Of all the times to catch up, it had to be now, didn't it? Well, at least it's right before all the planning starts to simultaneously come together and fall apart, and not in the middle of it.

On a separate note, I've been bouncing around a theory for a while. Have we seen any reference to Dread Emperor Benevolent yet in story? Because his quotes are all suspiciously similar to the kind of stuff we've been hearing from Catherine especially, to the point that if it'd been Empress I'd have said she takes that name when who/whatever is behind that song gets her onto the Tower. As it is, I have a feeling that he's Malicia's successor, assuming I didn't just miss a reference to him at some point.

Javvies

No, the only mentions of Dread Emperor Benevolent have been as the citations for the opening quote.

There's a relatively longstanding theory that Dread Emperor Benevolent is the reign name for Amadeus.

Liliet

Cat would be Empress, not Emperor.

And Amadeus would not allow High Lords to be present at his coronation lmao

tnozone

I'm still catching up, but I'd just like to say the following.

While the power of love is a useful tool for heroes, it's usually the opposite for villains. They tend to experience the failure of love as the person they love most/loves them most is often either the first person they kill when their mind is possessed/warped, or the last person they betray when they obtain ultimate power or on their quest to obtain it. It serves as a more personal moral event-horizon for the audience compared to stuff like destroying a city, unleashing a plague, or massacring a thousand innocent people.

Chapter 42: Twined

"The Lycaonese are a grim people though not without a dark sort of humour, as became evident when I was first told what a 'northern burial' is. The inhabitants of these parts do not bury their dead, for fear of the Kingdom of the Dead, instead burning their own and spreading the ashes on consecrated ground. What the locals refer to as one of their burials is, in truth, someone being eaten by ratlings from the Chain of Hunger."

– Extract from "Horrors and Wonders", famed travelogue of Anabas the Ashuran

This would be the second time I assaulted the ducal palace of Liesse, and it would have made three if the Lone Swordsman hadn't picked a dainty little eldritch church as his last holdout. Gods, now that I thought about it, hadn't I brawled with Akua every time I'd stepped within city limits in the past? Sometimes it was hard to reconcile the smirking woman I'd hated so bitterly with the Diabolist I know knew and on occasion even liked. Hells, I was pretty sure she'd once implied that some ghoul she was sending after me was Kilian, back when we'd been a couple. An arrow more pointed than plausible but then Akua's knack had always tended more towards striking deep than striking true. I dismissed the thought as the three of us began our approach down the Caen road, the broad avenue that led directly to the gates of the city's ancient seat of power. The gates were wide open, having fallen off the hinges, and the stone round them had been eaten into brutally.

"Someone assaulted this before us," the Saint said.

I grimaced.

"My own work," I said. "From when I last took this city."

"Akua's Folly," the old woman said. "The stories began trickling across the border after the Camps."

I did not reply, even though it was rare for her to engage save through threat and insults. I did not owe her a discussion of that catastrophe. Not to her, not to anyone. The breadth of the scope I'd failed my people by no longer choked me day and night, not the way it had before heading into the Everdark, but the Doom of Liesse would never be anything but a bitter brew for me. That I seemed fated to walk it again and again was perhaps cruel, but then by my hands I had earned that cruelty. I'd still my tongue to it and take what was nothing less than my due.

"They say you bound the Diabolist to the heart of the ritual," the Rogue Sorcerer quietly said. "And then broke it on her head, extinguishing every speck of her soul."

"It was the Black Knight who struck at Akua Sahelian's work," I brusquely said. "And it nearly killed him too. It doesn't matter, save that we should not touch a ward until the hall where the Diabolist once laid her first threshold."

I was saved further talk by stirring in the sky, though at the sight of them I almost wished we were still rubbing salt into my old wounds. The colossal panes of bronze-like glass I'd seen earlier – how could anyone not, given how starkly they loomed above the city? – had begun to shift. Like those beautiful jigsaw puzzles of glass and metal I'd once stared at in the markets of Laure, the pieces began moving like some intricate interlinked mechanism. Given the descending side of the panels they'd brought to mind a longview when I'd first thought of it, and it seemed that Masego was using them for purpose kin to that: rim glowing with massive carved runes I could not seem to understand, the panes began turning on themselves as if being adjusted for some arcane purpose. As it had earlier the first and largest pane of glass showed clear sight of the barren wasteland below as if it were being scried, but the angle of view and the closeness of the sight seemed to change in impossible ways according to the whims of spins.

"Rogue," I quietly said. "The runes, I can't keep them in my memory – that means they're High Arcana. What are they for?"

"I don't know," the hero admitted.

I waved a hand irritably.

"I know the upper arcane stuff is personal and unique for everyone, but I know there's usually some bridge of understanding there," I said. "I'm not asking for a treatise on what he's up to, just some broad strokes."

"Black Queen, I cannot understand High Arcana," the Rogue Sorcerer bluntly said. "I can hazard some guesses at the purposes of this device – I suspect every glass-like pane is a different scrying ritual and the largest one serves as a sort of receptacle for all that is seen, allowing variety of sight – but I cannot know anything for certain."

I glanced at the dark-haired man catching that he was faintly embarrassed. His pupils had been ringed in red or green, earlier, but that now seemed gone. A simple unremarkable brown, not so dissimilar to my own, was all that remained. I was a little skeptical of his words considering his record when it came to the fights and that at the Battle of the Camps he'd been directing the enemy wizard against my own mage lines led by Masego, who'd been dabbling in High Arcana long before I met him. Still, what did he have to win by lying to me here? Nothing worth the candle, I thought, and I knew better than most that Names could be tricky things: he might have some help from his in these subjects from his. Or, from that matter, the very opposite. It wasn't unheard of for transitional Names to serve as a set of shackles to be surpassed down the line and – and this was a rabbit hole I did not have to spare tumbling down. I glanced one more time at the pane, and near flinched when an eardrum-shattering shriek sounded across the ruined realm. I'd heard them before, the interwoven four cacophonies that followed, like old metal being twisted and warped. One after another, the angled Hellgates opened in the sky above and devils began pouring out.

"Lesser Breaches," the Rogue Sorcerer murmured. "Yet four of them. That is... remarkable. And absurdly dangerous. The Hierophant is taking a knife to the already chewed up fabric of this realm."

"Look at the larger pane," I urged, "if it's like the last time then there'll-"

And there it was, clear-cut in view on the bronze glass in a way it had not been when I'd attempted to look at it with my own mortal eyes: a glittering array of runes that hurt to look at, forming a circle at twice the height of a man. I glimpsed a ghostly silhouette within the circle, but before a heartbeat had passed there was a flash of blinding light and a gargantuan detonation in the distance. I'd looked away in time, though I noticed that both the Saint and the Sorcerer had looked through the glare uninterrupted. Leant on their Name for it, I guessed, though I'd never found how to work that particular trick myself back in my Squire days.

"I don't suppose either if you can shed light on that," I said.

"It is no coincidence the Hellgates opened before the other part of the ritual," Roland told me, turning to match my gaze.

Well, would you look at that. Around one his left pupil, the slightest tint of azure blue was beginning to form a circle. Name or sorcery, I wondered? The more I learned of magic, the more I understood that there were as many ways to practice it as there were languages under the sun.

"Meaning?" I asked.

"That the stuff of the Hells is being drawn in at first, then given shape by the circle of runes we saw," the Sorcerer said. "It is an attempt, I believe, at making something – though whatever was made seems to have been deemed unfit and so immediately annihilated. I would say those failed attempts are responsible for the Due that was used to occlude scrying in Iserre."

My throat caught. Not at the subtleties of the sorcery at use slowly being peeled back, but at what the hero had told me without knowing it. Masego was drawing from the stuff of Hells and trying to give it a shape through High Arcana – a form of sorcery that was, by nature, deeply personal. That shape looked human, or close enough, and he was being obsessively exact even by his standards when it came to the results of his work. The Warlock had been slain at Thalassina, it was said, and having passed to the place beyond there was no sensible way for Hierophant to bring him back. But Masego had once told me that devils did not die, not truly. They merely dispersed, returning to the primal stuff of the Hells where another of their kind would be born when the whims of those unearthly realms demanded it. Masego was brutalizing the world with sorcery until it gave him back the only one of his fathers he could reach. And he was, heartbreakingly, failing.

"Your Majesty?" the Sorcerer quietly said.

"Grief and miscarriage have seeped into the bones of this place," I said, voice grown rough. "And damn the Dead King, for having given him hope where there can be none."

After all, if the hero was correct it was the Due from this that occluded scrying then Neshamah was have seen to it that this was an exercise in futility: the Hidden Horror would need this to continue for months, if not years. Perhaps there was the slightest sliver of a chance, I thought, but how many lifetimes would it take for Masego to succeed? An obsession had been slid into the ribs of my friend, and not one he would easily be able to shake. I knew him, the way he thought. This would stay with him like an itch he could not scratch: the whisper that if he was a little more accurate, a little more inspired, if he spent another few years of research, then it could be done. That every moment where he had not yet succeeded was a failure. Merciless Gods, that old thing in Keter had wrought damage it would take years to unmake. And the middle of a war was hardly the time to do it.

"Enough dawdling," the Saint of Swords said. "The longer we wait the greater the chance the dagger will be caught."

"Agreed," I growled.

I had more than a little wroth to purge from my blood, now, and a hard fight seemed just the thing for it.

—

A hard fight was precisely what I found us denied.

The avenue leading to the palace had been empty, which was not unexpected, but the way that not a soul awaited as we passed the gates was. We'd seen going in that the fresh waves of devils brought through the gates had headed for the deeper palace, so it might be that strife awaited us there, but why allow us any uncontested advance? It wasn't like they were going to run out of devils anytime soon, if the numbers brought through the Breaches were any indication. Answer to that was only found after we rose by steps and passed through halls where the marks of my anger in the face of the Doom had yet to fade until we reached a plain oaken door that was not unfamiliar to me.

"Ward," the Rogue Sorcerer said, resting a palm on it. "Beautifully crafted, though it seems to have been aimed sorely at the Fair Folk."

"How did you get through back then, if it still stands?" the Saint asked, eyeing me.

I pointed a finger upwards, where I'd once shattered the stone of the ceiling to leap into the room and slaughter the mages that'd been hiding in there. Laurence, every spry for her age, glanced at the adjoining wall once before breaking into a smooth run — the first jump had her angling on that wall, after which I felt a small ripple of Name power and she leapt up through the hole. The Sorcerer, meanwhile, was still examining the oaken door with a gaze much too involved for it to be wood he was looking at.

"Can you break it?" I asked.

He'd said he could, after all. The dark-haired man blinked and turn to give me a sheepish look. Gods, what was it with practitioners and getting distracted?

"I can," he said. "The Saint?"

The answer came a moment later, as the old woman leapt down the hole and landed in a crouch.

"More magic upstairs," she said. "Peeked through the door and it was positively reeking of it."

"Ward?" I frowned.

"Labyrinth," she replied, shaking her head. "I'm no mageling, but I've had to go through enough of those to recognize the scent."

"Labyrinth, huh," I said, and looked straight ahead at nothing just in case it'd be able to see me through spell or prophecy. "Didn't work last time, you one-trick rat, and it won't this time either."

"Black Queen?" the Sorcerer asked, sounding alarmed.

"I believe we've got the Revenant known as the Skein on our hands," I said. "It's got a preference for those."

The Saint of Swords went still.

"The Skein?" she repeated. "Like in the old rhyme?"

"What rhyme?" I frowned.

"Eater endless, Shrouded silent,
Sought and lost sleeping below
Tumult tyrant, Snatcher slyest,
Dreaming still but waking slow
Skein scheming, last of five Lords of Horn from long ago."

She was not a particularly talented singer, and I suspected she'd rushed the rhythm, but I understood it without trouble. My brow rose: the rat had a history, it seemed. I supposed I shouldn't be surprised, as the Dead King seemed to enjoy raising in his service the rare and the unusual most of all.

"Might be," I said. "It certainly goes by that Name anyway."

"I thought you'd tangled with some hasty longtail that got caught and turned, not one of the Old Lords," the Saint grimly said.

"It's tricky but hardly unbeatable," I shrugged.

"You don't lack stomach, at least," the old Proceran said, which was not disapproving if not the opposite either. "Well, if it's the same as the old legends it'll be waiting for us. Might as well have a look. Sorcerer, get a move on would you?"

"Please," I added, flicking a glance at the man.

The Rogue Sorcerer nodded, and after muttering something under his breath rapped his knuckle against the door once. The hand stayed there, after, though he opened his palm and the world shivered close to it. Huh. That'd felt like an old friend, and one I knew well: whatever aspect it was he'd just used, it was cousin to my old Take. And even more distant kin to the more abstract ability I still used as First Under the Night, though whatever similarity there'd been at the source had strayed the further I went from my Name. Interesting, though. Instead of breaking these wards, was he stealing them? It was certainly one way to interpret his Name, though given how subtle such matters could be I was reluctant to come to conclusions so swiftly.

"Done," Roland said.

The Saint of Swords strolled forward, elbowed him to the side and kicked the door down before walking through. I pushed down a snort and limped after them, gesturing for the Sorcerer to catch up to her. I slowed my steps just as I passed the broken door, bending down to pass my fingers lightly over the shattered oak. There was not, to my senses, so much as a speck of sorcery left in there. Akua had laid her ward in there more than year ago, and considering the usual thoroughness of her work it should have been exquisitely done. Yet there was not a damned trace of it left, not even some faint aftertouch. Creation rarely brooked such exactness, I thought. This was the work of his Name, not any sorcery I knew of. I wonder, I thought, if there's a touch of colour around your pupil right now? I'd master my curiosity for now, but I'd never been able to leave secrets alone for too long.

I hurried to catch up with them before anyone could notice.

—

I'd give the Skein this much, it put in an effort.

Though I did not know whether it had powers akin to sorcery or it was simply wielding the tripartite works of the old Dukes of Liesse and the two greatest Praesi mages of my generation, it tried to trap and waylay us at every turn. Of course, given that the Rogue Sorcerer seemed to be able to shatter any ward in less than thirty heartbeats and that Laurence de Montfort's answer to mazes was to cut through any wall in the way of marching in straight line it did not end up amounting to much. While I knew that the Saint would tire in time, she did not seem at the moment more than lightly winded and if anything Roland seemed haler than he'd been since hobbling back to the band. While they brute forced their way through the best-laid schemes of the Skein I kept a wary eye out, for this all seemed too easy to me. We'd yet to encounter any devils, or the Tyrant or any Revenant at all. All three of these would need to be met before we arrived at the conclusion of this journey, and indeed the shape of our story should be nudging us towards that encounter. If we'd yet to meet them there was a reason for it, and since it was not of our own making it must be of the enemy's. That usually meant a trap.

"You ever hear of the Two Hundred Axioms, Foundling?" the Saint casually asked.

Boot against the wall, she pushed until the rectangular shape she'd carved into the wall toppled forward. Abandoned servants' quarters were revealed behind, and if I had to bet I would bet that we were closing on the edge of the western wing of the ducal palace. Soon we'd hit the inner courtyard, that heavily warded killing field that Akua had prepared to fend off any attempting to approach the part of the palace where she'd laid the heart of her ritual and her throne room with it. Hierophant was using the ritual arrays that she'd carved into Liesse, which meant he was likely in there as well. I doubted any of the holes I'd made in the defences on my way in were still there, considering the quantity of devils Masego had been calling forth. They'd turn on him in a heartbeat if they could, Dead King looming or not, so odds were fresh layers of viciousness had been raised instead.

"I have not," I said. "Some sort of philosophical book?"

"Close enough," Laurence de Montfort said. "They're best kept out of hands like yours, anyway."

"Charming," I commented, following her through the opening. "Why bring it up?"

"The only sensible solution to a maze is to not enter the maze," she quoted, tone amused. "This is close enough, I'd wager."

"And there," the Rogue Sorcerer hummed.

The open palm he'd laid on the wall in front of us went straight through what I'd believed to be a stone wall, revealing it to be a skillful illusion. The other half of the room, until now veiled, ended in a broken glass window overlooking the inner courtyard of the inner palace. Which was empty, save for the broken and scorched grounds where Akua had once nearly succeeded at killing me with her clever traps. Were we going to be allowed to run off this all the way to the heart of the palace? Archer had been in here before, and she'd told me the place was swarming with devils. What had-

"Wait," I said, as the Saint neared the window.

"What?" Laurence growled.

"The Skein," I slowly said, "in your stories, what is it known for?"

"Scheming," she bluntly said.

I grit my teeth. Now was not the time to get mouthy on me, Saint.

"Look, in your rhyme all five of the 'Old Lords' have some epithet that goes with their Name," I said with forced patience. "The Tumult is a tyrant, which I'm guessing means it's good at herding other ratlings. The Eater is endless, which I'd wager means even for a Horned Lord means it's really hard to put down. The Skein is scheming, sure, but the Snatcher is the 'slyest'. What does the Skein do, Saint? Are there any stories that hint at anything more?"

The heroine matched my gaze, brow creased with thought.

"It led a horde to devour whole what would become Hannoven," she finally said. "Through some secret way, using wiles. They're old stories, Foundling. There's not a lot of them and the Skein is barely in any. Makes sense, if Old Bones got to him."

Through some secret way, using wiles. It wasn't a lot to work with, and that it ate a whole ancient city didn't weigh much on the scales to my eye – it was what ancient hungry beasts did, what mattered was the manner of it. Hannoven was, as I recalled, one of the most fortified cities on Calernia – it was usually put in the same breath as Rhenia, Keter and Summerholm. Could I assume that even in the dawn of days it'd been a fortress? Yes, I decided. The Skein had, after all, used a 'secret way'. If it'd been a pack of huts, given the size of the damned thing there would have been no need for subtlety. It itched at me that the story spoke of a city, a place that was fixed. Not an army or a band of heroes, it was a city that made the tale and that was detail that resonated. In Keter, the Skein had been given the defence of a palace and it was the same here. It might have a trick that works well with fixed positions, either both the attack and the defence. I had too little to go on, Hells. That was the thing with the Dead King, wasn't it? Anything secret that might help in defeating him for good was long dead and buried. If not by his hand, then by sheer dint of centuries. Although, when we'd fought the Skein in the Threefold Reflection, it'd been as part of a pattern hadn't it? One Revenant per palace. King Edward in the Garden of Crowns, the Thief of Stars in the Silent Palace and the Spellblade in that horrid half-realm we'd tread trying to move between Creation and reflections.

The ancient King of Callow had been placed in a place for only the regal, the Thief of Stars assigned to spy on us in a place where every sound was muted and the Spellblade, a dead elf utterly lethal in direct combat, given watch over a place where there could be no place to hide. They'd all been posted, so to speak, in a place that benefited talents or nature they'd had before being sent there. Was is the same with the Skein then? I knew it'd used an artefact to manipulate the three interlocked realms of the Threefold Reflection, and that its oracular abilities had allowed it to do so even more dangerously, but this felt like a departure from the pattern. The Silent Palace had made it easier for the Thief of Stars to sneak around, not possible – amplification of a capacity, not crafting of a new one. It was the same with all the others, too. And if that held, then some pieces were beginning to fall into place. Gods, I almost couldn't believe I hadn't noticed: I'd already walked the grounds of this very ducal palace once and seen it gone still and bare, when I'd unleashed my domain of Moonless Nights. And then too, I'd still come across wards and traps. There was a reason we hadn't come across so much as an imp on our heedless advance through these grounds, and that was because we weren't in the palace at all: we were in the domain of the Skein.

"Saint," I said, opening eyes I hadn't realized I'd closed. "When you cut Winter, cut my domain, you were still within it right?"

"I was," the old woman warily said.

"And you could feel that you were?" I pressed.

Her eyes narrowed.

"Here, now?" she asked.

"Been too easy so far, hasn't it?" I said.

Her blade returned to the sheath and she took a moment to steady her stance and breathing. Then the world shattered around us like panes of glass, and the only hint that it wasn't her work was the slight widening of her eyes.

The first thing I noticed was that the roof over our heads and walls shielding us were gone.

The second was that the Skein in all its horned glory was nesting in the courtyard below, surrounded as far as the eye could by hordes of devils. Two silhouettes were at its feet, though in the gloom I could not make out who they were.

The third, and last, was that of us the Tyrant of Helike was being held aloft on his throne by a swarm of gargoyles while grinning like a man having the time of his line.

"My friends," Kairos Theodosian cheerfully announced, "I am grieved to inform you there might have been some slight changes to my allegiances."

Caerulea

Vote! (for A Practical Guide to Evil)

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Also apparently there is a Discord? Not sure what goes on there, but if you want to find out, go here:

<https://discord.gg/3nbsUfZ>

Naeddyr

Tyrant, you villain! You will not get away with this!

naturalnuke

Lies and calumny, possibly a set up!

stevenneiman

I'm kind of imagining Cat saying that with the same degree of emotion as someone running through an inventory checklist.

antoninjohn

Slight change in allegiance, gasp Kairos is turning from Below to join Above and become a hero

erebus42

A betrayal worthy of Traitorous!

RoflCat

Only if he steals from Above and sell his spoils to Below, after poisoning it of course.

Euodiachloris

"The Tyrant was, of course, lying. There was no conceivable way for him to cease being aligned to his own self."

Liliet

Eh, Akua has demonstrated it's possible 😊

Insanenoodlyguy

Ubua floats by his side "This angel redeemed me with the power of friendship!" he beams.

"Goddamn this this shit is powerful" notes the spectre, looking honestly awed by her own skills.

catulu

Mind telling me where that is from?
You know, for research purposes?

Insanenoodlyguy

Ummm... nowhere? I made it up just now. It's just an ironic echo of what Akua said in her big damn hero moment in book 4.

cthulhu worshipper where is that reference from?

Javvies

Like anyone expected otherwise from Kairos.

It's a trap!
The Skein is a nasty one.

It would seem that Masego is attempting to resummon/reform Tikoloshe. Or so Cat thinks.

Liliet

A lot of people called it.

I refused to, and for the very reason Catherine is horrified here: THIS IS BAD 😊

danh3107

What a shocking, sudden, stupendous, spectacular and all together surprising turn of events! Consider my expectations thoroughly subverted Tyrant, you fiend!

NerfContessa

Hmmmm, a slight change of allegiance, so instead of only himself he now also is allied with.... Big Rats? :p

Really nice chapter.

Someguy

Skein is a rat that makes humans run themselves exhausted through mazes. And Saint thought she was not entering it by cutting through.

Dainpdf

No one expected the meta-maze. And Cat got it because she had privileged information.

Mental Mouse

Well, “that party member provides a critical clue” is totally a trope.

superkeaton

Ah, glamour, a web weaved over another. Typical of a rat, to design mazes.

Novice

Unfortunately for the rat, a cat is now on the hunt.

JJR

“the best-laid schemes of the Skein”

Haha, I see what you did there erraticerrata.

And the mouses plan does go awry in the end.

Hierus

Leave it to the tyrant. I really like smart cat, exspecially if we compare to winter queen cat.

Gibborim

*Black Cat

Caerulea

Vote! (for A Practical Guide to Evil)

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Also apparently there is a Discord? Not sure what goes on there, but if you want to find out, go here:

<https://discord.gg/3nbsUfZ>

(apparently this didn't post earlier. Huh).

Caerulea

Nevermind, it just disappeared.

Liliet

2 links = held for moderation

erraticerrata

Pretty much, yeah.

erebus42

Come on Black! I'd have thought The 200 Heroic Axioms would have been required reading for Cat so she'd be better able to deal with Heroes who didn't rely solely on stories and handouts from the Heavens.

Also I'm curious about the Rogue Sorcerer. He seems to be able to steal spells or possibly magic itself, but does he draw power solely from stolen spells.

If he does that would be an extremely interesting if very limited power set. He's becoming more intriguing by the chapter.

Dainpdf

Maybe even Black hasn't managed to get his hands on those... or maybe he thinks them not worthy of study compared to narrative theory.

Dainpdf

*to his version of narrative theory.

Because really, the axioms seem to be "narrative theory for heroes"

Liliet

I think it's the former. There's A LOT of info he doesn't have – for example, Saint and Pilgrim seemed aware of who Wandering Bard was back at Camps, and he'd never heard of her.

shveiran

Sure, but this is a book. Where do they keep the copies for Scribe to be unable to grab one through her network?

Also... where IS Scribe now?

Liliet

That's a fucking great question.

And I agree with someone's guess that 200 axioms is likely oral, never written down.

shveiran

Ooooh, I didn't think of that. I was really getting a "book" vibe, but it would explain Amadeus never mentioning them.

onedollargum

Maybe what he does is steal the show? XD

Nafram

Ah, Kairos Theodosian, always classy

Sun Dog

His loyalty cannot be brought at any price. But it can be rented on the cheap.

sengachi

I've been thinking since last week, what if the Rogue Sorcerer has been turned to Kairos' side (willingly or otherwise)? There was the assumption that his apparent willingness to hear Catherine out was a possible ploy of the heroes. But what if it was Kairos' ploy? You know, the person who has the explicit ability to see your dearest wishes and use them against you?

That might significantly affect how this fight goes, if that's the case.

Liliet

Tariq. Behold.

Catherine limited possibilities to 'a ploy by heroes' for a reason.

sengachi

Cat has literally been running circles around his sight recently and they're right now going up against an enemy who specializes in running circles around people who just fooled Tariq's sight. I think it's at least plausible that Tariq missed the Rogue Sorcerer getting subverted.

Fayhem

Cat didn't "run circles around" Tariq's sight (though she did ultimately outmaneuver him), the goddesses literally perched on her shoulders blocked it outright. And before you say "well maybe Dead King and/or Kairos could do that too then" A) Tariq very much knew immediately that he'd been blocked and B), no. Mayyyybe DK could apply his millennia of sorcerous knowledge to replicating a divine-base/god-tier effect, but cunning though Tyrant is he's not in that league. But even if DK could replicate blocking Tariq's Ophanim-powered sight (on a third party rather than on himself) outright spoofing the Choir of snoopy angels should be seen as at least an order of magnitude more difficult.

I have been wrong on a couple points of late tbf, but I don't regard the Rogue Sorcerer having been subverted in this manner as a serious possibility to be considered.

Andrew Mitchell

> I don't regard the Rogue Sorcerer having been subverted in this manner as a serious possibility to be considered.

I agree.

Liliet

Catherine hasn't been running circles around his sight, Catherine is personally shielded by goddesses of Night, a domain that literally specializes in obscuring sight. She wasn't fooling him, she just put a stone wall in front of him.

1224

You're "grieved" Kairos? Is that shit eating grin you are no doubt wearing your expression of grief.

Euodiachloris

The other main option is "maniacal laugh" and he's not even giggling – so, yeah; grin it is. ;P

Andrew Mitchell

So Masego is trying to resurrect Tikoloshe. I mentioned the possibility in the comments in the chapters after the death of Masego's parents. On one hand I'm glad to be proven right, but on the other I'm feeling sad for Masego and his sisyphian task.

Its interesting that Catherine doesn't think it will work. I wonder if Masego will manage to prove Cat wrong?

Javvies

Cat thinks that even if it is theoretically possible to do, that it's going to take forever, and/or the Dead King has either taken steps to make it impossible (summoning and binding Tikoloshe himself, perhaps) or to make extremely difficult (ie, giving Masego enough information to try, but leaving out key bits and pieces of information ... probably not outright lying, though, but possibly allowing Masego to run with a misconception/misinterpretation.

Andrew Mitchell

Yes, lots of possibilities here.

IIRC most commenters previously thought it was impossible too and they may well be proven right.

Mental Mouse

> most commenters previously thought it was impossible too and they may well be proven right.

The hard part will be convincing Masego....

Liliet

honestly I'm currently leaning towards "Masego is savvy enough he'll realize it quickly, the hard part will be getting him out of depression afterwards"

shveiran

I may be wrong (and she could as well besides), but I think Cat reasoning is that the DK's ploy is to suggest an attempt that is not impossible but VIRTUALLY impossible. Something Masego will ram his head against because it is THEORETICALLY possible to overcome the obstacle. Masego is brilliant, but not balanced even on a good day. I find it realistic to imagine him losing himself in an impossible task, obsessed with getting it right. The very insight we had on how his mind works (when Cat broke him out of the interrupted Drop-a-Lake-Ritual backlash) suggests this may work wonders.

Mental Mouse

Yes, this. He could totally get obsessed as a way of channeling his grief.

But the scary thing is... he is probably one of the top five mages on the continent, and his specialty is miracles. He might actually be able to do the impossible!

shveiran

I feel the DK would not have set this up if he thought he could realistically succeed. And he is a better sorcerer, I fear.

Mental Mouse

My point is that especially here and now, Masego is not necessarily limited to the "realistic". I will also note that Tikoloshe is/was a creature of Desire... and Masego has a powerful desire!

shveiran

Mhm, so the solution will end up being "the power of love" two times in a row? It's possible, especially if there is a "third time" somewhere we haven't noticed. What if the dialogue about Saint in the previous chapter was setting that up?

Mental Mouse

> So Masego is trying to resurrect Tikoloshe. ...On one hand I'm glad to be proven right, but on the other I'm feeling sad for Masego and his sisyphian task.

There have been other commenters in the past who mentioned being moved to tears by various episodes. This one is my turn.

Andrew Mitchell

Kissaten

So, rat's going to face off against Saint of Swords who can cut everything, aspects, domains, space itself, and supposedly future too since Cat put that gun on the wall already. Is there any chance of Skein surviving this?

Liliet

I mean it kind of is already dead anyway the answer's no 😊

daegone823

If it was not for Chat then the saint would still be cutting stone door ways. The saint is not invincible just really powerful. The skein is not only powerful, but cunning.

He is an enemy where force is not the best course of action and can be a fatal mistake. The only counters are aspects and story plot armor created by heroics.

JJR

She'll cut the future and the next chapter will be 44 right after the the fight and everyone except Saint will be very confused.

Also Tyrant will be their friend again somehow, because Tyrant.

If EE could somehow pull that off that would be amazing and hilarious.

caoimhinh

Cool chapter.

So Rogue Sorcerer can steal wards and accumulate them inside him, that's an awesome Aspect.

Cat really should have explained to them in more detail what the Skein is capable of, she is the one who has fought it. Instead, she kept most of the information for herself and was pretty vague even when talking to Pilgrim. That seems counterproductive, though it might be that she did it to make sure it was a harder fight that made Rogue and Saint spend more of their Aspects there, perhaps?

It's worth noticing that Skein cut its losses and dispelled the domain when it was noticed, instead of risking Saint cutting through it, that means it would have taken direct damage from that, it might be useful in the coming fight.

Two silhouettes standing by the feet of Skein, one is King Edward?

Kairos was mentioned as a third and sitting on his throne while Cat said the two silhouettes were not discernable, so there's a new Revenant in town.

Next battle should be pretty intense, added to it the conversation-negotiation between Cat and Kairos, it's going to be very interesting. The Heroes are going to be very angry when Catherine recovers Amadeus' soul, but they won't have no option but to suck it until facing Masego, where I think Saint will lose her shit and attempt murder plus we'll see if Tariq holds his end of the bargain.

The hype is high.

Typos found:

- the Diabolist I know knew / the Diabolist I now knew
- every spry for her age / ever spry for her age
- they brute forced their way / they brute-forced their way
- seemed to easy to me / seemed too easy to me
- our story should ne nudging us / our story should be nudging us
- You ever hear / You ever heard
- I'd wager means even for a Horned Lord means/ delete the last 'means'
- Was is the same / Was it the same
- The third, and last, was that of us the Tyrant of Helike was / The third -and last of us-, the Tyrant of Helike, was

Kissaten

Keeping secrets to herself is A) a safe thing to do since you can reveal something about yourself you didn't want – especially since heroes are still enemies; B) is a subtrope of an unspoken plan, it can be used in a fight

For two silhouettes candidates are Prince of Nightfall, King Edward, Grey Pilgrim and Archer, Hierarch as well as any new Revenant. If unknown Revenant's the case, it is going to survive this fight 100% since it's the only new one and is narratively supposed to be the last boss/trick in the bag. Also it could be Neshamah himself, if we are to list all possible candidates.

Mental Mouse

Another option would be Black installed into a necromantic construct.

Liliet

They didn't have time for a thorough debriefing/infodump, they're running on a very tight schedule. Note how the heroes aren't questioning Catherine not having told them this earlier: she talks about things as they come up, it makes sense.

>That seems counterproductive, though it might be that she did it to make sure it was a harder fight that made Rogue and Saint spend more of their Aspects there, perhaps?

Definitely not. There's hard fights ahead and NONE of them are Cat vs heroes.

>It's worth noticing that Skein cut its losses and dispelled the domain when it was noticed, instead of risking Saint cutting through it, that means it would have taken direct damage from that, it might be useful in the coming fight.

oh, is that what happened? I thought she did cut through it, but this makes more sense.

>Next battle should be pretty intense, added to it the conversation-negotiation between Cat and Kairos, it's going to be very interesting.

SAME

> The Heroes are going to be very angry when Catherine recovers Amadeus' soul, but they won't have no option but to suck it they miiight have already resigned themselves to this lmao >until facing Masego, where I think Saint will lose her shit and attempt murder plus we'll see if Tariq holds his end of the bargain.

Whatever happens will be amazing.

I think it's worth noting that Laurence is increasingly friendly here. She even quoted the 200 axioms book for seemingly no purpose other than a joke. If she's not warming up to Cat per se she's at least bringing down her stonewall of "do not even talk to this" that's been up since Camps, when she tried to kill her under the peace banner (the first time).

Roland is interesting as shit.

Andrew Mitchell

Yes, Skein definitely pulled back his domain.

> Then the world shattered around us like panes of glass, and the only hint that it wasn't (Saint's) work was the slight widening of her eyes.

> Whatever happens will be amazing.

For sure! 😊

> I think it's worth noting that Laurence is increasingly friendly here. She even quoted the 200 axioms book for seemingly no purpose other than a joke. If she's not warming up to Cat per se she's at least bringing down her stonewall of "do not even talk to this" that's been up since Camps, when she tried to kill her under the peace banner (the first time).

Good pickup. It is quite a shift from her previous stance. I wonder what's caused this? She's not a subtle person so I don't think she's trying to lull Cat into a false sense of security. And I can't imagine it was the scene with Archer expressing her love. So I am left to wonder what's going on.

Naeddyr

A possibility is that she's falling into her Role as a hero, because Cat is fitting the counterpart role of a heroic comrade too well. Gimli and Legolas.

medailyfun

Actually the Archer's confession can be important, it showed that the Woe were not just clever and cool as Saint had mentioned, but also capable to love and sacrifice

Andrew Mitchell

I agree that it can be important; and it certainly will be important for the resolution of this arc and for the Woe into the future.

My mental image of the Saint is still that she wouldn't be moved by this confession. But I'm happy to admit that I could be wrong, and even that Saint's comments in this chapter are weak evidence against my position.

Liliet

If Laurence can't be moved by this, what can she be moved by? This is clear evidence against her position, and I see her as a generally rational person who just has really skewed priors on this by now. This surprised her model, so she's shifting it, as a rational person does.

She probably doesn't really understand what's up with these people, but at the very least her first guess was wrong.

Andrew Mitchell

You're making a lot of sense and I'm mostly on-board with your view. Thank you. ♥ I think I was viewing her as a fanatic rather than a rationalist.

Given her previous absolute conviction and certainty any thawing of her position is progress. But to jump straight to "her first guess was wrong" is too much of a leap IMO. Maybe she's now, for the first time, open to the possibility that she could be wrong and is working on getting more data (with RS' help) to make sense of this unique situation.

Liliet

Her first guess was wrong as in "this specific model is not it". That doesn't mean she'll go straight for the opposite rather than a slightly modified version: "still awful, just also capable of love". Still, yeah, I think she's in a more open data gathering mode now rather than the previous stonewall of "I am not buying any of this".

And yeah I used to think she was a fanatic too... until the Alchemist story and "dozens". She sounded too much like someone who fucking learns from experience and who knows what it's like to have her beliefs shattered and is open to the concept. Better to admit she had been wrong than to be a stubborn believer; denial is not her thing.

"No matter what you say I don't believe you" is not denial, here. It's a result of experience indeed =x

shveiran

Just opinions here, but I can't say I find the idea convincing.

For Archer's revelation to move her, it would suggest that the idea of a villain having deep affection is rare; otherwise, it doesn't really make sense for it to give Laurence pause. But... I mean, the villains we saw were people still. People love.

Hells, even assuming Cat's group and the Calamities are exceptions, what about Akua? She is as old school as you can get and she still loved her father.

Heck, what about the Sisters? They still love each other, and they have been swimming in murder sacrifices for centuries.

I'm not really seeing "villain being capable of love" as a real revelation.

I guess it is possible Laurence simply never saw it before, but if she was burned "dozens of times", doesn't that mean that none of those villains felt love for anything but themselves? It doesn't seem like a solid theory to me.

Not impossible, but just... a bit unlikely?

Liliet

>For Archer's revelation to move her, it would suggest that the idea of a villain having deep affection is rare; otherwise, it doesn't really make sense for it to give Laurence pause

First of all, there are two more factors in play here than just the fact Archer is in love.

The first is the story that's playing out. Keep in mind that before now Laurence had no idea where Cat was going with all this; she basically enlisted them with the pitch of "trust me, I have a plan". Without ANY specification what the fuck the plan here actually was.

And Laurence's mind does not go to best-case scenarios in this kind of situation.

Second, it's not just the very fact that Indrani's in love that matters here, but the fact she said it. Consider Akua Sahelian: how willing would she be in her Heiress/Diabolist days to admit to any affection towards anyone? Sure she felt it, but she categorized it as a whim / a weakness, and this is a widely held view. It's a classic for people who think doing good is for the weak to also think love is for the weak. Hell, Indrani herself used to think that, remember? It was as recent as Cloaks that she was complaining to Cat about how she keeps feeling this annoying feeling of loyalty and affection.

Indrani actually confessing her feelings for Masego in front of the heroes, especially when Cat was clearly dancing around the topic, means she is either willing to trust them or does not view this as a weakness; or, most likely, a mixture of both.

That's a whole lot of information that goes against Laurence's default expectations.

Third is the mixture of the above: the fact that Catherine Foundling consciously and deliberately went for this kind of story. Sure Laurence had felt her wield a heroic story before, but that was Callow's national story of defense against invaders; it did not bode well for the Crusade, but it did not say much about Catherine's personal character. This? This is confirmation that Catherine actually knows about and values and uses such interesting things as Power of Love, Power of Trust and Power of Friendship. Again, don't think all villains are like Amadeus; he's super mega hugely atypical. Hell, even Alaya told him that attachment was always his weakness. This is a confirmation of Catherine's methodology that Laurence legitimately DIDN'T HAVE before.

(I would note that Sisters are also atypical, particularly for villains Laurence faced. This is at its core the same issue Amadeus had when Tariq outplayed him: only being closely familiar with stories from one region. Villains Laurence has faced are villains from Good nations, ones that had a choice between Good and Evil, and not just Evil and powerlessness. Komena and Andronike in Procer or Levant would have Heroic Names for attempting to preserve their homeland; Amadeus's story is blatantly heroic in shape, just on the wrong side of the border. Laurence would have never met anyone like them before because she didn't foray into nations mired in Evil so deeply that allying with Above is legitimately not an option. She dealt with rejects, those who not only didn't qualify for Good Names, but for skill-based Neutral Names either; or did and then ignored the options this gave them in favor of being blatantly villainous. Catherine and her Woe are nothing like them, and this is not something Laurence would have encountered before)

shveiran

I reply to myself because I can't reply to Liliet's own comment below XD

1st: True, but why would Cat embracing a good story be news to Laurence? She knows she plays the narrative and can play both roles. I think Sain's comment on the Axioms even references it. Is there really any change?

2nd & 3rd: This has some merit. Then again... when has Cat ever done anything but displaying she loves her folks to bits? I'm just saying, if Saint was operating under the assumption that the Black Queen is not baring her heart for the world, she has been doing so willingly assuming it was all pretense. I don't really see how that's possible if it is such a game changer for Laurence. We never saw an indication that this moved her particularly, or that it was a working hypothesis of the Saint. Considering how nicely EE usually foreshadows things... I don't know, it doesn't feel right.

Unofficial 4th: It could be as you say, but we have very little information regarding the normal villains in Procer or Levant. Your read may very well be correct, but it is speculation at this point. I see merit in it, but it is unproven.

Liliet

>1st: True, but why would Cat embracing a good story be news to Laurence? She knows she plays the narrative and can play both roles.

How exactly do you think she knows that?

As I said, Callow's 'national defense' story was up for grabs, Cat wouldn't have needed to try. Shit like First Llesse? Cat didn't expect KAIROS to know that. Kairos, who has a spy network and would be deliberately fishing for information on rivals in a way Laurence doesn't have access to.

Remember how Saint just said that she heard rumors about Akua's Folly after Camps? It was a deliberate huge PR thing, and she still had no idea.

>when has Cat ever done anything but displaying she loves her folks to bits?

In front of Laurence?

>I'm just saying, if Saint was operating under the assumption that the Black Queen is not baring her heart for the world, she has been doing so willingly assuming it was all pretense.

When did Cat bare her heart to the world where Laurence would hear? I mean for fuck's sake she learned better than to display outrage/dismay at villainous shit that horrifies her during Book 1.

I think you're misreading Cat here, and underestimating how much her 'badass villain who gives no shits' facade is working against her here.

>Unofficial 4th: It could be as you say, but we have very little informations regarding the normal villains in Procer or Levant.

>Your read may very well be correct, but it is speculation at this point. I see merit in it, but it is unproven.

It's pure sheer logic with a dash of textual evidence on top. People who do heroic shit become heroes unless there's a reason not to. In Evil nations the reason is big and blatant; in Good nations, there's none. Laurence learned that the hard way, herself.

I mean, yes, it hasn't been formally confirmed, but Laurence kind of went on a rant about it, didn't she?

Liliet

I have two guesses.

First of all, yes the scene with Archer expressing her love. Like, think about this from Laurence's point of view: she is the way she is because of a genuinely held belief that these are horrible vile villains who don't do that. They don't fall in love with each other, they don't reveal it to heroes while their friends are trying to preserve their privacy, they just... don't. And she was just proven wrong about this (remember, Tariq's a truth teller, Laurence trusts him to call shenanigans if there are any). And I bet she was getting "yep this is real" from her story sense too.

Second... I was actually reminded recently of the scene around Camps where she went "I want to have the entrails of whoever did that to her" wrt Cat. She IS a hero; her instinct IS to sympathize. She's been this standoffish because she's been consciously, deliberately and aggressively suppressing it – she can't talk to someone like Cat without it later backfiring on her in the form of pain when they inevitably turn on her. But she's not Akua and not Amadeus and the suppression only works for so long when they keep spending time together and Cat keeps being so damn likable. Like... she's rude af but so's Laurence herself. Their outlooks and attitudes are actually super similar. My guess is that it's really hard for Laurence to not like Cat, which is why she was that aggressive in the first place: she was trying to actively counter the effect.

But she's losing that fight 😊

Andrew Mitchell

Both guesses make sense and it could be both of these and more.

SITB

Laurence literally just dismissed the fact that Archer is witty and funny as an excuse to her actions a chapter ago.

I don't know why is there this prevalent idea that having positive qualities means you are a Hero, either Good or good. Amadeus and his merry maruders had genuine love for each other and even now Masego tries to resurrect his father (a devil); yet no one denies that Black was also a monster that committed a metric ton of atrocities.

Liliet

being funny and being in love and willing to share that fact with heroes are 2 v different categories of thing

if nothing else, think about the story
'witty villain' is one thing but 'a girl risking her life for a chance to snap her beloved out of a villain's possession' is very fucking different like no it doesn't mean Indrani is Good or a good person but it means she's a person period and willing to expose that fact to the world, which is NOT Laurence's default assumption with villains and ofc Laurence doesn't want to be on the wrong side of THAT story lmao

Liliet

Fayhem

> It's worth noticing that Skein cut its losses and dispelled the domain when it was noticed, instead of risking Saint cutting through it, that means it would have taken direct damage from that, it might be useful in the coming fight.

I think that might depend on how you define "direct damage". IIRC when Saint cut Winter she didn't just tear a rent in it she actually cut a piece off. As in, it was no longer Cat's (though Akua snagged it for herself once it was loose, bc Akua). Cat had a full fae Court's worth of power to play with and probably never touched even 10% of it at a single time bc of her principle alienation issues, so she never really missed it long term. Pretty much anybody else with a domain would really need to be a lot warier of permanently losing a chunk of it, whether losing a piece immediately affected them negatively or not.

Of course, I think that losing a chunk of Winter also didn't exactly feel great to Cat in the moment either, so little from Column A little from Column B maybe?

Liliet

>IIRC when Saint cut Winter she didn't just tear a rent in it she actually cut a piece off. As in, it was no longer Cat's (though Akua snagged it for herself once it was loose, bc Akua).

Oo, that's your read on that?

Sounds somewhat plausible, though it's worth noting that snagging a piece of Winter for herself is what made Akua Cat's / part of Cat (that was creepy in the best way)

Fayhem

Yeah, that's how Akua became able to manifest to people besides Cat – she grabbed the slice of Winter when it went flying off, so she then had some power of her own, though she could still only get out to use it at Cat's sufferance IIRC (I think that restriction's gone now too, at this point).

Liliet

Didn't she appropriate Winter through the bindings?

Fayhem

FINALLY found the reference I was looking for, from a conversation between Cat and Zeze after the referenced incident in Bk. IV Ch. 12 (<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2018/05/11/chapter-12-cambre/>):

"Think of your mantle as a cape. Much like your body itself, it is a fixed object in the eyes of Creation."

[...]

"The main difference being that your body is a shape, while your mantle is a pattern of power," he said. "That power is, of course, finite. Not in the sense that using it spends it, but along the lines that the cape remains a cape – it does not grow or lessen, as a living thing would."

"So she cut the cape," I guessed.

"Essentially," he admitted. "You might say she cut out a corner of the cape. The pattern itself being fixed, the rest of the power thinned itself as a whole to recreate that corner."

Liliet

Yeah, I remember that, I don't think Akua took that though

Fayhem

I give up on finding the reference, but I'm like 90% that got mentioned in there somewhere. Probably not the most relevant point by now anyway though, since Winter itself got taken out to dinner Below-style.

1224

I think if Cat told them too much about the enemy then the enemy would pull something out of its ass to surprise them with that they weren't expecting. Safer to say nothing.

Liliet

Ooof, this is also a good point.

Mental Mouse

Aside from intraparty politics and “unspoken plan” issues, briefings are complicated by the point that even if DK can’t scry them, he might well have sent some inconspicuous creature to simply eavesdrop on them.

benthelynx

I’m wondering if one of Skiens aspects is an ‘all paths’ kind of deal. Because this mirrors the keter debacle too closely for it not to be name shenanigans. Also I can’t wait to see what trap the dead king is laying with this pattern

Stormblessed

I really want Cat to get her hands on “two hundred axioms” now. Considering the Saint said she shouldn’t have a copy that should make her want it more. And then I want to see her reaction to the glory that is “Two Hundred Heroic Axioms”!

Andrew Mitchell

That would make for some good PGtE fan-fiction.

moosy

With the mention that Rogue Sorcerer is a transitional name, I wonder if he’s shooting for Warlock. That’s presumably up for grabs now.

Liliet

I don’t think it is necessarily, it was just idle speculation by Cat on possibilities.

And definitely not Warlock, at that.

Andrew Mitchell

Warlock is a Villain name. But RS could become the Wizard of the West.

konstantinvoncarstein

He is not Callowan, and WotW is a exclusively Callowan Name. And I don’t think that RS is a transitional Name.

Euodiachloris

If the Queen if Callow says you’re Callowan, and you agree to be her subject... Tada! New Wizard.

konstantinvoncarstein

Ah yes, well spotted 😊

shveiran

Good catch. I was thinking along Hakram's reasoning on the Warlord name, but Callow is a kingdom, not a race. Clever.

Liliet

I think Sorcerer and Wizard are separate Name lines here, whatever differentiates the two would stand in the way of one transitioning into another though it's possible the Wizard of the West is a deep enough groove that if you slide into it it can just flat out beat your previous Name (as is the case with ruler Names: whatever you were previously straight up doesn't matter)

edrey

it should be possible, specially when he is talking about civility when he is the rogue sorcerer, about the new Name i think is the hedge wizard, the twin who warlock killed, because his eyes and the name-dreams he could have, the heavens shouldn't let such opportunity get wasted. that of course if he survive all this

Andrew Mitchell

I had forgotten about that the Wizard of the West was Callowan, so thanks for the reminder.

IIRC we don't know anything about the Rogue Sorcerer's background so he could be from Callow and the name could be transitional. I don't recall where the transitional name idea came from; I just went along with it. It's fun to speculate but I don't think it's likely to be true.

Fayhem

IIRC it's been established (for a given value of established, at least) that RS is Proceran; it was a plot point that he uses a very specifically Proceran school of sorcery back when Cat was having Akua try to track Black's soul down magically. And I think there's been some references to his native language? Idk for sure on that part.

Transitional Name speculation actually originated with Cat herself. But yeah, there's probably a cultural barrier preventing him from becoming Wizard of the West specifically, even if RS actually is a transitional Name. I saw somebody say "well the queen of Callow can just make him Callowan though!"; no, strongly disagree. Names arise from culture, not just political borders or allegiances per se. That's why orcs never claimed any of the Praesi Names ever, despite being within Praes and sworn to give their allegiance to it. You can't just decree that someone's culture changes, no matter who you are.

shveiran

That's true, but the culture of Callow IS changing. A lot of Greenskins around, these days, and a lot of bona fide callowans starting to see them as the Army of Callow. Loyalty to the Black Queen may trump birth soon... but I will concede it's unlikely we're there yet.

Fayhem

I meant more the culture of the potential Named, actually, though I can see how you'd read it the way you did. If RS doesn't see himself as Callowan then I think that's a fairly insuperable barrier to him getting a Callowan Name, at least as far as I understand Names.

Andrew Mitchell

I think that personal perspective has got to be important, and yet Cat got a Callowan Name (Squire) when she didn't see herself as Praesi.

Fayhem

...Did you mean to phrase that differently?

Andrew Mitchell

Why yes, yes I did mangle that just a bit. 😊

My point was that Cat got a Praesi Name while she was only thinking of herself as Callowan.

shveiran

You know, I was about to concede to Fayhem that the Named-to-be's perspective on the self is key, and so anyone who doesn't see themselves as callowan can't earn a callowan name... but this is a very valid point. I wonder if Cat did see herself as part of the Praesi culture SYSTEM enough for Amadeus to jump-start her past the issue.

Fayhem

Haha no worries. And I think Squire is actually an "open" transitional Name; it can transition into Black Knight (as Amadeus intended) but it's also the precursor to becoming the White Knight, which is definitely open to Callowans.

Fayhem

And now that I've read their comment, shveiran also has an interesting point with:

> I wonder if Cat did see herself as part of the Praesi culture SYSTEM enough for Amadeus to jump-start her past the issue.

I do personally think the primary thing is that Squire is an "open" Name, but you can make a case that it could be pretty relevant that Cat was raised in an Imperial orphanage with a curriculum custom-designed by Amadeus, and her pre-existing plan was already to enter the Praesi system and turn it towards her own ends (by joining the military academy in a more conventional manner than what wound up happening).

C_B

So...how many beings highly similar to, but not quite identical to, Tikoloshe has Masego now conjured and (effectively) killed?

Yikes...

Fayhem

> So...how many beings highly similar to, but not quite identical to, Tikoloshe has Masego now conjured and (effectively) killed?

*and dispersed. Remember, the whole premise here is that you can't actually kill devils.

C_B

My guess here is that Masego is trying to short-circuit the "gain personality over time in Creation" process by re-conjuring Tikoloshe and grafting on a mental imprint of his personality (which took thousands of years to develop the first time, but Masego has a handy record of the already-developed version he's trying to shoehorn in without having to wait).

It's not working, in that he has yet to create a copy of Tikoloshe that meets his specifications...but I imagine each of his attempts is creating an imperfect copy of Tikoloshe, which he then disperses (complete with destroying everything that made it unique, just like happened to the original Tikoloshe).

To my mind, this is morally equivalent to killing someone, even if there's some "essence" that goes back to the Hells.

Everything important about the devil being dispersed is destroyed.

(I could definitely be totally wrong about what Masego is actually doing, though.)

Fayhem

If that is what he's doing I agree that's fucked up. Honestly a very very significant part of why I think what he's attempting is actually a multi-stage process where what he's discarding is just a hollow blank from the stage before where he'd try to "import" the personality (as it were) is that I just don't think even half-mad grief-stricken Zeze would actually do what you're describing to any version of his father, even imperfect ones.

Liliet

^

Liliet

The thing is, there's nothing morally relevant about a newborn devil. And probably not even fully formed, either.

Fayhem

I should follow-up on that previous comment I think (ayy immediate second thoughts). Devils start gaining, for lack of a better term, "personality" in the moment they are formed and not before. If Masego's trying to create a vessel he can reform his father in, I would expect him to be dismissing imperfect vessels before what's presumably the more important part of the procedure. So they'd just have the base amount of personality for devils a fraction of a second after being formed, which is to say functionally none.

Could be wrong about how the procedure he's attempting is operating (I can't use High Arcana, after all) but that's my take.

Mental Mouse

Except it's still a futile effort unless he can recover the memories... and perhaps the bindings, because those also shaped him over many years.

Fayhem

We've gotten precious few details on what Masego's trying for exactly, but it almost seems as if he's essentially trying to reverse entropy. Trying to reassemble Tikoloshe's personality after he was dispersed seems as if it must be like taking a pile of ash from somebody getting completely incinerated and trying to turn it back into a living person (after the ash was blown away by the wind, no less). No wonder even the Hierophant hasn't gotten anywhere, if so; there's miracles and then there's that.

Mental Mouse

Well, Arcadia provides a possible record of Tikoloshe's mind, and that was a pretty serious magical catastrophe – I wouldn't be surprised if his thoughts were imprinted. Whether his entire, lengthy memory is, that's another question.

Fayhem

Mm, point. DK's echo in Arcadia seemed to have his actual memories in it rather than just present thoughts, but then at that point DK didn't have four millennia (IIRC) of accumulated memories like Tikoloshe did. Even if that's all there in Arcadia, somehow conducting a perfect lossless transfer into a newly constructed vessel would be a titanic undertaking. It would certainly explain Masego's obsession with getting the vessel exactly right if so – even beyond his normal perfectionism in magical matters, if you're going to pour four thousand years worth of memories into something you probably kind of need it to be a flawless receptacle to have any chance whatsoever.

Liliet

Yeah, the Arcadia imprint is the only way I'm seeing it even remotely possible. And it still can't not be a fool's errand bc Dead King's agenda =x

Liliet

I don't think he'd need bindings back, sure they shaped him but they already have. Don't forget the convo at Thalassina started with Wekesa breaking those.

"I choose this of my own free will" (TIKOLOSHE SHUT THE FUCK UP AND STAY ALIVE FOR YOUR SON'S SAKE)

Mental Mouse

> (TIKOLOSHE SHUT THE FUCK UP AND STAY ALIVE FOR YOUR SON'S SAKE)

And this is where we discover some combination of differences between both Praesi culture and our own, and also between an ancient incubus and a human father.

Tikoloshe's bond was to Wakesa, who was sacrificing himself for his son.

Liliet

When Masego talked about being the one in the reefs while Wakesa is the one in the city, Tikoloshe reacted with 'FUCK NO' before even Wexsa did.

Tikoloshe loved his son very much. He just was a dumbass who did not think it through in an emotionally charged moment.

Also, upon reread I realized that Wakesa was already dying there. Like, Masego repelled the divine touch, but not before it kind of half crushed Wakesa into paste. Though it's possible he could have fixed himself up with sorcery / survived as Named do, if he'd not done that, so that read still remains 😡

shveiran

There is no reason to say that Tikoloshe had ONE bond. If anything, we simply learned that he loved Wakesa more than he loved Masego.

Even that is stretching, IMO: Wakesa was dying in front of him, and to abandon him in those last instants would have been hard whether he loved him more, less or equal to Masego.

It's not like the incubus had time to sit down and make a pondered, balanced choice.

Mental Mouse

You are thinking of him as a human. I'm not so convinced that applies.

shveiran

I'm thinking of him as a creature capable of sincere affection. But I'll grant that it is speculation, although I feel his very demise kind of proves he was moved by emotions and not bonds at this point.

Mental Mouse

Moved by emotions, but those emotions themselves had been shaped by a long history, and then by the contracts created by Warlock. Contracts that were probably complex enough to constitute a program.

Tikoloshe at his death might well have been among the greatest creations of Praes: A creature of the Hells reshaped and uplifted to be capable of true love, and even the “moral equal” of a human.. But equal doesn’t mean identical – even shaped to the image of humanity, he was ultimately a devil.

(Proving that wrong would be way cool, but would also require an uncharacteristic display by the God’s Below.)

Liliet

All evidence we have says it does.

Liliet

Remember “can be overridden by a stronger desire of my own”?

Daniel E

Now that we are nearer to Hierophant being a focal point of the chapters; I am insanely curious about what exactly he learned from that God Mask back in Thalassina. “Screamed, but did not flinch”.

Chapter 43: Treachery

“Habitually treacherous enemies are accomplices to their own destruction.”

– King Henry Fairfax, the Landless

I breathed in.

Fear drifted into my lungs along with the rotten scent in the air, the poisonous odour of thousands of hellspawn and one of the oldest beasts of the Chain of Hunger. Death, decay and a fight that would have been hard business even with an army at my back. Gods, but it’d been a long night and the dawn of it was not yet in sight. It’d been one thing to stare down armies when I’d been Named, when I’d been in the deepest throes of Winter, but now I was painfully aware this could all end as simply as my throat being opened by some lucky devil. The knowing of that almost numbed my limbs, when it sunk it so suddenly: I could die, in these few coming heartbeats. I could have died at any time on the way here, and even if we survived the closing jaws of this trap I might still die before the night was over. It was an arresting though, one that had my palms prickling.

I breathed out.

Fear is an old friend, I thought. Fear was the pain in my leg, the whispering tune of mistake and mortality and needing to always do better lest if all fall apart. How could it cow me, when I leant on it like a pilgrim's staff? I let that tenet straighten my back and took a look at my opposition. Devils, alas, in the thousands. Walín-falme and akalibsa, as we had fought before, but this was a disparate horde and there seemed no end to the assortment. It made gauging numbers difficult, given the wild variation of shape and size in the swarming throng, but it could be no less than two thousand. We moved, from there, to threats in the singular. The undead Horned Lord known as the Skein was nesting among the ruins of the courtyard and attending hall, its darkly furred strangely humanoid body folded inwards as if it were a beast at rest. Great antlers of bone jutted from the top of its head, set above golden eyes made even more vivid by the deep red gouges beneath them. It was a creature gifted with foresight, near impossible to damage and wielding at least one aspect I knew to be capable of unmaking its mistakes – Spool, it had called it in Keter. At its feet stood two silhouettes, veiled to me until a sliver of Night saw to that mundane frailty.

I breathed in.

Yet more trouble, and my fingers harshly coiled. My predictions had come up short in two different ways and quite visibly so, for I now looked upon two men: one whose frayed tabard bore the twin bells of House Fairfax, the other whose pale green eyes watched all unfolding with open interest. The man who had once been the Good King Edward Fairfax, Seventh of His Name, bore old and intricate plate over which a tabard in the gold and blue of the royal line of Callow hung. He wore no helm, laying bare the face of a man in his late forties with sparse white hair and the eternal beginnings of a beard, and in his hand he held a longsword for which there seemed to be no sheath. To his side, the soul of Amadeus of the Green Stretch had been put in slender silvery stocks, his hands too far kept to reach the gag that had been put over his mouth. My teacher looked much like his physical body did, though there were dark rings around his eyes and a sort of haggard look to him I found deeply unsettling. Black had always been near obsessively neat in his grooming, but his soul laid bare was in disarray. That boded ill, though at least the sharpness in his gaze had not been dulled. A bag had been absent-mindedly tossed between the two of them, one I had with my own hand filled with crowns. That left only...

I breathed out.

Kairos Theodosian, Tyrant of Helike, sat draped over the gaudy throne his gargoyles were keeping aloft unevenly. Though he'd quite brazenly betrayed us, the odd-eyed villain had yet to bother with foibles such as armour or a blade. No that he needed them, with a flock of enchanted gargoyles obeying his every whim and a treasure trove of lethal artefacts at his disposal – to which, he'd added the casting rod of the Rogue Sorcerer, which he was currently toying with as he grinned a pearly white grin. This was all of it, I thought. Our enemy, against which stood three: the Rogue Sorcerer, roughed up and stripped of tools, the now twice-winded Saint of Swords and myself. This was not a fight we would win with swords, I thought, given the disparity in strength there. The best that could be hoped for was delay. We did, however, have one advantage over our foes. The foundations of their side were unsteady, while as long as there such a common enemy before us my own triumvirate would stand united. How can I take your strengths and turn them against you? Four heartbeats had passed, and as the fifth reached us Laurence de Montfort sighed. Not out of disappointment, I decided, or sadness. It was the same sigh I'd heard dockworkers in Laure make when some merchant had filled the hold with no eye to taking out the goods out and an hour-long job was going to end up taking twice as long. The Saint spat to the side, then rested her blade against her shoulder.

"That's going to take a while," she said, sounding irked.

"That's mine, you loathsome turncoat," the Rogue Sorcerer yelled at Kairos.

"I prefer to think of it as ours," the Tyrant jauntily replied. "Although, if you truly want me to return it..."

So, the sharper was about to blow and the moment the three of us were separated by the horde then there would be no more planning. This was it, all I had to scheme.

"Saint, how long can you buy me?" I asked.

"You got a way to win?" the old woman casually asked.

I nodded.

"Then however long you need, Foundling," the Saint of Swords told me with a hard smile.

I supposed she could be counted on to be a reliable whirlwind of destruction to anything she faced even when she was on my side, which was somewhat comforting.

"Keep them off me," I said. "I'll handle the Tyrant."

"Figures you'd go for the cripple," Laurence de Montfort said.

A helpful reminder that 'on my side' didn't mean friendly or any less generally horrid, I noted. A heartbeat later Kairos got the casting rod he'd stolen working and streaks of flame that looked fluid as water shot out towards the Rogue Sorcerer, who took off running towards them. Godsdamn it, Roland. It didn't matter if he could handle the sorcery being thrown at him, Kairos had hundreds of bloody gargoyles to throw at him and however good the hero's set of mail it didn't cover his face or throat or neck. I let the Night course through me and flicked my wrist, spinning a hooked chain that caught the wayward hero by the back of the coat and dragged him back forcefully. The Sorcerer had been about to reach the edge of demolished second story room we were still standing on, but the force I used in pulling him back had him half-tripping backwards. And also narrowly avoiding the knife-wielding gargoyles that popped right up from where they'd been hanging off the edge awaiting to scythe through Roland's ankles, because because Kairos being a chatty jackass didn't mean he wasn't clever. The streaks of flame I left him to deal with as I advanced – he snarled something in a language I didn't recognize, still tripping backwards, and some sort of swirling eddy of air caught them in a spin until the fires gutted out – and dismissed the chains. The gargoyles that'd come over the top milled uncertainly, knives extended into nothing, and did not even manage to chatter before I'd sent twin needles of Night through their torsos. They blew a moment later, and I met Kairos Theodosian's uneven eyes as I came to stand by the edge of the drop.

"So," I said, beginning to reach for my pipe, "how firmly rooted would you say your current allegiances are?"

It was theatrics, not directly asking what it was the Dead King had offered, just like reaching for a smoke in the middle of battlefield. I could not show weakness in the face of the Tyrant of Helike, lest he decide we were spent and that the Dead King's victory was assured. Calm, control and even a smidgen of nonchalance. Anything less and I would not have gotten that keen glint in his good eye, the one that delighted in there still being a game afoot. For though Kairos Theodosian enjoyed a good bout of treachery, he would not commit to it without purpose and would never climb into a sinking ship. In that sense, I understood him in a way that few people could: like me, he had reached his current heights climbing over a tottering pile of victories. Like me, he knew it only took one hard defeat for it to all come tumbling down on his head.

"We are close as kin, our trust boundless and fondness without peer," Kairos soulfully said.

"Kill them," the Skein snarled, head suddenly rising up. "Kill them all."

I passed my palm over the head of my pipe, allowing a flicker of black flame to light it before pulling at the wakeleaf unhurriedly. I sighed in pleasure, feeling the Tyrant's gaze unwavering on me.

"Shouldn't you see to that?" Kairos amusedly asked, moving his head towards the courtyard.

Devils, Revenant, the closest thing I'd ever have to a father. A fight I could not win. Calm, control, never miss a beat.

"That's what heroes are for," I said.

I glimpsed, from the corner of my eye, the Saint of Swords landing in the midst of a sea of devils with her sword raised high. Screaming followed, none of it hers. So, Kairos hadn't taken the unspoken invitation I'd given to imply he was open to further treachery. Which meant Neshamah had bought him with a prize that was significant enough the Tyrant didn't believe I'd be able to match it. He wasn't refusing the prospect of turning on the Hidden Horror, that wasn't his way, but he was making it known the bidding had started high and would only get higher. So what did he offer you? I wondered. Given that Kairos' ambitions were still bound, as far as I knew, to the peace conference he'd forced then it had to involve the survival of the armies below. Or at least his, I corrected, for Iserre was made into a tremendous butcher's yard by the Tyrant's hand then the only the threat of utter annihilation could possibly bring either Hasenbach or myself to negotiate with him ever again. Couldn't be just being spared, though, because the Grand Alliance would be crippled by losing the armies below and so far Kairos had gone out of his way to avoid accomplishing that. I was missing something, because I could see no way in which the Dead King taking this realm benefitted the Tyrant. My fingers tightened, beneath cover of my sleeves. Was it that simple? When I'd irritated the Hidden Horror, he'd said something that now sounded anew in my mind: when I have taken what I wish from this ruin I will forsake it as well. If after he got what he'd come after Neshamah had no use for this place, what would he lose by promising it to the Tyrant of Helike?

I inhaled smoke and blew it outwards towards Kairos, whose nose wrinkled at the acrid smell. I couldn't beat that offer. It was a way for the Tyrant to get everything he wanted, so long as the Hidden Horror got it too. Which was, I realized, my angle. Kairos Theodosian could not, as I'd thought earlier, afford a single hard defeat. And he had to be achingly aware here that he'd made a bargain with an entity his superior in every way, including perhaps even treachery, and that if he was crossed then he had no real way to strike back. Not alone, anyway, and when it came to opposing the Dead King then there was only one game in town.

"Well, he's lying to at least one of us," I pensively said. "Did you offer something worth more than a hundred-year truce?"

"You jest," the Tyrant grinned.

A little too quickly, I thought.

"I'm deadly serious," I said. "Kairos, I'll be blunt here because if he's actually sold this place to you instead of me I'll need to cut my losses and break it. Which is going to be damned hard to do a messy besides, so I haven't the time to dawdle. I got my win here in exchange for backing his envoy at the conference when the truce offer comes. One of us got peddled goods already sold, obviously, so which of us is it?"

"A truce," the Tyrant skeptically said.

"Don't be daft," I frowned. "You know what it's meant for. I'm willing to take the bet, because I'll get this continent ready for war on Keter even if I have to kill and raise every ruler myself, but I'm hardly blind to the risks."

A hundred years was a long time. Time to prepare, yes, but also for the continent to come apart. A truce meant no armies, not absence of schemes, and the most brutal blow the Hidden Horror might yet deal was to let that century come to pass and then do nothing. To let every willing sacrifice turn into bitter recrimination, to let his opponents devour themselves from the inside without sending a single soldier across the border. If I'd tried to weave a lie out of thin air, I thought, the Tyrant might just have sniffed me out. But this? If I were Kairos Theodosian, I'd believe it. Because I would afraid I'd been double-crossed, yes, but also because of who it was I was looking at. A woman who'd bargained with the King of Winter and Sve Noc, when the cliff's edge was reached, and Hells hadn't I headed to Keter to make another deal not so long ago? The Tyrant of Helike watched me with an inscrutable expression his face, and the simple fact that he was no longer grinning like a lunatic told me I'd drawn blood. I thought, for a moment, of feigning impatience and trying to hurry him along – an announcement it was time to cut my losses, cryptic action begun – but I stilled my tongue. On real stakes I would not gamble this way. And the more I actually lied, the more I risked this exceedingly more skilled liar catching me out.

"Speak to me, then, Black Queen," the Tyrant coolly said.

Not victory, this, but it was an opening.

"I'm not going to bribe you," I snorted. "You just knifed us, Kairos. You want back on this side? Make it worth my while to keep the heroes from putting your head on a pike. I'm willing to deal because I'd rather you sell me this place than the Dead King, but don't mistake that for actual need."

For a terrible moment, I thought I'd overplayed my hand. That the bluster had been too much, that I'd been seen through because I'd refused to bend my neck even if in that situation it would have been my words exact. Instead I was interrupted by a flock of steel-clad devils, whose leathery wings beat loud as they descended towards me with raised spears. My muscles began to tense and it was all I could do not to reach for the Night. But I had appearances to maintain, and Gods I was so close to flipping the Tyrant I could almost taste it. The walin-falme hit a hastily slapped down ward like birds hitting a window, as the Rogue Sorcerer came through for me. I did not even grin, instead pulling at my pipe as I continued matching gazes with Kairos. Look at how in control I am, I thought. Wouldn't I have to be a lunatic, to stick to a bluff so stubbornly when the situation is this dire? Airily tossing aside the Sorcerer's casting rod – Roland distantly screamed in a furious voice about it being irreplaceable and worth a fortune – and extending an open palm, Kairos was handed his jeweled sceptre by a chitter gargoyle and used it to thoughtfully scratch his chin.

"Are you lying?" the Tyrant of Helike asked, cocking his head to the side.

I grinned, all teeth and malice.

"I don't know," I said. "Am I?"

A heartbeat passed, both stares unflinching.

"I think, Catherine," Kairos Theodosian fondly said, "that you are lying through your teeth. But I still can't tell, and so it seems were are still allies."

Calmly I inhaled a mouthful of wakeleaf, and waited for the – there it is, I thought as the Skein's hulking shape obscured the sky, rising behind the Tyrant and myself. The stench of it was horrid, though spitting out the smoke in front of my face took the edge off of it.

"Spool," the Skein snarled.

And just like that/

/the Tyrant of Helike sneered.

"Fate is a tug of war, you raggedy old thing," Kairos Theodosian said, and there was something sharp in his tone I'd never heard there before. "Do you think the wishes of the conquered matter more than those of contenders?"

"You die laughing," the Skein hissed. "Or. You flee. Or. I am broken. Or. Everything burns. Or. Or. Why does it keep changing?"

"There's more than one reason I picked him out for this band," I amusedly said.

Was Kairos Theodosian a treacherous, unpredictable and murderous madman? Yes. Obviously. But against a particular kind of foe – say, an oracle who'd spin out of new thread of prediction from his every whim as the lunatic committed to them with ironclad will unhesitatingly – that had its uses.

"Spool," the Skein snarled again and/

/"Do you think yourself above even the Gods, you presumptuous relic?" the Tyrant of Helike snarled back. "Do you think you can erase me like chalk on a slate? Learn your place."

"Shouldn't have done that," I told the Revenant, pulling at my pipe.

"It will kill you," the Skein cackled, its laughter like rumbling thunder. "Wish, wish into the grave. How many years can you spend?"

I winced. I'd fought enough Named to recognize when one's bottom line was being crossed, and the continued attempts of the Revenant to use its aspect were definitely whipping Kairos into a proper frenzy. I could only guess at what was the cause of it, but the rage in that crimson bloodshot eye and the wildly shaking hands struck me as too raw to be a lie.

"I will confess," the Tyrant of Helike said, tone eerily calm, "that you have rather offended me. You may attend to other matters, Black Queen. This one will be settled by my hand."

"And now," I said, "for my next trick."

Because if I were an undead sorcerer with my personal Hell and forever ahead of me, if I'd taken to snatching Named and making them into my vanguard in Creation – which would mean, most of the time, that they'd be far from me and exposed to all sorts of aspects and sorceries – then there was one thing I'd make sure of. The Skein went still as the corpse it was, and pale gold eyes shone with something eldritch.

"You have been fooled, Tyrant," the Dead King spoke through his puppet. "I struck no bargain with the Black Queen."

And there it was, I thought. The gap between the man the Hidden Horror had once been and the man the Tyrant was. Neshamah had been a brilliant, sharp-sighted sorcerer whose apotheosis had been achieved over decades of careful planning with nary an opening left open. Even in undeath the heart of that man remained, made stiffer perhaps but undiminished. And the thing was, he had that same flaw that my father sometimes did. Gods, clever as they were they forgot anyone else could see the world in a different way they did. Forgot to see, I supposed, or simply didn't care. Why would they? Victors that they were, they'd gotten their way so often. But Kairos Theodosian, now that was a man of a different breed. He was Tyrant of Helike not because he wanted to change the world, to shift borders on a map or leave behind a name that would ring through the ages. Kairos, he was villain. He was a partisan of Below, not a warlord or a theft of godhead, and his faith was the same ruinous red thing that had rent the Wasteland asunder for more than a millennium. And so the Dead King, brilliant monster that he was, had just made his first blunder of the night. Because the moment he'd made an effort to not be at odds with the Tyrant of Helike, he'd made every lie I'd spoken irrelevant. Because, in the eyes of the Tyrant, he would only be worth appeasing if he was a threat. And given the choice between successfully crossing me or the Dead King? Well, one of them was worthier prayer than the other.

I met the Dead King's eyes.

"Mistake," I said in Ashkaran.

"Rend," Kairos Theodosian laughed, and all Hells broke loose.

matesbe

Tyrant really is the best Villain, after Cat and Black. He's just so unapologetic about it, it's almost endearing.

Dainpdf

No love for Traitorous and Irritant?

Malicia also has a sense of competence and dignity I quite appreciate.

Oshi

Irritant wasn't a villain. He was just glorious.

Dainpdf

Seeing as he was a Dread Emperor, I must respectfully disagree.

Kissaten

That's why he abdicated. No longer Dread Emperor, heroes no longer have any reason to kill him.

Dainpdf

Did he? What chapter is that from?

ATRDCI

Epigraph from Book 4 Chapter 68: Poised

“Obviously you can’t kill me now: your enmity is with the Dread Emperor of Praes, and I’ve already abdicated. I am now but a humble shoemaker, and what kind of hero slays a shoemaker?”

– Dread Emperor Irritant, the Oddly Successful. Later noted to have made surprisingly nice shoes during his three abdications.

Dainpdf

Thank you!

Dainpdf

Also, he did keep the villainous status.

Clint

Are you slandering this humble shoemaker?

Rey d`Tutto

A truly gifted humble shoemaker, please.

erebus42

I think it’s because he remembers that the most important thing about being Evil is to have fun. As much as the Diabolist got some good mileage out of the whole classic villain schtick she took herself way too seriously and never stopped to smell the roses. Kairos is the walking, talking embodiment of “fuck it” which I think is a big part of why he’s so awesome. Honestly if there has been one good argument against Black and Cat’s “practical” style of Evil and for the classic one it has been the amount of fun the Tyrant seems to have been having ever since his debut.

RoflCat

In other word, he’s this trope incarnate:

NerfGlastigUaine

And one the best examples besides IM0. Also, I love Trope Talk, I hope Red makes more videos soon.

Liliet

...Neshamah acts like he isn't but he really is, Kairos acts like he is but he really isn't. Fucking beautiful.

Kairos is definitely heavily based on the trope even if there's mix and match :3

Liliet

...and also Guide defies the "third act breakdown" trope altogether. Villains know they lose at the end, and they go down manically cackling "and I never gave a shit in the first place!"

Hmm. If anyone actually DOES get a genuine "I never saw this coming" third act breakdown it's Neshamah, because he DOES think he's cheated the system. If that's ever subverted, well,

NerfContessa

Ah, my colleague, you are so. Right.

Love that tyrants style.

Liliet

He isn't. The first core trait is "backstory doesn't matter to their motivation" and like... did you see how Kairos reacted to Skein talking shit about his mortality? Kairos is 100% backstory driven. He's not that trope.

He's going to forever act like he is and take offense to any indication he isn't. But he isn't.

Neshamah is, though :3

Liliet

oooooooooooooooooooo

I watched further into the video and

'pure chaos, which is a very similar archetype to pure evil but moves in different directions'

THIS

this is Kairos vs Neshamah

sutortyrannus

>I think it's because he remembers that the most important thing about being Evil is to have fun.

"The most important part of any summary execution is to remember to have fun and be yourself." – Dread Empress Malevolent II

erebus42

A statement I'm sure Kairos would wholeheartedly agree with.

Liliet

Yep.

Kairos embodies the proper disagreement between Evil and Good: not of means, but of ends. His ends are those for which what Evil offers really is best, and the only argument against him standing Evil could be "is this what you really want?"

Because he believes he does.

naturalnuke

As soon as Skein tried to rewrite him I knew he was solidly in Catherine's camp again.

Valkyria

solid and fluid are very much the same when speaking about the tyrant I think.

Just look how he treats his former allies he was close as kin whom he trusted boundless...

Mental Mouse

> solid and fluid are very much the same when speaking about the tyrant I think.

He actually is kinda like a non-Newtonian fluid (oobleck etc): Try to be gentle and he oozes away. If you just smack him, then suddenly it's easy to pick him up and move him... as long as you keep handling him roughly!

.

Andrew Mitchell

That makes a surprising amount of sense.

NerfContessa

Sooooo, brooks had theodosian liquified for their original DNA cushioning material? No wonder they switched to cheap foam, theodosian fluid ran out :p

Mental Mouse

As I've said before, Kairos' treachery is so reliable that Cat can just work it into her plans.

onedollargum

A dishonest man you can always trust to be dishonest.

Mikasi

It's always the honest ones you have to watch out for. Never know when they might start lying to you.

shveiran

"Honestly, it is the honest men you need to watch out for, 'cause you never know when they'll do something really stupid"

Fuodiachloris

Yup. Kairos stands by one principles: to have active choices (even bad ones) matter.

Also, loved he Dead King pressing his other button; more worthy and much more difficult (but, apparently, takeable – who knew?) target sighted.

Liliet

oooooo this is a really good summation

Jeffery Wells

Tyrant is a real villain's villain. He's got goals and plans, but the most important thing about those goals and plans is that they are the most villainous things he can think of at the time. Best way to fuck up with him is to accidentally give him an opportunity to be even more villainous.

antoninjohn

We all know that Cat can trust her good friend Kairos to stand by her side

Novice

I mean, why would anyone doubt the Tyrant's eternal friendship? It's obvious from the very start that Kairos would help the Black Queen forever and ever. Clearly this turn of events is very much predictable and EE should rewrite this chapter.

A Big Ol Rat

Spool

Dainpdf

Kairos will always be right behind her, ready to stab anyone trying to sneak at her back.

Euodiachloris

/anyone else 😊

Stormblessed

Hahahaha! I love that it's this moment where Cat pulls out the truth that she can speak Ashkaran. It's the perfect moment because this is the one time she's truly gotten one up on the Dead King. It shows her growth at being able to handle the two biggest threats we know about. The Bard and the Dead King. And here in this moment I think he's realizing just how right he might've been when he said that Cat could "Some day be a peer." And he might be regretting those words right about now.

Dainpdf

He probably knew. He's had access to Masego's memories, plus he invited Cat and co. to visit him through Arcadia, knowing their capabilities. That that probably planted the idea of this whole endeavor in Masego's mind is probably not a complete coincidence, either.

Odinski

He did know, but Cat has refused to admit it untill this moment despite them both knowing that she knows that he knows.

Andrew Mitchell

This.

Liliet

Yeah, Cat pretending to not know Ashkaran was Kairos brand level of shameless alternate reality ♥ ♥ ♥

Javvies

Heh.

Chasing ahead blindly out of emotion? Tsk, tsk, Rogue Sorcerer. That's how you get killed. Now you owe Cat your life.

Kairos ... interesting, but did you really think that the Dead King would keep his word without secretly attaching strings or a suicide pill?

Dainpdf

He did block the devils from tearing her open just after, though.

Mental Mouse

A hook and chain to yank Roland back? Seriously?

Nope, not seriously. Comedy. She tossed Roland a jester's cap to match the Tyrant's, offering him the protections of the heroic comic relief.

Meanwhile, Neshamah got completely snared by Cat's banter with Kairos... which is odd. Did his "influence" over Masego perhaps backfire upon DK? Because golden eyes or not, this is more how Masego might have responded!

Liliet

I think Cat's analysis is spot on. Do note she predicted exactly what would happen to the degree of employing dramatic smugness around it ♥

Someguy

Ah. If Kairos can pull a win over Bard whom Dead Dude has never won against, of course he can win against Dead Dude.

Dainpdf

Has he not? His apotheosis itself was a massive win, of greater impact than Kairos's. Plus she's thrown him a bone or two over the years, like the Spellblade. Something like respect, there.

JJR

I can't remember what chapter it was, but it was also mentioned that he managed to capture the Bard and vivisect her. How he managed that I have no idea, especially with Bard's teleport away from danger aspect.

Ιούλιος Καίσαρας

I believe it's against Mortal danger. He "just" made it sure that her life wouldn't be in any danger whatsoever.

Liliet

* away from death, not danger 😊

shveiran

I wonder, is that confirmed to be how the Bard's power works? We have never seen her take damage except from auto-inflicted wounds, but not ALL wounds are even potentially lethal. Are we certain it is death-based?

Liliet

Well, that's what Neshamah said in that explanation???

shveiran

It just doesn't make too much sense.

I mean, when you think about it, that isn't THAT powerful a failsafe. All it takes is for someone to know you have it, and then they throw you in a cell. If you are too restrained to kill yourself and force-fed, you are stuck forever? I mean, obviously someone is going to make a mistake sooner or later, but that seems too easy a counter for the Intercessor. There must be more at play.

Liliet

Wander would likely drag her away to some other place after some time. I'm guessing she COULD get stuck like this for a while, just not for long.

Dainpdf

Never have her life be at risk during the process, for starters.

Kissaten

Dead King's Apotheosis is a trap for him. He made no mistakes, left no openings, so he was forced into a state which he cannot escape. Not only he has to be invited to the Creation, he is bound to Serenity and has everyone as his enemies.

medailyfun

still big improvement over being plain dead 😊

Sylwoos

Not at all, those restrictions are self-imposed. DK can step out of Serenity and drown the continent in undead whenever he wants, he just knows how this particular story ends and avoids it.

Dainpdf

I am pretty sure the only binding is one of his choosing. By never leaving unless invited, he accrues no risk, which seems to be his modus operandi.

(Because then the villain of the story becomes whoever invited him, so the narrative doesn't really support the Dead King being ended or something of the sort.)

danh3107

Is Mistake officially a Cat catch-phrase? It's not as catchy as lesser lesser footrest, but I like it still.

Gunslinger

It's an inheritance from her father.

Dainpdf

I must say I didn't quite follow when she started using it. Felt like I was missing some sort of character development in between.

Croelty

I honestly have been trying to recall for a while now when exactly Cat started to refer to Black as her father, without much success. That also seems like a character moment I missed out on.

Agent J

When she dumped Killian, went to chat with him instead of her friends at the campfire, and ended the night dozing off as "her father" put a blanket over her.

Dainpdf

That is quite recent, and I don't think we got a real moment for it either. I think it started on book 5.

Liliet

Actually in Book 4 she gobsmailed me with it during her talk with Andronike. The exact quote was something like "I was angry with my father, for being so much less than he could be".

I was not surprised afterwards :3

Dainpdf

True! Still came a bit suddenly, though I guess it happening during an introspective moment is kind of better.

I just feel a moment like that needed more oomph?

Liliet

That moment had all the oomph it needed as far as I'm concerned do keep in mind it was followup to Second Llesse already, which was the culmination of the entire book 3, the first serious beat of the 'yes hes her dad' arc was Epilogue II and the first mention of it as a possibility was Book 1 Chapter Fall

Dainpdf

Sure. I guess it's down to personal taste? In the middle of all that for me it got overshadowed by all the other conflict going on, plus the human thing.

I guess I could chalk the sudden decision to trauma, but I still feel there could have been more struggle with the concept. I will add it to the "List of things I feel the skip between books 4 and 5 robbed me of".

Liliet

The struggle was all of Books 2 and 3 😊you're better off listing it among things that Cat being Wintered robbed you of

...I mean I'm not telling you how to enjoy the story, some part of it is def down to personal taste

Dainpdf

Don't know, I just feel it was not enough. And yes, Winter was something of a hiatus in her character development. Considering that arc was so very long, it makes sense that it drove the density of emotional investigation down sharply. Still, we barely got to see Cat deal with readopting her humanity. All that, presumably, happened during the skip between books.

Liliet

I mean the way I'm reading it, dealing with it is precisely what's happening onscreen in front of us. The fear fragment's part of it. The increasing mentions of 'father' is another.

Mental Mouse

It's been developing smoothly since the beginning, from "hah, he'd be a wierd-ass father figure" through "the closest thing I have to a father" to claiming him as such at least internally, and iirc she's actually said so to some of the closest in her "family".

Liliet

Yeah lmao the first one had been in Book 1 on the balcony ♥ ♥ ♥

Rook

Only became a noticeable catchphrase in book 5.

Coincidentally around the same time that she freed herself of Winter and realized her sharpest weapon was her mind, not her sword.

It was a pretty noticeable bit of character development since the end of book 4 was the first turning point where she stopped ruining herself to win battles, and started giving up battles to avoid ruin

Dainpdf

Sure. It's just that having that just start with the new book, with no explicit build-up to it, feels a bit jarring.

Fayhem

There's been a lot of explicit build-up. She's been referring to him internally as her father since partway through Book III. The frequency has stepped up a bit in Book V but that's the only real change there.

Dainpdf

She didn't really do so without reserve like she's been doing, as far as I remember. She called him "almost my father" or something like it, I think, but never this much recognition. Again, if I recall correctly.

Fayhem

Bk III Ch 57 (<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2018/01/08/chapter-57-revolve/>), last sentence: "The last part I remembered of that night was my father's hands putting a blanket over me."

She's been doing this for a while. The tempo and ease of the references to Amadeus as her father have increased, but the precedent was set a long time ago now.

Fayhem

Ayyy replied to completely the wrong thing/completely misintepreted you. PLEASE IGNORE ME

Dainpdf

Uh, what?

Fayhem

I replied on the premise that you were saying there was no explicit buildup to Cat calling Black her father, but then I looked again and saw that you were replying to the comment about Cat starting to say "mistake" like Black does. So I thought that was what you were talking about when you said there was no explicit buildup. But I guess you actually were talking about her calling Amadeus her father?

Dainpdf

...yes? I am very confused.

Fayhem

As was I, clearly. I think we're both talking about the same thing now though.

Liliet

IT WAS IN BOOK 4 AND I DIED WHEN IT WAS

Dainpdf

Now the question is: Is undead Liliet still Liliet?

Liliet

is undead Akua still Akua? 😊

Dainpdf

Who knows.

daegone823

Everdark, which was ironic since they were the farthest apart. Black also had lost his soul at this point fighting an illegal war against Procer(most likely for Chat to distract crusade)

Dainpdf

An illegal war? According to whose laws? Having an international regulation of... well, anything, is sort of the point of the story.

Miles

Only the people may declare war

Dainpdf

I didn't know you read the serial, Anaxares! Shout-out from a fan!

Isi Arnott-Campbell

A Cat-chphrase, if you will.

taovkool

...this is a bad idea but eh, fuck it.

CatXKairos. I'll ship it.

Impossible, I know. But there's weirder ships out there in the sea.

1224

Honestly I ship it too. They play off each other pretty well.

Dainpdf

One of them would be a widow by the end of the first hour.

erebus42

It would be a glorious hour though.

Novice

It would bring the Red Wedding to shame.

erebus42

Honestly, I ship them too. She's probably one of the only people in the world that really understands what he's about and he could probably get her to lighten up a little. They'd both probably be planning on how to best murder each other but Kairos would probably view that as a great couple activity.

Liliet

nah, they'd be a terrible match bc the minute Cat learned of Kairos's tragic backstory she'd be too distracted dealing with sudden sympathy to be any fun for him anymore

Someguy

Eh. Old Akua and Kairos was my ship. Malicia should have arranged the political union to make them big ass targets for Heroes throughout Calernia. It'd have brought her more tangible Intelligence assets on Heroic capabilities & weaknesses as well as political time than Akua's Folly as a big stick to play whack-a-mole.

erebus42

Maybe, I've always been a sucker for a good ol' opposites attract couple though.

shveiran

Opposites, as in "my deepest desire is to burn the world to see how high the pyre reaches and yours is for people not to do that anymore" opposites?
Your ships need counseling, sir.

erebus42

I never claimed my ships were overly stable in the long-term.

Kelthor

Eh I kinda just want them to be best buds. Not saying married people can't be best buds, but it feels like it would change the dynamic between the two.

I'm currently shipping CatXAkua.

Liliet

My fleet:

CatAkua (without skipping any steps or changing their current dynamic, let them do what they are doing, I ship THAT)/

CatIndrani/IndraniAkua/IndraniMasego (qp)

CatRozala

(crack) CatCordelia

major friend ships that get my heart aflutter also:
Cat/Juniper
Cat/Laurence (yes I'm serious)

caoimhinh

LMAO

Vortex

At this point I am not sure you are a shipper anymore, at this point I feel like you are running a fucking port.

Liliet

I'm the aro ace poly dockmaster!

Whiteeyes

"How dare you try to predict my actions! I can't predict my actions, who gave you the right to try!?"

erebus42

I'm pretty sure that was his exact thought process.

nick012000

More to the point, though, the Tyrant's whole thing is the defiance of Fate – it's the whole reason he became a Villain in the first place, and the driving reason behind why he does what he does.

caoimhinh

Kairos came into his Name by beating Fate and making the prophecy of his death into a lie, so he is among the best-equipped people to fight an oracle.
That also means that fighting someone pretending to use Fate against him, Kairos will take the matter VERY seriously and personal.

Liliet

More like "go ahead and predict my actions, i DARE you to try"

Skein: "AAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAAA"
Catherine: "challenge accepted"

Sylwoos

Tyrant is a very simple man. He see a opening, he stab.

Nairne .01

If that's so, he should get acquainted with Robber.

Gunslinger

The typos made this chapter slightly harder to follow, but my word the chapter itself was great. Cat saying mistake in Ashkaran is one of the crowning highlights of this series. How many times can one sass the fucking Dead King.

Also more insightful readers, was Kairos unraveling Spool by using his Wish aspect? He doesn't say it out loud but the Skeins line about Wish all you want makes me think so

Dainpdf

That, plus he seems to better at the Maddened Fields strategy than Cat was.

Liliet

Yeah, he doesn't even need to try, his mind is just naturally like that ;u;

Dainpdf

Plus I bet he made special study of the woman who "defeated" his most famous predecessor.

1224

Probably. I think the only time you have to say an aspect is the first time you use it.

caoimhinh

Yeah, Kairos outright says it when Skein first uses Spool.

"Do you think the wishes of the conquered matter more than those of contenders?"

It's interesting how Wish is working here, it's not reading Skein's heart and wishes, it's turning his spooling back of time into wishful thinking, an immaterial thing. That's almost going Meta, but I guess the fact that Kairos came into his Name by beating a prophecy might be giving him an edge against time/fate-related abilities.

Overcoming Fate is the very beginning of Kairos' story, an Oracle is screwed against him.

Valkyria

It could also be that the aspect here is reading the Tyrants own wishes and makes them reality. He wished to stay in this "timeline", so it can't be changed by the Skein.

Liliet

I think it's not that meta and much more straightforward: Wish allows Kairos to "make a wish" and have it come true, at the cost of years of his life (which pissed him off for Skein to bring up / try to use against him). Wish in DnD can mimic the effect of any spell iirc; in this case it was Counterspell to Skein's Spool :3

Gunslinger

How does years of his life work I wonder? Don't Villains have an endless life span? Maybe it twists Fate so that no matter what he'll reach a violent end faster

shveiran

I like this theory, but I wonder how it STARTED. I mean, I'd think this was his first aspect, as it was needed to overcome the prophecy and make the rest possible, but at that point Kairos didn't have a lifespan. Or rather, it was a very, very short one.

mavant

If his fate was originally to die at age 13, and he's older than that now, maybe the only way to kill him is to de-age him.

Liliet

I think while that's true for villains in general it might not be true for Kairos

Clint

"Also more insightful readers, was Kairos unraveling Spool by using his Wish aspect? He doesn't say it out loud but the Skeins line about Wish all you want makes me think so"

I took it as something more complicated – like he was determined to use Wish to wish to do something the Skein hadn't foreseen. So instead of seeing one, or a few, clear threads forward, the Skein kept seeing more and more possibilities – it couldn't lock one down because as soon as it saw one possibility, Wish made that not what Kairos would choose to do in the actual coming future.

Andrew Mitchell

Oh, I like that interpretation.

Liliet

He wouldn't need Wish for that, it's his natural thought process 😊😊😊

Dainpdf

On one hand, this was awesome. On the other, seeing Neshamah outwitted like this is a bit anticlimactic. If he truly has been, I mean.

Now to picture Black's soul laughing at what Cat just said... he most likely can't understand Ashkaran, but surely he knows what she said.

RoflCat

I'm sure he can tell, because at that moment she probably has the punchably smug face that he would do in the same situation.

Y'know, just like when Nauk pointed out she make 'the face' that usually means they'll win.

And I think it was Hellhound that explains she has basically the grinch's evil smile in that moment.

Don't remember when it was, but probably long before Arcadia.

Agent J

Battle of Three Hills. Backs against the river, outnumbered by the Silver Spears, and Cat starts smiling. So Nauk relaxes, certain in their victory.

Dainpdf

Well Black's thing is that he wouldn't smile or gloat so hard he'd underflow the humility and cross right back into smug territory. But yeah, Cat's probably got that smile right now.

Liliet

I actually bet he can't guess what she said bc he wouldn't expect her to use HIS catchphrase :3

Also, no wonder Neshamah got outwitted: this is Catherine's chosen battlefield, hearts and minds of allies :3

Liliet

I also wouldn't be surprised if getting beaten by Catherine here wasn't actually Neshamah's preferred outcome: sure he loses a short term opportunity, but he gains a long term rival/peer 😊

Dainpdf

What is even long term when you are the Dead King? Cat has extended lifespan, but she's still dust in the wind.

Liliet

That's not what he's saying!

Dainpdf

Yes, he minimized the lifespan difference when he was trying to argue her into accepting a bad gamble. It was in his interest that she think she would still be around in a hundred years, and that she think herself a threat to him then. I am not saying he lied – he didn't tell her she'd live forever – but it was in his interest to frame his answer in such a way.

Liliet

True.

I just get general narrative vibes for “like fuck Cat's dying in a mere single human lifespan”, too ;u;

Dainpdf

I could see some kind of final sacrifice ending for her. Because as much as she says so, I don't see her moving to The Garden and becoming a farmer after her deeds are done.

Liliet

Of course not, are you kidding me? She walks off into sunset (probably to another continent, to wander with Indrani) and Callow knows her as the Queen who will return in their darkest hour 😊

Dainpdf

Maybe. I wonder whether she can, though, embroiled with Sve Noc as she is.

Liliet

I'm sure they won't mind once she's set them up ♥

shveiran

"Outwitted" it's a stretch, I feel. this is a tiny, tiny part of all the DK is doing. Heck, even this "meteor Arcadia unto my enemies' armies" is a small part of all he's doing. He is the Enemy, the Hidden Horror, the Adversary. He is the mind on his side fighting the war, and he is winning. Recruiting the Tyrant and sending the Skein were two moves in this clash with the heroes in this particular battle.

Outplayed? Perhaps, good sir, but not outmaneuvered.

Not yet, and not by a long shot.

Dainpdf

I guess this does fit within his MO: sure, she outplayed him, but he hasn't really lost much... well, except for a few revenants.

Oshi

Until we understand what he has done to Masego we can't begin to understand this fight.

shveiran

True. My argument, however, is that the DK doesn't do climatic battles. He controls the field. He will have to be outmaneuvered A LOT to be forced into a decisive confrontation, because he, like Cat, understands how that story ends.

So he plays it safe. Set so many irons in the fire that it doesn't matter if the heroes turn some of them.

Mental Mouse

> seeing Neshamah outwitted like this is a bit anticlimactic.

Oh, the show ain't over 'till the fat lady sings. But for the first time, Cat has maneuvered DK into a misstep, instead of jumping through his hoops. She really is a contender.

M0och

I think this series has turned into my religion...

M0och

Because gods, how can a series be this f*cking awesome in every aspect!

erebus42

Damn. Tricking the Dead King into showing some skin so that the Tyrant couldn't help but stab him in it. For a relatively improvised plot that was brilliant (assuming it was part of the plan). The fight is still young though.

:)

"Mistake," I said in Ashkaran.

Neshamah's Folly

Isaac Martinez

I think that the moment that Cat stops feeling fear, is the moment that she dies.

Liliet

I think Cat agrees with you XD

Soma

DAMN.

Get scolded in your own dead tongue. Catherine's been showing her mind and her words are sharper than any blade tonight. How many people could trash the dead king in an encounter, let alone with just words? The intercessor? Points for sheer power and style.

werafdsaew

I'm not understanding something here; why would the Dead King showing up make him not a threat to the Tyrant?

Kai Merah

It's not that it doesn't make him a threat, it's that if you're trying to appease your enemies/underlings or trying to prevent conflict between yourself and your enemy/underling, clearly, you're only doing so because you consider said enemy/underling a threat. To Kairos, Dead King showing up means Kairos is important/threatening enough to need appeasement. So he thinks he can stand a chance of double-crossing the Dead King now, since the Dead King considers him a worthy opponent/threat. And between double-crossing Cat, and double-crossing Dead King, it's clearly a more awesome feat to successfully double-cross and beat Dead King.

wirelessgrapes

Because he makes the move to step in to try to re-establish his control over his chained tiger. Tyrant is so ingrained in his role, that he simply cannot ignore the chance to turn on his 'superior'

Euodiachloris

It's the Way of the Starscream: why be content in just backstabbing Galvatron when you can target Megatron? Or, you know, both?

JJR

How soon until Tyrant back stabs himself though?

Liliet

He does that every time he uses Wish :3

ciara

You're mixing up the pronouns in this bit (understandably, there's a lot of "he" in there):

"Because the moment he'd made an effort to not be at odds with the Tyrant of Helike, he'd made every lie I'd spoken irrelevant. Because, in the eyes of the Tyrant, he would only be worth appeasing if he was a threat."

Kairos isn't being convinced that the Dead King is a threat. Kairos is realizing that the Dead King doesn't consider HIM to be a threat, based on the Dead King addressing him as an ally.

See, Kairos doesn't want to be an ally who works with you to achieve your mutual goals, he wants to be the enemy who you have to have to pay off to achieve your goal even though it's his goal, too. He's not happy making any deal that strikes you as fair, and if he finds out you think his deal is fair then he's going to try to start over and extort you harder. If you're not offering him a deal you hate so that he'll work with you, he thinks you don't properly appreciate how much you'd hate to have him working against you.

He's taking this chance to fuck the Dead King over so that next time he's given the opportunity to sell out the Grand Alliance (and/or the fate of Calernia), that undead bastard will pay him what's he worth.

Cicero

You're reading this wrong too.

"Because the moment he'd [The Dead King] made an effort to not be at odds with the Tyrant of Helike, he'd [the Dead King] made every lie I'd spoken irrelevant. Because, in the eyes of the Tyrant, he [The Tyrant] would only be worth appeasing if he [The Tyrant] was a threat."

The Dead King revealed that the Trant was in fact a threat to the Dead King, and so a betrayal of the Dead King would have actual weight. Making it impossible to pass up.

werafdsaew

Among all the replies I like yours best.

Cicero

It doesn't. What it does is show that the Tyrant can be a threat to the Dead King, and that was a mistake, because a chance to effectively betray the Dead King is so amazing that the Tyrant cannot pass it up.

1224

So Karios is more and more becoming one of my favorite charcter in general.

Adrian_V

I almost wish the armies below could be seeing this, could you imagine how each army would be reacting? Also i loved how badass the Tyrant was in this chapter, and Cat too of course, i can imagine how Laurence will react but it will be interesting to see anyway.

Also as soon as i saw the title i had to go to youtube and listen to the bleach soundtrack Treachery, you guys should try too xD

More_Dakka

The armies are watching on giant projected screens on the night sky. Every few minutes the betting odds for who out of the band survives changes and money changes hands. Cat remains the favorite and Tyrant's odds look like a heartbeat graph

Andrew Mitchell

Thank you. That image made me smile. 😊 😊 😊

Mental Mouse

It's all going to be about who's standing to tell the stories.

Cat &co. aren't merely making history with this mission, they're making mythology for future generations.

Liliet

YE A H

Thea

Has anybody considered that Cat might be wrong and Neshamah didn't misread Kairos? That everything's still within his plans? He must have some idea to dodge the Party of Five.

Liliet

Very unlikely.

Neshamah isn't THAT committed here, he's just going for an opportunity. He can't legit utilize all the resources he could or he'd expose himself to a narrative vulnerability.

So when Cat picked the battlefield, he met her on it. And it's the battlefield Catherine WINS on.

Oshi

Correction, it's the field Catherine is better on. Remember that the DK is all about never being vulnerable, His losses are always things that don't ultimately hurt him. You can put him back in the bottle but he'll always come back. It's important because I don't think the game he's playing is what we see.

Liliet

Yeah, Cat's best case outcome here is 'I win and DK doesn't win but doesn't lose either' bc she can't make him lose.

As I said elsewhere, I wouldn't be surprised if "Catherine outwits me in this fairly simple scheme that gives her a huge advantage by nature of battlefield and circumstances" was actually his preferred outcome here.

Catherine is still fucking awesome.

"And now, for my next trick"

Mental Mouse

She does have pretty good stagecraft these days; I also liked the finger-snap when ToS got herself destroyed. (I originally wrote "auto-Darwinated", but on further consideration, Darwin doesn't apply here. 😊)

Liliet

Yep.

"Not exactly my doing, but given the opportunity to pretend otherwise, why wouldn't I?"

Mental Mouse

It's not completely new, but she has come a step beyond her early "<blink> I meant to do that" moments. 😊

Liliet

After the 'now for my next trick' I can't stop picturing Cat as a stage magician. You KNOW she'd love it.

Liliet

so uh about our earlier bard discussion in DnD bards can have any kind of Performance skill, not just music: dance, oratory, comedy, whatever

Cat's got Performance (stage magician)

She's been going for it ever since "The answer to this question may surprise you!" but she only started succeeding recently ;u;

nick012000

I wonder if Cat can pull a trick with the Night to give Black's soul a temporary body to use once she gets him loose, the same way she used Winter to give Akua's soul a temporary body to use.

Liliet

That's my guess, yeah. The most obvious thing to do here.

Andrew Mitchell

Brilliant chapter. ♥ Cat demonstrates once again how important it is to truly understand other players.

Well done to everyone who guessed that King Edward and Amadeus would make an appearance.

Dhael

Black has to be watching this like a proud father.

"That's my daughter that just manipulated the Hidden Fucking Horror into making a narrative that she can win with"

Andrew Mitchell

♥ ♥ ♥

Aotrs Commander

I was just thinking myself he was probably shedding a quiet little soul-tear of liquid pride...

superkeaton

Well played, Cat, now that you've stirred the pot, can you fish a decent victory from it? You've always had a talent for it, but the Dead King is old, old, Old.

Vin reisling

So every time he uses wish he spends lifespan? Very fitting for the tyrant.

Valkyria

How did you come to that conclusion?

Liliet

Skein said that?

Valkyria

oh yeah whoops. I kind of hopped over that sentence it seems.

konstantinvoncarstein

And less overpowered.

Clint

It sounded vaguely like that, but it doesn't make sense – Kairos has already lived past his fated span, and Villains never grow old.

thearpox23

He doesn't AGE. How much "lifeforce" he's still got in him is still anybody's guess.

I'm sure if Masego was around he'd be able to provide some pedantic commentary on the nature of using your own lifeforce to power your spells or aspects.

shveiran

There is a lot of uncertainty, but it is not hard to imagine his Naming to go something like:

- Kairos is dying and won't make it past the year because sickness and prophecy.
- Kairos becomes the Tyrant and can't get sick/die of sickness anymore.
- Kairos gets an aspect that allows him to cheat prophecies, odds, logic and probably trigonometry.
- the aspect is powerful and versatile, but comes with a finite amount of uses that do not replenish.

– When Kairos runs out of uses, he dies.

Kissaten

I think Kairos tricked Djinny (metaphorical, but given how many artifacts Theodosians acquired during the years he might as well had one chained somewhere) into granting him a Final Wish before death, and Kairos somehow used it not to die. A deal a lot like Cat's acquisition of Winter dukedom and then queenship, only that it's less pure chaos and more belief and backstabbing, madmen getting wings and all that.

beleester

Maybe that's why he needs to always be a villain.

Darkening

Interesting idea, but not sure how that works when villains are immortal.

Andrew Mitchell

Villains are not immortal. They die, just not of old age or normal disease.

Morgenstern

That's actually what 'immortality' is often presented as. 😊
Not being un-killable, but simply not aging and not dying of diseases, but only dying when getting killed by a foe (which is mostly still a hard thing to do). Being a mortal, as the corresponding parallel, meaning you age, get sick etc. and can be killed rather easily. The difference between gods and mortals.

But yeah, there is also the version where "immortal" means "unkillable", no matter what. (Which is not the same as 'cannot be imprisoned and/or suffer'.)

I'm no longer sure which of these versions is the original one. *shrugs

Allafterme

I loved how Skein prompted to attack the band not when Saint go on about like a powergamer, not when Sorcerer joined the fray but when Cat started a nonchalant chat with Tyrant...

Liliet

Well, that's when the future changed in his vision 😊

Euodiachloris

Yeah: spot the real crisis point. waggles eyebrows

Mental Mouse

Cat showing up was the crisis point! 😊

Kissaten

Does Rend destroy all manners of illusions, including Arcadia and Hells? Like clearing a path to destination or something. He pulled Dead King's real self (which was speaking) through Skein's body, possibly destroying poor rat in the process?

Kissaten

Or, more likely, he just dropped Skein to Creation into the loving embrace of three armies.

Andrew Mitchell

Oooooouch that's going to be bad for those armies.

Mental Mouse

Skein might be able to do some damage just as a big-ass fighter, but his time-power won't help him much – even without Cat, the Legions alone have Juniper and other legendary generals running them. There is no path where he beats them.

Liliet

Skein is 60 ft tall.

On a plain against an unprepared army thats one sated ratling and one very dead army.

Mental Mouse

The Callowan side has fought demons, and some of the Procerans have fought Ratlings before. They have mages and siege engines.

And most damning, the Skein would be detached from their own story, thus drained of all narrative support.

That says... the Skein isn't necessarily relevant, because it just got possessed by the Dead King himself! What happens if (he might resist) he gets dumped in the middle of those armies, some of which have experience fighting his undead and perhaps even monsters... and still without narrative weight?

Andrew Mitchell

I think DK can stop possessing Skein any time he wants to.

Mental Mouse

Which then reverts to Skein vs. everybody, with the added handicap of having been discarded by his maker.

Liliet

Skein's story is absolutely army devourer pls it's a Horned Lord
it's a monster from the kind of godzilla/nge story where the army just serves as a first course to show how tough it is

Mental Mouse

The problem is, it's out of its story – leagues away from the warrens it came from, dropped into a bunch of armies all of whom were waiting for a far more important story to play out. I figure that demotes it at least to "monster of the week", where immense size just means easy targeting. Even if DK stays with it, any time he spends fighting the army is time he spends outside the shard and leaving the initiative to the party.

Liliet

their PRIMARY objective here is to preserve the armies though

shveiran

Skein is 60 ft tall, but he would be surrounded by a lot of magic users and trained soldiers with siege weapons (also, is it day right now? Because otherwise we can add a lot of Mighty).

Granted, he would do some damage, but as soon as the side gets its shit together he's done. He's not a demon and doesn't have auras of corruption or anything that prevents him from getting hit by a lot of fire at the same time. He is powerful, he heals, but still. He vs everyone is not a good bet.

Liliet

sure maybe he won't wreck the entire army, just like 60% or so of it given Cat was like 'no more than 15% losses',

shveiran

I feel like you are overexaggerating its power. Skein was the stuff of nightmare, but he plays that role as a leader of ratlings, not as a one-man army. Other Horned Lord, perhaps, could play that role, but he is the schemer among them. Schemers don't shine when thrown on a different plane and into a battle.

Also, your argument about a godzilla story has merit in a vacuum in this setting, but that is not the story currently being told: Skein is not the Big Bad, it is the instrument discarded by its maker (as pointed out by Mental Mouse) to cut its losses, at least presumably. Skein is not the main antagonist, is not even the most relevant instrument here (I suspect Old Fairfax is going to be the next attempt by the DK). There really isn't enough of neither narrative weight or physical might to threaten THREE ARMIES.

Quite frankly, if there was, the war would be irrelevant. If one revenant can bring that much destruction, what does the DK even care if they can craft a path to pop these guys north? He has 50 KNOWN revenants.

Liliet

that's why fortifications matter
I'm talking about the scenario where Skein is dropped right in the camp 🤨

Javvies

Depends on how long in Creation the party has been in the Arcadia/Liesse Shard. Time shenanigans being a thing with stuff related to Arcadia.

If it hasn't been that long in Creation, it will technically be day, but Fall will still be in effect, enabling the Mighty.

If it's been a bit longer in Creation, it'll be regular daylight. Longer still, and regular night may have arrived.

At any rate, the Army of Callow will still have their fortifications.

Also, there's the distinct possibility that Andronike and/or Komena will be present and find the Skien offensive. Or just aggravating enough to do something about if it starts popping off Spool or other Aspects in their immediate vicinity.

Plus, the Alliance forces still have most of their Levantine combat priests.

Actual Wizard

I'm really liking Cat's new catchphrase of "Mistake."
It really helps to show how much she has internalized her narrative perception and character insight.

Liliet

Oh, that's not what it shows.

It's her father's.

SpeckofStardust

Using Rend in a unstable realm soon to crash into creation that is also connected to multiple hells.
I think everything going to hell is an understatement. Everything is going to Fun.

Satchrd

Wait did he take the cotton candy from the clowns?

Mike E.

Man no props in the comments for the Saint? I don't like her, but when she is committed to your side (even when she hates your guts), she doesn't mess around. She just basically committed to fighting 2000+ devils until either she is dead (and the Band loses), or Cat wins.

"Saint, how long can you buy me?" I asked.

"You got a way to win?" the old woman casually asked.

I nodded.

"Then however long you need, Foundling," the Saint of Swords told me with a hard smile.

Liliet

MAN YEAH

everything else was distracting but LAURENCE DE MONTFORT IS HARDCORE & BADASS AND THE BEST

you know when Cat's starting to find her comforting the tides are shifting 😊

Andrew Mitchell

Speaking about shifting tides... I was really interested in the following exchange

"Keep them off me," I said. "I'll handle the Tyrant."

"Figures you'd go for the cripple," Laurence de Montfort said.

I found the last line jarring because I assumed Laurence was trying for gentle sass rather than cutting words. Is this Cat being too wedded to her current view of Laurence? Or hasn't Laurence shifted as much as I thought she might have?

werafdsaew

Maybe that's just how she talks and she can't help it.

Liliet

I think it's a combination of two factors
– Catherine is absolutely going with the worst view of Laurence she can out of inertia – while Laurence is most definitely trying for quipping / friendly teasing, that's not an easy tone to nail down and she ain't the most socially graceful person around, so... the joke fell flat, sharp needle up

shveiran

This chapter was a blast, and the conclusion was perfect. Cat and Kairos, whispering a word each to turn a desperate situation on its head? The Black Queen whispering but an obscure reference, and sounding more deadly with that than the Tyrant unleashing his full regalia?

That's the good stuff. More, please. You have provided over four books worth of this, and I have not yet had enough. Not nearly.

On the side of Heroes, quite a bit to consider.

Saint keeps to her turn into ally of the month, not simply because she stands alone against the Horde (it's not really a surprise, coming from her) but because she keeps interacting with Cat in a very different way.

And I am really curious to find out what has started this. Many suggests it is Archer's revelation of being in love, but I can't say I'm convinced.

I'm looking forward to our getting confirmation or being revealed her thought process.

As for RS.. I've long been suspecting Amadeus soul was in there, but I'll admit now I'm feeling unconvinced. It isn't that we see Amadeus captive (could be an illusion, could be a trick, could be his soul was spliced, could be he left a trace in RS...), it's more that RS blunders a lot in this chapter in a non-Amadeus way, and I don't feel like it is required to keep up appearances or anything of the sort. The theory seems weaker now. Which makes it more likely his olive branch to Cat was genuine, which is good for them both?

Mental Mouse

Amadeus doesn't need to actually possess someone to influence them. Compare to his effect on Pilgrim.

shveiran

Granted, but the theory was that Amadeus was actually driving the show from within. Having influenced RS out of screen is not quite the same. You may very well be right, but the possession theory has been crippled IMO.

Mental Mouse

Actually, my guess was that he'd followed Cat's example and had a discussion with the spirit.

Liliet

The possession theory was always annoying, having an actually sane new hero was far more interesting. And is!

Liliet

Yeah ♥ ♥ ♥

Andrew Mitchell

RE: Laurence's shifting perspective, I held a similar mindset to you but Liliet and I had a long chat about it after the last chapter and they managed to convince me that Laurence had shifted more than I thought. You can check it out <https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2019/05/20/chapter-42-twined/#comment-42554>

I do agree with you though that it would be good to get some PoV confirmation.

RE: Amadeus and the Rogue Sorcerer. I no longer think Black was/is influencing RS but if he was then I'm sure it will be confirmed by the text at some stage.

shveiran

I saw that discussion, and you can in fact find my own thoughts scrolling down.

I can't say I'm currently convinced by those arguments, but hey, I've been wrong often before.

Andrew Mitchell

So have I. Many times. 😊

lennymaster

Somehow people still insist on the misconception that Villains are somehow immortal. It was explicitly stated within the first two books, that Heroes get the OPTION/POSSIBILITY of true resurrection (no undead nonsense, the actual real deal), while Villains get to always be at their physical prime. That means that they do not age, but like most Named, their end is violent and they do not tend to live longer than the average Hero. No Named gets sick due to less than extrem circumstances, Heros just have to deal with getting physically slower and weaker as time goes on as well.

liate7

Immortal is often used for unaging, not just for unkillable. For example, Tolkien elves are general considered immortal (evidence the wikipedia page), even they decidedly are killable.

lennymaster

I thought that too, annoying as that linguistic imprecision is, there are however regular comments that from context give me the impression that people consider lack of aging as genuine immortality.

Just to lay it out, for me agelessness means that getting your head chopped off kills you, immortal means that somebody can take your body apart molecule by molecule, atom by atom (Cloud of Desintegration for example), and that all you have to do is just find or make a new body for yourself. That of course does not include phylacteries or other soulcontainers being involved, that would merely be undeath.

I know, some may say that is splitting hairs, in a world where there are things such as ghosts and other undead, demons, angels, faeries that are regularly reborn, elves that can bend how reality works as well as gods and Gods, it does matter in my opinion. Considering how much precision is involved in Names and Aspects in the Guidverse, means it matters a great deal.

Javvies

Immunity to aging/disease/natural causes while still being killable is in some sources/series referred to as being immortal (lowercase "i"), while having those immunities while not being killable/inherent automatic respawn/resurrection is referred to as being Immortal (uppercase/capital "I").

It gets complicated. And potentially confusing.

On the other hand, I'm not sure that there's a good term (especially a widely known one) that's explicitly "immune to aging, diseases, or other forms of death by natural causes, but can be killed".

But everybody knows that if you say that somebody/something is "immortal", aging and natural causes are not something they need to worry about, even though their killability is unclear. That's when you get phrases like "immortal until killed".

Mental Mouse

The big thing to realize is that in the Guideverse, the human condition is rather more negotiable than in our own. Villains get some protection from aging, all Named get protection from disease and similar "boring story" threats. And, of course, each Named gets a unique selection of magical powers! In the text, Named are occasionally contrasted to "mortals", usually in the context of a Named tearing through ranks of un-Named soldiers.

Even so, there's a definite presence of "gods in the world" (as distinguished from Above and Below), which are basically exempt from the "human condition" altogether. They're not necessarily unkillable, as demonstrated by the one that Captain "broke", but they simply don't have to deal with the ordinary concerns of the living – not just aging, but even food, air, or any injury short of the outright fatal. The fae fall under that description, so the most powerful of them are commonly described as gods, and have even been worshipped. The power level of gods seems to overlap with the upper reaches of Named power, but can extend well beyond that – especially after they renounce mortal concerns... like Cat didn't.

NerfGlastigUaine

Great chapter, but there seem to be more typos than usual. I don't like to complain because you're giving us a great story at an insanely fast pace, but the portion in the middle where Cat and the Tyrant talk was honestly hard to read.

NerfGlastigUaine

Great chapter, but there were more typos than usual. I don't like to complain b/c you're giving us a great story at an insanely fast pace, but the part in the middle where Cat and Kairos bargain was a little hard to read.

Cap'n Smurfy

The absolute contrast between the Dead King and the Tyrant is really quite remarkable. They are arguably the most Villainous Villains on the Continent, but are polar opposites in just about everything. The Dead King doesn't do anything without meticulous planning, minimizing risk, pulling back at the slightest hint of danger and seems to keep and place importance on deals. He's an ageless existence and determined to stay that way. The Tyrant on the other hand is flying by the seat of his pants, positively high diving into danger and quite possibly burning up his life force as he goes. They're just nothing alike, but still follow the same ideals religiously.

Liliet

And they don't, at that.

Kairos does.

Neshamah 'bit the hand that fed him' :3

Mental Mouse

You're kidding, right? Kairos has been all "hands are yummy!" from Day 1.

Liliet

what?

Liliet

ah wait I got it. Well, Kairos is definitely doing something close to that, but he's still following the philosophy while Neshamah's got his own :3

Big Brother

I know I'm a little late for this kinda comment, but about the Rogue Sorcerer. All of y'all are assuming he's a stealthy magic user, but may I pose this question? What happens when an agent goes Rogue?

Let's look at what he's done so far. RS has carried the soul of the (arguably) greatest Villain of the Age, led an army /safely/ through incredibly hostile territory (the Arcadian Fragment), got thrown off a Cliff by a Traitorous Villain, has publicly sided / With/ Cat (the Arch-Heretic) against the Grey Pilgrim and the Saint of Swords, and has most recently been seen subverting/ negating magics intended to impede/harm him.

The Rogue Sorcerer isn't the hiding type, he's the Practical type, even if that means going rogue.

Andrew Mitchell

Yes. I think RS will turn out to be a useful ally to Cat.

Kwabena Yiadom

I remember the chapter on how he achieved his apotheosis ended with the bard laughing much like the twin gods. Can it be called a win if she practically celebrated it?

James

I love this story, but the typos really bother me. I decided that I couldn't handle them any more. I'll be posting an edited version of the chapter as soon as I can from now on.

Here is this one! ~~None of that~~

erraticerrata

I don't know what would possibly make you think this was all right, but don't do that again. I'll be contacting you by email.

Mental Mouse

It's a bit late, but in my reread I turned up "original text" supporting Cat's crown:

> But I was in charge in their eyes, wasn't I? The legalities we'd been quibbling about all day didn't mean dust in the eyes of the Gods. ... Which meant that if I made a choice, Above took that as a choice for all of Callow.

From the end of <https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2018/06/15/chapter-21-tug-of-war/> .

Liliet

oh my god that was so good it's rigid and inflexible asshole winter Cat but it's still one of her best moments ;u;

Chapter 44: Small Slights

"Forgiveness is a scale balanced, nothing more and nothing less."
– King Edward Fairfax the Fifth, the Hardhand

Aspects were telling, I'd always thought, especially those with harmful intent.

In practice they tended to have similar applications, true, but you could tell a lot about Named from what imperative it was that'd resonated with them. William had found his principle in Swing, which had been a branch sprung from what he saw as the most important part of who he was: the Lone Swordsman, the one who settled wrongs with a swing of his sword. Now take Masego, though, whose Ruin had crystallized facing the very Revenant before me. The first glance at that might lead one to think Hierophant was darkly inclined, and to be honest the thought had crossed my mind at the time. I'd led my friend into quite a few messes, and few of them pretty. The truth if it, though, was that Masego had been raised by the Calamities long before he became part of that other family the Woe had turned into. He'd learned their lessons young, even if they'd taken different shape in him than perhaps expected. To ruin something, for Masego, was to pare it down until it'd reached the very edge of breaking. Until, in a sense, it was no longer a threat. That he'd draw the line there instead of going further into annihilation I liked to think was as much due to the empathy he'd been encouraged to embrace over the last few years as the cold practicalities taught him from the cradle. The lessons of the villains who'd crafted the Reforms, the Conquest: it is easier to subdue than eradicate. Less costly, and war like all things was a matter of costs and benefits.

Some were not so clear-cut: as in most things, Black was frightfully subtle under the veneer of overt simplicity. His Destroy, seemingly a straightforward cudgel to bludgeon the Tower's enemies with, was a glimpse at what lay at the heart of the man. Someone who, when moved to act, would not tolerate any result but the annihilation of what had stirred him to violence. There was no nuance to the word, or to its effect, because in the end to him the world was split in half by the line he'd famously drawn for the Legions of Terror: victory and defeat, with nothing of worth in between. And so it was with that knowing in mind that I watched the Tyrant of Helike laugh his will into existence, the word he'd spoke ringing out in a way that had nothing to do with his voice. Rend, Kairos Theodosian had said. The splash of that decree was swift and brutal, the Skein's skull half caving-in as a tall antler broke and its right arm was so harshly snapped it came to be hanging by half a bone at the shoulder. Bones broke across the Horned Lord's body, though in a manner that was haphazard. It was tempting to ascribe that the Tyrant's whimsical nature, but I was not fooled. To rend something was not to destroy it, to break it or anything so... thorough. It was to tear something into more than one piece, to wound it. To hurt it. But never, I grasped might be the essence if it, to kill. Wound and hurt and sow enmity, but never to finish the fight. Because that was the Tyrant's way, wasn't it? Always an enemy, a scheme, a betrayal afoot. Like a spinning top, if he slowed might just tip over.

The deeper gold had vanished from the Skein's eyes before the Tyrant had even finished speaking, the Dead King leaving behind the corpse he'd inhabited without hesitation at the first indication of danger. It was the great rat itself that screamed in rage at returning to great wounds, all the while a swarm of gargoyle gathered in a chittering flock around the villain. I claimed a last inhalation from my pipe, and reluctantly poured over the last of the wakeleaf over the edge and quite likely onto some devil's head. Wasteful as this was, given how rare and expensive the herbs was out here, I'd need to intervene soon enough. Not quite yet though.

"My I assume, Black Queen, that you have a stratagem?" the Tyrant of Helike idly asked.

Shaking the dragonbone pipe one last time to make sure it was all gone, I put it away in one of the many pockets of my cloak.

"I do," I said. "The way I see it, my Lord Tyrant, our trouble at the moment is that the opposition's got an army and we do not."

Below us, wading through the sea of devils still filling the courtyard, the Saint of Swords reminding why even at height of my brute power over Winter she'd put me to flight on our every encounter. The sight of that old woman wearing no armour save a tunic and pale tabard flickering through the tide of creatures was spellbinding, because Laurence de Montfort had sallied out to fight an army on her own and she was not losing. I watched her cut through the knee of some devil of smoke and stone twice the height of a man and broad as city gate, pass under its toppling form as it fell and take with three quick strokes the head, the arm and the eye of jackal-headed devils leaping out at her. The last, still living though half-blinded, saw its face used as a steppingstone for the perfect somersault she executed to evade the furious swiping of the devil she'd hobbled. It made paste of the jackalhead, the Saint of Swords landed precisely in front of the still-bellowing devil's overextended shoulder and with a cold sneer she severed its head from its body. She'd never once broken stride in all of that, nor had she overly hurried or strained herself. She was not using any of those wicked cuts I knew she was capable of, pacing herself in a display of utter scorn at the calibre of her opposition. Gods, if it was just her and the devils contained inside a ward she might not even lose.

It wasn't just that, unfortunately. Which meant that the Skein's snarled order to kill us all had been followed eagerly by the devils, and while a great many of them were rabidly going after the Saint there were others who'd decided on different prey. Flocks of walin-falme had come for me, at first, but after beating impotently at the ward the Rogue Sorcerer had put up in their way for some time they'd decided to take their displeasure to the source of the inconvenience. Leathery-winged and furious the devils converged on the broken balcony the hero had claimed as his perch, bearing armaments scavenged from the dead of the Legions and Akua's most loyal. It did them little good, for while he'd wielded wards when it came to ensuring my protection now the dark-haired man was going on the offensive. It was like watching a talented but self-taught musician at work, I thought, for while the sorceries he used were rough and raw the cleverness of the use and the breadth of his range were astounding. A swirling vortex of air that drew in a dozen devils was fed a cloud of bright yellow acid, earning screams as the creatures began to burn and melt. A large globe of translucent sorcery, much like the shields Masego was fond of using, formed around another pack and after opening a single hole through it the Sorcerer repeatedly shot sloppy but powerful fireballs within until all that was left was ash and slag.

Of the hundred or so that'd first gone after him, at first simply walin-falme but soon most everything winged and borne of the Hells, only half reached his balcony. Where they found the Rogue Sorcerer to have nailed small spike of silvery metal in broad circle around his position. Innocuous, at a glance, but their purpose became clear when he began pouring lightning in a stream above him and the spikes each drew a sliver of that flow in a sudden arc. By this sudden caging of himself in lightning, the hero caught the first wave and fried them in a heartbeat. Lesser devils fled in fright, but the walin-falme had been soldiers for the Tower once upon a time: they were made of sterner stuff. They caught and skewered some of their allies, using them as shields to pass under the lightning untouched. There they found only a ball of radiant light that blinded and burned them, scattering them as the Rogue Sorcerer reappeared atop another balcony after dismissing a glamour almost fae-like in nature. The silvery spikes were still there, and in their wounded surprise the devils were in no state to adjust the new angle: then the lightning began pouring again, none were left alive.

"Well," the Tyrant of Helike said, "one must concede they have slightly less of an army now than they had an hour past."

We both knew that was a temporary state of affairs, though. Already I could see the Rogue Sorcerer's face was flushed and dripping with sweat, his breathing hard. Mages like Masego and Akua, who used the exact amount of power needed to make a spell function to the intended purpose, would be able to continue throwing around sorcery for longer even if it was of higher calibre. Roland, clever as he was, was bleeding power well in excess of Keter's Due and I suspected his natural gifts weren't particularly impressive besides: if he continued at this pace for much longer, he was going to fall unconscious. If he didn't continue at his pace, he was going to get eaten alive. Something of an issue, that. Meanwhile, the Saint had been forced to give ground by the sheer mass of bodies being thrown at her – you could not, after all, manoeuvre around tidal wave of flesh and claws. After that her cuts began tearing at the fabric of this realm, leaving those sharp arcs behind and changing retreat into brutal stalemate, but that was effectively flipping the hourglass on how long remained until her aging body caught up to her. Still, it was almost absurd how well they'd done. Oh they had a story at their back, enough to earn a nudge or two – buying time for an ally against hopeless odds – but most of that was still simply that there were very good at killing things. Devils in particular, I suspected. Above did not send its champions out into the world without first doling out a few tricks aimed at Below's favourite instruments.

"It's not a battle where there's only one host," I chided. "Proper form, Kairos."

"My apologies, Catherine," the boy grinned. "Quite right, quite right. And where do you intend to acquire such an army?"

"One was helpfully provided," I murmured, looking down at below. "Yet I need someone to be nuisance, if you will. Just horribly inconvenient in every way."

"At last, my day has come," Kairos Theodosian gravely said.

I could almost feel the eagerness boiling in his veins.

"How long do you think you can grab everyone's attention?" I asked. "Do you have a monologue in you?"

"Catherine," the Tyrant said, sounding deeply offended.

"You're right, I apologize for even asking that," I replied. "I'll leave this in your trustworthy hands."

"You are a dear friend and honoured ally, so I'll let it pass this once," Kairos said, waving nonchalantly. "You may proceed, Black Queen."

I squinted at him for a moment. He was definitely going to be betray me at least once more before this was over, but it shouldn't be before we'd reached the end of this. And definitely not by selling me out to the Dead King, which should make this possible – I was a lot warier of being disrupted halfway through by the Tyrant than one of Neshamah's brood of the dead and the damned. Now, to make my way through this mess on foot would take too long, even if I killed the pain in my leg and borrowed some hurt without looking at the interest. I could probably call on the Saint to carve me a quicker path, but that'd make my intentions obvious: which, given that the Dead King could be looking through anyone's eyes and could intervene through any of them, was the same as dooming my scheme. I had another way, of course, though it wasn't impossible he'd prepared for that.

Couldn't call on the Sisters for it, though, since the more I asked them to intervene the higher the chances Neshamah would get his hands on slivers of Sve Noc with all the disastrous consequences that entailed. Sloppy and imprecise it was then.

"Kind of you, my Lord Tyrant," I said, and stepped off the ledge.

The Mantle of Woe and my unbound hair both flapped as I fell, but my attention was on the Night coursing through my veins. Like threading a needle, I thought. The cloth was thinner than I was used to and the window to get it right would be slight, but I still had faint memories of what it felt like to have that inborn knack Winter had leant me. Darkness spread out like an inky pool beneath me, a handful of the Tyrant's gargoyles curiously following me with eager cries and also much less endearing knives. I dropped into the dark, and for a moment it felt like plunging into cool, deep water. From the moment I touched the edge of the gate, I had less than a heartbeat to align it properly with the gate out. It was hard to describe, the act of putting it together. Like catching a faint spot of light in a dark cave that told you where the way out was, though that realization had to be paired with the instant act of will to move there lest the way out be botched. Or worst, lost. But I had it, near perfect, and-

"Wind," the Skein susurrated, great golden eyes like lanterns in the gloom.

I tumbled out cursing in Kharsum, well to the side of where I'd been aiming for. That godsdamned rat, if I didn't have a stripe of its fur as my cloak's collar by the end of this I'd eat my boots. It took me a heartbeat to get my bearings, which didn't improve my mood any: I'd meant to come out near Black and the Good King, but instead I was hip-deep in akalibsa on the east side of courtyard. Devils who had most definitely heard me swearing, for the way their houndlike faces turned to me. Armed and armoured in stone as they were I did not count them as a great threat, but given enough anything they could be trouble. Either I was going to have drawing on Night again, which was playing with fire when I had two large workings ahead of me, or-

"Ladies, gentlemen, other assorted beings," Kairos Theodosian said. "If I may have your attention?"

I suspect they might have ignored him, if the grounds beneath the Skein had not exploded in the moment that followed. I spared a glance at the mess of broken stone and dust that had appeared without warning, eyes narrowing when I glimpsed dirtied snow in there. Hells, had he just weakened the barrier between this place and Creation to the extent there'd been an impact? Had he done that precisely enough to use it as a weapon? How had he – no, no time for that right now. The akalibsa had turned towards the noise, and when they returned their attention to me they found

I'd disappeared. Under glamour covering sight and scent I began limping to the nest where the Skein had laired, and the two men waiting there: one a corpse, one a soul. King Edward had remained unmoving throughout the entire skirmish, eyes calmly gazing at his surroundings as he openly kept watch on both my teacher and the sack filled with crowns. Which had yet to be destroyed, interestingly enough. That implied either that Neshamah wasn't entirely opposed to my getting my hands on this realm, or that there would be something dangerous in him or one of his agents breaking them. Leaning on my staff I made my way through the rubble, avoiding paths that would have taken me through knots of devils. It made the journey longer, but the Tyrant seemed to have things well in hand.

"- worry not, my blessed brethren," the Tyrant of Helike thundered, "I will be a merciful king, should any of you survive _"

Another chunk of the courtyard went up in noise and smoke. Though it didn't seem to be killing many of the devils and had only angered the Skein even further, it certainly seemed to be commanding their attention. Near everything dead or spawned of Hell was now trying to put down a cackling Kairos, who was weaving erratically in the air without having ever left his throne. Slipping across the strewn stones, I snuck up on Black and the Revenant from the side. With the horde going after the Tyrant I'd been able to put some spring to my limp, and climbing over some large block of granite I finally reached the broken stairs where they'd been waiting this whole time. The Good King twitched like he was trying to speak, but words never came out. A heartbeat later seven wooden pillars began forming around me, glamourised or not, and shit that was bad. I'd seen this hold the Princess of High Noon, and these days I was just a mortal with too much mouth and prayer. The moment the runes came up I'd be stuck. I managed to sneak my hand into my cloak just as four eldritch runes began to glow around me, linked by a faint circle of light. Frozen in place, I let out a sigh as my glamour shattered like glass.

"Hierophant's own magic," I said. "Ironical, I'll grant."

"The Abomination was awaiting one of you making for the crowns," King Edward Fairfax calmly told me. "And hindered my own attempt to warn you, Queen Catherine. Still, I give you greeting. It has been some time since we last spoke, yet I see you have not been idle."

My teacher was watching us, missing nothing, and if he was surprised by what had just been said his face showed no sign of it.

"Same to you, Your Majesty," I said. "Didn't think he'd let you of Keter, to be honest."

"It was something of a surprise to me as well," the Revenant said, "though I do not pretend to grasp the thoughts of that monstrous creature."

He might not, I thought, but through him I might be able to grasp a thing or two. Through what Neshamah did and did not prevent him from doing, watching as he no doubt was through the dead Fairfax. Best to flush out all I could before striking.

"- kneel in abject submission, and you will be granted the mercy for which I am well-known-"

Another deafening burst, though sooner or later that trick would run out.

"I don't suppose you know what he actually wants from this place, do you?" I asked. "It can't be the original notion of crashing it into Iserre, that'd be pitting him against a band of five. He might win that, of course, but there's no real winning that if you understand what I mean."

And, more than anyone else on Calernia, the King of Death had to be wary of trading early victories for later disasters. There was no one else with as expansive a meaning for later, after all. And, as the way the knowledge of the Bard had become widespread in our age proved, it'd become a lot harder to bury knowledge after it'd been spread nowadays.

"If I could aid you I would," the Revenant said, tone regretful.

The gold of his eyes had not deepened, but then I was hardly a novice at the sleight of hand. He was in there, and it might just have been him speaking the right words to suggest I shouldn't pursue this line of conversation, that there was nothing to gain from it. Too neatly done. Which meant I had my opening, and even digging for more wasn't worth letting the opportunity slip. My fingers couldn't move, frozen as they were by the binding, and my power was bound as well. But the small carved wishbone was held in my hands and that was enough. Its power, after all, was not mine. Not bound.

"Abscond," I said, my voice lacking power.

But the wishbone broke, and it was enough: a trail of stars guiding me, I slid out of the binding and my steps took me right behind the Good King. I laid a hand on him and grinned, all teeth and malice.

"O Sve Noc," I said. "Judge me worthy on this night, that I may take the dead from death."

Night poured into the man who had once been King Edward Fairfax, and with wicked laughter Sve Noc began to wrestle away rule over the Revenant.

Caerulea

Vote! (for A Practical Guide to Evil)

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Also apparently there is a Discord? Not sure what goes on there, but if you want to find out, go here:

<https://discord.gg/3nbsUfZ>

Liliet

I love how many people now do this in Droughtbringer's absence
♥

Caerulea

I figured I would put it first, but since there are so many others I probably don't need to. Not sure if I will continue.

happyhavak

High Priestess Cat is so far my favorite Cat. Snarking gods just has no equal.

Epok

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>
also come check the discord <https://discord.gg/Tmnt3H3>

Insanenoodlyguy

Interesting. A new option for final crown appears.

TeK

A wild Crown appears. Cat uses Splash.

P

Even magikarp learns tackle at level 15. Kat's been on the edge of apotheosis, I'm pretty sure she's learned more moves than splash and struggle at this point 😊

crysjal

Like Surf. After all a proponent of lakeomancy should know how to ride on water.

Tek

Cat is a Magikarp is more apt analpgy than I thought. First two books she basically can't do anything except Struggle. Then she learns Ta(c)k(l)e, and spontaneously evolves into violent Gyarados, or even Mega Gyarados, but has no trainer at that point, because the only one she had betrays her. So she makes her own kingdom, and rules it, dropping lakes on other trainers trying to tame her, until she feeds herself to what I can only assume is Murkrow, making it evolve into two Honchkrows, and by then the analogy falls apart wildly trashing and spilling it co tents everywhere.

New theory, PGtE is an allegoric tale about leveling your Magikarp that got wildly off track.

NerfContessa

Your insane theorem has my approval.

And wow, cat. Trying to. Steal a. Fairfax,. That's....
Unexpected in the way, if not the deed.

Mental Mouse

Eh? Edward's been on the table for a while now, as one of DK's lures.

Pulling him away from DK first, makes the idea less obviously idiotic. 😊

danh3107

I love how cat can just make stuff from heroes, that's just amazing. Also deities fighting deities should be interesting.

Great chapter all around

erebus42

It is a potentially versatile ability that she could get some good mileage out of. It should also help offset her lack of aspects and give her some good unpredictability and potential aces in the hole.

Novice

Yep, Cat said it herself: "That's the trick: always one more."

Mental Mouse

It's also a vicious ability, given it seems to actually damage a victim's Aspects! Ironical, given her own history with a damaged Name...

Dakem

Haha no wonder the Dead King is respectful, with Sve Noc's all about stealing power from dead things.

Javvies

Oh.

Oh snap.

Is Cat resurrecting Edward? Or just kicking the Dead King out? Please let it be resurrection, that would be awesome.

Also, Cat, really? Asking if Kairos has a monologue in him? Was that actually a misstatement or were you trying to insult him on purpose for some reason?

Two __

It isn't resurrection, that is the province of Good and only Good, and while Evil can mirror it, they can't copy it.

Novice

It's possible that it's resurrection, Cat got one from Sve Noc after all. There's also the line: "...that I may take the dead from death." supporting this. I'm not saying this is most definitively resurrection, just that it's a possibility one cannot discount.

Oshi

It is most certainly possible. However in this case I don't think that is her intention. She will steal his Revenant and have the good Pilgrim resurrect :p

Novice

Ooh, now that's a better idea than a straight-up resu. Good catch.

Javvies

I'm pretty sure that there are limits on Pilgrim's ability to resurrect people.

There'd have to be.

There's probably a time limit on how long somebody can be dead for it to still work, or something.

Plus ... Tariq isn't here, and likely won't be encountered again until Cat finds Masego.

On the other hand ... Sve Noc and Night are not Below, and so aren't automatically lacking in the ability to actually resurrect people the way Below is.

Tek

Can Tariq resurrect Black though?

Javvies

Depends on if Tariq's ability to resurrect people requires a body*.

Because remember, we've only known Tariq to resurrect Heroes who died within the last day or so when he has their body.

*Cat may or may not be carrying Amadeus's body with her.

Also, Amadeus isn't actually/technically dead.

Nash Equilibrium

Black is still alive, so not at the moment!

Regarding limitations on the Grey Pilgrim's Forgiveness aspect, he can't use it if the person has been dead more than a day, it was mentioned in the Battle of the Camps (specifically, a use of miracles by other clergy to keep the corpses "fresh" so that the aspect could be used to raise them all over a few days).

Liliet

Sve Noc and Night come from Below and Winter, and given neither has a resurrection ability, I doubt they spontaneously generated it. They did say Catherine was dying but not yet dead when they claimed her.

And while there are definitely limits on resurrection ability, I suspect the Revenant kind of necromancy might extend the timespan :3

Cat definitely loses nothing from asking Tariq later, anyway ♥ ♥ ♥

shveiran

We know Below's Bestowed cannot resurrect but only have means to avoid death.

However... are we positive this means Evil deities cannot do that?

Ganer7956

How sure are we they are not merely usurping control of the revenant? Take the dead [our revenant friend] from death [the dead king]? Wouldn't that work?

Liliet

That's the sensible default assumption, yes.

The speculation on how it MIGHT be more is fun though

Rook

Isn't death one of the dead king's nicknames? V5 c38, the pilgrim refers to him that way.

"There is an old story," the hero said, "about Death taking the Forever King's only son."

DramatisPersona

Presumably Evil's allowed the fucked up "please kill me, this is a nightmarish parody of living and every day is a fresh horror" sort of resurrection. Or would that classify under mirroring it?

Mental Mouse

That would be the undead thing. Cat's been there herself...

shveiran

Which is within the "avoyding death" trope, admittedly. It is either a contingency/refusal to your demise or something an Evil mage does to you because they refuse to deal with your passing away.

Or mindless monstrosities, but I assumed we were including only undeads with awareness.

But yes, I argue that is not quite resurrection. It's becoming something else to avoyd death, not coming back to what you were before dying.

caoimhinh

It's absolutely not resurrection, it's gaining dominion over the Revenant.

1) Cat wasn't resurrected by Sve Noc, she was freed from Winter so that 'killed Winter Cat and brought back mortal Cat', same as the Cat becoming Sovereign of Moonless Nights didn't mean she was dead, it transformed her 'killing the mortal and raising an immortal' but in those two cases her 'deaths' were metaphorical (though that still has a weight on Creation).

2) Resurrection can only be done by Good, Sve Noc is from Below. Though it can be imitated, like the Secret of Many Lives that lets you avoid real death by shedding yourself and letting a part die, or passing the soul from one body to another.

3) Good King Edward has been dead for centuries as a Revenant under the control of the Dead King, there's no way for him to resurrect.

4) It was explicitly stated that what Cat and Sve Noc are doing is struggling for control: 'to wrestle away rule over the Revenant'

So no, there's no resurrection involved there.

TeK

Cat was resurrected. She stopped being Winter Cat and became mortal after Sve Noc kinda shanked her soul and let it's innards spill across Strycht. Then she gave up her claim on Winter, and then she died.

Also "killing mortal and raising an immortal replica of mortal's last image" is functionally death in every way it matters, Warlock agrees, Masego disagrees.

And hey, we still got Pilly with an aspect of ressurection. I mean, plausible? I bet it's used either on Eddy or even more weirdly, on Black.

werafdsaew

"Am I dead?" I softly asked.

Cat was almost dead, but not quite. So it's cheating death; not true resurrection. Besides the body has to be fresh for Pilgrim to use Forgive, and the body of a revenant definitely is not.

Andrew Mitchell

Thank you.

TeK

Oh. Okay, my bad.

Mengha

One thought though, it's possible that the body may still be considered fresh, since DK definitely has some preservation magic flowing through his revenants. They're all fleshy even after a few centuries. (I don't think this is super likely but still)

Also I feel while Fairfax being resurrected is unlikely, he has some story weight behind him as one of the guys with the most claim to nemesis status. (I don't think he is DKs actual nemesis but this is kinda an evil clone / brainwashing story, those never end well for the villain)

Fayhem

> One thought though, it's possible that the body may still be considered fresh, since DK definitely has some preservation magic flowing through his revenants. They're all fleshy even after a few centuries. (I don't think this is super likely but still)

That's an interesting thought, but I'm very skeptical. The Pilgrim has a time limit on how fresh a body has to be and it's pretty short; somebody already referred to him needing priests to preserve the bodies when there were multiple dead heroes at once during the Battle of the Camps, which means he's got maybe a day or two tops before unchecked decay will put a hero past his reach. DK would definitely have made it his business to know that, and moreover will definitely have dealt with heroes who have resurrection powers before. Letting his Revenants decay juuuust enough to be difficult/impossible to rez for most heroes who even have the ability, without quite being enough to impair their effectiveness, is way too easy a vulnerability to close for DK not to have already thought to do that probably centuries or millennia ago.

Rook

I'd say it's almost certainly an impossibility, because the Pilgrim's resurrection is a narrative based miracle rather than a Sorcery based on technical circumstance. It's more about whether that person is considered just-dead rather than the physical state of their body, otherwise it would make little sense for him to have resurrected a Hero that had gotten a knife through the brain at the battle of camps.

His Role is a helping hand, not a healer. The fact that he's such a powerhouse in that Role may mean that he can extend that last minute intervention one foot past the doorway, but it's not as if he can reach hundreds of miles past. It would take an exceptional circumstance even for a Heroic story – one with the kind of weight that most heroes never see in their entire life – to make resurrecting a long-dead person possible, however well-preserved.

Sve Noc and Neshamah fighting over a revenant makes sense narratively, since that theme overlaps. Night ate Winter, and Winter undead of notable corpses were known to be similar, something mirroring the living version (I.E some of Akua's mages that Catherine reanimated during second llesse).

Liliet

I would say that your point about story-based miracle is exactly WHY I think it's possible.

There needs to be a reason WHY Pilgrim can resurrect someone. The Aspect is called "Forgive". To me it implies that the death needs to be something incomplete, not entirely settled, something that can be glossed over.

King Edward was kept more free-willed than other Revenants as Neshamah's private joke, and there's a big fat story opening in the form of his connection to Catherine. If she wrestled him out of the Dead King's control and then gave over to Light, the story would be... elegant. Think of how this would look in a simpler setting: a priestess of death from an underground realm helping the heroes get one of their own back.

The shape is there. Not so much I'd put it above fifty/fifty, but it's... plausible.

Liliet

Catherine was absolutely dying after losing Winter, remember the whole 'tore her heart out' dealie with Akua? She wasn't dead though, so it wasn't a resurrection, I agree Sve Noc can't do that.

I still think Cat's probably going to at least ask Tariq if it's possible, but yeah, the immediate intent is just to usurp control :3

Mental Mouse

> "Ladies, gentlemen, other assorted beings," Kairos Theodosian said. "If I may have your attention?"

Just lovin' that! Especially followed with "BOOM!" to make sure they're paying attention!

Liliet

Kairos is such a great partner for Catherine ♥ ♥ ♥

shveiran

Come now, he is fun to watch, but he is not REALLY a good partner for her. In whatever meaning of the word. They really, really want opposed things. There is no way they can work together long term.

Liliet

You're not wrong.

I savor it while I have it)=

Mental Mouse

> were you trying to insult him on purpose for some reason?

Of course she was, that's how she motivates him!

Novice

If Cat is trying for a resurrection instead of just stealing an undead from the Dead King, how fucked is Calernia going to be now that there'll be two monarchs bearing the mantle of Callowan spite? How long will the prices get, so to speak?

Oshi

OMG SHE IS A FUCKING GENIUS! She found her crown mother fucker!

Oshi

Ok I calmed down. This is exactly what she wanted. She put not just anyone but a friggin Callowan in charge of this realm. Long Price indeed.

Oshi

Alright I'm calmed down. A Callowan King brought to rule. How friggin amazing! Long Price indeed. So many people get a little come uppance!

ninegardens

But no.

She would have to be very very silly to use that crown that THE DEAD KING just HAPPENED to roll her way. This isn't genius on her part, this is the dead king passing her a tool to use.

The dead king who totally has his hooks in this particular crown. If its used then the dead king will have hooks in the entire realm, FOREVER.

Its a tempting off. A chance to keep her own crown. That doesn't mean its a GOOD thing.

helpmeimscared

Hi!

VOTE OR YOU WILL BE FED TO THE EVIL ZOMBIE RAT HULK LACHESIS.

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Liliet

<https://discord.gg/GkbJ7N8>

And come discord with us!

erebus42

Ooo, taking one of the Dead King's toys? A bold move and hopefully one that pisses him off. Though, Neshamah may actually be giving him to her with something nefarious in mind.

I do love Catherine and Kairos working together. I'm sure their partnership will be rich and enduring!

I cant' wait for Cat and Black's touching father-daughter reunion. Though I am a little concerned, since many of those stories end up in tragedy.

Allafterme

Well, Black just watch her roll in with a band of five, as a member no less, turn Tyrant by lying her *ss off & performed an Evil miracle to save a former Good King of Callow from DK. I'd give anything that convo in, like, right now...

Euodiachloris

So very not proud. At all. Nuh-uh.

helpmeimscared

Hi!

VOTE NOW OR BE EATEN BY THE EVIL ZOMBIE RAT HULK LACHESIS

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Soma

Hmmm. I'm a little confused as to how stealing a dead king from the Dead King is going to avoid the sisters coming in contact with Neshamah, but hey, I'll roll with it. 'Take the dead from death,' is a nicely legendary feat that's going to go in the holy book.

IDKWhoitis

Cat wants to avoid UNnecessary contact, and if the Dead King focuses on trying to grab SveNoc rather than the king, then Cat is assured at least the small victory here, which Cat is focusing heavily on. Sve can take care of themselves, but best not have them tied up before the plot begins.

shveiran

This.

She even mentions as she moves toward the King that she has "two big workings ahead", so I'm pretty sure this was her plan at the start of the chapter, not a contingency she fall back to when she was caught.

IDKWhoitis

Either my memory is failing me, or did Grey just disappear? Like I know he has a lack for appearing at just the right moment, but I fear him making a play for Masego...

Novice

He was with their dagger, Indrani, going for the backdoor.

TeK

Oh my god, Indrani is a "dagger" that is going to "stab" Dead King in his "backdoor".

Fayhem

I am so disappointed/proud right now. Well done/shame on you. 😊

agumentic

Your memory is failing you. He's with the Archer in a dagger group that's supposed to make a play for Masego.

kotekj

Grey is with Archer, the hidden dagger racing to break DKs hold while our merry band of...3.5(?)... faces off against skein.

TeK

One soul and one dead body kinda equals into a full fledged human

Liliet

4.5 then :3

Naeddyr

Tyrant! I never doubted you for a second!

magesbe

Can I say for a second how much I have grown (I didn't originally) appreciate just how much more careful Cat has to be in these fights, how much more she has to think? In the Everdark; heck, even against the heroes; I was looking at her basically regenerate through her fights. Now she can't do that, so she makes up for it by doubling down on what made her dangerous in the first three books: her mind.

TeK

You mean her visionary wisdom?

Mental Mouse

Yes, that's what she gained in her new mortal life. She tried out the regentank power-brawler thing for a while, and it just wasn't working for her. So she went for an even more protean magic base, but swore off the brawling part.

Liliet

I love your wording ♥

Andrew Mitchell

Wow, what an ending. Lovely little one-time trick to get out of that binding. And was it actually Masego that wove that spell? And, if so, is he close? If so I expect Indrani to get here soon as well.

I didn't pick that she was going to go for a resurrection of King Edward but I ♥ ♥ ♥ it!

And it's so, so good for Tyrant to be helpful for once yet Cat's right that it won't last.

Novice

That binding is probably just a proximity landmine/trap woven against anyone who goes near the crowns.

Andrew Mitchell

That sounds plausible. 😊

caoimhinh

Not resurrection, gaining control from the Revenant.

Andrew Mitchell

Yeah, there's a good chance you're right. I think the wording "that I may take the dead from death." can be read either way (stealing control or resurrection). But given that it's only Above that can grant true resurrection I think your interpretation may be right.

TeK

While only above can grant true resurrection, Sisters did resurrect Cat already, did they not? I suspect that they can give sorta pseudorrresurrection if in as long as you partake in their domain. And I so want Edward to see the Callow today, I hope he'll truly make it.

Andrew Mitchell

I don't think the sisters needed to resurrect Cat. IIRC (and I could well be wrong here) Cat almost, but not quite, died before the sisters saved her.

TeK

Bard said she died, as did Cat, but hey, one is lying the other is ignorant.

Fayhem

I think it's worth noting that even when Bard is telling the truth it doesn't mean she isn't being deceptive (if anything, that seems like it's probably something like her specialty). If there's one thing that the Guide has demonstrated it's that "death" can cover a variety of meanings. My read on that was always that it was Winter!Cat "dying" to reclaim her mortality and become FUN!Cat much like Squire!Cat "died" to become Winter!Cat in the first place. Basically the idea is the transition between a mortal form and a Winter mantle imprint of that person counting as dying in both directions of the transition (mortal -> Winter, and Winter -> mortal).

Some other people have already quoted relevant passages about how in literal terms Cat was just almost dead too, going to be leaving the house soon so not willing to spend the time hunting and copy/pasting rather than finishing reading comments.

Liliet

I think it depends on how hard you squint on technical definition of 'death'. Clinical death is an existing classification IRL: we can't resurrect the dead, but we can bring people back from a state we classify as death. Cat was at death's door, standing on the treshhold, just not quite all the way through.

shveiran

That's all true, but let's not forget she was at the Threshold according to deific beings. I'm just saying, what they consider "not quite dead yet" is "not quite at a point where we can't bring you back", so that may be a very different definition than one a mortal would use.

Liliet

My point was just that there IS a point past which Sve Noc can't bring her back, and the point is rather closer than the angelic 'been running around as undead after getting her head cut off for half a day' shit

Mental Mouse

The thing is, her former human body was lost, replaced by the "eldritch abomination" Winter body, which in turn was absorbed by Night. The sisters needed to create a new (mortal) body for her and install her spirit into it. I'd call that resurrection fair and square.

Andrew Mitchell

I can certainly see where you're coming from. The ambiguity of the text gives us lots to argue about there. 😊

Mental Mouse

The big difference between what Sve Noc did, versus what Pilgrim does, was that in the former case the spirit was still present, whereas Pilgrim is supposedly pulling people straight outta Heaven.

someguy

Why didn't they fix her limp then ?

Andrew Mitchell

If I recall correctly, the limp was discussed early in this book. I think it relates to two things:

- Cat’s residual self image; her mortal self had a limp, and
- It’s a really useful reminder for Cat that she has mortal limitations.

Mental Mouse

IIRC, because she told them not to. Part of her ditching the power-brawling. Likewise her scar from the Lone Swordsman.

Liliet

Catherine: “Well you see I fucked up so badly that one time with the demon they actually couldn’t!”

Sve Noc, from the background: “Actually we could but-”

Catherine, discreetly kicking at Sve Noc: “I FUCKED UP SO BADLY THAT THEY COULDN’T”

caoimhinh

Yeah, notice that the very last sentence of the chapter states what is happening and what their intention is: “with wicked laughter Sve Noc began to wrestle away rule over the Revenant”

Cat is likely going to use this as a distraction, pinning Neshamah against the Sisters in order to drive his thoughts away from Masego and ‘the knife’. That will also give her a chance to free Amadeus and get the crowns during the mess that’s inevitably coming.

Liliet

We’re back to the ‘make as much chaos as you can and count on being best able to handle it’ planning shape ♥ ♥ ♥

Mental Mouse

It’s worth noting that “only Above gives resurrection” is AFAICT not an “official rule”, but a rule of thumb from Black’s prior experience with human Named.

Sve Noc and Cat may well be changing those rules.

Andrew Mitchell

Oh, thanks for that... I can't wait to see what happens with this.

Mental Mouse

> And was it actually Masego that wove that spell?

Well, it's a spell he came up with himself, distinctive enough to be characteristic of him. It might not have been cast in present tense, but as a trapspell.

Mental Mouse

The thing about Tyrant is, Cat knows how to handle him! Even back in Keter, she was thinking:

>The Tyrant of Helike was mad, this was well-known. I was starting to wonder if it was perhaps too well-known. Behaviour could seem erratic without actually being so, when you failed to grasp what someone was truly after.

Liliet

Catherine gets him.

Honestly, getting people is her speciality. Since Book fucking One, she's been doing the thing where her first approach to the person is to figure out their decision making algorithym, then act based on that. She's even doing it to Neshamah now ;u;

Andrew Mitchell

One more thought... the title chapter is "Small Sights" which is obviously about the Callowan saying "Small slight, long price." I've got two thoughts about what that might mean:

1. There will be a price to pay down the track for Cat's small slight against the Tyrant (asking if he had a monologue in him).
2. Once he's resurrected, King Edward will have the opportunity to extract a long price from the Dead King.

Are there other possible meanings?

TeK

Not really. It is a deeply Callowan saying, bascally the motto of the whole kingdom, and there arre two Callowans currently on the scene, Cat and Edward (I mean, maybe Roland, but come on, it's way unlikely), so the story is tied, indeed, to either Cat or Edward extracting their respective long prices, and my guess it would be Eddy, for his price is really long in making. After all, he did say thatin the face of eternity will spit on DK and all his works, time for Neshamah learn the true meaning of what Callowan spite really looks like. Would be interesting to see it. Also I suspect we will have a short conversation with Neshamah right about now, after Cat had more than proven to be a passing nuisance.

Liliet

It's almost definitely 2, given the weight of the saying and the Callowan king in the same context.

Though, it might be both =x

Oshi

The thing that worries me though is that the DK has likely done all this to setup Edward as his chosen token for the new realm. If he's smart enough to predict Cat's play he might be using this whole thing as a way to setup his own pattern of loss and wins in order to ensure he is the one who picks the victor by choosing who he loses to. I wouldn't count my chickens until after we understand what this play means in the next chapter.

Liliet

Agreed.

shveiran

It is possible, but the DK's is not infallible. Cat has not showed he can craft aspect item out of defeated enemies, and that power is an interaction between a very peculiar individual and a recently ascended twin goddess. Just as he made a mistake in handling the Tyrant, he is on the backfoot here. He might have been not been able to predict King Edward could be stolen from him, not just slain.

It isn't really that strange a mistake, with so little information on a new player, and that might be the point: a prolonged confrontation with a new enemy, betting only known and ultimately unimportant pieces, to gather as many data as possible for future reference.

I think the Hidden Horror may have planned all to ensure that even a tactical defeat, caused by being blindsided with a new narrative, would only better position him for a strategic victory.

Euodiachloris

What Cat is doing may seem cruel to outsiders, since this can only be a one way trip for Good King Edward.

However, getting a chance to go out as yourself, extracting as much interest as possible from the bastard who turned you into a puppet? A few centuries of missed birthday prezzies have just landed at Edward's feet, and like every good little Callowan boy... he's going to go all out to make karma work its socks off. 😊

Andrew Mitchell

True. And I think it's pretty clear from Cat's original discussion with King Edward that he wasn't happy and that he wanted the chance for revenge before he dies for good.

caoimhinh

This chapter had an interesting insight into Aspects, too bad we didn't get to know more about Wish.

Catherine is getting a Revenant of her own now?
Cool.

Typos found:

The truth if it / The truth of it the essence if it / the essence of it
My I assume / May I assume going to be betray me / going to betray me
I still had faint of memories / I still had faint memories let you of Keter / let you out of Keter a grinned / and grinned

TeK

"He was in there, and it might just have been him speaking the right words to suggest I shouldn't pursue this line of conversation, that there was nothing to gain from it."

Wait, does that mean that there was actually DK inside Eddy? So she wanted him to make an appearance, to make him vulnerable, so that Sve Nok had someone to wrestle away Edward, otherwise he would be able to take him back any moment. Isn't she afraid he would take slivers of Sve now?

Awesome chapter, as always, noticably less typos. I am waiting on the edge of my sit for more Black, at this point, everything else being just a prelude to it. I mean, daughter freeing her father's soul from clutches of dastardly Evil, who had also brainwashed her friend, well, it's just so many heroic tropes at once.

On a little side note, I've been thinking, and doesn't WB been a real Creational analogy of King of Winter? I half remember, though it may be just a Mandella effect, her saying "I always loved a good story.", so it would make sense if she wanted to make the world more interesting to make new and interesting narratives. Maybe it's even her vice, or flaw, that she can't help but make new ones, case and point, Hierarch, which she made and then abandoned which might mean that she didn't really need it, and made her more as an indulgence on her part.

Briskly

I think last chapter with the Dead King speaking through the Skein, basically confirmed the dead king is always watching through his revenants.

antoninjohn

I wonder if Cat will marry the Good King, it would give her more leniency that even Procer could not deny.

Liliet

- 1) she does not intend or want to rule for long
- 2) it's very doubtful he can be resurrected, 'wrested away from death' just means 'from dead king' here
- 3) -Catherine's voice from a distance- LMAO NO

Mental Mouse

> 3) -Catherine's voice from a distance- LMAO NO

EE: Bwah hah hah! 😊 Seriously, if he comes out of this alive he seems to be a decent chap. But that whole "former crusader x Priestess of Night" thing might get in the way.

Mental Mouse

Also, odds are good that one or the other may be banned from a crown. If he does come out both alive and crowned, he might be a backup king for Cat! Or at least, he could re-introduce himself and hang out long enough to formally adopt Cat and Viv into the royal family, with maybe a few others for good measure.

TeK

That is pretty up there with theories about Cat marrying Dead King.

Liliet

I haven't seen a single one like that. Do you mean the theories about Cat marrying Kairos? 😊

TeK

Nah. NACK when Keter ark was ongoing, some people theorised that Dead King will marry Winter Queen sorta like Arcadian Court in the unholy alliance. And that was a reason for an invitation. It made more sense back in the day.

Liliet

AH I SEE

werafdsaew

Why the Dead King "there" means that Cat has her opening?

Liliet

My guess is, with him absent, she could have easily snatched control of the revenant, but he could have just as easily snatched it back later at any point he chose. This way, with his hooks in Edward... actualized? instantiated? she can actually root them out.

Oshi

It's more than that. I think this is the moment that Sve Noc reveals herself in opposition to Neshamah. Cat wanted it setup so the story favored them and for that she needed not just a fight but a fight over a carrion corpse. Literally what the Tenants of Night demand is that only the strong rise and gain. Cat has set things up so they have every chance not just to win but to win in a way that leaves no openings for the DK.

Liliet

Oh that is a great point ♥

Euodiachloris

With Edward on board and helping out in any way he can to kick the Dead King to the curb.

It's taken centuries, but the cavalry has finally come charging down the mountain to him. I doubt he's going to care too much to ask questions about the Night. 😊

Liliet

Yeah ♥

Kissaten

"Sorry, can't help you"

Breaks wishbone "How about now?"

Sounds to me like a trap, to be honest. Like, "I DARE you to try and take Good King from me". Creation is ironic like that, letting words bite back the one who said them. Was it Dead King speaking or Good King trying to weasel out of his bindings?

Dead King wants coalition falling apart, make the living fight each other, and Good King is the last un-living Fairfax – so there's a possibility to push a hero like that to reclaim his throne, even if he is a slave/servant/lieutenant to current Queen.

Liliet

Yeah this is most definitely a setup.

The question is, is it a functional trap, or is it just Dead King cutting his losses and trying to get away while losing a minimum of skin / disposing of liabilities?

Someguy

I thought it was mentioned that the by King Edward himself that Fairfaxes born after the time of Yolanda the Wicked do not actually have Fairfax or Alban Blood?

<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2018/07/30/chapter-37-offing/>

Granted, I'm not sure if it's actually Edward or the Dead King talking here.

Liliet

Doesn't really matter. Story doesn't track a genetic marker, it tracks a cultural thread, and culturally speaking, his last name is Fairfax.

Kel the Seer

I wonder whether a Good King, once successfully wrested from DK is planned to be used as the new keeper of this crossroads, an information source on the DK and how he plans, or an advisor for her named Heir of Callow when Cat inevitably abdicates?

Cat's naming of Vivienne as successor looked to be part of her long term plan for the Accords (no Named rulers) as well as to throw the heroes off balance. Then I realized that it gave her a fallback plan if she gave up her crown since a ruler who does so as part of this but continues to rule would bring ruin upon their lands.

Stealing Edward is a good way to get a long price out of the DK, but I wonder if it was one of her opportunity plans once she saw the pattern of revenants, or if she had planned something like this all along.

BatlleG

So, why Neshamah want Cat to get Edward ? Cmon, it's Dead King, this Revenant wouldn't be here if there were no purpose to it. It is a crown that belongs to Calernia, it seems matching with Cats wishes, its Good, seems perfect for Cats to use it. Dead King should see it. So why is it here ? Because there is some plan.

Most obvious would be that even if can 'steal' Edward, Dead King can still take control after. So he lets band of 5 win, establish kingdom they want and then just take it, as im sure 'you cannot steal from death it due' should be story that works in any word.

I'm sure there are more clever reasons that I couldn't think about atm.

Liliet

I think that's why Cat took the opening while he was there: if she'd taken control while he wasn't, DK would do just that.

shveiran

I agree it is a given King Edward is here because Neshamah had a plan.

It is not a given, however, that the plan is working. Cat may have pulled one over him as a result of disparity of information.

edrey

we cant forget about the pivot, so DK must really has a plan, the monsters are the revenants, the trial is kairos traition, and the pivot should the DK's plan, after all opposing the band of five is loosing really bad so he would wait after the realm is secured then strike, how? no idea, but with so much talk about saint death, the price of the pivot is obvious

Liliet

Yep. Cat has already just shown herself capable of outwitting Neshamah on her own prepared turf, and it looks like she was very much planning the 'and steal the Revenant if he's there' thing.

Morgenstern

... or he actually wants Cat to succeed, because his ultimate play is not being the Eternal Evil being let out of the bag occasionally, or even taking over... but finally winning against the Bard and the Gods, having grown tired of his shitty half-life existence, just like the Winter King did. I mean, the fae realm was supposed to kind of foreshadow happenings in Creation, at least possibly, right? 😊

The DK has been actually helping Cat so much, it's almost ridiculous for that to be him falling into story traps, what with all his supposed millenia-schooled intellect and story knowledge.

Morgenstern

AKA "let her succeed where my attempt failed".

Morgenstern

... and the WB and the DK might actually secretly be working together on this. I mean, we DO also have the theory that SHE is (also?) tired of her shitty half-life existence. 😊

Liliet

Arcadia is the one that mirrors Creation, not the other way around. Winter King wanting out = Praes as a nation growing tired of its own bullshit and attempting to change; Winter/Summer marriage = Praes/Callow dubious union, sharing an army and everything.

And I strongly doubt DK is "tired of his existence". It's likely he's giving Cat openings on purpose here, but that's because he loses nothing substantial of his own by doing so. Undead are ultimately replaceable; he's not undermining his own power base by giving Cat hard-earned victories here. It just plays into his own long-term narrative as someone impossible to vanquish for good but entirely possible to beat back and thus score a win. Not unbeatable, but a fixture.

Also, he thinks Cat is fun and is looking to enhance his existence by gaining a potential long term peer. Or even short term, but a diversion!

Kissaten

Whose aspect is Wind? Neshamah or Skein?

Andrew Mitchell

I think Skein. Wind as in winding a thread around a spool. TBH at first I thought it was Wind blowing her off course.

Now I think about it further, maybe it could go either way. Do you recall what aspects Skein showed at their first encounter?

Tek

He had his Spool, the one that was that maze-domain thingy. And I'm pretty sure Wind made her gates lead right where she entered them.

Liliet

Hmm.

>I tumbled out cursing in Kharsum, well to the side of where I'd been aiming for.

Looks like "gust of wind" to me, not like "maneuver was cancelled". She'd probably break bones if she tumbled out at the height she was when she entered, at that.

ninegardens

So wait... didn't she just say that using Sve Noc here was unsafe?

Andrew Mitchell

Yes, she did. So the fact that she called on her here needs some further explanation, I think.

Clint

She said she didn't want to use Sve Noc too often, because she had two big things to use them for and the more often she used them the more DK might learn to counter them.

This is probably one of the big things she was saving them for.

Andrew Mitchell

That makes sense. Thanks.

crysjal

Calling it now, Black is going in the Revenant.

Andrew Mitchell

King Edward's soul is still in there. Can there be two souls in one revenant body?

crysjal

A dead hero who has held a grudge for millennia and a bitter villain striking out at the world. They are probably very similar people. Then working in concert would be epic and exactly the sort of thing both characters would be willing to accept to act on their personal grudges.

Aotrs Commander

Once again, Cat's and Kairos' interactions are utterly charming.

(It's a practically a sit-com in the making...)

Liliet

Buddy cop movie!

TeK

So, speaking of crowns. Edward is kinda an obvious ploy from Dead King, Cat had secured Tariq's crown, which may or may be not obvious plot from Above, she has her own and kinda predisposed to abdication so that is kinda obvious too, narratively speaking (and also is so net for her in satisfying many of her desires in low to no cost, I bet everyone kinda expect it), then there is Black and his kingness, and Tyrant, though I would not bet on that. I am more and more convinced that the crown will come from outside the story. Cat repeatedly shown that you can ape the narrative without trully committing to it, so she may just conjure a crown out of a thin air, the one noone see doming (and so noone, not Tyrant, not Pilgrim, not DK can plan for, I mean I'm pretty sure that Neshamh has a variety of plans depending on who's gonna win, and how they are gonna win, and whose crown will be used). I think the mystery of final crown, outside of metametanarrative way of keeping readers on ends of their seats, has also a metanarrative strength that let's her be carried by the story. She got her own crown, has all those Revenant crowns, Tariq gave her his crown, she can stab Tyrant and use his crown, there is Black's crown, the question of "whether or not Cat will reach the point of choosing the crown" is kinda self-evident now, the real question, storywise is "what crown will Cat choose". It's the story, that, I suspect, Neshie had fed till it got really full, kinda making her victory mandatory. Maybe that is his angle, with Edward, and all. Not Cat's using his crown, but just Cat using a crown. And he can position himself to strike after that. And there are two questions then. How can DK use Cat's plan, and what do we got on crowns outside the story?

So I have a theory. DK had aknowledged Cat as a peer. Cat is arguably the leader in the band of two most famous heroes in Calernia and most famous Villain of her age (or as some might argue [i]other[/i] most famous Villainof her age). That and her maneuvering swiftly put her into position of a leader of anti-dead coalition. She got drow, she got callow, she got dwarves, now she probably, maybe, also got GA and League. And since WB position against Neshamah is as the one who "left the door open", Malicia is Dead King's ally, and she outwitted and suborned everyone else of import, she is kinda a rival to Dead King. A nemesis. And we know what those guys have. A pattern of three. So maybe, Dead King is giving Cat an empty victory, after he got what he needed, much like he gave the realm to Kairos, so that he can later leverage a victory of his own – of course, nothing as drastic as killing Cat, just, ya know, devouring millions of innocents and crushing her armies, while maybe turning everyone she knew and loved against her? Mild strokes, you know. But Cat can give DK a victory here too, if she plays her cards right. For example, using one of Revenant crowns, leaving him an opening, giving her the win over Cat “because she was too arrogant and greedy to notice a trap”. Or some other way. It all really depends on what Dead King really after, because everything else, including making armies of the living butcher each other away from the front, trying to create a fresh hell of undead, stealing Cat’s precious friend and ransacking his brain for secrets, were just secondary objectives, from what I can see. So DK is positioning Cat to “win” here, while he “just” manages to complete only his primary objective. And also a mere couple of secondary ones. And isn’t she winning? Making DK blunder, again and again, losing his Revenants, and failing to turn Kairos, and now whatever she does with Edward.

About the crown, I think it would be Cordelia’s. Long shot, probably wrong, but hear me out. So we know she dredges up something in a lake nearby. Corpse that is not corpse – that is probably something angelic in nature. Through the Augur and also maybe WB she knows that forces will come to align in Iserre. Dead King, Tyrant, Black Queen. All her enemies, in the same place, vying for the control of the shard of Arcadia, trying to turn it into something, no matter who wins, eldritchly Evil. A shard containing Liesse – Malician blunder, her rival’s. And we were told that she had inherited her blunders. Maybe it is more literal? What if Cordelia tries to usurp this shard and tie it to the angelic corpse, while dealing a blow to Dead King, and hopefully outright killing two other Villains? And look, the Saint who tries to kill Procer, GP, who refused her orders, and Black, who is not a person she is fond of, all here, all, in one place. She somehow tries to make shard a domain of the Above, to tie it to the Choir and throw it to the north. Not the point. But she is counted for by Cat, and reasoned with, to make a one crown that is not Named (so it can’t be somehow fucked with by Hierophant), and make highway wholeheartedly Proceran, which, given it is in Procer, makes sense, and allows a smooth adherence. Also she sacrifices her power, backs Rosalia as new First Prince, and goes off to fight for her native Rhenia, as is her wont.

But it’s just a theory. Also, the epigraph speaks about forgiveness from the mouth of Callowan King. Maybe it’s a foreshadowing of [b]Forgiveness[/b] of a Callowan King? Eh? Eh?

Also, they are both Edwards. Also also, when meeting him first time, Cat thought:

"Would that be Edward the Fifth?" I said, desperately trying to remember which of those had gotten themselves killed while crusading.

"The Seventh," the king chided. "You will know my daughter Mary, at least. She was but three when I was claimed, she must be the longest-reigning monarch Callow has ever seen."

Kissaten

8th crown is going to be Indrani. The one Band took with them into the depths, she is an heir to Ranger and all that. It even has a dramatic weight behind it that's beyond mere True Love's Groping.

Mental Mouse

Wait what?

(1) Archer is one of many students (and a personal rescue) of Ranger, but how is she "heir"?

(2) Ranger herself almost certainly wouldn't qualify as a crown anyway. Isolated sage/teacher is a thing, but it's not a crown.

Liliet

^

shveiran

I don't buy the theory as a whole, but that's because Archer isn't an heir. Why wouldn't Ranger qualify as a Crown? She rules Refuge as a goddess, and has been doing so for decades.

Granted, it is an unconventional rule, but since when does that matter?

If Black counts as king of Callow because his authority was practically absolute over the land, why wouldn't Ranger for Refuge?

Javvies

Archer doesn't rule Refuge as a goddess. She "rules" Refuge by virtue of the fact that (a) nobody is dumb enough to stand in her way or assert their own claim of rulership over Refuge, and (b) Refuge exists because she enables it to through protection from Fae incursions in her vicinity and because she tacitly allows it to continue to exist through not killing everyone.

Also, I'm pretty sure she doesn't actually do all that much on the way of ruling the place, and doesn't care to be involved in the ruling/running of Refuge, as IIRC, when Archer first shows up to retrieve Hunter, Archer mentions something about Ranger not being happy about needing to be involved in active rulership activities.

In addition, I'm unconvinced that Refuge constitutes enough of an outpost of civilization to generate a "Right to Rule" over it. There has to be some sort of minimum threshold, after all, and my impression of Refuge is that it's fairly low in population.

shveiran

I agree with most of your points, but the point remains that they are applicable to Black too. She rules it because she is the biggest monster around, but she is still in charge.

She doesn't pass laws, but she is still the law of the land as she was.

It is possible there is a population threshold, and I agree that Refuge seems to be fairly small. But there has been no indication that such a threshold actually exists. This is fairy tale logic, so my bet is that so long as you do rule a place, it counts.

Liliet

It's less population and more cultural narrative. Refuge is not a country, it's at best a city (more like a small town), and not a city-state. It's not a polity any more than a random isolated hamlet in the woods that isn't claimed by any tax collectors is.

And I suspect Black would not have counted as a King of Callow had Cat not roped him into the 'sword in the stone' narrative somewhat retroactively. That's how what Kairos said sounded to me, and it makes sense.

shveiran

I don't disagree, but "not claimed by anyone (else) 's tax collector" is not that far from our definition of an independent state. "Superiorem non recognoscens", "a state that which doesn't acknowledge anyplace else as sovereign of itself".

Now, I am just arguing for arguing's sake here (I don't really think Refuge's crown is going to play a part here) but I really think Refuge HAS one.

As you said, it is about cultural narrative: Refuge's people see it as a sovereign place. They don't think it's possible for someone to come knocking and say "you are my subjects now". They feel they are independant and that they are from Refuge.

I'll admit it probably has less weight than an established kingdom, even one (like Callow) that has not been acknowledged as one by what passes for the international community of the Guideverse. I'm simply arguing it could pass as a Crown. It isn't as far removed from the norm as other theories that have been thrown around.

Liliet

Hm.

I can see that if I squint hard enough yeah, and guideverse narrative IS all about squinting hard enough, so yeah. You're probably right. IF Ranger were here AND for some reason were inclined to help, she probably could.

Liliet

Refuge doesn't have a crown, it's a fucking campground. You might as well take any sergeant and claim that they 'rule' their line therefore they have a crown.

Also, yes, Indrani isn't her heir XD

shveiran

Well, YES, but so what?

I'd expect One Eye and Istrid didn't have a palace, but despite cultural differences they still had a "right to rule" over their tribes.

The culture is key. And Refuge's is very specific. A monarch trying to rule a Principate from a tent would see his authority diminished for it, but a Chieftain or Matron doesn't need a palace to rule.

Liliet

I think Refuge doesn't HAVE enough of its own culture to count as a state.

Though, yeah, maybe it does.

Mental Mouse

Sorry, but Cordelia is pretty much crackfic, if only because she's nowhere near the scene and doesn't have any magical abilities such that she could get here.

"Obviously" Cat chooses the crown, which means it may yet be subject to enemy action – but not until after Cat summons Larat. Until then, she can just veto unwanted contenders. But this is also in context of Cat's story-fu and magical battles against the Dead King, which we will learn the results of in future installments. Not necessarily Monday, as this seems a likely place to put an Interlude for Pilgrim and Archer. Which should be worth the cliffhanger, because those two make a really odd couple.

Liliet

Oh my god you're so right.

ninegardens

Okay, new plan, just to screw with everyone:
Use one of the various plot relevant crowns as crown number, and then pick one of the Procean crowns out for the PLUS ONE.

Repeating things and taking credit for the idea

If she takes away DK's power over King Edward, then his crown becomes an untainted 8th. Using that refurbished crown as the "and One" would be a clean resolution to move the larger plot along but lacks significance.

It solves the immediate narrative challenge of how to feed Larat without preventing Dread Emperor Benevolent, sacrificing Callow, getting in a blood feud with Levant, or requiring the end of Kairos (who is too adorable to waste on a minor plot point, and whose villainous monologue is winning the day).

I am unclear whether Masego needs to be the Big Bad of the Level, rather than Larat. If Archer saves Masego now through the Power of Love, then there is no reason to preserve Saint beyond this battle.

I predict that Masego will be taken out of commission for the Larat battle (unconscious and protected by Archer – maybe ported back to the Observatory?) and the Band of Five against Larat will be Cat, Kairos, Tariq, Rogue Sorcerer, and EITHER Saint or Edward.

Killing Saint here for the surprise crown would be so much more cathartic than offing her in some random duel later with SwordStaffPrayer. Using Edward feels like a Deus ex Machina to preserve a boring, stupid, distracting secondary character now buried under death flags and foreshadowing. I hope we see surprise Saint murder instead, and Edward laid to rest in Liese-Callow with proper funeral rites after he uses an Aspect to wriggle Cat free from a personalized trap sprung by Larat. Larat HAS to have something customized for her...

Best outcome: Cat starts to grab Edward's crown, Saint thinks any use of undead is Evil and doesn't want DK or Sve Noc to shape the realm, thinks Cat's crown fits best since it is why she was in Callow was to take the crown from Evil. Cat has to defend herself against Saint and uses SwordStaffPrayer. Tariq is not there, and Tariq's offer has no value with Edward there. Saint's head rolls, Larat strolls up to her crown plus seven and, newly empowered, terminates Masego-DK's armies on a caprice. Party of Five including Edward goes to bat against Larat.

Other observations:

Kairos changing his mind constantly (Skein forecasts) and stopping short of seeking actual unequivocal victory (Rend) is the path of The First Step of the Plan Always Works. He is a brilliant villain.

Liliet

The staffswordprayer is going to be used to save Saint, not kill her, calling it now. At some point foreshadowing becomes subversion bait instead.

Also, Benevolent is a historical Dread Emperor who does not map to Black in any way because of the presence of High Lords in his epigraphs.

thearpox23

I've considered the saving the Saint theory for a while now, and the main issue here is the anti-synergy with the Pilgrim's shtick. It is not impossible, but I admit I do not see a simple non-contrived for that to happen.

Liliet

Pilgrim is currently separated from them, note.

thearpox23

Think from the end. Why would a story situation arise where something like that is needed if the Pilgrim is not there? There is more to his tales than teleportations and power-ups.

Liliet

To the contrary: that's exactly why the split. Catherine and Tariq on the same team are somewhat redundant because their capabilities overlap. And now that he's not there is exactly when a story giving Catherine a chance to show off how she can do what would otherwise be his job would arise :3

Keep in mind, the Mentor Death trope, for example, is exactly about giving characters a chance to do something the mentor could do better.

thearpox23

Except they're still part of the same team of five (+one?) even if they're currently performing different tasks.

And it is a required trope that even when such a team separates for a while they always reconvene when important plot happens. If any of them were green then sure, they might get overwhelmed somewhere and provide an opportunity for the wise mentor to show off. But someone like Saint won't be in mortal danger until the events are ripe for them to reunite again.

Now that's not exactly cast in stone, but again, the how to deviate is where I struggle for a good solution.

thearpox23

PS: Also, the crux of my yesterday's comment was that as was established in the setting creation does not like repetition. And likewise, each of the members of the Band of Five provides their own unique role and skills to the group. Creation itself will be unwilling to provide opportunities for characters to do Pilgrim-like things for something Pilgrim has effectively copyrighted.

It'd be one thing if someone was his foil, but we know Cat isn't that.

Liliet

In my experience party split up stories are usually used specifically to highlight people's capabilities separately from each other and how well other members can cover for the absence of one.

They won't have grand new revelations without reuniting, true. But Cat has already managed to broker 3 months of truce out of Neshamah while half the party was away, and they're expected to save Masego while the rest are doing the distraction. "Being in mortal danger" is not a super big super special event, it's standard fare for the kind of thing they're doing. Technically Saint was in mortal danger already if Catherine hadn't managed to get a ghost army to take the pressure off her.

A breaking point in the relationship of two characters is exactly the kind of thing that happens during a party split. Have you seen ATLA, and if you have, do you remember the 'life changing trips with Zuko'? Like that kind of thing is what splitting the party is FOR.

thearpox23

ATLA is the Airbender thing? Didn't find it interesting, so I didn't watch far.

Cat brokering deals with ol' Neshy was them operating on a different meta-level then everyone else. She does this routinely, but it doesn't directly tie in to the ground meta-level events.

And I would argue that the Saint was NOT in fact in mortal danger, and if you think she was you'd be bodied by someone like Black in two moves. Consider that a Chosen can hold the tide against the dead for days given a story, and you can see that Saint wouldn't get swarmed by demons. You can swarm someone like Saint with demons, then get a Villain to stab her in the back, and she'd still avenge herself and run around for two hours with a dagger in her back before deciding that a lack of blood is suboptimal.

The reason she was just holding her own, is largely because a member of her party was already doing things, and so she was content for the time being to be relegated to the background. Having that party member's plan fail? I'd say Saint would be able to turn around the whole situation by herself, just with the expected consequences of failing to prevent a catastrophe, and maybe not by fighting every single demon in her way in order.

And so yes, being in mortal danger IS in fact a special event for a party of this caliber. These are not green heroes, they are all in fact strong enough to have a chance of winning even if they were to invade and stop Masego by themselves without a party of heroes.

And while character growth is a very important aspect of splitting the party, I reiterate that not all ways to accomplish that are created equal. Each character has their own defining traits, and one does not just steal the main shtick of another the when they are absent for five minutes. It is actually how a good author can write himself into a corner if they have a group where the characters combination of shticks serves to remove ways to show character growth, forcing the author to make do with hackery to get anywhere.

Liliet

Seriously? Protecting other people is now someone's "main shtick that should not be stolen" and not a pie everyone has got a finger in?

BTW, if Cat uses up her staff in the current confrontation with Kairos, I'm counting that for my prediction.

('Cause our definition of mortal danger clearly doesn't align, here)

Javvies

Wait.

I just realized something.

The Dead King is currently possessing Edward.

The "Right to Rule" does not have to be voluntarily given up – it can be taken.

Cat is really good at taking and repurposing stuff that was owned by her enemies.

What if Cat is trying to steal the Dead King's Right to Rule? And use it as the "and One"?

Sure, it'd probably have serious short term downsides ... but if the Dead King isn't allowed to be King anymore ...

Fayhem

That would be abso-fucking-lutely hilarious, but given that invalidating DK's ability to rule is practically a win button for the protagonists (might not cripple him immediately, but given that IIRC there's no method to undo that...) I don't see any way there's enough narrative weight to pull that off here before they've even gotten up north to battle DK there.

Mental Mouse

She might be able to take DK's crown hostage and exchange it for Masego. Or even do so with Edward!

shveiran

But she wouldn't. I don't buy she can take the DK's right to rule away like that, but if she could, she would have single-handedly taken away his ability to keep his low-key domain. It would cripple him utterly long-term. Anything that followed could be about the death-throes of the Big Bad, not just another skirmish.

This is "Choosing not to heal Nauk" all over again, only the greater good is a billion times bigger. It could make possible, nay, inevitable to defeat the DK at some point. Anyone who considers loss of life as a bad thing, like Cat does, would not exchange that for ANYTHING.

Mental Mouse

I don't think she could keep his right-to-rule; I suspect she could grab onto it, but actually holding onto it for any length of time would be way out of her league; at best she'd get a "King For a Day" story, and probably wouldn't come out of that too well.

Feeding DK's crown to Larat would almost certainly be a Bad Thing:

- 1) For starters it would "shape" god!Larat after a king that's trickier and more intimidating than he ever was to begin with, the literal ruler of a plane of Hell. Given the power boost, killing him might not be an option even for Sve Noc.
- 2) If the loss-of-kingship actually stuck: Congratulations Cat, you just destabilized a whole nation beyond Calernia. You were worried about refugees? How about the population of Serenity, pouring through a hellgate with devils hauling their stuff for them. And they might not be too happy about living conditions out in Creation where there's no god-king to cut the sharp edges off their lives.... And then there's various devils and undead that would probably come free along with them.
- 3) That's if it sticks, or at least until Neshamah finds some way to counter it. Assuming that feeding the crown to Larat breaks it (nobody's been worried about god!Larat taking over seven provinces of Procer), some thoughts come to mind:
 - a. Simply merging the Crossroads into his Hell, or grabbing god!Larat and dispersing his substance into said Hell.
 - b. Assigns one of his Revenants (or somebody from the Serenity) to rule over Keter.
 - c. If the loss of Kingship in Keter deprives him of his foothold in Creation, he can "retire" to being god of Serenity (with local kings), and wait for some unwary soul to invoke him... not so different from where he was before.

So I started thinking about why Cat and Karios play off each other so well and I realized at least part of has to do with the fact that they are foils of each other.

For example Cat is known for her practical evil and behind the veneer of a plan is her exploiting chaos, making it up as she goes along, and out right bluffing.

With Karios is known for being a villain's villain. Behind his attempts at obvious villain plots and seemingly random acts of evil is a plan.

Cat tends to prefer twisting the truth rather than outright lying. She'll often tell the truth when she's expected to lie knowing the people around her won't believe her and during her having power of winter couldn't lie outside of specific wording. When she does lie, it's often such a boldface lie that people believe there must be something else going on (exemplified by her tricking the Fae by writing a blatantly false invitation)

Karios, on the other hand, is known for being dishonest. As I saw someone quote in an earlier comment "you can always trust a dishonest man to be dishonest". Practically everything he says is him lying, yet it manages to hide his goals— people tend to dismiss him as a lying liar who lies and don't bother to think about how he's lying or what exactly he's lying about. It also makes him less credible (which Cat used to make herself sound more believable when she was talking to the party about what happened to Masego) but honestly I think that's the point.

There's also their origins. Cat was an orphan who wanted to change Callow for the better and so sought power. We know she had that ambition long before the story began, because she's clearly been saving for a while. Also in the beginning of the story she is, for a lack of a better word, adopted by a father figure mentor character.

Kairos on the other hand was born into royalty, although we can argue both didn't have particularly legitimate claims. Unlike Cat, Kairos in his extra chapter doesn't seem to have much ambition, not until the generals and such came to him plotting treason. Also unlike Cat, he is desperately trying to find value in the House of Light before he rejects it, where as Cat was mentioned to skip sermons and only really studying the the Book of All Things after she became a villain. The chapter ends with the implication that he rose to power by killing his father, who clearly put as little effort as possible into raising Kairos.

Anything I missed?

Andrew Mitchell

Nothing missed that I can see. You've compared and contrasted them well.

Enjou

Seems like the Good King's crown might make a good one for shaping the realm, now that Cat has taken him away from the Dead King. If he was connected to the Dead King still, that'd be a problem, since the shape of the new realm would be overly influenced by the Dead King's power over the Good King.

Now though? You've got a crown of a Callowan king who was enslaved by the Big Bad for a long, long time. Small slights bring long prices, so what do you think a huge slight like that gets you? Freed from the Big Bad by another Callowan monarch, the crown would be used to make realm intended to be used in order to fight the Dead King.

Andrew Mitchell

I approve. I think this would be quite narratively satisfying.

DC

Wait a minute.

Thief of Stars? Abscond?

Has someone been reading the SBURB Glitch FAQ?

kgyl21

If the Gray Pilgrim resurrects the King, they have a Fairfax to put on the throne of Callow.

Mental Mouse

Then his Forgive would be gone until the next sunrise.

Mental Mouse

More immediate problem: He isn't here. And it's possible that his Forgive will be used by the time he gets here.

Ephemeral

Anyone think that the whole thing is a trap?
Cat is fairly well known for usurping her opponents powers and the whole thing feels kind of convenient...
Not saying that's definitely what's going on but I wouldn't be surprised if the Dead King is counting on her usurping control over King Edward...

Mental Mouse

Does he know that she knows that he knows...? 😊

She's going up against DK in a challenge of both magic and story. We shall see who wins out...

Andrew Mitchell

For all those that are rooting for a true resurrection of King Edward, I've just noticed another supporting clue. Someone else may have noticed this already but I don't recall seeing it mentioned.

Look at the chapter's opening quote

It's almost like King Edward is giving instructions for what the party needs to do to use Pilgrim's Forgive aspect.

werafdsaew

A different Edward though; Edward the Fifth versus Seventh. And what does a scale balanced mean in this context?

Mental Mouse

Here's what Edward the Seventh had to say:
> "Stand tall, Queen Catherine," King Edward the Seventh told me. "Stand proud. We have been broken before, humbled and rent asunder. We have crawled through the blood of our kin and suffered the yoke of tyrants. It does not matter. We do not yield, we do not bend even when the sky comes tumbling down on our heads. Keep your grudges close, child, and never forget them. We are Callowans, and for every slight there is a price."

Liliet

♥ ♥ ♥

(god I love this storyline)

dcarter8419

Can't wait for more

Aston Whiteman

Monday a No Cat Update Day?

Happy Memorial Day!

Kakavorin

There was a small delay. The chapter isn't currently linked properly on this page, but it is in the archive.

Link for convenience: <https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2019/05/27/chapter-45-long-prices/>

Chapter 45: Long Prices

"Grudge is born of blood, carried by it and redressed through it. As they who came before me swore, I so swear: there will be no peace nor rest 'til the Cradle is reclaimed."

– First Oath of the People, taken by all in the Duchy of Daoine at age seven

I'd once had a conversation with Akua, after Indrani had hit the bottle hard enough during our 'council' that she'd ended up snoring on the table. We'd talked about him before, of course: the Dead King. The Hidden Horror, the Abomination, the last king of Sephirah – all that a hundred more titles, a treasure trove's worth of grim honours accrued over the centuries. We'd all been spinning our schemes around the ancient thing in Keter since the invitation had first reached me in Callow, and no small amount of talk and ink had been spent over the thought of what he might intend. In a sudden moment of honesty, sharing a shoddy table with a woman I still sometimes remembered to hate, I'd admitted that the Dead King's ambitions were opaque to me. Assuming he even had any. What could the immortal ruler of a near-untouchable realm truly desire from Creation? All the wants of a mortal ruler were in his hands already: wealth almost absurd, authority absolute, the adulation of the people he'd forged to worship him as their sole idol. What was there, in all the world, that the King of Death could not obtain with either a snap of his fingers or use of the patience in which he was peerless?

Companionship, Akua had eventually suggested, and perhaps there was some truth to that. When he'd spoken of the Bard it had been with an almost fond manner of respect, though they were foe in all things and more than once she had ruined him. Yet while I would not deny I'd had my moments of arrogance over the years, I would not seriously countenance that my potential apotheosis had been reason enough for him to stir the Crown of the Dead to war. Malicia's invitation had been an open door but walking through it had been his own will and the purpose of that will escaped me still. Even if he ended up successful beyond a monster's wildest dreams, even if he devoured the continent whole and brought forth a thousand years of darkness... then what? A fleet raised, and through ships the tide of undeath was to be taken across the Tyrian Sea? Or into Arcadia, perhaps, some other Hell or for true ambition to the Heavens themselves. It was difficult, I would admit, to truly think on the scale and scope of someone like the King of Death given the comparative speck of a life I'd lived. Yet I did not believe that the soft-spoken, patient monster I'd seen make of his own home a pyre for apotheosis would choose as his path endless war on all the world.

Akua had challenged me on that, surprised by my certainty. In some ways, she'd argued, the Dead King was the pinnacle of what being partisan of Below meant. For all that the Hidden Horror had slumbered beyond his borders sometimes for centuries at a time, that only one villain in the history of Calernia had ever been his better. May she never return. How else but war was the King of Death to subjugate the entire world? It'd been a stark reminder, that conversation, that the people who'd raised Akua Sahelian had seen conquering the world as an admirable thing to aspire to. Believed that it was natural to believe so, that all others did as well. Her peers, her highest servants, her kin: her entire little world had shared that madness. It must not have seemed like madness at all, I thought, when you were in the warm embrace of that world. How could it be, when everyone who mattered believed it reason as well? But Akua was still a Wastelander, a highborn, in ways she might never entirely shake. It blinded her to the truth that the Dead King's victories had sprung from his rejection of everything the brood ever circling the Tower held dear. See, the thing with the kind of game that Neshamah was playing was that the opposition only needed to get lucky once – and they had forever to take yet another swing, praying for that golden day. And every time the Dead King went to war, Above got another shot at him.

An endless war, for Neshamah, was a long and elaborate suicide by odds.

Oh, we'd not peered at the heart of the Hidden Horror and unfurled its deepest secrets that night. We were, after all, both so young and taught to think in the terms of a war that rarely made it so far west. But it'd stayed with me, the thought that patience was not a skeleton key to the Dead King's every trouble. He could retreat back into the Serenity when he disliked the cast of something, true enough, but that had costs – in champions broken, in secrets unearthed and tricks revealed. Much of that knowledge died with those who'd learned it, so soon gone, but the important bits – those that might one day destroy him? The Intercessor would hoard them, and then dole them out to heroes whenever opportunity arose. Patience allowed him to set the battlefield as he preferred, to stack it, but the battle still had to be fought. Why offer a hundred-year truce, if not because he disliked the shape of this particular battlefield? The paramount virtue of an existence like the Dead King had to be cowardice, in this world of ours, and that meant retreating immediately and without qualms the moment it seemed like there might be a genuine threat after him. That knowledge was no skeleton key either, though, for he remained the Hidden Horror. There were so few things that could be a threat to him, when it came down to it, and even in the dawn of days the Bard had named him adept at avoiding weakness.

The ability to take back a Revenant from the grips of the Dead King would be a strategic threat, but not an overwhelming one. Save if I was prepared to assemble my own army of dead Named to match his, which would taint my reputation beyond repair in my seat of power and antagonize near every possible ally, it was little different from losing one of his champions to the blade of a hero. Of course, I'd not simply petitioned Sve Noc to aid me in clawing back the free will of the Good King: we were doing it while the guiding will of the Hidden Horror was still inside. Now, I was no mage and my learning in such matters were still young. But I knew, from having raised corpses and bound them to my will as well, that the kind of fine control that I'd seen displayed here could not be done without investment. I couldn't be sure what it would cost him, if we succeeded at trapping whatever part of him he'd disseminated into the Revenant, but that hardly mattered. The Dead King was, not to belabour the title, dead. He no longer healed, in body and soul. Every loss of him was a permanent loss. And so, as the might and attention of doom-crowned Sve Noc poured into the corpse of Edward Fairfax, I returned to a familiar place. Surrounded by the absolute pitch black of nothingness, I stood leaning on my staff and met the gaze of Neshamah in the... flesh, so to speak.

"I do not hold much respect for recklessness," the Dead King said.

I replied nothing. The hourglass had been flipped, I thought, and it was not for me the sand was running out. Oh, there was no real guarantee that we'd succeed at trapping him. But even if we failed it would be at a cost, and greater to him than us. For all that the King of Death had made attrition his sharpest sword in some ways, it may yet be turned on him to cut just as deep.

"Still," Neshamah said, "your use of it as a calculated measure continues to surprise."

It would have been an empty gesture to look at anything other than him, for there was nothing else to look at, so I did not bother with the theatrics. I did not speak either, though. It was not me, who had come to bargain – though I had schemed the coming of this conversation, I would not deny.

"You will require guarantees as to the Hierophant's life," he said.

I inclined my head in agreement. I'd been worried, since the start, that there might be some things that not even the Pilgrim's resurrection could take back. Or that his hand would be forced early to spend that aspect on some life I cared less for, preventing the use I needed for some lesser prize. Receiving assurances from the Dead King was preferable, for though he was no fae bound to his word he had to know that if he crossed me on this after making a promise I would never bargain with him again. Recklessness, he'd called this. Like in these struggles of ours there was meant to be a manner of cordiality, mayhaps not of fair play but at least of an... understanding that this was a game, a play, a sport to be had. Do not forget, the ache in my leg whispered. Do not forget. I bared my teeth in a feral smile at the King of Death, the savage pupil of savage teachers, and let that pretence die. We were no Proceran princes making courtly war, for there could be no such thing as a war courtly.

"Six months," I said.

"Pardon?" the Dead King said.

"Your armies will not advance a single step for six months," I said. "This, and the release of the Hierophant. That's my offer."

"You overestimate the strength of your position," Neshamah warned.

"You have," I murmured, "taken my friend and now bargain with his life while scheming the death of others dear to me. You arranged the destruction of my armies, of near everyone I've ever cared for. But for my intervention, you would have buried Iserre in death and borrowed Hierophant's hand for the deed."

"You clutch the remains of what you once were, Black Queen," the Hidden Horror said. "It does no favours to what you have since become."

"It was never really personal to me, before," I told him. "You were a foe, but in some ways an ally as well. In principle I thought it tragedy that others died to your invasions, but no one weeps for faces they never knew nor loved."

"A taste," the Dead King said, "of what is to come. They will be strangers, Catherine Foundling. One day, and sooner than you believe, they will all be strangers."

"And if that day comes, I may yet become the horror you foretold," I admitted. "But today, Dead King?"

I limped forward, into his space, with cold eyes.

"Today you are the thing that took my friend," I hissed. "The thing that would have slaughtered the Woe and the Army of Callow without batting an eye. I 'overestimate the strength of my position', Merciless Gods."

I struck at the nothingness we stood on with my staff, the sound ringing like a thunderclap.

"You think after this I'm not willing to try falling off the cliff together, Neshamah?" I said, tone sharp. "To gamble on which of us will find our wings on the way down? Look at my back, King of Death, and see what is writ there – when given the choice between risking ruin and kneeling, I've only ever replied one way."

A moment passed.

"Has your tirade ended?" the Dead King calmly asked. "No purpose was served by it, save the thinning of my patience."

"You have my terms," I coldly said. "Six months and the release of Hierophant."

"That is no bargain," he said.

"Aye," I replied. "It's a price. And if you know a single thing of my people, you'll know ours are always long."

"I've more than a single hostage in my possession, even if the Tyrant has once more turned," the Dead King said.

"I knifed Black when we last spoke before ordering him to find his decency," I said. "He's since arranged the starvation of several hundred thousand innocents. Try again."

"If you are to assemble your coalition against me, you will need a ruler for Praes," he replied. "You cannot tolerate the continuation of Dead Empress Malicia's reign, which leaves him your sole reputable candidate."

My fingers clenched. It'd been too much to hope for that playing it off would work.

"Amadeus of the Green Stretch and Masego the Hierophant," Neshamah said. "For assurances I will not take the life of either on this field, your crows will loosen their talons."

I breathed out.

"No," I said.

His eyes tightened the slightest bit, which on another man would have been frustration and surprise.

"Down we go, Dead King," I said. "Gods help neither of us, the fickle pricks."

"Assurances," he said. "And three months."

It meant he wouldn't release Masego, that whatever purpose he was using my friend's body for he would continue until the very last moment. But three months, Gods even just three months? It kept the Lycaonese in the war instead of letting them stumble down the slope into oblivion, and it was enough breathing room to turn this war from lost to losing.

"Night's not over," I said, matching golden eyes to mine.

"Once more, in this we agree," the King of Death said. "Bargain agreed?"

"Bargain agreed," I replied, and darkness broke.

—

The Sisters had not reached apotheosis gently, and their works were not gentle ones. Yet this was a matter of theft, of taking, and in such matters we were all well-learned. Sve Noc, discerning my thoughts as they formed, loosened their grip on the Revenant just enough that the wisp of spoke that'd been the Dead King's will slipped away into nothingness. And along the footpath the Hidden Horror had used to withdraw, rapacious Night coursed down. Imperious and grasping, it devoured what bound the man who had once been the Good King Edward Fairfax to his subjugator in Keter. Komena, I knew as she deigned to brush her thoughts with mine, wanted to claim him in the Hidden Horror's stead. To have a Fairfax flagbearer of her own, to spread the Tenets of Night wherever dusk was known. For where, among the realms of men, were more fertile grounds for her red-handed lessons than the war-torn fields of Callow? Andronike, ever cautious and calculating where her sister craved clash of arms, felt more inclined to snuff the Revenant out. Mastery over the tainted carried risks, she grasped, and brought opportunities for that most dangerous of foes who our war against was only beginning. Why chance it, when there was little need? I disagreed. With both of them I disagreed, and though it was not in the nature of prophets to argue with prophecy or of heralds to argue with the message born, that was not the lay of our ties. It was for my contentious nature most of all they had raised me to be First Under the Night. And so when I spoke the Sisters listened, and our wills joined in miracle.

King Edward Fairfax, Seventh of His Name, breathed his first free breath since he'd died below the walls of Keter. That was the first of the two great workings I would unleash today.

"It has been," the Good King said, "many years since I last tread the streets of sunny Liesse."

Letting out a long breath, I opened the floodgates and Night begin to fill me. A rising tide of power, too much of it for me to able to shape or grasp with my own hands. In the sky above us all, deafening shrieking noises began to fill the air as hellgates were torn open one after another. This already half-ruined realm began to shudder at the roughness it was treated with, a sinking ship with yet another hole made in the hull every few moments.

"You appear to have incensed the Abomination, Queen Catherine," King Edward said.

"I tried to strong-arm him into some fairly major concessions," I admitted. "It appears he believes I am in need of an admonition."

Night continued to pour into me, a tide rising, until the world around me turned into an oil painting: imprecise, as if smudged, but no less beautifully coloured for it.

"So it does," the Revenant said. "I thank you now for the breaking of my chains, you who they name Black Queen, but I must wonder at the price of it. What dark patrons have sought my indebtment?"

