the best pick.

He works well with the warden of the East, without serving her. He is a friend without being one of her pawns.

He is well liked among heroes, and has experience leading.

He is flexible in his powers, and is well versed in stealing power. Sound familiar?

He has the classic heroic tale of reluctant leadership. Additionally, he's very experienced in legal matters and diplomacy.

Zach

One argument against this is that narratively there's nothing clearly leading to it.

Also, probably more importantly, Names ultimately stem from some deep conviction on the part of a Named. Rogue Sorcerer has never demonstrated some deep desire to exert control over all Heroic Named.

Gabe Meadow

While that's true in the outward sense, we've seen him become steadily more and more frustrated with his fellow Heroes over the course of the past few books. It's plausible to imagine he's become disenchanted with Hanno's lack of effective leadership and maneuvering.

All it takes is the last straw to set off Roland exploding – metaphorically, not literally.

samshadar

That doesn't seem impossible. Considering the Dead King is free to pursue victory, why shouldn't Cat be?

ethericsentinel

Nah, the only possible Name in that case is the Warden of the Eats.

edrey

i really sympathize with cordelia, the lack of perspective of the bigger picture from the heroes is far too ridiculous. the healer is the perfect example, one thing is the trust you have in your leader another is being a immature and irresponsible person. even after the warden is choosen, the heroes would need to learn that their actions have consequences.

jack

They're both as bad as each-other.

She was playing politics against the Healer instead of trying to build a proper band of heroes to take the tower.

She's completely unsuited to lead the charge against the gates of Keter, and that's what the warden of the west needs to be.

She needs to learn how to fight and direct stories. Cramming The Book of Some Things into her soul might help, but not by much.

WuseMajor

Yeah, but...Cordy doesn't understand or even like Heroes. She fundamentally doesn't get it, so she can't lead them, she can only call them to account.

Which means that the Heroes will scatter and for an alliance against her, like Hanno thinks.

They're both, fundamentally, poor choices for Warden, until they get their heads out of their asses and realize that they both have failings and need to learn the things the other knows.

Nairne .01

EE is good at reflecting the real world in this story.

ISiejek

Yes thank you for saying it the hero's are worse than the villains in some ways, at least the villains know that they are 'Evil'

Kennedy

Cordelia sees what Hanno failed to see. Although heroes are in general better people than villains just because they're objectively Good doesn't mean every single action they take is objectively good, and therefore impossible to reproach. Heroes do make mistakes and need to be held accountable for them in the same way that had a villain done the same thing would be.

Salt

At least she and Hanno have one thing in common. They're both ludicrously, hilariously, blind to their own failings.

How is it possible to get so self-righteous about how Named are behaving here, and not see the parallel in how she treated with Catherine the Squire, back when she wasn't so deeply in her debt that the Kingdom Under couldn't dig her out? How she still treats looks down on even people like Frederic?

She killed tens, hundreds of thousands starting a Crusade, refused to treat with Catherine out of disdain for her lowborn origins exactly the same way as the Band of Five just looked down on her for not being Named, refused to compromise at the cost of other people's lives when Catherine bent her own neck repeatedly to sue for peace (just like a certain set of Shiny Boots), and even when confronted with it by Rafaella refuses to compromise on her principles while inwardly criticizing Hanno for refusing to compromise on his.

Royalty being put on trial? Doesn't happen, unless it's by other Royalty, and not even then if you're just clever enough. How is Royalty not being held accountable by anyone except themselves, somehow more responsible than Named not being held accountable by anyone except themselves? Is it somehow better that complete immunity from consequences comes from wealth, bloodline, and cleverness, rather than principle and mandate?

Honestly, the world that Cordelia wants is one where Catherine the Orphan never becomes the Warden of the East. It's one where the Squire is executed halfway through the second volume because her lack of etiquette and lineage disqualifies her from challenging the likes of Malicia, while Cordelia and Malicia drive the continent into ruin while pretending that there's any consequences for their actions.

Linnus42

Didn't Cordelia just acknowledge last in chapter one of this Occidental arc that Christophe had learned a lesson? Now she is ignoring it.

Red Axe wasn't even a real member of the T&T since she signed up to backstab before Indrani got to her via Bard. Also really Cordelia have some goddamn empathy. I don't think the Red Axe made the right choices but I can see why a girl who got raped and saw their whole village massacred for * and giggles would think the system is corrupt and needs tearing down. She has severe mental trauma and one cannot expect a village girl in roughly medieval setting to be up to date on geopolitics.

Is Hanno losing three fingers really maiming? But beyond that Christophe had never even agreed to the Gaspard plot to backstab the Drow. Is Cordelia suggesting we charge him for thought crimes on that one? Also its amazing she is more salty about Chris cutting off three fingers than Hanno.

As for Tariq, Cordelia fails to acknowledge her plan would have burned Black and the Legions to death in a city which would have killed even more civilians then Tariq's plan. She thinks Tariq should be held to account for his crimes. My question is does she think she should stand trail for burning a whole city to the ground with civilians inside? And its not like her plan was operational yet. I am going to take the plan that kills less people personally as tragic as it is.

Saint was right about Procer it is a corrupt cesspool even her solution is terrible but she only got the chance to try that as you note because Cordelia started the crusade. A crusade she started purely for political reasons. A crusade where some Princes final solution to Praes was GENOCIDE.

What punishment did Cordelia handout to all the Princes she heard them cheating their Taxes during the Apocalypse? Absolutely nothing. She also stopped Hanno from killing a bunch of Holies and Conspirators? Did she give them harsh punishments? I don't think so. She claims she dealt with Gaspard but what her plan before Arsenal Went Down? I seem to remember her having none and stonewalling Cat and Sve Noc. Now one can argue well we cannot toss out all the leadership during a crisis. Which is fine but Cordelia doesn't apply that to Heroes who are worth their weight in gold in this current fight.

Laws don't really restrict, constrain or limit the powerful. Be they rich entitled princes or Heroes chosen by the Gods Above. For a whole host of reasons they keep commoners in line but not the powerful. Which Cordelia should know given all the coups, tax fraud, etc the Princes pull.

aurikdomi

Christophe was going to kill Hanno if he didn't surrender his position of authority to him iirc, and it was only Hanno's badassery that turned that down into only 3 fingers. the city was planned to be evacuated but not until the last moment so as to not tip their hand iirc, and Saint thought every last thing about Procer was worth utterly destroying so she could let other people build in the ashes something that might theoretically be better I.E. hoping the power vacuum would be better, and it wasn't just procer she wanted to burn, she wanted Callow and possibly quite a bit more. She punished those cheating taxes she could, but also they aren't exactly paragons of evil by pulling their resources and money back to protect their own people. Weak and cowardly but those aren't vile actions like slaughtering an entire town of innocents with the sword or a death plague. she completely ruined the holies? most were made to go serve on the frontlines fighting the dead king, large swathes of their properties and wealth were confiscated and used to help fight the dead king, and their political power was unmade. She had to be careful with Gaspard because she isn't trying to be a tyrant who immediately beheads those who plot against her, but he definitely got his comeuppance.

Cordy acknowledges the rich and powerful are hard to give consequences to but not impossible, her claim is Hanno intends to keep it impossible for Good Named to be held accountable.

Linnus42

But Named do get held accountable.
Saint and Red Axe are dead. Also Saint only got a chance to implement her policy because Cordelia started the Crusade for purely political reasons domestically. Tariq didn't get prosecuted because it was both a Name and Political Issue. And Cordelia's solution was worse anyway. If Tariq had the same position in Levant and didn't have a name but poisoned the water supply or something, he still could have skated.

As for Chris, go reread Hanno explicitly did what he did to prevent MK from getting executed.

Also there are still fighting a war against extinction so kinda cannot afford to simply execute or handout long prison terms laissez faire to Named.

Your assuming they dodged Taxes for good reasons. That is not confirmed in the text. The Heroes also make their choices cause they think its the right or good move so its the right or good move is not a great defense that you seem to think it is. Unless you want to apply it consistently.

Vortex

I would argue that Cordelia's crusade was a necessity for governance, aimed specifically at uniting her allies and enemies in Procer against her ultimate antagonist, the Empress who had been funding a brutal civil war for decades. Cat getting run over by the crusade in Callow was just collateral damage.

Unfortunately, her crusade made Cat desperate and gave Malicia, Cat, and most importantly, the Wandering Bard, leverage to unleash the Dead King.

Salt

This wasn't the case at all, you're misremembering.

It's mentioned outright in volume 4 chapter 3 that the army invading callow was almost entirely Cordelia's opposition in the assembly. It wasn't an attempt to unite her enemies and allies, it was a blatant attempt to bleed her enemies on the highest assembly by sending them war on Callow. It's also mentioned that she did this as a means to get around the fact that they were her checking her power over Procer.

The negotiations also failed partly because Cordelia wanted to dethrone Catherine specifically. Exact quote out or Cordelia's own mouth:

> "A villain ruling over Callow is not an acceptable outcome for this war", the first prince said. ...'

The war wasn't morally justified, it was very specifically a politically motivated move, she had other options, and she deliberately torpedoed the negotiations with Catherine because she didn't want a Villainous "warlord" like her to stay in power.

Even if all of the above weren't true, it still wasn't some defensive reaction to a one sided Malicia scheme. Cordelia was doing the same in Praes, and outright admitted at the arsenal that she indirectly bankrolled the Doom of Liesse in the process

Meaning that the largest unnecessary war and cause of in the story prior to the Dead King himself was started by her for political reasons, and the largest genocide in the story prior to the Dead King bankrolled by her for entirely political reasons.

Both of which she accomplished specifically by actively circumventing the very same Proceran Laws that were supposed to check her own power so one person wouldn't be able to wield the power of the entire nation this way. She has a lot to answer for, which she never has even considered allowing herself to be put on trial for, and she spent most of the story undermining the legitimacy of the same laws that she believes should govern all of Good.

Linnus42

Yeah the difference between Hanno and Cordelia is Hypocrisy/Elitism really.

Cordelia is a major cause for a whole lot of crisis and takes little to no accountability for it. Sure Hanno caused some issues but the difference is he didn't notice he was. Even if yeah he should have.

She also likes laws and compromise so long as they benefit her. She is not pro compromise and law when it doesn't aid her. She says as much in her internal monologue in this chapter. But that makes her mostly the same as all the other Princes besides like Rozala, Otto and Frederic lol. So the vast majority of the Princes have that issues.

Further more you can say Hanno thinks Heroes are special but by the rules of the world they are as confirmed by the Gods (who aren't abstract in this world but confirmed). Cordelia thinks Princes are special because? Well she was born into that special class and so has a vested interest in protecting them.

But honestly my biggest question about this world is the level of political theory. States don't really constrain the Elites, the same way they constrain normal citizens. Any analysis of what happens when a rich person and poor person breaks the same law tells you this much. Its also true in Procer where we see how much stuff Princes getaway with Cordelia included but Cordelia never acknowledges this issue. The Heroes and Named really are just another class of Elites. Except the prime contributor for most of them where they are, is not being born to the right family. There are more of meritocracy.

Then there is a fundamental issue. Heroes are a response to failures in the system which is why they are liable to challenge existing Laws. They also serve as the only reliable check I have seen on Princely abuses in this series. Ergo Cordelia has the same issue Hanno does but much worse, she lacks the personal power to check Heroes and doesn't have the support of strong enough Name to do it either. Which is the only way her system would work but that works for Cat because Villains are inclined to bow before Power. Heroes though are used to helping or being the underdog a lack of power isn't going to deter them the same way. Power is more to bring them to heel as a last resort not a fundamental part of governing.

kinigget

Okay, so, while Cordelia definitely does have her problems, hypocrisy is decidedly not one of them. All the things the guy above mentioned happened 5 or more years ago at this point. Today's Cordelia is not that person any more, and judging her that way does her a disservice.

Cordelia doesn't think Princes are special, what she thinks is that Heroes aren't, that they need to have accountability to someone other than themselves and the God's Above so that things like Saint of Swords deciding that it would be For The Best if Procer burned to the ground and then trying to make that happen.

You also seem to have some fundamental misconceptions about what Heroes are and how they function. They're not responses to flaws in the system, they're just those empowered by the God's Above, directly or otherwise. They seek out what they perceive to be Wrongs and Right them. Sometimes it's as you say and they go up against corrupt nobles and unjust laws, but you also have people like Christoph, who was a nationalistic bag of dicks up until Hanno had to punt him for trying to destabilize the Truce and Terms.

Heroes are Good, but that's not the same as good.

Salt

Well, yes and no. There's a reason they're both lacking as claimants

The Mirror Knight and Pilgrim changed too, and their crimes were in the past. But Cordelia still wanted to put them on trial, because that's how universal accountability works – you can't just claim that you've had character development or that it's old news and never face consequences for your actions.

She's not wrong about that. Her sentiment there is correct. But that's also where the problem is – she doesn't apply it to herself or to her fellow rulers.

Where it gets hypocritical is not also having plans to hold herself and princes to the same standard. Her being better now and the Crusade being in the past shouldn't absolve her or the other princes of the accountability of being put on trial any more than Tariq or Christophe. In that, she's the poster girl for hypocrisy.

More importantly, she still doesn't recognize that how well the law functions in practice and how closely aligned it is with the original intent of the law, matters just as much as having everyone under its authority and following it in letter. This has always been her failing, and it shows blatantly here in how she outright disregards whether or not the Proceran legal system actually functions properly, in favor of focusing on whether or not everyone is under its authority.

The most telling, recently-applicable and not a "it's five years ago so it doesn't count" example is the Arsenal itself. The only person in those trials that cared about the universal and fair applicability of the law under the terms was Hanno, or all people, not Cordelia. Cordelia plotted with Cat to circumvent the legal process to get the outcomes that she wanted, while Hanno held everyone's feet to the fire to ensure that the trial actually functioned the way it should, according to both the letter AND intent of said universally-applicable law.

Heroes aren't always good, and need to be held accountable, but putting them under the authority of a system or person who's just as or more flawed than the Heroes just makes the situation even worse.

masterofbones

If your nation's survival requires running roughshod over every innocent country on the continent, that isn't actually an argument for why your country's way is morally superior.

dadycool

Yeah, I think a lot of people, myself included, forget what Cordelia was like before this war. Her being First Among Princes simply means she's the worst of the lot. Honestly, Cat very well could've let Procer rot and essentially nothing of value would've been lost.

Konstantin von Karstein

Except maybe the biggest contributor of men and resources to the war?

shikkarasu

Yeah... Procer's royalty may be pretty messed up, but they have been keeping the Dead King and Chain of Hunger in check for centuries. Not to mention the subjects are not guilty of their leaders' decisions. I feel this statement hard, and we all get to be salty about Procer's actions up until the Everdark, but there is a lot more to the country than their bloodthirsty and pompous upper class.

Xinci

The only ones who can take credit for that are the Lycaonese. They are basically a sacrificing subgroup of Procer in total. With their demise, the rest of the maledictions of Procer have no supporting institution to mitigate their tendency to muck everything up. Procer was only fine before now because the matters of the south didn't actually matter for defending the rest of it.

masterofbones

I find that surprising honestly. Her personality never changed. She has, from day one, followed the script of "oh I'd love to be reasonable, but politics you know? I have to stab you in the back for no reason, its the rules"

dadycool

I think the difference is perspective. Before the Everdark, we were at the stabby end, but it's been so long since she realized what an asset Cat is that we've forgotten that she does it. Especially since we only hear the successful result of her keeping the other Princes in line.

avandartheservant

Want to comment on this part "Royalty being put on trial? Doesn't happen, unless it's by other Royalty, and not even then if you're just clever enough." Which would be true if it wasn't for the Regicide – Saint even killed princes, and was beyond the consequences. Which implies that Named are superior to Royalty, and what offends Cordelia and bothers me, is no one agreed to that. What Cat has as Warden of the East is a balance between secular and named power, with both subject to her oversight, with consequences for both spelled out.

A separate point – Cat could see the “mote” of Viv as Princess, a Chosen name – because she has secular power in the east. How are Cordelia or Hanno going to handle having a Damned name under their purview in the west?

laguz24

Yes, but I also love how blind she is to the problem of the princes that she has to wrangle. Since some princes can dodge laws. Who will wrangle the schemers after she is gone?

Linnus42

Its not just that they are dodging Laws. Its that they are doing it in the most dire of circumstances

If you are not going to pay your taxes when DK is threatening you with extinction. Are you ever paying your taxes?

Konstantin von Karstein

I guess that's what Cat will be addressing.

Insanenoodlyguy

“I may be one,” Rafaella of Alava told her. “So make your boost, First Prince.”

topwebfiction.com/listings/a-practical-guide-to-evil

letouriste

So next chapter we get Cat mashing out Cordelia until she tear up and then, as both her and dear Hanno are not good enough, she meld them together in an amazing chimera hating itself.

Then Frederic get free of his loyalty spell and claim the Warden title while everyone else is vomiting by the simple fact he's the only one present barely capable to match Cat both in wits, force and conviction (on the Heroic side)

caoimhinh

Honestly, Rozala should take the Name of Warden of the West.

She is both princess and general, and has ample experience dealing with both scheming politicians and Named, she is able to push aside her personal feelings for the betterment of the realm and work alongside the woman who killed her mother, and still has strong enough principles that she made an oath binding her whole bloodline to rise in rebellion should the Principate stab their allies in the back once this mess is over.

She is not perfect, and neither is she Catherine's equal, but she is a great middle point between the two extreme points that are Hanno and Cordelia and can still use them both as support and advice in the matters to come.

IDKWhoitis

While I am still partial to Freddy, Rozy wouldn't be much worse...

But until now, Rozy has been completely off the stage, she's not nearby or shown an inch of interest in dealing with heroes. Philosophically, she's not that far off from being an ok candidate, but narratively I don't see it coming through.

Linnus42

Rozala has been offscreen for too long even if she does have that sword in the hill trigger but she left field at this point especially with EE saying the resolution to this plot is soon.

Frederic has been a sniveling yes man with less independent though than Christophe. He has DQ himself more than once in my book but is Crystal Clear in this issue.

I don't think there is a third option from Good/Heroes in the West. Either they share, one wins or the position gets cancelled in my book.

IDKWhoitis

I can agree that the position gets cancelled is quite likely, maybe with a trap for bard thrown in for good measure too.

However, I can see Cat confronting the heroes in the Tower and asking them "What do you want in your Warden?" And let them pseudo-nominate each other. I don't think anyone is as crass to go "Me, Myself, and I" but rather as they talk it through, it can emerge that either Cat is the best option, or someone in the room is. Sprinkle in some revelation mid-fight of "Cordy? I tagged and bagged her like Hanno, you guys need to figure your own shit out or give me a good reason to take either one of them seriously."

Freddy hasn't been independent yet, but I don't think that necessarily disqualifies him, since someone who respects order and has restraint is probably one of the most important qualities to the Warden of the West in the coming Age of ORDER. Someone who can have principles but find alternative manners in achieving them, giving and taking in compromises. Both Cordy and Hanno were given opportunities to show their flaws on display, if Freddy's flaw is "Stand on your own two feet" That's by far the easiest to address in a chapter or two out of the other candidates.

Linnus42

Is he though? Sure he has some qualities of both but how much worse is he then either?

We saw in terms of combat that he is outclassed at Arsenal.

In terms of politics, he botched the whole Red Axe mess by not thinking about the politics before he gave Red Axe a free pass.

Sure in theory he can be a compromise option in practice though....

shikkarasu

I think the point is that he has a baseline amount of both sneaky and sword. He isn't perfect by a long shot, but may be better material for the Boat That Needs Building. I still like Cordelia (after Cat gives her the Talk) as my favourite candidate, but I can certainly accept Frederic as an alternative

Reader in the Night

I think the thing Cordelia is most blind to is herself. Who calls the First Prince to account? In theory, the Highest Assembly. In practice, she has been actong exactly like a Hero and forcing what she thinks is best down their collective throats for about 3 books now.

But I enjoyed seeing her attempt to learn Name lore, and will further enjoy watching Cat take her apart next chapter.

ninegardens

>>"Cordelia had had enough. If no one else discharged the duty properly, then she would. And if the likes of the Forsworn Healer and the Valiant Champion insisted on getting in her way, she would sweep them aside. There was no compromise to be had with duty. "

Lols.

"Oh no- named are too unruly, and will not be swerved from there purpose. They need someone to govern them, and I will do that. There will be no compromise in that duty".

I think this is one of the moments where we get to really see why Cordelia is a claimant for a NAME... but also why it is so self contradictory for her to have one.

Also, her get zonked so easily at the entrance to the tower: anyone could have seen that coming, and that the fact that she didn't, and got caught so easily really is a strike against her claim.

Like... bringing Hanno in was hard.

I love her. She has great points. But reading this chapter, I see all the reasons why she can't be Warden of the West.

nick012000

Yeah. She had a Band of Five to lead, and then she sat in the back and let the other four do all the work, and entirely squandered the gift that providence dropped into her lap.

Linnus42

Also I do find it funny that Cordelia is mad Hanno didn't compromise over Red Axe. When the Laws everyone agreed to said he didn't have to. So she is Pro Law when it favors her and against it when it doesn't which makes her the same as like all the other Proceran Princes.

jamesc9

I wonder if there are any elites who are anti-law when the laws favour them.

IDKWhoitis

The Champ had a very valid point about her not having a sword, she lacks the martial mentality to get one. That alone weighs against her heavily, because you can't depend on armies or laws to bend Heroes to your will. Cat's sword is hardly about the armies, its the manner in which she plunges into the fray and grabs victory from the jaws of defeat with a sickening crack.

That Cordy didn't even really get a conflict or even enter the tower realllllly lowers my opinion of her claimancy. Sure, claimants are naturely weaker, but so far down the list they get captured by plot points, ehm, tendrils of Night? Nah, that's Cat and the story judging her not worth putting her on the stage for a fight. Because how much does cleverness get you when you can just get speared through the throat by a Reverant?

The Warden must be at the frontlines, so Cordy will just be a liability in this war.

I'm really hoping one of those that went into the dark during this chapter gets it (I'm blatantly supporting ya boi, Freddy)

Linnus42

I mean Villains are also more inclined to just follow the strongest as well. But the issue is Cordelia has not the personal power or the support of strong enough Heroes to back her plan to rule.

Konstantin von Karstein

Maybe Cordelia will become a sort of Warden opposed to the one Hanno is trying to become, and make sure WotW doesn't need too much personal power?

Linnus42

I mean the issue is she wants to making sweeping reforms that are bound to be unpopular. Valiant Champion has already said she is not going to fall in line behind Cordelia. So without personal power or a bunch of strong Heroes willing to go all the way to back her to the hilt how is she enforcing any legal reforms? Ignoring the fact that Laws are not going to stop Heroes based on their fundamental nature.

So far she has her cousin who is not a combat Named but I suppose can act like a magical NSA and wiretap Heroes. And Frederic who is not exactly an elite fighter in Martial Heroic Terms. You can say she can rely on Cat for backup but that is probably not liable to help her support. Painted Knife seems to be hedging on either way for the good of Levant but there is a big difference between saying your willing to give Cordelia a shot at running things and being a true pro Cordelia Partisan. Willing to enforce unpopular edicts on fellow Heroes with violence...such edicts could flip people away from Cordelia or get them to stay Neutral.

IDKWhoitis

I present the only case study we have of such names: Dread Emperors.

Similar to Good Kings of Callow (which have been very opaque besides, so I chose the one with more data points) they don't take to the field sword in hand.

They have a chain of loyalties and lieutenants to manage different aspects of running an organization (country) and several named (Calamities recently, but history does indicate that a Black Knight, Warlock, and a handful of other names popped up too).

These sorts of roles depend on (at least in evil's case) managing the wants and needs of different keys of power (the high seats and factions). The greatest roadblock however, lies in that they also depend on an ideology that all the supporters subscribe to. Emperors also cheat, because they can afford to be in a shadow civil war with their own countrymen as long as they have the support of 51%.

The heroes have no such unified ideology, partly because they come from such different cultures and backgrounds, that creating a chain of loyalty becomes hellishly difficult without heavy factionalism. Creating those cracks within the heroes and T&T would make such a Warden infeasible. Evil can get away with it because the mantra of "Fuck you got mine" is so much easier to work with than "Do Good Unto the World" which has drastically different means and meanings depending on the culture we are talking about. Cordy would need not only Freddy's help, but also Hanno's and possibly Roland's to create such a chain of loyalties. And we know that half the people on that list already hate Cordy's plans.

Short of the Gods Above putting their finger on the scales, it would be difficult to convince all the heroes to follow Cordy.

Xinci

Cordelia to form a consolidated mega-identity basically, using interconnected information networks of pro-social values, information on events affecting Good to promote group action, and a net of interconnected relationships across cultures. A Hypothetically it would get easier the more consolidated the areas of Heroic activity get as Cardinal is made. So by becoming its ruler and managing the institutions that will support Heroes, she can get at least the foundation for consolidation. The formation of things like the order of the red lion can and likely will extend into a new analog in Cardinal due to the bureaucratic holes it will need to be filled. The formation of more universal codifications of behavior can be had by studying Heroic literature/axioms, the Heroes themselves, and forming diplomatic relationships with them. Which she will need if she wants to form a system of law for them that won't implode within a generation. The formation of diplomatic ties would be similar to her previous goal of forming positive generational relationships with other nations and Procer, this is just an extra-national version of it. It is a massive undertaking but is already within her goals...

BargleNawdleZouss

1. Frederic Goethal as Warden of the West – has experience as a hero, war leader, and ruler of large number of people. His “negotiating” sessions with Cat will occur with frequency! 😊 or

2. Cat as simply The Warden – she oversees all Named.

and/or

3. This whole thing is just a trap (or ALSO a trap) to bait out the Wandering Bard once again and give Cat & Masego another shot at her.

Further thoughts:

4. Who were the Kingfisher Prince, the Valiant Champion, the Painted Knife and the Mirror Knight fighting in the Tower? If Cat was staying at the top of the tower and if the Hunted Magician was able to fully heal himself and the Barrow Sword before the Heroes arrived (a big IF), that will still leave the two men plus Archer outnumbered, even more so with heavyweights like Valiant and Mirror up front. As far as we know, Pilfering Dicer and Harrowed Witch were not coming back, and Royal Conjurer may not have had time to return after fishing Blessed Artificer out of the lake.

Frivolous

Valiant Champion better be praying HARD that Catherine doesn't become Warden for all Named.

If she does, Rafaella will sooner or later receive an order, or be put in a situation, wherein she is guaranteed to die heroically.

Lying in wait for her to refuse or to avoid the trap will be beautiful and very convincing accusations from multiple heroes of Cowardice and Desertion. And they will think it is all their own idea.

IDKWhoitis

Hypothetically, when a villain is fighting a proper band of heroes, they get a power up to match the threat. So Archer + Cat + Maybe Mighty flanking could be enough to give the band a run for their money.

Also, it could have been an illusion played by Cat, playing the sounds of battle to disorient the heroes and get Cordy to walk in (lets be real, if Hanno was kicked out at this point, she was certainly watching the new cohort show up).

None of the heroes they have in that band are particularly versed in magic or illusions, so some degree of tomfuckery may be anticipated. I would also not put it past Cat to throw the Tombmaker at them to burn some time.

IDKWhoitis

Im looking forward to any/all of these resolutions to this shitshow. Cat really does seem nominally to trend the line between Hero and Villain often, but deep down she is a bit too far gone I think...Even then, the heroes sure as shit respect her, even if they don't like her.

Salt

Kairos actually commented on this when he looked at everyone with Wish. Found it hilarious that her deepest wish was PEACE, considering it meant that Below's favorite daughter was Above-inclined at heart.

Bad@games

Al im saying is the only hero good enough for this is the Rouge Sorcerer. Literally best boy

Adrian_V

Cordelia fails to realize that she has the very same flaws she is angry about, the difference is that her faith lies where her own authority is so she thinks the system works better in the end, what she is most failing to see is that heroes only exist because there is a grave need for them, basically they only appear when everything is going to shit or worse (by going i mean that they appear because there is still a chance to save the day but without them the situation is fucked)

Is like that epigraph where some king said that for every great good to appear a great evil must exist FIRST.

Linnus42

Yeah Heroes don't appreciate Laws because they are a reaction to some failing in society. They are like an immune system response.

Konstantin von Karstein

Not necessarily. A counter example is the Named Magistrate that went to Mercantis, and who was obsessed by the law. I agree that Heroes are often very good for the society they live in, but when they screw up there's no one that can make them accountable. See MK, SoS and GP. Now I'm not saying that GP's actions weren't justified (I don't think he would deserved to be harshly punished), but a trial by Procer were he could explain and justify his decision to judges, like anyone else in that situation, sounds more just abs could punish horrible acts that weren't justified.

Linnus42

Right but Magistrate is following those Laws because he believes in the Law. Not because someone told him he had to cause its written on a piece of paper.

Saint of Swords and was going to succeed or die trying so she cannot be punished. Unless you mean when she redirected the Crusade in which case I do not believe its illegal for Saint or Bard to make their case to the Holies on who she be Arch Heretic. Not agreeing with Cordelia is not a crime.

MK got punished for his brawl at Arsenal. Cordelia can complain it wasn't harsh enough but its Hanno's Domain. Much like I doubt Cordelia would be receptive if Hanno told her how to handle those Holies and Princes who were in the coup against her. The Gaspard affair, he never agreed to betray the Drow so that be Cordelia wanting a thought Crime Conviction.

Would Cordelia go on trial if she ordered a city burned with the Civilians, Legion and Black trapped inside? That was her original plan ad it would have killed more. Cordelia is mad cause Tariq didn't respect her authority not because she cares that much about Civilian deaths. I don't believe government leaders can just order atrocities committed in their country and claim legality as a defense. She didn't even bring charges against Tariq, she just stewed about because politically she could not afford to. Levant would revolt.

Which is really the crux of the matter you can argue harsher punishments for Tariq and Christophe but they are trying to win a war against the Dead King. Cordelia originally wanted to put Christophe in jail for a month at minimum. Now think about how many more would die without MK on the front...same for Tariq. They could be the difference between breakthroughs, mass casualties and Dead Named.

Adrian_V

Yes, the problem is context, in the case of GP if they went to trial on Procer nothing good would have come out of it, procer may as well have moral miopia as their hat, they have done similar things if not worse across history but since it isn't them is alright.

I am not sur ehow to explain what i think here but Cordelia trusts too much in the system and doesn't allow for individuality or circumstances, she also has too much faith in the ideals of Procer, from what we have seen the sentiment is a nice one but she is beating on a dead horse, and not 1 like zombie xD

shikkarasu

As anyone with allergies will tell you, immune systems can be in serious need of curtailment. They need to exist, but they can get some toxic ideas regarding 'doing their job.'

Adrian V

That just makes the analogy all the better, all we are saying is that the situation is complex and Cordelia is trying to minimize, tries to shift the blame on the other side and ignore the flaws in her system, plus her own patriotic spirit is blinding her, she needs to accept Procer is death for all purposes.

Miles

The problem here is that while Hanno was able to keep the heroes in check but unwilling, and Cordelia was willing but unable, the Warden of the West needs to be both. Other options here include Christophe – but he's like Hanno, maybe Frederick – but he's like Cordelia.

We don't really have a possible candidate who can do both things and whom we've seen here. Bard could do both but then she'd have to give up her current Name. Maybe someone else is out there dealing with the mess.

Or maybe Abigail will score a win on the front lines just in time to prove she's the One True Claimant.

Abigail For Warden. Thank You all for coming.

nimelennar

I know this is going to be a controversial pick but:

Mirror Knight for Warden of the West.

He knows Heroes make mistakes; he has made them.

He knows that imposing consequences is effective: he's had those consequences imposed, and has been improved by them.

It's been noted how much he's improved under the tutelage of Hanno (or was it Tariq?), and is no longer the brute force that he used to be. In this very chapter, he shows knowledge of name lore, leadership, but also humility and the seeds of some diplomacy.

Hanno and Cordelia are both unfit for the role; the Kingfisher Prince is too loyal to Cordelia to be a candidate, and while I love the idea of Warden Abigail, if she had any inclination she were even being considered for the role, she would break through that door to the Kingdom Underground before the end of the sentence reached her ears.

There is no best choice, but a Hero who can both lead and who knows that Heroes need to be kept under control is what is needed, and Christophe qualifies.

Linnus42

He has grown but they don't actually let Chris lead bands usually. And Hanno said Chris wants to stay faraway from Politics. But honestly Chris is a better Dark Horse then Frederic in my book. At least he has independent thought.

Abrakadabra

The Kingfisher has no independent thought? Fuck no! He has too many, and because He understands Both sides, that makes him hesitate to Pick a side. He is the understanding type, the guy WHO watches on silently and observes everithing, while the loudmouths (Hanno and Cordy in this case) making an ass out of themselves. What He needs, is to throw away hesitation and be decisive. That is almost the same kind of choice that Adjutant made. No suitable candidate for warlord? Then I will do it. No suitable candidate for warden? Then I will do it.

ninegardens

Mostly... I wish they had sent Christoph to deal with the bridge at the end of the last book instead of Hanno.

Christoph WAS at the stage of deserving to lead a band of 5. Tariq was training him up, and it was such a perfect moment to have it play out.

....I'm not sure I see MK being the Warden here... but I can totally see him being a powerful voice of reason in a dark moment, and that is... kind of cool, in terms of Character development.

Like... when he was first introduced, he was just "That low key racist asshole that Hanno was babysitting"

Linnus42

I think what Christophe is likely to serve as is a counterbalance to Frederic. You kinda want at least two Named from every region that can offer opposing views on the major issues. More of a Jedi Council approach though without the late stage screwups. So Painted Knife can check Valiant Champ. Etc for other countries.

caoimhinh

Rozala Malanza has experience dealing and leading armies, politicians and Named. She is lacking in the Named department, but she was still able to work appropriately with them and incorporate them into her military operations.

She has powerful principles, enough so she swore to rise in rebellion should Procer pull a Procer and backstab everyone once the war is over, but she is also pragmatic enough that she can set aside her hatred towards Cordelia and work efficiently for the sake of their nation.

To me, she is the most adequate middle ground between Cordelia and Hanno:

A princess, noticeably the only one who didn't squabble in an emergency and readily gave up her crown during the Princes' Graveyard. A skilled politician that made herself the head of the opposition to Cordelia one step at a time, and veteran general that has consistently been able to achieve success against ridiculous odds, with only Catherine so far outmatching her.

She can then use Cordelia and Hanno as advisors in her Role as Warden of the West.

Linnus42

The issue is more the setup for her has been lacking. She is a good compromise on paper but the setup is just not there.

I think people want a third choice so they are reaching for Frederic, Christophe and Rozala.

Then you got stuff like Cat getting both which works insofar as she the main character

Evgeny Permyakov

Relentless Magistrate?

Konstantin von Karstein

Yes, I support Cordelia but I can't see how she could win.

Tavar

I think Fredric is going to be the eventual warden, which will satisfy both Cordellia and Hanno. He's both royalty and well regarded commander of named. He's also bonked Catherine, which is parallel in its own way.

AbraKadabra

And it May be another loss for Cat. She forced the warden issue on her terms And the sacrifice She must pay is that She loses Frederick. She loses him to the position of warden And politics.

Reader in the Night

Now the real question is: Will Catherine strip Cordelia from the waist up then hang her upside down?

Because if so that's kinky, but I ship it.

Frivolous

I was going to ask that too!

Also, do claimants to a heroic Name get to survive being thrown off a cliff, or is that just for solidified Names?

RoflCat

Pretty sure as long as you're on a path to possibly becoming Name, you're immune to cliffing unless it's specifically against another claimant in a duel for the prize (in which case the cliff is usually extra lethal instead)

Miles

I think Hanno lost his Name a bit before the last time we saw him? Iirc there was a one line to that effect somewhere. He also lost his claim before she defenestrated him so I hope he's alright.

Silverking

Actually, I just thought of something worse.

Cat: Ah, good, you're finally awake. We have things we must discuss.

Cordelia: ...You didn't even bother to tie me up?

Cat: Why would I do that? It's not like you can do anything but talk, right? I mean, I suppose you could do a mad dash into the center of my ritual to try and snatch the Book of Some Things, but if you had the guts for that kind of gamble, we wouldn't be here.

BargleNawdleZouss

Silverking: this is how I expect the next chapter to open, with Vale summer wine or possibly aragh on a table between them. Definitely not tea, however! 😊

boballab

Naw nothing so pleasant as Vale Summer Wine, it would be that rotgut that Cat likes to drink.

ethericsentinel

Amusing as the idea is, Catherine won't get her preferred solution by such painless trickery. Her Role is to drag others into it (ahd herself be dragged into it) kicking and screaming.

shikkarasu

I don't see anything painless or tricky about the above suggestion. Cordelia needs to be confronted with her lack of hard power, and being told that she wasn't a threat worth preparing for will be the most painful thing she's heard since "Prince Klaus was among the fallen." Cordelia has sacrificed everything she has left for the Warden gambit. There will be nothing easy about the realisation of just how far she is from having a real chance.

Juff

Typo Thread:

thatshe > that she Healer note > Healer noted must weigh > must have weighed length our > length of our away to the > away the detail.Cordeliadid > detail. Cordelia did Foundling's s lieutenant > Foundling's lieutenant only here > only one here frowned. "Douka (extra space) therefore is > therefore there's live diplomacy > leave diplomacy made complicated > made her complicated to be governed > to being governed behind Calernia > between Calernia through his actions, > through his actions.
The was > There was but curses > curses
what is that > what is it

Anon

Disciplined > disinclined

Frivolous

I want to say that I really really dislike and despise Rafaela the Valiant Champion here.

She's being an asshole and a bully, telling Cordelia that she better give up, and even threatening her with disobedience even if she does become Warden of the West.

She's actually not correct. WoTWC may come with an aspect or something that gives the Name the power to compel heroes.

And even if she does disobey, who cares? She is dispensable.

I'd really like to see Catherine string her upside down, or maybe just have Indrani fill her full of arrows.

nimelennar

Don't tempt Cat; she'll actually do it.

Konstantin von Karstein

She's telling Cordelia she won't support her because she don't think she would be a good Warden. So what? Maybe the way she told her was a little rude, but there's worse flaws.

Yes, the Name could come with an Aspect to help control Heroes. Compelling them outright seems quite Villainous. But that's not a given, and could very well not always be sufficient (or a « nuclear option », like Speaking). Raphaella has a point when thinking that not being able to force your decision on the people you try to command is bad.

Why such hate? I'm not a fan of her, but she doesn't deserve to die.

Linnus42

Protag centered morality and cause she killed Captain and wore her as a coat.

Despite Black being the one who led unprovoked the attacks against Hanno's Team. Despite Warlock offing two of her friends. Despite her cultural allowing taking mementos. People aren't consistent on because there is not the same level of outrage when the Orcs eat the corpses of humans that seems like desecration to me.

Cat hates her so most of the famous does as well as anyone else who gets in Cat's way or Cat doesn't like for the most part.

Yeah an Aspect that forces Compliance seems unlikely for a Heroic Name to have.

But yeah nothing wrong with Champ saying she thinks Cordelia would be bad and she won't support her. I mean part of the reason Cat intervened between Hanno and Cordelia is cause she thought Hanno would win with the Dwarf Gambit and Cordelia would not lose gracefully and do something stupid. Somehow I doubt Cordelia fans would be outraged by such actions if their girl was doing it.

Also if Cat tried to kill Champ it start a Civil War that Doom everyone to DK.

Abtrakadabra

Now Now putting words into others mouth...

shikkarasu

I agree. I personally love Raphella in that "don't blame the one who survives" way. Am I salty that we don't have Sabah anymore? Sure. Is the Champion any less of a treasure for it? I truly don't think so.

I will always support Cat in her undying hatred, but she lost an Aunt. That's a whole other thing.

Eris

> compelling them outright seems quite villainous
Uhhh, are you sure we read the same book series?

Frivolous

Konstantin: I despise her because of this:

Heroes are supposed to be about free will, right? The earnest desire to do Good, even if they argue about the way to do Good?

Even though the Interludes: Paragons and Epitomes ended in disaster, I admired Hanno's total evenhandedness, even if it didn't work out very well and it took too much time as compared to Catherine's meeting with the villains in Interlude: Reprobates. He never even drew his sword.

And here Rafaella is threatening to disobey the Warden of the West if that Warden turns out to be Cordelia. It's shameful and I hate her for it. It's like the dishonor of the democratic process, insofar as picking the WotW is in any way democratic.

I also think it's terribly counterproductive. Heroes don't bend very easily. It probably just made Cordelia more determined to get her own way.

It would make sense if they were all villains and Indrani was doing the bullying. At least for villains might makes right. Also Indrani has better grammar.

Frivolous

To add to my recent post: It reminds me too much of an electoral candidate's armed thugs and goons telling an opposing candidate to stand down, she can't win anyway, and if she does, something bad will happen to her.

Thus I believe Rafaella is bad. I would take pleasure in Catherine's exacting vengeance upon her.

Hmmmmmm

I think the difference is that if they were electoral candidates it'd be a singular person, working on behalf of the other candidate, trying to intimidate her.

But it's not that and this isn't an election- it's an audition/job interview.

It's an audition for the gods/powers that be, where you have to show you can play the part, but it's more like a job interview when it comes to the other characters because if they decide you're incompetent then it doesn't matter if the big boss upstairs hires you, they're going to be working around you.

Then there's the fact that the Named are a much smaller group than the typical electorate. The Champion is a powerful Named with pull, so it's not really so much 'a goon marches up to the opposing candidate' and more 'the entire state of Maine has declared they will succeed from the USA if this person is elected.'

Like yeah, it's just Maine (no offence to Maine, it's a lovely place just small) but it still indicates a worrying split in the people Cordelia hopes to rule if they're so unwilling to accept her because they think she'll get them killed that they would side against her even if she wins the favor of the literal gods.

Could VC have been nicer about it? Yes. But failing to tell the beauracrat who now wants to be a military commander and vanguard warrior that she needs to shape up before anyone will follow her and they legitimately don't have time for that since everyone might die otherwise would be pretty dangerous. She didn't threaten Cordelia, she warned her, which is something that other people have been trying to do repeatedly if more subtly and politically mindedly.

I don't really like the VC, I find her grating and not in a fun way and some of her choises are...bad. But having the guts to walk up to the ruler of a nation and genuinely say 'I think you're about to get a lot of people killed if you're stupid, don't do that. We won't follow you if you do' isn't intimidation, it's someone Cordelia is looking to rule genuinely informing her that she doesn't qualify for that rulership position in the eyes of many of the Named. Or she was just being blunt, which is also possible. It's still not intimidation, though. 'I don't like/trust you enough to follow you to my probable death' is a very reasonable thing to say, and also something that kind of kills the credibility of anyone trying to lead Named in this world.

Frivolous

Hmmmmmm: I agree with most of your points.

I disagree mostly on the nuances and semantics. Subjective interpretation stuff.

In Cordelia's place, I would have definitely felt threatened.

Reveen

She's a fucking monarch. There's nothing wrong with bullying her.

Miles

Oh yes. I forgot Above aren't above a spot of mind-rape between friends and coworkers, and random citizens who happen to be within a couple hundred square miles.

308924810a

Okay, we've seen two Claimants get beaten. And Cordelia is beaten. Catherine knows that her primary threat is being able to talk her around to something, and as such should either avoid Cordelia, or put the ability to eject the woman from the tower out of her own hands.

Now where's the third Claimant?
and who?
A dwarf?

Jason Ipswitch

Akua is the third Claimant, unless it's Cat herself taking both roles to become a sort of Villain who instructs (but does not mentor) heroes. If this new Wardens and Cardinal setup is going to replace Bard's endless meddling, the Warden of the West needs to be someone who can match Cat. Hanno and Cordelia have just demonstrated that they cannot, and never will.

Akua is definitely on a redemption path, is unquestionably closer to being an equal to Cat, and has both significant story knowledge, significant experience with Named, and both a degree of personal power and experience handling rulers and nobles. If she swoops in to save the day, or simply gets chosen by both Hanno and Cordelia as a compromise (possibly on the theory that Cat and the other Hero will never accept it), then that completes it

On the other side, Cat seems like she's not entirely prepared for what happens if her ritual succeeds (although maybe I'm reading that wrong). But if it does, she'll very much be in a position to have "stolen" the mantle of Warden of the West. And her groove in Creation for stealing power is very deep by now.

And there's another groove that she's been cutting as well. While she's been careful to avoid anything that's explicitly mentoring, she's been instructing heroes for a while now: Princess, the Knight Errant (even if she tried to sucker him into killing for her), and now she's teaching lessons to Claimants. She's never going to be good, but she is effective at what she does. A sort of Evil but Practical Guide, if you will.

Silverking

I had theorized that this encounter was Cordelia's chance to finally ride a Story and see what all the fuss is about. Imagine watching her riding along into Named battle for the first time and seeing things...Just Work. This is the true reason behind all the silly rituals and the unwavering conviction: Above rewards Heroes for attempting the impossible by making it actually HAPPEN. Everything they do is based on this, and thinking that someone can become the Warden of the Heroes without understanding this is like expecting Hanno to take on the role of the First Prince: you just see a bunch of selfish short-sighted fools doing what they please, and you swing around your sword in frustration until you conk yourself on the head.

Instead, she makes the safe play, the smart play, and Cat shows that if Cordelia doesn't even attempt to be a Hero, then Evil doesn't need to even be clever to take her down. Heck, Vivienne now has the non-martial name of Princess, and she would have lasted longer than you...

Actually, that might not be a bad idea. Oh, not Vivienne becoming the Warden, but Cordelia going to talk to Vivienne about what being a Hero is like. Vivienne understands wielding both personal and political power, and she's a more objective perspective than the submissive allies or stubborn foes that Cordelia has been dealing with up to this point. She'll also be much better company compared to Cat's upcoming speech of "You're barely even a contender at this point! Get better or please stop!"

Sugar Roll

If the Herald of the Deeps is a claimant, I'll put my money on him instead. Hanno and Cordelia as they are now are both bad candidates.

Konstantin von Karstein

There's no way. His Story is very different, and even his Name has a very different « taste » than any on the surface. Also, no Hero would accept a Dwarven ruler.

Sugar Roll

True, it was wishful thinking on my part. It's just that there's just no one else, other than the dwarf, with enough influence to be on par with the Warden of the East.

Miles

I mean this is Above we're talking about. All they really need is a willingness to put in a bit of effort, a pretty face, and not murder their dad for the chance at a quicker victory.

Frivolous

I want and hope that Indrani makes a couple of wooden sculptures to commemorate this. Muscular sweaty Hanno half naked and hanging upside down for one, Cordelia for the other.

Brown wood for Hanno, something like Earth's mahogany, and yellow wood for Cordelia.

And then Indrani should show off the sculptures to everybody.

Daniel E

Something I've learned in this series is that the author loves subtle one-line callbacks. After rereading this chapter, Champion's correction about the grammar of 'Wizard' being marked with sadness prompted me to go searching. A few Google's later:

Heroic Interlude: Arraignment – (Hedge Wizard after transforming into an eagle and back again) “Champion helped her up to her feet, then clapped her back. Hanno saw the mage repress a wince. “Eagle trick, very great,” the Levantine heroine said, her tradertalk heavily accented. “Witch can have many rabbits after victory.” “Wizard,” Hedge corrected absent-mindedly. “It's a genderless noun.” The Champion ignored that as cheerfully as she usually did.”

Hedge Wizard died in Calamity III, along with Sabah.

ninegardens

Ouch. All the more poignant, because it explicitly says that Champion was ignoring what was said. clearly, she wasn't.

Miles

Wait. Shut up. Hold on a second.

Valiant Champion is the Heroic Idrani.

marillius

Catherine isn't just testing Corde and Whitey, she's testing all the heroes. Neither of the two claimants work and both are needed. If one wins they both break the Alliance in some way. Neither can serve the role perfectly.

Catherine isn't really looking to test either of them, or at least not JUST test them... She's given the opportunity for every Hero around to take the test too.

Dreamer

Comment section became much more judgemental in the last few chapters. As in judging writing – actions of characters. Anyone else noticed it as well?

Feels like some theories were replaced by judgements of Cordy here and Boots/Cat in the last few chapters.

Is it from the dissatisfaction of writing and that's just venting?

I used to love heading into comment section, but not so much anymore... Feels like it begun in Warden of the West arc.

/rantoff

In general seems like we have:

Warden of the west(territory) – Cordy

Warden of the West(heroes) – Hanno

Neither is both. Similar to what Bard wanted to do to Catherine. What's the solution? Not a single clue.

Writing this, made me think these are great grounds for Cordy to get closer to leader of Heroes than it is for Hanno to become leader of lands/princes.

Linnus42

First Fandom War? This always happens when a winner take all setup occurs between two popular characters. Though yes I am sure dissatisfaction with the characterization and writing also factors in.

ninegardens

I wouldn't take it too badly.

It's always our game to try to guess what will happen next. It just so happens that "What will happen next" is inherently about judging the character... not in a mean way, but in the same way as judging a diving contest. This involves examining each claimant's strengths and faults. Not so much Venom in it (at least, not in comparison to the Ater Arc, which felt far harsher... and I'll make no pretense, I was part of that)

sengachi

It's just two new commenters starting shit, I think. Hopefully they'll lay off soon.

Liliet

Hedge ;~;

Daniel E

She's in a better place now. Some place where she doesn't have a Hellfire spear imbedded in her face 😏 On a serious note, did we ever get a specific explanation of what happened to her sister? Or was she just killed between chapters?

Liliet

Wekesa redirected the curse Kairos had concocted for Captain onto her. She would have survived with Hedge sharing half the curse and it being not enough to kill both of them if Bard had not stolen the weight of that story, so instead she just died like a normal chump.

Daniel E

I must be blind, can you point me to which Interlude that happens?

Daniel E

Nevermind I found it. Such a brief few lines, blink and you'll miss it.

Liliet

<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2017/09/20/villainous-interlude-cadenza/>

Additionally explained in

<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2017/09/25/villainous-interlude-thunder/>

sengachi

This is such a fascinating perspective chapter. I totally get Cordelia's points and she's right, even as I can't help but notice her missing little details, like the fact that the Mirror Knight actually is improving. (Quite a lot actually, it's sweet to see him trying to do better).

But also ... holy shit does the end of this chapter make me realize Raefella is right. For the Warden of the West to not also be a sword is such a huge weakness.

Clmineith

I can't say who I would support for WoT. I don't know, really.

But there, I think Cordelia was tested, given opportunities, and failed.

Possibly, she could have persuaded the other heroes but she didn't try, instead playing politics. I'm not sure.

What seems obvious, is:

- 1/ She didn't try to lead the group of five
- 2/ She didn't enter the Tower with the hero, instead counting on her guard to protect her. If she had stay alone doing something (waiting as reinforcement, or else) it would have been ok, but she was separating herself from the group: one side with four zeros, one side with her and her guards
- 3/ The worst, in my opinion: "Fleeing was better than allowing herself to be taken prisoner. She nodded her agreement and pulled at her reins. East, they must head east. There were allies there". Just... it's how a princess works, not a heroin.

Cordelia intends to get a title and using it, but she didn't intend to live it.

Darkening

Would have been nice if there were a bunch of minor off screen incidents Cordelia could bring up here, those 'hundred small justices', to reinforce her point. Hammering away at those same 4 incidents is just kind of tired at this point.

beleester

Yeah, that's been my beef with this arc. Hanno's turn to antagonist has been mostly offscreen, and so has much of Cordelia's empire-management (for understandable reasons). The Praes arc was something we'd been building up to for six books.

"How does we fix Praes?" was an interesting and thorny problem that naturally tied in to Cat becoming Warden of the East. "Who gets the magic book?" isn't really a question with the same weight.

Eris

And isn't that just it? Nothing whatsoever about WoTW gives it near the same weight as WoTE has at the moment.

The story isn't revolving around a worn and weary duality pattern, but rather about a new Villainous groove – and a major one at that – being carved into creation over the span of a measly half a decade or so, and the Heroic side having to play catch-up with it.

Salt

It actually wouldn't even be against the direction the story's been going if there just wasn't a Warden of the West straight up.

One of the big things is that the whole Good vs Evil thing is just awful for everyone that isn't Named, and often still awful even if you are Named. Breaking up that directly opposing symmetry is kind of in line with Catherine's whole schtick about not being crabs in the bucket from the Everdark arc.

Symmetry in terms of story would still be there, considering the closest rival/direct antagonist to Catherine is currently the Bard more than anyone else. Eating the book of some things is an eye for an eye mirror to the Bard playing hardball by shutting down all the Below stories.

beleester

Maybe we've been looking at this the wrong way. Cat framed this as an argument of philosophy – what sort of person should the WoTW be? The hero who upholds their ideals the best? The one who's willing to bend those ideals to work with the other Warden? The one who's best at fighting the other Warden? Etc. But idealism vs cynicism has been like, the central hero-villain debate for the entire story – we could keep debating it until doomsday and not get a satisfying resolution, and the true answer will always depend on how much the plot favors you, anyway. Let's ask a more concrete question: What role will the Warden of the West play in the war?

Warden of the East was pretty straightforward: "Get the East in order, the hard way." Cat's role was to go into Praes, and either kill or dethrone everyone standing in the way of sending an army of diabolists marching west. There was a lot of complexity as to who got killed and how, but it was never in doubt that her mission was to lay down the law to villains.

What problem is Warden of the West here to solve? Procer is already in the war, the problem is they've been in the war so long they're breaking under the strain. People are giving up and bailing out, or demanding they get paid back for their hard work, and the Alliance can't afford that. Cat's strategy won't work here – taking the throne through violence isn't a Proceran tradition like it is in Praes, there are too many thrones to claim, and we can't afford a civil war anyway. What Procer needs is someone who can give people hope and convince them that things will get better, that if they just wait one more season it'll all be worth it.

Hmm. That sounds like the Kingfisher Prince, to me. Cordelia and Hanno both have ideals, but Frederic is the guy who can really sell a heroic ideal. That's basically his whole thing – “not all pretty things are lies.”

ethericsentinel

Agree that Cat's strategy, as presented here, can't work alone. But I strongly suspect that the violence is only a front. Cat isn't aiming to let one or the other seize the win through violence; she's aiming to force the direct confrontation that both Cordelia and Hanno were previously angling to avoid. Will that end with a third winner like Fredric or Roland? I wouldn't be surprised, but whoever wins it won't be by force of arms..

SufficientVelocity

The most important thing: Where is new best bird Wizard? Did she go with the Valient Champion? Does she for tell a new Knightley Order of Heron Riders? I feel like the comments are really distracted from what matters here.

Abrakadabra

My take is that Cordelia will become a warden of named, and Hanno a warden of earthly powers.
To be a balance against them.

mamm0nn

Most of the comments seem to overlook the big picture for the details. The specifics of what Cordelia and Hanno think and say matter little, instead it's all about who gets chosen in the end and the end result.

Cordelia has shown this chapter more than ever before that she is pretty much another Cat. She believes in pretty much all the same things when it comes to Hero-hating and governing. Hanno is Cat's opposite, everything she hates about heroes and opposes without having any hard crimes against him like MK, Saint or Pilgrim had. Cat clearly prefers Cordelia because she is more alike Cat and Cat's eventual long-term victory view, but as Archer said Hanno is currently what they need.

The question lies more in what the Wardens have to be. Two opposing forces, morally and in believes? Or two forces that are similar but bullying and rooting out the same believes together in a way that will yield rebel resistance and pruning of creation? Equivalent Conflict, or Unified Tyranny vs the Repressed?

I personally see neither to be the best choice now, though I doubt we're getting a surprise third Claimant. Cordelia has my personal preference and her personal points hold more merit, but from the big picture Hanno is the better option.

Zach

Narratively speaking, I'm expecting Hanno. It's easy for me to see a situation where Hanno – whose failure we saw first – ends up coming back and succeeding in the end. We also have Catherine's pledge to reconcile with him and the greater side narrative of Hanno changing as a person. Cordelia is much better as she currently is, but she hasn't really experienced much change to her character or goals. So there aren't really as many interesting places to go with her.

Also, Hanno seems like he might have some sort of big epiphany after getting owned, so maybe it is possible for him to change (though Catherine herself expressed the idea that his convictions are unchangeable).

Zach

One area where I disagree somewhat with Cordelia is the "Villains being governable and Heroes ungovernable" part. I think that her perception is biased by Catherine having a tight leash on Villains during the war (and Hanno refusing to do the same to the Heroes absent the most dire circumstances, like when he had to physically stop Mirror Knight). Within Evil-aligned Nations, where Villains are the leaders, there aren't really consequences beyond that of powerful Heroes coming from elsewhere, but the same can be said for Good-aligned Nations when they're in a direct conflict with another major Evil-aligned Nation – Praes is always coming for Callow in the same way Callow is coming for Praes.

Her perspective is skewed due to her only exposure to villains being in Procer (where they're weak) and the war (when they were firmly leashed by Catherine, who is an unusually reasonable villain). Though she also had lots of experience with Malicia, so I'm not sure why she's not factoring that into the equation.

That being said, she's still a much better option than Hanno. She desires to see Heroes leashed in the same way Villains currently are, and that's far more similar to Catherine's role than Hanno (who seemingly just wants to be a leader who advises Heroes, like some sort of institutional Grey Pilgrim). Valiant Champion was correct that Cordelia can't really be any sort of equal to Catherine (due to Catherine having both the brains and the brawn, so to speak), but the same is true of Hanno, only in an ideological way. Hanno can be clever, but he is firmly ideologically opposed to one of the key roles of a Warden – he is unwilling to directly exert authority over Heroes.

Drk

As thing goes kingfisher prince gonna get The Book and Name

Practicalfanofevil

While i wont say that its for the best. It seems like cordelia is going to get the book. In Guideverse terms Hanno has the weight but not the story. On the other hand Cordelia has the right story but not enough weight to sink the knife in. Unfortunately for Hanno i dont think having enough strength will get him what he wants without a proper story to back him up and he will end up as another skeleton in the dragons cave as cat puts it. Im guessing Cordelia will by the end of this arc get the warden name and an aspect that helps her to take away Names from heroes through some kind of voting process.

Eris

I for one don't get the hate Cordelia is getting in the comments section. Yes she has her flaws in her argument, but I don't understand the support for Hanno. If Hanno wins, I don't think the Truce and Terms could even function. Hanno would always do what he thinks the right thing is, even if it breaks laws. The T&T wouldn't work, because as soon as there is something Hanno doesn't want to do, he won't compromise or anything. Heroes under his reign would have just as much power and little accountability as before.

Salt

You have it backwards. The only person in the story we've seen that has been able or even willing to attempt upholding the existing T&T when push comes to shove is Hanno. Not Cordelia.

The Arsenal arc showed this best. When Cordelia plotted with Catherine to undermine the T&T in order to get the results they wanted in the trials, Hanno was the roadblock that forced them to respect the T&T and follow some semblance of due process for the trial. Hanno was the one willing to bleed in order to resolve the situation without breaking the conditions of the T&T.

Hanno's problem was, instead, putting far too much faith in Heroes which in large part led to the crisis in the first place; but it was Cordelia who tried to ignore the T&T to do what she thought was right after the crisis developed.

Basically, Hanno isn't good enough because he won't recognize the problems with Heroes, and allow these crisis' to develop far too often in the first place. Problems that could've been prevented will happen anyway because he had too much faith in a divine mandate to see what's in front of his eyes. He puts way too much emphasis on principle.

Cordelia isn't good enough because as soon as a Crisis happens, she'll undermine and ignore the law – including the future Liesse Accords – to do whatever she wants. Exactly the same way she did with the T&T, as well as the highest assembly. Laws and rules aren't protected when Cordelia is in charge, they're bent and undermined whenever convenient for her personal goals. She has far too little principle.

Linnus42

I mean I disagree insofar Hanno was not really around to stop Cordelia's four main complaints.

Red Axe....Hanno was nowhere around for this and never even met Red Axe before she did what she did. Maybe you could have talked her down if you beat Bard to her. But her plan was also to destroy the Rules and Regs, no Laws Cordelia dreams of passing could have stopped Red Axe.

Tariq plaguing the Village. Hanno was nowhere close to stop that. Cordelia never filed a real complaint because politics. And even if he was with Tariq, I doubt he could have talked the man out of nor per se was it a bad plan. It was the least bad of the options being burning a whole City from Cordelia or letting Black burn all the crops.

Saint is very much ditto. She is not going to listen to Hanno, she didn't even listen to Tariq at the end. Before that she told Cordelia that Procer was rotten not a crime. She also switched the target with Bard of Arch Heretic. Which is not a crime cause having a political difference with Cordelia is not a crime and before any of the system was developed. Its not Saint's fault Cordelia launched a Crusade despite having zero inroads with Heroes and the Holies hating her. Hanno also not around to stop any of that.

Christophe, for one he never agreed to betray the Drow with the Gaspard Family. A plan that originates from a Prince scheming is Cordelia's job to sort out not Hannos. Not to mention Cat only sussed out his involvement by spying on him when he was sleeping. Now Cordelia probably would be down for Thought Crime Punishments and Mass Heroic Surveillance but I doubt Hanno or many Heroes would be. So really you can only say that he could have stopped the Heroic Debate between Chris, Fred and Roland escalating. Chris was feeling himself after massacring Demons with Severance and seeing Cat corruption in Action (Bad Move). However, the issue here is Frederic was going out of his way to provoke a fight. A fight he couldn't even win.

That is the issue with Cordelia's complaints in my book. Only one crime was Hanno even in a position to intervene and he did intervene for that one even if he could have done it faster. But should he really be stifling free and open debate among Heroes? As for punishment...Cordelia never filed a complaint about Tariq, curious she wants to hang him, I doubt she be hanging herself if they went with her burn down the city plan. Saint died in the act and seems like the type who is unlikely to surrender. Red Axe got executed by Hanno and Cordelia is more mad Hanno didn't let him try Red Axe under Proceran Law despite that going against the terms. Christophe got punished, maybe not harshly enough but they are fighting a war against ruin.

Ergo the only way to stop most of these actions is to curtail free speech such that discussing stuff Cordelia doesn't like is a crime and mass surveillance presumably from Cordelia's cousin with future sight predictions on top of that.

BargleNawdleZouss

I know we're going to learn more in about four hours, but I haven't seen much discussion here of what will happen if Cat is actually successful in "eating" the Book Of Some Things. Do heroes lose their powers? Does Providence simply not tilt the field in Heroes' favor when in conflict? Does this sweep the board clear for the Game Of The Gods? Let's hear your thoughts on the effects of Night having a BOST Sandwich(tm)!

Interlude: Occidental IV

"It is not enough to win. If you do not destroy the very foundation on which your enemy stood, all you have done is change the face of the man who will kill you."

– Dread Emperor Benevolent

Cordelia woke up looking at the moon.

The sky spread out above her, a river of darkness with glistening jewels for stars and brightest among them the crown jewel of night. The midnight eye, she thought. She was not manacled, the fair-haired princess found, but she was chained. Someone had set her down on a throne of stone from which twisting chords of Night slithered out, forming into shackles around her hands and feet. Trying to rise up, Cordelia found her legs wobbly and half-fell back into the seat. She groaned as she bruised the back of her knees against the stone, forcing aside the pain to look around. She must be atop the tower, she thought. The view could come from nowhere else.

And there was only one person who could have brought her here.

"I do not believe," Cordelia said, "that you would abduct me only to then ignore my presence. Shall we dispense with the theatrics, Catherine?"

A long moment passed and she wondered if she had not just made a fool of herself, but from behind her came the sound of a match being struck. Though she felt the urge to twist around on the seat and look back, Cordelia forced herself not to. Appearances mattered even more when you were at a disadvantage. Instead the acrid smell of wakeleaf drifted to her, lazily carried by the breeze, and she heard that familiar limp drag itself across the stone. A soft step and then the sharp rap of the staff on stone, all a fabricated display of weakness. The Warden of the East could still move as swiftly and gracefully as a cat when she needed to.

Catherine Foundling limped into sight from her left, moonlight lapping at her back like the tide at the shore. Even the jarring colours of the Mantle of Woe were drowned in strands of Night, as if she wore a cloak woven from it, and only the cherry-red burn of the pipe allowed Cordelia to see anything at all under the dark of the hood. One piercing brown eye set in a face carved by hatchet, all sharp angles and severity. It was only those ever-expressive lips that broke from the blade edges: always smiling and smirking, grinning and baring teeth.

The Warden drew back the pipe to blow a long stream of smoke, veiling her face in darkness for a moment, and Cordelia was left without a window to gaze through. When the red burn returned, it was to an amused little quirk of the lips. Like she knew a joke no one else did.

"Hanno would have seen the trap coming," the Warden of the East lightly said. "You do know that, right?"

Cordelia let the barb pass through her. This was a negotiation, diplomacy. Allowing the woman on the other side of the table to irritate her was handing her further advantage when she already had many.

"It is decent manners to offer refreshments when entertaining a guest," Cordelia calmly replied. "I believe a tart red is the traditional kind vintage for stargazing. A bottle from lakeside Aequitan if you have one."

Unlike the rest of the principality the large cities near the coast had never truly become Arlesite even after the Aquitanii were conquered, so the ancient tart grapes were still used in the vineyards. Aequitan reds from the south were unpleasantly sweet, Cordelia had found, best drunk with small game or not at all.

"How fortunate, then, that you are not a guest," the Warden drawled. "If you insist on wine, Hasenbach, there should be a bottle by the seat. You can pour for yourself."

Cordelia did grope around, finding to her relief that her legs were steady, and hid her dismay when she saw that it was half-empty bottle of Vale summer wine that rested on a low table. She could have used a drink that did not taste like it had been mixed with cider to settle her nerves. The Queen of Callow's hopelessly provincial taste in wine had been speculated by some to be a clever way to display Callowan pride, given the famously poor reputation of those vintages, but Cordelia had sadly learned better. She took a deep drink of the glass she'd poured, much more than was polite.

Awful.

"You'll be able to stand before long, if that's what you were trying to do," Catherine idly said. "The binding was just a little rougher than I meant it to be."

She had little practice with bindings, Cordelia thought, because she so rarely took prisoners. Had the sideways reminder been on purpose?

"Duly noted," she replied. "As we have now both found a vice to nurse, given the circumstances I believe it would be forgivable to do way with the usual courtesies."

The face disappeared into the dark, a cloud of smoke flowing out.

"Indeed?" the Warden amusedly said.

"Indeed," Cordelia confirmed. "I imagine that your plans for the Book of Some Things are nearing their end, which invites urgency in our talks."

For a moment she thought she saw the other woman wince at the mention of the artefact, but it might have been a trick of the light. A single fleck of red cast just as many shadows as it did their opposite.

"We'll be ending this soon," Catherine Foundling casually agreed. "The attack on the tower is going south in a hurry and-"

She suddenly paused, then sighed and snapped her fingers. There was a flare of Night and a curse from someone else's mouth. Cordelia rose to her feet just in time to see a shape being tossed over the edge of the tower. The one-eyed queen limped there, then cast an irritated look downwards.

"I can see in the dark, Kallia," the Warden peevishly called out, "and I've traded the one eye for a hundred. Try that again when you're actually invisible, not just quiet."

There was a loud thump and a snap, then a hoarse shout.

"Crows," Catherine Foundling muttered, shaking her head. "If she doesn't stay down with the second leg broken I'm going to need to have a talk with that girl. There's a difference between determined and goddamn stubborn."

Cordelia glanced down at her glass, allowed herself a grimace and then polished off a third in a single swallow. It seemed that there would be no rescuers coming to free her, which was unfortunate. Buying time for them to come had been in the back of her mind, but she would have to negotiate without that card up her sleeve. Adjusting her angle accordingly, the blonde princess discarded any thought of a bargain from even relative strength. The only way she would pass through this victorious was by discovering what it was that Catherine Foundling truly wanted and how it could be leveraged into a compromise.

Cordelia took a few steps around the stone seat, finding that her Night chains followed without restraining her, and laid her elbows against the back of the throne. She felt Catherine's eye back on her even as the wink of red was taken away, replaced by a plume of smoke that drifted up to the cloudless sky.

"I was given to understand that the Book of Some Things is a manifestation of Good stories," Cordelia calmly said. "Though I do not believe there is precedent for such an act, one might assume that destroying such an artefact would have dire consequences."

The Warden of the East smiled.

"Assume," she repeated. "That's been a problem lately hasn't it, Cordelia? How often you're forced to assume."

The wrong approach, the princess acknowledged without missing a beat. That had not been a personal attack made because the one-eyed queen was feeling defensive, it had been a barb made out of derision. I misread signs and was mocked for it. She did not mind. That, too, was actionable information. The Book was not the keystone then, either destroying or ingesting it. There was another motive underlying all this chaos. What? If she found this, she found the key to it all.

"Then disabuse me, Catherine, by all means," she pleasantly said. "If I have made an error let us resolve it."

Even from a change of subject she should be able to glean a hint. The Warden's smiled turned sharp and Cordelia's heart sunk. She had mistepped again. I will lose every time until I learn what game it is we are playing, she darkly thought.

"Have you ever wondered why it is that you're held in high esteem by so many rulers," Catherine Foundling nonchalantly said, "but when heroes look at you, deep down most of them believe you're a failure?"

Cordelia straightened, elbows leaving the back of the throne as she set down her cup on it.

"Only a handful of Named alive have ever ruled," she replied. "Or even held high office. Few understand what those responsibilities entail or what the limitations of a crown are."

Heroes, in particular, grew strong through uncompromising conviction. It encouraged the belief that simple solutions would suffice no matter the situation, which was wildly untrue. Strength grew into ever more complicated a word the higher you came to stand.

"That's true," the Warden amiably replied. "It's not what most of them are built for, even if they don't want to admit it. But then they're hardly alone in that, since you're only looking at the half of the truth that you like."

An idle step forward, even as Cordelia warily took her cup in hand.

"They see you as a failure," the Warden of the East said, "because you did fail."

The tall princess's eyes narrowed imperceptibly, the first genuine stirring of anger of this conversation rearing up its ugly head until she smoothed it away.

"That's the gap in perspective, Cordelia, that you're not seeing," the one-eyed queen continued. "A lady, a king, they look at what you did and applaud. It was an impossible task but you moved mountains and held up the sky, compliments galore. But heroes?"

The Damned shrugged.

"What they see is that Cordelia Hasenbach took up an impossible task and then she failed," the Warden said, "when victory against impossible odds is the very foundation of what a hero is."

It was a moment of cold, cutting clarity that followed the words. The pieces fit, suddenly and cruelly. The sneers she had found buried deep in the gaze of so many Chosen, that simple marrow-deep disbelief that she had not been able to fix everything and prevent the inevitable. The ugly assumption not so much as whispered but ever present that somehow, she had chosen Procer should fall.

Impossible was not a word any of them genuinely believed in.

"Bearing a Name would not have made keeping the Principate together easier," Cordelia evenly said. "Given the Truce and Terms, it would have instead significantly complicated my efforts."

She would have been both above and under the White Knight in authority, the boundaries of jurisdiction so blurred as to be useless. Cordelia entertained the thought, briefly, but could only see a disaster in the making.

"And that would matter if Procer was your wheelhouse," Catherine said, rapping her staff against the side of the throne.

The sound almost made her flinch. It was like rattling the cage of a songbird that'd sung out of tune.

"But that's not the duty you're after, is it?" she continued. "You've thrown your hat in the ring to be Warden of the West and that's a very different creature."

And there, Cordelia thought, her line of argument collapsed. She drank from the cup, the too-rich taste filling her palate, and set down it down again on the stone to a neat little note.

"You speak as if not having been Named is a mistake crippling my ambition, that I cannot see the world the way many heroes do," the blue-eyed princess said, "but you are wrong."

She stepped back, chains following so lightly she would have thought them made of feathers if not for the shackles.

"That distance, Catherine, that estrangement? They are the very foundation of my claim," Cordelia said. "I have seen heroes as someone who is not one of them. Witnessed their flaws as only someone who stood outside of their circle can. I can learn namelore, aspects and tricks. All Named do."

All heroes had to learn their nature, the unseen rules of their trade, and not all received the help of a mentor. There was no shame in this, or in her remaining lack. She was a quick study.

"What cannot be learned is the understanding of where heroes falter," she told the Warden, meeting the dark eye lit in red. "Where they step beyond the bounds of duty and do more harm than good."

She never would have sought to be Warden of the West without it, so the princess thought it almost absurd to count it a weakness. It was not unlike chastising a bird for having wings.

"Our gap in perspective can and will be bridged," Cordelia plainly told her. "I am not unaware of its costs. But I count it a worthwhile trade for having removed the scales from my eyes."

"You're not listening," Catherine said. "What is it that you've used to push your claim, Cordelia?"

The other woman limped around the throne, leaning her back against it. It was not a restful stance, for all that it was motionless. Cordelia took in the silhouette and could only think of a snake drawing back to strike.

"Armies," the Warden of the East said, enunciating every syllable. "Nobles. Treaties. Everything except people you'd actually be leading. A First Prince in everything but Name."

The princess's lips thinned.

"I do not yet have the sup-"

"You're not listening," Catherine Foundling interrupted in a hiss. "Your claim is a test, and you are failing it."

She pushed off cloak of shadows sweeping behind her as she limped forward and Cordelia stepped back.

"You can learn namelore," the Warden said. "Of course you can. Just like he can learn politics. But that's not what a Name is, what a Role is. It's not asking you if you're going to be the right person in five years, it's asking if you are right now. Are you?"

Cordelia's eyes hardened. No more steps back. Any fruit grew beyond reach if you raised the branch high enough and kept raising it as soon as the hand neared.

"And were you a perfect fit, Catherine, when you became the Squire?" she challenged. "Was Tariq Isbili, when he became the Grey Pilgrim? I imagine most Named were not, and so it seems to me that the requirements to wardenship rise every time you are at risk of having an equal."

The last touch had been a barb and an investigation both, trying to find what lay behind this tirade, but the princess immediately knew she had not drawn blood. The words washed over the other woman like water over a duck's back.

"That's the thing, Cordelia," the Warden smiled. "You're not my equal. And if that's hard to swallow, you only have yourself to blame: you had months, years to learn namelore on your own."

Cordelia scoffed. Quite the simplification.

"Would you have taught me, Catherine, if I had asked?" she mocked. "Are tutors in the art so easy to find? For some skills time is the only teacher."

It was not as if she had not sought instruction. But namelore was not committed to books, its rules were often obscure and there was only so far reading stories would get Cordelia when she had to deal with heroes from all over Calernia. The few heroes she had been in a position to interrogate were usually new and shallow in learning: even Frederic, perhaps the most seasoned hero on her side, freely admitted that he still had much to learn.

"I'm a villain, there would have been no point," the Warden dismissed. "Which you might have known if you'd asked me. Or if you'd asked any hero but those few you trust – that is, those who already obey you."

"Is having allies a black mark as well, now?" Cordelia said. "An interesting development."

The insinuation that she only trusted through control was particularly rich, coming from the Black Queen. The same woman who had put a knife to the throat of every living being on Calernia to force her enshrinement into the Grand Alliance.

"Not a large one," Catherine scorned. "How many heroes would even back you in an election, First Prince of the Chosen?"

A pregnant pause.

"Ten, fifteen?" she ventured.

The number was roughly accurate, in all likeliness. That the vast majority of these were Proceran was another bitter pill to swallow. It was a weakness, but one she had not had great opportunity to mend. Nearly all Chosen had been on the fronts, far from Salia, and private correspondence with any would justly have been seen by the Highest Assembly as a political act. In a cut of irony, now that the heroes were nearly all in Salia it was even more complicated to approach any of them in private.

The perception that she intended to become Warden through a coup would have... grave consequences, she had grasped.

"Not even a third of the heroes, the very people you're supposed to lead," the Warden of the East said, shaking her head.

"I have not yet made my case to them," Cordelia said, maintaining an even tone. "I would prefer to make it from a stronger position, it is true, but do not mistake timing for inability."

"So confident they'll bend your way after a speech," the Warden chuckled. "How the Hells would you know if that'll work, Cordelia? You've spent years seething about heroes do wrong, but have you actually ever learned what makes them tick? Why do they act the way they do?"

A litany of variations on 'I believed it was right' and 'I followed instinct' had been her answer when she asked, usually.

"The reason is not as important as the result," Cordelia replied instead.

The Warden squinted at her.

"Is that you, Tariq?" she said, grinning nastily. "You're looking good, for a dead man."

The blue-eyed princess kept the twitch of fury the barb had caused away from her face, instead dismissing the rejoinder with a curt gesture.

"That the Grey Pilgrim committed atrocities does not mean his every act and word was wrong," Cordelia said, heat bleeding into her tone. "Only that he committed atrocities and was the kind of man who would."

Calm, she must be calm as the surface of a pond. Catherine thrived in chaos, in the heat of argument. Cordelia would win by keeping her head and grasping why this conversation seemed to have no end point.

"And that is my very point, Warden," she pressed. "Why Tariq Fleetfoot murdered a town full of innocents does not matter. His reasons, his reasoning, they do not matter: only that he did. I do not need to understand his every thought to condemn his actions."

Centering herself, smoothing away the last of the anger, she leaned into the opening.

"Besides, for all your harping on about understanding heroes how many of them agree on anything of note?" Cordelia continued. "You pretend there is some sort of common heroic mindset, but half of them would be at each other's throats without a greater threat looming over them. You reproach me the lack of something that, by and large, does not exist."

That rejoinder bought her a moment to think. There is no gain for you through this conversation, Cordelia thought. Berating me into dropping my claim is a waste of time when you have half a dozen more direct tools to ensure I lose. And she'd had the impression that Catherine favoured her claim, besides. Was this a favour, then, an attempt to help Cordelia sharpen her claim? It seemed unlikely. So what is it that you are attempting to accomplish, Catherine?

The Warden scoffed.

"Now you're being naïve," Catherine said. "Do you think Hanno is popular with heroes because he's pleasant and good with a sword? He understands what they want, knows what lines they'll fight him over, and navigates that terrain. You, on the other hand?"

Even in the faint red glow, the outline of a sneer could be seen.

"You're a diplomat who never learned the language of the other side of the table. You can get by, sure, but in every conversation how much do you miss?"

Which was not untrue in principle, she thought, but stood an empty objection in practice.

"Hypotheticals," Cordelia calmly replied, circling the throne as she spoke. "Generalities. You stick to those because there are no true examples to draw in, Catherine. Those that you could, you agreed with my answer. Sometimes even supported it."

The Warden of the East stood behind the throne, the princess before it, and she took back the cup she had left on the stone. The wine was still terrible, but to a parched throat it would be better than nothing.

"You have no practicals, Cordelia," Catherine harshly said. "That's the entire fucking point of what I'm saying: your record with heroes is line after line of nothings. It's not enough to avoid most mistakes. It's not something that lands in your lap if you're the least wrong, you have to win it."

She snorted, face disappearing as a stream of smoke spewed out.

"But here's a practical, since you like them so much," the Warden of the East said. "You want to be a leader of heroes, Cordelia, when you know so little of them it would barely fill a thimble and most of them wouldn't trust you to empty a chamber pot."

Trust could be won. It was not an auspicious beginning, she would concede, but beginnings were what you made of them.

"But bad as that is," Catherine continued, "worse is that you never considered making the sacrifices that would have made up for your lack. You know who might have filled you in on namelore, done it eagerly even?"

The smiled turned sharp.

"Hanno of Arwad."

"A rival claimant," Cordelia replied. "This is nonsense."

"Would he be your rival right now, if you'd asked him a year ago?" Catherine retorted. "If you'd reached out after the Arsenal, tried to understand the heroes instead of sitting on your anger and pride?"

Yes, Cordelia's mind whispered, but she was not as certain as she would have liked. She was not without faults. If she were, the last words she had spoken to her uncle would not have been in anger.

"Much can be changed if one shuffles around the past," Cordelia said. "And regrets are easily found. Or are you still proud of your journey to Keter?"

"It was a fruitful disaster," the Warden easily replied.

Unashamed even now.

"You have known many of those," she mildly said. "From the Liesse Rebellion to the bloody end of the Dread Empire. Are you so certain you want to revisit old mistakes?"

She drank from the cup, more to wet her lips and win breathing room than to drink. You are going to shrug it off again, Cordelia thought. Because this is not a match in your eyes, is it? You do not win by getting the better part of the argument.

"We'd be here all night, but I'm game," the Warden laughed. "It's not my time that's running out."

The Lycaonese princess stilled in surprise.

"Now now, Cordelia," Catherine chided. "Surely you didn't think keeping me talking would delay the ritual, did you? It can keep going without my hand guiding it."

It made no sense, she angrily thought. If all that Catherine wanted was to consume the Book of Some Things, then there was no need for all this theatre. Cordelia was a valuable hostage, she could have been kept in a cell and left to rot. Instead she was here, circling an empty throne and talking with the person whose time was most valuable in all this affair. The Warden was getting something out of this conversation, otherwise she would not be having it, but Cordelia simply could not tell what.

"What happened to the Sword of Judgement when he came to the tower?" Cordelia asked.

"We had a pleasant talk," Catherine easily replied. "And he was tossed back out."

You cannot beat us through this, Cordelia thought. No, that was untrue. In every way that matters you have already beaten us, so why is it that you are still playing? Even if some feline impulse of cruelty had taken her, the Warden did not have the time to torment the defeated. It made no sense. Why would she keep playing a game she had already won? The princess drank the last of the wine, washed it down. And as she set it down hastily, almost dropping it, she froze. Remembered another time she had stood across a very dangerous woman and heard a cup topple down.

You kept playing a game, Cordelia thought, when you had not yet won. And simply because she was defeated, because Hanno of Arwad was defeated, did not mean Catherine Foundling had won. She found the Warden of the East's dark eye, glimmering red. It was never us you were playing against, was it? Her pulse thrummed, she straightened her back. She had found the thread, now she only needed to follow it down to the end.

"And how many sins did you hang around dear Hanno's neck?" Cordelia too lightly asked.

"Enough," she laughed. "You know, I actually think that all this enmity between you two goes back to a single moment."

"Do you now?"

The Warden breathed in deep, face veiled by the dark, and answered through a wreath of smoke.

"The first time you saw each other," Catherine said. "When he entered that Chamber, spun that coin and you caught it. You each thought you understood the other, for a moment. And you've paid the price for that ever since."

She ran a hand atop the back of the throne, as if amused.

"He thought he was looking at someone who was Good enough to be heroine," the Warden told her, "and so your every compromise since has been a disappointment. You, on the other hand?"

"By all means," Cordelia pleasantly smiled, "do deign to inform me of what I believe."

The one-eyed queen wagged a finger at her.

"You, Cordelia, saw that he respected your stepping in," the Warden of the East said. "And you thought that meant he respected law, respected how Procer is run. That made him the good hero, the trustworthy one."

Cordelia's belly clenched, for that had the faintest ring of truth to it.

"Only he didn't actually care for either of those things," Catherine said. "He accepted it as a courtesy, from Named to Named. Because the way you saw it, you might not have the power but you have the conviction – and that's the part that matters, anyway."

"You revisit the past so often one might believe you would rather live there," Cordelia sharply replied.

"It's an interesting night, that's all," the one-eyed queen said, elbow against the throne and chin on her hand. "Plenty there to ponder about. Like the way that you turned down a Name that night, Cordelia."

"It would not have made anything better," the princess replied, and meant every word.

"I don't entirely disagree," Catherine said. "It was a wise decision in some ways, but it also speaks to the one sin I'll hang around your neck that outweighs all of Hanno's: you don't actually want to be Named."

A sliver of incredulous laughter escaped her lips before she could smother it.

"Then pray tell, what exactly has all this been in the service of?" Cordelia said, gesturing at the night around them.

"Not wanting it," the Warden smiled. "You're doing it because you think it's your responsibility, your duty, but fight all you like under that flaking coat of paint I still see the same woman that was on the floor of the Highest Assembly that night."

Cordelia took a step back, jaw clenching.

"The one who snatched Judgement's verdict out of the air and swore mortal laws for mortal men."

"It is not that simple," she bit out.

"It never is," the Warden said. "And I think you're right about a lot of things, Cordelia. Heroes should have someone calling them to account. But it's not enough to be right. To be clever or to be wise. You also have to win it. Because know who else believes that just being right is enough?

She saw the end of that sentence before it came, but that did nothing to dull the sting.

"The same lot you say you're going to make toe the line."

"It is not the same thing," Cordelia snarled.

The calm, the calm failed her. How dare she?

"A Name isn't a crown," the Warden of the East said. "You don't just get to have it because it fits your head, Cordelia. And the way I see it, you're not Good enough to be anointed or strong enough to be a tyrant so what's left? Inheritance?"

The one-eyed queen leaned closer, as if to whisper a confidence.

"Whose death is going to give you your power this time, Cordelia?" she gently asked. "Even if you spend the Augur down to the last inch, you'll run out of kin long before you stand my equal."

And as the words slid between her ribs like a knife, the cruelty of it opened her eye. It was not an accident, so barbed a phrase. And yet it won nothing. So the cruelty is the point. The Warden of the East had come for her certainties, her belief, with methodical brutality. One after another, sparing nothing. And that is the point. That is what you gain.

Inflicting that before she was tossed out of the tower to land at Hanno's side in the grass.

"Are you truly so eager," Cordelia Hasenbach quietly said, "to make yourself the villain?"

"It's habit by now," Catherine Foundling confessed, sounding just a touch too grieved to be lying. "But there's power in it, always has been. So ask yourself, Cordelia, before you make yourself into a heroine" what is that you want that power for?"

She rose as she spoke, hand knocking over the cup that had been left there, and as Cordelia saw it tumbling down she felt a whisper.

Darkness.

She woke up in the grass, a man standing over her. Cordelia Hasenbach met Hanno of Arwad's eyes and a long moment passed.

"Rough night?" the Sword of Judgement drily asked.

TRUELIKEtheRIVER

oh boy it's gonna go down

Linnus42

I really don't think Cat went for the Jugular here. She could have brought up Cordelia launching the Crusade and refusing to cut a deal with Cat because Cat was a lowborn warlord. Cordelia bothers to cut a deal and Cat probably never goes after DK or the Drow.

Gabe Meadow

Because it's completely irrelevant here? The only things that matter relate to Cordelia's suitability or lack thereof to be Warden of the West.

Soronel Haetir

I would say even Cordelia's behavior immediately prior to being captured speaks to her unsuitability. She was facing an impossible position and her instinct was 'retreat' rather than 'bull my way through'.

Liliet

That would be because unlike you, Catherine actually follows Cordelia's logic there.

concerned

Time after time, I see a rude comment and look at the name to see "Liliet" above the rudeness.

You know you can just be pleasant instead of a jerk?

Liliet

I generally try to, actually. What was the previous time?

milieu

Not concerned, but responded below

Liliet

Thank you. I mean I argue but I do appreciate the fact of response to this request. Feedback is useful 0.0

Miles

That's why you look at the name regardless of your opinions about what they said, so you don't come away with such a twisted perspective on a person.

Zggt

And also took a page from the Tyrant playbook (hence the eye motif), only in reverse. The Tyrant looked for an enemy so grand that the Gods would make him their equal (and settled on the Bard for the ability to get at a Choir). Cat is doing the opposite, she's dragging Cordelia and Hanno to her metaphorical level by making them confront her... Now they can group up and have the ability to draw against her in the next confrontation, as she is done with the first part of that plan.

Liliet

the Tyrant was looking to entertain Gods, not have them make him their equal...

Xinci

No real difference really. To entertain the conflicting methodologies must have given unique points for the given interaction, just like theatre honestly.

Ciara

Singular they, referring to the enemies he was looking for

Liliet

oh ok

gingerlygrump

Being autistic doesn't mean you get to be mean to other people without apologizing.

gingerlygrump

Ugh and I meant to leave that comment on another chain

ninegardens

Trying to become his enemies equal, not the gods.

Also: How do we think young Kairos would fare at the moment, in this weird, post-story world for Villians? Would he adapt instantly, or end up as a fish out of water?

My instinct is that he'd pull back and batton down the hatches initially, once he realized he no longer had certain stories on his side... and then he'd flip to the reverse and happily play into the stories that were meant to punish him... not for any tangible gain, but just because he could.

Liliet

Yesssss.

Miles

I'm pretty sure he'd die instantly. His Name was keeping him alive.

Actually... do villains age now? I'm pretty sure the age stasis was a story thing but I guess this was never confirmed. 😊😊😊😞😞😞

jamesc9

Age stasis was indirectly confirmed when Amadeus lost a name and started ageing.

milieu

I wasn't party to the conversation above on rudeness, but I do agree with the impression that other commenter had put forth.

I would consider this message as an example of another time. Your tone in this post assumes others are addled in the brain, which is a rude assertion.

Liliet

It... doesn't? I have talked to a great many people in this fandom who don't remmeber specifics of earlier events. The Tyrant plot was in Book 5. I do not think that people hypothetically misremembering what it was about makes them "addled in the brain".

(Being autistic can be described as doing that, though, and I am, so there's that.)

Cpt. Obvious

You are probably the most prolific contributor of comments to the discussions about the Guide here on wp. At least yours is the name that stands out to me.

Something I've learned over the years is that if you post a lot of your thoughts and feelings anywhere where they will be read you will also end up making some posts that not necessarily shine a pleasant light on your name.

Sometimes it's a failure to "read the room". What was meant to be a light hearted comment comes off as rude crude and nasty.

Sometimes you were in a bad mood, or trying to hammer down a point and forget that's there's a person on the other side of the argument. And sometimes you might just feel justified in slapping someone down a peg or two, which is usually a really bad idea.

There's also times when you learn to know someone through numerous and long discussions. Sometimes that can lead to jokes and comments that to someone who comes into the discussion without prior knowledge seems downright horrible.

And then there's the simple mistakes. A dropped letter or word can sometimes make a huge difference in how a post reads.

My point is that if you make a thousand posts and ten of those end up sounding nasty, then those ten is what a lot of people are going to remember.

I know that generally I don't look all that much on the name of the poster unless I'm either very impressed by a certain post, or I look because I wonder who it was that were that toxic.

So don't let the occasional comment bear too heavy on your mind. But if you start to hear similar things regularly then you might want to take a step back and see if what you posted matches what you want to be remembered for.

AbraKadabra

Some of these commenters are really addled in the brain. Just saying.

Cicero

Not so sure of that. Cordelia might have responded to that by confessing she was wrong and had erred, and that wouldn't give the result that Cat wanted. For both her and Hanno to be shaken in their securities and then for them to talk.

Flameburst

No, because the error she would be admitting to would be that of a ruler, not a named. It wouldn't impact her claim at all.

stevenneiman

The point was that she was attacking both of them for things which would make them bad Wardens. While consolidating her power with a war of aggression was unreasonable, I don't think it was really a mark against her as a Warden claimant specifically. I suspect that her goal is something like splitting the Name, and so she's focusing on failings the other could have warned each of them away from. And say what you will about it's reasonableness, one thing that the tenth crusade was not was a mistake Hanno would have warned Cordelia away from if they'd been listening to each other.

Salt

Hanno definitely wouldn't have supported the Tenth Crusade lol. He probably would've actively turned to violence to stop it, if he'd been there at the time.

Can't really characterize him as someone who'd support morally ambiguous compromises like the Crusade, when one Cordelia's major problems with him in the first place is his complete and utter refusal to make morally ambiguous compromises, even when she believes them absolutely necessary. Even the Choir he served was basically the mirror opposite of Mercy – Judgement is all about "is it Just", as opposed to Mercy's "does it minimize suffering despite being Unjust".

It's kind of what happened at the Arsenal too – Cordelia believed the only way to resolve the problem was to put the Red Axe under a Proceran trial, at which point he just brick-walled her and told her to figure out another solution. It's not Just or Lawful, it's against the spirit of what was agreed upon in the T&T, therefore not happening regardless what anyone says about it being necessary.

Salt

Actually wait, maybe I'm wrong, I don't remember that part of the timeline that well. He hadn't personally met Catherine back then, just Black? He probably would've been OK with it even if he knew why Cordelia was starting it

Gorbox

He fought for the Crusade, but i don't think he would have agreed with the reasoning behind it, as Cordelia started the tenth Crusade because she saw it as the only way to keep Procer from falling back into civil war, and to unite the "Good" nations and make an alliance with the Dominion. Not for a holy reason, or for Justice.

Two dozen snakes

You keep looking at Cordelia and Hanno through the lens of what they did and what they believe in, and not through their suitability to the role of Warden of the West. Hanno fails because he's too uncompromising, because he believes that being a hero automatically means being right, all the time, on everything. Cordelia fails because she doesn't understand what it means to be a heroine. Their points of failure are very different, and Cat is doing this in the hope that one of them will grow from it into the right fit for Warden of the West. She's not going after them personally, she's going after what makes them unfit for the role

Nairne .01

That is also not entirely true.

Hanno doesn't believe being a hero means the individual is always right. He believes that those meaning good but in the wrong should be guided so they don't make the same mistakes again.

Abrakadabra

Only he Just does not make them behave. Cordelia do not want to lead the heroes, she want to constrain them, Hanno do not want to lead the heroes either he Just want to free them to do whatever they want. One of them looks at the heroes as lawyer WHO is against them, the other like a lawyer which is with them, but none of them is really them. One is judging them too harshly the other does not judge them at all.

sengachi

The Venn diagram of "things Cordelia has does which put her on Cat's bad side" and "Cordelia's disqualifying traits for the Name Warden of the West" are not a circle, and in fact do not overlap in many places.

Abrakadabra

False. Cordelia did not make peace because she was too Good for that. Later when she realized she has no choice she made peace which makes her not Good enough to be Named.

AbraKadabra

Now I am totally sure there will be two warden of the west. Cords is like a prosecutor for heroes, while Hanno is their lawyer. There NEEDS to be two of them to judge the heroes fairly, otherwise it all comes down to personal preference. Cordy would be too harsh on heroes, Hanno would be too lenient. They need each other. They need each other on so many levels. One understands heroes the other understands governing and politics.

The two can make a balance. On the villains side there is no need for balance because might makes right. But on the hero side they desperately need it.

Tenthyr

I'm going to be honest, the fact it took her that long to realise Catherine was playing the Villian to demand the story summon a hero to match her is a bit embarrassing.

That Hanno didn't realise that until perhaps the end even more so. No wonder Catherine was enjoying that as much as it stressed her.

Linnus42

Hanno realized Cat was playing a game from the start. That is why he is trying to talk down every single Villain when he could just smash through them.

Tenthyr

No, he thought she was playing one game when she was playing another.

She wasn't trying to make Hanno better, or teach him a lesson, or strike him down so Cordelia could rise.

She was making herself the Villain, and the one thing Catherine kept hammering home that he didn't get is that the only person who can currently stop her is someone who is actually her equal.

Hanno didn't actually internalise until then that he wasn't Catherine's equal at all.

Linnus42

I mean the whole point of this is to make them better a game can have multiple levels.
Cat simply has contingencies.

dadycoool

Great, now I'm imagining Cat going into a Big Bad monolog, including "If no one worthy of the Book of Some Things can step forward, then I shall be forced to take it into myself," and right before she says that, Bard opens her mouth, unmuting the Below stories and placing a trap right where Cat's about to step, making Cat the new Wandering Bard or some equivalent, finally releasing Bard and imprisoning Cat forever.

Sinead

That's why Akua's lounging around in the shadows with a knife.

It's only a theory, but Akua has been compared to Hierophant before. And I could totally see Maseago consulting with Akua to refine his anti Wandering schema.

Longshot theory, but I think having Bard (who has called Maseago popping out of the woodwork twice to be boring) getting surprised stabbed by Akua (who no one planned for) would be great.

dadycool

Well, I was thinking less a matter of Bard actually making a move and more her releasing the grip she has, which would have an immediate, widespread, and unstoppable effect, including punishing grandstanding Villains. The current "No consequences" thing is probably the only reason why Cat's tower is still standing.

Oh gods ever burning, she's just tossed two people off that precipice. As she was developing her Name, there was a significant precipice, significant enough I was 100% convinced she'd get tossed off one to trigger her Name. Now I'm kinda scared for next week, though I'm probably as widely off-base as normal.

caoimhinh

I wonder if Bard slowing down Below's stories (since she didn't kill them, just stopped them from working for now) isn't what's gonna end up screwing the Dead King for good.

I mean, the moment he felt that the constraint was gone, he abused the shit out of that bug right away and used dozens of Demons and attacked without any regard for what a narrative mistake that would be in normal circumstances (again showing that despite what they say about the undead, he can indeed learn and adapt, as he jumped at that opportunity casting aside the pattern of behavior he had been practicing for his whole existence which spans millennia).

Is it going to be like someone finding out that gravity has started to behave weirdly, and thus starts juggling with lots of heavy objects over his head, only to be brutally crushed by those the moment gravity starts working normally again?

boballab

I was thinking that too. What if there is a karmic storyline backlash type of thing when the rules go back into effect?

Liliet

I'm at least half certain that was the point of all the song and dance Bard arranged in Ater. She sure as hell wasn't seriously going after Catherine's life, so what's left? Well, this, for one, lines up well with what I had been again half sure (and Catherine has been revealed to agree with a lot of premises for that) was her game in Book 5. Baiting DK into overextending.

Sinead

To be honest, if this comes down to yet another 'Cat fucks up', I'm gonna be pissed. What is this, Book 6?

But really, having a statement in a world run by narrative of 'The Bard cannot really interfere for the next 5 days (or what ever the timeframe is) and just have her cosmically slap down Cat because even when the cosmic rules of 'villains get their comeuppance' is turned off, the story makes sure that it still catches Cat going and coming back?!

I'm hoping that we either see Hanno and Cordelia do a united front against Cat and 'stop' Cat, or that if Cat eats the Book, she then is able to balance the scale with the villain stories for whoever is WotW.

medailyfun

is Cat developing Toss Aspect?

Sykomantis

I'd wager Topple might fit better

boballab

Oooh that's right villains are not tied to story right now and Hanno tried to use the lone hero storming the castle trope after his helpers got picked off, then tried the monologuing villain trope after being caught never once thinking it through. He automatically assumed that the traditional uncompromising hero storyline would work...then it didn't. No wonder of the two getting tossed out Hanno seemed the most shaken, Cordy didn't have her core foundation broken as bad as Hanno. The end line is showing how resilient mentally Hanno can be, Tariq would be proud of him right now. It is a shame Tariq got stuck with the Mirror Knight and wasn't able to tutor Hanno, Hanno would have been a much better student for him. Then again thankfully Saint isn't around anymore to influence people like the Mirror Knight.

Liliet

Tariq got Christophe after TWO YEARS of war. Hanno could have gotten his tutoring if he wanted, but noooo, he has Recall and already knows everything he needs, right?

Insanenoodlyguy

Actually you got me thinking Akua is going to take the book. She was a villian. Then she liked acting the hero. Then she started pretending to be redeemed. Then she started actually repenting. Then she rejected everything she once wanted. Even Hakram said Akua always stood across from Cat in a way he wanted. What if it's about to become a thing? It makes no goddamn sense of you actually stop to think about it but maybe that's why it works when somehow Akua of all people snows up to storm the tower rallying the others in a big damn heroes moment to stop it at the last second. Then she becomes the Warden, punches Cat in the face hard enough to loosen a tooth and then kisses her hard. Or maybe those last two in reverse.

milieu

This is such a fairytale ending that is so "it can't possibly end that straightforward and well right??" that I am starting to have hope it might 😊

Barthumphries

Yeah, that could work. Akua completes her heel-face turn and spends the rest of her life as a Hero trying to atone for her prior mistakes. The Repentant Shade or something like that.

Miles

Bard: Tell me what you have

Akua: A KNIFE!

Bard: NO!

Linnus42

Compromise seems likely that political marriage crack theory seems less insane lol.

Gabe Meadow

These two will have an interesting talk. And I suppose what happened in Occidental II and here are each fitting.

Cat deals with Hanno, the man of principle, with a principled argument.

Cat deals with Cordelia, the Prince of pragmatism, with a pragmatic argument.

ninegardens

Always gotta argue with people based on their ideals. Otherwise what's the point? Otherwise, all you got is power and authority.

sengachi

Which, to be fair, Catherine also has plenty of right now.

shikkarasu

When you have X, no matter what X is or how much of it you have, don't let it be described as mere X. That's when the hubris catches up.

Albert Wen

Are you ninestrings? If so, why did you delete your Reddit account?

ninegardens

I am not nineStrings, and thus can not answer as to why nineStringes deleated their reddit account. Perhaps the gnomes got to them?

Albert Wen

Someone suggested Demon of Absence on Reddit. It's quite sad, he wrote all sorts of masterpieces, such as:

"Cordelia: I know we've barely spoken, or expressed even the smallest piece of attraction to each other in any context but being emotionally ransacked, beaten, restrained and thrown out of a tower has me in an incredibly romantic mood.

Hanno: Truly proximity, mild dislike and recent shared trauma shall be the rock upon which we build this relationship. Let us make sweet love here in the grass while our coworkers and friends are crippled just metres away, and Cat absorbs an energy field larger than her head."

ninegardens

That sounds horrifying.

It also sounds like how sexual attraction works for some people, which tbh is even more horrifying.

Thanks, I hate it.

Rey d`Tutto

There are more than a few "hero stories". The Book of Some Things is no mere trade paperback. There are at least three dozen "heroes journey" stories I can shake a stick at without any references to tropes.com. And Anti-hero counts as Hero here.

The Book of Some Things is at least a large reference hardback book, and 9 inch (23 cm) by 12 inch (30+ cm) (small reference book size cover) is bigger in at least two dimensions than my head.

Cat is not a 6'4" (1.95m) tall male, she's a short-ish female human. My head is bigger than hers, tho that assumes Callowan heads aren't much bigger than average humans.

Metalshop

Hell yes.

Reader in the Night

It felt like Cat was considerably gentler with Cordelia than she was with Hanno. I suppose a part of it is the way the First Prince's brain works, she's a woman of Goals while Hanno runs on Principles. For Hanno, Cat had to point out the flaw in his Principles and he pretty much folded by himself, while for Cordelia, she had to show her that her Goals could not be achieved by her current means.

But still. Hanno's felt like "you are wrong and you don't have the power to oppose me", while Cordelia's felt like "you're right, but you don't have the power to make it stick". I expected Cat would be very even-handed on this, but it still feels like she favors Cordelia.

Linnus42

Preach, No Lie Detected. Espeically when you consider Cordelia has screwed Callow over more then once by bank rolling Akua's Liesse Project to refusing to ever cut a deal with Cat because she was an upstart lowborn warlord Villain but she gets the kid gloves here.

Snappy270

I partly agree but there also another point here. I think both cordy and cat have moved past that point (the crusades ect), they have began to under stand each other. Remember cat was also willing to sell a principality to the dead king with is a terrible fate.

Cats current anger at cordy is quite new. She wanted cordy to win, but even she admit cordy would be bad at it. And is disappointed that the pissing match is happening now. Hanno on the other side is getting her anger against all heros not just Hanno, which has always been building up.

So i can see why she would be more savage with him.

shikkarasu

I think she used the right tools for the right job. The bigger part is that Hanno was hit by a personal hypocrisy, the fact that he is used to being the Bigger Man in any conversation. Normally he is, but right now? He just had violence. He has become what he hates.

Cordelia was just shown that she doubled down on a losing hand. It hurts, especially with the jabs about her family dying along the way, but it wasn't the same personal attack on everything she was. Not because Cat doesn't want to hurt Cordelia, but because the same opportunity wasn't there and wouldn't have been directly necessary.

....Also Cordelia is not as defenestration-proof as Hanno.

ninegardens

She is giving them the "High stakes conversation" that each is suited to. Cordelia is trained to know how to be a political prisoner, and Hanno knows the schtick with a Hero hanging over a pit. In some sense, for all the "pain" Hanno went through, she was in some sense making him Comfortable, by playing the part of a familiar story.

And for both of them she said "By ignoring each other, you are betraying your own principles" – Hanno was ignoring a fellow hero, and Cordelia was ignoring a potential ally, a chance to learn.

masterofbones

I think its a sign of respect for Hanno. She lays out the problems clearly and simply for him, because she knows he can take it. Cordelia is devastated by a much lighter touch, and wouldn't have been able to handle the harsher treatment Hanno got. He's used to heroes pointing out the moment they see someone do wrong. She's used to yes-men saying that shes perfect and incapable of making a mistake(right up until they stab her in the back).

ohJohN

Ah yes, nothing gentler than preying on Cordelia's deep-rooted shame and guilt about relying on her favorite cousin (and last surviving relative she's close with) in a way that eats away at her sanity, just to twist the knife.

masterofbones

In comparison to what Hanno got? Yeah a little bit of guilt tripping is a soft touch flashburn283

So, who is she waiting for to take up the mantle, or is this once again to fuck with the Bard?

Gabe Meadow

There is a little bit of that.

"The princess drank the last of the wine, washed it down. And as she set it down hastily, almost dropping it, she froze. Remembered another time she had stood across a very dangerous woman and heard a cup topple down. (...) You kept playing a game, Cordelia thought, when you had not yet won. And simply because she was defeated, because Hanno of Arwad was defeated, did not mean Catherine Foundling had won. She found the Warden of the East's dark eye, glimmering red. It was never us you were playing against, was it?"

The last time is obviously a callback to Fatalism III where the Bard was implied to be meeting with the Saint and dropped the cup – all just before Cordelia entered the room. And the Bard's the one who set up Cordelia and Hanno to be at loggerheads like this.

Intercessor's gotta come out of the woodwork lest Cat ruin her work here, and Cat's waiting for that.

MrRigger

And if the Intercessor comes out to talk, she's not concentrating on blocking Below's stories anymore. Which means the Dead King's suddenly a Villain overreaching.

Reader in the Night

I think Cat might be pushing for this, really. Looking at it in a bigger picture sort of frame, the entire War on Keter is still part of the Game of the Gods, so the Bard can afford to let it happen.

But Cat's threatening to eat part of the Rulebook of the Game, while making a huge production of the fact that no-one can stop her now, and the Intercessor is still the referee before she is anything else.

I think Bard will be forced to stop holding back Below's stories even if she knows it's a trap just so Cat can lose here, because you know that if Cat eats that Book then Above is never getting their stories back.

Catherine might genuinely be attempting to bully the Choirs into bullying the Intercessor into releasing the stories.

Miles

You know... I think the reason Cat can keep the ritual going is because she's not the one actually eating the book. MASEGO is! She's just the distraction.

Or maybe it's enough for him to witness it being eaten. Either way, I bet the reason we haven't seen him since the beginning is that he's about to get a much needed power boost.

Barthumphries

I think you're right. But it's not Masego eating the book. He is far too pragmatic and uncaring to ever be a hero. But as someone else pointed out earlier, Akua, who we already know is present...

caoimhinh

She leans on Cordelia's side because of her own personal reasons, as Catherine believes Cordelia would back her more in the plans she has planned such as the Liesse Accords and Cardinal, even though Catherine knows that objectively Hanno is the best choice but he would be more dangerous than Cordelia because while Cordelia may haggle her for every single thing she would still bend in the end, while Hanno would agree on most things yet have lines that he won't cross, and thus whenever he chooses to draw the line he will fight to the death. Or at least that's what Catherine believes.

As of now, it seems like Cat's strategy is twofold:

- A) Making each of them realize their mistakes and what they lack, and thus no matter who wins, they will have a bit of the other and be less of an extreme case than before this night.
- B) Catherine is still trying to find what the scheme of the Bard is, and how to foil it. All she knows is that leaving these two to their devices would have been a mistake.

At least she knows that this conflict between Hanno and Cordelia will not be of benefit anyone, so she must make it so they can compete without turning it into a division in the Grand Alliance, as this is not the time to be divided, since they are soon to make the final campaign in the war against Keter.

burlindw

I think that, even now, she's still avoiding backing either of them. One of the complaints that she leveled to both of them was a lack of sacrifice for the role. My guess is that she taking each of them apart to see which one puts themselves back together better. Whoever wins that will have more weight to their claim by virtue of actually overcoming a personal struggle to reach it.

RoflCat

More like it's the same with the Tower again, where to compromise is to lose.

She CAN'T back either of them as they are now, since to recognize/favor one as Warden would imply they in that state is her equal.

And between them getting some kind of revelation to grow into her equal versus her own Warden Name weakens down to their level? Pretty high chance the latter will happen if she go with that.

But the two were prideful, stubborn people who refuse to grow, so Catherine decide it's time for villainous intervention to push them out of their comfort zone to force the necessary growth.

And if all else fail I still think she would just eat the damn book and become Warden of Calernia.

Insanenoodlyguy

I now float the theory that Cat gets a “let’s face it, you only have ever had one equal” and turns to find Akua eating the book.

Frivolous

Seems quite possible yes. Akua would be completely out of left field, but Catherine does respect her as an equal.

Importantly, Akua is also not beholden to Catherine apart from the whole guilt thing. And she definitely has the chops to be Warden of the West. She’s a genius and a charmer par excellence.

She does have the whole Doom of Liesse and Diabolist thing hanging over her head and making heroes hate her, but repentance is a hero thing, though usually the repentant hero doesn’t have a past quite so vile and mass murderous.

Barthumphries

Except Cat just had a “you only see Akua as your equal” from Hakram.

MoreBeer

The big problem with Akua is no one would trust or follow her. Not heroes, not nations (of the West anyways). The heroes would see her as a card carrying villain, the nations an enemy, and the whole thing will be called a plot to make Cat ruler of Calernia. As satisfying as it might be for her to become a hero, she’d never be accepted as a leader of them.

shikkarasu

I didn’t get this until reading the comments section today, but I don’t think Cat cares. She set up a situation that only the Warden of the West can resolve: The WotE about to fundamentally change the struggles of all heroes forever (bc there would always be a Villain with Bard-level foresight into their plans) and all the non-Wardens are failing to climb the Tower in time. She has created a Story that demands the best candidate in Creation show up and stop her, and if they don’t? Cat gets to sift through the Heroic Stories to track down the Warden she likes best, assuming one exists.

It’s just so elegant.

ninegardens

For all his conviction and such, and all that Cordelia is "wiser" etc etc....

She is just way less good at listening than Hanno. At least, this time, that's what this looked like.

Too busy playing the game, trying to find the angle, trying "understand", but in doing so, ignoring what is actually being said and not actually asking (or, she did "ask", but as part of the game).

And the weird part is.... for all that Cat threw her certainties in her face, tried to hurt her.... It was also one hell of a compliment:

"The reason you can't be warden is because you believe in something. Mortal laws for mortal men." – Cat respects her for that... it just makes her a poor fit for the job.

Reader in the Night

Sure, but I argue that her having mad respect for Cordy (and props where props is due, the Lady deserves it) shouldn't actually have influenced the way the conversation needed to go:

The reason Catherine respects is because she would be awful at the job, and Catherine should have made sure to hammer that home. In some parts, it looks weirdly like Cordelia understood the insult, but.

How is "mortal laws for mortal men" actually an indictment of Cordelia?

Two dozen snakes

>How is "mortal laws for mortal men" actually an indictment of Cordelia?

How is it not? She's trying to become the Warden of the West here! She can't keep thinking of heroes as subjects, as if she'd just trade the office of ruler of procer for that of ruler of heroes. The Warden of the West can only be a ruler of heroes if they have the martial might to enforce it

shikkarasu

Because Heroes are barely mortal. They don't outlive regular people, but they stand next to gods until the day they die. You don't just show up with a fancy hat and say 'change in management, folks'. That will get you laughed out of the room, or politely escorted somewhere lacking sharp edges on the furniture.

Juff

Typo Thread:

kind vintage > kind of vintage was half-empty > was a half-empty do way > do away in our talks. > in our talks."
down it down > it down except people > except the people off cloak > off, the cloak wereyou > were you your away > your way heroes do wrong > heroes doing wrong me the lack > me for the lack heroine" > heroine

pirateddesigns

>>"It's habit by now," Catherine Foundling confessed, sounding just a touch too grieved to be lying. "But there's power in it, always has been. So ask yourself, Cordelia, before you make yourself into a heroine" what is that you want that power for?"

Should be:

"It's habit by now," Catherine Foundling confessed, sounding just a touch too aggrieved to be lying. "But there's power in it, always has been. So ask yourself, Cordelia, before you make yourself into a heroine: what is it that you want that power for?"

Xinci

Nah, grieved is right since she isn't indicating feeling insulted, she is noting melancholy over what she has done.

Liliet

Yeah grieved is definitely right.

caoimhinh

Hanno be like:

"Hey, you. You're finally awake. You were trying to stop the Warden, right?

Walked right into that Night ambush. Same as us, and Painted Knife over there."

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Vivienne, popping out of nowhere for meme purposes: "Damn you claimants. Calernia was fine before you came along! Keter was nice and lazy."

Hanno: "We're all brothers and sisters in binds now, Thief."

nimelennar

Princess.

RoflCat

Which means the appropriate response would be.

Excuuuuuuuuuuuuuuuuuuuuuuuuuuuuuuuuuuuse me, princess.

Frivolous

Question: Why did Catherine wince here, if she did?

Quote from above:

"Indeed," Cordelia confirmed. "I imagine that your plans for the Book of Some Things are nearing their end, which invites urgency in our talks.

For a moment she thought she saw the other woman wince at the mention of the artefact, but it might have been a trick of the light. A single fleck of red cast just as many shadows as it did their opposite.

ruduen

I imagine she's going to flinch anytime someone else mentions the Book by the full name.

It probably takes her effort to not groan every time.

Dsce12

Pretty sure that she cringed at the name of the book

Sugar Roll

That's because Catherine knows the true name of the book is Disney.

sidehammer056302

Someone help me out, just so I'm clear. Hanno's unworthy because he lacks perspective and governing experience. And Cordelia's unworthy because she too lacks perspective, this time of the heroes side, and because she doesn't actually want the Name?

Also, Cat just casually tossing heroes of the tower and breaking limbs? XD Fucking love that!

caoimhinh

Hmm, I think there are quite a few ways to see it, different readers might provide a different perspective.

The way I see it, it's not that Hanno is unworthy, so much as it's that claim causes problems. His success would create a political mess in Procer (to be fair, everything is a political mess for Procer's Highest Assembly), plus Catherine is leery about having him as Warden of West because she feels that he will fight her to the death the moment there is a serious disagreement even if he would be cooperative in almost everything, while she thinks Cordelia can be made to bend even if she would have to haggle for every single thing. On paper, Hanno is the best choice, but due to realpolitik (as in, Proceran Political Bullshit), there are several issues that would arise from it, like that Princess that wants to deliver her crown to Hanno.

Cordelia is unworthy because she is letting her own bias and resentment blind her to the hypocrisy of her position. How she puts Proceran nobles' benefit above everything (she is constantly worried about setting precedents that might threaten the Princes' privileges), and then coats it on higher obedience to the law. She is a politician, not a hero. She is a ruler, not a leader.

Cordelia doesn't really want to be Named, she just thinks that's what will let her do what she wants, she sees it as her duty, but she really does not believe that Named should have such authority, and that is a contradiction when she is trying to become a Named of authority over Named.

Thing is, Hanno wants to be a guide for the Heroes, while Cordelia wants to be their First Prince and rule over them and judge them and punish them. Cordelia's claim becomes problematic because she wants to make her Role an inherently vindictive one, always eager to persecute them, and that kind of approach runs counter to what being a Hero is, and will only be perceived as tyranny by the Heroes, it's doomed to fail, so she needs to drop that kind of mentality if she wants to continue.

Evgeny Permyakov

Proceran politics is tertiary to Cat. The main Hanno's sin both in Cat's and Cordelia's eyes was his unwillingness to police the heroes. He was going to lead, teach and console them, and that's an entirely different thing. Wardens do not lead or teach, they supervise and enforce rules.

> Cordelia's claim becomes problematic because she wants to make her Role an inherently vindictive one, always eager to persecute them, and that kind of approach runs counter to what being a Hero is,

No it doesn't. A righteous vengeance and maintaining law&order is a perfect Hero thing.

caoimhinh

But she doesn't have a righteous vengeance, just grudges born out of her blaming other people for the messes of her own court.

Also, oppression and vindictive persecution are not the same as maintaining law and order. She is not saying "when one of them steps out of line, I will bring them to heel" she is saying "They are like that, and they need to be punished, and they need to be handled with an iron fist because otherwise they will not behave" which is a gross generalization, shows lack of understanding, and shows ill-intentions.

She isn't so much saying "I'm gonna fight crime" as saying "There is this group of people who are the ones who commit crimes, and I'm gonna go down on them."

Two completely different kinds of discourses.

Evgeny Permyakov

>But she doesn't have a righteous vengeance,

She personally doesn't. But she certainly can ride such a story.

> She is not saying "when one of them steps out of line, I will bring them to heel" she is saying "They are like that, and they need to be punished, and they need to be handled with an iron fist because otherwise they will not behave"

You are mixing opinion with public position.

Cordelia, having to deal with the shit Heroes regularly put on her plate, has every right to be mad at them. Cordelia, being a politician, is not stupid enough to think she can cancel Heroes. So, she is going for the next best thing: to regulate them. Whether she hates Heroes is irrelevant in this context, her being capable of fulfilling the Role and acting within it matters.

Salt

> her being capable of fulfilling the Role and acting within it matters.

Which is actually the problem, because as Catherine pointed out, she can't fulfill the Role. She doesn't have the competence and expertise to do so Much the same way that Cordelia herself was pretty miffed at Hanno for touching the dwarven negotiations with nonexistent diplomatic expertise, and Named for judging her as a ruler with nonexistent experience with rule, she's also the same when it comes to claiming the Name of Warden.

She's trying to fulfill the Role with absolutely no understanding of how Names or Roles work, has demonstrated a lack of interest in even attempting to find out (as Catherine pointed out, she had lots of chances and threw them all away), and is passing Judgement on half the Named on the continent with nonexistent experience with what being Named means.

Cordelia's story regarding her and Named is about as much "righteous vengeance", as the Lone Swordsman blindly criticizing Catherine without knowing anything about her was "righteous vengeance".

Evgeny Permyakov

>Which is actually the problem, because as Catherine pointed out, she can't fulfill the Role.

Yes, it is a problem, because

>She's trying to fulfill the Role with absolutely no understanding of how Names or Roles work,

This I don't disagree with.

>has demonstrated a lack of interest in even attempting to find out

This, on the other hand, is blatantly wrong. Cordelia do have an interest, because she needs it to accept the role, and uses Augur to work through it.

Salt

She's had her entire life to learn Namelore, including the five years since she started really getting into continental-scale conflicts with Named, and made a decision to start looking into it just recently while claiming the title of Warden.

That's like Hanno making a bid to be elected First Prince and recently doing some light reading on diplomacy to prepare for it, solely because he decided he wanted to be First Prince last week.

In both cases, it wouldn't make any sense to rely on such a shallow understanding of the subject to attempt fulfilling such an insanely critical role.

Relying so heavily on the Augur is actually more proof of her inexperience and lack of suitability than a point in her favor here. It's extremely basic Namelore that oracles are notoriously prone to failing or being unreliable at critical moments. That kind of basic mistake just cannot be made by a Named with half the authority of the Bard herself.

milieu

This thread is awesome for illustrating the depth of PGtE

Abrakadabra

Hanno actually did that though. He decided to become a ruler without preparation while cordy did the same, she wants to be named without preparation.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

>"There is this group of people who are the ones who commit crimes, and I'm gonna go down on them."

That's almost as lewd as that time Masego and Cat held hands. 😊

sidehammer056302

It's hard for me to see that the Name cares anything about politics, only power and the Role. If this was truly Cat's decision, I think she'd make it and be done with it, but that's not what she's doing. It's the Name's choice, and it finds both candidates wanting.

I appreciate you mentioning hypocrisy on Cordelia's part, that's a fine way to put it, but at the same time, I'm not sure having an overseer for good is a contradiction in terms, unless the Divine truly views Heroes as above question and all their actions as inherently Good. Which I don't think is the case, because they have things like anti-heroes and anti-villains, people change allegiances, so it's known that Good can lose its way. If Good can lose its way, couldn't that necessitate a Warden to keep them on track and dole out punishment? Does the Role care whether the intentions of the individual behind that function are purely noble so long as the function is fulfilled?

caoimhinh

Yep, what I meant is that there are political consequences no matter which one of them gets the Name in the end. The Name doesn't care about politics, but the claimant does, especially Cordelia, since she is moved and restrained by political considerations.

The Role is a nascent one, so it is heavily influenced by who the first bearer of the Name is. While they both would fulfill the functions, they have different approaches to it.

It's not that having an overseer for Good is a bad thing, but there is a difference between a person who is ready to punish and a person who is eager to punish.

Hanno wants to guide Heroes and be there for what they need, as a guide and leader, not as a ruler or prosecutor. He has also proved that he can intervene and punish them if they lose their way, like he did with Mirror Knight. When the time comes to enforce a rule or law, Hanno will do it, but in every other instance, he will be there providing advice and guidance so that there doesn't need to be a punishment.

Cordelia wants to be like a First Prince who rules over them, to bind them to her mandate, and she is actively looking to punish them for what she perceives as their failure to adhere to the right way of things. Yet Heroes will never tolerate having a tyrant over them, a politician trying to control their actions and punish them for not following the bureaucracy.

And between Hanno and Cordelia, she is the one who has shown that she can bend her principles and righteousness due to politics, going back on her words and even keep an atrocity like the Crusade ongoing because it would have been personally inconvenient to stop it.

Evgeny Permyakov

>When the time comes to enforce a rule or law, Hanno will do it

Chapter 33 disagrees.

>If he believed a law unjust he would not follow it, and would not expect anyone in his place to do otherwise.

>"That is," Hanno of Arwad said, "what the Warden of the West must be. Not a king or a judge but the intercessor between necessity and faith. Neither leash nor lash, a guide to the lost and hand to faltering.

Linnus42

Not all Laws are good. Do you think he should enforce slavery because its the Law of some land?

If a Hero steps out of line Hanno will bring down the hammer to put them back in line.

Evgeny Permyakov

>Not all Laws are good.

Laws are not good or bad, they are not people. Laws are either practical or not. Impractical laws may be repelled, but until then they are to be enforced. That's exactly the point of having laws: to have a publicly codified universal code of conduct.

>If a Hero steps out of line Hanno will bring down the hammer to put them back in line.

You are actively ignoring what was written in the story.

Linnus42

Did you just really justify enforcing slavery?

Mirror Knight stepped out of line and Hanno brought him back into line.

Red Axe got executed.

Tariq, Cordelia never brought charges.

Saint died in the attempt.

So no i think its you who is not reading but what does one expect from a slavery SIMP.

Frivolous

Insulting someone in a comments section over an interpretation demonstrates poor character.

I don't see why anyone should bother to respond to you again. Not worth it.

Evgeny, condolences on the insult. Hope you are okay and can ignore it and the one who launched it. Reflects on them rather than on you.

Evgeny Permyakov

Yes, if a country has laws supporting slavery, and it has deep enough roots in culture and it makes sense economically, enforcing slavery laws might be a good idea for continual existence of said society.

If you are unhappy with such society, you should change it or destroy it outright. But selectively ignoring some of its laws will make more harm than good.

And stop ignoring chapter 33 already.

Agent J

Well, he'll bring down a slap on the wrist at least. A lack of willingness to hammer is one of the main contentions with Hanno's candidacy.

caoimhinh

But the thing is, Chapter 33 is not from Hanno's perspective; that statement is just Catherine's impression. You cannot use Cat's opinion as if it were an absolutely correct thing.

Of course, there is a limit to what can be asked of him (or any person) through a rule or law. It's not like he will blindly obey if an abusive law is passed. Not even the common people do that, hence why there are protests, uprisings, revolutions, and amendments to laws and even constitutions.

Still, the point is that so far, between Hanno and Cordelia, he is the one that has stood by the agreements he signed, the promises he made, and enforced the rules he was charged to enforce. Sure, he is has a line that he won't cross, like anybody else, but that's a matter of principle and that point is not so easily reached, as we have seen that Hanno is one of the most reasonable people in the story, and he is always willing to listen to others.

Whereas Cordelia has bent to political demands, went back on signed agreement, started a Crusade for political ambitions and then kept it going because it was politically inconvenient for her to stop. She is not without morals nor is she malicious, but her good intentions can be bound and strangled by bureaucracy and politics. Which is not what anyone wants nor needs

Another difference is that Hanno has consistently shown that before going for punishment, he will try lots of different things and help people avoid needing to be punished.

Take his fight against Mirror Knight, for example. Before that point, Hanno talked with him and made arguments, while in his head he was constantly looking for a way to end things in such a way that he didn't have to kill Christophe. He was ready to do it, he didn't want to punish him in such a way, but would do it if Mirror Knight forced him. Hanno wasn't eager to dole out punishment, and instead was conciliatory until the end, even if he was ready to do what was necessary, and thanks to his efforts he managed to reach a solution where none of the Heroes died.

Compare to Cordelia, who is eagerly desiring to punish the Heroes for the slights she perceives, and funnily enough in those examples the ones most responsible weren't the Heroes but rather the politics involved, and it's easy to see how she might be a superb Proceran politician, she is not fit to be a leader of Heroes.

Evgeny Permyakov

> You cannot use Cat's opinion as if it were an absolutely correct thing.

I totally can, because guess what, the situation is about what Cat and Cordelia think about Hanno. Besides, Cat's opinion is basically a summary of what Hanno told her.

>She is not without morals nor is she malicious, but her good intentions can be bound and strangled by bureaucracy and politics.

Which is exactly what is the point of the Wardens: to make Named less disastrous for everyday functioning of society of mortals, i.e. politics.

>Another difference is that Hanno has consistently shown that before going for punishment, he will try lots of different things and help people avoid needing to be punished.

Basically, you are telling that Hanno helps Heroes to avoid the rule of the law which is exactly the thing Cat and Cordelia want to quench. How does it make Hanno a good Warden? It makes him a Good Warden, but this isn't what Cordelia or Cat want.

sidehammer056302

"...there is a difference between a person who is ready to punish and a person who is eager to punish."

Is there, though? That's really what I'm wondering here. Objectively, yes, I agree, and once again I appreciate you boiling it down to the exact difference being "ready" and "eager" but in a story where Above and Below have painted Labels on everything in this vague cosmic game of theirs, I'm not too sure.

Nascent as the Name is, will it really care so long as the Role is carried out? Maybe it will, and Good will have a chance to surprise us, but I think it's been demonstrated enough that Good is just as ruthless as Evil when it comes to enacting its will.

caoimhinh

Hmm, I think there is indeed a difference.

Here we have two very capable people who have different opinions on what the new policy of the group should be, and while they both have the potential to fulfill their tasks, the attitude with which they are going to go at it will make a world of difference.

As it currently stands, there is no set Role for what the Warden of the West is or must do, so whatever they think must be the Role, will be the Role, at least to some degree.

Cordelia wants to police the Heroes because she thinks they are untouched and nobody has made them responsible of anything nor punished them for their mistakes and crimes. So she not only is looking forward to punish them, she already considers them guilty.

Hanno will be a leader and counselor, not a boss watching over their shoulders to make sure they are working properly. It's not as if Hanno wants to have a hands-off approach and let them do whatever they want, but he won't be after them all the time, only intervening when necessary. And yet when he does intervene, he will be ready to do what needs to be done, but will look for various alternatives first, like he did with Mirror Knight: Hanno knew that he might have to end up killing Christophe but still was conciliatory, calm, and reasonable, and though he was ready to kill Mirror Knight, he looked for a solution where he didn't have to.

Plus, Hanno did not hold grudges over his own wounds, instead choosing to dole out a punishment not aimed at hurting Christophe but towards making him a better person.

So yeah, their attitude and vision on what the Warden of the West must be like will make a big difference, since their way of doing things is different, their policies are different, and the duties they are going to set for themselves are different.

It's why two people occupying the same office are not the same, and the mandates of two presidents of a nation can be so different (of course, there are a whole plethora of other factors, but you get the point).

sidehammer056302

Very well said. I just wonder if divinely; cosmically, their methods will matter. We don't hear much from Above or Below; I'd be interested to gain some more insight, maybe from the Bard or perhaps the Dead King someday? Above seems like all the bad stuff from standard Judeo-Christian deities and Below... haven't they been completely silent? I may be forgetting, but I think the closest we've gotten has been the Sisters, no? And they're not so bad. Hmm.

Anyway, this has been a fun discussion. Hope we have something to debate in the next chapter as well! 😊

AbraKadabra

Hanno is not a leader. He is an enabler. He do not judge...Cordy is not a leader, she is a punisher. She judges heroes too harshly. Non of them leading the heroes nor will they. Only together can they do the job.

Insanenoodlyguy

She's smashing coal together till she gets a diamond. It doesn't even matter which one becomes the diamond, only that one emerges. The point is she's the villian and no half hearted claimant is going to stop her. Only her true equal can. What finally does come up those stairs and does so will be, whoever that person is.

Vortex

Hanno if he becomes warden will let heroes run unrestrained, no matter the price to his allies or the war against Keter. He is perfectly willing to allow everyone else to suffer and choke and die so a hero can follow their convictions, even if that conviction leads to stabbing his allies in the back and shattering key treaties.

Cordelia simply lacks understanding of how to lead heroes, and as she currently is, elevating her role to warden in will be divisive and many heroes will not agree to it.

There are other considerations too. Cordelia is seen as a better peacetime leader while Hanno has lots of military achievements under his name. Cordelia is probably the better leader in the long run but Hanno's story weight might be desperately needed in the war.

jesdynf

"Before we begin, let's get one thing straight. We're still sure the Dead King's worse than her, right?"

"After tonight? Bit of a coin toss. I can stitch wounds, but the Light won't heal these burns. Can we just let her eat the Book and make her go to Keter and be personally hurtful to people who deserve it?"

"I won't say I'm not sympathetic, but who does that leave for Warden?"

"How badly do you want make her regret this exercise?"

And that's how Indrani, Warden of the West, helped save Calernia.

Liliet

Bless.

IDKWhoitis

Well, I'm not entirely surprised that Archer was somehow able to fight that many heroes with a little help, but I am deeply curious as to how. Probably a series of illusions and traps lanced with some downright unsporting cheating.

As for Cordy, it felt...long?

I do wonder how Hanno's night went after being tossed out. Was he just sitting there thinking, watching the sky, then suddenly snapped back into it as Kallia fell? I wonder how the following conversation is going to go. Will Cordy be beat down enough to relinquish the claim? Not that it would make Hanno the automatic winner by far, but between the two of them, I think Cordy got a worst thrashing of the pride and beliefs. It could also be Cordy does sit down and start going through Hanno's thought process (and maybe, just maybe learns to trust it a little more.)

I do think the Heroes are going to crash into the throne room, and I hope that's the next chapter. Although if they were thrown out the tower that would also make sense.

The last question I'm left pondering...Could the Tombmaker use the Mirror knight as a particularly dense blunt weapon on the other heroes? It certainly would complicate things for the heroes...

caoimhinh

Time has been working weirdly that whole night. Remember how a few chapters ago, Catherine sent the Heroes to Arcadia, and then took three steps, and received news about what they had already done in Arcadia?

But yeah, Hanno was probably just sitting there meditating about what Catherine told him. He is pretty prone to introspection and reflection, given his constant practice of meditation since he became a White Knight.

Adrian V

Honestly is that trait of Hanno that makes me wanna see him as the warden, even now i think Hanno reflected a lot more than Cordelia, but the night still isn't finished so who knows who will learn more in the end.

Honestly if it wasn't because of weird name rules the obvious best choice for the title is the one capable of step aside for the sake of everyone else (since the crux of the conflict here is that the way they were fighting for it both would fail)

boballab

"Well, I'm not entirely surprised that Archer was somehow able to fight that many heroes with a little help, but I am deeply curious as to how. Probably a series of illusions and traps lanced with some downright unsporting cheating."

The answer was given by Hanno when he fought Indrani back in Occidental I by Hanno:

"She was good, but those instincts were- Hanno's eyes narrowed as he studied her once more. The ease she handled those two longknives with, the way they just seemed to fit. Those instincts were not an Archer's instincts. "You're becoming the Ranger," Hanno said."

I said it a while back and the story line has proven me right: The Ranger Name is OP. Indrani is a claimant to that name, and it was a clue about how Hanno needed to fit a new name, and she is changing to that Name, becoming less the Archer and fight more like Ranger and Ranger can fight that many opponents without illusions.

Liliet

Funny how I've seen the opinion Cat was harsher on Hanno than Cordelia, too.

Reader in the Night

I really feel like Cat went super-easy on Cordelia. Like, not punishing this ridiculously wrong claim:

>"What cannot be learned is the understanding of where heroes falter," she told the Warden, meeting the dark eye lit in red. "Where they step beyond the bounds of duty and do more harm than good."The insinuation that she only trusted through control was particularly rich, coming from the Black Queen. The same woman who had put a knife to the throat of every living being on Calernia to force her enshrinement into the Grand Alliance."You have no practicals, Cordelia," Catherine harshly said. "That's the entire fucking point of what I'm saying: your record with heroes is line after line of nothings. It's not enough to avoid most mistakes. <

It's not a line of nothings, it's an actual line of mistakes and blunders. Mostly with Hanno, but Hanno genuinely represents Heroic interests. Cordelia's dislike of Heroes has influenced her every interaction with them, so most don't like her any more than she likes them.

Reader in the Night

GAH, WordPress mauled my post!

Reader in the Night

Well, nevermind. Before WordPress ate most of my post I was pointing out that Cordelia's claim that perspective cannot be learned is utter nonsense, as Cristophe clearly learned and Hanno is learning it right now.

Then I pointed out that Cordelia saying she's less Evil than the Warden of the Freaking East is an utterly idiotic argument, because she's gunning for the Role of Leader of Heroes, her standards need to be not only higher but flawless.

And thirdly, yeah, Cordy burning bridges.

Trupo

Cat giving relationship therapy to Hanno and Cordelia; now I saw everything.

Ten silvers say she's going to make them share the Name via marriage.

shikkarasu

10 Denarii says Warden of the West will stay one Name, but one or both of Hanno/Cordelia gain a Name focused on supporting the Warden not unlike Adjutant, Scribe, or Captain.

Insanenoodlyguy

They will both be great supports for Warden Akua. Meanwhile Vivienne face heel turns again and becomes the first Black Princess.

nimelennar

I don't think they can share a Name; a few chapters back, they said it's usually only siblings who can.

shikkarasu

Shush, I'm about to make 10 denarii off of this.

boballab

The word "usually" means that it is only most of the time not all of the time and does not bar a different type of pairing. So yes they can share a Name, but they would need to meet some type of condition...probably something like marriage. In most western style religious marriages and partly in secular marriages the official overseeing the ceremony will say something about 2 becoming 1 and EE could use that here.

RoflCat

If there isn't a precedent, BE one.

They are facing the person who literally is the first Warden of the East (among many other firsts in her list), that excuse of there being no precedent doesn't fly.

ohJohN

It's notable that this is from Cordy's POV, who (we're continuously reminded) is shit at namelore, and her conclusion is based on only the historical records available to her. Remember that Amadeus (with a very deep understanding of namelore and access to more & likely better historical records about Named) was surprised by Hanno's coin aspect, and the Bard remarked that type appeared rarely enough he probably wouldn't have heard of it.

This is an assumption Cordelia makes about the world based on the evidence at hand, not a True Fact Passed Down By The Gods.

ohJohN

This theory keeps cropping up, and I just straight up don't understand how them getting married would help anything.

My money's still on them sharing/splitting the Name, and it seems likely that next chapter will involve them reconciling at least a little. But what advantage would they gain by being married vs. just generally on good terms and willing to work together? It's equally unprecedented for non-siblings to share a Name whether they're married or not.

Liliet

You're missing the shipping point. This isn't about in-universe concerns.

ohJohN

Fair enough. There've been a few comments that seemed like they thought it made sense for plot reasons (the comment I replied to isn't particularly representative, it was just the final straw of 'wow people sure are talking about this marriage theory a lot??') and that probably colored my perception of the obvious shipposting ones 😊

Liliet

I mean, making serious plot-tying-together analysis about shitposting claims is half the fun of shitposting,

Michael J Mooney

Because of the story/statement it makes. Coming together in marriage is a unifying act that throughout history has been used to unite countries, armies, tribes, or even just families. So them getting married would act to unify their claims to be Warden.

ChillyPepper

I'm not sure why, but i feel like the argument blade cut towards Hanno a bit deeper than towards Cord. Perhaps different approaches for different people, a harsher approach for him and a more logical one for her.

It felt a bit softer on Cord's side (for me), and I feel a bit disappointed.

ohJohN

Hard disagree. Hanno was a lot more aggressive in his conversation and Cat responded in kind, but she primarily tore into him about his hypocrisy and arrogance, both warranted. Cordelia approached the conversation less confrontationally and so Cat was more superficially amiable, but she was still pretty brutal and bluntly laid out how Cordelia fucked up, wasn't her equal, etc. – even saying that not actually wanting the Name was worse than Hanno's deficiencies. (And was I the only one who read the comment Cat made about the Augur this chapter? That seemed way crueler than anything she said to Hanno.)

Sugar Roll

A sleeping princess and a white knight. The question is, did Hanno wake her up with a kiss?

shikkarasu

The only think I hate more than this trope is how hard I blushed when I read it. Take my *ing upvote.

Frivolous

When Cordelia refers to Hanno as 'dear Hanno', that was so very Praesi. Very Malicia.

It might kill Cordelia if she were told that. And in truth, to defeat Malicia, or even to hold off Malicia in the political and economic wars she had been waging against her, Cordelia had to become just a little like Malicia.

Loonie

if this is all just a "now kiss" play by Catherine, this is the most awkward and stretched out build-up one could imagine.

warden of the East, matchmaker of the West?

boballab

Yeah that would be funny centuries down the road and there is a new Warden of the West finding one of his aspects being "Marriage of Wardens".

RoflCat

It's the villain mentor play imo, mainly for Cordelia and Hanno but she's still teaching the others too.

Like teaching the Artificer to not use explosion (of Light) when in confined spaces, or the Painted Knives in this chapter 'being quiet alone isn't enough to be sneaky'

The only exception is of course the Apprentice, cuz she's a gud girl.

Rynjin

Glad to see the serial itself backing up exactly what I've been saying for the last 4 chapters.

laguz24

I don't get the headcannon that Cordelia was unwilling to deal with cat because she was a lowborn villain. She's far too pragmatic for that. It was more because her internal political problems and her foreign allies in the grand alliance made it politically unfeasible. Plus she didn't have as much control over the 10th crusade as she pretended she did.

boballab

That was exactly the main part of the problem, where Hanno would never compromise the reverse was very true of Cordy especially back then. She would always look for the compromise and never take a stand and say "I am right and you will fall in line" something she would need as Warden of the East. Remember even to get to this point in her claim she had to make a compromise with the other Princes of Procer in a secret meeting. That was the whole thrust of what Cat was saying, you can't compromise your way into a Name, you have to stand and seize it. Cat even warned her she would regret to bowing to that internal political compromise and she was right and we saw later on in the story there was ways for a First Prince to ram something through... she just wasn't willing to pay the price or make the sacrifice to achieve it which was something also Cat pointed out. She always had someone else pay the price or sacrifice for it thus the reason for Cat's dig about her running out of relatives.

Liliet

yeah that's One Guy who has the most interesting Cordelia takes
ohJohN

Same, I thought it was pretty explicit by this point that she couldn't budge on the crusade due to political necessity. Cat even notices after her 'look, despite being a villain I'm not a deranged cannibal, I want peace and will make VERY SIGNIFICANT concessions' speech, Cordelia seems to believe her and genuinely considers it but, maddeningly and inexplicably, still refuses.

Cordelia underestimated her for those reasons, but she was willing to do the monthly domain-meetings and pretty clearly had a reason beyond petty prejudice why she couldn't compromise.

beleester

Wow, even Cordelia is pointing out that this whole debate has been vague generalities.

Daniel E

I'd like to take a moment for us all to appreciate the fact that Cat is now frequently throwing Heroes off the top of an evil tower. Dread Empress Erroneous would be proud.

The Ignorant Student

THANK YOU!!! Finally! This is exactly what I hate about Cordelia, that she is probably the single most ignorant character when it comes to Names, that she actively hates them, and that her only motivation to become Warden is so that a Named doesn't get the title!

But anyway, I feel like part of the problem with both Hanno and Cordelia is that they both think the West Warden has to be the same as East Warden, when it really shouldn't be. Everyone agrees Tariq would have been the perfect Warden, and when you look at him you see someone who was willing to do the hard things, but always did them himself. And when he could avoid violence he worked to do so. West Warden is less of an active role because Heroes don't need the same iron fist that Villains do. I see West Warden as something closer to Hierarch, they aren't an active ruler or leader, but push comes to shove and they will take down entire Choirs. East needs to show off and keep their boot to the neck of anyone thinking of acting up. West needs to leave Heroes to do their job and only step in when someone goes too far. Above and Below are different people with different perspectives and Roles, but Hanno and Cordelia both act like they have to be a mirror image of Cat.

boballab

I mostly agree with you but it isn't the fact that Cordy has problems with hero's that makes her a bad claimant, it is her tendency to always compromise and never take a stand and pay the price herself. If she tried to be the head of the hero's the way she led Procer it would be a disaster because the favor trading that she is used to wouldn't work. The classic example is the Mirror Knight situation, Cordy wouldn't pay the price of stopping him like Hanno did, she would try and find a compromise and when that failed (MK isn't known for being a compromising sort) have someone else do the dirty work. Cordy and Hanno have basically completely reversed problems being the Warden. Hanno never compromises first and Cordy always tries and compromise first, neither knows how to pick and choose, which was why Tariq would have been so good as Warden. Respected by both Named and un Named and knew when to bend and when not to. He had the years of experiences to get him to that point (as we saw in his backstory) something Hanno and Cordy both lack yet. It is why it would have been better if Tariq had mentored Hanno and not MK because learning when to bend is basically all Hanno needs to learn.

Liliet

I don't think Tariq would have been a perfect WotW.

ChillyPepper

He would've been horrible, the only reason he became reasonable was because he was met with opposing and probably stronger force. Imagine if he was on the same scale.

Abnaxis

My prediction: Hanno and Cordelia will both abdicate, Cat will wind up eating the Book, and the principal alienation from absorbing all that power will fuck with her mind so much she'll wish she was the Sovereign of Moonless Nights again.

Insanenoodlyguy

She prepares for just that and then Akua eats the book

Someperson

Well, I dunno about the specifics, but I reckon I might see the thrust of this story.

Catherine is threatening all of the powers that stand behind Good. A little bit like when she got some angels to resurrect her way back when, only with higher stakes.

If her “villainous plan” succeeds, then the Book of Some Things gets devoured, and both of the Warden of the West claimants are fully discredited. Probably there is no Warden of the West. Possibly Catherine just becomes The Warden, period. The institution of Heroism itself might be shaken.

Only Catherine probably won’t succeed. I don’t think she plans on succeeding at eating the book (although win or lose she still gets the essentials of what she wants). She is making a credible threat that if nobody else can step up and do “Warden of the West” right, then she will.

And if the heroes and the gods and the angels and the heroic stories don’t like that, they’d better do something about it. They’d better fast-track having a worthy Warden right now, and not in five years.

BargleNawdleZouss

I still say this is all a cunning plan to get Cat another shot at the Wandering Bard/Intercessor. TBD!

superkeaton

Lovely.

sengachi

I’ve been thinking more about what Cat was criticizing of Cordelia in this most recent chapter and (forgive me if someone’s already pointed this out)-

Well I don’t think Cat was criticizing Cordelia’s policies or her ideas or what she wants to do with the Warden position. Any day of the week, Cat would pick Cordelia’s position over Hanno’s. What she was criticizing was simply whether or not Cordelia could pull it off.

Yes, it would be great to have someone reign the heroes in. Yes, Cat would love to have a counterpart who agrees with her on that.

Yes Cat would indeed like to see equal rule of law apply to all Named. These are things they agree would be good to have.

But all that is pie in the sky if Cordelia can't make that happen. And that's the problem. Cordelia thought that if she earned the Warden of the West Name by proving to Cat that she's the right person for the job, she'll be able to make that happen. What was missing, and why she fails as a candidate, isn't her policies. (Cat may not necessarily agree with all of them, but they're not disqualifying in the way Hanno's are). The problem is that Cordelia simply lacks the personal power to enforce her edicts.

It's not that she'd be a bad Warden. It's that, as is, she simply can't be a Warden at all. She's not a bad option, she's a non-option.

Zopilote 506

Its been like 3 months but I finalmy caught up. Man Cathererine is playing them like a fiddle

Steven Silver

I'm calling it now: Cat's going to repurpose the ritual to fuse the White Knight and First Prince Cordelia into the perfect claimant! Enter First White Prince Knight Cordelianno of Hassenwad, Warden of the West!

Barthumphries

First White Prince, Knight Cordelianno of Hassenwad. When adjectives come from the same category there must be a comma between them. shrug

Barthumphries

A lot of people have written a lot about the difference between Hanno and Cordelia. Here's the difference in a nutshell.
Hanno is now Neutral Good.
Cordelia has become Lawful Neutral.
Cat was presented the choice between Good and Lawful. What she wants is Lawful Good.

Interlude: Occidental V

"Adversity tempers, power tests."

– Helikean saying

It was as if all the world had been cut down to three sights: the night sky above, the pale plains below and the tall tower bridging them. The dark was quiet, and there was not another soul to be found for miles around them.

"We are returned to Creation," Hanno said, offering his hand to the prone princess.

Cordelia Hasenbach looked at it as it were a snake, then something like contempt flickered across her face. Jaw squared, she took the hand and he helped her rise from the grass. Her legs were unsteady but the First Prince was a stubborn woman: she toughed it out until her stance firmed.

"Do you know how much time has passed?" the princess asked.

"Since you were taken? I can only guess," he replied. "But between my arrival here and yours, barely time enough for a kettle of water to boil. Arcadia makes sport of any who would measure its time."

Had it been hours for those in the realm of the fae, moments? More the former than the latter, he guessed, but guesses were all he had to give. Hanno waited as Hasenbach gathered her bearings, taking in the utter emptiness of the plain around them before her gaze moved to the tower. The gate that Christophe had smashed open still lay sagging on its hinges, almost an invitation.

"I suspect," Cordelia Hasenbach said, "that passing the threshold unprepared would be a costly mistake."

"It ends soon," Hanno quietly agreed. "Have your instincts grown enough to feel it?"

Cool blue eyes considered him. No answer came.

"It is in the air," Hanno told her. "The roads grow short for the lack of ground left to tread."

It was like a shortness of breath or unease in the limbs. The sensation that the story would soon reach its conclusion and that he was not ready. Here and now, the two of them alone under the sky, was the last chance to turn it around.

"Like an edge," the princess finally said. "It feels like the moment before defeat, when the wheels and cogs are already moving but just before they snap into place."

Hanno nodded. It was impressive, he thought, that even as a claimant she would have so sharp an impression. But then the First Prince had always been an impressive woman, hadn't she? That had never been the trouble with her.

"The threshold is the point of no return," the dark-skinned man pensively said. "But we have time before that, all the room that can be found in the boundary between Arcadia and Creation."

That was what the world whispered to him, the current his crippled hand could almost feel. Time was undefined now, made... malleable by the gap between the two realms. But the story would lock into place the moment they crossed the threshold, leaving only the closure.

"Of course we do," the First Prince said, sounding disgusted. "How many steps ahead did she plan this?"

Hanno's lips thinned.

"Too many," he said.

Blues eyes left the tower, returning to him.

"Then this conversation," Cordelia Hasenbach calmly said, "is what determines victory and defeat."

Victory and defeat, huh. Loaded words, on a night like this one: whose meaning for them was to be taken as gospel? His, the First Prince's, Catherine's? Or maybe that was the point of it all, he thought. Choosing whose lines in the sand determined the nature of the game.

"I am beginning to believe," Hanno said, "that thinking in those terms is the first mistake. In a fight, someone must lose."

"And what would you call this instead?" the First Prince of Procer said, gesturing around them.

Grass painted pale by moonlight, the depthless dark above and in between the tower that belonged to neither. Like stairs joining the heavens and the dirt. Going up or going down? Not something you could know, Hanno thought, before your foot first touched the stone.

"A journey, perhaps," the Sword of Judgement finally replied.

Something with a beginning and an end, but not a battle. Not without struggle, for so few things were, but not something defined by struggle.

"A journey," Cordelia Hasenbach repeated, tone musing.

The princess's hand rose, fingers extended, as below them both the grass shivered from the breeze. Like she was trying to catch the wind.

"Maybe," the fair-haired woman said. "But I am not so certain you and I are on the same one, Hanno of Arwad."

A reply came to mind silver-quick, from the old law-riddles of Arishot's Ruminations. Can strangers ever be on the same journey? He'd loved those scrolls as a young court scribe in Arwad, the way they forced you to think. Arishot had not written to make laws but instead lawmakers, asking questions that bent one's understanding until flaws were revealed. That riddle warned against common blame, Hanno had thought, against faulting a rower and a captain the same way for a crime. But which of us is the rower, Cordelia Hasenbach, and the captain?

"I had thought," Hanno admitted, "that this would end by the ascription of fault."

The First Prince studied him, gaze composed.

"But no longer?"

Hanno snorted, suddenly tired in a way that had nothing to do with the hour.

"What does it matter," he said, "if the pool one of us drowns in is a few feet deeper than the other's?"

Hasenbach looked away as if burned by the sight of him.

"She took you to task as well," the First Prince said.

"With method and great enthusiasm," Hanno replied.

Some of that he knew she must have sat on for years. Too much of that had felt like a valve being opened, a sac of venom being drained.

"I as well," the First Prince said, then hesitated.

Hanno patiently waited.

"She is convincing, I know," the princess said. "That does not mean she is right."

"I spent most of my time on the grass," he admitted, "finishing the argument in my mind. Speaking the retorts I could not place, that escaped me in the moment."

He could see now, looking back, that she had angered him on purpose. He would have spoken better calm, seen more clearly. He could have pointed it out it was absurd to pretend that the Saint or the Pilgrim to killing innocents in the pursuit of ending an evil was equivalent to a villain simply killing for evil. That her sacrifices, the weight they had given her Name, did not make her worthy. Just strong. That Hanno himself had made mistakes, but that if those disqualified him from wardenship then her own would make her the last woman allowed anywhere her title.

Like a fencing match, he had played it again and again in his mind. Every time swatting away more of her points, scoring more of his own. But one had never budged no matter what he cast against it.

"Did it change anything?" Hasenbach asked.

He breathed out slowly.

"Nothing that matters," he admitted.

That was the difference between a fencing match and a duel, when it came down to it. One was won on points, the other ended when the opponent was killed. A thousand small cuts mattered nothing in the face of that single blow going through the heart. Do you think claimants grow on trees, Hanno? And no matter how much he turned around the words in his palm, looking for the fault, he had found none. Cool blue eyes were studying him again, looking for something in the cast of his face.

"What is it that she said that shook you so?" the First Prince asked.

An unpleasant truth, the dark-skinned hero thought. That I never stopped to consider that you might be right and I might be wrong. That your claim could be the equal to mine instead of an obstacle to overcome.

"That I should have asked you a question years ago," Hanno replied. "W-

—

"-hat is it that you want, Cordelia Hasenbach?"

His tone was as serious as it was earnest, and still Cordelia almost laughed. She looked away so he might not notice, eyes finding the vast stretch of the plains. The sea of grass where strands of shadow and light interwove, under the starlit ink of the endless sky above them. Two seeming eternities pressing down on the stark silhouette of the tower, a stubborn nail refusing to be hammered in. But nothing could fight forever, Cordelia knew. Instead you were used up grain by grain until not a speck was left, the defeat so quiet and creeping you did not know of it before it embraced you.

What did she want?

For her uncle to be alive, her family with him. That the realm she had spent half her life healing had not become a wasteland ruin, that she could have kept everyone alive. That she had won more and lost less, that she had been the kind of woman who could have saved Procer instead of being the custodian of its death throes. That Calernia might know one long and lasting summer, a golden peace and time of plenty. That she was not carrying with her so many ugly choices, so many bitter compromises. And maybe, beneath it all, that she was still the same woman than before all the sacrifices she had made.

But that was looking back, and not even the Gods could return the arrow of time to the quiver. So instead Cordelia looked forward and sought her answer, shaving away the dross one cut at a time until there was only the bone of it left. It was even simpler than she had thought.

"I want my successor to be able to hang the Peregrine," the princess said, then frowned.

That was not quite it. The arrow missed by a thumb.

"No, I speak untrue."

She breathed out, groping at the truth, and finally the words came to her,

"I want a world where it is a given the Peregrine will hang," Cordelia Hasenbach said. "Where there is no doubt that someone, anyone, who murders an entire town of innocents will die for it. That there will be no excuse, no protection, no talk of a Choir giving absolution or a greater good hiding behind the mountain of corpses."

Catherine had talked about so many heroes, about that night in the Chamber of Assembly and the crossroads of the Arsenal, but these were not the source from which it all flowed. It was that brutal campaign through the heartlands, the Black Knight burning granaries and villages to kill thousands in starvation. It was the Grey Pilgrim condemning hundreds of innocents to a painful death to catch his foe, only to then keep him alive. It had been the seed of the realization that rules, laws, did not really apply to them. That only Named were entitled to dole out justice to Named, that whatever the first colour of the cloak it always ended up red.

The Sword of Judgement took a step back, turning to face her instead of standing side by side, and Cordelia knew it had begun.

"Princes can destroy towns as well," the Sword of Judgement said, tone even. "Many have. How many were brought to justice by law?"

I fought the Great War as girl, Cordelia thought. Do you truly think you have anything at all to teach me about the cruelties of princes? She had not led her people south as an army because peace somehow did not occur to her. No one raised in the shadow of the Crown and the Plague could be ignorant of the costs of wars, even the most necessary ones.

"How many were brought to justice by heroes?" Cordelia replied.

Before the man could reply she pushed on.

"And I do not mean in the last decade," the blue-eyed princess said. "That is the scale of the immediate, the short precedent. It is not an honest examination of the past. Since the Principate was founded, Hanno of Arwad, how many princes and princesses have deservedly been slain by heroes?"

The brown-eyed man frowned.

"Given a few hours I would be able to give you a precise answer," Hanno said, "but at the moment I cannot."

Cordelia waved that away. She was not trying to ambush him, pretend that lacking an exact number would mean she somehow won the argument.

"Imprecise would be enough," she replied. "Thirty, forty, a hundred?"

He mulled that, eyes going distant for a few heartbeats. The air pulsed faintly with power. Aspect, she thought.

"Less than eighty," he finally said. "More than thirty."

And more than she had expected, but not enough to prove her wrong.

"It is a drop in the bucket," Cordelia told him. "There have been thousands of princes since the founding of Procer. Hundreds of them must have been genuinely vile and malicious. Some lived out their lives keeping their throne, I have no doubt, but most of them did not."

A crown was not power absolute and uncontested. Chosen struggled with understanding that when it came to doing Good, but even more when it came to the other side of the coin: no royalty on Calernia would be able to be truly, genuinely evil without consequence even if there were not a single hero in existence. People did not enjoy being ruled by tyrants, even skillful ones. And in the end, a ruler only had power so long as people followed them.

"Some were tried before the Highest Assembly, but I would wager not so many more than heroes have slain," she continued. "It is not a common procedure. Most were removed by their families, by the outrage of the people, by blades or poison."

Hanno shook his head.

"You think of heroes as wandering forces," he said, "but that is true of very few."

Cordelia hid her irritation. That was not at all what they had been discussing.

"For every Pilgrim and Saint there are dozens who became Named seeking to end an injustice and would then not stray far from that mandate," he said. "When finished they will beat the sword back into a ploughshare, return the enchanted ring to the old woman in the woods."

"We stray from the topic," she told him.

"We do not," Hanno calmly replied. "Named are not born out of the Gods waving a hand: those that killed princes were, in all likeliness, brutalized by those same princes. All those means to unseat tyrants you lay out failed for so long and in the face of so great a cruelty that a champion was empowered by Above to end that evil."

The blonde princess paused, genuinely taken aback. It had not occurred to her, truly, that most of the Chosen who had killed Procerans princes would be Procerans as well. In the back of her mind she had always thought of it as a foreign intervention. An outside force meddling. It was jarring to realize there was no solid reason to believe that was true.

"That such heroes existed at all," Hanno of Arwad continued, "is the mark of the utter failure of the means you defend."

He shook his head.