"Nothing," I said. "You owe not a single thing. Miracles are not bought and paid for, even those of the Night."

"A gift," King Edward said, sounding unconvinced.

"I have request to make of you," I admitted. "Yet it would be meaningless if you did not agree of your own free will. And so there will be no talk of debt, to either myself or Sve Noc. On this all three of us agree."

"Mercy gifted without strings, yet with purpose," the Good King said.

He sounded, I thought, almost glad.

"I am a priestess," I said. "But also a queen."

And there were so very few things that a queen could afford to do with a single pure benign intent, in the end. Virtue alone did not win wars, or keep people fed through winter. In the distance, as if in an entirely different world, the Tyrant of Helike was still speaking. The devils around us and afar were boiling like a pot about to tip, stirred into a murderous frenzy by sorcerous means and now swelling in number with every passing moment. The Saint of Swords fought still, unbending and without pause, and though I could almost hear the Rogue Sorcerer's panting breaths in my ear still spellfire spun out and devils died. Yet the battle around us, coming to us, seemed almost like a distant scene. I already knew that it was not out there victory or defeat would be found.

"Your petition, Queen Catherine," the Revenant said. "I would hear it."

Leaning tiredly on my staff, I raised up a palm and compressed everything I could of the Night in a ball. My will failed, though stubbornness made that defeat slower than it should have been. The forces I was trying to wield were simply too large. But where I faltered the will of the Sisters drew me up, and with their two grips – one deft and soft, Andronike the spinner of weaves, the other imperious and coarse, Komena the breaker of spears – an orb of pure Night formed above my open palm.

"Can you hear them?" I asked. "Our people, the echoes of them in this place. The indelible mark a terrible slaughter leaves long after it has ended."

"Like songs woven of wails," Edward Fairfax softly agreed.

"The foe who did this I slew and made my own," I told him. "Though that end is a pittance, to the madness that was the Doom of Liesse. But there is an enemy that stands before us, using her works for ruinous purpose and waging war on all the world. That, too, is a scale to balance."

His eyes flicked to the orb of Night.

"One last time," he said, "into the breach."

"It will kill you," I warned. "There is little kindness in that power, and it was not meant for your hands."

"I am long dead," the Good King replied. "And kindness is not what I would have of this day."

Edward Fairfax had no longer been young, when he was claimed, and I suspected even if he had been few would have called him handsome even then. But to the strong cast of his face there was a manner of regality, like it had been hewn from stone and taken the noblest properties of that make. Helmetless, his crown of white hair was the sole he wore and the sword in his hand was bare. Without a sheath to return to, for there was none at his hip, it would never be allowed to rest.

"The war never ends, Queen Catherine," he told me, tone quiet. "The faces and the borders, the foes and the friends, they are but the shallowest measure of the thing. Not all tyrants reign from the Tower, and many who have hunted the wicked partook of wickedness in the hunt."

I inclined my head.

"One should not confuse striking at evil and doing good," I quoted.

"Lest good become the act of striking," the Good King completed, tone approving. "You understand, then. That when your evil is no longer necessary, Black Queen, to linger would be to stray from the narrow path you have tread."

My fingers clenched.

"I know," I croaked out.

Dead fingers snatched the Night from my palm, clenching into a fist and letting the darkness sink into the flesh.

"Then rise, Callowans," King Edward called, voice like thunder. "Rise once more, for we yet have debts unsettled and House Fairfax calls on you one last time."

There was a heartbeat of silence, a stillness like death. And they answered, as they had for centuries, for even a grave made for a petty hurdle when it was a Fairfax calling you to war.

sivarajan

Called the title!

Liliet

Called the title, Catherine successfully reclaiming Edward, and the ghost army.

The fandom did good on this one 😊

Stephen R. Marsh

Wow.

TeK

From small delays, long chapters.

Gunslinger

Honestly it's amazing how much the quality of the writing improved with just a little more time. It's a pity EE still needs to work a day job or we could have more of this.

sengachi

Speaking of which: <https://www.patreon.com/user/posts?u=3523924>

Jarthon

Indeed, though that delay does mean that Small Sights has no link to Long Prices which will be quite annoying to any future readers. I do hope that gets fixed.

Flatsc

Talk About leaving one with goosebumps.
The amount of point ^ counterpoint going on here is making my head spin.
AS always erraticerrata, I can't Wait until the next chapter 😊

Euodiachloris

Seconded. I think my goosebumps have goosebumps. 😊

NerfContessa

QFT.
Simply grand chapter.

superkeaton

The Noble Dead rise.

dyxsst

FIRST!!!!!!!!!!

the finest case of the wait is always worth it

Navi-Hank

This chapter isn't connected to the others.

danh3107

My kinsmen, brave dawi all, one more Grudge to be settled from the Damaz Kron. Vengeance shall be sated.

KAZUUUUUUUUUUUUUK

Gunslinger

Is this a quote from something?

Gibborim

Dwarfs in Warhammer Fantasy are called dawi. And they do like their grudges.

Lord Delakar

Naw he's just talking like a WHF (warhammer fantasy) Dwarf aka dawi. Dammaz Kron is the dwarven name for the book of grudges. An all around badass idea and fits well with Callow lore.

As for the cry of Kazuk. I think it maybe a mistake on "Karaz a Karak Ankor" which is the dwarven version of Camolot.

Or possibly "Khazukan Kazakit-ha!" Which is the dwarven version of "yo betta check yo self, before yo wreck yo self." Ie dwarves are on the warpath and not even considering the idea of POW's or hostages who only last long enough to be used as ammo in a grudge thrower. IE an Onager.

danh3107

Pretty much exactly what I was going for despite my numerous misspellings of dawi phrases....

Although Khazuk or Kazuk is a pretty common warcry.

Andrew Mitchell

Woah, that was A M A Z I N G. ♥ ♥ ♥

- It seems that King Edward really gets what Catherine is trying to do. So he's sacrificing himself to give Catherine the ability to win here. He WON'T be giving his crown for the making of the highway.
- Is King Edward or not? He's breathing but his hand is still "dead".
- The last two paragraphs put a smile on my face and tears of my eyes.
- So much more information about the Dead King. He does not heal, so any wound is a permanent reduction of his capability.
- I was surprised that there wasn't discussion about the details of the guarantees for Amadeus and Masego. It seems that there is a lot of wriggle room for the Dead King to leave something behind in them.
- Minimum 100,000 undead wraiths from Liesse. Now that's going to change the tide of this battle and the next (with the new god Larat).
- Three months should be enough to get an new alliance agreement hammered out and the Drow and other soldiers to the battle fronts. Especially with the new highway.

nimelennar

- Is King Edward or not? He's breathing but his hand is still "dead".

It's a revenant of King Edward. It's not alive, as true resurrection is something that Below can't achieve. Apparently, though, it's close enough to "alive" that it needs to breathe.

Andrew Mitchell

Yes, something new then, not quite like other undead.

Liliet

I think he less needs to breathe and more does so anyway, like Winter Catherine – out of habit, and for olfactory experiences.

Dainpdf

The Dead King knows his craft. He might also be breathing because something in him keeps the instinct, though there may be no need for it.

onedollargum

Like Winter Catherine then. Substance in the shape of a person.

Dainpdf

The deal will be enforced by Story and strife. The DK needs to be able to strike deals in situations like this, so he won't throw that away so easily.

And breaking his word, while not as bad as for Fae, is likely to have Narrative Consequences. Or, well, Cat is likely to make sure it does.

Adrian_V

Or it could be that the whole thing with a revenant is that they never fully died, like their souls never crossed over so they can be alive again and not be resurrected.

Liliet

I mean 'soul never crossed over' is also what happened with Catherine and Akua, didn't make them any less undead. "Soul never crossed over" is kind of the definition of soul-ed undead, "soul was brought back" is full on resurrection and comes with the whole 'the body is alive too' package.

Michael Anyanechi

That ending gave me chills

Sethur

This was SO worth the wait!
The Good King and the Black Queen, bringing forth a miracle of doom... Now this is a story! ^^

Mental Mouse

So, Neshamah, what think you of Cat's position now?

taliesinskye

Epic.

Baron

I remember the first time this series made me cry tears of awe. It was when Adjutant came into his Stand aspect.

That time was the first of many.

Andrew Mitchell

I know exactly what you mean. ♥ ♥ ♥

The Brave Little Muffin

Bad fuckin ass. I was wondering why she picked him to co-opt.

IDKWhoitis

I would point out, that "I do not hold much respect for recklessness," is roughly the Dead King's equivariant of saying "You little shit."

Cat just struck at the core of what he is, and probably did more in this one attempt than most Named have done in hundreds of Years.

signspace13

And also shows growth in going for the long Con instead of just injuring him here, she could have decided not to bargain and taken the immediate Victory of Wounding him here, but no, she gave him back his fragment of soul for the chance to complete her actual goals

Liliet

Actually Cat kind of traded a long-term gain for the living of Calernia, for a short-term gain for just her and her contemporaries.

Though, the Lycaonese could have been in enough danger it'd be a long term problem too...

Decius

There goes Akua's crown. The dead will not stand for her to keep it.

werafdsaew

Does the agreement means that Archer/Pilgrim can no longer free Hierophant? Or are they still free to act?

Gunslinger

I think the Night is still young part means she can have a swing at him to free Masego. Just that he won't take his life when trying

Fayhem

Lol beat me to it! Shoulda refreshed the page before replying to people.

Oshi

The DK wants something and he will not leave until he achieves it. The assurance was that he would leave and not linger.

Fayhem

The agreement means (re: Hierophant specifically) Dead King won't just hand him over, but also won't break his neck on the way out if they can give him the boot. So Archer/Pilgrim are both still free to act and very much needed.

Euodiachloris

Liesse is dead. But, beware its ire, all ye who would trespass and transgress.

talenel

It also feels like a sort of purification for Liesse. These Callowan souls were killed and put to unholy purpose by The Enemy. Now they may go to their rest having righted a wrong and fought for their Kingdom. Having reclaimed Liesse for the Kingdom.

Andrew Mitchell

I like your idea and hope that's what happens.

WuseMajor

Honestly? If he actually WANTS her as a peer after this, I think he must be mad. I have to agree with Bard that "she's the type who burns herself out" I just think she'll manage to kick over the game board before she goes out. If she does end up falling though, and, say, ending up the immortal priest-queen, ruler of the Drow, and so on....the schemes she would weave to keep the Drow and the Hidden Horror from wreaking havoc would be mighty, twisted, and mighty twisted.

I doubt she would ever quite lose that propensity to gamble everything on a single roll of the dice though. I mean, if she hasn't by now, then that's a part of her to stay.

Dainpdf

Not a propensity that leads to long careers, as she herself just outlined with the DK.

Mental Mouse

Well that's the thing... heroes get to survive brinksmanship way more than villains do!

Which is Cat... are you sure? 😊

Also:

> I have to agree with Bard that "she's the type who burns herself out"

Except she's done that three times so far. That's not "burning the candle at both ends" anymore... that's the everlovin' Phoenix! (Even if it's painted black 😊.) The Phoenix is a powerful archetype in its own right, which specifically is known to travel from the heavens to the realms of the dead. And it represents immortality beyond even that of the gods...

Dainpdf

Depends on the tradition you're pulling your Phoenix out of. In any case, brinksmanship will bury even heroes, in time. See Prince, Shining.

Javvies

The Shining Prince wasn't engaged in brinksmanship. That was sheer stupidity. Albeit possibly helped along by the Wandering Bard. If he'd (a) worn his helmet, and/or (b) been under a truce banner when issuing his challenge, things would have turned out differently.

Dainpdf

Taking deadly risks. The only difference is he got no benefit if his risk taking didn't get him killed.

It's still a lesson in "take risks and someone will exploit them" still applies even if Above is tipping the scales.

shveiran

I don't think he's mad, but he may very well be lonely.

TeK

I am actually sorry for DK here. Not only did he killed all his friends to become an immortal abomination, but because of that, he can't make new ones 😞

Not to mention that the only people he can even remotely consider to be friends are WB and his one true love, lately Triumphant.

werekobold miner

the dead king can play tower defense with ranger

Dainpdf

Is this the... second? Third? time that Cat twists the arm of some major figure since she came back.

To get the Pilgrim to ally, to get the DK to give concessions, (implied) to get Black's sould back from the Pilgrim...

Oh, wait, there were also the two times she threatened Laurence's life (to get Black's body back, and to get Pilgrim's crown).

So fourth or fifth time?

Dainpdf

The way things are going, that Forgive aspect she needs might need to be used on Pilgrim's poor arm...

Dainpdf

Wait, she also twisted Kairos's arm into attacking the Alliance. Five or six.

Why does WordPress not have an Edit function??

shveiran

Admittedly, it is kind of her thing, these days.

Considering in the beginning her thing was to wreck whatever stood in her path, I find this is a sharp turn toward the Good side of the "narrow path".

Liliet

♥ ♥ ♥

He Who Hungers

The Doomed rise again. 100,000 souls risen at the call of an equally dead Fairfax.

Patience, Age and Experience vs Recklessness, Savagery and Cunning. A collection of Named taken by force vs a group of Named collected by trust and family. Revenants vs Woe. Dead King vs Black Queen.

A dance surely to watch.

IDKWhoitis

I'm unclear if Catherine is going to use Ed's Crown, but that may not have the necessary weight...

He is dead afterall.

I think Cat is almost certainly going to use her own, and let Viv fully take the Crown, but in doing so, may break her forming name of Black Queen...

Unless Cat uses the Skein's, but that would run into the same problem that using Ed's Crown.

Caerulea

I suspect Tariq's crown will be used, given how she traded letting the Saint of Swords be for his crown, when the time comes (Chapter 40). In addition, the crown of a helping hand is probably better than a crown of gambles and long prices for the realm.

Mental Mouse

Cat's like: Surprise DK, you missed a big point, 'cause Eddie isn't just another random crown: He was a former king over this city. And fondly remembered by most of the 100K people who recently died here...

Skein still isn't marked as a crown, and Cat is showing no signs of getting back on the Name bandwagon. AFAICT the last remaining known crown that could conceivably get involved is Hierarch, but he was last reported playing psi-screen from an undisclosed location (probably in creation), and surrounded by Atalante (sp?) priests.

Agent J

Black Queen broke at Second Llesse. It's just an epithet now. Cat has no "forming Name" left to break.

shveiran

Yes... and no.

She had a forming name then, and it meant “vassal sovereign under the Tower, playing the system for the sake of Callow and reforming it as a true piece of Praes – if under its Empress”.

That name broke at Second Liesse. Cat will never ally with Malicia now, or at least never agree to be her enforcer / vassal. She cannot trust her to that extent.

But Black Queen was a forming name. It doesn't really have a shape, because it never really formed enough to come into existence.

What Black Queen still is, is Cat's lower case name. It is how the most important players of this era, whether Named or not, whether ALIVE or not, refer to her. And she is STILL the pivot of any major event that's going down.

She will never be THAT Black Queen. That path has been erased before it was completed.

But names are shaped by culture, and major events shape both history and Story. Calernia and Callow both will walk new paths before this is over, and at the center of it all is still the Black Queen.

Scheming, nudging and bludgeoning the continent into a shape she can live with.

All that while being Nameless, and yet conviction and will are at the core of what Names are.

Am I the only one that fully believes Black Queen will BECOME a Name still? One with a different meaning than the one that was forming in Book 3?

Andrew Mitchell

I don't know if you're the only one, probably not. But I'm willing to admit that what you're suggesting is possible, I just don't think it's very likely. IMO there's less than 10% chance. The main reason I'm assigning it such a low probability is the total lack of foreshadowing in the text. Given how sensitive Cat and the other villains and heroes are to forming names, I would expect one of them would have noticed and that we'd get a hint.

Mental Mouse

Oh, it will surely become a Name... for the future! Cat doesn't get to tap into it as a Name, because it doesn't exist yet. But some future ruler – presumably one of Cat's successors – will turn to frantic creativity in the defense of the realm, achieve the name of Black Queen (or perhaps Black King), and discover that their opponents can also become resources....

Likewise, Hakram couldn't have been the first "hypercompetent orc assistant". Black's reforms probably put a lot of particularly competent orcs in such roles early on, and then lasted long enough for that to become a tradition.

Daedelus' Muse

"One should not confuse striking at evil and doing good," "Lest good become the act of striking." "Many who have hunted the wicked partook of wickedness in the hunt."

Hmm, is the Good King's middle name Nietzsche? "He who fights monsters should see to it that he himself does not become a monster. And if you gaze for long into an abyss, the abyss gazes also into you."

Mental Mouse

I like seeing Guideverse's proverbs.

Javvies

Nice.

And this, people, is why Callowans are the most spiteful of all.

Laurence has definitely, and maybe Tariq (if to a lesser extent), have failed the charge that Edward and Cat talked about – blurring the lines of striking at evil and doing good. Laurence has completely lost track of the difference, but for Tariq the lines have gotten quite blurry.

Rook

Catherine isn't so different from Laurence in that sense, or at least she's far more similar to the Laurence than she is to Tariq. She's always been someone who strikes down rather than building up, while Tariq is more about preventing the need to strike down in the first place. Chemotherapy vs a vaccination.

To her credit she's always readily admitted it – both in the conversation with the Good King and previously when she described herself as someone who fights the monsters so that the real work can be done in her wake – but she's always been a character that cuts out the cancer than one that heals the wound.

Javvies

Cat hasn't lost track of the difference between striking at evil and doing good. That's a key part of her conversation with Edward. And part of why he agreed to help her and to summon the Callowan dead.

Laurence has completely lost track of that difference. Tariq has not completely lost track (I think), but the lines differentiating between the two have been incredibly blurred for him.

And both Laurence and Tariq have partaken of wickedness of their own in the hunt of the wicked of others.

Liliet

I think Laurence knows the difference as well as Cat does, she just perceives a lot of urgency in the current situation where there really isn't that.

Javvies

Have you forgotten about Laurence's "plan" to burn down everything and get the Dead King to pull a Triumphant?

Laurence has completely lost track of the difference between doing good and striking at evil. Admittedly, according to Tariq, striking at evil has been almost the only thing that she has done as a Hero. But she's still lost track of the difference.

Rook

Have you forgotten that she isn't following 'her plan', but instead Catherine's plan on Tariq's recommendation?

Have you forgotten that the series would've ended at book 4 if the Saint hadn't backed down in the face of Rozala's decision to negotiate? End of book 4 chapter 17 if you want a refresher.

If you want to claim that the Saint doesn't understand the difference between striking at evil and doing good, then why has she repeatedly chosen to let others do good over striking at evil herself, when the chips are down? It's certainly not because of any lack of faith that she'd win that fight in the end, considering that she outright states they can win when they were arguing about it.

Laurence being able to back down even while disagreeing to that large of an extent, while furious, and while believing to the end that it'll end badly, proves she that she not only understands the difference but she acts on that understanding better than 9/10 characters in the series.

Mental Mouse

Laurence has actually been learning from her experiences, while Cat has been proving herself to all the heroes. And for whatever reason(*), the Wandering Bard isn't around to mess with her head.

(*) Probably because at least Cat or Archer would chase her away posthaste, and they know how to do that now. Possible involvement with the "must flee what she desires" thing.

Liliet

This, thank you!

For all talk of Laurence being a loose cannon, she has yet to fuck anything up other than the Arch-Heretic thing (which has Bard's fingerprints all over it).

Liliet

Laurence's plan was based on the idea that allying with Cat will not save Procer but only lead to further destruction because of course Cat will betray them / because her narrative is that of revenge against Good. With that prior, trying to ally with her looks like a humiliating attempt to weasel out of only-too-deserved trouble.

Fayhem

> Have you forgotten about Laurence's "plan" to burn down everything and get the Dead King to pull a Triumphant?

You know, I've been factoring that into my analysis of Laurence's character pretty hard for a while now. But lately I've been getting more and more uneasy about relying on that, especially the longer that Bard is absent from view and that Saint appears (very relatively) willing to be "reasonable" by her unique definition of the word. It was heavily, heavily hinted at (to the point I consider it basically confirmed) in the chapter where the plan was laid out to Cordelia that Bard was involved. Specifically, extra chapter Fatalism III (<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2018/10/01/nihilism-iii/>) had the passages:

"Through the wood [door] she heard a spatter of female laughter and the sound of cup being dropped, [Cordelia's] brow rising in response."

and

““Good evening, Your Highness,” the Saint of Swords nonchalantly call out.

Her mind spun. She’d set out aiming to find out which of the Chosen had demanded the conclave, and already she had her answer. She absent-mindedly noted a handful of details in quick succession – there were two cups, not one, and one had been toppled. It’d spilled liquor all over the table. The other goblet was in the hands of the heroine, inclined at an angle that allowed her to recognize water within. They were alone in the room, the only other door behind the Saint, and the chandeliers casting light allowed moving shadows to be cast into the corners.”

Those aren’t signs the First Prince would pick up on because she doesn’t have the background information necessary, but as a reader I consider it a lock that Bard was there.

So. Is this really the Saint’s plan, as I initially believed? Or is it the Bard’s plan, and Saint agreed to serve as the mouthpiece when relaying it to the First Prince? If it is Saint’s plan then it’s easy enough to believe it really is that uncomplicated and brutal since “uncomplicated and brutal” is basically Saint’s meditational mantra. But if this is really the Bard’s play... well, it might easily still be just as brutal but uncomplicated isn’t a word I’d ever pick for Bard.

In other words, if this is the Bard’s play then to assume we know the intent of this plan is to assume we know the Bard’s mind here. And the folly of reaching that assumption too easily has been writ before us in the fate of Sabah, among others. So. When Saint gave her horrifying little speech about letting it all burn because it’ll work out for the best in the end that way, was this the plan? Or was this just what Bard wanted the First Prince to hear?

The second one, honestly, might be scarier.

shveiran

I believe you are right about Bard’s involvement, but I’m not sure it matters.

The plan involved creating a divide that could not be reasonably crossed between Callow and the world, through religious grounds, to ensure total war. Whether or not Laurence was the architect or the mouthpiece, isn't there evidence enough she was ON BOARD with those goals and ends?

Fayhem

Well, that divide seems to be being crossed right now in the story so "could not be crossed" doesn't seem to be accurate. The idea that the Conclave's action would ensure total war was part of Laurence's description to Cordelia; if the sincerity of her description is questionable and the accuracy of the prediction is being shown to be false in practice, is the fact that she described those as being her goals and ends to the First Prince as part of a plan designed by Bard actually sufficient evidence that Laurence is in reality on board with those goals and ends?

I don't know! That's the point I was trying to make; not that Laurence is 100% definitely not that crazy (maybe she is, it wouldn't exactly be wildly inconsistent), but that I don't feel safe in taking that chapter as a 100% indication that she actually is that crazy.

Also, let's not forget that Saint has leveraged her Regicide-y reputation in Procer as part of a calculated bad-cop routine in concert with another, subtler hero before. Prior to the Battle of the Camps Tariq gave the assembled princes a nice "I'm a reasonable wise old man, I hope you will listen to my advice when the time comes" speech, left the tent, and then Laurence gave her trademark "THAT'S NICE BUT I'M FUCKING CRAZY SO DON'T FUCK UP OR IT'S REGICIDE TIME" speech before leaving the tent herself. Then we got a scene between Tariq and Laurence where they're basically both going "we sold that routine to them pretty nicely, they should be primed to listen to the Grey Pilgrim now" to each other. So there's precedent for her deliberately playing up the scariness of her reputation as part of a calculated plan rather than as a 100% sincere position of her own.

Liliet

Y e p.

Rook

I have to completely disagree about both Laurence and Tariq.

Laurence knows full well what her role is and follows it. That's why whenever she and Tariq butt heads about a big decision, she's the one who backs down and follows his lead even though she has the bigger sword by far. It's why she was willing to even concede to Rozala's decision to negotiate at the end of the battle of camps, even though at the time she had no reason to believe Catherine was any different from the rest.

Given a choice between letting other people do Good or striking at Evil anyway, the text SHOWS that she more often than not chooses to back down in favor of letting other people do Good. She followed those decisions even though she completely disagreed with them and 100% believed they would end badly.

In fact the only groups she's shown to be completely hostile to in the text are the Proceran Princes (who everyone is hostile to, even the other princes), literal hellspawn, and Villains, against which her attitude would be correct 99/100 times.

The Saint is a massive dick to be sure, but in general she's not ignorant or wholly unjustified. Being not likable doesn't make someone evil, ignorant, or stupid. It just means they're not likable.

Tariq on the other hand, probably understands the difference better than anyone, even Cat and the Good King Fairfax. His entire character (and Mercy's) revolves around committing a lesser evil for a greater good, even when he understands that it's an evil and that the ends don't justify or absolve the crimes of the means.

If you accused him of being a large extent knowingly immoral I'd actually agree with you – there's a good reason why pure utilitarianism is a stance most people only argue to play devil's advocate – but you can't accuse him of being ignorant about either the moral issues with his actions or the consequences.

If you were to look at the classic trolley dilemma, he's not the character that would divert the trolley to kill one person and think his action is pardoned because he saved five people. He's the character who'd admit that doing so makes him an irreconcilable murderer, but would do it anyway. Because he's a hardliner whose values are all about the least suffering.

Liliet

Yeah.

werafdsaew

The difference is that Laurence will never stop striking at Evil—even when there’s no worthy Evil to strike, and striking is not the best solution to the problem. Cat always planned on abdicating after she stabilizes Callow.

shveiran

Also, Laurence has been using her “I am a sword and a sword cuts so that’s my solution to all things Evil” approach for a long time.

I don’t absolve Cat of her actions, but she IS young at this, and she HAS realized that approach doesn’t work long term, and she HAS been fighting against the tide to find more peaceful solutions. It is usually bullying through story-fu, but that is great progress over what, four years since becoming Named? Three?

Risser

“and them dole them out to heroes”
And then dole them out

Also the link from the last chapter to this one is broken or doesn’t exist

Alegio

I just noticed how callowans would make great necromancers. The whole never leave a debt unpaid thing probably makes rising angry callowan spirits pretty damn easy.

Sckarred

The grave is no bar to my call

sutortyrannus

Exactly what went through my mind as well. Magnificent.

Raivshard

“We rode on the winds of the rising storm,
We ran to the sounds of the thunder.
We danced among the lightning bolts, and tore the world asunder.”

So many great lines in that series.

Ben Serreau-Raskin

Amazing. I legitimately teared up and got chills.

Whatever other outcomes lead from this moment, Cat was just judged and found worthy by her culture's equivalent of King Arthur in a setting where the tale of King Arthur would literally give superpowers to anyone acting it out. Whether or not any of her companions ever see or know it, that's going to have weight both narrative and emotional.

Liliet

I just wish someone else would know 😡

Just... yeah.

Silverking

The conversation between Catherine and King Fairfax is so bittersweet. On the one hand, Catherine is hearing something that she has been desperate to hear for a long time: that the "narrow path she has tread" has merit, that her desire to do right by Callow is not a flimsy pretense for the suffering she has both given and received. The Woe is has always been a bit...compromised for Cat to see them as objective observers, and Procer's self-righteous condemnation wasn't doing her any favors. But to hear at least one Good person whose opinion she values say that he's proud of her...oh, that was so good to hear.

On the other hand, I'm reminded of the original Fallout, with the Overseer's speech at the end of the game. "You saved us, but you'll kill us. I'm sorry. You're a hero... and you have to leave."

Liliet

Mhm.

I don't think he's asking of her to die at the end, only to leave, and Catherine does already have dreams for what to do when she gets that, shared with Indrani.

God, the moment of his approval is so powerful here though.

shveiran

I wonder, is that a difference?

I really, really want an happy ending, but... Cat isn't Indrani. She doesn't need to die, no, but she needs to end her story, permanently. I wonder if she'd be able to without dying.

To surrender the ability to step up for Callow if need be, to trust that peace will last, to renounce the possibility to ride to the rescue with the rising dawn (or the rising night, as the case may be).

I think she understands it is a necessity, but I'm not sure she can ever bring herself to do that AND watch helplessly the next catastrophe be born without her, or even worse leaving and wondering at all times. Callow is, in the end, the core of her being.

Sad as it is, I fear she'd rather take her life.

marillius

Why can't she become a wandering miracle worker whose always there are the right moment to prevent greater evils with the help of lessers? Why can't she be a shadowy version of the grey pilgrim? He gets to live centuries guiding but she can't? And considering that means she can weave in and out of a story, as long as she doesn't take an apprentice or a liking to anyone in said story, and then hang out with her bae after she's done... I'd say it'd be a pretty good happy ending.

Particularly if she ends up as a semi-balance factor to the crow goddesses, always giving them perspective on how 'greater evil' usually means 'you lose', with only one exception thus far.

signspace13

The Grey pilgrim is as mortal as anyone else, he is likely in his late 60s or early 70s, living hundreds of years is not how Hero's operate, not unless they are already immortal before being Named.

Liliet

Calculations have been made that put him at 80+.

Hardly a century, though.

lennymaster

Pilgrim is old, but he is most definitely not older than a century. Remember, Heroes age. And Indrani is more of a friends with benefits, and that quite possibly only due to the fact that she and Masego never acknowledged their feelings for each other.

Liliet

He doesn't get to live centuries guiding.

But Cat might 😊

shveiran

I don't KNOW that she doesn't, but I SUSPECT she has so much weight behind her that she can't NOT be the protagonist for her own story.

Pilgrim gets to do that because her story is built that way, slow and steady. He's the fireplace you rest your weary feet beside.

Cat's is a supernova, but being the brightest star means you can't stand in the background.

Liliet

I think she can burn out that story and stay alive afterwards for a calmer one.

Liliet

I think Cat's going to go for a Queen Under The Mountain story, rather than surrendering her right to help. She wants to be a guardian, not a ruler, and it's specifically the ruling role that she needs to step down from at the end. And she already wants to.

Cat's evil is in ruling, not in protecting. Protect, I'm fairly certain she's allowed to.

shveiran

There are a lot of traps with that.

Protect from what, external threats?

If she steps in to handle domestic ones, like an usurper or a rebellion, she is basically enforcing the current ruler's right of domain OR deciding when a ruler is allowed to keep ruling.

That is pretty much "rule through proxy", because you get to select and remove kings.

So let's say just external threats, like a silent sentinel on the wall with a very cool cloak billowing in the wind.

Cat repels bad procerans coming to conquer her land, Cat steps in and crushes her, cheers and beer for everyone.

But what happens if there are reasons for that invasion?

What happens if a Callowan ruler is doing something bad a la Aqua, or maybe invaded beforehand?

Cat then becomes an asset in their arsenal as the monster guarding their "lair" (aka kingdom) or makes a judgment call and steps aside. But if she gets to pick and choose, with the power she has, she is de facto still ruling: her decision has so much weight she is still the key factor no matter where the crown lies.

There are too many nuanced complications for a “warden” role to be taken cleanly, especially with her single-handedly reforming the country.

If she stays, she won’t be able to be neutral. She will rule in practice, if only because everyone will want to try and curry her favor and so she’ll have a say in anything that’s decided.

Liliet

I don’t think Cat’s going to do that.

I think Cat’s going to stay away and come out ONLY when the threat is actually definitely dire.

Maybe only when called on by heroes, that seems like a good heuristic.

Soma

Good chapter.

Kissaten

Finally joining crusade to finish off Malicia? Who is there that is ‘she’ who wages war on all the world? And 3 month long truce on top of that to let Cat see that war to completion. There’s also Black in here, and Malicia did say that “Praes is no stranger to walking dead armies”, lol.

werafdsaew

You’re reading it wrong; the “enemy that stands before us” refers to the Dead King; the “her works” refers to Akua’s superweapon.

Deviant Loader

I’m surprised the Dead king, given how cautious person with no opening as he is, had actually given Cat such a typical opening to strike or strong arm him in the first place.

I hope that in the story is not going down the path that made the capable characters start holding the idiot ball for just for some other characters to win though.

Also, I interested to know, given how there’s talk of small gods being taken down by heroes.

I am now curious if the Dead king himself also have a few demi gods in his possession or not, given his power.

I’m also curious that given how common it is that the dead king controls his minions outside. Why didn’t some hero tried that stunt or sudden got inspired to do it on him yet like what cat did yet.

Javvies

The Dead King doesn't know Cat's capabilities as First Under the Night.

Remember, while he knows everything Masego knows (or so it should be assumed), Masego last saw Cat when she was still Sovereign of Moonless Nights.

Deviant Loader

For one, DK had a chat with Cat before showing that he knows about Cat having support from the goddesses.

And so it seemed reckless to me that he even acted on the lack of information and put himself in harm's way and anywhere close to Cat in the first place.

That he knew had the support of the unknown power of goddesses. Which in itself seemed to defy his character.

So as I said, it's surprising for me that DK even had such an opening to begin with.

Liliet

Neshamah was working with the Masego/Liesse plot before Cat came back and actually before she made the agreement with Sve Noc.

His pieces were already in place and he was already in a weak position.

Andrew Mitchell

I don't think anyone's holding the idiot ball yet. And I'll be very surprised if EE ever does that.

One of the reasons I love PGtE so much is the way EE frequently surprises me with unexpected plots and character developments which surprise me, and yet are entirely satisfying with the way they fit early into the ongoing story.

Liliet

DK ain't holding any balls here, other than audience overhyping him. He misstepped and did not have full information to act on, that's all. Cat's debuting her new capabilities, and this round is hers fair and square. She probably won't get another opening like this.

werafdsaew

Because controlling the undead isn't something that the Heroes typically do? Cat is rare in that she's using villainous powers for heroic ends.

shveiran

Not just that. The DK was outmaneuvered because Cat had Goddesses to call on when she started the Tug of Revenant War. He couldn't see that coming, and was risking a loss. I don't think it would have been a MAJOR loss, but it is one he could not recover from and so he is willing to concede a far greater advantage than its worth, to buy Cat off into not inflicting that loss. It is a good bargain for both of them, in the end.

Deviant Loader

I felt that DK should already know that Cat had the power of goddesses to call on. He even had a chat with Cat about it.

So I'm actually surprised DK even put himself in that reach to Cat to begin with, when knowing about this.

Andrew Mitchell

Sorry, when did they have a chat about that? I'm trying to remember it but I'm drawing a blank.

Liliet

In the recent chapter where he brought up the hundred year truce thing he commented that he wondered how she got the sisters to give her the army.

And Cat was like 'wait he doesnt KNOW???'

Andrew Mitchell

Thanks... I can't believe I blanked on that.

doominator10

Juniper: "Ok Cat let me get this straight. You formed a heroic band with the Tyrant, the Rogue Sorcerer, the Pilgrim, and the Saint of Swords and took a jaunt through not-Arcadia into the ruins of Liesse where the Dead King hijacked brainwashed Hierophant using his grief for his father. You then thwarted the Tyrant's sudden but inevitable betrayal, then used him and the rest of your band to fight an army of hundreds if not thousands of demons just so that you could get close to an undead revenant of one of the greatest Callowan kings, steal his soul from the Dead King using Gods who I'm sure are the reason why I keep hearing cackling laughter in the back of my head, and had the king raise a bunch of undead Callowans to fight back the demon army, all while brokering a few months of a ceasefire with the Dead King?!"

Cat: "More or less. Hakram pass me my pipe, it's been a long day."

Vivian: faints

Abigail: 'Don't make a sound. Maybe they won't notice I'm still here and have me executed for knowing all this.'

Andrew Mitchell

Hahahahahaha... Yep, that's how that conversation will go. 😊

(By the way, it's devils, not demons. Demons are much, much worse.)

happyhavak

Incorrect. Hakram would have already had her pipe ready and waiting.

konstantinvoncarstein

It is an army of devils. Demons are eldritch abomination capable of destroying an entire city in one night.

shveiran

Cat: "And that concludes the retelling fo phase 1 of my plan.

Now, phase 2 began when I..."

Insanenoodlyguy

Oh come now, be nicer to former thief. Vivian is not gong to faint. She is, however, going to start drinking straight from the bottle.

Liliet

Vivienne breaks down giggling.

Hitogami

Wow! This chapter was so good!

shveiran

So good a chapter.

The discussion with Edward gave me chills, and there was so much insight on how and why the Dead King thinks and acts...

Priceless. EE has me more hooked with every single chapter, no matter how much I feel that the hype could not possibly grow more.

Raved Thrad

Aragorn shaming dead oathbreakers into fighting for him has absolutely nothing on Dead King Edward calling on dead Callowans to rise from the grave and fight for hate and spite.

Liliet

SO FUCKING GOOD BOTH OF THEM

I love the point where at the end he just takes the Night from Catherine. Like she was reluctant to give it to him because it'll kill him (even if that's her own plan) so he grills her for a bit and then just takes it.

Badass ♥ ♥ ♥

Euodiachloris

"Oh, no you don't, girly: my revenge, my choice. Cough it up!"

Oshi

It's not spite. It's to even the scales. It's fine line but Callow is all about balancing the scales at it's best. Of course the scales always balance towards them when they are done but that's fair right?

Gamer7956

This chapter gave some interesting insight into the Dead King... and I'm honest to say I'm also curious as to his motivations. As such I went and reread the epilogue of book 3 – where the dead king decided to march (I believe). Note what happens in the chapter just before it – the Hierarch accused the Wandering Bard of a crime, and declared that should the heavens intervene they would be put to trial (and implied this also applied to Below). The Wandering Bard was then dispelled – mid conversation. This raises questions. What made the DK's gem glow? Could it be a dispelling of the Bard not by a physical assault but an assault on her role – that comes from the madness that is the Hierarch? How often do the madmen that shake the very foundations of creation come about? Triumphant being the last is very believable...

We know for a fact that the Tyrant wants to put the Gods on trial and have them found guilty – what if that isn't dissimilar to the DK's goal. What more could the Dead King want than freedom? And how else would he get it than by removing providence entirely?

Of course, I'm likely WAY off the mark, this is the Guide we're talking about. But I think it bears... well... thinking about.

Andrew Mitchell

For quite some time I've been saying that the Bard's role is to keep the game going on behalf of Above and Below.

Your new theory fits desire that neatly. And if it's true then the Dead King and Catherine have more in common than I thought. Catherine wants to break the game and improve the lives of everyone across Calernia.

Mental Mouse

As far as DK's gem, I suspect that was much simpler: "Hey boss, someone important showed up in Keter looking for a treaty". Or, possibly "one of Triumphant's successors has triggered the hotline I left with her".

Oken Marsh

There is no link from the previous chapter to this one currently.

aran

> patience was not a skeleton key to the Dead King's every trouble

Skeleton, get it?

aran

> "You appear to have incensed the Abomination, Queen Catherine," King Edward said.

I'm a bit confused here – did Catherine break the bargain by freeing Edward anyway, or did she only agree to let Neshamah safely escape the revenant? (And if the former, why did she bother bargaining?)

aran

> In the distance, as if in an entirely different world, the Tyrant of Helike was still speaking.

Man, when this guy monologues, he fucking MONOLOGUES.

LokeshC2

Why am I crying!! It's just an army of innocent dead people following a dead good king.

Interlude: Repudiation

"It is written that the Hidden Horror sent envoy to the Iron King Tancred, threatening that should he not strike the banners over Hannover and open the gates the city would be stormed and burned to ash. So did Tancred Papenheim then send back a single torch, with on the side engraved three words: 'if you can'."

– Extract from 'Crowned In Iron', a compendium of Lycaonese histories assembled by Prince Alexandre of Lyonis

It was like watching two enemy Hells trying to devour each other.

The Revenant – stolen from the Dead King, she'd thought, by the grim patrons of the Black Queen – that had once been a king of Callow spoke in a voice like a clarion call and the dead of this accursed place answered. Laurence watched, jaw clenched, as a coursing tide of wraiths made of silver and shade rose from the scarred ground. Mere dozens, first, but that swelled into hundreds and then thousands before more than a handful of heartbeats had passed. Those were not soldiers, the Saint saw. There were children and elderly among them, men and women whose hazy silhouettes bore no arms save angry hands. And oh, how angry they were. The rage of them was a clamour and a song, the weight of it making the air feel taut. Thousands of voices, of silhouettes, moving like a seething river of souls to tear at devils and dead alike. Laurence splattered the blood of another devil on the ground with a flick of the wrist, catching its clumsy strike and sending its head tumbling down with the riposte, and without hesitation began to move. Not towards the Black Queen, whose lone silhouette was surrounded by an island of stillness, or the other Revenant. No, roughly forcing aside any spirit that in their advance got in her way Laurence de Montfort headed for the imprisoned soul of the Carrion Lord.

She'd seen it when they first broke through the maze of the Skein, still pilloried in that clever silver artefact the Sorcerer had crafted for them, and she could not allow it to be claimed by anyone else's hands. Allowing the Tyrant to keep it was pointless – even when Theodosian had stolen it earlier he'd not proved to be a least a modicum useful by destroying the soul himself – and it was out of the question for Foundling to be allowed to reclaim the Black Knight. Tariq had allowed himself to savour the taste of hope for the first time in too long, and grow drunk off it, but Laurence would not lower her guard so easily. It was difficult to advance, to the Saint's displeasure, for though the wraiths were but lesser dead and ignored her even when jostled they streamed forward heedlessly. It was like swimming in death, and more than once Laurence found her sight obscured by the flows. The devils who'd been in the courtyard were ripped apart within moments, she'd seen, harsh hands clawing at them and wailing mouths biting down on flesh. The Skein was not destroyed, but from what she could glimpse it was being drowned in sheer numbers. Foundling, at least, had not moved from her perch.

Stumbling over broken stones and just one more push away from beginning to hack at the bloody wraiths no matter the consequences, Laurence finally broke into what had been the Horned Lord's nest of ruins and found Amadeus of the Green Stretch still imprisoned. And gagged, thank the Gods for that – if she had to hear a single other sly barb from that viperous tongue she'd cut it out of his mouth. Another company of wraiths flowed before her, cutting her path, and she felt like screaming but she was too close to draw attention to herself now. Only, through two passing spirits she saw a tall shadow standing by the villain. In the flickering lights she could not be sure, but Laurence could have sworn its face had been painted purple. Feeling her stomach drop, the Saint dropped all pretences of subtlety and harshly forced her way through the wraiths. Several swiped at her with angry hands, though when she continued pushing forward they lost interest and returned to their war instead of pursuing. She'd been too later, the Saint saw. The drow that'd been standing by the prisoner snapped closed the silvery artefact that'd been unfolded into a pillory, now no larger than forearm, and with an amused silver glance at her it took a single step forward into nothingness. Bordel, Laurence silently cursed. That was Foundling's little attendant, wasn't it? The one she'd called Ivon, or maybe Iva. The Saint, fingers tight around the grip of her sword, turned her gaze to the Black Queen.

She was still standing alone on the rise, that many-coloured cloak flapping around her from the wind of the wraiths flowing around her. Hair long and unbound, her limp grown more pronounced and nowadays leaning on some sort of walking stick, she seemed nothing like the angry mutilated child Laurence had tried to put down at the Battle of the Camps. Catherine Foundling had yet to strike a single blow with a blade since she'd returned to Iserre from her journeys, the rumours went. And she had grown more dangerous for it. All night they'd danced to her tune, the Saint thought, glancing at where the Black Knight had been spirited away before she could take him back, down to this very last note. You don't know what you're bargaining with here, Tariq, she appraised. Setting a wolf on a tiger only has two beasts prowling the wilds, wounded and twice as vicious. Yet the time had not come where Laurence would bare her blade to redress yet another mistake made by kinder or weaker souls, so her longsword returned to the sheath. Climbing up the mound of ruins, the Saint came to stand by the side of the rising villain of their age. The woman remained silent, eyes on her dead countrymen now taking the battle to the devils pouring out of the open hellgates. Among the horde, the crowned Revenant led the charge with a shining blade.

"How did you know it would work?" Laurence asked.

The look on Foundling's face was strange, almost subdued on a face that seemed to have been carved from hard edges with the razor-sharp cheekbones and too-strong nose. Even grief looked harsh on a face like that, much better suited for the sharp grins and cold stares the Black Queen was infamously known for.

"It always does," Catherine Foundling said, "when you make it hurt a little."

Laurence's lips pulled back in disdain.

"Does it sting that much, to have had to borrow another's hand?" the Saint said. "You've not been shy in doing so tonight."

Though perhaps it struck closer to home, that even being crowned in Laure had not been enough to give the warlord a fraction of the pull the long-dead Fairfaxes had on her people. It was no great endorsement of her reign, that she'd had to use the name and Name of another for that working.

"This city is a mass grave dug by my failures," the Black Queen replied, tone remote. "And yet here I am, walking its grounds once more. How many more, I wonder, will it take before I have been made to look that failing in the eye enough?"

Laurence hesitated, for though it was a monster she spoke to in that moment she sympathized with the woman more than she'd thought would ever be possible. Because this was not a smirking, victorious puppeteer tugging at all their strings. That distant bleakness she knew well. It came from the same place that had the Saint of Swords wondering what might have changed, if she'd arrived a sennight early instead of late. If she might have slain the beast when it'd taken a handful instead of a village, if she'd found Isodorios when the dragonblood first began to decay instead of after the red had taken him. What if, that old and tireless flagellant's whip.

"It'll never leave you," the Saint said, not unkindly.

It was honest, which was the highest courtesy she had to offer the likes of Catherine Foundling.

"I don't suppose it will, no," the Black Queen quietly admitted.

There were a few heartbeats of silence, left unfilled by either of them, before the old woman grew impatient.

"And now what?" Laurence asked.

"We're a distraction, Saint," Foundling reminded her. "And I would say that the enemy is suitably distracted, at the moment."

"The Skein's not finished," Laurence replied. "It'll take more than wraiths to put it down."

"See to it, if you'd like," the younger woman shrugged. "Take the Tyrant and the Sorcerer if you please."

"You're not going to lend a hand," the Saint grunted. "What a helpful hand you make."

Theodosian was probably enough on his own to entirely bury the Horned Lord's oracular insights instead of simply muddy them the way Laurence's own domain would, but it'd go quicker with a priestess or ruin keeping the Revenant contained while those of them better-versed in killing the dead put an end to the abomination.

"I'll be headed inside, should King Edward succeed at breaching the wards on the inner palace," Foundling casually said.

"Should?" Laurence asked.

"Depends whose wards they are," the Black Queen grunted. "Let's hope they're still using the Diabolist's work as the base, otherwise it'll be like trying to topple a rampart by throwing eggs at it."

Further hellgates opened above them, devils pouring in. The victorious battle for the courtyard finished with the Tyrant of Helike, laughing maniacally as he shot streaks of a fire from a jeweled sceptre at a hissing and fleeing Skein swatting away the dead pursuing it – they had, Laurence saw, ripped away great swaths of fur and eaten the flesh like hungry ghosts – until the Horned Lord leapt over the cliff's edge of that was the end of the ducal palace. In the distance the dead king of Callow raised his sword at the sky filling with fire and brimstone, and grimly declared war upon it.

The dead obeyed.

Laurence waited. There was ending coming, she could feel it. And when the moment came, she would be ready to meet it as it should be met.

—

Tariq had faced many a villain in his time, and not always with Light and strife. Often words could bring greater good in the world than a harsher touch, if they were the right ones, and so it might just be the truth that there was no living on Calernia who had spoken with more villains than he. The quiet ones, he'd found, tended to be the most dangerous. Those who did not feel the need to boast or fill a silence oft had greater designs occupying their thoughts, and so proved more perilous adversaries. This was no cast iron rule, however. For example, it would have been a lie to say that Kairos Theodosian was not one of the deadliest Bestowed he'd encountered over the years and the boy simply could not stomach holding his tongue. Still, the tendency was pronounced and though the Woe were as peculiar a band of villains as their infamous predecessors when Tariq had first assessed the Archer her constant chatter had encourage him to dismiss her as an ancillary threat when she was without the guiding hand of the Black Queen at her back. A skilled and seasoned killer, mind you, with a way bow in hand that might as well be sorcery. But not a true danger, like the brilliant mind behind the brutish face of the Adjutant or the eerily innocent atrocities the Hierophant had it in him to commit.

He had been wrong in this.

While it was true that the Archer – Indrani, as she'd casually confirmed she was named – was loquacious, the Pilgrim had beheld what went on behind the smiles and the swagger and it had him unsettled. The Archer's thoughts and feelings shifted constantly, mercurial as the tides, yet there was a bedrock beneath them that was as subtle as it was watchful. It had had taken him the better part of an hour, for one, to put the finger on what a particular association between a part of that bedrock and amusement directed at him meant. Namely, that the smiling young woman was considering she might have to kill him in the future. Without feeling so much as a speck of guilt over it. It would have been easier to swallow, Tariq would admit to himself, if the Archer were a coldblooded devil like some of the monsters wearing human skin he'd had to face. Incapable of joy or fondness in more than shallow ways, though it had to be said that no all such constrained the Pilgrim had met were monstrous or even particularly nefarious. Yet the young woman was not. Deep affection and something like an intricate manner of loyalty had bloomed in her, when she'd spoken with the Black Queen, as well as something he had uncomfortably placed as lust. Something more romantic in nature emerged when mention was made of the Hierophant, though it was paired with a manner of wonder that implied to him the admission there was still fresh.

Indrani the Archer was, he knew by virtue of his aspect, a pleasant if hedonistic young woman would not even slightly hesitate to slit his throat if she judged him a threat or was asked to by someone she trusted. The knowledge was made even more unsettling by the way that wheedling information out of her was ludicrously easy, though the bedrock beneath that ease missed nothing of the nature of the questions being asked. Perceptive, this one, even though she was already on her second flask of Levante monteron since they'd left the rest of the band. That she remained mostly sober after drinking that much hard liquor was notable even in one Bestowed, though given the appearance he suspected she had murdered outriders from Lord Marave's army for them. Possibly she had killed them entirely for the flasks, for her fieldcraft was not the kind anyone with mundane eyes would easily see through no matter how skilled those eyes.

"- so we signed it as 'the King of Winter', since none of us knew the name, but the real important part here is that she called me a sullen wench," Archer said. "Sullen, really, can you believe that? The nerve of her sometimes."

Tariq set aside a concern, namely that he had been repeatedly outmanoeuvred by a young woman whose notion of a ruse fit to enter the seat of the Winter Court was a lie so blatant the fae would hesitate to call her out on it, and addressed a more pressing one. Such as the fact that, while Indrani was gesticulating, she was not keeping both hands on the sheer cliff they were climbing. Something of an issue, as she was the lead climber but if she fell the same rope she used to help him up would help drag him down to his death.

"Should you truly be this cavalier with the handholds?" he asked in a strangled tone.

"Don't worry about it," Archer dismissed. "We're almost there anyway."

"And that will be solid ground, yes?" the Grey Pilgrim faintly asked.

"Bit of a slope, but pretty much yeah," the young woman cheerfully said. "Used to be a secret escape tunnel, when this was still Liesse the city instead of Diabolist's flying magic tantrum. Nobles, right? They're like moles, always digging tunnels to get out when the going gets rough."

"And you're certain it was not found by either the Diabolist or the Hierophant?" Tariq pressed.

"Like, at least half certain," she badly winked. "Seriously though, it used to lead into Hengest Lake. Had to take a swim in there to flee through, and no villain could possibly take a dip in there. Cat says there was some spare angel corpse lying around inside."

"The Hashmallim that was tricked into perdition by Dread Emperor Traitorous," the Pilgrim agreed. "It is well-known, in some circles. He was one of the only two Praesi rulers to successfully harm a Choir."

"No shit?" Archer said, sending him a serious glance. "Had no idea what kind of an angel bone it was, don't think the others did either. Anyways, Diabolist slapped a massive cliff in front of this entire part of the city when she landed it to make it easier to defend it so it was buried until Zeze stole it again. We're the only two people who know about the passage, as far as I know, which is pretty far 'cause I got good eyes."

"No shit," the Grey Pilgrim solemnly confirmed.

Though he was missing much of the context that would be needed to decipher the nuances of the information she had so easily volunteered, he was appreciative of the way she was dragging him up the cliff even as she spoke. Tariq was rather less spry than he used to be, and had never been much of a climber besides. He'd more than once fallen while climbing Sintra's balcony, though he'd never used the stepladder she'd once ordered set against the wall in what was very much open mockery. The Pilgrim glanced down the sheer cliff, not in the slightest enjoying the fresh reminder that was he was currently dangling down a rope above the height of storm clouds. If he fell down that, it would be more than pride and a planting of bluebells that would sting of it.

"So who was the other?" Archer asked, wedging her boot into a crevice and nimbly hoisting herself up.

"The other?" Tariq asked.

"Praesi ruler," the young woman clarified.

"Ah, that would be Triumphant if the old histories are to be believed," he answered.

His tone was a little hurried, as the rope had grown taut with her rising and he'd done his best to follow her path.

"Ah, Triumphant," Archer hummed. "Now there was a real horror. She's always fun to read about, isn't she?"

If one enjoyed pages depicting a procession of brutal massacres and subjugation, culminating in hubris so flagrant it moved not one but two empires on the other side of the Tyrian Sea to wage war on her. Which Tariq did not, for all that the learning of history was important. Praesi histories tended to be sickening, as a rule, a parade of savageries always trying to exceed the last. Dread Empress Triumphant had been the worst of that lot by a fair margin, and one did not need to read of her attempted annihilations in the Chain of Hunger and the Titanomachy to be disgusted. Even the atrocities she'd resorted to in the cowing of the powerful Alamans tribes that'd dwelled on the shores of Lake Artoise were worthy of revulsion, and they'd been but a pale shadow of what she'd inflicted on Callow.

"If you say so," the Pilgrim replied.

Indrani did not pay his answer any heed, for she was making vaguely pleased noises and wedging herself against outcroppings – only to move swiftly from side to side, rising up as far as the rope allowed and swinging a leg over what appeared to be the ground floor of a tunnel. She rolled back and helped up Tariq, putting those muscled arms to work hoisting up his wizened frame. They unhooked the rope, after that, and the Pilgrim wove the slightest sliver of Light into a globe.

“You don’t know the trick for seeing in the dark?” Archer asked him, looking surprised.

“The Light reveals many enchantments as well,” Tariq told her, “and subtleties that leaning on one’s Bestowal does not. Best we advance cautiously, yes?”

“I suppose,” she said. “Might be the Callowans put up some-“

She paused, or perhaps it might be more accurate to say she was interrupted. Her senses were sharp, but Tariq had more to rely on than what his frail mortal shell could provide: the Ophanim whispered into his ear, urgent but not disapproving. Above them, Liesse shook and a rampant clamour was distantly heard.

“Well,” Indrani said. “It looks like slow and careful just took a leap down that cliff.”

“So it did,” the Grey Pilgrim murmured.

“Look at the bright side, Peregrine,” Archer cheerfully said. “Nobody does distraction like Catherine.”

Caerulea

Vote! (for A Practical Guide to Evil)

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

(Discord:)

<https://discord.gg/3nbsUfZ>

I guess I am still doing this.

Andrew Mitchell

I’m glad you’re still doing it. 😊

Liliet

You are a blessing on this fandom

happyhavak

If it helps, this reminds me every time I see it and I never fail to cast my vote.

Naeddyr

Traitorous MVP. Thanks for the chapter!

Halinn

I like Traitorous even more now!

naturalnuke

"To be redeemed one must have at least one redeemable quality. Addendum: Yes, even if a choir is involved."

Think we just learned where this came from.

Stable

Most Villainous Praesi

Javvies

Lol. Tariq's wishing he wasn't involved in this right about now.

Ah, Indrani, never change.

Though, I admit, I'd probably be worried about Archer going hands free in climbing off I were in Tariq's place. On the other hand, she may drink more than anyone except the Wandering Bard, but Archer does know what she can and can't do.

I wonder how what Tariq learns from Archer will affect his views on Cat and company.

Dainpdf

Even Cat has been worried about her drinking... and she wasn't hanging from a rope way above cloud line.

Liliet

S A M E @ all of that ♥ ♥ ♥

Indrani is so proud of her very distracting friend!

Hierus

"Nobody does distraction like Catherine." hahhahahaha. Well said.

Someguy

Something is on fire isn't it?

Dainpdf

You just know goblinfire will somehow end up involved.

IDKWhoitis

Probably an old store of it that Goblins failed to ignite when Cat pulled that Goblinfire trick at the palace in Book 3.

Elena

Well, we never did confirm how goblinfire's magic-killing properties interact with Arcadia and we'd get to see how it effects hell as a bonus.

Dainpdf

Considering we heard it implied it was made of demon...

Mental Mouse

Not yet, AFAICT, I'm sure that will change eventually. 😊

Neon156

Well, that just happen

Someguy

"The Hashmallim that was tricked into perdition by Dread Emperor Traitorous," the Pilgrim agreed. "It is well-known, in some circles. He was one of the only two Praesi rulers to successfully harm a Choir."

Hail Dread Emperor Traitorous!

sengachi

Traitorous: once impersonated his Chancellor with a robe and a pair of melons

Also Traitorous: damned an angel

Gibborim

Perhaps that was even the same story!

KageLupus

Hashmallim are the Angels of Contrition, right? So that means that Traitorous was able to trick an Angel into thinking he was contrite and wanted to atone for his many, many sins. Then turned that around and screwed the Angel in the process.

A quick definition of perdition says it is " a state of eternal punishment and damnation into which a sinful and unpenitent person passes after death". So that now sounds very much like Traitorous managed to switch places with an Angel and have it get punished in his place.

Mental Mouse

Angel: "I'm sorry I set eyes on that asshole..."

NerfContessa

Wow.... We must hear more about how he did that.

I mean the angels here are. So far out moralitywise this should be even more impossible than it would be with "regular" Angels....

Traitorous remains immensely cool.

SITB

"Traitorous's Law: while redemption is the greatest victory one can achieve over a villain, to function it does require the villain to have at least a single redeemable quality.

Addendum: Yes, even if a Choir is involved."

– Extract from 'The Axiom Appendix', multiple contributors

Thief of Words

Best cobbler remains a maker of excellent shoes.

Big I

I thought Irritant was the cobbler

Stormblessed

I loved the part where Tariq reacted to the story of the Woe's way into Skade and how they lied so blatantly to get there. That was deeply satisfying, as was his general confusion about why Archer was so cavalier in giving out information when Cat was so clamored and tip lipped.

Basically, Cat says only what is useful and what she wants him to know, but Archer tells him everything but what is useful and what he would want to know.

Dainpdf

It was pretty reckless, as artifice goes. Really, that whole adventure succeeded in great part because the King of Winter wanted it to.

Liliet

To be fair, Cat counted on that in her calculations – they were brought to Skade when trying to return to Marchford, and that's as blatant and invitation as it gets. She was not technically lying!

Dainpdf

Except for the fraud/impersonation thing where she signed in the name of the King of Winter.

Liliet

Well, yeah.

But she was just actualizing what she knew was a real invitation!

Amoonymous

This is a great point. She only mentioned the plan and not the reasons behind it (e.g. they essentially WERE invited by the King as they could only move towards Skade, or that they only used that plan to buy time to figure out what they were going to do – not with the intent to destroy Winter).

Novice

I fucking love Traitorous, man. Of course he fucking tricked an angel. I should have known he had it in him ever since reading the excerpt about Traitorous passing off as his Chancellor with a wig and a pair of cantaloupes. If he could trick the viper's nest that is the imperial court, he could trick an angel.

erebus42

Personally, I prefer the story of him starting a secret cabal set on overthrowing him, him usurping the throne from himself, and then preceding to betray his co-conspirators. As for the angel? Of course he had it in him. And we all know why he did it right?
Because he could and because it wouldn't have seen it coming.

sutortyrannus

"My dear friends, I have a confession to make. Some creative reframing of the truth may have taken place during the planning of this coup."
– Dread Emperor Traitorous, addressing the Order of the Unholy Obsidian upon successfully usurping the throne from himself

Gotta love it.

antoninjohn

Cat really knows how to have great foreplay

Kissaten

>“The Hashmallim that was tricked into perdition by Dread Emperor Traitorous,” the Pilgrim agreed. “It is well-known, in some circles. He was one of the only two Praesi rulers to successfully harm a Choir.”

Bullying doesn't count as harming, eh

Ben Serreau-Raskin

Cat's not Praesi, wouldn't count either way.

Dainpdf

Didn't put any corpses in lakes, at least.

Also, not a Praesi ruler.

Alivaril

“The Hashmallim that was tricked into perdition by Dread Emperor Traitorous,” the Pilgrim agreed. “It is well-known, in some circles. He was one of the only two Praesi rulers to successfully harm a Choir.”

More proof that Traitorous is the best emperor known to Praes. Villains are immortal unless killed; how do we know that he hasn't been every other Emperor/Empress since then? Even the Malacia interludes could just be an Aspect intended to trick even himself. [/s]

ATRDCI

Triumphant: I can force an Angel through sheer power!

Cat: I can force a Choir through Story!

Traitorous: Hold my thrice poisoned wine...

Liliet

y e s

(also, he didn't need an antidote: the three poisons interacted to cancel each other. the poisoners, who did not know about each other, were all very surprised)

Javvies

He's Named. He has to have known the trick for ignoring poisons.

But it didn't stop him from being responsible for hiring one of the poisoners, tricking a cabal into hiring the second, and living another life as the third one.

Liliet

Oh yeah, forgot about that part ♥

Fuodiachloris

Thrice? Oh, a slow day, then... 😊

JJR

Don't hold his wine, at least one of those poisons is contact poison smeared on the outside of the cup.

erebus42

First off, go fuck yourself Saint! Yeah! Ivah for the win! Second, Archer and Pilgrim are certainly a fun match.

sengachi

Ivah is really earning that Lordship, huh?

Isaac Martinez

I don't know. Reading that the honorable Peregrim Fleet-Foot saying solemnly "No Shit" is kinda...

Dainpdf

It does seem out of place.

erebus42

I took it as him sarcastically echoing what she had previously said.

Dainpdf

Sure, but having him engage in banter with Archer like this still seems out of place.

Maybe he's reading her and tailoring his approach?

Liliet

I think he's...

...drumshot...

...somewhat off balance 😊

Dainpdf

I am going to count this joke as an act of Evil.

carrier

Not with the right intonation.
I imagined a resigned voice.

Liliet

^^^

It is possible in a very specific way, he just, you know... sounds like Gandalf driven insane by ~~hobbits~~ kender

Liliet

Indrani got to him ♥ ♥ ♥ so fucking beautiful

Euodiachloris

The cliff collaborated quite a bit, mind. 😊

Soma

Ah interludes. Perhaps we're nearing the end of this arc? It's always nice to see what the Woe has wrought through the eyes of others.

Dainpdf

Perhaps not quite like her, but I believe both Robber and Kairos to be quite good at distractions.

And nice to see Saint and Cat pseudo bonding. Also? Yoink! Poor
Vivi, got substituted by Ivah.

Oshi

It's better at it anyway.

Sylwoos

Cat's opinion of a diversion is putting your house in fire, ambush you as you're trying to flee, then punch you repeatedly in the face. All that for somebody to sneak in the back entrance and steal your cupcake before the fire get to them.

Kissaten

Cat is a Thief in a sense, too. Vivi's shtick was stealing stuff so large one couldn't believe it being stolen, like, fleets of ships, suns and months worth of supplies, as well as entire treasuries. Cat's is to take others' aspects and roles. Ivah is not so much stealing as tying loose ends, it doesn't achieve ridiculous feats, just loots what was lying around on the floor unclaimed.

Dainpdf

Cat's thing is Taking, not Stealing. Important distinction.

And this just was a yoink moment. Casually appearing from stealth to steal a thing and in the process ruin someone's plan.

Hierus

““No shit,” the Grey Pilgrim solemnly confirmed.” I don't think that really fits how the grey pilgrim speaks, as hilarious as it is

It's an echo of Archer's earlier statement.

C_B

Yeah, I can just hear him carefully enunciating it in “uncomfortable dad trying really hard to use teen slang correctly” voice.

Andrew Mitchell

Liliet

y e s

Iconochasm

Dab on the Dead King.

JJR

Yeet him back to hell.

Mental Mouse

“Yeet”... my niece only told me about that word a couple of weeks ago, I'm pretty sure this is the first time I've seen it in the wild.

TeK

“until the Horned Lord leapt over the cliff’s edge of that was the end of the ducal palace”

That’d be the last we’ll see of him.

Someguy

No bet. He returns with his own Band of 5. Dead Dude does not strike me as the type to not collect the whole set.

ATRDCI

Nah, Laurence specifically said that there’s been very little activity from Skein compared to the other Horned Lords, and connects this with Cats reveal that it’s a Revenant for the Dead King.

Miles

He already has a band of 5. There’s a whole song about it. Most of them are dead though.

Artisan Noodle

Yeah, nobody could survive that fall.

P

So did Tancred Papenheim then sent back a single torch, with on the side engraved three words: ‘if you can’.

And here is the difference that I’ve seen between the Lycaonese and the Callowans laid bare. The good people of Callow would have sent two words; an imperative verb relating to copulation and some form of a second person pronoun.

They don’t seem to care about being witty, or pretty, or brave. Callow only seems to care about seeing their enemies defeated. It doesn’t matter if the have to salt their own lands, eat boot leather for a year, and then slash their own throats; so long as the other guy loses as well they don’t care. Even William was a perfect example of them, he was so suicidal that despite the skills his Name implied, the Choir of Contrition still had to give him an ability to resurrect himself.

Hell, even Edward Fairfax, given the chance to repay the indignity of being a slave beyond death was willing to accept what a woman who had had ties to Winter described as “unkind” solely to spit in his former master’s face. I honestly doubt that he even cared if it would actually accomplish anything, the chance to potentially knife his enemy in the toe is too much for their brand of insanity to ignore. And neither Laurence or Tariq understand. But that's to be expected, they're not Callowan.

P

That was meant to be a top level comment... 😞

Stable

It was a top comment in our hearts.

Euodiachloris

Not just Edward; every last citizen of Liesse gets a "kick arse, take Names, make the bastards who would use you without asking effing well pay" invite.

I think most only didn't rise in under three seconds because they had to slip their happy-dance pumps off and reach for the hotmail boots. Those who did rise immediately already were tooled-up and ready to rumble. Probably because they had died in the middle of a brawl?

Euodiachloris

Really, spellchecker? "Hobnail" escapes you? <_<

minichirops

I feel like the author deserves props for me ignoring the inherent insanity until now.

Caleb Corkum

They never die when they leap off of a cliff. Also, if the death isn't explicitly shown or confirmed, they're probably not dead.

Andrew Mitchell

Yep.

IDKWhoitis

Although probably boring in comparison, I do wonder what the armies in Creation are up to. Like is Juniper planning a rapid retreat if need be? Or is she negotiating with the Lev commander?

Is Viv talking with the Drow?

werafdsaew

It's less than a day; they're probably still sorting out their wounded.

Liliet

Less than an hour if Cat's comment is to be taken literally.

sengachi

The poetry of Cat bypassing the certain trap that was using the dead spirits of Liesse by passing the buck off to the dead Fairfax King of Callow, whose claim to those spirits supercedes even that of the Dead King's, is just beautiful. Especially considering she nabbed him from the Dead King.

Also, dang, she really gave the King the best way to go out he could possibly hope for, didn't she? Leading dead Callowans in death against the Dead King, when in life Callowan dead under the Dead King's control were probably what killed him.

Liliet

Yeah ♥ ♥ ♥

onedollargum

The Pilgrim getting told to look on the bright side. XD

superkeaton

The Woe are a bad influence on poor little Tariq. First they gave him hope, now he's swearing. By the end of this, he'll trade angels and miracles for crows and backsass. Also, I appreciate that the more he learns of Catherine's "negotiations" and "plans", the more frustrated he gets.

Liliet

SHE JUST DOES THAT TO PEOPLE ♥ ♥ ♥

Mental Mouse

Remember the last time we heard Pilgrim swear: When Catherine surrendered!

Seems so long ago.... 😊

Caleb Corkum

Cold Cyberia

Hashmallim: Repent! Repent! Repent!

Traitorous: My good friends, I deeply and sincerely regret my previous actions. Let me repent by bringing a new age of justice and enlightenment to the Dread Empire. crosses fingers behind his back

Andrew Mitchell

Draconic

I think that was a lie. It was just a new age of contrition, not justice and enlightenment. After all, a new age of justice and enlightenment should include dead angels of justice and enlightenment buried under Praesi cities.

Mental Mouse

The Choir of Enlightenment would probably produce some really annoying heroes. 😊

Shoddi

A Shining Prince, perhaps?

NerfGlastigUaine

Traitorous is awesome, but I'm still cheering on my man Kairos, the second-gen Traitorous. I believe that one day, he will out-traitor Traitorous. In fact, one of his schemes will be to resurrect Traitorous just to betray him, only to reveal it was a distraction for his real plan to kill the Gods by baking the world's largest cake, only to reveal he is in fact a disguised Traitorous sans cantaloupes but with red contact lens instead – you know, for the vampire vibe – only to reveal that Traitorous was/is actually a time-travelling Kairos all along! Kaitarous wins once again!

sutortyrannus

It's only Wednesday man, I can't brain hard enough to sort through this properly.

Andrew Mitchell

I'd love to this as a fully formed PGtE fanfiction. 😊

ATRDCI

My dear friend, how could you think so little of Kairos, our most steadfast ally, that you presume his plan to be so paltry as to not include breaking Dread Emperor Sorcerous from his prison in the moon?

sutortyrannus

"It is written that the Hidden Horror sent envoy to the Iron King Tancred, threatening that should he not strike the banners over Hannover and open the gates the city would be stormed and burned to ash. So did Tancred Papenheim then send back a single torch, with on the side engraved three words: 'if you can'."

– Extract from 'Crowned In Iron', a compendium of Lycaonese histories assembled by Prince Alexandre of Lyonis

"If". Great reference, one of my favourite stories from Ancient Greek history – right up there with "Molon Labe".

Great chapter, love these Interludes.

Liliet

Ancient Greek history? 🙄

sutortyrannus

Quote's a parallel to the story about how Phillip II of Macedon (Alexander the Great's father) threatened the Spartans with invasion with something along the lines of "You are advised to submit without further delay, for if I bring my army into your land, I will destroy your farms, slay your people, and raze your city."

The Spartan response was "If".

Clint

Right up there with: "Nuts."

Liliet

Omg.

Thank you ;u;

Eva

Such a great chapter ❤️

NZPIEFACE

>No shit

That's like the only time he's sworn.

Liliet

He's not swearing, he's echoing Indrani's own question ♥

Mental Mouse

There was at least one other recently, and more fervent: In response to Cat's surrender. I noted at the time that her machinations were literally enough to make a saint swear.

Mental Mouse

King Edward: "ARISE MY PEOPLE!"

Callowan shades: "ROWR!"

Neshamah (probably): "WTF?!?! Oh, shit..."

Kairos: "YEE-HAW!"

Skein the giant undead ratling: "AAHHH, they're crawling all over me they're eating me get them off get them off me AAHHHH"...
<jumps off cliff>

Rogue Sorcerer (probably): "Anybody seen my casting rod?"

Laurence: "Hmm, I better get Black's soul while everyone's distracted" ... "Dammit, Cat!"

Cat: "A big mistake's never really over, is it?"

Laurence: "Nope." <Looks up> "or on second thought..."

Pilgrim: "What fresh hell is this?"

Archer: "That's my Cat!"

Gunslinger

Very accurate chapter summary

Argentorum

Underrated post.

Draconic

Some typos I found, though a few of them might be as intended:

not proved to be a least a modicum -> at least

She'd been too later -> too late with a priestess or ruin -> priestess of ruin?

there was no living -> no one living?

predecessors when Tariq -> predecessors, when Tariq with a way bow in hand that might as well be sorcery -> with a way with the bow (Maybe? I think this sentence needs some more checking) that no all such constrained -> not all such young woman would not -> young woman, who would not ruse fit to ender -> endear?

reminder that was he was -> that he was more to rely on that what his -> than what his Thanks as always!

Morgenstern

until the Horned Lord leapt over the cliff's edge of that was the end of the ducal palace -> edge of WHAT was
-> OR: edge that was [no "of"]

Caerulea

ruse fit to ender → ruse fit to enter

Mental Mouse

Also, Ivah's reappearance reminds us that Cat still has access to Creation through the Night. Probably doesn't even need a true gate, since one bird's with Cat, while the other is with Akua. Looks like Cat's banking her first winnings: Black still needs to actually be restored; if Akua can do that, it might be done before the band gets back!

Andrew Mitchell

I like the way you're thinking here. It would be nice to get Amadeus back (together) soon.

Insanenoodlyguy

Leads to a dramatic reveal at the right moment. We don't see or hear from him again till the peace conference. "What of Praes?" Asks Cordelia or some such, and in walks The Claimant.

shveiran

Mhm, it seems I may have to retract my previous commending of Laurence's steps. It seems she is still quite certain that any deal with Cat is temporary and she needs to be put down hard as soon as humanly possible.

It suggests her bantering is either an attempt at lulling her into a false sense of security (which is more intrigue than I would expect, but admittedly not that complex a facade that I can't see her put up) or she giving in to the shape of the "Band of Five" (article 7 of the Band of Five Trope Contract: Hilarious bantering will be partook in by all members no matter how grim the situation) without renouncing her determination to slay her at the first available opportunity.

I was rather unconvinced by the "Indrani's love moving Saint to allow a bridge being built" theory, but I'll admit the Small Sights chapter had me doubt my position. Still, it seems this proves we are still headed to a clash before, if ever, that conflict can be put to rest.

ATRDCl

Laurence must first be given temptation, shown how Not So Different her and Cat really are (more so early Cat than current Cat but still)

Given that this is Laurence, the more convincing the temptation the harder she will reject it because its very existence is just proof that Cat is the Enemy they must be killed never made truce with.

shveiran

Yeah, that was pretty much my argument when some suggested she may come around eventually: Saint has (because she lived the life she had and yadda yadda yadda not currently relevant) adopted the stance that "The enemy cannot be reasoned with, and any and all evidences of the contrary are a clever ruse we must not fall for else we pay dearly in ways yet unseen".

That stance cannot be countered or changed once it is fully adopted; any argument, proof, doubt or counterpoint will be received as just another trick and therefore not merely discarded but simply ignored as irrelevant.

I'm not saying she will, necessarily, never come around; but I am certain she won't SPONTANEOUSLY change her mind based on what she witnesses or is told. Nothing of the sort could persuade her, because any such evidence can be faked.

Liliet

I would say Laurence's logic is more like...

'the odds of Cat being a horrible evil villain are 1:100000'
-shown piece of evidence that makes Cat 10x less likely to be a horrible evil villain-

'ok the odds of Cat being a horrible evil villain are 1:10000'

-shown piece of evidence that makes Cat 2x less likely to be a horrible evil villain-

'ok the odds of Cat being a horrible evil villain are 1:5000'

-show piece of evidence that makes Cat 100x less likely to be a horrible evil villain-

'ok the odds of Cat being a horrible evil villain are 1:50'

proper Bayesian updating, just really, really faraway priors er, replace that with 'odds of Cat NOT being a horrible evil villain' or switch the two numbers around. whoops @ notation

Liliet

Andrew Mitchell

I love the idea of Laurence being such a Bayesian but I just don't see it revealed by her POVs.

Liliet

I mean I don't think she thinks in literally those terms
lmao

I just think she does, y'know, think.

And Cat hasn't exactly been providing evidence exclusively against her being an evil villain, trope-wise =x

Insanenoodlyguy

There's also the corruption factor, which both her and Tariq have commented on. Namely, the whole "Cat of Tomorrow" problem. Cat, and several villains before her, can and have started with truly noble intentions that make them at least an Anti-Villain. The problem is, the things they do corrupt things. Cat was going to become more and more the Queen of Winter, hungry cold and hollow. Even if she was decent today, that thing she became in a fight would eventually be what she woke up in the morning as (Cat herself would agree with this assessment). You didn't HAVE to kill her because of who she was, but rather because of what she was going to be. Now, she's avoided that story, sure. But look at it from the outside. Yeah, she's not going to become Winter's Queen anymore. Instead she's the high priestess of two gods who each have a talon in her soul who become gods from lies, betray, self-consummation and murder. The thing they are looking at is detestably scarier than Winter, and it's sitting on her damn shoulder and laughing in a weird caw noise much too often for your taste. This is kicking the can down the road and ending up with an even bigger can. Tariq still sees hope, but as stated, Lawrence sees "If I cut the hand off now, the rot won't take the whole arm." it's not that she's denying that the hand isn't completely rotted through, it's that inevitably (as far as she's concerned) it's going to be.

Liliet

Mhm.

Remember when after book 4 ended there was a whole panic movement in the comment section about how Cat's going to be a slave to evil goddesses now?

What makes us the audience be okay with what's happening currently is our knowledge of:

- Komena and Andronike's backstory and genuinely good intentions;
- Komena and Andronike's current priorities;
- Catherine's point that she made to them successfully about how Below's approach fucking sucks;
- the details of her agreement with them about how SHE tells THEM what to do and not the other way around;
- the ongoing reiterating conversation that yes, it's Catherine who gets the last word when they're being EEEEVIL and she knows better.

Absolutely NONE of this Saint has so much as a HINT OF A CLUE about.

shveiran

Also, that would be a fully unsatisfying ending and we have come to fully trust EE to deliver awesome stories.

Let's not kid ourselves here, that's the main reason. We know it is going to be ok.

Whereas "ok" may or may not mean "awesome tragedy", but still, enslaved by Komena and Andronike is really, really not in the cards.

Liliet

THAT TOO LMAO

Which just serves to highlight how Tariq and Laurence cannot possibly know what we do :3

Rook

I think you hit the nail on the head right there.

We know for a fact that Catherine isn't like the other Villains – by omniscient reader-view into her every thought since she first became the Squire.

The Saint just has to judge by what she sees, and even though she's wrong about Catherine now, she's literally never been wrong before about every other Villain she ever had contact with.

If that paranoia drives her to strike at Catherine here even when it isn't warranted, it'd be a tragedy for both of them.

I'm hoping Catherine finds a way to convince her even a little. If a jaded shell of a person like the Saint can be convinced, it'd be definitive proof that anyone can be. That it's within Catherine's power to bridge that gap, no matter how wide.

werafdsaew

> she's literally never been wrong before about every other Villain she ever had contact with.

How do you even know that for sure? She might have executed people who didn't need executing and no one would know.

Rook

Her role is a cleanup crew for horror shows, rather than the prevention of them. She always arrives AFTER everything has already gone to shit.

Considering this was stated in her own inner monologue (in this very chapter) as well as being outright confirmed Tariq who literally has psychic, semi-omniscient, mind-reading angels on his shoulder, I think it's safe to say that it's about as close to an absolute assurance as you could have about any character in the entire series.

The Saint doesn't have to guess. There is no ambiguity. Whether she likes it or not, her entire Role is killing the Akuas of the world after they've committed their second liesses.

It's likely that's actually why she hasn't, or perhaps even can't (with any degree of success), taken a swing at Catherine during this latest trip. Cat is a Villain that Laurence absolutely despises, but she hasn't actually done anything even remotely approaching 'Evil' since the band of five was formed. The headsman that beheads irreconcilable monsters doesn't have any narrative weight behind her swing, when her target isn't being a monster.

Liliet

Y e p.

It's interesting, by the way, how her and Tariq's POVs on her Role differ. He just says 'oh yeah Heavens send her places as a post-disaster cleanup crew'.

She places responsibility for arriving late on herself.

One of them is religious and it's not Laurence 😊

shveiran

Uhm... no. What we know is that both she and Tariq believe it.

That's it.

Considering Saint is not a balanced observer and Tariq's insights comes from an angel, there is no particular reason to believe their version is nothing BUT their version.

Let's not forget Above assumes anyone on the other side is a wound upon creation, Cat included. Intentions don't matter, ACTIONS don't matter (e. g. William), long-term consequences don't matter. All there is, is the flag.

Rook

The level of reaching here to try framing the Heroes to be in the wrong for everything is becoming so ridiculous it approaches outright stupidity

Typical Villains being a blight on Creation isn't some uniquely Above-centric rhetoric. Black himself has explicitly acknowledged this, and he's a near-emotionless killing machine with absolutely zero moral compass and more personal disdain for Above than the Saint has for Catherine. Unless you want to try claiming that Amadeus of the Green Stretch is a Heroic partisan of Above, then it's pretty much a fact acknowledged by everyone with a modicum of sense on both sides that typical Villainy is a wound on creation.

Speaking to Malicia:

"Alaya, we consistently blunder so badly we need to rely on demons to stay off destruction. We would rather irreparably damage the fabric of Creation than admit we can be wrong. There is nothing holy about our culture, it needs to be ripped out root and stem as matter of bare survival. Forty years I have been trying to prove success can be achieved without utter raving madness ..."

Speaking to Akua:

"You," Black said, "are the incarnation of waste. Of every destructive instinct that must be carved out or repurposed lest we ever reach old ends through old means. Your accolades are as worthless as every single thing you've ever said and done. They will pass, and be forgotten. We will all be better for it."

The most monstrous Villain of his generation waged a decades long war on old-school Villainy because it was so wasteful and destructive that he felt it threatened their own survival.

Not only that, we have the Saint here empathizing with Catherine – someone she’s actively attempting to kill – about second llesse with explicit examples about the kind of situations she normally deals with. In this very chapter.

“... it came from the same place that had the Saint of Swords wondering what might have changed, if she’d arrived a sennight early instead of late. If she might have slain the beast when it’d taken a handful instead of a village, if she’d found Isodorios when the dragonblood first began to decay instead of after the red had taken him. What if, that old and tireless flagellant’s whip.”

Skepticism in itself isn’t wrong but this is getting ridiculous. Everything shown in the text directly contradicts the idea that the Saint and Pilgrim are generally mistaken about the character of people they fight against. A few chapters ago in Entreaty, even Catherine herself directly accepted what the Pilgrim was saying about the Saint’s life and role as most likely true. Let that sink in for a second there.

Sorry to break it to you but your stance is the crackpot fan theory here, not mine.

shveiran

Dude, you need to chill.

My disagreeing with your conclusion does not mean I disagree with you on everything you’ve ever said, written or thought.

I am not “framing the Heroes for everything”, I am saying Above thinks in terms of white and black and people don’t act that way. Their moral framework leaves no room for finesse and that is why GENERALLY RIGHT does not mean – cannot mean – ALWAYS RIGHT.

I am not claiming Above is always at fault; I’m simply refusing your statement that “the Saint’s approach has never been wrong in the past”, because I see no evidence for it save a two people’s opinions backed by an otherworldly being that physically cannot bend enough to take into account human nuances.

Arguing against your conclusion is not quite the same as believing its polar opposite.

Rook

I got too riled up, yes.

On the subject of the debate though, my point there still stands. The skepticism you're putting forth is so far gone as to be beyond all reason.

Ask yourself. If your argument is that it's not believable because it is simply 'two characters opinions ...', despite the fact that it's both the protagonist and one of the primary antagonists, what would it take to prove it to you? How many other things that are normally taken at face value would be thrown out the window by following the same strict criteria?

Would you need ten characters? Several flashback chapters detailing the story, dedicated to setting it in stone? An explicit author's note?

Considering that this is a novel, not a fantasy history textbook or a dictionary, you must to an extent take the writing to an extent at face value. Character background simply cannot be developed with the level of assurance you're looking for, without damaging the quality of the writing.

When Catherine thinks 'some feat is beyond what I can do right now', you don't be a skeptic to the point of ridiculousness and respond 'well that's what she thinks, it's the opinion of just one character. She's young and not an optimistic thinker. Has she ever tested it? No? Let's assume she actually can and that she's just mistaken until irrefutably proven otherwise'. Because at that point the skepticism has reached such stupid levels that it becomes near-impossible to discuss anything at all.

werafdsaew

You're making a leap here. Saint's Role being X doesn't mean she can NEVER step out of her role from time to time. For example, Pilgrim's role being saving people doesn't mean he cannot punish the errant Prince of Orense in "Peregrine IV", even though that action didn't save anyone.

Rook

It's outright stated by the Pilgrim, and even Catherine believed him. Catherine, who has more reason to be skeptical than anyone considering they've spent nearly three volumes actively attempting to kill her.

A bit of a small leap when it's a direct quote from six chapters ago. Certainly a far smaller a leap than supposing the opposite. The ball is in your court.

Chapter 40 of this book -Entreaty:

Quote 1, the Pilgrim confirms:

"... Yet mine was still the lighter of the burdens, for even Laurence's victories have only ever come in the wake of disaster."

My brows furrowed. If I was following his meaning correctly, he was implying that while his role had been snuffing out disasters before they could fully form while the Saint of Swords had been... well, cutting of limbs when the rot took."

Emphasis, "even Laurence's victories have ONLY ever come in the wake of disaster"

Quote 2&3, Catherine's reaction/evaluation:

"And I could see, through the grief in his voice, that there truly was a tragedy there. Because he might be a decent actor, I thought, and perhaps a liar of some skill if there was cause for it, but he had not taken to it the way some of the people I knew had. The tremor in his voice was genuine, coming from someone who'd never learned to fake it so perfectly they'd blurred even to themselves the difference between truth and lies. "

shveiran

All this is valid only under the assumption that Pilgrim, angels and Saint cannot be wrong on the subject. I refer you to my comment above, since the discussion is branching.

Miles

It's not her fault, it's Traitorous's. Because they won't try to redeem irredeemable villains any more if it risks their own.

Mental Mouse

> she's literally never been wrong before about every other Villain she ever had contact with.

> Her role is a cleanup crew for horror shows, rather than the prevention of them. She always arrives AFTER everything has already gone to shit.

It occurs to me that this would represent one helluva selection bias for her experiences!

Liliet

Y E P

And funny story here... something I noticed... note the difference in view of it between her and Tariq.

Tariq:

> "Laurence de Montfort was sent forth, for near as many years as I, when there was absolutely nothing left to save," he gravely said.

Laurence:

> It came from the same place that had the Saint of Swords wondering what might have changed, if she'd arrived a sennight early instead of late. If she might have slain the beast when it'd taken a handful instead of a village, if she'd found Isodorios when the dragonblood first began to decay instead of after the red had taken him. What if, that old and tireless flagellant's whip.

Tariq's view is that it was Above/Heavens/Providence/ whatever sending her forth. That it was an external force being cruel to her, that she actually did not have the option of arriving on time.

Laurence assumes personal responsibility for all the shit timing.

I actually... probably agree with Tariq here? If the same thing keeps happening, in this 'verse it's very likely to be the work of a story / a pattern / something you cannot easily change.

But that's not Laurence's view. She's... she's not religious. She does not put trust in a higher power to guide her, she just does things, and all the personal responsibility she assumes herself.

There are... so many levels on which this matters, but one I would like to highlight here is that this means she does not think there is a selection bias. She thinks the world just works the way it's been working for her for sixty years. That the things that happened to her every time are indeed inevitable.

I mean, it's obviously not an absolute view, on some level she has to have noticed that other things happen to other people. She trusts Tariq for a reason.

But...

She does not correct for selection bias as fully as it applies.

Mental Mouse

> She does not correct for selection bias as fully as it applies.

Indeed. But that's the thing about selection bias, in science, literature, or even life in general: The specific hazard of selection bias is exactly that it restricts your view, leading you to false generalizations and blinding you to potential contradiction. That's why it's so hard to avoid or to correct for. And Laurence has got it bad...

Liliet

Mhm =x

I'm not exactly blaming her for this =x

Liliet

I think Laurence is struggling with an internal conflict of 'but evil' 'but catherine foundling' 'but evil' 'but catherine foundling' 'but evil'.

She's engaging in banter despite herself :3

shveiran

I'm honestly curious, where do you see evidence of this? Is it just the banter?

I'm really not getting that read, but I admit I really think she isn't conflicted and that may lead to me ignoring contrary evidence.

Liliet

The banter is part of it. Do note that she was surprised and changed her approach instantly when she realized what Catherine's problem actually was. I think Laurence is conflicted because there's an obvious conflict right there, and I don't think she's a complete idiot, you know? Her narration sounds like she's absolutely certain of everything, but note that she's still going along with Tariq's plan and note how she dropped "if the Black Queen is indeed going to cling to her last scraps of decency". Laurence is not the kind to enunciate her problems out loud, not even in her internal monologue. She prefers to bury them and wait for them to burn themselves out one way or another.

The thing with deep 3rd person POV in Guide is, it still doesn't capture 100% of a person's thinking process. Deliberately, at that – we wouldn't have been able to get snippets like Bard's POV if they were perfectly spoilery. There's always undercurrents that don't come to the surface explicitly.

And Laurence is, like, a paragon of certainty. Unshakable confidence/faith is like her main power, of course she's not voicing doubts she's having in her position. In this case, absence of evidence is really not evidence of absence, any more than us not knowing Cat's plan for dealing with Larat beyond 'have a band of 5' means she doesn't have one.

And we do have evidence of what she's thinking, which does add up to an internal conflict, because she's getting external evidence for two conflicting conclusions. And she's not discounting it, we know she isn't... ah, to be fair, I'm writing this after the next chapter drop, with fresh new evidence available.

On a basic level my prediction making algorithm is basically "if I were the writer / if I were to take over at this point / if I were writing a fic, what would I do with this". Erratic is a million times better writer than me, but a lot of things he does are predictable just because they're the best possible move, like how Cat commented about Juniper early on.

This story is most interesting and Laurence's throwaway lines have the most narrative value if that's what's going on. So that's what I'm assuming, and hey, haven't been proven wrong yet :3

(There's something to be said for pure internal consistency: a model that might not have a clear and undeniable chunk of evidence confirming it, but that just explains everything in a tidy way)

shveiran

I'll read the next chapter and continue the discussion there, then. Right now, I can see what you are coming from but... I don't think you are right. But maybe next chapter will change my mind; I'll try to be open to these concepts.

Liliet

^^

Mental Mouse

Agreeing on all counts, even before seeing the next chapter. I will note:

> Erratic is a million times better writer than me, but a lot of things he does are predictable just because they're the best possible move, like how Cat commented about Juniper early on.

For an author, "best possible move" is very subjective... in this forum, we have a group of fans, selected by the point that all of us have read this far and liked it, and many of us have been discussing the narrative for months.. That naturally gives us a fair bit of rapport, not just with each other, but with the author. That's why we can sometimes predict his "best possible move" for the Guideverse.

Erratic's authorial skill shows in being able to create a world with enough depth and consistency to support author/reader rapport, and then to keep that rapport over this many chapters and months. Compare to the current fuss over the ending of the TV version of Game of Thrones – I haven't followed the show myself, but reports of the finale are that they broke the characters, world-rules, and even continuity, so badly that viewers were just going WTF, and not in the good way.

Javvies

To be fair, from what I understand of the Game of Thrones finale (and season 8 in general), it was in large part a continuation of the degradation of Story quality, consistency, and logic, that occurred more or less whenever they went off-book, and they'd had two full seasons of continuously going off book immediately prior to season 8, making for three nominally full seasons of going off book, and that has a cumulative effect. Well, depending on storyline, some storylines went off book earlier than others.

Plus they started rushing, and whenever you try to rush a story to its conclusion, bad things happen, which made everything worse.

Granted, I'm not sure where they pulled the decision on the succession out of, nor do I think I really want to know.

That is, the problems people are pointing out and complaining about in/with the finale (and season 8 in general) didn't actually start in season 8 – they started much earlier.

Admittedly, GoT kept raising the bar in terms of strict cinematography and visual spectacle ... but that's all there was.

And the visual spectacle did keep the volume of complaints down, to a point ... in earlier seasons. But visual spectacle alone does not a quality story make.

Admittedly, I haven't actually seen all of GoT season 8 yet, and at this point, I'm not sure I want to, even though I did see the previous seasons.

Liliet

I know very little about the TV version of GoT but even I heard echoes of THAT drama.

You're not wrong in that familiarity with the way specifically erratic handles storytelling is a lot of it; still there ARE objective criteria. Like, yes, internal consistency of characterization, worldbuilding and continuity, as a great example. Erratic knows what he's doing, and in my experience a lot can be deduced the way Cat figured out Kairos's plots: I see what he's doing, I'm assuming the results are what he intended to do, so what do the results actually do?

It's fun to be in a fandom of a really good writer :3

Mental Mouse

> It's fun to be in a fandom of a really good writer :3

Oh yeah.

werafdsaew

I think there may be a pivot–Saint's pivot on whether she turns on Cat or not at the end.

Mental Mouse

> Still, it seems this proves we are still headed to a clash

Actually, Cat might just run out the clock on Saint. Once Pilgrim and Indrani get Masego straightened out, Saint doesn't have an excuse to attack him. Then Cat Chooses The Crown and calls Larat. Saint might get to help with killing god!Larat (Cat expects a simple execution, but she might get a nasty surprise). A reprise by DK could still make trouble, but eventually Everybody Goes Home Afterwards, and Saint has to Wait 'Till Next Time.

shveiran

But DOES she, though?

Tariq is on board with the whole "let's move the armies north and make war together", but will she stay her hand?

Mental Mouse

And from the future... heh heh heh (yeah, on my prior self).

Insanenoodlyguy

Hmm, she talks of an ending and facing it... I think Saint is getting ready to die.

If I had to guess, she's pulling the heroic equivalent of what Warlock did, namely, if you go into something completely willing and KNOWING you are going to die, though you will surely do so barring outside intervention (and it only works if that intervention is completely unexpected on your end), you will succeed in whatever goal you have.

Cat has made clear what's going to happen if she goes for Black or Masego, perhaps she's thinking her story ends with removing two or even three of the biggest threats at the cost of herself, doing the first and then succeeding in the latter at the cost of mortal wounds. Probably planning her final words before she dies, no doubt witnessed by Tariq and maybe one or two of the other heroes.

Of course, she's not paying attention to what the signs are telling her. It just happened that all the wraiths blocked her way long enough for the soul to be ferreted away. That's some hard story intervention right there. She lost them Black, whatever else happens, he's not hers to take anymore.

Mental Mouse

> Hmm, she talks of an ending and facing it... I think Saint is getting ready to die.

It would be ironic but logical if Saint tries for Masego and he flat no-sells her. If he was ever in a position to pull a snap on her, this is it. Or he could just dump her in a random Hell.

Irrelevant

So I was rereading the story, and Cat just met with the hidden horror for the first time. In that conversation he tells her the the good old tyrant wove a trap for the angels, something we have yet to see pay off.

Now that he is as far as he is, perhaps it's time for that to pay off?

Mental Mouse

That was furthered at the "conclave" where the band was formed. One of Kairos' terms for joining in, was that afterwards, Hanno would stand trial before Hierarch.

Frolamiz

"Catherine Foundling had yet to strike a single blow with a blade since she'd returned to Iserre from her journeys, the rumours went."

Yes, and this will give the first strike even more narrative weight.

Daniel E

"Her idea of a ruse meant to unseat the King of Winter was a lie so blatant, even the Fae hesitated to call BS". I actually laughed out loud at this. Spilled my tea a little 😅

Liliet

The best part is how it was valid logic on both Catherine's and the fae's part. Catherine: "if he didn't want me to fake his signature on an invitation he wouldn't have invited me". Fae: "if she's faking the signature of the King of Winter and he doesn't want her to she's not just dead she's super mega dead and she would know it, so he probably did invite her". And he did!

Mental Mouse

To which Cat's proper response is "look, it worked. Have you ever dealt with fae?".

KingWillisIV

I love the comparison of Robber saying "Nobody does crazy like the boss" and now Idrani saying "Nobody does distraction like Catherine". They're distinctly different and yet with so much overlap.

Liliet

Yes ;u;

Mental Mouse

On occasion of Skein's unceremonious exit, I would like to mention a quibble I have with it's excessive size.:

It's repeatedly been described specifically as being 60 feet tall. Even allowing "tall" to blur into "long" – that's the height of a multistory building! AFAICT the only land animals that big in our world were the biggest of the dinosaurs, the giant sauropods. Something like that doesn't go into a building, so much as through it. And even allowing for magical strength, I'd say having it scampering around would involve a fair bit of damage to the environment.

E.g.:

> until the Horned Lord leapt over the cliff's edge of that was the end of the ducal palace.

→

"The courtyard's paving buckled beneath the Horned Lord's leap, and again when it landed near the cliff's edge that was the end of the ducal palace. Another leap took the bulk over the edge, along with a fair bit of the edge. A thunderous concussion marked its descent to the wasteland's surface; a few moments later, a horned head rose into view as the revenant peered back warily at the proceedings."

Mental Mouse

(And yes, something that big needs three sentences to get out of the room. 😊)

Liliet

I think the cliff is just THAT TALL.

Liliet

(I mean Tariq did mention they were higher than some clouds)

Mental Mouse

> I think the cliff is just THAT TALL.

> I mean Tariq did mention they were higher than some clouds

Tariq was being hauled up a cliff in another location, while the rest were in a courtyard (so, the city's original ground level). Also, I wouldn't count on this shard having a "normal" atmosphere.

But yes, I was handwaving some details for illustrative purposes. 😊 In that case, my point was that 60 feet (most of 20 meters) is the size of a 4-to-6 story building, or a fairly intimidating cliff.

Liliet

Yeah ♥

Interlude: Renunciation

"We fight not only our own wars but those of our forebears and our children, for we inherit the wounds of those before us and pass our own to those that follow. And so, fools that we are, we keep trying to fill one grave by digging another."

– King Edmund of Callow, the Inkhand

The damned rat had made a mess on the way out, though that'd turned out of some use: whatever blighted eastern sorcery kept the last stretch of the palace protected it'd been no match for a Horned Lord fleeing without much thought given to its surroundings. Its swinging tail and massive limbs had torn through walls and halls, baring what looked like a set of large private chambers – maybe the lodgings of whatever jackals had settled into this place after the Dukes of Liesse were chased out. Even eviscerated in such a way the palace was not defenceless: the first wave of wraiths to try charging through the opening had dispersed like smoke in the wind. So much, Laurence had thought, for the dead Callowans opening the way. Odds were it'd have to be the boy serving as the key to the locks again, and best he got to that sooner rather than later. It was pretty piece of theatrics the Black Queen had put together, snatching a dead king and appointing to the head of the host meant to meet the Hidden Horror's last guard. Clever, and not without worth. But if the Saint of Swords knew anything it was that pretty stories came to swift ends, and when this one collapsed she had no intention of being caught out on the open where the devils could swarm them. Foundling must have shared at least some of her opinions, as she'd sent for the other members of this band of theirs.

Roland dragged himself up the mound of ruins looking half-dead, though without wounds. The Rogue was a better hand at avoiding blows than dealing them out, as far as Laurence was concerned, though it took all sorts to reach a journey's end. Storming a villain's fortress like this wasn't really what a boy like the Rogue Sorcerer was meant for, anyway. That they'd yet to run into practitioners while pushing further in just dragged him further out of his depths, though the Saint suspected his particular talents would find sharp use at least once before dawn rose. He spoke a few words with Foundling in a quiet tone – her own was kind, Laurence noted, maybe asking about the state he was in – before coming to a discreet collapse against an upraised stone that could from a distance be taken for him simply leaning against it. Having pushed herself to the edge of what her body could take more often than the boy had seen winter pass, the Saint was not fooled in the slightest. He was on the edge of collapse and his pride must have the lion's share of the toil of keeping him standing. Laurence approached, as they all waited for the Tyrant to join them.

"Saint," Roland greeted her without opening his eyes. "Not too worn out?"

"Unlike you," Laurence bluntly replied.

If Tariq had been there he might have been able to smooth away the rougher edges of that exhaustion with use of the Light, but Foundling had sent him to traipse around secret ways with her foremost assassin. It wasn't the Adjutant, at least: word was when the Black Queen really wanted something dead it was the orc she sent out. But Laurence knew better than most the kind of lessons the Archer would have learned at the knee of the Lady of the Lake. It'd be a surprise if any of them didn't involve a corpse in some way. That Tariq had simply accepted being split from the rest of them, where ambush from other forces sworn to Foundling might see him turned into a hostage, had riled her up more than a little. If they were dealing with some raving madman with more minions and powers than sense it'd be one thing to surrender one of their own into their custody – it was a reliable trick to get close enough to a Damned to 'surrender' yourself into stabbing distance. Foundling wouldn't make mistakes that elementary, though, and she'd played them all for fools more than once tonight. It was one thing to bargain with one of Below's servants, though Laurence still believed that dire mistake, but pretending arrangement was alliance could only be furthering that mistake.

"I have tonics," the Sorcerer said. "I will not topple, if that is your worry."

"Relying on potions is a good way to get killed," Laurence said. "Trust your Choosing, not anything that can fit in a bottle."

The boy's eyes fluttered open, the orange rings around his pupils still slowly fading. Whose sorcery had it been, that he'd been spending in the fights? Hard to say. The Saint was no student of the arcane and Tariq had told her that Roland de Beaumaraais' wanderings had taken the boy far and wide: it could have been anyone's, from anywhere. There were places on Calernia where even she had not found the road taking her.

"We have different approaches, Regicide," he replied, almost defiantly.

Laurence's jaw tightened. Even now, she was not sure of this was a long game of Tariq's or if the boy had genuinely blundered into halfway trusting someone that'd spend him without a second thought. The Peregrine had an eye for detail and for the long view Laurence had never seen the likes of in all her days, so she would not put this past him. But she was uncertain of the boy was this skilled a liar. The truth might lay somewhere in the valley, she considered. A lie but spoken with real anger. There'd been too many defeats of late for a proud young Chosen like Roland not to feel their wisdom had failed. He was not, Laurence would admit, entirely wrong. It was never enough to be right: you also had to be victorious, or it didn't mean a damned thing.

"Don't be a mule," she said. "Stay in the back save when your talents are needed. Foundling and the Tyrant can take the hits until we get to the pivot."

Spreading around the hurt a bit ought to even things out, when the villains started considering sticking the knife and taking the while prize instead of keeping to the arrangement. Laurence wouldn't draw first, not when Tariq had given his word. She trusted him too much for that, inconveniently sentimental as he could be. But neither would she stumble blind into the inevitable. And if he proved to be right? Her fingers clenched.

"Do we not have enough foes, that we must ever make more?" Roland tiredly asked her in Chantant.

"Just because she's not fighting us," Laurence gently said, "doesn't mean she's not our foe."

Could be the bargain would hold for a few months, a few years. A decade, Gods forbid, though she would not put coin on that. But it would break. Foundling wanted to wiggle her way into Cordelia Hasenbach's dreams of a Grand Alliance, that much had come clear, and given the way the ventures was on fire the Saint did not mind so much. If the Black Queen wanted to do them all a service and be taken by the blaze, fighting for the last scraps of decency she still clung to, then Laurence would keep her mouth shut. But Catherine Foundling could not have a hand in shaping the world that would come after the ashes settled, lest the old sicknesses carry through to the foundation that would be laid in the ruins of the old order.

"An alliance of victors, is it?" the Rogue quietly said.

He was speaking half of a saying old and dear to their people, though some claimed it was some ancient Merovins who'd first spoken it. An alliance of victors is like a hearth in summer. Useless, it meant, doomed to fail. For when the covenant of need passed, the nature of men ran its course instead.

"You're young," the Saint tiredly said. "So this seems like the sum of it to you. But there's always an after, Roland."

"Is it not this very manner of thinking, Saint, that saw us end up here in the first place?" he replied.

"I hope you can still believe that, in a decade," Laurence de Montfort honestly said. "That we will live in a world kind enough to tolerate that belief."

But I won't count on it, she thought. If she did not keep a watch, who would?

"My beloved comrades, I have returned!"

The Tyrant of Helike landed atop the mound with a sick crunch, the ugly enchanted sculptures carrying his throne everywhere being ground into the stone by the abrupt landing. They chattered loudly in protest, though another gargoyle wearing the tailored robes of a Stygian magister went around swatting them into silence with a stick. Gods, that nasty little cripple was just sick in the head.

"Good," the Black Queen said, turning to address them. "We'll be breaching the last holdout, now. Sorcerer, you and I will take the tip of the spear. I have a feel for the weakness in things, and you've..."

She shrugged.

"... that thing that you do," the dark-eyed woman said, sounding amused.

"Understood," Roland said, discretely wiping the corner of his mouth.

Not quite thoroughly enough for Laurence not to notice the hint of green broth on his lip. So he'd drunk something, then, and ignored her advice. She'd have to keep an eye on the fool, lest he get himself killed overreaching his grasp.

"Is no one going to address the delicious ironic army of the dead currently warring on the Dead King's host of devils?" Kairos Theodosian said.

"You've summed it up," Foundling drily replied. "Consider it addressed."

The boy's red eye was shining wet, like it'd been dipped in blood, and his smile came too easy. Laurence knew that to be the sight of a sharpened knife being bared, and from the way the Black Queen's own eyes sharpened so did she.

"I was referring to the way that the Good King seems to be falling apart at a quickening rate," the Tyrant said. "Presumably, his army would follow him into slumber."

She'd been right then, Laurence grimly thought. Like an arrow sent flying, that ploy of Foundling's would hit the mark but then turn into little more than dead wood.

"He'll hold long enough," the Black Queen said. "Yet we should not linger. Sorcerer, with me. The two of you should keep an eye out for the Skein – somehow I doubt its leaping down a cliff has rid us of it for good."

The Saint did not reply, for it would have been too much like taking an order, but she did not disagree. It was decent enough sense, for Roland had his tricks but it was Foundling's priesthood of the wicked that had wraiths parting for them as they advanced on the last bastion. The two took the lead when they arrived at the feet of the walls the Skein's retreat had ripped open, climbing up and beginning to paw at the wards. Laurence remained below, as much to keep an eye on the Tyrant as to keep watch for the Horned Lord's return.

"Did you notice," Kairos Theodosian said, "that she now seems to have no issue spiriting away the sack of crowns where it cannot be gotten at. Strange, that earlier it had to be carried."

Of course she had. And the way that the Tyrant's passing defection – one without consequence, as well – had led to sole change that now both the crowns and the Carrion Lord were in the hands of the Black Queen. How long had she been scheming that, the Saint wondered? Still, the Tyrant was being condescendingly obvious about sowing seeds of enmity. He must think her simple, the little prick.

"Has anyone ever hit you in the mouth hard enough to break teeth?" Laurence asked.

"Alas, my friend, I am but a slave to my nature," the Tyrant grinned. "So are you, of course. It is why we are being played so masterfully by our delightful leader."

No leader of mine, the Saint thought, though she knew better than to give the villain what he wanted and voice any of her thoughts.

"I expect I'll get to kill you before spring arrives," the Saint casually said. "I'll admit, you wretched little shit, that I'll enjoy cutting you down a great deal."

"Interesting," the boy mused. "So what is it that the Dead King offered you, to make you so angry?"

"Your head on a pike," Laurence said, leaning forward to look the boy in the eye. "Insulting, that he'd try to rob me of the pleasure of chopping it off myself."

"You're taking all the fun out of this," the villain complained.

The Saint's fingers clenched. Too easy. That'd been too easy. She'd made a misstep somewhere, and he was now letting himself 'lose' this conversation because he'd already gotten what he wanted. Laurence studied the Tyrant, who studied her in turn with a lazy smile. Should she kill him immediately, just in case? That was where her instincts lay. Scheming villains were like termites, the longer they were left to dig the greater the damages. If she turned on a member of their band of five, loosely as that band was aligned, then there might be consequences greater than physical hostilities. On the other hand, were the consequences greater threat than whatever the boy had planned? Could be feint, she noted, him baiting her so she'd strike and he could finagle the others cutting her loose. She couldn't be sure Foundling wouldn't put keeping a close eye on Theodosian above whatever use she might get out of Laurence's sword arm this close to the finish. On the other hand, the Saint thought, it was too late for the Tyrant to sell them out to the Dead King. Which meant if he was going to screw someone, it was likely to be the one getting closest to their chosen victory. That, reluctant as Laurence was to admit it, was Catherine Foundling.

No, it was not worth making herself the truce-breaker of this story for such an ugly prize. The Saint of Swords would wait, hand on her pommel, and judge when the time came. Above them the first ward broke and the Black Queen yelled for them to catch up.

The Saint and the Tyrant had not moved from their matching stares, but it was Laurence who looked away first.

—

"I had been," the Grey Pilgrim slowly said, "under the impression your queen disapproved of necromancy."

Indrani glanced at the old man, putting away the bit that he'd apparently been able to sniff out the nature of the trouble above them through several layers of stones and wards without any difficulty. Might have been the angels, though, she corrected herself. Vivienne had been right, when she'd first said more than a year back that putting a finger on what the Pilgrim could and couldn't do was complicated even for a Named. His patron Choir made it hard to tell where his own sensory abilities began and the secrets they no doubt shared ended.

"She'd not going to put a few corpse-raisers at the back of a battlefield, no," Archer snorted. "But she doesn't ride live horses, Pilgrim. Callowan she might be, but don't forget who taught her."

The Praesi fondness for the art was as well-known as their Callowan foes' strong distaste for it, and both likely sprung from the same source. Indrani had thought for a while that Cat wouldn't mind an undead legion at all, if having one wouldn't make half her living soldiers desert without batting an eye. Mind you, Duchess Kegan's people had been stacking up dead souls for a long time before Akua got around to snatching the whole pile so when it came down to it even Callowans weren't above getting a little corpse on their hands.

"It is unlikely that I shall," the Pilgrim replied.

In the light of his, well, Light they'd been making good time through the tunnels. The bloody thing had been built to be swum, unfortunately, not walked. Meaning it was broken ground all around, with sharp ups and downs, and while the Peregrine was spry for a relic he wasn't going to be leaping around anytime soon. That meant every once in a while the rope came out again and Indrani dragged him up an incline, or slid him down one, though at least he was so light she barely noticed the weight of him. Seriously, he might as well have been made of feathers. Archer glanced at the old man's pensive expression and snorted. Still anguishing about the way it was the Carrion Lord who'd taught her, was he? He should have been more worried it was Akua she'd first cut her villain teeth on, as far as she was concerned. The Black Knight was sensible kind of savage, most the time. Getting into scraps with Akua Sahelian, though, taught lessons about grinding people into dust so they could never swing at you again. Akua had always been too good at squeaking out of trouble for her own good. Or anyone else's, for that matter.

"My worries amuse you," the old man said.

His tone was a tad disappointed, like she'd been unkind to someone's puppy.

"Sure," Indrani shrugged. "You're going about this all wrong, Grey. Digging for stories with me, trying to get a read on where she came from and what she's after now. Bet you put out little test for her since the lot of you entered this place, too, just to see where she fell on things."

The old man's silence sounded, Archer thought, just a little contrite. Caught him out, had she? In all fairness, he wasn't a bad hand at that game. It was deftly done, just enough give someone not looking for it wouldn't have noticed the take. But Indrani was pretty sure he was used to coming from the other side: already the darling grandfather, the trusted figure. In a word, the old man was used to being a mentor. That wasn't a void that'd ever needed much filling with the Woe, though, so any such attempt would only ever feel like trespassing and be all the more glaring for it.

"And you say such an approach would be a mistake," the Pilgrim carefully said. "It would be considered hostile?"

"More like a waste of time, and probably her a trial on her patience," Archer absent-mindedly said. "If she notices, which she will, because you've tried to kill her a few times so she's paying attention."

She recognized this particular stretch of tunnel, as it happened. They were nearly at the end: one last climb up and they'd end up in the tragically empty wine cellar where the trap door had been hidden.

"And what would you suggest instead?" the old man asked, voice sounding a little strangled.

She flicked an impatient glance at him.

"Look, you're trying to deal with us like we're skittish fucking horses in need of your reins," Indrani said. "Throw that to the side, 'cause that ride ends with your throat cut open. Probably by me, 'cause let's face it I'm quicker on the draw than Hakram. You want to know what she wants? Sit across a table with her with a decent bottle and politely ask."

Archer frowned at him, just to make it clear for once she was being serious.

"And she'll tell you, Peregrine, because the moment you stop being someone trying to handle us you're back to being someone she wants to work with," she said. "Hells, Pilgrim, as far as I can tell mostly she wants things to be slightly less on fire everywhere. That really so devilish a scheme you can't stomach it?"

"There are other considerations to making a bargain with your queen, Indrani," the Pilgrim quietly said.

"If your Grand Alliance can't get its shit together long enough to accept help when the Dead King's about to eat the whole pie," Indrani frankly said, "then I don't get why you're so keen on it in the first place. Kind of a shipwreck, isn't it?"

The old hero's face was unreadable in the dim light of his own making, but this wasn't really her problem was it? Indrani was called in when there was trouble to be had, not to play the diplomat. Besides, but a few moments later they arrived at the end of the tunnel and what awaited them disturbed the Grey Pilgrim enough the other conversation died on its own.

"Souls," the Peregrine quietly said, blue peering up as if they could see through the trapdoor. "What awaits there, Archer?"

"A wine cellar, for the first few steps," Indrani said. "After that, well, you had it right. About a city's worth of souls, and the man who bound them as his instrument."

Caerulea

Vote! (for A Practical Guide to Evil)

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

(Discord:)

<https://discord.gg/3nbsUfZ>

Have a nice day.

Aston Whiteman

No?

Liliet

No, you won't have a nice day?

TeK

"They chattered loudly in protest, though another gargoyle wearing the tailored robes of a Stygian magister went around swatting them into silence with a stick."

Tyrant truly is a best thing to ever happen to the Creation.

erebus42

He certainly is proactive; having his HR rep keep an eye on his Gargoyles and making sure they don't get any thoughts about unionizing.

Javvies

Hah!

Somebody get Indrani a keg or two on me.

Finally somebody else said it – if the Alliance is this screwed up, how is it worth keeping?

And, yeah. Laurence is doubling down on having lost track of the difference between striking at evil and doing good. As regards Cat, anyways. Laurence is not wrong to want Kairos dead asap.

The Rogue Sorcerer seems not particularly useful thus far. And I have all kinds of questions about him.

Also, what's Tariq talking about? Where the heck did this idea of Cat not approving of necromancy come from? Did he forget the thousands of Winter!dead rising from the glacial lake at the Battle of the Camps?

I mean, sure, Cat doesn't have necromancers in her employ or standing armies of the undead, but still.

i'mnotgivingmynametoamachine

I think by now he figured out Akua did that.

ATRDCI

Unlikely, given during his "accept Cat's surrender" introspection he had no idea Akua existed, in the context of someone who could use the well of Night

Soma

Cat doesn't like necromancy, or at least is a bit conflicted, especially after Second Llesse. She's mentioned that, but she's not going to completely ignore a powerful tool when it might give her the edge. Pilgrim would have picked up on that distaste with his sight especially when he first encountered Catherine it would have been more raw so soon after The Doom.

Andrew Mitchell

> The Rogue Sorcerer seems not particularly useful thus far. And I have all kinds of questions about him.

I think he's going to be more useful in the near future. But he's been pretty damn useful so far by removing difficult wards and killing & distracting a LOT of devils.

Someguy

Given that their opponent is the Dead King, Roland's Role in this Story is that of a Skeleton Key.

konstantinvoncarstein

What is a Skeleton Key?

erebus42

It's like a master key that can unlock any door in a place.

Someguy

This:-

https://en.m.wikipedia.org/wiki/Skeleton_key

EX

A key that can open any lock. The term probably has a wikipedia page.

Ben Serreau-Raskin

I'm pretty sure he's a Spell Thief/anti-magic type. Mostly skilled at tricky applications of small magic until he gets to "Take" a bigger magic, at which point he can turn it back on its users. Against Masego that basically makes him untouchable unless Zeze pulls out some real dire summons.

The way Saint thinks about the pack of practitioners taking him out of his element really does seem to imply that he's a specialist regardless.

JJR

Of course, one does always need to be careful about what the effects of the magic they are copying actually are.

As Black Mage learns the hard way in that one 8 bit theatre strip.

<https://www.nuklearpower.com/2006/04/29/episode-689-backfire/>

edrey

well, he ending under the control of the king is also possible, we never knew if he meet him in the journey to liese

Cicero

It appears to me that the Rogue Sorcerer gets his magic by stealing it from others?

I wonder what sort of magic he might foresee stealing from Cat, and how tempting that must be...

erebus42

Ironically, he doesn't seem to be the type overly interested in the acquisition of power.
I am curious though if the spells he steals are one offs.

signspace13

I think he can likely invest them in artifacts to various effects, like his blasting rod, but otherwise I think they are pretty temporary, and it seems that he can only Carry two stolen magics at a time.

I also don't think all of his magic is stolen, he seemed to be casting normally in the battle, I think his magic would more effective if it was entirely Name based, instead Cat remarks on it being inefficient in comparison to Heirophant and Diabolist.

medailyfun

the gift and deep knowledge of high arcana make great magic, not Names. Heiress could do big stuff even having weak name and I vaguely remember Apprentice was directly mentioning he was not relying that much on his Name

Euodiachloris

I don't know about that: a Jack-of-All can do things a Master-of-One cannot, as well as visa versa. It's unlikely to be elegant, but... RS is playing with all the toys the sandbox – even the ones outside known theoretical frameworks.

He and Heirophant are like the work crew vs the architect of using all of the things. They should have synergy, if they ever get to work together.

Andrew Mitchell

Now I want to see that. 😊

konstantinvoncarstein

What Catherine does is not magic, but miracles of Night. I don't think RS would like the result of him trying to steal that 😁

shveiran

Stealing from Cat is most definitely a mistake

crysjal

Considering his eyes change colours and he's described as "inefficient" and unable to use high arcana (which is personal to the individual and therefore useless to him) the rogue has something like a Sharingan for magic. He's then fallen into the trap of knowing a lot of copied magic but never bothering to hone his skills to use it properly.

IDKWhoitis

Killing Kairos would be a mistake, in most circumstances. He likely has Traitorous level plots to cause trouble long after he's dead, and killing him would give those plots enough narrative weight to make people regret such choices.

Crippling Kairos seems better than outright killing him, and likely is easier too. After all, one does not kill the comedic relief...

konstantin von carstein

Furthermore, his throne will probably explode, or something like that.

medailyfun

He is already crippled so I doubt it will make any effect 😊

shveiran

Kairos is the kind of character that's trouble whatever you do.

You kill him? Contingencies are in place to ensure you remember him.

You cripple him? He walks around the setbacks and now it's personal.

You leave him alone? You will regret it.

Honestly, I think killing him is the lesser evil. It will STING still, but at least he cannot put more contingencies in place than he already has and he no longer enacts more schemes with far reaching consequences every few days.

Kissaten

Kairos proved himself to be a trustworthy fellow, if anything.

Zourath

I think that's actually part of why he thought that. She* went out of her way to use something that isn't necromancy in order to get an effect identical to necromancy. It's like hitting a nail with an axe when you have a perfectly good hammer in reach.

*Actually Akua

Liliet

> Finally somebody else said it – if the Alliance is this screwed up, how is it worth keeping?

The problem in this case is not that the Alliance is screwed up. The problem is that the heroes think they know Cat's story, and her story is one of... a plague-bearer getting everyone else sick. She doesn't mean it, she doesn't want it, she has the best of intentions, but anything she does will just end up making things worse in the ironic prophecy sort of way.

Either that or she's just going to betray them all. You know, one or the other.

The Grand Alliance is not the main consideration at this point.

Mental Mouse

> her story is one of... a plague-bearer getting everyone else sick.

Except... that's just the basic pattern of stigma, indeed of scapegoating. "We can't let those people work/live/stay around "decent folks", they'll just bring down the whole neighborhood..." Also "anybody who stands up for them is obviously part of the problem". Whether it's black folks, gays, drug users, sex workers, Jews and/or Muslims, – any attempt at problem-solving gets thrown away in favor of "we just need to get rid of them, and all our problems will be gone!" Even in the Guide-verse, I don't think that's gonna work.

Liliet

- 1) I am not saying it's a good idea;
- 2) Tariq's and Laurence's reasons are very different from the historical irl ones;
- 3) they can't exactly learn from IRL examples from inside their fictional world, can they?

Mental Mouse

> Tariq's and Laurence's reasons are very different from the historical irl ones

They're not that different, especially in regard to the political parallels. Essentialism is explicitly a conceit of the Guideverse, but it certainly has often been popular in our own world, including modern America. Combine it with eliminationism, you get Bad Things Happening.

Within the Guide, Amadeus made a decent case that in fact, Pilgrim & Saint were successful enough at eliminating Evil from their home ground that they tipped a balance on a larger scale. Which directly implies that no, Good is not "allowed" to win permanently, any more than Evil is.

Liliet

>Within the Guide, Amadeus made a decent case that in fact, Pilgrim & Saint were successful enough at eliminating Evil from their home ground that they tipped a balance on a larger scale. Which directly implies that no, Good is not "allowed" to win permanently, any more than Evil is.

The other way around. IF we accept that Good is not "allowed" to win permanently and the balance tips over as a premise, THEN Amadeus's case for the heroes being responsible for Dead King holds water. That was his argument: "do you really think you're allowed to win without tipping the balance over and empowering Evil to strike back?" It's a known fact already.

A rather uncomfortable one, if you take the view that Good = good. But note that Tariq's conclusion was 'and then we beat the strike back, and then we just keep winning anyway and fuck Fate', interestingly mirroring Amadeus's own response to 'this cycle is endless'.

>They're not that different, especially in regard to the political parallels

They really. They're not blaming Catherine for external problems already happening, and they're not sticking her with any labels she did not willingly accept. Being a villain is less like a nationality and more like being a member of a political party calling themselves national socialists, yeah? And also wearing a swastika on your sleeve, because Guideverse is not subtle. You can be born into a religion, sure enough, but Catherine's a politician and all her choices she made herself.

And 'discrimination' against the infectuously sick, also known as quarantine, is also a historical thing. Well-known to be horrifying and unfair, but also effective at preventing the spread of sickness if enforced successfully.

Mental Mouse

A potentially useful question: Suppose Cat somehow managed to attain a clearly heroic Name. Do you think Laurence would back off? Would Pilgrim stand in the way of the crusade against her?

Liliet

Laurence would back off, throw her hands in the air and go "welcome to the team kid and congratulations". Pilgrim would look at political convenience first much like he did when Cat came to him for help pre-Keter, but to the degree that he is the pivot, yes he would do his best to arrange to fold her in. It'd be his best case scenario come true before his very eyes.

Miles

The Rogue sorcerer kept the wraiths from interrupting cat and Kairos when they had their chat. So far he's been like IT, or a good Butler. Doing a good job means you don't even notice he's there (though you'd notice things going wrong if he was gone).

Rook

I suspect the only reason he was so worn out is because it was directly combative support here. He's a versatile character that copies or steals from others, which means narratively he has endless flexibility but takes a hit in raw power – an imitation is almost never as strong as the original, in stories

I suspect that he'll actually be massively more effective against Masego than the devils, despite the larger power difference. The key being that the Hierophant's main strength is primarily his knowledge and the obscurity of his workings, not his sorcerous muscle. The usher of mysteries, not destroyer of worlds.

He's may even have the capital to be a threat to Catherine if he wanted to be, considering the less combative role that Catherine now falls into as first under the night.

Liliet

I don't think he's a threat to Catherine, because his main strength seems to be turning an enemy's own sorcerous strength against them. It will probably work very well against Masego, you're right, but it's not sorcery that Catherine uses and we've already seen a lesson in what happens when a foe tries to use her strength against her. Angry crows happen.

Rogue Sorcerer is a narrowly specialized anti-mage :3

happyhavak

Rogue wouldn't be the first hero Cat Converted

Andrew Mitchell

"Look, you're trying to deal with us like we're skittish fucking horses in need of your reins," Indrani said. "Throw that to the side, 'cause that ride ends with your throat cut open. Probably by me, 'cause let's face it I'm quicker on the draw than Hakram. You want to know what she wants? Sit across a table with her with a decent bottle and politely ask."

Archer frowned at him, just to make it clear for once she was being serious.

So f'ing good. The Peregrine needed to hear that... But did he listen?

Faiir

If things are less on fire, how will they be CLEANSED BY THE RIGHTOUS FLAME?

erebus42

Easy there Saint

Liliet

His problem is not the devilishness of her schemes... =x

shveiran

His problem is , he still thinks in binary when the paradigm has chaged.

Liliet

Has it changed?

Can you describe&prove to me, on the textual basis, that it changed? (Only actual description+explanation qualifies as a positive answer. Saying "yes" doesn't cut it. Do the explanation)

Miles

Jeeze with such tight constraints on format it's like you're asking for an excuse to argue, not an answer.

Liliet

Sorry. I just wanted to dissect what evidence was available for that, and this kind of thing is much easier when it's the person arguing FOR the point presenting it --

Rook

He still thinks in Binary which isn't helping the situation yes, but the paradigm has not changed nor is the pilgrim unjustified for his precaution, as fruitless as the readers (not the characters) know it to be.

Catherine is an emerging exception among exceptions, but the villains that preceded her, as well as most alive today, and even one in her own band, still fall into the exact same old paradigm.

An exception isn't a pattern.

Which isn't fair for Catherine, no. But at the same time it's not as if Catherine alone, in just a few years, has suddenly changed the pattern of Villainy. The Pilgrim isn't in the wrong for not throwing away a lifetime of experience based on his limited interactions with a single person.

naturalnuke

Oh.

Zeze no...

NerfGlastigUaine

Ah, Tyrant. He's not only a magnificent traitor, he also nudges others into betrayal as well. I'm looking forward to the inevitable backstabs (and frontstabs, sidestabs, omni-directional stabs) that will result.

erebus42

Honestly, I think it was more about needling the Saint than thinking he'd actually get her to betray them (though I'm sure that would be a bonus). His very existence is anathema to everything she believes in and as she said herself he was being super obvious (probably intentionally so) in his baiting of her. But I agree betrayal is inevitable and I'm sure it will be glorious.

Andrew Mitchell

So not all Liesse's souls rose up at the call of Dead King Edward. Interesting.

Caerulea

I suspect those are the souls that Akua usurped, and that were in the palace already. The shades that rose up at the call of The Good King were the ones that Akua butchered using Still Water. The ones that the Hierophant has are those that were woven into a Gestalt, before Black broke it.

Andrew Mitchell

Ah, so the souls of all the Watch who have died over a couple of hundred years. Makes sense.

Cicero

I thought that had been returned to the Watch already.

konstantinvoncarstein

No, they were returned to the Deoraithe. Maybe the wards on the palace interfered with Edward's summon?

And the Gestalt is made of the souls of all Deoraithe who die since their exile from the Golden Bloom, not only from the soul of the Watch.

Ben Serreau-Raskin

The fighting souls are the ones Akua killed with the Zombie Army Ritual, the gestalt are back in position empowering the watch, and the souls in the room ahead are all the ones that died at Thallasina when Warlock called in all his markers with Below and let loose a Death Curse that scarred the land into perpetuity. Masego was able to grab them because he watched how the DK did it way back in the day.

Death Knight

This rings true. That amount of power would also explain why the Hierophant was seen to be "teleporting" and/or phasing out of Creation when observed by Malicia's agents as he was making his exodus out of Praes.

Someguy

Looks like Zeze is really out of it, isn't he of the opinion that sacrificial rituals are for illiterate hacks?

Andrew Mitchell

Technically he doesn't seem to have been sacrificing anyone. He's just using already available souls.

Faiir

He wouldn't waste a readily available resource after all.

ayon96

I think it's the souls of the praesi city where masego snapped. Tyrant did say he ate a citys worth of souls.

Andrew Mitchell

Ooooooh, that does ring a bell. I hope you're right.

shveiran

O god, I hope you aren't. That sounds it would have long term consequences, and with grief and possession already on the table... will what we get back really be a Masego?

C_B

Pretty sure this is referring to the souls of those who died in Thallassina.

Kissaten

Those are Praesi from a different city destroyed by Warlock.

Big I

It's probably the souls of the people who died at Thalasinna, gathered by Hierophant as he left.

Liliet

These are Thalassina's souls, not Liesse's.

Walter

To paraphrase:

"So what you're saying is that the one person who's trying to stop the Dead King should stop doing what's been effective, and should instead start taking advice from a Heaven approved advisor, even though he's an oath-breaker who's tried to kill her ..."

erebus42

Pretty much yeah. Honestly one the great things about the Pilgrim's character-as much as he annoys the hell out of me- is how it serves to deconstruct the designated mentor role and show it's pitfalls. He really can't seem to meet anyone on an equal footing can he? He seems to genuinely think he alone knows what's best and that everyone else should take his council. It's one of the main things that makes him so infuriating. Hopefully the universe continues to disabuse him of those ideas and continues to kick him in the metaphorical balls.

Liliet

I mean tbh I still think it would be good for this alliance if Cat and Tariq fell into a mentor/mentee relationship for a bit. This kind of relationship in stories tend to have a lot of feedback for the mentor learning from the student, and of course it's a brilliant move diplomatically.

Gamer7956

That really can't happen. Cat started referring to Black as 'Father' before this arc started – presumably to play up their connection for the story. That would be all for naught if she suddenly took another mentor – a subversion of the strongest part of her connection to Amadeus

Liliet

I mean, Cat has specifically already renounced Black as her mentor. That happened after Second Liesse and was a whole thing. "You're no longer a Squire".

The 'adopted father' thing is their only current connection, that and the fact being a mentor is timeless. "My old mentor" doesn't imply they're currently teaching you,

And to round up my point, IT'S POSSIBLE TO HAVE MULTIPLE MENTORS OVER A LIFETIME

Liliet

P.S. Also, replace 'mentor' with 'advisor' if you wish. My point is just Tariq being close to Cat in an advisory role and getting to really understand her decision making process, her political situation and her alliances from the inside.

Andrew Mitchell

That sounds like it would need a whole lot of trust that Tariq hasn't earned yet.

Liliet

Trust people to act according to their nature.

C'mon, Cat.

KageLupus

Like handing over the reins of your apotheosis to twin murder goddesses required some unearned trust?

Javvies

Ah, but Cat had seen some of what made the Sisters take the path they did.

Also, there's a rather distinct and important difference between "trust unearned", which was the Sisters, and "demonstrably, and by his own admission, inherently, untrustworthy person who already betrayed you before", which is Tariq.

Rook

Have to agree there, I actually favor Tariq in terms of intent, but I STILL think it'd be a mistake for Catherine to give him control or undue influence at this point

Regardless how reasonable his skepticisms about Catherine are based on what he personally knows, the fact is that he can't be trusted to understand her right now, which means he can't be trusted not to fuck it all up if given too much of the reins

We have to remember that even with Sve Noc, all that the surrender of Winter bought Catherine was the sisters stepping back to take an objective/unbiased look through her memories to understand her character and intent. The trust returned came after, based on what they saw there, based on a full and complete understanding of what and who Catherine Foundling is.

That latter part, the understanding, is the key issue between the Pilgrim and Cat in the first place – the Pilgrim likely wouldn't disagree with Catherine's goals or intent if he knew them like the sisters do now. But the thing is that he currently doesn't and can not, to any appreciable extent. Trust alone is naivety, it only has value when it's paired with understanding.

Liliet

"Advisory vote" means you only get as much influence over the result as you can get others to listen to you.

I'm not offering to put Tariq in charge of anything. I'm offering to put him in the exact role where he feels most comfortable – providing advice, insight and suggestions to the person who actually is.

Liliet

There's a long road between "will break his word in situations where doing otherwise would be absolutely catastrophic" and "inherently untrustworthy".

I would argue the former actually deserves a lot more trust than someone who would hold to the letter of their word stubbornly no matter what, being as how they use their head and not their principles to think.

Mental Mouse

> Like handing over the reins of your apotheosis to twin murder goddesses required some unearned trust?

No, it required Cat getting her butt kicked halfway to a hell and back – remember, Cat was not in control of that situation!

At least not in present tense... but she had made enough of her self in the past, that when she faced literal divine judgement, the goddesses in question gave her a lot of "unearned trust" in taking her as their representative to humanity and the surface world.

fireinsideincites

Yes, but it's not unheard of. A queen who is misunderstood but trying to do good for the people going against tradition and the institutions, being mentored by an older, wiser advisor who works for/used to work for those institutions. The trust comes from them both trying to do good but approaching it from different angles (see Tyrion and early Dany)

Javvies

That (or something similar) could, and probably would, have happened ... in Tariq's redemption play on Cat. Y'know, the one Cat was willing to lean into and cooperate with if he'd give his word to prevent Procer from partitioning and exploiting Callow for their own gain, or at least allow her to do so. When he knew that her greatest desire was for peace and that she cared about protecting Callow and Callowans more than petty much anything else (the thing he knew was a hook for Below to pervert her good intentions into non-good actions).

Also, the one that he broke because having given his word doesn't mean he'll keep it.

So ... no, I'm pretty sure that nothing along those lines is gonna happen anymore.

Unless it's flipped and Cat becomes Tariq's mentor figure. Which would be kind of hilarious, but mind bogglingly improbable, IMO. Plus Laurence probably (try to) kill the both of them if that happened.

shveiran

Agreed. A mentor relationship implies NON-EQUAL STANDING between the two.

Lillet mentioned that the mentor usually ends up learning from the student, but while that IS true, that is still the exception within the relationship: most of the teaching flows in the other direction – since one of the two is meant to be, you know, a MENTOR.

In the middle of book 4, Cat would have been willing to learn from one of the most experienced heroes in Calernia. It would have made a great contrast with her tutorage from Black, and would have helped walked the narrow path.

Now, though? Now the Black Queen will accept to deal as an equal with nearly anyone, even if it means giving up power and control... but she will not trust someone else to teach her what to do or how to do it. That ship has sailed, that ship has BURNT.

I'm all for seeing Cat and Tariq reach an understanding, but that will happen as a consortium between equals or not at all.

Indrani got it right, plain and simple.

Andrew Mitchell

Well said.

Mental Mouse

Cat has already learned a lot from Pilgrim... more than he likes, really. But as Archer points out, he doesn't get to appoint himself her mentor. Especially after so much of her development has been in response to him trying to kill her.

shveiran

Quite right, she has learned from him. Because if you survive a fight you have learned from your enemy. That doesn't make Aqua or Tariq a mentor, merely a challenged overcome.

You can also learn from an ally, through sharing and exemple... but he and Cat are not quite there yet, if they'll ever reach it.

Soma

Mmmm interludes. I can't get enough of these specific Woe centered interludes. I almost regret its Friday.

carrier

Don't despair, the next one shall be a double release

Soma

00000000hhhhhhh myyyyyyy. You've made my night! I forgot about that. Admittedly, I'd guess the bonus won't be quite so immediately following people interacting with the Woe, but who knows? And it will be great besides.

erebus42

About time someone called the Pilgrim out on his condescending mentor bullshit.

Good on the Saint for actually making the smart call. I still think she's a mad dog who needs to be put down but hey, credit where credit's due.

Also I'd say we're about due for that other shoe to drop.

carrier

I've no idea what's the test left behind by the pilgrim, buy it has the sorcerer on is signature.

Kissaten

I think it's his deal with Cat about not killing Laurence, or at least related to it.

Pokekid01

I take personal offence at this chapter's pre-quote. A proverb on the folly of revenge? Written by a CALLOWAN? Admittedly, the Inkhand seems to be a more level-headed sort, but still, this is a most profane heresy of the highest order.

erebus42

I know right? I'm sure even Dread Emperor Revenant would blanche at something so blasphemous and unnatural.

Faiir

Obviously, it was a misattribution made possible by me, The Great Emperor Traitorous (not to be mistaken with a feeble Betrayer)!

Liliet

So, here we have Laurence's predictions ranging wildly from "Catherine is going to have Tariq captured" to "Catherine is going to stick with this alliance for decades". Fucking beautiful.

And Indrani isn't following, alas. Apparently Catherine did not share her insights into Tariq's understanding of the situation.

She's still helping ♥

shveiran

To continue our discussion, I'm really getting a different read. Her prediction does seem to range in time, but she is not really considering a different end: even if Cat sticks with the alliance for decades, the implication is that at some point she'll need to be put down and the longer she stays the greater the damage.

I assume your read on her clenching her fingers is that she is conflicted and is trying not to consider the possibility that Cat is actually a different breed. And I'm not saying that interpretation is wrong or impossible... simply that when I read it, I think it means "if Tariq was right and this mission goes according to plan, then he will not allow me to slay her before we move north, and that is DANGEROUS, what should I do?" or even "if Tariq is right and this alliance to slay the DK actually works, that means Foundling is somewhat even more dangerous than HIM, and I'll likely won't be around to kill her then. So should I kill her now, while I can, and damn the consequences?"

Mental Mouse

In other words, she's deeply tempted to kill Cat, regardless of her companion's advice and everything she's seen of Cat in particular. The question is whether she can overcome her ingrained pattern of "kill all the eeenvviiiill".

" "if Tariq is right and this alliance to slay the DK actually works, AFAICT She didn't mention killing the DK, and if she did it would mean she was way off the rails.

Remember, that wasn't actually on the table at the conclave And Cat has been very specific that the win condition against DK isn't killing him, it's chasing him back into his hole. Given that DK can just withdraw and flee back to his own realm at any time, I wouldn't bet on a surprise kill either.

Liliet

> even if Cat sticks with the alliance for decades, the implication is that at some point she'll need to be put down and teh longer she stays the greater the damage.

Yes. Not because of her bad intentions necessarily but because of how they predict the general shape of her story goes. I like the metaphor I used above: a plague-bearer getting everyone else sick.

> I assume your read on her clenching her fingers is that she is conflicted and is trying not to consider the possibility that Cat is actually a different breed.

No, actually, my read on it is "he might be right and we'd have to put her down anyway". Laurence is willing to entertain the thought Cat might be genuine, but not that she might be right.

She really doesn't have remotely enough information for that conclusion.

shveiran

Right. So...

...We agree? I mean, I'm not arguing that Saint doesn't feel like it's a pity Cat has to be slain; merely that she is not any less determined to slay her than she was a week ago.

Liliet

Depends on how you try to quantify 'determined'.

Laurence is no longer absolutely convinced that Cat needs to be slain right now, the second she gets a stab at her throat. Her conviction can be further weakened. Sure it's a long journey from here&now to "maybe Foundling really should win", but she's already on the road :3

Her opinion on Catherine has already changed. It hasn't changed enough to get her to cancel the slaying appointment, but the capacity for change is there, and I predict it'll change more yet :3

Liliet

AUGH FUCKING UNCLOSED TAGS

Ben Serreau-Raskin

Once again the Pilgrim displays an amazing combo of supernatural discernment (detecting a massive ghost army through however much solid Rock while being lugged through a Tomb Raider level) with a bone deep lack of understanding of Cat's character (both having that question and then asking it so bluntly).

Ben Serreau-Raskin

That line about his face being in shadow of his own making is perfect though. Some really story craft.

Ben Serreau-Raskin

Edit: *really top notch story craft

Isi Arnott-Campbell

TBH I like it better as "Some really story craft." I dunno, it's just oddly appealing as a turn of phrase.

sengachi

Here's a thought. So far Laurence has been making a conscious effort to avoid going down the expected route of betraying the villains to the detriment of the party, even self-admittedly against her own nature. Of course she has to have a Trial at some point, and the assumption is that eventually that self-control will be tested to its limits. But now that I think about it, there's another very pivotal thing which could happen around Laurence that would satisfy the Narrative.

A) Does Tariq know Laurence sabotaged Procer's ability to unify against the Dead King?

B) Does the Dead King know that?

I'm guessing the answer to A is "absolutely not" and the answer to B ... well that would be a hell of a bomb for the Dead King to drop on the party now wouldn't it?

konstantinvoncarstein

Laurence don't sabotage the union of the Principat itself, she "just" burned all diplomatic bridges with Callow. It probably makes it even harder for her to have to work with Catherine.

sengachi

Oh no I didn't mean she sabotaged the alliance. What I meant was how she sabotaged the Callow/Procer peacetalks to ensure Procer had to split its forces in a way that was meant to ensure the eventual complete destruction of Procer.

Liliet

TBF I'm not sure she could have predicted the current situation. The inability to let the Legions just go is based far more on Callow's determination to rescue Grem / Grem's previous actions, than the Arch-Heretic thing.

Liliet

...on the other hand she couldn't have predicted Callow being willing to offer alliance&help even despite the Arch-Heretic thing either, so actually scratch that, you're right.

Mental Mouse

From the DK's point of view (or even for story success) Laurence is the real weak point in the party, because she's got her own mission that directly conflicts with the party's mission, and she's having trouble with the conflict.

Compare to Kairos's betrayal, which was "all part of Cat's plan", didn't surprise anyone else (except perhaps the newbie RS), advanced the plot... and with his continued rotation, came right around to bitch-slapping the Dead King! Cat's key insight was simply that Kairos is "crazy like a fox" – he may look unpredictable, but he does remember what he's about and what the long-term plan is.

Cold Cyberia

I'm really liking the development of Saint. All of her life she's been fighting evil that would break others to the point where all she sees is schemes of Below. It's probably a defense mechanism as much as it is a belief built from experience. The hope that some villains might also want to build a better world would probably break her at this point.

I think she'll die by landing a killing blow against the Dead King. It's clear there's no place for her in the new world since it requires a modicum of trust and it would be a fitting end.

shveiran

That's the best possible ending for her. I'm not sure that's what she'll get, and that she won't do harm along the way.

Death Knight

Also her realizing that would very likely kill her. Once a Hero starts compromising on their core ideals, they become sloppy and more prone to mistakes which eventually culminates in their death (see W.O.E on Proceran and Heroic Named).

Liliet

I don't think Laurence's core ideal is 'villains are irredeemably evil'. Remember, she already had her Name when she still thought villains could be ok to compromise with. Laurence's core ideal as a hero is protecting others, and I don't think she's going to need to compromise on that.

That is not to say there isn't a lot in her to shatter other than that core ideal =x

shveiran

I don't know, it feels like it has become the fulcrum of her stories though.

Cat's path is one of lesser evils, of making the hard choices and the ugly compromises to try and make the situation a bit less awful.

It sounds like Laurence's has been about madmen, the tragedies they wrought, and the need to put them down.

It's true that in the beginning she didn't have this ideal, but it has been the fulcrum and moral of the struggles she has lived through. More than protection; she has been "Above's executioner" . And she is an old one.

I dunno. It seems that belief is key to her being. To change it would mean she'd need a whole different skillset to deal with problems (to seek alternative solutions, to figure out if a redemption is viable etc). Can she really start anew, after all this time?

I'm really, really curious to see where EE is going with this character, to be honest. It's one of those instances where I can find no good solution, and I'm eager to be shown what I missed. Like so many times before since I found this gem of a series.

Liliet

A fulcrum, but not a core ideal. Yes, if it were to be shattered she WOULD need to pick herself up from a whole lot of very tiny pieces; but it would not destroy her Name.

And yeah SAME

Liliet

> The hope that some villains might also want to build a better world would probably break her at this point.

That they might want it, she's probably perfectly fine with knowing for a fact.

That they might be able to actually achieve it, that they might be right?

Now that...

Mental Mouse

> It's clear there's no place for her in the new world since it requires a modicum of trust and it would be a fitting end.

Compare to the Saint's POV:

> But Catherine Foundling could not have a hand in shaping the world that would come after the ashes settled, lest the old sicknesses carry through to the foundation that would be laid in the ruins of the old order.

One of them has to go. and I'm betting it'll be the burned-out old hand, not the up-and-comer.

shveiran

You have managed to express a concept I've uselessly thrown paragraphs at in a few simple lines.
Thank you

Rook

I don't think it's one or the other, I think it's both.

They're both wartime soldiers, not peacetime builders. The Good King instantly recognized this, and Catherine herself acknowledged that long before the Saint or Pilgrim ever came into the picture. That's why her intention was always to abdicate once the storm passed – she's a necessary evil right now, but in the end she's still an evil.

"... Lest good become the act of striking," the Good King completed, tone approving. "You understand, then. That when your evil is no longer necessary, Black Queen, to linger would be to stray from the narrow path you have tread."

My fingers clenched.

"I know," I croaked out. ..."

The Saint on the other hand is of completely out of place to handle the aftermath even in nations where Good wins the field. She's an eraser of atrocities, both in role and experience, which is useless when there are no atrocities that need to be erased.

Mental Mouse

Well that's the thing, Cat always had a retirement option; Saint never did.

Morgenstern

I'd say theoretically she has. She might not be needed, but not being needed doesn't have to mean you have to fuck off and die. You might simply retire as well, if you can accept that you are no longer needed. I for one am not sure yet that the Saint might not find a way around to that eventually.

Liliet

I mean Saint can always just do what she's been doing and go north to fight rattlings. It's not like there's a shortage of enemies for her to fight =x

Mental Mouse

The big question for Roland is if he managed to retrieve his casting rod, which clearly makes a difference. He's had to defend himself without it for this fight, and that took a lot out of him.

Fayhem

Hmm, Laurence's POV here is leaning me back towards thinking she actually was sincere about her whole "let it burn, what rises from the ashes will be purer for it" spiel to Cordelia; doesn't mean Bard wasn't orchestrating the moment in service of a deeper plot though.

Mental Mouse

Remember, Bard is a major-league manipulator, while Saint is very easy to manipulate.

Raved Thrad

Ah, Archer. She may be a brute, but she's an introspective, perceptive brute. I wonder how having Zeze's kid will change her.

...and having said that, I'm already feeling sorry for the kid.

Liliet

I'm not so sure Indrani's one for pregnancy and childbirth. I see them going the route of Masego's parents and adopting a Gifted kid as much more likely... if they even decided to have children at all, which they'd honestly need the whole Woe to agree to communally raise lmao

Raved Thrad

That kid would either have the best of childhoods, or the worst. Maybe even both.

ByVectron!

If Cat has Blacks soul now, when does she piece him back together? I mean, that seems like a very nice pivot point, yeah?

Liliet

Might happen offscreen... or better, in an interlude 😊

SITB

Is this the second time ever for an Indrani PoV?

(The first being the Fletched extra chapter)

Liliet

...huh.

Yes. Yes, it is.

Daniel E

Although it is customary in stories like this for a main character to die heroically at the end, I sincerely hope all of our Woe get to sail off into the sunset, as it were. That said, if we had to lose somebody, my money is on Hakram or Masego. The right-hand (no hands, lulz) or tormented protagonist are always the ones who get sacrificed.

Mental Mouse

Hakram left this story back at the conclave. And Masego has probably gone immortal, not to mention several people actively trying to save him. Today I think it's the heroes who have all the death flags.

Liliet

I think they mean the entire PGTE.

Interlude: Repurpose

"Mastery is meekness, for it is the observation of what we are intended to hold. It is the art of the suppliant. Only through usurpation can understanding be reached, for anything less is servitude."

– Translation of the Kabbalis Book of Darkness, widely attributed to the young Dead King

Firyal had died screaming, boiling heat washing over her. This she still remembered, sometimes, and in those rare moments of lucidity she knew terror. For while she had once been a mage some skill, the shackles around her soul were like nothing she had ever seen. A trained mind had allowed her to drift out of the dreams, once every few days, long enough to dread the return to that strange slumber where she only saw the life she had lived. Again, and again and again, for some obscure purpose. Perhaps, she had thought, this was one of the Hells. Perhaps she had not looked closely enough at all the bargains she had made, and some devil had gotten the best of her. So Firyal wondered, until she was startled awake by her shackles being ripped away. Freedom tasted sweet, for a moment, before she saw them. Eyes above her, burning and unblinking. As if the sun had been imprisoned in orbs of glass. Unkindly, the eyes peered through the span of her life like a bored scribe skimming a scroll.

"Useless," a calm voice noted. "Pass in peace."

The sun in the eyes died and then there was only oblivion.

–

"This is an abomination," Laurence said. "You know it, Foundling, and would still offer salvation to its architect?"

They'd torn through the last defences surrounding the sanctum like they were parchment, between the Black Queen's knowledge of their lay and Roland's knack for taking down wards, but what had awaited them beyond the luxurious quarters and feast halls was an Evil manifest. At Laurence's feet, like lake water softly lapping at a shore, the translucent and almost shimmering broth of hundreds of thousands of souls was spread out. Above them there was only darkness for a ceiling, whatever foul sorcery was at work here having warped the nature of within into this... sickness. It was silent in here, almost peaceful, and that made the sight of it twice as ghoulish.

"Yes," the Black Queen said.

She had hesitated, the Saint thought, for barely the fraction of a moment. The loyalty of that was laudable but made a sin against Creation by who it'd been offered to. To safeguard a poisoner against consequence was to share in the guilt of the poisonings that would follow.

"Ah, well they were just Praesi," the Tyrant of Helike drawled. "It's not like the Grand Alliance hasn't been having rousing discussions of their wholesale slaughter anyway."

The Saint hadn't known that, not for sure, but then she was not particularly surprised. Tariq's chomping at the bit for them to head to Salia as soon as this was settled now made a great deal more sense. The boy-villain could be lying, of course, but that didn't matter nearly as much as whether or not Foundling would believe him. Laurence's hand casually went down to her sword. There was a pause.

"You're not even lying, are you?" the Black Queen mused, her tone wry.

She often used amusement to cloak her true thoughts, the Saint had noticed.

"An issue to settle when this is done with," Foundling sighed. "Pity for Cordelia Hasenbach is not something I particularly enjoy feeling, Kairos."

Did anyone? Klaus' niece or not, no one claimed the highest office of the Principate without climbing a mound of corpses. Some justly made, but others? Procer had grown into the kind of beast that would devour the best of intentions and taint them simply by being what it was.

"I cannot assure our safety if we wade into that," Roland piped up.

His eyes had never left the lake of souls, fascination and revulsion warring within them. Wizards, Laurence unkindly thought. Even the finest of them were only ever one swell of curiosity away from tumbling down a foul slope.

"I'll be handling that," Foundling said. "Where there is darkness there is night, and so it stands within my dominion."

No, not night, Laurence thought. It was 'Night' she had said, with a subtle ring of power to the word. Some blasphemous dark mirror to the Light? The Saint had believed the Black Queen's strange powers to come from a bargain made with lesser gods in the service of Below, but the sacrilege might run deeper than that.

"And where will we be headed?" Saint flatly asked.

"Why, dearest Laurence, that ought to be obvious," the Tyrant of Helike laughed. "To the throne room, of course."

No one humoured the madman with further reply. The Black Queen's staff struck the ground and before it the souls parted. And so, Laurence thought, it begins.

—

Tariq carried light into the dark, as he had sought to do for most his life.

The sliver of it was enough to push back the silvery sea of souls around the two of them, that tragedy happened and happening. The right to Behold the truth of things, that was the gift that had been bestowed upon him many years ago when he found his own base discernment too feeble a thing to rely on, but there were occasions where it was curse as much as boon. This was one, he thought, for not until the Heavens called him to his rest would the Grey Pilgrim forget this sight: an expanse of shivering souls, wounded and crying out from the sudden brutality of their demise. Shackled to Creation and kept in that torment of a half-existence, sorcerous bindings keeping imprisoned in restless slumber. And where someone else might see only the waters, Tariq... Oh, he could see them all. Every weeping child, every terrified innocent lost to a death they had not even been able to understand. For all that, the Grey Pilgrim did not look away. Someone had to see them, to refuse to avert their eyes. And to free them, when the time came, for this would not be tolerated.

"Huh," Archer said. "So that's what it looks like when your blood is up."

"This place is a blight onto Creation, child," Tariq quietly said. "You are no priestess, but your senses are keen. You must know it as well."

"He wouldn't have let it come to this, if he were in his right mind," she replied. "But that's what you get, when you push monstrously talented practitioner over the edge. They fall, and either they die or they make wings of whatever's at hand at the time."

"The attack on Thalassina is no excuse for this," the Pilgrim sharply said. "It does not exempt the Hierophant from responsibility for this abomination."

"You don't get to make that call," Archer calmly said. "He's not for you to judge, crusader. You take a swing at a nest of vicious diabolists, well, you get shit like this. If he crossed a line in defending his home and family then it's not the enemy that'll discipline him — it's Catherine."

"And if she simply pardons him?" the Peregrine asked.

Hazelnut eyes met his own.

"If you believe that, then your eyesight's worse than I'd thought."

The heartbeat of tension that followed was broken by the flapping of great wings. It startled Tariq into looking up, though he could barely glimpse the shape of the large crow in the gloom until it landed on Archer's extended arm. The pulsing thoughts and feelings of the young woman that he'd been able to behold until that moment were suddenly obscured, as if a shadow was being cast over them. The loss was discomfiting, he'd admit, though that was a paltry thing compared to the black-winged horror perched on young Indrani's arm. Even a casual glance into those night-woven feathers was enough for him to hear distant screams. To smell fresh blood being spilled, as if he was standing by an altar where a throat was being opened. The Ophanim breathed into him and the haunting faded, though like a prowling beast it was not gone – merely held at bay.

"You sure?" Archer said, cocking her head to the side.

She winced before she was even finished speaking, and Tariq noted she never looked directly at the crow.

"I always get stuck with the snippy one," the young woman angrily growled. "Fine, we'll do it. Away with you, bird."

The murder made flesh flew above, and Tariq breathed in sharply when he saw its talons had left bloody marks on Archer's arm. He raised his hand, silently offering healing, but his companion shook her head.

"The Sisters don't really do nice, but they don't bleed people without a reason," she said. "The blood was taken for a reason. Also because I piss them off but Hells at this point it'd a shame to stop."

She did not lack courage, though the Peregrine found it regrettable she chose not to exercise it on worthier pursuits than recklessly provoking lesser deities born of ritual slaughter.

"And what did the Sisters request?" Tariq asked.

"Masego's nearing the end of whatever the Dead King using him for," Archer said. "We can't afford this slow a pace anymore."

"We will hurry, then," Tariq agreed.

Tired as he was, better exhaustion than inaction.

"Ah, you're not getting my drift," the young woman said. "Walking the road won't cut it."

"Your meaning?" the Grey Pilgrim asked.

"Snuff the light," the Archer said, "and stay close to me. We follow the crow."

—

Iblin had been so proud to be called to stand among the ritual even though he was young and not entirely schooled in the proper ways. Yet he had power to spare, and that had been needed most of all, and so among the circles that supported the Lord Warlock he had stood. But then it had... where was he? There'd been a light, a terrible Light, and a voice had Spoken. This was not Thalassina, Iblin realized, this was not Thalassina and — blinding eyes were staring down, releasing a pressure that had been keeping him constrained, and the relief lived only until his soul began suffering examination. Like an insect pinned and open so that the entrails could be looked upon, the last moments of Iblin's life were studied by that burning glare. He screamed, for it was an intrusion unlike any he had felt before. The presence had been calm, at the start, patient. But twice it looked upon the same moment, when the voice had uttered a word and the circle had lost control of the gathered power, and tried to look at the Warlock from where Iblin had stood but found the angle too stilted. The examination grew rougher, forceful, until the grip suddenly loosed.

"Useless," a voice impatiently said. "Leave."

Oblivion fell over Iblin like a blanket.

—

Like children wandering into the woods at night they moved in a line, everyone close enough to the one in front of them to see their back even in the gloom — save for the Black Queen herself, who gazed into the darkness with seeing eyes even where there should be nothing to see. Under their boots the translucent liquid souls turned into solid ground, though only as long as they touched and not an instant more. The Saint had claimed the rearguard, for she would not trust the Tyrant to stand at her back — even if he were truly standing instead of letting himself be carried by his ugly creations. She'd kept an eye on him in case he warmed to the notion of striking at the Rogue Sorcerer's back, whose earlier spoken sympathies had apparently convinced the Black Queen to place behind her. If this was a ploy, Laurence thought, it appeared to be working.

"Catherine," the Tyrant of Helike said, "I've a query, if you would."

"Do you?" the Black Queen replied. "Imagine that."

Laurence noted that their pace quickened at that, limp or not.

"We are being guided by one of your crows, are we not?" Kairos Theodosian mused. "I can almost hear the beat of the wings."

The Saint could not, though she'd felt there was an air of carrion to this abominable place from the start. She'd presumed it to be either the souls of the dead or Foundling's own powers, though, not the presence of some old monster.

"I don't have crows," the Black Queen mildly replied.

She'd not outright denied having a guide, and the Tyrant hacked out a wet laugh.

"And are you not worried, my dear friend, that so wantonly parading pieces of a godhead around the Hidden Horror will have... intriguing outcome?"

"If he wants to catch Sve Noc in the dark," Foundling said, "I can only wish him good luck."

"I thought you might say that," Kairos Theodosian said. "Which is why-"

In a single continuous movement, gathering the power of her Choosing to refine her strength and swiftness, the Saint of Swords unsheathed her blade and thrust it through the back of the Tyrant's throne at the height where his heart would be. Always tempting to go for the neck, with villains, but while clever Damned often had artefacts meant to protect such a weakness they rarely bothered with more than a single layer of enchanted armour over their chest. The blow went straight through the stone and metal, but it was no flesh that was torn through afterwards. Lips thinning with displeasure, Laurence withdrew her blade and let whatever illusion had been laid over the gargoyle shatter.

"Betrayal," the Tyrant called out through the mouth of another gargoyle. "Betrayal most foul!"

The Black Queen turned to gaze upon the mess and Saint took a careful step back. If the confrontation began here, then-

"I really wish you hadn't done that," Catherine Foundling said.

"He was about to turn on us," Laurence flatly replied.

"Yes," she agreed without missing a beat. "But now we turned on him first, and that means-"

Light bloomed in the sky above them, chasing the shadows, and wreathed in a halo the Tyrant appeared – carried by a swarm of chittering gargoyles, seated on what appeared to a measurably gaudier specimen of the throne he'd previously sat on.

"- so viciously scorned, I am left no repose but to meet you all in open and honourable battle," Kairos Theodosian cheerfully announced.

"Komena," the Black Queen murmured in that foreign tongue of hers, "sate."

This time Laurence did feel the devil, or rather her absence – a weight there had been in the air vanished, even as light spread further around the Tyrant of Helike and he revealed what appeared to be a... sword? Saint opened her mouth, but Foundling suddenly extended her staff out in front of her with a glare.

"Do not," she hissed, "accept that beginning."

"What say you, blackguards – if you'll forgive my language – and reprobates?" the Tyrant shouted, openly gleeful. "Will you meet my challenge?"

The Black Queen rolled her shoulder, as if to limber it, and glanced at the rest of them.

"Head for the throne room," Catherine Foundling said. "I'm the only one who can handle what he's about to use, which I suppose is rather the point."

"How will we know the way?" Roland asked.

Foundling pointed at the Tyrant, or rather the light wreathing him.

"You'll be able to see it soon enough," she said. "Get moving. You don't want to be caught in the middle of that."

Laurence's lips thinned.

"The sword," she said. "What is it?"

"In a word?" Catherine Foundling grimaced. "Hierarchy."

—

"Well," Archer said, "that's not good."

Tariq gaze upon the light rising in the distance, chasing away the shadows, and knew that once upon a time the stuff of it had been Light. It had been... twisted, after, but the nature of it was not hidden from his eye. The Ophanim murmured in his ear, angry at the perversion but also worried. This was a weapon, and a dire one.

"The Tyrant of Helike has betrayed them," Tariq grimly said.

"Cat said he'd planned to steal this entire place," the young woman said. "I guess he's settled for making a grab at the souls instead."

"And this does not worry you?" the Pilgrim asked.

"We're nearly there," the Archer shrugged. "Although we're going to lose our guide soon, I suppose. Out in the open in Hierophant's seat of power she'd be meat on the plate."

"That Kairos Theodosian could claim such a great bounty of souls," Tariq clarified.

"Cat's there," his companion replied, eyebrow rising.

As if that settled the matter, as if the Black Queen was a talisman of victory. If it had been blind loyalty or even love, the Grey Pilgrim would not have found it half as unsettling. But it was trust, simple and deep. The kind he had never once seen one of Below's champions so easily extend to another. The Woe defied easy description, in both what had brought them together and what had since bound them.

"Then let us proceed," the Pilgrim said, tucking away his thoughts.

They moved swiftly, pace racing against the distant blooming of the Tyrant's light. And they found their mark, moments before the first rays chased away the lesser god that had been their guide and helper both. The Pilgrim and the Archer stood before a flight of tall stairs, roughly hewn and leading to gates of bronze slightly cracked open. Sorcery pulsed like a living thing, hear, a great heartbeat, and the wisps of it were visible in the air. Upwards they hurried and slipped through the opening and into the Hierophant's last sanctum.

—

Precision.

It had always been about precision, Hierophant dimly remembered, even before this had begun. It was the fundamental failure of humankind, the inexactitude of what it could perceive in a world that was the most finely tuned construct in existence. And so they all puttered about, sometimes blindly feeling out a segment of the greater whole and daring to call it a theory of magic. And Hierophant had been blind as well, was blind still, but in his restlessness he had found what he craved the most: sometimes, just sometimes, he could see it all. Witness it in full. And so the impossible simply became improbable, and now he must fit all the pieces together. Perfectly, or it would be worse than doing nothing at all. There had been a need for tools, and so tools he had gathered.

The souls of Thalassina, the fuel of his work.

Broken Liesse, the foundry from which he would cast salvation.

The Observatory, eyes for where his eyes could not reach.

The secrets of Trismegistus had been of great use in leashing the souls and keeping them at hand, in shattering what he needed of Arcadia and making of it what was required. Souls alone were not enough, no, they were not. And so he had ruined the realm, and from ruin gained mastery – aspect pulsing, breathing, pulsing. It was... unpleasant. His body ached, and so he had withdrawn from it. There were simply too many distractions and the work could not brook those. It needed to be perfect. But it was not, even through the Observatory. He filled the sky to see, to find the shards and reflections of deepest Arcadia, but it was not enough. Muddled, the shards were, inexact. Papa could not be made anew from that. And then it came to him, the understanding. He had the souls, those who had been there in the last moments of it all. He could see through their eyes, and where their own were imprecise bits of flesh his eyes would not fail. Only there were so many, many souls. And who else could he trust with this? No one.

His mind drifted sometimes, moments were lost, but that was as close as Hierophant would suffer to sleep.

The souls did not get him what he needed. Glimpses, yes, but incomplete. Not even his aspect could bridge so broad a gap. But ah, he was not done. Like jigsaw puzzles, those toys someone he could not recall had loved, he took the glimpses and put them together. Fit them until it could all be seen, and then again. All eyes that could be found, for anything less would mean imperfection. Yet distractions came knocking at his door. Vermin wandering through the ruin, armies and travellers. Named, even, that resisted the storms he redirected towards them. Entities, sometimes, and those he spared thought to catching – there was always a need for fuel, for the foundry was ever hungry – but they were slippery things and skilled at hiding in the shadows. Distractions, distractions he could not afford. The essence he extracted from the Hells had bleed and using old arrays he bound devils with it to put in the way of the vermin. No further thought was given than that, for Liesse was high up and defended. But now, now, there was assault. Things crawling in the dark, Named everywhere and even contamination.

Someone was trying to take souls, to rule them through law and faith, and when Hierophant had tried to swat them out of existence he had found the laws resisted him. They disallowed his interference and sunk further into the sea of souls, poison in the well. One of the entities was trying to contain this – and was this not a familiar presence?

No. We cannot afford distractions.

Hierophant had to hurry, yes. Containment would fail, contamination would spread, and it would all be made inexact. The pieces were together, though there would be more. If he kept looking, it would be perfect. As he needed it to be.

It is already perfect. We must hurry, they are trying to break it.

Vermin, vermin everywhere. Yes, it needed to be now. Before it was soiled. It all fell together, dozens and dozens of glimpses he had painstakingly gathered, and when they were all fitted Hierophant breathed out.

“Witness,” he whispered.

It rang out, went out, and then it was caught.

“Yes,” the Dead King whispered fondly into his ear, “now show me what it is that she’s planning. Show me what the Intercessor seeks, Hierophant.”

Caerulea

Vote! (for A Practical Guide to Evil)

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

(Discord:)

<https://discord.gg/3nbsUfZ>

Have a nice day.

Andrew Mitchell

I love the way you get in early with this reminder. ♥

erraticerrata

First update of the month, which means extra chapter. Titled “Miraculous”, it’s from multiple POVs and set immediately after the current arc. As usual, linked in the Extra Chapters tab.

Javvies

Hmmm.

Kairos is up to something tricky, as per usual.

I’m not entirely sure what it is or how it’s supposed to work, though.

Or how Cat's going to stop it.

On the other hand, I'm really not liking that Saint is probably going to get to Masego before Cat can. Or that's what it looks like, anyways.

Interesting, the Dead King wants to know what the Wandering Bard is up to. Can't blame him for wanting to know that, however much he deserves to suffer for the way he's going about finding out.

Well, it seems clear we were more or less right about Masego trying save/recover one or both of his parents.

Laguz

No, he wants to know what her goal is, what is her endgame. Something important but nonessential.

Rook

Understanding the Bard's intent is the furthest thing from nonessential. It's likely the singularly most important possible thing the Dead King could learn, bar absolutely nothing.

The only thing that could realistically threaten an airtight powerhouse like Neshamah is exactly the kind of narrative warfare the Bard trumps everyone at, and the fact that her goals are clouded means it's next to impossible to resist her at all.

We already saw an example of that, how easily she played Black, tricking him into wielding the knife that killed Captain. The greatest Villain of his generation, likely the most genre-saavy one in hundreds of years, and she stepped on him like an ant simply because he didn't know what her goal was.

It's even more disadvantageous for Neshamah to be in the dark. There is no recovering for him when he takes a loss. There is no successor to take up his mantle. Every moment that he doesn't understand her win condition is one where he's in danger.

Andrew Mitchell

Yep. And he's been hunting this knowledge for literal centuries.

Miles

Funny thing is her goal is probably just to make him confused about her goal so he has to play it extra safe and therefore reduce his impact on the world until he can be stopped. The Bard's is who gets sent in when the saint can't get the job done.

Andrew Mitchell

> Funny thing is her goal is probably just to make him confused about her goal so he has to play it extra safe and therefore reduce his impact on the world until he can be stopped.

IMO the DK being confused is, at best, a short term or ancillary goal. The Bard's up to something we just don't know what.

> The Bard's is who gets sent in when the saint can't get the job done.

We've never seen the WB do anything except manipulate others to change how they act in order to manipulate the story and the resulting outcomes. I'm not sure who you're suggesting would be sending her in, and what you'd be expecting her to do. She's not a direct actor, just a manipulator.

Javvies

I have to ask – what story have you been reading where Bard's goals and endgame are nonessential?

Because such a story is very different from the one that everyone else has been reading.

To be fair, most people wouldn't be able to do anything even if they did know and understand what Bard's goals and endgame are. And most people don't even realize that there's anything going on there that is worth paying attention to. I'm not even sure Tariq realizes that Bard has her own agenda.

Nairne .01

Neatly summed up.

Cpt. Obvious

The Bard is an enigma. She's been shown to be working against Evil. It's been suggested that The Wandering Bard is a Name.

Think on that for a moment.

At first glance it would appear that she's a Hero firmly on the side of Good. But is she really?

If we look at some of what we think we know of Names there's one big difference between Heroes and Villains. Villains live until they are killed. They don't age while Heroes grow old and eventually die of old age, or they are killed. And as TWB has been at her game for millennia can she really be a Hero?

While it's possible the Gods above created her before the rules were nailed down I kind of doubt it.

So she's a villain then?

That seems a bit off too. She haven't struck me as having any real villainous qualities. She's lately been aiding Heroes which by itself doesn't mean that much. She's also betrayed them, but then so has Kairos, so that doesn't mean much.

But all in all the pieces doesn't seem to add up for her being either Hero or Villain. Instead I think she's something else entirely.

Perhaps she is one of the gods that set up the game and Creation, but chose to stand apart as a spectator and thus set aside most of her powers. But as you can't observe a process without changing the outcome she's still able to influence Heroes and Villains. Over millennia she's grown dissatisfied with the way the Game is developing and has hatched a plan for how to change it.

Well that doesn't sit right with me. I'm more leaning towards her being something unexpectedly born from Creation. A conscience that's not really aligned with either side of the Game. It might have been a reaction to the Gods interfering with Creation that birthed her. It might be that she's walked Creation and composed the stories are so important. And it might be first the Gods tampering with these stories or later mortals and Names manipulating, subverting or changing these that's caused her to take a more active role. Perhaps she's just bored with the narrative and wants to write a "better" story.

There's a lot of guessing going on here, but I'm pretty sure the Wandering Bard isn't just another Hero or Villain.

Liliet

Apparently the Dead King is as curious about what the fuck "eat the baby" means as us here 😊

Mental Mouse

Actually, Archer and Pilgrim will apparently get to Masego first (via Night), then Saint.

Love Cat's response to Saint's happystab: "~~Idiot... go away!~~" –
> "I really wish you hadn't done that... head for the throne room". Meanwhile Saint is still worrying about the wrong villain....

Soma

Woah, the extra chapter is right after the current one? That seems... different? They all seemed to be from earlier in the story before I thought.

Mental Mouse

Well, it's basically confirmation that Cat's deal held. However, it also suggests that Cat won't get any better deal (or re-bottle DK), if the undead do come back after 3 months.

Liliet

That's why I don't really like the way the last sentence was worded there >x>

Aston W

Thank you.

Caerulea

Vote! (for A Practical Guide to Evil)

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

(Discord:)

<https://discord.gg/3nbsUfZ>

Caerulea

Thank you, WordPress, for choosing to start displaying my previous comment immediately after I posted this one.

In other news, the chapter, and the extra chapter, were very good. I wonder of Maesago's aspect will be disabled by the Hierophant. Also, way to screw up, Saint.

Liliet

(Eh, more is better)

What do you mean Masego's Aspect disabled by the Hierophant?

Caerulea

Hierarch, goddamn it. As in, he 'puts it on trial' or something, and it is judged guilty, or whatever he does to attack things that really shouldn't be attacked, and Masego losses it for a bit.

Liliet

oooooh

Rook

I feel like the Hierarch won't necessarily be in conflict with masego at all. In terms of intent the Hierophant is currently more concerned with unraveling the mysteries of creation rather than changing the lay of it in the first place.

If the Hierarch is a jury, the Hierophant is a witness. They may get along surprisingly well.

shveiran

I feel like I'm missing something; you and others seem to assume that Hierarch has an agenda, but that confuses me. Isn't it the whole point of his character that he doesn't have one? Aggressively so?

He seems less of a jury per se and more of a "revolutionary jury".

Dangerous for sure, but without a plan for what it will do tomorrow or even after lunch.

I don't see how he can be in conflict with anyone aside from "the Hierarch is a dangerous madman and must be removed" (AKA Monster of the week) or "I'm/My loved ones are currently sharing a geographical location with the Hierarch, ain't that a bother".

Holding the gods accountable is really more Kairos' plan than the Hierarch. Andraxes doesn't DO plan. Schemes are the work of Foreign Despots and against the Will of the People.

Rook

Hierarch hasn't been an aloof observer since the end of book 3. He started out that way, yes, but he's been making his own moves ever since he was provoked by the bard.

Putting Hanno and the choir of Judgement on trial, in particular, was something that was decided on by his own volition after getting his aspect of Receive, not a Kairos plot he was forced into.

Book 3 epilogue:

““Your own fucking Gods will bleed you like a pig,” the Wandering Bard hissed.

“Then they, too, will be hanged,” Anaxares noted. “As honorary citizens of the Republic, they are subject to its laws.”

“You-“

“Aoede of Nicae, I charge you with treason,” he said, rising to his feet. “Collaboration with foreign oligarchs and agitation in the name of wretched tyrants.”

...

He left the alley, the quarter, the city until he found the boy awaiting him. Kairos Theodosian took one look at him and laughed, his red eye burning. ...”

Book 4 epilogue:

“The visions came to his eyes and ears on the wind, unbidden and unwanted. He could only Receive them.

...

most importantly of all, on some barren shore, a knight in white stood with his sword high. A killer who had taken lives, but never at his own behest. Behind him, looking through a coin, something unfathomable loomed. The Seraphim, Anaxares thought. The Choir of Judgement. The angels who had judged and slain people of the League.

The Hierarch smiled.

For that, they would be judged in turn.”

shveiran

Does it count as an agenda if you don't act on it?
I agree he would judge the gods given a chance, but what did he actually do to pursue that goal? It really seems like he is just along for the ride to me.

doominator10

:0

AdrianGrey

Wait, Catherine called the sword “Hierarchy”. What on earth? I mean, it obviously refers to Hierarch, but how? Pilgrim said it was giving off corrupted Light, but Hierarch is an Evil name. And how could the blade have anything to do with Hierarch's power in the first place? What the hell is going on?

doominator10

What is Hierarchy, if not Order taken to it's most extreme and damned? Isn't Good all about law and order?

erebus42

It can be, though not necessarily. Lawful Evil and Chaotic Good exist for a reason after all. Though in this case, Heirarch's whole thing is about putting even the Gods on trial, so seizing the means of salvation is kinda on brand for him.

Andrew Mitchell

This isn't D&D and that alignment system does not apply.

luminiousblu

That doesn't mean that Good has anything to do with law and order, though. The most explicit forms of law and order in terms of government are slavery and empire, and both of those are cleanly on the Evil side of things. The nominally Good regions include Callow, which we know had a pretty ineffective way of rulership, Procer, which barely has a cohesive set of laws based as it is on the HRE, and the Golden Bloom, which may not even have a government as we envision it considering every elf is a world unto himself.

erebus42

No it is not but the ideas behind them do apply. There's nothing inherently Good or Evil about Order and Chaos (though many seem to forget that). Law and Order can be forged into tyranny, while chaos and rebellion can be used to help others.

Ravenfrost

I belive there was a demon traped by masego who could bend phisical and metaphisical laws. A demon of hierarchy.

luminiousblu

Good's got shitall to do with law and order and hierarchy isn't order taken to its most extreme, order is hierarchy taken to its most extreme. All order implies a hierarchy, by definition the concept of that which is above and that which is below. It's more basic than Good/Evil.

werafdsaew

The League do have priests, and they're with the Hierarch. So maybe the Light comes from the League priests and is twisted by Hierarch's faith in the laws?

Andrew Mitchell

Makes sense!

konstantinvoncarstein

Yes, Catherine found that the priests of Atalante were with the Hierarch.

werafdsaew

The Hierarch has the League priests with him. The Light is then twisted by his faith in the laws?

Rook

The current Hierarch is a Neutral Name, not an Evil one. Likely the only currently existing one of its kind. The Bard herself confirmed as much, when she tried to force him to pick a side and was set back when he refused.

The essence of it in the first place is exactly what the name implies – it controls authority and ranking. Of course it can do something as trivial as wresting authority of some minor power from Above or Below.

The place it was spawned from mirrors this as well, in Bellerophon giving Below a vote. That isn't some honor laid at Belows feet or worship towards them, it's an attempt at usurpation of their authority. Placing them at eye level of everyone else instead of the pedestal above them that it normally occupies.

Tl;dr Hierarchy isn't Evil or Good. It's the highest form of blasphemy towards both.

shveiran

> Hierarchy isn't Evil or Good. It's the highest form of blasphemy towards both.

I think you meant THIS Hierarch? I don't think the previous one was from Bellerophon, and it doesn't sound like she was mad or blasphemous either.

Rook

Lol that's what I already said in the first line of the post you're quoting

Liliet

Atalantean priests.

And metaphysically speaking, Hierarch is a Neutral Name.

Death Knight

There's no such thing as a Neutral Name. There are only degrees of alignment. I believe the Hierarch is A Good Name. Only he takes what Above preaches (abide by the rules or be punished and what not) and applies that to everyone, Gods included.

Liliet

>There's no such thing as a Neutral Name. There are only degrees of alignment.

Source?

The first time Neutral Names came up, it was Indrani telling Cat not all Names are clear cut at Marchford. It has come up since that Ranger is not quite a villain, and of course, when Bard came to talk to Hierarch, she came to ask him his alignment.

Oh, and we have WoG that you can't get a Heroic Name while worshipping Below, so there's that.

Javvies

The so-called "Neutral Names" are Names that can be powered by both Above and Below – Names that can be both Heroic or Villainous, depending on the current bearer of the Name.

But any given instance of a Name is always aligned to either Above or Below. Even if the previous holder of that Name was aligned to the other side.

Rook

In general true, but the Hierarch is an exception. The reason the Bard was talking to him at all when she suffered her loss was because he was refusing to comply to that rule.

“I abstain,” he said.

The woman sighed.

"That's not how it works," she told him, as if he were a witless child. "Right now you're sucking at the teat but you're not swallowing. There's always a side picked, Anaxares. Always."

...

'Anaxares studied the woman for a long moment then shook his head.

"I do not answer to your Gods," he said. "They drew no lots and hold no appointment."

Something like surprise flickered across the woman's face.

"You're Named," she reminded him.

"I am citizen of the Republic of Bellerophon," he replied.

"You were created with purpose," the Bard said flatly. "Fulfil it."

"This purpose was not voted upon by the People," Anaxares said. "I do not recognize it. Forcing it upon me is unlawful."

But of a long argument they had there, not going to quote the whole thing. But the subject of the argument is pretty clear, and more importantly the Bard actually lost. Anaxares successfully picked no side at all.

Liliet

Again, source?

My impression is that a distinction needs to be made between political and metaphysical alignment. They can't be in blatant contradiction, but political alignment is more polarized while metaphysical alignment strikes me as much more of a permissive gradient, with an accomodating middle for Names whose bearers can switch sides multiple times a week if they want without their Role losing any skin.

(And that's separate from Names that can be instantiated as belonging to either side metaphysically, like how Cat's Name of Squire was definitely metaphysicall Evil, and did not take it well when she let a hero go. Squire can be anything, but Cat was an Evil Squire; meanwhile Thief could be whatever she liked without her Role giving a shit)

shveiran

The current Hierarch is the second person ever to bear the mantle of that Name.

If I'm not mistaken, the previous one was the founder of the League, and was not Evil.

It seems Hierarch is a Neutral name, tied more to the land it rules than the axis of Good and Evil. Like Ranger, Hunter, Archer and so on and so forth. They are a minority in The Guideverse, but they do exist.

Soma

Giving the Dead King a look into the Bard seems like... well, one could call it a bit of a sticky situation, I suppose.

shveiran

Right? I mean, on one hand capitalizing on what he does against her is pretty much the only possible way to realistically score a point against the Intercessor. On the other hand... the opposite may be true, so maybe he shouldn't be allowed to get that insight? How can a situation be a lose-lose and a win-win at the same time!

erebus42

Once more Lawrence screws over both herself and her allies.

Did Kairos turn Heirarch into a sword?

What have Masego and the Dead King discovered about the Wandering Bard's nefarious plans?

And what sort of fuckery does Cat have up her sleeve?

Find out next time on A Practical Guide to Evil!

antoninjohn

Well at least Masego learnt a whole lot about magic, that's going to make him a lot more dangerous when he teams up with Cat against that backstabbing "Grand Alliance"

Joy Liner

CALLING IT NOW masego is a revenant and doesn't realize it yet

Andrew Mitchell

Interesting idea and it will be fascinating if true. I don't think it's at all likely to be the case.

Morgenstern

Seems more like a bodyless soul, if anything. He kinda left his body behind after all and is now just "drifting for a few moments" instead of actually sleeping, like those souls in this chapter seemed to do.

1224

Hmmm. Lot's of players in this game. Smells like a recipe for chaos and we all know Cat's good at exploiting that.

Naeddyr

I can't believe Tyrant betrayed the party so quickly.

Andrew Mitchell

Technically, he tricked Laurence into betraying him so, to some extent at least, the story will be on his side.

Oshi

No he tricked Laurence into providing him the excuse to unsheathe a "Light" blessed weapon granted to him by someone of honor. He forced a duel.

shveiran

I must say, I AM SURPRISED this time. I was kind of expecting a betrayal before the conclusion of the arc, but not THIS soon. Come on, Kairos! If you do it this often you'll cheapen the tension!

edrey

so the bard's plan is what the DK seek, really mad, great kairos taking the souls should also include that king of callow, that looks like a bigger plan

Liliet

I don't think he can.

Oshi

This is...bad.

konstantinvoncarstein

Isn't it always so? 🙄

IDKWhoitis

I love how the Woe know that Cat will fix it, it's really only a matter of how many limbs have to be chopped off and how loud the swearing will get before it's done.

To a Hero, this is the same level of faith they place in Above.
To a Villain, this is what is expected of oneself.
To the Woe, they pray at the altar of Cat.

Thea

I worry for Zeze... so many ways this can go where he doesn't make it in the end, even if Cat manages to stick it to all sides.

Does she have some levers to pull? Lives he still owes her? Two prior cases of saving him from himself, making this the blessed third one? I only remember one...

luminiousblu

I hope he dies honestly

If he makes it out of this one it'll reek of asspull, and Cat is long overdue actually losing something for real. Nauk was a nobody, Nilin barely existed before he croaked, Kilian disappeared almost four books ago, and Black clearly isn't dead yet and didn't feature prominently for a good long time anyway.

werafdsaew

Why do you want to watch major characters die? Would you rather read tragedies instead?

luminiousblu

Because it turns out some bitterness is due when Cat's entire thing is moaning about how much this journey is costing her. The story isn't a classical triumphalist tale and I'm sort of sick of Cat pretending everything is so hard when at this point the golden luck of heroes seems to be shining on her too. It's tough to take her seriously when the fact of the matter is that the heroic privilege is also known as protagonist plot armour, and she's been using that in spades.

shveiran

I can kind of see where you are coming from.

To me, it doesn't feel that way because EE is very good at making us see how Cat sees the bodies left in her wake as real losses. Sure, they didn't have names, but I feel their weight nonetheless because she does so keenly.

But... I guess I see what you are coming from. A named death would be a symbolic wound.

I don't particularly want one, but... I guess it would serve some purpose.

luminiousblu

It's hard for me to think of them as real losses when it's pretty clear that they were introduced solely to BE said losses. I find Catherine's moral framework unconvincing, which is worse than just being hypocritical, and I find it tough to sympathise with her on any level, or even cheer for her wholeheartedly these days.

Sometimes it feels like EE has fallen into the trap of making everyone but the main character a total dumb fuck in order to make the main character look smart. Clearly, after all, we're not meant to think that Laurence, or Pilgrim, or whoever actually has a point. Even when Catherine herself wavers I find myself unconvinced at how one-sided the actual narrative treats it where Catherine is right, and everyone who opposes her is either sadly mistaken or an aggressively stupid moron who's generally also presented as morally lacking. The best parts of the story are when EE writes about anyone but Cat, past Second Llesse.

Aaron

> Clearly, after all, we're not meant to think that Laurence, or Pilgrim, or whoever actually has a point.

Whaaaaaat? Every time we get a look in their heads we get hammered with the rightness of their position in the general case and their clear-sighted analysis of the current situation in the specific case.

Rook

I found that a very strange statement too, since there's been massive amounts of debate in the comments section over the Saint/Pilgrim's justifications for like the last 20 chapters.

From what I've seen there's actually a fairly even division most of the time, which is a strong indicator of the writing containing nuanced and multifaceted antagonists, not the opposite.

Andrew Mitchell

Good point.

luminiousblu

The overall narrative. Everyone obviously thinks that they're justified, there's not a single person who doesn't think that they're doing the right thing considering their personal situation because if they did they'd stop. Even Akua thought she was justified when we got to see her point of view.

That doesn't mean that the flow of the story supports them, considering Laurence's stubbornness makes things worse and worse with barely any upside while Tariq, for all his goodness in the flashbacks, is portrayed almost as an old fogey trying to meddle where he doesn't belong and being too stubborn to see the other side of matters.

Thea

Nauk, John Farrier and the Gallowborne weren't just introduced as sacrificial pieces. Their stories could've gone tons of other places, too. Although I admit that Nauk's end was drawn out, but that may have been due to changes in the script cutting down on his screen time. We may never know.

As for Catherine only fighting idiotic assholes and ultimately victims to her greatness... No. Many generic heroes are kinda blind, but that's a point. Saint and Pilgrim are used to show different angles and there is a proper conflict of ideals going on there. We just mostly see or from Cat's side and empathize with her point of view. From another, the restoration of Good Callow and the Grand Alliance might look much better than the insult the former is for Cat... but that's but this story, is it?

luminiouslu

I wasn't talking about Nauk, John Farrier, and the Gallowborne, which are actual characters (or in the last case a group of them), mostly talking about Liesse which is literally a case of a million deaths is a statistic. A hundred thousand deaths is, well, okay for starters it's not even that many people during a war between two large states – Hannibal snuffed out almost as many in one battle, and Bai Qi buried alive anywhere between that number and four times as many. But even if it were a lot it's hard to give a damn when we're not really shown any reason to care. What difference does it really make if it were a hundred thousand and a hundred million?

As for Nauk and John Farrier, the problem I see with treating them like 'real' losses is that Nauk hasn't been relevant since at LEAST when he got his brains melted and really hasn't done anything important since maybe, eh, Battle of Marchford? while John Farrier was a nobody and mainly a stand-in for the Gallowborne as a whole, a sort of common Callowan if you will, whose role was fairly rapidly replaced by Abigail. While I see how in-universe Catherine was probably attached to those, I find it difficult to sympathise because at the end of the day they were highly marginal characters who had overstayed their plot relevance (especially Nauk – John Farrier's death could be symbolic of how little a single unnamed person, even a decent one, actually matters when you're up against things from the latter half of the monster manual, but Nauk dying "again" can't be taken seriously because he was clearly there only to either die again or to be miraculously revived, those were the only two plays left for him to make)

Saint and Pilgrim have different angles. So, in fact, do William and Akua. Heck you should've used Cordelia, who possibly has the most brutally pragmatic line of thought in the series. My point, though, is that Saint and Pilgrim are not actually vindicated by the plot most of the time. Saint thinks she's right in much the same way Doomguy probably thinks he's right or Todd Howard imagines himself to be a saint, while Pilgrim, who doesn't get quite as one-sided of a rap, is still shown to be mostly too stubborn for his own good and somehow a meddler. You could delve into the mind of literally anyone and they'd mostly come off as justified. Masego imagines himself justified right now, because the souls are already dead and he's helping them pass on anyway in his search for daddy. That's clearly, however, not what the plot is looking to say.

shveiran

I'm confused.

It seems to me you are saying that the characters are diversified and coherent in their own perspective, but you have a problem with the fact that the plot tends to show the protagonist as being right.

Is that a good summary?

Because if so... I don't get it.

I mean, the protagonist strives to radically change the world. How can the conflict NOT be about people resisting that change? And you too seem to believe that the antagonist are coherent in their resistance, so that's not the problem.

You dislike the fact that... the plot shows the protagonist's goal is something we can get behind? I'm sorry, I don't get it. Why would you want the plot to show the main stakes are not significant or desirable? It would be really hard for me to feel for the protagonist if she was shown to be a madwoman.

Mental Mouse

From different POVs, we get looks at various characters' ideas of why they're right. The point is to compare the different perspectives, and realize that there really is a fundamental conflict. It's not simply that one or another is "right", but their basic goals are in conflict.

I'd The real hidden bias is on the readers' side: Most of us belong to an aggressively pluralistic society which supports individual achievement and self-determination. This gives us a clear bias as to what character we favor. 😊

luminiousblu

Which again isn't my point. Yes, there is a strong reader bias, which you can see when there's a Pilgrim chapter and everyone is up in arms over him doing something Catherine does too. Obviously there are different points of view being given, my point is that the overall structure and flow of the story makes it clear who is "right". After all, Laurence is being portrayed as a hothead who makes things worse for everyone more often than not here. We're TOLD that she's sort of emotionally scarred and that she's helped so many people before but we barely see any of it.

Andrew Mitchell

> the actual narrative treats it where Catherine is right, and everyone who opposes her is either sadly mistaken or an aggressively stupid moron who's generally also presented as morally lacking.

It's almost like you're reading a different book. I do understand the issue that you're talking about, having seen it in other books but I don't think the issues you're describing apply to PGtE very much, if at all. IMO EE has done a marvelous job building my understanding of, and often sympathy for, many of the characters opposing Cat. I see them act intelligently based on their world view and the information they have.

luminiousblu

Just because you understand the worldview of others doesn't mean you're meant to sympathise with them nor does it mean they're presented as not complete gibbering imbeciles. Based on their worldview is right, but the problem is that 90% of the Named world apparently follows a worldview that borders on objectively wrong.

Andrew Mitchell

90% hold worldviews that "borders on objectively wrong". That's a pretty strong claim and I can't see it myself.

Could you give me a specific character (that's not Saint or Perigrine, they've been discussed a lot already) and explain what it is that makes you hold that view for that specific character?

I'm genuinely attempting to understand your view.

werafdsaew

If you don't like the main character it's hard to see how you can truly enjoy this work. Why don't you just stop reading?

luminiousblu

>h-heh don't raise any criticisms, just stop reading
lmao
End yourself

werafdsaew

You know what happens when I don't like the main character? I read something else.

shveiran

Aside from the fact that the "end yourself" is really uncalled for between people discussing fiction, so please don't...

... the point remains that this isn't any criticism. To me, and I'm guessing werafdsaew by his comment, this is what PGtE is about: an original world trapped in an inescapable conflict by a clever twist on the Good-Evil tropes.

You seem to feel that the conflict is forced by the author through character stupidity or stubbornness, and I am honestly at a loss as to why you'd want to read a book you feel is written that way.

This is not me saying you can't post criticism, just me wondering what it is that you enjoy in a story that you portray has having forced conflicts and no real stakes.

werafdsaew

To the contrary. The Dead King got getting what he wants, and he also made an agreement to not harm him. So unless the Saint decides to turn on Zeze no-one is even trying to kill him.

Morgenstern

If I remember correctly, he only agreed he wouldn't kill him. Doesn't mean he will relinquish control or that he wouldn't cut his soul out or that Zeze isn't already dead or ... or ... or... 😊

Liliet

Actually he opened negotiations with "you will receive guarantees as to the Hierophant's life" which is generic enough it doesn't really leave room for Overly Specific Wording. The Dead King is interested in upholding the spirit and not just the letter of the deal here, too, because it's his guarantee that next time he will be bargained with too (instead of just losing to attrition over centuries with people willing to let everything they love burn but not listen to a single word from him)

Mental Mouse

The big thing Cat might be able to do is to interrupt the Dead King's control of him. That said, it's a bad sign that both the party and DK are all "hurry up!"

Hakurei06

>Crow Goddess >Murder
GODSDAMMIT EE

Wait, Cat is a priestess of murder.
ahaHAHAGH- khgh... grh ... h ...

Cold Cyberia

This really highlights the priorities of immortals. Knowing what your opponent wants is key because if you live forever you always have the luxury of starting over later down the line. Like shooting in the dark, if you have eternity it doesn't matter how many times you fail you'll eventually hit the target even if the odds are tiny. This applies to Bard in particular because unlike villains she doesn't even have a seat of power which makes removing her resources a temporary measure.

It's also why Kairos is such a dangerous opponent. Wish allows him to see the innermost desires of the people he sees (among other things) which is essentially half the battle if you're fighting against a beings like Wandering Bard and Dead King. Really enjoyed this chapter!

Cold Cyberia

Side note: I'm surprised Hierophant can't beat Hierarch in a straight up metaphysical fight, especially since he has already fought (and learned from) the Beast of Hierarchy. First time I've noticed the connection but I'm wandering if this is where Anaxares is going. A being that's adjacent to Gods, like the demons, rather than working within their framework.

Side note 2: Bard has now been deeply involved in both instances of the new deities we see. She was elbow deep in Sve Noc, both through the sisters and Cat obtaining her mantle + she was directly responsible for the Hierarch as a Name but also talking to Anaxares. Still not sure if this is part of a grand plan or if she takes the Bob Ross approach of no mistakes; only happy accidents.

Nairne .01

She most definitely wants people to think Bob Ross has been her collaborator in a lot of instances.

ninegardens

Pretty sure the current Hierarch is totally NOT in her plan (she even stated as such), and it will be interesting to see how that pans out.

She may have adapted her plan SINCE then.

ninegardens

Gotta say, I love the fact that the italics in Zeze's seciton isn't HIS thoughts:

"No. We cannot afford distractions."

"It is already perfect. We must hurry, they are trying to break it."

Aotrs Commander

Excellent job, Saint, fucking everything up as usual because you are incapable of actual thought, even less so than ACTUAL swords.

How has she lasted this long being this stupid again?

Liliet

I'd love to see you do better in her place.

Laurence acted like a smart person with reflexes honed by a lifetime of not letting villains finish their sentences.

>“Sixty-seven: putting an arrow in a villain during their monologue is a perfectly acceptable method of victory. Heroes believing otherwise do not get to retire.”

>— Two Hundred Heroic Axioms, unknown author

This is from a Kairos chapter, too.

>The boy grinned, red eye burning.

>“I am the Tyrant of Helike,” he said. “Dead or not, they are in my service.”

>The villain’s sceptre pulsed gold and made a sound like a gong ringing. Hazy silhouettes formed in ranks in front of him. Soldiers, all of them. Ranks upon ranks filled the room and they unsheathed their swords, strung their bows. Lances were raised and horses whinnied.

>“Shit,” Hedge cursed to herself. “We got monologued. Never let them finish the monologue, Hedge, that’s how they get you.”

Laurence acted prudently, she simply lacked information / deep insight into this specific situation and how exactly it differs from average that Catherine had.

Mental Mouse

> she simply lacked information / deep insight into this specific situation and how exactly it differs from average

Well, that’s the thing, almost always has been: Cat and the intrigues around her, are intrinsically outside of Saint’s expertise (and comfort zone).

Liliet

Yep.

I get somewhat annoyed when people act like this makes her a complete idiot / an incompetent hero / ‘how did she survive so long’. By stabbing more preemptively is how

Rook

Agreed, the Saint is actually quite sharp (no pun intended) as far as sword arms go. She just happens to be the only muscle stuck in a four way fight between master schemers that are all at the top of their field.

In many ways she is basically ‘Practical Good’ as far as gritty avenging Heroes go. Doesn’t listen to monologues, willing to fight dirty when needed, kills villains before their plots come to fruition, doesn't rely on external tools, never underestimates the enemy, never indecisive in a crisis, wary of betrayals from within, etc....

She's also narratively saavy to an extent, although right now she's quite outclassed. Most Heroes wouldn't be able to easily tell that the Good King's mini crusade was too clean of a story to last, or read when they Pivot is approaching like she just did.

Liliet

Mhm! ^^

shveiran

You know, I still dislike her as a character, but these are all valid points; some of which I didn't consider before. Nicely done.

Andrew Mitchell

Honestly, this one's on Cat as far as I'm concerned. She could easily have told the Saint:

"Look, Karios is going to betray us, it's what he does. And I have a counter ready, but he actually needs to betray us first. If you've got an opportunity for a preemptive swing at him, DON'T take it or you'll put us on the wrong side of the story."

shveiran

And Saint would have trusted her this time because...

Liliet

When exactly would she have done this? They were in Kairos's earshot the entire time, considering gargoyles and illusions.

Tohron

At first I thought the Dead King just wanted to see the godhead Warlock had been shown, but this is interesting too.

Andrew Mitchell

I thought that was his aim too. But EE really surprised me with the Dead King's focus on the Bard. I makes perfect sense in retrospect, I wish I was i

Andrew Mitchell

I wish I was smart enough to have guessed that in advance.

Death Knight

There's no such thing. EE confirmed as much.

I'd say the Hierarch is a Good Name since he champions law and order, something Above is implied to preach in the Book of All Things. The only difference is that the Hierarch believes that not even the Gods Above are exempt from their own laws and will hold them to account. Below as well. The other commentor was correct when they said that Hierarchy is the highest form of blasphemy.

Liliet

>There's no such thing. EE confirmed as much.

I'm guessing this is a reply to me about Neutral Names?

Can you give a source on this? When did EE say that?

Cold Cyberia

I don't think there's a direct quote but the story very much frames Names as a choice between Good and Evil. We are told they are given by the gods, i.e. Bestowal. Bard said that in the end you have to chose a side when she was talking with Anaxares. Since Creation is a battleground between the gods and Named are their soldiers there's no impetus for a neutral party with a possible exception of WB.

Even people that are closest to being neutral champion the philosophy of their gods. Ranger being a pure expression of individualism (Below) and Hierarch being a pure expression of conformity (to laws of man) and community. Granted, it's not so clear cut and they do warp the power to be their own but I think they are still technically a villain and a hero.

Speaking more broadly, it would be supremely unsatisfying if "just be neutral" was a solution to a conflict that spans the literal fabric of existence. Per EE, much more advanced nations (Kingdom Under, Yan Tei) struggled with the problem of coexistence between villains and heroes. If being neutral was a valid solution I think they would've employed it.

shveiran

This is a valid point, but an alternate explanation would be that only a few Names can actually be neutral. That wouldn't really have such harsh consequences.

Liliet

>but the story very much frames Names as a choice between Good and Evil.

Political, not metaphysical. The distinction is worth making. You're not allowed to not pick a side unless you're personally Ranger. That was Bard's point to Anaxares.

"Just be Neutral" is

- 1) not something you get to pick: Neutral Names are skill-based ones, or results of weird shit like the League of Free Cities which is a mixed Good/Evil polity. Anyone who gets a Name from any other kind of story is stuck with the metaphysical alignment they get (ie Cat was an Evil Squire regardless of her personal theological opinions);
- 2) not something you're allowed to stick to: Bard came to say hi to Hierarch, and everyone else ends up being drawn into the conflict / aligned with one side or another whether they want to or not. I bet Vivienne didn't mean to formally change alignment from hero to villain when she accepted Cat's deal, she just ended up stuck with everyone else applying the label to her;
- 3) still possible, if you're fucking Ranger. Who teaches heroes and villains both, and has been remarked as not being technically a villain despite her past association with the Calamities. Archer was Neutral too, until she was formally associated with the Woe.

(Which gave her a political label, but did not change the fact her Name is Neutral and her Role doesn't give a shit which side she's on and doesn't have either specifically heroic or specifically villainous tropes built into it)

Also, I don't get the impression that the advanced nations struggle with the coexistence of Bestowals from Above and Below. They seem to have figured it out just fine.

Javvies

Ranger is (and always was) a Villain. Technically. But very nonstandard. And since she's both not the Classical Evil type out to do Evil for the sake of Evil, and insanely personally powerful, plus lives in an inhospitable spot in the middle of nowhere ... she's not exactly high on the list of priorities for most Heroes to go after.

Though IIRC, somewhere Saint thinks about having gotten owned by Ranger but not being considered worth killing.

Archer(Indrani) was also always a Villain. Technically. But, again, a nonstandard one.

Ranger and Archer are both Villains because their take on their Names is one about personal freedom and not needing to listen to the rules other people play by. They don't care about "the greater good", they care about themselves, even more than they care about their friends.

That is, their Names are empowered by Below, because they earned Names by their own merits and their personal philosophies/outlooks on life are in line with Below's stance of "do whatever you want to do, as long as you don't complain about the consequences".

In D&D terms, they're more or less Chaotic Neutrals. But in the Guideverse, Chaos is Below.

Liliet

>Ranger is (and always was) a Villain. Technically. But very nonstandard.

Source?

Like, I acknowledge that that's what you think. But I think otherwise.

>Archer(Indrani) was also always a Villain. Technically. But, again, a nonstandard one.

Is that so?

>"They're in range, for you?" I asked.

>"Sweetcheeks," she grinned. "There's not a damn thing in any world that isn't."

>It was talk like that that had me believing the ochre-skinned woman wasn't a villain. None of us who'd managed to live this long would so willingly dip down hubris and slip it too much tongue.

Politically, Indrani is a villain because she stands with Cat. Metaphysically, she's Neutral enough that the 'hubris punished' tropes don't apply to her.

>That is, their Names are empowered by Below, because they earned Names by their own merits and their personal philosophies/outlooks on life are in line with Below's stance of "do whatever you want to do, as long as you don't complain about the consequences".

I don't accept that as a workable definition of 'affiliation with Below', because this category would also include... Thief, Hunter, Hedge Wizard, Rogue Sorcerer...

>But in the Guideverse, Chaos is Below.

I disagree. From the point of view of rulers, priests and everyone else who is not another Named, Heroes are very much a force of chaos, with a tendency to break established systems that they don't like and leave behind ruins for someone else to rebuild from. (That was kind of Cat's issue with heroes trying to liberate Callow, remember?)

Law/Chaos are neutral in Guideverse. Good/Evil tend to correspond to Above/Below but aren't closely tied to because Above and Below are political sides, which inevitably muddles the waters.

Javvies

Good and Evil isn't the real conflict between Above and Below. Good and Evil are just labels, and Above has a better PR game because they can actively coordinate between their Named.

The real conflict of Guideverse is between letting people figure things out on their own, or telling them what to do and how to do it. Chaos and Order, more or less. And, respectively Below and Above.

Above is called Good and Above because they have an inherent PR advantage in coordinating between one generation and the next and between one Named and the Next, plus they have an organized religion for their cause.

Below got saddled with being Below and Evil because they are hands off, and only get involved when actively requested to involve themselves and only do so to a relatively limited extent, governed by to what extent the requester earned divine intervention.

There are no metaphysical Neutrals.

There are Names that can be empowered by either Above or Below, but each instance of such a Name is always empowered by one or the other, and it can easily change between instances.

And it's probably a helluva lot easier for one of the "Neutral Names" to be less traditional in their behavior for being a Hero or Villain, to ride the line more easily, without upsetting their Name. Especially if your Name is about personal abilities/skills.

Archer is a nontraditional Villain, as is Ranger. Archer can get away with flaunting her talent/taunting hubris about her ability with a bow because that's the essence of her freaking Name. She's the Archer – it's what she does. If it has to do with archery, she's one of the best in the world at it. It's a self-reinforcing feedback loop. Being really good at archery contributed to her becoming the Archer, which made her better at archery. Showing off how good she is at archery just further reinforces her Name. Especially since it's really hard for a Narrative counter to “I’m really good at archery” except in ways that themselves reinforce that she’s good at archery – that is, things that require something other than archery to overcome. She’s explicitly not a Hero. Go back to the siege of Marchford – she says that she can’t do much about the demon, that takes a Hero, ie, Hunter.

...

Are we seriously having the discussion about the so-called Neutral Names again?

IIRC, we had it way back in book 2/3. And I’m pretty sure that at some point EE weighed in with confirmation about the nature of the so-called “Neutral Names”.

Can’t remember exactly where/when, though.

*We referring to the community in general, not anyone in specific.

shveiran

I kind of agree with your vision of the conflict between the gods, but that is about the players, not the pawns.

Above has a vision for the world, and empowers people that shape the world accordingly.

Below wants to see what happens if determined people get magical power to enact their own vision.

You can argue one is Law and the other Chaos (though honestly, I think it is more complicated than that and those words have too much baggage attached, so I’m not sure it helps having a clear discussion) but even if you do, that is just the gods.

A ruler is not about chaos, no matter who powers him or her.

A brigand is not about rules or the big picture, no matter who fuels his or her name.

About Neutral names, I have only started reading comments after catching up with the Guide.

I have not seen that comment, and if you can recall where it was I’d be very grateful.

I don’t think that point is made very clear in the novel, however. Squire and Hierarch certainly works how you describe, but while we know Hunter was a Hero I really didn’t get that Ranger and Archer were Villains.

Liliet

There is nothing like that in the Word of God compilation google doc. Probably never made it there; incidentally, it would be awesome for more than just this discussion if you could find/link the quote you're talking about 🙄

What is there, however, is this:

>Evil Names thrive on conflict, by their very nature

>The Squire Role isn't always Evil, no. It largely depends on who they'll be squiring for, though anyone squiring for Black is going to be Evil. Catherine taking the shortcut he offered made that a done deal: since he effectively used his own Name to kickstart hers, there's going to be bleed over in several ways.

>The influence of the gods is usually on the subtle side. You're right that Evil Roles usually let people do whatever they feel like doing – that's because they're, in that sense, championing the philosophy of their gods. Every victory for Evil is a proof that that philosophy is the right path for Creation to take. Nearly all Names on the bad side of the fence have a component that involves forcing their will or perspective on others (the most blatant examples of this being Black and Empress Malicia, who outright have aspects relating to rule in their Names). There's a reason that Black didn't so much as bat an eyelid when Catherine admitted to wanting to change how Callow is run. From his point of view, that kind of ambition is entirely natural. Good Roles have strict moral guidelines because those Names are, in fact, being guided: those rules are instructions from above on how to behave to make a better world. Any victory for Good that follows from that is then a proof of concept for the Heavens being correct in their side of the argument

>I started writing the Guide in large part because I wanted to deconstruct or avert modern fantasy tropes, and the Principate is a large part of that. It is, undeniably, the largest force for Good on the continent. It's kept both the Kingdom of the Dead and the Chain of Hunger at bay for centuries when otherwise they would have rampaged through most of Calernia. Living conditions in Procer, even for the peasantry, are better than pretty much everywhere else. Its rulers obey the dictates of the House of Light to the letter, if not always in spirit. None of this changes the fact that they are a feudal empire, with all the nastiness that implies. They still war on each other for petty reasons, see the people they rule mainly as a source of income or manpower and the Principate has tried to invade almost every other nation on Calernia at some point in its history. Heroes die young, villains crash and burn. At the end of the day, most people actually running things are just /people/. Getting a set of rules from the Heavens doesn't magically make everyone that takes up a crown a decent person.

>On a purely technical level, the largest difference between the worship of Good and Evil is that Good is almost always community-oriented (hence the existence of churches like the House of Light) while Evil works on strictly personal relationships between worshipper and deity. There are no priests of Evil, though it can be argued that /everyone/ is a priest of Evil: all prayers can be granted, for the right price.

>The Gods Above and Below do roughly correspond to "lower case" good and evil, as far as entities that far removed from mortals can be understood. That neither side of the equation intervenes directly means there's a lot of room for interpretation in the respective philosophies they preach, but the bare bones are there.

(oh, this ^ is the one I went looking for when I dove into the doc; might as well keep going tho)

>The way god-sourced powers relate to Creation is an inversion of the broad philosophies of the Gods. Good is centred around community and Evil around individualism, but in their respective Named you'll more often see villains capable of affecting a great many people and heroes mostly capable of affecting themselves

(0000H THIS IS THE MOST INTERESTING ONE. I couldn't find it the last time I went looking; this is largely where I first got the impression that the Lawful/Chaotic aspects of Above and Below balance each other out. Above makes Lawful societies that heroes then liven up / break up / chaos-ize as necessary; Below thrives on baseline chaos where villains are the ones to impose the kind of order they like. Note that this means Names like Ranger, Archer and the like, which are centered around affecting yourself and no-one else, are closer to the heroic end of the scale this-wise)

>As for the Heavens/Hells that's a more complicated issue. Technically the Hells is where the devils are and the Heavens is where the angels are, in a physical sense. Good and Evil cultures believe that their souls go to their respective Gods after they die, unless angels/devils have a claim to them, but no one has ever passed on to the other side and remembered what was there so there's still a degree of uncertainty. Faith would be a pretty meaningless concept if the afterlife was a physical certainty.

(not sure if this is even relevant to this particular discussion but I'm a bit irked by the Triumphant theories popping up every other chapter like clockwork so dredging it up again...)

O, here's an interesting one:

>Q: The problem really is this world doesn't really have an appropriate name for Catherine to transition into. Grey Knight would fit her best of the obvious options but it isn't a Name as far as we know.

>A: There would be no cultural drive anywhere on Calernia to birth a Name like Grey Knight, which effectively ensure it could not come into being.

Note how this does not say 'it's impossible for a name like Grey Knight to exist because basic metaphysical mechanics' but only 'there's no cultural drive for it on Calernia'.

>"I have not specified anything about whether Hierophant is a villainous or heroic Name, no."

(this is a non-answer but still worth dredging up lmao since it implies there is in fact a question)

>Proceran Named (that is, both villains and heroes) are rare and tend to have a local focus, heavily tied in to a local legend or story. It can be as basic as protecting a lake or an relic, or something more reactive like commoner Named vs abusive authority. Opposition for a Proceran hero will not necessarily be a villain. Plenty of forces of natures like spirits and monsters still running around, especially in a place as large as the Principate. It wouldn't be unusual for corruption in the ruling class to be the opposition either. When villains are involved, there's a bend towards them being sorcerers (magic has a poor reputation in Procer) and they're usually directly opposed to the hero in some way (want to use the hero-protected lake's power for their own ends, or have a scheme that would involved something dear to the hero)

>All heroes are considered to have a mandate from the Heavens in theory, though in practice heroes who affect the broader continent are very few. The 'rules' will be heavily dependent on how they came into their Name, the moment that crystallized who they are. Hanno, for example, would break down if he started going against what he perceives to be justice. William would have been driven suicidal by ceasing to attempt restoring Callow, since it was heavily tied in to his last source of self-worth. It's not a paladin class feature where you can fall and the powers disappear or turn dark, it's more that the further a hero strays from their core ideals the weaker and more prone to catastrophic mistakes they become.

(This one is important to my understanding bc it differentiates heroes who can do whatever the fuck they think is right from dnd paladins who have to follow a code)

>The House of Light didn't inhibit internal Procer warfare so much as it 'civilized' it: the priests are the reason no one burns villages to hurt a rival's power base. In a sense the House codified Proceran warfare, especially through the introduced concept of 'just war' (which means in practice that princes need a pretext before taking a swing at other princes). What makes a war just would take too long to list, but in essence if you're removing wickedness (fighting someone who did a bad thing) or protecting the innocent (fighting someone who hurt those that are your responsibility) it's socially acceptable to go to war.

>Heroes don't fight in the civil wars, as a rule. Some might because of personal attachments, but cooperating with temporal powers would carry a perception of them 'tainting' their purpose and serving as enforcers for the House of Light would bring brutal backlash. (As a rule, anyway, heroes tend to consider themselves closer to the Gods than priests. Anyone can be a priest, but heroes got their own pat on the back directly from Above.) Fighting between heroes is quite rare, and usually comes up because of cultural differences from where they're from: an Alamans hero might see sacrificing three hundred people to put down a monster as monstrous and against every rule of chivalry, while a Lycaonese would consider it a regrettable but necessary sacrifice. Those different opinions might lead to blows, but actual deaths in those fights are nearly unheard of.

Wow, I'm a bit disoriented from reading through the entire document again, and also tired and my laptop is refusing to let me scroll using the touchpad, but basically...

There's a lot that supports your point – Good is about community which is what laws are for in the first place, while Evil is about individualism which is in fact connected to chaos. But the archetypal way villains and heroes act, respectively, is from the DnD point of view Lawful Evil and Chaotic Good, balancing it out enough that I'm confident in saying Good \neq Lawful and Evil \neq Chaotic in Guideverse.

If you can, please do find that discussion and WoG that you're referring to!

shveiran

I'm very much with Liliet on this one.

If you have evidence to support your claim, by all means bring it forth, but as is I certainly don't remember quotes along those lines.

I also don't see much evidence that Above and Below are much about chaos and law, or even greater good vs personal freedom. A lot of heroes operate outside the system, and villains generally seem to care only for the rules they set themselves.

We have seen Brigands, Thieves and Pirates on both sides of the Chessboard, as well as Rulers.

Not to mention, if caring about the greater good was enough to jump the divide between Above and Below, would Cat still be a Villain? She's been all about the big picture and greater good for all since before book 4.

Is the Champion really about order? Are the Stygian about chaos? Does Saint look like she cares much about the proper way to do things, rules and borders and whatnot?

I really don't think there is a law-chaos axis here, let alone one that runs parallel to the Good-Evil one. Below's approach may be to fill determined individuals with power and see what they do, whereas the angels impose rules on the world and wish for their champions to uphold them, but that is the GODS. The Named do not operate that way, and we have seen a lot of contrary evidence that suggests such a rule does not really apply.

Cold Cyberia

I think Bard's point is exactly what she said: "Right now you're sucking at the teat but you're not swallowing. There's always a side picked, Anaxares. Always." As in, if you get metaphysical juice you need to chose a side.

You're also mistaking political for metaphysical and vice versa. Ranger teaching heroes and villains both isn't a metaphysical statement of how the world works, it's a political statement of how the Refuge is run. A metaphysical statement would be thus: Ranger's power is completely independent of Good and Evil, thus being neutral. This is clearly not the case since she embodies the totally individualistic side of spectrum which falls within the purview of Evil.

You might not get the impression Kingdom Under (or other large polities) didn't struggle with these issues but they nonetheless did. Check the word of god document – this is why Kingdom Under. The fact that their solution is coexistence between villains and heroes and not neutrality supports my argument. Even when everything is peaceful and the conditions are perfect for neutrality, they still have to chose a side. Because that's how the narrative laws work.

Liliet

Uh.

The philosophy an individual supports has nothing to do with their metaphysical/political affiliation whatsoever. Like there's probably a statistical correlation, but when we're talking collectivist/individualist, not even a strong one. Come on, which side's philosophy does Amadeus support? Catherine? Remember how the WoG says villains tend to get powers for ruling and heroes tend to get individualistic powers?

Ranger's Name per se, her Role and Aspects, could easily be heroic. Come on, a monster slayer? Someone who perfects their skills? That's literally Laurence. Hunter was a hero, Archer ended up a villain, you think that's hard baked into their Names?

My argument is that:

- the metaphysical alignment of many Names (though not all) is not set and can vary based on instantiation (see: Squire)

- an instance of a Name has an alignment hard-baked into it trope-wise, one that depends on the story that birthed the Name and has absolutely nothing to do with the Named's personal opinions/philosophy/anything else. Only the path they're actually walking

- there is a spectrum that can roughly be divided into three sections for that "baked-in" alignment. There are Good Names, birthed and empowered by a hero's conviction – these are the only ones that get Light granted to them. There are Evil Names, birthed and empowered by a villain's ambition – note that the villain doesn't have to actually worship Below or agree with any part of their philosophy for that, unlike heroic Names this does not come as part of the requirements. And there are Neutral Names, birthed and empowered by all the other things – a person's skill and drive to improve it, most often. I speculate (though I'm less sure of it) that Captain and Scribe, for example, are both inherently Neutral Names, and if say Amadeus managed to get himself redeemed onto the Heavens' side (just imagine for the sake of the argument pls), they both could have followed him without their Roles having so much as a hiccup.

Good and Evil Names are ones that weaken if your political affiliation to your side weakens, because political affiliation is part of their stories, at least on Calernia. Yan Tei does not seem to have that particular feature.

Neutral Names do not inherently give a shit about which side you're on. Thief is an example of a Neutral Name – Vivi ended up losing it because of no longer doing thief-like things or thinking like a thief, the side transition itself was utterly painless. Archer is an example of a Neutral Name as well – had she hit it off with a crew of heroes she'd have joined them just as seamlessly as she did Catherine's gang. These Names are not metaphysically speaking empowered by either Above or Below, though characters in-universe might think like they are just out of religious inertia.

(Catherine was surprised to hear Archer was not necessarily speaking a hero)

All that said, Creation in general doesn't really brook Named with Neutral Names staying Neutral themselves. Ranger ended up carving herself a niche and hiding in it, but it's precisely Ranger-sized and Ranger-shaped, and even then she's often considered to be at least leaning on the side of villainy because of her past association with Calamities. Calernian stories demand that you pick a side, even if your Name is Neutral.

And coming back around to the topic of Kingdom Under, Yan Tei, etc, even if you remove the conflict element, your Name when instantiated is still going to be one of the three: hero-type, neutral-type or villain-type. You can't just pick to be Neutral if you got your Name for your ambitions, that pegs you as metaphysically villainous regardless of opinion.

>You might not get the impression Kingdom Under (or other large polities) didn't struggle with these issues but they nonetheless did.

I didn't say they 'didn't' struggle, I'm saying the struggle isn't still ongoing bc they figured it out eventually 😊

>Check the word of god document – this is why Kingdom Under 0? Can you quote the part you're referring to specifically?

>The fact that their solution is coexistence between villains and heroes and not neutrality supports my argument.

I'm not seeing where that contradicts my interpretation. It accounts for that just as well as yours does.

> A metaphysical statement would be thus: Ranger's power is completely independent of Good and Evil, thus being neutral. This is clearly not the case since she embodies the totally individualistic side of spectrum which falls within the purview of Evil.

Don't confuse philosophy and metaphysics, seriously. Ranger's Name is not any more individualistic than Hunter's, and her story hardly embodies individualism when she literally has a place she's ruling and a school she's running.

>I think Bard's point is exactly what she said: "Right now you're sucking at the teat but you're not swallowing. There's always a side picked, Anaxares. Always." As in, if you get metaphysical juice you need to chose a side.

We operate by different definitions of “need”, maybe? I’m saying that “need” is in this case “because Bard says so”, aka a political point. It’s clearly physically/metaphysically possible for him to not have chosen a side yet, yeah?

jack

Dude?

Fayhem

It’s not like we didn’t already know the Dead King is a monster, but this is a very personal level of callous cruelty on display here. He didn’t just tell Masego that he could bring one of his fathers back, he let him get to the point where he could actually see how to do it (or believed he could, which emotionally is the same thing) just to steal that non-replicable moment of possibility from him so he could twist it to his own ends. I doubt Masego will ever fully recover from that; we just saw the Dead King give him another scar he’ll carry until the day he dies, because apparently what happened in Thalassina just wasn’t quite enough trauma yet.

tl;dr – NESHAMAH YOU GODSDAMNED MOTHERFUCKER

RoflCat

I feel the more horrifying thought is that the Bard had hands in what happened in Thalassina because that’s the moment Masego is reconstructing.

Fayhem

Interesting idea; my read on that was that DK was hijacking Masego’s aspect and pointing it somewhere else entirely, but it’s def not impossible that Bard was in Thalassina and up to shenanigans.

NerfGlastigUaine

Well, that’s one hell of a wham line to end on. B/c really, our favorite not-so-harmless bard has been away for too long. And now we see what the Dead King was going for. Plans within plans, always playing the long game.

Interlude: Reckoning

"Fate is not a bridle; it is an arrow in flight. No hand but your own can loose it, yet once loosed there can be no desisting from the path."

– Dread Empress Maleficent the First

Masego awoke from his dream to a firm hand on his shoulder. The touch was unpleasant, as most touches tended to be, but not so distasteful as to stir him to action when he was so... tired. He'd said something, hadn't he? Just now. And it'd been important. Yet he could not quite recall, and there were other matters to have his mind aflutter. Masego could feel sights flicker just beyond the reach of his eyes, as if stolen before they ever became his.

"I would have preferred," a measured voice said, "to use means that preserved your gifts. For that I apologize, Hierophant. You are a rare talent and so this stands a great waste."

Masego had heard that voice before. Months, years ago. It was not to be trusted. It belonged to an enemy. He tried to extend his will, to claw back the sights that had been taken from him, but it was... difficult. He saw a garden and a pale woman in a dress. He saw a man with a silver coin, spinning and spinning until it dropped. He saw a crowned corpse, a grinning skull – and his will was firmly set aside, like a child whose wrist had been slapped. He struggled against it, but only weakly and ceased when the futility of the act became clear.

"It is necessary, however. If we'd had more time," the voice said, "it could have been done more cleanly. Yet your mistress forced my hand in this, however kind her intentions. So did that amusing child, though from him I would not presume kindness of any sort."

Masego had no eyes to blink open blearily, but the glinting lights of Summer's noon came alight once more. There were arrays around him, in the dozens, that he could not remember making. He wanted to study them more closely but it was difficult to concentrate. He felt exhausted and it was only worsening. Like a barrel draining out. There were other circles of rune he remembered carving himself, the necessities of bringing back his father, but they were skillfully intertwined with the stranger's work. Someone, he realized, had usurped his work. Wormed runes into his arrays and so repurposed them for a ritual that was almost a manner of scrying, though unlike any he'd ever seen. Still, it was all derivative. There should be something at the heart of it all, empowering and empowered.

Gods, he was so tired.

"Steady now, Hierophant," the Dead King murmured. "Divination is delicate sorcery at the best of times, and we seek to unmask the greatest liar these lands have ever known. It is too early in our shared journey to falter."

The hand pulled him up from the slump he'd not known he was falling into, its grip now tight enough it hurt, the sights he was still denied began to flicker even more swiftly.

—

"We are too late," the Grey Pilgrim sadly said.

There had been no missing the colossal pulse of power that'd shivered outwards and through them even as they stepped into the sanctum. Tariq had been given pause by what awaited inside, for never before had he seen such works of magic: it was as if every surface of the great pillared hall within had been covered with runes. They had been artfully carved, no mere circles but instead almost a great mural: waves crested and broke, carved into stone, and spun into forests and peaks. The sight of it was oddly beautiful, like a painting made a hundred thousand little brushstrokes, but like rivers returning to the sea all the patterns of runes coursed back to the throne at the centre of the room. On it, a sickly thin man in dark robes was seated, sightlessly looking up at the ceiling through a tattered black eyecloth. The Hierophant, though he looked more than half dead and great strokes of manifest sorcery whirled around him like a storm.

"He's still breathing," Archer flatly replied. "Careful what you step on, Pilgrim. Follow my path."

Tariq felt a swell of grief, for he beheld the young woman's anticipation of what might yet come and it was like a flinch of the heart. The first time, he well-knew, was always the worst. And no amount of years or seasoning could ever truly prepare you for it.

"He is being used by the Hidden Horror for a ritual, Indrani," he softly replied. "Even should he survive, there will be little of him left."

"You don't know that," she sharply said.

"I know we cannot let that ritual run its course," the Grey Pilgrim said.

"If we interrupt it could—" she began.

Like quicksilver, without the slightest hint of warning, the Archer had two bared blades against Tariq's throat. He'd not even had time to blink. The cool touch of steel against skin would have been relief, after the exertions of the day, if not for the slight bite of the very sharp knives.

"You won't cleaning up any loose ends under cover of good intention, Pilgrim," the Archer mildly said.

"I did not intend to," Tariq said.

She looked at him searchingly.

"Might be that's true," she murmured. "Might be it's not, or just that it won't matter. The Lady said there's only one way to deal with your breed, so I'll speak plain now. Just between you and me."

She leaned forward.

"You kill him, Peregrine, and I'll make whatever ten corpses I need to make the Grand Alliance eat itself alive," Archer said. "You might think Cat will keep me in line, or the war on Keter, or half a hundred different other practical little worries for practical little minds. But look into my soul, Tariq. When I tell you not a single fucking thing will stay my hand, am I lying?"

The Pilgrim looked and beheld the truth of it.

"No," he quietly said. "You are not."

The blades left his throat, and a few spins later they were sheathed and put away.

"Glad we have an understanding, Peregrine," the young woman smiled. "Now let's find a way to wake him without hurting him."

—

"There's something out there," Laurence said.

The dark of this abominable place had been chased away by the glow of the Tyrant's own blasphemy, which brought to mind more than a few passages from the Book about Evil clawing at Evil. Not that the Book of All Things was all that reliable a guide, when it came down to it. Whoever had penned the old thing seemed under the impression that Chosen were naturally prone to holding hands and tearfully joining righteous cause, in contrast to the spirited backbiting of the Damned. Presumably they'd never witnessed two Chosen with different intentions existing in each other's presence, much less two of Above's servants coming from different parts of Calernia. Without someone like Tariq to keep the peace or someone bearing a clear mandate to unite behind like the White Knight, you might as well be throwing a whole bag's worth of angry wet cats in a half a bag. Laurence caught the drift of her thoughts and killed it quick as he could. The mind tended to wander when one tired, and she'd not been this exhausted in a very long time.

"The Hierophant, presumably," Roland delicately said. "Or our more discreet comrades."

He was looking at her like she was old, which was fair. She was. He was also looking at her like she was doddering, though, a dowager seeing monsters in shadows, and for that almost slapped him across the face. Her fingers itched with the impulse, though she pushed it down.

"There are other things out there," the Saint sharply replied. "And they are looking at us. Prepare for trouble, Sorcerer."

The weight of the attention placed on them did not waver even after she revealed her knowledge of it. It might be that the watchers were not hostile, she acknowledged. It might also be that they were either powerful or ignorant enough to be unmoved at the prospect of two heroes' wrath. Whatever the truth, they would not learn it by hesitation or idleness. Taking the lead, Laurence quickened her steps as they approached the final stretch separating them from the shadowed silhouette of the throne room. The Saint bared her sword, for anything that would be offended by such a gesture already meant to be a foe. Sharp eyes picked out the watchers, and what Laurence found did not please her. There were dozens, though each stood alone as some sort of sinister of honour guard around the the Hierophant's prison-sanctum. Only one was seated, halfway up the steps leading to the gates. It was in the shape of a man, though its hair was too unnaturally dark and its lips too unsettlingly red to truly be one. It was like looking at a story made flesh, Laurence thought. Raven-haired and red like blood, something pretending it was made of flesh with a mocking smile and one eye covered by pretty dark silk cloth. On its lap there was a sword, and the thing was sharpening it patiently with a whetstone. One languid stroke at a time, the sound of it a rasp in the strange silence of this place.

Laurence knew a thing or two of swords, and that one had no need for sharpening at all.

"I bid you welcome, Chosen," the thing said. "You are awaited."

The Saint spat to the side.

"Been skulking about, have you?" she said. "And turned out about as useful as a wings on a trout."

"Saint," Roland softly hissed, having caught up to her. "We greet you in peace, Huntsman."

The old thing glanced at the boy approvingly.

"Your kind were a mannerly people, once upon a time," it said. "It is pleasing to know some of those ways remain. In the manner you have greeted me you may leave, to seek your fate beyond me."

"My thanks," the Rogue Sorcerer said.

"What's inside?" Laurence asked, meeting the faerie's eye.

She glimpsed something like darkness in there, hungry and old, but she bared her teeth and it found no purchase in her soul. The Saint spat to the side again.

"I asked you a question, scavenger," she said.

"The king of pins," the faerie laughed. "I see you, cutter. Wounding and wounded, a rag in pale grasp. How much filth can you swallow before the stains no longer wash?"

Laurence snorted.

"I've had more ominous from street soothsayers," she replied. "If you want to earn a copper at least toss around a few fumes and powders."

Ignoring the creature's open displeasure she strode forward, making sure her tabard flapped in its face as she passed it. Roland hurried at her side after making apologies to the thing, but he was only a step behind when Laurence passed through the cracked-open bronze gates.

—

"It's killing him, isn't it?" Indrani quietly said.

The old man sucked in a breath, but after a moment shook his head.

"I expect he'll remain alive," the Pilgrim said. "Though there will little left of him save a broken mind in ruin of flesh."

It was difficult to look at him. Masego had thinned, back when he'd first gotten into the Observatory and entranced himself with his own work, but out on campaign afterwards he'd reclaimed back some of the weight. Enough it didn't look like he was being starved, anyway, though he'd been nothing like the plump man Indrani had first met years ago. Now that was lost, for he was little more than skin on bones with wildly overgrown dreadlocks. He must have eaten on occasion — mage or not he'd be dead by now otherwise — but not often, and he'd likely cheated hunger with spells. His sickly frame would have been bad enough by itself, but there was a river of sorcery coursing through him that was burning his body from the inside. Whatever it was the Dead King was doing, it was not gentle to her... to Masego.

"You need to get me through," Indrani said. "If I could reach him-"

"We've tried, Archer," the Pilgrim said, pointedly looking at her arm.

It's just flesh, Indrani angrily thought. The swirls of pure and lingering magic around Hierophant did not immediately breaking through a coating of Light, but it was a near thing. Indrani had tried to speed through anyway, though she'd had to pull back. If she'd stayed any longer she might have lost the entire arm, but as it was all she'd lost was some flesh. You couldn't even see bone, it was basically a scratch.

"So we try again," she replied. "Slap some more Light onto me, and I'll take a running leap."

"You'll lose more than a part of your arm," the old man calmly said.

"Yeah, so I was thinking," Indrani mused. "Keeping up the protection won't work, we saw that, but what if the moment it break you just start healing me instead?"

As long as she didn't lose anything essential, then it didn't matter in what state she arrived on the other side. Immediately around Zeze was safe, she'd Seen it and the Pilgrim agreed. It was just the outer shell that she needed to get through.

"You may very well die regardless," the Pilgrim bluntly said. "Neither of us has the means to breach this... defence without risking the Hierophant's life. I know it runs contrary to your nature, but it would be best if we waited for-"

"We might not have that long," Indrani interrupted in frustration. "It could be moments or hours, and there's no way to know."

Though the strange whistle of spinning sorcery almost covered it, she still heard the footsteps. She already had a longknife in hand when she came to face the fresh arrivals.

"Moments," the Saint of Swords grunted, striding in sword bared. "So stop whining. What's this, then?"

—

Tariq breathed out a sigh of threaded worry and relief. Young Indrani was very much at the end of her rope – there was no need of an aspect to tell him as much, though the confirmation was not without value – and expecting of Laurence sympathy for any in Below's service was not unlike expecting that very thing of a bared sword, which would be a delicate dance to lead. Laurence, however, possessed means that he did not. Where even the most delicate applications of Light whispered into his ears by the Ophanim had failed, her sword would not. He suspected the Archer would forgive a great many things if they came accompanied by the safeguarding of the Hierophant.

"Laurence," he greeted.

It was no happenstance his tone was pitched just high enough to cut through the beginning of young Indrani's no doubt less than diplomatic reply.

"We are in need of your expertise, and perhaps Roland's," Tariq said. "It appears the Dead King is using the Hierophant for sinister purposes, and has made reaching him difficult."

"You want me to cut something," Laurence bluntly said.

He'd known her long enough to detect the amusement twined to the bluntness, though he doubted anyone else here had.

"In that art you have few rivals," he said, and immediately realized he'd made a mistake.

Mentioning the Lady of the Lake would only remind the Saint was lending a hand to the most prized pupil of that hated foe.

"Can you cut through that?" Archer asked.

She gestured towards the whirling sorcery. Though he'd been ready to step in and smooth the rough edges before the situation... deteriorated, flicked glances at both told him there was no need to.

"Could your teacher?" Saint casually asked.

What he beheld told him behind the nonchalance was a burn that'd dwelled in her belly for more than forty years, and having closed the wound over it with his own fingers and Light he could not find it in him to reprimand her for it. There were some things that couldn't be forgiven without losing part of who you were, and the open belly had been the least of the wounds the Ranger had inflicted on Laurence that day.

"I'm not sure," young Indrani admitted. "It's just wild magic, so there's no... principle to it."

The older woman's smile was darkly pleased.

"It'll flow back," Saint said. "But I'll carve you a way through."

"Good," young Indrani nodded decisively. "Let's finish this, then."

"And your attempt does not succeed?" Tariq calmly asked.

"It will," Archer growled.

"Watch your mouth, girl," Laurence harshly said. "It's a sensible question. If it doesn't work, the best way might be to kill him."

The Archer had blades in hand before the sentence was over.

"Peace," Tariq said. "Saint does not mean for him to remain so."

The ochre-skinned villain looked at him with narrowed eyes.

"Your resurrection trick, it works with villains too?"

The Grey Pilgrim was slightly pained to hear described the act through which he came closest to feeling the will of the Gods Above as 'your resurrection trick', yet he smoothed that away. No one would have not done the same could truly understand the nature of the act.

"It does," Tariq said. "As Laurence well knows. I am not, however, certain it would succeed with the Hierophant."

It was not only young Indrani that looked him askance at that. Laurence was not deeply schooled in the ways of his gift of forgiveness, for there had never been a need. Even now he would rather keep silence over it, for it touched upon the sacred, yet silence would now cost more than speech.

"His body might be too thoroughly ruined already," the Peregrine admitted. "I could breathe back life into him only for Hierophant to die again within moments. If the wound were of a different nature I would not hesitate, but if they were inflicted by his own magic..."

Wound inflicted by a foe would be one matter, easily dealt with. A wound inflicted by oneself, even under duress, was a thornier issue. There could be no guarantees, and he was inclined to believe it would fail. The Gods Above observed the order they had created, as did all the boons they bestowed. He could not Forgive a disease borne of one's own body, old age or the insidious manners of destruction that years of sickness or poison could inflict. Deaths unnatural, those could be forgiven for they went against the meanings of Above. The Hierophant's malady was not so clear-cut that Tariq could promise a return if the boy was slain. If he could be freed whilst still living, of course, that would be a different story. It was always much easier to stoke the last flame of life back to a blaze than to light it anew from spent ashes.

"It's his magic killing him, isn't it?" Roland hesitantly said.

"More or less," Archer said, brow furrowing as she studied the hero.

It must not be far from her mind, Tariq thought, that at the Battle of the Camps all three of them had stood on the opposite side of the field from her.

"I could take it," the Rogue Sorcerer admitted. "His sorcery. That would save his life at least."

In the breath that followed, both Archer and Saint refused and they each eyed the other with displeasure for it.

"I appreciate it, Rogue," Indrani said, and it was genuine. "But taking his magic might kill him in a whole other way, if you know what I mean."

"Are you an idiot, boy?" Laurence harshly said. "You want to take sorcery currently in the hands of the Dead King? Are you really that eager to be hollowed out and made into a Revenant?"

A valid concern, Tariq silently acknowledged.

"Roland," he said. "What you take, can you return?"

"I've never tried," the young man admitted. "I do not confiscate without reason. I suspect not, to be honest, but it is not impossible."

"Tariq," Laurence sharply said.

He met her eyes and inclined his head to the side. They had worked together a great many years, the two of them. She should know by now he would not dismiss the concern she'd expressed. After a moment, her face tightened and she looked at the Rogue Sorcerer with considering eyes.

"It's a risk," she spoke without looking at him.

"It is the Hidden Horror," Tariq said. "Can there be anything else?"

—

Laurence chewed on her lip. He wouldn't try go through with this, she knew, unless she assented. Could she do it, if the worse came to pass? Oh, if it worked the victory would be more than merely sweet. But if it didn't, she could be permanently crippling a promising young Chosen. If she'd been fresh, then... No, that was false thinking. It made no difference, whether she was tired or not. The issue was of capacity. And there was not, in the end, a single thing in Creation that Laurence de Montfort could not cut.

"A measured risk," she said, and it was concession.

Tariq nodded, lowering his wispy head of hair.

"Archer," he said. "Given choice between the confiscation of his sorcery and death, would you not agree that confiscation is preferable for Hierophant?"

The vicious girl glared, more at the situation than anyone in particular. Laurence could almost sympathize. It'd been a long night for all of them, wicked and righteous both.

"It's not impossible for him to get the magic back, right?" the Ranger's pupil said, looking at Roland.

"I don't know," the Rogue Sorcerer admitted. "But I would do my utmost to return it, that much I can swear."

"Fuck," the Archer said. "All right, worst case if Cat doesn't get here we can go down that road. Won't matter, anyway. Saint, carve me a path would you?"

Laurence looked at the child the Ranger had so fondly raised. She saw there the same indolent pride and skill, only without the weight of centuries behind it.

"Say please," the Saint of Swords said.

"Please," the villain replied without missing a beat.

Laurence's fingers clenched. Oddly enough, she felt more cheated by how easily the girl had said than she would have if the Archer had never said it at all. Sword in hand, the Saint tread across the carved floor and came to stand by the edge of the sorcerous whirls. She adjusted her stance, weighing her sword in her hand.

"Archer?" she said.

"Ready," the girl replied.

"Now," she hissed, and struck.

Her will cut where her sword could not, and it was enough to disperse sorcery. Long enough for the Archer to race across the opening. The girl grinned triumphantly as she slid before the Hierophant, laughing, and then-

"Pesh."

- the seemingly-entranced boy lazily raised a hand, sorcery flickered and Archer's brains splattered the floor.

"Now that I have your attention," the Dead King spoke through the Hierophant's mouth. "That was your single resurrection, I believe. Do not attempt to meddle again, lest your losses expand beyond the recoverable."

—

Masego was half-asleep, for not even the painful squeeze of the hand on his shoulder could keep him entirely awake anymore. Almost dreaming, he drifted in and out of consciousness. The sights still came, but he could feel they were nearing the end. They were slower now, like they had to reach deeper for less.

"How mundane," a voice spoke close to him. "How petty. I expected better of you, Intercessor. This is... beneath us."

"Oh, Nessie," a woman's voice fondly said. "You should know by now the house always wins."

It was a jolt to his consciousness. Masego's not-eyed fluttered open. Though this surroundings were still hazy, what had been lulling him into slumber had drawn back. There were two people here with him. One stood behind the sorcerer, and had a hand on his shoulder. He was the Dead King, an enemy. And in front of him a woman. Slender, dark-haired, much too pale to be Catherine. He could not make out everything about her, but there was a silver flask in her hand and she was drinking from it.

"You believe I cannot see your little scheme?" the Dead King said. "The thief and the cutter, to lessen me for every year to come. I need not witness your plans to see that. It is an acceptable trade, for I now know the lay of you."

"That's getting a bit ahead of yourself, innit?" the woman chuckled.

"I know," the Dead King said. "And now that I do, I need not lift a finger. I'll tell them, Intercessor, and every last one will turn on you."

"Yeah, see, that's the part where you're getting ahead," the woman drawled. "You knowing. The little shard of you in poor ol' Zeze knows, but you-you? That's a different story."

"You failed," the Dead King said. "The Tyrant spread into the souls, yes, but the Black Queen contains him. I will still have room enough to pass what I know."

"Do you?" the Wandering Bard grinned.

Masego saw her perfectly then. He saw, too, the blood and brains on the floor and the woman they belonged to.

"Dead King," Hierophant roared. "You did this."

The Wandering Bard raised her flask in a toast.

"Always," she smiled, "wins."

Caerulea

Vote! (for A Practical Guide to Evil)

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

(Discord:)

<https://discord.gg/3nbsUfZ>

Does anyone know a good danish recipe?

Some Sarcasm Required

First, you have to catch a live Dane, this may sound easy, but remember they are descended from the Vikings, a people feared across Europe and beyond for good reason.

Then you need 4 cloves of garlic, 10 whole onions, a quarter cup of salt, a touch of crushed red pepper and a hint of rosemary.

Remove the head and entrails, hand and feet are optional.

Tie the Dane to a large pole, place them above a large bed of coals, ensure no flames lick up and burn the skin, as we want it a nice golden brown, not char. Now, while the dane is rotating over the fire, stuff the abdominal cavity with the chopped garlic, onions, and rosemary, rub the salt over the skin.

Roast until golden brown and the internal temperature has reached no less than 165 degrees Fahrenheit for 5 minutes.

Then sit back and enjoy your roasted Danish.

Rumal Zero

By "danish recipe" do you then mean a recipe from Denmark or a recipe for the baked goods called a "danish" (to everyone but the Danish of course).

No matter the meaning I have a Danish danish recipe for you right here, translated, though still in metric:

Makes 12 pcs – takes 60+ minutes

INGREDIENTS:

For the filling

2 eggs

3 tblsp sugar

3 tblsp wheat flour
2 dl milk
the seeds of 1 vanillabean

For the dough

0.5 l milk
1 egg
1 tblsp sugar
50 g fresh yeast (dunno how much that is in dry yeast)
1 teasp crushed cardamom
500 g wheat flour
400 g cold butter
(melted butter for brushing down after baking)

For the glaze

50 g powdered sugar
1 tblsp water

WHAT TO DO:

For the filling

- Whisk all the ingredients together in a depp pan with.
- Bring the mixture to a boil while continuously whisking at high heat.
- Reduce the heat to a simmer (medium heat) while continuously whisking. Do this for about 5 minutes.
- Remove the pot from the heat and transfer the filling to a bowl. Let the filling cool for at least half an hour; stir the creme once a while as it cools.

For the glaze

- Mix powdered sugar and water until all lumps disappear. This glaze settles somewhat quickly, so maybe do this after the dough is done.

For the dough and danish

- Mix milk, egg, sugar, yeast and cardamom with two thirds of the flour until it forms a dough.
- Roll out the dough out to a square with a thickness of half a centimeter using the rest of the flour as necessary.
- Cut the butter into thin slices and distribute them over two thirds of the dough, leaving a one third strip without butter.
- Fold the dough over it self twice by folding the butterless third over the rest of the dough and then folding the dough again over the last third. This should make three layers of dough
- Roll out the dough to a square once more and fold the dough again like before. Do this rolling and falttening twice. This should leave you with $3 \times 3 \times 3 = 27$ layers of jummy butterdough for extra fluf.
- Roll out the dough to a 40 x 50 cm square and cut the dough into 12 equal squares (10 x 10 cm).
- Fold the four corners of each square partways to the middle (nearly forming a new square) and place some of the now cooled cream (about a tblsp) in the middle – put the 12 raw danish' on a sheet pan and let them rise for about half an hour in a warm place (slightly above room temperature preferably).

– Brush the dough with melted butter and bake them in an oven at 250 degrees celcius for 10-12 minutes or undtil light golden brown.

– Let them cool on a baking grate.

– Top with glaze and serve.

Tip for preserving!

– The danish danish can be frozen down for later before rising. Let them thaw for 2-3 hours before cooking.

Source: <https://www.arla.dk/opskrifter/wienerbrod/>

(A danish milk company – a danish is, roughly translated, called a “bread from Vienna” in danish.)

Andrew Mitchell

Javvies

Killing Archer in front of Masego? Bad call.

I wonder how much of this Masego will remember.

And how badly Masego is going to be hurt by this.

And, since Archer is (currently) dead, Laurence might try to kill Masego here and now before Cat can get here.

Caerulea

I do not think that the Saint is that suicidal, nor cruel. She is suspicious, violent, and rude, but without Tariq's advice or Masago acting against her, I think she would wait to see how things unfolded. Furthermore, she knows that if she killed Masago and Archer and then Catherine came to them, Catherine would kill her, and also get angry at Tariq. Overall, a very poor decision.

Also, you can not beat the Wandering Bard, apparently. She is to godsdamned good.

Liliet

Seriously, killing Masego now would probably have EVERYONE turn on her. Even without her knowing about the specifics of the pact Cat made with Tariq, like, COME ON. She'd be on the wrong side of the story, too. Laurence has opinions on who deserves to die, but she doesn't act on them when the time is this obviously wrong, come on.

Qwormuli

Not to fully rain on your parade(only a light drizzle, as I agree with you on large part), but our uncomfortably -and metaphysically- sharp old bat did decide to try her hand at skewering the Tyrant at the worst probable moment, fucking herself over at least in part.

In short, if you're a sword, everything starts looking like a neck or however it went. She's not the very best judge of when to not stab.

shveiran

Agreed. Plus, it's not really about being cruel or stupid, in my opinion.

If Saints considers masego to be a dangerous threat (which, to be fair, is not that much of a stretch even without her black and white morality) she might deem wiser to remove him and deal with the consequences.

It's true that she has shown to trust Tariq a lot and usually defers to him, but I don't think that's a Cat-Hakram level of deference. There may be a point where she becomes convinced Tariq is wrong, and acts accordingly.

Javvies

It's also worth nearing in mind that Archer was nominally the best chance of snapping Masego out of the Dead King's control

Archer just got killed, apparently by the Heiropant. Or the Dead King in him.

Thus, the attempt to break the Heiropant free from the Dead King failed. And so it's stabbing time.

Or so Laurence could conclude. And, from her perspective, it's not a stretch to get there, it is, in fact, quite reasonable.

Andrew Mitchell

IMO there's no way Laurence doesn't know that the Dead King killed Archer and that Masego is angry at the Dead King. Laurence is in the same room when we see what's happening with Masego:

> He saw, too, the blood and brains on the floor and the woman they belonged to.

>"Dead King," Hierophant roared. "You did this."

Liliet

Indrani getting herself killed by the entity possessing her loved one IS a trope for snapping said loved one out of it. Laurence would know that damn well.

frondred

Neshama is gonna die 😂😂😂

Liliet

> at the worst probable moment

Nuh-huh.

“Don’t let the villain finish monologuing” is a lesson that Kairos already taught the Free Cities gang, and it’s a well known one.

What Laurence failed to account for was Kairos accounting for what she would do accounting for his actions, which is a mastermind meta level higher than “do not stab ally, do stab traitor”. Remember when during the surrender offer moment Tariq commented that heroes were not obligated to be idiots and pre-emptively striking against someone who would definitely betray them did not count as betrayal? Followed by lamenting that he wishes the situation was that simple and he’s fairly sure Catherine does mean to abide by the surrender?

Normally, what Laurence did would be perfectly okay. Catherine predicted it would not be because of the understanding she has of Hierarch and his warped logic and how Kairos could weaponize that. Laurence not sharing that understanding makes her, as someone graciously put it, “the only muscle in a group of masterminds”, not an idiot.

RoflCat

I don’t know, would she?

While he was acting on the side of Callow, Cath has always managed to keep his restrained enough that he never really fall into the more Evil practices.

Hell, right now he’s getting the “You hurt my waifu” power up against the Dead King, the Saint has no reason to cut him down and HELP Dead King for it.

Liliet

yeeeeeeeeeeeeeeeeeee

shveiran

I'm not disagreeing necessarily, but do Saint and company KNOW that Masego is about to duke it out with the DK? I was under the impression that part was within Zeze's brainspace.

Andrew Mitchell

I'm pretty sure that was out-loud. But I could be wrong.

It will certainly change what happens next if it wasn't heard by the others.

Rook

I think the Saint will do just the opposite – she won't harm a single dreadlock on his pretty blasphemous head. Masego just pinned the blame for this on the Dead King out loud, in front of everyone. She knows none of them are his target right now.

If she takes a swing right now, the price of it would be to break Tariq's Bargain, lose the Sorcerer's trust, and all she'd get as a result is to turn the sights of a wounded and cornered Villain onto herself instead of the dead king.

She could do absolutely nothing at all and from her point of view, it would be letting two hideous monsters claw each other's eyes out while biding her strength. She might even help Cut the Dead King's piece of soul off from its path of retreat – literally – to lock those two hissing cats in the same cage.

Helping Masego attack the dead king right now would gain her a narrative advantage in keeping her word (that specific one being something both she and Tariq sorely need at the moment), weaken two 'Enemies', and save her own strength at the same time. Three birds with one stone, and the Bard likely wouldn't interfere either considering that it'd help her stop Neshamah's main body/soul from learning what her plot really is.

Javvies

I don't think Saint actually knows about Tariq's bargain with Cat. There's certainly no textual evidence to that effect. And for that matter, even if Saint did know, she'd most likely consider it a mistake.

The only witnesses to Saint killing Masego right now (as far as she knows) would be her fellow Heroes and the Dead King. As such, Saint can claim that it was necessary, or at least try to. But she would probably figure that her fellow Heroes wouldn't contradict her story to a Villain, and the Dead King is another Villain, and her story would likely be something along the lines of "the Dead King used Heirophant to attack us and killed Archer, so I had to kill him" ... which is probably going to be hard for the Dead King to refute.

Saint is a blunt instrument.

Also, if she kills Masego, Cat would be forced to pick and choose which of her friends gets resurrected by Tariq – assuming that Tariq will resurrect one of them in the first place, which Laurence probably figures (a) isn't a sure thing, and (b) she probably has a decent shot at trying to argue him out of it if he seems inclined to do so.

Rook

The terms of the original truce made to form the band of five was already meant to last until the Dead King was dealt with. She's already commented on the PoV

Rook

Whoops, didn't mean to hit post that early.

*she already mentioned in her PoV chapters of her intention to keep to those original terms of Tariq's sake, since she was essentially sure she'd be proven right in the end anyway, whether it was during this venture of later down the road.

And at the end of the day, every time she and Tariq have butted heads against each other she's always backed down and followed his lead. She's only stubborn as a mule when it comes to listening to Villains, when it comes to Tariq she usually shows restraint or lowers her pride even through blinding red fury.

I don't see her keeping faith here because she's concerned about being fair or honest, I see her wanting to cut Masego's head off with all her heart but staying her hand because the wiser Hero told her not to.

Gibborim

I think Masego will be more powerful than ever after this. I would expect a third aspect along the lines of Vivisect or Consume that will destroy the shard of the Dead King.

SlumberyStorm

Rember aspect have to work with in the Name. Masego's name is means make/crafter of miracles. So you have to work it with that in mind.

magey

Like, perhaps, the miracle the Pilgrim will shortly be using to resurrect Archer, that he's going to have a front row seat to witness?

Seems especially weighty right on the heels of his prolonged (and failed) effort to resurrect his father.

caoimhinh

Masego's Name isn't about making or crafting miracles, it's about understanding them (and from the magic practitioner's point of view to understand something is to achieve control of it).

Remember that the titles that accompany Masego ever since he became Hierophant are "Usher of Mysteries and Vivisector of Miracles", plus the definition of Hierophant is "a person who brings religious congregants into the presence of that which is deemed holy. An interpreter of sacred mysteries and arcane principles."

Masego will definitely emerge more powerful than ever from this experience, after all the great things he has witnessed.

Liliet

...unless he gets force-nerfed by the Dead King's ruination of his abilities.

Decius

Horrible call. Cat wouldn't swear revenge on anybody but the Dead King if Archer isn't rezzed, so Rogue takes Magic, Saint kills Rogue, Saint cuts out DK's influence, Pilgrim brings Rogue back is still a complete victory for Saint.

For that matter, even when Masego gets angry and takes the Dead King's power and uses it to find/make/remake his father without further casualties, Pilgrim might not be inclined to res Archer. Pilgrim could credibly claim that it's not possible because angels are fickle, and the only reason not to is because Archer is needed on the front lines... a reason which goes away if Heirophant wakes up and takes over Dead King.

Liliet

Wait, what do you mean by this? What are your expectations?

Insanenoodlyguy

He's riding a "You killed the one I love" righteous fury. It might kill or unmake him to ride it out, but during it? He's A. Pretty much goddamn unstoppable and B. directing that at the greatest enemy Good has ever known.

If she stepped in now, she'd be killed as an afterthought, or at least dismissively swatted aside. It's not a story you can insert yourself in except as an easily dismissed obstacle.

shveiran

Agreed, but does she KNOW Masego is aware and about to battle the DK? I think that part is in his mind.

caoimhinh

I believe they will notice once Masego starts roaring and the magic flow around him starts to change. Pilgrim might also be able to discern what's happening thanks to his Behold Aspect and the Angel's Radio that whispers things for him.

shveiran

Fair enough. In retrospect, it may very well be an irrelevant difference.

LM

So Bard is actually the bad guy? I don't really like that. It seems cheap, and contrary to the themes of this universe

shveiran

Why do you feel this way?

To me, it feels like an antagonist that was foreshadowed a lot more than the DK as the big bad, and if she actually enforces stories and through them the status quo, it is precisely the opponent Cat needs to defeat to get the world she wants.

Seems legit.

shveiran

Also, it's an enemy she almost literally CAN'T PUNCH OR STAB.
Even more than DK.

I really like the contrast to her early problems, honestly.

Ultimate_procrastinator

Not necessarily the villain, but at the very least her nature is contradictory enough to the beliefs of most Calernians that they would hate and fear her... which considering that she's essentially an immortal body-jacker who plays both sides of the whole Above-Below conflict, is not exactly unreasonable.

Thief of Words

Are you kidding me? The game being rigged being the ultimate conflict of the story has been evident since Black's first introduction. This has ALWAYS been a story about stories and the fallability of having only a modest grasp of the elements of them when they rule our lives.

WuseMajor

...Bard has been the big bad ever since we discovered she was more than a drunk taven singer. She's the force that keeps the crabs fighting each other instead of climbing out of the bucket. She's the crooked dealer at the casino who makes sure no-one else wins. She is why this continent keeps eating itself alive and any attempt to change that is contrary to her wishes.

If Cat wants Callow to ever be more than the terrain battles are fought on top of, she has to end the Bard.

Liliet

Not necessarily 😊

Isaac Martinez

Not only that. The only people to call Zeze as Zeze are the Woe. And in this chapter Masego describes her as "too pale to be Catherine" and that she "carries a silver flask". So, we maybe have in our hands a time traveler.

goliath1303

... Huh?

Bard has always had a flask. It's literally one of 2 defining features that she has and is even the one that's, by a large margin, that is noticed and commented on the most. The other is her lute, but while that only gets mentioned every so often, I can't think of a single appearance by her that doesn't include either a mention of her flask, her drinking, or appearing drunk. In the Keter/Arcadia echoes is described as a copper flask, which is noticed as being different than the silver one she always has in current times but that and her lute is how Cat and Masego recognize her even though she's in an unfamiliar body and they're speaking a language that is, at the time, completely unknown to them. Plus, the flasks mentions aren't just in passing normally, there's almost always a comment about what type of alcohol is currently in it as well as the fact that it never seems to empty. It's implied to be an extremely rare and/or unique item. It's started in sorry that whatever the name is in this story for a bottomless charm(a la a bag of holding type spell) is super rare and excitement and using it on a flask is seen as unimaginably wasteful. Also, she doesn't seem to choose the liquor that's in it. It's ranged from super fine brandy(I believe) to rotgut whisky to disgustingly sweet cherry liquer/spirits. I think it's all but confirmed it's something tied to her through different incarnations and most likely, at least to some extent and in some way, divine in origin.

Furthermore, what does her being too pale to be Catherine have to do with anything, let alone point to her being a time traveler? If anyone is going to have an inside peek at the main characters(shown by her knowledge of in group nickname) it's gonna be Bard.

I'm just so confused how "too pale to be Catherine and "has a flask"

goliath1303

Damn lack of an edit button... Here's the last bit I was gonna post:

Lead you to, let alone support, the theory that Bard is a time traveler.

onedollargum

Laurence just had a lesson on how timing matters when one stabs someone in the back. She might hold off here I think.

stevenneiman

Yep. Bad call. I expect that Neshamah is going to lose more than just the shard of power and the knowledge here. Especially since I think Masego has a much better chance than Laurence of being able to actually hurt or kill him. Laurence might be able to cut anything, but if she tried she would be going against the most powerful and carefully-crafted stories in Creation (or close enough) without even knowing they're there. Masego, though, is a lot less vulnerable to the Dead King's stories.

pagesbe

As Cat or Black would say:

Mistake.

naturalnuke

Masego is about to poison a shard of the Dead King's soul I think.

caoimhinh

He is going to dissect it, observe it, devour it and then ruin it into such little pieces that atoms will seem like planets.

A little taste of Deicide for Masego.

sengachi

This splinter of the Dead King is hand in hand with one of the greatest living sorcerers of an age, whose soul bears the aspect of Ruin. I expect it is about to have a very bad day.

Also, really Dead King? An “all according to my designs” moment? Against the incarnation of the narrative? Tut-tut, poor form.

erebus42

“Nothing is half as dangerous to a villain as victory. We raise our own gallows.” -Dread Empress Maleficent I

He’s grown too used to winning (or at least not losing) and is getting sloppy.

Fayhem

Well, for a given value of “sloppy” anyway. Playing against the Intercessor has been credibly established earlier in the story as pretty much the most dangerous game Calernia has to offer; Black spent decades slaughtering heroes one after another in large part through his superior grasp of the narrative, and then as soon as he went head-to-head with Bard she didn’t just win she practically made sport of him while orchestrating the death of one of his closest friends with his own unwitting complicity. Bard isn’t invincible, as far as we can tell Kairos put one over on her with the Hierarch in the same sequence, but there’s no more dangerous opponent in these kind of games.

tl;dr – yes he made a mistake, but he made it against an opponent who has been alive longer than him and who has spent that entire time specing into forcing narrative errors. Also, Liliet’s point is good about how he has at most an academic grasp of what human emotions are like at this point and that’s a real weakness when you need to predict what mortals will do.

Cicero

I think it’s more that the Dead King always plays conservatively, to lessen and mitigate his losses.

But that means predictability, and when that happens, sometimes an unpredictable opponent can flip that around and inflict significantly larger harm on the cautious player.

“Fortune favors the bold” as they say.

Liliet

Yup.

Dead King has his strong points. In this particular story, these strong points are reflected in the part he’s probably not going to suffer greater losses than this entire scheme and the (relatively small amount of) power he invested in it.

konstantinvoncarstein

And a very stupid and avoidable mistake.

Liliet

...for someone who still remembers what emotions feel like and doesn’t think them a silly weakness.

His “wait why are you taking this personally” moment against Cat was in retrospect very much foreshadowing of this 😊

konstantinvoncarstein

Ah yes, you are right 😊 I had forgotten.

medailyfun

why_so_serious.gif 😊

lqueenofblades1

Which moment was that? I can’t quite recall.

caoimhinh

He did that in his very first conversation with Cat back when they were in Keter, warning her that no matter how many fights they had or how much they hurt each other, none of that would be personal as it is merely part of the game that immortals play on the world.

But I believe Liliet is referring to the most recent one, in Chapter 45: Long Princes, here’s the extract:

{ “You have,” I murmured, “taken my friend and now bargain with his life while scheming the death of others dear to me. You arranged the destruction of my armies, of near everyone I've ever cared for. But for my intervention, you would have buried Iserre in death and borrowed Hierophant's hand for the deed."

"You clutch the remains of what you once were, Black Queen," the Hidden Horror said. "It does no favours to what you have since become."

"It was never really personal to me, before," I told him. "You were a foe, but in some ways an ally as well. In principle I thought it tragedy that others died to your invasions, but no one weeps for faces they never knew nor loved."

"A taste," the Dead King said, "of what is to come. They will be strangers, Catherine Foundling. One day, and sooner than you believe, they will all be strangers."

"And if that day comes, I may yet become the horror you foretold," I admitted. "But today, Dead King?"

I limped forward, into his space, with cold eyes.

"Today you are the thing that took my friend," I hissed. "The thing that would have slaughtered the Woe and the Army of Callow without batting an eye. I 'overestimate the strength of my position', Merciless Gods."

I struck at the nothingness we stood on with my staff, the sound ringing like a thunderclap.

"You think after this I'm not willing to try falling off the cliff together, Neshamah?" I said, tone sharp. "To gamble on which of us will find our wings on the way down? Look at my back, King of Death, and see what is writ there – when given the choice between risking ruin and kneeling, I've only ever replied one way."

A moment passed.

"Has your tirade ended?" the Dead King calmly asked. "No purpose was served by it, save the thinning of my patience." }

Also it's worth noticing that when Neshamah tells Catherine that Amadeus is also his hostage, promising not to hurt Amadeus as part of the bargain for letting him go, the Dead King merely states Amadeus' value as a political tool that can bring stability to the region once Malicia dies; hilariously neglecting the fact that Amadeus is the closest thing to a father for Catherine, which the Dead King should at least be able to infer or make a good guess, as he has been reading Masego's mind, but he didn't.

It's likely that he has become so detached that feelings of affection are strange and foreign for him now, though he has been shown to be able to appreciate and respect exceptional individuals or those he considers worthy (Intercessor, Triumphant, Ranger, the bloodline of Papenheim, Catherine, etc).

Liliet

Yep, what caoimnh said.

Neshamah is Not Good At This.

Insanenoodlyguy

You're right. That makes so much sense! He's ready to deal with peers who are becoming like him, and he's ready to deal with classical evil that's close enough (triumphant) but he's either never had to deal with sufficient power to hurt him in a mortal who feels, or he's simply forgotten.

Liliet

I suspect there's a dash of motivated forgetting there in the mixture: this does not fit with my pre-existing ideas about how reality is, so I'm going to ignore it and pretend it never happened :3

Neshamah is smart, but that doesn't make him unbiased.

shveiran

I'm perfectly in agreement, though that really applies only to being blindsided by the power of love.

Gloating, not so much. But I'm willing to assume it was the Bard being awesome rather than the DK being an idiot.

WuseMajor

Hmmm... I'm not entirely sure how avoidable it was. If he hadn't shot her, they'd have had Archer there to try to snap Masego out of it, before he was done. And, because they're heroes, they'd have cut apart this chunk of him shortly afterward.

I think the most sensible thing he could have done was to leave things mostly finished and get away once the heroes started their assault. However, it's possible that might have harmed him in some way too. So, I think the Dead King might have been maneuvered into a no-win scenario here.

...Granted, the other options are probably less painful ends than this one, but they were likely ends just the same.

konstantinvoncarstein

Could he not send her in a pocket dimension? Or put her to sleep?

Liliet

That's the class of solution you need to already have in mind as a potentially useful tool. This is what "thinking outside of the box" means: being able to easily find in decision space solutions that aren't the standard set. Amadeus would easily come up with the options you've offered, because doing as little damage as he can is part of his MO; Neshamah's MO is doing as MUCH damage as he can so that his opponents will take 'not being wholesale slaughtered' as the best victory they can get, so this is far, far outside of his box.

And as Cat has pointed out, his box has served him faithfully for so many years, he doesn't really consider things outside of it anymore.

Liliet

Or to put it in a simpler way: it's not on his quick access panel :3

Liliet

Agreed re: no-win scenario here, yeah. That's the power of a True Love story: it's specifically the one that says "however it goes in the middle, at the end, TRUE LOVE ALWAYS WINS". Like it reaches right through and defines the ending.

Between Bard, Catherine and Indrani's crush, Neshamah found himself cornered quite neatly 😊

Danus

Fuck.

What a whacky loss. Wonder how it'll pan out.

Hoactzin

Hm. I feel like the ending would have been stronger if Masego hadn't yelled at the Dead King. Not a big deal though.

What was a big deal, however, was Archer dying suddenly. Did not see that coming.

Oshi

Someone was bound to die. The foreshadowing was there.

Liliet

When you have a really neat hammer, the story is immensely likely to grow nails in unexpected places, I suspect.

They weren't getting through this WITHOUT using up the resurrection.

And of course it would be Indrani waking up Masego in a somewhat rougher way than ideally intended 😊

Andrew Mitchell

> And of course it would be Indrani waking up Masego in a somewhat rougher way than ideally intended 😊

That's a good way to think about it.

Vhostym

The really scary question that Tariq or Laurence might be asking is: Did Cat plan this?

Jason Ipswitch

Well... Catherine obviously had some plan for getting Masego to turn against the Dead King. Instead of the Alliance that killed his fathers. And this is about the only thing that would accomplish that.

Liliet

I mean, Masego is Praesi culturally, and culturally speaking Praesi always victim blame. His own side is at fault for losing, not the other side for blooding them. Especially when the fleet that immediately did that is also dead. Masego doesn't give a shit about politics and he doesn't really do the 'who's the aggressor here' counting that Catherine does naturally.

Revenge against the Grand Alliance would hardly interest him even if someone offered imho.

Fayhem

Yeah, Masego is very much Warlock's child in this respect. He has absolutely no emotional attachment (either positive or negative) to abstract political entities. E.g., he only cares about Callow because Cat cares about Callow, and for that matter similarly for Praes but more bc of Uncle Black.

Liliet

Yep.

His attitude towards the war was "if I kill some crusaders Cat will like that right?"

He just doesn't give enough of a shit about the Grand Alliance to consider it a target for revenge.

Javvies

Not exactly.

Masego didn't care about the Grand Alliance or the related political situation.

That was before the Grand Alliance/its Crusade killed his parents. He might very well care enough now to want revenge about that

I mean ... he just up and boiled the blood out of two people who insulted Cat and the rest of the Woe in front of him. Admittedly they were also irritating him at the time, but I'm pretty sure he's going to have a more significant reaction to the people he assigns the blame for the deaths of his parents.

Liliet

Masego is a person who generally does not run on Protagonist-Centered Morality and considers actions against his side to be just as fair as symmetrical actions BY his side. (We know that from his early ethics debate with Cat about Lone Swordsman's actions)

If he considers it perfectly acceptable for himself to kill enemy practitioners (or anyone who annoyed him), he also will consider it perfectly acceptable for enemy practitioners to aim to kill him. Or his father. Especially given that those who killed his father are already dead.

The logic of 'revenge on the side that organized the attack' is convoluted enough for Masego to not even think in that direction. There are like five separate steps involved all of which he won't take. He is prone to Praesi victim blaming logic, does not consider deaths in war to be unfair, the situation has ended with his father killing those who killed him right back, and does not consider the Grand Alliance to be an entity of interest any more than the sea the fleet was on. Oh, and also cares about his friends/family above any abstract considerations, which right now means Cat and the Woe and Amadeus with them. Oh, and also was starting to come around on Cat's point of view on 'how the world should be' and thinking that he wants Cat to win because he likes the world better when it works that way.

Just... the weight there is like 1:10000

Javvies

... You know you just contradicted yourself, right?

I agree completely that Masego doesn't care about the Crusade having attacked Thalassina or that Thalassina was utterly destroyed as a result/side effect of that attack.

And, sure, he doesn't really object on moral grounds to Heroes and Crusaders trying to kill Villains. It's just annoying that they take time away from his research.

On the other hand ... he genuinely deeply cared about and for his parents. Just look at his efforts to bring one of them (presumably Tikoloshe) back.

It is entirely plausible that the emotional reaction to the loss of his parents overrides the tendencies indicated by his prior demonstrations of relative indifference to being attacked and lack of caring about it/the attackers once the incident is over (aka, the attackers are driven off and/or dead with nothing he cares about having been a casualty).
See his intensely personal reaction to Indrani going down.

Frankly, it's more believable that he has, or more likely will have, an intense reaction of anger oriented towards those he blames for the deaths of his parents, than him not doing something unpleasant to those he blames.
He might very well not have gotten to that stage of his reaction yet, having been sidetracked and stuck on the idea/process of trying to bring at least one of them back. But once he's no longer fixated on trying to bring them back ... he's not going to be able to deny that they're really truly gone.

Liliet

It's not about... augh! Of course he cares about his parents!

But like... if your loved one trips on a rock, falls down some stairs and breaks their neck, are you going to SWEAR REVENGE ON ROCKS? Or do you not care about rocks enough for that?

Sure, Masego is going to look for targets to blame. They are going to be, in approximate order:

- himself, for failing to protect them better;
- Malicia, for sending them to fight her wars;
- the Gods, for being immediately the ones whose powers/intervention killed Wekesa and Tikoloshe (both Above and Below);
- if we start reaching, Uncle Amadeus for not being there...

As far as he's concerned, the Grand Alliance is a non-entity. A landscape feature. You don't swear revenge on landscape features, you swear revenge on the person who pushed you to tumble down the slope.

Javvies

The Grand Alliance is not a rock or other inanimate object.

Masego straight up did not care about the Grand Alliance back when all it had accomplished was to get its ass kicked out of Callow after conquering a few herds of sheep, and get "invaded" by Amadeus and a couple Legions.

In other words, the Grand Alliance had done nothing that did more than temporarily inconvenience Masego by taking him away from his mage tower/lab research.

It is quite likely that he is no longer purely indifferent to the Grand Alliance now that it has actually taken people he cares about from him in a more or less permanent manner (once he'd no longer fixated on bringing at least one of them back, anyways).

It isn't like Masego particularly cared about the Dead King on a personal level (just an academic one) before Indrani went down. Now Masego wants to render the Dead King into chunky salsa. Or something.

Sure, Masego cared about his parents and Indrani differently, but you don't get it both ways.

Liliet

Masego cared about Dead King in the sense that he acknowledged Dead King as an entity he was very much interested in and in a sense rivals with. Not, like, to the degree of pattern of three rivals, but at the very least Neshamah is a fellow practitioner, and the originator of the Trismegistan theory of magic if you remember to boot.

Grand Alliance is a fellow nothing as far as Masego is concerned. I'm not sure he remembers that that's what it's called and who the members are.

Liliet

Oh, if the Ashuran fleet had actually survived the attack, I would very much bet on Masego going all Roaring Rampage of Revenge on them before anything else. But they're dead, and that line of thinking does not go further. Maybe you angrily kick the rock your loved one tripped on, but you don't track down all rocks of this specific kind to grind them into dust. They're rocks. You don't actually care.

Liliet

A better question is: did Indrani? 😊

Andrew Mitchell

I'm not sure if she knew that the Dead King could/would control Masego to kill her but she certainly knew she might die. And her time in the everdark taught her what that (almost) feels like. And still she went.

Such is the power of love. ♥ ♥ ♥

Liliet

Yep.

"Oh it didn't even cut off my entire arm let's try again"

"Yeah maybe you can't shield me but consider: what if I keep getting mutilated and you keep healing me would that work"

This is the Archer that she was always going to be, the Archer that Hye's weak ass teachings held her back from becoming.

Her answer to the question 'what do you want to be?'

Matthew

I say yes. I think her plan to snap Masego out of it was always going to include, "Maybe if I get hideously injured or killed in front of Masego... that might work."

Liliet

Y e p

maresther23

She didn't, but they will think she did. This is one of the beauties of this webserial. In book one, before the last battle in the War College, Black told Cat not to make chained plans, but lots of schemes that increased her chances of winning. She ignored him but managed to scrap a win. Books later, the leader of the Deodarite (her name escapes me) considered Cat one of Black's perfect schemes twenty years in the making that flourished just in the right moment, when we know it wasn't.

At the beginning of this battle Cat told Viv it wasn't a plan, but a set of counterweights that only activate if needed. That is why she always has one more trick, she has a general understanding of everyone in the field, has prepared some contingencies, and is amazing at adapting them in the field.

Indrani or Masego dying is a "no win" situation for Cat, she has done everything to protect her friends, but she knows the dangers and prepared a counterweight in case it was needed. People will think she planed everything, but they will never realise all the contingencies she didn't used and all the scrambling she had to do to make things work.

Liliet

Mhm.

This was most definitely not Plan A. But it was a plan.

Euodiachloris

Eh. It's way more badass than True Love's Kiss.

And, it might shake her out of her suicidal recklessness should she get rezzed. Because the high chance if not getting a rez at all is always a thing to cash cold water on any spirit.

Liliet

Yep.

And I don't think this was suicidal recklessness in the sense of "danger is not real and nothing bad can happen to me". Indrani has JUST had that arc, remember? Everdark shook her out of that and she spent several months up to Cloaks stewing in fear and anxiety wrt that? And chewed Cat out for her perception of Cat acting like that?

Knowing what we know about the arc Indrani's already been through, this was the kind of calculated recklessness that comes with a cost-benefit analysis that says the reward is worth the risk. Whether Indrani focused on the chance of herself surviving and saving Masego as worth the risk of dying, or considered that her dying would most likely work to save Masego and decided that that outcome was fine with her too, she's not just being fearless out of lack of understanding of the risks.

luminiousblu

It'll only count if she actually stays dead. I, personally, am now hoping for Masego to bring her back at the cost of getting his magical ability deleted.

Liliet

Huh, that would be neat also. Only, it would leave a dangling loose end in the form of magic-less Masego. Hmm... what if he keeps the Gift itself but loses the Name and all the abilities / inhuman knowledge that came with it? Or maybe keeps the Name but has all he ever Witnessed nulled? At the very least I can't see him keeping the knowledge he got in Thalassina...

shveiran

If there is a Book 6, better for him to be dead than a cripple. I'm not really sure how he could factor in the story much at that point. Same for Indrani, honestly... if Masego dies, I'm not really seeing the shape or her story.

I think they'll either be both around, mostly whole, or both dead/removed from the narrative.

shveiran

Agreed, but I really didn't expect it to be Archer

Cicero

Mistake Dead King. Mistake.

Morgenstern

Are we really sure it wasn't the Wandering Bard who did that "pesh", snap, Indrani is dead thing? The DK's dialogue seemed to heavily hint at it imho. What with all that "really? that is beneath both of us". Otherwise, where did that come from / what else does it relate to?

Rook

The Bard most likely just delayed him until Masego woke up. The Mistake Neshamah made was engaging her in dialogue at all. What was actually discussed was of absolutely no consequence, the import was that she made him waste time talking about his victory instead of fleeing immediately and as fast as he could.

She most likely set up the situation to happen though. Kairos just happened to delay Catherine, who was likely the one person that could've stopped Indrani from making the move that her killed?

Not a coincidence, I think.

I think Kairos didn't just betray them all, he betrayed them to the fucking Intercessor. Catherine knew he was delaying her specifically, when she said "I'm the only one who can handle what he's about to use, which I suspect is rather the point".

This would require a level of foresight that should be near impossible to have, but if anyone can do it it'd be the good ol' Boogeywoman.

Rook

It should also be noted that the event that prompted Neshamah to call out the Bard for being 'petty' was masego noting that his visions were slowing down.

If the Bard's goal was just to delay, and if Neshamah thought she was just trying to delay his Inevitable Victory (TM) out of petty spite, it'd make perfect sense why he'd make that accusation.

The situation in itself would be part of the weapon. The Villain, being Assured Of His Inevitable Victory, talks about how inevitable his victory is, foolishly allowing the Hero to delay him long enough for a last minute turnaround. It's one of the most classic story tropes that exists.

Which means, if any of these suppositions are true, then Black was quite the smart cookie for considering bashing himself unconscious rather than engaging the Bard at all. Amadeus, at least, recognized that he was about to be whipped, even if he didn't know what angle she'd strike him from.

Liliet

Y e p

shveiran

I agree with the gist of Rook's analysys, but I think the "beneath us" line referred to the Intercessor's PLAN, as witnessed through the ritual. That is why he later says "all I have to do is tell them", the subject doesn't change.

Liliet

Yeah, that does make more sense.

Alessandro U

I too feel that this is the correct interpretation of what happened.

Andrew Mitchell

The relevant dialogue is

"Pesh."

– the seemingly-entrance boy lazily raised a hand, sorcery flickered and Archer's brains splattered the floor.

I think this is very direct evidence that the Dead King was responsible for Masego killing Archer. Like 95% certainty level. The Dead King doesn't actually say "that was me" but its heavily implied.

Linking this to the later discussion between the Dead King and Wandering Bard is unnecessary as Rook has explained.

danh3107

Jesus Christ.....

Naeddyr

oh fucking wow, wandering bard you absolute fucker

Liliet

That's what Neshamah gets for trying to discount Power of Love

erebus42

That's pretty much her in three words.

Soronel Haetir

Dayum

Soma

Ummmmmmmmmm... wow. That was a mistake. I will be supremely miffed is our general comedic relief does get killed permanently, but that is what resurrection is for isn't it? That includes coming back wrong, as that will probably kill off the freewheeling awesome of Archer. Or who knows the... issues resurrection has might just make Archer more Archer. I'm going to stake a wishful hope on that.

Liliet

I think resurrection just comes with low key depression, and I don't doubt Indrani will push through it. She's pushed through worse just in this book.

Especially with Masego going on a Roaring Rampage of Revenge against Neshamah on her behalf 😊

Gamer7956

Honestly, I think that Tariq won't be the one to pull off the res. I think Masego's about to hit his third aspect, and it will likely be one for replicating miracles – including resurrections. How else to get Cat to fuck up than give her an easy escape to a bad situation.

Because if an angel ressurects a villain, J can't see it being the same person who comes back.

Liliet

>Because if an angel ressurects a villain, J can't see it being the same person who comes back.

This has literally happened in the story.

Quite Possibly A Cat

Did... did the Dead King just make someone kill their One True Love?

Well, I guess the House always wins when you take another hit on 21.

Liliet

I know right? First he chewed out Cat for not playing by his 'zero attachment rules' then he acts like Bard kicked his kitten for taking proper&obvious advantage of a skyscraper-sized opening he left.

Between that and the "Catherine made me do it!" on hurting Masego, its fucking amazing how pathetic he actually is when you cut through the outer layers :3

maresther23

Even better, Bard weaponized the power of love... again

konstantinvoncarstein

Again?

Liliet

Good question. When WAS the first instance? I'd be surprised if there wasn't one, but... when.

Hum. Does knocking Amadeus off balance with news about deaths of his loved ones count?

Liliet

Oh! She used Sabah's attachment to Amadeus to bait her into attacking Rafaella first! That was a thing!

konstantinvoncarstein

Is it not only the heroic side of the story who can do that? 🤔 Here it is the Woe and their buddies, but concerning Sabah's death she was on the villainous side.

Liliet

I think it's not about which side of the story you are and more about how emotionally stunted you are. Granted, it does tend to correlate!

But Calamities really were the Woe's predecessors in the 'villainous band of 5' 'villains powered by Love, Trust, Friendship and Loyalty' department 😊

konstantinvoncarstein

Indeed. But the power of Love is when you triumph thanks to your love. And Sabah died.

Liliet

I think Power of Love is the whole thing complete with the drawbacks 😡

Liliet

(And Sabah literally had an entire Aspect dedicated just to her loyalty&attachment to Amadeus, so... Power there was indeed)

shveiran

The shape was wrong.

She engaged to prevent Rafaela from assisting Hanno against Amadeus.

The Champion was a complication, not a direct threat, so Sabah wasn't doing a last stand to protect her buddy => no power up.

Agent J

Sabah isn't the one who got the power up, no. It was Rafaela. And it was a beast vs heroic champion story. Sabah fucked up when she fell into the role of the bestial monster fighting the champion in the arena (domain).

I don't think love played a role in that story at all.

shveiran

Yep, that's what I was saying.

Love was the bait Bard used, but the story had the wrong shape for Sabah to gain the "protecting loved one" power boost.

Liliet

Yeah, what I mean was Sabah's love for Amadeus dragging her into a losing fight.

Cicero

Power of Love also incorporates a character sacrificing themselves for the one they love's ideals. Thus making the loved one feel regret and reconsider their life goals.

Maybe that's why Black ended up losing his name?

Andrew Mitchell

Maybe that was an early influence.

The direct cause of Black losing his Name was overuse during their travels/battles over Procer.

Unoriginal

No, it was in the text mentioned that it was because his name no longer fit him. While the reasons for this aren't spelled out one can assume that he hasn't been acting like a Black-Knight should act.

In fact, we've known this about his character for a long time but it never has gone far enough to lose his name like he did during the campaign. But the reason the Black Knight was so weak in conventional power in comparison to his predecessor is that his name never fit his modus operandi very well and so he never had quite so deep a well to draw upon.

Anyways, some have theorized that he may eventually become Dread Emperor Benevolent mentioned in some of the epigraphs but that's neither here nor there.

dalek955

I don't think so. As I see it, overusing aspects can get a Named killed (either by exhaustion or by inviting missteps), but couldn't burn out the Name itself. Amadeus ceased to be the Black Knight because he ceased to fit the Role of the Dread Empress's strong right hand, first by breaking with the Empress and going his own way, and then by getting so thoroughly trounced by the Gray Pilgrim at the Legion's expense.

Liliet

I think Bard was most definitely angling this way. Between 'go murder your little friend in the Tower' and 'feels like a sin doesn't it', she basically went full villainous monologue on him. That engenders pushback, and with Second Liesse alienating him from his own side, and better yet leading to Catherine ordering him to go be a better person?

Ye p p.

erebus42

Well...shit

antoninjohn

True love conquers all, even death

Thea

Love is how villains die.

Liliet

Yeah but I bet they still feel like they come out the winners for having had the choice :3

Agent J

I know Tokoloshe certainly does.

Liliet

Yeah 😊

Really... a quick post-death poll for the selection of: Sabah, Wekesa, Tikoloshe, Indrani. Question: "Do you regret the love that caused your death, and would you have preferred to not be attached to that person and survive? Y/N"

😊😊😊

IDKWhoitis

I love the Dead King for the bastard a half that he is. Pretending to be out of it completely to force them into a tricky gambit.

Also, I shudder to think what the Bard wants, that would make the Dead King the LESSER of two evils. What would cause heroes to turn, and Cat to reunite with the Dead King?

Is it the meta knowledge of the show must go on? Is it an apocalyptic ending waiting for everyone at the end? Is it a full wipe of the slate?

Or nothing at all. That the Bard wants nothing in particular to happen, and just pushes things arbitrarily, pretending that a grander plan is afoot? The inventor of the Catherine Gambit, just smile and nod as chaos roils around you?

Liliet

I wonder if it's Heroes he meant would turn on her, or Gods...

haihappen

If I interpret the DK-WB exchange correctly, the Wandering bard was using the heroes to fight a war of attrition against the Dead king, just like Isabella the Mad against Theodosian (or however his name is written).

In the process, she is willingly sacrificing heroes and enables villains to commit atrocities. I.e., the whole process up to the point that the Grand Alliance fights the Dead King was engineered by the Wandering Bard to turn out just this way (Rebellion in Callow; Akua's Folly & its destruction; weakening Malicia to ally with DK)

The unaccounted/unpredictable variables here are Cat and the Tyrant, yet I am not sure about the Tyrant.

My personal theory is that the ancient thing that the Tyrants line consults for a prediction is controlled either the DK or WB.

Basically, DK and WB play Shrantí (that board game mentioned a few times now, I may have mis-spelled it) with the entire continent.

Liliet

I think you're misinterpreting, because absolutely nobody would turn on Bard if that were the big revelation.

The attrition thing was obvious enough Neshamah didn't need to ride visions to see it, even Laurence caught the idea from half a step.

Fayhem

it's spelled Shatranj, IIRC. Basically just another flavor of Fantasy Chess, which is why Black hates it (for purposes of officer/leadership training anyway, not so much as a game itself) since it's way too abstracted and orderly and it makes people think you can get away with making 52-step plans like that in an actual war.

Anyway, to get back on topic I don't think we have enough information yet to deduce the Intercessor's plans. We didn't see what Neshamah just saw, and if the Dead King couldn't deduce what she was up to from the information previously available I suspect it's because the necessary information just wasn't out there. I don't think we in the audience have gotten any privileged info that would fill in a blank that the Dead King wouldn't have info on, unless maybe it's the extra chapter where Laurence talked about letting Procer burn to purge out the impurities (still not sure whether Bard's actual intent there matches what Laurence said though). So I think that the reveal of what Bard is planning is still pending.

Andrew Mitchell

> So I think that the reveal of what Bard is planning is still pending.

Yes, that is yet to be revealed but it will be for sure... And in the meantime, I'll continue to enjoy all the speculation!

grzecho2222

It could be just victory for one side, because than Gods either abandon this reality to build a new one (and given how much fae want to escape their own abandon realm) or they will tear it apart and use it as materials for building a new one

IDKWhoitis

Why do I have this fear that one of the Woe may not make it out of this nightmare before its over?

I feel like Saint wouldn't either in such a scenario...

Liliet

They will, it'll be fine.

They have a heroic story and Bard's meddling at their backs 😊

IDKWhoitis

Nah, I think Bard likes it when everyone loses a little bit. It makes each side more desperate, more malleable.

Here's to hoping though...

Liliet

>Nah, I think Bard likes it when everyone loses a little bit.

Even if it's generally speaking better for her plans, I can attest with certainty based on textual evidence that she doesn't personally speaking like it better. Contrition stories are her least favorite :3

shveiran

Assuming the Bard never lies is a big leap, IMO.

Liliet

In her own POV's internal monologue?...

Liliet

Welp! There goes Indrani's story, firing off properly. I wonder if she expected this. Like this was obviously not her best case scenario, but... I'll honestly be more surprised if she did not consider this possibility and did not figure it'd work either way :3

Also, wow Neshamah is whiny. First Cat doesn't play by his rules, now Bard doesn't. And it's the same thing both times – emotions and attachments fucking up his neat arrangements eh :3

Wonder who the fuck is 'they' that would turn on Bard? I see two options – Gods or Heroes. Or both, but I honestly think that's less likely, just from the phrasing? Hum.

(My preferred option, obviously, is Gods)

Also lmao @ Cat managing to get in on that sweet, sweet Bardic meddling in her favor ♥

Also I wonder what the plan the heroes came up with was. For Roland to take in the sorcery, then for Laurence to cut it off from Neshamah? That's the impression I got. I like them willing to help, though ♥

And I love the Laurence-Indrani tension :3

caoimhinh

Like Cat said, for all that Neshamah is brilliant and has a vast information network and resources to understand the other players, the Dead King is stagnant in his ways. He has underestimated the strength of emotions, the core of human nature.

Not surprising when we consider that he has been an undead god for thousands of years. For all that he can have some 'clear visuals' thanks to his detachment, it also limits his scope of comprehension and what he can predict.

Liliet

Yassss.

Love this trope so fucking much. Amadeus might have tricked readers early on into thinking one might be able to properly account for Power of Love etc while standing on the outside of it, but let's be real, no. That was no evidence of any such thing.

Evil still Cannot Understand Good AND I LOVE THAT TROPE WITH THE PASSION OF A THOUSAND BURNING SUNS about time Cat & her crew found themselves on the right side of it 😊

caoimhinh

Well, we know for a fact that Amadeus can love in many ways (his family from the Green Stretch, the love of his life Ranger, his friends in the Legions and in the Calamities, Alaya, and Catherine) so he might actually have a decent shot at understanding the power of love and account for it.

I think it's not so much that 'Evil cannot understand Good' as it's actually closer to 'Humans Through Aliens Eyes'. Since this is more akin to Dead King forgetting about the intricacies of human nature due to his experience as a millenia-old undead rather than him not reading the abilities of his adversaries or what they are feeling. He knows Cat is suffering for the death of people in the war and she is angry for what he is doing to Masego and the Army of Callow, yet he dismissed this as something fleeting because he is thinking 'in a hundred or thousand years this won't matter' and 'all these losses and emotions will be just a memory eventually'; Neshamah has become so detached that he finds the notion of fighting teeth and nail for one's loved ones a weird or irrational thing, even ignoring how big a reaction can be and how far people are willing to go for their loved ones.

I suspect the Bard's plan is something deeply personal, hence Dead King's disdain for it and calling it mundane and petty.

Liliet

>so he might actually have a decent shot at understanding the power of love and account for it.

I mean. The impression I get from Amadeus is that he's 100% the kind of Heart-like Leader powered by Loyalty, Friendship and Trust of & to everyone around him. Alaya commented on it once, "attachment has always been your weakness, one you've managed to turn into a strength of sorts". Amadeus rides down those personal level heroic tropes whooping and screaming in terror.

He's a farmer's son wielding his mother's sword in defense of the weak from the power-abusing nobility, who led a rebellion that led to real reforms and real change.

Amadeus is exempt from any and all "Evil Cannot Understand Good" dynamics because he IS an antihero caught on the wrong side of the political divide.

>I think its not so much that 'Evil cannot understand Good' as it's actually closer to 'Humans Through Aliens Eyes'. Since this is more akin to Dead King forgetting about the intricacies of human nature due to his experience as a millenia-old undead rather than him not reading the abilities of his adversaries or what they are feeling.

P much same thing. Remember what he did to BECOME a millenia old undead? And how&why Cat is desperate to avoid a similar fate?

>I suspect the Bard's plan is something deeply personal, hence Dead King's disdain for it and calling it mundane and petty.

Huh. Yeah.

Morgenstern

Ah. I guess that would be another thing that comment of the DK can be related to. Thanks. I actually linked it directly to that moment of Indrani dying. Hm...

Euodiachloris

Both sides of the Gods might also be in the same "too not human to understand why the game pieces are beginning to get very, very weird and acting in strange ways" boat. 😞 If anything, the Dead King is a little god showing the problem off to everybody.

The Sisters almost went the same way, but are fighting talon, beak and snark to avoid it.

Liliet

Mhm!

Fayhem

> I suspect the Bard's plan is something deeply personal, hence Dead King's disdain for it and calling it mundane and petty.

That's a very interesting inference, I hadn't considered it at all really but that honestly seems pretty plausible to me now that you've pointed it out/argued for it like this. I would be truly fascinated to see what constitutes something "deeply personal" for a millennia-spanning entity like the Bard. Because given that basically nobody except her, the Dead King, and the elves live that long (and the elves are assholes so fuck 'em) any strong personal attachment/motivation she feels I think would have to either be:

A), very recent. E.g., a story of how an immortal fell in love with just a lowly mortal and blah blah blah, way too trite and I think this is very unlikely as such even if you are right about her plan being personal.

B), something she's carried with her since the very beginning, probably from before being committed to this immortal semi-purgatory. I.e., something of such burning importance that she's carried it with her for literally millennia, presumably without ever even letting on that she's been building towards it or DK would have figured it out previously. Now THAT sounds more like a story with enough weight to it to matter.

Mental Mouse

> yet he dismissed this as something fleeting because he is thinking 'in a hundred or thousand years this won't matter' and 'all these losses and emotions will be just a memory ...'

Sounds like he focused so completely on the long term that he forgot about the short term and maybe the medium term, and quite possibly the long term. 😊 In particular, Cat at this point is likely to "forgive" DK's smoking ashes. If he's right about her immortality, he may already have made her into a nemesis that can persecute him down the centuries..

shveiran

Could Neshamah and Masego together really uncover something the capital g Gods didn't know? I can share the charme of the idea, but it seems a bit farfetched.

konstantinvoncarstein

Don't seems likely. The Gods create Creation, after all.

lennymaster

And mages usurp Creation.

konstantinvoncarstein

Yes, but creating an entire planet and an infinity of planes is several orders of magnitude more complex than anything imaginable by Neshamah.

Liliet

I mean if the Gods were omniscient they wouldn't have needed the wager in the first place would they?

I get the impression they aren't really big on foresight or trying to figure out what's going to happen as a consequence of anything they're observing. Consider: Neshamah is officially confirmed as having blindsided Below by betraying them.

Mental Mouse

> Neshamah is officially confirmed as having blindsided Below by betraying them.

??? What are you referring to here? In any case, Praesi theology declares that betraying Below is the truest form of worship to them.

Liliet

When Bard was talking to the Sisters about their bargain, she told them Below got less generous since Neshamah 'bit the hand that fed him'.

1224

I don't know what Masego is going to do. I just know it's going to be hella cathartic.

caoimhinh

At that moment, Neshamah knew...
He fucked up.

Mental Mouse

> At that moment, Neshamah knew... He fucked up.

Actually, I don't think he's figured that out... yet.

Andrew Mitchell

> She saw there the same indolent pride and skill, only without the weight of centuries behind it.

Interesting that Saint sees that Archer has the same skill as the Ranger. I wonder if that has implications for later?

> lazily raised a hand, sorcery flickered and Archer's brains splattered the floor.

Wuff, I was NOT expecting that. But certainly a smart move by the Dead King IMO.

I'm not actually sure what the exchange between the Dead King and the Wandering Bard actually means. So I'm looking forward to reading the ensuing discussions.

Plus, it seems Masego is pissed. He's going to take out this fragment of the Dead King, isn't he?

Liliet

>Interesting that Saint sees that Archer has the same skill as the Ranger. I wonder if that has implications for later?

I think it's less 'just as skilled as her' and more 'the same general category of thing' / 'the same general direction'.
'Without the weight of centuries' and all.

>Wuff, I was NOT expecting that. But certainly a smart move by the Dead King IMO.

Oh was it now? 😊

I will admit my favored / most likely prediction for how this would turn out featured dead Indrani over Masego woken up by her death, and Pilgrim using up his resurrection on that, just because of how neat a story it makes... on meta level, on ground level, on ALL levels 😊

Neshamah left a skyscraper sized opening for the story to fuck him over by using his mastery over Masego's body to kill the girl who loves him coming to rescue him, and amplified it by being smug about it. The blowback from that is going to blow him cleanly out of all gains from this particular game, as Bard is here to ensure 😊

Like... this is a Power of Love story, and he tried to swat that aside. That's how YOU get swatted.

Between this and his earlier whining @ Cat that she's not playing by his rules by taking things personally? Neshamah's getting REAL rusty on those feelings tropes 😊

(Maybe even in a world of stories – maybe particularly in a world of stories, – it takes a person actually capable of Trust, Love and Friendship to recognize and take into account their Power properly 😊д😊D)

Hexblade

Personally, I think there is a second game here. The Dead King said that he already was losing a bit of himself to the Cutter (Saint). I think this is a ploy for Masego to take him apart in order to help push Masego and the Woe towards his side with the knowledge Masego will rip from him.

Liliet

Huh, that's an interesting version.

luminiousblu

I mean it feels out of character, doesn't it? I refuse to believe that in the thousands of years between him going Lich-King and Catherine nobody's tried to pull a "I know you're in there somewhere" thing on him. It is literally one of the most ancient stories around. The Dead King is the guy who plays the long game and never fails because he leaves no openings. If he isn't bluffing Bard and isn't buying time with some sort of hologram (which would explain why Masego can suddenly see again) for his 'real' soul to get away and communicate the information I call BS. Neshamah has consistently shown to be someone who refuses to take the bait, and gloating one step short of the goal is the clearest bait there is.

Liliet

Villains always fail.

This is how & this is why.

If the bait was easy to refuse nobody would ever take it.

He's not some kind of transcended being violating the laws of narrative. He's just the most successful villain finding himself a niche. That niche means he's safe, but it doesn't mean he's safe from elementary mistakes 😊

>Neshamah has consistently shown to be someone who refuses to take the bait

Neshamah has shown himself to be someone who acts like he never takes the bait and considers himself too smart for anyone else to keep up with him.

That does not make his view objectively correct 😊

This genuinely feels more in line with the general narrative setup, to me, than the idea that Neshamah is actually unbeatable. Nobody's in control, not him either. Power means constraints, immortality means deteriorating sanity. Play into tropes that strengthen you enough, and you find yourself trope'd 😊

luminiousblu

>Villains always fail.

>This is how & this is why.

This is a platitude. Villains always fail only in the sense that if you fail you're clearly a villain. This is true even in the Guideverse, because Neshamah is only a villain in the most technical sense of the word when he doesn't fail. A looming catastrophe isn't a 'villain', it's a phenomenon to be avoided. That is what Neshamah has always been presented as – clean up unassailable. The way to 'win' against him is to merely avoid losing.

>If the bait was easy to refuse nobody would ever take it. Define 'easy', because you don't need to be a genius to realise that gloating before you've finished the job makes no goddamn sense in any world, including guideverse. He could've had a minor devil nearby waiting to tell the Bard that she's too late, if he so pleased. This isn't a curveball bait, it's not hidden or obfuscated, it's not buried six layers under like the whole "hunter of maidens" thing that killed off Captain. It's something Neshamah was arguably not even baited into doing, he simply decided to do it on his own.

>Neshamah has shown himself to be someone who acts like he never takes the bait and considers himself too smart for anyone else to keep up with him.

Which, considering he's styled all over repeated attempts to bring him down for millennia at least, is supported by evidence. Him being a poser believing himself more clever than he is doesn't make sense when you consider just how successful he's been. You're going to complain, 'oh, but he hasn't taken over the continent yet!' but even that we've seen comes from how cautious he is and how utterly unwilling to take bait he is. The dude doesn't like taking risks, so he's more than willing to wait out any danger that shows up and to engineer the circumstances of his expansion so as to not provoke the dice turning against him. It's arguably strange he hasn't already bailed – clearly, Malicia and the Black Queen have long since stopped being the 'main' threat in the eyes of everyone involved.

>Nobody's in control, not him either

You don't need to be in 'control', though. I don't know why you brought it up. From a narrative point of view the idea that Neshamah is an entity to be beaten is already pointless – he's not presented as Sauron, he's presented as Moby-Dick, the guy who everyone hates but nobody has ever been able to do meaningful damage to, a lurker in the dark, the boogeyman of every story. An obsession with combating him leads only to ruin through your own actions.

>Power means constraints

Power doesn't mean constraints. By definition power means, in every universe, even in guideverse, the lack of constraints on your actions. What we view as constraints on power is rather just conditions for power to manifest. There's a few people who have constraints placed upon them but most of those constraints are either fundamentally tied to their power or a result of how they obtained it.

>immortality means deteriorating sanity

That's total BS though. Catherine keeps saying this, probably partially to excuse her behaviour as the Queen of Winter, but what are the facts? The Fae are not 'going' insane, they operate on different rules and with different mindsets because they're immortal and they're, well, fae. The Elves aren't insane, just racist and immensely powerful – and no, you don't have to be insane to be racist, especially in a world where you can objectively show massive and meaningful differences between species. Masego's "papa" is clearly not insane despite being immortal and around since before the Dead King. Sve Noc and the rest of the drow aren't insane, just warped, which isn't the same thing – they're thinking clearly and logically, just in a manner and against values foreign to everyone else.

Even if we allow that this isn't the case, since Catherine pulled off a minor victory against Neshamah using Sve Noc, what bugs me isn't necessarily just the fact that he's blundered. It's that it was so transparently obvious. Nobody didn't basically facepalm when Neshamah basically went 'haha you're too late my victory is assured'. The dude has no right surviving this long if he's going to do something like that, and it shows what I mean when I said last chapter that it feels like everyone but Catherine is being presented like a total moron at times. Is it that no party but the Woe has EVER tried to bring back a loved one from Neshamah? Is it that he's never possessed someone before? Are we meant to believe that this is the only trick that works, that none of the other transparently obvious 'asking for it' phrases and scenarios can be baited out? None of these explanations make sense. How the hell did he not get finished off ages ago by a bright eyed hero with a hot adventurous girlfriend?

I'd also say it seriously bugs me that Masego has pulled off what should nominally be impossible by shaking off full possession at the last moment but that's just guideverse shenanigans. Personally I've always wanted to take an axe to the face of every single person who even so much as nods at the Power of Friendship/Love and am therefore super biased, so I won't comment on the stupidity of that particular interaction.

Liliet

>Personally I've always wanted to take an axe to the face of every single person who even so much as nods at the Power of Friendship/Love

Well, this is not the narrative for you then 😊

Mental Mouse

DK thinks he owns the long game, but Bard plays it longer. And "who the gods would destroy, they first make proud". As Liliet put it:

>Neshamah has shown himself to be someone who ... considers himself too smart for anyone else to keep up with him. That does not make his view objectively correct 😊

It may well be that Neshamah has been slowly decaying for millennia, and now is slipping into hubris. Or just focusing so closely on his project against the Bard, that he (at least the sliver of him that's present) fumbled badly against the mortal opponents. His alienation from humanity might also help explain why he completely blew off the possibility of a Power of Love play.

Andrew Mitchell

> It may well be that Neshamah has been slowly decaying for millennia, and now is slipping into hubris. Or just focusing so closely on his project against the Bard, that he (at least the sliver of him that's present) fumbled badly against the mortal opponents. His alienation from humanity might also help explain why he completely blew off the possibility of a Power of Love play.

All of those are very plausible IMO and taken together are enough of a reason for the Dead King to have made this mistake. Additional thoughts which IMO add to the plausibility:

– The opportunity Masego presented (the opportunity to find out the Bard's true motive) may NEVER have arisen before now.

– If Masego hadn't actually thought about, or internally acknowledged, his love for Archer (and we know Masego was almost totally oblivious to those feelings) then the Dead King couldn't really pick up that knowledge from rooting through Masego's brain.

Liliet

KABOOM ♥

Mental Mouse

> Between this and his earlier whining @ Cat that she's not playing by his rules by taking things personally?

In fact, I suspect that much of his interactions with Cat in this book were "concern trolling", aka trying to talk her out of a winning position. Too bad Cat is very much on to that game, having been "trained" by Pilgrim and company.

sengachi

Well fuck me, I find myself rooting for the Bard.

Liliet

She's on the party's side right now! 😊

Daniel Magelinski

I maintain that she's never really been on anyone's side.

Liliet

Well, yeah. I mean situationally, you know like the green/red flagging in video games 😊

Sugar Roll

No, she's not. My take is that she is creation's moderator and enforces the balance between good and evil. When one side gets a substantial advantage, she intervenes on behalf of the losing side.

erebus42

Then she's either shit at her job or plays favorites since (except for that thing with Sve Nok) when has she ever helped out the Villains?

shveiran

I get what you are coming from, but let's remember that the Chain of Hunger and the DK both count as Villains. And they are pretty much undefeatable.

BUT yeah, mortal villains really get the short end of the stick.

erebus42

A fair point, but she hasn't really focused her efforts directly on them until recently has she? Not to mention the facts that the two had been relatively dormant until recently, and that the Pilgrim and the Saint have made it so that Villains haven't been able to make any real victories in most of the continent. She's only been subverting in the few places where villains do have power. If she's the embodiment of anything it's the status quo; specifically the one that states that the villains always loose. Now she probably doesn't want their complete eradication like the Saint does; after all who then would be around for the Heroes to defeat and prove themselves against?

denimcurtain

I'm assuming she usually isn't very active. I feel like her joining a five man band even is more hands on than usual for any given decade. Just needs subtle pushes.

As for the balance between villainy and heroes...it's been pretty balanced as far as we can see. Exceptions being the dead kind, triumphant, and today. Villains achieving dominance followed by swift falls to heroes is part of the balance. Heroes need to win over villains at some point because otherwise villiains live forever. There's a lot of reasons why heroes aren't generally threatening to the balance.

Mental Mouse

> There's a lot of reasons why heroes aren't generally threatening to the balance.

Well, that's the thing, per Amadeus the heroes of Procer and Levant were winning too much, enough that they triggered the Conquest as a balancing reaction. I suspect their campaigns were part of why Amadeus and Cat were capable of similarly purging heroes from their territory.

denimcurtain

Maybe. Though it's Amadeus' theory and even he only goes as far as saying that it only became a problem when Procer turned it's eyes towards Praes.

Liliet

My vote is 'plays favorites' ♥

Fayhem

Is she? Or is she just using them to fuck over DK? Because there can be a HUGE difference in how that goes from the party's POV. When you're on somebody's side, you want them to succeed by a standard they would consider success. When you're using somebody, it doesn't matter if your tools break as long as they accomplish what you needed them to.

Like I said; a HUGE difference.

Andrew Mitchell

Well said. And it will be very interesting to find out the truth of it.

Liliet

True.

I think Bard's in favor of this story actually going well for the party's side, just because she can, but I admit that's my pro-Bard bias :3

Mental Mouse

> Is she? Or is she just using them to fuck over DK?

She can do both – the DK vs. Golden Bloom incident makes it clear she has no problem linking and overlapping two stories.

Faiir

I don't.

I feel like the Dead King doesn't really need anything from Calernia, and is only moving out to screw with the Bard. With Bard out of the picture, I always felt a real truce could be reached

This makes me feel like they should be allied with the Dead King even more – if he loses to her at the peak of his power, what chances do our villains have?

OTOH, Intercessor is THE antagonist. If her job is keeping the Good/Evil war going, then without defeating her there is no way for Cat to achieve what she wants.

Liliet

Why would she have made the League of Free Cities then? 😊

Tenthyr

On the one hand, damn there Bard, stylish.

On the other hand what the Dead King said kinda has me rooting for him, if only because whatever he found out about the Bard must be REALLY bad.

Liliet

Depends on how you read the 'them' there at the end 😊

erebus42

I mean the most probable choices would be the Heroes or the Gods. Either way, it would be cathartic to see the Wandering Bard squirm a little and get knocked down a peg or two.

Liliet

Mhm.

Still, between Neshamah and Intercessor, I'll take Intercessor every time. At least she's not unambiguously evil, y'know?

luminiousblu

Neshamah has style though. Bard does too but she's too inconsistent with her style, on account of the whole "literally doesn't exist 99% of the time" thing.

Liliet

Yeah but Neshamah's the one who slaughters people for shits and giggles and doesn't give a fuck about anyone but himself and considers feelings a silly weakness.

Bard's POV was actually that of a person.

Maybe for you a million is a statistic, but I feel otherwise :3

sengachi

On the other hand, the Bard literally told him “this time, eat the baby” meaning “yeah this time I’ll actually let you take a chunk out of Procer”.

So however human her perspective may be, she’s also the human who decided to let the Dead King win on some level and kill millions to see her own desires through (whatever they may be).

Liliet

That’s your interpretation of what she meant. I doubt even DK trusts that it’s a genuine promise.

Fayhem

It’s been genuine enough for the Lycaonese to reach the brink of extinction; their goals were shifting to “evacuate enough of our civilian refugees that maybe future generations will be able to return” before Cat’s deal kicked in. I’m positive that DK didn’t just take Bard at her word, because that seems to be the entire motive for what he’s doing literally right now. But him even just committing to this invasion less hard would have made a difference that could probably be measured in tens of thousands of lives.

In other words, yes Bard is more human than DK (not setting the bar high, but still it is true). But look at our own real-life world. Is humanity really a barrier to being just as capable of perpetrating horrors as any fantasy villain?

shveiran

I agree. On the other hand, it seems WB is crafting and reinforcing stories that FORCE death and loss as background upon Calernia. For the young orphaned hero to topple the evil empire, the evil empire must have existed for some time and oppressed its citizen so much that no one REALLY expects it to fall. That’s a good story, right?

If that theory is correct... The bard is just as nefarious, her methods are simply weirder and indirect.

Liliet

That conclusion is skipping over many points such as “how willingly is she doing this” and “what even is the alternative”.

And I would like to bring your attention to the existence of the League of Free Cities... and its origin.

Faiir

I don't really agree – I feel like Bard connects to people personally, but is bothered more by the Lone Swordsman's death than that of thousands around him.

While Dead King doesn't care about singular people, but could actually create a stable country for billions. A million losses now could be a statistic if it leads to billions of people living happily over thousands of years.

I do realize it never ends this way in stories because they would be boring, but this is the reason why in-universe story driven powers cause so much strife.

Liliet

>but could actually create a stable country for billions

Gotta love when people look at a dystopia and praise its dictator.

Faiir

How much of it did we actually see though? I don't think it's clear whether it's a dystopia or utopia at this point.

And the fact that Dead King is a dictator on its own isn't that different from other monarchs in Calernia.

Liliet

It's a dystopia because the Dead King is not going to allow them any kind of self-determination or exploration that goes against his ambition / outside the bounds of where he wants them to be.

Mental Mouse

They're both figurative leviathans who think to toy with the mortals beneath them. It's long past time they both got a lesson in perspective.

nick012000

Reminds me a bit of this scene from Bablyon 5:

Ritvik Jha

Well the important part is that the hidden horror won't be able to pass the information that is vital in defeating the intessor

Hardric62

You're saying that as if Masego won't get the intel out while he's dissecting that Neshamah's Shard he's about to get.

Insanenoodlyguy

Odds are decent, it works as an emphasis of Dead Kings utter incoming loss.

Dead King Shard: "Wait! What we've learned

Insanenoodlyguy

Damn I wish wordpress let you edit, accidentally hit send too soon

Dead King Shard (When it's clear it's going to lose): "Wait! What we've learned, it's too important, too valuable, it must be preserved! She-"

Heirophant: "You hurt her. I don't care." does something nasty

Ritvik Jha

Well the important part is that the hidden horror won't be able to pass the information that is vital in defeating the intessor, the real enemy is not keter but the Bard, she keeps the wheels of conflict turning.

Liliet

Keter is kind of low key still also the real enemy.

Kirroth

Here's a thought. We now know the fragment of the Dead King that's possessing Masego doesn't have an active connection to his main body. It has to dial home, so to speak, to deliver news of what it's learned. And the Bard's gambit is to scramble the call until Saint and Sorcerer can destroy the fragment, which it's implied will permanently weaken the Dead King.

If faced with imminent destruction, will the fragment choose to accept the loss or will it try to spite the Bard by passing its uncovered secrets to Cat?

Liliet

Ha.

That would sure be neat!

(Too neat. Too easy. Most definitely won't happen. Or at least, not with the full volume of information... 😊)

Andrew Mitchell

I hope so. I really, really, really hope so.

shveiran

I think it would try, I'm not sure it would succeed.

NerfGlastigUaine

Well fuck. I can't believe it, but I think the Dead King is the underdog in this fight. Wandering Bard is too hax EE, plz nerf

Liliet

Oh pls, did she even have to do anything. Cat was the one to orchestrate the True Love sory here 😊

caoimhinh

She somehow got into Masego's mind/soul to have that conversation, and even made the Dead King's fragment loosen its control over Masego. That's a new trick, and pretty OP (almost like the one she used in her conversation with Amadeus where "by Providence" everyone was asleep and wouldn't wake up until the end of the conversation). If she hadn't intervened it would have taken far longer for Masego to wake up and could possibly get him crippled by Neshamah or killed by Saint.

That is assuming it was indeed the Dead King who moved Masego's body to kill Indrani; at this point I'm no longer sure if it wasn't Bard taking control over his body for a few seconds (she shouldn't be able to do that, but then again she could get some trick out of nowhere and do it, her limitations hadn't really been established).

Liliet

Bard isn't allowed direct touch, and that's as direct as touch gets.

And yeah, she can apparently project herself as an apparition into people's consiousnesses where one person sees her and no-one else does. Like she did at Second Llesse, where Cat saw her.

I don't think she loosened DK's control though, like I think that was falling apart on its own because his ritual was ending. What she did was distract DK with conversation until Masego recovered enough to process Indrani's death 😊

That is fully within her established abilities.

Mental Mouse

> I think that was falling apart on its own because his ritual was ending.

I suspect the part of DK that was actually controlling Masego, was dependent on the latter being isolated from the outside world: DK knew that any new input from reality (and especially Masego's friends) could break the control.

And then Laurence just cut DK's sorcery, specifically the part that was keeping the outside world away from Masego.

Liliet

oh yes, that too 😊

Insanenoodlyguy

Nah, if he was the underdog he could win. Bard's genius is always using somebody else's story. And in that story? Right now he's the deplorable evil that just used a man to hurt his one true love. At this point, his role is to play the "at this moment, the Dead King realized: he fucked up" ragdoll. Anything he can throw at Masego at this point is no longer going to keep the boy down: at most its going to hurt but not stop. Boy's probably about to get his third aspect, and hes' definitely not going to lose. Best case for Dead King is Archer is resurrected and this distracts him long enough for the Dead King to limp away, but since Bard put this together, I'm pretty sure instead it's "Masego might keep rampaging and/or explode unless we can show him that oh look, the woman he just realized he loved is alive again."

konstantinvoncarstein

I wonder what would be his third aspect. Something linked to cleansing, or freeing?

caoimhinh

I wonder about it too.

He is Hierophant Usher of Mysteries and Vivisector of Miracles, his current two Aspects are Witness and Ruin, maybe the last one would be Reveal? That would suit the nature of who Masego is and what his role as Hierophant is. It could also be Usurp, that would be poetically awesome as Usurpation is being said to be the essence of Sorcery in that world.

Actually, his third Aspect could be anything at all and I'm sure it's gonna be badass.

Kissaten

Thinking that the Chaos that is Kairos can be contained – a classic mistake. Thinking that Catherine will not find a common ground with Kairos – a classic mistake x2.

It appears that Dead King planned to use some soul out of thousands as a messenger, Kairos made a play for souls, and Cat was expected to be so appaled by treachery she won't forgive Kairos and fight him to the victory of one of them? Bard appears to be safe from Hierarch – she is pale now, i.e. hierarchy used on black-skinned thalassinians won't make her subject to it, but it's Kairos, he is going to knife her somehow.

Morgenstern

Nah, the DK is expecting one soul to slip out during their struggle. That Cat will keep Kairos from taking over ALL of them for at least long enough for his (the DK's) messenger to slip out.

Mental Mouse

> Thinking that Catherine will not find a common ground with Kairos – a classic mistake x2.

Yeah, I'm expecting that Sword of Heirarchy is about to get used against Neshamah.

Rook

Said it before and I'm gonna make the same call again, the Bard's plot is to be free of Above and Below.

We already knew that she flees from three things: Promised death, direct touch and her heart's desire. When she fled from Hierarch the only thing that makes sense is the third, and she fled the exact moment Anaxares refused to choose Above or Below.

We know that she's directly involved with Above and Below, per the little shtranj match Cat had with Kairos, and that they've put bindings – restrictions on her.

We know now by what Neshamah just revealed that whatever her plot is, it will cause all of 'them' to turn on her. So far she's been observed to be on absolutely no character's side, which realistically leaves only set of entities that could turn on her in the first place, by virtue of not already being hostile to her. The ones she's bound to, the ones she's working for.

Whether that's by striking at them or even at herself in the most elaborate suicide that Creation has ever seen, to be determined; but she's planning to turn on her makers. I suspect that the entire reason she created the Name of Hierarch all those years ago, and why she was so interested in how a Villain was made in the Arcadia record of Neshamah's apotheosis, was for the sake of learning how to create a person that could fulfill that purpose, since her own bindings don't allow her to. The former was a failed test run, the latter was research.

luminiousblu

I severely doubt that she can actually do such a thing. Being as she were literally the "house" in question, Above and Below are like the ground and the sky, while roles are merely wood. Bard gets to change what the rules look like, but she's never even gotten close to outright changing the rules. Even if she burned the house down, I see no reason they can't just build a new one.

Rook

Considering she's a narratively unbeatable abomination that was already ancient when the dead king still had a pulse, the fact that it'd be so difficult to accomplish doesn't disqualify it in the least, in my books. If her goal was of any sort of mundanely difficult feat she'd likely have already accomplished it in a few centuries just to pass the time.

But hey, doubt as you will. I'll be sure to rub it in later.

luminiousblu

Have you considered not being a caustic jackass? Was the last line really necessary?

Andrew Mitchell

To me, that last line was funny and felt like it was meant in the spirit of friendly competition, rather than being cruel or nasty.

I'm not saying I'm right and you're wrong, it's just that we had different reactions.

luminiousblu

That would certainly work, but then that just means Rook vastly overestimated how close we are and whether or not it's appropriate to make 'friendly' competition. So either way it doesn't really come off well. Or maybe I'm overreacting. Who knows.

Mental Mouse

In both one's own comments and reacting to those of others, there is a useful rule to keep in mind: "The failure mode for 'clever' is 'asshole'." It's wise to be careful what you say yourself; but it's also worthwhile to forgive the misjudgements of others.

Andrew Mitchell

Wise words.

Novice

Pretentious much?

Cold Cyberia

I think her plan is to use the rules Gods themselves created to effectively cheat the "house". Even if the house always wins, you can still count cards. I would wager her plan is to present Gods as the villains, herself as the "monster" that will turn on them and humanity as the peasant with a sword – the ultimate heroic underdog.

luminiousblu

Eh I dunno

It depends on how EE wants to write, in the end, but rebellion against the gods is a VERY bad story to be the rebel. It has essentially never ended well prior to the modern era where killing gods is basically the endgame of any angsty hero whose series runs on long enough. Even 'bad' gods like, say, Izanami or Ereshkigal were far beyond mortal means to combat on a metaphysical level. Diomedes hits Ares, but only because Athena is rigging his aim. He "'hurts"' Aphrodite, but then Apollo immediately shows up to stop him from getting big ideas about hurting a goddess who the author of the Iliad had a vested interest in stripping of her capacity as a war goddess. Ishtar is clearly an antagonist in the Epic of Gilgamesh, but Gilgamesh outright loses. Sun Wukong is a deity of sorts already when he rampages through Heaven, but then the real big wigs show up and make a joke out of him. You can't win because the very idea of winning against a deity is not defined. They don't have a loss condition.

The only real angle for a mortal hero is that even the gods can't fight fate, but the Bard ISN'T fate and mortals are just as bound by fate as the gods are. I can see ways for him to pull it off. I just am leery of having a 'rebels against the gods' story end well for anyone but the gods in a story that relies so heavily on abuse of narrative tradition.

Mental Mouse

There's also Masego's old question: If a human gained the knowledge/power of a god, would there be a difference? We may be about to have that answered.

Cold Cyberia

I can't see how the story can end in anything but rebellion against the gods. Beyond the numerous discussions of divinity and apotheosis, an actual murder of a god in the Arcadia arc, hints about Bard's true purpose and the whole Anaxares arc, the most compelling reason to me is that they're the ultimate villain. The real evil of Guide isn't a particular polity or human nature, it's the system (i.e. the gods) which perpetuates and enhances violence, created solely to resolve a philosophical dispute.

Imo, that's very much a narrative Bard has been setting up for ages and it's now coming to fruition. Gods as the ultimate antagonists, mortals as the ultimate underdog heroes, herself as the monster that will turn against her masters. I agree with you in that if a random villain or a hero rebelled against them they would be swatted down – like many of the past Tyrants – but this has been in the works for a long time now.

shveiran

I think it ends in rebelling against the Gods' order, not the Gods per se.

There has been a lot of talk about dissecting low case gods, not the other kind.

We are talking about the beings that created the world, magic and that power up Names; what would you even hurt them with?

To beat them is to escape their Games, not literally BEATING them up.

Cold Cyberia

You'd hurt them by using their own rules against them. Judge the Gods Above to be unjust and usurp the power of the Gods Below through betrayal. Underline the hypocrisy of their rules or re-frame them to the mortals' advantage.

Because deities must follow certain rules. We've seen this with Cat who was calcifying into something unyielding but the most obvious example was the Summer Queen who essentially committed ego suicide in order to fulfil her three duties.

shveiran

Sure, but she was, again, a lower case god. And, you know, she was melting armies as an afterthought still.

I mean, everything we ever saw a Named do? That is a sliver of the gods. There is so much of an imbalance of power that... how can you do anything to them? There isn't even a single STORY to support such a rebellion because it is an unprecedented act, so even story-fu wouldn't work.

I just don't see how it is possible, sorry.

ninegardens

I agree this is more likely to be a "don't beat up the gods, instead we must slip the noose" (as Black might say).

That said... I do think there are PLENTY of stories that can be used here. There are plenty of stories of heroes standing up to unjust kings, heroes bringing down tyrants, and villains usurping thrones. If you want to use the story against the gods, you just have to frame it right so that they fall into the ROLE that the story cares about (even if the story doesn't apply directly to gods in the past).

... that said, I really don't know if the Gods above and below are vulnerable to story-fu. The small gods INSIDE creation, yes, but the ones outside it... I dunno.

Cold Cyberia

I realise it's a lowercase god but the point with the Summer Queen was to illustrate how such being to adhere to their duties. The more power you have the more tightly bound you are to your nature. I think it's the same with Gods. We've already seen they can only intervene at particular moments for example, and that the scales are always balanced.

The Summer Queen had to fulfill three duties. Once it was shown to her that she had to commit ego-suicide in order to keep them up she had to do it. It wasn't really a choice. Gods will also have such restrictions. Above might be based on the belief that the rule of the Gods is always just and good. If you show this isn't the case they will change just how the Summer Queen did.

And there's plenty of stories here. The particulars don't really matter: the fact Gods made Creation is irrelevant to their Role of being tyrants over mortals, in the same way Cat being an undead abomination was irrelevant to pulling the sword out of the stone.

konstantinvoncarstein

"He "'hurts"' Aphrodite, but then Apollo immediately shows up to stop him from getting big ideas about hurting a goddess who the author of the Iliad had a vested interest in stripping of her capacity as a war goddess".

Small correction: Aphrodite was never a war goddess, she is the goddess of love and beauty. It is why Diomède managed to hurt her. Except for that, I agree with you 😊

Euodiachloris

Aphrodite was imported, initially to Crete and Sparta. She was Asarte aka Inanna: "all's fair in love, sex and war – and farming".

Crete and Sparta still had her as a warrior, but... for some reason, the Athenians seem to have taken umbrage at two goddesses using shields, spears and armour. 😊

konstantinvoncarstein

I checked, and you seem right. Thank you for enlightening me 😊

Euodiachloris

Interesting sidenote: although mention of a local goddess named something close to "Athena" is made in a couple of translated linear B fragments, there's no guarantee that Classical Athena isn't, herself, an Astarte-remix-and-reskin from a different angle. Both Athena and Aphrodite have... suspiciously Astarte-ish origin stories. And other tales.

Yup. Sparta and Athens clashing over interpreting similar cultural ideas differently? Shocker. 😊

konstantinvoncarstein

Did you study classical history, or are you just passionate? 😊 Not many people know this kind of things.

Euodiachloris

My dad did: his degree was a first class honours degree in Classics. I just have a passing interest after having grown up around Latin and Greek classics (even though I can read neither languages, let alone their various dialects, at all well).

I have learned to avoid pastoral poetry and plays. Snoozefest alert. And too many random satyrs. 😊

luminiousblu

The Iliad was 'written' soon after Aphrodite was introduced to Greece. Aphrodite Areia was her original 'form', and she was derived from Astarte (goddess of sex, love, lust, war, and fertility) and therefore Ishtar, the goddess of all that plus politics and judgement. There's a very peculiar line in the Iliad where Zeus tells Aphrodite something to the effect of "heh, you have no reason to be on a battlefield silly girl why are you doing that?" and Aphrodite doesn't contest it, instead wholeheartedly agreeing with a super-artificial sounding affirmation of her nature as not a war goddess. That's basically how you know that the point was up for contention at the time of writing and that Homer was trying to pick sides in one of the more touchy political debates of the time.

Aphrodite being hit by Diomedes and then Diomedes immediately getting shut down is an extension of that. A mortal hero, albeit a blessed one, isn't supposed to be able to so much as physically touch a deity who isn't trying to be injured. That Aphrodite is anyway is supposed to highlight WOW SHE'S REALLY NOT A FIGHTER IDK WTF THE SPARTANS WERE THINKING APHRODITE A WAR GODDESS PFFT HAHA. Then Apollo shows up, just to remind the readers (or listeners, more likely) that they shouldn't get a big head and that gods are still a big deal and can push their shit in at will.

caoimhinh

Except that they actually CAN and rebellion against the Gods has been shown to be possible multiple times in ancient stories. It was actually only in recent times, with the ascent of monotheistic religions like Islamism and Christianity that deities started to be considered unbeatable. Ancient cultures respected their gods but also aspired to be like them, gods weren't considered distant unachievable concepts nor omnipotent forces, just very powerful beings or spirits and were shown to intermingle with humans and other creatures, they could be reached and even surpassed with enough effort.

Overcoming of the previous ruler of the Heavens and even a wipeout of an entire previous Pantheon of Gods is in almost every mythology and culture.

Zeus rose to prominence by beating Cronus, and Cronus himself rose to power by beating Uranus (the very reason Zeus, Poseidon and Proteus made arrangements and intervened to make the sea nymph Thetis marry Peleus was that it was prophesized that her son would be greater than his father and Zeus was afraid of that, hence they forced her to marry a mortal human, her son was Achilles)

Similar things are true for whoever is King of Gods in other mythologies, they took the throne by beating their predecessor.

The Egyptians, Celtic, Irish, Nordic, Mayans, Japanese and many more, have examples of Gods killing each other too and dying by the hand of other creatures. In fact, some pantheons are shown to be at war with other races.

Now, you might argue that the point is mortals can't do that (either beating or killing gods), but that was considered to be a very real possibility in ancient mythologies.

Hindu and Chinese myths especially, as in those mythoi humans are actually capable of ascending into deities. It's just that gods went to very long ways to prevent that, it's not that it was impossible.

For example:

The deities against whom Sun Wukong fights used to be humans and animals but trained in esoteric arts to gain power and consumed special meals that gave them immortality, the Jade Emperor (ruler of all chinese gods) was a human that cultivated his way into the throne of heaven (and he wasn't their first ruler either) and his greatest General Erlang Shen (the one who stopped Wukong) was born a mortal too.

Indra, the King of the Devas, was cursed by the mortal sage Gótama Rishi into having vulvae all over his body for having sex with the sage's wife. Indra had to make amends in order for the sage to remove the curse, which means the king of heaven wasn't capable of getting rid of the curse by himself.

Gautama Buddha himself is one of countless ascended humans who stand side by side with the Gods in Taoism and Buddhism.

In Greek myths, humans were shown to be able to beat the Gods even in their specialties; Arachne defeated in their contest of weaving Athena (goddess of wisdom and handicraft) and was cursed into becoming a spider because a Goddess shouldn't be humiliated, Ares (the God of War) was hurt by Diomedes the very same day that Aphrodite was wounded by Diomedes, even if Athena guided the spear the fact remains that Diomedes wounded Ares and MADE HIM RUN AWAY.

So the Gods ARE killable. They can be beaten, restrained, sealed, wounded, and killed by the hands of mortals (and other creatures, like Giants, Cyclops, and monsters too) in almost every mythology.

The only difference is that they have access to greater powers, more knowledge and resources, they are even shown to have longer lifespans thanks to elixirs and exotic fruits (Ambrosia, Nektar, Peaches of Immortality, Amrita, etc). Nordic and Hindu mythologies outright state that anyone can kill a God if they have the adequate tool or spell, showing deities as susceptible to mystic runes, curses and magic weapons (like the ones crafted by Dwarves or the Brahma weapons depicted in the Mahabharata, Ramayana and the Puranas) even when those are used by mortals.

Only the monotheistic religions depict their deity as an almighty, omnipresent and omniscient being, like some kind of distant disembodied force that can do everything (yet strangely has armies of angels and has to depend on them and mortals to carry on his will).

shveiran

That's all very interesting (honestly), but I'm not sure it's relevant to the point being argued.

Calernia and the Guideverse in general are powered by their own mythology, and I don't see many evidences that Gods (not to be confused with gods) can be touched.

I mean, they litterally power Named and bestow them with powers. Think how much difference in level there is between people and Named, then imagine how higher the creator beings stand.

I think they are closer to monotheistic power levels, myself.

luminiousblu

That itself is sort of a trap. It's not about power levels, it's about the fact that they're on a different scale. It'd be like the difference in 'power level' between a human and the property of heat.

caoimhinh

Indeed, the Gods in the Guideverse are too powerful to actually be hurt by the beings inside Creation. Though a sliver of them can be fought and the two sides keep each other at bay from intervening too much in Creation, there's certainly no way for them to be killed by their creations, as the created simply lack the power for that, they can't even get in contact with the Gods without their explicit permission.

I was simply addressing the point of Luminousblu claiming that fighting against the Gods is a modern concept and "the endgame of any angsty hero whose series runs on long enough" as that is simply not true.

luminiousblu

None of those actually matter. You're drawing an artificial line between Abrahamic religions and PIE ones which tells me you come from a culture dominated by Abrahamic values.

>Zeus rose to prominence by beating Cronus, and Cronus himself rose to power by beating Uranus (the very reason Zeus, Poseidon and Proteus made arrangements and intervened to make the sea nymph Thetis marry Peleus was that it was prophesized that her son would be greater than his father and Zeus was afraid of that, hence they forced her to marry a mortal human, her son was Achilles)

What you'll notice is that all of those are deities. Gods fighting gods? Yes, very common. Gods aiding humans in fighting gods? Yes, happens sometimes, especially in heroic epics. Humans fighting monsters, with or without divine aid? Also fairly common. Gods helping humans out and getting fucked by other gods? This one's weirdly cross-culture. Gods fighting humans, and the humans styling on them? No. This just doesn't happen.

Thetis is still divine in nature – all nymphs are minor deities. Narcissus does nothing to Echo, she's cursed and either kills herself or turns into a flower because Narcissus is just so cute and he'll never be hers so she has a mental breakdown. Even Sisyphus locking up Thanatos is essentially Sisyphus tricking Thanatos into locking himself up, he himself didn't do anything because he would've gotten crushed had he tried. All stories where the god loses they basically do themselves in.

>In fact, some pantheons are shown to be at war with other races.

You're thinking of the Norse, I imagine. Here's the problem – the giants are gods too. The Jotun are clearly divine in nature, as are the elves. They're not 'gods', as in they're neither Aesir nor Vanir, but they're still divine. If you're thinking of yokai/yaoguai, those aren't at war with the gods any more than you're at war with termites or mice or the coffee stain on the couch.

>Hindu and Chinese myths especially, as in those mythoi humans are actually capable of ascending into deities. It's just that gods went to very long ways to prevent that, it's not that it was impossible.

Hindu myths are slightly different insofar as heroes are often just outright gods in an avatar, or at least half-deific. Chinese myths don't work the way you think, because being a god is a job you can be hired and fired from by the Jade Emperor and the celestial bureaucracy, which is why there's gods of utterly trivial shit like tofu stands or one specific type of shoe. Saying that they killed gods when speaking of mortals is neither here nor there, it's like saying that sous-chefs can arrest people because they could always quit and get hired as a cop.

>Arachne defeated in their contest of weaving Athena (goddess of wisdom and handicraft) and was cursed into becoming a spider because a Goddess shouldn't be humiliated

That's one specific version that wasn't even very popular in Greece (or possibly postdated the classical era, I'm not sure). The more common versions generally have Arachne either

A. have been outright worse and gotten cursed

B. have been really good, but Athena criticised the topic manner which was a jab at Zeus' infidelity (remember, Athena is Zeus' daughter – you're telling a girl her dad is a cheating manwhore) and Arachne tried to hang herself because oh my god nobody's ever criticised my work so harshly I'm a genius I can't take this but Athena thought this was such a waste so she turned her into something that could still weave beautiful tapestries or

You also need to remember that Athena, goddess of handicraft, had to have given Arachne that talent. It doesn't actually matter even if Arachne was better, because it's still Athena blessing her with such talent. In the original stories Arachne is repeatedly talking shit about Athena, so Athena shows up in the guise of an old lady and tries to warn her off it, to which Arachne replies that in essence if Athena wanted her to stop being a blasphemer maybe she should come down herself, haha! She's nowhere near as petty as you think in this story.

>Ares (the God of War) was hurt by Diomedes the very same day that Aphrodite was wounded by Diomedes, even if Athena guided the spear the fact remains that Diomedes wounded Ares and MADE HIM RUN AWAY.

Firstly, Ares' job is to job. Secondly, you're missing the point. Athena is a goddess of war. So is Ares. The message isn't that Diomedes has the ability or potential to wound Ares, which isn't actually what happens. The message is that Athena is better than Ares. Athena guiding the spear means it's Athena doing the work, Diomedes is used as a vessel to show that Athena, patron of Athens, is better than Ares, patron of Sparta – it's not a coincidence that the Homeric poems were first compiled – and therefore, written down – in Athens. Diomedes attacking Aphrodite is a very strange little thing with little counterpart anywhere else, and was also meant to communicate a message that Aphrodite is not a war goddess the Spartans are talking out of their ass Pandemos and Ouranos ok not Areia long live sea foamer's fat milkers. It's not meaningful to use that line as evidence for Diomedes being a match for a deity – Apollo is also not a war god, but Diomedes shits his breeches at the mere idea of fighting him.

>and other creatures, like Giants, Cyclops, and monsters too

The Cyclopes are divine. Giants, including Greek ones as well as Chinese ones, are divine. They're not "gods" but they're in all respects the same sort of entity, saying the Hundred Handed aren't gods is like saying Nyx isn't a goddess.

>like some kind of distant disembodied force that can do everything

You're being both aggressively atheist and also highly misinformed. Most of the deities are empathetically not 'humans but bigger', the pop culture vision of pagan gods. They are metaphysically higher up the scale. Zeus rules the skies, but he isn't a king ruling a fief, the skies obey him because his authority permeates their existence and it exists with his leave, and his physical form is less important than his metaphysical authority. Most deities continue to exist and function even without a physical form, or a stable one at least. Nyx and Gaia have avatars, but they're irrelevant and arbitrary. Ouranos is still alive and can even still pump a baby into Gaia after being diced into pieces, because Kronos stole his authority as king, being unable to kill him for real. Zeus locks Kronos up but he still affects him, being as he were the titan of – among other things – time.

In other words, pagan deities are still disembodied forces and though they may or may not have avatars (whether or not some of the more esoteric deities around have a physical form is debateable), it's not their core and not what really matters. The reason you can't kill them is largely down to that, or variations thereof. They play on a different field. Humans fighting them is like a 2D object attempting to fuck with a 3D one.

Liliet

>Humans fighting them is like a 2D object attempting to fuck with a 3D one.

Ooooh, I like this comparison.

caoimhinh

I'm not drawing the line, I'm pointing it out. You were the one who claimed fights against Gods were a modern angsty concept, when it's actually a part of every culture. Monotheistic religions being the only ones that claim invincibility for their deity (yet there are still opposing forces to it), whereas in polytheistic religions the Gods are shown to be killable, just really powerful hence the need of special methods or tools to do it.

> "Gods fighting humans, and the humans styling on them? No. This just doesn't happen."

Yet it's never stated as impossible, and it's in fact stated multiple times in many cultures as being a very real possibility, enough to make the Gods move to prevent it from happening. If it were outright impossible there would be no need to act in order to prevent it.

> "You're thinking of the Norse, I imagine. Here's the problem – the giants are gods too. The Jotun are clearly divine in nature, as are the elves. They're not 'gods', as in they're neither Aesir nor Vanir, but they're still divine. If you're thinking of yokai/yaoguai, those aren't at war with the gods any more than you're at war with termites or mice"

Actually, war between the established Gods against other races happens in Greek, Irish, Celtic, Hindu, and Mayan myths too, not only in Nordic myths. Even in monotheistic religions like Zoroastrianism and Christianity there's a war between Good and Evil forces, like Yahveh and the angels against the Devil and demons/fallen angels or Ahura Mazda against Angra Mainyu (which can be interpreted as an abstract conflict but both sides also have supernatural beings supporting them).

True, Giants are said to be born from the blood of Uranus that fell on the earth (making them 'children' of Gaia and Uranus) yet the Giants don't have the powers that the Gods, right? Even Gods doesn't have the same powers that others, except for superhuman physical stats and a bit of magic.

Jotun and Elves aren't divine, they are simply supernatural races that predate humanity, though they are the descendants of the ancient primordial entities, just like the Aesir.

The Tuatha De (the old gods in Irish myths) waged war against other races too, though in later myths they are depicted as Ao Sí, one of the inspirations for our concept of fairies/elves. In some myths and legends there are humans who could count themselves among their number by certain rites, marriage or accomplishing deeds.

Asuras, some Yakshas, and nearly all Rakshasas in Hinduism are examples of other supernatural entities that oppose the Gods and are clearly capable of killing Gods.

In nearly all mythologies, the underworld is filled with creatures that oppose the gods, to the point that making a journey there is considered a perilous trip even for the Gods, so only the bravest and most powerful manage to do it, sometimes relying on magical artifacts.

Not everything supernatural is 'divine', as the distinction between what's divine and what isn't is clearly defined in each mythology, either by the nature of the power or by the authority they wield.

Being a God is not a matter of race (though in some cases all Gods are members of a family or race), it's a title, a matter of authority over some aspect of the world (only the oldest deities are seen as abstract forces that can sometimes take humanoid form), but in most cases those elements or aspects of the world already existed and the Gods simply came to gain authority over them.

That's what marks the difference between a god and other supernatural creatures. Zeus rules the skies and whoever beats Zeus will be the next ruler of the skies, a similar case with Poseidon, he didn't create the seas or the waters (that was Oceanos), yet he came to rule the seas and the many minor sea deities that inhabited them. Assuming Poseidon dies, nothing would happen to the sea, as it doesn't depend on him to exist.

By the way, Cronus wasn't the titan of time, that was Chronos, though the two are often mixed-up and in modern times they are considered the same, the Orphic tradition clearly makes a distinction between the two; in the Theogony of Hesiod from which we got most of our info about Greek Gods, Cronus is the patron of harvest (though that is related to time).

The child of a god might or might not be a god, depending on who the other parent is (the children of Loki with the Jotun Angrboða were outright monsters vastly different to each other and their parents), the conditions of their birth (Dyonisus was a god despite being the child of Zeus with a mortal, thanks to his special birth) and depending on the way they live (doing great deeds was a way for achieving divinity, like is the case of Heracles in Greek myths, and literally anything in Chinese and Japanese myths -as there are Kami for anything at all and objects can gain spiritual consciousness too-)

You claimed that in Chinese myths being a god is simply a job, but that's actually similar to what happens in other mythologies. Only the most ancient deities are considered to emerge from concepts, forces or elements, the rest are regents of elements or originators of crafts/arts, not embodiments of those.

Unlike Greek gods, Egyptian deities were known for the duties they had in the world, not for the powers they wielded.

Mesoamerican deities sometimes didn't have any duty or authority over the world until they had matured as is the case with the Twin Heroes who later became the Sun and Moon.

Zeus wasn't born with the power and authority to rule the skies, neither did Poseidon nor Hades originally have control over the seas and underworld, they earned the right after winning the Titanomachia and then sorted the three domains among themselves. The rest of the deities had 'functions' in the world and that 'job' was their power. And while in some cases they are the ones to invent crafts and teach them to humans that doesn't mean that the humans born with some talent have those talents because they were gifted them by a God (as you claimed was the case with Arachne).

Also, as I pointed in my first comment, the immortality of the gods is said to be maintained by the consumption of special meals and elixirs in many mythologies (Amrita, Ambrosia, Nektar, Immortality Pills, etc) with the notable exception of the primordial entities that are anthropomorphic concepts (like Chaos, Nyx, Gaia, Uranus) and even then they can be beaten by the later generations (like Uranus was beaten by Cronus, who was beaten by Zeus and Zeus lived in fear that someone would eventually surpass him, likely one of his children).

We both presented examples of humans (Diomedes and Heracles) wounding Gods, I provided an example of a Rishi in Hinduism being capable of cursing Indra the king of heaven, forcing him to apologize and make amends if he wanted the curse lifted. Chinese texts like Fengshen Yanyi(or Investiture of the Gods), Journey to the West and earlier myths also state that humans can kill gods and elevate themselves to the status of gods, gain immortality and power, the positions in Heaven are not directly related to the power of the person, quite the contrary they attain positions by displaying power. As I said above, the top deity the Jade Emperor and the greatest warrior of heaven Erlang Shen were born and raised as mortal humans yet they achieved power by their own training. The deities in Mesoamerican myths could actually be hurt by mosquitos, snakes, birds, and other animals, they could even be killed by poison, suffocation, drowning and landslides, so it's not farfetched to think humans could kill them.

So once again I point out that the clearest difference between humans and mythical gods is simply their access to knowledge and resources, any mortal could become immortal if they consumed the food of the gods or drank their beverages (even in Christianity there's the Fruit of Life in Eden shown in Genesis -with Yahveh stating that humans must be prevented from eating it or they would live forever- and the Waters of Life in the Celestial Jerusalem shown in Apocalypse), also any mortal had a decent chance of killing a God if they were to use special weapons, which were not always made by the deities (Odin's spear and Thor's hammer were made by Dwarves) or to use magic.

TL;DR: there are multiple examples in all mythologies that state that humans killing gods isn't impossible, just very hard and a matter of lack of access to adequate resources. And it's definitely not a modern concept.

luminiousblu

I'm really getting tired of reading this shit because of WordPress formatting being utter garbage so I'll make one more reply and read yours if you make one.

>Yet it's never stated as impossible, and it's in fact stated multiple times in many cultures as being a very real possibility, enough to make the Gods move to prevent it from happening. If it were outright impossible there would be no need to act in order to prevent it.

The fact that it doesn't happen in makes it effectively impossible in guideverse. Depending on the actual mythos, killing a god can be anywhere from totally impossible to something out of reach of mortals and even heroes. It's outright impossible in Greek myth, while in Norse myth it's not impossible or anything but normal people can't pull it off. People rebel, but it always ends poorly for them. Even temporary victories where you pull a fast one on the gods end with more major defeats, which would make you the villain carrying a huge villain ball and 100% doomed to die in guideverse terms.

>Actually, war between the established Gods against other races happens in Greek, Irish, Celtic, Hindu, and Mayan myths too, not only in Nordic myths. Even in monotheistic religions like Zoroastrianism and Christianity there's a war between Good and Evil forces, like Yahveh and the angels against the Devil and demons/fallen angels or Ahura Mazda against Angra Mainyu (which can be interpreted as an abstract conflict but both sides also have supernatural beings supporting them).

I would argue most of those established races are in fact divine. The Asura in Hindu myths are outright gods, for a given definition of 'god' since Hindus have a very abstract notion of what is and isn't a deity and how they're related to each other. You're drawing a hard line between the supernatural and the divine but in that case the problem is that such a strong distinction between the two stems directly from the whole thou shalt have no gods before me thing. There sometimes was a distinction, but it often was depicted as a difference of faction and not of kind, or otherwise was close to being differences in level where the gods were even higher up the ladder (or lower, depending on the mythos).

>That's what marks the difference between a god and other supernatural creatures. Zeus rules the skies and whoever beats Zeus will be the next ruler of the skies, a similar case with Poseidon, he didn't create the seas or the waters (that was Okeanos), yet he came to rule the seas and the many minor sea deities that inhabited them. Assuming Poseidon dies, nothing would happen to the sea, as it doesn't depend on him to exist.

Assuming nobody replaces him, however, Okeanos, who didn't create the waters but is simply what they are, the ocean will sit there doing absolutely nothing forever. It's the authority that matters. You can't steal divine authority as a mortal any more than you can get a fish to take over Mars.

>The child of a god might or might not be a god, depending on who the other parent is (the children of Loki with the Jotun Angrboða were outright monsters vastly different to each other and their parents), the conditions of their birth (Dionysus was a god despite being the child of Zeus with a mortal, thanks to his special birth) and depending on the way they live (doing great deeds was a way for achieving divinity, like is the case of Heracles in Greek myths, and literally anything in Chinese and Japanese myths -as there are Kami for anything at all and objects can gain spiritual consciousness too-) Kami are not really gods the way you'd normally recognise them to be. They're akin to a sort of vital essence or personification of concept. Everything is divine in Japanese myth, every hair on your head and every bottle of water has a kami associated with it, but they're not gods.

As for your arguments about the Chinese I think one of the things you're missing here is that firstly 1. It's not about the role, it's about the fact that you can be hired and fired at will and 2. The whole idea that you can kill a god as a human only holds true for a flimsy definition of human. A 'cultivated' buddhist or taoist is immortal and nearly invulnerable to mundane harm. He is basically halfway there to being divine. That also holds for almost every hero who's shown to wound gods – Hercules, for example, is half-god, and more than that even drank from Hera's bosom (who, remember, while not the goddess of motherhood is still the goddess of marriage and wives) which gave him a stupidly huge power spike.

>So once again I point out that the clearest difference between humans and mythical gods is simply their access to knowledge and resources, any mortal could become immortal if they consumed the food of the gods or drank their beverages

This is super arguable. Whether or not you could just eat the food of the gods and therefore become as the gods varies based on account. Usually it's not the case. The fruit of knowledge/life are clearly metaphors, even in the second century early Christians recognised how absurd it was to obtain knowledge by the physical teeth.

As for claiming that gods are more knowledgeable and more powerful humans undermines the entire point of them being gods. I know it's popular in the modern era to think this way but that's not how people thought back then, not the context stories were written for, and that's why most stories where you rebel against the gods ends very poorly, because the underlying message in most of them is an exposition on character flaws of the hero – hubris, restlessness, greed, or simply being delusional. Because at the end of the day the problem here is for ancients that fighting against the gods is a lot like fighting against the rising sun. If you don't like the fact that the sun is in your eyes every morning, the best bet is to just suck it up and deal with it instead of incessantly complaining and pissing everyone around you off.

grzecho2222

If I remember she fled when he called her to court and given that she would have gotten death penalty...

Fayhem

> So far she's been observed to be on absolutely no character's side, which realistically leaves only set of entities that could turn on her in the first place, by virtue of not already being hostile to her.

I have to dispute your reasoning here. She's been shown to us, the audience to be on no character's side. Literally no one on the continent has gotten the range of POVs that we've gotten. The fact that she isn't allied to anyone doesn't mean that no one thinks she's allied to them.

Valkyria

Since it was mentioned by “the old thing” I can’t stop thinking of Saint well damn. I didn’t actually mean to hit send there.

Valkyria

what I meant to say was

Since it was mentioned by “the old thing” I can’t stop thinking of Saint as one of this little wash-cloth thingies you throw into the washing machine along with your clothes so it won’t change color...

Liliet

omg nice

ActionKermit

Pretty sure the “old thing” is the Prince of Nightfall.

Valkyria

I know I just found it amusing how she didn’t even use any (N)name or title because he is something that does not need proper adresssing

Mental Mouse

> one of this little wash-cloth thingies you throw into the washing machine along with your clothes so it won’t change color...

Digression: What “thingies” are those? I’ve dealt with several pink-underwear incidents (and similar) over my decades, and I’ve never heard of such a countermeasure.

Valkyria

Just google “color catcher sheets” and there’s results... I dunno what country you’re from so maybe do it in your own language if it’s not English anyway.
How I got to know them? – Watching to much commercials does the trick.

P.S. I never tried them myself so please don’t hold me responsible if they do not work xD

Mental Mouse

Thank you!

caoimhinh

That must be some kind of Nordic esoteric thingy, do be careful when taking witchcraft advice from a Valkyrie. XD

Cold Cyberia

It strikes me that the narrative could be going along the Shakespearean lines of lovers united in death. Probably not going to happen and I suspect people would go mental but I would love a move like that. Looking at the visions we have:

"He saw a garden and a pale woman in a dress. He saw a man with a silver coin, spinning and spinning until it dropped. He saw a crowned corpse, a grinning skull"

It's possible the pale woman is Wondering Bard (described so later in the chapter) and the garden refers to Arcadia. Her origins maybe? She could've been a fae initially seeing as she's more like a story pattern than a living being of flesh anyway.

The spinning silver coin is a reference to White Knight and when it drops, he finalizes his judgement? Crowned corpse is probably Dead King, not sure if the grinning skull also alludes to him or maybe something else.

We didn't really get much on Bard out of this exercise. Apparently DK thinks her goals are fairly petty and heroes would abandon her were they find them out. I maintain she wants to get revenge on Gods for forcing her into a life of creating atrocities and maintaining the game.

Novice

The pale woman in a garden is more likely to be the Augur, I think.

ChillyPepper

Everyone is mentioning how this was a mistake. Did anyone think that this is still design?

As weird as it sounds, I think the Dead King did not expect to make it out of this, and he just wanted to expose the "grand scheme", hence the "They will turn on you" part.

If the shard remains in Heirophant and said Heirophant is able to check it in some manner, wouldn't this be an ultimate victory rather than a mistake?

Mental Mouse

> I think the Dead King did not expect to make it out of this, and he just wanted to expose the "grand scheme",

Per the text, the knowledge is still in a DK-shard within Masego, DK didn't expect that bit of him to survive. He figured it could pass the goods to him... which it might have, if Masego weren't now awake and prone to summarily obliterating any part of the DK he can reach.

I think DK is about to rediscover the hazards of "and the next step"....

Insanenoodlyguy

He was going for a Xanatos gambit, but unlike the titular man himself has forgotten what it is to be mortal. For those of you who didn't watch Gargoyles, Xantos is basically the ultimate "I already won, because there's literally no outcome where I don't get something I want." antagonist, hence being a trope namer. His plan B or C was usually the real plan all along and happened during Plan A, which was thwarted sure, but long after it actually mattered. and a glorious bastard voiced (and modeled after) Jonathan Frakes. It looks like Dead King was aiming for "I discover the Bards Plan. I send that part of myself back unharmed." with backups of "I can still send the message to myself even if I'm thwarted early, worth the crippling if I can get one up on HER." and maybe a "Masego prizes knowledge. Even if he comes out of this intact, he'll learn this, and spread it. I negotiate with cat to get the knowledge." All of these, it honestly wouldn't shock me, are the plan B after plan A of invade the continent, because I believe he'd be willing to escalate the deal to "I will not come out again unless expressly invited" in order to get that piece of knowledge. The invasion succeeded would be nice but was all a pretext for this more important thing.

The part he's missing, having not been mortal for too long, is the part where, given the chance to persevere or at least hear the secret, Masego in the height of his rage says "YOU HURT HER. I DON'T CARE WHAT YOU KNOW." and obliterates him even at the cost of that valuable memory. As a result he'll keep going forward with Plan A, but in truth the whole goddamn mess fails here and now.

Liliet

Y e p 😊

Valkyria

Not really chapter related but... am I the only one who sees the Heiropphant and Masego as kind of different people? I mean i know they are one Person ans such... But to me Masego is the son of his fathers, the socially awkward but likeable weirdo who is in some ways naive and quite the sociopath.

But the Hierophant is like this powerful mage, who is just mindblowingly powerful when it comes to sorcery who doesn't really care about people just about his research and finding ways to achieve whatever he's currently working on. Sure it's basically Him vs his Name but still.

It's a little like the Black Queen / Cat thing, like she discussed with Akua. But the Black Queen still is Cat in so many ways, what they want or can do mostly differs only on a political level than a personal.

It's like Archer is so herself within her Name in a way that I just think Masego is not. Only a feeling on my part here so I don't know though. It's just a random thought that crossed my mind and that I wanted to share...

Mental Mouse

> am I the only one who sees the Heirophant and Masego as kind of different people?

I think the crux of this plot is exactly that they are the same, even if Masego himself might not have accepted that yet. Remember, by our standards Masego is a high-functioning autistic. The classic "Aspie fallacy" is to see themselves as "a brain on a stick", failing awareness of their body and the emotions coming from it. But we can learn better...

Valkyria

That actually explains a lot. I never considered it like that... but now it makes a hell lot of sense.

also... how do you write in cursive here? Is it possible to learn this power?

Andrew Mitchell

These text boxes we're typing in accept formatting using basic HTML tags which have been part of the world wide web since it's beginnings. You can learn how to do it here.
https://www.w3schools.com/html/html_formatting.asp

I know blockquote, bold and italics all work, I don't know what other formatting works.

Valkyria

I actually know how that all works, i know basic html from school.
I just didn't know simply typing them inside my text would work.

Aotrs Commander

In fairness, it's not always clear which particular set of formatting is available (if any) in any given forum/blog/comments section.

Andrew Mitchell

True. I tried to find WordPress specific information but couldn't.

caoimhinh

Fascinating

Mental Mouse

You mean italics? You do that with HTML tags. You don't get all the tags, but you can use at least:

`italics`, `bold`, `<s>strikeout</s>`. Let me try a couple of others: `^{super}`, `_{sub}`.

And now we see if I managed to get all that right.

Mental Mouse

OK, looks like superscript and subscript don't work. The HTML entities (https://www.w3schools.com/html/html_entities.asp) do though, that's how to get symbols like hearts (though WordPress also seems to interpret some text-style smileys).

In my last note I made heavy use of the entity `<` which gives a `<` symbol when it would otherwise start an HTML tag. To write the last sentence I used `&` which I just used recursively.

ninegardens

And here is me reading that and thinking: "Well yeah, I am a brain on a stick."

Andrew Mitchell

I'm familiar with that feeling.

Mental Mouse

The reason I firmly call it a fallacy is that it leads to getting blindsided by emotions, which affect us even if we can't always perceive them. (It also leads to neglect of the body, which has all kinds of bad effects.)

Mind you, the “brain on a stick” impression isn’t a new thing, nor unique to autistics. It’s in the same vein as Cartesian dualism – which, let me grant, is natural law in the Guideverse. 😊

But even in the Guideverse... well, the Hierophant who has been food-processing devils for power, is still the same Masego whose affection Indrani has been gently nurturing for months (years?). And who just woke up to the sight of her corpse. Emotions are going to happen here, and they’re going to happen to someone who isn’t used to feeling them. And who has a fair bit of magical power left. This isn’t going to be pretty.

Andrew Mitchell

These text boxes we’re typing in accept formatting using basic HTML tags which have been part of the world wide web since it’s beginnings. You can learn how to do it here. https://www.w3schools.com/html/html_formatting.asp

I know blockquote, bold and italics all work, I don’t know what other formatting works.

Aotrs Commander

sigh

That was such an astoundingly stupid rookie mistake to make, I question how Dead King has actually lasted this long if he’s going to make idiotic mistakes like that – especially since he’s supposed to be paranoid and going up against something he knows is the Narrative.

Mind you, that said, he doesn’t seem like a particularly good general, relying on little more than weight of numbers and a few toys to swamp the enemy, so perhaps I shouldn’t be that surprised.

I guess I’m just naturally wired to expect better out of a lich purported master-necromancer...

konstantinvoncarstein

I agree that it was a stupid mistake. But concerning his military tactics, maybe it is because his goal is not conquest?
🤔

caoimhinh

Well, to be fair, we have seen him use his Undead in pretty interesting ways besides the already powerful Revenant Named: digging underground tunnels to attack fortified positions, forming gigantic snakes filled to the brim with undead soldiers, poisoning rivers and lakes, blighting the land, using flying wyverns that breathe venom, and even undead warlocks to cast spells.

Also, his defeat in this case is due to the Wandering Bard somehow being able to appear inside Masego's soul and wrestle control of his body out of the Dead King's grip. It's still up to debate if it was him or her the one who moved Masego's hand to cast the spell that killed Indrani, but the Intercessor made Neshamah loosen his grip on Masego enough that Hierophant was able to see Indrani's corpse. No one saw that coming.

Liliet

(I fucking adore that the actual answer for the source of his mistake here turned out to be "amatonormativity")

Liliet

Do note that this defeat still doesn't really hurt him. Sure, he's going to be diminished by one little sliver of himself that he invested into this scheme, and the scheme itself is going to fail.

But the 'main' him is still there, barely scratched, not in the line of fire at all. His favorite gambit: to make heroes' victory something other than seriously hurting him because that's just how dangerous it is.

That part's still working!

JRogue

I think the petty thing that the Bard wants is death, and a little revenge on the Gods the way out.

Ultimately I believe Cats goal is end the "Name Game" the Gods have going and leave humanity and other races) to rule itself without their intervention.

So either Bard saw a promising student in Cat (who was taught by Amedaus and has likely exceeded his teachings) and started manipulating this a long time ago. Or Cat sees Bard as a way to end the Gods manipulation narratively speaking somehow.

I believe DK dies, or ceases to be a real threat, and the "Big Bad" of Book 6 will be the Bard, who ends up beat by Cat, but wins because she dies and Names are destroyed, then the Gods can no longer interfere, even indirectly, in humanities (and other races) destiny.

Kinda speaking long term here, but this group of scenes presents a chance to look way forward in the overall story.

shveiran

Beautiful. Absolutely beautiful.

Larat finally entering the picture, ominous and promising at the same time.

The wasteland of Masego's being, suggesting the question is not "what he'll lose" but "will there be something left".

Archer being Archer, reminding us once more how each character of the Guide moves in accordance of strings of his own.

Saint being a dick but a heroic dick nonetheless, and Tariq trying to balance all the moving parts to the best of his limited abilities.

Roland apparently

The DK's casual murder, just in case someone was wondering why he was such a big deal; I'm having a strong Warlock-Bumblng Conjuror vibe.

Juicy insights on the DK's power, the intrigue with the Bard's plan and most of all...

... the power of love saving the day in such a way I'm rooting for it.

Marvelous, absolutely marvelous. Thank you, thank you so very much.

jack

So what is it that the Dead King knows that will have everyone turn on the Bard?

Kissaten

Apocalypse, maybe? Maybe Bard pocketed Triumphant somehow and intends to let her loose on the world once more? Demons are destroying narratives, so maybe it's Bard's masterplan.

Andrew Mitchell

Wait, "Demons are destroying narratives"?!!? I feel like I missed something important.

Where did that come from?

Kissaten

Demons destroy and corrupt Creation, they are outside of set of rules gods placed upon it.

JJR

Calernia has gotten too far outside it's parameters and she plans to study physics until the gnomes come.

Probably not, but it would turn literally everyone against her.

onedollargum

The Calamities wreaked physical havok, but the Woe wound ideology.

Calemyr

I haven't posted here, but I've been reading this series for a while (caught up at the start of Book V) and greatly enjoying it.

My theory is that the Bard's "disappointing and petty" game is that she's actively working to continue the war between good and evil. As long as there is a compelling story, the Theory of Narrative Causality remains in effect and tropes are effectively physical law. That is the meaning of "The House Always Wins" in this case: as long as stories thrive, a savvy student of story-fu is just shy of omnipotent.

The flip side, of course, is why I assume she's the end-game final boss of this tale. Stories starve without conflict. Peace is anathema to her. Cat's dream is effectively the Bard's death.

Hope that makes sense.

Andrew Mitchell

Welcome Calemyr. 😊 Good to have you join in the commenting community. We're a very civil and thoughtful group and IMO our discussions really add to my enjoyment of the Guide. I've learnt a LOT from many people here who see deeper and/or differently than I do.

> My theory is that the Bard's "disappointing and petty" game is that she's actively working to continue the war between good and evil.

You're in agreement with many folk here, including me. There are some interesting dissenting views on this though.

> The flip side, of course, is why I assume she's the end-game final boss of this tale. Stories starve without conflict. Peace is anathema to her. Cat's dream is effectively the Bard's death.

Well said. You've stated that much more clearly than I could have.

ninegardens

So, some people have accused Nessie of not being badass/impossible cautious enough here... but I think there is an important point to make here:

This isn't Nessie ACTUALLY losing.

By which I mean, he staked something here, and he may lose his stake, but it is entirely possible he is playing this game more recklessly than he would the ACTUAL game, because this is only at 1% stakes.

Sometimes being ultra cautious always isn't enough to assure victory, so being able to break off a tiny piece of yourself that you CAN throw into a riskier game is a VERY useful ability.

So yeah, the the bard may have beaten him. This time. That's fine.

JJR

Except his soul doesn't heal, maybe. And if that's the case losing 1% at a time to Bard The Ever Living will end with him losing, even if it takes millennia.

Javvies

Yes and no.

It's certainly not something he can afford to do repeatedly. However, if it's a one-time tradeoff to find out what's actually going on with Bard (her true goals and endgame) ... it might actually be worth it.

Especially since he probably didn't expect that he'd be in serious danger of losing the shard of himself that's in Masego.

Also, since tinkering with souls is a thing, and he'd have the most experience, skill, and knowledge at doing so, it is possible that he might be able to graft replacement soul bits to his own, in order to recover from damage, even if he can't naturally heal.

ninegardens

Right, which is why he wouldn't take this risk if there wasn't something worth gaining.

But "Knowledge of Bard's plans for this Epoch" seems like a worthwhile thing to risk 1% soul damage on. Especially if you are concerned that her actual plan might be MORE than 1%.

Liliet

This!

Mental Mouse

Aside from personal damage, Nessie's potentially facing a hit team of Powers and alliances which could at least wipe Keter off the map within a hundred years, and might actually be capable of ending DK for real.

Liliet

This.

Yes, Neshamah lost. I'm not seeing anything weird here, his entire strategy is "I lose... and I lose... and I lose... yet somehow I'm still here, undiminished"

Forrest

Okay, so... Neshamah messed up badly. Side note: it would appear that many of us were right and that Archer's (hopefully temporary) demise was being suggested early in the book. Though I have a slight suspicion about the bard's plans I've held for a little while as to why she has been helping Cat get so set up. It pertains to the theory many here expressed that she's been wanting to escape her role that she's been fulfilling for ages now.

I feel like she's planning on escaping her role by placing Cat in that role instead. Which would also explain why he felt they would all turn on her, including Saint, cause it's not like she would like having Cat around like that.

Daniel E

I don't care how much Goodness the Pilgrim pours into Archer's resurrection, she is going to have the mother of all headaches when she returns. Like month-long blackout drunk hangover. I also wonder if her errant brain matter will be magically poofed back inside her, or simply regrown. I recall Hierophant mentioning at Camps that Pilgrim's power is more akin to crazy-fast healing than true resurrection.

Liliet

Indrani waking up surrounded by bits of her own brain, is absolutely going to happen 😊

medailyfun

that amount of brain bits makes many brain bytes :o)

Jonnnnz

OK, I really hate the Karma Houdini trope. The entire world is based around it being impossible, yet one villain pulls it off. I speak, of course, about the Bard. We have seen her help Akua commit atrocities, turn the Drow into what they are now, stopped the dead king from even considering conquering more from Below after she aided his rise, and all the while she never stopped her over the top villainous monologues, revelling in taunting those she torments. Have we ever seen her remotely heroic? Actually helping anyone? Doing anything that isn't strictly creating larger body counts?

I get that the Karma Houdini is supposed to make us hate a character, but for me it is just tiring. She brings out the worst in people because reasons, people let her because gods exist, but she's nothing more.

Liliet

She created the League of Free Cities. She stopped Black from doing what he was doing in the Free Cities and possibly set him on a path to redemption (?). She's been keeping conflicts from escalating beyond measure, making sure DK knows not to set plagues on the continent and not to get too greedy with the surface. She gave the Sisters their bargain, allowing the drow to survive.

Bard is not an unambiguous villain, no, and we still don't know what her endgame actually is, nor who are 'they' who would turn against her at apparently one word from the Dead King.

superkeaton

To quote the Dead King, "Boom, headshot!"

Ah, love. Stronger than death.

Speaking of death, whatever happened to Assassin? Nary a peep from that most tenebrous of knives lately.

Liliet

He was in Ashur, impossible to reach, even before the naval blockade went into action.

Unmaker

The Dead King, who has survived and prospered by not making narrative mistakes, just made what seems to be an obvious narrative mistake. There have been a number of theories as to why above, but here's another one:

He failed, not because he was passionless, but the opposite. His passion since before his death has been working against the Intercessor. For the first time in a long time, he has a chance to do just that. With that intellectual rush going through his brain, his normal error avoidance routines may have been ignored for a moment. And a moment is all it takes.

Interlude: Reverberation

"At which point Lord Bujune and Lady Rania both accused the other of being the Emperor in disguise, and the meeting devolved into protracted argument until the final quarter hour had passed."

– Extract from the minutes of the fourth meeting of the Red Fox Conspiracy, as taken by the stenographer Shamna Mehere (later revealed to have been Dread Emperor Traitorous all along

"She is not permanently dead."

Hierophant caught the withdrawing hand by the wrist. This was, he knew, mere symbolic slant: a way for his feeble mortal mind to interpret a complex interplay of forces it could not truly understand even as it used them. The Dead King was not truly standing behind him. The Wandering Bard had not stood in front, either, smiling like a well-fed cat. And so when he squeezed the wrist of Trismegistus until the bones broke, it was not the strength of his grip that mattered. Only that of his mind.

"Listen to me," the Dead King said. "The Pilgrim can still resurrect her. If I do not intervene. Do not make me intervene."

"Can you?" Masego asked, cocking his head to the side.

His sorcery, usurpation usurped, rose without his bidding. Like a spear being formed from a dozen threads of magic. It was not, Hierophant noted, the formula that would make a Revenant. But it might be that turning Indrani into such a manner of undead would interfere with Above's work, so it was not to be tolerated. If you can't defend, he remembered Catherine once telling him, attack so your enemy has to. And so Masego did not pit his will against the Hidden Horror's simply weaving spell with his own hands and striking at the Dead King's presence.

Power met power, a stalemate of an instant, and then the Hierophant truly went on the offensive.

—

Three heartbeats had passed.

On the first, young Indrani had died. With cold nonchalance the Dead King had raised his hand, spoken a word and sent out a flickering spike of void too swift for even the Pilgrim's eye to follow. It had ripped through the Archer's forehead, the flesh not wounded or even vaporized so much as... unmade. Gone. The sorcery around the flesh was so strongly concentrated it obscured even his sight. The warning that began to be spoken after through the mouth of the imprisoned Hierophant, Tariq cared little for. He'd heard many of those before and might yet hear more – threats presented as a warning, fear spoken calmly as if that simple veneer changed the nature of what was being said.

On the second heartbeat Laurence, taken aback yet not beyond action, had darted forward to catch Indrani's corpse by the back of the cloak. To drag it out of the way of the returning sorcery the Saint had parted with a blow of her sword, lest the Archer's body be mangled by the wild and whirling magic. Roland finished the last syllable of the incantation he'd begun, protective panes of translucent sorcery forming around Indrani's body. Too late to be of use even presuming they would have held, which the Pilgrim doubted. Tariq did need to look at the young man's face to know it had gone ashen, burning guilt flaring at the thought of having been too slow. A loss tied to deeper fears, fears that Tariq could do nothing to soothe away. To meddle too much in the conflict that lay at the heart of Bestowal was a danger to all involved, he'd learned the hard way.

On the third heartbeat, young Indrani's corpse was unceremoniously tossed out of the way by Laurence, sliding across the rune-covered tiles and leaving behind a trail of wet blood. The shield around it winked out, Roland having dismissed the working with a clenched hand, and the other two heroes turned to the possessed warlock with hard eyes. Saint with the intent to cut, either the boy or the infestation. The Sorcerer with guilt-threaded determination, intent on confiscating the sorcery as he no doubt told himself he should have done from the start. It was these implacable twinges of conscience that always reassured Tariq the young man was in no danger of falling into Below's embrace. Willingly, anyway.

"- expand beyond the recoverable."

"Hold," the Peregrine said.

He had not raised his voice. It resonated anyway, and the other two stilled. The Hierophant's body half-rose, sorcery flaring, but then it fell back down and his power seething uneasily.

"The boy's fighting it," Laurence said, tone holding the barest hint of respect.

It was the closest to praise she'd ever come when mentioning any of the Woe. Tariq gazed down at the corpse of the vivacious young woman he'd spoken with, and for an instant wondered at coincidence. That she would take such a risk unflinching, knowing that the opponent was the Hidden Horror. That it would be young Indrani he was partnered with heading into the deeps, as if to make it certain he'd know what was lost should he stay his hand. How far ahead did you see, Catherine Foundling? How deep did the Black Queen's cunning truly run? It did not matter, the Pilgrim told himself. Not so long as it was turned against their enemy, against the Enemy.

"There will be an opening," Tariq said, tone calm and patient and unrelenting. "And when it appears, we will strike at the Dead King with our wroth entire."

The Hierophant, empowered by his affections and the death of one beloved, would throw off the Abomination's yoke for a moment. It would be enough for the rest of them to... A shiver went through the room, through this warped place, and as if tugged by strings the fabric of it began to pull inwards. Towards the Hierophant. Like silver mist, the souls of hundreds of thousands slithered through the open bronze gates and burrowed into the blind warlock's thin frame. Villain, the Pilgrim remembered then. The Woe were, for all the kind intentions of their leader, still villains.

And their kind did not get clean victories, even against each other.

—

"You are being made use of by the Intercessor," the Dead King said. "To your own detriment and that of your mistress."

"I do not have a mistress," Masego said. "In any sense of the term of which I am aware."

The bindings he'd wrought while half-mad were, it had to be said, a work of art. The elegance of their structure was matched only by its strength, far beyond any working made by his hand he could recall. He suspected that Trismegistus might have whispered insights, though considering he was going to end the creature it was unlikely he'd ever know for certain. The souls poured into him, power accumulated at a breakneck rate, though never more than he could handle. He'd made certain of that, taking only the slightest portion before releasing the dead to the Underworld awaiting them. It made the rate of accumulation easier to control, and to his understanding remained legal under Callowan law. It might be necessary, Masego mused, to secure some sort of permit for such future ventures. He would consult Adjutant on the subject.

"I know what she plans, Hierophant," the Dead King said. "And it would destroy all you hold dear."

Though the warning seemed well-intended, Trismegistus simultaneously attempted to seize enough sorcery to sever himself from Hierophant in what was likely an attempt to flee. Masego, without batting an eye, released all that Trismegistus would wield unshaped. Wild. Dimly, he noted that it appeared his shoulder now had a smoking hole in it. The physical one, anyway.

"You are dying," the Dead King said.

"That has been true since my birth," Masego reasonably pointed out.

"Your attempts to hinder my escape are killing you," Trismegistus said.

"That is true," Hierophant agreed. "Though I expect they'll annihilate you first, at which point I will cease and survive while you remain annihilated."

Ah, Masego thought, slightly worried. Was this a monologue? He'd been warned against those by several people.

"Given such a premise, what reason do I have not to kill us both?" the Dead King said.

"Nothing," Hierophant acknowledged. "You simply lack the ability-"

He paused, looking for something suitably pithy to add. Insults were pithy, he vaguely remembered quite a few of his friends using them.

"- you Jaquinite," he scathingly added.

—

"Tariq," Laurence hissed. "What the Hells is happening?"

The torrent of souls was streaming around the Grey Pilgrim without ever touching him, as if the dead were shying away from the Choir ever holding vigil over the soul of the Peregrine, but the rest of them didn't have a pack of winged guardians to rely on. She'd put her sword through the floor and anchored herself to that, but inch by inch she was being dragged towards the Hierophant by the sheer quantity of dead souls pushing against her. Through the mess she could see Roland huddling under roiling tongues of light, pressed against the ground. His protective spell was being battered down, moment by moment.

"The Hierophant is gathering and then releasing the dead," Tariq said, calm voice carrying perfectly through the whistling sound of flowing souls. "Massing strength for a crippling blow at the Hidden Horror."

"And what happens if we're drawn into that?" Laurence yelled.

She did not gesture at the maddened sorcerer, as she might very well fall into the current if she took a hand off her sword. Already her blade was being pushed back through the stone, her boots slowly sliding with it.

"Death, presumably," the Peregrine said, then paused as if speaking to the unseen. "Definitely death, Laurence, I retract the presumption."

You'd think the fucking Ophanim would bother to serve as more than some kind of almanac of dire ends, wouldn't you? But Mercy was all about the soft touch, way she understood it, so unlike one of Judgement's Chosen her old friend couldn't simply call down attention and have this entire black mess smote into smoking ruin.

"Do something then," she screamed.

"That won't be necessary," Tariq said. "It's been long enough. If the souls are in here, Saint, then out there what is left to fight over?"

Now wasn't the time for bloody riddles, she thought, but then there was thunderous sound above and the room's ceiling dented. Solid stone. A heartbeat later the dent became an explosion of shards and shape fell through. It was a throne, Saint saw, though acid seemed to have eaten away large chunks of it. The ceiling shook once more, though a stunted silhouette tumbled through the hole. The Tyrant of Helike, Laurence saw, was being carried by gargoyles holding his robe and had a visibly worsening black eye. He looked up, slightly worried, though he rallied quick.

"It's not what you think, Catherine," the Tyrant called out. "I swear. I didn't betray you to the Dead King again. Why, I'd never."

There was a beat.

"I betrayed you to someone else entirely," Kairos Theodosian proudly announced.

The gargoyles had to draw him back when a crumpled sword fell through where he'd come, and Laurence half-expected the Black Queen to follow through – only, instead, tendrils of darkness tore through half the ceiling and ripped it out like some gargantuan monster. Above them, the hood of her many-coloured cloak raised and two large crows perched on her shoulders, Catherine Foundling coldly glared downwards from the edge of the roof. Gargoyles began raining down, mangled and seemingly half-devoured.

It'd been a while, Laurence thought, since she'd seen the Black Queen really lose her temper.

—

"You are not in love with her," the Dead King said, sounding irritated. "With resurrection assured by the Pilgrim, unrequited affection should not have been sufficient. Not even with her meddling."

Hierophant spared an irritated thought for Trismegistus as well, irked by the presumption of that. As if a cursory reading of his memories would be enough to understand the sum of him – one did not master a grimoire by skimming it. While Papa had not been able to understand, not truly, for it was against the nature of an incubus to be as he was, his other father had seen in Masego similarities to what he'd once seen in his uncle. Enough to suggest a conversation. Not every kind of love involves bedplay or poetry, Uncle Amadeus had told him. You can crave closeness with someone without craving them in other ways. Sometimes it just... fits. The intensity of it can be misleading, but you will learn. Still, it would not do to monologue again by informing his enemy of such nuances. Where before the Dead King had fought him over the gathering power, now instead his opponent was allowing him to shape it while gathering his own will. They would clash, Masego thought, over control of that last working. Yet for all that the other mage was his superior in learning and skill, he had the advantage. It was to him the bindings had been attached, his hands that had released them and his will that was giving the power shape. It would be a struggle, but his victory was likely.

"It seems I will have to surrender to you," Trismegistus said.

"I refuse," Masego said.

"You refuse the millennia of knowledge I could offer, along with secrets that would allow the Black Queen to end the Bard's schemes?"

"Yes," he said.

There was a heartbeat of silence.

"Catherine is already going to be very angry," Masego pragmatically said. "And it'll be worse if I dissect your shard after finding a way to torture you, I think. So I'll wait to take your secrets until we attack Keter and destroy your heart."

Another heartbeat passed.

"I think I'll make this painful, though," Hierophant pensively frowned.

His hand still itched, when he thought of the red splattered on the floor and Indrani's body falling.

"You overestimate yourself," the Dead King warned.

"Your secondary runic escapement patterns were subpar," Masego scathingly said.

He was getting rather good at this pithy banter stuff, Hierophant mused.

—

“Now,” the Tyrant of Helike said, “there are some among you who might be considering killing me.”

The boy did not lack courage, Tariq mused, though in truth it might be more accurate to call it a disregard for consequences. The Black Queen’s entrance had been appropriately eye-catching, a display of the power of this ‘Night’ she had acquired the right to wield. The two monstrous old things perched on her shoulders had no qualms in lending their power, now that the Hidden Horror was busied wrestling wills with the Hierophant, which meant that Kairos Theodosian had found his every advantage stripped away in a matter of moments. Artefacts shattered, gargoyles torn through, and the souls amongst which he might have sought to hide were either tithed and released by the Hierophant or cowed into retreat by the hungry gaze of these Sve Noc. Now the Tyrant of Helike was stumbling back as the Black Queen limped towards him, her staff hitting the carved floor like punctuation. The Grey Pilgrim felt no inclination to intervene in this, for Kairos Theodosian had been the architect of a great many unnecessary deaths.

“But before we get to that,” the Tyrant chuckled. “I need to expound on why and to who I betrayed you.”

The Black Queen did not bother to reply, simply raising her sinister black wooden staff and aiming it at him.

“It was to the Wandering Bard,” the odd-eyed boy said. “And I did it for a pardon!”

“Should have held out for an escape route,” Catherine Foundling drily replied, and Night gathered at the tip of her staff.

“Tariq,” the Tyrant called out. “You still have the pillow you used that night. That’s what she told me to say as proof.”

The Grey Pilgrim flinched.

“Wait,” he croaked out.

“Oh, Bard,” Theodosian murmured with a vicious smile. “You never disappoint.”

“Pilgrim?” the Black Queen said, turning impatient eye to him.

“I’ve only ever told one person that,” Tariq admitted.

Not even Laurence knew that the pillow that'd been the death of Izil... He'd needed the reminder, he'd decided that night, so that never again would he ignore portents until it was too late.

"And why do I care in the slightest if the Bard has promised him anything?" Catherine Foundling bluntly asked. "To be honest I want to kill him twice as much now."

"Because she would not make that promise without reason," the Pilgrim said. "And I trust her discernment in such matters."

"I don't," the Black Queen said. "I've seen her get up to some pretty shady shit, Pilgrim. And not all of it serving Above, either."

"It might have seemed that way," Tariq delicately said. "But I assure you-"

"When this is over, we're going to talk about the Wandering Bard," the Queen of Callow grunted. "But fine, Kairos bargained for the lot of you to spare him. Hold to that. I'll tie up the loose ends for you – just close your eyes and count to five."

"We are not fae, to muddle through on exact wording," Tariq sharply said.

"Tariq, allow me to be perfectly clear," the Black Queen said. "There is no way in the fucking Hells that I'll consider the word of the Wandering Bard to be binding to me because you and I are on the same side."

"She makes a good point, Tariq," the Tyrant of Helike solemnly said. "I hate to say it, but it seems you might be losing this argument."

The Peregrine grit his teeth.

"I will count it favour," he said, "if you withhold your hand now."

The Queen of Callow eyed him silently, considering.

"Same terms as our last bargain," she said. "Should the other condition fail to happen."

The old man breathed out. She was doing him a kindness, here. The Black Queen could have demanded much steeper price, or even kept the favour hanging above his head.

"Then you have my thanks," Tariq said, dipping his head. "For both this and your restraint."

"I am deeply pleased to be returning to the fold," the Tyrant of Helike grinned. "Why, it's almost like I never-"

The sudden pulse of sorcery caught them all by surprise. The Hierophant rose from his throne, gasping a breath, and the Grey Pilgrim beheld the rotten orb that was the Dead King's hold being torn out of him. It still held by threads, and was slowly its way back into the villain's soul, but if they acted now. Laurence was already moving, the Black Queen dismissed the power at the end of her staff and began shaping Night anew. Roland was halfway through a spell, but quickest among them would be Tariq. Until his eye caught a slender, dark-haired woman leaning against the wall. In the blind angle of everyone save him. Though she held her usual silver flask in one hand, she was not drinking. It was the other hand that drew his attention, wagging a finger disapprovingly. One, two, three, she counted out and only then mouthed now. The Pilgrim struck out with Light, just as Saint began to carve away at the Dead King's rot, but the Hierophant only screamed.

—

Trismegistus leaned over Masego's shoulder looking into the distance.

"Did I not tell you?" the Dead King said. "You overestimate yourself. To be rid of me there will be a price."

And though the Hidden Horror's hold was ripped out of him, it did not go alone. For the all the power and sorcery the Hierophant had been holding vanished into smoke, and there was not a single piece of it left.

Masego reached for his magic, and found nothing at all.

—

There were exactly two things within It: instructions, and a secret witnessed through another's eyes. It waited inside the corpse, and only slithered away under cover of the souls when all Foes were distracted. It crawled and crawled and crawled, as instructed, until it reached the edge of a cliff and fell. Far, far below a large creature opened its mouth. The Skein swallowed whole the animated shard of sorcery, and in the moment that followed fell apart in a shower of dust.

—

Far away, as the slightest shaving of the shard no doubt destroyed by now returned to him, the King of Death laughed. Seven hundred and thirty-three years, crafting the spell he'd used in his mind without a single word or line of it to be found by the opposition. And the loss of the shard would lessen him forevermore, impossible to recover — though without it, how could his defeat possibly have been believed by the Intercessor? All of it a contingency, for it had been victory he sought, but for centuries he had watched his old friend make a friend of plans he'd thought flawless. Neshamah said nothing at all, for it would be a warning if he did, but alone in the dark he softly laughed.

This once, it seemed the house had lost.

The Ellimist

This is the worst chapter to be caught up on.

Andrew Mitchell

I know the feeling. 😊 Not too long to wait until the next chapter, about 5 hours.

NerfContessa

Nope.

On my first read I caught up 9n the chapter where cat realizes sve noc swallowed winter.

Andrew Mitchell

Woah, 339 comments on this chapter makes this one of the most commented PGtE chapters ever. Certainly top 5, possibly top 2.

I'm a bit slow but I've just noticed the that the last five interludes titles have all been single words starting with R.

Will we have another Interlude? Will it start with R?

My guess is that the next chapter will be back to Cat's POV.

green

I honestly don't know if I want the Dead King to win. I have an idea of what the Intercessor might be after/for, and if I'm right... he's not wrong. for what he just did to Masego, though, he needs to burn.

ALSO HI FINALLY CAUGHT UP stares at index waiting for next chapter

Caerulea

The RSS feed updates slightly before.

Mental Mouse

I'd just like to call out the lovely battle-by implication displayed here: Kairos started waving his glowy sword, Cat sendt RS and Saint ahead with a disgusted "I'll handle this". Follow them and proceed with throne room scene... until Kairos gets pounded through the ceiling, followed by the remains of his sword, and an incandescent Cat.

NerfContessa

You can't return what was destroyed, though given he has not lost his name he might be able to aim someone else's magic, given his whole shtick is usurpation....

Great chapter again.

Chapter 46: Abdication

"One hundred and two: defeat is inevitable, yet it can be just as useful as a victory. Fate assures you at least one loss, so make sure it's the right kind."

– "Two Hundred Heroic Axioms", author unknown

We'd won, so naturally in the heartbeat that followed it all went to shit. Masego stumbled down his throne with gasping breaths, fingers blindly clawing at the rune-carve stone. He'd always been tall, but never before had I seen him so thin – it made him look spindly, like some long-legged insect in ragged black robes. The sorcery that'd been hanging heavy in the air was gone now, like some great gust of wind had blown it out, and I suspected that whatever it was that'd achieved that was the same thing that had Masego's limbs trembling. Heaving, he began to puke and I had to restrain myself from going to him after taking a unthinking step forward. It'd have to wait just a little longer, graceless as that truth was. Before the rest I needed to be sure that I wasn't going to be asked to make an ugly choice between two people I dearly loved.

"Pilgrim," I said. "What ails him, does it threaten his life?"

Even if the man did not know, the Ophanim would.

"Only if not attended to," the Peregrine said after a moment.

"The fever will rise and his body will weaken: it will take weeks if not months of recovery."

"Then raise Archer, if you would," I said.

I'd phrased it politely but we both knew it for the order it was. Wordlessly, the Sisters left my shoulders

"We don't raise the dead, Foundling," the Saint sharply said.

"Resurrect, then," I replied, rolling my eyes.

I met Tariq's stare and slowly he inclined his head in agreement. I wondered if I was right in guessing he'd not immediately brought Indrani back because he'd thought Masego might yet die and that, in the war on the Dead King, the Hierophant would be more useful than the Archer. I set aside the thought, for there was nothing to gain from pursuing it. Even if he'd been thinking that way the colder part of me had to acknowledge that it might not be a bad thing at least one of us had been. I was too close to this, to them, to be able to genuinely do the same. Leaving the Grey Pilgrim to the business of overturning death, I hurried to the still-crawling Hierophant. By the looks of it there hadn't been much in his stomach, which no doubt made the heavens worse as the body stubbornly tried to spew out something that wasn't there. His glass-crafted eyes moved wildly beneath the eyecloth, but he did not seem completely blind. I knelt in front of him, swallowing a pained wince, and made sure he saw me before further approaching.

"Masego," I softly said. "It's me? Do you recognize me?"

"Catherine," he croaked. "It's gone."

"I know," I softly agreed. "We all saw you push the Dead King out. We struck at it together."

I caught his shoulder and, shivering at the weight it put on my bad leg, tipped him back so he was leaning against me instead of half-sprawled over the floor.

"Here we go," I said. "I'm going to get the vomit off you, Masego, is that all right?"

"Not the Dead King," he rasped. "It's all gone, Catherine. My magic."

I stiffened at the announcement. I wished he'd spoken in a softer tone, so that the heroes – and Kairos, who'd remained dangerously silent through all of this – would not have heard him. As they most definitely just had. I immediately rebuked myself for the thought, for he was in no state to consider such matters. Are you sure, that pointed little question, held on the tip of my tongue for a heartbeat before I buried it. It'd only insult him: he wouldn't be this devastated if he wasn't sure.

"It'll be all right," I whispered. "We'll fix it. There's always a way, Masego. Always."

A lie, I thought, but one I would have wanted to be told in his place. He'd be able to speak to this more clearly when he'd rested and recovered, and when he did he'd have Akua to help and the knowledge of Sve Noc to look through. If there was a path to be had, we would find it.

"I feel warm," he said. "Fever. My teeth hurt. I can't fix it."

Sickly as he was, Masego was larger and heavier than me – I had to draw on Night to subdue him without hurting him, his sudden violent flailing taking me by surprise. Shit. I'd wanted him awake for the last stretch of this but he was going a bad way. Weaving a long thread of Night as gently as I could, I pressed my thumb against his forehead and let the working gently tug him into slumber. His thrashing subsided until it was little more than twitches and I let out a shaky breath of my own. All right. It looked bad, but once we got back to camp it could be fixed. We had mages and priests and I was owed by the foremost hero on Calernia, a man who had an in with a Choir. He'd come out of this all right, and then we could see about clawing back his magic from our enemy. Breathe in, breathe out. There was no place for weakness in me when the Tyrant and the Saint were looking. I unclasped the Mantle of Woe and bunched it together, sliding it under Masego's head so he wouldn't scrape it against the runes. I rose back to my feet, leaning against my staff.

"Touching," the Tyrant of Helike drawled. "I do not jest, Catherine, it was truly-"

"There's a general that's been with you from the start," I said, meeting his gaze. "Basilis, is it?"

"Are you threatening me?" Kairos asked, sounding amused.

"Finish that sentence," I said, "and you'll find out."

Whatever might have followed that was to remain unspoken, for with a gasp Indrani returned to the land of the living. I limped past the Tyrant, making my way to her side. Tariq had put her on her back before digging into his aspect, and now miraculously enough there was no trace of the hole that'd been blow through her head save for dried blood over her face. The Saint was gazing down at her with a sneer when I arrived, while the Pilgrim gently asked her to cease moving so the Light could heal the last of her scrapes. Indrani's hazelnut eyes swam into focus when I arrived, first staying on me and then moving to the other two heroes by her 'bedside'. Leaning to the side, Archer spat out a little mucus and wiped her lips.

"Cat's always been fine and I can be sold on the Saint – gotta love a girl who knows her way around a sword," she drawled. "But a priest too? Gods, there can't have been that much liquor in the city."

In a moment of quicksilver surprise, I saw the Saint of Swords looking like someone had just personally pissed in her morning porridge and the Grey Pilgrim looked utterly, wickedly delighted before I had to cover my mouth with a hand lest I burst out laughing.

"I wasn't always a priest, I'll give you know," the Peregrine sanguinely replied. "As a young man I once even attempted to become one of the Hidden Poets."

"They of the seventy-eight methods of carnal love?" Indrani asked, sounding somewhat intrigued.

"Indeed," he agreed. "Alas, my kamil declamations were judged unworthy and so I took an interest in healing instead."

"You look rather spry, for a dead woman," I said.

I looked at her searchingly even as I spoke, looking for a flinch or darkening of mien that would have given away a shadow cast on her soul. Resurrection was too great a boon to come without a cost, in my eyes, though that did not mean that price would be paid immediately. Yet I found nothing and so offered up my hand to cover my surprise. Indrani took it, and with a grunt I dragged her up.

"Well," Archer said, "I did get to take a nap. I'm all refreshed now."

I almost winced at that. I'd not seen her die, but the sight of her head missing a chunk was going to haunt my nights for a few months to come. Indrani's eyes moved to the sleeping form of Masego, lingering on the rise and fall of his chest. The twitches were already rarer, but still I caught his leg in a spasm as he turned and a moan escaped his lips.

"What happened?" she quietly asked. "I know how I..."

She hesitated there, and I found an almost troubled look on her face when I looked. Not entirely without marks, then. I reached for her shoulder, but she shook it away.

"We knew it was a possibility," she said, tone grown firm. "But it should have shaken him out of the Dead King's hold. What went wrong?"

"Your little friend pushed out the Hidden Horror," the Saint of Swords said, approaching. "Long enough for us to help strike him down."

"When the shard of the Dead King ruling over the Hierophant was destroyed, it took his magic with it," the Rogue Sorcerer said.

Both the Pilgrim and the Saint shot a look at him, and he dipped his head as if to confirm something.

"Roland?" I asked.

"It is part of my Choosing to know when there is sorcery to confiscate," the hero told me, face grim. "There is none left in the Hierophant."

"Shit," Indrani murmured. "That's going to leave scars even if we fix it."

"Which we will," I meaningfully said.

Indrani questioningly glanced at my neck, more specifically the height where my cloak's collar would usually be.

"If anyone can," I agreed. "Otherwise, well, praise the Night and we'll figure something out."

"Crows might know something, yeah," Archer said. "They're basically magpies only with, you know..."

She gestured vaguely, trying to get across the concept of godhood. Something that had eluded the finest mages and theologians of the continent for millennia.

"That's heresy," I piously said.

Komena cawed in the distance, unamused by the way I hadn't entirely disagreed in my own thoughts.

"See, you've angered the gods," I said.

After the hellish, riotous night we'd gone through – and which had yet to end – trading barbs with Indrani like this was like a balm for the soul. The rest of the band had been looking on with various degrees of amusement and impatience, which was fair. Most of us were allies of convenience, if even that. I cleared my throat, Archer falling in at my left like it was the most natural thing in the world. I found strength in that where earlier I'd begun to find mostly exhaustion.

"The five of us have made it to the journey's end," I said. "And so now we bring about an ending."

"This where you reveal the last crown?" Laurence de Montfort bluntly asked. "Overdue."

"I'll confess to some curiosity as well," the Rogue Sorcerer said.

There was a moment of silence, a courtesy I was offering to the man in question – the opportunity to speak himself, if he preferred it that way.

"It will be mine," the Grey Pilgrim said. "Though the Dominion of Levant has no kings, I was born to the bloodline that has ruled it since its founding."

The Saint spat to the side.

"Funny how it's always us who ends up paying the butcher's bill tonight," she said. "Almost like it was planned that way."

I didn't answer that. It was true, at least in part, though I regretted nothing. For all that I'd scraped them raw, I'd made them fair offers and would deliver on all I had promised. As we'd begun the year deathly foes, I considered that far more generous treatment than was owed by the ways they'd dealt with me in the past.

"There can be no us and them, Laurence, if we are to survive the decade," the Pilgrim quietly said. "Not against the kind of foe we face. And it is no great loss, I assure you: I know better than most how ill-suited I would be to rule."

"Some would say merely knowing that would make you better ruler than most," the Saint replied.

I bit down on my tongue, because now was not the moment to express my strong opinion on the matter. Humility wasn't necessarily a bad thing in a king, but it was hardly a qualification. Ambition wasn't a flaw, it was the character trait behind most – no, now was not the time for that. Gods, was this my shatranj speech? Of all the damned habits I could have picked up.

"Oh, please do have him elected Holy Seljun," the Tyrant grinned. "That would be delightful. We'll have to have his... great-great-nephew? Close enough, I think. We'll need to have the current Seljun assassinated first, that is my implication, but worry not. Mercantis offers very fair prices on poison these days."

"Must you, Tyrant?" the Rogue Sorcerer asked.

"It's simply getting a little too chummy in here for my tastes, if you'll forgive my language," Kairos cheerily replied. "As if most people in this room had not tried to kill each other at some point."

"Well," Indrani mused. "He's not wrong. Why is he alive, anyway?"

"He made a deal with the Wandering Bard," I said.

"That is the opposite of a reason to keep him alive," Archer pointed out.

"A courtesy was extended," I said, tone informing her the line of questioning was at an end.

"Hear that, Saint?" Indrani grinned. "We're being courteous to you. So maybe you try not being such a-"

"Archer," I hissed.

"-card," Indrani adjusted at the last moment, "I was definitely going to say card."

Kairos gasped, as if deeply shocked by her foul language.

"It will not be long before dawn rises," the Grey Pilgrim said, "even given the nature of this place. We must attend to the tasks ahead."

"Namely, to slay a god," the Rogue Sorcerer said.

That bought an aftermath of silence for a few beats. If he'd not been Proceran I would have assumed a pun, but given his origins my assumptions erred on the side of clemency.

"Unless you're holding out on us, Foundling, the odds are not skewed in our favour," the Saint of Swords bluntly said. "It would have been one thing with the warlock, but he's done. The five of us and your cheap Ranger imitation won't cut it."

"There were more than simply the Huntsman outside," Roland said. "The entire Wild Hunt was standing vigil around the room. We will be outnumbered."

"We won't be, my dear friend," the Tyrant of Helike said, "for the same reason that the Hierophant is nowhere to be found."

Three pairs of eyes sought Masego, and when they found nothing at all turned to me instead. Alas, without my cloak I'd been robbed of my pipe and wakeleaf. Hadn't thought that through properly, I mused.

"Did you think she wanted this done before dawn for the ambience?" Kairos Theodosian grinned. "Oh no. She wants the war ended before daylight scatters her little army of darkness."

"I've dealt with fae royalty before," I mildly said. "A story is the one blade they can't parry and that we earned, as our band of five. But you still need to sink in the knife and that means power. I've provided it."

Of which there would be no lack, before the coming of dawn. The Sisters were circling in the sky above, patient and slow, but the Mighty I'd sent for would have long ago made their way through the broken grounds of Liesse and reached this deeper palace. If the coming Court and my own side came to blow, as I expected they would, I would have warriors awaiting more than the match of a Wild Hunt reforged.

"You think our Larat's going to be a rougher ride than High Noon?" Indrani asked.

"If we let him get a grip, that seems likely," I grimly replied.

None of the others here had been part of our fight against Princess Sulia, the general of Summer's hosts and herald of its sun, so while the idle reference by Archer was not gibberish to them neither was it really understood. The Saint and the Pilgrim had faced villains and monsters I'd never known the likes of, but the fae were... different. Less and more dangerous at the same time. And Larat, once the Prince of Nightfall, had been all sorts of dangerous even before his service under my oaths had taken him across the breadth of Calernia. Fae couldn't learn, not the way mortals did. Their natures were static in the way our weren't. Yet I knew from experience that they could learn to... interpret themselves through different eyes, shaping themselves through oaths and stories. The Wild Hunt, while bound to me, had seen more of Creation than the rest of their likely had in centuries. I fully expected any Court they had a hand in making to be dangerous in ways that the ancestral forces of nature that were Summer and Winter could scarcely have imagined. I breathed out, rolled my shoulders to limber them.

"Ready yourselves," I warned. "We begin."

I seized my staff and struck down at the ground, a thin wave of Night rippling out, and from that darkness I leaned down to snatch out the bag that held seven crowns. Without even needing to look, I knew that the fae had come. As I strode towards the throne on which Masego had sat, when in the throes of the Dead King's enchantments, from the corner of my eye I saw silhouettes standing atop the walls. In ripping out the ceiling, I had made of this throne room an arena of sorts – and in a silent circle above the Wild Hunt stood, eyes watchful. I emptied the sack at the bottom of the throne. An old crowb of ivory and gold, set with a great carved topaz. A straight-edged cavalry sword, wrapped in a cloak. An ornate longsword, specked with its dead owner's blood. A silver tiara, bitter surrender. A bloody knife, regicide absolved. A bare blade within a banner, and last of all two silver wings ripped in spite. A harvest of royalty that cast a shadow over a third of the greatest realm under Calernian sun. No small harvest, this. The Grey Pilgrim padded forward as I threw aside the empty sack, and with measured ceremony came to stand before the pile. The old man brusquely snapped his own staff over his knee, the old thing breaking like it'd been fragile as driftwood, and tossed it onto the pile. He whispered two words under his breath, though I caught only one: izil.

With that last addition the seven crowns and one I'd promised were offered, and so the creature I'd promised them to arrived. Larat drifted in from right, steps silent and smooth, long black hair trailing behind him. He near brushed against me as he passed, though it was not jostling – it was an acknowledgement of his presence. We were, I thought, long past the petty games of posturing other times might have brought.

"I had thought, my queen, that you might destroy me before the debt was paid," the fae amusedly said. "Or make of me something... tamed and hollowed."

His sole eye flicked a glance upwards, where two crows still circled.

"I am a woman of my word," I replied. "However terrible that word might be."

"So you are," Larat said, dipping his head. "Let all witness it, and Creation remember it."

He ran an almost loving finger against the stone of the throne before him, having fluidly stepped around the crowns that were his due. As I watched every last thing tossed onto the pile turned to ash, until naught was left but that, and under Larat's watchful gaze those ashes rose up. They spun once, twice, thrice, and with every spin they gathered more tightly into something being forged. A crown, I thought. It was made of grey chalcedony and mother-of-pearl, one twisted like threads and the other hanging in star-like spots, but something more eldritch leant both darkness and radiant lights to the shaping artefact. It thickened, until the last touch was added – a distant radiant star, shining on the brow, stolen and set for the pleasure of the newborn Court.

"And so is born the Court of Twilight," the fae said. "Under the pilgrim's star, willingly given, and winding through the many realms of mortals wicked and righteous both. We tread the span of dusk and dawn, unhindered and unseen, watchers of boundaries and makers of secret ways. Let none think themselves our masters, for we are the children of the debt repaid and the tricks woven in death."

Pale fingers caught the crown and Larat softly laughed.

"I thank you, Sovereign Under the Night," he said. "Not for the bargain fulfilled, for that was as ordained, but for what you gave us all freely."

He'd not put on the crown, I thought. It had not yet begun.

"And what would that be?" I asked.

"We cannot learn as your kind do, Foundling Queen," Larat smiled. "But we can... mimic. That is our gift. And you have shown us a great many things. You taught us, my queen, the greatest trick of them all."

Larat, smiling, put on the crown.

"Hear my first decree, one and all, as Twilight's King," he laughed.

Larat, smiling, tossed it back down onto the throne.

"My crown I abdicate, and let the worthiest of you bear it."

nipi

Wait the Tyrant just got a guarantee of not being attacked. Would that still be upheld if he gets or tries to get the crown?

nipi

Wonder if the Dead King used the random portals connected to the shard of Arcadia to move some of his undead behind the defenses. Including some undead mages to raise more troops from old graves and conscript from poorly defended villages.

nipi

Hmmm... Might be that Masego will end up wielding fae magic instead of the regular kind. How necessary is creating the shortcut anyway? They have 3 months now.

Mental Mouse

No they don't, the shard is still falling. Also, Cat's army turns into pumpkins at dawn.

nipi

The shard is falling because its unclaimed. Killing a god seems necessary for cats portal scheme.

Brigsby

On the contrary, claiming that crown could stabilize the shard. It was falling into creation due to the magic of Masego, magic that is now gone. It's possible this caused it to drift instead of being forced to collide with another one of existence. That would make it a Psuedo-Arcadia just like Cat planned. Also, Masego gets the crown I think.

JJR

Hang on a sec, they actually have the perfect candidate to take up the crown. The goat that is not a goat but a horse. Specifically a small horse. All they need to do first is paint it purple, and then when they put the crown on it it will become the Princess of Twilight and Sparkle.

Yes, this is clearly the best plan and can in no way backfire.

Zim the Vixen

You. I like you and I like this.

Clinton Orebajo

You just made my day

Alegio

I really doubt it but wouldn't it be awesome for Masego to take the crown? New magic for him to play that is not exactly magic but a power to make whatever you want of reality.

Zim the Vixen

I find it concerning that most people here want their favourite character to take the crown.

Let's remember that whoever becomes a god must be killed, for this piece of Arcadia to not crash into Creation.

Javvies

No, they don't.

Establishing the Court enables the entity in charge of it to stabilize it as a new plane.

Killing Larat after he established the Court was necessary because it's Larat.

Killing whomever takes up the Twilight Crown isn't, strictly speaking, a necessary part of Cat's plan to stabilize the shard and use it as a transitory plane, safer than Arcadia proper.

Killing whomever takes up the Twilight Crown is very much dependent upon who that person/entity actually is.

Regy

I'm confused I thought Skein had stolen the shard as he fled...

Andrew Mitchell

A different shard. (Shard just means 'small fragment'.) The Skein took a shard of information back to the Dead King.

Big I

I predict that Good King Edward will become the Twilight King.

sengachi

Ohhhh. I like that idea. That would be a compromise I think everyone but the Tyrant could get behind, and I think everyone assembled is just about done with him.

sengachi

Oh fuck

Nukeey

Can you imagine the absolute hellscape that plane would into if the Tyrant gets the crown?

Cpt. Obvious

But it would be the fun kind of hell. The kind that so decadent and stupidly horrible you wouldn't know if you should cry or laugh. You certainly wouldn't die in a boring way that much you could at least count on.

eliarice

Decimated. Catherine is going to have PTSD from just how hard Larat owned her. That one line was more devastating than literally anything that The Dead King has done in his entire unlife.

Poetically Psychotic

Larat, you cunning old fox, you.

Chapter 47: Tenet

"You who would be mighty, seek excellence in all things, for the conquest of eternity must be earned with every breath."

– Extract from the 'Tenets Under Night', Firstborn religious text

Well, shit. I guessed you could always count on good ol' Larat to make a bad situation incredibly worse. And I wasn't the only one to realized that with a pithy gesture and a few words he'd dropped us all in the deep end, because the moment the fae who'd abdicated the Twilight Crown took a step away from the throne I had to speak up.

"Hold," I got out, and there was an echo.

Archer's longknife slowed a hair's breadth away from the hollow of Larat's throat, as did the Saint's longsword – though it'd not been me that Laurence was listening but the Pilgrim. Who had, thanks the Gods, enough of a finger on the pulse of this to recognize that killing the fae now would be a Very Bad Idea. High above us, Sve Noc lazily circled the sky. Yet another fire I was going to have to put out the moment I'd assessed the nature of this turnabout. I inclined my head in thanks at Tariq and shot Indrani a steady glance. Shrugging, she withdrew her blade and with an unnecessarily eye-catching spin she put it away. The Saint I left to the Pilgrim, eyes on the fae who'd been the Twilight King for the span of two sentences. Was he still, though? I wondered with a frown. Not king – the abdication might have been a trick, but not of that particular kind – but fae. There was a flush to his skin now, and while his long hair remained unearthly in its perfection it was no longer... unnatural.

"Larat," I said. "Look me in the eye."

Baring a smile of pearly white teeth, the one-eye creature met my gaze and my lips thinned in dismay. When I'd first met the Prince of Nightfall, a simple look in his eyes had sent me tumbling down into fear and darkness. A glimpse into his nature, forced by the matching of gaze. I'd learned to resist that pull, in later years, or at times simply been the greater monster of the two of us. I was not currently using any of those tricks, for there was no need to. Larat held not a speck of power within him. And fae, Masego had once told me, were little more than power made flesh and shaped by stories. The inevitable conclusion of that sent a shiver up my spine.

"Do you even know," I softly asked, "what you've become?"

"Something... unprecedented," he said, smile broadening.

"And the rest of the Hunt?" I said.

One after another they leapt down, graceful and lithe. None of them bore titles that I could catch the scent of, be it the newborn regalia of Twilight or older and more vicious accoutrements.

"We claim nothing," Larat languidly replied, "save that we are."

"Fascinating," the Saint of Swords said. "You gonna feed them to your drow, or should I just go ahead and finish this? I've yet to hear a reason that smirking head should stay atop his shoulders."

"Because someone's going to have to put on that damned crown, now," I said, never looking away from Larat. "And while I can't say for sure what murdering the creature that first forged it would do exactly, I doubt it'll be particularly pleasant."

The former fae's lips twitched. Seed of madness in the crown was my guess, putting an original sin at the heart of what this realm would become. The clever fox had picked a path that meant we couldn't kill him without dropping a vial of poison in our own cup.

"There no longer are any oaths between us," I acknowledged. "All debts have been paid."

"So they have," Larat admitted. "Would you believe me if I said, my queen, that my service under your banner was a pleasure?"

"Not even an hour free," I said, "and already lying? You always were a quick learner."

He laughed, deep-throated and wild. I swallowed a sigh.

"You fulfilled your oaths to the letter," I conceded, and raised my voice to the others. "All of you. If we are to part tonight, it is not in anger."

Larat, viper-swift, raised the sword hanging from his hip. I did not reach for the Night, though Archer was halfway through a killing stroke before she turned it aside – my former servant, after a salute, had dropped the blade at my feet.

"May we meet again, my queen, before the end," Larat said. "For every gift you gave you took fair measure, and I can pay no higher compliment."

Much as they had years ago when riding horses, the creatures that had once been the Wild Hunt paid me the mirrored farewell to the allegiance they'd sworn. Lance and blade and bow fell at my feet, and with every last a bow. Some paid respects to Archer as well, though to her they offered only words. They gathered around Larat: slender, beautiful and even without so much as a speck of power still terrible to behold.

"And what will you do?" I asked.

"Whatever we wish, my queen," the one-eyed fox said. "For be it wicked or righteous, it will be entirely ours."

I let them go without another word, ignoring the Pilgrim's weighty look and the Tyrant's fleeting yet fascinated glances at the former fae. There was another issue about to take hold, after all. For all that I'd chosen to part with the Wild Hunt on a cordial note, Larat had repaid my planned deicide in the same manner. The Twilight Crown was not up for grabs, and he'd known exactly what he was doing when he'd offered it to the worthiest. It was respect that'd stayed the hands of the drow so far, for through the Night I could feel hundreds of them hungrily gazing down. If I ordered them to refrain, I'd strain the limited of my authority as the First Under the Night. Oh, some would listen. At first anyway, until they saw foes and rivals close to getting their fingers on great power and the balance swung the other way. The only way they'd obey such an edict was if Sve Noc put their weight to my words. Yet I had the Sisters in the back of my mind, and so I knew they were eying that crown as hungrily as the rest of them.

"Black Queen," the Grey Pilgrim began, "given the-"

"Pilgrim," I calmly said. "I don't think you appreciate how delicate the situation is right now. I need to... confer with my patrons."

"Evil clawing at itself," the Saint bitingly said. "There's a surprise."

I ignored her.

"It'd be a mistake," I said in Crepuscular, addressing the sky.

The first crow that landed on the floor did so smoothly, and just as smoothly rose into the silhouette of a drow. Silver-blue eyes shone, and I saw she was wearing the ancient armour of soldiers of the Empire Ever Dark with at her hip a sheathed blade of obsidian. Komena. Her sister, fully formed a drow before her crow talons could touch the stone, made ground with serenity. It was the robes of the long-broken Twilight Sages she wore, in flowing shimmering silk, and her hands she hid within long sleeves. Andronike. My patrons, at least, had taken me seriously enough to make act of presence. And a little more than that, even. I caught flecks of dust gone still in the air around me, made visible by the glinting light, and all others in this seat of power stood as if frozen. Save for the Pilgrim, whose knowing eyes followed me still – whatever power was at work here, bending perception, the Choir of Mercy had not suffered that he would be touched by it.

"Would it be?" Komena said. "Twilight is not so far removed from our domain. And mastery over ways... oh, let the offering of travellers be not blood but instead prayer. There would be opportunity in that, and yet more. We have lost the Everdark and the kingdom you bargained for still has to be reclaimed from death. A home for our people would be fair in every way, Herald."

"You can't eat two courts of the fae, Komena," I said. "That would be grave overreach."

The two of them, long-legged and fluid, began circling around me on foot the same way they had as crows.

"You have warned us of such perils before, of the foes they would bring," she replied, and glanced at the Grey Pilgrim. "Having seen them, I am less than cowed."

"The way I see it, there's two ways that could go," I said. "Both end up with every single gain you've made so far pissed away."

That had them both looking at me with their full attention.

"You could become 'the monster that eats courts'," I said. "And just like that you're the greatest threat kicking around Calernia, both taking the weight off the Dead King and beginning a death match with every powerful entity in the service of Above up here and gathered to deal with him."

I paused, letting that sink in.

"Or, perhaps even worse, you've just begun a pattern," I said. "I made a Court of Winter and you ate it. I made a Court of Twilight and you'd eat it. There's only one court of the fae left, Sve Noc, and I also had a hand in its inception. Where do you think that story leads?"

"We would be mistresses of the greater part of the Garden," Komena said.

"Would you?" I said. "I wonder. When I stole Winter, it didn't do anything to the ruling court of Arcadia as far as I could tell. See, what I think is that it's the neverborn courts they get their blood from: Autumn and Spring, never to be again. Because Summer and Winter had to die so the unification of Arcadia could happen, so they couldn't be foundation of an entirely new realm could they? So my theft of Winter? Fine, I was robbing a corpse. The crown just to our side might just be what used to be Summer. So at best, o goddesses of mine, you'll be even. And you know that one viciously clever little bastard that just walked out of here?"

I jutted a thumb towards the open gates of bronze.

"The ruling King of Arcadia considers him to be a little dim," I said. "Think on that, before you start believing you'll be the winners in that scrap even if the weight is even. You're too young to the godhead, your power is too fragile and your foundations too unsteady. You're not ready for the kind of attention eating Twilight would bring."

Komena did not reply. She was not pleased, I could feel it, but she did not dismiss what I'd said.

"I do not disagree," Andronike said.

And now for the other one, I grimly thought.

"Let us allow the Mighty to find who is worthiest among them, and so establish influence without... overstepping," the oldest of the sisters said.

"Short-sighted," I assessed.

I saw Komena hide a smile.