"You even defend the poison and blades of others while condemning the same tools in a hero's hands," he said. "I will not force on you my belief that becoming a hero means one seeks to do Good, but are you truly going to argue that it makes people less worthy?"

He was not wrong, Cordelia thought, to chide her for having let her gaze shy away from part of the truth. But that did not mean he was right. His blinders were no smaller than her own.

"It does not," the tall princess replied, "but neither does becoming Named take someone beyond laws. It is true, I cannot deny, that you have spoken the truth: the Highest Assembly, the natural means, they fail. Have failed and will fail again."

This was not a revelation for her. Cordelia had spent years convincing, arm-twisting and sometimes outright bribing the Assembly into backing what she believed to be necessary reforms. She had no illusions about the average character of royalty.

"Yet that does not mean decisions about the lives of thousands – sometimes even millions! – should be blindly entrusted to whoever first arbitrarily received power from Above," she retorted. "Good intentions are not enough: principle will not make up for a bad tax policy or lopsided trade rights."

Christophe de Pavanie was the man she thought of then. Well-meaning in so many ways, but even now still of narrow perspective and limited in judgement. Paired with power as a Named that could make him rise among the most influential of an empire, it was a recipe for disaster. At best he would be a puppet, at worse a stone around the neck of the people he had taken upon himself to rule.

"Ruling, making the decisions of a ruler, is a skill," Cordelia said. "One that requires a lifetime of training and that very few Chosen have cultivated. A bad decision by a good man will inflict a great deal more suffering than a good decision by a bad man."

A deep breath, steadying herself after the long tirade.

"You are right, the... order of things is imperfect," the princess said. "But that does not mean heroes should be allowed to do as they wish, it means the order must be fixed."

"Then fix it," the Sword of Judgement bluntly replied. "Why would any of us oppose the world being bettered?"

"You do not have to oppose it," Cordelia harshly said. "You make it unnecessary by being who you are. Why should there be significant reform to anything at all, when no matter how dire the situation becomes a hero will emerge to save the day?"

"You are arguing in the favour of disaster," Hanno slowly said, incredulous. "That lives should not have been saved?"

"I am arguing," she said, "that heroes have been killing villains and wicked princes since the founding of the Principate and it has fixed nothing. That Chosen excise tumours but do not, cannot heal the sickness that causes them."

And because of that, Cordelia realized in a moment of clarity, she had come to think of them as being part of the trouble. One of the reasons for it. But that was unfair of her. A suspicion born of the souring experiences she had had with Chosen. Blaming them for existing was like blaming a man for not allowing his throat to be cut. About that much the Sword of Judgement was right and she had been wrong.

"And that does not mean they should not exist," Cordelia said, "but it means that so long as Chosen remain the final arbiters of what is good, we cannot grow. So long as we leave the decision of what can be allowed and what must be refused in the hands of a handful smiled on by the Gods Above, nothing can change."

And that was what the Liesse Accords were, deep down, the reason that the Lycaonese princess had fought tooth and nail over provisions and sections but never once doubted she would sign it when the negotiations ended. It was a treaty that let mortals dictate rules to Named.

"That world cannot be built so long as laws do not apply to everyone," Cordelia said. "Until it is Calernia, not the Chosen few, that decide what the lines in the sand are."

The dark-haired man had gone still as stone, looking at her as if he had never seen her before.

"They gave us a choice, Hanno of Arwad, the only one that really matters," she quietly said. "Let us make it."

—

The irony, Hanno thought, was that in many ways Cordelia Hasenbach was like the very people she distrusted. The ironclad conviction that made up her spine, that he had not grasped was at the heart of all she did, was the very trait that led people to become Named. It was something Creation reacted to, embraced. And though Hasenbach might despise him for the comparison, as she spoke she had reminded him of no one so much as Tariq Isbili. The Pilgrim's own iron law had been different – the alleviation of suffering, no matter the cost – but looking at the First Prince of Procer he saw in her the same alloy of idealism and brutal pragmatism that had been the Peregrine's signature.

It was an unsettling thought.

"The changes you speak of," Hanno said, "the world would be better off for them."

The princess's lips quirked into a smile that did not reach her eyes.

"But," Cordelia Hasenbach said.

"So long as the first step to them is making heroes obey corrupt authorities," he told her, "there is no chance of them ever coming to pass."

If the foundation of her reform was to make Named bow to the very evil they had risen to defeat, then the ideal was nothing but fool's gold.

"Then let them obey something else," she said. "Rules that crowns had a hand in making but do not belong to the crowns."

He was not a fool, to need every word spelled out to him.

"The Liesse Accords," Hanno said.

Catherine Foundling's dream, the justification for her every atrocity: a muzzle on every atrocity that would come after her. As was so often the way of the Warden of the East, it was the finest of intentions raised atop a mountain of corpses. Hanno believed in their worth, but not that way that Catherine did. The rules would do good for Calernia, curb excesses, but in time they would become a tool for oppression as well. He had no illusions about their permanence, that their ability to better the world would be more than temporary.

"They can accomplish what queens and princesses cannot," the First Prince said. "A set of rules all will abide by. A first step heroes will accept."

"And for that you would become Warden of the West," Hanno thoughtfully said. "To ensure that heroes follow the rules."

The blonde princess looked faintly embarrassed as she nodded.

"I am not unaware of my weaknesses as a claimant," Cordelia said. "I lack knowledge of namelore and have not cultivated many close relationships with heroes."

Hanno hummed.

"But for what you envision the Warden of the West to be, even with those weaknesses you remain the better candidate," he plainly stated.

What she described might be best described as the heroes of Calernia being made into a guild and Cordelia Hasenbach as the head of that guild. It was not a position that would require skill at arms or even a great deal of personal power: her function would be that of an administrator and a diplomat, not a captain. It was also a position that would require her to abdicate all power in Procer, Hanno knew, a sacrifice that would earn her some respect. That she was willing to make that sacrifice did not surprise him as much as it would have an hour ago.

Tariq had never taken the Tattered Throne.

"I was expecting more of an argument from you," the First Prince delicately said.

"I do not agree with your vision," Hanno clarified. "But I do understand that from your perspective pressing your claim is the most sensible answer."

"Yet you disagree," the princess said.

"Not with your intentions," he replied. "There have been enough misunderstandings between us, so I will speak plainly: you do not need to be Warden of the West to achieve this."

It would help her, certainly, but it was not necessary. And it was turning the Role to a direction that it did not need to be turned – or should, considering that a guildmistress would not be what Above's champions would need in the wake of the war on Keter. Coolness returned to the blue eyes considering him.

"Indeed?"

"Cardinal will be the seat of the Accords," Hanno said. "And your interest lies in them more than in Named themselves. Taking up a position there as a high officer and a diplomat will place you in a position to shape laws and curb abuses exactly as you wish."

And it would not force her into the position of leader of the heroes, a position she would not enjoy or be particularly skilled at.

"If your worry is lack of influence over Named, then change the Accords to reflect what you believe is necessary," he told her. "I would support this. And as Warden, I would have no difficulty working with you."

She studied him for a long moment, then slowly nodded.

"To my own surprise," the blue-eye princess said, "I find myself believing you would try."

Hanno grimaced.

"But," he echoed.

"The question has been long in coming from my side as well," Cordelia said. "What is it that you want, Hanno of Arwad?"

For all the gravity of the situation, Hanno thought, it felt as if they were children declaiming a play at each other. Taking turns, trading tirades. They were, in a way. Fate was heavy around them, like the air before a storm, and so far in the journey every word mattered. They had run out of room to maneuver. So Hanno considered his answer carefully even though the words came easy, looking for the heart of it. It was too late for grievances to matter, for might-have-beens to be worth bringing up. Instead he looked for the source, the kernel moment of why he had come to stand here.

It was not the Arsenal, he realized to his faint surprise. The disappointments of that fortnight had been long in the coming, more flower than root.

"I want a world," Hanno said, "where you could not have called the Tenth Crusade."

The First Prince flinched. She had reason to. It all went back to that first mistake, didn't it? The moment where the woman in front of him had decided to raise Above's banner without understanding what that decision meant. Where she had put the lives of tens of thousands, of most heroes on the continent, on the line because of terribly mundane reasons. Because Procer had been plagued by disaffected mercenaries, because it had been wary of a resurgent and hostile Callow on its flank. The real reasons for the Tenth Crusade had nothing to do with the Black Queen or the Doom of Liesse: the groundwork for it being called had begun being laid years before.

"I do not believe heroes should rule," Hanno said. "We are forged for a reason, to combat an evil, and that defines what we should be: exceptional power granted to fight an exceptional evil. Come and gone in a few moons, like fireflies."

How many Grey Pilgrims and Saints of Swords were there, really? Sometimes not even a single one in a generation. Hanno believed that a dozen heroes fighting under the Grand Alliance would no longer be Named by now if they had not been drafted into the war against Keter. Their foe and mandate had been clear, stretched into the present only by the great threat looming over all the living.

"But we no longer live in a world where that is possible," he told her. "Calernia is not the same place it was even a century ago: the kingdoms are more powerful, the cities larger, the borders push ever further into the wilds. It is no longer a place where someone can simply disappear."

A century ago, the thought of something like the Truce and Terms would have been laughable. Named were too hard to find, too spread out, and who could even enforce these rules even should they be set down? Now half the younger heroes took them for granted and even the older ones expected that when a great Evil next came to Calernia the same bargain would be struck with villains.

"It is no longer possible to take up the sword and retire into obscurity after having hung it back above the mantle," Hanno said. "Heroes are sought, followed, drawn out by mortal powers. And then they are used for purposes beyond what they were meant for. From that, evil flows."

Like Christophe, whose power and candour had driven the House of Langevin to try to entrap him into some plot. The Mirror Knight should have never so much as spoken to a Langevin: he had come into his Name to protect the Elfin Dames, to face the Wicked Enchantress that would come to destroy them. If not for the Dead

King's march, he might never have left the lakeside town of his birth. Hanno had not been offended to learn that the Langevins had sunk hooks into him. Why would he be, when the plain truth of the matter was that unscrupulous souls had taken advantage of the vulnerability a good man had risk to save every living being on Calernia?

And it would keep happening again and again, the corrupt and powerful twisting power meant to do Good, so long as there was no one standing between heroes and earthly crowns. Someone who could free their hands to do Good and steer them away from being used.

"There is some truth in that," the fair-haired princess finally said. "I did not understand what I was unleashing, when I called the Tenth Crusade. I erred and many paid for it."

He slowly nodded. It was only the shallowest layer of what he had said, but it was the beginning of an understanding.

"But your words are not entirely true, are they?" the First Prince said. "Heroes seek crowns as well, 'Prince White'."

The disdain for the title was palpable but Hanno was not offended. How could he be when he agreed?

"Yes," he enthused. "Exactly. I should not be holding the authority that I took up."

For the first time since he had met her, he saw the First Prince of Procer visibly taken aback.

"I have had to because Named and kingdoms have become so intertwined as to be indistinguishable," Hanno said, "which is not a state of affairs that should exist."

It was not as if he had wanted to seize the reins. But what other choice had there been, when failing to do so might doom all of Calernia? If Hanno did not become the Warden of the West, did not lead Good's forces against the walls of Keter, he foresaw no victory. The First Prince was fit to rule, but for all that it needed a foundation of authority the Name was not about ruling.

"I have not deluded myself into thinking I am a fit ruler, Cordelia Hasenbach," Hanno told her. "I have to bear a crown, let it be a firefly's crown: gone in a few moons, when the darkness abates. And after the need has passed--"

"You would set it down and stand as Warden of the West," the First Prince calmly said. "Spending your days ensuring that heroes stay true to their purpose by keeping them apart from earthly powers, stand as the intercessor between them."

"It is not that the world is corrupt and heroes without fault," he said. "Above's blessing does not make Named more than men, beyond pettiness or cruelty. But that power comes in recognition of a need to do Good, to make the world a little better."

And maybe the princess was right and one day the world would have no need for heroes, but that day had not come. Perhaps Calernia had changed, but heroes could as well: they could meet the Age of Order on their feet instead of being overtaken by it.

"All the world needs to do is let them," Hanno pleaded.

The night air had stillness to it in the wake of his words, the First Prince's face a bland mask as she studied him in silence.

"I can see it now, I think," Cordelia Hasenbach finally said, tone eerily calm. "The trap."

Hanno frowned.

"The Warden's?" he asked.

"The Intercessor's," the First Prince replied, shaking her head. "Because whoever wins, Hanno, whichever of us steps forward, something breaks."

"Something is lost when a claimant wins over another," Hanno slowly said. "That is only natural."

The blue-eyed princess half-smiled but did not explain.

"You do not need to be Warden of the West to achieve what you spoke of," she said instead.

"It is perhaps the only way to achieve it," Hanno replied, shaking his head.

"It was pointed out to me tonight on several occasions," the princess said, "that what Named do not follow laws or titles but the individual. It is power personal, not institutional, and that is the very thing you seek to preserve. Your successors, Hanno will not command the same respect."

"That can be trained," he replied.

"Can it?" she said, tone doubtful. "Even if that is the case, it will not change the bone of the matter: the respect will come again from the individual, not the Name. In other words, the Name does not matter."

Hanno stilled. Looked for a reply, a rejoinder, a way to disagree.

"You can do all of this as the White Knight," the First Prince said. "You were already the shield of the heroes, Hanno, and you have little interest in the Accords themselves or the ministry of kingdoms. So why do you need to be the Warden of the West to do all this?"

He groped for his answer, feeling lost in a way he had not since the Light returned to him. And he found that he did not have one. That all the thoughts he had put together, building back the wall broken by the silence of the Tribunal, were built on a foundation that did not exist. It was true, all of it, but it was built on thin air. As if from the very moment he had heard- his stomach clenched. And there it was. The root of the mistake.

"Because," Hanno quietly said, "there is a Warden of the East."

—

Clarity, Cordelia thought, could be such a cruel thing.

"We are not claimants," she said. "We are the bears in the pit."

And no matter who won, the bears always lost. The hero's face drew tight but, tellingly, he did not disagree.

"You believe the Intercessor is behind this," Hanno said. "How?"

"Gods, who knows?" the blonde princess tiredly said. "Perhaps she pulled strings at the Arsenal, or on the night we faced each other in Salia. It could be a hundred other little moments where a push or a pull made a difference and we would never know."

Her smile was bitter.

"Has anyone aside from the Black Queen ever been able to untangle her plots?"

The hero jerked back as if he had been slapped. That was answer enough, Cordelia thought.

"And so we damage Good, whoever becomes Warden," Hanno of Arwad said, sounding appalled.

"We already have," Cordelia said. "To add weight to my claim, I promised by abdication as First Prince to Rozala Malanza and her allies in exchange for their support. There is no going back."

"And I have let myself be crowned prince in all but name," Hanno quietly replied. "The divisions will no go away no matter who becomes Warden of the West."

It was worse than that, she thought. Thinking in the scale of the immediate it was a danger, but there was something else awaiting just beyond the horizon.

"Neither of us would have all of Good behind us," Cordelia said. "Neither of us would be her equal. And on that hobbled leg-"

"-we would venture out to fight the Hidden Horror," Hanno finished through gritted teeth. "That is..."

Cordelia's understanding of namelore was still a shallow thing, but even she could see that it would be a catastrophe for two Wardens to face the Dead King without the full weight of what they claimed to stand for behind them. It would be going to war with a gap in your chainmail.

"Why would the Intercessor ever want this?" the Sword of Judgement asked. "She the Dead King's enemy as much as our own."

"She wants us to lose I think," the princess said. "So that when the darkest hour comes she can save us. Entirely on her terms."

The Wandering Bard had burned too many bridges to get her way otherwise. She could only dictate terms now if the only choice left was between her and annihilation.

"So she poisons the chalice long before we can think to drink," Hanno grimaced. "That fits her unpleasantly well. Foresight is two thirds of what makes her fearsome."

And Catherine Foundling was the one who had caught her out. Again.

"We would have torn each other to pieces until only one was left standing, if she had not done all this," Cordelia admitted.

If she had not come after their every preconception with a knife and dropped them here in the grass, like misbehaving children in need of making up. The dark-skinned hero peered at her closely.

"We have been wrong," Hanno of Arwad conceded. "That does not make her right."

"Bears in the pit, Hanno," Cordelia softly said. "You saw it before I did."

A long moment passed, silence hanging between them. The breeze caressed the grass.

"Journeys, not a battle," the Sword of Judgement murmured. "Yours. Mine. Hers."

Blue eyes met brown, an understanding. They could still end this right.

She did not know who took the first step, but they passed the threshold together.

Gabe Meadow

Wow. That, that was a wonderful catharsis. The venom vented, both sides acknowledging mistakes and flaws, and avoiding the trap that Catherine ran into in Praes. False dichotomies, false choices.

And now, I don't know what happens next, but I'm sure it's going to suck for the Wandering Bard.

Nairne .01

I sure hope so.

stevenneiman

I give it 90% that TWB doesn't show up and her plans are more or less successfully unraveled, and 10% that she shows up in person again and gets maimed further because Cat had plans for that outcome.

Unrecovered

Since Princes Graveyard her Name should be Herder, really.

Cat Herder, horrible pun intended 😊

Thor

Cats anger at her name becoming a pun would be amazing. She'd probably spontaneously combust.

ruduen

Go Boost!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Quite a realization for the both of them – not only that neither of them were a great fit, as many had recognized, but that neither of them needed to fit to do what they wanted to do. I think a lot of people (myself included) failed to realize that those awkward fits were being forced into place because of that unspoken assumption that someone has to be able to oppose the Warden of the East – and that that means there has to be a Warden of the West.

Except... there doesn't have to be.

And then the question becomes... If that Role is gone with both of them rejecting it again, what happens to them now? That conviction for their goals still remains, and they both still have parts to play. And what does it mean for Cat's Name, now?

Nairne .01

That Cat will probably become something else.

Aischylos

I think Cat may become just the Warden – potentially being hinted at throughout these chapters as people have started mixing Warden of the East and just Warden

Lictor Magnus

If an extra day leads to chapter like this, take all the time you need. That was beautiful 😭

Mitch

That discussion was very satisfying. I can't wait for the next.

irritantseraphim

So HannDelia Jäger-ing as Warden of the West? I am stoked for the next chapter.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

I think we can do better when it comes to mashing up their names. Cordelianno of Arwsenbachad.

irritantseraphim

Yeah, I could've. But it was late and I wanted to sleep.

Cordelianno Hasenwad.

Abrakadabra

Hannelia Arbach. 😊

Abrakadabra

Or alternatively Corvad Hannsenbach.

shikkarasu

Corvad? A counterpart to the First Under the Night? Why don't you just drop the pretence and call them Grand Master Ouroboros? That is clearly a D.E. Traitorous pseudonym.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Nice try at deflecting suspicion away from yourself, but I'm onto you. It is clearly you who is Traitorous in disguise!

Linnus42

I mean it makes sense insofar as the West (Good) should not be run like the East (Evil).

Sinead

Good being sociatally so the Role is divided, while Evil has a Warden to knock heads together.

Eris

Dang. And here I thought Abigail was going to become the Warden of the West.

Jk jk amazing chapter! Maybe they can split the role: Knight of the West and Judge of the West maybe

Korr4K

Unless I'm very mistaken, it has been highly implied, since several chapters ago, that they would share the Name. I'm actually a little bit disappointed that it was so predictable

Linnus42

Indeed the only unpredictable or crack part of the theory is if they get married to seal the deal.

Korr4K

That would be a mistake, the "surprise" would be caused only by the fact that it was never hinted and you don't add random things to your story just to make it unpredictable

Liliet

Tht's what "crack" means.

RoflCat

After this chapter I'm even more in favor of them letting Catherine eat the book.

It'd solve both issues at once.

With the Stories of Good under her, she'd be above 'just' Warden of the East and in fact become something close to equal and opposite to Bard which is one of their enemies at this one anyway.

And with there existing something on 'Good' side as equal and opposite to Catherine, there's no longer a need for Hanno or Cordelia to become Warden of the West.

Meanwhile Hanno will just return to what he's been doing in Grand Alliance before, because that is already what he want to do.

Cordelia will abdicate as promised but still retain her position as a high officer of Grand Alliance, dedicating her time to refining the Accords.

Rozala has made her oath at the Graveyard so she's a safe bet to keep true to the fight.

dadycool

That's what I've been hoping for for a while. To be perfectly honest, I think I just want Cat to have godlike power and being the not-Wandering Bard would give her that, while also fixing a lot of problems.

xanthir

Well yeah, Cat's been foreshadowed to become the Practical Guide since the beginning :p

onedollargum

The Practical Guide sure sounds like like a name to me.

AbraKadabra

Or the practical guide to evil is the book that will be made from the stories of Evil.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

The Wandering Bard vs the Stationary Bard (since she plans to be the one the rest of the Woe come home to between their individual escapades). She can eat part of the vacant Name Adjutant to work a pun into the "stationary" part.

shikkarasu

Would that make her similar to the creepy crypt oracle under the Theodosian castle? Everyone gets to pilgrimage to the Stationary Bard once per Choosing to get vague advice? It would be a fun double edged sword where she needs to keep her advice useful enough that Named still seek her out, but still self serving enough to leads them to further her agenda.

RoflCat

We clearly need a repeat of Painted Knives and the toss off Tower moment ad infinitum.

She get her own office somewhere high in Cardinal.

Occasionally Heroes and/or Villains come to try and get a surprise on her.

If they're just annoyance, they get tossed out the window immediately + an 'advice' on what they did wrong.

If they actually have some real issues that's blocking their path ahead, she'll give them a thorough grilling to open their mind to the path ahead, THEN toss them out of her office window.

But because the drop is never lethal (because of course) + the long 'teachings' tend to solve their core issues, each person only go to her for this rite of passage once and then proceed to spread the legend of 'the Grumbling Guide atop the Tower'

Korr4K

I have been discussing the idea of Cat becoming the "first(?)" real grey hero, neither from Above nor Below. It made sense because her vision required a warden for both sides but, apart from the Pilgrim, there never was a candidate with her same weight. But then she stated multiple times that she doesn't want anything to do with "Good" (and vice versa), that everybody, especially heroes, will always see her as the greatest from Below, she has already become W. of the East.

The more the story progresses the less it makes sense for her to become W. of the West

Liliet

And the reason they need to go in is just to give her a hug. Two hugs.

Seriously, that's pretty important. And increasingly urgent.

Sinead

Cat standing imposingly behind the pedestal of the BoST

Hanno and Cordelia: Cat, get some damn therapy!

Cat: very well. hands over book a dissapears into the shadows

Liliet

thats basically what happens, right?

MundaneWalkingHorse

I'm pretty sure the mandate here is shattering the idea of a "Warden of the East" in the first place. They show up and tell Cat to fuck off on making them "choose" a Warden, she celebrates by nomming everything that is good and holy and shouting "I'M FREE!"
The genie is loose.

Bakkasama

I don't think they will share the name. Cordelia already looked into it, the only instances in which a name was shared by two people have always been between siblings.

So it might just be that they both reject it. There is no reason for there to be a Warden of the West just because there is a Warden of the East, otherwise there would have been a Warden of the East every time there has been a Warden of the West before.

lostdeviljho

Has there been a Warden of the West before, though? I recall no mention of precedent for that Name beyond Cat's own.

Yamageddon

I think it's been mentioned before, but in the past it's not had as grand a status as it has now. I think King Jehan The Wise was a previous Warden of The West? Or was he Wizard of the West?

Liliet

King Jehan the Wise was a Good King, if Named at all. There was a Wizard of the West who worked with him, though.

Warden of the West is a new Name and a new Role. There is no precedent.

Konstantin von Karstein

Jehan was Good King. There were Wizards of the West, but not Wardens.

ohJohN

It's long been a (purely ceremonial) title claimed by First Princes/ses – due to Procer's regional influence and its role in keeping the Chain of Hunger and the Kingdom of the Dead in check – but so far the only explicit precedent for it being a Name was when Cordelia caught the Seraphim's coin, was offered the mantle (twice, first Good-flavored then Evil-flavored), and refused it (also twice).

Given that Hanno would likely be able to Recall previous (Good) WotWs, and he conspicuously hasn't mentioned doing (or attempting to do) so despite being a claimant and getting into arguments about what the Role should be, I think it's a pretty safe assumption that no one has ever claimed the Name before.

Reader in the Night

Huh. Cordelia's about to reject the Name of Warden for the third consecutive time.

Cicero

Hmmm... I wonder if that has any story implications.

aurikdomi

And further Cat is doing her damndest to break all that remains of the age of wonders, why not then its rules?

Korr4K

This. The story is literally changing its "era", the introduction of new rules wouldn't be strange at all. Cordelia's words are meant to show us how much she is out of "Name lore", she doesn't really grasp the scope of Cat's work and what it would mean for future Named

Cicero

Uh... that wasn't what I got from this chapter. What I got was that there wouldn't be a Warden of the West because they don't need that name or Role.

Flubber

Ooh, things are coming to a head.

Hanno mentioned that Catherine has committed atrocities. What are they? I can't think of any.

Unless maybe he means how she let the Lone Swordsman go all those years ago, which set in motion a disastrous series of events? But even then, I didn't think Hanno knows about that incident.

MagicalFlyingHorse

Catherine spent several years following her dad's playbook of murdering heroes and excising potential insurgents, and is culpable for a number of war-crimes. Very "deserved" war-crimes, ones that no one else would be punished for, but war-crimes none the less.

A lot of it probably is his anti-Evil bias speaking, though; she must have done something bad in this regard, because she is Evil, and Evil does something bad in every regard.

Darkening

She killed a bunch of people in battle in a spooky way at the battle of the camps :V. Remember how much shit people were talking about that? Like Tariq lasering people with solar fire is so noble but Catherine dumping a lake on people is an atrocity.

gingerlygrump

The whole of the Proceran Bestowed really circlejerk on how awful Cat was as the Black Queen, but Tariq was a monster. He was just as much a murderer as Amadeus was.

Thief of Aglets

How many atrocities has Cat committed to her own person, much less forcing poor vintages on the unsuspecting palettes of others? One per page?

Beyond that though there are the untold legions of faceless minions of friend and foe both that she's condemned to die because of her grand plans.

She's even bastardised Stories enough that Above's agents were forced to Rez her properly.

Does that mean that she's coming to be 'touched' enough by both sides she may just become Warden? I don't think so. This world needs things in pairs to balance out. Heroes retire when their calling has passed and there is nothing to oppose them (unless their role is to wander and correct the little wrongs, like a 1/4 sized A-Team), but Villains conjure heroes until they're unseated.

I believe Intercessor has always been a fixit-type, but she's worn the groove so deeply she's poking through to the other side. And now she requires a balance.

What's the Story of the Roles of the Wardens? Constant duellists or star crossed and unable to reconcile due to quirks of Fate?

There must be someone to balance Cat.

Thanks again EE for this amazing story!

tuftears

Oof. What if, absorbing both Good and Evil, transforms Cat into the Warden of the Living, the natural opponent to the Dead? Keter's encroachment into the breathing world may then constitute an upsetting of the natural balance, and Cat would be empowered to deal with it.

edrey

well it believe is about the point of view, the crucifixion of mages after Liesse can be counted as one, sure, but most Callowans approved it, not for nothing she is Queen, also the killing of extremist nobles, but only not nobles would be appalled for it. the iron kings in the book were harsher. in the war is about how she dropped the lake, its the medieval thinking of duels, you allow them to defend themselves and show mercy if they lose, for a professional and veteran army that is foolish.

Hanno is in the end a warrior with divine power and lack the understanding of the petty mortal world is the reason he is useless as a prince or well as a normal person, there are reasons why we send professional armies to war and not untrained civilians, first and foremost is your own people what i find really idiotic of Hanno is that he can search the lives of Named rulers, their decisions and their "atrocities" and compare them with Cat's own decisions, to find if he's right or wrong about her.

i pretty sure it will break his mind if he goes too deeply into their memories and perspectives, that Above approve morals completely different than his and that she is a heroine but not a Heroine, and good and Good are not the same. that she has done more good than evil, and he can't be compared to her in doing good.

Liliet

Honestly I do wish Hanno would elaborate on his perception of atrocities Cat has done. Is he confusing her with Amadeus or what?

shikkarasu

I think we can safely assume that he looked deepest into The Lone Swordsman's memories for context regarding her, and perhaps the Heroes who came for Winter!Cat, which she slaughtered. From Above's perspective that was pretty heinous. I mention TLS specifically because we know that he learned about Maddie's fighting style by seeing how William dealt with Catherine.

Also worth mentioning:

- Tried to leverage the Hell Gate Machine that Liesse was made into.
- Tried to release the Dead King before it was cool.
- Became the Queen of Winter in the first place.
- Chose mass murder instead of abdicating whenever Tariq offered a 'peaceful resolution to the war.'

There are a lot of good reasons for Cat's choices, and even still she herself regrets a lot of her decisions, but Hanno would see it through the eye of a Hero. One who was personally appalled by her if at all possible. It is, I feel, a mark of his character that he ever sat down to talk with her in the first place instead of just flipping the Coin.

Liliet

> •Chose mass murder instead of abdicating whenever Tariq offered a 'peaceful resolution to the war.'

You're misremembering. Catherine was the one who offered Tariq her abdication instead of mass murder and asked if he can then protect Callow from getting looted by Princes and he went "well I cannot dictate terms to Procer tho, a war between Levant and it would be worse".

Catherine has brought this up multiple times, with her only condition being safety for Callow. Neither Tariq nor Cordy took her up on it.

>•Became the Queen of Winter in the first place.

Oh you mean when Akua had her mind controlled and she found breaking the restraints on her power to be the only way to fight back? Or when she killed a fae to claim his title and stop the fae incursion into Marchford?

> •Tried to release the Dead King before it was cool.

I mean, she could have if she'd wanted to. Cat's the one who chose to not enter the bidding war with Malicia.

Sure she had the intent to do that on certain conditions. She did not end up doing it. It didn't actually happen.

> •Tried to leverage the Hell Gate Machine that Liesse was made into.

Again the same “didn’t happen” problem, paired with Hanno having no source to know this. No currently-dead heroes were involved.

> Heroes who came for Winter!Cat, which she slaughtered. From Above’s perspective that was pretty heinous.

They attacked her. Hanno well knows she did her best to talk them down. We get his reflection on it at the end of Book 5. Self-defense is not “an atrocity”.

> I think we can safely assume that he looked deepest into The Lone Swordsman’s memories for context regarding her

And what atrocities does William know her to have committed? You think Hanno’s judging her for having let him go that one time? Cause that’s the only less than perfectly ethical decision I recall Cat making in that whole storyline.

shikkarasu

I fully agree with 95% your points. My point is that using Recall shows Hanno what those Heroes thought of Cat, the least charitable way to view her. Yes, all those Heroes were the ones in the wrong, but they clearly thought that killing her was direly needed or they wouldn’t have Names in the first place. As Hanno said, most Heroes are one and done, meaning that at least a few of these were Chosen for the express purpose of ending her.

For all that he struggles to see the big picture, these past few chapters have really highlighted just how big his blind spots are and have always been. This is why I don’t blame Hanno for accusing Cat of atrocities, especially in his own head, but instead praise him for taking the time to speak with her in spite of all the heavily biased first hand information he has of her.

Liliet

Hum.

> Some of the last words the Stalwart Paladin had ever heard. That life had perhaps been the most useful to call on, when studying the Black Queen. The Lone Swordsman had been the rival of her youth, and her struggles there too far removed from the woman she’d become, and none of those who’d died at the Battle of the Camps had seen much of her aside from the terrifying foe that’d been the Sovereign of Moonless Nights. The Stalwart Paladin, though, had walked among the people of the Callowan city of Dormer and then spoken with the Black Queen for some time. It had been fascinating, hearing through him the offer she'd extended. Go home, Catherine Foundling had offered, looking so very exhausted. She'd offered peaceful means, and bared steel only when pushed.

>

> It was not his place to judge, yet it had troubled Hanno that he could not easily decide what his answer would have been, had he truly stood in the other hero's boots.

Hanno applied SOME critical thinking at least.

But yeah I'm pretty much in agreement with you. I JUST WANT TO HAVE THAT DISCUSSION ON SCREEN NEARLY AS MUCH AS I WANTED THE HANNO/CORDY TALK

Rynjin

I'd say starting a war that claimed hundreds of thousands of lives and destabilized half the continent's for the sole purpose of ridding herself of inconvenient political opposition qualifies, yes?

Flubber

It would indeed count, but I didn't think that was known outside maybe the Woe.

(Maybe it is widely known – there is just so much to this story, I forget things.)

So discounting that, is Hanno referring to the crucifixions and the lake-dumping? To call those atrocities (considering the nature of the world in this story) seems a bit silly of Hanno.

zenanii

Hanno knows. He has access to recall, and we know for a fact that he can access Lone Swordsmans memories.

As for other atrocities? Cat was indirectly responsible for the hanging of the Lone Swordsmans conspirators.

She killed the Shining prince. Could she have settled things with him in a peaceful manner? Probably not. Did she try? Not even a little.

Her entire ascent of power has been riding in the wake of The Black Knight, who is very much a terrible person, and makes Cat guilty by association.

She killed The Lone Swordsman. Some might argue that she did a good thing, by stopping the choir of Contrition from being unleashed, but here's the thing: That is not the reason Cat killed him. She killed him because he was opposing her and she needed a stepping stone to reach greater authority. As before mentioned, she crucified a bunch of praesi nobles. She bound the soul of her rival to her cloak and wore her as a mantle. Afterwards she took to grooming said rival to become the sacrificial sheep for DK.

After becoming the Black Queen she was personally responsible for wiping out several adventuring parties. Yes, she gave them a chance to surrender if they promised to leave her alone, but let's be honest, she wasn't doing that because she was such a bleeding heart who couldn't stand to see those poor heroes hurt, the real reason was to weaken the story against her.

She traveled to Keter with the intention of unleashing the Dead King.

After that failed, she traveled to the Underdark and attempted to enslave an entire people.

Once she returned to the surface, one of the first things she did was rescue the Black Knight, arguably one of the worst people in Calernia.

Then there was the whole Red Axe Incident.

These are just from the top of my head, I'm sure I've missed a couple.

Sinead

I will note that Cat was tired of killing kids, so the story bonus does not really stand. You still have to have the conviction, since just going through the motions will still burn you.

Empty prayers and all that.

Liliet

Who did that?

shikkarasu

As with any war, a very complicated question, but I think Cat, Cordielia, Malicia, Amadeus, Kairos, Bard, and perhaps a few others have danced to this tune in one book or another. Different wars, but everyone started something they didn't have to for the sake of acquiring, consolidating, or maintaining power.

Liliet

"for the sake of getting rid of inconvenient political opposition"

who did THAT???

Salt

It was mentioned in vol 4 chapter 3. Cat and Cordelia were debating rule. Cordelia was talking about how the highest assembly was better than a dictatorship despite the squabbling was because it put a check on the power that any one individual could hold, at which point Catherine's rebuttal was asking why the host invading Callow was made up almost entirely out of Cordelia's opposition in the assembly (one of the few times Cordelia wasn't able to muster a response)

I don't think it could be said that the crusade was called solely for the sake of that purpose though. More that she also used it for that purpose.

Liliet

I mean, Cordelia didnt START the war for that, she just directed part of her opposition that way.

Salt

There were a few reasons why she started the Crusade, but restraining her political opponents was definitely one of the big ones. The original reasons were more or less spelled out in the volume 2 prologue

> "Enough for what?"

> "For Procer to be ready to launch the Tenth Crusade," she whispered.

>All of her problems, neatly solved with a single announcement. The Dominion was at least nominally Good, and would not nibble at their borders while they were fighting the Empire. The League of Free Cities would either keep their more Evil-inclined members in line or erupt into civil war, either of which would keep Helike busy. And while the First Prince did not legally have the right to command the private armies of the principalities, all of them were by custom bound to contribute to a Crusade. The troops of her political opponents would be abroad for years, where they could not interfere while she stabilized the Principate. Tens of thousands would die. Callow would be broken for a generation, as the prize being fought over. But it would keep Procer together.

She basically started it to keep Procer's external threats opponents pointed away, and to weaken her political opponents in the highest assembly. Callow was supposed to be destroyed as basically a prize to be divvied up by the parties she was trying to distract, and the hellgate in Liesse actually had nothing to do with the original reasons – she only about that almost two full volumes after laying all the groundwork for the Crusade to start (one of the Cordelia POV chapters after second Liesse mentions her reading reports of it, I forget which).

It's actually not at all an exaggeration to say she intentionally tried to destroy callow/kill tens of thousands purely for her Principiate-related political needs, considering she blatantly admits to it in her original monologue about planning the crusade to begin with

Liliet

She had other options, and chose this one as one she believed was Good. It's disingenious to talk like the pragmatic reasons were the ONLY ones that mattered here.

Rynjin

My mistake, I misread the post I was replying to and thought they were talking about Hanno's perception of Cordelia's atrocities, not Cat's. So for clarity: Cordelia did that. She started the Crusade to get rid of inconvenient political opposition, and just all around PEOPLE she found inconvenient (like the mercenaries).

But yeah, the list of Cat's atrocities are so long it's almost like they could fill 6 books or something.

Liliet

WHICH SPECIFICALLY WERE THE ATROCITIES THOUGH like, the ones HANNO would call her on???

Rynjin

Hm, if I had to take a guess: bargaining with the Dead King (which didn't go her way, but she still tried it) tops the list. I'm not sure how many of her other war crimes are public knowledge, or at the least knowledge Hanno has access to. Maybe her specifically letting Lone Swordsman go. I'm not sure how he feels about the water blasts of doom during the Crusade. There's a 50/50 chance Hanno acknowledges it as a necessity of war or looks down on it as Doomsday weapon adjacent.

Liliet

This is the interesting part!!!

Zach

The worst is probably letting Lone Swordsman survive and purposefully igniting the Callow Civil War (though I kind of doubt Hanno is referring to this). She had basically zero motive for this other than “giving me an opportunity to gain power.”

Attempting to form a deal with the Dead King was also really bad and dumb (and the whole premise – that she had no choice – ended up being wrong).

beleester

Huh. So my complaint that this seemed like an empty and weightless conflict was actually the whole point. The conflict really is just “we want our own Warden” and they’ve noticed the problem with that. I’m impressed.

ninegardens

So... looks like we’ll be having no Warden of the west then. Cool.

Of course, plenty of damage is already done- Cordelia already abdicated. “Prince white” is already a thing (I wonder who started THAT particular phrase)

And mostly... I kind of love the way grey pilgrim slotted into the conversation, Cordelia’s utter hatred for him (or at least... for the aloofness of it), and Hanno’s thoughts of “You are so much like him.” Exquisite.

And both of them have important goals, but neither of those goals actually cares about the title... just perfect. I like this. I like this a lot.

Al

“Journeys, not a battle,” (...) “Yours. Mine. Hers.”

I think we’re getting an extra Warden.

East/Evil: Cat

West/Good: Hanno

Cardinal/Center: Cordelia

Nairne .01

I don't think so.

jamesc9

If Good people ~work-for~ the Gods Above, and Evil people ~work ~for~ the Gods Below, then I'm not sure who would empower a middle role.

Xinci

Hmm, I do enjoy it when they actually talk to each other. It is interesting to observe the coalescence of the modern schema for Good in the Age of Order through their conversation. The transient aspect of the regulatory actions of Heroes and Good groups is particularly interesting as it backlights a lot of cooperative pro-social behaviors and the eventual failure of those behaviors. Both Heroes and the groups they serve are transient. Heroes are like immune cells, called up to mitigate threats to the group while it continues to grow. The Good group must maintain effective pro-social rules, sanctions, and values, which generally will corroborate to whatever ideations Good apparently has given them. Dissent is always easily done, however, so eventually even if the Heroes don't fail the group burns itself out or is conquered by some outside influence. But while it does live, it is limited in how bad it can be, by necessary self-regulation for survival.

Thus, Procer's methods of keeping control over its Princes abuses must for the majority of its functions been effective, at the same time many Heroes could have been generated to mitigate or supplement its means of regulation. Cordelia's statement of them needing to grow, is somewhat ironic but entirely fair under such a paradigm. They basically need a ruleset that coadunates ameliorative values to to the point of applying beyond a singular culture and outlasting that culture should it die. It does make sense why Above was fine with them both, even if it was a trap.

The cyclical nature of such regulation naturally also quite accurately applies to the Accords. It will form a base framework to allow the growth of cooperation for both Good and Evil groups, but in time it will fail like any other ruleset. But for a time it will allow a lot of useful baseline growth. I quite look forward to how Cordelia and Hanno will fill niches from here on

sidehammer056302

"coadunates"
"ameliorative"

Well, I learned some new words today. Jesus, what a mouthful...

Eris

Wait, "coadunates" is a word? I assumed it was just a typo from "coagulates", lmao

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Me too, but apparently its meaning is: "to unite into one : combine."

Yamageddon

Love your analysis! These recent chapters have really backlit my opinion that PGTE is one of the most interesting fictional explorations of philosophy I have ever read. What I especially appreciate is how applicable to our modern day ills these fictional fights, arguments and explorations are. I spend a lot of time and energy on emotional and intellectual labour in pursuit of (my new favourite word you've just given me) coadunating our fractured social spheres on earth. How are we going to move beyond the shallow problems we face? How will we unify in the face existential threats? How are we going to heal the festering divisions in our cultures and between them? I'm not sure yet, but this series, and these recent chapters in particular have given me a lot of food for thought.

I think applying the discourse about heroes and earthly crowns as a metaphorical image to our current situation with systemically unjust laws, activists, police has some serious potential. The discourse about heroes meaning to do well but accidentally causing harm is highly applicable to people who enter government or the police force, only to be co-opted, corrupted, or confused and hindered from actually doing Good!

On one of the previous chapters, somebody had mentioned how the various characters and factions represented various philosophies eg utilitarianism, and I'm fascinated to hear which other philosophies you all see or appreciate in PGTE. Thoughts on my rant??!

FanofFans

This! I live in the US, I wanted to email this wonderful chapter to every elected Representative and Senator in our country ("why can't we be friends, why can't we be..."). But alas, I'm still trying to get my 16 yr old D&D enthralled niece to read PGTE.

sidehammer056302

hey, no shade by the way; i just always considered myself rather well read, but i had never seen those words before, lol

Adrian_V

Ok we all know that yes choosing one would fuck everyone out, but i still like Hanno more because at her core Cordelia is a hypocrite, it is not a coincidence Hanno compared her to Tariq, for that matter Cordelia all but told us in her narration that what really bothered her about Tariq was the fact that he didn't give Black to her (note also that she was willing to burn a city during that same campaign and fails to remember it).

Simply put she fails at seeing herself in the mirror, Hanno at least does that. There were points that make me think more about it but i am too lazy to reread right now to find them xD

Only thing she has in her favour is that she is smarter than Hanno, or at least more cunning, proof is that she managed to uncover the Bard's plot sooner, of course she still falls short of Cat.

Scavion

Cordelia is not a hypocrite. She was the Lawful ruler of the land and authority over Procer. Elected by her fellow Princes. Tariq should not be able to just wipe out a village to pursue his own goals. Cordelia had a similar plan but she is mortal and under the council of other mortals. Her entire beef is that named just DO things without speaking to anyone and just karma houdini the consequences. If, for example, Cordelia made the same decision then her people(or rather the First Assembly) could potentially take her to trial.

Salt

Well, the reason that mandate of the people, or at least the representatives has so much more legitimacy than divine mandate IRL is because there's essentially no proof of the latter, and no proof that the latter is virtuous or benevolent even if they existed

In the guideverse there's irrefutable proof that said divine mandate comes from near-omniscient entities of pure capital-G Good that extol a specific virtue to its utmost extreme as part of their nature, and even Cordelia knows that the typical character of said representatives in this case (Proceran princes) is absolutely vile.

So there really is a pretty good argument in the current guideverse setting for Tariq's divine mandate having just as, if not more, legitimacy a lot of the time than Cordelia's mandate from regional representatives.

This could change in the future if Cordelia were able to implement her reforms, cut out the cancerous nobles, and kill the disease at it's root – but at the moment, it's kind of a tossup even with choirs being kind of horrifying.

Liliet

Cordelia was given mandate and responsibility to make that choice by people following her, electing her. She'd forced that election with a war, but she did not fight the war solo: she managed to win the war because many backed her.

And Cordelia's plan would not have worked because the man tasked with actually executing it took a second look and decided to not. Checks and balances, and need for compromise.

Tariq just kind of decided it one day and that was that.

Linnus42

She was given a mandate from the Princes not a mandate of the People. Her mandate is from being a Noble by Birth who got elected to First Prince by her fellow Nobles who also primarily got their jobs on bloodline.

Albert Wen

The Princes are the largest group of politically and generally educated people in the entire country. Remember how Roland (Olivier) could trick people because no one could read? There isn't even a way to spread information about elections and votes in a reasonable manner. Procer's best solution is to have people with in-depth educations be in the same room for any important matters.

Their blood isn't important, it's their family resources and connections that make them relevant.

Liliet

As with all people whose power is not founded on magic, Cordelia also gets the implicit consent of all people who go around carrying out her orders.

As we've seen this time when that guy decided she didn't actually have his consent to this.

Adrian_V

Like Linnus42 said, plus how is that any different from a choir? Or even taking choirs out of the picture how is that any different from a hero with years of experience and actually on the field deciding to take action? That is why i called her a hypocrite because she the same.

Plus what counts is that she was willing to do it, if anything is worse since she ordered it instead of doing it herself

Liliet

A hero cannot be stopped by everyone around him deciding they don't agree to let him do the thing.

Choirs are not morally relevant agents here

Adrian_V

Actually they can, if enough people oppose them, it could be they either lose the narrative or even ANOTHER hero coming into play

Liliet

That's a significantly higher bar than people simply refusing to cooperate.

Adrian_V

Outside of a fantasy world maybe, but given how dependent Heroes are of tropes and stories it isn't as impossible as it sounds,

Anyway i still like Hanno more xD

Liliet

Well, chalk another point up to Cordelia being bad at Namelor?

jamesc9

Could we have a link to the person who decided not to, please? I seem to have forgotten.

Liliet

<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2018/10/10/interlude-queens-gambit-declined/>

> And yet here he was, reading a report stating the Legions were but a day's march away and considering treason.

>

> There were no two ways about it, disobeying the First Prince's orders would be high treason. [...] The actual text of those was delicate and regretful, but the heart of it a brutal thing: after short defence on the walls, he was to draw the Praesi inside Iserre and set the city on fire around them. His troops were then to evacuate and join the relief forces sent by the Dominion, to fall upon the easterners while they were freshly bloodied. Iserre, as of Prince Milenan's last royal census, counted over a hundred thousand souls between its walls. Gauthier knew it was more than that, perhaps as much a ten thousand more who were foreigners and so unrecorded or too estranged from the law to want their presence noted in anything as official as a census.

>

> He would not be allowed to evacuate them. Their panic, the letter noted, would prevent the Praesi from pulling out their forces in time by clogging up the streets.

>

> He wrestled with the decision throughout the night. Handpicked men discretely prepared the blazes, for he did not give the order now it would be too late afterwards, and when dawn came Iserre had been turned into a pyre. It was the arithmetic of it that stayed with him. There were, according to reports, perhaps fifteen thousand easterners and not even half that many bandits with them. A host of twenty thousand at most. And his orders were to burn alive five times that many to wound the Praesi. He would be damned in the eyes of the Gods, if he did this. Yet how many more would die in towns and villages, if he did not? Not merely in Iserre, but all over the realm. Duty and faith tugged him different ways. [...]

>

> The words, though defiant, were as ashes in his mouth as he rode back to Iserre. He'd just ensured the city he'd spent his entire life guarding would either suffer fire or a bloody sack. [...] The assault would come soon, he knew, and the decision he must make with it. Duty or good? Gods forgive him, but as the fourth night fell Captain Gauthier made his decision. Better he be known a traitor than a butcher. When the assault came, he would empty the city and ride to Salia for his trial.

Albert Wen

Actually, she is smarter than Cat. Putting aside whether or not Cat has even figured out exactly what Bard's attack is yet (haven't seen any signs of it from her, only moves that increase her advantage in general), Cordelia displayed way stronger political insight during the dwarf meeting, when she always dug one level deeper than Cat while guessing at dwarven internal politics.

shikkarasu

I wouldn't call anyone simply 'smarter'. Cordelia has always been the better diplomat and politician over Cat, Hanno, and basically everyone other than Malicia, who she matched wits with for years. Cat is better at counter-Barding and Machiavellian planning, which takes an unrelated type of genius.

I don't think either one could learn the other's trade to the same level in the next 10 years, and if they did they may be the worse for it, since they would have to slow or halt progress in their own field. As Cordelia and Amadeus have both lamented, there are only so many hours in the day and so many skills to learn.

Adrian_V

Yeah, smarter isn't exactly the right word, afterall with enough education anyone can appear smart, that is why i said cunning, she is more cunning than Hanno.

zenanii

You're missing the point. Cordelia isn't hating on Pilgrim because he committed an atrocity to t stop Black Knight. Her issue is that he had no one to answer to afterwards.

Yes, she was ready to burn a city, which was arguably just as bad. But unlike Taric, she would answer to the highest assembly for her actions afterwards.

This is her issue with heroes, not that they're worse than nobles, but that they effectively exist outside of the legal system.

Liliet

This.

Adrian_V

Err, that is what she says to herself, but in her narration at some points she let slip that she is angry because once it happened she couldn't just hang Black like she wanted, she is partly right because not hanging basically means all those lives were wasted btw, but to me it sounded like she really doesn't care he killed a town but rather his justification for it, and that he didn't ask her neither.

Adrian_V

Oh also another thought, 3 is almost always an important number, who says there need to be 2 named ruling the accords?

Evgeny Permyakov

There need to be a bloodhound, a judge and an executor.

Linnus42

First, well that was worth the wait in terms of Hanno and Cordy prospective on each other and coming to an accord.

So they realize its a Bard trap and the West does not need to be run like the East.

Special Bard to me is starting to feel like Kairos behind every plot and flipping the board and yes I get this was setup at Arsenal but still I am tired of Bard lol.

However, I don't think we have gotten fundamental resolution between Hanno and Cordy on how things should be run in the West in regards to Heroes and Governments. That is the biggest thorn also they didn't talk about Viv being Princess and eventually Queen so sure while Named running governments is rarer in the West it still occurs....

dadycoool

I think Callow has always been a middle ground between Preas and Procer, beyond the obvious physical location. Preas and Callow both have Named rulers, while Procer and Callow are both historically aligned with Above, just as an example.

Liliet

We don't need a "fundamental resolution" on that because the Accords are already a thing and contain all those provisions and specifications.

shikkarasu

This is a trend I am noticing in the comments section. The complaint that there is still more conversation to happen. I really don't see the problem there. We are getting more chapters in which more progress will be made. If Hanno and Cordelia had talked like this two years ago Cat would never have gone full Tyrant / half Triumphant and we would never have seen her crash a flying Tower north of Salia.

Keep having personal failings, my beloved Claimants, I have so much more popcorn left to munch.

Kiara

This chapter finally coalesced what I feel should happen. As others have been saying the obvious answer is splitting the name – But that doesn't quite feel right. Instead I believe Hanno should get Warden of the West and Cordelia some name that implies she speak for the non named. In the world they're creating a voice for villains, heroes, and unnamed just feels like the right balance.

Not sure what the actual Name would be tho,

Sykomantis

Unnamed Advocate maybe?

Casey Glick

Arbiter of the West

egregiousmiscellany

Whenever people bring up potential Names, they never mention The Cardinal. It makes sense for the place, and it makes sense for the person.

plainWonder

Warden of the Rest?

marillius

The vast, disgusting irony of Coredlia judging the Grey Pilgrim for condemning a village while waging a war against a country for little better reason herself. She truly is a disgusting person. And Hanno, who claims that the Black Queen has committed atrocities yet I could name none following her story (certainly battles lost and hard choices made but none save in defense of her realm) and his attitude and certainty that Good Named are always Good despite countless lives laid at their feet.

Zggt

Just as it was said in this very chapter, the Crusade was brewing well before Cordelia announced it. It was the result of a multitude of internal wars, the only way to resolve a muddled succession with a united (and relatively unharmed) Procer. It is why Cordelia chose to do it. There is at least some surface equivalence to Tariq killing an entire village, but there are also important differences, the main one being that Cordelia did not condemn anyone to die outside a battlefield, and the Crusade did find a solution (albeit a very grim one) to the overabundance of fantassins. Not that Cordelia is blameless, but you can point out that Cordelia only took the pragmatic/easy path when her duty required it, while Tariq did so systematically.

This is why the Bard could plan this far ahead, which also fits with one of the main motifs of the story (societal change being an overriding power, even when there are people who wield lakes or lasers).

marillius

What does killing people on the battlefield mean in relation to morality? She was a shit leader who is ultimately responsible for the state of affairs that led to that war and all the deaths that were caused because of it. The people her army killed were in no way less innocent because they were soldiers. One could argue she's actually worse than Tariq and not just by sheer dint of numbers of dead but because this wasn't the only way but as you say the easiest.

Eris

... Excuse me, what? I get that hating on Cordelia is popular nowadays and all that, but the whole reason she is the First Prince of Procer is because she did all in her power to salvage a functional country out of Procer that was slowly falling apart due to the civil war. She is only responsible for the mess that Procer was in before the Crusade insofar as any Proceran noble can be, and much less so than the vast majority of them at that. So are you arguing it would've been better for everybody if she didn't do that, and let the Proceran civil war rage on? Perhaps the situation would have been saved by heroes, eventually, sure – I'm not so confident in that, admittedly, but let's say it would have been – would it happen before Procer as an entity has effectively collapsed?

Yes, calling for the Crusade was a fuck-up of continental proportions – pun intended – but nothing before that was outside the realm of reasonable.

Salt

> There is at least some surface equivalence to Tariq killing an entire village, but there are also important differences, the main one being that Cordelia did not condemn anyone to die outside a battlefield,

Not entirely, no. There's no moral difference at all for at least 20 thousand of them. Cordelia specifically ordered them conscripted for the Crusade. Them being on the battlefield makes no ethical difference if she forced them onto said battlefield against their will in the first place.

Direct quote from the prologue prior to the crusade starting:

> Cordelia was unwilling to gamble the fate of the Principate on such odds, and so she had taken action: she'd ordered general conscription in Salia. The bottom of the barrel was being scraped raw, but she'd put together twenty thousand levies. Had she further enforced the decree, or even broadened it to neighbouring principalities, she could have easily tripled that amount. There was, unfortunately, no point in doing so. There were no armaments for the conscripts to use, and dwarven representatives had flatly refused any further sale without even bothering to explain why.

Mercenaries and Fantassins, there is a moral difference. Career soldiers, also a difference. They chose to be there. They hold the responsibility for what they chose to do.

For the peasant conscripts, there functionally isn't a moral difference. They were forced onto the battlefield with little training, worse armaments, against their will, and slaughtered there. A lot of them were straight up used to make a bridge of human corpses at the flower vales. Cordelia holds the responsibility for what she chose for them, regardless of their will.

Ethically speaking, if "causing the mass deaths of innocents for the purpose of saving even more lives" is a hangable offence, à la the deontological answer the trolley problem (the value of a life is NOT commensurable), both Cordelia and the Pilgrim should hang. No exceptions. If it's a pardonable offense because it was necessary to save more lives (the value of a life generally IS commensurable), neither should hang.

Liliet

Honestly I think Cordelia's actual point would be more precisely expressed by "could be hanged" rather than "would hang". "Would stand trial". These are all subtly wrong because "could" could mean "if you're strong enough" and "would stand trial" means nothing if the judges won't indict or give a harsh sentence. Would-hang-if-he-did-not-defend-himself-successfully. That's a mouthful and she didn't say it, but the point comes out clearer if you use it as that.

Barrendur

Beautifully crafted chapter; very convincing characterisations. Immensely enjoyed the absence of Cat!

dadycool

Yeah, the Interludes have been better than the Chapters for a while, or at least more fun to read.

Reader in the Night

Oh wow! That was really cool and beautifully done. One line of dialogue that bothered me a bit was :

<>

Not because I think it's good or bad, simply because it felt sort of like it didn't fit Cordelia's actual argument? Though maybe I just failed to comprehend it.

It went something like:

Hanno says that what Cordelia wants is Good, and so Heroes wouldn't oppose it; Cordelia says, well, <> , which I took to mean was her saying that Heroes make her changed unnecessary, or at least, seem to be unnecessary; then Hanno says "are you saying Heroes shouldn't save the day?"; and Cordelia concludes "I'm saying Heroes shouldn't get the final say on what 'saving the day' looks like."

I don't think the "You do not have to oppose it, you make it unnecessary by being who you are." line works with the point she's trying to make, since Heroes being who they are is exactly what makes the existence of rules necessary.

Maybe she should have said that "you don't have to oppose it, you resist it by being who you are"? Because like Hanno says, Heroes are stopgap measurements, so they have a natural tendency to return the situation to what the Status Quo was before their big Evil happened, rather than meaningfully improving upon the system.

I don't know. Maybe I'm stepping out of place by trying to tell EE how he should have written their story. I'm just honestly trying to help. Just to repeat that this chapter was masterfully done and I deeply enjoyed it!

Reader in the Night

Sigh I'm getting sick and tired of WordPress' formatting weirdness swallowing parts of my comments. I hope it's still understandable.

What I had placed between the Angle Brackets was:

["You do not have to oppose it," Cordelia harshly said. "You make it unnecessary by being who you are. Why should there be significant reform to anything at all, when no matter how dire the situation becomes a hero will emerge to save the day?"]

Anyways, since I'm already here, another thing I wanted to comment on: ["Journeys, not a battle," the Sword of Judgement murmured. "Yours. Mine. Hers."]

I think this means Hanno and Cordelia are going to go into the Tower and roast Cat (for her own good of course) this time around! That would be so cool to watch!

Also, on the issue of the WotW, I think Hanno and Cordelia are going for some sort of shared position that equates to WotE. That said, if they do go the way of making decisions by council, they really should add a third person, both to serve as a tiebreaker and because of Rule of Three.

If that happens, maybe the third slot could go to an elected representative of the average Calernian muggle, to contrast the interests of the Heroes and the Crowns? Sort of like the House of Commons in the British Parliament.

If that happens, I nominate Abigail! With how terrified of both Named and Politics she is, she'd be the perfect candidate to represent the people who want nothing to do with any of that!

Albert Wen

Angle brackets in WordPress are used for markup. i.e.
`\italics\`: italics

Albert Wen

Whoops, no idea how to escape characters.

Liliet

Cordelia means that problems get fixed and so pressure does not build up for systemic reform. Every time there is a coup but no revolution.

Reader in the Night

Yeah, but that goes back to Hanno's point: Should the Heroes stop fixing problems, then?

Kinigget

What Cordelia is pointing out is that Heroes are an impediment to systemic change, because why would you need systemic change when they're around to stab whatever problems crop up?

Liliet

Mhm.

Frivolous

I think one of the reasons the Wandering Bard targeted Cordelia and Hanno (as per Akua's comment in chapter 37: Bygones) is because the Wardens of the West might be able to command her.

Also I suspect that the Wardens of the West and the East might make public the Name and description of the Wandering Bard, not just to heroes and villains but to everyone, so that she becomes common knowledge across Calernia.

Still haven't figured out why the WB targeted Kairos Theodosian, though.

Albert Wen

Did WB ever target Kairos? As far as I'm aware, Kairos was one of the people she had less control over, but I'm not sure she ever went after him.

Liliet

It's what Akua said.

shikkarasu

She used him, that's for sure. I think he was playing the kind of game she approved of, so she never had to go after him. I would even argue that she had all the control over him she needed.

She mentioned way back in Book 2 when talking to William that she would rather 100 Diabolists or Dread Empress Magnificents over a single Amadeus of the Green Stretch or Black Queen. Tyrant was a mad lad who took care of himself in the end, but the Practical Evils? They change the world in ways that threaten her. She can dangle carrots in front of cackling psychopaths, but she cannot deal with systemic reform.

anonymous4968

I like this resolution, regardless of others opinions I don't dislike either of them.

KarmaA

Gonna call it now. Cat for warden of good, Bard for warden of evil. Bard as eternal jail warden for DK.

Frivolous

I expect the Intercessor will try to interrupt one last time before or shortly after C and H announce that they are the Wardens of the West.

She might come personally again, but I think it just as likely she'll use hidden pieces among the heroes already present. Maybe to kill C or H. Maybe to kill Catherine.

Frivolous

Occurred to me just now: The Book of Some Things is supposed to be all the Stories of Good, right?

Does that include the Intercessor's own Story? Would reading it allow one to reliably predict the Intercessor?

In other news: Unlike virtually every other book, Some Things is not something Cordelia can have the Forgetful Librarian read and summarize and analyze for her. The Librarian is a villain.

So who will read it? C and H themselves? Maybe the Augur?

Liliet

Bard isn't either Good or Evil.

shikkarasu

I think she might actually predate the hard concepts of Good and Evil. She certainly predates most of the Tropes that she wields. Probably invented a few just so she would have the best understanding of how her tools functioned.

Liliet

Good and Evil are what Creation was founded on, she cannot predate those.

Wonder

"We have been wrong," Hanno of Arwad conceded. "That does not make her right."

"Bears in the pit, Hanno," Cordelia softly said. "You saw it before I did."

Is Hanno right that Cat is wrong?

pyrohawk21

You missed what I think was meant there. Namely, it was Hanno conceding that Cordelia had been right when she said that earlier. Whilst Cordelia's response was that he had also seen something critical before her.

Basically it's the two of them conceding that whilst they are both right in what they saw, they had not seen the whole picture. And the other had seen parts they were missing. That neither were wrong, but also that neither were entirely right.

Albert Wen

I thought it meant Cat was also a bear in the pit.

Liliet

Technically yes, but only in the sense that they also need to help her as she helped them. Asking "do we need to fight her though" is the wrong question.

Sinead

I wonder if we will see Cat's Name being revised as just Warden.

"Who am I?" I hissed. "I am Below's watchman, the enforcer of the black laws, and I tell you now that if you do not settle your debt in full then I will cast your shivering souls out into the darkness from where is no return."

Yes she has been watching over Below, but if her Role is revised to being the one who collects Below's due (aka death for 'glory') from those who break the Accords, with Hanno as perhaps Ageis (an even bigger shield reflective of his formative years in the Titanomachy)

Nairne .01

My feelings on the matter are very simple... why is it not Friday yet...

Nairne .01

P.S. thank you very much for this chapter EE.

Daniel E

I can see this going two ways. Either they declare joint ownership of the Name, and when prompted that sharing a Name only happens rarely between siblings, they simply say 'too bad, we're making a new Story'. Or, they concede the role to Cat and give their endorsement of her consuming The Book.

pyrohawk21

It's also possible that what forms for them isn't a shared Name or giving up the role. Especially not the latter as they both have agreed that what Cat sees isn't always right.

Instead I wouldn't be surprised if they form some sort of twinned Names. Basically they each have a different name that splits the role of Warden of the West between them, whilst also having both Names work together. Hanno as the Champion of Heroes and Cordelia as the Ruler of Heroes.

Because they've recognised that each of them desire to use the Warden of the West for a certain purpose, which doesn't actually need them being the Warden to achieve. Yet neither does the role each of them believes is needed clash with each other, so long as they are not trying to do so whilst there is a Warden of the West to oppose them. So if neither of them become the Warden, what stops them from taking up another Name which works with the other to achieve the task they desired to see fulfilled?

Jason Ipswitch

I don't understand why people think Hanno & Cordelia are going to share Warden of the West after this. They've just concluded the only reason they "need" a Warden of the West is because there is a Warden of the East and Bard set them up. They agree that neither of them actually wants or needs the name. They're not going into the tower to claim the Name, they're going into the Tower to change Cat's Name.

What form that will take, I'm not sure. But my guess is that Cat will end up with more authority, but not with a full "Warden of Calerina" or equivalent name. She's still a Villain, and Hanno & Cordelia know that. and so her final Name/role will lean in that direction. She'll be a sort of evil guide, but a practical one .

(Maybe I'm wrong, and I'll be in for an large surprise over the next week or two. But if my guess is right, it's a testament to the effectiveness of EE's writing that something could be telegraphed so prominently for so long, and yet lots of people still are thinking it will be something else.)

Liliet

Options so far:

1. Share WotW, because they've fucked up enough they've cornered themselves into the necessity to claim it.
2. Change Cat's Name, and then probably gain different Names themselves? I'm not seeing Cordelia walking out of this WITHOUT a Name, one way or another, and Hanno's in the process of transitioning too.
3. Gain different Names and talk Cat down without changing her Name (boo, lame boring option)

Juff

Typo Thread:

as it were > as if it were Pilgrim to killing > Pilgrim killing woman than before (than cannot follow same. more like "the same woman she was before") that way that > the way that had risk to > had risked to what Named > Named no go away > not go away

Mincheriit

Thanks for the chapter. Ok im thinking Cat's answer to 'what do you want' deep down, is something along the lines of " a world where a 'black queen' wouldn't have been needed"/where i wouldn't have existed/become what i am.

I just put it like that to go along with the way Hanno and Cordelia said theirs. No idea which style cat would say it, imo depends on how she's feeling and how... serious she's saying it.

Reader in the Night

That's kinda what she said to Tariq, to be honest: "Where were you when Callow was taken over?"

Bad@games

It makes a twisted sort of sense to me that they would share the name, it's the star wars sith v jedi mentality. 1 super powerful sith vs multiple kinda powerful jedi, who evenly match the dark side by working together

Isi Arnott-Campbell

It's like poetry. It rhymes.

sidehammer056302

So...

Are we going to have Joint Wardens of the West? No Warden of the West?

Will Cat's Name change if there is no Warden of the West? If she devours the Book, which contains Good's stories, will she become the Warden of both sides? Will she simply be THE Warden?

I have to admit, going into this arc, I was siding with Cordelia, and when she voiced what she wanted, that the Tariq's of the world would be hanged, I was won over even more, but Hanno surprised me when he hit back with not wanting a world where Cordelia could call the Tenth Crusade. Cat nigh BEGGED her not to do it, but because of politics and hubris, how many thousands died? All those people she hangs on the Black Knight's tear through her country, those are all ultimately on her. Perhaps even Tariq's crimes as well. I'd forgotten, due to the magnitude of events that have since occurred, necessitating the Alliance, how much all of this stemmed from her orders. That put me hard into Hanno's court.

But! Now that we understand this is a terrible trap, I'm kinda hoping we get no Warden of the West, and that either Cat inherits the powers (by devouring the Book or not) or that there simply is no Westerly Warden.

ninegardens

See... I find it interesting how many people are in the "hang Tariq" camp. (Not a critique, just a contrast).

Like, we are talking about Tariq killing hundreds in the same sentence we talk about Black knight starving THOUSANDS. That was what he was trying to stop.

We also have Cordelia's alternative plan which involved burning down a city with the citizens inside. And... as Hanno and you pointed out, the whole damn Crusade and much that has happened since can be laid at her feet (very much a case of "a good person with a bad policy" as she aptly describes).

I am all for Tariq being put on trail for what he did. I am all for him being pulled up before a tribunal... but Cordelia's phrasing of "I want a world where it is a given the Peregrine will hang" just sat wrong with me, and actually lessened her claim in my eyes.

I want a world where it is a given that the peregrine will be called to account. What the results of that Tribunal are should not be a foregone conclusion however, and Cordelia's phrasing implies a desired outcome, not just the desire that the law be applied.

Honestly, in terms of Morals, I'd argue Tariq has better defences than 95% of the princes, generals and main characters in this story.

sidehammer056302

That's interesting, because I find the actions of the Black Knight almost completely justified. Taking the fight to the enemy and striking at their strategic resources is a completely viable tactic, If Cordelia was horrified by the devastation wrought, she really oughtn't have picked the fight. War isn't just a game, nor a business or political maneuver to bust out whenever things start to get dicey at home. To so casually play with the lives of three countries and then be horrified by the repercussions is moronic and any attempt at moralizing is pure sophistry.

I think the hang up on Tariq is his seeming hypocrisy, Tariq insists he and his action serve Good and thus are so, yet he murders an entire village of noncombatants in order to subdue a single legal combatant defending themselves from an invading religious war. At least Amadeus never claimed to be anything other than a warlord.

But I agree with you on Cordelia's skewed desired outcome, hanging instead of trial. Though I suppose it is possible she's speaking with the benefit of hindsight, since she knows at this time that Tariq was guilty of the massacre and he even admits it, if I'm remembering right.

Salt

I think Amadeus' actions are completely unjustified, and significantly worse than both Cordelia and Tariq (who are similar), interestingly enough.

The main difference is that, for all their flaws, both Tariq and Cordelia were actively attempting to save lives, or to make the world a better place. That was their end goal – which they both largely succeeded in, albeit with some pretty awful mistakes in the process as well.

For Amadeus, it was victory, full stop. The man doesn't give a single shit about the lives of innocent Proceran peasants or how much they're suffering, that's why even his adopted daughter unequivocally calls him a monster. What he did was more along the lines of shifting the war away from the agreedupon rules of engagement to total war, mostly so he could win

As far as Cordelia vs the Pilgrim goes, imo neither one is any more or less justified than the other in their "lesser evils for the greater good" style – they'd probably make similar choices in similar situations, most of the time. The Pilgrim at least admits that his lesser evils are horrifying, while Cordelia is largely unrepentant about hers, but I don't think that makes him any more or less guilty. They should be judged and sentenced the same way on account of their actions and intentions being near-identical, whether the verdict is a hanging or an absolution

sidehammer056302

See, I'd have to disagree, respectfully.

Cordelia was having political troubles in Procer that might have lead to another civil war and tried to quash it by pointing to an "enemy" outside of their borders and siccing all the malcontents at them. It was a tried and true tactic of running Procer, in fact. It was literally business as normal. That, to me, is completely reprehensible.

And as to "agreed upon rules of engagement"? I'm sorry, but who exactly agreed to these rules? I know the innocent Callowans never did. War isn't just something you toss around because you're too lazy and inept to sort out your own house. It should be the very LAST resort, in EVERY situation, no matter HOW the ruling powers like to use it to further their ends. If you dare step foot in MY country. try to kill MY people, loot and rape MY peoples' lands, you're going to damn well pay the price. Amadeus, "monstrous" as he was, struck the hardest, most devastating blow he could against the offending force, depriving them of essential war assets that might have extended the conflict and cost the lives of more of his side's people. So the aggressors die in droves because they can't feed themselves, so what? They're the aggressors! None of this would have happened if Procer wasn't such a terrible and corrupt country in the first place. No loss that I can see. "Oh no, the people we were going to kill and loot and rape and steal land from turned the tables on us and hit US instead! Boohoo! They're so MEAN! Wah!"

Amadeus was completely in the right, in my opinion. Cordelia and her religious fanatics bear FULL responsibility for EVERYTHING that happened as a result.

Forgive me if any of that hostility seemed directed towards you in the slightest, that isn't my intent. I have strongly held opinions on this matter (lol, obviously) and find it absolutely disgusting the way war is used as business tool. Sending people out to die and kill for the benefit of the rich and powerful is abhorrent.

Salt

By rules of engagement I mean the ones Cat and the Pilgrim specifically agreed on for tenth crusade as it was starting, for the express purpose of limiting harm to innocent people on either side/curbing excesses during the course of the war. One of which was not sacking cities. It was meant to be a first step in building trust between them and civilizing the conflicts a bit going forward

The random Proceran villagers and average cityfolk who were probably weeks away from even hearing news of the Crusade fully starting weren't deserving of getting caught in the crossfire any more than the innocent Callowans.

You think some average Proceran farmer had a hand in starting the crusade? The poor know-nothing weaver a thousand miles away from the front that was all geared up to rape and pillage Callow? They weren't part of the "offending force", and they certainly weren't "aggressors". They were people just trying to live their lives, people who regularly got stepped on by the powers of the Principiate who actually started the war, and it was them that Black actually ended up harming.

It wasn't princes and generals starving to death as a result of what Black did. Those people have the money and connections to live in luxury even during the quite literal end of the world. It's normal, average, innocent folk without any special political or economic clout that have their entire family starve to death when there are food shortages. His little counter-crusade across Procer harmed mostly people who had absolutely nothing to do with anything, and had almost no personal effect on the large majority of Proceran top brass who were really responsible for the Crusade.

That makes it abhorrent, in my eyes.

sidehammer056302

You're right, I was looking at the Black Knight's counter-attack as merely damaging the war effort and overlooking the human element. On the personal level, you're absolutely correct, they're just trying to live their lives with no say over how things are done, but on the macro scale, they're supplying our enemies with the means to devastate our home.

Also, I had completely forgotten about the conversation between Cat and the Pilgrim and didn't remember they had agreed on any rules. That's my bad.

In the end, I still very much put the blame on Cordelia and Proceran nobility. If there had been a reasonable way of getting at and punishing them personally, I would choose it a hundred times over, but in reality, the only way to significantly strike at them was to do what Amadeus did. The nobles valued only money and power, and both of those are tied up in how many people they have and how much food they can produce. It's not pretty and it's unfair. but it's also something the rulers of Procer decided to ignore when declaring war unprovoked. That really is the biggest tragedy of the situation, Cordelia and the nobility did NOT know who they were F'ing with and got utterly spanked, yet the real price was paid by the citizenry.

After some time to cool down, and after reading your posts, I'll demote "completely justified" to perhaps something like "necessary evil", I do still think it was the most tactically sound decision given the options, but I'll concede it was in fact monstrous.

PS: But damn, now I'm really wishing Cordelia and the nobles hadn't gotten off so scott free! Do you think the devastation of Procer by the Dead King going on now is in some way EE's karmic vengeance?

jamesc9

When Cat got teleport ability, someone who might have been Juniper pitched assassinations of Proceran leaders, and she turned it down. Finding a link would take a lot of searching.

Lord Haart

IIRC Cat thought it might be fair in theory but in practice would cause the deaths of even more peasants.

Mithras

So I'm coming down on two sides here.

First, we can't lay Cordelia's decision to crusade solely at her doorstep. Sure this is business as normal for Procer, sure everyone was happy to be part of a land grab, sure she refused every treaty presented to her and yeah definitely this situation could have arisen under normal circumstances.

But it didn't, Procer's situation after the long civil war was engineered by Malicia, she set up the bank which drug the war out and which geared Procer for crusade and which ultimately put Cordelia in the untenable situation she found herself. Does that absolve Cordelia of guilt? No but it reminds us that in war there is very rarely absolute morality of responsibility.

On the other hand the idea that Amadeus did not intend to do good is a nonsense. Honestly his goals were one of the most laudable in that part of the story. He wanted to free Praes and Callow from their cycle of endless conflict and population boom and bust, he wanted to dismantle the natural systems which explicitly oppressed the common people. The actions he took in the crusade was explicitly to protect that ideal. What made him a villain was his cast iron certainty that his way was the right one and his willingness to do whatever he needed to do to anyone else to make his version of reality come true (limited by pragmatism of course)... hmm seems like I'm describing Tariq here- the real difference between the two is that Tariq's grand vision basically boiled down to slapping down bad guys, helping heroes and generally maintaining the status quo even when he disagreed with it. Both Names were perfectly happy breaking the eggs they needed to in order to achieve their goals.

Salt

In a broad sense you could say every character, including all the worst ones, were trying to help something; but that means basically nothing at all. Heck, even the Dead King destroying all life on the continent is trying to help the Serenity/Keter. In terms of caring about the wellbeing of the continent as a whole, there's very few characters that qualify, and most didn't start out with such a broad view. Black certainly doesn't qualify at any point, he's very partisan towards Praes the way early Cordelia only cared about Procer.

The likes of Cat/the Pilgrim are different, in that they're not solely focused on the good of one minority over everyone else, and actually have some lines they won't cross.

Catherine rejected Bonfire. Tariq mainly cares about alleviating suffering for creation as a whole, and never deviates from that. Black primarily cared about Praes, and couldn't care less if the rest of the continent drowns in a sea of blood.

In terms of the specific action that's the topic – him counterattacking through Procer – that wasn't an effort to make Praes or Callow better. He was simply trying to do as much damage as humanly possible to their enemies before dying for Catherine's sake, since at the time he actually believed his life was nearing its end due to the weakening of his Name. It was essentially the Named equivalent of a suicide bombing.

He did take some major actions for a greater good, but you can't just blanket paint every single thing he did in a positive light based on his overall motivations. Awful actions are still awful, regardless whether your overall life goal is to lift up a nation or eat twenty sandwiches.

alelekitaponga

Here's the rub, would thousands starve? Or would thousands starve because the Princes of Procer would refuse to sue for peace and pay for war reparations/ grain from Callow? Remember that War was declared and food supplies are a legitimate military target. No civilians were killed or harmed and Black's Army was civilized enough to PAY for their supplies. If we apply precedent anything Black did wouldn't count as a war crime while Tariq sure as hell would.

That's the reason that we "hang Tariq". The method, because Tariq is only Good and Black Evil if we take into account outcomes and not what's actually being done and their legitimacy in doing it. Black is a wartime general following standard practices while Tariq is a “nobody” (officially) slaughtering civilians (not even his civilians).

jamesc9

> food supplies are a legitimate military target

If they're food supplies for civilians, in our international framework, then I'm not sure that that's true.

I think that in the framework between Tariq and Cat, it's probably false, because busting the food supply for a city is just an indirect version of city-busting.

Black isn't subject to an agreement between Tariq and Cat.

Liliet

Yeh I don't think Tariq was necessarily wrong. However the world Cordelia is talking about is also the world where he would be.

Linnus42

I can only respect that world of Cordelia if she be hanging besides him like that meme if they went with her plan. But I don't think Cordelia thinks she should be hung if she made the call to burn a whole city.

Liliet

Honestly that's valid criticism. I see Cordelia's point and I don't think some hypocrisy on this specific matter is too bad – it's like Cat saying that Named should have less power while accumulating power, or like democracies needing to defend themselves from authoritarian ideologies. Sometimes self-consistency is self-defeating, and differentiating the present and the future is meaningful.

And I'm aware I'm making arguments Cordelia is not, but, well. She's running on emotions. I'm analyzing the rational impact of those.

Liliet

(I think Cordelia's point comes across more clearly if you replace “hang” with “stand trial, like an actual trial with an actually impartial judge who isn't incentivized to be lenient with this specific person”. She would stand trial alongside Tariq, willingly. Her point about hanging is not about hanging yourself, it's about submitting to law and outside judgement.)

Reader in the Night

An important distinction that I think should be drawn is between whether or not something is "right" and whether or not it should have "consequences".

Even the fairest Law in the universe will sometimes meet a real-life situation where applying it would be unjust, because that's just how life works. For example, Tariq's necessary genocide of a small town.

You can argue it was just or unjust, necessary or not, but it remains unlawful. And the Law needs to apply in all cases, even if there are excellent reasons for breaking it, because if you start making exceptions the Law itself becomes weakened, and that allows actually evil acts to go unpunished.

So Tariq might have been in the right, but he still needed to have been punished for it. And I think that certainty that they'd be punished itself might weight on the decision-making process of future Heroes:

Is killing that village really worth it, even knowing you'll die for it? If death discourages them, it probably wasn't needed in the first place. If it's truly needed, then the Heroes make the righteous choice and sacrifice themselves along with the village.

Abrakadabra

Starving thousands is not equal to killing thousands. They can be saved at any point if the Principate is willing to do so. For example by sending the food to them instead to the front. While killing hundreds is killing hundreds. There is no going Back.

letouriste

So...i guess the next step is turning back cat from the blinders she got since the time skip?

That was really well written EE 😊

aurikdomi

absolutely worth the delay great stuff

Trupo

Just noticed that the unrealised Hanno / Cordelia dumvirate has the same dynamics that Amadeus / Malicia once had... and Intercessor tried to split them using pretty much the same method. Coincidence?

Liliet

Yo, I fucking love this.

Shoutout to all the people (the one person?) who called out WotE as part of the trap.

This was great and also the best and also excellent. Though I would, like many readers, like Hanno to elaborate on what "atrocities" he means.

mamm0nn

Suuuuuuuuuuuuuuuuuuuuuuure Mirror Knight wasn't meant to ever leave his lakeside village after defeating a probably Fey Villain. Above always hands out Aspects that make you a little stronger every dawn to Heroes that are meant to just exist for a year and then go away again, especially in a world where Below gets an even Due for everything Above gives their side.

ninegardens

This.... is a really really good point.

I kind of wonder if EE just forgot this particular character detail, cause it is a detail that hasn't been mentioned for like.... 5 books.

Sinead

I think he was meant to be a whisky barrel.

aka: store away safely age, and then bust out when the party starts hitting hard.

So sending him on a Crusade was good as it tempered him in a way that meditation would not. Christophe probably came into his Name when the Crusade was inevitable, so his investiture would have taken that into account.

legomithras

Yeah I'm sure cordelia's arguments are full of holes but Hanno's wrongness is obvious.

Hanno: 'Heroes were not meant to rule.'
Every Good King Ever, The Blood, The Heirach and a bunch of other Ruling Names: 'You wot m8?!?'

shikkarasu

The Tyrant: "I agree; Heroes were not meant to rule and I think we all know what needs to be done." unhinged grin
The Dead King: "I disagree. Good Kings make good lawn ornaments.”

The Hierarchy: “no one was meant to rule. What is wrong with you people?”

AndromedaStar

What I’m worried abt is that the Bard, in retaliation for her Warden of the West crippling plan going wrong due to Catherine’s intervention, is going to set in motion a Warden of the East crippling plan and let go of Evil’s stories riiiiiiight about when Catherine is just about to finish consuming an energy field bigger than her head.

Sugar Roll

It’s been said that there’s a thin line between love and hate. They could not stand each other before but now they’re finishing each other’s sentences. Is the HannoXCordelia ship really going to sail?

Two dozen snakes

Bard is going after the Warden of the West because the Role is the one in direct opposition to the Dead King. It is Above’s answer to the Dead King. That is the story of the West. That is why she first attempted to create the Name in a way she could control, and why now that she can’t control it anymore she wants to weaken it. Because the WotW takes her out of the board, she no longer has a path to taking over the war on Nessie

Hanno and Cordelia were poor fits because both assumed the Warden of the West would stand in opposition to the Warden of the East, to be its Good mirror. But it’s not. The Warden of the West has nothing to do with the Warden of the East, because the stories of the East and West are too different, not enough intertwining between them

As always, Indrani had it right all along 😊

Ronnie

Given that the Intercessor knows that Catherine can often see through her plots, I wonder if there is a trap within the trap. She has likely baited Catherine to absorb the ‘Good’ stories; perhaps if Catherine is now gifted the ‘Évil’ stories, Catherine, having sight of all stories, automatically becomes the next Intercessor.

We haven’t had the origin story of the Intercessor yet.

chris S

I’m surprised so many comments are discussing splitting/sharing the WotW Name in upcoming chapters.

It just seems people missed the entire point of Hanno and Cordelia's realisation – because WotE exists as a Name, Bard pulled strings to make everyone think that they NEEDED a WotW role to balance it out.

Liliet

I mean they also realized that while they SHOULDNT have done all that they ALREADY HAVE and now they have to handle the mess somehow.

RoflCat

Something I just thought of in a shower thought moment:

Catherine is basically doing an intervention so that Cord/Hanno doesn't have to go through what she did with Black.

Two people who have opposing goals (specifically for Malicia for those two) that refused to come together and talk on compromise (remember that Catherine also said she wouldn't pursue if Alaya escape across the sea, which for Black would still be acceptable result since she lives) until it's too late and there's no room for further talk or any option besides blood.

And Bard wins regardless of which way things go.

So instead of Hanno/Cord have a lethal confrontation, they get shoved into a time out room to have a talk and avoid the trap.

Liliet

Mm!

AbraKadabra

Maybe they will let her eat the book of some things, and when they eventually stole the villain stories from the Bard, she will make it into a book, name it the practical guide to evil, and give it to them.

S33K3R

Anyone else see the summer court reference in Cordelia's 'what is it you want' moment?

D. D.

A long moment passed, silence hanging between them. The breeze caressed the grass.

"Journeys, not a battle," the Sword of Judgement murmured.
"Yours. Mine. Hers."

Blue eyes met brown, an understanding. They could still end this right.

She did not know who clicked the first link, but they cast the vote together.

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Jdburger

So reading this chapter it occurred me that this maybe a bard plot but not just the one Hanno and Cordelia are thinking off. This confrontation has been building for awhile so we can safely assume this was but in motion prior to the Bard conflict with Catherine this book.

Catherine currently has the Book of all Above stories, and the Bard is suppressing all Below Stories. I might have missed something, but why has not be revealed yet. We know WB has a good measure of Cat – I wonder if the Above Stories is actually a trap for Cat.

WB can probably guess Cat would intervene between Hanno and Cordelia, and likely use the Above stories as bait. If Cordelia and Hanno tear each other apart, she wins because the Warden of the West is crippled and so they will need to turn to WB for help. But WB from what we see in Arsenal does not do simple plans... so what if the Book is a contingency. Cat's ritual consumes the Book and it becomes part of her just as the Below stories are part of WB aspect. Hanno and Cordelia cannot or will not be Catherine's opposite from this conversation leaving the closest being the WB.

Not big on Namelore but could that nature influence one of Catherine's developing Aspects – turning it into something similar to the Bard's Wander. It would mean like the WB she is confined to influencing stories rather than leading them. Without Cat influence being checked the Alliance may still fall apart and force them to follow the Bards plan to stop the Dead King.

Sorry if this has already been discussed posting via phone so hard to go through all the comments.

Chapter 39: Name (Redux)

"Carry with you my blessing and my curse: may you ever get what you deserve."

– Extract from the 'Tenets Under Night', Firstborn religious text

The fabric of Arcadia cracked around me and I grinned. I was so very, very close.

The Book of Some Things struggled furiously against the relentless onslaught of Night, but it had begun a slow descent into loss from the moment the first tendril slithered through a fracture. The artefact's power was constrained in a way that was literally inhuman, the precision impossible by mortal hands, but no matter how hard the nut if you hammered at it long enough you'd get something to show for it. Brute force all the way through would have taken days, maybe even an entire week, but that'd never been the plan. All the Night I could channel into relentless pressure without needing to guide the ritual had just been meant to create those fractures.

The precision work came after, widening the cracks and pulling apart the defences around the Book shard by shard. I could dip out for a bit and let brute force fall down again, but I'd been embellishing the truth when I'd told people that the ritual could end without me. It was technically true, but if I wanted it finished tonight then I'd need to be personally involved. It why I'd rustled up my band of valiant villainous defenders in the first place: one I got my licks in with Hanno and Cordelia, I'd need people to cover for me while I did the labour of smothering the divine Light of hope. You know, metaphorically speaking.

... probably. It would have taken more power than this if I was literally killing hope, I reassured myself.

And the thing was that, deep down, I'd not actually expected this to work. I went against everything I'd been taught: I had cackled atop a flying tower, begun a massive ungainly ritual to destroy something Good while there were heroes in riding distance and just generally monologued at people who might be construed as my rivals should you squint a bit. I had, in other words, behaved in a way that would have made my father roll in his graves if he'd not been given to a pyre. Only now I was standing alone in a room so deeply drenched in shadows it might as well be the night sky, prying apart the shell of the Book as it shone like a furious star, and I was winning.

The Book burned, for a moment washing away even the slightest of shadows, but I snorted.

"Shouldn't have done that," I informed it. "Sure, as far as I can tell your source of power is pretty much inexhaustible, but your outflow..."

The burning Light suddenly flickered, and in the moment of weakness Night swallowed all it had lost and more. The Book struggled, burning bright twice more, but every time it burned shorter and ceded more ground afterwards.

"Like I thought, you have a fixed outflow," I told the Book. "Like veins, yeah? So when you come at me with all that fire, trying to chase me out of the room, you're cramming a lot more blood in those veins than there's supposed to be. Making them burst."

The Book pulsed, shadows shivering around it.

"You damaged yourself," I tutted disapprovingly.

And it opened the veins wider for me to slither through, not that I'd give it warning over that. I was still unsure exactly how intelligent the artefact was. Not sentient, as far as I could tell, but it was far from inert. There was a will in there, dumb and blind as it might be.

Leaning forward, I pulled at the Night. Picking through later after layer would have taken too long, especially the tighter shell nearer to the Book itself, but I'd been going deep instead of wide: I only needed to get to the artefact to finish this, not strip it naked. My flesh eye was half-closed, blinded by the Light, but under my eyecloth Night roiled and let me see through a hundred more. It was easier that way to pick my angle, slide between two jagged shards – invisible even to my weaves, only outlined by the press of Night against them – and slip into a crack. Not deep enough I thought, but I had a way around that.

"Hooks," I ordered, frowning.

Like a thousand little mandibles the Night slipped into the crack bit into the shard, anchoring itself to the power. Like a fishing line I spun out chords of Night from it and hung them behind me, into the great currents of darkness, before rolling a shoulder. Now I just had to put my back into it. All my eyes closed, I breathed out shallowly and emptied my mind. Distractions fell away one after another, swallowed up by the dark, until all that was left was a simple thought: pull. I sunk into it, made it fill me up to the brim for what must have been a hundred years.

A loud crack jolted me out of the state, the sound rippling across the fabric of Arcadia. A long, thin shard broke away and flew up from the massive pressure, disappearing into the currents of Night. I could feel the tapestry of Arcadia wane around me, like a tapestry used as a cutting board. Creation would have been more solid, but I'd chosen Arcadia because rules were looser here in the first place. It'd last long enough anyway, I thought as I learned forward even further. Now there was only a small, smooth shell no broader than my thumb keeping me from getting to the Book.

One more good hit and I was in. I sent out my will, Night rippling around me, and found Archer.

"Report," I ordered.

"Band of heroes coming from the hills," Indrani said. "Captured the Royal Conjurer, by the looks of it, but they're having a hard time with horses on the hill paths. The rest of our guests are contained."

There were only so many bands of five I had it in me to swat away tonight, so it'd be best to finish this as soon as possible. I'd given the would-be wardens every chance I had to spare. If they couldn't pull through now, it was on them.

"Do what you can to slow them down," I said.

There was beat.

"Cat, what's wrong?" Indrani asked.

"Nothing," I lied, and cut the tie.

Looking down, I saw that my hands were trembling. From the exertion, I told myself. Not from what I was about to do: attempt to steal Above's power and devour it whole. I clenched my hands.

"It's the best of the bad solutions," I told the Book. "My foundations will be weak, sure, but I'll have the power to take on the Dead King."

Just not, I thought, the power to survive him. When two peerless monsters entered the ring, only ruin ensued. I wasn't sure, couldn't be, but that was my gut said and these days it was so rarely wrong. I'd be fragile strength I took into the fight and the Hidden Horror would make me pay for that. Maybe I'd make it out anyway, merely crawl out broken, but the odds would be leaning the other way. I stared down my hands until they stopped shaking.

I was a few graveyards past a happy ending.

"So let's take a swing," I murmured, "and see where it gets me."

The power came easy: Night loved a winning battle. The Book's power felt smooth as an eggshell, without flaw, but I had broken through that before. The battering ram came down, the mangled globe creaking under the weight as I wielded the power in the most simple, brutal way it could be wielded. I waited and watched through a hundred eyes and one, following the shape of the power as it distended under the pressure. And, eventually, fissured. A small break, more along the curve of the last shell than inside it, but there was a slight indent.

I flexed my will, turning pressure to liquid as Night poured down through the slight opening before it could close. It would do. It was weak leverage, but when you had enough strength to wield that could be enough. I wove hook after hook, tightened the weave and raised my arm. I took the deep currents in hand, closed my eyes and pulled. Was I in the dark, or was I the dark? It was hard to tell where the border was. My own heartbeat felt distant, as if I'd been submerged, but I had a lifeline. The chords of Night in my hand, pulling at me as I had pulled at them.

I came back to the world to a splintering sound that echoed of a scream, the shell cracking and breaking as I breathed out and Night tendrils pulled and picked and ripped it all apart. All that effort, I thought as my eyes opened, to expose no more than a thumb's worth of the Book of Some Things. But exposed it was, and I reached out for the leather-bound book with my hand. Light burned, a sun howling in indignation that I dare to darken it, but I had veiled greater suns than this.

"Fall," I ordered, and Night obeyed.

The Light did not give an inch even as I drowned it in darkness, but the dark was patient. Like a candle starved of air I watched it burn and burn and burn until there was nothing left to consume but itself, and then that pride ate itself hollow. Until there was but a speck left, an ember, and the light dimmed. I had won.

Damn me, I had won.

My fingertips found the leather cold to the touch. Blindly angry, I ripped out the ember from the book and watched it wilt. I held the speck of Light in the palm of my hand and looked through the Night, to the threshold of my tower in this realm and another. The moonlight was blinding, a curtain of pale, but through it cut two stark silhouettes. The First Prince and the Sword of Judgement, crossing the threshold together.

"Good," I said. "Good. Now we end this."

—

They climbed the stairs unhindered, I saw to that.

The dark parted for them, like a tide receding, and I heard the sound of their steps on the stone long before they passed through the gate into the tower's heart. Neither of them hurried, neither of them slow: it was a pace like the beat of a drum. It had the taste of the inexorable to it. And when they came at last, entering a sea of Night broken only by the glow of the ember in my palm, the play of shadows cut the figure of them to the bone. As if only the crux of them was being shined upon, the rest of it claimed by the dark.

Hanno of Arwad, the tall knight with a workman's calloused hands. The sword at his side was little more than a line, his eyes a single streak of calm. Cordelia Hasenbach, the princess with the arrow-straight back. A raised chin and blue eyes burning cold.

Neither of them flinched away from the dark.

"You're late," I said.

My voice echoed across the Night, the only thing it did not swallow. No, instead the words reverberated across the room until the very last note faded, somehow faintly sounding of the cawing of crows. I felt talons digging into my shoulders, the presence of Sve Noc a tangible weight. I had the attention of my patronesses.

"But not too late," he replied.

His movement drew shape from light, the cut of his jaw and the length of the sword still in the sheath.

"Not so sure about that," I said. "Though at least the both of you made it here."

"Bears in the pit," she evenly said. "We saw. There is blinkered and there is blind."

A slash of pale gold across her brow, the whisper of long skirts against the stone.

"And what is it you see?" I scoffed.

"The lady of long strings, pulling at them still," he said. "Poisoning the chalice we are all to drink from."

Lips firmly set, the dull shine of a belt buckle.

"Too little," I said. "And much, much too late. If all you hold is what I hand you..."

My fingers closed around the ember of light, shadows like ribs cast on my face. I did not finish, crush it entirely and eat it whole, but the warning was plain. Better tyranny than a lackluster opposite. That mistake, at least, most of Calernia would live through.

"And what would closing that grip make you, I wonder?" she asked.

Curls like a river going down brocade, a tooth digging into skin to the very edge of piercing.

"The necessary evil," I smiled, all teeth under the hood. "You ought to be used to it by now."

"You are," he replied, blunt. "It is why you reach even when you should not."

Hair cut short I could make out the skin under, cloth hanging loose on his arm.

"What else is there?" I challenged. "I gave you warning. I bet you might live up to the boasts of your Gods, share a victory, but I see none of that before me."

"You see nothing," she said. "Because you are still in the pit."

A cheekbone like a crossguard, a blue sleeve hiding a hand. I almost laughed in Cordelia's face. Of course I was still in the pit. I'd started there, bleeding for silver, and odds were I'd die in there as well. Just because the pit got bigger and the toughs tougher didn't mean anything had changed.

"You've failed," I said, the regret in my voice honest. "Neither of you will stand. There is only one way left now."

Through, I thought.

"That is true," he acknowledged. "If you act alone."

The entire relief of him, for the briefest moment as he passed between two ribs: bruised but not beaten. A bearing of a fragile certainty. They were not yet done. I narrowed my eye at them, staring them down from all sides, but they were half shadows themselves in the depths of the dark.

"So I ask again," I said. "What else is there?"

"Bargain, Warden of the East," she said. "Do you not have the West before you?"

Half of her stood in the light, like she had been split in half: gold and winter and blue, for a heartbeat shone upon.

"Bargain instead of taking."

And she was gone, dress trailing a flutter behind her as she returned to the dark. My fingers, the ones still holding the Night, clenched. Knots formed around them. She was serious, I thought, and Hanno was not contradicting her. They were mad.

"Half the world?" I mused. "That will have a hefty price."

"Is that an excuse for stealing instead?" he asked.

The good hand on the Good sword, a shoulder pulling tight.

"I'll bite," I languidly shrugged. "What is it that you want for your half?"

"Give up power," Cordelia Hasenbach challenged. "Your hands should only hold so much: another must lead the Damned."

A glimpse of light, but all I saw was the eyes: cold and blue and hard as the iron her people had once named kings for. You want me to step away, I thought. To become the sole keeper of the Accords and bind my hands with my own rules. There would be captains for Above and Below but I would not be one of them, instead an arbiter between. My fingers clenched even further. Did she even begin to understand how much power she was asking me to throw away? Already I was abdicating my throne, was I to burn every last scrap of influence I held along with it? What she described, it would leave me no authority save through the Accords. While they kept their followings intact, giving up empty claims in exchange for the root of my own power.

"And while I cut my own legs the two of you will keep your seats, of course," I replied.

I shook my head, darkly amused.

"You people can never really lose, can you?" I said, smiling my father's smile.

"Can you?" Hanno of Arwad retorted.

All I saw in the light was his hand, the fingers cut to the phalange. Hanno's own bargain.

"On the cusp of your oldest trick, another ruin of a victory," he said, "do you have it in you to compromise anyway, Catherine Foundling?"

Night roiled with my anger. Another hero coming out of the cold asking me to meet them halfway after having stepped an inch to my mile. Another fairweather friend demanding my cloak. My fingers closed further around the ember, the shadow ribs pulling closer.

"Compromise takes from both sides," I bit out. "What is it that you're giving up?"

The two of them stood at the edge of the light, little more than silhouettes. The three of us around the heart of the Book, like three strangers huddled around a fire.

"I will abdicate all power in Procer," Cordelia said. "And spend the rest of my life in Cardinal serving the Accords."

"Their laws will have to be enforced on Named," Hanno said. "I will pledge my sword to the duty, under your authority."

I took half a step back. Lose everything, they'd demanded of me. And now they were offering everything in return. A simple solution, but the intricacies spun out along with my thoughts. She'd build Cardinal as a city and the skeleton of the Accords applied, the schools and the bureaucracy. And he'd make himself into the enforcer of the laws all Named must abide, the one sent into the breach when horror got loose. The both of them would grant legitimacy that I simply did not have, warlord that I was. And they would also be a noose around my neck: I could not ask dark deeds of that enforcer, I could not plot conquest past that chancellor.

Wings and an anchor at the same time. An elegant, balanced solution.

It just required me to be willing to give up every speck of authority I held beyond treaties that were still nothing more than ink on parchment. To let slip from my grasp every single thing I'd fought for since the night I had almost been strangled to death in an alley. Talons dug into my shoulders. My goddesses were watching, waiting. Wanting to hear my answer. I looked at the two silhouettes in the waning light, feeling the weight of their gazes and silence, wondering. Had the Sisters had felt like this that night in the Everdark, when I had offered Winter and asked for salvation in return?

I got no answer from them but expected nothing else. After all, it was my turn on their side of the altar.

"Crabs in the bucket," I murmured. "It always comes back to that in the end, doesn't it?"

Having to trust that the others wanted to leave the bucket too, that they didn't just want to drag you back down. The leap of faith. And I still remembered what it was like, kneeling before silver eyes and asking the only thing you really could. Help me. Please.

"It might fail," I told them.

They waited, silent. I clenched my fingers and unclenched them.

"But that's we always say, isn't it?"

My father had never understood, to the end, that sometimes it wasn't about winning. It'd gotten him killed. And maybe, I thought, this would get me killed too.

But it was the only way out of the pit, and what else could I do but try?

I released the Night, the knots around my hand unmaking themselves. The sea withdrawing around all three of us until the last ember of the Book shone like a firefly cradled in my hand.

"Half the world," I quietly said. "Bargain struck."

Cordelia stepped forward first, reaching out and gently unclasping my fingers. The ember burned against my palm, free. Hanno met my eye, leaning forward over the altar and smiling.

He blew out the Light.

Darkness swallowed whole the room, then it swallowed me too.

—

I woke up standing on ashes.

In the distance the wind howled, kicking up great clouds of ash and dust, and my leg was throbbing. My sword was at my hip, my staff in my hand. Both were cold to the touch. I pulled my cloak tight around me, shivering, and looked ahead. There was a great stone ramp there, leading to a broken city. It had been built in a tall plateau, which lay shattered as ash rained down from the sky and the wind whipped at hollowed out husks. I'd been here before, I knew. I'd fought to defend this city and lost.

"Hainaut," I murmured.

The wind gave no answer. The sky above was an endless stretch of storm clouds, red lightning crackling above and making itself known through the flashes of light. The whole world seemed coated in bleak grey light. I sighed,

"At least it isn't Liesse," I muttered. "We have haunted each other long enough."

Around us was a vast plain of ash, so there was only one way to go: forward, into the city. My leg felt like nails were being driven into it, but I pulled my hood down and limped towards the ramp. With every excruciating step, I could not help but think I had been here before. Not Hainaut, but the rest. This plain of ash. But I could not tell when or how, no more than I remembered how I had come here. All I knew was that my answers lay ahead.

The journey was long. The sky began to darken as the hours passed, shadows lengthening around me. But I reached the bottom of the slope, and there at last it all fell into place. Half-buried in the ash, revealed by a careless twist of wind, I found a corpse. A legionary, one of mine. Just some boy who couldn't have been older than eighteen, his skull split open and his eyes unseeing.

Come to a foreign field to die for strangers.

"Name dream," I said, then shook my head scornfully.

I glanced up at the sky.

"Death did not shake me when I was barely more than a girl," I told it, "and I've waded through oceans of it since. What did you expect?"

"For you to learn."

It had been many years since I'd last dreamt one of these dreams, but the woman who'd called out to me still felt like I'd seen her yesterday. Why shouldn't she, when she was wearing my face? Older than me, her hair cut short and her robes pure white, but we were still twins. At her hip a long and slender sword hung from her belt, pure silver, but that wasn't what drew my attention. She was holding some sort of case with a cloth draped over it.

"Added to your arsenal, I see," I amiably replied.

The doppelganger glared at me.

"And you still avoid the reproaches to which you have no answer," my twin said.

"I've learned a lot of things," I told her, half-smiling. "Just not the sort you like."

"Not the sort anyone should like," my twin said. "How many cities' worth of dead now trail in our wake, Catherine? Enough of them it might make up a kingdom. Your very own graveyard crown."

"Better my graveyard than the Dead King's," I flatly replied. "Mine, at least, will sleep in peace."

"They should have drowned us at birth," she said. "Evil as the act would have been, it would still have been better than the plague of a woman we turned into. Again and again you were given the choice to turn away, to do better, and where did that lead you?"

She gestured up at broken Hainaut.

"Ruin heaped on ruin," my twin said. "You are the worst of what we were as a girl, honed to a fine edge."

"You never learned how to compromise either, did you?" I asked. "You still think it's better to accomplish nothing than to do bad things."

"Look around you, Catherine," she gently said. "What is you've accomplished?"

My fingers clenched around my staff.

"You were wrong then," I replied, "and you're wrong now. Doing nothing is worse than being Evil. It's just going along with everything that's wrong with the world."

"And is it a better world you've made?" she asked me.

I breathed out, looking up at the sky. I could have been flippant, have made a joke of it, but it would have felt wrong. This is the last time I'm ever going to see you, isn't it? If I was to face my doubts manifest, I would face them honestly.

"Ask me when the war's over," I finally said. "When I'm no longer holding my sword."

Face unreadable, she slowly nodded.

"What now?" I asked her.

"I guide you into the city," my twin replied.

She pulled away the cloth, dropping it into the ash and revealing the wooden lantern below. There was no flame inside, I saw. It was an ember of Light, the same I'd seen Hanno blow out. Around us, night fell over the world.

"Follow me closely," she said. "The way is treacherous."

She was not lying. The streets were cracked, houses and towers falling apart as the wind mournfully twisted past them. The rain of ash blinded the view of the sky, the rare lightning and distant starlight crowning the clouds. Hainaut had been turned into a monument to ruin and death, corpses dangling from every edge and crammed in every nook and cranny. Under the lantern's light I glimpsed faces I had known, soldiers I'd once laughed with or ridden by. Once I thought I saw Nauk's face, scarred with Summer fire, but it was too far to be sure.

I made certain never to look too closely at any goblin's face.

"Usually I meet the other one first," I said, following her into the deeper city.

"Evil has always come easier to your hand," my twin curtly replied.

"But not tonight?" I asked.

"It was not it that bought you entry," she said.

Her tone made it clear the conversation was over and she ignored my other attempts to talk. I followed her in silence through the tomb of a maze, recognizing where we were headed: the heart of the city, where there had once been a reservoir of water. It'd been broken during the battle, the plateau split by sorcery and the wrath of the Firstborn. We found the other one there, sitting on a broken pillar by the edge of the drop as she ran a whetting stone along the edge of her blade. The clouds parted as we padded across the dust-covered stone, moonlight peeking through and wreathing her silhouette.

The other twin still had that pink scar across her nose, her long hair kept in a braid reaching down to her coat of mail. Regular's armour. She had a mangled look about her, worn down from war, but for once I was more worn than her. She wore a blood-specked tabard over the mail and a knife at her hip that I recognized even sheathed.

I would not soon forget the knife I'd used to kill my father.

"Ah, Cat," the Evil twin grinned. "Welcome back, my girl."

"'evening," I drawled. "You look in a fine mood."

The Good twin stepped to the side, silent and glaring.

"Shit, why wouldn't I be?" the scarred twin laughed. "It's been a long few years, Catherine, but look at us now."

She waved around the sword, enthused.

"We're basically Queen Bitch of Calernia," the Evil twin said. "Sure, it took a damned lot of killing to get there but that's why we've got a Hell of a throne to lounge on."

Ugh, a pun. There was a reason I'd killed her half the times we'd met. She leaned forward.

"And just between you and me, my girl?" she said. "It makes our legs look good."

"I don't do a lot of lounging these days," I noted. "It's actually pretty painful on the leg."

She rolled her eyes at me.

"Yeah, that's the one part I've some issues with," she said. "You need to cut that out. Fix your leg, put on your big girl pants and properly take this continent in hand."

"Should we now," I flatly said.

"You know we could," the Evil twin grinned. "It wouldn't even be that hard. A few clever choices while we pull down Keter on Neshamah's head and there'll be no one left who could stop us. Besides, we both know they're all going to be so pathetically grateful once we pull them out of the fire again."

"So the bargain I just made," I said, "I ought to discard it."

She smiled at me.

"Do you why I sit here?" she asked.

I shrugged.

"The view?" I guessed.

"That's one word for it," she said. "Come closer."

I limped forward, the lantern's light burning behind me and the moon above, until I stood at the edge of the drop. The plateau had been shattered, I knew, but down there I saw not a single loose stone. There might be some at the bottom, but how could I tell when a kingdom's worth of mangled corpses had been piled over it? I'd seen a lot of death, since I became the Squire and in the years since, but that sight still gave me pause. How many thousands were down there?

"Who are they?" I quietly asked.

"The city's the people who got us here," the twin said. "Those, they're the people we've killed. With wars, with choices, because it would have cost too much to save them."

My fingers clenched. They should have drowned us at birth, the other spirit had said.

"And that's the view you chose?"

"It's what we are, Cat," the spirit smiled. "The girl who did that. I just want you to stop fucking around and own it."

I looked down at the dead, unblinking.

"You never learned to lose," I finally said. "That's your mistake."

The spirit eyed me, unimpressed.

"Why would I want to?"

"Because when you look at these you see victories," I said. "It's the only way you know how to live: going from one fight to another, hoping that one more battle will fix it all."

I shook my head.

"It's prayer," I said. "Below's favourite kind. All in every time, until inevitably you lose it all."

"We haven't lost yet," the twin said. "I'll take those odds."

"They'll take you," I replied. "It's a rigged game. It's how they've always gotten us."

I looked back at the other spirit, who stood watching us with her lantern in hand. I stepped away from the edge.

"The first time I met you two," I said, "I killed you both."

"Good times," Evil twin grinned.

"The second time," I continued, "I left you behind."

"And the demon broke you," the other spirit replied.

Mistakes, I thought. Both times it'd been mistakes. And I'd never seen them with the Beast.

"It's the end of the road, you know," I quietly said. "There won't be another one after this."

Neither of them answered. Their gazes were on me.

"It's the third time," I said. "Let's make it count."

I breathed out, looking up at the moon through the parted clouds, and let myself loosen. Stopped trying to trick my way out of this, to win it, to use it as a tool. It was a journey, nothing more and nothing less. A hand gripped my right shoulder.

"Do better," she whispered into my ear. "Remember the girl who wanted to save her home. She was always the best of you."

A hand gripped my left shoulder.

"Don't flinch," she whispered into my ear. "Remember the girl who wanted to be the storm. She's the one who got you here."

We stood the three of us under the moon, in the heart of broken Hainaut, as below us the corpses began moved. Not as a horde but as one, a behemoth of a creature rising from the cradle of death made of a hundred thousand corpses. It stood tall and terrible, blotting out the sky, watching me through a sea of dead faces.

"Hello, old friend," I softly greeted the Beast.

It opened a gaping maw, baring fangs made of broken swords and spears and banners. It was a beast, I thought, fit to swallow the world whole. West and East, what did it matter? It would devour it all.

"I once told you I wasn't afraid of you," I smiled. "But it was a lie. Did you know?"

It laughed, the sound a thing of horror.

"Let me tell you again, then," I said. "I'm not afraid of you."

The behemoth of corpses climbed out of the pit, standing over me. An entire world of death enveloped me on all sides. I cocked my head to the side.

"Is it a lie now?" I asked it.

Its massive head lowered and it watched me, suddenly snapping out. I did not flinch.

"You know what we are now," I told it. "Who we are."

I looked up into its eyes.

"The Warden," I claimed, and the world shivered with the truth of it.

The Beast roared in approval. Time to wake up, I thought, and the great maw of death opened wide.

I never felt it close around me.

thehidno

Well EE you did it!

i made a wordpress account just to comment here.

i have been following this story since you the academy arc all the way back in book one when i started my first study. i did not know what kind of ride i got on back then but i do know your story kept me company during good time and bad times. Right now i am working on the last assignment of my history degree in my second study and i just wanted to let you know how much i appreciate all you have done, and how well you have tied everything together.

because this right here is my new favorite moment in the series finally surpassing Cat and Indranis moment in the library.

thank you for everything you have done i am not the most involved member of the community yet i still want to thank you for all your work.

i wish you the best in finishing your work and wish you the best in whatever you want to do next!

Kind Regards,
TheHidno

Chapter 40: Resolutions

"An empire is a barrel with a hole: you must never cease filling it, lest it spill out at your feet."

– Queen Elizabeth Alban of Callow

I'd expected to wake up aching, but it was the opposite: it was like I'd had my best night of sleep in years. Maybe in all my life, I thought as my eyes fluttered open. It was like every ounce of me was sated with rest, a start from a blank state. But, as I found out moving under my covers, there were limits to the magic of that. My bad leg still throbbed like it was going to burst. A look around told me two things: I'd been brought to my rooms in the guest palace, and someone had been keeping watch on my sleep from the other side of the bed.

Seated in a chair wide enough it must have been brought just for him, Hakram met my gaze.

"You look tired," I said, the words escaping my mouth before I could think about it twice.

The tall orc shifted in his seat, the steel of his prosthetic hand brushing loudly against the cushions.

"I am," the Warlord replied. "Long days and short nights. You know how it is."

"Always too few hours in the day," I agreed, then hesitated.

We had been apart for long, but he could still read me better than anyone.

"You've been asleep for three days," Hakram gravelled. "They brought you to Archer in the tower, saying that eating the Book made you fall unconscious."

"It wasn't the Book, I don't think," I muttered. "More the transition itself."

He studied me carefully.

"I can believe that," the Warlord said. "I could feel the pull of your Name from outside the room even when you were unconscious and it is stronger now. More focused."

He wasn't joking, I saw. And the more my gaze lingered the more I saw. Not from my good eye but from the one the Hawk had taken, the hollow socket. I could... It was like the stars I had seen in the void as Warden of the East, but the perception had been refined. His Name was like a translucent fire raging over him, when I focused, and I could make out beating hearts. Only one had solidified. He has only one aspect, I thought. And it went further than that. The more I watched the silhouette, the secret fire, the more I saw that it was connected. Chords spun out, stories I felt I might be able to follow by running my finger along the connection.

I should be able to see more, some bone-deep instinct told me, but I was being hobbled. The Warlord was a villain, and half of my eye was still in my enemy's hands.

"I became the Warden," I said.

His brow creased in surprise.

"Not of something," Hakram slowly said. "Just Warden."

"I suppose there's no need to specify," I replied, "if I'm Warden of everything."

The air shivered in the room. He felt it too. And yet I was still a villain, I thought. Night still came when I called. Transitioning had not changed who or what I was, only amplified it. It would be the same after me: a hero could hold this Name as well. The Role of standing above Named, at the top of the Accords, it did not belong to either Above or Below. It would be what we made of it, because it was us who'd made the Liesse Accords. For good or ill, it was in our hands.

Hakram was still watching me, face unreadable.

"All of the Woe have gone through two Names," he said, "save you. It took you three to settle."

I hummed, pensive. That was one way to see it.

"There's always a cost," I said.

I'd given up much to come into this Name, at least in the way that I had. Would I have been a simpler sort of villain, if I'd taken the Book by force instead of taking it with the blessing of the two claimants to the West? My gut said yes. Still a Warden, maybe, but more a Warden of the East bloated for having devoured the other side's strength than the more... balanced mantle I now wore.

Hakram suddenly grimaced, looking away.

"I was not fair, when we spoke in the thicket," he said.

I frowned.

"What's bringing this on?"

"Until I found Archer, I did not know whether you were dead or alive," Hakram said. "I trusted, Catherine, but I could not be sure. And so I thought of our last conversation again, that it might be the last words we ever spoke."

"Lancing a wound is never pretty," I said.

"Aye," Hakram said, "but while it was not only you I was angry with, you still received both helpings of blame."

I made to speak, not sure what I should, but he raised a hand to ask me to let him speak. My teeth clicked shut. Fine.

"Did I ever tell you," he asked, "what the Tyrant saw when he used his perception aspect on me?"

I shook my head. I'd always assumed that Hakram was even keeled enough Kairos had simply seen nothing to use against him.

"Nothing," Hakram quietly said.

My breath caught. That was, well... I took a moment to digest that. What it meant, that he'd had so little in his life except for me and the Woe.

"I used to think it was a virtue," the Warlord said. "That I could step away and see clearly because of it. But that was fear, looking back. It was easier to want the things you did, dream your dreams, than have my own. And maybe if things had gone differently, I would have spent a life satisfied with that."

I breathed in sharply. I could see where this was going.

"But then you saw Scribe," I said.

"I saw too much of myself in her," Hakram said. "And did not like what I saw."

I sighed.

"And what does that mean, Hakram?" I pushed back. "I get it – you thought I might one day do to you what my father did to her. Cut her adrift after a lifetime. But why are you telling me this?"

We'd already tread those grounds, revisiting them would do no good.

"I stand behind much of what I said that day," he said, "but you did not deserve all the anger you received. For that I owe apology."

He paused, reluctant.

"And you were right about one thing."

His jaw clenched.

"I could have come to you with it," Hakram gravelled. "I did not. I do not regret becoming the Warlord, Catherine, but I dislike the thought that part of what drove me was fear – that deep down I thought it easier to return bearing the Name than to speak to you as the Adjutant."

I studied his face for a long time, the craggy green leather of it, and found only calm there. Slowly, I gave a nod. But I did not speak after, because the conversation was not over and it was not for me to finish it. We'd parted on my words, last time. If there was to be an ending it would be of his own ushering, whatever it might be. The silence lengthened.

"You told me it was all in my hands, last time," Hakram finally said.

"And meant it."

He did not hurry to words, which I was not sure whether to curse or appreciate. If it was to be the knife, then let him be quick with it. I'd need the time to lick my wounds.

"I never thought you would ever turn a knife on me," the tall orc admitted. "Leave me behind, maybe, but never steel."

His clenched his fingers of bone into a fist.

"I saw it in your eyes that night," Hakram said. "But I don't think I believed it until you spoke the words out loud."

Part of me felt the urge to apologize, to bury the hatchet at any cost, but I took it by the neck and squeezed. I was who I was. Maybe I still had some change left in me, but not so much as that: in the end, if the stakes were high enough I had run out of lines I wasn't willing to cross to win. Suddenly, he snorted.

"It is a crooked thing," he said, "but in a way it reassures me. You didn't just see the Adjutant that night, you saw me."

"I saw you," I evenly replied, "and raised a knife."

He shook his head.

"I came as the Warlord," Hakram said, "and stood against you. I cannot leave your shadow and in the same breath demand its protection."

I studied him quietly.

"And now?"

"I don't know," he quietly laughed. "It is new ground for me as well."

I bit my lip.

"It can't be the way it was before," I said.

"I don't want it to be," Hakram honestly said. "Do you?"

Yes, part of me whispered. But could I really ask that when I now knew what'd it cost him?

"No," I replied, and found I largely meant it. "But now I'm at a loss. I've never-Lost someone I love to anything but the grave, I thought. I don't even understand how I got your friendship the first time, how could I possibly know what to do now?

"- I've never," I weakly finished.

He laughed at me, the prick.

"Eloquent," he teased, smiling at my rude gesture.

The mirth passed, though never quite entirely left.

"We start from the beginning," Hakram said, leaning forward and offering his arm.

When we'd first met in the valley all those years ago, I remembered, I'd been the one to offer. Lips quirking, I clasped the arm in a legionary's salute. It was steel I felt under my fingers now, and his own found the cloth that these days I wore more often than mail, but it was better this way. We weren't the same kids we'd been in Spite Valley, playing war games in the Tower's shadow. It wasn't the same two people meeting. We parted after a moment and he drew back, rising to his feet.

"There may not be much time, in the coming days," he said.

To meet, he meant. To try to forge the scraps of what we used to be into something else.

"So we'll have to make it," I firmly replied.

He nodded, hesitation coming to his face.

"In Keter," Hakram said, "there will come a time beyond armies. When Named will venture ahead."

I nodded. We both knew the Dead King wouldn't die to anything as mundane as armies.

"When that time comes," he quietly said, "I would like to fight with the Woe."

My heart clenched. To that, at least, I had an answer.

"If the Woe are fighting," I simply replied, "where else would you be?"

I saw a weight leave his shoulders, and some part of me wanted to weep. When had it come to this? Lancing a wound is never pretty, I reminded myself. But it was necessary, if the limb was to heal instead of fester. Hakram stiffly nodded at me, and a heartbeat later he was gone. Out the door and into the palace, leaving behind him an absence that felt almost physical. I leaned back into my pillows. Soon enough someone else would enter the room and Creation would come calling, responsibilities dragging me back, but for now I just closed my eyes and listened to the sound of my own breathing. It was a faint thing, barely more than a wisp, but I remembered what hope felt like.

And for the first time in months, I held hope that the pieces of who we'd been might not stop the people we'd become from finding a way to fit together.

—

Proceran palaces grew salons like caves grew mushroom, but one of the upsides of that cultural sickness was that you could send for a drink anywhere. I was not surprised in the slightest that Cordelia's personal steward not only knew that I drank an herbal concoction for pain but the exact mix as well. Aisha ought to be flattered that her old family recipe had become subject to foreign espionage, I figured, and it really was quite convenient. I finished the mug – served at the perfect temperature to drink, because of course it was – and set it down on a pretty little glass table, trying to tell the Sword of Judgment through my eyes that his hovering was getting on my nerves.

"Another day of rest might be forgiven, given the circumstances," Hanno said.

Evidently, I needed to work on my glares.

"Time's the one thing we can't spare," I replied. "Besides, I'm fine."

I was not, in fact, fine. I was still a little slow on my feet and... unsteady. Sometimes it felt like I didn't fit in my own skin anymore, that I was moving with limbs there weren't my body's. From the steady look the dark-skinned man fixed me with, he was well aware of the lie and debating whether or not he should call me out on it. Fortunately, I had a secret weapon.

"I will not venture an opinion as to Her Excellency's health," Cordelia Hasenbach mildly said, "but she does seem fit for light duties such as discussion."

That Excellency business was going to get old fast, I could already feel it. And it was probably half the reason she was sticking so closely to the title, because underneath all that courtesy Cordelia did have a streak of bitingly polite pettiness.

"See," I smiled, "we're just talking. And we've got a lot of grounds to cover, so let's be about it."

Hanno dared to roll his eyes at me as he took a seat, the absolute ass, and I was not sure whether to be pleased or insulted. It'd taken only moments in the same room to realize that in the aftermath of our little tiff in Arcadia he'd considerably warmed to me. Being willing to take a step back and meet them halfway had not quite restored our relationship to the easy friendship of the early days, but it was a damn sight better than the cool distance that'd followed the Arsenal. I'd had a few looks at him through my dead eye, the one that saw much, and found him covered in burning pale flames. He did not quite have a Name, but it was not far.

I tried to have a look ahead, see what he was moving towards, but it was too tricky when I had to maintain a conversation at the same time.

"There are urgent matters," Cordelia agreed. "Negotiations with the Kingdom Under must be carried out to a finish before we march on Keter, which I consider the priority of the Grand Alliance's foreign diplomacy, but there are internal matters to settle."

She, on the other hand, did not have so much as a fleck of power gathering around her. Cordelia Hasenbach had fallen on the side of being true to the woman she had been on the floor of the Chamber of Assembly: mortal to the bitter end.

"The compromise between the Blood and the Bestowed," I said.

"To begin," Cordelia agreed. "Though on grounds more esoteric, I believe there is question in need of an answer as well."

She slid a look at Hanno when she said 'esoteric', getting a nod out of him.

"The Severance needs a wielder," he plainly said. "The decision must be made before we set out north."

I hummed, leaning back into the plushy seat.

"All of that starts second place," I finally said. "Before anything else, we need to properly enforce the arrangement we made in Arcadia."

Cordelia's eyes narrowed slightly.

"Settling the representatives under the Truce and Terms," she said. "You mean to step down immediately."

"From that position," I agreed. "I'll still be Queen of Callow until we finish things in Keter, at least in principle. In practice I'll begin passing authority to Vivienne as of today."

I didn't even foresee friction there for the rest of the war. Viv wasn't much of a general and knew it, while I'd made a career off of handing off the ruling parts to someone else why I went about the business of being a warlord. It was only fitting that my last war would end my reign with it.

"I am glad," Hanno said. "Princess Vivienne is respected, but your legions would not fight for another queen as they do for you."

I waved that away, though I was a little flattered. It was true, I knew that regardless of him, but hearing it from someone like Hanno added a certain something.

"We've been through a lot of mud together," I said. "But back to the selection: the first thing to settle is whether or not you'll be standing to represent the heroes."

If he did not it would be a race, I figured, but as I saw it there was little chance of anyone else filling the shoes if he wanted to keep them on.

"That is my wish," Hanno said. "Until the fall of Keter I would keep the office, setting it aside when I swear myself to enforce the Accords."

I had no trouble with that, to be honest. I would have accepted it even before our relations thawed, so my approval was only growing. There was one potential source of objections, though, sitting pretty in her seat as she delicately sipped at lemon water. Cordelia noticed my inquisitive glance, which I hadn't tried to make subtle in the slightest.

"It is not my place to argue for or against," the First Prince evenly said. "When we struck a bargain, Your Excellency, I accepted your authority over certain matters. I will not go back on my word."

I cocked an eyebrow.

"And if were to ask for your opinion?" I pressed.

She did not look pleased, but neither did she fight me.

"It is the natural choice," Cordelia admitted. "And it will ease the tradition from the Truce and Terms into the Liesse Accords."

She still didn't like him much, I thought. The esteem they'd once had for each other had been eroded down by years of speaking past each other and it would just as many years for it to be restored. If it ever was. But she was willing to work with him and not the kind of woman to blind herself to someone's virtues because of a personal animosity.

"I'll look forward to you taking your seat again, then," I said, nodding at Hanno.

Then I sighed.

"The selection on my side of the fence is going to be a little more complicated, unfortunately," I admitted.

Of the Woe, both Archer and Hierophant had the strength to be able to claim the seat as well as strong ties to me that'd help them keep it. The trouble was that neither of them would want to get anywhere near that seat given a choice and this wasn't the kind of position to take half-heartedly. Not even just until the end of the war. Keter was going to be vice tightening around Named and we'd need steady hands at the helm if we were going to keep all these very dangerous people from cracking under the pressure.

"You have been grooming the Barrow Sword as a captain for almost two years now," Hanno noted. "Do you not think him fit?"

"There's going to be a brawl," I frankly said. "And I'm not sure he can take the Red Knight, who will absolutely throw her hat into the ring."

And she was strong enough she'd be able to chew through most Named in a fight, but she'd be a fucking disaster as a representative. For one, at least nine tenths of everyone who ever met her couldn't stand her. If she were just awful as a person it'd be one thing, but from the reports I'd read she was unfit to command even a band of five. Hanno grimaced.

"Even Christophe is wary of her," he said. "And he is not a man to scare easily."

It was her aspects that made her a threat. By simple ability she was a very skilled fighter but hardly impossible to handle. When you threw in Devour, though, she became a headache to handle. If there was anything that aspect couldn't take a bite out of, we'd yet to encounter it.

"I believe you once sent the Archer to discipline her, after a brawl with other villains," Cordelia noted.

"I'd bet on Indrani over her," I agreed. "But Indrani won't want anything to do with those responsibilities."

She'd made it very clear to me that command of a roving warband was the most she was interested in taking up.

"You misunderstand me," the First Prince said. "I mean to point out that you, the appointed representative for Below, saw it fit to use her as your champion."

Ah, I thought. Clever. Archer wouldn't want the seat, but she would absolutely be willing to fight as Ishaq's champion should he be challenged – and I'd set precedents for that over my own tenure to no objection from my charges. Trust Cordelia Hasenbach to find the loophole no matter the game.

"That might work," I acknowledged. "I'll need to speak with the both of them first."

Hanno politely cleared his throat.

"Have you considered," he asked, "the possibility of the Warlord laying his own claim?"

"He won't," I said, certain. "He's got too much on his plate already, herding the Clans and hammering out the aftermath of the peace in Praes."

I'd had to juggle the duties of a queen and a representative before and I'd found the amount of work crushing even with the likes of Hakram and Scribe supporting me. And that was ruling Callow, leading professional armies. The Clans would need much more personal a touch than my people ever had.

"But if he does?" Hanno pressed.

"Then I won't stand against or for it," I replied.

He'd left me to stand on his own two feet. I would not disrespect that by propping him up should he reach for more. That settled the talk of selection, at least for a moment, so I let Cordelia gently guide the conversation back to other matters.

"The talks with the Blood can be ended promptly," she said, "and it would set a good tone to act swiftly. For a Warden to settle what was before a matter of debate will begin to prove the worth of the office."

Going unsaid was that a lot of heroes would find it hard to swallow no matter what the Sword of Judgment said, even when they felt the pull of my Name against them. Being decisive from the start would do a lot to convince people it was worth ceding authority to me. It occurred to me, after a moment, that I'd never told either of them what my Name now was. And yet the both of them had been referring to it freely since we met. I almost shivered.

Sometimes fate's hand was less discreet than others.

"You're not going to like what I have to say," I bluntly told her. "The entire point of having a Warden is to have someone who can settle disputes involving Named. Sometimes that will mean having power over signatory nations even if you don't like it. A very narrow sort of power, relating only to Named, but it'll still be there."

She visibly did not like what I had to say.

"You have already heard my arguments," the First Prince said. "I believe it a poor precedent to set that a decision of Levant's ruling council might be overturned by Named on account of Named."

She paused, mastering herself.

"Yet that is not my decision to make," Cordelia conceded. "That is the bargain I struck with you. And the existence of a single office instead of rival ones does put to rest certain fears of partisanship I had previously held."

I considered her for a moment, honestly a little doubtful she'd given in so easily. Maybe I shouldn't have been, I eventually thought. She'd been the First Prince, not a queen, and that wasn't the same thing. Especially not the kind of queen that I'd been, inheriting a culled nobility and direct authority over most of the largest cities in Callow as well as the only standing army. I had a lot more power than most Fairfaxes ever did. Cordelia Hasenbach, though, had been wrestling with the Highest Assembly all her reign. She'd had to give ground before, I thought, suffer defeats on matters she very much cared about.

She would exercise the power she could to the letter of the law and no further, taking the defeats when they came and living to fight the battle another day. That was her way.

"Good," I muttered, flicking a glance at Hanno. "And you?"

"I have no more objections now than I did before," the dark-skinned hero shrugged.

Fair enough.

"Then it's settled," I said. "I'll sit down with the Blood tonight and get the terms put to ink."

With that out of the way, Hanno himself brought up the next decision in need of being made.

"Have you given thought to the Severance?" he asked.

I clenched my fingers, unclenched them. Give and take, that was what'd brought us here. I had not come out ahead by listening to the tyrant's whisper in the back of my head.

"Only a hero can wield it," I said, "so that takes it out of my hand. Should you be chosen as representative for Above again, I'll leave the decision in your hands."

My gut said either him or the Mirror Knight, but it was hard to be sure. Hanno watched me with those calm, patient eyes.

"You will want the final word," he stated.

I did want that. Very much. My instincts demanded it, a precaution in case the heroes fucked up again and some unfit idiot ended up wielding the single most important artefact of this war. But it couldn't be that way.

"This only works if I trust your judgement," I made myself say. "So I'll trust your judgement, Hanno."

The translucent flames around him I could see, if I concentrated hard enough, only had a single solid heart within them – and it tasted of memory. Recall, had to be. He'd lost the aspect he had once called on every time he flipped that coin of his, likely forever. It was Hanno of Arwad's judgement I was betting on, not the Tribunal's, and trust didn't mean anything if it was offered on the cheap. He did not hide his surprise, or the strange emotion that flickered through his eyes after.

"Thank you," he finally said. "I will keep you informed."

I nodded, uncomfortable, and was dimly grateful when Cordelia nudged the conversation towards what she most cared about. Hanno went along just as easily, which was only natural considering he'd also put quite a bit of his back into dealing with the dwarves.

"A united front when meeting them again would improve our position," Cordelia said. "The three of us, certainly, and perhaps the representative for Below as well."

"Sure," I said, "but that's posturing, not substance. We need something to come at them with. I don't suppose you'd care to share what it is you've been digging up in the Salian archives all this time?"

"Ah," the First Prince faintly smiled, "then it was you."

I cocked an eyebrow, admitting nothing.

"Or Princess Vivienne perhaps," Cordelia said. "Thieves of her skill are passingly rare."

"She's a princess now, you know," I chided. "She doesn't steal anymore."

I let a beat pass.

"When a princess steals from foreigners, it's called diplomacy."

The only born royal out of the three of us was less than amused, but I caught Hanno's lips twitching. Yeah, of course that one would agree. I doubted the fucker had paid taxes to anyone since age sixteen, ascetic vagrant that he was.

"So?" I pressed.

"It occurred to me after our talks with the Herald of the Deep that we were missing the forest for the trees," Cordelia said. "We thought of the cities and why he wanted them, but did not consider how they would be held."

"Strength, presumably," I said. "Assuming they get to cram their terms down our throats."

"Strength would involve dwarven arms," the First Prince pointed out.

Well, yes. It wasn't like they were lacking in either manpower or armaments. They'd just seeded colonies across the northern third of Calernia while simultaneously providing arms for large armies across several fronts.

"I don't see your point," I admitted.

"It would mean dwarves on the surface," Hanno said. "Thousands for every city, come to live under the sun permanently."

I blinked. Shit, they were right. I was so used to thinking in terms of the Kingdom Under just being another empire to deal with that I'd forgotten this demand was breaking a long-term policy of isolation from the surface. The most dwarves Calernians usually saw were mercenaries hired through Mercantis.

"That's a lot of people away from their usual centres of power," I muttered. "At a time where their population's being spread out up north."

Was there even a precedent for dwarves ever sharing a city with someone? I couldn't recall one offhand.

"I imagine the Kingdom Under sees it as installing an armed ruling caste," Cordelia said. "They chose cities instead of empty land for a reason. But in practice, the Herald is achieving something else entirely."

"Three city-states sitting atop massively profitable trade routes to the underground," I finished, "and little to no real oversight. Outrageously wealthy pocket kingdoms for him to rule over."

The First Prince nodded.

"I attempted to discern the worth of the trade involved and acquire an idea of the Kingdom Under's wealth," she said. "While you were asleep, I finished the work as much as it will ever be."

I cocked my head to the side.

"And?"

"For at least the next two centuries, the cities would represent more wealth than the entire Fourteenth and Fifteenth Expansion put together," Cordelia said, "while involving less of a tenth of the people involved in these."

So small, rich kingdoms living under the protection of the prominent military power of Calernia.

"Sounds like a golden retirement to me," I frankly said. "With just enough challenges to tackle he won't ever get bored."

"My thoughts exactly," the First Prince coldly smiled.

"You're wrong."

I'd almost forgotten Hanno was there. I turned an eye to him, skeptical.

"There's speculation," I conceded, "but the foundations are solid."

"You are also taking the most uncharitable interpretation as fact," he pointed out. "Not unreasonably, given the Herald's behaviour, but it blinds you to a truth."

"And what would that be?" Cordelia asked, tone cutting.

"I do not know what the Role of a Herald of the Deeps is," Hanno said, "but if he was seeking to leave that life behind his Name would be weakening."

He met my gaze.

"Having been in the same room as him, did you sense such a thing?"

I chewed my lip.

"No," I admitted. "And if it'd been there, I would have sensed it."

My sense of Names had become unusually keen after I became Warden of the East. The dwarven Name had felt odd to my senses, but in no way broken or fading. Which meant Hanno was right.

"So he's trying to fulfill his Role still," I noted. "That's interesting. How would pocket kingdoms help the Kingdom Under?"

"A queen's perspective," Hanno admonished.

I narrowed my eye, mentally taking a step back and looking at it another way.

"He's a hero, so he's trying to help part of the kingdom," I corrected. "The downtrodden. Not the whole realm, and certainly not in a ruling sense. The gains their empire make through this are just how he sells it back home. The city-states are what he's actually after, not the profits."

"They would earn him the support of the expansionist faction," Cordelia said. "Which he had suspected to be his backers within the Kingdom Under."

Fuck, I thought, that actually made a great deal of sense. Even if the expansionist were assholes, the ones who wanted to make gains at the expense of the people of the surface, the Herald would have nowhere else to go. I could see the pattern now: two leading philosophies underground, one of isolation and one of expansion. Even if there was a dusting of evil or even Evil in the expansionists, the Herald would make common cause with them. He had to, because he wanted to reform his people and the only other game in town saw dwarven society as a closed circle.

"It fits with where I first met him," I admitted. "Leading the Fourteenth Expansion, on the very outskirts of dwarven territory. He's trying to get out from under the thumb of people in power by going into the wilds."

The First Prince considered that, then slowly nodded.

"Form the perspective of attempting to reform custom, the city-states described would be an ideal garden," Cordelia said. "Small populations of like-minded dwarves, large wealth based on trade instead of labour and more numerous foreign peoples around them to erode the old ways. It is a well-crafted plan."

One that the Herald had rushed the encirclement of the Dead King to sell to his people, immediately knocking at our door afterwards. The details really did fit, Crows. I could sympathize with the intention if it was really this, even admire it a bit, but none of it changed that all those pretty things would literally be built on our backs. That the Herald was willing to let thousands and thousands die, gamble with the fate of Calernia and blackmail desperate nations to get his reforms. That was... Fuck me, I thought. Yeah, not exactly an unfamiliar situation. Just not the way I was used to it.

So this was what it felt like, facing me across a table.

"So we know what he's after," I said. "Now we're in a position to fight back."

"It has been brought to my attention that a dwarven gate was recently unearthed," Cordelia said, the look she flicked Hanno's way rather cool. "We can make use of it to reach out to the isolationists and out his plot."

"Must we?"

I frowned at Hanno. He trusted heroes more than I thought wise, even now, but he wasn't a fool. He wouldn't argue for the cession of three cities – one of which was part of the League, not even the Grand Alliance! – to the Herald because he was trying to accomplish something Good through dubious means. I suspected that, if anything, ye ol' Sword of Judgment would think worse of the Herald's methods than we did. Unlike Cordelia and I, he expected better of heroes.

"What the Herald seeks it not evil or harmful to the rest of Calernia," Hanno elaborated. "It is his approach that is objectionable. If he can get his way without it being at our expense, would it not be better to attempt that bargain?"

"Is there a way for him to get his way save at our expense?" Cordelia skeptically replied.

"If it is a city and the riches of a land the Herald seeks," Hanno said, "there is one we can offer."

It took me a moment to realize what he was getting at.

"Keter," I disbelievably said. "You mean the Crown of the Dead."

"It is a great city, surrounded by lands that were once rich," he said. "And unlike the cities demanded it will stand empty once the war ends."

"Keter is part of the land that was promised to the Firstborn for their participation in this war," I said. "How many homes are the dwarves going to steal from them?"

"Would the drow truly want the city?" he honestly asked. "I was given to understand they made their own in the Duskwood."

"That's twice now powers have tried to go back on that bargain," I coldly warned. "Alliances have been broken over less."

He shook his head.

"I do not mean for a treaty to be breached," Hanno said. "Let them trade the claim, by all means. There must something in the Herald's hands worth more than a claim over a city they might never inhabit."

I hummed. That was, well, more acceptable. Given the losses the Firstborn had taken in the war with Keter, I honestly wasn't sure they could colonize all of the lands that were now the Kingdom of the Dead. They might genuinely be amenable to a trade, if the dwarves offered up something worth the exchange. The problem with that, though, was...

"Nearly all of what makes the demanded cities attractive to both the Herald and the expansionists is absent in Keter," Cordelia said. "It is far from trade and there are no humans within that might be used for labour. They will not accept that bargain."

Yeah, that.

"His backers would not," Hanno said, "but the Herald himself might. We are trying to work past him when we should be working with him."

We were going around the bastard because he was willing let a third of Procer be blighted to get his way, not because we just felt like being poor sports, but I forced myself to consider his words anyway. Hanno, for all his flaws, understood heroes better than I did – the way they thought, the way they moved. I closed my eye and opened the other. Not looking at Hanno himself but beyond, fingers running down the strings of story. Was he right, was there a path?

Was there a lever to move the Herald of the Deeps?

I felt myself drift, following the chords until I found something at the other end. A force, a will, a Name. An entity that I could only dimly make out, this far from it, but I could see something. Three hearts, all solid, but there was something... deeper. A glimpse at the strings that would move him, the way they tasted. Love, I saw. The Herald was driven by love. Made greater, projected to many, but at its source intensely personal. And personal was a creature that could be moved by more than just stick and carrot. I breathed out deeply, closing one eye and opening another.

Both of them were staring at me.

"Catherine?" Hanno cautiously said.

"I was having a look at our friend," I replied, tone steady. "I saw enough to think your method has merit."

Cordelia looked rather skeptical.

"He's doing this out of love," I told her. "That much I'm certain of. Romantic and personal, everything else grows from there."

"Love," the First Prince of Procer said, "is not a sound political strategy."

Hanno looked about to disagree and I wanted no part of that debate so I cut in.

"I agree," I said. "But we lose nothing by attempting to move him first. Prepare the appeal to the opposition in the Kingdom Under, and if the talks with the Herald fail we can proceed with that plan immediately."

"It would be best to negotiate entirely in good faith," Hanno protested.

"So far he hasn't," I pointed out. "I see no need to reward that with trust he has done nothing to earn."

He did not look pleased and neither did the First Prince, but neither of them stormed out of the room. That was something.

"Another compromise," Cordelia said. "You seem to have acquired a taste for those."

"If I have on redeeming quality, Your Highness, it's that I never hesitate to steal the methods other people beat me through," I smiled.

I did not get a laugh, which was only sensible since I'd not truly been joking. With an agreement in principle, we hammered out a few more of the details and split off to see to our parts. It would all have to wait until the representatives were chosen, anyhow, so there was still time.

Too little of it, but wasn't that always the way?

—

I had the talks with the Blood settled by nightfall and a treaty after dinner. By tomorrow the rest of the Grand Alliance would be informed, as even though it was an internal matter of Levant it involved the Liesse Accords. That part, as the First Prince had predicted, benefitted from decisive action. It was the other talks of the two following days that had me itching. The most frustrating part about the representatives being chosen was that I couldn't be directly involved. As the Warden I stood apart, so I would not even have a seat in the council of villains past explaining why it was now needed.

All I could do was stack the deck behind closed doors and hope.

Hanno was chosen on the morning of second day, by a wide margin. It took until Midnight Bell for the villains to finish and the Pilfering Dicer almost died – accused by the Red Knight of having interfered in her duel with Archer. But we got our way, in the end. The Barrow Sword was chosen as the representative, narrowly, after Indrani managed an equally narrow draw against the Red Knight. His position was still weak, but Ishaq was no fool: he'd move to consolidate, aware he had my blessing to take everything in hand.

I doubted Below's lot would be as firmly in hand as when my reputation had been making people think twice, but it would serve. Gods, it would have to. Soon the League and the second wave of Praesi troops would be arriving, and when they did the march north would begin shortly after. There were only a few matters left to settle.

—

Hierophant had told me he needed five days to prove whether the Rogue Sorcerer's theory had been right, and he was punctual to a fault: at noon on the fifth day, I sat before a mirror through which we faced each other.

"Roland was correct," Masego told me. "We were looking for a source of power that might shatter the Intercessor's grip on stories, and we have found one."

I was too early to be relieved, I warned myself.

"So what is it, exactly?" I asked.

"Night," Hierophant replied.

I blinked. Was it really going to be that easy?

"More precisely, Night as it was first granted to Sve Noc by the Gods Below," Hierophant specified.

Ah, and there was the pinch.

"I shouldn't need to tell you that pretty much all Night has passed from some Firstborn body at some point," I pointed out.

The drow had been very ardent proponents for centuries of murdering each other for that power.

"Some, yes, but not all," Masego said. "The Sisters have administered the resource since the beginning, Catherine. They still hold the power they used to create their shared godhead, which was bestowed directly by Below."

"So the Crows could do it," I said.

"They could be used to channel Night against the Intercessor, whom you've informed me had a hand in granting it to them in the first place," Hierophant corrected. "They could not do it themselves, by my estimation. At the very least you – or someone of equivalent strength in Night – and myself would need to guide the ritual."

I grimaced.

"You want me to head north just as the armies begin to march on Keter," I said. "That's not a small ask, Masego."

"Nor is breaking the hold of the goddess of stories on her domain," Hierophant bluntly replied. "You asked me for a solution and you have it. There is nothing more I can do."

I clenched my fingers, then unclenched them.

"Can we really spare you?" I asked. "The crown of Autumn–"

"Has been carved into what we sought," Masego interrupted. "It will be the cursed gift to the Dead King that we planned. And while I would prefer to be there when it is used, should the necessity strike my presence is not required. Roland and the Blessed Artificer would both be capable of using it without me."

And both would be with the armies. I rubbed the bridge of my nose. I didn't like it, to be honest, and it went against the grain for me to leave all the preparations behind. But it couldn't be denied that if we didn't get back Evil's stories, the Dead King would snap us over his knee. Much as I'd like to pretend otherwise, I didn't really have a choice.

"Well then, pack up and join me in Salia," I said. "Look like we're headed to Serolen."

I had a week until he was there, so I had better spend it well: after that, there would be no going back.

elanevensong

Yay! Thanks for the chapter

ruduen

Go boost!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Many of the big issues are taken care of, and while the dwarves are still an affair that are incomplete, it looks like the list of objectives for the final missions has been laid out.

And so we enter the endgame.

It's amazing to think about how long the story has been going. Thanks for all of the times so far, and I'm excited to see just how things will resolve. After all, we have the goals laid out... But this has never been a story where you'll meet those goals without question, or without a fight.

Sir Nil

Ah yes, let's start dividing up Keter before we've won, counting your eggs before the basket has never backfired.

Sinead

I mean, the Dwarves were doing just that with the living realms as well.

Establishing the parameters of what the Grand Alliance can actually afford (without internal politics breaking it all down) is a solid plan.

And this isn't dividing up land that other people are living on either.

Salt

Yep. Not to mention that trying to win the battle without having any idea of what comes after is one of the first mistakes that Catherine learned not to make.

All the way as far back as the Lone Swordsman and the bands that came after he before the crusade, one of the big glaring problems she realized most Stupid Good Heroes had, was assuming that cutting the head off the big bad somehow solves every problem. Absolutely nothing in their heads regarding how to fill in the power vacuum, how to establish proper boundaries of rule and infrastructure, and how to make sure said power vacuum doesn't suck in former allies into another conflict.

Half the point is to figure out what to do after ahead of time, because by the time the "after" rolls around, it's already too late to start figuring it out.

jamesc9

And isn't that a parable for the limits of hard military power in our time?

SpeckofStardust

If keter doesn't fall everyone dies.
Straight up when total war is the table planning for after winning is the only thing you can do, cause if you lose no plan is able to be done anyway.

jamesc9

> If keter doesn't fall everyone dies.

What if that's not true? What if being Warden gives her power over the DK's stories, and she also has the hard power to slide the knife home?

SpeckofStardust

That would be Keter falling yes.
Like if the Dead King falls so does Keter, and if Keter falls so does the Dead King.

MoreDakka

It's more like the dwarf is demanding three city's for the armies that have already been paid for and they are giving him one that the armies would have gotten him for free if he hadn't been a dick

SeventhSolar

There's no point to not dividing up Keter. At this point, it's paying for an entire war front and a good amount of their arms and armor.

caoimhinh

When in Procer, do as the Procerans do

jamesc9

I've liked this, because I think that it contains a large measure of truth, but I reserve the right to decide later whether to dislike the outcome.

DC

In fairness, if they lose then there won't be a problem anyway; much easier to provide living space to the undead.

Levi Kalden

I mean there are only two outcomes, dead king is, well, dead or they are all dead instead and it doesn't matter that they can't enforce those promises. So it doesn't matter at the end

Linnus42

Hakram and Cat make up. We see how this Triumvirate works for now and that it will be eventually a Quintet with a Quartet of Named split 50-50 between Good and Evil. Though one can argue Warden being Neutral means that system can get unbalanced fast unless Hanno's new name is also going to be Neutral but lean good. 3 v 1 Heroes to Villains seems like a super majority.

joewill5234

Cordelia is not a Hero, and apparently is not even close to a Name.

Reader in The Night

On the one hand, I think I do like this resolution better for Cordelia personally, of holding no Name because it's not what she wants. On the other hand, I do think the system would have worked better if her position had a Name, both as part of a Rule of Three and as a ready-made Band of Five to defend the Accords when you added the Representatives. Maybe her successor will get a Name?

Insanenoodlyguy

No, it will be the opposite I suspect. There will always be two who orbit around the warden, one an embodiment of named, one a normal mortal (albiet an exceptional one). A balance entirely different then that of good and evil, fitting for a truly neutral name.

RoflCat

Cordelia is not Named, and this setup is temporary until Keter falls.

Once that's done Hanno will likely start to train his replacement for his eventual 'retirement' into the new Name.

Eventually the 3 of them will forms a balanced voices around the Accords.

Catherine presents the Villains views and the Stories

Hanno the Heroes

Cordelia the view of non-Named mortals.

Catherine will draft/revise the Accords as needed, Hanno will act as the enforcer of its rules and Cordelia help ensure the countries accept it.

jamesc9

> Catherine will draft/revise the Accords as needed

I'm not sure that I see this. The first draft was a mixture of Vivienne's aristocratic education and Hakram's Find. I liked Cordelia as Lawgiver, in someone else's story of the Cardinal / Accords executive. This would mean that the Accords are hard to change unless it's for the benefit of non-Named.

RoflCat

That's the first draft that's been written down, but the core of it has always been inside Catherine, Viv/Hakram helped refined it which is what I expect to be part of Cordelia's job going forward.

Like, if Catherine say she want Named to not be a ruler, Cordelia might counter with Princess being there, or Hanno point out there's Names specifically for ruler position (again, Princess as example)

So Cat then can adjust it to any non-ruler Named can't be a ruler, with an exception clause where the person declared an intent to transition to a ruler Name.

Or to use something else as example.

Cat and Sve Noc made the first interaction.

The final version put into Tenets Under Night is...'touched up' a little more.

Although even that attempt couldn't overcome 'try a foot'

Quwertzuiopp

Warden isn't a neutral Name. I don't fucking get the obsession everyone has with neutral Names, it's worse than with Grey Jedi. The story has repeatedly and relentlessly told us through text and subtext that no such thing actually exists. Every single allegedly "neutral" Name sooner or later just turned out to be a Villain in hiding or a Named that is aloof towards the conflict of philosophy, but still fulfilling the purpose of one side or another. I can't actually think of a single one that didn't turn out to be a villain good at hiding themselves.

In this very chapter, Cat tells us that she is still very much a Villain, that the mantle of Warden could change between Above and Below when switching the wearer, but that who ever wields is doesn't somehow stop being the Hero or Villain they were before.

As far as we know, the only way to be Named is for the Gods to personally hand it to you. That means that there can logically only be a neutral Name if the two sides shake hands and give out a double bestowal to make someone BOTH. You can't be a neutral Name by being neither, it is metaphysically impossible. Who the fuck is supposed to give you a neutral Name? There are only two factions and they play for keeps and play to win.

And mind you, the only known exception was literally created by writing in exceptions into the very laws of nature somewhere around the beginning of the universe by mutual agreement of both sides. One might be forgiven for thinking that the Gods might create a new exception to start the new age just like they started the age of wonders by creating the WB by also bestowing heroic powers onto a villain to also make Cat both at the same time, but the text tells us at very first literary convenience that they didn't and that Warden is just a normal Name with an exceptional Role, with Cat still being fully a Villain by her own admission.

So really, I honestly don't understand how you would even get to 3 v 1 Heroes to Villains. Even if you supposed that Cat was Neutral, Hanno + Hero Rep vs Villain Rep would still come out to 2 v 1. Cordelia is not Named and thus per definition neither metaphysically a Hero or a Villain, and she clearly has the potential to be both or she wouldn't have been offered a Name by both sides back to back. The reality is that Cat isn't neutral, so it evens out to 2 v 2, with Cordelia as the only actually neutral one in the mix, by virtue of not being Named.

Tenthyr

The story quite literally just said the name is neutral. It can belong to a hero or Villian, but the function and nature of the name stands apart from Above or Below.

Zach

You're confusing Name and Role. Warden, as held by Catherine, is a Below Name. In the future it could be an Above one.

A good comparison is Squire. Squire can be either a Heroic or Villainous Name, but any given Squire is one or the other, not both.

ninegardens

Warden is a neutral name. Catherine is a Below aligned NAMED.

The Name itself isn't on any given side in a general sense, but the particular Named who has it will lean one way or the other.

jamesc9

@ Quwertzuiopp, I think that the hope for (over-reading slightly) Neutral wielders of Names is a bit like the hope for independent regulators in democratic politics. It's a hope to opt out of conflict, in order to opt out of having to decide who to trust, where deciding who to trust is a known, hard problem.

SpeckofStardust

Named are granted power by the gods because they fit a role that they the gods want empowered. Which gods they are empowered by decides if thier the below's or above's. Non-Named aren't locked into this system. Named are, technically many Name fit roles that either side might want to "support", Aka Archer a basic role of being kickass with a bow could be a hero or a villain, however the person who is Named will effectively be either supporting the below's ultimate argument or the above's ultimate argument. Not being supporting either means a lack of fulfilling a role and thus losing the name, because without role the Name wont stick.

If one side of the gods want to opt out empowering someone tends to mean they switched sides and thus the other side will pick up the slack.

The Warden might go either way, but the holder of the name dam well can't. (or anyone who is named)

The bard got empowered by both sides to keep the argument going until (I assume) the mortals get to an answer. (I also assuming thier regretting that set up for bard)

Tenthyr

Oh my. All that power and it might not even be an aspect.

I do wonder what Aspects Catherine will form to enforce the Accords on those who defy them...

RoflCat

She can't have an Aspect for punishing defiers.

The bargain is that Hanno is its enforcer, so the most likely result is that she'd have the ability to detect someone breaking the rule and teleport Hanno over there.

Kinda like how Tariq was guided by the Choir to where he's needed.

Tenthyr

She will need someone to do the minor work of enforcement, but I doubt Catherine is going to be an idle Warden. Warden implies doing the work of defending and safeguarding the accords, and Catherine has worn the rut so that you must have the POWER to hold your mantle, not just the will.

Salt

So you're saying she'll be able to Guide him exactly where he needs to be at exactly the right time?

Yamageddon

That sounds very practical, yes!

shikkarasu

Rein, Collect, and I can't remember the third one that was floating around a book ago that I liked. She's dramatically used Collect twice now, so the third better make an Aspect, and the idea of a pun like Rein being part of her soul makes me happy in unnatural ways.

Liliet

Wait, so where IS Masego right now? In the Observatory? In the Arsenal? Am confuse.

Hum, not what I called for Cat's Name, but we haven't seen all of it yet either.

Also not what I called for Cordelia. A shame, but fair enough I guess ._.

Hanno's getting a new Name! ^^ And yeah Recall is sticking around which is Nice

Hakram!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!! ^^

Nice way to resolve the thing with Ishaq, also totally what I called.

Not what I called for the heroes, but reasonable!

FINALLY WE'RE COOPERATING ON THE DWARVES THING JESUS CHRIST ON A CRACKER

Liliet

P.S. SEER CAT
SEER CAT
SEER CAT

ODIN CAT

and Masego outright calls Bard the goddess of stories, which probably has one hell of an implication when Cat's outright usurping her Role.

Unrecovered

Has one eye, sacrificed other, has two crows... Damn how come i've missed it?

shikkarasu

Staff not unlike Gungnir, supernatural mount, habit of sacrificing herself for personal power...

CMDraz

She is after all Woe and Warden, AKA Wodin

Isi Arnott-Campbell

"Horse" with more limbs than one would expect (both current Zombie and Dread Emperoress Big-Ass Spider).

Linnus42

I wonder if there is a Name for that type of Aspect.

Hanno has Recall.

Cat seems to have it as well with Take.

Some sort of inherent Aspect that is linked more to the soul than the Name.

Bard would know I suppose

Liliet

I wonder if Cat would have gotten Seek as it if she'd not lost it back then.

shikkarasu

I would also like to call out Masego's Glimpse to Witness and Deconstruct to Ruin. We never Glimpsed his 3rd Aspect as Apprentice, although Learn is most likely.

I expect that since Aspects are based on the character and how they think/view themselves that there would be a lot of parallels after transitions. Cat's were only different because she stopped thinking of her path as one where she would Seek and Struggle to find her way to power. She had, at that point, enough personal power to Take what she needed and Break what she disdained. ("Use what she cannot break and break what she cannot use.")

Hanno believes in the Wisdom of others, even if he isn't taking direct orders from Angels anymore, so it makes sense that he will either keep Recall for as long as he has any Name, or he will develop a similar one.

Sinead

My understanding is that Maseago is back in Laure/Observatory. It's actually a better place to be since Callow isn't under assault right now. Since the Arsenal has been shut down, I think that they would need the support at the Observatory that just wouldn't be available elsewhere.

Liliet

OKay but where was he when he was therapy-ing Cat on her way to

shikkarasu

I think at this point he just has a traveling lab in the supply train. Possibly in Arcadia to stay safe from DK. Or, more amusingly, he just wanders in to any sizable house/cave/mansion and Merlins it into his bedroom/office. See Disney's Sword in the Stone for an accurate depiction of my headcanon.

Liliet

hockety pockety wockety

Isi Arnott-Campbell

I didn't get the reference so your comment was completely incomprehensible for a moment before I drew the obvious conclusion.

BargleNawdleZouss

I learned something today! LOL

erebus42

Yay! I've been sorely missing the Drow in this story.

Sinead

Now does Cat actually deal with the issue with Kuisrov herself, or does she oversee the transfer of power and uses someone else (likely Ivah) as the spearhead of this initiative?

Liliet

popcorn.jpg

shikkarasu

She did have a bunch of her soul hollowed out to fit a majority of the Night into if needed. She could probably just kill him, Take his stuff, and not need to borrow from the Sisters anymore.

ninegardens

"kill him, Take his stuff"

I see what you did there.
Robber would be proud.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

God I miss him. Her limp must be so much worse without her (lesser lesser) footrest.

Adrian_V

I suspect we will see a resolution to some Drow su plots, like that general that is rebelling and basically trying to usurp Sve Noc.

Also glad to see these 3 working together

Frivolous

I suspect Catherine and Masego will have to fight and kill Kurosiv.

Might have something to do with the quantity of Night that Kurosiv is hoarding and denying Sve Noc. For that Night to be released and used against the Intercessor, Kurosiv must die.

Salt

They'd better bring some countermeasure against acid then. It'll be a sad day when the Warden goes up against a dude named "corrosive" and isn't prepared for corrosion

Isi Arnott-Campbell

I'm surprised at myself for not catching that.

RoflCat

What other countermeasure is needed besides Catherine just being Based Catherine?

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Is this a chemistry joke or am I overthinking it?

RoflCat

chemistry base + 'confidently be who you are' based so yes

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Adrian_V

They could use him as a sort of medium or living artefact to channel the night, basically they sag him with all the side effects doing that would have on them, that way they kill 3 birds with 1 stone (him, the intersector and not cripple themselves)

arcanavitael5

I did not expect the chapter to go like this but I love it. The wakeing up from getting name and seeing Hakram. The reconciliation of Cat and Hakram with hi still being part of the woe. The meeting with Hanno and Cordelia and how we handled that with them and the new dynamic between the 3 of them. Hanno and Cat are on good terms as well which is awesome and Cordelia is putting aside her dislike for him which is good. The powers of the Warden being used to understand the Herald of the Deep which so far is not an aspect. I like how a Cat just cool as a cumcuber replace herself as the Villian representative with the Barrow Sword (MVP LARPER)

That bit with Less to about the bard is very intersting. This is such a great situation of the last chapter.

Liliet

Cat has already gotten over the representative thing in the previous chapter ♥ ♥ ♥ and it was never as personal to her as ruling Callow was

I love how Cat in book 6 was like ":blushing: we're close collaborators? :blushing:" and now she looks back like "our easy friendship"

ohJohN

"cumcuber" oh god

Frivolous

This chapter makes me feel good. Hakram reconciling with Catherine, Catherine and Hanno and Cordelia learning to work together.

Hahaha, the Herald of the Deeps is doing all this just so he can be with his boyfriend. It's so sweet and romantic.

I wonder if Hanno's new aspect will be the same as the old Recall. I have a hard time believing it will be exactly the same. He's not the same man anymore.

Wonder what Hakram's first aspect is. Wonder if Vivienne has a first aspect by now.

I'm a little surprised that, at least according to Hakram, Kairos saw no Wish at all in Hakram. I figured his Wish would be merely weak, not nonexistent.

Glad that Ishaq became the captain for the villains. Needing a girl to fight for you against another girl is probably a bit embarrassing, though.

I'd like some glimpse of the Red Knight sooner or later. It's annoying that she's never gone on stage yet. I want to see for myself just how obnoxious she is.

Linnus42

Yeah we have heard a lot about Red Knight but we haven't seen her.

I mean I can imagine there was a bit of that meme going on between Ishaq and Hanno...Look at my man, look at your man. Since Hanno with no Name spanked Ishaq and Hunted. And Ishaq cannot even defend his own claim lol.

SeventhSolar

Ishaq's more a rogue-type anyway. So far, his strengths include: leading bands of 5, resurrecting, executing dangerous targets, and whatever he did to steal his artifacts in the first place. A very villain-style leader, never takes a fair fight when he has his crew playing frontline.

Linnus42

Sure he has the roguish charm I suppose and has other skills. Point is he is starting to look like Frederic outclassed against Real Martials.

SeventhSolar

Unlike Frederic, he still has Named leadership experience, ambition, and rogue combat tactics. I didn't mean rogue as in roguish, I meant rogue as in assassins, thieves, other classic rogue archetypes. He can't beat Hanno, Red Knight, or the Ranger claimant in a 1v1 duel, sure. But if he really wanted to kill one of them, bets are off. He can start with an ambush, take a mortal blow, and land a single cut to win the fight. Probably still can't take Indrani, though.

Frederic is a supporter in every sense (Aspects and outlook). He's supposed to lose fights.

Linnus42

His sword is not an instant kill and your tactic only works if no one knows his sword can rez him.

Liliet

> Glad that Ishaq became the captain for the villains. Needing a girl to fight for you against another girl is probably a bit embarrassing, though.

I think among Named these attitudes are long gone.

> I wonder if Hanno's new aspect will be the same as the old Recall. I have a hard time believing it will be exactly the same. He's not the same man anymore.

The Aspect is basically a brand on his soul from slightly overdoing it with the Gigantes, it's not really a result of a Name or of the kind of person he is. I don't think it'll change, though Hanno's capacity to handle it will likely improve.

> Wonder what Hakram's first aspect is. Wonder if Vivienne has a first aspect by now.

I know right!!! NAME NERDERY PLEASE GIVE US NEW ASPECTS FOR ALL OF THE WOE (except for Masego who is perfect as is)

Juff

Typo Thread:

an herbal (should be "a herbal" for UK) is question > is a question else why I > else while I would just > would take just be vice > be a vice steal anymore. > steal anymore."
less of a > less than a "Form the > "From the seeks it not > seeks is not willing let > willing to let on redeeming > one redeeming

I was too > It was too

shikkarasu

"An 'erbal" would make sense given the... degree of refinement generally displayed by our fair Queen, Long May She Reign Until She's Bored, Happy Retirement Thereafter, May She Never Return.

Eleron Marilus Pfoutz

Ah, yes, Dread Black Empress Queen Catherine Triumphant Foundling, Goddess-Empress-Queen of All Evil and Callow, lover of half-fey gingers and Vale summer wine and victories snatched from the jaws of defeat.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Isn't Killian quarter-fae, not half?

shikkarasu

Correct. Book 2:15 – Council

""Kilian of Mashamba. Her grandmother rode with the Wild Hunt until encountering her grandfather. Specifics are sparse on how she died, but the fae rarely last when too far from Arcadia"

And for bonus facts: Book 3:Extra Chapter – Regard " "Anyway," [Ranger] said, "I'm thinking about a hunting trip in Arcadia. The Wild Hunt was very uppity when I met them."

some time later, same extra chapter

The tavern was nearly empty at this time of the night – people in the Green Stretch were farmers, went to bed early and rose with dawn. "

Crack Theory:

Ranger chased Killian's grandmother out of Arcadia and into the Green Stretch, where she hooked up with a Farmer. Black inadvertently saved Killian's life by distracting Ranger long enough for Killian's parent to be born. After Good King Edward was killed this is the loose end that she immediately left the Calamities to go deal with, however Ranger didn't care about some half-fae or their daughter and so let them live.

Sugar Roll

After the war, a new city is going to be built at the heart of the continent. I imagine a suitable offer can be made to the Herald of the Deeps regarding that.

Konstantin von Karstein

And give him the seat of the Liesse Accords? Great idea!

shikkarasu

Genuinely unsure how serious you are being, but this unironically.

Konstantin von Karstein

I'm sarcastic. Giving to an expansionist foreign power the only major link between the 2 nations (so where all the trade will happen is an awful idea. Cardinal will be the new centre of Calernia, with its school. And you would give power over it to the Kingdom Under?

shikkarasu

As a politician you make a good point. For the Narrative? I like the idea of the radical expansionists being immediately bound to a new, different set of rules once they get up here. The Herald has no stake in the surface or its politics and may very well be bringing the whole "only Dwarves can own property" mindset with him. Making him part of the new paradigm might help in shaping how the Dwarves operate on the surface.

Genuinely surprised at how much I'm siding with Hanno all of a sudden, but now that he's started describing his position with something other than platitudes I'm starting to get it.

Konstantin von Karstein

Yeah, that's another reason why having him anywhere near the Accords would be catastrophically bad.

Gabe Meadow

I love the reconciliation between Cat and Hakram, and the trio of Cat, Cordelia, and Hanno starting to work together again. This is what the WB worked to knife for years, because this collaboration could just save Calernia.

The twist reveal of the Herald's motivations make a lot of sense here, EE as ever, hinting at it in Interlude: Triptych long before we ever thought it would become a major thing. Delein and Balasi, whose love is illegal, and of course: "A mere seeker of deeds could not be seated at the same time as the Herald of the Deeps, he thought, bitterness so old and worn it was hardly even that anymore."

It would make another great change to Calernia's benefit if the dwarves (or a presumptive faction), truly begin to recognize surface folk as people and work with them.

Hargabga

Things are looking up.

Suspicious...

letouriste

I mean, everything was a little too bleak recently.

NerfGlaistigUaine

Was a bit disappointed the villains choosing their leader was skipped over. Would've been an interesting interlude, but I suppose the pacing may be better off without it. I'm also surprised Barrow Sword accepted having a champion fight in his stead. Thought his honor would make him insist on taking on the Red Knight, but I guess pragmatism won out.

SeventhSolar

He doesn't have honor, that's why he's a Levantine villain, not a Levantine hero.

beleester

No, he's got honor. Remember that his big personal issue for the past book has been "I want Levant to officially recognize my glorious deeds in this war."

But I think that working to make that happen taught him the value of using the rules to your advantage.

SeventhSolar

That's not honor, that's status. Honor in Levant is fighting without seeking advantages or disadvantages. Ishaq wants fame and fortune. Essentially, he wants to be nobility in the way that the Blood are. Nothing about him screams "I will sacrifice my goals in order to give my opponents fair fights."

shikkarasu

He had Lawful/Stupid beat out of him when he challenged Cat to a duel for her position. Now he has Lawful/Wait, So I Can Claim Tacit Superiority To Archer, THE Fucking Archer? Hells Yes She Can Fight My Battles For Me.

Clear ideological upgrade, in my eyes.

Earl of Purple

I hope Hanno becomes a Knight again. Then we can have a band of five consisting only of Knights. The Black Knight, Red Knight, Mirror Knight and Knight Errant to fill it out.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

The fact that the first two knightly Names you rattled off were color-coded gave me an idea: Power Rangers/Practical Guide mashup.

shikkarasu

The Dead King is too powerful, better form Knight-tron

Black/Errant: Form Feet and Legs!

Red/Mirror Knight: Form Arms and Body!

Hanno: And I'll form the Head!

The Blazing sword is, obviously, the Severance.

Earl of Purple

Might be three colour-coded. Hanno used to be the White Knight, after all; he could be so again.

Peter

5 knights in Keter – sounds expensive

jamesc9

That was punny.

kal durak

I'm looking to see Hanno change from The White Knight to The White Prince!

Dome Zasrekh

Keter has a hellgate that leads to a hell with a lot of humans in it. They will lose their leader if the dead king dies, so the dwarven city will have lots of humans to work with!
Too many things seem to work out lately, makes me worried!

Salt

Well if the point for the herald to expose some of the dwarves to other cultures so the kingdom under doesn't become this isolated regressive culture, I'm not sure having them live with the only peoples that are even more isolated and regressive than the kingdom under would necessarily work out well.

Whatever comes out of a mish mash of the serenity (quite literally human cattle raised in a hell-pen to blindly cult worship the dead king) and the kingdom under (a race almost completely physically isolated from every other race, and xenophobic to the point where even the Drow seem openminded and accepting in comparison) is probably going to be the most fucked up thing since Praes.

Kojo

I think that whoever is advising the Herald of the Deep is making a mistake because they are going to turn the Dwarfs from a competitor/enemy of the surface nations into THE ENEMY of the surface due to the timing of this expansion. Because if you consider the various surface nations, you can already see some of the seeds for the future civil wars that will wrack each nation in the next 100 years.

Procer – North Vs South

Free Cities – Everyone Vs Protector

Callow – Disagreements over the settlement of Goblin and Orc veterans in Callow.

Orc Horde – Not sure?

Goblins – Pro matriarchs vs Anti matriarchs

Praes – A war started by an election.

Each of these potential wars might be made worse due to meddling by other nations through The Cardinal, As Black said that The Cardinal might become the new continental court.

So why would the Dwarfs not wait for all these conflicts to start and weaken the Grand Alliance/Liesse Accords before slowly taking over the surface instead of giving the surface nations something to rally around? Like trying to cheat us when the Dead King was out to kill us all.

Because now, due to the Herald of the Deep, the foremost powers of the Surface have concrete proof that the Dwarves are coming for them, and even if the current scheme fails, Cat and Cordelia will start making long term plans during their time in The Cardinal to counter future Dwarven invasions. Is it just me or those the current scheme by the Herald of the Deep make absolutely no sense?

jamesc9

I remember THE ENEMY as a thing from the Age of Wonders. I'm not sure what it will be like in the Age of Order. It depends, at least in part, on whether the stories will pull the Dwarves into the Liesse Accords against their will.

Salt

"The Enemy" as a theme will still be around for sure imo, and still be just as relevant. It just won't be based on an enforced binary Good and Evil. Just because Above and Below aren't setting the terms, doesn't mean prejudice and bigotry suddenly disappear. That's not something Above or Below need to force on mortals for mortals to exude it from every pore on their own.

If anything it'll be even worse in a lot of ways – people kind of suck like that – with "The Enemy" just changing themes to be based on nationalities, races, mortal belief systems, or even much more petty things that are horrible enough to lend some credence to the idea that Above and Below actually do know better.

The only thing that the Age of Order actually changes, is mortals dealing more with mortal failings instead of problems caused by higher entities and their associated grand works. Mortal failings can be every bit as awful and serious as problems caused by said higher entities though, meaning there's a real chance the Age of Order could have the same types of problems or even be worse than the Age of Wonders, the same way there's also chance it could be better.

Mike E.

"When that time comes," he quietly said, "I would like to fight with the Woe."

My heart clenched. To that, at least, I had an answer.

"If the Woe are fighting," I simply replied, "where else would you be?"

—

That exchange gave me some feels. Woe back together again for the end?

Frivolous

Agree, that exchange made me feel good weepy.

Also this mirrors what happened in the Arsenal. Catherine sat Hakram's bedside waiting for him to wake up. Here he returns the favor.

BargleNawdleZouss

Hypothetical: Hanno puts up the decision of who wields The Severance to a vote. The results are split between himself, Mirror Knight, Valiant Champion, Blade of Mercy, and Bloody Sword

(as mentioned in Chapter 33: Claimant (Repeat)), with none close to a majority. As a result, Arthur as Knight Errant gets picked as a compromise candidate.

Likelihood = low, but a reader can hope! 🙏

Frivolous

Hakram was a bit wrong when he said all the Woe went through 2 Names except for Catherine, who has had 3.

I'm assuming that Indrani is either Ranger by now or is progressing in her claim to Ranger.

The reason is Vivienne: Thief, Princess, and presumably Queen, if she lives long enough and Callow doesn't get destroyed. That's 3, not 2.

In related news: I wonder if Vivienne attended the hero meeting wherein Hanno was reelected as captain of heroes. Did she get a vote?

Also: If there still were any heroes (like Tariq) that loathed or feared Catherine for making Callow Evil by ruling it, I wonder what they would say now that Vivienne and Arthur have become heroes. Especially Vivienne. Years in Catherine's company and she becomes a hero again.

Would they say that it means Catherine can't be all that bad, or would they say that it only speaks to Vivienne's virtue, that she resisted contamination by Catherine, Hakram, Masego, and Indrani?

Of course this is Vivienne the Yoinker we're talking about, so no one could say she's that pure. So maybe Callow isn't that Evil either.

jamesc9

Hmmm... So if we evaluate someone's alignment by their enemies, are the Summer fae of Above or Below?

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Summer is of Above, Winter is of Below. To me this is made most clear not through the direct iconography/symbolism of either side, nor their battle tactics or directly-onscreen cultures (but those too; the Winter Court are all treacherous schemers, and the armies of Winter fight in a less organized, more bunch-of-skirmishes-in-one-spot fashion compared to Summer's tactical cohesion), but most of all through the summary we once got of the typical cycle of Summer and Winter.

To wit: Summer builds itself up as this land of milk and honey, idyllic and plentiful to the extreme, while Winter sits and festers in bitter deprivation and hunger; and when it becomes unbearable Winter attempts to claim Summer's bounty by force and one of them destroys the other for that cycle. Evil looks greedily upon what Good has, and acts first to seize or ruin it; Good responds to this aggression. It's the same pattern Praes and Callow had prior to the Conquest, hence said Conquest eventually altering the nature of Arcadia-as-viewed-from-Calernia.

BargleNawdleZouss

I'm curious if Hakram attended the villains' conclave as The Warlord?

Someperson

Well with luck this will be the final confrontation with that darned Wandering Bard that is brewing. And ironically the very lack of villainous stories will probably make it substantially easier for Cat to do that.

Hakram would have made an ideal representative for Below, although it also makes a great deal of sense that he did not attempt it.

Bart_KF

OH SHIT that's why Kairos was so insistent that Hakram was broken somehow! Because of his Wish aspect! He looked where someone's heart's desire was supposed to be and found nothing- that makes so much more sense now!

Chapter 41: Passing

"Forty-four: never refuse a companion come to join your journey at the last moment. Whether true or traitor, they represent a necessary opportunity."

– "Two Hundred Heroic Axioms", author unknown

The heroes had come together in one of their little councils and a verdict emerged: when all marched on Keter, the Mirror Knight would wield the Severance.

I'd hoped it would be Hanno instead, but I would make my peace with the decision. It wasn't like he'd be keeping the sword after the war anyway – it had been made in the Arsenal, so by treaty it would be going into a vault under Cardinal as soon as one was built. It would see the light of day again if a Warden saw a threat emerge that it should be wielded against, but I had my doubts there would be another of those in my lifetime. Vivienne had the Jacks keep an eye on Christophe de Pavanie afterwards and they noted he did not seem to feel particularly happy about the choice.

Rumour had it he'd argued against his own candidature, though even my friends among the heroes remained tight-lipped. Knowing their kind, trying to refuse the charge had probably swayed a few more in favour of him taking up the sword. Still, important as the decision had been as the days passed it felt like little more than an afterthought. A much greater test was looming just ahead, after all: word had been sent to the Herald, and we were now prepared for the final talks with the envoy of the Kingdom Under. Even the most eminent of swords was a small thing, compared to the conversation that would make or break our attack on Keter.

We took Cordelia's suggested line, at least superficially. The Barrow Sword would sit in as the representative for Below and the First Prince had reached out to the Kingdom Under through the dwarven gate to find an interlocutor should the talks with the Herald fail. We'd kept it deniable and strictly Proceran so far, talking about the trade the gate being dug up might represent while Cordelia's envoys sought to get in touch with an isolationist dignitary. It wasn't that subtle, of course, and wasn't meant to be – our best shot at getting in touch with such a person was them finding us, not the other way around, so rumours were to our advantage.

And if this blew back on us, then the Grand Alliance could say it'd all been the Principate and that Cordelia Hasenbach would abdicate because of this debacle, because she totally hadn't been planning on doing that anyway.

We got tentative feelers back from a dwarf whose title was something like 'home-lord' in dwarven, but she got frustrated when our envoys got noncommittal and that boded well. Knowing our time was running out, we rushed the meeting a day early. The Herald of the Deeps and Seeker Balasi were once again the whole sum of the Kingdom Under's delegation, which in retrospect looked a little suspicious. Arrogant as dwarves were, they had to know that sending fewer people than the number of fucking cities you were asking for was a bit much – this was the Herald's choice, I figured, cutting other people out of the room so word couldn't get out to his opponents back home.

It boded well for our bargaining position that he couldn't even be sure of everyone in his delegation.

"You have been given sufficient time to grasp the terms," Balasi bluntly said. "Have you deliberated your answer?"

They didn't waste time on courtesies and this time Cordelia didn't pull out the perfect hostess routine, which I felt was rather more honest a way to do this. Hanno might be inclined to see the best in the Herald, but I had yet to find any reason to.

"A sort of answer, certainly: it has come to our attention that you have not been negotiating in good faith," Cordelia Hasenbach coldly replied.

I reached for my wakeleaf and began stuffing my pipe, letting the hero and the diplomat have at it. I was here to look imposing and wave my Night stick, not pull strings they were my better at pulling.

"This is an insult," the Herald calmly said. "Withdraw it and apologize or these negotiations are at an end."

Mistake, I thought. The green-eyed dwarf wasn't a diplomat and it showed. Never give that kind of an ultimatum unless you were sure you wouldn't be called on it or you were willing to go through with the threat. The First Prince matched his gaze, unblinking.

"The door is behind you."

Balasi rose to his feet.

"Salia will be sunk into the ground for this," the deed-seeker hissed. "You insult envoys of the King Under-"

"Silence," I Spoke.

His mouth closed shut and he stared at me as if I'd gone mad.

He might think so, but it had been a tactical choice. It meant the Herald would have to speak for himself at all times and I was looking for something else besides. Still, I cocked my head to the side. That'd resonated more strongly than it should have. It was like I'd thought in Praes, the aspect was so close to emerging it would only need a single halfway solid pivot to solidify. As I considered that I kept my dead eye on the Herald, who under the calm façade was furious. Personally so. But is it him you're in love with, or is this just a close friendship? I could not tell, I wasn't good enough at this yet.

There were a lot of revenge stories around the Herald that began by Balasi dying, but that didn't precisely confirm it either. The death of family or a childhood friend was just as common a catalyst as a lover's to begin a journey of revenge.

"Now," Cordelia said, leaning forward, "do you intend to leave?"

I knew her well enough to tell that the glint in her eye was a vicious little twist of satisfaction. Couldn't blame her, given how these two had tried to use the threat of extinction at the hand of a common foe to extort us out of three cities.

"It appears there has been a misunderstanding," the Herald evenly said. "We will depart once it has been resolved and you have understood the depth of your mistake."

"Your intentions were understood," Hanno said. "You are attempting to create realms on the surface where you can change the ways of your people."

It was calculated that he would be the one to speak. If it turned out we'd been wrong in our conclusions, then he could take a step back after Cordelia 'chided' him and remain silent like Ishaq – who was looking faintly amused as he beheld all this and was not inclined in the slightest to get involved. He was a man who knew his limitations, the Barrow Sword. He was still a few years away from having earned a seat at this sort of table in his own right.

"You assume much, angel-child," the Herald replied.

"It is a laudable undertaking," Hanno continued, "but your means are wrong. You cannot build the foundations of a better world by setting the stones on the back of those who live in it."

The Named dwarf's face tightened, the first sign of anger obvious enough I was able to catch it.

"You know nothing, White Knight," the Herald of Deeps said. "Of what is needful or needed. The weight of your ignorance is crushing."

The air in the room thickened, but I clicked my tongue against the roof of my mouth.

"None of that, now," I lazily said. "Else I'm going to start doing it too, and you won't like where that leads."

"Threats and insults," the Herald scorned. "All of you will pay for this insolence."

He stopped massing power, but only because he rose to his feet as well. He strode out of the room, Balasi following after throwing me a glare I rolled my eye at. They two of them left silence in their wake until the Barrow Sword broke it.

"I take it negotiations with these fine fellows are at an end," Ishaq said, stroking his beard.

I cast a look at Cordelia, who looked thoughtful, and then Hanno.

"No," the Sword of Judgment said.

"No," the First Prince agreed. "They will be back."

Two bells later, they were proved right.

—

Dusk was approaching when the two of them returned. They were ushered back into the same room after being made to wait while we gathered up again. This time there were no theatrics: they knew that while they still had a blade at our throat now we had one at theirs. Not the Kingdom Under's, that was a lost cause, but them specifically. Cordelia's fondness for cards as a chosen metaphor for diplomacy was proving accurate: we'd played the opponents instead of the cards, and now we were getting results. Interestingly, I noticed that while my command had faded in Basali there was a lingering echo. If I gave the same order, it would come down much more harshly the second time — and my instinct was that three might lead to permanence.

That might prove more than a little useful, if the aspect was meant for what I thought it was.

Hanno took the lead this time, as Cordelia had already pulled the rug out from under them. It was about the soft glove now, not the steel underneath.

"You accused me ignorance," he said. "Help rid me of it."

It shouldn't have worked, I thought. But I knew it would. Because underneath the calm I could see that the Named was just itching to talk. To lay it all out to someone who'd understand, who'd agree. It was the same reason villains gloated, only instead of getting them friends it got them killed.

"The Kingdom Under," the Herald of the Deeps began, "has grown calcified."

He spun us a tale, after that. Reading through the lines and navigating an unfortunate number of words in dwarven that I had no idea how to pronounce, it looked like the heartlands of the Kingdom Under had grown into pretty much a caste system. People lived and died in their little bubbles according to tortured rules, only the rungs on the caste ladder were quite literal here: the commons lived crammed in the deepest pits, the respectable in the nicer cities that had been emptied as the expansions continued.

The Herald was from one of the wealthiest families in the great city that was broadly below Orne, a place called Maradar, but he had seen the evils in the way the commons were used because... there he gave a look to Balasi that put to rest any notion it was just friendship between them. Deed-seekers, as I recalled, were dwarves who sought to commit great deeds to their status would be raised in dwarven society. The pieces fit rather neatly together.

"After I became the Herald," he said, "I attempted reforms. It... did not go well."

"There was war," Balasi frankly said. "He was accused of stepping beyond his Burden."

"So you compromised by heading the Fourteenth Expansion," Hanno said.

Only that too had failed. While the largely bloodless victory I'd delivered to them over the Firstborn had seen the Herald lauded, it had also made the pioneering safe. His opponents from back home, seeing massive gains to be made at little risk, had immediately begun getting their hands all over the colonies. To get him out of the way they'd tossed him leadership of the Fifteenth Expansion, an unprecedented honour, but those first waves would be mostly soldiers and those had other loyalties. If he wanted to make a haven for the trod upon, then he would need somewhere else to bring them.

So, as we'd surmised, he'd cut a deal with the same people who had been chasing him off after every victory.

"Securing cities for support would have been so resounding a victory we would have been untouchable for at least a century," the Herald said. "Time to grow, to make alliances."

"A fair turn given to an ugly act," Cordelia said, unimpressed.

"You would already have gone beyond us if you did not want to cut a deal," Balasi replied. "So offer your terms, First Prince."

"Keter," she replied.

"A wasteland infested with the dead," the Herald frowned.

"A great city among once-rich lands," Hanno replied. "An outpost with roads to the Kingdom Under, a natural capital to the Fifteenth Expansion."

"Even if all the dead are broken," Balasi slowly said, "there would be no trade, or humans to work under us."

"Are you seeking change," the Sword of Judgment quietly replied, "or just to add a rung below you on the ladder?"

Both dwarves flinched. There was talk back and forth after that, about boundaries of land and trade concessions and the massive sum of gold that they both wanted – I now suspected to make a garden out of Keter, if they were stuck there – but I could tell that it was Hanno's retort that had done it. Every time it looked like they were getting angry, they felt the bite of the bladelike sentence slide below a rib.

"It is not the bargain I was expected to make," the Herald told us when the negotiations wound down. "I may not have the support to make it law."

"I am willing for Procer to take the debt immediately if supplies for the siege of Keter are promised," Cordelia told him.

"I cannot promise them," the green-eyed dwarf admitted. "I do not have the authority to move such quantities by my word alone. The land-kings will have their say."

"But you can help," Hanno pressed.

"I have struck a bargain with Sve Noc through an envoy before," the Herald said, glancing at me. "This power none can deny me, so these talks do not worry me. All I can offer for the land-kings is an oath on my staff that I will fight for these terms with all my might."

So not a sure thing, I thought with a grimace. It wasn't the agreement we'd wanted, and the Sisters had yet to agree to the terms – which involved them ceding a great deal of territory theoretically theirs – but it was something. And if we tried to go pas them, reach out to their opponents in the Kingdom Under, we ran risks too. The talks might be killed entirely, or the terms grow worse. And even if it worked out just fine, it would take time. What would better terms matter, if they were accepted when we were all dead? No all the decisions we could make carried risks. The real question was which of them was the best risk to take.

My gut said this was the one.

Hanno had gotten to Herald, I'd seen it, and that would work for us. It was a better bet than a complete unknown. I met Cordelia's eyes and nodded my assent.

"Then speak to the land-kings, Herald," the First Prince said. "This is the bargain we seek."

Drinks were brought in, we emptied them and the Herald of the Deeps swore his oath. I saw Creation eddy from the strength of it. It will not be broken without consequence, I thought. That night, as I lay in bed I found that sleep eluded me. The assault on Keter had always been going to be a gamble, a roll of the dice that would lead to either victory or extinction, but it was even more so now. We had enough supplies for the march and a few weeks once we set camp around the Crown of the Dead – a little under two months, barring a disaster, but even two months wouldn't be enough to crack open Keter.

If the Herald failed, we failed with him.

I was not surprised that I slept little, and fitfully.

—

It was actually quite hard to take anyone by surprise through the Twilight Ways, at least when you got to the scale of armies. A cavalry contingent of a handful of Named could be slipped in to devastating effect, that was true, but an entire army? Getting it through the gates could take more than a day sometimes, not unlike marching a host through a narrow mountain pass, and it was even worse when you were leading a coalition force – half a dozen languages, people yelling about who was in charge and too many different baggage trains. Having led such a force on the Hainaut front for almost two years, I figured I had my finger on the pulse of the kind of troubles it entailed.

As always, though, the League of Free Cities found a way to surprise me. After a day and a half they had most of the Helikean army through and that was pretty much it. Everyone else had landed small forces, squabbling over who should go through, and apparently Bellerophon's citizen militia was debating just staying in the Twilight Ways the whole time.

There would, I was informed, be a vote.

Still, by the afternoon of the second day there was no longer any delaying the official 'arrival' of the League: people had seen the troops crossing into Creation, word was reaching Salia and there might be a panic if the situation was left unattended. The people of Procer's capital had gotten much twitchier about armies since the shine off the myth of the Principate's invincibility had worn off. For that and diplomatic reasons, theatre was made of the whole affair. It suited all parties, since the League cities wanted to salvage their reputation after sitting out most of the war while Procer was in desperate need of good news to trumpet about.

All of the cities picked two hundred of their shiniest soldiers – Bellerophon drew the names by lot instead – and a parade was welcomed into the city to raucous cheers. Cordelia cracked open the foodstuff reserves to throw street banquets and newly minted Empress Basilia sent out crates of salted fish, dried mutton and dates as an elegant gesture of goodwill. If she made sure that the generosity was traced back to her by having her own officers distribute what was technically League stores, well, that was just how those games were played. She'd not gotten her hat by missing opportunities.

The city's spirits were lifted, the doom just beyond the horizon forgotten for a night, and why wouldn't the people cheer? Not even the First Crusade had boasted an array of soldiers from so many parts of Calernia: this time all the nations of the continent stood on the right side of horror.

I did not take long for Basilia Katopodis to seek me out after the formalities were done. She came alone, keeping the pretence of a visit between old friends instead of state affairs, but we both knew better. I received her in the same bar I'd received Nestor Ikaroi in when he came on her behalf, standing behind the counter. The Protector of the League had good taste in drinks: she asked for a Wasteland mule, which was a finger of aragh in pale beer. It was an old Legion favourite I remembered from the War College, beloved of students for being a cheaper drunk than either beer or aragh and of innkeepers for being really easy to cut with water without affecting the taste.

"I wondered if Ikaroi was boasting," Basilia amusedly said as I handed her the mug, "but it seems not."

"It's a little nostalgic," I admitted.

"I wonder if there are any boys in Laure who now boasts of having had their ale poured by a queen," she mused.

I snorted.

"There's a few who could boast of getting more than that, if they put the details together," I told her, wagging my eyebrows suggestively.

She choked on her drink, spraying mist on Cordelia's nice carpets as she coughed. Ah, the costs of diplomacy. The Empress of Aenia, a realm that covered almost half the territory of the League, was a tall brown-haired woman with a rather plain face and the build of someone who'd spent most of their life on horseback wearing heavy armour. No one would call her pretty, but she was fit and fierce – interesting to the eye the same way a tiger would be. She'd once been believed a man, I'd heard, but I would not have guessed at a glance.

"There are tales about Callowan serving girls," the Empress admitted, grinning.

"All lies, except for the ones that are true," I drawled.

She'd not come for idle talk, of course, but I saw worth in keeping the loosely friendly relationship we'd had so far. I had been Basilia's informal patron during her rise in power, providing support from afar while she fought Malicia's allies in the League. I'd even tugged at Cordelia's sleeve once or twice to get her to toss the then-general a bone. We both knew she'd risen far beyond what I had ever intended and that a relation that'd once had a clear superior had grown rather more muddled, but that was not enough to warrant hostility. She was still the closest thing I had to a reliable friend in the League.

I just had to tread more carefully when asking things of her and expect to be asked the odd favour in return.

"That's always the trouble with tales," Basilia said. "It can be hard to pick out the true ones, especially when it comes to Named."

It was my turn to send her an amused glance. There was no need to go fishing when I was ready to just toss her the fish.

"That one's true," I said. "I stand as the Warden now. The office will be written into the Accords, with all accordant powers and responsibilities. There is no longer a need for the League to worry about infighting within the Grand Alliance – all our efforts are turned against Keter."

She let out a low whistle.

"You do keep landing on your feet, don't you?" Basilia said.

"Coming from you, Empress," I smiled, "that's a little rich."

We traded toothy, savage smiles.

"The message I sent through Ikaroi still stands," she told me. "The League can't sign onto the Accords unless we get back the Hierarch."

"He did not strike me as a man who would sign them if you did get him back," I frankly replied.

She shrugged.

"Regardless, there's way around it," she said. "The cities have already adopted laws that follow along the same lines, so the holdout is you."

Meaning the office of Warden, which could not be expected to have authority over the Named of the Free Cities when the League had not signed onto the Accords.

"And you have an offer?" I asked.

"What falls under the authority of a Protector of the League is vague," she told me. "Largely on purpose. So Named could be swept under that aegis, if the bone is gnawed at some."

I almost smiled at the audacity.

"You want a deal between the office of Warden and the hereditary title of Protector," I mused. "Your authority over the League's Named recognized in exchange for enforcing the Accords on them."

She wanted for her and her descendants to be the natural and legal lieutenants of the Wardens in the Free Cities. More power gathered to her title in exchange for me getting my way past the labyrinth complexities of negotiating any treaty with the League.

"I could stomach that arrangement," I said, "so long as it's contingent to the League not having signed onto the Accords yet. Once it does, it will be no different from any other signatory."

I might not be in a position to take a hard line at the moment – we needed the Free Cities if we were going to take Keter – I had no intention of sundering the Warden's authority by allowing private Named fiefdoms under the office. Basilia narrowed her eyes at me, recognizing my answer for what it was: a concession that I could accept this temporarily, but that I'd be putting my full weight behind getting the League into the Accords properly the moment we were done with Keter. It wasn't what she'd wanted to hear, but like me she knew that pushing too far would bite her in the ass.

So, as I had expected, she went after another concession.

"They made for interesting reading, your Accords," the Empress said. "Particularly the parts about Cardinal and this school you intend to build there."

I'd originally meant it for Named, but in practice it would likely see only a few of these attending – young and transitional types, before they headed out into the world. The guild I intended to raise there for villains, and perhaps even heroes if Hanno was so inclined, would draw more interest than the halls of learning. But the school itself would draw mages and nobles from all over Calernia, especially if a few Named mages could be talked into teaching. There would be a lot of influence to be traded there, so I cocked the eyebrow over my dead eye at the empress.

"What about it?" I idly asked.

"The League would be late to join that effort, and our divisions may lead others to edge us out," Basilia evenly said. "A pledge might allay those fears."

I got what she practically wanted out of her before long: guaranteed seats. For students, but also for teachers. And there was the clever part: those were not to be promised to the League itself, since indeed that would be illegal and infringing on the authority of a Hierarch. They were to belong to the Protectors of the League, so that the Empress and her successors could use them for bribes and influence. Well, she didn't lack for audacity. I bargained her down to one teacher and ten students, which I suspected was actually what she'd been after from the start, and with that little concession I got the Empress of Aenia in line.

She'd still fight me tooth and nail to keep the League out of the Accords so she could maintain her authority over Named, but this way she wouldn't actually go to war over the matter. Good luck with that, I thought, smiling prettily at her. The eastern half of the League's terrified of you gobbling them up and it's Cordelia fucking Hasenbach I'll be sending to talk them into signing. She smiled back just as prettily, no doubt already planning half a dozen ways to brutally smash any fingers that dared creep anywhere near her backyard.

"To alliances," I toasted, raising my cup.

"Long may they last," Basilia Katopodis replied.

And to the sound of metal against metal, the League of Free Cities entered the war.

—

The day before Masego was set to arrive in Salia, the people of the capital filled the streets. Rumours had been swirling around the city for days, no small amount of them seeded by Cordelia's spies, so it was with expectation more than glee that the people gathered. I was not to stand in the crowd but instead in a great raised gallery by the side of the platform where a First Prince would abdicate and another be elected. I'd had forewarning, of course. From the Procerans themselves, but also through the Jacks: the two princesses had gone through every legality they could given the circumstances, and that meant a vote in the Highest Assembly.

There was no way to hide that from Vivienne's people, who might not be the Eyes or the Circle but were nothing to be underestimated.

It was without an invitation that I went to see Rozala Malanza, but these days my name was invitation enough. The guards, swarming the place like vigilant hornets, let me through and an attendant guided me to a small room up two sets of stairs. There the Princess of Aquitan was having a cup of sweet cider as she looked through a great window at the crowd still gathering below. Louis Rohanon, her husband and secretary who'd abdicated rule of Creusens at the Graveyard, was fussing over her as she allowed his attentions with a fond gaze. I was almost reluctant to clear my throat.

Louis stepped back immediately, looking mildly embarrassed.

"Your Excellency," he said. "A pleasant surprise."

"Louis Rohanon," I said. "Or should that be prince consort?"

He smiled ruefully.

"Simply consort," the dark-haired man replied. "After consultation with the Rogue Sorcerer, it was decided it would be best for me to be removed from anything princely."

I hummed in approval. The 'crown' he'd surrendered in Iserre had been more than a chunk of metal, it had been the story of his right to rule. It was perhaps not necessary for him to have refused a largely ceremonial title, but the prudence spoke well of him. Rozala was not without taste.

"And to what do we owe the visit, Warden?" the Princess of Aequitan asked.

I flicked a glance at her husband, who took the hint with good grace and made his excuses. As he left the room I took in the sight of Rozala Malanza as she had chosen to dress for her coronation: a warrior-princess. Over a red dress with a yellow stripe down the centre – her heraldry's colours inverted – she wore a polished breastplate, vambraces on her arms and greaves over soft leather boots. The thick belt at her waist, touched with gold, bore a sheathed sword. The princess' dark curls had been pulled back, freeing bangs as a loose braid went down her back, and she had been made into the very ideal of an Arlesite princess of war.

It suited her, I thought. It was not without reason I considered Rozala the toughest Proceran general I'd faced: if we'd fought the Camps to the finish instead of making a truce, it would have been an army-shattering hour for both sides.

"Now that my husband was chased off and you've looked your fill," Rozala drily said, "will you deign to speak freely?"

I took the time to pick my words carefully.

"Yours is an election come out of the war," I said, "but Gods willing, it will last long past it."

"Ah," the dark-eyed princess smiled. "I had wondered if I would warrant such a visit."

There wasn't a lot of joy in that quirk of the lips.

"You have spent much coin and effort keeping Procer from failing," she said. "So you look for assurances that our gratitude will not be short-lived."

"You took an oath after the Graveyard," I said, "when you put that sword in the ground. I don't believe you the kind of woman to go back on it."

"But," Rozala replied.

"We will have business, you and I, when I sit in Cardinal and you in Salia," I said.

And I did not have the kind of rapport with Rozala Malanza that I did with Cordelia Hasenbach – who, for all that we had faced off for years, had become someone I trusted in our own way. Considering that Procer would be pivotal to the survival of the Accords one way or another, it meant I needed to have a second look at the dark-haired beauty before me: not as Cordelia's general and rival, but instead as a First Princess in her own right. Rozala narrowed her eyes at me.

"Let me speak plainly, then," the princess said. "We will never be friends, Catherine Foundling."

Her jaw clenched.

"I believe you cruel and cavalier with lives as well as deeply conceited," Rozala Malanza harshly said. "That the Gods have seen fit to reward you for this is the misfortune of our age."

I did not blink, waiting for her to finish.

"But you keep your word," the Princess of Aquitan reluctantly added. "And treaties made with you can be trusted. Procer will stand behind the Accords, even if arms must be twisted."

"I have heard promises before," I warned, "and they died stillborn on the floor of the Assembly."

Rozala's face hardened.

"Procer," she said, "will not be what it was. It cannot be."

She rested a hand on her belly.

"I will not bring my daughter into the world I knew as a girl," Rozala Malanza swore. "The chaos, the petty wars and the knives. Hasenbach had the right of that: there is rot in the Principate and it must be burned out."

My eye narrowed.

"And what will you do about it?" I asked.

"Open your ears," Rozala said, "after the crown is set on my brow."

I left, as she'd tacitly told me to, and an hour later found myself leaning against the gallery railing while the people of Salia shouted themselves hoarse. After the criers and resonance spells had made known Cordelia's abdication there had been cries of dismay, for though her reign had not been without troubles and riots she was a comfortingly steady hand. They had turned to cheers soon enough, though, when Rozala's election was announced. She was a popular woman, her victories in the north well known while the black marks on her record were long forgotten.

Cordelia Hasenbach herself set the crown of white gold on her successor's head, the two of them matching gazes as she did.

When the First Princess of Procer stepped forward afterwards, to the edge of the platform, I felt spells bloom all around us. Scrying mirrors, I realized after catching sight of one of them from the glint of the sun reflected, though where they led I could not be sure. Rozala had a good speaking voice and the promises she gave out were the kind a beleaguered people could cheer at: driving out the dead, restoring order and peace to Procer. After that, though, things took a turn and I found myself leaning forward in interest.

"- and so as we begin our march on Keter I ask: where are the princes and princesses of the south?"

Murmurs, unease.

"Again and again," Rozala Malanza called out, "we have sown the seeds of our own defeat. Schemes and grasping hands, betrayals and cowardice Shame at every turn.. Even as the Hidden Horror closes his grip on Procer, these parasites hide in their palaces and leave the rest of us to burn."

A shiver went through the crowd. Like she'd touched a finger to the pulse of the fury just under the surface.

"No longer," the First Princess said. "I give you this oath now: those who call themselves princes and do not march to save Procer are princes no longer. All their families I attaint, all their holdings I declare forfeit. When the moon turns, all who will not hold a sword to save the Principate will be cast out of it until Last Dusk."

The city went wild, the clamour of shouts and stamping feet shaking the walls. And now I knew where those scrying mirrors went: the First Princess had, on the day of her coronation, thrown a gauntlet to every crown in Procer.

Pick it up, Rozala Malanza had said, or I will drag you off your thrones by the hair.

"Yeah," I murmured, smiling down at her from the gallery. "You'll do."

—

Hierophant arrived in Salia early, late on the night of the coronation instead of early in the morning. I offered to delay our departure so he could have a night's sleep in a proper bed, but he would have none of it.

"It makes no difference to me," Masego told me. "And time is of the essence, you have been telling me."

"You just want to get your grubby fingers on the godhead of the Crows as quickly as possible," I accused.

"That too," he shamelessly agreed.

He did want to spend a few hours with Indrani before leaving, though, as she wouldn't be coming with us despite her protests to the contrary. I wanted her keeping an eye on the Barrow Sword, whose seat as representative was still too fresh to be anywhere near secure. I encouraged him to, as much because I loved them both as because I needed some time to get the last of my affairs in order. I sent word that I would be leaving tonight instead of tomorrow to all those who needed to know, then talked Vivienne into a late supper with me. Hakram was out of the city, settling a dispute between two clans out east, so a message would have to do.

After my pack and goodbyes were done, I went to find the third companion that would come north with me. Akua was not far, having been amusing herself over the last few days by turning the flying tower where I'd become the Warden into what she called 'a proper throne' in between going into the slums of Salia to offer healing against the diseases that kept sprouting up in the crowded hovels. Some of them could not be wiped out entirely by Light.

"Did you know, darling, that most villains only ever encounter a single godhead in their lives?" she told me. "You are something of an overachiever in that regard."

"It's the Crows again, so it doesn't count as a new one," I argued.

Though it was novel for her to actually need supplies now — as well as clothes, since she could no longer a shade who could change her wardrobe with a thought — she'd had most of them set aside already. If anything, she had seemed eager to head out to Serolen. When I asked, she turned thoughtful.

"I've always felt the business to be unfinished," Akua said. "It is good to settle all of one's affairs properly."

Yeah, I felt it too. It was time to bring to a close the journey that'd begun in the outskirts of the Everdark. We were nearly ready to leave, horses saddled – well, Zombie for me – and our route out of the capital picked out when there was a commotion just out the palace. I looked through the Night, one of my hundred dead eyes, and cocked an eyebrow. Moments later, Cordelia Hasenbach rode in atop one of those sturdy horses the Lycaonese favoured. She had saddlebags and she was dressed to travel.

"Going somewhere?" I idly asked.

"I believe she means to come with us, Catherine," Masego told me.

He sounded a little surprised I hadn't caught on to that. Mercifully, Cordelia was not one of the Woe so she did not take the golden opportunity to mock me as one of them would have.

"I thought it best to make my offer for Keter directly to Sve Noc," the Lycaonese princess said.

She was still Prince of Rhenia and Princess of Hannover, at least for now. The papers to pass on the crowns to Otto Redcrown and turn him into the sole ruler of the Lycaonese were already ready and signed, I'd been told. They were only waiting so it wouldn't look like Rozala was stripping her predecessor of the titles.

"That could be done by scrying mirror," I replied, unimpressed. "The First Princess wants you out of the capital, I take it."

"We are in agreement that my looking over her shoulder as she begins her reign would benefit neither of us," Cordelia replied.

"And how does that lead to your riding with us?" I pressed.

"I thought you might be in favour of my presence," the princess mildly said, "since it will allow you to keep an eye on this."

Reaching inside her cloak, she presented a baton of sculpted ivory. It was beautifully made, but aside from that there was – no, not quite right. There was something at the heart of it, I thought, dead eye seeing a glimpse of something like Light. I shot her an inquisitive look.

"It is," Cordelia Hasenbach told me, "the device that triggers the ealamal."

I smothered a grimace. Yeah, she had me there. I wasn't letting that out of my sight if I could help it. I'd already figured there must be an artefact serving the purpose but the Jacks had not unearthed anything when they looked into it.

"I don't suppose I could talk you into breaking that," I said.

"No," she pleasantly replied.

"Welcome to our little band, then," I sighed.

"It is," Cordelia victoriously smiled, "my great pleasure."

elanevensong

Yay! Thanks for the chapter

nimelennar

Oof.

If the entire continent, including Callow, the League, Praes, and a reunified Procer, march against the Dead King, that's a very, very powerful story.

This, of course, means that something is about to go terribly wrong.

letouriste

you forgot the giants (and probably the Titan), the dwarfs and the drows 😊

Ciara

And you forgot the elves!

nimelennar

I don't think the dwarfs are in yet.

Rey d`Tutto

They go to settle the Drow. Sereolen(sp?) is the Drow capital, where the D are fighting the Dead King.

Levi Kalden

Lucky us, its not our problem if the protagonist isn't there to see to it

Liliet

BEST BEST BEST BEST BEST BEST BEST

I AM GIFTED A GIFT TODAY AND I LOVE IT VERY MUCH

Cpt. Obvious

Even reading this many months after you posted it raises my spirit to witness your joy!

ruduen

Boost!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

You know, I expected a band heading out with Catherine. But my money would've been on a standard Band of Five, with more Named in the group. Does the compatriot formerly known as the First Prince fit into such a band? Would it just be a group made with the expectation that one or two more will fill in as they go? Or are they just skipping on the five entirely if this is entirely a villain story at this point?

nick012000

I think it might be five? Akua was going to be Cat's third companion, with Masego the first or second, so with Cordelia it makes five once you add in Cat herself. I dunno who the non-Masego member of the first two is

caoimhinh

Yeah, Cordelia joining the trip is just weird. Not only are her arguments for going quite flimsy, but it is actually detrimental for her to leave. She, as one of the most skilled administrators in the Principate and the person who is most informed about everything going on throughout the realm, is needed right now. But she is suddenly going to be absent instead of smoothing the transition or supporting Rozala in the many things that are needed so Procer doesn't collapse.

Plus, shouldn't the artifact be now in the hands of the new First Prince? She is keeping it as her own personal weapon instead of something that belongs to the nation. So much for the advocate of systems and institutions over personal power.

Cordelia's hypocrisy never ends, I see.

Linnus42

I mean Cordelia is an eternal Hypocrite nothing new there. Clearly angling to secure herself more unearned power despite being too good for a Name.

kinigget

Having her sticking around would be purely detrimental, given that it would look like she was trying to maintain her power despite having abdicated. As for the staff, would you trust something like that to be kept in a nation's armory? Better that it stays in hands that have been proven trustworthy, leaving aside the story pitfalls leaving it lying around entails. You act like she's keeping it for her own personal benefit, this is not only deeply uncharitable, but against what we know about her.

SeventhSolar

Cordelia is trained and practiced in the use of the Ealamal, I believe. Ever since she first used it when the Dead King broke into the the Assembly Chamber, the Ealamal has been an artifact tied directly to Cordelia Hasenbach, rather than to the Principate.

Salt

Have to disagree complete here. I'm not a Cordelia fan, I think everyone here knows this as an obvious fact, but her going with Cat isn't just sensible but absolutely necessary. Mostly because Sve Noc is about to be asked to give up fucking Keter to the Kingdom Under. I'm not sure if it can be understated how serious that is in their point of view, the Sisters are going to be utterly apoplectic about it for completely valid reasons.

They're being asked to cede the crown jewel of the dead king's lands; something they and the Drow earned after giving up the Underdark, taking their entire peoples to the surface, having a significant portion of them – many of their greatest – massacred fighting the Dead King, having their Godhead sundered by the Dead King, and now also needing to risk the source of their original Godhead to break the Bard's grip on Evil stories.

The Sisters have basically risked and suffered catastrophic losses in Every. Single. Thing. that matters to them and their peoples, entirely on a leap of faith, in the face of genocidal Armageddon from both the Dead King and the Kingdom Under. Now, the same nation that plotted to betray them during the literal end of the world just made an agreement on their behalf, with the Gods-damned Kingdom Under, to yet again take away the crown jewel of what their entire peoples bled and died for.

In a personal sense, the Sisters and the Drow absolutely do have the right and do deserve to hear it from Cordelia directly, rather than a secondhand message or ritual. They've gone so far above and beyond what they can be reasonably expected to give that every inch of fury they'd muster at this latest development is 10,000% justified and beyond. The Crows are the goddesses of theft in murder, not the goddesses of bleeding themselves dry out of selfless sacrifice for the sake of nations that tried to destroy their entire peoples.

In a Story sense, there's so much weight already built up behind this that it's near impossible for this to pass without some serious narrative consequences coming out of someone's hide. That someone is very likely to be the office that Cordelia holds and/or other signatory nations like Procer.

Honestly at this point if Cordelia herself doesn't guarantee their dues to be paid with as much story weight behind it as possible, Below would probably be narratively justified in ripping it out of Creation itself to make sure they get their due. Which they absolutely would do with glee, the very instant this large of a debt is called into account from a nation whose entire identity is an altar to Below.

Linnus42

You see I buy that more if bringing Cordelia was Cat's Plan. Also whole Dwarf Action plan and giving them Keter was more Hanno's plan no so wouldn't they want it to hear it from him. Well you can say Hanno is needed for the War but Heroes can travel pretty fast via Arcadia or Twilight anyway. And one could also say Rozala needs a political crash course from Cordelia.

Does Cordelia really care that much about the Drow being screwed in this plan though? Cordelia just showed up for this mission and used as leverage a super weapon (that her own supposed philosophy says she has no more claim to). It seems more to me that Cordelia is not happy having basically no power and is trying to leverage a super weapon that she argued should be under the sole control of the Proceran Government and the First Prince to advance her own agenda. Not cause she cares about Sve Noc being mad. Not to mention I really don't expect Sve Noc to give a frak about an apology from Cordelia, they expect to get screwed by Procer. But also Cordelia has no real political power in Procer anymore or leverage over the Dwarves to right any wrongs. She has nothing to offer Sve Noc.

But really the main issue is Cordelia's hypocrisy. She cares about laws, regulations and institutions only so far as she can use them against her rivals. When they seek to bind her she breaks them, ignores them, etc. Her political philosophy use to "When the First Prince does it, its not illegal" now its "When I do it, its not Illegal" Cordelia has always leaned Villain in my book though.

Also speaking of the Angel weapon whatever happened to the speculation about how that angel weapon would work with a sealed choir? That was a major question and the answer is it works just fine? Its like EE discarded that plot point to warp the plot to make Cordelia look good.

chris S

"Also speaking of the Angel weapon whatever happened to the speculation about how that angel weapon would work with a sealed choir? That was a major question and the answer is it works just fine? Its like EE discarded that plot point to warp the plot to make Cordelia look good."

In this very chapter The League discusses the Hierarch returning being a factor for the League's admittance into the Accords. Methinks this plot point maybe isn't quite as done and dusted as we've all just assumed.

Salt

It doesn't matter how much remorse she does or doesn't have or what her overall character is here. It mattered when considering her for Warden because it would be an indicator of what her overall Wardenship would be like and shape the Role itself might take

Neither is the case for this one. This is a clear cut instance where it simply makes practical and personal sense for the particular negotiation. It's a matter of all involved parties showing proper regard and respect for the Sisters and the Drow by at the very least going personally when asking for something this severe, as well as filling a narrative necessity.

She's not particularly virtuous, no. That's the realm of Heroes. That's also not important right now, because what's going to matter to the firstborn right now is the most relevant people holding themselves accountable for making sure this leap of faith isn't going to end up with a knife in their back, not whether or not the representatives have the most golden principles. Different needs for different situations.

Her not being particularly virtuous compared to the likes of Roland or Hanno, doesn't mean every single thing she does is wrong. The same way Black being vicious and callous to an extreme didn't mean every single thing he did was evil.

mavant

Given their noted propensity for looting corpses, perhaps Cordelia means to offer the ealamal to Sve Noc in the bargain for Keter.

Liliet

Smoothing the transition for Rozala is the explicitly stated reason FOR her absence. I assume she has prettied up everything administrative ahead of time, and now's the time for her to make herself genuinely & also conspicuously scarce and not in position to influence Rozana's new reign in any way.

nimelennar

I don't think Cordelia can count towards a Band of Five; Cat notes that she seems to have relinquished her claim on any sort of Name.

Kletanio

A standard Band of Five (in outside media) can always include one Badass Normal, right?

nimelennar

Hmmm. That's an interesting question. If someone steps into a Role of "Badass Normal," would they get a Name for it, or would the Role itself preclude the Name?

Liliet

Catherine wasn't Named when she joined the Twilight Liesse band. Name is not important, Role is. If anything one can get a Name FROM joining a band of five.

Cpt. Obvious

Late thoughts...

At the time they set out the stories for villains are still silenced, so a band of five doesn't add any story based boost.

Which makes me wonder if there are any reason for mixed bands like we've seen earlier. Would the Heroes of such a band receive any benefit beyond the added abilities of the villains?

Feels like these mixed bands weren't considered to be an option by the Gods who drew up the templates for the stories. Well on the other hand they were probably not expecting to have their Bard go corrupt, the Heroic stories stole by a Villain or the villainous stories silenced so...

Tenthyr

My my, Catherine is maturing an aspect that will turn any command Spoken three times into an unviolatable law.

Hard to beat that as a way to curtail a Named abusing their power.

megaprr

I would say Decree... but given that that used to be one of the Saint of Swords' aspects I think perhaps not.

Looking at synonyms.... There's Order (meh), Proclaim (bit too ostentatious), Declare (I like), Command (I like, but less), Dictate (bit too dictatorial), Impose (I like less), Compel (bit too mind-controllly), Constrain (meh),

caoimhinh

Sentence

megaprr

wow how did I not think of that... seems pretty spot on!

Rynjin

I like the sound of "Discipline", as that's the way she's been using it, to punish and teach a lesson to those who cross her.

tmchin75723

If it were discipline, it wouldn't really fit with how it was used this chapter. She's not making the dwarf shut up to improve his behavior, she's doing it to give herself an advantage.

Rynjin

I disagree. She's using it to put him in his place. If he doesn't learn his lesson (not to speak out of turn in front of his betters), the punishments get harsher and harsher.

shikkarasu

Rein

letouriste

how about just Speak

mavant

If it's Proclaim, I hope she orders someone to walk five hundred miles.

Mike E.

And then make them walk 500 more...

ninegardens

Just to be that man who walked 500 miles...

Black Spiral Dancer

I would bet the aspect will be named "Lock" or "Bind". I favour the first but I understand the second might be used.

erebus42

Well now, it seems Cordelia is in for a little adventure. Only now the things that go bump in the Night aren't only gonna be coming to stab her in her beliefs...

edrey

Great chapter
all the world against Keter, Now a new Drow arc, but this band of five lack one person; who would be?

Kletanio

[illegible]

Reaper

Agreed
Rumena is a sass master on pqr with Archer, and can keep up with Hakram on dryness.
He fills the two positions.

Insanenoodlyguy

This is a finishing of old buisness. There was another there for most of that journey, and now that we again journey to the heart of things Drow, I'd be shocked if Ivah isn't back soon.

Juff

Typo Thread:

There were a lot (extra space)
They two of > The two of Basali > Balasi me ignorance > me of ignorance go pas them, > go past them,
No all > No, all contingent of a > contingent or a shine off > shine of I did not take > It did not take cheaper drunk > cheaper drink labyrinth complexities > labyrinthine complexities Keter – I had no > Keter – but I had no turn.. > turn.

could no longer > was no longer

ninegardens

I'm... confused.

Why are they taking Salia's current nuclear defence... our of Salia?

Shouldn't it be given to the new queen?

Why does Cordy still have it?

Also, Rozalia and her boy continue to be great.

caoimhinh

A) Because Cordelia is a hypocrite who for all her talk about systems and institutions, actually has no faith nor trust in those, and only believes in her own judgement and capacity.

B) Because Cordelia joining Catherine's journey to Serolen makes no sense whatsoever. She has no real reason for going to meet Sve Noc, and she is a liability with zero combat strength. Worse, she is actually needed in Procer, but she is leaving just because she feels like it?

Cordelia is direly needed in Procer right now, and her leaving all of a sudden is practically throwing a lot of stuff over Rozala (things that Rozala has no idea about, since she was away in other tasks) and saying "good luck", as if the marathon of administrative and diplomatic tasks that plagued Cordelia's every waking hour was suddenly no more, or it didn't need to be properly explained to the successor to smooth the process. She should have stayed and served as Rozala's advisor and properly pass down the responsibilities and convey the details of all the things going on in the Principate, all the plans and measures taken for the sustenance of the realm.

But noooo, let's leave it all in Rozala's hand, and just as icing on the cake, let's leave with the key to the use of the nation's ultimate weapon.

Amostyx

C) I'm not sure they can use the ealamal at the moment. Salia is filled/surrounded with all the allied forces of the Grand Alliance, the vast majority of which haven't been judged by the angel previously. Triggering the nuclear option now would probably do more harm than good.

I think the villains are camped an appropriate distance away from Salia, but I'm not sure about that.

aurikdomi

Pretty sure Rozala isn't staying in the capital either, but leading the armies marching against the crown of the dead. Also we don't know the limitations or workings of the artifact yet. Does it activate the angel corpse? is it the angel corpse? can it channel power in a more targeted but smaller fashion? who knows

ninegardens

Cordy is getting a lot of hate in these comments lately.

Honestly, I don't think she's any MORE of a hypocrit than our protagonist. Both Cordy and Cat lead large countries, and are forced to make frequent compromises. Both have their blindspots, their personal faults.

Both try to do Goodish things, and wish to be something more. And both have failed... time and time again... often through their own stupid.

shrug

devildragon777

It can't be used at the moment without potentially annihilating a good (Evil?) third to half of the GA in/around Salia to begin with. Cordelia is effectively being told to get out of the way during the transition, so it's either bring it along where Cat can keep her eye on the nuke button, or leave it with Rozala, who at this point knows and was involved with barely anything to do with the Ealamal. Guess which one C & C prefer!

There isn't really a range limit to the remote that we know of, so it might be possible for Cordelia to activate it even if she isn't specifically there. Or the priests around the angel corpse might be able to finagle something if necessary.

Agent J

There was a comment somewhere that Cordy might be intent on trading it to Sve Noc for Keter. Which could be an interesting development.

Linnus42

I mean what was the point of spending so much time on who gets Severance if the resolution was obvious and offscreen. Could have at least had a tournament or heard Christophe's speech.

Dwarf Resolution goes the way Hanno expected. Which quite frankly suggest that Hanno very much didn't need to cut the deal he did at all. Without Cat's biased intervention (would she have pulled that if she thought Cordelia was going to win?) He Could have taken the whole pie and left Cordelia with nothing...though we see why that be a bad idea cause she do something crazy.

Cordelia shows herself to be a massive hypocrite. Jumps on the Sve Noc mission to chase personal power and shows her distrust of institutions (not under her personal control) by keeping the nuclear launch codes for herself instead of turning them over to the right ruler of Procer, Rozala. That sounds like High Treason perhaps she should be hung? But Cordelia has gone from when the First Prince does it, its not illegal to when Cordelia does it its not illegal. Clearly, Cordelia is angling for a Non Named power up from somewhere and her main chip is something she should no longer have access to period. Is it really a sacrifice if she immediately tries to circumvent it? Also really Cordelia could act at a consultant and give Rozala a political crash course since we know Rozala aint great at it.

Agent J

"He Could have taken the whole pie and left Cordelia with nothing"

How did you miss... literally the whole point of the last mini-arc? Hanno is not Cat's equal and did not have the full support of Good behind him. Catherine could have "taken the whole pie" as well by eating the book without bargain, but in either scenario, they'd be marching off to face the DK on a hobbled leg.

As for leaving Salia, fucking Malanza herself doesn't want her around looming over her shoulder. In order to have a smooth transition of power, power needs to actually transition. Cordy sticking around doing effectively the same job is not that. Just like Ishaq, Rozala wants to solidify her new position and so Cordy leaving is explicitly to her benefit (and preference, let's be honest, she hates Cordy even more than you).

As for the ealamal, I'm hoping she plans to sell it to Sve Noc in exchange for Keter. Because otherwise, I have no idea what they can offer that would be worth losing ANOTHER FUCKING HOME to the same genocidal fucking "Hero" and his genocidal fucking Kingdom Under. I hope she's not just going their to bat her eyelashes and ask sweetly. She needs an actual offer and, oh, hey, she's brought an angel corpse with her. I wonder what those fetch for? (Well, she brought the launch codes, but whatevs.)

ninegardens

...

...

Holy shit.

Can Sve Nok Eat an angel?

I mean.... They are running low on power, thanks to being mauled recently...

And they are the goddess of "Theft in victory".

And... it would bring a certain amount of balance to their light/dark side.

In other bussiness, why haven't we handed the drow the Twilight ways yet?

A place without noon?

Giving them juristiction over it would be the "fair" if you taking Keter.

kinigget

You are missing the point entirely about Hanno. Sure, maybe his plan would have worked, but letting him do that and become Warden of the East would still have fundamentally weakened Good and driven a giant wedge between the Heroes and the people they're supposed to protect.

And where in the name of hellfire are you getting the idea that Cordelia is chasing personal power? Hell, the reason she had to leave Salia was to prevent those exact optics. She has nothing better to do, can accomplish some goals on the way, and keeps the angel nuke away from anyone who would misuse it.

Steel and Elaborate Insult

Cordelia Hasenbach: Gives up the sovereignty of the largest nation on the surface, her ancestral titles whose history drive her very being, the Name that would most assuredly make her personally powerful

Commenters on this Web serial: She cares about nothing but personal power!!!oneone!eleven

Steel and Elaborate Insult

I mean, say what you like about a woman who was born to privilege, bred to assume authority, and lived an entire life in the lap of luxury, but she's not Louis Rohanon or Abreha Mirembe.

Liliet

Louis Rohanon?

Linnus42

She was gave up being First Prince trying to score a more powerful position. She failed.

She kept the super weapon control so she could leverage it for more power not to protect it lol. Cordelia is the one after all who made a big deal about getting mad about Tariq killing the villagers despite not having the right. She claims you have to have the ascent of the governed (even though that loosely applies to Nobles) and yet keeps the super weapon. The weapon belongs to the state of Procer and the first prince should have control is Cordelia's argument when she is first prince. But when she is not first prince, she thinks she deserves to keep the weapon? That is the problem with Cordelia, she believes in rules, laws and institutions when they apply to others not herself.

shikkarasu

She gave up being First Prince to accomplish a goal. She never wanted to be Warden of the West, she was tricked into thinking it was necessary. This was covered in Occidental IV. Just about everyone in this story fights for personal power, but that's how the world is changed. Once Hanno pointed out that she didn't need to be WotW she stopped caring about the Name.

I don't think she's a control freak, no more than Catherine at the very least, but after her conversation with Auger she realised that in order to change the country to something better she'd have to start stepping on toes and burning bridges. Cardinal is simply the best opportunity to keep working at her reforms, so of course she gave up everything she had left for it.

As for the Angel Stick, I wouldn't leave that in the hands of someone like Rozala. Love the First Princess, Long May She Reign, but she is a General first and a ruler second. Rozala may be entitled to the weapon, but she can't be using it with the army in Salia, anyway.

Salt

Not to mention that said angel stick is a metaphysical semi-magical Nuke that's a giant narrative risk by way of being a dubiously controllable power, of foreign origins, that they understand little of, and which would be devastating if something were to coincidentally happen to it. Exactly the kind of gigantic narrative weak spot that entities like the Bard like to exploit. It only makes sense to make sure the most obvious point of failure – the trigger – isn't left too far away from the supervision someone that can combat the Bard.

Leaving the trigger for it in Rozala's hands is like leaving your five year old child alone to guard your house, while knowing full well that Genghis Khan is roaming around just waiting for a chance to burn your house down. Rozala wouldn't be able to see the Bard coming if the Bard was actively strangling her neck.

Even if the Bard takes a different approach, this way they at least have a metaphysical link to the weapon to do something about it remotely.

Reader in the Night

I mean, by this argument, Cat really should just take the Nuke's launch codes for herself by force. Cordelia's squishy as hell, Catherine is much better suited for actually defending it from misuse.

By the argument of actual lawful right... Catherine might have a claim as well, not sure. Or Rozala might, but Cordelia certainly doesn't.

Skaddix

Yeah my complaint has two parts.
Is this a good idea for Cordelia to use the Angel Exterminatus as Leverage with Sve Noc for something. We can table that part though.

Is this action consistent with Cordelia's supposed ideology that we got told this very arc. So I am not buying well her thoughts evolved over night. Cordelia's whole ideology is not might makes right. Its that the state using its rules, regulations and laws should control and constrain "Special People" mostly Named with a focus on Heroes from Cordelia. So by her own argument who holds the nuclear football should be determined by the state of Procer and its First Prince or by the High Officers of the Grand Alliance. Cordelia alone by her own argument doesn't get sole discretion over it anymore since she is no longer First Prince and not even a Prince. Ergo she is hypocrite because she doesn't care about the laws, rules and regulations when she is out of power and said laws, rules and regulations restrict her. She is acting like the Heroes she whines about despite supposedly being opposed to special rules for special people. Which suggest she only held her previous ideology cause she was in power given how quickly she discarded it when she lost power. Whether Rozala can be trusted as Cordelia's defenders argue is irrelevant though I see no special reason not to trust Rozala.

Cautiously Skeptical

Um...I'm pretty sure Cordelia is the only one who has the narrative weight and practice to potentially use the thing safely? Which coupled with the number of 'Evil' people in the army Rozala is leading means Cordelia is probably the best person for the job.

Because this isn't a choice between "Cordelia, the former First Prince", and "Rozala, the current First Prince" potentially using the thing.

It's between "Cordelia, the person who has reliably held Proccer together and been trained for this" and "Unnamed mage guy no.3 who has almost no narrative weight or authority but does understand the stick" holding and potentially using the thing.

Rozala's trustworthiness isn't in question, it's her literal capability and whether leaving it with her rather than under the eye of the person who built it and one of the most powerful Named on the planet is a good idea. Especially since Cat is one of the few who could reasonably assess whether using it at any given moment is sure to backfire horribly.

Additionally, something basically everyone is ignoring when talking about this, there is no indication that Rozala didn't know and agree to Cordelia taking the stick, which handily sidesteps the issue of legal ownership. This is a constitutional monarchy, Rozala is now the primary ruler, it's likely entirely up to her how military assets are deployed. It's a national weapon, likely under heavy guard for obvious reasons, and while the control method is secret the existence of one is pretty deducible so it wouldn't make sense for her not to have at least some idea of it.

There was probably a conversation along the lines of: "I need you to leave the main force/Salia for awhile so no one questions my authority"

"Of course. I will accompany the Warden to explain to the literal gods why we've given away part of their territory, since I'm actually a trained diplomat and I don't believe anyone else going is suitable for that role. I've gotten most everything ready for you here, although there is the matter of the angel-stick. I was one of the few who knew how to use it, but I've been told that using or holding a weapon of great power without appropriate training is basically asking providence to beat you over the head with it. Who do you want to take care of that?"

"I can't use it near the main force anyway and it's going to be a while before we need it. Take it with you, no one will expect me to trust you with this and it will be safer than in my hands."

"You don't trust me."

"I trust you to do what you believe is best for Proccer and the world."

And so Cordelia gets given the paper with the nuclear launch codes because she is one of the very few capable of using them and also leaving that lying around is asking to be compromised.

No legal issues, very few ethical ones, just a woman who has ceded power acknowledging the power of the new First Prince over her by leaving peacefully to ensure a smooth transition of power and taking the potentially dangerous weapon along because it was agreed to.

(Yes, she might have suggested that she take the stick, rather than Rozala doing so as above, but I still very much doubt she did it without talking to the First Prince at all)

AbraKadabra

WHO says that Cordy does not act on Rozalaz orders?

kinigget

This is at least the third time I've seen you make these statements that run directly counter to the actual text. At this point I can only assume you are deliberately ignoring anything that doesn't line up with your weird grudge against Cordelia. By all means, you are allowed to not like a character or what they stand for, but you do both the work and the author a disservice by reading selectively like this.

SpeckofStardust

The angel nuke button is going with the party that's ultimately facing bard.

As a non-named she Cordelia could legit be useful in that regard. Also with the Drow and dwarves the only power to not help in this war is the elves.

So plots that might come up before the end-

Final bard fight.

Elf intervention.

Drow politics.

Hierarch's return to creation.

Fun talks between Alaya and Cordelia, Dead King and Cat.

ninegardens

Chilling out, and just fricking nuke Korosiv.

Cordelia: "What? You wanted to get rid of him? Right?"

DC

The gnomes are still a thing too, although they are fine as a background explanation for the tech level

ohJohN

They're not a Calernian power though, they're based elsewhere in the world and only show up rarely to enforce their technology ban. I wouldn't count the Yan Tei, Baalites, Asadal, etc. for the same reason, and it seems like they've had more/more recent contact with Calernia. (The elves also came from abroad, but they've been living here for millennia now so they count.)

ohJohN

Ashur hasn't contributed anything to the war on Keter specifically, since they got rekt right before it started, but at least some Ashuran Named are part of the forces.

And is nobody gonna mention the rats?? 🤪

Zahariel

There is something I have just noticed. Here are the forces now involved in the Crusade against the Dead King :

Callow

Procer

Praes

The Orc Clans

The Everdark Empire

Levant

The League of Free Cities

The Dwarves

Notice something ? There are eight of them. That is, "seven and one". An alliance of seven and one nations/polities against the Dead King ... that's powerful story stuff, I think.

Of course, I may be completely wrong, have forgotten something, or just be looking too deeply into this.

ANCT

I think the pattern is a good call, but a few things are wrong. One, the Orcs are still a part of Praes. Two, you forgot the Titans appear to be taking part. They would fit the one quite well

Liliet

Gigantes.

Daniel E

I hope Sve Noc gets a happy ending here, they have definitely earned it. They've been sorely under-appreciated; so much of the shenanigans Cat has pulled would not be possible without the magical battery that is Night.

Alex

Not sure if I missed it, but why is Rozala "First Princess" instead of "First Prince" like Cordelia? I recall that Cordelia was correcting someone for calling her a princess at some point, and explaining why "First Prince" was the proper title.

megaprr

That was because of a quirk in Lycanoese laws if I recall correctly. They never amended it to recognize the Princess title, so Cordelia went with Prince instead.

Liliet

First Prince is what Cordelia called herself out of Lycaonese pride. Normally First Prince/Princess is gendered.

Reader in the Night

The one thing I question about Cordy going on the mission with them is in terms of danger. They're heading into a brewing Firstborn civil war, and Cordelia is useless in a fight even by civilian standards. And it's not like the Firstborn are above assassination or taking her hostage, either.

Cordelia is awesome at politics and she might even be useful to solve the Firstborn civil war, but the Firstborn are the most individual-power-by-square-capita race in Western Calernia, and they're very violence-inclined. If it turns into a fight, the rest of the party will have to fight while bodyguarding Cordelia.

Liliet

> Cordelia is useless in a fight even by civilian standards

I actually genuinely don't think so.

She's Lycaonese, trained with weapons (and I'd bet that out of these four she's the one with the monst experience knowledge & skill in wilderness camping lolz). She's demonstrated that she can keep a cool head in a combat situation, see alternate routes and execute them (the coup arc). She has potential to be as good as a non-Named non-professional-warrior can even BE on a trip like this.

Sure, she doesn't have the >9000 power level that it takes to fight Mighty. And they will have to bodyguard her some. But there's wayyyyy worse candidates to be stuck bodyguarding.

Rey d`Tutto

When they throw themselves out of the way before you have to...?
Priceless.

Frivolous

I like that Catherine can deduce things about the Herald's character, his nature and relationships, simply by looking at what stories flow from him.

It's a very considering power, too. She looked for stories that flow from Balasi's death. That's a thinker power equivalent to Kairos's Wish.

It's just too bad that that capacity is not proven to work on regular people. If it only works on Named, it has limited utility.

Vyole

Is that a casual reference to Basilia being trans? I absolutely adore the way LGBT people are casually scattered throughout the story without being anything to remark on

Frivolous

Yeah Basilia being trans has been hinted way back. This may be the first time it's been outright stated, though.

Liliet

I mean, it was about as outright stated back then as it is now. EE doesn't bring terminology into this but the hints are transparent.

softle

I very much appreciate that we got this second hinting on a chapter named "passing"

DC

The thought just came to me that Cat was able to get a sense of the Herald's stories without him being present.

I wonder what would happen if she tried that trick on the Hierarchy?

SuitorShooter

"and apparently Bellerophon's citizen militia was debating just staying in the Twilight Ways the whole time.

There would, I was informed, be a vote."

Gods, I've missed Bellerophon.

David Stone

First and Mightiest of the Free Cities, May She Reign Forever.

heffalumps

rreh? hope EE is all right... this is an awfully long time between chapters. 😊 unless there was an announcement somewhere I missed?

Rynjin

EE's sick, skipped a couple of updates to recover, be back on track soon.

heffalumps

good to know, thank you! ♥

Chapter 42: Journey

"A journey is one of those magical events that are turned into either an eternity or a heartbeat by the quality of one's companions."

– Aldred Alban of Callow, the Prince Errant

It was pretty clear that Cordelia had not been on a day-long ride in years, but to her honour even as she became pained she did not let out so much as a single complaint. Masego filled in the gap in whining, having always despised horse riding with a vengeance and not grown to like it in the slightest over the years, but of all people Akua came to the rescue.

"My own body is not yet fully accustomed to riding," she told him. "As I've only had it for a few months."

"It is very nice," Masego told her, looking her up and down shamelessly.

There'd been about as much sexual tension in that look as in a visit to a healer's tent to get your boils treated, not that it stopped Cordelia's eyes from slightly widening. I sighed.

"He's talking about the homunculus nature of the body," I whispered at her.

It was made with magic, which made probably would make this the first pair of tits he'd actually be interested in looking at. In all fairness, if you had to pick one pair in all of Creation you could do much worse than Akua Sahelian.

"How sweet of you," Akua replied, not batting an eye. "But it still needs breaking in, which is why I have been using a spell to ease my time in the saddle."

Huh. Hadn't known that. Hadn't felt it either, but that was not entirely a surprise: a mage of Akua's calibre was capable of hiding smaller workings from my senses if they did it on purpose. She offered to teach him the spell and he eagerly agreed, then took pity on Cordelia and offered to cast it for her as well.

"So that you might gauge the difference," Akua smiling offered.

I saw the Prince of Rhenia seriously consider refusing her out of principle, but saddle-sore was saddle-sore. The spell was applied and we quickened our pace again, riding north through the Twilight Ways. It was hard to tell how good a time we were making: from a distance, the starlit compass was vaguer. I could only tell we were progressing, not at what rate. Not yet anyway.

Though the company we'd assembled was unusual – 'the Black Queen, the First Prince, the Hierophant and the Doom of Liesse walk into a bar', there was a premise – the travelling itself was smooth. I sometimes took Zombie on flights ahead, as much to bag some game as to cure her restlessness, and the addition of quail and rabbit to the cookpot was welcome. It was our custom to rotate the chore, which led to occasional bouts of the surreal. Sending the former First Prince of Procer out to gather firewood while the Doom of Liesse made biryani chicken for four felt like some sort of deranged waking dream.

Masego seemed entirely nonplussed, not that I'd expected anything else. I doubted Zeze would bat an eye even if the entire Choir of Judgment made him morning eggs, so long as they weren't over-salted.

Three days in, as Akua went to gather firewood and Masego went about skinning the pair of rabbits I'd caught with a disturbing amount of skill – much easier than people, he'd told me with a horrifyingly well-meaning smile when I'd commented on it – I found my eyes following Cordelia's hand. Or, more specifically, the ivory baton they were holding. The command rod for the ealamal. I knew it was real. I'd asked Masego, and there was no fake anyone in her service would have been able to make that'd fool his eye.

"You stare at it whenever it is near my hand," Cordelia said.

"And that surprises you?" I replied. "It's a lot of power bound to a pretty small object."

She settled herself more comfortably against the fallen log, adjusting so it wouldn't dig into her back.

"Not so much more than you could bring to bear, given time to prepare," she said.

I snorted.

"Yeah, no," I told her. "That's not comparable, Hasenbach. Maybe with the Crows personally guiding my hand I could bring down something vaguely in the same league, but it'd kill me for sure."

"You veiled the sun itself in Iserre," Cordelia skeptically replied.

"I mimicked the effect of an eclipse, temporarily, for a small part of Iserre," I corrected. "And that wasn't me waving around a staff, it took months of preparations and an artefact that a once-in-a-century mage made."

I paused.

"And I didn't even do the deed," I noted. "I'm the one who put in the power over the months, sure, but it was Akua and Sve Noc who called down the fake eclipse."

"If you believe that to be reassuring," Cordelia mildly replied, "you are sadly mistaken."

I rolled my eye at her, then put up my palms in a gesture of appeasement.

"Look, at the end of the day we can quibble about precedents and equivalents all we want but you're holding in your hands the control rod to one of the few artefacts in existence that can just kill me," I said. "No ifs or maybes – I'm in the range of the ealamal when you use that thing, and I'm dead."

I snapped my fingers.

"Just like that," I said.

I wasn't sure what the boundary conditions for not being killed by the wave of Light even though there'd been tests – it looked like maybe the standards on Judgment deciding to kill you were as low as they could get, but that was just informed guesswork by Roland – yet the odds that I wouldn't be one of those picked off were so low as to be nonexistent: Warden or not, I was still a villain. In some ways I felt like I was a girl again, walking around with the knowledge that my life was only my own so long as no one decided to snatch it.

It'd not missed the feeling, but the years of war against Keter had done wonders for my tolerance to looming doom.

"So you'll have to forgive me the staring," I bluntly said. "It's not going anywhere."

Blue eyes studied me, maybe assessing how much of the agitation in my tone had been genuine. She decided it had been.

"I meant no offence either," Cordelia said.

I shrugged, having taken none. I'd certainly encouraged the perception of my being an unstoppable force over the years, it very much had its uses. But it had led to people overestimating what I could actually do – or survive – sometimes.

"I'll confess to some curiosity as to how you even have it," I said, trailing off.

I wasn't going to push if I hit a wall, but I was more than a little interested. I didn't know Rozala Malanza all that well, but she didn't seem like the kind of woman who just handed out doomsday weapons to recent political opponents.

"It was part of the negotiated terms for my abdication," Cordelia admitted.

Huh. It was true that Cordelia had been in a decent bargaining position when she'd negotiated her abdication. Support for Hanno had been growing, but it'd not been support for him to rule all of Procer and it certainly hadn't been support for Rozala Malanza to do the same instead. After the war would have been a toss-up, there was no telling whether Cordelia would have ended up an untouchable saviour or the woman blamed for the horrors, but at the time of the deal her throne had been solid. She'd lost most of Procer, sure but the parts that had stayed were still largely behind her.

"Didn't quite trust her with the doomsday weapon, huh," I said.

Couldn't entirely blame her. If I'd built something that stupidly dangerous I would want to keep it under my thumb too.

"Trust," Cordelia replied, "can be a very complicated word."

"I'm not casting stones," I shrugged. "If anything I can sympathize."

Cool blue eyes studied me.

"Can you?" she said.

"I've had issues with giving up power even when it was my decision to," I frankly said. "I like to think of those times as growing pains, but it's not quite that clear-cut."

I'd been an ass to Vivienne for some time, when it'd sunk in what my abdication would actually mean. An abdication she'd in no way forced on me, any more than my choice of her as my successor. It wasn't the same with Hasenbach and Rozala Malanza, but there was enough in common I could feel pangs of sympathy.

"Have you considered," Cordelia said, "that perhaps the decision was as much about you as Princess Rozala?"

I blinked at her, taken aback.

"How's that?" I asked.

Her lips quirked mirthlessly.

"You have a history of only listening when the interlocutor also has a knife at your throat, Catherine," Cordelia Hasenbach said. "I took the precaution when I believed I was to be Warden of the West, but I stand by it."

I bit the inside of my cheek, trying to decide whether I should be insulted by that or not. Wasn't sure yet.

"A complicated word, is it?" I mildly said.

"I took oaths," Cordelia simply said. "To you, I do not deny it, but I yet heed older ones. If we lose, if the Dead King triumphs and the land teeters on the brink of extinction, I will make the hard choice."

My jaw tightened.

"If we lost in Keter," I slowly said, "you want to blast the ealamal. As strong as you can."

"More than nine in ten should survive the Light," Cordelia quietly said. "Should nothing go wrong."

"You don't know that it won't," I flatly said. "You've never fired that thing at the kind of strength you're talking about. The furthest you've gone is the borders of Salia."

"I cannot," Cordelia grimly agreed. "Yet what can I do but make that choice anyhow, if the other choice is death for all? Even should nine in ten die instead, it would be better than annihilation."

"And if it goes worse than that," I pressed. "If everyone dies?"

Her lips thinned.

"Then when a ship next crosses the Tyrian Sea, its captain will not find all of Calernia a realm of the dead," the blue-eyed princess said. "A cold comfort, but then I am Lycaonese: we are winter's get."

I leaned back. I recognized the cast to her face, it was the one she always had whenever I'd brought up the angel corpse over the years. She wasn't going to be moved on this. And I could even see the grim sort of sense in it: like she'd said, even the most horrific of results was a better end than extinction and become soldiers in Keter's service. On the other hand, she had to know that absolutely no one who had a decent chance of dying should that weapon be used – a number including every villain alive – would find this acceptable or be willing to tolerate her keeping the baton should they find out.

I held no illusions about the people who'd been my charges until recently: if the worst came to pass in Keter, they would be legging it through the Twilight Ways towards the closest port where Baalite ships docked. Learning that instead they were going to get an angel knife in the back might genuinely make a few of them desert and I wasn't sure I blamed them. It would not be too hard a thing, I thought, to sweep this under my authority as Warden. Odds were Hanno would back me, and Ishaq doubtlessly would. Hells, I could just take the damn thing from her and it wasn't like she had the strength to stop me.

It'd be a lie to say I was not tempted.

Silence hung between us. It might yet come to force, I thought, meeting those blue eyes. You have to know that. But for all that her holding that ivory length was putting a knife to my throat Cordelia had also extended trust, hadn't she? She'd told me what she intended without being forced, pretty much admitting that she saw her duty to Calernia as something that came before even the oaths she'd sworn to me as Warden. One step forward and one step back, only it didn't feel like we'd stayed still.

A noose was just a knot, until you'd killed someone with it.

"A complicated word," I slowly repeated.

And left it at that.

For now.

—

The journey was restful in some ways, but in others it was not to be. That much became clear as the days passed.

I'd never particularly enjoyed cooking: it was a lot of tedious little chores followed by equally tedious looking over fires and ending up in a plate that never seemed to be quite as good as when made by others. Still, it would be shabby of me not to pull my weight so I'd learned to be solid with at least few recipes. Of those I liked hunter's stew the best, since it was about as simple as cooking got, and I'd become a fair hand at it. There would be the usual bickering from the gallery about spices when time came to fill the bowls, I had no doubt, but that was part of the draw by now. Indrani sneering down on Callowan tastes and Vivienne going for her throat in retaliation was always good for a laugh.

Hells, back in the day even Akua got into it once or twice. Like most Praesi, she seemed convinced that any plate without a fistful of goddamned cumin sprinkled over it was unforgivingly bland.

I checked on the pot, finding the stew simmering, and stirred it a few times with the ladle before closing it again. I looked through the smoke as Masego sat across from me, long legs folding as he tried and failed to make himself comfortable perched atop a stone much too small for that. I thought of a praying mantis for a moment, looking at the long limbs, and almost laughed. To think he'd been pudgy when we first met. I could hardly even remember what that was like: he'd melted in the months leading up to the Tenth Crusade and never gained back the weight. Long robes and the black eye cloth, a golden glimmer beneath it, were what I saw in my mind's eye when I thought of Masego nowadays.

"Won't be ready for at least another hour," I told him. "So if you were hoping for an early bowl-"

"I was not," Zeze calmly replied. "I came to speak with you."

I narrowed my eye at him. That sounded serious. I wiped the steel ladle on a cloth and set it down.

"I'm listening," I told him.

He didn't speak, at first, as if surprised I'd agreed so easily or unsure what he'd wanted to say.

"We have come a long way since the day we first met in Summerholm," Masego said.

I half-smiled. By some counts, Apprentice could be said to be the first Named to join what was yet to become the Woe. He'd already been a master of his mantle when Hakram had only just begun to come into his.

"You've taken to chasing larger creatures than winged pigs," I drawled.

He quietly laughed.

"Too many still breathe fire," Zeze replied.

He paused, looking for words, and I gave him the space to think. There was rarely any gain to be had in rushing his mind.

"We have all changed," Hierophant finally said, gold shining beneath cloth. "You do not seek the same ends you did back then, and you seek them differently."

"Yeah," I murmured. "I've been seeing that too. We've..."

Moved on, I refused to say, because if they were gone from my life what did I have left?

"It is inevitable," Masego said. "The man who raised me is not the same who stood at Uncle Amadeus' side during the Conquest. In overcoming circumstance we grow – or are buried, overcome by it."

"I'd argue they were the same man," I said. "Just standing in two different places, at two different times."

Hardship and pleasure bent people in many ways but ultimately they were just colour on the canvas. They did not, could not define what the work was painted on. To my surprise, he smiled.

"I knew you would disagree," he said. "You still believe in the line in the sand, the difference between right and wrong. I have grown to like that about you, Catherine."

I cocked an eyebrow at him.

"Have you?" I drily asked.

He nodded.

"You try to make people stay on one side of the line," Masego said. "And, more often than not, we are better off for it. It doesn't always work, but I like that you try."

I cleared my throat, looked away. He'd always been at his most dangerous when he was painfully earnest.

"But you don't believe in that," I said.

"I believed that we should try," Masego honestly said. "You have shown me the value of that. But we've had this conversation once before, years ago. In the end-"

"- Creation ends," I quietly finished. "So it's not wrong to care about it, but it's missing the point. We should be looking beyond the bars, not rearranging the inside of the cell."

He looked pleased.

"So you do remember," Masego said.

"This," I said, "is about apotheosis, isn't it?"

"You have all found purposes," Hierophant said. "Hakram heals the people he once saw as a lost cause, Vivienne has traded the rooftop for the throne, Indrani has decided that instead of being Ranger she wants to be better than her. And you..."

He mulled over his words.

"You have decided to pull down the curtain on the Age of Wonders and usher what comes after with your own two hands," Masego finally said.

"Everyone's changed," I slowly said, "except you. Is that what you're saying?"

"I will break the shackles I was born bearing around my wrists," Hierophant simply said. "I will open my mind to the secret of existence and burn with the truth of the godhead."

I almost shivered. It was a nice evening out, warm with bright starlight and the merry gurgle of a stream right around the bend of the hill. And still I almost shivered, for though there had been no threat in my friend's words neither had there been so much as a speck of doubt. Masego had become the Hierophant by peeking at the truths behind the curtain, laws mortals were not meant to understand, and he had been unwavering in his sole ambition ever since: he would become as a god, and then step beyond even that. I studied him, fingers clenching and unclenching.

"I feel," I finally said, "as though I am being warned."

"The Dead King awaits in Keter," Hierophant evenly said. "And when I face him once more, Catherine, I will even the scales between us."

"You want revenge for your magic," I said.

"Revenge is not the right word," he mused. "It is the bargain of an eye for an eye, and that is not a rule I abide by."

Through the smoke, I saw Masego's eye burn bright gold through the cloth.

"I will ruin him," Hierophant said, his calm like that of a deep, dark lake. "I will make of Autumn's crown a noose around his neck and make him watch as I tear out of him everything of worth."

The fire crackled. Motes of gold danced on the smoke, as if traced by some luminous finger.

"I will use the sum of his works as a step for my own," Hierophant told me, "and let him rot like a bloated carcass as I reach horizons he never so much as glimpsed."

The dark-skinned man leaned forward, long braids sliding off his shoulder.

"That is what I promise Trismegistus King, and only then will I count us even for what passed between us," Masego said.

I swallowed. These were not idle words, I knew. He wasn't the kind of man to speak those. Masego genuinely meant to rip out the power of Neshamah and use it as part of his own apotheosis.

"Why tell me this?" I asked. "Why now?"

The glass eye's light ebbed low, now little more than glimmers again.

"You made room for everyone else in the world you're building, Catherine," Masego said, then smiled.

He drew back and just like that there was no trace of the Hierophant left in him, none of the intensity that'd filled the air around likes a physical thing. As if it'd only ever been a trick of the light and the illusion had been broken the moment he moved.

"Remember to make room for me as well," he asked.

I loved the man like a brother, and he loved me the same, but I knew a warning when I heard one. When the moment came for him to even the scales, if I stood in the way it would not be a small thing. That was what he'd been telling me.

If it came down to choosing between my dream and his own, his choice was already made.

—

I'd gotten used to my laundering being done for me.

Both the Army of Callow and the Legions had it as an assigned duty, but I'd never served at a rank where I might end up needing to kneel by the river shore and rub the dirt out of my clothes — or other people's. I wasn't unfamiliar with the chore, it was one of those we traded around when the Woe travelled together. Usually it was Vivienne who traded for it, she didn't mind getting her hands bone cold, but she wasn't along this time. So instead I found myself kneeling in the sand by Akua Sahelian, washing clothes in the stream. It was hard work, and rough on the hands, but there was only so much to wash and when it came to drying afterwards we cheated with magic.

The aftermath found us sitting on flat rocks by the river as we waited on the spell to finish getting the water out of the blankets. Akua had insisted on using a slower one, since apparently it didn't damage the fabric.

"How do you even know that?" I asked. "If you tell me you've ever had to do your own laundry, I'm going to call you're a liar."

She rolled her eyes at me, the simple red and yellow robes she wore somehow managing to look tailored instead of plain.

"It is originally a spell meant to rid oneself out of contact poisons," Akua said. "There's nothing worse than a botched assassination attempt ruining your favourite dress."

"Of course," I drily replied. "How dare I ever think otherwise."

"It is the common birth, I assume," Akua kindly informed me. "I have reliably been informed that lowborn children are born with inferior minds."

I glanced at her.

"Please tell me that's not actually something one of your ancestors believed," I pleaded.

Akua smiled beautifully.

"Not at all, dearest," she said.

A pause.

"It was his Mirembé wife," she told me. "There was a most fascinating treatise on the subject in the family library. Did you know that Callowans are also born naturally subservient? While I'll admit I've yet to encounter such a specimen, very convincing experiments were executed to prove this."

"I'm going to strangle you," I cheerfully told her.

"Irrational anger in the face of one's divinely ordained superior," Akua noted. "I was warned it might happen."

I tossed a stone in her direction, though she got a shield and a smug look up in time. My lips were quirking, though, and so were hers.

"So what's your take on our guest?" I asked her.

She slid me a glance.

"Catherine Foundling," Akua said, "are you soliciting me for gossip?"

"Indrani's not there," I complained. "And Masego doesn't get the point. He always tries to be nice."

She was grinning, now.

"She snores like a bear, did you notice?" the golden-eyed sorceress said.

"It was horrifying," I admitted. "I couldn't believe it was her at first, she's always so dainty about everything. I'm impressed at how good she is with a bow, though."

Cordelia had bagged us a pair of rabbits a few days back, which had been a pleasant addition to the cooking pot as well as a surprise.

"Lycaonese nobles are expected to hunt, I believe," Akua said. "Not unlike Praesi, though presumably with fewer assassinations attached."

"In my experience, that's always a safe assumption when Praes is involved," I said.

She snorted at me. It was light talk, nothing of politics or Keter or the many dooms ahead, and it made knots in my shoulders loosen. It was so rare, these days, that I could afford to just sit with someone by a river and talk. We must have spoken for an hour, far longer than the spell needed to finish, but I sensed she was as reluctant as I to acknowledge that and put an end to it. Eventually, though, it became harder to ignore that we would be awaited in camp. I sighed. Her expression immediately went blank, the highborn mask falling down over the lovely face. What had I done? I hesitated, but dimly I could sense that prodding at her now I was likely to lose a finger.

I kept to the silence instead, until humanity bled back into her face and she broke it herself.

"It would be easy," Akua said, "to simply fall into your orbit again. I forget that, every time we are parted."

She smiled at me, fondly but without amusement.

"Somehow I always forget that that it is not some subtle manipulation that you entrapped me with," Akua said. "That you truly enjoy my company, and that is what makes it so very easy for you to win."

"That's not what I'm trying to do," I said.

"It's always what you're trying to do, Catherine," she replied with a strange gentleness. "It's in your bone, the disease you inherited from the father you chose."

My fingers clenched into a fist. That wound was still fresh. I wasn't convinced it could ever be any other way.

"I'm not sure what it is you're saying," I said.

"I have had enough of cages," Akua told me. "And choices being made for me."

"You're talking in circles," I replied.

"If I choose to serve as the jailor of the King of Death," she said, "it will not be at anyone else's behest."

"I've asked nothing," I replied.

It had taken years for me to make it so I wouldn't have to. It had gone wrong in Ater, all the small steps I'd taken. The moment they should have led up to never came to pass. There'd been too much going, and the Bard had put her fingers to the scale. Had the pivot passed, had I failed? Looking at her, seeing her looking at me, I had to consider the possibility that I had.

"Nor should you," Akua said, gracefully rising to her feet. "Of all the debts I owe, the one I owe you is far from the heaviest."

She began to gather the clothes, a clear sign the conversation was finished. And it left me wondering a question I would rather not have to entertain at all.

If I had failed, what then?

—

On our thirteenth night on the road we found the guide Sve Noc had sent us for the latter half of our journey to Serolen, waiting seated by a shallow river. The colours of my sigil painted on its face, Ivah of the Losara offered me a smile as it rose to its feet.

"First Under the Night," Ivah said, bowing low, "it has been too long."

ErraticErrata

I'm back and recovered from my illness. Chapter's out a little early as a thanks for your patience while I got better.

SHARKS

Glad you're feeling better. Take care of yourself!

aurikdomi

thanks for surviving ee!

Frivolous

Glad you're better and feeling well again.

Taltos Dreamer

I'm very glad you are feeling better. The wonderful chapter is just icing on that cake

tmchin75723

Who, ultimately is responsible for keeping the dead king trapped? The Warden, of course. I'm thinking Cat's not getting that happy retirement at Cardinal after all.

miles

It seems a bit unfinished. Is there supposed to be dialogue after that greeting?

lenethren

Wonderful chapter. Glad you are better.

Droughtbringer

<https://topwebfiction.com/listings/a-practical-guide-to-evil/>

KageLupus

Sa vrede?

Someperson

CERA AINE

TheGreatAsp

So the 5th member of their party will be ivah, can't say I was expecting that

dadycool

And so the fifth member arrives. This was a very nice chapter. Very light, with friendship conversations with each of them. I believe this has been said before, but Masego is fucking terrifying.

Grey

I love Masego, but despite knowing his goals for a long time I find this rather unsettling. I hope that he remains intact, mind and soul, and not just a figment of himself shallowly pressed onto godhood.

Liliet

I mean, Catherine recovered from Winter as completely as it gets, and Masego would presumably be seeking less destructive means of apotheosis in the first place,

Someperson

Masego has very substantial insights into the ascensions of the Sovereign of Winter, Neshemah, and the Crows as examples to study.

Apotheosis is no easy task, but I would certainly hope he could learn from some of their mistakes, and do better.

Frivolous

I want apotheosis for Masego. I hope that if he is ever required to choose between apotheosis and balancing the scales with Neshie, he'll choose apotheosis.

I mean, that's the likely result anyway, but I hope that he doesn't pick torturing Neshie for eternity over subliming.

Liliet

Zeze has already picked Cat not being mad with him over torturing Nessie in Reverberation. It was quite adorable.

ohJohN

Just imagine it: post-apotheosis Masego would be the absolute best arcane patron.

Like, so far Cat has made pacts with an archfey (total dick, ageless king of hidden knives and frozen corpses) and goddesses of theft and murder (forged through millennia of magical cannibalism).

What's the worst Masego's gonna do, whisper pedantic corrections into your mind whenever your prayer contains factual inaccuracies?

(Sure, his words would probably come as an unsettling thousandfold chorus of voices, but I'm sure if you brought that up he'd be like, "0- H/ 2~"- ' -I- ' - D/I~D/' -N~ 0- T~'~A~ C/
0/ F/0-R/ -° T/ H/' E~ /F/ R~ A- I~L-I- I~' E/'S/' - 0/0- M- 0~R/T/ A/ L~ -M-I/ ' N- D- 2~ IS THIS BETTER?" and then g you a boon in embarrassment.)

jamesc9

I'm not used to the idea of gods giving gifts motivated by the god's embarrassment.

Jake

Yay, Ivah is back! Best Drow 10/10

Cpt. Obvious

Hey I like Ivah, but best Drow?

I'd like to throw the Tomb Maker into the hat. I just can't ignore what he said to the Saint of Swords about how he didn't need a weapon to spank an errant child...

Lord Haart

Rumena is genderless but if a gender had to be assigned, I've always leant that it'd be female.

arcanavitae15

Nice to see you recover. Interesting chapter with especially with how Cat had her conversations with Cordelia, Masego, and Akua, they were all very in theme with the characters. I also like the 5th member of the band being Ivah I really missed it.

Liliet

I love the epigraph implication that the company was pleasant enough, half the journey passed in a single chapter :p

Juff

Typo Thread:

worse than > worse than nonplussed (nonplussed actually means confused. the "not bothered" sense is mostly an american mistake) conditions for > conditions were for Judgment > Judgement
It'd not missed > I'd not missed
Procer, sure > Procer, sure, become soldiers > becoming soldiers likes a physical > like a physical

Isi Arnott-Campbell

"American mistake"? That's not how languages work, dude. I know you're probably framing it that way facetiously, but I personally am not amused. It carries a hint of the same overweening cultural arrogance that causes empires to form to begin with.

ninegardens

So, you're saying that you could care less about Juff's linguistic imperialism?

Mary Gentle

It is how languages work – they spawn dialects, or engulf them; some dialects go on to become other languages; some languages wither on the vine. Looking at the history of almost any word demonstrates that.

"Nonplussed" threw me right out of the chapter with Masego. I kept trying to see where a missing negative would fit in, and it didn't and doesn't. That break in the immersion did actually spoil that part of the chapter.

If you want to argue it, "nonplussed" is from classical Latin: "nōn plūs", meaning "not more, no further", that is: you've arrived at that spot beyond which you can't go. (For reasons of confusion, or whatever.) It's difficult to get "not bothered" out of that.

Having said that, meanings shift. If you want to define what you're writing and speaking as American, I don't believe anyone would have a problem with it. It's just that Microsoft appears to think there's something called "British English", and there really, really isn't. (Not unless you want to also carve up and name the various Commonwealth countries' use of English, and heritage countries like India, and the use of English as a business language...)

In other news: lovely, bittersweet chapter, full of love as well as forboding. And things never get this good without the wrath of the Gods (possibly quite literally) descending on our villains.

Which reminds me. Isn't Cat being a bit quiet about the problem that the Angel of Mass Destruction is going to void the world of all its villains? Very probably leaving the heroes untouched? I just feel she should be reacting a bit more.

I miss Hakram...

shikkarasu

RE: "British English"

There's normally an option for British vs American and, if they felt like pretending they were thorough, Canadian.

Personally, I'm in favour of having an Indian English, Australian English, etc. option in spell check/language options. They are all valid dialects of English and it's fascinating to see which bits of the old "King's English" survived in each one. Talking to native English speakers from India, for example, should be an absolute treat for anyone with a passion for language, since they still have turns of phrase from 1800s Britain that the British stopped using at some point in the past hundred years or so.

RE: Cat being a bit quiet

You can kill every Villain on the continent, much like how Maddie killed every Callowan Hero, and still expect new people to take up the torch. There is no point for Cat to bring up how many friends and allies she would lose. If Cordelia did kill all villains, Cat knows this would be a last resort due to the number of Proceran lives it would forfeit, so there isn't much point talking about it further. They each knows where the other stands.

Estelulu

There is an Australian English option in spellcheckers.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

When you said "it is how languages work," I think you meant the same thing I did when I said it isn't. Clearly I could've worded my comment better. The "that" in my "that's not how it works" was referring to the idea that one dialect is more proper than another. In any language, it's all just what it is (until it's something else), and emerging in a specific geographical area doesn't confer special properties. I will admit that the specific case of a word with two diametrically opposed meanings does lend itself to the idea that only one of those meanings can be correct.

ninegardens

Masego. I love you. And I love that for all the granduer of this story your goals are just... Beyond it.

Like... the central thesis of his philosophy is so damn good.

BUT.

BUT....

One of Nessie's most basic tricks is "Lol, I put a piece of my soul in this book. Now I am going to eat your mind"

Do you really think it is wise and/or safe to use that fuckers science as the basis of your apotheosis? Couldn't we just like... not do that?

""
Villians don't age Zeze. You have all the time you need. Why try to cheat by eating the author of the necronomicon.

Hell, you know what? Zeze taking Nessie's science and using it to reach godhead is probably a victory condition as far as Nessie is concerned. Even if he doesn't get to beat the gods, so long as someone does, that's still pretty good, right?

God damn it Zeze.

ninegardens

also, I can't help but think Cat is tragically missing the point when she says "You want revenge for your magic". Zeze doesn't give a damn about his magic. Zeze wants revenge for the Dead king laying so much as a finger on Indrani. Or hijacking his brain, or... plenty of other things. But the magic? That's like... WAY down the list of things he wants revenge for.

Liliet

Yup, Cat misses the point a lot when it comes to Masego, bless 'em

Liliet

Masego doesn't give a shit what Neshamah wants, though.

ohJohN

Yeah, and it's not like Neshama's high-level goal is inherently bad, or even too far off from Masego's own – the problem comes from, you know, trying to kill every living thing on the continent to achieve it.

If Masego happens to achieve one of the DK's victory conditions, for his own reasons and without all the genocide, I don't see how that's necessarily a problem? Just because a bad dude wants it doesn't mean it's always a bad thing in itself.

Liliet

Mhm. Poetic and shit, if anything.

shikkarasu

The real risk, here, is that DK will pull another trick to live on in Masego's mind. Remember that Masego needs a good story to beat DK. Archer dying in front of him gave him the True Love powerup needed to win an arcane wrestling competition with DK, and he failed to Wrest the Hellgate at the end of Book 6. It is a very real concern that he flatly cannot beat DK in a fair* competition, and will be wholly or partly consumed.

* "fair" herein being defined as two mages each given similarly vast time/resources to prepare for their confrontation. Masego having the Arsenal and sente feels roughly on par with, or inferior to, DK having millennia to accumulate power and defend against literally anything he can imagine.

Liliet

Thought.

I wonder what would happen if Cat actually remembered Masego telling her earlier that he won't leave her side, and asked him how the two statements are compatible in his mind.

ninegardens

"My goal is omnipresence."

"What did you think I needed all that apotheosis for?"

kinigget

Gods its always the chapters like this that stick with me. The little conversations that seem so inconsequential at first, but betray grand depths of character.

Wonder

I really want Cat and Akua's thing to work. Cat just has to get over her long price thing and accept that she has changed Akua for the better and that should be enough.

Liliet

Cat would need to forgive herself for Liesse, first.

Lord Haart

Liesse is for neither Cat nor Akua to forgive. Most of the people who would need to forgive them are dead, and the rest still mourn.

As in the real world, crimes may go unpunished but they also don't get erased.

Liliet

Hm, bad phrasing actually. Cat needs to... let go of punishing herself for Liesse.

(Also, it wasn't Cat's fault so much as to need forgiveness, really)

Sugar Roll

I'm pretty sure Cordelia thinks Masego is a casanova. From her perspective, Masego is making a pass at Akua. Indrani made it known in the arsenal that Masego has seen Catherine naked and insinuated intimate relations between them. Vivienne reinforced that image when she signed Masego up for something like a sex club as a prank. It would be hilarious if Cordelia is now having second thoughts about joining them because there's a sexual predator on the loose.

shikkarasu

I love the idea that Masego has this reputation that every part of his being contradicts once you speak to him for 10 consecutive seconds. The sheer mental whiplash from your spies being so uncharacteristically wrong, Cordelia then gets a nosebleed from trying to reconcile the two Masegos in her mind, followed by Akua quietly informing Masego of the anime nosebleed trope, just to add fuel to the fire.

Sykomantis

Oh Gods yes I need this to happen it would make this entire arc

Sugar Roll

After his apotheosis, he becomes the god of love and fertility.

shikkarasu

His 2nd project, once a god, is to figure out how the hells that became his Domain. Archer just laughs her butt off and appoints herself as his prophet.

stevenneiman

I feel like that line about Indrani should have said that she wants to be better than Hye and not to be Hye. It's already been strongly indicated that she very much does want to be the ranger.

shikkarasu

Wants to be the Ranger, but not the current Ranger. I think something is lost by differentiating between Hye and Ranger too clearly. It is more clear, but less poetic, especially since it was once the other way around. Indrani used to want to be just like the current Ranger, but didn't care for the name or role.

Now she wants to do the job, but doesn't really care about the woman.

Cpt. Obvious

I wouldn't say she doesn't care for Hye. I think she still respect her, but I think she's realized that she never loved her.

She respect Hye for her skills and for her drive to be self-sufficient in everything. But she's realized that Hye is a very bad role model. None of the students that walked out of Refuge were prepared for what they found.

They grew up chasing the approval of Hye, something that was basically impossible to get. The more they tried to please her the more they failed. Hye didn't train them to be anything but the most skilled. Pleasing others where a weakness as emotional bands would limit them and make them vulnerable. Better to never trust than to suffer having your trust broken. Better never to love than have your heart broken. Friends can betray you. Even hate can betray you. But an enemy can never betray you.

So Indrani having her sights on becoming the Ranger is not just ambition, something Hye most probably approves of, but also a way to show that she's achieved what Hye tried to teach her, how to be a better Ranger.

Dang that got long-winded. Be grateful that I cut out more than four times as much text that was just me rambling in circles, never getting to anything even remotely resembling a point...

Evgeny Permyakov

Akua is maturing. Yay.

anonymous4968

And so the guide, goes to a band of five.

Linnus42

I am still curious by what right Cordelia claims to have the right to nuke the whole continent with an Angel Exterminatus. Its not political power cause well she doesn't have any any more not that her previous level of Political Power would give her the any rights beyond Procer. And yet she supposedly believes special people ie Named should be controlled.

Masego staying Masego. Akua still talking about sealing the DK, smfh. I will really hate if she does that.

nimelennar

It was decided through a legitimate democratic process: one person, one vote. Cordelia is the person with the ealamal trigger; she gets the vote.

(With apologies to Terry Pratchett)

Linnus42

She bargained with Rozala for the rights to it. That may imply she has some rights in Procer I suppose but that agreement doesn't clear her to use it across the whole continent. And doesn't jive with her supposed philosophy of governments over special people. By what right does she claim to make such a judgment for the whole continent?

Not that I consider Procer's government of unelected princes voting on decisions to be democratic. Even if I thought Cordelia was in the right to have the weapon and use it as she saw fit. I be worried about the safety of such a device in her hands. She is a zero in combat ability.

shikkarasu

Cordelia had bagged us a pair of rabbits a few days back, which had been a pleasant addition to the cooking pot as well as a surprise.

"Lycaonese nobles are expected to hunt, I believe," Akua said. "Not unlike Praesi, though presumably with fewer assassinations attached."

Coupled with the fact that she just passively is Lycaonese I would be shocked if she never learned to fight or command armies. Not as well as Klaus, but well enough. Also, I'm interested in what the minimum range/radius is for the Ealamal. She may very well be able to call in tactical strikes only a few meters wide. The entirety of Salia is 'the furthest she's gone,' not the lower bounds of the weapon. The act of holding it may very well give anyone combat ability, provided they know how it works and can be trusted to hold it.

As for the right? Kind of the whole point of the Accords is that no-one should have that kind of unilateral power, much less use it, but the Dead King needs to be destroyed before the Nukes can be disarmed. Ethics are legitimately a thing for after the war right now, as horrible as that statement is.

Dome Zasrekh

I think it originates from the corpse not the trigger.

kinigget

It's insurance for if everything goes horribly wrong. A chance to give a final "fuck you" to the King of the Dead.

You ask what right she has to hold it as if that question matters right now.

Quibbling over beaurocracy at this point serves no one but Neshama

MoreBeer

By the right of Inertia. She had the power, she used it well and didn't abuse it. She is, to paraphrase, "the evil you know."

There is no way to know how someone else might use the power should they come into possession of it.

Lord Haart

Yep burden of proof is to show who has more right (or that it skittle be destroyed) rather than saying she doesn't. She had it already, what's the argument for giving it up?

And honestly I think it's clear that Cordelia is NOT ethical, and probably has never been. Her goals of saving Procer and the rest of Calernia, and then establishing the Accords, is why Catherine wants her as an ally, not because she has some internal code of conduct like Hanno.

nimelennar

Okay, hear me out.

So, Masego is trying to become a deity. And while he does like having oodles of power, he seems to prefer knowledge, so that would probably be his domain.

A god with a knowledge domain is almost certainly going to be omniscient.

This story has two modes: the parts from Cat's perspective, written in first person, and everything else, written in third person, and some of the stuff in those chapters it would have been impossible for Cat to find out after the fact (e.g. when the character dies). You'd need some sort of omniscient perspective to get this information.

The obvious conclusion is that when Cat decides to put this all on paper, Masego will be her co-author, taking care of all of the third-person POV chapters, from his omniscient perspective as a god of knowledge.

BargleNawdleZouss

I like the callback to Book 6, Chapter 38 (Tantamount) referencing Cordelia's archery skills. Nice to see it wasn't just an idle boast!

Grimfel

Yeah this was a nice touch for sure

BarthHumphries

I worry that, once they get stories back for Evil people, they'll swiftly get "Well, some Good person has a 'kill only evil people nuke', so it's only fair that I should have a 'kill only evil people nuke'." Cordelia's continued claim of that weapon risks everything.

BarthHumphries

Whoops, the evil person would have a "kill only good people nuke".

Chapter 43: Serolen

*"Silent then stood the great city, whose mighty had called in vanity
the great wrath that passed.
And found they who had laughed that their power might be vast, but Dobrogost laughed last."*

– Extract from the 'Dobrogost Veste', a Firstborn traditional epic

"Trouble has come to Serolen," Ivah of the Losara said.

"Has it ever not?" I replied.

We travelled quicker now than we had before. Ivah had bargained for the Secret of the Half Road, and though it might not be as instantaneous as the Shadow Stride the Longstride Cabal had once boasted of it still lengthened our steps. We had to ride in a narrow line, over a stripe of Night barely larger than the horses, but so long as we rode there we were possessed of a great celerity. It did not prevent the horses from getting tired, but they covered easily thrice as much ground before needing a rest. One the second of those interludes, as the rest of our company had their mounts drink in a shallow pond, I sat with Ivah to speak of what awaited us to the north.

"This is true," Ivah acknowledged. "But there have never been troubles such as this. It is... unsettling."

My brow rose. Not a word it would use lightly. Ivah had once been a rylleh in a sigil in good standing, about as high as it was possible to rise without holding the sigil yourself, and in the nights since fought under me through campaigns above and below. The drow was not a sort to unsettle easily.

"Have the lines collapsed?" I bluntly asked.

"We have lost the southern woods," the purple-painted drow said. "The Gloom was pierced through with great roads of steel that were kept alight with strange lanterns."

I grimaced.

"And they didn't pull back the Gloom forty miles to start over?"

Ivah hesitated. It had no reason to watch its words around me. As its sigil-holder, I was the only person it could be said to answer to and I'd never been one to mind blunt honesty. Only there was someone even above me, wasn't there? Sve Noc.

"Shit," I quietly said. "It's not that they didn't want to, they couldn't."

It must have been deeply distressing, I thought, for Ivah to admit that the goddesses it had worshipped all its life had limitations. That they were not all-powerful or beyond failing.

"It broke into shards when an attempt was made," Ivah said. "A third was recovered, but Sve Noc says cannot be forged anew into a lesser Gloom. They have been used as weapons to win battles since."

My eye narrowed.

"You're keeping something back," I stated.

"Mighty Kurosiv has stolen two of the shards," it admitted. "They have claimed it is proof of their divinity and taken the name of Loc Ynan."

Fate-giver, it meant. But it was the formal version of giver – maybe closer to 'gifter' – and the implication there was that the gift was given to an inferior. Kurosiv was effectively claiming to be the entity that would 'give' all of the Firstborn their fates. A naked challenge to Sve Noc's authority.

Even this far away from Serolen, I could catch the scent of civil war in the air.

"Last I heard Kurosiv was playing god-king in the northeast, with an eye to returning to the mountains above the Everdark," I said. "What changed?"

"They tell a tale of having wagered the fate of the Firstborn in a verse-game with the Dead King," Ivah scorned. "That they triumphed over it and won from Death a reprieve for nine years. They now come to gift us a new fate, leading us east and across the water to a land of endless riches."

Oh did I not like the sound of that.

"I'm assuming by water they don't mean the Chalice," I said.

The painted drow shook its head.

"The salt-water," Ivah said. "We are to sail on great ships that will bring us to a glorious kingdom without light."

My fingers clenched.

"They made a deal with the Dead King," I bluntly said. "Pull out of the war and the Firstborn get nine years to get the Hells off Calernia while Neshamah thoroughly wipes out the rest of us."

"That is also the belief of Sve Noc," Ivah agreed.

Would the Dead King keep to that deal? I wasn't sure, but in all honesty it shouldn't matter. He'd finish killing us off long before nine years had passed and I had my doubts about the success of a Firstborn exodus across the Tyrian Sea anyway. They'd lived underground as long as they'd been a civilization, they were neither shipwrights nor sailors. Although with Kurosiv holding the reins, they might just hit one of our port cities and devour enough they can raise a decent fleet. More worrying was a question I did not have the answer to: was this Kurosiv's plan or was Neshamah now using diplomacy to finish collapsing us?

Because if it was the latter, we were in deep shit. There weren't really any human nations that'd cut a deal with him, at least not unless we suffered a catastrophic defeat in Keter first, but the same was not true of others. The Golden Bloom was unlikely to actively help him, but the elves might take a deal so they could cut and run unhindered. The Gigantes had sit out the war since their sacrifice in keeping the Hellgates closed, so they might be tempted for the right prize, and worse of all was the Kingdom Under. We still hadn't signed a new treaty with the dwarves, so if the Dead King came in with a better offer? Fuck, that could get bad.

There was no way we would take Keter without the Kingdom Under supplying the besieging armies. If they pulled out of the war, we were done.

"How bad has it gotten?" I asked, tone gone grim.

It did not play coy, which I appreciated.

"Most of the remaining Ten Generals still follow Sve Noc," Ivah said, "but two have gone over and brought their sigils with them. We still have the greater part of the strength, but that strength is bound holding the lines to the south: Kurosiv and their traitors now hold much of Serolen."

It grimaced.

"The strife has grown along lines it never had before," Ivah said. "The tenets that you taught us in Iserre have divided the Firstborn."

Fuck, I thought. I'd never seriously considered that might be a possibility, back when I had spoken out. I was the mouthpiece of living goddesses who held in their grip the source of power of all Firstborn, it wasn't exactly a kind of position that got you questioned. But the Sisters weren't the only source of power now, were they? They'd admitted to me months ago that they couldn't even try to kill Kurosiv anymore without pretty much destroying an already-ruined Night and it sounded like the usurper had only grown in strength since.

"How?" I got out.

"Many sigils despise them," Ivah frankly said. "That Mighty can no longer take and kill freely is loathed and the authority of the Losara over the new oaths even more so. Sigil-holders remember times when they were not bound by promises and their authority could not be challenged by vote."

I studied its face.

"It's the protection oath that fucks them, isn't it," I stated.

It was the foundation of the reform I'd laid at the heart of the Firstborn: violence could not be used to keep a drow in a sigil or punish them for leaving it. It was what gave the votes power, why the new ways had teeth. Sigil-holders who continued to treat their followers like cattle would find that their sigils shrunk while those who treated their followers well would find their ranks swelling. A straightforward incentive for sigil-holders to begin treating the powerless decently.

"Nisi and dzulu have been leaving harsh sigils in droves," Ivah agreed. "That this could not be curtailed by spear or Night has left Mighty furious. It goes, they say, against the true Tenets of Night."

"And let me guess," I coldly smiled. "Kurosiv welcomes the malcontents with open arms. They offer the old ways again, maybe even worse."

"It is said that the nisi are sorely used in the territory of the traitors," Ivah hesitantly said. "The tenets of Iserre are not observed among the sigils following the usurper."

And how genuinely awful did treatment have to get, before even the Firstborn thought it was too much? And bad as that was, it wasn't even what worried me the most from the situation.

"You told me we have the most sigils," I said, "but Kurosiv poached a large chunk of the Mighty, didn't they?"

Reluctantly, Ivah nodded. I rubbed the bridge of my nose. Of course they had. The tenets I'd introduced gave power to the powerless over the few individuals that'd ruled over more than nine tenths of the Firstborn as uncontested tyrants for more than a millennium. Some of the Mighty would take it in stride, but some of them would simply look at the fact that now nisi – a word that literally meant cattle! – had some power over them and be offended to their very core. Lesser Mighty wouldn't mind so much, I decided, because they didn't actually lose a lot in practice and they might even gain in the exchange. But those few whose strength had allowed every right, rylleh and sigil-holders? They would be furious at the reforms.

And now another god had come, one that promised them a return to the old ways. All the most poisonous of the Mighty, those who knew they couldn't cut under the reforms, would hear it a siren song. If we were dealing with humans I'd call it good riddance, but these were drow: being a murderous cancer likely meant they'd been among the strongest of their sigils.

"Fuck," I feelingly said.

That civil war was still looming just beyond the horizon, but worse than that was the realization that my side might actually lose it.

—

It took us another week and a half to get to Serolen, a short span that felt like forever. Every day we spent here could not be spent with the armies that must already be marching on Keter. How much more of the Principate had been destroyed, while we rode down a shadowed road? How many more thousands had died to blades and devils? There's been a restful tinge to the travels at first, since so little was demanded of me save that I ride north, but that had faded. Urgency whipped at my back, reproaching every breath not spent making haste to Duskwood.

The others felt it too. Cordelia grew more somber as the days passed, still cordial but ever more distant, and Masego even began setting aside his book to ride in earnest. Akua, as though the talk by the shore had never taken place, stuck to me as a second shadow. She spoke more to Ivah than myself, asking it about old acquaintances and the state of affairs in the Empire Ever Dark. But her presence was not unpleasant. I tended to withdraw less into myself when there was a conversation going, and it was less demanding to listen than to have to keep it going myself.

It sometimes frightened me how well she had come to know me, perhaps better than anyone alive save Hakram.

We could tell the moment was passed the remnants of the Gloom, even in the Ways. The shadows got deeper, the stars more distant, and Ivahs' road grew noticeably more effective. From there, our last few days were consumed with haste. There was a calamity in the making, I knew it deep in my bone.

"Is it your Name?" Akua asked me quietly, one night by the fire.

"Maybe," I murmured. "More senses than aspect, yeah? It's like I can feel a current with my fingers."

"Fate," the golden-eyed sorceress said. "A convergence of events."

I nodded.

"Something big is coming," I said. "A great pivot."

For my patron goddesses, or for all the Firstborn? It was too early to tell. All I knew was that coming too late would bring down a disaster on all our heads. So we picked up the pace, running each other ragged as we rode through a dry and sandy riverbed until I could sense the end of our path ahead. Our mounts milled about the sand as I reined in Zombie and the horses followed, Ivah coming to stand at my side without so much as a whisper of warning. Not without reason had I once named it my Lord of Silent Steps.

"We're here," I called out. "Get ready for the crossing."

I got a tired, cranky grunt out of Masego and more vocal acknowledgement from the other two. I barely paid attention, though, catching Ivah's stare from the corner of my eye.

"You told me parts of Serolen are in Kurosiv's hands," I said. "What are the odds that there are enemies waiting on the other side?"

"We will emerge within the Shrine of Tears, Losara Queen," it said. "It is a stronghold of those loyal to Sve Noc."

"So not very," I summed up.

"It is so," Ivah agreed.

I sighed, then glanced back.

"Arm up," I ordered. "We're going into trouble."

Ivah sent me a wounded look, but it ought to know better by now. Even if there hadn't been a bevy of gods at work in Serolen, convergences of fate made the unlikely common. I would have bet on a fight even if there wasn't a good change of enemy action. I took the lead, Ivah at my left and Masego behind me. Akua stayed in the back with Cordelia, as much to shield the calm-faced princess as because she tended to benefit from having longer to cast. She wasn't the war mage that Masego had been before he lost his magic, or truthfully even now. I unsheathed my sword, Zombie keening eagerly at the sound, and breathed out.

My staff came down, opening a gate out of the Twilight Ways, and I rode through.

The air was warm and humid, that was my first thought. I blinked it away, but my eye went wide as I took in the sight around me. The Shrine of Tears was massive, larger than any Proceran palace I had ever seen and taller than even the Alban Cathedral in Laure. It was disorienting to stand inside, because the shrine pretended it was otherwise: though there was a tall ceiling of curved stone high above, it was hidden by thick fog all the way to the corners of the roof – which came down in walls that were long curtains of rain.

Through the uneven curtains I glimpsed at the lake the shrine had been raised on, but it was not what drew the eye as I rode further onto a causeway of wet stones. Under the roof the great Shrine a hundred smaller shrines had been built, made of painted tiles in vivid colours: red and yellow and blue. Few were larger than a house and everywhere tall painted poles stood, bound to each other and the sharp roofs of the shrines by thick woven ropes from which hung strands of coloured cloth and shining trinkets.

Across it all rain fell in gentle drops, sliding down the vivid tiles and down deep furrows in the ground that led to shallow canals. It was as if under the great roof a hundred beautiful islands had been laid to rest among rivers of stone, each laden with prayers and offerings. It was, I thought even as I pulled up my hood, a place of startling beauty. Behind me I heard Cordelia gasp and smiled. She'd never known the Firstborn as anything but violent killers and skulking spies, but this should begin to teach her differently. They were the ruin of a people, but even now there was more to them than Night.

We emerged on the island at the heart of it all, on the causeway leading to the ornate shrine behind us while knotted ropes crisscrossed above our heads. And as the gate out of Twilight died with a gentle breath, I saw movement ahead. Silhouettes moving through the faint mist of islands.

"There should be a sigil awaiting us," Ivah said.

Its eyes had followed my own, picking out the number. Seven, eight, nine – no, eight, they were using raider's walk to make their warband look larger than it was.

"Looks like there's one," I coldly smiled.

I shrugged.

"At least it's not one of the Ten Generals," I said.

I would have felt one of them coming. This was, by their strength in the Night – oddly muted to my senses, enough that I couldn't just pick out their numbers through it as I once would have – a sigil-holder and a cadre of rylleh come to kill us.

"What insolence, to dare come to this holy place as servants of a false god," Ivah said.

Its shoulder had tightened, its muscles coiled. All in anticipation of the violence to come.

"Zeze," I called out, "sow confusion."

He cleared his throat.

"Can I have the bodies afterwards?" he politely asked.

I turned to fix him with a steady look.

"I have been very interested in how a race not born to the use of Night could grow so innately adept at wielding it," he defended.

"Fine," I sighed. "Just don't get, you know..."

I gestured vaguely.

"I do not," he admitted.

"Don't get all Warlock about it," I elaborated.

I ignored Akua's choked laugh and Cordelia's murmur of 'should I even ask?'.

"I will not be the Warlock," Masego assured me.

"Not what I asked," I sighed, "but I guess it'll have to do."

I patted Zombie's neck, stroking her feathers and nodded at Ivah. It did not need instructions, not after the months we'd spent fighting together in the Everdark. It knew exactly what I wanted of it. I rolled my shoulder to limber it, then cracked my neck to the side.

"Well," I cheerfully said. "Let's solve us a religious dispute. Chno Sve Noc!"

I spurred Zombie to a gallop, and moments later we were aflight.

—

They shot first.

It was the first time I'd fought Firstborn since the Night was ruined, and the difference was plain to see: the three streaks of darkness that howled towards me took a moment to form and they... weak. The Secret could no longer be used the way it once had been. I didn't even bother to weave a defensive working, my knees guiding Zombie into a short dive that saw all three projectiles go wide. Three of the rylleh ran at me down the causeway on the other side of the river, power blooming around them as they aimed to leap at me when the dive went lowest, but I grinned and pulled deep.

Gods, the Night came easy here. It was so much stronger than in the south.

The air exploded, paving stones flying everywhere as the rylleh scattered into thin lines of Night along the ground, and my staff touched one of those strands of shadow before Zombie banked upwards. That was all it took. I disrupted the Night before it could form into flesh and the rylleh lost control, reappearing like a burst balloon filled with black blood. It never even got off a scream and I pressed low against Zombie's neck as another volley of Night streaks howled just past my air. Amateurs. If they'd gone for centre of mass instead of my head, they would have at least forced me to defend.

Still, they were not unskilled. While three ran across the causeway and another three continued to fire from the back, the last rylleh had been pulling on a larger working. The kind that took time and shouldn't be interrupted. Coming out of its body in strands of Night, a hulking shape with a massive maw – it was little more than teeth set in a round and eyeless head – formed and shot out towards me. It didn't make it far. Two heartbeats and the world rippled, the rylleh's face turning to utter surprise as the Night beast turned around and bit its head off before blowing up in streaks of black flame.

Hierophant could do all manners of nasty things, using Wrest.

The flames scattered the rylleh shooting projectiles, as they'd been standing too close for comfort, and that was my opening. I slapped aside the spear one of the runners from earlier tried to toss at my back, then sent out my will and picked up the black flames that were guttering out. I fed them life and they roared out in a blaze, spreading in thick tendrils that swallowed up two of the rylleh in the blink of an eye. One of them walked out of his own flesh with a wet squelch as it began to burn, but Hierophant broke the working halfway through and instead of being skin deep half the meat stayed on the bones. Gods but that was an ugly way to die.

Four out of eight dead, all rylleh. Where was the sigil holder, it hadn't made a move yet? Ah, out back. Atop one of the shrines, gathering Night to itself to form some sort of carapace armour. I'd seen Mighty Jindrich do something similar once, but the shape stayed humanoid here. I suspected I'd not enjoy it should the armour be finished. A whisper against the back of my mind and I turned without batting an eye, following the instinct. My staff slapped down a spear, then twirled to parry the spear of Night that had been hidden in its shadow. I'd not moved in moments, and in a fight that was too long.

"Go," I whispered at Zombie, and guided her with my knees.

We fell into a curved glide, circling around the island-shrine where I had caught up to the warband. Two of the surviving rylleh fell back to their sigil holder, but one slipped behind me and leapt across the canal – to be caught in the throat by a bolt of sickly green light. The drow went straight through the spell, looking triumphant, but that passed. The moment its feet touched the stone on the other side, they began to turn to dust. Someone was getting fancy. Akua always did like her curses. I had more pressing matters, though.

I flicked an orb of black flame at the sigil holder gathering his carapace, but the two rylleh besides it formed a spinning wheel of Night and scattered it. Yeah, they were going to keep covering their captain until it got that done. Unfortunately for them, I had a way around that.

"The carapace, Zeze," I shouted.

The world rippled again, and in the heartbeat that followed it all went wrong. I could feel Masego's will wresting away the Night, began to rip out the carapace, but then another will fought him. Not the drow's, it had tried and failed already. Something bigger. Hierophant let out a hoarse shout of pain and I clenched my jaw in anger, lashing out with howling flame. Again the rylleh summoned their wheel, but the Night was all askew around them and as my working impacted theirs the fabric of Creation rippled out angrily. I pushed my will, fed my working, and there was loud crack before the shrine burst into a rain of melted, broken tiles.

A plume of smoke hid the results from my sight, but I could still feel Night in there. At least one was still alive. I risked a glanced back, finding Masego was leaning on Akua and bleeding from his empty eye socket. Golden eyes met mine from a distance and she shook her head. In no danger of death, then. Good, I could put my full attention on this. Kurosiv had taken offence to someone wresting Night from their faithful, but it was not the last injury it would suffer today.

When the smoke scattered I found the sigil holder still standing, garbed in black carapace from head to toe. It was segmented, like armour, and it had taken up a long spear of obsidian covered in glyphs. I saw the mark of its sigil written on the side of its carapace helm, a pale wriggling snake pierced by an arrow. Eterin, it meant, and so it was Mighty Eterin I now faced. The armour drow leapt up, landing with unearthly grace atop one of the wooden poles. Eterin flourished its spear at me almost mockingly, and my eye narrowed. I guided Zombie's glide to the side, watching the timing and throwing myself off.

I landed atop a pole of my own, leg throbbing with pain, and return the flourish with my sword.

"In the name of Loc Ynan, I order your submission," Mighty Eterin called out.

Its voice was reedy, but its eyes were sharp.

"As First Under the Night, I offer you a chance to return to convert back before your summary execution," I mildly said. "Which I feel is rather generous, consisdering."

It laughed.

"Va Ynan Yn," Mighty Eterin replied, and broke out in a run.

The gift is given, it meant. Eh, ours sounded better. With unnatural grace it ran atop the rope tying our poles together, but I did not move to meet it. I called Night to me instead, weaving it into spinning blades above its head. My eye narrowed as the air current failed to suck Eterin upwards, snapping the working into an explosion instead. That got it to react, but not as I wished: it swayed on the rope for a moment, but the armour was not so much as dented.

"Tricky, tricky," I muttered. "You don't get the mobility, but this is stronger than Jindrich's Secret."

And Jindrich had been the second strongest sigil holder in Great Strycht. It wasn't the expendables I was getting sent at me. I began gathering Night again as Mighty Eterin crossed the last of the distance separating us, laughing as it raised its spear, and grinned back toothily. Tendrils of shadows rose from the bottom of the pole, twining around my limbs, and I focused my Name: with the strength of both behind me I met Eterin's blow, my staff catching the side of the spear.

It should have been blow straight off or lost the spear but instead spun, impossibly still on the rope, and when I tried to slide my sword into its belly the steel slid harmless against the carapace. I hastily put my guard as Eterin finished its spin, turning it into a blow from the back of the spear towards my ribs, and though the angle was wrong for both it was worse for me. My blade went down, the obsidian shaft struck my rib hard and I swallowed a groan. But I was close, and with a free hand. I laid my fingers against its chest and my will pulled.

It was easy as ripping a page out of a book. For the first heartbeat, at least, and then I felt it too. The thing that called itself Loc Ynan, Mighty Kurosiv. The great leech that had survived even the wrath of the Crows. It was like the whole sea coming down at me through a narrow channel and I rocked back, shaken, but I saw something beyond my vicious blooming headache. This was a power, but it was not beyond me. Kurosiv was not a god, for all that they put on airs. And I had ended stronger storms than this, crushed them in the palm of my hand.

"I am the Warden, you upstart thing," I hissed, "and if you dare raise your voice against me, I will Silence it."

The Night in Mighty Eterin died. It was snuffed out like a candle between fingers, Kurosiv's will cut just before I felt from it a towering rage. The sigil-holder moaned out in pain, his carapace crumbling into nothing, and my hand rose to catch its throat.

"You should have picked a better god," I told it, and squeezed.

My Name flared, the Beast laughing in my ear, and Mighty Eterin died as I pulped flesh and shattered bone. Urgh, now it was all over my hand. I leapt down, using the tendrils to ease my descent, and dismissed them as my boots touched stone. I tossed the corpse away and wiped my hand on my breastplate, limping away to pick up my sword and sheath it. And as the last of the bodies began to cool, a hush fell upon the Shrine of Tears. A dimness blanketed the world, the sound of my own breath distant to my ears and the soft patter of the rain gone silent. I did not need to look to know they had come, sensing their looming shapes in the Night like leviathans swimming through the water.

They perched behind me atop the tallest shrines, the silhouettes of great crows large as houses casting long shadows past me. Sve Noc had come to the victorious field.

"Now you show up," I drawled, glancing back at my patronesses. "A little late to the evening, are we?"

They were hard to look at with the naked eye, even for me. Their very feathers seemed woven out of inky blackness, and here in this place of power I could dimly sense the endless void that lay beyond the surface. Like the emptiness behind stars, the absence of anything at all. Someone might go mad, looking too deep and too long at that. Ivah was already kneeling, but neither Akua nor Masego – recovered but his face still touched with blood – seemed impressed. They looked at the goddesses with the unruffled assurance of people who had been raised to see gods as meat on the block, not anything worthy of awe.

But that was only to be expected, while Cordelia staying astride her horse had me nodding in approval. It was her first time standing before the likes of Sve Noc, as far as I knew, and though her hands were bone-white around the reins she sat straight-backed in the saddle. There was steel in that spine. The Sisters did not answer me – indeed they rarely spoke outside mind or shared dreams – but there was no need for them to. They had brought a herald with them, an old acquaintance.

The Tomb-maker was still the oldest drow I had ever seen. Its back bent, its skin creased and its thick black veins visible through it. Its tunic of obsidian rings was belted tight at the waist and it wore no arms, never having done so as long as we'd known each other. Silver-blue eyes were set in a face bearing in paint a blooming ochre sunflower in ochre and its long white hair went down its crooked back. Mighty Rumena had not aged a day since I last stood in its presence.

"Losara Queen," the old drow greeted me. "You have already shed blood on the grounds of Serolen."

"A good omen," I agreed.

"There are few better," Rumena chuckled.

It cast a look around, lingering on distant gates that stood across the shrines.

"My sigil will hold the Shrine of Tears until the Kasedan arrive," the Tomb-maker told me. "Let us leave for the temple-fortress. We stand too close to the skirmish lines for council to go unheard."

"Doing a lot of walking, are you?" I smiled. "I suppose I've already handled the fighting for you."

It smiled at me, glancing at the dead bodies.

"Indeed," Rumena said. "You may now boast strength equal to a rat trap, First Under the Night."

Fuck, no comeback came to mind. Not again, goddamnit. Komena cawed in amusement. She always played favourites, the bitch. The Secret of Scathing Retorts remained enthroned.

"Ugh, just take us to the whatever temple," I sneered.

It took to victory with a mocking grin. Masego cleared his throat.

"And send the corpses after us," I added. "The Hierophant has laid claim to them."

If there was one upside to dealing with the Firstborn, it was that no one so much as batted an eye when Zeze asked for a pile of corpses.

Silver linings, eh?

—

Serolen was a city that had been built out of a hundred cities, and there was no other like it on Calernia. The finest monuments and architectural wonders of a nation millennia old had been stolen and regurgitated wherever it pleased Sve Noc, a haphazard nightmare of great beauty. Towers carved out of stalagmites jutted out of the forest floor along with elaborate painted pyramids and what looked like an entire city district on a mile-wide plate of stone. Small houses of stone and wood had risen up between the great works, streets being burned into the ground with Night along the sprawling canals that Andronike had insisted on.

The temple-fortress was not one of the ornate and beautiful places, but instead exactly what it had been named as: a square of heavy obsidian walls surrounding a squat fortress of stone and bone topped by an airy temple without doors where Sve Noc liked to nest. Our rooms were at the heart of the fortress, deep in the belly behind half a dozen heavily armed sigils. I sent Zombie up to the temple, knowing she'd enjoy the place and the Sisters wouldn't mind, and dropped my affairs in the luxurious rooms that'd been designated as mine before immediately heading for the war council, where Rumena and Mighty Ysengral would be waiting. Ivah had left to attend to the Losara and prepare them for my return, while Akua and Cordelia both indicated interest in attending the council. Masego, not so much.

"I want to dissect the bodies while they're still fresh," Zeze informed me. "My interest lies in the intersection between Night and the physical body, which requires that there still be wisps of it yet to fade."

Well, it wasn't like he was actually going to pay attention if I forced him to come.

"Don't get too deep in a new study," I warned. "We might need to go on war footing soon."

He scowled at me but did not argue. Good enough. I picked up Cordelia and Akua, both of which were drawing stares wherever we went. All three of us were human, but unlike them I could be felt to have power in the Night – with my hood down and no skin showing, I might be taken for a short Firstborn if not for the depths of my strength revealing me as Sve Noc's chosen herald. In a nostalgic turn, the war council room that I found was much like the one I had seen in Great Lotow long ago: thrones set against the walls and an empty stone floor at the heart. Neither Rumena nor Mighty Ysengral were seated when I entered, an implicit mark of respect.

I'd seen Ysengral in dreams before. It was the best defensive commander of the Firstborn in my opinion, only the eighth of the Ten Generals but having proved utterly lethal to Keter's forces by relying heavily on traps and artillery. It had earned the sobriquet 'Cradle of Steel' the hard way. It was no more impressive in person than it had been through the visions, a skinny drow with short white hair and a slight overbite revealing half-broken teeth. It wore black half-plate made of an alloy forged through Night over steel ringmail, and a single-edged sword was sheathed at its hip.

Both it and Rumena offered me a respectful nod as I swept in, Akua and Cordelia behind me.

"Mighty Ysengral," I smiled. "Our meeting is a long-awaited pleasure."

"Shared, Losara Queen," the drow replied. "I ate memories of the campaigns in Hainaut with great pleasure."

A toss-up whether the poor bastard whose memories had been eaten still lived. Just because Ysengral was competent didn't mean it was any less vicious than the rest of the Firstborn when it wanted something.

"I bring with me Prince Cordelia Hasenbach, of the Lycaonese," I told it, "and the one who was once a shade in the Night, Akua Sahelian."

Ysengral flicked a silvery glance at Akua.

"I have heard of your works, Mighty Shade," it nodded.

Cordelia did not rank the same courtesy. If she was offended, she did not show it. It wouldn't be the last insult she swallowed today anyway, as I'd told her. For one neither she nor Akua would get to sit here, as it would imply they were equals to the two Mighty – something neither of them was likely to tolerate even if I interceded. It was easy enough to find which was my throne: one of them was twice as large as the others, about the right height for me and positively dripping with sculpted crows. I sat down with relief and they followed suit. Cordelia came to stand by my right, Akua following suit to my left with an amused quirk of the lips.

"Mighty Ivah told me of the state of Serolen, but the talk seems to have been out of date," I said. "Where do we stand?"

It was Ysengral that fielded the question, flicking a wrist as it called on Night. An illusion that resembled Serolen as seen from above spread across the stone floor. Nails of pale light began to coalesce over much of the eastern half of the city and a chunk of the centre where the canals converged

"The traitor sigils have seized nearly half the city," Ysengral said. "The traitor Ishabog's attempt to seize the heart of the canals was ended by Mighty Rumena, but the traitor Moren has broken the back of two of our own offensives."

Ishabog the Adversary, the Fourth General. One whose sigil was small and made of only the strongest Mighty, numbering not a single nisi and dzulu. Its defection to Kurosiv was not unexpected. Moren Bleakwomb was an even harsher loss, having been the Third General. It knew Secrets that granted it power over ice and snow, an arsenal that had only grown more deadly after Sve Noc devoured Winter. In a straight fight it was probably weaker than Rumena, but it didn't give straight fights and anybody trying to kill it was going to die in a permanent blizzard long before catching sight of it.

One of its favourite tactics was to use its dzulu and lesser Mighty to bait an enemy sigil onto grounds it could encase in ice, killing both in a stroke, so I could see why Kurosiv's ways would be of greater appeal to it than the reforms.

"And what have they been doing since Ishabog got whipped?" I asked.

"Skirmishes across all boundaries," Rumena said. "They push strongest for the temples in the city heart, but there have been attacks everywhere."

"Moren placed sigils at the border and gave them lead to raid as they wish," Ysengral told me. "Ishabog and its riders join the raids as they pleased, abducting duzu and slaughtering all others."

I frowned.

"So they've stopped with major pushes?" I asked.

"I believe Ishabog is joining raids to find a weakness in our defences," Ysengral said. "It looks for a killing stroke."

I looked at Rumena.

"They are provoking us to attack," Rumena disagreed. "Only I could match Ishabog on the field and it follows no strategy, so they hoped to bait us into another offensive so that we might try to force its presence."

The old drow grimaced.

"It is a trap," the Tomb-maker said, "we have seen that Kurosiv's traitors are raising towers of obsidian in many places across the city."

I did not like the sound of that at all.

"Do we know why?" I asked.

"They might be meant to empower Moren's winter," Ysengral suggested. "We have dammed it on their side of the canals with Secrets, but if forced through our defences it could overturn the preparations of my sigil."

"I do not believe it Moren's work," Rumena disagreed. "It has always preferred raw strength to ritual, and Ishabog even more so. There is only one other mind that can have conceived of such a thing."

Kurosiv themselves. Yeah, the more I heard about that the less I liked it.

"Then we need to have a look at one of those towers," I said. "We need to know what they're for. What kind of defences are we looking at?"

"Significant," Mighty Ysengral replied. "Sigils defend them and sometimes more than one. No less than an offensive will let us reach even the closest."

I clenched my fingers and unclenched them.

"Then that's what-"

I felt Andronike brush against my mind, the refusal deep. They did not want us to go on the attack. Why? I had fallen silent, turning to look at the temple above us through the ceiling, but no one asked why. The answer my patronesses conveyed was complicated enough it took me some time to decipher. They were afraid the deaths would feed the towers, I got, only the fear was not just in abstract. You don't believe those towers are about the fighting on the ground, do you? You think they're a weapon forged to kill you. I mulled over that, biting my lip. I could see where the suspicions came from.

Rumena was convinced they were baiting an attack from us and Ysengral had noted that Ishabog was abducting dzulu when it raided. Were those meant as workers to raise the tower, or sacrifices to feed them? Maybe both. Either way, it hinted that the towers needed people to be on the other side of the canal for them to be of us. An offensive was playing right into that. But doing nothing was not an answer either, we all knew that. The longer we waited the longer the enemy had to advance their plans.

"That's a problem," I admitted. "How would either of you rank the chances of a small cabal making it to one of the towers hidden?"

Neither of the Might looked convinced.

"Moren knows all that tread its winter," Ysengral said.

"There are ways around every power," I said.

"They'll have seer Secrets everywhere around the towers," Rumena replied more bluntly. "Without the cover of an offensive and the chaos of war, there will be no success."

"The deaths of an offensive across the canals might be turned against us," I said. "We will not make such an attempt."

The once-First Prince of Procer stirred at my right. I turned to look at her.

"Cordelia?" I asked. "Speak."

"Am I to understand, Losara Queen, that it is the deaths of our soldiers that are the reason such an attempt cannot be made?"

Eh, maybe not in an absolute sense but in practice yes. Kurosiv might be able to sacrifice its own sigils to try to kill Sve Noc, but it would be a bloody gamble – and if it lost, it would have nothing left. Much better to spread out the deaths between two sides, even them out by making it a war.

"More or less," I agreed.

"Then I may have a way," Cordelia Hasenbach said.

The drow seemed skeptical, but I knew better.

"What do you need?"

"One day," she replied, "and every Firstborn chronicler you can spare."

Well now, I thought, that ought to get interesting.

TRUELIKEtheRIVER

"I am the Warden, you upstart thing," I hissed, "and if you dare raise your voice against me, I will Silence it."

AA

dadycool

Yeah, that was amazing.

Darkening

Was that an aspect? Given how often she's used that command to great effect it would be fitting. Could have just been Speaking, I suppose, though it seems a bit of an odd use case. She probably would have made a comment if it'd been her awaking an aspect I guess.

dadycool

She did make a comment about how if she used it thrice, it'd likely be permanent. It was when they met with the Herald and his boyfriend a second time.

boballab

It was written in Bold which EE uses to denote aspect use. What is more significant to me is whether Kurosiv cut his tie to Eterin before Silence hit or did it get him, like it did Malicia through her puppet when Cat was in Praes, and Silence cut the tie. If it worked on him like it did Malicia that could be very crippling to it.

Earl of Purple

Speaking is also bold, that doesn't actually mean anything. Not yet, at least.

Maeveam

The fact that it killed its power suggests this was an aspect. Would Speaking the word 'Silence' have done that?

Earl of Purple

I had misread/misremembered by the time I made my comment.

ISiejek

Possibly, part of her name is Command as has been show before, it could go either way, personally I think making one of her aspects Speaking would work best

shikkarasu

I'm 90% certain that this was an Aspect. That would explain why commanding someone to be Silent was more powerful than Speaking should have been; she was passively tapping into the Aspect without actively using it. We have gotten confirmation that Aspects can be used to empower actions without being burned in that once-a-day sort of way. I think that's what happened in the meeting with the Dwarves, and here she was using actively invoking Silence for the first time.

Put more simply, I don't think there is any way in Hells that her authority over Kurosiv is strong enough for her to Speak to him through a follower like that. He's a traitor, so not under her authority as FUtN, and not Named. This would be more impressive than what she did to the Dwarves, at a far greater range. Surely it's one of her long-awaited Aspects.

shikkarasu

Also, she said "I will [Silence]," which is not a command, like Speaking, but rather the way Aspects are introduced. Aspects nearly always describe the speaker doing something. To themselves, to others, or to the world.

"And if you won't give me my due," I said. "I'll Take it." something had broken and he needed to Mend it.
"Come on, you bastard. Here I Stand,"

Earl of Purple

I'd misread or misremembered by the time I reached the comments, I was in fact wrong.

Taltos Dreamer

I think it was her will through Speaking combined with her power in Night. It looks like the Warden has power over the Name-adjacent like the Mighty...or the Mighty count as Named in Drow culture.

Rey d`Tutto

Nope. Aspect.

Haven't read ahead, this is a prediction.

ohJohN

Already pretty settled by previous replies, but just some additional textual observations.

Speaking:

- always takes the form of complete commands (even if only a single word), not statements or questions
- generally is standalone dialogue, or kept distinct from other non-Speaking dialogue by a sentence or clause break
- is entirely bolded
- is only capitalized according to standard English rules (i.e. words that begin a sentence or proper nouns)

By contrast, the invocation of an aspect:

- bolds & capitalizes the name of the aspect (and nothing else)
- can be thought or spoken or narrated, as a single word or as part of a complete sentence

So this is definitely an aspect invocation, as it's part of a statement and capitalized where it otherwise wouldn't be.

Agent J

It's also the right kind of verb for an Aspect as well. If she commanded him to be Silent, that wouldn't have fit as an aspect grammatically speaking and would definitely be Speaking. Silence on the other hand is the right sort of specific verb (don't remember the technical term) for an Aspect.

Frivolous

Hah. I was right after all. Kurosiv really did end up making a deal with Keter AND running away.

Still in the middle of reading.

Frivolous

Also thanks EE for remembering and correcting that the Dreamer was still active, since the Tribulation mentioned the Dreamer had been killed.

I'm guessing you fixed that since I can't find it anymore in this chapter.

megaprr

Great chapter as always!

One aspect down... two to go!

megaprr

Anyone care to make predictions?

Daniel E

Badgers, because it's always badgers. Always a disaster, never just a minor problem. Never 'Oh no, we're out of the really good wine, but that's ok we'll just drink this still-decent wine instead'.

shikkarasu

I'm confident in Collect, used twice in dramatic moments, just begging for a third, and I'm hoping for Rein, but I think Silence covers that pretty well, so odds are it will be something else..

Rey d`Tutto

Not Collect... Take

ninegardens

Ummmm...

Wut.

Like some sort of wild Counter ritual from Akua or Zeze I might expect, but Cordelia coming in hot with "Yo, someone give me the history books. I got this" was not what I was expecting.

This sounds awesome, and I am all for it... but also what the heck?

dadycool

I'm tempted to assume she's coming into something, considering she spent a long time in the Salia library and came out of it with a small arsenal. Now she looks at certain doom and baffled allies and says that.

spencer

I think we've pretty clearly established that Cordelia will never become Named.

shikkarasu

I agree, and yet am similarly tempted. What all did she learn while working with the Forgetful Librarian? What were FL's Aspects? What else did Cordelia take with her

dadycool

Ho about a Role? If she'll be an Administrator, she'd be able to weaponize rules, policies, traditions, and such.

jamesc9

So she wants to know which rules, policies and traditions are available to weaponize in this situation.

ninegardens

Some sort of Queen/administrator perhaps?

RoflCat

Well, considering she took the 'right hand' position + Cat noted that she hasn't earn the respect of the Drows, it make sense that she need to establish herself.

Considering the nature of the Drows on the other side, my first guess is she'll dig up their old grudges/oaths and use that to cause chaos + analyze what Secrets the enemies may have.

erebus42

Well this is certainly a cluster fuck. I do sincerely hope that if Cat can end this situation the Drow will be able to consolidate and recompose themselves. They definitely are my favorite faction and they unfortunately felt like the collective whipping boy of last book.

Insanenoodlyguy

That's the easy part. Drow are very accepting of the idea "this side won, they are in charge now, the fact they were stronger is proof that they are right, or at least more right." Ynan says he is the new god and meant to bring them to old ways. If the old god beats him, that will settle that for most.

edrey

well, this is a disaster, no better place for Cat.
Now the Queen of winter, ice and darkness, loss and found is in her terrain.

Great chapter as always

dadycoool

She was born in a pit. Uphill battles are where she learned to walk. Struggle was the first Word she ever learned. Her teeth grew in chewing on the fallen corpse of a foe above and beyond her. Her second life began by looking Power in the eye and forcing it to submit to her will.

ohJohN

I love this, but the pedantic ghouls that haunt my brain insist that "Struggle was the second Word she ever [L]earned" (because Learn was her first aspect)

I'm sorry, I also hate these ghouls, but here we are 🙄

jamesc9

The ghouls are trying to help you. I acknowledge that accepting their help, in the form in which they want to give it, may be problematic.

Kletanio

Don't forget that Hasselhoff has experience holding together a country that has no business remaining held together.

shikkarasu

Rule #3: Don't Hassel the Bach

caoimhinh

It still surprises me how Sve Noc let the situation come to this

dadycoool

Well, that's the thing about giving your underlings the power of choice with out inherent, immediate repercussions. Some of them don't make the choices you like and some of those choices turn into big problems.

beleester

"See, this is exactly the reason why I wanted to mind control the world. The rebellion is only proving my point."
-Dread Emperor Imperious

Ed

Not like they had a choice, it's been one arse kicking after another for them.

Xinci

Eh, blame both Sve and Cat. They are in this state in the first place due to not preparing institutional contingencies or at least logistical frameworks beyond a single point of failure(which...big oof on Cat as a Villain for that) when they intended to fight the Dead King. Naturally, it has come to this since Sves means of regulation have either been inferior or just incomplete.

ninegardens

Also, Sve is goddess of "Theft in victory". This is all well and good, but also means that "Theft and victory" are BY DEFINITION valid means of taking power from her. The nature of the power itself is "Finders keepers", and has been for thousands of years.

You might as well criticise a prime minister for being voted out.

Theft and trechery is what Sve's power is made out of.

Zach

This situation is an example of why you need to deal with counter-revolutionary elements and can't just let them hang around.

masterofbones

Its also a great example for why its hard to do something about the counter-revolutionaries.

All the weak, mostly useless in combat people love the new rules. Tons of the strongest, most valuable people hate them. What is the result? The rebels are almost entirely made up of skilled and intelligent individuals, while your loyalists are almost entirely made up of fodder.

Its remarkably similar to what happens if you crack down on major corporations. They will just leave, meaning that location's productivity plummets.

ohJohN

You'd think Cat would be better prepared, given her father's shining example in post-Conquest Callow 😊

sengachi

Honestly, in all my studies of history I've seen a revolution this big which didn't involve a reactionary movement on at least this scale. It's just a really freaking hard problem to wrest power from the powerful without them using that power to fight it.

Juff

Typo Thread:

says cannot > says it cannot sit out > sat out cut under (should this be "cut it") There's been > There'd been somber > sombre (somber is us spelling) moment was passed > moment we passed Ivahs' > Ivah's roof the great > roof of the great they... weak > they were... weak
A whisper against > There was a whisper against (or a whisper sounded, or something like that) began to rip > beginning to rip drow's, it > drow's; it was loud > was a loud armour drow > armoured drow
I landed atop (extra space) and return the > and returned the to return to convert back (one or the other) with he strength > with the strength blow straight > blown straight put my guard > put up my guard and with a free > and had a free as least > at least that they put > that it put easy my > ease my seen. Its back > seen, its back ochre sunflower in ochre (is the repetition intentional?) gave them lead > gave them leave duzu > dzulu said, "the Dreamer > said. "The Dreamer Kurosiv themselves > Kurosiv itself (or is kurosiv a them, not it) be of us. > be of use.
Might looked > Mighty looked such an attempt. > such an attempt."

Liliet

Cordelia "not Named" Hasenbach continues to be amazing.

SILENCE!!! CALLED IT!!!

And Hell Yeah new drow arc!!!! Pretty Serolen!!!

And hell yeah Akua still sticking by Cat. What an amazing combination of having no idea what she wants and knowing EXACTLY what she wants. God.

Wonder

Holy shit !!! New Aspects are the best!!!!

I was planning to go piss at reading all of the chapter but damn that New shiny aspect Silenced my resistance in sheer awe . I had to go take the mother of piss while crowing out in praise .

Dos the land without light reference mean the new Story is still in this universe?

gladiuslucix

I assumed the "kingdom without light" was just the Drow equivalent of "promised land" or "land of milk and honey." A place that may not actually exist, but they'll promise you it does if you join them.

ohJohN

this, it makes sense that "a kingdom without light" would be a promised utopia for a people that spent millennia underground and are physically & magically weakened by sunlight

Adrian_V

Huh so Silence, and it can be used to kill things or at least make them as if they were dead or destroyed if that is what it takes to make the silent (basically like snuffing something), usefull if she can control the level of measure although we have seen all aspect can be streeched (would be funny if she later on uses it to get silence after a night drinking xD)

I won't be surprised if 1 of its more practical application is to shut off other aspects.

Now lets see how Cordelia gaings some fame among Drow

dadycool

Well, there is a certain Name that's based around singing, or at least telling stories, which makes her voice the foundation of her Name.

ninegardens

Oh shit. Cat is going to silence the bard, and then she'll have to steer stories completely through mime!