"Pardon?" Andronike said, voice too calm to truly be.

"You're thinking in terms of gains without also weighing the drawbacks," I said. "Do you intend to make whoever takes the crown the leader of your people, fold them under their rule and effectively have them stuck in this ruin of a realm forever? Because that's what you're headed towards if you make a play here."

"They have no choice but to make bargains with us if the ways are under our stewardship," Andronike said. "This war is lost otherwise."

"You're robbing them while the Dead King holds them at knifepoint," I said. "That's a mistake. What happens when the war is over, Sve Noc? Do you think they won't go back on treaties you crammed down their throat when they were in duress?"

"And will they come to love us, if we treat them lovingly?" Andronike mockingly replied. "That is surprisingly naïve of you, Herald. If they turn on us for this, they were always going to turn on us. All the more reason to claim what we can before the knives are bared."

"You're missing the point," I patiently said. "There's nuances to this, Andronike. Sure, the Procerans are never going to put a crown of flowers in your hair, but there's a difference between 'the enemy we leave alone because it contains a worse enemy' and 'those bastards that extorted us while we were facing annihilation'. You know what's going to be a lot more useful to your people than one of the Mighty on that fancy chair behind you? An undeniable and weighty precedent for the Firstborn being reasonable, restrained actors. You're going to have to live up here, after the war ends."

"You would have us pin our hopes on amity and mercy," Andronike said.

"I'd have you fight this war in a manner that doesn't guarantee having to fight another one in twenty years with your current allies," I frankly said. "You named me First Under the Night because you needed feet on the ground. Someone to steer you away from the mistakes you're blind to because of your position."

I paused.

"This is one," I said. "This might be the mistake. The choice that decides whether you're a decade-long catastrophe that ends up drowned in heroes or the latest nation to claim a seat at the table up here in the Burning Lands."

They circled around me still, silent. Thinking.

"This is not our way," Komena said.

"Your way is a snake eating its own tail," I said. "Be better."

"They might turn on us regardless," Andronike said.

"They might," I admitted. "Fear or faith, that's your choice. You can't cross a chasm without taking a leap."

The Sisters looked at each other, eyes sliding away from me, and whatever it was they spoke it was not meant for my ears. Pounding heartbeats drummed against my ears, they began circling anew. With every step they further faded into the shadow, until there was nothing left but crows once more circling above. As if they'd never left at all. I breathed out, slowly.

"You are First Under the Night," Andronike confirmed.

"The Firstborn listen," Komena said. "Speak."

My fingers clenched. Above us the Mighty stood, a ring of painted sigils and silver-blue yes. Watching, waiting. And my goddesses had asked me to teach restraint to a people they had taught to esteem gluttonous theft above all. I was not, I thought, clever enough a liar to trick them all into obedience. And that'd be rather defeating the purpose of this, wasn't it? I was the high priestess of Night: if I found offence with the faith I'd been named the steward of, who but me could be charged with the change of it?

"Are you worthy?" I asked, and my voice rang out.

Not a soul replied. I let out a harsh bark of laughter.

"Your silence says it all," I told them. "You believe you are, or that the shedding of blood will make you so."

And why wouldn't they? The worthy took, the worthy rose. Did the act of taking not make them worthy? That was the sickness inside them, Below's ever-red altar made into an entire people. It was the old enemy wearing another face: Callow and Praes, forever intertwined and bleeding. Procer as much burden as bearing, sowing its own demise with every conquest. It was bucket holding the crabs, and I was going to break it.

"I see you," I harshly said. "Scavengers, carrion things crawling in the dark. You make faith of what you've taken and call that worth. I see you, who call yourselves Mighty. I have been you, and heard the sweet anthems of might, so hear me when I tell you this truth: a hundred rats clawing at each other does not make a single king."

Oh, they did not love me for that. I saw it in their eyes, in the way fury and malice filled the Night. But it was a lesson long overdue and love was not what I wanted from them, much less what I needed.

"Did you believe a single moment of excellence would earn you an eternity of power?" I said. "The one-eye fox that left this place head held high forged this crown through ruses that fooled gods and ruined realms. What bring any of you that matches those deeds?"

I bared my teeth.

"The murder of your own kind? I ask you, what manner of creature under sun or moon is not capable of this? Where lies that which would make you worthy?"

I struck my staff against the ground, let the clap that sounded out jostle them.

"You have grovelled in the ruins of your own empire, bleeding behind the Gloom," I said. "And through that you survived. Yet is that all you seek, you who call yourselves Mighty? Survival? I thought you seekers of deeds. I thought you reclaimed of an empire ever dark. I thought you Firstborn, not grey ghosts haunting a ruin."

Fury still, but now their pride had been pricked. And there were some who were listening. Hearing what had been spoken but also what had not been.

"It is not enough to take," I said. "For you must be worthy to take. It is not enough to rise, for you must be worthy to rise."

Blasphemy, some would have called that, but how could it be when I spoke with the voice of their gods?

"Did you think eternity would so easily be conquered?" I laughed. "Seek excellence in all things, Firstborn. Seek to stand mighty not by lowering others but by rising above them, lest you make your own victory worthless. They who cannot master themselves will never be anything but servants."

I breathed out, let what I'd said sink in.

"And so I ask you again, you who call yourselves Mighty – are you worthy?"

Sa Vrede. The whisper spread, bloomed until it was on every pair of lips. No, the answer came, and with it the beat of spears against stone. Slow and oppressive, like a dirge.

"Then seek excellence, Firstborn," I said. "Ever seek it until the night comes where your answer has changed."

Chno Sve Noc, they went. All will be Night. And they bowed, for I has spoken with the authority of high priestess of Night and for all their fury they had found worth in the path I laid before them. As the deity-crows circled slowly above us all they withdrew into the darkness, dismissed without my needing to speak another word. I let out a shaky breath and turned to find the eyes of most everyone else resting on me. I doubted anyone other than Archer had understood any of that – Indrani had learned a bit of Crepuscular back in the day, though it was a fiendishly complex language so not all that much – but I supposed even without the learning it'd been something of a spectacle.

"Dawn will come before the hour's turn," the Grey Pilgrim quietly said. "And with it the end of this journey, for good or ill."

"Then there is only one agreeable solution," the Tyrant of Helike said.

He let a moment pass.

"We should crown Catherine," he said, and winked at me.

"I've ridden that horse before," I said. "Never again."

"A shame," he mused. "I'd volunteer, yet I suspect my dear friends might..."

"Murder you like we were planning to do to Larat?" I finished. "Of course not. Go ahead, Kairos. Put on the crown."

"Breaking the crown itself might suffice," the Rogue Sorcerer said.

"How sure are you of that, Roland?" the Saint asked.

He grimaced.

"Half and half," the Sorcerer said. "As you might guess, there's not exactly a precedent for this."

And considering that the hero wasn't able to understand High Arcana, there was only so much weight I was willing to put on his word. Gods, I wished Masego was in a fit state to speak right now. Hells, I'd even settle for Akua right about now.

"So either we roll the dice over the life of around two hundred thousand people," I grimly said. "Or someone puts on that crown and then we kill them."

Naeddyr

I naaaailed it, like a crown on a head.

Naeddyr

Thank you for the chapter!

naturalnuke

And Catherine makes another strike at the forging of the Drow.

Javvies

Nicely done, Cat. You're getting good at this High Priestess thing.

Huh.

I'm not entirely sure why murdering the person who puts on the Twilight Crown is still necessary, no matter who that person is.

Dainpdf

Because the person would have too much power; because the fae power corrupts; because they would be stuck in the ruined realm and thus useless for the war anyway.

medailyfun

why, of course we kill whoever is useless for war

Dainpdf

As opposed to letting them be a costly liability? Yes.

nimelennar

If someone wears the crown, they become ruler of a new Court of Fae.

No one wants there to be a new Court of Fae.

So they need to crown someone and then kill that person to destroy that new Court before it is established, to leave this realm as a place that can be crossed by any who pay the price.

Or, they could just break the crown, and it might accomplish the same thing... but they don't know if that will work.

Rook

I think there's a strong narrative argument for the Saint to be the one that puts on the crown, in terms of a final redemption story. The person that's puts it on is going to affect the nature of the realm as much what formed it.

An entire life lived, ever cutting down disasters, ever failing to prevent them no matter how strong the desire to. An unbreakable, incorruptible, unwavering sword that held firm through any and all obstacles, no matter the crucible or the temptation.

Now for the first and last time, at the end of that long story, she can finally, finally succeed just once in Saving instead of Avenging after the tragedy has already taken place. By willingly being cut down instead of cutting down, she can forge not just a redemption but the Greatest redemption after a lifetime of failures, of being moments too late again and again.

A realm forged of the Saint wouldn't be a kind one or a pleasant one, but it would be a wholly incorruptible one, and an unbreakable one, no matter the evil or the storm. It could never be twisted away from its nature. It could never be corrupted, poisoned, or struck with disease.

More importantly, the Saint would have strong personal reasons to. If she wants to make sure there's absolutely no Evil influence in the establishment of the realm, it can't be a Villain being the first and last to put that crown on their head (larat never wore the crown before putting it down). Which in her eyes would leave the Sorcerer – a Good young seedling snuffed out before his time – or the Pilgrim – who she holds in the highest esteem, likely even higher than herself. It would be a self sacrifice play from the one asshole you'd never expect the self sacrifice play from, but still for her own goals until the very end

Andrew Mitchell

I like the way you've laid that out. Very satisfying option.

And she still gets to be used against the Dead King. Just not the way she expected.

crysjal

She still has a secret plan (to let procer be destroyed) so until they discover that then she gets plot armour I'm afraid.

Mental Mouse

> the Sorcerer – a Good young seedling snuffed out before his time

Also a magic-thief. And remember, Below's forces use magic a lot more.

naturalnuke

Then the realm gets swung like a sword and breaks the Dead King's little hell.

Because it's what she would have wanted.

Fayhem

> (larat never wore the crown before putting it down).

He did. For about two seconds, but he did:

"Larat, smiling, put on the crown.

"Hear my first decree, one and all, as Twilight's King," he laughed.

Larat, smiling, tossed it back down onto the throne."

Emphasis mine, of course. He was King exactly long enough to be able to abdicate the position, because he's a little shit. But he was the King, even if only for a moment. But honestly Larat is villain enough to count for anybody paying attention, much less by the standards of the Saint, so your actual point still has merit.

Rook

Ah I misread that, good catch

sengachi

Oh. Wow. Yeah, that'd do.

Dainpdf

Unless this is all a ploy to kill her. Safer, from the perspective of not letting any villains' plans work, to just break the thing.

vamair

No one wants there to be a new Court of Fae? Well, I do! Twilight Court sounds awesome, especially when on the other side of the fourth wall.

Insanenoodlyguy

Same reason Cat doesn't want to put it on, murder aside. Larat did one thing in his very brief stint as King: shaped the court. And so any who succeed him inherit this. As cat knows full well, this will begin to have... effects. The King or Queen of Twilight, even if a friend today, may become a foe tomorrow.

This is where King Edwin can still deliver though, if he yet stands. The dead king retreats, but if he does this, his imminent death yet has meaning and he can rest. Of course, this ascension will give him life again first, so it'll hurt all the more. Though I suspect that'd be too easy a resolution now, so he's likely dead already

onedollargum

King Edwin, the thrice raised XD

Dainpdf

And have possible remnants of Neshamah's sprcery in the realm? Bad Idea.

Guopo

Am I the only one that thinks that the drow should have teared her apart, First Under the Night or not? She is trying to make power addicts go against their instincts by what basically amounts to moralizing. Imagine trying to make a bunch of Wall Street brokers more aware of the long term by asking them to be better.

byzantine279

Were she talking as Cat that would be the case. But she was speaking with the full weight of their gods.

Liliet

Sve Noc can dust them out of existence with a thought, they literally all are alive only on their sufferance.

Mighty are not just power addicts. They are power addicts who survived, power addicts who got recruited into the southern expedition.

They are sane enough to respect the Law Of The Bigger Fish.

sengachi

And just as importantly, they're old. The Mighty strong enough to be here are all ancient monsters, and you just don't get to be that old in a meat grinder like the Underdark unless you know how to change. The Mighty aren't old like Sve Noc, unchanging ageless immortal imprints. They're ancient mortals who have earned a lease on longer life by being better than ever other damn contender who would have toppled them. They are adaptable, they must be.

So when Cat, this person who just rolled through their entire civilization like a living wrecking ball and went toe to toe with their gods only to come out as the freaking High Priest of their religion wielding more Night than any of them could hope to have, when she says backed by their gods "there is a way to be even stronger" ... well, none of them are stupid. All of them are adaptable. All of them respect might makes right not merely as a reality but as holy writ, and here speaks the mightiest. And yeah the goddesses who could disintegrate them all are also flying overhead, that too.

Andrew Mitchell

100% right.

shveiran

Very well said.

It's important to remember that the Mighty are not just power hungry: they are those that succeeded in applying the Tenets of Night, which are a divine writ.

The Firstborn are experiencing an Exodus, led by a Cat-shaped Moses (staff included). And sure, the path is hard, and they will be tempted to go against the will of their Goddesses and Prophet along the way, but one does not embark on such a path, leaving behind all they once held, without knowing on some level that things will never be quite the same.

They have the POTENTIAL to change. The story has the right shape.

Morgenstern

I saw no need either, after the chapter before this. After this one, though, I believe the reason is in Cat's suspicion that Larat put a "madness" in the Crown that will make anyone mad who wears it.

Now, I don't entirely understand why anyone needs to put it on at all, after this realm should have already been stabilized by Larat forming the Twilight Court, even if just for two seconds. Does it somehow fall into pieces again if the person abdicates? Then, why the heck, shouldn't it do so with their original plan that would even have KILLED that person and not just forced them to abdicate? o0 I'm curious for the revelation there. At least, I very much hope we'll get one. Without one, it reeks of being irrational instead of a sensible theory.

naturalnuke

Problem 1, it's still falling, problem 2, it currently doesn't lead where they need it to lead.

So they need to gain control of it somehow. Best way would be corpse robbing because no one owns it anymore, is someone does own it then they are liable to corruption and or whatever trap may or may not be in the power.

dalek955

I think their problem is that they need the realm to be rulerless and unclaimed, and that's not how Larat left it. By abdicating the crown to be claimed by "the worthiest," he left it in trust for a specific ruler, even if no one yet knows who that is. If they left the crown as it is, the band of five would be leaving the realm and anything they make with it effectively up for grabs.

Someguy

Does the wearer have to be alive or even sapient?

Dainpdf

Seems like it, though I like that line of thinking.

Valkyria

I smell the chance for yet an entirely different way to implement suicide goats....

Leventide

They are not putting the crown on a goat.

Valkyria

but... but...

David Lynch

Of course not; they're putting the crown on a purebred Liessen charger. Keep up, man.

nipi

Did the Tyrant bring his "horse"?

Valkyria

I dunno but if it takes the throne he can rightfully claim that treason and kill it

Euodiachloris

There is that gargoyle-and-book combo that's been walking around as a representative placeholder...

Morgenstern

Hah. I would laugh so hard at that one XD

naturalnuke

Killing the placeholder representative would be amazing.

Gunslinger

Cat's speech was fucking glorious. Chno Sve Noc!!

>Would you?" I said. "I wonder. When I stole Winter, it didn't do anything to the ruling court of Arcadia as far as I could tell. See, what I think is that it's the neverborn courts they get their blood from: Autumn and Spring, never to be again. Because Summer and Winter had to die so the unification of Arcadia could happen, so they couldn't be foundation of an entirely new realm could they? So my theft of Winter? Fine, I was robbing a corpse. The crown just to our side might just be what used to be Summer. So at best, o goddesses of mine, you'll be even. And you know that one viciously clever little bastard that just walked out of here?"

Can someone clarify what this passage means? I'm too sleepy to properly parse it.

Naeddyr

"Winter and Summer were easy mode because they were dead, the new realm is going to be a lot tougher."

Dainpdf

Cat says Winter and Summer died in the process of making the new court, so her taking Winter was easy. This crown of Twilight is probably made of Summer.

The new Court is made of Autumn and Spring, so even if Sve Noc ate this one, they would be even (or not even that, since they ate corpses).

Considering the Fae King's cunning, Cat says Sve Noc couldn't beat the Court at even power.

nimelennar

There were four Fae Courts, one for each season.

The power of Winter went into Cat.

The power of Summer (maybe) went into the Twilight Crown.

The power of Autumn and Spring went into the new Fae Court, jointly ruled by the former Queen of Summer and King of Winter.

So, if Sve Noc takes the Twilight Crown, they will be establishing themselves as the other pole to the current Fae Court, and thus war against them will be inevitable.

Each will have the power of two Courts (hence, "at best, you'll be even"), but the current rulers of the Fae are a lot cleverer than Sve Noc, so it probably won't go well for the Firstborn.

Taichi22

Even worse, it establishes a dichotomy between the two courts – one of light and one of darkness. One court of stories and fae and light and Arcadia Resplendent, and another of darkness and death and crawling rats.

You don't want to be on the darkness side of that story, no matter what you get.

Liliet

Oof. Night and Day courts to replace the seasonal dichotomy, huh.

Fayhem

I think actually Twilight and Dawn courts, currently. But if it mirrors the 4-season cycle that they had before, then yeah presumably we'd get a Court of Noon and a Court of Midnight as well. Which honestly sounds pretty fucking dope as a reader, though it also makes perfect sense why the characters who'd have to actually live with it would be going ALL MY NOPE TO THAT.

manic Insomniac

The [unammed current marriage court] gets its Magic Juice from the two courts that WOULD have happened, but didn't because of Cats bullshit. Cat got her Magic Juice from the corpse of Winter. Twilight might get its Magic Juice from the corpse of Summer.

Currently, Sve Noc has consumed Winters power, so it has One Courts worth of power. If it eats Twilight, it will have Two Courts worth of power.

However, since [UCMC] gets its Magic Juice from the TWO courts that didn't happen, [UCMC] ALREADY has Two Courts worth of power.

Therefore, [UCMC] and Sve Noc Post Twilight-nom will be equally matched in power.

Agent J

Court of Arcadia. Given that they are now called the King and Queen of Arcadia.

Dainpdf

Obviously, you crown the chair itself, then kill it.

Or crown the Shining Prince, predating the coronation so that Cat decided him on the field.

...or maybe see if there is any of the devils left? Hm...

konstantinvoncarstein

They would not have enough narrative weight for it.

Dainpdf

Party pooper.

caoimhinh

I don't know, the chair might have it if you twist the narrative enough.

I mean, every crown belongs to a throne, after all. Hahahaha

konstantinvoncarstein

Or the goat. It has clearly taken enough importance that it can wear a crown 😊

caoimhinh

Indrani would NEVER let Catherine forget that if pun if they actually used a literal Scapegoat. Hahahahahahaha

joewill5234

Pun? Is it a pun to do something in the original way, the act from which the word originated? I don't see it. It would be following old traditions.

onedollargum

Good old Escape Goat =D

caoimhinh

Masego would probably say that, and would be correct as you are, but all Cat would see would be the pun. And her group of friends will never stop reminding her of it.

Fayhem

Don't be ridiculous. A goat could never do that. A purebred Liessen charger, on the other hand... 🤪

konstantinvoncarstein

You're right, my mistake 🤦

Euodiachloris

The gargoyle that sits on an otherwise empty chair and spouts phrases from a book whose faith automatically disowns it...

TeK

Just bring back all the abdicated royals, and offer them a "chance to be king again".

Dainpdf

If only they had the time! And Cat hadn't specifically warned them it would not work.

Insanenoodlyguy

Agreed. It'd be one thing if one of them made to take it and was cut down, or even Grey did it knowing full well what he'd be sacrificing, but if they just hand it off, it will rot the whole process. The world will continue breaking down, if slower, as it's last ruler doomed it to ruin and a successor was never chosen.

dalek955

The abdicated royals, like Pilgrim, are just that: abdicated. They gave up their divine right to rule, and that specifically applies to any new crown they might get hold of.

caoimhinh

I wonder if Cat could simply call Akua there, crown her and finally kill her and be done with her "I'm going to make a good person out of you before I kill you" idea. It would be the most efficient way. Of course, it would be hard to kill her and Cat would lose one "ally", not to mention that it's pretty obvious at this point that Cat has grown fond of Akua to the point she has to constantly remind herself that she wants to kill Akua eventually.

Agent J

I'm sorry, but here on the S.S. Catkua, we call that base heresy.

caoimhinh

What's a bit of Heresy between friends? That's how the best alliances between ships are made! Besides, I was certain the S.S Catkua was in route through the Platonic Sea? I should contact Commodore Lillet for more info, she has the greater amount of ships I have seen so far here..

Soma

Commodore Lillet, my sides!

Whoever started the catkua ship be like

Shipper "Brothers your uncle fannys your aunt, there you are with two ships. The makings of your very own fleet. Course', you'll take the grandest as your flagship, and who's to argue? But of the Catkua, name me captain. I'll sail under your colours and give you ten percent of me booty and you get to introduce yourself as Commodore Lillet, savvy?"

Lillet: "I suppose in exchange you want me to not ship the whelp?"

Shipper: "no, no, no, by all means ship the whelp, just not yet. Wait to lift the curse for the opportune moment. For instance, after you've shipped Norrington's men. Every clink last clink one clink.

Shipee: "You've been planning this from the beginning! Ever since you learned my name!"

Shipper: "...yeah!"

Liliet: "I want fifty percent of your booty!"

Shipper: "Fifteen!"

Liliet: "Fourty!"

Shipper: "Twenty five! I'll buy you the hat. A reeeeeaaaly big one. Commodore."

Liliet: "We have an accord!"

caoimhinh

I have a screenshot of Commodore Liliet's fleet of ships, it includes ghost ships, one Dreadnought, a couple regular warships, one outright aberrant ship, and a wooden canoe.

Mind you, she probably has some unregistered pirate ships somewhere.

Check out the list here: <https://i.imgur.com/kxgzTk6.png>

Soma

Oh myyyyyyyyyyyyyyy

A grand fleet!

Liliet

Ok now I want to know which one's aberrant and which is the canoe...

caoimhinh

Well...

Catkua would be a Ghostship (Punintended).

IndranixCat + IndranixMasego is a mighty Dreadnought with long-range magic missiles and guided by Aspect-powered satellite vision and machine gun turrets on deck.

CatxRozala and CatxCordelia are a regular warship and a regular commercial ship with a bit of shady deals if one were to look at their accounts.

IndranixAkua would be that type of small but fast yacht that Narcos use to traffic cocaine while having a party full of booze and hot chics on the deck.

CatxLaurence is the aberrant one, of course.

CatXJuniper is the wooden canoe.

And I know you have at least one pirate ship, the CatxKairos. Plus the Viking raiding ship that is JuniperxAisha, from which we are all unofficial crew members.

Liliet

Well, yeah, I forgot to mention JuniAisha, or rather, I was only listing Cat ships (Indrani/Akua counts bc that whole list is actually one big ship)

♥

Don't forget the last two are FRIEND ships. Cat/Juniper is a proud frigate sailing since book 1, and Juniper has even stopped being tsundere about it (they HUGGED in book 3!)

I'd argue you can also ship adopted family ships, which adds at least two more to the armada, but I know people ARE going to misinterpret it, intentionally or otherwise, and while I'm vaguely cool with that happening to the friend ships, I am very uncool with that happening to the family ships, so unnamed they will stay. I'll call them submarines ♥

Love your classification ♥

Liliet

Oh, and I'm not sure about Cat/Kairos. It just kind of shows up sometimes, but I know I didn't put it there. It's like the ship version of a stray cat you put out milk for. Is it yours? Arguable! Is it there? Most of the time, no! What's up with it? Ask when you learn to speak cat! Or ship, I guess! This metaphor kind of got away from me! Pirate speak? Arrrrrr?

Ariklus

Can a RobbIckler lesser lifeboat fit in the glorious fleet?

I still hope for a political consortry resulting in the creation of Lesser Footrest Tribe (creation ow which was sanctioned years ago)

Liliet

Just for the number of consonants in a row there, YES.

As a friend ship :3

Liliet

I feel like there's a lot more potential to be milked out of Catkua in-story, but tbh this being the ending (and Akua submitting to it willingly) would also be cool as shit, even if I'd mourn that...

IDK. I hope there's another solution >x>

Liliet

...oh. I reread the ending, and Cat says she wishes she had someone to consult on this, and even Akua would do. So the current dilemma is predicated on her not being there.

Death Knight

Akua's chain is no longer there but doesn't she also wield Night? Can't Sve Noc tell her "get ya thicc ass over here?" She is a shade after all I don't think getting her there will be an issue.

Andrew Mitchell

I really like this idea for a few reasons:

I'm pretty sure that Akua's redeemed by now, and giving her life for a very good cause may be just the end she needs. With the 100,000 lives she will save just by stopping the fall of this land, she may even balance the scales in her favour. And I think Akua needs to die eventually because otherwise Cat's giving up on an essential aspect of her Callowan identity (long prices).

It makes so much sense, Akua may even do it willingly and she wouldn't be hard to kill.

Thea

Maybe giving up on the long prices is what needs to happen though... Can't only change Praes to break the cycle.

Liliet

Agreed.

Cat's whole thing from the start was based on putting aside a grudge. "Okay fine the Black Knight conquered us and Praes are mean meanies who suck, now how do we be productive about this?"

Dainpdf

So apparently this is the third time Cat refuses a crown.

So I guess my Pattern of Three theory paid off, but in the wrong way? Unless Cat gets a queen name in some other way before this is over.

IDKWhoitis

She already has embodied the Black Queen role, and I think we don't see the markings of a Name because either

1) Names were the old method of gathering and using power, and Cat is all about breaking the old ways...

2) The Black Queen is a Name, but it is so new, that it doesn't have any accumulated power behind it, and Cat's natural nature is shaping the path (or lack thereof) of this new Name.

ActionKermit

The Black Queen was a proper Name, but Amadeus stopped Cat from taking it after Second Liesse.

ayon96

Amadeus's action resulted in dread empress not supporting cat's rule. Without her support Black Queen didn't have enough weight to become a proper name

Liliet

Considering Cat got literally crowned right afterwards and was able to extricate herself from the Dread Empress's influence specifically because of his actions (and the reason Malicia stopped supporting her WAS that she no longer was dependent on her)... I somehow don't think that's it.

What I think is that the "Black" part of her Name referred to Cat's colder, more vicious side, the part of her willing to fully live up to the "justifications matter only to the just" motto. The pivot in Liesse was, either she rejects Malicia's plan in favor of "rolling over for Hasenbach", as she so graciously put it at the time, and gives up on her forming crown... or she locks herself into the way of Evil by agreeing to go along with it.

Because of how extreme the hellfortress option was, the Name ended up taking shape as dark enough to completely break when the decision was taken away. It would have been the manifestation of Cat's darkest moment, given enough power to forever take her over and drag her down, with no option to crawl back up.

After Black broke Liesse, it did not take Cat long to realize that (1) he was not wrong narratively/practically speaking, and (2) fuck no. It really was the Darkest Hour, the one moment of weakness at the lowest point, Cat's war fatigue playing a cruel joke on her and the rest of Creation.

(We all know that would have ended with at least a couple new Hellgates open on Calernia, don't we? Let's all give collective thanks to Auntie Bard and Uncle Amadeus for that being prevented from happening)

Anyway, that set the metaphysical/narrative meaning of "Black Queen" so that now p much no matter what Cat does she's not coming close to embodying it again, especially not after Everdark. She's only moving up and away, now.

shveiran

Sure, but I don't think that preventing a Name from forming prevents that Name from ever forming afterwards.

Cat will never be the Black Queen as in "Sovereign of Callow under the Tower", but she has been the Black Queen to friend and foe alike for books now. I could see her getting Black Queen as a Name that means "Lesser-evil, narrative-focused villain ruler" or something along those lines.

Dainpdf

1) Uh, maybe. "Priestess to earthly gods" is not exactly an innovation, though, so I don't think this holds up.

2) Hierophant was new and it had power. This doesn't hold water.

Mental Mouse

I'd say a variation of 2: Black Queen might not be completely new (e.g., Heirophant wasn't considered novel, just unexpected), but no prior holder was more memorable than Cat herself.

Cat's exploits have simply taken over any prior stories about the name – at this point, any time anybody on Calernia tells a Black Queen story/joke/song/etc, it's a reference to Cat. And any future holder of the Name of Black Queen will be shaped by Cat's story.

Soma

Oof, human sacrifice reprise. This seems like a line Catherine was always going to come up against again. Curious to see how it plays out. I'm hoping the band stays okay, because I don't really want to see any of them die. I mean maybe the tyrant, but while he and the saint live there's still the chance of the saint and the tyrant buddy cop movie. He's a loose cannon, she's a loose canon, plot ensues.

Probably for the best the heroes didn't understand Catherine's speech. She's taking Evil in a very dangerous direction. Fear the reasonable madwoman.

Excellent chapter.

IDKWhoitis

I bet Tariq is going to get the summary from Mercy, and if anything, it's going to confirm his bone deep certainty that Cat needs to die by the end of this. She is a manifestation of every bloody lesson learned, a Black 2.0, which has gone beyond the cruel pragmatism of the Calamaties. Cat has gone beyond, breaking the Order of the world, and reshaping it into something new, never seen before.

Watching her in her element is terrifying enough, even without subtitles provided by Mercy. She just cowed a whole pack of hungry murderous creatures by shouting them down, and not with the fury of her god, but with a cruel battering with the truth. Even Kairos isn't being silly anymore and is as close to serious and honest as we've seen him this arc.

Liliet

But would Tariq really be unhappy with this?

Soma

Yeah, I mean unsettled I'd get. Hell, Cat just legit claimed to have to have created every fae court in existence. I'm not sure about unhappy though. The remaking of the Drow moves in a direction I think the Pilgrim would be down for, or more down for than what they are, since it would reduce suffering.

Micke

Pilgrim would think whatever his Choir or the Bard told him to think, and they are very much against their amusing game of mortal suffering being broken. It makes me suspect at least some Gods Below are in favour of breaking the cycle, just to spite Above.

Liliet

I think he trusts Bard, not "delegates his thinking to her". I frankly don't get where the "slavishly obedient Tariq" meme comes from, it has 0 support in the narrative, either from his current POVs or the flashbacks?

On top of Tariq being "the one long view hero they have", this also doesn't make sense in light of Bard's Role. She's forbidden direct touch, remember? She either acts as an entirely neutral messenger, or confirms people's pre-existing conceptions in a way that nudges them to act the way she prefers. Being allowed to directly tell people "you are doing this wrong, let me explain the right way" and having them actually follow the advice would, coupled with her millennia of experience, give her immensely more power than she currently evidently wields.

And of course Choirs don't tell people what to think. On top of previous narrative evidence (hi William the idiot racist), recently we literally had Tariq try to ask them for input, only to get "NaN we trust YOU!!!" in response.

There IS no divine source of insight/instructions for Good champions to consult when in doubt. Life on Creation would be much easier if there was.

shveiran

I think the answer will be a pivotal moment for ol' Tariq.

Remember, both he and Saint have always operated under the assumption that Evil can be defeated.

Under that assumption, allowing the creation of a Black-inspired, sustainable, effective nation sworn to Goddesses bound to Below, is something he must strongly oppose, because it is the birth of a nation that must later be fought and conquered if Above is ever to triumph in Calernia. Within this assumption, Cat is terrifying; an ever growing manace who refuses to allow labels to restrict her options.

But that assumption is refuted by Cat and Black, and I think the guide will prove them right; as in, the game is rigged to go on in perpetuity, and there can be no eradication of either Good or Evil.

And I think the dialogue between Tariq and Asmodeus set the stage for a switch in perspective for the Pilgrim.

Under that assumption, what you can do as a Hero is not eradicate Evil, but rather groom the sustainable Evil (because if you squash them, more evil will rise in its stead and won't be the sensible kind, but rather the madman kind, and that is worse for people everywhere). Within this perspective, what Cat is doing is amazing. It opens the road for a nation of Below that focuses on excellence rather than constant mayhem, and you can't but consider it a huge step forward.

We know, I think, where Tariq's angel stand on the issue. And we know what the Bard preaches, since she dismissed William's doubt in book 2 to ensure he'd mind the label of Evil more than how sustainable the regime was.

Where will Tariq stand? By this point, I think it could go either way. And though I'm awful at predicting EE's twists, I think the story points toward a Pilgrim that embraces Cat's perspective and emends his attitude accordingly. Eventually.

konstantin von carstein

Excellent reflections! 😊

Liliet

I don't think Tariq's angels stand anywhere on this. Except if you put it as a "what eliminates unnecessary suffering", I suppose.

I wouldn't trust what Bard said to William all that much. Willy's kind of an idiot, she had to take him by the nose ring to lead him anywhere.

And finally, I don't normally nitpick typos, but this one just deserves correction: it's not Asmodeus, as in a demon or whatever, it's Amadeus, as in "love of God", because Guide is beautiful and gives no fucks ♥

shveiran

Yeah, I'm DMing Way of the Wicked for my D&D group, my Asmodeus is showing. I KEEP getting it wrong, sorry XD

Regarding the rest, I THINK we have HINTS of how the Bard and Choirs think on the matter by their actions in previous books.

I have no trouble admitting they ARE circumstantial, but still:

– The Bard's talk to William was still aimed to ensure he didn't consider long term benefits or the sustainability of the Evil empire and only focused on the Good vs. Evil war. William being easily manipulated, I feel, only reinforces the idea that the result was the Bard's aim => keep the conflict going. So I doubt a sustainable Firstborn nation that sings hymns to Sven Noc is acceptable in their views.

– As for the Angels... I mean, let's leave William aside, the fact remains that the Hashmallim was willing to play ball. We are told it did in the past. Combine that with the glimpse we got with the fledgling paladin the choirs tried to recruit mid-fight, and I don't think it's a stretch to say that the Angels are more focused on smiting evildoers than worldpeace. I'll be surprised if the angels support the creation of a drow country.

Liliet

You are thinking of angels as a well coordinated hivemind, and one that has involved opinions on the specifics of mortal politics to boot. I don't think the text supports this reading.

shveiran

I think the cordinated hivemind, or something along those lines, is rather canon, so I'm guessing you disagree on them being hands on?

I don't think they have" precise opinion on the specifics of mortal politics" either, but I'd argue they don't need to in order to oppose Cat's designs. When you get down to it, a general inclination is all you need. Something like "Oppose all Evil " or "Prevent Evil from taking deeper root in reality" is enough to veto the building of a Firstborn country, and it does seem in tune with what we saw of the angels.

I simply think the angels fight to WIN the struggle between Good and Evil, and that is it as far as I'm concerned: if that is your goal, Cat's objective is something to oppose.

Andrew Mitchell

I'm not taking a position in this argument but I am interested in this comment:

> I think the cordinated hivemind, or something along those lines, is rather canon,

It seems to me that many people in the comment section would agree with you, I feel like that common feeling could be satisfactorily explained by our (mostly) shared culture about angels rather than actually being canon.

Do you think this is a just feeling you've developed (and share with others) or if there's something in the text that actually makes this canon?

Liliet

>I think the cordinated hivemind, or something along those lines, is rather canon

Every Choir within itself is a coordinated hivemind. Individual Choirs are separate though. Mercy and Judgement can disagree, Contrition and Compassion can disagree. They're probably not aware of what other Choirs are doing, either.

>I simply think the angels fight to WIN the struggle between Good and Evil

And I think the angels work to promote their virtue, to support heroes who they identify as embodying it in all their designs, and that's kind of... it.

Again, see: William. His entire storyline, starting from Cat branding his Name, was about how he was really fucking easy to lead by the nose, and the angels weren't taking up the vacancy.

shveiran

(I'll answer to both comments here to keep the discussion from branching too much)

Regarding the angels being Hiveminds, I honestly think this is how they were presented. It was not STATED in a definitive way, so I will admit there is a bit of uncertainty, but I think there is a lot of evidence in this regard.

Within a single Choir, angels don't even have singular names, and that points toward them being parts of something larger. We also know that when an angel dies, the Choir is not diminished as its power is a constant.

I think this is more us building on the provided clues than mistaking tropes with canon. I could be wrong, of course, but as of now I see no elements in the story that suggest it.

Also, yes, I meant they have one mind for each Choir. We are of one (Hive)mind in that regard.

Regarding Angels, I'm not sure which part of William's story you are pointing out as an example.

Even intervening Choirs have limits, because if they push too hard Below gets to push back, so I think there are several reasons why they didn't intervene more directly when William was branded, when William was defeated by Warlock or when Cat was pulling her sword-in-stone BS-fu; first among them, the shape of the story was too wrong, and that meant fighting against the current and therefore too high a cost.

There is also the fact that Contrition was not advising William like Mercy is Tariq: they were empowering him through the Feather sword. A different blessing, but they can't give them all to each Hero.

The fact that limitations exist to their action doesn't mean there isn't an agenda.

And sure, they operate through Heroes, and sure, they pick Heroes that follows their key virtue, I'm not disputing that. It's just...

Well, it's not JUST about the virtues though, is it? It really seems Heroes tend to fight Evil more than they do evil.

I mean, take Contrition. During the William arch, we are told what would happen if Contrition manifested in a city, and that it has already happened before. And the result is a city-worth of people not just feeling contrite and embracing a new way of life because of that truth – it is a city worth of people taking up arms to fight the closest, biggest Evil there is.

I have an hard time believing virtues are enough for the Choir; it seems to me they think the only real way to live up to those virtues is slaying villains or villain's minions, and therefore that the most important thing is still the GvE war.

Liliet

>Well, it's not JUST about the virtues though, is it? It really seems Heroes tend to fight Evil more than they do evil.

I mean, virtues are... kind of tied to that? It's about virtues (good intentions!) and not being a follower of Below, two cutoff criteria narrowing the possibility space so that the worst case scenario is William.

>it seems to me they think the only real way to live up to those virtues is slaying villains or villain's minions

That's not the vibe I got off Mercy; they came to Tariq the first time when he put an injured beast out of its suffering and returned to him the second when he killed his nephew (a Good ruler of a Good nation, but one who would have led them to a catastrophe).

Which, were both, killings, so I, kind of see your point, now that I look at it.

Still, Hanno's crystallization moment was refusing to condemn a minion of Below committing an undeniably Evil act.

And yes, by Choir hivemind I mean they're not all a single hivemind, not that individual Choirs aren't. I agree that individual Choirs obviously are, I just think they're independent from there and it's possible for them to be at odds, even, if their champions disagree on the course of action.

Andrew Mitchell

Well said. 😊

werafdsaew

If killing Drows is free according to Pilgrim's utilitarian calculus, then sure. Otherwise if he would rather not have to kill any sentient beings then he would be behind what Cat is doing.

Liliet

I think they count as morally relevant sentient beings, yeah. We know from Willicakes' storyline that anti-nonhuman racism isn't very popular with heroes on average even against literal cannibals they're at war with right now.

Mental Mouse

> while he and the saint live there's still the chance of the saint and the tyrant buddy cop movie. He's a loose cannon, she's a loose canon, plot ensues.

Also property damage and body count. 😊

IDKWhoitis

A damn shame they didn't strap Larat onto the throne and dice him up...

Although nonetheless a good call.

I'm placing my bet on a throw at the dice and breaking the crown and harvesting the power for another ritual. Catherine has forsaken the crown, and one of the heroes isn't going to put it on... And we all know how much Cat loves throwing the dice into Fate's face and seeing what results of the endeavour.

Agent J

Yet if the dice, finicky as they often are, should turn against them then everyone dies. Everyone. Not just the three armies, not just the people still living in Iserre, but everyone in the Dead King's path. Y'know, since the only army with a shot at stopping him just fucked themselves royally.

Yes, Cat loves throwing the dice at Fate, but only after rigging it to explode. Right now, it's more likely to blow in her face instead.

Honestly, my money's on Pilgrim. Wait, strike that. He just gave up the right to Rule literally seconds ago. Kairos sure as shit won't get it. Catherine's refused it. Saint is unlikely. She's not the self-sacrifice type (wouldn't be an old hero if she were prone to that), nor is she the ruling sort. Besides, her soulsword will be needed against the Hidden Horror.

That just leaves Roland and he's too... well no. He's not enough. We don't know him enough. We don't care about him enough. He just doesn't have enough weight for something like this. I mean, he doesn't even know Higher Arcana. Wtf dude. You're a serious downgrade from Masego.

I've no clue where EE's going with this, but I'm loving every moment of this wild ride.

Andrew Mitchell

Pilgrim could take it. He won't be ruling for long and the curse takes a while to take effect.

But Saint is actually a good option. Rook made an excellent case early on in the comments, worth reading if you haven't already.

Sylwoos

Pilgrim gave up his right to rule to create the very crown you want him to take. Being Fae stuff made of stories and all, I highly doubt he can even claim it and if he did the consequence would be... very, very bad.

caoimhinh

But if the ones throwing the Dice are Heroes, then Providence and Narrative would be on their side. And right now they are the Party trying to save everyone, ergo the good guys, the heroes of that story.

It could work, they have the narrative weight to make it happen.

That's also a thing to consider.

Mental Mouse

Providence maybe, but Pilgrim has learned at some pain that just because he's a hero doesn't mean he can play fast-and-loose with the Narrative.

You know, if Larat is really mortal now, they can indeed salvage it for another ritual. They have Spellblade, Thief of Stars,, maybe Edward VII, Cat, Tyrant of Helike (if he dies), maybe Black; one more crown to shape it and they can reroll.

Of course, that is contingent on anyone, not just Larat, being able to forge a crown; on them finding the last one and a claimant to it before the realm crashes onto the armies below; on the Tyrant not being warned about the possibility by the Bard. Still, while unlikely, the growing ball of crowns would be fun.

Mental Mouse

Except this realm has already had a crown forged for it. No take-backs, no do-overs. 😊

TeK

It is going to be the Hero, ain't it? It is basically "there must always be a Lich King" all over again.
Please don't kill Pilgrim, he's my favorite pony.

nimelennar

Can't be Pilgrim: he's given up the right to rule.

TeK

He doesn't have to rule, just be crowned and knifed. When they explained what giving that up entails, they mentioned that another crown COULD be taken...

Just that the consequences would be disastrous. So yeah, he probably will not die. Yay?

Sparsebeard

It's probably Black, as many said last chapters...

After all :

"They say the third step is the cruelest,
Walk when the moon is at her clearest:
Love ends with the kiss of the knife,
Trust is the wager that takes your life"

Thea

But they already need Black for ruling Praes...

Morgenstern

And it has been stated many times in the story already that there is NO ONE to replace Black for that purpose. While there are still many peeps left over who could act as the claimant for that crown.

Morgenstern

That third verse would make brilliant sense, too, if it ended up with Indrani / Masego. Poor crappy love story ending in drama. I mean, he's already robbed of something he at least currently believes he cannot live without (and she does so, too), so...

Sparsebeard

If Black is alive, Cat won't climb the tower so how the hell can the third verse make sense in that context.

Despite Cat's efforts, it always was foreshadowed that she'd kill her mentor and climb the tower... Plus, she already stated that between her ambitions and Black, she'd choose her ambitions.

Plus, Cat might actually be an even more acceptable Ruler for Praes than everyone else (especially since she didn't torch half Procer).

Since the drow are not an option, I truly don't see anyone else as "worthy" in the vicinity.

Zgggt

Pilgrim won't take the crown because he would be stuck with the price. The point of him is that he never pays any direct personal price. Someone else always has to sacrifice themselves, or get maimed, or die. Tariq might not like watching it, and might even wish he could do it himself, but that's like losing your legs but saying that you want to fight in a pro MMA match even if you would get beat up... Nice thing to say in theory, and hey, you might even mean it.

Unoriginal

He always pays the personal price. He's a brutal utilitarian bent of minimizing suffering, and every time he causes it in the pursuit of lowering suffering overall he suffers the same pain that the victims go through.

Perhaps not every time, we have no hint that happens when he fights using 'mundane' methods but we know that when he 'cast' plague on the town that Black was occupying to kill the army with him. The Pilgrim suffered the same as every single person who died from the disease, taking their suffering into himself as the price for doing so.

JJR

But that means if he tries to rule any way a curse will destroy the kingdom that he was attempting to rule. And that is kinda what they want right now. The curse was supposed to be a more subtle thing sure, crop failures and the like, building up to more extreme things. But I'm sure it can work with a group of people bent on killing the usurper. Plus, they would have to contend with the fact that anyone who does wear the crown, no matter their intentions before hand, is going to be changed by it. So ideally they would want someone who would put it on and then let themselves be killed, but having a backup "Narrative itself will make you lose this fight" is a good idea.

That or they could still put it on the goat. A scapegoating if you will. I'm not sure how well that story turns out though.

Mental Mouse

> But I'm sure it can work with a group of people bent on killing the usurper.

That... is a possibility. The question is whether they can shape and extinguish the curse that way, or if it would instead become inherent in the realm.

superkeaton

Hm, tricky tricky.

Oshi

I wonder when the Bard will appear. This of course is what she planned. All to end an alliance in it's bed.

Ashen Shugar

Makes you wonder how well the Bard can see/predict the future. If she saw this coming from Larat and thus made sure Masego wasn't going to be in any condition to give expert advice in what they could/should do.

Andrew Mitchell

"You would have us pin our hopes on amity and mercy," Andronike said.

...

"They might turn on us regardless," Andronike said.

Well done EE, this has some very clear parallels to Catherine's decision to pin her life and her hopes on the Sisters' mercy.

=====

>"So either we roll the dice over the life of around two hundred thousand people," I grimly said. "Or someone puts on that crown and then we kill them."

They're going to kill Pilgrim. He can take the crown, he just won't have the right to rule. And he won't be Twilight King for long.

konstantinvoncarstein

Or crown Amadeus.

Morgenstern

Pilgrim is not needed (as ruler) on Calernia. Black is. Unless Cat were suddenly okay with a Praes reverting back to insane Emperors and Empresses destroying everything and returning to the bloody cycle with Callow. She was rather clear that she does NOT trust Akua with that and also none else (who would do it and be accepted enough).

Fayhem

He isn't needed as a ruler for Cat's plans, but he is needed. Nobody else has both the cultural weight and the basic sanity to drag the Levantines to the table for the Liesse Accords. Do you really want Cat to have to try to talk sense to the Lords/Ladies of the Blood by interacting with them directly? Because while I don't have the turbo-hate for them that I've seen a lot of other people express in the comments, it is still the case that literally nothing I've seen in their POVs suggests that would be anything other than a bloody disaster. At every stage, a core desideratum in Cat's plans has been "I've got to keep the Pilgrim alive, there's no substitute for the role he occupies in my plans". That hasn't changed now.

Abstract

I am liking Larat more and more.
Despite having no free will, he has managed to escape Arcadia, cat's machinations, and walk away a free man, without fear of reprisals in the short term.

damn fine show.

RoflCat

I mean, the man just wanted to be free from the cycle.

I would too once I realize if I remain a fae then Ranger will come visit every cycle for the eye.

Andrew Mitchell

Me too. 😊

I think he's got free will now.

Fayhem

> I think he's got free will now.

Which is terrifying. Cat ditched being fae because she realized it made her more dangerous, not less (well, among other reasons). Pretty sure Larat made a similar calculation. He didn't change his personality, he just expanded his options. Larat is still very much in play as a Chekhov's Noun, and the danger factor for whatever he pulls in future just increased wildly IMO.

Faiir

He could be the star of his own spinoff series!

Andrew Mitchell

That's what fanfiction is for. AFAIK there hasn't been any PGtE fanfiction written yet apart from a couple of short scenes in the comments. This is a tragedy.

OmniscientQ

On Spacebattles resides the only Practical Guide fanfiction I'm aware of: A cross-over with Worm titled "A Practical Guide to Escalation".

Andrew Mitchell

Thanks! Back to Spacebattles I go, after not visiting there for many months. 😊

Andrew Mitchell

Hmmm it seems there is a bit more than that one. 😊 😊 I'm happy!!

There's "An Impractical Guide to Ascension" as well. And a few more one-shots. Check this search:

<https://www.google.com/search?q=spacebattles+practical+guide+to+evil+site:forums.spacebattles.com>

Shin_Splinters

It was pretty badass, a creature made of thought and power betting that thought would be sufficient and abdication let him escape the restrictions of power.

"Cogito ergo" got high stakes in there.

danh3107

Cat's speech was, for lack of better terms, fucking awesome.

If you'll excuse my language.

Andrew Mitchell

Excused.

Sparsebeard

It will probably be Black, after all, the girl will climb the tower...

"They say the third step is the cruelest,
Walk when the moon is at her clearest:
Love ends with the kiss of the knife,
Trust is the wager that takes your life "

caoimhinh

Awesome speech. Someone should add it to the speech section of the Guide on TV Tropes.

The Drow and Sve Noc are learning to be more pragmatic in their ways, cool. They are going to need that if they want to survive in the world and prove that they aren't crazy stupid Evil that needs to be put down.

They need to crown someone and kill that person.
Maybe get Akua there and finally end her? That could be a good solution, but she is still useful to Catherine (not to mention Cat has come to like her) and she needs a strong spellcaster to handle the Night spells (as evidenced with the Eclipse made by the well of Night, which is still in effect), political advisor and schemer on her side for the campaign ahead and political mess ahead.

The other interesting and more likely candidate is Good King Edward Fairfax, assuming he hasn't collapsed already.

He would suit this Court of Twilight, as he is a Good Hero made into a Revenant by Evil and then granted freedom by Night to fight against the Enemy. He has quite a few elements from both Above and Below in his story, so he is (in my opinion) a suitable Twilight King.

He is also likely to understand the necessities of the role and make it a willing sacrifice, perhaps even making the nature of the new realm into a better thing than if the ruler is brutally murdered.

Soma

King Edward would make for a super satisfying ending. Spitting on all of Death's work till the very end. I very much like the shape of him getting in some real vengeance against the dead king more so than just becoming free. The twilight king gave his life to spite Death.

I waaaaaaaaaant it.

Andrew Mitchell

I'm pretty sure Edward is no more. I don't think he lasted long after he called up all the Liesse spirits.

caoimhinh

Last we saw him he was still around, so we really can't be sure.

He must be in terrible shape, that's for sure.

Also, remember that time is flowing strangely in that place, due to the power of Narrative and Providence.

Andrew Mitchell

> Last we saw him he was still around, so we really can't be sure.

Agreed, that's why I said "pretty sure". It's hard to be certain but I give it a 1:20 chance you're right. It seemed to me like Edward's short term fate was quite clear and we don't have to always get to see deaths on-screen. Plus, to me, it would feel unsatisfying for Edward to come back after he chose what seemed to be certain death.

caoimhinh

Well, coming back by claiming the Twilight Crown IS certain death still.

Andrew Mitchell

True. 😊

Fayhem

> It's hard to be certain but I give it a 1:20 chance you're right.

So in other words, he just needs to roll a nat 20 and he's good. I'll take those odds. Remember, for once providence is backing Cat's team here.

antoninjohn

I still think Cat should take the Crown

Agent J

Mortal always.

Squire!Cat was cool. Winter!Cat was awesome. Priestess!Cat has been an absolute fucking riot and I'm loathe to relinquish her, be it for a new Name or a new Court.

Kissaten

...this is when Robber comes in and steals the Crown under everyone's noses

Andrew Mitchell

♥ ♥ ♥

Sugar Roll

And while Catherine was making that speech, Ivah already grabbed the crown and disappeared.

On a more serious note, give it to the Heirarch and kill him. He must be somewhere in the area.

konstantinvoncarstein

Do you really want a madman who want to destroy the Gods Below in charge of the highway?

konstantinvoncarstein

But I agree that he has to die

Sugar Roll

They're planning to murder the person who gets the crown immediately. If you're going to have someone killed, why not take the opportunity to remove someone dangerous off the board.

caoimhinh

Anaxares would never take a crown for himself.
They would need to kill him first to make him become King, which defeats to purpose of having him crowned before killing him.

Euodiachloris

I'm damned sure even his soulless corpse would rise in rebellion against itss own coronation.

Richard Ngo

My guess is... Masego! Once he wakes up and realises he has no magic.

Liliet

No

Mental Mouse

Goddamn, Cat may have given up Winter, but even so she's seriously chill!

> the moment the fae ... took a step away from the throne I had to speak up.
> Seed of madness in the crown was my guess, putting an original sin at the heart
> High above us, Sve Noc lazily circled the sky. Yet another fire
I was going to have to put out
> "Pilgrim," I calmly said. "I don't think you appreciate how delicate the situation is right now."
> if I found offence with the faith ... , who but me could be charged with the change of it?

The Tuesdays are ganging up on her, but she's managing anyway. 😊

shveiran

Ok, so apparently I was royally wrong.
Both on them no longer needing to stab the crowned individual, and on the Mighty not being an issue.

And boy, am I glad I was, 'cause this was fucking awesome.

Leave it to EE to always deliver not what you think you want, but what you don't know you need.

Liliet

SAME

Bakkasama

I would have thought the pick to be obvious. Since the crown was made so that the one to wear it would die and give it up to defeat the Death King, the worthiest one would be that Plproceran princess who didn't hesitate to give up her crown willingly to beat the hidden horror and was deemed the worthiest among the princes to keep it because of it.

Liliet

And that would be a good idea because?...

NZPIEFACE

Uh, that would just be saying "ur a cool dudette but soz cuz u were cool now u die"

ThatOneGuy

Long story short. They need someone to ease the crown to murder... But if someone does wear it then they could rule a dead empty realm with nothing inside of it.

Give it a few years and they will want company even if they have to start taking people. Then it's a slow fall from grace and a rise towards the old, but slight fresher minted brand of fae.

The old fae have the crown a middle finger walking away so that they could be unbound and do whatever they want. So taking up the crown doesn't add them to the pot.

ninegardens

Quick, give the shiny hat to Wandering Bard!

Okay, on a more serious note:

Why do they need to murder whoever takes the crown? I was assuming the plan to Murderize Larat was because ... well, he's Larat. Ain't no one want that boy with power.

If it ain't Larat I'm a little hazy on the compelling need to murder Twilight Princess.

Also, who thinks that Akua would make a fitting bearer of the crown?

A chance for her to experience godhood, and also face the judgement promised to her, here in the ruins of the city she destroyed. Akua's folly would be remember for generations to come (because of the highway), and depending on the ending it would either be a perfect redemption arc, or a last chance at trechery (which would, in the circumstances be relatively justified).

Also, Cat mentioned the mantel of Woe being nearby just now, so that's a cool thing.

Liliet

The mantle was with Masego, who was spirited away to the camp by the drow.

I'd write a detailed explanation of why I don't think Akua dying here is the best option for guide as a story, but I'm on mobile and tired. Maybe tomorrow.

The tl;dr is that it's better than she deserves.

ninegardens

Yeah, I agree, I don't actually believe that Akua is a LIKELY candidate for the crown... I was just mentioning her as a character that we have largely forgotten, that would somewhat fit all the IN STORY requirements for the crown (Namely, Cat could give her power and then stab her in clean conscience).

From a narrative perspective, no. Akua is too fun, too useful, and hasn't been hinted at throughout the arc, so it wouldn't work at all.

Mental Mouse

Akua isn't bound to the mantle anymore – she was back in Creation anyway, but if needed she could easily come back through the Night. That said, I agree this isn't the best option story-wise, in part because she wasn't a part of this story. (That's considering the Shard arc as separate from the preceding battle.) Also, it seems an anticlimax from her perspective... "I gained trust and power as a ghostly servant, until one day my mistress decided to sacrifice me to the Greater Good".

Mental Mouse

Come to think of it, putting it that way means that by Cat's lights, the available candidates are pretty much Laurence, Kairos, and possibly Cat herself (breaks some of her goals, but she's got that self-sacrificing thing going).

Liliet

No, this would actually be very elegant wrt Akua. How exactly did she "not come up" when they are IN LIESSE? Remember that aborted conversation about how Roland heard that Cat bound her soul to the array and then destroyed it? Remember the whole "restless souls" thread? Remember how they're in the Ducal Palace, which is incidentally where Akua died in the first place?

From the perspective of the story of the Doom of Liesse, this is anything BUT random. It's tying up her arc with a neat bow, made queen of the very place she killed only to be killed in turn / willing sacrifice to save two hundred thousand where she had previously killed one hundred thousand (and change).

It would be the ultimate fulfillment of her drive to be noticed, to be remembered, to leave her own unique mark on Creation – she was willing to die for it back when she first MADE the thing, because she was smart enough to understand how low the odds of her surviving the decade were. The argument of Cat being a perfect storm she wants to ride was the one Cat accepted in Everdark as an explanation of her behaviour for a reason – it's THE drive compelling her.

In short, Akua getting sacrificed here would be all about HER – all about the old her, to boot, with a slapped-on coat of surface “redemption” for glory.

Her full redemption arc has more potential than that, and step one is her learning to recognize value in things that are not about her at all.

Mental Mouse

Certainly Akua has been mentioned along the way... and yet, Cat declined to take her along on this ride (possibly because she'd already been assigned to run an eclipse). She's surely been helping with all the movements through Night from her “back room” back in Creation, but she's carefully not done anything that would have revealed the continued existence of the Doom of Liesse to the rest of the party..

There's probably only two people present (Cat and Archer) who know that Akua the former Heiress and Diabolist still exists in any form; if Cat called her up as a sacrifice, that's the first thing they'd have to explain to Pilgrim, Sword, etc, and they don't even have an hour for that. 😊

Liliet

I mean I doubt the heroes would demand an explanation when the entire province is running out of time :p

Honestly, this is kind of the upside. Akua just appearing like “no time to explain, have fun going ??? on your own time” is like half the appeal of this scenario ♥

Mental Mouse

Cat would still need to discuss the matter with Akua, and again, there's less than an hour.

Niteman

I think it will be Masego who dons the crown of Twilight. He lost his fathers, now he's lost his magic. Losing his fathers broke him enough to let the Dead King in, now he's lost his magic which is a major component of his identity. the Dead King used him like a puppet and killed Indrani and he's unable to do anything in his current state to make the Dead King pay for it. Donning the crown would enable him to bring order to the realm and stabilize it which would help his friend Cat and also would be used as a tool in the war against the Dead King. For someone who likely feels completely useless right now, it could seem like the logical choice to help his friends and punish the foe who used him.

Javvies

Except that Masego is (a) unconscious and likely to remain unconscious until Cat decides to wake him up, and (b) no longer physically present.

Masego isn't going to be taking up the Twilight Crown.

Now, if Cat or Archer were to take up the Twilight Crown and not need to be killed, I could perhaps see one of them giving Masego a Twilight Court Title or otherwise empowering him through the Twilight Court.

NZPIEFACE

What if she puts on the crown and pulls some Name-dream shenanigans?

Masterofbones

All hail Discordia!

Andrew Mitchell

Hail Eris!!

Mental Mouse

Yay, hot dogs tomorrow!

The lady doth protest too much, methinks

Really though, why not Cat? She's good at dying

Andrew Mitchell

She has been good at dying but... she's already had three and the next one could be her last. Plus, I get the feeling that dying here is a permanent sort of death given the 'highway' the band want to make.

Javvies

Yeah, but I'm still not seeing why killing the person holding the Twilight Crown is being considered an automatic necessity here.

When it was Larat, sure, murder his ass thoroughly so he can't fuck with them ...

But I don't know why they'd need to murder, say, Cat, if she had the Twilight Crown, in order for the highway plan to work. I fully get why Saint would want to kill Cat at that point (even more than she already does), and why Rogue Sorcerer and Pilgrim would be cautious and probably suspicious of Cat/Cat's motives, but I don't get why killing Cat, Sovereign of Twilight, would be required to use the realm as a highway.

Andrew Mitchell

Cat was pretty clear on needing the bones. This is the last line of <https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2019/04/26/chapter-32-woven-weaver/>

Sure, "bones" is almost certainly metaphorical but it's clear that the new fae god needs to die.

Javvies

At the time, she was referring to Larat.

And killing him to get him out of the way makes sense.

He's a murderous nutjob on a good day, after all.

But I'm not at all sure why killing a Twilight!Cat or a Twilight!Hero would be a necessary component in using the realm as a highway. That hasn't been explained as far as I can tell.

Andrew Mitchell

You're quite right that the 'why' hasn't been explained. But the bones quote is evidence that it is needed.

shveiran

Also, last line of this chapter reads:

"So either we roll the dice over the life of around two hundred thousand people," I grimly said. "Or someone puts on that crown and then we kill them."

I AM confused as of the why, and I was previously advocating they no longer needed to do it, but it seems Cat believes it firmly.

And I don't know about you, but I am not going to argue with Cat.

Girl is scary.

Chapter 48: Swan Song (Redux)

"Beware of deep passions, for great love may turn in hatred just as great."

– Hesperos the Tepid, Atalantian preacher

Less than an hour was left before the sky fell down on Iserre, and three great armies were broken and buried. How many people were down there, right now? I'd off-handedly said two hundred thousand, but with the League's armies it had to be more than that. Three hundred? It didn't matter, I thought. Their deaths were simply not the kind of blow Calernia could recover from in less than fifty years, if even that. To anchor this realm and wrest it out of the precipitous fall, Twilight could have three outcomes" a crown-bearer, one's corpse or a shattered crown. If there was to be a crowning it'd have to be one of us, I admitted to myself. None aside from the band of five I'd assembled and our guide in Archer, the fateful sixth, had the required weight to bring this to an end. We'd been the ones to storm the Dead King's holdfast, to destroy the shard of him and to face against the clever fox who'd turned it all around on us. It had to be us, didn't it? I could feel the current of the story and fighting against it too forcefully would only lead to failure. If I tried to bring out Akua, whose ties to this place and murderous legacy ran deeper than anyone else's, I suspected she would simply not arrive in time. In a place like this, where the rules of Creation ran so thin they could be twisted and snapped, having the story going the other way was a stone around your neck. The flipping of an hourglass would tell me near nothing about how far dawn was, while the rising tension of the choice having to be made would be almost exact a measure.

Crescendo awaited, climax, and cheating it would be tricky business.

"There is no choice to be made at all," the Rogue Sorcerer said with forced calm. "We must shatter the crown. Anything else would be odious."

There'd been a time I knew, where I would have agreed with him. But it'd been a few years since I'd last had the luxury to think that way – right and wrong, untouched by practicalities such as risk and consequence. Which was the greater wickedness, I wondered: the killing of one at the altar, or to gamble hundreds of thousands of lives on odds unclear?

“I have heard it told in rumour,” the Tyrant of Helike said, “that our friend the Peregrine can offer solace through resurrection. One after each dawn, the rumour goes, forgiving the mistakes that came before it.”

And there went Kairos, pivoting from pest to useful because he was simply too clever to remain a distraction that all would agree on throwing out when it was all coming to a close. I suspected he would act the wise and sagacious ally, from now on, simply to ease everyone’s well-earned urge to toss him out on his ass and close the doors behind him. Exhausted as the rest of us, Kairos Theodosian had a worsening purple bruise where I’d very satisfyingly decked him in the face, but otherwise no real injuries. Still, from the way his limbs had taken to twitching under the robes you’d think he was the worst off among us. Whatever sickness it was he’d been born to, it was debilitating whenever the protection of his Name waned. I followed the villain’s gaze as it turned to Tariq, adding my weight to the unspoken question: if someone sat the throne and let themselves be slain, could the Pilgrim raise them anew after dawn? The white-haired man cocked his head to the side, as if listening to words only he could hear. He, too, had old monsters to ask answer of.

“It is uncertain,” the Peregrine admitted. “There are some deaths not even my prayers can forgive, and to die on the altar for the sake of others might be one such.”

The old man glanced meaningfully at Indrani, who in deference to the seriousness of the situation had been keeping her mouth shut.

“I cannot bring back those departed twice,” he warned. “No matter the circumstances.”

I’d had absolutely no intention of letting anyone so much as shake a knife in Archer’s direction, but that was good to know. My friend had already died one tonight so, as far as I was concerned, she’d more than paid the dues she hadn’t even owed.

“Might be this is obvious to the rest of you,” Indrani slowly said, “yet why aren’t we simply having someone put on the fancy hat and stay alive? That ought to do the trick.”

I grimaced. The Saint spat to the side.

“There’ll be no founding of a court in service to Below on my watch, girl,” Laurence de Montfort bluntly said. “The terms of this truce were that there would be a breaking, not a coronation."

"It would be preferable to the cold-blooded murder of an ally," the Rogue Sorcerer flatly said.

"Think beyond keeping your pretty hands clean, boy," the Saint harshly said. "Consider the centuries of blood and suffering that would come from the birth of this Court of Twilight."

"Ah, but the courts of Arcadia was so troublesome for they had many stories, many titled among their number," Kairos idly said. "It need not be so for Twilight. A single brow bearing a crown, and nothing else. Power held yet going without exercise."

His tone had been idle, but there'd been something to it that had me clenching my fingers. He was half in love with the notion already, I could tell. And I could see how it'd appear to the Tyrant of Helike: then moment of temptation forever continued, principled restraint that might yet be broken by the right word or tragedy. And as for the rest of us, none would get what they truly wanted save a life spared. Or, as Kairos was likely to see it, yet another foe slighted and spared. To him, it'd be the loveliest of endings. And Gods forgive me, but I was more inclined to it than a killing. There was no one here that could have their throat carved open without a bloody mess following, greater good or not. If it was a hero and the Saint survived, she'd carry that grudge like a blade pointed at my back until one of us died. If it was the Saint herself, the lengths Tariq had gone to for the preservation of her life would find themselves tossed in the mud before so much as the first signature was put to the Liesse Accords. It was a thinning of foundation where I needed it to be firm. There'd be no talk of Indrani going through this, and while before the end I suspected I'd be put before a choice like this I would not walk the altar path when there was so much work left to be done. Martyrdom without groundwork was vanity, nothing less and nothing more.

It was a possibility, I thought, to force that crown onto Kairos' head and slit his throat. One I'd seriously consider, but the Tyrant had bargained back his life from the Bard and the Pilgrim seemed set on respecting this. Would it be worth it, I asked myself, to cross him on this? It might be too much of a risk. The Rogue Sorcerer might come out either way, given his scraps with the Tyrant, and Archer would be at my side through Crown and Tower but the other two? The Saint was most likely to see the practicality in bleeding Kairos, but she often deferred to the Pilgrim over calls like these and she'd be just as eager to take a swing at me. The Tyrant's reaction was arguably the most predictable and least worrisome, for though he'd attempt escape he wouldn't take it personally in the slightest. No, I finally decided. The odds were too stiff and the cause too red. Even if I got away with it I'd leave scars, the kind that'd come back to bite me down the line, and our alliance was too young not to be mangled by something like this. Gods, sometimes working with Above's people felt like shackles around my wrists. They just had so many rules. Even making a discreet inquiry as to the nature of the truce agreed on by Bard could feasibly do damage here, I reluctantly acknowledged, so it was best to set aside the notion entirely. Unless the Tyrant betrayed us once more, at which point the chops would be back on the damned plate.

He wouldn't though, I thought as I he offered me a bright and knowing smile. Kairos had a finger on the pulse here, on the underlying currents, and he had no intention of giving me an excuse. I smiled back, and it did not reach my eyes.

"That's a pot forever on the edge of tipping," the Saint growled. "I'll not have it."

"If your issue is with a villain bearing the crown, then I will do so myself," Roland said.

"That sounds lovely," the Tyrant grinned. "Indeed, what is one more elaborate lie when one is at the very heart of who you are, Sorcerer? You've my seal of approval."

The hero paled, to my surprise. What was it that Kairos had found out about him? Pilgrim and Saint shared a weighty look and Tariq cleared his throat.

"You are too young for such a burden," the Peregrine delicately said.

Ouch, I thought. That had had to sting. Having the closest thing to your side of the Game's communal wise grandfather essentially telling you he didn't think you'd be able to take it if you stepped into the fire. The Rogue Sorcerer tried to hide his flinch, but he was among the least skilled of the liars here.

"If the Grey Pilgrim wants to take the crown, I'll make my peace with it," I conceded.

"You sound like you're making a concession, Foundling," the Saint harshly said. "When what you're doing is giving Below a path to one of the most powerful heroes alive. Shut your damned-"

"Tariq tossed his own crown into the bag, dearest friend," the Tyrant idly interrupted. "So if he takes one up now with the intent of ruling, who knows what manners of wickedness may come of it? We must think of the children, Catherine."

Indrani choked at the last sentence, sending Kairos an admiring glance that had the villain overtly preening. Aside from the theatrics, he'd actually made sense. It might be that Tariq would be reclaiming the right to rule he'd discarded, by putting on that crown. Or it might be something else entirely, and a disaster in the making. We couldn't take the risk.

"Even if I were willing to let that much power fall into the Saint's hands, I doubt she would be willing to take it," I said.

"You won't be getting your hooks in any of us," Laurence de Montfort bluntly said.

"It cannot be you, Queen Catherine," Tariq apologetically said. "I yet remember your... brittle temperament as Queen of the Hunt. I cannot in good conscience make bargains with such a creature."

I grimaced. Well, he wasn't entirely wrong. I suspected I'd handle apotheosis a lot better if the crystallization of it didn't come from one of the worst days of my life, but there was no real way to know. And it'd be a lie to pretend the notion of claiming that sort of mantle again was anything but repulsive to me. I'd put power over the rest before, and we'd none of us come out the better for it. Slow learner as I was, I would not claim to be that slow.

"I claim only one crown, and hardly forever," I said.

"While I would be delighted to lend a hand -" the Tyrant of Helike began.

"No," I said.

"No," Tariq said.

"Hah," Indrani snorted.

The Saint's hand simply went down to her sword.

"- yes, that," Kairos said, sounding a touch chagrined. "Which leaves only one among us."

"Kairos," I mildly said, "did we not once have a conversation on the subject of you taking a swing at my people and the consequences of such an act?"

"It is... possible," the Grey Pilgrim said.

I nearly twitched in surprise, fixing the old man with a look.

"There would have to be oaths," the Peregrine said, dipping his head in apology at Archer. "Safeguards."

"Well, would you look at that," Indrani mused. "You do listen, after all."

"Abdication after ten years," Tariq said, eyes moving to me.
"Guaranteed of safe passage for those waging war on Keter.
Abiding by earthly treaties."

I was genuinely taken aback by the turn, enough that it took me a moment to get ahold of my thoughts.

"I won't force her to do it," I flatly said.

"Cat," Archer said. "Look at me."

I turned, eyes lingering on the traces of blood still on her forehead. The reminder that she'd already died once tonight.

"It's just ten years," she said. "And you didn't age while Duchess or Queen, so I'm losing nothing there. I'm not enough of an asshole to insist we murder someone over a decade."

Except that she was, unkind as that thought was. Because Indrani was lovely and generous to those few that she loved, but the rest? She was not the kind to bleed for strangers, and I doubted the few months we'd spent apart had changed that about her. Or maybe I just didn't want to. What would it mean, if months away from the Woe was all it took to let her compassion bloom? Or it might just be away from me, I darkly thought. What had I ever really asked of her, save for slaughter? And though that thought remained, so did my gaze remain on the bloody marks streaking across her forehead. That, too, might be a reason for seeking crown. For all the other burdens of my time as Sovereign of Moonless Nights, I'd been absurdly difficult to kill.

"I won't pretend it doesn't make things easier," I said, meeting her eyes. "Having that much power at your fingertips. But it blinds you to other ways to die, Indrani. It takes from you as much as you'll gain – perhaps even more."

"I know," Archer said. "I was there, remember? But I want to know what the word looks like, from that vantage. That's reason enough."

"Is that really who you want to be?" I quietly asked.

"An entire world of secret paths, of unknown horizons," Indrani smiled. "Wouldn't be that something to tread?"

It'll change you, I wanted to say. Even if you put down the crown after ten years, and that is never as simple as you'd think, it will still have changed you in ways you can scarce understand. Gods, I wanted to forbid her to go through with it. And the thing was, if I pushed hard enough she just might withdraw her agreement. I knew that sure as I knew my own breathing. Indrani trusted me enough for that. But it would never be the same, afterward: we would no longer be partners or friends – a line would be drawn, and she'd be on the side of it that meant servant. Merciless Gods. It was ugly and selfish of me, but I would rather let her try the crucible of Twilight than knowingly destroy what bound us to each other.

"We'll have to agree on the wording of the oaths," I finally croaked out.

I met her gaze, and an understanding passed between us. It was not love – neither of us had been afflicted with that particular delusion regarding the other, for all that we occasionally shared a bed – or at least not that kind of it. It was... a recognition, maybe. That I thought she was making a mistake, but that I respected her enough to stand in the way of decisions she freely made. Had this, too, been a pivot? A moment she'd look back to, in years to come, when wondering if the ties binding her to the Woe were a lifeline or a leash. Perhaps pivot was a conceited term to use, when matched to the unspoken understanding of two mortals of no real import in the greater scheme of things. Too grand for the two of us. But there was resonance to the meaning of it, I thought. Whether this had been a fault or something akin to wisdom I'd not know for years to come, but in time I would know. I was unnaturally certain of that, in the beat that followed her hazelnut eyes meeting my own. Indrani inclined her head towards me, not speaking a word.

"No," the Saint of Swords said.

The Tyrant let out a pleased, breathless sigh.

"You told me if I still believed you wrong come morning light, we'd put this to judgement," Laurence said, looking at Tariq. "Dawn's around the corner, old friend, and now I tell you this: I will not brook this deal you would strike. It is an abomination in every way."

Indrani casually took a half-step to the side, coming closer to me. In a better position to buy me time to weave miracles, if it came to blades bared. I wished I could say she was being unreasonably cynical by doing so. I almost spoke up, but there was a reason Kairos was keeping his mouth shut. He, too, suspected that anyone carrying Below's banner in the Saint's eyes intervening now would be met with immediate assault. Robber had told me a sapper's saying, once: no one has hands clever enough to juggle munitions. Simply by speaking up here, I'd be cracking a match in a warehouse full of goblinfire.

"Only ten years," Tariq told her. "It is breathing room so that we can arrange for a more agreeable ending, Laurence."

"It's condoning the birth of a court hatched by servants of the Hellgods," the Saint barked. "There's no going back from that once we unleash it, Tariq. And odds are we won't live to see that garden of ruin come to bear fruit – by what right do you pass on that woe to those that come after us?”

“You would rather embrace murder than compromise?” the Rogue Sorcerer said.

“Shut your mouth, boy,” Laurence hissed. “You understand nothing. You shy away from taking a life now, from taking a risk, and you think that makes you virtuous? All it makes you is complicit. Your scruples will cost a hundred generations blood and fear simply because you flinched when time for the hard choices came.”

“How hard a choice is it really for you?” the Sorcerer replied, tone ice cold. “When did you last make another, Saint of Swords?”

Laurence’s face shuttered closed. Hells, I had to admit that Roland was starting to grow on me some.

“Peace, Roland,” the Pilgrim said.

“Would that she’d hear of it, if only the once,” the younger man scathingly replied.

“No, Tariq, let him speak,” the Saint said. “Let him sing the praises of compromising with the Enemy. You’ll survive this, Sorcerer, for you may yet bring some light into this world. But burn this moment into your memory, child. Keep it close. There will come day when it burns like a lash on your back.”

“What is made can be unmade, Laurence,” the Pilgrim told her. “Even if this bargain were a mistake, and I do not believe it to be, it remains impermanent.”

“Does it?” she asked. “You’re letting them in, Tariq. You are setting a precedent for us sitting across the table from the monstrous and the mad, pretending they can be reasoned with. And Gods be good, perhaps this once it might even be true.”

My brow rose.

“And yet it cannot be allowed to pass,” Laurence said. “Because once the exception is made, the precedent is set, the ink touched the water – it’s done. It’s over. The poison is in and there’s only sickness and death ahead. How many times will this bargain you’d strike lead those who come after us astray? How long will it take, before Twilight becomes a murderous madness that can reach everywhere across Calernia?”

“We must first ensure there is a Calernia left to safeguard, Laurence,” Tariq quietly said.

“Compromising the soul to preserve the flesh,” the Saint of Swords said, “is the first step into Below’s service. There are things worth facing ruin for, Tariq.”

"No compromise with the Enemy," the Grey Pilgrim echoed. "That is your principle. Yet you know mine, Laurence."

"So I do," Laurence de Montfort softly agreed.

Light bloomed, but already the Saint of Swords was moving and she struck.

Liliet

I'm sorry, book WHAT
I think all your numbers are off by one

Andrew Mitchell

You've spotted my (not so deliberate) mistake. Thanks for pointing out the bug. I'll fix it next time I run my code.

Liliet

Ooooh that's what happened ♥

RandoCalrissian

Hi Andrew thanks for getting the next chapter up... and all your hard work and creativity! Just wanted to point out that the "next chapter" link at the bottom of chapter 48 still points to the (now missing) chapter delay announcement and not chapter 49.

Chapter 49: Cracked

"They who first look at the sun will never see aught else."
– Helikean saying

It was just steel. There must have been thousands of longswords just like it in Iserre alone, decently crafted but nothing extraordinary. It was the work of some smith somewhere, not an enchanter or legendary artisan, so there was nothing to that sword that should allow it to cut into the likes of Twilight's

Crown. Except, of course, that it was Saint of Swords of wielded it. Tabard trailing behind her, the old heroine crossed the room in three smooth strides and her sword arced down beautifully: the strike was like flowing water. And hit something that shouldn't have been there, a subtle glamour broken when Laurence de Montfort's blow scythed straight through the gargoyle that'd thrown itself in the way. The Tyrant of Helike cackled, high-pitched and delighted, but the Saint's blow carved through the stone construct and continued through and into the crown. I thought, as I watched the edge of the steel bite through chalcedony and mother-of-pearl, that if not for the for the gargoyle it would have gone straight through. Yet the Tyrant's stage trick had tainted what would have otherwise been a clear blow, and so instead the Saint's sword cut halfway through the Twilight Crown before it stopped.

Not even a heartbeat of stillness reigned over the room before a torrent of power tore out.

Everyone here had been in a scrap or two, so the raging tendrils of sorcery that went out did not score a kill the way they might have with less experienced Named. Reflex had me half-stepping to the side, still a swordswoman picking her distance for all my lack of sword, and dusk-like power howled through a bare few feet to my side. More importantly, having been close to the initial burst the Saint had been forced to retreat or see herself run through by a tendril. More than one, even, for a handful of howling streaks chased her even as she retreated, never slowing nor missing a step. Had her attack awoken something in the crown, some shard of sapience? A flicker of a look to the side instead showed me a hard-faced Rogue Sorcerer with his hands outstretched and his long coat fluttering in unnatural breeze, guiding the sorcery with sharp gestures.

"Treachery," the Tyrant of Helike gleefully hooted. "Treachery most foul!"

With great flourish he presented his left palm, allowing one of the chittering gargoyles in attendance to place down a wand of what looked like pure gold on it.

"Cat?" Indrani calmly asked, eyes on the Saint of Swords.

She was ducking and weaving, for now, driven back by the Sorcerer's trick. But it'd be temporary. I wouldn't trust means that feeble to hold back Archer for long, and Laurence de Montfort was her superior in several ways.

"Don't kill her," I said. "Unless it puts you at risk not to."

"Gotcha," Indrani nonchalantly said.

In a whisper of boots on stone she slipped into the fray, the maelstrom of unleashed energies that had yet to ebb in the slightest. I'd expected the crown to either keep bleeding like a stuck pig or translate the wound into a single punishing torrent of power, but it wasn't indulging any of my expectations. It seemed almost like the lashing sorcery was the wound itself, thrashing about the room in some kind of eldritch pain. A nudge from Andronike had my gaze lingering on the side of the cut Laurence's sword had made, a sliver of Night sharpening my sight. Ah. So it was eating into the rest of the crow, shaving through a sliver at a time. It was simply slow and little at a time, though if we didn't settle this mess for too long we'd still be in trouble. The Tyrant's wand proved to be an artefact of some power, a heartbeat later, as he aimed it towards the Saint and spoke an idle word: streak of brilliant lightning went out, forking around an approaching Archer and striking at the Saint from both sides. Undaunted, Laurence de Montfort parried one streak and smoothly ducked beneath the other. Just in time for Indrani's boot to catch her in the chin, sending her sprawling back. Three streaks of twilight-stuff, guided by the Sorcerer, snapped out at the falling heroine. One would have punctured her throat, by my reckoning, but Roland redirected it towards her shoulder instead at the last moment and that was room enough for the Saint to manoeuvre: she twisted on herself, allowing one of the streaks to hit her flank and using the pressure to adjust her fall out of the way of the other two.

She landed in a crouch, slapped aside Indrani's follow-through strike with the flat of her blade and brutally backhanded Archer. I sucked in a breath, but Indrani had scrapped with Laurence before. She slid back, parried a probing blow by the Saint and adjusted her angle of attack to make the most of the support the Sorcerer was still providing. She'd make it through this, I told myself. I couldn't even hold it against Roland not to have put an end to this fight right out of the gate, not truly. The Saint had been a respected elder and ally until not so long ago, and even though she'd done so treacherously she was only going through with the fate he'd himself advocated for the Twilight Crown. A glance told me Kairos already had another artefact in hand, some sort of jeweled silver arrow, and was preparing to throw it like he was playing darts in a tavern. Yet it was the last of us whose reaction I was most dreading to look upon, and my eyes finally turned to the Grey Pilgrim. I hid a grimace. The Peregrine looked as if he'd aged twenty years in the last twenty heartbeats, and given his age that led him at least one foot into the grave. His face had gone ashen, his footing unsure, and if he'd still had his staff I was certain he'd be leaning on it for support. He had, I thought, genuinely not seen this coming. Neither had I, though that'd been more because I'd expected the Pilgrim to seem more worried if it was a possibility and he hadn't been. I could almost hear my father chiding me for relying on second-hand knowledge without having contingencies in place accounting for it being false.

"Pilgrim," I said.

He did not reply, eyes clouded as he watched the Saint of Swords cleverly snap out of Indrani's longknives out of her grasp, catch it with her free hand and smash the pommel into Archer's cheek. A moment later the Tyrant's strange arrow struck at her with a keening sound, and though she flicked her blade back in time to cut through it barely helped: at the moment of impact, the arrow broke and a dozen sharp darts of wind exploded out. Maybe half hit the Saint's flank, scoring blood if no deep wound, though that didn't hurt her half as much as Indrani's other blade cutting halfway through her thumb and snatching back the stolen longknife.

"Pilgrim," I said more loudly. "This is not the time to sink into yourself, Tariq. Whatever grief you might hold, how many lives is it worth?"

That shook him out, enough his blue eyes turned to me.

"The crown is wounded," he said.

"So I'd gathered," I flatly said.

"You do not understand," Tariq said. "The wound is permanent. It is part of the crown, now. And it will kill whoever bears it."

Shit, I thought.

"This from your Choir?" I pressed.

"Yes," he tightly said.

Shit, I thought once more, with feeling. I wasn't going to return for a sermon at the House of Light anytime soon, but in current situation I was willing to take the Ophanim to their word. We'd be killing whoever ended up putting it on, which disqualified Indrani from his discussion of succession as far as I was concerned. I'd already had enough close calls with death that I suspected I'd run out of ways to cheat it, and if I croaked it here too many things fell apart. That left who, the Sorcerer or the Pilgrim? It'd have to be Roland, I grimly thought. Much as he'd been growing on me, if the Grey Pilgrim died here the storm that'd follow would be massive. It was an ugly thought, turning on someone who'd been becoming a true ally, but what other choice was there? Indrani, the thought came. I felt a sharp well of disgust at myself, both for her name having come to me at all and then my refusal to entertain it. Was it not rank hypocrisy, to demand this sacrifice from strangers while denying even thought of it when it came to my own? There'd been more than one reason villainy came easier to me than the other side's works.

"It will have to be me," the Grey Pilgrim said.

Night preserve me from godsdamned heroes. It wasn't a righteous sacrifice it you screwed the people you were allegedly doing it for, it was just vanity.

"No," I bluntly said. "Don't be a fucking fool. Now, would you help us contain the Saint before someone gets killed?"

The Tyrant had, while we spoke, thrown a javelin of red coral at Laurence. Poorly, for his arm was trembling and it was dubious he'd ever trained his body, so it flew errantly and skittered against the ground – where it blew up into a storm of fire, a solid ten feet to the side of anyone else in the room. The Saint leapt through the flames, apparently deciding to take advantage the opportunity to shake her pursuit, but Kairos already had tossed out a large opaque orb of glass and it caught her in the belly as she went through. It broke against her and smoke poured out as words boomed out in the tradertongue, the smoke solidifying and trying to bind her limbs.

"Laurence," the Grey Pilgrim called out, but his call was drowned out by the booming tradertongue harangue.

For a moment I wondered if Kairos had planned it that way, before dismissing the motion. Though it was possible, in truth it hardly mattered if it was. I reached for the Night, wove a globe of it and sent it spinning forward. Though it'd do no harm to anyone, it swallowed the words that'd come from the orb like a pit of darkness swallowing even the sound of falling. Unfortunately it also took the smoke bindings with the rest, which I'd not meant for it to do in the slightest. Kairos protested, though I ignored him.

"Laurence," the Grey Pilgrim repeated. "Desist now, while you still can."

"Better dead than kneeling to the dark," the Saint of Swords snarled. "Do your-"

The cold beam of Light struck her in the chest before she even finished speaking, and I almost let out a whistle. I'd felt that, the rippling of it in the air. The Peregrine was finally done fucking around, it seemed. The side of her chest a ruin of burned flesh, the old heroine swallowed a scream and slid across the stone floor. Already the Grey Pilgrim was crafting fresh strikes of Light, while Archer ran towards our opponent with five streaks of twilight-stuff guided by the Sorcerer following hidden behind her. The Tyrant had a handful of gargoyles before him presenting artefacts for him to wield like a pack of chittering wee sommeliers surrounding an Alamans prince with choice vintages. With the Pilgrim having been moved to act, the balance of this scrap was sharply on our side. But was it, I suddenly wondered, too sharply on our side? The crown was still falling apart, sliver by sliver, so we had to end this. Yet if this began a lone principled heroine standing against a band of five that was mostly villains...

"Give up, Saint," the Tyrant of Helike drawled. "Our victory is inevitable. You might even say that, in a manner of speaking, we are invin-"

"Kairos," I screamed. "Don't you fucking dare-"

"-vincible," the Tyrant finished in a cackle. "Submit to Below and you may yet be spared, do-gooder."

It wasn't anything as obvious as Laurence de Montfort suddenly finding all her wounds had been healed, or a lightshow of power being shoved into her tired frame. Yet, just like that, as she was dragged by Kairos' latest bout of treachery onto the path of a story the Saint of Swords stood a little straighter. Her eyes sharpened, her footing grew more assured.

"Archer, retreat-" I yelled.

But it was too late. Indrani's first blade extended as her whole arm outstretched and she place the point of her longknife at the Saint's back with blinding quickness. Just not quite quick enough. Laurence took a half-step to the side, letting her pass, and cut off her arm the wrist. She would have flicked the blade a second time and taken Archer's head, if not for the Sorcerer's quick divesting of twilight-streaks forcing her to withdraw a step back. The Pilgrim's gleaming Light caught her a moment later, but with hard eyes she carved right through and leapt up. The Tyrant and I struck at the same time, his green jade baton sending out a swarm of green insects at the Saint as I wove Night into dense flecks and sent them out at her. But it was like, I realized, tossing logs into a fire. The insects – each one made of jade, I only then caught – found a cut in the air that warded their approach save for those that impacted it and found themselves cut through. I'd formed four flecks of Night and the Saint almost contemptuously cut through only one, though at exactly the right time for the detonation that ensued to catch the other three. Her right boot landed on the Rogue Sorcerer's face a moment later and he went down like a sack of beets from the hit. Hells, that'd gone south in a hurry. Unlike the heroes and possibly even myself, Kairos had to know that the Saint would kill him in a heartbeat if she could. So why would he throw the fight this way?

I glanced at the Tyrant of Helike and found his gaze, half of it red as fresh blood, resting on my ebony staff. Kairos grinned when I caught him, utterly unrepentant. I found myself wishing I'd succeeded at cutting his throat instead of blackening his eye. The Pilgrim had chosen to prevent Indrani bleeding out instead of pursuing the offensive, to my relief, and as she held her severe hand to the stump with gritted teeth one of the greatest living healers of Calernia began to put it all back together. Good. Archer might make it back into the fight, I just needed to use Kairos and my own talents to hold until we could turn this around. The Saint should be coming for either of us by now. As it happened, Laurence de Montfort rose from the smooth crouch she'd landed in after tumbling past the unconscious Sorcerer. She glanced at me, calmly, and then her gaze swept the rest of the room. It came to rest on the crown, and without a word she ignored us and went straight for it. Oh Hells. It might be, I knew, that finishing the cut would only break this realm and spare us all either death or bargain.

Or it might mean the death of hundreds of thousands.

"Slow her," I ordered the Tyrant.

My tone was harsh enough he did not argue. The unpleasant truth was that I did not have the means to contain someone like Laurence de Montfort. Every trick left in my arsenal derived from the patronage of Sve Noc, whose blood-drenched path to apotheosis made the exact kind of power that someone like the Saint of Swords had been meant to put down. Maybe if I'd been quick enough to think of it earlier all of us save Archer could have let ourselves be 'beaten' and she could have duelled the Saint with something close to even footing. But at this point trying to use numbers to bring her down was effectively using the same tactics that'd led a horde of devils to swarm this very heroine barely an hour ago. The result back then had been providing the Saint of Swords with a lot of bodies to cut, and I had no reason to believe this would go any differently. I couldn't contain her or defeat her, and maybe if I had longer I might be able to figure out another way to get this done but I didn't have the time. So either I bent, and let her toss the dice with the lives of three great armies and most of Iserre besides.

That, or I killed her.

Breathing out, I began to limp forward even as Kairos tossed priceless old artefacts in the Saint's way like they were apple cores. My staff I raised, and abandoned the delusion that it had ever been one. Night roiled and the ebony fell to ash, leaving behind only a sword in a scabbard. The latter was an ornate thing, unlike most I'd borne in my time. Carved obsidian, depicting the tale of the fool girl who'd made accord with the Night. The blade had not once unsheathed waited within as my fingers tightened around the scabbard. Its long handle was onyx and amethyst, stones chosen for one's facility in holding power and the other's aptitude for bridging the mortal and the divine through communion. Kairos had, against all odds, succeeding at expending enough of his inherited trove of treasures to force the Saint to step back. She still stood by the throne's side, some sort of shining panels of sorcery standing between her and the crown, but my advance drew her eyes went to me. My hobbling had taken me ahead of all the others, and at my approach she smiled a hard smile.

"A duel, is it?" Laurence de Montfort said.

I lowered the scabbard to my side, right hand gripping the grip.

"Stand down," I said, offering once last chance. "Stand down, and we can still end this with words instead of blood."

"Some bargains compromise the very heart of what you are," the Saint replied. "You'll lose, Foundling. Call your minions back and let me end it the way it should have been done since the start."

I breathed out, steadied my stance.

"You're mortal," Laurence de Montfort sharply said.

"So are you," I replied, and for the first time since I'd left the Everdark I drew a sword.

I'd gathered Night for months in preparation of this moment, not a single mote of it anybody's but my own. This was a prayer, after all, not a ritual. I was making an appeal to Sve Noc, and sacrificing power so that a miracle might be granted. And so, when my sword cleared the scabbard, it was revealed to have no blade. Night pulsed all around us, a living and breathing thing.

One.

"What have you done?" the Saint asked.

Two.

"Nothing," I honestly replied.

Three.

"Do you think I'll not strike you for being unarmed?" the Saint snarled.

Four, five, six, I counted as she spoke, and she stiffened with the last. It was close, then. I'd wondered how long she would last. I touched me too, but Gods forgive me the touch was lighter than I'd believed it would be. The Dead King, it seemed, might have been terrifyingly correct. The Saint took a step forward, and I almost spoke but instead I close my mouth. It would not do to monologue, would it? Not when the end was close. I watched her skin tighten, grow sallow, I watched her limbs weaken and finally she fell down. A moment later and she was dead. Struck down without a trace. It had, from the beginning to the end, taken eleven heartbeats.

And so in the heart of the prayer I had made, eleven years had passed.

I'd always known that I couldn't beat the Saint of Swords in a fight. What kind of a fool would fight a heroine forged of war through that which had forged her? No, I'd heeded the lessons of my years under the Black Knight and slain her through one of the few things the Heavens did not protect their chosen from: the passage of time. I let another heartbeat pass, simply to be sure, and only then did the Night's touch upon this broken realm withdraw.

ruduen

Go vote!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Hoo, boy. I wasn't sure if it was possible to get through this or not without someone on the way out. With the current format, it looks like the price that both sides pay might be higher than expected.

And with a few different balls still in the air (especially with the White Knight still standing as an outside factor), and with the crown still damaged, it's hard to say if there's still more to pay.

Dread Empress Evisveil

That. Was. Beautiful.

Valkyria

Ouh shit. Well that is... I didn't see that coming. And that's twice in two chapters so gods damn me if this isn't good story writing.

Also... did it affect only the saint or everyone? Also... that is so OP. Can she reuse that or is it a one time ass in the sleeve?

Valkyria

ace... damn it xD autocorrect

Daniel E

'Ass in the sleeve' is so much better; the possibilities of what it means are limited only by your imagination.

Valkyria

I just realized I spelled sleeve wrong too...

ahhh there I am, once in my life early enough so my comment is high enough for everyone to see... and then that xD

I dunno who said it, but "Set in Stone" is too powerful an Aspect for WordPress to hold...

Valkyria

Oh no I actually didn't xD
One less mistake on my part

Andrew Mitchell

Unless you count your mistake that you were mistaken?!?
XD XD

To err is human. Don't worry about and we won't worry about it either.

NerfContessa

At least you didn't spell it "an ass in the slave" :p

Liliet

I think it affected Laurence and Catherine

badluckcat

As I understand it Catherine got touched by it as well and it was only possible through months of infusing power, all spent at a single time. Not to mention Catherine isn't fool enough to try the trick on heroes a second time. She may end up filling the staff again but it won't be the ageing trick.

daegone823

Was I the only one thinking she was going to stab the pilgrim for turning on everything she stood for.

I mean this was fine but I guess I had a darker expectation. The hero who slays monsters becoming a monster and assuming a throne of twilight to stone for her sins.

Liliet

Laurence thinks... thought, I suppose... in terms of consequences of her actions, still. She had a different idea of what the long-term consequences here would be and acted on her belief; no part of this belief included the idea that killing Tariq might possibly somehow make the situation better.

Isaac Martinez

Probably one-time. Cat just released her energy as sacrifice for a miracle. She can't do a miracle twice if the result is "random".

goliath1303

Where we it ever implied that her miracles, or any for that matter, are at all random? If that was the case they would be orders of magnitude less useful. Imagine Tariq trying to Forgive somebody's death, but instead every field within a certain distance is made incredibly fertile. Or he's with an army engaged in a desperate struggle and just as things seem hopeless he goes to summon whatever that star he calls is called, only to banish the weariness, horror, and non-lethal wounds of the host he's a part of.

Or as an example of a miracle forged from Night, how about this: Think of how many nights are spent by Cat over the course of who knows how many months investing every bit of time and power she could afford to spare forging what she hoped would be a counter to the walking massacre that is Laurence de Monfort. At the battle rages she stops pretending she was ever holding a staff signifying that the climactic scene where Cat and Saint finally drop the pretenses and stop playing nice. The moment she ceases lying to Creation about the staff and behind fighting in earnest, the world goes dark. 2 massive hosts clashing in a contest to decide the fate of all Calernia suddenly freeze and everybodys breath catches in their throat as they stand frozen in terror. An eldritch power they can't begin to comprehend without embracing the seeds of a dark bmadness envelops them. There they stand, prisoners to a power massive beyond belief and defying their very best efforts to keep their minds off of it. Unwillingly, the shape of that power begins to reveal itself. Millenia old and forged in the darkness of the tattered remains of an empire Ever Dark, a curse that damned the desperate remnants of a dying race willingly embraced. At first it reeks of oaths sworn to Below, of countless betrayls made in the dark and offered up as prayer to 2 bloody and blasphemous godlings. Consecrated on an altar of murder and ruin, this... Night*, a voice like death incarnate rings through their minds, shattering what's left of their sanity in all but the strongest and hardened of souls – whispers seductively, promising revenge for all sights and unimaginable power there for the taking; even as it stokes the embers of madness and insanity that are, no matter how small they may be, at the heart of us all into raging infernos burning away everything except for 2 things. The first, the words: “The worthy take, the worthy rise.” over and over, and the second is only the harsh and dissonant cawing of a pair of crows.

All of this passed in less time than a single heartbeat and, as the fighting between the armies in the distance reaches a heretofore unseen level of savagery and violence, Laurence stands unbowed in the face of that most terrible of powers. She slices through the night without any apparent, the all encompassing blackness simply parting without an eddy or whisp coming closer than 3 feet to the Saint of Swords as he Decree shapes reality around her. Without any words spoken she prepares to strike. As she weighs her options, Cat draws the sword-that-is-a-prayer, revealing... Nothing. The ornate handle is attached to nothing. As they stand there and Saint tries to understand this development they hear a change in the sound of the distant battle. All across the field the armies that Saint is a part of are dying. It starts with a handful at first, but eventually they fall by the thousands every second. 20 seconds after the Black Queen draws her not-sword every soldier facing her army is dead. Looking at the newly 70,000 dead Laurence took a deep breath and turned back to her opponent. What she saw there enraged her. The Black Queen looked stricken, as if horrified by what she had wrought. Without giving her the opportunity to make an excuse, she decapitated the foremost villain of her generation.

In each of these examples there are unquestionably miracles performed, just not the right ones. If they worked like this then Grey Pilgrim, First Under the Night, and many others would lose a lot of their power.

adrian1992blog

My bet is that while she could use it she can't abuse it, not because of some metaphysical rule (like the pattern of 3) but simple mechanics: it seen it also affects her so each use leaves her older (although it's implied she doesn't age normally), just with that it limited to be an ace against already old opponents or beings like goblins that have shorter lifespans. Against immortals or stupidly long lived races (I think the Giants are that) it would be like spiting against the wind.

Quite Possibly A Cat

It would also be rather in effective against undead. You know, the big bad guy that they are planning on beating.

Liliet

There's also the story rule that every trick works reliably ONCE. Like the first step of the plan thing; Unspoken Plan Guarantee. (I guess the staff was different enough from what we all assumed that it got a handful of that even despite all the foreshadowing)

Raivshard

I doubt that it's tied down to any one effect; bear in mind that it is a prayer, not an Aspect, and considering that she wanted to hold it in reserve for the hidden horror and/or his trump cards, praying for something which would age her opponents seems rather pointless.

It's a miracle, which means it probably resembles a Heroic ability in that it gives you just what you need as long as you only ever use it when you absolutely need it, and even then, not too often.

Faiir

I am pretty sure the prayer-staff was intended as an anti-pilgrim weapon.

Shveiran

It has always been an anti-Saint option.
Cat has always stated that nuking the Pilgrim would destroy her dream of the Accords. If she developed a countermeasure, it would not be a lethal one.

Liliet

The well was an anti-Pilgrim measure, or to be more precise, an anti-Shine measure.

tyizor

Great chapter. Honestly I don't mind the delays if it means the upkeep in quality. Thanks again erratic!

Liliet

vote pgte

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

come on discord

<https://discord.gg/3nbsUfZ>

Raved Thrad

"This thing all things devours: birds, beasts, trees, flowers;
Gnaws iron, bites steel; grinds hard stones to meal; Slays king, ruins town, And beats sword-wielding bitch down."

shieldredblog

Rumena?

Halinn

RUMENARUMENARUMENARUMENARUMENARUMENARUMENA

Brackas

Water?

Andrew Mitchell

Time.

onedollargum

Tolkein fiction.

dingaloo

A couple hours' delay is a small price to pay for this glorious climax. Bravo!

mikeazhao

Damnnnnnnnnnn

Daniel E

Wow. So did Cat also age 11 years as a trade? If not, then I'm uncertain exactly how this miracle worked. Hopefully Idrani gets her hand back. 'Archer Deadhand' just doesn't have the same ring to it. Lastly, what prediction of the Dead King is she thinking he was right about?

Gunslinger

She aged 11 years but the touch was light on her. Guess she's still kinda immortal after all

Mental Mouse

Note that even without that, and with pessimistic assumptions(*), she started out as what, 25 or so?

(*) Consider that Cat's temporal trap probably wouldn't have affected the Named Villains even if they got caught in it, because Named Villains don't age. And Cat may not be Named anymore, but she's certainly still a Villain, sponsored by Below and trafficking in eldritch powers. I'm not surprised she gets a break on that.

erebus42

She's the high priestess of Night. The sisters Sve Noc and the Mighty lived quite a long time as a result of the Night so I wouldn't be too surprised she was effected but not overly so despite not having a name.

Mental Mouse

Oh right, I'd forgotten – Night explicitly extends lifespan, that was part of the Drow's original deal with Below..

Liliet

Catherine is 20.

Yes, really.

And that's without accounting for Named/fae bullshit and that one half a year she lost in Arcadia over the span of two days. Biologically her body might have started even younger.

Shequi

I'm not sure Biology played any part in Cat's existence while she was essentially a story of Winter incarnate.

Liliet

well she apparently could not see through eyes grown in the back of her head without growing an optic nerve to them so... SOME role???

ayon96

Cat spent another heartbeat to make sure so it was 12 years

RoflCat

Back in ch 36 Bid:

"I am a mannerly man, Catherine," he lightly said. "And you have given me no reason to act otherwise."

It almost felt like I was back in the Pit, for a moment, an opponent and I slowly circling as we took each other's measure.

Waiting for an opening, for a weakness. I remained painfully aware that I had a lot more of either than the Hidden Horror.

"No?" I mused. "Yet you called an immortal, when we first met, and well..."

I shrugged, raising an arm in a nonchalant display.

"I'm hardly that, these days," I said.

The old monster's face was like a mirror, I thought as I watched him for a reaction. There would be nothing there to see I had not placed there myself.

"Are you not?" he smiled. "High priestess and herald of an apotheosis you ushered into this world by your own hand – would something as base as age or disease take you, Catherine Foundling?"

"The years will kill me, one of these days," I said. "If nothing else gets around to it first."

"Ah," the Dead King smiled. "But how many years would it take?"

^Basically he's implying that despite Cath becoming 'mortal' by giving up Winter, she's still far from a normal mortal

Andrew Mitchell

Thanks for sharing that.

I'm thinking Cat may be mortal but ageless.

Sugar Roll

She probably ages like the Drow now. If Rumena's age is any indication, she could live for thousands of years.

Liliet

Drow with a higher-than-nisi amount of Night don't seem to age period. Rumena was old already when the Tenets of Night first came into being.

Liliet

If she was entirely ageless she would not have been affected by the artificial passage of time here period, I think. She gets SOME amount of aging, just apparently noticably slower.

Shveiran

To me, that is unrelated to Cat's aging.

It is simply the Dead King acknowledging that Cat has reached so much narrative weight that she won't leave the narrative because of something like a flu or old age. She has a chance at sticking around indefinitely if she plays her cards right, because the Story wants her in it and will push with her if she reaches for a form of immortality/agelessness/aphoteosys.

What I think is saying is basically that High Priestess or no Cat has a de facto aphoteosys so long as she doesn't fuck up... which again, is true for all of them regardless.

Shequi

Remembering here that The Intercessor is also eternal without being either immortal, ageless or undying.

Shveiran

I think that's because she goes nowhere when she is nt acting "on stage". She basically lives a day or two each year, if that, and therefore can stretch her years a long way.

caoimhinh

As Gunslinger said, Cat also 'aged' eleven years, but it was lighter for her; not because Night was less effective, but because Catherine is not a mere mortal, which is what the Dead King told her when they conversed while Cat was on the way to enter Liesse in the chapter he made the offer of 100 years of peace.

Basically, by becoming the High Priestess of Sve Noc, First Under the Night (F.U.N for friends), Catherine is unto the path of being unaging like the rest of the Named of Below.

Javvies

Besides, there's a significant difference between 11 years of accelerated aging that leaves you in your 70s+ (Saint) and one that leaves you in your early 30s (Cat).

caoimhinh

Indeed.

Faiir

I'm stealing the FUN!Catherine idea 😊

caoimhinh

By all means, be my guest.

I haven't been the only one to call her that in the comments of this book, hahaha.

I'm actually still surprised that Indrani hasn't used that acronym in any of the chapters. Seems like something she would say to tease Catherine and get her annoyed with some puns.

Liliet

It works better in writing than out loud.

byzantine279

She aged 11 years, but because of the goddesses she isn't physically 11 years older. Older than she should be, but not by much, it seems.

Javvies

Even if Cat is aging like a regular mortal human, she went from being early twenties to early to mid thirties, at worst. Sure, that's a hit ... but to use D&D terminology, she's still the same age category, whereas Laurence went from Old/Venerable to hitting her max age.

And let's be honest ... sure, there's a difference between early 20s and early-mid 30s, but for most people the difference is going to be relatively small.

Liliet

Early, not mid. Catherine is currently 20 according to any sane attempts at a timeline.

(She was 18 when founding the Broken Bells with Talbot, since then one summer was spent putting down Akua, then one winter in the timeskip between books 3 and 4, and now is the next winter after that)

Javvies

Timeline gets confusing. Especially since it's not entirely clear how (and how fast) certain characters move around long distance (especially offscreen). Also, I thought one or more of the time skips might have been longer.

At any rate, I think that my point is fairly clear and stands independent of timeline concerns.

No matter exactly what age Cat is/was, an 11 year difference between early 20s and 30 something usually isn't going to be that big in terms of physical wellbeing

– even for a normally aging mortal human. And, sure, losing 11 years out of the prime of your life sucks ... but Cat was young enough that 11 sudden years later, she'd still be in the prime of life no matter how being First Under the Night affected (or didn't affect) her aging, unless one wanted to postulate that it would somehow accelerate her aging.

Liliet

The timeline is v clear when you look specifically at seasons passing. The timeline pre-Cat being 18 lines up to that, too – I first built the timeline that put her at 18 at that time, then someone else found the quote confirming she was 18.

And yeah, Cat's not losing much here. I just wanted to plug in my timeline information :3

I mean fuck even if it accelerated her aging to the point she's Laurence's age now or someshit, you think she wouldn't go for it for the sake of saving everyone here? ♥

Shveiran

I think you are right chronologiclaly, but with all the body modifications she went through, I'm completely at a loss regarding how it translates in practice to her biological age. Did she ever age while the Squire? Did she ever age while Winter Queen? My guess is no.

Liliet

According to her reflections on it, when Squire she did age, although it felt artificial, like she was following a script. Supporting evidence: she grew an inch taller than Black :3

When Winter Queen she probably didn't entirely, so take a year off that biologically.

Given we also don't have data on how much lighter the touch was, "she's biologically less than 32" is the only hard fact we have.

Shveiran

Right, the Seba-approved inch! Good call, I'd forgotten that.

Agent J

She spent months in Iserre alone. Add to it her time in the Everdark, Keter, and fending off a Crusade.

20 is too conservative. I'm thinking 21-22? Might even be 23, though that's stretching it.

Liliet

I'd thought 21 too, but research doesn't lie
(I can back this up with quotes)

Steve

Eh, if you eat well and train seriously, physical peak is mid-late 20s to 30. Technically, Cat either just hit to went slightly past the typical ideal physical age for a human.

Rather like I recently did 😊

But overall, if you are trying to be in shape, you'll be in better shape at 30 than 20.

Decius

My guess: Time advanced 11 years everywhere. EVERYONE is older, not just the people involved in this fight, and they've been fighting with the Dead King for over a decade now.

Andrew Mitchell

I don't think Night is capable of creating a world-wide effect. The sisters are not that powerful. The effect was focused on Laurence but Cat was caught in it as well.

xanthir

Doesn't have to be a world-wide effect. Just... the two of them skipping thru time, aging but not experiencing the passage otherwise.

I hope that's not the case, but it would definitely be an interesting outcome, and I'll never begrudge this story throwing me some curveballs.

Sitxar

Given that the political situation and the amount of balls that depend on her juggling right now, this outcome would be just like if she had died. Which is not an option.

Liliet

This has happened with Winter already.

Shveiran

There is no way Cat would have developed a trick like that to fight Saint, when she was operating under the assumption that fighting her with the Pilgrim in close proximity was definitely an option when she started her preparations.

That is likely one of the other reasons she went with aging, something Tariq cannot undone (just like Villains cannot resurrect, the means to avoid death and cheat age are barred to the heroes).

Considering Tariq is just as vulnerable to a few added years, and that keeping him alive as always been a win condition for her, she would not have developed this as an area of effect spell, aging all that are around the fight.

Even if I was wrong and she had, I find it very unlikely that she would unleash a power that could nib all her plans in the bud by killing Tariq without ever acknowledging that risk in the chapter.

It is far more likely that the cost, the offering of the prayer is to face the same consequences she unleashes on her enemy; two targets, Cat and Saint.

Shveiran

She also wouldn't develop a trick that would keep her out of the loop for over twice the time since she first gained a name while at this critical a juncture. It's pretty much handling the DK victory, AMONG OTHER THINGS such as letting Callow be conquered by whoever strolls that way.

Tenthyr

This. Cat was affected too as part of the miracle, it had greater weight because she was also under its influence.

Mental Mouse

I'd hope not, that would be a dead loss in almost every way that matters.

NerfContessa

Joa not to mention that someone with her style needs a more... Responsive appendage than hakram as a pure strength type.

Also, dang. Age magic. Good one.

podian

Holy (or unholy?) shit.

Nairne .01

I guess that depends who you ask? Drow would probably pick the former.

erebus42

I mean I'm with the Drow on this one. Even if they aren't gods you worship they're still technically gods.

Someguy

This is why you don't follow Bard's instruction for anything. Named who obey Bard become nothing more than puppets on strings walking towards their own tragedies.

Rook

To be fair, Kairos played them all pretty hard on his end, even without the Bard.

Kairos was the one that first led the conversation down the path of coronation.

Kairos was the one who disqualified the other two Heroes from bearing the crown, which the Saint might have accepted. Tariq due to having laid down the crown, and the insinuation of secrets hidden for the Sorcerer.

Kairos was the one who made sure the crown was half cut instead of stopped all the way or cut all the way

Kairos was the one who gave Saint the narrative advantage so that she couldn't be contained – only victorious or killed.

He had a hand in EVERY part of how this went down, and it just happens to badly harm Catherine's plans in particular.

If she finishes the breaking, she compromises her own bottom line. Coronation? Now off the table. The remaining option of completing the coronation followed by a killing? Unless she can find a way to pin it on Kairos' head, which might be just as bad as letting him live, it'll either weaken the Woe by permanently losing Indrani or make her completely irreconcilable with damn near every Hero on the continent. Alliance made with the Black Queen and one or both of the greatest Heroes of the age end up dead but all the Villains walk out alive? How's that going to look for anyone who wasn't there to see the events play out? Not to mention Killing the Saint just put cracks in her personal alliance with the Pilgrim as well, who also happens to be the only living person who could possibly vouch for her with any worthwhile Weight in the eyes of everyone Good aligned in the world.

werafdsaew

I think you're giving Kairos too much credit here. You're saying that the Saint would have been OK with a Villain having the crown without Kairos? That's not possible.

Also containing the Saint instead of killing her doesn't change anything, unless you think they could force the crown on her head then kill her.

Pilgrim isn't a complete idiot; Cat killing Saint here is perfectly justified.

Rook

Uh no, the Saint obviously wouldn't be OK with a villain in the throne as we just saw. That's the entire thrice-damned point.

The one way for him to break up the band is to cross someone's bottom line, and as soon as the decision is set on having a Villain take up the mantle? Line crossed.

More specifically, it cross the line of the single least reasonable person there, whose death would also fuck up Catherine's own plans of bringing everyone on both sides to the table.

In my opinion not much of a stretch to believe Kairos did this intentionally when

A) Every one of those turning points in the decision making process was proceeded by verbal prodding from Kairos

B) scheming, making enemies, and screwing over anyone he can is the literal reason for his existence

werafdsaew

Not seeing it. Even without Kairos, the band would still have made the exact same decision, for the exact same reason they made it with Kairos there.

Liliet

I don't think Pilgrim will break his alliance with Catherine over this.

I suspect he might just decide to take the crown himself over Catherine's objections though, to spare Roland. THAT will be bad.

But I think even if Kairos had his eye on forcing Saint's death from the start (because he could) it was most definitely Bard's plan for it to happen. Consider how different the situation would have been if Masego had been here, as well.

Andrew Mitchell

> I suspect he might just decide to take the crown himself over Catherine's objections though, to spare Roland. THAT will be bad.

Yes, and Pilgrim knows that would be bad, very bad. I don't think he'd choose all the additional suffering that him taking the crown would cause vs Roland taking it.

Liliet

>Yes, and Pilgrim knows that would be bad, very bad

I'm NOT SURE. A great piece of Cat's logic regarding why he's necessary is the Accords.

Also he's literally already said it should be him.

Shveiran

He has. But I really, really hope he realizes the consequences of being removed from the picture at this juncture.

I mean, forget the Accords. This mean the armies go back to kill each other, the Pilgrim is no longer around to keep even the Crusade together, both he and the Saint died while trekking with the BQ so everyone hates her guts, Callow is in no position to move north and help, Which also means Kairos won't... It is a freaking disaster. If he can't see this, I'll be unable to consider him as someone that sees the big picture.

Liliet

and then he had WoA (Word of Angels) that it will be fine ;u;

Cheeezburger

Reminder that Kairos was in cahoots with the Wandering Bard

Jessica Day

But what if she knows you will disregard her instructions?

Personally I'd just flip a coin every time she talked and do my best to ignore her words otherwise. Someone as skilled as her? You can never best her at her chosen game.

Liliet

Personally I'd just do whatever I already figured would make sense to do, and ignore her entire existence like she as an ad popup.

Otherwise she'd be able to force you to trust your decisions to a coinflip just by showing up and talking, and disrupt anything you do with a lot less effort.

Wait she is better than we thought

I think Amadeus was manipulated by NOT escaping. His soul was a major reason Kairos, Cat, Laurence, and the Crown were in a room together. If not for him, Laurence might be elsewhere by now.

Sulomund

It didn't go how I thought it would, and you know what? That's the way I like it.

Andrew Mitchell

Woah. I was delighted by the staffswordprayer; what a clever idea. It's a pity that gun can only be fired once.

Did Catherine just renege on her deal with Tariq? Saint wasn't, at that time, threatening the lives of any of the Woe.

Who's going to put on the crown now? Tariq or RS or Indrani? It's better not be Tariq. The foremost hero of this age NEEDS to come back from this jaunt with Cat or her main plan is ruined.

Andrew Mitchell

Also, good to see Roland picking the right side.

Javvies

Nope. Remember, Tariq wasn't willing to reciprocate in granting courtesy.

So I don't think there was a deal to spare Laurence.

Besides ... she was threatening their lives. As well as the prosecution of the war against the Dead King.

caoimhinh

Cat and Tariq made the deal that she wouldn't kill Laurence unless she actually killed Masego, even if Saint threatened to harm Hierophant Catherine would still go for non-lethal attacks. In exchange, Pilgrim would use his right to rule as the 'and one' of the seven crowns and one.

This could be considered a breach of the deal, but it was done because Saint was putting everybody in Iserre at risk.

Agent J

That deal was voided already. Pilgrim begged for Tyrant's life (after the latter name dropped the Bard) and Cat basically said, fine, same deal as last time.

She spared him, she earned Tariq's crown. Then Saint fucked herself and everyone else royally. A shame. She was equal parts fun and frustrating. I'll miss her.

Liliet

And it was Tariq asking to spare Kairos that led to this, considering the delightful little bit of betrayal he pulled off right here. Even if no deals were in play and Cat had been fully willing to go along with whatever he asked of her, this was a "pick one out of two" situation, and I think he'll recognize that.

I wonder if he'll be willing to have faith that Bard's plan is for the best, after this, still.

caoimhinh

Hmm, Kairos being alive wasn't what led to this. This is entirely the Saint's fault for being so stubborn and refusing to actually make a deal for peace. It wasn't even a big compromise. It was Laurence's refusal to consider a non-violence option what got her killed.

Also, Kairos being dead wouldn't have stopped Laurence from cutting the Twilight Crown.

As for Tariq keeping his trust on the Intercessor, yeah he totally will still trust her. As far as the Heroes know she works for Above only. Remember when Cat tried to explain to him that she also worked for Below and his refusal was that it only looked that way? And his conversation with Laurence during the Battle of the Camps where they mentioned she is always part of the heroic bands when big things happen? He and everyone who knows of her (save for those who have contacted Neshamah, like the Woe and Kairos) believe her an exclusive agent of Above as she is apparently always a Heroine.

Besides, nothing here points that Saint's death is the Bard's fault. Probably in his next conversation with the Bard she will be able to swing the facts into her being helpful and convince Tariq to be part of whatever is her next scheme.

Even if Cat actually manages to talk to Tariq about the true nature of the Bard, odds are Pilgrim will go his usual 'you truly think it's that way, but you are wrong' that he has kept ever since meeting Catherine.

Liliet

Kairos prevented everyone from subduing Laurence peacefully by going on that monologue (as a deliberate betrayal because he's a prick like that).

From Bard's vantage, it's child's play to predict:

- what Larat would do to wiggle out of this (she presumably has a lot more knowledge than Cat on how fae work and how they can and cannot change, as well as on personally Larat);
- that the decision everyone else agrees on would be unacceptable to Saint and she would force the issue (note how Saint's reasoning for why bargaining with Evil is unacceptable sounds suspiciously like what Bard had told William in Book 2, and that there were obvious traces of Bard's presence when Cordelia talked with Laurence in Fatalism);
- that even if there would be a chance for Saint to survive with everyone working together to subdue her peacefully, Kairos would gleefully sabotage any hope of it just for the hell of it.

The cherry on the cake is the fact that if Masego were here they would not be presented with a gamble, they would be presented with clear understanding of what the crown does and what breaking it would do, and that would change the tone significantly. It's as likely as not breaking the crown WOULD work and it's only Masego's absence here that drove this into the dilemma corner that it's in now. And hey, guess who specifically and targetedly prevented Masego from being okay enough to be present!

This might not be the SOLE goal of Bard's here, I doubt she ever does anything with just one reason. But it was an undeniably straightforward result of it.

And yes, it's possible for Tariq to still keep his faith in Bard after this. Hell, I still think she might be a good guy, and I've got a lot more dirt on her than he does, or will even after this.

It'll be interesting to read, though 😊

...And yes, Tariq doesn't know everything the audience does wrt why it was Bard that did this. However, she made the deal with Kairos to keep him alive and she made sure Masego lost his sorcery. These data points he has very intimately since he was the instrument she used for those. No way he won't notice the pattern here.

caoimhinh

I would object to the first point, considering that the Court of Twilight is unprecedented and Larat's actions are basically writing a new story never seen before. Making the Bard capable of such prediction is gonna be counterproductive for the plot, it would make more sense if Larat got the idea of abdicating the crown from the Bard. That would be consistent with Fae nature of not changing and I could totally see the Bard meeting with Larat and the Wild Hunt in private, would make more sense than the Bard foreseeing Larat doing something that by recognition of every other character is unprecedented and not supposed to happen.

As for the rest, I pretty much agree with you. Except on blaming Kairos for Saint's death, that's on her own. Sure, Kairos monologued to give her a push, but she was already set to fight to the bitter end, and Catherine herself was already noticing how the story was looking before Kairos spoke. They would have needed to severely beat her to subdue her, which pretty much amounts to having to kill her, as she would not surrender. Besides, she would have cut the Crown anyways even without Kairos there, so she could have got them all killed by the explosion of the crown (or simply destroyed the crown and stabilized the realm, odds were 50-50 and Heroes work with far worse odds all the time).

Liliet

> the Court of Twilight is unprecedented and Larat's actions are basically writing a new story never seen before.

Unprecedented doesn't mean unpredictable. He didn't just randomly decided to write a new story: Winter's desire to break out of the circle was a mirror to Amadeus's plan in the first place. Fae don't change; Larat acted in accordance with his nature, Catherine just didn't know enough about what building blocks he had available for that.

>Except on blaming Kairos for Saint's death, that's on her own. Sure, Kairos monologued to give her a push, but she was already set to fight to the bitter end, and Catherine herself was already noticing how the story was looking before Kairos spoke.

Catherine could have done something to change the story had Kairos not spoken. I agree Saint's death was likely anyway, but Kairos's presence guaranteed it. She wasn't surviving with him there.

>Besides, she would have cut the Crown anyways even without Kairos there, so she could have got them all killed by the explosion of the crown

...if Kairos wasn't there to put a gargoyle in the way?

Don't forget that established capabilities for Bard's prediction of events include her engineering the first Swan Song, just by making sure Akua survived and pushing Black in the Free Cities. Her intervention here was much closer and much more targeted.

Faiir

Great write-up.

Though I don't agree with Bard being good 😊

Liliet

We Shall See
(in a year or two)

Mental Mouse

> Did Catherine just renege on her deal with Tariq? Saint wasn't, at that time, threatening the lives of any of the Woe.

Dude, attacking the crown menaced and endangered everybody, and even Pilgrim came down on Cat's side of the fight. That said, by partly blocking Saint's attempt to cleave the crown, Kairos has given everybody the "worst of both worlds": The crown's power is now active and hostile.

It might be possible to "fix" the crown, but now it will definitely cost at least one life. One newly-suggested possibility: Cat embraces her nature as an immortal, puts on the crown, and (with Night's aid) resurrects herself from the resulting ZOT! Or they could finish breaking it, which will certainly be dangerous (and embarrassing) but it might be best to take their chances. That would be a good thing to ask the Choir about again, they now have new information based on the current crisis.

Liliet

You know what could be a thing? Roland putting on the crown, claiming he can probably fix this, then dying... allowing them to go through with the plan... then getting resurrected by Tariq after dawn, because that definitely counts as a MISTAKE that could be FORGIVEN.

Shveiran

If it works, yes. I find it more likely Roland won't come back. The scene is already very crowded, and he can now serve satisfyingly as a loss for Cat, Pilgrim and the audience.

This whole thing needs an hefty price somewhere, and Saint won't be enough.

Faiir

I don't agree.

Roland looked like either a red shirt or someone's plant from the beginning, so I couldn't connect with him.

Him dying here would be waaaay to predictable and boring. And EE doesn't do boring 😊

Mental Mouse

> Roland looked like either a red shirt or someone's plant from the beginning,

... later revealed to have been Emperor Traitorous all along! 😊

Liliet

He cannot serve satisfyingly as a loss because Cat already thinks of him as the expendable option.

It would be... really bad for her character development to go through with that thought.

caoimhinh

She was threatening the lives of everyone, actually. Both the Woe, the people present in that shard of Arcadia, the nearly 300 thousand people in the armies on the field and the rest of the population in Iserre.

Saint was gambling on Providence to sort it out and make the realm collapse without harming anyone, since Luck tends to favor Heroes in stories where they have to put so much at stake and save innocent people, but the rest weren't willing to take that risk.

So, I guess Tariq will be angry and grieving, but won't be able to hold it against Catherine.

Jason Ipswitch

I think you're being too generous. Saint wasn't gambling that the outcome of destroying the crown wouldn't hurt anymore. She was certain that no matter what the outcome was – even if it was everyone killed and Calernia overrun by the Dead King – it would be “better in the long run” to destroy the crown.

caoimhinh

Yeah, I'm giving her the benefit of the doubt, but I can't honestly rule out the notion that she might have been thinking that everyone was better dead than if the Heroes compromised with Villains.

werafdsaew

She willing to let the entirety of Procer be destroyed, why would she hesitate to sacrifice just a single Principality?

Liliet

She was willing to let the political institution of Procer be destroyed, not the entirety of its population. There's a subtle yet appreciable difference.

Shveiran

You are not wrong, but that political destruction would have come around through continued war with Callow and allies. I don't think she was under any delusion Cat would go quietly, so she was willing to accept that result would come around through mass slaughter of unknown quantity.

Andrew Mitchell

Having just re-read her exchange with Cordelia in Nillism III, I agree with you. It's not the impression that I was left with at the time but your interpretation makes sense.

<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2018/10/01/nihilism-iii/>

TeK

Is she really wrong about that though? One thing that boggles my mind is how everyone just assumes that Cat is right and Saint is wrong. Like... Why?

Liliet

I'm not assuming that. Given how much trouble fae courts are, it's entirely possible Saint had the right of it here..

Rook

Other than creating a potential catastrophe that damages creation and burns all possible bridges with every Good aligned faction on the continent if there is even a SLIGHT hiccup in dissolving the realm ten years down the line, absolutely no issues with it at all.

Because if there's one thing we know about fae courts holding enough power to create a true deity, its that no one ever interferes with the destruction of one, and nothing could possibly go wrong with such a large shifting of weight.

There is no way you could instantly lose the fight a year before the sword ever takes your head off via a slight intercession that simply delays the dissolving of the court. Say, just long enough to lose trust, which would consequently see you drowned in the inevitable tide of Heroes crawling out of the woodwork to destroy the new biggest baddest Evil Fae Court in town. One that would see you hunted down and killed afterwards, no matter the cost, if you were unfortunate enough to already have a very bad track record with Fae Courts. Like for example, stealing an evil fae court, feeding it to an ancient evil entity to create an evil god, then creating an entirely new evil fae court out of figurative thin air.

From a practical perspective we also know that the Hidden Horror is a narrative lightweight, thus when fighting against him there can be zero negative repercussions with being dependent on a magical entity not of their own making that they barely control. They should definitely just use the tool created by Trustworthy Lieutenant Larat, instead of breaking it and forging their own.

No, we can be entirely sure that it was a foolproof plan before the Saint ruined everything. Nothing Catherine Foundling touched has ever gone catastrophically wrong before. No cities were ever genocided by a seemingly small Catherine mistake, made with the best of intentions.

Liliet

I love you.

SilentWatcher

Nothing like that would have happened. Cat has shown she can learn from mistakes and such obvious ones would be easily prevented.

Shveiran

You are right. It was a very risky plan. It was much more sensible to flip the coin on 300000 people, a dozen Named, and generally everything that could ever hope to repel the Dead King, who is THE big monster of this continent and is currently trying to eat it. What was I even thinking.

Rook

If only there were some kind of third option other than breaking the crown or allowing someone to wear it for years.

Say, like a third option that was the original plan in the first place, and would be completely foolproof as far as saving the armies in the present while not creating an utter calamity for the future.

Like putting the crown on someone's head and slaying them.

Speaking straightforwardly for a second, do you remember why Catherine refused to choose that route? Because the consequences of killing any of them would be problematic, down the line, except for Indrani who she balked from choosing because of personal sentiment.

She had a damn good choice that wouldn't have been a gamble or a near certain future disaster, and what she had to do for it was make a concession on anything. The grudge with the saint if it was Roland or the pilgrim, the thinning of her relationship with the pilgrim if it was the saint, or her personal feelings if it was Indrani.

But she wasn't willing

So she took a half measure, she flinched at the hard choice, showed an opening, and Kairos punished her for it, well-deservedly. Now she's back to square one having killed someone anyway and still no closer to solving the problem.

None of the options were pretty but let's not pretend that Cat took the route of the crowning because there was no other way, no third option. She took it out of fear, and an unwillingness to lose in the slightest.

Shveiran

This isn't about Cat being unwilling to make an hard choice.

The "damn good option" you speak of, aside from the whole "murder a friend" thing has the slight hitch that Archer isn't a martyr. You need someone to be willing to crown him, you can't tie them to a chair and put it on their head. The trap originally worked for Larat because he was unable to escape the story and therefore the crowning (though he had other plans, it turns out).

REGARDLESS, that becomes a "damn good option" compared to breaking the crown and rolling the dice ONLY if you consider the possibility of Villains and Heroes sitting at a table instead of knifing themselves in the alleys to be horrific.

Would you expect someone to kill their friend (after somewhat brainwashing them to be on board, I guess) in order to appease the opinion of someone that not only they think is wrong, but that is pushing for their friend's death (or massive gamble-slaughter) because she actively rejects all they have built and wish to build, and would oppose them just as strongly tomorrow regardless of this choice?

Liliet

@shveiran

>The "damn good option" you speak of, aside from the whole "murder a friend" thing has the slight hitch that Archer isn't a martyr.

First of all Rook is talking about ALL of them as an option. Roland, Laurence and Tariq were all options.

Second, much more interestingly.....

>the slight hitch that Archer isn't a martyr

That's what Cat THOUGHT.

Yet.

>"Cat," Archer said. "Look at me."

>I turned, eyes lingering on the traces of blood still on her forehead. The reminder that she'd already died once tonight.

>"It's just ten years," she said. "And you didn't age while Duchess or Queen, so I'm losing nothing there. I'm not enough of an asshole to insist we murder someone over a decade."

>Except that she was, unkind as that thought was. Because Indrani was lovely and generous to those few that she loved, but the rest? She was not the kind to bleed for strangers, and I doubted the few months we'd spent apart had changed that about her. Or maybe I just didn't want to. What would it mean, if months away from the Woe was all it took to let her compassion bloom?

I mean Cat's logic here is incredibly bullshit (and 'few months' does not fit in the timeline no matter how you stretch it coz 1) it's still winter iirc, 2) there's no way events that happened since Indrani left took MONTHS) but the fact is, there was a suggestion presented she might be wrong.

There is also an earlier quote higher in the chapter...

>"It is uncertain," the Peregrine admitted. "There are some deaths not even my prayers can forgive, and to die on the altar for the sake of others might be one such."

>The old man glanced meaningfully at Indrani, who in difference to the seriousness of the situation had been keeping her mouth shut.

>"I cannot bring back those departed twice," he warned. "No matter the circumstances."

Why exactly would Pilgrim, with his Aspect of Behold, be meaningfully glancing at someone who totally wasn't a martyr and definitely wasn't about to suggest herself as an option?

Especially given that immediately after this it's Indrani (who had been 'in deference to the situation keeping her mouth shut') who speaks up.

>I'd had absolutely no intention of letting anyone so much as shake a knife in Archer's direction, but that was good to know. My friend had already died one tonight so, as far as I was concerned, she'd more than the paid the dues she hadn't even owed.

>"Might be this is obvious to the rest of you," Indrani slowly said, "yet why aren't we simply having someone put on the fancy hat and stay alive? That ought to do the trick."

Moreover...

>It was a possibility, I thought, to force that crown onto Kairos' head and slit his throat. One I'd seriously consider, but the Tyrant had bargained back his life from the Bard and the Pilgrim seemed set on respecting this. Would it be worth it, I asked myself, to cross him on this? It might be too much of a risk. The Rogue Sorcerer might come out either way, given his scraps with the Tyrant, and Archer would be at my side through Crown and Tower but the other two? The Saint was most likely to see the practicality in bleeding Kairos, but she often deferred to the Pilgrim over calls like these and she'd be just as eager to take a swing at me. The Tyrant's reaction was arguably the most predictable and least worrisome, for though he'd attempt escape he wouldn't take it personally in the slightest. No, I finally decided. The odds were too stiff and the cause too red. Even if I got away with it I'd leave scars, the kind that'd come back to bite me down the line, and our alliance was too young not to be mangled by something like this.

So your point about it being impossible to force the crown on someone is not really supported by canon text.

Oh, and either way

>We'd be killing whoever ended up putting it on, which disqualified Indrani from his discussion of succession as far as I was concerned. I'd already had enough close calls with death that I suspected I'd run out of ways to cheat it, and if I croaked it here too many things fell apart. That left who, the Sorcerer or the Pilgrim? It'd have to be Roland, I grimly thought. Much as he'd been growing on me, if the Grey Pilgrim died here the storm that'd follow would be massive. It was an ugly thought, turning on someone who'd been becoming a true ally, but what other choice was there? Indrani, the thought came. I felt a sharp well of disgust at myself, both for her name having come to me at all and then my refusal to entertain it. Was it not rank hypocrisy, to demand this sacrifice from strangers while denying even thought of it when it came to my own? There'd been more than one reason villainy came easier to me than the other side's works.

You'd think the logic of "it can't be Indrani because she won't go for this" would ease Cat's conscience on this point rather than leaving her grappling with 'how bad a person am I'.

Mental Mouse

My sarcasm meter just melted! 😊

But seriously, yes Saint had a case. If she'd been able to cleanly destroy the crown, Providence might well have lent a hand in support of a successful story... but with Kairos' interference, it's the worst of both worlds instead.

caoimhinh

About what exactly, do you mean?
Compromising?

That's just simple civility and the basis of any convivence, negotiations and the hope for peace. Cat is trying to go beyond the simple struggle of Heroes vs Villains and trying to change the way they do things. So that entire countries don't have to be swept up in the mess caused by Named every couple of years.

Saint is being stubborn and refusing to see reason, she refuses to consider the possibility of there being actual peace. Her refusal to compromise and her prejudice despite evidence that her opponents are looking for peace seem to border in the xenophobia and racism (as in 'everyone who is not like us is an enemy to be destroyed and can't be reasoned with, there can be no peace between us' line of thinking that has been the speech of so many discriminatory groups through history, and which is obviously wrong).

I don't think everyone is assuming things about who is right, different readers have presented different opinions, and even those that see Saint's actions as crazy can see the context in which she made her decision (her life experience). What we are all in accordance, I think, is that Saint's action of gambling with 300 thousand people's lives instead of compromising is not something heroic.

Liliet

You might want to rephrase that last sentence, because literally half the plot point this chapter was that the universe absolutely counted this as heroic on her part.

Oh and incidentally, I'm not in that accordance, though for a different reason.

Fayhem

> You might want to rephrase that last sentence, because literally half the plot point this chapter was that the universe absolutely counted this as heroic on her part.

If there's one thing that this story has established it's that the narrative is very gameable, so I'd consider it dubious to conclude that somebody getting a narrative advantage is inherently an objective ruling on the part of the universe itself. Especially since Saint's heroic advantage explicitly did not trigger off her own actions in trying to smash the crown, but from Tyrant's wantonly assholeish decision to deliberately frame this as "lone Hero fighting for What She Thinks is Right against a group of largely villains cockily boasting of their inevitable triumph". That's not the universe ratifying Saint's perception that What She Thinks is Right actually is right, that's an existing narrative frame that Saint was eligible for based on the pre-existing attributes of the actors involved rather than because of her choice per se.

Liliet

I don't think it's necessary for the person to be right for their actions to be heroic.

Heroic idiocy is a trope.

Fayhem

IIRC “heroic idiocy” usually refers to heroes being idiotic, not to idiocy being heroic. I think that’s a very salient distinction here.

Liliet

“Heroic idiocy” very much refers to actions being fucking stupid yet undertaken with heroic intent. See: what Cat thought about Tariq’s “It would have to be me” here.

Fayhem

Sure. But heroic intent does not ipso facto equal actual heroism, which is the distinction I was trying to draw (apparently unclearly lol).

Liliet

“But heroic intent does not ipso facto equal actual heroism”
How do you define ‘actual heroism’ then?

Fayhem

Ah, the million dollar question! At this point I feel as if we’re getting further into realms of actual philosophy that I haven’t looked at seriously in years, so idk about you but I’m starting to be a bit out of my depth lol. But to give it the old college try:

I would consider heroism, “actual heroism” if you will, to consist of a kind of marriage of intent and effect. If you want to do good but in reality all you do is fuck things up, you’re not a hero; you’re a fool at best and a tragedy at worst. If you have no particular desire to do good, but doing what you want to do for your own reasons produces good results for people then I’d say you’re not a hero since any beneficial side effects of your actions are no more than a happy accident at best. To be an “actual hero” I think you have to both want to do good/be heroic and then actually accomplish that.

Liliet

This position makes sense as a basis and I agree in principle, but I think it requires modification to account for risks and chances.

To take the roughest extreme: if someone gave their lives to carry out children from a burning orphanage, but one of the children later became a serial killer and killed all of their orphanage mates then 100 other people, does that make the original person's actions in saving them not heroic in retrospect?

There is such a thing as 'reasonable expectation', and it's in the definition of 'reasonable' that the wiggle room is to be had.

I think in guideverse the universe resolves this by pattern-matching 'in cases that look like this are consequences usually positive or negative'. Or even 'in cases that look like this do people believe consequences to be usually positive or negative' :3

In this specific situation, I suppose an argument can be made that there was no 'reasonable expectation' of a better outcome here, so it was not heroic.

I'd say Saint's expectation was pretty damn reasonable when it came to 'let's not do the twilight queen indrani thing' but unreasonable when after cracking the crown she proceeded to try to break it. It's possible though that she didn't know cracking the crown already made that plan unworkable, and in fact that's my guess. She didn't know the half-measure succeeded already.

Fayhem

In the example you gave the consequences are both way down the road and by no means reasonably anticipatable (is that a word?). The Saint's actions, by contrast, directly threatened the lives of hundreds of thousands who are all needed to turn back the Dead King. That's both immediate and extremely knowable, since she had literally just been told exactly that by the only person present with anything resembling subject matter expertise like five seconds earlier.

I'm just saying, if we're assessing "risks and chances", let's not just assess whether risking the fallout of Twilight Queen Indrani might be a bad idea. Let's assess whether risking literally the deaths of hundreds of thousands of people who are additionally needed to stop the Dead King from eating the damn continent might be a bad idea. You have to include both sides of the scales to see where the balance falls.

And so in this case, I will absolutely stand by the claim that Saint was being the bad kind of stubborn here and risking what she had no right to. Accepting the risk of killing hundreds of thousands and risking the death of a continent because you can't accept the risk of a compromise is just called fear – fear of losing your moral certainty, fear of undermining the premise that's held together your hard hard life.

There's a point where "making the hard choice" isn't a sign of moral courage, it's a sign of the lack of it – and Saint crossed that point here. The fact that she was willing to sacrifice herself to do so because she believed (or at least convinced herself) she was doing the "right thing" just makes her choice tragic, not heroic.

Liliet

No, I'm assessing both and I agree that both are significant.

And I guess with your point about fear I can see why you would reject the word 'heroic' here, since that usually has explicit connotations of bravery, not just good intent.

caoimhinh

Remember that Named don't even need to be actually good, bad or heroic in nature or intentions to take advantage of Narrative. All they need is the shape of it to be empowered or weakened by its force. That's the whole point of how Catherine manipulates things to be on the advantageous side of a story and Amadeus avoids falling into narrative traps, sometimes even making sacrificial story tropes (remember his advice to Grem when fighting against Hanno's team of knights). Plus there are multiple layers to a narrative, and multiple stories can act at the same time or use the same people to 'activate' one after the other.

Saint was definitely in the wrong here, putting in risk everyone's lives for her stubbornness; however that also made a story of a principled heroine fighting for what she believed was correct against a group that was majorily composed of Villains which empowered her to fight, she was ultimately in the wrong so she would have likely be defeated in the end (remember Villains get an early victory or initially beat the Heroes in many stories) yet when she was looking like she would be subdued Kairos 'activated' another story by proclaiming his team as invincible with an assured victory plus saying that Saint would need to submit to Below, this had the same effect of a Monologue: weakening the 'villain' of the story and/or strengthening the 'hero'.

The Universe and the Power of Narrative in the Guideverse isn't a conscious intelligent judge, but rather a mechanism that acts by force of consequence. A wicked Villain acting like a good guy can get the advantages of the Narrative just fine (like Black and the Calamities did for decades), and a well-intentioned Hero acting in the wrong manner can be screwed by the Story (like the Saint of Swords when attacking Cat under truce banner, as Catherine was correct in her behavior).

Rook

The Saint was quite clearly good as far as intentions go, not just 'Good' in a narrative sense. Whether the action was the right choice is a separate question, and depends entirely on perspective.

You have to realize that 'reckless principled buffoon who cares more about lines in the sand than lives' is the interpretation by readers really stretching to find a moral quandary with a character they dislike. The text shows that her motivations were the opposite – she was worried at the mass harm she believed the establishment of the realm would have on later generations

>“... There's no going back from that once we unleash it, Tariq. And odds are we won't live to see that garden of ruin come to bear fruit – by what right do you pass on that woe to those that come after us?”

She's not indignant because people dare to disagree with her. She's indignant because in her eyes the coronation is passing the buck to their children and grandchildren. Irresponsibly unloading the burden and suffering to untold generations that will follow, for an easy solution now.

It's not that everyone agrees the coronation is the least harmful way to go, the disagreement in the first place is whether that actually is the case.

Because one side is believing it can be taken back, be undone, the other believes it can't. THATS the crux of the disagreement, and honestly there's absolutely no concrete proof either way.

caoimhinh

True. That's what I meant when I mentioned the multiple layers of Narrative and multiple stories at work with a group of people.

It's very subjective, and the power of story can swing one way or another depending on the interpretation and shift to the opposite way as soon as a single sentence is spoken.

They are all to a degree, right. And at the same time, they are all wrong to some degree. We know that Laurence worries are well-founded, she has vast experience on this, and as a veteran Named she knows how her world works in the conflict of Good and Evil, she is right to worry about the future if their principles are compromised; but that's the radicalization that's typical in conservative factions of politics, they don't trust the other party and don't believe change is possible or positive.

Tariq, on the other hand, knows the same as Saint (probably a bit more), but has decided to not lose hope, he is always willing to alleviate suffering and works towards peace. Even if it's always on his own terms (while accusing the other side of being the ones doing it, as he does with Cat), yet he is right in his worry of letting the other side dictate terms because he has seen them use that as opportunity to cause harm many times.

Amadeus and Catherine are the other side of the coin. They belong to the side that has always done bad choices and caused harm to others, so they decided to change things. Black built up a reputation as Carrion Lord, a cold-blooded Villain who destroyed everything in his way to make Praes a great nation, while his real plan ultimately led them to acting in a way different from the Villains of the past, as that was the only way to achieve true and lasting peace, to break free of the cycle (notice that while Amadeus is willing and perfectly capable of mass slaughter to achieve his goal, he refrains from it and takes a more pragmatic and even charismatic approach whenever possible). Cat is right now trying to break new ground, bringing a further change from the one started by Amadeus, yet she has to fight against the reputation of her predecessors and the bad image the Heroes have of her (only Tariq -and maybe now Roland- has a decent opinion of her, and that's only because he looked at her soul before), from the perspective of Heroes and other countries, she is a warlord building up a great army, a threat to their lives. Forcing her to fight against them and kill their armies, which leads to confirmation bias that she was actually really a wicked person and so they call a greater reckoning, thus continuing the conflict.

It's all part of the cycle, and to break free of it, they need to make compromises. Yet it is understandable that the ones who had lived through the war aren't willing to make peace, as they grieve and are pained by their experiences that make them distrust the other side. But it needs to be done, otherwise they are just going to be killing each other for generations without end. Compromise is, after all, the only way peace treaties can be formed, signed and implemented without crushing the other side.

Shveiran

@ caoimhinh: damn right. Couldn't have said it better.

Liliet

Saint was in the wrong. She was also being heroic about it. I'm not seeing the contradiction.

caoimhinh

Yeah, we have established long ago that she is a Knight Templar, close to a Well-intentioned Extremist (though that's more Pilgrim's trademark).

It's not contradiction. It's multi-layered narrative.

Liliet

THANK YOU

Liliet

also Well-Intentioned Extremist has Amadeus's portrait on the dictionary entry

TeK

"About what exactly, do you mean?

Compromising?

That's just simple civility and the basis of any convivence, negotiations and the hope for peace."

Yes, that, why do you think that's going to work in Guideverse, or why do you think that such an obvious idea had never been tried before?

I feel the need to point it out – our common sence does not work in the universe with vastly different ruleset. An example – running or swimming is entirely pointless in the vacuum of space.

"Cat is trying to go beyond the simple struggle of Heroes vs Villains and trying to change the way they do things."

Aha, and Saint had been told that... When, exactly? See, another common assumption is that every actor has the same information as you. Up to and including metanarrative information such as that Cat is a protagonist and so must win in the end and also holds a moral highground because she never did anything to warrant distrust, like, I don't know, strating a civil war, installing an architector of genocide of a city as a governor or enslaving an entire race to have some meatshields. Sure, she's all changed or not her fault. And Saint knows all the convenient details that make her "not so guilty"(tm)... Since when, exactly?

Y'all act Saint to be unreasonable for distrusting Cat, but what reason to trust her she really has, aside from proclaimed (sic!) good intentions? I mean no Villain had ever proclaimed good intentions before, had they?

And the last thing I am going to point out, is that you don't know that she REFUSES to consider anything, it is just as likely or more that she HAD considered, and then d3cided that it's not worth the risk based on the information that she had and the fact that the situation CONVINIENTLY resolved to place a whole EVIL FAE CPURT AT THE BECK AND CALL OF BLACK QUEEN. And how was she supposed to know that after EVERYTHING had gone according to her plan, this is no just another time she pulls the rug under the Heroes?

And, with all of the above in the consideration, I'd just shank the queen, to be honest. Like, compromise actually requires someone doing the compromising, not just manipulationg everyone into doing what you want them to. Which is exactly how the situation seems IF

YOU DO NOT HAVE A DORECT LINK TO CAT'S THOUGHTS. Which Saint don't.

Liliet

Note how Laurence actually did not make an attempt on Cat's life. Like even when she parsed Cat as challenging her to a duel – Cat got a whole eleven seconds to murder her with a spell in while Laurence was trying to talk her down.

She actually, genuinely, is willing to give Catherine Foundling a chance.

Just, you know... not a fae court-sized one.

Liliet

Was.

Fuck.

Laurence)=)=)=

Shveiran

No. She is not willing to give Cat a chance. And to reply to Tek, yes, she believes Cat to have good intentions.

She said as much in Swan Song (Redux), and she still refuses a long term compromise. That is the point, that is what she fears: not teh Twilight Court, but establishing precedent for Villains and Heroes to sit at the table and compromise. Because "villains will always betray you in the end".

That is the hill she is choosing to die on. Those are the long term consequences she fears. Her stance is simply incompatible with "giving a chance" to any Villain; because it is not about believing they have changed or lacking informations about seeing that they are good, it is about fearing the consequence of a precedence.

This was her pivot: the moment where she chose between embracing the new or sticking with the old.

I am not denying she had reason to take this stand; it wouldn't have been a pivot otherwise. But let's not add what isn't there: she had already determined Cat was likely sincere, because she told Tariq as much; she was not willing to compromise-but-not-fae-court-level-of-compromise-just-yet, because what she feared was precedent of a compromise: if you are set on avoyding that, the best she could have offered the Black Queen long term was a temporary truce. The alternative was giving her sanction to keep on going, and SAINT WAS DEAD SET AGAINST THAT.

Liliet

I think if it wasn't fae court level she likely would have bent. Just because it was her position does not mean she would not eventually be willing to change it.

But she never got a chance to.

caoimhinh

It has been proven that governments of Evil-aligned and Good-aligned nations can cooperate and work together (see the League of Free Cities) and also there's the example of the Yan Tei where they are ruled by two people, one from Evil and one from Good. Besides, Evil-aligned nations make commercial deals with Good-aligned nations, although they prefer to use intermediaries for the sake of public image (Praes exports gems to Procer and imports food from Procer). So there's in-universe proof that coexistence IS possible.

Also, Pilgrim told Saint about Catherine's intentions for peace since as early as the Battle of the Camps. He stated it clearly and confessed that only the politics of the situation stayed his hand from enabling it to happen with Catherine in power of Callow. Besides, this isn't just putting blind faith into Cat's team, they were crowning Indrani under the condition of Oaths (which we know for a fact that affect normal people, even Named, and are outright unbreakable by Fae so they would have been a secure measure to assure that there would be no misuse of that power), and yet Saint decided that setting the precedent of making peaceful deals between Heroes and Villains was poisonous for the heroic cause, so she destroyed their safe option and gambled on the fate of 300 thousand people.

I am not saying that Laurence was insane, just that she isn't willing to compromise and sit down for civilized peace talks. She is a fanatic, a conservative faction that radicalized her position of belligerence towards her enemies of the past and carries that hatred to their successors.

It's no different than two countries at war for a long time; unless one of the two sides achieves an overwhelming victory over the other side, the conflict won't stop with a clear winner. Now, it's clear that any conflict that last for so long means that the two opposing forces are of roughly equal might (or that their advantages and disadvantages balance each other), what we are seeing here is the new generation of one of those sides offering peace and co-existence, achieved by mutual compromises, while the other side refuses this and decided that they would rather fight to the death (this was stated clearly by Laurence).

You don't need to read the mind of the other side to be able to achieve peace, if that were a requirement then there would never be peace. No negotiation, business deal, or peace treaty is signed by both parties knowing each other's pasts and minds, they are achieved by recognizing that both parties would benefit from the deal.

If your justification for Saint refusing peace is "she doesn't know Cat" or "she can't read her mind" that's a very bad excuse and completely invalid, because no peace treaty has ever been done that way. Peace is achieved by both sides recognizing that they can't win the war without great cost, and is only signed when both sides take a step back and compromise.

Otherwise they just keep sacrificing people in the conflict.

caoimhinh

Also, this wasn't even a deal for lasting peace, it was merely a truce for them to temporarily join and fight against the real unreasonable enemy: the Dead King.

The Twilight Court would have easily been contained or limited by the Oaths taken by Indrani, plus binding the participants to destroy the realm 10 years in the future when Indrani abdicated.

It wouldn't even be a great compromise, it would be a mutually beneficial agreement with clearly established boundaries.

Yet Laurence threw that off-board and put hundreds of thousands of people at risk out of her stubbornness and pride. Thinking that making a peaceful deal tainted their cause. it's the same nonsense as the speeches of racial purity or supremacy that say that joining with people of other race or nationality is a dishonor and a mark of shame that would disgrace the family line forever. It's stupid.

Yeah, the Villains of the past were crazy bastards, and yes, maybe the Villains of the future will be crazy bastards, heck the villains of today are crazy bastards (looking at you, Kairos) but that does not justify gambling with people's lives simply because the solution is given by a Villain. If that Heroine rather let people die than let them receive the cure from the hands of a Villain, it's not the Villain that's the problem there.

edrey

tariq, most likely, would take his right to rule back, get crowned and die like gandalf. on the other hand, the white knight just gained a very dangerous life. i am looking forward the peace talks now

Faiir

I might have missed something in the chapter – is there a specific reason why everyone talks about WK like he just leveled up, besides the fact that he's one of the only named heroes left?

Cheeezburger

It's because his power is to temporarily get the experiences and powers of any past hero, and if Tariq is dead, he will be in that pool.

Mental Mouse

Well... he gets the skills and memories, I don't think he gains all their powers. He had a magical weapon that shapeshifted to suit his needs, but Black broke it. (He might well do Light weapons in future.) I'm pretty sure he does not get their aspects. The interesting thing is that he's definitely not limited to his own Choir's heroes.

Say it again slower

I think it isn't because White Knight has Hero Power Access – that power is restricted to memories of other White Knights. I think it is that he is bound to Justice and Cat just murdered a major hero. Am I mistaken?

Liliet

He is restricted to memories of ALL HEROES. Not a single person mentioned was a White Knight. Most specifically I recall Unconquered Champion (who got Black in a pocket dimension and teased out some of his tricks), Lone Swordsman (who fought Black's student and thus had some insight to draw on about his school) and Thief of Stars (who drew my attention for obvious reasons).

caoimhinh

I remember that he also Recalled the Unerring Fencer, the Sage of the West, and the Sword of the Free.

I didn't remember him using the Thief of Stars.

Liliet

She was mentioned at one point!

And yeah, those ♥

Mental Mouse

Also: die like Gandalf? Are you actually talking about the LoTR character? Because y'know, he doesn't actually die in the books. Goes down into a chasm to wrestle a Balrog, but he comes back from that, and at the end he sails off to the West with the elves.

caoimhinh

Maybe the Choir of Mercy will resurrect Tariq as the White Pilgrim XD

werafdsaew

The deal to spare Laurence was superseded by the deal to save Tyrant.

Liliet

Cat phrased it as 'should the other condition fail to occur' ie she's still agreeing to spare Laurence but now has the deal secured if Laurence doesn't attack either.

I don't think Tariq will consider this to be a breach of agreement in spirit, since Catherine laid the condition that she will not allow Laurence to kill Masego upfront, and I imagine Masego is one of the 300 000 + the entire civilian population of Liesse. Which honestly should be enough on its own, but if we're talking literally made deals – well. That one was for Laurence threatening just Cat. Cat wasn't even in personal danger here, just protecting everyone else.

Note how even Roland came close to being willing to kill her here.

Shveiran

Also, Cat was in danger. She was on the demiplan Saint was willing to risk crushing on Creation.

It is a very minor point, but still. It's not like her own survival wasn't in question.

Liliet

True. I get the impression the plane itself was going to stay ok, but it's not guaranteed.

Cat's own survival wasn't THE question here though which is the main point :3

Javvies

Huh.

Well that happened.

Kairos ... what the hell. Monologuing at Saint? That's a mistake if there ever was one.

That's one hell of a trick, Cat. But that's definitely a one time trick.

Andrew Mitchell

Not a mistake, it was another deliberate betrayal.

C_B

Was it a swing at Archer, or intended to force Cat to kill Saint, do you think?

werafdsaew

He wants to see what that staff-sword-prayer does

Mental Mouse

And use it up – he's surely figured that Cat specializes in one-shot artifacts.

caoimhinh

I would say a bit of both, but mostly to force Catherine to kill Laurence. Notice that he started that Monologue when it started to look like they were actually about to subdue Saint.

Now Cat was forced to go back on her word of not killing

Laurence, Pilgrim will be grieving, and the side of Heroes has lost a very powerful member, and at the hands of the Black Queen, which will strain her relationship with them in the future alliances that are obviously necessary. Anyone present knows that it was a necessary thing, even Tariq, but the Heroes and politicians who were not there will probably think different things, and Heroes in this setting are not prone to forgiving Villains or pausing to think about a situation where one of the Named of Below is actually the good person of the story. (This might interestingly enough lead to a situation of White Knight using his coin of Judgement on Catherine to decide the matter, and either make a mess by swinging against her or blowing everyone's mind when the Seraphim declare her free of culpability)

Andrew Mitchell

> (This might interestingly enough lead to a situation of White Knight using his coin of Judgement on Catherine to decide the matter, and either make a mess by swinging against her or blowing everyone's mind when the Seraphim declare her free of culpability)

Now THAT'S a scene I really want to see play out.

TeK

Seraphim do not split hair whether or not someone is guilty in one particular instance or case. It's more of an absolute concept. And Cat is absolutely guilty.

Faiir

Do we even have an example of Seraphim proclaiming anyone not guilty through the coin toss?

Fayhem

Not on camera I think, but IIRC there's mention of WK getting asked off-camera to pass some heavenly judgment when he was in the Free Cities. That stopped as soon as the Seraphim gave a "smite" verdict on someone lol. It seems like he mostly flips the coin to ask when he's already fighting someone or otherwise thinks they may be guilty of injustice though, and since he's a Hero and the Seraphim seem to have a surpassingly uncompromising definition of justice that means there's an extremely strong selection effect for cases that will produce a "smite" verdict.

And yeah, like has been pointed out by others the fact that he's using his discretion on when to flip the coin and ask means he is in fact still employing his own judgment to an extent, despite his shtick ostensibly being "I do not judge". I do feel like accusations of hypocrisy get thrown around with too much force when people discuss heroes tho, like yes they don't implement their ideals with 100% consistency but that really isn't of itself an argument. It doesn't prove their ideals are wrong, and it doesn't prove they're wrong for trying to follow them or for thinking that trying to follow them is better than not having any. At most it proves they're human, which means you're "proving a point" that no one has actually disputed. That generally gets referred to as a strawman fallacy.

That's not necessarily directed at you btw since idk where you land on all that, I'm just ranting because it's something I feel ranty about lol. And in WK's case I actually do have objections to his actual ideals, they're just not based on pointing out that he isn't wholly consistent in applying them.

Liliet

Boi I hear you.

And Hanno was implied to have flipped a coin on the Gigant who found him on the shore, and gotten a 'not guilty' verdict.

Unless he started his 'I don't see why I would flip the coin here I see nothing wrong' streak back then ;u;

NZPIEFACE

You forget that literally every regal hates the Regicide, for a damn good reason.

caoimhinh

Hmm, true.

But their hatred towards Saint of Sword is mostly because she doesn't respect their nobility, she doesn't give a damn about them being princes and princesses, and she says that to their faces. That's why they hate her, not simply because she killed a prince decades ago.

Nevertheless, my point was that when the news spread it's going to cause a ruckus, specially among the Heroes.

Rook

You forget a they also hate AND piss their pants in fear of the Black Queen. The Regicide was no one's friend, but she was in the grand scheme of things still on the same Side, especially with the Dead King looming over the horizon right now. The Black Queen's reputation, on the other hand, is that of a soul-freezing terror from the Other Side.

Now, if you're an ordinary person or ordinary noble, and you get the news that the Black Queen murdered a living legend among Chosen, what are you going to think? You're certainly not thinking "Jolly good old chap, the hideously terrifying Villain ain't so bad! She did us the favor of killing one of our most reliable Allies against the Dead King, when the Dead King is on the verge of annihilating all life on the continent! Hip hip, Cheerio!".

No, said Villain just shot up on your charts from a hideously terrifying monster to a world-shatteringly terrifying monster. Now you're feeling cornered because the successor of the fucking Black Knight, who looks to be every bit as terrifying as her teacher, is lurking at your backs whilst the Hidden Horror is knocking down your front door.

As far as the details of why she had to kill her? Even if word got out far enough, even if people had the patience to listen, who's going to believe it? Hells, half the people in her own Legions believes she sees through souls and freezes the blood in your veins at a whim. They're not even up to date enough to realize she's not a frozen murder fairy anymore, she's just the high priestess of murder in the dark.

At any rate, it's near-certain no one is going to believe the Villain killed a Hero for entirely reasonable and Justified causes, because what kind of legendarily terrifying Villain gets there by being a reasonable or Just person?

Decius

You have to control the narrative.

All anyone else knows is that Saint isn't around anymore. Blame Kairos for killing her via betrayal, and everyone believes you. Combine that with Kairos stealing the crown and being killed in turn, and things work out pretty well. The hard part is forcing Kairos to steal the crown, but with all of the betrayal he's been doing lately it's about time for him to end anyway.

Someguy

Control of narrative is unfortunately in Bard's toolbox. Good luck with that.

Liliet

Not convinced she'd get in the way here.

Insanenoodlyguy

Did he hear Grey and Cat Talk? I think he could be reversed psych'd into this. Sell "you aren't getting the crown you bastard, you hear me?" Hard enough and he won't NOT be able to put it on.

Liliet

Hmmm.

At that, their best shot at murdering the newborn god wearing the crown was guess who?...

Insanenoodlyguy

Yeah, but now the crown is a death trap. And "I swear you die today if you put that on" and the like has tricked smart villains before.

Liliet

Yes, exactly my point. If Kairos had missed that the crown was a death trap, the logic could have been that he could totally go for it now that Laurence is not around

Liliet

I don't think Kairos needs to die for this to work, either. Literally nobody is taking his word for anything, if he told you in summer it wasn't snowing you'd look outside. If Tariq survives this, his word will be fully sufficient for everyone to go 'oh fuck the Tyrant'.

Now if he doesn't either... =x

NZPIEFACE

So, Tariq just ended up dead. I feel your comment is going to be much more relevant now.

Liliet

I mean honestly everyone present will probably point their finger at Kairos when a question is asked of whose fault it is Laurence died, since that's entirely accurate AND politically advantageous for the entire friggin world.

Though leaving the judgement up to Hanno could be beautiful as well, considering I somehow doubt Seraphim are biased.

Javvies

Hold up.

The Seraphim are likely totally biased.

At least when it comes to entities that can be construed as Evil. Such as Cat.

When it comes to those that are Good, or at least not Evil, sure, they're probably about as objective as they can be.

But remember, the Seraphim, like all Choirs of Angels, have an agenda that includes defeating Evil.

Liliet

Remember that Hanno's career as a Hero of Judgement started with looking at his Evil mother committing an unambiguously Evil deed and going "you know what? I'm not condemning this".

Shveiran

Yes. "I".

Hanno realized he could not be objective, so he surrendered the decision and all future judging to an entity he believes sees a bigger picture and is less biased.

That doesn't mean Judgment would not have condemned his mother, or that the Seraphim doesn't consider being Evil as sufficient condition to be found Guilty.

Liliet

We have different interpretations of hero/Choir relationships :3

Shveiran

We do, and it's true we likely don't have enough evidence to reach a solid theory yet (we'll likely get more when the Hierarch's arch reaches its climax).

But my point isn't about that, is about whether or not the Seraphim condemns Evil because it's Evil. Hanno doesn't have much to do with it, in my opinion.

You seem to believe they wouldn't necessarily find her guilty, but I'm not sure why.

Liliet

Seraphim condemn Evil because it's evil, not because it's Evil 😊

Rook

Catherine is almost certainly a target, if not THE target. I don't think people fully realize how much of an awful setback this could be to basically all of her long term goals. It's not even funny how much trouble this is.

One, this looks terrible to everyone else. This looks really, seriously TERRIBLE. Some of the greatest Heroes of the age made a bargain with the Black Queen, resulting in at least one being struck down by her own hand, emphasis the latter. You know what message that sends to anyone considering making a deal with the Black Queen? Don't even fuckin consider it, it'll end up with her murdering the shit out of you. Look, even Heroes on the level of the Saint aren't immune from the horror of the wicked Villain's schemes.

Second, guess who's the only person here with enough respect and weight among the Good-aligned forces to even have a remote chance of clearing Cat's name? The Pilgrim. What a coincidence, Killing the Saint happens to put cracks in Cat's relationship with that very person.

Third, all the weight of converting the Saint here just went up in a puff of smoke. Literally one chapter ago, one of the most jaded and stubborn Heroes alive – as well as one of the most respected and famous – as much as outright admitted Catherine is an exception. Even if it was 'this once', it would have set up precedent for an exception, for a Villain to be accepted by the most ardently Evil-hating. Not anymore. Whoops.

Fourth, they STILL have to deal with the crown, and having someone abdicate in ten years is now off the table. Cat either compromises her bottom line by fully breaking it, which narratively is a huge blow even if you ignore the fact that it'll emotionally wreck her, or she sacrifices someone.

Hypocrisy and not respecting your own bottom line – even if forced – weighs badly in any light. Her options? Kairos, at which point you have Larat being the first ruler and fucking Kairos the last, when establishing the realm. Bad news bears. You have indrani, which would directly weaken the Woe and probably take more years off Cat's life than her little attack just did. Or Roland/the Pilgrim, which heavily exacerbates the problem from point one. It looks TERRIBLE in the eyes of the rest of the world.

Javvies

On the other hand, IIRC we don't actually have confirmation of King Edward's final demise, and we certainly haven't seen his corpse. And without a body ... we can't say he's dead again for reals this time. So he's technically still on the table. Not that that's necessarily a particularly good plan either.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Well, we technically have seen his corpse even though we lack that confirmation you mentioned. His corpse was just moving around and thinking and such when last we saw it. 😊

Liliet

"The foremost hero of the age died AT HER OWN HAND" is the kind of information that's only going to get out if someone everyone's willing to believe puts it that way. Neither Roland nor Tariq would be out to throw Cat under the bus here (let alone Indrani and the drow observers), and Nobody Cares What Kairos Has To Say. Especially if one or more heroes say otherwise.

The real trouble comes if Tariq and Laurence BOTH die here and Roland is the only survivor. Sure he's a foundation for heroes dealing with Cat, but he doesn't have the weight to force POLITICIANS to do so, and Levantines are going to be livid regardless of Roland possibly trying to reassure them it wasn't Cat's fault.

kinigget

Because Saint is a moral absolutist down to her very core. She was willing to gamble hundreds of thousands of life on the basis that she could not conscience setting a precedent for working with Villains. Not even against a greater threat.

She may not be wrong, and honestly likely isn't. But her absolute adherence to her moral principles even in the face of an overwhelming number of practical reasons to break them makes it all moot

Basically, she's being Rorshach

Never be Rorshach

Javvies

I think you accidentally replied to the wrong comment.

Liliet

She wasn't willing to set precedent for allowing THE CREATION OF A NEW FAE COURT ANSWERABLE TO A VILLAIN.

A precedent for low key ground level working with a villain, she's already set, and note how she tried to talk Cat down instead of cutting her down immediately when Cat did her swordprayer trick.

Isaac Martinez

The prayer not only affected their time, our waiting time for the chapter was the sacrifice.

Draconic

They should have put the crown on the Saint's head. She's the one who broke it, she's the one it should kill.

Tenthyr

They couldn't contain her, like Cat said. The only way to stop her was for Cat to use her Prayer.

Adurna

I feel like the crown might very well end on her corpse at this rate. A risky move to be sure with the dead king about, but a queen at the twilight of her life would be fitting.

Liliet

Oooh this is an interesting idea.

The story wanted a sacrifice. The story bloody well GOT it. It's possible another isn't needed.

Tenthyr

The blade that was not a blade, the only sure death waiting all Heroes.

Walter

TYRANT!

erebus42

Hey, scorpions and frogs man.

Ali Khan

You know what? I'm glad this was delayed.

Because there is no way I could wait two days for the next chapter.

Xinci

And so through competition do our competing creeds crown a triumphant champion. The keeper at the last door dies while a new one takes up the mantle. A bit sad that Laurence couldn't be convinced in the end but I suppose there's only so much space on the stage. A bit surprised Laurence didn't try to think "A sword doesn't age unless it rust". But it was a fair climax before the next act and she didn't have the weight for a "Cut through time and space" scene I suppose.

NZPIEFACE

Heroes don't get immortality bullshit.

TeK

Just every other kind of bullshit.

Death Knight

Hey Kairos, your head's looking a littlw bare. How about you try that cracked crown on, huh? Come on, it'd be a good fit...

Andrew Mitchell

Honestly, Kairos might actually go for it now:

- He's a true villain's Villain. Below might actually save him from the crown killing him and Kairos would happily pay whatever price Below wants for that.
- Roland's still useful but it's going to be able to stop Kairos.
- Indrani is injured.
- Pilgrim's just about spent.
- Cat's used her best trick and so may not be able to stop Kairos if he makes a play for the crown.

Insanenoodlyguy

That's the key. She has to make clear he better not put on the crown and then try to stop him. That ends with him putting on the crown and being the villain that fell for it.

Fayhem

What's the line from the Evil Overlord list? "Never try to absorb a field of energy larger than your head"? Kairos might be too canny to fall for that, but then again he's made his whole career out of riding the razor's edge of villain tropes... who knows if he could resist rolling the dice on being able to do it again.

WuseMajor

Tyrant would find a way to make them all regret making him put the crown on.

Anyone have a running tally on how many times Tyrant has betrayed people since they made their alliance?

TeK

Not enough. He is yet to betray Heroes for Cat, after all.

Liliet

Three.

One for Dead King, one for Bard, one for Laurence (so to speak).

caoimhinh

Cool chapter. Totally worth the wait.
RIP Saint of Swords.

I must say, seeing Kairos pulling a Gilgamesh's Gate of Babylon through his Gargoyles here was kind of funny, but also interesting, that with him throwing priceless and mighty artifacts one after the other without any regard and in a sickly way with his weak arms. Amusingly contrasting with Gilgamesh's cool way of launching his treasures as projectiles at his enemies through the golden portals.

The Staff-Sword-Prayer being a Blade of Time is a fascinating thing that I truly didn't see coming. Probably a miracle that won't be used ever again, but it was very powerful and a clever way to side-step the issue of fighting the Saint of Swords. In the middle of the chapter, I had kind of expected Catherine to use her sword of Night to finish breaking the crown (something like half the wound being made by a Hero and the other half being made by a Villain seemed suitable to break the Twilight Crown, at least to me), but now that artifact has been used, though maybe Cat can still wield a Miracle of Night that can work.

The act of killing Laurence will have great repercussions, even if Tariq and Roland tell the others what truly happened, it's unlikely that the other Heroes will see this in a good way. It might even lead to Hanno using his coin on Catherine, which would lead to interesting consequences depending on what side of the coin is the one that lands (a messy fight if it lands on swords as that would mean the White Knight would attempt to kill her, and blowing everyone's mind if it falls on the laurels as that would mean the Choir of Judgement declares her not guilty, which would probably be something unprecedented for all of them and with the Angels telling them that she acted correctly they would have to swallow their complaints and hopefully see her in a new light).

I really hope Pilgrim doesn't die now by putting the Twilight Crown, because that would create a huge mess, even if Roland can advocate for the fact that Pilgrim sacrificed himself to save everyone, it would still be blamed on Hierophant and by extension on Catherine, driving Levant into a warpath that won't help anyone.

So the question is, what will they do now?
Will there be a scapegoat for the Crown? Who will it be?
Will they find another way?

Typos found:

- it was Saint of Swords of wielded it / it was Saint of Swords who wielded it
- if not for the for the gargoyle / if not for the gargoyle
- the rest of the crow / the rest of the crown
- even though she'd done so treacherously she was only going / even though she'd done so treacherously, she was only going
- I hid a grimaced / I hid a grimace
- cleverly snap out of Indrani's longknives out of her grasp / cleverly snap one of Indrani's long knives out of her grasp
- though she flicked her blade back in time to cut through it barely helped / though she flicked her blade back in time to cut through it, it barely helped
- his discussion / this discussion
- cut off her arm the wrist / cut off her arm at the wrist
- she held her severe hand / she held her severed hand
- The blade had not once unsheathed / The blade I had not once unsheathed
- Kairos had, against all odds, succeeding / Kairos had, against all odds, succeeded
- my advance drew her eyes went to me / my advance drew her eyes to me
- I touched me too / It touched me too
- I close my mouth / I closed my mouth

Liliet

Yep, that's about my analysis too.

A question is, why did Bard want this?

(This absolutely has her grubby fingerprints on it everywhere)

It's possible this was intended to help Catherine (as always in the nastiest way possible). IF Tariq survives this, that's what I'm seeing.

If he doesn't, the balls are still up in the air.

caoimhinh

I don't know if Bard wanted Laurence to die, but considering the setting we should assume everything that happens is part of a scheme or at least something she predicted, and make our hypothesis around that premise.

I would think it could be to tie a loose end? Saint was the only one who knew the 'burn all Procer in the final Crusade' plan so maybe it's something to squeeze her usefulness to the limit, get rid of Laurence to silence her while setting it up in a way that cast Catherine in a bad light when rumors start circulating (Heroes are more likely to only care that she killed a Heroine rather than the actual circumstances of the fact) plus psychologically wounded Tariq maybe in a effort to radicalize his position.

There are many ways to go around this, and many ways the facts can be twisted into a narrative benefitting some and hurting others, both for Heroes and Villains. Ultimately, it depends on how omniscient EE makes the Bard. He could make it so that the Intercessor simply takes advantage of the situations as they present or show her as someone who no matter what happens everything is part of her plan; My personal view is that the Bard is somewhere in between, making many plans and having access to lots of information and resources, but definitely not omniscient yet capable of improvising with whatever situation happens.

Liliet

I agree with your view.

This one was obvious consequence, but what it was FOR...

I will say this: it does NOT contradict my earlier theory about Bard triggering the Arch-Heretic bullshit to get the radical elements out of Catherine's way early.

Andrew Mitchell

So you're still firmly on Team 'Bard is a secret force for small-g good' then?

I'm sticking with my theory that the Bard's role is to keep the game going and that's ALL she's doing.

I think it's going to be at least an entire book before we get to know that for sure. I'm currently thinking its 50% you're right, 45% I'm right and 5% something else.

Liliet

I am just not seeing any evidence against that theory no matter what new shit comes up. There's ALWAYS a way what she's doing leads to good things if you squint. Sure it takes some squinting, but you really don't have to squint HARD. Somewhere between 'what she did broke an evil Empire and birthed the idea of the Accords' and 'Cat just got everything she wanted handed to her on a silver plate at the horrible price of losing a possible huge liability',

(I mean it's early to call THAT one yet, but literally Tariq or Cat dying are the only Bad For Cat's Plan outcomes here, and Tariq's death might put more gears into action we haven't seen yet – and Cat's not dying for good here, she's the protagonist, we know that much :D)

>I'm sticking with my theory that the Bard's role is to keep the game going and that's ALL she's doing.

>I think it's going to be at least an entire book before we get to know that for sure. I'm currently thinking its 50% you're right, 45% I'm right and 5% something else.

yeah lmao it's likely we won't know soon :3

Shveiran

Mhm, I see. So your position is basically that the Bard manipulates the plot, and the plot is bringing Cat closer to her goals (because protagonist). So either Bard is the final antagonist, or Bard was on board with it all along and we just didn't see it.

I'll admit if we go with Bard's omnipotence, it DOES make sense. My problem with it is that it makes Cat's struggle unsatisfying, personally: it requires so much foresight and manipulation on Bard's side, that basically everything becomes her doing instead of Cat's. It reduces the protagonist to mostly a pawn.

But I'll admit it is not impossible, unlike I previously believed.

Liliet

I'm seeing it as slightly different than omnipotence: effective omniscience that leads to very good predictions (though not literal future sight), but very very limited ability to influence events.

If a rock rolling down the hill comes to a fork, and it takes a light touch to send it tumbling one way or the other, Bard can provide that touch.

If the rock is already there.
If the fork is already there.
If Bard has the capability to be there.

She participates in events, but the protagonist being who she is is a harsh prerequisite for Bard getting her way. This is why my theory is not unsatisfying to me: because it DID take Catherine Foundling, and it DID take Amadeus of the Green Stretch to find her, for Bard to get the ball rolling the way it went.

Their choices very much matter, and frankly they matter more than hers. She only works with what she's given.

Catherine Foundling's choices are shaped by circumstances she finds herself in. One of these circumstances is Bard, and I'm not seeing anything unsatisfying in that :3

daegone823

Was I the only one thinking she was going to stab the pilgrim for turning on everything she stood for.

I mean this was fine but I guess I had a darker expectation. The hero who slays monsters becoming a monster and assuming a throne of twilight to stone for her sins.

Andrew Mitchell

Laurence had no reason to become a monster; as expected she stayed true to herself to the very end.

To me, Laurence becoming a monster would feel like a cliché and EE has done a sterling job avoiding those so far.

daegone823

Right you are which is why this fiction is so wonderful. We have been trained by so many fables do many stories that they have been ingrained in our genes as much as the average Calowan.

The other can set up the story then introduce a goat and our mind explodes. Seriously the author must have a note on there laptop to introduce st least one goat as a plot point for every major battle.

Really love this story shame it is so hard to explain to friends.

daegone823

The author

Javvies

She was already a monster.
Just one that was on the side of Good. "She's a Hero, so she can't be a monster."

TeK

Highly debatable. What is a monster? Why is she a monster?

werafdsaew

If the Saint succeeded at destroying the crown, and that gamble failed in that it killed everyone in Iserre, she would be remembered as one of the worst monsters in history by body count, far exceeding even the Doom of Liesse.

onedollargum

I'm pretty sure the media would play it as: "It was only at great cost that the Saint foiled the Black Queen and saved us from the foundation of the Damned Twilight Court."

Andrew Mitchell

If the word somehow got out, then I agree.

However, I think all the witnesses would be dead as well.

werafdsaew

Pilgrim, with his Ophanim protection, is guarenteed to make it out alive. He's also the Hero who would tell the truth to the world to forestall future Saints.

Trupo

That “Enemy” she spoke of all the time? It was her, because she made it impossible to make truce with her. She turned herself into one of people that couldn’t be trusted or reasoned with and had to be removed for everyones sake; i.e. what she believed she was fighting.

Liliet

She died because instead of cutting Catherine down the second she took out the sword, she tried to talk her down, thus giving her the eleven seconds she needed to kill her.

I’m just saying.

Shveiran

Debatable. There was too much narrative weight behind that swordnotsword that she was never going to survive it.

The narrative was pushing very hard against her. You could say it was her choice to hesitate; I could say that was the shape of the story pushing her to fall for it. And we’ll never know.

Liliet

True.

But I think if she was not willing to hesitate, something else would have tripped her up. Not this. This is the shape of her not being out to kill Catherine.

Shveiran

But even if she was... so what? Saint took a stance she was never going to walk away from. And that stance was “no long term compromise, no sitting at the table with them”. Long term, that means killing Catherine because Villain. There isn’t a lot of wiggle room here.

NZPIEFACE

I realized why we don’t like Saint.

She’s trying to dictate the results of lives she has no real right to, both from our point of view, and everyone in the story’s. Her voice is an opinion, a pretty valid one from the good guy’s PoV, but still, she’s been forcing her way with things that she never should have.

luminiousblu

>we Speak for yourself chap

TeK

Quite.

TeK

Forcing your way of things is what being Named is all about.
Everyone does it, Cat does it, and we have no reason to believe she can't be wrong.

jack

Timesword?

TIME-SWORD!

Andrew Mitchell

'Single-use' time-sword!

JJR

Time And Rayless Dimension In Scabbard

gyndroid

""Come, drow," the Saint of Swords said. "Let's see if your faith is strong enough even I cannot cut it."

"Come," Rumena replied, "before one of us dies of old age.""

...welp!

onedollargum

Foreshadowing! Nice find.

erebus42

What's especially funny is if he were there he would have survived it and outlived her anyway

Liliet

What's even funnier is he might have known about Cat's prayer and done this on purpose.

gyndroid

It's certainly not the first time he's teased about old age, and I kind of love it.

From chapter 12:

Clenching my fingers, I spit to the side.

"Rumena, pick out two thousand warriors," I said.

"Will you be spitting on them as well, First Under the Night?" the old drow drily asked.

"That one's a bit of a stretch," I replied without missing a beat. "Careful with those, you know your back's not what it used to be."

"At least one of us should live to reach old age," Rumena smoothly retorted.

Liliet

I love him so much.

Andrew Mitchell

Me too. I want some more, much more, Rumena screen-time.

Odd

Still time for Black to take up the crown. Death of the mentor has enough narrative weight even if Cat didn't see it.

Sparsebeard

Plus, it would count as amends for Saint's death and showing resolve. This way, it's not only the heroes who sacrifice.

Liliet

If anyone of Cat's takes up the crown and dies, it's Akua. Like there's literally no reason to pick Black over her, and about 1000 reasons not to.

But nobody from the outside can interfere.

Aotrs Commander

And nothing of value was lost.

(Well, unless Indrani's hand can't be put back,...)

Don't rest in peace, Saint.

Shveiran

Arguable. But mostly, arch is not done yet. Crown is still broken, realm is still fallig, and the previous neat solution has been made impossible.

Liliet

RIP Laurence. You will be missed, if not by everyone.

Tohron

Somehow I'm thinking that it'll be Black who ends up getting crowned. The way the story's going, I'm not seeing either Indrani or Roland suddenly dying, and since Black isn't quite alive right now, he could get crowned and still survive in some fashion.

Tohron

AAAND ninjaed...

Andrew Mitchell

Black is not there, he's back at camp.

Andrew Mitchell

And probably not re-assembled as yet.

JJR

Black Knight action figure! (some assembly required, Soul not included)

Andrew Mitchell

Hahahahhhaha

TeK

Can I paint it pink?

Fayhem

Honestly I feel like in the right circumstances Amadeus would totally roll with that idea just for the psychological advantage of making all the Heroes feel really weird while they're fighting him.

Liliet

Yes.

Fayhem

Riding an undead unicorn that he has also painted pink. "At them, Buttercup! They'll never stop the power of our friendship."

Liliet

Amadeus's 1000 actual friends roll their eyes.

Fayhem

Which is the real reason he'd say it, obviously.

Liliet

If this were possible it'd be Akua.

Thea

So... Will Archer make a full recovery? Or still having lost her hand leave symptoms and take her Name in the process?

onedollargum

She might recover that hand, but the resurrection says to Prepare for Unforeseen Consequences.

erebus42

I would guess she won't recover the hand since it was the Saint who cut it off. I predict she will also probably decline a zombie hand (probably for the best considering who they are fighting). If she does lose her name (probable, since it's kinda hard to use a bow with only one hand) she'll at least be in the same boat as Masego. I'm sure it will be a lovely little bonding experience (you know, having the Crafts that they dedicated their whole lives and identities to snatched away and what not), hopefully they'll be able to help each other find new ways to reinvent themselves though.

Andrew Mitchell

I hope you're wrong and I fear you may be right.

Javvies

Why? It's not like Saint was using an Aspect or something like the Hashmallin feather sword that William had. As far as we can tell, anyways.

Plus, Pilgrim started to use his Miracle-healing to reattach it almost immediately.

I think Indrani's worst case scenario is that she needs to spend some time rehabbing.

Physically, anyways.

Indrani might need some mental recovery time, though, since she's had a particularly bad half hour or so.

Morgenstern

I'm still kinda banking on self-sacrifice-tragedy by one of the lovers, to potentially attempt restoring the love of their life even in their final second. Although I'm not sure that'll happen. Might just be poor Roland bites the dust. But I would feel seriously cheated if no one bites the dust after THIS chapter. They firmly decided against gambling. That's what you should get for denying the heroic gamble, storywise, no?

Andrew Mitchell

FTFY

"But I would feel seriously cheated if no one ELSE bites the dust after THIS chapter."

Euodiachloris

She may find herself becoming more plot dangerous without a Name or her martial skills.

After all, the really scary thing about Indrani has always been how flipping intelligent she is underneath all her mannerisms.

erebus42

Daaamn! That's how it's done! I was skeptical of the idea of Cat's ace in the hole against the Saint of Swords being a sword, looks like I was right to be so. If there's one thing I can appreciate its beating a seemingly invincible opponent through a loophole. Especially when done so beautifully. Time really does always win I guess.

I get the feeling that that's it for Andrani's arm considering it was the Sait who cut it off.

Also Kairos you beautiful treacherous bastard! Never change.

Hitogami

Kairos is really Dread Emperor Traitorous in disguise

burdi

it is time then for catherine to subdue the twilight crown declare that she is the most worthy, she unmade two court of fae, and the twilight crown was born from her scheme the pilgrim will disagree of course but the crown already broken and catherine is the only one ever bear the court crown before

TeK

Why would she do that, she specifically DON'T want to have it.

konstantinvoncarstein

At last Saint is dead! Now, it is the turn of Kairos and Anaxarès

JJR

Cracked presents:

The seven greatest traitors of Calernia! (You'll never guess which ones were Dread Emperor Traitorous all along)

Kissaten

Bard REALLY wants to see that crown on Black Knight's head, doesn't she?

So, I think, if Bard's behind Crown's cracking the natural cause of action is to break it completely, "no one's worthy": If it explodes and kills the heroes but armies somehow survive there's no strife between those armies, and this kills both Bard and Dead King; If armies die as well Dead King dominates the continent, and Bard cannot allow it; if neither die it's a clear loss for Bard. Meanwhile any outcome where someone's worthy has coalition broken and either villains or heroes winning, meaning return to status quo so it's in Bard's interests.

Trupo

"I have my moments," Amadeus mused. "I did hear this funny jest, from someone very dear to me. It was about this very arrogant woman who had her belly opened and crawled away holding in her guts."

He paused.

"The punchline is that you'll grow old and die, while Hye won't," he helpfully added.

Liliet

This remains the worst joke he's ever told, and also my favorite.

I feel really bad for Laurence, I'll be mourning her for some time yet, but...

...

...this was still funny in how bad it was.

TeK

I kniw I am probably the only one, but I am sad this is how Saint died. She deserved to die as she lived, holding darkness at bay with the sword in her hand. This is just not fair. Heartbreaking. Gotta go cry myself to sleep now.

Morgenstern

You're not the only one. Multiple peeps here have already stated having the same feeling.

werafdsaew

Except that is exactly how she died? From our perspective she's making a big mistake, but from her perspective she is the last hero holding the darkness back sword in hand.

Liliet

She failed tho. The first charge succeeded (and she prevented the founding of the court), but the second to finish breaking the crown failed.

(That was by the way very stupid of her, though I guess she might not have heard what Tariq said about no-one being able to put it on and survive now)

Liliet

...actually she succeeded nm lmao

Liliet

That's about what I did 😊

Andrew Mitchell

I feel sorry, but not VERY sorry. I too would much prefer her to be around to take a swing at the Dead King.

Mental Mouse

Everyone keeps saying this, and I don't know why. She was powerful, but ultimately a one-trick pony. If she'd gone directly against the Dead King, he'd have swatted her and maybe sent her back as a Revenant.

Andrew Mitchell

Well, clearly she wouldn't be sent in alone against the Dead King. She'd go as part of a band with a plan.

Hardric62

Most impressive finishing move from Foundling here.

That being said, I do have one regret: the fact Cat will never be in a position where she gets the Saint of Bitches to reveal/rant about her big plan was to have Procer burn to cinders and hope something worthy would rise out of the ashes like she said to Cordelia in front of as many Alliance leaders as possible. That would have been so nice to see... Including the Saint of Bitches' likely slaughter of them to silence them (eh, there is a nice villain to take the fall just next to her), only for another revelation of failsafes of a shape or another revealing it was for nothing...

Liliet

I regret Laurence dying, and never coming to respect Catherine Foundling for what she truly is and her plan for what it truly is.

She was a good hero and a steadfast ally to those who needed her.

erebus42

Except the Procerans. But then again, they were Procerans so fuck em.

SpeckofStardust

People Stating Laurence is an unchanging fool-
"Some bargains compromise the very heart of what you are," the Saint replied. "You'll lose, Foundling. Call your minions back and let me end it the way it should have been done since the start."

I breathed out, steadied my stance.

"You're mortal," Laurence de Montfort sharply said.

-Does anyone here honestly think that saint was willing to let Cat live 10 chapters ago?

Shveiran

No. Considering she was also willing to gambel everything to prevent a compromise between Villains and Heroes being reached, fearing the consequence it would have as a precedent would be the direst threat to Calernia ever... does it matter?

She would have killed her EVENTUALLY. She would have killed her allies and destroyed all her works if given half a chance.

This is not the tragic loss of a beautiful friendship, stomped by fate before it ever bloomed. This is us finding out who among two powerful people with strong ideals unable to coexist actually survives to try and shape the world.

SpeckofStardust

The entire 5 man band was a compromise between heros and villains, This was the formation of an evil entity on the level of winter Cat, and then an agreement to leave it alone for 10 years. considering that they didn't have much time for making a deal that had no loopholes I consider it to be a bad thing and an Evil one, there is no compromise here.

Shveiran

It's not like you need many loopholes, here. The new Court doesn't have members, or baggage, or stories, or titles. All you need is for Indrani to swear she will never title anyone else, and it is a Court of one guaranteed. Add a clause about abdication in ten years or whatever, and you are golden. This isn't Winter, it doesn't have a millennia of weight behind it.

Shveiran

And that, kids, is why spellcasters are OP.

konstantinvoncarstein

In this case, priests

konstantinvoncarstein

#Codzilla

ninegardens

So, is it just me or is it that (once again), the obvious choice for the crown is infact Cat herself.

It'll kill her, and she won't be around to force through the Accords...

But in terms of Narrative weight, and diplomatic intent it checks all the boxes.

If Pilgrim and Roland come back and are basically "Yup, black queen sacrificed herself to save all your lives. Here's the treaty she was working on. BTW, the now have a short cut to the DK, and three months breathing room"...

Or would it being a "Villian" taint the realm too much?

... hmmm... might be a problem as far as the Drow go.

Andrew Mitchell

And a problem as far as the PGtE series goes... We (the readers) know Cat's going to make it to the end.

ninegardens

I mean obviously they won't do it, but it would be one hell of a twist for EE to kill off Cat a chunk before the end, and then just have nothing but interludes for 30 chapters.

TeK

As a final memento to Laurence, as a token of my appreciation for the character, despite common disdain of her, or more precise because of it. I genuinely liked her and it pins me that so many people happily cackle at the scene of her pointless, tragic, unnecesseary death. Gotta admit though, if not for her treatment that I considered unfair and my subsequent attempts of defending her, I would be far less attached to her.

So, let me be more concise: we are sure that Saint is wrong because a) her postion is antagonistic to Cat and Cat is the protagonist, so we have an expectation that she is right b) she is wrong in both common sence and a conventional korality of our world. Anyone suggesting killing people in droves so that heroes would get a power-up here is an unstable lunatic, no to ways about it. c) she, as was pointed out inverse, is unlikable. So we don't want her to be right.

But how sure are we that Cat is right? Maybe she is wrong. Maybe you can't build a better world with good intentions and desire to change it. Maybe her thinking is a passing anomaly, sson to join the annals of history, never to be seen again. I want her to be right.

But I also wanted for Saint to survive all the wars, and see the better world she had given everything to save. A better world she had given anything to prevent. I wanted her to see, with her own eyes, that she is wrong, and people can be changed for a better. That there are colors to the world, not black and white. And that the trust, once given, can bloom into a flower of unimaginable beauty. I wanted her to see, I guess, because there are many ways to die. But to die fighting against your comrades, for a goal you'll never met, derided and demonished by those on your side, to die fighting because you can not believe into a better world, to die, without hope, without closure.

It is a terrible way to go. And I wouldn't wish it to anyone. Much less to Saint.

Andrew Mitchell

Well said. Bravo!

TeK

I never really bought into "Hero hate" train, and GP is still (and was from the moment he appeared) one of my favorite characters. A genuine Good Guy. Not that I can't appreciate a good Villain when it comes, the fact that I could and can relate to Black Knight the most out of all the rouser of characters (and frankly, the presence of SUCH A RELATABLE CHARACTER was the reason I fell in love with this novel in the first place). He is just so much like me it's not even funny. Except for demisexuality, I am quite average at that. But everything else, from the box (although my method involves visualising myself feeling particular emotion and choking that self) through the cold practicality down to the seething rage against Heavens resulting in singleminded goal of "winning" he is what I would be, were I a character, an idealized version of myself. More clever, more driven, more ruthless, less constrained, more ambitious, more confident, just more. I can gush about similarities for hours, the self-identification as a cog, a tool, attempts to cast off humanity (and by attempts I mean that neither of us were successful) I honestly find more worth in following Amadeuses journey than in any other part of the Guide.

But for all our similarities, there is a key difference at our beliefs, and the reason why I do not share his seething hatred for Heroes. It is our views on agency and it's existence. I am much more closer to Masego in that regard, who is also somewhat relatable, although I never was anywhere on the spectrum, nor am I a genius. But the attempts to mechanise and rationalise social interactions were painfully realistic. So, in short, I share Zeze's position on existence of nature in place of agency. I do not believe in the freedom of choice, and while not believing in the destiny in the sence of predestined success or failure, I do believe that there was never any other way for me but to attempt to see my ambition through. I just can't.

And now that that's out of the way, let me explain why I not only do not hate/despise/dislike Saint, but think she is undeservingly hated.

For the most part, I find the reasons for hero hate quite simple. First, they are not protagonists, second they do not live up for our idealised versions of heroes straight out of comic books. Which I hate. I am not American, you see, I was not raised on comicbook culture. I find my version of heroism derived from my late country of birth – USSR. And the hero I associate with the word is an everyday hero. A simple laborer, with flaws, and stuff, not perfect, not ideal, not anything, just an average person going through the day and working to feed their family. Underwhelming, I know. But without those? We would not have a civilization. I utterly hate that culture of success when the only people deserving of aknowledgement, of notice are billionares of this world. Only exceptional are real. And simple people are just not here? They do not exist. I's allways leaders, geniuses, like thay whole belief in pivotal person, as if anyone can do something great alone. How many know about Alexander, and how many know about those who helped him get where he were? His father, who actually made Macedonia strong enough to take Persia later? His generals, his you know what? I think I got my point across.

So when I looked at the concept of the Guide, where average people fall by wayside and the Fate of the world is literally decided only in the clash of the handful of Named, I saw the people propagating my contempt for this scenario and got happy. Black's, Malicia's and Cat's way, is our way. Where institutions are far more powerful than an individual. But for all that I like that way, ironically, it is as much not the way of their world, as individualism is not the way of our world.

Barrendur

Ah, Laurence, peerless hero, you deserved better; you deserved a chance to live in the world you protected through the decades, not to die struck down by the fumbblings of a girl who believes in compromise only so long as it requires no meaningful concessions from her. Cat did not follow your example; Cat may not even have recognised your example as being one... and now, all I can offer are my thanks, Hero, for a life lived in sacrifice for the little people; thank-you for your service, and rest now in peace, knowing you did what had to be done and you did not flinch.

You will be sorely missed.

miles

Now put the crown on Saint! A broken crown for a dead hero, cut by her own hand before it killed her (ish) – the perfect long-term advantage for the good guys I'm sure.

Chapter 50: Sunset

"Blood freely spilled always offers greater power, for it carries the worth of both the blood and the choice."

– Extract from "The Most Noble Art of Magic", by Dread Emperor Sorcerous

"Huh," the Tyrant said. "That is not what I believed that would do."

I wheeled on him with cold eyes. For all that he'd helped me land the killing stroke on the Saint, he was also the reason there'd been a need for one at all. We'd been close to subduing her, before he'd decided to taunt Fate and loudly dare it to meddle. There would still have been the issue of the wounded crown, but Gods I would have preferred ending this without Laurence de Montfort's corpse on the ground. Not because of any deep affection for the heroine, though I'd had a few perturbing glimpses on this journey at the woman that lay under the zealotry, but because the Saint of Sword's death would both have a messy aftermath and rob us of someone who might have been able to truly hurt the Dead King. I'd begun this winter itching to put her down, but now... A virtue was no less of one because it belonged to an enemy, and for all her horrid flaws Laurence de Montfort had hardly been without the opposite. My hand had been forced, in the end, when the choice had been between a woeful roll of the dice and slaying her where she stood. But for all that the choice I'd made would stay with me, I would not for a moment forget who'd forced me to make it.

"This was," I said, "one betrayal too many, Kairos."

"There's no such thing, Catherine," he confidently told me. "And if there was, yet one more betrayal would see to it."

Shouldn't be too difficult to kill him, I thought. I had no intention of allowing anywhere near the decision yet to be made over the crown, or of sparing him after that last knife in the back, so ending this here and now before the Twilight Crown finished crumbling seemed the way to go about it. Kairos Theodosian still had a handful of attending gargoyles and more artefacts than anyone should have at their fingertips, but aside from that he was spent. He'd burned his strength against the Skein and then against me, shaken his sleeves enough that all his worst tricks had already been revealed. And while I was hardly fresh, above us two crows still slowly circled. Omens of death, and death was what I intended on delivering: if I need seek the helping hand of my patronesses for that, so be it. On the other hand, I grimly thought, there was still one last use left for the Tyrant of Helike tonight.

"There's one path that doesn't lead to me snatching the life out of you tonight," I coldly said. "And that's you putting on that crown."

"So it seems I am to die," the Tyrant pensively said, "unless, instead, I am to die. Truly, my friend, you present me with a dilemma."

"Burn enough bridges and you'll find there's no pretty path left," I bluntly said. "You just tried to get half of us killed by flapping your mouth, Kairos. Fuck the amnesty you bargained for: the last courtesy I offer you is deciding the shape of your grave."

The slightest flicker of power, but there were only so many times someone could use a trick around me before I caught on.

"Riddle me this, Catherine," the Tyrant cheerfully said. "What makes you think that-"

Night flooded me, bringing strength to my hands, and I crushed the obsidian scabbard still in my grasp. The powder that fell I blew through and, shaping the Night I threaded within it, cast it outwards. The obsidian dust revealed Kairos' glamoured silhouette as he tried to make for the door and the Night I'd sent out wove itself into a noose that delicately went around his neck. The end of that rope fell into my palm, and as the noose tightened my fingers closed around it.

"Well," Kairos Theodosian slowly said, glamour dispelling. "This is embarrassing."

"Don't pay attention to him," the glamour I'd been conversing with insisted. "He's an impostor."

I wound the Night rope around my fist and spread my stance to steady my footing.

"How's your dilemma coming along?" I asked.

"Bracingly," the Tyrant replied without missing a beat.

"Enough," the Grey Pilgrim tiredly said.

The streak of Light cut halfway through the rope of my own making, severing it clean. I was, bluntly put, too surprised by the old man's sudden turn to properly react.

"How many of us do you intend to slay tonight, Queen Catherine?" the Peregrine said. "Enough."

"If it's not him it'll have to be one of us," I pointed out. "There is no reason to spare him, Pilgrim. One might well argue he earned that end."

"Shall we speak of endings earned then, Black Queen?" the Grey Pilgrim replied, tone remote and eyes considering. "It would be an exchange of some consequence, I think."

"You can't be serious," I said. "You struck out too, Pilgrim. To contain her, as I wanted to. And the damned reason it had to go further than that was the Bard's fucking amnesty, which you insisted on—"

"I am well aware of what took place here tonight," the Peregrine harshly interrupted. "Are you? I'd just lent my hand to the killing of a woman I loved like kin and trusted just as deep. Those ties were already tried and tested when you were yet to be born, Catherine Foundling. I did this because the bargain you offer may yet save lives by the millions and lay the foundation of a long-lasting peace. But do not mistake that, not for a moment, as my having been suborned to your every whim."

"None of that means he should be sent home with a slap on the wrist," I hissed.

"A trusted and farsighted comrade has asked me to spare the Tyrant's life," he flatly said. "And so it will be spared, no matter the nasty tricks he may play."

"You are the hero of my heart, Grey Pilgrim," Kairos Theodosian said, picking out the Night noose still around his neck and dropping it to the floor. "In the spirit of my deep gratitude, I would offer-"

The weight that fell over the room was almost a familiar thing. Above us Sve Noc spared a glance, and so my knees were not made to buckle, but the Tyrant of Helike was offered no such protection. The odd-eyed villain collapsed, first on one knee and then outright to the ground for that leg's shaking. Twitching on the stone floor, Kairos rasped out a pained breath as the Grey Pilgrim stared down at him. Sharing that gaze, the Choir of Mercy looked upon the Tyrant without the slightest speck of compassion.

"You are not forgiven, Kairos Theodosian," the Peregrine said, voice ringing with power. "You will yet serve a greater purpose, and for that you will be allowed to crawl out of this place through filth and dust. But you are not forgiven, you creature of ruin and perfidy."

The Tyrant twitched on the floor still and I realized with a start it was as much from his convulsing body as a shivering laughter ripping out of his throat.

"Coward," he gasped. "Even now Mercy holds your hand. Coward."

The old man strode forward, dusty grey robes trailing behind him, and he knelt before the cripple before laying a hand over his lips.

"Through lies and deception you have brought great suffering," the Grey Pilgrim said. "And so from you I take that poisonous gift: never again will you speak untruth, lest it be the last words you speak at all."

Radiant light blinded my eyes, for a heartbeat, and through the Pilgrim's touch I felt the Ophanim reach out into Creation. This would be a curse, if a villain had been the one to place it. I wondered what it was to be called, when a heroic hand had done the placing. My brow furrowed. Would lying make Kairos make a mute or kill him? It'd not been clear, by the phrasing. Looking at the Peregrine's shoulders, I wondered if that'd been on purpose. The Tyrant's body shuddered one last time, like someone whose fever was going the way of the grave, and only then did his twitching end. He exhaled a ragged breath.

"This is not," Kairos Theodosian guffawed, "the last you've seen of me."

Mismatched eyes going wide, he looked up and waited. A moment passed and he did not die.

"Best get crawling then, I suppose," the Tyrant of Helike mused. "Until next time, friends."

Without a hint of shame he flipped onto his belly and began dragging his expensive robes through the filth, fleeing the throne room like a snake slithering on the ground. Three heartbeats later the last remaining gargoyles ran out after him, as quick as their little legs allowed. I debated, seriously, reaching for the Night and just vaporizing the back of his head. The temptation was there, made even heavier by the way the odds were good I'd manage it. But if I did, it wasn't the story that'd punish me. I'd be, in essence, breaking off ties with the Grey Pilgrim. Which I couldn't afford to, if the Accords were to be more than a waste of ink and parchment.

"That was a mistake," I finally said.

"If it was," the Grey Pilgrim said, "then it was mine to make. Not yours."

I kept my face calm but winced beneath it. Already the cracks were beginning to run through what I'd wanted to be the foundations of the Liesse Accords. And it wasn't fair, I thought, for there was plenty of fault to spare and divide. But in the end, the Peregrine had stuck to our arrangement and helped slay the same woman whose life he'd bargained for. I could not truly ask more of him or begrudge his bitterness over having been led to this pass.

"If you're quite finished," Archer spoke up, "then I could use a hand, Pilgrim. I'm usually concerned only with hitting heads, not what comes after. Does he need healing?"

She'd propped up the Rogue Sorcerer over her knee, supporting the back of his neck. The Saint had knocked Roland unconscious, but aside from a red boot mark on his forehead the spellcaster should have no lasting marks. A concussion seemed likely, though, Named or not. The Pilgrim hurried to the younger hero's side, wielding Light with a delicate touch for but a few moments before the Sorcerer woke. The mark, I noted, had gone from bright red from light pink but it still remained highly visible.

"She's dead then," Roland croaked out, eyes going to the heroine's corpse. "Gods, what a waste."

"So it was," I quietly agreed.

His eyes, for once without trace of a coloured ring around the pupil, met mine.

"Your work?" he asked.

I nodded. Behind us, as is mocking the quiet of the conversation now taking place, the crown continued lashing out around itself with tendrils of sorcery.

"Whoever bears that will die," the Rogue Sorcerer frankly said. "I'd be like trying to grip a naked blade as tight as you can, only with your soul instead of your fingers."

The Saint of Swords' last kill, unerringly made from beyond the grave. Her aged figure still lay sprawled at the foot of the throne, still and silent. No one had dared to touch it.

"Look like the choice was made for us," Archer said, seemingly amused. "We're back at making a god and killing it, whether we like it or not."

"There is no choice to make," Tariq evenly said.

And already I could see the lay of that, how it'd unfold. A band of five assembled before the eyes of princes and princesses of Procer had gone into broken Arcadia at the urging of the Black Queen, among them perhaps the two most famous heroes alive. Neither the Regicide nor the Peregrine would return from that journey. The treacherous Tyrant of Helike would escape with but a curse, and from the heroes the only survivor would be the Rogue Sorcerer – a hero little known, and a mage to boot. Sorcery was not well-trusted, in Procer, and seemingly rare in Levant.

We'd be at war again before Morning Bell, bargain or not.

"Agreed," I said. "It'll have to be me."

Three gazes turned to me, Archer's the least surprised.

"You said it was possible resurrection would work," I reminded the Pilgrim. "And dawn comes. If it doesn't, well... Vivienne's been designated as heiress to the throne. I wish she'd had longer to prepare, but we don't always get to choose."

"No," Indrani said.

I blinked at her.

"You've cheated death too many times, Cat," she bluntly said. "You've always squeaked out of it so far because you had a story at your back, but this time the wind's going the other way. You've spent your luck thrice over, this is just going to get you killed."

"It'll get someone killed regardless," I said. "I don't relish the thought I might not come back from this, Indrani, but I knew the risk when I began going down this path."