Hell... just from a narrative point of view, Silence would break the bard's name and... unlike anything else we've seen might actually be enough to unmake her.
Cool.

Wonder

Apparently Being Silenced Three times makes the effect permanent. Cat speculates during the Post Warden chapter ,the dwarf negotiation.

spencer

I don't think that her Silence directly killed Mighty Eterin. It just removed Kurosiv's influence, and without it Cat one-punched Eterin to dust.

KageLupus

Exactly. Cat actually Silenced Kurosiv, and that removed the connection between it and Mighty Eterin. Without a source of Night Mighty Eterin became just Eterin, and without that power it was never going to stand a chance against Cat.

What I find really interesting is just how Night reacts to Name stuff in general. Cat is something of an exception I think, given her Name and role in Drow society, so I can see how she is able to use an Aspect on Kurosiv. But I have to imagine that anyone else would be hard pressed to do something even remotely similar.

I have also been thinking about whether the Drow lack Names because of something inherent to the Night that they use, or simply because of cultural reasons. I really thought the big twist of this arc would be some Drow getting a new Name and starting off a new era of their society. Probably Ivah since that would be a good mirror to Hakram getting the first Orc Name in centuries or however long it was. But that supposes that Drow can actually become Named and I am still not convinced that is true. There was definitely too much emphasis on the individual before the exodus for them to be able to form Names. The question is whether Cat has shifted their culture enough that they can start wearing the grooves in Creation that Names fill in.

Earl of Purple

I think there's WoE that drow don't have Names because Night-as-it-was already filled that space; drow won't get a Name from Below with Night because that's double-dipping into Below's pool, and drow culturally aren't ready for Above Names- and also won't get one if they hold Night, since that requires sacrifice on an altar of Below's. Now Night has been Ruined, it may well be possible for drow Named to crop up- and I'm leaning toward either Ivah or Rumena for that.

Adrian_V

It basically destroyed something since it was the only way to make it "silent", not sure if it was the working or the night used in it

jamesc9

"if 1 of its more practical application is to shut off other aspects"

We've seen Cat's Silence weaken Malacia's Rule.

BargleNawdleZouss

Hmm, I thought Cordelia was going to volunteer to use the ealamal on the traitor-held portion of the city, and then the group having a debate on how precisely the angel-smiting can be targeted. I'm looking forward to her diplomatic solution instead!

shikkarasu

She may not be Named, but Cordelia is showing that she is still certainly a PC.

DM: you need to enter a fortress, which is heavily monitored, and if you start a fight the bodies will trigger a Doomsday Ritual.

Cordelia's player: Are there enough books here to get advantage on a Knowledge:History check?

DM: ...whyyyy?

Cordelia's player: I have an Idea.

DM: No, this is a clear stealth mission. Guys, back me up.

Catherine's player: I want to see where this goes.

Akua's player: I take the Help action. Can she use my Int bonus?

DM: YOU ALWAYS DO THIS.

Linnus42

Cordelia randomly comes up with an idea despite knowing jack about the Drow? One could argue the archives gave her some insight but she wasn't the one doing the reading. And given the Drow's limited interactions with the surface one would question the veracity of such chronicles. Well I suppose EE brought Cordelia for a reason and EE does love having Cordelia shine. Highly biased towards the character in my book. Insight here would make more sense coming from Akua in my book.

Some thought Cordelia would be for the angel weapon but nothing suggest that has precision targeting quite the opposite. It really seems to have a massive AOE that spreads from a central point. I suppose it could be used if all the rival drow were on the side of the area closest to the angel exterminatus.

Cat reminds me of Dany here. Show up to a culture make a bunch of sweeping reforms and surprised Pikachu face when they backfire. Because you didn't understand the culture you were trying to change. Also sweeping reforms during a war also tend to be some optimal if they are not about winning said war.

Probably should have brought Mirror Knight lol. Really someone who could use Light would be useful here.

As for the Drow cutting a deal with DK seems kinda obvious. DK got consulted by the Twilight Sages back in the day and has plenty of time to study Night. I see no particular reason why DK bother going back on the deal. If he has mopped up the rest of the continent chasing the remaining Drow seems a waste of time. I suppose it depends on if he thinks his future moves will require cutting deals.

Cat's Aspect is Silence.

kinigget

Leaving aside your weird grudge against Cordelia, Cat's reforms didn't actually fail, this was always going to be a possibility just by the nature of what Night is. Also Mirror Knight is the actual single worst idea possible to bring here. Motherfucker once tried to sell the Drow out and they know it, Light is the nuclear option here, and as much as he's gotten better about it, he still hasn't quite shaken off his Proceran Supremacist views. The man is a war waiting to happen.

Linnus42

My point with Cordelia is I find it weird she who doesn't know jack about Drow and has limited interaction with the Drow. Magically discovers a solution in like 5 seconds of being told the situation. That is ignoring the fact that she should not even be able to follow the discussions cause she doesn't speak the language. Seems to me more author bias for Cordelia to shine here than any well setup payoff or logic from EE. It also clashes with the message of Cat causing this issue because despite knowing about more about Drow she didn't consider the ramifications as an outsider imposing reforms.

I would not count a Civil War during a War against extinction a grand success of policy. Will Cat's policy work in the long term sure that is likely...was it good move to implement in the short term headed into a war against extinction the answer there seems no.

The solution to this False god issue is probably to going to involve killing said False god. Which means that bringing some Light User for this mission would be quite smart. Mirror Knight is most optimized to beat Drow specifically though which I was a name dropped him.

Xinci

Hmm, I am still really curious if Sve Noc will be "dead" or at least broken to the point of basic inability to interact by the end of this. Momentum is currently on the side of Kurosiv, their power bloc is more fluid in action and is actively collecting power from other Drow to form a new god. Whereas Sve Noc is calcified, her side has a set of rules but those don't actually apply to the framework of usage and dissemination of secrets and their powers. Eventually, one would likely self emerge under the paradigm Cat set, which is more efficient methodologically, that would eventually precipitate systematically to the rest of the Drow sigils, but she is mimicking societies that grow such things gradually. And as an important caveat, such things need to be protected because they are somewhat fragile as they grow. It's possible that the formation of the Losara will be a saving grace though since they do form a societal apparatus for information accrual. It seems likely Kurosiv got the schema after observing or just directly from the DK too(with those towers also likely being sabotaged so he gets the info for more research as a general assumption) since they seem similar to the pillars he used to absorb Night before.

Abrakadabra

My guess is that Nessi wears Kurosiv lile an old smelly sock.

benjamin h

if i were the drow i'd take the deal with keter tbh.

jjr

Wait a sec, Mighty Kurosiv claims at least some of its legitimacy from its claim that it won a verse game with the Dead King, winning a reprieve from death for nine years. And now Cordelia wants, "every Firstborn chronicler you can spare." Is this war going to be decided by an epic rap battle?

ninegardens

Oh, holy shit, you are right.

MC Hasenbach is in the HOUSE.

308924810a

Is there any actual reason for the loyalist Drow to stay here? If they all uproot and go through Twilight to the south they should still be able to get enough food to survive, and will have neatly derailed whatever plan these rebel drow are pursuing, leaving them with a large number of undead forces already positioned on their borders and very little to offer the Dead King as a deal. Perhaps he'd let them sit out the war as the rebels are claiming he promised, perhaps he'd alter the deal and require they fight on his behalf so he can get a force that can operate in Twilight.

shikkarasu

DK would likely let them leave, but give them no means to do so. The rebels would then attack the coasts of Calernia to steal or make ships, leaching military resources that no-one can spare to stop them. The Loyalists would be stabbing the rest of the continent in the back to flee South, basically ensuring their own deaths unless they also leave the continent. So they will need to raid coasts as well. It's not the killing blow that attacking Twilight would be, but it would knock the Drow front out of the war and set enemies fighting each other all without costing the Dead King anything at all.

This is all assuming that they only needed to worry about outside forces. Some Mighty, such as Rumena, won their position with the promise of defeating the Dead King. They lose their position as Sigil holders if they run, now.

Chapter 44: Antecedents

"If you cannot be good, be just. If you cannot be just, be mindful. If you cannot even be that, then be slain by a better man."

– Clément Merovins, fourth First Prince of Procer

I was too restless to sleep, after the council, and so I sought company instead.

Masego barely slept any more than I did, so it was at the... well, he'd probably call it a laboratory but it was really more a charnel yard that the Firstborn provided him. He was cutting open a rylleh's skull with a silver knife when I entered, from the top of the head to the strange almost beak-like nose bone that drow had where humans had cartilage. While there were more bones there were less muscles on their species' face compared to humans and they were placed differently. It was one of the reasons the drow were considered less expressive.

I dropped into a rough stone seat, watching him work. As a girl I'd found the sight gruesome, but these days I'd made enough corpses that their sight evoked little in me.

"Learned anything useful?"

Hierophant did not immediately answer, waiting until he'd finished cutting through the bone properly and revealed the black sausage-like brain under.

"Useful?" he mused. "I do not know. Yet certainly interesting."

We tended to have somewhat different ideas about what that word meant, but what the Hells. It wasn't like I had anything better to do.

"Like what?" I asked.

He looked surprised, eyeing me suspiciously.

"You do not usually express much interest in my dissections," Masego said.

He sounded, I thought, a tad reproachful.

"It's drow corpses and I am First Under the Night," I shrugged. "You might say it's in my wheelhouse."

He mulled over that, then nodded in agreement.

"What do you know about the nature of the Gift?" he asked me.

I hummed.

"I read the Natura Virtutis by Warlock Shatha," I said. "The ability to do magic has two components: one his physical, the body must be born with the talent, while the second is metaphysical and necessitates a soul."

"Shatha's work is incomplete, never explaining how the likes of devils and fae can use a form of sorcery," Masego noted. "I would recommend you read Magister Cressida's Theologos, which skillfully revises and completes the theory. Still, it serves as a base."

He paused.

"The metaphysical aspect is the most essential of the two," Masego said. "It is why Akua was able to practice magic after seizing a new body while it would be pointless of me to attempt the same: the Saint of Sword severed the part of my soul that interconnects with the physical, allowing the use of magic. Changing the body would mean nothing."

"I'm following so far," I said. "How does that lead to the Firstborn?"

He tapped the side of his knife on the open drow brains.

"There have been Firstborn mages in the past," Masego said. "We know this as a fact. So why none since the creation of Night?"

I hummed. That was a pretty good question, actually.

"Did the Sisters kill the capacity?" I asked.

"It would be more apt to say that they replaced it," Hierophant said. "As far as I can tell, the same part of the soul that was cut in me – that allows the use of magic – is used for the manipulation of Night."

"Every drow uses Night, to some extent," I pointed out. "They can't all be capable of magic."

He beamed at me.

"My wonder exact," Masego said. "I can think of only two existing manner of creatures that can all use a manner of sorcery, fae and devils. Species whose sentience is a complex matter."

Considering fae were living stories and devils grew more intelligent the older they got, on top of both having a sort of immortality, I could see his point. The Firstborn weren't really like either.

"Every Firstborn is born with some Night, supposedly," I mused. "It's only those Mighty that have been alive since its creation that lived without it."

And there were precious few of those. Not even all of the Ten Generals had been born before the fall of the Empire Ever Dark.

"That is because your patronesses have changed the souls of the drow," Masego said, sounding impressed by the Crows for what might be the first time.

I felt their weight of their attention suddenly in the back of my mind, the two of them listening through my ears. Masego's golden eye lingered on me, and I wondered if he could see them. I wouldn't be surprised. Either way it didn't stop him.

"It is very crude work," Hierophant opined. "Metaphysically speaking, it is the equivalent of hammering a nail through the forehead to serve as a connection. In those born capable of magic – as one of the rylleh you provided me was – it appears to destroy that capacity.”

Komena felt irritated, I could tell because the emotion was strong, but underneath that cover I could sense that Andronike was worried. Gods. How many people in all their years had ever found this out? It couldn't be many.

“In those born without it, however,” he continued, “it appears to serve as a prosthetic of sorts. An appendage that functions as the connection between soul and body they do not have.”

My eye narrowed.

“Let me guess,” I said. “That nail, it's the piece of Night that every Firstborn is born with.”

“More likely there is additional Night as well, gifted by Sve Noc through the nail so that its functionality is confirmed,” Masego said. “I imagine that when Night ‘fades’ after a death, it is returned to your patronesses through that very appendage – destroying itself in the process.”

He leaned forward over the corpse-covered table.

“Did I miss anything?” Hierophant coldly smiled, asking the goddesses lurking in my soul.

They went away, silent, and he chuckled.

“I didn't think so,” Masego said.

I rolled my eye at him.

“Always glad to see you making friends,” I chided.

“I admire the inventiveness of their original work, do not misunderstand me,” he said. “It is their ramshackle attempt at apotheosis that offends. Unlike you, who stumbled to the result accidentally, they have no excuse for their sloppiness.”

Nice of him to excuse me, but I couldn't actually argue with the way he'd put it so I did not risk sarcasm.

“It was a desperate decision made to save their people, Zeze,” I reminded him. “Not a master plan.”

“I will not laud a hollow doll as a god, Catherine,” Masego shrugged. “If they claimed themselves to be less I would keep silent, but so long as they claim divinity I will offer the very scorn that claim deserves.”

Yeah, I did not foresee a great friendship between Zeze and the Crows. A civil tongue was probably the best I could hope for, to be honest, so best to change the subject before they started listening in again.

"So, do you think Kurosiv made their own nails?" I asked.

That got his interest.

"I do not think they can," Hierophant admitted.

"Huh," I said. "How's that?"

"The 'miracle' of Night that creates these nails, Catherine, is not something any of the Mighty could do," he told me. "We came here, you might remember, for the original Night. The power that was bestowed onto Sve Noc by the Gods Below and makes up the heart of their godhead."

"You think the nails are made of that," I guessed.

He nodded.

"Kurosiv is bestowed and not bestower," Masego said. "They cannot create nails because only the original Night can shape souls."

"So they're just usurping where the nails go," I mused. "Taking over part of the spider web, so to speak."

"You forget," Hierophant said, "that the nails are part of Sve Noc. It is more accurate to say that Kurosiv is attempting to devour their godhead one piece at a time, that they might become a god in the place of the Sisters."

I clenched my fingers. Like a tug of war that only ended when one side held all the rope and strangled the enemy with it.

"It's to the death, then," I said.

Masego looked at me, eye glimmering gold.

"Oh yes," he smiled. "Very much to the death."

Well, wouldn't that make for sweet dreams.

—

I was up before dawn, breaking my fast when Cordelia was brought to me by an ispe of the Losara. My sigil had smoothly slid into the role of my attendants and escorts since my arrival, treating me as if I had never left, and it would be a lie to say that I did not enjoy it. The former First Prince sat across the low table, eyeing the spread of food laid out for us.

"Don't eat the mushrooms," I told her. "They make humans laugh uncontrollably whenever we drink water."

The blonde princess looked appalled.

"You have a plate full of them," Cordelia said.

"I can burn out the effect," I said, "and they are tasty as Hells."

I popped another one in my mouth, chewing on the savoury flesh. I could eat all sorts of terrible stuff again now that I could use my Name to burn out 'poison' again, it was pretty great. She stuck to the bread and what she probably assumed to be honey and not the blood of gem-eating snake crystallized and then melted into a brew. Tasted pretty similar, though, so might be best not to break it to her. We polished off our food and then got to business, Ivah arriving at the precise moment I needed of it. It bowed and sat at Cordelia's side under her curious gaze.

"Ivah is my second among the Losara," I said. "And it speaks fluent Chantant and Lower Miezán, as you know, so it'll be your guide and translator. The highest Mighty usually speak a few human languages, but those historians you asked for won't."

It would also be her escort, since Cordelia was full of knowledge and eminently killable. Having the effective head of the Losara at her side would it clear she wasn't to get her throat cut so some jawor could learn to speak Reitz.

"You have gathered them, then," Cordelia said.

"I have," I replied. "Though there's no such thing as a Firstborn historian in the sense you mean. There are Mighty, though, who through Secrets or because of personal interests have gathered histories of their people both ancient and recent."

"That is what I need," she nodded. "May I call on your war council for information as to the enemy's situation across the river?"

I nodded, seeing no issue.

"Ivah will handle it," I said. "Practically speaking, you can ask for pretty much anything you need."

I offered her a sharp smile.

"One might say your work is divinely blessed."

She looked rather torn at that. Sve Noc were horrors, hard to get around that, but it was useful to have gods in one's corner.

"I look forward to working with you, then, Ivah of the Losara," Cordelia said, offering it a nod.

"And I you," Ivah replied, perhaps more politely than honestly.

Eh, it'd work out. Ivah would prefer to go wade in the blood of our enemies at my side, sure, but its skills were better employed elsewhere at the moment. Besides, if I was reading the Sisters right it would be good for it to have a history of working with Proceran royalty. My tenure as First Under the Night would end before long and my replacement would need to deal with humans whether they liked it or not. I took my leave from them, having something like an appointment to head to. It had been long since I last communed with my patronesses, and I'd yet to have a proper look at the temple where they roosted. N my way to the aerie, though, I came across an unexpected sight.

Akua was leaning against a windowsill in one of the high corridors overlooking the ramparts, hair loose and eyes distant. My limping gait was easy enough to recognize but she did not turn when I approach, eyes staying on the distant shapes of the great monuments the Sisters had stolen from their ruin of an empire to adorn their capital with. Not unlike, I thought, magpies making a nest. I came to stand by her, leaning on my staff instead of the stone.

"Copper for your thoughts?" I offered.

She did not answer immediately, tucking back an errant strand behind her ear. Her red riding dress was form-fitting, but I followed her gaze instead of letting mine linger. She did not seem in that kind of a mood in the slightest.

"I was thinking," Akua said, "of Praes."

I hummed.

"What of it?"

Her jaw tightened.

"I killed it, you know," Akua said. "The Dread Empire. It might be your father that handed me the match, Catherine, but he couldn't have done it in my place. It was my decision. I saw..."

She shook her head.

"Too much, I suppose," Akua said. "Too much I could no longer ignore."

I did not interject.

"And so I burned an empire I could have ruled," the golden-eyed sorceress said.

I leaned against my staff of dead yew, letting it bear my weight and carefully not looking at her.

"Do you regret it?" I asked.

A long moment of silence.

"Yes," she finally said.

My heart clenched. A golden gaze turned to me, darkly amused.

"There is no need for anguish, dearest," Akua said. "You did not fail. It is not the throne I regret but what it might have meant."

"And what's that?" I warily asked.

"Making a difference," she said. "I could have made things better, Catherine. Mended wounds."

She shrugged.

"Here, at your side again, I am not that woman," she said. "I trail in your wake. Not unpleasantly so, but when I remember those who looked at me with hope in their eyes it does not seem enough."

I studied her, silently, from the corner of my eye. She looked at the horizon still.

"So what is it you want?" I asked, too casually.

She rose from the windowsill, all fluid grace, and offered me a lovely smile.

"I do not know," Akua said. "But is it closer to the woman that struck the match than the one who stood silent in the war council last night."

She left, brushing her hand against my arm as she passed, and I said nothing. I thought, standing there as she left, of that moment when you flip a coin. After it reaches the apex and begins to come down, just before it hits your palm.

Just before you know what face will come up.

—

I called Zombie to me instead of taking the stairs all the way to the summit of the temple-fortress.

It didn't end up mattering, because before I could reach my patronesses they reached me. The touch of the Sisters against my mind was light, but the images they offered up burned bright: I was needed elsewhere. The enemy had come, and I pulled at Zombie's reins as our destination changed. Yesterday, we'd won a victory at the Shrine of Tears and I'd personally slapped Kurosiv in the place. It looked like the Fate-Giver was a sore loser, because the Shrine was where it was picking a fight today. And while I'd been expecting Ishabog the Adversary, the opposition's designated raider, to make an appearance what I got was altogether worse: Moren Bleakwomb had come out to play, and the Third General was in no mood for half-measures.

What had been sheets of rain yesterday was now frozen solid, holes smashed through where the raiders attacked. Mighty Kasedan and its sigil had been assigned to hold the Shrine after we retook it, but I could feel not a single survivor of the Kasedan within. All the Firstborn that remained were of that Other Night, the one I could not read as deeply. Besides, I only had need of eyes to be able to tell there would be no survivors: a blizzard was howling behind the ice walls, the mark of Moren Bleakwomb letting loose. It was not the Losara that I led into battle, as it was no longer their role: they were oathkeepers and priests now, no longer warrior-Mighty.

Instead it was the Rumena at my back and the Tomb-maker itself at my side. Standing before one of the holes, I watched the blizzard and cocked my head.

"That's stronger than I was led to expect," I noted. "In sheer power, Bleakwomb's a notch above even you."

General Rumena did not disagree, which spoke volumes.

"Moren has grown in strength," the Tomb-maker evenly said. "More than it should have. This was not taken from another Mighty. It was given."

The scorn in the word was thick. The worthy rose, the worthy took: they were not handed gifts. So Kurosiv had begun to strengthen their lieutenant, huh. I supposed there was nothing keeping them bound to play by Sve Noc's rules anymore.

"How does it compare to Radigast?" I asked.

"Close," Rumena somberly said.

I let out a low whistle. Radigast the Guest, the First General, was powerful enough that even when it possessed the bodies of other Firstborn – the Secret that saw it earn its sobriquet – it could usually bat other Generals around. It and the Gloom-shards was pretty much the reason southern Serolen had yet to turn into a rout, since its sigil was spread out all over and so it could move from one battle to another in the bat of an eye. I rolled my shoulder.

"Well, Rumena," I said, "let's knock before we enter. It's only polite."

I pulled down my hood as the Tomb-maker took a wary step away from me, breathing in and sinking deep in the Night. Blackflame was nothing to sneer at, when you concentrated it, and I'd long learned that trick. I smashed the sheet of ice before us, the sea of black fire I slammed into it sublimating the frozen water and the gust of air making the blizzard within disperse for a moment. Near the gate, anyway. I flicked a glance at Rumena.

"Don't dawdle," I chided. "We've a traitor to discipline."

I stepped into the howling winds, immediately feeling the cold eating at my flesh. Night flared in my veins, burning it away, but I was still reluctantly impressed. That'd been quick. A hundred eyes bloomed to replace my dead one, all buried in wind and snow, but I was feeling out the currents. There was an eye to the storm, a place without wind or frost. Moren and its sigil were there, not in this lethal storm. Behind me I felt Rumena's presence burn in the Night, the ground moving as it raised out of solid stone a path for its sigil to take. Good, that took care of that. I could go straight for Bleakwomb.

It must have thought much the same, because even as I began weaving a bubble of Night against me – a sphere of stillness that would kill the winds – I felt the great presence in the Other Night move towards me. The winds picked up in strength, ice began to spread over the snow and reach for my boots.

"None of that," I sharply said, smashing down the butt of my staff.

Tongues of fire shot out against the ground, revealing bare stone again, and I finished that bubble of stillness just in time for Moren to strike its first blow: high above us, I began to hear cracks.

"You fucking loon," I said, half-admiring. "You're bringing down the ceiling on us, aren't you?"

Only it was worse than that. Wasting no time, I pulled at Night and filled my bubble of stillness with spinning winds – not as strong as Moren's, but strong enough to turn aside anything falling on me. Only it'd not just been me that Bleakwomb was aiming at. When it'd brought down the ceiling, it'd filled a massive storm with hundreds of large pieces of stone. Rumena's hall was ripped apart in moments and I cursed, ordering it to withdraw in the Night. This wasn't a fight, it was a fucking rat trap – and this time we were the rats. The Tomb-maker balked. Its sigil should retreat, it agreed, but itself... We both paused when a dreamlike vision shivered through our minds.

Andronike's hand, but the memory had been taken by Komena: a lookout from the Ysengraļ had just seen Mighty Ishabog and its sigil moving to cut our retreat.

"Go," I snarled at Rumena through the Night. "Clear them out."

There was no argument this time. I turned my attention back to Moren Bleakwomb, whose gaze I could feel on me through the storms. I could see through its own works, I thought. So that was why even though it was far from a brawler it'd made it up to Third General: it always had the advantage of home territory, because it brought the territory with it. Unless I dispersed that blizzard I was fighting uphill and dispersing that thing would blow through most of my strength in the Night. Attrition and aggression with the same single Secret. We'd underestimated our opponent, I thought. Not expected that Kurosiv would empower its lieutenant.

I was not prepared to win this fight.

"Still," I told the blizzard, "there's appearances to maintain. You can't just stroll in, wipe out a sigil and then stay put in a temple that used to be ours. That'd be bad for morale."

I moved around my footing, placed a second hand on my staff and squared my shoulders. I smiled, Night flooding through my veins. Fighting Moren's Secret would just exhaust me, so I did the very opposite. I attuned my Night to its own and fed the working, filled its belly to bursting until the winds howled so loudly that the scream shook the very walls and the pillars holding up the roof began to crack. Ropes snapped, painted shrines shattered and even the frozen waters were ripped out of the canals. I could feel Moren struggle to keep control of the over-mighty working.

"Yeah, you're recent to that kind of power aren't you?" I smiled. "You're not real good at handling it yet, not after so many centuries of stagnating around the same strength."

Then I'd added my own strength and that had made it significantly worse. I'd thought it would. I was no stranger to biting off more than I could chew, so I had a grip on the difficulties involved in your strength increasing so suddenly. The two of us stood in the storm, untouched, as the world broke around us. To my displeasure Moren had control enough to spare its own sigil, maintain the eye of calm, but that was all it could save. The Shrine of Tears broke, everything shattered and ripped apart until no two stones stood atop one another and the beautiful place I had seen yesterday was but a dream.

The winds died, leaving only a flat empty expanse of snow and a ring of rubble around us. I met the eyes of the silhouette across the field, Maren Bleakwomb's staring back unblinking. A tall and skeletally thin drow, haggard in their stringy blue and green clothes – looking half-drowned – and covered in masses of round beads as if attempting to make up for the severity of its figure. I offered the traitor-general a mocking bow, gesturing at the nothingness around us.

"It's all yours," I said.

The Mighty did not answer. I limped away, feeling its gaze biting at my back.

We both knew this was not going to be our last fight.

—

It was nightfall by the time the borders were secure again and I'd spent most the day fighting.

But a day had been spent, and so I went to reap the harvest that had been sown. I found Cordelia Hasenbach in what had been someone's bedchamber but was not covered in papers and tables, the blonde princess animatedly speaking with Ivah and the two dozen other Firstborn on the room as a dzulu of the Losara took notes on what looked like a great map. I squinted at it as I entered, finding mostly sigil names and red lines linking them to other names. The drow bowed as I entered, which I dismissed, and I turned towards Cordelia.

"What am I looking at?" I asked.

"I am pleased to see you as well, Your Majesty," she mildly replied.

"I'm about six hours and nine hundred corpses past courtesies right now," I tiredly replied. "What am I looking at, Hasenbach?"

"War," Ivah replied in her stead, sounding enthused.

I took a longer look at the map, then scanned the papers. Most of it was poetry, records of duels between Mighty and the found of sig- oh, oh.

"Kurosiv's entire philosophy is being hands off," I slowly said. "It's said multiple times that Sve Noc's edict ending fighting between sigils under Keter breaks is a betrayal of the Tenets. So even if its sigils start attacking each other instead of us..."

"It will not intervene," Cordelia said. "At least not immediately."

"So you figured out which of those sigils hated each other in the Everdark," I said. "The feuds and wars."

"Of which there were many," the princess drily said. "And to think I once believes Alamans quarrelsome."

"The worthy take," Ivah agreed.

"If they're fighting each other instead of looking at us, we have a decent shot at getting to one of the towers," I smiled. "That is a solution."

Then I threw her a look.

"If you can get those sigils fighting," I added. "How do you intend to do that?"

"Last night," Cordelia said, "I inferred from context that though some of the greatest Mighty have abilities to detect intruders this is not perfect. That these 'seers' are concentrated around the towers."

I narrowed my eye.

"False attacks," I said. "You want us to paint raiders in other sigil's colours and spill blood so the feuds start up again."

"They are not so different as princes, these sigil-holders," Cordelia quietly said. "And Malicia once taught me the truth of them: they want to fight. All they need is the means and an excuse."

The latter of which we would provide. My gaze turned to Ivah.

"Lord of Silent Steps," I said, "your opinion. Does this have the shape of victory to you?"

It mulled over its words before answering.

"There will be war," Ivah said. "I know not how much, but that there will be war I believe."

I slowly nodded.

"Then let's do it," I ordered.

—

By nightfall the following day, forty-seven sigils under Kurosiv were openly at war with one another and I'd had to refuse eight requests to add Cordelia Hasenbach to the Night.

She'd bought us our shot with her cleverness, now all that was left was to take it.

—

I was out of practice sneaking around without using Night.

Probably should start practicing that again. I'd never been so much as a shade of what Vivienne could do in her prime as a Thief, but for a Squire I'd been pretty decent at getting the drop on people. With the years and the bad leg, though, it'd become more practical to just veil myself and limp right past watchers. That wasn't a possibility tonight: if someone as powerful in the Night as I was started using it on Kurosiv's side of the canals, they were sure to notice. The Sisters had been pretty firm about that. An argument could be made that it might be best if I didn't come along, but my answer had been blunt.

Akua and Masego could probably handle any Firstborn that were not one of the Ten Generals, but that was in a duel. If they got caught and swarmed by a dozen sigil-holders, they were good as dead: Zeze could only Wrest the power one person at a time and Akua's magic was no Night-proof. Someone was going to have a trick that'd get through her shields, and she just couldn't compete with the mobility that any Mighty worth their salt brought to the table. No, if this went bad – and in my experience, little jaunts like this tended to – they would need me to slap the opposition in the face hard enough it bought time for us to leg it.

Some people thought there was more to it, of course.

"I see you cannot suffer the thought of our going on an adventure without you, dearest," Akua amusedly. "How charmingly transparent."

Masego looked at her in surprise.

"I thought it was impolite to point out when she did that," he said.

"Less so when it is done flirtatiously," Akua informed him.

I saw unfoldingly nakedly on Masego's face the struggle between the thought of being able to be ruder to be people and having to be flirtatious. He sighed, turning to look at me.

"Not worth it," he said.

"Hey," I weakly replied, unsure whether I ought to be offended or not.

It was not an entirely inauspicious beginning, considering that a great many of the Woe's successes had been preceded by my so-called friends ragging on me. I supposed that, mathematically speaking, they would have to be.

The half of Serolen our side held was wound up tighter than a coiled spring, but so far the violence had been mostly contained to Kurosiv's sigils with only a few raids attempted over the canals. They'd run into Mighty Ysengral's prepared defences and been brutally slaughtered to the last, which had rather discouraged repeat attempts. Well, that and the baskets full of severed heads the Ysengral had catapulted back over the canal as a taunt. The Cradle of Steel's sigil had knack for the unnecessarily vicious that never failed to amuse.

After speaking with Rumena, we'd picked the tower that had been raised inside the Relic Grove as the one to hit. It was in the northeast of Serolen, past two sigils that had a reputation as nasty customers – the bigger of the two, the Yeshala, had been the effective rulers of one of the Everdark's cities before the exodus – and deep in a part of the city widely considered a death trap. The Relic Grove had taken a little too well to the surface, the way I heard it.

"The Rozhan tended to the Grove as their sacred duty once and now lend assistance to the cabal protecting the tower," Rumena said, "but they have been drawn into the war between the Yeshala and the Orobog. Patrols will be thinned."

Which would mean nothing if either Moren or Ishabog went prowling around looking for us, but we had a plan for that: Mighty Rumena was going raiding. In principle, the target was a camp near the Singing Rings where dzulu taken from us in raids were being kept penned up.

"How likely are you to draw both?" I asked.

Rumena hacked out a laugh.

"I ripped out Ishabog's ear a sennight ago," the Tomb-maker replied. "It will come for my head if the opportunity arises, I am sure of it, and Moren will act the moment I get too close to the tower in Rings."

I grunted, not entirely convinced but knowing it was our best shot. The Relic Grove wasn't the easiest target by a long shot, we'd been careful not to be too easy to predict in case someone on the other side figured us out, but I disliked plans that relied too much on enemy error. But we're not exactly swimming in other courses, are we? The civil war that Cordelia had effectively started in Kurosiv's camp would not last forever: the leech might preach that it let its sigils do as they wished, but they would definitely step in if the fighting lasted too long. They couldn't afford to erode their military strength by too much, not with the balance of power in Serolen so narrow.

"Try to get the other ear," I told Rumena. "I want a matching set for my hat when we'll have talks with their lot."

It blinked, then let out a startled bark of laughter.

"Your will be done, First Under the Night," the Tomb-maker replied.

Funny how it only ever called me that when I was telling it to do violence, wasn't it? Firstborn, what could you do. The timing was carefully arranged so that the three of us got to the canal before Rumena's raid began, looking over the placid waters at the low hills where the Yeshala had lain their line of defence. Most drew disdained fortifications – which I could understand, given what most Mighty could do to a set of field fortifications in the span of a breath – but the Yeshala Sigil had made an effort, perhaps spurred on by the example of the Ysengral on our side of the canal.

There was a rough spiked wooden palisade set atop a low earthen wall at the bottom of the hills, maybe ten feet away from their end of the canal, and a dozen raised stones reaching higher than the spikes dotting the length of the fortification. Mighty were perched atop the stones, keeping watch on the sigil guarding our shore, and they would be the first obstacle in our way. Akua, standing by my side, had her eyes on the enemy sentinels.

“Strength?” she asked.

“Pravnat,” I said. “Maybe one jawor? Hard to tell without them pulling on Night.”

Pravnat were just promising ispe, the lowest of the Mighty, and jawor squarely a middle rank among that same distinguished number. I would have expected at least one rylleh around to keep an eye on things, but there was none I could see or sense. Either the Yeshala had committed to the hilt to their war with the Orobog, or the sigil’s defence strategy considered these watchers an expendable alarm. Given the usual callousness of Firstborn strategists, it really could go either way.

“Favourable terms,” Akua murmured.

I nodded, silently appreciating she’d refrained from calling it luck. Two villains and the Doom of Liesse talking about getting lucky was just asking for fate to rap our knuckles.

“Hierophant,” I said, “get us started.”

Masego nodded, wresting away the magic in the trinkets he’d taken to carrying everywhere since losing his magic. We’d found that his doing that was harder to sense for Mighty than a mage casting the traditional way, since it was a manipulation of already extant power instead of something forming, so it would be him that wove the enchantment around us. He murmured for some time in the mage tongue, Summer-lit eye sweeping over our forms from under the cloth, and after he snapped his wrist I felt a sensation like warm mist sweep up from my toes to the crown of my head.

“Ibrahim’s Mirror,” Akua murmured. “Your appreciation for the classics never fails to charm, Hierophant.”

“It’s a fine spell,” Masego told her. “Even Father couldn’t find a way to improve the formula.”

The conversation was a little surreal to hear, considering that I could now no longer see either of the people speaking. It wasn't true invisibility, which was rare and exceedingly difficult to maintain, but instead a sort of reactive illusion forming a cone around each of us. Ibrahim's Mirror effectively made everything in the cone 'transparent', the enchantment reproducing the sight almost perfectly. There were two weaknesses: one was a slight shimmer, like light on a mirror, whenever the cone first enveloped an outside object. The other was that anyone standing inside the cone was unaffected by the illusion. I cleared my throat.

"Let's get a move on," I said. "We only have so long before General Rumena strikes."

Crossing the canal itself was not particularly difficult. At this time of the day the water was shallow, barely more than waist-high, as a series of lock chambers upstream directed the overflow to channels feeding cisterns in Serolen's central districts. Water did not register as an object to Ibrahim's Mirror, so it was unseen that we got to the opposite shore. Akua climbed first, staying close so we would remain visible to each other, then helped up Masego and myself. We were careful to move quickly towards the earthen wall, dripping water on earth instead of stone as much as possible, where it would not remain noticeable.

We were between two 'watchtowers', neither of the Mighty perched atop the raised stones seeming to have noticed our crossing. Now, though, came the tricky part. There was no way for us to climb the palisade atop the earthen wall quietly enough; drow senses wouldn't hear us, which meant we'd have to get inventive. So we huddled close, cones overlapping, while Akua knelt by the bottom of the wall. She laid an elegant hand on the packed earth and began to murmur, trailing off into silence after repeating the same incantation ever more quietly the third time. Even standing behind her, I could barely feel the spell magic she used.

It was barely more than a spark, the same petty curse used again and again. The spell was a Wolofite creation, meant to soften an inch of someone's scalp so it was easier to rip out their hair. Fortunately, it could also be used to soften earth. Akua withdrew her hand after a moment, then began to dig. It was like digging into a garden's black earth, not an effort in the slightest, and she stopped after hitting hard earth again while Masego and I scattered the earth about. It took six instances before we had a path, then another three until it was widened enough we could crawl and wiggle our way through.

We hurried up the hills as I kept an eye on the Yashala sentinels, who seemed blessedly unaware of what had gone on under their nose. It wouldn't last forever, sadly. One of them would find the hole or notice the irregularities in the earth and then an alarm would be sounded. Hopefully, though, we'd be past the territory of the Yahsala Sigil by then. Let them arm up and go on war footing all they wanted, we weren't going back by their territory anyway. Under the cover of a copse of trees we stopped, patting ourselves free of the clinging earth, and huddled close to negate the cones.

"Everyone fine?" I murmured.

Nods. We'd agreed to speak as little as possible.

"Then we take the Soaring Stairs," I spoke with a grimace. "Let's go."

Alas, they were the fastest way through. They weren't difficult to find, though as in many parts of Serolen I found the sudden transition from thick woods to monument a little jarring. Slowly sloping stone stairs two wagons wide began at the end of a beaten dirt path leading to the canal, rising for what had to be the better part of a mile. Beginning at the bottom, steps had been painted in vivid colours over which Crepuscular glyphs were inscribed in pure white. Each was the name of a Mighty that had attempted to reproduce the famous deed for which the monument was named: begin at the top of the stairs as an ispe and slay enough foes by the time you'd reached to bottom to have become a rylleh. The Cabal of the Soaring Stairs had gathered ispe by the thousands every ten years to attempt it in some sort of grisly ritual festival, but as far as I knew none had ever succeeded after the first.

They were an exquisite sight, cutting through a few more hills and then the beginning of an inhabited district with houses and temples and makeshift streets, but they were also fucking stairs. Near deserted at this time of the day, at least, but since I couldn't use Night to dull the pain I had to rely on the herbs I'd taken earlier. They were working for now, but I already feared what the trip back would feel like when their effect went away. The three of us moved in silence, hurrying as much as we could. Masego was less than athletic and I limped, so admittedly we were not the fastest infiltrators Calernia had ever seen.

On both sides of us the territory of the Yashala was splayed out, the serpentine streets slithering around knots of houses and towers. Firstborn liked to cluster houses together, build them to have common roofs. It felt more like the roof of a cavern that way, and less like the sky of the Burning Lands where they had come. It made for strange streets, knots of houses and shops and temples popping up like mushroom patches as trees grew through everything and paths winded around in every direction. I let my gaze wander a bit, but not too much. We were not here to sightsee.

"Catherine," Masego murmured, just loud enough for me to hear, "we have a problem."

I paused halfway through a step.

"I'm listening," I said. "What-"

Behind us Night flared, streaks of light touching the sky. It was coming from near the canal. An alarm, sent up by the Mighty.

"That," Masego said, coming close enough I could see him point ahead.

I looked up at the top of the Soaring Stairs, where a warband was massing. A few dzulu, taking the front, even began sweeping down the stairs. Fuck. They'd found us out too early.

"Change of plans," I said.

"Indeed?" Akua murmured.

"Follow me," I said.

And I leapt down into the streets to the side, the two of them following after a beat. I swallowed as scream as my bad leg throbbed, then adjusted my cloak on my shoulders.

It looked like we'd be doing this the hard way.

Droughtbringer

<https://topwebfiction.com/listings/a-practical-guide-to-evil/>

Speck of Stardust

Ah politics, people who work with each other for a single reason can easily fight if 2 reasons are brought to bear.

Mirror Night

I suppose the Sisters while one of them may have been good at magic were not a once in a century genius prodigy. Plus they were kinda on the clock though Masego might be right surely they could have improved the work over time. But the Sisters really didn't seem to do much or have an exit strategy before Cat stumbled into them.

Ah finally getting back to Akua deciding to jack in the Praes Arc Conclusion. Yeah I was personally quite annoyed she saw the issues and had a chance to assert herself and fix things and decided not to. So she and Cat can play will they won't they again. Whatever happened to the guy who was falling her around anyway...

Cat is really making it hard on herself with the All Caster Party though I guess if they are High level and this is D&D 3.5E or Pathfinder I it not that hard of challenge. Still think she should have brought a powerful light user given she knew there be a fight being likely.

Agent J

A Light user? Like a Hero? You want her to bring a Hero to the heart of her Dark Goddesses' power? In the midst of a civil war? While the Hierophant studies their souls?

9/10 odds that comes back to horrifically bite the Drow/Crows in under a decade.

Linnus42

I mean if I know I am going to have to kill a false god Drow that uses Night. Yes I want a Light user to use as hammer against them.

Salt

To be fair this isn't really a Good vs Evil fight or stopping Evil from harming the innocent sort of deal. This is a strictly in-house Evil vs Evil catfight (pun intended). Heroes don't really have any place in this kind of civil war, story wise, unless they're trying to exterminate the Night or something

Mirror Night

I don't see how that is relevant. Light is quite useful when the goal is to kill Night Users. And I don't think it takes a genius to figure death would be a likely solution to this false god coup situation that Sve Noc has.

kinigget

Ya gotta consider the fallout.
Sure, if the only goal was to kill Night users, sending a Hero would be great, but this is about what the Drow become, and whether or not Cat's reforms continue. Bringing in outside help of any kind is a bad idea.

Miles

The goal isn't to kill Night users. It's to kill only the ones we don't like.

Liliet

Well Cordelia IS there...

Also Cat didnt know about the drow civil war when she was setting out.

shikkarasu

I've seen a lot of influences from 5e as well that weren't in Pathfinder. (Mages cannot concentrate on two spells, no casting 2 spells in the same round) That said I don't think this is just D&D. The power level is all over the place, by that standard. For instance, interplanar travel seems to be an easy trick for low level mundane mages while even low level teleportation like Dimension Hop is basically impossible.

ruduen

It's already everything-goes-wrong-o'clock? Huh, that was quick, especially with villain stories still off. I guess opportunistic stealth missions to obtain essential important information regarding the enemy's plans are still too heroic to be fully suppressed.

SpeckofStardust

I mean no villain stories means the first step of a plan can just fail.
Like what happened here.

Liliet

THINGS

HAPPENING!

Adrian_V

I have to stop my reading to ask a super important question:
["Don't eat the mushrooms," I told her. "They make humans laugh uncontrollably whenever we drink water."]

Is this real? I thought it was going to end up as a joke? xD

dadycool

Considering it's Cat, it's probably a joke.
Considering it's the Drow, it's probably real.
That's what makes it fun.

nick012000

I'll admit, I laughed when it was mentioned that Cat had to deny a bunch of requests to give Cordelia Hasenbach, an Heroic Claimant, Night. I'm not sure if that'd skew her nascent Name towards being Villainous, if she'd wind up some sort of anti-Hero that wields dark powers to good ends, or if it'd just short-circuit her Name entirely and leave her un-Named.

The discussion on how the Mage Gift works and why all Drow are born with access to the Night was interesting, though. I wonder if having a genetic aptitude for the Gift would give certain Drow improved affinity for the Night, even if the Gift itself was lost during the implantation process? It's also confirmation that Cat will never be able to use Mage spells, I guess. I wonder if the gifts of Light given to Heroes and priests of the House of Light work the same way.

I also wonder if a Drow Named (the Mystic Theurge?) would be able to use both Mage spells and Night using their Aspects, though, by using the Gifts of other people the way that the Hierophant and Rogue Sorcerer do?

hakureireimu

I read it as killing her and harvesting her knowledge to add to the Night.

sengachi

Knowing the Drow, I expect Cat got both types of request.

spencer

Do we know of anyone besides Cat (and ancient drow) who has been given night? I would expect all the requests to be to suck Hasenbach's skull dry of knowledge.

Darkening

Masego got an offer when he lost his magic and turned it down pretty firmly. We haven't seen a lot of others have close contact with drow on screen. Kinda surprised we never saw any goblins get it after they started worshipping sve noc in Cat's army.

Cpt. Obvious

The Gobbler has its claws firmly into goblin kind. And I doubt it would take kindly to some upstart gods sinking their talons into its subjects.

Kiara

Wow I read that night comment differently than you.

I thought it was give her to the night. Ie have her killed and her skills given to a mighty. Each requests being an individual who wanted to kill her.

CalmBreaths

I don't think they were requesting Cordelia be given night, rather that she be killed so her knowledge and cunning could be added to it. Which is significantly more gruesome and on brand.

Liliet

Cordelia is not currently a claimant, she fed her nascent Name to Cat's.

As of Salia / as far as we know anyway...

Isi Arnott-Campbell

There is that one heroine, the girl with parallels to the Scorched Apostate, who was formerly a mage and traded the Gift for Light.

ISiejek

She gave up her name though didn't she? For the second time even

'Ladi Williams

Thanks for the comment.

I do t want Cat to spend too much time on this. I wish she scold just curb stomp the opposition but alas the sisters messed things up too much already and Cat now has to pull their behind out of the fire.

I just want this arc over and the sisters back to almost full power.

Zggt

Everything is about to be on fire, also known as Cat's fine art of "diplomacy".

Juff

Typo Thread:

Firstborn provided > Firstborn had provided one his physical > one is physical their weight > the weight of he rylleh > of the rylleh smoothly slid into > smoothly slid back into again now > now

again, it > again; it eating snake > eating snakes would it clear > would make it clear
N my way > On my way
I approach, > I approached,
But is it closer > But it is closer Kurosiv in the place (should this be face) strength, ice > strength; ice
I could see through > It could see through Maren Bleakwomb's staring > Moren Bleakwomb staring feeling it gaze > feeling its gaze not covered > now covered on the room > in the room
Keter breaks > Keter believes Alamans > believed Alamans power one > power of one was no Night > was not Night had knack > had a knack in Rings > in the Rings
Yashala > Yeshala (occurs twice)
Yahsala > Yeshala
as scream > a scream

Reader in the Night

Huh. I just realized a flaw on the Accords that I never thought of before: all Villains are biologically immortal, while Heroes age normally. The leading cause of Villain mortality, death by Hero, stops being a consideration so long as the Villains uphold the Truce.

Which means that in a couple of centuries, Cardinal will be effectively ruled by Villains by dint of simple seniority. As positions are vacated by Heroes due to old age, any neutral role will eventually end up on the hands of a Villain, and from there, all that Villain has to do is not be killed and keep accumulating power and influence until it becomes virtually impossible to remove them.

For context, I got here by wondering if the Firstborn would edit history after Cat's death so the position was retroactively always occupied by a Drow.

Salt

The Accords don't actually stop Heroes and Villains from fighting or killing each other. It just outlaws a lot of the worst methods, in terms of collateral damage. Angel summoning, Demon summoning, Cordelia's angel stick, Second Llesse/Still waters, etc... kind of deal.

Villains are also a lot more prone to death by hubris, ironic comeuppance of their own making, infighting with other Villains, fatal overreach, death by worthy successor, death by worthy rival, death by stronger Villain who just needed you out of the way, etc... If you leave a Hero in peace they tend to live to a ripe old age and mentor other Heroes and do kind acts and whatnot. Leaving Villains in peace tends to have them hatch plots that embroil them into conflicts with just about everything else under the sun.

I don't think there'll be much in the way of overly long-lived Villains being too common even after the Accords

sengachi

I expect we'll see a general uptick in Villain lifespan, to be sure, but it's important to remember that even Black and Malicia didn't last all that long. Two of the most successful Villains ever and they only lived long enough to enjoy extended youthfulness, not even an unnaturally long life. And both of them died for political and personal reasons which would still exist post-Accords.

Villains might no longer be vulnerable to angle-nukings in a post-Accords world, but they'll still be vulnerable to their own bullshit and Heroes taking exception to crimes against humanity.

ohJohN

Malicia has a firm expiration date a bit under 8 years from now, but I'm pretty sure she's still alive?

shikkarasu

I just took Sengachi's wording as 'dead woman walking'. Not to mention that she might not live much longer even if she isn't executed. She must be over 80 by this point and over the course of 8 years that is going to catch up hard.

Liliet

Truce and Terms are strictly temporary wartime measures, Accords don't include any sort of truce.

Reader in the Night

Isn't there a School for villainous and heroic Named in Cardinal? How would that work with no truce?

I expect at least some sort of enforced peace within Cardinal would exist as long as the Villains aren't actually doing anything wrong, otherwise the concept of Cardinal isn't really workable.

Liliet

Within Cardinal, yes.

Miles

That's not a flaw, it's a feature. Those villains who don't do too much damage get to live long lives. Those who do, die.

Black Spiral Dancer

Hmm... exciting. Masego's "Not worth it" made my day. Or night.

Adrian V

I see what Cat did there, she can't keep the temple then just destroy it so no one can have it, and leave in a manner than implies she could have fought more but just wasn't worth it.

Now i wanna now more about that first general, it has to be a badass. And speaking of generals can someone give me a list of their names and monikers? (And main power if we know it), i can only remember the one whose moniker was Spearbitter, and that one died if i remember (include dead ones too).

Lastly Cordelia didn't dissapoint, it says a lot that they want her in the night so much, i just know more than 1 Mighty saw what she did and nodded all "ok that is impressive, and nasty" xD, and just imagine what Malicia could do, or better yet both muahahahahahaha

Drow fan

I'm not sure whether a consistent list is possible at this point, but based on the reddit (https://www.reddit.com/r/PracticalGuideToEvil/comments/i32d8i/current_state_of_calernia_as_of_book_6_interlude/) and some searches I would wager that the following list was accurate during the drow exodus:

First General – Radigast the guest (can fight in the body of other drow)

Second General – Mighty Kurosiv the All-Knowing (trying to be a god)

Third General – Mighty Rumena

Fourth General – Mighty Ishabog the Adversary (has only mighty in his sigil)

Fifth General – Mighty Moren Bleakwomb (blizzards)

Sixth General – Mighty Radhoste the Dreamer (his title is saying it)

Seventh General – Mighty Vesena Spear-biter (could bite through a giant revenant)

Eighth General – Mighty Ysengral the Cradle of Steel (defensive, uses traps)

Ninth General – Mighty Radosa the Hushing Dread (ambushes the dead and has fewer losses than any other General)

Tenth General – Mighty Jutren

By now Kurosiv is no longer a mere General; Radhoste, Vesena and Jutren were killed by the dead and apparently Moren became more powerful than Ishabog, so it would be the following list:

Radigast, Rumena, Moren Bleakwomb, Ishabog, Ysengral, Radosa, possibly four new Generals?

Has anyone something to add/correct?

ohJohn

This page has at least their names, numbers, and known epithets: https://abridged-guide-to-evil.fandom.com/wiki/Empire_Ever_Dark

Miles

Cat didn't destroy the temple. She fought Moren and forced him to unleash so much power it flattened everything.

At least that's what it looks like to Rylleh sigil and anyone else who might have been watching.

spencer

The exposition on how night works was interesting. What does this imply for Cat? She must have a bigass spike of night through her brain too. Could the Sisters grant that to any human if they chose?

Cordelia as Priestess of Night would be pretty cool. Then she could get power without becoming Bestowed.

Xinci

It was good to get further confirmation on the interconnectivity of the Gift. I suspect the same overriding property of their souls also prevents Name formation. It would go with what the Dwarves indicated when they called her a abomination. The original pure Night being what can manipulate souls makes sense, I am curious about if the DK has figured this out yet and informed Kurosiv

It seems Kurosiv did indeed go the route they neglected in sanctioning the giving of power. Which is troublesome perhaps for the Losara in the future but maybe can be assimilated if Sve wins. They are in this to the knife now, Sve was found wanting before and her competitor is fluid and hungry.

shikkarasu

I always assumed that Light worked like this, honestly, since we've not seen an example of a Mage who can also use Light. Light seems to be awarded based on the Gods' whims, possibly influenced by the faith of the person in question. Surely by sheer dint of odds some priest with the Gift would eventually gain access to Miracles eventually, unless some aspect of the process specifically purges the Gift from them, as with the Stalwart Apostle.

I don't think Night prevents Names, or else Catherine wouldn't be the Warden right now. She's more deeply entwined in the Night than anyone, except perhaps Kurosiv, and must have the brain spike since she has no Gift.

Crack Theory: Sve Noc is an example of twin Named and the Night is a massive F-off Aspect, not unlike Delegate, empowered by the ongoing ritual that is the Tenets of Night. The spike allows the use of Night in the same way that Masego's Wrest does, but en mass.

shikkarasu

oops, must have messed up my angle brackets.

308924810a

-Each was the name of a Mighty that had attempted to reproduce the famous deed for which the monument was named: begin at the top of the stairs as an ispe and slay enough foes by the time you'd reached to bottom to have become a rylleh. The Cabal of the Soaring Stairs had gathered ispe by the thousands every ten years to attempt it in some sort of grisly ritual festival, but as far as I knew none had ever succeeded after the first.-

Why is this the case?

Surely they know how many they have to gather in one place to have a rylleh's worth of Night in one place? So long as someone prevents them from leaving/they actually want to fight, it should. all concentrate into one person at the end.

Unless the original still exists and has some sort of vested interest in not letting anyone else do what they did.

shikkarasu

I think the idea is that all of the other ispe/dzulu on the stairs are on the same side. If they win, whoever struck the killing blow gets the jackpot, but that probably only gets them up to Pravnat, maybe Jawor if they made it far enough down the stairs before they got cheapshot.

If you choose to be the one (ones? Multiple runs per festival?) who starts at the top of the stairs then you are guaranteed only the biggest prize, but without the chance to get it by landing a cheapshot; you need to kill every Drow harvested by your own hand. Standing in the crowd is low risk/low reward/low chance of reward, starting at the top is suicidal risk/set for life reward.

It's like how the previous Black Knight, the one that Amadeus was Squire to, died to a non Named foot soldier with a spear. Sheer numbers eventually win out, doubly so with the difficulty of using power you've only just gained.

KiltedBastich

Hang on a second, what's this bit about the Saint of Swords severing Masego's magic? Wasn't that the Dead King who did that, as he was being evicted from the Hierophant? Did I miss something?

Salt

The Dead King got a hold of his soul, Bard stopped the Pilgrim from being the first to react, and second in line was the Saint who did Saint things and metaphysically cut off the Dead King's grasp on him.

It was left kind of vague at the time, but from this it looks like she did it by just cutting out the part that the Dead King was corrupting, which I guess is whatever part of the soul lets him feel and use magic

jamesc9

Hmmm... My understanding is that, when he has wrested magic from somewhere, he can still feel it normally.

origamiflame

So Cat has won once against Kurosiv, and tied this time...

Though is that pattern paused for her, as a villain?

Also, if that is the case, why would she say

"I nodded, silently appreciating she'd refrained from calling it luck. Two villains and the Doom of Liesse talking about getting lucky was just asking for fate to rap our knuckles."

Liliet

Reflex.

Miles

Patterns of 3 are subverted all over the story. They only matter if the author says they do.

Or from a no-metagaming perspective, there is no pattern of 3 because those only form for people who are similar in strength and/or rivals. Kurosiv has a trick to resist, but is ultimately unable to rival Cat.

ninegardens

I'm... not sure how I feel about Coredalia's plan being "Let's use false flag operations to stir up a civil war."

Partly because... that isn't actually Cordy's modus operandi (She even says "I borrow this from Malicia"), and partly because False Flag operations and stirring up civil war very much ARE the kind of thing I would expect Drow to already know about. They've have 1000 years of brutal tribal warfare. This is something they should already know. They shouldn't need Cordy to suggest it, and certainly should be that impressed by it. At least... that's how it feels to me.

Or maybe I'm just sad because it wasn't "MC Cordelia Rap battles a god", which got suggested last chapter, and sounds god damn fucking amazing.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Hopefully she'll get a chance to rap battle a god in the future. Maybe the Dead King? It's also not too late for her to rap against Kurosiv even if the odds are now against it happening.

Liliet

> and partly because False Flag operations and stirring up civil war very much ARE the kind of thing I would expect Drow to already know about. They've have 1000 years of brutal tribal warfare. This is something they should already know. They shouldn't need Cordy to suggest it, and certainly should be that impressed by it.

This! Yeah, this is what feels off about it.

shikkarasu

This is an excellent point. As Devil's Advocate I will suggest that Drow hold mundane learning in such low regard (most don't even know about the time before the Night) that keeping track of who hates who and by how much isn't prioritised. Note that Cordelia asked for chroniclers and historians, but essentially got a handful of gossips.

"Though there's no such thing as a Firstborn historian in the sense you mean. There are Mighty, though, who through Secrets or because of personal interests have gathered histories of their people both ancient and recent."

I think the Drow know about False Flag attacks, but they never thought to use anything other than common knowledge. What would be the point? If you want everyone to know that Sigil A attacked Sigil B, surely you would only choose well known about, current rivalries, yes? What Cordelia brought to the table was the very idea that this information, old grudges forgotten about by all but those who hold them, is as valuable as the Secret of spewing acid vapour from your mouth.

It's not about False Flag being a new concept, but about the way she organised dozens of them in the span of a day, all convincingly enough that not a single one of the enemies questioned it. Because of course the bastards from that other Sigil would turn their back on us this quickly. Don't you remember 250 years ago when they stole all our riding lizards? This is just Noc-Damn typical. Let's kill them.

ninegardens

I see- you're arguing that they aren't impressed with the idea of false flag attacks, but by the execution. This feels... plausible, but not compelling? It's a decent argument- and I certainly can't think of a better one... but I also don't feel convinced.

shikkarasu

It's also not just the overall effectiveness, but also the way she used resources that no-one else thought of and, to top it off, she is effectively a nisi. It's the kind of bragging rights that Drow live and breath, for those who wanted her to be granted a sliver of Night. Ivah was sent out to the burning lands as one of several nisi lead by a dzulu to prove itself worthy after having its Night stripped away. Killing enough foes while that weak is how you become respectable in Drow culture. Nothing indicates that she was asked to be made Mighty, just not cattle anymore.

On the flip side, a way of turning useless Secrets into viable weapons is worthy enough for those who wanted to harvest her and gain her knowledge. I add this since we aren't 100% sure what 'requests to add her to the Night' means, and as some commenters have pointed out it's probably a mix of both kinds of request.

Think of it like when Black took down the Pirate Queen:

"Your prize ship has been sunk. Most your lieutenants are dead. You are kneeling on the floor of your very seat of power," he murmured. "Bringing you to this took me four people and a rowboat, Pirate."

It's partly the execution, partly the lack of resources used, partly the magnitude of the result. All together she is worth more than nothing, and 8 separate Drow, of however many she interviewed or knew of her work, wanted to act on that. The more I think about it the more I am convinced.

Orby

They were in a constant state of tribal civil war, hard to "start" one in a meaningful way. As to "false flag ops", actual constant attacks precludes the need to come up with the idea, you're already at war.

Both these things being new concepts to the sve noc era drow rings true, to me.

Abrakadabra

I agree, this. Unless drow has some cultural bias against wearing the colours of other sigils?

Forum Solipsist

All of the exposition about how all Drow are able to use Night, and mostly my take away was: Heirophant is disdainful of how crude the mystic prosthetic that can grant non-magic users the ability to use magic is.

Let me say that again. Heirophant has just seen an example of a mystical prosthetic that allows use of magic. He is disdainful of how crude it is.

By the time they reach the walls of Keter, he is going to have a far better version for himself.

Miles

He was impressed by the prosthetic, just disdainful of its inventor.

It's like a peer whom you can't stand, but they suddenly do something really cool and you're like, "ok props for that. Still think he's a total tool though"

But yes Masego is totally gonna steal everything Sve Noc has ever done and improve on it, and call it his original work like he came up with it from scratch.

Orby

They were in a constant state of tribal civil war, hard to “start” one in a meaningful way. As to “false flag ops”, actual constant attacks precludes the need to come up with the idea, you’re already at war. Both these things being new concepts to the sve noc era drow rings true, to me.

Chapter 45: Kernel (Redux)

“Understand this: divinity is an act of murder. A god can have no beginning or end; both must be slain without hesitation.”

– Translation of the Kabbalis Book of Darkness, widely attributed to the young Dead King

I thought I’d gotten a sense of the Yeshala territory, but I’d been wrong.

The streets weren’t empty the way it’d seemed from up on the Soaring Stairs. Sure, it wasn’t exactly a market fair out here but neither was it a ghost city with a few terrified souls shivering behind closed doors. The three of us had barely turned our first corner before we nearly stumbled over a handful of nisi sitting in an alcove and chatting about a recent game of inic cin as they wove reed baskets. None of them noticed the edge of our illusions glimmering against the wall, but we quickened our pace anyway. They were the first drow we encountered, but hardly the last.

We found a sort of half-hidden trading where dzulu were bartering meat and greens for small wooden beads and sharpened obsidian – well shaped, fit to serve as knife blades – and mere streets later drow were sneaking to the side a run-down temple painted entirely in shades of yellow to hang small white ribbons from hooks on a wall. The ribbons were simple cloth, but I could see that there were glyphs on the hooks. Prayers for luck and good health, for the misfortune of your enemies. Life still breathed in Yeshala lands, it just kept out of sight. Like rats hiding from the light.

Never once did we see a Mighty anywhere, though perhaps that should not have been a surprise. There were so very few of them compared to the numbers of the Firstborn, not even one in ten, and none of what we’d seen would be of interest to them. Nisi were expected to do all this, the labour of keeping cities standing, because it was the work fit for them. Real drow, real people, pursued only the accumulation of Night. Nothing else was worthy of one's time. Still, it was evident the Yeshala had seen better days.

That so much of the territory was run down or broken meant the Mighty were using dzulu and nisi for war labour, not abandoning them to their affairs, and the consequences of that were obvious. They wouldn't have been, in the Everdark, but deep down that was why I believed that Kurosiv's philosophies – which would survive them, I had no doubt of that – were doomed to lose. See, when the Firstborn had been living in grand old ruins sigils had been able to fight over who got the nicest part and it'd reinforced the order of things: fight well, gain Night, live better.

Now, though, it wasn't so simple. Serolen was a trove of stolen treasures, but large parts of it had been built over the last few years. And those quarters had been unquestionably superior for nisi and dzulu, who'd never got to taste comfort anyway since the niceties were reserved for Mighty. Nine out of ten Firstborn had been force-fed the realization that they didn't actually need Mighty to make their lives better. And whenever sigils turned to the old favourites, raiding all the neighbours and slaughtering on a whim, now Firstborn were actually losing something. Their comfortable lives were being infringed on.

One of the first things my father ever taught me was that the tool tyrants needed to maintain their grip on power was not fear but apathy. And just like Mazus squeezing the blood out of Laure until there was the scent of revolt in the air, the Mighty here were chipping away at that apathy one inconvenience at a time.

Even if you'd only risen an inch from the bottom of the barrel, no one liked losing that inch. Mighty who kept too close to the old ways, Kurosiv's gospel, made things worse for the bulk of the Firstborn. In Procer or Callow that'd end with the nobles knifed and changes made, but of course it wasn't that simple here. It took more than sleep and a knife in the back to kill a sigil-holder. But the wind was turning against the old ways, because the old ways were fucking awful for everyone except the strongest Mighty and now there was a visible, known alternative.

So the Mighty would find their cattle growing less and less obedient, apt to lashing out through the means the tenets of Iserre had given them, and the clever ones would learn to go with the wind. They'd use it to increase their power at the expense of their rivals, throwing a few concessions at nisi and dzulu as the price of prosperity, until it became common sense that it was the better practice. And then, one day, the cattle would grow mutinous again. Maybe they'd look at other kingdoms and see their lives could be better, or because the Mighty got too hungry again and their subject suffered for it.

The reason didn't matter so much as what would happen: all of this, once more. The same cycle, over and over again. All the Kurosivs of the world lost eventually, because they weren't the natural order of a single goddamn thing – they were parasites.

And no matter how tight the saddle, you could only ride a tiger for so long before it remembered it wasn't a horse.

We ghosted through the streets, avoiding people as much as we could and heading straight north. We'd have to take one of the winding paths around the hills to get to the Relic Grove, but the wasted time taking the streets had cost us was worth it. The Soaring Stairs and the other large avenues would be crawling with Mighty by now and there were bound to be a few with a Secret that'd see through Ibrahim's Mirror. Our gamble was that by the time they'd realized this was an infiltration instead of the prelude to an attack and begin sweeping through the territory, we'd be long gone.

I was not fool enough to call it a success yet, but these were odds I'd roll dice on.

We took a long, diagonal street leading to the northwest because it was completely empty but the longer that lasted the more uneasy I felt. Akua clearly felt the same, as she gestured for us to stick closer together. We found out why the street – and all those around it – were empty after we got to the end of it, finding a marketplace stripped bare. At the heart of it, hammered into the paving stones, a large iron pillar covered in number glyphs stood. To it were bound what had to be at least three hundred dzulu, thick chains to which drow were shackled on both sides radiating out of the pillar like spokes of a wheel.

The paint on many of their faces was faded or cracked, but there was no mistaking that these people came from at least a dozen different sigils. At least half, though, were Yeshala. Bile began to rise in my throat as I took steps closer, shaking off Akua's warning touch on my arm. It was the pillar I looked at, the count being kept. Numbers, but also a few words. Not just these dzulu but also a dozen 'batches' before them. Mighty had carved into the iron pillar how many were to be kept and for how long, the number glyphs ominously slashed through when the time had passed.

"They man the pillars with their own people when they don't take enough of ours," I murmured, genuinely appalled. "Mighty Yeshala was the one who sent its dzulu here."

It was one thing to know that even dzulu were considered barely better than animals in the eyes of Mighty, another to see them chained here like cattle awaiting the abattoir. Akua stood at my side, golden eyes hooded as she studied the pillar.

"They are meant for the tower in the Relic Grove," she murmured. "It is why the pillar is so close to Rozhan territory without needing defence: these lives are claimed by a higher power."

My fingers clenched. I'd known they were taking dzulu from our side of the canals, Rumena had told me as much in the war council, but it hadn't been sure whether it was as work slaves or sacrifice. I should have known, I thought. If they wanted pairs of hands, they would have taken nisi as well. They want dzulu because there's a few Secrets' worth of Night in them. Masego was the only one of us who could not fluently speak and read Crepuscular, so he shot us a curious look.

"When are they meant to be moved?" he asked. "Knowing the frequency of the sacrifices will be of some use."

"Two days," I grimly replied.

If this didn't end in two days, the drow I was looking at were all dead. Or worse. And I don't think I can end this in two days. Akua met my gaze from the corner of hers, visibly sharing in the thought. She looked away after a beat.

"Other Firstborn seem to be avoiding the area," Masego noted. "We should continue down this street, it will quicken our pace and lessen the risks."

Throat tight, I nodded. Grim as the logic was, it wasn't untrue. But before we could move, there was an interruption.

"We need," Akua Sahelian quietly said, "to free them."

I felt the weight of those golden eyes on me without needing to turn. My heart clenched. The calculus was plain to see, as it so often was at times like this. If we freed them, the enemy would know we'd been here. Maybe not immediately, but sooner than otherwise. And if we got caught, were forced to retreat or fight our way out before getting to the tower, it might be a lot more than three hundred drow that died for it. And on the other side of the balance was a hard truth: if we did not save these people, they were dead. And we would condemn them to that fate simply because of a risk, a potential danger. Not a certain consequence.

I knew the choice I would have made if I'd come alone. Knew it deeply, instantly. And some part of me recoiled at the thought of how very comfortable with sacrifices I had become.

"Masego?" I asked.

"So long as the spell is not too powerful, I can maintain the Mirrors through it," Hierophant said.

He did not seem particularly concerned with the moral question to wrestle with, I thought. Indifference, or was he simply trusting me to wrestle with it for him? Sometimes it was hard to tell.

"I have had enough of shackles, Catherine," Akua murmured. "Especially those made of iron."

I studied her face. She had already made her decision, I realized. She would free the dzulu whatever I said. And so I shivered, knowing in that moment that I had both succeeded beyond my wildest hopes and entirely lost control of the situation. So I said the only thing I could say.

"We must be quick," I replied, "and then cut through the Rozhan territory in a straight line."

It wasn't even that difficult, when it came down to it. The shackles had been made to resist Night, not sorcery, and so Akua sent a spell shivering down the nine chains one after another that simply popped the shackles open. The dzulu milled about uncertainly, some even fearfully. Thinking it might be a trap. But when one of them hesitantly tried to leave and nothing struck it down, there were excited shouts and within moments they were scattering in every direction. We waited until our path was clear, then ran for the Rozhan grounds to the east.

I could not see Akua's face, but somehow I knew she was smiling.

—

The Rozhan were a smaller sigil than the Yashala, having taken up a territory that was a thick half-circle around the east of the Relic Grove. Theirs were poor lands, most of them still woods, and their inhabited holdings were essentially knots of houses and temples closely clustered together in clearings. The rest was tall trees split only by a few paths, used for hunting and patrolled by Mighty but otherwise abandoned. Cutting through wasn't all that difficult. The Rozhan were on war footing as well, though, so we did have to duck two patrols that we might not have known were coming if not for my ties to the Night.

Just because I couldn't tell how many there were or how strong didn't mean I couldn't feel them coming at all. Kurosiv was yet a usurper.

Before long we reached the end of a shallow dirt path and found ourselves standing at the edge of our destination: the Relic Grove. Only a threshold made of four arm bones lined up between two twisting oaks announced the end of Rozhan territory, but all three of us could sense it. There was power in the air, and the fog we could see up ahead was not of natural make.

"I have been looking forward to this," Masego cheerful admitted. "The Firstborn usually shy away from anything that could be considered necromancy, it is an interesting change of pace."

"The Twilight Sages left scars," I said, "but this isn't necromancy, not exactly. Technically Mighty Kavian is still alive."

"But not truly sentient," Akua noted. "Ego death is still a manner of death."

Masego nodded in approval.

"We're not getting into that debate here," I said, sensing tricky grounds. "We have work to do. Do you remember the rules?"

"We must always be in contact," Masego said, sounding displeased.

"Do not touch the grave-trees," Akua dutifully added.

"Good," I grunted. "I'll go in front, Zeze behind me. Let's try not to wake up Kavian, yeah?"

Settling into a single file line, Akua taking my cloak and Masego hers, we passed the threshold of bones. To the power-blind the Relic Grove would have seen like nothing more than misty old woods, the trees tall and twisted and its grounds covered with dead leaves no matter the season, but the illusion lasted only as long as it took us to encounter the first grave-tree. In the side of large, thick ash tree whose branches were spreading out like the fingers of a hand, there lay a small stone stele to which a drow skeleton had been nailed.

The part that had Masego's hand twitching at my back, though was that the Night in it had yet to fade.

"No relic," Akua murmured, sounding a little disappointed.

"There's probably a Secret or two in there that Mighty would value a great deal more than a fancy spear," I said.

"One cannot make an earring of a Secret, darling," she replied.

I rolled my eye, pulling us forward. One of the dangers of this place was that the Secret behind the mist would actively try to get us lost and make us stumble on graves, but there was no chance of that so long as I could feel the beacon of power that was the obsidian tower in the distance. Mostly getting through was slow, tedious limping forward on a forest path that was barely distinguishable from the rest of the ground.

"How long have Mighty been trying to harvest Kavian?" Zeze asked.

"Seven hundred years and change," I said. "The days where entire sigils disappeared in there are long past, but they still get a few fools every year."

Akua let out an interested noise.

"Did you ask Sve Noc what Secret it is that allowed it to remain for so long?" she asked.

I snorted.

"Are you asking me, Sahelian," I drily said, "to reveal the secrets of my communion with dark goddesses simply so that your petty curiosity might be satisfied?"

There was a beat of silence.

"I am," Masego brightly replied.

I heard a half-choked laugh coming from the back. Fine, be that way.

"It's the Secret of Recurrent Echoes," I said, "only it's not actually supposed to last this long. Just a handful times, opportunities for the holder to murder some other drow and take their body."

And Mighty Kavian had spent the last few centuries methodically doing the latter, but never the former. Andronike figured something had gone wrong with the part of the Secret that maintained sapience, probably because Kavian had tried to make it repeat much more at the expense of mental stability. The end result was that a Night-presence of the old monster popped out whenever someone disturbed the Relic Grove, murdering everyone involved and shackling their Night before disappearing again. The whole thing was like fucking honey for Mighty: a fight against a legend and a massive payoff in Night if they won? It'd taken literal centuries before cocky sigil-holders stopped feeding their sigils into the place.

The Rozhan Sigil had come into existence out of scavenger crews that'd figured out how to get their hands on some of the lesser morsels from the outskirts without bringing down Kavian's wrath on their heads. They took care of the graves in exchange, apparently, and had some Secrets entirely about the matter. Back in the Everdark the Relic Grove had been a maze of stone and lichen buried at the bottom of a city that'd been shattered by a dwarven incursion, but it had taken very well to being moved to Serolen. Kavian's blank consciousness had grown to permeate all the fucking trees around here, like some sort of sickness, and now there was...

"Stop," I whispered, and immediately they did.

The grave-tree before us was larger than the last, a massive willow that had grown around three steles, but that wasn't what had given me pause. There was a shape crouched on the branches, a slender drow whose eyes were scanning the mists. It passed over us twice without seeing us, my shoulders tensing as it did. See, the old Relic Grove had been stone and lichen. But this new one, moved into the woods? It'd had old, strong life to work with. Trees that'd been around for centuries, if not longer. And with Kavian's consciousness spread out, it had caused... echoes. The Mighty whose Night and belongings were the relic of the name drew from the life of the trees, forming these... things.

Little more than shadows, but wielding Night and completely unkillable. Even if they got repeatedly smashed into nothingness, all it would do was cause the shade to dwell into the tree until enough life accumulated again for it to manifest. It was possible to end the phenomenon by destroying the tree, of course, but anyone who did that instead got to deal with Mighty Kavian itself. None of us moved, even our breaths growing more quiet, but the shadow was still looking at the mist.

"It knows something is here," I murmured.

I got a shake from Masego at my back, agreement. Fuck, we weren't going to pass with it looking for us. And it was smart enough to notice the light from Ibrahim's Mirror when we got too close to something, those things were known to attack Mighty who used Secrets of stealth.

"Akua," I said. "Distract it."

A heartbeat of silence, then a quiet incantation. From the corner of my eye I saw a ghostly light bloom to our right, behind the thick leaves of an alder tree, and the shadow saw it too. Without hesitating it leaped in that direction, chasing the spell, and I tugged urgently for them to follow me. I put aside the pain in my leg, making haste, and I could see that the shadow was hacking away at the tree now – and the light further running away. A splendid choice of spell. Now we just needed to-

To come across another grave-tree, a twisted elm with two skeleton-adorned steles, before which stood a shadow wielding a long spear of crystal. And it'd definitely just see the light from Ibrahim's Mirror on the branches. Fuck. So that was why the mist had been trying to push us here. It was just smart and malicious enough for something like this.

"Keep touching," I said, "and run."

It didn't know where we were under the illusions, but that didn't matter: it came at us in a burst of Night, shattering all three spells in a single thrust. I wrestled down my instinct to turn around and fight, knowing that I was the only one who could guide us through the mist. Instead I ran as fast as I could, every stumble having me curse how fucking unnecessarily long their legs were compared to mine. No longer maintaining the Mirrors, Masego was freed to fight as well and I felt bursts of magic erupt behind me as I guided us through a thick knot of branches that whipped at my face.

Akua cursed and a pine shattered to our left as the faint pop of a shielding spell broke. I took us off the path and through bushes, ignoring the thorns as they tore at my cloak. Masego grunted and I felt the ripple of his aspect unleashed, something catching flame far behind. Eye ahead, Catherine, I reminded myself. I couldn't be sure how long we ran like that, weaving between trees and stones and winding forest paths, but my heart was pounding in my throat when we finally stopped. My back was drenched in sweat, but we'd finally shaken off the shadow.

"We are too far for it to follow," Hierophant panted.

He was even worse off than I was, I saw with a twinge of satisfaction. Akua, on the other hand, didn't even look like she was sweating. Urgh. Couldn't she be bad at more things? It was starting to get irritating. We caught our breath together, then Masego wove a new set of Mirrors.

"We're close," I told them. "It's up ahead."

We took our time with the last stretch, knowing it to be the most dangerous. The dead leaves covering the forest floor thinned, revealing smooth stone beneath. The trees here rooted through it, shattering stone and spreading rubble, and it seemed like every ten feet we came across one of the tree-graves. It took us almost as long for that last stretch as it'd taken us for the rest: I was in no mood for another run, so I had us circling whenever I caught sight of a shadow instead of risking being caught. But we got there, at long last, and from the mists rose the silhouette of a great obsidian tower.

Although it wasn't actually that great, I noticed when we got a little closer – stopping at the edge of the trees, wary of being seen by the Mighty that'd be guarding this place. The tower was maybe sixty feet wide and thrice as tall, nothing to sneer about but not exactly gargantuan. Made sense, if Kurosiv has set their minions to build several. It was pure obsidian, though, fitted not in blocks but like the polished pieces of a jigsaw puzzle. The precision of that was impressive. Concerningly, though, I could see a fucking door.

A quick look told me there were windows at the very summit, large ones facing every cardinal direction, but were the people assigned here really forced to climb every time they wanted to enter?

"Can either of you see a way in?" I whispered.

Akua shook her head, but Masego was staring at the wall with his Summer-forged eye.

"There are hidden mechanisms in the pieces, bound to Night," Hierophant told us. "Releasing the workings would seem to free a slab to be pushed in."

"A secret door," Akua enthusiastically said. "Well done, Hierophant."

She was, I thought, enjoying this little jaunt a little too much.

"Can you Wrest it open?" I asked.

"Yes," he said after a moment. "But there are people within."

"The place is too thick with Night," I admitted, "I can't actually feel out drow. It's like smaller flames hidden in a bonfire."

"I can see four at the bottom of the tower," Hierophant said. "And some shapes at the summit, near the windows, but they are veiled."

It wasn't just anything that his eye would be unable to see through, so that smacked of Kurosiv weaving a little something. Best to avoid there entirely.

"Are the two parts of the tower connected?"

"They are. There is a middle chamber as well," Masego added. "The sacrificial altar."

I cocked an eyebrow.

"How do you know?"

"There are gutters for the blood," he said.

I swallowed a grimace. Shouldn't have asked. This was going to get tricky, I thought. There was bound to be at least one strong Mighty among the defenders, which meant I'd likely have to pull out Night and that would give away the game. We'll have to crush them fast, get a look at the ritual and run, I thought. There was no helping it. I turned towards them and-"We need to move," Masego said. "They are coming out."

I blinked in surprise but did not argue. There had been nine drow in the tower, and every single one of the seven that left had been rylleh. There were, I gauged when they left and I could tell them apart from the ambient Night, not one but two sigil-holders among them. All of them went due west, leaving only two at the bottom. Once they had passed I voiced the question that had been on my mind the whole time.

"What are they going after?" I muttered. "There shouldn't be-"

I took a look at the eastern horizon for the first time, having a good angle at last, and paused. There was a large plume of smoke going up.

"Masego," I evenly said. "Did you set the Relic Grove in fire?"

"The shadow set the Relic Grove on fire," he corrected. "I only redirected the flame."

"Ah," Akua smiled, "so that is why they are leaving. They need to put out the flames before Mighty Kavian goes berserk."

"I'm going to get blamed for that one too, aren't I?" I sadly said.

"Well," Masego said, "you did bring me here. So in a sense, it is your fault."

That little shit. If I'd actually had the time to take him to task for that I would have, but we needed to get in and get gone before the enemy returned.

"Get us in," I ordered. "Akua, you and I hit them fast and hard."

We took our position smoothly, Akua already beginning to incant. I couldn't, since the moment I pulled on Night I'd be outed. Masego had neglected to mention that the slab of obsidian freed was ten feet tall, but he used the Night from the mechanisms to do so anyways. Which revealed two very surprised rylleh, both in Yeshara colours, baring their spears at us. I pulled on Night, quick and deep, and began to form a wedge of blackflame when... it unravelled? Akua's shrivelling curse took one of them in the chest, dropping it, but the other one shot through the door towards me as Night slipped through my fingers.

What the fuck?

I might actually have gotten a spear through the chest if Masego didn't Wrest again, killing the Secret it used to speed forward. It stumbled, and abandoning the thought of Night I instead focused my Name and struck: my sword cleared the scabbard in a heartbeat, cutting through the wrist that came up to defend the rylleh's neck. Akua hit it with a small curse that made it spasm, though, and I smoothly drew back my blade and feinted – it moved to dodge to the left, and the edge of my blade went right into its skull. It spasmed again, Night gathering, but Masego killed whatever Secret that was before it could get away.

"Catherine," Akua said, "what happened?"

My teeth clenched.

"I'm not sure," I admitted.

But whatever it was, it'd nearly gotten me killed. We hurried inside, all of us aware our time was already beginning to run out, and took in the sight of the circular obsidian chamber. Every surface save for the carved stairs leading up to the central chamber was covered in glyphs, each carved into the precious stone and then filled with molten silver. It was striking sight, though that was not why my two mages paused. Masego took a few steps forward and then went still, eye moving without pause, while Akua took a slow turn around the chamber before kneeling in front of the wall facing the door.

I left them to that, instead limping to the nearest wall and rapping my knuckles against it once. Solid. I focused my Name and struck at it with my staff, the dead yew bouncing off. Yeah, that was fortified with Night. The impact wasn't the same as if it was simple obsidian. Probably the whole damned tower had been built using it and it was running through like veins, which was why I'd had so hard a time picking out the drow inside. Destroying this place with Night would take me a long time, it'd be much easier with pure physical strength – and I didn't have nearly enough of that on hand.

There'd be no breaking the tower tonight, and having Masego try to Wrest the threads running through was just asking for Kurosiv to get involved. This would stay a scouting trip, so we'd best make the most of it.

"So what are we looking at?" I asked.

Masego was in his trance, lost in thought, so it was my other mage I was speaking to. Akua frowned, still kneeling before the wall of silver glyphs.

"These towers are altars," she said. "That much is certain."

"Charnel pits to feed Kurosiv," I said, not hiding my disgust.

The Sisters had made their entire race into an ever-red altar hidden behind the Gloom, once, but it had not been for their own benefit. This was simple, ugly greed.

"Indeed," the dark-skinned sorceress said, "but while this has been their function so far it does not appear to be their primary use."

"Ominous," I muttered. "So what is?"

Akua looked like she'd bit into a lemon as she rose back to her feet.

"I cannot tell," she admitted. "These are not structured like any glyphs I've seen before. Night-workings have a... syntax to them, Catherine, but it is entirely absent here."

"Because this is not a Firstborn ritual," Hierophant's calm voice cut through.

My fingers clenched.

"Tell me Kurosiv was not fucking fool enough to borrow a ritual from the Hidden Horror," I begged.

Masego took a step closer to Akua, ignoring me, and after demanding her attention without a word he raised his hand to point at a line of silver glyphs.

"There," he said. "And now two lines below, the closing half. You should recognize this."

Golden eyes followed his instructions, then narrowed.

"I cannot believe I missed that," Akua murmured.

"You have flesh eyes," Masego dismissed. "You cannot look at the entire pattern at once the way I can. It was only a matter of time before you recognize it."

I loudly cleared my throat, which finally got their attention.

"Someone," I said slowly, enunciating every syllable, "please tell me that Kurosiv was not fucking fool enough to borrow a ritual from the Hidden Horror."

The looks on their faces were not promising.

"It is not just a ritual," Akua told me.

"You've seen the original with your own eyes," Masego continued.

I froze.

"Wait, you're telling me..."

"This appears," Hierophant said, "to be an adjusted rendition of the ritual that destroyed the Kingdom of Sephirah and made Trismegistus into a god."

Fuck, I decided, was not quite strong enough a word for how bad things had just gotten.

—

Getting out of enemy territory was more long than difficult.

We just legged it north as far as we could, then circled until we reached one of the canals that fed Serolen's and took a boat back down. It was refreshingly uneventful, leaving me with a long while to digest what we'd found out. I was silent most of the trip, lost in my thoughts. Had the Dead King genuinely given out his oldest trick to a would-be rival, or was there a trap laid at the heart of the ritual? We couldn't know, not having seen only one of the towers, and I was beginning to think it wouldn't matter.

Either way, the Firstborn would end. Whether it was that Kurosiv devoured their kind and then Sve Noc or that Neshamah finished ripping out the Night as he'd attempted at the Battle of Hainaut, it would be a disaster that might lose us the war. The Dead King gaining Night would be significantly worse, but even if Kurosiv got their way without a hidden price then the young god would walk away and free all the armies assaulting Serolen to reinforce Keter just as it was getting besieged.

When we returned to the fortress I left my companions behind, heading directly to the airy temple at the summit where the Sisters roosted. It was a simple enough place from the outside, a rough square of stone whose roof was tiered and walls were entirely arches, but the inside was raw, untamed Night. Not even when I had tried to eat the Book of Some Things had the feel of it been so strong. I could no longer see or feel anything save an endless black expanse in ever direction, and it was in that void that the Sisters came to me.

Gods, even lesser gods, were beyond tiredness. Yet somehow I thought, looking at the two of them, that they seemed exhausted.

"We wane," Komena said, her eyes hard. "The tide has turned against us."

And I knew she was speaking the truth, for the mantle of divinity was feeble on their shoulders. Her voice had not echoed with things dimly understood, her very presence did not send a shiver down my back. Night had been made to suffer Ruin, and then been wounded further by Kurosiv's betrayal. They were goddesses still, but of a great deal less than before.

"Kurosiv is not stronger than you," I said. "I could still drive them out of their followers."

"Not yet," Andronike quietly agreed.

"It's why we need to fight them now," Komena said. "You know it's true, heart of my heart. If we wait until their strength surpasses ours, only defeat can ensue."

"They won't come out to fight you this easily," I said. "Their entire strategy is based on holding their ground, daring you to take a swing."

That was the conclusion I'd come to, on the way back. I'd thought that Kurosiv's strategy was oddly defensive, at first, considering the Dead King was pushing north towards Serolen and there were no iron cast guaranteed when dealing with Neshamah. How long could they truly afford to wait to become sole god of the Firstborn? Except I'd misread what they were actually after. It didn't give a shit what happened the drow, it was only after apotheosis. They'd gladly devour their own kind and walk away. So now it fell into place.

If we attacked their side of the river, the blood flowed to the towers and Kurosiv was strengthened while our numbers waned. If we waited this out, Kurosiv would finish its ritual and devour all its followed before taking a swing at Sve Noc.

"We would not be the victor in that strife," Andronike told me, having followed my thoughts. "We hold great power, but much of it is dispersed in others. It would be our lesser still, but..."

"Concentrated," I finished with a grimace.

Selfishness had its strengths. Still, it also had weaknesses.

"The defensive stance only works if their sigils stick with them," I said. "And I expect that, hardliners or not, few of those Mighty are going to be eager at the thought of being eaten. We need to arrange talks and out the truth."

If enough of them believed us, enough defected back, it might not even come to a fight between deities. We could just take back the towers by force and smash them before the bloodshed fed Kurosiv.

"Is it your right to attempt this," Andronike acknowledged.

I eyed them both with a frown. They weren't going to stop me, but neither was buying this as a solution. Why?

"You are First Under the Night," Komena curtly said. "You were appointed to attempt what we would not."

I decided to let it go. Their reasons were their own more often than not, why would this be any different? Besides, I had a more urgent worry.

"I tried to use the Night, when we were out at the tower, but it failed," I told them.

"That is known to us," Andronike said.

I rolled my eye.

"Then do you also know an answer to the question I shouldn't have to voice?" I asked. "What the Hells happened?"

Komena grimaced.

"The Night is coming apart," she said. "Your Hierophant took it to the brink of destruction and it has been pulled in too many directions since."

I winced.

"How bad?"

"The power itself is still functional, the trouble is that it is invested," Andronike said. "In Mighty, in workings, in Kurosiv's hoard. If it could be all returned to our hands and redistributed it could be mended, but as it is..."

"We will have to begin eating old workings soon," Komena said. "Else what you experienced will repeat."

"It is difficult to predict where the lack will happen," Andronike admitted. "There are too many wills involved."

So Night was finite, and it too many people took chunks of it up to wield there might not be enough left for whoever was trying to – even if they should be able to. That sounded, I thought, uncomfortably like the fate the Sisters had bargained to avoid: the Twilight Sages borrowing more than they could repay.

"We are not unaware," Andronike coldly said, "of the resemblance."

I raised a hand in appeasement.

"If we slice open Kurosiv our books are out of red, right?" I asked.

"Broadly so," Komena said.

"Then we start with that," I grimly said. "And fix the mess once we have their head on a pike."

The Crows hadn't picked me as their herald without reason: all I could feel from them at that plan was unyielding agreement.

—

Even Firstborn, whose concept of peace was closer to truce, had ways to hold talks.

Usually drow diplomacy was along the lines of threatening annihilation if immediate surrender was not given, sometimes a dash of exile or surrendering Mighty for harvesting, but that was between sigils. There wasn't really a precedent for the scale of the talks we'd asked for since the fall of the Empire Ever Dark, because until the exodus the drow had been united under Sve Noc. Well, divided under Sve Noc really but the supreme authority had been uncontested. So now that there were sigils under Kurosiv and sigils under us, the situation grew a little more complicated.

We settled on ten Mighty for either side, since keeping any more than twenty of that quarrelsome brood in close proximity was bound to result in fighting. The three of the Ten Generals in the city – Ysengral for us, Ishabog and Moren for them – were a given, as was Rumena. It might not have a rank in the Ten, having instead served as the commander of the Southern Expedition under me, but it was comparable or outright superior to many on the list. After that the ranks were filled with powerful sigil-holders, in case a fight did break out, and also me.

We met in the city centre, contested grounds, in a beautiful old temple called the Empty Shore. It was entirely made of wood, a rarity before the exodus, and though the outside was all vivid colours the inside had painted with impossible skill into the illusion of being the shore of a lake under the dark of night. And not a night from the Everdark, for there were even distant stars above. It was exceptionally beautiful, and though no ground was truly sacred to Firstborn most Mighty would hesitate before beginning strife that might destroy this place.

It was us that'd called the talks, so after the usual rounds of posturing – I refrained, knowing that my mastery of Crepuscular was too shallow to risk dipping my toe into the fast-paced trading of taunts – we were expected to state why everyone had been gathered here. I spoke up then.

"Tomb-maker," I ordered.

Night flared, Mighty tensing at the sensation, and behind me an obsidian wall covered in silvery glyphs. The very same we'd found at the heart of the tower. There was some shuffling on the side of our opponents, but neither of the Generals were surprised. They'd already figured out what last night had been about.

"I will speak plainly," I said. "This is not the work of the entity that titles itself Loc Ynan. It is a ritual of the Dead King's make, whose purpose is to make a god from the death of an entire people."

A pause on the other side.

"Not only us," I bluntly said, "but you as well. You will be the first to die when the Fate-Giver reveals what fate they truly have in mind for the Firstborn."

I'd expected a range of reactions to that revelation. Denial, dismay, maybe even violence. It wasn't even out of question that Kurosiv would decide the game was up and try to devour its followers immediately. But what I got, instead, was laughter.

"See," Moren Bleakwomb mockingly smiled, "it is as was foretold. Now that they fail against our might, they resort to the cheapest of tricks."

My fingers clenched.

"This is not a trick," I flatly said. "I am willing to—"

"It does not matter even if your false gods have tricked you, human," Moren said, using the word as one would filth. "We know the truth. Sve Noc tried to devour us once, and you think sweet whispers will let us do away with our protection?"

It all went downhill from there.

We got out without a fight, in the end, but we'd lost face and was quietly furious as we returned. The Sisters had hidden something from me, something that'd made all of this a fool's errand, and I confronted them with the petty mistake. They were neither of them cowed by my anger, but they did deign to provide explanation.

"When sigils began to defect, we took measures," Komena said.

My lips thinned.

"You tried to drain the Night out of the traitors," I said. "Like they claimed."

"It failed," Andronike plainly said. "There were some who were made nisi, but the leech was ready for us. It usurped mastery of what you call the 'nails', severing us from the traitors."

I rubbed the bridge of my nose. Of course, the existence of the nails was a secret that only a few knew. So when Kurosiv had told their faithful that it took towers to keep Sve Noc at bay, they'd had no reason to disbelieve it. And if I were an ambitious god, I'd even fake a few drains to remind my subject of why keeping the altars wet is so important. And I realized, suddenly, why it was that the Sisters had let me walk into those talks without telling me. Weakness. It was the same reason they'd used Ivah to tell me about the collapse of the Gloom instead of using dreams. They were ashamed of looking weak in front of me.

Neither of them addressed the thought, and not for lack of seeing it. I took it for the tacit admission that it was. No quite enough for me to forgive the way they'd let me make a fool of myself, but enough that I was willing to change the subject.

"We've been outplayed," I said. "There's no reason for the defector sigils to believe us and every reason for them not to."

Kurosiv had been planning this for even longer than I'd thought, and planning it smart.

"We must prepare for war," Komena said. "It will come down to the fangs, Catherine Foundling."

A war of gods, she meant. Kurosiv and the Crows, savaging each other for rule of the Night and likely destroying most of their race in the process. My goddesses didn't want to slaughter their own, but they'd still choose that above getting swallowed up by the usurper. I clenched my fingers then unclenched them.

"No," I finally said. "We still have one card left to play."

This was a game of deicide, now, and I just happened to have brought to Serolen the finest expert of that art in all of Calernia.

—

It wasn't exactly hard to find Masego. He was in his laboratory again, dissecting another corpse. How he was being kept supplied in fresh bodies was a question I'd decided not to ask. I plopped down in the chair I was pretty sure he was leaving there mostly for my visits, then groaned as I stretched out my tired limbs. He didn't turn, but I felt his eye glance at me through the back of his head before returning to the corpse.

"We can't stop the ritual from happening," I informed him.

Masego paused in his study, leaving the ribcage of the drow whose internal organs he'd been looking at kept open by steel contraption.

"I thought that might be the case," Hierophant replied. "It is a clever conundrum they present us with. Making war to destroy the towers might strengthen Kurosiv enough it can slay Sve Noc, while leaving our foe to their devices ensures they will devour much of the remaining Night and then your patronesses afterwards."

I was entirely unsurprised he'd caught on to that. Masego might be utterly uninterested in war as a rule, but deicide was an exception. To him this would be a genuinely interesting puzzle to figure out, or maybe something more along the lines of fencing.

"Diplomacy has failed," I said. "We tried to warn Kurosiv's sigils, but they got their story out long before we even knew it needed contradicting."

He cocked an eyebrow.

"And their excuse?"

"Sve Noc tried to drain the rebels out of Night when the first raised their flags," I said. "They've been claiming the towers are tools to ensure that can never happen."

The rebel Mighty probably figured that Kurosiv was skimming off the top, but that we'd come out trying to get them to pull down the towers had instead probably cemented in their minds that they needed to stay up at all costs. The talks had come across like an attempt to land a killing stroke now that we were losing, not us trying to save their damned hides. Masego let out an amused noise.

"And so the few Mighty capable of deciphering parts of the glyph array recognize the parts related to draining and believe them," he said. "Perhaps we should consider backing this Kurosiv instead, Catherine. They certainly seem to be the more skillful of these would-be gods."

"That's not in the cards," I firmly said.

Even if it were possible to convince Kurosiv to turn on the Dead King and refrain from devouring their race, they were chronically untrustworthy and their ideals were repellent to me. On top of that, in the long term I'd just be saddling Procer with another kind of enemy looming to its north. No, there was no bargain to be made there. Besides the Sisters might be a pair of murderous, thieving crows but they were my murderous and thieving crows. We'd entered the nightmare together and we would leave it just the same.

"Unfortunate," Masego shrugged. "So what is it to be our plan?"

"If we can't stop the ritual," I said, "then that leaves us only one choice."

He leaned forward, face brightening.

"Usurping it," Hierophant said, sounding pleased. "A most interesting idea."

"We came here to gather the original Night anyway," I pointed out. "We can kill two birds with one stone. When Kurosiv tries to eat the Firstborn, instead we return all the Night to Sve Noc and wipe the slate clean. We shake off the Bard, get our affairs in order and move to join the fight in Keter."

"That should be possible," Masego mused.

"Good," I grinned. "We can return with an army of refreshed drow at our back, which sh-"

"Ah, you misunderstand me," Zeze absent-mindedly interrupted. "It is possible if, like Kurosiv, you are willing to kill every living drow in the process."

The grin went away.

"Start from the premise that I'm not willing to do that," I said.

"Then you expect too much of me," he honestly replied. "I am not familiar enough with Night or soul work to do this to the level of precision you require."

He paused.

"I could perhaps lower the casualties to somewhere between two thirds and four fifths," Masego finally added. "Anything more than that would require Akua's help."

It was a life raft, and I boarded it eagerly.

"But with her help you could do better," I said.

"Presumably," he said. "She has experience harnessing the power of lesser gods into fixed systems that I lack, and her arrays in Liesse were precise to a degree I had believed unfeasible. As for soul work, we've explored different branches of the discipline – it is conceivable that she would know a method to remove the nails safely that I would not."

"Then we're putting the two of you on this," I said. "Everything else is kicked down the ladder, Zeze. Anything you two need you get it, and even if the Dead King comes knocking at the gates I want you to keep working on our usurpation ritual."

He didn't look all that happy about being interrupted in his study of Firstborn physiology, but the kind of work I'd asked would not be unpleasant to him. If he'd not already been getting into his own project, I suspected that he'd be outright eager.

"I'll inform her myself," I continued. "In the immediate, do you need anything to get started?"

The glimmering eye swivelled towards me, visible under the cloth.

"Live test subjects," Hierophant said. "Expect deaths. Our first attempt to remove the nails are unlikely to be anything less than traumatic."

My stomach clenched, but I slowly nodded. I'd ask for volunteers, people knowing the risks. But if I couldn't get enough?

Well, I guessed we'd see how far I was willing to go when extinction was on the line.

Liliet

HEEEE

SpeckofStardust

So whats better.
Slave freer Akua.
Deicide mission Masego
Or in denial that she has zero issues doing horrible things Cat?

Liliet

"I won beyond my wildest expectations and also entirely lost control of the situation" Cat

Miles

She just made Moren Bleakwomb go through that exact feeling at the shrine. How quickly the sunꞰ ɛlqəꞰ.

Liliet

lmao

erebus42

I mean I'd say she definitely still prefers to avoid doing horrible things if feasible alternatives exist.

Liliet

This, yeah.

M0och123

Alas, Cat is a practical Villain, it is one of, if not her most defining trait.

Liliet

(Although it should be noted that Akua's insistence on freeing them showed this WAS an existent feasible alternative, and Cat didn't see that)

Hhii

Just because it possible doesn't mean it's practical

Liliet

mm

Miles

Doesn't seem like there were any bad consequences. In fact, it should sow some doubt. She was able to sneak around and count coup before trying peace talks.

erebus42

True, though in this case you might be able to attribute that to them being on a dangerous mission and in a hurry.

Liliet

Yeah, it's not An Inexcusable Wrong. Action \neq inaction, morally speaking.

Hargabga

But she came to think any risk of not getting her reward as a reason to discard a notion entirely. She picks the safest option, even if it is objectively monstrous. I love her development, ngl.

Zach

Well, the thing she admits herself is that she wouldn't have decided to save the drow, despite saving them being feasible (and then proceeding to successfully do so). She wouldn't have been willing to take even a small risk to save those several hundred drow (at least until Akua brought it up).

Basically she doesn't have enough of an objection to sacrifices that she's willing to put much effort into avoiding them. If someone gives her a way to avoid them she'll accept it, but won't put much effort into finding such a way herself.

ohJohN

I think the real cornerstone is less 'effort' than 'expected utility': Cat is pretty consequentialist at this point, and if leaving those 300 drow to die increases the odds of saving all 100k+ drow from extinction by 1% (expected lives saved = 1000+ drow, or 700+ net), then the choice is already made.

However, if you throw Akua into the mix (who will save those 300 drow regardless, for deontological reasons), it quickly becomes a choice between stopping her (messy and very likely to lead to mission failure) or taking the 1% hit and continuing on.

Miles

Slave freer aqua is a terrible omen.

The doom of freaking liesse has taken over Vivian's role and is acting as Cat's moral compass.

gingerlygrump

Isn't that what Cat wanted, though? She surrounds herself with people that do have morals, in some capacity or another. Even Robber had morals, he happily died with a smile on his face so that his friends could live and oh my god just thinking about it makes me cry again.

Cpt. Obvious

BASTARD!

You had to remind me that he's actually dead. And I can't even hate you for it...

gingerlygrump

I know, I know, it's still such a hard punch to the chest that I cry every time I think about it. God he was amazing and I hope that somehow Cat DOES come for him and take him back from the gods below.

Christian Oaks

Calling it now, the towers are meant to take the night to the deadking giving him back the ability he lost in death-learning through the use of night theft from others

devildragon777

...The crows have a tendency to underestimate their opponents. First Neshamah, and now Kurosiv...they need to change or this will keep happening.

Cat's finally lost any hope of reins on Akua, and I think that'll be healthier for them both in the end. Also, Cat occasionally needs someone to yell at her for being a self-sacrificing dummy at times, and an Akua who's an equal would definitely be able to do that (She already has!)

I guess Masego and Akua are doing something similar to patient trials of a novel surgery? The other metaphors I can think of are...not pleasant.

Something I'm wondering about is how does Night get added to the pool? From what it seems like, there's a max limit, but how does that limit get expanded? Or is it just recycling the same powers?

Insanenoodlyguy

you can pull power from non-drow to increase night, gain more secrets. It's a much lower process, but it's what Ivah was trying to do out of desperation when we first met him.

beleester

This was the original plan for sending the Drow up north – they'd get a steady flow of Night from harvesting the rat invasions every year.

Geno

It's been stated many times before gods can't really grow or change. That's basically why the Crows empowered Cat to give them ideas they wouldn't consider otherwise

Sethur

Drow can draw Night from non-Drow as others have stated. And I think it was implied several times that Drow can add to the Night themselves by learning stuff in their lifetime. When Cat first met Ivah, it implied this was possible but that now Drow would ever attempt it, because for Mighty it was just faster to kill someone to get stronger and for weaker Drow it was like painting a target on one's back over several, arduous years. When Cat gave out the Tenets of Iserre she tasked the Drow with adding more Night, not just by killing, but by being/becoming better. Hence her question "Are you worthy?" which gets answered with "Ask tomorrow". 😊

sengachi

Each newborn drow's soul and each consumed outsider adds a little Night to the pot. Secrets can also be added by drow learning them the hard way. Unfortunately there are also ways Night and Secrets can be destroyed or lost (I don't think the transfer process is 100% efficient) and it seems like the Firstborn's Night supply had been stagnating for centuries. Or at least not growing fast enough for Sve Noc to do the apotheosis they were looking for. And the Mighty rarely invent anything new, so new Secrets of any serious magnitude are rare.

Miles

There are no drow newborns. Drow lost the ability to reproduce when they lost the ability to die of old age.

ohJohN

Pretty sure this is not true:

- only a threshold amount of Night keeps drow from 'natural' death, otherwise they die at exactly 60 (cf The Three Faces), and that limit on their baseline lifespan was part of the Crows' bargain with Below
- in this chapter we learn that 90+% of drow are non-Mighty
- thus there almost definitely weren't enough drow in existence at the time Night was created to survive a millennium of constant & bloody (VERY CONSTANT, VERY BLOODY) warfare without replenishment
- it's been mentioned that Mighty generally identify as genderless and are uncomfortable with gendered classification ("cattle-terms") because nisi ("cattle") are the only ones who consistently reproduce, and they're dogshit in the hierarchy

Miles

>I guess Masego and Akua are doing something similar to patient trials of a novel surgery?

Speaking of this, I doubt their call for volunteers will go well. Drow culture being what it is they'll get plenty of volunteers to go raiding for some voluntolds though.

mamm0nn

Just last chapter it was mentioned that Cat didn't want Cordelia harvested by some dzulu for the ability to speak Reitz, meaning that even aside from all the other stuff said before it was recently re-affirmed that the drow can gain power from any sentient being. Not sure if they can take power from animals, but probably not.

Which is kind of a broken ability if they weren't confined to infighting only as they are in this setting. As long as they win their battles and their numbers don't grow too low, drow can just go on campaigns and grow stronger by default of regaining all their own Secrets and their foes skills and powers too. As long as they keep breeding more numbers they just need to make sure they don't lose the battle regardless of the losses incurred.

MoreBeer

Kind of like the Dead King huh? Or the chain of hunger. Any of these forces only get stronger by killing others, as long as they're careful not to lose battles.

The problem is the deck is stacked against all these continental threats so they're not OP in the actual narrative. They're just threats. Unfortunately for the protagonists the Dead King managed to break out of his evil-in-a-can mode and is now truly OP.

mamm0nn

Not really. The Dead King is still bound to numbers, if one soldier kills two zombies then there's an overall loss. One that battle can partly regain, but especially in defensive forts he lost rather than broke even. He just has the overwhelming advantage of numbers to ignore this, only having the advantage of growth when defeating hapless or weak foes. And the chain of hunger is not so much ever-growing rather than a plague that just spreads out. They're a bit like (regular fantasy) goblins, just reproducing so fast that they appear a numberless plague.

Meanwhile the drow have a direct and notable growth with every victory. Not a drop of their own power is lost but the power of their foes is gained. Immediately. Directly. Assuredly. As long as they win, and do not rout leaving massive amounts of Night behind.

Linnus42

Yeah I still think Cat should have brought some Light Users. Its not like combat wasn't an obvious likely outcome to the Drow usurping power in a civil war. I know some don't like Mirror Knight for instance but he is optimized to kill Drow especially with Severance. And if not you got other options.

It occurs to me that this false god Drow plan is only liable to be working because Cat turned off the Villainous Stories. I was wondering what DK was doing and it seems he was capitalizing massively on that screw up. This probably also ties into why he didn't just slaughter all the Drow with Night Crippled and the Stories off. Though i am still not quite sure what was stopping him from rolling the Human Fronts with all the top people meeting in Salia. But who knows maybe he is working another angle.

Part of me wonders if Masego and Akua would actually give the power to Sve Noc. I find that some what doubtful. Maybe will get an Isildur and the Ring scenario with Cat as Elrond. And Honestly Sve Noc should give more info to Cat lol and not just let her go in blind but maybe they don't want to bias her choices.

Liliet

Cat did not know she was walking into a civil war until Ivah found her!

Linnus42

Cat knew a Drow was usurping power though. Killing that Drow is the obvious solution to any false god plot. Cat is suppose to be a lore master so no I don't buy that argument.

shikkarasu

Sure, but bringing a Light user in is still asking for trouble. Bull in a china shop, trouble. All of Serolin is made with Night, even if little of it is made of Night. Cat would need to keep that Hero/priest on a short leash the entire time, and there are only so many resources she can pull from the main army.

It was a valid choice to not bring Light users, even if it would have made some of the fighting easier.

Liliet

Cat didn't know that was a problem that would need immediate addressing or that there would BE a false god plot.

ninegardens

We the audience knew. The the audience knew several years ago that Kurosiv was trying to claim night, and was going to be a threat. It was kind of obvious. Besides, even if you don't know what kind of madness you are heading into, having a good toolbox on hand is useful. And ummm... Cat left with only a small fraction of her toolbox.

I can see the argument for leaving MK and severance behind (though severance WOULD be handy)... but bringing some kind of hero party member would be very useful... Overall it just seems like a very small party for a very important mission.

Two dozen snakes

The Dead King HAS rolled the human fronts and the only reason he hasn't taken Salia is the repeated use of the Eleamal. Right now he's probably working on a counter to that. Otherwise, he knows the game is up for the Rebel Alliance – they're out of time. They have to come to him in Keter and soon, so he can just wait for them while building his response

No way Masego or Akua usurp the ritual for themselves. Masego wants apotheosis on his own terms, while Akua has grown away from that entirely. She doesn't want to have that kind of power anymore

Cat couldn't bring a Light User because they're heroes, and the only Hero we've met who is both powerful enough to make a difference AND not lose his mind and take a crack at Sve Noc upon witnessing drow culture is Hanno, and he's needed in Salia. Pity Tariq is no longer around...

Death Knight

The Pilgrim would definitely have fucked up Kurosiv's shit hard with Mercy on his shoulders...

Geno

She had no idea the civil war was happening until she got there. Will never understand why some readers expect characters to be clairvoyant. It makes no sense at all

mamm0nn

The Villainous stories being gone thing doesn't seem as absolute in practice as it seemed when this problem was introduced. Cat's probably here because of Providence urging her to be here not too late nor too soon, the heroic assault on her tower was still with plenty of hero always wins fuckery, and Villains also don't get the power boosts that the first act would grant their story.

I think that while the Bard controls a lot of the current and mundane Stories, she's hardly the one that created and shaped all of Providence. Tales that apply to Named of both sides as well as a more ancient Might vs Right likely still apply. Villains can still be defeated or drawing heroes by Providence, they're just no longer so bound to this fate that Asmodeus would rage against the heavens over it. F.e. if a new Hero and Villain were to appear now and fight each other, the Villain would be able to fail on their first appearance if they bluster too much but they wouldn't be destined to die by the hero at the third act. But the Hero might still be attracted to the Villain's plot and appear at the right time to play their Role. Just, the outcome would go from 90/10 to 60/40 on who would win the battle in the third act battle. Or more favourable for the Villain if they prepared well while the Hero just rushed in.

David Stone

The villainous stories being gone doesn't help Neshamah here. The one story that consistently "works" is: villain deals with powers beyond its understanding, expecting UNLIMITED POWAH! but instead gets its soul eaten. Evil Overlord List item 199: "I will not make alliances with those more powerful than myself. Such a person would only double-cross me in my moment of glory. I will make alliances with those less powerful than myself. I will then double-cross them in their moment of glory."

Insanenoodlyguy

I studied her face. She had already made her decision, I realized. She would free the dzulu whatever I said. And so I shivered, knowing in that moment that I had both succeeded beyond my wildest hopes and entirely lost control of the situation. So I said the only thing I could say.

"We must vote quick"

topwebfiction.com/listings/a-practical-guide-to-evil

Tenmei

"We can kill two birds with one stone."

Cat using this expression here feels rather ominous xD

Miles

Seems like it would be a sore topic for the birds on her shoulders but I guess they didn't catch it.

Gabe Meadow

It's interesting that this was titled Kernel (Redux). The original chapter was in Book 4, depicting Neshemah's progress towards apotheosis. And we see how Kurosiv's work here mirrors the Dead King's: a lot of smart thinking, patient groundwork, and the brutal destruction of everything that isn't necessary for attaining godhood (meaning all the draw in this case).

The one crucial distinction here, is that Kurosiv/Loc Ynan, clever as it is, hasn't taken the full caution to leave no openings, starting with borrowing the ritual from the Hidden Horror, and hopefully not guarding the apotheosis ritual against usurpation. Well, I hope so, or else Calernia is screwed.

Also, the reveal about the Night introduces a pattern to lesser godhood. It's finite, fixed. The Dead King is DEAD, any soul shard lost is gone for good, permanently weakening him. He cannot grow, in that sense.

The Night might (we don't know for sure) be capable of replenishment and growth, but it's definitely something that can be overstretched, with its vulnerability to usurpation being a significant part of the problem.

I imagine Masego is taking notes for his superior PROJECT APOTHEOSIS.

Dome Zasrekh

DK can't grow 'cos he is undead. Gods can grow just fine. Night is known to feed on others to grow, that's the whole point of it, to pay the debt of the old drow.

ninegardens

>"Live test subjects," Hierophant said. "Expect deaths. Our first attempt to remove the nails are unlikely to be anything less than traumatic."

Right.

And here we have your annual reminder that Hierophant is in fact a villian. Not just Apathetic about morality, but actively ummm... happy to put it on the back burner.

And he needs Akua in order to make this work.

And Akua is becoming more and more heroic, and less and less willing to live with Person sacrifices.

Ohhhhh... this is going to be fun.

Liliet

I mean prisoners from the other side are one obvious way to make this work.

shikkarasu

Nah, Akua won't tolerate it. It will be a mirror to an old argument over Ivah's band from the start of the Everd Arc showing Akua's growth as a person and Warden!Cat's decline, even lower than Winter!Cat.

"We've enough at hand to salvage keys for ourselves," Diabolist said. "Though I would suggest we keep one guide to learn how to use it."

"I'm not going to just execute prisoners, Akua," I peevishly said.

"It's not a question of usefulness," I said. "We don't execute prisoners."

That whole conversation circles around a few times, Akua finding new ways to justify killing them and Catherine insisting that these things are simply not done. I can't wait for Akua to tell Catherine that it's not a question of usefulness; that she will not kill prisoners.

Salt

Catherine does execute prisoners though, en masse at times. Just not for frivolous, unnecessary, or cruel reasons.

She specifically picked out the highborn from the prisoners she took at the end of second Liesse and had an entire road lined with their crucified corpses. That's pretty far from being absolutely against killing prisoners.

At the end of the day if she has enough of a vendetta and/or sees enough necessity in it, she'll cross that line and even more.

Liliet

they arent going to kill them they are going to experiment on them also she should have this argument with Masego not Cat

shikkarasu

Given that the experiments are going to be lethal and torturous I don't see that as a mark in Cat's favour. As for who Akua should argue with, Masego is not the one being a hypocrite, here. Nor is he the one simply assuming that Akua will have a hand in it.

*"Then we're putting the two of you on this," I said. ...
"I'll inform her myself,"*

She went on a tirade about killing your prisoners, specifically Drow, and how it is morally wrong. She even convinced Akua that this is true and admitted that this was her intended goal over the past 3 years. Not a day ago she witnessed that Akua has taken this so very much to heart that she risked her life to save 300 Drow, friend and foe alike, even knowing that it may change nothing. All of this and then still tacitly ordering her to help gruesomely kill prisoners?

Cat made a Hero (Named or not) and now she's asking her to act like a Villain. You don't get it both ways. Rehabilitating Akua means not relying on her to do capital 'E' Evil for you anymore. This is, at best, a callous disregard for Akua as a person. I would even go so far as to call it betrayal. It was one thing to give Akua the rope and let her do as she will with it. To simply allow her to return to Praes. It's another to tell her to tie a noose and stand on this chair. This specific chair. The one that Cat is preparing to kick.

Liliet

I don't think that was about Akua taking Catherine's speech that one time to heart. I mean she was immediately arguing with Catherine about this.

Also, I think you're missing the point. This is the solution with the FEWEST lives lost, that's why Cat is going for it. Do you seriously think Akua's new moral compass will tell her "let them all die rather than do experimentation on unwilling subjects"?

shikkarasu

You are correct, Akua changed over 2.5 years of being shown a better way; it's not just the one argument. Still, I can't help but note it was the first time Cat tried to tell Akua 'we don't do this' instead of simply 'get back in the box.' It was this first of her many lessons on being good and that is the sort of thing that has weight. The sort of seed EE plants 3 years before it is going to be a pivotal part of a character's arc.

What really sells me on this are the following 3 things:

- Cat realising that Akua would rather jeopardise the mission and go against Cat's orders, even when 300 Drow would 99% certainly die, even if these ones were freed.
- Akua saying that she was sick to death of shackles.
- This conversation from last chapter: "I trail in your wake. Not unpleasantly so, but when I remember those who looked at me with hope in their eyes it does not seem enough."

While I fundamentally agree with you and Catherine that this is the least of two or more evils, and I'd probably side with Masego on anything because he is my favourite cinnamon roll, I really do think that Akua's new moral compass will tell her to find a third way, even if one doesn't exist. I fully expect her to take the Heroic stance that it is better to make a stand and fail than to torture and kill 'innocents'.

Zach

No; as Masego said, the earlier experiments will almost certainly die. So it's actually worse than just execution; it's torturous executed via experimentation.

Liliet

the point is the reason

Burdi

Why would masego and akua give all night to the sve nov after they get it all in their hand. Neither of them fond of the crow. It would more make sense to give night to cat, make her goddess one more. Part of it that made night immortal is Winter anyway so give it back to cat would be possible

Liliet

Because uh... Cat doesn't want it? Cat wants it with the crows? If you squint, you could argue crows are her subordinates she's delegated handling the drow and the Night to, so why would her best friends sabotage that? Masego has suggested switching contractors but Cat said no, I'm sure he might suggest it again but Cat'll just say no again.

erebus42

Yeah she didn't much like being a goddess and I doubt she has any real desire to be one again.

Liliet

I'm sure Masego agrees with DK's view that getting that back would be a step down for her.

shikkarasu

I'd feared alienation as the consequence of drawing on my mantle, all the while too far gone to realize I'd already estranged myself from everything that'd made me Catherine Foundling. Better to die than go back to it, I thought. To be nothing at all rather than be that. I closed my not-eyes.

"Mortal," I whispered. "To the end, whatever that may be."

Yeah, maybe not in her top three options.

Miles

Because it's the sloppy seconds of a failed/poorly executed apotheosis. They won't want it because they don't want it.

Juff

Typo Thread:

the side a > the side of a if interest > of interest and begin > and began Yashala > Yeshala have seen like > have seemed like of large, > of a large, to dwell into (seems like it should be more like retreat) something, those > something; those just see the > just seen the singe > single Yeshara > Yeshala baring (not the right word. maybe pointing, wielding, brandishing) was striking > was a striking recognize it > recognized it against us. > against us."

guaranteed > guarantees happened the > happened to the its followed > its followers
"Is it your > "It is your was buying > were they buying it too many > if too many had painted > had been painted wall covered > wall was covered and was quietly > and I was quietly is it to be > is to be first attempt > first attempts

Nick Chivas

Is it meant to be this?

Concerningly, though, I could see a fucking door. >
Concerningly, though, I couldn't see a fucking door.

nineran

No, because a door is clearly a trap.

Amostyx

Possible typo

Concerningly, though, I could see a > Concerningly, though, I couldn't see a

KageLupus

"Good," I grunted. "I'll go in front, Zeze behind me. Let's try not to wake up Kavian, yeah?"

Settling into a single file line, Akua taking my cloak and Masego hers, we passed the threshold of bones.

Unless I am not getting the plan, the party order should be Zeze -> Akua -> Cat, but the description makes it sound like it is Akua -> Zeze -> Cat

Zahariel

This chapter once again reminds me how dangerous the Dead King is. I mean, he was able to convince a Drow proto-Eldritch Abomination to trust him, despite the Drows having spent centuries/millennias being terrified of him and actively avoiding his territory. That's some good persuasion skills right there.
Or maybe the other side felt cornered and didn't have a choice ?

beleester

The Dead King published a how-to book on ascension to godhood – Kurosiv could be copying that rather than talking directly with the Dead King.

shikkarasu

A booby trapped how-to. Hells, he may have just made a new copy and let Kurosiv “steal” it.

laguz24

Masego ate that book and look where it got him. Actively trying to use that book’s instructions is an even worse idea.

sengachi

I’ll bet the Dead King seeded pieces of the ritual in his undead necromancers and let Kurosiv piece it together from “stolen” information, taken as Night and Secrets.

Raved Thrad

Forgive my ignorance, if that be it, but what happened to Jindrich? I have a soft spot for that insane nutter, and I’d been looking forward to seeing it in action again. Did it buy the farm somewhere and I forgot?

sengachi

I think it’s just on the frontlines happily murdering undead.

shikkarasu

I hope it harvests Night from a Crab-Forge. It deserves to treat itself.

mamm0nn

I disagree with Cat’s visions of how Kurosiv was eroding the apathy and that the new ways would inevitably win over the old ones. It’s what she wants to see and wants to believe, but these are inevitably different creatures with a different culture and different situations. She even remarked it several times herself that where some selfish Proceran prince was still just a regular man in the end, the most selfish and arrogant Mighty were also the most powerful who could have that attitude because of their power and experience.

This isn’t even about the mightiest also being the strongest by a wide margin, and that a ruler wouldn’t need a large army of loyal soldiers or the tithes of the people to continue ruling. The drow are a massively different species, to a point where all of Asmodeus’s teachings are downright worthless here to just apply to them. He would likely scold Cat himself if he’d see her apply his human-oriented ideas onto a decisively different species that doesn't even care about gender. And she clearly doesn't know a lot about their culture still, let alone about the stuff she'd have to know to make a drow-version of Asmodeus's dissection of a human kingdom's ideals and soul.

If her ways were truly so good that they would soon make Kurosiv's outdated because hers would win out in the end, then that would've happened in the Underdark centuries ago. Even trapped in a cave led by goddesses that wanted the killing to continue, there would've been Mighty that would've improved the lives of the nisi simply because they could or wanted to. A millennium is a very long time, and any Mighty holding a position for a while would've had decades of sitting around having nothing better to do.

If the nisi being happy would've been a meaningful advantage, then some Mighty would've grown and spread the example. No such thing happened, or at least it never reached prominence while the Mighty fighting for themselves only was clearly working well. Whether it's the power difference of Mighty making the nisi's power insignificant (quite likely) or the drow mentality and morals being decisively different from the humans' (likely a factor), Cat's belief that her new ways will soon make a return to the old ways an inferior and foolish idea is foolish itself. And that is making me rather scared for whether her big 'I'm improving the world!' project will even last a decade.

Salt

In my opinion, Cat's reasoning is pretty sound to be honest. What the Drow currently are and have been are a moot point in the current scheme of things – the underdark arc and this arc is about them changing and growing as a people from the old ruins of their civilization. It doesn't make sense to me to say they're not going to culturally change as a people, in the middle of a story arc about them culturally changing as a people.

That's why the entire civil war is happening in the first place, in this short of a span, Drow culture has already become so far removed from what it was that there's an active rebellion against the Crows, and Drow like Kurosiv have begun to bestow power rather than letting it be earned the hard way. This would be unthinkable to the past hundreds of generations of Firstborn, yet here we are before even a decade of living on the surface.

There isn't much basis to say Drow culture over the past millennia has served them well either. The Drow right now aren't a Great Civilization, they're the ruin of one. They're the bloated, fetid corpse of a once-great people that sat in the underdark rotting for a Millenia. They didn't grow, they didn't progress, they accomplished nothing but bleeding their own peoples and degenerating into pitiful things that the original Empire Ever Dark would be horrified with. There's no reason to worship the old ways now that they're no longer isolated, and every Drow can see for themselves that the old ways have caused them to fall so far as to be barely eye level with species the old empire once considered cattle.

As far as how they're going to change, there's lots of good reason to believe Catherine's predictions make sense. The fact that so many Heroes and vengeful Villains specifically become Named because average people were being pushed too far and too cruelly proves it. For that to become such a major and universal Story Trope in the Guideverse, it has to happen with such consistency and frequency across every culture and generation that it carves the pattern into the face of Creation itself. Even among Non-Humans like the Dwarves, you see it in Named like the Herald.

At the end of the day, the simple fact of the matter is that people like Kurosiv fall apart the first time that they don't win. Meaning they're sure to go down in flames eventually, as always winning is the territory of Above, not Below. The Drow need to be led by individuals who make sure they they always get their due, instead of wasting lives and effort in a futile effort to always win.

mamm0nn

I'm not saying there's going to be no cultural change, I'm saying that Cat's specific vision of change is incredibly naive and that she has no proper knowledge and experience with drow to even try predicting their kingdom and culture a decade down the line.

This is a big difference in opinion between you and me, I can already tell. I see you even expect Above to factor into this, something that is definitely not going to happen for the literal Night-worshipping drow. They, similar to the orcs and goblins, will remain wholly Below-worshipping and getting no Heroes to rise up to cause this Evil Loses habit that you're talking about. Similar to the orcs, they can remain repressed for centuries by big evil guys.

As the drow Mighty are both very big and strong as well as something that any nisi could one day become (rather than being chosen for like a Name), they hold a natural leadership position here. In this culture, Below can and will win by having the strongest lad around, it's their very religion. Kurosiv and his Mighty don't even care for this cultural change you're speaking of, they're just seeing their own power and influence wane and decided to do whatever suits them best instead. Nothing to do with the drow culture in specific, just their own immediate desires. And as they are the most powerful around, unless there's someone even stronger like Cat around to actively enforce this then they'll just make their Might is Right.

Christian Oaks

Calling it now, the towers are meant to take the night to the deadking giving him back the ability he lost in death-learning through the use of night theft from others

ohJohN

(I'm dying at 'Asmodeus' 😊)

I think Cat explains her reasoning well in this chapter, and she addresses a lot of your points. I also think you're vastly underestimating how different the situation in the Everdark was compared to now.

Her way wouldn't have been successful in the Everdark because that was a closed system, with constant, zero-sum fighting over the nicest ruins which "reinforced the order of things: fight well, gain Night, live better." That became a stable equilibrium, in part because the Crows – the source of Night, the best available tool for improving your life – actively encouraged it, to ensure enough sacrifices to keep their species alive. Sigil-holders weren't just "sitting around having nothing better to do": you have to raid for supplies, defend your territory from constant attacks, and keep increasing your Night to avoid rival sigil-holders (or your own lieutenants) eating you. Focusing on non-Mighty too much would see your sigil outcompeted and wiped out; building anything beyond the bare minimum for survival (e.g. mushroom farms) just puts a target on your back. Nisi didn't have much of a choice, or better options, and after some centuries very few drow would even remember a different way of life.

Now, on the surface, things are VERY different. The Crows are no longer trying to keep their people divided and constantly at war with each other, even backing the Iserre tenets to enforce some degree of cooperation. Resources aren't as scarce – there's woods full of food and lumber and room to spread out, there's other races and nations to trade with – so it's no longer necessary to fight amongst each other to survive (even counterproductive, with a shared external threat). Without that intense competitive pressure, nisi now have more choices than "get treated like garbage by Mighty" and "get wiped out", and Cat has shown them a workable alternative with tangible results. These alternatives are possible now, and as long as they remain so, I think her prediction is pretty plausible.

Underneath it all, I don't think drow are so very different from other races. Definitely shaped and scarred by their circumstances, their culture and beliefs twisted by centuries of conflict and isolation and scarcity. But we've near-exclusively seen the perspectives of Mighty: a small minority, the ones best adapted to that environment, most likely to buy into its vicious mindset. I don't think the average nisi is irreconcilably different from the average goblin or orc – and Cat's general lessons about people have, for the most part, applied to those races as much as humans.

Abrakadabra

So Kurosiv is playing the Saruman game. Join the dark lord and rule together/in competition with him. Either that or he is already a flesh puppet of DK.

Sir_Immith

"One cannot make an earring of a Secret, darling," she replied.
For sure she knows this for a fact because it's been tried

Chapter 46: Penultimate

"So spoke Maleficent: 'To sit this throne is to be debtor and indebted: I owe and am owed, tethered by the oath that raised me. Let this empire forget not it took myriad hands to raise the Tower.'"

– Extract from the Scroll of Chains, first of the Secret Histories of Praes

I sometimes felt like the shepherd from the stories, stumbling on the half-buried lamp and rubbing it so I might ask the djinn for wishes.

Though there were two wonder-makers in Serolen and neither were bound to anything as dingy as a lamp, it was still betting it all on their ability to make my wish come true: usurp Kurosiv's apotheosis ritual without killing thousands, if not millions, of Firstborn. Sve Noc had allowed me time to find a solution, a way other than them rolling up their sleeves and getting into a death match with their would-be devourer, but what was the point if the medicine was as brutal to the drow as the disease?

If the deaths were inevitable the Sisters would choose their talons over faith in Hierophant's works, whom they neither liked nor trusted. They'd been clear about that much. I had been given much authority as First Under the Night, but ultimately I was not a queen here for all that they called me one. I was a councillor and it was not my place to decide how they were to defend their godhead, or what fate they would countenance for their people. It was frustrating to have my hands tied, but I knew that to be unfair.

I had kept myself in check in Praes because there was still so much about that land I did not understand, too much to have the right to make the decisions I wanted to, and every bit of that was a hundred times as true in Serolen. It still left me restless. Ysengral and Rumena did not need me to fight their defence against the traitors for them, a kind of warfare I had little experience in besides, and unless either of the Traitor Generals came out to fight I wasn't needed for muscle either.

It left me in the uncomfortable position of being the highest-placed person in Serolen after Sve Noc in principle, but having very little to do in practice. Instead of going around chewing at my nails I turned to the Losara, the sigil I had founded in the Everdark and charged with the duty of priesthood and oathkeeping. The numbers of it had increased tenfold under Ivah's careful stewardship, but unlike any other sigil inexistence its numbers were spread out all over Firstborn territory – there weren't that many of them in Serolen, but then they weren't supposed to be fighting anyway.

It was not unlike holding court back in Laure, handling petitions to the crown. My Lord of Silent Steps had affairs in hand, not unexpectedly, so it was the matters related to my title of First Under the Night that were asked of. Which left me sitting with a bearded old drow who looked about to keel over. Its wheezing was not to enough to deceive me into thinking it weak, though: its presence in the Night burned, powerful among the rylleh of the Losara.

"This one would not dare question the designs of one so high," Mighty Trokel said, "yet it is not time, Losara Queen, for your words to be set down?"

"You want a book out of me," I said, almost amused.

Their fate of their entire race was in the balance and yet they wanted a holy book out of me. Mighty Trokel inclined its head in agreement, another Mighty – a younger one called Solvobod, my purple paint not covering only its face but instead its entire bare torso – picking up the thread.

"It is known that the First Under the Night has no time to spare for setting down its sayings," Mighty Solvobod said, "and this is only sensible."

"Of course," I drily agreed. "And?"

Much hemming and hawing as they tried to figure out how not to offend me with their request, until I got it out of them: they wanted to assign me a scribe, someone to set down my words and ask me questions whenever I had the moment. A tortured compliment about my being a skilled speaker of riddles was unravelled down to the blunter bone of them being aware that I usually only taught through conversation, so they figured the only way they'd get a book out of me was someone actually following me around and doing that.

I wasn't exactly eager at the prospect and made it clear that certain conversations would be barred, which they fell over each other to agree, but they weren't wrong to ask this of me. I'd been named First not because the Crows thought I had a knack for religion but because I was well placed to serve as a herald and advisor, someone who could help them fit the Firstborn in the complicated tapestry of the Burning Lands, but I was their high priestess. I could not leave only silence behind me.

"And I suppose you've already a scribe in mind for that?" I asked.

"This one offers itself to the purpose," Mighty Trokel replied, stopping to wheeze halfway through.

I mulled over that. It was rylleh, so it could be counted on to get out of the way without dying pointlessly when fights came. I glanced at Ivah.

"Mighty Trokel has some renown as a chronicler," my Lord of Silent Steps noted.

An endorsement, in other words, but I was not satisfied.

"How old are you, Trokel?" I asked.

The old drow looked surprised. While it was nowhere as aged in looks as Rumena it lacked the bland agelessness of most its kind, so I'd bet a couple of centuries at least.

"This will be my six hundred and thirty-third year, Losara Queen," Mighty Trokel said. "I once thought to die an ispe, but had a stroke of fortune in war."

Meaning it'd gotten to harvest a motherlode of Night and found its lifespan significantly expanded, but gotten stuck looking older and never bothered to change the look. Six hundred and thirty-three years, I thought, the vast majority of which it would have spent as rylleh or close. The highest of the Mighty, save for those who ruled over even Mighty.

"Ivah," I said, "who is the youngest among the Losara?"

"I am uncertain," the silver-eyed drow admitted. "But I can know the answer in an hour's span, Losara."

It paused.

"Nisi, almost certainly," Ivah added.

Yeah, I'd figured it would be one of them. It was why I'd asked.

"Find out," I ordered. "I want called to me the youngest Losara who knows their glyphs."

Surprise, and not just from my steward among the Losara. They'd caught on quick.

"You mean to make them your scribe," Ivah said.

Trokel, I noted, had not dared to do the same. Perhaps fearing I would take it as insubordination and rip the life out of it.

"I will have two," I said. "Trokel, old and rylleh. And the other, young and nisi."

I met the old drow's eyes, saw how it looked like it was itching for a pen, and for a moment I was improbably reminded of Nestor Ikaroi.

"You stand high, Trokel," I said. "Sometimes that's the worst place to look at history from."

My Name thrummed in approval, pleased, and it warmed my veins. They bowed. I told them Trokel would begin following me as soon as the other scribe was found and that was the end of the petition, though I cut short entertaining another: word came through a runner that one of my wonder-makers had left the room where they'd been holed up in half a day.

It was time for me to have a talk with Akua Sahelian.

—

Akua had taken to wearing black since we'd come to Serolen, I'd noticed.

It wasn't enough to make her blend in with the Firstborn — that would have been difficult, when she had curves enough for a dozen of them — but it did make her stand out less than, say, Cordelia Hasenbach and her colourful riding dresses. Tonight it was a loose, long dress with faint accents of gold swirling up the ribs she'd chosen to wear, paired with a cloak of the same cloth and a gauzy black veil that cascaded halfway down to her back. The veil was kept in place by a slender carved band of gold, one of the few pieces of jewelry she still wore nowadays.

It was far from the most alluring dress she'd ever put on, but there was something attractive about how obviously comfortable she was in the clothes. This was, I dimly realized, as dressed down as she'd probably been allowed to be back in Wolof. It would never do for a Sahelian to be too casual in their clothes, yeah?

"Now you stare," Akua said, sounding genuinely exasperated. "Should I just have put on a mutton's pelt a few years ago and called it a day, Catherine?"

Her wearing only a pelt actually sounded like something I wouldn't mind seeing in the slightest, but I decided that lying shamelessly was the best part of valour.

"Of course not," I lied. "I was just wondering where you've been keeping all these dresses."

"Pocket realms," she archly replied. "I forged one while in Praes and a second on the way to Salia."

I really should start using Night to do that, I noted, I had the capacity.

"Good to know," I said, then invited her to sit.

She did, still eyeing me with some irritation. Unlike me, who had to fold like a praying mantis, she somehow made sitting at the low tables the drow preferred a graceful thing. How she managed that with legs longer than mine I'd never be sure, but it was probably dark magic of some sort. I worked out a kink in my shoulder, then caught her eye.

"So," I said, "what's the verdict?"

"It is theoretically possible," Akua said, and I did not hide my relief.

"Casualties?"

"From taking back the Night?" she replied. "None."

"Masego was worried taking out the nails would kill them," I said.

"Masego has not powered rituals with sacrificed fae before," she retorted without batting an eye. "Winter's mark is still deep in the Night, Catherine, which resulted in some useful secondary properties. Ripping out the nail would certainly result in death, but dissolving it is possible without killing the host."

I slowly nodded.

"And in the moments they're all left without Night," I began, then trailed off in invitation.

"If dawn comes to pass without it being restored, I imagine nearly all Firstborn save for dzulu and nisi would die," Akua mused. "Night is what extends their lifespan."

"So we'll be flipping the hourglass the moment we begin this," I muttered.

Which was a risk, but not an unacceptable one. I felt Sve Noc brush against my thoughts and cocked my head to the side, silently asking the question. A soft brush back, pregnant with intent. No, it wasn't a dealbreaker. Good.

"We've got divine blessing so far," I said, leaning forward. "So what do you need to get it done?"

There she grimaced.

"Living drow willing to let their nail be dissolved so we can find a method that will not have grave consequences," Akua said.

I nodded.

"We've sent out for volunteers and you already have a hundred," I said.

"We'll need Mighty, Catherine," she gently said. "They have a deeper connection to the power, it will react differently."

I clenched my fingers.

"They might have to be prisoners," I admitted. "We have some lined up for when it's been tried, but none want to be the first."

Sve Noc had so far declined to make it an order to one of their Mighty to lay down on the slab. I was both relieved and indignant that'd been their decision. On one hand, did they know what the stakes were? On the other, Gods, let there be at least one side in this nightmare that halfway deserved to win.

"The point of the procedure will not be to kill," Akua finally said, "but is a fine line, Catherine."

I grimaced.

"But no so fine," I said, "you won't walk it."

I was right and we both knew it. She looked away.

"What choice is there?" she asked.

"Always less than we'd like," I murmured, "and yet we go on."

The silence that hung between us was not restful. She was not happy, and I could not quite shake the metaphorical pebble in my boot.

"How many rituals is it that you've asked me now?" Akua idly asked, golden eyes returning to me.

There was an expression in them I found hard to read.

"Depends on how you count them," I hedged.

"You always dole out power and trust so freely," the dark-skinned sorceress. "I once believed that your great flaw, you know."

"Not anymore?"

Her lips faintly quirked.

"This ritual you ask, it will put in our hands a gift of the Gods Below themselves," Akua said. "How can you be certain neither of us will be tempted to claim it?"

"I can't," I admitted.

She leaned forward.

"How can you be certain it will truly do what we tell you it will?" she asked.

"I can't," I repeated. "Anymore than I can be sure Vivienne didn't spend the last few years undermining me as Queen of Callow, or that Hakram didn't use me to become the Warlord. It's impossible to know for sure, Akua. Some things you take on faith."

Her lips pursed. Not an answer that satisfied. I was, I suspected, being tested somehow. For what I could not know, but it behooved me to tread carefully.

"And should I decide that simply being handed trust and power to wield at your order is not enough?" Akua quietly asked. "That I, too, want to decide?"

My fingers clenched and slowly unclenched. A test, I thought, but a lie here would be a mistake. I met that golden gaze with my mismatched own, the eye I'd been born to and the one I'd lost, and breathed out. A year ago, I was not sure what I'd have answered. But today? I still remembered that moment in the streets, looking at the dzulu in chains, and who it was that'd not been willing to walk away. Some things, I'd told her, you took on faith. But there was more to it than that, and that was the question that lay hidden behind those golden eyes. Am I a prisoner on a longer leash, Akua was asking, or am I what you say I am? One of us.

"Then I trust your judgement," I quietly replied.

Her face went blank. She nodded, curtly, and rose to her feet. Back to work, not that she even made the excuse, and as I watched her leave my stomach clenched. Pivot, I thought. Faint enough I'd not sense it. A personal one.

And it was too early to tell whether or not I'd regret the answer I'd just given.

—

I'd expected Cordelia to keep busy, given that she was not a woman prone to idleness, but I was surprised when the Losara watchers I'd put on her told me exactly how busy she'd been. Apparently her every waking hour was spent either meeting with sigil-holders or historians, her translators stuck as close to her as shadows. I caught her after a meeting with one of the rylleh of the Ysengral – no matter her old rank or recent exploits, she did not warrant the time of one of the Ten Generals – and got her to sit down long enough for a drink and a meal. Neither were of the kind of quality she must have been used to, but I did notice she dug into the pheasant with relish.

"I enjoy the taste of game," Cordelia admitted, "but I had to refrain in Salia. A noticeable preference for hunted birds would have drawn comment."

"Ah," I hummed. "The Lycaonese savage enjoying hunting too much would have been a bad look."

I received a thin smile that pretty much confirmed my guess. During the years where Cordelia was an outright foe, I'd never considered how fragile her position truly was. She'd pretty much won the Great War, that much was true, but the years of peace afterwards had been extremely dangerous to her. She was a Lycaonese ruling southern peoples who tended to dislike and dismiss her kind, walking a tightrope even when her victory had still been fresh. It was no wonder she'd had to be so careful with the perception of her, when you looked at what her reliable supporters had been.

The core of her backers were damn far from Salia on top of being the poorest, least populated and least influential of the principalities. The Lycaonese had proved in the wars then and since that their armies were the finest in Procer and punched well above their weight, but she couldn't actually bring that strength to bear: most of it had to remain pointed north, keeping back either the Chain of Hunger or the Dead King. She'd built a bloc of southern supporters, sure but her majority in the Highest Assembly had never been large or solid.

It'd been only cleverness and her initial reserve of goodwill from winning the Great War that'd allowed her to push through her early reforms. Well, that and skillfully getting the people on her side. For a foreign savage come to the capital as a conqueror, however gentle of one, Cordelia Hasenbach had been impressively well-loved by the people of Salia.

"I was always surprised," I said, "that you never got the House of Light on your side. Gods know I would have had a priest standing at my side at every session of the court, if I could have found one willing."

I hadn't, or rather there'd been plenty willing to attend but none as my open backer. It'd been enough of a headache to find someone in good standing willing to anoint me as Queen of Callow, and I was still half-convinced that I'd only found takers because it'd been an open secret at that point that Praes and Procer were looking at the borders with hands on their swords.

"They courted me early in my reign," Cordelia admitted, "but what they wanted of me I was unwilling to give."

I raised an eyebrow.

"The seat in the Assembly the lost after the Liturgical Wars?"

Seemed like the likeliest prize. It'd been part of the bait that Scribe had used to get Holies to back the coup against Cordelia, a promise of restoring it made in Rozala Malanza's name.

"They were not so bold," the fair-haired princess chuckled. "They wanted me to exert my influence to make an exception to the foundational possession laws for the House."

I squinted at her, trying to remember what those were. I'd actually heard about those, Pickler had praised them in a report because of how easy they made it to build defensive bastions.

"Right, Lycaonese princes have different rights," I said. "No one can own land in your principalities except for the royal line, everyone else is renting."

"It is a little more nuanced than that," Cordelia said. "Some lands have been held in the trust of certain families for centuries, with written treaties between our royal lines and theirs that prevent revocation without certain conditions."

"So the priests were pissy about having to pay rent for their temples," I said, amused. "And you told them to stow it and keep paying."

A less generous woman than I might have called the expression she made at that a moue.

"The Holies wanted the right to hold lands and raise sovereign monasteries, as they do in southern principalities," Cordelia said. "I explained to them that the refusal to parcel royal rights goes back to the rule of the Iron Kings and is considered sacrosanct, but the frustration at being unable to secure a northern foothold is an old one."

She elegantly shrugged.

"Our relationship significantly cooled after that, though it was never outright hostile until events boiled over during the coup," the princess finished.

I grinned.

"And for that little piece of work you got to rip their fangs out," I said.

Vivienne had watched with attention and more than a little relish as the wealth and land of the Proceran House was methodically dismantled in the wake of that mess, noting that the priests even had to pretend to be grateful since she wasn't coming down on the actual people – it was the riches, the properties and the trades, that Cordelia had confiscated for the good of the war effort. In the years to come, the House of Light across the Whitecaps would find that it had a lot less coin to throw around when it wanted to get its way.

Like Vivs, I was already looking forward to the furious shrieking.

"It was only a matter of time until another First Prince did the same," Cordelia demurred. "Besides, your own religious adventures are rather more interesting."

I cocked an eyebrow.

"The House Insurgent is all you too, Hasenbach," I drily said. "I wouldn't have gotten so many firebrands on my side without the Tenth Crusade knocking at the gate."

"I meant a different sort of religion, First Under the Night," the princess amiably said.

"Eh," I shrugged. "The Crows and I came to agreement, that's all."

"There has been a great deal of speculation as to how you became high priestess of Night," Cordelia delicately hinted.

I rolled my eye at her.

"You can just go fishing openly, you know," I told her. "You've already made your oaths."

Hesitation. How rare for her to wear it so openly.

"Even though," Cordelia carefully said, "I yet hold the key to the ealamal?"

"Don't get me wrong," I said. "I really wish you'd smash that thing over your knee. But yeah, holding that doesn't mean you don't get your seat. In case you hadn't noticed, people having held – or holding – knives at my throat doesn't really disqualify them from sitting in my council."

"The Doom of Liesse's continued existence does indicate a degree of flexibility on your part," she conceded.

Sure, I thought, flexibility. Let's go with that.

"So what is it that you're actually curious about?" I asked, changing the tack.

"Much," she drily said, "but most as to how you successfully convinced Sve Noc to appoint you their high priestess. Rumours run wild, from your having triumphed over them to your souls having been melded."

The last one was actually not entirely untrue, which was a little disconcerting to consider.

"I headed for the Everdark after the talks went south in Keter," I said. "By then it was clear that Malicia and the Dead King intended war, which weakened your position, but my armies were battered and I was without allies. The Firstborn were the only Evil polity left, which made them pretty much the only candidates for getting help."

"So you did not intend priesthood from the start," Cordelia said.

I snorted.

"I thought I'd make a bargain with the Priestess of Night, not even knowing she was actually a they and not Named in the slightest," I said. "Only that went out the window almost immediately. Firstborn don't really negotiate with humans, and the Sisters were a lot more interested in Winter than anything I had to say. Besides, the Everdark was falling apart even without the dwarven invasion I arrived just ahead of. It was a fucking mess, Cordelia."

"Not the worst position to bargain from," she mentioned.

I grimaced.

"Winter," I admitted, "kept me frozen in the aftermath of one of the worst days of my life. I wasn't thinking as clearly as I could have. So after I realized I could make my own sigil and bestow fae titles, I struck a bargain with the Herald of the Deeps for the destruction of Sve Noc in exchange for the right to bring any drow following me to the surface as an army."

Utter surprise, though smoothed away quickly.

"You fought them?" Cordelia asked, leaning forward.

"I did," I said, "and they gutted me like a fish. I lay down on the ground to die, down there in Great Strycht, and only survived because they needed me to finish eating Winter. If Akua hadn't saved me then, Sve Noc would have slurped me up like tepid gruel."

I did enjoy the faint look of disgust she made at that lovely image.

"We had a shot at turning it around on them, after, but I'd had Winter ripped out of me by then," I said. "And I felt... freer for it. It'd broadened my perspective. So instead of continuing to fight like bears in the pit, I asked for their help."

I grimaced.

"Begged, really, when it came down to it," I admitted. "Because it was the only way out that wouldn't irreparably fuck one of us: someone being willing to lose, willing to bet on trust before it'd been earned."

She studied in silence, for a long time, and I felt uncomfortably naked under her gaze.

"Trust," she softly repeated. "It always comes back to that, does it not?"

"They repaid it in full," I said. "I've done a lot of things I regret over the years, Hasenbach, but that night in the deeps will never be one of them."

Blue eyes considered me.

"You call me both Hasenbach and Cordelia," the princess said. "Do choose one, Catherine, the irregularity grows irksome."

"That an invitation?" I teasingly said, cocking an eyebrow.

She met my eyes.

"It is," Cordelia frankly said.

I cleared my throat, surprised and a little embarrassed.

"All right," I croaked. "Cordelia."

Shit, I'd called her that before so why was using the name now making me feel like blushing? A change of subject was in order.

"I'm told you're sitting down with a lot of sigils," I said, perhaps a tad gracelessly.

She looked faintly amused but let it pass without comment.

"I have been trying to discern," she said as she tucked back her braid, "what lies ahead for the Firstborn."

My gaze sharpened.

"You want to know what kind of a neighbour Procer will be getting," I said.

"I love the Principate and always will," she admitted, "but in this I must embrace a broader perspective. When the war ends, Calernia will not be the same land it was when it began. What is it that the Firstborn seek as people, what are their needs and hatreds? I would understand, before negotiating the treaty with Sve Noc, what the place of the drow is to be in the coming centuries."

She was, I thought, probably the only ruler in the west that was actually pursuing that line of thought. There was a reason she'd made for a dangerous foe.

"And what did you find out?" I idly asked.

"You do not rule these people," Cordelia replied, blunter than was usual for her. "You are considered a manner of prophet, a religious symbol, but power is in the hands of the Ten Generals and the most powerful sigils – under the vigilant gaze of Sve Noc."

"My place as First Under the Night is temporary," I acknowledged. "I was appointed to guide the Firstborn in their settlement on the surface and serve as a vessel for necessary reforms, but I'm not meant to stay in the seat. I'll be surrendering the title at the end of the war, like all the others."

All except the last, the one that lived under my skin.

"You have steered them to a strong diplomatic position," Cordelia acknowledged, "but I fear that situation cannot last."

"You think they'll make themselves into a problem after the war," I said.

"The most troubling issue is that drow do not trade," she replied. "There is some barter, admittedly, but no coinage and no merchant class. Their society is turned towards subsistence and war, with few other pursuits."

"So Procer's stuck with a neighbour that's more interested in the Night gained through raids than anything that could be had in peace," I summed up.

"Building Serolen has already begun changing them," Cordelia noted. "That much is clear. Though Mighty keep to strict sigil divisions, nisi and dzulu living side by side wane in that perspective. I expect the tendency will end in larger sigils founding their own cities and sigil loyalties turning into city-state loyalties. By then, the needs inherent to feeding a city will ensure the development of some sort of internal trade – and thus a form of coinage and industry."

I hummed, not disagreeing. I doubted it'd be anywhere as clear-cut as what she was describing, but I didn't disagree with the thrust of the prediction. She underestimated, though, how much Night mattered to drow. War would always be a central part of who they were so long as the prize was there for them to fight over, no matter the other pressures.

"That form of the Firstborn state should prove a welcome trade partner to Procer," Cordelia said, "and so change the balance of power on Calernia indirectly – with less pressure from the north and northern principalities growing wealthier from the change, the Principate's energies will likely turn towards the Free Cities."

"Basilia will have," I mildly said, "very little tolerance for that."

"There will be war," Cordelia frankly said. "Not in our generation or the one after that, but in time it will happen. My hope is that the framework of the Grand Alliance will keep that war local and contained."

Optimism, I thought, but then I thought it was much too early to make predictions about what after the war would look like.

"So," I said, "your issue isn't with the drow in the long term. It's how they'll be during the..."

"Growing pains," she delicately suggested.

I snorted, but if the shoe fit...

"You're afraid they'll burn bridges before settling down," I pressed.

"It is the nature of the beast," Cordelia grimly said. "Before there can be city-building and trade, there needs to be an accumulation of wealth and food. Since you've taken measures to restrict the strength of the Mighty-

I gave her a very innocent look that she did not buy in the slightest.

"- then it will not be achieved by a sigil accumulating an overlarge amount of nisi and working them as effective slaves," the blonde princess said. "Given that the one resource the drow will have in abundance is skilled warriors, that leaves acquisition by force as their path forward."

And the Firstborn weren't fools, we both knew. They'd not keep raiding each other when the real wealth was south and still recovering, poorly defended.

"You can get ahead of that," I said.

"I will recommend that First Princess Rozala do so," Cordelia frankly said. "Lending the expertise of our merchants and farmers after some guarantees of safety would only be common sense. But that is, ultimately, a bandage wrapped around a slit throat."

That was, I suspected with an undercurrent of amusement, a Lycaonese expression translated into Chantant.

"There's another way for those warriors to gain wealth," I idly said.

She stared at me with piercing blue eyes.

"So you did foresee it," Cordelia said. "I thought you might have, when you backed the Praesi request to have those orc mercenary companies recognized under the Accords."

"You need them," I pointed out. "Even when we've dealt with Neshamah the undead will remain – they'll just be leaderless, roving bands instead of an army. And you have the manpower to take back the south and most the heartlands, but beyond that? Your armies are the worst off in the Grand Alliance."

"So you would have us hire mercenaries," Cordelia said, tone thick with distaste.

"It's your way out," I said, "and they'll need to be foreign. Procer's blown through its fantassins these last few wars and you won't have the people to spare to fill those ranks again because there'll be a massive amount of land to reclaim."

"And so we hire drow and orcs to claw back our lands," she said, "further strengthening their image as allies and not monsters out of legend while filling the coffers of their fledgling nations."

I smiled at her, though I couldn't lay claim to much praise over this. I had, after all, stolen Hakram's plan wholesale and fitted it to the Firstborn.

"And the goblins?" Cordelia pressed. "Princess Vivienne has already announced that Callow will open its borders to them, which I believe to be your work."

"Don't undersell her," I mildly replied.

She'd not needed any convincing at all, even though we'd both known it would make the Matrons livid.

"There were attempts to poach my sappers, during the fight for Twilight's Pass," I noted. "I expect that now Callow has opened the gates, some of the attempts to bring in tribes will grow more serious."

"You want to make a world where they have roots everywhere," Cordelia quietly said, watching me. "Orcs, goblins, drow. You would drag them out of our bedside stories and give them places at our hearths."

I met her gaze.

"When I was nothing," I calmly said, "they backed me. Not the Matrons, not the Clans, but them. The greenskins, the rank and file. And when my back was against the wall, when I was lost and grasping for allies, I went into the dark and returned to Iserre at the head of an army of the Empire Ever Dark."

My jaw clenched.

"I owe them a lot, Cordelia," I said. "And I will pay every drop of that debt back, come Hells or high water."

If I needed to cut out parts of Calernia so the drow fit it better, I would. And I'd do the same for Robber's people, for Nauk's. Hakram and Pickler had found paths and if they needed them seared into the ground, well, it just so happened I was a deft hand with fire. In this, at least, I was yet my father's daughter.

"You have," Cordelia said, "one of the most vicious conceptions of loyalty I have ever known."

I cocked an eyebrow at her.

"And?"

"I do not entirely dislike it," the princess admitted.

She finished the last of her dessert – a sort of pudding whose main ingredient was, I believed, a kind of fermented algae – and set aside the silver spoon.

"You have my thanks, Catherine," she said.

"What for?" I asked.

"I believe," Cordelia smiled, "that I now know the bargain Sve Noc will accept."

—

Two days later, in the depths of the temple-fortress, a Mighty lost their Night without dying.

Now it was all over except for the violence.

Droughtbringer

<https://topwebfiction.com/listings/a-practical-guide-to-evil/>

gingerlygrump

EE, you are one of the best writers I've had the pleasure of reading.

megaprr

Aaaaaaaaand horny cat remains horny

Levir

It's an integral part of her being. To be horny at the most inappropriate times.

erebus42

Horniness cares little for context, it knows only desire.

Black Spiral Dancer

Hornyness is. The rest has to try to be.

Metalshop

I'll admit, I teared up for the part about the greenskins.

LInnus42

Not sure the analogy works between Akua and Viv and Hakram. For Hakram, there was never any clear path to him becoming to Warlord until it kinda fell into his hands. For, Viv eh Cat still had the Army and enough intelligence on her own to know what Viv was doing locally.

Liliet

Vivienne is the head of the intelligence network. Catherine literally receives intelligence FROM her. This has always been a HUGE leap of trust ever since Book 3.

Linnus42

She has the Drow if she really wanted to check whatever Viv is doing.

She could also just get someone to scry Viv.

But the main issue is Viv doesn't really gain anything backstabbing Cat during the middle of the wars if she going to get power anyway.

So not especially equivalent to me.

Onos

It's fascinating the way you persist in contradicting the author.

ninegardens

I mean... she didn't have the drow back when she essentially said "Vivian, go back to callow and act as queen for 6 months, I'm visiting the everdark. Hopefully I come back"

Agent J

You mean the drow she didn't use against humans until Book 5? This somehow delegitimizes the trust she's had in the Spymistress she hired in Book 3? The same Spymistress she doesn't appoint as her heir until, again, Book 5?

I'd say there was plenty of time to sabotage if Vivienne were so inclined, and as for reasoning, she could have easily pointed to a myriad of red lines Catherine's crossed since her joining. Starting from keeping the Doom of Liesse to knocking on the Dead King's door.

Liliet

What Agent J said.

"Does not gain anything" is in the eye of the beholder. You know, like how Kurosiv doesn't ACTUALLY stand to gain anything by betraying Sve Noc to the Dead King, because the Dead King is 99% guaranteed to eat him while Sve is actually loyal to her people?

Tohron

...and even if the Dead King doesn't betray it, all the destinations they could supposed flee to from Calernia are already occupied by civilizations that make everyone except the dwarves look irrelevant.

dadycoool

When she was a tavern wench, the greenskins kept her safe from the humans. When she was drowning, it was the creatures of pure darkness that reached out and breathed life into the corpse she was inhabiting. The orcs love her because she loved them first, the goblins adore her because she adopted so many of their traits, and the Drow very nearly worship her because she gave everything to them.

onedollargum

More Cat insight, nice!

And we get scribes! Will they contribute to the practical guide?

spencer

We already have many quotes from the book, so yes.

I am looking forward to a scribe interlude though!

Miles

We have quotes from before they even joined, too.

Cpt. Obvious

I think I remember quotes from Vivian, Queen of Callow, and I have a feeling Hakram were quoted. There's a nagging feeling that there were a quote attributed to Indrani, but I'm very uncertain as I don't remember it being flippant enough to be something she'd say, and I can't imagine some poor scribe would dare to sanitize the language used by Archer or perhaps Ranger.

edrey

Cat in all her glory, vicious with a big heart.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Big to fit more viciousness. 😊

jamesc9

"You have," Cordelia said, "one of the most vicious conceptions of loyalty I have ever known."

That's impressive, given that she's a northerner.

Juff

Typo Thread:

inexistence > in existence
it is not time > is it not time Their fate > The fate hawing as > hawing ensued as up in half > up in for half mused. "Night (extra space)
"but is a > "but it is a
But no so > But not so Anymore than > Any more than not sense it > not sensed it sure but > sure, but get Holies > get the Holies they priests > the priests form the north > from the north

Liliet

God, so adorable. I kept wondering where Cordelia was the last couple of chapters!

Aaaaaaaa cu... te...

(both Akua and Cat)

man, and Cat has really embraced the idea of "trust is when even if the person betrays you, you'll just assume they had a good reason / find that an acceptable outcome too". Fucking... beautiful, yo.

Sugar Roll

I vaguely remember a couple of books ago that I made a prediction about Akua betraying Cat when she even the scales—possibly after saving millions of lives. Well, Akua may very well save millions of drow soon. I hope my prediction is proven wrong because I'm growing fond of her.

Liliet

I mean, that's not how it works. The scales cannot be evened. Saving these people doesn't bring those other ones back.

Sugar Roll

No, it doesn't but at one point she thought that way. Did she change her mind about it? Maybe but I'm not entirely convinced and I guess we'll find out later. She has already proven she has no qualms about switching sides during the Praes campaign so it won't come as a surprise if she does so again in the future.

Rey d'Tutto

Nope onna Rope.
If anything, Akua is Contrite.
I'm wondering if she's still a Villain.

Dome Zasrekh

The world did give her Hero support before...

mavant

An interesting philosophical question: Would literally bringing those people back even the scales?
Sure, nobody knows how to do that at the moment, but if there's anyone who could figure it out it's probably the Akua/Masego/Neshamah think tank.

Salt

Well, imo probably impossible, considering the question of whether or not it evens the scales is dependent on the moral perspective of the person or entity being asked the question. It's really a question of commensurability of value in terms of lives and the opinion of the moral system of belief regarding it.

The Choir of Contrition? "You will not be forgiven" is one of their catchphrases, they don't believe in commensurability of pretty much anything past a certain point. The scales will never be even.

Mercy? Would literally eat a baby to save the lives of two babies. They only consider suffering or the lack of as value. If you've lessened suffering in the world overall, the scales are even and then some.

Below? You can always even the scales, but the price is going to be taken out of your hide, and they decide how much weight your sacrifices put on the scale. As far as whether they have any sort of impartiality or whether it's based on whatever they feel like, we have no idea.

Cat and current Akua though, the answer is more or less no, the scales cannot be evened for that kind of a genocide. Both their senses of morality takes the concept of the value of a life being incommensurable, and applies it very strictly when it comes to needless mass deaths.

Salt

Or I guess badly phrased, it'd be more accurate to say it's about how much weight is placed on the act of taking a life in the first place

Miles

If death weren't death then her actions wouldn't be that big a deal in the first place.

DC

Trust is seeing so deeply and believing so truly in another's goals that seeing them achieved at the expense of your own is still a victory

Liliet

yessssss

Salt

> "I owe them a lot, Cordelia," I said. "And I will pay every drop of that debt back, come Hells or high water."

Somewhere out there, Below is all puffed up with pride.

Paying back the dues that were earned, come hell or high water, specifically in a way that's a step forward for them all and puts weight on the scales favouring them in their argument with Above.

SpeckofStardust

Considering the High priest of the below known as Kairos Theodosian has this to say on the matter of where Cat heart did lay.

The Queen of Callow still bore one of the strongest wishes he had ever seen, pulsing with her heartbeat: peace, peace, peace. It was like watching a flower bloom anew with every beat. Even now it was all he could do not to laugh until his throat bled, for what an exquisite jest it was that one of Below's finest servants in the long history of Calernia was at heart one of Above's!

-Interlude: Wicked

Zach

I like the dynamic between Catherine and Cordelia.

Wonder

Does this mean Cat has accepted she has lot control of her plan with Akua and is okay with that?

Liliet

Yup.

Catherine is great like that.

The point of the plan was always to do the right thing, and the right thing has clearly been accomplished.

Rey d`Tutto

Akua is a conundrum.

She knows the depth of her "sins". Her Atrocities will not be forgiven or forgotten.

She is a Contrite Diabolist Villian.

Contrition won't try to claim her, as She'd pwn der @$$.

That's a hard stop for Them. Like she wouldn't be prepared?

She's not gonna be a hero. She's a good Villain.

Michael Langridge

Above and Below don't seem to be aligned directly to Good and Evil to me. They seem to be more like Law and Chaos. So there's no reason you cannot have Good villains and Evil heroes. (Although they would tend to be the exception.)

MoreBeer

By strict D&D terms, yes. Heroes are defined by following the dictates of Above, whatever they may be and whether or not they are objectively Good. The prime tenet of Below is that you do as you will, if you are strong enough.

Those seem to fairly clearly define Law vs Chaos, with Good and Evil being only coincidental in alignment.

These sides are defined to us according to the Book of All Things and by Amadeus respectively IIRC, so they may not actually be the truth presented by the Gods Above and Below. Unreliable narration is a definite thing to beware of.

Myvekk

Good point, and the D&D similarity came to me afterwards as well. Above & Below put me more in mind of the philosophical difference in Babylon 5 though, where the Vorlons are 'do as we say', and the Shadows were 'do what you want'.

'Do what you want', does not have to be selfish, but usually is. And 'do as we say' can become, 'the ends justify the means'.

Insanenoodlyguy

She accepted that a while ago. It's admittedly still possible for the plan to work, but the shape of it is much different now. The situation where Akua would for sure walk that path was dashed the moment she set that throne on fire.

Sugar Roll

I wonder what kind of deal Cordelia has for Sve Noc. She will be essentially asking the drow to be neighbors with dwarves again. The drow was evicted out of their lands the last time that happened. It would be interesting to see how that plays out.

Agent J

And forceful eviction was the gentle option. The Dwarves came to genocide them. If the Drow are half as spiteful as Callowans, that's not a slight they're soon to forget.

Salt

I think the offer is going to be a guarantee to allow harvest of Proceran dead to add to the Night. Death row prisoners with learning, corpses of scholars and craftsmen after they come to their natural end, some degree of freedom to harvest Night from the fallen when working as mercenaries, etc...

The reason that the Drow withered in the underdark was because they hardly created or added anything to the Night other than more knives. All they did was steal from each other, sometimes losing precious secrets in the process, and every passing year diminished them a bit more. They ended up with an abundance of secrets to kill each other with and a lack of secrets to build or create with, as well as being so isolated that they had no way to grow by harvesting or learning from other cultures. If Cordelia offers them a steady supply of harvested skills and knowledge, even from the corpses of mundane Proceran scholars, warriors, craftsmen, and leaders, that kills several birds with one stone for everyone.

On the Drow side, the direct and obvious advantage it lets them start growing again. The less obvious advantage is that it broadens their view by having a flood of new knowledge and skills added to the Night. They'll start to see the power and value of secrets that have uses other than killing each other for more secrets to kill each other with. They'll understand that they can become worthy in ways that don't have to do with killing or fighting. It opens the door to Drow starting to craft and research on their own again, and eventually having Mighty equivalents of Named like the Bitter Blacksmith or the Concocter, instead of every single one being the a dark elf version of the Red Knight. It naturally sets them back onto the path of once again becoming the 'Empire Ever Dark', instead of forever continuing to be the 'Squabbling Savage Tribes Ever Dark'.

For Procer, this pretty much strangles the Drow threat before it can really become a threat. The knowledge from harvested Procerans doesn't just empower Drow, it brings inevitable understanding of Proceran culture and perspectives. It lays the groundwork for a co-dependent ally that cannot afford to war on Procer, as they gain far more from a friendly relationship, as well as more concrete gains in payment via mercenary work. The Drow will never manage to be united in wanting to destroy Procer – due to so many of them being familiar with, gaining benefits from, and even possibly being fond of Procer. Not unless the Sisters themselves push for a war on Procer.

Furthermore, the cost to Procer as a nation is basically nothing. They don't practice necromancy in the first place, what the hells are corpses worth to them other than being a drain on their economy to bury and manage? Suddenly this useless burden becomes an incredibly useful bargaining chip that turns a potential foe at the door into a neutral-at-worst ally-at-best neighbor.

I think it would be a fitting Cordelia-esque deal imo, especially with the whole trust thing that was the topic in this chapter. This perfect solution only works on the premises that Cordelia trusts the Crows to keep to terms after she's dead and gone, if one day Procer grows vulnerable again and the firstborn grow great. After all, the whole countermeasure to neutralize the Drow threat completely fails if the Sisters decide otherwise, simple as that. Trust extended and benefit given on a leap of faith, just like Catherine did when surrendering Winter.

ninegardens

That's... politically/culturally weird (for the procians), and I'm sure many wouldn't be keen giving their bodies to an evil polity...

BUT

I could see this working.

I mean, gawd- imagine that as a retirement scheme: "If you are skilled in life, than in your old age, you can go visit a resort town up north, and get pampered for a few years, before having your arts gifted to a younger generation in your death". The Drow have every incentive to make the resort town appealing, that the craftsmen would have nothing but gain from it.

The fact that it ties nations together just makes the whole thing kind of utopian.

Sugar Roll

In my mind, I imagine Cordelia offering the services of the house of light to help cleanse the remains of the kingdom of the dead after the war. Most of the territory is corrupted and it's a win-win for both parties. The drow will get more out of their territory while the house of light can use the opportunity to mend their reputation and regain their influence.

Xinci

The Drow(at least with current Night) have an interesting situation in that they may form an agricultural and trader class in a more diverse and more emergent fashion than human analogues. The land they have been given is ruined, but a blank slate, so even if Proceran agriculturalists and merchants come to give them their own paradigms they may find the Drow grow a network of relations through sigils fairly quickly. The existence of a thing like Kavian implies a distinct level of potential when it comes to affecting a specific parcel of land and for sigils to form symbiotic interactions through the Night with that area and the type of life inhabiting it. Especially if Night could perhaps be generated from such mutualistic compacts over time since it may be taken from the living without killing them. Given they will be close to the plains of hunger there is a lot of interesting potential interactions with both the ratings and its tough grasses, when it comes to Night harvesting. Its likely that if introduced to alchemist the Night's ability to at fuel the growth of biological matter, could either be sectioned into particular Secrets for modification and growth given directly by Sve or Secrets perpetuated by the study of extant ones, perhaps with purveyance of additional related information and sharing of it encouraged by Catherine and the Losara with Sve Nocs approval. Basically, the potential of the Night and the state of the land may mean that the Drow agricultural and trading classes may dynamically self form to a pressure long term to develop unique strains of flora(likely fauna too since they appear to have brought their animals with them) that would induce various types of trading and sigil formation around those strains. Such things are fairly likely as they spend more time in the area and terraforming efforts in the formerly devastated Keteran regions consolidate themselves. It is a rather interesting change up in pattern for the formation of city-states since baseline needs could become drastically different depending on the method of Night usage and their distribution. Naturally though will depend highly on the state of Sve Noc by the end of this.

Also, I suppose it's good that Cat will have a scribe. It's unfortunate, that her wordings will be contested in the future.

Her conversation with Akua and Cordelia does sort of line up why she didn't properly form a council with Akua and Masego to help reformat stuff so this all of the things Sve did to forestall this wasn't way too late or done after she lost her powerbase. It appears that Cat formed a boundary on communication and as such was willing to not attempt to get a proper informational framework for their survival beyond immediate threats. ie. She didn't bring in Akua or Masego since Sve mistrusted them and she allowed that state of relations to continue instead of doing the potentially risky thing based on trust to mediate communication between those parties and grow proper channels of communication to forestall future issues. Which has honestly been a pattern with Cat on subjects like this

Liliet

You need to watch for occasions to use paragraph breaks more when on platforms like wordpress. Oof.

Anyway this is VERY interesting yea.

And Catherine cannot "properly facilitate communication" between ALL parties that could possibly use it, especially given that for Sve Noc to trust Akua and Masego like they trust Cat, Akua and Masego would need to allow them to access their memories and also thoughts in an ongoing fashion, which they, uh. Won't. So that's not a very productive avenue of inquiry.

Xinci

I mean the alternative was a single contingency that failed. A lack of attempts and the consequences therein show that inaction was just as bad as actual attempts to explain issues with the given methodology. If trust is an issue then it must be built and maintained through proper explanations of the situation and context therein.

Liliet

Wait, when did Cat's inaction bring negative consequences? I'm failing to follow the chain of events you're implying.

KageLupus

I wonder if Akua is on her way to forming another Name, now that she is firmly on the path of working off her past crimes. I feel like she has spent the last few years in an existential state that didn't really allow it. But now she has a body and is basically back to being human (as opposed to a Winter construct or Night shade) and she is starting down a new narrative path.

Ever since she was back in Praes, Akua has been feeling the moral pull to do good and help those in need. She is still ruthless enough to fit in with the Woe when it is called for, but risking the mission to save sacrifices shows a significant shift in personality. That alone probably isn't enough to merit a Name but it also fits in with the general pattern of the Woe.

The Woe are pretty well defined by change and growth, as people and also as Named. Each of them have transitioned through Names even when those Names aren't considered to be transitory (Adjutant -> Warlord, Archer on her way to being Ranger). Akua also had a transitory Name, but by the time she "joined" the Woe she was already the Diabolist. So her journey is more like Diabolist -> shade -> normal (ish) Human -> new Name.

That might look like a stretch, but it is basically the same journey that Vivienne had to go on to become the Princess. First she was an enemy, then she joined up, eventually lost her Name, and then assumed a new role and the Name that came with it. Akua doing the same thing doesn't seem impossible given that kind of precedent.

Given that her new role is something like "help those in need to atone for my past sins" I would expect a future name to be something like the Penitent Shade or something along those lines. (I know she isn't a shade anymore but the Name is cooler that way). She could get Aspects that help her find people who need help, or to contain powerful forces since Cat has been grooming her for that as well.

Liliet

I don't think Akua is doing this "to atone to past sins". Cat has driven in with a sledgehammer that that's not a thing. She's just doing this because it's what she wants to do / feels like doing / likes.

Sinead

This is also why Contrition doesn't fit. Akua isn't focused on her past sins like William was. She is focused on making the best out of today for a better tomorrow.

....

dusts of Compassion!Akua hype train

Liliet

yssssssss

Rey d`Tutto

Yeah, less "Contrition", more " This looks broken. I can fix it."

mavant

Akua's new name is Bob The Builder.

Miles

Yeah, Ubua sounds sorta like Bob.

Ubua the rebuilder

Rey d`Tutto

And we should call Cat "Al"
Apologies to Paul Simon.

Santiago A Duarte

God it's really hard to describe how high the peaks of EE's storytelling are. I hope you don't take it harshly if I say that you're not the best technical writer ever, not bad, certainly, but not a master of the English language.

What you are is arguably the best storyteller I've ever read. Part of that is the privileges that come with writing millions of words and everything that you can set up in those, but that's a difficult thing itself. The narratives crafted in PGTE are second to none, the sheer number of characters and stories I care about so deeply is ridiculous. And when you get to the big payoff chapters like the fall of Hainaut, it's some of the best experiences I've ever had with any form of media.

All of this is to say thanks, before this series ends so painfully soon. It's been a source of joy for years, and a truly excellent story.

Rey d`Tutto

Agreed.

I read a lot.

In my youth, I'd read the cereal box ingredients list if I forgot my book at breakfast.

Tolkein, Asimov, Heinlein, Clarke, etc. were what I "cut my teeth" on.

This fiction and its use of Trope are Tight.

As far as free web serials are concerned, this Work is equal to that of the authors I listed above.

There are three webserials I count as my favorite, and this is one.

308924810a

"The Holies wanted the right to hold lands and raise sovereign monasteries, as they do in southern principalities," Cordelia said. "I explained to them that the refusal to parcel royal rights goes back to the rule of the Iron Kings and is considered sacrosanct, but the frustration at being unable to secure a northern foothold is an old one."

I'm honestly surprised none of the Lycaonese ever reversed this privilege in order to cut a deal which would allow them to field more casters.

To my understanding they've traditionally been caster-deficient, and given the Dead King's recent use of swarms, thus not actually credibly capable of defending themselves if he takes attacking them seriously(the only effective method the Grand alliance has found to counter swarms of undead insects and birds is casters using area-of-effect effects). They can't build up more bloodlines of mages because the Dead King keeps killing them all, but the capacity to cast Light seems to be more about the proportion of people with the right mindset in a population, and the degree of willingness of Angels to invest power.

It might be possible to scale up in less than a generation of time just by increasing religious education and the angels seeing a need, and any ownership of monasteries without revocation of ownership rights could be tied to treaties requiring that the House send a certain number of Light wielders north to fight Evil every year or decade or maintain their own version of the order of the White Hand or something.

Not sure whether this is Lycaonese being dumb about prioritizing ancient rights, some weird artefact of their method of centralizing their administration to raise a superior army, or some sort of supernatural cultural legacy of the Iron Kings not being firmly committed to Above(what with the Iron kings possibly ruling as Tyrants).

KageLupus

Lycaonese know better than to make strategic plan based on political dealings, especially with the soft and untrustworthy southerners. The last thing you need are a bunch of non-soldiers who don't owe you allegiance or fully appreciate your mission getting underfoot. Only thing worse would be them sandbagging in fights or outright failing to live up to their part of the treaty.

Sure you can probably deal with them breaking the treaty, but then you are spending time and money and political power on something that didn't help stave off the Ratlings or DK so why even bother? Better to just keep charging rent and making money and using that to supply your armies since you know you can trust your people. The lack of mages is an issue but at least it is one they can work around themselves. Bad faith political dealings are a lot of work for little gain, comparatively.

Miles

It's not like the south had any more or better casters worth the trade.

The house of light were famously noncombatants early on, at least until the opportunity to fight things other than the DK/Ratlings came along.

mavant

In before the Drow develop an economy based on ~~forged~~ ~~madra~~ Night tokens.

They already use it as their primary store of value, they just need to use it as a means of exchange.

Furthermore, they could use not just raw Night, but Secrets, as tokens of exchange. From the Latin root, that would be... Cryptocurrency.

Meela

Groooaan

Evgeny Permyakov

>My Name thrummed in approval, pleased, and it warmed my veins.

So, a cryptic mentor figure? Interesting.

Chapter 47: Hollow; Hallow

"And so the First Under the Night asked them this: do you know how to kill a god?"

– Extract from the 'Parables of the Lost and Found', disputed Firstborn religious text

Trokel and Fania made for an odd pair.

The rylleh was wrinkled and wheezing, deceptively slow to the eye but moving with the measured grace of an old killer. The nisi was chubby-cheeked and painfully young, always offering up half-smiles of crooked teeth. It had been very honoured to be chosen as one of my scribes and told me often enough I could repeat the words back with the exact cadence in Crepuscular, accent and all. The dislike between them had been instant, though it was scholarly in nature and not personal. Trokel saw its duty as that of an apostle, squeezing out of my words and actions wisdom for all who partook in Night to follow. Fania was not interested in wisdom so much as stories, on the other hand, and did not write down near as much.

I'd grown, almost against my will, rather fond of their constant bickering. It made me a little homesick, but sometimes a touch of homesickness was good for the soul.

"They can't really be called heretics," Fania insisted, "as they do not deny the divinity of Sve Noc. They simply believe that Loc Ynan is the superior deity."

"That is heresy," Trokel informed it, glaring through rheumy silver eyes.

"Not until they've lost," Fania lightly replied. "They have not yet been proved wrong."

"You should have been used for mushroom-feed at birth," Trokel muttered.

"I'm just waiting for you to keel over and die, Old One," Fania grinned. "From nisi to rylleh in a breath, just imagine the songs."

It was almost like I'd been trained to look fondly on a mouthy, playful soul pulling at the pigtails of an opiniated scholarly sort. Gods, I missed Indrani. She had a knack for pulling me out of my thoughts when I got stuck in them, making it all lighter. And Masego missed her too, because I couldn't think of another reason he'd have brought a frankly terrible wooden sculpture of a duck to Serolen. But he had his work and I had mine, so we soldiered on. Now that the spell formula for the ritual had been created and the groundwork to use begun, we had gone on war footing: it was only a matter of time until strife erupted across the canals, and both sides were moving their forces in place.

Unfortunately for us, we had more than just Kurosiv and their schemes to worry about.

Ivah was seated when I entered the room it used as an office, holed up behind an elegant little Proceran bureau that was painted in bright enough colours that your average Alamans craftsman would have rather hanged themselves than be associated with it. Procerans tended to leave bold colours to banners and clothes, finding them rather gauche on furniture. I waved it down as it began to rise, scribes following behind and bowing almost as low as they did for me, but it insisted on getting up and holding out my chair for me. It had cushions, I noted with pleasure, and given the general drow disregard for those they'd likely been added just for me.

It was the little things, sometimes, but sadly we didn't have time for idle chatting.

"You've got news, I'm told," I said.

The Sisters had already given me vague impressions, but we were in agreement that unless they'd looked at something with their own eyes a report usually better served the purpose of keeping me informed.

"It is so, Losara Queen," Ivah agreed. "From both the southern front and the realm of Procer."

Ah, bad and worse.

"Start with Procer," I said. "At least that one's a disaster I'm used to."

"Arans and Lange have fallen," the Lord of Silent Steps said. "While Aisne buckles under the weight of the enemy, despite a worthy defence and reinforcements from Salia."

And that was only a short respite. The moment the dead digested their gains and raised them as fresh armies, the heartlands would collapse. We'd been aware from the start that the siege of Keter would be as much a race against time as it was a fight against the Dead King himself.

"And the force that laid waste to Segovia?" I asked.

It was the army most worrying me, at the moment. It'd been bogged down by harassment at Segovian hands – they were apt sailors, as a people, and the Kingdom of the Dead was impotent at sea – but that was never going to last/

"It has burned a swath through Orense but ignored the south of that land," Ivah said. "Now it marches east."

Towards Aequitan, I saw after a moment to place the map of Procer in my head. We'd been afraid that the Dead King would just keep pushing south and hit Levant in an attempt to try forcing Dominion forces to return and defend their homes, but I was once more reminded that petty mortal politics were not something Neshamah cared for. Because I could see what he was actually doing, with the Principate's span laid out in my mind, and it was a fundamentallu different way of thinking. That southern army wasn't there to win ground, it was there to sweep the south clean of every city of more than ten thousand souls.

That was why he'd ignored the south of Orense, which was sparsely populated because of constant skirmishes with the Dominion.

I could see the trajectory in my mind's eye. That army would go through Aquitan, then dip south for Valencis and resume east into Salamans. You'll even ignore Tenerife at first, won't you? It'll be there for you to pick up when you move on the League. He'd just march the army north, afterwards, into densely populated Iserre, and by then two thirds of Procer would be undead. Neshamah didn't think of this as war, not really, but though I'd already known that I had never felt it quite as keenly as when I saw traced out in my mind the extermination of Procer.

He was just getting rid of the vermin, sweeping the Principate clean of life before getting to Levant and the Free Cities.

"I took two generations of Callow and garbed them in steel, taking them to die on foreign fields," I mildly said. "And still we'll come out of this war the lucky ones. It's easy to forget that, sometimes."

I shook my head, clearing it of the dark thoughts. We were not yet done.

"And our front?" I asked Ivah.

The Lord of Silent Steps looked grim.

"There as well the Hidden Horror looms tall," it told me. "General Radegast caught an army within a Gloom-shard last night and destroyed it to the last, but we lost General Radosa to a pair of demons on another field."

Fuck, I thought. And the Hushed Dread had always been so good at getting out in time. At this point the Ten Generals was turning into a boast of a title: there were barely any left, and too many of those traitors for comfort.

"Are we still losing ground?" I asked.

In other words, was the city itself at risk? Ivah equivocated with a wiggle of the palm, looking troubled.

"In truth, General Radegast has been going from victory to victory," the Lord of Silent Steps said. "The dead come at us in hordes, relentless but blunt and disorganized. Though we cannot afford to pull back forces, the Guest reports that we have a decisive advantage and a counterattack might drive the enemy out of Serolen entirely."

I rubbed the bridge of my nose. That canny undead fucker, I thought.

"You see it too," I stated. "That's why you're not smiling."

"I have suspicions," Ivah admitted.

"Then let me lay them to rest," I replied. "Radegast is being baited. The Dead King has been throwing his troops at us so sloppily because he doesn't care about winning the battles. He's keeping the First General stuck south so it cannot intervene here in Serolen."

Because Serolen was how Neshamah handled the drow, not the battlefield. Even if the capital was lost, so long as Sve Noc survived they had the skills to make the snuffing out of the Firstborn a painful, drawn-out affair. Night was exceptionally well suited to irregular warfare, after all. No, the Hidden Horror wanted that messed settled cleanly instead of lingering: either Kurosiv ate their entire race or the infighting between lesser deities broke Night, turning those same reckless attacks into a sudden killing stroke. It was one thing for Radegast to defend with Night, but without it?

It would be sheer butchery, an instant rout.

"Spending the dead," Ivah darkly said, "is ever the Dead King's favoured trick."

I grunted in agreement, but my attention was elsewhere. There was something off here, I thought. Instinct had been digging at me ever since we found that tower in the depths of the Relic Grove, but I'd never been able to name it more than restlessness. Unease. Now, though, I was beginning to feel out the shape of something. The Dead King had given out, in one form or another, what was perhaps his most precious secret: the ritual that'd made him. Sure, people who'd studied him or the Kabbalis Book of Darkness – or gone traipsing through Arcadian echoes, like we did – might be able to piece much of the work together, but Neshamah had given out the real thing. For what, a shot at settling the drow more quickly? It'd be a feather in his rotting cap to clean that up early, but that wasn't how the Hidden Horror worked.

Above all things he was patient, and risking giving us a look at the very heart of his godhead wasn't worth the trade. Neshamah always lessened the risks to himself, knowing that every personal loss was a permanent one.

"It's not enough," I murmured. "He paid too much, so he bought something I'm not seeing."

"My queen?" Ivah asked.

I bit my lip.

"He's tried to steal Night before," I noted. "It could be as simple as that."

How hard could it be, for him to ride Kurosiv's mind as he had once ridden Masego's?

"As in Hainaut," Ivah slowly said, trying to follow the tidbits I was speaking out loud. "You believe he may one more seek to take the Night from Sve Noc?"

But why? Why do you even care about Night, Neshamah? At Hainaut, when Masego had ruined the Night to prevent the Dead King taking it – the Sisters hiding away the rest within Ivah, tying themselves to it in a manner that made the Lord of Silent Steps my natural successor – I'd believed that the Dead King had wanted the Night as ritual fodder. To get some ritual going. Only he'd proved in the aftermath of that battle that he didn't need the power in the slightest, when he'd opened three Hellgates as retribution to Tariq's sacrifice. So what was it about Night that he cared about?

I knew why I'd come to Serolen, but what did he want badly enough that-

"Oh, shit," I croaked out.

Had the Hidden Horror really been that farsighted? As early as Hainaut, when the rest of us were still all stumbling in the dark?

"We are warred upon," Ivah said, and it was not a question.

"I know what the Dead King wants," I grimly said. "It's the same thing I do, just for the opposite reason."

I had come to Serolen so that me might break the Intercessor's hold on Below's stories, breathed life into them. And for that, Hierophant had told me I needed the true Night. I had come north to find a sword to slay the King of Death with and found him already here, looking for the same blade.

Not to wield it but to lock it away forever.

I rose to my feet, seat scraping against the stone and my staff of dead yew under my hand before I even thought to reach for it. Under the worried gaze of the three Firstborn I paced, my limp full of sudden nervous energy.

"No," I told them, "this is good, actually. It was the missing piece. We know all the pieces in play now. There's just more of them than we thought. Besides, t's still Kurosiv's game when it comes down to it."

"Forever schemed against, we," Ivah sighed, lips thinning.

"Could grow fat off enmity," Trokel finished, looking approving.

It liked its classics, Trokel, and even I had learned a few parts of the Songs of Dust.

"Queen of Lost and Found," Fania said, "may I ask for elucidation?"

I flicked it a one-eyed glance, baring a smile full of teeth.

"Do you know how to kill a god, Fania?" I asked.

The young drow stilled, then stiffly shook its head.

"You make another," I muttered, fingers drumming against the side of my staff.

Yes, it would do. It had the right beats to it, I thought as I stared at Ivah, and a fitting pair of hands.

"Now we can win," I told them. "And when we win, we take it all."

Iva's eyes narrowed.

"The counterattack," it said.

I nodded approvingly.

"We get Night settled properly, focus our forces, and Radegast will have it right," I said. "We can sweep the dead out of Serolen on the counterstroke, with forces to spare."

Enough that I'd be able to take a Firstborn contingent with me to Keter for the siege, which would be a great help. No one did night warfare quite like the drow, and when fighting the dead sieges did not quiet down after dusk. Ivah looked pleased at the thought of such a resounding victory, but it had never been one to get too excited.

"First we must prevail here in Serolen," my Lord of Silent Steps said. "I trust in your wiles, Losara Queen, but Kurosiv

"Yeah," I agreed, "and we can't afford to wait any longer. Neshamah's a spendthrift in bones, but he's not that wasteful. If the attacks stepped up, Kurosiv is nearly ready. We have to go on the offensive right now."

Ivah blinked in surprise.

"Tonight?" it asked.

"It's that or giving Kurosiv the first blow," I replied, eye and tone distant. "I just need to figure out the where."

Now that I knew what to look for, I could feel out the thread. The beasts in the pit, the kingdom of Night as the prize with scavengers looming in the shadows, and the story had sharpened. I'd figured out more, so I was seeing more. The pit was there, it wasn't just an abstract anymore. But where? I cocked my head to the side, groping about. It was faint, but it had been decided. Somewhere in the heart of the city, but any fool off the street could have told me that. There was a veil preventing me from seeing more. Come on, I thought, gritting my teeth. I can feel the echo, there's a tie to me. Something personal. I heard indistinct voices but ignored them, clawing at the veil with my will.

It was like swimming against the current, but I'd done that all my life and I wasn't going to let it stop me now. The Beast leaned over my shoulder, huffing out a laugh like a hundred wails, and as I grinned I felt claws settling over my hand – we pulled down, together, and through the tears glimpsed at the truth.

Stone islets in a lake, nestled against a canal, all covered in sculptures and greenery that glowed in the night. Pleasure ships had sailed there once, passing by enchanted metalwork that sang when touched by the breeze. The Flowing Gardens, it was called, and I knew all this at a glance because I had been there before. I had shed blood there. We withdrew our hand, though not quite quick enough the backlash did not smash right into my face. The Beast was gone in an instant and I was drawn to the here and now by the painful sensation of tumbling on bare stone with a half-broken nose, bleeding from the face.

All three drow had risen in alarm, but as I turned with a groan I began to laugh through the trails of blood.

"That cheeky little shit of a would-be god," I wheezed. "There, really?"

I gestured curtly for them to sit back down, pushing myself up.

"Losara Queen," Ivah said. "Have you been attacked?"

"I tugged at fate's tail," I smiled, "and it didn't like that in the slightest."

It only looked more alarmed at that, which only went to prove Ivah of the Losara was no fool.

"It's fine, Ivah," I said. "I know what we need to do now. I know how we end this."

I met its eyes with my own, grinning.

"We're going back to Great Strycht, you and I," I said. "Where we killed and made a god."

And this time, I thought, we'd make it stick.

"The Flowing Gardens," Ivah said, ever quick on the uptake.

"It's where it all ends," I said. "And I know how to get Kurosiv there tonight."

"They will be wary," my Lord of Silent Steps warned.

I chuckled.

"You ever fished, Ivah?" I asked.

"I have not," it replied, looking suddenly reassured for some reason.

"I was born in a city by the Silver Lake," I said, "and in those waters there's a kind of fish called the Laure silverscale."

"Named after the lake?" Ivah asked.

"And the shiny scales," I drily replied. "See, the thing about the silverscale is that it's got a touch of magic to it – eat the flesh not too cooked and it'll grow back your hair even if you went bald. So a lot of old nobles want it, and since there's not a lot of them even a single catch is worth a fortune."

I limped back to my seat, wiped the blood off my face and slumped back down onto the cushions.

"Easy coin, you'd think, but there's trouble," I said. "That touch of magic also makes them smart. Wary as all Hells. They never take bait and they go deep the moment there's a hint of a net."

"So none are caught?" Ivah asked.

"Oh, we get them," I said. "You just have to be patient. If you can't catch them yourself, you let the tide do it for you. They love to nibble at water milfoil, so some clever Laure lad planted a lot near the shore and set a few stones in place before leaving."

Milfoil only grew near Southpool, usually, but then the silverscale itself was believed not to be a native species. Callowan scholars had usually called them a divine blessing on the Fairfaxes since their appearance a few centuries back, but Praesi historians instead noted that they'd only appeared after a failed attempt to take Laure with an army of orcs with gills that'd ended with a lot of alchemy-filled corpses dumped into the Silver Lake.

"So the silverscales swim close, see there's nothing waiting and have themselves a meal," I continued. "And they stay, because there's a lot of it and no one comes. Only when they've got full bellies and they try to leave, they find the tide's come down and suddenly the rocks they swam over earlier are higher than the water."

It was an old trick, that one, older than the kingdoms. It'd just fallen out of favour when nobles had started minding commoners mucking about their shorelines.

"And so the fisherman comes back and scoops them up," I said, "because there's nowhere left for them to go. It's called a weir, and silverscales stopped falling for it but for a while it made our fishermen rich."

"You mean to entrap Kurosiv," Ivah said, meeting my gaze.

"They're hungry," I smiled. "So close to victory they can taste it. So we're going to give them exactly what they want: they're going to win."

Until they didn't, but by then it would be far, far too late.

"And Ivah?"

The Lord of Silent Steps met my eye, unflinching.

"Find a yew tree and take a long branch from it," I said. "Bring it to me. And most importantly, do it with your own two hands."

—

I sat on the stone bench, a long branch of yew across my lap and the knife that'd killed my father in my hand. I sat there, alone save for the divine, and carved as the ship drifted down the current.

"You once told me," Andronike said, "that the yew is the tree of death."

Her voice was like a hundred whispers woven, and she a ghost in the night. Her cloak was half a veil, trailing in a wind that wasn't, and the ornate iron mask at her hip the last of long-buried evil. Her silver-blue eyes burned in the dark.

"I will not recount to you," I said, "what I scheme. What would be the point? I hide nothing, and you see much."

"What you ask," Komena said, "goes beyond faith."

Ah, the ring of iron and screams. The spray of blood in the air, full-throated wrath. Steel mail from neck to knee, a sheathless sword at her hip that gleamed blue. Every time I beheld her from the corner of my eye her dark face became a long-fanged skull, gone when my gaze returned.

"Faith, huh," I mused, whittling away at the yew. "Funny thing. Chase it and you'll never find it, have it and you might not even know."

A god on my right, and god on my left. Neither behind me. Not yet.

"Before Kurosiv was known as the All-Knowing, it bore another name," Andronike said. "It was called the Leech."

"They will drink the blood of us to their fill," Komena darkly said, the chorus of rage echoing. "This I do not doubt. It is their nature."

"So let them drink," I said.

"We cannot," Andronike harshly replied, voice like a lie ruining a life.

"You know you're not truly gods," I said, almost gently. "Not anymore. Too much was ruined. It used to be I heard the echoes in your words because of who you were. Now, though?"

The knife that'd killed my father – that I would see red, forever red, no matter how clean the steel – shaved off another sliver, down to the point. I did not look at them, or need to. They were in me, had been since they made me their herald. It was a tie difficult to explain, one perhaps only Ivah would be able to understand. It had, that night in Hainaut, borne their weight for an hour. Such a thing left marks that never entirely faded.

"You're putting it on, aren't you?" I asked. "It's an effort."

That was what they'd been hiding from me. Why it was Ivah that'd been sent to tell me the failures, why they'd sent me to negotiate with Kurosiv's sigils blind to avoid admitting to another. Ruin and rebellion had hollowed them out, and their godhead was breaking apart. Night itself was, like when I'd reached for it at the bottom of the tower only to find nothing. No wonder Hierophant had been so scornful of their apotheosis.

"It is still us," Komena said, voice tired. "No matter how lessened, Catherine Foundling, it is still us."

I might have thought that an empty boast, a claim that even now they were still divine in every way that mattered, but for the tone. The exhaustion of it. No, she meant something else entirely: it's all that's left of us, and I fear to lose it.

"It is not fear," Andronike bit out. "It is concern. You scheme recklessness."

"That is," I replied, "my nature."

"Where is your eloquence now, Queen of Lost and Found?" Komena harshly laughed. "Your silver tongue has yet to appear."

I breathed out, looking at the darkened sky.

"Do you ever think," I asked, "about that night down in the depths? About the choices we made."

Silence.

"Do you regret it?"

My question reverberated across the water, like a mockery of itself.

"No," Andronike said. "I do not regret naming you First Under the Night."

"In this," Komena softly said, "we are yet content."

"I'm glad," I admitted. "We're not..."

I trailed off, the words hard to find.

"You can't be friends with your own gods, I suppose," I crookedly smiled. "But I remember what I saw of you, before I gave up my crown. How you became who you are. And I still see much of myself in you."

Some of the best and some the worst.

"It's not unlike faith," I said. "Because you gave me a gift, that night, that was greater than power."

I thought of that moment in shadowed room, Cordelia and Hanno standing before me. The choice, always the choice.

"You taught me to lose," I said. "And that might be the most valuable thing anyone ever taught me."

The blade paused on the length of yew.

"So please," I quietly said, "let me return that gift to you."

I felt them meet each other's gaze over my head. I did not look, for it was not a moment meant for my eye.

"Heart of my heart," Komena gently said.

"Even now?" Andronike asked, more fragile than I had ever heard her.

"It began with us," her sister said, "it ends the same."

I carved away at the yew, wrist snapping, and left them at it until they fell silent. Only then did they turn to me, leaning over my shoulders. We looked, the three of us, down at what I had made: a spear, a killing point made of death's own wood brought to me by Ivah's hands.

They both stood behind me, now, and no more need be said of it.

"Let's make it," I murmured. "A night worth singing about, you and I."

Their fingers dug into my shoulders, feeling like talons, and my dead eye bloomed anew. Power poured into me, a sea made to fit into a woman's shape, and I saw the Night. All of it. They rode me as the Dead King had once ridden Masego's mind, all of their power at our hands.

Sve Noc whispered, and all across Serolen spears were raised. War, they had ordered.

And we sat on the ship, watching, as violence spread like ink in the water. Our sigils had been waiting, and so had Kurosiv's. The Ysengral smashed through the defences on the riverside, pushing through, but they were drowned in bodies until even the steel walls they had brought were overtaken by the mounds of the dead. To the south our attack was stopped cold, caught in a clever trap and butchered, before Kurosiv's warriors crossed the water to kill and burn. The heart of the city was an orgy of death, the fighting in the maze of ancient wonders so tumultuous that sigils no longer recognized allies from enemies.

We were losing, and all over the city towers of obsidian gleamed. We were losing, and Kurosiv was glutting on our defeat.

So much death, so quickly. The air was shivering with it, Night wafting up like smoke. And as the hour passed, another and another and another, we sat on the slow ship and watched blood trail across stone millennia old. Until Ysengral's beleaguered offensive, forced to a halt, suddenly punched through. The warriors ran for the tower they had been sent after, the reason they had been told they must do or die, and though they ran into entrenched resistance they were still gaining. Loc Ynan after all, had recalled its Traitor Generals.

The offensive on our side of the canal faltered, what had seemed like a promised victory faltering, as a great ice storm bloomed in the heart of the Flowing Gardens. We saw its birth, the scream that reached up to the sky, for our ship had sailed slowly but with purpose. The slender wooden prow touched the shore and I rose, shadows trailing behind me like a procession of shades. It had been a ship like a knife, a single piece of black wood exquisitely carved, and it had brought me to my destination without need for haste or steering.

I took a limping step on the islet of stone, before me a great blizzard and frost creeping across every part the Flowing Garden. I leaned on my staff, my other hand holding the spear of yew, and on the edge of the white death I found Ivah of the Losara waiting, my two scribes at its side. Tall and thin, hair long and pale, but it was the mark on its face that drew the eye: silver on purple, a tree bearing the fruit of two circles incomplete. Losara, it meant. Lost and found. The first of the Firstborn to have sworn to me, the first to have seen something worth taking in my words.

But do I really know you, even now? The Lord of Silent Steps was as the Firstborn themselves, cast in exile in a new world, and I had to wonder – had the drow changed, or only their circumstances? Who are you, Ivah of the Losara, when all the noise falls away?

"A nice night, isn't it?" I idly asked.

Ivah bowed low.

"Losara Queen," the Lord of Silent Steps murmured, then bowed even lower. "Sve Noc."

I cocked my head to the side.

"I have need of you, Ivah of the Losara," I said.

"I serve," it solemnly replied.

I held out the spear of yew, end first.

"Take it," I said.

It did.

"You'll know," I murmured, "when to use it. Until then..."

I smiled.

"Be my shadow," I asked, "one more time."

Ivah softly laughed.

"Always, Lately Queen," it swore.

And I took a limping step forward, then other, until I had passed the Lord of Silent Steps and it was swallowed by the procession of shades. The two scribes watched me with the sort of religious awe that was, deep down, at least half fear.

"Moren Bleakwomb stands within the storm," Trokel said. "Are you to fight it, First Under the Night?"

I shrugged, nonchalant. There was a lot worse than Moren at the heart of that blizzard.

"I'm just going to ask a question," I said.

"A riddle?" Fania asked.

"Oh, nothing so convoluted," I mused. "The simplest thing in the world, really."

One step at a time, I reached the edge of the storm. The cold, Gods, the cold. It was sinking into me already, like apathy eating away at my insides. Whispering about how easy it would be to lie down and die, to finally rest.

"Already tried that," I told the storm. "Fate dragged its feet."

Komena laughed in my ear, sounding delighted. My back straightened and I looked ahead into the blizzard, seeing nothing but somehow knowing that Moren was looking back.

"All you who hear me," I said, meaning every word, "are you worthy?"

Sa vrede. The words rang out even in the storm, but no reply came. They were waiting, biding their time. I clicked my tongue against the roof of my mouth.

"If you'll not give your answer," I said, pulling down my hood, "I'll have to come and take it."

I stepped into the storm, batted about by the howling winds before I could so much as blink my eye, but a hand held my shoulder and kept me anchored to the ground,

"Let us," Andronike said, "not stumble at so late an hour."

One step after another, fighting against the headwind. It was coming for me, frosting even the Mantle of Woe, but the weight of my victories was not so easily toppled. The storm raged, ate at my warmth and my mind, but my soul burned like a black flame. It would take more than this to stop me. And so Kurosiv sent out more, footsteps soundless on the snow and a hunter's eye. Ishabog the Adversary tread the blizzard as easily as fish would swim water, untouched and unhindered, and came at me from behind. It was an exquisite blow, I saw through Andronike's eyes, the perfect amalgamation of the strength of a Might and centuries of skill.

The obsidian tip of the spear stopped a hair's breadth before it could touch the back of my neck, caught by a hand.

"Too slow, Ishabog," the Tomb-maker said, shaking its head. "Always a little too slow. You never learn."

"Rumena," I said, voice echoing with Komena's.

"I listen, Sve Noc," the old drow said.

"Make an example."

Ishabog struggled to draw back the obsidian spear, but the Tomb-maker held it in place. It laughed, the stone under the snow beginning to shift under our feet.

"I obey," the Tomb-maker replied, and then glanced at me. "Losara?"

I glanced in acknowledgement.

"When you find the Leech," Rumena said, "tell it this from me: this makes eight."

The Sisters thrummed with vicious amusement, so I accepted the trust with a nod.

"Arrogance," Ishabog spat.

"True," Rumena said. "Why else would anyone believe they can kill me?"

A scream of fury was its answer, but as the ground rumbled and Night flared I left the Mighty behind. The blizzard barred my path, no longer a blind thing but instead a living malice, and I found my steps slowing. Moren Bleakwomb was narrowing its power, strengthening it where I stood. Stone shattered, the air bit at my throat and my hair threaded with ice. Even the flame of Night burning beneath my skin felt the touch of that. I stopped.

"Enough," I said, and raised my arm.

Fingers extended, I reached for the wind and felt it filter through my fingers. Only it was something deeper I was looking for, and the thousand eyes I bloomed in the Night I found it. Threads of power, threads of Night, pulling at the strings of this city-breaking calamity.

"It's just a Secret, Moren," I said, and my fingers closed around a thread. "And no matter how bleak your storm, my hand can Silence it."

I was the fucking Warden, who did it think it was? My blood sang and like a sickness in the blood my aspect seeped into the thread of power, tainting it. From string to string it moved, until it had contaminated the entire maelstrom, and I bared my teeth as Andronike's gentle fingers on my chin turned me to face an unseen silhouette behind curtains of white. I drew back my hand and slowly, mockingly, snapped my fingers.

The storm died.

The winds were snuffed out, the power gone, and a sudden and terrible silence fell over the Flowing Gardens. All around us, as far as the eye could see, snow began to fall with almost sacrilegious gentleness. The softest of powders, and through that tender rain I met the silver eyes of Moren Bleakwomb. I took a step forward and the tall, haggard scarecrow of a Mighty stared at me, something like terror in its eyes. Another step and it flinched. A third and it backed away. A fourth and it reached for the Night, only to spasm and let out a scream. Every drop of power was gone, vanished like smoke.

Kurosiv was cutting their losses, unwilling to let me harvest their strongest Mighty.

I limped through the carpet of snow, boots crunching, as Moren spasmed violently on the ground. It only ceased when I was mere feet away and wormed around to stare at me with abject fear. Legs still shaking, it began to crawl away. The butt of my staff touched the middle of its back, and it went still as a stone. I leaned forward, Komena demanding death in my ear.

"Do you really think," I quietly said, "there's anywhere in the world that would be far enough?"

"Finish it, cattle," Moren rasped back.

I caught it by its bedraggled hair, dragging it until it was looking up at the falling snow. Its breath caught in its throat at the sight.

"It's beautiful, isn't it?" I said.

"Yes," it rasped, voice raw with a grief too ancient for me to understand.

And as the eerie beauty filled the eyes still, I killed Moren Bleakwomb. That was the most mercy I had in me to offer the ancient drow. Neck broken, it dropped into the carpet of white it had sown and I turned away. The dead would keep. Before us, at the heart of the storm I had silenced, a would-be god awaited my coming. It would not do to keep them waiting, and so I answered the invitation hanging in the air. Limping through the trails of pale falling from the sky, I reached a small islet upon which a throne had been raised. Whatever else might have adorned the stone was gone, ripped away, leaving only the sight of Kurosiv the All-Knowing, they who called themselves Loc Ynan, to greet us.

I reached for the pocket sown inside my cloak, frosted fingers closing around my pipe, and found a packet of wakeleaf as Andronike sniggered against my neck. Under the unblinking gaze of the monster that would devour their entire race, I stuffed my dragonbone pipe and lit it with a pass of my palm. I breathed in deep, venting the acrid smoke through my nose, and let out a little sigh of pleasure. Why be mortal, if not for the little pleasures?

"I have to say," I mused, "all stuff aside, I've gotta give it to you that you look like a proper fucking villain."

The All-Knowing was taller and larger than any Firstborn I had ever seen, and for all that the impression was of slenderness for the good proportions their limbs were easily thick as two of mine and their neck a forest of black veins. They wore a tunic of sculpted obsidian from neck to thigh, with pauldrons shaped like dragons biting down on mouthful of emeralds, and their ribs had been traced in molten gold – dripping down as if it'd been paint. Their legs were covered in slender trousers of dark cloth, covered by greaves of bone and gold whose emerald settings had been carved into the likeness of a hundred eyes.

Yet none of it was as striking as the face, which the darkest I had ever seen of any drow and set with pure silver eyes. The sigil of the Kurosiv, two straight vertical lines and above them a crescent moon facing upwards, had been set in molten gold instead of facepaint. The lines begun under the eyes, the moon above black brows. Their dark hair, long and smooth and gathered into a long braid down their, ended wrapped around an egg-sized emerald. Across its lap a single-edged sword of obsidian waited unsheathed, a wicked shard without even a guard.

"Catherine Foundling," Kurosiv All-Knowing replied, their Lower Miezan in a pleasant Laure drawl. "You come to me bearing gifts in my moment of triumph."

I breathed in deep and spewed out a stream of smoke.

"Is that," I calmly said, "what you think this is?"

"I have waited so very long," Kurosiv gently said, "to take from the failures riding your shoulder. More years than a creature of your kind could hope to understand."

"Hey, just for me," I drawled, "could you maybe say that this is all going just as you planned?"

"None of that, Warden," Kurosiv smiled, revealing sharp filed teeth. "I was warned about you. No games, not now. I even set out Moren for you to use your aspect on."

I know, I thought. That's what the entire point of that raid on the Shrine of Tears was, isn't it? It's not like the victory really won you anything. You just put Moren in my way so I'd fixate on it as my opponent.

"Damn," I grinned, spitting out smoke that wreathed my face. "You got me."

"I get everything, Catherine," Kurosiv said. "That is my fate."

And in a heartbeat, they struck. A sea of Night came down on my head, an eternity of power turned into some mutable, ever-shifting horror – a million tricks stolen from a million corpses, all of them jaws snapping down at me. I breathed in, smoke filling my lungs, and we struck back. Millennia of desperate deals in the dark, every scrap of knowledge and power the Sisters had gathered in their desperate bid for salvation and ascension. The sea against the sea, enormities colliding.

My bad leg throbbed. That was when it began going badly.

I coughed out smoke, struggling to stay up, and as my knee began to bend Komena's arm slipped under my armpit to hold me up. Kurosiv laughed, still seated on their throne.

"Even now, you might have won," Loc Ynan said in Crepuscular. "I recognize this. Though half-hearted, you are yet mighty. But you always make this mistake, the two of you."

Their eyes burned silver. My knee buckled and Andronike had to slip under my arm to keep me standing.

"You invest yourselves," Loc Ynan continued. "You lessen yourselves. And in the end, where does that bring you?"

The sea came down and I hit the floor, the Sisters coming down with me.

"There it is," Loc Ynan almost lovingly said. "On your knees."

My hand went for my sword as I rose, but they were quicker. The point of the obsidian blade went through my breastplate and came out my back, the impalement a wave of horrid pain. I let out a wet gasp as Loc Ynan's hand took my shoulder from behind, holding me up.

"Before they called me All-Knowing," the god whispered, "they called me the Leech. And oh, how I have hungered."

Night began to pour out of us and into them. Trickles, at first, then rivers. The Sisters fought it and my clouded mind struggled to turn this around, take from Loc Ynan instead, but my feeble attempts were batted away contemptuously. Drop after drop, the Night came to Loc Ynan, and all over the city towers came alive. It was not only Sve Noc's power coming home, but ever scrap of it the Firstborn had ever held. And it was inevitable, what would happen then. I could already feel the malicious god savouring the sight. The Sisters were Night, they had left all else behind. They no longer had bodies.

And so they died, one drop at a time.

Komena leaned close to me, fingers digging into my arm as if she were afraid to let go. She went first. Andronike's anguish rippled out and she let out a wail of grief, but she never finished it. The god's face split into an impossible broad smile.

"The worthy rise," Loc Ynan said. "Is that not our rule?"

They laughed. All that was left was ripping out the nails, the last of the meal, and it was all over.

"And so, at last, the Firstborn have made a god."

Blood flecking my lips, I leaned forward into the embrace until my lips were by their ear.

"Mistake," I whispered.

And on the other side of the canals, our towers came alive.

The god went still.

"No," they said.

The flow shifted. The rivers that had fed the apotheosis emptied it.

"No," Loc Ynan snarled. "You insignificant-"

Night gathered, and I could see where. I could follow the threads. An elegant, dark-skinned hand raised its palm up as an orb of darkness gathered atop it. Akua Sahelian, golden eyes smiling, stole the godhead piece by piece. Loc Ynan tried to move, but my hands were tight around them. The sword in my guts kept them close, and we stood there with trembling limbs. What was a god without a godhead? Nothing much, we both knew, and as Night drifted out of our grasp we both fell to our knees. Together, intertwined in my blood.

They were coming. Not only Akua, but Masego as well. I could feel it.

"They couldn't fix it," I told Kurosiv as they let out laboured breaths against my neck. "The Night. They couldn't because their godhead was broken from the start. Even feeding it Winter was just filling a broken barrel."

"It was never power meant for sharing," Kurosiv rasped. "How could you not see that? A single god perfect and eternal, not a million failed ones."

"Do you know how to kill a god, Kurosiv?" I smiled.

They pushed me away and I tumbled into the snow, groaning in pain. I was, once more, dying. But so was Kurosiv, I saw plain as I finally glimpsed their body. It looked ravaged, like it's been hollowed out from the inside. Skin hung loose and the melted gold fell off in flecks, they were drenched in sweat and their breath came and went.

"You fail," Kurosiv laughed. "You still fail, Queen of Lost and Found. You cannot hold the power forever, I can feel it fighting. How long – an hymn, an hourglass? And when it leaves it can only go to me. There is no one else left."

"Ah," I smiled, blood bubbling up my throat. "That's not – ah – that's not exactly true."

Neither of us heard it coming. Why would we? Not without reason had it been named the Lord of Silent Steps. Ivah of the Losara, thrown out of my shadow when Night was taken from me, padded silently across the snow. The would-be god's gaze took in the purple-and-silver paint and flinched, only to stutter down to the size of the spear of yew Ivah held and go utterly still.

"Kurosiv," I gurgled. "Hey, Kurosiv."

They flicked a glance my way.

"The Tomb-maker tells you that makes eight," I grinned, all teeth and blood.

They went ashen with rage, but a flicker of movement caught their gaze as Ivah moved – the thrust was perfect, smooth in that way it only ever really was in stories. And the would-be god died, their heart's blood dyeing the length of spear of yew, and as I continued to bleed out I watched Ivah. Watched it kneel, reach at the cooling corpse and draw out the faintest whisper of darkness. The Lord of Silent Steps was a drow, and it had killed.

It held Night, the first of a godhead yet to be.

It held the Night and stood there, knowing it could snatch divinity itself.

So who are you, Ivah of the Losara, when all the noise falls away? I had wondered that, in my silence, but there was a question I had asked of it. All you who hear me, I'd called out before entering the storm, are you worthy? And Ivah had heard me, dwelling deep in my shadow. But words were just words, and what could they matter when apotheosis was at hand? It was tempted, I could tell. It was the desire of all Mighty, deep down, to become the deity they had served. Silver-blue eyes found mine. My blood was pounding in my ears, drowning everything out, but I still heard every word.

"Maybe tomorrow," Ivah replied.

And it raised its hand above its head, holding up the wisp of Night to the sky, and offered the oldest and deepest prayer of the Firstborn.

"Chno Sve Noc," Ivah of the Losara whispered.

A ripple. Faint, but it was there. The Lord of Silent Steps had borne Night once, borne the weight of gods on its shoulder. It was tied to them still. And in that wisp of Night held up to the starry, snowy sky I glimpsed sisters. Hello, old friends, I thought, but my vision was swimming. Darkness was not far away. It was kept at bay, though, by long fingers taking up my cheek.

"Oh, Catherine," a voice soft as silk murmured. "Have you ever won a single thing without bleeding yourself for it?"

I choked on my answer, blood thick in my throat, but I felt lips press against my burning forehead and magic shivered through me. I was not... When had someone taken the sword out of me? Akua helped me up, the softness of her lips burning even more harshly than the fever, and I spewed out blood and bile onto the snow. I felt weak, I thought as I hacked out another gob of blood. Good enough to stand, but not much more than that. She passed me my staff to lean on, but stayed there for me to lean on. Neither of us spoke a word of it.

Masego stood before Ivah, before the wisp of Night, and in his hands he held the stolen godhead.

"This time," Hierophant said, "we do it properly."

The towers burned in the distance, obsidian melting, and the Hierophant made a god. Days of glyph-carving disappeared into smoke in a heartbeat, Masego guiding the Night through the ritual Akua had made, and as the Night fed into that first wisp it grew. Grew until my patronesses stood before me once, more decked in cloak and armour, but there was more to it than that. The simple weight of their presence was crushing, Ivah falling to its knees until Andronike affectionately raised it up. But there was... The two Sisters suddenly turned to look at Masego, whose face had gone blank, and then at Akua.

Hierophant was looking at her like he'd never seen her before. She was smiling.

"You did something," I croaked.

"So I did," Akua murmured. "I made a decision. A nudge, righting a wrong left to fester."

She paused, meeting my gaze.

"What now, Catherine?"

Am I a prisoner on a longer leash, those golden eyes for the second time, or am I what you say I am? I breathed out shallowly. I'd made the decision already, I realized. I'd made it years ago.

"Then I trust your judgement," I said.

Was it grief I saw in there, or love? Or perhaps what I was most afraid of – that, when it came to the two of us, there might not be much of a difference between the two. I looked away. The question burned, but this was not the hour for it.

"It is done," Andronike said, sounding almost disbelieving. "It is truly done. We are returned."

I left Akua's warmth behind, limping forward leaning on my staff.

"All will be Night," I said.

"Aye," Komena said, smiling a hard smile. "And so now we turn to the paying of debts."

They'd gotten Night back, all of it. And they had a proper godhead to bring it to bear. So they did, Creation groaning at the weight of their will.

The Intercessor dropped into the snow like a wriggling worm.

I knew that face. It was the one she'd worn in Praes, Yara of Nowhere. And cursing, gasping, the Wandering Bard twisted around until she was on her back – and saw me cast aside my staff, limping towards her.

"You idiot," the Intercessor screamed. "You fucking idiots."

She backed away but I followed, slowing only to bend down and take up what she had left behind.

"Don't you get it?" Yara of Nowhere shouted, eyes wild. "He's going to kill you all. If you do this, you give the game to him and he's going to-"

I swung, and the lute shattered against her jaw with the most satisfying sound I had ever heard. Strings went flying and she yelped, so I fucking did it again. I hit her until her face was bloody and the lute broken beyond repair, kneeling down in the snow as she moaned in pain.

"You're not even taking my place," the Intercessor spat. "All this, and you're not even taking my place."

"You took my father, Yara," I said calmly, almost conversationally. "Did it with my own hand. So I'm going to take every single thing from you, except what you most want to give me."

I drove my hand into her chest, through the flesh, and reached deeper. It had taken an artefact, last time, but I was further down along the path now. I was the Warden. With a hoarse shout that came as much out of her lips as mine, I ripped my hand clear of her. I left no wound behind, not even rustled clothes, but in my hand I held a sword. Above had been a book, but Below?

I held in my hand the sword that was the stories of Below and smiled down at the Intercessor.

"Run, Yara," I said. "I'll be waiting for you at the end of the road."

I struck down, but the sword cleaved only snow. Panting out my breath, I rose to my feet. The Wandering Bard was gone. It was over.

Or so he wanted us to think.

I turned towards Kurosiv's corpse.

"Did you think," I said, "that I'd forgotten about you?"

Silence.

"Come now, Neshamah," I said. "Do you really think I'm going to fall for that? I know exactly why you're here."

Kurosiv's body jerked upright, still impaled through the heart. Their eyes had gone red.

"You have grown, Catherine," the Dead King spoke through the corpse's mouth.

I limped forward, sword in hand, but almost stumbled. Masego caught me on one side, Akua the other, and together we went.

"You haven't," I replied. "I saw you coming, Neshamah. You came for the stories because you're afraid of what we might do with them."

"Too little," the Dead King said, "and too late. That is what you hold in your hand. You have grown, Catherine, but you have not grown enough."

I laughed in his face.

"You were hoping to wait until dawn and steal the Night like a thief," I said. "Going through Kurosiv, who's the foundation."

Or wait longer, if Kurosiv won. Death would see the Night pass to him and he had all the time in the world to wait for it.

"You failed, Neshamah," I said. "Tonight, you lose."

Another step forward.

"There will be no peace," I told the Dead King. "There will be no truce – only the shiver before the blade claims your neck. You will fight and you will rage and you will weep, but in the end there can only ever be one end to this."

And I stepped back, because this was for another to end. When my gaze turned to Masego, however, I froze. Hierophant, I saw as he pushed up the cloth, had his eye back. One was still of glass but the other was flesh and blood, the same brown I'd once known him to have. He leaned forward, smiling.

"We come for you, King of Death," Hierophant finished, relishing every word.

He snapped down his wrist, speaking a single word, and hellflame devoured Kurosiv's corpse whole. And so I saw the second miracle that Akua had stolen away from the godhead, along with the eye. True Night could change souls, it was how the nails had been made. And Hierophant had lost sorcery because the Saint had severed the part of his soul that connected his body to the power, allowing him to wield it. Akua had healed his soul.

Masego had his magic back.

Droughtbringer

<https://topwebfiction.com/listings/a-practical-guide-to-evil/>

KiltedBastich

Ohhhh yeah. That's the stuff. Ahhhhhh.

ErraticErrata

It was one of my favourite chapters to write in a while. Been a long time coming.

dadycoool

It's always nice when an author is excited to write a chapter. You can taste the eagerness in their words and it enriches the entire experience.

Gabe Meadow

Indeed. A true moment of triumph without anything to mar it. Save Cat bleeding pretty nastily for it, but isn't that par for the course?

dadycoool

Is it really a victory if Cat isn't bleeding out?

Sethur

It's only a victory if Cat has somehow mutilated herself and she gets blamed for a fire she didn't actually start. Does melted obsidian count?

Someperson

Hey there's still hope that Catherine gets blamed for burning Kurosiv's corpse to cinders in the draw holy book.

Miles

Speaking of self mutilation, did Akua bother to also heal Cat's leg? iirc that one's due to a soul injury too.

Someperson

I'm pretty sure Cat keeps that one on purpose.

Cpt. Obvious

Yep, that's been mentioned quite often. She keeps it to remind her that she is mortal. She keeps it to remind her that choices have consequences. She keeps it because it makes her think twice.

Two dozen snakes

This. This is the kind of chapter that makes me desperately yearn for a live-action TV adaptation of the Guide

This was fantastic. Thank you EE

anonymous4968

Nah, has to be animated. Live action would become a CG mess.

Cpt. Obvious

I Dread either option. (Dang it. I've written so many posts here the spell checker thinks Dread is a proper noun...)

Without enough money thrown at it a live action TV production would be so disappointing. And as an animated version odds are their vision would clash badly with the images the books have painted in my mind.

The one fantasy work converted to live action I've seen long after reading is LotR. And it has totally supplanted the visions the books painted for me. The only things still my "own" (ok so good old JRRT described it to me but my mind painted it) are things like the old willow tree, the tomb where Bilbo got Sting and almost all of the Silmarilion. But even there alot of the faces has been replaced by what the movies showed. Luckily they were mostly pretty good, but sometimes I miss my old vision of those stories.

Now LotR was a huge franchise just waiting to happen. The books had been read and loved by generations of reader. The were translated to something like 30 languages and had sold many millions of copies. So yeah there were a lot of money spent on the movie.

As good as I think the Guide is there's no way any company would spend that kind of money on turning it into a TV series. Not unless it first reaches a lot more people than it has so far.

naturalnuke

It was PHENOMENAL!

Oh the beats!

The lines!

THE END!

I'm gushing

'Ladi Williams

I was reading and while reading there was the constant fear that EE would not finish this until next week.
Imagine my joy when I got to the end.
I was like "what!?"

Darkening

Yeah, there were like 3 different parts where I was like, "Okay, this is the bit where we get some cool line and the chapter cuts off and we'll get the big fight next chapter" And then it just kept going lol. Awesome stuff.

onedollargum

Feels so good.

This may be a story about becoming evil, but it feels so good when a villain falls to hubris.

Santiago A Duarte

I don't think it's really about "becoming" evil... Cat is the closest to "evil" she ever gets in the first 2 books, from like chapter 3. She's just about the lightest Villain possible these days.

Cpt. Obvious

She's the kind of evil that doesn't do evil for evil's sake.

She chose(!) evil because none of the "good" guys seemed to have any kind of plan beyond: "Smite Evil!"

Hero rose. Hero kills Villain(s). Hero inspires revolt. The Dread army stomps out the revolt. The Calamities kills Hero.

Result? One less Hero and a lot of dead bakers, peasants, cobblers and so on.

Rinse and repeat.

Meanwhile the Dread Empire had shown that as evil as they were they had a long term plan that didn't involve killing as many as possible. They even allowed the House of Light to keep holding sermons and educate the people of Callow. They even paid for the orphanage she grew up in, where she got an education and were expected to attend the House of Light.

One side repeatedly brought death and despair with little gain to show. The other was organized and authoritarian, but it had a bureaucracy that she could use to change things. All it required was that she embraced Evil and spent a lifetime working her way up the ladder until she could start making a difference.

And then the Dark Knight found her and all her plans got thrown out the window. Since then she's been scrambling from one pit of chaos to another.

But it all started with her deliberately choosing evil long before she learned she might have a shot at becoming a Villain. But it was never because she wanted to do evil but because it was the way to her goal; getting rid of the Praesi nobles who were mismanaging Callow.

Becoming a Villain changed her ambition from getting rid of corrupt nobles to feeding Callow. But that's just details...

Cpt. Obvious

Feeding Callow?

May the Gobbler eat you spellchecker!

plantsbeans

AAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAA

Rey d`Tutto

Masego had his Magic back...

Subliminary

Wooooo! I FINALLY caught up on this series after starting it a few months ago. Magic boi got his magic back let's goooo

dadycoool

Oh shit. OH, HOLY SHIT!!! This was an amazing chapter start to finish, but Masego's magic was a major nerf when he lost it. Honestly, the only thing scarier than a fully-powered Sve Noc is a fully-powered Hierophant.

Isaac Martinez

EPIC

clavesoon dayam

sidehammer056302

I'm just sitting here laughing maniacally. I can't stop!

Are there words?

ARE THERE WORDS?

XD

Three bitch slaps in one chapter! Godhead restored! Masego empowered!

There are no words for this!
Hit me up after Chapter 48, we'll talk then..

WuseMajor

Oh.

There are words.

Are you worthy?

sengachi

Ask me again tomorrow.

KiltedBastich

Three bitch slaps? More like FIVE.

1. "Make an example."
2. "Do you really think," I quietly said, "there's anywhere in the world that would be far enough?"
3. "The Tomb-maker tells you that makes eight," I grinned, all teeth and blood.
4. " So I'm going to take every single thing from you, except what you most want to give me."
5. "There will be no truce – only the shiver before the blade claims your neck. You will fight and you will rage and you will weep, but in the end there can only ever be one end to this."

SO many people got told, after fucking around and finding out.

edrey

you can feel the fire from this chapter.
with this blade they should be able to see his plan, and that would be a show.
truly great chapter.

Liliet

AA YESSSSSSSSSSSSSSSS

and wow Catherine really just went to the Sisters with a plan that said "let him kill me and you" and they really just said
"okay"

and MASEGO AND AKUA!!

and the PROPERLY MENDED godhead for the Sisters ^^

ANd

AA

dadycoool

Oh good, someone was able to put it into words.

'Ladi Williams

To! Lil, calm down before you get an aneurysm lol.
And the God head is out of akua and masegos hands....they can perform a miracle for you.
But that was a wtf chapter...I think "THE wtf" chapter for this book.

Someperson

Honestly the last chapter I can really hold up to this one is when Kairos went out with a bang.

And that isn't to say we haven't had good things since then.

Crash

there's good chapters, there's great chapters even. but then there's this. woah

Silverking

The Warden has the Book and the Sword. The Crows have relinquished their Ruined power and had it remade anew. The Eternal Turncoat steps forward on a path to a true destiny. The Hierophant has regained his familiar tools, all the better to dissect the Dead King with.

And Neshamah, poor Neshamah. The rules of Good and Evil are back in play, and you have overreached. You got to eat the baby, and now you have to pay for it.

onedollargum

Neshama lost another piece of his soul, which is dope. =D

Raved Thrad

Chno Sve Noc!

I can't help but wonder at how all this affects the balance of power. Or, perhaps more properly, the balance of the Powers. If "doing it right" means that Sve Noc are true goddesses now, then how does that affect the balance / detente between Above and Below? Are they part of Below, or are they effectively a third divine faction, standing apart as the Firstborn stand apart from Calernia?

I love the developments in Akua's character and power. I don't know if she's going to gain a Name out of all of this, but she's definitely falling into a Role: that of the balancer, the bringer of justice. I'm half-expecting angels to try and recruit her any moment.

The Intercessor getting beaten with her instrument was absolutely satisfying. 😊

With Masego's magic back, that makes possibly the two most accomplished mortal spellcasters aligned against the Dead King. Add in Catherine as the high priestess of two goddesses actively in opposition to him, and it promises to be a very interesting final fight.

Konstantin von Karstein

I think their still « only » goddesses, not Gods.

Liliet

They're not Gods, just gods properly on Nessie's level

Isaac Martinez

Akua... What did you sacrifice?

nick012000

Akua's a heroine now. If she's doing the Right Thing, does she need to sacrifice anything at all?

Konstantin von Karstein

She's not,... yet.

masterofbones

A villain turned hero rarely gets a chance to do anything but sacrifice themselves.

Sinead

True, but she has a sacrificial Cat as a reusable scapegoat.

Or to put another way, Cat put Akua on the long path, which has a pay-off of not costing her life necessarily. And has in part bought it with her own sacrifices as well as through trust and lesser trials.

Liliet

> True, but she has a sacrificial Cat as a reusable scapegoat.

My god. I'm stealing this line.

Rey d`Tutto

They die after having been redeemed.
Ubua cannot be redeemed. She is a can without a deposit, made of worthless materials.
The Penitent Whatever needs to live a long life making a dent in all the red on their ledger.
Heroine, of the Great Evil Long Path Redemption arc/trope.

Miley

Oh dang, it's even been foreshadowed from the beginning.
The one feature all Heroes have in common is how pretty they are. And Ubua is the prettiest of them all.

Big I

Fuck me. That was awesome.

Speck of Stardust

So the next question I got is Yara going to get to watch the dead king go or is Neshamah going to see Yara's removal?
Either way the the final meetings before the end are what interest me the most.

Also dead king you lack the ability to judge growth when it comes to the matters that surpassed you, cause you've never seen it done before.

dadycoool

It seems the same goes for Yara. They've been the two highest "mortals" for so long that they simply can't fathom anyone rising to and above their level.

Liliet

Pretty sure that's Yara's explicit plan.

Reader in the Night

This chapter was awesome beyond words, but I admit I didn't fully understand it. How was the Night un-Ruined in the process of stealing it and then feeding it back?

Because we have bits of Sve Noc being diminished by the ruined of the Night, and also the fact that their godhead (which is different from the Night? Or is their godhead and the Night one and the same?) was broken from the start. But how was it broken originally, how was it fixed, and why does fixing it give more power back to the Sisters than what was stolen in the first place?

The Night has been since it's very inception a zero-sum game, and the only way to introduce more power into it was to steal it from somewhere else. Did fixing the godhead allow Sve Noc to actually gain more Night through the faith of their followers, or something?

Because if so, that's... Actually a huge fucking deal for the drow. If Night stops being a zero-sum game, then the Drow don't have to continuously cannibalize themselves to grow stronger.

So... Is that it? I don't expect the author themselves to answer, or anything, but. Was the original flaw of the Godhead the fact that Sve Noc couldn't turn prayer into power, and now they can? Or was it something else? And if so, what exactly is going on?

Reader in the Night

And even more questions: The part where Ivah replied the question with a "maybe tomorrow" was absolutely fucking glorious, but how the hell would Ivah even have been able to become a god anyways? It only had a single wisp of Night, while Masego actually held the bulk of the power and the godhead itself. If Ivah ate the wisp of original Night.. Wouldn't it just have gained a tiny amount of Night?

And jumping from that, how the hell did Akua fix Hierophant's soul with the Night, a power that is meant for everything but fixing soul? Sure, we saw that thing about Nails, and how a godhead can effectively alter souls, but to do that, wouldn't Akua have needed to use a portion of the Night? So did she steal a portion of it to patch up Hierophant's soul, or something? If so, is the Night permanently missing that little bit of power?

nick012000

Ivah had the rights to the new godhead because he'd been the one to score the killing blow on Kurosev.

Darkening

And he'd been linked to the godhead from the time when sve noc hid inside him, so he was already forged into a vessel for it to inhabit. Just like kurosiv expected it to flow to him when akua and Masego lost containment of it, it would have gone to him since he was the only remaining wielder left.

Reader in the Night

Ah, now I get it. Masego and Akua's containment ritual would eventually fail, and then the godhead would "leak", or "run downstream", to Ivah.

Still, Ivah receiving a godhead without the proper rituals to absorb it... It probably could be done, but its godhead would have been even more "broken" than Sve Noc's.

Snappy270

The point about Ivan getting an even more broken god head is so true, but their whole culture is about getting more power so would still be tempted.

As for how it broke, it happened when they were created. They were offered godhood by the bard to stop the twilight sages. But it was they had no idea what they were doing so when they accepted it went wrong. Without proper training they were suddenly goddesses and resulted in breaking their own power, also with two of them pulling in different ways didn't help. They gave out their power to stabilize themselves and started a killing culture to make sure it didn't pool into one being.

They ate Catherine's winter godhood to try to use more power to fix themselves. When Cat willing gave her power they were able to stabilize themselves without the need of giving out night, but weren't fixed. Even in their own world (the gloom) they couldn't keep DK out which shows how they didn't have complete power over their godhood.

It got fixed cause Masego was able to pull all of night together and make it into a proper godhood. The sisters now knowing how to use the power didn't break it immediately so were able to change creation, pulling the bard to them.

Hope that makes sense.

Liliet

They didn't "give out the power to stabilize themselves", it was meant to be shared among the drow as their life force from the start. They were trying to do a very complex thing.

KageLupus

That assumes that all of the various power players left on Cat's side let Ivah live long enough for the ritual to fail. Between Akua, Zeze, and the Tombmaker I doubt it would have happened. Really, if Ivah had fallen to temptation then it would probably have had a very short lived run as a proto-godling before getting snuffed out. But that would have prevent Sve Noc from receiving the godhead and the whole thing would have gone pearshaped.

Luckily, Ivah is a true gentlethem and a believer, in Sve Noc and the Queen of Lost and Found.

Darkening

Ehhh. If Ivah had finished Cat off as he very easily could have in that moment, it's not like there would be a lot of options available. Rumena was stripped of night just like every other drow, so Ivah would have been the only drow with even a scrap of night and I suspect without night to prop him up Rumena's age would be an issue. Akua and Masego were both occupied with the ritual and them trying to stop and kill Ivah would have just caused containment to fail earlier and given him the power. Sure, Masego and Akua could probably make a decent go at godslaying and probably wouldn't be feeling particularly rational about restraining themselves from murdering cat's murderer but it wouldn't be a certain thing. Especially since Ivah's whole thing is being inhumanly stealthy so his power would likely express itself that way pretty natural and make him hard to catch.

Syndic

My take: Akua and Masego, or actually the ritual and whoever did it, needed to have all of the Night in one place to change (fix) it. As long as some of it was still in Sve Noc, or in the "nails", no ritual could affect all of it, so it could not be fixed. So to fix it, they had to get it out of the goddesses, the pretender gods, and the firstborn.

As to why it needed fixing – because when the sisters first tried to become gods, they were desperate. Their ritual back then was not complete, not perfect. It made them something like gods, but there were flaws.

And for the miracles Akua performed to fix Masego: They held the entirety of a god in their ritual. All its power, all its sway over creation. A god could easily(?) give a mortal an eye back and reattach a severed bit of soul without diminishing itself, and so with the entirety of a god in their ritual so could Akua (and Masego).

Reader in the Night

I agree with your take on te broad strokes, but the lack of specifics is what confounds me: You posit that Sve Noc's forst ritual wasn't perfect because they were hurried, so there flaws, which in turn prevented them from being a "true" god. And that makes sense.

But what were this flaws? Why and how was the godhead broken, and more importantly, in which ways is the godhead "better" now that it's fixed?

And why does Sve Noc have more power after fixing it? We know the Power isn't a consequence the godhead, it was originally a gift from the Gods Below, then it got Ruined.

It would make sense if they were able to use the Power they have more efficiently because their godhead is better now, but the chapter seems pretty clear that they just plain got more power out of it. How? Where did the extra Power come from? Neshamah's own ritual?

hakureireimu

We do know their godhead was "broken"; it says so this chapter. As to what was wrong? I think we'll know that in future chapter.

I don't think Sve Noc has more power; rather they have better power. Same power without some of the drawback for example. Like Cat lost power but gained flexibility by losing Winter and getting to borrow Night.

Quwertuiopp

Its better now in the same way a palace is better than the burned out rubble of one. It is more powerful the same way a hammer is more powerful when hitting nails than a blob of Jello of the same mass as the hammer would be at that job. Just because it has the same amount of power as before, that doesn't mean it isn't in a more potent shape.

A battery and a pile of coal may have the same energy content, but ready to use electricity is more versatile in usage while still being more powerful when turned to a singular task. If you want make an engine, an electric motor is going to be more efficient than a steam engine powered by burning coal.

tmchin75723

They have a perfected godhead ritual (though using it 1:1 is asking for usurpation). Thanks dead king! Akua and Masego then cannibalized it to remake Sve Noc.

Darkening

A few millenia of Night being grown by harvesting outsiders, even if it was a relative trickle, is an easy explanation to grab for the total amount of Night being greater, plus Winter getting mixed in, and this is the first moment since the dawn of their apotheosis that they've had all of the night back in themselves and not invested into their entire population. So this is the first moment we've ever seen them without Night being scattered across their entire population, all of it concentrated in one place and whole. So Night might not be more powerful than it was before the ritual, it's just that it's all in one place now instead of most of it being parceled out to the population. Plus Akua/Masego undid whatever Ruin did to weaken it I guess? I dunno how that worked exactly. Presumably Sve Noc will be nerfed a bit when they start raising Mighty again. Wonder how many former Mighty are gonna get knifed for their previous actions.

Reader in the Night

Ah. That makes sense, I forgot to account for the fact that the Night was mostly parcelled off before the Ritual.

Liliet

Yeah, the Sisters specifically discussed how they didn't have enough for themselves because Night was invested in workings. The Gloom shards, the part Kurosiv had stolen for itself... The problem was not that the total was too small. I mean that's also something Ruin did, Night is smaller now than before that, but with the Kurosiv problem fixed and the Gloom shards dissolved and reabsorbed, and the whole thing made more efficient, it's still enough.

Dillon

Keep in mind that Neshamah was riding Kurisov through his death; I wouldn't be surprised if they got the Ruined portion of Night and maybe a bit more than that in the trade.

So Sve Noc is at 100% power and unbroken for the first time. Plus we've never seen them fully concentrated since they've always been significantly invested in their followers. It stands to reason that they're way more powerful than before.

Liliet

Think of the godhead as a vessel. The power fills it, and the vessel is what allows it to be moved and shaped.

The Sisters' vessel was broken and crooked, more so for having been Ruined. That took some of the power but more importantly it warped the vessel further – as little as Masego could, I'm sure, but the problem was already there.

So this chapter, the vessel was disassembled.

And then Masego made a new one.

It wasn't fixed, it was literally remade. The Sisters died and were brought back to life from the imprints they left on their faithful. Ivah's killing of the previous god gave it the... start of the thread, to knit the whole thing back together, and it chose to give the thread to the trace of the Sisters it had instead of taking it for itself. And Masego did the actual knitting.

We don't yet know the details of how exactly the remaking to be un-cracked this time will impact the result. But Night was never REALLY zero-sum. It could be added to by killing and stealing, and also by learning and sacrificing. It was ALWAYS something meant to grow from new Secrets added to it. The zero-sum thing was just a result of the drow being locked inside the Gloom, only the few exiles going aboveground to try and win honor by adding to Night.

And of course, there was already enough power, even with Masego's Ruin. Even with Kurosiv having stolen like two thirds of what remained, the third was enough to hold back the Dead King and maintain the Sisters, if in a fading state, and their entire side. With that power back, the Sisters have a modest but whole godhead, lesser than it would have been if Masego had fixed it before the Ruination, but good enough.

Reader in the Night

Yours was a nice metaphor, and it really helped me visualize how the Night (filling) and the Godhead (vessel) interacted with each other. Admittedly, the pottery metaphor got a little tortured by the time Hierophant was knitting (?) it back together, but I got the gist of it.

That said:

>The Sisters' vessel was broken and crooked, more so for having been Ruined.<

I think what was Ruined by Hierophant was a part of the power, not the godhead. The godhead continued working the same way (if at a lesser strenght) afterwards.

And since we're touching on the subject of power: You said that the sisters have a godhead that's fixed but less powerful, but the chapter really makes it seem like they have more power now than when they talked to Catherine while she was making the spear. And while you said that the Night was not a zero-sum game, you correctly pointed out that any extra power had to be brought in from an external source, so where did the significant power boost come from?

My current theory is that Neshamah's own ritual somehow generated more Power for Kurosiv, which then got ripped out along with the Night and fed back into Sve Noc. But by your own metaphor, Trismegistus' Ascension Ritual is probably more about shaping the vessel, not creating the filling. In Neshamah's case, the Power was the lives of an entire Kingdom. In Kurosiv's, it was Sve Noc's own power that it stole.

Maybe it was the fact that a bunch of drow died in the fighting? Would that have provided extra (necromantic) power, on top of the Night that was collected when they died?

Snappy270

Its less more power and more they now can do more with said power. Like the power they have is more concentrated allowing for it to have a greater impact in reality.

Creation will now listen to them as they now have the authority.

Most gods have this authority but it took them several goes to get it.

In the beginning all they could do it maintain the gloom and give out night. With catherine they gained enough control to move the gloom and build a city, but they still didnt have complete control as DK could break in and even gained ground. After ruin all they could do was break the gloom to stop DK.

Now in their home creation bends to their will, probably only in gloom as that is their domain. But in there they are all mighty.

KageLupus

Here is another analogy, related to power and the godhead:

Imagine the original godhead as a monster truck or other big vehicle. But, it was put together by amateurs who didn't have a blueprint and had only kind of seen a monster truck in passing. They got really close, but the wheels are misaligned and the axels sag and the whole thing kind of chugs and rumbles and stutters along. You can drive it over damn near any other vehicle because it is bigger and stronger, but the whole time you are crossing your fingers and hoping the next bump doesn't cause something to fall off.

To really stretch the analogy, Cat then convinced the Sisters to take their hunk of junk to the local scrap yard. The whole thing gets broken down into various parts and given over to a couple of incredibly knowledgeable engineers who manage to build an actual functioning car out of it. It is much smaller than the monster truck, but sleek and fast and runs smooth as silk. Ivah holds the keys to the car and thinks about taking it for a test drive, but then decides that the Sisters really do deserve it and hands the keys back to them.

Now Sve Noc has a vehicle again, which is smaller and less powerful than the monster truck, but has the added bonus of not being at risk of falling apart after every big bump. They also learned that sometimes you can go around a problem, rather than over it, but that is a metaphor for another post...

tmchin75723

They might not actually be more to night, even if it is fixed. Right here, we're seeing them with all of the power, uninvested.

Liliet

> You said that the sisters have a godhead that's fixed but less powerful, but the chapter really makes it seem like they have more power now than when they talked to Catherine while she was making the spear.

Yes. It's less powerful than it was before Ruination, not before this hot potato game. They literally have more powerful than when they talked to Catherine because they took back from Kurosiv his portion.

(I expect the part that had been invested in the Mighty got immediately reinvested back into them, so that wouldn't make a lot of difference)

> And while you said that the Night was not a zero-sum game, you correctly pointed out that any extra power had to be brought in from an external source, so where did the significant power boost come from?

Kurosiv.

Insanenoodlyguy

And capable of growth again. The Drow have been learning the hard way how to do more with less, and they just got at least their original way to use Night back. So as they take more, everybody's that much sharper for learning to do without. This was a pivot moment and the race just got a second wind.

Gerionar

I'd go a step further and say: the godhood is like a power grid. A power plant feeds Night into the grid which in turn fuels all drow and great workings. The quality of the engine and the grid determines how efficiently the god can use the Night. According to Masego's statement from a few chapters back, the machine Sve Noc were using was a crude and inefficient thing, badly tuned and probably leaking in several places.

Then Heinaut happened and Night was Ruined. Pressure dropped to critical levels. The godhead itself probably suffered, too. Parts of the power grid were amputated, which lead to even more problems managing the strain on the system. Kurosiv tapping into the grid and stealing Night only made things worse. Blackouts were the obvious result. You could attempt to repair the power plant, add more pumps, buffers and valves, patch leaks, bypass clogged sections of the grid, and disconnect the broken parts. But this is sunken cost fellacy. It is much better to completely scrap this faulty abomination and get a new system, one designed by professionals. Even though there is less total Night in circulation, it runs so smoothly that you can barely hear the soft humm. It has a lot more UUMPF! to it, too.

But transfusing the Night from one vessel to the other is a risky thing. You have to shut everything down (including life support for the elderly!), extract all the Night from the system, collect it safely, and feed it to the new power plant. A lot of things can go wrong: the technician (Kurosiv) responsible for bleeding the Night from the old system could botch the job. The designer for the transfer process (Akua) could have added something in secret and used the Night to power a working of her own (which she die). The person (Ivah) charged with feeding the Night into the new machine could have decided to take the seat at the controls. And probably a hundred other things.

It worked out only because everyone was trusted to do their job.

Daniel E

Do you know to make a God? And so the First Under Night spoke thus; Have you tried turning her off and then back on again?

Frivolous

Sadly apropos, Daniel. Haha.

Frivolous

Good explanation, Gerionar.

Salt

If I'm not misunderstanding it, the problem in the first place was that the Twilight Sages made a deal with Below to mortgage the lives of all future generations for lifespan and power to fight the kingdom under. Turns out it was a shit deal though, because it wasn't enough to let them win and, as the dwarves slaughtered the Drow, it lessened the number of future Drow that would be born in the future. Their debt basically became impossible to repay, and defaulting on it would mean the end of their entire race.

The Sisters renegotiated the deal to save their people, killing all the twilight sages in the process, but they also got shafted because the new deal essentially just turned the entire race into sacrifices to Below via the Tenets of Night, and they were still never going to be able to finish paying off the initial debt.

Looks to me like what they just did by breaking apart the godhead and reforming it was a miracle in the divine sense. They broke apart the flawed godhead by sacrificing god-Kuroshiv, reformed it afterwards as a proper godhead, and essentially erased the twilight sages original debt to Below – bringing the future of their race back for real. Quite literally a miraculous birth by sacrificing a minor god on Below's altar.

As far as why they seem stronger now, my personal speculation is that their own growth and accomplishment is in itself an entirely separate tribute to Below, and they managed to pay back their original debt and more, the excess of which they're getting this additional power from. Basically they finished paying the mortgage on their godhead and have some pocket change to boot.

The reason I think the debt was so completely paid is because we have to remember that the original bet between Below and Above isn't lowercase morality-wise good and evil, so much as an argument about whether it was best for mortals to be ruled (Above) or guided to greater things (Below). At the end of the day, Below isn't in this for something as trivial as the lives of a mortal race, something like that isn't even valuable to entities on the level of Above or Below. Their actual goal is to guide mortals into becoming greater than what they would've been by following Above's rule, proving Above wrong in the process. This kind of growth is a major point reinforcing their argument that mortals can be guided to those “greater things” after all.

The fact that the Sisters managed to learn to lose and still get their due, learn to make leaps of faith, to escape the bucket or the pit or whatever you want to call it, resulting in the true revival of their race and becoming something greater, is a tribute to Below in and of itself. Especially because it was independent of divine mandate, and was basically a self-deterministic act of growth based loosely on Below’s philosophy – “are you worthy/maybe tomorrow”, which essentially means always strive to be better than you were yesterday.

... meaning this entire debacle basically paid back a debt of something Below doesn’t really care about (the lives of the Drow as a race), with the currency of THE singular thing of true value that a mortal in Creation can give to Below (weight on the scales proving them right and Above wrong), which actually put Below a bit in the red instead. Whatever additional power they got from this could just be the natural tendency of Below putting their finger on the scales to balance their accounts.

Reader in the Night

Your theory is plausible, but... If it’s what happened, then the narration simply doesn’t give us the correct context clues to reasonably conclude it. Even when Cat’s stealing the artifact of Below’s stories, there’s no mention of debts paid, gifts from Below, or Below directly intervening to help or hinder any of the involved, even with three effective godlings on the scene duking it out (Bard, Dead King, Sve Noc).

Lobo logo

We know that the leech has been hoarding night for centuries – even before the ruin and it attempting godhood in earnest . The sisters also said that getting it’s night returned would put them back in the black. The power up is as a result of them having all of the leech’s night and all other night returned to them

Insanenoodlyguy

This. When Masego worked this thing into the new godhead, he had a good amount of the original untainted material, and with the rest broken down, it could all be put back together in a working order.

Liliet

I've been under the impression, and still am, that Winter was what let them pay the original debt. Even before the miracle Akua said that only the older Mighty would die from losing Night for good – because it maintains their lifespan, and that nisi and dzulu would be fine.

zenanii

This is how I understood it:

Creating the godhood from night could be compared to creating a sword. And the sisters are really mediocre smiths who don't understand the fundamentals of swordsmithing.

What they ended up with was a unbalanced sword full of impurities, a real mess. Then Neshama stole part of the "sword" and Masego ruined it as well, so now they had a chipped sword with no guard and a cracked pommel.

What they did here was take the entire sword, smelt it all down into liquid steel, and then have Masego, an expert "blacksmith" forge the entire thing anew. And while they might have ended up with a bastard sword instead of a longsword, because of the night that was stolen by Neshama, the finished product is still one helluva lot better than what the sisters started out with.

Liliet

I'm pretty sure a bastard sword is larger than a longsword
;u;

Regret

A bastard sword's blade is usually as long or a bit shorter than a longsword, the big difference is the grip, that is longer.

Some say they tended to be a bit heavier though.

EmEss

It depends on what definition of 'long sword' you are using. In Dungeons and Dragons terms (and other works drawing from it) a long sword is a one handed weapon and thus smaller than the hand and half bastard sword. In HEMA (Historical European Martial Arts) (and more generally by historians) a long sword is a two handed weapon with a cruciform hilt and thus larger than a bastard sword.

Liliet

interesting! ty

*arcanavita*15

AHAHAHAHAHAHAH HYPEPEYE OHOH OH.

This was astounding just astounding it shows how much everyone has grown, so many story lines wrapped up wonderfully, she got a total victory weakening and maybe killing Yara, killing the fake god, reforging the godhead of the sisters, Masego getting his magic back and telling the dead king he is coming for him, it was just amazing.

WealthyAardvark

"And so ErraticErrata asked them this: do you know how to make a reader fanbase hoot and holler in delight?"

SomeoneSomewhere

And the readers answered: "yes He does". And licked the display screen in inappropriate places.

Juff

Typo Thread:

brough a > brought a last/ > last.
fundamentallu > fundamentally one more seek > once more seek that me might > that we might breathed life > breathe life
Besides, t's > Besides, it's Queen, but Kurosiv (missing words) the last of long-buried evil (something's wrong here) then other, > then another, a Might and > a Mighty and Night I found > Night found which the darkest > which was the darkest like it's been > like it'd been fell of in > fell off in fell of in flecks, they > fell of in flecks. They an hymn > a hymn
stutter down to the size (something's wrong here) my staff to lean on > my staff (it's repeated) down ad > down at

pirateddesigns

Not a typo so much, but the whole story about the Laure Silverscales being caught in a weir by the tide... Silver Lake would not have a tide as it's not the ocean where lunar gravitational pull causes the water level to oscillate on a planetary scale. In the midst of an otherwise superlative chapter, this killed the flow for me for a moment. But then I shrugged, said to myself "magic planet," and moved on.

Liliet

Okay so in my previous scream I forgot to mention: SEER CAT SEER CAT SEER CAT

WHO ELSE WANTS TO SEE CAT CHAT WITH AGNES NOW BECAUSE AAAAAAAAAAAAAAAA

that power is so great and hype

"i understood more so I could see more" SEER CAT SEER CAT I WANT MORE MORE MORE

shikkarasu

I want a chapter where Catherine Speaks to the Augur at length, only to end with her waking up two weeks before hand. Cat then decides against making the journey to talk to her, since they've both already had the conversation, retroactively.

caoimhinh

Also, we apparently now have the authors of the two Drow religious books based on Catherine.

Trokel wrote the "Tenets Under the Night, Book of Losara" Faina wrote the "Parables of the Lost and Found"

Liliet

Yep.

Fania, not Faina.

Mirror Night

Yeah the mechanics don't make total sense to me. Nor am I fan of reversing sacrifices made previously so while I like Masego, him getting his magic back doesnt quite work for me.

It was epic enough I suppose even if how it all worked out doesn't check out in my book.

'Ladi Williams

Okay, so I had been ecstatic and hyped and reading all comments....but I couldn't comment bcos I didn't want to take the stress to sign in.

BUT, when I saw your comment, I had to sign in to say this....
"YOU ARE ALONE IN THAT BELIEF"

Mirror Night

Best not to speak for others unprompted. For instance Reader in the Night seems pretty unsure about how it all worked as well. So no I am not alone. Not that I especially care about the opinions of others or yours in particular.

shikkarasu

I completely get that. Sacrifices that get reversed inherently mean less. However, I will suggest that going 3 years and 2 books without his Magic, and all the character growth that he made during this time, mitigate that quite a bit.

Unlike when Pilgrim came back to life a bell or two after dying, or how Cat gets new powers almost immediately after losing her existing skillset, Masego had to learn how live like people without the Gift (who he used to think of as useless). We got to see how he coped with magic being a tool that was borrowed, rather than an extension of his being. We even got to see him turn down lesser versions of what he had (see his vicious refusal of Sve Noc's offer).

Mageso has had a full and satisfying character arc with Wrest, and now we get to see him, for the first time ever, at the true height of his power. I think this was a reversed sacrifice done very, very right.

Insanenoodlyguy

If it was simply reversed by default or a "reward" it'd be shallow, yes. His price has meaning because it wasn't settled by him l. Akua gave it back to him. She no doubt sacrificed something in the process. She basically just used a wish on Masego, probably a lot of other thing she could have wished for. Masego had no expectations of getting his magic back here, if he'd gone for it himself it'd probably screw him fate-wise later.

Salt

Masego losing his magic wasn't really a sacrifice though. Not all loss is a sacrifice – it has to be a willing trade.

Hakram cutting off his own hand to gain Vivienne's trust was a sacrifice. Something willingly given to gain something else.

Being corrupted by the Dead King and having Saint cut off the taint is just a wound. Nothing wrong with healing wounds imo, story wise

RoflCat

It's Akua doing her thing.

She basically reverse engineered the Night nails and make something that can heal Masego's broken soul since as established True Night can affect souls.

You can see the moment that happened when Sve Noc fully came into godhood again, when they looked at Masego and him turning to Akua upon realizing.

It's simply Sve Noc "repaying debts" to Masego for his help.

M0och123

This was such a great chapter OMG!

lowinternetspeed

Obviously every part of this chapter was pure fucking awesome and with the chapter title its going to be followed by a bunch of interludes which are going to be great. Everyone can agree this is one of the best chapters in the series (which is no small thing in this series.)

but Ivah

Ivah going "Maybe tomorrow" is my new favourite one-liner.

pyrohawk21

Huh, just had two interesting thoughts. The first is that the symbology behind the form that which the Stories of Good and Evil took was fascinating. The Sword and the Book which is also known as a place where a Pen Writes.

And which is mightier? The Sword, which triumphs over the Pen as it forces the Pen to obey. Or the Pen which even when forced to obey by the Sword, creates changes in the world which in time will have the Sword pulled back from the Pen... The correct answer? Hell if I know, and I don't think the Heavens know either!

The second thing however was the fact that Masego has his missing eye back now... and it's an eye of flesh and blood. I can't help but wonder if that might actually be even more useful than if it replaces it with another artefact similar to his remaining Summer Glass Eye. Because by having both, it ensures that he sees both 'God Sight' and 'Mortal Sight', and thus misses only those which can not be seen by either. A much harder task that foiling one or the other.

Entirely possible he's going to end up replacing them, but having them remain as they are is a thought...

caoimhinh

Interesting, though keep in mind that it is not a Pen, it's a Book.

Above's stories were a book, like a storybook or a Book of Law, which goes well with what they portray themselves as, and what is encouraged by those stories: do what is right, play by the book, the plot is on your side.

Below's stories are a sword, hacking away obstacles and carving their own place in Creation by force and wicked viciousness to make the world match the vision and madness of the wielder.

Liliet

Masego did not replace his eyes because an artefact was cooler, he replaced his eyes because they went blind from looking at the Summer Sun up close.

Like, an artefact was also cooler, but Masego didn't just self mutilate for it.

Frivolous

I'm surprised Wandering Bard is still in her incarnation as Yara of Nowhere. She bit her tongue off the last time. I thought she'd died and been rebodied.

except what you most want to give me – I'm guessing Catherine intends to deny her the death she wants, and for her to live forever. Nasty.

I'm also surprised Catherine used WB's own lute to smash her, instead of using her aspect of Silence. Very satisfying and physical, yes, but not what I expected.

I suspect the lute will not be remade. Forever broken. That still leaves WB the liquor, though.

Does this imply Silence is a once-per-day aspect?

nimelennar

Most Aspects are only useful once per battle (except the passive, always-on ones like Ranger's). If they can be used a second time, they tend to be a lot less effective the second time.

Mirror Night

Not per se. It depends on the power of the Aspect. More powerful Aspects can only be used once per day generally... weaker Aspects can be used more often.

Silence so far has seemed pretty darn strong so it makes sense Cat is limited.

beleester

I think Yara of Nowhere is her true identity – who she was before she became the Bard.

Insanenoodlyguy

This is her original form. She went into active non passive war, outright declaring her intention to kill Cat. That kind of dramatic divergence means this time it's serious. So she gets her true form, with all the strengths and weaknesses that entails (typically your true form is the state you ultimately die in)

Frivolous

All right. Still think she's not going to die, though. Catherine believes in long prices and she seems to indicate so.

The King of Death, who wants nothing more than to live (or not-live) forever, will die.

The Intercessor, who wants nothing more than to die, never ever will.

ninegardens

So... sorry if I missed something, but WHAT did Akua mess with with Sve Noc?

Apart from fixing Masego's magic? Cause it sounded like that was the 2nd thing.

Or is the first thing she did just something that we haven't been told yet?

caoimhinh

She took from their power to forge a miracle: restoring one of Masego's eyes and fixing his soul so that he could have his Gift to use magic back.

Insanenoodlyguy

The way I look at it, channeling all that power, you can do a lot without really lessening it, but probably only one thing in the short amount of time unless you try to hold on to the power (which has its own consequences) so basically, you get a wish. Lot of things you can do with a wish and her kind of smarts. But what she spent it on was restoring him. Presumably with that kind of pivot, she had at least one really good idea that would more directly benefit herself. But she sacrificed that for the sake of another, which makes it all the more effective. Because Akua is now playing a hero for real.

Rey d`Tutto

I expect Akua to gain a Name.
She was Committed to Old Skool Evil for the Lulz. She committed atrocity after atrocity after insult after aggression. She attempted Elegant Evil, and was Prideful up until she was Smote by Cat.
And turned to a Cloak Shade. And gained a shard of Winter. Cat Manipulated her into someone who would gladly take the long price of Atonement to keep the Dead King as Evil in a Can.
She Escaped that end, by embracing the idea that she can never be penitent enough to be good, and evil fer th lulz bites yak dick, so just make other's lives suck less. It makes her feel good to help folks.
She learned better than Cat taught.
So she's the Unforgiven hero archetype.

Insanenoodlyguy

The way I look at it, channeling all that power, you can do a lot without really lessening it, but probably only one thing in the short amount of time unless you try to hold on to the power (which has its own consequences) so basically, you get a wish. Lot of things you can do with a wish and her kind of smarts. But what she spent it on was restoring him. Presumably with that kind of pivot, she had at least one really good idea that would more directly benefit herself. But she sacrificed that for the sake of another, which makes it all the more effective. Because Akua is now playing a hero for real.

Wonder

"Kurosiv," I gurgled. "Hey, Kurosiv."

They flicked a glance my way.

"The Tomb-maker tells you that makes eight," I grinned, all teeth and blood.

They went ashen with rage.

Just look at the joy Cat expresses when she tells Kurosiv Rumena's message. She is incorrigible even nearly dead. She happily shares Rumena's Secret with him.

And on the other side of the canals, our towers came alive.

The god went still.

Did Masego and Akua build their own Towers?

Did Masego kill the shard of Neshamah in Kurosiv?

Since Cat ate the Book of Somethings ,she definitely has to eat the sword in some way too, the Name demands it , right?

Cat can be made a mage by Sve No now , right?

Rey d`Tutto

She has more power as First Under the Night than she knows how to Mage.

Otherwise, I agree

Isi Arnott-Campbell

List of important people Catherine has hit in the face so far:

Dread Empress Malicia, first of her name.

Yara of Nowhere, the Wandering Bard.

Was there anyone else in previous volumes of the series? I know there was that guy from the very first chapter, but he wasn't important like these two. Anyone else hoping she'll get a face-strike in on Neshamah, making her 3 for 3 on main antagonists?

shikkarasu

Does mugging an Angel count? I want mugging an Angel to count, but I understand it is much less literal.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Since Angels could be argued to be not-quite-literal in the very nature of their existence, I'm willing to count it.

Darkening

She killed the Lone Swordsman by repeatedly stomping on his head after she stabbed him, does that count? She felled an ogre with a single punch to the face back in the War College if you believe Robber's version of it, though that probably doesn't count as an important person. Pretty sure she explicitly didn't hit akua in the face back when she broke a bunch of her bones after killing William. Problem is, back in her facepunching days important people were generally too important to be in her weight class, and once she was powerful and influential enough to get away with it she was more about slapping people around with magic or just stabbing them to death. Ah! She punched the Duke of Violent Squalls in the face during their duel. That's pretty mid tier for importance.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Ok, so, updated list.

War College ogre (on the one hand this is merely alleged and the person isn't notable; on the other hand the claim was made by best boy Robber, meaning it is by definition important to me).

William of Greensbury, the Lone Swordsman.

Hashmal(lim) (metaphorical/metaphysical; honorable mention to that Angel of the Choir of Endurance, who shows up when we see an example of Cat's practice of drawing heroic bands to her, asking them to leave, and then having to kill them in self-defense).

Duke of Violent Squalls.

Dorian Theodosian, the Exiled Prince (metaphorical; counting it because I decided to count things like the Angels. For anyone unable to place the name or the Name, it's the guy who got shot in the throat because he took off his helmet).

Dread Empress Malicia.

Mighty Kurosiv (verbal; see above. This verbal face-punch is notable mostly for the recipient's immediate annihilation, whereas most of Cat's verbal sparring partners have substantial time to retort. Granted, I'm sure this isn't the first exception to that, but if you couldn't tell by the ever-loosening rules this is kind of a casual thing for me).

Yara of Nowhere, the Wandering Bard.

Xinci

Mm so they did indeed die but were remade. There may be a cost for doing this, as their presence is so heavy it may be that they cannot interact with the Drow as they once did. This would explain the disputed nature of the text, alternatively, it may be that the information contained in the Night was not shared when new Drow are born after this event as Sve is now too heavy to intermingle as easily. Of course, as this is the precipitation of a new era for them, this may be the time to dispense information to the Losara, make better networks of Night distribution, and decry new tenets to help prevent a situation like this from happening again and in general aiding cooperative growth on the surface so the Night can grow itself against various future threats somewhat preemptively. They may also perhaps bring dead Drow back, as their information/souls do appear to be containable or at least be actively recorded somewhere in the Night given the active workings Sve was reinforcing. Many opportunities have arisen here even as limitations loom for their future.

Mm, so Bard was definitely aware of Cats growing pattern, but I do suppose with the role being institutionalized and spread out like it will be in the Age of Order, unfortunately, doesn't give her the death she needs. Or at least doesn't give her an immediate/easily wrought successor for her exact position. Perhaps the role of the Intercessor too spread out under such a paradigm or perhaps Cat could kill her and more fully take up such qualities anyway if she truly wanted to instead of desiring to inflict misery in revenge? Hard to know, Cat may have simply sidestepped that trap inherent to Creation, so Bard will stay alive til this Order ends or a Warden mercifully ends her life.

Well, Masego can achieve apotheosis now, I suppose given Nights transubstantiative nature, repairing his eye is not unexpected. I wonder if he kept any scars he has? I do suppose if there was any time to do so it would be now, and this should reduce the cost of apotheosis for him quite a bit. Seeing the exact ritual the Dead King used, along with pure Night, the stories of Above and Below, Angelic remnants, and the Summer sun should give him some rather excellent conceptual bones to build himself with.

Insanenoodlyguy

Nah, they are better then ever. A lesser god that became that to prolong their lives just risked it all sacrificing their lives. Below doesn't care about the power itself, just the sacrifice, the price paid. There was no promise it would all work out, they died knowing that, so it was real, they are going to be more capable now. Maybe a lower starting level of power, but that can be fixed easily enough. There is a war on.

Zahariel

OK, so first, this was awesome. I cannot wait to see what kind of crazy stuff Masego gets up to next.

Second, can anyone please tell me if the whole "that makes eight" thing between Rumena and the Leech is a reference to something? From context, I can incur that the Leech has tried to kill Rumena seven times and failed (and hey, seven and one, fancy that), but are there mentions of that elsewhere in the story? I can't remember if there are.

shikkarasu

"I have a tongue of fire"

"You are only an eight year snake"

-The traditional opening of an Epic Rap Battle of the Everdark

More succinctly: 'Get on my level,' takes a drag of wakeleaf
'Bitch.'

GluestickGenius

I first assumed it was about Kurosiv's sigils that Rumena destroyed before, but as per Ch. 12 Contest, those only add up to five ...

Xinci

It did raid on two of the sigils under Kurosiv recently though. And that last one would make eight if it did indeed annihilate the others...

AK

We actually learn why it's 8 in the bonus interlude "Tomb" posted about a month later (on patreon; will become open when the book ends).

nimelennar

Given that Fania is the one who prefers stories to words of wisdom, it doesn't bode particularly well for Cat's attempt to put a nisi's perspective even with a rylleh's that the recounting of this story is in a "disputed" Firstborn religious text.

Insanenoodlyguy

Who do you think is disputing it? The two probably still argue and critique each other's articles all the time.

shikkarasu

In the opening quote of 5:25 – Dead Ends

"And so the First Under the Night came across a portal where great danger might lurk, and upon witnessing it halted and sought the council of Sve Noc. 'O Night,' said the First, 'what wisdom do you offer?' And so the Young Night answered thus: 'Try a foot first.'"

– Extract from the 'Parables of the Lost and Found', disputed Firstborn religious text

I think 1 or 2 First Under the Nights later the Drow lose some appreciation for Cat's flippant description of her Patrons.

Liliet

Sure, but it's still out there.

sengachi

I think Cat is the one who disputed it.

Someperson

Yeah, that sounds about right.

Most of Cat's authority in a religious capacity comes from the trust the Sisters are willing to back her with. Which is clearly not something to be underestimated, but I'm pretty sure Sve Noc isn't going to be bothered if the drow don't take Cat's sayings as gospel truth. Heck, even while Cat is still First Under the Night the Sisters have basically approved of Rumena repeatedly mocking and disrespecting her, and it's pretty clear that beyond giving Catherine power over Night they are happy to let her reputation sink or swim based on her own merits and worthiness.

We can also be pretty sure the next First Under the Night will be Ivah, which is fun. Honestly Ivah's one-liner may have been the most epic part of the chapter tbh.

Xinci

It's a bit weirder since Night can package information, so it's fairly possible that Secrets could be used to dredge up information from the Night from when she did say that information and have the exacts noted. This could be a bungling on Cat and Sve's communication again, where the scribes are allowed to feud and misappropriate information later because Cat said she wanted two people on this. Basically, Cat is blind to a different possibility in information transmission due to the nature of the Drow, and instead goes with her experiences with human societies scribes. Sve just letting it happen would be weirder otherwise, since letting such things be disputed directly weakens the office of First Under Night and the support Sve Noc gives it, and thus indirectly her own tenets.

Dave

Oh that's some good shit!

ISiejek

I have so very much I want to say about this chapter, but honestly, I'm not sure how.

Instead, let me just say, this might well be the best chapter so far in the entirety of the story.

I can't wait to re-read the entire thing once it's finished to confirm!

shikkarasu

I would like to nominate Book 3, Chapter 65: Elision. The Fourfold Crossing is by far my favourite trap in the Guide, and the insight into the various shades of Catherine was fascinating.

ninegardens

...
Wait a second.
WAIT a second.

None of this makes any sense.
Laure is a LAKE. Callow is landlocked. What fucking business does a lake have having TIDES?

The whole premise of the entire story is suspect now. Has Cat even SEEN the ocean?

Come to think of it, if your going to have crabs in a bucket, do lakes even have crabs in them?
How BIG are these lakes, exactly? What is going on with the hydrology in this region?

Daniel E

I honestly, sincerely appreciate that you are asking the real questions here.

Insanenoodlyguy

I'll answer your question with another question. Did you really think cat could toss around so much lakeomancy without consequence? It is all explained by that.

shikkarasu

I've held my peace for 6 Books, now, mainly because fantasy maps are rarely realistic in their geography, but the Wasaliti river runs coast to coast. From sea to sea. There is some serious hydrofuckery in Calernia.

Abrakadabra

Yep the wasality is strange. But not actually impossible, provided there is a great lake in the middle from which two river runs in different directions. The lake has to be in a great valley which collects water AND it have to have consistent precipitation. So not actually impossible, but highly improbable.

Ed

Where I live is on a drainage divide, everything that falls here runs away in one of three different directions.

Darkening

Considering the other callowan lake we saw had an island that was only there if you took 1 specific magic boat and was also an angel corpse, and that Callow has had a couple millennia of madmen throwing every magical doomsday scenario they can imagine at them, a lake with tides barely budes the needle for me. If anything I'm astonished Callow is as mundane as it is. They've got the waning woods on one border, and the wasteland and all its horrors on the other, too, you'd think some of those horrors would wander.

Darkening

Come to think of it, the proceran angel corpse was in a lake too until Cordy dredged it up. What's with Angels and dying in lakes? Is this all foreshadowing to Lakeomancy being the greatest weakness of angels and we're going to see Cat score the third angel kill in Calernia?

ninegardens

Mostly, I'm just thinking: Procer had a lake Angel. It also had a lake border with the king of death.

The obvious thing to do is move said angel so that you have an entire lake of holy water as your front line.

Now... obviously that isn't a good plan, and Nessie would fuck with it some how eventually... but I'm still suprised no one tried it

Darkening

Now... I suspect trying to use necromancy on an angel would backfire horribly, but I still find the idea of putting a dead angel anywhere near the worlds greatest necromancer viscerally horrifying. Just, on the off chance he could actually do something with it.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Funny that his nickname is "Nessie," given the whole lake thing being discussed here. And he is, without a doubt, a monster...

ISiejek

You guys do know that lakes can have tides right? Any large body of water is the same...

Really wanna mess with your head? Realise that the sea is basically a really big and deep lake 🤪

beleester

It's a pretty big lake – I don't think we're ever given a scale for the maps, but it looks to be around the size of a province in Procer? If it's somewhere around the size of one of the Great Lakes, it'll have small but noticeable tides – although maybe not big enough to catch fish with.

The Great Lakes don't have any native crabs, but apparently the Chinese Mitten Crab is an invasive species that's spotted there occasionally. Who knew?

Adrian V

This must mean Cat wasn't the first Lakeomancer!!!!

Mary Gentle

Big lumps of water have tides. As for how big they have to be... The Great Lakes don't hack it:

"Studies indicate that the Great Lakes spring tide, the largest tides caused by the combined forces of the sun and moon, is less than five centimeters in height. ... Consequently, the Great Lakes are considered to be non-tidal. Water levels in the Great Lakes have long-term, annual, and short-term variations."

<https://oceanservice.noaa.gov/facts/gltides.html>

Trouble is, I can't find a scale on any of the maps, so I don't know if the Silver Lake is a similar size. or bigger, or smaller than the Great Lakes.

We can always rely on New Scientist:

"The smallest body of water in which lunar tides have been measured is Loch Ness in the UK, which is 37 kilometres long. Here, the tides have an amplitude of about 1.5 millimetres."

Read more: <https://www.newscientist.com/lastword/mg24332501-200-time-and-tide-what-is-the-smallest-body-of-water-with-lunar-tides/#ixzz7B02fzf9d>

Loch Ness isn't very big. I bet you'd be hard put to tell a millimetre and a half tide from the ordinary little waves on the shore there.

To work out the size of Silver Lake, we'd probably be reduced to measuring the amount of road a legion can march during a day (normal day, not one of Cat's short cuts), for a known pair of points, from one city to another, say. And then extending that until we have some idea how big Calernia is, and what proportion of the landmass the lakes represent.

On the OTHER hand...

The Wasaliti River runs from ONE EXIT TO THE SEA to ANOTHER EXIT TO THE SEA. The only way I can see this working is if it flows inland (like the tidal bore up the Severn!) at one river-mouth, and flows out the other end – except it's doing this so it exits at both mouths of the river simultaneously, so the Wasaliti is actually FLOWING IN TWO DIRECTIONS AT ONCE!

And we're going to worry if the lakes have tides? 😊

I don't have a problem with this, for what it's worth. The continent has been severely fucked over by magic, time and time again. I think they're lucky to have got away with a river that flows in two directions simultaneously. Things could have been much worse.

Wiki tells me there are plenty of freshwater crabs. Bring own bucket.

Liliet

Wasaliti is a sea channel and not a river and you can't tell me otherwise. It doesn't actually flow anywhere, it's just straight up a crack in landscape, including through a MOUNTAIN RANGE. Ship navigable through said mountain range, because it's explicitly a trade route with Free Cities.

Mary Gentle

Do we know the Wasaliti doesn't flow? (Serious question, I can't remember if it was mentioned in the last 6.5 books.)

It has the Isle of the Blessed in the middle somewhere, don't the waters flow past that?

Trying to think of an equivalent length of sea channel in our world – off to look at Google Earth...

Liliet

No, no we don't. It's fanon explaining how the FUCK-
hakureireimu

There are freshwater crabs

Rey d`Tutto

Mud crab tastes like mud.

Dungeness is the low end of what I consider Crab. Snow and King are superior tastes, but grow in difficulty of extraction.

I believe there are freshwater crab that don't taste like regret... But I ain't been introduced to them yet.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Saw a mudcrab the other day. Horrible creatures.

BueWinds

I am left with one burning question from this chapter:
What was the third miracle Akua stole from the godhead?

Daniel E

I'm surprised this hasn't come up yet. What do we call the embodiment of Below's Stories? The Sword Of Everything Else; Unoriginal ; Pointy End Facing The Enemy

shikkarasu

I want to see someone pick up the Severity and the Everything Else, then fight Ranger with them. I think I would be OK with the end of Calernia if we could just see that match on Pay-per-Scry before the undead overtake us.

Reader in the Night

Call it the Sword of Get to The Point.

Adrian_V

Convincing Argument? Pointed Argument?

Mary Gentle

"That's A Likely Story"?

Liliet

The Sword Of Other Things

mavant

I find myself experiencing an unexpected pang of sympathy for Moren and a grief too ancient too understand.

Liliet

Mhm.

Wonder if it was another who remembered pre-Night.

Mary Gentle

I'm really glad the Tombmaker survived.

Been thinking for the last couple of chapters that maybe it had death flags being planted on it. I don't know why, but I just really like Rumena. Maybe it's its sense of humour. 😊

Liliet

Rumena is fine.

Mary Gentle

Well, it WAS, but now you've said THAT...

That's right up there on a level with "this is all going just as I planned". 😊

Liliet

Historically, in this work, for me, no it really isn't.

Indrani's been alive since Book 4.

SuitorShooter

"Are you worthy?

Maybe tomorrow."

So damn cool. I love when Cat's plan is about having faith in people, and seeing it rewarded.

Rustlegion

So I have a question, I know that as far as nations go none of the ones that we've seen rate as world powers, with the exception of the dwarves and I'm assuming the Dead, but how do figures like The Hierophant or Warden stand as far as individual power?

MoreBeer

I'd assume Heirophant is sitting around the height of individual named strength. He's at least as strong as Amadeus or Laurence was, and is probably approaching Ranger.

Warden probably stands among the strongest of regional (ruler) names along with names like Dead King, who has continental influence.

IIRC there are three name tiers loosely grouped as to power. Transitional names, full names, ruler names. I don't think regional names are necessarily stronger in a fight (Ranger could surely kill any dread emperor or Good King) but they have more influence.

BargleNawdleZouss

QUESTION: now that Masego has his magic back, does he still have Wrest as an aspect?

Liliet

There's no particular reason for him to have LOST an Aspect, no :o)

Masego was already casual godslayer levels of terrifying.

This has just become, uh, casualer.

Rey d`Tutto

I don't know... Fly Causally...

shikkarasu

It does beg the question of what Wrest will be used for, now. Masego likely cannot surpass the limitation of one-spell-atta-time that all mages are subject to(yet). He can still shut down a Spellcaster with Wrest, but in a way that feels like an under-powered version of Take. Less permanent, Sorcery/Night only, and he can already imitate Miracles with the Gift, so he doesn't even gain the level of flexibility that Roland has with Confiscate & Use.

This is not to say that I see this as a problem or obstacle, I am hype for what new trick Masego will learn now that Wrest is a tool, less a crutch.

RandyTheTwin

This is why I read these books. Shit like this just awakens a deep hunger in my chest for more, even though I know I won't get any for another 20 chapters. Still, I can't wait.

Frivolous

Hey, ErraticErrata – Hope you remember that Catherine asked Rumena for Ishabog's remaining ear to decorate her hat with in Antecedents.

I hope that when we next see Catherine the ears are on her hat, though I'm not sure she actually wears a hat.

Liliet

That was for next time she talks with Kurosiv's gang. I doubt she will again.

Someperson

I would make a joke about Neshamah eating crow, but... That is almost explicitly what didn't happen.

Frivolous

I like that Yara screamed and that her eyes were wild. She seems desperate, frenzied.

Is she truly worried now, for perhaps the first time in her long long existence, or was she just acting and lying as usual?

I wish we could get an Interlude from her POV. I want to see what it's like for the Intercessor to be completely blind to stories, to answer some questions:

Does her memory for stories compensate in any way for her blindness to stories, or does it make it even worse?

Is her ability to Wander in any way affected or weakened by the loss of her Story-fu aspect? Does she still Wander where she's needed, yet now is unable to see why she's needed there, or does she now Wander to truly random places?

Not sure if we or she could tell the difference, though.

David Stone

I'm a god. How can you kill a god? What a grand and intoxicating innocence.

Frivolous

This is very late, but EE, if you read this, I'd like to know what kind of sword Catherine drew out of the Intercessor.

A short sword? A longsword? A rapier? Zweihander? A bastard sword? A katana?

Two edges or one?

What kind of sword it is would, I think, reveal something about Below and Below's stories.

I wonder if it's an executioner's sword, like Terminus Est.

shikkarasu

10 Denarii on an Arming Sword, fit for Catherine's height, same as she has been using since Book 1 as her default. The type of sword less reflecting where she acquired it, and more that she has Claimed it for herself.

Salt

If it's supposed to be Below-themed, imo it probably doesn't necessarily have a defined shape.

Below's entire thing has been all about being flexible, ever-changing, and ceaselessly growing. Any single shape for the sword wouldn't make sense to me, as once it's defined it'd be a rigid weapon fit for one specific purpose, dependent upon being unchanging in properties. Regardless what type of sword it is, that's more Above-themed than Below

It'd be more fitting if the sword was entirely undefined in terms of specific length, shape, etc... and just refused to allow itself to be defined by a single description. Either by details of it being very conspicuously omitted, or constantly changing in terms of how it's perceived. Basically having none of the strength that comes with the rigidity associated with a single shape, but being impossibly versatile and always having the potential to be a better fit for the situation

Frivolous

I'm also kind of worried about Masego. I think it very likely he'll ask to borrow the sword so he can study it.

And then he might lose one or both of his eyes when the experiment blows up in his face again.

gnaruscat

Nice!

Storm

This would have been so much cooler if Tomb came before it

Chapter 48: Root

“Summer’s friend, winter’s stranger; winter’s friend, stays forever.”

– Lycaonese saying

The Flowing Gardens would never be called that again.

The old enchantments here had unravelled, unmade by the greater powers that had run wild across islets and canals. What had been left behind was beautiful in the eeriest of ways. Moren’s final winter lingered, the luminescent trees and flowers trapped in ice – forever perfect, forever blooming. A pale carpet of snow that no footsteps could mar remained, sparing only the frozen canals. There the last echo of the ancient songs of the Garden remained, for under a layer of cracked ice water flowed and so the canals groaned out strange hymns that made the heart shiver. And at the heart of it all stood a broken throne, before which we had killed a god by raising another.

Loc Ynan’s corpse, scoured clean of the Dead King’s soul shard, remained there with a spear of yew through the heart.

It was a hallowed placed, for good or ill, and its beauty was not unlike that of the Firstborn: strange and terrible and keening like a broken heart. I stood among the paleness with an old friend at my side, his eyes – one mortal, one anything but – alight with wonder as he watched the wind thread through his fingers.

“It will snow,” Masego said, “every time the moon is full. I can see the echo.”

I hummed in agreement. I could feel it too, how tonight would return to this place again and again.

And it was not yet over, for all that we were all bone-tired, keep on our feet only by the strange febrile energy that came of victory and feeling it all coming together. That tonic would fade before long, but we still had a little while in us still. So the two of us, together, watched as Sve Noc embraced the divinity that the Hierophant had forged for them. The night thrummed, as if defiant of the dawn yet to come, and wind like a warm breath rippled across Serolen. I couldn't see it the way Masego could, his eye laying bare the truths of the world, but I trailed down my finger down the string of the story and smiled. The Sisters, at long last, were slipping the noose.

"Light and Night, huh," I murmured. "Symmetry in all things."

"Their godhead was flawed," Hierophant mused. "Split from the start. What they received they gave out, keeping part for themselves, but that was making a single broken god and a million godlings. The godhead is a trick of perspective, Catherine – it can be shared, but it cannot be divided."

So they'd fixed it, he and Akua. Gathered it all together again, dissolving the nails that bound all Firstborn to the Night, and handed it back to Sve Noc to put together into a true godhead. And now Sve Noc, the Sisters and the Crows and a hundred names more, were giving their gift away once more – but not in the same way they once had, oh no. Firstborn no longer held Night, no more than humans held Light: it was outside them, borrowed. Granted by a higher power.

"They won't like it," I quietly said. "Not at first. But they'll get used to it."

The worthy would still take and rise. Night could no longer be taken the old way, because now to harvest it from drow or others grew the Night as a whole instead of a Mighty's personal hoard, but there were still gains. No one had ever quite figured out what defined how much Light individuals were capable of wielding, answers varying from a birth talent to the depth of faith or strength of the body. There would be no such doubt over Night: the more one added to it, the more of it one could wield. As one's power grew, their body would change along the same lines holding much Night had once caused: indifference to age and silver eyes.

Sve Noc would not shortchange those who had fought for them, their loyal Mighty not suddenly faced with decrepitude.

I knew exactly what those changes would feel like because I'd already gone through them. My eye was not silver – not yet – but the rest? There were none, save perhaps Radegast the Guest, who could come close to wielding as much Night as I could. And as for age... I'd once told the Dead King the years would kill me and the old monster had just smiled, before answering – ah, but how many years would it take? Many, I knew. Enough that spending eleven years of my life to snuff out the Saint of Swords had not left a visible mark. I was not sure how to feel about having been the precursor to what Night would now grant, the first draft of the work.

"It won't matter," Masego said, openly pleased. "The Sisters have faith, now."

I almost smiled. Someone who did not know Hierophant might have taken that as a spurt of religiosity, but I knew better. He was being quite literal, because when he'd mended Night and guided Sve Noc into rebuilding it he'd done more than just smooth away a few hard edges. He'd fixed it, the flaw. Now it wasn't just a shoddy mantle of power that the Sisters bore and that... changed things. I raised my hand, a mirror to his, but it was not the wind I was grasping. It was threads, millions of them blooming. Night had been born finite, parceled from its very first breath, but that had changed. It was no longer something that could be counted or measured.

I watched the faith, the earnest belief of millions of drow swelling the godhead of Sve Noc, and let out a convulsive laugh. After all these years, all the sacrifices and the despair and the darkness, the two sisters had found the end of their winding road: they'd slipped the noose. The debt of the Firstborn would be wiped clean, the destruction they'd staved off with a loan and then Winter's flesh at last gone for food. They were no longer finite, their godhead a living and breathing truth, and so what did a few measly years mean for them to pay? Faith fed Night, fed its twin goddesses, and like a beacon in the dark their power filled the sky above us.

Sve Noc paid the old debt of the Twilight Sages, returned the years borrowed, and for them it was no different than a sigh. Time meant nothing to the immortal.

"How does it feel?" I asked.

Masego turned to look at me with his mortal eye.

"What does?"

"How does it feel," I smiled, "to be first man in Creation to ever make a Choir?"

Because that was what he and Akua had done, when it came down to it. In Night instead of Light, but that was a shallow difference when it came down to it. Should I call my patronesses angels of thievery and murder instead of gods, what would it change? And that, more than the rest, made it plain the scope of what he'd achieved to night. Because Choirs did not choose a single nation, and single people, and remain bound to them. They were not so... limited. And come morning, neither would Sve Noc be.

I gave it a month before the first goblin was blessed with Night.

Masego considered my words, face pensive.

"Do you remember," he finally said, "what the Queen of Summer said to me, when I tried to throw off her binding in Arcadia?"

After the Battle of Five Armies and One, I recalled, and it took me but a moment to recall the words.

"If you'd had a few years, Masego," I quoted. "You have not seen enough."

He smiled, closing his fingers around the wind.

"If I met her tomorrow," Hierophant simply said, "she would be wrong."

Nothing more need be said.

The two of us stood there, in companionable silence, until dawn came and pulled the final curtain over it all.

—

The First General gilded its patronesses new crown with fresh victories.

Three battles won in a day, Gloom-shards keeping the day's bite away from the Firstborn, and now the dead were on the backfoot. It was a matter of weeks until they were driven out entirely. General Ysengral used the time to purge Serolen of the most egregious traitors – an easy enough task, given that Sve Noc now refused them the wielding of Night – and consolidating our hold on the city. There was no organized resistance to the effort, the second apotheosis of the Crows and Kurosiv's murder having snuffed out any thought of rebellion in even the most hardline of the opposition. It was one thing to deny a god when you had the protection of another, but without that?

Only fools and the mad kept holding their spears, and those were made short work of.

I myself had another duty. I sat in what drow now called Verde Zyebug, the Garden of Dead Gods, and told the scribes of the Losara of what had happened. Not all, for some truths were better left buried, but enough. We sat among the snow whose cold never seemed to reach my bones and spoke, until day turned to night and day chased it away. I left the Garden exhausted, leaning on my staff, but there was more yet. My presence was required, for Cordelia Hasenbach had finally sought her audience with the Crows. The deal she had come to Serolen to strike was to be unveiled at last.

I limped my way to the temple-fortress, returning to the depths, and stopped by my quarters loon enough to wash. It was with fresh clothes and wet hair, still half-combed, that I made my way to the war council room where the princess would be allowed to make her case. I was, I found with mild amusement when I entered, the last to arrive. Two crows were perched on the back of my throne, so even the goddesses had gotten here before I did. Declining to apologize, I limped across the room and settled into my seat. On my left was Ysengral, and on my right Rumena – neither of which looked particularly interested in what Cordelia Hasenbach, standing before us straight-backed, had to say. She had won some respect by fostering the civil war among Kurosiv's sigil, but in the wake of our more recent victory that counted for less than before.

"Princess Cordelia," I said. "As First Under the Night, I grant you audience in this hall."

The fair-haired woman bowed, as was the etiquette. My words were pretty much a formality, given that though I had the highest status of the mortals in this room in practice it was Rumena and Ysengral that ran Serolen – and the Sisters who had the final say on agreements with Procer. I suspected that Sve Noc would take a step back as the years passed, distancing themselves from earthly affairs, but it would wait until the storm had passed. I felt a flicker of approval from Andronike.

"I thank you for the privilege," Cordelia calmly replied, straightening. "I come on behalf of First Princess Rozala and the Grand Alliance to offer treaties to the Empire Ever Dark."

If this were a Proceran court that'd be the part where we moved to a more comfortable setting, but that wasn't the way of things in Serolen. She'd be standing through it all while we sat, which I felt bad about but not enough to start standing on my bad leg. I flicked a look at Ysengral and gestured it could start speaking, letting the negotiations begin. In Chantant, since Hasen- Cordelia spoke no more than a few sentences of Crepuscular. The start of it was nothing unexpected, reaffirmation of the alliance against Keter and Rozala 'expressing her firm belief in the importance of our friendship' through her envoy, but then we got to the parts that mattered.

The promise to balance: Keter had been promised to the Herald of the Deeps for his support and to the Firstborn for theirs. It could not be held by both.

"You are not asked to cede lands that were promised to you," Cordelia plainly spoke. "The Kingdom of the Dead remains yours, whatever else is said today, and our talks concern only the acquisition from your empire of the Crown of the Dead as well as surroundings."

A map had been drawn and was now brought forward, one I'd seen before – it was the one the Herald had agreed with. The city of Keter and a significant but not particularly large amount of land around it were marked out. Enough farmland that the city could be fed without needing imports, that had been the calculation made. After we got all the poison out of the ground, anyway. Pretty phrasing on Cordelia's part, I thought, casting this as the Grand Alliance buying a claim from an ally instead of offering it to someone else. The Sisters were not so easily swayed, but presentation mattered if you wanted to keep trust.

"And why," General Rumena bluntly said, "should we care to cede a single thing to Procer? We have bled for every inch of that claim."

And now the moment of truth came, as I had genuinely no idea what Cordelia would bring forward. She'd been having trouble finding a price, I'd known that, but our last conversation had seen her declare she'd found it. She started out predictably enough, offering on behalf of Procer things the Firstborn would need after the war: seeds for fields, cattle to begin herds and goods made in Proceran cities. Neither Rumena nor Ysengral were sold, I could tell from their presence in the Night. They knew they could get all those things without needing to cede territory. But that had been the prologue, and then she got to the meat of the offer.

"You have been asked to bleed for the west," Cordelia acknowledged, eyes sliding to me for a moment before looking away. "To make sacrifices for human kingdoms few of you have ever seen. And none have ever paid you back for the losses, save in promises now bargained over."

"How can the word of humans be worth?" Ysengral scorned.

It did not bother to exclude me from that, but I didn't take offence. Mighty Ysengral was one of the Firstborn who believed that my being First Under the Night meant I wasn't human, not in the ways that mattered. Maybe not drow either, but far from cattle.

"I do not blame you for the mistrust," Cordelia said. "It was earned. And yet we need the Kingdom Under if we are to win against the Dead King, so sacrifices must be made."

Neither of the generals were pleased to hear that, and truthfully neither was I.

"So let Procer pay its share," the blue-eyed princess said. "We ask of you to cede territory, and so we offer to cede the Empire Ever Dark territory in turn."

I hid my surprise, feeling that of the others. Even Sve Noc. The map she brought forward this time marked the territory she proposed Procer was to cede and the sight of it had my eyebrows rising. It was a third of the Principality of Cleves, namely the northern third. Coastlands and rocks, little land good for farming, but if we won the war? The city of Cleves was in there, a natural harbour near the crossroads of the Grave, the Tomb and Lake Pavin. A natural harbour at the end of well-kept roads going south. It's going to be one of the trade centres of Calernia in the coming decades, I thought. One of the richest cities on the continent.

And there lay Cordelia's cleverness. Because she was giving away something hugely valuable, but for it to be valuable there needed to be trade between the Empire Ever Dark and Procer. And trade meant relations, meant a measure of peace. And that meant First Princess Rozala would sign the treaty, because peace with the Firstborn would be worth so much more to her than lands she did not hold and were infested with undead.

"A worthy offer," Mighty Rumena conceded.

"You are owed more," Cordelia frankly replied. "The Firstborn have stood by Procer in its darkest hour, dying by the thousands so that our realm might survive. And so I would return that pledge."

I leaned forward.

"On behalf of the Grand Alliance, I would offer this treaty and oath," the blonde princess said. "So long as the Grand Alliance and the Empire Ever Dark stand, I pledge that the full might of the Grand Alliance will be mustered in the defence of your empire in the face of any attack by the Kingdom Under and its vassals."

Ah, I smiled. So that's what you figured out. Loyalty. From our talk, she had decided that what the Empire Ever Dark really wanted – really needed – was a guarantee that never again would they be forced into another exodus. That never again would they stand against the dwarves without allies, without an alliance spanning half of Calernia and willing to make a fucking ruckus on their behalf. Cordelia kept talking, delicately making it known that the pledge would be written to stand even if members of the Grand Alliance had been suffering raids, but I was already leaning back in my seat with a pleased sigh.

I already knew how this would end.

—

I had not slept in too long when I found her.

It added a haze to all I saw, as if the edges of the world were blurred. Her, though, I saw clear as day. Akua was seated on a worn old paving stone that must've been ripped out of the street, looking at an altar that could not be more than a day or two old: a simple tile of ceramic, on which two crows had been painted in black. It was faint, but I could feel the power in there. Honest faith had been offered up to that tile, the kind that left ripples behind. And Akua Sahelian's golden eyes watched the altar with a distant look, the long skirt of her black dress draped about her seat. Cloth-of-silver drew the eye to her waist and only a single small pin kept her hair in place.

She was a vision, I thought, though of what I could not quite find the word for.

"Thinking of converting?" I asked.

An amused glance was flicked my way.

"Are the perks worth it?" she lightly asked.

"Eh," I shrugged. "I've seen better."

I felt the Komena's indignation echo from a distance, which only improved my mood. Akua chuckled, running her fingers gently across the dried paint.

"It is not a small thing that we did," she said. "In some ways, it might be the most consequential action we ever undertake."

"Ending Keter will beat that," I said. "Hard for Night to matter if there's no one left to use it."

She conceded the point with a nod but did not look entirely convinced. She wasn't entirely wrong, either. Keter had been beaten back before, but what we'd done here with the Night? It didn't really have a precedent, as far as I knew. It was just that this war with the Dead King wasn't like the others, even if it was hard to understand. Neshamah was laying it all on the line, this time, knowing it was the best shot at winning he'd ever get.

"How did dear Cordelia's talks go?" Akua idly asked.

I hummed.

"She's convinced them," I said. "Now all that's left is shaking hands with the dwarves."

"A most convincing woman, Cordelia Hasenbach," she mildly said.

I cocked an eyebrow. That hadn't entirely sounded like a compliment.

"That something you mind now?" I asked.

An assessing look, then she for some reason she looked satisfied.

"Not so long as she doesn't overstep," Akua vaguely replied, then offered me a smile.

I frowned at her, unsure what exactly that was supposed to mean. She thumbed the painted crows one last time, then withdrew her hand.

"Are we to depart from Serolen soon, my heart?" she asked.

"Two days at most," I said. "I am to... speak, before we go, but we will be marching on Keter with reinforcements after."

By now, the siege should have begun. And there were only a few days left before the Hellgates opened, not that I was too worried about that. Amadeus of the Green Stretch had, once more proving his mind was a steel trap, found a way out of that horror that was more than simply closing the gate. I'd ordered his legacy to be seen through to the end, and it would be. Akua nodded, eyes lingering on me.

"You did not come to tell me this," she stated, as if she knew it to be a fact.

I grimaced. Sometimes it still surprised me how well she could read me. It had snuck up on me, the way she'd become one of my closest friends. It might be a nightmarishly complicated thing, this relationship, but it was no less deep for that.

"I wanted to see how you are," I admitted. "Now that it's done."

She'd held a godhead in the palm of her hand, for a moment. And bent it to her will. But when she chose to use that power, what she'd done with it... I'd known Masego was her favourite of the Woe, but I'd not seen what she did coming. And even now, it did not feel entirely like a personal decision.

"How lightly you have learned to tiptoe in your old age, dearest," Akua drawled.

I grunted in displeasure.

"Fine," I said, eye turning to the crow-adorned tile. "You made a decision, that night."

Healing a friend over godhood. Once more lending her hand to a ritual that would change the world.

"Do you still stand by it?"

It was one thing to choose in the heat of the moment. But night's veil had passed and been replaced by the cold light of day. Akua did not answer at first. I snuck a glance at her and found she was staring at where I'd stopped: the crows on the tile.

"You told me once," Akua said, "that nothing could ever even the balance for the Folly."

I nodded, but she didn't see.

"Yes," I got out.

"I didn't really understand, then," Akua admitted. "I saw one hundred thousand lives and thought it was a heavy debt, but not beyond settling."

She breathed out.

"I learned differently in Praes," she murmured. "I saw..."

She fell silent.

"It ripples out," I murmured.

Those full lips stretched mirthlessly.

"It ripples out," Akua softly agreed. "More was lost than lives that day."

She looked down at her hand, clenching her fingers.

"It is not a debt I can repay," she said. "Not even should the rest of my days be spent on the labour. And so, for a time, I thought to do away with the thought entirely."

"And now?"

She hesitated.

"I like him," Akua confessed. "Masego. He reminds me of my father in a way that doesn't sting."

"So you wanted to help him," I said.

"All it took was a nudge," she mused. "I had the knowledge for it, and I was in the right place – at the right time. I felt so easy that the real question was why I shouldn't do it. And that was when I saw it, Catherine."

Golden eyes turned to me.

"It's not about whether the debt is repaid, is it?" she asked. "It never was."

She laughed, a little bleakly, and my heart clenched at the sound of it.

"It's about whether you're the sort of person who'll try," Akua said.

I licked my lips.

"Are you?"

"I don't know," Akua Sahelian admitted. "But sometimes, I want to be."

—

Fifteen thousand. That was the sum of the reinforcements that Sve Noc had agreed to send south to the siege of Keter, though more might follow if Radegast's victories continued to rack up. I was grateful they could rustle up that many to spare, after the rough year Serolen had suffered, and did not hide it from my patrons. Even more of a boon was the Might meant to lead the expedition.

"I swore in Iserre, Losara Queen," Mighty Rumena reminded me.

"Before nine years have passed," I muttered.

"Keter's gates will lie broken," the old drow finished. "I will keep not break my oath."

"It wouldn't be the same without you," I honestly replied.

The sincerity seemed to take it aback, which was rare enough I rather enjoyed it. Beyond the mustered sigils, though, there was another duty left to me in Serolen. Much had happened in the city since I came, and though in time the words set down my scribes – which would follow me south, as part of the Losara contingent under Ivah – would spread among the people, there was a need for a more settled conclusion. An end to the journey that had begun on the outskirts of the Gloom and taken us all the way here to Serolen, the entwining of my fate with the Firstborn's coming to the end of the road. All we had left now was Keter, but I owed more than that before my mantle was passed to another.

And so the Firstborn gathered to the Garden of Dead Gods.

A tide of grey flesh as far as the eye could see, from the lowest of nisi to the heights of the Ten Generals. One hundred thousand, two? I could not tell, and the Sisters whispered in my ear that it didn't matter. I was First Under the Night: sooner or later, all drow heard my words. I had not needed to carry word north of the reforms of Iserre for them to bear fruit. So I stood before a people not mine – sometimes close, but never quite – and leaned on my staff. The eyes on me were not only those of the few, the Mighty, but of all who dwelled in Serolen. How many of these nisi and dzulu had never so much as caught a glimpse of the First Under the Night before today?

It was not my place to fix these people, to mend their broken pieces. I did not understand them enough for that, and even if I did would they want the meddling of my hand? No, I had been chosen as the herald of the Crows because I was the stranger. The dark mirror through which they could look at themselves, the asker of questions. And that was what I had to offer them, today.

"In the depths of Twilight," I said, "I asked you something."

A pause.

"Are you worthy?"

Sa vrede. And that harsh question I had once castigated the Mighty through was no longer simply that. It was a ritual now, now, something that they owned more than me. And Ivah, oh Ivah had made something true of it. Something worth believing in. Sa vrede, I asked them. Cera aine, the Firstborn answered, as they once had in Twilight.

Maybe tomorrow.

"You have come," I said, "a long way. But a long way yet lies ahead of you."

I looked at the ocean of faces, the shining eyes and those that Night had not yet silvered.

"So I must ask you," I said. "Who do you want to be, children of the Ever Dark?"

I looked behind me, at the god slain with a spear.

"Will you reach for the Heavens with hungry hands?" I asked. "There is glory in the Old War, let none tell you otherwise. In defiance against the tyranny of the sun."

I looked at the blue sky above, the endless expanse that held so much promise.

"Or perhaps you would take the winding path," I said. "Make accords, raise stones. There, too, there is glory – in casting aside the old empire to make one greater. To conquer peace as you have conquered war."

My one-eyed gaze swept them.

"I ask you again, children of the Ever Dark," I said, voice echoing. "Who do you want to be?"

Some answered, words or curses or oaths, but they were few and one answer was louder than all the rest: silence.

"That, too, is an answer," I gently told them.

And not a bad one. Ignorance was a blank slate.

"The choices are yours," I told them, warned them. "So hear me now-"

I extended my arms, encompassing all the world around us.

"These are no longer the Burning Lands," I said. "Do not look back, for there is no path there to be found. Your home is here, and so you receive the greatest of gifts: in this strange land, your fate is your own."

I leaned forward, smiling toothily.

"Struggle and rise," I told them. "Struggle and fall. But, above all, struggle."

I struck the ground with my staff and the earth shivered,

"Today," I told them, "you have nothing."

Or so little, I thought, that there was hardly a difference.

"But tomorrow? Tomorrow is an empire there for your taking."

They were an old people, the Firstborn, but made young again. Let them not waste that chance.

"So go out into the world, children of the Night, and carry with you my blessing and my curse."

I laughed, and thousands shivered.

"May you ever get what you deserve."

*arcanavita*15

Holy Shit the choir of night!!! The sisters are now Night Choirs and Night is now similar to Light!!

dadycool

It always felt like Night was supposed to be the answer to Light, now it really is.

Kletanio

It never balanced right that "Light" and "Sorcery" were opposites.

Dome Zasrekh

Sorcery was always inferior to light, just more versatile.

SeventhSolar

I liked that dichotomy. The power of the divine vs. the efforts of mortals. The sanctioned and the blasphemous. The soul and the mind.

sengachi

There are many dichotomies in Guide and I love them all.

Liliet

They never were.

ruduen

Boost!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Quite a lot to process. Surprise among surprises, it seems like Akua might... get it now. Of course, it's hard to say just what that's going to mean when they actually reach the end of the journey.

I wasn't sure whether or not we'd see the resolution here or be jumping back to the way, but it seems there's little time for respite – back into the breach they go.

Liliet

Is that actually surprising???

burlindw

I am very excited to see Night wielding goblins. The Matrons will be pissed though; Night will act as an equalizer that they will have difficulty controlling, so there'll probably be some conflict there.

pyrohawk21

It's even worse, because their standard response is to throw assassins at the target. Because the wounds caused dealing with all them cost more than any benefit their deaths could give, thus ensuring eventually one assassin will succeed.

But now? With Night? All those deaths mean more plentiful and rich sacrifices to give to the Night. Meaning now they need to have very effective assassins which will succeed with the fewest deaths possible.

You know what they call those? Rivals.

Komplode

Imagine a secret alliance of normal gobos keeping the matrons in check!

Hellspirit

It is called "the great goblin conspiracy"

Rynjin

Now I'm even sadder about Robber's demise. So close to being able to realize his true, even more terrifying potential.

nimelennar

All would have trembled at the sight of the Greater Footrest.

shikkarasu

Wait until Cat comes to Collect on her debts. There's nothing to say that Robber is gone forever. Cat's first trick was Necromancy, and it has grown as much as her habit of making trinkets from the souls of the fallen.

Night! Robber is no more impossible than anything else the Woe have done.

Cpt. Obvious

How I wish we could see that. But unfortunately there's no corpse to reanimate, and so far Cat has needed that. And I doubt his ghost is lingering. If anything the Gobbler probably made sure to grab him asap. Such a tasty soul...

RoflCat

I can see them pulling the old goblin gambit of having some split off to try the new thing i.e. some Matrons convert, some try to keep the old ways.

Whichever way the dice roll, the goblins live on.

I can see Night becoming their equivalent to Christianity, with the old ways becoming the witchcraft/pagan path down history. And of course Catherine is the Snark Jesus.

Aureum

Imagine Goblin Ammunition with Night.

Rey d`Tutto

Dark Goblinfire?
Light it once on Keter. Wait.
No more Keter.

Tenthyr

Night rich male goblins will be ageless. Goblin society is about to shatter in the best way. Pickler will be delighted...

Someperson

Especially seeing as a longer lifespan is one of the biggest concrete difference that the matrons hold over the rank and file goblins, and extending one's lifespan is literally the oldest miracle granted by Night.

dadycool

It's very hard to follow a climax like Hollow; Hallow, but this somehow managed to stand with its own glory. And at the end of it, Cat gave voice to a truth everyone saw way back when she first encountered the Empire Ever Dark: Here was a nation of people just like her. Strugglers.

Mirror Night

I am also curious about what determines the amount of Light lol. It seems super imbalanced even among Heroes.

burlindw

Some sort of weird measure of piety or faith probably. Not by human standards of either, as it's meted out by angels and gods, but I think its a sound guess.

arcanavitael5

I think it depends on the story and narrative of an person how good are they, how important is their story, what type of good are they things like that.

erebus42

A roll of a Divine D12

arcanavitael5

I feel like that speech in the end shows how far everyone has come as individuals and as a people it has a bit of the talk from Akua from it with the whole who do you want to be, it also shows how far the Firstborn as a people have come they are as Cat said a blank slate. Odin vibes from Cat intensifies.

Raved Thrad

A couple of thoughts:

1. If it's inevitable that goblins will be able to wield Night, then what about the Armies of Callow? What of all the soldiers marching to banners with crows' wings painted on them? How long before the House Insurgent is marching alongside the Callowan chapter of the Priests of Night?
2. Akua is really starting to grow on me, if only because she reminds me of one of my favorite old characters, from Baldur's Gate: Viconia deVir. My paladin romanced her, and when I carried my game over to Baldur's Gate II I managed to turn her from NE to TN. So many memories. I hope she gets a better ending.
3. If Night can hold back aging, does that mean that we might, in future, see (functionally) immortal Night-wielding goblins? Should Calernia be afraid? Is the Gobbler running away in fear yet?

dadycool

It utterly tickles me to think of the rivalry that would arise from the two Callowan faiths.

I think the Gobbler would cackle all the day long.

Salt

Even if they're not functionally immortal, just the idea of a long-lived Night-Powered goblin is fucking terrifying. I don't know if Catherine fully realizes what kind of a horror this is going to be, it's no joke.

Goblins are incredibly intelligent, wickedly cunning, and insanely adaptable. They're also natural engineers, thieves, alchemists, and assassins. They have so much potential that they tend to be an absolute terror if they even manage to live long enough to be a teenager. The only reason they're not a greater force on the continent is because of their two crippling weaknesses – a short lifespan and being incredibly weak individually. Both of which the Night solves perfectly.

The only thing they have to do is worship deities of theft-in-murder who have no real morals to speak of, and in exchange they get a bag of tricks and power that (according to Catherine) can grow infinitely as long as they continue to murder and steal. Which is basically all they do anyway.

Give it a few centuries, and the goblins are going to start producing their equivalent of Horned Lords through the Night. Except unlike Horned Lords, whatever the hells you call an ancient Night-Powered goblin is going to have intellect and cunning that matches or outright exceeds the power they have. The greatest of the goblins, if they reach their full potential in the Night, could legitimately make demons and Named Horned Lords look like schoolchildren.

aurikdomi

Horned lords do supposedly hold the intellect and cunning that matches their power

shikkarasu

I doubt most Callowans will be bloodthirsty enough to attract Sve Noc's favour. Too many farmers trying to protect their home, not enough hubris. Goblins, on the other hand, were roughly following the Tenets of Night before Night even existed, and added the Crows to their worship almost immediately.

That's not to say Callow won't have any Night users, I just don't see it growing near as influential among humans as the House of Light, or even House Insurgent.

Rey d`Tutto

The Long Price.

Callowan Grudge.

There will only be a few, but those few... Don't Piss Them Off. Callowan Night Villains could just be ol' Jeb/Jess, out on his/her back 40, who the gangs, bandits, and assorted scumbags learn not to disturb.

Theft and Murder and Vengeance. And a relatively peaceful area where the Villain makes his/her home

erebus42

Is...is Akua jealous of Cornelia?

That was a nice callback to Struggle

I wonder if now that the sister's are true goddesses and the Night has been stabilized if it won't be as much of a pushover to Light and Sorcery.

Also if the sisters can be considered the "Choir" of Night, Theft, and/or Murder I wonder what "Choir" Masego will form when he finally achieves apotheosis. The Choir of Sorcery? The Choir of Knowledge? The Choir of Stiklers?

erebus42

*Cordelia

SeventhSolar

I trust in Masego not to disappoint. When he breaks his way out of reality, he'll leave behind a Choir-shaped hole. It will be utterly fascinating and drive all who view it mad as they stumble halfway out of reality themselves.

nimelennar

I definitely think Akua is jealous. An attractive woman, who is now on a first-name basis with Cat, who was previously her rival and equal but now is in a more cooperative relationship, someone who has wronged Cat much less than Akua has, and for better reasons? The only other person who could relate to Cat so strongly would be Malicia, and that's more of an "evil stepmom" vibe than a romantic one.

I don't particularly ship Cat with anyone (at least since the Kilian ship sank), but I can definitely see why Akua would have something to worry about here.

erebus42

"What are you doing Evil Stepmom?"

But in all seriousness, I would agree that there definitely seems to be symmetry between Akua and Cordelia, though I think in terms of historical and intimate weight I'd still say Akua has the edge between the two.

Liliet

Yeah, but Cat has not sworn a solemn oath to never sleep with Cordelia...

(Which, admittedly, she technically hasn't for Akua either, but I'm sure you know what I mean)

Mary Gentle

"Is...is Akua jealous of Cornelia?"

Remember waaaay back, when Killian told Cat "You're rather horrible at this"?

Cat's still horrible at this. 😊

If Cornelia and Ubua turn up naked together in Cat's bed, I can see Cat asking "Oh... Is there a blanket shortage?"

erebus42

To be fair, at least with Akua, she has been suggestively dancing around Cat from the start. Granted their feelings do seem to be genuinely coming to a head now but still...

Rey d`Tutto

I am a bad man.

I want a (cannon or not) Cordy + Akua + Cat fanservice chapter.

Yep, I'm going' to hell.

edrey

i was half hopping that they would trick the forever king in paying the debt but this still a good end for the drow arc, a choir of night, Dark angels? it fit the seven and one pattern, and make calernia one of the most special places in creation.

erebus42

Honestly, I'm still kinda hoping that we'll get an elf vs. Drow showdown -even if it's just a one on one.

Salt

Rumena might be one of the only living individuals on the continent that can match the elves in all three categories of power, skill, and shameless rage-inducing arrogance. On top of that, it's highly likely that even the Emerald Swords don't have a way to defend against the Secret of Scathing Retorts. It'd be a show for the ages

erebus42

Even should the elf survive I imagine the emotional wounds would never heal.

Harrison

They will carry it with them for the rest of their lives.

Konstantin von Karstein

We don't know the exact number of Choirs, so no 7 and 1 here 😊

mavant

The ones we've seen are all named from the traditional Jewish angelic hierarchy, so I would assume there are ten.

Liliet

"Types of angels" don't 1:1 correspond with choirs, we've heard of at least one type (either seraphim or cherubim) called out as being a part of two separate choirs. There's no fixed number of choirs iirc

Rey d`Tutto

No, there are a fixed number of Choirs, and Angels. Which is why Angelic Corpses are such a big deal. Even when an Angel dies, the Choirs' Numbers are still inviolate. Logic be damned. Their number doesn't change. There are an ever-changing number of Hells, and an amorphous amount of demons, devils, imps... More Order vs Chaos than Good vs Evil.

Liliet

> No, there are a fixed number of Choirs, and Angels.

Hmm. Let's dig into WoE:

> Xinci:

> Ah, yes I did want to know if this is spoilery or not. But have Choir names changed over time? Like Strength to Fortitude?

> EE:

> Choir names have changed, yes
some names refer to the same without people being aware of it

> Tzeentch:

> Probably gets asked a lot, but is there a complete list of Choirs? Or even a more filled out partial list?

> EE:

> no complete Choir list, never saw a need

> hakureireimu:

> Are servants of Heaven also Angels in Yan Tei, or they something different.

> EE:

> no angels in Yan Tei lands

> Liliet The Adorable Nerd:

> are Choirs the same everywhere or do they vary by culture?

> EE:

> interpretation of Choirs varies by culture and era

> There's twenty-three different kinds of demons, related to the first twenty-three Hells. Devils are beyond count in both amounts and kind. As for angels, the actual number of Choirs is hotly debated by scholars – heroes don't know, since it's unheard of to be affiliated to more than one.

> There's a great many choirs, so listing them in their entirety would be more confusing than helpful.

> "Q: What are all the Angelic choirs

> A: I believe I've been asked that question before, but pretty much there's enough that listing them is pointless since only a few of them will ever be relevant to the story. Other Choirs have already been mentioned, though, notably Mercy and Compassion."

...so all this doesn't technically contradict the number of choirs being fixed yea. we just don't know how many there are 😊

Certainly more than ten though, is what I'm getting from this

Reader in the Night

Fuck. That was... Powerful. That whole chapter, was immensely powerful. To kill a God, is a single moment of glory, albeit great. But this speech from Cat will be one to echo through the ages.

And not just among the Drow, because the Children of the Night are now all those who Struggle. Honestly, Catherine's Creation of an Evil religion that asks the question "Are you worthy?" might be a greater contribution to ending the Old Order than even the Accords would ever be.

Because the Worthy take, the Worthy rise. But the Worthy are cautioned against stealing power they didn't earn, and that can stop a great deal of Evil's self-destructive tendencies.

dadycool

Oh, fuck. Every street rat and urchin will suddenly feel empowered by the Carrion.

Reader in the Night

In Calernia, Evil is all about DIY, and now everyone who keeps to the faith of "take what you need instead of expecting it to be handed to you" will have a Patron Goddess on their corner (as long as they don't ask for more than they give).

KageLupus

Calernia is full to the brim with people who follow the tenets of the House of Light but cannot wield that power.

You still need the ability to channel the power, Night is just different in that it has a built in level-up mechanic if you can contribute more Night to the pool. But how much Night is that little street urchin really going to contribute?

Also, the main point of the original Tenets of Night was a focus on power above all, not just theft. Taking Night from a fallen foe was simply your due because the strong rise. Even now after the Hallowing the same basic system is in place. A Drow wouldn't increase their personal store of Night by killing another Drow now, but murder is still how you increase Night in general.

So a street urchin who stole an apple would not warrant the attention of the Goddesses, and even if that urchin killed a merchant for the apple they probably wouldn't care. But if that urchin was decked out in Crow iconography and prayed for the strength to murder a merchant (and meant it), that might be enough to get the ball rolling.

Salt

I don't know about making fanciful prayers or wearing religious garb making a difference. Seems way too shallow and definitely way too human, not something the Sisters would appreciate

The Sisters are mortals that reached apotheosis by rebelling against the Twilight sages to save their people, endured watching the remains of their people cannibalize each other for millennia while barely kept together a flawed godhead, and slipped the noose by taking a leap of faith that resulted in actual death after being mauled by the Dead King and their own followers.

They're going to look favourably on one thing, in the end – people who have that same spark that they once did as mortals themselves. They'll only pay attention to people who are willing to endlessly fight to be more than the hand that was dealt to them, and they'll only reward them with one thing – the opportunity to make that spark into something great with their own hands.

The street urchins that have enough fire in them would likely get an offer, the same way choirs like Judgement and Contrition give offers to mortals that fit their own ideals. If they accept, they'll be given nothing at all (or at least nothing permanent) except the ability to harvest night. Basically a single path out of the pit in a hopeless situation, and if they can make the best use of it to build themselves up bit by bit? Great, they deserve it. If they fail to grasp that opportunity and become great? That's fine too, they weren't worthy.