"That's nice," Archer casually said. "Very stirring. But if you take so much as a step in that crown's direction, I'll knock you the fuck out."

She was, I realized as I looked at her stony expression, absolutely serious. It was a strange thing, to both love and be furious with someone in the same moment for the same reason.

"It cannot be you, Queen Catherine," the Grey Pilgrim agreed. "You underestimate the depth of the loyalties you have earned, and not only here. The Army of Callow would carry your corpse to the gates of Salia to make a funeral pyre of it. And I shudder to think of what the drow would be, without their designated conscience."

"It can't be you either," I hissed. "You think it'll go bad if I die? Hells, Pilgrim, your death alone would have Levant on the warpath but the Saint and you? Even if the First Prince turned up just to order the Alliance armies down there not to fight we'd still have a battle on our hands."

"Then it has to be me," the Rogue Sorcerer tightly said. "Archer has already been resurrected once, there is not even a chance of her being spared lasting death."

He shuddered out a breath.

"It will have to be me," Roland repeated. "It makes sense. I am the only practitioner among you, who best to shape this realm in what is needed of it?"

"At a guess? The only person in this room to have ruled over a court of the fae before," I said.

"Cat, you can't be trusted to make a choice like that right now," Indrani frankly said. "Whenever there's a blunder – and I'm guessing you count the Saint's death as one – you always get all... self-flagellating. Like you're just looking for a sword to fall on. Pilgrim says it's good politics to keep you alive? Even better. I don't really give a shit, though. I'd rather cut the damn thing than let you put it on."

"You can't think like that, Archer," I sharply said. "I'm one life. That's the weight on the scale. You'd be putting at risk hundreds of thousands-"

"Then it's a good thing I'm not one of Above's footsoldiers, isn't it?" Archer said. "I get to be selfish if I want to."

I wasn't going to make headway there, was I? Touched as I was, I was just as infuriated. Because I couldn't be grateful for this, not when it might cost the world so much for her to follow through. Who was it, I'd wondered, who'd taught her to love people on her own terms – much as I wanted to blame the Lady of the Lake for it, the dark suspicion lingered it might just have been me.

"It will not be you," the Pilgrim said. "Nor will it be Roland."

Though he'd gone pale at the notion of perhaps embracing his own death, I felt a sliver of admiration for the way the Sorcerer didn't simply take the first way out he was offered.

"The Black Queen was correct," Roland said. "There may be war, if you are the one crowned and killed."

"My death will echo," the Grey Pilgrim said, cocking his head to the side. "I have been promised this. There will not be war."

The Ophanim agreed with this? Godsdamned angels.

"You're needed to keep the heroes together," I said. "There's no one else with the pull."

Maybe, and I would not have put a lot of faith in that prospect, maybe the Saint could have succeeded at that. She'd had the strength, if not the charisma.

"The White Knight will return," the Pilgrim serenely said. "He was already on his way."

"The Tyrant had plans about him," I said.

"I expect he does," the Peregrine said, undertone amused. "It will come to nothing, under the stern glare of the Seraphim."

"It might be that you could forgive my death," the Rogue Sorcerer hesitantly said. "None could do the same, for you."

"Forgiveness was never meant to be a salve for every wound made on Creation," the Pilgrim gently said. "It was a gift to be handed out in the face of grave injustice. And there is no injustice, Roland, in an old man being allowed to rest at last."

"So you're just going to lie down and die?" I said.

There was a heartbeat of silence.

"The Saint of Swords is dead," I said. "We all had a hand in that, mine looming largest by far. But that's it, Pilgrim? Your friend is dead and you feel tired, so you're choosing death when Calernia is facing its harshest test since the reign of Triumphant?"

"Queen Catherine," the Sorcerer hissed. "There is no need for-"

"You've done some real nasty things over the years, haven't you Tariq?" I said. "We both know you have."

The old man's blue eyes, limpid as a cloudless summer sky, met mine.

"You don't get to roll over for death, after crossing those lines," I said. "After taking on that responsibility."

"Which of us are you truly haranguing, Black Queen?" the Grey Pilgrim chided me, not unkindly.

"I think I'll get away with it," I pensively replied. "I really do."

Because I'd been here before. Twice. At this crossroads, making this call. I'd chosen death to rid myself of a pattern of three with the Lone Swordsman and taken my due resurrection from the Hashmallim after refusing the crown they offered me. I'd chosen death once more to slip the bindings the Diabolist had entwined me in, making myself the beastly keystone to her demise, and refused the crown she offered me. Liesse had been the crucible of my existence in a way nowhere else in this world could claim to be. Which of my triumphs and ruins had not been born of this place, or taken place among it? Here in this city I'd forged my claim of power over Callow not once but twice – first through bargain, and then through simple might. I'd struck a pact here that allowed Akua Sahelian to govern this place, and when that governance led to folly it was on these grounds I'd torn through her heart. Indrani said I'd cheated my demise too often, and perhaps she was right. Twice, here, I had tricked life out of death. But there'd never been a third, for before I'd woken in the depths of the Everdark mortal once more I'd dreamt and within that dream asked Sve Noc a question: am I dead? And the reply had been: at the threshold. Not through. Not quite dead. And so, I thought, Archer might be wrong in this.

Maybe I did still have a story at my back: twice living through death after twice being offered a crown. There was power in reiteration, in repetition, and few numbers had heavier hand on a story than three. Or, I knew, this might be where the pattern came to a close. This once I'd be reaching for the crown, and so my death would remain. It could go either way, I felt. Yet even then, I had a better chance of living through this than any of the other three. Rolling the dice on poor odds had always been one of my worst habits, I thought, but why stop now? You only lived once – give or take a few times.

"Three times I've been offered a crown here, by someone neither fully friend nor foe," I began. "Three times-"

Archer, sighing, slid behind me and to my indignation she covered my mouth with her palm and put me in a chokehold. I began struggling, but she was Named and I was not: the disparity in strength could not be breached my mundane means.

"Is that... necessary?" the Rogue Sorcerer delicately asked.

"If you feel like you're winning," Indrani said, "the single stupidest thing you can do is let Catherine Foundling talk. Go on, Tariq. Before she turns it around on us."

I reached for the Night, preparing to force her back as gently as I could, but it slipped through my fingers. Fear rose up in me, and I looked up. The Sisters were perched on the edges of the gutted throne room, one to the east and one to the west. They watched, silent.

Are you worthy? Komena asked, a whisper in my ear.

Patrons, I thought. Not tools or companions but goddesses of which I was the high priestess. If I set a measure in their name, I would be measured by it. It was, I admitted, brutally fair of them.

I have brought us here, through scheme and steel, I told them. I've tricked mortals and Named, set the Dead King aflight and freed from his grasp the last of the Fairfaxes. I have slain and won victories, all to bring this journey to an end of my making. Who can be worthy, if not me?

Sve Noc watched me, judged me, and in inscrutable silence passed their judgement.

All will be Night, Andronike whispered in my ear, and it tasted like assent.

Indrani knew me best, and so when the goddess-crows above let out a cacophonous caw she immediately tried to knock me unconscious. Unfortunately I knew her as well, and so restored not to struggle but to the first trick I'd even seen one of the Firstborn use: sinking into a pool of Night at my feet, I dissolved into a tendril of shadow and followed forward. Even in that strange, unpleasant state I could feel the clash of Sve Noc and the Choir of Mercy – both attempting to hinder the others' champion and prevent their foe from hindering their own. They were, at least in that moment, each other's match. I could hardly see, when shadowed, for unlike drow this state of being did not come naturally to me. I had to leap back into mortal form to get my bearings, though fortunately I found myself not far from the throne. From the corner of my eye I found Indrani, having strung her bow, nocking an arrow and likely intending to wing me before I could claim the crown. The Sorcerer's jaw was tightly clenched as he worked some manner of sorcery, but it'd be too late.

Sidestepping the Saint's corpse, I reached for the crown.

My fingers went through it

The illusion broke, now that I knew it was there, and so did the one the Rogue Sorcerer had woven around the Peregrine. The Grey Pilgrim took the wounded crown, set with his own star, and placed it upon his brow.

"No," I shouted.

Like it was the most natural thing in the world, the Grey Pilgrim leaned down and gently pried the Saint of Swords' blade from her cold hands.

And, just as gently, rammed it through his own heart.

Satan

I wonder if Cat can steal the Pilgrim's resurrection and use it on him. He'd probably end up a powerless geriatric, but it sounds like a story.

Jago

Till this last chapter, I did think that the Fairfax King revenant was the solution.
And with the death of the Grey Pilgrim we lose the best healer that could help Masego.

Chapter 51: Twilight

"Of all Praesi I trust least those who come bearing gifts."
– Queen Yolanda of Callow, the Wicked (known as 'the Stern' in contemporary histories)

There was a part of me still, after all these years, that expected the momentous to be flagrant. That the closing of an era or the birth of a realm should be an affair of thunder and lightning, a crashing and crackling storm of power. But that was so rarely the way, wasn't it? The pivots of history that we all got to see, the speeches and battles and coronations, they so often flowed from unseen turns taken months before. Quiet bargains and private councils, decisions made in the dark. Yet I had learned that the truth of Creation was that while at times power in exercise was deafening, more often it was hushed. Subtle. And as the ending that was breathed into the Twilight Court came from the Grey Pilgrim – Mercy's patient, farsighted and indirect hand – why would its coming be a raucous thing?

Tariq Fleet-foot, the sword of his oldest friend through the heart, let out a soft gasp and slumped onto the throne. Blue eyes fluttered to a close as trails of scarlet tainted the dusty grey of his robes: death blooming in three hues, painted by the Peregrine's own hand. The Pilgrim's face loosened slowly from a clench decades in the making, and as he sagged down against the throne he let out one last shuddering breath. That shudder rippled out, the last will of a man whose life had been a thankless struggle to lessen suffering in a world so very intent on wounding itself time and time again. It was a death that would ring out across Calernia, I thought. One not easily forgotten. Yet, looking at the white-haired healer who'd stumbled back with a sword through his chest, I could not help but believe it had been a lesser ending than he'd deserved. I'd had my quarrels with the Grey Pilgrim, but never once had I thought him malevolent or deliberately vicious. The shudder I'd felt slowly faded, and in deference to the death of a man who had tried so very hard to be a good I closed my eyes. I had no prayers to offer, for the goddesses I kept to were not the kind whose attentions would have been welcomed by the Pilgrim, and so I remained silent instead.

The roof that would have been above our heads had been ripped away by my own wrath, when I'd hunted down Kairos Theodosian meaning to kill him, and so the lazy summer breeze reached us unhindered. It shook me out of my daze, enough that I opened my eyes and looked up. What had been darkness above us, Masego's grief and madness given shape, had become something softer. Almost wistful. It was closer to night than day, to my eye, but the shade of the twilight writ across the firmament of this realm was a pale and starry blue. Speaking not a word, I limped out of this cursed room. The summit of the tall stone stairs beyond the bronze gates allowed me to stand and take in the breathtaking sight splayed below: what had once been a ruin of dust and flame was now a realm in truth. The Hierophant's devastating use of this broken realm had been turned into something beautiful: a sprawling kingdom of tall grasses and rolling hills, of shadowy rivers and secret paths. It was a warm evening, like a southern summer's, yet the breeze was soft and its caress almost playful. It was the kind of night, I thought, that would be a pleasure to journey through.

I wondered if a young man called Tariq had once roamed a twilight much like this one, a very long time ago in a land far from here.

If the echo of that memory had been enough to leave its mark on this place. For that this was the inheritance of the Peregrine there could be no denial: just as it had been set on the Twilight Crown, the pilgrim's star shone above in the starry sky.

"It's beautiful," the Rogue Sorcerer quietly said.

I'd not even heard him approach, too deeply lost in my thoughts. Long leather coat trailing at his back, the last of the three heroes to have heeded my call came to stand at my right. He was looking not only at this starlit realm below but also had what had been made of thrice-broken Liesse. The City of Swans had partaken of life breathed into this place, and though it was not the same city that'd once been the jewel of southern Callow I could still see the traces of that place in its fresh face. The ruins had not been raised anew but the sight of them had been... eased by the growth of greenery. Tall shaded trees had become the pillars of slender basilicas, gutted churches turned into ethereal gardens of flowers in shades of dusk. Vines with umbral flowers bound together streets like strange arches and soft grass had grown through both pavestones and graveyards. Liesse, I thought, had become the City of Twilight. A resting place for pilgrims and the lost, bell towers and softs beds of moss awaiting all who'd wander to this cradle of tragedy. I found my throat choking at the sight. How could it not, when Tariq's last gesture had been to make beauty out of the broken shards of my bitterest failure?

"The star's always watching," Archer softly said, having come to stand at my left. "You old rascal. Keeping an eye on it all, are you?"

How strange, that I found the thought comforting when the man had tried to kill me more than once.

"He always did," Roland said, tone quietly fierce. "Gods, he was not a perfect man. And there are things he did, that he asked us to do... But he looked out for us. Even when it cost him. Especially when it cost him."

It was not a grand eulogy, for a man who for good and ill had done so much for so many years, but I couldn't truly mind. What kind of words could any of us say that would be more than a pittance to the living, breathing tribute to the Grey Pilgrim that was around us?

"I wished I'd never had to fight him," I simply said, the honesty of it feeling a little too raw. "I wish it'd never come to this. But we so rarely get to choose, don't we?"

"Then win, Black Queen," the Rogue Sorcerer said, eyes burning as they met mine. "Because this was not nothing. Two great stars fell to forge this realm you promised, two servants of Above like few before and few will ever come again. It has to matter. Or else..."

He trailed off, though it was not a threat. It was almost a petition and more than a little desperate. Or else what did their lives mean? Their tears and blood and decades of bitter struggle to bring just a little light to Calernia? If the fall of such old and honoured stars meant not a thing, what could any of us ever hope to amount to?

"This war has only just begun," I softly said. "It will take us to Salia, to forge a peace. It will take us to Keter, to visit upon the Dead King what he has so often visited upon us. But there's another enemy, Sorcerer. She breaks kings with sentences and topples kingdoms with but the lightest of touches. None of this can end before she'd been killed. For good."

Roland dipped his head, not in acceptance but at least in acknowledgement.

"It seems," he said, "that we have much to speak about."

That we did, I silently agreed, dipping my own head in a return of courtesy. But not here, not now. Not looking at what could either be taken as a last breath of life freely gifted or an entire realm made into the mausoleum of good intentions.

"Not dawn yet, I think," Archer said. "But close. It might be time to go back, Catherine."

She was right, I knew. The Pilgrim had promised that the manner of his death would assure there was no war between the Grand Alliance and my own armies, but his death would still be catastrophic to relations between my people and the opposition. The Tyrant of Helike, by now, would not doubt have crawled back to his armies and begun his hasty retreat. There would be fears to quell, explanations to give, and more duties to see to than there were hours to either night or day. I should go back, for though the triumvirate of Vivienne, Juniper and Hakram could see to much of the situation there were parts that could only be settled by my own intervention. Fearsome as those three could be, my reputation loomed taller still.

"Go," I said. "I'll follow."

Indrani cast a look at me, half worried and half hesitant.

"Are you sure that-"

"Go," I repeated, a tad more sharply.

Her jaw tightened with displeasure, but she did not test me further. I did not have it in me to be furious at Indrani for getting in my way tonight, not right now – it was like the Pilgrim's death had replaced sentiment in me with some manner of exhaustion – but her actions there would not go unanswered. It would be a thorny knot to untangle, this mess we'd made together, for she had died and we'd both need knives sheathed if we were to help Masego out of the worst of his grief. But she'd not trusted me, in the end, even if her intentions had been guided by love of me. That would need to be addressed, lest the wound fester between us.

"Archer can guide you out," I told Roland. "She has a knack for paths like these."

He nodded, though his face was unsure.

"Come along, Rogue," Archer said, tone thick with forced cheer. "We're all in a need of a stiff drink after a night like this, and there's none to be had here."

No elaborate farewells followed, as they simply disappeared into the city below. Indrani would find a way out, as she had first found a way in when seeking Masego. The Lady of the Lake had shared knowledge with her I'd not asked the lay of, long aware that the keeping of her teacher's secrets was one of the few things Indrani considered sacred. I sat, after they'd gone, resting my bad leg against the rough granite steps. But for all that I was tired, it was a restless weariness that'd settled over me. Before long I was hobbling down into Liesse, through the broken palace of the proud and ancient House of Caen – gone from Callow, like the city they'd once ruled. Above me, shadows among the shade, crows flew beneath the starry sky. I had no destination in mind to guide my steps, little more than a wandered in a realm of wanderers. Feeling the breeze stirring my hair, cooling my sweat in the crook of my neck, I passed through the garden that'd been made of Liesse. I trailed my fingers through luminous bushes bearing wine red flowers, limped through fields of soft grass made silver by starlight. It was a surreal city, and one where it would be easy to become lost. Yet I came upon a place, in time, where the scent of old deaths lingered. It'd been a basilica, once, before the walls were shattered.

Now all that remained of whatever beauty there'd been were tall panes of stained glass whose colour had faded, whatever scene they'd once depicted now instead a mere game of blue shades. There had been pillars, within, and though half-crumbled they'd become intertwined with thick and twisty trees bearing small red fruits. Yews, I thought, and what had once been a temple of worship to the Gods Above had instead become a manner of shaded grove, leading to a yew elder and larger than any of the others. It towered tall and broad, its branches spreading out far in a great crown of leaves. The wind set something akin to chimes tinkling when it passed through the branches, and it was when I saw the face of those chimes I understood the source of the taste of death. The ragged remains of a tabard that'd once depicted the golden bells of House Fairfax trailed like streamers, tangled among them the broken shards of the armour last borne by the Good King Edward. Halfway sunken into the earth at the foot of the great tree the last Fairfax's sword shone from an errant ray of light, the blade still pristine and sharp. I slowly approached, in almost reverent silence: the King of Callow had cowed the Hells themselves, for a time, and done it with little more than will and spite.

The crows threaded through the branches and took perch with only the slightest murmur of a sound heralding them, their shadowy feathers melding into the penumbra of the great yew. They looked, I thought, as if they belonged here. My fingers softly lid across the grip of the sword once wielded by Edward Fairfax, and I smiled mirthlessly.

"In northern Callow," I said, "the yew is known as the tree of death. In the south and the heartlands it's the elder trees they claim to be that omen, but even in Laure the story was told different."

I flicked a glance upwards and found my patron goddesses silent yet watchful.

"It's because of the Deoraithe," I told them. "Their longbows, they're made from yew. And for a very long time, there was no sight half as dreaded in Callow or Praes as a company of Daoine longbowmen. There were older superstitions, too, but in my eyes it was the centuries of reaping lives that hung death on the branches of yews."

And still my only answer was silence.

"So this is how it goes," I softly said. "I take up again the sword I lost in the Everdark, and bring war to the Crown of the Dead. It's an old story. Well-worn, and strong for it."

King Edward had been taller than me, I thought, with broader shoulders as well. And yet, I suspected that if ripped that sword free from the earth it would fit my hand perfectly. Better than any other blade ever hand.

"The world spins on," I said. "No matter who lies buried. And so that is the sum of us: we fight and we die and if we're lucky we're remembered for a while still."

All we'd schemed and struggled and bled, and still this night hadn't belonged to any of us. How could it? When the crabs dragged each other down the only victor to be had was the bucket.

"No," I murmured. "I think not."

My fingers left the sword I would not claim.

"Am I not your high priestess, Sve Noc?" I said. "First Under the Night?"

"So you are," Andronike said.

"In this, we are satisfied," Komena said.

"Then as your priestess I make this claim – we can do better than this," I called out to the twin shadows among the branches. "Than a ruin of a victory, handed to us by kindly hand. I don't care if we've been tricked and tripped by the Intercessor or the Dead King or even fate itself. We can do better than this, and so this story has not come to an end."

I laid my palm against the rough bark of the yew, looking up through the branches.

"I heard you, Good King," I whispered. "Your warning. I hear and heed, so lend me your aid when I yet stumble."

Under the twilight sky the great yew groaned and twisted, the scent of death in the air thickening until I could taste it on the tip of my tongue. From the crown of the tree a branch dropped, slender desiccated deadwood still echoing of defiance in the face of the end. I knelt to take it, and found it was of excellent height and yield for me to lean on as I walked.

"We will not go gently," I promised to the tree-grave of the last Fairfax. "And we are not yet done."

Turning my back to the grove abruptly, I limped away leaning on the yew branch-staff. The grounds I had tread I tread once more, returning to the summit of the City of Twilight. Through grass and grove, through thorns and flowers and streets of worn stone. Behind me, as if trailing, Sve Noc followed on inky wings. I climbed the great steps of granite, and as I forced open the great gates of bronze I had never closed two great crows claimed my shoulders as their perch. Within awaited silence and something else, for though the Grey Pilgrim still sat dead on his throne with the Saint sprawled at his feet they were not alone.

Like a solemn tribunal, or some aerie of angels, the Choir of Mercy stood vigil over its fallen champion.

Under the stars a multitude of tall and thin silhouettes stood, the only marks of their presence silhouettes like a heat shimmer and ever-spinning eyes like wheels of flame. There were dozens and dozens of them, all bent as if in grief. None turned as I entered the throne room and my own back was coated in starlight, but the weight of their attention was felt nonetheless. I could almost hear a song being sung, as if the wind was carrying to my ear parts of a faraway refrain, and what little I could make out was... heartbroken. Melancholy in a way I was not sure I – or any mortal – could truly understand. The barest fraction of that feeling was enough to put a stutter to my step.

"You actually loved him, didn't you?" I said, voice wondering. "Or as close to that as you can."

They answered not. Whatever manner of mourning the angels bore, they would not share it with me. It took a single step forward, and as if a sword had been unsheathed a myriad of burning, spinning eyes turned to me. I swallowed dryly, for though Sve Noc were at my side and I knew well their power the Choir of Mercy was older and colder both, when it deemed it necessary.

"You can't bring him back," I said. "I understand. There's rules, and it's not in your nature to make exceptions."

The attention never wavered nor lessened in intensity.

"But I'm not you," I said. "Your rules don't bind me. And if you let me, I will."

I suspected, that if not for the Sisters sinking their talons deep enough into my flesh I bled I would have passed out. The blinding light and heat I felt, for just a moment, would have seen me fall to my knees if not for the staff in my hand. And yet it'd not been strike, for within that heat and light I'd heard whispers and while the words I'd not understood their meaning I'd somehow grasped anyway.

"Why?" I repeated.

It was a fair question, I supposed.

"Because I can, so I should," I said. "Because even when he was my enemy I did not believe him to be a bad man. Because..."

I struggled to find the words to express it, but perhaps the simplest truth was best.

"Because I don't want to be at war with you or him," I quietly said. "And the moment you choose to believe that, the war's over."

And I supposed I was a fool, thinking I could make peace with a Choir even if its virtue was that of mercy, but I owed it to all of us at least to try.

"We kill you," I said, "you kill us. The wheel keeps spinning, the world keeps bleeding. And maybe that can't be mended, maybe there's just something about mortals that's all teeth and hunger and it'll never go away no matter what we make of ourselves – but we can do better than this!"

I gestured at the room around us, the realm around us, but I meant more. I meant the armies below, at each other's throats even in the face of annihilation. I meant the Named scraping each other raw until even the noblest beginnings and the finest intentions became knives to hack at each other with. I meant Praes, hungry and wealthy, and Callow, sated and poor, each capable of helping the other but forever clawing at themselves instead.

"Please," I said. "I know you don't make exceptions, and I won't ask you to. All you need to do is to stand aside."

We stood there, the Choir of Mercy and the Arch-heretic of the East, and a long moment passed.

They stood aside.

Heart beating wildly I limped forward, until I stood by Tariq's corpse. He would have looked to be sleeping, if not for the sword through his heart. Night flickered through my veins, strengthening my limbs, and the Sisters flew up cawing like grim omens. I eased out the Saint's blade, spilling blood all over myself, and dropped it to the side. And then, without warning, I stuck my arm into the Grey Pilgrim as the thief of Bestowal that I was. Three aspects awaited: a star, an eye and a prayer. It was the last I ripped out, a whisper of Forgive touching my mind. My fingers withdrew a small receptacle of wood, which I slid open with shaking fingers. There was a fine red powder within, and a power that would have blinded me if I'd tried to gaze upon it.

"Time to rise, pilgrim of grey," I murmured. "There's still work to be done."

I blew out a breath, and the powder scattered across the dead man's face. A long moment massed, once more, and my stomach tightened.

Then, above us in the sky, the pilgrim's star winked out.

Tariq's mouth opened to a ragged gasp, and within the depths of Liesse death was cheated for the third time at my hand.

Author Unknown

See this here? This is why PGtE has over twice as many votes as second place on topwebfiction.

Hitogami

Damn right!

James, Mostly Harmless

When I write this comment, Guide has more votes than the next three stories combined!

NerfContessa

And rightly so.

Wow, I did not see that coming. Pilgrim is likely to be...
Cross for being back and his powers being crippled. Still,...
Wow.

Hitogami

And once again, Cat blows me away! Wow!
Thank you for this chapter

Paerofar

That is a beautiful chapter. Thank you from the bottom of my heart for continuing to exceed my expectations.

Morgenstern

Beautiful(ly moving) the whole way, through. Thank you.
A fitting eulogy – and then... so much more. Second chances are even more beautiful still, aren't they.

DD

I dunno. I mean, I love it but...
How did Cat retain a vestige of Take without a Name? Did I miss or misunderstand something?
Long time fan and supporter, but this seems a weakness in the story to me.

Drake

The purview of her gods is theft of power. It's what the Drow are. It resonated with what she was.

vorellaraek

It's not an aspect anymore, it's something she gets from Sve Noc. Her version of the way the Drow kill each other for magic and Night.

fireinsideincites

It's not a vestige of Take. It's part of her due as the First Priestess Under Night. One of their main tenets is the worthy take, the worthy rise. Just as the drow can take the knowledge and power of other drow, she has co-opted it into taking the bestowals of named. See the chapter about after the death of the Thief of Stars for more detail

Novice

Yep, and to add to this, Cat has been harvesting aspects out of dead heroes even before Everdark. She's been doing this ever since she became essentially the Sovereign of Moonless Nights.

Mennolt van Alten

Not only does the worth of Cat mean she can take, as the high priestess she can decide who is worthy... Worthy to rise in this case.

Novice

You missed a major plot point and so many story beats if you're still wondering about that this far out into the story. You're clearly not paying attention.

certainlight

I don't get it. Someone asks a clarification question, someone else replies. You reply yourself with this insult, then you follow up with some useful information 4 minutes later under the previous comment. Why not just be constructive, rather than leaving insult?

Andrew Mitchell

We can never fully understand why people act the way they do.

I like to think that Novice was just having a bad day or moment or whatever and was just feeling a bit pissed at something else as they were writing this response. And made the response quite negative and unhelpful.

Providing a helpful response a few minutes later indicates to me that Novice was probably regretting their first response and was wishing WordPress had a delete function.

I have some empathy with this because I have been known to do similar things in other forums.

goliath1303

U know this was an old comment and it's mostly been answered, but I wanted to expand on what was already said in case anyone else is confused. When Cat became Sovereign of Moonless Nights she lost the Name of Squire and her Aspects along with it. Who she became during that time and since was shaped by those early days as the Squire though. She lost Fall, but still had her domain due to being fae royalty. We know that Larat and the Princess of High Noon both had domains a well. Larat mentioned that Cat's looked a lot like his and we saw Sulia's when she fought the Woe. She also kept a version of Take. In its original form she was able to take an Aspect used near/against her. When she did it that way she kept it until she claimed something else, with restrictions on its use. She was able to use Rise 3 times per day with diminishing returns each time. In its current incarnation though she is able to take one Aspect from a defeated or dead Named. Instead of a limited number of users per day, while keeping it until she Takes something else, this form only has one use. It also has a physical manifestation. She doesn't know what she's taking until she claims it, all she gets is a "feel" for what it is. The first time she did this it was in the form a whistle. I think that might have been her taking Call from Diabolist and summoning the Weeks Hunt for the first time, but don't quote me on that. Another example we've seen was with the Thief of Stars when she took an Aspect that looked like a wishbone and allowed her to escape the binding Masego tried to use on her at the beginning of this arc. I know there were more, I just can't think of any right now.

Mike E.

Damn, did not expect any of that last scene.

Edgar Vea

This was a cop out, I mean doing better is satisfying but they should have had to deal with it and also who do you think the mysterious she is either augur or the first prince of procer.

Big I

"She" probably ly refers to the Wandering Bard.

Gibborim

... .. You mean the Wandering Bard?

Fable

This was explained earlier, when the Thief of Stars was killed. She remembers the power, and serves the twin goddesses of looting. It is definitely different, as Take required the hero to live, and the stolen power could be reused. But the harvested wishbone to Abscond with, and the powder to Forgive, were both one time use only.

yee

The Wandering Bard is in fact the Dream Emperor Treacherous who killed and replaced the original one centuries ago.

Ein

You all know what's going to happen when the alliance army passes through the area again...

Abigail comes back from a scouting trip. "Hey guys, look at this cool sword I found just sticking out of the ground by a tree!"

Abiforqueen

I would love that so much!

Forum Explorer

a beautiful chapter

Kwabena Yiadom

Breath taking, loved every second of it. This is getting so good I am afraid it will stop living up to my expectations and then I'd be crushed. For now though the Guide "best online novel ever". I wonder how deeply tied to twilight, if at all the Pilgrim would be.

certainlight

I'm wondering the same. Pilgrim doesn't have room for any new Aspects that could tie to a domain, and we have no evidence that resurrection changes ones Name or Aspects. This also implies that Pilgrim has never been raised previously, unless it is simply his particular Aspect that can't be used twice and not the idea of resurrection itself. Discussions regarding Cat getting resurrected seemed to keep this option possible even though she has died and been restored before, so it suggests Aspect limitation (or maybe a Choir thing).

I bet personality-wise, after Laurence and now being dead and ripped back into life, he'll be a little...grumpier? And interesting what this might mean when he fights the dead King; did he gain anything in death that can be an advantage, or will it swing the other way? With Cat (who's died and been resurrected by Hash) and Pilgrim (who's died and been resurrected by allowance of his Choir), we're approaching another power of three to face a Dead King; seems fitting.

Mental Mouse

Hmm. All three of Cat's resurrections have been directly at the hands of god-tier entities (Choir of Contrition, King Winter, Sve Noc). I'm guessing that Pilgrim's resurrection will generally follow the rules for his Aspect, but it also took place after Cat removed said Aspect from Pilgrim's corpse, so I think he will not regain his ability to Forgive death.

However, I wouldn't be surprised if he still has privileged access to Twilight – not exactly a personal domain, but still some special connection. At the least, he can probably take people through it without the usual blood price, and he will know its paths and ways. One interesting test of just what went on behind the scenes, is whether he knows about Cat's little visit to Edward's grave.

As far as a group of three, Pilgrim has resurrected quite a number of heroes, but most recently (bar himself) Indrani. For a group they might need a third who's been resurrected either "under their own power", or by another power not previously represented. (The Forever King would be one possibility.)

Definitions

Did Cat just Forgive the Crown too, or is Tariq gonna die twice?

Mental Mouse

Given that the realm was already peaceful, not writhing in agony or attacking people, I'd say Pilgrim's death healed the Crown.

certainlight

This chapter brings up an interesting ability of Cat's that opens some options for Masego. Are there any Aspects that Cat could take and then give to Masego to restore his powers, or use for him to the same end? What would happen if Cat and Masego went back to the Dead King's memory echoes and she Took something? Is there an Aspect she could borrow that would give her an ability to reverse Masego's loss of power (Skein's domain/time reversal ability, Pilgrim resurrects William and she borrows Rise if we consider M's loss of power as a wound)?

Or...is the fact that he is Hierophant (well, kind of) imply he will wrest the Night from Sve Noc? He's already had some insane interactions with god-like beings when his fathers died, but it's not an expected story pivot. My guess is he'll simply find a way back to his Aspects, or encounter some new mind-boggling magic thing that makes him transition to a new Name or Aspect, similar to his first two Names (Apprentice when criticizing another mage, and Hierophant during Four Battles and One).

Mental Mouse

Well, Cat could give him stolen power, but then so could Roland. My guess, though is that among the various powers in play, Masego's deep knowledge, and perhaps natural healing of this unnatural injury, the crew will cobble together some way for Masego to regain access to magic.

Or

This. Was. Awesome.

M0och

HOLY SH*T!

That was an awesome chapter!

I unfortunatelty think that I was not in the right mindset to fully appreciate it but damn.

Cat flipped the whole damn table so to speak...

Concerned citizen

Was the Crown Forgiven too along with Tariq, or did Cat just rez an insane fae Pilgrim doppelganger?

Mental Mouse

As I said above, the realm is peaceful! When Cat went out to look nothing attacked her; rather, she had a nice conversation with a local spirit she knew. I'd conclude that Pilgrim's death healed the Crown.

Card_Hoarder

It's been raining outside as I read this

Mental Mouse

I just want to call out a phrase I noticed on reread:

> and as I forced open the great gates of bronze I had never closed Either Mercy or the realm itself seems to be, um, tidy.

morroian

Chills, brilliant chapter and writing

Interlude: Concourse I

"When a highborn is slain, look to who benefits and you will have learned what families the third party wants to incite strife between."

– Extract from 'The Behaviours of Civil Conduct', by High Lady Mchumba Sahelian

There was only one crowned head left south of Salia, and it was Princess Rozala Malanza of Aequitan.

As a girl or, honesty compelled her to admit, as recently as a few years ago Rozala might have found such a prospect exciting. To wield such influence, to claim such authority, and with so few to check her! After her mother's disastrous bid for First Princess during the Great War and the ruin that had befallen the Malanzas for it, Rozala had been forced to look in the eye the fact that if she did not take cover under another's wings her family might yet be toppled entirely and that odds were Aequitan would not know prominence against in her lifetime. And now, not even a decade later, Princess Rozala could be argued to be the second most powerful individual in Procer: she commanded a great host, had inherited the reins of a powerful bloc within the Highest Assembly and her reputation as both general and noblewoman had reached heights she'd never before thought possible. And yet, as dawn inched ever closer the Princess of Aequitan found it all felt hollow. For all the power and influence that had been gathered to her name, Rozala Malanza found that the sum of what she could do in the face of death was look up at the sky and pray.

Pray that the Peregrine and the Regicide lived up to their legends, that the Rogue Sorcerer proved worthy of one day having such tales matched to his name. That the Tyrant's schemes would be turned against the Crown of the Dead and, most of all, that the Black Queen would make as terrifyingly potent an ally as she had been an enemy. They'd all danced to the sounds of Catherine Foundling's tune, this winter, found the calm-faced villain always one step ahead. Let the Hidden Horror taste of that, for once, Princess Rozala thought. Let every promise that has been made under cover of night come true, and great vengeance be visited upon the King of Death. Rozala Malanza ruled lands large and wealthy, commanded soldiers in the dozens of thousands and held power of life and death over a dozen times that – and so, left to stand stewing in her own inability to do more than hope, she pondered her growing mislike of the Chosen and the Damned. Those colourful few, cloaked in power and mystery, who would bargain with the fate of nations and the pivots of history. Who left all others in the dust of their grandiose adventures, be they great or small. What a hateful thing it was, to have your own life and death decided by the hands of others.

She was not unaware of the irony inherent to a princess of the blood pondering such things. The touch of rue jostled her out of her thoughts enough that she heard the person approaching behind her, though she did not turn. Hair loose and going down her back, Rozala tightened the warm fur cloak around her body and kept looking at the night sky brought about by the blasphemous sorceries of the drow.

"There have been another dozen," Louis Rohanon, once Prince of Creusens, told her.

The Princess of Aequitan did not need to look to know he was exhausted beyond all words. Neither of them had slept in much, much too long – and there was only so far brandy and alchemical tonics could carry one past what one's body could tolerate.

"Were they more coherent than the last?" she asked.

"In a manner of speaking," Louis sighed. "It has become apparent that the... visions all concern the same journey, but the Heavens were seemingly unconcerned with the order of the revelations. It is all rather haphazard."

Louis Rohanon had never been a particularly pious man, which was Rozala was less than surprised by his implicit criticism of the manner the Gods Above had granted their insights. No doubt if the Prince – former now, she reminded herself – of Creusens was a one of the Gods the visions would have been regularly arranged, in good order and with the proper seals affixed to bills of delivery. Less than surprised, yes, but perhaps a little amused. Not that she would show it. The mirth was short-lived, though.

"And the initial vision," Rozala said. "Has anything happened to cast it in doubt?"

She looked at him from the corner of her eye and caught his face tightening.

"No," Louis quietly admitted. "It still returns at least once per lot of dreamers waking, and never once have we been told of anything taking place past it. It seems to have been the end of their journey."

The Princess of Aequitan closed her eyes. She'd not slept, so there'd been no opportunity to experience the dreams, but in the urgency after the first dreamers woke she'd had several of those blessed with the visions describe it to her in detail. It always seemed to centre around the same vivid parts: the Black Queen's scream of denial after she realized being tricked, the Grey Pilgrim taking up the blade of the fallen Saint of Swords and then the wizened hero's taking of his own life. All who'd dreamt the dream agreed that the Black Queen had tried to prevent the Peregrine's death, though words failed them when they tried to explain why. Yet it seemed undeniable, by now, that both the Regicide and the Grey Pilgrim were dead. The former, if one of the growingly reoccurring visions was to be believed, having been slain by Catherine Foundling herself.

"Any word of the Dominion armies?" she asked.

"None of the Blood have returned from their seclusion," Louis said. "The senior captains still hold command, and our people in their camps confirm their rank and file are having similar dreams."

"It's the Blood that'll make decisions, not the captains or the soldiers," Princess Rozala said. "Keep sending envoys, Louis. We can't afford for the battle to resume."

"Dawn will bludgeon the drow hard," the former Prince of Creusens carefully said. "And will arrive soon. If a victory is to be seized by surprise, it would be in the coming hour."

"Tell me, Louis," the dark-haired princess flatly said, "even if we slew every last soldier of the Army of Callow without losing a man, what do you believe will happen when the Black Queen returns?"

"She's already raised one army of the dead," Louis said, though he shivered. "How many times could she truly do such a thing?"

And shiver he should, for Malanza had been told the same tale as he and it had clenched her guts to hear it. An ancient king of Callow stolen from the Dead King's grasp and hundreds of thousands of furious wraiths summoned to deliver his wrath? Such a thing could break an army fresh and dug-in, if well-used, and Rozala Malanza's host was tired and spread out. For all that the Black Queen had come to favour subtler tricks than those she'd plied at the Battle of the Camps, it would not do forget for a moment that they were facing a woman capable of slaying thousands with snap of her fingers.

"Regardless, this is not a gamble we can even begin to consider with the League still on the field," Rozala reminded him. "They may have withdrawn but they are not so far as that."

The disparate armies of the League of Free Cities had, as of an hour past, begun to retreat. They'd put perhaps a mile between themselves and the other two great hosts on the plains, their great combined camp turning into a labyrinth of mayhem before it'd even been fully raised. Rozala had ordered envoys sent there, to probe for intentions and information, but so far all had been turned away outside the camp and the few spies she'd tried to slip in had been shot and hung from poles as a warning. She'd not even tried to get anyone inside the Army of Callow's camp, well aware that Wasteland sorceries would make infiltration more than merely difficult, but at least there her envoys had been received by Lady Vivienne Dartwick. Who was now, it seemed, heiress to the throne of Callow. Lady Dartwick had been courteous but declined Princess Rozala's offer of sending a contingent of priests from the House of Light to see to her wounded, likely suspecting the additional intent of gleaning the state of her camp through it. At least the venture had confirmed that some of her soldiers were touched by the dreams too, as well as confirming that the 'priests' of the heretical House Insurgent were truly capable of healing. Which would not be a pleasant to hear for some of the priesthood in Salia, Rozala suspected. Last she'd heard from the capital, lines against Callow had been hardening amongst the House of Light.

"As you say, Princess Rozala," Louis relied, inclining his head.

She grimaced, for until a few hours ago though she had been his leader they had also been peers: and while the former still held true, the latter did not. They would have to become used to that. Rozala tried to conceive of a sentence that could mend the gap she could feel growing between them, but sentiment had never been her knack and she struggled over the words until the entire debate was made moot. A messenger approached, though Rozala did not recognize her face and she was being escorted by a pair of Aquitan soldiers. The messenger bowed low, and only began to speak when Rozala gave her leave.

"Your Grace," the woman said, her faint Alamans accent still discernible. "You have been summoned to stand before the First Prince. The Order of the Red Lion has found the restrictions on scrying lifted at last."

Louis' face darkened with both anger and embarrassment.

"It was ordered that any successful contact with Salia be reported immediately," he sharply said. "How is it that I am only now hearing of this?"

"You ordered everyone under your command to do so," the messenger politely agreed. "Yet I am here on behalf of Her Most Serene Highness' plenipotentiary envoy Arnaud Brogloise, who answers only to the First Prince and the Highest Assembly."

So Cordelia Hasenbach had hidden an entire set of messengers and scryers right under her nose, Rozala darkly thought. Likely among the army of the former Prince of Cantal, who until so recently she'd believed one of her most eager supporters. The Princess of Aquitan grit her teeth at the memory of Arnaud's treachery revealed in the bloodiest of ways, though now was not the time to settle that account.

"As always, I am at the disposal of the First Prince," Rozala replied flatly. "Guide the way, messenger."

Louis was left with instructions to have someone inform her the moment there was movement from the Levantines, no matter who it was she was speaking with at the time. The dark-haired princess followed the messenger into the camp of the Cantal army, though she was not so foolish as to do so without a company of trustworthy Aequitan soldiers escorting her. She was well aware that the First Prince would find it much more difficult to take her head after the dust had settled and her star rose in the eyes of commons and royalty alike, and while Rozala was not certain it was in Hasenbach's nature to so bluntly snuff out a rival these were dark days for all. Fear could do strange things to a woman: sometimes it could urge her to greatness, but it could just as easily spur her to the basest of instincts. Yet Rozala and her escort were not surrounded and slaughtered but instead guided to the former Prince of Cantal's private pavilion where the man himself awaited. Along with a handful of wizards who took their leave when dismissed, and a basin of water large enough it could have been used as a bath. Arnaud Brogloise rose from his seat when she entered, as the fresh disparity in their ranks required, and personally introduced her.

"Her Grace Rozala Malanza, Princess of Aequitan and supreme commander of the southern armies," he briskly said.

Cordelia Hasenbach's cool blue eyes, framed by those perfect golden tresses, were already studying her through the waters and so Rozala offered the proper bow.

"Your Highness," she said. "As I was summoned, I came."

"For that promptness I thank you, and again for the services you rendered the Principate on this campaign," the First Prince said. "You may consider me informed of recent developments in Iserre, for the purpose of this conversation."

"So I shall," Rozala replied, resisting the urge to glance at Brogloise. "May I then inquire, Your Highness, as to what the purpose of this conversation is? While I have matters to bring up before you, your messenger implied... pressing need."

It was as close as she could come to chiding the First Prince for summoning her so abruptly, and the message should be twice as loudly heard for the way Rozala had kept to the courtesies while Hasenbach very clearly had not.

"As of a quarter hour ago, we have confirmed that the Dead King has withdrawn on all fronts," the First Prince said.

Rozala's eyes widened in surprise.

"Furthermore, while my cousin finds it difficult to see through either the Hidden Horror or the Black Queen, she has confirmed that a truce of more than one month and less than six was bought, though not at what price."

I did not escape the dark-haired princess' attention that Catherine Foundling had been mentioned in this, though for now she could only speculate as to why.

"You believe this is the doing of the Queen in Callow?" Princess Rozala asked.

Hasenbach sighed.

"Queen of Callow," she finally said. "Best we grow used to that, Your Grace, for it seems bargains will have to be struck. The Augur had gleaned that the truce is related to the Black Queen, though little more than that. Given the consequences of hostilities resuming, we cannot afford to take risks with Queen Catherine's life – or, indeed, to risk provoking her at all for at least a month."

A pause saw the First Prince's tone grow heavy and solemn.

"In that spirit, Princess Rozala Malanza, as commander of the Principate's southern armies I charge you with the preservation of Queen Catherine Foundling's life and the safeguard of her armies and associates. Should the Dominion strike at her, you are to take any measures short of open war with Levant to prevent conflict reigniting between Callow and the Grand Alliance."

Rozala sharply breathed in. Open war, the First Prince had said. Which was implicit endorsement of assassinating Dominion commanders over allowing the Black Queen to be put at risk. If it ever came out that Cordelia Hasenbach had given such an order, the Grand Alliance might very well splinter. The First Prince, Rozala thought, had just handed her a knife to put to her throat in years to come. The Princess of Aequitan would never like the cold-eyed woman ruling over Procer, she knew that. There was too much bad blood.

Yet there were times where she could not help but admire the other woman, in spite of all the rest.

"I understand, Your Highness," the dark-haired princess said.

"I believe you do, Princess Rozala," the First Prince of Procer evenly replied. "Whatever comes, the Principate must survive. Do as you must, and know you have the full weight of my authority behind you."

The water in the basin rippled and in the heartbeat that followed Cordelia Hasenbach's silhouette disappeared, leaving behind only tepid liquid. While the First Prince had been within her rights to take her leave so abruptly, it surprised Rozala that a woman known so far and wide for her diplomatic talents would so carelessly offer discourtesy twice on the same night. Then it occurred to her that with the audience having come to an end so swiftly she'd never had opportunity to bring up the petitions passed on to her. The dark-haired Arlesite turned to Arnaud Brogloise, who still stood in silence. His dark eyes had not ceased studying either of the princesses as they spoke, though at least he'd not bothered to put on the pretence of being a blustering fool again. In Cleves the middle-aged former prince had put on some muscle, adding it to his pudgy frame, but Rozala had never found him to have much of a presence – on occasion a sort of buffoonish swagger, but nothing to give her pause. Yet now his girth seemed less laughable, his ruddy face no longer a fool's visage, and the Princess of Aequitan realized odds were he was physically stronger than he. It was somewhat unsettling to know that, now that she'd seen Arnaud Brogloise open the throat of royalty without batting an eye.

"You are still her envoy, I take it," Princess Rozala said.

She was princess and he not: no longer was courtesy owed.

"I am to begin negotiations with the Queen of Callow when she returns," the older man acknowledged. "I've already spoken with her right hand, to interesting result."

"Lady Dartwick?" Rozala asked, surprised.

"Hakram Deadhand, the Adjutant," the Alamans corrected. "He lacks formal title save for his Damnation, but wields the influence nonetheless."

An orc, holding power in Callow? It had been one thing when the Wasteland still held sway over these lands, but it seemed rather odd that one of that land's ancient enemies would have such authority within its borders now.

"And what did the Deadhand have to say?" the Princess of Aequitan asked.

"A great deal, on the subject of accords," Arnaud replied, lips strangely quirked. "I have a great deal of reading ahead of me."

"More than you believe," Rozala said. "I have petitions to pass on to the First Prince. As you've demonstrated a knack for reaching her, they will be placed in your hands. Delaying would be ill-advised, Arnaud."

The man let out a breath that straddled the line between a sigh and a chuckle.

"You have something to say?" the princess flatly said.

"I would not speak out of turn, Your Grace," he said. "Yet I wonder – these petitions, would they be the designated succession for the abdications of the night?"

They were, though Rozala did not immediately say so. Thought it was little more than a formality, save if accusations of treason and other great crimes were to be made, the designated succession for a principality of Procer was to be submitted to the Highest Assembly. There'd only been a handful of refusals throughout the entire history of Procer, usually when villainy or civil war had split the realm asunder. Why would such a matter amuse Arnaud? Certainly the amount of crowns to be approved was unusually high, perhaps even without precedent, but... The Princess of Aequitan's blood ran cold.

"Send for the wizards, Brogloise," she said. "I will put the matter to the First Prince myself."

"I will change nothing," he replied. "An extraordinary session of the Highest Assembly was called. In times of troubles the wisdom of our predecessors is once again needed, and so the Guillermont Decree has been restored."

It took a moment for Rozala to place it. Not the name of Guillermont, for that she could hardly ignore: it was the name of royal house that had ruled Aequitan before the Malanzas rose to prominence and set them aside. The decree in particular, though, came from the First Princess Éloïse Guillermont – best known for ending the Principate's occupation of Callow. Before she'd been First Prince she'd been a sitter of the Highest Assembly, and her election to the office of First Princess had been... contentious. The politics of the time had been complicated, as they often were in Procer – Guillermont had been the leader of a bloc among the Assembly that held no lands in Callow and so considered the taxes levied to keep armies standing there an utter waste – but the broad lines had been that Procer in those days had been split between the royalty that wished withdrawal and those that wished to tighten Procer's grip. Princess Éloïse had risen to power by seizing an opportunity after Callowan rebels had slain five princes in their beds in Laure, gathering her allies in the Assembly and passing her eponymous decree before succession could be arranged. It was an obscure procedural measure that specified no assermenté – that pretentious Alamans term for proxy – could be used to present one's name for confirmation of succession. The would-be ruler had to attend in person. In practice, that'd meant that the designated heirs and heiresses of the slain royals had been forced to leave their seats in the Assembly empty for more than a year as they remained in Callow trying to keep their holdings from collapsing. Those empty seats had allowed the Princess of Aequitan to swing the balance of votes in her favour by enough of a margin she was elected First Princess and ordered the withdrawal from Callow, changing the path of history.

Yet that had been a mere procedural trick, one that First Princess Éloïse herself had been easily persuaded into rescinding when she'd ascended to the office. What Rozala was beginning to piece together was a different beast entirely. Seven crowns had been abdicated, this night. That meant that almost a third of the Highest Assembly, which held twenty-four seats, had been silenced: proxies could not vote when there was no ruling prince or princess stood behind them, for they were the voice of that ruler and had no formal decisional power of their own. That left seventeen votes, then, for the foreseeable futures. The Lycaonese principalities made four. Salia itself, the demesne of the First Prince, held a vote as well. Prince Frederic of Brus and Hasenbach's other two foremost loyalists in Salamans and Tenerife were well known to have instructed their assermentés to follow Hasenbach in all things, which meant eight votes. Prince Beatrice of Hainaut's lands were being defended by Lycaonese armies, which likely made for nine and with Prince Gaspard in Cleves being heavily dependent on southern supplies for his defending armies that made ten out of seventeen. A clear majority that would vote however Cordelia Hasenbach wanted it to. And it would not be broken in the coming months, for the First Prince would be able to put her chosen candidates on the abdicated thrones long before any possible designated heir presented themselves in Salia. After all, the only mages who knew the secrets of scrying in Iserre were in Hasenbach's service, and no rider could ride quicker than sorcery.

"She has made herself the queen of Procer," Rozala croaked, "in everything but name."

"On doom's approach," Arnaud Brogloise said, "law must fall silent."

"And you would enable this?" Princess Rozala hissed. "You were a prince, Arnaud. You understand what is at stake: the Assembly can be led, but it must never be commanded. That way lies tyranny."

"Oh, we'll survive a spot of tyranny," he replied. "Yet we might not survive Keter without it."

"What did she give, to make of you such a loyal hound?" the Princess of Aequitan hissed. "What manner of ugly bargain was made?"

"She let her kin die and her home burn, to better our chances of victory," Arnaud said. "Loyalty is a child's sentiment, Your Grace. I heed Her Highness's decrees because she had proved willing to sacrifice whatever is necessary for Procer to survive."

The scathing reply on the tip of Rozala's tongue had to be swallowed, for another entered the pavilion. It was, the princess saw, one of her own officers.

"Captain Matias?" she asked, tone harsh.

"Your Grace," the soldier said, bowing. "Louis Rohanon has sent word: the armies of the Dominion are gathering."

Cursing, Princess Rozala Malanza thought, would not help in the slightest. Yet she still blasphemed several times, before sending for enough soldiers to give those damned Levantine madmen pause before they got everyone killed.

Caerulea

Vote! (for A Practical Guide to Evil)

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

(Discord:)

<https://discord.gg/3nbsUfZ>

Patreon:

<https://www.patreon.com/user?u=3523924>

Caerulea

And it is no longer broken, so go vote again.

stevenneiman

Ok, so that wasn't just me that was having problems. I got the "forbidden" message just after my computer crashed so I thought the crash screwed up something fiddly related to my computer's internet connection.

ruduen

I'll admit, after everything that happened, I was expecting a slightly longer break before the politics resumed in full force.

I suppose prophetic visions and scrying will accelerate things on the political front as well.

naturalnuke

0 danh3107

Well well well, the game is afoot!

ATRDCI

"In that spirit, Princess Rozala Malanza, as commander of the Principate's southern armies I charge you with the preservation of Queen Catherine Foundling's life and the safeguard of her armies and associates."

Cat: Im gonna self flagellate and sacrifice myself again.

Rozala: whacks Cat with a scroll No! Bad Cat! And Gods Above why does your orc keep trying to get rid of his arms?!

RoflCat

Silly Rozala, she need to learn from Archer that the answer is choke hold.

After all, it both silences and weakens her.

Risk of death? Eh, she's survived worse.

haihappen

It is established to spray misbehaving Cats with a bottle of water to deter unwanted behavior.

Mental Mouse

I dunno, that seems an unwise tactic against a former lakeomancer. 😊

Fayhem

Former? She's patently still got the gate trick and I would be shocked if the Sisters can't compensate for her no longer having a fae mind to process the gate formation data. I expect (read, greatly anticipate) gate-delivered death to feature against the Dead King one way or another.

Mental Mouse

Well, she hasn't dropped a lake on anyone since she got out of Everdark, and she'd generally backed off from such massive overkill. But I could easily believe that if someone tried mockingly spraying her with water, she might drench them in return.

Fayhem

The only battles she's been in since the Everdark have been in gate-disrupted territory. And she specifically had "avoid mass casualties in the opposing force bc I'll need them later" as a strategic goal vis-a-vis both Procer and Levant, so even if she could have she wouldn't have. I don't expect either to feature against the Dead King, quite especially not the second.

Shveiran

Also, the main casualties she inflicted were delivered by riveromancy, which is by definition a branch of lakeomancy.

Or at the very least a feeder.

Liliet

^^^ 😊 seriously learn your classifications people

erebus42

As it always is

folros

A game at lest, and multiple feet.

talenel

Hmm. Arnaud really is a distasteful person. Useful, but still not someone I'd want to be friends with. And the truce keeping Cat alive isn't all that surprising.

Yet I do wonder about the Dominion. It would not surprise me if they withdrew from the war. I really don't think the Grand Alliance will stand with the way Bard is influencing things.

Andrew Mitchell

My take on Arnaud is that he's quite straight-forward now that his cover is blown. I appreciate that. Playing politics now will kill Procer. Saint's expectation was that Procer (as a political institution) was going to die but I think Cordelia, Arnaud and Rozala can keep it together. Changed, for sure, but still...

Oshi

I think Arnauld is the most honest person there. He has a purpose and all else falls beside.

Rup

"On doom's approach," Arnaud Brogloise said, "law must fall silent."

Andrew Mitchell

It's a good line. But I agree with Rozala that it stinks of tyranny.

TeK

When doom was at the gates of Rome, they chose a person to wield a single-handed power, and it was a greatest civil honor to wield said power, because Romans understood the need of unified command and absence of politics in a face of existential threat.

And also there is a fact that almost every single dictator willingly abdicated after the war, which is just so awesome.

Gregorio Cardarelli

Well is not really like that, in Rome the Dictator was a political position only appointed in times of crisis and had a finite time of existence of six months which could be extended for another six months if the threat was not extinguished. The first dictator without time constraints was Julius Caesar and that position was made "more legal" by his successor, Augustus, which brought the end of the republic and the start of the empire.

Mental Mouse

Remember, most of us are modern democrats (little-d), suspicious of royal power as opposed to the will and interests of the people. Rozala and other Procerans only coincidentally agree with us –they are aristocrats, suspicious of royal power as a threat to their own power, prerogatives, and interests.

Shveiran

I see what you are saying, but I think that's valid only if you squint a bit: it isn't really democracy and its ideals that Malanza is defending.

Proceran Princes remind me of French nobles in the 1700s, resisting the monarch's attempts of consolidating a centralized power.

centralized power means more absolute power, which can bring tyranny and oppression.

But the thing is, a centralized power was also the birth of the concept of "public interest" (well, rebirth after the fall of Rome really, but still); many of what western democracy now consider to be the duties of a State toward its citizens was seeded in those years by those monarchs and their staffs.

Rights as a quality inherent to every citizen started to be conceptualized around the same time; because we started to move from “subject of this or that lord and king” to “citizen of that state”. The very concept requires a centralized, absolute power.

It could be some of those nobles (and Malanza) resist such an idea because they worry about the long term threats to the rights of the people.

It could be they resist it because they don't want to lose their power, privileges and charges.

Could be there is a bit of both.

Historically, centralized power is a pillar of western democracies. It's how we grew past local laws to state laws, where citizens are equal before the law and have inherent rights.

Which isn't to say centralizing power is always a good thing; I just feel it gets a bit of an inherent abd name that isn't really warranted.

Mental Mouse

> isn't really democracy and its ideals that Malanza is defending.

Well yes, that was my point. “Ancient” democracies (e.g. Athens, the Mongols) AIUI tended to be cases where no one player could gather enough power in the first place to dominate the rest of the populace. (And remember that Athens was a city state among many others, most of whom did have kings.)

Successful modern democracies tend to be cases where, after power got centralized in royalty, other players kicked back and broke the royal power, then arranged things so that nobody could claim total power (see also: separation of powers in American politics). That can happen in stages, as when Britain started with the Magna Carta to limit the king's power over the nobles.

Democracies built without that prior centralization often don't work very well – see Africa, where areas wrecked and arbitrarily carved up by colonialization tried to skip past the royalization stage. Similarly, many nations around the world (Middle East, Asia, Africa again, Latin America) have gotten passed around among strongman “presidents”, religious leaders, and/or military rule. (The common factor being that those are the folks who actually can exert power over most or all of the territory.)

India is an intermediate case, where the British had welded the subcontinent's princedoms into a "nation" that promptly fractured on religious lines, and the what's left of it still has difficulty pressing national policies over provincial and local powers.

Shveiran

I missread your post, then. My apologies, I very much agree with your later analysis.

Granted, a number of royals realized giving more and more power to a beurocracy of professionals was a good thing for all, and parliamnets and governments grem more and more independent to their respective royalty. Some monarchies had to broken down for democracy to flourish, others eased the project and made teh transition mostly peaceful.

Mental Mouse

> a number of royals realized giving more and more power to a bureaucracy of professionals was a good thing for all,

Pre-modern China is the classic example where a standing bureaucracy provided continuity and expertise regardless of what emperor, or even dynasty, held the throne. I'm not sure how much of the original system survived the Revolution, but at least some of the traditions certainly did; AIUI the Communist Party still operates largely through a standing bureaucracy, which is still recruited by examination. Which is why their top people tend to be remarkably well-educated, to the nation's benefit.

Shveiran

If we look for a more western example, Italy was unified by the Kingdom of Piemonte and Sardegna, who had a nominal King, but whose agenda was in practice determined by a Prime Minister. By that time, the King nominated the Prime Minister, but the latter would still be the one behind the kingdom's wheel. Italy kept to that system, slowly seeing the election of parliaments gain more and more influence on the freedom the monarch had in the selection of the Prime Minister.

In the end, the monarch became a vestigial part of the system, and after WWII was not included among the country's institutions.

Mental Mouse

I note that Italy is also a European example of a nation that never quite centralized the national power, and as a direct result isn't doing too well at democracy, or even rule of law (q.v. the Mafia and other organized-crime families there).

Shveiran

Mhm, that's debatable. I'd say we centralized power well enough, but those issues stem from the fact that we never achieved a unified culture. The permanence of organized crime is, in my opinion, more related to the fact that local, regional culture tend to be divided in its condemnation of the phenomenon than it is to lack of centralized power.

As for our, shall we say, "electoral difficulties", I'd say that lack of education in several parts of the country, economical difficulties, and almost thirty years of politicians offering simple answers to complex problems are more to blame; which again points more to the lack of a unified culture than to a lack of centralized power.

Then again, that is my personal take. It is a fact that a certain degree of regional institutions retain a certain influence that has no real place in a unified state.

But I think the root of our difficulties lies in the fact that living in Tuscany, Sicily, Sardegna, Lombardia or Friuli is a drastically different experience, which spawns very different views and needs. It is very hard for us to agree on a way forward, because there is precious little common ground to build the foundations on.

Mental Mouse

Well, I'm not going to argue Italian politics with a native. But I can speak a little about American politics, and I'll say that America has always contained vastly different cultures and environments. At our founding, we were divided between what I'll flippantly call "religious fanatics"(*) and "dope-smoking Freemasons", with the pacifist Quakers as an uneasy hinge between them... and a crosswise division between urban industrialists and rural plantation owners and farmers.

Nowadays, our cultures range further: From tony mansions to the ghetto and barrio, religious Salt Lake City to bohemian southern California, the big cities to rural towns, seacoasts (on both sides) to the Midwestern heartland, the damp chill of Michigan to the dry heat of Arizona. And then there's New York City, containing a microcosm of the world....

But all Americans, and even in the midst of massive social change, that does come first. (Yeah, there was one time it didn't... and we're still paying for that.)

Mental Mouse

Coming back here, it seems I forgot a footnote in my previous message, about "religious fanatics".

I probably intended to note that the Puritans got something of a bad rap from Hawthorne, but they were still pretty coercive and AIUI intolerant of other faiths. (I've heard the claim that they came over so they could oppress non-believers in peace.

emerged from a standoff among the various groups, the general idea being "you don't mess with us, and we won't mess with you".

Liliet

This.

Euodiachloris

Pulling off a Barons' Revolt to stuff a Magna Carta down Cordelia's throat is possible. But, with the Oracle? Not recommended as being entirely feasible without a lot of, say, scry-busting interference, however. Like say, from two Crows and a sufficiently motivated friend.

We'll see.

Mental Mouse

Cordelia isn't enough of a monarch for a Baron's Revolt to make sense yet. If she gets overturned, Procer just goes back to being a bunch of squabbling princedoms.

Shveiran

As Mental Mouse said, plus the fact that signing a Carta doesn't really mean much unless the document carries enough weight that taking it back provokes immediate retaliation from the people. Without that, it's just paper; and I'm not convinced Procerans would be that invested in limiting the First Prince's power at this point of their history.

medailyfun

You have forgotten the capital letters in the words
Will, Interests and People

caoimhinh

Cordelia has always been like that. She even started the Crusade as a plot to consolidate her rule on Procer. She sees herself as the only one fitting to rule Procer, and she is one of the few sensible aristocrats in Procer, since she was the only one who saw Malicia's plot for civil war in Procer and managed to put an end to it. So she has no reason to trust her compatriots with the position of First Prince, plus her own personal ambitions of holding on to power and having prestige to pass into history as one of the Principate's greatest leaders.

Also, almost every instance of Cordelia's POV is Cordelia either worrying that she is going to be deposed, or Cordelia doing something to avoid being deposed, it's come to the points that every decision she makes is weighted by those factors, even those of altruistic nature like the war against the Dead King.

Although I think most of us agree that she is indeed the most capable ruler among the current Principate, she is indeed obsessed with keeping in power as much as possible, that's the curse of Procer's Nobility, everything is politics and schemes to retain power. Though Cordelia, being Lycaonese, is notable for having the insight and decency to actually make preparations to defend against the Rattlings and Keter.

talanel

It's the thing though. If Arnaud's purpose was a lesser one, say, he would still act as if all else falls aside.

As an example that ties into the mention of him as a rapist by Liliet, if Arnaud's main goal at the moment was sexual pleasure, He would get it regardless of anyone else's feelings about the matter.

Andrew Mitchell

I think your conclusions are only somewhat justified by the text. Remember that we've only seen Arnaud as he real is once his true role was revealed. And (as I suggested to Liliet) the rapist idea could have been part of his cover.

And it could be true or it could be fabricated. We just don't know for sure.

It's just occurred to me that everything we've seen (or heard) of Arnaud is consistent with him being a full-on sociopath. It's entirely plausible to me that Cordelia could find and use someone with those qualities.

Liliet

I agree that he's likely a sociopath! I also think he's a sociopath like Hakram, and that it's not necessarily pure coincidence that his current goals are something we process as "good". Sociopaths are capable of abstract thinking :3

Mental Mouse

I really don't think Hakram qualifies as a sociopath in real-world (human) terms. Not only is he quite capable of feeling affection and loyalty (per his POV!), but his incident of "giving a hand" to Viv indicates that he's unhesitating in self-sacrifice for the greater cause, which is not at all about his own power or welfare.

I think it was fairly clear that what Cat calls a "coldblood" as applied to humans, is not at all the same thing as the Kharsum word for an orc "variant", which translates as "coldblood". As I said back when this came up, the idea of "cold blood" would have very different implications to humans than it does to orcs. Humans think of a "cold-blooded killer", someone who lacks the "warm" feelings that bind humans together. Orcs think of someone who lacks their normal tendency to "hot" violent rage. (That is, an orc coldblood is the opposite of someone afflicted with the Red Rage.) Thus when Hakram discovers something to fight for (Cat and her cause), he says "now at last I am an orc".

In the real world it's been discovered that the brain abnormalities associated with sociopaths... don't always translate to sociopathic behavior. The key factor seems to be that a strong duty-based religion is capable of "socializing" even a child with that neurology, such that they become a normal member of the community. This seems to have included at least one of the most prominent researchers studying sociopathy. 😊

That said... no bets on what happens if such a person gets pushed to a breaking point, where social constraints fall by the wayside.

Liliet

IIRC Hakram meets the diagnostic criteria for APD (antisocial personality disorder)

Mental Mouse

> meets the diagnostic criteria for APD (antisocial personality disorder)

Wait, what? How do you get that? Setting aside the point that he's a different species with a different norm, there's also the point that he's a soldier and nearly a noble in a society that's much more violent than ours, also at war. And that's just Callow! 😊

Grabbing from the Wikipedia entry for APD:

> pervasive and persistent disregard for morals, social norms, and the rights and feelings of others. [3] Individuals with this personality disorder will typically have no compunction in exploiting others in harmful ways for their own gain or pleasure and frequently manipulate and deceive other people, achieving this through wit and a façade of superficial charm or through intimidation and violence

He's certainly capable of bullying or tricking opponents, but we've seen no sign of him abusing random people around him, or even abusing his power or position.

> They may display arrogance, think lowly and negatively of others, and lack remorse for their harmful actions and have a callous attitude to those they have harmed

Again, aside from being at war (and being a genuine badass)....

> Irresponsibility is a core characteristic of this disorder: they can have significant difficulties in maintaining stable employment as well as fulfilling their social and financial obligations, and people with this disorder often lead exploitative, unlawful, or parasitic lifestyles.

Nopeity Nope. That is, aside from his actual social position as the Queen's left hand, thus standing on the backs of the peasantry etc.

...

> Serious problems with interpersonal relationships are often seen in those with the disorder. Attachments and emotional bonds are weak, and interpersonal relationships often revolve around the manipulation, exploitation, and abuse of others.

Not seeing much of that either. Sleeping around, whatever, the dude's a soldier, a powerful courtier, and is living in a society where nobody much cares who he's sleeping with, except maybe to tease him.

Frankly, given that Hakram is Officially a Villain, it's surprising how little he fits that pattern. Also ironic, given that APD represents a big chunk of the popular concept of human evil.

Now, if you wanna talk about Kairos...

Liliet

OK I gotta find a better source on that sometime. I heard it thirdhand, and I don't think those diagnostic criteria are good since they definitely don't fit a person's internal understanding of themselves. It's a condemnation, not diagnostic criteria.

Dropping this line of conversation for the moment.

caoimhinh

Yeah, Hakram never really seemed a sociopath to me. He was more like a nihilist, depressed and struggling to find his meaning in life because nothing could motivate him or inspire him to actually yearn for it.

He found that in Catherine, hence his absolute and undying loyalty to her.

What Hakram shows to most people is that he has no ambitions beyond serving Catherine, though we know from his conversation with Cat that he desires change and to prove that Orcs can be more than simply an oppressed race of brutes, and that can be achieved by following Catherine so he simply carries on as usual, so from an outsider point of view those trying to analyze him are befuddled for his apparent lack of ambitions and goals. Though yeah, he can be very cold-blooded in his reasoning and ruthless in his actions, but that makes sense given his origin and the life he has (as an orc, a soldier, and a Named from Below).

NerfGlastigUaine

I definitely wouldn't want to be friends with Arnaud, but I rather like the bloke. Rarely do you see an Unfettered Well-Intentioned Extremist who's so refreshingly direct sans ham.

Also helps that he makes a lot of bloody sense; extinction makes all means reasonable.

Liliet

The only reservation I have about Arnaud is that I don't think he would have had the reputation of a rapist if there was 0 truth to it.

It's a pretty big one, granted.

Everything other than that? I hear him on every word and more.

Andrew Mitchell

> I don't think he would have had the reputation of a rapist if there was 0 truth to it.

I had forgotten about that, or I may have missed it. I wouldn't put it past Cordelia to have created that image to give Arnaud deeper cover. But, of course, the easiest way to create that image is to do it for real.

Thea

Did we ever get confirmation what it was? Or did it remain vague? Because I thought it might have been little boys... but I remember no confirmation either way. And that can be faked rather well. Spend a night behind closed doors, (Actually do nothing), have your red herring disappear in some village.

Fayhem

Not to mention, back when Cat could hear pulses, smell fear etc as a Scary Fae, when she paid attention to Arnaud she didn't sense that he was feeling something different than what he was projecting. She sensed that he wasn't feeling anything. Like, ever. I would say I'm probably at least 90% that he is sociopathic/psychopathic.

That's important. That kind of pathological personality type is almost 100% motivated by self interest, because no one and nothing else is actually real to them. A Useful Monster is still a monster, and I can't rule out the possibility that he chose to take that role for Cordelia because a Useful Monster gets license that a regular monster wouldn't. Not to mention that it's been established that he was also marked psychologically by the defense against the dead that he mounted along with Rozala and Louis. So when he declares his unlimited loyalty to Procer, is that sincere or is it really his unlimited loyalty to preserving the only source of enough meatshields to potentially keep the Dead King from claiming him personally? I don't think it's a relevant distinction as far as his actions/goals currently go, but it sure does affect how sympathetic I am towards him as a person.

Liliet

>That's important. That kind of pathological personality type is almost 100% motivated by self interest, because no one and nothing else is actually real to them. A Useful Monster is still a monster

I would refrain from passing blanket moral judgements on entire types of neurodiversity.

And I would point to Hakram.

Euodiachloris

Seconded. o/

Fayhem

> I would refrain from passing blanket moral judgements on entire types of neurodiversity.

From the Mayo Clinic's definition of Antisocial Personality Disorder (the clinical diagnosis associated with what is more informally called sociopathy/psychopathy):

"Antisocial personality disorder, sometimes called sociopathy, is a mental condition in which a person consistently shows no regard for right and wrong and ignores the rights and feelings of others. People with antisocial personality disorder tend to antagonize, manipulate or treat others harshly or with callous indifference. They show no guilt or remorse for their behavior."

I'm pretty comfortable with considering that categorically bad.

Also, that's not Hakram. He was mistaken for that or something similar earlier in his life (specifically/ particularly by Juniper IIRC since he was a weird orc and she didn't know what to make of that), but AFAIK at this point everyone who made that assessment of him has reconsidered. And even if they hadn't, I would consider his POVs to be more than sufficient evidence against.

Mental Mouse

See my comments above, "coldblood" seems to mean something very different for an orc versus a human.

Euodiachloris

Somebody with a very high anti-social quotient can still work out that their best interests lie in not dying by pitchforks, tar and feathers. Procer has been building to some form of social revolt for a while, and it's very clear Anault picked up on that decades ago. And has attached himself to somebody he's decided has a social compass that works better than his, but who also has a chance of avoiding the worst outcomes due to their own "do what works" nature.

The social well-being is in his long term best interests, in this case.

Anti-social personalities are more than capable of working inside the Golden Rule, if only for reasons of enlightened self-interest. But, often in... interesting ways. Yet... it can work.

Fayhem

> Anti-social personalities are more than capable of working inside the Golden Rule, if only for reasons of enlightened self-interest.

I mean, sure? You don't really need to convince me of that since it was roughly the premise of my analysis (i.e., an antisocial personality type can choose to behave in a prosocial manner for reasons of self-interest).

Regarding the rest of your comment, none of that is currently supported in the text. It's not clear that Procer has been building to some form of social revolt (it's mode of government isn't particularly acceptable by our modern democratic standards, but it's very much typical for medieval governance and there's been no particular indication of unusual levels of social unrest outside the ambit of Hierarch using his aspect on people; for that matter, in preindustrial times on the rare occasions when popular revolt did occur it was generally wildly unsuccessful), it's not clear that Arnaud perceives that it is, it's not clear that he has any interest in overall social well-being beyond "hey let's not all die to the Dead King", and it 's not clear that his reason for attaching himself to Cordelia has anything to do with his (also unestablished in the text) perception of her having a superior social/moral compass. Maybe you're right! But there's no evidence that you are.

Liliet

Yeah.

And it's not like it's a detail that makes that much difference. Creating an impression of something like that without actually doing it is the kind of involved deception operation that's just not worth the cost.

(Rozala referred to it twice in her POVs, once somewhere in Crusaders or Kaleidoscope, once when coming south recently)

Shveiran

Isn't it worth it, though? It allowed him to be held in contempt both because of his supposed stupidity and annoying personality and because of his sordid habits. Schemers expect people to have skeletons in their wardrobes, allowing them to find one helps dissuading them from digging deeper.
I'd say it has its uses.

Or maybe he is a rapist.

Or maybe he is a rapist but went through with the act mainly to give people a skeleton to find.

My point is, I could see him crafting the rumor to make use of it. Compared to the ruse about his whole public and private life? That's small beans, so far as deception goes.

Liliet

Yeah. My point is, if he does not find the idea distasteful enough to reject the idea of making it a part of his image, odds are he also does not find it distasteful enough to craft an elaborate ruse about it instead of, just,

Blegh. I don't want to even think about this stuff.

Shveiran

You may have a point there. Still, we'll likely never know for sure and I can't say I mind the Guide doesn't really dwell on these topics.

Liliet

AGREED STRONGLY

talenel

Arnaud seems like one of those people without really any moral fiber. There are no lines I think he wouldn't cross in order to meet his goals. He doesn't seem to really care about any people either.

Now, is his goal right now something we can agree is relatively good and something Cat can work with? Yes. But it doesn't make him a pleasant person or a person I would want to be friends with. Especially because while his methods make more sense in a time of existential threat, I don't think they would change at all were they up against a lesser one.

Shveiran

I don't disagree, but most the characters of the Guide have a kill count in the hundreds at least. I don't think I could go have a beer with most of them, honestly.

talenel

I guess that's true. Still most characters in the series do have some sort of lines they won't cross. There's something more to them than purpose. Arnaud is not and it's kind of inhuman and repugnant in ways that the others aren't (Monsters like the DK not withstanding)

Shveiran

It's mostly a matter of perspective, though. To a sufficiently invested individual, the only real line becomes the goal itself.

I feel like Arnaud, like Amadeus, or Cordelia, or Pilgrim, or saint, or Cat, simply has a very specific goal that overshadows everything else. Though there may be a lot they would prefer to sacrifice on that altar, there is ultimately nothing they wouldn't if it was an absolute necessity.

Keep in mind, we have seen very little of him aside from the mask he wears in public and the one he uses when doing business.

He may very well have very human connections or passions, all we know is that they are, ultimately, overshadowed by his commitment to the well being of Procer.

I don't particularly like him myself, but I find him much more moral than many we have been introduced in this story. Then again, I do tend to favor characters that can look at the bigger picture, so that may very well be me.

Liliet

I basically agree with this perspective, and I like "To a sufficiently invested individual, the only real line becomes the goal itself." Well put ♥

Liliet

>Arnaud seems like one of those people without really any moral fiber. There are no lines I think he wouldn't cross in order to meet his goals.

These two sentences do not follow from each other, because 'there are no lines he wouldn't cross' also applies to

- Catherine
- Tariq
- Amadeus

>But it doesn't make him a pleasant person or a person I would want to be friends with. Especially because while his methods make more sense in a time of existential threat, I don't think they would change at all were they up against a lesser one.

That's a fair prediction.

I just really like the 'y'all are children and we're about to die if we don't look to the one (1) person here actively trying to save us' view.

talenel

But, at least for Tariq and Cat, I do believe that there is good intent there. That they wouldn't cross certain lines unless it were truly necessary. With Arnaud, I do think the goal matters more than any consequences. He would cross lines even if it was only to make things more convenient for him. He sort of reminds me of Black, just without any real care for other people, which is one of Black's main redeeming qualities.

Liliet

Mm, I'm not making that bet, but I'm not taking it either. Wonder if we'll ever know :3

nick012000

Fortunately, the Grey Pilgrim got rezzed, so hopefully he'll be able to get the Levantine forces to chill before things get too heated.

Faiir

Or the fact that he was rezzed by blasphemous forces will be treated as HERESY!

Liliet

Technically he was rezzed by his own Aspect, with the approval of the Choir of Mercy.

Somehow I don't think there are forces in play that actively want his name blackened badly enough to somehow try to play THAT.

(It is not how Bard operates either)

talenel

Hmmm, it seems to me that Bard has been very much working to ensure the status quo. Why wouldn't she want Pilgrim discredited and cast aside, so that the Grand Alliance fractures even more? So that villains and heroes stay to their respective sides and stop inter-mixing? Because those seem to be high priorities to me.

Liliet

>Hmmm, it seems to me that Bard has been very much working to ensure the status quo.

How does the creation of the League of Free Cities, and being disappointed by how it didn't shift the status quo, fit into this?

talenel

I guess I ascribe to the idea that Bard is a tool of the Gods (both Above and Below), to ensure that things don't change. And she can't actively go against that goal, despite any personal desires to the contrary. So while she is personally disappointed, it does not change what she must do.

talenel

This could be completely wrong, this isn't something I have so much evidence to back me up. Just a personal theory.

Liliet

The difference between us is that I believe she very much CAN, as long as it's not disobeying direct orders otherwise 😊

Faiir

I believe you're right.

Faiir

You may be right, with Pilgrim being the Bard's staunch defender.

I wonder if this will be used on the Trial of the Gods by a certain fan favorite character (actually I just forgot his name):

"Your angels ignore their own laws!"

Liliet

Anaxares? 😊

werafdsaew

Heroes are explicitly above priests in the hierarchy, since the former gets a mandate from Heaven.

Fayhem

Hey, it's not Warhammer 40K. Fanaticism doesn't always have to override rationality here; I'd honestly call fanaticism winning out more the exception than the rule.

Faiir

Weeeeeeeelll

Maybe in Praes.

And Callow, since, you know, most of the fanatics got killed in the last war?

Levantines, Bellerophon, Daoine, Keter, at least some Proceed principalities and WK's homeland look pretty fanatical to me.

Fayhem

Except for Bellerophon (Most Fair and Glorious of All Cities) I'm not really seeing it tbh. The Proceran House of Light/the Levantine Lanterns seem like they've been inclined towards being hardliners, but that's specifically the church elements.

The Levantines I'd describe as pretty ruthless (which is what happens when your national culture is defined by a group of classic Murderhobo Heroes) and consumed by honor duels and deed-seeking and etc., but not particularly ideologically fanatical as such.

Daoine have an overarching goal they are fervently committed to, but they've proven themselves more than willing to be highly pragmatic in how they pursue it; I don't think I can agree with describing being goal-driven as being the same as fanaticism.

Keter is for all intents and purposes one person, who again is not so much fanatical as supremely ruthless and amoral. If by Keter you meant the Serenity then fair, they're pretty thoroughly indoctrinated. They're also completely irrelevant to Calernian politics/society except as a renewable source of corpses for DK, which is why I wasn't counting them before.

WK's homeland (AKA Ashur)... hmm, not sure. We've had a very limited view of it; it seems like they've got a lot of ingrained societal rigidity, but again not sure I'd call that the same as fanaticism.

The League I (mostly) wouldn't call too fanatical overall; even the priestly-priestly city, Atalante I think, wound up joining the League forces despite them being effectively controlled by the Tyrant, a notably non-Heavenly individual.

Procer overall... not seeing it there either. The Lycaonese are diehards for sure, but to me at least that's a category that may overlap but is not the same as fanatics. And as for the Alamans and Arlesites... yeah, no. Just no.

Honestly, we've seen a lot of people/nations make mistakes and/or act poorly in the Guideverse. But a relatively small amount of that is what I could consider attributable to fanaticism as such. The Arch-Heretic declaration for sure counts, though that was (much) more from the church than from the state and was actively spurred on by Bard/Saint. Mostly the mistakes and bad behavior have been the kind you could get pretty much anywhere though.

Shveiran

I agree with Fayhem.

In my opinion, the Guide does a great job in inventing different fanatsy cultures, which are therefore based around different key values than our own. Since we often don't spend too much time in many of them, at first glance we may mistake "different" as "strange" and "strange" as "fanatic".

Also, they are medieval-like cultures. Most of the individual involved don't know how to read and learn of the world and of different cultures mostly through rumors. Travel is diffucflt for the common people and you mostly speak to those you know.

It is not a state in which putting oneself into someone else's shoes is a common approach. Educated individuals, which is who we read about? Sure, they are educated and smart enough to do it? Analphabeth farmers who never left their backwater village? Likely not.

The cultures are not fanatical, they are simply different and not really talking to each other.

Liliet

WELL PUT

Liliet

This.

Honestly, guideverse has less religious fanaticism than our own world, mostly I suspect due to people with traits that would override any such tendency getting Heavens' Mandates.

tkjarrah

""In that spirit, Princess Rozala Malanza, as commander of the Principate's southern armies I charge you with the preservation of Queen Catherine Foundling's life and the safeguard of her armies and associates. Should the Dominion strike at her, you are to take any measures short of open war with Levant to prevent conflict reigniting between Callow and the Grand Alliance.""
i see you ee setting up the perfect slowburn enemies-to-lovers scenario

Liliet

Three-way, too.

TeK

I ship Louis and Rosalia though.

Insanenoodlyguy

The new tragedy of the diplomacy arc. The princess realizes her right hand man is more than just a friend, but now she finds herself on a new battlefield when he despondently keeps sleeping with half of the present callowans in his own stupor over no longer being of standing with the woman he loves (and none of the callowans caring). She must muster the courage and the words to get him back, and then figure out what to do when the Callowans just figure that means threesomes. And can anybody match the lovemaking standard set by Adjutants new hand? (It has lube and vibrates, Masegos other father had helped with this one)

Faiir

I don't think I could see Arnaud as a romance target – he seems too much like sociopath.

I don't mind you shipping them of course 😊

ninegardens

Louis is the bookworm. Arnaud is the creepy creep. Seperate dudes.

Liliet

Rozala has two hands~

Walter

Hasenbach Is playing nice with Cat for arranging the truce. I wonder how much bitterer the taste in her mouth will be once she learns of the resurrection she pulled while a Choir stood by?

Andrew Mitchell

Why would Cordelia be bitter over the resurrection? Its a good thing that GP is alive to help with the Dominion.

IDKWhoitis

It completely undermines the Arch Heretic of the East declaration, and adds a fuck ton of legitimacy to Cat's claim to the throne and the schism that is currently undergoing. It is a political disaster and a theological backhand across Cordelias face.

werafdsaew

Except Cordelia is not the one who wants to label Cat Arch Heretic, and in fact tried to fight against it. The Procer House of Light is a rival to her influence, so this is actually good thing for her.

caoimhinh

Keep in mind that Cordelia was not the one who declared her Arch-heretic of the East, that was Bard's plot with the assembled priests of the House of Light.

It's not really a political disaster, but it does start to put a stop to all the political bullshit that Cordelia and Pilgrim had used as excuses on the way of sitting down and signing peace with Catherine and Callow. The Crusade was launched against Praes, though. Hilariously enough, they had gotten nowhere close to it (except for the fleet in Thalassina and another port city I don't recall, which was sacked by Asur), yet Praes is burning in their inner conflict due to the Goblins and that High Lady of the Moderates who wants to rebel.

NerfGlastigUaine

It was Nok, by the way.

caoimhinh

Thanks~

Liliet

>it does start to put a stop to all the political bullshit that Cordelia and Pilgrim had used as excuses on the way of sitting down and signing peace with Catherine and Callow

Those were not excuses, those were legit obstacles. Both of them wanted it, we know as much from Cordelia's literal own POV at least.

This is a gift, for her.

caoimhinh

But those obstacles were political bullshit.

Pilgrim's concern was "If I ask Levant to have peace with Callow, it will be seen as weakness on Cordelia and thus she will be deposed from her position, and her dreamed Grand Alliance would fall apart". Which translate as him caring more about the possible dream of Cordelia more than the lives in Callow, luckily he stopped that attitude later on and realized that the world of today must not suffer for the 'world that would be'.

Cordelia's concern was "This Crusade which I started at first is now out of my control and I can't force it to stop because that would get me deposed if I were to oppose the House of Light, as they would ally with my political opponents. So now I must carry on and face Callow and Praes in a head-on confrontation despite my plan to fight them in a more subtle and smart way". She never had the intention of having peace with Catherine, she just planned to fight her in a more indirect way instead of marching the crusade against the whole of Callow, as the declaration of Arch-heretic of the East made Callowans close ranks against Procer and back-up Catherine even more fiercely plus making it impossible for the Crusade to stop until there was either a clear victory or a crushing defeat, because compromise would see Cordelia removed.

Those weren't even much of an obstacle for Procer as a whole as they were obstacles for Cordelia as a ruler of Procer.

You will find that none of the things before has changed, yet the people in charge are seeing things in a different way, and that suddenly changes everything and agreements can be reached, which signifies they could always do it, yet refused because of personal agendas and found good excuses for shielding their objectives A.K.A political bullshit.

Liliet

>But those obstacles were political bullshit.

Yes. Yes, they were. Political bullshit is people's lives, that's why people are forced to take it into account.

>Which translate as him caring more about the possible dream of Cordelia more than the lives in Callow,

The "possible" dream?

Cordelia started the forging of her alliance from stopping the raids between the south of Procer and Levant. Literally there was an ongoing border war that she stopped.

Cordelia's very much real and realized dream IS to stop wars. The lives in Callow lose out to lives in Procer and Levant just by numbers.

> as the declaration of Arch-heretic of the East made Callowans close ranks against Procer and back-up Catherine even more fiercely plus making it impossible for the Crusade to stop until there was either a clear victory or a crushing defeat, because compromise would see Cordelia removed.

Which is why Cordelia tried desperately to stop this declaration?

Let's not forget that the moment everyone refers to when they hate on Laurence, the "let Procer burn" moment, was her explaining to horrified Cordelia why exactly she threw her influence on the scales to get Cat declared Arch-Heretic of the East.

It was that act, specifically, that both Cordelia and her referred to as the imminent destruction of Procer.

>You will find that none of the things before has changed,

The things that have changed:

- Cordelia's de facto usurpation of the Highest Assembly removes the possibility of her making a smart move only to be removed before she can go through with it. She can now treat with whoever the fuck she wants, and unless there is an uprising and she is overthrown by force of arms, her diplomacy stands;

- and on that note, with the Dead King invading, nobody is braindead enough to rebel against her until the war is over. A peasant revolt is one thing, the Princes and Princesses know better;

- and on that note, she might just be giving up on her long-term Grand Alliance objectives in favor of short-term survival, as becoming a de facto tyrant like this eats into her political capital viciously.

Tariq was just getting thrown by the storm here and there; he is not a politician and not good at this. He did whatever seemed like the best thing to do at the moment; that has changed like three times by now. His judgement is questionable; his good intentions are not.

Andrew Mitchell

> – and on that note, she might just be giving up on her long-term Grand Alliance objectives in favor of short-term survival, as becoming a de facto tyrant like this eats into her political capital viciously.

So it's a good thing that Cordelia is setting Rozala up to take over as First Prince once Cordelia's efforts are spent. I've suspected this for quite a while now and this chapter was another step along that path.

talenel

Eh I definitely don't buy that Cordelia wanted anything to do with Rozala taking over after her. She's just been in the right position at the right time where Cordelia has been forced to put her in positions of power. Even then Cordelia has kept several knives to the back of Rozala. Honestly Rozala feels much more the parallel of Abigail in Callow. Not the heiress apparent, but someone more militarily inclined who has stumbled their way to greater power despite a general lack of political acumen.

Now, since Rozala is in a position of power and is relatively principles, Cordelia pretty much has to use her. But she is by no means a groomed heir ala Black and Cat, nor is she a desired one. She is simply a good tool.

Andrew Mitchell

I can see how your interpretation makes some sense on the surface but I still support my theory as what's going on behind the scenes. So I think we'll just have to see how this one turns out over the course of this book and the next.

Liliet

Huh.

You know, that might be exactly right.

Andrew Mitchell

Oh, I hope so! 😊

It's my new favourite theory and I'm in love with it!! ♥ ♥ ♥

Liliet

I feel like it might be too much of a villain-side trope – groom the successor who will defeat you – for it to occur to Cordelia, but if that is not so, it fits her MO 100%

Shveiran

You bring up a lot of good points, in my opinion.

The part I disagree about is the idea that Cordelia was concerned with stopping wars. My read is that Cordelia was (and is) concerned only with Proceran prosperity. Which isn't that absurd a view for a ruler, but it does stain her moral a bit.

She wanted a Good coalition, but that was because, as per Malicia's analysis in Book 3, she had too many desperate veterans not to be a war and had to somewhat secure her borders: attacking an Evil nation with the backing of Ashur and Levant was the way to solve her conflict for Praes.

She has never showed to be overly invested in stopping deaths in general, only with long term prospects for Procer.

She may yet get on board with cat's dreams, but she doesn't share it yet and has certainly not worked toward them on purpose, if not at all.

talene1

This. Cordelia is much more interested in Procer as a nation-state and the ideals of the Lycaeonese then she is in the people of Procer as a whole. I could definitely see her letting half of the population of Procer die I'm exchange for preventing Procer from being conquered by someone else, even if that would let far more of her people survive.

Liliet

I am not sure where this reading comes from.

Lycaonese ideals ARE to protect people.

Liliet

>She has never showed to be overly invested in stopping deaths in general, only with long term prospects for Procer.

I think she has that basic Good/good moral foundation, she's just Lycaonese. She doesn't have the view that 'no deaths' is the default or an achievable goal. She was brought up with the 'lesser evil' mentality so we're not seeing traces of idealism in her POV that would be there with otherwise.

talene1

Yes, but where Cat could and would work with the DK to save her people, I don't think Cordelia ever would, even if it meant every single Lycaeonese died or half or all of Procer as I mentioned above. That's my point. That her people, any people, do not come above certain moral beliefs. It's one of the main differences between her and Cat.

Liliet

I mean, Cordelia high key knows better than that wrt DK

talenel

I think you and a lot of other posters are way too optimistic about Cordelia as fighting for peace. Cordelia has never been about peace, but about fighting the true threats. The Dead King, the Chain of Hunger, etc. She has always been about Good fighting Evil smartly and to stop righting each other instead of the Enemy. Always

It's the whole point of the Lycaeonese. They fight against the great Evil. They do whatever they must in order to do so. Her people can die as long as it is serving this Greater Good. It's why she really didn't, and to a smaller degree still doesn't, want to work with Cat because she is Evil.

Now is Cordelia more practical and willing to see beyond that yes? Yes. She's no Saint of Swords. But she definitely has some biases here and does not desire peace like Cat does.

Insanenoodlyguy

Cordelia is not particularly interested in fighting for peace right now. But she is very interested in fighting for SURVIVAL. If peace is the path to that, she'll take it without blinking. Previous motivations for her (and Rozala, and a few others) have been superseded by this pressing change in priorities. It's why Rozala has been saying for some time now "We can't be fighting the black queen right now, why the fuck was I marched to the south, if the north falls we are all dead, all of us!"

talenel

I agree with your take. I do believe a lot of people have been viewing Cordelia with very rose-colored glasses here and seeing her as almost an analogue for Cat and Cat's ultimate goal of peace for Callow/Calernia.

Cordelia has not been focused on peace as her ultimate goal by any stretch of the imagination.

Agent J

I'm at a loss for words. Multiple people in this very same thread seem to have found this strange idea and then clamped down on it like a damn rottweiler.

Cordelia is not fighting for peace? Of course she bloody is! Her vision of peace is specifically what drew the Grey Pilgrim to her cause, why he supported her unwaveringly against all Cat's exceedingly generous offers.

Granted, much like Cat, it is peace on chosen terms, but peace nonetheless. The fight she meant to bring to Praes was just the start. She would then turn on the Chain of Hunger and, inevitably, the Kingdom of Dead. One by one, she meant to wipe Evil from the continent. In her own words she knew that peace would not be achieved in her lifetime, but that she was building the groundwork for it.

Peace, singularly, has ever been Cordelia's goal. She just went about it differently. Cat seeks peace by way of coexistence, Cordelia, by enveloping the entire continent in the Light of Above.

You may agree with Catherine's path more than hers, but to say Cordelia does not seek peace at all and only serves Proceran interests is to grossly misrepresent the woman. We've seen by her own POV and Tariq's that it's blatantly not true.

Shveiran

Yeah... but that is not "peace" though. That is "I killed all possible enemies and thus, so long as we avoyd civil wars, we are done fighting."

Mind you, if not for the assumption that because of Narrative-physics-laws" I'm operating under the assumption that the balance is enforced, and thus ultimately her plan is pointless because if you wipe out Evil somewhere it pops out of somewhere else – if not for that assumption, Cordelia (or Saint) sound perfectly reasonable. It is hard to argue with eliminating the Chain of Hunger or the Dead King, honestly.

And Cordelia's approach to the problem is preferable to most, in my opinion.

I just disagree that this is fighting for Peace. Peace is something you make with an enemy to end a war. What Cordelia wants is winning that war. And that is not peace, it is victory.

It is not a despicable goal nor anything, but it is not the same thing.

Liliet

@Shveiran if your enemy IS strife, like... backed up by the Gods who like strife and encourage and enforce it where they can... then victory = peace is reasonable, because you're certainly not getting peace any other way.

Cordelia believed that the path to peace is through victory. That might be factually speaking an error, but does not invalidate the point about her core goals.

talene1

As I said below, I just don't think Cordelia sees peace as really possible in the way Cat does. She wants to end the major threats, but war will happen even among the good nations as the alliance falls apart once the threats sustaining it are gone. There's this sort of inevitability to war that I've always found colored in Cordelia's mindset.

Pilgrim I do think saw a final peace to Cordelia's plans that she did not. Because for all of his utilitarianism, he has an optimism that the world can be really better that she does not.

Shveiran

I can see why she'd go about it that way, but I remain convinced that is not the same thing: Cordelia is playing the game and trying to ensure the side she feels is best wins in the best way possible, whereas Cat is aiming to change that game.

I am not saying I find Hasenbach approach to be a bad one, merely drawing attention to the fact that she and Cat have been working toward a different goal.

That may yet change, if Cordelia and Cat talk honestly and the First Prince is persuaded. So far, though? Cordelia has been about uniting the Good side, and win the war with EVil in Calernia. Beating the enemy, not making peace with it.

When you look at their ultimate objectives, you could say Cordelia has been acting as a General, whereas Cat has been trying to be a Diplomat. And that blows my mind a little.

Andrew Mitchell

I think you had the right view when you said Cordelia is about fighting the true threats. But I think you're wrong when you bring in Evil, Good and the Greater Good. The Lycaeonese defend against true threats. I don't think Cordelia really gives a shit about Good vs. Evil except where its politically expedient to use that.

talene1

Hmmm, I guess I agree that she is working against the true existential threats. But I do believe that she definitely sees Evil and Good. She just sees them in shades of grey. The Free Cities are more of a light grey while Cat is a dark grey. And of course the Enemy is black (or at least really really really dark grey). Now is she practical enough to see past Good and Evil if necessary? Yes I do believe that. But it does color her worldview.

Liliet

>Cordelia has never been about peace, but about fighting the true threats.

I am not seeing the distinction.

She has always pushed for peace among those who AREN'T true threats so they can unite AGAINST the true threats. It's consistently been her methodology.

>to stop righting each other instead of the Enemy ya, exactly

I don't believe she thinks of Catherine Foundling as The Enemy, unlike Laurence.

And yes, her perspective differs from Catherine, because she is Lycaonese and her default is fighting against ratlings every spring, while Catherine is from Laure and the default she grew up with is peace whenever there isn't war.

I don't think their perspectives are in any way incompatible.

talene1

I guess the way I see it, there's this sort of nihilism to the Lycaeonese mindset. This belief that the war will never end. What can happen is that Procer can finally end its two most existential threats (DK and Chain of Hunger). But will the war against Evil end? No. Will Good stop fighting itself when the Enemy is gone? No.

So yes, I do see it as Cordelia not believing in the existence of a true peace the way Cat does. It's something that having more interactions with Cat may eventually convince her of. That the better world doesn't necessarily have to include war. So while their views aren't necessarily incompatible, I think Cordelia will struggle to find the optimism to believe in them. Especially after the crushing blow she was dealt by Bard and Saint.

Also, while she doesn't think of Cat as the capital-E Enemy, she does think of her as evil and dangerous, just not the main threat (at least as of their last meeting). It's something she will have to learn to see past.

Liliet

Yeah, struggling with optimism is something I can easily see with Cordelia, especially after all this bullshit.

I will note though, she genuinely believes in the "we are the wall" mindset. She's pessimistic, but idealistic, too.

talene1

>Yeah, struggling with optimism is something I can easily see with Cordelia, especially after all this bullshit.

I will note though, she genuinely believes in the "we are the wall" mindset. She's pessimistic, but idealistic, too.

It's those ideals that also separate her from Cat as I mentioned above. She thinks certain things are more important than people, in a way Cat does not.

Liliet

I mean, those things more important than people are... larger amounts of people.

"We are the wall" for other people and future generations, not for a church or something.

Liliet

AKA helps Cordelia Hasenbach immensely in all her endeavours, gives her position a lot more strength that it currently has and backhands those who went against her / behind her back.

Andrew Mitchell

Cordelia's moved on. She's 100% focused on fighting back against the Dead King now. She wants the Alliance to stay together so the Levantines join in the fight against the Dead King.

stevenneiman

Also, Cordelia is a total pragmatist. She's not going to throw a fit about the way that she got a lost asset returned to her faction when she's going to need the Pilgrim some time in the next one to six months.

Mental Mouse

> I wonder how much bitterer the taste in her mouth will be once she learns of the resurrection she pulled while a Choir stood by?

Not very, and all the sweeter for Cat having perma-killed Saint!

As others have noted, condemning Cat as Arch Heretic not only wasn't Cordelia's will, but was a "fast one" pulled on her via the Houses of Light et al. Specifically, by the late Saint of Swords, who told Cordelia cheerfully that she intended to see Procer utterly destroyed and build something "better" in its place.

So now Saint is dead, and "not a hero's death". While the Grey Pilgrim (who was always well-disposed toward Procer and pushed his own nation to ally with them), comes back in triumph... with what's essentially an angelic pardon for Cat, and ready to slap sense into a few (or more than a few) priests.

Shveiran

The part I think tastes bitter is having to ally with Cat.

I don't think Cordelia wants to be her enemy, mind you, but she doesn't want to be her ally much more.

Allying with Callow is, now, a political and strategical necessity. And so, like the pragmatist she is, Cordelia goes out of her way to ensure it.

That doesn't mean she likes it. The Black Queen scares her, is obviously growing in influence and power with any passing week, and has radical plans she can't fully understand and therefore plan around.

Whatever else she is, Cat is also a problem for Cordelia. One she has to live with it, but the bitter taste is there.

Insanenoodlyguy

I'm pretty sure with the way things fell that Cordelia is going to be much more amenable to everything now, and incidentally, so will Rozala.

Cat is going to sit down with them and, perhaps not at the main table, but on the side, say "Look, Saint was a fucking lunatic, and I'm half convinced she decided to lean into the 'All hope is lost' story by letting there be a fuckton of casualties so the survivors could win at the last moment. I had to put that crazy lady down so we could try to win this without the death of an entire nation first. Also, I've got these accords that will keep us named from having too much power, cause lets face it named have too much power." That's going to get both of those women nodding so hard their necks hurt at this point.

Andrew Mitchell

Yep.

Liliet

>The part I think tastes bitter is having to ally with Cat.

Pretty sure it's going to be 'OH THANK FUCK SHE'S AN ALLY WHEN IN POSITION OF STRENGTH OVER US'.

Cordelia does not I think have ideological hangups that prevent her from seeing Catherine as an attractive option for an alliance, and personally I've been seeing her POV as being rather sympathetic towards her (in a way it's not towards most of her Princes lmao). As soon as the facts align so Catherine IS an ally, I think it will be a relief for more reasons than just political expedience.

Soronel Haetir

Isn't it wonderful how the band keeps playing even as the barn burns down around everyone's head?

antoninjohn

Cat saved Procer and if Procer wants to keep being saved they can't kill her

caoimhinh

The problem is Procer's leadership are a bunch of ungrateful and untrustworthy people who only think short-term with their ambition.

Even Cordelia, though she thinks long-term in her ambitions, and she is also arrogant and stubborn. Then there's Arnaud, who has no ambitions (and according to Pilgrim, no emotions) and is also a long-time planner with a lot of patience.

werafdsaew

Well it's a good thing that Cordy is now a de facto dictator? I'm not sure if Cordy has ever been stubborn; arrogant yes, but not stubborn.

Shveiran

I very much agree on the stubbornness. Cordelia is (not unlike Cat) very used to have her way and shape reality according to her will. She doesn't react well to finding out she can't.

With that said... She is consolidating power in a time of crisis and ensure she has the ability to pass whatever law she wants in the coming years. Considering she very much wants to repel the DK first and foremost and that will requires coesive planning, I can't say I find that either unreasonable or bad for the side of the living in general.

I take it you feel her plan is more about personal power and ambition?

Andrew Mitchell

Loved this interlude. I do like Rozala but she needs to accept the stakes of the game here.

Also, I see Rozala is going to be a supporter of The Accords given the insight we just got into her view of Chosen and Damned.

caoimhinh

She needs to ally with Cat to put a break on Cordelia's 'I am the Senate!' scene. Cat has the means to help Rozala's bloc to get their successors into the High Assembly fast.

Liliet

I somehow suspect Catherine is going to approve of Cordelia's move here. It is strategically smart in this war, even if in the long term it's likely to have her labeled villain for ages to come. Catherine... sympathizes with that approach.

Sure she's found herself treating with Rozala's faction specifically, yet let's not forget it's Rozala's faction that were the expansionists who wanted to divide Callow up.

caoimhinh

True, but I think Cat would support Rozala, even if it's just so Cordelia doesn't have a completely unopposed grasp on Procer. One of Catherine's musings and observations of Rozala hinted at her finding interest in the factions opposing Cordelia. Let's not forget that Procer and Cordelia are still enemies of Catherine and Callow; Cat might want them focused against the Dead King now, but she doesn't want them united and strong.

Liliet

> Let's not forget that Procer and Cordelia are still enemies of Catherine and Callow; Cat might want them focused against the Dead King now, but she doesn't want them united and strong.

Actually that's the exact opposite of how Cat wants it. She wants to unite the continent in a treaty; the Dead King merely provides a convenient excuse for forcing everyone into being friends. The GOAL is the peace; the military alliance is the MEANS.

We'll see how it plays out, it's worth noting Catherine doesn't have access to Cordelia's thoughts and doesn't know how badly Cordy wanted to make peace with her. But Catherine also thinks of Cordelia as the rational actor she can treat with by presenting her with a superior path and expecting her to take it without pride or stubbornness getting in the way.

caoimhinh

No, Catherine needs them in a balanced position of being not too strong and not too weak for them to sign the Accords. She already knows this, and many of the strategies and tactics we have seen her use, plus the insight we have into her thoughts show us how she has pondered about the state of Procer and the rest of the Grand Alliance, and her intended way to force them into making peace with her.

Cordelia doesn't want peace with Catherine, we have seen this from her point of view, she sees Cat as a violent and cruel warlord, and is constantly planning how to put Catherine down.

When Cordelia found out about the conclave of the House of Light in Salia declaring Catherine Arch-heretic of the East, she was furious, because that would only agitate Callowans and make them despise Procer even more, which would drive them to gather further under Catherine's control. Cordelia had plans to handle the situation in subtler ways, even with the Crusade, but Procer's priesthood meddling in Callow's affairs and the legitimacy of their Queen would detriment her plans.

Liliet

>Cordelia doesn't want peace with Catherine, we have seen this from her point of view

So we have.

>. In the wake of that blow, like carrion to carnage, the self-proclaimed Kingdom of Callow had sent formal request to join the Grand Alliance.

> [...]

> A choice had to be made, then, in how Cordelia would spend her influence. She could either make quiet concessions and assurances behind closed doors so that no coalition of princes numerous enough to unseat her formed, or she could call in every favour she'd accumulated since her crowning to have the proposal shoved through the Highest Assembly's throat.

>She'd been teetering on the brink of a decision, when Catherine Foundling called on her.

Note how Cordelia was on the verge of SPENDING EVERY SINGLE FAVOR SHE ACCUMULATED SINCE BECOMING FIRST PRINCE on accepting Callow into the Grand Alliance. She was willing to blow her ENTIRE political capital on that.

> And yet when she had sat across Cordelia in that strange shadowed world, she had made a reasonable offer. Abdication, if on her own terms. Alliance against the Empire, for assurances of Callowan independence. And so the First Prince had hesitated.

> Then reality had come calling, of course. It was a tempting offer, as devils were wont to provide, but it would shatter the Grand Alliance. The Dominion's highborn would never brook such a compromise willingly, and twisting their arm into accepting it would make it certain Levant would withdraw from the Alliance the moment the Tenth Crusade ended. The Thalassocracy might agree, as Magon Hadast disliked having his finest war fleets abroad while Nicae stirred near his belly, but it was no sure thing. And if Cordelia accepted the Callowan offer, backed it in the Highest Assembly and proposed it to the Grand Alliance only for it to be spurned by her own allies? She would be unseated within the month. For a moment she dared to walk the line anyway, to try to secure such an overwhelming diplomatic triumph that not a soul would be able to deny she had won the war with words instead of swords.

Catherine's more specific deal was unacceptable to her BECAUSE SHE WOULD NOT BE ABLE TO ENFORCE IT

caoimhinh

Oh, Cordelia sees that Catherine's offer is reasonable. That's the reaction of literally everyone when Catherine makes an offer, they all say "oh, this is a good offer, if I accepted there would be peace", then comes the bunch of excuses, political bullshit and personal issues covered with arrogance and stubbornness that make them say "NO" and then they all suffer because of it. Then they come back and blame Catherine for it and call her a monster for the things she did to protect herself and Callow due to their refusal of her offers. Literally every time, Cat has had to force them to accept her offers, they only accept when they are beaten.

1. She doesn't trust Cat, and specifically says it comparing her to devils making a reasonable offer.
2. She doesn't accept because doing it would have her unseated, meaning that it's a personal reason, a selfish thing.
3. She proceeds to say that to have the Grand Alliance obey such thing would require a lot of favors and political capital. She is not saying "I would do it if it weren't so costly", she is noting how absurd the notion of accepting it is and how everyone in the Grand Alliance is likely to refuse, thus making it costly to force the decision on them.

4. She then is tempted to accept because if what Catherine said was true and the offer was real, accepting it would mean an amazing diplomatic victory for Cordelia and bring her prestige for "winning the war with words instead of swords".

No, Cordelia doesn't want peace with Cat, she wants Procer strong, and crushing Praes and Evil (the Grand Alliance was formed by mounting the Crusade, after all), she also wants Catherine removed.

Cordelia had plans in place, but the House of Light's actions (prompted by Saint and Bard) threw those plans aside and instead of a smart and careful Crusade they went on a full-on bloodpath uniting their enemies against them. That's said in one of the Fatalism Extra Chapters.

You are trying to make it seem as if Cordelia would want Catherine and Callow in peace but was forced to attack them and is now forced to keep fighting. But the reality is different, she engineered the Crusade against Praes and Callow to stabilize her own rule over Procer, using it also to establish the Grand Alliance because making joined military operations is a way to form alliance between countries. She also ended the border skirmishes with Levant because she needed them on her side if she wanted to fight against Procer.

Cat's offers are also unacceptable because they dismantle the whole political apparatus that Cordelia and co had built on the premise that there can be no peace with the Evil-aligned countries (which is an hypocrisy, really, as Praes and Procer have commercial deals all the time, using intermediaries for the sake of appearances).

Shveiran

My personal take is that truth lies in the middle here.

Cordelia has political necessity to consider, and it isn't foolish not to do something one thinks is doomed to failure: if Levant leaves the Grand Alliance, its weight is nullified and Callow being a part of it no longer matters in the first place. If Cordelia is unseated, her plans with the Grand Alliance die with her.

These are not selfish reasons: these are practical limits to her options.

With that said, I agree that Cordelia has never put much effort toward peace with Callow, since the beginning. She did, after all, send her political opponents to carve it up would they had been victorious, in a fight she very likely did not expect to lose. Sending reasonable Princes in Callow and the greedy bastards in the Vale against the Black Knight would have been better for Callow, but Cordelia prioritized sending her best general without internal opposition against Grem One-Eye and the Carrion Lord.

Again, NOT UNREASONABLE, but it does clarify her priorities. A Callow paved over by her armies was a perfectly acceptable plan to her.

Afterward, she made no effort toward peace. She had reasons, sure; she still did nothing, though, which means it still wasn't a priority.

Lastly, she told Rozala to kill 'em all after recalling her from the north.

And, yes, Augur. But still, she didn't try any compromise even if she knew the other party was willing to deal. She didn't even try to set up a Winter-bullshit-connection to see if that bypassed scrying and try to deal in person, instead relying on someone that could not really make a lot of concession and would have to ultimately do battle to keep with her instructions (Malanza).

I don't think Cordelia is mad or even despicable, but she has not tried to compromise with Cat so far. I really don't get that vibe from the quotes Lilieth provided.

caoimhinh

I agree with you.

Cordelia has to consider multiple angles before making a decision, both because she is the leader of her people and because she has enemies everywhere. There are also practical and political reasons why making peace with Callow would be met with opposition (many of those are actually personal opinions of individuals in power), but nothing so far suggests that Cordelia in a personal level would like peace with Catherine. In every single instance we have seen Catherine mentioned or seen from Cordelia's POV, it's either contempt, fear or anger that's there, not the desire for peace.

Lilieth

>She did, after all, send her political opponents to carve it up would they had been victorious, in a fight she very likely did not expect to lose.

She very much expected them to lose, actually, that's what Catherine called her out on in their conversation. She expected to win at the Vales, the northern expedition was more of a diversion / knife in the back, and she expected them to be crushed.

It's in her narration in Fatalism I I believe that she never had the slightest intention of annexing any part of Callow.

>Lastly, she told Rozala to kill 'em all after recalling her from the north.

I believe you are misremembering, because Rozala's orders were "inflict a showy defeat then leave them to retreat while you make a show of handling the League instead, literally the only reason we can't just fucking ally with them is that Augur said there will be a revolt if we do, so work around that"

Liliet

>She didn't even try to set up a Winter-bullshit-connection to see if that bypassed scrying and try to deal in person

We don't know she didn't. Let's not forget this only works if Cat sets it up: Cordelia might have been waiting for a summons from her every evening with 0 effect or any way for us or Cat to know of it.

Liliet

>2. She doesn't accept because doing it would have her unseated, meaning that it's a personal reason, a selfish thing.

Liliet

> 2. She doesn't accept because doing it would have her unseated, meaning that it's a personal reason, a selfish thing.

I disagree. Cordelia took that seat for a reason, because she believed she had to for her homeland's sake.

>You are trying to make it seem as if Cordelia would want Catherine and Callow in peace but was forced to attack them and is now forced to keep fighting. But the reality is different, she engineered the Crusade against Praes and Callow to stabilize her own rule over Procer, using it also to establish the Grand Alliance because making joined military operations is a way to form alliance between countries.

I am not seeing a contradiction between facts you refer to and facts I refer to. Cordelia got the Crusade going before Cat was in charge, and after getting updated information on Catherine and her capabilities would maybe have liked peace, but (1) all the reasons she started it in the first place, (2) too late.

Like... saying "I want X, but can't have it for reasons Y and Z" is not logically contradictory.

Shveiran

It is not contradictory.
It is also not a given she thinks that in any meaningful way, though.

In a vacuum? I think Cordelia would rather have Cat and Callow on her side than not, so long as she thought she had the power to check her influence. But she is the First Prince, so that is not an hard condition to meet.

But that is not really the same as saying she WANTS to achieve that. It's ... a bonus objective, not a beseeched one. If it falls in her lap or (like now) becomes a strategical good move or even a necessity? Let's, it's not liek she actively wanted Cat as an enemy.

I just think that if the situation was different – if getting Cat on board had a cost, Cordelia wouldn't be particularly inclined to bend over backward to get that.

She would weight the costs and benefits, and make a pragmatic choice. For good or for ill.

Liliet

I agree with this view, yeah.

Good thing her and Cat are on the same page about that last part!

Liliet

(Finally, finally they are! 😊😊😊)

Andrew Mitchell

I agree.

And remember how close Cat and Cordelia were to actually working together in those Winter chats they were having. It was just Procer's political realities that stopped true progress being made back then.

Shveiran

Like... when? I don't think they ever got past the phase Cat-makes-an-offer-and-Cordelia-refuses-by-asking-for-the-moon.

The fact that Cordelia couldn't agree to Cat options does not mean she really really wanted to. It just means she couldn't agree.

Andrew Mitchell

Having re-read the relevant chapters:

<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2018/04/18/chapter-3-chat/> and <https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2018/08/24/interlude-empires/>

I think I read too much into it and my recollection was mistaken.

Liliet

They were close in spirit.

Star-crossed allies? ;u;

Andrew Mitchell

Yes, but unlike star-crossed lovers, I think Cat & Cordelia will get together as true allies, and not just allies of convenience against the DK.

Shveiran

It certainly seems possible now, and I wholeheartedly hope they do.

Not a certainty, though... which admittedly makes it MORE likely, because we can have that and still have tension along the way.

Liliet

"Stars say what, now??" – Catherine, disdainfully

Liliet

Yeah, the 'really really wanted to' part came from Cordelia's POV, not Cat's POV.

Liliet

YEAH

Ben Serreau-Raskin

Oh this is going to such a fantastic shitshow. I cannot wait.

ATRDCI

"[Rozala] pondered her growing mislike of the Chosen and the Damned. Those colourful few, cloaked in power and mystery, who would bargain with the fate of nations and the pivots of history. Who left all others in the dust of their grandiose adventures, be they great or small. What a hateful thing it was, to have your own life and death decided by the hands of others."

Hmm, now who does that shroud of mystery, neverending adventures, manipulation of fates pivots, and callous disregard for spending the lives of others sound like?

Glares at the Intercessor

Traipsing Troubadour

Today you are glaring at me, and I am drunk.

But tomorrow you will be dead, and I will... still be well.

grzecho2222

Still waiting for Bard vs Robber art duel

Mental Mouse

And of course, this suggests Rozala will be all for the Liesse Accords.

Mental Mouse

Intercessor points at Cat 🙄

Oshi

It's always the quiet ones. I think the most significant thing here is The Liesse Accords are now shared with someone outside of Cat's circle. Best part is it was shared with one of my favorite characters in this book anyway.

Zebu

Love the interlude! Still trying to parse Cordelia, but that's a good thing.

There are a few things I think are spelling/grammar errors, though— is this where to leave them?

Left column is current, right is my guesstimated correction:

"family mighty yet" "family might yet"

"prominence against in" "prominence again in"

"thousands and held" "thousands, and held"

"which was Rozala" "which was why Rozala"

"was a one of the Gods" "was one of the Gods"

"she realized being tricked" "she realized she'd been tricked"

"Swords and then" "Swords, and then"

"with snap of" "with a snap of"

"withdrawn but they" "withdrawn, but they"

"but dclined Princess" "but declined Princess"

"informed or recent" [Not sure about this one— "or" might be

"about," "of," or "on"]

"I did not escape" "It did not escape"

"than he. It" "than she. It"

"when there was no ruling prince" "when no ruling prince"

Mental Mouse

Just adding a search keyword near your message, for when EE gets around to Typo hunting.

stevenneiman

So I guess now we know what Mercy had that they expected would be enough to keep Tariq's death from bringing war, but I have to say that it doesn't seem like a good idea. Neshamah is Below's champion, and if Above gets to hand out information in such a blatant manner Below should have the right to at least one or two hints for Neshamah when the world can afford it least for him to know anything.

IDKWhoitis

What's worse, is that Nesh knows how to hold that in his back pocket for a rainy day. He isn't going to spend that easily or for a cheap advantage.

The argument can be made that Above could only do such things because Nesh won the previous scheme to undermine the Intercessor, but I find it more likely that Nesh might already have banked a lot more narrative weight over the course of a couple millennia

caoimhinh

And Neshamah conveniently has certain information that he is interested in spreading, about a certain Bard.

Mental Mouse

Yes, and that hurts the Alliance how, again?

Insanenoodlyguy

Depends on what it is. But if he can do the equivalent of this, it no longer matters what his standing is. These visions, it seems, are accepted as true. Presumably because the way they were projected left no doubt in anybody's mind that they were authentic and not fabricated. So, if Nessie can do the same, it's only a matter of when and what, no longer if. If the visions are fully 100% believed by all who have them, (and even if that's just heroes, that's enough. Consider the GREY PILGRIM screaming that she can't be trusted, you could probably do the whole thing through him alone if you timed it right since the Angels would likely confirm the truth of it no matter the source, and i'm sure it won't just be him), and Nessie believes that telling people would make them turn on her, he's probably right. Consider as well that Cat will likely back this, since she's ready and able to believe the Bard is not the force of good most believe her, and his threat seems a lot more plausible.

Mental Mouse

The thing is, if one person has a dream, it could be a Sending From Beyond, or too much pepperoni. If everyone has the dreams, it's a Sending.

Neshamah almost certainly can't match what the angels are doing – partly it would make him deeply vulnerable, because he'd be touching huge numbers of minds, some of which may be sorcerers, priests, etc (and would require an awful lot of power). And partly because if he tried broadcasting a false message, I'm pretty sure it would bring immediate and overwhelming retaliation from Above and quite possibly from Below as well.

Nessie certainly will reveal what he's learned, and probably publicize it widely – he's said as much as that's the point. But probably not immediately, because he'll want some time to work before the Bard knows he's learned it.

caoimhinh

We don't know yet, I guess that depends on what exactly that information is.

Neshamah was pretty sure it would turn everyone against the Intercessor once they knew about her plans and intentions.

Liliet

>Neshamah is Below's champion, and if Above gets to hand out information in such a blatant manner Below should have the right to at least one or two hints for Neshamah when the world can afford it least for him to know anything.

Eh, I'm not sure the balance is quite so blatant. Especially given that the price for this dissemination of visions was Tariq's death.

...was meant to be Tariq's death...

...well it's not the Ophanim's fault Cat went and fucked with a good plan, is it???

(Wait, it is. It literally is. LMAO)

Insanenoodlyguy

I don't think he needs to do the equivalent. He can probably do this informing exactly two people, come to think of it: Pilgrim and Cat. Both have patrons beyond mortal Ken, leaders of Good and Evil who can both confirm, even without dream help, that anything he tells them about Bard is true or false. If both the prominent Hero and Villain of the time are saying the same thing at the same time, it's going to reach EVERYWHERE. Dead King doesn't have to sell it to everybody, he just has to sell it to the merchants, to stretch the metaphor.

Liliet

Yeah, makes sense.

Dresden 67

Er, EE?

According to the map there are twenty-four principalities in Procer.

Nine Arlesite, eleven Alamans and four Lycaonese.

caoimhinh

Holy shit, the Saint of Swords also cut 3 of the Principalities momentarily out of existence, from the afterlife?
Too OP, please nerf.

Faiir

Maybe Absence ate them?

caoimhinh

Oh, so that's what Cordelia dragged out of the lake at the center of Procer.

Shveiran

I had forgotten about that! Well, it looks I might get around to hating Cordelia EVENTUALLY, after all. If she gets around to craft Great Breaches, she makes the list.

Liliet

We have to see what it is, first 😊

(Also, she's acting on Augur's prediction of the only possible path)

Mental Mouse

That could be ugly...

Shveiran

To be fair, we are not sure THAT is what she'll use the ruins for. It was also foreshadowed that Liesse as a ritual site could empower a wild array of workings, so maybe that's just EE preparing to pull the rug from under us and reveal Cordelia had another plan all along.

With that said... I wouldn't be very surprised if she was planning to get her fingers on the doomsday weapon. It isn't really an unreasonable direction for her character.

She was Malicia's enemy for a long time... and that usually brings one to adopt some of the enemy's habits and ideas.

Mental Mouse

Eh? Cordelia's find is still mysterious, but AFAIK it's got no connection to Liesse.

Shveiran

Doesn't it? I was 100% sure it was a part of Akua's array.

Though admittedly... why would I think that? The Second Liesse wasn't even close to a lake.

Uh.

So, scratch that about Breaches. What is it you think she fished out?

Mental Mouse

Unclear, but if the 3 “missing” Provinces aren’t simply a mistake, that’s a bad sign.

Come to think of it... did DK actually destroy any provinces before he departed?

Shveiran

Did we ever get confirmation Pilgrim got around to killing the Absence demon in Callow?

Mental Mouse

Well, there was a strong hint in that several heroes dropped out of the running count, but afterward there were no further disappearances and suchlike.

There is a classic SF novel that the Absence demon immediately brought to mind: War Of Omission by Kevin O'Donnell Jr. Somebody invents a device that can remove chunks of reality, people included... along with all the “connections” to them, such as people’s memories. An example from the book was that if somebody used it on a town’s mayor, the townspeople wouldn’t be asking “what happened to our mayor?”, they’d be asking “hey, why don’t we have a mayor?”. (The effect was also reversible, though it had subtle side-effects on the minds of the restored victims.)

The title hints at the fun-and-games ensuing as the invention gets mass-produced.

broadaxe

That is a really interesting perspective, most likely EE simply made a typo or some such, but maybe it was on purpose and everyone has literally forgot about 3 principalities, that would be kinda crazy and a huge plot twist 🤪

caoimhinh

I didn’t expect interludes to delay our seeing of the scene of Cat’s return with Pilgrim with the rays of dawn, but this could be good.

They've got Dreamer TV and are aware of most of what has happened in the shard of Arcadia because anyone who sleeps gets visions? Whaaaaat?

Well, that's new, put your random soldiers to sleep and when they wake up they have visual information to report of what's happening in a different realm of existence.

It's really weird that Rozala didn't know Hakram had authority in Callow, given that he has had it for years now and it was not a secret; besides, while Rozala is no skilled politician or schemer, she must have had intelligence on Callow (sure, the Jacks are a powerful counter-intelligence team but still, Hakram being Cat's right hand and having authority in Procer is no secret, EVERYONE knows that).

Also, it's nice to see the Liesse Accords being brought up to the attention of Procer finally, and Cordelia being so freaked out that she now has been forced to stop thinking she has the upper hand and finally willing to compromise.

Cordelia used a bureaucratic trick to keep all the abdicated princes and their successors away from the Highest Assembly. If I understood correctly, they need to communicate with their successors, have them go to each of their principalities to ascend to their positions and then go to Salia to sit in the Highest Assembly, before their word have any weight and their vote becomes valid, which Cordelia assumes would take months... How bad for her, Catherine has a bunch of mages capable of scrying, plus has just succeeded in the creation of a realm specifically designed to be a high-speed path to anywhere in Calernia (or the world). Hopefully Rozala will figure this out (she was there when the creation of such realm was discussed, after all), swallow her pride and start conversations with Catherine to get her bloc's successors to sit in the Highest Assembly fast. Maybe become closer to Cat in the process.

It would be very interesting to see actual cooperation between at least a part of Procer and Callow, plus Levant being brought to order by the Pilgrim's confirmed resurrection.

Next chapter: Levant's political intrigue and everyone in Iserre wondering what the hell will happen + a mandatory cliffhanger.

Typos found:

- against in her lifetime / again in her lifetime
- which was Rozala was less than surprised / which was why Rozala was less than surprised
- with snap of her fingers / with a snap of her fingers
- dclined / declined
- informed or recent developments / informed of recent developments
- he was physically stronger than he / he was physically stronger than her

Oshi

I think Rozala assumed Hakram was something brought on by influence from the Tower. A way to assuage them. She doesn't really see Eastern politics well and is bad at discerning motivations. It's her weakness. Put more bluntly she's a straight shooter looking at murky picture.

Liliet

>It's really weird that Rozala didn't know Hakram had authority in Callow, given that he has had it for years now and it was not a secret

Not weird to me. Information disseminates slow and hard in this setting for people who don't have scrying mages, and as Rozala has mentioned, in Procer only Cordelia has them.

>while Rozala is no skilled politician or schemer, she must have had intelligence on Callow

I am not surprised to learn she has not.

This is the whole thing people trip over when they yell about how the murderous warlike Grand Alliance attacked the poor innocent Dread Empire that was just starting to throw off its shackles of Evil and come into its civilized own.

Catherine grew up in Laure, the Reforms were no more a secret than Hakram's influence, and yet she still could not find out what they were even when actively seeking the information out.

>Also, it's nice to see the Liesse Accords being brought up to the attention of Procer finally, and Cordelia being so freaked out that she now has been forced to stop thinking she has the upper hand and finally willing to compromise.

Cordelia has not thought she had the upper hand since the Vales. And she has been willing to compromise since Vales, and she HAS been compromising, which is exactly WHY she made no accord with Catherine – she was forced to compromise with people who would not brook it.

Cordelia now finally HAS the upper hand. She finally has the opportunity to play this game the way she wants to, which is to say, the way Catherine has paved and surrounded with pretty trees and flowers for her.

>Hopefully Rozala will figure this out (she was there when the creation of such realm was discussed, after all), swallow her pride and start conversations with Catherine to get her bloc's successors to sit in the Highest Assembly fast.

That would be a bad thing, since it's Rozala's bloc who wanted to divide Callow up for spoils. They're Cordelia's opposition, in her horrible evil policy of reinforcing the north and NOT trying to profit from robbing neighbours. Well, people who oppose her evil policies and people who want revenge for her evil plot of stopping the Proceran civil war (which lasted TWO. FUCKING. DECADES before her intervention)

>It would be very interesting to see actual cooperation between at least a part of Procer and Callow, plus Levant being brought to order by the Pilgrim's confirmed resurrection.

AGREED WHOLEHEARTEDLY.

Andrew Mitchell

> Cordelia now finally HAS the upper hand. She finally has the opportunity to play this game the way she wants to, which is to say, the way Catherine has paved and surrounded with pretty trees and flowers for her.

YES!!!! (And about bloody time!)

> That would be a bad thing, since it's Rozala's bloc who wanted to divide Callow up for spoils. They're Cordelia's opposition, in her horrible evil policy of reinforcing the north and NOT trying to profit from robbing neighbours. Well, people who oppose her evil policies and people who want revenge for her evil plot of stopping the Proceran civil war (which lasted TWO. FUCKING. DECADES before her intervention)

And the ONLY reason Cordelia went to civil war and eventually took the reins as First Prince was that there was NO ONE else in the Assembly that could see the big picture and act in the interests of everyone.

Shveiran

"in the interest of everyone" in Procer. With that caveat, I agree completely.

Liliet

t h i s

Liliet

(well, to be fair, there were enough people in the assembly who saw the big picture for cordelia to gather serious support for her bid, there was just no-one else with her level of ability)

Euodiachloris

I'm greatly amused by the thought that Cordelia might be faced with a Barons' Revolt led by the the very faction that hates her guts all in high dudgeon over her tyrannical overstepping and waving... the very Accords, internal reforms and settlements with Callow she quite likes, anyway. Which would also ensure that shit like the Saint deciding Procer looks good in ashes wouldn't happen again...

I think Cordelia is a big enough girl to wear "King John" with pride, if it means Procer gets the Accords that aim to keep Named meddling in politics to a minimum.

And, it was their own idea to push for better checks and balances on themselves. Bless their cotton socks.

Liliet

Yeah. Agreed ♥

"Oh no, I am vanquished... (yo good job)"

Euodiachloris

"Oh, dear! A system of international accords, universal justice, checks and balances and forms of certified oversight that reach from the bottom all the way to the top... all of which will also incidentally strip principalities of the right to do as they please unimpeded by the pesky impartial oversight of their peers and other institutions! Curses, I am undone!"

IDKWhoitis

Man, playing spectator to Cat must be terrifying. And with no audio or subtitles. There's a lot of room for interpretation. Hopefully the Lev Blood got the same images as the Porcerans. Because if certain things are missing, it can look like Cat murdered Saint in cold blood, then forced Grey to commit suicide.

I want to know see the League perspective, and the smug smiles seeing Tyrant crawling back after getting his ass kicked... You got to know the Syrian magistrate won't be able to help themselves from saying something.

caoimhinh

Nah, they should at least have audio. And the visions, while scrambled and not completely given information, were clear enough that everyone knew Cat tried to stop Tariq from killing himself.

{It always seemed to centre around the same vivid parts: the Black Queen's scream of denial after she realized being tricked, the Grey Pilgrim taking up the blade of the fallen

Saint of Swords and then the wizened hero's taking of his own life. All who'd dreamt the dream agreed that the Black Queen had tried to prevent the Peregrine's death, though words failed them when they tried to explain why. Yet it seemed undeniable, by now, that both the Regicide and the Grey Pilgrim were dead. The former, if one of the growingly reoccurring visions was to be believed, having been slain by Catherine Foundling herself.}

So they got video, but no context, only isolated scenes without the before and after to explain why those things happened.

SITB

lol @ the Ophanim promising that Tariq's death wouldn't lead to a war; and then finding out that they sent everyone a vision of what happened to try and preempt this.

It's probably for the better that Cat revived Tariq despite Mercy's 'help'.

Clmineith

Actually, I wonder if the Ophanim don't just send the dream about Tariq's death, and someone else send the other, about her killing Laurance.

Maybe the Bard, who masters the storytelling better than anyone?

Liliet

It might have been easier, story-wise, for the Ophanim to just open up 'visions of what happened' as fair game for dreamers, in natural proportion to importance/impact, knowing that the exact manner of Tariq's death would take first place on its own.

And from there, it's all natural drawbacks. Note that the Levantines most likely don't give a shit about Regicide, she's not one of theirs.

Novice

Oh wow, it seems Cordelia is on her way to revoking the privilegia and thus uniting the Holy Roman Empire. Good job, girl.

TeK

Playing as Branderburg no less.

Novice

Those Lycaonese are gonna goose step their way to Keter.

Andrew Mitchell

Are there any Lycaonese left? I don't think there can be many left who can fight at all.

Mental Mouse

I dunno that she's that far along. At this point, she's just trying to keep the more aggressive principalities from making trouble before she can sort out the foreign-affairs situation.

NerfGlastigUaine

I love Interludes where they discuss Catherine, they really give you a sense of how terrifying she is. Remember when she was struggling with angsty anti-heroes and doing slapdash necromancy? Now she's moving nations, terrifying princes and going to town on the Dead King himself. Sniff, they grow so fast.

Still hoping for another undead suicide horse (goat) though. That trick never gets old.

Big I

I take exception to the Procerans saying Adjutant has no title. Didn't the Dread Empress make him a lord after First Liesse?

SITB

IIRC Malcia bestowed Hakram all the attendant privileges but not the actual title.

Liliet

Yep. Catherine commented that he could style himself as "Lord Adjutant" in public now, note how that was already the default way of referring to Named (Lord Black, etc), Hakram just had the problem of being an orc.

Javvies

Hmmmm.

Not sure how I feel about Cordelia's move to secure control over the succession of the seven crowns. I feel like this could backfire badly.

... These dreams appear to be a pretty terrible means of preventing disaster, if they're from the Ophanim.

TeK

Yeah, she would probably be forced to abdicate after the war with Keter. Probably to the some famous general who fought on the frontlines in the same war and is a leader of an opposition block second only to hers.

I wonder, who it might be...

Andrew Mitchell

Exactly.

Mental Mouse

So "Concourse I". Presumably another interlude for the Levantines next, and Friday will be the same for Callow's forces, and/or the triumphant return.

Lets hope Rozala doesn't manage to screw things up before then.

Mental Mouse

A quick thought about the triumphant return: Archer and RS can find paths, but Cat and/or Pilgrim can make gates. The latter pair might well get back first!

Liliet

I have thought about this already and it could be pretty amusing ;u;

Andrew Mitchell

> the triumphant return

At first I thought you were talking about the return of Triumphant. (May She Never Return.)

Shveiran

I wonder if we'll a League one too

TeK

"Seven crowns had been abdicated, this night. That meant that a perfect third of the Highest Assembly, which held twenty-four seats"

Urgh, um... Huh?

Is it a subtle clue that Rosalia is bad at math?

I also can't wait for her to kiss already Louis. She previously stated that the only reason she didn't get together with him before was that their crowns prevented it. HOW CONVENIENT! I thought it was a precursor to that nice bit of "they have a sexual tension but too professional to admit it" leading to true love winning in the end despite politics. Who knew it was a clever foreshadowing! I bet the whole Princes' Graveyard was so EE could ship them.

On the related note, Cordelia is so obviously setting up her abdication after the wr with Dead King and Rosalia as her succesor, it's not even funny. Can't for the love of me comprehend, why some people still hate on her. She is amazing, totally one my favorite unNamed characters, right after Amadeus, Cat, Robber and RUMENARUMENARUMENA.

Andrew Mitchell

> On the related note, Cordelia is so obviously setting up her abdication after the wr with Dead King and Rosalia as her succesor, it's not even funny. Can't for the love of me comprehend, why some people still hate on her. She is amazing, totally one my favorite unNamed characters, right after Amadeus, Cat, Robber and RUMENARUMENARUMENA.

I'm with you 100%. And I'd add Abigail to that list as well.

Mental Mouse

The First Prince thing is clearly meant to be a temporary measure in the face of crisis (see also: Roman "dictators"), and Cordelia shows no sign of wanting to change that.

Andrew Mitchell

Yes, in Chapter 3: Chat (Book 4) when Cordelia was talking with Cat she argued strongly for the Assembly's role as a check on the First Prince.

Shveiran

I think Cordelia wants both: to give the First prince more power to turn Procer into a proper federal state rather than an old coalition that mostly sticks together. Which would also make civil wars easier to avoyd. As is, I think most of the powers and responsabilities fall on the singular princes.

She wants those powers to be the First Prince's to make a centralized government.

But she doesn't want it to be free of checks, to prevent dictatorship. Hence, the Assembly not as the ones wielding the powers themselves, but as the one with the right to stop the First Prince from abusing them.

Or maybe not. I'd need a closer look at Proceran laws to make a better judgment call.

Liliet

I think Cordelia is just how changing her mind (and possibly not all the way through the process) on how attached she is to the way the Highest Assembly / First Prince cooperation is meant to work.

It's possible she only wants this to be an extremely temporary measure that will go to the status quo afterwards.

It's possible she wants to go to the status quo afterwards, but set/cement the precedent of the First Prince getting emergency powers.

It's possible she has changed her mind and now wants to centralize Procer more than it had previously been (contrary to the view she expressed in her conversation with Cat)

Liliet

It's a subtle clue that erratic is bad at math, because originally it said 'twenty one', everyone was like 'wut' and erratic fixed it ;u;

Mental Mouse

Oh, OK.

Mental Mouse

>Oh, OK

And I see that in the next round, he fixed the rest of Rozala's comment.

Liliet

The power of a hivemind at his beck and call~

Shveiran

I mean, EE was bound to be bad at SOMETHING, right?

Mental Mouse

I wouldn't even say "bad", just imperfect. This has grown into a very large and complex world, keeping track of everything is non-trivial.

Shveiran

Oh, I agree. It was a bad attempt at an off-hand compliment (suggesting he was great at everything else we saw) .

One day I'll manage to phrase one in a way that doesn't confuse people XD

Andrew Mitchell

♥

Liliet

Yep. Between timeline, distances and this, we have officially found the thing ♥

NZPIEFACE

When he said "Oh I made sure that my death won't cause war" I was not expecting the gods to literally live stream their adventure to everyone.

Shveiran

I'm really curious about the next chapter: like otehrs, I'm a bit underwhelmed at the Ophanim's plans to avoyd war, but maybe seeing things from the Levantines' perspective will make them sound much more solid. It will be interesting to see their reactions, that's for sure.

medailyfun

The story flow suggests they are going to move their forces to protect army of Callow from scheming procerans and the League

Shveiran

That'd be hilarious. I hope you are right.

Mental Mouse

Remember, from the Levantines' point of view Cat was clearly trying to save Pilgrim. And they don't care too much if she killed Saint.

Mental Mouse

I don't think the Ophanim committed to preventing the war altogether, but if the mortals wanna fight, it won't be over the Pilgrim's death.

Caerulea

I suspect that, when Catherine and Tariq finally emerge, somebody, or many, will believe that Cat reanimated Tariq's corpse. After all, she is a powerful necromancer, and they just watched her raise an army of the dead.

Mental Mouse

I don't think the army of souls was in the dream-broadcast, just the final squabble for the crown.

Liliet

Louis and Rozala talked about it, it was.

Mental Mouse

Checking back, I stand corrected.

It occurs to me that Calernia is likely to be getting another Book Of Light, recounting the Harrowing of Liesse and founding of the Twilight Crossroads.

the Harrowing of Liesse and the making of the Twilight Crossroads will be

Mental Mouse

Bah... if WordPress isn't going to allow editing of comments, well, I know some good reasons for that. But if so, they really need at least a preview screen!

Andrew Mitchell

I think Procer's priests will be able to tell pretty quickly that this is the true Grey Pilgrim.

ninegardens

Would the real Grey Pilgrim please stand up...

Shveiran

I concur. If they have powers that are harmful to undeads, they can probably perceive them as well, at least when they are looking right at them.

I mean, both are Cleric tropes, after all.

Liliet

I would expect the Ophanim to make sure to make a lightshow clear enough to give the impression that YES IT'S REALLY HIM even before priests etc can definitely confirm it.

Mental Mouse

Tossing out a Shine ought to do that; it's his distinctive power and IIRC even casual observers (or at least anyone with magical or clerical abilities) can recognize it as specifically holy Light.

Liliet

A quality option.

Interlude: Concourse II

"Thus the Gods granted us the third boon: no longer would scales close our eyes, obscuring knowledge of Good and Evil and preventing us from earning just deserts."

– The Book of All Things, sixth verse of the second hymn

Juniper had done what she could to keep the army on battle footing, but not even the Hellhound's sternest warnings could keep an air of festivity from hanging over the camp of the Army of Callow. Hakram noted with some amusement that while the ale rations that Legion tradition dictated should be opened after a great victory remained sealed and put away there seemed to be no lack of drink flowing through the cups of the legionaries – be they exiles or the Black Queen's own. While the Army of Callow had been under strict instructions to refrain from sacking towns and cities even when its columns were detached and the supply situation became arduous, there'd been no order sent down to avoid trading with Procerans. Callowan soldiers were on campaign pay, which meant only half the coin was handed and the rest set aside for return home, but they were hardly penniless and in a war-torn region like Iserre they were the closest thing to patrons the locals would see for the winter. That'd overridden reluctance to trade with wicked heretics some, though no doubt there'd been price gouging. At the very least, most the bottles and flasks merrily being traded around fires were filled with the rich red wines the Principate's heartlands were known for. The ambitious had sprung for bottles of pleurs de fée, the heady Alamans herbal liquor whose name could more or less be translated into Lower Miezian of 'fairy tears'. Hakram had tried it a few months back and found the drink foul, though humans seemed to like the taste well enough.

"You'd think we fought a battle, by the revelry," Vivienne said, tone dry.

Neither of them were fools, and the former Thief was an old hand at this sort of game, and so instead of wandering around the camp in heavy dark cloaks that hid their faces they'd put on officer's armour and kept their faces half-hidden by helms. Two well-fitted armoured gauntlets, one empty and the other hiding bone, had seen to it that Hakram's most easily discernible marks would be kept out of sight. The orc followed the human's gaze, finding a pair of grizzled or goblins cheerfully bullying some Callowan girl-soldier into drinking enough aragh it was a near-certainty she'd puke. The sappers noticed the attention but were unbothered bit it. Not unreasonably so: Adjutant was passing for a captain of heavies, and Vivienne for a mage lieutenant. Neither of them would be in an easy position to punish the drinking of soldiers so far removed from their own theoretical commands.

"Perhaps we didn't," Hakram quietly replied, "but it feels like victory nonetheless, doesn't it?"

"We threw some spells and shot some engines and General Abigail ordered a single cavalry charge on enemy mages," the blue-eyed noblewoman said. "The drow fought, admittedly, but us? This entire 'battle' had seen fewer than two hundred soldiers die, Hakram."

"Aye," Adjutant agreed, once more amused. "Fewer than two hundred of ours dead, and we've both forced the Grand Alliance into truce and put the League of Free Cities to retreat. They'd make songs of today, Vivienne, even without Choir dreams gilding the legend."

"Legionaries would make songs of rivers being wet, after drinking," the heiress-designate to the throne drily replied. "They've taken to the sport of it the way Callowans once loved jousting."

Hakram had never actually seen one of the famous Callowan tourneys, much less a joust, though he'd read of them in books. Under the Carrion Lord's rule knightly orders had been banned, which effectively killed the practice, and though under Catherine the Order of the Broken Bell had risen anew it was also part of the kingdom's army in a time of war – and so not free to pursue such leisurely pastimes. Under the old kingdom the Fairfaxes had often held tourneys to recruit promising knights into the Royal Guard, which had leant the practice a certain legitimizing weight, but Cat had balked at resurrecting it. When Grandmaster Brandon Talbot had pressed the matter she'd told him she'd rather arm another company of regulars or feed a village through winter than 'piss away gold celebrating the virtue of knocking down people with sticks'. He'd caught Juniper, whose distaste for the chivalric trappings of Callowan knighthood was deeply ingrained, grinning to herself for a solid month after that session of the Queen's Council.

"Mock if you will," Hakram gently said, "but you know I speak the truth. Tonight will be remembered for many years to come. It will have consequences, Vivienne. Ripples."

They'd resumed walking, and though the gloom of Akua Sahelian's curtain of night had cast darkness over all it was not enough that Adjutant did not see the unease his words had brought to Vivienne's face. Like him, she had difficult grasping what might yet come of what had taken place tonight. Unlike him, however, that blindness worried her. Their steps slowed as they left the outskirts of the Second Army's camp in favour of Fourth's. He'd have to speak less here, as he'd spent months as an observer with the Fourth Army and he might be recognized by some through his voice even in the dark. Vivienne's gaze was on a young Soninke legionary, standing on the shoulders of a pair of orcs with a clay pot of black paint in hand as he added to one of the army's banners.

"Wings," she softly said. "I will not be surprised if the Third is doing the same. Sve Noc were not meek of hand in Sarcella."

The legionary had some talent, Hakram, though, for though instead of a brush it was the work of fingers dipped in paint the fresh symbols added to the banner could not be mistaken for anything but what they were: crow's wings. Two pairs, sharply shaped and feathered, and the Soninke finished the last touches on the last wing only to reveal the Fourth Army's changed banner: the four in Miezan numerals, gold on Fairfax blue, but now framed with crow wings at the upper corners.

"It'll spread from there," Adjutant acknowledged.

The soldier-artist was helped down by the pair of well-built orc women who'd been holding him up – one of them, Hakram could not help but notice, had an enticingly muscled frame and fangs that looked like they'd go right through bone – and the three of them were greeted by cheers from the throng of soldiers that'd been watching.

"I'd say something scathing about soldiers and superstitions," Vivienne mused, "but for all I know that might be enough to attract the gaze of the Crows."

"Best to keep on good terms with gods, when death and dying's your trade," Hakram said.

"Even those?" the noblewoman said. "I wonder. That Catherine has charmed ancient horrors into some manner of patronage I've no trouble believing – Merciful Heavens, it wouldn't even be the first time – but that does not mean the spread of their influence is a boon. She will not always be there to keep them honest, and when our soldiers return home there might be... complications."

"The House Insurgent has been rather amiable to the drow," he pointed out.

There'd been incidents, of course, but the Firstborn were being kept in hand by their chieftains and to be frank the Insurgents were trouble all around. Hakram had been told of quarrelsome priests, before, but it'd been with the understanding that those quarrels were largely theological. The House Insurgent was rather prone to fistfights, for priests, and it likely did not help that most of them were young and fresh to their rebellion.

"The Insurgents are the hotheads and Catherine's most radical partisans in the House," Vivienne said. "It's the priests in Callow that might have words when the banners come back bearing Night's wings. Heresy, in particular, comes to mind."

Hakram had followed the debates within the Callowan House of Light with great interest, to the extent that he'd sought a sister for theological lessons. More than once Sister Mariet had hinted that he should consider conversion for the sake of his soul, but given how clear-spoken and learned the old woman had proved to be he'd hardly minded. The conclave in Laure that'd followed the Jacks seeding the rumours he and Vivienne had agreed on of the Woe's time in Keter had taken them both by surprise, and they'd both found that as they had no real influence within the House they could only be spectators to what then unfolded. Perhaps a third of the priesthood of Callow, numbering high with the young and those hailing from the heartlands of the kingdom – which had always been the region most eager to embrace the Black Queen's reign – but also a surprising among of oldest priests from the north who'd been infuriated by the Proceran House being involved at the Battle of the Camps had taken a hard line and pressed for the entire Tenth Crusade to be declared graceless. That'd been judged too extreme an approach by many, even though the Grand Alliance had come to be held in great disdain. It would be, in essence, declaring the entire priesthood of the Dominion, Procer and Ashur to be grasping heretics and any soldier participating in the crusade to have forfeited the grace of the Heavens.

Cooler heads, mostly priesthood from the ravaged south and the wary east, had tried to broker a compromise by instead declaring the decrees of the same Salian conclave that'd declared Catherine to be Arch-heretic of the East to be themselves heresy. That vote had passed unanimously, but the radicals had pushed for denunciation of the House of Light in Procer as a whole and found little appetite for the measure among their fellows. The talks turned harsh when the compromise motion of the House providing a tithe from its coffers to the Kingdom of Callow to support the defence of the realm was flatly refused by the southern priesthood, who was already beggaring itself providing charity to the families displaced by the Arcadian War. With that second compromise collapsing, the radicals scorned their fellows and mocked them for children of Dana – which, Hakram learned from the ever-helpful Sister Mariet, was a reference to the infamous Sister Dana of Laure who'd colluded with the Procerans during their occupation Callow – before walking out of the conclave. They'd come to call themselves the House Insurgent, in the months that followed, and many had flocked to the Army of Callow. Yet it could not be denied that most the Callowan priesthood, more than two thirds of it in truth, had preferred a tamer stance.

In the kingdom the priests who'd remained in the fold had come to be called the House Constant, though that was more story than truth: they were united mostly in their eschewal of harder measures, and in other things remained as prone to squabbling among themselves as the Callowan priesthood was reputed for. They could be counted on to back Catherine against all comers, so long as those comers were foreign, but Vivienne was right in worrying of dark wings painted on banners. The settling of a goblin tribe on Callowan soil had been a hard mouthful to swallow for many of them, as was the entrusting of so many high offices to Wastelanders and greenskins, yet those had only been earthly matters. The Crows earning some devotion of their own, however, would be seen as Below sinking its claws in the hearts of the Callowan flock. There would be trouble.

"Most the soldiers we took in from the old legions keep to Below, if they keep to anything at all," Hakram said. "And many of what used to be the Fifteenth do the same. It may not be too contentious a matter so long as it is kept ceremonial. Soldiers' superstition, as you said."

"I hope you're right," Vivienne said.

Yet her eyes were on the cheering soldiers, surrounding a crow-marked banner.

"But if you are not," she said, "then it might be necessary to back our favoured horse within the House of Light."

Adjutant's brow rose.

"Insurgent over Constant, you mean," he said, tone pensive as he measured the rusks. "It might be it can be done. If we return victors one and all, their reputation will have risen. Yet there are risks to meddling there, especially for us."

House Fairfax had been embroiled in disputed with the House of Light more than once, over the span of its line, most often over the great cathedral of Laure and what was spoken in the sermons given there. Yet the old kings and queens of Callow had been Named as often as not, exalted in Above's service. It was one thing for one of that ilk to intervene in the House's affairs but entirely another for the Black Queen to do so. If a villain was seen as trying to subvert the House of Light, rebellion was certain. Even the Carrion Lord had chosen the soft death when dealing with the priests, preferring instead the stratagem of starving them of coin.

"Too early to tell if it'll come to that," Vivienne Dartwick finally said, eyes hooded. "We'll have to keep an eye on things as they unfold."

Adjutant rumbled in agreement and they resumed their walk. The First Army's camp, where they'd begun their wandering, had been quiet and orderly compared to the rest – as was only to be expected, as it was Juniper's own command and closest to her displeasure should festivities become too obvious. The Second's, under General Hune, had been tense for other reasons entirely. As Hune's army had seen fighting during the day and the night, it'd been allowed to rotate most their companies to sleep. Which had turned out less than restful, when vivid dreams began waking the legionaries. The First Army's entire mage contingent had been awoken to put together answers, as well as the Senior Mages from other armies. So far there'd been little more put together than the string of visions depicting parts of the struggle that'd taken place over Liesse, though the shape of the whole adventure had been taking appearance when they'd left the mages to it. Adjutant would have liked to assign Akua Sahelian to the matter, but she'd had more pressing duties: the soul of the Carrion Lord had been stolen back from the heroes, as had been his body weeks ago, and now the shade who'd once been the Diabolist had been tasked to bind soul and flesh anew after their brutal severing. Still, useful as her expertise might have been the army's mages and scribes were capable of seeing to the matter. It was less than urgent, anyhow, as Catherine would tell the tale herself when she returned. Most important, as far as Hakram was concerned, was that the most recurrent and vivid of the visions showed that Grey Pilgrim and the Saint of Swords were seemingly dead. The latter would do no favours to Catherine's reputation, but the former was a deeper concern.

The Dominion was prickly, when it came to the Peregrine, and though the visions legionaries had received made it clear Cat had tried to prevent his death that might not mean too much to grief-stricken killer with more pride than sense. Someone would have to be blamed, and even if it did not outright come to war they might try to kill Catherine upon her return to 'avenge' the Grey Pilgrim. Which would lead to war regardless, no two ways about it. His warlord was popular even with the Legions-in-Exile, who of the coalition holding this camp were the host with the least fondness for the Black Queen. The Army of Callow and the Firstborn had deeper loyalties, and very few qualms over killing either Procerans or Levantines if provoked. The truce over the field had been achieved by scheme and force of personality more than great desire for peace by the soldiers, Hakram knew, and that made it fragile. Even more so now that the League's hosts had retreated some and no longer stood as a close and obvious threat to the other two great assembled armies on the field. Juniper was well-aware, which was why there were scouts out there keeping an eye on the Grand Alliance's positions and the Army of Callow had yet to entirely leave battle footing.

If the betrayal came, they knew, it would come after dawn rose when the drow would be struck by the sun-sickness and forced into slumber after being stripped of their power. Some would remain able to fight, but few and as little more than tribes of warriors.

The orc was forced out of the thought from the first stirrings of a song in the distance, one he did not recognize. The mismatched pair wandered closer to the source by unspoken accord, until they found a broad bonfire and a crowd half-drunk soldiers around it. Orcs and goblins, Taghreb and Soninke and Callowans. They were, to hear of it, crafting a song in the old legion manner – everyone trying a verse, a chorus of loud voices singing the attempts until something passable had come of the crucible. Hakram missed Nauk like a limb, in that moment. The other orc's rough humour and gift for song and poetry, his strange yet unrepentant sentimentality. It was not enough to distract him from the sight of one of Vivienne's agents approaching her discretely, whispering news in her ear when she gestured permission. The orc's attention turned instead to the song, heart clenching at the remembrance of a friend he'd now twice grieved.

"Came they proud princes, one and all
Great lords from olden, golden halls
And as one they fell, under the moon
When the Black Queen sang her tune

For in lovely Iserre did come undone
Dominion of seven crowns and one

'lo blood of slayer, brigand, binder
And champion too, binding tighter
Yet what star could shine so brightly
It would not fear our queen's fury?

For in lovely Iserre did come undone,
Dominion of seven crowns and one."

The song, he thought, was fiercely proud. Raw and half-done, yet already he could see the grimly boastful shape of it ripping free of a hundred voices. The Jack slipped away and without pause Vivienne leaned close, lowering her voice.

"Juniper sends that the Dominion has begun to gather troops," she whispered. "So has Princess Rozala."

The one-handed orc looked up the night sky, so very close to fading. He could feel it in his bones, how close to that veil falling they had come, how near to the end of the journey they'd arrived. It would all end soon, one way or another. And beyond that, Hakram felt another pull. An older claim to him, one he'd embraced body and soul.

"We gather our own, then," he growled. "And quickly."

The woman who'd once been the Thief glanced at him knowingly.

"You know where Catherine will return," she said.

"I do," Hakram Deadhand said. "So let us gather steel, and march towards it."

Vivienne did not question him, for she knew the truth of it. In end, Hakram of the Howling Wolves Clan was many things. A soldier, a killer, a steward and on occasion a scribe. He'd served as an advisor and a herald, as an ender of loose ends and watchman of missteps. For the hand taken from him by the Penitent's Blade and returned by the sorceries of the Sovereign of Red Skies, he had earned the sobriquet of Deadhand. To ensure the succession of everything that had been built in the beating heart of Callow he'd carved through the other wrist, and not once regretted it. That lesson, like many others, he had learned from someone he loved the way a knife loved a steady hand or sparrow loved flight. For, most of all, he was a bored sergeant on a warm Wasteland night, catching his first glimpse in the eyes of a stranger of the girl who'd topple empires and feeling his blood burn.

He was the Adjutant, and Catherine Foundling was returning.

If any stood between them they would be broken, sure as dawn and dusk and the death of men.

Caerulea

Vote for A Practical Guide to Evil!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

(Discord:)

<https://discord.gg/3nbsUfZ>

Patreon:

<https://www.patreon.com/user?u=3523924>

Javvies

Ah, good, it seems that Hakram and Viv are getting along better.

Heh. It's never a good idea to stand between an orc and his/her Warlord. And they're going to try to stop Hakram from getting to Cat.

This should be good. If unfortunate for the Levantines.

Huh. I would've thought that the obvious exit would have been in the circle or whatever the technical name of the ancient quasi-religious site Cat parked herself and her army around.

Javvies

Dammit wordpress.

Rup

... the way a knife loved a steady hand...

Damn..but, WHAT a mental image...and what can be steadier than a deadhand...(i know it's the opposite here)

Liliet

Ah, but that exit is not The Dramatic Middle Of Everything like, it's probably the geometric middle of everything, but not the dramatic one

Also, what're the odds the Levantines are planning no such thing? We know Rozala is trying to deescalate things (and is very bad at it apparently)

Taichi

Had it been a major priority to land there, it likely would have been somewhat possible. However, given the weight and direction the story has headed with regards to their time in the City of Twilight, unless a direct effort was made to subvert the landing zone by someone with a weight in the story, it's practically guaranteed that events would align one way or another to dump them in the most theatrical spot possible.

That is to say, in between all the armies.

James, Mostly Harmless

Guide not only has more weekly votes than the next three stories combined, but it is only 55 votes short of having more votes than the next four stories!

Andrew Mitchell

I really enjoyed the conversation between Vivienne and Hakram because of how far their relationship has developed since Hakram's sacrifice. And I loved this line from Vivienne:

> That Catherine has charmed ancient horrors into some manner of patronage I've no trouble believing – Merciful Heavens, it wouldn't even be the first time – ...

Useful insights into what's happened in the House of Light in Callow.

Andrew Mitchell

Plus, I'm EXCITED for the return of Black. Pity we didn't get any indication of how long Akua is going to take.

Liliet

Useful and FASCINATING AS SHIT

to me at least also, utterly characteristic in how they get 0 input from Above and don't expect any either :3

Someguy

Anyone else got the song? It does not seem to rhyme when I try to sing it.

Andrew Mitchell

Maybe that's because it's still a work in progress?

Euodiachloris

By committee, even. A much-less-than-sober committee, to boot. XD

Andrew Mitchell

A very good point!

dalek955

It does rhyme, although some of the rhymes are a bit forced. What it doesn't do is fit a meter.

Gibborim

Wow, there were no comments when I loaded the page.

Gibborim

I was so close to greatness, if only I had rushed down to yell "FiRSt!!!" Instead of reading the chapter.

Andrew Mitchell

Most of us are (or will be) glad you didn't yell first. It's generally considered poor form in this community.

sivarajan

We say "Go vote on topwebfiction" instead.

Andrew Mitchell

Hahahaha. Yep... But at least that has the positive effect of helping others find this magnificent work! 😊

Liliet

Oh wow, only luck prevented you from being an asshole!

If you were to find yourself a 'first' again, do the links comment, yeah :3

Gibborim

Nothing could make me more likely to post "fIRsT" than preemptively calling me an asshole for it.

RandomFan

Not even saying "You're an asshole for being the type of person who would ever consider making a contentless 'first' post"? Because that's certainly nastier. Also, for the record, you can consider me to have said that.

tyizor

Nothing eh? What about saying that you'd be a pitiful attention seeking human that's trying to make up for the fact that their parents didn't give them enough attention when they were younger, so they seek out attention (be it positive or negative) from a community that ultimately doesn't really care about them because they're a single insignificant internet denizen whose username noone is even going to bother to remember?

You're right, that's not enough to motivate you. Here, let me give you some motivation. You can do it! You can be a pitiful attention seeking asshole instead of amounting to anything! Yayyy

JJR

That's a lot of words, for someone who doesn't care.

Caerulea

Comments take a minute or so to be approved, and I do not think you would have beaten me. If you did, I would just think something along the lines of “really? Who let the toddler in here?” and then move on. Otherwise you would be in the unenviable position of having a comment saying “FiRSt!!!” third on the list. If you are quick, just put the links up, so people see them, rather than waste space.

Andrew Mitchell

Honestly Gibborim, I don’t get all the hate being thrown at you here. In my experience our community is almost always a pleasant and civil place to hang out. And I’m quite disappointed that some people here aren’t demonstrating that at the moment.

I entirely get your angry response to an IMO unreasonable attack.

I encourage you to stick around and be part of what is a really great community that can add a lot of richness to your understanding of PGtE; as it has to mine.

Mental Mouse

I’ll note that EE as specifically said that doesn’t particularly like having to moderate the comments, but he will if he has to (and as lately demonstrated, he does read them).

In this exchange, I think Liliet muffed her “humor” roll and set off a cascade.

Andrew Mitchell

I concur. One of the indicators of a healthy community is the absence of active moderation. I can only recall one time EE needed to do that, and this incident is far from needing EE’s attention IMO.

Mental Mouse

> One of the indicators of a healthy community is the absence of active moderation.

Mmm... I’m in another very strong and supportive online community, but that one is much more intertwined with other communities on the Internet and the real world, and it also occasionally deals with hot-button stuff.

That means that on the one hand, we get occasional visits by people who aren’t really in touch with the group’s attitude, and on the other, even the regulars sometimes mess up. A gentle warning almost always suffices for the regulars...

For the other cases, the blog owner invented a new sanction for the Internet: Disemvoweling. That's not a typo – sufficiently offensive or abrasive comments get their vowels removed. This effectively disarms the problematic messages, but if you squint you can still make out what they say, so the trolls can't really cry "censorship". 😏

Andrew Mitchell

> For the other cases, the blog owner invented a new sanction for the Internet: Disemvoweling. That's not a typo – sufficiently offensive or abrasive comments get their vowels removed. This effectively disarms the problematic messages, but if you squint you can still make out what they say, so the trolls can't really cry "censorship". 😏

I wish I had more than one like to give this. I just ♥ ♥ ♥ this approach. Thanks for letting me know that such cleverness exists.

Mental Mouse

Thanks. She (also her husband/co-blogger) were already prominent science-fiction editors, and she's known for her expertise in community moderation (she has written a couple of books). Alas, age and disability are creeping up on her these days, so she's not very active online anymore..

Mental Mouse

I'm splitting this bit out in case the links get spamfiltered: She has written a couple of books dealing with (among many other topics) moderation: Making Book and Making Conversation

Shveiran

Disemvoweling sounds fucking awesome and clever as shit. Whoever came up with the idea deserves a treat.

Just... priceless.

NerfGlastigUaine

"Thus the Gods granted us the third boon: no longer would scales close our eyes, obscuring knowledge of Good and Evil and preventing us from earning just deserts."

Interesting that in this verse this knowledge was a boon, while in Christianity it's the first sin. And in both cases, I'd like to call doubt on its veracity.

MrMaturity

Before they got to just have deserts, I wonder what meal they were having to become so bored of it?

Asterix the Guy

First of all, they wouldn't be just desserts if they had had any meal beforehand.

Second of all, those are just desserts that you are thinking about. Just deserts are much drier than that.

(Also, hey everyone, first post here.)

*

Liliet

Jungles and steppes.

Mental Mouse

Hmm. My current Minecraft world has savanna, plains and deserts near spawn; I still "have" to go looking for jungle and taiga. (The new version added cool resources to both.)

Liliet

NICE.

I usually go looking for high hills to put a house on the border with; just really love it visually ♥

Mental Mouse

Well, usually I start off looking for a good place for an initial lair and just expand from there. In mountainous areas that will be an exposed cave or dug into a cliff face, because I can make it safe with not much wood – in flat areas like this, I'd start with a dirt hut and upgrade over the first few days.

In this game, however, I got a dominating factor – spawn is in sight of a village! And with the Village and Pillage update, that means guaranteed beds, and much better houses than they used to be! That said, defending the village is still tricky – even with the golems, I just lost some well-traded villagers after I left a perimeter gate open before I went down mining. (oops) And that was after I'd gathered most of them into a common building.

I think I'm going to finish the job, put their bell in there too, and just lock them in with their job-site blocks and beds. (Maybe add a bit of farm too, mostly I've been hand-feeding them from my own farm tower.)

Andrew Mitchell

Now I feel like getting back into Minecraft. I loved it but it was SUCH a timesink. 😞

Liliet

0000000H and oof, yeah defending villages are tricky

Mental Mouse

Even within Christianity (and perhaps more so in Judaism) there's an alternate view of the departure from Eden: Considering it as "welp, now you're finished, here's the world".

Mental Mouse

There's a fair bit of controversy within the Abrahamic religions over the matter. In my Jewish upbringing, the first sin was definitely disobedience, while gaining the KoG&E was what required the expulsion. But there's a definite undercurrent that the whole thing was a setup: Having gained that knowledge, humanity was ready to inherit the world made for them.

NerfGlaistigUaine

Huh, never heard that interpretation before. Mostly had a straightforward Protestant Christian upbringing. Personally I take Christianity/religion as more of a philosophy – help the poor, act as you want others to act, etc. – than an actual history or laws. A lot fewer contradictions, headscratchers, and straight-up horror that way.

Mental Mouse

Well, when people insist on taking Bronze Age mythology as literal truth, yeah that's gonna be a shitshow. Just last night I had a local kid trying to tell me how God loves me, and Jesus is the only way to God, Adam and Eve, yadda yadda yadda. (Oy gevalt! 😞)

He even offered to heal my back in Jesus' name... after I'd already explained that the reason I was leaning towards him (from "social distance") because I'd left my hearing aids inside when I came out to smoke. I tried not to be too hard on him because he's just a teenager (also, it's not his fault his pastor hadn't gotten up to "why not to proselytize to Jews" before the epidemic shut down churches) but it made me sad. Not least because, if he's counting on Jesus to protect him from the epidemic... ;-(

danh3107

There has never been a stronger platonic romance than Hakram and Cat.

prove me wrong

C_B

Aziraphale and Crowley are at least a tie.

Oshi

That one in book and show has a good strong undertone of not quite a friend.

Andrew Mitchell

And not nearly an enemy. (Although I must admit I haven't seen the show yet.)

maximillian999

Watch it! Soooo good!

Rup

.um..
Modesty Blaise
&
Willy Garvin
(at least in the original books)

caoimhinh

I would say that Amadeus and Alaya are even stronger.

Even if Alaya's stupid obsession with securing her throne led them to a separation after over 40 years of loyal friendship and unconditional trust.

Liliet

^^^

maybe it's through sheer tenure, but they win out if only through the fact that Hakram and Catherine have yet to make me cry

Raved Thrad

We'll all cry when Hakram goes off to die.

Mental Mouse

Um, that's not a romance. There are other kinds of love!

Also, how many people noticed that Hakram now has a psychic link to Cat? At least, he knows where she's coming out, and Viv expects as much. I guess that comes with a Name based on being someone's assistant.

Andrew Mitchell

Something like Scribe and Black, perhaps... Actually, maybe that means that Scribe's going to turn up (or perhaps she's around already) when Black is put back together. It would be nice to see her again.

JJR

Speaking of Black's misadventure. I wonder what Ranger thinks about all this. Is it a "He knew the risks." thing? Or was she almost about to go all Kill Bill on the Principate?

Andrew Mitchell

I don't think Ranger is the rescuing type. IMO she's more the revenging type. She'll happily hunt down cut open the person who killed Black, and the person who ordered it.

Cicero

Samwell and Frodo.

Or if you want to get traditional about it:

David and Jonathan.

Javvies

Ah, good, it seems that Hakram and Viv are getting along better.

Heh. It's never a good idea to stand between an orc and his/her Warlord. And they're going to try to stop Hakram from getting to Cat.

This should be good. If unfortunate for the Levantines.

Huh. I would've thought that the obvious exit would have been in the circle or whatever the technical name of the ancient quasi-religious site Cat parked herself and her army around.

badluckcat

Normally yes, they would exit there. But they're coming out from a piece of Arcadia after having gone on a once-in-a-lifetime adventure. They will appear in the most dramatic possible location at the most dramatic possible time.

Andrew Mitchell

Spot on. It is guaranteed by the Guide universe's mechanics, and by the fact that we're reading a great story. 😊

Death Knight

Seeing as the Pilgrim is tied thematically with the sun and Cat is with him, I imagine as soon as the first rays of sunshine appears so will he.

Barthumphries

Everyone thinks the Pilgrim is dead. Why not keep that thought going so he can swoop in to save Cat at some point in the future? 😊

Andrew Mitchell

Because appearing now is going to stop unnecessary suffering, right now. That's kind of the Grey Pilgrim's thing. 😊

Shveiran

If there was ever any doubt, the fact that dawn marks the weakening of the drow and therefore the most likely start of hostilities on the Dominion's part makes dawn THE moment to return.

Assuming the Dominion plans to attack, that is. Which is, admittedly, not a given. It almost pains me to say it, but I should probably give the Ophanim the benefit of doubt here and at least consider the possibility that the Levantines are marching in to keep the peace, much like Rozala.

Agent J

The Levantines are why Malanza is marching to keep the peace. That they're both marching are why the Army of Callow is mustering now as well. If the Levantines wanted to deescalate the situation, it would have been as easy a task as not mustering their army.

Are the Levantines preparing to attack? Maybe not, but I can't see a scenario where their actions could logically lead to a less volatile situation.

ciara

Perhaps they're getting ready to pre-empt the Procerans taking revenge for the death of the Saint?

Shveiran

Honestly, I agree with you there, but... I've been wrong before, and we were promised the Ophanim would handle it. So... I'm giving them the benefit of the doubt, even if my gut says Levant marching is stupid if peace is their goal. Unlike the Procerans, it doesn't seem like they have reasons to believe their armed intervention is necessary to stop their allies from attacking in a frenzy.

Euodiachloris

There will also be backlight. And mist. Because of course. 😊

Mental Mouse

I was thinking they'd appear between pillars of light and darkness...

Shveiran

Also cool.

doominator10

I always did wonder how the Callowan priesthood rationalized following Cat. I'm actually really looking forward to seeing how the drow interact with Callow proper, at least until they get a home carved out for them from the dead king's lawn.

erebus42

Yeah it certainly will be interesting. I definitely would like to see Sve Noc get some nonDrow followers (I know I'd at least consider converting after having seen what the Night can do).

Raved Thrad

I'm thinking Masego and Black. Masego because divinity has always fascinated him, and when he sees that Cat doesn't have to kneel and chant to commune with her patrons, he may see it as a good (if perhaps temporary) replacement for his magic. I can see him having long, animated discussions with both Andronike and Komena about death, murder, and the quanta of divinity.

As for Black, can anything be more awesome than being named Black of Night, father-figure of the First Under Night? 🤪

Shveiran

First off, kudos because Black of Night sounds fucking cool.

Though seriously, I don't think the two of them will ever agree to challenge the power of a deity, lack of bowing notwithstanding.

Shveiran

*CHANNEL. Damnation.

Raved Thrad

Autocomplete hell?

Mental Mouse

> I know I'd at least consider converting after having seen what the Night can do

Well yes, that's the problem for the House of Light. Cat may need to "introduce" the concept of religious freedom.

(That said, I snickered at the poor Sister hoping to convert a Praesi-born orc!)

Shveiran

I quite liked that addition, honestly. Shows she is not thinking in terms of us and them, or at least not in a way that is culture-race based and immutable.

Granted, it was doomed to fail. But it is good sign, no?

Andrew Mitchell

Yes. I took it as a good sign too.

Andrew Mitchell

I don't think Cat's planning on taking the Drow back to Callow. The point is to find them a home of their own once they've helped bottle up the Dead King.

However, the story may have different ideas. Given the discussion about the potential for conflict, it now feels inevitable that the conflict is going to be an issue.

Javvies

True.

Though relations will likely be helped (from the Callowan perspective) by the fact that Sve Noc helped Cat free Edward Fairfax from the Dead King.

NerfGlastigUaine

"one of them, Hakram could not help but notice, had an enticingly muscled frame and fangs that looked like they'd go right through bone"

Damn it Adjutant, keep it in your pants. You're learning bad habits from your Queen.

Andrew Mitchell

By all accounts, he was sleeping around well before Cat came on the scene.

erebus42

A Hakram POV is always welcome, as is a new legion song (I'm curious to hear what it would sound like finished)

The hype for Cat and the Pilgrim's grand entrance is getting pretty real though.

caoimhinh

I wonder if we will get that expected arrival of Catherine and Pilgrim with the breaking dawn during our next Mandatory Friday Cliffhanger.

I'm guessing next chapter will be an insight on Dominion's camp and the current state of their politics and interclan dynamics, with the end being the marching of the Dominion's army and the tense posturing of the three nations' armies setting the stage for Cat's dramatic return and the reveal of ~~Gandalf~~ Pilgrim's resurrection.

It will probably be tenser if Indrani and Rogue Sorcerer arrive first and get intercepted or if Hanno arrives.

Relyt

"the soul of the Carrion Lord had been stolen back from the heroes, as had been his body weeks ago"

ErraticaErrata, was it really weeks ago? I thought they traded Saint's life for Blacks body at a botched treaty-talk-thing like the day before all these shenanigans went down? A lot has happened yeah, and it's been weeks for us, but hasn't it been less than a day in-story?

As always, great chapter, wonderful writing. I'm looking forward to all the tense posturing as folks wait for Catherine to show, then dropped jaws when the Peregrine's with her.

Andrew Mitchell

Yeah, I was thinking days not weeks. But I'm notoriously unconcerned about consistency of time & distance in stories.

Euodiachloris

Not to mention stories which contain transitive planes with temporal rules of their own. 🤪

Liliet

Just thank everyone and everything it's not months this time.

But no, it's definitely been days at least. Cat marched around for quite a while before coming across this barrow.

Micke

The real question is, will any legionnaires remain loyal to Malicia when they hear the news?

JJR

She does still have those hidden loyalty commands implanted in all the high ranking officers. I don't remember which chapter we learn about them though.

Andrew Mitchell

That's a good point. I wonder how many have died and been replaced by now. I expect Malica won't have been able to get any more commands placed in new officers over the last couple of years.

Abigail comes to mind here. It would be interesting to see Abigail vs. Juniper if Juniper is being mind controlled.

Also, does Black know about them either from Malica or via other means? And does he have a counter?

Shveiran

I think Malicia mentioned in one of her POV interludes (possibly the one about Salia's death?) that she believes Black doesn't know she used Rule to overcome the limits of "Speaking" and rewrote the top brass.

If she was right, it is safe to say Juniper is compromised, since she has been in the presence of the Empress even after becoming Cat's go-to general.

As for Abigail v. Juniper... I don't know, for all that Abigail may have grown, her barely controlled chaos seems like a long, long way from matching the Hellhound... which, it should be mentioned, is still learning and growing, especially now that she is digesting her defeat and planning with Grem One-eye.

Personally, if it comes to that and Juniper doesn't eat her alive, I'd be very disappointed.

On the other hand, Cat squaring off against Juniper with Abigail providing a measure of unpredictability that Juniper fails to foresee and Cat takes advantage of? THAT I'd totally be behind.

matrixm

It was about a month ago, yes.

Morgenstern

Should be, yes. But who knows how much time the five man group spent in the faerie realm... it's been known to happen. And for rather more time than just a few days/weeks... 😊

Morgenstern

five "humans" group, if anything... "heroes" was what i actually wanted to write.. o0

StarlightGlimmer

Five morally complex superhumans and The Tyrant

Morgenstern

hm.... i guess my brain made a mix-up with the "Blue Man group". XD

Morgenstern

On second thought... I'm no longer sure I'm not mixing up scenes, too. Where does the scene with Rumena holding the Saint by the "neck" (throat) figure in... Rum"e"nation. 😊
Let's conclude I'm confused, but the comment about fairie realms is true in general, no matter what ^^°

Mental Mouse

I'm not EE, but lessee: She won Black's body in chapters 26 and 27: Overtures and Civility. Chapter 28 is a single conversation. Chapter 29 opens with "We got three days' march before Creation turned on us" (the gate in their path). The "Mavian prayer" site Was introduced in Chapter 30: "Weaver; Woven", and in Chapter 31 she writes the letters and then we get 7 interludes of battle and byplay: a day and a night (the latter interrupted by Pilgrim's Shine), culminating with "So We Shot Him"; the Shine ends with dawn, which then gets eclipsed.

Then Cat comes back to steal the scene from Kairos and begin the Twilight arc, which wraps at Chapter 51 (with 4 interludes). Hints from the text suggest that their journey and battles take that day and the night after it, with them returning at dawn.

So, 5 days (but 30 chapters!) since they got his body. I think EE lost count again.... 😊

NerfGlastigUaine

I think I'll take a break from this story. Not that it's not great, in fact I think it's getting even better recently, but I want to do a binge later instead of reading a single chapter every other day. It's amazing how fast the author updates and how consistently, but I'm starting to feel like an addict whose hit is never enough and always kept longing for more.

Thank you Erraticerrata for writing such a great story and thank you fellow readers whose comments are always entertaining and theories wildly interesting even when (especially when) they're wrong. See you all again in two months.

Andrew Mitchell

Enjoy your break. 😊

Rup

(i tried..lasted one week)

caoimhinh

I'm pretty sure it's healthier to take one bottle of liquor every two days than suddenly drinking 20 bottles in one sitting. Same principle applies to drugs (where an overdose can kill) and for chapters of a serial, where the Hype will burn us.

I would recommend to add another novel to your reading time so you can get distracted from the obsession of wanting to know what will happen next chapter in this one by reading what's happening in others (I'm sure that among the readers here we can get a very long list of web serials to enjoy). Another option is going for a re-read of the novel, there are many things that are appreciated more on a second reading, like character development or the re-living of a particularly epic or emotional chapter, it's something I personally enjoy.

Nevertheless, it is your decision, and I can't deny that there's something really satisfying in reading and finding the "Next Chapter" button available and working when you reach the end of a chapter, so I understand your urge.

In any case, enjoy. Whatever you decide, just be sure to have a great time~

Kwabena Yiadom

What would you recommend, as another story to read on the side?

Mental Mouse

I've most been reading webcomics, but one of those stands out: Kill 6 Billion Demons features a Crapsack Multiverse with an Eastern ethos and mythic style, laid out in effing-spectacular artwork. The protagonist was a barista from our own Earth, who had cosmic power handed to her and promptly got caught up in the squabbles of the Demiurges. (Dammit, she was just trying to get laid! 😊) Learning how to use that power is a bit tougher, but she's got an angel teaching her martial arts and a devil teaching her magic (among other things, heh heh).

Currently she's about to enter the Grand Tournament held by one of the demiurges, prize being "anything you want". As it happens, he has somebody she wants, but she may not have thought this through....

Other excellent webcomic sagas include Skin Horse (a followup to the classic but long-completed Narbonic), and the long-running (20+ years!) Sluggy Freelance, but both of those seem to be approaching their respective finishes.

Andrew Mitchell

I second this recommendation.

caoimhinh

Oh, cool. Kill 6 Billion Demons is a name I have heard before, it's about time I embark on that reading.

I gotta start reading more western webcomics; most of the ones I read are Korean webtoons like Tower of God, Wind Breaker, God of Highschool, DICE: the Cube that Changes Everything, Solo Levelling, Her Summon, I Love Yoo, and the Boss Of School; but I have found some pretty good western webcomics, like Unordinary, Love Advice from the Duke of Hell, Mage & Demon Queen, Always Human and many more that I can't recall right now.

I will add your recommendations to my list and check them out this weekend, thanks.

Andrew Mitchell

I recommend reading the text below the comics as well. It really adds to the depth of this multiverse. Sometimes it's very short, sometimes it's much longer.

caoimhinh

Just checked, it's really awesome to have that bit of lore there. It's kinda like the epigraphs here in Practical Guide to Evil. It adds a certain spice to the story.

Andrew Mitchell

A couple of complete stories which I really enjoyed:

Leftover soup: leftoversoup DOT com

Harry Potter and the Methods of Rationality: hpmor DOT com

And a couple of ongoing stories I've been enjoying for years:

Order Of The Stick: google it

Questionable Content: questionablecontent DOT com (over 4000 comics and going strong)

caoimhinh

I finished the Methods of Rationality a couple of months ago, it was really good, though the end turned weird. I particularly enjoyed the part about death, the Dementors and the desire for sharing immortality as an improvement for humanity.

I'm reading the Order of the Stick but I'm reeeaaaalllyyy behind, hahaha. At first I read it at random, but I decided to read it properly.

I will check on Leftover Soup and Questionable Content, never heard of those before, but paired with MoR and OoS, plus recommended by you, I'm pretty confident on them being of good quality story and very interesting content.

Andrew Mitchell

QC just keeps getting better. With over 4000 now and five more per week so you'll need quite a bit of time to catch up.

Enjoy! 😊

caoimhinh

Well, there are the most famous options, like The Wandering Inn, The Gods Are Bastards, Worm, and Mother of Learning.

On RoyalRoad I have found many different types of stories that are very interesting, like Metaworld Chronicles, Everybody Loves Large Chests, Iron Teeth, and Trails of Ascension (I write this one, 54 chapters as of today, allow me a little shameless advertisement XD).

You could also take a look at some of the big names of Xianxia genre (chinese fantasy, centered around their mythology, with Qi Cultivation, taoism, buddhism and immortality as important aspects of the story) like I Shall Seal the Heavens, Cultivation Chat Group, Stellar Transformations and History's Strongest Senior Brother. And there's also Korean novels, like Everyone Else is a Returnee, Solo Levelling (this one was even adapted to a webtoon, currently ongoing), and Main Character Hides His Strength (kinda weird name, but the story is very serious and sometimes outright grim).

Those are some of the ones I know, have read, and usually recommend, all are fantasy (my personal favorite genre) but they have vastly different takes on fantasy and their storylines are unique, providing a big number of interesting characters with different characteristics.

I'm sure other readers can vastly enlarge this list with their own recommendations and gave us all a large variety of names of every possible literature genre. There are amazing jewels out there waiting to be discovered. If you can share a recommendation too, I'll be happy to read it.

Mental Mouse

I understand, but... well, that's why I'm so active on these comment pages. For each chapter, we get a couple or three days to discuss it among ourselves.

Andrew Mitchell

That's a real benefit for sure. I read almost every comment and it adds such richness to my appreciation of the story.

caoimhinh

Yeah, the crazy theories, debates and in-depth analysis provided by the commenters are really amazing. It adds a whole new level to the experience of reading the web novel, having a large community of peers reading alongside oneself and sharing their view, we enrich each other's experiences.

KageLupus

Something that I do on occasion is to go back to a previous book (sometimes even the same book) and then do a big binge on that. I usually find something new that I didn't catch the first time through, and knowing what happens later lets me find some really neat, subtle foreshadowings.

A recent example from my binge of book 5 is that during the Saint of Swords v Rumena fight, Mighty Rumena says something along the lines of "Let's hurry up before one of us dies of old age." Considering the last couple of chapters that has gone from a witty line about Rumena being ancient to an amazing line because Rumena had seen Cat's staff and knew what it was for.

caoimhinh

Indeed, reading the previous books brings forth a sense of perspective into the story, and we see some of the pieces that were set into motion many chapters ago start taking effect in the current chapters, and it's also nice to see the changes and evolution of the characters, some of the consistency errors (most of which have been fixed) and even the changes in the viewers impression and feelings towards a character. For example, almost everybody hated Akua during the first couple of books, now almost everybody likes her; the Grey Pilgrim and the Saint of Swords are two characters that have been liked by, hated by, and awed the readers during the many chapters where they have appeared.

Something interesting I kept wondering about, for example, and confirmed when re-reading book 2, is that Masego was not initially as socially awkward as he is in later books. The Masego of Book 2 was capable of sarcasm, insults and jokes, with also a much friendlier disposition (and his first introduction depicted him as having a leaner body "like a scholar" while later chapters depicted him as fat). At some point around book 3 and 4, this changed and the current Masego is shown as someone who has always struggled to understand social interactions and just a couple of chapters ago we saw him fumbling when trying to come up with an insult for the Dead King, saying that he was doing it because he learned it from Cat and the others and wanted to imitate them, however in Book 2 we saw Masego constantly throw minor insults to his opponents during battles (see for example his two duels with the Bumbling Conjuror in Book 2 and his contempt towards inferior magic casters, even in his fight against Demons he delivered some pretty witty comments).

Javvies

Y'know, that's not actually true.

"Built like a scholar" doesn't automatically mean lean and/or skinny. In the context of being compared to well muscled and physically fit soldiers, it could easily mean someone with a heavier and softer build. Especially since a sentence or two later, it is said that "his lips were fleshy".

caoimhinh

Hmm, I don't know. Historically and in stories, scholars are of a lean build, the merchants are the ones who possess a fat body, while scholars tend to have skinnier looks and more fragile frame.

Also, fleshy lips have nothing to do with fat or lack thereof. Cheeks and neck, sure, but not the lips.

IDKWhoitis

I wonder if the Augar or White Night are also getting the dreams, because out of anyone else, they might be the most interested in what follows.

Also, the Black Queen legend will truly become a monolith by the end of this crusade, one of those legends so long and insane that people will doubt its veracity.

Andrew Mitchell

Maybe you're right but I also wonder if it might instead be known, and believed, as widely as the stories of Dread Empress Triumphant (MSNR).

(Sorry for the double post.)

Rup

MSNR... 🙌 hm...good one..will have to remember it..

Andrew Mitchell

liked it too. 😊

* 3 to 10

Mental Mouse

Yo. I had her in a parenthetical phrase in the middle of an already-rambling sentence, and went "oh good grief...".

Andrew Mitchell

Ah, thanks for adding to our community lexicon. 😊

caoimhinh

She already is, and that's a funny thing because everyone comes to fight her having her the reports of her actions and they are all like "Nah, that's pure exaggeration, she isn't that strong and terrifying" and then Cat pulls something even scarier than what they heard and it's too late for them and they are screwed.

Every opponent that Catherine has faced come with a preconception and prejudice about her, and then finds that such an image was inaccurate and lacking.

Fayhem

> Every opponent that Catherine has faced come with a preconception and prejudice about her, and then finds that such an image was inaccurate and lacking.

To be fair, a lot of that is prob because her reputation (especially abroad, given the slowness of most non-Imperial communications) would typically be based on the last thing people know that she did, and since becoming Squire Catherine Foundling has triggered the Took a Level in Badass trope, eh, at least three times by my count? Offing the Duke of Being a Little Bitch or whatever his title was to become Duchess of Moonless Nights, embracing Winter to level-up to Sovereign of Moonless Nights to take out Akua, feeding Winter to Night to become F.U.N. I get the feeling that most Named get to trigger that trope like once in their whole career, maybe twice if they're lucky/special. Also, the last one notably is not so much a straight increase in power like the last two so much as an exponential increase in flexibility, which is an entire other level of wrong-footing if even your prognoses of potential changes are focused around "maybe she got more powerful again".

Mental Mouse

I'd count the Book 1 wargames too. Greenhorn officer with zero military experience walks into the War School at the bottom of the heap, and walks out in command of a Dread Legion.

Fayhem

Hmm I could see that yeah. I was measuring more in terms of "objective"/external power-ups, and I would personally call the Book I wargames more of a perceptual/political upgrade since for me at least those were more about people starting to learn who Catherine Foundling really was than about Catherine Foundling herself changing. But since the initial topic was Catherine's reputation your interpretation there is definitely also valid; I just hadn't considered it because I was just seeing it through my own lens.

Fayhem

Follow-up: if we're counting perceptual/political level-ups, then First Liesse should definitely go on the list too. Dread Legion commander/rookie Named on her very first campaign goes from military successes to simultaneously snuffing out the last of the Callowan rebellion WITHOUT her own people turning on her, foiling and scoring points off the heir to the Sahelians (also a Named in her own right), and using her victory over said heir to the Sahelians to extract concessions from her political allies. Then that was immediately followed by Black basically turning over Callow to her like "yeah this has been my primary personal project for 20 years and you've only even been Named for like 2 years, but here you go I trust you with this completely". Alaya/Malicia specifically tagged the High Lords/Ladies as still persistently underestimating Black through sheer force of blind prejudice so I don't think that did as much for Cat there, but there's no way that didn't win her MAJOR points with the Legions.

Mental Mouse

Maybe. I'd think that was straight-up "rewards of success." It did establish her rep in her own country, but the process was "onscreen". The comparison does help me understand your qualms about considering the War College as that trope.

Andrew Mitchell

Maybe you're right but I also wonder if it might instead be known, and believed as widely as the stories of Dread Empress Triumphant (MSNR).

antoninjohn

I wonder what happened to the Anaxares?

Andrew Mitchell

I've been missing him. But I'm certain he'll be making another appearance due to Karios' scheme to put the gods on trial.

Oshi

Nope, he wants to put a Choir on Trial. Judgment in particular.

caoimhinh

Ah, Hakram ogling the teeth of the females, that perv. Good to see traditions hadn't been lost and he is still the same promiscuous Orc that everyone knows, hahaha.

Those few last paragraphs displaying Hakrams absolute loyalty are truly great.

That's love, pure and loyal, untainted by lust or romance, or any other desire beyond the wish of companionship. He can even just follow his heart and know where Catherine is going to appear through pure Power of Friendship. See? Under all that layers of cold Orc, Hakram is a softie at heart.

So... Concourse III is going to be from the Dominion's POV? I wonder if they are actually losing their minds over the death of the Peregrine and really decided to attack or if they are doing something else. I wonder how the different members of the Blood are taking it, what decisions are being discussed and how the Dominion leaders are relating to each other.

We know that Razin and Aquiline are getting closer, while Razin swore vengeance on Yannu, Moro of the Bandit Blood lost one arm, and Yannu seems to be the cold and calculative type, but who knows how he might react to the news of Pilgrim being dead, who knows if they are having another honor duel to decide what to do or if they are united due to the mourning of the Peregrine. There's quite a mixture for volatile situations there, even more than there is in Proceran camp.

Liliet

Yep, Levantines are going to be the most interesting to hear from here ;u;

Raved Thrad

Well, we've seen what Levantine Blood consider to be honorable. I'm betting that someone got knifed.

It's even possible that Aquiline and Razin knifed Yannu and then immediately got to boinking in the spreading pool of blood. Razin would have had his blood up, and each time there's a chance for blood to be spilled it's like Aquiline's just drank five cups of coffee, with an espresso chaser.

frederic

There are a few OTL iterations of benevolent (or neutral) deities of the Night (Ratri comes to mind but there was at least one in ancient Nabatean mythology, and a few others).

I wonder if nascent Gods can be influenced by their worshippers..

Mammon

It was already obvious before, and now it only becomes more so. Leave it to Above to cover all bases by hedging their bets. Such slimy and tricky bastards.

Callow being defeated? The Arch-Heretic has been slain and her corruption carved out of existence. Hurrah for the Crusade and Above prevailing as always.

The Alliance being defeated? The House Insurgent of Callow was righteous and stuck to their beliefs as those Levantine necromancers and scheming Procerans turned to heresy by their selfishness and greed. And isn't it just like the good guys to be a conclave of young ones in an underdog position fighting against an injustice outnumbering them vastly? Hurray for the Good Preserved and Above prevailing as always.

Sem: Uhm, Jonathaniël?

John: Yes, Simiëlle?

Sem: The armies of the Black Queen are worshipping Night Gods as well, that doesn't sound like it will work in our favour in a few centuries if they win.

John: No worries, Sve Noc are created in understanding and trust and are evil but not evil evil. We can always declare the Night a balance to the Light and the other Below the heretics.

Sem: Are you sure? Don't you think that's-

John: Nah, it's fine.

Tyrant, elsewhere yet somehow aware of this conversation: Rubs hands together Yesss... Just as planned. Create that precedent for there being an allowed absolute opposite evil for a good. Right, my precious and somehow Light Good Hierarch? Just as planned...

NZPIEFACE

There is precedent, just not in the same continent. The dude's on the bigger continent have a country ruled by both a Villain and a Hero.

konstantinvoncarstein

Yes, Yan tei

JRogue

Where is that documented? I know that the other continent has been mentioned a few times, but not many. Is it in a reddit or some comment from EE? I would very much like to read it.

Thank you in advance for the info.

Andrew Mitchell

<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2015/08/12/chapter-20-rise/> and <https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2016/05/11/chapter-22-rescue/> are a couple of early examples.

If you want more, check this Goggle search: https://www.google.com/search?rlz=1C1CHBF_enAU795AU795&ei=6ewTXcH40o7390PVj5PACg&q=site%3Apracticalab.3...3198.4475..4709...0.0..0.190.1251.0j7.....0...1..gws-wiz.n3q6o2ASoYI

Andrew Mitchell

Damn it. I replied but because of the three links my reply is awaiting moderation... Check this google search for all the references to Yan Tei:

https://www.google.com/search?rlz=1C1CHBF_enAU795AU795&ei=6ewTXcH40o7390PVj5PACg&q=site%3Apracticalab.3...3198.4475..4709...0.0..0.190.1251.0j7.....0...1..gws-wiz.n3q6o2ASoYI

NZPIEFACE

It was some off-handed comment Cat made way back.

Thea

All is night. Good and evil.

Or maybe not.

Mental Mouse

Eh, I don't think Hierarch can be construed as Good. It remains to be seen whether he and Kairos will survive their confrontation with the angels.

haihappen

I wonder if the Grey Pilgrim is coming back unchanged. The Tolkien-esque version would be that death changed him, thus him coming back as the White Pilgrim, basically an agent of good living on borrowed time. Did we ever find out how the Pilgrim lived this long in the first place?

It would have been a great deconstruction if the Saint and Pilgrim took the "live extension" formula from the alchemist that the Saint let go once. But that does not seem the case as I remember the Pilgrim saying he kept the Saint alive for a long time. Curious.

Liliet

I think they're just old people of regular lifespan length? Like, Pilgrim is in shape for a 90 year old, is all.

lennymaster

Saint literally died of old age just a few chapters ago. When they talk about Pilgrim they always say he did Above's bidding for the better part of a century. That puts him at roughly the same age as Black, around 80 years old or thereabouts. Black just stopped aging when he got his Name as all Villianous Named do.

Mental Mouse

Based on Cat's commentary in the timefield, Saint would have had 10 more years to live. Pilgrim is probably older. Heroes don't get perpetual youth, but it was mentioned they do get protection from the common infirmities of age, along with immunity from ordinary (plebeian?) disease.

NZPIEFACE

I thought Black was 60ish.

RandomFan

Even if they had, it's heavily implied that the formula is more an "elixir of life" than an "elixir of immortality" in saint's story. If the Alchemist was very good at what he did, he might have added three seconds to Saint's life, in the end.

edrey

the pilgrim had thirty when her sister became ruler, at the same time nefarious hadn't become emperor,, so i would say eighty and a little more. black had twenty when he take that name so he is sixty and something years and for cat i lost count after that trick but that shouldnt count at all

Mental Mouse

With that story, my thought at the time was "and then she just lets him go? With nobody keeping an eye on him? No wonder it came back to haunt her!"

Mental Mouse

> though the gloom of Akua Sahelian's curtain of night had cast darkness over all Waitasec, I thought the eclipsed day had passed, and most of the true night after, so that they were waiting for true dawn?

Clint

It is true night, but there's also Pilgrim's miraculous early-dawn-it-is-so-not-night-anymore miracle, which is in turn being covered by Akua's yes-it-is-it-sooooo-is-night miracle.

True dawn should wipe away all the nonsense, as well as ending true night.

Mental Mouse

Um, no. The whole point of Cat's surrender was not to set her Night directly against the Pilgrim's Light, and especially not to overcome it! So she let him spend his Shine to turn back the night, surrendered, let Viv bargain back the surrender in the face of the League. And then we get:

(From "Interlude: So We Shot Him")

> The orc looked up, in time to see the shining star that held back the night wane, and the truth of Creation replace it. The drow were struck down anew, before they could even properly stir.

""

> Akua Sahelian watched dawn rise, a crow on one side and a well on the other. "Fall," she said. A torrent of darkness shot up in the sky, and from dawn wove an eclipse.

Fayhem

shrug I'm guessing just on the basis of her personality/ approach to this whole situation that Cat went on the side of overpreparing vs. underpreparing; there might have been so much Night in that well that the artificial Night has lasted right through real night, but isn't still strong enough to override the dawn again.

rhyatris rhyatris a0814cc162 <https://wakelet.com/wake/QSs8nbXTbktlqYEtUp0ND>

Interlude: Concourse III

"All law is upheld through violence, but when violence itself becomes the law then only disorder can come of it. As prosperity requires order, to ensure prosperity a ruler must therefore suborn violence to law."

– Extract from the memoirs of Dread Emperor Terribilis II

Razin Tanja was not yet lord of Malaga, and in truth might never be. Father had named him heir, before they left Levant, and so of all that could lay claim his right would be the foremost and hardest to dispute. Yet he remained only heir, until he'd stood the ancestral grounds of the Tanja and been acclaimed to lordship by his closest kin. Razin had no right to call on the oaths once sworn to his father and so the captains of Malaga could defy him his orders if they so wished, though on war-grounds with the death of Akil Tanja still fresh they'd chosen to follow his commands nonetheless. It was because of that frail arrangement and the rights of his Blood he was considered to have voice equal to the other three standing at this council, though it would be foolish to assume the others did not regard his standing to be the lowest among them. Yet here they were nonetheless, the four of highest authority among the Dominion's armies, having woken from the waking-dreams the Peregrine had sent them to hold these talks.

There were only seats and a deep-dug firepit within the tent, for though it belonged to Lord Yannu Marave it was not the same they'd before used for war councils. This one was rather smaller and behind ancient ward-stones brought from Levant, gifts from the Gigantes that had been rarely made and were even more rarely taken away from ancestral grounds. There they kept veiled from sorcery and spying the affairs of the families owning them, as it should be. Though the stones could have been set around a larger tent, Razin knew enough of sorcery to know that certain patterns must be kept arithmetically exact to exert their full strength. The wonder-makers of the Titanomachy were free in speaking the secrets of use when they granted gifts, though never the secrets of making, and no two such gifts were ever truly the same. If the Lord of Alava had chosen this lesser tent, it would be for good reason. Razin would acknowledge, in the quiet of his own thoughts, that the closer seats and crackling flames set to the talks a different tone than that of the battle-councils.

It was easier to see the truth of the others this way. Lord Yannu Marave – Careful Yannu, as the man was known in Levant – had not personally taken the field, yet the general of the Champion's Blood looked drained under his sweat-flecked facepaint. For him Razin found little compassion, for the man had slain his father even if the matter had been settled in fair and honourable duel. He found near as little for Lady Itima Ifriqui of the Brigand's Blood, who had held command of the Vaccei warriors but left her eldest son to lead the vanguard that'd tried the fortifications of the Callowans. Moro of the Brigand's Blood had been made to sleep again, fed herbal potions concocted by binders so that if there was more to be seen in dreams one of the Blood would see it. He might yet be allowed entrance to this tent, should he come with pressing knowledge. Though Lord Yannu sat on the other side of the flames and Lady Itima to Razin's right, to his left was the only person in this tent he counted as more companion than foe. Lady Aquiline Osená, who twice had tried to see him slain before they had shared strife against the drow. He found his gaze drawn to her bronze-green paint, the sinuous lay of it covering every inch of skin not covered by her tanned leather vest.

He'd not forgot the sight of her running over moonlit snow like a whisper of smoke over water, beautiful and terrible like some ancient goddess of the hunt from olden days. Ashen Gods, how could he? He might as well been branded with a hot iron. Aquiline found his gaze, for he'd allowed himself to linger too long, and though the cast of her face was difficult to read under the colours she did not seem displeased in the slightest. Though Razin had known women before, something of the wicked glint in her eye had him feeling like he should blush. He looked away, careful not to display undue haste in doing so that would draw attention from the others but found he had to force down something like a smile.

"The Peregrine is dead," Yannu Marave said, voice shattering the silence. "We have all seen it."

And more besides, Razin thought. The journey the five Bestowed who'd gone to fight the Dead King had not been shared in full, he thought, but enough had been offered to know what need be known. The Grey Pilgrim had gone to death for the sake of all the world, and though the Black Queen was wicked and scheming she had not schemed his death nor broken the bargains she had made. The same could not be said of the Regicide, which had troubled all. Laurence de Montfort, though unfortunately Proceran, had been held in high esteem by most of them. Rarely had the Heavens known so righteous or unyielding a servant.

"The Tyrant of Helike must die," Lady Itima of the Brigand's Blood harshly said. "The Theodosian line should be ended for good, lest the viper keep biting again and again."

"Are we to wage war on the League, then?" Aquiline replied, unconvinced. "The One-Eyed King is poison to all he touches, but still surrounded by a great host."

"We can petition the Grand Alliance for soldiers," Lady Itima insisted.

"Which ally would you petition, Ifriqui?" Razin calmly said. "Ashur, broken at Thalassina and besieged on its own island by the fleets of Nicae? Or perhaps Procer, who even now makes desperate war on the Hidden Horror?"

"You would let this go unavenged, Tanza?" the Lady of Vaccei sneered. "All knew you without magic, but are you without honour as well? You talk like a coward."

His teeth clenched, his anger rose.

"Razin Tanja rode with a slayer band and fought death steel in hand," Aquiline sharply said. "Can you claim the same tonight, Itima Ifriqui? Did you even come close enough to draw or legionaries to loose a single arrow?"

"I have nothing to prove to you, girl," Lady Itima replied, tone just as sharp. "When you've fought in half as many battles as I have, then you-"

"The Peregrine is dead," Yannu Marave repeated, calm voice cutting through the rising voice. "And so, without his wise hand to guide us, we must decide where the honour of Levant lies."

Though neither of the two ladies were pleased with the interruption, they allowed it nonetheless. There would be other nights to pursue their feuds.

"Dangerous words, Marave," Aquiline warned. "It is the Holy Seljun who keeps the Dominion's honour, on behalf of the Majilis."

"Must we keep to that pretence even now that he is dead?" Lord Yannu asked, tone exhausted. "Custom is custom, yet we all knew who was the Isbili we followed – stripped of that name or not. In this tent are four of the five that would be seated if the Majilis was called to session. The fifth has not been more than a decoration in my lifetime."

"Hasn't been a ruler of the Pilgrim's line worth the name since Yasa Isbili," Lady Itima conceded.

"What it is you suggested, Lord Marave?" Razin stiffly asked.

"That decision must be made as to the fate of this Grand Alliance," the Lord of Alava said. "What has it brought us, to warrant what we've lost in its name?"

"You'd abandon the Tenth Crusade?" Aquiline asked, genuinely surprised.

"What Tenth Crusade is that?" Yannu Marave asked. "We've marched for more than a year now, and I've yet to see it. We have fought soldiers of Callow, soldiers of the League and now the draw servants of the Black Queen. Was it not the Tower we swore to war upon? Pretty words were spoken yet the truth is plain: only Ashur tread Wasteland soil, and it has been defeated. The Tenth Crusade is done, and if there can be said to have been so much as a thimble's worth victory to it then it belongs to the Queen of Callow."

He exhaled.

"Let us go home," he said. "Let us bury our dead and see to our lands, instead of chasing shadows for Cordelia Hasenbach's sake."

"Oaths were made," Lady Itima said.

"To march," Lord Yannu said. "March we have, and fought too. How much more can be owed? Aid was given, oaths kept."

"And what will happen, when the Dead King devours the entire Principate and raises it as an army that'll outnumber grains of sand?" Razin said. "Do you suppose he'll simply stop at our borders and turn around?"

"The Red Snake Wall has never been breached," the Lady of Vaccei said.

Her Blood knew the great work better than any other, having often snuck past it to raid Arlesite lands, but this was foolishness. Aquiline agreed, it seemed.

"Never has the Hidden Horror tried it," the Lady of Tartessos said. "Mighty as the enchantments of the spellsingers are, the Crown of the Dead is a spawning pool of endless fresh horrors. What manner of abomination might be made from the corpse of an empire? Best not find out, for all our sakes."

"It is not written in stone that Procer will fall," Lord Yannu said. "Bestowed have flocked to the north, and now both the Black Queen and the League offer truce to the First Prince. Let Procerans see to the defence of their own lands, and if friendship so compels your souls we may offer other bounty than the blood of our people. Foodstuffs and arms, loans of gold to fund their war."

"And so when the war for Calernia's survival is ended, we shall be remembered as those that crawled back to our own lands after the first taste of bloodshed," Aquiline scathingly said. "Or, even as the continent dies around us, we'll be cursed as the cowards who might have preserved it – if not for the wisdom of Yannu Marave."

"Thousands have been lost already," the Lord of Alava said. "Our old ally the Thalassocracy is ruined for at least a generation even if it shakes the Nicaean boot off its throat, which is hardly certain. Would you exhaust our every army as well so that Salia can reclaim Levant after the war end? We all know how much alliance meant to princes, after Callow lost its armies in the last eastern crusade."