As far as what the poor urchin child could contribute to the Night? That's secondary. Contributions will come naturally through the act of taking, and if they manage to become great people through the Night it's a foregone conclusion that their contributions will be proportionally great. What matters isn't how much they can contribute right then and there, so much as whether they have the mindset and potential to get there eventually.

'Ladi Williams

Why is everyone limiting Night to street urchins though? The Noble that has proven to have a fire or a "spark" as @salt has said gets noticed. Basically anyone that embodies the ideal of the sisters gets noticed.

Salt

I don't think anyone is limiting it to street urchins so much as that just being the topic to begin with in this particular comment chain lol. Realistically it's whoever and 'what'ever the Sisters approve of, ideologically.

Every single random orphan among the endless multitude gaining potential to upset the balance of power also tends to make for a much bigger potential change though, compared to a few nobles among their already limited number potentially gaining more power on top of the power they already have, so the former is more worth discussing imo. It's analogous to how the army getting more tanks isn't even worth discussing, but potentially every single civilian alive getting their own personal tank out of nowhere is kind of a big deal.

Big I

I think the most likely human Named to get access to the Night would be a Hunter, or a Slayer from Levant.

Salt

That's a very interesting point, Levantine culture for slayers especially does seem to fit in well with the tenets of night. Levant is a Good nation, traditionally, that the likes of the Barrow Sword are trying to turn more grey, so it'd be interesting to see how that changes the culture of Levant long term.

'Ladi Williams

Holy Shit!

I still maintain this would be an awesome series if they can somehow capture the spirit of the Story!

I want that lady that played Ayra Stark to act as Cat in the series...she's a scrapper!

'Ladi Williams

I also can't wait to see the dead kings comeuppance...grins like Cat

Liliet

Animation only.

'Ladi Williams

Animation wouldn't reach a very wide audience.

That's the only issue I have with animation...

If it wasn't animation...that guy that played Gandalf automatically goes for the Grey Pilgrim..

Aqua man would be the Kingfisher Prince.

Iron Man (End game) would be Rogue Sorcerer...

I don't know their names that's why I use movie roles to describe them...lol

shikkarasu

lol, after Khal Drogo and Ronin I can't imagine Aquaman as the Kingfisher Prince. He feels much more Barrow Sword.

I'm with Liliet, though; this needs to be animated. Think Avatar or the Netflix Castlevania.

John Pratt

The Grey Pilgrim has been firmly Middle Eastern in my mind since his introduction, just because of the name. His last name "Isbili" and the way his early life in Levant is described make me think of a descendent of Mohamud becoming a holy scholar. So I think I'd cast that guardian guy from "The Mummy" assuming his hair has gotten that salt and pepper look by now.

Liliet

Levantines were specifically called out as looking like "cousins to Taghreb" and we've heard that Taghreb legend that basically says they had once been brought to the south of Praes as slaves. So yeah.

'Ladi Williams

You are right. I fucked up on the Pilgrim cast...and @Liiliet has turn me a new one on some other casts...Lool. Who would you cast as

1. Masego
2. Black
3. Indrani
4. Captain

At least you agree with my choice for Cat...right?

Rey d`Tutto

Masego? John Boyega. As much as I loathe the Star Wars non-Machete films, his acting brought life to a Corpse-like script.

Black? Bruce Williams.

Indrani? Gal Godot or Salma Hayek.

Captain? Gwendolyn Christie in lotsa makeup.

Who would play Scribe? Sigourney Weaver.

Hanno? I'm drawing a blank on his description.

Wandering Bard = How many Actresses, exactly?

Cordy? Theif/Princess Dartwick?

Dead King? Morgan Freeman just for the MindF*ck.

Akua? Sophie Turner.

Who am I forgetting...

BargleNawdleZouss

Tariq Isbili and the Levantines have always been Ottoman Turks in my mind, rather than Arabic. To ignorant Americans such as myself, this might account for the "cousins of the Taghreb" feel between the two cultures.

Rey d`Tutto

As an ignorant American, I resemble that remark.

As Carlin said, we fought the Germans because they were horning in on our action in attacking little brown people.

I love my Country. My Government?

Yeah, I have Afghani as In-laws. I know the world is bigger than I can know. And a lot of it happens in Europe, the Middle East, Africa, and South America that I can't get "News" on.

And I read the NY Post, RT, Al Jazeera, BBC, Epic Times ... Ive learned to read between the propaganda. Everybody has their own agenda/spin.

But not much is being said.

Anyhoo, thanks.

Allafterme

Curious, as a Turk I always thought them as Andalusians before the Reconquista.

Liliet

I disagree with Iron Man being Rorgue Sorcerer SO MUCH I can't even describe it.

Animation or bust, and tbh I don't care about audience size nearly as much, like... even a tenth as much. Live action for Guide is a horrifying idea, like you just know they'll fuck up all ethnicities (like the Gandalf guy for Tariq... who is Levantine... which are arabic... which Ian McKellen is very not), all large battles or large sorceries (just due to technical limitations) and all appearance details other than ethnicities too. Just... no. No, god, absolutely not, never, I do not consent to this. I know nobody's asking me, but... blaargh. Ew.

'Ladi Williams

Lmfao... I can just imagine you shuddering while typing this...lol.

Yeah... I fucked up on the casting of Grey Pilgrim... I now remember he was Arab-ish...but why do you disagree with the Rogue Sorcerer casting also...oh, you can't describe your dislike and disagreement...lmao.

Okay...you guys win...animation it is...they should just please please please do it...and do it well...

But please twll.me you agree with my cast for Cat.

And maybe Angelina Jolie for Ranger. Who would you cast Black as? Or Indrani? Oh, who's going to do Masego?

I would probably have as much fun casting this series.

Liliet

My best attempt at description of my disagreement:
REALLY DIFFERENT VIBES. Robert Downey Jr is... boisterous and larger than life, while Roland is more subdued, as low key as he manages to be and dryly snarky.

Is Angelina Jolie Korean?

Also, I know like 3 actors, all of them from MCU. I am NOT a live action person.

Who is your cast for Cat? And are they half Native American (of specific tribes too) like Cat is?

Liliet

(Like, I don't know that many actors, and I DEFINITELY don't know that many actors WHO AREN'T WHITE.

Significant characters who are white are like... Amadeus (though tbh i hope ee will change that in a rewrite), Vivienne, Cordelia and uhhh peers closely Brandon Talbot? Rozala Malanza? Anne Kendall? John Farrier?

We're going into D-list here boys and girls)

Liliet

We do know EE would cast Cillian Murphy as Amadeus!

...but I honestly just hope EE changes Amadeus from white to mixed in rewrite. It would fit the lore w/ Duni being descendants of white people in the Empire (this was highlighted with the Thirteenth whose mixed children were viewed as Duni), AND it would fix the "white savior" vibes his storyline otherwise has. Would be a good thematic highlight of how the dominant ethnicity designates mixed people as "not us" in the way opposite from IRL – we have "white" and "not white", while they have "Soninke and Taghreb" and "not Soninke or Taghreb".

shikkarasu

Amadeus is Irish, who were not considered 'Caucasian' until the 1900s, because the concept of 'race' is so horrendously arbitrary that it beggars belief. The Duni are a very good addition to Praes for this reason: Praes is not the 'in-universe Africa;' it is the amalgamation of ethnicities that had the worst reputation in Britain, historically. The people that have been pointed to and labelled 'evil' or 'lesser' for no good reason, IRL. France is only excluded because of Procer, and Callow needed a 2nd aggressor nation for the plot.

Including the Duni in the Empire of Praes, who do not visibly fit with the theme from a 21st Century perspective, highlights how arbitrary racism really is. This is a group that, in 1800s, was considered lesser than 'white' humans by some, but in 2000s are considered the among whitest people out there. I think Catherine's "but you're Duni?" reaction to Killian being proud of her country is also a great scene that wouldn't work otherwise: just because you look like the people that hate you (Callowans) doesn't mean you 'pass' around them, or that you would want to.

Long story short: pasty white Praesi make about as much sense as the Wasaliti's status as a river, but I think they reinforce the overall theme of the story too much to change.

Liliet

Amadeus is what now?

Are you extrapolating from Kilian being red-haired?

Because she's the only Duni we hear of being so, and she's explicitly a descendant of one of the Wild Hunt... her coloration is not necessarily Duni-related.

Duni are descended of Miezens and Callowans. There's nothing Irish about them. Deoraithe are the Irish reference, their language is borrowed from them.

'Ladi Williams

Okay....this got intense...fast! Loveeet! grins madly

shikkarasu

Double-checked a few things and I was dead wrong. Need to do another revision of my notes. My brain probably got stuck on green stretch equalling emerald isle or some such. Thanks for the call out!

Abrakadabra

Amadeus being Irish is not about looks, but about how the Irish were treated in the empire is similar to how the Duni is treated in the empire.

Liliet

The analogy is not nearly as strong for him being Irish as for any number of other ethnicities in similar situations.

BargleNawdleZouss

Here's a random collection of actors that are my headcanon for certain roles. This is by NO means complete. Also, for The Woe, in reality they'd have to pick a bunch of 18- to 20-year old newcomers. This is just how I see them in my head while reading:

- Catherine Foundling: Zendaya
- Indrani: Priyanka Chopra Jonas
- Amadeus the Black Knight: Tom Cruise (1. He can do it. 2. He's vertically appropriate 3. Let's face it – his involvement would bring in ALL the investors)
- Wekesa the Warlock: RuPaul
- Dread Empress Malicia: Angela Bassett
- Robber: Peter Dinklage (Tyrion Lannister from Game of Thrones)
- Eudokia the Scribe: Glenn Close
- Dread Empress Triumphant (May She Never Return): Viola Davis
- Kairos Theodosian, the Tyrant: Timothee Chalamet

- Tariq Isibili, the Grey Pilgrim: Ian McKellen (yeah, I went with Gandalf, couldn't help it, that's how I see him in my head. He'd find the role redundant, I'm sure)
- William of Greenbury, the Lone Swordsman: Kit Harington (Jon Snow from Game of Thrones)
- Laurence de Montfort: Judi Dench or Meryl Streep
- Rafaella the Valiant Champion: Melissa McCarthy (she can bring the humor!)
- Roland de Beaumaraais, the Rogue Sorcerer: Ezra Miller (played The Flash in the Justice League movie)
- Prince Frederic Goethal, the Kingfisher Prince: Ryan Gosling or Chris Evans/Pine/Hemsworth.
- General Abigail of Summerholm: Kristen Schaal
- Hanno of Arwad: Chadwick Boseman (if only!)
- Dread Emperor Irritant I, the Oddly Successful: Chris Rock
- Princess Rozala Malanza of Aequitan: Catherine Zeta-Jones

Rynjin

Jesus Christ don't inflict a fucking nightmare like this on me.

'Ladi Williams

Lol

'Ladi Williams

I'm going to have to Google most of these artistes to know if I agree with your selection...but tentatively I agree with some of the ones I know...
What do you mean by Ian McKellen would find the role redundant? It has plenty of screen time and a major role in shaping the socio-policies of the entire continent...and he would feature big time in at least 5 seasons before he "dies".

BargleNawdleZouss

'Ladi Williams: as others have commented here, Tariq is similar enough to Gandalf from Lord of the Rings that I speculate Sir McKellen may not find it interesting. I would love for it to happen, don't get me wrong! 😊

shikkarasu

I think Ladi was being sarcastic, listing ways that Tariq the Grey (Pilgrim) is similar to Gandalf the Grey with a cheeky "but this time he won't die and come back in the first movie, it will be much later" at the end.

Rey d`Tutto

I think it's a reasonable idea to do this in animation, but given the MCU...

My Voice Actor choices would be much different than those I posted as a wishlist

Rey d`Tutto

Also, Saturday Morning Cartoon PGtE?

Take my Money!

Liliet

MCU is A big reason why i dont want to ever see Guide in live action

tawawara

"So go out into the world, children of the Night, and carry with you my blessing and my curse.

May you ever get what you deserve."

I got chills, man. Literal chills.

Salt

The second Tenet is going to make for some hilarious situations when defeated human foes tell a Drow that they'll get what they deserve one day, and the Drow reacts by being very approving that this cattle understands Drow culture so well

onedollargum

"I hope you get what you deserve" is a fantastic blessing and curse. Probably even higher than "May you live in interesting times".

arcanavitae15

The Carrion Choir is a good name I think for the choir of the night which is a callback to Amadeus and Catherine while also being fitting for the Drow who feed from corpses and the sisters favorite avatars of crows.

BargleNawdleZouss

I am enjoying that Cordelia has offered Cleves to the drow, when it was the Langevins of Cleves who attempted to plot against them and screw them out of the territory promised to them after the war.

ninegardens

Oh brutal.

Let it never be said that Cordelia doesn't know how to be petty.
Tactical AND petty.

sengachi

Holy hells I hadn't caught that, thank you for pointing it out!

Juff

Typo Thread:

hallowed placed > hallowed place keep on our > kept on our still had a little while in us still (two 'still's) down my finger down (two 'down's) for food > for good achieved to night > achieved tonight patronesses new > patronesses' new loon enough > long enough
I felt so easy > It felt so easy the Might meant > the Mighty meant keep not break (odd wording) down my scribes > down by my scribes drow heard > drow would hear now, now, > now,
"May you (extra space)

Frivolous

"Carry with you my blessing and my curse: may you ever get what you deserve."

– Extract from the 'Tenets Under Night', Firstborn religious text

The above is from Name (Redux). Something Catherine said that is not in the Parables of Lost and Found, and is not disputed.

Masego can call himself not mere Kingmaker but Godmaker. Awesome, no?

I suspect he is now close to apotheosis. Maybe very close. Maybe just a hop, skip, and a jump away from being not just Sve Noc's physician but also Sve Noc's peer.

What happened to the sword? Did Catherine absorb it already?

EE: If you didn't see my comments in the previous chapter, I'd like to know what kind of sword it was. Could you please describe it for us?

Also, if Catherine hasn't absorbed Below's stories, Masego will surely want to run experiments on the sword. Hopefully it doesn't blow up in his face like the Book of Some Things.

Frivolous

Addendum: I think that the exploits and hacks that Keter found for Night before this may no longer work as well, or work at all.

I think that is why Radegast won 3 victories in one night. Because Masego and Akua repaired the vulnerabilities in Night.

I think that if Neshamah tried now to use the same ritual he did at Hainaut, to usurp Night, it wouldn't work anymore.

Insanenoodlyguy

It won't, as noted here, each Drow with night was a little bit of sve noc. Lots of night in one place meant he could grasp and pull. This time, the string is dissonectable.

Liliet

I mean, the trap in Hainaut closed around Rumena having Komena riding on its shoulder. She was there in person.

MoreBeer

I suspect Radegast won due to Kurosiv's followers losing their Night. This seems to have been part of Cat's plan all along; to lose in such a way as to draw her enemies out right where she wanted them, for the moment triumph turns to ashes.

ChillyPepper

Ivah the God Slayer when?

shikkarasu

Maybe tomorrow

Sam

Something I've just realised: for most of those involved, the events of last chapter were the climax to a whole lot of preparation and will have world-shaking consequences, perhaps the most important thing they'll ever be involved in.

For Masego, it was a practice run.

Rey d`Tutto

"Tuesday"

Earl of Purple

Cat needs to go stare at Rumena or Ivah. Because now Night is equal and opposite Light, I think drow can get Names again. Maybe one of the other Ten Generals instead, if any live.

Syndic

Like "Rumena" isn't already a Name. Might be a bit weird to be a claimant of that, but that's only an issue if Rumena ever dies to free the Name up for the taking... 😊

(Also, giving Rumena additional powers feels like... going back to slap the baby you took candy from. Or taping dynamite to a nuke. Basically it feels like the only reason one would do that would be mocking whoever is on the receiving end of a Rumena beatdown.)

Liliet

> Basically it feels like the only reason one would do that would be mocking whoever is on the receiving end of a Rumena beatdown.

Are you telling me Below is above slapping a baby they took candy from?

SuitorShooter

I feel like Drow inheriting the literal Names, and the associated temperament and powerset, when that Drow died would be VERY on-brand for Drow. Respecting not the institution, but the personal cache of Night accrued by that individual, and expanding it with their own great deeds.

Someperson

Night prevented Drow from getting magic. Do we know that it prevented Names as well?

It's a reasonable assumption, seeing as there haven't been any Named drow as far as Cat is aware. But it might also have something to do with their stories, after all orcs only recently started getting Names again and I wouldn't be surprised if their time between the two Empires Ever Dark was not the most conducive to Named.

On an unrelated note, I have just realized that I can't think of a single character in this setting that can wield both sorcery and Light. I wonder if they are mutually exclusive on a spiritual level, or if it's just very different skillsets and mentalities required? Jaquinite sorcery at least does incorporate faith, but I'm pretty sure Masego would be less dismissive of them if any of them could actually manifest Light as part of their workings.

If Light and Night are truly similar to each other now, then I doubt many Drow will choose to forgo Night to pursue sorcery, even if they now have the ability to if they wanted.

Earl of Purple

I believe there's WoE on the discord that Night-as-it-was was already power from Below, and a Name on top of that would have been double-dipping, which Below disapproves of. Maybe it still does, but maybe because Night is now equal to Light, which can be granted alongside Names.

Given that Light interferes with sorcerous workings- hence why prayers etched onto the armour of Callowan knights offers protection from war-mages, Levantine binders' pets and why Hanno disrupted the enchantments on that bronze-clad Revenant last book or one before, on his way to rescue Nephele in a Lycaonese fortress- I'd say it's impossible to use both without Aspect trickery.

Someperson

Even if you can't use Light and sorcery at the same time, and even if learning them is not at all complementary, I guess I'm still a little surprised that nobody learns both.

They have different enough strengths and weaknesses that being able to choose which to rely on in a given situation isn't a trivial thing.

SuitorShooter

That would definitely be a spiritual thing. Skill with Light (and with Sorcery) leave a trace on the user, and those traces would absolutely interfere.

Xinci

Fitting I suppose, they started in a pit and made a microcosm of Below's patterns on Creation with Night. They have epitomized the virtues and methodology of its advancing permutations, so what better Angels could Below acquire? The existence of Night serves to perpetuate and permutate different methods and can be freely given tools to those who need to advance their methodology. Catherine gave it a month for the Drow, but I won't how long it will take for this to shift some of the methodologies of Villains over time. Adding to the Night still gives some pressure to take from others but at the same time very much incentivizes collective collaborative networks for such activities.

I would also suppose that Sve's focus on the bigger picture and distancing herself from mortal affairs may then be why we end up with some of the information that was given by Cat being disputable. Information can be stored and transmitted through Night, the words said is very applicable to transmission. However, as Sve presumably has control over that Night even now a mixture of who she deigns to give it to and calcification as time goes may leave gaps in the commonly propagated information throughout the Night. At least her blessed curse was carried on , whole, into the future.

nimelennar

"Neshamah was laying it all on the line, this time, knowing it was the best shot at winning he'd ever get."

I guess I don't see why this is still the case. The Bard has been taken out and the Villainous stories returned into play, under the control of the Warden, no less; basically all of Calernia is now united against him, probably soon including the Kingdom Under; the Drow have been reforged; and there's a weapon on its way North with the Dead King's Name on it, specifically forged to defeat him. Not to mention that Black has supposedly, somehow, found a way to neutralize the Hellgates.

Yesterday, sure, this was his best shot at winning he's ever get, but I don't see how that's still true today. If it were still an option (he's pissed off enough people at this point that it really, really isn't), I would take the L, retreat, fortify, and lock my wounds for a few millennia, if I were him.

shikkarasu

The Intercessor has been wounded for the first time since he came to learn of her existence, He already has most of Procer and in a few months he will have all of it, barring Salia. His opposition is headed by a Villain, and so not owed a last minute victory over him. The rest of the continent is starving, deep in debt, and desperate enough that if this next offence fails most of them will clamour over each other to take deals like what Kurosiv was promised.

It's hard to imagine that, even 2000 years from now, Nessie will have a better board to play on. Pulling back means that he will be out a lot of resources and will need to wait for the next crusade to gather more Revenants. A crusade that will have all of his current enemies' resources and more. He may be able to grow his fodder with the Serenity, but the backbone of his forces -the Scourges and other former Named- he only gets to replenish when they come for him.

Kletanio

One more detail: if Neshemah obtains Night he gets the power to permanently suppress the downsides of Evil Stories. If he doesn't go basically all-in on this one move, then his enemies will be able to turn back on his greatest vulnerability, and the next time he'll be in much worse shape. So not only does he have a legitimate shot of winning this thing as-is, he has a legitimate shot of making that much more certain. In other words, not only would his victory be assured, he could finally tell people that his victory was assured without disassuring it.

sengachi

The thing is, Black won in the face of overwhelming narrative disadvantage, it can be done. The trick he pioneered was not leaning into villainous tropes which earn a backlash and instead just being better than his opponent by building up his forces through means the 'Good wins' narrative couldn't contest. Things like logistical and hierarchal rationalization of the military, progressive racial inclusion, cultivating positive cultural identity, extensive training and strategic planning, etc. Then once he got to the battlefield, even if Callow won every single battle it was possible to win and pulled every possible rabbit out of the hat, the Legions of Terror were still going to win.

And the Dead King has kind of done the same thing. He's spent millennia building up his forces in Hell where narrative can't touch him. Procer has also lost a ton of its capacity to feed its people, which is something narrative can't just fix with a wave of its ephemeral hand. He also got a bunch of (maybe?) freebies while the villain stories were down (and if they're not freebies, well, he's about to eat the backlash regardless of what he does). He's in a position not dissimilar to Black, so long as he shows relative restraint with his apocalypse buttons from here out.

But in the future?

In the future the Dead King is fucked.

There's now a Warden who literally wields the stories of Above and Below, and her and all her successors will seek his death at every opportunity. That's gonna be a problem for him three thousand years down the road as surely as it is today. He is also completely encircled by the Kingdom Under, which will only reinforce its borders more as the years stretch on. The Firstborn have a new godhead which is only going to get more settled and powerful as the years go on, and they hate him with a burning passion. And the rest of Calernia is never going to be this weak again.

This is his last chance. He will never have a shot like this again.

Gabe Meadow

Indeed. And don't forget, for all that Cat won a big victory for the Firstborn here, it was a defeat Neshamah could afford. The siege of Keter is, after all, the Grand Alliance's last chance as well. They need to win outright here, and the Dead King has more than one to skin a Cat (pun intended).

If he deters the Kingdom Under from providing supplies, or gets them to break off in the middle of the siege, he wins. If he turns it into a grinding stalemate, he'll probably win in the end. Not to mention all the other nasty goodies he has stored away. Sure, the villain stories are back in play, but that didn't prevent him from pulling the triple Hellgate trick back at Hainaut when they were active.

Of course, if Kreios decides to lead the giants to war after all, the Alliance has another safeguard against those...

Liliet

Procer's still devastated, and the Hellgates are still about to open. And meanwhile retreat is not an option, as you have pointed out. Going all out is still Neshamah's best shot at victory simply because he's all out of the others.

Someperson

This tbh.

Neshamah could maybe pull out of Procer but he still doesn't exactly have anywhere to retreat to if Calernia is hellbent on storming Keter.

Dome Zasrekh

The reason he's chances are bad is why he can't retreat. They would hunt him down.

MoreBeer

Pretty sure Black's plan for the hellgates is thousands of devil-binding Praesi mages being on-site to take control of any/all devils that come through.

It was Cat's plan, but Black co-opted it to ensure Alaya couldn't be executed. And Amadeus died to make sure there was only the one way it could work.

arcanavitae15

I wonder if humans can use Night now in addition to other races which would be neat like maybe the orcs can get some because their whole hungering gods thing fits the theme of Night.

Someperson

No reason why they couldn't. Although Cat's guess about goblins being the first is probably a good one.

I wonder how long it will take for some kind of "Heretic" Name to pop up: a member of the House of Light that instead uses Night, or one of the Mighty that instead uses Light.

Sam

Or, for that matter, the first Night-wielding heroic name.

Dome Zasrekh

Unlikely, like Light in villains is not possible.

Rey d`Tutto

Anti-hero at best.

mavant

Akua ♥

BargleNawdleZouss

Further thoughts:

1. Imagines Robber imbued with the power of Night shivers
2. I'm surprised that neither Cat nor Masego made a comment about fixing the godhead of Sve Noc was good practice for Masego's own apotheosis. I do wonder what Masego will use as fuel/fodder for his own rite of ascension, however...
3. I'm glad that EE addressed the point about Cat sacrificing years of her life in order to kill the Saint Of Swords. As The Woe are all about the same age, I had expected some comment about a change in Cat's appearance, most likely from Indrani. I don't know if it's quite hanging a lampshade, but I appreciated the explanation regarding her villain's anti-aging status quo.

Liliet

> I'm surprised that neither Cat nor Masego made a comment about fixing the godhead of Sve Noc was good practice for Masego's own apotheosis.

That just goes without saying; Cat had remarked Masego would enjoy the project she's putting him on for a reason.

> I'm glad that EE addressed the point about Cat sacrificing years of her life in order to kill the Saint Of Swords. As The Woe are all about the same age, I had expected some comment about a change in Cat's appearance, most likely from Indrani.

This was stated directly back then. This is not a new explanation, just a callback.

> Four, five, six, I counted as she spoke, and she stiffened with the last. It was close, then. I'd wondered how long she would last. I touched me too, but Gods forgive me the touch was lighter than I'd believed it would be. The Dead King, it seemed, might have been terrifyingly correct.

Frivolous

I'm surprised and pleased to note that there are millions of drow.

I hadn't expected that from a race that doesn't care much for procreation. I thought their numbers were in the low hundreds of thousands at most.

Liliet

They'd sent fifty thousand of just the warriors (dzulu+) south with Cat as an "expedition" while also having the rest of their species mass evacuating and attacking the DK from the north. Math really wouldn't have worked out for "low hundreds of thousands".

Someperson

The Crows have become something akin to an angelic Choir, but...

Below already has the infinitely numerous hordes of devils and demons to serve as their reflection against Above's angels. I don't really see how they have a vacancy for the position, so to speak.

Makes me wonder.

What if the position the Crows are now occupying is somehow the one left behind by the Choir of Judgement?

May you ever get what you deserve, indeed.

Mary Gentle

Somewhere down among the devils, I hear the Tyrant of Helike laughing.

'Ladi Williams

Okay...Zendaya and Priyanka are solid matches so far...
RuPaul is another dead ringer...you are on fire!
Glenn Close is too old for scribe
Timothy Chalamet works for kairós...has the look already...lol
I disallow Jon snow for lone swordsman...I like Jon snow and lone swordsman not so much.
Judy Dench works...
Melissa McCarthy is perfect
Ezra Miller...? Meh
Kristen is good for the role...funny and all
Zeta Jones I don't really know...
Chadwick...*insert tears *
All in all...you did very good

BargleNawdleZouss

Yet more thoughts:

1. Now that the Grand Alliance is about to start the siege of Keter, I cannot wait to see what Pickler has put together for the assault. I'm hoping that goblin machinery can breach the walls and sweep the field, so that all the Names are fresh for the combat with the Dead King and his Revenants, demons, and rituals he's been keeping in reserve.

2. Elves and the Spring Crown – will we see an update, or is that plot point a red herring? If that pool of power is utilized, how will it affect Quartered Seasons and the weapon they've made of the Autumn Crown?

3. Bands of Five to be assembled for the final assault:

- The Woe, of course, as Team Autumn Crown: Warden, Warlord, Hierophant, Archer (Ranger?), Akua Sahelian
- Team Severance: White Knight, Witch of the Woods, Mirror Knight, Valiant Champion, Forsworn Healer
- Team Rogue's Angels: Rogue Sorcerer, Blessed Artificer, Silver Huntress, Silent Guardian, Vagrant Spear
- Teen Titans: Knight Errant, Apprentice, Stalwart Apostle, Page, Young Slayer
- Team Evil: Barrow Sword, Harrowed Witch, Royal Conjurer, Hunted Magician, Headhunter (this needs more muscle and/or a healer, but I'm not sure who else is left that'd be good in the field. The Red Knight seems like an even worse idea than the Headhunter, though)

Earl of Purple

Young Slayer's dead, and Harrowed Witch and Royal Conjurer already have a Band.

I'd love to see a Team Knight, though. If Hanno gets a Knight Name again, we'll have five confirmed knights- White, Black, Errant, Mirror and Red.

BargleNawdleZouss

Oh crap, I blanked on Young Slayer. Thanks! Possibly slide Blade Of Mercy into his slot, then, if Antoine has matured in judgement a little.

SuitorShooter

The only way to increase your personal power, increases the collective power. That's a hell of a trick for binding millions of psychopaths into a coherent nation.

Archaon

"Not so long as she doesn't overstep," Akua vaguely replied, then offered me a smile.

Dangit Akua, don't you get in the way of glorious CatDelia, the ship aint even sailed yet, but the boat is built!

Interlude: End Times II

"Dread Emperor Heinous led the Legions into the seventy-ninth Hell, and once the devils gathered an army in the face of his incursion he laughed and addressed his soldiers thus: 'Fear not disaster, sons and daughters of Praes, for of all the peoples of Creation it is our birthright alone to ride it as a steed.'"

– Extract from the Scroll of Vainglory, thirty-ninth of the Secret Histories of Praes (destroyed by order of Dread Empress Maleficent II, only partial texts remain)

It was tradition that a flying fortress not be named.

Dread Emperor Sorcerous had later made it into a law that no tyrant had since seen fit to repeal, but the tradition itself was as old as the first large rocks that Soninke sorcerers had raised into floating altars for their people to worship at. To give the constructs names, Alaya had been told, tended to make them... temperamental. Inimical's Boot was the example mages tended to quote at her, which after being given the name had begun accidentally crushing people the emperor disliked with alarming frequency and an even more alarming dearth of explanations about why it was doing that.

And so the fortress that Chancellor Alaya of the Confederation of Praes – a name yet to be officially ratified, but now that the Tribes had given ground she knew where the votes lay – rode had not been granted a name, though it didn't stop soldiers and servants from calling it the Limping Sister when they thought no one was listening. The sobriquet was apt enough: the construct was smaller than the three behemoths known as the Old Mothers that'd followed Catherine Foundling west, and of the smaller 'sisters' this one was by far the slowest.

"An imperfection in the central ritual array," High Lord Sargon had told her. "Too much bleed, it lets wind buffet the shields and slow us down."

"And the lights at night?" Alaya had asked, morbidly curious.

"Not ghosts, Your Grace, that is mere superstition," the High Lord of Wolof had been quick to assure her.

Perhaps a little too quick, she'd thought, and she muttered 'probably' she was fairly certain he'd added under his breath had done nothing to reassure her. The uncertainty left her to consider whether being haunted by the giant spiders used to raise the fortresses would be better or worse than being haunted by humans, which sadly was not even the most outlandish question Alaya had been forced to ponder over her many years of rule. That still remained whether or not devils, some of which considered souls a form of currency, should be made to pay taxes over any such gains made within the borders of Praes – and more specifically what the monetary value of a soul should be.

There had been spirited debated over the matter, some of her advisor even noting that if devils paid taxes they might be considered to be citizens of the Empire in some ways, and purely to piss her off Amadeus had returned to Ater with an entire treatise about- Alaya's stomach clenched. She heard the sound of the knife sinking into flesh, the small gasp as she stood there helpless, and the orc across the table paused in his sentence.

"Your Grace," General Grem One-Eye said, "is something the matter?"

I think you'd understand, One-Eye, Alaya thought. Better than most, for you loved him too. But she was not looking for understanding, much less comfort. Life had been breathed back into the husk she'd become so that she might serve a purpose, to serve as the bridge between the old Praes and the new, but Alaya of Satus knew better than to call it a second chance. There was too much blood on her hands for that, too many sins for her to answer for – and at the end of her road, the Warden would be waiting with a sword in hand. So what did it matter, that sometimes she came across a familiar turn of phrase in a report and she choked on a sob? She was not meant to escape the shadow she had cast, and so there could be no use at all in confiding in anyone.

Not even someone who'd understand.

"No," Alaya replied, tone smoothed into calm. "Please continue, general."

Grem One-Eye slowly nodded, then resumed his report on the estimated timing of the Praesi forces marching to reinforce the Grand Alliance's siege of Keter. Though in principle the private armies of the High Lords had all been disbanded when the soon-Confederation of Praes was founded in Ater, in practice that had not been feasible. Breaking up the armies and reorganizing them under the command of the Black Knight, High Marshal Nim, would take months that they simply could not spare. Instead the commanders of those armies had been temporarily drafted into the Legions as auxiliaries with their forces under them.

The sheer amount of supply trains that had involved was staggering, given that the armies of the High Lords were themselves made up of the armies of lesser lords, and it had been one of the reasons that Praes' armies had been staggered into three waves as they began marching west. Some of the house troops were acclimating to the changes better than others and General Grem was not shy in pointing out those that trailed behind: Takisha's lot were the worst offenders, the High Lady of Kahtan's already loose grip on her many vassals having further weakened since the Fall. Not that the need to acclimate was in short supply, these days.

Grem One-Eye had taken with good grace his demotion from being the senior military commander of the Empire to being a general under High Marshal Nim for the Confederation, but he could not quite hide the lost look that sometimes flickered across his rough face. While he'd been a prisoner the fate of Praes had passed him by, leaving him to emerge into a strange new world where he was not quite certain where he fit.

Alaya could sympathize.

"Warlord Hakram tells us that the Grand Alliance's main host will be arriving on the outskirts of Keter within the week," General Grem concluded, "which puts us in the area of fourteen days behind."

"Evidently it was the right decision to send the bulk of our sappers with Marshal Nim," High Lord Sargon said, offering up a boyishly crooked smile. "It is best that the siege works be in full swing when we arrive."

He'd grown, Alaya thought, into quite a dangerous young man now that his soul was no longer held in a box. Thought outwardly the High Lord of Wolof was dedicating himself to the campaign against Keter with great enthusiasm, Ime had already picked up on his longer game. He meant to gain acclaim from being instrumental to Praes' contributions to the war: most of the flying fortresses had been raised by Sargon and his cadres of Wolofite mages, or according to Sahelian rituals he'd handed out. Circulating said rituals outside Wolof had been a great gift, and earned him personal regard among mages and highborn beyond the broader gain of having his name associated to every single such fortress.

What he meant to do with the acclaim was still unclear but given the offers he'd already floated to help with the reconstruction of Ater she suspected he was already beginning to position himself as her successor. The people of the capital had long memories and would not soon forget High Lord Sargon Sahelian putting roofs over their heads again. If he bartered his marriage well and remained liked in Ater, well, it was only a matter of courting enough of the greenskin vote for Sargon to serve as the Chancellor after her.

Alaya was not yet sure whether she should help or hinder him. One of many decisions that would have to be taken after the war.

"We have our part to play before lending our aid in the reduction of Keter," Alaya said. "One just as important as securing the foothold, in some ways."

Grim nods all around. Procer was falling apart behind them, but the Hellgates opening would turn what was a slow descent into annihilation into a heedless tumble down the cliff.

"Speaking of," Chancellor Alaya idly said, eyes turning to the last person at the table. "Are we still making good time, Lady Nahiza?"

Nahiza Serrif was not, strictly speaking, a lady – though highborn, she had never been in line for a title. But as one of the most brilliant mages of Praes' last generation, once a rival to Wekesa and Dumisai of Aksum, she was usually granted the title out of courtesy. Not that the sullen, sour-faced old woman had ever cared. She was infamous for two things. The first was her reluctance to ever leave the mage tower she'd won by killing the Necromancer and making his ghoulish army eat itself as well.

The second was her genuinely foul temper.

"Do I look like a ship captain, Chancellor?" Nahiza grunted. "Find a window and look out, if you're that curious."

High Lord Sargon cleared his throat.

"I'm told we are on track to arrive in time," he contributed.

"Cribbed your cousin's notes to figure that out too, did you?" Lady Nahiza peevishly said.

Sargon was visibly angered by the comment, cheeks reddening, which rather impressed Alaya. It was hard to get under his skin these days.

"Your insinuations," Sargon bit out, "do you-"

"We'll get there in time, don't you worry about it," Nahiza interrupted, addressing the Chancellor. "With a few hours to spare, I'd say. The sister's limp is not so crippling when you figure out how to talk to her, no matter how many meddling boys botch their numbers."

The High Lord of Wolof's expression further darkened, to Alaya's private amusement. The old mage was not the most helpful of this informal council, but she did have a way of making even the most tedious meetings entertaining. Still, better to end this before it got out of hand.

"Then I believe the day's business is at an end and we may adjourn," Alaya pleasantly said. "I will see you all tomorrow."

There was some shuffling around the table as they rose and offered the bow mandated by the new modes of etiquette, save for Lady Nahiza who walked out of the room without acknowledging anyone else. The only time General Grem had commented on it, she'd chewed him out for making fun of an old woman's shrinking bladder and no one had quite dared to call her out on what was most likely – but not certainly – a brazen lie. Alaya did not linger, instead taking to the luxurious halls of the flying fortress at a brisk pace with her personal bodyguards following behind.

Even before it had been known that she would travel on this particular construct it had been one of the most comfortable, the entire central bastion having been salvaged from the ruin of one of the fortresses that Dread Empress Regalia the Second had raised for her invasion of Callow. It had been meant as her personal vessel, but never been used – it'd been sabotaged by the High Lord of Kahtan, as Regalia's popularity early in her reign had worried many of the High Seats. They'd wanted to blacken her name a little, unaware that the once-promising empress would be largely remembered for starting the Sixty Years War in the centuries to follow.

It'd since served as a sort of fortified mansion outside Ater for whoever held the Tower and been further touched up for comfort, which had made it a natural pick when the Wasteland was scoured for potential fortresses after the Fall. The suite that Alaya had inherited was almost as comfortable as her old accommodations and near as thoroughly warded, which had been a pleasant surprise when she made her home there. Still, it was not why she had chosen this fortress out of all the others. The reason for that was just ahead of her, past a door that opened at her bodyguard's knock and revealed a dedicated scrying room.

The mirrors and pools were without the frills and ornaments that their equivalents from the Tower had accumulated over the centuries, but no less functional for them. In truth, given that the Grand Alliance – by which she meant Catherine Foundling, staring down the crowns west of the Whitecaps – had shared some of the improvements on the old scrying rituals that'd been made in the Arsenal. It was not the scrying room Alaya had come for, however, but instead the smaller one attached to it. A glorified cupboard crammed with shelves of scrolls and a desk groaning under piles of parchment, with a single seat held out for visitors.

There Ime sat, hair drawn back into a loose braid and wearing a pair of ivory-framed spectacles. She'd always hated reading in magelight without them, and there was no other lighting in her packed archive room. Alaya turned to dismiss her guards with a glance and a smile, stepping into the room and closing the door before sliding into the seat.

"Chancellor," her spymistress greeted her.

"Ime," Alaya replied.

It was... not the same as it once had been, between the two of them. Ime had betrayed her. Betrayed her to the only person in all of Praes willing to do anything to keep her alive, but it had still been a betrayal. That changed things. Alaya was not one prone to unconditional trust, but there had been few people alive she trusted as much as the woman on the other side of the desk. That the trust had been shown warranted and not with the same act added shades to the act that the dark-skinned woman was not yet sure how to parse. It did not help she could no longer read her spymistress through the means she once had.

Connect, like her Name and all her aspects, was gone. Never to come back, if the age lines now touching her once perfectly smooth skin was any indication.

"You have news for me?" Alaya asked.

"Word from Duskwood," Ime agreed. "The Warden has crushed a plot of the Dead King's to steal the Night, dealt with the rebellion within the drow and now marches on Keter with reinforcements."

"How many?"

"Fifteen thousand," she replied. "Many of them Mighty."

A considerable force, especially after nightfall, though these days thousands of soldiers felt like nothing more than drops in a pond. There were only so many battles that could be fought – won or lost – before the numbers began to feel... unreal. Disconnected from the brutal realities of the war on Keter.

"She wasted no time," Alaya finally said. "She can't have been there longer than three weeks."

"Probably less," Ime ruefully said, "but then she's become rather formidable, hasn't she? Little Catherine Foundling, who would have thought."

Amadeus did. But then Alaya doubted even he had suspected that his apprentice was to become one of the leading figures of their era – arguably the leading figure. There were others just as powerful or as influential, but none who had their fingers in quite as many pies as the Black Queen.

"I never thought she'd make it this far," Alaya admitted. "Even when she returned from the Everdark at the head of an army out of legend, I expected her to stumble in Procer."

"She still lacks polish," Ime frankly said. "She's just very skilled at putting herself in situations where it doesn't matter – and she'll run out of those, come times of peace."

Alaya was not so sure. Of all the traits Catherine Foundling had inherited from the man she'd called her father just in time to murder him, perhaps the one that mattered most was the knack to find talent and bind it to her. What will it matter that she lacks polish, when her foremost diplomat is Cordelia Hasenbach? It did not get more polished than the former First Prince, who unlike Alaya had given up her crown with dignity and elegance that could only be envied.

"We'll see," Alaya said, then looked away.

The collection of scrolls was not particularly fascinating, but it allowed her the time to gather her thoughts.

"All that's left is Keter," she finally said. "It will be our crucible."

"If the siege fails, the continent is lost," Ime quietly agreed. "And we've begun building ships in Nok, but it won't be enough even if we hold the Whitecaps for years afterwards. We just don't have the resources or the sailors to get more than a third of Praes across the sea."

If that, Alaya thought, and that was if Callow and the Legions volunteered to die to the lost to delay the advance of the dead. She had seen the numbers, though, and she agreed with Marshal Juniper's opinion: if Procer was lost, so was Calernia. The population of the Principate was simply too large for any army to have a hope of holding against it once the Dead King armed it and sent it after his enemies. Her lips thinned. She had begun it all, she knew. A desperate bargain made with Keter had given the Hidden Horror his opening to come out of his lair.

It would have happened without her, she knew, for the old monster was a deft hand at convincing others to call on him. But it could not be denied that the pact had been her own, and so she had a share of responsibility in all the deaths that had followed from it. It was a dizzying thought, too large for guilt to truly reach her over it – it was simply too enormous a concept for it to be able to feel personal enough for guilt to follow. Oh, and it was a complicated chain besides. Would Alaya have ever struck the bargain, without the Tenth Crusade marching on Praes?

No, and yet how much of Hasenbach's eagerness for that march had come from her own meddling in Procer? Which itself had come out of fear of Proceran meddling in their affairs, and on and on it went without end. There could be no beginning or end to human affairs, save the First Dawn and the Last Dusk. Everything else flowed from those threads, an unbroken tapestry. Yet Alaya had made a decision and now Calernia teetered on the brink.

That was not nothing.

"We must prepare what we can to flee," Alaya said, "but I cannot disagree – there would be no mitigating the death blow that would be defeat in Keter."

"We're sending the largest coalition army in the history of Calernia after the city, at least," Ime noted. "There's never been that large an alliance facing a common foe."

"It only speaks to the truth that we are all desperate," the chancellor grimly replied. "Empress Basilia committed the League because she knows she will be unable to win the war by the time it reaches her doorstep."

She breathed out.

"Let's us not pretend that this is anything but a gamble, Ime," Alaya said. "We roll the dice on Keter because at least with a roll there is a chance of victory."

In a more traditional war, there no longer was. That ship had sailed the moment the Proceran fronts collapsed and the dead poured into the heartlands. The odds might be against the Grand Alliance when it besieged the Crown of the Dead, but at least defeat was not writ in stone – and it was the only real chance the nations of the living had to defeat the Dead King.

Unfortunately for them all, the Hidden Horror knew that as well.

“He’ll be waiting for us,” Ime said, echoing her own thoughts. “With all the nastiest tricks he still has up his sleeve.”

And that was the stuff of nightmares, though Alaya’s own would burn green for years to come.

“He always defends Keter most fiercely during crusades,” the chancellor quietly said. “It is the only ground he has never ceded.”

“It’s the only ground no crusade has ever taken,” Ime darkly said.

And so that was their last hope: taking a city that had not fallen in several millennia from the immortal lich that had spent all that time devising fresh blasphemies to defend it.

“This is not a crusade,” Alaya said, injecting confidence into her voice. “And Keter has never faced us.”

The other woman slowly nodded.

“I suppose it hasn’t,” Ime murmured.

Silence filled the room, neither of them pressed to break it. Alaya leaned back into her seat, closing her eyes, and for the first time today allowed herself to feel how fucking exhausted she was. Like string pulled so taut it was beginning to fray. There was always so much to do and she could not afford to rest, not when Maddie had died so she’d get this shot fixing their mess. And she was not sure whether it made her want to sob or laugh, that she could only allow herself this speck of sincerity when shut in this room with a woman who’d betrayed her. A woman she had kept as her spymistress and closest advisor, for all that, because who the Hells else was left?

Alaya had not been one of the Calamities in life, and in death they’d left her behind again.

But there was work to be done, an oath to keep, so piece by piece Alaya of Satus put herself back together again. Her eyes opened and she rose to her feet, meeting Ime’s gaze.

“Tonight,” the Chancellor of Praes said. “Tonight you’ll see why this one is different.”

You and all the Grand Alliance, Alaya thought.

—

Though the wind whipped wildly at the walls, she did not feel so much as a breeze.

Alaya's hands gripped the arms of her throne as she sat ramrod straight, her stomach clenching as the fortress plunged through the sky. Lady Nahiza was giggling almost girlishly, sorcery swirling around her in strands so thick they were visible to the naked eye – the old woman kept guiding the construct down, through the clouds that fled under them until there was a hole in night's roof and moonlight plunged down after them. The city of Sauvion had been levelled by Keter's Due when the Hellgate was opened mere miles to the north of it, leaving behind only husks that looked like charred bones under the moon's eye.

The gate itself stood above a bed of ashes, perfect and round and sealed by the sorcery of the Gigantes. Behind some howling Hell waited to be unleashed, the runes burned onto the sides of the gate awaiting to bind the infernal host to the Hidden Horror's will. An army of tireless monsters, awaiting only the end of the 'Riddle of the Lock' to be unleashed.

The fortress shuddered as it hit the ground, force rippling out in a shockwave. Alaya, seated at the very top of the highest tower, saw every detail of it. The clouds of ash and dust that kicked up, the rolling wave of earth and stone the impact sent outwards. The flying fortress landed on the ground of the Principality of Cleves like a hammer's blow, the few undead that had been close enough to contest the arrival of Alaya's force crushed and scattered. Coming out of the Twilight Ways high in the sky had given the Original Abomination no warning, and now it was too late.

Lady Nahiza turned towards her, grey eyes wild with warlock's flee and tanned cheeks flush with pleasure. In her hand, she held a stone orb covered in runes.

"Your permission, Chancellor?" the sorcerers asked.

Alaya's eyes moved to the Hellgate, staring down the smooth surface.

"Begin," she ordered.

Sorcery flared, the orb burning bright as the sister-runes in the depths of the fortress sent the signal to the mage cabals that had been preparing the ritual for hours. Alaya had, when she felt the noose tightening around her neck, tried to bargain with a way out for the Grand Alliance: her finest diabolists had agreed that a Greater Breach could not be closed, save perhaps through the wrath of a Choir, but that it could be... added to. Seven days a year, that had been the lock Alaya proposed to add. Devils would only be able to cross during those seven days and nights, buying the Grand Alliance at least another year to deal with the Dead King.

Alaya of Satus, who had once been Malicia, watched the gate as below her sorcery bloomed. The Dead King's gate, the end of the mistake she'd made that had begun it all. That had cost her almost everyone she loved. But there was one last gesture she could make in the face of that, for while she had been seeking the words of mages Amadeus had been doing the same. Only it was Nahiza Serriif he had sought, asking her entirely different questions.

"So tonight, King of Death," Alaya said, "listen closely, for you hear our last song. My part and his – half from the grave as is ever your due."

And magic filled the night as the Riddle of the Lock died, the first step of the ritual coalescing into burning shackles around the Hellgate. Seven nights and seven days, beginning now. Alaya's refrain, fitted to the song. In the breath that followed the first devil crossed, a hulking shape covered in spikes, but the sorcery was not yet finished. The second step, brazenly mad, began with half a ton of coal was set alight. Smoke billowed out in thick trails through vents, the heat feeding into arrays whose powers mirrored that of the gate. Thousands of aurelii's worth of the most expensive magical reagents known to man were being expended every thirty breaths, cabals of mages at the beginning of constant rotations spending themselves raw.

The diabolists were stealing the leash on the devils beginning to pour out of the gate, and the sound of it was Amadeus' refrain.

It would keep going for seven night and seven days, until the gate closed for a year and Alaya sent the thousands of devils that had been stolen north with one order only: make war on the dead. The two of them had shaken the world once upon a time, when they'd been young and the worst of them had not yet caught up to the best.

"One last time, Maddie," Allie softly said. "You and me against the world."

Thunder rumbled, but what did she have to fear? She was the one who'd brought it.

Droughtbringer

<https://topwebfiction.com/listings/a-practical-guide-to-evil/>

ruduen

That will certainly do. I was wondering just what magic Amadeus was still looking at, and it's interesting to find that it's going back to something we've seen early on in the series – applying a binding on every devil to cross the gate. Of course, this is likely on a very different scale than we were used to.

Here's hoping that another solution or an alternative solution pops up in a year's time, but that's a 'later' problem.

Time to see how many Interludes and how much fighting we see before Cat's arrival – after all, it sounds like they'll have to be in the thick of things before those reinforcements come at the right moment.

Liliet

The Dead King's Greater Breaches were already going to have bindings applied to devils as they crossed. This ritual OVERRIDES that.

Unrecovered

Well he do have a living population that consider him a hero, so I can see it. He just needs to call them to arms to protect their kingdom.

Gabe Meadow

Masego told us time and time again: Usurpation is the essence of sorcery. And while Amadeus was never a sorcerer, it's just like him to turn a threat into an asset of your own.

Someperson

I'm pretty sure they aren't going to permanently cheat the hellgates out of their due, at least not in this era.

The whole "evils sally forth for one week out of every year" thing feels too much like the fixings for a story set in the world after.

But usurping the binding from this year's batch of devils is certainly a nice trick to turn against Keter.

tynam

Notice how much it solves old issues as a theme. Instead of needing to guard one border all the time – where over centuries the Lycoans can resend doing all the work while the people they protect forget what that is like and stop helping – we have a great in three locations distributed across Procer, where everyone can more easily help and has reason to, happening seasonally so the cost in blood and gold is affordable and predictable.

Not a safe world, but a better one... a long term threat, sure, but it doesn't get worse over time and it doesn't scheme for centuries to make you neglect it the way Neshamah could.

tynam

*resent doing all the work.

Quite possibly a cat

A city making its last stand against an army of devils, the Villainous chancellor already having declared they will take the city?

I really hope the Dead King hasn't trained a secret squad of Heroes.

benthelynx

He hasn't trained them. He raised them from the dead in his service.

Mirror Night

Yeah but they are not really Heroes anymore they are Revenants...I am not sure the distinction actually matters for former Heroes or Villains any more at this point.

Also I don't think any Hero could help DK without falling.

Jason Ipswitch

Unfortunately for the Dead King's "bend dead Named to serve my will" plans, his opponents have the Warden, whose named is pretty much tuned for putting other Named in the place. I suspect Revenants are going to fall like bowling balls before Cat's new Name.

burnsy

Cat, strolling through a battlefield: You get a Silence! And you get a Silence! The Tempest gets a Silence! Everybody gets a Silence!!

Miles

He could have heroes too, for all we know. He's got an entire kingdom of the living who revere him as a god-king. If one of them decides it's an injustice that these foreign invaders are besieging the city they might just meet whatever the requirements are to be a hero.

Hargabga

He probably does have a squad of living Named, but no Heroes. It's one step from this to "a Hero realises that their teacher is secretly an eldritch monstrosity and rises in rebellion".

Someperson

Evil chancellors commanding armies of devils to lay siege to a city may be prone to failure, but so are crusades of priests and heroes to extinguish an evil on the evil's home turf. Keter has taken multiple crusades on the chin without flinching.

Like Alaya pointed out, the fact that this isn't a crusade, the fact that priests and the diabolists are all working together on this one, is one of the single greatest single things that the side of the living has going for them at this point.

It ceases to be a story about a heroic crusading white knights or power-mad evil empresses, because it's simply a story about life vs. death.

Quite Possibly A Cat

Sure, its a story about life vs. death to the people topside, but to the people down Below in Serenity? They are fighting off attackers from beyond reality trying to murder God. To the people in Creation, they were attacked, but to Serenity this is just a continuation of the Fifth Crusade.

Luckily, I'm pretty sure the Dead King isn't the type to raise his own Heroes.

Someperson

I genuinely don't think he could raise Heros.

I would wager that knocking off some of Above's gifts using Revenants is actually the best he can get away with on that front.

The situation at large matters, not just the person becoming Named.

Which, as I recall is something that Cat was pretty frustrated about with the Tancred situation. Unless the surrounding story lines up just right, the Heavens won't send a miracle.

And no matter what narrative finagling happens, "servant to the Hidden Horror, the guy who murdered his previous kingdom and is currently exterminating all of the surrounding countries" is more than a bit of a problem for any heroic story, unless the thrust of that story is one of betrayal.

Above is neither terminally dumb nor particularly shy about picking sides, especially where the Dead King is concerned.

That Fool

There may be a chancellor may be leading a horde of devils from a flying fortress, but they allied with Good against a greater evil, making the narrative heavily favor them. Especially because this could be spun as a last stand against annihilation.

*arcanavita*15

This feels so fitting an end for Malicia. Alaya really explains her thoughts on everyone and I really love the reflection she and Ime have on Catherine its just fitting. A real masterpiece of writing EE to give the antagonists so much character, I really love Alaya's character arc.

Liliet

OH MAN THIS IS GREAT

SpaceDorf

I have caught up again. 😞

After re-reading the whole grand saga from the beginning I started dreading the Date Stamps.

Cera Aine is all that I can do.

Wonder

Poor Ime, she betrayed Alaya out of love to save her, now their relationship is bitter for it .
I Feel sorry for Alaya that her death is going to be demanded by everyone after the war.

Juff

Typo Thread:

her advisor > her advisors
the stood > he stood would take months > would have taken months associated to > associated with
In truth, given (missing something like "they were better") warranted and not (maybe add "both" for clarity) help she > help that she to the lost > to the last unable the win > unable to win Lets us > Let us room, neither > room; neither warlock's flee (something wrong here)

sorcerers > sorceress

coal was set > coal set worst of them had not yet caught up to the worst. (is this right?

feels like one if the 'worst's should be "best")

LD1977

warlock's flee → glee worst of them had not yet caught up to the worst → I think second is "best"

*arcanavita*15

This goes to show the emotional impact Amadeus had upon people and the world, it is part of what made him such a wonderful character, I really like how EE portrays deaths and the impact they have.

Death Knight

Made more excellent by the fact that Amadeus is a child murderer. We're rooting for a guy that had no qualms killing kids before they become a problem of a Heroic sort. Sure, it was mentioned in passing and heavily implied but yeah. Props to EE.

*arcanavita*15

I wonder what the wider reaction of what happened in the last chapter will be, what will Alaya think of Akua now is something I am very interested in, I really liked there character interactions.

Hargabga

To this day I honestly can't understand why Cat had to kill Alaya back in Ater. Like some kind of grand fixation, impulsive and unreasonable, refusing to acknowledge any other way, refusing even to wait until the war of annihilation is done, before taking her long price. I am not saying to not kill her, just why she didn't wait? To stake her entire reputation, her entire plan on one point of failure...

And the resolution, where she killed her father only to spare the women she allegedly had no choice to kill, it just so absurd it boggles the mind. If she had to kill her no matter what, why did she stop? If she hadn't, why did she knife Black?

It's not like she doesn't have a reputation to write it all off as some elaborate plot. She did unconditionally surrendered to Pilgrim before, it's not like there was anything meaningful to lose, reputation-wise. And she is patient enough to wait on her revenge, as Aqua clearly demonstrates.

I had largely forgotten about this, but seeing Alaya again made the old doubts surface.

Hargabga

Kill Amadeus I meant.

*arcanavita*15

She wasn't explicitly planning on killing Amadeus but she was willing to do so, he just forced her hand, I also think the Due he paid in part is at least part of the reason Alaya got spared for a time as well, not something that made it happen but nudged it, this is just a head-cannon.

RoflCat

>It's not like she doesn't have a reputation to write it all off as some elaborate plot.

Her Warden Name was on the pivot at that moment, so no she couldn't just play it off.

She came to Praes declaring everywhere that she's here to end Alaya and not in a peaceful way.

So when Amadeus made his ultimatum, it was either giving up on her Warden Name (massively reducing the chance of winning against Keter in her opinion) to keep Amadeus's life, or the knife comes out.

And she made her choice, one that Amadeus probably knew she would.

His death was a payment not to reduce Alaya's sentence (death), but to delay it because he was the Chancellor and she was the only acceptable replacement for him at the time. Once her term as Chancellor is over, it's execution time.

ninegardens

"Her Warden Name was on the pivot at that moment, so no she couldn't just play it off."

I think Hargabga was pointing out that SETTING UP the pivot (which Cat did... over and over again), was a mistake. It was a critical failure of story fu to set up a pivot from which loss was a very real and serious option (and, indeed, happened)

RoflCat

>And I considered it, for a moment. Maybe if I made a compromise, then – and immediately I let out a soft gasp. The stars were dying. The black was fading. The Name itself, after all this time, was waning.

>It was never only Named or nation, I realized with dim horror. I'd always needed to have both. I'd just been tricked into thinking it was a choice.

She didn't even realize she was on a pivot until the very moment of it.

Also, even if she saw it coming, I honestly don't see anyway for her to avoid it.

>"There might come a time where you earn a kind hand, a protector, but not tonight," I coldly said. "Instead you earned me. You dealt out evil and it has been returned to your gate, but you think that at this hour of reckoning you can flee from your dues?"

>"Who am I?" I hissed. "I am Below's watchman, the enforcer of the black laws, and I tell you now that if you do not settle your debt in full then I will cast your shivering souls out into the darkness from where is no return."

Do you see anything in there that suggest her Name would be happy to let Alaya live?

The only way Malicia could've survived was to flee from Calernia on her own initiative, which Catherine already said she wouldn't pursue due to Keter priority.

Also do keep in mind the person who made this into a pivot and not just a path in her Story was Amadeus, not Catherine.

Snappy

I was because at that point Alya had to die, the story of Praes was broken but could be rebuilt (according to the Tower in arcadia) if she was left alive Amadeus would of forgiven her and she would probably be his chancellor, over throw him and become empress again restarting the old stories. But when Amadeus stopped cat, he created a Pivot for her name and she had to see it through. Killing Amadeus broke Alya too stopping her from ever rebuilding Old Pares and becoming a defender of New Pares in honor of him.

It was awful and brilliant at the same time.

Ike

Catherine is human and she has flaws. The callow tendency to extract long prices is one of them. It is a flaw the Bard exploited when trying to stop Catherine from becoming the Warden of the West.

*arcanavita*15

She needed to kill Malical because she was allied with the Dead King and allowing someone to live after doing something like that would really hurt the whole image of the New Age thing she is pushing for, she would still be able to pull it off but it would be a lot tougher. She wanted to kill her for the Night of Knives where she killed Ratface, basically she fell got caught up in the whole Long Price thing. She needed to spare her because she was the only person who could actually run Praes besides Akua who just denied the throne and wasn't interested.

Letouriste

"Inimical's Boot"

That's a freaking name and a half, lol.

Salt

It was an entirely sensible decision to draw a hard line in the sand for Malicia to die in my opinion. The list of horrible things she's done throughout like every single book in the series is insane, and she was still an utterly unrepentant major liability in the war against the dead king.

Malicia specifically allowed Second Liesse to happen – she knew Akua was attempting to open a greater breach and she hid it from Black because she wanted a super weapon to threaten the rest of the continent with. She had a fair number of Catherine's personal friends murdered during the Night of Long Knives. She planted brainwashing in Juniper and quite a few legionaries that mentally destroyed them. She actively fought an indirect war against and sabotaged the Grand Alliance through her actions in Mercantis. She was also the main reason holding back Praes from joining the war against the Dead King, as she specifically allied with him through the entire thing till her death, which is kind of a problem when he's opening greater breaches and the GA as a whole is losing the war, badly.

Meaning that she's a powerful, dangerous, and malicious variable with a political acumen that neither Catherine nor Cordelia have a foolproof answer to. Not only is her track record the worst it possibly could've been, there was also no indication of her changing her ways or reforming whatsoever. She was actually on a downward power-hungry spiral in mentality for the last couple books, if anything.

I don't think it's unreasonable at all for Cat to be fixated on finally killing off the knife that's been at her back for about four books running. Malicia waxing sentimental about Black and ime this chapter after having to be brought into submission by force in the first place doesn't really change much imo, other than giving her a bit of closure as a character. Having relatable sentiments after the fact doesn't really make up for the things she's done, nor does it change anything in terms of the practicality of why she needed to be put down at the time.

nimelennar

"Alaya sent the thousands of devils that had been stolen north with one order only: make war on the dead."

Oh no. Cat's poor horse...

Ciel Morgenstern

Hm.. I admit I hadn't thought of her "horse" (monster-crow-hybrid ahem), but rather what other casualties this could mean along the wayside, if one doesn't give that devilish horde any framework to work with other than "kill x". I mean, what do they care if they kill "a, b, c, ..." alongside "x"?

Miles

I'm sure Praes' finest are not that bad at what they do.

Benjamin Huang

It would be massively gigabrainied if the DK foresaw ALL of this. He KNEW the hellgates and their devils would be hijacked. He KNEW praes would go full Old Evil against him, flying fortresses and all.

Stop me if you've heard this before, a shining city on a hill (dark cliffs surrounded by bottomless abysses but potato potato) Attacked by a ruthless horde of devils Lead by a Tyrant riding a Flying Fortress

As the Alliance nears the walls of Keter, the DK unleashes his trap card.

A ragtag team of five plucky preteens who, leaving their Serenity against the rules, undergo a desperate quest to save their home and utopic way of life.

After all the DK has had the opportunity to make a lot of orphans over the years.

And we all know what orphans mean.

Heros.

Sykomantis

Yeah, but as someone mentioned earlier, DK can't do that. He's not just A Villain, he's THE Villain, and a story like that is just asking for the Hero pivot "My master was actually an eldritch abomination, so now I must put him down while having angst about having to kill my almost father figure". DK is too careful to allow a plan with that kind of story fu loophole. He's only survived this long by never allowing any story that could leave him vulnerable to happen, and trying to manipulate Heroes while being a Villain is just asking for a comeuppance.

Now, villains in the other hand...

Konstantin von Karstein

Taking control of the devils sounds like a good idea at first, but wouldn't the DK be able to take it back? Let's hope he has enough on his plate to prevent that, but that's not sure.

ninegardens

I mean... its still better than NOT taking control of them.

Xi Cree

The problem lies in the way their bindings were applied... the very mechanism to call each devil was what applied their bindings.

Ie. There are too many of them now in the world bound with an individual binding to grab them all up.

Also Make war on the dead is such a general command that the ones that grow smart enough will realize it gives them HUGE leeway once in the world and aware.

Thorium

Lets hope 'one order only' is only figuratively. Or at least seperate from the binding. I got the impression that the thing that seperated a good diabolist from a dead one was that their bindings were thorough enough to make lawyers weep. A binding with a single command would be useless for everything except causing utter mayhem.

Daniel E

If I were a bad Demoman, I wouldn't be sittin here discussin it with ya, would I?!

ninegardens

So, being back with the Preas team...

Does anyone know what happened to Akua's antagonistic minion dude?

Cause like, he was awesome, and kind of just evaporated after that story arc, and that seems a shame, throwing away a cool character.

nimelennar

I don't think Kendi has been seen since the Tower fell. Which, yes, is a shame.

Lord Haart

I had the impression that she had actually killed him earlier and it was his "ghost" she was taking to.

Xinci

Hmm, well that was interesting. We now have further potential signs of titles aiding the differentiation of matter in Creation. I am rather curious about how much the potential souls of the spiders, humans, or really any flora or fauna who may have gotten tied to it affect the Sister.

It looks like their ritual used the smoke as a carrying agent for the bindings, burned the reagents for proper material to form the bindings in the smoke, and the heat from the burning to help power the arrays. Truly their rituals are getting more efficient.

As a side note, I wonder how long it will be until a praesi uses the line of logic on souls that devils who took souls could be citizens to get around the diabolism laws.

I do also wonder how Maddie would feel about his scheme in Praes being known as the Fall. Quite dramatic, but he did tend to love melodrama.

Darkening

So, Alaya spends her whole time as dread empress acting like a chancellor. Now she's a chancellor and she's acting like a dread empress leading a fleet of flying fortresses and usurping armies of devils to wage war against the King of Death. Funny. Couple of loose ends to the praes storyline I hope we get answers to. What happened to Akua's treacherous lieutenant since he hasn't been mentioned once since she set the tower on fire, and did cat keep the giant undead spider queen? I suppose using an undead spider against the dead king could backfire, but it's too cool to just dismantle for parts. I kinda want to see Cat just yank a giant monster spider out of her Night pocket dimension at some point. What a fun surprise that would be for somebody.

Tom

> and more specifically what the monetary value of a soul should be.

> There had been spirited debated over the matter

I see what you did there

Daniel E

I've gotten in the habit of doing quick search on any potential names or places. This chapter marks the second time we've read about flying fortress of Dread Emperor Inimical. Ahem:

"Admittedly, it was my fault for not specifying the flying fortress had to be able to fly in directions other than up. Oh, it can fly down as well? Splendid. Guards, drag the Lord Warlock beneath my fortress. It'd be a shame not to use it at least once." – Dread Emperor Inimical, the Miser" – Chapter 30, Quarters.

sengachi

Hahahaha, oh thank you for dredging that up, that just makes this better.

Chapter 49: Arrival

"There is no more one last war than there is one last tide. Perhaps even less, for the moon will change before men do."

– King Jehan the Wise of Callow

The last campfire before the plunge, I felt, ought to have been more momentous than this. Instead it was strikingly mundane, the rabbits Cordelia had shot during the day's travelling ending up roasted by Masego over the open flame as I went to pick up firewood and Akua groomed the horses. I'd actually thought I'd get out of firewood duty by catching a few birds, but Zombie had gobbled the first up – purely out of spite, the damned bird didn't even need to eat – and screeched so loudly the rest had scattered, so down into the brush I went. I tied her to the tree furthest from the fire, informing she had been a Bad Girl and She Needed To Learn Her Lesson. She cawed at me rather skeptically, which I did not take to be a good sign.

I blamed the Sisters, they were a bad influence.

I got back with the last batch of dry wood in time to get my skewer fresh off the fire, Cordelia doing a decent job of hiding her horror as Masego told her why it wasn't actually a good idea to cook with hellflame even though the temperature was more stable.

"The taste of brimstone is quite overwhelming," Zeze sagely told her. "My experiments were conclusive."

"By that he means that Indrani talked him into scrapping our entire meal twice," I drily said, swallowing a groan as I lowered myself into sitting on the ground.

It was a nice little clearing that we'd chosen as our camp site for the night, surrounded by just thick enough a thicket that it gave us the illusion of privacy even as we sat in the midst of a host of fifteen thousand Firstborn. I'd set down a boundary line in Night that added some genuine privacy to the appearance of it, but getting the drow to actually keep their distance had been more difficult. Upon learning that I intended to eat fresh meat nineteen sigil-holders had volunteered their sigils to hunt game in my name, and they'd been halfway through talking themselves into duels over the privilege when I put my foot down.

Amusing as the thought of five thousand Firstborn scouring the countryside of the Ways clean of every living creature larger than a mouse was, Cordelia's rabbits would be quite enough.

"I am not sure whether that is technically blasphemy," the fair-haired princess noted, "but I cannot help but feel that it should be."

"It sometimes shows that you have never been hosted in Praes, darling," Akua told, strolling out of the woods. "Dinner canmost definitely be blasphemous."

Cordelia, feet not going over the side of the blanket she'd laid on the ground by so much as a hair and hands folded primly over her lap, offered the other woman a flat stare as she sat to my left.

"It sometimes worries me," she said, "that when you speak of Praes, it is hard to discern what is a jest and not."

"And if you think that's a joke, I've eaten what she thinks is appropriately seasoned chicken," I muttered at Cordelia under my breath. "It'd make you wish for the goddamn brimstone."

"Your national dish is stew, Catherine," Akua retorted, unimpressed.

"Stew's good," I protested. "We eat it all the time."

There was a choked noise that sounded suspiciously like suppressed laughter coming from my right. I narrowed my eye at now suspiciously expressionless princess.

"Out with it," I sighed.

"I once asked the palace's head cook to make traditional Callowan beef stew for Princess Vivienne," Cordelia admitted, "and she offered me her resignation."

An indelicate snort from my left, followed by the two of them letting out quiet peals of laughter. Typical, I grimly thought. Like the country of my birth, I was plagued by base treachery out of Praes and Procer. Fucking nobles the both of them too, I glowered. I wasn't sure how that played into it yet, but give me long enough to think and it absolutely would. A skewer was pressed into my hands and I looked up to Masego's smiling face.

"Eat your rabbit," he said. "It's getting cold."

I bit down on the juicy flesh, still glowering.

"Fine," I told him as I chewed. "But just because it's you asking, Zeze."

I polished off the rest of my rabbit skewer and was hungry enough to dip into the bag of dried berries afterwards, though it wasn't long before we moved on to the kind of dessert I actually enjoyed: a bottle of aragh, which Akua had been keeping in her pocket space for the entire trip like a complete hog. She hadn't opened it yet, though, so as I did I informed her of my forgiveness.

"How generous of you," Akua replied, impressively enough without so much as a hint of sarcasm.

"Sometimes, when she wants ours things, she says it's taxes and takes them," Masego told Cordelia.

The recently retired First Prince of Procer fixed me with a stare that could best be described as soulful disappointment.

"Eh," I shrugged. "Why even be a tyrant if you can't steal booze from your subjects?"

It was a pretty good stare, I'd give her that, but I'd had to deal with the Grey Pilgrim for years. No one did disappointment like Good's communally mandated grandfather, may the old bastard rest in peace. I poured a cup and pressed into Masego's hand as he rolled his eyes – it was somehow even more distressing a sight now that only one of them rolled all the way around the socket – and grabbed the cups for the rest.

"I always did find it unusual how few creature comforts you've claimed over the years, given your repeatedly professed desire for them," Akua languidly said.

She was sprawled over her blanket like it was a reclining couch and some oiled-up manservant was about to start fanning her. If anyone thought it was coincidence that the position ended up pressing her riding dress flatteringly around her, I had a real nice house in Keter I wanted to sell them. She lightly took up the cup when I offered it.

"I guess I ended up more the iron military rule kind of tyrant, huh," I mused.

"By far the most boring sort," Akua opined.

She was, sadly, pretty much right. Should have gotten known for a spot of decadence before I started going around in plate and a black cloak everywhere, now I was stuck with the reputation and it was too late to change it. After the war, I promised myself. Pastel dresses for a year. Still, let it not be said I'd allow myself to be cornered without a sortie.

"Besides, Your Highness," I said to Cordelia, "don't try to sell me you've never pulled at the bounds a bit – no one sits on top of a shitshow like Highest Assembly for years without allowing themselves some way to let out the steam."

The put-upon innocence that appeared on the princess' face was believably good, which was impressive because those pretty blue eyes could only do so much for compensate for the warrior's shoulders on her. Akua jeered at her and Masego was sipping at his drink, looking like he was gauging whether he could get away with discreetly dumping some in the fire – I glared at him to signify he would not, to his chagrin – so she gave ground.

"I did once have a banquet served for Amadis Milenan where every single of the nine services tasted of oranges," Cordelia conceded.

I cocked an eyebrow. Didn't sound like much of anything.

"He is," the blonde princess mildly explained, "deathly allergic."

Akua actually smiled.

"Ah," she said. "He could say nothing, because accusing you of trying to poison him would have been an act of treason, if then proved untrue."

"Oh yes," Cordelia said, her savagely pleasant smile never wavering. "The near mutiny from the cooks when they were asked to bake bread that would taste of oranges for the cheese platter was worth seeing him squirm in his seat through every single service of a formal state dinner."

I sipped at my drink, hiding a grin. I'd always known there was a petty streak hidden under the manners, but it was nice to have it confirmed for posterity. I let myself relax into the blanket as the cups emptied and the bottle was passed around, letting the warmth of the fire seep into my bones as Masego was drawn into a conversation about the benefits of a mage guild's existence – I knew better than to believe Cordelia had laid the breadcrumb leading to that by happenstance – and though Akua occasionally interjected I was happy to let them have at it.

The good feeling was lingering in my limbs, sweet and heavy enough it was hard to tell apart from sleepiness.

"- without standardized magical education, it is impossible for any society to have artefacts on a more than local scale," Masego said. "If there no common principles a mage cannot undertake the upkeep of the artefact another made, so the knowledge end up kept by apprenticeship lines."

"Which are vulnerable to being ended by happenstance," Cordelia acknowledged.

She had it right. Callow had suffered from the weakness over the years, and after the Conquest the Dread Empire had pretty much snuffed out organized Callowan sorcery by interrupting the master-to-apprentice passage of knowledge: only a gutted Guild of Hedges had survived, and all the talent there had been pushed into the Legions.

"Exactly," he enthused. "Learning should never be so unsafe. Every secret that dies with its holder is a loss for all of Creation."

I felt Akua's gaze move to me.

"They'll be at this for a while," she noted, faintly amused.

"I can't tell if she's humouring him or genuinely interested," I said.

Akua rolled her eyes at me.

"She seeks a closer relationship with him," she chided, as if it were obvious. "Our dear princess already has her eye on Cardinal, my heart. She foresees his presence there in the coming years, and catches a second bird with the stone by obtaining his thoughts on the matter of organized sorcery under a central authority."

Which would inevitably ensue, considering the school that would be at the heart of the city yet to be built. It would draw mages like flies to honey, and you couldn't just let loose a few hundred mages – or more – in any city without supervision. They'd have to be organized, and the ruling council of Cardinal would be the natural authority for them to be under. Cordelia had a history of endorsing that sort of thing, too, having created the first mage order since before the Liturgical Wars during her reign. The Order of the Red Lion, effectively a guild of scrying-capable mages. I grimaced.

"Thought I'd get at least a year after the war before that sort of thing started up," I admitted.

Akua flicked my shoulder, which surprised me enough I had to bite down on yelp.

"Poor Catherine," the golden-eyed sorcerers gently mocked. "She only wants to build the most important and influential city on Calernia, but somehow this has drawn attention and intrigue."

A pause.

"Who could have possibly foreseen this state of affairs?" Akua mourned, laying a hand over her heart.

"Ouch," I muttered. "I mean you're not wrong, but still ouch."

"You'll survive," she retorted, merciless. "Do get out of your head, dearest. It will have been a waste of my bottle otherwise."

I snorted at that. Fair enough. I dragged myself up, brushing my hand against her shoulder, and cracked my back with a little sigh.

"Fire's making me fall asleep," I told them all, having drawn the others' curious stares. "I'll go for a bit of a walk, get the blood flowing."

The ring of forest around us wasn't all that deep, but the branches and leaves were thick enough that limping to the edge got me the treat of breaking through to a starry sky. Under it the Firstborn had made camp, the absence of fires still strange to my eyes after all these years. They were used for cooking, but no longer than that, and by now had long been snuffed out. The fifteen thousand that Sve Noc had sent south with me had still raised their tents along sigil lines, a far cry from the professional lines and avenues of a Legion camp, but the campaigns had taught the drow the virtues of order.

There was a cross of broad avenues going through the camp now that no Firstborn army would have bothered with five years ago, as well as designated latrine pits and supply tents.

"How many centuries has it been since the Empire Ever Dark fielded armies?" I asked.

I had felt its presence even through the dark and silence. Night hid little from me, these days.

"None have been sent to war since the years after the Gloom descended," Ivah of the Losara replied.

"So more than a thousand years," I murmured. "You're adapting dreadfully quick, Ivah."

It wasn't empty praise. There were modern armies that simply hadn't caught up to the methods introduced by the Legions of Terror during the Conquest, be they the combined arms or the professional ways of making war, and it wasn't because they'd lacked coin or time to. The Great War hadn't refined Procer war-making, it'd scrapped armies and beggared thousands into being disaffected mercenaries. And the Dominion was, in a lot of ways, just as tribal as the Firstborn: Ten Generals instead of the great lines of the Blood, captains and companies instead of Mighty and sigils.

The drow, though, were taking well to war on our scale. Tactics were still specialized instead of standardized – the Ysengral for fortifications, the Jindrich for heavy infantry – but I could already see the bare bones of Firstborn armies emerging and they'd make fearsome beasts to wrestle with. Heavy skirmisher contingents like no one else still fielded, startlingly quick massed spear infantry and Mighty as replacements for either cavalry or mage cabals. It was only a matter of time until sigils began to turn into professional soldiery, and when that began the Firstborn would be well on their way to having respectable standing armies.

"Of all our talents, strife has ever been our favourite," Ivah mused. "Our blessing and our curse, one might say."

The echo of my words made me turn. I found my successor as the sigil-holder of the Losara – and likely First Under the Night – leaning against a hollow tree. The shadows of the branches reached across its painted face, the silver tree-on-purple cut through like claw marks. Ivah rarely bothered with more than the lightest of armours, my Lord of Silent Steps preferring long coats with wide sleeves paired with intricately woven scarves, and it might have been taken for simple traveller if not for the way its presence burned in the Night. In a way, after what it'd done in Serolen it deserved my title more than me: it had made the first of the new Night, when it slew Kurosiv.

It was connected to it even more deeply than I, for while it'd been my scheme Ivah had been the one to bloody its hands with a spear of yew.

"You're displeased?" I asked.

"We are what we are, Losara Queen," the Lord of Silent Steps replied. "I fear not the seeking of Night, only that in embracing the spear we might forget how to hold all other tools."

That becoming too good at war would see the Firstborn lose interest in the less exciting labours of building a home in the Burning Lands, it meant.

"It'll be on you," I quietly said, "to teach them better."

The Sisters had chosen me for the exile, for the war, but it was coming to an end. They would not leave me afterwards, I thought, for I had spent too long as their herald to be severed from them after. But I would be a priestess among many, no longer the towering figure in the Night I now stood as. That was fine by me. I had been Sovereign of Winter and Squire once, and learned from it that one power always grew over the other. To be Warden was more than the old coat I'd once worn as a girl, but to be First Under the Night was not a small thing either.

Better to make it cleaner, so that fate's course ran without hidden eddies.

"It will be," Ivah just as quietly replied, looking up at the sky.

It was the first time it acknowledged what the both of us had known for years: that it had served as the sigil-holder of the Losara while being groomed for my role as high priestess for years, chosen by Sve Noc themselves. Each of the Sisters had their favourites among the Mighty, but neither had thought to elevate one as the greatest of the Firstborn under them.

"Afraid?" I asked.

A long silence.

"Yes," Ivah murmured.

Its jaw clenched.

"It is one thing to kill a god, another to grow a garden from its bones."

And the flowers born of blood were lovely, I had learned, but ever poisonous. I had tricked Winter into death and devoured it only for it to rot me from the inside. Yet in the end, was that too not an answer of sorts?

"How do you kill a god, Ivah?" I asked.

Silver eyes on mine.

"You make another," it replied, thoughtful.

If you don't like the altar the Firstborn worship at, I thought, make another. We stood there under the starlit sky of the Twilight Ways for a long moment, the two of us leaning against threes in companionable silence.

"I wish," Ivah murmured, "that you did not have to leave. That we would keep you."

My heart clenched, but I would not answer the sentiment with a lie. It offered me a wisp of a smile.

"We borrowed you for our purposes," the Lord of Silent Steps said, "and you borrowed us for yours. It was a fair bargain, the faith doled out repaid threefold."

"The Firstborn," I acknowledged, "have never failed me."

And I found that I meant every word of it. Baffled, disappointed and sometimes angered but never failed. From beginning to end, they had kept their oath like a knight's pride and a devil's due.

"We have long memories, Losara," Ivah said. "We will not forget Callow's Queen or the soldiers we bled in the mud with. That affection, I think, may just survive us both."

I looked down at my hands, those worn old things that'd never quite wash out the red.

"Wouldn't that be something?" I smiled, daring to hope.

It softly laughed.

"It would," Ivah murmured. "It is a long road ahead, and we could all do with a few more friends on it."

"Then do not be afraid, Ivah of the Losara," I gently said. "For we'll be walking it both, and I count you as one."

The drow stiffened at the words, like a cat afraid of scalding, but as the moments passed it unwound.

"And you," Ivah brusquely spoke into the silence, as if afraid to get the words out.

I did not smile, afraid it'd shame it, and instead let silence linger. The embarrassment only thickened, though, and I need only glance at the cast of its shoulder to know it felt like squirming. Taking pity on it, I cleared my throat.

"You sought me out for a reason?"

Ivah nodded in acknowledgement.

"Words has arrived from Creation," the Lord of Silent Steps said. "We will be the last to arrive in the hinterlands Keter. The Praesi fortresses arrived last morn."

I half-smiled.

"The last to the party, huh," I murmured. "Best make our presence count, if we've made them wait."

Ivah pushed off from the tree and offered me a bow, shallower than it had been before Serolen.

"Good night to you, Losara Queen," it said.

"Good night to you, Lord of Silent Steps," I replied.

It left the same way it had come, through the dark, and I returned to the warmth of the fire and company. There would be precious few moments like those, in the coming days, so it would not do to waste even a single one of them.

—

We crossed back into Creation a little before Noon Bell.

Riding ahead on Zombie, taking to the sky, I noticed two things in quick succession: first, once you got high enough the clouds of poison thinned enough you didn't even need to breathe through cloth. Two, even as the first sigil set foot in the dust of the Kingdom of the Dead a battle was being fought about a mile to the north of us. Much as I my instinct was to spur on Zombie and get into the thick of it, I held myself back and took in the situation from the sky. The Crown of the Dead was a dozen miles to the west, the great fortress-city jutting out of a chasm miles deep and a spire of black stone rising even higher, and around it in a loose circle I could see the encamped armies of the Grand Alliance.

Fortified camps, too. Pickler had been busy, because though the angle wasn't right for me to see everything it looked like the Grand Alliance had encircled Keter with ramparts of its own. It had then gone further and built a ring of walls behind the camps, something called contravallation. Sensible, I thought, given that the Dead King still had armies out in the field that'd be headed our way. We'd be fighting as much from the back as the front while the siege continued, we'd known that from the start, but I was still impressed Pickler had gotten so much done so quickly. She has Legion sappers now as well, I reminded myself.

Zombie circled slowly up in the sky, the wind batting at my face as I returned my attention to the battle up north. By the look of the banners and the massed cavalry being used, it was Rozala Malanza and the army that'd held Cleves out there in the field.

On the other side I saw mostly a mass of bones, with only a few necromantic constructs – the dead had numbers, maybe twenty thousand to First Princess Rozala's ten, but it wasn't helping them much. The Proceran shield wall held, Light burning away the poison in the air and tearing through the skeletons in thick rivers to disrupt their formation. And by how quickly the constructs were going down, I'd guess there were Named on the field.

A victory in the making. At guess, Neshamah had sent out some expendables to hinder the crossing of the Firstborn and Malanza had caught it flatfooted. Tied them down with the cavalry, did you? I mused. She'd always had a knack for cavalry tactics, even back during the Tenth Crusade. It had been her tacit threat to send cavalry south into Callow and hit the Vales from behind that'd forced Juniper and I to give her a fight at the Battle of the Camps.

I waited until the first two sigils had crossed and a vanguard had been established for the Firstborn before going out to return the favour. Night came clean and crisp when I pulled, flowing better than it had since Hainaut – and even better than before, at least when the sun was out. I unleashed trail of black flame through the heart of the enemy formation, torching Bones by the hundreds as Procerans cheered. It had a charming element of novelty to it, the Principate's soldiers being glad of the sight of me. The battle had already been won before I arrived, and my contribution just helped turn it into a rout.

I passed twice more, dropping trails of fire, and noted approvingly that First Princess Rozala was moving to encircle the dead. It'd be a mistake against a living army, since cornered soldiers fought like devils, but undead didn't rout so there was no point in leaving them a way out. Bones just got stupid and disorganized when you killed enough of the Binds leading them, some of the bands wandering off as the cohesion of the army broke down. The forward ranks of skeletons kept breaking themselves on the Proceran shield wall, increasingly less skilled in that assault, while fantassin companies swept the flanks and the cavalry began riding down the bands of skeletons that broke away from the host.

Already over, and it was looking like light casualties for the Procerans. Now we just needed to win the next hundred of these, all the while besieging the single most powerful fortress in all of Calernia.

I left First Princess Rozala to her moment of glory, knowing that after Cleves her soldiers could likely use a battle having gone cleanly their way, and rode Zombie back to the beachhead. Sigils had begun to spread out during the hour I'd spent north, the Firstborn assembling into a marching column headed for the camps to the west, and seeing that General Rumena had it well in hand I saw no need to stick my oar in. It'd been herding sigils around since before the city I was born in was founded, it didn't need me breathing down its neck.

Impatient at the pace of the advance even though I knew in the back of my mind that the drow were quick on the march as far as armies went, I landed long enough to have word sent to my companions that I'd be heading out to the camps in advance and took to the sky again. Zombie was in a good mood, I noted, having puffed her feathers vainly at the cheering earlier and remained convinced she'd been the star of the battle ever since. I saw no need to disabuse her.

The flight west was longer, the winds turning strange and quarrelsome the closer we got to Keter, but we made good time. I watched with thinned lips as the hulking shape of the Crown of the Dead rose ever higher, that island of stone connected to the land around it only by four great bridges. I'd tread one of these on foot, once upon a time, and before this was over I would again. A look back and a flex of Night told me that the Firstborn were mostly done crossing by the time I reached the camps, the column snaking west along with First Princess Rozala's victorious army.

It was with a sense of vindication that I led Zombie into a slow circling glide above our camps, taking in the sight of the armies that'd been gathered. There'd never been a coalition like it in the history of Calernia: Praes and Callow, Procer and Levant, the League and the Empire Ever Dark. All the greatest armies left among the living had been marched here for our great siege of Keter, and though I knew that was no guarantee of victory the sight of it was deeply satisfying. We'd done it. Through Hells and high water, we'd mustered all that was left to muster. Now we simply need-Power bloomed, deep in the heart of Keter, and my blood ran cold. Sorcery rose from the camps, but it wasn't us the Dead King was aiming at. As a torrent of magic shot up in the sky, past the great spire and the green clouds, Creation shivered.

Then the sky began to fall, one panel at time.

I thought it an attack at first, when shards of northing hit the ground and kicked up great clouds of dust, but the few that hit the camp broke harmlessly against the defensive wards. I had seen this before, I realized in a moment of eerie clarity. Just not from this angle. I looked back, to the drow and saw that the last few sigils had been dropped down from a height. Like the Army of Callow was, when Akua shattered the Twilight Ways under us.

"Gods," I croaked out, as destruction spread as far as my eye could see.

Miles in every direction, one break at a time, like a ripple on the surface of a pond. We'd brought the great muster of Calernia here to besiege Keter, I thought, so the Dead King had broken the Twilight Ways. How much of them I couldn't know – miles, a third, maybe even enough that the realm itself would begin break down. In the end, it didn't really matter. Neshamah had let us in and then tightened the noose: now there could be no retreat.

We would take Keter before supplies ran out, or we would all die.

Droughtbringer

<https://topwebfiction.com/listings/a-practical-guide-to-evil/>

Mirror Night

Yeah i figure DK would crack the skies and break Twilight eventually ala Akua. Some good character moments before the storm I suppose.

But god this pacing still confuses me. Cat and Drow are off the board with some of the heavy hitters and yet they can already see the Crown of the Dead? How the frak did they turn it around and push so deep in Keter when DK was beating the break off them when Cat when to handle the Drow Issue. Did the Praes Mages and Orcs really make that much of a difference? I mean I suppose its kinda implied they just ported in with Twilight but considering Akua already compromised that seems kinda arrogant to do that and just ignore supply lines.

Liliet

They have no use for supply lines from Procer because there are no supplies there. Dwarves or nothing, and dwarves do have exits to where they are.

SpeckofStardust

I mean the biggest problem of the Ways being shut down is that the Villains have nowhere to hide when angel weapon gets used.

Liliet

HORRIBLY TRUE

caoimhinh

Nevertheless, it seems the supplies from the Dwarves still have to come through the Twilight Ways and thus now can no longer come?

Still seems weird, considering the Dwarves haven't arrived yet.

Rey d`Tutto

Cat was able to negotiate a withdrawal for the Drow so the Dwarves could encircle Keter.

The Dwarves just need to dig Up.

caoimhinh

Yeah, but they sealed it off. That encirclement wasn't to make tunnels and place people, it was a full construction to prevent Keter from expanding underground, no?

I'm starting to think maybe the Dwarves can't just dip up right at Keter due to that encirclement they built. Maybe that's why Cat is saying supplies aren't coming?

Still weird, since the Dwarves army has not arrived yet, and they would need supply lines.

Liliet

I think the dwarf supplies are supposed to come from the underground tunnels. And the dwarves haven't agreed to the Keter deal yet, yeah.

caoimhinh

- 1) The Dwarves already agreed. That was the whole deal with the Herald back in Salia before Cordelia abdicated.
- 2) If the Dwarf supplies are supposed to come from underground tunnels to Keter, then why did Cat say "before our supplies run out" if they still have the option of the Dwarves bringing them?

Liliet

(Because the Herald was only authorized to conclude the deal he had originally brought to them, and all he could agree to was bring the new deal to his superiors)

agumentic

They did just port in with the Twilight Ways and will be relying on dwarves for supply lines. There wasn't any other way to reach Keter.

caoimhinh

Yeah, but it's weird, because last time we saw those armies (except for the Praesi one), they were all on retreat from Keter's armies, and the frontlines were being pushed heavily into Procer's territory.

Did they just decide to ignore everything else when launching this offensive and leave the heartlands of Procer unprotected while the siege is going?

Also, that last line seemed to imply there weren't any new supplies coming now that the Twilight Ways were damaged.

tynam

Yes, that's exactly what they've done. Containment is impossible at this point, since they've lost the natural geographical barriers and the undead are just spreading out everywhere in Procer... so they've left behind the minimal militia and garrisons to slow that down at the big cities and used the Twilight Ways to bypass the entire campaign field straight to Keter.

That plan is a guaranteed loss of Procer, but that's already where they were... so the only winning move is "the enemy's gate is down", a decapitation strike on Neshamah. If they get him the undead left behind in Procer change from 'unstoppable army that grows larger faster than anyone can keep up' to 'millions of dangerous but stupid skeletal raiders that will just wander aimlessly in lands mostly already empty'. Without the Dead King you can take the rest back slowly over the course of decades if you have to, expanding as your population re-expands to fill the space. Even if they can survive the Dead King's end, Revenants are no match for Named – without Neshamah plotting how to avoid losing stories for them, they're just dead Named with weakened aspects and they literally can't learn, which is extremely fatal when you're up against the Cat-trained generation of heroes coming up...

(Clearing this up, of course, will give all those new ork and dark elf mercenaries something useful to do while those societies start adjusting to trade and industry.)

Hargabga

They basically lost a war, so they bet it all on their armies killing DK faster than he can kill the rest of Calernia. Do not misunderstand – this is very much a last desperate gamble.

Darkening

Yeah, they definitely didn't fight all the way through here, they just went via the Ways. And yeah, they don't have supply lines, so they're all dead in a couple months if they're still here. But, well, desperation more than arrogance. At least DK couldn't break Twilight before they got here, since that would leave their only desperate hope as sending a band of five into the breach and with literally no other options existent in the face of apocalypse, that band would have some pretty incredibly weight backing their story.

ISiejek

The crow have multiple fronts and also used twilight ways to avoid walking through enemy territory not to mention they were the closest to keter already

spencer

Narratively, I was expecting some sort of challenge in the ways before reaching Keter. I agree that going straight to the boss fight was a bit abrupt. But I guess there will be plenty of juicy story within the Keter campaign.

Hellspirit

I don't think there's anything that could reasonably be a challenge on the way.

Liliet

Aaaaaaaah.

gnaruscat

Yup

erebus42

Well shit.

I've said it before but the Drow are probably my favorite faction. And while it has always been pretty introspective now that it has stepped out of Cat's shadow (both figuratively and literally) I'm glad to see how clearsighted Ivah appears to be. I suspect Ivah will grow to surpass even Cat as First Under Night. That was also a rather sweet moment the two shared. Also the orange prank was a delightfully cruel and hilarious move on Cordelia's part.

Sinead

At this level, I think the ideas of 'surpassing' is the wrong way to look at it.

Ivah would not be where it is without Cat.

And Cat could not have gotten where she is now without Ivah.

They are really one shadow of crucial reformation of the Firstborn.

You can probably draw some comparison between Andronike the General and Komena the Twilight Sage.

The Green Mouse

"Andronike the General and Komena the Twilight Sage." I think you got those mixed up.

Christian Oaks

Damn good stuff, and if we must rush to the finish of the books that is an excellent way to do it.

Gabe Meadow

This was our last deep breath before the plunge. And what a plunge it is! The siege commences, neither side can back out. That just leaves the big hanging question marks: the Herald and the Kingdom Under, Kreios and the Gigantes, the Forever King and the elves.

Plus what other nasty tricks are respectively stored away in the Hidden Horror and Grand Alliance's arsenals.

Christian Oaks

The dead king could retreat into the serenity and secretly be the only person who knows how to close a hellgate behind him. Or at least do what warlock did and open another so closely it can't be used

letouriste

i really love these in-between chapters. That was really sweet

Benjamin Huang

bruh this is just GG no re for the Dead King lmao. protags are next to his base, he's cut off their escape, guide ends in mid-february.

the timeframe feels really really rushed. it's only been 3 weeks since Cat left and somehow they've managed to

a) surround Keter

b) construct double rings of massive, city-encircling fortifications all while their main leadership is gone.

hopefully something cool happens.

Hargabga

Yeah, if I was the Dead King, I would've tried to stretch the war past February and into hiatus.

Liliet

It hasn't been three weeks.

Liliet

Er, as in, it's been more like a couple of months.

shikkarasu

Oh? I thought it was 2 weeks to do to Serolen, 2-3 days there, and a week travel to Keter. Seems like a lot of us missed something. What do you have for the timeline?

Liliet

I think it was like 2 weeks to Serolen before meeting Ivah then 2 weeks with Ivah, at least a week or two there, and two-three weeks to Keter (this long cause they're taking an army).

That said, I'm having trouble stretching the timeline to have the Hellgate locks release already. It was a year, a month, and a day, we have 13 months to account for. It's like, three and a half months from Hainaut to Praes, three months in Praes (total six and a half), three and a half months back (total ten), a month in Salia (total eleven) and two months to Everdark and back (total thirteen)? Travel times are eternally nebulous in Guide and the Wasteland doesn't have normal seasons, so this can be stretched into shape. Two months in Praes feels more right to me, which would necessitate four months to get there and four months back... or more than a month in Salia... when I think a month in Salia is already a stretch, it ought to have been more like a couple of weeks... Like, I get that armies get a long time to get moving, but I think four months and counting is uh, a lot.

Hargabga

Hold up, does Catherine now has an undead giant crow as a mount? When did it happen? And how does it work?

Konstantin von Karstein

It happened when she attacked the camp of that Praesi noble at the beginning of the book. From Aksum, I think?

Matthew Wells

Cat raised Zombie 8 right before raising Abreha. She's one of the Arcadia Resplendent Fae's mounts.

Alex Teates

No, it is a Praesi monster that Catherine saw and immediately went MINE!

irritantseraphim

Twas during the campaign to settle Praes, in the build-up of the battle in this hillside, I forget the name. Zombie died during an assault on the camp of Aksum, so she reanimated one of the dead crow-horse-mutants.

zenanii

It was one of the wasteland monstrosities killed during the second praes arc. The sisters helped raise it I think which is why it still has a personality.

Liliet

A griffin/hippogriff, presumably a crow one.

ohJohN

This Zombie was originally one of the monsters brought to Kala by the Aksum forces. First seen from Talbot's perspective in Juniper's Plan (Redux):

[...] by the time he arrived she was tossing a dead fae in the path of a devil belching vivid red flames while trying to fend off what looked like... a hippogriff? No, not quite. He might never have seen one of those outside heraldry, but while the creature had horse's legs and tail it instead of a hawk-like appearance it had great crow's wings and head.

It also bit off the head of the queen's horse, before she stabbed it in the neck.

[...] By the time he was done, the queen was sitting astride the dead crow monster with a smugly satisfied look on her face. No, not dead Brandon saw. Undead, for it blinked and let out a happy screech that had him wincing in pain.

In the next chapter Cat mentions that the Sisters (Komena in particular) helped with the raising process so, much like the Winter-raised flying fae Zombie, this one has more personality than her usual undead mounts.

ohJohN

hmm WordPress ate my link, here it is again: <https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2021/05/28/interlude-junipers-plan-redux>

BargleNawdleZouss

Lines of contravallation in anticipation of a larger relieving force? It's Julius Caesar at the siege of Alesia!

Kletanio

It's pretty standard siege tactics going back thousands of years. Gotta keep your enemy from attacking you while you're attacking them! So naturally, you sometimes end up with sieges of sieges.

(Been reading Bret Devereaux's series on siege warfare and fortifications. I didn't know this, but apparently "starving them out" was a really rare tactic. More often the siege was a long, slow assault build-up. Dig close to the walls to undermine them, build up a ramp to go over the walls, etc. Highly recommend.

<https://acoup.blog/2021/10/29/collections-fortification-part-i-the-besiegers-playbook/>

<https://acoup.blog/2019/05/10/collections-the-siege-of-gondor/>
)

Hargabga

Except the dead won't run away because they thought that "the cavalry is here".

Sykomantis

And so it begins

Juff

Typo Thread:

eve need > even need canmost > can most at now > at the now too, I glowered > too. I glowered pressed into Masego's > pressed it into Masego's pressingly > pressing like Highest > like the Highest for compensate > to compensate there no > there are no end up > ends up on yelp. > on a yelp.
sorcerers > sorceress already seen > already see simple traveller > a simple traveller against threes > against trees need only > needed only Words has > Word has hinterlands Keter > hinterlands of Keter that form the > that from the batting as > batting at

At guess, > At a guess, unleashed trail > unleashed a trail
Princes Rozala > Princess Rozala northing > nothing
Callow was, > Callow had,

shimizubad

Last time a Zombie showed that much personality it was bisected. I'm already crying for this one

Darkening

Well, there was a theory thrown around that Zombie 8 would survive and be the final one because Cat's Odin imagery made her need a sleipnir equivalent and sleipnir had 8 legs lol.

ohJohN

7 ZOMBIES AND 1! 7 ZOMBIES AND 1!

shimizubad

This wasn't supposed to be a reply

laguz24

Dead King, the villainous stories are active again I think. And you should have sensed it, you literally just made a heroic last stand for the ages with everything riding on the line. How are you this stupid? Next you are going to say that you're invincible and stuff.

Darkening

Well, his alternative is to let some of them escape, which will inevitably include named. And then those named, faced with the end of the world and out of possible alternatives, will form a band of five to dive into the breach with an incredibly weighty story behind them. I guess the dead king would rather bet on being able to snuff them all entirely in battle rather than have a band of nigh unkillable assassins coming for his head.

Rey d`Tutto

That's why this is the End of the Age of Wonders.
DK wins? Age of Undeath.

Coalition of Life wins?
DK minions cleanup, and detox of deadlands. Ratlings. Golden Boom twats.
Founding of Cardinal. And attendant stories...

ohJohN

Well, no explicit confirmation this is the case – Cat has the Sword of Everything Else now, so theoretically she has the ability to turn Evil stories back on, but she hasn't mentioned doing so. Perhaps she hasn't figured out exactly how yet, or she's waiting due to tactical considerations: she and her fellow villains can also benefit from the lack of Evil stories, and she might be holding that card to play at a pivotal moment when it would REALLY screw over the Dead King.

Darkening

It was described as the bard actively using an aspect to suppress the stories at all times, so I think they would have turned back on the moment bard lost her grip on them, rather than being a toggleable option cat has to enable.

Sugar Roll

The Dead King be like, "None of you seem to understand. I'm not locked in here with you. You're locked in here with me!"

charl X

Yeah everything since the tower fell HAS felt a little rushed, in previous books id have expected the serolen arc to be at least 50% longer, maybe even approaching twice as long

But the praes campaign wasn't paced too badly, the tower itself falling was a little bit rushed but still a very satisfying conclusion to that arc

Like when you compare the serolen arc and praes campaign arc to previous ones they do feel like they are going much faster, though slow pacing is a criticism some people might level at other books in the PGTE, i never minded that though

Serolen arc especially feels a bit rushed though, still written well and not unsatisfying, no big gaps to annoy me or anything, but its a noticeable change from previous arcs

And well the start of the assault on keter is blindingly fast, not even some other pov interludes or anything, just BAM the armies are all set already

shikkarasu

In fairness, the walls were raised in the 3 weeks that the Serolen arc (travel time included) took to resolve. We know that a company of 100 sappers can basically raise a keep overnight from the War College arc. Emptying out Praes of their Sappers, giving them any extra hands they need, and prepping bits of wall in advance makes complete encirclement of Keter sound pretty doable in 3 weeks, to me. I'm sure it isn't Wall Sina or anything, but better than a ring of heavies holding up tower shields.

As for Seolen being a fast arc, it was. I think the whole thing took 2-3 days? Maybe if we had more Drow POV it would have made sense to stretch out, but Cat, herself, really didn't have much to do there. She brought god-slaying talent and served as an Avatar of the Sisters for an hour at most, but ultimately she is settling into the role of figurehead while her successors run things. I, for one, don't have an issue with the pacing there.

...plus EE probably doesn't want to divide book "5" into 3 parts

*arcanavita*15

I really loved the first half of the chapter with all of the character interactions and then Ivah moment. The second half was really weird pacing, I understood it but it just felt weird in a pacing sense.

onedollargum

Such a nice little moment with Ivah. The fireside chat was cozy too.

spencer

The sexual tension with Akua is taut! When Cat snuck off for her walk in the dark I half expected Akua to follow for some pre-battle destressibg.

Darkening

Yeah, I definitely expected some moment between them when she walked off. But we got Ivah instead, which was also fun.

ohJohN

She offhandedly mentions that she brushed Akua's shoulder when she stood up, and while I fully expected Cat to not (consciously) ascribe any meaning to it I thought for sure Akua was gonna follow her like "AWW YISS SHE GAVE ME THE SIGNAL, IT'S HAPPENING"

j

Nah that was on purpose. Akua flicked Cat and then Cat returned the touch. It's on.

Levir

Once more, into the breach

nimelennar

Am I missing something? Is there some reason why Cordelia was a First Prince, but Rozala is a First Princess? Is it because they're from different regions?

Zggt

In the earliest appearances it was specifically mentioned that Cordelia wanted to be called First Prince rather than First Princess

braxen1

Yes. If I'm remembering correctly Cordelias native tongue doesn't have a word for female ruler so Prince is the traditional title. So she chose to use prince as her title.

I always thought she did that to play up her unsophisticated brute from the north image before everyone else realized what a master of statecraft she was.

Or maybe it was a bit of a silent protest over tradition.

ohJohN

I'm also only working from memory so I can't say for certain, but I thought it was a specifically Rhenian cultural quirk – I believe Reitz (Cordelia's native tongue) is the primary language for all Lycaonese principalities, yet Mathilda Greensteel is called the Princess of Neustria.

I vaguely recall it being a matter of pride to Cordelia to use 'First Prince' – embracing the (admittedly outmoded) Rhenian address to draw attention to her status as the first Lycaonese head of state – but knowing her she was probably playing a few angles simultaneously through that choice (I think at one point some southern royals even mention it explicitly as an example of her brutishness, so mission accomplished!).

(Her other title, Princess of Salia, is also interesting: my guess is that, because it's the only one that is jurisdictionally unrelated to Rhenia, those cultural factors didn't apply.)

braxen1

Found it. Good thing I remembered it was in a Cordelia Interlude. In the Prologue of Book 2. Would have needed another read through if it was a Cat chapter.

"It seemed to dumbfound southerners that she still went by the Rhenian formal address rather than the more gender-accurate one she'd gained upon her election as the ruler of the Principate. While she was technically the princess of Salia, now that she'd gained the title of First Prince, she refused to allow the southlings to slight her heritage by refusing to acknowledge that she came from the northernmost principality of Procer. Rhenia was still backwards in some regards and the laws had never been officially amended to reflect the reality of women ruling, but she was proud of her origins nonetheless."

I was close, but definitely off on the tradition aspect.

nimelennar

Thanks! If I ever noticed that, I have certainly forgotten it!

Daniel E

What became of The Sword Of Everything Else? Is Cat just keeping it as an artifact?

Sinead

I assume she will use it in a suitably dramatic moment to break the Dead King.

Perhaps she cuts off his Due or something, so he gets no death curse.

Rabblrouser

This is the endgame.

Alexey Romanov

Do they know tides are caused by the moon?

Chapter 50: Clouds

"O Fiona, would you weep,

*of your old bargain now?
Queen to not, a price steep that they now disavow*

—

A just king was promised, just a king's what we got and our coin's still honest, but it heads south to rot

—

*Deliver us, o knight of Dunloch,
Your honour fierce and proud
Singing of the kingdom lost
Whose banner is now a shroud*

—

*Faith kept is faith earned
But when oaths lie forgot
No king can call it treason
To speak true of our lot*

—

*So one night I may leave,
Abandon home and hearth, choose the sword and believe in getting an oath's worth*

—

*But it will not be tonight,
the step is cold with rime.
But under the dying light,
I'll sing it one last time —*

—

Deliver us, o knight of Dunloch,

Your honour fierce and proud

Singing of the kingdom lost

Whose banner is now a shroud."

— "O Knight of Dunloch", Callowan rebel song from the northern baronies

The arrival of the last army to join the siege of Keter should have been an uplifting moment, like the beginning of the end for the Crown of the Dead, but instead the coming of the Firstborn had been drowned in the shadow of Neshamah's counterblow. I landed in the Third Army's camp to cheers that rang a little hollow and didn't bother to make a spectacle out of it: posturing would not remove the sight of the sky falling from the minds of my soldiers, and it'd look all the more laughable for trying. I handed off my reins to a stout Vale boy and let myself be guided to the command tent, informed by one of the phalanges that Juniper was already waiting for me.

More than just her, as it turned out. All four of the Army of Callow's generals were there, as well as the expected old hands — Aisha and Pickler. So was Kilian, to my surprise, but I kept the sentiment off my face. It made sense, given that these days she was the longest serving of our Senior Mages. Our surviving ones, anyway. I took Juniper's offered arm with a wan smile, clasping it in a legionary's salute before turning to the others.

General Bagram, the oldest veteran in the room, had visibly aged since I last him. The orc's fangs had yellowed and his eyes grown sunken, even if his back was still straight. Zola Osei looked better rested, and more confident for her solid performance during the Praesi campaign. She'd not be shy before, but not that assurance was less of a performance. Lady Abigail — of House Tanner, nowadays — still looked like she'd bot out of the tent given a halfway decent excuse, her eyes a little too wide kind of like a panicking horse, but her Third Army's reputation towered above that of all the others.

The last and freshest addition was an old man with a crooked nose and blue hair, still built like a bull for all that his hair had turned white. General Jeremiah Holt, formerly of the Thirteenth Legion and now instead of the Fifth Army. The First and Second, merged after the heavy losses at Hainaut, would remain that way for the rest of the war. It was better for Vivienne for them to start their own legacy, anyway. She'd get to grant them a cognomen herself and cement the close tie, like I had with the Third. Besides, it would have left a bad taste in the mouth to hand this strange Hune's old rank.

"Where's Princess Vivienne?" I asked after the round of greetings.

I'd forgotten how very red Kilian's hair was, I'd admit. It was still as striking a feature as I'd found it at seventeen, even more so now that she wore it a little longer.

"The White Knight sent for her," Juniper told me. "There's been correspondence from the Kingdom Under."

I sucked in a breath.

"Good news?" I asked.

The tall orc looked at me with irritation.

"If we already knew," Marshal Juniper growled, "she'd be here, wouldn't she?"

I grinned, which startled her and so the grin only grew. I patted her arm, to her bafflement.

"Missed you too, Hellhound," I fondly said.

She cleared her throat.

"Yes, well, we have military business," Juniper stiffly replied.

She was already getting enough amused looks at her expense that I decided to spare her further teasing. I invited everyone to sit, helping myself to the cup of water that Aisha had poured me. I noted the taste of lemon, which I'd grown to like in Praes, and shot the Taghreb beauty her an appreciative look. I got a wink back. Ah, Aisha. She was still tempting even with Juniper at the table and a fresh reminder of the dangers of sharing a bed with a subordinate squeezed in between Pickler and Zola.

"So," I said, setting down my cup with a sharp rap. "Fill me in."

Given that this was a siege, who was to report first was evident enough no order need be given.

"We'll be finished surrounding Keter by tomorrow evening," Sapper-General Pickler said. "We started by making gate-fortes in front of the bridges, but we're planning a full encirclement."

She paused.

"Both circumvallation and contravallation," Pickler specified.

I could think of a few reasons why the Grand Alliance would bother to wall up our side of the 'moat' that was a chasm miles deep, but one in particular came to mind.

"They've been shooting at us, I take it," I stated.

"Ballistae and sorcery," Juniper said. "At night especially, though they change the hour to keep us on our toes."

"And we're handling the magic?" I asked.

Juniper slid a look Kilian's way, who brushed back a strand of red hair in a way that brought a faint pang of nostalgia before she cleared her throat and spoke up.

"Our wards are sufficient to handle the swarms," Senior Mage Kilian informed me, "and ritual attacks have been going sharply in our favour, at least on the defence."

I breathed in sharply.

"The Praesi made that much of a difference?" I incredulously asked.

"We estimate we might have as many as twice the number of mages as there are within Keter now that we have both the cabals and the Magisterium," Kilian replied. "It's still hard to guarantee that we can surpass the enemy in any single place when they concentrate their forces, but alongside Lady Nahiza Seriff we've set up proactive defences to get around that."

I cocked an eyebrow at the vagueness.

"We hit their rituals with ours before they can hit our troops," Kilian summed up, tone dry.

I swallowed a smile.

"Well done," I praised, meaning it.

Wouldn't work forever, since our mages got tired while Neshamah's didn't, but while we finished our siege works it was a solid defensive measure. When we went on the offensive, however, we'd have to pull mages off the defence and then things would get nasty. But they'll get even worse than that if we don't have cadres of diabolists waiting for the demons we're sure to get dropped on us.

"Siege preparations?" I asked the table at large.

"Bombardment of the southern and western gates has already begun," Juniper replied, "but we're having a hard time getting through the wards in the stone. We're holding off until we have a way to crack them."

"I'll put Akua on it," I absent-mindedly said.

Masego was better at wards, which was only natural given that his father had been the undisputed master of them in this lifetime, but I'd need him for something else. I needed to know how badly the Twilight Ways had been hit. It should just be a temporary shattering in the Kingdom of the Dead, I thought, but if it wasn't... I'd planned to imprison the Dead King in the Ways, after forcing on him the poisoned Crown of Autumn. I'd even picked out his keeper, someone I could trust to keep him forever contained. I grit my teeth. The latter part of that scheme was already in doubt, but if even the premise was buried I was in the deeps.

Had he known? Was that why he'd hit the Ways like this, even though he had to know that cornering heroes was putting the wind at their back? I had yet to break the sword I had ripped out of the Intercessor to restore Below's stories, keeping that blow as a card up my sleeve, but he had to know that when I did that counterstroke would cost him. It smelled of a mistake to me, and we were too late in the game for the King of Death to be making this kind of mistake. Something was up. What's the angle here, Neshamah? What is it you're after? I drifted back to the present, noticing that most the table was looking at me expectantly.

I'd probably been asked a question, I realized with faint embarrassment. Not acute enough for me to stop, though.

"Have there been any sorties?" I asked.

"Not since we've finished raising the gate forts," General Jeremiah replied, frowning. "Your Majesty, if you would-"

I raised my hand to silence him.

"Not one?" I insisted.

"No," General Bagram told me, leaning forward with clear interest. "All the fighting's been at our backs. The devils are chewing up the dead in the south, but every other skeleton's headed our way. We've been chasing off armies led by Scourges."

I drummed my fingers against the table.

"The earlier sorties," I slowly said. "Were any of them led by a Scourge?"

Blinks of surprise. Aisha was the first to answer.

"None," the Staff Tribune said. "There were other Revenants, but none of that calibre were reported."

Only Neshamah wouldn't send out all his best Revenants out in the field, he had to know he needed assets to handle the hero death squads we'd be throwing at him. Meaning he's keeping them back on purpose, I thought. Trying to prevent our Named from catching one of them and putting them down early? No, he wouldn't be thinking that way at this point. Trading a single Scourge for ten Named was the kind of bargain he'd take with a smile, because there would be no more Named reinforcements. Every Named he killed was one less story, one less aspect we could use against him. If anything, he should be eager to bleed our numbers dry.

It didn't make military sense for him to hold back the Scourges, which meant he was moving according to another set of rules. And one I knew that, his intent was not so obscure after all. I rubbed the bridge of my nose.

"This is," I muttered, "a goddamn mud trap."

Neshamah had no intention at all of fighting us in a desperate last battle. He was just keeping us here for the two, three months he needed for his armies to finish destroying Procer and raising it. That was the real way Calernia lost, when he devoured the Principate and fielded an amount of undead beyond our capacity to beat. He'd keep throwing expendable armies at our back to prevent us from mounting a proper assault on Keter, but I suspected that if it came down to it he might actually cede his capital. Did he really need the Hellgate and the Serenity behind it, if he already had the rest of Calernia on a silver platter? They were conqueror's tools, and the conquest was already halfway done.

And beyond even that, a sudden fear assaulted me. We'd bet it all on ending the Dead King here to end his armies, but was he even here? No, I told myself, I was overcorrecting. I could still feel the thick knot of stories coming together in Keter, as if it were just out of my sight, and that couldn't be anyone else. He wouldn't have risked it, I decided. Providence would have pointed us at him anyway, and there's nowhere he has better defences at than Keter. And yet... I pushed back my chair, brusquely getting to my feet. The eyes of the highest-ranking military officers in Callow were all on me, showing varied scales of curiosity and wariness, so I kept my face calm.

I needed to talk with Hanno and soon. I had to be sure. The heroes must have a way to check if the Hidden Horror's in the city, I thought. Before that, though, we needed to adjust our basic strategy.

"Begin preparing for assaults as soon as tomorrow," I ordered. "Our timeline has changed."

Juniper's eyes met mine.

"Warlord?"

"The Dead King's trying to run out the hourglass on us, Juniper," I darkly said. "So let's remind him why he should know better than to take us so lightly."

—

The council Vivienne had gone to was done by the time I got there, but I got lucky. She'd stayed behind to have a drink and a talk with Hanno — Callowan diplomacy at its finest — which allowed me to catch the both of them together. The first thing I noticed when I laid eyes on them was that Vivienne was looking great. A little taller than when I'd last seen her, which smacked of Name given that it was late for her to get a growth spurt, and she'd gained some muscle too. Wearing armour and going around carrying a sword had added tone to her arms. I swept her into a hug before we even greeted each other, and if the way she tightly returned it was any indication she'd missed me too.

"Princess," I smiled, drawing back.

"Warden," she smiled back.

Only then did I turn my attention to Hanno, who'd be looking at us with tolerant amusement. He'd not changed much in the time since we'd last seen each other, at least not physically. But the power I could sense him, however tightly constrained, gave away that he'd gotten something back since our talks in Salia.

"You're Named again," I said.

"Not yet," Hanno of Arwad serenely replied, "but I believe it imminent."

"I'm happy for you," I told him, a little surprised to find I meant it.

He'd be a lot more useful to me as enforce of the Accords as a hero, of course, but it went further than that. If Hanno had gone through the doubts and all the reproaches I'd crammed down his throat when he tried to become Warden of the West, then he'd end up better off for it. He'd been struggling with hesitation and his own sense of what was just ever since the Seraphim had gone quiet, so if he'd found a measure of peace with his situation I could only be glad.

Besides, with serenity came strength and we'd need heroes of his calibre to take Keter.

Vivienne set aside the abominable brandy they'd been drinking to pour me a cup of wine, further reinforcing that she was the right choice for my successor, and I joined them at the collection of folding tables they'd been using as a single larger one. I raised an eyebrow at the high number of chairs, which Vivi caught.

"We had to give the Free Cities five seats," she explained, "since the Blood has five as well and giving less would have been an insult."

"So Procer got five as well," I said, rolling my eye. "Please tell me you didn't make a scene for us as well."

Hanno snorted.

"Two of those seats are empty in your name," he said. "One for the Warden, the other for the Queen of Callow."

I sent Vivienne an aggrieved look. She well knew my opinion on having too many people sitting in council – it was an inconvenience at best, trouble at worst. A conference was one thing, but a council needed to actually be able to hear itself talk.

"It does wonder for my leg room," the Princess told me, entirely unrepentant.

"I always knew the power would go to your head," I sighed. "I should have seen the signs, just look at the kind of people you've been rubbing elbows with."

Hanno shot me an interested look.

"She plays dice with Indrani," I told him. "No one of decent repute would ever subject themselves to that."

"Sidonia once told me she cheats most relentlessly," he noted.

"Eh," Vivienne said. "Her sleight of hand could use some work."

I smiled into my cup, drinking of the wine – some Proceran pale that'd likely get rare in the coming years, given that the undead had not been great for vineyards – and letting the warmth of it soothe my throat. I set it down with a dull thud, the sound getting their attention. They'd both known me long enough to recognize it as a signal for us turning to business.

"Got a question for you," I told Hanno. "I don't suppose there's a heroic Name trick that can be used to confirm the Dead King is in the city?"

He looked surprise, the plain but honest face slowly developing a frown.

"You're afraid he's abandoned his capital in favour of Procer," the dark-skinned hero said.

"It shouldn't be the case," I replied. "But we're not in a place where maybes are something to tolerate."

He nodded in understanding.

"There is no such trick," he said. "Providence can sometimes be bent to the purpose, but it is unfortunately unreliable when it comes to the Hidden Horror."

I grimaced. So much for that.

"However," Hanno continued, "I have reason to believe he is in Keter as of today. Antigone's opinion is that the ritual used against the Twilight Ways earlier was directed by his own hand."

Vivienne stirred.

"One of the Scourges is a mage," she pointed out.

"Not sure the Tumult could handle a ritual like this," I noted. "It's a gestalt soul, not a practitioner capable of this quality of magic."

"That is still," she said, "a maybe."

I grimaced. She wasn't wrong, I conceded as worried my lip.

"I'll see if Masego can find out," I said, reluctant as I was to heap more on his plate. "A godhead, at the very least, shouldn't be possible to hide."

Which also meant Neshamah knew we had the Crown of Autumn in our camp, but he couldn't know what we meant it for. With that matter as settled as it could be in the moment, I pivoted to the greater consideration.

"So," I said, "I hear we've got word from the Kingdom Under."

Both their faces were grim, a sight that had my stomach clenching.

"Two letters," Vivienne said. "A personal one from the Herald, carried by Seeker Balasi, and a formal one from the negotiator for the King Under the Mountain."

She'd phrased the letters as coming from two different people, which had a worrying implication.

"The Herald's no longer in charge of negotiations," I stated, and it was not a question.

"He has been replaced," Hanno said, "by a Lady Sybella. Who informs us that any promises he might have made were done so without the backing of the Kingdom Under."

"Fuck," I feelingly said.

I leaned back into the chair, closing my eye and tilting my head back. That wasn't quite the worst outcome for us, but it wasn't far either. The amount of soldiers we'd gathered for the siege of Keter was the single largest army – of the living, anyway – in the history of Calernia. Numbers were a little vague given the many moving parts and lack of records in some armies, but we should be somewhere between two hundred and two hundred fifty thousand souls in all. Cordelia had pulled off fucking miracles getting enough supplies to feed an army that size on the march from a crumbling Procer, and gone even further by getting enough to feed us for part of the siege, but it wouldn't last.

"How long do we have before we're out?" I asked.

"For water, two months," Vivienne said. "We've already started rationing food, and at this rate we have three to four weeks left."

"If the Dead King does not hit our supplies," Hanno reminded me.

We needed the dwarves. We had around two months before Procer was done and Calernia with it, but we wouldn't even last that long if the Kingdom Under didn't bring us food. I breathed out, forcing calm, and opened my eye.

"All right," I said. "Hit me with it. What does Lady Sybella want?"

"The original terms the Herald proposed," Hanno said. "With the addition of the city of Keter."

I thinly smiled.

"Does she also want Laure while she's at it?" I bit out.

"The phrasing of her missive was... strong, Cat," Vivienne said. "She's not interested in negotiating terms with us. We take it or leave it."

My fingers clenched. One of these days, we'd have to get around to teach the Kingdom Under a modicum of humility. They were the great empire of Calernia, but their hegemony had always relied on keeping out of surface affairs and playing nations against each other. Now that they were putting a knife at our common throat to extort us while the Dead King tried to kill us all, they'd outed themselves for the bandits they were. If we survived this fucking war, I expected that diplomatic efforts to squeeze the dwarves out of our affairs would find fertile grounds.

But first we had to survive.

"She has to know at least half of us would rather tell the dwarves to bite it and take our chances with Keter," I finally said. "And that was before she further upped the price. She's overplaying her hand. Why?"

"The Herald's letter shed some light on the matter," Hanno said, jaw locked tight. "He tells us that the Kingdom Under has learned of the ealamal's existence."

I blinked. Yeah, hard to keep that under wraps when it was getting brought here for the siege. What would that change – no, he couldn't possibly mean that.

"You can't be serious," I quietly said. "They actually want us to use it?"

"The mathematics are simple, from where they're standing," Vivienne ruefully said. "Either we give them everything they want and they lend a hand, or we blow them off and lose to the dead without them. Then, in our despair..."

"They think we'll blow ourselves to the Hells and the Dead King with us," I completed.

"Not so much to the Hells," Hanno said, "but that is the essence of it. They expect the ealamal to empty large swaths of western Calernia, leaving the lands ripe for the taking."

Why bother negotiating with the humans, I thought, when they might do you the courtesy of emptying their own lands so you could take them? And since the ealamal was unlikely to reach as far as southern Procer, they could still take the cities they'd asked for by force with the populations intact afterwards. Gods, with the continent so ravaged some might even be grateful for the protection.

"That's one of the vilest plans I've ever heard," I said. "And I have heard vile plans, Hanno, even speaking a few myself."

"It is unconscionable," the dark-skinned man agreed. "The Herald of the Deeps agrees, hence his warning. He also reiterates his promise that he will do all he can."

I almost rolled my eye at that, refraining only for Hanno's sake. So far all the Herald had done was try to roll us when we were vulnerable and then fail to be of any use when turning his cloak. I'd spare a speck of gratitude for the warning, but wasn't putting a lot of hope in the dwarf. He'd done nothing to warrant it and much to do otherwise. The room fell silent and I began drumming my fingers against the table, lost in thought. Eventually, though, I had to speak up.

"I don't see a way out of this," I quietly admitted. "Our bet was that the Herald would come through, and it appears we've lost it."

"With the rationing we still have three weeks," Vivienne said, but we both knew otherwise.

It would hardly be a victory to take Keter within that time, because our armies would likely be fucked anyways: we couldn't forage in the Kingdom of the Dead, which mean that to eat we'd have to march back. To Procer or Serolen, but both were weeks away. Weeks where hundreds of thousands of soldiers would be expected to march with empty stomach. They'd die, we all knew. They'd die in droves, and darks things would be done as we grew desperate to survive. Even if we won, I realized, even if we got the Dead King, we might still lose. Not because of Gods or sorcery or a story, but because we were too far out in enemy territory without a supply line and our diplomatic efforts had failed.

"The cause is not lost," Hanno said, unruffled. "Being cornered with everything on the line lends us strength enough to overcome the impossible."

He paused, brown eyes moving to me.

"And that sword at your hip is not a sword at all, Catherine, unless I'm gravely mistaken."

People didn't actually tend to notice the sword at all unless it was pointed out to them, even Named, but then Hanno's name hadn't been picked out of a hat when he became the Sword of Judgement. But Vivienne, from the half-hidden startlement on her face, had not noticed it until just now. I unclasped the sheath from my belt, a beautiful wooden piece carved and painted by an artisan of the Ysengral Sigil that displayed the northern constellations on moonless night, and slid out the blade. It didn't look like much, really. Just a smooth steel arming sword that lacked a crossguard, its edge wickedly sharp to even a casual eye but otherwise unremarkable.

It was only fitting, I supposed, that Below's stories would take the form of a double-edged blade without a guard. Sometime my Gods had a halfway decent sense of humour

"No," I agreed, "it's a little more than that."

"You can free the stories at any time, then," Hanno said. "And it might not be as simple as sealing his doom in a single stroke, but..."

"It'll tip the balance," I finished.

It'd hurt him. That was the reason behind the strategy I'd begun sniffing out today, after all: Neshamah was afraid of the stories coming back. That was why the only armies fighting the Grand Alliance were coming from outside the city, why they were led by Scourges and why he was hiding behind his walls. It was even why he'd shattered the Twilight Ways only after the Firstborn had crossed: he was religiously avoiding direct confrontation. Because he knew the moment it was him against us, everything on the line, I'd break the sword and the result would not be a finger on the balance so much as a hand around his throat.

We were in deeps, I wouldn't deny that, but so was he. And that meant we were still in this war.

"Masego called it the Book of Some Things, the other one," Vivienne said.

"Not my choice," I defended. "He insisted that since he'd made the artefact he should get to name it."

"I thought the name rather charming, actually," Hanno smiled.

Ugh, he would. I shared a look with the other Callowan in the room.

"So what are you calling this one, then?" Vivienne asked.

I raised up the blade, noticing it did not gleam even under candlelight – as if it refused to reflect light entirely – and studied it, then smiled. It'd be a shame not to keep to the naming scheme now that Hierophant had started it, since it was too late to take back anyway.

"I'm rather partial," I replied, "to the 'Sword of the Rest'."

elanevensong

Thank you for the chapter!

Droughtbringer

<https://topwebfiction.com/listings/a-practical-guide-to-evil/>

Liliet

Damn, congratulations to the people who called it.

The sword's name, I mean.

Frivolous

shikkarasu – 10 denarii to you. You were right, the Sword of Other Things is an arming sword.

Frivolous

Also thanks very much EE for describing the Sword for us. Very informative.

Quote: It was only fitting, I supposed, that Below's stories would take the form of a double-edged blade without a guard. Sometime my Gods had a halfway decent sense of humour

Quote: I raised up the blade, noticing it did not gleam even under candlelight – as if it refused to reflect light entirely

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Inswordmative, if you will.

shikkarasu

Thank the Gods; I must still be 25 in the hole from all my other bets.

Tenthyr

I deeply desire Catherine to at least stab a Scourge to re-death with the Sword of the Rest...

dadycoool

So, is there a Sword of the Best that I don't know about? It's always fun to watch the gears turn in her head. Such a meta schemer.

Hargabga

Also Sword of the Test and Sword of the Pest.

dadycoool

Hm, Best, maybe East, Fest for holidays, Hest for stand-ins, Jest for the court fools, Lest for the soothsayers and oracles, Nest for the birds, you mentioned Pest, Quest for adventurers, you mentioned Test, Vest for the fashionable, West, someone else mentioned Zest.

Anyway, I figured it was a "One for the best, and another for all the rest" kind of thing.

Reaper

Sword of the Pest was Irritant's sword

D. D.

"Book of Some Things"

"Sword of the Rest"

onedollargum

I really like that name. Some Things and The Rest.

M0och123

Lest we forget the sword of zest

dadycoool

Oh, that's the pun. OK.

shikkarasu

The rest of the stories, wrested from the bard, to lay her enemies to rest. Oh, Cat, didn't you tell us you dislike puns? You beautiful liar, you.

RoflCat

After thinking about it, I think the name is more fitting than I thought at first.

'some things' might be generalizing but it implies it's there, that the speaker is thinking of specific group at least. While 'the rest' has this dismissive, uncaring sound to to what they're referring to.

Which I find rather fitting to how Above and Below operates with regards to their Named.

Above pick and choose their Heroes, while Below take in anyone willing, including those rejected by Above (rip Apostate)

SpeckofStardust

So the dead king is in a holding pattern because he scared of a story fight where he is really really in a bad spot, the kingdom under is the problem for the age of order, with the elves and giants being the only 2 powers not involved in the current crap storm.

So where's the twist to shake the current status that bard will be betting on?

Darkening

I'm expecting the herald to show up at the head of an army of deed seekers and disaffected dwarves at some point.

Santiago A Duarte

That's not really how armies work, though. Especially when you're talking about mercenaries and adventurers spread out beneath an entire continent and gathering them without the approval of a central government. You simply can't do that and get to where you want to go within three weeks. If Herald had started the process six months ago, sure, but then it would have been mentioned in the letter

Liliet

Not necessarily! Mentioned i mean.

asazernik

Especially given he knows a bit of Namelore, and a surprise reinforcement is more apt to arrive at just the right time.

Mirror Night

Well also DK is sweeping across the land of Procer. He just needs to not lose here. He doesn't have to win just wait about 2-3 months or so and his forces elsewhere will win. But yes Cat having the Sword of Villainous Stories prevents him from making a big move and over committing.

egregiousmiscellany

There are ostensibly Good people in the Serenity. DK can probably try flipping the good/evil dichotomy.

Cicero

That choice on the part of the dwarves is blood feud level of insult.

I'd seriously consider killing all the dwarven envoys and sending back their heads as answer.

What does it matter that it will enrage the dwarves, they've already sided with the Lich King, what more can they do. It's war to destruction now.

SpeckofStardust

Now its not that bad.

But they did basically decide to sit this one out because they know that the dead king will lose and best case it be due to a suicide attack by the surface nations.

But ya the kingdom under is 100% going to be the problem for the next age to deal with.

letouriste

Wasn't Bagram dead?

Yep, Bagram's Dead

Yes, Bagram is dead, though it was only reported to us by Cat as narrator as a casualty report, it didn't play out in the text itself

Juff

Typo Thread:

Queen to not, (is this right? should it be "naught") be shy > been shy but not that > but now that bot out > bolt out wide kind > wide, kind this strange > this stranger beauty her > beauty gate-fortes > gate-forts this lifetime > his lifetime
And one I > And once I of Name given > of a Name, given sense him, > sense in him, enforce of > enforcer of Hanno had gone through (should be more like "overcome") does wonder > does wonders looked surprise, > looked surprised, as worried > as I worried to teach the > to teaching the empty stomach > empty stomachs sense of humour (missing fullstop)

ChillyPepper

Not sure if it's my English being bad or what, but there is the bit with Jeremiah having blue hair, but then says its white? (kinda confusing me a bit, gotta admit)

Earl of Purple

It should be eyes, not hair. He has blue eyes.

Reader in the Night

Could be because "blue hair" is sometimes used as a synonym of grey or silver hair.

Agent J

Could be he went white and then dyed it blue. That's my new headcanon anyway.

Cat feels oddly zen in this chapter, I feel like she is becoming more and more like the bard and the dead king just in her own way or at least something similar to them.

*arcanavita*15

I am hyped for Cats other two aspects, and maybe expansion on Silence.

ChillyPepper

Is that a red flag on Kilian, she gonna die, ain't she?

Dome Zasrekh

Or (hopefully) she will help break the ice on Cat's love life. She's still sooo bad at this, she needs help!

ninegardens

The flag is red only in the most literal interpretation.

GluestickGenius

Nah, that's her hair. Easy to confuse, however.

frederic

I'm curious. Why do the dwarves assume that the ealamal will not affect them as much, or more, than the surface if it is used? Usually area of effect is a sphere, not a surface-following circle.

M0och123

That's a good point, Fireball is a 20ft radius sphere after all.

dadycool

So when I cast it in a tavern, I'm also vaporizing the people upstairs?

Miles

Only if your xM is paying attention, which is a big ask.

Liliet

The ceiling is in the way, and has its own HP.

Presumably the dwarves expect the, well, ground to keep them safe.

(The GA's calculations back in the Arsenal did account for the Whitecaps serving as an obstacle to the spread)

Eris

Pretty sure it has been established that the Ealamal wouldn't go over the Whitecaps, i.e. sufficient amounts of earth serve as an "insulator" of sorts

Earl of Purple

It's slowed down by solid rock, it's why Callow and Praes survive. The Whitecaps get in the way and get vaporised. Plus the main dwarf cities are further south than this, so it's only recently settled territory bearing the brunt.

shikkarasu

I'd love to know why the dwarves are so certain that no-one will sneak the ealamal down into the deeps and fire it there. A half mad Hero, Villain, or just the last member of House Insurgent. Dial it up to 11, forget about surviving and just blast them all.

Do. Not. Piss. Off. Callow. What was it that one into quote said? If you steal an apple from a Callowan farmer you can expect their grandchild to find yours 50 years later on the other side of Calernia, punch them in the eye, and steal 3 apples on their way out?

mindsword2

Chapter 47: And Justice For All

"The question of who the most vindictive people of Calernia are has long been debated. Some say it is the Arlesites, who will duel to the death over the use of the wrong adjective in a verse. Others say it is those of the Free Cities, where the moving of a border by half a mile will spawn a war lasting three generations. Others yet say it is the Praesi, who indulge in political assassination the way other nations enjoy a cup of good wine. I would humbly put forward, however, that the answer is the people of Callow. Steal an apple from a farmer of the Kingdom and fifty years later his grandson will find yours on the other side of the continent, sock him in the eye and take three apples back." – Extract from "Horrors and Wonders", famed travelogue of Anabas the Ashuran

RoflCat

And the story of them making suicidal push into Procer (or was it Praes?) to the point the ruler at the time had to make massive remunerations just to get them to go away.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

I think you're thinking of the incident that taught Mercantis not to fuck with Callow, but the point stands regardless.

Daniel E

Credit to the author for creating the first instance of Dwarves that I dislike. The drunken work-a-holics of Dwarf Fortress, the honorable misfits of Tolkien, even the soccer hooligans of Warhammer. All great Dwarves. But these guys take 'greedy jerks' to a whole new level.

jack

I was expecting "The Double Edged Sword"

I'm also expecting the Dead King to try to steal it from her. Probably successfully.

When have any of Cat's plans ever worked out when he was involved?

She'd probably be better off breaking it now, before she loses the chance.

308924810a

Who is this and what has she done to our pun-hating Catherine? What with sword of the rest being used in both the sense of a sword containing the remainder, and a sword which brings an end to activity(either of the dead king, or of stories).

Liliet

Catherine has always had her moments of slipping up in her pun hatred...

Gideon

And now, after weeks of binging, I am finally caught up to present. What a wonderful ride.

DC

Between Anaraxes and Hanno, I wonder if this is going towards Judgment being tempered to a safe level before the weapon is invoked

Alien4ngel

'The sword that is not a sword, but a promise...'
But I can't recall the chapter.

Darkening

You thinking of the staff that was a sword that was a prayer?

ruduen

So, the dwarven villains have unshakably strong positions while the dwarven hero is desperately trying to keep his vow and make things better.

Will breaking the sword also have an impact on dwarven stories? The comeuppance on that side is also liable to be swift and harsh, if dwarven stories are anything like the stories we've seen.

Chapter 51: Arsenal

"Thirty-three: it doesn't matter how good the sword is, if it talks put it back where you found it. Yes, even if it lets you beat your nemesis. They probably thought their talking sword was a good idea too and look where that got them."

– "Two Hundred Heroic Axioms", author unknown

Indrani was carving away at the table when I found her, sprawled under it.

"I may have to call the guards," I mused out loud, taking off my riding gloves, "there appears to be some kind of table goblin in my tent."

I got a scoff in answer and she popped out her head long enough to roll her eyes at me.

"Please," Archer replied. "I'm at least the height of two table goblins."

She retreated under the table, steel rasping against wood as she shaved away at a detail, and when she spoke up again I could hear the goddamn grin in her voice.

"Unlike some," she airily added.

"That's treason, it is," I gravely replied.

"This is why we call you Sanguinia behind your back, you know," Indrani informed me.

"She was a visionary ahead of her time," I defended.

Dread Empress Sanguinia II had outlawed being taller than her in the final – relatively more – despotic years of reign, which was a sensible enough decree. She'd also outlawed cats for some reason, which I honestly I could take or leave. I unclasped my sheath, set it on the table and leaned against it to dip under and at least have a look at her face. What I got instead was pulled by the collar followed by warm lips against mine, with a hungry little nip at the end that had me lingering for more. Must have stayed there a while, because I was still enjoying myself when someone cleared their throat behind me. I dipped back out, a little out of breath, and found Vivienne eyeing me impatiently.

"Vivs," Indrani drawled, still under the table, "I know you want in on this real bad, but wait for your turn."

The Princess's blue-grey eyes considered me, then moved to Indrani's half-visible body.

"I could do better," Vivienne shrugged.

"Who's she talking about?" 'Drani asked from under the table.

"Both," she replied in my stead, not hesitating for a moment.

"Hey," I protested. "I got stabbed in Serolen and it still kind of stung less than that."

"You should probably stop making plans that have a step where you get stabbed, you know," Indrani advised me. "I'm no expert, but it does seem like a flaw in your plan-making process."

"You can't ask her that, Indrani," Vivienne chided. "You know it's what she always uses when she's missing a step. Like, don't know how to convince that princess?"

"Get stabbed," Archer chortled, the filthy traitor. "Don't know how to beat that hero?"

"Get stabbed," Vivienne completed, meeting my eye with a look of smug satisfaction.

I glared back. We both knew Indrani was going to worry that joke like a fucking bone for at least a year now, which Vivienne had inflicted on me purely as her long price for forcing her to see what she'd walked in on.

"Why did I even miss you people?" I asked.

My eye narrowed.

"And it's my goddamn tent you know," I told Vivienne. "Don't think I won't find Arthur some nice noble boy and crown his ass instead, Dartwick."

"I have no idea what you might be referring to," the Princess smilingly lied. "I only came to inform you that we've talks to wrap up with Prince Otto at Evening Bell."

I blinked in surprise.

"About..." I leadingly said.

"Yes," she confirmed.

"I didn't think you'd get it done this quickly, given the circumstances," I admitted. "Well done."

"Do not overpraise me," she demurred, lips quirking anyway. "Reitzenberg proved a remarkably straightforward man to deal with even before Prince Frederic joined his name to the venture."

The Kingfisher Prince was in as well? No, of course he was. That'd always been the most admirable thing about Frederic Goethal: he always tried to do what he thought was right, whether or not it was convenient for everyone else. I'd cursed him for that at the Arsenal, when he'd refused to give Cordelia and I our easy way out of the situation with the Red Axe, but it wouldn't do to forget that most of time it was a boon that the Prince of Brus went out of his way to be a good man.

"I'll be there," I said, then paused. "And get Pickler to come as well, would you?"

I was fixed with a steady look.

"As is she fond of telling me," Vivienne said, "she is busy enough for five of her, which sadly Masego has not yet figured out how to make because as usual sorcery is useless."

"Make her come anyway," I said, and it was not a suggestion this time.

She nodded. Good. I'd meant it, when in Serolen I'd told Cordelia I intended to repay every drop of my debt to the people that'd raised me up. And Pickler had been in that room, the first time I strayed from Black and Malicia's plan to make something of my own. The first time I committed treason to their cause for fidelity to my own. She'd argued, she'd been afraid, but in the end she had sworn.

And I had not forgotten.

"I've got correspondence that could use your attention, if you have the time," Vivienne said.

Barely two hours into camp and already I had a dozen duties pulling me in different directions. Serolen, for all the dangers there, had been strikingly less demanding in that regard. A reminder that I was not a figurehead or a symbol here, that I had made myself an integral part of the Grand Alliance and its policies.

"Can't," I replied. "Hanno suggested I have a look at something the Blessed Artificer has been cooking up."

I'd had a look at it back in Salia and been impressed by the power of what she'd created, but when the Sword of Judgment called something 'significantly dangerous' we were dealing with another league. Adanna of Smyrna had been eager to tell me that Masego wasn't the only one who improved his craft through conflict, and though I couldn't think of an enemy she'd have fought in my absence that would kick her up a notch she had been in charge of guarding the Crown of Autumn.

"I'm not certain where she is," Vivienne said, heading off my question before I asked it. "I'll put the phalanges on finding out."

I nodded in thanks, rolling my shoulder.

"Might go have a talk with the Mirror Knight first, then," I said. "They can reach me there."

That had been Hanno's other suggestion, as it happened. Christophe de Pavanie had been chosen to be the Severance's bearer, and though I didn't believe for a moment that the sword we'd made out of Saint's aspect would be enough to do in the Dead King there was no denying he'd play a key role in how we'd pull down Keter's roof on his head. To have a look at him as the Warden, feel out the stories he was bound to, was only sensible.

"Won't need to," Indrani said, dragging herself out from under the table.

She set down her knife on the carved wood, but now that I had my first good look at her since returning my eye was looking beyond flesh. I went still, sharpening my focus. There'd been the faintest trace of the story before I left, but it had since set in stone. My Name pulsed in my veins as I followed the thread, trying to make out the timing but finding it too elusive to narrow down beyond 'soon'. Still, there was no denying it: she'd be getting a visit. And following that chord I could get a glimpse at the knot to come, the makings of the fight, and that gave me a look at the people who'd be fighting. Some of which I'd not been sure would be involved. So you'll come, after all, I thought with satisfaction.

Good. It meant I still had one card up my sleeve that not even Neshamah would see coming.

"Cat?" Indrani asked.

I shook my head.

"Looking at your Name," I told her. "Nothing to worry about."

She must already suspect, I thought, that though she was still the Archer she was now reaching for another Name entirely. Indrani shrugged.

"Sure," she dismissed. "Like I was saying, I know where the Artificer is. She's at the Bitter Blacksmith's forge, out in the Proceran camp."

"Huh," I replied. "What for?"

"Making a sword with her," Indrani said. "At least that's the word around the camps."

I'd start there, then, I mused. Definitely not because I was putting off talking with the Mirror Knight as long as I could.

"Intriguing," I mused. "I'll have a look, then."

"And don't stay to drink after your talks for too long," Archer instructed me.

I cocked an eyebrow.

"You're putting Masego to work already, so you'll be busy making it up to me," Indrani informed me.

I knew that glimmer in her eyes well, and it usually heralded a good time. I cleared my throat.

"Seems only fair," I conceded.

She leaned in to kiss me again, but I did notice that in the moment before that she shot a smug grin at Vivienne. Indrani, I could not help to notice before I got pleasantly distracted, still had a knack for coming out of a conversation the only winner and at everyone else's expense.

—

Of the two Bitter Blacksmiths, I was understandably more familiar with the villain. I did know a few things, though, from reports and the short few conversations we'd had in person. Helmgard Bauerlein, elder of the estranged siblings, was not a mage. And unlike her brother she did not work enchantments into steel, or even Light for that matter. What she had was a supernatural knack for handling exotic materials, which was why of the two she'd been the one chosen to head to the Arsenal and work on the creation of the Severance. She'd also slept with the Hunted Magician while there, which while amusing gossip didn't do much to tell me about the kind of woman she was.

Aside from one with poor taste in lovers.

Pulling at her threads as I approached her smithy, I got a much closer look at the stories that drove the heart of her. Her chords were all intertwined with her brother's, dozens of knots ahead where they'd end up killing each other but a short length away, and it all went back to a pair of moments. A teacher – parent also, maybe, but it was hard to tell – had given them a lesson that'd marked them. Something along the lines of 'the smith makes the blade', which they had understood very differently. Something they'd done had then led to the death of their teacher, which they bitterly blame each other for.

It'd hardened their differences into philosophies I could make out pretty clearly. Helmut Bauerlein, the brother, now made 'blades only he could make'. His Name allowed him to craft superbly nuanced enchantments, sorcery-wrought steel like the Lycaonese had not seen in generations. Helmgard, instead, had learned that a smith could 'make a blade out of anything'. Her path was pure mundane skill, her Name simply allowing her to make blades out of anything in Creation.

It had me curious as to why the Bitter Blacksmith would want or need the Blessed Artificer's help in making a sword, though the first answer I got when I finally found the smithy had no relation to either woman. Outside the small stone house whose chimney was letting out column of white smoke, a young man was sitting around with all the awkward restlessness so common in those of that age. Arthur Foundling, lately the Knight Errant, was trying to look casual leaning against the wall when he very clearly felt like pacing. I hummed, limping in his direction, and looked deeper.

There was a chord here, binding him to someone inside the smithy. Or something, maybe. Wasn't good enough at reading the differences to tell yet.

The Knight Errant straightened up out of his slouch the moment he noticed me, blue eyes widening in surprise. He had what almost looked like a spasm when he couldn't seem to decide whether he should salute or bow, settling into a gesture that tried to be both and fell short of either.

"Arthur," I greeted him. "Or should that be Sir Arthur, these days?"

"I have not been knighted as one of the Broken Bells," the dark-haired boys seriously replied.

I almost snorted. It was true I'd never taken back my order to Brandon Talbot that nobody was to knight him, but you might say someone had gone above my head for that. Ugh, pun not intended.

"And Hanno's not a lord," I said. "Yet people went as far as calling him a prince, not so long ago."

For that matter, I seriously doubted Hanno of Arwad had actually ever been formally knighted by anyone. Well, anyone mortal anyway. I wasn't sure I wanted to recognize the Choir of Judgment's ability to make knights, which made it all the more fortunate I had someone in my corner arguing the matter. As far as I knew, Anaxares the Diplomat was still up there making a racket. Gods bless the madman, at least as many as cursed him.

"I am not Hanno of Arwad," the Knight Errant firmly said. "And I'll not deny my Name, but neither will I claim a title I do not hold."

I found myself smiling. What a brat, I thought, not entirely without fondness. I'd have to see about getting him knighted properly, then: we'd look like right fools if he went around having Knight in his Name with no mundane title matching it.

"I'm sure something must be in the works," I replied, remaining vague.

I shot a glance at the closed door of the smithy, the faint sound of metal being hammered coming from the inside.

"I take it it's your sword getting forged in there?" I asked.

He looked faintly embarrassed.

"I was gifted star metal by a friend for my transition from Squire and asked the Blacksmith to make a blade of it," Arthur admitted. "It proved to be more difficult an undertaking than I'd expected."

I cocked an eyebrow.

"Must be," I said, "if the Blessed Artificer was pulled in for it."

He nodded, seeming unsurprised I knew of that.

"They-"

He was interested by a shiver in the air and a flash of Light searing at the threshold under the door. Gods, I would have felt that even without my Name senses. The smoke billowing out the chimney turned even paler, as if ivory had been made into wisps and released towards the sky. And now I knew why Adanna of Smyrna was here.

"She's heating the furnace with Light," I stated.

"The Blade of Mercy volunteered for the work," Arthur said, "but the Blacksmith says the quantity must be perfectly even throughout and only the Artificer's artefacts can easily accomplish that for long enough."

I let out a low whistle.

"That's not the kind of star metal you can buy in markets," I said. "I've seen blades made of the stuff before and they don't need anywhere near that much work to be made."

They were popular with nobles for their beauty and lightness relative to average steel, but there was nothing particularly special about them otherwise – just that the ore had fallen from the sky. Some old legends insisted they were a bane to devils and demons, but then there were old legends about like a hundred different materials doing that. In my experiences with their kind, the stabbing tended to be more than important than what you stabbed them with.

"It isn't," the Knight Errant confessed. "The Page says it was taken from the stars that fell over Hainaut, sold to him by a fantassin that near burned his hand off taking the stone."

I went still.

"That," I slowly said, "is one Hell of a gift."

A piece of Tariq's last act, the pilgrim's star called down on the Enemy. My eye returned to the pale smoke drifting up. No wonder it had taken Light to be forged. When the Grey Pilgrim had cast it down, it had burned so bright in the sky it'd been blinding.

"It is," Arthur quietly replied. "Gaetan is... perplexing."

I cocked an eyebrow.

"He's an intolerable arse most of the time," the Knight Errant elaborated at my unspoken prompting, "but sometimes he just has these surges of gallantry. He'll take the lash for someone else or toss away riches like they're nothing. It'd hard to square together."

"The first time I met Archer, she sucker-punched me when I could barely walk and after she strutted about like she'd won a prize," I drily told him. "There's hardly anyone I trust more now, though."

"I wish he was more like Lady Archer," Arthur muttered, which was honestly one of the harshest things I'd heard said about someone in quite a while.

"The good doesn't wash out the bad," I told him. "No more than the bad washes out the good. It's on you to decide what part matters most."

He sighed.

"Jury's still out," the dark-haired boy decided. "But it really was a princely gift."

"No lack of princes, on this side of the Whitecaps," I easily replied.

That got a smile out of him, as digs at Procer tended to with my countrymen, but the amusement was soon gone and replaced by something more complex. Wariness, guilt? Something else, too.

"You're sitting on something," I noted.

He hesitated, though when I cocked an eyebrow he gave in.

"I thought you'd be angry," the Errant Knight said.

"About?"

He squared his shoulders, and his courage along with it.

"In the Tower, I fought against your plot," Arthur said. "The one to kill the Empress."

There was an implicit accusation I didn't even bother to deny. I had very much been after Malicia's head that day. And though she was only Alaya these days, I'd not forgotten or forgiven the Night of Knives and all that came afterwards.

One day the time my father had bought her would run out, and I would come to collect.

"You weren't brought in on the plan," I said. "You disobeyed no orders by fighting it."

"I would have anyway," the hero said, sounding more like a boy confession than a defiant champion of Above.

I studied him, leaning on my staff of yew.

"I would have anyway," Arthur repeated, "and so part of me feels like I should apologize."

I cocked my head to the side.

"Did you think on the consequences, before you acted?"

He sharply nodded.

"Do you regret the decision you made?"

"I don't," the Knight Errant replied, and this time there was an ember of defiance.

"Then don't apologize," I said. "It's a waste of words."

I could no longer hear hammering from inside, even when I pricked my ear, only the hiss of vapour. Quenching the blade, were they? Nearly done. My eye found the boy's.

"The first lesson my father ever taught me," I said, "was a question."

My fingers clenched around the haft of dead wood, thinking of the knife I still had strapped against my arm.

"Do you know," I asked, "what sets apart people who have a Role from people who don't?"

Arthur shook his head.

"Will," I echoed. "The belief, deep down, that you know what's right and that you'll see it done."

I met his eyes.

"Do you believe you've done the right thing, Arthur Foundling?"

His jaw clenched.

"Yes," the Knight Errant replied.

"Never apologize for that," I told him. "When all's said and done, it's the only thing you get to keep."

And I hardly needed to look, to see the chord binding us. Not a teacher and an apprentice, but not entirely like it either. You could learn from people without being seconded to them. I'd learned from Tariq, as both a foe and a friend. I could do worse as a role to play than the Grey Pilgrim, only with more of the grey and less of the pilgrim. The moment hung between us, fragile, and when the door to the smithy creaked open it ended. I glanced at Helmgard Bauerleins' surprised face and smiled.

"Blacksmith," I said.

"Lady Warden," she replied, her Alamans heavily accented. "This is a surprise."

She looked wary. Wondering if I'd come to paw at her work, perhaps.

"I came looking for the Blessed Artificer," I said. "Found a little more than that."

"And finding's half of your queenship, allegedly," Adanna of Smyrna cut in, peeking out the door.

The golden eyes behind those spectacles were as startling as ever, that shade so rarely seen outside the Wasteland. The two women were heavily garbed in leather, as was only sensible in a forge.

"We are done, Arthur," the Bitter Blacksmith said, addressing him directly. "Come have a look."

She paused, hesitated.

"You as well, Your Excellency, if you wish," she added.

Not exactly enthusiastic, I noted, but she was staying polite. I was curious enough to enter anyway. There was a strange scent in the air when I entered after Arthur, almost like incense, but I paid it little mind. As the three heroes crowded around the anvil where the blade had been placed I hung back, leaning against the wall, though for all my discretion I availed myself plenty of looking. It was, I'd admit, one of the most exquisite swords I had ever seen. It wasn't finished yet, neither the guard nor the pommel mounted, but the simple length was strikingly beautiful already.

I'd never seen the like of that metal before: it seemed as if it'd been made of pale smoke, the turns of it fuming down the edge. When you looked at it from the corner of your eye, it gave the illusion that the smoke was still billowing. I knew better than to touch it, cooled or not, and so stayed back as the Errant Knight ran his finger down the length.

"It's gorgeous," Arthur quietly said, sounding choked up. "Thank you."

The Bitter Blacksmith gently smiled, a strange sight on such a rough face.

"You brought me the materials," Helmgard Bauerlein said. "All I gave you is time and skill, and for a hero I'll always offer those freely."

Somehow I doubted her brother would be quite so generous with Below's champions, I silently noted. Or even that he'd sell them much of anything, when instead he could spend the rest of his life making legacy swords for wealthy nobles and charging them through the nose for it.

"It's good work," the Blesser Artificer said, almost grudging.

She paused.

"No, it's a masterwork," she continued, shaking her head. "That is no simple blade, Arthur. It will seek out deeds, and before it begins that journey it deserves a name."

The invitation was clear, but Arthur hesitated. I could understand why: it was a choice that'd likely have consequences rippling out beyond his lifetime. At the heart of that blade, of this moment, I could feel a nascent story. Adanna had told it true: it was blade that would seek deeds.

"A sword like that," the Knight Errant said, "we call it a legacy blade, back home. The kind you pass down a family line."

The dark-haired boy smiled, more in sorrow than joy.

"Only I'm an orphan, see," Arthur Foundling told them. "Just one from a house of a thousand foundlings, all of them my brothers and sisters. And this blade is to be ours, our legacy of foundlings, then it's not mine to name."

Blue eyes turned to me.

"There's already a head to our house," the orphan quietly said.

My throat caught. The face of both heroines grew cold as they looked at me, but I didn't care for them at all. It was the other Foundling I looked at, and his gaze was unwavering. His decision had been made and he would not take it back. I pushed off the wall, Mantle of Woe whispering on the floor behind me as my staff rapped against the wood. Feeling the air thicken with Creation's attention, I leaned over the blade and dared to touch it. It was nearly burning to touch, already no friend of mine, but it awaited a name nonetheless.

I had been given the right, or perhaps the burden.

I looked at the metal like smoke and thought of that night far to the south, when an old man had given everything up as a prayer to a better tomorrow. I'd not loved Tariq Fleetfoot, but I had come to respect in him a way I respected very few people. And now this piece of the star he called down to save us all, the Pilgrim's Star he had put out of the sky, had come to be forged into a blade. There could only be, I thought, one name for this.

"Peregrine," I quietly said. "Its name is Peregrine."

Creation sighed, as if letting out a breath it'd held in, and all the weight that had been pressing down on us faded. I withdrew my fingers before they could be burned, somehow knowing it was about to bite. I found the faces of the three of them hard to read, but it did not matter. I was done here, and Adanna felt as much.

"You asked for me, Warden?" she said.

"Hanno tells me I should have a look at your work," I said.

She nodded, visibly pleased.

"I will show you to my workshop, then," Adanna said.

I nodded my goodbye to the Blacksmith, who returned it, and only slowed on my way out when I passed by Arthur – who was still staring at the sword, fascinated.

"Tariq Fleetfoot spent his life trying to make a better world," I said, laying a hand on his shoulder. "If you're going to wield a piece of his light, then do him proud."

Withdrawing my hand, I stepped out of the warm smithy and left silence behind me.

—

The Blessed Artificer's workshop was cramped and overfull, like she'd crammed two wagons' worth of goods in a single stall. There were two dozen different lengths of wood I could hardly tell apart, stones ranging from pebbles to emeralds and enough tools to arm three generations of masons and carpenters. Maybe the only place in there that didn't look like it was waiting on the excuse of a stiff wind to fall on me was the large carving table in the middle, which by the looks of the dirty plates and half-full glasses was also where Adanna ate most days.

She tried to put those away discreetly, and in an act of mercy I pretended not to notice.

What lay on that table, though, commanded my attention and refused to release it. It recognized the bare bones of the artefact, because I'd once seen in Salia: a wooden pillar half a foot wide and seven long, crisscrossed by rods of copper. The carvings on the surface had been sanded off, replaced instead by twisting sequences of glyphs that burned my eye to look at, and something... more had been added. Inside, maybe? I limped closer to the pillar, ignoring the discomfort of standing so near something that gave off Light like it was some kind of preachy handmade sun, and had a look at the bottom.

I clicked my tongue against the roof of my mouth. There was a copper sheath, but it did not cover the sight of the bottom of a stone sculpture that'd been inserted inside the pillar. She must have hollowed it out, carefully enough she didn't touch the copper rods all the while, and even more carefully inserted the sculpture. I tried to grasp the nature of that sculpture with my Name's senses, but immediately stepped back with a hiss of pain.

"Fucking Hells," I quietly said.

"It has been improved, as you can see," the Blessed Artificer smugly said.

"Improved?" I disbelievingly replied. "That thing is a..."

I grimaced.

"Well, not quite a godhead but a passing imitation at least," I said. "But no, that's not what you were actually trying to make is it?"

I paused, golden eyes familiar and yet not fixed on me.

"You made an angel," I said. "A one-heartbeat angel."

It'd last only for that heartbeat and then be spent, but that was about the strength I could feel in that thing. And considering it was giving me a headache to feel it out I wasn't even sure whether or I was going too low.

"Not an inapt way to put it," Adanna mused. "Though I have been calling it the Ram."

My eye narrowed.

"You want to knock down Keter's gates with it."

"That is my very intent," she smiled, baring pale teeth.

"Can you make more?"

She looked away.

"It was a moment on inspiration," the Artificer admitted. "I have not been able to enter the right mindset since."

I bit the inside of my cheek. She could call that inspiration if she wanted, but I knew better. Above's putting a finger on the scales. And part of me was relieved, for Gods – Above and Below – knew we could use the help, but it wasn't that simple. Looking at the Ram I was not thinking of the breach in Keter's walls it might become, but instead asking a bleaker question.

How bad was it going to get, for the Heavens to start helping before we'd even begun?

Well cat is in the same weird place as Bard.
But still consider a villain when the question gets pushed.

Casey Glick

But notably, she is using the power to make people better, at nearly every opportunity. Better for their own sake, and in their own minds. She knows she has the power to weaponize it, and is choosing not to, at the moment.

ruduen

Boost!

<https://topwebfiction.com/listings/a-practical-guide-to-evil>

I see that everybody is gathering their optional sidequest weapons at this time. Now all we need is for the dwarves to bring a merchant in front of the gateway of no return, and we'll be ready to kick this final battle off!

Rey d`Tutto

Test

erebus42

Awww, Cat's getting all sentimental and maternal in her old age.

Liliet

her ripe old age of 23/24 ♥ ♥ ♥

dadycool

Well, for a Villain, eight years of high-profile villainy is a long time. Especially with GP and SoS glaring at her.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

That I initially read these acronyms as "general practitioner" and "save our souls" (what sos stands for in the context of a real-life emergency) seems apropos, considering he healed people and she was unspeakably dangerous to fight.

Sam

Random trivia: "SOS" doesn't stand for "save our souls", or anything else. It's just a very easy to remember morse code sequence. Everything else is a backronym.

Cpt. Obvious

And the international radio emergency call isn't SOS but PAN-PAN for a non critical emergency or MAYDAY critical emergency.

You could say that if there is no immediate risk of lives then use PAN-PAN. So a ship having an engine failure in open waters and calm weather would be a non critical emergency.

However the same ship having the engines fail in shallow waters during a storm warrants a MAYDAY.

erebus42

I mean, considering her chosen occupation and roles that is pretty old.

Liliet

Well I couldn't possibly argue with that lmao

shikkarasu

Plus 11 years after killing Saint, arguably. Possibly less, given that she's been First Under the Night for about 3 years. It really depends how you measure it.

Liliet

AAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAHHHH so good!

Indrani the carver, her and Vivienne and Catherine in a room is always a joy.

ARTHUR!!! I fucking knew it, well okay no I HOPED, that his takeaway from the situation would be feeling like he ought to apologize to Catherine and not like she ought to apologize to him.

Catherine is finally in less denial about him, which I suppose the denial did buy her a better story?

THE PEREGRINE SWORD AAHHHHHH

Catherine you already know how fucking bad your situation is, I'm pretty sure the Heavens leaning over to help is not, like.. unexpected just from what you know. Your entire hope for victory already rests on this lmao

Liliet

ghhhhhh the head of House Foundling god Arthur so totally picked up on how much this means to Catherine

gingerlygrump

That plucked the heart-strings. She has spent her whole post-orphanage life building the family she didn't have as a child. He truly honored her.

Liliet

It's not just about that!

Thematically, Catherine being an orphan with no record of her origin has from the start served as a symbolic beat of her being "the everywoman", the "purest" representative of Callow. Having no defined origin meant she could have any origin, and in a sense has them all. Catherine has gotten offended about the suggestion that she change her surname to something less generic, and has conspicuously NOT used the magic in her easy reach to find out her origins.

Catherine has deliberately claimed her origin as a point of pride, and brought it honor.

Arthur, here, is... responding to that. Recognizing it. Making a gesture of grand acknowledgement.

And it's so good to know that yes... the orphans noticed.

gingerlygrump

I hadn't thought of that: at this point she could easily find her parents... but why bother? She has the family she's chosen, and that's what matters to her.

Liliet

c u r i o s i t y

Catherine is normally curious, the fact that since book 2 when she learned about bloodline rituals to this day she still hasn't answered the question suggests to me that it's a matter of deliberate principle to her, and we do have corroborating evidence

RotGut

Why do you type like you have a brain injury?

amit27592

That's not a very nice thing to say and not a nice way to say it.

Please keep your grudges and whatnot out of this chat thread.

Liliet

I type like I have a brain injury? In what way?

*arcanavita*15

Its so epic I loved that entire scene with them talking and the hit right to the feels with him allowing her to name the sword.

ninegardens

Arthur and that conversation was a treasure (Arthur +Nim team up when?)

But also, we now have matching swords Perigrine and Severence (From Saint and Pilgrim), so THAT feels significant (Arthur+Chrisoph pair up when).

Feels like those three belong in a band of 5.

The Perigrine-Cat connection is one of my favourite dynamics in this entire series. Like... there's a lot of stuff going on, but it always felt that for me, scenes with Perigrine just WORKED.

and now we have a sword.

(Kind of funny that this sword does NOT go to the blade of mercy, given Tariq's choosen choir)

Ciara

There could only be, I thought, one name for this.

"The Blade of Mercy," I quietly said. "Its name is the Blade of Mercy."

"Am I a joke to you?" The hero in question asked, having entered while I was occupied.

"Yes," I said, miming ripping his arm off and beating him with it again.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

LMAO (laughing my arm off)

Casey Glick

Black Knight, Mirror Knight, Knight Errant, White Prince, Kingfisher Prince?

Liliet

I don't think Antoine ever had a lot in common with Tariq or his path.

Isaac Martinez

Well, you know, BAD. But don't worry, It WILL be WORSE.

Juff

Typo Thread:

I honestly I > honestly I most of time > most of the time help to notice > help notice out column > out a column
He was interested > He was interrupted than important than > important than boy confession > boy confessing was blade > was a blade
And this blade > And if this blade respect in him > respect him in It recognized > I recognized she didn't touch > she hadn't touched Ad considering > And considering whether or I > whether or not I moment on > moment of

Mirror Night

I mean its obviously pretty bad since they got to get it all done in a Few Months before DK kills everything. It might not be so bad if they weren't on such a tight clock but since they are on the clock well you are going to have make progress rapidly. I doubt DK makes it easy and fights them outside the gates.

dadycoool

I like how Arthur, and presumably all the other Callowan orphans, look to Cat as their Head of House. The name she gave was apt, as well. That whole segment was simply good.

Hellspirit

They actually don't, but this has probably made it so.
(Afterall, Arthur showed us that Cat's background is a rumor).

dadycoool

Oh, yeah. Maybe the bond between the two of them, the one she saw forging/strengthening is that of Head and Member? If so, that has interesting implications.

Liliet

That would require Cat to have actually made an organization, stories dont spring out of nowhere at all.

No, Arthur has just adopted her as his and also everyone else's big sister... much like Cat had adopted Amadeus as her father way back when.

shikkarasu

The orphanages were set up by Amadeus, and Cat is his successor... She soft claimed herself the heiress to all of Callow on those grounds before. I accept the literal truth of your take, Liliet, but I think I'm with dadycool on this one.

ninegardens

Arthur meeting Amadeus "Yo, Grandpa! stop burning things old man"

Casey Glick

Pickler, greeted by a younger generation of demolition-sappers: "okay boomer"

agumentic

I imagine it's a rumour every orphan in Callow believes, though. So they might look up to her regardless.

shikkarasu

Orphan 1: "I heard she castrated an Ogre in single combat."

Orphan 2: "That's nothing, I heard she went back in time to found the same orphanage that raised her."

Orphan 3: "Yeah! And she left clues about how to win all her unwinnable battles under a floorboard that only her younger self would look under."

Orphan 4: "I talked to a soldier who saw her blow up a wall with a goat!"

Orphan 1: "... That doesn't even make sense."

Orphan 4: "No really, she controlled it with her mind, made it run into a wall, and BOOM!"

Orphan 3: "You are so full of crap, Kevin."

arcanavitael5

I like the attention being given to Cats most positive aspects in this chapter the queen of lost and found which was commented on and reinforced by the whole giving other races homes and the whole Arthur scene, which was beautiful. The whole talk and ten Arthur letting her name the sword which was really fitting,

ohJohN

Thank you, I didn't make the Queen of Lost and Found(lings) connection and this got me there!

arcanavitael5

I'm happy that Cat had a nice thing happen to her and let it happen which is really great.

Liliet

IKR???? Finally something good!

arcanavitael5

She mentioned having a surprise that the dead king would see coming which is very interesting personally I think its the ranger. Quote "And following that chord I could get a glimpse at the knot to come, the makings of the fight, and that gave me a look at the people who'd be fighting. Some of which I'd not been sure would be involved. So you'll come, after all, I thought with satisfaction.

Good. It meant I still had one card up my sleeve that not even Neshamah would see coming."

ohJohn

Yeah that's what I thought too: Hye is the only one really who Indrani has a strong connection to and isn't already committed to the war effort.

My second thought was the elves, through or because of Hye somehow, but with how much they hate him I think Neshamah would absolutely see them coming. Hye, though? She's quite possibly the closest thing he has to a friend, and until now it would have been incredibly out of character for her to join this fight.

ninegardens

Doesn't Hye go hunting in Keter fairly often?
Is she even here for the sake of this battle story, or is she gonna be like "Welp, its July, guess I'll got hunting in Keter. Oh Look! Foundling is here. Guess this will be an interesting season then. New prey"

Clmineith

Actually... could Ranger decides to attack Cat? You know, because of the whole father killing thing?

LarsBlitzer

When Arthur was about to apologize for working against Cat I was halfway expecting her to remind him of her house's motto "Justifications Matter Only to the Just." But Having her be steadying influence on him worked much better, I think.

Liliet

House Foundling ayyyyyyyy

BargleNawdleZouss

So, Arthur and Gaetan as a future couple, hmm?

Liliet

YUP

SuitorShooter

There could only be, I thought, one name for this.

"Peregrine," I quietly said. "Its name is Peregrine."

Oh yeah, that's some good shit EE.

Xinci

Hm the formation of a angel for a heartbeat definitely has interesting implications for prayer and the runes used for things like knight armor. It's a one time deal here but there is potential in development for the concept in the future. Makes a good comparative to Masegos non-denominational smite

Reader in the Night

The Peregrine Sword. Just, shivers.

The Peregrine Sword for an Errant Knight. The blade being smoky and gray, like Tariq's clothes. Cat charging Arthur to do the Grey Pilgrim proud. The whole thing, it drips momentousness.

We can really feel like Catherine just shaped one of the new generation's greatest stories yet to come.

Salt

It'd be an interesting read to see how the story of the sword shapes up/how it interacts with the wielders.

Tariq was, in a lot of ways, a model Hero in terms of intention, but his story was anything but happy, and his hands were anything but clean. In a lot of ways it was as tragic as the Saints, and in some ways he was just as brutal as a result. At the end of the day the Pilgrim was a dude who would put his life on the line at the drop of a hat because he cared about alleviating the suffering of even one more person, but spent his entire life being put in the position of choosing between killing an innocent with his own hands to save two others, over and over. He spent his whole life being forced by his own morals to commit acts he found repulsive and appalling, because often a lesser evil was the only way that he could achieve a much greater good.

The story of sword itself is probably going to have elements of that, and the thing itself will likely be as necessarily brutal and dangerous as the person it was forged from. It might very quickly become one of those Heroic artifacts that's known as a burden that needs bearing, rather than some pleasant glory to be chased after.

ninegardens

Maybe the weilder will see it that way.... but remember, Tariq always had good PR. People outside seldom got to see the ruinous cost.

Another possibility is that Tariq was always a mentor. It could be that the sword fills a similar role, always being handed to a young hero in need of guidance, never staying with one hero too long, but instead bouncing around, and always finding its way to the hand of greatest need.

sengachi

Huh, was this a second Aspect for Catherine? Maybe Name?

ninegardens

It's the Name of the sword. It gets the same caps because the sword has that much weight, but its not an aspect or anything.

Hell, it might not even stick around- in that future mentions of the sword will just be normal, its only bold because this was the naming of the sword.

Ben Serreau-Raskin

Love Arthur's little bit about "House Foundling."

BargleNawdleZouss

1. Glad we got to see how Artificer is going to make a qualitative difference. Now, I look forward to seeing how Pickler and Concocter will contribute their force multipliers.
2. Speaking of Cocky, I can't wait to see her reunited with the Doddering Sage.

3. I'm also anticipating Sapan the Apprentice having her key moment and transitioning to her final Name.

4. Very curious to see the reaction of the Orc Horde to the undead.

superkeaton

God dammit Arthur, you pure fucking ray of sunshine

Rey d`Tutto

No shit, right?

I'm So Meta Even This Acronym level Story-fu.

DC

The thought occurs that Below doesn't HAVE to intercede on behalf of the Dead King, if for whatever reason they'd prefer he lose. They could apply their boon to villains fighting him instead.

KiltedBastich

It's been mentioned before that Below isn't too fond of the Dead King, because he threatens to end their wager with above prematurely by killing everyone and turning them into undead either mindless or slaved to him. Above and Below both need mortals with free will, able to choose one or the other, and the Dead King could very possibly wipe that out completely. Below doesn't like that any more than Above does.

Chapter 52: Mass

"And so the Black Knight, having survived the battle, knelt before Dread Emperor Irritant and addressed him in despair: 'Your Dreadful Majesty, our cause is lost. What can we do in the face of such utter defeat?'. To this the Emperor answered: 'Naturally, we must make more enemies.'"

– Extract from Volume IX of the Official Imperial Chronicles

Christophe de Pavanie was training alone.

I wasn't familiar with the particular drill, but I'd gone through enough of the same sort to recognize what it was for: I'd been a sword and board kind of girl too, back in the day. Might still be, if not for my bad leg and how it made taking on hits a real bad idea. The Mirror Knight was moving in full armour, footwork smoothly moving back and forth as he timed the thrust of the blade to go through throat-height in a fluid killing blow. Then pivots to the side, taking a phantom hit on the shield and cutting the side, only to pivot back and begin the sequence all over again.

There were tracks in the dirt, noticeable enough he must have been at this for hours.

The training grounds were empty except for him and the whole place felt like an island of calm in the sea of the Proceran camps – I could barely even hear soldiers around their cooking fires further out. Though the man's senses were sharp enough he must have heard my limping gait nearing, he did not stop in his exercises. I was in no great hurry, so instead of interrupting I hoisted myself atop the wooden fence delineating the grounds and waited him out. Another thirteen sequences and finally he stopped, sheathing his sword as he turned towards me.

"Most Named don't keep up drills," I called out, curious. "The argument's that you get more out of spars."

The Mirror Knight took off the polished silver helm, revealing sweat-soaked light brown hair and a serious face.

"Sidonia offered," Christophe de Pavanie said, "but I need the drills."

I cocked my head to the side, considering.

"Because you keep getting stronger," I guessed.

He nodded.

"If I do not regularly drill my fundamentals, I begin to make mistakes," the Mirror Knight admitted.

I hadn't actually thought of that. Supposedly the man got a little tougher and stronger every morning, but my reaction to that rumour had been more one of general disgruntlement at the unfairness of such an aspect more than the practical realities of constantly changing. No wonder he drilled regularly, if he had to adapt to a different grip every three months or so.

"Most of my swordsmanship was taught to me after I got my Name," I told him. "And my teacher taught it consequently. I notice you're not using any of the better-known Proceran styles, though."

"It was an inheritance from my teacher," the Mirror Knight said.

"One of the duellist schools?" I asked, curious.

Arlesite duellists were famous, though I'd never heard of any who used shields. The green-eyed man snorted.

"Nothing so high-brow, Warden," Christophe said. "It was my predecessor as the Mirror Knight who taught me when preparing me to take up her duties."

Huh, I thought, surprised.

"I hadn't heard of another Mirror Knight in our lifetime," I said.

"You would not have heard of me either, if not for the Tenth Crusade," he ruefully replied. "Our charge is to defend the Elfin Dames and it does not involve much travelling about. The Enemy always comes to us, not the other way around."

"That does tend to be the way," I sighed, then studied his face. "Were you close?"

His face turned thoughtful.

"I understood her," Christophe de Pavanie finally said, "perhaps better than I have ever understood anyone. That is not always a kind thing."

I nodded, understanding perhaps better than he knew. I'd also had a mentor who was a reflection of the ugly as well as the rest.

"I miss her," he said, with a sincerity that struck. "But her time was finished from the moment I was chosen to succeed her. It'd be ungrateful of me to begrudge her peace."

I hardly even needed to reach out to lay a finger on the chord, old and faded as it was. Chosen champions, each fighting an opponent and wining. Each fading away in the years that followed, until the Elfin Dames chose a successor and the mantle was passed. I wondered what it was that the lake spirits sat on that needed such protection. Some old horror, no doubt, or one of those wonders that were just as terrible.

"Do you miss it?" I idly asked.

He looked away.

"It was a simpler world," the Mirror Knight said. "Oaths, duty, an enemy. The paths were straightforward, both the good and the evil."

"Would that it were always so simple," I wanly smiled.

"The Grey Pilgrim once chided me for saying the same thing," Christophe quietly replied. "That making the world black and white was to give away half of Creation to the dark."

He paused.

"That we could do better."

"And you agree?"

He looked sad.

"I don't know," the Mirror Knight confessed. "In the end, Warden, he was such a sad man."

My breath caught.

"He was not proud of his work," Christophe de Pavanie disbelievably said, shaking his head. "Him, the Peregrine! All those evils laid to rest, and still he held himself with such sorrow."

"There are costs to victory," I said, "and Tariq Fleetfoot was the great victor of his time."

"It was the look in his eyes that I have grown to fear," the Mirror Knight said. "The tiredness. And I am slow of thought, Warden, but on that look I have thought for long."

I balanced my leg against the wooden plank, studying him in the gloom of the spreading dusk.

"And what did you decide?"

"That I do not want to ever have that look," the man bleakly laughed. "And that mayhaps the first step down that road is to admit that I cannot go back."

He looked down at his armoured gauntlet, clenching the fingers.

"I have seen too much to be able to fit in that small, simple world again," the Mirror Knight sadly said. "Sometimes there is no going home."

"But leaving it," I replied, "is the only way you get to see beyond the horizon."

He did not disagree, pushing back a sweaty lock of hair.

"May I ask why you have come, Warden?"

"Curiosity," I said, fingers closing around my staff.

As to why Hanno would advise me to go and see you.

"And is it sated?" he asked.

I smiled.

"You've grown, Mirror Knight," I said.

And I understood what Hanno saw in him that made him want to trust the Severance to his hand. The man I had faced in the Arsenal had been tempered by the passage of time, by the fires he'd gone through. I could still see the flaws in him, but they no longer threatened to devour him whole.

"Is it really growth," the man tiredly said, "to simply earn fresh scars?"

"Sometimes, Christophe, I think it's the only thing there is to earn," I confessed.

He did not look relieved to hear it, but then he wasn't meant to. I slid down the fence, landing in the dust, and began to limp out of the training grounds.

"Was that truly all you wanted, Warden?" he called out.

I turned and met his gaze, then inclined my head the slightest bit.

"I look forward to working with you, Mirror Knight," I told him.

And I found, as I turned my back on him, that I might actually mean the words.

—

Prince Otto Reitzenberg was something of a rising man these days.

He'd begun the Tenth Crusade as the third in line for the Principality of Bremen but over the same bloody evening that'd seen him earn the sobriquet of 'Redcrown' he'd shot up the line of succession all the way to princeship. And now he was in line to inherit a great deal more, as Cordelia had not hidden her intention to pass him the crowns of Rhenia and Hannover when she left to settle in Cardinal. Considering Mathilda Greensteel of Neustria had left no close heirs, Otto Redcrown was most likely going to end up as prince of all Lycaonese when the war ended.

Prince of broken lands in the hands of the dead and a people made penniless refugees, but it would not stay that way forever. The northerners would return home, in time, and do so with both swords and ploughshares strapped to their backs. And they won't spread out too much at the start, they'll clear out a few cities and territories, which is why Cordelia's scheme might just work. After a generation or two of building and fighting together, even if the Lycaonese spread outwards would they still think of themselves as Neustrians or Bremenites? Cordelia had bet that they wouldn't, that her people would come out of it with the boundaries between them erased.

The dour man didn't particularly look like a prince set to rule over lands that'd make up about a fifth of the territory of the Principate, though. His dark hair was cut rough and short, his clothes plain. And not the kind of plain that was a subtle boast, precisely tailored and woven: it was badly died woolen shirt he wore, a little too broad around his shoulders, and his hide trousers were worn enough that the seams going down the sides were loosening. He was not handsome, his nose large and almost hooked, but dark eyes and thick eyebrows made him look rather intense.

It was a face naturally made for brooding, I reflected, which seemed like fate as work given his known propensity for it.

Frederic Goethal could not have been more different, from the fair curls to the sunny demeanour, which made their evident closeness all the more eye-catching. The Kingfisher Prince had come decked out in enough silk to compensate for the other royal's plain clothes twice over, all in the blue and red of his house. They were pretty tight on his body, which was worth a second look I wasn't too shy about taking. After all I knew from... personal experience he didn't exactly mind. Vivienne looked like she wanted to elbow me when she noticed, but thankfully we were in front of royals so she had to hold back.

I offered her a pleasant smile that was not smug in the slightest before turning my attention back to the other two. They'd gotten here a little early so Pickler wasn't there yet – it would have been a feat worthy of a Name to drag her away from the siege preparations a breath earlier than was necessary – so we'd been making light conversation over drinks, but I couldn't help to notice something a little off about the both of them.

"If you don't mind my saying," I began, "the two of you look to be in a rather fine mood."

Better than I'd expected, given that they should both be aware of the answer we'd gotten from the Kingdom Under.

"It is the news from the north," Prince Otto said, his Chantant somehow always sounding a little curt.

He was visibly pleased, though. I cocked an eyebrow.

"News?" I asked, flicking a glance at Vivienne.

She shook her head, as much in the dark as I was.

"Before the Ways were shattered, we received word through Salia," Frederic smiled. "Rhenia yet stands."

Not the principality, obviously, since it'd pretty much collapsed the moment the undead forced the Rhenian Gates. He meant the capital city of the same name, Cordelia's seat.

"I'd heard it was under siege," I ventured.

"It's Rhenia," Otto Reitzenberg said, lips twitching. "It fears sieges like a fish fears water."

"There is fortress dug inside the mountain," Frederic explained. "The people retreated when the walls were lost."

"They lost it since," Otto informed us, "but there's tunnels that lead to the cavern-keeps."

"The cavern-keeps," Vivienne slowly repeated.

"Lost those too, so they collapsed them on top of the Enemy," Frederic cheerfully said. "Then they retreated to the Old Chasm while the undead dug up the tunnels."

"The giants used to mine there for ore," Prince Otto told us. "The stories say the Chasm used to go all the way down to lava, until some of the cliffs fell. The Rhenians burned the bridges behind them and dug in."

"And they're still holding?" I asked.

"There's a secret passage from the Old Chasm to the mountaintop," Frederic said. "They sent a messenger up there and towards Salia three months ago."

"They'll hold," Otto said, not a speck of doubt in his voice. "They're Rhenians. By the time the Enemy takes the Old Chasm they'll have built a fortress atop the mountain."

I'd often heard that Rhenia was the strongest fortress raised on Calernia by mortal hands, greater even than Hannoven's famous seven walls and Summerholm's brutal street-by-street slaughterhouse, but it was only now I was genuinely starting to believe it.

"A stubborn lot these Rhenians, I take it," I said, cocking an eyebrow.

Otto Redcrown, his mood still the finest I had ever seen of him, went as far as venturing a few bars from a song I did not know. The Kingfisher Prince was the one to add words to the chorus, though.

"I broke your wall, said Old Bones,

So Rhenia built another," Frederic Goethal grinned.

The Prince of Bremen joined his voice to the rest, lips twitching.

"I took your keep, said the Rat,

So Rhenia built it higher!

And we'll never run out of stone,

so you'll have to try harder!"

I traded an amused glance with Vivienne, which did not go unnoticed. The Lycaonese looked abashed, but Frederic utterly unrepentant.

"Drinking song?" I idly asked.

"An old favourite," Prince Otto admitted. "Even outside Rhenia only Turn the Season is sung more often."

I was curious enough to ask about that, always in the market for a good drinking song, but that was when my legionaries announced Pickler. She was sent in without wait, the Sapper-General of Callow eyeing me with mild irritation that turned to confusion as she took in who Viv and I were entertaining. No one rose to greet her, she was by far of the lowest rank in the tent, but she got a round of greetings – she'd worked out in Twilight's Pass with the two princes for over a year and there seemed to be genuine amity there.

"Take a seat," I invited. "We were about to begin."

Pickler slowly nodded.

"The phalanges weren't clear on what this is about," she said.

"You're here to listen," I simply said.

She looked like she was swallowing a sharp retort at that, but she sat anyway. I glanced at Vivienne, who got the conversation started. As well she should, having handled most of the negotiations for this.

"I was glad to hear of your response to the amended terms," the Princess said. "I would not press you to formally sign a treaty while we are besieging the Crown of the Dead, but I believe an agreement in principle would be pleasing to all parties."

"I am ready to sign the formal treaty whenever it is presented writ to me," Prince Otto bluntly replied. "There is no difference between principle and ink."

I found myself believing him, to my surprise.

"I appreciate the intended courtesy, Princess Vivienne," Frederic replied with a smile, "but it is not bending our arm to see this inked. Our word has been given."

"Then I will see it arranged at the earliest convenience," Vivienne calmly said. "And tonight we can simply end the talks with a drink."

"The very best way," the Kingfisher Prince approved.

I snorted. So did Otto, so I winked at him. He actually looked amused.

"Congratulations are in order," I said. "Bremen are Brus will be the first crowns west of the Whitecaps to officially invite goblin tribes to settle in their territory."

At my side, Pickler went still as a stone.

"If only more would come," Prince Otto grouched. "Six will hardly be enough to settle the entire Kaltwend."

"You should have offered better tax incentives," Frederic sagely said. "It is how I convinced my tribe to settle in the marshes. Gods know they'll be rooting out undead for years."

"All I can fill my treasury with is iron," Otto Redcrown sourly said.

A sentence that had no business sounding as arresting as it did, I noted. As the talk continued about where the seven tribes that had accepted the offers extended to settle in their lands through the intermediaries of the crown of Callow and the matron-attendants of the Snake Eater Tribe – our own Callowan goblins – I felt Pickler's breath slow as she listened to the words. It was a comprehensive treaty, for all that Vivienne was refraining from boasts. The goblins were formally recognized as subjects with all attendant rights, the tribes guaranteed certain territories and tax exemptions in exchange for duties agreed-upon.

Mostly taking up arms against the ratlings, mine mountains and work on the Lycaonese great fortresses. Frederic instead wanted his tribe to work on roads as well as the Bruseni mines, which was why he'd also offered generous terms to any former sappers that might want to settle in Brus. He was rather canny for a hero, one of his more attractive qualities.

The talks tonight had been a formality, an end to the negotiations where I'd be present to make it clear that I was endorsing the treaty, so they did not stretch out overlong. After a few drinks the princes took their leave and Vivienne, ever discreet, took a single look at Pickler and I before excusing herself. It left the two of us alone in the tent, Pickler of the High Ridge Tribe's face unreadable. Those large amber eyes did not blink as she stared at me, her once-smooth skin now creased with wrinkles. Goblins, even those of Matron lines like her, aged so much quicker than humans.

"You did this," Pickler finally said.

"Vivienne handled most of it," I said.

"But it was possible," she said, "because you put your weight behind it."

I did not deny it, since it was true, but she was putting too much on my shoulders. The Lycaonese had already been interested, it'd just been a question of getting the practicalities of it done. And getting Rozala Malanza to approve, though strictly speaking her approval wasn't actually needed since princes were free to handle such a matter as they wished. It'd helped, though, and would prevent trouble from the Highest Assembly down the line. The way Vivienne told it, Rozala hadn't been eager but she'd been disinclined to fight the matter. I expected if there hadn't been clauses about no goblin munitions being made in Procer she would have been more enthusiastic, but I could only push Praes so far before Chancellor Alaya was forced to fight me.

"When Vivienne had it announced that goblins were free to settle in Callow," Pickler quietly said, "I thought that was the end of it. That it was as far as it would go."

She grimaced.

"It was already no small thing," she admitted.

But it wouldn't have been enough, we both knew. To just open the door in name and then do nothing more with it. To let it end there. To tell the goblins they could go elsewhere but then let the Matrons make sure they never saw it. So it wasn't what we'd done, because I still remembered that night in the tent the plea she'd made on her knees. They kill us for sport, she'd said, echoing the words of someone we both missed like a limb. Please, she'd asked. If not you, then who?

"You told me," I quietly said, "that there are fifty thousand more like him in the Eyries. Boys that never got out."

"And every day," Pickler murmured, "they die choking in the dark."

"It's a box, Pickler," I told her. "And it only works so long as the Matrons can keep it closed. But after the war, oh after the war..."

No longer. Too many tribes had taken the offer to leave, to settle abroad. It would be impossible for the Matrons to keep it quiet, and from now on every time they raised the whip it would be with the knowledge that now goblins could leave. That the choice was no longer the Matrons or the grave. And I saw that knowledge sink into Pickler, down the marrow of her bones. Saw it burn bright like a candle.

"I cannot repay you for this," she finally said. "I do not have the years. But anything-"

"You told me," I said, "that your people don't believe in debt."

She smiled, baring teeth like needles.

"For this, Catherine," Pickler replied, "I would learn."

"There's nothing to pay back," I gently said. "Even if it weren't the right thing to do, even if there was nothing to gain, I would still have done it."

I met her eyes.

"Because I do believe in debts," I said. "Because you're one of mine, Pickler, and you asked."

Goblins didn't really touch others, not unless they were either trying to kill each other or sleep with each other. But her small, spindly fingers found their way into my own and squeezed. I squeezed back. We sat there in silence for a long time, the only sound in the tent our breaths.

"Do you think," she murmured, "he would be proud?"

I swallowed, finding my throat dry.

"Yeah," I murmured back. "Yeah, I think he'd be."

And we sat a little longer still, the two of us and the ghost we hadn't named, until I had to leave.

There was still one conversation ahead of me tonight.

—

Even now that she was no longer First Prince or Princess of Salia, Cordelia's tent was heavily guarded. Fortunately my name was among those that were to be ushered in when they arrived, and I wasted no time taking advantage of that.

I was surprised when I saw the drinks on the table — mead — but less so when I recognized the other woman sitting with Cordelia. The resemblance wasn't strong, but it was there: Agnes Hasenbach shared the clear blue eyes and blond hair of her royal cousin.

The Augur always looked a little lost, I'd thought, with those big blue eyes and short bob of hair, but I knew better than to think her foolish or harmless. Oracles were always a little odd, it came with the territory. Besides, tonight she was smiling and more... present than I could ever remember seeing her before. They both rose when I entered the tent, though Agnes needed to be reminded.

"I didn't mean to interrupt," I said.

"It's all right," the Augur said. "I saw you coming."

I eyed her warily.

"Prophecy?"

"The window hole," Agnes solemnly replied.

Had I just gotten had by Cordelia's unearthly waif cousin? It was, I grimly thought, certainly looking that way. And the other Hasenbach's amused quirk of the lips, which we both knew she was allowing to show entirely on purpose, wasn't helping things.

"Your Excellency," Cordelia greeted me. "A pleasure."

"Not an unexpected one, apparently," I drily said.

Agnes enthusiastically nodded, which honestly made it hard to stay miffed at her.

"I'll just borrow your cousin for a bit, if you don't mind," I told her.

"So long as you put her back when you're done," the Augur said.

"Agreeable terms," I replied, so we shook on it.

Cordelia's eyes were soft as she followed me to the back of the tent, behind a flap and near to what appeared to be a bathtub and some very nice sleeping robes. Silk and fur, huh. I cocked an eyebrow at her, but she strategically refused to meet my eye. Feeling rather more even than I had until then, I cleared my throat.

"She seems to be doing well," I said, jerking my head towards the flap.

"She ceased pushing herself after the march on Keter began," Cordelia said, sounding relieved. "There is no point in the exertion when the Dead King's power clouds all auguries regarding him."

Good on her, I thought. We could use the edge, in truth, but I'd heard some stories about what happened to soothsayers that looked a little too close at the Dead King. It didn't tend to end prettily.

"Glad news," I said. "Not the only ones for House Hasenbach today, I hear."

Cordelia's backed straightened, as if reminded she was yet Prince of Rhenia.

"I expected no less of the capitals," the blue-eyed princess said. "I saw to it that enough of my subjects too refuge south that we were not gambling it all on Rhenia's walls, but I have no doubt they will hold until the end."

"No doubt," I affably agreed. "I've been told Rhenians are a stubborn lot."

Narrowed eyes.

"If we must," Cordelia Hasenbach very mildly replied.

I raised my hands in peace, which sadly did seem to entirely appease her. A bloodthirsty lot, these Lycaonese.

"And how did your talks with Prince Otto go?" she asked.

"Like you don't already know," I snorted.

"It is polite to pretend," she serenely replied.

"Treaties were signed," I said, rolling my eye. "I've already leaned on Chancellor Alaya, so it's pretty much a given that tribes will be settling up north. Who exactly will depend on recruitment after the war, but I wouldn't be surprised if you did end up nabbing some of my sappers after all."

Vivienne would be settling another three tribes in Callow after the war – Kegan had thrown a fit, I was told, but had bent to the argument that we needed sappers and couldn't exactly keep bringing them in from Praes – but across the Wasaliti was still a little too close to the Eyries for some. Those that went would do so with my blessing and a bag of coin to help them get started.

I had to spend the Sahelian treasury on something.

"Congratulations," Cordelia said, sounding honest. "From what I have seen of goblins, they will take well to the spring wars with the ratlings."

"It'll be like they never left home," I drily replied.

Only better, because the rats weren't anywhere as clever as rival goblin tribes. Given the sheer amount of territory Lycaonese needed to reclaim, their fortresses needing to be rebuilt and their borders in need of skirmishers this was pretty much a match made in the Hells.

"A diplomatic success is heartening, given our other... difficulties in this area," Cordelia added.

I grimaced. So she'd been told about the dwarves.

"Wasn't sure you'd been told about that," I said. "Making sure you were was half the reason I came."

"The gesture is appreciated," she assured me, eyes calculating. "And if I were to inquire as to the other half?"

Do you still think we can win, I did not ask, or should I be worrying about the ealamal lighting up tonight? Only it wasn't fair to ask, or entirely true, so I didn't. Cordelia didn't look like she despairing, I thought, but she was so tightly controlled a woman I wasn't sure I would be able to tell if she were. She wouldn't pull the trigger early, though, I knew. She wasn't the impulsive sort. Even if that's the decision she'll make, she'll let us try and fail first.

"I'll be pushing for an attack tomorrow," I told her instead, pretending it was that. "We need to take a swing at Keter so we know the kind of opposition we'll be facing."

Her face tightened slightly. Hadn't bought that, huh?

"How bad is it, Catherine?" she quietly asked.

I began to answer, but she raised her hand.

"Not the answer you would give a general or a subordinate," the fair-haired princess said. "What you truly think."

I exhaled, passing a hand through my hair.

"We're cornered," I admitted. "On parchment we have three weeks, but in my opinion we'll know within eight days at most whether it's feasible to take the city with our forces. Past that crest, our strength will be going downhill."

"But it is not," Cordelia slowly said, "impossible?"

"No," I told her, and honestly. "It'll be damned bloody work, mark my words, but we have a few nasty surprises for him that no army's ever brought to his gates before. That, and there's still a ball I tossed up."

She stared at me flatly, which after coughing into my fist I took as an invitation to elaborate.

"It's something the Tyrant once said to Hakram," I said. "A classic heroic trick: when you're juggling stories, you make sure that when they come to a head the ball you want falling down at just the right moment is the one you threw."

At the Graveyard, the Grey Pilgrim had sent all the horse of the Grand Alliance into Arcadia under the guidance of the Rogue Sorcerer. He'd been keeping a heroic, overwhelming charge up his sleeve the entire time we'd been fighting. Sadly for him, Kairos and I had both seen it coming.

"You still have a story up in the air, then," Cordelia said, following the thread.

More than one, really, but there was no need to lay it out just yet.

"There's more than one way to skin a cat, let's leave it at that," I replied.

Blue eyes studied me.

"You are keeping your cards close to your chest," she finally said.

"That's the way this game's played," I replied.

She was not pleased, those fair eyebrows creasing, but she'd been in my boots often enough as First Prince not to argue.

"So it is," Cordelia replied, inclining her head.

I hesitated for a moment, then clapped her shoulder. She looked as surprised as I felt.

"We've still got arrows in the quiver," I said. "Spend time with your cousin while you still can, yeah? Tomorrow it starts and there will be no time for comfort." A slow, hesitant nod and I drew back. Agnes was emptying some of her cousin's mead into her own cup, trying to be discreet about it, and I offered an approving grin she guiltily returned. I left the last of the Hasenbachs to their drinks, striding out into the night, and went to a reunion of my own.

Indrani would be waiting, and I wasn't above taking the advice I'd given Cordelia.

So, uh, what do you think that the Dead King is going to do to the Elfin Dames once the undead forces rampaging through Procer get their hands on them with no Mirror Knight there to protect them? That feels like a pretty ominous question mark hanging over the Mirror Knight's story to me.

Mirror Night

I don't think DK is going to bother. DK will handle the side quest after he has done the main quest. DK is not the one in the rush, as Cat notes they have 8 Days to make significant gains. DK just has to outlast this siege while his armies massacre civilians across the land for the most part.

I assume Aspects from Cat, Hanno, Indrani and even Viv will factor in. Cat and Hanno only have one Aspect...Indrani is Ranger transitioning so who knows and Viv I think she is suppose to be Princess but its weird she doesn't get invited to any Hero Meetings. Also Hanno doesn't have a name at all right now so presumably that will be plot relevant at some point.

I also based on the setup fully expect to get a back to back badass scene with Christophe and Arthur. Since they have swords forged from an aspect of the two great Heroes from the Old Age. Not to mention Christophe is a rather obvious Lancelot Expy and Arthur is well you know Arthur.

Agent J

"It is going to be a long war," Tariq whispered, the weight of the years heavy on his shoulders.

"Longer for us than most," Laurence replied, barking out a laugh. "We'll be part of the five, old friend. You can be sure of it. I already feel the pull."

-the two of us, the Pilgrim added silently. Relics of an age already past, dusted off one last time.

—

And so it comes full circle. Splendid as always, EE.

naturalnuke

OH GODS THE FORESHADOWING OF THAT.

Honestly that's just impressive

Cicero

Well, Cat seems to be expecting the Ranger to show up at the end game anyways. Not certain why she thinks Hue is going to help kill the Dead King instead of her, but we'll see.

Someperson

Honestly, I doubt Hye even wants to get rid of the Dead King, seeing as she has raided Keter a fair few times before basically just for fun, and made a point of not trying to actually put an end to Neshamah. But neither do I imagine she particularly wants to see him win for good, for much the same reasons. It is safe to assume she will show up, but as a bit of a wild-card. Still, even just knowing that she will show up is something you can make plans around...

boballab

It's not about Hye, it is about the Name Ranger. The Dead King for all his age and power is not very good at Name Lore because, it has been established that Named make ruts in creation called stories and stories repeat, he let Ranger make a rut in creation. Why she wants Hye to show up is because Indrani is on the cusp of becoming Ranger as her Warden powers told her. Indrani takes the Name from Hye and that rut that has been created over time shows that as Ranger she can get to the Dead King. As to why Hye hasn't killed him is very simple... The Ranger only hunts those worth hunting and the Dead King has long went out of his to never appear as that.

"I am the Ranger. I hunt those worth hunting. Rejoice, for you qualify." Book 3 Chapter 32 Close

Remember that is why she fought the Summer Queen.

agumentic

I think Elfin Dames are somewhere on the other side of Procer, so by the time the Dead King's forces get there, whatever he could do with them would be a moot point.

Liliet

Can't be too other, Christophe is Alamans, not Arlesite.

ninegardens

Welp, that seen with Pickler was heartbreakingly sweet, and I actually cried.

Mirror knight was... pretty good. Mention of the Perigrine (two chapters in a row) was pretty heavy and... I feel like this is one of the best cases of EE pulling off character development really well. Mirror knight takes a long time to develop, and it feels effective and genuine. Very cool.

Loving all these "calm before the storm" chapters.

Mirror Night

I think it works better coming from Christophe lol. I don't even remember Arthur having a convo with Tariq. I mean it matches thematically as in Christophe is more like Saint in the Ultimate Weapon sense. He is tankier and has better physical stats but lost out on the Mental and skill Front. Arthur especially with his name also matches up well with Tariq, Grey Pilgrim and Vagrant Knight kinda suggest a similar Role. And as I said above I expect a team up between Mirror Knight and the Vagrant Knight.

So many goddamn Knights...I wonder if we can get a whole power rangers style team up at this point lol. We got a Mirror Knight, A Vagrant Knight, Red Knight, Black Knight...I think that is all the Knights maybe Hanno counts as Honorary as White Knight if his new name doesn't have Knight in it.

Razorfloss

I need band of 5 made up of only knights. All we really need to round out the party is the magic knight.

Raved Thrad

Which version? The original series Sailor Moon-type magic knight, or the OAV version with spirit beast mecha? 🤪

Mirror Night

I think they just mean more of a Knight and Mage Hybrid so Magus, Eldritch Knight, Spell Blade type...

shikkarasu

Obviously Mystic Knights of Tir Na Nog. We just need General Catastrophe to serve as Pyre, with the Red Knight riding her into battle.

Abaddon130

I know this is an old comment, but I just wanted to point out two things. The first is that Arthur isn't the Vagrant Knight, he's the Knight Errant. Yes they roughly mean the same thing, but I still think it's worth pointing out what the actual name is. Second, there's no need to use an honorary Knight to fill out the band of 5. You missed the Blood Knight in your list. Black Knight, Knight Errant, Mirror Knight, Red Knight, and Blood Knight. That band would be heavy on melee fighters and have no healers or ranged attackers (Unless you count the Black Knight picking up Mirror Knight and throwing him at enemies as a ranged attack. Based on the fact that that tactic has been successfully used to drink a turtleship and breach a fortress, it seems valid.), but it would still be hell to put down. With BK's ability to control another body, how devastating RK's Devour Aspect had been said to be, how ridiculously tough MK is, and the unknowns that are BK & KE that seems like a group that would be a headache and a half to put down. 3 Heroes and 2 Villains also means you'd have Above's borderline cheating to deal with as well as Below's underhandedness. Good luck to whoever had to deal with that.

Ben Serreau-Raskin

"You get a goblin tribe, and you get a goblin tribe, goblin tribes for everyone!"

Juff

Typo Thread:

– Extract from Volume IX of the Official Imperial Chronicles (outside of quote box)

wining > winning badly died > a badly dyed fate as work > fate at work help to notice > help but notice is fortress > is a fortress

Bremen are Brus > Bremen and Brus

mine mountains and work > mining mountains and working tent the > tent and the wouldlearn > would learn capitals, > capital,

too refuge > took refuge wouldn't surprised > wouldn't be surprised bee fighting > been fighting reunion of my own (missing fullstop)

dadycool

The impulsive boy has grown, the goblins are spreading like a plague, and the Augur is a devious little trickster.

Marco Boscolo

Am I the only one getting more and more concerned about Cat? Her plan to trap the Dead King is getting derailed: the ways were shattered, the Crown is a big question mark, Akua might not be the jailer she wanted her to be. And guess who has a Name that means "a person responsible for the supervision of a particular place or thing" and is also used to indicate the superintendent of a prison?

Yamageddon

nimelennar

Liliet

THE GOBLINSS

Catdelia friendship!!

dadycool

Frivolous

onedollargum

["There's more than one way to skin a cat, let's leave it at that," I replied.]

That... I hope that's a metaphor and not a cosmically ironic pun.

Someperson

This is one of the only times I would say it is fortunate that Cat hates puns.

nimelennar

I think what I'm going to miss the most when this is over is Dread Emperor Irritant.

Daniel E

Agreed. He is, to my knowledge, the only Dread Emperor with Story-fu strong enough to have a Story-based law named after himself.

Reader in the Night

You know who's missing for this party? Larat. Pretty sure he still has one last debt to settle with Catherine, and I think calling in the Wild Hunt ad literal cavalry is one of the balls Cat has in the air.

Someperson

Doubt that this would be a winning blow but it'd certainly be a nice eleventh hour reinforcement that keeps the side of the living in the fight for a bit longer until they can do their thing.

ohJohN

Emotional moments in stories don't often provoke a physical reaction from me, but damn did I get choked up during the Pickler bit 🥹.

This entire chapter was just excellent, three different character payoffs ON TOP OF the ones from last chapter. Expertly done.

Someperson

On the one hand, I really hope we get an epilogue when all is said and done.

On the other hand, we have enough foreshadowing about what might come next that I can already imagine the kinds of stories you might get.

BargleNawdleZouss

1. Agnes Hasenbach aka The Augur: I am picturing her as a very sweet woman with Down Syndrome.

2. Still awaiting Kreios the Riddle-Maker to show up at the last minute and make a contribution.

Someperson

Neshamah: Nothing can stop my world domina—

Kreios: iF yOu HaVe FoUr PeNciLs aNd I hAvE sEvEn AppLeS, hOw ManY PaNcAkEs CaN FiT oN tHe RoOf?

Neshamah: what

Cat: proceeds to shank Neshamah at a critical moment of distraction

Chapter 53: Motion

“Greatness is a chariot pulled by ghosts: it goes nowhere without deaths, but too many will tear it apart.”

— Argea Theodosian, Sacker of Cities, Tyrant of Helike

It was the bloody middle of the night, so if they didn’t have a good reason for waking me we were going to have a brisk round of hangings.

“I’ll eat their livers,” ‘Drani groaned, pulling the pillow over her head. “Won’t even season it, yue bashtards.”

She was usually better at waking up than me but she’d, uh, put her back into it tonight. We were still both pleurably sore and exhausted. I blinked away the light from the candle borne by legionary behind the partition in the pavilion, sliding on a robe, and limped out without bothering to hide my irritation. The large orc on the other side coughed, visibly embarrassed and unsure where to look, which was mildly amusing considering that while I was showing skin it wasn’t like I had anything an orc would care to look at. My teeth were sadly herbivorous, I’d been told, and my skin thin as paper.

“There’s a situation, ma’am,” the legionary got out.

“I’d guessed,” I bluntly said. “What kind?”

“Urgent?” he ventured, carefully staring at the quill sharpener on my desk.

I sighed.

"What's the urgent situation about, sergeant?" I impatiently asked.

"There's trouble with the drow," he hastily said. "The Firstborn, I mean. And soldiers."

My eye narrowed.

"Which Firstborn?"

"The Lord of Silent Steps, ma'am," he replied. "And another two that are supposed to be scribes."

It took me a moment to shake out the rest of the sleep, but once I had it fell into place immediately. It'd finally happened, then.

"Send word I'm on my way," I told the orc.

He could not get out of the tent fast enough. Indrani was somewhat more awake when I returned, though when I told her I needed to go out she decided to gather all the covers to her like a cocoon and pout instead of helping me dress.

"Might not be too long," I told her as I pulled on my last boot.

She snorted, kissing my clothed shoulder affectionately.

"Yeah, like I'd buy that," Indrani said. "Take too long and I'm helping myself to your liquor stash, fair warning."

"Pest," I fondly replied.

I left her to it, closing the flaps on the Mantle of Woe and finding my staff waiting for my hand. The night was oddly pleasant – weather around Keter was largely unchanging, knowing neither winter nor summer – and I took a deep breath as I limped out. With wards to filter the air, there was no need to worry about the poison mists in the camps. Two legionaries were waiting to escort me to the 'situation', saluting as I approached, but it was not to them my eye turned. A dark shape moved against the dark sky, lazily gliding until it took a dive towards me. Soldiers cursed and reached for their swords, but I raised a hand to stop them.

Andronike landed on my shoulder, light as a feather, and dug her talons into the cloth of the Mantle.

"Heavy-handed of you to come in person," I commented.

"The time for subtlety is passed," the crow replied.

I snorted.

"Sounds like something your sister would say," I teased. "Where is she, anyway?"

"Bringing to life your little notion," Andronike said.

Huh. Taking that long?'

"Mastery has proved laborious," the Eldest Night conceded.

"Worth the investment," I replied. "We need all the nasty surprises we can get."

"So Komena said," the crow sourly replied.

I brushed my mind against the goddess's, intrigued, and got half a thought in answer. Andronike was convinced her sister was so enthusiastic because she wanted to be able to step on people, which I honestly thought she might be right about. Not that the elder sister was in any position to throw stones.

"Like you don't also hunt rabbits for sport," I replied, rolling my eye.

The legionaries had been careful not to stare as I bickered with the massive god-crow made of malevolent shadows, but I saw in my peripheral vision that the two oldest ones – a Soninke captain and his Callowan lieutenant – seemed genuinely indifferent. I glanced at their hips, finding goblin steel blades in the sheaths, and swallowed a smile. Old hands, these two, probably from as far back as Arcadian Campaign. They'd seen me argue with so many unspeakable eldritch abominations it didn't warrant much interest anymore. My lips twitched.

"All right," I said, rolling my shoulder and getting an offended squawk from Andronike when I didn't spare the one she was on, "let's go have a look. It's a damned ungodly hour to be at."

"Ma'am," the Soninke captain replied, saluting with an amused glint in his eye.

It wasn't a long walk, or rather it was a shorter walk than it would be in any other part of the ring of camps. Juniper had begun planning out the layout of the siege encampments for the Army of Callow before we even left for Praes, so the ease of movement was only to be expected. High Marshal Nim's sappers might have matched us if they hadn't been saddled with the Wasteland's noble armies with a coat fresh paint slapped on them, but they'd had to wrestle with that headache so we'd come out ahead. Pickler, I suspected, would have gotten quite smug about that.

She'd not taken well how our sappers had gotten regularly outdone by those of the Legions at the Battle of Kala and since grown enthusiastic about getting one over the 'cousins'.

The soldiers at the heart of the incident weren't under arrest, having done nothing wrong, but they had been brought to an empty drilling ground surrounded by a few lines of legionaries keeping curious eyes away. The six of them seemed less unsettled by that than the presence of the Firstborn, though. Ivah was seated cross-legged atop a training dummy, silver eyes smiling as it looked down at them, while behind it my scribes stood with watchful eyes: Trokel looked uncertain about all this, but Fania was openly fascinated.

The officer on the scene, a tall Duni captain with a long scar across the throat, was only too happy to turn over the whole mess to me. As she promptly withdrew and pulled back the lines with her, I was left with three Firstborn and six legionaries of the Army of Callow. Andronike shuffled on my shoulder proudly, like a cat dragging back a dead mouse, those fucking talons. I resisted the urge to glare at the Eldest Sister in front of everyone, but it was a narrow thing. Still, looking at my soldiers I had to say the Sisters had been pretty blunt in making their point.

Two humans, two orcs and two goblins would make up the first people outside the Firstborn who could use the Night.

"At ease," I said, having seen tension rise as the silence lingered. "None of you are up for discipline."

The highest up was a sergeant, a Callowan woman with the Summerholm look about her.

"Pleased to hear that, ma'am," she crisply said, glancing at the others. "Am I to understand that everyone here can..."

She trailed off and I cocked an eyebrow.

"Any of you have a reliable trick yet?" I curiously asked.

It was a goblin who stepped forward, hesitant. Small, even by goblin standards, and with the wrinkles that began to accrue past fifteen – nearly halfway through their lifespan, for all but those of Matron lines. He put up his hand and I felt the pull on the Night a heartbeat before a small, flickering ball of black flame erupted above his open palm.

"I was out of matches," the goblin admitted. "So I cursed and then asked for..."

He glanced at Andronike, pressing a reverent knuckle to his forehead.

"Take and rise," he fervently said. "The Crows provide."

How many years did you gain just by becoming able to use the Night? Not so many by a human's reckoning, I thought, but for him the difference it would make was beyond words. One of the two orcs cleared his throat, the burn marks going down the left side of his face striking even though the helm covered part of them.

"Can't show it," he said, "but I see better in the dark now, Warlord. Almost like it's day."

I reached out through the Night and found his mark, the small but steady trickle being drawn from the sea. None of the others volunteered anything. Both humans were women and orcs men orcs were half-and-half, but I could not help but notice both goblins were male. Some part of me smile coldly at that, the Beast laughing deep in my bones. Soon enough the Matrons would hear about that, and I could only look forward at how the fear would be keeping them up at night. Night wouldn't care about their little matriarchal racket. I looked at the two goblins, one aging and the other who couldn't be older than nine, and the wonder I saw in those yellow eyes felt to me like a sound.

The one a sharper's fuse made, just after you lit it.

"A good start," I approved. "You will not be able to do much, at first, but the power can be grown."

"It can?"

The other human was the one to speak, a young dark-eyed Taghreb who then blushed at having spoken out of turn. I smiled.

"That is the foundational virtue of Night," I told her. "To prove yourself worthy is to rise."

I could see the burning curiosity in them at my words – and the deep hunger, in the yet silent female orc and the aging goblin – but I would not hold their hands through this. That was the other side of the coin: Night demanded that you win your own victories. Tossing the first few outside the Firstborn to gain the power into the deep end was not a great notion either, admittedly, but I didn't have the time to take on pupils. Not six and even less the greater number that would follow in the coming days. Fortunately, as the aging goblin had said 'the Crows provide'. I glanced at Ivah, who leaped down from the dummy and landed in the dust without a sound.

"This," I said, "is Ivah of the Losara, the Lord of Silent Steps."

A shuffle and salutes ensued, with varying degrees of crispness.

"There is no finer Mighty among the Firstborn," I said, "or any I trust more deeply. It is the duty of the Losara Sigil to keep oaths and hold stewardship of the Night – a duty that now extends to all of you."

I met its eyes and it offered a shallow bow.

"Honour was given," Ivah said.

"It was meant," I honestly said, and the soldiers looked a little lost so I clarified. "Ivah will see to your education in the Night. Orders will be given to your superior officers so you are removed from several of your regular duties so you might take lessons instead."

A sharp sensation of approval from Andronike, and of satisfaction as well. At my words, but also at me. It's only fair, I thought at her. They had chosen me as First Under the Night, a stranger to the Firstborn who had changed the ways of their people. Now it was their turn: let Ivah be the stranger bringing about change, working through the first apostles of the Night among the peoples of Calernia. It wasn't just lessons I was giving Ivah with that assignment: it was getting to shape traditions in the use of Night for all these people, traditions that would echo for decades and perhaps centuries to come. It was a lot of power to give someone, but how could I not trust Ivah? Maybe tomorrow, the Lord of Silent Steps had said as a god was slain and another made anew.

There were some deeds that made distrust seem obscene.

All seemed pleased at the news, not that an order coming from the Queen of Callow was something that left a lot room to refuse, but a closer look told me that the sergeant who'd been the first to break the silence was hesitating. I gestured for her to speak up.

"I don't want to overstep, Your Majesty," she carefully said, "but is it really alright? The House of Light..."

"It's nothing for you to worry about," I firmly told her.

She looked skeptical, though unwilling to contradict her own queen.

"The age is coming to an end, sergeant," I told her, the crow on my shoulder spreading her wings. "There is room enough on Calernia for both Light and Night. And if there isn't..."

Andronike took flight, cawing as the soldiers flinched away.

"I'll make it," I said, and spoke the words with cold certainty.

None of them seemed inclined to doubt me after that. I'd meant every word, anyhow. The House Insurgent already tolerated crows being painted on the Army of Callow's banners, and they would make their peace with Night so long as it was sworn to respectable purposes. As for the priests back home, the so-called House Constant, they'd fall in line. I saw none of them here, with the world on the edge of the knife, and earned them precious little patience from me.

Or from any of the soldiers that'd be coming back home, I'd wager.

I left them in Ivah's safe hands, limping away from the grounds, and as my escort fell in behind me I considered whether or not I should wake Vivienne to tell her immediately when I was shaken out of my thoughts.

"Your Majesty, if I could have a word?"

I turned and the pin told me what the girl was at a glance, if not who: the painted skeletal hand of the adjunct secretariat. Too young to be anything more than a messenger, I thought, with her chubby cheeks and blond locks at least an inch past what regulations allowed. The secretariat wasn't part of the Army of Callow, though. Once upon a time they'd been under Hakram alone, though his departure had seen them passed off to Vivienne. She'd left Hakram's right hand man in command and intervened only to smooth differences between the phalanges and the Jacks – the spies sometimes got in each other's way – which I considered wise of her.

Much like me, the least thing she needed was more on her plate.

"Message?" I asked.

She nodded.

"Lord Hierophant asks that you attend him immediately," the girl said. "He is under the threefold wards."

I stared flatly at the messenger, who blushed under the scrutiny. It wasn't her fault, Masego had been the one to send her, but now I was morbidly curious.

"Assuming I'd been asleep at this hour like any halfway reasonable person would be," I said, "what would you have done?"

"Kicked this up to my lieutenant," the girl honestly replied.

I clapped her shoulder.

"You will go far in life," I told her just as honestly, which turned the blush incandescent.

The blond hair and faint accent painted a particular picture, thou

"Liessen?" I asked, taking back the hand.

"From Paltridge," she replied. "It's a little town near the border with Vale. But I had family in Liesse."

Her and half of Callow. It'd been the second-largest city in the kingdom and one of the wealthiest.

"Is that how you ended up with that bit of ironwork on?" I asked, glancing at the iron pin.

"I enrolled just before you led the army into the Wasteland," she proudly said, then deflated. "I, uh, didn't do well at the Laure training camp but I know Chantant and I'm good with numbers so the adjunct secretariat reached out."

She paused, a little breathless.

"I wanted to fight Praesi, not run messages," she admitted, "but it was better than going back to scribe work while the world's going to shit."

To my amusement, the blush returned with a vengeance when she realized that she'd just cursed in front of the Queen of Callow. Yeah, she was definitely new to this. Most of the phalanges that served as my guards were former legionaries, and all of them knew I could curse in twice as many languages and thrice as filthily as any of them. I cocked my head to the side, studying her.

"No regrets?"

"It hasn't been like I thought it'd be," she admitted. "We fought Praesi but not for long, and now they're on our side."

"There's been Praesi on our side from the start," I reminded her. "I first raised the Army from the Legions of Terror."

She shot me a surprised look.

"Those aren't Praesi," the girl told me. "They fight under the Sword and Crown. Everyone knows it's the High Lords we need to hang, Your Majesty."

When I was your age, I thought, saying that would have gotten you called a traitor in half the kingdom's taverns. I looked at the fair-haired girl who couldn't be older than seventeen, one of the children raised in the shadow of the battles I'd fought since becoming the Squire, and saw in her a seed of what Callow would become. A seed I'd washed Calernian fields in blood to water, that my father had died to grow. I smiled. Can you hear her talk, Father? It might have been just an inch, but we moved the world. We changed the story.

"Maybe one day," I said. "First we find out if the Confederation of Praes makes for a better neighbour than the Dread Empire did."

"I'll buy that when pigs fly," the girl muttered.

"You'd be surprised what wings can grow on," I drily replied, thinking of the first time I'd ever met Masego. "Thank you for the message..."

She straightened.

"Alice, Your Majesty," she told me.

"I might as well go see what my favourite madman wants, since I'm already up," I said. "You have a good night, Alice."

She saluted, the angle of it off by large enough a margin I pitied whoever had been her drill instructor, and I left her to her duties. The threefold wards mentioned in the message told me exactly where Zeze was at, since there was only one such set in the entire ring of camps. We'd ripped out the anchor stones from the Arsenal when we shut it down and Roland had led a team to spend almost five months repurposing them into the strongest movable defensive wards in the entire Grand Alliance. We kept all sorts of important assets in there, but the two that stood out were the Severance and the Autumn Crown.

Considering Masego had begun losing interest in the Severance not long after it was forged while Quartered Seasons had been his baby from the start, I could give a good guess as to which the two he'd be at.

Even in the middle of the night the place was heavily guarded, mostly Lycaonese foot with goblins spotters, but I didn't have to wait long before being escorted past the first layer of wards. I was both known and expected. The Autumn Crown was held in the deepest part of the depository, past the other two layers of wards – I felt my connection to Night weaken, and if the wards were actively turned on me I suspected it might be outright silenced – but the chamber in which it was kept wasn't all that impressive to look at. From the outside, it was just a large steel cube with seven rings of painted Mavian script wrapping around it.

The door was opened for me by a grizzled old Lycaonese warrior – Neustrian, by the look of the tabard – and I stepped through a threshold, the air pushing back against my movement as if were water. I blinked away the unpleasant sensation as the door closed behind me, leaving me to look at the glowing insides of the cube. Trismegistan runes I was more familiar with burned on what seemed like every spare inch of steel, from ceiling to floor, carved cleanly so that stepping on them would change nothing. The light they let out reminded me of embers, though the colours of it was...

colder. Hierophant was standing deeper in, before the Autumn Crown itself.

It was a pretty piece, as fae crowns tended to be. All copper and bronze, worked to look like a circle of roots, but those roots grew small branches and dead leaves that looked incredibly lifelike. Because they were, I realized after a moment. At some point, impossible for my eye to perceive, the metal turned to flora. We'd changed that crown, though, and it showed. Long, thin nails of iron had been hammered into it and jutted out like needles while a closer look revealed precise cuts into the roots and leaves. About a scalpel's length. A vivisector of miracles, Hierophant had called himself when he first came into his Name.

He'd lived up to the boast.

"Checking in on your work?"

Masego half-turned to look at me, as unsettling a change as the way he now wore his eye cloth: like me, covering only one eye. His own was not dead, still bright with the light of Summer's sun, but it felt as though we were mirroring each other. If enough of us take wounds, we'll have half a dozen mirrors to go around.

"Roland assured me it was all secured, but I wanted to see for myself," Hierophant said.

I hummed, limping closer. The sound of my staff against the steel uncomfortably like a blow.

"So is it?" I asked.

He nodded.

"It will work," Masego said. "When the Dead King is made to wear it, he will lose all power over the dead."

"Some might call that a fair trade, given what he'll get in exchange," I mused.

"He won't," Hierophant said, coldly satisfied.

For the Autumn Crown to be a gift – something that was not an attack, that could not be refused – it needed to be a boon. A boon with a price was allowed, but the gift still had to give Neshamah something. We didn't want to empower him, of course, but to an extent we had to so there'd been a fine line to walk. The conclusion had been that we should give him something he already held, as much as possible: immortality. The Autumn Crown, after Hierophant's cuts, now served the purpose of making whoever bore it a fixed point in Creation. He'd known how to do it because he'd spent about a year studying that very thing, back in the day.

I'd been a fixed point as Sovereign of Winter, after all, though most people had simply believed it to be regeneration. In practice, my shape had been fixed and Winter's power simply filled the mould anew whenever part was damaged.

The Dead King would gain much the same benefit, though for him the real prize would be that we were pretty sure his soul would receive much the same treatment. Should it cut or damaged or anything else at all it would form anew, whole again. Given that the Hidden Horror's great fear had always been the way he was finite, that every personal loss for him was permanent, the property would make the Autumn Crown enough of a gift that it could not simply be fought off like a curse. Even if the boon came at the price of losing all power over the dead, ending his control over all his armies.

We'd wanted to kill his magic entirely – Masego most of all, for obvious reasons – but we'd been unable to get that right in time. This would have to do. Besides, even if he still had most of his magic we could imprison him in the Twilight Ways if the right person watched over him. Unless, of course, the Ways were broken for good and all my plans were ashes. He didn't seem interested in volunteering answers and it took me a moment to get the stomach to ask, but I got it out.

"What did you find?" I asked, licking my lips.

"The Ways were destroyed over the surface broadly corresponding to the Kingdom of the Dead," he said.

"That's... good, relatively speaking," I ventured. "Is the break temporary or-"

"Permanent," Masego bluntly said. "He was... thorough."

"So the Ways will be dead over the Kingdom of the Dead," I mused. "Yeah, there's enough symmetry there I could see fate lending a hand to make it stick."

"It's not that simple, Catherine," he said. "Mortal hands created Twilight, it is imperfect in ways a realm like Arcadia is not. More than that, it is young."

"Fragile," I quietly said. "You meant it's fragile."

He nodded. I grit my teeth.

"How bad?"

"I cannot be sure," Hierophant, "not without further study, but I believe the destruction will ripple out. Like cracks on a sheet of ice."

"Stop dancing around it," I said. "What are we losing?"

He hesitated.

"Most of it," Masego said. "Between seven to nine tenths."

I sucked in a breath.

"You're sure?" I asked.

"Not immediately," he specified. "But over the next decade, I believe most of the Twilight Ways will collapse. Only anchored points and their surroundings will be wholly unaffected."

My eye narrowed.

"The gates," I said.

"And Liesse, which is the heart of the realm," he added. "It seems likely there will be other stable pockets I do not know of, spared collapse by happenstance or other reasons, but the only reliable travel through what will remain of Twilight will be from gate to gate."

I breathed out, feeling out his words with my Name. There was a shape there, I saw with dread. Twilight broken, like its crown, ruined shards of it intertwining with Creation wherever they fell. There would still be other paths than the gates, but few save Named would ever find them and they would be terrifyingly dangerous to tread. For all others who would travel under the twilight sky, there would only be the roads between gates. I passed a hand through my hair, frustrated. That a fucking ritual could undo Tariq's-

"Ah," I muttered, the piece falling into place.

Masego cocked an eyebrow.

"We did this to ourselves," I sighed. "At least in part."

"It does seem likely the Dead King imitated Akua's ritual out in the Wasteland, after he knew it possible," the dark-skinned mage agreed.

"Sure," I shrugged, "but that's not the part I mean. When we first made the Twilight Ways, the Grey Pilgrim scarified himself to make them. That's a heavy weight, Zeze. It'd take more than just a ritual, however good, to undo that."

"But you resurrected him," Masego hazarded, looking genuinely interested. "Which changes the balance of the phenomenon."

"That weakened it, but it might have stuck anyway," I mused. "He thought he was going to die for good and that matters. He killed the Saint for it, too, and she was probably his closest friend. That's more weight. No, what actually fucked us was Hainaut."

"Where he sacrificed himself again," Masego noted.

"Fate is blind, but also fair in her own way," I told him. "She doesn't play favourites: we don't get to make Tariq's sacrifice count twice."

The moment he'd called down that star, the Ways had become fragile. The Dead King wasn't all powerful, of course, and it seemed like he'd had to rely on second order effects to do most of the heavy lifting when wrecking the realm. Wouldn't be perfect or instantaneous either. But it'd only become possible at all because of Hainaut and the second time the Peregrine spent his life for the greater good. I grimaced. No good deed went unpunished, huh?

"It hurts us," I admitted, "but we're not knocked out of the war. We'll start to feel the larger consequences after either we've won or we're all dead."

"It should still be possible to retreat through Arcadia after the siege is ended," Masego nodded.

Only we can't drink the water from Arcadia the way we could Twilight's, I thought, and lack of water would kill us even faster than starvation. There was no need to burden him with that knowledge right now, though. It was not in his power to solve.

"I am sorry I could not offer better news," he said.

"I'd rather thank you for them not being worse," I replied, "but either way it's no fault of yours."

He studied me for a moment.

"You look tired," Zeze said. "Get some sleep."

"Back at you," I snorted.

I turned away from the crown, making for the door.

"Come on," I called out. "I bet Indrani's still up. She'll want to switch tents if you're going to bed, so you might as well pick her up on the way."

I put on a smile that was a tad forced, feeling tired in ways that had little to do with the hour. Maybe it'd all look a little less bleak with a few more hours of sleep into me, I thought, but then maybe it wouldn't.

Gods knew I wouldn't hold my breath.

Droughtbringer

<https://topwebfiction.com/listings/a-practical-guide-to-evil/>

Linnus42

Fate Says No Double Jeopardy on Heroic Sacrifices.
Only get to sing that story once.

Night in the hands of non Drow. Interesting I am not not sure any of them will get strong enough to matter much given how fast this siege has to go but the ability to spread out more troops who can see ambushes in the night and operate in the dark that aren't Named is quite useful.

Cat I assume will wander around and bump into someone for another conversation. Viv has popped up more then once, Indrani, Masego, Ivah, Arthur, Christophe, Cordelia and Augur...so a convo with Hakram and Akua seems in order and maybe another with Hanno. Deep cut would be Killian lol.

Insanenoodlyguy

they are about to potentially be able to kill massive amounts of people, or take from their own comrades as they fall. This is actually prime conditions to get some people strong enough to make a difference. And decent odds of the first Name that uses night.

Linnus42

Sure but you have to remember Cat says they need to make major progress in 8 days. And they have 2-3 months max to finish this, so I doubt any of the new Drow climb the tree quick enough to be super relevant at the end. Doesn't help none of these characters are really relevant unless we see a human or goblin or orc we already know using Night say Killian, Aisha, etc...

shikkarasu

I absolutely love the idea of declaring these 6 'new Drow'. Like how being a Dwarf had remarkably little to do with genetics in Discworld.

Cpt. Obvious

The story has become so massive I have a hard time remembering everything, but weren't there some rules added regarding who the Drow were allowed to "harvest" night from? That they can harvest enemies they kill is s given. But I'm uncertain about the rules regarding fallen sigil mates. I'm pretty certain Sve-Noc no longer allows Mighty to kill and harvest from their own guild indiscriminately. But what about those killed by the enemies?

Sir Nil

On one hand, the new Night wielders are unlikely to gain any powerful abilities during this battle.

On the other hand, if they win and survive, this is pretty much the perfect levelling opportunity.

ruduen

It really depends. Remember, to Night, proving oneself worthy is to rise. A battle like this is certainly quite an opportunity to prove oneself worthy.

In addition, at this time, if Night is equivalent to Light... Well, it's good to think about whether that power is now an investment from the Gods Below anymore, or if it's entirely within the hands of the crows. The sudden gift of a known but previously ungranted power would be quite a bit of name-bait if it was Light. And given the recent changes in the Night, combined with Cat's precedent as a Night-wielding Named...

This is a danger, but also quite an opportunity. Not one Cat (or anybody) could visualize right now if Night primarily operates under villain stories, but when that sword snaps...

AviKav

<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2021/11/09/chapter-48-root/>

> I watched the faith, the earnest belief of millions of drow swelling the godhead of Sve Noc, and let out a convulsive laugh. After all these years, all the sacrifices and the despair and the darkness, the two sisters had found the end of their winding road: they'd slipped the noose. The debt of the Firstborn would be wiped clean, the destruction they'd staved off with a loan and then Winter's flesh at last gone for ~~food~~ good. They were no longer finite, their godhead a living and breathing truth, and so what did a few measly years mean for them to pay? Faith fed Night, fed its twin goddesses, and like a beacon in the dark their power filled the sky above us.

> Sve Noc paid the old debt of the Twilight Sages, returned the years borrowed, and for them it was no different than a sigh. Time meant nothing to the immortal.

Liliet

I think Night is under the command of the crows, but is Name-bait anyway. Any power is, from political to stolen from fae.

dadycool

And so it begins. Darkness spreads and Night grips ever more mortals in its talons.

It's a shame about the Twilight Ways, though. It really seemed like a big step towards the Age of Order, but I'm sure in time we'll come to see this as for the best, somehow.

LarsBlitzer

I'm fairly sure that Masego will come up with a way to create new Twilight gates eventually, stabilizing the disruption DK started. Like he said, it'll take about a decade. It won't be quick, and it'll likely be very expensive, but reliable transport from point A to B, bypassing whatever dangers there are in the physical world and shortening travel time in the bargain? It'll be worth the cost.

KageLupus

From a long-term narrative perspective, I think the Twilight Ways had to be broken in the way that they were in this chapter. Cat's original plan for the Twilight Ways was to have it as a place she could lock down the Dead King. But then she immediately saw the tactical advantage that it provided and started using it for rapid troop deployments.

This was necessary for the fighting against the Dead King, but imagine the world in 20 years after the DK is defeated. The Twilight Ways aren't broken and DK being locked inside only really messes with a small area of the Ways, so why wouldn't you still use them for troop deployment? Warfare in that world is going to be vicious because it is so easy to take a swing at your enemies when you can move through the Ways. A journey that would take months only takes weeks instead, is much harder to scout or harass than if they were in Creation, and even if you know it is coming it is much harder to figure out exactly where the other army is going to reappear.

Breaking the Twilight Ways reduces their use for advanced warfare, but only after it was used to get to the final battle with the Dead King. It also puts the Heroes backs to the wall and turns this last fight into a potential "final stand" situation. Which is probably a calculated risk on the DK's side since it puts him in a dangerous position storywise but also sets the stage for him just letting the Grand Alliance walk home the long way while dying of thirst.

Liliet

> Cat's original plan for the Twilight Ways was to have it as a place she could lock down the Dead King. But then she immediately saw the tactical advantage that it provided and started using it for rapid troop deployments.

The other way around actually. At least, she sold it to the heroes at Princes' Graveyard as "making a highway for our armies".

shikkarasu

"We're going to make a god."

But, Catherine, that's Hubr-

"Then we're going to kill that god and make a highway out of it's bones."

...I ...What?

I think I understand; The God's can't punish us for hubris if we keep doubling down. Any punishment the Heavens invent for us will be insufficient by the time it is applied.

Truly, the Lately Queen is wise beyond her years.

shikkarasu

We call this 'The Hubris Shield' strategy in my DnD group. Also WTFork happened to my italics? I swear I closed them after the incredulous 'what'.

Rey d`Tutto

Thank you WordPress.

Editing a comment is so 1990's.

JJR

"There would still be other paths than the gates, but few save Named would ever find them and they would be terrifyingly dangerous to tread. For all others who would travel under the twilit sky, there would only be the roads between gates."

It sounds to me like the twilight realm is going to become a bit dichotomous. There will be roads of light between gates and safe to use and paths of darkness that only the powerful would dare to tread. Both still twilight, but on opposite ends perhaps.

Hargabga

So where she'll stick Fixed King now? And with whom? Just like the best Catherine's plans, it went off the rails and burned green long before she got to implement it. I wonder how it'll tie into Neshamah's greater plan that somehow involves whatever Yara is after.

Darkening

Liesse is still gonna exist, so she might trap him there still somehow.

edrey

well, you could say its the twilight of the age of wonder, and the Dawn of the age of order, they would find a way just in time. i am sure.

Night is coming, the sacrament of struggle will change everything and cant help but think andronike as a cat. it really fit her.

Juff

Typo Thread:

by legionary > by a legionary her like > herself like claps > clasp subtlety is passed > subtlety has passed as Arcadian > as the Arcadian and since > and had since orcs men orcs > orcs smile coldly > smiled coldly forward at > forward to and earned > which earned which her > with her picture, thou (missing stuff) team to spend > team that had spent which the two > which of the two goblins spotters > goblin spotters closer. The > closer, the it cut > it be cut scarified > sacrificed

Reader in the Night

What I'm more interested in is, rather than non-drow gaining Night, now that Night isn't a godhood, will drow be able to gain Names? Everything seems to indicate that the next generation of drow will be magic-capable again, or at least have a few magic-capable children born.

If the drow can get Names...

BargleNawdleZouss

Random tangential question: while all this is going on, what are non-combat Named such as Relentless Magistrate and Sculptor doing?

Konstantin von Karstein

I think it would depend on their abilities. The RM could stay in Salia to prevent infiltration, or do so in the camps.

ninegardens

I think this is the third chapter in a row where Tariq has shown up.

That's... fair. All the mentions made perfect sense in context, but it is an interesting sort of shadow being cast.

... Also VERY on character for Grey Pilgrim to still be having an impact this far after his death... mostly for the better, but always with that twinge of remorse.

Liliet

It's one thing I really like about Guide: characters who die don't disappear.

mamm0nn

Twilight breaks

Cat: Hm... Now we need a new infinite realm to imprison the Dead King in. Grabs Wandering Bard's flacon. This should do.

sengachi

Oh wow, I was thinking and chuckling about what Catherine's argument with a dark god (whose voice has been described as extremely unpleasant for mortals) must be like for her soldiers. But then to see that two of her older hands just don't even freaking care?!

HAHAHAHAHAHA

Someperson

Goblins gaining Night is every bit as beautiful as I hoped / expected.

Someperson

Welp that wasn't supposed to be a reply to anythin else but whatever

onedollargum

Tariq being able to cause Catherine problems even after he's died feels very on-brand for him.

nick012000

Well, it looks like the Dead King's just foiled Plan Inprison The Dead King In The Twilight Ways Forever. No Twilight Ways in Keter to inprison him in anymore. They'll need to find somewhere else to stash him if they're still planning on stashing him somewhere.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Maybe they can get in contact with a Choir and stash him in one of the Heavens. Then again, it seems like mortals don't get to invade the Heavens like they sometimes do the Hells. In any case I'd be surprised if my idea is even vaguely similar to what they go with.

Sykomantis

I'm betting on the Dead King being forced to teach magic to uppity brats in Cardinal for eternity. Truly a hellish existence

ninegardens

Didn't his magical textbooks just download his mind into your body by default?

Pretty sure I wouldn't trust him as a teacher.

Sykomantis

Yes but that's before he gets the crown. After he gets it and doesn't have to worry about dying or being killed, he probably wouldn't have a reason to do that anymore. Plus they could just make him teach from memory, no textbooks allowed.

Rey d`Tutto

I'm not sure that would be better.

All curriculum from the Dead Autumn King would need to be audited by Agnes & Masego prior to any students seeing it. At the least.

Daniel E

I appreciate that the Goblin's prayer uses Catherine's Squire-Aspects.

Crash

Well, since you mentioned.

Cat told the Drow to Struggle and Learn in this new chance they have gotten as well.

If you wanna be poetic I'm sure there's something to be said about the ruins of a people and Fall/Break. Seeking deeds for their goddesses and such. The worthy Take, the worthy Rise and all that.

Cat's Aspects are fun like that!

Xinci

The fixed point thing is highly useful...especially since Winter was always connected, across both time and space. This holds some rather serious potential implications on Neshemash's new path to apotheosis. At least in part, it means he may not need to be in conflict with them anymore.

*arcanavita*15

I like Cats talk with the person who was part of the phalanges, it really goes to show how much Callow has changed for the better even with all of the negatives her reign has brought that even if by only a bit she and her father's dream has been accomplished.

*arcanavita*15

Both of the Night wielding goblins are male which is just another nail in the coffin for the matrons, Cat really enjoyed that the Beast even got a laugh out of it.

RoflCat

So, we have Nightstalker and Cursespitter in the making?

An orc who fight in the night as well as a Mighty, but can also function in the day, and a goblin 'mage' who cast spells by cursing aloud.

I'm guessing one of the humans or the other goblin will become among the first 'priest' of Night, gaining favor by spreading faith of Night instead of through battles.

Darkening

Y'know, it's a small thing, but it's interesting seeing an orc continue to refer to Cat as Warlord when there's an actual Warlord running around these days. I guess she's still his Warlord even if his species has a new ruler.

Liliet

Orcs have not historically been a united people. There might have only been one The Warlord at a time, but there might well have been multiple variations on the Name running around, like all the Knights these days. There being a Warlord over there while you're over here with your own Warlord is what Warlording is all about: no point if there isn't anyone to war with.

SpeckofStardust

3 things.

1. wont the dead from his hell still obey him even without magic enforcment?
2. Will he just become King without the Dead?
3. Why not just simply kill him?

ninegardens

Chuckling hats at people is easier than killing them. The story fu is less against you. Also, you can probably get away with "gifting" the hate to any ONE of his bodies, as opposed to having to find his "true" body (whatever that might mean) for the sake of murder.

kaldurak

You'd be trying to kill someone who has been dead for millennia.

Travis Michael Chin

1. I'd say rather than being obeyed, the dead currently are controlled. If the dead are released, the ones without fine control will probably just go feral (which I think is how soldier dead are usually designed), and the ones with souls will likely either be free to die, or free to do as they will. He'll still have loyal followers, of course, but he's not scary because of his followers.
2. The Risen King? Autumn is still a season where things go to die.
3. The story is much, much weaker for killing an ancient horror vs sealing it. I think they just don't have the capability.

Crash

Plus, Evil in a Can is a classic!

Chapter 54: Animus

"Men should always make grand plans. What better way is there to please the Gods than to make them laugh?"

– Louis Merovins, seventh First Prince of Procer

Ater had been deeply wounded by the siege that brought about the fall of the Tower.

Praes' capital had not been sacked – though the Clans had cheerfully helped themselves to all the riches in the camps of the High Lords outside the city – but the battle within its walls had arguably been more brutal than your average sack was. The destructive brawls between Named and harsh street-to-street fighting between Praesi defenders and my Army of Callow had been damaging enough, but then my father had unleashed the giant spiders and the High Lords had answered by emptying their arsenal of horrors to turn the tide. When I left Ater for Salia, the number floating around was about a quarter of the citizenry dead and large part of the city uninhabitable.

It wasn't a bad a butcher's bill as the Doom or the end of Thalassina, but it had still been a cruel day for innocents.

Still, like most of the many Praesi tragedies it had not come without attendant opportunities. Corpses were raised to lend a hand to the rebuilding, devils summoned to clear out the last spider nests, spellfire unleashed to clear the streets. That'd been only the small part, though, because the finest mages in the once-Empire had been tasked with raising flying fortresses for the war on Keter and given the forbidding of human sacrifice they'd gotten... inventive. With a clear path into the caverns under Ater, the Praesi had gone in and hemmed in the spiders with wards before sacrificing them by the thousands. It wasn't as good as humans would be, I was told, but quantity had a quality of its own.

The first wave of 'fortresses' had been chunks of Ater ripped from the ground, mostly towers and gatehouses. After that it'd gotten trickier, the mages having to gather the sacrificial power before moving it out of the city for a second ritual. There were, to my absolute lack of surprise, a bunch of mostly empty fortresses around Ater whose purpose was largely to wait around until someone would set them aflight. The War College had used them for war games occasionally, though most of the time they'd simply been used as fortified storehouses for whatever Dread Emperors had wanted to keep outside the city.

All in all, there were thirteen flying fortresses that the newly minted Confederation of Praes had brought to the siege. The three largest, the 'Old Mothers', were essentially massive flying castles with full garrisons and mage contingents. After that we got the three the rank-and-file had called the 'Sisters', smaller castles with strong curtain walls that'd been built explicitly to be raised as flying fortresses. The last seven were nameless, cobbled together from the ruins of Ater. I'd used one in Salia when having my... polite disagreement with Cordelia and the heroes, and two more had been along, but the last four had been slower to follow.

That was because High Marshal Nim and the now-reinstated General Sacker had gotten together to think about the siege of Keter before beginning their march, and they'd come to a realization: about nine tenths of the traditional Legion arsenal was going to be useless when attacking the city.

The Crown of the Dead had a moat in the form of the gaping chasm, but that bloody thing was miles deep at least. Unlike a river moat or a pit a few feet deep, there was no way we could fill it. We weren't going to be starving out undead, either, which left siege weaponry as the way forward. Only those walls were thicker than any other city's on Calernia, because the Dead King had nothing but hands and time and enemies to prepare against, so while chipping away at them with catapults and trebuchets was technically possible it would be... difficult.

We had the range, it was true, but even regular city walls took long to crack even under concentrated fire. It would take months of bombardment, if it worked at all, and we didn't have months to spare. That was without bringing sorcery into the mix, since those walls were all warded to the Hells and they'd be defended by dead mages. No, if we wanted to take the Crown of the Dead before doom came calling then we'd need to storm the walls. More precisely, the gates: the four stone bridges across the chasm were the only ways in and out of Keter.

They were also, naturally, the most heavily defended parts of the ramparts.

Nim and Sacker had considered what an attack on those gates through four funnels with overlapping siege weaponry positions and waiting mage nests would be like and I'd felt their wince all the way from Salia. It'd be a fucking slaughter, exactly the kind of killing floor that Neshamah could use to erode our army into nothing. Their solution to that, instead of finding a way to force the gates quickly, had been to broaden the assault. Which was how I'd come to stand looking at the four constructs the Jacks told me legionaries had taken to calling the 'Ugly Cousins'.

When not in flight the things looked like some sort of botched stone corridor, but when they began to rise their purpose was suddenly clear: they were siege towers, the kind only Praesi could make. Only since the moat was so wide and deep, they'd ended up looking like some sort of oblique, upwards-sloping hallway. I laid my palm against the stone of the one I stood close to, feeling the sorcery pulsing within even when it was grounded.

"I am told they take almost an hour to get up in the sky."

I'd heard Chancellor Alaya coming. I'd even heard her dismiss her guards when she got close, though it was only now that she'd addressed me directly I was bothering to turn and face her. She'd gotten older, that was the first thing I noticed. Her once perfect skin had gained some crow's feet, but it was more than that. Malicia had always been immaculate, perfectly put together even when it was absurd she should be, but that'd been the Name. Alaya of Satus, who was Chancellor of Praes but not Named, was just as mortal as the rest of us.

That meant dust stuck to her clothes now, that light didn't always offer her the most flattering of angles and the tailored green dress she wore was just that. Tailored. Not cut for her by the very hand of fate. She was still one of the most strikingly beautiful women I had ever met – more beautiful than Akua, even, honestly compelled me to admit – but it was no longer supernatural. She was beauty, now, not the beauty.

"We still have to keep them grounded until the assault," I replied. "We've got the power to spare to keep them in the sky, sure, but up there they wouldn't be under the protection of our wards."

And I had no doubt whatsoever that the Dead King would begin taking shots at them the moment he could.

"So they remain asleep until tomorrow," Chancellor Alaya said.

I grunted, agreeing but displeased about it. I'd told ordered Juniper yesterday to prepare for an assault today, and she had, but that was the Army of Callow. The Legions were able to prepare quickly enough to follow suit, but most other armies were not. For once it wasn't even Procer that was the worst foot dragger, since the despite Empress Basilia's best efforts the League armies were still a fucking mess. Their command structure was unified in name only, and apparently Bellerophon's generals took to instructions like cats to water. Tomorrow morning that was what I'd gotten back.

Frustrating, but going in half-cocked against Neshamah would cost us more than just time.

"So they will," I said. "I hear the Confederation will be taking the lead on the storming of the walls."

"We have the assets to make the attempt and High Marshal Nim believes it is sound tactics," she replied. "Besides, to be the first to bleed will wipe away some of the blemishes on our reputation."

Blemishes you put, I almost said, but bit my tongue. It was true, but what point was there in saying it?

"You don't think the assault will succeed," I noted.

An eyebrow was cocked at me.

"Do you?" she challenged.

"No," I admitted. "And it'll be a costly butcher's bill for the first to poke their head in."

"So my generals agreed," the chancellor said. "But someone must take that first step regardless."

I considered her from the corner of my eye.

"And I'm sure that it'll be just a coincidence that your auxiliaries take the front," I said.

The former private armies of the High Lords still had very dubious loyalty to the new regime, for all that their owners had agreed to the dissolution of the Dread Empire and the birth of the Confederation. Even if they were brought into the fold of the Legions of Terror, their loyalties would never be certain enough for the chancellor's tastes. Bloodying them by making them the first to try Keter's defences would thin their numbers to something easier for Alaya of Satus to handle.

"Unexpected talk, coming from the woman who brought back forlorn hopes to Callow," the dark-eyed woman mildly replied.

My jaw clenched.

"You wanted to talk," I said. "Not show me the fortresses, however impressive. So talk."

I was pretty sure I knew what this was about, but I saw no need to make it easy on her. The chancellor sighed.

"Your talks with the Procerans have the Council of Matrons up in arms," she said. "And they are not yet aware that treaties were signed: the talks alone were enough for them to threaten civil war."

Good on the Jacks for catching that, I thought approvingly. In the report I read while eating breakfast there'd been a note that observers from the Matrons had been hounding the chancellor for meetings over the last week.

"Tragic," I replied, entirely unsympathetic.

Her face tightened and I got a sliver of satisfaction from having gotten under her skin.

"It is not an empty threat, Your Excellency," Alaya said. "When tribes begin to migrate, they will fight to preserve their power."

"And they'll lose," I bluntly replied. "Which will only accelerate their decline. The smart ones will realize that and stay out of it, find other ways to keep their tribes under their thumb."

My bet was isolation. The tribes that lived in the Grey Eyries would close their borders and clamp down on internal trade to prevent word from spreading. It would only work in the short term, though. Sooner or later the seal would break, and then the Matrons would be facing the same dilemma: be less fucking awful or have the people they're awful to run out on them. Truly the thorniest moral conundrum of our age, with no obvious and easy solution.

"They will not begin with civil war," the chancellor warned. "First they will send out the Preservers."

"Right, their little killing squads," I snorted. "Good luck with that."

"They will begin by stirring incidents between the settled tribes and the locals, Your Excellency," Alaya said, "not attempting wholesale slaughter."

"And when we catch the first lot, Vivienne will have them drawn and quartered in a Laure public square before sending word of it to every ruler on Calernia," I patiently replied. "What you don't seem to understand, Chancellor, is that I'm not fucking afraid of the Matrons. Neither are Vivienne and a hardened soldier princes who live on the other side of the continent from the Eyries."

My gaze hardened as I met hers.

"If they step out of line," I coldly said, "they will be stepped on."

If the Council of Matrons needed me to bring down a mountain or two on the heads before the lesson sunk in that they did not own their entire race, then I'd bring down a three just to be sure the message was crystal clear.

"How lightly you think of civil war, when it will not be yours to settle," Alaya bitterly replied.

"Coming from you," I pleasantly replied, "that's a little rich."

And then I scoffed, because now she'd gotten me good and angry and for all her flaws the Chancellor of Praes was not a stupid woman. She wouldn't do it by accident.

"Now tell me what it is you actually want," I continued, "and figured that riling me up first would help you get."

Her face went blank, like a mask of clay, and I almost laughed. I wasn't seventeen anymore and she wasn't the only schemer I'd ever had to deal with. Cordelia had also made it a point of angering me when we first started talking, since it made me more impulsive. Akua had been the one to pick up on it first, but I'd not forgotten.

"A concession," Chancellor Alaya said. "So that I might split them in half before conflict erupts."

"I already threw you a bone," I replied. "No munitions to be made in Procer, it's in the treaties."

"Which as, Princess Vivienne pointed out, will allow Praes and the Tribes to keep control of these goods," the dark-eyed woman said, then paused. "Or it would, if a workshop was not being built where Liesse once stood whose purpose is to make goblin munitions."

I kept the grimace off my face. Even after the purges they'd suffered in Callow, the Eyes remained uncomfortably good at their jobs. While the knowledge of how to make munitions was strictly keep within the Grey Eyries and we hadn't gotten our hands on it, we had sappers that believed they were on the track of how to make them. They wouldn't be the first, since Akua had once told me the Sahelians were pretty sure devils were one of the ingredients, and Vivienne had agreed that this was very much worth funding. The Army of Callow would lose bite without the munitions and it was a bad position to be dependent on Praes for the providing of them.

Besides, if we did crack the recipe we would crack a monopoly along with it. Callow could make pretty coin, selling the stuff to Procer for use against the ratlings and the dead.

"That would break no treaty," I said.

"It corners the Matrons enough that they will likely attempt secession again," Chancellor Alaya said. "And though you have no sympathy for me, Your Excellency, it is not only my legacy that such a thing would threaten."

My fingers clenched.

"I'm getting tired of repeating myself," I bit out. "What do you want?"

"Are you familiar," she said, "with the term 'cartel'?"

I frowned.

"It's what you call it when merchants band together to fix the price for something," I said. "A consortium, only with full control on the goods they're selling."

"I would ask that all sales of goblin munitions beyond the Legions of Terror and the Army of Callow be handled entirely by a common trade company," Chancellor Alaya said, "whose profits would be shared among the owners."

So that was her angle, I thought. She'd throw parts of the ownerships at a few of the strongest Matrons so they'd get rich and continue backing her against other tribes, turning the goblins against each other instead of all the Tribes against her. A classic Malicia play, especially the part where her office would be one of the owners and would rake in gold as well with very little effort needed to be put in. And the worst part was, it was a good deal for Callow as well. Not only did it help stabilize Praes while it was trying to reform, if the only two existing sources of munitions agreed on a price when selling outside then we couldn't be played against one another. And with both the chancellorship of Praes and the crown of Callow having a direct stake in the company, even other nations would be wary of trying to strong-arm the company.

It'd make the trade even more profitable than we'd anticipated.

"I'll consider it," I said. "Vivienne will be handling that long after I abdicate, so she would need to agree as well."

But she would, I thought, and from the glint of triumph in Malicia's eyes – Alaya, I reminded myself, Alaya – she knew it as well. I was only refraining from telling her as much because I still hated her to the bone.

"You know," I said, "I'd wondered if anything would change when I saw you in person again."

If I'd hate you less or more, I meant. If I could still look at you and see anything but the reason he got himself killed.

"Did it?" Alaya asked, her indifference too airy to be true.

"No," I admitted with a soft laugh. "Not a goddamn thing. It's like we're still standing on those fucking steps with the Tower burning behind us."

I clenched my fingers around my staff until the knuckles turned white.

"It'll always be like that, I think," I said. "Some hatreds don't burn out."

The dark-skinned woman met my eye unflinchingly.

"Oh," she softly said, "but I understand exactly what you mean. It took two of us to kill him, after all."

And I wanted to break these perfect white teeth, so rip out her heart and let it fry under the sun, but I still remembered what it had felt like when the knife sunk into him. It was her that'd paved the road to that moment, I would believe that until the day I died, but I wouldn't deny that in the end it was my hand that'd held the blade. Even if she owned every step that had led us to that murder, it was my hand stained in red.

We were done here, I decided.

"I'll see you around, Alaya," I said, eye cold. "Don't die before I come to collect."

—

I'd voiced my opinion on war councils that got too large more than once and it seemed that others shared it, since there were relatively few of us around the table. Two for each power, more or less. Lord Yannu and Aquiline Osen for the Dominion, Rozala Malanza and Prince Otto for Procer, Empress Basilia and Nestor Ikaroi for the League, Chancellor Alaya and Hakram for Praes, General Rumena and Ivah for the Empire Ever Dark, myself and the Hellhound for Callow. Twelve people were a lot when you were trying to fit a group to a table in a tavern, but it was positively austere for the war council of a continental alliance. Once upon a time Hanno and Ishaq would have gotten seats as well, but that era was over. I was the Warden, now. There was no need of another voice to speak for Named.

It was a colourful assembly, fit for the stories that would one day be told of this siege. Almost like a painting, I thought.

Careful Yannu Marave looming tall and broad over slender, deadly Aquiline as dour-faced Otto sat excruciatingly careful not to even brush against First Princess Rozala's swelling pregnant belly regardless of the steel breastplate fitted to it. Empress Basilia and Secretary Nestor leaning close as if scheming, a plain-faced woman of warrior's build that had carved out an empire and the old, tattooed scholar trying to trap her inside it. Ever-beautiful Alaya of Satus, soberly dressed in green, and the Warlord at her side: a hand of steel and a hand of bone, neither half as dangerous as the mind behind Hakram Deadhand's calm eyes.

Ivah, a cold flame in the Night whose face was silver on purple, and stooped old Rumena in his obsidian ringmail who'd be able to kill most people in this room without even using a Secret. And to finish it all Juniper and I, the tall marshal in her Army's plain armour while I kept the Mantle of Woe pulled tight around me.

It was as worthy a company as any, I thought, to chart the course that would either save or bury Calernia. I was not the only one to feel the weight of that on our shoulders, and so there was none of the politicking and pleasantries that would usually accompany the presence of so many influential people in a room. Instead we sat in sparse silence, drinks of cool water being passed, and once everyone was ready the talks began. Rozala spoke up first.

"Reports from our outriders paint what we believe to be a picture of the Dead King's plans for this campaign," the First Princess of Procer said. "In every direction undead are gathering streams from the outskirts of the Kingdom of the Dead, forming into massed armies."

She paused.

"At the moment we have counted four such armies in the process of assembly," First Princess Rozala said. "One, to our northwest, is a mere forty miles away."

"Numbers?" I asked.

"Somewhere between thirty and fifty thousand," Prince Otto briskly replied. "A true army, not the rabble that was routed yesterday."

"They are gathering around a Crab," Rozala added. "Perhaps the only one left in the entire Kingdom of the Dead."

An uplifting thing to hear, until one realized that just meant all the rest were with the armies ravaging Procer. The massive fortress-constructs were rare and we'd thinned out the numbers over the course of the war, but not anywhere near a wipeout.

"I have something in mind to handle the Crab," I said, earning raised eyebrows. "Our trouble is that those armies need to be pinned down while we take a swing at Keter."

The Dead King's plan, as the First Princess had said, was hardly impossible to figure out. Neshamah was going to keep tossing those armies at our camp whenever we tried an assault on Keter and otherwise stay back. Why should he even try to kill us when he could wait us out instead? Every passing day got him closer to victory, as another mile of Procer was devoured and our army's strength waned from tiredness and growing hunger.

"The other three armies," Empress Basilia said, "are they fighting fit?"

"Not for days yet, perhaps as much as ten for the largest force," Rozala replied. "More importantly, all of them are at least two days of march away."

Considering undead did not need to rest and could walk through the night, closer to one in practice. It was still a significant distance in the sense that none of them could realistically arrive in time to reinforce another if it gave battle near our camp. As a general some part of me was hungry at the potential defeat in detail that the position represented, but that was thinking about this wrong. Sure we might clear them out through a series of pitched battles, but to accomplish that we'd have to abandon the protection of our camp for several days and weaken our forces for only a minor gain.

Beating those armies meant nothing, after all. The only thing that mattered was taking Keter itself and those undead hosts were just expendable distractions.

"So part of our force gives battle," Basilia said, "while the rest storms the walls."

Like most Helikean commanders, the empress had an aggressive bent to her tactics. It came from Helike usually being assured of having the better army when fighting with the League or Procer, which made it tempting for its generals to seek decisive battles so the war might be won hard and fast. It was the way she'd waged war to cow her enemies in the south and it'd worked out well for her, though if she tried the same tactics against professional soldiers like the Army or the Legions she was likely to get her teeth kicked in instead. It was not a coincidence that she'd preferred to make a deal with Stygia than try to beat the Spears on the field.

In this case, though, her instincts were spot on.

"Agreed," I said. "We should take the initiative to catch them in the field instead of letting them come to the camp."

"The camps are fortified," Prince Otto pointed out. "With walls and siege artillery positions."

"We can't afford to let the Crab get too close," Lord Yannu replied, shaking his head. "Its presence has the reek of a trap."

I grunted in approval, receiving a nod of appreciation from the Lord of Alava and returning it. Lord Yannu was a cold customer, but he probably the finest general in the Dominion. Juniper had considered him as much of a headache as Rozala Malanza, when the two of them had been pursuing her in Iserre.

"There's a reason the Dead King left that particular Crab behind," I added. "It can't be needed for army upkeep, not with Keter and its forges so close."

"It'll be meant for war," Hakram agreed, bone fingers clenching. "Best to break it before it gets anywhere near our wards. You have that in hand, then?"

I nodded.

"I've been keeping some surprises up my sleeves," I idly said.

I was a little flattered by the number of wary looks that got me.

"Then we must only choose the forces to send out into the field," Lady Aquiline said. "I would claim that honour for Levant."

The other Blood flicked a glance at her, then nodded.

"Our skirmishers will be of no use forcing a wall," Careful Yannu said. "The Dominion would best serve in battle."

"Levant's captains alone will not be enough to face fifty thousand," Prince Otto said.

Which was the upper bound of what our scouts believed to be gathering to the northwest, but it was not senseless to plan for the worst case. Lycaonese had been taught the hard way to never count on luck tangling with the Hidden Horror.

"Then the Clans will march with them," Hakram gravelled. "The Confederation's forces will be key to the assault, but my warriors will be of no use until the city's cracked open. I would take a third of number lead them out with the Dominion."

The Clans had sent a little over seventy thousand warriors, all of them fine if somewhat undisciplined foot, so he was proposing to add twenty-three thousand or so to the Dominion's remaining twenty-seven. About a match in numbers, I noted, though too light on cavalry for my tastes. Basilia seemed to agree.

"I would offer the kataphraktoi to round out the force," the Empress of Aenia said. "General Pallas has experience working with most of you, she can have the command."

And she'd officially returned to the fold of Helike, now that Basilia had caught up to her. There was a round of agreement around the table, from Rozala most of all. Between serving as outriders and yesterday's battle, her own horse was being run ragged. General Rumena caught my eye, but I shook my head.

"We want to keep the surprises up our sleeves as long as possible," I told it in Crepuscular.

Besides, if the assault went south we were likely to be hit hard in retaliation during the night. If that came to pass we would need the Firstborn at full strength to defend the camps. I received a nod and that was the end of that. The talks continued for another hour, details and plans being laid out, but the bare bones were there.

Tomorrow, the steel came out.

—

Happenstance had offered me one more night than I'd planned for, one last evening before I plunged into war, and I would not waste it. I had given my word and meant to keep it. There was never time, so it would have to be made. I got my hand on a couple of rabbits and put them to roast, sent one of the phalanges to get their hands on few bottles of aragh – not the good stuff but the rough, throat-burning fare that the rank and file drank. Then I sat in the dark and waited, until I heard a gait almost as odd as my own coming close. Hakram came out of the gloom and into the fire's light, slowly coming to sit by my side. I took out a spit, the rabbit still half raw and entirely without spices, and offered it up. He took it.

Silence hung in the air, thick enough to choke.

"So I hear you've fought another god in Serolen," Hakram suddenly said. "And here I thought you'd finally kicked the habit."

And just like that, the silence was dead. My shoulders loosened.

"If we're going to talk about that shitshow," I said, "you're cracking open the bottle first."

He laughed, taking a bite of his rabbit before groping blindly for the aragh.

"So hear me out," I began, "say you're a drow looking to become a god instead of your current gods, then the Dead King comes to offer you a hand. You know, just because he's such a good friend. What do you answer?"

The Warlord mulled on that.

"Pull the other one," he sagely answered.

"That sort of answer is why you ran out of hands, Hakram," I reproached. "But hey, at least you're smarter than someone who called themselves the fucking All-Knowing."

I got a laugh, a brutal crack about how he hoped they'd taught me how to dodge so I wouldn't run out of eyes like he had hands, and just like that I knew it was going to be a good night.

—
I went to bed smiling, even knowing what was ahead of me.

redfate

Man is Cat pulling the last drinks with friends before death trope?

Someperson

I dunno, I doubt Cat will die permanently given that she's the main character and also has an established pattern of defying death.

But as for Hakram, well he could die, and it'd be especially sad because he and Cat are actually starting to be friends again and because he has a whole future as the first orc Named in possibly literal ages and all of what that signifies.

Shit.

Dunno if EE would cut that many story threads short, though. Would be a bit of a departure from the deaths that have happened up until this point.

Ed

But is it really cutting them short? We are in the endrun here anything is possible.

billstewartmt

She often has last drinks with friends before battles.

Veyros

She often dies...

arcanavita15

Nice chapter, good to see that Cat's happy also with her getting to banter with Hakram. I love how everyone at the table are intimidated by Cat saying she has a couple of contingencies that along with the Alaya show how far she has developed as a schemer.

Mirror Night

Yeah I gotta say this reminds me of something I don't like. Why is it only the Black Women who must pay prices for War Crimes cause they wronged Cat? Malicia needs to get killed by Cat and Akua should guard DK for all time cause they messed with Callow?

General Basilia was massacring civilians including women and children to badly float towers while working for Kairos....if its about settling grudges of old surely Hanno and Champ should get to run her through. But she is enjoying a rather free pass.

caoimhinh

Urgh, nor this shit again... being black has nothing to do with it.

1) They aren't paying for war crimes, they are paying for hurting Catherine on a personal level.

2) Basilia's actions during that siege where they used flying towers were under Kairos's orders, so the responsibility falls on him.

3) Hanno and Raphaella have no grudge towards Basilia.

There are also a lot of practicalities involved on why certain grudges can't be pursued, and those have been shown clearly during the various chapters, like how Cat didn't kill the Cataphracts that were killing the Army of Callow, and instead chose to break their hands, or why despite how much it hurt Callow during the Tenth Crusade, the Kingdom must still keep good relationship with Procer and Catherine even had to fight while minimizing Proceran casualties.

Catherine exacting her Long Price from Alaya and Akua is a different matter, and even then she is forced to postpone killing Alaya for years.

So maybe look at things beyond the characters' skin color, things will make sense if you go beyond seeing only skin-deep.

Mirror Night

You know what a certain famous trial after a certain world war said about just following orders?
She was a high ranking general not a foot soldier lol.

Sure it might not because they are Black Women but I see only Black Women paying any long price in this series.

Karios, Basilia, Black and the Calamities got to of their friends killed. Was Basilia a major player in that no but she was a factor so that seems rather personal to me.

Regret

Was every female main character's skin colour mentioned? I don't remember. Then again, I rarely remember single skin colour in written stories except for when it is tied to a specific location and/or culture (i.e. actually relevant properties of characters). But that's largely on my shitty memory.

In my subjective experience (where skin colour is mostly absent (I am aware that is problematic in real life, but I don't read to practice for real life, I read for entertainment)), I can tell you that in my perspective Cat is not acting absurd in specifically focussing on these two. It fits without skin colour, so Occam's razor says that is the most likely explanation.

Also, Cat hates herself at least as much as she hates Alaya for Black's death and she hates Black for putting her in that situation. For your assumptions to be consistent (that only Black women receive Cat's deepest hate) both Black and Cat have to be Black too, and Black has to be a woman.

Liliet

> Was every female main character's skin colour mentioned? I don't remember.

We know the ethnicities. Soninke are black, everyone else isn't.

The only named Soninke women in the cast are Alaya, the Sahelians including Adanna the Blessed Artificer who is Akua's cousin, and Abreha Mirembe.

Before Adanna showed up in the plot (and before Akua's explicit redemption arc in Praes) there was an even more awkward problem of every single black woman in the cast being Evil and also an awful person.

Abrakadabra

There is also the repentant magister. And there is Ime the chief spy WHO was not shown to be especially evil.

Liliet

True, Ime was just in service to Malicia and her goals

Nephele was not Soninke or part Soninke, that we know of. She was not black.

Insanenoodlyguy

Because the “personal” was on the other two instead. Who are both dead, incidentally, having paid that kind of long price you complain about not happening.

sivarajan

Meting out victor’s “justice” to some for trumped up “war crimes” charges while allying with others guilty of the same or even worse is perfectly in keeping with said “famous trial.”

Cpt. Obvious

Trying to apply anything from our world to a place as different as the world of the Guide is not going to work.

In Creation stories rule to the degree that the city state of Helike

Cpt. Obvious

[WP, go fuck yourself! This comment system is a Disgrace!]

The entire city state of Helike will flip-flop between Good and Evil depending on who is on the throne. And it’s not a gradual thing either. When Kairos murdered his father and claimed the throne it didn’t take years or even weeks before the people accepted him.

Under his father Helike was on the side of the Gods above, and so was the people. Yet the moment Kairos took the title of Tyrant they were suddenly on the side of the Gods below. And they cheered him in the streets.

My point is that with a Tyrant in Helike personal choice is pretty much not on the table for the population. The Tyrants commands will be followed enthusiastically no matter how evil they are.

Now if his father had issued those same orders then he’d had been met with refusal.

It’s hard to apply our morality to something like that.

zenanii

Nah, let’s just ignore all the world building, Cat’s complicated relationship with these characters, and the way the story has developed to lead us to this path to instead focus on what really matters.

'Ladi Williams

Lmfao...very apt answer.

I'm black. But it amazes me to no end the way people (mostly white) tend to lose all sense of reasoning and rational deduction when skin color comes in.

Very real and believable world building and politics has shown why some people cannot be touched right now...but no! It's easier to bliv EE is racist instead.

Sugar Roll

How about you judge someone not by the color of their skin but by the content of their character.

Letouriste

I don't get how you managed to go so far in this story while understanding so little about it.

All your points have been answered by others but let me tell you something: i completely forgot they were black. That's how little their skin color matter in this story.

'Ladi Williams

Exactly! Me too. A few chapters ago when we were talking about making a live action of this book or not...when people were discussing casting and race came up, I was like what! Couldn't even remember the humans were of different skin colors till that came up and I was like oh yeah yeah...Amadeus was...cat is...lol.

Zachary A Sloan

While the person who started this thread was being ridiculous, how in the world did you forget that Soninke are fantasy west-African?

Abrakadabra

I forget about it too. I remember far more about the golden eyes of the highborn. That is a far more striking feature in my mind.

Konstantin von Karstein

With that logic, as a gay man I should be offended that the only gay couple on-screen was killed.

Except that one of them was a complex, well-developed character who wasn't reduced to his sexuality, and who died saving the life of his son.

In PGtE, characters aren't just they're orientation/skin colour/whatever. And sometimes people from minorities die, or commit atrocities. Given EE's track record, I don't think there's any sexism where you think there is.

Hargabga

Let's also mention how one of those gays was a cruel evil warlock who is basically Dr. Mengele with magic and another a literal demon. Or how the most well known evil country is inhabited by fantasy African people. Let me rephrase that: an Evil Empire of people of heavily implied African descent is fought against by a Good Kingdom of Whites. Or how the most evil person in the series, the one whom the rest of the world gathers up to kill is fantasy Jewish! OMG, dogwhistle found, EE is literally a Nazi.

Snappy270

The dead king is Jewish? How? By being a necromancer ? Sacrificing a kingdom? Conquering a hell? Or the most accomplished mage ever ? Explain.

Hargabga

His ancient language is basically Hebrew. Keter, Neshamah, Sephirah, those all are Hebrew words. I hope for all gods you actually parsed the transparent satire in my post.

Snappy270

Duh just wondered if there was truth to such accusations, didn't know that about the language. Stuff like that just makes me smile (the use of real world languages rather than anti semitism)

Konstantin von Karstein

I assume it's sarcasm...

AbraKadabra

Yeah! And in those Alian movies the xenomorphs are all evil predators, And they are all black! Now I see the big picture! 🤔

ohJohn

I wasn't gonna engage, but then I noticed the irony of saying "why does this story hate Black women, they should kill this trans character instead" and so I figured I'd mention that

PatchworkKnight

I think it's less about them being black women as much as it is the unfortunate side effect of Praes being based on some African cultures (west African, iirc). Praes is going to naturally produce the most enmity with Callowans due to the geopolitics of their relationship. Combine that with the fact that EE has made a habit of putting many women in positions of power in the setting, and you have a recipe for black women being statistically more likely to earn a long price from Catherine.

I've spent a lot of time thinking about the situation, and I don't think there's a good way to avoid this situation without entirely rewriting the story to change Praes' cultural analogues or shoehorning additional enmities to try and even it out.

Mirror Night

Your analysis is essentially correct in my book and the only insightful response to my comment. I think it's more an accident than any real malice on the part of the author. Cat turning on Praes was always going to lead to this issue. I suppose you could have made Akua or Malicia Taghreb but does having it occur to Arab and West African Women only really make it better? Don't especially think so.

The other issue is I don't think Cat's hypocrisy on Long Prices is being played as a negative. Or to put it another way I don't think most of the Fandom thinks it is a bad thing she is hypocrite. Everyone else has to put aside grudges to make this system work (primarily the Heroes) but Cat does not. She gets to have her cake and eat it as well.

Insanenoodlyguy

And yet, believing you no malice aforethought and recognizing that it's far too late to change the characters current paths, you keep bringing this up. Which says to me your reason is very simple: You want to keep having this low hanging fruit of an argument. That's my insight.

Mirror Night

I don't like it and I believe in free speech that allows for me to say I don't like it. As for your insights if I cared about them I respond to your comments.

Insanenoodlyguy

It's not that you dislike it or should or should not dislike it, it's how you keep bringing it up. The why you continually exercise that free speech right you have in this particular instance (you don't have free speech by the way, you have the terms and conditions of WordPress on this particular forum of conversation, though admittedly you still effectively have it for this purpose and I'm just being pedantic), is what I am commenting on.

Anyway, I apparently made you care about my insight, so I consider this discourse fruitful.

Liliet

I think Mirror Night is not wrong to comment on it every time. It remains accurate after all. And would take up a lot less bandwidth if people would stop dogpiling it with "well we didn't even remember these characters were black!!!" and "are you calling EE racist?!?!"

Insanenoodlyguy

Oh I absolutely with you on "Stop feeding this flame"

Zach

This sort of thing is basically the end result of most US liberals (and politically engaged people in the US in general) viewing politics as a form of self-expression. Since actual material change is out of the question (and not something that mainstream politics will ever support), all that's left is nonsense like policing media and defining yourself in terms of your opinions about said media. There is nothing beyond the culture war.

It's just kind of depressing and pathetic. People endlessly arguing about stuff as trivial as "whether a web serial is problematic" because, on some level, they realize that any actual meaningful political change is out of the question.

Sinead

I do agree thst the cultural analogues used for Praes as the source of the starting conflict does mean that there are issues that arise over time regarding who is the antagonist to be punished.

However, I do not think the story makes Cat's Long Price mentality a good thing.

I know I have a poor memory, but the only people I can think of that were given such an attitude were Akua and Alaya. Everyone else was politics dtiving it one way or another. The cavlary in Book 5 got just a broken finger because Cat needed the actual buy in, while the Praesi Trueblood mages in Book 3 were executed as brutal politics surrounding the Doom. Cat may have some vindication in those acts, but it's not personal grudges.

My understanding of Akua is that Cat couldn't have just killed her in Book 3 in part because of Cat's oath to Akua, which has now turned into Akua being a better person than Cat. And Cat's own mentality led her to kill her own father.

Considering that the story is seeming to lean towards rehabilitative justice over punitive justice, I still hold out that we may yet see Cat lose control of this second Long Price as well.

No comment on the fandom reaction. Wasn't thrilled with the reaction around Malicia's response to Wolof for example.

caoimhinh

Looking at it accurately, the only one really paying a Long Price is Akua, as Catherine is planning to have her keep the Dead King prisoner for eternity.

Alaya is just going to get killed, and if you consider getting killed a Long Price then all of the other characters that have been killed have suffered the Long Price and thus it is not something that only happens to black women.

Also, you accuse Cat of being a hypocrite for not compromising to make the system work, yet the very fact that Alaya is alive right now and keeping a position of authority over Praes for the next 8 years is already proof that you are wrong, and Cat kept Alaya alive exactly because Alaya was needed to make the system work.

Nobody is asked to let go of their grudges, but everyone has to refrain from acting on their grudges because they need to work together to survive.

In fact, multiple times we have seen Catherine rein herself in, not acting on her grudges because of the greater good. This is a fact, and that mindset guided her strategies during the Tenth Crusade and was the prime guideline for the Princes' Graveyard: beating her opponents without killing them because despite their many differences and conflicts, they are needed.

This also applies to a more personal level too, as Catherine greatly hates the Valiant Champion, yet Cat hasn't killed her.

ohJohN

I think calling it an “accident” – with the implication of ‘bad but unintentional’ – is still a weird take.

One of the things I really enjoy about this story is how so much of the setting is based on the historical real world, but a lot of our modern expectations are subverted – the story starts soon after fantasy-Africa colonizes fantasy-England; color discrimination is only a big structural problem in fantasy-Africa, against greenskins; gender discrimination is only a big structural problem in the Tribes, against men.

So, sure, Akua and Alaya are Black women whom the protagonist holds particular enmity towards, and I understand how that could be harmful if handled poorly – though I think it’s mitigated pretty heavily by them being well-written, complicated, frequently-sympathetic, fully fleshed out characters following their own goals and incentives like everybody else.

But they’re also representative of irl historically shitty behavior that makes such harm a concern in the first place. Akua, a rich noble from the occupying empire, is granted governance over occupied territory for political reasons and genocides 100k civilians. Alaya is one of the most successful imperialists in Praes’s history, tacitly allowed that genocide, used Still Water herself, and started backsliding on the Reforms that had begun to raise an oppressed population above ‘expendable subhuman’ status.

(It’s also notable that Cat herself has darker skin because she’s half-Daoine, a fantasy-Native American/Irish people – both of which irl have, uh, historically not had great experiences with England and its colonies.)

I just think it misses the point to claim that it’s bad, even without “any real malice on the part of the author”, that these antagonists are Black. They’re not presented in a way that reinforces or encourages irl prejudice, and it seems like a generally anti-racist message to condemn them for the same sort of imperialism, oppression, and genocide that contributes to irl racism.

Sexism is handled similarly, and I get the sense that’s less contentious: Cat hates the Matrons because of their treatment of male goblins, yet it’s pretty obvious the lesson is not ‘women are bad’, but instead ‘gender discrimination is bad’.

(Analogously, it would seem strange – whatever other problems you have with Disney’s Aladdin – to complain ‘ugh, of course they made the villain an Arab guy 🙄’)

And it's not like Akua and Alaya are the only ones she's planning cruel ends for. DK and WB are definitely on that list – and DK's Long Price seems strictly worse than Akua's, as they're materially the same (stuck in the Ways together, forever, as enemies) except Akua would be entering willingly. The rest of that list is already dead, frequently at her hands.

As for Cat's "hypocrisy", I don't really see it. Cat absolutely does "put aside grudges to make this system work": she delayed Alaya's execution – who killed some of her closest friends, is partly responsible for the current existential threat to the continent, and is wanted dead by many other heads of state for various atrocities – for the sake of the war effort and the long-term stability of Praes.

I think it bears stressing that those two are responsible for exceptional atrocities: their uses of Still Water alone are likely among the highest-casualty mass death events in centuries (the only confirmed contender is the Contrition Crusade, which Cat is similarly, uh, not super jazzed about).

It's not hypocritical for Cat to focus on them: they've objectively done way more harm than Basilia, and they're responsible for the deaths of Cat's loved ones and subjects. She's not the Platonic ideal of morality, but her fierce loyalty to those she feels responsible for is not one of her faults.

AbraKadabra

Insightful comments you want? Here it is.
You are an asshole.

Why, you might ask? Because you are actively try to ruin others enjoyment of the story by dragging real world politics into it.

Q.E.D.

Your asshole status is confirmed and proven.
Congratulations.

fictionfan

What about goblins and orcs? surely their lives are also as valuable as humans?

All lives matter!
make love not war!

*arcanavita*15

I liked to see the Cat and Alaya scene and that just confirms that she hasn't changed much, and Cat is still going to murder her. Cat casually finding out what she's doing and then dismissing most of her plans is just something that is really cool and contrasts their earlier relationship back when Cat was still the Squire.

SpeckofStardust

""
"So hear me out," I began, "say you're a drow looking to become a god instead of your current gods, then the Dead King comes to offer you a hand. You know, just because he's such a good friend. What do you answer?"

""
Bard is that you?
No that's not the answer to the question but my response to reading this.

Letouriste

The only right answer ;D

caoimhinh

A wholesome night before the storm

Megaprr

Time and time again I see this shit being brought up. No. This has nothing to do with race or sex. The guide has gotta be the most inclusive story I've ever read. By far. The explanation here is a simple one. Basilea has no serious, personal relationship with our protagonist. Alaya does, and so it's much more meaningful and impactful for her to take this role. Whether or not Basilea should be punished shouldn't even be up to Cat either. It's a foreign country. Stop trying to shoehorn earth issues into this. They have no place in this story given how clear EEs message has been of morality, competence, and other contrasting qualities being completely independent of race/sex/sexual orientation. Cat has had other non-black/women enemies too, and most have been hit with pretty terrible consequences too yet I don't see any complaints there. And if your problem is with positive representation of minorities, the main cast literally has everyone being a different race, and more than half are women.

'Ladi Williams

Representation of minorities and political correctness is slowly being the death of Hollywood... I don't see why every story has to include minority that has no right being a major cast in a story just to satisfy small minded people anyways...

Lol Wut

First of all, your comment is basically entirely irrelevant for a lot of reasons and also shows you have some deep biases you should probably address.

To actually respond to what you said...political correctness in Hollywood is something that comes from a long history of movie makers trying to appeal to the widest possible range of people without offending anyone. If YOU are offended that businesses that make their money on mass appeal aren't willing to alienate large portions of potential audience because you think it's unfair people judge other people for their actions/what they say/the media they produce then...good for you, I guess? It's pretty ridiculous but if you want to be offended about stupid stuff then by all means, continue being wrong

The idea that political correctness has 'ruined' Hollywood is pretty ridiculous. Very few 'classic' films would become less good if they didn't have the sort of minor offensive elements that political correctness usually deals with. Most of such things are pretty small, despite how offended people get at them. Much of what is called 'political correctness' by people attempting to argue against it is actually that they have a prejudice they don't wish to have to hide and take issue with people judging them for it. That's what the phrase means, adhering to the common socially acceptable opinions/vernacular as a veneer because your prejudices mean you don't actually believe it. Your post is an example of someone only partially doing that, though, so at least you're semi consistent

This brings us to your mention of minority representation. The idea that a minority needs to have "a right" to be written about/portrayed as part of a main character makes it pretty clear you devalue anyone who is not part of the dominant cultures you identify with. This is mostly not political correctness, although you could have just come out and said "I don't like seeing minorities represented in works because I think they're lesser than me" but didn't, presumably because you knew you would be judged more harshly for saying it explicitly rather than just implying it. Again, this is not something which has "ruined Hollywood." Very few scripts really and fully address the issues of discrimination, societal pressure and the various other impacts of being part of a minority group. This is largely because most people don't like having to confront the realities of societal inequality when they're trying to enjoy themselves. This can itself be problematic, but in many cases scripts are written as if in a somewhat idealised version of reality where these things are only somewhat an issue if they exist at all, and thus having a diverse cast doesn't really affect anything negatively for you unless you have a prejudice against said type of person.

Forced diversity can be problematic if the writers don't know how to write diverse characters, but that's a writing flaw not a flaw in the idea of diverse casting. Stop accepting mediocre writers who can only effectively write very narrow types of people or put them on a more capable writing team.

Also, I'm not sure what you meant by those who want diversity being 'close minded' people. Studies have shown that having more diverse role models actually tends to increase one's openmindedness, empathy and creativity, so those who consume quality works with diverse casts and don't immediately engage in hateful kneejerk reactions reap only benefits from it.

If you don't want to practice moderation in your language or see minorities existing, that's your right. It's not your right to impose those wishes onto anyone else. You are entirely free to limit your contact with the world/ consumption of media to ensure you aren't exposed to such things, you will miss out on a lot of very good stuff but that's a choice you have to make. You are allowed to act in whatever manner you see fit provided you aren't inflicting harm on other people, there's no law to stop you being an ass. It's the rest of the world's right to judge, exclude and mock you for it if you act ridiculously, spread false ideas, and are so insecure you can't handle the idea that maybe, just maybe, people who aren't like you are equally as worthy of existence and representation. If you want to continue engaging with the world as it is, rather than being a relic of past myopic views and antiquated social structures, then I would suggest you take some time to genuinely learn about the issues involved with an open mind. Because this sort of toxic thinking damages you before it damages anyone else.

Or you could just be a hatemongering troll, lol. Because seriously, who reads a fantasy story about a mixed race, bisexual, powerful woman if they are genuinely against any form of representation. There are tons of trashy, self insert, white male power fantasy stories that suit such views far better

Abrakadabra

Longwinded bullshit.

DD

While I'm not at all convinced there's enough pattern in this story to justify the argument raised above, your own comment betrays itself. Saying "minority that has no right being a major cast in a story"? That is a concept that only makes sense if we assume that any deviation from the real-world majority (in whatever place you live) must be justified.

But if people who happen to be cis, het, white, abled, et cetera automatically have "right being a major cast", and everyone else doesn't have it in the same automatic way? Yeah, that's a problem. One that people who object to inclusive representation in media usually haven't had to experience, and therefore find it easy to ignore or deny.

'Ladi Williams

Thank you. That's what I mean by political correctness and minority representation is slowly killing Hollywood.

masterofbones

The "downside" of accurate representation is that minorities get villain roles just like everyone else.

This naturally leads to certain types of people complaining that the story is racist/sexist/whatever.

This in turn leads to the modern trend, where minorities in stories aren't allowed to have flaws or be weaker than any male/white character in any way, meaning that only white men are allowed to have actual personalities.

'Ladi Williams

Thank you very much.

Minorities and political correctness forces script writers to include casts that probably won't have been included or have no bearing on the plot and story line just to ensure "inclusion".

No single major movie can be about something anymore...has to include whites...blacks...asians...aliens...and the alphabet soup whether it has a bearing on the movie or not.

Luckily EE does not give a damn...and has just written a damn good story

BargleNawdleZouss

Pardon me if I'm being overly detail-oriented, but I would like a roster of all the Named present at the siege of Keter. I'm hoping that some of the ones who've been mentioned but not actually appeared "on stage" are shown in action, such as the Stained Sister.

'Ladi Williams

I definitely do not know all of them...add yours to this till we build a comprehensive list.

1. Cat 2. Hanno. 3 Mirror Knight 4. Archer 5. Vivienne 6. Hakram 7. Masego 8. Barrow Sword 9. Bitter Blacksmith 10.

Blessed Artificer 11. Rogue Sorcerer 12. Akua? 13. Concocter...
That's all I know of definitely

ninegardens

... Ranger (!)
Kingfisher prince
The OTHER bitter blacksmith (?)
Silver Huntress?

...
Anyone else?

BargleNawdleZouss

Here's a list of Heroes and Villains whom I believe are likely in the siege camp. I am not including non-combat Names such as the Forgetful Librarian, Sculptor, or the Doddering Sage, who almost certainly would not be part of the armies. Nor have I included Akua Sahelian or Hye Su the Ranger, as the former is not Named and the latter is not present...yet(?).

Some of these are guesses, as the characters have been mentioned but not appeared "on stage"; I'm guessing it's likely that if alive, they'll be present at the final battle. Please do mention other characters I missed, or those that have been killed.

VILLAINS

- 1 Warden Catherine Foundling
- 2 Warlord Hakram of the Howling Wolves
- 3 Archer Indrani
- 4 Princess Vivienne Dartwick
- 5 Hierophant Masego
- 6 Barrow Sword Ishaq
- 7 Red Knight
- 8 Harrowed Witch Aspasia
- 9 Pilfering Dicer
- 10 Hunted Magician
- 11 Concocter Constanza
- 12 Bitter Blacksmith #2 Helmut Bauerlein
- 13 Headhunter
- 14 Royal Conjuror
- 15 Black Knight Nim Mardottir
- 16 Skinchanger
- 17 Grave Binder
- 18 Affable Burglar
- 19 The Marauder

HEROES

- 1 White Knight Hanno of Arwad
- 2 Witch of the Woods Antigone

- 3 Rogue Sorcerer Roland de Beaumarais
- 4 Silver Huntress Alexis
- 5 Mirror Knight Christophe de Pavanie
- 6 Kingfisher Prince Frederic Goethal
- 7 Blade of Mercy Antoine de Lange
- 8 Knight Errant Arthur Foundling
- 9 Apprentice Sapan
- 10 Blessed Artificer Adanna of Smyrna
- 11 Bitter Blacksmith #1 Helmgard Bauerlein
- 12 Augur Agnes Hasenbach
- 13 Vagrant Spear Sidonia of Alava
- 14 Painted Knife Kallia
- 15 Valiant Champion Rafaela
- 16 Page Gaetan Rocroy
- 17 Myrmidon
- 18 Bloody Sword
- 19 Forsworn Healer
- 20 Silent Guardian
- 21 Stained Sister
- 22 Grizzled Fantassin
- 23 Forlorn Paladin
- 24 Swaggering Duellist
- 25 Daring Pyromancer
- 26 Stalwart Apostle
- 27 Wise Astrologer

Snappy270

Wasnt there a duelist that was sent to protect cordelia during the first stage of the war. A Villan I think.

And the Posioner that was part of the band of 5 in Mercantis, I know she probably isn't combative but could have stuff in her options that could help. Also the relentless magistrate no idea where they went too.

BargleNawdleZouss

I didn't include Poisoner or Relentless Magistrate; Poisoner might have something to contribute in a military scenario, but Magistrate would not.

As for the Duellist, see #24 above in the Heroes list; please let me know if he's actually a Villain.

Can you think of anyone I left out who'd be combat-ready or combat-adjacent?

Snappy270

Sinister physician ? Was at the arsenal as a doctor. So could help out and protect the injured.

Merry balladeer ? Lots of bands of 5's have bardish roles to help troops act.

And swaggering duelist is a hero.

KiltedBastich

The Princess is a Hero, not a Villain. That was explicitly addressed between Vivienne and Cat, and they concluded it changed nothing between them. That conversation wouldn't have been necessary at all were she a Villain.

It makes sense, too. She earned her name by following a Role of being a leader and (literal) shining example to follow.

BargleNawdleZouss

Also, I'm surprised we haven't yet seen Catherine debrief/toy with Lady Abigail the Fox! 😊

Juff

Typo Thread:

I left Ater > I'd left Ater large part > large parts a bad a > as bad a honestly compelled > honesty compelled was beauty > was a beauty told ordered > ordered the despite > despite morning that > morning – that a hardened > the hardened the heads > their heads down a three > down three strictly keep > strictly kept so rip > to rip
sat excruciatingly > sat, excruciatingly he was probably luck tangling > luck when tangling of number > of our number steel came > steel would come on few > on a few be smiling > bed smiling

Joe Nuts

Rumena in his obsidian > Rumena in its obsidian

Tzur Almog

What happened to General Nekheb, the dragon general? Did he die or just go into hiding?

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Nekheb spends a very large amount of time sleeping, and is only vaguely beholden to mortals. They're probably leaving Nekheb to snooze for fear that the dragon would simply murder a few dozen people and then migrate to a safer continent or something.

AviKav

> They wouldn't be the first, since Akua had once told me the Sahelians were pretty sure devils were one of the ingredients,

I entirely forgot that it wasn't just demons

<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2018/05/11/chapter-12-cambre/>

> "You believe they've never dabbled in diabolism?" she said. "My dear, the Sahelians have known for decades that one of the primary ingredients in munitions is powdered devil. Our alchemists never managed to reproduce the process involved, but it is a certainty. Now, consider that goblinfire burns all things born of Creation. What do you think that recipe involves?"

>

> My heart clenched.

>

> "You can't be serious," I said. "They're using demons? How would that even work?"

AviKav

> "Oh," she softly said, "but I understand exactly what you mean. It took two of us to kill him, after all."

> [...] It was her that'd paved the road to that moment, I would believe that until the day I died, but I wouldn't deny that in the end it was my hand that'd held the blade. Even if she owned every step that had led us to that murder, it was my hand stained in red.

I just realized

– Malicia's survivability

– Catherine's knife

Their themes. He choose them

To their horror

fictionfan

Good god. Its a fictional story set in a world made up in EE's head. EE has the right to put the story in any way she wants. She kills off a character or redeems it. its up to her.

All this idiocy about "oh no a Black/white/hispanic/trans" or whatever is your personal b is just that. Idiotic.

Enjoy the story which is going amazing. If you feel have reached this far in the story line and are still 'offended' that a certain character, who may or may not be black, died; stop right here and don't read further.

Every couple of chapters we got some twits who come out with this again and again.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

This story has gotten some weird criticisms from time to time, ones that I agree aren't really worthwhile. However, your "love it or leave it" attitude is counterproductive.

Firstly, it is counterproductive in the sense that the people here who come up with these weird criticisms obviously aren't going to be placated by your openly hostile tone, so that hostility doesn't accomplish anything.

Secondly, it is counterproductive in the sense that people can and should discuss negative aspects of a work. EE is already great, but encountering reasonable criticism will result in further improvement.

In conclusion, if you like the story, you should avoid actively bullying people into avoiding reading it.

Abrakadabra

Why should they be placated? Why should be their bullshit addressed at all? Bullshit should be swept off the table, swiftly and decisively, not being analized while everyone is forced to smell the stink!
Stop humoring these people, that is the correct answer in my book.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

By "placated" I mean that they'll stop. My point with that was that your tactic to drive them off is completely ineffective and might even make it worse by giving trolls a target with which to sustain their interest, further clogging the comments with nonsense the rest of us have to wade through if we want to interact with each other. And like I said earlier, if you manage to drive anyone off (highly unlikely, of course) it won't necessarily be the people you want to.

Also: without analysis, it is not always clear what is or is not bullshit. Your personal gut reaction carries no authority whatsoever— it is well within your capacity to take exception to something you shouldn't, as we all do. I don't even disagree that the previous arguments we're talking about were bullshit, but your attitude about them makes it abundantly clear that you don't understand WHY they're bullshit. The "why" of it is rather important.

The bottom line here, to me, is twofold: you're being unnecessarily aggressive, and I don't respect that approach in a context like this; and EE has, on one occasion, stepped into the comments to tell someone off for giving bad feedback. Ergo, he demonstrably does not need your salty self to defend him and his work.

'Ladi Williams

I find the way you started your response and the tone generally very offensive... "the universe doesn't like that"
If I had issues with anyone's sexuality or race, I wouldn't rate The Guide as one of my best books of all time.
That said, the comment was in response to the one above talking about positive representation...that shit kills good stories...just let the story be...don't include people and ideas that aren't needed just for positive representation.
If a story is about a black bisexual cripple...let it be about that...but don't include a black bisexual cripple just bcos it would appeal to a wider audience and it's in vogue to do so...
That is my point. Understand?

KiltedBastich

You keep missing the point. Any random person you meet might be a black bisexual cripple, or an Asian trans person, or a genderfluid biracial person, or anything at all.

So why shouldn't some random character in a work of fiction also have the possibility of being anything at all? It doesn't detract from the work of fiction, it makes it more like reality.

The only way, the ONLY WAY, for this not to be true, is if you are starting from the assumed position that everyone should be cis/het/white and that being otherwise makes them unusual, noteworthy, or out of place. That learning they are just who they are is somehow an imposition on you.

Why do you believe that a random character in a work of fiction being other than cis/white/het "kills good stories"? Does it offend you that random strangers in real life are not cis/white/het?

If the only time that a character can be a black bisexual cripple is if it's somehow important to the character, that's literally tokenism. It's saying that ordinary people are not supposed to be black bisexual cripples.

This is implicit bigotry in action, even if you aren't aware of it in yourself. Your unspoken assumptions are that ordinary random people are supposed to be cis/white/het, instead of, well, whoever they actually are. You can't make that be true in reality, but you get upset when it's not true in fiction. Why? Why should random background characters only be, quote, "normal", unquote? Why isn't it perfectly reasonable for random background characters to be any damn thing at all?

That's something in yourself you should take a long hard look at, because it's frankly a deeply unattractive way of thinking.

Abrakadabra

Shaddap.

vuthuha912

Ha! That is rich coming from you Alaya. You are the one who he chose every single time. He gave you your throne, he killed your enemies, he is the one that keep your entire reign from falling apart and he died to save your life. What? Would any of your decrees or policy be enforce without him, the Calamities and the military standing right behind you? The moment he left, the entire thing collapsed. Nim was following his philosophy. Cat was someone meant to protect you for him once he died. Fuck it. You have everything and you fucked it up. You are the reason he is dead. Everything you did push him further down the road. Cat would never killed him if he did not step in to save your life. He wouldn't be in Procer if he didn't want to buy you more time. He wouldn't even adopt Cat if he didn't care for what happen to you after he died. In his mind, for the longest time, a better Praes and Alaya are the same thing so he did everything for you. The moment he realized you were under the curse of the Dread Empire, he went to rescue you, sacrificing everything to save you.

No Cat was just someone at the right time, at the right place. The root of everything about him has always been you ruling Praes. You don't get to complain when you are living on the time he borrowed.

Interlude: Reputation

"Reputation is in the hand of others, but honour only in yours."

– Levantine saying

Moro Ifriqui squinted through the Baalite eye at the horizon, then put it down to pat the neck of his Segovian shortmane. A beautiful beast, though he had never named her, and from a breed that the Brigand's Blood had been riding for more than a century. The Segovians were Procerans, but they were also old allies against the princes Orense. They had long traded fine horses and steel to Vaccei at generous prices so that their common enemy would continue to suffer raids at the southern border.

"Anything?" Siraj asked.

Moro's younger brother looked wary, as he often did these days. It had not yet strayed into cowardice so he had not spoken of it, but he would have to if the men noticed. The heir to Vaccei felt for his brother, who only wanted to return to his wife and daughters, but the Brigand's Blood could not show weakness. Theirs were a hard people, and those who ruled over them must be harder still.

"Not yet," Moro said. "The dead send no vanguard."

None that he could see, anyhow. The poison clouds obscured much of the view.

"Would that Yannu Marave did the same," Siraj sighed.

Moro sent his brother a sharp look and the younger man – only by two years, but younger still – hurriedly straightened. None of the riders come with them had been close enough to hear, but it had been a risk.

"There will be honour to be found in the shield wall, vanguard or not," Moro evenly said.

"I await it eagerly," Siraj replied just as evenly. "Mayhaps I will even take a Revenant's head, tug honour my way instead of yours for once."

Moro nodded, satisfied, and guided his horse closer to his brother's.

"Mother will have you commanding the archers," he murmured. "You will hold them in your arms again, Siraj."

The younger man grimaced, twisting his face paint: umber brown and basil green, the Vengeful Brigand's own colours.

"It is not the dead that worry me," Siraj said, leaning closer and lowering his voice. "What Mother plans..."

Moro's jaw tightened.

"It is too late to hesitate," he replied. "The order has already been given."

A small cut and a quick poison. In the chaos of the fight neither be noticed. It is necessary, Moro reminded himself. For our Blood, for our family. It was a grim business, but grim was the business of the Brigand's Blood. Doing anything it took was how they'd survived without bending to Tartessos or Malaga when both were stronger. Poison, night ambushes, killings without honour. Sometimes even bargains with dark powers. Mother had never admitted outright, but she'd hinted enough he was sure the rumours about having paid the Marauder to kill Aquiline Osen's older brother were true.

"If we're caught, it is the end of us," Siraj murmured.

"If we do nothing," Moro tiredly said, "it is the end of us as well. Or do you think the Osen will end our blood feud after they claim the Tattered Throne with the Tanja?"

Siraj grimaced again, a silent concession. Razin Tanja was no enemy, but neither was he a friend. And with him so obviously taken with his betrothed, the old Ifriqui game of playing Malaga against Tartessos would find no purchase.

"Stay out of it and keep your silence, brother," Moro said, leaning close. "I'll do what needs to be done so you can go home to your family."

"You're my family too, Moro," Siraj softly replied.

Part of him ached to pull his brother close, to let him know it would be all right, but he knew he could not. Eyes were watching. Eyes like poison, heart like stone, the Anthem of Smoke went. By his hand a thousand graves sown. Honour to the Blood, Moro reminded himself. He was a son of Vaccei, and there weakness was death.

"Then listen to me," he replied.

Shaking his head, he carefully returned the Baalite eye to its leather sheath before glancing at his brother.

"Return to Mother," Moro ordered. "Tell her the dead advance without vanguard and I am riding to report this to Lord Marave personally as a courtesy."

She would know what it meant. He was, after all, following Itima Ifriqui's plan.

—

Yannu hated the smell here.

Even after the Lanterns burned the poison out of the air, even through the cloth mask, the Lord of Alava could smell a residual stench in the air. One not unlike the smell near the hill mines, the kind that stayed against the roof of your mouth and tasted of blood. He glanced at Rima, seeing that under the cloth she was scowling as well. Of all his cousins he had long liked Rima best, ever since they were children playing together in the grass. Though a Marave in name she was too far from the main line to be considered as his successor, but he had brought her up as much as he could when he came lord of Alava. She was the captain of his sworn swords, now, and the many scars she'd taken guarding his back had proved his trust to be without error.

"Do you remember," the Lord of Alava said, "the first time we ever saw the mines?"

Rima's scowl deepened, pulling at the scar that went through her left eyebrow. The red of it was just a shade different than the red of the Marave colours, though she was careful never to paint the ashen stipes close so it would not stand out.

"I remember thinking they were foul as Below's asshole," Rima said, "and that only a devil would send anyone in those pits."

"That makes me a devil, then," Yannu grunted.

"We are what we are," Rima shrugged, unconcerned.

He'd hated those mines too, as a boy. The sight of men and women going down into the pits to break their bodies breaking stone so ore could be ripped out of the earth had disgusted him. Yannu had never thought to inherit Alava as a boy, for though his great-aunt Sintra had named his father heir he had an older sister. But he had thought that when she became Lady of Alava he might speak to her of the mines and quarries. Of closing them, perhaps. Then a wound gone bad during an honour war with Malaga had taken her a year before his father fell to old age and Yannu Marava, Lord of Alava, had learned a bitter lesson.

His lands were known for orchards and cattle, but they alone were not enough for Alava to stand. Malaga had cattle herds as well and Levante's orchards almost as fine. It was the wealth hidden in the hills, the ores and the stone, that kept Alava's warriors in steel and the people fed through cattle-fevers and lean seasons. Mines and quarries were his blood's backbone, and to close them would be as breaking his own back. He had done what he could, sending prisoners to work instead of men of honour, but never closed a single one. The memory of that added an intimacy to his distaste for the scent, though the smell was not the only thing lately that had left a foul taste in the mouth.

He glanced to the east, where the banners of Tartessos and Malaga were raised together. The eastern flank of the column was shared by the warriors of the Slayer and Binder's blood. Rima followed his gaze without difficulty – she was even taller than him, though slimmer in build.

"The banners are nothing," his cousin said. "A gesture. It's the shield wall that worries me, Yannu. No one else has blended companies in our lifetime."

"They do the same with their skirmishers," Yannu grimly said.

Before going east into Praes, the betrothed pair had kept their captains separate. Malaga's warriors under Malagan captains, Tartessos' under their own. No longer. Warriors of both lands served under captains of either. Though Razin Tanja had claimed the measure had come from the losses in the Wasteland, that it had been simpler to blend companies than be forced to disband some by insistence on keeping sworn warriors separate, Yannu knew it to be an excuse. The two youngbloods were tightening their alliance, getting their warriors used to fighting as one host.

And so those banners raised together to the east were one of the most dangerous things Yannu Marave had ever seen.

"You could have split them," Rima said. "You have the right."

He did. Lord Yannu Marave held command over all captains of the Dominion in this battle, twenty-seven thousand warriors marching in a loose column across the great dusty plains around Keter. Land that men called the Ossuary, after the many armies had had died here only to rise again as a host of bones.

"It would have been a mistake," Careful Yannu said. "I do not hold the only command on the field, Rima. The Warlord and General Pallas would have seen through my reasons and word spread. That is more dangerous to us than leaving them together."

Too many people already had eyes on the Dominion. Yannu had been pleased of Rozala Malanza's coronation as First Princess, for their years of sharing a front had ensured he was closest to her of the Blood much as Itima Ifriqui had once been closest to First Prince Cordelia, but it was clear she had no intention to involve Procer in Levant's affairs after the war. It was the League that troubled him, for Empress Basilia was already making advances. She wanted the League of Free Cities to fill the void the Thalassocracy had left as the Dominion's closest ally and sign defence pacts against the Principate.

For such pacts to be signed there needed to be someone seated on the Tattered Throne, and that meant Basilia Katopodis had to gain in securing a quick succession should she be given an opening – and it would not be the Champion's Blood she backed, if it came to that.

Yannu would have liked to bargain with Callow, but he could not. The Black Queen was said to be fond of Razin and Aquiline, even rumoured to call them 'her lordlings' in council. She had even ensured they stood for Levant at the talks with the Dread Empire, an honour that had once belonged only to those of the Pilgrim's Blood. If she was brought in, where her favour would lie was clear as springwater. No, Yannu must keep other powers out of the matter at all costs: the only one likely to aid his cause had no hunger for getting involved. And that meant giving no excuse for the rest to involve themselves.

An excuse like weakening the Dominion's fighting strength because of internal matters.

"They did not fight me when I sought the command, Rima," Yannu continued. "That says much."

It meant neither Razin Tanja nor Aquiline had thought it worth a quarrel to have either of their names attached to a great battle against the dead instead of his. Worse, Yannu found he did not disagree with their decision.

The two of them had accolades enough to their name they did not need to take risks to earn more. They'd fought well before and during the great offensive in Hainaut, ending in the battle at the capital where Lord Razin – the weakest reputation of the two – was said to have faced a Scourge and lived. Since then the Black Queen had dragged them east into her campaign to settle Praes, where it was said they had fought with distinction at the Battle of Kala. After they had stood for Levant at the Tower's fall and the talks that followed, speaking for all of the Dominion as neither the Champion's or the Brigand's Blood ever had.

Most unsettling, though, was the distant amiability with the Barrow Sword. They'd pushed hard for the Bestowed to be given a chance to earn a place in the Rolls in the service of the Dominion, which looked to Careful Yannu like an alliance in the making.

"They're looking past the battles here," Rima grunted in agreement. "The boy, that. Aquiline's a fine killer but she thinks in blood and prize heads. Tanja's as clever as his father was."

And nowhere as proud, Yannu thought, which made him more dangerous. As Rima had grasped, they were preparing for the days after Keter, he understood, for what would come after the war. When the captains and their warriors returned home and the truce birthed by Cordelia Hasenbach came at an end. There would be blood, that much was certain, for the Tattered Throne stood without any Isbili left to claim it for the first time since the founding of the Dominion, coming with it the prize of rule over Levante: the largest, wealthiest city in all of Levant. Yannu knew it would come to war, for the heads of two great lines of the Blood were set to wed and with the Isbili dust there could be no better bid for the Tattered Throne than such an alliance.

And he had no intention of letting them make of the Dominion their kingdom.

There was noise behind him, so Yannu reined in his horse and glanced at Rima. She snorted and went to have a look, leaving the Lord of Alava to stare at the western flank of the marching column. There his own warriors and Vaccei's marched, distanced and under their own captains. Further west the great glittering snake that was the Clans under the Warlord was keeping up with his own host, while the thick of cataphracts under General Pallas screened the sides of both armies as they advanced. Rima returned quick enough he did not have time to grow bored by the sight.

"Moro Ifriqui's back from the scouting trip," she said. "Coming to report in person."

"Not necessary," Yannu frowned.

"The report, the man or the entire lot of them?" Rima drily replied.

He did not answer. Like most Alavans his cousin cared little for the Ifriqui, even less so now that his talks with them had come to nothing. His attempts to bind the Champion's Blood to the Brigand's in answer had been frustratingly unsuccessful. Yannu himself kept only to men, a preference shared by none of Itima's sons – the oldest of which, Moro, was over a decade younger than him anyhow – and though both lines had other kin the ages did not align. Itima's eldest granddaughter was three years old too young for any of his nephews, and though her youngest son was still unwed he was in his twenties while Yannu's oldest niece was twelve.

Matches further from the main line could be made, but to what purpose? They could not bind an alliance or hope to eclipse the prestige of a wedding between the Lady of Tartessos and the Lord of Malaga. That left their alliance one of circumstance, held together only by common enemies.

"They are allies still," the Lord of Alava finally said. "And have reason to remain so."

Itima and Aquiline hated each other like poison over the matter of the deaths of the Osenas' brothers, so the Lady of Vaccei had much to fear from her enemy's ascension. Yannu himself had slain Akil Tanja in an honour duel, which would make Razin his enemy until death, though that was not the reason he opposed the youths.

"They're Ifriqui," Rima scathingly said. "They have no cause, not like you do. It's not hunger or fear that sets you against the married banners."

Yannu had no intention of seeking the Tattered Throne for himself or the Champion's Blood. He would prefer it if neither Itima nor her sons sat it either, though he might not get that choice. His preference would be for the Painted Knife or the Valiant Champion to be raised to rule of Levante as a reward, though he knew Rafaella would not be a popular choice. Though the Valiant Champion had gone as far as eschewing face paint to distance herself from the Marave even after Yannu had executed everyone involved in the betrayal, she was still a Champion. It would be seen by other lines as Yannu reaching for the Tattered Throne through a cheap trick. In truth, Yannu did not much care who sat the throne so long as it was neither of the betrothed.

They would be too strong, that was made their claim unacceptable. Malaga was second in wealth only to Levante due to its canal while Tartessos controlled the access to the Brocelian Forest and its treasures. If they gained Levante and through it mastery of the Gulf trade, they would hold the entire Dominion by the throat.

It was even worse than it looked, he had realized over the year of war. Alava traded the ore and stone of its hills to Levante for grain from its fertile fields, while Vaccei traditionally imported cattle and steel from Malaga and Levante. If the Tattered Throne fell into the hands of the betrothed, they would not need war to bring the rest of Levant to heel whenever they wished: they could simply close their doors and let their foes wither on the vine. The Majilis would grow meaningless, no longer a council of equals guided by the Holy Seljun but instead a court with a king and queen ruling over it. It would be the end of the Dominion, the dream sung of in the Anthem of Smoke.

Let neither queen nor prince rule over our dominion, the Grey Pilgrim's daughter and successor had pleaded, and for that plea Yannu would go to war. He was not certain, however, that he could win that war.

Though the alliance of Tartessos and Malaga was surrounded, to the north by Vaccei and to the south by his own Alava, it had strong bones. Malaga was wealthy and the home of the binders while Tartessos strengthened its forces with free captains and adventurers that tried their luck in the Brocelian. Even if Itima Ifriqui could be counted on to stand against them – which she could not, the Brigand's Blood were snakes and Itima the most cold-blooded of the nest – it promised to be a long, brutal slog of a war. The kind that broke realms. Better to kill one of the betrothed and snuff out the alliance before it took flight, Yannu had thought, and Itima had unsurprisingly agreed when he brought her into the plot. She'd already killed enough Osenas not to balk at one more.

But, after Moro was brought forward and discarded the excuse of the report to carry a message from his mother, Yannu's heart clenched with the cold fear that he might have made a mistake.

"This is driveI," the Lord of Alava flatly said.

Moro Ifriqui, eldest child to Lady Itima and heir to Vaccei, had a hard face that life had seen fit to further scar. The redness of them was striking against his brown and green face paint, as another stripe of colour.

"We must act now, Lord Yannu," Moro said, speaking his mother's words with his own mouth. "They will wed when Keter falls and killing them when victory is won will only draw more attention."

They were not yet married, Yannu thought, precisely to discourage knives being sent after them. Aquiline likely meant it a deed of honour, not beginning the fight when the Grand Alliance bound them all still, but Lord Akil's son had grown canny as his father. He had done it so that any attack on them would be seen as so thoroughly unprovoked it would draw the ire from all the world. And that was the very trap Itima was stepping into now.

"Neither can be killed while we war against the dead," Yannu said. "There will be trouble when we kill Tanja after the victory, but it will only be a stain on our reputation. To kill him now would be betraying the Grand Alliance."

"Only," Moro Ifriqui said, "if we get caught. We have men who-"

"Enough," the Lord of Alava harshly replied. "I have refused, Moro. There will be no arrow loosed."

The heir to Vaccei shrugged.

"That choice is no longer in your hands," he said.

Yannu considered killing him, then and there. The Ifriqui had come with only a small escort of riders and Yannu's own sworn swords were closer and better armed. None were close enough to overhear them speaking, which meant none would be close enough to stop him from slaying the other man should he strike first. It would cause much trouble and solve little, the Lord of Alava decided after a moment. Anger was not enough of a reason to kill.

"Should I warn them," Lord Yannu said, "your entire line could be ended today."

"You won't," Moro replied, appearing unworried. "If you try to bury us, we'll drag you into the grave with us. And it won't even matter if it's true: they'll use it to get rid of you regardless."

That was, the lord grimly thought, likely true. He had slain Akil Tanja in an honour duel, and though his son had forsworn vengeance that did not mean there was no enmity between them.

"We're in the same boat, Lord Yannu," Moro smiled. "So let's not fight, else we'll both end up in the water."

"This is not what we agreed," Yannu insisted.

And, to his shame, his eyes drifted to the side. Past the column of warriors, up in the sky where a lone silhouette flew in lazy circles. The Warden, on her black-feathered mount.

"She has greater worries than us," Moro said, following his gaze.

"Pray that she does," he replied.

It was a dismissal and the younger man heeded it. Too many risks, Careful Yannu thought, as he watched Moro's back and Rima returned to his side.

He would have to act.

—

Map of the Kingdom of the Dead had remained largely the same over the last three centuries, though few of them extended far to the north of Keter itself. The most comprehensive extended all the way to the shores of the lake some called the Chalice and the outskirts of what was now known as the Duskwood, but rare were the maps that went any further. Mostly Ashuran ones, as the Thalassocracy's sailing ships sometimes circled the north of Calernia and their captains were particular about chart-making. The heartlands of the Kingdom of the Dead, though, were as much known territory as any land that was death on all who tread it could be.

It was why Hakram had several fine maps of the large plains surrounding Keter, the so-called 'Ossuary', coming from different nations.

He had halted to consult them atop a low hill, in particular an Arlesite map from the Ninth Crusade that bucked the reputation of Proceran maps being horribly unreliable by proving to be by far the most accurate of the lot. An hour past they'd marched across a long-dry riverbed that had been marked on it and no other parchment, which had only reinforced Hakram's trust in the mapmaker's work. The northwest of Keter had been fertile lands, once upon a time, and there were still traces of that. Dry riverbeds now only ever filled by rain were one, but there'd been more than grass and fields here during the days of Sephirah.

"That," the Warlord muttered, "could be trouble."

Sigvin leaned over his shoulder, peering at the parchment. She wore good chain mail that went up to her neck, hiding her ritual scars, and there was an axe at her hip. Unlike a warrior, though she had no shield. As a shaman, she was not to join the shield wall.

"What does the symbol mean?" she asked.

"Ruins," Hakram said. "The remnants of a city."

She looked understandably skeptical. Poison clouds obscured sight over long distances on the Ossuary, but a city so close to Keter would have been noticed. Troke Snaketooth, standing to the side of them and listening closely, looked as if he had an inkling.

"How old?" the chief of the Blackspears asked.

"Old enough there's no one left that speaks the language," Hakram replied. "There's almost nothing left and what remains is largely buried. I doubt anyone who notice the ruins without walking over them."

"And yet they are to be trouble," Oghuz the Lamé said, frowning.

The chief of the Red Shields had come out in warrior's mail, though he was unlikely to fight in the shield wall. Juniper's father was yet an able champion, though, and might choose a worthy fight to step into so that his clan would continue to hold his name in high regard.

"General Pallas sent word the dead are marching our way," the Warlord said. "At our current pace, in two hours we will clash over the ruins or close."

Hakram spat to the side, into the dust.

"The Hidden Horror does not deal in coincidences," he told them

Word would have to be sent. General Pallas and Lord Yannu should be told, he thought, but his eyes moved to the sky to the third in need of telling. A cloud of green hid away Catherine's distant silhouette but she was out there. Had been since dawn when they set out to march. The ruins were not from any of the thirteen great cities of ancient Sephirah, Hakram knew as much from their walk through the shards in Arcadia, but there had been other cities and towns in the kingdom – and there was no telling what the Dead King might have hidden in their ruins, buried under ash and dust.

And what the Warlord could not sniff out, the Warden might.