"The First Prince is an honourable woman," Lady Itima said with a grimace, looking like it cost her to admit it.

Though the Brigand's Blood was fervent in its hatred of enemies abroad and Procerans in particular, the Lady of Vaccei had spoken of Cordelia Hasenbach with respect more than once. The peace forged between Vaccei and Procer by its First Prince could have been so costly as to ruin the Ifriqui, for none had stood behind Lady Itima in her warmongering and would have protested heavy reparations overmuch, but Hasenbach had been restrained and allowed for honour in peace. That'd been remembered just as much as the many treacheries of the Principate.

"Will her successor be as well?" Lord Yannu retorted. "Or will our spent lands be hungrily eyed by Arlesite crowns and a would-be conqueror be elected after her?"

"To ward off a betrayal that might be," Razin mildly said, "you instead offer a betrayal that is. I see no honour in this, Marave. Only fear."

"Hear hear," Aquiline said. "It might be the Tower we declared war on, but it is the Dead King that now seeks our end. Until the Last Dusk that old thing will be our enemy, and I will not retreat without even catching sight of his armies once."

The Lord of Alava turned to fix Itima of the Brigand's Blood with a steady look.

"Your judgement, Lady Itima?" Lord Yannu asked.

The older woman hesitated.

"It is not the war we agreed to fight, no denying that," she said. "And you speak sense in being wary of Arlesite friendship. Yet honour must be observed. Some may remain, but others should return."

Lord Yannu said nothing, gazing at them over the fire.

"Then let it be remembered that when the Enemy marched, Vaccei flinched and Alava turned tail," Lady Aquiline Osená said, tone cold and contemptuous. "Tartessos will not shame itself in such a manner. My captains will remain, and I with them. Run back behind tall walls, if that is the sum of you."

The gaze moved to him.

"Malaga stays," Razin simply said.

"You're not lord, boy," Lady Itima replied. "You've no call to make that decision. It will be put to the captains."

"I imagine it will," Razin Tanja of the Grim Binder's line replied. "I will be certain to tell them the Lady of Vaccei believes them so cowardly as to flee. No doubt they'll be eager to prove you right."

It might have been enough, Razin suspected, just for the captains to be told that retreat was Lord Yannu Marave's own notion. His slaying of Father had seen him politely despised among the men and women who'd spent decades in the service of Akil Tanja. Now that one of the Brigand's Blood had called their bravery into doubt this way? Gods, there might be honour-duels over insinuations they'd even considered returning south. Lord Yannu gazed at him for a long and silent moment, until he tiredly sighed.

"Has your shoulder been fully healed, Razin Tanja of Binder's Blood?" the Lord of Alava asked.

It had been. Though the drow's blow had been hard enough it was still tender, the healing of his binders had ensured that within perhaps a day he would perfectly hale. As it was, save for a mild ache when he moved there was naught left to fix. Still, a strange amusement took him when he realized they were not even speaking of the same shoulder wound as the previous time – it was not a goblin blade that'd hurt him last but a monstrous drow appendage.

"It has," Razin acknowledged.

He would not lower himself to lying over the matter, even if Yannu Marave meant now to kill him just as he'd killed Father.

"By smoke add dust you vowed enmity between us," Lord Yannu said. "To be set aside until healing was seen to."

The Lord of Alava rose from his seat, graceful for all his exhaustion.

"Let us settle matters of honour, then," Yannu of the Champion's Blood said.

"As was sworn," Razin calmly agreed, rising to match him.

The tent was not large, he thought, yet neither was it so small it could not be put to use as duelling-grounds. It would best to keep this away from the eyes of their captains, regardless.

"Will either of you require an officiant?" Lady Itima drawled. "I've no horse in this race, and so put forward my name."

Razin declined, as did Lord Yannu. Theirs would be a duel to the death, not first blood or first wound, and so there was no need of another pair of eyes to adjudicate when to call a halt. Aquiline had risen as well, and leaned closer so her whisper would not be overheard.

"I've seen the two of you fight, Razin," she said. "You're one of the finest blades I know, but he is finer still and experienced in such duels besides. You will not be the victor in this."

"He is tired," Razin replied.

"So are you," she said.

"I vowed enmity nonetheless," he told her.

She studied him in silence.

"So you did," Aquiline conceded.

She leaned closer still, and for a heartbeat he believed she might kiss him. Instead he swallowed a gasp when he felt a knife slide into his lower belly. He'd not even seen her draw. Still studying him, the Lady of Tartessos nodded approvingly.

"You didn't scream," she said, sounding proud. "Good. You may consider this the formal beginning of our courtship."

"Well," Razin croaked, "you've certainly made an impression."

"Lady Aquiline, what is your meaning by intervening here?" Lord Yannu coldly asked.

Aquiline graced his reply with a twitch of the lips before turning to the Lord of Alava.

"As Razin Tanja is injured, he may not fight you," the Lady of Tartessos said.

That was one way to delay the matter, he conceded. She'd even been kind enough to slide the blade somewhere that had little risk of killing him. Yet it would amount to little, for Yannu Marave's intent remained: the man would slay either himself or Aquiline, and so ensure that few enough captains remained that those of Malaga or Tartessos would follow the rest home simply not to be stranded without allies in the midst of the Principate. Before long, there would be one more-

"And so I claim his right as his champion," Aquiline Osená casually continued. "Any may contest this claim if they so wish, but it will have to be blade in hand."

"Aquiline," he began, "don't-"

"Alas, he has become delirious from the pain," she said. "And so his word can no longer be taken over the matter."

Lord Yannu's cool eyes moved from him to the Lady of Tartessos, assessing.

"So it seems," the Lord of Alava agreed.

The choice was clear, Razin supposed, between a mere unacclaimed heir like himself and a true ruling lady like Aquiline. If one of them had to die, in Yannu's eye she would be the better choice for unlike him, she could call on oaths to force her decisions onto captains. Knowing there was no point, he set aside the urge to continue protesting. Both duellists moved to the side of the tent, where they would have more room to move, and the other two of the Blood were invited to withdraw to the opposite end of the tent. Knife still in his belly, Razin obeyed.

"Even if she is the victor," Lady Itima casually told him. "I've not agreed to your own decision."

"What do you want, Ifriqui?" he grunted.

"The Tyrant of Helike," she murmured. "If not the annihilation of his line, then at least his head."

Aquiline and Yannu unsheathed their long, hooked swords and bowed. The Lord of Alava was taller than her, he could not help but notice. Larger and heavier with a great deal more blood on his hands. The Slayer's Blood were unnaturally skilled duellists, it was true, and Aquiline skilled even compared to her kin. Yet the Champion's Blood were known to reap lives like wheat and laugh through wounds great and small. There was no telling who would be the winner.

"We've no soldiers for that reckoning," Razin said. "And no ally to borrow them from."

"You know my terms, boy," the Lady of Vaccei simply replied. "They will not change. If you and the girl want my warriors, earn them."

The unspoken threat being that otherwise she would leave with her host, and perhaps the Alava men as well. If Yannu was slain and no other captains left, the Alavans might be shamed into remaining with the greater army – lest they be known as the sole warriors of the Dominion to have fled. If the Vaccei swords left with them, however, there could not be talk of dishonour. Or at least not quite as pointed, which for men who wanted to leave would suffice. Of course, this meant nothing unless Aquiline won. The two duellists had begun to move, he saw, yet blades had yet to clash. They were fighting over position, for now, looking for an opening to end it quick and clean. They were both tired and well-aware of it. The Alavan captains would be hard to keep, he thought, if Lord Yannu was killed. The hill-folk of Alava disliked taking orders from any save the Champion's Blood, and were prouder than most. Aquiline suddenly lunged forward, blade flickering forward, but Lord Yannu calmly parried and withdrew, with the hook of his blade scoring a long cut on the Lady of Tartessos' cheek. Red blood trailed down onto paint of green and bronze.

This would only end when one of them died, Razin thought, and in that moment the thought disgusted him. The Peregrine's corpse was hardly cold that already the children of others lines were killing each other over disputes of honour. Was there really any honour to be found in this? Razin wondered, watching Aquiline deftly manoeuvre around the fire pit to avoid a blow that would have taken her hand and scoring a cut of her own on Lord Yannu's face – above his brow, where the blood might trickle down onto his eye if he was not careful. There was skill, that much was certain. Admirable skill. But honour? It was his own father being avenged, Razin reminded himself. His father who had been slain in a honour-duel much like this one, disagreeing over a decision of great import. Theirs were hard ways, Razin Tanja knew, but he'd been taught that they were also honest ways. Unlike Procerans who poisoned and schemed, unlike the Free Cities and their empty trials, those of Levant did not leave the rot to fester. The brought it out, cut it out, settled the matters so they would not grow and settled them in honour. Honour-duels, he thought. Honour-wars. So much honour was there to be found in the Dominion, and all of it derived from blood.

"If he kills her, the Osenas will feud with the Maraves," he quietly said.

And, though it would be early and almost presumptuous of him to say, the Tanja as well.

"So they will," Lady Itima shrugged.

She was unmoved, for this was simply the way of the world. Steel touched steel, as they watched, as a quick exchange that had Razin's heard racing saw Aquiline avoiding a cut throat but taking a blow to the side of the head from Lord Yannu's heavy pommel. She seemed dizzied, and so his stomach clenched in fear. Razin Tanja had stood just like he was standing now and watched his own father be slain, because this was an honourable way to settle things and it would be dishonourable of him to do otherwise. This settles nothing, he thought. It is rule by the blade, and it brings ever more the same. If Aquiline slew Yannu, avenging Razin's own father, then some other Marave would one day come for her to avenge Yannu. And then in years after someone would come for her killer, and on and on and on it would go until either Levant died or the Last Dusk came to pass. Razin felt as if he were standing on the edge of a tall precipice, as if he were about to fall, and every inch of him wanted to retreat. To take a step back. But he thought, in that moment, not of anything his father or teachers had ever said but of a pair of cool brown eyes and a cutting grin wreathed in smoke. You mock yourself, the great monster of their age had told him almost gently, by pretending today did not happen. It did. Learn from it, or die in a ditch somewhere blaming everything but yourself.

"Enough," Razin Tanja of the Binder's Blood said.

Lady Itima eyed him curiously, but nothing else came of it.

"Enough," Razin hissed, and he ripped the knife out of his own guts.

Even when the blade clattered on the ground they did not cease their fighting, though when bleeding and wincing he stepped in between them the blades were held back.

"Razin," Aquiline harshly said, "do not-"

"How many years has it been, since the Dominion was founded?" he interrupted. "Three hundred and change, I'd say. That is how long it has been since Procerans ceased killing us and we've started doing it to ourselves. Enough, damn you."

"You dishonour yourself," Yannu Marave scorned him. "Fearing defeat-"

"The Valiant Champion took up arms to end tyrants, didn't she?" Razin said. "Rulers who forced their will through force of arms. I wonder how much difference she'd really see, between you and a prince."

The Lord of Alava paled, either in dismay or white-hot fury.

"If there is honour to be lost," Razin said, scorning the very word as he had himself been scorned, "then let it be mine."

"You would let your father's death go unavenged?" Aquiline asked, and there was something like contempt in her voice.

That wounded, it did, but still he must press on. Learn from it, or die, he told himself.

"Someone has to," he snarled back. "What does this change? What does any of this change?"

Something in him snapped, for if he'd been able to see this why hadn't they? Why did it have to be him, bearing those disdainful looks like he'd somehow spewed in their cup by arguing that more killing wasn't going to get them out of the put killing had first dug.

"It settles our disagreement," Lord Yannu said. "Move aside, Tanja, or be struck down."

Razin laughed.

"Do it," he said, extending his arms and wincing from the wound in his gut being stretched. "Is this what we are now? Even when the world is half-ended we kill each other over battle plans and decisions and how we've killed each other over the last two. Are we truly that... little?"

"I will not warn you again," Yannu Marave calmly told him.

"Move, Razin," Aquiline said, and though there was still disdain in the voice there was more worry.

It was not much of a balm, but it was not nothing.

"No," Razin said. "If you want to force this through look it in the eye, Yannu Marave – admit that you are willing to cut down an unarmed man to get your way."

"Damn you, boy," Lord Yannu hoarsely said, but raised his sword anyway.

The knife came to rest against his throat without anyone having it heard unsheathed. The Lord of Alava stilled.

"Keep talking, Tanja," Lady Itima said.

A convulsive chuckle ripped its way free of his throat.

"Do I truly need to make some great argument," he said, absurdly amused, "of why we should cease slaughtering each other at least on the same night when the sky almost fell on our heads?"

There was a heartbeat of silence.

"Gods Above," Razin said. "Look at us. We might as well be an Alamans farce: the four fools who duelled on the night the world almost ended. We've fought half a score in battles and skirmishes against the Army of Callow and the League and the drow, yet the closest the Dominion's armies have come to breaking this winter is this very hour. Think on that, for a moment. We've wounded ourselves more viciously than the Black Queen and all her heretic cohorts put together."

"Much have you chided us," Aquiline said, "yet you've said nothing of how to mend the wound."

"We bring back the Peregrine's corpse," Razin Tanja said. "And we put it to a proper pyre. And when that's done? We don't butcher ourselves like fucking animals. If we are to decide the fate of Levant, then let Levant have a say."

"The Holy Seljun?" Lady Itima said, sounding surprised.

"No," Lord Yannu softly said. "He means the captains. He means that we speak our case to an assembly of our soldiers, and choose our way by acclamation."

Razin nodded.

"And if the soldiers choose to go home?" Aquiline pointedly asked.

"Then we go home," Razin said. "We have to be willing to lose, Aquiline, to bend. Otherwise this only ever ends with swords bared."

"That has been our way," she replied, "and it has served us well."

"Has it?" he softly asked. "The Grey Pilgrim has been dead for nary an hour, and already in this tent the seeds of a decade of war have been sown. Can you truly say our way has served us well?"

"I will agree," Yannu Marave said, "to sending warriors to bring back the Peregrine in honour."

Razin admired, against his will, how calm the man's tone was when Itima's knife had yet to leave his throat.

"The escort and the assembly both have my agreement," Lady Itima of the Brigand's Blood said. "Be it battle or retreat, let it be chosen before Gods and men."

"The escort and the assembly," Aquiline agreed after a moment, tone brisk. "The right decision will be clear to all that are not craven fools."

Razin Tanja idly wondered if it would be ill-taken to send for a priest or a binder for his stomach wound before an honour guard of warriors was assembled to take the Peregrine back to his kin.

"The escort and the assembly," he said, as if there'd been any doubt.

He was still bleeding from the belly when they left the tent, but at least no one had died. That was, he decided, better than he'd had any right to hope for.

Caerulea

Vote for A Practical Guide to Evil here:

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Discord Server:

<https://discord.gg/3nbsUfZ>

Patreon:

<https://www.patreon.com/user?u=3523924>

Liliet

bless u

Psyrix

ugh, I've honestly become a drug addict chasing a high xD, was refreshing and refreshing for 3 mins and was scared that there'd be a delay xD. Thank the godssss (also, voteeee [don't have the link rn i'll add when im done reading the chappie]

Caerulea

Just so you know, the RSS feed updates with the url (I mean, you could have guessed it for this one but in general) before anything else updates with the link. 14 seconds after midnight tonight, though it has been later on occasion.

Jeffery Wells

I'm getting worried. I see the dates on the chapters as I'm catching up and the story isn't done yet! What am I going to do when I finally catch up? Wait??

Javvies

So, Razin's proving that Cat's decision to spare him was worth it.

Hmmmm, it will be interesting to see how Tariq having been resurrected will affect the Levantines.

Ah, so they at least saw enough to tell that Laurence was unreliable.

Cicero

Actually I reread that section, and I think it was a comment on how Cat killed the Saint and how that disquieted them. It was not a comment on Laurence's unreliability.

Liliet

I very much read it as a comment on Laurence's unreliability.

>though the Black Queen was wicked and scheming she had not schemed his death nor broken the bargains she had made. The same could not be said of the Regicide

The same does not refer to 'his death' specifically here because bargains are mentioned afterwards, it'd be a pretty tortured reading.

Morgenstern

Agreed. To make it un-tortured it would have to be something along the lines of "the same could not be said of what she did to the Regicide". It very much reads like the Regicide having schemed death or at least broken bargains, the way it is.

Liliet

She broke bargains, the way I'm seeing it, pretty simple. You know, the bargain of 'let's do what everyone agrees to do', the unspoken one.

Mental Mouse

It seems that reform is catching on.... strangely, with the champion of (New) Evil preaching peace against the stalwarts of Good.

Shveiran

It seems Cat's decision was very much on point, yes. Though I must say I wish her parting words with Razin had been more on point.

Don't get me wrong, I LOVE this outcome. I wish it was ice cream so I could eat it up, I like it so much. But while I'm enamored with the outcome, Cat's words seem a bit weak to provoke this sharp a turn.

I mean, Razin ends up very close to Cat's own point of view here, if through Dominion lens: sick of the death, realizing the status quo is a vicious cycle that cannot be escaped unless we are willing to break it. I can't help but wish her words to him had been closer to such insight. As is, moving from "You mock yourself, by pretending today did not happen. It did. Learn from it, or die in a ditch somewhere blaming everything but yourself." to this radical a change seems a bit weak.

Well, perhaps not weak, but it seems a lot more related to Razin than the words, it's what I'm saying. Perhaps something more pointed could be arranged, before publication, if that's what EE is planning? I think it wouldn't be forced to have Cat say something more related to breaking the cycle of violence.

Jessica Day

I disagree with this assessment. She told him to look inward and take responsibility. Such a thing required one to look at their own belief structures. Having done so, he essentially is asking the same in turn of the others.

Ultimate_Procrastinator

"it seems a lot more related to Razin than the words"

If I may offer my opinion, that assessment is exactly why I liked what happened here. Razin didn't upset the status quo because Cat made a neat, perfectly applicable speech to him, just like so many other, usually trite works of fiction; rather, he received a nudge, saw that the direction it pushed him in was a good one, and rolled with it on his own. It feels much more human, real, and satisfying to me to see Razin take a relatively minor comment, see how it applies, and go well beyond the initial scope of the statement. It also helps, in my mind, that he just recently saw his father die; losing family and friends has a way of making people people stop and reassess what is important to them, then take actions they never would have been brave or committed enough to do beforehand.

daegone823

Lets see this from his point of view he comes from a long line of mages and is constantly put down by everyone besides his father for his lack of magic. He already has to prove himself and be creative in how he solves his problems since he does not have magic to rely on. He has had to make practical choices.

- Black queen defeated him, because he was so focused on honor/pride/blood

- Whipped/dishonored in front of all dominion for his mistake(humbled)

- His father was defeated in an honor duel because of honor/pride/blood

- He sets aside honor/pride/blood, to help a former enemy(who attempted to have him murdered twice), because they share a common goal

- He along with many of the dominion see the Peregrine himself set aside honor/pride/blood to ally with villains to face a common evil.

- The last nudge was seeing a new found ally/love interest risking their life for his honor/pride/blood in a pointless duel that would most likely result in 12 years of war.

He had seen the success of putting aside pride and the downfalls of on blind belief adherence to honor. The Black Queen may have begun his journey of discovery but it was the lessons from the events that surrounded the war that allowed him to truly learn from the mistakes of the past.

Chat was a beginning but

Liliet

This!

Catherine only brushed him by; it feels a lot more real for him to have come to the same conclusion from entirely different premises. The conclusion is a good one, that's all.

Liliet

I think it being unrelated is precisely the point. Catherine isn't magically enchanting the continent into following her views, she is just one ripple on the wave of change where Razin is another. A thing she incidentally said about something entirely unrelated was well-put enough to resonate with him on a basic level and end up applicable here. He's not following her, they're standing side by side, she just figured it out first.

Soronel Haetir

You're cruel making us wait for the great reveal,

Evadrea

Another fantastic chapter ^.^

Hitogami

It really is one of the greats.

nick012000

I was honestly expecting Razin Tanja to get a Name the moment he pulled the knife out of his stomach.

Gunslinger

Me too but then I expect everyone to get Names. Not my fault there are so many cool characters in this story

jonnnney

Too many Bestowed on the field for a new one to pop up without damn good reason. A single decision might push Razin towards a Name, but he has been too weak and wishy washy for a bit of common sense to yield a name.

Fayhem

"A bit of common sense" doesn't really cover putting yourself between two duelists and daring one of them to kill you because you're trying to overturn literally centuries of deeply ingrained cultural dysfunction, in my eyes. Razin is more than how you're painting him, in this moment in particular.

Agent J

What he did is impressive, yes. But it's leagues away from the goblin steel that is the Will of Named. There's a level of madness to every Named we know intimately. Cat, Tariq, Hakram, Laurence, Amadeus, Indrani, Kairos, Masego. Their madness takes different forms and is expressed in different ways, but all are mad to the bone.

For what else can one be when they look at the lay of Creation and know the truth of it. Cat knows it can be better. Hakram knows she can make it so. Black knows the game is rigged and that he can win despite that. Laurence knows Evil must be Cut from the world. Indrani knows the only way to live is to absolutely fucking live. Masego knows Creation itself is the greatest miracle ever woven and that he can crack the code of it. Our lovely little lordling, by comparison, knows nothing at all.

Razin is far from mad, his will far from steel, and he is far from Named.

daegone823

I mean Cat was given the Squire name after being stabbed by the Black Knight.
One named changed her world along with her purpose to change the status quo.

Razin may get a name from Being stabbed stealthily in the belly by slayers
Whipped by the binders
Trading blades with the champion
tricking the brigands line * receiving the blessing of the confirmed Grey Pilgrim

Just saying there is a great deal of weight behind the actions he takes, and the pattern is there.
He could be the Dominator, The New Blood, Progenitor

Agent J

Cat was given a Claim to the Name Squire by the reigning Black Knight. Being able to grant that Claim is his due.

All that you have listed pales in comparison to what Cordelia has done and she's not getting a Name anytime soon. Named are exceedingly rare. What Razin has accomplished is not. It does not set him apart from the chaff. Hells, the Arlesite up north warring on the Dead King has a greater story behind his sails, along with more absurd feats, and inspires greater awe in those around him, yet he still bears no Name and you would argue being whipped for his massive fuck up in Sarcella is a worthwhile accomplishment that could lead to a Name?

Honestly, if the readers were the ones doling out Names instead of Providence, a third of Calernia would be Bestowed.

Andrew Mitchell

While I agree that Razin (and the noble up north whose name I can't recall) might (or might not) get a name. I think you're massively overstating readers' opinions on this matter.

> Honestly, if the readers were the ones doling out Names instead of Providence, a third of Calernia would be Bestowed.

Think about this for a second. There's about 400,000 troops and civilians present in Iserre. To my recollection, there is literally only two people who have been the subject of recent Name speculation – Razin and Rozala. That's 1 out of 200,000. Or 0.0005%

Agent J

... I was being hyperbolic.

ninegardens

>Hells, the Arlesite up north warring on the Dead King has a greater story behind his sails

I mean.... I kind of wonder if that one IS secretly named, given how enigmatic he is, and how we see glimpses of him but its explicitly not clear how he does all this shit.

Liliet

Frederik? Honestly agreed, I was surprised he wasn't already Named when he led the charge against an enemy Named

daegone823

He was raised in a society where killing at the drop of a hat was expected. Merely the fact that two experienced generals launched into a duel resulting in death and no one batted an eye in the middle of a crusade no less. The expectation to kill one another due to past slights was strong. He was the son of the general and the expectation for him to be killed or kill was also high.

He was raised in this society where blood meant more than personal beliefs meant more than the lives of all. In a society like that he decided to argue for peace.

I understand that we have seen a lot of big things going down and expectation are very high for who should be named and who should not be.

- He is royalty which in this universe gives him a high chance of being named.

- He has a vengeance story (pattern of three with Yanu)

- He has purpose to change the honor bound ways of his people

- He has faced a drow with hundred of years of killing behind its back and survived

While there may be many in the dominion who use honor or respond when there honor is questioned. He chose to let go, to give up his honor for peace.

This was one of the pivot moments Chat is always using in her favor. Guess what Razin did the exact same thing that the Black Queen did and his efforts halted a war and ensured none of the generals died for blood feuds.

"Razin felt as if he were standing on the edge of a tall precipice, as if he were about to fall, and every inch of him wanted to retreat. To take a step back. But he thought, in that moment, not of anything his father or teachers had ever said but of a pair of cool brown eyes [...] Learn from it, or die in a ditch somewhere blaming everything but yourself."

He knew the implications of his actions and chose to do them anyway. He chose to do something that has not been done for years to settle for peace. I mean no offence but did Hakram have any major feats besides being near Catherine. I think Razin does to just deserve a name but needs one to enact the changes he has already begun.

Liliet

I think the difference between Hakram and Razin here is, Hakram was widely known as the Squire's adjutant and fit the cultural groove for that well. He's The Adjutant, as stories go, it makes sense.

The What would you call Razin? How would you define him in terms of easily summarized and easily understood character archetypes?

Mental Mouse

You are being distracted by Black's theatrics, which another Named (I forget which) was very clear was strictly unnecessary. He might well get his name by a touch from Pilgrim. Pilgrim could apply a thwack upside the head with his new staff (I assume he'll just pick one out of the Twilight environment), but Pilgrim is way less theatrical than Black was, so I doubt he'll do that unless Razin manages to annoy him first.

daegone823

Razin is the son of the Grim Binder, he is widely known as the child without magic that still stands against beast. He faced the black queen survived, faced the drow on the fields and survived, challenged Yanu in front of assembly of all under the dominion. In the future he will bed the slayer, trick the brigand, and maybe even duel Yanu then deny him death so he will forever live in shame, and for all these deeds and more he will be recognized by the Peregrine who unbeknownst to all killed his own nephew to ensure peace. No to mention his country right now does not have to follow him but they do out of loyalty to his decisions. Nothing binds them to him they follow him because they see the soul of a hero in his blood. His actions have proven as much.

Razin will be the one he will see as the future for Dominion someone who sees past there honor and what is good and instead focus on what must be done however much it cost personally.

I think with all these feats it would be foolish not to think he should at least become a candidate for a name. Don't forget the side of good has been losing a great deal of heroes lately. I think they are seeking new heroes to fill in the gaps left by old. He can fulfill some story line that has him defeat the dead king or at least be apart of the group that faces the hidden horror. the weakest hero usually yeild the greatest pivot for the heavens to work through.

Mental Mouse

In particular, note how he set "true" honor against Yannu's "careful" exploitation of the rules. "[Do you actually care about honor, or just killing anyone who says "no" to you?]"

And the keystone: "We have to be willing to lose, Aquiline, to bend.". Honor-duels to the death are for people who can't handle losing, who'd rather burn the house down than move to a different chair.

WuseMajor

Eh, peacemakers don't get Names.

....ok, well, the Grey Pilgrim is still taken and he'd probably think it was sacrilegious to end up with any name other than Grim Binder.

Still, people remember and write stories about Warriors, not diplomats.

Morgenstern

Well, was it not a grim binding of opposed forces what he just did? ^^

Mental Mouse

He would likely get a transitional name to start with, which would position him to go in any of several directions. And there are certainly less-violent names, they just don't show up in the fight scenes.

My very own name

Hierarch is pretty much a diplomat Name, at least originally.

And peacemakers might be the minority, but they are there as well. If they truly believe in peace, it would be possible to fuel a Name.

Euodiachloris

There might be an issue as to which Name would fit. That was Grey Pilgrim work, and he's of the wrong line. Also... that Name is currently complicated by being a little bit of a silver mackerel tabby of the Schrödinger variety. 😊

Mental Mouse

Not yet, but that may come (Aquiline isn't herself Named anyway). Remember that Names come from purpose, and Razin is developing a new purpose.

Shveiran

If Cat hadn't raised Tariq, I could have seen him claim Gray Pilgrim by trying to maintain the peace he wished for.

Liliet

"Pilgrim" means "wanderer". Tariq earned the Name by going off to wander the land and do good where he can. Until and unless Razin goes on a similar journey, he cannot lay claim there.

Tenthyr

Oh snap, character growth so sudden it gave the poor boy whiplash.

erebus42

I mean Razin has been in the process of reevaluating himself ever since getting his ass handed to him by Cat and his father dying. I'm personally ok with him having an epiphany. It may be sudden but it wasn't completely out of nowhere

Liliet

Yeah, this is a followup on thoughts he was having in the song lyrics interludes, too.

Ultimate_Procrastinator

Also, people reassessing what's important to them right after the death of a family member or friend (like, say, a father killed in an honor duel) is pretty realistic, as is them suddenly committing to things they would not have before

Mental Mouse

And a "stomachache". 😊

Rup

.from "a whisper of smoke over water"
(Ps what an image)
(Pps sounds like name of a song)

Mental Mouse

Smoke on The Water... classic!

Andrew Mitchell

Yes, I thought of that too when I read that line. I've loved that first guitar riff since I was a wee lad,

Shequi

That's an interesting turn; fresh from a fight as a great swordsman, and now speaking cooperation. I think Bestowal approaches for Razin Tanja of the Grim Binder's Blood.

Novice

It would be hilarious if he gets the Name of Squire.

Mental Mouse

Wrong culture, I think. He might well get one of the Levantine names. Or, the way things are going, he might even coin a new Name.

Andrew Mitchell

My money's on a new Name. But I'm also in two minds about whether or not he will get a Name and if so whether or not that will be a good thing. I mean, I'd hate for him to get a leadership related Name and then be excluded from actually leading the Levantines.

Decius

The Peregrine's values appear to have migrated to a new host, who is willing to see himself dishonored if it means not forcing an unending series of feuds and wars over honor.

Liliet

♥ ♥ ♥

Andrew Mitchell

I was NOT expecting Cat's chastisement of Razin to have such an impact so quickly. She certainly knows what words to say.

It's going to be great seeing the GP rally the assembly of captains in person, and not just as a corpse.

Liliet

Catherine serves as a wise crone without even trying to – she didn't actually mean anything by her words other than the immediate context, she just chose them well enough they ended up echoing to apply everywhere ♥ ♥ ♥

Cha 20!

Andrew Mitchell

Cha 20?!? No wonder she does so well on bluff and intimidate checks. 😊

Andrew Mitchell

Ooops, and diplomacy checks too.

Liliet

You see exactly what I mean 😊

(and seduction checks without even trying...)

Gunslinger

Poor Rosala never stood a chance.

Liliet

"Are you trying to seduce your way out of this, Black Queen?"

"No"

"Shame"

Andrew Mitchell

hahahhaha

Mental Mouse

> Catherine serves as a wise crone without even trying to

More like a "wise child", really. A crone is the representative of tradition and accumulated wisdom. But a wise child can answer what a crone cannot, precisely because they "don't know better" – they are not blinded by "received wisdom", nor bound by precedent.

Liliet

I would say "do not look away from what happened today" is more along the lines of "canned yet still actually valid wisdom" that you'd get from a crone :3

Catherine's thing is very largely repeating rather obvious things that she was brought up on and then recontextualized and verified: killing is bad, trust is good, etc. That's the "old person" kind of wisdom, not the child kind :3

Mental Mouse

Huh? I'd say the opposite, "killing is bad, trust is good" is simple enough for a child. It's the "grown-ups" who then tell children "don't trust those people", and "explain" (justify) why they have to hurt someone. (Especially when they say "it's for your own good"!) But more generally, it's young folks that challenge the rules, while old folks try to enforce them.

The Pilgrim himself was a classic example, until Cat battered him into yielding by demonstrating that her methods could consistently beat his. Cat's brilliance is in taking what she's been taught and transforming it with creativity, specifically by challenging the assumptions that came along with it.

Liliet

Do note that when she was younger Catherine very much favored the approach of "kill it with fire until it stops moving". It's the dynamic – is the person saying the thing because they haven't yet been taught otherwise, or are they saying it because they tried the other way and found out this one was better? Catherine has very much tried the other way. It's not about the simplicity, it's about the source of the wisdom. Catherine's is experience. disproportionately extensive for her age.

NZPIEFACE

I just realized, but Bard is basically Contessa.

ninegardens

I mean... similar OP story role, with mysterious motives and questionable free will but...

I was gonna say but, but then after that list I'm not so sure.

Bard has to LEARN her skills. She has age, but learning. Contessa gets them by magic, but has no context. in some sense, I'd say Bard is Wis/Cha while Contessa is (effectively) Int and Dex.

But yes, having thought about, I agree, the similarities run deep.

RandomFan

That's one model. I think it's the least useful: Contessa has a goal, and motions to get to them, but there's no logic to the tapestry, and the only thing you can do to mitigate her is make victory impossible, or to use weaknesses that I don't think anyone in canon both knows and can exploit.

Another is this: Bard is a very wise, but still limited, seer, who is frantically trying to tug the story her way. She's fallible, she's failed before and will fail again, but usually the failures only have prices in time, suffering or forms she doesn't have to pay. There's not much you can do to beat her, but there's a lot that can make her lose- it's just a lot harder to make her stay defeated than anything else, and she has some amount of supernatural support for her

More like Jack Slash, given their main powers.

Navi-Hank

He's coming into a name. Probably a Gillan one by his desire to break the system

Andrew Mitchell

(I expect Gillan was a typo and you meant Villain.)

I think a Villain Name is unlikely, but not impossible. He's not setting out to take or exercise power for himself. He's just using his leadership skills & position to shake up an existing system for the good of everyone. I think that's pretty unambiguously Good. Plus, you know, Levantines as a nation are aligned to Good. I think Razin's headed towards a Good Name.

I don't know what it would be though. What do you think?

Jessica Day

Seeing as this change was wrought by Cat, I think we may be moving away from names. Just look at the princess in the previous chapter, upset at how names decide her life and others. The closer we get to the Accords, the more I think Cat's influence will be pushing people away from names. She herself no longer has a name and neither does Vivienne. And now people begin to break away from those old stories...

And so when the young heir stands between 2 blades it feels less like someone trying to impose their will and more like someone pleading for a better way, for a change to the old system.

Andrew Mitchell

You make a good case for that. I would be happy with Ranzin becoming a true Levantine leader without a Name.

My very own name

But we have to take into account the fact that Levantine culture highly values its Named, while Procer, as a culture, does not easily lead to Named. So, probably, Levantines get many more Named.

caoimhinh

His desire is not to break the system nor is it powered by ambitions, he merely wants the well-being of his nation and to stop needless bloodshed.

If he actually gets a Name, it will be a Heroic one.

Liliet

By that logic, the five founders of Levant were villains too. Can we stop pretending Evil = Chaos and Good = Law for five seconds?

dalazar6942

Based on the prologue of PGtE, the first page of the book of all things no less, The two sides of the debate that have come to be called Good and Evil, or Above and Below, actually are neither. They spawned out of the choice between guidance and rule, or control. However, looking at the behaviors of both sides, from the Choirs' absolute values and requirements, and the Devils overwriting of localized reality, you have to appreciate that it's never really been specified whether Good or Evil represented guidance or rule. So as for Good = Law and Evil = Chaos, just look at the republic of Bellephron. Law = Chaos = Evil.

Fayhem

IIRC we have word of god from EE that Above and Below actually do correspond roughly to good and evil as we would conventionally understand them. As far as the Book of All Things goes, it's no more necessarily correct than any other book written by mortals.

Further, even if the BoAT is correct there I don't think the Gods making Creation to settle an argument over guidance/control vs. freedom/anarchy (depending on what coat of paint you put on each of those) necessarily invalidates the premise that they're actually good and evil respectively. You can make an argument that they wouldn't use creation to settle an argument over good vs. evil as such because there is no settling such an argument between two sets of entities that are (meta)physically incapable of changing their nature; an argument over approach, on the other hand, might actually be possible to settle.

Liliet

000H good point re: argument over approach ♥

Qwormuli

Gods have no precedent in inability to change and the only(albeit not 100% reliable, I'll agree) source present claims the opposite. Demons too, are capable of change, it seems. Only angels are seen as static(currently) and I suspect them to be as far from the big G's as us.

Liliet

I mean, the Book of All Things is just. A religious book. Both Catherine and Laurence have commented on its limited... credibility.

And WoG is that Good=good and Evil=evil...

And honestly the in-universe conclusion of it works as well
_ _

StarlightGlimmer

My crazy conspiracy theory is that Above and Below do not map to the factions of the Titans, but there are elements of both in each. Contrition and Justice are aligned with the Titans who seek to rule mortals, given their demands for total obedience, while Mercy is aligned with guiding mortals to something greater. Below offers power to get someone started making their own way, and they offer the creation destroying power of demons to prove mortals are too foolish to make their own way. As I said, crazy conspiracy theory.

Qwormuli

THANK YOU.

Qwormuli

The people responding to you seem to forgotten differences between good and Good and vice versa, it seems to me. Personally, I think of it as a bit of a tossup, if he even gets a name, as diffusers of strife have had rough times with names.

Liliet

We haven't "forgotten" it, we just remember how the mechanics actually work.

Ben Serreau-Raskin

Man, Razin is really growing on me.

Fascinating look at the internal politics of Levant. They're trying to run their government like a band of Five but none of them can stand each other.

Liliet

The part where Razin tried to stop Aquiline, but Yannu agreed to her argument he is delirious from pain... and Razin thought "of course he'd rather kill her than me". Like, holy fucking shit. Their law is based on emotional decisions made in the height of passion, but it doesn't exactly enforce that you aren't allowed to do the same things out of political convenience, how would it? Even though that's not the intent.

This is just... pain. All pain.

konstantinvoncarstein

Yes, the Levantine are pretty stupid in that regard 😏

Liliet

Less stupid and more horrifying. "Which of the two teenagers is it more politically convenient for me to murder through the opportunity given to me by killing the father of one of them?"

konstantinvoncarstein

Stupid on the sense that it is even possible that the situation can come to it.

caoimhinh

Also, arrogant. Their take on "honor" is simply fame and prestige, not actual honorable conduct, morals or ethics. On another note, Razin and Aquiline are at least in their early twenties. I'm almost sure Aquiline is older than Catherine.

Cat just came out of the Ever Dark calling practically everyone without wrinkles in the face a child, because she now feels like an old lady weary due to waging war. Going like "look at them, they are so young" when they are her age and older, hahaha.

She has also had a streak of condescending thoughts during this book, though it's less noticeable when she is thinking about someone who is older than thirty. Kairos is the notable exception to all this, as he is about 16-17 years old but Cat has never acted or even thought in a condescending manner about Kairos; this is of course because Kairos is a dangerous individual who has proved that can't be underestimated, he is a Named armed with ~~madness~~ visionary wisdom and large resourcefulness, after all.

Liliet

I wouldn't call 'oh my god why are CHILDREN in their twenties COMMANDING ARMIES' condescending... but then, I think like that too (and I'm not much older than Cat AND I WOULD NOT LIKE TO COMMAND AN ARMY THANKS) tbh their take on honor is SUPPOSED to include morals. That's why Razin still has something to compare it to. It just, uh, derailed a little along the way -_-

Oh, and Kairos is no more than a year younger than Cat. He was 16 as of Interlude: Precipitation, which falls on Cat being 17 but not yet 18.

Mental Mouse

Cat complaining about "children" commanding armies is pretty rich. I think she herself is still young enough to be snippy about people who "don't get it" – that is, she lacks the maturity to realize that just because she's figured something out doesn't mean it is, or should be, obvious to everyone else.

Liliet

I mean tbh Cat DOES pack it with realizing 'oh my god I am also a child'. It's rich indeed 😊

caoimhinh

I know, right?

She came out of the Ever Dark with the attitude of someone facing a mid-life crisis, suddenly everyone under 30 is "so young" and she starts to condescend them and feel bad for fighting them because she is "killing children", plus her interactions with the Good King Edward showed plans of dying once she succeeds in stopping the meaningless wars...

And she is just 21. She should stop acting like a 70 years-old veteran who fought in both World Wars. She has seen some very nasty shit in her campaigns from both sides of the fence of Good and Evil, which makes sense for her to be weary of war and slaughter, but the condescending attitude should stop. It's really not like Catherine to look at someone and treat them like ignorant children simply because of their age, when she knows perfectly well that wisdom doesn't come from age but from experience and some of the brightest people she has met are as young as her (like Akua, Masego and Indrani).

Liliet

Seriously, there's nothing condescending about not wanting to kill people.

caoimhinh

True, there isn't.

But there's a whole world of difference in "I don't want to kill people" and "I don't want to kill these ignorant innocent children", especially when those "children" are about the same age of the person saying it (in their late teens and early twenties).

Saying "you are mistaken" is not the same as saying "you made a mistake, idiot", two completely different attitudes, right?

It's not about the act, but the attitude.

The issue here is that Catherine is mentally putting herself both distant and above the others, with an attitude of "I know the answer, and you ignorant brats don't." which one could see when Winter took hold of her (at those times, both her speech and inner thoughts narration patterns shifted to a more prideful tone, like a predator staring at prey) but the current Cat is free of that mental influence and principle alienation, plus she is taking a more humane path that aims to benefit everyone in Calernia as a whole, beyond being Good or Evil, so that condescending attitude is not fitting with her nor suitable for her goals.

Liliet

I'm... still not seeing it. What exact quotes are you referring to?

Mental Mouse

Well, that's what I'm saying. That prematurely world-weary attitude, condescending to those who don't see what she sees – that's classic teenage behavior, though it does sometimes last into early 20s.

Normally parents don't appreciate that, and try to train it out of their own kids... but Cat hasn't had much in the way of actual parenting.

Learning not to condescend is something that (sometimes) comes with maturity. She'll get there – even while she's been battering and manipulating others to her will, she's also been getting her own harsh lessons.

caoimhinh

Hmm, I would argue that world-weary attitude, condescending attitude is something that comes from old people.

The pretense that one has all answers and can do things better than everyone else if one were in their position, or that one can do everything one sets to do if one simply had the right chance, and usually blaming others for the lack of those, that's teenage attitude.

It's common to see a defiant teenager thinking he knows better than the elders and accompanied with the eagerness to prove it, however it's the elders who have the weariness in their attitude when they say things like "Oh, child, if you only knew" while sighing into the distance and wondering why the world is as it is, which is kinda what Cat has been doing.

Mental Mouse

Old people come by world-weariness and the voice of experience honestly (e.g., Pilgrim and Saint). When teenagers do it, it's unwarranted and usually misaimed. Cat is an exceptional case, exactly because she's facing "experience and treachery" with "youthful vigor, idealism"... and also some treachery of her own. Not to mention lateral thinking for good measure. 😊

caoimhinh

Exactly.

I agree with you, but I think my point stands. Cat really shouldn't be looking into the distance and sighing while saying "they are so young" when she sees people that are her same age.

caoimhinh

Yeah, but Catherine isn't horrified by young people leading armies, she is looking at them with a melancholic expression and muttering to herself "look at them... so young, with so much life ahead, and I have to kill them" as if she were an old person. That's the attitude that someone like Pilgrim or Saint would have, after a lifetime of fighting and arriving to the point where their enemies are people vastly younger than themselves. Cat shouldn't be acting in such a way, she is not much older than any of them.

Dominion's Honor has stopped being moral a long time ago, to the point that right now it's all about fame and prestige, "saving face" like they say in chinese novels, it seems like the ones who practiced honors including morals were only their founders.

I think Kairos was like 3-4 years younger than Cat, when we were first shown Kairos, he had just come to power, and he was somewhere between 13 and 15, Cat was already close to 18 (she was 15 by chapter 1, making her 16 by the beginning of book 2 and 17 somewhere in the middle of it -we never know of Catherine's birthdays, she and other people simply vaguely mention her age at intervals-).

Liliet

>Cat shouldn't be acting in such a way, she is not much older than any of them.

Don't see why she shouldn't. True statements remain true, and "young people shouldn't be dying in a war" is a true statement regardless of how old the person saying it is.

>when we were first shown Kairos, he had just come to power

Nope! He was 16 and he'd been a ruler for a solid 3 years by then. I can't really look for the quote right now but he's mentioned to be 16 in Precipitation.

And Cat would be about 17.5 in Precipitation, bc reasonable timeline puts her birthday in winter and Precipitation was in summer. So depending on when Kairos's birthday is, he could be exactly a year younger (16.5), a year and a half younger (just turned 16), or half a year younger (about to be 17). Or anything in between, a year being average.

Mental Mouse

IIRC even Cat doesn't know her actual birthday, given she's a foundling. Of course, many cultures in our own world count age by "winters", New Year's, Midsummer's Day, or such like; that's mostly cultures that don't have very good calendars, but in this case something like that would be a reasonable measure for the orphanage to take.

Javvies

More likely her birthdate is recorded as the day she was taken in as a ward by the Imperial Orphanage. Or the day she was "found", if those aren't the same.

Ie, if she were found at the Orphanage's front door, she'd probably be taken in right away, but if she was left/found somewhere else, she might not have been taken immediately to the Orphanage as a ward, but might have been treated as a misplaced child with parents to be located.

Liliet

Huh, yeah, she probably counts her 'birthday' on the new year (which there's no reason not to assume to be in midwinter, seeing how that's what fits with the timeline decently).

Mental Mouse

> Man, Razin is really growing on me.

Razin is growing, full stop. If he survives, he will be a legendary leader.

Mental Mouse

Also, Pilgrim's gonna be proud of him!

Fayhem

Right?? I'm predicting the Peregrine showing up at the height of the conclave dealy the Levantines are calling and basically looking like he came back from the dead to back Razin up, so talk about a credibility booster there.

(Meanwhile I'm betting Cat will actually be giving her armies and prob the Procerans an absolutely scalding talking-to for almost starting the fight she's put so much effort into stopping by being paranoid and freaking out; let's note that for all the dysfunction in the Levantines' council here "taking vengeance" on the Black Queen like everybody else was thinking they'd try to was literally never even on the table for a single second).

Liliet

I do love how everyone was assuming they'd be idiots while actually... they were idiots in a completely different way!

Qwormuli

The nation of murderhobos. Works as well as it sounds.

Novice

Cat changing the core stories of different nations small step by small step is honestly a treat to behold. I can't wait for the debates/discussions between characters when the Accords proposal hits the table.

Also, I'm glad this particular ship is still sailing. Not gonna lie, sliding a knife through his belly as the start of the courtship is metal as fuck.

RoflCat

Imagine a 'how I met you mother' moment in the future.

"So we hated each other's guts at the start, then I found her fighting figure very hot, and then she confessed to me with a stab to the stomach"

caoimhinh

Praesi Nobility would be proud. They would make a toast of good wine and even bring out the expensive poison for flavor.

erebus42

A Praesi wedding without at least three betrayals is considered a dull affair.

Euodiachloris

And at least seven different poisons, darling. None of this "just use ricin" boorishness, either. A proper wedding requires an interlocking web of toxins that coordinate as a distinct theme. Preferably to go with/ culminate with the flowers.

Mental Mouse

Ohh, there's a lot of poisonous flowers! You'd probably need magic to make their odors poisonous, though, as opposed to convincing people to eat them. 😊

Jessica Day

Lol you just made me flash to the Wicked Witch cackling over a crystal ball repeating "poppies!"

Raved Thrad

Let's not forget that the bride tried to get him killed twice soon after they met. That's got to be the foundation of a legendary romance.

vamair

Third time's the charm?

Raved Thrad

Apparently, third time's a wedding. 😊

Andrew Mitchell

Third time's a bedding? 😊

Shveiran

Just for that scene, I now have a thing for Aquiline of Tartessos like few others.

I mean, DAMN. That's the good stuff.

Mental Mouse

This is a "sharper" version of the trope "Slap Slap Kiss Kiss".

Gerion

And so the ripples spread. And the true meaning of Uncivil Wars unfolds – for there is no "Civil" war.

Andrew Mitchell

Ooooh, I like that idea. 👍

superkeaton

The boy speaks sense. Cat's becoming a terrible teacher.

erebus42

Nothing helps one reevaluate themselves like brutal, soul crushing defeat.

Mental Mouse

> Nothing helps one reevaluate themselves like brutal, soul crushing defeat.

Just ask Cat! Or an increasing number of her friends...

erebus42

Well well Razin Tanja, aren't you full of surprises. Looks like Cat made a good call in sparing you.

Also, awww Aquiline you big romantic! Nothing say love like a knife wound in the stomach and volunteering as their champion in a duel to the death. I'm shipping you guys already. #Raziline

Novice

We were told that love ends with the kiss of a knife and yet it sure as shit started this one.

caoimhinh

Captains of Malava: Lord Razin! What happened? You are wounded!

Razin (still bleeding and clutching his stomach): smiles wryly Well. it's a funny story, actually.

Captains of Malava: What happened, sir?

Razin: Well... I started a courtship with Lady Aquiline.

Captains of Malava: Oh. That explains it. Good for you, sir. We see it was successful.

Razin: Is that sarcasm or do you really believe me?

Captains of Malava: Yes.

Andrew Mitchell

NZPIEFACE

wtf how do you bold words

konstantinvoncarstein

word, but without all the !!

Shine

konstantinvoncarstein

It did not work
Word

caoimhinh

I learned recently thanks to the advise of other commenters, now I will pass on the wisdom. Basically you just add variations of before and after the words that you want changed, but in the closure you need to put

So for example, to write bold words you put the letter b inside the and you put /b inside the closing to mark that it is the end of the words you want altered.

That way, we can write in bold words , in itallics and even in ~~slashed text~~.

It's pretty cool right? Adds a nice touch to the commends.

This site can show you how to do it in more detail and with many more examples:

https://www.w3schools.com/html/html_formatting.asp

Liliet

[b]bolded text[/b] but with angled brackets instead of square

caoimhinh

Oh, they are called angle brackets in English? I knew them as inequality signs.

One learns something new every day, thank you~

Andrew Mitchell

Both names are correct. They're inequality signs when they are being used in mathematics. And angled brackets when used in text (and HTML text formatting).

Liliet

I know them as that too, but since they're used as brackets in html, i guess,

Raivshard

Direct HTML code, huh? Interesting, since most sites use simplified forum code. I wonder if it allows CSS references... 🤔

Andrew Mitchell

ASFAIK it's just simple HTML formatting. But give it a CSS a go and let me know what you find. 😊

BTW I recently discovered that the same simple HTML formatting can be used on Patreon as well.

Liliet

I think it doesn't allow most things -_- it's only limited html

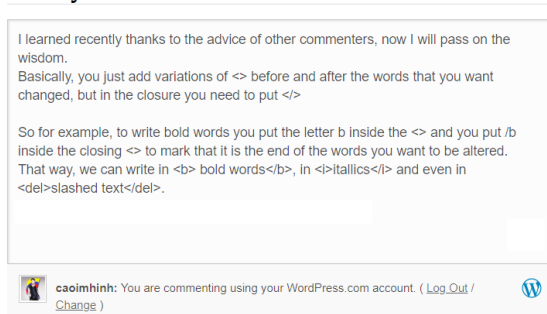

Raivshard

No surprise. Maybe when I'm home I'll take a look at the code behind the comment box.

caoimhinh

Eh, the previous comment didn't come out as I expected. I made an image to explain better and uploaded it to imgur, here's the link:

How you write it in the comment.

What comes out as your comment, and how it looks for others.

caoimhinh

I learned recently thanks to the advice of other commenters, now I will pass on the wisdom. Basically you just add variations of before and after the words that you want changed, but in the closure you need to put

So for example, to write bold words you put the letter b inside the and you put /b inside the closing to mark that it is the end of the words you want altered.

That way, we can write in bold words , in italics and even in ~~slashed text~~.

Notice the lack of <> in the posted comment, this is due to the site interpreting it as an invalid command.

Nevertheless, the link I posted in the comment above leads you to a site that explains how to use the html script commands.

NZPIEFACE

wtf this uses HTML??? I've been trying markdown or BB code for ages

Mental Mouse

Nope, WordPress uses an HTML subset. Not the whole spec, but you can do some of the markup (bold, italic, strike), link anchors, and entities.

NZPIEFACE

big oof

Andrew Mitchell

And 'blockquote' too.

caoimhinh

Yeah, pure heretic sorcery. I tell you.

Andrew Mitchell

Yeah, different sites use different formatting. It's a pain. I discovered that Patreon uses HTML too.

Mental Mouse

Most blogs use either HTML or BBcode for comments; Github and (IIRC) MediaWiki use markdown. Using something besides HTML is a pretty good security measure – if your site isn't passing comments through an HTML parser at all, you don't have to worry about security holes in a parser that's trying (and perhaps failing) to dumb down a full-power HTML engine (letting visitors write HTML code for public display is a security nightmare).

Andrew Mitchell

Indeed!

My very own name

MediaWiki unfortunately has its own syntax. It's similar to Markdown in some ways, but not at all in others. I feel like it's usually more powerful, but at the same time makes for uglier "source code", which is understandable, given that Markdown was the one made specifically to look pretty with or without processing.

Andrew Mitchell

Good points. You made me consider which one started first and my feeling was that MediaWiki was created much earlier but I was wrong. MediaWiki launched in 2003 and Markdown was invented in 2004 so they may have been separate efforts or Markdown may have been an effort to make something better than MediaWiki's approach.

RandomFan

To avoid invalid commands, \\ is magic. If this works on the usual rules, \ becomes \\. At least, I think. If this looks like nonsense, I'm sorry.

Mental Mouse

There's a certain amount of backoff so that random less-than signs or backslashes don't break text when they weren't actually being used in HTML elements. However, you can also use entities to get various characters when they would otherwise start something in HTML:

< for < > also works for > (but is usually unnecessary)
& for &

Andrew Mitchell

Thanks for the tip.

Raved Thrad

Meanwhile, in the Tartessian corner:

"Do you see? Looks like he got knifed."

"Is that...?"

"Yes. Looks like she angled it just right."

"Gods Above, she must be so hot for him!"

"Tell the attendants to lay out the good pillows. And the red bed spread. That way, the blood stains don't show."

"Squee!"

SpacyRicochet

"And tell them to prepare the toys... the sharp ones."

Raved Thrad

That really depends on whether or not they've both had enough ~~blood-flowing~~ foreplay to proceed directly to the ~~thrusting~~ boinking. No screaming, though: apparently both like it quiet.

Jessica Day

When do this become Kushiel's Dart?

caoimhinh

Oh? That trilogy has been recommended to me before, I'm told it has an interesting take on angels, plus certain... themes about the search of love and pleasure. With the main character being an anguisette.

caoimhinh

And let's not forget that Razin comes from a long line of Binders, so he probably has training in bondage. This is quite the kinky pair, aren't they? After all, Razin has just awakened to the pleasure of knife-point courtship by Aquiline. Hahahahaha

ATRDCI

I mean, they are both of the Blood after all. This sort of play is all but inevitable

Insanenoodlyguy

I do hope the courtship is still on.

Andrew Mitchell

Oh, it's ON all right! 😊

Sparsebeard

I wonder if the realm of Twilight would be considered a flying fortress...

Novice

It can't be a fortress, anyone and their pure-bred Liessen charger can walk through the realm. Well, except for the undead I presume.

Sparsebeard

Yet, if you reverse the roles and a villain made a flying realm where everyone and their pure breed Zombie horse could walk through (except the living I presume) people would start to get offended... discrimination I tell you!

I wonder if the DK could send a small band of adventurers to protect all that is evil and unholy from this abomination!!!

Liliet

Actually I don't think they'd be offended. Terrified, maybe, but only if the villain actually used the realm to attack them, otherwise it'd be like the Dark Day protocols: nobody actually KNOWS those exist 😊

Fayhem

> the Dark Day protocols: nobody actually KNOWS those exist 😊

*knew

Mental Mouse

I suspect that his Revenants don't normally get their own storylines, being subordinate to their master. King Edward was an exception, but he was carrying his own original storyline, to the effect of "the Good King has been in durance vile, but eventually there shall come a chance for redemption and revenge". For that matter, he'd said as much back in Keter... and it seems even the Dead King failed his Evil Overlord Trope save against it.

Mental Mouse

Not quite, but Cat is totally putting the lie to Malicia's claim that the Age of Wonders has ended. New goddess(es), formerly hidden race comes out as badasses, new (friendly) fork of Arcadia, and of course a legendary Queen to match Triumphant.

Rup

M.S.N.R.

touches forehead

Raved Thrad

With how often Chekhov's Gun is used in this series, I wouldn't be surprised if, at some point, it is revealed that Catherine is the reincarnation of Triumphant.

Andrew Mitchell

ASFAIK there's no reincarnation in PGtE. Unless you count devils which get a clean re-spawn.

But the Triumphant thing does seem to be a gun ready to fire but no one really knows when or where. Except EE, of course.

Mental Mouse

Eh,,, apparently the Praesi have been doing that MSNR thing almost since her defeat (thousands of years?). As one of the others (Hakram?) said, "that is a prayer" – and while Below isn't terribly demonstrative, I suspect even they will respect a prayer that's been repeated by an entire nation for millennia. My puckish suggestion aside, I wouldn't hold my breath.

That said, the legend of the Black Queen might well eclipse that of the Dread Empress! Indeed, that might be a key factor in Cat's long-term success. After all, she is trying to rewrite the stories!

Mental Mouse

Wouldn't it be a hoot if she turned out to be the Book 6 opponent?

caoimhinh

I saw it more akin to a meteor before, but now that it's stabilized it's more akin to a moon.

ninegardens

I am now thinking of the big grinning moon from Majora's mask

caoimhinh

That's absolutely what it would have looked like if Tyrant had gotten grasp of it.

He was even researching about crashing it on the Serenity.

caoimhinh

LMAO, I like Aquiline, starting the formal courtship with a knife. That's one crazy woman, but that means a very interesting relationship for Razin. And it pretty much assures us that there will be no being unfaithful to that wife.

Good for Razin for being the voice of reason, willing to risk shame and death for the sake of what is right rather than their wicked version of honor that honestly seems like nothing more than reputation and fame, rather than true honorable deeds.

Who would have thought that the first one to agree with him and back his proposal of looking for a peaceful solution would be Itima?

The interludes aren't over yet, it seems I was right there was something more than the Levantines marching to fight; apparently there won't be even the slightest conflict now, just the other two armies tensing due to their speculation while the Dominion's army is actually just holding an assembly, not preparing to fight. If they send a message to Procer the doubts will be cleared pretty fast.

Unless... maybe the place Catherine will appear (with the Peregrine, but no one knows that) is somewhere close to Levant's camp, or worse, in the middle of their camp. That would mean that Hakram, who has friendship-powered radar attuned to Catherine, will march a group of Legionaries there, that could really add to the tension since it could easily be misunderstood.

Typos found:

they granted gits / they granted gifts

he would perfectly hale / he would be perfectly hale

By smoke add dust / By smoke and dust

It the Vaccei swords left / If the Vaccei swords left the though disgusted him / the thought disgusted him

The brought it / They brought it

Razin's heard racing / Razin's heart racing out of the put / out of the pit

IDKWhoitis

I'm personally worried that after a silent and quick chat, Pilgrim will tell Cat he should stay dead.

Like he has accumulated a lot of narrative weight that can be used, and maybe he is really broken over Saint dying. Or maybe Fate will be a fickle bitch, and the Twilight realm won't work with a guiding star of some sort...

So Cat showing up with Grey's corpse in the middle of the Lev camp will truly turn the tension well past 11.

Faiir

I told you, HERESY

Liliet

>I'm personally worried that after a silent and quick chat, Pilgrim will tell Cat he should stay dead.

And you think she'll just take that? Pfff. She'll come back with him bound and gagged if she has to

Agent J

The Black Queen will not be denied.

caoimhinh

I think he will take it with resignation, accepting that he still has a role to fulfill, besides, the Ophanim will be there talking to him, so that will probably help him cope with his resurrection better.

Pilgrim had said that he was weary from the long life he has lived and the bitter experience of fighting Evil and alleviating suffering in the world, but he referred to his death as "when the Heavens see fit to let me rest" so I don't think he will run or become depressed, nor do I think he will blame Cat or the Angels for his resurrection. He will carry on with his duty; I actually believe he will be more shocked by the fact that the Ophanim allowed Cat to do resurrect him, that could blow his mind.

Liliet

YEAH.

And he'd probably be like 'wow if 2/2 sides agree here I GUESS I DONT GET TO ARGUE'

Raved Thrad

Yandere girls are the BEST!

caoimhinh

Ah, I see you're a man of culture as well.

Raved Thrad

There's just something about not knowing whether or not you'll wake up in the morning. 😊

caoimhinh

Living to the limit, right?
Then again, if one is faithful, one has nothing to fear of a Yandere. Those guys only die due to being cheaters XD.

IDKWhoitis

It seems like our boy here might be getting the first shivers of a Name...

And he seems to be fond of breaking traditions and cycles...
Using the words our dear old Cat tossed at him.

Also, I was have expecting the Grey Pilgrim to come into the tent near the end screaming something along the lines of "What are you doing children?!?"

Amy Lear

At this point I'm genuinely starting to be concerned that erraticerrata might actually consume all of the remaining awesome left in the universe before completing this book.

At this rate, our universe will be left pale and barren beyond the one spark of a tome, and its sequel will never be written because there is simply nothing left.

Please, erraticerrata, you must stop. Or, if you cannot stop, you must slow down.

All of existence is in peril at your hands.

sutortyrannus

This is beautiful.

"Don't. It's really stupid."

"Ok."

daegone823

Yanu knew what he was doing was cowardly, and he would not be able to hold his throne if ran away especially with the slayer's woman all but guaranteeing his name would be mud.

He would go back home be killed by his own men/kin "for the blood"

broadaxe

Hmm, It's interesting that originally they had to make a god, then slay the god to get the realm they needed, but they ended up with a still borne god that they then resurrected. Just thought of that, curious reversal of the plans 😊

caoimhinh

They made a god, then that god abdicated his throne and a large part of his power but likely retained a lot of it, then they put another person on the throne of that god and we don't know if he became a god too for a while (though I don't think so, given how he simply stabbed himself with a common sword and bled to death so perhaps the transfiguration hadn't taken place yet) and then he died, but was resurrected probably as a mortal again...

Just as planned.

Jessica Day

The text explicitly stated they left without a wisp of power.

caoimhinh

Not exactly.

Cat couldn't feel any power from them, but she could tell there was something there, they were not mere mortals. They are an entirely new kind of Fae, and we are still uncertain whether the death of the Twilight King (Tariq, as he was the one with the crown at the moment) means the dissolution of the Twilight Court of Fae, and if the former Wild Hunt still have a connection to it through which they can draw power, or maybe they are completely free Fae unbound to any Court right now.

Jessica Day

Perhaps. I get the impression they traded everything for freedom but I wouldn't be too surprised if you are right.

Nairne .01

I have been wondering about the nature of the Bard's powers.

What if roles, names, the narrative is part of a domain that is spread across the whole continent of Celernia? Even if it's not the Bard's domain, what if there is a god that didn't join a side, and is just enjoying the show. The Hierarch called her a servant of Stillness.

It just came to me when I thought how Cat influenced Razin.

Nairne .01

What do you guys think?

konstantinvoncarstein

I don't think it is a domain. Anyway, Named are not exclusive to Calernia, the Yan Tei empire is governed by both a Villain and a Hero.

konstantinvoncarstein

Stillness as in "statu quo", I think.

Andrew Mitchell

That was my interpretation too.

Liliet

So this is not the first time a woman stabbed a man in the stomach as a means of saving their life.

Beginning of courtship, end of apprenticeship, you say pot-ay-to
I say pot-ah-to 😊

Naeddyr

The way to a man's heart is through his stomach.

skyboy

The way to a woman's heart is through her ribcage.

Worked on Akua, at least.

Andrew Mitchell

hahahhaha

Liliet

Worked for Akua, too, it seems like.

Raved Thrad

You just have to angle the knife right. 😊

Rup

Author Unknown

Instead he swallowed a gasp when he felt a knife slide into his lower belly. He'd not even seen her draw. Still studying him, the Lady of Tartessos nodded approvingly.

I can't help but feel this is still more humane than high school romances.

Raved Thrad

Still a better romance than Twishite.

daegone823

So in order to win a girls heart from a slayers group
-46 lashes
-Face an old horror that lived beneath the ground murdering it's own kin
-Save her life, twice
- Take a shank in the belly without screaming

You may now begin courtship...

Raved Thrad

Achievement unlocked: HURTS SO GOOD

caoimhinh

Hahahahaha I have the perfect reaction image for that!

Source: Mage & Demon Queen.

Raved Thrad

Pink eyes! ♥

Raved Thrad

LOL! It reads like a bad JRPG.

It reminds me of Ikazuchi no Senshi Raidy.

Alegio

To be honest I was expecting Razin to become Named in the middle of that.

daegone823

If he was to receive a name it might be a villainous one he is going against one of the practices of the above. Evil names are not just for the “bad” people they are for the people who want to change the reality of there world through there own means not relying on the heavens.

Just saying Hierarch(absolute democracy), Archer(freedom in all things), Heirophant (dissecting miracles). Theses are not exactly evil. The peaceful approach that Razin is ordering the dominion to take goes against 300 years of ingrained honor. The champions blood Mansin was willing to throw away his life for honor/ the blood.

Razin is asking them to turn away from there blood. to betray what they have built there nation on. He is hinting at causing the same amount of upheaval that Chat demanded of the drow "to be better". Even more alarming he was successful by only shedding his own blood.

He is at the precipice for something but maybe not a heroic name.

Mental Mouse

Good is "follow these rules for everyone's sake". Evil is "do whatever you want and can get away with". Yannu is a lot closer to Evil than Razin is; the latter is just reminding people that there are more rules than the ones about when you get to try and kill someone.

Liliet

>Evil names are not just for the "bad" people they are for the people who want to change the reality of there world through there own means not relying on the heavens.

No.

Most heroes don't "rely" on the Heavens for anything, Heavens just choose to support them.

Evil Names are for:

- people who deliberately turn to Below for power;
- people politically aligned with Evil.

mavant

[i]I wait outside the pilgrim's door
With insufficient schemes.
The black queen chants
the funeral march,
The cracked brass bells will ring;
To summon back the fire witch
To the court of the crimson king.[/i]

Mental Mouse

Ref: King Crimson – In The Court Of King Krimson (full lyrics in description).

Wealthy Aardvark

This is still my favorite chapter in the entire Guide. Thank you, EE.

Interlude: Concourse IV

"A victor has a hundred friends, every last born yesterday."

– Helikean saying

Abigail of Summerholm – still a general, despite her best efforts – had finally figured it out. As the Gods despised her for reasons known only to them, her attempts at mild incompetence had instead been reward with successes that'd earned her a reputation as a 'tactical prodigy'. Her continued protests that she was not such thing were being taken as humility instead of desperation, to the extent that Marshal Juniper had commended her for being 'grounded' and 'not letting acclaim go to her head'. Abigail had never seen anything half so horrifying in her life as the Hellhound attempting an approving look, and she'd had goblin stew. Which was made by goblins and not of goblins, as she really wished someone had told her before she'd eaten a bowl out of fear of offending a whole swarm of sappers. Ah, but it'd been naïve of her to assume that simply trying to pass on her responsibilities to literally anyone else would be enough to see her demoted back to a set of responsibilities less gallows-adjacent. Indeed, from the towering heights of her fresh understanding she now grasped how guileless and green that manner of thinking had been. But she'd learned, oh yes she had. They were going to sweep her under the rug quietly, maybe even enlarge her retirement pension so she kept her mouth shut for the rest of her life, which as far as she was concerned was the ideal state of affairs. Of course, her most cunning plans still hinged on the Deadhand not getting them all killed before Morning Bell.

Which was, unfortunately, looking less likely by the moment.

"Six hundred, at least," the Adjutant calmly said. "Personal armsmen of the Blood, by the looks of their equipment."

The tall, broad-shouldered villain spoke in that way orcs often learned to after they'd been out of the Steppes for a few years: slower than they would in Kharsum, and careful to avoid being too loud. You could tell how long they'd been out of the homeland by the way they talked, since those fresh out of the Clans hadn't usually yet figured out that a big orc speaking loud and harshly in a hard-to-understand accent tended to make humans a mite twitchy. Hakram Deadhand struck Abigail as the kind of person who went around spending a lot of time thinking about what other people thought before acting all cold and measured. She'd known folks like that more than once, they were the traders who'd done the best under the Praesi at Summerholm. Those who'd not choked on pride when it came to getting trade permits from the easterners, who'd not balked at serving legionaries and greasing the palms of Wasteland scribes. They usually weren't nice people but they did tend to be able to afford nice meals, which in Abigail's humble opinion was a lot more useful a trait.

"The Tartessos and Malaga captains were hard in a scrap," General Abigail replied. "And they're not even the people known for having heavy foot."

Please, Lord Deadhand, she silently prayed, do not ask my two cohorts to take that damned hill. Four hundred legionaries, even veterans, trying to dislodge those armsmen would be like swinging a trout at a wall: amusing, except for the trout. She'd seen those bastards in Sarcella taking a run at sapper-dug positions and still make a dent, since they refused to die even when shot repeatedly and didn't seem to have a single self-preserving bone in their bodies. It was always worse when one of their nobles was around, too, it put an unnecessary amount of additional steel to their already-steel countenance in the face of danger.

"That would be the Alava warriors, whose colours are also flying," the Adjutant said. "I receive your point, general. An assault before reinforcements are had would be difficult."

Huh. She'd not expected that to work. Did praying to people actually change things? She'd heard that there was talk about making the odd offering to the Crows these days, which she didn't entirely disapprove of. The Gods Above asked for a lot, birds were probably much easier to bribe as far as deities went. Alms took hard coin, but you could get dead rats from any poorly-kept cellar.

"Haven't been told why we set out either, sir," Abigail said. "Er, lord? My lord?"

"Adjutant will do," the ivory-fanged villain told her.

Ugh, he'd even done the fucking grin just like Krolem did. Someone really needed to have a sit down with all these orcs and explain to them that some big muscled bastard displaying enough sharp teeth to fill the mouths of at least three jackals wasn't ever going to be taken as reassuring by anyone with any sense. At least the goblins were aware they were horrifying as all Hells when they did it.

"We are to serve as the escort for Her Majesty's return to Creation," the Adjutant said.

Abigail was well-learned in the ways of the Army of Callow, by now, so she didn't need to have it spelled out for her. Of course it'd gotten worse, it always did it this bloody outfit.

"It's on that hill isn't," she whined. "With all the warriors on it."

And any moment now the Dominion was going to be reinforced by a battalion of demons, or a legion of angels, and still the Deadhand would say: take me that hill, General Abigail, or no general's pension for you. And that was the thing, wasn't it? Abigail had come too far to retire without the pension now, she refused to attend that many bloody strategic briefings and not make it out of this damned war set for life.

"Your intuition is as acute as rumoured," Deadhand said.

The Summerholm girl didn't squint at the villain, because that was a good way to get your eyes eaten, but she did wonder how long it'd taken the orc to perfect a tone of voice that so perfectly straddled the line between serene and sardonic.

"Thank you," she said, cleared her throat. "Sir lord Adjutant."

"As for why you in particular are serving as commanding officer for the cohorts instead of a commander or even a legate, it's simple enough," the one-handed orc gravelled. "You're one of the few people Catherine has ever personally promoted. I was curious."

Abigail looked up at the sky, casting out her despair for any god willing to hear her. How much would it cost, for people to stop getting 'curious' about her? She was willing to resume attending sermons, if that was what it took. Or offer, like, three dead rabbits to the Crows. She could probably get a few of those from goblins if she found a gaggle around a campfire and put up bottles to trade.

"I'm flattered," she lied.

She was going to have to implement that plan faster than she'd earlier intended, the general thought. Gods forgive her, she might even have to accept that dinner invitation Grandmaster Brandon Talbot had sent her. Rumour was he extended that to every rising Callowan officer, but she'd thought to avoid the whole thing like the plague by claiming that a goblin had eaten the invitation. It would have held up, they ate basically anything if they got hungry enough or were dared to. Now, though, she'd have to use a nice public dinner with important people to say something horribly, absurdly racist somewhere too many high officers were seated for it to be ignored. She was still debating on what to say, that was the issue. She wasn't going to start mouthing off about greenskins – not when she had so many of them close to her and bearing sharp things – and going after Wastelanders tended to earn retribution. Taghreb officers watched each other's backs, and if there was a single Soninke in this damned army that couldn't do magic or didn't have a friend who could she'd yet to run into them.

No, it'd have to be about real foreigners. She'd been mulling over arguing that 'all Procerans should be eaten, especially the children'. If she said that in front of enough people it'd have to be bad enough she was encouraged to retire, right?

"And now Rozala Malanza graces us with her presence," Hakram Deadhand said. "This is going to get interesting."

It was hard to make out much in the darkness, especially at a distance, but the Procerans were hard to miss: they'd brought their own torches, and not few. Even after the Tyrant of Helike had tumbled them down from Arcadia it looked like the princes had been able to put together a contingent of horse. Abigail had a hard time guessing numbers, given the swiftness they rode with and the movement of the torches, but there had to be at least two hundred riders there. Trailing behind at a slower pace, men-at-arms whose strength was easier to gauge were approaching in a column. Easily five hundred there, Abigail saw with dismay. This was about to turn into a bloody godsdamned mess, wasn't it? The Dominion had six hundred foot, but it also had the hill and some of those hard warrior-priests who'd melted the Princekiller's own plate over him. Princess Malanza of Wherever and Whatnot had that light Proceran horse and some decent fighting men for a sum of seven hundred but Abigail suspected charging up a hill at Levantine armsmen wasn't likely to end well for Malanza, horse or not.

And then there was them, approaching with two cohorts of two hundred. One of regulars, veterans from Arcadia and the Doom, and the other a lighter force: sappers, mages, crossbowmen. The weakest force of the three, if you didn't count that Hakram fucking Deadhand was part of it. She'd seen the orc Named thrown like a trebuchet stone at Akua's Folly and walk it off before assaulting a rebel bastion near single-handed. The Adjutant could turn it into a fight, if not a very pleasant one.

"Our reinforcements might get there in time," General Abigail tried.

And they might, pretty please, bring with them someone high up enough in rank this would no longer be her problem. The low hill the Dominion had taken and would allegedly be the Black Queen's stepping stone back into Creation was roughly between the camps of Levant, Procer and Callow but the dark-haired woman would bet on the Army of Callow's muster over anyone else's without batting an eye. No one else drilled battle-muster save for the Legions, so if this got out of hand their own legionaries should get here quicker than either the Levantines or the Procerans. Of course, there were a lot more of those around so that'd only go so far.

"Unlikely," the Adjutant said, eyes moving across the darkness.

He could see where she could not, Abigail knew.

"We're mobilizing faster," he acknowledged, "but they began earlier. This is the vanguard for all of us, and it'll have to be by our hands it's settled: by the time reinforcements are on the field Catherine will have returned and it will be over."

Please don't order me to take that hill, Lord Deadhand sir, Abigail desperately thought.

"I suppose we'll have to take that hill," the orc mused, and she whimpered a little inside.

He cast at her an almost knowing look before offering the barest flash of fang.

"Not alone, though," the Adjutant said. "See the banner riding towards us? Rozala Malanza seeks audience."

—

Princess Rozala rode her destrier hard, intent on snatching this disaster out of Below's ruinous grasp before they all ended up paying for it.

Whatever it was the Blood had been up to in their closed council, in the wake of its end they'd not bothered to even acknowledge the presence of the messengers she kept sending to their camp. They'd gathered entire war parties of their finest warriors, sent for the Lanterns and marched out for the hill where Rozala's mages said enough power was currently coalescing to burn a town to the ground. The Black Queen's return must be imminent, her people had concluded, and its location was beyond dispute. Which meant the way the Levantines had made for it without missing a beat unlikely to be a coincidence. The riders she'd sent after the Dominion forces with orders to try anything short of baring blades to get an audience with the lords and ladies had been turned away roughly, though at least not in utter silence: they'd been informed that this was a sacred matter, and concerning only the Blood. No interference would be brooked. Heart clenching, Princess Rozala had sent forward the soldiers she'd been able to muster up until then and left Louis to assemble the second wave.

The Callowans weren't blind, of course, so they'd sent out a force as well. Just two cohorts from the Third Army, but that force's general had something of a reputation: the Levantines spoke of her with a measure of respect for the way she'd held on to the city of Sarcella even when taken by surprise and outnumbered. This General Abigail was also said to have slaughtered like lambs almost a quarter of the Levantine mages during the first assault on the southern palisade, which was no small thing. Rozala Malanza's ancestors had fought binders often and known them to be dangerous foes when moved to war. Still, even led by a superb field tactician four hundred legionaries were not a major force. Not so great as the one fielded by Levant, at least, or even the hasty party the Princess of Aquitan had put together and led forth. Or so she had fought, until she'd seen the Black Queen's own banner flying above the cohorts: silver on black, a balance bearing a sword and a crown. That the sword weighed heavier said much of the woman who'd taken that heraldry as her own, and how it was she'd come to be Queen in Callow – of Callow, Rozala corrected herself. Best not make that mistake around Foundling herself, her temper was well-known.

That the Sword and Crown flew could simply be sign that it was expected the Black Queen would return under it. Or it could mean that the Adjutant was with the cohorts, and that'd complicate things. In truth, it could be said that Hakram Deadhand was the least dangerous of Catherine Foundling's woeful company. He lacked the terrifying great sorceries of the Hierophant, the Archer's talent for sudden and surprising killing strokes and even the Thief's rumoured endowment to steal anything from a fleet or river barges to some fae princess' sorcery. The Adjutant was a lesser figure in the stories that'd made it across the mountains, as the nature of his Damnation would imply. Yet there was one thing all tales agreed on – of all the Woe, none were so implacably loyal to the Black Queen as her Adjutant. The others, Rozala felt confident she might have swayed into holding their hand. The Archer was drunken sot, for all her lethality, the Hierophant had read through then entire peace talks after the Battle of the Camps and the Thief had been cautious even before she'd been rumoured to have lost her power. The Adjutant, though? Be reputation, he was temperate and even-handed sort. Those, in Rozala's experience, always tended to make the worst fanatics.

Few things were as troublesome as an otherwise reasonable man believing an unreasonable thing.

Escort riding close around her even as the rest of her vanguard advanced on the hill where the Levantines had taken position, the dark-haired princess veered hard to the side when she saw the Black Queen's banner split from the rest of the legionaries. An escort of ten, the very same number she rode with, made for her direction at a sedate pace while the rest of the cohorts continued marching on the hill. Wary of too sudden an approach being taken as a charge, Rozala reduced the pace of her mount and shouted for her soldiers to do the same. Within moments they were in sight of the enemy envoys, and even before she drew her up reins and halted the Princess of Aquitan was silently cursing. There was no mistaken the burnt and darkened plate on the tall orc for anything else: the Adjutant was there, along with a young woman bearing the marks of a general and a retinue of Callowan regulars. The dark-eyed Arlesite would have called it a risk taken, bringing but a matching number of legionaries when she rode to them with horse, but knew better. The orc was Damned, and not fresh to his legend: he could likely kill them all without coming to breathe heavier for it.

"Hail, Lord Adjutant," Princess Rozala called out in Lower Miezan.

"Your Grace," the Adjutant replied in the same.

She flicked her eyes to the side, taking in the sight of the woman who was most likely this General Abigail of the Third Army. Black hair, tanned cheeks, watery blue eyes. More tavern girl than warrior-queen, and what was it with Callow and spawning all those wee dangerous women?

"I present you General Abigail of Summerholm, in command of the Third Army," the Deadhand said. "You may have heard of her."

"So I have," Rozala replied. "Well met, general. Your deeds in Sarcella drew attention."

"That was all Her Majesty," the black-haired woman replied almost hurriedly. "Truly, I have done nothing worth remembering."

Humble, the Arlesite princess wondered, or trying to remain obscure so that she would take her enemies by surprise in wars to come? Either way, she was one to watch out for.

"It appears, Princess Rozala, that the Dominion has seen fit to obstruct the return of my queen," the Adjutant gravelled in that unsettlingly deep voice. "This seems to me a violation of the truce that was struck."

"I am sure they merely mean to serve as an honour guard," Rozala lied. "Though, of course, that honour should be shared between all of us. Indeed, I brought soldiers with me for this very purpose."

The orc's hairless brow narrowed.

"A threefold honour guard is your intention?" he asked.

"Of course," the Princess of Aequitan said. "Is it not yours? Surely the Army of Callow would not seek to break the truce your very queen arranged."

The Damned let out a noise that was either amused or contemptuous, Rozala knew too little of his kind to tell.

"I've no intention of sharing the honour," Hakram Deadhand calmly said. "We'll be clearing out the Dominion by force of arms."

General Abigail let out a mocking bark of laughter, though her voice made it sound like strangely terrified trill.

"There is no need for such a thing," Princess Rozala insisted. "I can accompany you to treat with the Blood and this can all be achieved without breaking truce."

The orc studied her for a long moment, and then slowly bared his fearsome great fangs.

"The First Prince ordered you to keep Catherine alive and amenable," the Adjutant serenely said. "You'd have tried threats otherwise. Well now, that's a fascinating turn. How far are you allowed to go to assure that?"

"You assume much," Rozala flatly replied.

"I suppose it doesn't matter," the orc said, snorting. "Send your people in a flanking position for the hill, on the eastern side. We'll take the other flank. You and I can speak with those Levant lordlings from a position of strength."

"You overestimate your position," the Princess of Aquitan said, tone glacial.

Hakram Deadhand studied her, then laughed.

"No," he said. "I don't. Glad to have you on our side, Princess Rozala. I've great esteem for your campaigning in Cleves."

And just like that, he turned and began to walk again. Though anger boiled in her stomach, the Princess of Aquitan found she had no means to deal it out. What could she do, strike out at the Black Queen's own aide or let him lead his cohorts into a fight that could not be won? She'd been ordered to avoid provoking Catherine Foundling, and letting the Adjutant die would be very much the opposite of that. The Princess of Aquitan found that General Abigail was looking at her still, a strange expression on the Callowan's face. She reached for something within her armour and Rozala tensed, half-expecting a knife, but instead it was a dull bronze flask. The general tossed it to her and patted her horse's neck with what seemed to be genuine sympathy.

"I'd tell you it gets better," General Abigail said, "but it would be a lie."

Caerulea

Vote for A Practical Guide to Evil here:

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Discord Server:

<https://discord.gg/3nbsUfZ>

Patreon:

<https://www.patreon.com/user?u=3523924>

Jonnnney

No I ain't voting again until the Author stops twidling their thumbs and gets Catherine back into creation. This has been the wordiest nonaction series of chapters in the whole damn serial.

Argentorum

I think I agree with that. Catherine needed to show up with the Pilgrim like, a chapter ago. Or this chapter at the very least.

If we didn't know she brought him back to life, this sort of dramatic tension would be appreciated. But we already know that he's going to be there to make the Levantines eat Crow (ha!) so it's just a bunch of...things happening because of stuff.

Dan

I mean, all of the other interludes have been about how canny operators maneuver around Cat's plans and how the gods are setting up the chess board.

I kind of like the reversal on this one, where all of the powers that normally control the story are laying their plans and thinking they're clever and subtle and all that, not realizing they're about to be screwed by a wrench Cat tossed into the gears of the divine plan CHAPTERS ago. It's sort of a measuring stick on Cat's character development, she's gone from barely holding on by the skin of her fingertips while the world Named her and otherwise told her how badass and in control she was... to legitimately being able to break the narrative itself in a way that the setting's literal laws of physics themselves can't deal with.

Admittedly in terms of physical things happening it's obviously just getting all the people into place that need to be together for the drama to unspool more efficiently in the next real chapter, but thematically this is probably my favorite of the interludes so far.

Shveiran

I agree it is a nice reversal, and I'm very glad we got it.

On the other hand, I do think 4 interludes are a bit too long for this. I would have preferred we wrapped this up in maybe 3, and even that much only because this has been a wild ride ever since the battle begun.

It is a welcome break, just... a bit long, for my tastes.

sengachi

It's called pacing.

Tsura

I mean the 6 chapters between Catherine's Lakeomancy and her regaining consciousness were pretty long too, but honestly this has all been pretty interesting for the most part, although Procer's politics have always bored (and felt more hard to decipher) me more than the rest

tkjarrah

god i love abigail

tkjarrah

someone wife this idiot coward before i have to pagemaster in and do it myself

Zgggt

She's the greatest character that isn't a footrest.

tkjarrah

Abigail is and has always been, in a spiritual sense, a footrest

doominator10

I'd posit she'd be a least a greater lesser footrest plz don't hate me

DD

People remarking negatively on the verbose handful of delaying interludes of late...I agree.

But one should never disparage a look into the mind of ABIGAIL OF SUMMERHOLM...HERO OF THE IMPERI...I mean, OF CALLOW!

DD

Did not mean for my comment to appear as a reply...don't know how that happened.

Sethur

Abigail is a godsdamned treasure. Everytime I see her name pop up in a new chapter, it's sure to make my day. 😊 amc

oh yes. especially how everyone keeps mis-interpreting her.

"General Abigail let out a mocking bark of laughter, though her voice made it sound like strangely terrified trill."

Levi Kalden

I expect her to come into a Name like the Bumbling General

erraticerrata

First update of the month, and so extra chapter's up. As usual, it's in the eponymous tab.

This one is the first of the two-parter, titled Seed and set in the days before the Conquest. The POV is a younger Black's.

Andrew Mitchell

Thank you EE for your continued hard work to bring us this story three times a week. IMO your work has been amazingly high quality lately. ♥

And here's a link to the extra chapter for everyone's convenience: [https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/
2019/07/01/seed-i/](https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2019/07/01/seed-i/)

Rup

.um...would it be possible..to get a picture/art of that balance-crown-sword motif

caoimhinh

Here you go~

I don't know who made it, but they uploaded it to Catherine's page on the Practical Guide to Evil wikia, credit to them.
It's pretty cool in my opinion; I wish there were more fan arts (I have seen only a couple others depicting Catherine).

caoimhinh

Alternatively, you can have this one.

I edited the text because I'm sure the actual words of the House of Foundling are 'Justifications matter only to the just', not 'Justification only matters to the just', but they are pretty much the same (I also edited a bit the Us and Os, because those two letters looked weird to me in that text format).

Mental Mouse

If you zoom in on the original, you'll see it's some weird-ass font with smileys in the O's. Ptui! 😊

Really, I'd rather see it done in a form that could plausibly be an actual banner, rather than that over-shiny metal. Yes, it's supposed to be "silver on black", but even metallic cloth doesn't look like that! WP indicates that heraldic "silver" is commonly represented by pale gray or white (actual silver being prone to corrosion).

Mental Mouse

That said, your new version is... better justified, or at least properly centered. 😊

caoimhinh

Justified text, LMAO, I see what you did there. Catherine would burn us both for that pun; you for making it, and me for laughing so hard.

maximillian999

You go home and think about what you've done, Mouse.

Andrew Mitchell

When I saw "WP indicates that..." I asked myself "Why the hell are they citing WordPress?!?" and a moment later "D'oh!" 😊

caoimhinh

Something like this or how?

I wish someone with actual artistic talent (and true image edition programs, not just Window's Paint like me) would pick it up and make a good fan art with it.

Imagine a legionary holding up the standard, would be really cool, but that's beyond the scope of my skills to draw/edit. (T_T)

Mental Mouse

Yes! That's excellent! Hmm.... looking at that, it suddenly occurs to me that EE described a legionary painting black wings... on a black banner. ???

caoimhinh

Putting black wings on a black background is hellishly annoying, let me tell you, even with different shades of black and by using grey-white borders to highlight the contrast.

That legionnaire must be a real artist if he actually painted double wings on each side, and made them visible and recognizable.
Check this out, what do you think?

Mental Mouse

Classy!

Mental Mouse

PS: If you haven't already, it should definitely go on the wiki!

TeK

It was on Fairfax blue though.

Mental Mouse

And I'll note belatedly that EE has since edited the banner's original colors to "gold on Fairfax blue".

caoimhinh

Really? 😬

Man, I should re-read the whole series after this book is over. I wonder how many of these retcons will I find.

So, no longer silver on black but instead gold on blue?

EE is gonna have to edit like a dozen different chapters where the banner is mentioned, plus another half a dozen where Cat is musing about the meaning of the symbol and colors, where she explicitly did not use anything that resembled the old banners of Callow's royalty.

I wonder what prompted the decision to make such a change.

Mental Mouse

It might well have been the comments (including mine) about painting black wings on a black banner.... EE doesn't fix every error that's spotted, but he does patch up the more blatant groaners, like when he lost track of how many principates were in Procer. (Supposedly he's going to thin their numbers before publication as well, given that most of them are pretty irrelevant to the story.)

Javvies

Abigail is awesome.

Fucking idiot Levantines. Assuming that they're actually there for Tariq's corpse as was part of their original plan, before the aborted honour duel, not talking is a terrible idea. Especially when everybody knows that's where Cat is going to return to Creation.

It's like they're asking for a misunderstanding and fight. Oh, shit. Bard is in play again, she could have thrown a wrench into the meeting of the Captains.

Andrew Mitchell

Yes, Bard may be in play but I don't think the meeting of the Captains has occurred yet. They (the four in the tent) agreed that getting the body was the first step.

I agree that NOT communicating is a stupid move by the Levantines. I wonder what's going through their heads that that seemed like a good approach?

LaNuup

But I am also amazed that Adjutant completely refuses to talk to the Levantines. Seems unusual for him to do something so reckless and possibly harmful in the long run as breaking this truce by taking the hill.

Andrew Mitchell

Yes. That's a very good point LaNuup. 😐

Shveiran

But he didn't refuse to talk.

He merely moved the Proceran host and his own into a flanking position before, to deal from a position of strength.

It is not a practically diplomatic approach, no, but it isn't quite as dramatic.

Nairne .01

On the contrary. It is the most diplomatic approach here.

They don't really have anything to offer the Levantines so they need leverage, i.e. an advantageous position to make the Levantines even want to speak with them.

Shveiran

It is a page from the early Book of Foundling Diplomacy.

Namely, the one about cheap wine and a sword being brought to the table.

It is not a strange approach, but it isn't the only way to do diplomacy and it isn't how Cat wishes to do things now. Still, I guess one doesn't come between Adjutant and his warlord and then act surprised he doesn't take it well.

What I can't understand is what the Levantines are up to. Occupying the hill really feels like an overly provocative move for no sensible gain, as is.

RoflCat

I'm guessing it's a mix of the same ol 'we don't deal with the Enemy' and preparing for 2 situations that might happen.

1. Cat bring back the body, but refuse to give it to them. Because it's a bargaining chip, much in the same way the Pilgrim used Black's to bargain with her. Then they want to be in stronger position to 'negotiate'

2. Cat did not bring back the body, leaving it in Twilight. In which case the Levantines will have to venture in there to recover it, and since they don't know the changes that happened inside and only seen the snippets of the journey that should show the devils and such, they'll go in expecting enemies waiting.

Mental Mouse

And of course, they're in for a serious surprise (and a tongue-lashing) when the two come walking out arm-in-arm.

Mental Mouse

> the one about cheap wine and a sword being brought to the table.

In this case, Hakram's got the sword axe, and Abigail brought the booze.

Fayhem

> Abigail is awesome.

SO TRUE. I'm not saying this is necessarily you, but to everyone who ships Robber and Abigail, a) SHAME ON YOU and b), what should be the ship name tho.

> not talking is a terrible idea

Very much agreed! My theory: I think any of the actual Blood would have enough political savvy to spot that as a fact, even those who are not exactly specced into diplomacy. At a guess, they told their captains "don't bother us with anything that isn't important" and their captains, having no diplomatic savvy to speak of, are venting their cultural biases by going "Proceran bitches leave" without properly understanding the foreseeable consequences of that. Could be wrong, but as dumb as the Levantine leadership has been in some respects I still give them enough credit to let them have the benefit of the doubt here.

sivarajan

Robbigail, obviously.

Cicero

I see Abigail has diplomatic chops in addition to her supreme tactical ability.

erebus42

Truly a legend in the making!

asdf

Can Cat like squire her? I suppose not.

anon

I mean she did already pass a torch over to her before.
Wonder if it would have the same weight as stabbing her in the chest with a sword.

TeK

Should still do this, just to be on the safe side.

medailyfun

It's never too late to stab!

Liliet

I love how she's genuinely competent politically but does not process that fact at all ;u;

TeK

Except she is not. She just genuinely doesn't give a fuck, because she sees herself as doomed. Might as well do whatever.

Insanenoodlyguy

That is a poor read of Abigail. For all her frustration, she's clearly giving a fuck and thinking things through. If she wasn't thinking things through, she'd insult EVERYBODY at the party she's considering committing political suicide at. Instead, she's measuring out exactly what will get her in career trouble without getting her in REAL trouble.

The problem is she's making her natural talents apparent in all of this, and as a result nobody actually wants to get rid of her as they might with the sort of incompetent she doesn't realize she isn't.

Mental Mouse

Yeah, I love her "well, I have to say something seriously racist, but all our races are folks I don't want to piss off... foreigners, maybe?" And then comes around to a "modest proposal" that's so out-there even the Praesi wouldn't buy it.

Liliet

It's amazing how much savvy she's displaying by accident while genuinely not trying tho.

Mental Mouse

Yeah, tossing that flask to Rozala is likely to lead to unexpected dividends. Cat: "Congratulations on defusing another tricky situation!" Abigail: "Shoulda poisoned it. And maybe drank it myself."

Someguy

Poor Abigail, she's stuck in an Anabasis Story with herself in Caiaphas Cain's Role.

stevenneiman

General Abigail, HERO OF THE KINGDOM.

maximillian999

Wait, I know Caiaphas Cain as the Flashman takeoff set in WH40K, did they find some way of fitting him into the March To The Sea as well?

Someguy

The March of the Liberator counts.

https://wh40k.lexicanum.com/wiki/First_Siege_of_Perlia

maximillian999

Thanks!

Andrew Mitchell

She reached for something within her armour and Rozala tensed, half-expecting a knife, but instead it was a dull bronze flask. The general tossed it to her and patted her horse's neck with what seemed to be genuine sympathy.

Abigail is a joy to behold.

Spinner335

When this is done and fanfics start popping up like weeds we need a story where Abigail becomes Squire instead of Cat somehow.

Oshi

Then she wouldn't be Abigail.

Mislead, Obey, Flee

for he aspects?

Faiir

More like:

Survive,
It will be better,
No it won't.

MagnaMalusLupus

Deceive
Delegate Despair

Faiir

You clearly win.

sivarajan

Those would have fit Catherine perfectly too.

sengachi

Okay but those would legit be amazing aspects.

Deceive might even function as some sort of meta-aspect. We know that Named gain some degree of power/providence from their notoriety and legend, so an aspect which reinforces that would be an amazing power boost (albeit probably not a runaway loop).

Delegate is one of the most genuinely excellent aspects I can image for a commander. Like, Black's Lead is useful, but Delegate? Ohhhhhh, damn that would be an aspect. Can you imagine what you could do with supernatural intuition for what people are best suited for what task, who should be deployed against which enemies, and the ability to give some aspect juice to those you give authority to?

And Despair would just be such an in-character finisher. Spreading Abigail's own morbid fatalism and fears over the enemy to break their resolve would be perfect.

Valkyria

sounds like a pretty nice poem... Abigail should use that in her biography.

stevenneiman

She doesn't have the strength of purpose to take a Name.

MagnaMalusLupus

Fuck that, she totally does. She wants that general's pension Gods damn it, and she'll do what she must to get it. She didn't ask for the promotion, and now can't figure out how to get out of it. The reluctant protagonist is the one of the first steps on the hero's journey, after all.

TeK

Yeah, when she retired she will get a Name Pensioner. Truly, a marvelous achievement. Her aspects would be Shirk, Avoid, and Win.

Raved Thrad

"The Kingdom of Callow of the Wee Dangerous Women." The way this story's going, pretty soon each and every tavern wench in Callow will secretly be either Named or some secret warrior prodigy on the order of the Queen of Blades.

And I can't get how, no matter what Abigail does, everybody takes it as a sign of her secretly terrifying competence as a tactician and strategist.

Raved Thrad

Arg. Get over. kicks keyboard

erebus42

Not just Callow. Malicia was a waitress at an inn and Amadeus was a farm boy. Named (including Heroes, Villains, and all the in-between) can come from anywhere. I think that's the part that scares Rozala shitless. Having been born to power, the idea that someone she could casually overlook could one day have the power to lay her low or bind her into service under them must truly be terrifying.

IDKWhoitis

They are used to Cat looking normal, even laughingly over her head, and she kicks their ass every time.

So here comes this nobody, who providence and Cat have taken an interest to, so obviously there must be a deeper ploy or layer that isn't innately obvious.

And truth be told, Abby is more competent than she gives herself credit for, and has mostly stayed outside of politics and factionism to avoid attention and responsibilities. So therefore she is actually one of the better candidates, even if she didn't particularly want it.

Shveiran

She is doubtlessly competent, which is why Cat took an interest in her in Sarcella: her defense plan was improvised but also solid.

The fact remain that her legend is owed to a lot of fortuitous happenstances – surviving the slaughter in Sarcella by not being there when the Lanterns attacked, requesting acavalry from Juniper hoping to be rejected as an excuse, than finding herself needing that very contingency after it was granted and passing for a mastermind – and that means she is really, really in over her head.

Liliet

Ah, but she's not commended for 'surviving the slaughter in Sarcella', she's commended for her actions in holding it AFTER it happened and she found herself in charge. AKA a genuine achievement legitimately fully attributable to her. The 'get the rioters drunk' stratagem that had her catch Juniper's and Cat's eye is also most definitely her, since it seems very much her style: Abigail is strongly in favor of deescalation always, and that's exactly what the wine did.

medailyfun

Isn't drunk crowd even more dangerous as a rule? Frankly speaking I don't think that narrative turn was realistic

doominator10

A drunk crowd may be worse, but only if they have to pay for the wine themselves. Nobody can be mad with free alcohol.

Mental Mouse

Cat said as much, the response was "she got them so drunk they couldn't fight".

As an aside, It's occurred to me before that nobody in this setting waters their wine, which IRL was nearly universal before the modern age. (Herodotus had a comment to the effect of "the Egyptians drink their wine neat, that's why they're all crazy". Of course, in our history, that was how Europeans made usually-contaminated water safe to drink; the Asian cultures went for tea instead, probably because a significant fraction of their population can't process alcohol. In the Guideverse, they presumably have magic and miracles to purify water.

Liliet

It's more dangerous, but less organized. As I understand Abigail managed a manner of presentation that defused the emotional tension and distracted people from the train of thought that would have led to rioting.

Aotrs Commander

There is, of course, always something to be said for "better lucky than good."

(Though dear Abby would appear to be a bit of both...!)

TeK

As Cat puts it, lack of ambition for being a ruler is hardly a requirement for being one. Ambition is not a character flaw, just a trait behind many.

erebus42

It's always heartwarming to see one royally fucked individual console another.

Also I wonder if both Hakram and Cat know about Abigail and just keep her around because she's still successful and because it's amusing. Maybe they can see a story forming around her? It would be hilarious in an Anaxares-esque kind a way if she ends up with a name that ensures she's stuck in her situation indefinitely.

Andrew Mitchell

> Also I wonder if both Hakram and Cat know about Abigail and just keep her around because she's still successful and because it's amusing.

I've taken this as a given, but I think there's more to it than the two reasons you shared.

Abigail doesn't really want to be where she is, but she not only produces results by thinking for herself (remember the riots she averted), she also learns (remember Catherine was tutoring her). Plus having a general that's actually from Callow will have gone down well with the native Callowans. And will be even more important once Cat abdicates and puts Vivienne on the throne.

Liliet

I think Catherine leads Abigail like a book, and considers her genuinely useful. Which Abigail is not getting, the poor girl.

Mental Mouse

> It would be hilarious in an Anaxares-esque kind a way if she ends up with a name that ensures she's stuck in her situation indefinitely.

Yeah, poor Abigail... it's not that she can't catch a break, more like she can't avoid them!

Anaxeres's Naming was surely manipulated by Kairos, trickster-fashion. If Abigail does get a name, it'll surely be one of the Trickster types, probably the Bumbling subtype. I find myself wondering what the Wandering Bard would think of her.

Also: Note that all three of the forces are there to receive one of their own. Two of them are expecting corpses, and one of those is about to get a big surprise. Happens it's the force who are currently holding that hill....

Fayhem

> If Abigail does get a name, it'll surely be one of the Trickster types, probably the Bumbling subtype.

The Bumbling General, but everybody else hears Brilliant whenever she tries to tell them.

Javvies

I can buy a Trickster type Name for Abigail.

However, I don't buy a Bumbling X type Name. Remember, Names are, at least in part, about what other people see/think. Abigail might think she's getting (un)lucky, but to almost everyone else, she is tricky and cunning. And, let's be honest here, when she does get (un)lucky it isn't in an obvious fashion (ie, it's not apparent to most observers that she's making things up as she goes and getting lucky). Nor is it the slapstick/physical comedy we saw from the Bumbling Conjuror. Unlike the Bumbling Conjuror, who everybody knows just gets lucky and does so in a blatant and comedic fashion – and slapstick/physical comedy, at that, which isn't what we see from Abigail.

I could see Names along the lines of "Cunning X", "Deceptive X".

Or, perhaps more likely, given that the story seems to be moving away from Names and Named, Abigail could just end up with an epitaph like "The Cunning", "The Tricky", etc.

Mental Mouse

> Remember, Names are, at least in part, about what other people see/think.

Good point.

Soma

A interlude from Abigail, now that's a gift. I do so adore her tropes.

If she got a name my guess would be something like General of Terror, and for the aspects I'd guess Fear, Flee, and Frenzy. The name being ironic of course, referring to her terror. Fear originating from her fear, flee from her desire to flee and frenzy for a desperate push so flight becomes yet again an option. It is unfortunate that such a configuration would ensure that Abigail would make the best sort of general for fighting behind enemy lines against hopeless odds, again and again and again.

That said, I suspect with the way the story is going Abigail won't get a name. She'll wind up with something worse for her plans to shirk authority instead. Well that's my BSing out of the way.

Nice chapter!

Mental Mouse

> She'll wind up with something worse for her plans to shirk authority instead.

A noble title, paving her road to becoming Queen Abigail!

Hmm... It occurs to me that the prospective Liesse Accords are now well enough known that by now Providence might be actively avoiding giving a Name to anyone that they're considering for a crown.

Fayhem

> Providence might be actively avoiding giving a Name to anyone that they're considering for a crown.

I think Black's gamesmanship with the principle is pretty strong evidence that Providence is a blind force rather than one that makes plans; it also seems pretty plainly tied to Heroes with the capital H. Catherine got a dose of it bc she had Heroes in her 5-man band, but otherwise that's a straight nah fam. And as has been observed by many the Lycaonese have been demonstrating heroic tropes (most notably of the self-sacrificial variety) left and right; given the way the war has been going for them, I don't think I would ever accuse them of benefiting from Providence.

All of which is my somewhat long-winded way of saying I don't think so, because I don't think Providence actually considers/plans anything (or even can), or ever applies except to Named and only a specific subset at that.

Mental Mouse

By Providence I'm referring to "the system". It doesn't need to be intelligent, but it does react to the stories that people are actually telling. And right now, what people are increasingly saying is that the most powerful living Villain is operating without a Name... and is pitching an entirely-plausible international agreement that Named folks shouldn't be running countries.

Fayhem

> By Providence I'm referring to "the system".

Mm, I see. That's sort of confusing since in this setting AFAIK Providence is used as a very specific term d'art meaning the so-called "golden luck of heroes" that points them to where they need to be and hands them helpful coincidences. That can certainly be taken as a function of the system overall but equally certainly isn't the totality of it so I'm uncomfortable with treating the terms as interchangeable.

Also, while Creation (particularly the Name-related functions thereof) certainly can react to changes in the stories people tell, given that AFAIK Catherine hasn't actually pitched any specifics of the Liesse Accords to anyone outside of her inner circle I'd hardly say that could be an element of any popular stories at the moment. For Creation to be taking that into account would require forecasting rather than reaction, which to me is something that implicitly requires intelligence/sapience of some kind; you can react unconsciously, but to forecast you have to be able to think ahead. Key word there being think, ofc.

caoimhinh

Ah, suspense, suspense. Doesn't seem like the Interludes will end next chapter yet, probably will end in our Mandatory Friday Cliffhanger.

Always fun to read Abigail's POV and her complaints about Fate deciding that she must be successful and famous. Plus other people's misunderstanding that she is an extremely cunning hidden badass scheming to hide her skills, that's always hilarious.

So every mage can feel the energy gathering in the hill where Cat and Tariq will appear, that's interesting, I wonder why the Dominion's Nobles decided to hold their gathering and vote there when they could simply do it in the center of their camp (the hill was stated to be somewhere in the middle of the three camps). It's not as if they are holding some rites, they are going to give speeches and have the captains decide what option is the best.

Typos found:

down form Arcadia / down from Arcadia read through then entire peace talks / read through the entire peace talks

Andrew Mitchell

> I wonder why the Dominion's Nobles decided to hold their gathering and vote there when they could simply do it in the center of their camp

I don't think the Levantine's are here for the Captain's assembly. I think they are here for to claim the Grey Pilgrim's body. IIRC the four nobles in the tent agreed that they'd see to the body first and then have the Captain's assembly.

caoimhinh

So they want to first bring back Pilgrim's body and then hold their assembly...

That would make a lot of sense, yep. Seems like a sensible plan, even. Given that the result of the assembly could possibly make them fall out of the Grand Alliance, they better be able to march out of there as fast as possible after the result.

Thanks.

I imagine Pilgrim will abstain of speaking during the assembly, given how he already gave up his "crown" and probably would want to see Levant's current leaders taking a step forward in a more righteous decision-making progress.

Mental Mouse

> So every mage can feel the energy gathering in the hill

Yeah, incoming gate. And it explains how the others know where to wait.

caoimhinh

Yeah. Though it's a bit weird that the incoming gate is felt with such anticipation.

Hakram is going there because he felt it with his Name that Catherine would come back there.

I'm thinking it would make more sense if what the Proceran mages are feeling is the Levantine mages' ritual to form a Gate, rather than it being a naturally formed gate (as the realm is already estable) or something summoned by Sve Noc as those gates form right away. But for Narrative force that place where they open the Gate is exactly the place where Catherine's party appears through their own Gate. Because, you know, "coincidences".

Liliet

Or just 'hand extended from both sides'. Easier for Catherine to make an exit where one was already being made.

AKA yeah, I agree.

AceOfSpade

I have to say. When I read Abigail's plan get into forced retirement I misread the thing she was going to say. So I'm going to bet that when she puts it into action she'll misspeak or be misheard and accidentally spark waves of food donations for the poor hungry proceran children.

zenanii

"The First Prince ordered you to keep Catherine alive and amenable," the Adjutant serenely said. "You'd have tried threats otherwise."

Guess Rosalia will have to re-evaluate the Adjutant being "the least dangerous" of the woe.

Liliet

I think the entire point of her thought process there is that she already acknowledges him as factually the most dangerous, she just doesn't formulate it like that.

Mental Mouse

"None of us can keep up with Cat... but he can!" Behind every great leader is a great second-in-command, and that's where Hakram comes in.

ActionKermit

Watch it just be Indrani and Roland. Pure comedy when all three forces charging the hill realize they've been duped.

ninegardens

Actually, its a purebred lissien charger.

Andrew Mitchell

Filled with explosives. No, scratch that, filled with explosive goats.

Mental Mouse

"I'll see your Trojan Horse and answer it with..." 😊

TeK

I heard you liked Trojan Horses, so we put your Trojan Horse inside your Trojan horse, so now you can hide inside a Trojan Horse while being in the Trojan Horse.

Fayhem

I'm sorry, did you just suggest exploding goat MIRVs? Out loud? Dear Heavens, I hope Robber doesn't read the comments section.

Raved Thrad

...or ever encounter an elephant. He'd immediately start whinging at Catherine to animate one, as a carrier for his exploding goats.

Fayhem

WHY ARE YOU GIVING SUGGESTIONS ON HOW THIS COULD HAPPEN

OH GOD DO THE FAE LANDS HAVE FLYING ELEPHANTS AS WELL AS FLYING HORSES

See, this is how we get exploding-goat MAD on Calernia. Then fast-forward 100 years. Civilization is destroyed. Survivors are few. All the inhabitants of the goat-blasted wasteland are mutated by the powerful goat radiation into terrible, tin-can-eating new forms. But war... war never changes.

Cue Book VI: Fallout: New Callow.

Euodiachloris

Whales. Amphibious carrier delivery systems...

Andrew Mitchell

Yes. Yes, I did suggest that... And I'm not sorry even if Robber gets to read this...

Totally. Worth. It.

Mental Mouse

It would be funny, but I doubt their return would raise so much magical fuss, since she's "finding paths" rather than making a gate. Also, Hakram wouldn't have responded like he did.

TeK

Or he is perfectly aware that it is a distraction, and just postures to sell others on this notion.

Cold Cyberia

Ah, Hakram you truly are a prince among men.

I doubt Abigail will ever get a Name but if she does I would hope for Reluctant General. Can't wait for her to go to the party and turn out to be a stellar socialite while accidentally pacifying whatever radical nobles are left.

Euodiachloris

The esteemed Cosmic Plaything.

Sometimes, you need to call a spade a spade. 😊

Mental Mouse

> Can't wait for her to go to the party and turn out to be a stellar socialite while accidentally pacifying whatever radical nobles are left.

A mirror to Cat's jug-and-sword diplomacy: "Abigail may be gauche, but she's not terrifying like Catherine!"

Naeddyr

Bah.

Bah!

You are all short-sighted, you aren't looking at the big picture!

General Abigail? Of course. Queen Abigail? Pshaw.

Empress.

Mental Mouse

> General Abigail? Of course. Queen Abigail? Pshaw. Empress

The Unlikely Goddess...

TeK

Dread Empress Accidental.

Fayhem

All of her chapter quotes are just "Why me."

Fayhem

And she keeps trying to abdicate, but everyone in the Wasteland assumes it's a fiendishly cunning Traitorous-type scheme and it actually prevents any of them from overthrowing her since they don't want to act until they understand what she's planning.

talenel

Well it seems like my idea of Rozala as Abigail's parallel/mirror looks a lot more likely.

TeK

"Humble, the Arlesite princess wondered, or trying to remain obscure so that she would take her enemies by surprise in wars to come? Either way, she was one to watch out for."

Foolish Abigail! Doth thou tryeth to deceive me?

Enjou

> Alms took hard coin, but you could get dead rats from any poorly-kept cellar.

The true irony is that this pretty much describes the drow before Cat found them. Dying rats in a poorly-kept cellar. Truly it's the traditional offering for Sve Noc.

Sparsebeard

I wonder how the sisters fell about being given offerings of dead rats and handfuls of corn lol.

sivarajan

"General Abigail let out a mocking bark of laughter, though her voice made it sound like strangely terrified trill."

sivarajan

That's the kind of humor I haven't noticed as much of this book.

Aston Whiteman

New Chapter Delayed today?

Andrew Mitchell

No. It's been up for a while. <https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2019/07/03/interlude-concourse-v/>

Satan

I really hope Pilgrim gets to look inside Abigail's mind.

Interlude: Concourse V

"Diplomacy is war without all the clumsiness."

– First Princess Eugénie of Lange

If it came to a fight, Lord Yannu Marave decided, they would likely lose. He did not fear the Proceran horse, for its charge would break against a shield wall strong and unflinching. Neither did he balk at the numbers, for though legionaries were skilled soldiers and men-at-arms brave neither were match for armymen of the Blood holding high ground. It was the Callowan sappers that tipped the balance to the opposition's side, for he had seen with his own eyes what their munitions could do when lobbed at a tight formation. The word shredding came to mind. Torture of Callowan prisoners had yielded knowledge that these 'sharpers' were both commonly used and in large supply, which made it likely the packs of sappers he'd seen shoot out of the torch light and into the darkness would be carrying them. No, if the Procerans and the easterners had ridden forth to betray them then every son and daughter of Levant on this hill would be dead before reinforcements could arrive from the camps. Had they?

"That is Rozala Malanza's personal banner," Lady Aquiline said.

"Arlesite she might be, but she's no foe of ours – she has behaved honourably since taking command in Iserre."

"I see cavalry and foot coming for us, not bread and honey," Lady Itima replied. "This has an ill cast to it, girl."

Spoken, Yannu thought, as a woman whose lands shared border with Arlesites. Unlike Aquiline Osenia, whose main preoccupations as Lady of Tartessos had always been rivals of other Blood and the prowling creatures of the Brocelian.

"The Black Queen's banner flies as well," Razin Tanja mentioned, eyes narrowed. "One of the Woe might be with the legionaries."

The Lord of Alava considered that. Though the visions the Peregrine's last will had carried to them had told much of what happened within the nightmare of dead Liesse, it had not revealed where the Archer and the Hierophant had gone. They should both be alive, though the great Soninke warlock had been stripped of his power, so it would be possible for them to be riding with the cohorts. Yet it seemed unlikely, after the night's troubles, for the Archer's death was still seared in Yannu's own memory and the Hierophant had been put to slumber as an act of mercy. No, if any of the Woe rode under that banner it would be the Adjutant or the Thief – and there had long been rumours that the latter had lost her Bestowal by stepping into the responsibilities of rule.

"If it is the Archer and they mean to slay us, then we are all dead," Yannu Marave noted. "She will kill ourselves and our officers as the opening stroke, and our only answer would be to charge down onto sapper-prepared grounds."

Everybody held in a wince at that, for all here had suffered of the vicious devilries goblins could prepare when given opportunity. Razin Tanja most of all, from what he'd heard, for the Third Army under General Abigail was said to have turned the streets of Sarcella into a slaughter yard even before the Black Queen arrived.

"No one's sprouted an arrow in the forehead," Lady Itima of the Brigand's Blood said. "I'll take that as a hint that either the Archer's not there or they're not baying for blood."

If it were only the Callowans coming none of them would have batted an eye, for when the Peregrine's body was returned it would be by Catherine Foundling's hands if by any. Yet the Procerans coming out had muddied the waters, for they had no business with what would come by morning's light. They had even been told as much, for their messengers had insisted on audience beyond politeness, yet here they were. More suspicious yet, their advance had come to be matched to that of the Army of Callow's legionaries: together they were heading towards flanking positions that would be difficult to push back if assault was given.

"The Praesi crossbowmen could be firing by now," Lady Aquiline pointed out. "Not to great effect, but at least to soften our defence before assault."

Lord Yannu was inclined to agree this was sign of peaceful intent, yet this was a delicate situation. It was likely that canny old Itima Ifriqui had noticed already, even if she'd held her tongue, yet the younger two among them might not have: save for Itima's own two sons, every individual of any Blood in Procer was standing atop this hill. And given both the Brigand's line poor reputation and recently-mauled forces – their assault on the Callowan camp had been costly – it was unlikely that they would be able to sway even most captains into following them through diplomacy or threats. A strike here and now would be decapitating the armies of the Dominion abroad, and even when word trickled back home months from now any retribution for the treachery would have to wait until matters of succession were settled and a session of the Majilis convened. The Lord of Alava was not certain why betrayal would be had here and now, but there was no denying the opportunity was there. Had the Procerans or the Callowans peered into their private councils and then decided removing the Blood to be in either their interests? It seemed a senseless thing, truth be told, but easterners were willing in a villain's service and Procerans lied as easily as they breathed.

"Silence serves us not," Razin Tanja said. "It is unseemly to treat with foreigners before the Grey Pilgrim's body has been given to the flame, yet strife would be even more so."

"Shall we give them voice in our councils as well, Tanja?" Yannu said, voice hard cast. "We have our wats for reasons, though it seems you have forgotten both. Blood can wash out, unlike honour tarnished."

It was more than simply unseemly to play politics with foreigners now, it was dishonoring a great man's death. That Proceran royalty would not be willing to discard their precious Ebb and Flow even long enough for the Peregrine to be put to pyre was...

"If the Black Queen's the one bringing back the Peregrine, the Callowans at least are already part of this," Tanja replied.

"Speaking to them and not the Procerans might split them," Lady Itima noted, sounding approving. "There can't be a lot of trust between them."

Akil Tanja's son seemed as if he wanted to argue that'd not been his intent at all but restrained himself in the end. Young Razin was not so stubborn as to toss away victory he'd already earned, then. For victory he had indeed earned, Yannu had silently acknowledged the moment Lady Itima spoke in favour of audience. For Lady Aquiline had made her preference for talks clear already, and if only the Lord of Alava stood alone of the four against words being bandied then his growing isolation among the Blood in Iserre would only be set in stone. Neither Razin Tanja's words nor a knife at his own throat would have stayed Yannu's hands after he'd set out to guide the Dominion away from disaster through duel, as he had. He'd taken a step back simply because Lady Itima Ifriqui, who had every reason to stay out of the affair for dislike of the Osená, had chosen to put that knife to his throat anyway. Though it was a proud old boast in the lands of his birth that Alava had stood alone even when the rest of the Dominion fell to the Principate, and that the hill-folk needed no ally save the bravery of their own kin, the reality was that the city and lands he ruled could be starved of coin and goods and even many foodstuffs if it broke with every other great line. At the very least, alignment between the other three would see him removed from the highest command of Levant's armies even if killed one.

He could kill them all, perhaps, but that would be just as dangerous a roll of the dice and he was a careful man by nature. No, best to take step back then and now so that he might arrange victory on his own terms when the opportunity was ripe.

"It seems there will not be a choice," Lady Aquiline suddenly said. "Look."

Under three banners – Aequitan, Foundling and truce white – a party had approached the foot of the hill as they spoke. Two riders were behind Princess Rozala's familiar silhouette, one carrying her heraldry and the other a torch. Behind a tall orc in darkened plate two smaller humans were carrying the other two trailing cloths, a mere six souls in whole. Unlikely to be an ambush, then, even though the burnt plate was as good as announcement that the orc among them was the Adjutant.

"We can send an invitation to the Deadhand alone to stand before us," Itima said, smile gone hard.

It could be a fine line between envoy and hostage. Razin Tanja cast her a considering look, and for a moment Yannu was reminded of the boy's father. Lord Akil had been known for his keen wits, and though he'd been no great general under his reign the Binder's Blood has seen their influence rise through careful bargains and treaties. It was an old jape back home that the true talent of the Tanjas was not the magic of their famous ancestress but in truth the wealth that flowed through the canals of Malaga, yet few before Akil Tanja had been so skilled at making use of that wealth. More than once Yannu had seen the same look he now saw in young Razin's eyes in his father's own, just before someone was goaded into making a costly mistake on the floor of the Majilis.

"Alone would be insultingly obvious," Razin said. "Let him bring an attendant, at least."

Itima's agreement was the sound of the decision being made, and Yannu Marave began to wonder if it might not be better for the realm to kill the boy than Lady Aquiline after all.

—

Princess Rozala was more than passingly familiar with bravery. She would not consider herself a great paragon of that virtue, though neither was she a coward. Rozala, for all that she did not shy from battle, was still a princess of the blood: she went to war surrounded by loyal bodyguard and with priests ready to bring her back from death's door should wound be taken. It was natural this be the case, though perhaps not fair in a godly sense, for her death would herald a great deal more trouble than a fantassin's. Yet it was easier to brave, the Princess of Aequitan privately thought, when so many were sworn to keep her alive. Yet she'd seen purer strains of bravery in other men and women. Soldiers who volunteered to hold border positions in the face of the Enemy, knowing no reinforcements could be spared. Conscripts running back under arrows and spellfire to drag fallen friends back to safety behind the lines, boys and girls not even eighteen summers old stilling their shaking hands and raising their shields steady as the dead charged howling at them. The Arlesite princess had even seen many whose fearlessness had been hollow, a spectacle put on for myriad reasons ranging from stiffening moral to preserving reputation. And yet Rozala Malanza could not for the life of her tell if Hakram Deadhand's serene disregard for the danger surrounding them was genuine or not.

The orc's helmet was held in the crook of his handless arm, revealing the thick leathery skin and the troublingly large teeth of his kind. Greenskins were not well-known to Rozala, and so discerning one's sentiments did not come naturally to her, yet he'd not hesitated a moment when invited to walk into the wolf's den atop the hill nor expressed particular concern since. It was as if he could not see the hundreds of flaring heavily armed soldiers around them, whose gaze lingered on the truce banner Rozala was carrying with open antipathy. She would have preferred to come in riding, truth be told, but Deadhand had spooked her destrier something fierce when he'd come close. That instinctive dislike by animals was said to be natural to greenskins, though until recently Rozala had believed it to be one of those commonly accepted falsehoods like Praesi being liars from the cradle or Callowans being physically incapable of halfway edible cooking. It seemed there was truth to it, however, for all horses had grown unruly when the Adjutant had been upwind of them.

"The banner's dipping, Your Grace," Hakram Deadhand said.

His coarse voice betrayed the slightest hint of what she took to be amusement. Gritting her teeth, the Princess of Aequitan raised back to full height the banner she'd been made to carry like some sort of, well, attendant. Which the Adjutant had not hesitated to designate her as when the summons had come from the Levantines. To her dismay, she'd even had to play along for the sake of being there when the talks were held. As if leaving alone an orc and a foursome of quarrelsome Dominion lordlings could end in anything but bodies on the floor.

"Is your line known among your people to be of particular dignity?" Princess Rozala tried.

This would be slightly less wounding of her dignity if at least he was the orc surrogate for highborn. Otherwise, she was carrying a banner for one of the Damned plucked out from some northern waste to serve the Black Queen. A heartbeat passed.

"My mother famously made the finest Callowan meat stew in the clan," the Adjutant replied.

She was being mocked, Rozala realized. Wait, Callowan meat stew? Surely he could not mean...

"I'd never heard of this delicacy," the Princess of Aquitan said. "May I ask what it contains?"

Surely not Callowans, she thought, for the Black Queen would not have made so important a dignitary of him were it the case.

"Not humans, of course," Hakram Deadhand nonchalantly replied.

She mastered herself so that she would not breathe out in relief. At the very least she was not being made to consort with a bloody-fanged cannibal.

"Much too expensive, that far out in the Steppes," the Adjutant continued just as nonchalantly. "Never ate it done the traditional way until I came to Ater."

Before Rozala could conceive of a gracious way to ask the Damned at her side whether or not the 'traditional way' involved human flesh, they were ushered past one last ring of armymen and came to stand before the four heads of the Dominion's armies abroad. The older two she was most familiar with: Lord Yannu Marave of Alava and Lady Itima Ifriqui of Vaccei. The latter had particularly poor reputation among Arlesites for her vicious and unprovoked raids into Orense in the years before the Tenth Crusade. The First Prince might have made peace there, but the looting and burning of southern Orense had not been forgot. Lord Yannu she did not much like, but at least respected. The Lord of Alava, who claimed descent from the Valiant Champion, was a cautious and ferocious man who displayed little of the famed recklessness of his line. The Princess of Aquitan had disliked that by virtue of being the foremost Levantine commander he'd effectively seized command of the Iserran campaign, especially considering unlike her and several of her generals he'd never fought either Queen Catherine or Marshal Juniper. Yet the Dominion had provided the greater part of the host, and so claimed greater influence. If the Battle of the Camps had been a victory perhaps Rozala could have argued otherwise, but while those brutal three days had been many things they had not been that.

The younger pair she only through reports, though the Levantine fascination with war paint and bloodline colours made their identities easy enough to deduce. The young man in iron grey and crimson would be Razin Tanja, son and heir to the fresh-slain Lord Akil Tanja of Malaga. The peculiarities of Dominion inheritance laws meant he would not be Lord of Malaga until his kin had acclaimed him on the grounds of that very city, assuming his right was not challenged, so among the four highborn here his authority was the weakest. His own captains could defy him without breaking oath, at the moment, though if he ever ascended to lordship that'd be a poor decision indeed. The impressively-shaped young woman to his side would be Lady Aquiline Osen of Tartessos, by repute rival to the Tanjas and deathly foe to the Ifriquis for reason of kinslaying twice over. Dominion political affairs were fluid even by Proceran standards, for they shifted with the feuds of every generation of the Blood, but it was usually to be expected that their highborn would be feuding with whoever's lands bordered their own and seeking cordial ties with whoever's did not. The Maraves of Alava did have a reputation as proud lunatics staying out of politics save when offended, which had made it both surprising and not when Lord Yannu became informal head of the Dominion's armies abroad. Rozala was not unfamiliar with the trick of putting those that could not be called to heel in charge.

The four lordlings were standing and fully armed. And, by the visible wounds on the Osen and the Marave, had recently fought some manner of duel among themselves.

"You stand before four lines of the Blood," Lady Itima said in heavily-accented Lower Miezan. "You may kneel."

"You stand before the Queen of Callow's right hand," the Adjutant calmly replied in Chantant. "You may bow."

Princess Rozala would have appreciated the insolent confidence a great deal more if it hadn't run the risk of getting them both killed. Lady Aquiline's lips twitched in amusement, as did Lady Itima's, but Tanja's lips thinned and Lord Yannu's face remained inscrutable.

"Princess Malanza," the Lord of Alava said. "Are you now attendant to one of Below's servants?"

"I am sworn envoy speaking for the First Prince of Procer," the Princess of Aquitan replied. "Who also happens to temporarily attend to the Lord Adjutant."

If he expected to shame her into retiring, he would have to do better than that. Rozala had been the ruling princess of principality that'd half-beggared itself fighting to the death with the current ruling First Prince, the daughter of a woman who'd once laughingly boasted she would send Cordelia Hasenbach running back north with her tail between her legs to 'suckle on icicles and brood'. She'd had to wade through seas of scorn and mockery to rise to the height's she now stood at, all of it dealt by peers – which not a single individual here could claim to be.

"What an unlikely coincidence," Lady Itima sardonically said.

For some reason, she shot Razin Tanja a half-approving look afterwards.

"You interrupt sacred ceremony, Bestowed," Lady Aquiline said, eyeing the orc curiously. "Withdraw your warriors and let nothing more be spoken of this."

Rozala found herself almost shamefully glad that there'd been no talk about claiming the Black Queen's head in some sort of doomed attempt at vengeance. Near enough to every highborn of the Dominion was here, if some dimwit among them took a swing at Catherine Foundling the entire Levantine host could be decapitated. It wasn't as if the Princess of Aequitan had sallied forth to protect the Black Queen, for what would that monster fear from not even a thousand soldiers? The Queen of Callow had looked more than eight thousand horse in the eye, drawn a line in the snow and dared them to cross it. And when Rozala had offered her challenge, after, it'd not been met with fear or defiance. It'd been met, chillingly enough, with a sort of vague irritation. Like Foundling had already done them all a favour by refraining from slaughtering them like animals and anything aside from withdrawal from that point on had been trying an already thinning patience. That, more than threats or promises, had seen Rozala Malanza order a retreat. And rumour had since trickled in that the Black Queen had, for having struck at her legionaries, broken two fingers from every cataphract of Helike and sent them marching back to the Tyrant stripped of arms and armour. It might be that the Lanterns and the armsmen might kill the villainous queen, if they struck at her. It'd been a long and arduous night.

More likely, though, Catherine Foundling would lose patience at the attempt and kill them all without batting an eye.

"You have claimed the grounds where my warlord will return," Hakram Deadhand said. "That will not be brooked."

"We've no interest in your queen," Lord Yannu bluntly said. "We await the arrival of the Peregrine's remains."

"I've no interest in the remains of the Grey Pilgrim," the orc replied. "I await the arrival of my queen."

"Perhaps a simple honour guard can be arranged," Rozala suggested.

The Lord of Alava fixed her with a steady look.

"Sons and daughters will bring the Peregrine to the flame," he flatly said. "None other."

"The Queen of Callow will not return from saving all your lives to a ring of foreign soldiers," the Adjutant replied just as flatly.

Rozala would have hissed at him in an other language, if she shared any with him that the Levantines would not.

"It was the Grey Pilgrim who sacrificed himself for all who stand here," Lady Aquiline sharply said.

"It was the Black Queen who made truce where you sought war, and led the band of five to victory," the Adjutant said. "Do you deny this?"

"That the Queen of Callow acted honourably this night is not in doubt," Lady Itima said. "Bargains made were kept."

There was agreement from the others, some of it more reluctant than others.

"Yet you diminish the sacrifice made by the Peregrine through your words," the Lady of Vaccei continued. "Curb your tongue, Damned."

"Damned you call me, but my honour lies in the service of my queen," the orc unflinchingly replied. "I will not suffer her return being a circle of swords bared."

In that moment, Rozala Malanza grasped that the Adjutant had been playing them all. Gods, he'd been trying to extract something from them from the start.

"No offence is meant," Razin Tanja said.

"Then why do you insist on giving it?" Hakram Deadhand said.

There was a rumble of discontent from the Levantines.

"What offence is this, orc?" Lord Yannu bluntly asked.

"Though under truce, you are enemies still," the Adjutant said. "How can your surrounding my queen be taken as anything but slight?"

"The Peregrine's last escort will not be opened to Callowans or Wastelanders," Lady Aquiline firmly said. "This will not be argued."

"Then to avoid slighting Callow's honour, you must no longer be enemies to its queen but instead allies," the Adjutant said.

"Are we to swear oaths to the void?" Lady Itima mocked. "Even were we willing, there is nothing to be done."

"There is," the Adjutant replied, offering a fanged grin. "Years ago, Queen Catherine requested to become a member of the Grand Alliance. All that would be required for friendship to be established is your agreement to this suit."

"It would mean nothing, without the First Prince's approval and the Majilis' agreement," Razin Tanja said.

"It would satisfy honour nonetheless," the orc said.

Rozala's pulse quickened. Should she intervene, she wondered? For all that the Foundling Queen had declared her intention to join the war against the Dead King, that was not the same as her becoming signatory of the Grand Alliance. If four of the five greatest aristocrats in Levant agreed to back Callow's bid to become part of the Alliance, its chances would become more than merely good. The consequences of that were... hard to foresee. Gods, this was too great a decision too swiftly made. Rozala Malanza bit her lip.

A heartbeat later, dawn began and a gate tore open before all of them.

Two people hobbled through it, and just like that the Princess of Aequitan felt the world change.

Caerulea

Catherine is finally back in creation! As is the Grey Pilgrim! This news should be welcomed with celebration. So vote for A Practical Guide to Evil here!

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Discord Server:

<https://discord.gg/3nbsUfZ>

Patreon:

<https://www.patreon.com/user?u=3523924>

ruduen

I wouldn't call it just yet. Archer and Rogue are also a pair that could qualify. Though given the possibility of a dramatic Friday reveal, it could be either pair.

matesbe

I feel like the “and felt the world change” line wouldn’t be there if it was Rogue and Archer. Their appearance wouldn’t warrant such dramatic phrasing. It could be a red herring, but if it is it’s not a good one.

caoimhinh

Hmm, I think it would, because Archer and Rogue’s presence would almost assuredly force the Dominion’s nobles to accept Hakram’s terms. They were just discussing how Archer’s presence would mean they could all get killed very swiftly, and Rogue is allied with Procer rather than Levant.

Liliet

No, too dramatic. Also they were seeking hidden paths. The two emerging with dawn are 100% Catherine and Tariq

caoimhinh

Come on, we already know Named are empowered by drama. Indrani and Roland left first, waaay before Cat resurrected Tariq, remember she went for a stroll through Twilight Liesse first, got her new staff from Edward’s tomb and then went back to the throne room for Tariq, so it would make sense for them to arrive before Cat and Pilgrim, even if only for the escalation of tensions for a couple of minutes.

Nairne .01

Aye, but the vision was at the time of Pilgrim’s death right? I think Time doesn’t flow that much differently between the places.

Liliet

Exactly, the narrative runs on drama. This is not a fart noise anticlimax moment. “The world changed” cannot refer to the two of them.

Indrani and Roland wouldn’t be emerging from this exit in the first place, they were looking for hidden paths.

caoimhinh

The world didn’t change, Rozala felt it change when the two figures emerged. There’s a difference.

Indrani and Roland went back, nothing mentions they were going for hidden paths or that they were going to do anything else but returning to the camps.

The “hidden paths” thing was used only when referring to the essence of what the Twilight Realm is, not that Archer and Roland were going to explore them (why would they, when there’s still pressing matters waiting for their return to their respective camps?).

Though it could as easily be that Archer and Rogue stayed close waiting for Cat and Pilgrim, and they are all four returning together, with Cat and Tariq ahead of the group. I mean, if I were them I would stay and wait for my friend to come back after whatever moment of privacy she needed, considering the return point is in the middle of a war zone with four armies camping around.

Liliet

Indrani and Roland went back through paths that only Indrani knows how Hye taught her to find.

And yes, the world changing is most definitely not a reference to Indrani and Roland.

caoimhinh

True. I verified it. You are right.

No elaborate farewells followed, as they simply disappeared into the city below. Indrani would find a way out, as she had first found a way in when seeking Masego. The Lady of the Lake had shared knowledge with her I’d not asked the lay of, long aware that the keeping of her teacher’s secrets was one of the few things Indrani considered sacred.

Well, seems like the interludes are over, then?

TeK

I still would’ve liked one more interlude. I simply adore how other people react to our Cat.

Andrew Mitchell

I agree, for exactly the reasons you stated. But, I’d say 90% probability rather than 100%.

Liliet

True, no such thing as 100% probability. 90% sounds fair.

Morgenstern

Second that @magesbe.

Why would the world change if anyone else but Cat with the alive Pilgrim would come through that, after those words? There's no way those nobles won't agree to her joining the Alliance after that, after what they just went through in their own... "talks". Not only did she uphold all her promises – she now also brought their greatest Hero back to them.

Morgenstern

Also, dawn. It's absolutely appropriate that the symbol for (hope) dawn(ing) would return exactly with the dawn, just like another Grey appearing slightly changed with the sun's rays as savior.

Liliet

Yes. There was never any way they would return other than with the first rays of dawn. It can't be anyone but them, this dramatic position has 'reserved for the VIP' embossed on it in gold letters.

Mental Mouse

As others have noted, the two sidekicks would be a ridiculous anticlimax rather than the dramatic reveal we've all been waiting for. Also, they are both able-bodied; "two people hobbled through it" makes it quite clear these are the lame Cat and the aged Pilgrim.

apperatus27

Huh, I'm not actually sure if the timing of that is a good or a bad thing for the alliance.

On one hand, yay superman is alive!
On the other, the celebration might make this a missed opportunity for negotiation.

RoflCat

Actually if anything this makes the Levantines basically have to support Cat, considering she saved Tariq's life.

How would they hold their honour, if when asked for support they refused the 'ally' who saved their 'king'?

TeK

But if she used abhorrent Below methods to do that, it doesn't really count, does it?

caoimhinh

With Angels' approval of that Resurrection, all their pretext becomes null.

TeK

They were temporarily under duress. Really, it's more like an exploitation. She has a record of angel abuse, after all...

Valkyria

Well technically it was his own aspect that raised him...

TeK

She used William's sword to stab him too though. Does that mean his death was approved by Above as well?

Valkyria

Yes since his death was kind of a mercy given. Like for the world, since almost all other options would have dire consequences. GP even said beforehand that his death wouldn't create large waves – knowing Above would take care of it so it wouldn't all go to waste. And it did, since they basically broadcasted the whole thing directly into a whole lot of brains.

TeK

If by dire consequences you mean a hundred thousand zombified angry Callowans starting a Tenth Crusade prematurely, I got a news flash for you: Above was not against.

Valkyria

no i don't. more like "continent of the dead" consequences.

Cicero

Actually, she used Below methods to steal the Grey Pilgrim's own method of resurrection and then turned around and used it on him.

So I think that means the resurrection is not tainted, since the original source was above.

TeK

And Heiress planned to use angel's corpse to power up her demon-spitting machine. You may have missed "she used Below methods". How are we sure that a touch of those tower of self slaughter do not taint all they touch?

Liliet

Well I'm assuming the Choir would be still around to knock sense into anyone who doubts :3

TeK

Those poor little things were bullied by a big bad Cat into agreeing. Can't take their word, really.

Liliet

-Choir of Mercy shows up with a thousand flaming wheel eyes- =)

Andrew Mitchell

I know you're probably joking but I want to say that they really, really weren't bullied. Cat asked and explained, and they let her. It's quite a long section so I won't post it all here but here are the highlights:

"You actually loved him, didn't you?" I said, voice wondering. "Or as close to that as you can."

...

"You can't bring him back," I said. "I understand. There's rules, and it's not in your nature to make exceptions."

The attention never wavered nor lessened in intensity.

"But I'm not you," I said. "Your rules don't bind me. And if you let me, I will."

...

"Why?" I repeated.

It was a fair question, I supposed.

"Because I can, so I should," I said. "Because even when he was my enemy I did not believe him to be a bad man. Because..."

I struggled to find the words to express it, but perhaps the simplest truth was best.

"Because I don't want to be at war with you or him," I quietly said. "And the moment you choose to believe that, the war's over."

...

"Please," I said. "I know you don't make exceptions, and I won't ask you to. All you need to do is to stand aside."

We stood there, the Choir of Mercy and the Arch-heretic of the East, and a long moment passed.

Thanks for making me revisit this. It's a truly heart-warming scene which gives me hope that this is all going to turn out OK.

Shveiran

Also, just for shit and giggles... if someone can bully a Choir and bothers to pretend they want your agreement on something, I'm not sure it is a good idea to deny them. Not unless you are TWO choirs, at the very least.

Liliet

Sounds about right to me.

Euodiachloris

Not to mention that the Choir of Mercy kind of polished the aspect and added a library due date stamp to a card attached to it. 😊

RoflCat

Thievery isn't exclusively Below thing (see: Vivi before she joined Cat)

And the resurrection is a genuine resurrection which is exclusive to Good, not necromancy or other sort of Evil specific methods.

So outside of Cat's status as "Villain" that's getting harder and harder to justify with each time she show how unwilling she is to fight them, they don't have much excuses to go for.

But you know what? NONE of that matters if Pilgrim show his support for Cat. The moment that happen, Levant will follow, because the alternative is the end of Levant.

TeK

I joke

Mental Mouse

Hakram wouldn't have gotten a binding agreement anyway... but notice that just for a moment, he got the Levantines to actually consider it. That will color their thinking later.

Shveiran

Hakram's actions did seem a bit rushed and uncompromising, before. Not unreasonable or out of character, but simply too... narrow, too rigid, too clumsy in the situation compared to what he usually does.

But that's because he wasn't just trying to grab an anchor for Cat; he was laying the ground for her capitalizing on her deeds.

And damn, how nicely he dealt with the Levantines.

We should search the Tower for a cloning ritual, and get us an Adjutant each.

Liliet

YEP

TeK

"Torture of Callowan prisoners"

Ho-ho, uh boy, you done goofed.

hakureireimu

I'm more disappointed with Pilgrim. I'm mean if he doesn't have enough influence over even the Levantines, what good are his words?

TeK

It may have happened before or after he had joined their armies. But yeah, old man does NOT run a tight crew.

Euodiachloris

Isn't it interesting that the list of people he apparently needs to kill to save the dominion from certain instability... always leaves one all so very insignificant name out?

Yet, I don't spot anybody else readily destabilizing alliances by killing the worryingly effective competition every time he gets a chance to. 😏

werafdsaew

Who are you talking about?

Andrew Mitchell

The first 'he' is clearly Careful Yannu. But I don't know what the "all so very insignificant name" is.

Liliet

Himself maybe? XD

Euodiachloris

Yannu messing with the Pilgrim's game.

TeK

And a cherry on top:

"There are evils I have been forced to make peace with," the Pilgrim said with iron in his voice. "Torture is not one of them. You may be certain I will allow no such thing so long as I draw breath. The matter of exchanges, however, will have to be discussed with the Princess of Aquitan. Answer will be given before battle."

caoimhinh

Even if Catherine doesn't get them, Pilgrim will not tolerate this once he finds out.
And he will find out.

Liliet

I think Yannu's got an appointment with a pillow.

Euodiachloris

I think Peregrin might be done with that idea in this case.

Yannu doesn't deserve it. I think reaping what you have sown is the order of the day; it's going to be a sword or a blast to the face.

Liliet

Yeah I was being mean to Tariq hehe

Shveiran

It does seem like he is a goner, admittedly. Out of tune with the rest of the Blood, uncompromising with change, with no appetite for the Bone War... I'm not saying he is going to die necessarily, but I think he'll likely be removed from office and therefore from the narrative.

Liliet

"Removed from office" – what office? He's Blood 😊

Levantine system accepts only one way of firing Lords that everyone else dislikes 😊

Shveiran

Well, he is OF the Blood, certainly, but like Razin case exemplifies this is not purely a blood-related succession. You need to be AN heir to hold the fancy chair, but acclamation determines WHICH heir gets it.

I'm also not sure we know that only jolly murder removes one from the aforementioned fancy chair / fancy spot by the fire.

The fact that admittedly no talk has been had so far about deposing or disgracing a Line leader doesn't really prove it in my opinion. It merely suggest no one of the Levantine schemers thought it a viable option, but the Gray Pilgrim may have enough sway?

Liliet

Oaths aren't really something that gets taken back easily, particularly in Levant, and the difference between Razin and his father is that the captains haven't sworn to him yet.

antoninjohn

Oath breaking Pilgrim, with an oath you swore to a Few Queen.
That is going to bite you later

Someguy

That's 3 times now isn't it?

1. The hostage thing
2. Sword Bitch > shifted to Kairos.
3. The torture thing.

Oathbreaking really is Above's bailiwick.

Liliet

>2

what????

Pilgrim gave his crown, as promised

Insanenoodlyguy

Nah, even if the timeline ends up bad, oath is only open if
A: he knew/finds out, and then
B: doesn't do something about it.

And he's too smart to break oath twice to somebody like Catherine. That shit stacks and she already has an advantage.

Shveiran

Also... why would he? That is really out of character for him. If Tariq has a question, he asks the Ophanim, he doesn't torture people.

Insanenoodlyguy

Exactly. Based on his language, I think he would have made clear that Torture was not in the cards. Whatever Yannu got up to, I'm sure it was when Grey wasn't around.

Euodiachloris

Guess who is very much in for the high jump, then...

Shveiran

I mean... maybe?

Cat talking with the Gray Pilgrim about prohibiting torture of captured soldiers suggests the practice, while probably frowned upon by most, is still largely present. Otherwise, why even mentioning it if it was already established?

If that is true, Yanno may face political repercussions, but ... executions?

Cat, furious or no, won't nuke one of the Blood as that would result in snipping the alliance in the bud. Maybe Pilgrim will take action, but I can't believe that was the only "war crime" committed in this campaign, so...

Mental Mouse

I'm pretty sure that's in the indefinite past, rather than immediate past. They have been fighting back and forth for a while. Also, Yannu would never say "honor be damned"... yet it's clear that his honor is utterly villainous.

Also, Hakram is quite the Deadpan Snarker, but then, most of the Woe are pretty good at that.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

More like DeadHAND Snarker, amirite?

Shaerick 68

Take your like and get out

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Don't mind if I do. 😊

Spinner335

Oh you tease.

Gunslinger

Classic Wednesday chapter, teasing us for an epic Friday. I can't say I enjoy the levantine bickering but I thoroughly enjoyed Hakram playing them all. He's so fucking good.

Also poor Rozala carrying the banner while wondering about Callowan meat is just too funny.

Andrew Mitchell

Cicero

Abigail knows a fellow traveler when she meets one. Why else would she offer Rozala drink? She knows how hard it is to handle this sort of thing drunk, she couldn't bear to see someone bear it sober.

Fayhem

Seriously.

> "Much too expensive, that far out in the Steppes," the Adjutant continued just as nonchalantly. "Never ate it done the traditional way until I came to Ater."

Adjutant, you sure you're an orc and not a troll?

Liliet

Hakram, baring his fangs: am I?

Soma

Hoo, hoo, hoo! What a play! I love having the Hakram-Rozala interaction. Comedy gold, I swear.

Dear Commodore Liliet,

I've in my possession an odd vessel by the name of the Rozhand and think it would do well with the fleet. I certainly wish to aid this curiosity, but I do have some prior commitments on the Malacat, Rozacat, or whatever various name the ship is has decided on while I've been away.

All the best,
Soma

(P.S. For the longest time I couldn't read your name as anything other than Lillet, I swear there's not enough space between the dot and body of the i on the comment names.)

NZPIEFACE

I love it.
Every Rozala is in is basically a scene where she plays second fiddle.

Liliet

Yeah my name has something of an issue with being readable ;u;

For me to ship a het ship there needs to be a lot more there than "two people were in proximity to each other and the man took the opportunity he had to thoroughly humiliate and unsettle the woman". In fact, one would argue that this interlude has moved this potential ship from the utterly neutral "don't care either way" position to the slightly negative "I would prefer not" one.

I care not how ships intersect (Rozala has two hands), but...

Anyway, did you notice the "impressively-shaped young woman" in there as EVIDENCE 😊

Soma

But not even as a friendship? To be honest, I just want to see the Hakram-Rozala buddy cop movie now. There's just something about these two that now screams out for best of friends.

And were you suggesting Yanozala? Because that would be trip. I'm down for the cultural fun times.

Liliet

Yanno? What has Yanno got to do with it? It was Aquiline she commented to. But really that's details, I'm talking about the pure fact of Rozala displaying Catherine levels of Context Ignoring Gay~~~

And I want everyone to get along and be friends always, but really as far as friend-ships go Abigail/Rozala buddy cop movie currently is far ahead in priority queue ;u;

Soma

Oh damn, I misread when I went to go back and see who made the shapely comment. This is what I get for skimming, but how I got Yanno making that comment about Roz Rather than Roz about Aquiline, I'll never know. I blame that on being up past midnight. You're right EVIDENCE, Tanja's got to watch out, he's got competition.

And fair enough on the friendship priority queue.

Liliet

TBH I'm seeing it as evidence for Cat/Rozala since that's the Rozala ship I'm mostly interested in, but yes ALL the gay Rozala ships are Confirmed Valid ;u;

(We don't know Aquiline is interested in women. We do know about Cat...)

NZPIEFACE

At least people aint reading it as Llllet.

Liliet

...

You know that would be hilarious. Anyone is welcome to do that to themselves if they feel like it~

Death Knight

Same.

RoflCat

I feel like Rozala and Abigail might need to spend a night in the bar together, just to vent out all their misfortunes.

Also, well played Hakram, you genius bastard.

Nairne .01

Are you sure a bar and not inn, one with rooms for the night. I have a hunch they'd need one if it happened.

Liliet

Now speaking of new ships, , ,

Javvies

You fucking idiot Levantines. Well, most of you, Razin seems to be improving.

Also, Cat's going to find out you were torturing her people, and that's not going to go well.

Good job, Hakram. Nicely done.

Heh, Rozala completely bought Cat's bluff and is terrified of what she thinks Cat can do.

Rogue Sorcerer and Archer or Cat and the resurrected Pilgrim? I half think it'll be Rogue and Archer, but Cat and Tariq show up in the end of the next interlude to give a cliffhanger on a Friday interlude and return to Cat on Monday.

TeK

They are not idiots. Look, they even said that they wouldn't mind Callowans, if there weren't any Procerans, whom seemingly allying with Army calls for the possibility of betrayal, since they can't really trust neither of them, even though Procerans only came because they can't trust Levantines not to be bloodthirsty savages, and the communication that could've avoided that misunderstanding is currently impossible due to Levantine traditions. Which, while stupid, also show Proceran stupidity, since their encroaching insistence probably only insulted them more into stubbornness, but what is really amazing is that Procerans seem to have no insight into Levantine customs, since they are just as much an arrogant bunch of shits

So while those two groups of smart people blinded by arrogance and tradition respectively awkwardly dance around each other like me on a date with a pretty girl when I have no clue why she agreed, Deadhand is playing them both while trolling future Dread Empress Accidental as a side effect.

Liliet

Procerans boldly assumed the Levantines were not fucking idiots and acted accordingly. Rozala Did Nothing Wrong, she used the valid tools she had to deescalate the situation. It would have cost Levantines $0.00 to tell the Proceran envoys what exactly the 'sacred ceremony' WAS. They utterly failed to consider what their actions would look like from the side, 'everyone else is treacherous but we are white and fluffy and utterly beyond suspicion'.

TeK

If by "not being fucking idiots" you mean "they would try to murder a woman that in a span of a few hours defeated DK's devil horde and nonchalantly killed Saint, all the while playing everyone else (except Bard, but they don't know it) as a feedle, woman that had also coincidentally and probably accidentally saved them, for the act they were specifically told by Heavens she didn't commit, and also tried to prevent" I politely disagree. This is a textbook definition of suicide by stupidity.

Levantines screwed up too, no denying that. I mean it's nice to see that it's "everyone distrusts everyone" not "everyone distrusts Callow", but you'd figure that fighting a common opponent would bring them a tad closer. Or that literal centuries of coexisting would make some of them at least try to learn about each others customs and perceptions.

Liliet

They know SOME about each other's customs and perception. But note that this was not even the obvious solution to the Levantines, Razin had to suggest it, and Procerans have no way of knowing just how tense the situation is between the four leaders of Blood and how much they can't afford to step even a toe out of the HONOR HONOR HONOR line.

Insanenoodlyguy

Best Orc approached smart though. Didn't say anything about them maybe trying to kill Catherine, just noted how this dishonorable it appeared in context. Argument that actually made sense to their standards instead of a potential insult.

Liliet

Mm! "You're making yourselves look bad, I'm sure this is an accident and you would love to mend it 😊😊😊"

superkeaton

I dearly hope someone says "Look what the Cat dragged in."

TeK

Why noone yet tried to use valerian extract on her as an elaborate insult is beyond me.

Liliet

I guarantee it happened in the orphanage offscreen before the series.

That is, in fact, the real backstory of Cat's enmity towards puns.

TeK

I need an Extra Chapter dedicated to that very thing.

Mental Mouse

??? Valerian works just fine on people (middling-strong sedative), and AIUI does about the same for cats. You might mean catnip, which is a mild stimulant for humans, but apparently a hallucinogen for cats. (I've both brewed and smoked both herbs, back in my wild college days.)

Liliet

Cats really like valerian.

Mental Mouse

Yes, and? A lot of humans really like sedatives too, from chamomile through alcohol and on to the infamous opioids. (That said, valerian tastes nasty to humans.)

Fun trivia: The synthetic opioid Valium was actually named after the herb valerian. The manufacturer was trying to convince prospective buyers that this new "scientific" pill from a distant corporation, was as safe and effective as the herb they were so familiar with.

Liliet

Valerian extract is a very common sedative where I'm from, and it's used as a folk wisdom suggestion to, like, manipulate cats with it. Sprinkle valerian on a scratching post to get them to use it, etc.

Mental Mouse

Here catnip is the big stereotype herb, valerian is much less commonly available. Catnip has the drawback that sometimes cats will act overly weird.

Also some cats are immune to it. I've heard a tale of one cat whose owner's backyard contained the local catnip patch, but this cat was immune. He exploited this to become king of the neighborhood cats... he'd lure his rivals in, wait for them to get stoned out of their skull, and then beat them up. Cats are evil... 😊

Andrew Mitchell

> he'd lure his rivals in, wait for them to get stoned out of their skull, and then beat them up. Cats are evilsmart... 😊

FTFY 😊

Liliet

yeah, in Ukraine valerian is in everyone's medicine cabinet so it's the stereotype herb.

TeK

More of a stereotype, really. Don't know if true or not. But nice for you. Smoking valerian.

Mental Mouse

Safety warning: Only use a little bit of valerian in a smoking mix.

TeK

My only real vice is this web novel.

TeK

"Two people hobbled through it, and just like that the Princess of Aquitan felt the world change."

Aaand it's Archer and Roland, with another gate ripping after this red herring in a Friday's cliffhanger.

Alivaril

I doubt they would be hobbling if it was the Rogue Sorcerer and Archer. Swaying precariously in a drunken stupor, perhaps, but not hobbling.

TeK

In her defence, Archer did die.

caoimhinh

Well, they were beaten quite a bit by Saint before Catherine killed her with the Time Sword. They got some cracked ribs, bruised faces and are really tired, even if Tariq healed the worst wounds (like Indrani's severed hand). Besides, maybe the crossing of that Gate was not very stable, so they are hobbling as they cross.

werafdsaew

Given that they took different paths, nothing says one has to arrive before the other. In fact due to narrative bullshit Pilgrim/Cat probably arrived first.

Mental Mouse

"... such a backache..." Seriously, RS is described as young and reasonably good-looking – do you really want to lay odds Archer didn't jump his bones on the way out?

But no, still Cat and Pilgrim, because it's past time and the sidekicks wouldn't have changed Rozala's world.

caoimhinh

Wait, the original Grim Binder was a woman?

We already had confirmation that the Brigand and the Slayer were also females, legends saying that the conflict between their lines was due to competing for the Grey Pilgrim's affections. Two chapters ago it was confirmed that the original Valiant Champion was a woman too...

Holy shit, the first Peregrine was the only man of his Band of Five, he had a harem of Heroines by his side! He must have been an Isekai Protagonist.

On another note, I'm more inclined to think that those two crossing the gate right now are Archer and Rogue. Too early for Catherine and Pilgrim.

Typos found: The younger pair she only through reports / The younger pair she knew only through reports

TeK

Or just a shonen protagonist. I remember how people started to speculate Laurence was sorta like EMIYA back when Saint was first mentioned.

caoimhinh

Yeah, shonen MC definitely. Japanese style most likely, given how he apparently traveled around with the four of them, but didn't marry any of them, like what happens in most Harem genre jap mangas (it's full of girls in love of MC but he only loves one / marries only one in the end).

For the lulz and because playing with stereotypes is fun, I imagine the four companions of the first Pilgrim to be like this:

-The Valiant Champion would be the big sister of the group, probably would be the one who said "Ara, ara" all the time and had a merry attitude.

-The Bandit was probably a tsundere, getting in fights with the first Pilgrim, yelling and cussing at him without telling him about her true feelings and also get fits of anger when other women approached him.

-The Grim Binder was normally calm but secretly practiced S&M. Likely a kuudere, expressionless most of the time but caring about everyone in the group.

-The Slayer was the yandere of the group, of course. (I mean, just look at Aquiline and her knife-point courtship).

What do you think? Do you imagine them in a different way?

TeK

Nope, you are remarkably on point. Add to it leading a rebellion against a big evil Empire, and you got yourself a merry adventure.

(Spoiler: he also probably married his little sister, which is why they are so obsessed with Blood)

Faiir

Agreed on others, but the Valiant Champion was definitely a genki girl instead.

Andrew Mitchell

Nice pick up. I think I'm so used to gender not mattering in PGtE that I wasn't paying any attention to those details.... Yes, that is my excuse and I'm sticking to it, thank you very much.

Liliet

Please let's stick to not paying attention to those details -
_

caoimhinh

Hahahahaha.

Details are important! One can't just ignore them!

caoimhinh

Well, Gender "doesn't matter" in the sense that there is no discrimination and it makes no difference for absolutely any office, rank, charge or activity (except for Goblins, as they are a Matriarchy), but the use of the proper gender pronoun does matter, as seen when Simon and Basilia were introduced (a transgender man and transgender woman respectively). Men and women tend to be more balanced in number in their groups in Calernia, cases like the first Pilgrim's group and Hanno's original group, where there is only one member of a sex and many of the other, are quite rare.

Nevertheless, I seem to have annoyed Liliet by noticing the gender of the ancient companions of the first Pilgrim (or maybe for pointing out how japanese-MC-like he was).

~~Help me, please. She's got a whole fleet of ships at her back~~

Though I do find it funny that he was the only man in a band of five where two were already said to be rumored to fight over his affections. However, I must emphasize that in no way was my intention to be offensive in any manner.

TeK

Is it weird that I am annoyed by how you should always specify you were not trying to offend anyone the moment you touch gender/sexuality/race topics?

caoimhinh

Not weird at all.

I find it annoying too that someone would get annoyed/offended at the mere mention of gender/sex/race. Given how there is a clear and definite difference between an offensive comment and one that isn't, plus the intent of such are glaringly obvious.

But hey, if someone get angry/annoyed at you for something you didn't intend, saying "sorry, it was not my intention to offend you" seems like the natural thing to do. It is, after all, the truth.

Same principle as if when you are walking on the street and bump into someone accidentally, you apologize and move on.

Liliet

I'm not offended by your mentioning anything, I'm just really fricking annoyed by the entire Japanese genre of any of it. You are not at fault for being aware of its existence, I just respond by pointing out that it's terrible :3

caoimhinh

We are cool then.

Oh, yeah. Harem genre in japanese manga/anime/novel is really annoying. Though it does lives up by feeding up on relationships shipping of many characters, so the fandom is partly to blame for that.

glances meaningfully at the sailing fleet in the distance not so far

Personally I don't like it because it's mostly taken for laughs and teases too much on the romantic advancements while nothing really happens (any two people that got into even a tenth of the situations a japanese MC gets with a love interest would end up dating or sleeping together at the least, but in those stories hundreds of chapters pass without even a kiss, which is outright ridiculous).

Still though, Named do run on stories, so having a Named living a Shonen MC story and thus becoming one of the greatest legends of Calernia makes sense in-universe. XD

Liliet

I fucking hate the gender stereotypes / roles / tropes that it creates/propagates/feeds on. Admittedly they're occasionally funny, but a lot of the time to a lot of people they substitute for understanding of female characters' personality instead of enhancing it. And I fucking hate the culture of 'waifu' that makes use of those, too.

The trope that ticks me off most of all though is the rivalry / love triangle one. "Everyone knows that when two girls are in proximity with each other and a guy the only possible way it goes is that they start squabbling with each other and trying to win the guy's affection." If there weren't people who end up legitimately thinking like that, I wouldn't mind it so much, but...

^-^

~~but Akua is a yandere and Juniper is a tsundere and there's nothing anyone can do about that~~

caoimhinh

Well, each literary genre has its own stereotypes to play with.

For example, the recent years Young Adult novels had the love triangle of "female protagonist with two hot guys fighting over her attention and she is confused about who she loves, even though the book already told us that she loves only one of them", with movie adaptations making it worse.

As for personality types (yandere, tsundere, kuudere, etc), there's a wide variety of them and while fandom usually tends to overgeneralize and encapsulate an entire character into a single defining personality trait (even if it's the most important trait of that character), the reality is that there's plenty of depth to characters, and that shines when the authors dedicate one or more chapters to that character. A famous example is Mahou Sensei Negima (manga) with an almost an entire classroom of almost 30 girls romantically interested in the MC and the manga constantly plays with that and the interactions Negi has with each of the girls, displaying each of their personalities and how they develop their feeling for him (some love him, some lust after him, some respect him, some admire him as a role model, etc). Most importantly, even though it is a significant element of the manga and most of the girls play a significant role in supporting Negi accomplish his goals in life, THE STORY IS NOT ABOUT THAT. Despite the fandom's constant focus on romance and the speculation about which one of the girls is the one to become Negi's wife, the manga actually moves on to a wide variety of subjects like politics, racial issues, many martial arts and magic battles, plus the desire for connection between people and the salvation of the world through combined efforts.

Of course, the fans of Negima mostly didn't give a crap about that, they would raise their battleships of NegixAsuna against NegixNodoka and NegixChisame, and that's what people would mostly see online and in forums as that's the subject that heated up the debates and kept their attention, especially on the US and Japan where the actual main clientele and target audience was.

Sometimes, it's a market decision.

There's plenty of examples of playing with stereotypes (both in a straight manner and in an inverse manner) in literature, but the most glaring and famous examples are in manga and anime.

Liliet

>For example, the recent years Young Adult novels had the love triangle of “female protagonist with two hot guys fighting over her attention and she is confused about who she loves, even though the book already told us that she loves only one of them”, with movie adaptations making it worse.

Liliet

Well htis accidentally posted before I actually commented on it.

So the thng is, this one’s also annoying and tiring, but unlike the ‘girl instantly crushes on guy’ one I at least find this one relatable and true to life. Consider the eternal trope of “gets the girl as a reward”: girls are taught by culture that actually we are totally supposed to pick the more “deserving” candidate rather than the one we actually like, which makes sorting out which one we actually do like and which one is more deserving and which one plays into interesting tropes but we don’t really give a shit about... it’s not exactly a trivial task.

Saying “no” to someone who appears like They Would Be Hurt By That is not exactly taught at schools.

So... yeah. A girl utterly confused in a romantic situation of several suitors interested in her is only too real.

Liliet

>A famous example is Mahou Sensei Negima (manga) with an almost an entire classroom of almost 30 girls romantically interested in the MC

TBH as an aroace girl who is constantly expected by everyone around her to WANT A BOYFRIEND OR BETTER YET A HUSBAND I would rather step away slowly and not look in that direction.

Like, girls not being interested despite being in a hot/interesting guys' proximity is my jam, here.

caoimhinh

To each, their own. And our tastes from ten years ago tend to be different to the ones we have now, as we have matured and refined our tastes, usually looking for more quality and discarding certain literary genres in favor of others. Though I assure you this manga is worth reading (fair warning, the first dozen or so chapters might annoy you if ecchi comedy is not your thing, but if you pass that the comedy becomes better and the serious plot starts to develop too, with very interesting characters).

There's more to it than the absurd amount of love interests for the boy and the ecchi scenes, as I mentioned in the other comment, there's politics, action and lots of character development, and the romance doesn't all center on the MC; there are other couples in the story too, some involving teenage girls of the class, some involving the adults, and some with characters met later in the story, including one lesbian couple (this being a japanese story, it's pretty uncommon unless the story centers on them), some platonic relationships, some characters remain single through the whole story, and there are some asexual characters, there's a robot, a ghost too. Each of the characters has their own motivations for befriending Negi and they all interact with him in unique ways, even the girls attracted to him express it on different manners, which gives the story an interesting development.

Also, there's a reason for why it has that sub-plot with so many girls after the MC, actually: The editor forced the author to do it, since the author's previous work "Love Hina" had been such a success after using in an innovative (for the time) way the harem tag in a manga, along with ecchi comedy.

Ken Akamatsu (the author) actually wanted an adventure/action manga, but the editorial wanted to ride on the formula of his previous successful work, so he had to accept and had the first couple of volumes being pure comedy with some ecchi situations, and then BAM! action started and Negi started learning martial arts plus using his magic for combat, then demons appeared, then rogue mages, and plot escalated from there.

Though the most laudable thing is that despite the initial way that the author had most of the girls romantically interested in Negi, they had huge character development and they each pursue their own goals in their own ways, most of them getting over their initial attraction to him, instead behaving in more serious manner as they grow up; near the end, only about 5 of the girls are still interested in him in a romantic manner (which considering the initial number being close to 30, is a huge change).

The end result was very good and something not foreseeable from the early chapters, as the series gradually takes a more serious tone despite having started as a fluffy comedy. There are all kinds of stories out there, and even the ones who start in a way can end completely different, and even those that are famous for one of its traits have a lot more to offer than that.

Though of course, everyone has different tastes, so it's impossible for a story to be liked by everyone, but I would advise giving it a chance (to the manga, the anime adaptation sucked).

Liliet

I believe you that it's good, but wow I'm still incredibly not interested.

Works can be good and still hold 0 of my interest
-_-

caoimhinh

That happens. As I said before, to each their own, it's a natural consequence of people having different tastes that even great works of a particular style or genre will not attract some people, because they don't like that particular genre

Liliet

Mhm!

caoimhinh

Faiir

I think that character stereotypes in LN/WN make it easy for new writers to add characters that are not clones of each other and can be developed further in the future.

Especially in web novels, when a writer doesn't have a long term plan, you can often see how a writer figures out what a character is actually about only after some time.

If the choice is between a stereotype or a completely bland character in the meantime, I'd rather have a stereotype.

shieldredblog

If you think Shonen is bad, try reading a Wuxia.

caoimhinh

Well, at least in Wuxia and Xianxia there is sex and marriage between the characters and their love interests, not many years and hundreds of episodes of them getting half-naked and then going back to their lives pretending it didn't happen until the next time they get into a romantic situation and get half-naked again (played for laughs because japanese humor uses ecchi situations for that instead of taking them seriously).

At least in chinese stories if there's two people naked, there's going to be some action. XD

Ιούλιος Καίσαρας

Well, I also find it annoying in general but here the author either on purpose or by accident made one such cliché and I find it hilarious (more so if he did it by accident).

Liliet

But he didn't do the cliché. He did the prerequisites for it and then absolutely didn't do the cliché itself. Which is refreshing and wonderful.

Raivshard

Yeah, it's certainly not a romance. The main character might be a bisexual horndog, but that's more of an amusing sidenote to be trotted out for the occasional giggle.

Liliet

>We already had confirmation that the Brigand and the Slayer were also females, legends saying that the conflict between their lines was due to competing for the Grey Pilgrim's affections.

Wait, did it say explicitly that they were female (it's not a noun btw), or are you assuming there?

Also, Hanno was a man leading a band of women, and there was a whole lot of nothing out of it.

Also, do we have confirmation the original Grey Pilgrim was male?

caoimhinh

1) Fair enough, but I think Yannu used female pronouns when he mentioned that legend (which he dismissed as mere superstitions and said that the real reason for their conflict was over resources).

2) Hanno is very careful of how he relates with other people, though I recall there was some flirting between him and one of the sisters. Nevertheless, a man in a group of females doesn't necessarily have to be in a relationship with any of them, of course, I'm just point it out for the lulz and because there was already "gossip" of two of that team's members fighting over the Pilgrim's affections.

3) Yes, original Grey Pilgrim was male, the Athem of Smoke specifically uses male pronouns when mentioning him (tattered his war, tattered his throne), it was also stated as such by Tariq when he recalled the story of the first use of Shine (the boy become a man pucked a star from the heavens and light the first torch of rebellion).

Liliet

Right, thank you.

I'm just really annoyed by this kind of gendered trope approach. Hanno's band was a balm of my soul specifically BECAUSE literally nobody in-universe thought about it like that for even a second.

(He might have flirted with Irina, the Ashen Priestess, they had cordial conversations at least. Not sure if flirting, but yeah it's possible)

Shveiran

Hanno's band felt kind of flat to me, but I get what you are saying.

Personally, I really like how most of Calernia's rulers and best generals are female without anyone making a big deal about it. The Guide is all like that, which is why THAT particular band of Heroes didn't really stand out.

Liliet

YES.

Faiir

Maybe it's a language barrier, but "a group of males" or "a group of females" ALWAYS makes me think of animals rather than people, documentary style:

"And now the crocodile is starting his mating dance infront of a group of females."

Liliet

Same. Not a great habit i m h o -_-

Not to mention the Calamities include a classic tsundere, a gay best friend, a kouhai, a shapeshifter and the MC who still went for the childhood friend.

Liliet

Only made more amazing by the whole 'was briefly attracted to her but squashed that with extreme prejudice because she's a lesbian, ended up basically platonically married for 40 years and lecturing a nephew about qp partnerships' thing.

Taking a cliché and making the characters and dynamics in it alive, bright and whole enough that the cliché is absolutely unrecognizable as a result is a thing Guide does best.

werafdsaew

Where do you find that the original Binder was a woman?

caoimhinh

This part of the chapter:

It was an old jape back home that the true talent of the Tanjas was not the magic of their famous ancestress but in truth the wealth that flowed through the canals of Malaga

Liliet

Good catch!

Fayhem

> We already had confirmation that the Brigand and the Slayer were also females, legends saying that the conflict between their lines was due to competing for the Grey Pilgrim's affections.

I honestly don't remember that passage so I can't say necessarily, but if the confirmation you're referring to is just that legend says they were competing for OG Pilgrim's affections... that's not confirmation. Calernia is confirmed LGBT-friendly; OG Pilgrim could potentially be bi or gay rather than straight.

> Too early for Catherine and Pilgrim.

Dawn is exactly the correct time for Pilgrim to be showing up. Remember, they're moving through Arcadia; their speed is based on narrative time much more than physical time.

Nairne .01

How people keep forgetting Made to was there as well. Or was he gated by Ivah?

Nairne .01

Masego*

Damn phones and autocorrect

TeK

Yes, he was. He left well before most of the confusing fuckery has had happened.

IDKWhoitis

Thinking about, Noone in that tent has actually seen Hakram fight. He wasn't at the battle of the Camps or hasn't been waving his axe around much in the Procerean campaign.

And if Cat shows up, we know his combat potential only goes up, to back her up.

Unfortunately, Cat may be tapped, with several large miracles, the absence of strong story, and Dawn.

Although that's never stopped Cat from lying through her teeth and smoking a pipe non chalantly while dragging Tariq by a foot across a gate.

They saw her end Saint, so they must have some degree of fear of her. And she has ruined a small armies before, both Lev and Prócer, so Dread Massacre's saying about committing an act before that rings in every silence may be enough to silence them in turn.

Shveiran

Cat is at a disadvantage, without a strong story... when she comes back after saving them all, after raising the Pilgrim with a Choir's blessing, and has the Favored Son of Levant standing by her side?

I... can't say I see it.

Power-wise? Sure. She is tapped out, and dawn means the drows are too. But she has a shit-ton of narrative weight, not the other way around.

This is the DENOUMENT. The Story pushes for her to have an happy ending and for the tension to ebb, not the other way around.

Valkyria

Hakram you smug little bastard. He just can't help playing the big mysterious – maybe human eating – orc.
Poor Princess, doesn't know what she signed up for.

Sparsebeard

And here the pure-bred Liessan charger and it's Tyran are coming out of the portal...

SITB

'Callowans being physically incapable of halfway edible cooking' god bless this goofy national stereotype

TeK

In their defence, they probably created it just to spite Praesi raiding for food. You are hungry? Weeell, we got plenty of food, make yourself comfortable. What's wrong, why are you puking?

Liliet

It's because they are British. Have been in Britain, can confirm: the stereotype is based on TRUTH

Raivshard

Yeah, and unlike the British, they have yet to integrate Indian & Chinese cuisine (which also leads back to spices).

TeK

I think they made up British cuisine just to troll everyone. Like, they probably have entirely another TRUE British cuisine, and stereotyped one is for foolish foreigners.

Liliet

CHIPS WITH VINEGAR

A legit existent in Britain thing is CHIPS WITH VINEGAR

Darkening

And? That's delicious.

Liliet

Ok so here's the thing. When I was in Britain it was on a study exchange program where we the kids were placed with families. We ate the family cooking for breakfast and dinner (and the less said about me vs boiled vegetables dinners + trying to be polite the better), and we were given pre-arranged / pre-packed lunches. They contained a sandwich, some drink, maybe something else small I don't remember, but also A PACKET OF CHIPS.

With random flavor.

I appreciate the existence of odd flavors, I really do, yay diversity. But when faced with a choice to eat vinegar flavored chips or go hungry,,, well, I ate them every time. But I will NEVER stop grumbling about it.

Aotrs Commander

As A British Person (and more specifically, An English Person~), I feel a couple of points should be made here.

a) This means by extension, Catherine is British, HAH, victory for us, suck it the rest of the world! Now she's even more awesome.

(Extra bonus points, fellow British Persons, what regional accent should she have...?)

b) At least British cuisine has decent puddings and is actually edible, as opposed to everywhere else which insists on stuffing things full of random inedible vegetables, fungi or spices.

Heck, even British cuisine tends to do that; frankly, anything other than some form of potatoes and baked beans in addition to the meat is completely unnecessary.

Salt-and-vinegar crisps I will agree are as largely irrelevant as putting salt and vinegar on your actual chips (from the fish-and-chip shop), given that the One True Condiment – the ONLY condiment, all others are lies – tomato sauce contains both already (well, maybe not the salt if you get the healthy options available), especially since tomato sauce flavour crisps exist, which are, of course, the Best Crisps. (Or Worcester Sauce for the peasants.)

And anything at breakfast that is not explicitly cereal is heresy and should be burned, preferably with some form of high-energy particle beam.

Euodiachloris

Oi, I take offense to that. I'm on Team Brown Sauce. HP or Daddies', not picky; but brown over red every day of the week.

Except with fish and chips, of course: curry sauce and mushy peas for me with me chips, tartare and vinegar/lemon for the fish. 😊

Liliet

>Heck, even British cuisine tends to do that; frankly, anything other than some form of potatoes and baked beans in addition to the meat is completely unnecessary.

Honestly if the British cuisine was the way you described I'd probably call it the second most edible cuisine in the world after Japanese.

Fuck. Random. Inedible. Vegetables.

Tomato sauce is the best condiment, agreed wholeheartedly.

What about toast for breakfast?

Tj

Ooh Imagine if Cat was a scouser or a Geordie?

Mental Mouse

Hey, I like salt-and-vinegar potato chips! But in Britain, I suspect you mean a "packet of crisps". "Chips" to them are something quite different..

Liliet

Right.

That.

Euodiachloris

If I were to, say, have your address, I might be tempted to send you some Monster Munch that would definitely not be Pickled Onion flavour. And, it wouldn't come with a request to see your face upon trying them. At all.

Nope. 😊

Be glad Twiglets very definitely haven't crossed my mind, either... xD

Clmineith

Callow is Britain? What?! Since when?!

The history of Great Britain is basically characterized by how difficult it is to invade, being an island and with neighbors only on one side and all. Not to mention the place were never that good to produce food.

I know there is the Alban/Albion thing, but it's not enough in my opinion. Like, Procer have a lot of french names, but their political system is closer to the Holy Roman Empire.

TeK

Holy Roman Empire at start kinda WAS French though. Then again, Daoine is pretty much England(?), with longbowmen, celtic names and language, etc. And it's technically part of Callow. Than there are semiindependent goat herding people at the north... I am sure someone more familiar with British culture and history can spot more similarities. Aside from names commonly used and unedible cuisine.

Faiir

Also note that neither English not French were known much for their horse.

I wonder what other European country was known for being invaded from East and West and was known for their heavy cavalry 😊

Fayhem

At a guess I'd say I'm responding to a Pole here? I'm skeptical that was actually the inspiration for Callow given that Callowan names don't sound especially Slavic and most Calernian cultures get names that at least kinda-sorta-roughly line up with their inspiration RL cultures (Daoine being the notable exception off the top of my head). That said, if you left that out then yeah that's not a half-bad parallel at all. Being stubborn as fuck after being invaded lines up too; the French Resistance gets all the glory (at least in the West) but I know the Polish Resistance honestly did a lot more in WWII.

That said, at least in the medieval era the French at least were ABSOLUTELY known for their heavy cavalry. The English longbowmen weren't getting charged by foot or light horse at Agincourt and Crecy. I don't know that the English used all that much heavy horse in actual history (somebody who knows more feel free to correct me), but the mythological history of Britain that tends to get drawn on more heavily for Fantasy British very strongly foregrounds King Arthur and his Knights of the Round Table, and knights were the quintessential heavy horse of the medieval era.

Faiir

Well I don't really see countries in the Guide as direct parallels to actual historical ones – each seems more like a mix of at least two.

You're right about French horse – literally the first image I found after googling it was Pappenheim's Cuirassiers 😊

Fayhem

> Daoine is pretty much England

IIRC we have Word of EE that Daoine is actually ethnically (and apparently culturally, not that we've gotten any Deoraithe POVs outside of Duchess Kegan on campaign which I don't personally feel really counts on a cultural level) more closely based on the Native American Iroquois confederation than on anything else.

Which is ofc kind of confusing since their names all sound quite Celtic AFAICT, and as far as my limited cultural knowledge can tell me everybody else on Calernia seems to get names that more or less line up with their inspiration RL cultures. Which is why even though Cat is actually mixed-race (and has been explicitly tagged as having darker-than-regular-Callowan skin in AFAIK every book) people in the comments sometimes keep thinking she's white, since half-Callowan and half-Irish doesn't really suggest the same thing that half-Callowan and half-Native American does.

Anyway, Callow is "British/English" in what I think is deliberately the very generic way that fantasy protagonist cultures are stereotypically Assumed British Unless Proven Otherwise. If the similarities aren't super historically close I think it's because the sheer genericness is the point; to subvert a trope you have to start with something recognizable as a version of the trope for your base, and stereotypical Generic Fantasy British cultures tend to very much earn the first word in that title.

Clmineith

I dunno, I think it's a mistake to try and determine what real world country is what Calernia nation. I think that every nations were inspired by multiple real world countries, but every RW country inspired several nations.

Callow + Procer are pretty much a mix of Europa. Callow has Praes is more Turkey, with Rome and some other influences? Maybe? But Turkey is also in some of the Dominion...

This way it allow things to be recognizable without being not!england an not!france and not!poland, etc.

Fayhem

I'd agree that it's a mistake to try to align them too closely, yeah. They do have inspirations that are visible and I think it's fine to discuss those inspirations in the spirit of fun, but I def agree that these shouldn't be taken as actual representations of any RL cultures/nations.

Andrew Mitchell

THIS. It's a bit of fun, and that's all it is.

Liliet

Daoine are Irish AND Native American at the same time. Nothing says erratic can't base one fictional ethnicity on two IRL ones!

caoimhinh

Well, most of the countries in Calernia (and some mentioned from beyond Calernia, like the Yan Tei, Baalite, Miezán, the Yaminine and the Salamdeul) are loosely based on a culture from Earth, but the similarities rarely go beyond language and physical traits, since they all have completely different stories than their inspirations. Not to mention there's magic involved.

Some examples I have noticed:

-The Kingdom of Callow is inspired by Britain. The country name comes from the story stereotype that "a callow youth would rise to fight evil". You can also notice their english names of Callowan characters, their legend about the sword in stone, and their ancient rulers being the Alban dynasty.

-Daoine is inspired by Irland. The country name comes from the irish word that means "people". You can notice their names are celtic/irish names.

-The Dread Empire of Praes is inspired by Africa. Their three ethnicities being: the dark-skinned Soninke representing native africans, the tanned sand-colored Taghreb representing something similar to Arabs, and the white-skinned Duni (Amadeus is one of these) that are descendants of foreigners that settled in norther Praes. Mthawe is their most spoken language but the Taghreb have another language too. Their capital Ater, seems to me like the latin word Attero which means something like “wasteful” but has many other meanings. It was said that the name comes from a Miezan word.

-The Miezan Empire is roughly similar to the Roman Empire, having conquered many lands and slaved Praes. They came from beyond the Tyrian Sea, and are the ones who elevated mathematics in Calernia and advanced spellcraft, built marvels of engineering and heavily influenced many of the cultures there. They were fought back and repelled after centuries of occupation, and are the reason all ethnicities in Praes (including Orcs, Goblins and Ogres) hate slavery.

-The Principate of Procer is inspired by Europe. We have seen they have 3 different ethnicities: Lycaonese (who are the northern badass who always dedicate themselves to fight against the Rattlings and the Dead King), the Alamans (which live in central Procer) and the Arlesite (which live in the south). We have seen that Procer, being such a huge agglomeration of people and having different cultures joined in one, has different languages but the most famous is Chantant which is their equivalent to french.

-The Dominion of Levant has the Majilis as their ruling council, which is an Arabic term, though the similarities mostly end there, given as their culture and social laws are vastly different than those of Islamic countries to my knowledge (which is, in all fairness, limited, so if someone can add something here please do so).

-The League of Free Cities consists of an alliance of city-states that have greek names, but it's worth noticing that even though they have many similitudes to the Greek Polis, none of them can be an exact match to any real-life city-state of ancient times.

For example: one of them, Atalante, resembles Athens in their love for debates and exercises of rethoric, while the only one with Democracy is Bellerophon. Stygia practices slavery and trains their slave-soldiers to fight in Phalanxes, while the ones who seem to have a more spartan regime and war-like mentality are those from Helike.

-The culture of Sephirah, whose capital was Keter, the city of the Dead King Neshamah, is based on Israel, with people names being Jewish names and the places being named after Cabalistic terms.

This is all without mentioning the magical races in Calernia and the grand nations beyond the Tyrian Sea (the Wandering Bard stated that the Elves' domain is bigger than the entirety of that continent). It's a really vast and fascinating world EE has created in Practical Guide to Evil.

Javvies

Britain being difficult to invade is really only a relatively modern thing.

More specifically, it really only coincides with England becoming a naval power. And that's only been the case for a few hundred years.

In fact, for most of the Dark Ages and well into the medieval period, Britain was regularly being raided, invaded, and subsequently settled by the invaders.

Every wonder where the term Anglo-Saxon came from? Two different groups that invaded and settled in Britain – the Angles and the Saxons ... IIRC, both have Germanic (or proto-germanic) roots.

Then there's the Vikings/Norse (several waves, really), and before them the Romans, and after them, the root cause of the Hundred Years War – the Duke of Normandy, aka William the Conqueror, French, albeit of Norse descent (the Norse more or less claimed/extorted Normandy from the French Crown, hence the name). And before the Romans you had the Celts replacing the Picts.

There's a reason the English language is such a mess – it's in part because Britain was the punching bag of Europe for centuries. And everybody brought their own language to the party, and bits and pieces from each one got amalgamated into common use and thus the common tongue.

Morgenstern

They just meant when it comes to food, I'm quite sure, judging by the food stuff discussion above. 😊

Liliet

Callow is Britain because their names are British, their language – Lower Miezian – is just English, and their cooking is known to be inedible.

Oh, and appearance.

HRE included France's territory, didn't it? Procer has three languages: the Lycaonese one that's just German, Chantant that's just French, and Tolesian which is probably Italian. Or Spanish.

The country parallels aren't completely literal.

caoimhinh

I remember in the early chapters Catherine justified it by saying that spices were rare in Callow, due to their high prices and the state of the country as a conquered province of Praes.

Later on, she was made fun of by the members of the 15th because she lacks cooking skills, thus living to the stereotype, which she justified by saying that she was not the housekeeping type of person.

Further later on, she mentioned that indeed the cuisine was better in Praes, but she missed some of the snacks from Callow, and managed to get a small victory because Masego and others were really hung on Callowan pies and tarts.

Liliet

♥ ♥ ♥

Mental Mouse

If they're indeed modeled on the English... well, supposedly the real reason England conquered half the planet, was to get their hands on some decent food! 😊

Shveiran

To be fair, I could unrepentantly kill for some good fudge. I tried it like twice, and the months since have been oppressed by the weight of their absence.

Cold Cyberia

Just FYI, the chapter's not showing up in the table of contents (at least for me).

kek

"Dawn is near" -Archer (circa 7 chapters ago : D)

Someguy

TBH, the political outcome of this is not Rozala's problem. She hates Cordelia, she can kick this upstairs for it to be Cordelia's headache. Rozala has already fulfilled her tasks to both letter and spirit.

Liliet

Rozala cares about the country and about the eventual outcome. Her and Cordelia are genuinely full on 100% striving for the same outcome allies here, no matter how much Rozala hates that fact.

matrixm

YYEESSSSSSSS

And we'll played Haram, I thought it strange that he seemed to be acting so hastily.

Liliet

MHM

It's still a plan Catherine wouldn't have okayed if she were available for consultation, but it's much better than what it LOOKED like at least

Mental Mouse

Before even reading the chapter, I noticed that the "Previous" link skips right past the extra chapter "Seed I".

Steve

"... Well, this is awkward."

caoimhinh

Pilgrim: Hello. What's going on?

Levantines: He's alive! How is this possible?

Rozala: We saw the Pilgrim die!

Catherine: What? How!?

Hakram: Dream visions, started a couple hours ago, showed your journey, not complete.

Catherine: Urgh, stupid Angels, almost caused another war. Even though they promised. Typical...

grumbles into the distance

shieldredblog

This whole world changing thing makes me think I might have been right. Something had to have visibly and obviously changed, something other than the Pilgrim just actually not being dead.

So..The Pilgrim did keep the Twilight Crown and is now Fae levels of sexy.

Shveiran

Not necessarily. I mean, Cat bringing back the Peregrine from the dead, walking by his side before the Blood? Levant will not stand for considering her an enemy.

That is the precedent Cat has been after... and not because it DOESN'T change things 😊

Liliet

I think just his appearance side by side with Catherine here... does the trick

whlindsa

Predictions for A Practical Guide To Evil:

Robber:

Robber will survive the story (obviously), and win the hand of the fair Pickler, fairest of all Goblin maidens, in marriage...by the simple expedient of stabbing the Dead King repeatedly, then setting him on fire, and then using copious amounts of goblin munitions to blow the corpse to pieces, and then stealing his heart and running like hell before the lich can pull himself back together. He may have allowed some of the rest of the cast to help him with this, just to make them feel useful, because his legendary magnanimity is really his greatest trait, it really is. Either way, it is more than sufficient dowry to allow a nobody like him to wed the fair Pickler, and, hell, father as many children as he physically can, because, fuck, man, what goblin Matron wouldn't want to have the kids of the goblin who stole the Dead King's heart in her tribe. Within five hundred years, one out of every three goblins in the world will be a direct descendant of Robber.

As time goes on, it will become obvious that the name of Robber has become not just a name, but a Name, and the only one that the goblins possess that is not immediately erased because the surface dwellers found out about it. Among the court in Laure, the title of Lesser Lesser Footrest will continue, and will become the official designation for the person who has been named as second in command of the Kingdom's spy ring, and the one who is primarily responsible for managing the Court's covert operations. Despite the rumors to the contrary, this position is not always held by a goblin, and there have been many very famous agents of the Crown who have gone on to become Lesser Lesser Footrest despite being sadly un-goblinoid, but there do seem to be an awful lot of goblins in that position, don't there? Eventually, things will come full circle, and the latest holder of the Name of Robber will become the Lesser Lesser Footrest once again, just in time to almost single-handedly save the Calernia from the Dead King's eventual resurgence. He might, graciously, allow a few other Names to play a minor part in assisting him in this task, because every goblin Named Robber is really a prince at heart, and full of grace and generosity, but let's face it, when you need to absolutely murderize everybody in the room, goblins just really don't have any equals.

Pickler: Pickler will eventually marry Robber, because, damn, that's a really impressive marriage gift, and, let's face it, where else is a girl going to find a man who's willing to give her a collection of eyeballs that nice? Especially one who's willing to give up his entire collection of eyeballs, which may or may not require several wagons to cart around, and display properly, but we're not admitting to anything, because the quartermaster still owes her a favor or twenty. She and Robber eventually settle down in the hills of South March, where they become some of the most famous goblins alive, and found the goblins' next big center of population.

As she grows older, Pickler will continue to develop more and more advanced and innovative siege engines, with the end result that these machines will come to be called Pickler engines by most of the surface dwellers of Calernia, although, as always, the military will continue to stiffly insist on their formal nomenclature, even thousands of years after everybody else has just given up and started calling them by their real name.

Pickler will eventually be paid an outrageous amount of money by the Kingdom Under to knock it off, already, because this kind of arms race is getting expensive, dammit, and will retire to a life of ease, comfort, and relatively little scheming, where she can concentrate on things like building bridges, fortresses, and figuring out new and innovative ways to destroy those same fortresses without designing new siege engines to do the job, because, really, a girl's got to have a hobby.

Catherine Foundling:

Dread Empress of Calernia. Sort of whether she wants to be or not, at this point. Eventually, after four or five decades of rule, she decides that Calernia is stable enough for her to step down, and hands off rule of the continent to her chosen successor, while she retires to become a hermit, a scholar, a sage, and a teacher.

Hakram Deadhand:

He's still with Catherine come the sequel, but now he has two prosthetic hands. The inhabitants of the village where they live have just learned to ignore this little quirk.

Amadeus of the Green Stretch:

Amadeus will be sent as the single reinforcement for the Lycaonese provinces, because, really, certain things have to be done in a very particular order if they're going to defeat the Dead King for reals, and giving Amadeus actual backup would not just be overkill, it would actively distort the timetable they need to accomplish. I mean, yeah, sure, the man has lost the Name of Black Knight, but let's face it—all that means is that he isn't destined to lose, and doesn't have to throw Fate a bone any longer.

After the Uncivil Wars, he will retire to Refuge to live the rest of his days out with Hye. A hundred and fifty years later, his two oldest children will be kidnapped by slavers from Mercantis, and sold as slaves to across the Tyrian Sea. By the time Hye and Amadeus track down the slavers, retrace the route of the slaves, find a ship to get them across the Sea, and then finally catch up with their offspring, the two of them will have singlehandedly reversed the collapse of the Miezian Empire, and the new Infernal Miezian Empire will have restored order to the lands surrounding Styrbolgis Minor, and will conquer most of the continent on which the city of Miez was first built in the name of Catherine Foundling and the Holy Light. Oh yeah, and the Heavens probably feature in there somewhere, too. Ironically, this new Empire will not include the city of Miez. Hye will think that every aspect of this entire situation is completely and utterly hilarious, and she will tease Amadeus mercilessly about it for forever. Nobody knows why Amadeus seems to continue to display Villainous traits, despite no longer being a Villain, but the smart money is on him somehow blackmailing the Gods, or possibly having somehow stolen the angel's corpse out of the lake by Sallia.

Traitorous:

I am reasonably certain that Traitorous is, in fact, not dead, since I have seen no indication that the Praesi Highborn of the time elected to conduct a sufficiently exhaustive battery of tests upon his supposed corpse to settle the matter once and for all. I also find it very suspicious that a Dread Emperor could be undone by something as mundane as simple poison, especially since Names are supposed to be able to shrug off most poisons, and, more, that an Imperial Concubine would have sufficiently unfettered access to allow her to obtain said poison without anybody being aware of it. There is a strong possibility that Ime is actually Traitorous in disguise, and that the two of them will run away together to join in unholy wedlock after Catherine comes knocking.

Where is he now? What is he doing? Why is he doing it? What does he REALLY want? And can we definitively prove that the entire series is not the end result of one of Traitorous's plots, or that Traitorous has not lied to the author, and/or has not had Erratic Errata assassinated and replaced by a shapeshifting devil that has been specifically trained to be able to act as Erratic Errata's body double? There is no real way to know the answer to these questions.

Liliet

>Names are supposed to be able to shrug off most poisons, and, more, that an Imperial Concubine would have sufficiently unfettered access to allow her to obtain said poison

Holy shit.

Named being un-poison-able might or might not be an actual plot hole wrt Alaya and Nefarious.

Then again, apparently the 'burning out poison' trick needs to be used consciously, and if he didn't realize he was poisoned it wouldn't work.

And Assassin tried to poison Hanno's band, so the simplest answer is Praes has anti-Named poison.

Never mind, we're good.

Shveiran

Nasty Praesi tricks.

Erasing Plot-holes ever since the Secret Wars.

Ask not how big a mess your nasty Praesi trick will make, but rather what new, exiting, nasty Praesi trick you'll get to use to "clean it up".

Nasty Praesi tricks: a self-growth industry.

Because remember: if it is nasty, it could be nastier.

Nasty Presi tricks: coming now to you through Mercantis. Get them now before the Black Queen crucifies all provviders.

caoimhinh

Yeah, there are poisons that are too fast for Named to burn out of their systems, and also Alchemical/Magical poisons that can kill them.

They can actually be killed with anything if it's used appropriately, arrows usually don't work on Named, yet Amadeus used arrows to kill the Commander decades ago. Curses, spells and rituals can kill a Named, but Named can also fight it back if they are strong enough or aware of it, for example, Black slapped aside one of Wekesa's little spells that he was using to troll him in one of the Villainous Interludes, while Catherine and Ranger can cut through sorcery.

caoimhinh

I would just like to point out that the Dread Emperor that Imperial Concubine Alaya killed was Nefarious.

Traitorous has been dead for many decades, if not centuries, and he poisoned himself but framed 17 different rivals for his death, causing political turmoil, speculation and fierce competition among the claimants of the throne.

"Just as planned" is written on his tomb.

sengachi

I love how amazing Hakram is at keeping his eye on the bigger picture while everyone else is scrambling about reacting to stuff.

mavant

This cliffhanger will be the death of me.

Andrew Mitchell

Don't fret. It's only about six hours until we get the next chapter. 😊

caoimhinh

You mean, the next cliffhanger. Hahahaha.

Andrew Mitchell

Probably... Although, cliffhangers seem to be the new normal these days and not just reserved for Fridays. 😊

epokki

test

StarlightGlimmer

Cat will make Hakram teach Abigail everything he knows about logistics. Abigail will cry on the inside.

Chapter 52: Recovery

"Negotiation with your ruler, my lord, is like treading the edge of a hidden pit filled with man-eating tapirs. Unrelated, but before we further discuss taxation would you take a single step to the left?"

– Dread Empress Atrocious

Dawn broke through the night sky, revealing bared steel.

That, I considered, was a lot of swords. Shame about the way the people wielding those seemed inclined to point them in my direction. Princess Rozala, who was here for some reason, immediately began shouting for the pack of Levantine warriors surrounding us to sheathe their blades, which went largely ignored. Almost like some Proceran princess screaming out orders at people her ancestors had invaded hadn't gone over well with this particular crowd. Who'd have thought? Hakram, who was there because he was a prince among men, strode forward ignoring all the shouting and the foreign priests looking like someone had kicked over their anthill. After going through his cloak pockets he produced a nice little wooden pipe and stuffed it with wakeleaf, at my unspoken invitation putting it up against my lip and scratching out a match to light it. A few puffing breaths later I breathed in the smoke, breathed it out and let out a pleased moan before facing the angry shouting crowd.

"Right," I got out around the pipe's lip, "you all seem to be very concerned about something and I don't want to, uh, diminish that. But I also don't speak Lunara, so we're at a bit of an impasse."

"That was mostly Ceseo, in truth," the Grey Pilgrim rasped out.

His speaking triggered another round of shouting while I pondered the complexities of smoking a pipe without having a free hand for it. I had one holding up Tariq's doddering frame, slipped under his shoulder to let him stand, while the other was busy keeping me up by leaning on my staff. Our journey here through Twilight Throneless had been somewhat less than graceful, though I'd been rather amused by the fact that the first set of stairs we'd encountered on our way out of Liesse had probably come closer to killing either of us that night than Kairos.

"Figured they'd be a little happier to see you, Tariq, I'm not gonna lie," I mused. "Would you care to translate?"

The old man cocked his head to the side.

"To put it delicately," the Peregrine said, "questions are being raised as to the authenticity of my person."

"Oh?" I mouthed back, grinning nastily around my pipe. "Did someone call you an undead abomination yet? That's always been one my favourites."

"You're enjoying this a great deal more than you should," the Grey Pilgrim muttered.

"Someone else being called that?" I murmured. "Never. That would be highly petty of me, after all."

A heartbeat passed.

"Maybe they'll name you Arch-heretic of the West," I suggested. "Wouldn't that be something?"

I wasn't sure whether what shook him was a cough or a snort, but it ripped through his frame suddenly enough it very much did become a cough. My use of his resurrection trick was apparently a little rough around the edges compared to his personal touch, and he'd not been a young man to begin with. And if that hadn't been enough, I still remembered what it'd felt like having an aspect cut out of me. Tariq had been dead when I'd ripped Forgive out of his corpse, so he'd been spared the inhuman pain I'd felt when Masego carved Seek out of my soul, but losing a third of your Name was nothing something to be shrugged off. Especially when you'd had your aspects as long as the Grey Pilgrim had. A quartet of Levantines seemed to be getting deferred to by even the Lanterns, who were visibly itching to have a go at Tariq and I, and one's familiar face told me why: Razin Tanja was among them, which meant they were Blood. I waved at him from the Pilgrim's side, wiggling my hand against the old man's flank, but my treasured acquaintance seemed rather offended by the act. Fancy that, I drily thought. I'd always got on so well with Levantines.

"Queen Catherine, please," Princess Rozala shouted in Lower Miezan. "At least answer the accusations-"

"My return was wrought," the Grey Pilgrim said, weak voice firming, "under the auspices of the Ophanim."

"Forgiveness, Peregrine," a towering muscle slab of a man said, "yet if the corpse of the Grey Pilgrim were to be so defiled, it would speak as you do. Truth must be ascertained."

I glanced at Hakram, who'd fallen it at my side and was nonchalantly ignoring the way the few hundred warriors surrounding us had yet to put down their swords or even lapse in their general glowering. I drew on the pipe, letting the wakeleaf sink down my throat and into by lungs before breathing it out through my nose. It burned a tad – I usually blew it out – but not unpleasantly.

"So," I drawled. "I don't suppose you've got a flask of Vale summer wine stashed away in that cloak?"

"I could only get my hands on Dormer pale," Adjutant apologetically said.

My lips twitched.

"See, now I know that's a lie," I replied.

"This is going to be a hand joke, isn't it," he sighed, sounding resigned.

"If I say yes," I murmured, "are you going to lose it?"

I shamelessly chortled at my own joke and regretted it not a bit. His jaw muscles twitched in what was either suppressed amusement or the sudden urge to bite off my face, and not metaphorically speaking.

"Your Majesty, would you start taking this seriously?" Princess Rozala hissed. "This could easily devolve into a battle. Already forces are gathering, all bloody chaos requires is a spark."

I glanced at her, brow rising, then looked at Hakam.

"It's looking like Hasenbach's riding her hard to keep you alive and happy," he told me in Kharsum.

"She must just love that," I replied in the same.

Not even the harsh syllables of the main orc dialect entirely managed to hide my petty glee at the revelation, from the looks I got. I sighed and began helping Tariq off of me.

"Need my stick, old bones?" I asked. "I'll let you borrow it if you promise to give it back."

"I'll stand, thank you," the Grey Pilgrim sighed. "I will have to grow used to having broken mine."

I cast a look at the middle-aged warrior who'd very politely just told Tariq they were going to have to check if he was my dead corpse-puppet, mentally going through what I knew of Levantine commanders in Iserre. That was Yannu Marave, probably, though I couldn't be sure from his face-paint as I could not remember the colours of the Champion's Blood at the moment.

"Lord Marave, is it?" I probed.

"It is so, Black Queen," he calmly replied.

"Word of advice," I said. "When you have your priestlings poke at the Peregrine, tell them to be gentle."

"Truth must be ascertained," he replied, eyes tightening.

"Sure," I said. "But if they get too rough, after tonight I'm guessing the Ophanim might end up ascertaining them all over the ground. I mean, it's not my hill so I've no horse in this race, but think of the poor Proceran peasant who'll end up stuck cleaning that up."

I bet Alamans princes didn't even tip, too, they seemed like the type.

"We will see," Lord Marave said.

I had a free hand, now that Tariq was standing on his own, so I used it for the very important task of having another pull of my pipe and spewing out the smoke into the crisp winter morning air. Then, resting my staff against my chest, I extended an open palm towards Hakram and saw it filled with a nice little silver flask. Had to unscrew the cap, but a sniff told me it really was Dormer pale inside. I'd be damned, hadn't thought any Callowan drink would make it this far out. The surprise brought back sharp remembrance of Ratface, whose days as a quartermaster had seen him taken as some sort of contraband magician, and the ache of my dead friend's absence was a lingering pang. I smoothed it away from my face, pulling at the wine. A pair of Lanterns were not helping the Pilgrim stand, gently but firmly inspecting him.

"I'm guessing, Lord Yannu," I said, "that you want me to stick around until that little charade there is over with."

"I accept your kind offer, Black Queen," the Lord of Alava said.

Someone was letting the inch I'd given them go to their head, looked like.

"Put words in my mouth again, Marave, and that'll be the last time you have a tongue," I casually replied, with a nice friendly smile.

The warriors around us didn't like that, or at least not my tone. I wasn't clear on how many of them spoke Lower Miezani. The other three of the Blood – the older woman had to be the Lady of Vaccei, who I remembered had grown children, while by elimination the last was the Lady of Tartessos – didn't either, though none spoke out to take me to task over the threat. Almost like they were realizing they were trying to keep the Queen of Callow prisoner, breaking truce in the process. I allowed myself a single appreciative glance at the Lady of Tartessos, whose bronze and green paint paired with a rather tight leather vest made for an attractively unusual look. Truthfully if Lord Yannu had been twenty years longer he might have been the one to draw a second look but as it was he was both at least twice my age and getting on my nerves.

"No offence was meant," the Levantine lord said.

He didn't sound all that apologetic, which made sense as I'd yet to hear an apology.

"Now, for the sake of diplomacy I'll tolerate this," I said. "But I'd like the lot of you to consider the amount of insults you've been laying at my feet this morn, after the trouble I went through to save your ungrateful hides."

"You claim debt, Black Queen?" the Lady of Vaccei asked.

"I claim slights," I idly replied. "Three now and your tab's still open. Best start thinking now of how restitution will be offered for them."

I was willing to make peace with these people, to make alliances and sign treaties and fight by their side. But I would not allow that willingness to be confused even a moment for fragility. If they offered insults, they'd pay up for them – or else. I had no intention to allow either myself or Callow to be made the rented mule of the Grand Alliance in the war to come. Grace would be answered with grace, but disrespect with the same thing as well.

The talk of restitution went over about as well one would expect when spoken by a villain, but in those haughty faces I saw something like abashment as well. No one who spent as much time going around talking about honour as the Dominion's highborn did could be unaware that they were pushing me far enough a less temperate woman might have chosen violence as answer. Oh Gods, I thought, pulling at my pipe. You knew a manner of thinking was awful skewed when I could be counted as temperate by it. One of the Lanterns, speaking rhythmic prayers in what might still have been Ceseo for all I knew, brought forth a long spike of Light. She touched it to the Pilgrim's skin, near the wrist, and that was then the Choir of Mercy took offence.

Well, I'd warned them. The rest was on their heads.

There was a ripple of power by now familiar to me, a taste of flame and smoke and the beat of wings, and before it could draw blood the Light winked out. The Lantern fell to her knees, stunned, and began babbling in one of the Levantine tongues. I glanced at Hakram, pulling at my pipe, but the orc shrugged. He had no idea either then. I turned to Princess Rozala, realizing only then she'd been bearing a truce banner this entire time. Gods, I was more out of it than I'd thought. I almost asked why she'd been made flag-bearer, but to be honest the true reason might not be as amusing as what my imagination was providing so it'd be a shame to break the illusion so soon.

"I don't suppose, Your Grace, that you speak... that," I said, somewhat vaguely.

"Still Ceseo," Princess Rozala said. "They use it for formal conversations even in northern Levant. I'm not fluent, but she seems to be saying she has lost the 'grace'."

I cocked my head to the side.

"Well, I'll be damned," I said.

"Again," Hakram helpfully contributed.

I would have gestured obscenely at him, were my hands not full. Truly, my Adjutant's wiles were without match.

"They stripped her of the right to use the Light, then," I whistled. "That's as clear a verdict as you'll get."

I was not, apparently, the only one to think so. It was only Yannu Marave, at first, but within moments a handful of warriors followed suit and from there on it was like levees breaking: before the bone-tired Grey Pilgrim the men and women of Levant knelt. I could feel the tiredness withdrawing from my wary bones, though it must be illusion. I'd been at the end of my rope hours ago, by now I was dangling in the void. I sniffed at the flask in my hand once more.

"Hakram, is there anything aside from wine in there?" I asked.

"A Praesi alchemical tonic," he admitted.

My brow rose.

"Didn't think to mention that before I drank it?" I said.

"You have been awake for nearly twenty hours, Catherine," he said. "And few of them restful."

"Potions are always hollow strength," I grunted.