It would take more than a shout to reach her, but fortunately, Hakram had the means at hand. His gaze swept down the hill, where his warband had halted to wait for him while the rest of the warriors continued in the column led by Dag Clawtoe. A ring had formed, warriors leaning close as two people struggled, and the Warlord almost sighed. Hidir Bearkiller, a champion nearly seven feet tall with muscles like tree trunks whose favourite thing to do while drunk was be thrown into a pit with a steppe razor bear and kill it with his bare hands, yelped in pain cursed as Archer caught his thumb and began to bend it back. He gave in after there was an ominous crack, to the cheers of half the onlookers as Indrani beat her fourth consecutive challenger to the finger-game.

None of them had believed a human would have the strength to beat an orc at it, Named or not, which was why Hakram was now owed several bottles of Sleeping Bonesaragh no younger than five years.

"She is a menace," Oghuz complimented.

Juniper's father looked genuinely impressed. It was only a game, but the sight of Indrani twisting the arms of warriors with at least a foot on her repeatedly had made an impression.

"So far only to my champions," the Warlord drily replied.

He had assembled a warband of champions from all the clans as his retinue, since it would have been an insult to keep relying on the Howling Wolves and the Red Shields forever – if not to them, then to all his other followers. They were not as well trained as a Howling Wolves warband, even after regular drills, but the warriors had markedly improved. The heavy armour bought from Praes and reforged by clan blacksmiths had only made his warband of a thousand fiercer, though apparently only so that Archer might better maul them.

The devil in question was headed his way, strutting triumphantly after having clapped Hidir's back with affection, and Hakram rolled his eyes at her.

"Aren't you supposed to be with the Levantines?" he asked.

All the Blood had retinues to protect them, but there were enemies sworn swords could little again. Worry had been that the Hawk might try to bag one of the great lords of Levant during or after the battle, Archer had been brought along as much to keep the Blood alive as to face the Scourge. Losing any of them would be a hard blow to the Dominion morale, on top of a headache to sort out – neither Razin Tanja nor Aquiline Osenia had clear successors to their title.

"They're all over anyways, except for the lovebirds," Indrani easily replied. "Better to be out here where I can watch over the entire lot at once."

There was some sense in that. There was no telling when or from where the Hawk would loose its arrow, so taking the Scourge out before it shot was unlikely. Better for Archer to take a defensive posture and aim for the arrow instead of the Revenant. It was still, Hakram thought, a decision she would never have thought to make a few years ago. You're changing, he thought. It was a bittersweet thing, for it to happen only after he had left. The Warlord cut through the thought.

"I need you to send a message," Hakram said.

Indrani pointed upwards, cocking an eyebrow. He nodded.

"You know I'm always game for an excuse to shoot at Cat," Archer cheerfully said. "What do you need to say?"

Sigvin shot her a warm look, charmed by the romance of it. The mage from the Split Tree Clan had not met enough humans to know that violence did not usually take much of a role in their courting. Mind you, Hakram was not entirely sure she was wrong in this case.

"I'll write it down," the Warlord replied. "Wait for me."

"Sure, sure," Indrani dismissed, then slid a sly look at Sigvin. "So, Siggy, I hear tell you've been riding the Deadhand."

"I have," Sigvin nodded, then flashed a grin. "There are worse ways to pass the time."

Indrani laughed. He should, Hakram only now realized, never have allowed those two to meet. A tactical mistake of some weight had been made. One obvious enough even Troke shot him a sympathetic look.

"So is he any good?" Archer asked. "'cause Tordis said so back in Callow, but she was sweet on him I think and when a girl's sweet she-"

Hakram tactically retreated in search of ink and parchment before he could hear more. The quicker he was rid of Archer the better.

—

General Pallas whistled loudly, her escort smoothly coming to a halt around her as they joined with the riders that had been awaiting her. The word from the outriders had been interesting enough that she had decided to come in person even as word was sent to the other commanders. Her kataphraktoi had told it true, she saw with her own eyes. The dead had ceased their march.

Across the plains an army of the dead stood in silence, arrayed in a firm battle line with a reserve at the back and constructs to the side where a living host would place cavalry.

Behind them all, looming tall as a mountain, the Crab belched out smoke that filled the sky,

"They do not advance when provoked?" Pallas asked, turning towards Captain Dion.

The young man led the outriders, and had been the one to first send word.

"Not even when we enter bow range," Captain Dion confirmed.

It seemed, General Pallas thought, that the dead had chosen where they would give battle. In the distance behind her, she saw the trail of dust from the advancing columns of the orcs and the Levantines. Less than an hour away now. The Warlord had not mentioned what the ancient city said to be buried near here was called, if Deadhand knew at all.

"A simple name, then," Pallas mused. "The Battle of the Ruins should do nicely."

hue hue

Thanks for the work. Now place your bets, who is the dark power that the brigand blood deals with?

Santos

Villains

Levir

I think that was the Marauder

Someperson

My bet is it's just the occasional devil.

ohJohn

I, uh, think these consecutive sentences might be related:
"Sometimes even bargains with dark powers. Mother had never admitted outright, but she'd hinted enough he was sure the rumours about having paid the Marauder to kill Aquiline Osen's older brother were true."

nimelennar

Hmm. I wonder whose plot this is.

The Dead King's? It seems too petty for him, even if it effectively weakens the army facing him.

The Bard's? It doesn't involve enough names for it to be subject to her influence.

A leftover plot by Alaya? You'd think she'd warn her new allies about it.

Or maybe it's actually just what it appears to be: a petty grudge between the Slayer's Blood and the Brigand's. If that's the case, how stupid to prioritize your preferences of who is to rule the Dominion over its very survival.

Raved Thrad

If this were Worm I'd say it was a Coil plot, but since this is PGtE I'd have to go with Wandering Bard fuckery. 😊

WuseMajor

Yannu laid it all out pretty well, I think. He wanted to kill the boy after the fight, but before the marriage so they couldn't come back and be King and Queen over the whole region, because, even if they didn't take the throne, they'd have an insurmountable economic advantage.

Ifriqui agrees with that, but thinks it'll be safer and easier to hide if they do it now, in the middle of combat.

I wouldn't call it a "petty" grudge in this case.

caoimhinh

Nah, it is definitely petty.

They are letting ambition make them idiots. Yannu straight-up admitted that the coming war would be the kind that could break Levant as a nation, and he will still fight it. Meaning he would rather see Levant in ruins than let Aquiline and Razin rule it.

Putting their own personal convenience and ambitions over the well-being of the whole nation is something extremely petty.

Scmrph

It's not that petty when you consider his motivations, which is essentially to preserve Levant as a federation instead of a monarchy. Even though Brutus loved Caesar as a brother, he loved the Republic more and so we had the Ides of March.

That didnt end very well and neither will this, but the motivation is hardly petty.

nimelennar

Sure, charting the future of the rulership of your nation isn't petty, but prioritizing that above the existence of life on your continent sure is.

SuitorShooter

It's not just convenience and ambition. Marave have Blood Feud with the Tanja, so he has every reason to believe that if Tanja and Ossena rule Levant together as a king and queen, totally unchecked, they can and will destroy the Marave.

The Ignorant Student

It's not that crazy when you think about it. As much as we see this as a climactic battle for the ages, this is a world where (historically speaking) the good guys win literally every time. Imagine if during WWII we could point back to a thousand years of Hitlers pulling the same shit and being stuck down in our darkest hour by literal divine intervention? Hell, I'm ninety percent sure that somewhere out there is official White House correspondence or something that straight up says "let Hitler and Stalin fight it out because whoever wins, the longer this goes on, the more fascists and socialists are dead." And then at the end of WWII, there was literally a race to Berlin because whoever got there first could basically say "this is ours now" which is literally what happened when the Soviets got there.

Mirror Night

Knife is Brigand Blood right? She could be inline for a promotion or Barrow might not have to work hard at taking over some land lol.

Still seems wild to gamble on assassinations at this point.

I assume something bad is buried in those ruins.

Levir

Knife, like Spear, is not of the major lineages.

Linnus42

I am aware I am asking what part of the country she comes from. Its easier as a minor house to take over part of the country you are actually from. Painted Knife seemed to have a decent mind for politics she wouldn't be bad at being a Major Lady as far as I can tell.

ErraticErrata

The Painted Knife is originally from Levante and has no affiliation to any of the major lines of the Blood.

Mirror Night

Not a bad choice to sit on the Throne seems to not be bad at politics from what little we got and a neutral option. Thanks for the answer

caoimhinh

EE, would you mind refreshing my memory?

What's the betrayal that was mentioned in this part: "the Valiant Champion had gone as far as eschewing face paint to distance herself from the Marave even after Yannu had executed everyone involved in the betrayal"

Konstantin von Karstein

I don't think it was ever mentioned. From context, I imagine that some of the Champion's Bloid tried to have Raphaella killed. Probably because she wasn't of their line, or refused to ally with them.

Snappy270

That rings a bell. she their namesake without being of them. Did they try to marry her then got pissy and kill, her driving her out of Levant were hanno picked her up.

edrey

Well, Cat would have notice the attack with her story vision right? So i assume the brigand blood would be used as fodder in the ruins

ftaku

Are any involved in this tale of deception even Named or just descendents? I don't think her story vision would help. Hopefully her political savvy means she has prepared

TrustiestRaptor

I don't think there are named involved in the plot itself, but that doesn't necessarily preclude Cat from following story threads. Because there are definitely named involved in what is about to be the Battle of the Ruins, and I'd wager that there are a fair few stories about battles that begin with betrayals on one side leading to defeat. Assuming she can pick up on those threads, that is.

Cap'n Smurfy

None of the Levantines involved are Named, I don't think she can foresee this with story powers.

Insanenoodlyguy

She might have started too when the battle was given a name of ominous foreshadowing though.

RoflCat

Her domain is over Named, none of these Bloods are.

The best case scenario for Catherine to see this plot coming would be if this backstabbing becomes some kind of pivot for a Named.

Darkening

Yeah, I could see Barrow Sword intervening to prevent the assassination or something at least.

Insanenoodlyguy

Not even an at least, that's a good guess. It's the "this guy you aren't sure you can trust us advancing on you with a weapon, but then he aims past you to take out the threat about to strike." Kind of strike. And seeing one of those coming cat could do, and have placed him accordingly.

Though I think as soon as this battle just got named "Battle of Ruins" that anything she missed she can now see. There's entirely too many ways that name can be an accurate assessment not to have several pivots available. There has to be a lot of threads in the stats uncoiling now.

BargleNawdleZouss

Regarding the epigraph at the start of this chapter, I wonder if ErraticErrata is a fan of multiple Hugo Award winner Lois McMaster Bujold and her Vorkosigan Saga series? From book #13, "A Civil Campaign":

Count Aral Vorkosigan to his son Miles [the protagonist of most of the series]:

"Reputation is what other people know about you. Honor is what you know about yourself."

And then one line later, "The friction tends to arise when the two are not the same..."

Frivolous

Might have been devised independently but I remember that adage from A Civil Campaign, too.

caoimhinh

Interestingly, this is an important thing regarding the Blood, because so far we have seen very little of Honor in them, and instead a great obsession with reputation and fame.

Razin was right when he saw that they had lost their way.

Frivolous

Agree, caoimhinh. They're misusing the word honor.

Kletanio

Keep in mind that this is entirely consistent with older, less modern senses of the word "Honor". Honorable actions to a chivalric knight often feel insanely alien to us, because "following the orders of your liege lord, even if you disapproved" doesn't feel right anymore.

The Levantines are having a revolution as to what the word "honor" even means.

shikkarasu

Well put. This is why I can't really blame Yannu. He and the Lordlings are both standing up for what they think is right. Yannu is even sane enough to wait until after the war is over before murdering anyone.

The Brigands, however, are fing insane if they think they can get away with this with Catherine in the vicinity. She might not have Name Sight on them, but she knows a Praesi double cross when she sees one and she has been revenge blue-balled over the Night of Knives for a while now. Crushing one of the Dominion's equivalents of a High Lord in retaliation for a mid-war assassination would be very cathartic, I imagine.

caoimhinh

Emm... no, that's not the definition of honor, even by ancient standards.

Albeit to be fair, disobeying your lord or rebelling against them was considered dishonorable, honor is not simple obedience.

It differs a bit from culture to culture, but when they spoke of Honor, as in a code of honor, it was not about obeying orders, it was about living by a code or a set of rules.

The chivalry of the knights distinguished them from common soldiers (who would be the ones you described, people simply obeying orders even if they disagreed), a knight had a code of conduct and a way of life, taking vows for the protection of people and upholding of the law, as well as living with strong morals.

Now, in regards to the behaviors of ancient warriors and the way to keep to that honor, there are indeed things that may be alien for modern people, like Samurai taking their own lives through Seppuku or Hara-kiri being considered more honorable than being executed, or to follow their lord to the afterlife.

The thing here is, Honour was originally something that the Levantines was a set of conducts and behaviors through which they lived, and this is evidenced by the epigraph that show us the way ancient Levantines saw Honor. At some point in their history, they lost their way. Razin didn't invent a new definition of Honor for his people, but rather realized that the thing they were doing was not what their ancestors had wanted.

ninegardens

Feels like the obvious thing to do would be for the Blood to talk about what is to happen after the war BEFORE assassinating each other on the battlefield.

Like... Yannu and Brigand are being problems here, but the Betrothed really SHOULD maybe talk about "No, we don't want to rule the kingdom, we are willing to back [NAME HERE], if that'll keep you off our backs".

I feel like an honour bound society like the blood SHOULD be able to manage that.

Ughhhh...

ALSO, this is the 4th chapter (in a row?) mentioning the absence of the pilgrim... and I can't help but wonder if a couple of the previous reminders were partly in place to serve as foreshadowing for the conflict here.

Mirror Night

Would you really believe the Lovebirds if they said that? I don't think the other houses would agree unless they cancel the wedding or one of them abdicates. Lining up some strategic marriages might also be logical....but I think Yannu is right you need someone like Champ or Knife on the throne.

ninegardens

In a society based on great big honour?

YES! Them explicitly and publically saying "We intended to support the painted knives bid for the tattered throne, or, if she is dead, we will support the Valiant champion, OR if both are dead, we will agree to not make a bid for the throne from either of our kingdoms".

Yes, I would believe it. I would expect them to honour that.

Mirror Night

I mean sure if they stated they would support a neutral option like Painted Knife or Valiant Champion then yes I believe them. But they have not done that or suggested that as an option while they integrate their two houses more closely together....so an outside observer looking at them and the overall consolidation outside of Praes is not wrong in thinking they plan to seize absolute power.

Insanenoodlyguy

It wouldn't matter. Yannu muses on it here. The economic powerhouse they become alone means they'll have the most weight. They can shut down the rest if they want to, too big a threat to refuse. Even if they never take advantage of that, who's to say their children won't? That's what Yannu is thinking and he has a point, though he is going about it a terrible way. Levantine names have been grooved into this being a workable system but they have all broadened and interacted with other trends and opinions and ages old trends are pivoting here. You could not pick a worse time to try and keep an old system going then when a young couple with purpose is going to break it and there's named and name opportunities everywhere. Yannu would have found it incredibly difficult to do this when he wanted anyway but it's doomed to go pear shaped now, even without Cat.

Hydrargentium

Heh. If we're being constantly reminded about the Pilgrim's death, the rule of Chekov suggests that that is going to be important soon. If this really wants to be an "oh sh*t" kind of thing, then that'll mean we'll be seeing a new Revenant on the field soon....

Hg

caoimhinh

Hmm, but Tariq's body was turned to ash, so there's no way for him to be a Revenant, though the Dead King might have an ancient Grey Pilgrim as a Revenant.

You know what would be a true "Oh, shit" moment for those of the Blood?

If Razin became a Grey Pilgrim.

That would really consolidate the lovebirds' power block into something unassailable, as it would be the closest there can be to a successor to the Isbili line.

ninegardens

I mean, Razin as Pilgrim would be cute, but he just doesn't match the set up of the name... like... at all.

caoimhinh

As a healer who is obsessed with making sacrifices for the greater good? No, he doesn't fit that setup.

But Razin doesn't need to be like Tariq to be a Grey Pilgrim.

Keep in mind that different people can have the same Name and live in completely different ways, because while the Name is the same, the Role is different.

Besides, the original Grey Pilgrim wasn't like Tariq at all.

The first Pilgrim was a rebel that fought off the invasion of Procer and founded a nation. Things that Tariq had no intention of doing, as he supported Procer's invasion of Callow under the guise of Crusade (and admitted to Catherine he wouldn't stop them from it because of politics) and he actively avoided ever governing Levant despite all the people actively asking him to do so. Heck, the original Grey Pilgrim nearly got killed by the Choir of Mercy, while Tariq was their favorite friend.

Razin is the first of the Blood in a long time to realize the errors in their ways, the one who saw that they needed to change, that they needed a revolution in the way they see Honor and in the way they make decisions as a nation, and he is following his love and marrying her disregarding the politics involved, which is something even Tariq didn't dare to do.

Razin is also an anomaly among his bloodline, as he doesn't have the gift for magic that is cultivated among the Blood of the Binder, and it was implied by his father that the candidates for succeeding as Lord of Malaga are chosen for having the Gift, so Razin is breaking tradition by default.

So, Razin has the will and even the story of bringing a great positive change to his nation on his side. I think he fits for it.

Snappy270

Yeah they also mentioned no one of the grey pilgrim's line left to take levante. That screams new grey pilgrim coming in Levants time of need. But who?

erebus42

I dunno, I was actually under the impression that Tariq had sacrificed the Name itself along with his bloodline to fuel his final act. Granted I may be mistaken.

caoimhinh

The thing is, the Dominion isn't actually an Honor-bound society, they have deviated from that path and only care about fame.

That's what the epigraph is pointing out, the Blood talks a lot about Honor, but they rarely abide by it, and instead live and die for their reputation.

BargleNawdleZouss

From Ninegardens:

ALSO, this is the 4th chapter (in a row?) mentioning the absence of the pilgrim... and I can't help but wonder if a couple of the previous reminders were partly in place to serve as foreshadowing for the conflict here.

—

Okay, I'm making a wild-ass guess here: Knight Errant Arthur Foundling, led by his new sword Peregrine, shows up in the nick of time to save the lives of Razin Tanja & Aquiline Osen. Even odds if he then helps to expose the plot, or (hopefully) heal the breach between the remaining four major lines.

caoimhinh

I just remembered that the Dominion has this idea where a duel to the death between two commanders is an acceptable way to decide which battle plan they are going to use in the coming battle. That's how Yannu killed Razin's father.

So the Blood really are stupid enough to think that it's fine to kill one of their own top brass people before a big battle.

Frivolous

I'd be a little surprised if Catherine hasn't anticipated this little problem.

For instance, having invisible drow spies watching and listening to all the major players.

Then again, all the major players in this conspiracy are regular people, un-Named. So it might just have occurred in Catherine's blind spot. Though I kinda doubt it. Assassination was an obvious response to anyone who understands Dominion politics in general and the Brigand's Blood in particular.

Mirror Night

Is it obvious? Perhaps is it obvious they do it right now...that seems far less likely. Not sure Cat really has too many troops to spare prevent internal assassinations right now.

Frivolous

Sve Noc had enough drow to watch Christophe and the Langevin princess, and to watch Cordelia and Rozala, and that was when they weren't marching on Keter in a multi-state alliance.

ninegardens

I mean... Cat is dealing with like... a dozen other problems and threats... and has notably spent the last few days checking in on all the stories attached to the named in her campsite.

Insanenoodlyguy

We also have to consider providence. This might be a complete blind spot (I don't think so but let's assume) and it wouldn't matter. There are so many named hanging around that the odds are decent of somebody just wandering blind into this. Say Barrow Sword is there to discuss some point of the new rolls or Valiant Champion is just going over to tempt them to get smashed with her and oh hey wait that guy is definitely an assassin, well that isn't going to fly, and then we got a dead assassin and one of those b-plots a named has to juggle while also dealing with the battle of the ruins (which increases their survival chances till the story is resolved so bonus that.)

laguz24

Careful Yannu should be renamed common sense Yannu. Since he is the only one who seems to have amongst his little conspiracy. This also proves that backstabbing disorder is universal.

Tohron

I've got a feeling this ends with Yannu taking a blade/arrow for Razin and dying. Hopefully that would be enough to set the stage for them figuring out how to end all the feuding.

Juff

Typo Thread:

neither be > neither would be he came > he became had had > that had word spread > word would spread had to gain > had something to gain involved themselves > involve themselves name they > name; they Most unsettling (extra space) boy, that. > boy, that is.
thick of cataphracts (missing noun) old too > old, too
Map of the > Maps of the anyone who notice > anyone would notice he told them (missing fullstop) pain cursed > pain
Bonesaragh > Bones aragh little again > do little against Worry had been > Worried that

Frivolous

Hello, there is one part that puzzles me:

Though the Valiant Champion had gone as far as eschewing face paint to distance herself from the Marave even after Yannu had executed everyone involved in the betrayal, she was still a Champion.

What does this mean? What betrayal?

agumentic

Rafaella is not actually a part of the Marave family, and it was mentioned that her ascension to Valiant Champion has been violent. It looks like either during or perhaps soon after it some of the original line tried to bury her so some nobody couldn't claim the Name of their progenitor.

caoimhinh

Ooohhhh, now that makes sense.

I was wondering about that myself.

braxen1

I'm not sure, but it's been mentioned a few times that Rafaela doesn't wear face paint, which is unusual for Dominion warriors. It probably has something to do with her backstory since she has the Champion name, but is not part of Yannu's bloodline.

As a complete guess I would say someone from the Champion's bloodline saw her as 'stealing' the name from the more worthy bloodline members and tried to kill her or her family. But she lived and Yannu had everyone killed.

It's possible I forgot her backstory or its a reference from a Patreon chapter, which I have not read.

KiltedBastich

I'm guessing that Yannu and Ifriqui don't know that the literal last request of the Grey Pilgrim to the Black Queen was that she watch over the two lovebirds. If they did know, they would understand how utterly and completely ruinous and suicidal this assassination plan of theirs is.

ninegardens

Aside from the danger aspect, I wonder if the "Pilgrims last request" in itself would be enough to stay their hand. Pilgrim was kind of a big deal... but I suspect that politics is still politics.

Insanenoodlyguy

Easy to rationalize if you want to "oh he said that then, but look at what they are becoming now. He'd understand."

Sykomantis

So my guess is there's a Crab buried under the ruins.

Someperson

So I'm betting Ifriqui does something rash to try and kill Osen and it goes spectacularly badly in the near future, and that after the war Yannu is poised to make his move but then the dynamic duo offer some kind of concession that mostly smooths things over.

Insanenoodlyguy

No, if Yannu wants any chance of surviving this he has to actively contribute now. It might be in a subtle way, but he has already realized if he doesn't act he stays in this wagon, which is about to catch fire while careening off a cliff.

Someperson

Hm, yeah, I wouldn't be terribly surprised if Yannu made some kind of contribution to Ifriqui's plan failing.

spencer

Whats Abigail up to now? We haven't had her perspective in a while.

letouriste

I'm dying to know 😊

Interlude: Honour

"It is indeed true, Chancellor, that the greatest possible victory is over yourself. My magical doubles proved to be the worthiest of my opponents by far."

– Dread Empress Gemini (possibly Gemini II, never conclusively proved not one of the doubles)

Razin Tanja watched the distant line of the horizon, sitting the saddle, and wondered about the nature of change. How it was embraced and how it was fought, how it was cursed and how it was sought. It was not, he had come to think, a matter of people being good or bad. Sometimes bad men fought for good causes, necessary causes. Sometimes good women did terrible things, because they did not think of them as being terrible at all.

It was, Razin thought, like standing in a tower. If the inside of it was all you had ever known, the world was divided by the levels of it. You'd think in terms of top and bottom, of stairs and doors, and never consider there could be anything else at all. Only if you'd stepped outside of it, even once, suddenly it would all seem so silly. What did a level or another matter, when you had seen a mountain or the sea?

But then who could conceive of a mountain or the sea, when all they had ever seen was the inside of a tower?

No, it was not about good and bad. It was about whether you had gotten a glimpse of the world outside the tower or not, and what that glimpse did to you. For Razin that journey had begun a bridge outside the city of Sarcella, when the great monster of their age had told him to learn from his mistakes or die in a ditch. It had ended when he'd looked at a woman he'd already been half in love with about to fight Yannu Marave to the death in his honour and seen nothing but futility.

A shameful, ugly waste that somehow everyone around him insisted was honour.

"But it was just blood," Razin murmured.

But that was Levant, wasn't it? Blood and honour, two sides of the same coin. The glory and the slaughter, so deeply intertwined they might as well be the same thing. And so Razin would not think in terms of good and bad, today. That was not the bone of it, the vein. It was about the tower, and how many people had stepped outside of it. Been dragged outside of it by this war.

About how far people would be willing to go, to go back in and close the door behind them.

—

There was a trap here, Hakram Deadhand thought, even if he was yet blind to it.

The Warlord was not a general in the way of others he knew and had known, more Nauk than Juniper, but he was a graduate of the War College and had fought in campaigns that would be studied for centuries to come. To his practiced eye the battle line of the enemy was a recipe for a rout, or at least severe defeat since the dead did not flee even when beaten. Keter's centre was weak a weak half circle, only six lines of skeletons deep, and the sheer weight of a charge from Levantine heavy foot – Alava's was particularly strong, entire companies heavily armed with plate and hammers – should plow right through.

The enemy had thickened its flanks instead, as much as thirty of the forty-five thousand it numbered split between the two. The rest, four thousand or some, was held in reserve behind the curved centre. Hakram was not as well-read as some in matters of tactics, but the formation smacked to him of the tactics of the Iron Prince at the Battle of Aisne, the overwhelming Lycaonese victory that had won Cordelia Hasenbach the throne. On that field Klaus Papenheim had drawn in a larger coalition of southerners deep past his flanks by letting his centre give ground before halting the retreat and falling around the flanks for an encirclement.

When he told Troke as much, the chief of the Blackspears spat to the side with a skeptical look.

"Won't work here," Troke Snaketooth replied. "The Dominion will keep charging and even if the undead send in their reserve it'll be torn through."

Which would leave the two strong flanks of the enemy army split and prone to being encircled in turn, a defeat in the making.

"So it's bait," the Warlord gravelled.

Hakram was not surprised. He had asked General Pallas to take a closer look at the grounds near the enemy and her riders had found that behind the battle line there were hints of the long-buried city that had once stood here. The thick of the ruins behind the curve of the enemy formation, within the hollow of the half circle. The general the Dead King had sent to command here must want their own centre to collapse, Hakram thought, for the Levantines to continue charging forward right into some sort of nasty trap that would shatter them and turn the battle around in a single stroke.

He'd written as much to Catherine, which was why he had been baffled when he had learned that she'd sensed a few undead under the ground where the city would be but no gathered power whatsoever. As far as she could tell, there weren't even any constructs: just a handful of Bones. Hakram began trading messengers back and forth with Lord Yannu and General Pallas in the wake of that, their armies slowed to a halt far enough the enemy would not be able to steal a march on them. Not that they seemed willing to leave the 'defensive' position they'd taken.

"If we march away," General Pallas suggested, "they might follow us away from their position."

It was a sensible enough thought and the Grand Alliance attempted it, but the enemy did not move to follow. It only made the trap more obvious, but the enemy general knew the same thing they did: they could not afford to leave without fighting that army. If they pulled back too far there would be nothing to stop the dead from going around them and striking at the camps from behind while they were trying to storm the walls of Keter, a recipe for slaughter. And there was no doubt at all that the dead would march faster, because unlike the living they did not tire and standing in the sun wearing armour for hours would not exhaust them.

So the army turned back, taking its old position after having burned a little over an hour.

"Our purpose is to keep their army here," Hakram told the others. "We can achieve it simply by standing here and facing them without actually waging a battle."

Only, as Careful Yannu sent back in message, it wasn't that simple. If they stayed too late, they would be stuck out in the Ossuary away from reinforcements in the dark, having no idea about the state of the coalition army that'd tried to storm Keter. Given that Proceran outriders had made it clear that there were still other armies of the dead gathering out in the plains, they would be running the risk of Keter throwing all those half-assembled forces at them from the sides while the army in front of them attacked them in the dark. That was potentially disastrous.

"We fight," Lord Yannu sent.

"We fight," General Pallas agreed.

"We fight," the Warlord conceded.

There was no other way but to give battle, so all that was left was to find a way to do it without giving the Dead King what he wanted.

—

The wait was getting to them all.

Ishaq had chosen his band with care, knowing that he might never get an opportunity like this again, and he was still pleased with the plan he had decided on. It was a simple thing, as most functional plans tended to be. The Grave Binder to find the Scourge and reach them, the Vagrant Spear to close the distance, the Stained Sister to hold them down, himself for the killing blow and the Harrowed Witch to handle their retreat. Lord Hanno had been generous in releasing the two heroines to his service for the battle, seemingly uncaring that the deed of killing a Scourge today would see Ishaq added to the Rolls. The once-Knight appeared interested only in the end of one of the Dead King's finest Revenants, indifferent to all other consequences.

A hard man to grasp, Hanno of Arwad. He acted weak where he should be strong, acted strongly where he should give. The Barrow Sword had refined his understanding in Salia, when he'd crossed swords with the Ashuran, but even now he was often unsure whether the hero was being clever or not. This band, for one. Ishaq had fought at the side of Sidonia and Aspasia before, facing the Drake together in Hainaut, and knew them well enough. So he'd anticipated that Sidonia would hold the Grave Binder in contempt, for the man in tattered robes was visibly rotting from a barrow-curse. A contempt that would be returned in kind, as Idris saw her as a hound of the Blood.

But he had not thought, however, that the Stained Sister would be as oil and water with the Harrowed Witch. Both Procerans were survivors of the Dead King's advance, but neither cared for the way the other had survived. Aspasia had only disdain for the Sister staying among the living only because she had been buried among so many corpses the dead had forgot her, while the old heroine had not been shy in castigating the Witch over the sacrifice of her own brother to power an illusion that would let her flee unseen. Ishaq had twice been forced to demand silence as the bickering escalated towards thrown hands, wondering all the while if somewhere Hanno of Arwad might not be laughing at him.

Now all stood in sullen silence among the throng of Alavan armsmen, their faces hidden by simple soldier's cloaks. Warriors gave them a wide berth, as much out of respect for Bestowed as the stink that came from Idris' rotting flesh. It really was an awful smell, Ishaq thought to himself. The Grave Binder had told him that being ever dying deepened his hold over death, but even Idris admitted that the barrow had exacted from him a deep price for the rings that taught him his learning.

"I hope people will stop marching all around soon," the Harrowed Witch muttered, breaking half an hour of silence. "I'm getting a headache watching them."

"How little it takes to-" the Stained Sister began, hands folding into the sleeves her red-stained garments, but Ishaq's hard look put a stop to that.

Like children, sometimes. As if just standing in the vicinity of each other was enough to drive each other mad.

"The hosts are getting in formation," Sidonia told them, sounding distracted as she spoke.

The Vagrant Spear was looking at the same 'marching around' that Aspasia had complained of. Ishaq was no captain of warbands himself, but he too could see that Careful Yannu and the Warlord had been moving around their armies in preparation of the battle. The Clans had split in two, taking the flanks, while Levant tightened the centre. Why he was not sure, and it was not his trouble to bother with. The Barrow Sword had come here to hunt.

"Movement?" he asked Idris.

The Grave Binder was picking at his wrist, gazing off in the distance, but when addressed returned to the present. The Bestowed's fingers went to the glittering bronze rings on his left hand, a small shiver of power touching the air.

"Four Revenants in the army," Idris said. "In pairs. And the two out in the field haven't moved for the last hour."

"Could be the Hawk and an escort," Sidonia facing Ishaq directly and refusing to acknowledge the other man's existence.

It was a grim source of amusement to the Barrow Sword that though he too had stolen from a barrow, a few hard fights back-to-back had seen this offence to honour forgiven while Idris would be scorned to the grave and likely even beyond. Sidonia was not from a noble line, not having any of the Spear's blood even though she had inherited the Bestowal, but she had been welcomed warmly by the greats of the Dominion and so eagerly adopted their hypocrisies. Idris had done little that those of the Brigand's Blood had not surpassed in horror a dozen times over, but a darkened Bestowal and enmity with the Binder's Blood meant he must be deserving of death.

That would change, after the war. Ishaq would see to it. And that change would begin with his being the first villain to ever added to the Rolls.

"It could also be bait," the Barrow Sword replied. "We wait."

Some dissatisfaction at that, but none challenged him. He was representative for the champions of Below, though the title in his hands did not command the same respect as it had in the Black Queen's. No matter. Soon the Scourges would reveal themselves, trying to snatch some great name's life, and then his time would come.

Like all Bestowed before him, Ishaq would write his entry in the Rolls blood-red.

—

Aquiline Osená shaded her eyes with her hand, peering at the enemy as the sun pounded down on her helm.

By habit she glanced through the ranks for a head worth taking, some great captain or Revenant, but much as she hated to admit it the days where she could wade into the thick of the slaughter were past. She was only twenty-two, young enough that there should still be many years for her to slay great names and bring back their skulls to the Silent Shrine, but as Razin kept saying if either of them died then all hope of change for the Dominion would die with them. It was still frustrating to hear, and if he had not been clever enough to save that kind of talk for when they were naked and sated she might have quarrelled with him for it.

The Grim Binder's Blood made for canny men, it was known.

No, now her eyes were meant for different prizes. As the years passed she had become the leading captain of their host, her betrothed taking a step back and to instead hold command of reserves or the camp. Razin was not without talent as war captain, Aquiline believed, but she would not deny he did not have the knack for it that some were born with — like Abigail the Fox or Rozala Malanza. Yet in the Dominion none were held as Yannu Marave's equal when it came to leading warriors, which was part of why Razin had stepped back. If it comes to war, Razin had said, it will be you that leads our captains. Best you and they get used to it.

He really was sweet, Aquiline thought, still pleased at the memory. She toyed with a strand of hair, smiling, but was brought out of the reverie by a cleared throat. Captain Elvera was looking at her, worn face pulling into a cheeky grin.

"Not even wed and already losing your head," the old captain said, shaking her head. "What would your father say?"

"That at least I had the sense never to fuck a Proceran," Aquiline replied, entirely unashamed.

"I just taught him how to handle an axe," Elvera lied.

The Lady of Tartessos still found it wildly entertaining that Elvera had slept with one of spymasters of Procer back when they were young. She'd also been relieved it wasn't the dead traitor or the one that looked like a skeleton with dry skin hung on it, since it would have called her old teacher's tastes into question. In the distance a deep horn sounded – deeper even than those of the Army of Callow, which Aquiline knew well – and the sound called them back to order. Her eyes returned to the enemy's ranks, still find the same conclusion laying there to be found.

"If we charged we'd tear right through them," Aquiline Osená stated. "Their centre is thin and thin on shields."

"Which their captain wants of us," Elvera agreed. "That formation is too odd for it to be otherwise."

By the count of the outriders, the dead numbered over forty thousand. Likely closer to forty-five, the kataphraktoi had claimed, but they could not be sure given the way the enemy kept some of its troops hidden at the back. That meant the numbers of the Grand Alliance were higher: fifty-three thousand had set out with down and marched to this field, all in all. Twenty-seven thousand for the Dominion, twenty-three thousand orcs and three thousand kataphraktoi under General Pallas. It was rare for the dead to fight when their numbers were the lesser, given that Bones were hardly better than even Proceran levies as soldiers, but rarer still for the dead to stand on the defence.

And that was what Aquiline's eyes were telling her: the dead were still preparing to defend, not attack.

"I can't see the sense in it," Aquiline admitted.

"A trap of some sort," Elvera replied. "It's why Careful Yannu sent orders that we are to hold the centre but not break through."

"He didn't thin our numbers, though," the Lady of Tartessos replied, frowning. "Which he means he's worried about them breaking through us."

There could not be many reasons for that. Both their gazes moved to the Crab as their thoughts flowed down the same path. The monster was gargantuan, as were all of its kind, but this one was not like the others Aquiline had glimpsed. It was not a city on great spindly legs, workshops and smithies and dens of sorcery protected by walls, but instead entirely a creature of war. The mountain of death belched trails of smoke from great bonfires that looked like a thousand eyes, the air wavering from the heat around it, and from all sides extruded paired and massive folded tusks of steel. Aquiline could see in her mind's eye how they would unfold, turning into cutting lines that would carve through a man's height across the length of half a mile as the monster advanced.

"We have our own monster, my lady," Elvera finally said, nodding upwards. "And if it comes to a scrap, I'll bet on ours."

Aquiline refrained from looking up, looking for the silhouette of the crow and her rider. It would have felt childish, like a child tugging at her mother's skirt. A feeling she resented all the more for knowing the Warden was not much older than her. Not that one would know, from the way she carried herself: halfway between a sage and a lunatic, but ever a step ahead of her foes.

"She said she would handle it, so she will," Aquiline simply said.

Her worries had to be on the ground, where steel would clash. The orders had come from Careful Yannu and the Grand Alliance army had at last finished taking a formation of its own. The captains of the Dominion had taken the centre, Aquiline's own armsmen and those of Malaga in the middle while Alava stood on one side and Vaccei the other. The Clans had agreed to hold the flanks, Warlord Hakram taking the left flank while an orc by the name of Troke Snaketooth took the right. General Pallas' kataphraktoi were being kept in reserve at the back, along with eight thousand mixed foot from the Clans and the Dominion – the four thousand Levantines there under Razin's command, while Oghuz the Lamé held it the orcs.

It was a large reserve, but Aquiline approved of the caution. There was something afoot. In the distance the deep horns of the Clans sounded once more, soon after answered by the beat of Levantine war-drums. Aquiline breathed out, rolling her shoulders, and straightened her back. Her sword left the sheath easy as a breath and she raised the steel until it gleamed in the sun's light.

"Forward," Aquiline Osená shouted, and across the dusty plain warriors began to march.

The Warlord was not in the thick of it when the lines collided.

For now he was still of more use behind, watching the greater currents of the battle. Time for the axe-song would come soon enough. Instead he watched as the shield wall of his flank collided with that of the dead, his warriors smashing through the dead with axe and sword. Orc were larger than human, heavier, and found it easier to land the kind of blows that shattered skeletons. The other side of that, which became visible soon enough, was that the Clans lacked the discipline of the Army of Callow. The line became uneven in moments, finer warriors digging deeper into enemy lines, and the disorders gave room for the dead to bite.

They would kill more of the enemy, Hakram thought, but more would die as well.

"The centre's doing well," Sigvin opined. "The Levantines aren't pushing further than they should."

They had pushed back the enemy some, the Warlord saw, but not much and their captains were holding back the men. It had blunted the head of the half circle but little more than that. Lord Yannu's plan had been simple enough: since they were certain that what the dead had planned laid in the ruins, then to avoid the trap all they must do was avoid taking those grounds. The enemy centre would shatter itself on the Grand Alliance's, and then the majority of the Dominion army could swing around to take from the side the flanks that Hakram's warriors would have nailed down. And, in case a mistake had been made, a large reserve was being kept back.

Mitigated risk, Hakram had thought when he first heard it. A plan worthy of a man called Careful Yannu.

Movement drew his attention to the side. He and Troke had ordered their shield walls to be ten men deep, to stretch the line and prevent easy encirclement by the larger undead flanks, but it wasn't the Bones that were worrying him. Against these, Hakram would send his warriors all day without a second thought. It was the constructs, which had been waiting patiently to the sides as the shield walls impacted and the troops committed to the clash. And now, the Warlord saw, they were beginning to move.

"Fuck," Sigvin whispered, "but ghouls are quick."

"Keter uses them as replacement for cavalry," Hakram replied, eyes following the same curve as hers.

Thousands of flesh abominations ran on four legs, circling around the orcish shield wall to hit it from the side, but Hakram's chiefs had been warned. They back lines pulled away and formed another shield wall facing the ghouls. It was the larger constructs that drew his eye, though. Beorns and Tusks, great bears with bellyfuls of dead and boar-like abominations instead filled with rocks. The enemy seemed to lack drakes, save for a few circling above as watchers, and there had been no swarm unleashed. There were no insects to kill and raise, out in the Ossuary: all life had been snuffed out centuries ago.

"There they go," the Warlord grimly said as the larger constructs began to move.

The enemy's plan became obvious soon enough. The ghouls were keeping the new, thin shield wall pinned while Beorns circled around towards it. Though Hakram's warriors were holding the ghouls at bay handily, returning the favour in kind when throats were torn out by fang, the line was not steady. The Beorns would blow holes into it and then pour out skeletons in the holes. As for the Tusks, they slowly began to advance but their destination was not yet clear.

"Are you sure we can trust them?" Sigvin suddenly asked.

"Against the dead? Always," the Warlord replied.

On Troke's flank, the assembled shamans of the Clans unleashed their sorceries onto the approaching Beorns. Waves of fire and frost, withering curses that turned flesh to stone or exploded in waves of bronze sorcery. But there were only so many mages among Hakram's kind, not enough for both flanks. So the Warlord had bargained for reinforcements: as the great abominations approached the line, small bands darted out of the orcish shield wall. A heartbeat later blinding flares burst as the lodges of Lanterns did what they did best: savage giant monsters with the most warlike applications of Light on all of Calernia.

Blinding beams and pale fire, spears and axes and javelins. The priests of Levant, singing the same war hymns they had for centuries, tore wildly into the Dead King's monsters.

"Good priests," Sigvin reluctantly conceded.

Hakram did not answer, eyes on the Tusks. They had yet to charge, still moving around without clear purpose. Held back for now? It would make sense. There were no better constructs in the arsenal of Keter to shatter shield walls, best to use them when they would strike the hardest. But that meant his use as a watcher had come to an end. The tall orc reached for his helm, pulling down on his head and tightening the clasp. The shamaness sent him a bright look.

"Into the fight?" she eagerly asked.

"It's time," the Warlord agreed. "I'll lead my warband to-"

Hakram did not finish the sentence and came close to never finish anything ever again. The arrow had fallen down in utter silence, grey and unseen, only for the middle of the shaft to be hit by another arrow five feet away from his throat. He went very still, for a moment, but no other arrow came.

"I owe Indrani a drink," Hakram Deadhand said, and reached for his axe.

—

There was no hiding where the arrow had come from.

"I have them," the Grave Binder said.

Ishaq drew Pinon, the blade keening eagerly.

"We move," he ordered.

Sidonia laughed, Aspasia moaned and the Stained Sister's face hardened. With the collision of the lines they had been forced back behind the Alavan shield wall, but now they passed through it and into the thick of the dead. Ishaq and Sidonia took the lead, the Barrow Sword smashing through the shield raised in his way while the Vagrant Spear deftly leapt over another and scattered the dead into bones with a burst of Light. The two of them kept making room, clearing the dead in a storm as the rest of their band crossed the shield wall and it closed behind them. They had been quick, but they were fighting a sea and within moments the dead were pressing against them.

"Idris," Ishaq called out.

"Eyes, ears, tongue," the Grave Binder hurriedly chanted in Lunara. "I who hold dominion over the dead claim my tax: let none with eyes behold me."

There were many among Bestowed who thought Idris worthy of mockery, for like other sorcerers of the Dominion his magic could not destroy swaths of foes like that of Praesi and Callowan mages. He was a maker of curses and a necromancer, which had only earned him further mockery as his skill proved inferior to the Dead King's and he failed to steal control of undead from the Hidden Horror. That was missing, Ishaq had found, the true strength of his Bestowal. His mastery over death was not simple necromancy, it was a deeper power — and that truth was expressed by the way Idris, alone of all the sorcerers of Calernia, could wave curses that affected even undead.

Such as hiding from their eyes a band of five Bestowed as they snuck through an entire army of the dead.

The Barrow Sword had known from the beginning that fighting his way to the Scourges when they hid in the middle of an army would see his band spent by the time the clash began, so he'd ensured they wouldn't need to fight at all. The Bestowed wove their way through the packed ranks of the enemy, elbowing skeletons and ducking the shadow of great abominations as they heeded Ishaq's order not to destroy even a single one – lest the Dead King be able to find them through the destruction. They hurried as much as they could, the sensation of moving unseen oddly empowering after the Barrow Sword grew used to the vulnerability, and the Grave Binder guided them straight to the Revenants.

"The three Revenants are clustered together," Idris whispered.

"What happened to the fourth?" Ishaq frowned.

"Suddenly destroyed while it was trying to join the others," the Grave Binder replied.

The Barrow Sword traded a look with Sidonia.

"The Lady's in fine form today," she cheerfully said, openly pleased.

Was she ever not? Ishaq still remembered her methodically taking the Red Knight apart with knives, making a show of a woman capable of cracking stone walls with her bare hands. He knew well he would have lost that fight in her place, one of the many reasons it paid to remain on good terms with the Woe. The Warden required so little of her allies that Ishaq was frequently baffled she did not have more villains in her service – refraining from excesses was a cheap price for her friendship. Keeping to her rules had seen a cordial truce brokered between him and the rising force in Levant as reward.

The Black Queen hadn't been subtle about making them work together, but then why bother when she had the authority to do as she wished? He'd have that too, one day. The power to give an order going against centuries of custom and rightly expected to be obeyed. Some mornings he woke up so hungry for it his belly ached.

"There," Idris suddenly said. "Behind the beorn. Get ready."

"Sidonia," Ishaq called out.

"Honour the Blood," the Vagrant Spear shouted back, leaping atop the massive bear.

She was gone in a moment as the Barrow Sword went around, Aspasia and the Stained Sister following closely. The Grave Binder was further behind, already whispering his next spell. Idris' curses could not fool Revenants, who the Dead King empowered beyond his ability to trick, but he would keep all other undead away from them for as long as he could. They had until the Grave Binder faltered to make their kill and ready themselves for retreat. Ishaq turned the corner a moment later, watching as Sidonia struck at their enemies in the flash of Light, and counted three.

In the back, the Hawk was fleeing.

In front of them, two identical silhouettes in armour stood. Iron from head to toe, the helms shaped like the heads of wolfhounds. The Wolfhound, then, and a fake. The strongest defence of the Scourges, covering the Hawk's retreat. Ishaq rolled his shoulder, Pinon singing as she cut through the air. The Hawk was for the Archer to handle anyhow, he would make do with this one.

"Honour to me," Ishaq the Barrow Sword grinned, and stepped into the fight.

—

Yannu had taken the time to consider how he would do it, if he were Itima Ifriqui, and decided it would be a man from Tartessos.

Though the Lady of Vaccei was taking a black gamble by attempting Razin Tanja's assassination during a battle, she was a fool. She was, he had mused, simply used to getting her way. How many dozens of times had she rid herself of foes using the cover an honour war or a hunting day? How many had she poisoned and ordered slain in the night? Itima Ifriqui had killed Blood before and gotten away with it. Her failure was that she had not grasped the danger courted by breaking the treaties of the Grand Alliance. Razin's death would not be pursued by a few spies or a single Bestowed: the Warden herself would look into such a killing.

And there was no telling how far Catherine Foundling was able to reach for answers.

Still, Itima would know that if she were blamed for Lord Razin's death she would be facing the bitter vengeance of a widowed Aquiline Osená and a furious Binder's Blood, whose armies would both come for Vaccei to scour it as harshly as the Principate once had. So Itima must set Tartessos against Malaga in the aftermath, and there was opportunity for that. Several captains in Osená service had been bitterly disappointed by Aquiline's betrothal, having hoped to win her hand through honour, and there were even more who had lost kin fighting against the Malagans over the rich lands between the two cities. A grudge would not be too difficult to forge as a reason for the killing.

As the two betrothed kept their warriors in blended companies, finding a hand to do the deed was as easy as finding a Tartessos warrior foolish enough to think they might get away with it and greedy enough to believe the riches promised would be given. No doubt Itima had given out some gold as proof she would pay the whole, using the coin to tie the killer to whichever Tartessos man she wanted blamed for the deed. Yannu's first trouble was that there could be no telling who it was that the Bandit's Blood had bent to their purpose. It could be any of hundreds, and Razin's command in the reserves meant he was near too many warriors to count.

Yannu's second trouble was that he did not want Itima Ifriqui to be caught.

The Lord of Malaga had no doubt she would follow through on the threat Moro had carried, that she would drag him down as well if she was to be killed. And even if she was not, recklessly as she was acting Itima was still his only ally in checking the rise of his enemies. She must then be stopped without being outed, else it all come down on both their heads. Fortunately, though there could be many assassins there was only one life they were after. There lay Yannu's opportunity, and the way he could yet turn this to his advantage.

"I need you by Razin Tanja's side," Yannu told his cousin.

Rima blinked in dismay.

"Now?" she replied. "Yannu, we're fighting a battle."

Only half true. The two of them were well behind the lines, with his sworn swords, and not likely to fight until the enemy centre was broken and the Clans were to be reinforced.

"Now," he agreed. "Itima's being rash. She wants to kill Razin Tanja."

His cousin let out a low whistle.

"That's going to get a lot of people killed," Rima said, sounding impressed in the worst way.

"Too many," Yannu agreed. "So I'm sending you to him, as a veteran to help him decide when to send in the reserves."

"But not to kill him," she tried.

"Keep him alive at all costs," the Lord of Alava replied. "I believe Itima'll be using a Tartessos man to do the deed, so watch them closely."

"So I'm to constantly keep my hand on my sword for an hour or two around a gaggle of jumpy Tanja armsmen," Rima grimaced. "There's a pleasant fucking time in the making."

"Yes," Yannu said, unapologetic. "But most important is that when the assassin is revealed, you must see them killed."

Silencing the hand being used was crucial. With no tongue left to wag and no dead Tanja to prompt a deeper look by the likes of the Warden, the only trail left to follow would be the one Itima was sure to have laid pointing towards Tartessos. Rima might even win the Champion's Blood some honour by saving Razin's life, if she was quick enough.

"And when the armsmen ask why I looked at every Tartessos man twice all afternoon just before an assassin tried his luck?" Rima asked.

"I will settle that," the Lord of Alava said. "Simply tell them I had heard there might be an attempt and sent you to make sure he would live."

He'd have to create a believable way as to how he might have caught out a treacherous Tartessos captain, but it should not be impossible. Especially with Lady Itima's help, which she would be forced to give him if she did not want to get caught out having had a hand in any of this. Rima slowly nodded.

"You're sure?" she quietly asked.

"We still need the Brigand's Blood," Yannu admitted. "If we lose Vaccei, it is finished."

Alava could not win alone. It could fight, and might even follow him into that fight to the bitter end, but that the end would be bitter there was no doubt. That meant Itima Ifriqui must live through her blunder, even if he had to cross her to see it done.

"Then it's done," Rima said, clasping his arm.

Yannu clasped it back, pulling her close before releasing her. He was not pleased to send her away, but there was no one else he would trust this time. She had trained her right hand to serve as captain of his sworn swords in her absence, should it come to a fight, knowing she might be sent away on duties such as this. As she left his sight, vanishing into the crowd of armed men, the Lord of Alava turned back to the unfolding battle. It was, to his eye, going well. The enemy centre was teetering on the brink of collapse, having spent itself on his people's shield wall, and though the dead were mounting among the Clans they were holding strong.

The shield wall on the right flank was bending after having been thinned by the Beorns that had survived the sorcery of the orcs, but it looked in no danger of collapse. On both sides the ghouls were being thinned and it looked as if the Warlord had rallied warriors to go on the attack against them. He's to curve around the shield wall after, Yannu saw. Using on the dead the very same manoeuvre they had wanted to use on him. The Bestowed's very presence seemed to light a flame in the orcs, he saw, and not only the well-armoured ones he used as his sworn swords.

Wherever the Warlord stood vigor seemed to bleed back into tiring warriors, and they chewed up the dead like a closing maw.

It was worth keeping in- Yannu threw himself down from his horse, his armsmen closing around him with shields raised, but as he landed in the dust and his mount whinnied he saw there had been no need. The arrow he had glimpsed mere feet away from him had been shot out by another, taken in flight.

"Archer," one of his sworn swords said, and there were murmurs of agreement.

That and respect. The shot that might have killed Yannu had been madness, but it was madder still to have shot it. The Lord of Alava declined help to climb back the saddle, more bruised in pride than body, and returned to watching the battle. The centre was slightly further forward than he would prefer, but it had been too much to expect a fighting line to be too strictly observed. He was more concerned by the Tusks that still waited behind the enemy's flanks, not yet engaged even though on both sides the orcs were no longer losing grounds. When were they to strike, if not now? An instinct born of long experience had his eyes straying back to the centre, and there he saw it.

Just a moment too late.

The ground collapsed. The entire hollow he had been so wary of, the ruins under ground, had been nothing but a great sand trap. As the handful of dead the Warden had senses below brought down some pillar or another the entire cavern collapsed, turning into a massive pit. A few hundred of the warriors too far forward fell along with the entire enemy centre, though unlike the undead they would not be getting back up from that fall. And now he understood the trap the Enemy had laid, at long last. It'd been too obvious from the start, but that had been the trick: Yannu had never been meant to walk into the collapsing grounds.

He had been meant to keep his army in the wring place because of it.

Already he saw it laid out before him. Two flanks, the orcs holding but slowly losing to the dead on both. His centre, the Dominion forces, had been meant to reinforce the Clans by attacking the flanks once the enemy centre was broken. They would have gone both through the freed centre and through the back, preparing to encircle with the orc warriors as the anchor. Only now half the path was a pit Yannu's warriors could not march through, and the back path meant circling all the way around the orc shield lines while most of the Dominion army was facing the wrong way.

And he couldn't even do that, Yannu Marave realized, because behind him the reserves had yet to be committed and they were still in the way.

On the other side of the pit, the enemy reserve – which had stood right outside the edge of the fall – began to advance. On the flanks the Tusks turned as one, facing the shield walls of the Clans, and began to charge.

And over the entire army, for the first time since the battle had begun the Crab took a step forward.

—

"Hold," Aquiline Osená shouted. "Hold."

The shield wall wavered despite her screams, despite the way she had left the saddle and gone to stand with her warriors. And though Aquiline kept a face of calm, she was glad that the paint she wore from head to toe hid the sheen of her sweat. The fear that was seizing the shield wall was in her blood too, ice pooling in the belly. What else was she to feel, watching the Crab walking towards them one sickening step at a time? The great abomination's spindly legs, as repulsive as the scuttling legs of some vermin for all that they were taller than towers, crossed the great pit with ease. All over the carapace of stone and bone the fire-eyes burned, spewing out ever-longer tongues of flame that kept burning on the ground after falling in droplets.

When the Crab got close enough, dozens would be incinerated in a heartbeat with every plume of liquid fire.

Yet it was not the fire that had her warriors inching back, bending away from the sharply inclined pit where hundreds of their comrades had fallen to their death mere moments ago. It was the husks of steel, the strident grinding sound they made as they unfolded and slammed down. The Crab was only halfway through the pit, but already the razor-length hung in the air before the shield wall. At head-height. What shield could possibly hope to turn back such a massive blade? It would pass through the shield wall like a knife through butter, making mist of men. Three hundred feet. Two hundred feet. One hundred feet.

"Hold," Aquiline shouted again, but her voice wavered.

Her weight was leaning back as well, her body eager to flee even if her heart still hesitated. What had once been the enemy's centre was digging itself out of the ash and dust, the dead crawling out as they began to climb the slope towards her warriors, but worse than them was the enemy's reserve. It was proceeding down the slope of the pit in good order, staying in formation as it moved. The broken centre to hold us, the reserve to break us, she thought. All the while the dead tried to break the flanks and collapse the entire army. Dread seized her heart. A defeat, it would be a catastrophic- the sun was bottled out by the beat of great wings.

Her shield wall split, like fish around a shark, and a form leapt down from her mount. The crow-horse let out an eerie cry before flying away, leaving the Warden standing alone in an empty circle of warriors. The Mantle of Woe flapped at her back, the many colours of the foes defeated by the Black Queen of Callow a warning against any who would defy her, while her dreadful staff of dead wood dimmed the sight of any who beheld it – as if stealing the light of the world from your eyes. Catherine Foundling cracked her neck, and the Lady of Tartessos did not begrudge the three dozen warriors who widened the circle by taking a wary step back.

But Aquiline Osenia was Blood, and Blood did not flinch. She stepped into the circle, coming to stand by the Black Queen as no other dared. A coolly amused brown eye found her before flicking away.

"Aquiline," the Warden greeted her. "Clever little plan Keter cooked up against us, isn't it?"

"The Enemy's wiles run deep," the Lady of Tartessos replied, forcing calm.

Catherine Foundling was dangerous as a sword was dangerous: not to be feared, save when turned against you. Aquiline had learned much from her and the Army of Callow, enough to be grateful even knowing it was a boon the Grey Pilgrim had bargained for. But the fear would never entirely go away. The Warden was a graveyard made into a woman, her ghosts so many a second kingdom could be made of them for her to rule.

"Ours too," Catherine Foundling grinned, all teeth and malice. "And the Dead King will need to do better than this if he wants to get the drop on me."

The air cooled, the sun's warmth chased away, and Aquiline realized with a start that behind them the Black Queen's shadow had grown. Lengthened, broadened, until it was as a sea. Her warriors fled the spread of it, and not a moment too soon. From the shadow a massive hairy leg began to emerge, then another, as if some gargantuan creature was climbing out of the darkness.

"Ashen Gods," Aquiline croaked. "What is this?"

"An old tyrant," the Warden said, "ridden by a new god."

Roiling darkness in a gargantuan spider's shape, dripping rivulets of Night, rose to cast a shadow over them both.

"Keep your shield wall steady, Aquiline Osená," the smiling madwoman ordered. "I'll handle the rest."

—

The Tusk passed through the shield wall like it wasn't even there, turning orcs and steel alike to crumpled paste without even slowing. Light lashed out at the thick hide in a hook but though it burned through the flesh it scrabbled harmlessly against the stones below. They were just bloody stones, Hakram irritably thought. Nothing for Above to take offence to, so Light was about as useful against it as it would be against a real rock: not at all, unless a great deal of it was used. Skeletons in bronze and iron poured in the gap the Tusk had torn as it shook, turning around for another pass, but there would be none of that.

"Spears," the Warlord shouted.

They were moving before he even gave the order, Lead pulsing with his heartbeat and whispering through their veins. It kept his warriors up, quickened them, strengthened them. And it left them exhausted to the point of collapse when he left. Nothing was without a price. Two dozen spears tore into the Tusk from the sides, scraping against stone as they found purchase and the screaming monster tried to shake them off. It would not. Hakram's axe bit in the back of the beast and he used it to hoist himself up on its back, crawling through filth and rotten leather.

"I broke the gates of Okoro," Hakram Deadhand recited.

He struck. The beast screamed.

"My name echoing three rivers," he said.

And he struck. The beast's knees bent.

"And though I died an age ago," he sang through bared fangs.

And he struck again, through bone and flesh, until his axe touched stone and stone cracked.

"I live still through your shivers," the Warlord snarled, striking one last time with the might of his name in his hand

The stone split under his axe like dead wood, the Tusk's hoarse scream ending abruptly as half its body was carved straight through. Hoarse shouts of approvals, almost howls, and Hakram slid down from the felled beast. He raised his hand in an unspoken order and Dag saw to it, leading champions into the breach to close it and restore the shield wall. It was like holding together a dike, the Warlord thought. Every holed he plugged was followed by another erupting. And still his flank was doing better than Troke's, which had been so close to collapse that General Pallas had led all her kataphraktoi into a charge to stem the disaster.

Razin Tanja and Oghuz had led the foot behind them, as much because Troke needed the reinforcements as to get out of the way of the troops Yannu was shifting to support Hakram's shield wall. Already the right edge of the wall was bolstered with Alava armsmen, but the rest would be here late. So fucking late. Hakram's warriors were fighting like devils, but even with his aspect burning in his belly like a piece of coal he was not sure it would be enough. At least, though he was not the only one buried neck deep in a nightmare.

In the depths of the pit, Night warred with liquid fire and howling sorceries. Tenebrous, stolen from the ruins of Ater and granted to a lesser god as a mount, was fighting against the Crab as Catherine flew on her mount's back and hammered at the great monster's back with burning black flames. The heat of the fires was so great he could feel it on the wind even from a mile away and bursts of lightning blinded the unwary, but the smaller spider had cracked open the carapace of the larger Crab and it looked like it was trying to devour what its mandibles tore into.

Hakram was not sure what struck more horror in him: the chorus of screams that came from the Crab, or the demented screeches – which somehow echoed of a crow's caws – coming from Tenebrous. Either way, he did not envy the Dominion shield wall left behind to hold the centre. They were close enough that eardrums must be bursting from the noise.

Setting aside the thought, the Warlord returned to the fray. His battle was here, holding back the sea lapping as his wall of shields, and he had no time to spare for anyone else. It was all a whirlwind of blood and screams, steel flashing as the dead ripped out shields and threw themselves at warriors. The crawled under, ripping at flesh, ghouls leapt above shields and tore into formations. The Warlord went where the line broke, where strength sagged, and breach by breach his warband dwindled to nothing. Dead or sent to plug holes, none of the faces around him the same he had begun fighting with.

But his mind was cool, clear. His body was dripping with sweat, muscles aching and his limbs itching where they had been cut, but so long as his mind knew clarity he could make himself move. Another cut, another backhand breaking a skull, another ghouls taken by the neck and crushed. There were always more enemies, and it was with utter surprise that Hakram suddenly stood with no one before him. He turned, seeing only awe in the eyes of the warriors behind him, and found he stood alone in a ring of death.

"Report," Hakram Deadhand croaked, his voice raw from songs he did not remember singing.

"The Dominion has come, Warlord," a woman with the colours of the Graven Bones on her mangled shield said. "We stand."

The Warlord looked around. How many had died? Too many, he thought. Thousands on his flank alone. But wherever his gaze went he saw the dead losing ground, fresh Levantine armymen tearing into them.

"Let Levant handle the rest," he said. "Pull back in good order."

The Clans had done enough bleeding for the day. From the corner of his eye he noted that the shield wall left to hold the edge of the pit had pulled back and sneered. They had not even held back that paltry amount of dead, while his own faced the sea and won?

"What happened in the centre?" he asked.

"Aquiline Osenia was hit by an arrow," the same woman told him. "They say she had to be pulled back and may die."

Hakram grimaced. Well, she wouldn't be the only one today.

—

Merciless Gods but the Wolfhound could take a beating.

The other Revenant had died in moments, fending off Sidonia's assault but falling to a single blow of the Stained Sister. Barehanded, she crumpled the helmet and the head behind it. Pinon did not like the taste of her in the air, Ishaq had noticed, which meant it was likely true the Choir of Endurance had taken an interest. Regardless, that aspect of the Sisters' that lent her such brute strength was proving well worth her attitude. If only the Scourge had proved as easy a prey as the other.

A simple iron shield should not have been able to take a blow from the Barrow Sword's blade without a scar, but not a single one of them had yet to leave a mark on anything the Wolfhound wore. Ishaq had been told that the Scourge had the finest defence of all in the Dead King's service, but he had not expected to be dealing with the Keter's answer to the fucking Mirror Knight. At least, unlike Christophe de Pavanie, the Wolfhound did not strike as hard as he defended. That would have made this fight impossible instead of merely unlikely.

And Ishaq always trusted his luck to get him through unlikely, for good or ill.

"Pierce," the Vagrant Spear snarled, lunging forward.

Slower than before, though. It was her third time using the aspect, and like the last two it skidded across the side of the iron shield. Ishaq had stepped to the side as Sidonia struck and he moved to flank the Wolfhound, but the Scourge calmly took a step back and kept his sword high. Ready for a parry. The both of them continued circling each other as Sidonia panted loudly, the Stained Sister coming up to take her place. The old woman in the stained priestess garb moved like the wind and leap, but not so quick that her attempt to smash down the shield with both hands was not taken on instead. Ishaq risked a strike, a quick lunge near the neck – he was getting frustrated at never having pierced deep enough for Pinon to drink of the soul – but the parry was waiting.

The surprise came when he saw the Harrowed Witch sent her brother's ghost trailing behind the Sister and the specter threw himself at the Wolfhound's legs.

"Go," the Barrow Sword hissed. "Everyone."

The Grave Binder was looking unsteady on his feet, which meant they were running out of time to finish this. From the corner of his eye Ishaq saw movement, an arrow, but the Archer once more shot it out of the air before it could get anywhere close. Three more shots followed in quick succession, the Hawk being forced on the run by her opponent for what had to be the fifth time since the fight had begun. Ishaq put it out of his mind, trusting the Archer to cover him, and struck at the Wolfhound's back. The iron armour held but the blow broke the Scourge's poise, allowing Sidonia to slap away his shield and the Sister to land a hard blow on his helmet. It bent, ever so slightly, but the Wolfhound himself was slammed down into the dust.

The Barrow Sword, eyes wild, stabbed through the eye and to his triumph felt flesh.

"Drink," he snarled.

Pinon was every thirsty, but with his aspect behind her pull it was more than soft pulls taken from the soul. The Revenant imprisoned soul ebbed, pulled into his sword, but Ishaq's eyes widened in utter surprise when he felt the slightest ripple. An aspect. A moment later he was flying, blown off his feet, and Sidonia had a cut across her face that bled red trails down her face paint. He landed on his back, letting out a pained gasp. Pinon did not leave his hand. She never did, unless he made the decision let her go.

Ishaq rose to his feet in time to see the Stained Sister take a shield smash in the face, breaking her nose. For all her strength, she was not a trained warrior. Not like he and Sidonia were. The Vagrant Spear quickly made the Mark of Mercy and struck, bare feet padding across the dust as she used her spear to vault herself above the Wolfhound and strike at his neck from the back. But the shield was in the way, once more, as the Scourge calmly pivoted.

"Ishaq," the Grave Binder croaked out. "Not long now. Hurry."

It was slipping out of his fingers, the Barrow Sword realized. It was all so very close, and he was going to end up with nothing because his aspects were a poor match for the Scourge's. Because too many of his band had been brought for the talent that would get them out or in the fight instead of help during. The rage, the indignation, burned in his belly like acid.

"No," he hissed, even as Sidonia burned another aspect to move quickly enough to avoid being skewered.

He took a step forward, then two.

"No," Ishaq repeated, even as the halo of Light forming around the Sainted Sister was snuffed out by mere closeness to the iron armour.

Close now, close enough the Wolfhound was keeping him in sight.

"No," the Barrow Sword bit out, as Aspasia's brother was carved through and dispersed.

The spectre would reform, but not for some time. It did not matter, because now Ishaq was on his enemy and there would be no quarter. He took the shield bash on the face head on, his helm of bronze ringing, and though his nose broke he grinned through the blood and caught the Wolfhound's shield arm. The Scourge began pulling away, its strength implacable, but Ishaq smashed his bloody head into the Revenant's helm and broke the effort. He smashed Pinon's pommel into the faceplate of the helm, rocking back his foe, and in the heartbeat that followed felt a blade slide into his guts.

"No," the Barrow Sword spat into the Scourge's face, spit red, and slammed his blade through the eyehole again.

Drink, he thought again, with all his greed and rage. The aspect bit deep, bit hard, and for a glorious instant the soul came loose. Only then there was that fucking ripple, and it was all going to – Ishaq felt a faint touch on his shoulder, light as feather. He could not look, could not move in this frozen moment, but if he turned he somehow knew he would see a crow.

The offer went unsaid, but it might as well have been screamed.

"I have sold more of me for lesser prizes," Ishaq laughed, and saw in his mind's eye a pair cold smiles under silver eyes. "Take all you want."

Night flooded through his veins, blazing ice, and he tossed it blindly at the Scourge's soul. The heartbeat passed, the ripple finished, and the Barrow Sword was once more thrown off his feet. He landed roughly, bleeding and pained and well on his way to death, but he was laughing. Because the Wolfhound took a staggering step, then another, and then on the third that fucking helmet blew up in a burst of black flames. Still laughing wildly, Ishaq pulled himself up.

"How does it go again?" he said, wiping tears. "Ah, yes."

The Barrow Sword raised his blade to the sky in a salute.

"Chno Sve Noc, my darlings," Ishaq grinned though his bloodied beard.

Behind them, in the distance, one colossal monster finished ripping apart another. A great Crab reputed in a storm of flame that blotted out the sky, glassing the ground, while a gargantuan spider wreathed in Night let out victorious screeches.

"Best we get out of the army before the Warden starts stepping on it," the Barrow Sword noted, smiling back in the face of the wary looks from the heroines. "Aspasie?"

"Oh Gods I would have left like an hour ago," the Harrow Witch replied, and her sorcery snapped into place.

The same trick that had let her survive the dead, Ishaq thought with satisfaction, should be enough to get the five of them out of the army unseen before he finished bleeding out. It would be a poor end to his first deed in the Rolls, the Barrow Sword mused, to die.

Even if he got back up afterwards.

—

Lady Itima Ifriqui blinked at the messenger.

"You're certain?" she carefully asked.

"Hundreds saw it, my lady," the man replied. "It was too deep a wound for it to be cauterized by a Lantern, she had to pull back to get a healer."

Itima's mind raced. Was this Yannu's doing? Cleaning up the other threat now that the battle was turning into a victory? It was not her that had given the order. It was Razin she had in her sights, having laid a trail to have a jealous Tartessos captain who wanted Aquiline's hand blamed for it, but it should not yet have been carried out. Perhaps it was the Enemy's work and not that of the Lord of Alava, she decided. The two of them slain in a single battle would be too obvious, certain to have the Warden taking a closer look at the matter. The Gods were having a laugh at their expense, it seemed.

"Will she live?" the Lady of Vaccei bluntly asked.

The messenger hesitated, coming closer, and Itima frowned as she leant in. There were only armsmen around her, trusted Ifriqui men, but it paid to be careful. Still, it felt like theatre to – the knife moved in a blur but Itima was of the Brigand's Blood. She caught the wrist before it did more than scrape her cheek and she had a dagger sliding in the man's belly before a heartbeat had passed, twisting to make the assassin gasp in pain.

"You fool," she hissed. "You think you're the first to try? I'll keep you alive for days before you get the mercy of death."

"Honour," the man gasped, "to the Blood."

Her stomach tightened and she dropped the assassin, taking a step back and touching her cheek. A single cut. Poison.

"Healer," Lady Itima barked at her armsmen. "Get me a healer now."

Thirty men and women stood around her, the tabards over their coats of mail in the colours of the Vengeful Brigand's Blood. Loyal warriors, the finest in the service of the Ifriqui.

Not one of them moved.

Itima Ifriqui beheld the circle of steel around her which she had thought a shield a heartbeat ago but now recognized as a cage. She did not ask who, because there was only one man they would have betrayed her to: another Ifriqui. A spasm shuddered across her body, bringing her to her knees. A quick poison, Itima dimly thought. And almost painless.

Within thirty heartbeats she was dead.

—

The messenger whispered into Moro's ear and Razin watched as the man's scarred face convulsed with grief.

"Sad news?" the Lord of Malaga asked.

"It appears that my mother's heart gave, Lord Razin," Moro Ifriqui sadly said. "They think it was the hours in the heat wearing armour. Her health has been getting worse for years, but she insisted on taking the field today."

The way he said it, it almost sounded true. The woman who had murdered three of Aquiline's brothers was dead, the Lord of Malaga thought. A feud would be buried with her.

"She will have passed seeing us victorious, at least," Razin gently said. "Take comfort in that."

"There is no comfort to take in any of this, I think," Moro said, tone too raw to be a lie.

It was not, Razin reminded himself, about good and bad.

"Then why?" he asked.

Why come to me, why take my deal, why refuse to return to the tower and close the door behind you.

"I told my brother," Moro Ifriqui softly said, "that I get him home to his family."

Razin met the other man's eyes.

"We all want to go home, Razin Tanja," the man who was to be Lord of Vaccei said. "And not to fight another fucking war. So I'll do whatever's needed to get us there."

"Eyes like poison, heart like stone," Razin softly quoted.

Moro finished the verse from the Anthem of Smoke, changing only a word.

"By my hand a thousand graves sown," the Ifriqui murmured.

Silence held between them. Soon enough, a man that Itima Ifriqui had paid to kill Razin would try to do so. Rima Marave would silence him before he could speak. And when the coin was followed, it would be revealed that Careful Yannu had been the one to pay the assassin, that he had planned to kill an ally in the midst of a battle against the Dead King himself. But Razin would keep the secret, keep the Lord of Alava from being called a traitor by all of Calernia and the Valiant Champion's Blood from being dishonoured beyond repair.

He would do this so long as, when they all returned to Levant, Yannu Marave did not take up arms.

Razin Tanja watched the distant line of horizon, sitting the saddle, and wondered about the nature of change.

ruduen

Boost!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Ah, the satisfaction of knowing that some of them have actually learned. The world's not going to be the same place by the time everything is over.

And the crows seem to have learned better timing when it comes to making offers of power. There are plenty of villains who are going to have that in mind after that kind of impact.

Liliet

Reminded me of that one battle Cordelia won, by means of Sophie of Lyonis turning on her brother.

Unrecovered

Well of course they learned. Cat beat them with a stick until they either learned or died.

Also, those insane side character arcs! I expected this to be epic, but holy shit!..

Liliet

Hey, we now know Aquiline's age and she's actually younger than Cat! That's new. And a retcon I'm pretty sure.

CHNO SVE NOC HELL YEAH HELL YEAH HELL YEAH I KNEW TENEBROUS WAS TOO AWESOME TO NOT

Aquiline)=)=)= I hope she's fine!!!!!!

my god, Razin. Fucking cold, and also fucking awesome. Poor Yannu does not know what's about to hit him ;u;

dadycoool

Brings more weight to Cat calling the lovebirds her "Lordlings" if they're just kids to her.

Yup, it would be too much of a waste to just leave that massive creature lying around. Much better to turn her into Zombie the Great.

I think too many people, especially the powerful ones, like her for such a death to stick.

It's always fun for our protagonists to get their hands on a Sword of Damocles. Especially if they have no hesitation at all at using it.

Liliet

> Brings more weight to Cat calling the lovebirds her "Lordlings" if they're just kids to her.

I mean, she's 1-2 years older. That does not count when you're 20+.

The attitude is based on perceived maturity/experience gap, and it could have easily been the same with people actually older than her, which would have kept the same impact AND made it immensely funnier.

TENEBOUS!!!

ISiejek

Seems to me to likely be part of Razin's plan, he's the only one with a motive other than the dead king, and all of the dead kings lethal arrows have been stopped by archer this fight, it would be odd for her to have missed this specific one....

And obviously if it's his plot she won't die

boballab

Looks like Razin has learned his lessons from Cat well and is all grown up.

Soronel Haetir

Such a mess Levant is. I'm starting to think they'd be better off if all of the Blood were killed and entirely new leaders were found.

Konstantin von Karstein

Didn't you notice that the current Blood is trying to change that?

Ezario Gerion

But they are doing exactly that – of the old generation only Yannu is alive, now. All of the three other current heads are young adults, ready to accept the change.

boballab

It's because of what Razin was musing about. For all those years they stayed on their island in a 5 way tug of war. This was seen in the bonus chapters dealing with Tariq as a young man. Any time the Pilgrims blood became too strong they got killed off to maintain the balance and Tariq, who had been off the island fell in love with someone from another faction but that person never had left the Tower as Razin put it and so that relationship failed and the 5 way dance continued. However with the destruction of the Pilgrims blood (where did that "Pilgrims Daughter" come from since Tariq stated that all of his blood would die when he used that power) and all those fighters now seeing the world there was no way things could stay the same, it was just a matter of time and how many died at that point. It was good that Razin realized it early enough, and how the other 2 faction leaders would react, to make the necessary plans.

Sinead

The Pilgrim's daughter that Yannu refers to would have been the successor of the first Grey Pilgrim, or the first of Blood and not Deed to sit on the Tattered Throne.

D

Minor correction: Tariq didn't say it would kill all of his Blood (though he certainly knew it).

The narration said that, which (given it happened in an Interlude) is a little ambiguous as to whether it's his thoughts or an omniscient narrator. Not that it reduces our certainty of its truth – if it was the Pilgrim's belief it was absolutely a justified one, and if it was omniscient-perspective that only makes it more reliable

Cpt. Obvious

Oh, and for anyone else who like me missed the obvious...

The sacrifice of the entire bloodline was why Tariq were able to call down the star as he had already made the sacrifice of his life to anchor the ways. Without the sacrifice of the bloodline the ways would probably not have survived Akua tearing it apart in Praes. Or they might have broken immediately. What's for sure is that the falling star wouldn't have been anywhere near as devastating without the greater sacrifice.

Now as to the morality of sacrificing an entire bloodline without giving them a say that's a ugly thing to dig into.

From what's been said in the story it appears that Tariq didn't have a lot of faith in it. The last ruler (I've forgotten what the were called) that he felt was worthy was his sister. Not only was she murdered but that plot involved their brother. Before he washed his hands and walked away he had found out that their brother had actively had a part in the murder, and had then acted to smear the reputation of the father of their sister's son in order to have him imprisoned and were seeking to have him executed. All in order to crush the boy who inherited the throne.

So the Grey Pilgrim ended up killing his own brother.

Then he spends many years teaching his nephew how to rule and instilling a moral compass. Only to end up having to arrange a unfortunate death for the kid when he discovers that the money trail behind his mother's murder leads to a wealthy merchant in a neighboring nation and is planning to start a devastating war of extermination on the entire nation.

It's also been mentioned that he considered those of the bloodline that remained as mostly corrupt or even leaning towards the Gods below.

So he probably felt that it was a fair exchange. The lives of a bloodline that had gone corrupt for giving Calernia a fighting chance to survive this war against the Dead King.

nick012000

Yeah, it figures that the guy who eats the souls of the people he kills would be the first Named to get access to Night, aside from Cat.

I see that the Sisters have the dramatic timing for their divine intervention down, too.

onedollargum

Ishaq wants all the power that Cat has. Looks like he's getting a taste of each piece.

Someperson

I mean, what even is the point of making your very own dark reflection of an angelic choir if they can't give out eleventh-hour miracles for the villainous sorts?

For a reasonable price, of course.

Sir Nil

So that's how the Sisters planned on stepping on people.

dadycoool

With eight more, massive legs.

GluestickGenius

And the people will love it.

pyrohawk21

Causes, Ideals, Legacies. These are the things which the leaders of Calernia are crafting with their actions. And is there anything in all of existence harder to slay, for good or evil, than those?

Someperson

The f*ing Mirror Knight, probably 😊

Lictor Magnus

I didn't think about the fact that the dead king doesn't know what exactly went on in Praes. I don't think he knew he had to plan for a giant undead spider empress that most thought was a myth 😊.

boballab

You see that just shows that for all his age and supposed intellect, the Dead King just doesn't have any common sense because everyone else would have planned for some undead monstrosity when they fought Praes. It's not like they haven't done anything like it before, the only thing they are more famous for is raising Devils...hey if he didn't plan for Flying Fortresses and Giant Undead Monsters what are the odds...

Someperson

Next you're going to try telling me that Neshemah for some reason didn't plan for an army of sentient tigers. Old bones must be losing his touch.

KiltedBastich

Well now. Ishaq gains Night. Didn't see that coming, but his personal philosophy definitely fits the Tenets of Night extremely well. Struggle and rise indeed.

BargleNawdleZouss

I'm very glad my guess about Arthur saving the lovebirds was way off the mark. It is much more satisfying to see the Levantines handle this amongst themselves. Better yet, to show that they have LEARNED, as Tariq had hoped.

Well done as always, EE!

Krukova

Ishaq is low key my favorite character

ohJohN

He's been a gem ever since his introduction:

"hello, I hear you're the top villain, nothing personal but I'm gonna kill you now and take your place"

gets Night-slapped through two carts and a palisade

"good shot, Boss! drinks??"

sengachi

Sve Noc riding Tenebrous into combat was absolutely amazing, but I also love the cultural and political implications there. The new dark gods on the block rode a Dread Emperor into combat. In the Praesi philosophy of might makes right, that's got to be worth some major street cred and at least a few converts.

Liliet

* Dread Empress.

Giant trans spiders are valid and deserve our support uwu

GluestickGenius

Dread Empx.

We should not assume gender.

Liliet

I believe it was at first introduction explicitly specified that Tenebrous decided they were a giant female spider deep inside and proceeded to live the dream

erebus42

One could say that the late former tyrant lived the Trans, Furry dream.

Liliet

The truth.

D

The narrative has been magnificently inconsistent with the gendering of Tenebrous and as such I put it to you that the former Dread Emperor is indeed trans, but should be considered nonbinary until and unless Word of EE clarifies.

Liliet

I mean, the narrative is always from someone's perspective, and the lore specifies "giant female spider".

sengachi

Hey, now that Tenebrous is leashed, people can actually ask Sve Noc what DE Tenebrous' gender is! I'm sure plenty of Praesi historians would be interested in the answer.

Liliet

We do know the whole "female" thing was deliberately chosen, at least.

Someperson

Did Catherine accidentally invent Lolth as a lesser goddess under Sve Noc?

Sinead

I could see Tenebrous becoming the Praesi manifestation of Night, since there are not many crows in the desert.

Earl of Purple

Only if Tenebrous can get Secrets.

Which is a terrifying thought, really.

ninegardens

The the question is, did Aqualine actually get injured (totally possible), or did Razin and/or cat just deliberately arrange for rumours of her death to be greatly exaggerated, just in order to ensure no one ACTUALLY tried to go after her?

boballab

I think maybe they had Archer shoot her, no one else would be able to and trusted to hit a mark like that which would injure enough but not kill. Because of that it caused Itima to scramble and let someone past the guards without raising her suspicions.

Santiago A Duarte

They didn't need Itima to let anyone past her guards. Every one of them were traitors, she was dead as soon as she went near the battlefield.

Etin Obaseki

I don't think she got shot. The assassin just used that as pretext to get close to Itima.

Someperson

Well, that would at least go a ways to explaining why Razin wasn't apparently worried about it during the last bit of the chapter.

ohJohN

But Hakram noticed that the Levantine center was a mess, and one of his warriors reported that it was due to Aquiline being shot – she's either actually injured, or very publicly pretending to be.

Frivolous

Really happy to see aspects I didn't know before.

I'd guessed that Hakram had Lead even before this Interlude. It only made sense as he was the first Warlord in centuries. It made even more sense when I read the paragraph mentioning warriors gaining morale and strength in his presence.

It could have been Aid like Freddie but Lead seemed more likely for a villain.

Ishaq's Drink also makes sense. Sve Noc was clever to approach him, as he was to be the new villain leader in place of Catherine, and becoming his patrons would give them a wide avenue to influencing the villains of the Age of Order.

I think chances are very very good that many villains join the Night.

Very nice to see the Stained Sister and Grim Binder in action.

I'm guessing that killing the Crab gave Sve Noc a whole mountain of Night, considering how big and powerful it was. Theft-in-victory.

Note that in no way was Night defeated by Keterian magics in this Interlude. This confirms my guess that by reforging and refining Night, Masego and Akua had fixed all the exploits Keter had devised to hack Night.

I'm guessing the Stained Sister and Harrowed Witch are rivals the way Masego and Adanna are.

Archer is awesome. Hope Aquiline lives and not in a maimed way.

dadycool

I hadn't thought about how much Night Sve Noc would get from the Crab. Almost scary to think about.

Flubber

I think that Aquiline will live, but she will never be able to have children. She and Razin will rule a unified Levant together but it will not be the start of a monarchical dynasty, and so the Levantines will be more accepting of it.

Or maybe that goes against some theme that I have forgotten about.

Santiago A Duarte

That would be an oddly specific arrow wound, particularly given the power of Light, which they have plenty of lying around, including Named healers. The odds of an arrow not killing her but irreparably damaging her reproductive organs are...pretty much zero. I'm not sure it's even possible prima facie because of the Named healers around, it seems like a wound should be death or nothing for important people. It is so unlikely that I would instantly assume that they had Archer make that shot on purpose for some bizarre reason.

Liliet

I mean, they can always just adopt. Or pick a nibling.

erebus42

A foundling perhaps?

Someperson

I reckon it's especially likely that the Crows will be widely adopted by villains in the future seeing as the Liesse Accords will be banning the use of demons. Calling on Night however should be no different than calling on Light. If you are evil and want to get a bigger power in your court without pissing off the Warden then Night might be just the thing.

Sinead

I wonder if we may start seeing something rise akin to Devils for the side of Good in the sense of a limited functionality tool. Perhaps the Blessed Artificer is the one to work out such a thing.

So Good has Light and these lesser Light creatures while Villains have Night and Devils.

Earl of Purple

Spider beats crab. I love Tenebrous, glad we saw her again.

First time the Stained Sister and Grave Binder have shown up, too, though they have been mentioned. She broke Hakram's shoulder with that aspect.

dadycoool

I live for Sve Noc riding Tenebrous as a mount. Cat's influence cuts deep, apparently.

Mirror Night

Honestly, I lost a lot of respect for Ishaq that sort of arrogance and doing that BS only cause he wants a personal advancement marks him as pretty unfit for leading a squad much less all the Villains. That could have backfired massively. I suppose maybe the point is he is also part of the problem in Levant. And one must also question how much of a real reformer Razin is given this plotting. I mean I am fan of shades of grey but many were painting this guy has some sort of saint in the fandom which seems not the case.

'Ladi Williams

Point is no one is all good and all bad...
Ishaq had no choice but to risk it all if he really wanted to make a change to the way villains are treated back home...

Geno

I mean the alternative was obviously a war which would have ravaged at least part of their country. What's the life of one rather terrible person to prevent that

erebus42

Eh, total control is an illusion an even partial control is slippery at best. At the end of the day if you want to make meaningful change you have to take gambles every now and then. And while yes he did do it partly for his own benefit, he is still a force a reformation and change for Levant.

Someperson

Maybe you are right about Ishaq, but I dunno if a villainous leader without significant character defects is in the cards.

Lord Haart

Yeah I felt like this chapter was important for reminding us readers that Ishaq, for all his blustery gentility, is still very much on Below's roster. Doesn't lead his band of 5 so much as use them, but it's fitting.

Wonder

So that's where Tenebrous went.

Juff

Typo Thread:

begun a bridge > begun on a bridge weak a weak > a weak ruins behind > ruins lay behind had only disdain > had disdain sleeves her > sleeves of her escort," Sidonia > escort," Sidonia said, his being > him being back and to instead > back to instead still find > still finding out with down > out
Which he means > Which means held it the orcs. > held it for the orcs.
than human > than humans
They back > The back never finish anything > never finishing anything the passed > they passed wave curses > weave curses truced > truce rightly expected > rightly expect counted three > counted to three cover an > cover of an youmust seem > you must see this two > this to back the saddle > back on the saddle senses below > sensed below wring place > wrong place botted > blotted hestruck > he struck
name in his hand > name in his hand.
holed > hole
The crawled > They crawled another ghouls > another ghoul Sisters' > Sister's
leap, > leapt,
Witch sent > Witch had sent every thirsty > ever thirsty Revenant imprisoned > Revenant's imprisoned neck form > neck from int the > into the
as feather > as a feather reputed > erupted
Harrow Witch > Harrowed Witch

Rmac

You are using the apostrophe incorrectly.
Plurals have it after the s
Sisters'
Doesn't get used for verbs.
Revenants imprisoned

Darkening

Hell yeah kaiju fight! Magitech robocrab vs eldritch spider! That was great lol.

Bad@games

Love me some Barrow Sword, and seeing Sve Noc ride Dread Empress Zombie into battle is great as well!

daegone823

Wait so the sister got her name by being buried under dead. I hate to ask as a long-time reader. I remember her being mentioned when Cat met the newly formed villain that could sense the undead(Sixth sense, I see dead people...then cleanse them with fire lol).

Harrowed witch ran and the sister did what?

DrPepp3

The sister was a nun who got buried under the corpses of the rest of her village, and the dead didn't notice her amongst all the bodies. She didn't give up on her faith despite this, so was blessed by the Choir of Endurance and earned the name Stained Sister.

Earl of Purple

The Stained Sister survived by luck and chance, part of a monastery the Dead King slaughtered. She survived, probably injured, in a pile of corpse and then (I'm guessing here) Endurance whispered in her ear and offered her a deal, which she took.

Harrowed Witch survived by sacrificing her brother to power an illusion that would hide her from the dead.

Lord Haart

I've always imagined that with Above, it's more of a blessing in response to faith already given. It's Below who do the whispering and promises.

Or to put it differently, Above tells you the price but not the reward, Below tells you the reward but not the (full) price.

daegone823

The Drow now have a spider, I repeat the drow now have a giant spider. I wonder how the Procerans priest plan to do anything to them now that they have a giant spider. How will they stop the spread of the night religion I can almost see them begrudgingly allowing temples to the night to emerge.

erebus42

Honestly I could definately see an interesting dynamic where towns have a single priest(ess) of Light and a single priest(ess) of Night serving and dispensing alternative (sometimes conflicting) wisdom and advice.

D

To build on that: perhaps not in Procer, but in Callow I could see it coming to pass that the the two traditionally share a place of worship. A timeshare chapel, with overlapping duties at dusk and dawn, when both may be consulted together.

Gynedroid

Ooof, this is a delight. I'd be terrified of Cat using so powerful a corpse in the Dead King's demesne, but I still have hope. Perhaps it's not possible to wrest control because the Crows are proper goddesses now; alternatively, Cat has a plan anyway, and it's a hopelessly obvious trap she set that Old Bones still has to spring, which would be a nice reversal on what he pulled with the army

Liliet

So far the control wrestling w/ Dead King has only ever gone one way, the living stealing stuff FROM him. I suspect there's a reason for that.

Darkening

We still haven't seen a payoff from the comment way back that Hakram's hand could be subverted by a sufficiently skilled necromancer. Considering how central to his identity his Deadhand is, something like that would probably have a decent story weight behind it if used at the proper moment.

Liliet

I mean for that vulnerability to remain to this day is kind of ridiculous, Hakram being Named and having been in vicinity of Masego for a long tiem and all.

We did actually see the payoff from that, when Akua took over Cat's soul bindings in Liesse II.

Xinci

Razin mentions change as a relative notion, I am quite curious mainly about the depth of his realization the relativity of the concept of the tower. Since in the end in their world, it is simply a differing series of towers, growing ever larger, until one gets to Creation as a whole. Even if you go outside the tower, you simply enter a larger one with some rules under similar paradigms. Which may use to observe cultural precedents/ adaptations such as honor systems to be multifaceted in how serve particular purposes; allowing reorientation in how they work within a culture by redefining how they are perceived to be of use. There's a myriad of ways such shifts may fail, especially for what is essentially a relatively disunited confederacy transferring to a monarchical system.

I wonder if the Grave Binder always dying (well rotting?) gives him power due to seeing or having those rings act as some kind of intermediary between his soul and his body/ the rest of the world. At a baseline we know the soul affects the body, but you are always dying regardless, so presumably the power of death there is more about the interaction as a whole.

Hm so Sve Noc got to just eat both a Crab and the Dead Kings counter to the Mirror Knight defense wise. I am sure useful secrets will come from that meal, plus they now have precedent perhaps for eventual followings in the Dominion.

As a sidenote, I must say that the Undeads battle tactics were superb, or rather the way the mechanics of the worlds supported the battle was. Rocks as a counter to light is honestly a very practical clever solution for dealing with situations with enemy Light users. It matters little if they burn away the outer layer if they get hit with construct full of a ton of rocks. Praes presumably didnt do such techniques due to the prohibitive cost and likely diminishing returns in making a monster with outer shells of rock, trying to form a basis for it with devils, etc. The Dead King is uniquely one of the few with the time, knowledge and resources to really make it a good counter.

Lord Haart

Now I want Catherine to counter by using necromantic constructs full of munitions a la book 1.

It'd be amazing for her to bring out Tenebrous for the final fight against the DK only to have him steal Tenebrous, jump on, and have Catherine blow them both sky high.

erebus42

Well now, they really pulled an uno reverse on Itima there. The Crows definitely got the divine intervention thing down, and I think it will be good in the long run that they have started seeding priests in the various other nations. Honestly, this is the first we've really seen of the Grave Binder but I already love his Story and his whole deal. Granted I've always had a soft spot for necromancers -especially underdog ones.

Sykomantis

So I was 3/4 right: there WAS a crab, they DID have a trap laid under the ruins, and the crab DID come into play after the trap was sprung. It's just that the trap and the crab weren't the same thing. Kudos to EE for subverting expectations.

Frivolous

Quote from above: he Lady of Tartessos still found it wildly entertaining that Elvera had slept with one of spymasters of Procer back when they were young. She'd also been relieved it wasn't the dead traitor or the one that looked like a skeleton with dry skin hung on it, since it would have called her old teacher's tastes into question.

Comment: I'm guessing the dead traitor mentioned was Balthazar Serigny of the Silver Letters.

Can't bring to mind who the one who looked like a skeleton might have been, though. Anyone knows or can guess?

Frivolous

How foolish of me. The one who looks like a skeleton must be Louis of Sartrons.

Frivolous

Yeah, it was Brother Simon that Elvera fucked.

Quote from Interlude: Candle:

"They refused to humour me before I ventured with a band into the Brocelian," Simon said, almost nostalgic. "It was a rather fascinating experience. I met this woman, you see, by the name of Elvera. And she knew a remarkable trick."

ByVectron!

Does Ishaq get to steal the "secrets" from the Wolfhound, now that he's a follower of The Sisters? That would be such an incredible boost for a Named!

D

I'm not certain, here, but I don't think he got anything. In the end he wasn't able to properly Drink, and while he used Night for the "kill" he didn't stay to harvest any from the deaminated body. Of course, this assumes I correctly understood the rules and that they haven't changed in that respect since Night's reforging...

ninegardens

Can't help but think that Ishaq picked his proposed team based on strategy, and meanwhile Hanno is sitting there nodding "Yup, yup, you've picked 4 people who hate each others guts, sure to cause lots of angst and drama, good... yup, and you'll have to lead and unite them... good, good... and you'll be up against absurd odds that don't really make sense... mmmm, yup, sure, I can see this coming together", and then he signs off on it, and all the while Ishaq has absolutely no fricken idea about the 15 layers of story fu Hanno was calculating while signing off on that team.

KiltedBastich

Now that I think about it, Ishaq definitely needs to up his game on story-fu, if he will be expected to be Hanno's counterpart for the villains. Yet another aspect of Cat's power that he will need to learn to use for himself, continuing the trend.

arcanavitael5

Razin is a cold mofo he's learned from Cat and Tariq that was inspired, I felt the head your own rebellion school of thought with that scheme.

Hargabga

This is so so good. A 3d checkmate by Cat's student, who herself plays 5D non-Euclidian chess with gods.

superkeaton

Ishaq is a true blue Elric-stand in. Power is power, no matter the patron, and it's better to have than to not.

BargleNawdleZouss

1. After Ishaq was blessed by the Sisters and sent the torrent of Night into the Wolfhound's soul, I am mildly disappointed that he did not imitate Catherine's Finger Snap Of Doom before blowing off the Scourge's head. 😊

2. TANGENT: I enjoyed seeing Aspasie the Harrowed Witch in action again. My question is, after the necromantic assistance she provided Book 6, Chapter 19 (Spectral) in interrogating the soul of the Wicked Enchanter, did we ever see what favor she requested from Catherine in return?

AbraKadabra

Tenebrous is an it. Face it people. Not a she and Not a he anymore. It. And thats the truth.

Morgenstern

"That meant the numbers of the Grand Alliance were higher: fifty-three thousand had set out with dawn and marched to this field, all in all."

-> Quite sure that should mean: "set out with DAWN"

Chapter 55: Hail

"Nineteen: always help the treacherous lieutenant to kill your nemesis when asked. Even if it's a plot they'll likely stick the knife if it looks like you're winning."

– "Two Hundred Heroic Axioms", author unknown

Tenebrous smashed the last of the dead with unsettling glee, stomping about the undead army until there was no group larger than a dozen moving from the battlefield.

The dead did not rout, but the Dead King had decided to cut his losses and save some of the skeletons for battles to come and so the last two or three thousand scattered in every direction. The sight of it had the army cheering, the signs of victory become unarguable, but for all that that burst of enthusiasm there would be no pursuit. There was no cavalry left in any fit state to run down the enemy, and though Komena wanted to pursue the retreating bands I advised against it. There was no telling what manner of nastiness the Dead King might have waiting for her out there.

So Tenebrous returned to my shadow and the Battle of the Ruins, as General Pallas had suggested it be named, came to an end. It was a victory, but a costly one. From the first charge to the lines of the dead collapsing completely the battle had lasted barely three hours yet it was still one of the bloodier ones I'd fought over the last year.

Part of that was the nature of the armies involved. Orcs and Levantines tended to have inferior equipment to the Army of Callow, with its standard issue armour and weapons. Levantines were armed according to the wealth of the captain who led them in battle, an irregular arrangement, and the Clans were even worse. Equipment and training both varied wildly from clan to clan, though the larger ones all fielded a core of well-armed veterans as their main fighting force. On both sides, though, the average soldier didn't usually have a full suit of mail and plate was fairly rare. In a bloody, graceless brawl like the one fought today that meant casualties had begun to rack up as time passed.

The other side of the coin was Keter's forces, who in this case had boasted equipment parity at best but had the one advantage that undead could never lose: they weren't alive. Sure, the averages Bones was barely better than a Proceran levy in a fight but unlike that levy it would not tire or rout. It made Keteran armies a fucking pain to actually break, because they wouldn't run if they began to lose and they had an advantage the longer the battle continued. However unimpressive a skeleton wielding a bronze sword might be, when it was facing soldiers too tired to put up their shields in time it was going to start landing blows.

The Clans had been taught that hard lesson today. Holding the flanks against onslaughts all afternoon until Lord Yannu was able to swing around his forces to reinforce had been a bloody business and only gotten bloodier as the hours passed. Though Hakram had not yet put together a system to count casualties like the Army of Callow's, the rough estimate he'd gotten was that out of the twenty-three thousand warriors that'd sallied out only about fourteen thousand would be coming back. Almost ten thousand dead, a rough day for the orcs. The Levantines had walked away much more lightly wounded, down about four thousand warriors out of their twenty-seven. The worse off were still General Pallas' kataphraktoi, who'd had gotten themselves mauled keeping the right flank from collapsing. They'd almost half of their three thousand in furious charges,

It would be hours yet before we knew the real count of the butcher's bill, but there was no time to spend grieving. We needed to get moving, lest we be caught out in the plains come dark. First came the grim labour of taking care of the dead, warriors stripping their fallen comrades of arms and armour – we could not afford to waste any – before dragging them to make great piles. Mages and priests torched those until there was nothing left for the Dead King to use, mounds of bodies crackling bright as the afternoon crawled forward. We then left the field with what some might have called unseemly haste, but it would have been a mistake to linger.

There were still other armies out there, and the last thing we needed was to get stuck fighting them in the dark.

While I could have left the returning army in the dust, flying far ahead on Zombie's back, I led her into a landing instead and rode to speak with the victors of the day. Most cheerful of them all was the Barrow Sword, who had slain the Wolfhound and so fulfilled his end of the bargain with the Blood. He had earned a place in the Rolls. He'd also picked up another trick along the way.

"Night, huh," I mused, cocking my head to the side.

"So you can tell at a glance," Ishaq replied, stroking a beard matted with blood and dirt. "Useful."

"I'm still First Under the Night," I simply said.

That the Barrow Sword had taken the offer did not surprise me in the least, as Ishaq was brutally pragmatic even by Levantine standards, but that Sve Noc had extended it in the first place did. It had only been a matter of time before they began approaching villains, of course, but beginning with the representative for Below under the Truce and Terms was a bold statement. Maybe even more than that, I thought. The most powerful heroes all tended to have use of the Light, so granting Night to the most visible of the villains on Calernia – Neshamah and myself, anyway – was as good as slapping down a gauntlet. There was another merchant of miracles at the market, and this one a lot less squeamish than the Choirs.

If we were not at war and Calernia on the brink of annihilation, I suspected quite a few heroes would have answered that challenge sword in hand.

"I count myself in the finest company, then," the Barrow Sword grinned.

I snorted. He was in a gloatingly fine mood and I couldn't get myself to smack his fingers for it. Taking care of the Wolfhound had been solid work on his part: by itself the Revenant wasn't much trouble for our finer Named, but it was never by itself. It was always a meatshield for another altogether more dangerous Scourge, turning difficult opponents into outright lethal ones. It would have been even better if he'd gotten the Mantle, pain that she was for me to deal with, but I wouldn't look a dead Scourge in the mouth. I'd praised him enough during the report, though, so instead of reiterating and swelling his head I changed the subject.

"I hear there was a scuffle with the Blood during the battle," I idly said.

Curious dark eyes studied me.

"If Itima Ifriqui truly died of old age," the Barrow Sword said, "I will shave my beard and enter a monastery."

Yeah, hadn't bought that either. Someone had killed the old viper, though it was hard to tell who. None of the other Blood were kicking up a fuss though, not even her sons, so I was inclined to let sleeping dogs lie for now. It might be worth squeezing some answers out my ducklings later, but I wasn't inclined to get too involved if the boat wasn't rocking. Moro Ifriqui, though one-armed since the Graveyard, was popular with the Vaccei captains and on much better terms with the rest of the Blood. As far as I was concerned, Levant had traded up when he got put in charge – informally for now, until his kin Levant pushed through the same procedural trick that'd allowed Razin to become Lord of Malaga without returning there to be acclaimed.

"Not too much to be gained from digging," I mused. "The army's holding up well, which is the important part at the moment."

Ishaq was no fool, so he nodded in acknowledgement of my unspoken warning. He could have a look if he was curious, I'd tacitly told him, but only so far as it didn't endanger the readiness of the Dominion armies.

"I imagine my duties will be keeping me busy," the Barrow Sword replied.

"Good man," I pleasantly smiled.

I stayed long enough to get the tale of the fight told to me by the entire band of five, expanding on the simple report, and handed congratulations where they were deserved. Ishaq, cleverly enough, was unstinting in his praise of the Vagrant Spear and the Harrowed Witch. By doing so he was sharing the glory with a heroine in good odour with the Blood and by far the least threatening of the villains under the Terms, both strikes useful to him in the long term. He was shaping up nicely as my successor for representative, I decided. He'd been the right pick, for all that Indrani had needed to get her hands dirty to put him in place.

Speaking of Indrani, I found she was not in so fine a mood as the Barrow Sword.

"Couldn't land an arrow on the bastard," she told me, speaking of the Hawk. "It's unpleasantly good at running."

"You kept anyone important from getting shot," I reassured her. "Which was what I asked you, 'Drani, not a scalp."

"Aquiline got shot," she pointed out.

I rolled my eye.

"Not by the Hawk," I said. "That girl needs to start using a fucking shield or get better at ducking. If she gets killed by a skeleton, I may not be able to stop from laughing at her wake."

Which my finely-honed diplomatic instincts led me to suspect at least some Levantines might take offence to.

"You're all heart, Cat," Archer drily replied.

I shrugged. Aquiline would survive, the arrow had missed her lungs and they'd gotten her to a healer in time. The light armour preferred by the Slayer's Blood had its uses, I wouldn't argue otherwise after witnessing firsthand the skill of Levantine skirmishers during my Wasteland campaign, but it was ill-suited to the kind of battles the Dead King gave. She should order some good plate and get it over with before she picked up enough scars it'd ruin her paints. Gods knew today's wound was certain to leave one, mage healing or not. I left Indrani to her mood, which at least seemed to be inspiring her to scheme ways to handle the Hawk when they next met.

Hakram was easy enough to find, and though his chiefs were in a festive mood – a victory had been won today and everyone knew the Clans had done the heavy lifting – I knew that look on his face. It was the kind of calm deliberation he put on when he was trying not to openly disgruntled. I'd seen him put on shades of it more than once after Vivienne beat him at shatranj, though the shade of it today was rather more serious than that. I traded congratulations with a few chiefs, meeting Juniper's father for the first time in the process. Oghuz the Lamé was an impressive sort, all the more for being chief of a clan as powerful as the Red Shields when he needed a cane to walk.

Most orcs saw cripples as barely better than children, so he must still be a deft hand at duelling despite his age.

"I think she has your cheekbones," I told him.

"She does, the poor child," Oghuz mourned on behalf of his daughter. "At least she mostly inherited Istrid's looks aside from that."

"They make you look friendlier," I said, patting his shoulder. "Hakram's might as well be a razor blade."

The older orc looked rather charmed at that, to my surprise. I chatted with him longest of the chiefs, but he still left with the others when their Warlord implied he needed to speak with me privately. Then outright stated it, when the slower sorts failed to catch on. Eventually it was only the two of us, Hakram's face slumping into exhaustion as he met my gaze.

"Come to see how I'm holding up, I take it," the Warlord said.

The tone was a little pointed but was tired enough to fall short of being accusing.

"Something like that," I acknowledged.

I wouldn't deny that I had come as the Warden as much as I had come as a friend. Rare were the situations these days where I could afford to be only one of the two. He didn't look pleased by the reply, but I suspected he'd appreciated I had not tried to pretty it up.

"I will not falter, Catherine," Hakram said. "But will you begrudge me that I am bitter it was my people who bore the weight of the slaughter today?"

"It's why you agreed to take the flanks," I evenly replied. "Levant's twenty-seven thousand are all that's left of their armies. You have numbers they do not."

He'd brought almost thrice their number in warriors, and that hadn't even been the entire army he'd marched south to Ater. Mind you, orcs fielded a lot more warriors than most other nations since most of a clan except the young and the elderly would take up arms when there was plunder to be had. Considering how many women there were in orc warbands and their age – between twenty to forty – if the force brought to Keter was wiped out the consequences for the Steppes would be disastrous. Much worse than if the Dominion lost the entire army they'd sent to the Grand Alliance

"More died than was necessary," the Warlord growled. "We fell for the trap. I did not gainsay Yannu then and that is my guilt, but I will not forget we were left to stand alone for most of the battle."

"That's fair," I honestly replied. "I imagine General Pallas feels much the same. The course of the fight ended up going badly for both of you, so you have good reason to resent him."

So long as they didn't end up blaming Careful Yannu for malice that did not exist instead of a tactical mistake, I had no issue with some resentment existing. The Lord of Alava was a skilled general, but in this instance he'd not particularly impressed. To be honest, if it had been the Army of Callow dying on the flanks I'd likely be a great deal less gracious about this than Hakram was being.

"Pallas bled her men for us," Hakram conceded. "It was worth gratitude."

"She bled her men because if Troke's flank collapsed we were going to lose the battle," I said. "Pallas isn't exactly a bleeding heart."

She was, however, a talented tactician. She'd even correctly identified that with the Warlord holding the other flank together, it was Troke's that was in dire need of aid.

"Her reasons matter less than her actions," Hakram replied.

I shrugged. I wasn't going to argue the point if he wanted to toss thanks General Pallas' way, honestly. She was back under Helike and Empress Basilia these days, but I hadn't forgotten that Pallas and her soldiers had fought up north with the Grand Alliance years before anyone else from the League gave us the time of the day. Instead of arguing, I hummed and took a look at his Name to confirm the subtle difference I'd felt in him from the start.

"I see you picked up an aspect while you were at it," I said.

There he looked pleased.

"The traces of it were there, but it came together during the battle," Hakram said. "You can discern the word?"

"My sight's not that precise," I admitted. "Not right now, at least. I tend to see more deeply around pivots, when fate is thicker. But I can tell what it's about, more or less."

Active authority, in a local and direct sense. Not surprising for a career officer and my former right hand to pick up, especially after he'd stepped into large boots of his own by becoming the Warlord.

"Lead," Hakram said, not hesitating a moment.

I felt something in me unclench at the offered trust. For Named, aspects were cards best kept up your sleeves: keeping them hidden until they could be used to devastating effect was often the difference between winning or losing a fight.

"Try to use it," I suggested. "Let's see if I can help you feel out the limits."

It would have been a more politic use of my time to ride with the Blood instead for the rest of the way back, but part of me refused to think of that as the better use. We marched together the rest of way back, others flitting in and out but the two of us staying side by side until the camp was in sight.

—

"Fuck me," I said. "What the Hells happened to the floating siege towers?"

Vivienne looked grim. Given the wreckage I was looking at, she had good reason to. Keter was an island of stone surrounded by a deep chasm that was broken by only four bridges, which were the natural path to take when trying to take the city. Because we weren't raging idiots, we expected that the Dead King would use them to funnel our armies into narrow killing zones for as long as possible and then collapse them the moment there was a risk of us actually taking one of the gates. We'd prepared for that eventuality – it was not happenstance that none of the three most powerful mages in the Grand Alliance had left the camp – but it'd always been understood that the gates were unlikely to fall to us.

That was why Praes had turned floating structures into great siege towers, so that we might broaden our assault.

"Two were sunk," the Princess replied.

I grimaced, but to be blunt I was not surprised.

"There's a reason we didn't fill them with troops from the start," I said.

Only enough to secure a beachhead on the walls, no more. Otherwise we risked pissing away a few thousand soldiers to exactly no gain whatsoever.

"Two touched the walls," Vivienne continued. "Masego kept most of Keter's counter-magic off them for long enough."

"That's impressive," I said, "but since I'm not looking at a wall flying our banners, I'm going to assume that something went horribly wrong."

"We still have one tower," she sighed, brushing back a strand of brown hair.

"I hope to Below you don't mean that one, Vivi," I replied, pointing forward.

The outer rampart of Keter had been, in a manner of speaking, breached. Someone had seen fit to smash the floating siege tower into said wall, hard enough that it had gotten embed into said wall. It looked, I thought, a little like a knife dropped into a bloc of butter and jutting out. Except for the part where it was all stone on both sides and several tons of it were involved. The 'bottom' of the tower was extending far enough out of the wall that it really should have snapped off or dragged the whole thing into the chasm by now, which meant the enchantments keeping the structure aloft still partially worked. It was an oddly disturbing sight.

Princess sighed again.

"The assault went well at first," she told me. "We pushed across two of the four bridges, and though Keter spared neither arrows nor sorcery we reached the gates. The siege towers were torched before they could cross, but the ladders and the rams got through."

"So when we started knocking at the gates, Keter dropped the bridges," I predicted.

She nodded.

"We sent heroes under the bridges first, to try to prevent that, but Pickler believes that there is no outside mechanism. The bridges were built from the start with foundations under the city of Keter that could be brought down," Vivienne said. "It was old work, regardless, and played out differently on the two bridges."

I could see one of the two from where we stood, the fortified camp surrounding Keter as a ring of flame from all the torches and bonfires lit in the night. The arch of stone was missing its forward half, leaving the gate of Keter to stand over a sheer cliff.

"The Witch should have been able to handle that," I said, nodding there.

"She did," Princess replied. "She held the stones aloft long enough for our forces to retreat through them. And on the other side Sahelian negated the Enemy's work."

I cocked a curious eyebrow.

"Only a section in the middle collapsed," Vivienne said, "splitting the army in two and stranding the vanguard. She filled the gap with ice."

I sniffed in disdain. Someone was cribbing from my tactics. I'd started that whole ice thing in Dormer, long before anyone else got famous for it.

"So we kept up one of the bridge assaults and landed two towers," I mused. "Still a solid enough offensive. I take it that's when it started going wrong?"

"The Tumult came out to duel Hierophant to keep him from protecting the towers," she replied. "And Keter counter-attacked with wyrms."

I blinked. Those were great snake-constructs that'd only rarely seen use out of Twilight's Pass, being the Dead King's equivalent of our Praesi floating siege towers. The massive snakes were armoured and had ladders inside, which the dead could climb after the wyrms hooked themselves to the edge of the wall with steel and bone. What use could they have-

"He crammed his siege towers into our siege towers, like a snake forced into the maw of a larger one," I breathed out, putting it together.

It was both utterly wasteful of manpower, I thought, and brilliant in a twisted way.

"It kept us from landing a beachhead on the walls," Vivienne said, "and once he had us pinned, the Seelie came out."

Masego insisted that what that Scourge did was 'fascination', a form of enchantment, but it was pretty much mind control whatever he wanted to call it. So the Dead King had kept us contained to small tunnels with no real room to manoeuvre than then unleashed the fucking mind control fairy on the people inside. Yeah, I can see that turning nasty. Just for a bit, though. After that, it'd be sure to summon...

"The Blade of Mercy and Daring Pyromancer ran into her," Vivienne continued. "The Seelie got the Pyromancer, but the Blade cut the spell out of him and they set fire to the wyrm. It made her retreat, but ended up being something of a tactical mistake."

Setting fire to tightly enclosed spaces full of people who couldn't easily get out tended to be that.

"How bad?" I grimaced.

"Almost two thousand dead, more from the stampede and the smoke than the fire," Vivienne said, "and the dead got to the heart of the tower in the chaos."

"So that's how it got crashed," I frowned.

"No," Princess shook her head. "They tried to make them crash into each other."

Her description of what came after that was nightmarish. The Praesi mages controlling the other tower had seen the threat coming and tried to withdraw, but the wyrm inside had fought the movement. The soldiers inside panicked as the dead kept pouring in, meanwhile the other tower rose higher could it could be smashed down like a child banging rock down at another. Fortunately, the Black Knight had led a band through daring strike into the grounded tower to remove the wyrm using some acidic creation of the Concocter's that would dissolve it from the inside. It would have still failed, if Hanno and his own band had not stepped in to settle the other tower.

"How did they even get into it?" I frowned. "It should have been fully in flight by then."

"The Mirror Knight," Vivienne said.

"Sure, throwing him is the traditional opening gambit," I acknowledged. "But after he landed – wait, are serious?"

She nodded, lips twitching.

"They bound themselves to the Mirror Knight and had him thrown by a trebuchet, using him to pierce through the siege tower's walls," Princess said.

I paused.

"I know it's in poor taste to complain when they're on our side," I said, "but sometimes I do get a little irritated at how they keep getting away with this shit."

After that they'd fought their way through the dead and taken back control of the tower, holding it up long enough that the other one was able to get away. The turnaround was not to last, though, since the Tumult slipped past Masego and crippled the enchantments keeping the tower up. It began to crash.

"How'd they get out?" I asked, morbidly curious.

"For a very brief moment the falling tower and the one withdrawing were aligned, with only a gap of a dozen feet between where one ended and the other began," Vivienne said. "So they..."

"They jumped," I said, rubbing the bridge of my nose. "They jumped out the falling tower into the other one, like assholes."

Vivienne's blue-grey eyes betrayed some amusement at my expense.

"He's not even really Named anymore, he's transitioning," I complained.

"I'll be sure to bring the matter up at the next war council," Princess replied, serenely smiling.

My lips twitched, and the two of us stood there in silence for a while. Staring at the dark silhouette of Keter in the distance. The humour slowly melted away.

"How many?" I asked.

"At least sixteen thousand dead," Vivienne softly replied. "And I hear your battle was closer than anticipated."

"Fourteen thousand dead or thereabouts," I said. "The enemy got clever with a sand trap and mauled our flanks. The Clans soaked up the worst of it."

At least thirty thousand dead between the battle and the storm, huh. I stood there and let myself grasp that, the sheer number of soldiers we'd gotten killed in a day. I had fought entire campaigns where I had lost fewer men than died today. And it was only going to get worse. None of us had truly expected this assault on the walls to work, deep down. It was a first probe, to see how heavily defended the Crown of the Dead was. Almost two hundred and fifty thousand soldiers had come here to break the end times before they could break us. Nine more attacks like this and we'd run out of men.

We hadn't even managed to set foot inside the fucking city.

"It'll look better tomorrow," Vivienne finally said.

"No it won't," I murmured.

A moment.

"No it won't," my friend admitted.

So we stood there in silence, sharing company, until fear had dulled enough we could crawl into our beds to sleep.

Droughtbringer

<https://topwebfiction.com/listings/a-practical-guide-to-evil/>

Darkening

If you wanna get technical about it Cat, Masego was the first one to make a bridge out of ice all the way back in summerholm to get out of a burning room.

Liliet

Akua wasn't there!

Okay, fine, she wasn't at Dormer either...

dadycool

Damn that Butcher's Bill. It sounds to me like they traded 30k soldiers of varying value for effectively a single Scourge. It's not exactly a BAD trade, considering it's a Scourge and all the Notables on our side survived, but it's certainly not a good one either.

And lol at Mirror Knight, the Eternal Hammer.

Lord Haart

Also got a Crab, the only one there.

They should go ahead and destroy the two other bridges. Then Providence will give them some other way to cross.

onedollargum

First day's the hardest.

*arcanavita*15

"They jumped," I said, rubbing the bridge of my nose. "They jumped out the falling tower into the other one, like assholes." This got me laughing so hard.

shikkarasu

I will never tire of Cat reacting to Heroic bands and their "Calculated Risks".

Bæring

"Fortunately, the Black Knight had led a band through daring strike into the grounded tower"

Do you mean the Red Knight or did i miss something?

ByVectron!

Unless something changed, the new Black Knight is an orc you may know as Marshall Nim.

Crash

an Ogre.

ByVectron!

Orc – ogre, gnome – goblin, Cat – dwarf: they're all nearly the same thing, right?

Crash

Look mate, there's like 4 named Ogres tops and only 2 of those have last names. Pretty sure Nim's the first Named one in Calernia. Let them have this, they need it very, very badly.):

Abrakadabra

No, they dont. What they need is to live in peace, and not fight other peoples wars.

Snappy270

This is rough.... I'm sure they will win eventually, but 30000 in one day. How are they celebrating a victory ? There was a time when that was Callow's entire army. If they killed another scourge and made an opening maybe

Mirror Night

Its times like this when I wonder how a lot of these countries even have enough troops to fight. The series have been having on and off wars for years now at this point. Quite frankly it shocking they even have the numbers to afford to lose 30K. I suppose demographics might not be the strong point for EE.

Snappy270

I mean it's the war or death for them. And EE do say that Levant only has 27000 left. Which makes sense from the 80000 they started with at the beginning of the crusade. Levant never resupplied their armies cause they couldn't being such a small nation. Procer has nothing left for several generations. Callow also hasn't truly recovered, but did steal an army.

While the new armies are relatively untouched, the league fought in princes graveyard and their own civil war neither that bad.

One day I will see a post from you not trying to nitpick EE

Magicturtle

What a weird thing to complain about...

Branwen

There's a bit in The Art of War where Sun Zi discusses being surrounded thus:

"Throw your soldiers into positions whence there is no escape, and they will prefer death to flight. If they will face death, there is nothing they may not achieve. Officers and men alike will put forth their uttermost strength.

Soldiers when in desperate straits lose the sense of fear. If there is no place of refuge, they will stand firm. If they are in hostile country, they will show a stubborn front. If there is no help for it, they will fight hard."

So the answer is probably that they celebrate a victory for the same reason they're willing to fight to the death in the first place. Every member of the army knows they're trapped, and they've no choice but to seize victory from the jaws of death. Mourning the dead can come later, once they've done their damnest to make sure they won't join them 😊

As an aside, I'm very curious for this reason if the Dead King doesn't have some further plot behind shattering the ways. It seems enormously risky to essentially trap your enemies in a fight to the death when breaking their morale is more than sufficient to win. Does he maybe plan on offering the troops a chance to flee after killing off enough of them? 😊

Mincheriit

They aren't fully celebrating. Some of the army that split off the repel undead armies are celebrating essentially surviving a clusterfuck of a fight, this is before they rejoin the main siege which I don't think is celebrating beside maybe some who had very close calls or the type of celebrating to distract from the dire situation.

Soronel Haetir

Sounds like it's about time for some of that Providence that Cat's always bitching about.

'Ladi Williams

You mean the one that allowed the use the mirror knight as a door opener on a door kilometers up in the air? or that allowed them jump from one tower falling to another that was floating?

wec

I greatly enjoy that all the major tactical uses of the Mirror Knight are slapstick comedy routines.

Liliet

At least he's no longer the only butt of the joke. I'm sure he appreciates that.

M0och123

I do love Cat's eternal irritation for Heroes succeeding by the thinnest of margins even when they are on her side.

Oof over 10% casualties on the first day is not what you want out of a siege. Definitely not a good trade, even with the addition of a scourge kill.

I should also note the plethora of typos is slightly concerning... hope EE is doing okay...

shikkarasu

EE is trying to make the finale satisfying, while also keeping it 'on schedule'. That has to be stressful, and must be eating into proofreading time for each chapter. This is surely the hardest part of this 6+ year long journey so far.

Speaking only for myself, I would be OK with EE taking a mid-book break to destress, go over the plan, and maybe build a 2-3 update buffer for sanity sake. I like to think 9/10 of us are patient and more concerned with EE's health than the update schedule.

Letouriste

I mean, most web novels worth reading only update once every weeks or month. EE is doing a crazy work schedule and still manage to produce such a good and entertaining story.

I think we would all be okay to wait several months without chapters if it bring us a good ending. Without even talking about mere weeks.

BargleNawdleZouss

Speaking only for myself, I will be fine if Book 7 deals with the fall of Keter and the defeat/final resolution of the Dead King, and THEN we get Book 8, which will show the foundation of Cardinal and the beginnings of the bittersweet Ever After. This, of course, means that there would be seven Books...and One.

Very Babylon 5, with the final season dealing with the aftermath. IYKYK! I've been imagining the Gods of Above and Below as the Vorlons and Shadows, respectively. 😊

shikkarasu

OK, I know EE has another series planned for post-guide, but this? Please? I would Devour an epilogue book of arbitrary length that is just Catherine & co. dealing with the politics of Proto-Cardinal, wrangling Transitionary and other greenhorn Named, and occasionally catching up with the Queen of Callow or Warlord and begging for stories of life or death struggle.

"It was a straightforward engagement, I don't want to bore you with the details."

"Hakram, I haven't stabbed anyone in 8 months or even made vague plans to. Tell me everything."

Zachary A Sloan

He should just mention the FF14 expansion and tell everyone to play it for a few weeks while he takes a break

Adrian_V

So who wants to bet the Herald will appear with not only the supplies but with reinforcements at some point?

Same with the Titan that Hanno contacted (the last Titan i think it was), i mean i bet he will do something at some point, could be is even related to the above (transporting the supplies and an extra army) or maybe he repairs the ways somehow.

BargleNawdleZouss

I'm anticipating that the climax will feature the Herald plus supplies and reinforcements; Kreios the Riddle-Maker; the elves finally get off their asses to contribute (partly as an effort to get rid of Hye Su the Ranger, who ALSO shows up); help from the Baalites and the Yan Tei; and even the gnomes make an appearance.

Crash

If Hye shows up she's likely to die immediately after to be honest. Archer is aiming for her Name and that requires both a massive pivot and a vacancy.

Possibly, she gets risen by the Dead King soon after that. Finally finishing their little side banter.

Abrakadabra

The elves Just escaping reality. Like literally, they Just transitioning into The feylands with their territory.

Juff

Typo Thread:

that that > that averages Bones > average Bones
who'd had > who'd
They'd almost half (missing words)
my heat > my head
Neshamah and myself > after Neshamah and myself out my ducklings > out of my ducklings to openly > to look openly to the Grand Alliance (missing fullstop) the rest of way back (should remove to avoid repetition) gotten embed > gotten embedded bloc of butter > block of butter than then > and then
I can see > I could see could it could > so it could through daring > in a daring are serious > are you serious council," Princess > council," the Princess

ohJohN

Not exactly a typo but:

"At least thirty thousand dead between the battle and the storm, huh. [...] Almost two hundred and fifty thousand soldiers had come here to break the end times before they could break us. Nine more attacks like this and we'd run out of men."

(30k dead) = <220k remaining
 $220k \div 30k = 7\frac{1}{3}$ more attacks like this before they run out

Technically, yeah, 9 similar engagements would bleed their forces dry (and then some!) but I'm guessing it was originally written as '300k soldiers had come' and the math was based off that, but later it was edited down to 250k after checking notes.

Besides: this is an excellent opportunity for "7 attacks and 1 (final, desperate stand by the few remaining companies)" 😎

ohJohN

oh whoops, WordPress ate some of my math, it was supposed to be:

(<250k soldiers initially) – (≥30k dead) = <220k remaining

Gynedroid

Aquiline got shot by a skeleton? Huh. I thought skeletons didn't use bows and arrows much, too difficult to maintain? Preferred spears/javelins

Then again, this close to Keter, it's probably easier to do so.

...Or it wasn't a skeleton...

Konstantin von Karstein

The undead on campaign don't use bows, either because they're Bones (so too dumb) or because it demands too much care to stay in a good state or need frequent replacements, which would mitigate the advantage conferred by simplified logistics. I imagine there's only Binds on the walls of Keter, and logistic obviously isn't a problem.

braxen1

You know Istrid being mentioned this chapter reminds me of another battle where people were poisoned by their own side.

Did we ever find out who killed most of the generals when they were fighting Akua in Laure?

It wasn't Cat and I remember a chapter where Alaya was saying it's too bad someone else killed Istrid.

It probably wasn't Akua since I think she would have said something about it at the start of her redemption arc.

Was it Amadeus? He could betray his loved subordinates for the sake of a plan, but Istrid was already 100% his.

Lord Haart

I don't recall if it was confirmed, but fairly sure it was the Matrons.

Cat was dismissive of their assassins but think they might bite her (or Above forbid Pickler) for that.

braxen1

You know Istrid being mentioned this chapter reminds me of another battle where people were poisoned by their own side.

Did we ever find out who killed most of the generals when they were fighting Akua in Laure?

It wasn't Cat and I remember a chapter where Alaya was saying it's too bad someone else killed Istrid.

It probably wasn't Akua since I think she would have said something about it at the start of her redemption arc.

Was it Amadeus? He could betray his loved subordinates for the sake of a plan, but Istrid was already 100% his.

Kildare

Iirc it was hinted that it was the goblin matrons

Daniel E

I think we may actually see Christophe make a transition during the final battle. Mirror Knight no longer, he shall hence forth be known as Angry Bird.

Mary Gentle

It's not a complaint, exactly, because this was done very well, but I think I'd have liked the battlefield action in this chapter, and then – next chapter – “back at the wall” done in real-time, from someone else’s point of view.

There may be a very good reason for having events back at the gates summarised, in terms of what we’re going to see there later on, though Cat’s or someone else’s eyes. Still . . . I wouldn’t want to see things done in summary just because not doing them in summary would make the book longer.

(Count me in as one of the ones who wouldn’t object if the author needed a break for a bit. OK, I’d whine, moan, and whimper twice a week when there wasn’t a new chapter, but that shouldn’t be construed as an actual complaint.)

ninegardens

I think by having it summarized, and indirect, we get to have a “Light” “fun” chapter, to offset the tense battle scene. If we had both battles live on screen, we would have had pure tension, so the “hearing it second hand” mainly serves to convert a tense battle into a chill catch up with friends...

Which I imagine will be VERY necessary for the tone and passing going forward.

Titan

This is actually the chapter I caught up on! Ages ago when the first chapter of this book was published, I wanted to really enjoy the books again so I reread all of it from the start! One of my favorite things to do was liking every single chapter 😊

This is by far my favorite work of fiction!

Thank you for working so so so hard I am going to become a Patreon to support you.

Keep writing! I look forward to the end of this series, and the start of the next.

I daydream about reading a series all about Cardinal and the new world order.

Adam

The quality of this entire story is ridiculous for a web novel. Typos exist but the quality of this story is astonishing. Thanks for letting previously broke people like myself read too. Subscribing/donating today.

Kojo

Hi Everyone, could someone provide me with the link to EE's other story. Thanks.

shikkarasu

<https://palelights613694448.wordpress.com/2021/02/25/chapter-1/>

Rabblrouser

That after action report managed to be hilarious and depressing in such short order.

Chapter 56: Brink

"Note: while curiosity did kill the cat, the effect only ensued when it was so strongly imprinted in the mind as to overwrite motor functions. Human experiments reproduced the results, leaving what would set cats apart unclear."

– Extract from the journal of Dread Emperor Malignant II

The Grand Alliance taken a swing in the face, but we'd get over it. That was the way these things went, really. You rolled with the black eye, threw sand in the other guy's face come next round and stabbed them good in the belly while they were blinded. I told Vivienne as much when we discussed what should follow our 'victories' over breakfast. Her milkmaid braid was undone, falling down her back, and she started blearily at me over porridge she insisted on touching up with honey for some godforsaken reason.

"Have you considered," Princess said, "that the unreasonable number of brawls you've been in might be making your metaphors baffling to anyone remotely normal?"

Indrani, seated between us, finished scarfing down her sausage and licked her fingers before shaking her head at Vivienne.

"Nah, her stuff is always easy to get," Archer said. "You're off on that one."

My successor cocked an eyebrow at me as I winced. Ah, 'Drani. Even when trying to help, she ended up verbally socking me in the stomach like usual. It was a fair point that if Archer and I were on the same wavelength, there might be a little too much brawl in my metaphors.

"No, Vivienne is entirely correct," Hierophant absent-mindedly said. "When Catherine gets started it sometimes turns into rather mystifying jargon."

I grinned, cocking an eyebrow at Princess, whose turn it was to wince. Yeah, Masego was agreeing with her. I wasn't the only one with a would-be helper tying stones around my feet. Hierophant's notion of commonly understandable conversation was about three years if magical study removed from any halfway reasonable expectation. Draw, Vivienne mouthed at me, and I inclined my head. I could have tried for the win, but if Indrani caught on to what I was doing she was most definitely enough of a wench to go out of her way to sink my chances.

"Look, my perfectly serviceable metaphors aside the situation's not that bad," I said, allowing myself more frankness than I would in a war council. "The hourglass is emptying when it comes to supply, sure, but none of us actually expected our first shot at the walls to win us Keter."

"I did expect us to land on the walls, however," Masego noted. "Which we did not."

I sighed, not arguing the point because he wasn't wrong. Sixteen thousand dead without a single foot being set atop the walls of Keter was not great for morale. The reports from the phalanges and the Jacks I'd read over while drinking my tea had been pretty clear about that: even the Army of Callow's spirit had been bruised by yesterday's battles. It was unsurprisingly worst of all the Grand Alliance in the Proceran forces, which still sported a number of levies. The conscripts had been hardened by the years of fighting, but they'd never be as steady as career soldiers.

"Like I said, we took a swing in the face," I told him. "But we have a better idea of Keter's defences now and the next assault we'll mount will punch through the defences."

While the Confederation of Praes did not have a Warlock it did have an informal leading mage, Lady Nahiza Serrif. She'd been set to the task of overseeing the Praesi mages during the battle, backing up Masego's defensive spellcasting to shut down Keteran ritual, but she'd had another duty and she'd discharged it successfully: we now had an estimate of what Legion doctrine called the 'spellfire volume' of the Dead King's forces. As laid out by now-general Grem One-Eye's Considerations, spellfire volume was the total amount of sorcery than an opposing force was capable of mustering at once.

It didn't necessarily translate into superior strength in practice, since for example a smaller cadre of casters capable of High Arcana might well overpower a significantly larger group of less-trained mages that could technically deploy more sorcery.

What it did give us, though, was an estimate of the enemy's maximum strike capacity and how much of our own mages we should keep in reserve to defend. In this case, the answer was looking to be a little over two thirds of our casters. That was still a lot of strength loose for us to deploy, which meant a lot of the plans we'd been keeping back were now looking to be viable.

Committing the greater Praesi fortresses, for one, but also Chancellor Alaya's battlefield applications of Still Water. And since we could deploy these with an expectation that we wouldn't just be throwing away irreplaceable assets, it meant we could start using our trump cards to make openings for them. No, yesterday had been a black eye but it'd not been a total loss.

"And when's that going to be?" Indrani asked, curious. "We're going to be with the besieging force this time, yeah?"

"We are," I confirmed. "We'll have to discuss in council who takes their turn sallying out to keep our back clean, but I'm pretty sure it's going to be the League with some Proceran reinforcements."

Even after the Principate had spent years being ravaged, it still had by far the largest cavalry contingent of all the nations of the Grand Alliance. After the casualties her cataphracts had taken at the Battle of the Ruins to keep Chief Troke's flank from collapsing, Basilia was sure to want to use someone else's cavalry on the field.

"Nice," Archer said. "Been talking with Alexis about a trick we could use on a Scourge, it'd be interesting to try out. Doesn't tell me when we're taking our crack at it, though."

"I don't know yet," I admitted. "Not for a few days at least. We need to see to our wounded and let the soldiers rest for a bit."

Much as I disliked waiting, given the dire state of our supplies, you couldn't repeatedly send armies into the meat grinders and expect them not to break. We'd prepare for the assault and get it going as soon as morale had solidified.

"Good," Masego said. "I have begun studying the damage the fallen tower made to Keter's wards when it fell through the wall, but it is a difficult matter and enemy interference complicates it further. Time will help."

"Doesn't it always?" I easily replied.

It was the most precious resource, when making war, and always the scarcest. I left that breakfast in a better mood, some of the gloom for last night shed now that I some sleep in my body and a semblance of a path forward. I spent two days conferring with Named and generals, laying out the skeleton of the assault to come, and Hierophant even tossed some good news our way. The fallen tower, while it might not have destroyed the wards that made it unfeasible to reduce the walls of Keter by sorcery, had weakened several sections of them. That knowledge allowed me to add some flesh to the bones of the plan, Juniper further refining it.

And then we had trouble.

—

It had now been five days since the Battle of the Ruins, and it'd gotten bad enough that we'd had to call a war council over it. It drew raised eyebrows when I brought General Abigail instead of Juniper as my second, but everyone there had concerns great enough it didn't even end up warranting a spoken question.

"If we were not stranded," First Princess Rozala Malanza frankly said, "half my army would have deserted by now."

I winced. The Jacks had told me it was bad, but not quite that bad.

"I've had conversations with the Stygians and the Penthesians that bordered on threats to walk," Empress Basilia admitted. "And if they do walk, others will follow."

"It's not the nobles we have to worry about, it's the rank and file," I flatly stated. "We can hang a few aristocrats and the rest will fall in line, but we can't hang an army into being fighting fit."

"Threat of death will do little," Chancellor Alaya agreed, "when most of the Grand Alliance's soldiery is now convinced it is going to die anyway."

Which they were, and Gods forgive me but I couldn't even blame them. Our supply situation had been known for some time by select officers – inevitable, since we were already rationing and there were now about two weeks of food left – but we'd kept a lid on the real sucker punch: the dwarves weren't going to be supplying us with anything. The deal with the Herald of the Deeps had fallen through and his replacement, Lady Sybella, was perfectly willing to leave us to die until we bent to the even steeper terms she'd offered. Soldiers weren't always the most learned of people, but most of them could do simple mathematics.

There were two weeks of food left, none more around or coming, and it had taken more than two weeks to get to Keter through the Twilight Ways. Which were, anyhow, shattered.

The realization that even if by some miracle Keter was taken quickly enough everyone the Grand Alliance had brought north was likely to starve to death in the aftermath had been a knockout blow in the wake of the black eye caused by our first failed offensive. Morale had cratered, and even in the Army of Callow some soldiers had refused to leave their tents and attend their duties. We'd come down hard on those, hard enough that it'd not spread, but it was all balancing on a knife's edge. The Legions had held up about the same, but the less disciplined armies had not. Most of Procer's fantassins were no longer taking orders and Hakram was so busy cracking heads to keep the Clans in line he almost hadn't been able to come today.

Of all forces only the Lycaonese had been unaffected, instead throwing a feast they'd called a 'wake' where they got drunk and spoke each other's eulogies before declaring themselves already dead and sworn to fight Keter to the last. Even Cordelia had gotten proper sloshed, I'd heard, which I was rather sad to have missed.

"Our captains are petitioning to know of the terms the Kingdom Under asked and why they have been refused," Lord Yannu told us. "That part, at least, appears to remain unknown."

"Have any of you learned where the leak came from?" Rozala asked.

I grimaced.

"I have," I admitted. "The phalanges found the source."

That had the entire room's eyes swivelling towards me, save for one pair. General Abigail Tanner stood like a woman headed for gallows with her name written on the rope, the perpetual dark rings around her eyes standing out even more starkly for her bleak expression. With those watery blue eyes and that frazzled hair she looked like she hadn't had a good night's sleep in a year, which might well be the truth. I flicked a glance at her, nodding. She cleared her throat.

"It was the Third Army," General Abigail said. "I have standing orders for my Supply Tribune to underreport our stocks in food and goblin munitions, which made it stand out more obviously when it was on record we were a week away from running empty and we still didn't get sent anything."

It was very much against regulations to do what she'd just described, the underreporting so the Third would be sent extra stocks, but she wasn't the only one who worked her numbers along those lines. The adjunct secretariat had dug deep and found she and her officers weren't skimming, just using the extra stocks as a reserve in case supply was shaken, so she'd gotten off light. Some docked pay, a reduction of her pension and Juniper had pretty brutally chewed out. She'd blushed red enough at the screaming it had shown even on those sunburnt cheek, but the pension reduction had actually brought tears to her eyes.

That was the internal discipline of the Army of Callow, though. The problem that'd begun in her backyard had ended up much larger than that.

"How did it spread from there, general?" Razin evenly asked.

I replied in her stead.

"Her Supply Tribune's subordinates began asking questions and they found out that no space had been cleared in our camps for the arrival of fresh supplies," I said. "It was a small leap from there, and the shock of the realization was enough that several got drunk and loosened their tongues. From there, it was the simple spread of soldier's gossip."

It was unsurprising it'd spread across camps. The Grand Alliance armies were encamped close to one another and shared common walls, turning the fortified ring into something like a city of tents. With soldiers having little to do but gossip given the general idleness of a siege between assaults, the moment rumours began to spread it was a given they'd take like wildfire.

"It was my officers, so it's my fault," General Abigail said. "Can't take that back, but I offer you my apologies and my resignation."

Her tone had gotten, I thought, slightly hopeful by the end of the sentence. Though I would have liked to simply refuse her offer, it wasn't that simple. I didn't entirely have the leverage to make that decision alone, not when it was the Army of Callow that'd leaked the secret that got us into this mess. If the rest of the Grand Alliance wanted her resignation, I'd have to give it.

"It would change nothing," First Princess Rozala said. "The cat is already out of the bag."

"It might make things worse, truly" Empress Basilia noted. "Turn her into a figurehead for the resentment to gather behind."

Yannu was less convinced.

"Is she to escape punishment, then?" he pushed.

Razin shot me a shrew look.

"Has the Army of Callow already dealt out discipline?" the Lord of Malaga asked.

"It has," I said. "No demotion, but docked pay and pension as well as some other disciplinary measures."

An argument could be made that under some regulations she should be whipped, but I wasn't sure I wanted to go there. It'd make the Third Army boiling mad if Abigail the Fox was whipped in front of our assembled soldiery.

"She should be punished for failure of command, not the mistakes of her men," Prince Otto bluntly said. "That is her crime. Going any further would be unjust."

The general's face fell and I suppressed a smile. You're not getting out of command that easily, Tanner. Yannu Marave remained displeased and Rozala actually seemed like she was leaning his way in practice, whatever her words, so I threw them a bone by having her added to the latrine-digging duty rotation for a week. Neither of them were actually out of blood so they were satisfied with the light humiliation, though they really should have figured out that it would only make her more popular with her men. Soldiers liked seeing generals get their hands dirty. Being born a noble came with some blind spots, I mused.

It wasn't like a brewer's daughter would be all that concerned with her lordly dignity.

Crestfallen, General Abigail retreated behind me and we moved on to the thick of the meeting. What the Hells were meant to do about any of this.

"We should make the price asked by the dwarves public," Empress Basilia suggested. "The anger should turn sentiment around."

"That's a risk," I grunted.

Rozala agreed.

"If despair wins over anger, we might well be forced to agreed to the terms of the Kingdom Under by our own armies," the First Princess said.

Yannu and Razin backed her on that, the Lord of Alava frankly stating that most the Dominion captains would not hesitate to clamour for the bargain to be struck since Levant was ceding no territory.

"Should part of our army agree while another does not, the discord could get out of hand," Chancellor Alaya said. "We cannot afford to be fighting each other instead of the dead."

The problem was that no one really had a solution. Our soldiers were rebellious because, well, we were in a fucking terrible situation. If the dwarves hung us out to dry, we were all going to die whether or not we took Keter. Or even worse, some of the most powerful nobles would make it out while everyone else died. That thought would be like tossing a lit match at oil, if it spread widely enough.

"We need to secure our supplies with reliable soldiers," Hakram said. "Else we risk of deserters attempting to grab food and take their chances with the Ossuary."

"Wise," Empress Basilia said. "Though that is only a temporary salve. We need a way to turn morale around."

And there were some ideas, so we broke up and set about trying them. First was Rozala's own notion of spreading rumours of our own to flip sentiment: namely that we intended to invade the Serenity once Keter was taken, which was farmland bearing plentiful food. It worked some, but it was an obvious ploy and our soldiers weren't dumb. There was no guarantee the Serenity would have reserves, that we would be able to reach it and to be honest a lot of the rank and file were wary at the prospect of eating anything that'd been grown in a Hell. It wasn't enough. Another day passed and the mutters of mutiny only grew.

Mali – Chancellor Alaya's suggestion was slyer and ended up more successful. A production was made of supplies being brought into the camp from outside even as word was spread that an accord might have been reached with the Kingdom Under. It was pure sleight of hand, the supplies in question coming from one of the larger flying fortresses and having been smuggled out during the night so they could be brought back when everybody was watching. It wouldn't tide us over forever, I thought, but it might be enough to muster our armies for another assault. Or it would have been, if the news did not then come from further south.

The devils were gone.

The Praesi had seized and suborned the gates before unleashing seven days' worth of devils on the dead, the main reason we were not drowning in armies as we besieged Keter, but the Dead King had not sat idle. The bindings on the devils had somehow been twisted and they were made to turn on each other, destroying themselves in an orgy of violence. They'd still emptied the southern Kingdom of the Dead of troops so it seemed like only a minor defeat, until one realized what it meant: there was no army left in the way of any deserters wanting to run south to Procer.

That night there were five attempts made on the supply stores, and though none succeeded it soured sentiment. We hanged all who attempted it publicly – two Proceran fantassin crews, a Levantine captain, Penthesians and to my distaste a tenth of legionaries from my own First Army – but however necessary the gesture it only darkened the mood further. We held council again, and this time when Basilia pushed to have the terms of the dwarven deal made public most of the people around the table were in agreement. It was Alaya and I who were the standouts again, sharing the same fear: it was going to give a lot of angry people a reason to get angry at each other.

To Basilia's honour, she was right about the League's reaction. Outrage at the demand of Penthes being ceded to the Kingdom Under was so great that there were demands made that the Grand Alliance declare war on the dwarves as well – never mind that the League was not part of the Grand Alliance, or that if the dwarves didn't feed us we were all going to fucking die. I was even forced to admit that I'd been wrong to fear the worst, at least in the immediate, since it didn't lead armies to brawl. What it did do, though, was give a halfway decent excuse for everyone wanting to sit out the battles to do it.

Proceran fantassins and levies did it by the hundreds, refusing to take up arms until the terms were accepted, while both the Blood and Chancellor Alaya began to receive petitions to accept the terms even if the rest of their allies did not. Some of the High Lords began to imply that the Praesi auxiliaries, which had until recently been household troops, might be inclined to start following their lead again should the Chancellor not do what was necessary to get them out of this mess. Tensions began to slowly rise across the camps and another council was urgently called.

"We lean on priests and heroes to shame the disobedient into line," I flatly told them. "As for the High Lords, I'll take care of it."

I retreated into my tent and slipped into the dreams of those Alaya had said were most aggressive, inflicting on them terrifying nightmares. Fear did its work: the next morning, much chastened nobles came to reiterate their absolute support for the Chancellor and her wise reign. The other half of that, unfortunately, did not work as well. Some of the priests balked at being given orders by earthly powers, outright refusing to preach as they were told, and though Hanno convinced half the mercenaries to live up to their contract the rest chased him out. It was similarly mixed results with the levies.

The Brabantines that'd wanted to make him into a price rose up, but some of those conscripts had never so much as seen his face until Salia and they were not willing to put blind trust into a stranger. Not even one who was the Sword of Judgement.

"A successful assault on the walls would turn sentiment around," the Warlord said.

"If we could talk them into that, we wouldn't be struggling so hard in the first place," I bit out.

Even the Army of Callow was balking, which was like a thorn in my throat: every time I tried to swallow, it bit a little deeper.

"Hard measures have become necessary," Empress Basilia said.

And we all knew what she meant by that. All of us had still-reliable troops, soldiers that would obey the order to purge the disobedient if it was given. It would be a death blow to morale to bloody our soldiers into lining up for an assault, but with morale already fucked it was starting to look like the least lethal of the poisons to drink to go through with it. Reluctant agreement began to bloom across the table, but the thorn in my throat had not stung so keenly that I'd accept this. Not against soldiers that'd followed me since I was a girl, that had served unflinching through one nightmare after another until we reached the walls of Keter. I did not agree, and brusquely left the council. Juniper followed closely behind, and when we were out of the tent she took my arm. We stood there a moment, our gazes meeting as her hand stayed on me, and a knot of emotions seized her face. Shame and gratitude, anger and pride.

"Warlord," she finally said, tone thick.

Gratitude won out. We both knew it was the same soldiers whose butchery had been discussed that had put me on the throne and kept me there, and I was almost insulted that she had thought I would forget it. That I would meekly bend my neck to this.

"They won't do it without me," I tiredly replied, passing a hand through my hair. "But we can't do nothing, Juniper. Time is running out."

It had not been eight days since the Battle of the Ruins, and we both knew that the closer we got to empty stores the more violently desperate our soldiers would become.

"An assault means losses," Juniper murmured. "That means our stores last longer."

We both knew that an assault where the entire force did not participate was just throwing lives away, but that was exactly what she was proposing: getting people killed. I pulled away, feeling my bad leg throbbing. I needed to be alone. I worried at the thought like a dog gnawing at a bone, but I saw no way out. So I sat in my tent alone, a bottle of aragh open as I leaned back in my seat with my eye closed. Trying to think of something, anything, that wasn't just some variation of a butcher's knife.

The soft sound of someone entering my tent reached my ears, but I did not open my eye.

"I'm not in the mood," I called out.

"You are in one," Hakram gravelled. "Which is why you're drinking alone."

"I don't want to talk," I told him, leaning forward as my eye fluttered open. "There's been enough of that."

He looked, I saw, about as tired as I felt. Ignoring me, he sat on the other side of my desk and grabbed the bottle. He poured himself a cup so full it nearly overflowed before draining it all in one swallow.

"I don't feel much like talking either," the Warlord admitted. "It's why I'm here. For the silence."

I stared at him, unblinking, for a long time. Then I nodded. We had known a great many comfortable silences, the two of us. This would not be one of them, given the dark bent of our thoughts, but maybe it'd be more comfortable here with each other than it would have been alone. So we stayed there and we drank, an hour passing and then another. It was me who spoke, when the bottle was empty and my belly too warm.

"I thought I was done with hard measures," I murmured. "Past them. But we're never really done with horror, are we?"

Hakram did not answer for a long while.

"I used to wonder," he said, "if it was something we stepped into, or something we brought with us."

And now we know, I thought. We parted ways come dark, but I could not sleep. I felt restless, for all that there was nothing to spend my energies against. So instead I found my steps leading me to the tallest watchtower of our camp, watching over the campfires spread all around me. I stood at the edge of the drop, alone and veiled by Night, and waited. The streak of ice was still there, the old fear that would never suffer to be entirely mastered. Fear of the drop, of the fall. An old friend.

I hated it.

"I've been fighting you since I was a girl," I told the night. "Gods, how many times did I face you?"

I had sought rooftop after rooftop, trying to scour the fear out of me, and yet here it was still.

"Even after all I've done, how far I've gone, you're still here," I said. "Still a part of me. You can be bound and blinded, kept in the cellar, but you've never been gone."

And how hateful was it, that even this small thing I had spent all my life trying to rid myself of could not be changed? I leaned forward, boot beginning to give against the wood, and though I knew the fall would not kill me still my stomach clenched. It was how I knew I wasn't dreaming: when I fell, in my dreams, there was never any fear. I just tumbled into the darkness, not making a sound, and I was swallowed whole. My bad leg throbbed with pain, a reminder this was anything but a dream.

"Is that the lesson?" I asked. "That it's not about getting rid of you, it's about continuing the fight?"

I thought of the night I had become the Warden, the dream of it. The faces I had worn, their warnings. Do better, one had whispered. Don't flinch, the other had ordered. And beyond them, the Beast that had waited. That I felt coil around me now, warm breath against my neck as it opened its maw.

"I don't believe that," I murmured. "Maybe there's never really an end like we want, like you get in the stories – a clean cut, a last light – but we do get to win, sometimes. If we bleed for it, if we're clever and brave and we don't bend with the current of the world."

My fingers clenched, then slowly unclenched.

"This isn't good enough," I told Creation. "This place, this end, this taste of ash in my mouth that I know too fucking well. It's not enough."

And something like indignation burned in my belly, because deep down I had always wanted the world to be fair – for fairness, for good to be baked into its bones – but it wasn't. It was blind and brutal, and the only lights you found down there in the dark were the ones you'd lit.

"Maybe you don't care," I said. "Maybe it's a game to you, always was. Fine. But a game has rules, and I swear to anything out there listening that in the space between those I will carve a semblance of fairness. And if you won't help me, then get the Hells out of my way."

I had told the Beast I no longer feared it and meant every word. So I closed my eye, breathing out, and left my staff.

Then I took a step forward and let myself fall.

The Beast laughed, laughed loud enough for the world to quake and to drown out the scream of my fear. But it held me tight, warmed me and lent me its strength. My Name burned bright, chasing away the dark, and finally I was able to See. There was an above and a below, and below me I saw them all laid out. A never-ending sprawl of objects in motion, stars in the void. All the stories, the possibilities of them, and though the enormity of it threatened to snuff out my mind like a candle the Beast kept me together. And as I fell, as the enormity came ever closer and hurried towards me, I saw what I was looking for.

An object in motion.

I opened my eye, back cold with sweat, but I was not falling. I was still on the edge of the tower, a step away from the fall and fear coiling cold in my gut. Maybe it'd always be like that. Not the fight, because there would always be a fight – if not this one, then another. Maybe it was about the victories you could steal from fear, the lights you lit. I looked up, breathing raggedly, and above me I saw the clouds of poison had parted. The night sky was a river of stars, breathtaking and depthless. I might never have thought to look up, if not for all this.

Dawn found me sleeping there, swaddled in the Mantle of Woe.

—

“Two days,” I told the war council. “Give me two days.”

“What have you learned, Black Queen?” Rozala Malanza asked with a frown.

“That the world is always larger than we think,” I replied. “So give me two days, and I will give you a miracle.”

They did. They watched me like a hawk all the while, spies and envoys dogging my every footstep and growing impatient as I did nothing more than prepare for a battle they did not think would be fought, but on the dawn of the third day an alarm was rung. An army had appeared south, its trail of dust piercing past the cover of the poison clouds. I sent a single messenger and waited at the edge of the camp while it woke up like a hive, ramparts being manned and officers sent for. But the dust parted, the army approached, and worry turned to surprise.

These were not the dead. It was an army of dwarves, thousands strong. I had seen true, then. Today would be a pivot, for us and for them.

The greats of the Grand Alliance trickled towards me, a war council forming, but I already knew what it would be about. Who was to go speak with the dwarves, they would say. And that I would go was a certainty, but there would be bickering about the rest. Too many could, while few must be sent. So I had sent a messenger for a diplomat enough of them would trust. The conversation died, smothered in the cradle, as Cordelia Hasenbach rode up to our side atop a warhorse.

“Warden,” she greeted me, blue eyes sweeping over the others.

“There,” I smiled at the others. “Does this compromise suffice?”

It did.

—

The Herald of the Deeps received us formally in his tent.

Not in a stiff manner, I meant, but in the same way he had once received me deep below in the Everdark: after a few courtesies were traded, small wooden bowls were brought out. Relics whose grain was left rough, without varnish or polish. Seeker Balasi himself came into the tent with an opaque glass bottle in hand, pouring half a cup's worth of sudra in each bowl before taking a step back. The liquor looked like wine, but its surface trailed vapour and it looked on the verge of boiling. The Herald had once told me no bottle of the drink, which dwarves used only on important talks, had ever left the Kingdom Under. The Named's green large green eyes sought out mine and he offered a respectful – though not deferential – nod.

I noticed that the staff he usually took everywhere, crooked wood adorned with metal chimes, was nowhere in sight.

"Warden," the Herald of Deeps said, "I greet you in peace."

"Herald," I replied, returning the nod. "Your arrival is an unexpected pleasure."

"Creations holds us all prisoner to its whims," he said, then turned to acknowledge my companion's presence. "Princess Cordelia."

"Herald," she calmly replied, then glanced at the bowls. "You honour us with this service."

Balasi didn't sit at the table with us, this time. He'd not approached again after taking that step back, instead standing behind the Herald with a face that might as well have been carved out of stone. It caught Cordelia's eyes just as it did mine. The Herald had always preferred to let the deed-seeker do most the talking when it was possible. Something had changed.

"If these talks are not to be called of import," the green-eyed Named said, "I know not which deserve the word."

A pause.

"I come to fulfill our bargain, Warden."

My brow rose.

"Has Lady Sybella been recalled as negotiator for the Kingdom Under?" I asked. "I'd thought you replaced."

For a long moment, the Herald neither moved nor answered. Not so much as a blink of those luminous eyes.

"A sennight ago," the Herald of the Deeps finally said, "I entered the Hall of Hearths and sought the King Under the Mountain as he sat the Diluvian Throne before the great land-kings of our kind. I demanded of him to summon all dwarves to war and strike bargain with the Grand Alliance, so that we might end the Dead King once and for all."

My throat caught. A calmer presence in the back of my mind noted a detail: a week ago. Either this Hall of Hearths was close to here, or the dwarves had a way of travelling long distances quickly.

"And did he accept?" Cordelia quietly asked.

The green-eyed dwarf twitched in what I thought might be dismay.

"He refused," the Herald said. "And in his anger at my presumption, cast me into exile."

An exile that'd come here with an army, I thought, but my stomach was sinking even as I kept my face calm. So the Herald of the Deeps had come here with his loyalists to lend a hand to the fight. I would not turn away the help, but it was not the help we'd needed. Food was to be our saving grace, not more swords.

"But I gave an oath on my staff to fight for the terms I accepted with all my might," the dwarf quietly said. "So I did."

Cordelia stilled as I leaned forward. Power burned in the dwarf's green eyes, old and deep and without the slightest semblance of humanity to it.

"I slew the king on his throne," the Herald of the Deeps said, "and declared all of his line to be without burden or purpose. Unfit to rule."

I let out a sharp breath. Burden and purpose were the words dwarves used for Role and Name, I knew, but I had heard Balasi use them in a more religious context before. They seemed as much philosophy as namelore.

"And you got out of there alive?" I said, incredulous.

"Snapping my staff of office released the many spirits I have bound over the years all at once," the Herald said, sounding darkly satisfied. "The soldiers of the land-kings had greater concerns than to hunt me."

I felt like reaching for the drink even though it wasn't done cooling. That was, I thought, one hell of a way to resign. Still, for all that the Herald's act of defiance was impressive I was having some difficulty parsing the implications of it. Fortunately, I had brought Cordelia Hasenbach with me.

"You have not come," Cordelia mildly said, "as a representative of the Kingdom Under."

The Herald grimly chuckled.

"Princess, there no longer is a Kingdom Under," he said. "It has been a thousand years since the Kings Under the Mountain truly ruled, but the dignity of their blood kept the land-kings as part of the same realm in name."

He bared his teeth.

"I murdered that last restraint," the Herald said. "Twice over, when I declared the bloodline unfit: no brother or sister can be ushered into the seat to serve as a fresh figurehead. Instead every land-king now claims himself the true owner of the Diluvian Throne."

"Civil war," Cordelia said.

"Not one of them but thirty," the green-eyed dwarf replied. "A hundred, even. All of the old wars let loose again, without the King Under the Mountain to call for peace when a side wishes to surrender. It will be to the death, Princess Cordelia, until the Diluvian Throne is filled once more or the empire shatters all the way through."

I honestly wasn't sure whether that was better or worse than the Herald coming here with only an army of exiles. It was now a certainty we wouldn't be getting reinforcements from the Kingdom Under, because its armies certainly sounded like they would be busy for the immediate future. Fuck, I'd hoped- wait, no. Not all the armies were busy, were they?

"It got the impression," I said, "that neither the lands of the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Expansion were under a land-king."

From context I'd put together that they were under the authority of the King Under the Mountain, at least in principle, though in practice they'd been under the Herald himself. If their throne was empty, though, who did they now answer to?