I didn't further mention it, though, for cheat or not the tonic's effect was pushing back the moment where I'd collapse in my bed for three days by a few hours yet. Might be I wouldn't need that long before I crawled under a set of warm covers but I might as well be fully awake for the time it did end up taking. I took another sip from the flask. It might just be the lack of sleep talking, but the wine might actually taste better with the tonic in it. It took the edge of the sweetness of – oh Gods, I'd been spending too much time with Akua lately if I'd seriously been thinking about that. Next thing you knew I'd be talking about what poisons paired well with an Aksum sour, and what kind of a dress you should wear when crushing your enemies underfoot. Probably something red, I mused, depending on how literal the crushing was. The winding turns of my life had made me rather depressingly familiar with how difficult blood could be to get out of clothes. I forced myself to pay attention to what the Pilgrim and the Levantines were doing, which from the look on Malanza's face must be rather impressive.

Well, they did make a pretty painting. I'd at least concede that much. Tariq, weary and bloodstained and victorious, surrounded by a ring of kneeling warriors in steel and paint as the sun rose above them all. Unfortunately, pretty as this all was I was beginning to lose patience with it. If the Dominion wanted to get all ceremonial about the Peregrine returning to them all the better, but they could go about it without my attendance. It was also rather ungainly that myself, Hakram and a Proceran princess were the only people on this hill not kneeling to the Pilgrim. Didn't particularly make me want to take a knee to good ol' Tariq, mind you, but we stood out a mite. Adjutant looked askance at me, but I shook my head. Hakram Deadhand had no need to kneel to me, so why should he kneel to anyone at all? The Grey Pilgrim addressed his countrymen in one of their languages, sounding as if he was admonishing them, but even then they all stubbornly remained kneeling save for the four of the Blood. I was occupied wondering whether it would be rude to, well, leave after I'd finished smoking my pipe when the four aristocrats were calmly addressed by the Pilgrim and turned to us.

"We are told this was wrought by your hand, Black Queen," Lord Yannu Marave gravely said.

"Mercy allowed it, as the Peregrine said," I honestly replied. "And it was not without price for all involved."

Least costly to me, who'd merely tossed away the chance in the future that one dear to me could be stolen back from death, but it'd been a price still. Chances like that one came only once, when Creation's writ conspired to deliver them into your hand, and spurning what had been offered would ensure there was no repetition.

"Honour was given," the Lady of Tartessos said.

"Honour was given to all Levant," the Lady of Vaccei said. "This we agree."

"And so honour must be returned in kind," Razin Tanja gravely said.

So, I idly wondered, what kind of a largely ceremonial gesture would be made. Would concession be made, a declaration that I was not truly Arch-heretic of the East? No, I decided, not that. It'd been a conclave of several priesthoods that named me that, even if they were influential enough to force the Lanterns to agree it wouldn't be enough. Amusedly, I wondered if I was about to be made some manner of Blood. Not one of their own, of course, but recognized as some Callowan equivalent. I did remember that for all that their five great lines held the power and influence, other Named were granted some privileges as well. As far as Levant was concerned, being Named was being nobility. Catherine Foundling of the Squire's Blood, I thought. Well, it'd been a long year. I could use the laugh, even if diplomacy dictated it must be had behind closed doors where these touchy nobles could not hear it.

"The Champion's Blood endorses Callow's petition to join the Grand Alliance," Lord Yannu Marave said. "In my name, I speak this, as the Lord of Alava."

"The Brigand's Blood endorses Callow's petition to join the Grand Alliance," Lady Itima Ifriqui said. "In my name, I speak this, as the Lady of Vaccei."

"The Slayer's Blood endorses Callow's petition to join the Grand Alliance," Lady Aquiline Osená said. "In my name, I speak this, as the Lady of Tartessos."

"The Binder's Blood endorses Callow's petition to join the Grand Alliance," Razin Tanja said. "In the name of myself and my kin, I speak this, as the heir to Malaga."

They were, I understood after a moment of silent disbelief, deadly serious. Because for them this wasn't about treaties and interest and Calernia's balance of power – it was, old-fashioned as the thought was, about honour. What had moved their tongues was the same thing that'd been the source of indignation that'd seen Captain Elvera chastise me even as my prisoner for daring to suggest she might go back on her word when released. What lay at the heart of Praesi and Procerans I could understand, for it was not so different for all the posturing and castigations that both so freely threw. This, though? I would call it some sentimental ardour coming through in a moment of weight, but I was coming to grasp that was a mistaken understanding. This was good as law to them, wasn't it? Returning boon to even those they believed to be in Below's grasp, when boon was given. Honour, the way they spoke of it, was not something I could understand. It might be one needed to be born in their lands, to grasp it as they did. But my own people knew of debts, of scores settled, and perhaps those were not tenets so estranged as I might once have believed.

"I will not speak for the Pilgrim's Blood," Tariq said. "Now or ever. Yet I will speak of this to the Holy Seljun, Queen Catherine. And I swear now that the Majilis will speak as one, endorsing the petition of the Kingdom of Callow."

epokki

Hey EE, any chance you could check email regarding the art thing?

Also heres the links incase I cut in line with this msg. <http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil> , <https://www.patreon.com/user/overview?u=3523924>

ruduen

Well, that's quite an endorsement. Given how it was in the realm possibility for Cordelia to originally accept, I don't think she'll need more prodding here. So, who still needs to be convinced?

Or will minds have changed by now?

talenel

Well there are the priests. Say what you will, but I don't think they'll be backing down from their pissing contest with the Callowan House of Light.

Liliet

Considering the Grey Pilgrim and the backing of a Choir, I think they'll find themselves quite impotent in this matter. Oh there might be some pushing and shoving, but somehow I don't imagine it being an actual obstacle.

Mental Mouse

Also the testimony of that importunate priest and those who witnessed his punishment. If Cat saw "a ripple of power by now familiar to me, a taste of flame and smoke and the beat of wings," you can bet the priest's fellows (and perhaps the soldiers) saw at least as much.

Liliet

Her. It was a woman.

But Y E P and I bet for unbelievers a repeat performance can be arranged if the Ophanim are feeling pissy enough ♥

geoffpburns

Cat now has 4 out of 5 Majilis in her corner. The 5th one, the Holy Saljun might be more difficult. What you wanta bet he broke out the sparkling wine when he heard Tariq was dead? He might not be happy Tariq is still alive or grateful to Cat for making it happen. He has spent his life overshadowed by Tariq and under his thumb. The Holy Saljun is supposed to be the spirit leader of the Levant and first among equals of the Majilis but the Majilis and the population as a whole regard Tariq as the real leader. When Tariq speaks he may think he giving a suggestion but the Saljun maybe hearing "do it my way or what happened to your predecessor could happen you" even when Tariq is not leaning on him, and he probably does lean on him every now and again.

talenel

The Lanterns maybe. But the Proceran House of Light I think will be much more intransigent. Especially because there are a few choirs who have yet to get involved who I think will want to throw their weight around

Liliet

We'll see 😊

Someguy

The Lanterns will have to shut their mouths no matter how much is sticks to their throats.

The Procerans will whine like unhousebroken puppies and the Ashurans will have to pray Zeze does not recover or else....

C_B

I don't really expect Masego to seek vengeance on Ashur. Wekesa took care of those directly involved pretty... thoroughly, and Masego doesn't really seem to think in terms of nations in a way that would lead to him taking revenge on Ashur as a whole.

Now, whatever Above-aligned power was behind the "masked and hallowed presence"? THEY should be worried.

Liliet

(though truth be told, given the Praesi approach to 'who's at fault for the loser's woe', it's likely Masego will ignore that too)

Insanenoodlyguy

The lanterns just got a holy backhand that indirectly says "Stop doubting the Black Queen" That's going to shift things.

Liliet

Mm!

Faiir

Yes, I wouldn't mind an interlude about it 😊

Faiir

Bah, this was supposed to be an answer to stevenneiman below.

WordPress has horrible commenting UI on mobile 😞

stevenneiman

It will be absolutely hilarious to see the reaction from the House Insurgent when they hear of this.

IDKWhoitis

Only Ashur remains to be convinced really, but they will swing whichever way Prócer does, since they are almost under occupation by the League. Either they need Prócer to save them, or Ashur is removed from the power equation anyways.

The actual trouble would be the House of Light, as they would need to essentially be biting their own tongue. It's theological suicide for the Proceran House of Light to recant their edicts regarding Arch Heresy and their whole theological support of this crusade.

So the House of Light can't exactly state their support, and they can't actually support Cat, but they are currently stuck in a no win situation.

Cordelia has little reason to continue this war, and has a whole lot more power than a first prince ought to have. If she were to declare Callow an ally, in the face of the Enemy, Prócer at large might just have to bend to her will. As any rebellion would be stamped out with either Callowan, Lev, or Loyalists forces. This would be a cruel mirror to Prócers actions in the previous crusade. Cat is literally endorsed by Half of the Grand Alliance that matters and Angels. And this is to be considered after Cordelia already folded on calling Cat Queen OF Callow.

Cicero

Cordelia might find this a useful hinge to bring the Procer House of Light to heel.

Liliet

Mm!

Euodiachloris

I thunk the Houses in a few places are going to get prodded, now that they have a fully demonstrated choke chain.

After all, it's hard to call just anybody a heratic if there's suddenly a risk of losing the mojo that proves you're not one yourself.

Euodiachloris

I'm going to take the opportunity to highlight that my autocarrot let "thunk" as a genuine typo through. I'm rather pleased by this. 😊

Mental Mouse

And yet it didn't catch "heratic", oy gevalt. (Free Dictionary confirms it's not a different word.)

"Thunk" is puckish when substituting for "thought", but it's also a casual but valid action verb of its own, not to mention onomatopoeic (and relatedly, a sound effect).

Andrew Mitchell

> autocarrot

Where can I get one?!? 😊 😊 😊

P.S. "Thunk" is an outdated but valid past tense of think. Actually, now that I google it. It's also an alternative to "Thud".

naturalnuke

Really kinda kneecapped the Proceran Church huh?

IDKWhoitis

Kneecapped implies crippled, but might be able to recover slowly.

This is more akin to amputation via landmine.

Someguy

Too bad it did not reach close enough to be castration via landmine.

Decius

It's pretty simple: Declare her Redeemed by her actions. There's no point in declaring someone a heretic unless there's something they can do to stop being one.

Liliet

They can actually still manage to spin it in their favor as clearly Catherine's effort to offer aid in their hour of need was her effort to redeem herself from her terrible previous actions, brought about by their chastisement!

They'll just, uh, want to wait until Catherine's out of earshot for this one.

shieldredblog

She's not redeemed though or she wouldn't be a Villain. She wields the literal powers of Damnation.

Liliet

See that's a valid counterargument but whoever brings it up is clearly an enemy of the House of Light and heretic denying the obvious miracle brought about by the Choir of Mercy and everything

stevenneiman

Technically she's not a villain, but somehow I don't think they consider "priestess of the drow gods and wielder of a perverse mockery of the light" much better.

Faiir

Eeh I wouldn't call night/darkness a mockery of light, it's pretty much light's exact opposite.

ICSM

You see, I agree with you. Then again I'm not a moral absolutist nor a fanatical zealot bent on declaring people who disagree with me as Arch-Heretics. Or even lower-case heretics, for that matter.

talenel

People keep thinking that with the power of one choir (which honestly is narratively diminished due to the weakening of their champion), the other choirs won't get involved. I think that the Ophanim who have had a heavy role in the story thus far, will be receiving a lot of pushback from the other choirs. Remember 1 Choir does not equal all of the Angels. In fact we know that often angels are diametrically opposed.

frondred

Hanno is backed by the seraphim though. and the lone swordsman was backed by the Hashmallim.

talenel

Hanno has been only tangential to Cat's story though. He has really only clashed with Black thus far. And the Lone Swordsman has been gone for 3 books. Plus there are 4 other Choirs sitting around plotting. So yeah, 4-5 choirs that Cat has't really interacted with.

Big Brother

Cat Pimp-slapped the Choir of Fortitude out of the Stalwart Paladin, didn't she? Back when she was having to deal with Hero bands slipping into Callow to try killing her?

Liliet

There is no data on the number of Choirs. It's most definitely more than 7

thr0away07

There are likely somewhere between 8 and 10 choirs, as all of the names of the choirs presented thus far (that I'm aware of: Orphanim, Hashmallim, and Seraphim) are drawn from Maimonides' Mishneh Torah, in which there are 10 classifications of angels. It's possibly either the Chayot Ha Kodash "holy living ones", who are the highest ranking angels, or the Ishim / Eshim "individuals / sparks", who are the lowest ranking angels, could be weird and not choirs as they've been presented. The Chayot Ha Kodath are seen as throne bearers for G-d and are typically responsible for keeping balance, while the mythology of the Ishim / Eshim being the closest to humankind could mean they're meant to be the Good-aligned Named.

frondred

in this story the ophanim or choir of mercy is the highest ranking

talenel

Fair enough, I picked 7 rather arbitrarily. It just felt like a suitably momentous number. But I do feel that some of the other Choirs are going to have a much larger role in the proceeding chapters.

Liliet

>In fact we know that often angels are diametrically opposed.

Do we?

talenel

I could of sworn there was at least one chapter that mentioned Choirs of Angels/heroes basically fighting against each other. I could be wrong though.

Liliet

WoG is that while heroes might occasionally come to blows, particularly over methods / acceptable sacrifices / lesser evil, deaths are exceedingly rare even then (not counting straight up fallen heroes needing to be put down, like Laurence's reminiscence about Drake Knight).

talene1

Gotcha. The chapter I was reading was a lot more ambiguous than that, so it's most likely true.

Then again, right now things are really coming apart at the seams. Things are really coming to a head. For example Pilgrim vs Saint just previously. So it wouldn't surprise me if the conflict between choirs/heroes becomes a bit more nasty.

Liliet

Pilgrim vs Saint imho fits the bill there very well as a Regular Extreme. Note that the only reason Saint died was because of Kairos helpfully shoving sticks in wheels, and even then everyone felt so shitty about her death they had a literal argument about who gets to die.

(And I'm seeing that beautiful Stupidest Argument as at least partially very much coming from guilt/grief)

So like, the kind of thing that happens when stars align very much against you, and something no-one is okay with afterwards.

talene1

Ah but that's the thing. Right now the story is going into a narrative with more and more escalation. These events are quite momentous and have profound consequences for the future, especially in relation to the methods used to succeed. So I can see the stars being more inclined to align against everyone. Sort of million-to-one chances happening nine times out of ten.

DD

Easy enough to just couch it in terms of Cat "taking a step along the road to redemption." It's not that hard.

geoffpburns

Tariq gave up his crown, but is now promising to help Cat by using his power as unofficial ruler / power behind the throne of Levant. Didn't Cat warn the 7 princes that that kind of thing would lead to disastrous unintended consequences?

stevenneiman

IIRC, Cordelia was already seriously thinking about whether it was worth the political capital it would cost to ram it down everyone's throats, and now Cat's just made a great contribution to the war effort against the Dead King and (inadvertently) created a situation where refusing to allow Cat entry to the Grand Alliance might see it fractured. Cordelia could probably get it through much more easily now. Ashur might need convincing, but on the other hand they never had too much skin in the Callow game, and they might possibly have withdrawn after Wekesa basically destroyed their entire armed forces with his last act.

Liliet

Yeah, this is a gift getting dropped in Cordelia's lap. She's already taken over the Highest Assembly, and the rest of the Grand Alliance either blatantly wants Cat there (Levant) or doesn't give a shit / is likely to do what they're told (Ashur).

It's kind of hilarious how little it took for her to go into full "we are allying with Foundling no matter what it FUCKING takes, and keep her ALIVE please" mode ;u;

Big Brother

FINALLY! They should have done this from the start, the daft fucks!

Javvies

Heh.

The Ophanim dislike it when you use the Light to poke at their Chosen Hero.

And Cat warned them about it. And they did it anyways.

That could have gone better, but it could have gone a whole lot worse, too.

And it seems that Tariq has permanently lost Forgive as an Aspect. That's a downside, but probably better than Tariq remaining a corpse.

I wonder what the Levantines would have done if Cat hadn't resurrected Tariq and hadn't bothered to drag his corpse with her.

IDKWhoitis

Scream and charge, probably before dying, badly. I suspect Robber can't be that far away, and maybe a minor deployment of goblinfire to secure a retreat.

lankyZ

It really has been a while since the last use of the Foundling Gambit

Mental Mouse

> I suspect Robber can't be that far away, and maybe a minor deployment of goblinfire to secure a retreat.

Not to mention Cat herself, and if she hadn't rezzed Pilgrim she might not have been quite so tapped out.

Dainpdf

If Cat's experience is any guide, his Nane should also have a shallower pool of power from which to draw.

This adventure was quite good for Cat's plans—by now she has essentially got both Levant and Procer on her side for the Accords—but pretty bad in terms of facing Neshamah. Saint is gone and the Pilgrim is diminished. The Knights better be good in this endgame.

Mental Mouse

Other heroes can be supplied as needed; if Amadeus had to deal with heroes spawning in against him, the DK will face at least as much.

Dainpdf

New heroes won't be as experienced, and Lawrence's main import was acquiring a very refined domain over decades. The Pilgrim having hundreds of stories under his belt also helped, both in terms of being an experienced and effective tactician and in terms of having strong grooves carved into creation.

caoimhinh

However, new Heroes are known to be customized to deal with the threat against which they rise and also develop Aspects to better fight the Enemy of their stories. That phenomenon has been observed and analyzed by plenty of characters, like Amadeus observing that Hanno's original group was designed to counter the Woe (further strengthened by the fact that he and Hanno didn't enter a Pattern of Three despite being Black and White Knights, which declared that the destined Black Knight was Cat, thus announcing Amadeus' death -which was thankfully avoided because Fate is not written in stone-), and Catherine observing that leaving Heroes who hadn't completely come to their 3 Aspects survive confrontations meant that they developed Aspects to overcome that situation in the future.

It goes to the point that the formation of Bands of Five can be predicted to a certain effect as observed by one of the conversations Pilgrim and Saint had back during the Battle of the Camps.

If(or rather when) new Heroes start to appear to fight against Keter, they will be handed the necessary tools to do so, they aren't as experienced, sure, but teenagers defeating enemies that were out of their league is the most common thing in Calernia. And there are already quite a few that are starting to show hints of coming to a Name, like Razin and that Proceran Prince that always looks elegant no matter where he goes and was capable of riding down an undead bone dragon with his company of loyal soldiers.

Liliet

Frederic ♥

Mental Mouse

> he and Hanno didn't enter a Pattern of Three despite being Black and White Knights, which declared that the destined Black Knight was Cat, thus announcing Amadeus death

Amadeus didn't exactly die, but arguably "the Black Knight" did.

caoimhinh

True. But what I meant was that they didn't enter Pattern of Three because Amadeus was not the rival meant for Hanno, since that was Catherine. I mentioned it simply as part of the arguments supporting the theory that Heroes are semi-customized for the elimination of Villains, thanks to the more active support they receive from Above.

By the way, Bard said that Amadeus is still a Claimant despite having lost the the Name of Black Knight, which means he can get another Name and he could also get back the Black Knight Name (with three new Aspects for the current him, in constrast to the ones he got in his youth) like Catherine did with the Squire Name.

Javvies

Pretty sure Bard was implying that Amadeus was a Claimant to the Name of Dread Emperor, or whatever the actual Name is.

That is, Amadeus still has a Claim on the Tower he can exert.
Although, since he was (effectively) the King of Callow, enforced by Cat pulling a sword from a stone and claiming herself to be his heir, he might technically have (or have had) at shot at a Callowan Ruler Name.

caoimhinh

That is a possibility, yeah. But it's more likely to be claimant to Chancellor than to Dread Emperor, since Malicia is still alive and in possession of the Name of Dread Empress. Claimants don't appear while the Name is active, they appear to compete for it when nobody has it.

Mental Mouse

Hmmm... Black Knight in service to the Black Queen? That's assuming he doesn't go straight for Emperor, which would be messy on all sorts of counts.

Dainpdf

The problem is the Dead King has experience maneuvering so Bands of Five (and heroes in general) are not created to end him, at best drive him back. See Pilgrim and Saint's coming Band being used to drive him out of Twilight—a confrontation from which he got what he wanted, by doing precisely what Black told Grem to do in the Vales: letting them win, then snatching victory out of it.

Faiir

Forgive was OP, it had to be needed.

Faiir

*nerfed frickin autocorrect

Javvies

Not really.
1/day, on someone dead less than 24 hours (or sufficiently preserved)?
That's not that OP.
Certainly not OP to the point of being in dire need of nerfing into oblivion.

It does raise the stakes going forward, though.

Eleron M Pfoutz

Right. Forgive is just a fifth level Cleric spell (Raise Dead), with a much shorter duration (Your standard 9th level Cleric in D&D 3.5 would be able to resurrect within nine days.)

Liliet

Agreed.

It could not be used for

- making a fight have no stakes (only 1 res/day)
- enabling someone to be reckless (only 1 res/person)
- making what would have otherwise been a sacrifice free (likely cannot forgive that)
- prolonging select people's lifetime past natural (explicitly cannot resurrect from old age / sickness, nor cure it)

Literally the only thing it provided was some cushioning.

Aotrs Commander

Yeah, most mid-level D&D parties have access to better resurrection magic, though admittedly, they have to spend a bit of money on it.

Shveiran

Which is why as a DM at that level you need to build your fights so that the stakes are "TPK" or "something other than death", because a single character's death does not stick.

Honestly, I don't get this argument. Forgive WAS OP. Not "Drop-a-lake-and-stroll-through-Arcadia" OP, granted, but hugely powerful.

Employed with a band of Named, facing deadly odds on a regular basis? It greatly reduces the cost of attrition. Half the band has to die for the band to lose ANYTHING. That is huge.

Look back at Cat's battles with the Heroes in book 4: she mangled a lot and killed several, and yet almost all of them came back. It makes a huge damn difference.

it. Allows. You. To. Retcon. Named. Death.

How can anyone say that's not overpowered? I can think of a few Aspects that can be debatably more powerful, but then I remember that Forgive allows you to bring back the Named with those Aspects PLUS the other two that Named has.

Miles

OP is relative to the opposition's abilities.

So for comparison we have 'portals you can use to trivialize all logistics, attack an army from behind or just skip the battle and drop a lake on the other army,' 'see an ability once and permanently gain the ability to use a supernaturally powerful version of it at will,' and 'know your enemies' secrets.'

Actually it seems relatively weak in comparison.

Liliet

YEP.

Catherine's Arcadia gates are absurdly OP. Tariq's Forgive is so mild, every single priest could have it without the setting being radically transformed at its core.

(Because it does nothing for old age / sickness / slow poisons, and only gives every person one second chance)

Liliet

>Employed with a band of Named, facing deadly odds on a regular basis? It greatly reduces the cost of attrition. Half the band has to die for the band to lose ANYTHING. That is huge.

Once. Per. Person.

Everyone gets one second chance. One.

If there's actual attrition going on, you're just as dead with Pilgrim as without him. The same danger coming around the second time, if it again manages to claim the same life, will already be irrecoverably deadly.

Forgive is powerful but it does not sway story currents. It adds narrative possibilities, it does not take them away. As a writer, you want to have this tool, it helps you, not hinders you.

Faiir

From a reader's perspective, if GP was going to be around, there would be no lasting danger until after the first death of a fight. Archer situation was shocking for me, but that was because I forgot she can just be rezzed. You can't repeat it with the same effect.

Well even though the OP part was a bit of a joke, when comparing aspects you need to consider that the more powerful your skill, the better counter will the other side get.

Also note that gating time was inconsistent, and could make you appear on the other side months later, so it wasn't really reliable if used repeatedly.

Liliet

>From a reader's perspective, if GP was going to be around, there would be no lasting danger until after the first death of a fight.

Character death is not the only possible stakes!

Like, Catherine and Co aren't fighting for their own survival. Named adventures like the one in Third Liesse are very rare in the plot, and the objective in them is generally very external. Catherine lost in Keter, even though everyone lived.

I honestly never perceived anyone of Woe in danger of permanently dying regardless of whether Pilgrim was around, because to me it was fairly obvious narratively they'd stick around to the end. The tension simply lies elsewhere.

>Archer situation was shocking for me, but that was because I forgot she can just be rezzed. You can't repeat it with the same effect.

I mean, I 100% expected Indrani to die there, because it WAS the simplest + most drama value shortcut to Masego throwing off Dead King's yoke, and Pilgrim was there for a reason.

And now, even if he had kept his Aspect, the next death threat is for real death threat 😊

Note how the stakes were very much high during the discussion of who will be the sacrifice, both pre- and post- Laurence's death. Because in the situations where a resurrection would be dramatically inappropriate, the rules already say it doesn't work.

>Also note that gating time was inconsistent, and could make you appear on the other side months later

Faiir

Ok, convinced me 😊

Liliet

fuck

>Also note that gating time was inconsistent, and could make you appear on the other side months later

Catherine had enough control over time passing in Arcadia that it was always, reliably a shortcut compared to going the regular way.

Faiir

I believe it worked out for Cat specifically because she didn't overuse it.

Javvies

No, using Arcadia as a strategic shortcut worked just fine for Cat because she (a) was a Fae Sovereign (and therefore had an innate connection to how Arcadia worked) and (b) had a deal covering her and her forces using Arcadia with the King and Queen of the Unified Fae Court.

She had previously had minor issues with using Arcadia as a shortcut in that she ran into enemies on her third use thereof, but that's not an issue anymore.

Based on the being of book 4, when it's the Stalwart Paladin, Gallant Bandit, and Red Sorcerer, it looks like Cat used Arcadia as a shortcut (and a tactical advantage) whenever Heroes showed up. And since she'd dropped quite a few of those ...
Plus she exploited it several times against the Crusaders in Callow.

AQ

Catherine has two goddesses on her shoulders these days, threading the needle for her, I think.

Liliet

Mm!

Ciopo

Eh, I feel the loss of Forgive for the Pilgrim is kind of a power up.

He is now a hero with 2 out of 3 aspects, he just got handed the skeleton key of heroic solution to any one future conondrum, we all know that an hero without all their aspect will develop juuuust the aspect they need to save their asses... and Pilgrim understands narrative, if the victory owned was a knife, a missing aspect is [something suitably upscaled]

Javvies

By the description, it's more like when Masego had to cut out Seek from Cat's first iteration of Squire.

I'm pretty sure the implication here is that Tariq's iteration of the Name of Grey Pilgrim is at 2 realized of 2 potential Aspects. That is, his (current) iteration of the Name of Grey Pilgrim is permanently damaged. Not that he suddenly has an unassigned Aspect for future use.

Ciopo

Oh, I agree with you, but we know above are cheating bastards 😏

What took losing the name and regaining it might as well be shortcut to "a good night sleep" for a hero, metaphorically

Mental Mouse

I don't think so... in this case, I think they're both under a common ruleset for Named, hero or villain. Pilgrim's been brought back for a last hurrah, but it won't involve Forgive. That said, he might have some extra mojo for a later heroic sacrifice, especially if "the situation is hopeless".

Shveiran

Yeah, he is not long for this world. But he gets to shape the world for the better before going out in a last blaze of glory, incidentally removing an otherwise impassable obstacle.

Insanenoodlyguy

Agreed, If he gets a third aspect, it will be for the last act of his life. Or he gets the full power of his name + to put into one of his still held aspects, with the same consequence. Or maybe he finally lets himself stop and rest cause Cat is all about avoiding obvious story ends and he rolls with her now.

Mental Mouse

> Or he gets the full power of his name + to put into one of his still held aspects

Well, Behold is receptive, but Shine could go nova. Or he could directly call down the angels, probably in response to a demon.

Insanenoodlyguy

This comment aged really well.

Thea

Or Neshamah baits it with a faint and the Pilgrim fires it for tentatively/initially naught.

Insanenoodlyguy

Possible, but again, he rolls with cat now. Even if he doesn't see that coming, she would and then tells him.

caoimhinh

If Tariq's robes start to turn white all of a sudden, we'll know where this is going XD

Decius

When Cat was resurrected she got her third aspect back.

Liliet

Not resurrected. When she had her Name ripped away from her by Chider and then took it back.

Miles

Maybe healing damage to the soul is part of forgive. Seems like the kind of thing it might do.

talenel

I must disagree. The Ophanim just had a choice between gaining immense narrative weight due to the last sacrifice of their champion or to work with one of the Damned to save them, albeit in a lesser condition. Both the Ophanim and Pilgrim will be extremely narratively weakened. (Unfortunately, unlike another story where the Grey Pilgrim gets a power up by dying)

While Pilgrim will be extremely useful in a political manner with the Levantines, I think he will have lost a great deal of weight in Procer and elsewhere as one of the champions of Good.

Especially because I think some of the other Choirs are going to butt in and force the Ophanim to back off.

Thea

Maybe the Ophanim lost some narrative weight. Or maybe they paved a step of the easy way to change everything, forever.

Mental Mouse

Actually, I think the loss of his crown/staff will rob him of much of his political influence in Levant too. Not all of it, but he won't be dictating terms from behind the scenes.

werafdsaew

Except his influence was because he was trusted; not because he was capable of ruling. People aren't going to magically stop trusting him just because he's no longer eligible for a crown.

Mental Mouse

Trust was only part of his influence, and yes he'll keep that. But his own people were indeed saying that he could have been Sejun if he'd wanted, and such things matter to these people.

Liliet

P sure it's the other way round. They didn't follow him because they thought he could be Seljun, they knew he could be Seljun because they were already following him. Taking away the consequence doesn't affect the cause.

Mental Mouse

I'm pretty sure it was stated that he was in fact the proper heir to the Tattered Throne, by straight inheritance/lineage.

Javvies

Not exactly.

His mother held that position and his older sister was the heir and trained and educated with that in mind. However, when he became Bestowed with the Name of Grey Pilgrim, their mother wanted to reorder the succession in his favor. He refused and ran away (essentially). The sister ultimately succeeded their mother and was later assassinated, her son was the nephew that Tariq smothered with a pillow.

Tariq could become head of the Pilgrim's Blood and Seljun whenever he wanted because he's a direct blood descendant of the original Grey Pilgrim, and inheritor of the Name Grey Pilgrim. For the Levantine's, he's more or less the next best thing to the original Grey Pilgrim back from the dead.

He's still in a position where if he hinted at wanting to become Seljun, the rest of Levant would automatically acclaim him as such and murder anyone who even looked like they were thinking about hesitating about it. It's just that now, if he did that, he (and Levant) would get slapped with a curse.

It's not something he ever planned on or expected to do, but it was always something he could do without metaphysical repercussions, just the fact that he'd be a shit ruler (and knew it). Now, he still technically could, but in addition to being a shit ruler, he'd have a curse looming over himself and Levant if he did.

Liliet

Yeah, but he explicitly rejected that. And it's not the reason people follow him, again. The reason is his deeds and his Bestowal, intertwined. I strongly doubt anyone would care about him if after running away from home after being declared heir and refusing to go through with it, he actually joined whatever, uh, secret / low key organization he thought for a bit of joining to avoid attention? The fact he's proper heir to the throne is just icing on the cake, if anything serving more to give credit to their Blood system (see, those of Blood really are better than others!) than to him.

Mental Mouse

> "I wasn't always a priest, I'll gave you know," the Peregrine sanguinely replied. "As a young man I once even attempted to become one of the Hidden Poets."

> "They of the seventy-eight methods of carnal love?" Indrani asked, sounding somewhat intrigued.

> "Indeed," he agreed. "Alas, my kamil declamations were judged unworthy and so I took an interest in healing instead."

Liliet

We'll see how Judgement reacts 😊

But generally, the current was already flowing this way: note Cordelia's reaction. Catherine spearheading the fight against the Dead King will IMHO be enough for people to not think less of Tariq for buddying with her.

talenel

Politically, I think the fallout in the Grand Alliance wont be huge for Tariq. I just think that this is a huge narrative blow for him and that he has maybe one big thing left in him at most. I also think his power (in terms of his Bestowal) will be dramatically weakened.

Liliet

That sounds likely, true.

Liliet

It's not like he could have used it when dead, really

Ben Serreau-Raskin

Hell yes.

Zarquon

PGtE just gets better and better.

Rey d`Tutto

Weird. Still July 4th (Independence Day) hereabouts

Soma

I'm dying for that sit-down conversation. I love the shit talking, I need MOAR.

Amy Lear

Hakram: successfully having laid the foundation for Cat's work to go more smoothly than she could have imagined.

Again.

Dainpdf

Truly a prince among men.

Oshi

This was nice. Now what's next?

Death Knight

The peace conference though that might be the first arc of the next book. Three epilogues seems more likely, exploring the aftermath of Black, Masego and the tension between Cat and Archer while setting up the Peace Conference act.

antoninjohn

Tyrant will be in for a big surprise once he sees Pilgrim again

Gunslinger

He did say that it was not the last Pilgrim would see of him 😊

IDKWhoitis

I think Archer may start cussing or laughing or both upon seeing Pilgrim again.

Alivaril

Er, Cat acts as though her "price" was in giving up the resurrection, but did she actually do so? It seems to me that ripping into the Pilgrim's soul in front of the Choir of Mercy would be downright suicidal. She needed help to even remain conscious before their mere attention; their displeasure would likely have been significantly worse.

...Then again, self-deception may be a viable way to trick Creation into thinking she paid an important price.

Dainpdf

She could maybe have gone after they were done with their thing. Or used a different narrative.

She did also give up on the sword story, too.

IDKWhoitis

The larger cost is probably some cheating of fate for now the Twilight Court has Noone on the throne, and by bringing back Pilgrim, Cat may have further destabilized Twilight into only lasting far more shorter than originally planned.

A body was needed on that throne, and now there isn't one. A price was cheated.

Liliet

I don't think so. That seems like it's worked correctly.

Cat paid for the resurrection with her story credit.

Liliet

Not the Aspect itself. The Liesse three-beat of cheating death.

IDKWhoitis

I wonder if with the crippled Name and abdication of Authority, Tariq will just retire. Unless the choir intends to give him another 3rd aspect, which the fiery winged pricks might do.

But at the same time, I think the White Knight will take center stage on the Hero side soon, after Cat gets to Salía.

Like right now, I think Cat is going to empower Hak and Viv to get the horse trading and logistics figured out for Gate traveling and marching order, so she can sleep the rest of the Week off. Like the Levs and Procerans probably won't want to March with the Legions in Exile, but some arrangement can be set up.

And there's also the question if only Cat and crew are going to Salía or if the entire Callowan contingent is going with her. I doubt Cat is going to reinforce Cresuens or some area of the Procerean front, and the other armies are more useful elsewhere, rather than having all 3 armies camped outside Salía.

and lastly...

WHAT OF MASEGO?!?

Dainpdf

Also, what is Malicia up to? She's been off camera for a while, dealing with the aftermath of Thalassina... and plotting. And now Cat has brought Maddie back. Will that be worth something?

caoimhinh

I really, really want it to be Catherine who tells Malicia that Amadeus is back. Alaya's pride will be hurt, but she will still be grateful that Amadeus is safe thanks to Cat's efforts, which Malicia was incapable of doing.

IDKWhoitis

Depending on how cruel EE wants to be, there's a chance that Malica will fail to hold the Empire together and it will fragment like Viv was trying. Or alternatively some the Nobles in Praes will “depose” her.

Otherwise, Malica might just have to take a desperate gamble and stab Callow in the back to try to maintain power back at home. With Callowan army away, with Cat and crew, Callow itself is very undefended. And we know that Grain will be very important come Summer, as praes granneries will be almost empty, and they can't trade at the quantities they need.

Mental Mouse

Well, IIRC Cat left Callow perfectly willing to sell grain. And if Malicia tries to use one of her sleepers, Cat's likely to find out about them (other players already know she can turn any agent who's been in her presence). And once Cat knows what's going on there, Night may be able to do something about those Rule commands.

Shveiran

Malicia could probably find a way to destroy Callow, but that doesn't sound like it would achieve much aside from pettyness.

Sure, it would hurt Cat and she'd never get over it, but... what then? That leaves the Black Queen rich in armies and allied Named, with a thirst for blood and a story in her sail, marching on Praes to take Malicia's head and reform the place.

I'm not seeing her victory conditions, in this.

Malicia will come up with something, but it won't be as an act of spite. She's not the type.

Dainpdf

On the topic of backstabbery, Malicia would see the danger from a mile away. I doubt it.

As for grain, why can't they trade, again? Sure, Callow may not have as much food as Praes needs, but there is always Mercantis...

caoimhinh

I don't think they have any business going to Salia, they are likely going to stablsh some communications, but the princes that are riding with Rozala need to get their successors crowned fast, which they can do thanks to the use of the Twilight Realm.

Cat bought them 3 months of ceasefire, but the war is still going on. The armies currently on Iserre will need to march up north to be ready for the fight, the Drow expedition under Sve Noc's direct command is marching too, it will need to be established if Amadeus' Legions in Exile will accompany them or returning to Callow or Praes, plus there's the matter of dealing with the League of Free Cities.

There's a lot of politicking left to do.

Also, I want to know where the hell is Scribe, the last time she was shown was in one of Hierarch's visions and it showed her marching alongside Grem with the Legions, yet she has not appeared in this whole book, which I find weird. Maybe she will simply appear when Amadeus is awake, and no one will think it weird because that's part of her shtick.

IDKWhoitis

Likely a large peace conference featuring most participants of the war will be held. Thus it should be expected for this peace conference to occur with representatives of all sides. Technically they could have Roz or Arnuld be Cordelias rep, but I suspect Cat is going to want to talk to Cordelia face to face to finally put this heretical bullshit to a conclusion. Any treaty not done by Cordelia personally might be worth dust in Cat's eyes. It's in everyone's interest to head to Salía now.

So what follows is Cat and the Blood are going to Salía. But I don't think Cat would exactly want to go alone (Hakram alone with Cat probably, Archer may go where her dear boy needs her, and let's face it, he won't be helpful for diplomacy and needs some rest...) , and certain factors will want to leave Prócer now (Viv) (The Exiles). So likely the Callowan armies are going to either follow Cat around (for her safety and intimidation) or heads back to Callow with the Exiles.

They aren't needed right now with the 3 month cease fire, and if Callow enters the war, the Dead King will open a new front to the north of Callow, since the Elves are not in the Golden Bloom anymore.

The majority of the Drow may follow the Callowan army for security and logistical reasons. A small honor guard may accompany Cat, but otherwise they are a glaring liability with Dawn.

I imagine Scribe was somewhere in Camp with Grem, pretending to not be important and parsing whatever data she could (for all we know, she may have been talking with Tyrant).

She will materialize near Black's Soul next time that is on screen. And I am awaiting a heartfelt reunion between Scribe and Black, and some real scathing sarcasm and hatred between Scribe and Cat. Or potentially Scribe might forgive Cat, she did save him in the end...

caoimhinh

I agree with most of your points, but I really don't think they will go to Salia. Marching the armies to Salia is out of question and Catherine can't go with a small group there both for security and diplomatic reasons; besides, they absolutely need to go north to reinforce the lines, the peace conference can be held by Cordelia's representatives and Arnaud already has her signed permission with plenipotentiary power to deal and negotiate with foreign powers in her name.

One peace conference will be held right now, at least, involving the League of Free Cities. For matters of the Grand Alliance another will likely be held later on, but it would likely be in an army camp rather than in a city, they are in the middle of a crusade against Praes (and also Callow by extension) and war against the Dead King, so the heads of the armies and countries will likely be marching to the north.

3 months are plenty to reach Salia as they have use of both Arcadia and the Twilight Realm, but it's just not strategically nor diplomatically sound to have conferences there until the peace has been signed. Another option is for Cordelia to speak in private with Catherine through the scrying links.

Liliet

Cordelia can just literally participate in the conference via scrying link.

caoimhinh

Yeah.

Though she probably won't; I don't know if it's pride, the politics involved about leaving command of the situation to the authority that's on site or if she simply fears hacking of the scrying, but she usually doesn't hold a negotiation through scrying links, she pretty much could have done that in any of the conferences Procer has had with any other country, both so far Cordelia either sends a representative with letters from her and authority to make deals in site or goes to the site in person; of particular notice for us is Procer's dealings with Catherine, who has held conference with Proceran armies more than once.

I really think it's far more likely that Cordelia would leave the broad negotiations to her representatives in site, and maybe make private deals through the scrying links. It would likely be weird if the conference was held with Levantines, Cat's group, maybe the League, and Procer's representatives along with a huge mirror, or worse, a pool of water. Cordelia is too concerned about appearances to allow that.

Liliet

> she usually doesn't hold a negotiation through scrying links

It has never been done before. Two-way scrying the way we've seen it is literally Warlock's invention, and it only started getting popularized in Procer with Cordelia's Order of the Red Lion.

A conference via a scrying link would thus be an unprecedented thing, which adds complications to the ebb and flow of it. It's entirely natural Cordelia hasn't jumped that breach yet, she's got too many cats to skin as is.

And it's somewhat more rude to go with the time-saving method than the traditional method, because tradition and showing that you are willing to go through effort to make the conference happen. For a conference to be held through scrying link without giving insult, there needs to be a clear reason why it's necessary in this particular situation.

In this particular case, given literally everything going on is unprecedented and there's a bit of a time crunch with the 3 months time limit, I can see the new technology being introduced.

Shveiran

I agree.

In the previous talks, there wasn't so much riding on the results.

While I appreciate how pressing the situation is, and how fast three months can go by with this kind of ground to cover and this harsh a war to prepare for, the coalition is currently ramshackle at best. These armies how loyalty to a dozen different figures and were bleeding each other just last morning. This is not a situation you can put a band-aid on and call it a day.

A conference is needed, and the First Prince will have to be a part of it. So either they go to Salia, or a scrying relay is implemented.

Fayhem

> Marching the armies to Salia is out of question and Catherine can't go with a small group there both for security and diplomatic reasons; besides, they absolutely need to go north to reinforce the lines

I mean. I checked the map (<https://ibb.co/kPLn0a>) and Salia is almost due north of Iserre. You really can't make it to Lycaonese territory from Iserre without going through Salia, unless you want to take a huge detour for literally no reason. The capital of the Principate is absolutely where everybody's headed; formally adding a villain-headed polity to the Grand Alliance formed literally for a Crusade isn't a mere formality to be handwaved out of the way by representatives. I'm sure some preliminary truces etc. can get approved now or now-ish, but the big-ticket item is the kind of thing that needs to happen in public with everybody who matters watching in person. It was also stated previously that Pilgrim was champing at the bit to get to Salia because he needs to tell some fuckers to kindly separate their craniums and their hindquarters (that's, ah, paraphrasing), IIRC specifically at least in part regarding the crazy shit they've been saying about how to deal with Praes, and I doubt he will have changed his mind about his priority structure there now that Lord Black's apprentice is joining the team.

As far as Cat not being able to go up there without keeping her whole army around for security reasons (which I think is what you're alluding to there by saying she can't just have a small group?)... I mean, the reasons Cordelia noped out on accepting Cat's offer initially revolved around not being able to afford to force it down the Levantines throats. Now that they're actually pushing for it? Well, Cordelia already literally ordered Cat to be protected at almost any cost and the Levantines sure aren't gonna start shit now. It's not totally clear yet how the new Twilight Highway has affected regular Arcadia, but if it's parallel more than a replacement then Cat still has a line of retreat that nobody can follow her in anyway. Which as I've said won't be relevant, at this point literally every army that doesn't belong to the Dead King or Kairos actively wants Cat kept alive.

I think they will absolutely all head to Salia; I think that after the various heads of state and etc. get there most of the armies probably will keep going rather than hang around so they can get a head start on reinforcing for when the Dead King kicks shit back off again. But it's next stop Salia for the political players. You're not wrong about how important it is to prepare for when the war resumes, but the military preparations aren't the only part that matters; the political preparations matter just as much, even if people tend to get more impatient about that. EE does have a track record of surprising me so hey, it could happen again, but at least right now I'd say I'm at least 90% on that.

caoimhinh

1) It doesn't matter where Salia is, because they aren't going to be marching through Procer, they are going to use the Twilight Realm to travel because otherwise crossing that distance means months of time.

2) The armies can't be placed on Salia, that would almost effectively be putting it on a siege, it's not diplomatic at all to have so many troops of other countries near the capital. This is a principle that applies to every country both in real life and fiction.

3) Peace conferences are never held in the capital of one of the countries involved in the conflict, they are held in neutral ground or a suitable place that doesn't severely put one of the parties in great disadvantage.

4) Catherine doesn't need to be in Salia to talk with Cordelia, there are plenty of methods to establish communication through scrying. The use of intermediaries and representatives is also possible (Arnaud has signed plenipotentiary power, and both Vivienne and Hakram have the authority and knowledge of Cat's plans to carry negotiations), though there are some things that both of those women want to tell to each other personally.

5) They need to march the armies north as soon as possible, resupply the lines, rebuild the defenses, reinforce the troops and restock their weaponry, there's simply too much to do, spending time in Salia would be counterproductive.

6) Pilgrim wasn't heading to Salia to tell anything to anyone, he was going to deliver Amadeus body to be publicly executed while retaining his soul as leverage on Catherine and Malicia. He was then going straight north to fight against the Dead King. Tariq has made a clear point about his avoidance of meddling in politics, his only interference being because there were Named involved.

That said, it is possible that Catherine and the Majilis go to Salia for a conference of the Grand Alliance, sure. Catherine has the power to defend herself and her group, though she knows that she isn't invincible and she can still be overwhelmed by lots of troops. She is unlikely to place herself in such a vulnerable position. Not to mention that Cordelia doesn't particularly want Catherine anywhere close to her, she distrusts, despises and fears Catherine, that we have seen through their interactions and her POV chapters.

Besides, the conference discussing Callow's joining to the Grand Alliance won't have Callow present, of course. That one might happen with the members of the Blood getting to Salia before heading again to the north, but there's not enough trust to have the Queen of Callow visiting the capital of the Principate yet.

I don't think Cat will be visiting Salia before they solve the issue with the Dead King. By that time the war situation will be less tense and urgent, the political situation more stable and Callow will have built a better reputation after saving everyone's ungrateful hides. Again.

Liliet

>Pilgrim wasn't heading to Salia to tell anything to anyone

That's not what Laurence thought.

>she distrusts, despises and fears Catherine

Liliet

fuck, posted accidentally

>she distrusts, despises and fears Catherine

Source on any of it? Any quotes that indicate that?

caoimhinh

Do you think Cordelia trusts and/or likes Catherine?

Granted, Cordelia's view of Catherine has changed with the passage of time, but it has never been positive.

Every one of the insights we have had to Cordelia's POV show her either thinking of Cat in a negative light. Initially, she was shown thinking of Cat with disdain as "the orphan girl who was taken as an apprentice by the Black Knight" and later on even irritated that Catherine doesn't play along with the back-and-forth courtesies that Cordelia favors as royalty and now consider Cat a brutal warlord.

She came to fear and hate Catherine after news about Cat's capabilities during the Battle of the Camps arrived.

Cordelia covers herself in lots of blessings before conversing with Catherine through the Winter room (which is common sense, of course, but also shows lacks of trust, which, again, is natural because there is no reason for Cordelia to trust Catherine), she also had to take time to calm herself before entering there (because Winter's power feels eldritch to everyone so nobody is ever comfortable interacting with it). And the very reason she accepted to meet her through that in the first place was so she could study Catherine in person and gain insights in how to defeat her.

In Interlude: Empires, when Catherine greeted her in a casual tone Cordelia was irritated because such a thing would imply some sort of friendship: "This lack of courtesy should not go unremarked upon. Though this was an informal conference, Cordelia disliked the pretence of friendship between them that would allow such language."

The only reason Cordelia was even tempted to initially accept Catherine's offer of peace and alliance was because of a moment of fantasizing with fame, as actually succeeding in such thing would be an unprecedented diplomatic victory and give prestige to Cordelia "no one would doubt she won the war through words and not swords" and she would pass to history as a great ruler for achieving such a thing. Though once more her own self-interest impeded it, because it would require lots of political capital, favors and coercing to make the other Princes of Procer accept Callow's offer of peace.

She doesn't trust Cat, she doesn't like Cat and while she isn't scared of Cat too much, she does fear Catherine's power and capabilities, so Cordelia understands that to fight and beat Cat she has to fight in a smart way (which was why she was so angry with the Conclave and Laurence, since their intervention made unavailable more subtle ways of dealing with Cat, leaving only straight fight that would only end in massacres). She thinks of Cat as a Damned, for using heretic sorceries and necromancy. She wants to fight Cat, and defeat Cat so she can use that victory to cement her own rule, that's the whole reason why the Tenth Crusade was launched: defeating Praes to gain prestige and spend her political enemies' resources in the process.

Liliet

>She came to fear and hate Catherine after news about Cat's capabilities during the Battle of the Camps arrived.

Source?

>Cordelia covers herself in lots of blessings before conversing with Catherine through the Winter room (which is common sense, of course, but also shows lack of trust, which, again, is natural because there is no reason for Cordelia to trust Catherine), she also had to take time to calm herself before entering there (because Winter's power feels eldritch to everyone so nobody is ever comfortable interacting with it). And the very reason she accepted to meet her through that in the first place was so she could study Catherine in person and gain insights in how to defeat her.

Yes, and I don't see how "natural precautions, supernaturally caused discomfort and politically motivated mild hostility" translate into "fear and hate". You are attributing strong emotions to Cordelia, that have simply never been there.

>In Interlude: Empires, when Catherine greeted her in a casual tone Cordelia was irritated because such a thing would imply some sort of friendship: "This lack of courtesy should not go unremarked upon. Though this was an informal conference, Cordelia disliked the pretence of friendship between them that would allow such language."

They are not friends, and Cordelia disliked the lack of courtesy. Because she is a noble and brought up among nobles, and to her good manners are very deeply ingrained as something that should be.

This does not translate to fear or hate. You'd think if she actually feared and hated Catherine, the mild mislike of her lapse in manners wouldn't have been a blip on the radar.

>She doesn't trust Cat, she doesn't like Cat and while she isn't scared of Cat too much, she does fear Catherine's power and capabilities

There is a difference between "is apprehensive of" and "fears". Fear is stronger than 'being scared', not weaker. Fear implies impeding rational thought.

>She wants to fight Cat, and defeat Cat so she can use that victory to cement her own rule, that's the whole reason why the Tenth Crusade was launched: defeating Praes to gain prestige and spend her political enemies' resources in the process.

That was the reason, yes, but Cordelia's priorities have changed since then in multiple ways. For one, when the Tenth Crusade was gathering, Cordelia hadn't personally spoken with Catherine yet. For another, Catherine hadn't yet formally broken with Praes / announced her willingness to be an ally against them.

(It's specifically when she did so that Cordelia started considering her as a prospective ally, which is... remarkably obvious and natural. She'd thought of Catherine is part of Praes and therefore an enemy by association, but when Catherine proved her willingness to act otherwise, Cordelia would rather seize that and use it to her advantage, because Catherine is not the target – not in her eyes. She was always after Malicia, Catherine was only ever a barrier on the way to that)

Liliet

I would say that Cordelia is largely indifferent to Catherine as a person, with the attitude easily swayed in any direction by the last thought / association she had. Strategically she considers Catherine a potential valuable ally, and someone she can work with if obvious obstacles are overcome. She believes she understands Catherine's general logic and objectives enough to know when she can and cannot trust her. And she believes her powerful enough to be worth appeasing, especially in the current situation.

It's not personal. Not in either direction.

Fayhem

Re: 1), yes, they'll obv be going through the Twilight Realm. My point wasn't that they would have to physically set foot on Salian soil in order to get to Lycaonese ground, my point was that it's literally on the way so saying "they can't go to Salia because they have to go north" is a conclusion premised on a false dichotomy. They can absolutely go to Salia without it being a diversion from going to the front lines, and that's what matters.

Re: 2), again, yes? Like I said initially I didn't think the armies would be sticking around Salia. The point is that no diversion is required in order for Cat + whoever to get there. Heck, depending on how the new Twilight Highway works exactly there may be no inherent need for them to even travel together.

Re: 3), well, what alternative are you thinking of exactly? It's not like there's somewhere that isn't Procer that's on the way to the north. Also, this isn't a peace conference because they're already at peace now; active hostilities already ceased. This is a discussion of formal alliance, and holding that in the hub of the alliance where the architect of that alliance lives seems pretty natural to me.

Re: 4), I didn't say Cat had to be in Salia to be able to talk to Cordelia. I said that I think an issue of this kind of political moment needed to be seen to be decided in public (for a given value of "public" that covers as many political movers and shakers as possible at least). You're ignoring what I did say to respond to something I didn't. That's kind of a strawman fallacy there frankly.

Re: 5), literally none of those things require the political leaders of these forces to be physically present. Cat in particular has always had the approach of "I decide what my forces will do, and then Juniper's in charge of making things actually happen". Even the Levantines have some precedent for delegating to designated Captains, as shown with Captain Elvera. And to the extent that they are needed, that is the kind of thing that can absolutely be appropriately handled through scrying links.

Re: 6), as Liliet already stated that's not what Laurence thought, and I'm pretty sure she knew him better than either of us do.

Re: the remainder, Procer burns if anything happens to Cat and as has already been shown Cordelia is excruciatingly aware of that. Cat wants an actual alliance here, remember. If she can't trust them even to not commit national suicide just to murder her for literally no reason while she's in the middle of committing her forces to save all their asses... I really think you're wildly overestimating the degree of vulnerability/risk there. I'm sure Cat would hang on to an honor guard for appearances if nothing else, but I'm skeptical she would be at risk of needing them for anything. And if she's still got the ability to open gates of her own aside from the Twilight Highway stuff then she literally cannot be caught if she decides to just leave. You can't get overwhelmed if you don't have to stick around to wait for it to happen.

Also, Cat certainly at bare minimum puts Cordelia's nerves on edge, but in political terms there's a huge difference between being scared by someone and being seen to be scared of someone. If she refused to let Cat come to Salia when that is what makes sense (and it is), that would be a giant neon sign screaming WEAKNESS SHOWN HERE to her rivals and allies alike. It's not like there ever is a good time for that as a political leader (esp in Procer), but during the brief interlude in a war for national survival is exceptionally bad. Something similar can be said for snubbing Callow by disinviting their Queen from the conference that will determine the status of Callow re: the Grand Alliance. Cordelia already gave ground (proactively, which shows she's thinking forward) on recognizing Cat as Queen of Callow rather than merely the Queen in Callow, which means she already voluntarily surrendered her pretext for not recognizing Cat as a legitimate diplomatic presence/true head of state.

Last, re:

> I don't think Cat will be visiting Salia before they solve the issue with the Dead King.

I really do think you've got the order of operations backwards there. The political aspect isn't something that doesn't matter here and can safely be put aside until they "solve the issue" with the Dead King waging a war of extinction on the bulk of Calernia. I would expect they'll want to fast-walk the politics as much as feasible given the time pressures, but getting all the politics lined up and cleared away as much as feasible is something you want handled before the history-altering national deathmatch. And that's just Procer's perspective. From Callow/Cat's point of view... you really think Cat would want to wait until Procer doesn't need her anymore so that she can just bank on the famous Proceran reputation for gratitude towards Callow in the wake of a Crusade against the Dead King? Because the last time Callow did that, Procer turned around and conquered them without so much as a fig leaf of an excuse. But hey, I'm sure the Callowans have all just let that go. It's not like they're the sort to hold on to grudges and grievances after all. 😊

Liliet

Hm, now that you've laid it out this way, I think you're probably absolutely right. Catherine had told Roland, too, that the next stop was Salia.

caoimhinh

She said that? When?

I remember her saying there were lots of things to do, including many conversations about the battles ahead and an implication that she was going to reveal the Bard's true nature to Roland, but I don't recall Cat ever saying the next stop was Salia. If anything, it was always said they had to go to the northern front ASAP.

Soma

>"He trailed off, though it was not a threat. It was almost a petition and more than a little desperate. Or else what did their lives mean? Their tears and blood and decades of bitter struggle to bring just a little light to Calernia? If the fall of such old and honoured stars meant not a thing, what could any of us ever hope to amount to?

>"This war has only just begun," I softly said. "It will take us to Salia, to forge a peace. It will take us to Keter, to visit upon the Dead King what he has so often visited upon us. But there's another enemy, Sorcerer. She breaks kings with sentences and topples kingdoms with but the lightest of touches. None of this can end before she'd been killed. For good."

>Roland dipped his head, not in acceptance but at least in acknowledgement.

<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2019/06/21/chapter-51-twilight/>

Catherine directly says it will take them to Salia. They might just leave the armies in the twilight realm while the bigshots talk in Salia.

caoimhinh

Thank you~

Dainpdf

Very nice. This sounds like the point of a time skip to me—to some point amid negotiations, or when the army reaches the border with the KotD, or even to Cat talking to Black about what happened and where things will go next.

Interestingly, we've still yet to see what Black has become. Dread Emperor Carrion, anyone?
...nah.

asdfas

Dread Emperor Beneficent. Hasn't been referenced outside the quotes yet and he sounds just like Black in the quotes.

Dainpdf

Benevolent, I think. And I am still not sure. Black going Dread Emperor seems like a bad thing to happen.

Insanenoodlyguy

Nah. I'm not so sure he's going that route, but if he is, he's Dread Emperor Benevolent for sure. Also I give even odds that if it does go down that way, he does so with Chancellor Ayala at his side, doing the job she's always been meant for.

Liliet

>but if he is, he's Dread Emperor Benevolent for sure.

Dread Emperor Benevolent is in the epigraphs fitting the format of a past historical Dread Emp, suggesting he is in fact one.

The reigning name does not match Black's sense of humor, and the quotes don't match Black's motivations and philosophy.

Dainpdf

I was making a joke, hence the humorous (maybe?) name. Personally, I don't think that'll happen.

afsd

Come on dude, her name is Eudokia, it's been mentioned like 50 times!

Liliet

See I don't really feel like Black is going to end up Dread Emperor period (Cat's dead set on bringing down the Name after all...), but if he does, this is the best guess at his reigning name I've seen ;u;

Euodiachloris

I dunno: "Sardonic" or "Satiric" would suit him. Failing that... "Desiccator" – bone-dry wit trying to keep lush greenery a thing. shrugs

Liliet

♥ ♥ ♥

Fayhem

Eh, doesn't match the format; Dread Emperor reign names are all adjectives, specifically (if I've got my nomenclature right here) denominal adjectives. Carrion is a noun. There have been other Dread Emperor names that were words used as nouns (e.g. Irritant, Revenant) but AFAIK they all can also be used as adjectives, although in the case of revenant that usage is super rare. So it sounds badass/overtly Evil enough to be a Dread Emperor name for sure, but I don't think it lines up with how Dread Emperor names are chosen.

Liliet

'Malicia' is not an adjective and can't be used as one. Also 'Regalia'. There's precedent.

Fayhem

Well, Malicia isn't even a word as far as I know, but your point is taken. Still don't feel like it matches Amadeus' take on things, but that's just my personal sense of it.

erebus42

So the Dominion (or at least the people who really seem to matter in the Dominion) are backing Cat. Yeah, that should give her request a bit more weight.

Also, I love how she points out how delightfully out of place Rozala is throughout all this. I can only imagine what's going on in ol'Roz's head right now-probably something along the lines of "HOLY FUCKING SHIT, WHAT THE FUCK IS EVEN HAPPENING RIGHT NOW!"(but you know, more princessly).

Mental Mouse

> probably something along the lines of "HOLY FUCKING SHIT, WHAT THE FUCK IS EVEN HAPPENING RIGHT NOW!"

Followed closely by "she wasn't even here, how did she manage to win when she wasn't even here?"

Liliet

I love the "will you start taking this seriously, Your Majesty?!" comment. Rozala has Realized how Cat works, apparently ;u;

Sparsebeard

I'm sure the priests of House Insurgent are gonna be real smug now.

konstantinvoncarstein

We saw that a Choir could strip a priest of the power to use the Light. So who gives Light to the priests? Above, or the Choirs?

Dainpdf

My interpretation: Above, technically, but the Choirs have some say in how and where it goes.

It's like how your manager is not the one employing you, but can still fire you.

Liliet

I like this metaphor!

Dainpdf

Thanks!

Miles

The choirs are above.

shieldredblog

No they work for Above.

They're like computer programs created by The Gods Above to run things because they aren't allowed too intervene. They are powerful but they have very real limits to both that power and their understanding.

That said, they are the highest authority mere mortals have access to. Apparently slivers of Above's attention only show up to kill people through sheer contempt.

Ekmo

"And I sweat now that the Majilis will speak as one, endorsing the petition of the Kingdom of Callow."

Yes Tariq, sweat it out! It's gonna be an exhausting time I'm sure!

Mental Mouse

Since fixed in text.

Old Scratch of Kharkanas

Long time reader, first time commenter. You've mentioned before there's some elements of the worldbuilding probably won't make it into the story. Do you plan on releasing supplementary stuff after the story's done? I'd love to eventually see things like a full world map or notes on the development of the Praesi political system, once it's no longer risking spoilers. Thanks!

Jwombat

There is actually a full world map on the website; several in fact.

Javvies

Technically just the continent of Calernia, but since the other continents on the planet aren't relevant to the story, it might as well be a world map for our purposes.

caoimhinh

This chapter was hilarious from beginning to end, Catherine's sarcastic view of the events around her was really top-notch. Though I wonder why Hakram didn't explain immediately that the reason they were all aware of the Pilgrim's death was due to the dreams, but well, that can wait, I guess.

"It might just be the lack of sleep talking, but the wine might actually taste better with the tonic in it."

Yes, Cat, and Akua can actually make you a list of what liquor goes well with what poison and with what antidote. It's a millenia-old art among the Praesi High-born, better get used to it, as the world seems to want you climbing the Tower.

And thus, a year, half a crusade and many thousands of dead people later, Pilgrim and Levant do what Catherine asked nicely of them in the very beginning of the war.
Politics, eh?

Typos found:

-Lanterns were not helping the Pilgrim stand, gently but firmly /

Lanterns were now helping the Pilgrim stand, gently but firmly -that was then the Choir of Mercy took offence / that was when the Choir of Mercy took offence

Barthumphries

That's always been one my favourites.
Add "of" after "one"

but losing a third of your Name was nothing something to be shrugged off.
Change nothing to not

Not going to check the "notify me of new comments" box because this website sends every comment as a new email and frankly I don't want that many emails clogging up my inbox. Author can get my email address if necessary, hopefully nobody else wants to respond to this because I don't see a way for me to realize that anyone responded.

Brendan

And so begins the friendship between the angry horse people, and the angry hill people.

werafdsaew

Who is this acquaintance? Razin Tanja or the Pilgrim?

maximillian999

Definitely Razin.

Clmineith

I'm pretty sure Tarik cannot be offended, ever.

ciara

You say that, but try eating a corpse in front of him

Mental Mouse

"Hey, that guy is long past all suffering."

Fayhem

You. I like you.

Tom

"I could only get my hands on Dormer pale," Adjutant apologetically said.

My lips twitched.

"See, now I know that's a lie," I replied.

"This is going to be a hand joke, isn't it," he sighed, sounding resigned.

"If I say yes," I murmured, "are you going to lose it?"

—
Loved this, especially while she's still propping Tariq up and ignoring Malanza desperately trying to get her to deal with the frantic Levantines.... I was a little frustrated at the interludes carrying on for five chapters when we already knew that Cat & Pilgrim were going to come back together. But they ended up working wonderfully as the setup for the humor here. 😊

Domifax

Are corrections (typos) appreciated?

If yes maybe it would make sense to have a discord text channel or something similar dedicated to it – or is there already one and I'm just too slow to notice?.

Andrew Mitchell

There's a discord. If you go back a few chapters, and look at the first comment, you'll find the link.

Liliet

EE is not active on the discord though. People usually leave typos in the comment section, and erratic sometimes fixes some of them sometimes not -_-

This is a first draft

SpeckofStardust

This is where she needs to be held up because her leg gave out due to shock/lack of sleep.

Liliet

I love how great a perspective UTTERLY EXHAUSTED Catherine provides to all this. Perfect serenity because her field of fucks has burned down and been salted, abject refusal to follow what everyone is doing / inability to follow what they're saying, random trains of thought getting interrupted by even more random trains of thought, and in the end, WOW IS IT HER BIRTHDAY OR WHAT

♥ ♥ ♥

Andrew Mitchell

Yep. I can't WAIT to see her reaction at the beginning of the next chapter. 😊

Liliet

~~my bet is on falling over unconscious from exhaustion overwhelming the sheer effort to take this in after all sorry Hakram there's only so much your tonic can do~~

Euodiachloris

As a foundling, who knows? It could actually be her birthday. 😊

Liliet

YEP 😊

Euodiachloris

I wonder when the Houses of Light are going to wake up to the fact that Cat hasn't got a Name?

That could be their out: she might still kind of follow Below, but she's apparently not especially favoured by that lot, either (Heck, she might even conceivably be in the "mildly disappointed in you" books). The Houses can gloss over the issue of her not exactly getting stripped of her Name so much as her willingly trading it in for other things, but...

Shveiran

She is the high priestess of the murder crow goddesses of the drows.

"But she is not the Squire, now" really feels like trying to hide behind a tattered napkin, while sitting on a purple, luminous elephanth

Euodiachloris

Sve Noc aren't in Below's favourite favourites books either, however. 😊

Except, nobody has stopped to check that. Everybody sees dark-scary-murder-crows and just assumes. For some reason. 😊

Fayhem

> Sve Noc aren't in Below's favourite favourites books either, however. 😊

Eh, I don't really know how to even tell if that was so. Below seems weirdly chill about people going against them;

I'd guess it probably ties into the whole "if you can do it, then you had the right to". So they'll happily murder your face off (or exterminate your species maybe, y'know whatevs) to stop you when you're trying to go against them, but if you actually pull it off then it's like they just go "well guess you proved your point, good show old chap".

And the Mighty do still have all their murder-miracles which are supposedly the Below equivalent of what the priests of Light get up to, in terms of relative power source I mean. Which I guess would mean Sve Noc are gods, yes, but they're gods in a way where they're sort of like the Below-equivalent of angels. Which is horrifying, and therefore perfect.

Liliet

I think Sve Noc are rather more directly in charge of Night than angels are to Light. Above and Heavens are ultimately one structure; Below is a smattering of independent agents. I suspect Below couldn't take away the Mighty's powers even if they tried, at this point.

Fayhem

> I think Sve Noc are rather more directly in charge of Night than angels are to Light.

They're certainly a lot more hands-on! As we've just seen though, angels are just as capable of stripping away Light as the Sisters are of stripping away the Night. So I think the difference is more one of temperament and approach than of actual authority.

> Above and Heavens are ultimately one structure

Wha? It's been explicitly tagged in the text on multiple occasions that the Choirs don't always see eye-to-eye.

> Below is a smattering of independent agents.

I don't know that anyone's ever actually seen a direct (as opposed to self-identified) representative of Below in Creation. Tbf that very absence can certainly be taken as implying something in the line of what you're saying, but implying \neq demonstrating to my mind.

> I suspect Below couldn't take away the Mighty's powers even if they tried, at this point.

Impossible to know, since my take on it is still that they'd never feel moved to. But if there's a question of could it's only that we don't know to what extent the Gods-with-a-capital-G may be constrained from direct action. There's zero question of whether they would have the power to; in the Guideverse, the Gods aren't naturally occurring phenomena within Creation, they're the architects of Creation (hence that being the name for it). If you're strong enough to spin reality itself out of metaphysical whole cloth, nobody and nothing internal to your creation is going to be able to give you a hard time in a direct head-to-head.

Liliet

>They're certainly a lot more hands-on! As we've just seen though, angels are just as capable of stripping away Light as the Sisters are of stripping away the Night. So I think the difference is more one of temperament and approach than of actual authority

Yes, but no entity other than Sisters can grant / take away Night, or at least does so that we know of.

>Wha? It's been explicitly tagged in the text on multiple occasions that the Choirs don't always see eye-to-eye.

? They can be working together and not always in agreement, that's normal. I'm not saying they're one entity, I'm saying they're one structure. They at least aim to be allies.

>I don't know that anyone's ever actually seen a direct (as opposed to self-identified) representative of Below in Creation. Tbf that very absence can certainly be taken as implying something in the line of what you're saying, but implying \neq demonstrating to my mind.

We might or might not have WoG on this... We certainly know that devils are Below's equivalent to angels, and, well, we know how those work.

>Impossible to know, since my take on it is still that they'd never feel moved to.

Right, yeah. I mean something along the lines of 'couldn't do it just on a whim without breaking rules they and Gods Above agreed on for non-intervention'.

Insanenoodlyguy

Yeah, but it would still work. Remember that this is not a world of mass communication. So you tell the masses of Procer "The Black Queen is damned no longer, her name has been taken back by the hated Gods Below. She joined the band of five to stop the machinations of the Dead King and saved 3 armies, Angels themselves spoke of her deeds, and even allowed her to ressurect the fallen Hero Grey Pilgrim. She is arch-heretic no longer, as she has now set upon the path of redemption and comes to fight the Dead King in her pennance"

Is that some half-truths mixed in with pure bullshit? Absolutely. But it'll sell. Especially because the last part indicates (truthfully) that she's coming to bring help in a very dire situation. Sure, it won't hold up anywhere she actually travels through, but that's not most of the country, and by the time somebody on the street can put together a "Hey wait a minute..." moment, she'll actually be there, actually helping, and the layman's morality questions will take a back seat to the thought of "Well, whatever. Not the first time the high ups have sold us crap. She really is out there hacking zombie's heads off, good enough I guess."

Shveiran

Well, I was expecting a much more triumphant return, but apparently the ones who expected the Levantines to cry "bloody undead" were right.

In retrospect, I could see the dreams being interpreted as a warning by some. Like "the Pilgrim is dead, see? if you see a Pilgrim somewhere, it's an imposter! Be warned!"

Still, this was quite nice nonetheless.

Insanenoodlyguy

It does make sense. The dreams seemed to have a weight of truth behind them, so everybody who had them would swear up and down "No, he's definitely dead. not a little dead, not nearly dead, he died, I'd swear upon it." And he's the only hero we've seen with a Resurrection ability, and she is a known necromancer taught by a known necromancer.

Without knowing of her power stealing trick, the absolute kindest interpretation of this is that she raised his body because she herself was so exhausted she couldn't drag it back any other way. In which case a pious Levantine is still being affronted and screaming "How did you think we'd think this was okay you get your unholy energy out of that sacred man's corpse this instant!"

peterplful

I was expecting the Pilgrims resurrection to go horribly wrong, like the Pilgrim clawing at his face while performing an unnatural scream, or its dead eyes taking a shade of gold while in Keter a smile crept upon a dead mans face while he murmured 'Mistake' kind of wrong.

There is power in repetition as Kat said, but also predictability and Kat's repeated refusal to accept whatever carrots fate tosses her way and strong arm her terms (even at price) is bound to become something the Bard or the Dead King can exploit.

Liliet

Mhm.

The probability that this is in fact actually Tariq somehow is so fucking wild, I'm strongly not blaming them for not exactly jumping to that conclusion.

Liliet

(I love that the Choir's version of a 'whoops the news were a bit premature awkward how that turned out' is 'SMITE THE UNBELIEVERS')

Euodiachloris

It was less a smiting and more one of those brown envelopes with a notification that your driver's license has been revoked due to a sneaky speed trap camera and the automatic points accrued going over the limit you were never previously informed was there. 🤪

Liliet

yep ;u;
'hmmm awkward I MEAN HOW DARE YOU'

Mental Mouse

I suspect the priestess' punishment was basically for trying an attack instead of a divination.

Liliet

For not being gentle enough.

~~For not listening to Catherine~~

daegone823

Okay this chapter plus the resurrection chapter has actually given character to a choir. I love when the choir is given personality traits. They are like a parent who has pushed there child to follow aa certain path.

When the pilgrim sacrificed himself to save the many he truly embodied the choir's teachings. Still they wept surrounding him, then they to saw the possibility of retrieving there most loyal and dear follower allowing a dammed villain to save him.

After making such allowances it must have been hard then to have a priest question there perfect child who has made sacrifice after sacrifice. To question his existence after they brought back in their own eyes is there version of Jesus. The priest s should be glad all they lost was there grace and they weren't burnt to a crisp on the spot.

I guess that was there way of saying ungrateful.

Mental Mouse

> then they saw the possibility of retrieving their most loyal and dear follower

And perhaps, of leaving their mark on the greatest villain of the age. I still think the Hashmallim did that to Cat, leading to her famous tendencies to self-flagellation. (Heck, not only did we notice it, so did her friends). Now she's also been touched by Mercy.

Liliet

This sure is an interesting version!

ereshkigala

I wanna see Tariq's response to a certain shade.

AKUA: you thought you were the first enemy she forgave, old man?

TARIQ: omgwtfbq

Mental Mouse

Akua: "Sorry, no BBQing me, I'm a little past that."

Insanenoodlyguy

"So, are you going to try and seduce her too? I'll make you a deal: one of us succeeds, we try to get her to invite the other to bed as well" pilgrim coughs up blood.

"Oh dont go that route. Trust me, if she went for that I'd have been getting some the first night. Blood I have given her, trust me."

onedollargum

Cat gave away a sword and a forgiveness for a chance of peace. Nice trade!

Silverking

Wait, what were the 3 slights that Cat said the Blood committed against her?

werafdsaew

Pointing swords at her, accusing her of doing necromancy on Pilgrim, and putting words in her mouth.

superkeaton

Huh. Nice. Normally you just get a refund when you return something at the desk, but getting a shiny new endorsement for a worn-out priest is some lovely value.

Sherlock M

It only took me two weeks to get here... FINALLY.

And now, I have to wait til Mon... (tears)

Mental Mouse

Also, that climax...

> Least costly to me, who'd merely tossed away the chance in the future that one dear to me could be stolen back from death ... Chances like that one came only once ... and spurning what had been offered would ensure there was no repetition.

I don't think that was "spurned". Strangely enough, I suspect Pilgrim had become dear to Cat despite their opposition. And then...

> So, I idly wondered, what kind of a largely ceremonial gesture would be made. Amusedly, I wondered if I was about to be made some manner of Blood.

The Blood, ceremoniously: Screw the Lanterns, we're backing you to join the Alliance.

Cat: 0_0

werafdsaew

"Need my stick, old bones?" I asked. "I'll let you borrow it if you promise to give it back."

Can't the Pilgrim just get another staff?

Fayhem

> Can't the Pilgrim just get another staff?

My best answer: maybe? Given his vast experience in matters of heroic narrative, I trust Tariq's judgment of whether his story needs him to show some visible change like not having a staff anymore in light of his recent dramatic events (which would be my best guess for why he potentially couldn't just get a new staff). So basically if he does get a new staff, then I'll take that as meaning he could, and if he doesn't then I'd assume that means he's concluded he can't (at least not without some story-shenanigans like how Cat got offered a shiny new sword in Liesse).

Chapter 53: Avowed

*"Count them all, in the snow
Red and gold and black as night
Count them all, high and low
Seven crowns broken by rite
Brought they forth, in accord
Peace, oaths and a sword."
-Iserran children's rhyme*

If felt like the fact that my hands were currently filled with a pipe and liquor might be detracting some from the solemnity of this occasion, but maybe it was just me. Gods, I wished I'd gotten ten hours of sleep in me before having to parse this. On the surface this seemed like a coup, but not looking further than the surface was how you lost feathers at this game. Levant was backing my bid for being a member of the Grand Alliance, and Ashur had been struck down into irrelevance by the Battle of Thalassina and then being knifed in the back by the League. I forced my tired mind to keep slogging on, but as far as I could see the heart of what this meant was that if I made a bargain with Cordelia Hasenbach – which, given the amount of things I had to trade, I should be able to – then Callow would be brought into the fold. Was this a case of putting a leash on the beast you couldn't defeat, an attempt by the Pilgrim to bind me to his causes? It hardly mattered, though, in the end. I'd been trying to get a foothold in those treaties for years now, and if they were seeking a peace because they thought they could win that where war had failed them then I could live with that. Because I, too, sought more than my signature on declarations of alliance from this. I would get the Liesse Accords signed, and whatever else could be said of tonight it was also was a step towards that end.

Discretely as I could in this situation, which wasn't all that much, I pressed back the flask into Hakram's hand and hide the pipe behind my arm to empty it into the snow. Already I was half-wishing I'd drunk the whole thing, as much for the wine's touch of warmth in the face of the cold morning air as the tonic that'd shaken off some the lethargy clawing at my thoughts. Leaning against the dead yew offering I'd found in the depths of Twilight, where lied the grave of king the world had decreed to be good, I shivered but matched their expectant gazes.

"I have one foe," I said, "and he dwells north, behind the walls of Keter, where his tyranny lies serene. Everything else is chaff."

Would that I had my cloak, as much for warmth as for the presence it lent.

"You have bled my people," I said. "And we have done the same to you, every one of us dancing on damned strings. Let that end with this dawn, for we share one war still and it will not be found on this field."

"War on Keter," Aquiline Osená called out, voice loud and clear. "Honour in victory, and should doom find us then honour in defiance unbent."

The last word clapped out like a challenge, proud and finding reflection in those that heard it.

"War to the north," Razin Tanja agreed, his words ringing out. "As oath was sworn in Blood and smoke. The shames we will redeem, the graces we will earn."

"To the Crown of the Dead we bring steel," Itima Ifriqui smiled, hard-toothed and starved. "Through wasteland and snow, until tall walls come to echo our scorn."

"Oath was given. War to the knife," Yannu Marava said, eyes cold and limpid, "to ruin and carrion things and silent dusk. Let Creation know that the Dominion of Levant marches to war, and the sword will not return to the sheath until the Enemy has broken or we are dust."

Would my countrymen have shivered this way, I wondered as I watched the fire light in the eyes of the warriors around us, if a king of the Old Kingdom had called on their oaths? I remembered still the sight of Edward Fairfax standing bedecked in bells and spite, the words that heady call that'd sounded beyond the veil of death – rise, Callowans, rise once more for we have debts yet unsettled – and called the sum of my failures to war. It was a bastard throne I had made, and bastard was the claim I had on those who had chosen to follow me into strife. This, though? It was older, purer. The stuff fables were made of. I watched it ripple through the hundreds of armsmen around us, that intangible weight that betrayed history's gears turning. Sometimes, I thought, it didn't have to be a scheme. Sometimes the stars were aligned and Creation let fate flow like water down the river. A hundred thousand touches too light and too small to have been seen, conspiring to shape something grim or beautiful or both. The Levantines sounded swords and axes on shield, though this was no acclamation: the rhythm sounded like a strange dirge, like grief and doom and wonder.

"The Anthem of Smoke," Princess Rozala Malanza murmured under her breath.

It was, I remembered, one of the great story-songs of their people. Not unlike Here They Come Again for mine, or perhaps Red The Flowers. There was an anger to the tune, I thought, and why would there not be? Levant had been born of bloody, merciless rebellion. Their Named were not the white-clad knights of the Old Kingdom, the tricksters and preachers of the League or even the blinkered, colourful exemplars of Procer. No, that lot had tasted the blood in the mouth from the start, hadn't they? Slayer, red-handed killers one and all. Binder, shackling doom to ride it to war. Brigand – that incongruous Chantant word in Levantine hands, the scornful dismissal of bandit instead turned into declaration of war. Even the Champion had stood for a people who'd preferred burning their own homes to surrendering it. And at the heart of them all a Pilgrim in grey, and how did the famous line go again? His stride rebellion and stirring ember. Oh, theirs were not the finest armies I had seen. They lacked discipline, lacked training, lacked equipment. But they were brave, I thought, and the manner of savagery I saw in their bearing I thought might be kin to the sort I'd glimpsed in another hard people. One I'd come to trust, and in many ways they was still the backbone of my armies.

One served as my right hand, too, and another as the marshal of my hosts.

Savages as they might be, I thought, striking each other at every turn and writing honour's couplets in blood, but when the dark pivots came they wouldn't break easy. It was slight, and fading, but there remained something in them of the people who'd humbled the Principate when it stood at the height of its power. May the Hidden Horror yet choke on it. I stood in silence until the hammering of steel on steel ended, trailing off into the clearing sky.

"So be it," the Grey Pilgrim said.

And oh, he sounded exhausted but there was a brightness to his voice as well I'd rarely heard there before. Pride, I thought, if not without sadness. I could not blame him, for Levant had sworn anew to do the right thing and that never, ever came without a price.

"I stand witness to oaths sworn again, and let none break them while claiming honour," he said. "Let it be remembered that when the Enemy came for the world, Levant did not shirk its duty."

The sound of steel sliding out of its sheath drew all gazes to my side, where Rozala Malanza had drawn the slender blade at her side. In the morning's cast the princess was a sight, long dark curls loose behind her and matched in shine only by the gleam in those equally dark eyes. Tall and curved but hard-handed, as much general as she was princess, the Princess of Aquitan breathed out mist. In war too, had that one been forged. Her mother's war, the one whose defeat had haunted her life, but other since. The Battle of the Camps, where ambitions were ruined and I first tasted the fear that would lead me down the road to Keter. This one as well, though, had left a mark. A princes' graveyard, Leonor of Valencis had called it, one from which only one crown emerged untouched. Her own, for having judged it less than the lives of the people it ruled over. I'd admired the gesture then, and still did now. Of all the princes and princesses of Procer I had beheld, none save the First Prince herself could be said to have character worthier of respect.

"I am not the First Prince," she said. "Yet I stand the sole of my title in Iserre, and the south entire. I speak only to that, which is right enough to my eye."

I studied her in silence, not alone in this: so did the four of the Blood, and the Pilgrim as well. The Peregrine had been at her side before, I remembered, when he'd led the heroes of the northern crusade.

"We have been foe before," Rozala said, princess still but in that moment Arlesite even more, "on Levant we warred, unjustly, for many years. And to the east, across the mountains..."

She looked at me then, and I did not soften gaze or offer sympathy. I still remembered the bloody gaps left in the ranks of my army after I'd awoke from Winter's grasp, on the last day of the Camps, and though war was war even if I did not count it grudge neither would I simply forget it.

"We spoke righteous words, and schemed that which was not," the Princess of Aquitan said. "A fresh entry to a tally long kept of contempts offered unprovoked. I say this not to apologize, for I bear not so great a crown it can change the lay of the past, but to..."

She hesitated, struggling for the word.

"Acknowledge," Rozala Malanza said. "That even though treaties were signed, that alliances were made and bargains struck, we did not earn this. That in the face of the darkness what we have sown might have seen us stand alone, if you all had not chosen to heed beliefs of a higher order."

She let out what might have been a laugh had it not been utterly without mirth.

"To acknowledge that there were choices to be made and you chose to act in honour," she said. "Knowing that like the viper of old lore we have sunk our fangs in the flesh of our benefactors before, still you chose. And I cannot – I cannot offer anything for it that would not be insult."

She'd stumbled, in the last sentence, like it'd been disgraceful to speak it.

"There are no honours I could grant that would be higher than those you claimed simply by making this decision," Princess Rozala said, raising her chin. "I will not pretend that wealth or promises would be worth the blood you have and will shed, though should you wish them of me you have all I own. Yet I can, Merciful Gods, at least I can say that this was heard. That it will be remembered, that it will not slip quiet into obscurity once the menace has passed."

She breathed out shallowly.

"Shame on us," Rozala Malanza softly said, "if we ever forget it."

Her sword she thrust into the ground, through snow and ice and earth, and it bit deep.

"And if ever comes to that," she said. "On that day I, or one of my line, will come for that sword again. To take it up and wield it until the shame has been cleansed."

My fingers clenched. That had not been small oath, I thought, or a feeble one. The Princess of Aequitan had sworn, in her own way, that should Procer turn against those who were coming to its help in its hour of need she would rise in rebellion. No, more than just her. She had sworn as a Malanza and bound her entire line to the oath.

"Rozala Malanza," the Grey Pilgrim called out, voice clear and bright, "hail."

Like a snake uncoiling the call spread through the Levantines, Blood and not, until the hail rang out like thunder. Softly I struck the butt of my staff against the ground, looking at the sword and wondering what manner of curse would take anyone trying to take it up save in fulfillment of the oath. There'd been a weight to the princess' words, Named or not, and such a thing was rarely without consequence. No, they'd remember Rozala's Oath for many years to come. After the last hail died, like the wind had gone out of all of us we began to disperse. The force that had held us all spellbound had ebbed, used to nothingness or passed afar.

And so the great battle on the plains of Iserre ended with three things: peace, oaths, and a sword in the ground.

—

I could feel the vigor leeching out of me as we began walking downhill, the half-scattered Levantines parting respectfully for us. Princess Rozala had made her own way down, apart from Hakram and I and directly headed towards the horse and foot she'd brought. I'd traded a meaningful look with Tariq before we parted ways, both of us aware that there would be need for talks of all sorts in the days to come. Gripping as the exchanges on the hill had been in their own way, they would amount to little and less if the diplomatic legwork did not follow behind the grand gestures. Verbal agreements at sunrise made between recent enemies were not actual treaties, though my life would be a great deal simpler if they were. Still, I'd be useless before I got some sleep in me and Tariq was in even worse state: freshly-resurrected, robbed of an aspect and with no finger on the pulse of where his people had been headed before we returned. I, at least, could rest certain that Vivienne and Juniper would keep things running as they should in my absence. With Hakram to watch over them, these days I did not need to keep nearly as close an eye on the Army of Callow's workings as I had in the early days.

It was for the best, in my opinion. I still believed myself a fair hand as a general and an occasionally inspired tactician, but the army could not come to rely on me. Black, when he'd first forged the modern Legions of Terror, had been very careful to ensure that his presence and Name would be supplement but never required. The Legions, and now the Army, must be perfectly capable of functioning without my being involved. It freed my hand to address other perils, true, but there was also an issue of legacy — I would build no host that would be crippled by my death or abdication, whichever came first. I'd been taught better than that. Two cohorts and a pale-faced General Abigail were awaiting us when we reached the bottom of the hill, which had me casting a mildly reproachful look at Adjutant. She was far too high-placed an officer to be in command here if someone higher up the ladder had not requested it. The culprit seemed obvious, and after the general hurriedly distanced herself from us under pretence of leading the cohorts back to camp from the front, turned out to be unabashed.

"Wanted to see how she holds up under pressure," he quietly told me in Kharsum.

"She's held command in battles without folding in the slightest," I pointed out in the same. "She's a twitchy thing, mind you, I won't deny that. But she thinks fast on her feet and she's got the right instincts."

"Reminds you of anyone?" Adjutant mildly said.

I rolled my eyes.

"I was never all that shy when it came to getting into scraps," I replied. "Not every canny Callowan girl is my kin in spirit."

"If you say so," he teased.

"I do," I said. "And you're being cagey. Haven't told you anything you didn't already know, so what's your actual reason for bringing her along?"

"There's more than one kind of pressure," Hakram said. "Many moving parts, tonight, and many ways it could have spun out of control."

I grunted, conceding the point. Keeping the lid on the pot was different than keeping your head screwed on straight when the blades were already out.

"So?" I asked.

"She kept her head," he said, almost approvingly. "General staff material, that one. She'd also thank you for sending her far from the frontlines."

"She needs accolades first," I murmured. "A few feats under her belt. Otherwise the nobles will squeeze her too easily."

The bastard system of fresh Callowan rule I would be passing on to my successor had governors holding many of the great territories that'd once belonged to the aristocracy, but the nobles hadn't been stamped out. Yet there were still baronies up north, Duchess Kegan in Daoine and even highborn stripped of their lands still held a lot of influence. Though the unspoken threat of my disapproval – paired with the open secret I was less than fond of aristocrats – had kept a true noble faction from forming since the effective dissolution of the Regals, there was no guarantee such a state of affairs would be maintained under whoever followed after me. Rebellions or even just unrest, would be a nasty turn after the way Callow had exhausted and would further exhaust itself prosecuting war against the Dead King. Best to nip that in the bud with a large standing army whose head would be both popular with the people and not bound to any of the great nobles and dignitaries of Callow. Whether Abigail of Summerholm could be that woman still remained to be seen, but for now she was at least the foremost candidate. I was shaken out of the reverie I'd slipped into when thinking when I caught sight of a familiar silhouette approaching. Ivah, by now well-known in the Army of Callow's circles, found the shield wall opening for it without a comment.

General Abigail glanced askance at me, silently asking whether her presence would be required for the conversation that'd follow, but I shook my head. And tried not to be too visibly amused at her poorly-hidden relief.

"Ivah," I greeted the drow. "Still up, I see."

"My tasks have yet to end, Losara Queen," it replied. "I bring forth message from your shade, as well as your mantle."

It did, in fact, have my cloak with it. It spread it out, though not before handing me a small stripe of parchment, and I turned to the side to cast better light on it. He is one again, Akua had written me. Losses were slight. Exhaustion will keep him slumbering for a time. A tired smile stretched out my lips. It'd been a damned ride of a night, but there'd been more victories than defeats. Foremost among them was that my father's soul had been reattached to his body and he'd wake before too long, whole and not greatly lessened by the experience. Akua had come through for me once more, as she was in the habit of doing these days. Good news. I thought I'd heard a scuffle behind, but when I glanced there was nothing out of the ordinary. Hakram laid the Mantle of Woe on my shoulders and I breathed out in comfort. It was not so warm as that, but I'd grown used to it more than I'd ever believed I would.

"Masego is stable?" I asked.

"He is," Hakram gravelled. "And still asleep. We have him watched."

I snorted.

"Archer let you post guards?" I asked. "Which brings to mind, did Roland return to the Proceran camp in the end?"

"The Rogue Sorcerer," Adjutant frowned. "Archer was not sent out on a task?"

My stomach dropped.

"No, she wasn't," I said. "You haven't seen her or the Sorcerer, I take it."

"They did not come to our camp," he said. "And neither were mentioned to me otherwise."

"Shit," I muttered. "Did anyone recently move their – no, you don't even need to answer that."

I sighed.

"Still got that flask, Hakram?" I asked.

He nodded, though his eyes were curious.

"Hand it to me," I grunted. "I'll need the tonic if I'm to have talks with Kairos."

epokki

Hey EE, any chance you could check email regarding the art thing?

Also heres the links incase I cut in line with this msg.

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>
– <https://www.patreon.com/user?u=3523924>

Javvies

Good show, Rozala.

Ah. Fucking Kairos. I keep saying this – he needs to get murdered most thoroughly as soon as possible.

lankyZ

Does he really though?

...

... yes.

yes he does.

naturalnuke

Unquestionably number one on the list of things that need to be done.

Alivaril

...The ending of this chapter feels a bit like a bit of a disappointment after the excellent climax that was the last few chapters. I feel as though the story would've been better served by having an honest wrapup instead of letting the top keep spinning.

But my opinions don't mean you shouldn't vote! <http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Andrew Mitchell

IMO it was an honest wrap-up AND one part of the top kept spinning. This feels realistic and appropriate. Kairos still wants his seat at the table when negotiations start.

Agent J

Yes, I would have greatly appreciated a proper conclusion as well. I'm bloody exhausted, maybe not as much as Cat, but I could use some downtime myself.

Now we've more Kairos bullshit to deal with? Ugh. I honestly thought it'd be a while before he pulled something again. Doesn't he know when to gracefully leave the stage.

Shveiran

EE is very good at pacing, but this does feel like a (very rare) mistake to me.

I think the interludes were meant to both make us reconnect with the army and catch our breath; they achieved the first objective nicely, but to me the emotional stress primarily comes from Cat's tension, as I connect mostly with her because protagonist. The fact that she hasn't stopped since the battle started is draining. Personally, I'd have much preferred if Cat got her nap and, upon waking, found out that Idrani had not yet come back. One chapter ending with the sweet bliss of sleep would have done wonders, IMO.

Draeysine

I agree for the most part.

But you forget that there is no rest for wicked

Liliet

I disagree.

People have been talking about how everything feels too fine. The longer Cat keeps up a streak of victories, the more that tension builds – what's the next show to drop?

For people who think in tropes in a manner similar to hers, this is a godsdamned relief, and not a moment too soon -_-

Dainpdf

You talk as if losing Masego's sorcery, revealing her secret weapon, the Bard getting a victory, the Dead King getting a victory, the Pilgrim losing the Forgive button, AND the Saint dying aren't all various shoes that have dropped just over the last couple of chapters.

Liliet

Long-term, remember that Cat came into this with a plan to kill Laurence de Montfort and even halfway through Tariq had to bargain with her to get her to agree to try to not kill her. That one was a shoe, true enough, but it was a fairly light one.

Simply the dramatic timing of everything going well for Cat has never not been followed up with if minor but a hiccup. The hiccup coming on time just... serves as a confirmation that all the rest of it has indeed been a success.

Dainpdf

Cat came with a plan to kill Laurence because you always have a plan to kill things and Laurence was often antagonistic. She did not want to do so now, both because she did not want to blow her surprise weapon and because she did not want to kill Saint yet.

Shveiran

Agreed. And even discarding Saint, there is all the rest. Cat had a series of victories, but she bled for them all the way. She has surrendered a lot of control, throughout the thing: e.g. gaining the Sorcerer's ear is a victory, no two ways about it, but at the same time Masego was crippled. She gained an alliance with the drow, while losing Winter: a good thing, and yet a more fragile one because the drow do not, ultimately, answer to her.

This is a trend.

Now, considering the major victory here was legitimacy, and we had confirmation the heroic scene trusts Bard in a big way, everything here is a balancing act with the (supposed) real Big Bad of the setting holding the higher ground.

These victories had a cost, and are not gained once and for all: they have to be defended.

How someone can say that things are going too well is honestly beyond me.

Dainpdf

Honestly, I count losing winter as balanced in itself. Less raw power, but also less fae in her brain.

Javvies

She's also vastly more vulnerable to physical attacks. And probably also most magical attacks. Though she doesn't have Fae-specific magical weaknesses anymore, either.

Cat may or may not have more magical power at night now, but she has way less during the day. And sure, she had limits and limited skill/knowledge with exercising the power of Winter. On the other hand, if she got into a fight, Winter Queen Cat could always (and usually did) rely on her physical prowess to murderize her opponents, even if she couldn't or didn't use Winter magical power. Nowadays, if Cat can't use Night, she's extremely limited in a fight.

She also can't do the same kind of magically enforced oaths.

Plus, Akua's leash is a whole lot looser nowadays.

It's mixed, but trading Winter for Night is likely a long term net loss for Cat on a personal power level, especially if we exclude Sve Noc and their ability to boost Cat's powers and supplement them with their knowledge and experience.

Dainpdf

You forgot to count the "won't act in ways that are actually counter to her own interests".

Some might argue that was not a reduction in personal power, but it was definitely a reduction in effective personal power, which is what matters.

Great force is not very useful if applied in the wrong direction.

danh3107

Pretty sweet chapter!

Erratic the side bar for this story is all messed up though.

antoninjohn

Really Kairos, really. How could you betray your most trusted friends like that

Insanenoodlyguy

Why would inviting his tired friends to stick with him (no doubt with armed escort in order to ensure their safety in their exhausted state) be a betrayal?

Decius

It would get boring if he kept betraying his most trusted friends the same way over and over. Sometimes he has to spice it up a bit.

Soma

Fucking Kairos. He's really gone from comic relief to at best an irritation. An agent of chaos who is utterly predictable is tedious.

It's a good chapter, I'm just annoyed that Kairos keeps delaying plot and more fun interactions. I suppose I soured on him when he broke up the five man band.

Nafram

It WOULD have been better to see him get what he wanted through keeping it nice and stable despite all odds to the contrary, but alas

Javvies

He acts just too over the top evul for the sake of evulz ... and he's long since past the point where that could still be funny ... especially given his recent methods. And he's made of hax and bullshit.

And he made a deal with Bard.

Plus whatever he's got going on with Heirarch (who also isn't funny anymore – he hasn't been funny since he got the Name and stopped being Anaxares).

Masterofbones

I think you are quite close to the truth. I liked Kairos when he was surviving under his own power. He was an absurd but powerful entity that always survived by his own will and craftiness.

But now that he has the bard's blessing, he does as he likes and everyone has to ignore him. His survival is no longer a miracle, its just an annoyance.

Shveiran

On the other hand, I speculate the next arch will be about him and Anaxares, so I think we can reliably expect him to bite it by the end of the current book.

Ekmo

There's always room for one more on the Mantle...

Euodiachloris

All together now: what has he done? How bad is it?

Hakurei06

Looks like there's no rest for the wicked.

Andrew Mitchell

Nor for the righteous, it seems.

erebus42

Poor Cat, no rest for the wicked indeed.
Good on Rozala, I do enjoy how they keep setting up potential future Stories and Plot-points even though they probably won't be relevant or come to fruition during this particular Story.
Also, Ivah is awesome as always, even when acting as a delivery person.

Mental Mouse

One sword waiting in Twilight Throneless, one in Iserre Redeemed. Perhaps the third will be in Keter,...

Big Brother

Nope, it's gonna be the Hashmallim's feather Cat spread across the lakes of Callow

IDKWhoitis

So Archer and Rogue lost due to schenaigns or are they on a hunter killer mission, to wrap up one lose end?

Im placing a bet on "captured", which means there will be some light bargains to be made.

I also expect there to be no negotiation for at least 2 days while Cat and Pilgrim recuperate from the shitshow that just went down.

Mental Mouse

> Im placing a bet on “captured”,

So, it seems, is Cat. Though in fact, it might be her best bet is to send Ivah and a few friends, while she and her people recover. Not like Archer and RS aren’t eminently capable, and with a hand from outside...

> some light bargains to be made

Or the opposite: “Kinda dark in here, isn’t it? Now, lets discuss your prisoners...”

Sugar Roll

Did Hakram and Ivah have a scuffle for the mantle? I think we have a little rivalry going on as to who’s the better right hand man right here.

Andrew Mitchell

Yep, I think so. And Hakram won, it seems. Maybe Ivah just needs to learn his place.

Mental Mouse

> Maybe Ivah just needs to learn his place.

Or at least learn that Hakram has the reach on him. 😊

Isi Arnott-Campbell

*It.

Andrew Mitchell

My bad on that one too. 😊 Thanks for the reminder.

Edward Kim

I didn’t catch that bit, but reading it again and it’s hilarious XD

konstantinvoncarstein

At long last, hope has come, and the true enemy will be fought.

Andrew Mitchell

Yes, it’s about time the Bard was dealt with! 😊

konstantinvoncarstein

I was speaking of Neshamah 😊

Andrew Mitchell

Where you?!? 😊

Yes, I know you were. But we know he's not really the "true enemy".

geoffpburns

We have had enough epigraphs quoting the future history of the "uncivil wars" that suggests that this is not going to end with everyone joining hands and singing Kambaya.

Praes is likely to get a civil war with a conflict between Malicia and Black.

Tariq is likely to find it harder to control the Seljun now that he's given up his crown. So here could be a civil war there.

Procer has already had a civil war, but could be in for a second one once the threat of the Hidden Horror has passed. There are 7 principalities that can't be happy that Cordelia stabbed them in the back straight after their Princes took one for the team and there is bound to be consequences from Rozala's oath.

You have to wonder how long Kairos is going to be able to keep Hierarch under control. Having Hierarch place Kairos under trail would be interesting.

We don't know what Bard is up to, but once it is revealed there is likely to be some shuffling of who is in which camp.

There has been some reaction with 4/5 of Levant and 1/23 of Procer coming under the influence of a Villian. Even if Mercy is okay with it the other choirs are going to object.

Soronel Haetir

So how far is Cat from forgetting her oath to Vivian regarding Akua? Given Callowan sensibilities that could not be a good idea.

Oshi

She hasn't forgotten it. The worst thing you can do to Akua is to make her see her life in stark relief and die knowing the only time she succeeded was in being everything she was taught not to be.

I've always suspected her death will be wrapped up in either the destruction of the Bard or the death of the Empire.

Mental Mouse

If not the destruction of the Dead King. Regardless, it will certainly complete her redemption.

Hitogami

She is from Callow, as much as she may start to like Akua, the debt will be paid.

TeK

So, can Kairos get around restriction on lies, by choocing a herald and telling him what he wants him to say?

Andrew Mitchell

Oh, for sure IMO. Karios is also the sort of person to be able to tell people things that are technically the truth, but actually mislead.

Oshi

He doesn't need to get around restrictions. He just has to tell the truth that fits what he wants to say. Lies were never Kairos's gift.

Shveiran

This. I really don't get what the Pilgrim was thinking that time. It's like cursing Superman to make him incapable of using weapons. It's not like I can't imagine a situation where that hinders him, but no such scenario seems very likely.

Mental Mouse

> I really don't get what the Pilgrim was thinking that time.

As a Hero his options were limited anyway, and the Bard's parole further restricted them. What he's done is essentially to take a marker of sorts, one that in turn restricts Kairos' options. And story-fu can ensure it comes due at the most inconvenient time for Kairos.

Speaking of which, Cat still needs to have that chat with him about the Bard.

Liliet

Mhm. It's not a shackle, it's a landmine.

Shveiran

This makes more sense, admittedly, but why LIES of all things? Why not, I dunno, betrayals? It still feels off target, and Tariq is usually good at this sort of things.

Mental Mouse

Betrayals are perhaps too context dependent, and in any case betrayal is Kairos's story. Even with angelic backing, I don't think Pilgrim gets to just forbid a villain's own story.

Shveiran

I realize we are in the realm of speculations here, but if he doesn't get to do that, how comes he gets to enforce a substantial death penalty dependant on something that is highly subjective? The very definition of truth and lies as a concept usually comes with a huge gray field in between, and most people disagree on where the border lies. I don't know, that part sits ill with me.

Mental Mouse

He got to impose a probable death penalty (wording – it could leave Kairos mute!) because Kairos endangered everybody else's lives, including getting Indrani killed, and then also imposing a "one of you shall die" on the party.

Have you ever read any of Mercedes Lackey's Five Hundred Kingdom's books? They're excellent light fantasy, featuring a world mechanic called "the Tradition" – it's the power behind magic in that 'verse, which likewise responds to "story" (and song). The 500K books are much of my own basis for understanding the Guideverse's story mechanics, though the Tradition is more interactive. In both 'verses, "subjective" defers to "popular understanding" – tricksters do get to invoke technicalities, but only if they "make" the story.

One point that shows up in 500K a couple of times, is that every curse has to have an "out" – if a caster fails to provide one, the Tradition will, often something like "true love's kiss". That's what I'm thinking here. Saying Kairos cannot betray anyone wouldn't be leaving him an out, because "betrayal is what he does".

Saying he can't lie... well, that's a challenge, it leaves him enough room to maneuver and scheme... and risk getting caught by his own words: "This isn't the last you've seen of me" becomes a geas of sorts, protecting Kairos and possibly Pilgrim (he did get resurrected!), until the two foes meet again. Though it might not protect the Tyrant as much as he hoped, if Pilgrim comes to view Kairos' corpse (or possibly shows up as a ghost, though ghosts don't seem to be much of a thing in Guideverse).

Shveiran

It looks like even Yannu has no choice but to get back into the fold, which is good for him: he may even survive this way.

And damn, that oath was cool. Nicely done, Malanza: owning up your fuck ups is always a plus in my book.

Everyone is a big family now, which obviously means Kairos has to throw a branch in the wheels... but damn it, couldn't it have waited until after Cat's nap? I'm exhausted and drained.

Fayhem

> damn it, couldn't it have waited until after Cat's nap? I'm exhausted and drained.

I've seen a few people comment that, and I get it, I really do (because same!). But I'm thinking that might actually be the point. I think that the point is that Kairos is dragging Cat into dealing with this when she least wants to on a minimum of preparation and rest; I think that's flagging that he's going to get something from her that she might not have given up otherwise, because normally she'd be sharp enough to spot the trap. If I had to guess, probably something pertaining to the trial that will seem harmless but ultimately blow up in her face. We know Cat can match wits with Kairos as well as anyone can; I think making her do it while she's beyond bone tired is the handicap that will threaten to give Kairos the edge. Not just that, but the moment of relief after all your main goals seem to be accomplished is typically a vulnerable, unwary point for most people. So the tension will be how does she navigate this hazardous conversation under this additional handicap, and the feeling of "oh god why can't this just be over" from the audience is there because it puts us in the same boat as Cat and she's our viewpoint character so that's what you want there.

Shveiran

No, no, I get it. I share your expectations in full.

It's just that as a reader I think this is a bad choice. It feels bad. After two archs of upping the ante non-stop, with a lot of victories but never, ever a real denouement after them, I need a (fictional) nap. A moment to say: ok, this amazing, exhasuting thing is over and I can digest it before moving on to the next one.

If I was reading it all in one go... I think I would have started to lose focus half-way through because there was never a good moment to close the book and go to sleep serenely.

This is, of course, strictly personal. And even in my personal view, I'm not saying anything along the lines of "there is no pause here thus the book is ruined".

I just feel it makes the novel harder to read and enjoy.

If setting up Cat's mistake here is crucial, as it may very well be, perhaps a way to split between archs I and II could have been worked in? Something like a less strict timeframe for the band of five to depart, perhaps the need to wait for some eldritch reason that could give us a moment to digest Cat getting her truce and band and catch our breath, BEFORE jumping in the current drama? The current roping in wouldn't feel quite as exhausting on the reader's side if that was the case, I feel.

With that said, it is not a major deal: this is the kind of traps that can scare away readers, but this is a 5th book: if someone got to this point, they must trust EE to make it worth it in the end always.

I guess it doesn't REALLY matter, if that is how he wanted his work to feel.

Rup

I had this problem when I binge read PACT by Wildbow.....
.."it-gets-worse" trope is tough on the enjoyment

Shveiran

On the other hand, Wildbow IS doing it consistently and on purpose.

I, personally, don't like that.

It prevents me from enjoying the work of that extremely imaginative author because, no matter how fascinating I find his (her?) ideas, I end up constantly frustrated to the point of being actively sour. It is not for me.

That doesn't make it bad: some enjoy that sensation and find it thrilling, and there is nothing wrong with that.

I merely brought it up because this book feels a bit different from the others in this regard.

Usually, we get a break to digest Cat's ordeals or victories and prepare for the path ahead; not getting it here changes the reading experience in a significant way, IMO.

I know better than to assume EE has made a mistake; but in the off chance this was not done on purpose, I gave my two cents on the matter to draw attention to it.

Fayhem

That's fair! I, uh, don't really have much of a response beyond that, but I wanted to acknowledge your thoughtful response. 😊

Clint

I usually don't do typos, but this one took my pre-coffee'd brain a bit to parse out:

"Leaning against the dead yew offering I'd found in the depths of Twilight, where lied the grave of king the world had decreed to be good, I shivered but matched their expectant gazes."

should be:

"... where lay the grave of a king the world had decreed to be good..."

Barthumphries

I guess this is the typo thread.

If felt like

Change if to it. I didn't copy paste more because, as the very first sentence, it should be easy to find. 😊

Also not clicking to be notified of be comments because the subject line just change for each one because I get every comment in a separate email and that's just too many emails.

There were other typos, but frankly I didn't have time to copy/paste them to a separate thing to hold them until I was done reading.

talenel

Huh. It felt like the first part of the chapter was supposed to be really momentous, but it felt really flat. The typos and poor phrasing in places just made that whole beginning section just read tediously. The whole peace, oaths, sword, thing didn't do anything for me.

I guess as other have mentioned, this arcs pacing is starting to feel a bit strained. It kinda reminds me of Worm where arcs lingered too long due to trying maintain a relentless pace.

Aotrs Commander

Oh dear, Abby, looks like you won't be getting that nice retirement pension after all...

Cat Has Plans for you...

ThatOneGuy

This may sound odd, but maybe perhaps Kairos is not involved in this action or mystery. Archer was up when Kairos had made his hint about the Rouge who actually stole and kept the magic instead of promising to give it back.

Maybe archer realized this and just maybe... she is out on a hunt of her own?

Liliet

?

Masego's magic was destroyed by the Dead King being spiteful.

Agent J

Destroyed or stolen by the Dead King?

Shveiran

The ability to steal magic sound like a major workaround to his "doesn't heal" limitation.
I'm not saying it's impossible, but if he could wouldn't he be harvesting mages?

Liliet

Destroyed. Nothing of the Dead King escaped that fight.

Well, to be more precise, it was taken by the sliver of the Dead King and then destroyed along with it.

Cheeezburger

Wait, didn't the Dead King actually get away with it using a "play dead" tactic?
I'll try to find the section and post another response.

Cheeezburger

Here's the section, from Interlude: Reverberation :
"Far away, as the slightest shaving of the shard no doubt destroyed by now returned to him, the King of Death laughed.

""
This once, it seemed the house had lost."

matesbe

A tiny piece of him escaped. Not nearly enough to contain all the magic of an extremely powerful magical named.

Liliet

He put a spell conveying the message in the spell he used to kill Archer, which was a little earlier.

Agent J

Well, shit. Masego's not getting that back then. He's screwed. I forget the wording, but doesn't that break the deal Nessie had with Cat about assurances?

Oshi

Only that he would live. The whole kill his magic thing is the fault of the heroes not him.

matesbe

It's not the hero's fault. It's the Bard's fault and the DK's fault. Pilgrim, at absolute worst, was guilty of unconditional trust in Bard's judgement, he hardly planned this out. DK could have left Masego's body peacefully, but he took his magic with him out of spite.

Shveiran

Regardless of Bard's intervention, even in worst possible light she and the Heroes are guilty of no more than not intervening to prevent the fact (and even then is an harsh interpretation, at least regarding anyone not Bard, given that it was a split second decision and the consequences were unclear).

The crippling occurred because Neshamah chose to cause it. He is fully guilty.

Saying that Bard is also at fault, though I share the view, absolves him not at all. He crippled Masego willingly: guilty. Bard ensured no one intervened: guilty.

With that said, the deal was for Masego's life, not his capabilities. Considering Masego was using his capabilities to actively try to oppose the Dead King, it's hard to consider this a breach of terms.

Andrew Mitchell

> The crippling occurred because Neshamah chose to cause it. He is fully guilty. Saying that Bard is also at fault, though I share the view, absolves him not at all. He crippled Masego willingly: guilty. Bard ensured no one intervened: guilty.

Well said!

Liliet

The assurance was about his life.

And Masego is not getting that back, but that doesn't mean he can't get a new one :3

UltimatePotato

I started reading book one about 2 months ago and just now caught up. I was super surprised when I looked to see what the next chapter was called, only to see that it hadn't been published yet.

Andrew Mitchell

Welcome to the PGtE commenting community! I'm glad you're here. I really like the community here because hearing other perspectives as really added to the richness of my reading experience. Plus our discussions and interactions are virtually always positive and constructive and that's all to rare on the internet these days!

Chapter 54: Lustrate

"A house can be destroyed by a fortune spent and twenty years of exquisite scheming; or in less than an hour with a single well-thrown torch."

– Dread Empress Massacre

I didn't even step foot into my army's camp, knowing that if I rested for even a moment I'd drop like a sack of flour. Truth be told, I was in no state to deal with the Tyrant of Helike if he decided to get clever with me. I was very nearly out of tricks, dawn had come and exhausted was the demure word for how bone-tired weary I was. But Archer and the Rogue were likely prisoners, and that meant sleep would have to wait a little longer. I had, though, absolutely no intention of getting clever back at Kairos. If he wanted to have a neat little rapier duel, all wits and triple meanings, then I was going to stroll into his fucking camp with a flying fortress full of sappers. I would have specified the sappers to be bloodthirsty but Hells, when had I ever met any that weren't? Even Pickler got that unholy spring to her step when told her latest devices would be unleashed on enemy soldiers. So no, I'd not gone to camp to pick up an escort or a detachment of soldiers that'd look as impressive as they were useless under the dawning sun. Instead I'd gone to pick up my personal diabolical possibly-undead tame thing, and also Zombie.

"You are smirking most fetchingly, dearest," Akua Sahelian noted. "As you only ever do when pondering unkindness at my expense."

"Not a single part of it was untrue, though," I mused.

"Then all hail Catherine Foundling, fae queen of our souls still," the shade prettily smiled.

I could only resent the way the way sarcasm was actually an attractive look for her, instead of aggressively spiteful as it tended to for on myself. There was probably some dark magic at work, I told myself. Zombie's saddlebags had been filled with the bare necessities, such as wine and munitions and a set of knives. And a pouch of wakeleaf, though it was the redleaf variant I felt tasted a little too strongly against the roof of the mouth. Still, considering Iserre was half a ruin and the closest town was several days of travel to the north it was a miracle my people had even managed to get their hands on that much.

"Which reminds me, actually," I said. "Either of you catch sight of Larat and his posse after they made their exit?"

"No," Hakram said. "And we did look, now that scrying has been restored. No one has a clue of where they've disappeared to."

I let out a reluctantly impressed whistle.

"Larat, you magnificent bastard," I murmured. "Good on you."

I raised the flask of tonic-flavoured Dormer pale towards the sky in a toast.

"May you forever be someone else's problem," I said.

The last of the wine slunk down my throat, gone cold. The toast and respect that went with it I'd offered without rancour, even though his slipping the noose had meant trouble for my plans. As those plans had involved carving him open inside like a fish at market, though, I found that to be fairly done. That one-eyed fox had wanted to stroll into a strange new daw unfettered and unbound, no matter the costs, and had gotten exactly that. For all that the once-Prince of Nightfall was a monstrous old bastard, in the end he'd beaten both Fate and his own nature to claim his prize.

So very few of us could say the same.

"I think he might have been my favourite treacherous lieutenant," I mused.

Akua, without ever moving from her textbook perfect horse-riding stance on one of the confiscated Helikean horses, conveyed her deep and genuine offence at my words.

"You can't be my treacherous anything, dearest," I drily said. "Aren't you on the side of angels these days?"

"I'm sure some sort of arrangement can be reached with them," she serenely replied, after gracing me with a pleased smile. "Perhaps a pact of some sort."

Hakram choked.

"Are you suggesting diabolism be used on Choirs?" the orc got out.

"Finding the 'morally righteous' equivalent of blood sacrifice has been something of a riddle," Akua candidly admitted. "Priests have been... less than supportive of my inquiries, when pressed."

"Try helping people," I suggested.

"That sounds positively horrid," she said, wrinkling her nose.

I was at least two thirds certain she was joking, though. I took another look at her face, then amended to half. It was a work in progress, though maybe one of these days I'd have to sit her down along with Archer for a friendly talk about Why Other People, Who Are Not Us, Matter. Gods, I wondered if Black had ever been forced to have that with the Calamities. Not Sabah, I thought, as for all that she'd carried a ravenous man-eating monster within her she'd always been a decent woman. But Warlock or Ranger? Sisters, I'd pay good coin to have transcripts of that conversation. If Robber's band of marauders were still putting on plays, we could even make an evening out of a theatrical reading. Mean thou, Black Knight, that Creation be more than the navel at which I gaze so pridefully? Prithee, these be lies. Godsdamned Ranger. The rising sun had begun to cast down unpleasant glare before we reached the edge of the League's maze of camps, no doubt making for a strange sight. There were only three of us, after all, and Hakram was on foot. His long limbs and the tirelessness of his Name allowed him to keep pace, so long as riders shied from anything faster than a trot. We'd certainly not gone unnoticed, at least, for now seven detachment of troops were hurrying out of the sea of League tents to greet us.

"Is that a bedsheet?" Hakram asked, cocking his head to the side.

The Helikean foot carrying what was quite likely a bedsheet stolen from some Proceran clotheslines, and therefore also the Hierarch's personal banner, moved faster than the rest. It seemed like every city in the League had sent some people to meet us, including a thick pack of what I assumed to be Bellerophan infantry significantly outnumbering everyone else put together. Gods, but the armour they wore looked like it belonged in some war two centuries ago. So did the thickly-packed formations they advanced in, formations that would be reaped by wheat if they encountered a few lines of Praesi mages or even some swift-footed sappers.

"We are received in honour," Akua said. "Queen of my heart, shall we proceed?"

I breathed out. Could be a trap. Wasn't likely, considering Kairos had to know that breaking truce in any way at this point would see everyone else turning on him like rabid wolverines, but you never knew with the Tyrant. Just because he'd antagonized nearly everyone he could didn't mean he wasn't going to keep pushing his luck. If he were a reasonable sort of madman, he'd be a great deal less dangerous.

"Let's," I said. "As for courtesies to offer, I have only one thing to say."

Hakram's eyes found me, and Akua's brow arched in invitation.

"Remember the first time I attended court in the Tower?" I said.

"Vividly," the shade replied, lips quirked.

"Feel free to make that look polite," I coldly instructed.

We resumed our advance towards the Leaguers, bearing no banner and offering no announcements. They clustered uneasily around each other, a band of mercenaries and militias and career soldiers whose allegiances were only loosely bound together by Named madness and happenstance, and awaited our arrival. It would have been customary to rein in the horses before them and speak, I knew. Diplomatic. I kept riding.

"Black Queen, we greet you," one of the Helikean officers called out.

Hurriedly, I noted, as we'd not slowed in our advance.

"You're one of Kairos'," I noted. "Run back to your master, soldier. Tell him if Archer and the Rogue Sorcerer are not freed and in full health by the time I reach him, I'll rip out his fucking heart and feed it to Adjutant right here."

I jutted a thumb at Hakram, who gallantly displayed every inch of fang there was to display. I'd been told he had impressive pearly whites, by orc standards. It was a lot of teeth, and none of it friendly.

"You cannot threaten-" the officer indignantly began.

"She just did," Akua daintily sighed, as if put-upon by the man's poor breeding. "Best start running now, for we'll not slow in deference to the likes of you."

"Treachery," the call came from further down the field.

The Atalante contingent, by the looks of the banner.

"You knifed the rest of Calernia in the back at the Dead King's behest," I coldly replied. "And are now breaking the same truce you begged for last night. You have exactly once chance to make reparations before every army on this field marches against you."

"Seeking extermination, this time, not surrender," Akua casually added. "One does not twice allow a rabid dog to run free."

Ah, and there was that Wasteland highborn breed of nastiness. I'd not missed in the slightest, though having it turned on my opposition was a refreshing novelty. We could have lingered further, reasoned with them, but that would imply that we were in less than complete control of this situation. That we needed to speak with them, rather than having granted them the privilege of being spoken to. So we resumed our advance as if we were untouchable, and so went untouched. No one, I realized with amusement, wanted to be the first to step forward. As much for fear of death as for the calamitous consequences that laying a hand on any of us would bring, I thought. However rude we were, they must be painfully aware they were a long way from home facing better and hostile armies more than twice their number – and that there would be no swift retreat from Arcadia, now that the shard had been settled into a newborn and broken realm.

So they moved aside, and two Helikean riders peeled off in haste to bring warning.

I was too tired to properly assess the enemy's camp and so left that to Adjutant's watchful gaze, contenting myself with noting that just like the getting parties their tents remained highly divided. This was not a great army, it was a coalition of smaller ones. On the field, even if they had significantly greater numbers than either my eastern coalition or the Grand Alliance individually I would bet on those over this mess. Helike and Stygia fielded fine hosts, but none of the others were of that quality. Arguably, now that Ashur had been broken the League of Free Cities was now the preeminent sea power of Calernia – but down here, on the ground and in Iserre? Juniper would eat these poor bastards for breakfast, and she'd actually lost battles to the Grand Alliance in this campaign. It was only the prospect of casualties that kept everyone's sword in the sheath, and these days Kairos Theodosian was proving too much of a nuisance for that to keep being enough. Under our unfriendly gazes some attendants in servant robes came for us when we entered the edge of the camp, guides meant to bring us to the Tyrant of Helike and his 'guests'. We followed, and so tasted the Tyrant's warning pulsing blindly and dimly in the distance. The same invisible current I'd felt in Rochelant, and again made as a sword in Kairos' hand. The Hierarch had returned, and though his ruinous leviathan of an aspect was still slumbering its presence could still be tasted in the air.

Waiting until it could wake again, and feed.

Neither of my companions had been exposed to it before, and I glanced at them in worry. Distant as the pounding was, faint like a sleeping dragon's breath, it still trembled in the air. Adjutant, though remained as calm as ever in the face of it. And as for Akua, she simply cocked an eyebrow.

"Quaint," she murmured.

"Quaint," I repeated, disbelieving.

She smiled at me, golden eyes almost visible through the veil.

"Whatever else I am," Akua said, "I am a Sahelian still. What a shallow chalice this would be to drink from, compared to the many heady madnesses of my forbears. My blood has known great sweeps of lunacy, heart of my heart, and this kind is not so great I would fear it."

Well, who was I to deny that hard-headed arrogance couldn't let you fight the run of the world? I'd never truly understand – could never – that hard Wasteland pride rooted in old blood and deeds always terrible and sometimes great, for it was a highborn pride. I was the daughter of orphanages, raised to Wasteland lessons on Callowan lips, and the only blood I trusted was that which my hand had spilled. But I would not fully deny the bones of Akua Sahelian's vanity, for it was not fully unearned. We rode on, until a great pavilion awaited us and the guide-servants bowed, and only then did I dismount. The shade followed suit, and without waiting to be announced we strode within. To my utter lack of surprise Kairos Theodosian awaited within, not the Hierarch whose slumbering aspect I could still feel further in or even any of the greats from the other cities of the League. It was grimly satisfying to see that even a jackal's grin could not hide the black eye I'd given him or his exhaustion. There were but a few gargoyles left to attend him, for near all those he'd brought with him in the seeking of Twilight had been broken by my own miracles. He was, I thought, slowly but surely running out of artefacts to spend.

"Catherine," he affably greeted me. "In a fine temper, I see."

We were deep in the Helikean camp now, surrounded by thousands of soldiers whose loyalty to the Tyrant would be absolute. Unless we slew him with the first strike – unlikely, given the faint whisper of sorcery lingering within the tent – attacking him would start a fight I could not win. Yet my hand still itched with the desire to make a matching set of blackened eyes.

"Archer," I said. "The Rogue Sorcerer. They're in your hands."

"Honoured guests," he assured me. "Kept safe until you came to fetch them."

"I have," I bluntly told him. "Where are they?"

"They've been sent for," Kairos said, "though there has been something of a complication."

He could not lie, I knew. The Grey Pilgrim had seen to that. Yet he was not cripple in wits as he was in flesh and could easily deceive without outright speaking an untruth. Tariq, I thought, might have actually made him more dangerous. Knowing he couldn't lie I'd been inclined to believe him, until I'd realized he'd never specified exactly who it was he'd sent for.

"Complication?" Adjutant asked in my stead.

"Archer, while having peacefully enjoyed her pick of our bottles earlier, now appears to have killed her way through the company of soldiers sent to fetch her," the Tyrant sighed. "She's now retrieved her armaments and is suspected to be coming to kill me."

"And you would know this how?" Hakram asked.

"There was talk of beating me to death with one of my own gargoyles," Kairos informed us. "Well, shouts to be more accurate."

That did sound like Indrani, I'd admit to that.

"Your presence has since been known to her," the odd-eyed king said. "One hopes it will be enough to stay her hand."

I inclined my head.

"The Rogue Sorcerer?" I asked.

"Last I heard he was hesitating over which of the ancient tomes I've provided for his perusal he will keep. I've offered such a boon as a parting gift," the Tyrant said.

Tiredness had slowed my wits, but not slowed them so much that I would not understand the implication here. The two Named that'd stumbled into his grasp had been treated very well, and there would be no trouble in retrieving them. They'd not been hostages, then, but instead a pointed invitation.

"You wanted me here, obviously," I said. "Here I am."

"Would you like a drink?" he offered.

"I'd like two days of sleep and to see you eat your own hand before a jeering crowd," I casually replied. "Get on with it, Kairos. My patience wears thin."

"There is no need for us to be uncivil," the Tyrant of Helike chided me.

Akua's head inclined towards me the slightest bit, a question asked. I replied with the ghost of a nod. If she wanted to speak, then by all means.

"A surfeit of treachery is the mark of an insecure hand," the shade casually said.

"Did one of your most infamous emperors not style himself Traitorous?" Kairos said.

She laughed, rather cuttingly.

"Traitorous?" she smiled. "Oh, youth. You are barely even a Malignant."

Hadn't one of those started the War of Thirteen Tyrants and One? No, I decided, it'd been the First War of the Dead. Gods, the Praesi had had so many damned civil wars. Procer could try as it might – and most definitely had – it had a few centuries of catching up to do before it could even begin to rival the Wasteland in this regard.

"Third?" Hakram asked.

"Second, of course," Akua daintily replied.

"Harsh," he commented, undertone appreciative.

"You are tamer a beast than I believed you would be, Akua Sahelian," the Tyrant of Helike said, tone friendly. "Learned to love the hand that cowed us, have we?"

So he'd been able to see through that, had he? I was too tired to be afraid, and not certain I would have been even if I'd been well-rested and sober. Kairos could shout this on every rooftop across Calernia, if he wanted to: he'd burned too many bridges to still be believed.

"I see now, why you so easily strike a chord with so many of them," the woman who'd been Diabolist said, offering almost fond amusement. "You are, in essence, a poor man's Carrion Lord."

Gods, but I'd forgotten how genuinely vicious she could be with a turn of phrase. How easy it was, now that the sharpness had been dulled and turned to teasing and bantering insult, to forget that while I was playing in the streets of Laure and skipping my lessons Akua had spent her days learning to flay the pride of others with mere sentences. To play all the deadly games of the Wasteland highborn, those beautiful and elegant monsters with eyes of gold and poisonous tongues. Kairos' face tightened, imperceptibly. Were less tired, less raw, I suspected it would not have. But it did, and the woman who'd once been the Heiress saw the weakness bared.

"So eager to offer insult," Kairos said, tone friendly. "Shall we play that game, then? I know of the rules."

"Then you have played poorly," Akua said, scathing. "Look at you now, Tyrant of Very Far Away. You pretend it power that you can greet us without the greats of your League but we both know different, don't we? It is an admission that if they see you bleed, they will turn on you like hungry wolves."

"Am I to take lesson from you?" Kairos grinned, red-eyed and mutedly furious. "Oh, that strikes me as folly."

"I have seen boys like you played to death by the dozen," Akua said, almost gently. "Minds like pretty baubles of glass, thinking themselves untouchable for their sharp edges. It does not take brilliance or treachery to end the likes of you, did you know? All it takes is a thick enough boot."

A flicker of power, but not in here. Outside, and familiar. Discretely I gestured at Hakram. If it was Roland, I would prefer for them to await without entering. For looking at Akua now I saw cruelty like frost, yes, but not only that: I also saw a woman lancing an old and festering wound, and of that I would not brook interruption. Adjutant quietly left the pavilion, the gargoyles following him with their eyes but neither the Tyrant nor the once-Diabolist even noticing.

"And yet you pair me to the man who called your kind to heel," Kairos idly said. "Who took the proud High Lords of the Wasteland for mere horses to be broken in, and then proved the truth of that contempt."

"A pale imitation, in truth," Akua mused. "Armies and cleverness and parlour tricks, only without everything laudable in our man. Even made a shivering ghost, still he commanded enough loyalty for armies and pupils and companions to seek him. You? Victor and surrounded by armies, you've ruined yourself and call it brilliance. You are alone."

"So are we all," Kairos Theodosian said, and it was too harshly said for it to be pretence. "They beat you and fed you, Akua Sahelian, with pain and scraps of affections – until like a loyal hound you licked the cruel hand. The apprentice did to you as the teacher did to your entire people. And now you put on their masks and speak their empty creed, but that is a hollow thing isn't it? Compared to the truths you can still feel slithering through your blood, those that whisper of greatness instead of submission."

"I am more than blood," Akua Sahelian hissed. "I am more than what I was made from. But you, Kairos Theodosian? You are the apostle of the cage, the congregant of scrapped iron. And what has that made of you, Tyrant of Least and Less? You bargain with every change of the wind, and every time find return diminished. You have run out of coin to sell yourself with. You have made an enemy of all the world, and so you no longer have place in it."

"I am a droplet in the tide that will drown Creation," the Tyrant of Helike smiled, eye red like fresh blood.

"You are yesterday," Akua said. "That is the sum whole of you. And scream and wail as you will, that is all you'll ever be."

And, chin high and back straight, she turned. She walked out without another word and left behind her oppressive silence. I watched Kairos, and in turn he watched me. Like a furnace lit and closed, the rage could be seen glowing at the edges of him. The tent was opened a fraction, even as he continued trying to master himself.

"Archer found the Rogue and followed him here," Hakram told me in Kharsum. "Both are fine."

I inclined my head in acknowledgement without turning and the tent closed.

"You made a deal with the Bard, while we were out there," I said, tone even.

"A greater game is in the works than you suspect," the Tyrant of Helike said. "She is no ally of mine."

"The rest I could stomach," I mildly said. "But the Bard? You burned a bridge with that. Still. There'll be a conference of the great powers and you'll have your seat."

"As was promised," he said.

"As was promised," I agreed.

I turned and began to limp out.

"We have more to discuss, Black Queen," Kairos called out.

I glanced at him.

"No," I said. "We don't. You want an audience? Crawl to my camp. You ought to know how, after last night."

To the sounds of his anger and the chittering of gargoyles I walked out of the tent and did not look back until I'd brought my people safe to camp.

Javvies

I'm looking forward to Kairos being a dismembered corpse doused in goblinfire.

Kairos saw through whatever guise Akua has to recognize her as her. That could be a problem – Pilgrim did slap Kairos with the curse of truthfulness.

But how the fuck would Kairos know what Akua Sahelian/Diabolist looks like or how to recognize her? They would not have crossed paths, even by proxy, Kairos shouldn't be able to recognize her.

matesbe

It was probably the authority that allows him to look into the motivations and desires of others. It grants him supernatural perception.

stevenneiman

Kairos trades information with everyone. He might have run himself into a corner here, but he does know a lot about what's going on. And Akua went with Cat to Keter, so the Dead King knows about it, and he would be perfectly happy to share information which can ruin or at least weaken the Grand Alliance even if he gets little in return.

Liliet

It's not much of a riddle. Catherine kind of tipped her hand on having SOMEONE with her when she had Akua use the well of Night in her absence, and Kairos would have enough background info to put 2 and 2 together. Honestly I won't be surprised if Pilgrim does too, just hasn't brought it up so far.

(Binding a defeated foe to serve you is not any further out there in villainous methods than necromancy, as far as general trope perception goes. Catherine's internal struggle about her relationship with Akua is just that – internal, and a potential PR issue within Callow... honestly, with how much credit Cat's got there, I wouldn't be surprised if it wasn't much of a blow even there if it came out)

Layers

How can anyone dislike Kairos? He's perfect, I love him.

doominator10

"Poor man's Carrion Lord."

That cut so deep even I'm bleeding from over here.

Solal

"You are yesterday" was so so so much worse for me. But the exchange was so interesting either way.

Liliet

"You are yesterday" is cheap. It wasn't precisely targeted at Kairos, it was Akua more talking to herself of yesterday that she saw in him. "You're history" is generic enough to be fitting against anyone whose methods you don't believe in.

"Poor man's Carrion Lord" is a much more targeted and therefore much more deeply cutting insult 😊

Rook

Nearly all of it was targeted at herself as much as Kairos, to be honest. That was the genius of it.

Kairos is in many ways everything that the Diabolist was, what Akua was. Every single one of his failings she pointed out are failings she herself embraced in the past and has since renounced. Every single one is a boil lanced for herself in the admittance of the flaw.

She didn't need to read him to cut at the heart of him, all she had to do was take a page out of Catherine's book and self flagellate.

Liliet

Eeeehhh. I wouldn't call it that last one, what you did. What's characteristic of Catherine is that she bemoans her flaws, then continues to do the same thing, because she doesn't know how to do better and that's what annoys her in the first place.

Akua has probably been saving all of this up for a while, against her past self. She is seeing a road forward, out of everything she's poked at here disdainfully, and that's a big difference.

And yes, she's the best possible person to roast Kairos here ;u;

Liliet

"The only good ideas you've got going for you are those you stole from the guy you hate most, and even then you're kind of shitty at them"

Akua Sahelian is very important ;u;
~~she is not afraid to burn herself to burn someone else also and that is very worthy of respect~~

Euodiachloris

As Cat noted, this was a healing burn... for Akua. New Evil telling Old to shove it is one thing when it's a relative newbie like Amadeus doing it, but a black-and-red-and-Evil-all-over Sahelian giving it the finger in complete disgust?

Girl has fully committed to very definitely not being her mother's brand of Evil, while working to avoid the trap of finding another attractively traditional way of staying in the cage.

Euodiachloris

Forgot to note: a once-Named Sahelian of the direct line. A lesser Sahelian has also stuck a tongue out at Old Evil a time or eighteen, but remaining the un-Named head spy, friend, companion and lover of the Dread Express of the Tower while doing so... kind of blunted the impact a teensy bit.

But, two Sahelians? One Named-and-played-the-Game? Stack.

Liliet

MHM.

Akua was actually burning herself very deliberately here, you're right.

Sparsebeard

I mean, "Lustrate" means to purify, so it does make sense that Akua was targeting her past self...

Andrew Mitchell

Oooo, interesting. Thanks for sharing that fact. 😊

imagesbe

That was a nasty exchange between Kairos and Akua, and I think it hit both of them where it hurts. I'm really growing to like this Akua honestly. If Akua hadn't been the Doom of Liesse, I could see her and Cat becoming genuine, close friends. As it is, that will always hang between them to some degree, and Akua will have to answer for it at some point.

Also, Kairos got burned. Sorry kid, after the shit you pulled you don't even get "worthy adversary" levels of treatment. You burned those bridges yourself.

RoflCat

I think Akua's grown enough in her time with Cat that his attempt at insult doesn't really even sting anymore.

I feel an option for her to redeem herself is to become a guardian to Callow until it manages to recover. For the 100,000 souls she took from it, 100,000 souls she'll raise in it, that sort of thing.

Andrew Mitchell

That's a nice idea but there needs to be an end to Akua or it goes against the Callowan ethos of 'long prices'. My bet (65% probability) is that Akua's going to heroically sacrifice herself to save something critical in the battle with the Dead King and/or the Bard.

RoflCat

I think being duty bound to the land for however many generations it take for her to repay her debt is quite a 'long' time to do.

If anything a 'quick' death via heroic sacrifice seems like the thing that goes against the 'long prices' ethos.

Remember, these are the people whose grandchild will punch another's and steal 3 apples for the one stolen 2 generations ago.

Andrew Mitchell

Fair point. 😊

Liliet

>I think being duty bound to the land for however many generations it take for her to repay her debt is quite a 'long' time to do.

>If anything a 'quick' death via heroic sacrifice seems like the thing that goes against the 'long prices' ethos.

Mm, that's how I'm seeing it too! 😊

Also I love how Akua didn't give a shit about the 'folly' insults because there's only so long you can be called 'hey cloak accessory' and 'hey bad idea shade' before you stop giving a shit period ;u;

KageLupus

The long price for Akua isn't death, it is being dragged into a mindset where she knows exactly what a miserable life she had lived up until that point. Being shown what she could have had if it weren't for centuries of Praesi nonsense and evil. I don't think she is ever going to truly feel horrible about her actions at Liesse, or at least not enough, but that isn't really the cutting knife either.

The really painful bit is going to be Akua coming to value the rest of the Woe and still seeing that look in their eyes that says she is a monster and not forgiven. Every day that Cat and the rest joke around with her and bring her into the fold is slipping that knife just a little deeper.

stevenneiman

I honestly don't think that Akua was emotionally hurt by that exchange at all. If she'd had it just after her defeat maybe, but she's not as insecure as she was and she's not someone for whom those insults really do hit close to home. If anything, I think Akua sees Kairos as someone who wallows in everything she has outgrown, and for all the skill she delivered it with that genuine contempt was what Akua was channelling here..

Liliet

I think there's something there, but not what Kairos was aiming for. It was the "wait is this how people see me" and "was this what I sounded like" kind of emotional hurt, and the "well I guess I'm going to have to be explicit about my position without hiding behind jokes now" kind of emotional hurt. Like she commented “this sounds positively horrid” on Cat’s remark about helping people 5 minute ago, she still prefers the “yes I am still just an evil villain” mask, and she had to tear that off with chunks of face to really tear into Kairos here.

wirelessgrapes

He tried to play, but he forgets that not everyone feeds the burning desire to follow their each and every instinct to join in

Ox

Oh akua, how I’ve missed your sass

Gunslinger

Akua was phenomenal in this chapter but Catherine’s crawl to the camp jibe was the sickest burn. Oof

We get more indications of Akua’s path to redemption and it’s pretty darn convincing. I don’t think it will end well do her though. Cat will never forget the Folly

pagesbe

I think Akua might end up going down with a Heroic Sacrifice, rather than Cat having to put her down herself. Because it’s clear at this point Cat really doesn’t want to, she just feels like Akua needs to answer for her crimes in a more final way than she already has.

Andrew Mitchell

Yep. IMO it’s going to be a heroic sacrifice for sure.

caoimhinh

That is “the ‘morally righteous’ equivalent of blood sacrifice”, after all.

Andrew Mitchell

Good point. 😊

Zgggt

We have already witnessed the priesthood of Good committing a mass ritual sacrifice of the innocent in order to unleash a calamity on their enemy in a strict military sense. That was the actual start of the Battle of the Camps, where Cat watched in horror as Procer made a mass human sacrifice out of every non professional or aristocrat within miles to trap a chunk of Callowan troops.

What you're talking about isn't nearly as clear a blood sacrifice as that.

Shveiran

Uhm, no.

First off, what you are referring to was the battle plan of the army's general, not the work of the priests. Sending in the conscripts was no more the priesthood's decision than Juniper's plans at three Hills were Masego's idea.

Just because they were there, it doesn't make it their decision.

I agree that fencing in people for an allied cavalry charge is a ridiculous loophole for a supposed pacifist (if you hold someone down while another person shoots them dead, you can bet your ass you are complicit in that murder) but that has no bearing with the deployment of the recruits as skirmishers.

Second, that is a ruthless, yet solid and very common tactic for larger armies with a great score of unprofessional soldiers. Ugly, yes, but then war is usually that. Uglier than necessary, perhaps, but still not quite bleeding people for power.

Zgggt

The priesthood had to be involved, and pretending they didn't know what they're doing and yet literally asked heaven to do it anyways. It's a military tactic which involved using priests channelling the heavens so that for the price of innocents they will change the landscape in such a way as to make victory more likely. But even if you remove the priesthood completely from the equation, the answer to "how does human sacrifice committed by Good look like?" is "making this choice".

In a world that has so much weight in the choices and actions of so very few, we really can't allow Good to get away with childish "stop hitting yourself, I'm not hurting you so naaah" when the difference between that choice and throwing those same innocents into a fire and summoning a demon is not in the result.

Liliet

So the nuance you're missing here is that Akua's question of 'righeous equivalent to blood sacrifice' referred to 'how do I make the angels like me better'. Which this kind of sacrifice does not accomplish – it strains your credit with Good, not inflates it.

Shveiran

If you are arguing that the Guide's Good falls well short of good, I'm totally on board.

If you ascribe a deeper meaning to the "send forth the conscript" rather than, say, invading a country in the first place, or a Choir trying to brainwash cities, or Heroes scything through infantrymen who are defending their homes, or dozens of other instances in this series, I am not sure I see your point.

Most of the Good guys don't seem to ascribe a lot of value to the sanctity of life, not in practice. How does this stand out?

Liliet

BTW

>We have already witnessed the priesthood of Good committing a mass ritual sacrifice of the innocent are you aware of the meaning of the word 'ritual'

Mental Mouse

Well, redemption by sacrifice, anyway.

Soronel Haetir

Nice, Kairos is one who absolutely deserves to get his teeth kicked.

WhoEvenKnows

Man, Black woke up just so he could approve of and applaud this savagery. Imagine getting told: "You're nothing more than a moron doing a pathetic imitation of the man you hate".

Liliet

Y E S

and honestly, baby Akua as Heiress couldn't do anything NEAR this, the reason you forgot Catherine is that this is new and she has learned from YOU 😊

BerenTheBold

"You are yesterday," Akua said. "That is the sum whole of you. And scream and wail as you will, that is all you'll ever be."

Daaaaamn.. Akua has no chill 😂

Soma

One could say she's heartless.

Novice

So much shade thrown around, really.

Andrew Mitchell

She really showed some spirit.

Joeluma

Woe guys.

Just woe.

JJR

I'd say that Cat made Kairos eat crow here. But as First Under the Night the crow she served is eating him.

'Ladi Williams

Akua really has turned...who would have thought?

Sparsebeard

The thing I was more surprised with was that she helped fix Black, arguably the person she should hate the most (except perhaps herself). I mean, he did kill her father, perhaps the only person she truly loved...

Now I wonder if Black will similarly be able to let his grudge against Pilgrim go... he did promise a reckoning.

ActionKermit

I do wonder if she did anything else to Black during the process. It would be just like her to lay a hidden compulsion when his soul was in her hands, as a way to assassinate Cat. "Love dies at the kiss of a knife / Trust is the water that ends your life" and so on.

Andrew Mitchell

I think that's possible and probably even more likely now that Masego has come back without his magic. He's one of the few people that could possibly have detected or reversed that compulsion.

I don't think it's likely because that would go against Akua's redemption story and (a) I really, REALLY want that to come true, and more importantly (b) because ultimately I view PGtE as a creative work that is, at its core, optimistic about the capacity to change and Akua betraying Cat goes against that.

I think there's at most 10% chance that Akua's done anything except put Black together as well as she can.

Shveiran

Really? She is operating mostly through the Night at this point, and even if she wasn't Andronike knew magic before she spent centuries refining her knowledge. Even if Aqua was going to, I don't see the Sisters missing it or not acting on that knowledge.

Andrew Mitchell

I'm not sure what you're arguing with when you said "Really?" but, on reflection, maybe my last sentence was unclear. What I meant was:

"There's only a small chance that Akua added anything when she rejoined Black's body & soul."

Shveiran

Ah, sorry. I got it wrong and was confused.

Andrew Mitchell

That's OK. My fault, not yours. I often don't speak plainly.

Liliet

Technically probably physically possible. Mentally, she ain't going to do that.

caoimhinh

On that note, one meeting I'm anticipating is Catherine and Amadeus meeting the Valiant Champion. It's one thing for her to have killed Captain, but Raphaela actually skinned Sabah to make a cloak of her wolf fur, which she consistently wears as it is a trophy of her greatest victory so far.

They are both going to be really angry when they find out.

Andrew Mitchell

Yes, that's going to be quite the challenge for the relationships between Cat and her new allies.

Mental Mouse

> It's one thing for her to have killed Captain, but Raphaella actually skinned Sabah to make a cloak of her wolf fur, which she consistently wears as it is a trophy of her greatest victory so far.

Eh, that's a Praesi complement, if not an orcish one. Somebody actually telling Champion so would be a hoot!

Mental Mouse

compliment. Off to find some calories. 😊

Shveiran

That will bring some strain, but let's get on the same page here: most of the people here were trying to kill each other until a short time ago, which is less than a day for many of them.

If the rank and file won't knife the other soldiers to avenge their buddies, I doubt Amadeus won't stay his hand. The Calamities were trying to murder them, and did kill the sisters; Sabah biting it may be something they regret, but it's in the job description.

He will mourn her, but I think he knows it wasn't personal. If he wants vengeance on anyone, it's the Bard.

Liliet

Mhm! And the trophy taking is if anything a mark of respect.

Liliet

>she helped fix Black, arguably the person she should hate the most (except perhaps herself). I mean, he did kill her father, perhaps the only person she truly loved...

"Acts" covered that. Just because regular not emotionally stunted people think she should, doesn't mean she didn't have that burned out of her along with most other emotions. And this isn't one she's in most hurry to regrow.

Sparsebeard

"Acts" did cover that... good on you for remembering, for I did not.

Shveiran

As a Villainess, Akua is very aware she herself painted a large target on anyone she has loved.
Much like Amadeus with his parents in fact.

She knew the rules of the game, she still wholeheartedly chose to play it.
I suspect anything she begrudges Amadeus, she holds against herself tenfold for failing to protect him after putting him at risk.

Liliet

Mhm.

JJR

Yes... except she is so skilled at manipulating people she could still be acting and there'd be almost no way to tell. Cat did have that one interrogation session, but I don't know if she's kept that up.

Is this why Redemption equals Death? Because it's the only way to be sure the character was genuine?

Liliet

Only if you aren't following character arcs and analyzing characters' motivations and logic based on the POVs we've gotten from them.

Akua was questioning what the fuck the older generation was doing back at the start of Book 3, in her own POV.

Razorfloss

Now that was just nasty. I almost feel bad for him almost.

konstantinvoncarstein

He had it coming 😈

Trebar

He only had himself to blame

Soma

I am somewhat relieved that dealing with Kairos was short and sweet. Played me like a fiddle. I got all riled up about Kairos and now we get to see this nice little backhand to resolve the pest's attempts at intrigues. Well, resolved for now, but still.

Liliet

SAME. I was so happy Kairos got a neat little bow tied on his plotline here ♥ (and Akua got therapy in the process!)

Shveiran

Same. I had a bad reaction to last chapter, it is a nice relief to find out this side-plot was a chapter long.
It goes to show that EE is always, always a dozen steps ahead of where you expect him to be.

Someday I'll learn.

erebus42

Damn! Way to torch his ass Akua! He's gonna remember this, but he's definitely circling the drain. Even after all he's done though, when he does die I do hope he finds a way to screw over everyone one last time.

Andrew Mitchell

Nice to see Catherine still being F.U.N. even in the privacy of her own mind. 😊

caoimhinh

Catherine is giving EE ideas for the content on Extra Chapter stories XD

ninegardens

I mean, she has Black now. AND he owes her at a favour: "In return for saving your armies and returning you to life... PLEASE teach me how you got Warlock to be less murderous."

Liliet

Yes.

Fayhem

I'm guessing the answer would be some form of "positive reinforcement". E.g.: "Did you stay below your Murder Quota today Wekesa? Excellent! Here's a cookie rare magical tome you've been looking for."

Liliet

b e a u t i f u l and oddly likely ;u;

IDKWhoitis

Well, I'm pleasantly surprised that everything went fine with Archer and Roland.

I'm slightly disappointed with how Kairos still has a head attached to his shoulders, but he bargained too well to be killed that easily.

I wonder if Roland will continue to hang out with the Woe or if he will seek residence with the Procerans. I would like to hear Cat talk to Roland alone, like she has found herself to do on occasion, and pick out his desires and Endgame. It would make for good conversation on the way to Salía or the North.

Andrew Mitchell

Oh yes, we definitely need to see Roland and Cat have a chat soon. Preferably from Roland's point of view. But either way, I'm looking forward to it.

Soma

Yeah, I'm also definitely looking forward to Roland and the Woe interacting, and getting some of it from his perspective would be delightful.

tkjarrah

"I am more than blood," Akua Sahelian hissed. "I am more than what I was made from. But you, Kairos Theodosian? You are the apostle of the cage, the congregant of scrapped iron. And what has that made of you, Tyrant of Least and Less? You bargain with every change of the wind, and every time find return diminished. You have run out of coin to sell yourself with. You have made an enemy of all the world, and so you no longer have place in it." fuckin sick-ass burns

JJR

I like that "congregant of the scraped iron" bit, nice image for rejecting the whole "iron sharpens iron" thing.

tkjarrah

yes it was a sick reference

werafdsaew

Ironic, considering that is old Akua's modus operandi.

Soma

She's definitely speaking from experience.

Liliet

Yep. She is basically talking to her past self here, which is what lends Kairos 0 chance of comeback ♥

luminiousblu

Eh...

Akua didn't quite make an enemy of 'all the world' so much as forcibly carve out a huge chunk of it to be her friend. Kairos makes a point of offending literally everyone just to show he can, Akua tries to avoid offending people if she's not specifically looking to crush them anyway. If anything, Kairos makes an enemy of the world and so has no place in it, but Akua couldn't find a place in the world and so ended up making enemies.

Shveiran

Are you arguing that there are parts of the world that are not pushed to enmity by the deploying of a Doomsday machine that rips tears in creation that allow devils and demons to spew forth and is empowered by genocide?

I guess... the Chain of Hunger makes the list?

ninegardens

The other purebloods? Her Dad? Her Mum? The Dead King?

Hell, I mean Malicia was practically backing her up on this, in a "Now I will take your doom weapon and make it mine" kind of way.

Shveiran

I think you are mistaking "admiration" and "friendliness". She built a death ray to conquer it all. "It all" tends to have issues with that.

Her dad is not a people, he is one person who loves her daughter. the truebloods (Talía included) would have knifed Diabolist at the first opportunity to steal the death ray. Malicia's plan was precisely that. The Dead king would not have been on board with the idea either, why would he?

luminiousblu

>Are you arguing that there are parts of the world that are not pushed to enmity by the deploying of a Doomsday machine that rips tears in creation that allow devils and demons to spew forth and is empowered by genocide?

I'm finding it pretty hard to think of any place that would oppose such a weapon on principle. Even Catherine was going 'hmmm well now that she's already made it maybe we can put it to good use after all'. It's basically a nuke, and a hundred thousand is a drop in the ocean anyway when we're on about doomsday weapons.

Point is that Kairos makes offending people his endgoal, Akua offending people is at best an incidental thing, not generally the goal in and of itself. Kairos' introduction was basically a statement about being a git "because who the fuck is going to stop you lmfa0", Akua's first actual conversation with Cat was more or less 'hey I don't want to threaten you but if you would kindly get out of my way then I won't have to threaten to put everyone you ever knew to the torch whoopsie I let it slip hehe'. Both are being pretty capital-E, but the modus operandi is different.

Shveiran

The MO is different, the end result is not.

During the first chat with Cordelia, Cat herself remarks how Akua thinks of any country in the world as "on the conquest list". She makes an enemy of everyone because she is big, bad, and mad. She wants to conquer everything just because she cannot accept anything to be beyond her reach or her superior unless she is MADE to.

The only reason why Aqua never received international condemnation was because she burned like a falling star: three months after she stopped being just a wastelander schemer with no international relevance, she was already dead.

Fayhem

> The MO is different, the end result is not.

Ayyy jinx! For the record I started typing my comment before you had posted your reply, I just type slow when I keep getting interrupted by, uh, my actual job I'm supposed to be doing lol.

Javvies

Akua was one of the "reasons" Cordelia used to pull the Grand Alliance together, so it's not that she didn't cause international condemnation, it's that she was already dead and wasn't being a collar fairy yet.

At any rate ... Akua pisses people off as a side effect or, more rarely, as part of a specific tactic towards a specific end, when that's the "best" means of achieving that specific end.

It also makes her a target because if she isn't stopped, she'll do great and terrible things. In the terrible, yes, but great, sense of things.

Kairos seemingly pisses people off just for laughs and because he can. Like, for example, he helped set up the scenario that led to Sabah's death, because he wanted to stab Black in the back and feels. It literally gained Kairos nothing except the enmity of Black and Warlock – who were there to help him gain control/dominance over the League. And maybe whatever Bard gave him, since she was involved in that.

It's ... like the difference between Akua's trying to be Thanos (or maybe a Loki who wants grow up to be Thanos) and Kairos trying to be the Joker (except not as clever nor as funny and with an extra helping of bullshit and hax).

They're both terrible people, but Akua wants to conquer everything she can and break what resists until it stops resisting or ceases to exist, preferably the former, Kairos is a nihilist who just wants the world to burn because then he can say he lit it on fire.

There's a difference, and it does matter.
For Akua, it's either a side effect or a means to a specific end.
For Kairos, it's an end in and of itself.

Shveiran

There is a difference, but does it truly matter, from a practical stand point?

Everyone sane rallies against both Thanos-types and Joker-types, so whether that was the goal or a side effect, both kinds do piss off nearly everyone.

Liliet

It matters from character analysis standpoint :3

Shveiran

That it does, but I'm not arguing Aqua is Kairos with curves, here XD They are several differences between them, that much I agree on wholeheartedly.

Sparsebeard

Do you mean when he used Black and his victory over him to install the second Hierach in known history (with him as the grey eminence)... The way I see it, betraying Black was meant to somewhat appease the cities hes was warring with in collaboration with Black, it was a way to show he isn't a pawn of a foreign power.

Also, slapping Black hard made sure that the Tower would be much more careful when meddling in the free cities affairs...

Fayhem

The motive is different, but the effect is the same. Akua didn't want to make an enemy out of everybody just for the sake of it Kairos-style, buuut she still did it anyway.

Also:

> I'm finding it pretty hard to think of any place that would oppose such a weapon on principle. Even Catherine was going 'hmmm well now that she's already made it maybe we can put it to good use after all'. It's basically a nuke, and a hundred thousand is a drop in the ocean anyway when we're on about doomsday weapons.

What. The Wasteland, the Hidden Horror, and the Chain of Hunger are the only places in Calernia that wouldn't oppose such a weapon on principle, and even they'd be opposed to anyone else having it. And come on, "It's basically a nuke, and a hundred thousand is a drop in the ocean anyway when we're on about doomsday weapons."? That's a relative standard that literally nobody actually uses, even in our world where nukes have been real since the 1940s and we've had literally generations to get desensitized to them. I guaran-fucking-tee you that if somebody used a nuke today and killed 100,000 people, the reaction would not be "well that was only a hundred thousand, that's a drop in the ocean by the standards of nukes". The reaction would be "HOLY FUCKING SHIT THOSE LUNATICS JUST ACTUALLY USED A NUKE".

caoimhinh

Literally everywhere except the Wasteland and Keter oppose to that weapon on principle; and really on everything else, including practicality, religious motives, and political reasons.

Catherine didn't accept to "put it to good use" she was desperate and emotionally unstable at the moment due to the deaths of 100 thousand of her countrymen which she saw as her responsibility and fault, and accepted to use it as a deterrent by showing what it caused in Liesse and saying to everyone else "leave us alone and we won't use this on you", which wasn't going to work because then everyone would get a freaking divine mandate to wipe them out.

Fortunately, Amadeus was sane enough to notice that what everyone else in the world would see is a fucking diabolical weapon of mass destruction that would be used to threaten them all to submission, hence the rest of Calernia would call a Crusade (which is what they did) against Praes to destroy it and everyone who remotely knew how to build another; so he Destroyed it, since tying themselves to that story as "the Villains with the Doomsday Device" would make them the losers right off the bat.

It was Malicia's stupid obsession with power what led to this, as she actually financed Akua's plan and gave her the materials, because Malicia decided that she wanted her own personal power instead of continuing to rely on and trust the man who had kept her alive and in power for 40 fucking years.

Shveiran

Though I agree that Malicia's move was wrong from both a moral and pragmatic point of view, I don't think she did it out of lack of trust or power hunger.

Believing Amadeus wouldn't be able to repel the full might of the Crusade is not the same thing as those, and it is not an unreasonable position when folks like Saint and Pilgrim come out to play at the head of a larger force.

She made a stupid and despicable move, but she is not swinging out of nowhere out of trust issues, IMO.

caoimhinh

The way I see it, she used the "we will have this Doomsday Weapon as deterrent and thus we will not have to fight more wars" as an excuse. Because it's really illogical and runs against everything they had done for over 40 years. She did it because she wanted to have her own power since the Legions of Terror were more loyal to Amadeus than to her, and she even half-admitted it to him when she said she trusted him but only one could sit on the throne, which is an insult to Amadeus as he had spent the last four decades protecting her and defending her rule, distrusting him is one of the dumbest things she could do, as they started the war, won the war and kept control of Praes by Amadeus constant effort along with Malicia's politicking.

Thinking that Amadeus couldn't repel the full might of the Crusade is a valid worry, but making a diabolist weapon from the Age of Wonders is actually a weakness that would condemn them lose that war, and she must have known that as avoiding such things had been their policy for her entire reign.

It was not a logical move, it was an emotional one, made out of an obsession with power that clouded her judgement.

It has been hinted many times that Alaya is the most emotional of the two and that beneath her mask of control she has a somewhat fragile psyche with many emotional issues (like Tikoloshe's mention that Alaya "craves control the way a starving man craves a meal", her own admission that it took her decades to stop awakening with nightmares about Nefarious, or when after her last conversation with Amadeus she was shown crying and breaking things in her room in a fit of anger).

Liliet

I don't think Alaya fits the "hysterical irrational woman" trope you're trying to fit her into.

Yes, she has intense PTSD from Nefarious, and while she's largely recovered it can never be all the way.

No, she did not know everything as perfectly as Amadeus did. She'd been focused on intra-governmental politics and intrigue while he handled the broader culture / population / narrative issues, and she never came to realize just how large his slice of the "keeping things running" pie really was. It's a flaw in understanding, but it's not... a tantrum.

caoimhinh

I never said she is hysterical or irrational.

I said that her action of scheming to obtain Akua's Doomsday Device (and even financing and supporting it from the shadows) was an emotional decision, it was an action driven by her own craving for control, and that craving blurred her better judgement and cracked her trust on her closest friend in the world.

And yes, she knew things as perfectly as Amadeus, because she has been working with him for 40 years, and because Amadeus explained these kinds of things to her, that's why he was so angry at her, because she knows better and yet willingly made a fatal decision of the kind they had been avoiding their entire lives.

It's a huge difference from being hysterical and irrational.

Liliet

>And yes, she knew things as perfectly as Amadeus, because she has been working with him for 40 years, and because Amadeus explained these kinds of things to her

Did he?

I mean, sure, he definitely rambled in her presence on the topic, and he's certainly explained his decisions to her when she asked – we have seen it happen in Villainous Interlude: Coullisse. Note that she did not see what he was doing there until he explained.

Consider their argument in Epilogue 3. They'd been working at cross-purposes for a while now, prioritizing different aspects of what they believed were important to Praes's well-being, without ever realizing it. Note her conviction that Amadeus was going to get himself killed, and consider it in light of his actual actions – if she picked up on a death wish from him and concluded his judgement was compromised, it was not without grounds.

I am seeing perfectly rational reasons for Malicia to have made the decision that she did. Note that Amadeus even admitted that he could have seen the doomfortress plan succeed if he hadn't seen how Bard operates in the Free Cities. His anger was not just at that specific bit of stupidity, but also at her sabotaging his plan for Callow, which was part of a deeper disagreement – she did not want Callow to be independent and would rather damage it further than allow it to slip out of Praes's grasp, while he held the exact opposite opinion. She accused him of 'using Praes as staging ground for his spitting match with Heavens' and not seeing what his people actually want; in actuality I would say she herself made the mistake of taking the High Lords as representative of the country as a whole and identifying them with it. Her mistake had varied and nuanced roots; her trauma-fueled desire for control certainly played a part, but I'm not even sure she wouldn't have acted the exact same way without it.

caoimhinh

Of course he explained things to her, and of course she knows how their world works, they had been working together for 40 years. They are the closest of friends and Amadeus trusted in her with everything, It was always Malicia who did things behind his back.

She secretly conversed with Wekesa about that weapon, she has hidden mental commands on the high-ranked officials of the Legions without Amadeus knowing (and by her own admission it was done so she could have a hold on them behind his back), she financed Akua's Folly and who knows what other things she has done behind Amadeus' back.

He trusted her, she didn't extend that trust to him because of paranoia, despite more than 40 years of Amadeus keeping her alive and reigning, she still did things behind his back because she felt insecure and thought he had too much power, so she sought to have her own, despite knowing perfectly well that his own power was one of the pillars of her reign. Even when consciously aware of this, she still went with the Doomsday Device plan because that would give her a weapon of her own, independent from others, but by doing so she betrayed her best friend in the world, nearly tied them all to the type of doomed story they had spent their lives avoiding and effectively fucked up her country, triggering the Crusade, Callow's rebellion and the Goblin's uprising.

It's not that Alaya was crazy or hysterical, but she let her emotions guide her actions, which is ironic given how she rants about only trusting people to act according to their nature, well, that's her nature: craving for control. And in the pursue of absolute control she lost the control she had, now she is nearly alone.

Liliet

>Of course he explained things to her, and of course she knows how their world works, they had been working together for 40 years.

Do you think Amadeus is also an expert on dimensional magic theory because he's been working alongside Wekesa for 40 years?

He's the expert in story-fu. She isn't. She does not understand things as deeply as he does, even though he has explained.

>She secretly conversed with Wekesa about that weapon

She hasn't. She got his opinion after the whole thing blew up, and he was actually offended that she went for a secret plan to get it from Akua instead of just asking him.

>she didn't extend that trust to him because of paranoia

We have seen her cut off that line of reasoning in her own POV, counteracting the paranoia with 'it's Maddie, I'm being silly'.

>she let her emotions guide her actions

I disagree. This one decision was made very much out of cold calculations, just mistaken once.

caoimhinh

It's completely different to learning a craft, she definitely knew about Narrative and the weight of stories, that's her whole rethoric when she tried to justify it to Black, remember? "We can't win the fight against the Heavens, so we avoid fighting at all" and also tried to avoid being tied too strongly to that story by not being the one who built the weapon, but instead the one who stole it, and not even use it, just have it as deterrent. It was her own attempt at Story-Fu, and it was well-made enough that even Catherine's Name of Black Queen was about to emerge from that, Malicia's actions had weight and she understood it, yet she underestimated it and Amadeus saw that.

It's true that Malicia isn't as apt at Story-Fu as Amadeus, that doesn't mean she is ignorant, we have even seen from the most recent extra chapter Seed, that Malicia was in the know of Amadeus earliest findings of the Praesi problem with harvests, one that he understood as consequence of Narrative at work, hence their plan of joining Callow into Praes to avoid the starving issue, they came up and worked on that plan together and Black explained to Catherine how they reached that conclusion: by understanding of Narrative.

So Alaya knew the narrative meaning of her actions with Akua's doomsday device, and hence she carried on her plan in a meticulous manner; but her motivation, the drive behind that plan, was always that desire for control and independent power, that is undeniable.

Liliet

Everyone knows about narrative and story-weight, that doesn't mean they understand perfectly well how it works. I never called her completely ignorant.

I do agree that Alaya is largely driven by her desire for control and independent power. I merely disagree that she was doing 'emotional thinking'.
She genuinely believed that the goal she shared with Amadeus – Praes's prosperity – which Amadeus wanted for the sake of people / future generations, and she wanted for the sake of ruling a prosperous country – would be better achieved through these means.

Did her control and trust issues bias her towards this conclusion? Undoubtedly. But she did not go "fuck all other goals I want control even if it kills me".

Liliet

*ones

Javvies

Malicia absolutely knows how things actually work.
Mostly, anyways.
She is the one who wrote "The Death of the Age of Wonders", after all.

However, based on her actions, I'd say Malicia is more of a Classic Old School Evil than a Pragmatic
New Evil type at heart. She was able to go along with the Pragmatic New Evil of Amadeus when it brought her to power and the Conquest ... but when it came to keeping power, she didn't trust it as much and so fell into bad habits that escalated.

As far as Malicia picking up on a Death Wish or something from Amadeus because he picked Cat as an understudy, Malicia is the one who told Cat that Amadeus was going to burn out his own usefulness in some years.

Liliet

She did, but she didn't actually mean it judging by her reactions later. It sounds to me like she was just trying to draw Cat in / get leverage on her / put strings on her.

And Death of the Age of Wonders was about politics, not storycraft. Subtle but important distinction when it comes to nuclear deterrent.

Shveiran

I think Alaya was having trust issues, brought by decades of stress and a very different vision of the great problem ahead.

Ultimately, though, I think her mistake spawned from lack of understanding of the fabric of the world.

My understanding is that Malicia is a brilliant mastermind that sees her world through the lens of our own. She doesn't quite get that creations acts like a narrative, and that is not really a fault: we know of a handful of character in the whole Calernia that can do that reliably and make decisions based on that (I can think of just Cat, Tariq, Black and Bard right now).

If you remove that element from the board, she is seeking a nuclear deterrent.

I don't approve, and she went at it most despicably besides, making a huge gamble with Aqua rather than ask Wakesa to develop one (that's the part where I can see the lack of trust shine most vividly, though maybe she was partially aware of story structure and was trying to distance herself from the story of the weapon being used for the first time). But while dangerous, it is not an attempt doomed to fail. It is a risk, yes, but also a desperate measure for desperate times.

Only if we take into account the stories a death ray provokes we can see that failure was inevitable.

But that was an element I think she lacked.

caoimhinh

Yeah, the problem was her craving for control, which drove her to seek that weapon of her own so she wouldn't have to depend on Amadeus' power. It's a situation like Amadeus having a gun and protecting her with it, and despite she loving Amadeus and spending 40 years being protected by him, she still thinks it's better if she has her own gun, since it makes her feel more secure and in control, plus she could defend against him in the unlikely case that he turned against her; the problem is that she got a freaking bazooka and made everyone around jump in alarm, and she then tried to sell it as "they won't attack me because if they try I will shoot the bazooka, we will be fine" when the reality is a swat squad was assembling to snipe her because of course no sane person wants anyone walking around with a loaded bazooka even if she swears not to use it.

Another thing, she absolutely understands that her world runs on Narrative, hence why she didn't built the weapon herself but instead attempted to steal it from Akua; plus remember it was part of her rethoric for justifying her actions to Amadeus "we can't win the war against Above, so we don't fight the war at all", so she knew the kind of thing she was doing, and the narrative that was building, she just hoped it would turn different, which is the wishful thinking of someone making an emotional decision instead of a rational one.

Liliet

Agreed.

And IMHO Amadeus brought some of it on himself with his "I am CERTAIN you know better" position. He likes to not be in charge and he likes to put trust in people – except in some cases, trust just transfers into pressure, and this was definitely one of those. Malicia found herself at her level of incompetence, and instead of relying on the guy at her side who's better at this specific thing than her, she believed that he was right and she WAS better at this than him.

Calamity ensued, pun intended.

Liliet

Uh, this.

ciara

You're kind of glossing over the part where everyone who saw the Doom-of-Liesse machine and thought "I can use this" was either planning on killing Akua to take it from her (Malicia), or actually already had done so (Cat). How exactly does “inciting literally everyone to murder you” not qualify as making enemies?

Sparsebeard

Man that was almost painful seeing Tyrant be savaged like this...

It probably a good thing Cat left early, I have the feeling if this kept going he probably was gonna erupt in tears at this point.

Liliet

;u;

thegreatfeed

But they WILL become close. Akua WILL be redeemed and she WILL become a better person and only in the full realization of the nature of her crimes will cat’s promised punishment be possible.

This is Chacal de Nahueltoro situation.

Sparsebeard

Still, I don’t know why but a lot of this situation felt like a mistake to me. The whole weakning of Tyran’s position amongst the free cities and not listening when he was about to that about “the greater game” being played felt somewhat dangerous.

I mean, naratively, it would make sense for Cat to make a mistake now, when she’s so tired of body and mind... just when things seem to be looking up.

For all that Tyrant has done, I’d be very surprised if he wasn’t working against Bard. He is the man who created Hierach after all.

Liliet

I will note that Cat did not take into account that Absolutely Everyone will believe Kairos about Akua now, because he can’t tell lies [™].

Euodiachloris

Yeah, but everybody will also be busy trying to work out how he’s getting around the geas, as well – say, finding a way to believe a falsehood is true; or telling the truth with important bits chopped off it that entirely change the meaning. That’s the problem with proving yourself to be a traitorous weathervane with a high IQ: even if you tell the truth, people look for the lies.

JJR

Easiest way would be to create a new language. It has all the words of your old language but the meanings are all reversed. Then you can answer "yes" or "no" to any question as long as you remember to use the language that would make the word be true.

Shveiran

Yes, but... so? Akua is bound to Cat's cloak, I don't see the big deal.

Kairos can't tell lies, but Cat can spin the tale, and I doubt "death was too little a price so I enslaved her soul to my service" is too hard to sell to Callowans.

The hardest part is probably necromancy, and Cat has never been shy with that. Heck, the Heroes did some soul splicing of their own not a month ago, so I don't see THEM being offended by this.

I guess it would not be well received, but how is this a big deal?

Cat has one big secret left, and Kairos is not Malicia.

Liliet

Agreed.

caoimhinh

Indeed.

I see it more in the way that Akua was an ace up her sleeve, keeping her secret worked against Pilgrim as he didn't take her into account when making his plan and had him wondering "who the hell is over there?" after she activated the Eclipse.

Now Kairos knows of Akua, which almost certainly mean everyone in the next meeting will know when Kairos casually mentions it and Pilgrim knows he cannot lie. Which means the truth is out and everyone will start taking Akua into their calculations when dealing with Catherine, which includes Malicia as she more than likely has spies in every army except Helike.

Though the Majilis have just sworn to not fight against Callow until they finish the current fight with the Dead King, but still. Having one of her secret weapons revealed in such a careless manner is a loss.

Liliet

It is.

But I think it's one that would have happened inevitably. In the kind of game Catherine is playing here, NO secret can stay secret long-term. It's better to keep your cards face up from the start, because it'll keep you safe from getting fucked over when Creation decides that the most dramatic possible moment for your secret to get revealed has come.

This is how Akua ends up being revealed. If it didn't happen this way it would have happened in another way.

Note how in the throne room with the crown, Cat considered the plan of summoning Akua there to take it and get killed, and rejected it only on the logic of 'the narrative won't accept it and she won't be here on time'.

caoimhinh

It is also really weird what Kairos did just now. I mean, he captured Archer and Rogue Sorcerer just for the lulz of it or simply to give Catherine a scare and get her angry? That can't be it, he is a betrayer but he is also a schemer. It would it be that he simply did it to make sure that Catherine will keep her end of the bargain (as that was the only thing this conversation provided him beside the insult)? That's still weird, since he knows Catherine honors her bargains.

If there is no reason in-story for Kairos to do what he did, it would make this chapter another one of those fillers whose only purpose to show us Akua's character development and rehabilitation; and I would be disappointed. However, it's a very creative way to slip a filler in the story, much better than the uncle story, at least.

The exchange between Kairos and Akua was great but it could easily have happened at another time, in a less forced situation than Cat rushing to rescue fake hostages. So for story consistency, Kairos must have wanted something from this, and getting Cat into his camp for a conversation must be a step of a plan, unless all of a sudden Kairos has turned into an irrelevant weak character that can't do anything after his last beating at Catherine's hands, which would make no sense as we know the big game is still afloat and many other plans are still in progress, so Kairos can't be thrown into irrelevance/futility so easily.

Euodiachloris

I think he genuinely wanted to chat a little about Bard and the bigger picture... while still cementing his status as an important-if-dangerous piece in the Game.

His method of pulling Cat's ponytail appears to have backfired on him. 😊

Sparsebeard

I wouldn't be surprised if his deal with the Bard was a plot by her to engineer this very chapter.

After all, Hierarch has shown himself a good foil to her plans so perhaps the Bard wanted to sabotage his "relationship" with Cat (who is also a thorn in Bard's shoe).

At the time, perhaps the deal she offered to Tyrant seemed very good, except for the fact that dealing with the Bard was Cat's red line (which he might not have considered then)...

I might be paranoid, but whenever the Bard is involved I feel that the consequences of her involvement might very well be of her design.

Andrew Mitchell

> I might be paranoid, but whenever the Bard is involved I feel that the consequences of her involvement might very well be of her design.

That's a very sensible first assumption to make. The Bard's got millennia more experience than anyone mortals.

Liliet

>So for story consistency, Kairos must have wanted something from this, and getting Cat into his camp for a conversation must be a step of a plan

Yes, but he did not succeed.

Catherine refused to speak to him about whatever it was he wanted to speak about.

He did at least achieve a secondary goal of "reminding the world of his existence", which is imho a goal he always has, but I think he genuinely failed here. I mean he has had how many successes in a row? Even him crawling away from the throne room was very much a success at the core of it.

Andrew Mitchell

I think Catherine's confirmation that Karios was still getting a seat at the negotiation table was also a victory for him. But, yes, he didn't achieve his main goal of having further discussions with Cat.

Liliet

True.

The confirmation of him being invited to the peace conference, and the minor power play of making Cat come to him.

caoimhinh

But it's not like the world would have forgotten his existence if he didn't capture Archer and Indrani, or if he didn't get Cat to march into his camp right away.

As for the real purpose, which seems to be having a conversation with Cat and assurances of his place in the incoming international talks, the second was already known to him to be coming, but I can understand him wanting some more assurances after the events of last night, but both things could have waited until they were refreshed, or he could have much more easily sent a message to Cat's army for the talks to happen (though admittedly that would be too normal for him, out of his style).

I wonder if he was simply aware that Catherine was so tired that if they didn't have the conversation now he would have to wait for her to wake up in two days. Hence the harsh measures to get her attention.

Liliet

p o s s i b l e

(and a power play: look, I can MAKE you come) (that didnt go real well, though technically worked)

caoimhinh

Perhaps, though there was not much point in doing that. There's really not much point in what Kairos did, and also not much point in Cat bringing Akua there (sure, she is a strong spellcaster and who knows what she can call by using Night now, but Catherine has always made a point about keeping her hidden and she is aware that Kairos has supernatural perception, plus Catherine didn't really expect a fight in the League's camp); so in-story there's little meaning to those causes, but on a Meta level it's kinda obvious that the effect EE wanted was showing Akua's words, so he made Kairos do this and made Cat bring Akua along despite those two actions not being very logical and both being mistakes as it turned out (Kairos was humilliated and Akua's existence was revealed).

That dialogue, though it turned into half a monologue by Akua, was really cool, but the timing of it is off, and the events that led to it feel a bit forced, as they only happened by two of the series top schemers making mistakes they should have avoided.

Liliet

>There's really not much point in what Kairos did

There's not really much point to anything Kairos does, outside of the principle of the thing. Remember how Cat got him to turn on the Dead King just for the joy of turning on the strongest opponent? Right now, that's Cat, and he did technically get away with yanking her chain once more, even if he didn't get much out of it.

> and also not much point in Cat bringing Akua there (sure, she is a strong spellcaster and who knows what she can call by using Night now, but Catherine has always made a point about keeping her hidden and she is aware that Kairos has supernatural perception, plus Catherine didn't really expect a fight in the League's camp)

Zombie's saddlebags were filled with bare necessities: wakeleaf, a set of knives and munitions. Catherine was very much accounting for the possibility of a fight, and Hakram and Akua are essentially the two available Woe.

(Vivienne doesn't have a Name and doesn't have another power source like Cat herself, Masego is sorcery-less and asleep, Indrani's absence is the problem in question)

Catherine actually hasn't made a point of hiding Akua, only of keeping her disguised (and she is wearing the disguise here – Cat says 'i could almost see her eyes through the veil' at one point), which has been fully sufficient so far, except with the other Woe who simply know already. And Kairos doesn't trumpet his supernatural perception around... and Cat is really really really fucking exhausted. Like she was exhausted before dawn already, then dawn that actually knocks drow the fuck out came, and now she's running on Red Bull and pissiness. She made a miscalculation in going for the reflexive "assemble the avengers" response, and she still hasn't noticed the full extent of it (that Kairos is now truthful, which means he can rat her out to at least Pilgrim and Rogue who know it for a fact, and also to anyone Pilgrim tells about his curse).

Kairos made no mistake here. He lost nothing except some face (and we're talking about a guy who cheerfully belly-crawled away from the throne room, here), and got Cat to both come and confirm his invitation to the conference. He didn't get everything he was aiming for, but no mistakes were made.

And Catherine NOT making mistakes here would honestly have been weirder. She's, like, half-conscious. And Kairos most definitely deliberately sought to exploit it.

Narratively speaking, this is Cat getting blowback from the drawbacks of mortality (exhaustion) and from overreach mastermind-wise (she still has to do a lot of things personally, which means that when a scheme is grand enough, she's prone to ending up in this position – when she's already spent mentally, but there's still more to do, and urgently).

Akua getting a chance to shine and get some therapy was a pleasant surprise, but there was nothing off about the events that led up to it.

JJR

Maybe those tomes he offered to Roland were both actually a trap somehow?

caoimhinh

Poor Roland, every time he tries to get a magic tome it turns out to be a trap or scheme of some sort.

Liliet

>I mean, he captured Archer and Rogue Sorcerer just for the lulz of it or simply to give Catherine a scare and get her angry? That can't be it, he is a betrayer but he is also a schemer.

He is a schemer, but the endpoint of his larger schemes is the same: piss off as many people / eldritch entities as he can while still surviving it, and in the end die to so many people it'll be Traitorous all over again, only every one for real.

caoimhinh

Aren't you underestimating Kairos there?

Sure, he gets high on betrayal and loves pissing off other people, but he doesn't do things for the lulz, even if he does what he enjoys the most and does everything in a way that can make him laugh the most. He has a plan for everything he does, and objectives that he has been achieving along the story, even if he seemed to be just having fun.

If he were simply doing things for fun and to piss off people he would be a lot less dangerous.

Liliet

I'm not underestimating him in the least. If he had goals that were in any way compatible with anyone else's and didn't boil down to lulz and pissing everyone off at the end, he'd be a great deal less dangerous.

I mean, what do YOU think his goals are? What is he working towards?

Consider his dialogue with Skein, where Skein taunted him with spending years of his life on Wishes, to which Kairos's response was basically "HOLD MY FLOWER" to Catherine.

He has very much been achieving goals, yes. Those goals were him getting to reap even more lulz and pissing people off in the longer term.

Consider that the Dread Empire had considered him an actual ally, and was willing to spend resources on supporting his rise. His response to that? "How do I make it so they seek eternal revenge against me, instead"

Catherine characterized him earlier, imho correctly, as a true believer / priest of Below. Strife for the sake of strife, betrayal for the sake of betrayal, prayer offered just out of pride. Everyone else is not allowed to dismiss him, especially not if they're no longer underestimating him.

(Which Pilgrim still is, and the trap on him is still waiting to be sprung)

Akua gets him very well, here, because her objective, too, was in large part just 'screaming loud enough for the world to hear'. She was worse at it than him, and failed earlier, and has since dismissed the goal as defeating its own purpose; from Kairos's point of view, the game is still very much worth playing. Sure it ends with him dead; there was never any other option available in the first place.

Like... what other objective are you seeing him work towards? Not in specific, just in general, what else do you think he prioritizes? What's the competing principle?

caoimhinh

Sure, but what we need to keep in mind is that he doesn't act thinking only one step ahead, Kairos always acts moving several plans and scheming multiple things, plus he has contingencies in place for most of the things he does.

He doesn't just do things to piss off people now, he does things with a reason, the move people to do something, prevent them from doing something, to get information, to get an advantage for the next stage of the game, etc.

He keeps the game afloat, so his actions are not thoughtless, he is actually very careful in his madness and actions, even if he goes around pissing off everyone, they get pissed off because he is winning and his actions usually cost something for someone else (usually it's other people's lives while he pushes his own agenda, like the League war, the conflict with Hanno, the betrayal of the Calamities and the whole campaign in Iserre).

His actions are not "hey, I'm gonna piss off this dude", his actions are "I'm going to do something, and it will give me an advantage and keep on my plans, and piss off this dude in the process".

Sure, he has made lots of people angry, but he has also strengthened Helike, unified the League of Free Cities, made every other country in Calernia know his name and recognize the League as another player in the big game when they had been ignored before, caused great losses to all his competitors up to this point, and goes side by side with great schemers of the caliber of the Intercessor and the Dead King, he HAS achieved lots of things.

His endgame goes beyond simply pissing off others.

Liliet

His actions are not thoughtless, I never said they are.

>His endgame goes beyond simply pissing off others.

WHERE. Where do you think it goes? What IS the endgame?

Catherine cares about her country and people in general. Every other objective she has is ultimately overridden by this caring, but she has plenty of them: plenty of people she cares about, quite a few grudges she believes it her duty to carry (even though she will let go of them in a heartbeat if, again, her broader caring demands it).

Amadeus's goals boil down to ensuring Praesi people's long term prosperity / delivery from starvation. Everything else is instrumental towards that goal, although he also has a lot of things he cares about outside of it – people, moreso than things, really. Yet he will sacrifice all else if he has to in the service of that goal. If you dig into his reasons for doing literally anything, what you find is caring about other people, too – either situationally and momentarily (giving a cloak to that girl in the alley in chapter 1) or broadly and long-term (setting up orphanages so he can weed out heroes so he can rule Callow unimpeded so Praes can get its grain...)

When you dig into Kairos's motivations and plans, the end-goal you find is always wanting to spite Creation. Right now the end goal we know about is getting Hierarch to judge the Choir of Judgement – why? What does he get out of it?

What do you think he does?

And as I've said already, he has not lost anything with this maneuver. His gains were smaller than he'd have liked, but they were existent nonetheless. Mind games of 'you come when called' matter, in this kind of political clusterfuck.

Mental Mouse

Kairos is old-school evil. He knows that Creation didn't plan for him to survive, so he's going to screw Creation, and make people shiver when they see the ruins he'll leave behind.

ninegardens

His end game is Hierarch. I don't know what he plans to D0 with that sword, but that is his end game. That, and potentially screwing over the bard one last time.

Don't get me wrong, his end game will STILL probably be screaming into the void for the lulz.... but he has a bigger joke down the line.

As far as his plan here.... Cat is already at maximum hatred towards him. She's exhausted. He wanted to talk to her, or get a look at her, or just gather intel, and screwing with Archer and Rouge Sauce cost him nothing. There was an opportunity, and he took it. Maybe he didn't manage to D0 anything with that opportunitiy, but hey- its a free roll of the dice that costs him next to nothing, and pisses Cat off. The fact that he COULD have gained something from it if Cat had been more willing to listen is reason enough to justify his actions.

Liliet

This is what I'm seeing, yep.

Javvies

He may secretly have an actual plan. It might even be that he plans to put the Gods on trial, as I believe he said once.

But he sure as hell acts like he's just doing shit because nobody's killed him for it yet. And he usually acts like he's a nihilist, as well.

I mean, seriously – remember, Kairos worked with Bard to set up Sabah just so that he could betray Black and stab him in the feels while doing so. When Black was trying to help him gain control/influence over the rest of the League.

That gained Kairos nothing except for the enmity of Black and Warlock. And maybe whatever Bard gave him, if anything, though it didn't seem like she did.

caoimhinh

Emm, that whole event also gave Kairos authority over the League without being tied to the Empire of Praes, weakened the Calamities by killing Sabah and drove them away from his territory, butchered the group of Heroes active in the region and made them owe him a favor by letting the two survivors escape and heal while also pointing to other people than the League (Hanno and Raphaella moved on to fight against Praes- and Callow- in the Crusade, not against Kairos as even if they fought against him the ones who killed their friends were the Calamities not Kairos) and gave him an in with the Wandering Bard.

Of that whole mess, Kairos got a lot of stuff besides a good laugh. Same as in every one of his plans, except perhaps the Princes' Graveyard, and that only because Catherine outsmarted everyone (DK and WB still got some of the things they wanted though they paid a price).

Seriously, Kairos got sassed in a verbal discussion one chapter and suddendly everyone forgot how much of a successful schemer he is? Why does people suddenly think he only thinks in terms of immediate fun and no long term, when he has proven time and time again that he is playing a long game? He does things in the way that get him the most thrill, of course, but that doesn't mean he is not thinking of the long run.

Shveiran

It seems to me you are painting this in black and white while there is a whole lot of other colors in between.

"Kairos acts at random" is not the only alternative to "Kairos has a goal".

Personally, I think Kairos IS brilliant, in his own deranged way; and he certainly makes sure to always end up with working tools for the next scheme whenever he burns bridges finishing the current plan.

I ALSO think this is just a balancing act, however complex.

Like an athlete pushing his body to ever higher achievement, the act is the goal: to strive for perfection just to see how close he can get to it. Whereas perfection here is "Traitorous levels of Below madness", I suppose.

Kairos, in my opinion, aims to cry out to fill the voyd, so that someone will remember the sound of his voice; what he shouts is not really important to him: just the act, just the volume.

That is not really "having a goal"; that's "staying in the game as long as possible to have all the fun that can be had".

caoimhinh

I'm trying to do the opposite, actually.

To me, painting Kairos as someone who simply wants to piss off everyone and have a laugh at their expense is oversimplifying him severely.

As you said, this is not black and white, one thing doesn't eliminate the other. Sure, he offends everyone and has fun at their expense, but he also schemes and has deep and careful plans, vast intelligence networks capable of rooting out all of Scribe's agents (and likely Malicia's spies too), tactical cunning, and he is pretty meticulous in what he does, even if every single time it seemed like he was doing something for the lulz, that was only the surface layer, as I pointed in the previous comment, he HAS achieved a lot as a result of his plans, so just because we don't know exactly what he wants now doesn't mean he doesn't want something or doesn't have a plan for it.

Once again I point out, if he was a simple-minded person he wouldn't be so much trouble for everyone else, if he didn't make such good plans he wouldn't have managed to offend all those big players in the first place. It's because he made moves and won, which means they lost a round, that he has offended them in such depth, they aren't annoyed by him, they are hurt by him and were put in very real danger by his schemes. So far he has only "lost" once and he still managed to get a deal with the Bard, keep himself alive despite everyone around wanting him dead and kept his game afloat. Everyone else who has lost a round in the game has lost a precious someone or had their armies butchered. Kairos only lost a huge number of his gargoyles and spent artifacts from his vaults.

A few books back when he was trolling Anaxares and keeping him as "his most trusted advisor" nobody knew what the fuck was going on, later fighting with the members of the League of Free Cities, then against Hanno and betraying the Calamities we didn't see his plans, only in hindsight have we learned what he was aiming for. Why should now be different?

He has things he wants, he makes plans for them, and has the most fun out of it as he possibly can, because one thing does not remove the other.

Liliet

Kairos has things he wants and makes plans for them.

Those things he wants are, in fact, to offend everyone and have fun at their expense.

Like, you're thinking that just because he's a brilliant schemer and mastermind he has to have Serious Goals, or maybe you're taking some goals as self-evident? What the fuck ARE those self-evident goals though?

Kairos wants to fuck people over, in the long-term through carefully laid plans.

And in the medium term, as a far-from-accidental side effect of these plans.

And in the short term, as much as he can get away with without compromising these plans.

He's brilliant as fuck, and he's using all of that brilliance to be a troll. I'm not seeing what you're not seeing here.

ninegardens

I mean, it can easily be somewhere in between. He spent an entire book setting up Hierarch. That wasn't a whim. That wasn't JUST for the lulz. That was a long term meticulous plan that also happened to give him a potent weapon for later.

He might not have a plan for what to USE that weapon on later (though it looks like he does), but the point is, he at the very least has medium term plans beyond "screw with people", and has acted in a way that suggests long term plans (which may or may not be "screw with people")

For example, if his eventual goal is "Break destiny over my knee... permanently", that would match with his current action, and be a significant long term goal.

I think we explicitly don't KNOW his long term plans yet. They might be "fuck with people", they might be more complicated. In some sense, that's what makes him interesting.

Liliet

I agree.

My point is that since his core ethos is "fuck everyone and you in particular", he'll take actions that fit it whenever he has opportunity to.

Nairne .01

This felt short however, I was smiling through the whole of it.

Riaan Theunissen

Now, I know that Catherine sometimes misremembers things so that she sees herself in a better light, but given what she did to some of the Fae, things known to Akua and Hakram, shouldn't they at least be very worried about the fact that they can't pin down where they are?

Fayhem

I'm pretty sure if Larat wanted to scheme up some almost-certainly-self-destructive plan against somebody for past offenses, it would more likely be directed at Ms. Really-likes-that-jewelry than at Cat. And I got the vibe that Prince of Nightfall or not the rest of the former Wild Hunt are still following Larat's lead.

Andrew Mitchell

> Ms. Really-likes-that-jewelry

Ranger?

Euodiachloris

Yup.

She who likes very specific baubles.

Fayhem

Yep.

Riaan Theunissen

Catherine did things to individuals. Notably making one eat her own fingers. (I assume that there are a number of lesser actions as well.) Given that I would expect Akua, Hakram and others would want to make damn sure one doesn't get it into their head to get a bit of payback by making somebody Catherine cares about or uses die in agony, by making certain no illusion at the wrong place and time causes an incident between armies that escalates, no poison or curses find themselves in rations... Honestly, given some of the things shown about the Fae in this story as well as the methods Catherine used to control the Wild Hunt, I would expect lots of worry.

Fayhem

I already replied to Mental Mouse about basically this so I don't want to repeat myself too much. But basically, all the nasty shit Winter!Cat did to the fae was about successfully intimidating the shit out of them. She made that fae eat her own hand just for screwing with some random-ass tavern patrons in Callow. You think they're too stupid to put together what happens if they try hurting someone she actually specifically cares about?

It's not impossible that Larat and whatever minions he brings along could be an issue of some kind in future, but if he ever willingly re-enters Cat's orbit it's going to be in service of a plan more subtle and generally all-around fuckier than just screwing with her for vengeance's sake. Definitely worth continuing to keep an eye out for which I expect they'll be doing, but after all the trouble Larat and the former Wild Hunt just went to in order to slip the noose and get the fuck away from Cat I don't think they're going to be tripping over themselves to either come back or provoke her, much less both.

Riaan Theunissen

I haven't been speaking about Larat. I have been speaking about Akua and Hakram (and the others in Catherine's circle) and the fact that given what Catherine had done to various Fae they (Akua, Hakram and others) would want to know where the Fae (or whatever they are now) are and would be worried instead of dismissive about the fact that they don't know where the Fae are. Because Catherine controlled via torture, spectacle and killing, things that do not make fond memories, and because between glamour, potential portals, supernatural physical abilities and whatever powers an individual fae possesses one slipping in for a bit of sport / revenge could be disaster and / or death....

Liliet

>between glamour, potential portals, supernatural physical abilities and whatever powers an individual fae possesses

Catherine has specifically commented that crownless Larat did not appear to have a speck of power. I expect him to have lots of ways to do things anyway, but he's no less depowered than winterless Cat (and with no convenient crow goddesses to pick up the burden).

Riaan Theunissen

If they were truly powerless, however would they leave the realm or remain undiscovered? Not being able to find them should point to some abilities or powers. Granted, in the time that Larat had the crown on his head, he might have been able to create a backdoor (or multiples) in the realm that they used to get out, but even that should be cause for worry. (Of course, whether Hakram and Akua worry would also depend upon whether Catherine had taken the time to brief them about the "loss of power", which I don't think she has.)

As to the rest, my question has continuously been that given what had been done and the current situation, shouldn't Hakram and Akua have show worry. I have not been expressing concern, I have been asking about whether Hakram, Akua and maybe others should have been expressing concern given what they know.

Liliet

No, because they have a lot of more pressing concerns at the moment. Excessive anxiety over all possible scenarios leads to burnout.

Fayhem

Larat is the former Prince of Nightfall and the leader of the former Wild Hunt. If you've been expressing concerns over the fae, I think you have been talking about Larat, whether directly or indirectly.

And given that all of my points referred to "the former Wild Hunt" just as much as to Larat personally, that's besides the point anyway. So I guess my response would have to be "all the stuff I said before, but again" since you didn't actually respond to any of my points. Oh! And also a side of "what Liliet said", since whatever they are now it's not quite fae, certainly not as they were before anyway.

Mental Mouse

The thing is, the fey do get the idea of "don't screw with that person, they can eat us for lunch on their off days". They are bound by stories, so they try to avoid stories that run "... so Ranger killed them all. The End."

Fayhem

I mean, the ostensible premise of the potential concern re: Cat is all the interactions they've had with her. All the terrifying, terrifying interactions where she successfully bullied and intimidated the Wild Hunt. I agree that screwing with Ranger is for close to 100% of people/entities out there just a hilariously efficient means of committing suicide; that's why I said it's something you'd do if you wanted an almost-certainly-self-destructive activity. But screwing with Cat isn't much better for them, if at all in fact (Ranger's got massively more combat power, but Cat's got way more cunning and an order of magnitude more institutional support and I think Winter fae in particular respect cunning more), and they've had more than enough experience with her to figure that out.

tl;dr: I didn't say that because I actually think they're dumb enough to screw with Ranger, I meant more that if they were stupid enough to screw with Cat for the sake of it they would burn themselves up through sheer idiocy before they ever became a problem. If Larat or any of his minions show up again, they're going to have a subtler plan afoot than just "screw with Cat".

Liliet

Agreed on all counts.

Kissaten

What's up with all that Kairos hate? A ten or so chapters ago people shipped CatxKairos.

MagpieJack

EE is a good author who can play his audience. We loved Kairos, so he gave us so much Kairos Kairosly being the Kairorest we actually got sick of him. And then he gives us Monday's cliffhanger, which made so many people go UGHGUHGUHGUUGH (myself included).

BUT! All according to keikaku, since this chapter would straight up not work in the slightest if folks weren't as completely and totally done with the kid's antics as Cat is.

I suspect we won't see much of lil' K for a while, so that when he comes back we'll be all "Kairos you scoundrel we missed you".

Liliet

a g r e e d

RoflCat

He was an amusing mad clown for a while.

Then he stopped being funny, then he made deal with the fucking Bard.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

A few possibilities I'm spitballing here.

People fully realized that Cat's hatred of him isn't ironic banter.

His temporary alignment with Bard makes him more directly antagonistic from a storytelling standpoint.

Now that he's run out of people to anger his schtick's simply wearing thin; there's no-one new for him to get a rise out of anymore and his recurring victims' crankiness over it is infectious.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

(Also: remember when people shipped Cat with the Dead King? Weird in hindsight, though it was before he was first onscreen.)

Mental Mouse

Neshamah can be a pretty boy when he wants to be.

Shveiran

He's got cold hands, but coming with his own Serenity earns him points with the Firerfly girls.

Fayhem

Cold hands, warm hearts. A good boyfriend should know when to bring snacks, after all.

Andrew Mitchell

Hahahahaha.

Mental Mouse

LOL!

Mental Mouse

>... coming with his own Serenity earns him points with the Firefly girls.

I'm sure he'd have great times with those those mage-takers from Marchford.

caoimhinh

I don't think people are so much hating Kairos as recognizing that Akua landed a sick burn on him.
Honor where it's due, she cut him deep in that verbal exchange.

Euodiachloris

A moment to appreciate the sensibilities of the late Dread Empress Massacre. I get the impression that, though she certainly enjoyed both the simple and the convoluted approaches to getting the job done, her real delight lay in just cutting straight to the goal.

Fayhem

Yeah, she feels like somebody who really channels the Tao of Alexander, specifically vis-à-vis the Gordian Knot. Except the knot represents governing an empire instead of just being a big tangle of rope.

...actually, come to think of it I'm pretty sure it was meant to be a metaphor for that in Alexander's story too. Just means it fits even better!

SpeckofStardust

Compared to the truths you can still feel slithering through your blood, those that whisper of greatness instead of submission." sigh
Submission to your urges is not anything but submission.

Liliet

That's the one that got her to hiss, too. Consider that #1 Wasteland aristocracy rule is 'never show emotion' ;u;

Akua Has Opinions And Is All Out Of Fucks

Cap'n Smurfy

"No," I said. "We don't. You want an audience? Crawl to my camp. You ought to know how, after last night."

I think out of all the insults thrown his way tonight, that one had to hurt the most. The idea that he's no longer important or powerful enough to be worth listening to.

Paul

Well, who was I to deny that hard-headed arrogance couldn't let you fight the run world? Run=whole

Paul

You are tamer a beast than I believed you would be, Akua Sahelian.

You are a tamer beast instead of "you are tamer a" flows better

Liliet

No, I think this one is possible too. An idiosyncratic grammar choice, not a typo.

Fayhem

Yeah, I think Liliet has the right of it here. That's a deliberately stylized mode of speech (the kind you'd bring to Court, for a non-random example), not an error.

Eleron M Pfoutz

Kairos gonna need some aloe and some antiseptic for those burns.

Ben Serreau-Raskin

Damn Cat, that was cold.

Soronel Haetir

So why does Akua still call Cat a fae? I thought that was gone with her surrendering Winter. Is it just part of her continuous needling?

Liliet

> Is it just part of her continuous needling?

Yep.

Shveiran

So... is next chapter going to be about a father daughter reunion?

...Cuz I really want a father daughter reunion.

Andrew Mitchell

♥ ♥ I think we all want to see that.

Captain Amazing

I think Akua is going to cut out the Evil upbringing part of her soul and then come back as essentially someone else after sacrificing herself at Keter. In the Underdark she said she was trying to find out how to come back with every essential part of herself intact. Her definition of what's important to her being has changed somewhat since she met Cat. I'm thinking she and an abdicated Catherine could teach at a Callowan war college 😊

Andrew Mitchell

> I'm thinking she and an abdicated Catherine could teach at a Callowan war college 😊

Sounds like another great premise for some PGtE fan-fiction. It could even be a sitcom.

Liliet

Cat mentions to Akua in passing that Wekesa had been too much of a wuss to teach magery at college even though Amadeus had asked suddenly Headmistress Akua

Andrew Mitchell

O M G. Now I want to see that even more.

Seraphimus

Hello EE!

I just tore through all chapter of the Guide in very few days and I must say I absolutely love it! Keep up the good work!

Andrew Mitchell

Welcome to the PGtE community. We're a nice bunch and our discussions in the comments section here enrich my understanding and appreciation immensely. I hope you'll stick around and contribute your thoughts too.

FYI the community also has a sub-reddit and a Discord channel.

You might like to check out the Extra Chapters, some of which are not linked to from within the chapter pages. <https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/extra-chapters/>

Discreet Commenter

Spelling: Almost every time you use the word "discrete" (which means "separate/non-continuous"), you actually mean "discreet" (which means "careful/covert/secretive").

ninegardens

Re-reading this, given certain events at the end of this book is... interesting.

I don't think that Akua's insults cut nearly as deep as people seem to think... and I can't help but think Tyrant cut into her...

Chapter 55: Renewal

"It is said that when his Chancellor told him the scheme to release a culling plague would cause rebellion, Dread Emperor Vile thoughtfully replied that should this be the case he could always release a second one."

– Introduction to 'Thirteen and One' by Hakim of Kahtan, the Haunted Scholar

I woke up knowing two things: were more than halfway to dusk and that my leg hurt.

Gods, the throbbing was atrocious. Like someone was taking a hammer to my knee with every breath. I was tempted to reach for the Night before I'd even opened my eyes, to weave it so that coolness would sink into fevered flesh and the pain would recede to a dull and distant beat. Instead I forced myself to unclench my teeth and breathed in and out slowly, soothingly. I'd already pushed my limits last night more than was wise, cheating my body's due once more would only worsen the eventual settling of the debts. No, best to feel the harrowing pulse now when I had yet to see demands made of my time rather than putting it off until the cup tipped regardless of what I wanted. I let out a shuddering breath and opened my eyes, taking in the dim lighting within the tent. I'd settled onto a padded armchair to sleep instead of a bed, which no doubt would have made things even worse with my leg if someone hadn't propped both of them up on footrest while I slept. As usual, I was left to wonder about who it was that'd struck a devil's bargain in my name to arrange my meeting Hakram. In truth it was coincidence, I thought, though perhaps of that pointed kind that some might call fate. And it wasn't like that relationship had been made of thin air, willed into existence – it had taken time and trust and understanding. But how many people in Creation went through their lives without ever encountering someone who understood them even half as well as he and I did? It might not be providence, but it would be a lie to say that villains did not get golden luck of their own sometimes.

I let a few breaths pass, two sensations warring over mastery of my body. The loud and strident call of pain in my leg and the sort of earthly satisfaction one got from much needed sleep. The pleasant lethargy that lingered until you stretched, telling you a need had been seen to. I embraced the former to drown out the latter and sought further distraction by taking in the tent. The reason I'd ended sprawled in an armchair instead of a bed was but a few feet away: Masego still lay still on his cot, hands folded over his chest as it slowly rose and lowered. Indrani had fallen asleep on him when seated on his bedside, forehead on his side as she lightly snored. And, by the looks of the sheet beneath her mouth, drooled. Well, we'd all had a long night. The folding chair she was still seated on was precariously balanced on its two front feet, anchored only by her weight and leaning against the cot. I resisted the urge to suddenly shout just to see her stumble on the ground, though it was a close-run thing. To my surprise, there was another within the admittedly cramped tent.

In another armchair, curled up like sleeping cat, Vivienne was clutching at a blanket and sleeping so heavily she might as well be dead. I wasn't the only one who was a fragile little mortal these days, it was true, and her hours of waking had been almost as troublesome as mine. While I would not hesitate a moment to ruin Archer's sleep, Vivienne at least should get to keep her slumber for a while yet.

There were two layers over me, my cloak and a thicker blanket above it, so I softly dropped the latter on the ground and with a muted grunt pulled the former around me. Gods, even with the brazier in the corner the air was cool and I'd shrugged off quite a few of my clothes for comfort. Barefoot, I slid onto the footrest and back into my discarded boots, tightening the straps. Pain in leg spiked, which did not bode well for walking out of here. I reached out blindly and without fought, but my fingers closed around my staff. I almost started, eyes narrowing as I turned to look at the dead wood. Had I remembered where I'd propped it up last night, somewhere in the back of my mind? Or had it just been where it needed to be? Didn't matter, I ultimately decided. It was meant only to help me walk, not to serve as a weapon or a tool of power. It could not fail me in an hour of need if I never relied on it for more than what any stick could provide. I pushed myself up, swallowing a moan of pain, and took a few hobbling steps. It got better after a bit, though never less than unpleasant. Finding myself close to Indrani and Masego's sleeping forms I allowed myself to take them in for a moment, Masego most of the two. It'd been near a year now, hadn't it? How strange, that someone who'd been nothing to be for most my life could come to be missed to sorely when we were now parted. It wasn't even that Zeze was the one among my friends I saw the most. That'd always been Hakram. But there'd always been a manner of comfort in knowing that Masego was close by, even if he'd disappeared into a tome or an experiment for a few days. From the moment we'd met he'd so rarely been afar, even if not together. Until he'd left for Thalassina. I could sense a discreet working of Night on him, woven to keep another appraised of his health, and that served as fresh reminder of what our third time in Liesse had personally cost him.

When he woke, it would not be pretty. There'd be many among my fresh allies howling for punishment, and the loss of his sorcery would not necessarily be enough to appease. They weren't even wrong, I thought, for though he'd done it in grief and while manipulated by the Dead King he had come within an hour of killing hundreds of thousands. More, even. If the realm that'd become the Twilight Ways had crashed into Iserre, it would have taken more than this battlefield with it. How many more thousands lived in the principality's cities, its towns and countryside? No small number, and most of that civilians. Penance would have to be found, I thought, though delicately doled out. Already returning to lucidity would make him behold in full the truth that his fathers were gone, but that anguish would be paired with his sorcery being taken. That would... take time to accept, I suspected. I would not pretend to truly understand every part of the complex relationship Masego had with magic, but I suspected it would not be too different from losing a dear friend or a spouse for him. But we're back, I thought, looking at the sleeping pair. Vivienne was not far, and though Hakram would already be busying himself with one of the thousand little hidden things that kept my world spinning he was close as well. After months in the dark and split across the face of Calernia to seek our own truths, we were finally together again. Grim as the days to come were, the Woe had found each other once more.

Whatever doom lay approaching behind the horizon, it would find us waiting and bearing sharp knives.

Swallowing a wince as I leaned down, I picked up my blanket and softly laid it on Archer's shoulders. I brushed back a lock of hair that'd tumbled over her ear, fingers lingering as I acknowledged that there would be need to settle matters personal as well eventually. Though Indrani has spoken it nonchalantly enough as we chased victory in Liesse, the admission that she loved the sleeping man she was drooling on was no small thing. Out in the open it was no longer as a butterfly's wingbeat, easily ignored or taken for illusion. Most of what would have to be settled in there would have to be seen to by the pair of them, and I had no place in it, but only most. I'd been sharing a bed with Indrani regularly since that first time in the Everdark, but it might be for the best for that to cease until boundaries had been clearly drawn for them both. Or disappointments had, if it was to be that. Masego was in no way mandated with returning that affection, after all. And someday I wondered if he even could. That he had no interest in bedplay was well-worn knowledge, but he'd displayed disinterest in more than that. There were many ways to love someone, and not all involved skin or pining sighs. They'd find their balance, I knew. Or make peace with the way they could not. We were all too tightly bound for such a small thing to wound.

Being a good friend when the mood struck me, I slid a few small firewood logs under the lifted feet of Archer's chair so she'd not topple when she inevitably woke. I limped out quietly, feeling filthy with sweat and soot and blood. The thought of a warm bath or even a basin of hot water ferociously attractive, but I'd not eaten in too long and drunk quite a bit over the last day and night. Best get breakfast before that came back to haunt me. The thought was enough to work an appetite, and as it happened there was an open campfire not far. The two silhouettes by it I knew well, and was greeted by amused smiles when I leaned over the fire to smell at the iron pot being heated.

"Tea?" I said, surprised.

"One of Aisha's blends," Hakram replied. "It ought to help with the leg, if only a little."

Adjutant knew well my reluctance to cheat the discomfort for too long, so it wouldn't be an herb meant to kill the pain. Maybe one of those Wasteland herbs that helped with the flow of blood? Eh, I'd ask later. Instead I made Akua move further down the old stone and sat myself with a grunt, hands rising to accept the mug of tea the orc had just poured. I sniffed once more, but though the smell was vaguely familiar I couldn't quite put the finger on what had gone in it. I blew out the mist that wafted up, ignoring the increasing number of eyes I could feel on me. This part of the camp would be restricted, I thought, but there'd still be soldiers. It wouldn't be long before word spread I'd woken. The prominence of Lower Miezán in both Callow and Praes meant that gossip still flew with swift wings no matter who ended up joining the ranks of my armies.

"I'm guessing that clever little Night-weave on Masego is your work," I said to Akua.

She inclined her head.

"His health remains within my expectations," she said. "Though it may be some time still until he fully recovers."

My brow rose.

"Losing the magic didn't knock him out," I pointed out. "I did."

"You only pre-empted the natural course," she told me. "You may think of it as Lord Hierophant having recently gone under a surgeon's knife."

"Like when I lost an aspect," I murmured.

"That was a metaphysical wound," Akua disagreed. "This is physical. The body must acclimate itself to the absence of magic."

"And typically how does that go?" I frowned.

"It is not a phenomenon I am much familiar with, for in the Wasteland is it exceedingly rare for one to lose sorcery without death ensuing," she admitted. "And I no longer have a storied library to expand my learning, much as I would like to."

The Sisters might know, I thought. Or Roland, considering part of his Name apparently involved the 'confiscation' of magic.

"I see no reason to worry," Akua assured me. "Though he should remain weakened for a span, he should wake much sooner. It is exhaustion, not forced torpor."

I slowly nodded. Still, I'd not gamble with Masego's health if I could help it. Behind me the sound of eggs on a pan caught my attention: Hakram had cracked three, as I usually took, and was frying them on the open fire.

"I'll get you a conversation with the Rogue Sorcerer," I told Akua. "You should be able to get use out of that."

She inclined her head in agreement. I claimed a bowl myself, as Hakram's sole hand was already occupied, and watched with mild bemusement as Akua Sahelian heeded his instructions and got out a small pot of salt before sprinkling a few touches of it on my eggs. He deftly turned them afterward, using only his wrist. There was still half a cookpot's worth left of stew – horse, since we were starting to run low on other fresh meats, and I ended up digging hungrily into a bowl filled with both. The tea took me longer to get through, for it tasted bitterer than I preferred, but I was not drinking it purely for pleasure. It was a pleasant meal, my two companions keeping the conversation going on matters of no great import while I only occasionally interjected a grunt of agreement or the opposite. Apparently the heartlands of Procer used a great deal more salt in their meals than I was used to back home, since it could be brought in cheap from the great salt pans on the western coast of Neustria and Brus. I stretched a bit afterwards, pleasantly full in a way that I'd never truly known how badly I missed until I could be again.

"Right," I finally sighed. "Lay it on me, then. What did I miss while I slept?"

"In truth, nothing particularly pressing," Hakram said, to my surprise. "Arnaud Brogloise has sent messenger to request an audience when it is convenient for you. He'll be approaching you in the name of the First Prince, since the powers she granted him have yet to expire. I'd consider what he has to say more representative of the situation in Salia than what Princess Rozala will speak to."

I hummed.

"But it's not pressing," I said. "Why?"

"I expect he's still going through the partial text of the Accords I passed to him," Hakram said.

I didn't reply immediately, though I almost chastised him. We'd discussed passing that along to the Procerans in advance of the conference that would most likely be held in Salia – I couldn't see Hasenbach leaving the city at the moment, she'd be leaving the Highest Assembly to its own devices – but I'd been more inclined to Princess Rozala, or even the now-former Princess Sophie Louvroy. The latter was one of Hasenbach's loyalists, the one sent to keep an eye on the army, which implied a degree of trust. On the other hand, Arnaud Brogloise had turned out to be her spy and empowered envoy. He was, objectively, the better pick: not only was it assured that whatever he saw would end up in Cordelia's ear, he had the authority to speak on her behalf before we got to Salia. And though dear old Arnaud obviously had very few compunctions with killing, he'd been able to play some highly perceptive Proceran royals for fools. For years. Malanza was more general than steward, by my reckoning, and to my knowledge not a particularly skilled intriguer. No, Brogloise was the right choice. In some aspects, anyway. I'd rather have the Princess of Aquitan at my side than on the other one, when the time came to push for the Accords, and that couldn't be done if she was kept in the dark about them.

"Have another one prepared," I said, then thought more of it.
"No, two."

"Pilgrim," he said. "And Princess Rozala, I'd assume. Is that wise?"

I cocked my head to the side. There couldn't be many reasons he'd expected me to keep one of the two most powerful women in Procer in the dark until the last moment.

"You're afraid they might use the Accords to draw lines in the Assembly," I said. "For and against, every sitter to gather behind one or the other."

"The First Prince remains unpopular," Hakram pointed out. "These are times of war and she is not a general while her seat of power – the Lycaonese north and its support – has been uprooted. Of course, with the fighting up north toppling Procer's ruler would attract a great deal of scorn. Unless it was reluctantly done to avoid some great mistake."

"She's fought the dead, Hakram," I said. "And you saw her on the hill. She's not going to make a grab for the throne halfway through the end of the world."

"She might," Akua disagreed. "If she believed Cordelia Hasenbach to be unable to fight this war the way it needs to be fought."

"If we don't tell her now," I said, "she'll take that as the insult it is."

"Agreed," Akua easily said. "Arlesites are notoriously prickly over such matters. I also rather disagree with Lord Adjutant's notion that discussion of the Accords will be used in the Highest Assembly. Your support is much too precious a commodity at the moment for one of them to discard it offhand."

"My support," I skeptically said. "Wouldn't my backing in any of their private squabbles be a kiss of death? It's both a villain and foreigner intervening in Proceran affairs."

"Ah," Hakram suddenly breathed out.

An elaboration would have been more helpful, as far as I was concerned.

"You have a series of victories to hand out, my heart," Akua smiled under the veil. "End of the dwarven ban on armament sales. Assurances of truce with the Firstborn and the support of their armies against Keter. Access to Callowan grain markets come next harvest. The secrets of the Twilight Ways for Proceran armies to use. And, of course, the great achievement of having turned the dreaded Black Queen into a tame tiger unleashed on the dead."

My fingers clenched and unclenched as I considered that. I'd considered most of those a given the moment bargains were struck, but I could see their point. If all those things were presented as the victories of either Hasenbach or Malanza, they'd come out looking like the person getting things done. The kind you wanted in charge, when someone like the Dead King was at the gate. The First Prince already had the throne, true, but the Princess of Aequitan was fresh off what could be considered a success here in Iserre. And I knew better than most than when the days got dark people liked to have a soldier wearing the crown.

"If Malanza tries to seize the reins, then they'll both try to use the Accords as meat to barter for anything I could provide them," I said. "So if we don't send her the text we're essentially tipping the scales in Hasenbach's favour. She'll have had time to prepare, and she's too skilled a hand not to turn that into a significantly better position."

"The decision must be carefully considered, in my eyes," Akua said. "For the twin truth of what you said is that, in apprising Princess Rozala of your intent, we tacitly allow her to present a challenge to the First Prince in Salia."

Which I doubted Cordelia would take all that kindly to, all things considered.

"I would be surprised, in truth, if Cordelia Hasenbach's unseating was the intent," Akua continued. "By the procedures of the Assembly such a thing would be difficult to accomplish – and embitter the Lycaonese for generations if carried out. Assuming they did not outright rebel. More sensibly, with the right maneuvering it would not be impossible for Rozala Malanza to become the true power in Procer no matter who rules in name."

If this was just about curtailing how much hostility I'd be earning by my decision, I suspected sending the simplified Accords to the Princess of Aequitan would make for much less personal a grudge than keeping the same woman in the dark until we reached Salia. On the other hand, approaching the matter that way was a fine way to make a mistake: wading into a melee before knowing who you wanted to thump was a good way to end up eating dirt.

"There's no guarantee they'll turn on each other," I finally said.

"The Principate is on the precipice of change," Akua disagreed. "And only one may hold the reins if their nation is survive the war, they both know this: divided, squabbling, Procer can only break. The lesser crowns cannot look to two mistresses for orders, and so one of them must submit to the other before the Highest Assembly for uncertainty to end. She who remains standing will rule the Procer that is to come, should she survive the war."

"We lose little from allowing Princess Rozala a challenge," Hakram noted. "If anything with two bidders concessions ought to be easier to secure. If the First Prince had been more willing to negotiate with us in the past I'd advise against it, but there's hardly any good will there to spoil."

"I believe that Cordelia Hasenbach remains the superior candidate to ensure lasting peace," Akua told him. "And if decision is made to back her from the start, being owed a favour can be worth more than auctioned support – and would create good will. A knife hand stayed is worth more than promises."

I shook my head.

"You're selling both of them short," I said. "And I don't mean there won't be tensions, because that ship rather left the dock when Hasenbach made Malanza's mother drink poison after their civil war. But they'll remain cordial while the Dead King is at the gate, because neither will be willing to roll the dice when snake eyes might mean the end of the Principate."

I thought back to a conversation that felt so long ago, Hasenbach and I alone in the depths of my since-devoured domain. You miss the central tenet of the Principate, she'd chided me as we spoke of tyranny. It is, unlike Praes, a nation built on consensus. She'd sent Prince Amadis and his cabal into my hands to be savaged, I'd retorted back then, her opposition in that Assembly she so touted. Yet she's believed in her words, back then, even as she struggled with realities that were flawed. Did she still, I wondered?

"No, if Procer is to decide its own fate then let it be in the open," I said. "Cordelia Hasenbach cannot grudge me her own principles observed. Malanza gets the Accords, same as the Pilgrim."

Although, in truth, this entire matter should have been debated with Vivienne awake. Which they would know, I thought. Yet they'd spoken of it anyway. I would not count that a coincidence.

"You're not telling me something," I said.

"I thought you'd come to the conclusion yourself without prompting," Akua said, sounding fascinated. "It truly is a glaring blind spot."

"We've named boons you can offer that would win princes to either cause," Hakram gravelled. "Yet there's prize that would win the people as well. In these parts for certain and others as well. It is a matter of pride, in the end."

My heart clenched.

"Black," I said. "They'll want Black's head on pike."

The shade dipped her head in agreement.

"And you pushed this not because you want me to make a decision," I said, "but because he's awake."

"Before seeing him you should know what may still lie ahead," Hakram said. "Make no mistake, Catherine, they will hound you for him. Their people will riot otherwise, after what he's done. The Legions themselves may be spared, but the Carrion Lord? They cannot afford to simply let him go."

"They can't afford to fuck with me either," I sharply replied.

Akua looked at me, and for a moment under the veil I believed she might have looked sad.

"There will be a choice," she said, "between what the woman wants and what the queen requires."

I grit my teeth, rising to my feet.

"Catherine," Hakram called out.

I turned a glare on him.

"I handed him the full Accords," he said.

Why, I almost asked, but already knew the answer. Either my father would sign the damned thing, or he'd be sold so that everyone else did.

I stalked off, furious at no one in particular, to find Amadeus of the Green Stretch.

Javvies

Yeah, no.

Throw them Kairos, Heirarch, and/or Malicia. Maybe Akua.

Not Amadeus.

Malanza has had an epiphany of sorts. I don't see her exploiting the Accords in an attempt to gain power in Salia/Procer. I do see her using them to make sure that she doesn't get thrown under a bus or saddled with blame, but instead to make sure she keeps her position and solidifies and strengthens it.

Andrew Mitchell

I wonder how differently this conversation would have gone if any of the Woe were aware that Cordelia has effectively secured full control over the Assembly (even if it's only temporary).

I agree Malanza won't be trying to take over as First Prince. She's got her eyes fully on what's best for Procer's survival.

KageLupus

I don't think it would really change anything. As Akua pointed out, the way things stand now Procer has to be united under a single ruler. The war against the Dead King just can't handle the kind of infighting and intrigue that the Highest Assembly historically has. Cordelia having already started the process of consolidating power just proves that out.

But it also doesn't detract from Rozala's position either. She is still the number two princess in the land, and with Cat's backing could still be a contender for taking up that consolidated rule. Not giving her the Accords ahead of time would still be an insult and a tacit backing of Cordelia.

The only thing their lack of knowledge changes is the immediacy of what happens in Procer. It goes from "this will probably happen" to "this has started to happen". The decision they made based on the first is just as relevant to the second.

Mammon

I think that if they knew, Cat might actually be more inclined to back off and support Malanza as much as Cordelia evenly to not be interwoven in that event or be the next stepping stone after Cordelia falls. Because it takes just one Named meddling in this easily labelled tyrannical scheming and backing up the underdog Malanza and/or whatever plot the church was planning (the country-‘purifying’ one Saint mentioned to Cordelia) to see Cordelia’s power crumble under plot and ‘righteousness’ at pivot events.

And if there’s an evil queen who had a hand in Cordelia’s power maintained and bolstered, an alluring voice whispering sin from her left shoulder, then storywise that great evil would be the stronger yet now manageable to defeat power for this Named to focus on next.

As the Lone Swordsman and so many Callowans had tried and thus also being a staple Name thing to do in this universe: start a rebellion in a suppressed village or town singlehandedly, liberate a larger city with help of the people or already established rebel groups, take a large area with the rightful ruler’s support (in Procer’s case a principality with a Prince or more backing them up), full victory by beating Cordelia and crowning a righteous cause would be the next step, and then the Named one would be pretty much storybound and set in lore to be toppling tyrants and defeating corrupt evil rulers for as long as there are more powerful tyrants related to their initial cause or remain a threat to their country’s founded liberty. And as always, Cat would be first in line for trouble.

Ofc thats assuming that a new Named will be involved, which especially at the higher scale we’re now is rarely the case considering the time their training would take and better Named already filling the position. But with the Saint gone a vacancy opened up for Above to send in a new agent, and with Creation’s meddling there’s always the risk of such stories entangling her if Cat does make a wrong move even by fault of ignorance.

Sparsebeard

Black will have to sign the accords!

All hail Dread Emperor Benevolent, first of his name!!!

erebus42

There already was a Dread Emperor Benevolent I. He could be Benevolent II, or maybe Unscrupulous I, Unfettered I, Dispassionate I, or maybe Pragmatic I

William

No, the Benevolent from the epigraphs is Black, we're pretty sure. They all fit him, and there are specific references to certain things that he's mentioned in this past.

Andrew Mitchell

You're not alone in that view but personally, I'm pretty sure (65%) those quotes are not Amadeus. IMO they don't 'sound' like things Amadeus would say.

I hope we get to find out eventually, but this may well be a question which never gets resolved.

ATRDCI

We will only know that there is a Benevolent quoted in the epigraphs, but not when they reigned. And we know that at least some of the epigraphs are from the future not the past. (Ex. Juniper's and Aisha's respective histories)

Nuke_The_Earth

That's entirely possible, actually. The seven quotes attributed to Dread Emperor Benevolent are as follows:

"Please, do keep digging your own grave. I look forward to your splendidly inevitable demise." – Dread Emperor Benevolent the First – Chapter 19: Pivot

"There's no surer sign you're being played than being certain you've grasped your opponent's intent." – Dread Emperor Benevolent – Chapter 6: Rapport

"Morality is a force, not a law. Deviating from it has costs and benefits both – a ruler should weigh those when making a decision, and ignore the delusion of any position being inherently superior." – Dread Emperor Benevolent – Villainous Interlude: Decorum

"Peace is little more than the recognition that the reasons for which war was undertaken are no longer relevant." – Dread Emperor Benevolent the First – Chapter 17: Contingent

"There is only one lesson to be learned from shatranj: no matter who wins the game, the pieces return to the same box." – Dread Emperor Benevolent the First – Chapter 30: Witness

"Own what you are, no matter how ugly the face of it. No lies are ever more dangerous to a villain than those they tell themselves." – Dread Emperor Benevolent – Chapter 70: The Calm Before

"By hook and crook we will all hang, High Lords, from a noose woven of our many loose ends. But cheer up: none are beyond salvation, not even the likes of us. Let us see, at long last, if we can turn back the tyranny of the sun." – Extract from the coronation speech of Dread Emperor Benevolent the First – Epilogue

Now, tell me: Who do those remind you of, particularly the last two? Granted, 'Benevolent' isn't exactly the type of title I would see the Black Knight choosing for himself, but he's very likely been deeply changed by recent events, so who knows? It's a very plausible headcanon, I'd say.

Sparsebeard

Yeah, those quotes make him sound pretty reasonable. It would make sense that Cat would have commented on him when studying the history of Praes in the first book.

The fact that she did not perhaps is a clue...

Liliet

She did not comment on Massacre either, and even Irritant only came up in dialogue much later.

Shveiran

True. But Massacre sounds like any other mad Dread Empress of old.

Benevolent does sound like a different breed; it sounds like she likely would have brought it up at some point.

It is not proof, by no means, but it did make me suspicious.

Liliet

She did not mention Irritant until books 4-5.

Euodiachloris

Granted, when faced with extreme irritation. ;P

Cat's musings over history tend to be related to present associations. 😊

Liliet

Mhm. Her not bringing up Benevolent is not evidence of anything, per se.

Sparsebeard

The difference I see between those and Benevolent is that he was introduced very early in the story (book 1, chapter 19), pretty much at the same time that Cat was studying Praes' history. Whereas, Irritant and Massacre were later additions to the story (we don't hear about Irritant before chapter 38 of book 2 and book 4 for Massacre). For such a peculiar Tyrant as Benevolent never to have been named outside epigraphs does seem suspicious (especially since he gives an air of competence similar to the Terribilises). And I feel that there's been plenty of occasions to discuss Benevolent in story (for exemple when discussing Praesi morality with Akua or when Cat lists competent emperors).

Also, if you look at most Emperor quotes, they're mostly having fun by playing on the caricatural nature of most Tyrants with the name (or ephitet) of the emperor being strongly related to the quote (Ex : Vindictive, Irritant, "the Linguist", "the lawgiver", "the technicaly correct", etc.), that, or playing on the laughably inefficient nature of "Stupid Evil". On the other hand, Benevolent's quotes seem to mostly be either very practical or about using the narrative to further his own ends. Very little of "being a goody two shoes Emperor" vibes (one of the quotes is even about villains not lying to themselves mirroring Black's quote from first chapter that he's "the very worst kind of monster").

Liliet

> playing on the caricatural nature of most Tyrants with the name (or ephitet) of the emperor being strongly related to the quote

And Terribilis I and Terribilis II?

Benevolent fits the pattern of 'all the menagerie of historical tyrants, with all kinds of extremes between them'. It would fuck up the worldbuilding to suddenly go 'nah actually Benevolent hasn't existed before', and strongly so.

Sparsebeard

The Terribilises have their ephitets, one of the two was called "the lawgiver", I even mentionned that title in the very comment you're anwsering to... That other Terribilis, was based on the previous one since they both where considered competent (which is probably not a coincidence).

The way I see it, Benevolent existing in the past is kind of contrary to the general modus operanti of the Dread Emperors anyway.

If all other epigraphs where of the past fine, but since we know they can be from the future, it clearly means that the quotes from Dread Emperors can too. It's plain foreshadowing.

Liliet

>The way I see it, Benevolent existing in the past is kind of contrary to the general modus operandi of the Dread Emperors anyway.

Ah, and herein lies the crux of the matter.

I understood Benevolent's approach to be a part of the variation of the Dread Emperors' modus. They come in all shapes and stripes, Amadeus isn't special for his morality or for his approach. He's not even particularly special for being effective, see again: Terribilises. Both of them are known to have accomplished what they were aiming for, if not quite every single point of it.

Benevolent is just another variation – a clever Dread Emp who decided to take advantage of Good. There's nothing groundbreaking about the idea itself, it's easily derived from basic story-fu observations, and that's imho a large and important worldbuilding point of Dread Emperor Benevolent existing.

The model of the Praesi system in which Benevolent is an abomination that heralds change, and the model of the Praesi system in which Benevolent fits just as well as Massacre, are two rather different models. It is important to me that it is that latter that is canon, as implicitly indicated by epigraph format.

I would be interested to talk more about the systemic aspect, here.

Sparsebeard

> Benevolent is just another variation – a clever Dread Emp who decided to take advantage of Good.

I DO agree an Emperor who fakes "goodness" in order to prosper whold probably fit in Praes' past.

I don't see much in the quotes to support this interpretation though. If that was the case, I'd expect either over the top insincere goody too shoes quotes or at the very least to hear of some of his "benevolent" ways or actions. Instead, we get hints at his philosophy and world view that lack any of the “extremism” that we can find in most other quotes.

The quotes also don't support the kind of hypocrisy your vision of him suppose. He seems to be all about relative honesty.

To me, the quotes portray a person who does things DESPITE good or evil. Of a man who knows himself a villain but doesn't do evil for the kick of it.

That is the difference I see between Black's actions and those of previous emperors.

As you say there is a vast selection of evil in Praes' past, but they are all a variation of EVIL : from stupid evil to devilishly efficient evil passing by the deadly sins and a variation of evil traits or stereotypes. Except for Benevolent, I don't think there is any other emperor who didn't mind doing arguably GOOD things though (and you might correct me on that).

And Black has already done enough “good” stuff to be called Benevolent (by Praes' standards) like freeing the greenskins or raising the standard of living of Callow's peasantry.

Hitogami

I was sold on the idea until the last quote...Black doesn't deal well with High Lords

Someguy

I think he's saying that to the High Lords as he's about to hang all of them and one of them was shouting that he too will suffer the same fate.

Shveiran

He hasn't. Yet.

Liliet

No.

Andrew Mitchell

Thanks for pulling those out. ♥

Mammon

Oh no, this does sound like Black, except the last one. But the name Benevolent sounds like the new Akua, who does have shapeshifting abilities now. Treachery armed with the knowledge of the Black Knight Amadeus's teachings, the power of Evil and Friendship both weaponised to ride success like a wave, and especially the last quote actually sounds like one that the new Akua would make to own up both to her old self and her new teachings and understandings.

Andrew Mitchell

OMG you've cracked the mystery!! During Book 6 Akua is put on the throne to replace Alaya and becomes Dread Emperor Benevolent.

Soma

I saw Nuke_The_Earth's comment and didn't read all the way through the chain, and came to Mammon's conclusion independently, so I think Mammon got it, and beat me to it too. I kinda wish we could edit our comments so I could put that in it the one I commented off Nuke_The_Earth.

It it is right, Mammon might have the best twist call anyone has made, or will make, in the history of the guide.

Soma

Oh fuck me, its Akua isn't it?

"By hook and crook we will all hang, High Lords, from a noose woven of our many loose ends. But cheer up: none are beyond salvation, not even the likes of us. Let us see, at long last, if we can turn back the tyranny of the sun." – Extract from the coronation speech of Dread Emperor Benevolent the First – Epilogue

This reads like a reformed Akua who got 'redeemed'. In fact every quote reads like someone who's been either in Cat's or Black's orbit, but not quite like them. Benevolent doesn't quite fit Black and he's the type to wiggle out of something he sees as beneath him. Doesn't quite read like Cat because they don't have the tinge of necessary evil. Those quotes read like an Akua that learned at Catherine's knee.

The redemption bit is her current modus operandi as well a move to benevolent action. It is also likely to give Akua what she originally wanted in a cursed monkey paw way in comparison to how Akua would have originally started out wanting things.

I'm probably wrong because that would be an unrepentantly wild twist. But out of the people in Cat's orbit it best fits Akua's current MO.

Soma

See Mammon's comment, they beat me to it by a mile.

<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2019/07/12/chapter-55-renewal/comment-page-1/#comment-49505>

Javvies

No. Can't be Akua.

She'd be Dread Empress Benevolent, not Dread Emperor Benevolent. If, that is, she were to climb the Tower and take Benevolent as her reign name.

If we assume it is someone in the orbit of Cat and/or Amadeus, Benevolent could be Hakram or Grem, but I don't see either calling themselves Benevolent. And Masego doesn't care enough.

Maybe a fallen Hero, or a Hero Cat and/or Amadeus worked on to leverage into taking over Praes.

Oh. I know who it is.

It is the most generous one himself, Robber. He'd totally call himself Dread Emperor Benevolent. As he did what he does to people.

Andrew Mitchell

I refuse to let you spoil my fun with this idea.

Akua's just a spirit anyway. She could easily take on a male persona for a laugh. Especially if she needed to ensure she was climbing the tower without being associated with Cat or Amadeus.

Sparsebeard

You think too small, it's actually Akua bodysnatching Black, lol!

The people of the empire will eat from her hand.

Andrew Mitchell

Hahahahaha. You're right. That's even better!! 😊

Mammon

Like I said, Akua has shapeshifting powers. She can be posing as the Black Knight becoming Emperor Benevolent. Though Robber would indeed be a good contender.

Liliet

Welcome to the hell of that crack theory.

Sparsebeard

Yeah, I saw it mentionned in the comments and I was like "Nah, no way!", then I re-read the quotes and started re-reading the whole story...

Now I can't get it out of my head lol... perhaps that tinfoil hat I'm wearing now doesn't help in that regard...

Liliet

It doesn't fit the epigraphs format (EE doesn't go for cheap fakeouts, and 'this historical dread emperor is actually from the future lol sike' would very much be one), doesn't fit the plot (what dread emperor and what high lords), doesn't fit Amadeus's sense of humor (he would not choose that reigning name) and doesn't fit Amadeus's personality (don't even get me started...)

sutortyrannus

>and doesn't fit Amadeus's personality (don't even get me started...)

Please do get started, dear. I sincerely enjoy reading your thoughts on the topic.

Liliet

Alright 😊

So the thing about Benevolent from the quotes is that his MO is using Good to cover Evil. Or... using Good as a tool for inherently Evil, or at least selfish, ends.

Amadeus uses both Good and Evil in his toolbox, true. But which of them does he go for whenever he can and which does he employ only as much and as far as he believes is entirely necessary?

And much more interestingly, WHAT ARE HIS GOALS

Because let me tell you, personal salvation is... not exactly... on the list. Or personal comfort. Or personal survival. Or anything personal at all actually. Whatever you think of Amadues's approach to 'the ends justify the means', it's pretty explicit in the text that he's quite possibly the most selfless character in Guide, in that genuine "wait, MY needs? what about my needs? how are they relevant to anything?" way.

Moreover, one of Benevolent's core ideas appears to be slipping away from justice, tricking his way out of responsibility.

Compare this with "blaming Fate is the greatest moral cowardice" Amadeus. Moral fucking cowardice okay. That's a phrasing he casually uses in a conversation where he's attempting to convince the other person that he has no principles.

And compare his inner monologue of "if any of these things [morality, justice, principle] were inherent instead of ascribed, they would be rendered meaningless" to Benevolent's signature "morality is a force, not a law". One of the two is a cynicist who takes advantage of Creation to benefit himself. The other is an idealist who does not consider himself to live up to his own standards – "this does not excuse the principle of behavior", anyone?

Amadeus is like REVERSE Benevolent. He's as opposite to that one guy as they come.

And he's also likely not going to be Dread Emperor.

Leventide

In the last quote he's talking of turning back the tyranny of the sun, which refers to Callow. Therefore it can't be Black, since that would mean him betraying Cat.

shieldredblog

What was the Tyranny of the Sun again? I thought it was a Meizien thing.

Shveiran

I think you are stating as fact things that are not.

EE never said that those quotes are from the past; as was mentioned, many quotes have been presented to us in a moment where they were clearly still waiting to be written (most frequently in Book II); just because these are also from a Dread Emperor, I see no reason to assume they are from the past. It's not a "cheap fakeout" if it only contradicts things people are assuming without a real reason.

We have seven quotes about Benevolent. Short aphorism that are somehow funny.

That... is not really enough to judge someone.

If you told me "Amadeus cannot become Traitorous" I'd reply "yeah, obviously".

This theory is not quite as "tin foil hatish".

There are differences between how Amadeus is now, and the image we can derive from those quotes of Benevolent".

However.

Amadeus, as he is now, will not survive.

Cat told him as much. He said he knows as much. We know as much.

He is at a pivot.

If he does embrace it and change, he will likely become Dread Emperor. Who else is there?

And if he does become Dread Emperor, I fail to see in those quotes anything that has me going "no, it's impossible Amadeus would say anything like this later down the line".

I don't know if this will happen, but I think it's more believable than most theories that go around. If only because we don't know enough about Benevolent to really argue either point.

Liliet

>EE never said that those quotes are from the past; as was mentioned, many quotes have been presented to us in a moment where they were clearly still waiting to be written (most frequently in Book II); just because these are also from a Dread Emperor, I see no reason to assume they are from the past. It's not a "cheap fakeout" if it only contradicts things people are assuming without a real reason.

I'm not assuming ALL quotes are from the past. I'm assuming quotes NOT DIRECTLY SPECIFIED TO BE FROM THE FUTURE are from the past, since the epigraphs have been a vehicle to give us understanding of historical Praes from the beginning. Benevolent's quotes have been part of that, helping define what Praes HAS BEEN LIKE, narratively. And he's iconic in his own way, showing the mastery of the narrative that Dread Emperors HAVE been capable of demonstrating in the past, all the while not deviating from Praes's actual pattern.

It's an important beat in undersatnding of historical Praes, and undermining it would be a bad narrative move.

Shveiran

I think I'm missing something. All EE has told us is that Benevolent was a Dread Emperor; assuming he is from the past is reasonable, don't get me wrong, but it turns out that assumption was wrong, I wouldn't say the author tricked us into thinking that.

As a different exemple, take Aysha: the quotes tell us she is penning a memoirs. If it turns out "LOL that was a different Aysha altogether" that would be tricking us.

But I have been assuming that means she survives to have it published, and that is MY assumption; if it turns out that she dies and, say, the Hellhound has it polished and published as a way to honor her friend, the quote still makes perfect sense and I can only lament my assuming something was certain when it wasn't.

Liliet

Erratic presented Benevolent as part of past Praes's characterization. If it turns out that LOL SIKE it wasn't past Praes's characterization at all, that's bad writing.

Shveiran

I am arguing he did not, in fact, present him as anything but a Dread Emperor of Praes.

Maybe he is, and the theory is wrong. But if it isn't, there is no bad writing involved. Merely a reader assuming something that was never said to be canon.

We know Irritant, Maleficent, Vile, Traitorious and a few others are past rulers. Benevolent, Massacre and others have never been referenced in the fiction itself, and thus we have no context to infer anything BUT the fact that they were Dread Emperors or Empresses.

EE is using the quotes to expand his worldbuilding. But if anything, he has established he is NOT limiting himself to quotes from the past by including quotes from the future or present. If it is, it was foreshadowed as a possibility. If it isn't, the quotes being quotes proves nothing.

Keep in mind, I'm not arguing for the theory to be certain, I simply don't understand why you are certain it is ludicrous.

Liliet

Because Erratic has always been precise in his worldbuilding-via-quotes.

We know which quotes are from the future. It's immediately obvious when they are, they are clearly marked as such. They establish how the world will be.

Imagine if we suddenly find out that actually Aisha Bishara's memoirs belong to some other Aisha Bishara in the past talking about some other Catherine Foundling who just so happened to have existed before. After all, it was never explicitly stated in canon to be the same Aisha, was it? We just assumed!

Benevolent fit a particular section of epigraphs that played a particular role in giving us understanding of historical Praes.

sutortyrannus

First and foremost, thank for expending the time and effort to elaborate.

Now for a few rebuttals.

>It doesn't fit the epigraphs format (EE doesn't go for cheap fakeouts, and 'this historical dread emperor is actually from the future lol sike' would very much be one), doesn't fit the plot (what dread emperor and what high lords), doesn't fit Amadeus's sense of humor (he would not choose that reigning name)

I have to disagree. The epigraphs have a strong trend of pulling snippets from past and future and linking them to relevant themes in their attached chapters (Aisha and Juniper's memoirs, Firstborn religious texts). Regarding the Dread Emperors/Empresses in particular, they've given us an insight into the mentality of the Praesi ruling class, and how it's evolved from Maleficient I to Malicia. Given that we have no precedent for a non-Evil ruling name, that Praes is itself entering an era without precedent, and the implication Amadeus was the one to come up with the idea in the first place (Malicia told Tasia that a "dear friend" wanted her to choose the name "Trustworthy"), quotes from Dread Emperor Benevolent wouldn't be a fake-out but a valuable piece of foreshadowing.

There's more I want to add, but I have to go for now. Rest assured – the weekend will not pass without your conversion to the Way. 😊

Liliet

> Regarding the Dread Emperors/Empresses in particular, they've given us an insight into the mentality of the Praesi ruling class

Exactly. They've given us an insight into the mentality of the Praesi ruling class from a handful of varying representatives, from Massacre to Terribilis... and from Vile to Benevolent.

Listen, this theory makes me want to throw up. Like, literally. Like, when it first appeared, I was the one to confirm that we'd not had mention of Benevolent in the text, because I thought it was funny, but then people took it seriously, and... no. It's gross. It's ew. If erratic actually does this it'll be the worst idea he'd ever had.

The lady doth protest too much

It's been obvious since the first quote that Benevolent is Amadeus. The discrepancy you perceive could be him being ironic when talking in-story to a Praesi audience. It's not like he has no sense of humor, or the other Dread Emperor quotes are all dripping with sincerity. You're being too much of a presumptuous literalist working off very thin material.

Also, more generally, you aren't the author, nor are you the most ardent fan of this series, just among the chattiest and most cocksure. Other people can be perceptive and pick up on breadcrumbs left by the author that you choose to ignore. It's your prerogative to read texts as you like, but claiming "It's gross. It's ew." is incredibly pretentious.

Liliet

>It's been obvious since the first quote that Benevolent is Amadeus.

what the theory only came up during the 'what Name was Bard talking about' discussion after Epilogue 4, until then it occurred to literally no-one (that i know of) >or the other Dread Emperor quotes are all dripping with sincerity yes, actually, they are. The other Dread Emperor quotes tend to be either very literal, or overly-obvious-in-context (see: Atrocious's recent quote about taking a step to the left). The Dread Emperor quotes have been 100% accurate reflections of their MO's and personalities, as far as we know >but claiming "It's gross. It's ew." is incredibly pretentious no, it's me talking about my personal perception, in response to the assurance that I will be converted to the theory. Even if it's correct and I'm wrong and erratic is in fact going to do this, I'm never going to be onboard with it because that's how I feel about it. That's what I was referring to.

If anything, it was presumptuous of that person to say that I will be converted to the theory. However instead of just accusing them of that failing I went into explaining the reason why.

> just among the chattiest and most cocksure

-bows-

Speck of Stardust

Your biggest argument seems to lie in the idea that Black would never seek personal salvation... Which is flawed due to 1 kinda important thing. "I am," I said, "going to build a better world. Even if I have to drag everyone into it kicking and screaming. So there's your choice, Black: either you make yourself into a man that deserves to live in that world, or you're just another corpse I step over on my way there."-

Considering how this chapter ends

"I handed him the full Accords," he said.

Why, I almost asked, but already knew the answer.

Either my father would sign the damned thing, or he'd be sold so that everyone else did.

I stalked off, furious at no one in particular, to find Amadeus of the Green Stretch.-

Like really?

Even including the idea that the quotes of the dread emperors/empresses show the idea of Praesi thought process, why cant it show what is needed for them to be after the timeframe of this story? I mean hell the story has done a wonderful job of making goddam Akua into seeking fucking salvation, why the utter hells do you think that Black cant? ,To be frank if black signs the accords then Amadeus can easily become Benevolent and if he doesn't sign the accords? He will die because Cat will be unable to use him to control Praesi how she needs it to be controlled.

Liliet

My point is that Amadeus does not view morality as a means to selfish ends. He views morality as an end in itself, and himself as a tool used for others' benefit. This is different enough from Benevolent's stated M0 to make it not clever as a fakeout.

Malek Deneith

While I've no intent on insisting Black will become Benevolent (I don't mind the idea, but I don't feel the need to champion it either), I feel it needs to be pointed out that Black we've got to know this far might not be the same man as Black we'll get to see going forward. You have to remember Amadeus has been through at least three major events that could and probably should influence how he sees the world.

Event the first would be Cat stabbing him at the end of book instead of killing him and taking his Name. Given the talk that followed on making a better world and telling Black to either die or become a man worthy of said world it does feel like she was nudging him into something of a low-key redemption story.

Event the second – loss of his Name. We know that Names influence how their bearers act. Not nearly to the degree that fey titles do, but someone like Amadeus who spent forty-plus years as a Black Knight – even if he was a nonstandard one – was probably more than a little entrenched in his ways. Now he is likely less so, and this was followed up by a double whammy of Bard coming out to mess with his head.

Event the third and final – the recent soul separation and reconnection. Back when Cat got her hands on Black's soulless body Akua made quite a speech on how Sain't butchery is likely to affect Amadeus once he's stitched back together. Now the most recent info we have on this is Akua saying the losses were "slight" but... why write this into the story at all if it becomes a non-issue? Perhaps Akua is wrong, perhaps the loss runs deeper but it touches areas she didn't think to check. Or perhaps it indeed is a "slight" loss but at a precisely right aspect of his psyche to make a difference of some sort. Either way I doubt this will go by without some sort of fallout.

All in all I think we're going to see a changed Amadeus in months to come. How much of a change and in what regard it'll be, that remains to be seen. But we shouldn't assume he'll remain exactly the same as he was before.

Malek Deneith

While I've no intent on insisting Black will become Benevolent (I don't mind the idea, but I don't feel the need to champion it either), I feel it needs to be pointed out that Black we've got to know this far might not be the same man as Black we'll get to see going forward. You have to remember Amadeus has been through at least three major events that could and probably should influence how he sees the world.

Event the first would be Cat stabbing him at the end of book instead of killing him and taking his Name. Given the talk that followed on making a better world and telling Black to either die or become a man worthy of said world it does feel like she was nudging him into something of a low-key redemption story.

Event the second – loss of his Name. We know that Names influence how their bearers act. Not nearly to the degree that fey titles do, but someone like Amadeus who spent forty-plus years as a Black Knight – even if he was a nonstandard one – was probably more than a little entrenched in his ways. Now he is likely less so, and this was followed up by a double whammy of Bard coming out to mess with his head.

Event the third and final – the recent soul separation and reconnection. Back when Cat got her hands on Black's soulless body Akua made quite a speech on how Sain't butchery is likely to affect Amadeus once he's stitched back together. Now the most recent info we have on this is Akua saying the losses were "slight" but... why write this into the story at all if it becomes a non-issue? Perhaps Akua is wrong, perhaps the loss runs deeper but it touches areas she didn't think to check. Or perhaps it indeed is a "slight" loss but at a precisely right aspect of his psyche to make a difference of some sort. Either way I doubt this will go by without some sort of fallout.

All in all I think we're going to see a changed Amadeus in months to come. How much of a change and in what regard it'll be, that remains to be seen. But we shouldn't assume he'll remain exactly the same as he was before.

Liliet

And you think Amadeus is going to be a worse, more selfish and less idealistic person than before? That's where you see this narrative going?

I mean, if that's your prediction, I can't stop you...

Fayhem

You and I have personally already had this discussion (at some length!) so I don't want to rehash it, but something that I don't know if I commented before is that my disagreement with you over whether Amadeus could become Benevolent is based much, much less on disagreeing with your assessment of Amadeus (it's a little rosier than mine, but ultimately not super super far off) than it is on disagreeing with your assessment of Benevolent. You are (well, appear to be – I don't want to claim mindreading) drawing extremely strong, definitive conclusions about what Benevolent is/was/will be like on very scant evidence indeed.

Let me put something to you. I believe that all of Benevolent's attributed quotes aren't just compatible with my interpretation of Amadeus' character, I believe that there are at least plausible interpretations of the quotes (I won't claim more than that since I don't have any more evidence than you do) that are fully compatible with the interpretation of Amadeus' character that you have expressed to me before, unless I'm misremembering that wildly. Happy to elaborate if you're interested. 😊

Liliet

I have, while pondering this discussion, come to a conclusion about my own reasoning that I would like to explain.

Yes, in a vacuum, I could see Amadeus at one point uttering quotes attributed to Benevolent at some hypothetical point if he had to play this role.

However, the quotes are just far enough off from his character that it's not a funny joke for them to match up. It's not a clever closing of the circle. It would be an additional bit of information – that Benevolent is actually someone who holds the exact opposite beliefs from how he states them – not something encoded within the epigraphs themselves.

Which is where we come back to the issue of the format. It's not clever for Benevolent to have been Amadeus all along, any more than it is for Amadeus to secretly have been Neshamah's revenant or Traitorous in disguise all along. Funny as a meme, but not good storytelling wrt actual plot/worldbuilding.

I.E. if Benevolent's quotes had actually been Suspiciously Identical to Amadeus's unique views™, I could see this reveal being a clever twist at the end.

As it is, it would be an utterly unforeshadowed out of the left field one.

Fayhem

> I.E. if Benevolent's quotes had actually been Suspiciously Identical to Amadeus's unique views™, I could see this reveal being a clever twist at the end.

As it is, it would be an utterly unforeshadowed out of the left field one.

I mean. No offense intended, but given that (significantly) more of the people considering this seem to find Benevolent's quotes to line up pretty well with Amadeus' unique views than not, I don't think "utterly unforeshadowed" is really fair. And again, even if we set aside any disagreements over your interpretation of Amadeus' views I don't think your interpretation of Benevolent is actually necessarily justified by the text. I.e., I don't believe those quotes actually evidence Benevolent holding "the exact opposite beliefs" to how you interpret Amadeus' views.

Liliet

Those quotes describe exactly opposite beliefs. I agree it is not evidence that the person saying them actually literally means what they're saying. That's not relevant to my point.

And, well... most people who disagree with a theory aren't me and aren't coming in here to argue with it -_-

It's very common in this fandom to hold objectively incorrect interpretations of Amadeus that don't take into account all available evidence 🤔

willfultrooper

Some of the quotes from Benevolent do oppose the beliefs of Amadeus. But you're looking at him as if his character doesn't evolve/grow.

At this point in the story Black is at a crossroads as to whether he dies or lives according to Catherine's decision, which is simply put "Change for my new world or die in your old one". The only things I can see that clash with Blacks' character is his hatred or distaste for wasteland nobility which clash with the 7th quote which comes from his coronation speech. As well as the first quote which appears a bit too monologuey or tempting the story which Black is not known to do.

However the 7th quote could be argued due to character change. I construct this around the basis that 1. Catherine despite her dislike for nobility has kept them alive in Callow and has even placed some of them in positions of power and 2. she has wastelanders fighting in her legions and 3. several of her officers are wasteland nobility such as Ashara who would not agree with the purge of her family. Like I mentioned before Black is at a crossroads where he either signs the accords or doesn't which is a pivot for his character development.

Signing them would mean that he has accepted Catherine's view of the world and thus will be a pivot for his character development. Or he dies or Catherine lets him go. There are so many ways this could go that I'm not going into detail. But that would reduce the likelihood of him being Benevolent.

The first quote is the only thing that I can think of that clashes with Blacks' personality and even then this could just be a quip that he has with one of the wasteland nobility that is challenging him. Catherine done this with Akua and the Lone Swordsman.

I don't really agree with the Black is Benevolent as it would reduce the amount of lore The Empire has as well as being a bit too obvious in an otherwise nuanced novel (Of course EE could be doing this because sometimes foreshadowing is just that obvious) but to say that it is a 0% likelihood is presumptuous considering the quotes are all we have to go off of, since they haven't been confirmed as past, present or future. Of course I may have misinterpreted your premise entirely and you may have an argument based on one of the other quotes that I haven't thought of. If so I'd like to know. If it's well founded then I will willingly drop my argument or present a counter argument accordingly.

Liliet

As I have already mentioned, my biggest issue is with "morality is a force, not a law".

Honestly at this point I want to go into the dreaded 'new chapter spoilers' territory and point out that AS IT TURNS OUT, Amadeus's issue with Accords was 'I want this but more of it' all along. He built his very first argument against – 'isolates the Dread Empire' – with the eye to the proposal of the magic academy, which is a very deeply in-character thing for him to do, remember the earlier mentioned episode of Wekesa flatly refusing to teach magic in War College when Amadeus asked? Between that and the amount of focus/interest he had in the institution itself, education is a huge interest of his.

What I'm trying to say is: "Like I mentioned before Black is at a crossroads where he either signs the accords or doesn't which is a pivot for his character development." It's not. It never was this pivot. Note how the first part of the discussion is Catherine repeating his own logic, things HE taught her, back to him. He believed those things all along. He was onboard with the Accords before they were ever made, because they are a codification of his own beliefs already.

Amadeus was always working 'for the greater good', even if he'd never put it like that and his greater good was very narrowly focused on the concerns of the Dread Empire of Praes in particular. Benevolent's very mentality as gotten across in those quotes is different. It does not point at Amadeus in a clever way, which would make it a very shitty twist, just narratively.

Taken separately, the inaccuracy of the quotes and the incongruity of the format don't quite deal the death blow. But together they mean there wouldn't be a point to the twist. It would add nothing. There is no clever connection to be drawn, no realization to be had. Only losses in, as you said, the amount of lore the Empire has.

willfultrooper

if we're referring to the, as of today, newly minted chapter 57 of this book then yes, it would be out of character for Amadeus to reject and then agree to a proposal as if it was a new idea. I do not dispute this, and would only cheapen the moment in chapter 57. However it is not implied either covertly or in-covertly that Black has refused the accords. In fact only recent chapters point towards him discovering or at least understanding the ground works for the accords. To clarify this is the first instance (that I know of) in which he received the accords as written by Hakram, Vivienne and Catherine.

As for the quotes I cannot in anyway gleam any information as to how the Dread Emperor is, personality wise. So I cannot say for certain. An argument can be made however that Dread Emperor Benevolent could, as you put it, be working towards the greater good. I refer to the 7th quote, where he informs the High lords that they will all hang but that salvation is not beyond them. Though that may be stretching the quote to its' limits I admit. However this could be a turning point for the empire in which after experiencing a new kind of rule under Black and Malacia, Black/Amadeus takes over and could then refer to the accords as "their" salvation. Again, this is speculation (more like an additional possibility) and should not in any way be taken at face value. There is also the additional factor that the quotes don't really hint or at the very least act against Amadeus' greater good for Praes.

Liliet

The quotes don't hint towards Amadeus is my issue.

Liliet

OH P.S. I have thought of a possibly good way to point out the problem with "morality is a force, not a law".

This quote is from Peers, the one time we've seen Amadeus actually debate/discuss morality. It can be fairly taken to be his signature opinion, since it's pretty distinctive and fits very well with everything else he's ever said/expressed on the topic, as well as with IRL schools of thought he's vaguely parallel to:

>"We are born nothing, and taught a set of... rules for a lack of better term, that allow us to determine what is acceptable behaviour and what is not," the prisoner said. "What irks me, Pilgrim, is your insistence that these rules are a set of virtues inherent to the fabric Creation instead of covenant between mortals for mortal purposes."

Amadeus is quite literally saying that morality is a law, not a force here.

willfultrooper

From what I can take from that quote it seems more like Amadeus is irked, meaning irritated or annoyed, by the fact that Pilgrim thinks these rules are inherent to the fabric of creation. Of course this is from the understanding that what you refer to as law here from this specific passage was the "virtues inherent to the fabric Creation."

If your referring to morality as the "set of rules" which implies that morality is a law, according to the wording by "rules" which are just another less specific word for "law" (with the difference, from my understanding, being that rules are less strict. An example, a rule would be don't walk on the grass you could do so and it would be socially frowned upon but there would be no legal repercussions. If it was a law you would either be fined or jailed. So basically stakes are raised.) You would be right in assuming that Amadeus would think of them as laws in this passage. However he may not necessarily believe in them being laws as the statement is followed by "... For lack of a better term" which implies he had not come upon a better explanation or metaphor of morality, which he could have come upon just before becoming Benevolent or after.

Liliet

The way I see it, the relative positions are:

"Morality is something that needs to be followed because everyone, or at least the overwhelming majority, agrees on it"

vs

"Morality is a force of nature, like gravity, and you benefit from taking it into account, though cheating that force is if anything a proud and noble endeavour"

Ugh, it's not like I could argue that a stretch into fitting would be impossible. My point is that immediate intuitive interpretation, which is all we have for the epigraphs, is in the exact opposite direction.

Liliet

Which is to say,
>(significantly) more of the people considering this seem to find Benevolent's quotes to line up pretty well with Amadeus' unique views than not don't mistake vocal minority and majority...

Sparsebeard

> Those quotes describe exactly opposite beliefs.

Come on, some of those quotes are very Black-like:

"Please, do keep digging your own grave. I look forward to your splendidly inevitable demise." – Dread Emperor Benevolent the First – Chapter 19: Pivot – What he'd say to any villain building a Death fortress or launching into a monologue.

"There's no surer sign you're being played than being certain you've grasped your opponent's intent." – Dread Emperor Benevolent – Chapter 6: Rapport

– You could find it in the Evil Overlord's List, it's just smart. Not particularly Black-like, but certainly is consistent with integrating the narrative in your plans.

"Morality is a force, not a law. Deviating from it has costs and benefits both – a ruler should weigh those when making a decision, and ignore the delusion of any position being inherently superior." – Dread Emperor Benevolent – Villainous Interlude: Decorum

Black wants to WIN. He doesn't care about doing evil things like murdering orphans before they become heroes or razing the countryside. Neither does he care about doing good things like raising the standard of living of his subjects or freeing the greenskins from oppression. It's all a cost-benefit calculus in order to achieve his goals, despite morality.

"Peace is little more than the recognition that the reasons for which war was undertaken are no longer relevant." – Dread Emperor Benevolent the First – Chapter 17: Contingent – Same as the precedent, Black is fine with eternal peace with Callow, as long as we wins the peace.

"There is only one lesson to be learned from shatranj: no matter who wins the game, the pieces return to the same box." – Dread Emperor Benevolent the First – Chapter 30: Witness – Pretty neutral quote, I got nothing for or against it being said by Black.

"Own what you are, no matter how ugly the face of it. No lies are ever more dangerous to a villain than those they tell themselves." – Dread Emperor Benevolent – Chapter 70: The Calm Before – "You're a monster, aren't you?" I spoke softly into the night, looking at him from the corner of my eye.

He smiled. "The very worst kind," he replied.

"By hook and crook we will all hang, High Lords, from a noose woven of our many loose ends. But cheer up: none are beyond salvation, not even the likes of us. Let us see, at long last, if we can turn back the tyranny of the sun." – Extract from the coronation speech of Dread Emperor Benevolent the First – Epilogue

– The most arguable quote. Taken literally I don't think it's likely for Black to be anything like "Redeemed", he's too entrenched in his identity as villain. But even after this quote Benevolent still considers himself a villain (see 4th quote).

I'm guessing it would be an alternative meaning of "Salvation". And signing the accords as Praes would be a victory for practical evil since it would mean that the other good nations would be forced to deal with him, thus "turning the tyranny of the sun".

Fayhem

Nice breakdown! Re: the shatranj quote, I think there's actually a couple points that make that very plausible it's Amadeus specifically.

A), "there's only one lesson to be learned from shatranj" – it's canon that Amadeus dislikes shatranj, not as a game per se but because people try to draw lessons from it about warfare/ planning/etc. that the game is not correctly designed to provide. So "only one lesson to be learned" is a backhanded reference to that point that he doesn't think shatranj is actually a good teacher of lessons.

B), this definitely represents a plausible version of Amadeus as changed by Cat. Amadeus had his whole speech about how he wants Evil to win for a change, while Cat's thing at this point is about controlling the clash so it doesn't grind up innocents by the hundreds of thousands. Amadeus responding to Cat's call to become someone who deserves to exist in her better world by realizing that "victory" for a side that regards him as no more than another pawn in their game is meaningless and accomplishes nothing for what he actually cares about is a natural evolution/ character growth towards meeting Cat's call there.

There's been a Dread Emperor Benevolent quoted before, but seldom if ever mentioned as an historical figure... you might be on to something.

Liliet

No.

Soma

Alas. How I'd like to see Rozala, Cat, Black, Pilgrim and Cordelia all hitched to the same wagon. I do hope that perhaps signing the accords would be a way out for Black, as seems to have been implied.

IDKWhoitis

I think even Pilgrim could vouch for Black, in a weird twisted way. The Largest Lesser Evil he's met. Black would be an effective cap on Praes. Black is one of the finest tacticians in name lore and combat, and simply killing him for prosecuting a war would be too much of a cost down the line.

Alternatively, Pilgrim might find him to be too large a liability too have in Cat's hands. And he's as ruthless as Black when dealing with those.

Liliet

Note how Pilgrim was willing to leave the stage entirely and leave everything in Cat's hands period. That train has sailed, he's in her corner, and it's not like he didn't know she would defend her mentor. I think he'll stay neutral at worst, and at best might actually indeed back Cat on this yeah.

IDKWhoitis

Unless the Bard intervenes. And the Crippling of Named rulers will certainly limit her influence on national levels. She might not stand idly by while the Accords form.

Other than Bard, I find it likely Pilgrim will at worst, accept Cat's plan. Maybe with a little whining.

Liliet

You're assuming Bard isn't backing the Accords as if it was her own plan.

Mental Mouse

Agreed. Pilgrim knows that a big chunk of what Cat has been up to has specifically been about rescuing Black. Cat doesn't have many intimates, and Amadeus is her oldest surviving relationship – mentor, friend, and yes father-figure to the orphan.

While it was never said explicitly, I think it's pretty clear that at least half the reason the heroes didn't just kill him to begin with, was specifically to keep the Black Queen Catherine away from lines like "you killed my father. Prepare to die." (Lurved the movie... but consider that if you know one line from The Princess Bride, it's that one. Story!)

Liliet

It's certainly something Black considered as a motivation for them – that he's more dangerous as a mentor to avenge than as a player in his own right (he was also very amused by that). And yeah I don't think there's going to be GASPS OF INDIGNANT SURPRISE at Cat refusing to hand him over.

RoflCat

Maybe it'll be Cat's turn to teach Black about fitting into that better world of hers.

I'm sure there's some importance to that moment when the Student and the Mentor swap position, even if temporarily.

Heck he wouldn't be the first Praesi she needs to teach how to fit into society. (Akua)

Andrew Mitchell

> Maybe it'll be Cat's turn to teach Black about fitting into that better world of hers.

For sure. And the student/mentor swap will be permanent IMO. Remember, Amadeus wanted Cat to succeed (and, I think, excel) him.

erebus42

Awww, I can't wait to hear what I can only assume will be a heartwarming father-daughter chat. They have so much to catch up on; his loss of name, her loss of divinity, her new religion... I'm sure it will be just lovely.

Andrew Mitchell

Y E S

Now this is the sort of Friday cliffhanger I ♥ ♥ ♥ ... When I just KNOW the next chapter is going to be A M A Z I N G ! ! !

medailyfun

The next chapter can easily be a description of her long way to his tent, observing the camp and chatting with sappers 😊
The author excels in readers torture

Andrew Mitchell

Funny. 😊 But, no, that's not going to happen. I just don't get the hate that EE gets for cliffhangers and perceived padding.

Clint

You mean the three interludes we'll get next week?

IDKWhoitis

Some light heart jabs, maybe even a hug. I find it likely Cat will see aged far further than she remembers. His name isn't reinforcing his appearance anymore.

Or, alternatively, if he looks slightly changed, but Not old and weary, I would take that as confirmation that he is aspiring to a new Name, Dread Emperor perhaps?

TeK

Nay. The central tenet of accords: no Named Rulers. If he aspires to be Dread Emperor in Name, his days are short.

Someguy

Unless he sacrifices the power of this Name to the Gods Below to separate the Name from the earthly title?

IDKWhoitis

I think rules on abdication will include delayed clauses. I don't think Cat or anyone sitting at the table are expecting Tyrant and Hierarch to immediately step down. Maybe the majority of the clauses will take effect with the next generation of rulers or after 10 years, whichever occurs first.

Hell, If Black signs for Praes, I think the rest of the conference will have to accept him as someone influential in Praes, and getting Praes to sign this was always going to be a problem. Of course, optics of the deal may have to be altered to make this look like a good thing for everyone involved, rather than Black escaping the noose.

Liliet

I don't get the impression Cat is expecting to get Tyrant and Hierarch onboard with the Accords.

I also think that getting Praes on board will be easier than it first seems. We've heard it straight from Malicia that she wants to form treaties to ensure the continued growth of Praes, and that she acknowledges that Praes cannot rise and stay there if it does so alone. With Black as an intermediary, it's likely she'll honestly consider the accords. She might have issues with certain clauses, but that's what diplomacy and negotiations are for – that's not a dealbreaker, just a point of contention.

Mental Mouse

"So, it seems my former student has lapped both of us. We're being invited to sign a treaty with Levant, Procer, and the League. Along with Callow and the Firstborn Under Night. Still waiting to hear from some of the other nations. There's some international relations for you!

Fayhem

I'm pretty sure Malicia is getting got. IIRC Cat has repeatedly tagged her in the text as somebody who's going to have to go down the line. Heck, the initial premise of her negotiating position at the Battle of the Camps was basically "you want to invade Praes and topple/off Malicia? go nuts, I'll portal you there to make it easier". And let's not forget that Malicia had Ratface murdered in cold blood, along with a big fat chunk of the rest of Cat's government. To be fair Cat has shown with Razin and Nauk that she's capable of letting a friend's death go if it seems sufficiently advisable, but she let Razin live because she looked at him and decided "this is a future asset, not a liability".

Malicia didn't just kill one of Cat's oldest friends, she is an intrigue-addicted Named ruler who had a hand in enabling the Doom of Liesse and is fundamentally opposed to enacting the fundamental reforms of Praes that are needed both for internal reasons and to assure the rest of the continent they don't need to march in there and handle shit themselves to prevent another city-sized superweapon from being built. She isn't just an issue because she's a problem right now, she is a long-term liability for deep-seated character reasons that are not going to just evaporate. And to expand on the political aspect noted before, while Black may be hated by the people for burning granaries, Malicia is (accurately) blamed by the princes – AKA the people who are actually in charge, and most particularly and especially the reigning First Prince – for fueling and extending the ruinous Proceran civil war long past the point of reason. And, y’know, making the deal to unleash the Dead King, which is a BIG FUCKING DEAL to Procer and soon to everyone else helping fight the dead. And the hate towards Black could be significantly bought off if they can ship in grain through the Twilit Way – the issue before was that they couldn’t get enough food there in time, but now...

tl;dr – absent some huge narrative shifts to make her seem both more reasonable AND more necessary, Malicia is going to be gone before the story’s over. Not impossible, but let’s not underestimate the size of the shift that would be required.

Fayhem

> I don’t get the impression Cat is expecting to get Tyrant and Hierarch onboard with the Accords.

Quite to the contrary in fact, I think she’s angling to throw them under that bus.

Liliet

Y E P

Someguy

Hierarch probably will sign the Accords because he hates his Name & title, and thinks of it as an abomination that infringes upon the Will of The Prople. He will sign it just to quit and abolish the Name from any authority Not Elected by The People. Then turn himself in for the tribunal to do the right thing and execute him.

Liliet

Sounds accurate XD

Mental Mouse

Possibly: “No named my claim a throne, but if an already-crowned ruler gains a name, they can finish their reign naturally according to the customs of their realm”.

Clint

That would let the Dead King sign on...

konstantinvoncarstein

At the moment, a ruler without a Name would not be able to stabilize Praes, let alone reform it so it could function without Names. The Liesse Accords will probably have a delayed effect concerning the Named rulers.

TeK

That's the kind of compromise that destroys the entire point of Accords. It is like making a monarchy to get rid of monarchy – kinda pointless is what I'm sayin'

konstantinvoncarstein

How would it be possible to change Praes and not have a Secret Emperor, like Amadeus is saying? Names are a cultural thing, and only a thorough reform of Praes could change things.

Novice

I can't wait for the inevitable "It's not a phase, dad! This is who I really am." talk.

IDKWhoitis

I think Black is too smart to not see this math too, and likely his plans are already in effect. Even if he doesn't sign, I suspect Cat won't be able to handle him over (not emotionally, but because he is not weak enough). The Legions in Exile would probably prefer to go down on a funeral pyre rather than letting the transgression pass...

Although, I suspect Black would be willing to sign. Black is her Father for a reason, and Cat's philosophy is really the bastardized version of Black's. I would find it highly suspect if he didn't want to sign. Likely a different plot afoot. But not necessarily one against Cat. Maybe a way to shape public perception to not make Cat responsible for him, and to relieve her the burden of haggling for his life for the Accords to actually get done.

I suspect the simple responses are not what will follow, and likely some light prodding on Cat's part is needed. (and by light prodding, I mean liberal use of a mace).

caoimhinh

I agree.

Really, there's nothing among the Accords that we have seen so far that goes against Amadeus' beliefs.

-Not using Angels and Demons? He's perfectly fine with it! He thinks that's for the best too, as Angels are meddlesome dudes that interrupt his side's plan and Demons are blighted things that damage the fabric of creation.

-Not building Domsday Devices? Literally the reason he got into a fight with his best friend in the world, the Empress of Praes.

-No declaring senseless war? That was the whole purpose of integrating Callow into Praes instead of treating them as an oppressed colony, he raised Callow's standard of living under Praesi reign and was aiming to make it so they would be citizens of the Empire in real manner, so that Praes would not need to invade Callow for food and no longer need to blood its own citizens. He's all in for having peace.

-Having a functioning state that does not depend on Named? The whole point of the Reforms, both on Praesi institutions and the Legions of Terror.

-Strengthening relationships with other countries beyond Good and Evil? Both in Amadeus and Malicia's plans already and partly executed by them. Cordelia even has a copy of a treatise written by Alaya (If I'm not wrong it's "The End of the Age of Wonders") where she goes on length about such things and explores multiple strategies to achieve commercial, political and cultural alliances between countries, looking beyond their traditions as Good-aligned and Evil-aligned.

All this we have seen in multiple chapters and from multiple POVs.

The only thing I can think of Amadeus telling her to change is Cat's attempt on eliminating Named rulers, and not only because of his friendship with Alaya, but because doing that is honestly beyond Catherine's reach as those are cultural things and don't simply go away by signing things, you need to make huge changes in a country's way of life to eliminate a leader Name (Chieftain and Good King only disappeared because their respective cultures were brutalized and their nations conquered). Besides, she can't honestly be so arrogant as to expect that to not be a negotiation, the Accords will be signed but they won't be as her first draft, it would be ridiculous for every nation in the continent to sign and accept every single point of the Liesse Accords without modifications, that simply does not happen in any type of negotiation. She would have to conquer all of Calernia to be able to impose her treaty in unchanged terms to the other nations.

So I'm pretty confident Amadeus is all in for the Liesse Accords, hopefully he will have some questions regarding some points so we can learn more about what the documents actually say. He might even improve the Accords with his own insight.

Also, hopefully we'll see Scribe again, or at least someone will mention where the hell she is, as she simply disappeared after being confirmed to be on the run along Grem.

IDKWhoitis

I'm afraid that Black might find the Accords a worthy funeral pyre to die on. If he makes an elaborate showing of Cat murdering him or turning him over for justice, it would certainly make forcing the Accords through with less modifications possible, and very likely.

Black isn't a martyr, but if he sees a very viable way of completing his objectives, and his death is part of the plan, we know he will take it.

Hopefully he has changed a little, and will want to live to see the world after this war is done. After all this soul searching (cough) he is likely a changed man, and it makes an already unpredictable man, more so.

Andrew Mitchell

Excellent summary of the alignment between Amadeus and Cat.

Liliet

Cat can't hand him over for reasons entirely outside of his control, here. Like this has come up before – HE is more onboard with him getting killed than literally anyone else around. Including Cat. He's not going to take precautions, if nothing else this conversation might just reverse into "clearly giving me over is the right political move" "OH MY GOD YOU PIECE OF SHIT NOBODY ASKED YOU" again lmao.

IDKWhoitis

I'm just worried about what his opinion of Praes would be, and his thoughts on the Grem plan. Is he still needed is a difficult question to answer, and I suspect Black's own self evaluation will surprise us.

Fayhem

> Cat's philosophy is really the bastardized version of Black's *evolved version. FTFY. 😊

Andrew Mitchell

Yes, "new and improved" even.

Eva

He's coming back soon! Another great chapter, and Dad is returning to the fold 😊

Decius

The Black Knight is not going to sign the Liesse Accords.

The Representative of Praes is going to sign the Liesse Accords, on behalf of the Empress.

That, alone, will be enough to ensure that they go no further.

TeK

No Named Rulers is the main reason Malicia is staby-staby die-die.

edrey

so where is scribe? or assassin? the latter should have already killed his way in that island, and the first shouldn't be hiding anymore. and to be honest i really want to see cat making them kneel, they are really useless without Amadeus,

TeK

That is a weird notion. Why kneel? I mean, it's basically a pen and a dagger. No kidding they are useless sithout a guiding hand. What's wrong with that?

The lack of Eudokia is, though, deeply concerning.

edrey

you are totally forgetting how eudokia act, we dont have much information about assassin, but scribe has really big blinders about Amadeus to the point making him sacred, more less, and cant see the big picture or his legacy. if she doesnt reappear is fine, but i am pretty sure she will be back now that amadeus is back, she will try to force her way of thinking, and with her net of spies, that is not small thing. she need a sharp lesson or be killed before she cause something beyond repair, all for the sake of amadeus or what not

Raved Thrad

"While I would not hesitate a moment to ruin Archer's sleep, Vivienne at least should get to keep her slumber for a while yet."

ViviCat shipping intensifies

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Vivienne "painfully straight" Dartwick, yes. Alas.

Raved Thrad

And yet, who knows what is possible, Under The Night? 😊

Burnsy

Bet this conversation would've been a lot different if they'd known Cordy has gone full Caesar. I think this fully cements her and the angel corpse she dragged out of the lake as the endgame boss for book 5.

Also, while I'm very excited for the father/daughter reunion, anyone else absolutely desperate to find out what Scribe and Assassin have been up to this whole time? They've been off screen since the Calamities fractured.

Andrew Mitchell

> I think this fully cements her and the angel corpse she dragged out of the lake as the endgame boss for book 5.

Thanks for the reminder that the 'angel corpse from the lake' is waiting to fire. This may be a critical issue with getting Cordelia to sign the accords.

But as for this being the endgame for Book 6. Nah, I just don't see it. A significant factor in the final book? SURE. But not the boss fight. That's either going to be the Bard or the Dead King.

Mental Mouse

Where was it said that it was an angel corpse?

Andrew Mitchell

Towards the end of the first section in <https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2019/01/14/prologue-5/>

Andrew Mitchell

Sorry. I also meant to say that it's not actually specified as an angel. It's implied though.

Mental Mouse

> The Augur had found a path through, narrow as it was, and it began with a corpse that was not a corpse beneath the waters of the lake at the heart of Procer. The Ashurans, it was said, had called on a masked and hallowed presence at the Battle of Thalassina. Cordelia Hasenbach would call on a lot worse if she had to.

That doesn't sound like she thinks it's an angel...

Andrew Mitchell

"Hallowed" definition is (according to the Cambridge Dictionary) "holy or respected". Hence, the chance that it is an angel. But it could be something else.

Interesting to see the "corpse that was not a corpse" line... it reminds me of "staff that is not a staff".

Javvies

"Hallowed" was used in reference to what the Ashurans called on at Thalassina. Not what Cordelia is considering.

"Cordelia would call on a lot worse if she had to." This implies that she's willing to do things that are worse than what the Ashurans did. Also ... I'm pretty sure that if there were an Angel corpse, it would probably be in a situation similar to that if the Angel corpse that was at Liesse. That is, partly out of step with Creation, and therefore not accessible via mundane works like dredging.

Also ... I'm pretty sure that there's a "fighting fire with fire" type reference used in relation to Cordelia's project ... and possibly in context with the Dead King.

Andrew Mitchell

> "Hallowed" was used in reference to what the Ashurans called on at Thalassina. Not what Cordelia is considering.

You're right. I was wrongly conflating those two sentences. Thanks for picking that up. So whatever is (was?) in that lake is something from Procer's past that is now something that is and isn't a corpse. I think you may be onto something when you mention the Dead King. It may be something left over from a previous invasion by the Dead King? Maybe something that was used to stop him previously, at great cost?

Javvies

Could predate Procer as an organized entity, for that matter.

Could date back to Triumphant's conquest of Calernia. Or even earlier.

We have way too little information to work with when it comes to Cordelia's project.

Cold Cyberia

If there's any Praesi that would uphold the Accords it's Black. His life's work has been reforging the Empire so that it no longer depends so much on their Named. I would go as far as to say that he'd leap on the chance to remove Named interventions in conflict since to him, that's the primary reason for why Evil always loses.

That's the chief difference between him and Malicia or most Praesi nobles. They've internalized their defeatism to such an extent that they don't believe they can win any conflict without resorting to dumb, extreme moves. Meanwhile, Black still believes that they can win wars through discipline and strategy.

A more pressing concern will be the removal of Named in the ruling class. The Dread Emperor/Empress is such an old Role and Name that I doubt anything short of destroying Praes would do the trick, a move that's obviously not feasible.

Fayhem

> A more pressing concern will be the removal of Named in the ruling class. The Dread Emperor/Empress is such an old Role and Name that I doubt anything short of destroying Praes would do the trick, a move that's obviously not feasible.

It seems currently unclear in the text whether it's possible to refuse a Name. It looks right now like Amadeus refused one when Bard was nudging him, but earlier it sure seemed like Anaxares wasn't able to. Though that apparent discrepancy might be resolvable by supposing that Anaxares might in theory have been able to refuse, except that the kanenas refused to allow it and he wasn't able psychologically to defy them in the end. So if it is possible to refuse a Name, then that would do the trick: take the title/political position of Dread Emperor, but refuse the Name when it tries to fall upon you. That might not actually destroy the Name, but if you can't claim the Name without the title and the holder of the title won't take it that would render it irrelevant, at least for the lifespan of that ruler (the clear weak spot there tbf).

caoimhinh

Actually, Bard simply said that he is a claimant, and that he is no longer into the Role of the Black Knight, but another that he considers "beneath him", however, it was left vague. It seems like Amadeus is right now a claimant to some Name, but doesn't have it yet, at this juncture anything can happen, but once the conditions are fulfilled the Name will latch onto him whether he wants it or not.

Now, what that Name is, that's the question.

Shveiran

Well, that will be an intense conversation.

However, though I understand how powerful a political move it would be to hand over Amadeus for war crimes, I really cannot understand in what world that will be REQUIRED.

I mean... oh no! The villanous Black Knight invaded Procer and torched the countryside! Thousands have died and more will starve! How awful!

Surely, THAT requires a public execution before we can move beyond it, doesn't it?

For fuck sake, I'm so sick of this.

Just in the past two years, the "good side" FORMED A COALITION with the express purpose of declaring total war on another kingdom, proceeded to DECLARE WAR on said kingdom, SACKED ITS CITIES, and TWICE ATTEMPTED TO INVADE BY LAND; and, after being repelled, REFUSED to both PAY REPARATIONS and STOP fucking TRYING.

All of this even occurred before Amadeus did his shit!

The Black Knight committed war crimes? Damn right he did! No questions there!

But can someone please explain to me how that is somewhat a sin whereas all the rest is a-ok without using the words "but he is a Villain" or "the Heavens will it"? Guess what, those are war crimes too!

But noooo, those don't count, silly me.

And before someone brings up civilian death counts, can I mention that making a naval block on Praesi and forcing a stop on commerce is inducing famine by simply another means? What are those civilians gonna eat, Wasteland dirt? The fact that apparently the Tower has reserves of grain to compensate and Procer doesn't simply means the bad guys were competent, not that the good guys did something any less grave.

But sure, they are Praesi civilian, so they don't count.

Anyone asking for Amadeus head must be willing to pay the full price for it: Amadis, Cordelia, the Iron Prince and whoever was in charge of Ashur's offensive (assuming they survived Thalassyna) should follow him on the block. It's not punishing war crimes, if you are only enforcing it on one side.

I mean, what the fuck did they EXPECT would happen? What are they complaining about, "oh but they didn't just let our superior force roll over them on the field, they cheated!" ? How was this an unproportioned response?

Sure, it was a shitshow, but guess what YOU INVADED ANOTHER COUNTRY! You don't get to complain they invaded back you fucking morons!

And if this is just about appeasing popular opinions, they can suck it up.

The Black Queen is giving them hundred of thousands of soldiers and special forces, Named, a three months truce and a way to redeploy her forces and theirs to protect northern Procer, while ALSO selling to her people that she is going to help the side that has been invading her all year. You know, the Callowans. The "Long Price" guys, who have seen no reparations or even admission of guilt by the Crusaders YET.

If they can't find a way to keep the pot from boiling on their side, Cordelia and the rest are no allies but simply liabilities. This is not about justifying Amadeus' actions. It's about NOT justifying all those santimonious fucks that only seem to cry about loss of life and the misery of war when they aren't the ones dishing it out. Damn convenient, isn't it?

(Sorry, I left this one to boil a bit too long. Please forgive the ranting.)

Isi Arnott-Campbell

Addendum: some Good faction or other (Levantines IIRC?) advocated for ethnic cleansing of Praesi. Full-on genocide. Granted, other members of the Grand Alliance balked at this prospect.

medailyfun

cmon, "war crimes" is relatively modern concept, and even now it's something applied to a loosing side of war not to the winners.

Shveiran

I agree, but that's the whole point.
The Grand Alliance is bitching and moaning about his actions, but they are not any different from the murderous machine they willingly set in motion.

shieldredblog

What war crimes did Black commit?

The Pilgrim is guilty of war crimes for spreading a magical plague in Procer using Civilians and the first Prince was almost guilty of burning down one of her own cities.

The worst thing that Black did was burn granaries and deal with bandits. I don't think either is a war crime. He went out of his way not to commit any atrocities.

His invasion was a mild response to a unwarranted invasion by greedy genocidal conquerors. Procer won't see it that way but its true.

Fayhem

> His invasion was a mild response to a unwarranted invasion by greedy genocidal conquerors.

...No? I like Amadeus as much as the next guy, but he deliberately took actions with the explicit aim of inducing the starvation of tens if not hundreds of thousands of civilians who had sweet fuck-all to do with the decisions of their Princes. Whether that's technically a war crime or not (given the precedent of the Rendulic Rule you could actually argue either way I think) it is hardly "mild". As for the other side of your statement:

1), "unwarranted" – no, it was honestly pretty fucking warranted. Throwing Callow into the mix as a target was shitty, but another polity (it being an explicitly Evil one is icing on the cake, but frankly I'd argue this would hold true regardless) having a city-sized superweapon to which there would be no plausible temporal counter if it came back online is a scenario which can be considered legitimately unacceptable to other nations.

2), "greedy" – yep, I'll give you that one in a heartbeat. Fucking Princes, man.

3), "genocidal" – nope, some extremists far from the front were arguing for genocidal actions but they were being rejected and exactly zero actual acts of genocide had or have been perpetrated.

4), "conquerors" – well, aspirational conquerors maybe... but they didn't plan on running into the Black Queen! That said, this is hardly an unusual aspect of war, especially in a medieval-esque era.

shieldredblog

1) Procer paid for that superweapon, the Diabolist was funded by the First Prince. It's more than a little hypocritical to use it as an excuse to invade the same country you just helped commit genocide on. Also it was dealt with in house. There was no threat of it happening again. Even if that wasn't true, Procer started the war to deal with its Fantassin problem, not to make the world a better place.

3) While the full genocide plan probably wouldn't have happened, even the moderates agreed that the failure of the Crusader States meant that heavy purging was required. All of the nobles, their servants and every sorcerer on the continent would be hunted down and murdered. No tot mention the thousands of peoople who would try to stop said butchery. And then there is the greenskins and ogres.

4) Aspirational and historical conquerors.

Fayhem

1), ...No? Akua's mom took money from Procer to intrigue against Malicia (all part of Malicia's Just As Planned scheme ofc), and I'm sure some of that money made its way to daughter dearest. But that's definitely not the same thing as consciously funding said weapon, which is what would be required for genuine culpability here. Also:

> There was no threat of it happening again.

...You remember that literally the reason for the break between Amadeus and Malicia is that Malicia very much wanted to keep the weapon online and usable right? So seriously, there's no threat of the people who wanted to keep the weapon being able to rebuild/replicate it when they both actively want to and are home to the greatest living practitioners of the type of sorcery used to construct it? LOL NO.

3) (not sure where 2 went, guessing it got folded into 1?), So literally the same as Black's original plan for Praes plus some more sorcerers? Look, I'm not arguing the crusaders are 100% goody-goody two-shoes. They're not! They're really definitely not. Even if some of their aims were good, their motivations were corrupt with frankly sickening frequency. But pretending that Our Viewpoint Characters are 100% in the right by carefully eliding inconvenient context is doing literally exactly what people are mad at the Grand Alliance for doing.

shieldredblog

1) I didn't say it was the same. Procer is still partly to blame for it though. Akua's murder of an entire city would have been impossible if the first Prince hadn't knowingly funded the Trublood rebellion. While it was being built, it is said that Proceran Silver was their main source of funds.

Everyone know what the High Lords are like. This is like giving millions of dollars to al-Qaeda and pretending you didn't know they were going to use it to kill civilians. Then, claiming their attacks as an excuse to smugly invade another few countries and try your own hand at atrocities.

Fayhem

...As an American I feel very targeted right now.

shieldredblog

Honestly, I was just trying to stay away from a cliché Hitler comparison.

Fayhem

Dodging Godwin's Law is generally a good idea, sure. But you dodged a pitfall by kind of sidestepping into a minefield lol.

I'm not really offended personally for the record, both because of my personal politics and because I find getting super mad about politics on the internet to be massively unproductive and generally unpleasant. But if you weren't aware (can't tell tbh, so apologies if I'm telling you something you already know), your hypothetical scenario there could very easily be taken as a very pointed description of the past few decades of American foreign policy. There are def people out there who would not take kindly to that description.

Liliet

Honestly agreed.

On the other hand, that's a zoomed-out view of the situation. When we zoom in and consider Black's specific actions and specific circumstances, Cat has good reason to be pissed at him and consider him a potential liability. Those actions were Not Worse Than Those Of The Grand Alliance, doesn't mean they were good, either in the moral sense or in the 'good idea' sense.

Catherine going in there pissed off and ready to kick the shit out of him for making dumb decisions can only be good 😊

Shveiran

Oh, yes, I agree, I get why she is angry: Cat has taken the very mature position that, at some point, fault doesn't factor into it if what you are after is actual change. She prefers to give more than she has to so long as that induces the change she thinks is best long term.

I'm just mad that one side feels justified in zooming in on what their enemies did while carefully keeping their own actions out of the frame, without being called out on it. It's realistic. It's still a shitty move, and unjustified from the moral point of view.

And if they won't be called to answer of it, I'll be very disappointed.

Andrew Mitchell

A+ rant there my friend. No need to apologise for it all all. Very well argued.

I think it call comes down to this
> And if this is just about appeasing popular opinions, they can suck it up.

Yes, it is about appeasing popular opinions but it's also supported by the Augur's 'prediction' that Cordelia will face a popular rebellion if Black escapes. And we know the Augur has, at least to some extent, been influenced by the Bard.

That's why it's going to be a sticking point, not matter how stupid or unfair it is (as you have explained very well.)

Javvies

I'm pretty sure that Augur made no such prediction.

I'm pretty sure the only prediction Augur made that said "do this or Procer collapses/or similar phrasing/intent" was in relation to pushing the pursuit of and pressing battle against the Army of Callow and the Legions when they were trying to leave Procer. And I'm pretty sure that that was (reasonably) misinterpreted to be about going after the Army of Callow and the Legions at targets themselves, but was actually about having the pieces necessary to stop the Arcadia Shard from crashing into Procer, in the right place. Depending on just how good Augur's precognitive abilities are (or the source of those abilities), the truce with the Dead King, the Twilight Ways, and Callow getting into the Grand Alliance ... maybe even Laurence (and her get the Dead King to burn everything down so that Heroes can rise from the ashes and control what comes next plan) getting dead, might have been factored into the prophecy, since it was so open to misinterpretation.

Andrew Mitchell

From what I can tell your view that this is open to interpretation is correct. After doing a fairly comprehensive search all I can find that sheds light on this augury is this statement as delivered to Princess Rozala in Congregation II <https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2019/03/04/interlude-congregation-ii/> – the "offer" mentioned is Vivienne's offer to withdraw their troops so long as Black's legions can leave with them.

> "We've confirmed that if the offer is accepted, there will be rebellion within the month," Sophie said. "It is a certainty."

The source of the certainty is the Augur.

Javvies

Mmm.

Depends on how they came to conclude it would be "rebellion".

Going back to that chapter you linked to, it says that it would cover "most of the Eastern Principalities under Brabant" ... and if we go and look at the political boundaries map, that could be a misinterpretation of Procer losing those Principalities to the Arcadia shard and the associated fallout. This would require those speaking with Augur to assume what she was saying meant that there would be a rebellion, and to not have explicitly confirmed that she meant there would be a rebellion, rather than some other interpretation to the phrasing she used.

Augur is, after all, decidedly vague in her initial statements and significant follow up questioning to tease out the actual meaning behind her precognition is required. Which means the right questions need to be asked.

Alternatively, it could be that Kairos's plan to use Heirarch to capture the Arcadia shard would have been implemented and the side effects caused the rebellion.

Or, the gathering of Named and the consequences (Cat getting a foot in the door of the Grand Alliance and the Liesse Accords) meant that Heirarch doesn't get to run rampant in Eastern Procer. It's a distinct possibility that Kairos and the League armies would not have been within the capacity of the Dominion and Proceran forces to stop without the reinforcements that got sent after the Army of Callow and the Legions. Plus the Army of Callow and the Legions.

NZPIEFACE

Both of them are revolutionaries at heart.

I just want to see how much Black can bend now that he's lost his name.

caoimhinh

He's probably the most flexible out of the two. Always has been.

He's got pretty clear and defined boundaries were he draws the line. Everything else is negotiable and he's the most reasonable person about it.

For example, when Catherine wanted to make new reforms in Callow, Black gave her the go ahead, even when she started to plot to get a crown for herself and restore Callow's pride as a nation, Amadeus only said "sure, go ahead. Make as many changes as you deem necessary" and his only condition was "just don't rebel" and even after Catherine crossed that line he was pretty cool about it and accepted it as an outcome that was brought by his and Malicia's actions.

As of right now, he probably has very few things where he might disagree with Catherine, likely the only point of discussion is that she wants to kill Malicia and Amadeus is likely to oppose that.

Daniel E

As much as I hope that Masego gets his powers back, I just don't feel like that's going to happen. I'm calling it; Hierophant is effectively side-lined for the remainder, possibly replaced by Rogue Sorcerer.

caoimhinh

I like one of the quotes of Masego while they were fighting the Skein in Keter:

"There is nothing I have seen you can take from me. Witness."

My bet is on his third Aspect making this current loss irrelevant, he might recover his magic and gain even more power than before. He is the Usher of Mysteries and Vivisector of Miracles, his reach is beyond the purview of other mages, even those versed in High Arcana.

Masego is too important as a character to be kicked aside simply because he lost his magic. Narratively, the story now is how to get it back, improved. And for a Named, to be faced with such a setback and hard obstacle while having untapped Aspects means the coming Aspect is likely to be a tool to overcome that challenge.

RoflCat

My vote is he'll eventually discover how to use magic even without the Gift, and in turn be able to use more than just magic through diving deeper into his discovery.

After all, the Gift clearly exist in some way, since there's people who can and can't use it.

ninegardens

> "I handed him the full Accords," he said.

> Why, I almost asked, but already knew the answer. Either my father would sign the damned thing, or he'd be sold so that everyone else did.

Huh, so here's a thought- why is Cat so annoyed about this? Is it possible that there are rules in the accords that Black has already broken (which?), in which case signing them would be a death sentence (retroactive??) .

I dunno, it doesn't make a heap of sense, but its the only thing I can think of that explains her annoyance here.

Goobinator101

Accords can only be pushed successfully into action if you can please/push everyone enough to consider them seriously, Procer still wants Black to die afaik and they may use that as an excuse to not accept the Accords until that requirement is met.

Satan

It wouldn't be a slight if she offered both Princes the Accords, but also gave Cordelia another bone (like the nature of the Dead King's truce, etc.)

Chapter 56: Reflections

"In winning a game one may only grasp lesser victory; only in setting the rules may greater victory be found, for one then transcends the possibility of loss."

– Extract from "Bought and Sold", a collection of the teachings of the Merchant Prince Irenos, founder of Mercantis

It wasn't all that hard to find him, even though my temper refused to allow me to double back and obtain Black's location from those two. The combined camp of the Army of Callow and the Legions-in-Exile was centred around the barrow where I'd schemed the coming of this day, and the elaborate Mavian prayer atop it. It was half a fortress raised from the plains around the tumulus and half a well-organized city of tents, the latter being what told me where to look. Most of the layouts for camps that my army used were slightly adjusted from Legion standard, which I was long familiar with. By virtue of remembering a bird's eye view I knew which parts of the camp would have access restricted to them by order of one of my triumvirate of deputies – Juniper, Vivienne, Hakram – and where the restrictions ran high and the wards with them my father would be kept. Not as a prisoner, no. That'd be a blunder, given that within our own camp were the same legions who'd followed Black on his ill-fated campaign into the Proceran heartlands. I had no doubt, not for a moment, that Grem One-Eye would force a battle if we tried to imprison the Black Knight or execute him. None of my little triumvirate would have dared to take so bold a step without my approval, anyhow, not after the way I'd chewed them out harshly for overstepping not so long ago. Especially not when it came to a matter as delicate as Amadeus of the Green Stretch.

It wasn't long before I found the tent where he'd been recuperating, though somewhat unsurprisingly he'd already left it. Along with, from the lack of papers strewn all over the inside, one of the few fully scribed texts of the Liesse Accords. He was in fit state to move, then, which was good news. From there I did not even bother to ask questions of the legionaries still standing guard around the tent. I knew the man, better than most, and after so long cleaved from his own flesh he'd not be able to tolerate remaining stuck in bed helpless while the world moved around him. Especially not after having been handed an intriguing read by my Adjutant's hand. No, there was no doubt as to where he'd be holed up if the matter was seriously considered. I began my slow trek up the barrow's slope, slipping through the three concentric rings of raised stones that from below looked like some eldritch temple's wall. At the heart of it, seated among the dead riverbed of what had once been an altar to the fae, my father sat in the very seat I'd stolen from Arcadia. The parchments I'd once had Robber hang up on stones, when trying to divine a path through the Iserran chaos that would not break half the world, had long been burned – I would brook no evidence of my schemes to survive them – but I'd come by that method of thought honestly. Put up on worn and ancient stone in little clusters entire sections of the Accords had been put together.

Black did not look up from the parchments he was frowning down at even as I approached, though even Nameless he must have heard my limping gait. I could only make out the side of him, from where I was approaching, for he'd pivoted the seat to ensure that the afternoon sun would shine against his back and onto the sheets. He'd shaved, I saw, stripped away the growing and greying beard his soulless body had kept growing without him. It did not make him look younger – the thickening strands of grey in his hair saw to that, black touched by iron – but he felt more like the man I knew than the sleeping body had been. The cleanliness of him, not some highborn peacock's perfumed pretence but instead the austere thoroughness of someone who could not tolerate the slovenly, had been restored. Pale green eyes narrowed in thought before he rose to his feet and set down a thick sheath of parchments on the table I'd had put up here days ago.

"How much of it did you read?" I asked.

I limped up to his side slowly as he remained still, gaze still on the parchments ahead of us that traced the bare bones of the manner of world I wanted to make. I stood at his side, noting with old surprise that I was taller than he these days by more than an inch.

"The substance of it," my father replied. "The legal minutiae are not so interesting as what you seek to achieve through them. Which is..."

His head moved to the side, as if amused. My heart skipped a beat, for though I was no longer his student and his ways were not always mine, the thought that he might be my foe in this was almost too much to bear.

"Ambitious," Black said, lips quirking. "With iron and ink and oaths, you would bind that which is worst in us and through it call forth a strange new dawn."

"It's how we get out of it," I said, dry-mouthed. "The wheel of misery that rolls over us all, the wound some misbegotten part of us just keeps picking at. I see no other way."

"It is that," the green-eyed man quietly said. "And it's beautiful, Catherine. It truly is."

My throat choked up. Fingers clenched around the yew haft and my other hand rose, hesitantly. It was one thing to acknowledge the thinning, even crossing, of a boundary to myself but another to presume acting upon it. At our last parting, I'd slid a knife between his ribs and chased him out of my kingdom. Things, thoughts that had seemed certain in the privacy of my own thoughts or even those few I trusted now seemed – arms pulled me close, and I breathed out lingeringly as my nose came to rest on my father's shoulder. I could be furious with him later, I thought. It was not weakness to choose when an accounting was asked. His fingers held tight to the cloak he'd gifted me long ago, before I'd taken to adorning it with own victories and covered the blackness of its beginnings, and for a while we stood that way. The embrace broke without the embarrassment I'd expected from at least one of us, much left unspoken yet somehow still acknowledged.

"It appears I owe you the salvation of my soul," Black said, tone the faintest hint of dry.

"If there's pieces missing, well, it was like that when I found it," I replied.

His lips twitched, which coming from him was good as a smile.

"Gratitude, nonetheless," he said. "For the difficulties my defeat brought to you."

"The parts where you were arguably winning have been much, much worse," I frankly said.

"Then for that as well," he said, inclining his head to the side.

It was, I saw, an apology for the inconveniences he'd caused me. Not, even the slightest bit, regret for the dozens if not hundreds of thousands he might have killed through empty stomachs. I'd not truly expected otherwise, truth be told. He'd never been one to flinch in the face of monstrous acts, if he deemed them necessary to victory – or to repent for blood spilled a necessity's altar.

"You've gotten old," I casually said, statement and question both.

"They found me on Lake Artoise," Amadeus said. "Their band of heroes, so nobly clad. And before the first blow was struck, already I was no longer the Black Knight."

"Below sold you out?" I frowned. "I'm no great admirer, mind you, but that doesn't sound like them. They prefer their favourites to go out in a blaze."

"Already I had sensed the thinning of my mantle," he admitted. "The well was always shallow, and I leaned on it as rarely before, but the signs were there."

My eyes narrowed. That did to sound like the loss of Name, or more accurately not only that.

"You're a claimant," I said. "Shit. To what?"

He hummed a tune, and my blood ran cold for I had heard it before.

"There was once a girl without a name,

There was a tower no one could claim

No one remembers why she has climbed,

Or all those she must have left behind," he softly sang.

The Girl Who Climbed the Tower, that tune was called. Only those who might one day claim the tower at the heart of Ater had ever been known to hear it.

"You said you'd heard it before," I said.

"The fullness of it, only once," he murmured. "When I was yet young and believed there was nothing sufficient steel and cleverness could not cure."

It was what I wanted from him, wasn't it? Should he overthrow Malicia and become Dread Emperor, he could make of the Wasteland more than a wild and cornered beast. Carve out the worst of it, by fire and sword, and leave room for something better to grow of the ashes. And yet, hearing the pale-skinned man humming that eerie tune, a shiver had gone up my spine. Dread, perhaps, to match the title that may yet be claimed. Claimed, I mocked myself. What a nice, genteel word that is to describe the murder of one of the few people he loves still drawing breath.

"And now?" I softly asked.

"Now I heard the refrain and wonder," Amadeus of the Green Stretch said, "at the attributes that make an act a mistake."

I paused, sensing this was somewhere to tread lightly. I was not the only one in his life to have ever commanded affection, and his partnership with Malicia at its height had seen the Empire reach its greatest height since Maleficent the Second. Their ties were decades in the making and keeping, and though cracks had been wrought the temple they'd raised to each other was still tall and many-pillared.

"She's been making increasingly hardline decisions since you left," I said.

"She has made increasingly hardline decisions because I left," Black countered calmly.

Which might be true. I did not think the Empress so sentimental a creature that she'd lash out over the loss of a companion, no matter how dear, but Black was a little more than that. When he'd taken so many of the Legions to the Red Flower Vales and ignored every missive coming from Ater, he'd stripped her of her most feared enforcer as well as put it out in the open that at least half the Legions of Terror would heed orders from him over her. Her position had been crippled, even before the Ashurans started torching the coasts and cities with them. Even before Thalassina went up in smoke, taking the Thalassocracy's finest fleets but also Warlock with them. Now her power was shrinking, the vultures circling, and she could not afford even the pretence of weakness less she be torn apart. Of course, she'd ordered the Night of Knives before it ever came to that. There were some who might say that by making peace talks with the Grand Alliance and distancing myself from the Empire I'd courted such retaliation. They might not even be wrong.

That did not mean I would either forget or forgive it.

"You've read the Accords," I said. "I can't see her signing them, for many reasons but most of all that she'd need to abdicate."

"You underestimate her," my father noted. "If it became clear that her diplomatic position was untenable, she'd concede rather than fight a war she could not feasibly win."

"She won't sign it," I said, "because the moment she does the High Lords will slit her throat and one of them will claim the Tower over her corpse."

"Not," he said, "if I have returned."

My fingers clenched.

"I'll be blunt," I said. "No one would trust her to actually enforce the terms, least of all me. Sure, the throne in the Tower would go empty. A Nameless ruler would be rustled up. And before night's end the struggle to decide who would be the Secret Emperor or Empress ruling through them would be concluded. Maybe, and I do mean maybe, if you were keeping an eye on the situation those promises could be trusted. But then it would still be you that's the keystone, not her. She is not an asset to the arrangement."

I'd had frank, almost brusque talks with my father before. We had disagreed over matters great and small, most notably when we'd last spoken face to face. But never before had we really had such a discussion when I stood in the position of greater power and authority. Oh, even out here in the heartlands of Procer surrounded by enemies Amadeus of the Green Stretch remained one of the most powerful men on Calernia. He commanded the loyalty of a large and capable army, stood at the head of a great net of informants and had ties to powerful Named. There were those who called themselves rulers out there that paled in comparison. Yet now I stood Queen of Callow, First Under the Night and with great names and Named in my debt. I could, in all honesty, say that perhaps the only entity on the continent that could feasibly dictate terms to me was the Dead King – and even then, there would be difficulties. I supposed a lesser man might have felt cheated by that, the way the balance had swung to my side with the passing of the years. I'd seen it in Callowan nobles, the indignation at needing to heed the orders of some young warlord of no great line. At being made to kneel before someone the truths of their world stated should be kneeling to them instead. It ate the insides like poison, and always left a mark. And yet I found no trace of that in the man who'd once been the Black Knight. It should not have surprised me, even if it did.

When had ever begrudged me so much as a step forward, even when it came at his expense?

"Only so much can be spoken of this while neither of us has knowledge of the situation in Praes," he finally said. "I will have to speak to Scribe. We should still have scrying relays on this side of the Whitecaps."

"Scrying works now," I confirmed.

Green eyes narrowed.

"I will have to speak to Scribe," he said, tone strange.

"Your people are more likely to have fresh word of the Wasteland than mine," I freely conceded.

His lips thinned.

"Eudokia, this is hardly the time," he murmured. "Catherine, sharpen your mind against influence."

My brow rose.

"You think someone's meddling with my mind?" I said. "I'm not dismissing that out of hand, but there's other things in there nowadays that'd not take kindly to that."

"It is not active interference," he explained. "Consider it more akin to one being so utterly unremarkable that the mind dismisses them."

That... rang true, somehow. I drew on the Night, feeling the interest if the Sisters directed at me.

"One of my companions is the Scribe."

Oh. Oh. All this time? I'd just... not thought about her, even when by all rights I should have. Like my mind's eye had skipped over any hole left by her absence.

"Godsdamnit," I said through gritted teeth. "All right. I know she was with Marshal Grem for some time after your capture, but I can't speak to her movements after that. Hells, she could still be hiding in some tent here for all I know."

"She won't be," Black said.

To my irritation, there was an undertone of open fondness.

"If she has left the armies, then it was to prepare for what she saw coming," he continued. "Considering both defeat and victory would have brought you – and likely myself – to Salia then that is where she will be."

"You're telling me your spymistress has been in Procer's capital for what could be months," I slowly said. "What for, Black?"

"We'll have to find another form of address, if Amadeus makes you so uncomfortable," the green-eyed man said, sounding amused. "That one will never be accurate again, I don't think."

I rolled my eyes, though it was true enough. It felt... disrespectful to call him by his given name.

"Pray tell, Lord Amadeus, what has the Webweaver gotten the fuck up to in Salia?" I politely asked.

"I'd expect she has been taking root in the city, Your Majesty," he replied without missing a beat, lips twitching at my wince. "She often prefers to spread influence for some time before taking action, as a better read on the currents of the local allows for intervention so indirect as to be near traceless."

"And what is it she's been trying to set up?" I grimly asked.

"It could be near anything, truth be told," Amadeus said. "Though in all humility, I expect she will have given priority to reclaiming me. After ensuring she was in a position to do such a thing should opportunity arise, I would venture she began making arrangements for the political collapse of the Great Alliance."

If someone else had told me that, I might have been skeptical. Cordelia Hasenbach was probably, all things considered, the most skilled diplomat of our age. She'd also run circles around the Highest Assembly for years while simultaneously fending off the Tower's sabotage of reign. The Thalassocracy of Ashur had never been a great worry for me – they were a naval power first and foremost, what trouble was that to Callow? – but I'd read of them since the Tenth Crusade began. They were a realm arguably older than Praes and who'd largely remained stable for that entire span. As for the Levantines, though their squabbles of honour made them the obvious weak link they also had the Peregrine looking over the shoulder. The Grand Alliance was hardly the most stable of edifices, it was true, but neither was it captained by fools and with the Dead King at the gates there was mortar to keep them together. And still, if Black now told me that Scribe could threaten it, I could only believe him. For if I'd sent Thief or Adjutant or – Gods forbid – Akua in Salia and let them prepare for a few months? Oh, they would wound it badly. And Scribe had been the spymistress to the Calamities for longer than I'd lived.

"But you can tell her to call it off, whatever she has prepared," I said.

"It is not," my father said, "quite as simple as that."

Not the answer I'd been looking for, that.

"Eudokia takes orders from me so long as those orders are sound," he said. "In the sense that my judgement is unimpaired."

"Which it is," I pointed.

"Only if you do not consider sentiment to be an impairment, which she does," he said.

"I need the Grand Alliance to hold, Black," I flatly said. "For one, I'm going to be part of it."

"Indeed," he said, cocking his head to the side. "You need it. Callow benefits. On the other hand, the Alliance's continued existence means that the Dread Empire is effectively cut off and at the mercy of its signatories."

"Which won't matter if the Empire signs the Accords," I pointed out. "I'm not trying to end wars – I can't change human nature with bits of ink. But the moment Praes is no longer the nation of flying fortresses and undead plagues–"

"– which assumes that the Dread Empire of Praes, regardless of who rules it when the matter is broached, will be signing the Liesse Accords," Black said.

My heart caught in my throat.

"Are you saying you won't?" I asked, calm forced.

"Asking," he said, "is not enough. That you are my daughter in all but blood is not enough. We barter now the stuff of empires and the fates of nations. You would set the foundation of the Age that will follow you, and I fear that in some aspects of that seeking you are ill-prepared. I offer you, then, opportunity. If you want any ruler of Praes at all to sign your Accords?"

He met my gaze.

"Convince me," he demanded.

Cap'n Smurfy

Okay I'm pretty sure Scribes powers work on a meta level as well, because I'd completely forgotten she existed for most of the last two books.

Ethan Smith

Same mate

Andrew Mitchell

I hadn't forgotten... But that was mostly because, every now and again, someone in the comments would wonder what Scribe's been up to. And now we know.

TeK

I agree, the last two books were completely amazing.

Cicero

I've been wondering where she was, but I'd actually assumed that she had decided that Cat was more likely to succeed at recovering Black without her interference, and to take advantage of Black's absence to strike at what she might consider the root cause of Black's defeat: his sentiment for Malicia.

Thus I'd guessed she was in Praes.

Liliet

Yes, well... the last time she met Cat she was 100% seriously convinced she's about to kill Amadeus, and after the stabbing he had to order her not to take revenge.

Her trusting Cat was not very likely =x

Death Knight

If Scribe was not one of Grem's attendants when Cat returned and chewed out Juniper, then she likely would not have known that Cat had retrieved Amadeus. Indeed, it's said that she's been months in Salia with the scrying all jacked up in Iserre. She probably reasoned that if the Heroes had caught Amadeus, they'd likely bring him to Salia for a public execution so she endeavoured to cut them off at the head. Trust in Cat does not enter the picture at all.

Liliet

They don't work on everyone 😊

Admittedly my prediction had been that she's in the camp, just invisible to everyone ;u;

(and hey, confirmation that her powers can do that... and that Catherine had the same thought ;u;)

Mental Mouse

I note that Amadeus himself was expecting Scribe to be present: Love the routine:

"I will have to speak to Scribe". <crickets>
"I said, I will have to speak to Scribe". <nothing>
"Eudokia!!" <nope>

"Bah. Cat, shield your mind" Cat: "What? Ohhh!. She was with Grem, but then she wasn't lately."

"Dammit. She must have gone ahead to Salia, to break Procer from the shadows. It's gonna be tough convincing her I haven't gone soft on her."

oh is that what happened?

This is certainly clearer than it was written. Huge fan of the stories, and sympathetic to typos as someone who makes a ton myself, but there are so many of them throughout the story that sometimes when something strikes my ear as awkward I can't decide if I am misreading something or there is an important word missing.

superkeaton

God dammit, I totally fucking forgot about Scribe. Her power breaches the fourth wall!

Alright Cat, put your money where your mouth is.

TeK

I agree, breaking the forth wall is really an interesting trope.

Mental Mouse

Well... I'm not sure it still counts as breaking the fourth wall, but it's certainly "managing the readers", hindered mostly by us commenters frantically inventorying Chekov's Armory.

I think the last time he pulled something quite like this was the Absence demon, where several heroes vanished off the rolls without mention from anybody in-world.

ATRDCI

There was mention of it, just not directly so

Mental Mouse

IIRC, nobody actually said "we/they lost a few", just they had mentioned having X number of heroes earlier, and later they mentioned there were fewer, with no discussion of the discrepancy.

Shveiran

And that little touch was damn awesome

Aston W

Who the he'll is Scribe?

Andrew Mitchell

She was important in the earlier books but hasn't been around for a while. She is one of the Calamities (Amadeus' band of five). She's a non-combat Named who deals with all Black's paperwork, supply, admin; as well as building and controlling one of the largest networks of spies on the continent.

Faiir

not sure if missed the joke or joking on even higher level

Andrew Mitchell

not sure if Ashton's original comment was meant as a joke but I chose to take it literally

Crush

Scribe wasn't one of the Calamities.

The Calamities were: Amadeus, Captain, Warlock, Ranger and Assassin.

Andrew Mitchell

Yes, I got that bit wrong. Thanks.

Mental Mouse

Scribe was the Calamities' Sixth Ranger, like Akua to the Woe.

Joebobjoe

Considering that Scribe just demonstrated Assassin's trick with preventing people from recognizing him, I think Scribe might be one of the Calamities.

Javvies

Scribe and Assassin are explicitly two very different people.

Assassin has been in Ashur (may still be there), while Scribe was seen with Amadeus. They have mentioned Assassin while talking with each other.

Scribe has spoken about informing Assassin of things.

Assassin has a perfect disguise/shapeshifting type Aspect, and possibly a stealth Aspect akin to the Hide Aspect that Viv had while she was Thief.

Scribe blends into the background, is unnoticeable unless she wants to be noticed, and is readily forgettable. Kind of like The Silence from Doctor Who.

Also, Assassin is naturally(when not in disguise) a Male, who was raised and trained by some kind of assassin cult/order. He's said to have killed them all when he graduated.

Scribe is a woman that Black encountered in the Free Cities. I suspect they first met when Amadeus toppled Delos while drunk. At that time Assassin was already a member of Black's group that would come to be called the Calamities.

the verbiage ecstatic

> Scribe has spoken about informing Assassin of things.

Yes, extremely clever of Scribesassin to do that

Digitize27

Technically she's only a Calamity in the same sense Akua is a member of the Woe. The Original Calamities were Black, Warlock, Captain, Ranger and Assassin.

Andrew Mitchell

Yes, I got that bit wrong. Thanks.

TeK

You kidding, right? We wouldn't've just missed someone that important, would we?

IDKWhoitis

I see this as him playing the Devils advocate, and refining Cat's arguments for when she has to go up to the big leagues. I think he is going to be absolutely merciless in evaluating this, and will likely find many holes.

I'm manners of enforcement, who has the power? What is allowed to be used as enforcement? What stops more subtle names from getting away with dangerous magic attack?

The Liesse Accords are good for Calernia, but they need to address these points if Cat wants signatures at the end of all this.

Likely, Salia is going to crack in the middle of Cat trying to convince Scribe to call it off...

Insanenoodlyguy

He is doing that, but it's more than that.

As he mentioned, Scribe will consider anything "tainted" with sentimentality Black being impaired in judgement. So anything like "I want you to hold off because I trust she's really going to pull this off" isn't enough. He has to bring her "I want you to hold off because I sincerely believe this is the right move for Praes."

Fayhem

I also really like how this seems like it will work on a sort of meta, craft-of-narrative level. The specifics of the Liesse Accords are obviously going to be a big deal in the story going forwards, but it's also the case that they are a bunch of proposed diplomatic treaties festooned with legal minutia. This looks like a story-legitimate way of getting that info to the readers without it being just a slogging exposition dump.

Cat is going to need to go through all the main points of the Accords (finally revealing said to the readership), but it will be as an at least ostensibly adversarial case-making exercise with her newly-restored father. We'll have to wait for the execution to know for sure (though given the track record I'm pretty confident), but It looks like EE figured out how to make what could have been a brain-numbing infodump into a character-driven exchange with genuine narrative stakes. That is dope as fuck.

Insanenoodlyguy

"Asking," he said, "is not enough. That you are my daughter in all but blood is not enough. We barter now the stuff of empires and the fates of nations. You would set the foundation of the Age that will follow you, and I fear that in some aspects of that seeking you are ill-prepared. I offer you, then, opportunity. If you want any ruler of Praes at all to sign your Accords?"

He met my gaze. "Vote for Pratical Guide to Evil on Topwebfiction"

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

Rup

.insane.h👉👀

Shveiran

Nicely done

antoninjohn

I agree with Amadeus, Cat has been pushing for peace with fanatics at the cost of actually winning to the point of madness. That it started happening right after the bard broke her pivot is rather concerning

TeK

Can you explain what exactly do you mean by "actually winning", and who do you mean by fanatics?

Alegio

He probably means how she could stomp most armies around easily with sheer force but instead tries to convince them to unite their forces against the DK, but they are all like "Nope you are evulz so we don't talk with you!"

Dresden 67

Well, that's a gross oversimplification.

Dresden 67

It's not at the cost of winning. Peace and the adoption of the Accords is her win condition.

Peace on chosen terms is the end goal of all warring nations not seeking outright conquest or extermination. And since both of those outcomes are impossible to achieve for Callow, not to mention morally reprehensible...

Also, I wouldn't describe the leaders of the Grand scheme as fanatical. Sure, Cordelia is arrogant and ruthless but she's also a pragmatist. The lords of Levant are obsessed with honour, but we saw they were perfectly willing to ally with Catherine when honour demanded it.

Mental Mouse

Well, first Cat had to get the Good rulers to pay attention. Which came in the end to "Saint. you die now. No, Pilgrim, not you, you don't get to die yet."

Her next hurdle is rounding up all the loose cannons on the Evil side. Should she be more ... merciful ... in judging her proper rivals?

Shveiran

I agree with you, and yet I wonder... will this about "judging"?

We don't yet know the content of the Accords (though it seems we'll finally see parts of them oh my god yes my passion for laws is finally meeting my fantasy obsession why isn't this a thing more often but getting back on track what I mean is:

I think Cat as mentioned on several occasions how she doesn't expect Malicia to be a signee of the Accords; I wonder, with such an imbalance of power here, is it possible for the Accords NOT to screw over the Evil nations? Will the Accords be able to help transition Evil cultures away from Tyrannical rulers without collapsing them? They are more vertical than the good ones, and that means those roles -now filled in by Named – are still crucial. Callow can work with a monarch that isn't the Black Queen or a Good King, I suppose. But can Praes function without an Empress?

I'm curious to hear Cat's plans on the matter.

Fayhem

I think you're generalizing the structure of Praes to Evil cultures in general, and I don't think that's really accurate. Praes has been tagged in the text as only continuing to function/exist as a nation because of the management and regular intervention of Named, but other Evil polities mentioned (Stygia, Bellerophon, the Firstborn/drow, even Helike most of the time) don't rely on or even necessarily regularly produce Named. Also, the whole point of Amadeus' Reforms was to push Praes towards transitioning from a Named-dependent political culture to an institution-based political culture. Which, while that seems to have gone unspoken here, is the other reason Amadeus assuming rulership of Praes would be a big deal for Cat's plans actually succeeding.

Shveiran

Admittedly, I was mainly speaking of surface cultures that are capable of change, and thus excluding both the Firstborn and the Chain of Hunger (respectively).

I also didn't think of Stygia and Bellerophon (well done there), though honestly I think Stygia is the only relevant issue; while Bellerophon doesn't seem to be relying on Named, they also seem... beyond saving? It's a bit like the Chain of Hunger, you look at them and though you KNOW nuking them all is bad you have no idea how else to intervene?

Though Stygia is admittedly an interesting possible signee, I think Praes and Helike remain a very sore point. Helike has never even tried to distance itself from its Tyrant-centric tenets, and as for Praes... the reform have been trying to do that, but have not yet come even close to accomplishing the results in a stable way. As fo now, the Legions seem the only institutions that maybe a step in that direction, but with the goblins revolting even that is put into doubt. I agree Blac- Lord Amadeus and Malicia were aiming for that, but does it look like those idea could survive them, as of now?

Fayhem

> It's a bit like the Chain of Hunger, you look at them and though you KNOW nuking them all is bad you have no idea how else to intervene?

LMAO. I mean tbf Kairos figured out another way to deal with Bellerophon. Not, you know, to make it better, but still.

On the topic of Helike, while they do seem pretty stoked to have a Tyrant, unlike Praes their ruler is not always automatically Named. Kairos' dad wasn't Named at all IIRC, and his older brother who presumably would have inherited under the normal course of things either was or wound up becoming a Hero. So Helike is excited to have a Named ruler, but they frequently go without. So I think they still stand as an example, on the whole.

As for Praes, yes you're absolutely correct that the Reforms are in a perilous state right now. Which IMO is the other reason Cat needs Bl- Lord Amadeus to go take over Praes. Malicia will sell out the Reforms to better hold onto power, while for Amadeus there's no point to having power if he isn't using it to achieve his goals of reform so he'll never back down on those.

Last thing: I think the Firstborn are a surface culture now, whether they like it or not.

Shveiran

Oh, I totally agree on the Firstborn, it's just that, you know, I don't think the Accords were crafted with them in mind. But still, being prophet and all, I suppose they are a complicated issue but not a problem per se from Cat's POV. FUN Cat is leading them to their new land of milk and honey, parting the sea of dwarves to let them pass; sooner or later she is expected to hand out a few slabs of stone, no?

She's already started with the Crown of Twilight.

The problem DOES seem to be mostly Praes.
I cannot point to a chapter, but I am convinced Helike gets two kind of Named rulers? One Good, one Evil? And they let the choice shape their destiny?
Well, even if I am right it's not quite AS fundamental an institution as in the Dread Empire.

The tricky part I think will be resisting the temptation to remake the world in her image. There is little doubt Cat has little love for slavery (as well she should) but imposing that sort of things is, in my opinion, the difference between the Accords as a deal that could survive Cat and as something that lasts only so long as she is scary enough.

Insanenoodlyguy

The entire thing is about remaking the world in her image. If she can pull off the rest, this is relatively easy, though I don't think it would be part of the accords per se.

calathas

Not sure if you're interested Erratic, but I'm pretty sure it's "Sheaf of papers", not "Sheath of Papers". Sheaf refers to a bundle of something in modern english. I might be wrong, but I don't think I am.

TeK

I am pretty sure he gave up on not making typos, betting on editing the Guide later for publishing. Homestly, when it would be published, I'd buy every single book. That stuff is some of the best fantasy I've read, never mind Tolkien.

Andrew Mitchell

I'm with you 100% on that.

calathas

I only pointed this out because it isn't really a typo, as the Sheath/Sheaf thing is a common mistake in English. Not so much as accident, so much as a misconception about the language.

Andrew Mitchell

I think it's worth pointing out anyway. A common mistake is still wrong.

Morgenstern

Linguistically speaking, only so long as it does not become the new majority. If it does, that's just language change and then that will be the new correct form, while the old one is simply "obsolete" and might even become "wrong" to use in some cases. 😊

Andrew Mitchell

Oh, absolutely. And there's various stages to the process as well. I quite like Bryan Garner's classification of the stages.

What's even more interesting is that the stages of change are often different in different geographical areas; although I suspect the internet is probably speeding up and distributing a lot of the change process.

TeK

That just makes me all warm and fuzzy inside.

TeK

Probably the goblin fire. Anyway, never before had a reunion of two mass murderers had felt so heartwarming.

edrey

well at last he said she is his daughter, it was about time.
and who cares about influence in salia when a angel (?) is there, cordelia mistake and the bard's plan are the main event, and the hierarch for last, that city is finished.
but really Praes is, in the end, the true problem, Amadeus even said if Praes can not adapt let it perish, so what argument could convince him? a great question really.

Liliet

This was only i+1, consider he'd all but plain admitted he's her father at the post-Second Liesse convo.

BUT IT WAS A GREAT AND GLORIOUS ONE 😊

ATRDCI

He's no longer Named, so admitting such is now much less dangerous, both for him and her.

Andrew Mitchell

Remember, a vote for PGtE helps others find and appreciate this amazing work...

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

TeK

I wanted to vote, but did not see your comment, and I was so heartbroken, I had cried a litte.

Andrew Mitchell

Hahahahahahaha.

Javvies

Well, that explains why nobody noticed Scribe was missing or said anything about what she was up to. I'd been wondering about that.

I think Amadeus is at the very least interested in the concept, but has doubts about the proposed implementation of the Accords. I think this is more about constructive criticism/playing Devil's Advocate (I wonder what the Guideverse equivalent of that phrase is) than about actual opposition to the Accords.

Amadeus, Alaya/Malicia has been making bad decisions since before you left. Remember, she helped Akua create the Doom of Liesse, and planned to steal it and hold it over the heads of the rest of Calernia as a form of deterrent.

John Smith

Indeed I think some of us have noticed flaws...like its weird to me that Cat recognizes the prospect for Shadow or Puppet Leaders in Praes with a Nameless Pawn on the Throne. But doesn't seem to recognize that as an issue for any other country. I mean I am sure plenty would look at say Queen Viv as a puppet for Cat. GP basically runs Levant at least on Foreign Policy and he doesn't have an official government title. Saint told us a story of how the Alchemist with even less direct connection to the government then GP almost managed to set himself up as the real ruler of Procer. Ergo so No Named Rulers changes nothing. And that doesn't even account for say a non Named fighting a War and then getting a Name during it. Do they abdicate immediately? After the war? Etc.

And you noted the enforcement issue seems like at minimum you have to have one enforcer from each signatory but then you could have say Procer argue well that is unfair we have more population shouldn't we get more reps on whatever group is in charge of enforcement of the Liesse Accords.

Liliet

He knows that. It's the only reason he's even considering Catherine's point of view here – otherwise, Malicia is a treasured friend and companion, and someone he trusts more than himself to make decisions.

That last one has... suffered a blow.

ATRDCI

And this is presumably before he's had time to find out that she, however unintentionally, sent Wekesa to his death

Agent J

She sent Wekesa to war, with death as a known factor. By your logic, Black himself sent Sabah to her death. As well as Istrid and Ranker at that.

Javvies

Eh, I'm pretty sure we can put Istrid's assassination on Malicia, attempting to undercut Amadeus's control of the Legions and to "make him realize that Malicia is right about needing/using Diabolist's weaponization of Liesse as a deterrent against conventional warfare/a Crusade".

Fayhem

Rather think it was the goblins who did for Istrid, actually. If you're a bunch of cold ruthless Matrons, weakening all non-goblin controlled Legions before launching another goblin uprising is just good sense. For Malicia to do that might make sense from a mundane standpoint, but a Named secretly murdering another Named's friend as a way of manipulating their decision-making is just begging to get narratively screwed at the worst possible time. And for all Malicia's mistakes of late, I think she's absorbed enough of Amadeus' perspective/knowledge on Namelore not to make a mistake that elementary for such a relatively marginal gain.

Javvies

Goblin Matriarchs weren't (seriously) considering an uprising at the time. At least, no more than their standard contingencies for such.

Also, Istrid would be a lousy target for a goblin uprising preparation assassination. For one thing, she and her Legion were based in Callow, not Praes. Two, it was an orc or human (don't remember offhand) wielding the poisoned blade that got Istrid, not a goblin.

Three, the only way the Matriarchs could have anticipated some kind of weakness in the Tower would be if they knew that Malicia had lent Akua a helping hand and believed Black was going to find out – and in a split between Black and the Tower/Malicia, Istrid would be expected to back Black in the absence of major mental influence/control, not the Tower/Malicia. So assassinating Istrid would weaken Black's faction, and Black is the driving force behind the reforms, and made two of their Matriarchs Legion Generals.

Four, it's likely that Istrid would have been at the very least sympathetic to any motivating factors the Matriarchs might have had to launch an uprising. At the very least, she likes them more or dislikes them less than the Praesi High Lords.

No, there's no explanation for the goblins to take out Istrid. Especially not in the middle of a battle against Diabolist/Diabolist's forces.

This is the Malicia that helped Akua pull off the Doom of Liesse and wanted to steal it for herself. I think any argument that that Malicia knew better than to do something stupid because story reasoning and related backlash is not applicable.

Fayhem

Callow and Praes were part of the same Empire though. It's not like there's an invisible wall that stops Legions based in Callow from crossing into Praes. And where are you getting that an orc or human did it? The only thing we know for sure is that Istrid was cut by goblin steel and the blade was poisoned.

To quote Catherine in Book III Chapter 70, on the topic of Istrid's murder:

"It might be the Matrons. Isolationist as they were said to be, Robber had told me enough about the crones ruling his people I knew taking a few scalps to better position commanders of their own kind was not something they'd think twice about doing – if they thought they could get away with it. And if it was them... Suddenly it no longer felt like a coincidence I'd been offered desperately needed coin in exchange for a goblin settlement in Marchford. It felt like a calculated move to secure an ally before an uprising could be started. It might be I was being paranoid in thinking this, but in Praes the question was never if you were being paranoid or not. It was if you were being paranoid enough."

And hey, what do you know. A bit later we get a goblin uprising.

Three additional notes:

One, Black's faction supporting the Matrons having an improved position within Praes only matters if you assume they intend to remain within Praes. Given that the premise of the scenario being discussed is that they didn't (pretty strongly supported now by the fact that they haven't), that wouldn't be relevant here.

Two, and as far as Istrid's loyalties go, she was loyal to Black, full stop. All other sentiments would be subordinate to that. So the question is, from a cold-blooded standpoint, would you expect Amadeus to support a faction deliberately splintering from the Dread Empire in the middle of a war for its survival? Or would you consider that a dubious prospect at best? Note that his tacit acceptance of Catherine breaking off with Callow is not comparable, since a), he always planned for her to assume control of Callow in one manner or another anyway and b), since Callow was in the way of the crusade and ruled by a villain there was a 0% chance it wouldn't wind up fighting alongside the Praesi legions regardless.

Three, while in the same chapter Cat does echo your note re: Malicia by saying "She was not to be dismissed as too practical for this, not after the flying murder fortress gambit she'd tacitly allowed." I personally think her outlook is being colored by her personal bitterness/Black's tutelage here. The flying murder fortress, while I agree it was a mistake, was the linchpin of Malicia's plans for the survival of Praes. It's still a big dumb gamble that I agree she shouldn't have taken, but it's a big dumb gamble with an almost incalculably huge payoff if it succeeded. Murdering the friend of the man she most depends on to back her when they're both Named and inherently bound by narrative logic, for nothing more than maybe, somewhat influencing him, even if it's to influence him on the first big dumb gamble, is a profoundly reckless gamble of a decision with a decidedly marginal payoff. Even when she's being impractical Malicia isn't stupid.

Liliet

I don't think he can hold that against her, or will. She did the rational thing, using the assets she has; Wekesa can take care of himself. He's told Amadeus 'no' before, he could have told 'no' to Malicia.

What happened is a tragedy, but it's not a transgression to lay at her feet.

Andrew Mitchell

1. Loved the unembarrassed hug. Nice to have them back together.
2. Uh oh, Scribe's going to do something that damages the fight against the Dead King, isn't she.
3. "you are my daughter" ♥ ♥ ♥ THE FEELS
4. "Convince me." I think that's going to be much harder than Cat thinks it will be. But all the major leaders will need convincing so... it's going to be good practice.
4. I was hoping that Amadeus and Cat would have also chatted about the Bard.

Raved Thrad

Having Black (or do we call him Amadeus now?) acknowledge the relationship as it exists in Catherine's psyche has me all giddy, as does the fact that he acknowledges that he is capable of acting based on sentiment.
Squee!

Thea

And then it is revealed he was Dread Emperor Traitorous all along m

Gerionar

Yes, but he reveals himself, he rules as Benevolent for decades.

Gerionar

*but _before_ he reveals himself.

We really need an edit function.

Liliet

I mean he fucked up Catherine's psyche for a year with a plan whose formal justification for existence was "that one fae story that will lead to Catherine killing her adopted father" so..... not THAT new

BUT THIS TIME THEY ACTUALLY HUG!!!!

Ruduen Sen

I'm kind of amused – I had to do a double-take at Scribe's mention, not because I had actively forgotten – it had sprung up to my mind fairly quickly at that mention. It's good to have confirmation that it's likely an aspect or active ability, though.

At the least, though, this means we're not going to have any sudden changes to Amadeus's living status. There are too many unknowns to just off him at this time, which means we'll likely have his company for a while yet.

Truthhut

What drew shivers down my spine was that literally the paragraph before she was mentioned I thought, for the first time in two books, "We haven't heard from either Assassin or Scribe in awhile, I wonder what they are up to."

SpeckofStardust

uh that's a kinda low key wonderful showing of a mental influence.

ninegardens

So... gotta say, I Love how "The girl who climbed the tower" has been used in these books.

In that, the first few times it is introduced, it feels like it IS the main plot thread, that climbing the tower is Cat's destiny, and that she will eventually end up there. This is classic story foreshadowing etc etc etc.

... but then she takes a different path and THAT DOESN'T HAPPEN.

Similarly, with Amadeus we see that the song is there, but there are a million and one reasons why it may not happen (and indeed the fact that its "the girl who climbed the tower" further twists with expectations, makes it fit Alaya, Cat and Akua more... I wonder if Akua ever heard it...).

ninegardens

So, here's a chilling thought.
Given that this is a song.... and the main character we know associated with music is... the Bard... do we have a problem.

(I assume not, as the Bard is known more for terrible drunken singing, but still...)

Shveiran

She does carry an instrumnet, and it was mentioned that is common for bardic names, but... IS the Intercessor associated with music? Has she ever used it actively? I can at most remember her plucking a few strings as a prop, but we could just as well associate her with boots because she is usually wearing a pair.

konstantinvoncarstein

On the epilogue of the second book, she wanted to compose a song about William.

ATRDCI

She plays genuinely moving music during the fight of Hanno's band vs Kairos in the floating towers

Shveiran

Right, but in both instances she wasn't really doing "her thing" was it? It wasn't with a song that she played the Dead King, or Amadeus, or Cat, or the Conclave... she carries a lute, she may even use a lute once in a while, but that's not what she truly does.

William WAS his sword, you could use that as his symbol. The Bard though? Songs is not how she operates. They were more NAUK's thing than hers.

Fayhem

"The Girl Who Climbed the Tower" is the song that any possible claimant to the tower hears, regardless of gender identity. Given that Dread Emperor/Empress is a Name representing a gender-neutral Role, I'm pretty sure the song uses female as the default gender here because the very first Dread Ruler of Praes was female, as I think her immediate successor was as well.

Otherwise yes, everything you said!

SpeckofStardust

...

The words to the tune are different for him?

- "There was once a girl without a name,
There was a tower no one could claim
No one remembers why she has climbed,
Or all those she must have left behind," he softly sang.-
Cause this isn't what she heard.

Shveiran

I think every claimant has heard a different song, pertaining to their own path to the top.

But any claimant can still tell it is the same song. Because magic song.

Liliet

It's said to be a refrain.

Cat hadn't heard the refrain before.

theothin

Cat has heard at least three verses of it. This seems to be a fourth, although probably sequentially before the others.

There was once a girl without a name,
There was a tower no one could claim
No one remembers why she has climbed,
Or all those she must have left behind.

The first step is hardest, they said to her.
You will have to walk through fire.
It will burn away what you once were,
And always devour whole a liar

The second is the longest, they said.
You will walk under the restless dead.
The hanged all crooning from the gallows
To join them and rest in the shadows.

They say the third step is the cruelest,
Walk when the moon is at her clearest:
Love ends with the kiss of the knife,
Trust is the wager that takes your life

[https://abridged-guide-to-evil.fandom.com/wiki/
The_Girl_Who_Climbed_The_Tower](https://abridged-guide-to-evil.fandom.com/wiki/The_Girl_Who_Climbed_The_Tower)

Shveiran

Sniff. I'll need at least ten sword-fights and three political outmaneuvering to recover from that hug.

On the other hand, it's getting real. We are doing this. It's finally coming. After almost two Books, we are GONNA DISCUSS THE ACCORDS.

YEAH!

...How in the Nine Hells did EE manage to make me this hyped about an international treaty? I feel like he could make me passionate about laundry without breaking a sweat, it's uncanny.

Andrew Mitchell

konstantinvoncarstein

At last, we will know precisely what they are about 😊

Cold Cyberia

It would be an awesome twist if The Girl Who Climbed the Tower was actually a reference to the game Hakram came up – the one about using stones to build a tower. That way the prophecy could still come true (i.e. Cat climbs the tower) but its meaning is completely different. Anyway, every time a new verse comes up I get shivers, it's really good stuff.

In a strange way, Black is the ultimate persuasion skill check. If you manage to convince him everyone else would be a piece of cake.

I'm also surprised Sve Noc didn't protect Cat's mind from Scribe's influence. It seems like a pretty big oversight, especially since they listen to her advice. You'd think making sure Cat was not mind-whammed would be priority number...

TeK

Don't you think that the song every claimant on Tower was hearing long before Cat was born (Bla~ Lord Amadeus was confirmed being over 60, and he heard it in his youth and there is no reason it couldn't be heard even before) would not be about her? I mean come on, it is not your average fantasy, not every single thing revolves around our protagonist. Even, to the dismay of some, the morality.

It just as well may be that there was a Tower before Praes, as it was said that now it stands on a dead deity, and first Maleficent climbed it to claim the power of the Empress?

Andrew Mitchell

> I'm also surprised Sve Noc didn't protect Cat's mind from Scribe's influence. It seems like a pretty big oversight, especially since they listen to her advice. You'd think making sure Cat was not mind-whammed would be priority number...

I think they would have noticed a mind-whammy but this was much more subtle; making her not recall someone who wasn't there.

Fayhem

Yeah, if I'm understanding the dynamic here then the nature of Scribe's effect is such that it's less a direct effect on others than a manipulation of Scribe's own presence/weight in reality. So if I'm right, it's not so much that Scribe is actively pushing people's attention away from her (which would be more of a conventionally-detectable mind whammy) as it is that Scribe is manipulating her Name and sort of narratively making herself as smooth as a river stone so that attention just naturally skims right over her because she's presenting her Role to reality as being "someone who doesn't matter and isn't worth thinking of". Which would explain both why it is relatively vulnerable to someone specifically choosing to direct their attention to her – a river stone might be smooth, but you can still pick it up if you actually decide to focus on doing so – and why Amadeus was able to be unaffected immediately, because after associating with Eudokia for so long he probably double-checks against that effect by deliberately focusing his attention as a matter of course.

mavant

Do we know if Hakram ever heard the song?

Shveiran

why would he have?

Insanenoodlyguy

Yes. He heard part of it sung by Cat the night she named him adjutant.

Shveiran

Ah, right. Good call.

It wasn't a "spontaneous thing", though. The world didn't conspire to make him hear it, a claimant simply repeated it to him.

edrey

i think that song is somethink like a prophecy, an angel and summer for the first step, winter and the Night for the second, and that game for last. it sound like a long play from Below since the fall of the everdark. that is just too much godlike to said otherwise.

Cold Cyberia

Another point: Scribe has been setting up a disaster in Salia... but Cordelia has the perfect counter in the form of Augur. Since Augur's foresight is at its most powerful when she's defending Procer against potentially deadly threats she should have a field day against Scribe and her agents.

Let's see.. The Principate is on the precipice of total collapse. North fell against the Dead King, it's fracturing internally and the Grand Alliance is falling apart. If there's ever been a moment for Augur to get a heroic boost and smack down some spies (and Scribe) it's now.

Tek

Two things though: first, it is stated that Augur can't predict actions that are not planned, but an opportunity exploited, and Scribe is said to be amassing influence to prepare for such opportunity. Second, she is so good at being unnoticed, why do you think Augur, who half the time has trouble concentrating on mundane spies, can predict our dearest Eudokia?

Also, Above apparently does not want Procer that much. No reason to help it not to fall.

theothin

Above and Saint are not synonymous.

konstantinvoncarstein

I don't understand why a lot of people think that all heroes receive direct instructions from Above. No one does, not even the Choirs. It is the SoS who want the end of Procer, and only her (and possibly Bard).

werafdsaew

If Eudokia can counter Augur, Black would already have used her to counter Augur long before this.

Shveiran

Not necessarily; if the thory holds, she is still eluding the Augur while she prepares for striking.

Amadeus might have held off that attempt because he wasn't certain it would work, because even if it did it wasn't a given a hero would pop up to intervene, and even then because nothing would have protected Eudokia when she tried to flee the scene.

He is a careful individual who tends to minimize risks and seek out ways to guarantee returns; this seems a more desperate, or at least risky, mission.

Darkening

It was mentioned at one point that one of the weaknesses of oracles, or at least Augur, is that they can only focus on one threat at a time. Before, the main threat Cordelia was on the lookout for assassins and political pressure from Praes. Now, I'm pretty confident that she's pushing Augur to look for threats from the Dead King and the situation in Issere. I suppose given the ceasefire in the north she might relax enough on that to catch Scribe, but I doubt it.

mavant

Are we SURE that Scribe and Assassin aren't the same person? Those power sets seem to have a lot of overlap.

konstantinvoncarstein

Yes. During Amadeus's rampage in Procer, Scribe was with him. At the same time, he was thinking about Assassin in Ashur.

Furthermore, one cannot have 2 Names, and the Roles of Assassin and Scribe are too different for them to be the same person.

Shveiran

Yes. That particular theory is still popular and I can see the appeal, but that reveal wouldn't make sense in this universe.

Either Scribe or Assassin would need NOT to be a real name, and that sounds both an hard facade to maintain and hilariously unlikely considering all the stuff that was ascribed to both Assassin AND Scribe for it to have been done by a single Named who would be acting outside his or her portfolio for half of them.

Insanenoodlyguy

Not if part of your portfolio is disguise.

konstantinvoncarstein

So her/his/its portfolio would be

1: an unstoppable, shapeshifting assassin

AND

2: a one-woman administration and intelligence agency

It seems very different to me.

Insanenoodlyguy

Not really, just broad application. Lets assume aspects here:

Dismissive Aura: She can make herself seem "so utterly unremarkable that the mind dismisses them." That's also something great for somebody who's sneaking up on you.

Data Collection: She can pull in data from everything going on around her, and always be on top of it and organized. She quickly knows where everybody who's anybody is going to be when and where in a short time after securing herself in a city. SHE CAN FIND YOU AND SHE KNOWS WHEN YOU ARE ALONE. What other profession might make use of that ability?

The shapeshifting is admittedly less useful for a scribe, but if Assassin's shapeshifting is something like "Disquise" who the heck is going to expect the girl with a quill and a scroll running around in the background who's barely worth noticing to be the guy who's sneaking up on you? The way he was described in Deus, you forget what you saw when you see assassin quickly. There is definitely some overlap, and Scribe herself makes a great cover because someone like her is supposed to be most places he'd need to, easily ignored as the background administration in any sort of place that needs bureaucracy. How does he do it? Frequently by walking in the front door with a stack full of papers and looking for all the world like she belongs there.

konstantinvoncarstein

I agree there are overlaps between the 2, but Assassin is a Name that is very specific: he kills people. He could of course disguise himself in a bureaucrat, and collecting and organizing informations would indeed be useful, but it is too broad. It is something different than effectively running nearly by herself an entire kingdom AND a continent-wide spy network. If Assassin has the computing capabilities you speak of, it cannot be enough to accomplish this. His Role is about killing, not running things.

Furthermore, why would Assassin craft himself such a false identity, which let him open to attacks? If he can shape shift, it would be safer and easier to just disguise in a random guy/girl than a public figure relatively well-known. He has no reasons to do it, not even to hide his existence, because everyone knows of it.

Finally, we see in Interlude:Queen's Gambit Offered that Scribe is with Amadeus, while Assassin was send to Ashur. And Scribe was with Black during the entire campaign in Procer. No one can be in 2 places at the same time.

Per Word of God (see the document on reddit for more precisions), Aspects are only verbs at the infinitive. Yours sound more like Skills from the Wandering Inn;)

Insanenoodlyguy

He was thinking that, but we just established scribe can fuck with your head. He might be better at resisting it, but it might still affect him a bit. Especially if there is a separate persona

konstantinvoncarstein

Scribe can make herself forgotten by people, and hide her presence. Not completely rewrite the memory of several extremely powerful Named (Malicia, Warlock and Black Knight).

Shveiran

I don't have a problem with this part of the thory. The problem is that we know both Assassin and Scribe are, singularly taken, already remarkable power-wise.

If all they do and did is ascribed to a single Named, it doesn't add up.

Unless you are suggesting that Scribassin's Name is actually the Overpowered, whose aspects each allow him/her/it to call on the powers and aspect of a DIFFERENT Name, and thus he/she/it is both the Scribe, the Assassin and the Writer, I don't think it's possible.

Hydrargentium

And that last line is why we all love Amadeus of the Green Stretch so much.

Hg

ChillyPepper

Cat is worried about the artifacts and magical weapons so much that she fears the staff in earlier chapter, but failed to notice the one being made around her. The cape is pretty much an artifact except in noticeable effect I feel.

Liliet

Yes, but once again she doesn't rely on it for anything other than what a mundane cape would provide. The trick with magical items is not making their effects the lynchpin of your plan, lest you end up like Juniper stuck between two armies with Arcadia gates not working. If the cape just so happens to accidentally enhance her luck / save her life from some hostile magic, without it being a part of her plan, it not doing so at another time won't doom her (not anymore than she would be without having it altogether).

The Mantle of Woe's real functions so far have been:

- look cool and Symbolize;
- have Pockets, Lots Of Them;
- be warm.

It can't really... fail Cat at any of those, not in the narrative nasty way.

Isi Arnott-Campbell

The Mantle has also been shown to deflect magical projectiles that directly impact its surface. That's slightly more consequential, but only slightly.

Liliet

The important part is that she doesn't rely on it for that, she relies on not getting hit by magical projectiles in the first place / other magical wards/powers.

The mantle does not function as a trap here.

ChillyPepper

I do not remember which chapter it was, but there was an interlude (i believe?) someone noticing the cape changing into an artifact.

It is being formed into one if not one already, just because we can't notice what it's doing to her or that Cat is not actively relying on it doesn't mean it is not working in more subtle ways. For example, aiding Cat by a symbol of conquering. as we notice more and more people recognize the cape. Basically an aura effect.

And as proven here, we don't know, or notice, everything going on.

Liliet

Akua said that 😊

Andrew Mitchell

Worried about depending on them because they will always fail at the worst time. The cape may, or may not, become an artifact. If it does, I hope she's smart enough not to depend on it.

TheDerangedOne

blinks owlishly Is Scribe slowly becoming some counter to the Bard? Assuming she's not some unwitting catspaw in the bard's toolbox at any rate.

Gerionar

WARNING: This will be a long one!

"In winning a game one may only grasp lesser victory; only in setting the rules may greater victory be found, for one then transcends the possibility of loss."

I called it once, I call it again: THIS is what the entire story is about. It started with "win despite the rules!" and "less thinking outside the box and more smashing their heads in with the box". It has become Cat's way to one victory after the other and now it's her method to change the entire continent.

But I am going even further! I say that the entire divine dispute between Above and Below, or rather "those who want to rule" and "those who want to see mortals grow unrestrained" revolves around that. The mortals think that it is like a game of shatranj between Above and Below. But I say it is not about winning by the rules. It is all about dictating the rules they are playing by while they are playing. "Lawfull" wins, if either Above or Below achieves the "lesser victory" the game by the rules, because victory would require that either faction had enough control over their mortals to prove that this was "the better way". On the other hand "Chaos" wins, when the pieces decide to do their own thing and no longer play by the Gods' rules, when the mortals prove that they can do better without divine rule. The Accords are the biggest step in that direction in all of history. We know that this treaty would forbid Named to rule. Thus it would cripple the influence of the Gods on politics. And that is why I think the Bard will do everything to stop it, since she is imho the agent of "Law" more than she is for Above. Remember: She created the Dead King, she brokered the deal with Sve Noc and she tempted Amadeus to become the next stupid evil Dread Emperor, just so that the old song would go on and history repeat itself again and again.

Mental Mouse

What do you want to bet that the Wandering Bard is in fact the original composer of "The Girl Who Climbed The Tower?"

Andrew Mitchell

Good call! 😊 The Bard has been around since before the Miezan occupation, at least....

Actually, you've prompted another thought. Maybe the gods made the Bard when they made Creation. It fits with my pet theory that the Bard's role is to keep the game going.

Gerionar

That's what I said, isn't it? "Bard is the agent of "Law" more than she is for Above."

Gerionar

It wouldn't surprise me if she did.

Soronel Haetir

I don't get why Eudokia would be so opposed to the Accords. We know that she is personally invested in Amadeus (and perhaps more properly Black) not in Praes. If anything I would expect her to be off doing something to try and force Amadeus to take up the mantle of Black Knight again, although I'm not sure how effective that would be.

Either that or scheming to get him some Name where her unrequited affections (in the same vein as Page and the Shining Prince) could finally be returned. Although there his continued love of Ranger would likely get in the way.

In none of those situations do I see the Accords (or the continued viability of Praes) presenting any interest to her.

Andrew Mitchell

IMO if Amadeus can be truly convinced then Scribe can be also.

It's now well over 20 years since Praes' successful annexation of Callow. At a minimum, Eudokia and Amadeus have had 25 years together working towards the same vision. It's the vision that binds them (as well as the personal affection and friendship). Scribe has fully bought into Black's vision of a better Praes; one that no longer eats itself alive, one that is safe from disruption by its neighbours, one where people don't starve because some idiot Dread Emperor did something stupid. This aligns with the Accords somewhat but it's not the same, the Accords limit Praes as much as they limit all the other countries.

We know Amadeus planned for all sorts of contingencies; and worked with his confidants to refine and implement those plans. Contingencies which likely included things like mind control or giving into sentiment. We know that Amadeus currently thinks Eudokia will think that Amadeus is being influenced and won't trust his judgement without A LOT of preparation and effort.

Shveiran

Mhm, is that why you think Scribe takes action?

My read is that she is simply in love with Amadeus, in a way not unlike Hakram is with Cat. Adoration, feeling indebted to him; Eudokia is not even from Praes, I always thought her main motivation was “to make Black’s job easier and see him safe and accomplished”.

Their parting before Cat stabbed him really gave me that vibe.

You think she is more interested in what he is doing?

Andrew Mitchell

Oh, I think the love is there and, as you say, non-unlike Hakram. Your reading of Eudokia’s motivation may well be right and it’s certainly a factor. I think both motivations apply but how they’re weighted is really anyone’s guess. You may be closer to the truth than me.

Chapter 57: Hearing

“It was written in faraway Mieza that law is what separates men and beasts. We know better, in Praes: law is what separates the beasts wild and tame.”

– Dread Emperor Terribilis I, the Lawgiver

It was tempting to send for Hakram and Vivienne, who in some ways were just as much the architects of the Liesse Accords as I might claim to be. The shape of them had come from me, but it was Adjutant who’d discretely gathered jurists from Callow and Praes and pressed them for understanding until a cohesive body of law could be put together. Vivienne herself had been at our side the entire way, spreading out her Jacks far and wide to obtain the practical knowledge that was needed to make any of our fancies a functioning reality – yet burning, ardently, to see it done. Some days I suspected she’d spent more hours working out how the Accords could be made to hold up than either of us, moved by sheer want of seeing them take hold. It wasn’t like they wouldn’t be of use when arguing, either. Hakram had a ludic way with cold logic, and a mastery of details I’d never be able to match. And Vivienne’s brand of argument, half ruthlessly pragmatic and half genuinely passionate, did tend to reach people neither Adjutant nor myself would get to. I didn’t, though, because it would be missing the point of this exercise. Black wasn’t simply demanding that I convince him, he was giving me the opportunity to cut my teeth on selling the Accords to a foreign ruler in a relatively safe manner. Here, if I stumbled, it would not be a disaster that struck at all I’d fought for.

Even now, I thought, he was a sort of teacher still. Some things you never entirely outgrew.

Still, in the end it would be me that carried the Accords to the shore if they were to ever reach it. Vivienne, while heiress-designate to Callow, was still deep in my shadow from an outsider's eyes. And Hakram, and Gods it was unfair, but Hakram wouldn't be taken seriously by any of them save if he had a knife at their throat. Because he was villain, because he was an orc, because he had chosen to stand at my side instead of raising his own banner. It angered me, the suspicion that in centuries to come the Liesse Accords would likely be written of as my work alone and other names with claims just as deep would be allowed to fall to the wayside. History, I thought, would shortchange Hakram of the Howling Wolves Clan. I'd fight it every way I could, even when he might wish I did not, but I did not believe it would be enough. For too many out there the story would feel neater without him – less challenging of what they thought they knew – and I well knew the knots people were willing to tie themselves into to allow their view of the world to go unchanged.

Yet it was undeniable truth that when the deal was brought to the table where Hasenbach and the Blood and Ashur's committees sat, it would live or die by the wagging of my tongue. And so I dare not call on the others now, lest that same tongue fail me on a day mistake would mean lasting calamity.

Still, it was past noon and we both kept to some of the Wasteland's ways: though I did not send for the others, I did send for wine. And so Black and I claimed that old Mavian prayer for ourselves, breaking out bottles of some sharp Iserran wine – Prière de Fou, it was called – that lingered on the tongue like sin or vengeance. In the afternoon's light he seemed strangely vital, for all the greying marks of age in his once-dark locks. With a loose white shirt on his frame and woolen dark trousers going into Legion-issue boots, he honestly seemed more... carefree than I could remember ever seeing him. There'd been a heavy jacket of linen on his frame when I first came, but by the second cup of wine it was on the back of my seat to my own cloak's side.

"The throne of Callow recognizes Lord Amadeus of the Green Stretch, Praesi dignitary," I began.

I was toasted with a rough clay cup holding wine of which a single bottle could likely but a whole bag of. He was seated at the edge of our heavy wooden table, ignoring the perfectly good seat I'd left "The Dread Empire of Praes deigns to recognize the Queen of Callow, Catherine Foundling," he allowed, lips twitching. "In the depths of our mercy, keeping with our well-known concern for the fellowship of nations."

"Kind of you, eastern devil," I drily replied, leaning on my staff as I took a sip of my own shoddy cup. "Now, I assume you've read the proposed treaties that were sent to you."

"These so-called Accords, yes," Black easily replied. "A blatant attempt to weaken, isolate and starve the Dread Empire. And you expect us to sign these? You should be grateful our answer wasn't releasing a plague in Laure and setting your granaries aflame."

Threats, huh. It was true that while I arguably stood the greater victor on the fields of Iserre, Callow was not untouchable and despite the best efforts of my companions in fact remained rather fragile. Praes had other fires to put out, at the moment – a goblin rebellion that'd taken Foramen, the sack of Nok by Ashuran fleets and the annihilation of its largest port Thalassina along with every living soul in that great city save one – but Malicia might be able to get a handle on the mess, or whoever murdered her and claimed the Tower might. That meant Praes, though wounded, could turn its attentions on the fledgling goblin nation to its south and a very vulnerable Callow whose armies were largely abroad and had been for months. There shouldn't be food shortages though the winter, though there'd certainly be a rationing of the handouts by the royal granaries Hakram had created. If those went up in flames, though? It'd be more than a lean winter we were dealing with. No, the Dread Empire was not entirely without answers if cornered. On the other hand, there was a reason that even though Black was speaking like some arrogant Wasteland highborn even in that pretence he'd not 'actually' struck at my kingdom. The current lack of open hostilities was something very much in the Tower's interest to maintain, lest I turn my attention to it instead of the Dead King.

"If you strike across the border, I'll dismantle Praes after we're done up north," I said. "The Grand Alliance already wants to, we both know that. The only thing that's truly been standing in their way is trust and distance, both of which will be sufficiently seen to if Callow becomes a signatory."

"When you are done up north," Black repeated. "And there is the arrogance. Even should you beat Trismegistus on the field, will the Alliance not be ruined in achieving this? You threaten me with soldiers already sworn to die very far away. Your own armies are abroad, and their loyalties complex besides. If you do not want my concern to be how to break Callow before you return, or how to break it when you are returned, then offer terms other than submission or the sword."

I drained the rest of my cup and tossed it at his head. He caught it, though a lot more narrowly than he would have a few years back, and filled it with the Iserran red even as I considered my answer. So he was making it clear my position in the Tower's eyes was not so strong as one might think at first glance. I could concede to part of that, at least. After a costly campaign against Keter, I couldn't see the current signatories of the Alliance eagerly embarking on a second military enterprise immediately after. In Praes, the prevailing belief among the High Lords might very well end up being that Callow was the only threat to worry of if it came to war. They might not even be wrong, I thought. I was not so sure the Sisters would send a great army of Firstborn to aid me again, if blades came out in the east.

"Then let's see to your worries," I said. "You said that the Accords would weaken, isolate and starve the Dread Empire."

"When paired with your declared intent and seemingly imminent achievement of becoming a signatory of the Grand Alliance," Black specified.

I inclined my head in agreement. Wasn't going to be a secret for long, assuming it even was at the moment, so I did not mind the boundaries of our debate including it.

"I'm listening," I said.

He rose to his feet and strode across the thinning snow, pressing the filled cup into my hand as he passed, and came to stand by one of the raised stones. He tapped the parchments hung there with a finger.

"Weakening," he told me. "Your proposed laws would forbid the summoning for extra-Creational entities, save for peaceful purposes, and even then under restriction. These are specifically stated to include angels, devils and demons."

"They are," I said. "Cutting through the legalese, civilian labour and advice-giving is fine for angels and devils. Demons are forbidden under all circumstances save if all signatories of the Accords agree such an act is necessary."

"And so you roughly enforce parity of means between Named," Black said. "Which will be pleasing to some Named, mostly those incapable of actually doing any of this, but you seek to remove those same Named from positions of rule. As for lordly concerns, since those matter foremost under your laws, you would highly disadvantage Praes as a military power. Centuries of accumulated grimoires and contracts, which are potent soldiery when called on, are suddenly made invalid. Demons have been an integral part of the defences of our cities for ages, as deterrent and blade both. Some lasting presences of their kind would be difficult to dispose of even were we so inclined."

"I've made provisions for that last part," I said.

"Yes, heroic Named under villainous supervision would remove lingering mistakes such as Hell Eggs," he mildly said. "If that supervision were Praesi in nature, such an act might even be only mildly offensive foreign intervention in our affairs. Yet you do not address the most essential of imbalances: the Dread Empire would be surrendering a great deal of strength while other signatories would not. What does the limiting of angels mean to Procer or Ashur? To Levant? By weakening the Empire, you strengthen all its rivals at its expense. There is no nation in existence that would agree to such a thing unless forced – and treaties thrust upon a realm by force of arms rarely last."

"Demons," I flatly said, "damage the fabric of Creation. Every time one is used, it is an act of war waged on every other sentient being. That the Empire has been practicing that sort of diabolism for centuries is not an excuse to continue, it is something to expiate."

"Regardless of such concerns, it remains an advantage surrendered for no given rationale," he pointed out.

"You do get something from this," I said. "You get to no longer be the Dread Empire."

His brow rose.

"Look," I said. "I've read Malicia's treatise. The famous one, I mean, 'The Death of the Age of Wonders'. The touchstone of what she makes her foreign policy is making alliances abroad beyond the traditional Good and Evil lines, with the Thalassocracy of Ashur being the keystone. It's skillful politics, using it as counterbalance for Procer since traditionally it keeps the Principate in check by strengthening Levant and ensuring the League of Free Cities is pointed west."

"That," Black said, "and alliance with Ashur means that sea trade lanes and the grain they represent would be effectively untouchable."

"It's a nice thought, but Ashur jumped into bed with Cordelia and just spent the better part of a year putting everything in Praes within walking distance of the sea to the torch," I said.

"Hasenbach is good, Black, but she's not that good and Malicia had decades at the game before she was even born. Why did the Thalassocracy pick her over a risen but since restrained Praes as their ally?"

"Because the Tower can't be trusted," he replied. "Mind you, we had the effective heir to the Thalassocracy and some of their foremost admirals willing to back alliance after the death of Magon Hadast. But a powerful Praes – and we were, in those days, perceived to have largely assimilated Callow – will always be seen as a continental threat."

"And if you sign the Accords," I said, "you get to shed that like old skin. Oh, I don't mean that suddenly the Wasteland will be trusted and the Tower will be the sudden beloved of people it spent centuries sending flying fortresses at. But when decisions are made, high up? They'll know that the Empire is sitting at the same table as everyone else, following the same rules. The moment other crowns no longer have to worry about whether the latest Emperor is going to feed a few thousand babies to a snake to summon an army of devils, then they become a much more palatable ally. Then interests begin to matter again, and if that's the game then Praes brings quite a bit to the table. You ask what signing the Accords give you? Proof that you're a reasonable actor. And Black, how else are you ever going to get that?"

He studied me for a time, then gave half a nod.

"Some of the Empire's highborn might be swayed by such an argument," he noted. "Not the better part, but enough to make civil war feasible to win. Which brings us to an issue born of your Accords, yet not part of them."

"Callow," I said.

"Starvation," my father agreed. "Having largely forsworn diabolism, the Wasteland might not longer be able to conquer the Kingdom of Callow to secure grain supply. Even less so should Callow be a member of the Grand Alliance, which involves clauses of mutual protection against non-signatory aggression. Praes would surrender the means through which to forcefully acquire grain without having first secured other means for that acquisition."

"Praes can't sign the Grand Alliance," I admitted. "I can't see that ever going through."

"Neither can I," Black replied, amused.

"So we cut out the middle man," I said. "Praes and Callow, bound in a treaty of trade and peace. It's not like we don't take losses selling the crops south and west, anyway. The Principate has fertile plains and Mercantis gouges us habitually. Besides, in everything magical we're at least half a century behind the Empire, if not more, so it's not like you have nothing to trade aside from precious metals."

"You would be tying our nations at their very heart," he warned me.

"Good," I snarled. "I want it to be that the Tower can never war on Laure again without starving itself. I want the fucking stained glass in the windows of our palaces not to be imported from Procer. All these centuries of taxes and steel and young soldiers we've spent moving the same border back and forth can be put to better use. Gods, Black, just imagine what Praes could do if it didn't waste its talents on magical plagues and flying fortresses and bleeding its own people for fields! Imagine what Callow might become, if half the yearly taxes didn't go to raising knights and raising walls to the east – we could be so much more."

I laughed, harshly.

"Did you know that the cathedral in Laure, the one Elizabeth Alban had built spending Alamans treasures, is the reason why the House of Light is allowed to ask coin of the faithful?" I said. "Because there were points in Callowan history where the crown was too poor to pay for its damned upkeep while also raising armies and fighting wars in the east. Gods, Black, as nations we've spent more of – name it! – on killing each other than any single other thing in the span of our history. And while we were busy biting each other's tails, the world moved on."

"There will be those," he said, "for whom those truths will not be enough."

"Aye," I said. "I had a few of those too, back home. I hung the sloppy ones and murdered the rest."

He laughed.

"Those poor Regals," he said, lips twitching. "The fought as barons challenging a queen and found themselves instead having slighted the Dread Empress of Callow."

That there was a fond pride to his tone was not enough to prevent my wince. There was some truth to that and I knew it, for I had not learned the lessons of rule from my distant predecessors the Fairfaxes and the Albans. I'd wielded knife and scheme like one reigning from the Tower, tyrant no matter my good intentions. So be it. The Fairfaxes had failed, in the end, and I would not suffer that of myself after the myriad lines I had crossed.

"Your meaning is taken," the green-eyed man said. "Thought here are objections still."

"You trade the weakening for strength elsewhere," I said. "Your feared starvation will be sworn away. That leaves what, isolation? Praes is already isolated, by virtue of having pissed away every possible alliance it could have struck. What fault of that is mine, or the Accords?"

"Don't be childish," Black chided. "You would require of the Empire that it willingly embraced your new age – you must then make a place for it amongst that age."

"When did the High Lords and Ladies of Praes become lost children I must lead out of the woods?" I mockingly said.

A true speaker for those highborn might have taken offence to that, but while my father was hardly the source of my disdain for nobility he'd certainly reinforced the leaning.

"When you sought to place your will above even the Tower's," he easily replied. "In this world you would make, Praes must have a role to play. Else its energies will be spent unmaking what you have made."

"To be honest, I expect that within thirty years it'll be at war with the Free Cities," I admitted. "They'll not be Grand Alliance, and maybe not even Accord signatories."

"War is one thing," he said. "Inevitable, no matter what treaties are written. Yet more is required. Which brings me to this."

Striding forward, wine cup in hand, he gestured at another raised stone. One holding parchments regarding the to-be city of Cardinal, and the academy it was to hold within its bounds. An academy unlike any other Calernia had ever seen.

"The school," I said.

"It was," Black said, "a stroke of brilliance. Forcing Named to attend there, teaching them the articles of the Accords as well as manners of villainy and heroism? The academy is the means through which your dream lasts longer than your life's span. But it does not go far enough."

In truth the academy was more Vivienne's notion than mine – I'd been more concerned with enforcement, which had led me to the founding of Cardinal itself – but it truly was a stroke of brilliance. Oh, all those young Named would get practical lessons in how to accomplish what they wanted but they'd also get an education in the Articles of Strife: the manners of violence that were allowed of Named, depending on situation. How to keep mortals away from the damage, when it was allowable to kill another Named over a disagreement and what methods were legal to employ in that killing. And what methods would instead bring down on your head the wrath of the signatories, including the Named sworn to lethal enforcement of the Accords for a period of ten years at a time. I would leave behind a world where someone using a magic plague to wipe out a city would be met with heroes and villains from all over Calernia coming down on your head like the wrath of the Gods, where someone breaking the acceptable rules of warfare would be barred from Cardinal, from the Twilight Ways, from receiving support by any signatory government. Shatranj was a horrid metaphor for war, as war wasn't a game. But the strife between Named I fully intended on making a continent-wide tourney, a pit fight that'd allow the Gods to claim their due and the rest of us to keep on moving.

"You named these very accords after a tragedy wrought by sorcery – it was a Named practitioner, to be certain, but it was still magic that brought the madness," Black said. "Shaping Named is not enough."

"You want me to regulate sorcery," I frowned.

"I want you to make this Cardinal of yours the greatest centre of magical learning on Calernia," Amadeus of the Green Stretch said. "And to crown it the thief of our worst follies, made to serve higher purpose."

Andrew Mitchell

Vote, if you want to. No pressure. Just millions of unfortunate people on the internet who have not yet discovered the Guide:

<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>

tkjarrah

ACADEMY BABY THATS SOME RICH FUCKIN SEQUEL BAIT RIGHT THERE

SO HYPED

ALL SEQUELS MUST BE ABOUT HIGH-SCHOOL ANTICS AND THE COOL VILLAINS BEATING UP THE NERD HEROES AND OMG IT'S SUDDENLY AN ANIME!

TeK

Can't wait for an adopted baby of Masego and that other girl with a bow.

Raved Thrad

So the sequel will be all about Good girls falling for the Bad boys? 🤔

daegone823

Masego =professor snape or the guy who says wizards out of bed the squib with the cat

greatwyrmgold

I don't think Masego would willingly take Filch's job. Or do it well.

Javvies

Yeah ... Masego is not janitorial material. He'd smite a fool for suggesting he'd be the janitor at Cardinal. He could be talked into being one of the instructors there, but he'd definitely smite whomever suggested he be a menial labourer there.

greatwyrmgold

Heck, even just the "help discipline rule-breaking kids" part would fit him pretty poorly. I can't decide whether he'd be apathetic, needlessly harsh, or both. ...Then again, I'm not sure Filch was suited to that aspect of the job, either.

Decius

Practical Guide to Evil 2: Asterisk War

medailyfun

No, it's suddenly PGtE revealed as a prequel to Harry Potter

Flameburst

Theu guide always was a prequel to guideverse Hogwarts. Didn't see that one coming.

Javvies

I'm liking what I'm hearing about the contents of the Accords.

And, yeah, there's no way someone like Laurence would have ever supported the Accords. A school for both Heroic and Villainous Named? She'd flip out over that before getting to the details. Oh. Snap. Is there going to be a series of teacher and teaching related Names as a consequence of the school?

erebus42

Possibly. The Disinterested Pupil, the Lazy Genius, the Pitiless Tudor, the Bumbling Professor....

caoimhinh

The Headmaster, the Professor, the Counselor. Then the more specialized, like the Hot School Nurse, the Practical Guide, the Great Teacher Onizuka, the Student Council President, the Badass Bookworm, the Aloof Prodigy, the Cool Senpai, the School idol, and many more.

Maybe even a non-Named enforcer of the Academy's rules, just to show how a badass normal can still make the Named behave in that school, serving as a reminder that in the world at large they can't do as they please.

And of course the Almighty Janitor.

Andrew Mitchell

> the Practical Guide

That's Cat's new name.

NerfContessa

I would so fucking read this.

Damn, a centralized school for sorcery and Name raft?

Wow.

caoimhinh

Probably.

I can already see Masego as the Headmaster of the school, or at least the Dean of the Sorcery Department. I mean, it's called Cardinal, who more suited to lead it than the Hierophant. Truthfully, Cat and Amadeus (or even Pilgrim) are likely the best Headmaster candidates, but they have huge roles in politics to play, though Cat is likely to abdicate as Queen of Callow and many of her thoughts hint at her planning to die by the time all these things are established, but being the Headmistress of the Cardinal Academy for Named (C.A.N) she might find something worthwhile to pursue after her time as ruler of Callow ends.

Novice

Imagine Larat giving TED talks now and then on how to be a successful treacherous lieutenant.

caoimhinh

I would totally sign for those seminars.

TeK

"I mean, you really should've seen that coming"

Raved Thrad

"Keep one eye on your ultimate goal. Even if you only have one eye."

Agent J

"And to crown it the thief of our worst follies, made to serve higher purpose."

—

Akua is the Headmistress. Duh.

caoimhinh

Hot Headmistress.

Akua, embrace your new Role! Hahahaha.

ByVectron!

Power and respect, earned and not taken by force.

BlackPhoenix7777

Is there anybody in their right mind that would put Akua of all people in a position to shape the minds of young Named for who knows how long?

Agent J

I'd raise my hand, but first you'll have to define "right mind".

laguz24

No, I think that the wandering bard since she is the one who won due to their mistakes auka has not meaningfully won against either black or cat.

Javvies

Fuck no.

Bard needs to get taken off the board somehow (toss her into Serenity with the Dead King and ward the Creation side behind her?), or at least her influence greatly reduced.

There's going to be warnings about Bard as part of mandatory classes in Cardinal.

laguz24

Exactly by gathering so many named there the plot would eventually force her to be permanently stuck there and as for your plan of warding against the bard. You need to ward against fate itself which does not exist, you cannot wield fate like magic or miracles. Since now masego knows what she is after she can now be controlled. In all instance I agree the bard needs to be taken off the board but how, what you cannot kill you can regulate since the bard is essentially just a sentient Name based on storytelling. Getting rid of her would be essentially impossible, but using fate to chain her to one area and giving her a purpose would slowly kill her by forcing her to act outside of her name.

Liliet

Masego doesn't know what she's after, the Dead King blocked him out of the visions, and did not tell him after all. Unless he did in the last moment, that'd be badass 😊

pmHoward

Headmistress Abigail, Respected General living out her retirement in the only role that gives her as much responsibility and stress as an active battlefield

Fayhem

Perfect candidates to run this school don't exi-

> Headmistress Abigail, Respected General living out her retirement in the only role that gives her as much responsibility and stress as an active battlefield

caoimhinh

Eventually, yes.

Too bad for Aby, she's too young for retirement right now, barely on her early twenties. Hahahaha

stevenneiman

The question is whether people who care enough to become Named are the sorts who would brook rules being forced on them which turn them into glorified sports teams. Enforcement by a few of the greatest heavy hitters might help, but considering that villains revel in breaking taboo and heroes thrive on fighting battles against impossible odds and against institutions that offend what they believe in, I highly doubt that it will be enough.

There's also the problem of getting those heavy hitters. Aside from Cat and the Woe, the most powerful Named on Calernia that I can think of are Neshamah, Hye, Kairos, Anaxares and Tariq. An argument could be made for Hanno as well. Of those, Tariq is the only one I could see possibly being willing to act as an enforcer of a sensible set of rules written by three powerful people, and while he would be great in a lot of ways there's a lifespan issue to worry about. Also, banning Named rulers would make the Blood system very awkward, so even Tariq might have a hard time selling Levant on the Accords.

Liliet

>Also, banning Named rulers would make the Blood system very awkward

I don't think so? The "you're a hero and you can't rule but your children will be in line for it" arrangement makes sense, giving the Named the privileged position that Levant is after while at the same time sticking to the agreement.

>The question is whether people who care enough to become Named are the sorts who would brook rules being forced on them which turn them into glorified sports teams.

I mean heroes are after helping people, and helping people within bounded rules is still helping people.

And villains are after personal goals, and achieving these goals in the environment you're in is what the game is about.

Villains' goals aren't "to fight heroes", and heroes' goals aren't "to fight villains", not inherently. They are means towards their desired ends, for both sides.

KageLupus

Tariq is actually a really good example of how barring Named rulers could work out for the Blood. The Grey Pilgrim went around the continent saving the day and killing the Bad guys and bringing glory to the blood, all instead of ruling. If the Named Blood can't rule they are actually better off because then they are free to go gloryhunting across the land. Not to mention that most of the Named blood would rather go out and fight rather than rule anyways.

I really don't think it'll change much of anything for Ashur, to be honest.

Liliet

^^^

Despite the Blood system, Levant was already not ruled by Named. Their favorite Names are not ruler Names, and so...

Shveiran

I agree, although it's a bit of a PR nightmare in the short term.

"We the Blood have a right to rule Levant because we are descendant of great Heroes, who were amazing and wise and strong and pure and therefore we, by association, are more awesome than lesser bloodlines.

What's that? One of us became one such Hero in his own right?

Well. We can't have HIM rule. That'd be silly. Off to adventuring you go! Spit spot!

Liliet

Levant was never the biggest problem here...

Mammon

The biggest issue here is that Evil Named don't die of old age, while Good Named do. Meaning that with these Accords enforcing Evil Named to be untouchable as long as they fulfill some conditions, they are going to be the big hitters almost exclusively. The old monsters will be the main enforcers, and alike Neshamah now they cannot come out until someone 'invites' them to cause havoc without much limits.

Remember that Warlock wanted to get himself a nice and quiet mountain dungeon for his studies, and that Black stopped him from doing that because he'd become a target for Heroes to prove themselves and as a stepping stone for these Named to power up as a filler/training arc for a Villain that they currently cannot beat yet? The Accords would protect Villains like him and allow them to age like wine, until the time came that they had nothing more to perfect and continued with their next step or wait for perfect times to appear and meddle. That could make that part of the Accords a hard sell for the Heroes.

werafdsaew

Evil Names are not untouchable. The Accords are not meant to limit conflict; they're meant to limit collateral damage.

joni alanen

Well said.

Andrew Mitchell

The discussion in this chapter specifically included confirmation that Named would be allowed to kill one another.

> Oh, all those young Named would get practical lessons in how to accomplish what they wanted but they'd also get an education in the Articles of Strife: the manners of violence that were allowed of Named, depending on situation. How to keep mortals away from the damage, when it was allowable to kill another Named over a disagreement and what methods were legal to employ in that killing. And what methods would instead bring down on your head the wrath of the signatories, including the Named sworn to lethal enforcement of the Accords for a period of ten years at a time.

Javvies

You're forgetting about the Drow and Sve Noc. One of Cat's plans for the Drow included employing them as support and enforcers for the Accords. It gives them a second purpose, and the rest of Calernia (especially the Above-aligned types) a second important reason to leave them be.

The Dead King isn't going to be a factor in the Accords – he's going to be blocked off inside Serenity. Kairos and Anaxares most likely have to be killed, yes. That needs to happen anyways, so that's not really a loss for the Accords.

Hye/Ranger ... while it's unlikely that she'll actively sign on, it's also the case that she doesn't care about or do the things the Accords are designed to prevent. It's a bit like ... the nuclear nonproliferation treaties, non militarization of space agreements, and the modern Vatican – I'm not sure if the Vatican's an actual legal signatory on all of those ... but neither is the Vatican interested in having or engaged in developing for itself a nuclear weapons program or a space program.

Or maybe, telling someone who has a seafood allergy that the steakhouse is out of its seafood daily specials and doesn't have live lobsters.

Huh. I thought I had hit post on this hours ago. Oh well.

Shveiran

I agree on most points, but are you sure about the drow? Setting the mostly lawless culture as guardians of an international treaty seems an hard sell. Is there a text reference to this I missed?

Javvies

Admittedly, the plan may have changed since then, and a number of the details have definitely changed since then, but prior to encountering Sve Noc and becoming First Under the Night, Cat as Sovereign of Moonless Night included clauses about enforcing the Liesse Accords in the oaths she was having the drow following her take.

Now, the drow don't have Named, but Cat is planning on reshaping their culture, and a fair number of them are functionally on par with Named except for the Narrativistic features.

The drow will still need buy-in and tolerance from much of the surface, and having a bunch of them swearing oaths to uphold the Accords will help with that.

Shveiran

Ah, I see.

Uhm, to be honest I think the plan changed because of how different Cat's relationship with the drows is compared to her expectations: if she had been a Black Queen of Moonless Night, she could have counted on the oaths to turn the Mighty into a police force for the Accords.

Now she needs to persuade them to serve that role.

I'm not saying that's impossible, it's just... does it really feel like a role that fits for them? Granted, Cat is set on changing their cultures and, in some form, that is inevitable, but there is change and there is CHANGE, you know?

It might be just me, but I really don't get a "defenders of rules and enforcers of peace" image when I picture the drows.

Javvies

She just needs to sell it to them as the Accords help define who is "worthy" and who is "unworthy". Following and enforcing the Accords is proof of Worthiness, and violating the Accords makes you Unworthy and fair game to murder for power (or the lolz).

She's reshaping their culture anyways, including the Accords as an objective reference for some things isn't going to make her job meaningfully more difficult.

Liliet

I love your comparisons wrt Hye.

Sethur

Would also be interesting to see what would happen with transitional Names and Aspects that already exist in such a school. Like Squire and Apprentice. And there even is an Aspect "Learn". Imagine Amadeus becoming Headmaster (as a Name) and going around stabbing students to activate that Aspect. 😊

TeK

Ubua the school poltergeist.

Andrew Mitchell

Hahahahahaha!

Qwormuli

Ubua the sexy school banner. Is heraldry a promotion from being a garment ghost?

werafdsaew

Not sure what the "follies" here refer to. Sorcery in general?

Rustndusty

I think he wants to put Akua in charge of the school.

RoflCat

Would make sense on several levels.

She's one of the few beings alive(?) on Calernia to have stood on both sides.

She's well studied in magic of all kind of fields (she had that attempt at ritual to turn angel's corpse into power battery, she dipped in diabolism, she's had her hands on Fae power and now Night)

And since she's not really a living being, she can remain at school long past a mortal's life time.

Shveiran

It makes a lot of sense.

And it poses just as many problems.

I'm very curious to see Amadeus's reasoning on this one. Especially because I've long been wondering just where Akua's arch is headed.

Quite Possibly A Cat

Well Akua is trying to become a hero. Good SHOULD leap at the chance to have a Good Headmistress at this Named School. Most heroes have an annoying flaw where they age to death. This is an all around great ending to Akua's evil ark.

Shveiran

That's ... one way to see it, yet Akua hasn't (and possibly will never get) a Heroic Name. What she is, is a Villain with a remarkable body count and a close tie to both extradimensional entities and the Black Queen. I'm not sure she is quite as desirable an option for the heroic crowd.

Andrew Mitchell

Yes! Thanks for pointing that out. I missed that implication.

TeK

He's talking about the Phantom Menace.

Andrew Mitchell

Folly means foolishness so I think you could and get the sense of Black's meaning.

Decius

He wants the school to be Liesse.

Andrew Mitchell

Oh, that would be very fitting. Nice idea. 😊

talenel

This is what I was thinking. It's perfect. I think they even called it the Throneless realm. It's perfectly neutral and you can control who has access to it as well.

Faiir

And then any Named violating the accords loses access to travel through the realm.

Imagine if bad karma in RPGs made you lose access to fast travel.

Just delete the save and restart 😊

stevenneiman

Akua's Folly, Sinestra's weather magic, and dozens of other things that haven't been discussed in the same detail but which have been as ruinous in their own ways.

Steve

I can't help but feel he means to capture the Dead King. It would give the Dead King a way to live forever, so the Dead

King may agree if cornered.
That would get nutty, though.

TeK

So, kids, today's topic: breaking the fourth wall and misleading the audience. Meet the guest lecturer from Helike: Kairos Theodosius, professor of Evil.

TeK

Meet your gym teacher, the undisputed lifelong champion of Calernia's Named Fighting Cup: Ranger.
WARNING: discession advised – if you fail at class, you WILL be killed, as per Article 4.52b of Accords "Why we are not gonna fuck with that crazy half elf".

IDKWhoitis

The Evil freshmen seminars

Otherworldly Influences and Where to Find Them
-Guest lecturer: Abua Sakulian.

How to Change the Game: A Study on the Strategies of The Black Queen
-Lecturer: Aisha Bishara

A Study on Fear and its Uses
-Lecturer: Amadeus of the Green Stretch

The Heroic freshmen seminars

Why You Should Pick Fights You Can't Possibly Win
-Guest lecturer: Hanno of Arwad

Managing the Party: The Role of the Lancer
-Lecturer: Hakram of the Howling Wolves

What is the Greater Good?
-Lecturer: Tariq Isbili

Probably requirements for graduating (3 of 6)

How to Kill Mages 101
-Lecturer Ranger

How to Kill Otherworldly Beings
-Lecturer Ranger

Story Pivots and How to Use Them
-Tariq Isbili

Without a Trace: Practical Applications of Networks and Intermediaries
-Lecturer Eudokia

The Art of Exploiting Political Structures
-Lecturer: Amadeus of the Green Stretch

Schemes in Moderation
-Lecturer: Kathrine of Laure

sutortyrannus

Immediate headcanon. Bless you.

NZPIEFACE

Actually, there's definitely a compulsory class for history for all Named.

Taught by Bard.

Argentorum

Except the part they're not saying is that Bard probably has to die for all of this to work.

Liliet

Bard, from the distance: that's why I'm onboard!

edrey

i really can see masego teaching a new theory of magic for people without the talent or the so called Gift, on the side note the secrets DK are a must now

Dudehcjcjcjcj

A theory of magic for those with no magic, that dissects the laws of the universe...

Science, bitch!

Lead Engineer of Cardinal Academy: Professor Masego

JJR

Do you want gnomes to blow up the continent?

This is how you get gnomes blowing up your continent.

Andrew Mitchell

Only if you apply the knowledge. That is, if you actually build something the Gnomes object to. I don't think they object to pure research.

Shveiran

Why wouldn't they? Once research gets far enough, application of something they deemed dangerous becomes easier and easier – not to mention faster. If they wish to prevent dangerous technology being used, I don't see them brooking technological research.

Andrew Mitchell

I may be wrong about this but the only examples of Gnome intervention that I can recall being mentioned were all about applied technology (machines and devices). I don't know why they wouldn't be interested in research that could be dangerous but they just don't seem to be from what we've been shown.

Javvies

They sent the Empire a Red Letter because a goblin clan was "playing with powders". Said goblins were apparently purged by the other Matriarchs before Black could get there.

Also, the gnomes have historically objected to improved farming equipment.

The threshold for the gnomes objecting to your activities is low. And you only get three Letters in a century before the gnomes break your shit for you. "You" referring to countries, in context with gnomes.

Andrew Mitchell

You're right on all points. My recollection was wrong. Thanks for correcting me.

Strang

There's no way that school does not receive a red letter, or most likely Accords themselves will.

Most likely reason for gnomes' penchant for blowing up farming implements in My mind is to prevent technological advancement. More efficient farming means less manpower needed for supplying rest of the populace, means more room for population, means more free manpower means more advancements in everything. My guess is that The plan is to control population, and stagnate technology via preventing key technologies from getting out there.

With that in mind, place for higher education, as well as possibly enormous savings of manpower with people not getting plagued/mindfucked/fed to tapirs... gnomes will start showing up, or they've already fucked off to another planet(flying machines and bombings are not that far away from spaceflight, historically speaking).

Andrew Mitchell

> There's no way that school does not receive a red letter, or most likely Accords themselves will.

Past warnings have always been to countries so it would be a break with the past for them to target a school or an international agreement. If they do decide to target the countries that sign the Accords then Calernia is fucked.

> to prevent technological advancement

Yes, that does seem to be what the Gnomes are doing. So the clear clash with Cat's plans will need to be resolved somehow. I wish I had a clue how that can possibly be resolved though...

Liliet

Where do Cat's plans include technological advancement?

Javvies

Calernia is a backwater on the planet.

The Gnomes appear to have no issue with the place on another continent that has two rulers – one empowered by Above and one by Below. Nor do they care about the massive multi-racial empire that the Elves of the Golden Bloom got kicked out of for being racist assholes.

So the Gnomes probably don't actually care if somewhere tries to (or succeeds in) moving beyond being torn apart by war on a regular basis.

If we go back to Book 1 Chapter 15, where Black gets the notification, he says that Kerguel "had an interest in natural physics" and pursued it in the face of Red Letters, and so were wiped out. This was when "the great Baalite cities were a collection of mud huts". The Baalites are the people who colonized Ashur and fought repeated wars with the Miezens. As I understand it, by analogy, the gnomes got pissed off at Archimedes or Pythagoras and nuked Ancient Greece. Or maybe the gnomes nuked part of pre-unification warring states period China.

The only thing the Gnomes have been demonstrated to care about is any kind of technological and/or scientific advancement. They don't care about magical advancement, just mundane scientific advancement. Though there are thresholds below which they don't care about, ie Praes building a sapper corps and it's own improved siege engines and designs.

Neither the Accords nor Cardinal will trigger a Red Letter based on what we know about the Gnomes. No one involved (at least on Cat's side of things) is going to go anywhere near anything that the Gnomes would object to.

edrey

bah, i was thinking in how the dead king use magic when he is just a pile of bones, or the fae magic, now you want the gnomes, there is not third letter, they just attack.

Isaac Martinez

Wait, a school?

All the future Named will curse Catherine Foundling for making them go through exams, creepy teachers, entire bags of homework, bullying, possible romantic scandals, and the student council. All in the name of peace.

At least there will be expert lunch goblin and the tournaments of blood.

IDKWhoitis

So she effectively makes the Institute of War from League..

Not a bad play overall.

I would laugh if Cardinal used devils as its instructors or practice targets. They would follow rules more deeply than anyone else would or could. I wonder if a double headmaster system would be necessary, since having one side's influence that high up would erode the authority of the school...

Although there remains the questions of:

Funding – Do the signatories pay taxes to Cardinal in a sort of “Named Insurance”?

How are disputes between claimants resolved if no one backs down?

How are the claimants found? (I’m guessing magic shenanigans are involved)

Would Ranger need to be brought into the fold? She already heads a pseudo-predecessor of Cardinal. Would she be subject to the law?

Can non-named people enroll outside of the magically talented? I would assume counties would like to have observers in the academy, and likely would want their heirs to have connections to Named besides.

I’m deeply loving the Father-Daughter thing going on, with Amadeus playing Praesi advocate.

TeK

“How are disputes between claimants resolved if no one backs down?”

They roll d20

erebus42

I believe duels to the death are still viable so long as no one start sling around sorcerous/miraculous nukes.

IDKWhoitis

Since Names sometimes pit very different styles of its claimants against each other, it would be difficult to find a fair method...

Javvies

I would expect Ranger to more or less get grandfathered in by default.

While she’s Named, and technically a Villain, she’s nonstandard, and just generally doesn’t get up to causing trouble in the ways the Accords are designed to care about. Ranger doesn’t do diabolism or Angel summoning, nor does she go in for dread sorcerous rituals, nor does she have an interest in conquest or ruling. I mean, sure, she’s technically in charge of Refuge, but she only made one law (whatever she says goes) and doesn’t like having to actually do anything in relation to ruling the place. And, to be fair, following the dictate of “whatever Ranger says goes” is as much self preservation and common sense as anything else. She’s probably one of the most dangerous people existing on Calernia and has a temper.

She probably won't officially sign on to the Accords, but she'll likely respect the parts that matter by default because she doesn't care about doing the things the Accords exist to prevent.

As such, she won't be involved in enforcing the Accords, but she wouldn't be subject to an attempt to enforce them either. Amadeus and/or Indrani might need to be the one(s) to break the news about the Accords to her, if only so as to avoid the messenger being murdered on principle.

Hell – she might even like the Accords because it gives her an excuse to not rule Refuge. I'm pretty sure whatever non-Named governing structure Refuge gets will keep "don't annoy Ranger" as a fundamental principle of life and the legal structure in Refuge.

(Cause of death? – Suicide. – But the corpse is in fifteen pieces! – Suicide by Ranger, technically speaking.)

Javvies

Ergh. That was supposed to be a reply to a post prior. Dammit wordpress.

Matthew

A Named being able to exist outside of the Accords because they are too powerful is a massive loophole and could not be tolerated.

Javvies

Powerful Named will exist outside of the Accords because they'll only cover Calernia, and Named on Calernia, not the rest of the planet – including the empire where rule is split between a Villain and a Hero.

Powerful Named can't be allowed to violate the Accords and get away with it because they're too powerful.

However, Ranger isn't going to be violating the Accords (especially not in the ways that really matter) because the stuff the Accords are designed to prevent are things she has no interest in doing.

I ... don't have a good analogy to use here.

Mental Mouse

You mean like Neshamah? ;-p It might actually be time for Ranger to seek apotheosis, but that's a digression anyway.

The real point is that no matter how big your house is, there's always an "outside", and dealing with powers outside the Accord has to be covered in the rules. A closed-border option would be something like “need approval of the Committee to make trade agreements”, while a more open (and realistic) one would be: No agreements that violate or cross the Accords themselves. Respect the blacklists, tariffs, and subsidies from the Committee. If an outsider attacks a member unprovoked, we can and should dogpile the offender, subject to our own restrictions.

By “the Committee”, I mean whatever body is set up to administer and arbitrate the Accords. There will be something, whether informal or formal – and that group will be vastly powerful.

This is actually the first step towards a continental federation....

Fayhem

> It might actually be time for Ranger to seek apotheosis, but that’s a digression anyway.

It is a digression! AND SO I DIGRESS. Unless I’ve totally misunderstood what you’re talking about, I’m pretty sure that will never be in the cards for Ranger. As Catherine found, apotheosis is like living in a cage that’s been built out of your own soul, so the only way out is to die and/or pull a Foundling. And since Ranger’s whole thing is she will never accept chains of any kind from any one, I don’t see her going for that.

tl;dr – Ranger’s whole sine qua non is going “NO ONE TELLS RANGER WHAT TO DO, NOT EVEN RANGER” so she’ll never trade accepting more rules for more power.

Shveiran

Especially because ... well, what does Ranger need more power for anyway? She is that close to not finding worthy prey anymore.

Fayhem

Yeah, exactly. She would be taking restrictions she’d never want to accept when the payoff for doing so is making life more boring, when excitement appears to be literally the only thing she cares about (and I guess Amadeus, but I’m prepared to file sexy times and related things as a subcategory of excitement).

Andrew Mitchell

> How are the claimants found? (I’m guessing magic shenanigans are involved)

It's not necessary to find students when they are claimants, I think. Anyone who comes into a Name has to attend. Identifying them, and compelling them to attend are both really important points to be nailed down in the Accords.

werafdsaew

I don't think any compelling is necessary. It's not like the rules only apply to those who attends, and those who attends gets a Name education, which is hard to find anywhere else, plus access to the Twilight Way. The competitive advantage would be enough to draw most Names

Andrew Mitchell

That's a good point. Maybe just finding them and inviting them is enough.

Liliet

Hogwarts. It's going to be Hogwarts.

It's great and deserves 1000000 stories written in that setting

Andrew Mitchell

Yes it deserves 100,000 stories but it's not going to be Hogwarts. It's going to be better than Hogwarts; much more practical.

Liliet

Well, yes.

The comparison to Last Rock University from tgab is much better 😊

Fayhem

Jesus. Last Rock University, but it's founded by Catherine instead of Arachne.

...It REALLY says something that this is an institution that can reasonably be expected to make Calernia MORE stable.

Liliet

Hey, Professor Tellwyrn is a rock of stability when she's trying to be!

...

...

Yeah. It says a lot about Calernia.

kinigget

Less Hogwarts, more Whately Academy

IDKWhoitis

I think it would be easier to find claimants (especially to Names like Thief or such) and get them to come along through mundane means, rather than go through the whole process of tracking them down once they fully claim the name. Also, by taking claimants rather than full Names, it prevents some meddling by other Named or organizations by using assassination to "simplify" the problem of several claimants.

Thinking about it, how large is this school realistically going to be? Even in the "all hands on deck" scenario of this crusade, there was only really like 40 named total, both sides counted, including the old ones.

JJR

That might be part of why Amadeus wants it to also be a magic school. With the not named there to learn magic you'd have enough people for proper lectures.

Novice

"Praesi advocate" is such a great term. Praesi are much much worse than devils, after all.

IDKWhoitis

He plays the role so well, even adopting the mannerisms of old style Praesi diplomacy. Threats and insults to catch the opposition flatfooted, and trying to bullshit a position of strength.

Fayhem

Well, Amadeus has always been more than smart enough to understand the principle that understanding your opposition is the first step to defeating them. I suppose it should really be no surprise that he can imitate the approach of a Praesi highborn flawlessly, as such.

Liliet

I love how he's doing it while sitting on the table. I also love that his reply to Catherine throwing a cup at his head is to fill it with wine and give it back to her. This nerd

;u;

Javvies

I would expect Ranger to more or less get grandfathered in by default.

While she's Named, and technically a Villain, she's nonstandard, and just generally doesn't get up to causing trouble in the ways the Accords are designed to care about. Ranger doesn't do diabolism or Angel summoning, nor does she go in for dread sorcerous rituals, nor does she have an interest in conquest or ruling. I mean, sure, she's technically in charge of Refuge, but she only made one law (whatever she says goes) and doesn't like having to actually do anything in relation to ruling the place. And, to be fair, following the dictate of "whatever Ranger says goes" is as much self preservation and common sense as anything else. She's probably one of the most dangerous people existing on Calernia and has a temper.

She probably won't officially sign on to the Accords, but she'll likely respect the parts that matter by default because she doesn't care about doing the things the Accords exist to prevent.

As such, she won't be involved in enforcing the Accords, but she wouldn't be subject to an attempt to enforce them either. Amadeus and/or Indrani might need to be the one(s) to break the news about the Accords to her, if only so as to avoid the messenger being murdered on principle.

Hell – she might even like the Accords because it gives her an excuse to not rule Refuge. I'm pretty sure whatever non-Named governing structure Refuge gets will keep "don't annoy Ranger" as a fundamental principle of life and the legal structure in Refuge.

(Cause of death? – Suicide. – But the corpse is in fifteen pieces! – Suicide by Ranger, technically speaking.)

konstantinvoncarstein

It good for Catherine that Ranger is not doing anything that goes against the Accords. Imagine someone trying to enforce them on her 😊

Decius

If it were necessary, there would be a hero capable of doing so.

Ranger is genre savvy enough to not make it necessary.

sengachi

Amadeus, literal devil's advocate

Andrew Mitchell

1. Good to read about the depth of involvement that Vivienne and Hakram have had in the creation of the Accords.
2. Just lovely to see Amadeus 'teaching' Catherine again, even though the style is quite different.
3. I smiled to see Catherine still can't call her father Amadeus. "And Black, how else are you ever going to get that?"
4. Now this puts Catherine in a new light "... having slighted the Dread Empress of Callow."
5. Black makes a really great point. "Praes must have a role to play. Else its energies will be spent unmaking what you have made."
6. Cardinal and the school sounds A M A Z I N G.

erebus42

5. Yeah, people always go on and on about the Lower of Love but very rarely give the Power of Spite its due. Spite can keep the dying alive, keep the exhausted moving, and help bring the mighty low. It definitely would not be a good move to snub Praes if they don't want a big ol' "Fuck You" Plague.

Liliet

re: 3, I predict she will switch to calling him father before she switches to calling him by his given name 😊(have predicted that a while back and still not backing down on this) re: 4, this has been brought up before, Cordelia commenting on how she 'rules by Wasteland methods' and all :3

re: 6, remember how Warlock refused to teach magic at War College? Amadeus has not given up on the idea since ;u;

Andrew Mitchell

re: re: 4 – Good point. I guess I put more faith in Amadeus' opinion than Cordelia's; just like Catherine does. 😊

Liliet

Amadeus is honestly also biased: he's Praesi, and he's not looking at all the ways Catherine does better than that because he's entertained by the surface comparison.

Trying to not be the Dread Empire of Callow is exactly why Hakram put importance on listening to Vivienne more.

Mental Mouse

> Now this puts Catherine in a new light "... having slighted the Dread Empress of Callow."

Amadeus is being slightly facetious, but the Black Queen is definitely much more badass than the Good Queens were. And touchier.

Agent J

What do you mean? The Founders of both dynasties, Elizabeth Alban and Eleanor Fairfax, were every bit as badass as the Black Queen. One was the godsdamned Queen of Blades and the other kicked Triumphant's teeth in while shagging the Duchess of Daoine.

I love Cat to death, but she's hardly the first badass queen Callow has churned out. How'd Malanza put it?

"-what was it with Callow and spawning all those wee dangerous women?"

Liliet

YES 😊

There's a reason Good King Edward accepted Catherine so easily – she's a continuation of a very long and proud tradition 😊😊😊

wirelessgrapes

A magical, Name school? We anime now boyz

Novice

Beach episode when?

sengachi

We had one already, it was called Thallasina. Fun times.

Hierus

Amazing as always

Andrew Mitchell

If the new school has Houses what will they be called? Be creative. Answers from Harry Potter are NOT acceptable.

Chaos

Gryffindork, Slythering, Jigglypuff, Sve Noc

erebus42

I could see houses being based on type of name: Strikers (warrior and martial Names), Weavers (more subtle influencer types), Shapers (Mages and priests), Stalkers (thief and ranger Named)

Alternatively they could be based on what the individual seeks to accomplish: Architects (those with the ambition and will to create and or bring things about (art, weapons, schemes, policy, nations, etc)), Bleaders (those who fight and kill for the sake of fighting or killing), Guardians (protectors and healers), Scholars (seekers of understanding and knowledge), Rovers (thrill seekers), and Hands (those who seek to serve as best they can and or do their job as best they can)

Andrew Mitchell

I like both those ideas. 😊 Thanks.

Decius

Foundling, Amadeus, Sahelian, Isbili, Komena, Alaya, Wekesa, Eudokia, Theodosian, Almorava, de Montfort, Dartwick, Hassenbach ... after their first heads of house, of course.

Yes, some of those would require extraordinary events in order to be physically possible, and others would require extraordinary events in order to be acceptable to everyone involved.

Fayhem

Not on board with all of those (for one thing, in organizational terms that's about a million houses for an institution on a continent where the total number of Named appears to perpetually hover somewhere under triple digits) but I absolutely love the idea that even after she abdicates this is how Catherine has to accept House Foundling being a thing.

TeK

House Audacia, motto "Godhead is the trick of perspective"
House Nobilitas, motto "Objectively better than you"
House Curiositas, motto "To boldly go"
House Scortatio, motto "Anything goes"
House Ambitione, motto "Will to power"
House Archer, motto "Sullen wench", unofficial motto "Look what I can do"

House Rectus, motto "Lies and violence"

House Iustus, motto "To do good"

Decius

House Indrani, motto "Watch me hold my wine and do this!"

Mental Mouse

Any Named can hold their wine if they want (or burn it away, anyhow). I'd stick with the traditional: "Hold my wine and watch this!"

Decius

Right, but only people who aren't Archer can hand off all of the wine they are carrying.

caoimhinh

I think it would be more like:

"Get me more wine and watch me do it!"

caoimhinh

Well, I would personally not use the House system like in H.P, mainly because that system is kinda ridiculous and didn't really make any difference except cultivating stereotypes among the student body, but I digress.

I would divide it into departments, like a University, as the Named are more likely than not to be teenagers and older, and they are each highly specialized, so besides some basic core teachings the Academy would need to prepare them in different ways, the trappings of a story for Villains are not the same as for Heroes, and the way for each of them to fill their Role are different too.

Department of Story-Fu and Narrative Self-defense, directed by Headmistress Catherine.

Department of Political Science, also known fondly as the Schemes Department, led by Vice-headmistress Akua.

Department of Sorcery, directed by Dean Hierophant, Masego.

Department of Lore and Culture, led by Professor Tariq.

Department of Logistics and Support, handled by Professor Hakram.

Department of Network and Management, led by Professor Eudokia.

Department of Knife, directed by Professor Indrani. Everyone comes back from the classes sharper, one way or the other.

Department of Military Strategy, led by Professor Grem (as Juniper would be busy still being Marshal and General of Callow's army).

Department of Madness Lateral Thinking and Obscure Plans held by Professor Kairos, who insist that the Department's proper name is the Department of Visionary Wisdom.

Rule Enforcement, directed by Professor Hanno.

Campus Security, a team of multiple species, morning-shift to Orcs, night-shift given to Drow, and alternated in between are the Goblins, overall command by Ivah

The Office of Footrest is thought to be one of the mysteries of Cardinal Academy for Named (C.A.N), but it's said that the one holding office operates outside ordinary rules of the Academy at the behest of Headmistress Catherine.

Bi-weekly seminars on Extra-creational creatures are a mandatory curriculum.

TED Talks by many professors and guest lecturers are provided monthly, of special notice are the How To Be Successful Despite Yourself seminars given by the highly unwilling General Abigail, who insists that she just talks shit in her seminars and denies any capability of providing good advice, only giving half-assed answers, yet her Talks are a huge success among the student body and are proven to be highly educational.

Also, mandatory bi-monthly trips to foreign countries in order to build cultural knowledge and exchange, providing the students with insight about other countries and cultivate understanding between them.

TeK

"Cardinal Academy for Named (C.A.N)"

Evil in the can, ahahaha

Andrew Mitchell

Hahahahaha. You made me laugh several times while reading that. I especially liked hearing about Abigail's role. 😊

Mental Mouse

Ahem: An oddity of English is that "bi-monthly" and "bi-weekly" can mean almost the same thing, about every two weeks. (The "bi-" prefix is ambiguous.) In any case, even 6 times a year is probably too many field trips.

caoimhinh

True, and Catherine will definitely use that legal minutia to be a bit lazy XD.

But hey, they are Named, they will be fine with lots of trips and adventures, and can use the Twilight Ways to travel fast, so it can work out fine. Named are people of action, even those in supportive Roles(if we take Adjutant and Scribe as example, they are arguably those who rest the least).

Fayhem

I assume that Eudokia's department is the only one not bolded because people somehow keep forgetting to remember it's there.

Also, I feel like Story-Fu and Narrative Self-Defense are related but not identical fields. As such I could definitely see them being lumped together under Catherine like you have them, but I could also see Narrative Self-Defense being broken out into its own field under Amadeus given that the difference between how Amadeus and Catherine approach narrative tropes is that Amadeus avoids them because they're dangerous to him as a villain while Catherine finds a way to leverage them. Which maps pretty well to Narrative Self-Defense and to Story-Fu, respectively.

caoimhinh

Indeed.

And I agree with you, that's why Story-Fu and Narrative Self-Defense are both mentioned, together and related but not the same.

There probably will be a class called "Defense against the Defeat Stories" or something like that. Including assignments like writing essays about Narrative consequence, and story logic applied to Named activity, exemplified in history. Also, I can imagine them writing books on the subjects: "Monologues and why they suck", "First Step Is Sure Step", and "100 Ways To Not Get Killed By The Story" and "Patterns of Three" series which of course must be a Trilogy called Loss, Draw, and Win.

sengachi

Did you intentionally not bold Scribe's department? Because if so my hat off to you. I almost skipped over it because of that.

caoimhinh

Yep.

A nice detail, right?

It seemed... fitting, to make it that way.

Ben Serreau-Raskin

And there it is. Catherine Foundling sees a status quo she doesn't like and flips the table, continent wise this time.

Negative enforcement and positive reinforcement at the same time.

konstantinvoncarstein

She will create Hogwarts 🥰 I want to see an extra chapter describing it 😊

TeK

And here is the final proof that Cat really is a Villain: she created compulsory education.

Mental Mouse

Created? No, she was herself victimized by it at the orphanage, and is now continuing the cycle of abuse. 😊 😊

Andrew Bartlett

'spent more of – name it! – on killing'

Forget to name a currency after the initial draft or was she trying to say like, 'Spent more of ?

Javvies

I think that Cat is saying that if you can name something, anything, that can count as a measurable resource, Callow and Praes have spent it on killing each other in greater quantities than basically anyone else has. Food, money, steel, blood, lives, magic, Named, etc.

Shveiran

I agree. It sounds awkward to me though, no?

Liliet

Considering it's spoken out loud, it sounds fine to me. Actually pretty good oratory. Try saying it out loud, it sounds v good convincing passionate intonation wise.

Andrew Mitchell

Yep, me too. 😊

Na

I think that's as intended. I believe it's meant to be understood as "Spent more of literally anything you could name (lives, steel, gold, time) on killing ..."

konstantinvoncarstein

This Academy for mages and Named would basically be the Unseen University from "the gods are bastards" 😊

Liliet

Yes.

And Catherine and Amadeus are going to do that.

I love that the entire dramatic part with 'convince me' was a lead up to 'and you need to add a magic academy to that also' so fucking much

konstantinvoncarstein

I was wondering what could Catherine do after all is settled (if she survived). Being FUN till the end of times seems a bit boring, and she need rest. Maybe she could become professor? What chair should she have?

Andrew Mitchell

> What chair should she have?

The chair she looted from the fortress of the Count of Olden Oak, of course! 😊

Liliet

I mean Indrani has first dibs on taking her travelling around the world.

But Cat as a teacher = YES. Even if it's not quite the EXACT degree of amazingly fitting that is for Amadeus, it's still great ;u;

caoimhinh

That's also evidence that Amadeus is still a bit bitter that his plan of a Magic Academy taught by Wekesa didn't come to fruition (Masego even said that was one of the gravest fights they had), so now he is getting Cat to approve of one, probably getting Masego as the main teacher of Magic. Petty vengeance FTW, hahahaha.

Black: "Wekesa, teach magic for the Empire, that will be good for the country"

Warlock: "Nah, fuck those idiots, I'm not going to spend my time teaching my secrets to those bastards"

Fights happens

Black: "Okay, don't do it. But one day, I will have your child do it."

Warlock: "Yeah, right. Sit down comfortably and wait for that to happen."

Black: "I'm a patient man."

Decades pass, flash forward to the present

Amadeus: "So, Masego, have you noticed how many practitioners have so many holes in their education, and bumble so much in their spellcraft?"

Masego: "Of course, that's one of my main complaints to Catherine about her armies, it's like they were never taught properly."

Amadeus: "Indeed, that seems to be the issue. Catherine and I have been speaking about that, you know. About how to resolve that matter of ignorance among practitioners and improve the way of future generations."

Masego: "Oh?"

Amadeus: "I have a proposal for you."
Just as planned.

Andrew Mitchell

Thank you for the new head canon. ♥

Rup

Black: ..a set of gears..grinding creation to dust...

Liliet

Yes.

Yes.

Yes.

Eventually:

Eudokia: "Amadeus, you're blinded by sentiment. Think: why ARE you supporting this?"

Amadeus: "So, do you remember that idea I had about thirty years ago—"

Andrew Mitchell

♥ Well he did say that it needs improvements.

Cold Cyberia

I'm not entirely convinced by the Accords as they've been presented so far. Two biggest problems include:

- Most of the signatories would've been at war with each other prior to the signing. This leads to extremely strained relations and it's easy to imagine a member leaving soon after signing. It's also not ideal when it comes to personal relations. Imagine forcing a villain from Thalassina or Nok into a same room as a Hero from Ashur.
- Leaving the enforcement of the rules in the hands of member states is a recipe for disaster, see the League of Nations or UN. The rules will quickly become nominal, with superpowers of the age making a token effort of appeasement whilst in reality disregarding them with impunity. You need an independent stick because member states will always prioritize their own good over the rules if given a chance.

I've got more concerns but they're more practical in nature. For example, there's a couple thousand years of culture with regards to Named. Not sure making a school will really make a difference without some serious social engineering. The idea of Cardinal as a center of magical learning makes sense because sorcery is a skill and it heavily depends on understanding and theory. If you gather all magical experts in one place other practitioners would naturally want to learn from them, perhaps gain some prestige. Kind of like wanting to get into Cambridge or Oxford.

Names are similar but also not. There's obviously a skill component to them and having a talented teacher yields results, but at the same time one can become incredibly powerful simply by playing into their Role. Like, how would you convince Named to attend it? Especially since many of them have a very narrow outlook on life - it's practically a prerequisite for being a Named. So yeah, not entirely convinced.

Liliet

IIRC Cardinal would answer these concerns exactly - it's going to be an independent center of power, maintaining it easily because of its ties to most of existing Named (and the most learned mages, with Amadeus's addition). Once the system is made to work - which there are enough interested players to make happen right now, or rather, it's exactly Cat's game to arrange so that everyone will be - it will be self-maintaining and self-enforcing. Cardinal will BE the independent player, one whose strength comes from its independence and neutrality (since breaking it will cut it off from a proportionally significant fraction of new Named), so it will be strongly incentivized to keep the system going as defined. Its approach and specific interests will evolve naturally as the world changes, and it will be a permanent self-reinforcing fixture after the initial investment.

Shveiran

This. The problem is not maintaining the system (not anymore than any other system, anyway); it is jumpstarting the project and bringing it up to speed.

If Cat can come out ahead in the war in the north, with enough allies still breathing, it doesn't seem impossible. Just very very hard.

Liliet

Well, these aren't two who shy from very very hard projects ;u;

Death Knight

Simple; Join or Die.

theothin

That's the option Amadeus explicitly shot down right at the start. It's not a valid foundation: the key is making sure every nation is getting something positive out of the deal, an incentive to help maintain this paradigm rather than to find a way to overturn it.

Mental Mouse

> Not sure making a school will really make a difference without some serious social engineering.

The school is social engineering. Nearly every new Named on the continent will go there to be indoctrinated/educated in the Laws of War, which spells are Forbidden (as contrasted with the Official Spellbooks), and what Named may lawfully/safely do for their nations. There will be stories about students, ex-students, and even instructors, getting out of hand, and their inevitable comeuppances. There will be school songs, and traditional oaths.

This is where the new regime is shaped.

Mental Mouse

Addendum:

> Nearly every new Named on the continent...

... and new sorcerers, at least the ambitious ones.

Cold Cyberia

That's sort of my second point. Unlike the mages who greatly benefit the expertise, there's no real incentive for Named to go to the school.

Imagine you're a Black Knight, historically second or third most powerful Named in Praes. Or a bigshot Hero from Levant – one of the ruling lines. Your name has enjoyed a thousand years of privilege and you have a lot of power. Why would you agree to go to a school, where your privilege will be restricted? With people whom you will despise on a deep, philosophical and cultural level?

You say every Named will go there but I ask: how and why? You think someone like Archer or Ranger would go? White Knight, who flips a coin and kills people if it land the wrong way? You can't just mash villains and heroes together because they've literally been fighting against each other since the beginning of time. Hence the need for social engineering before the school is even established.

Javvies

Most, if not all, current Named wouldn't attend Cardinal as students.

Hell, most of the big Names who survive the current wars might be instructors or guest lecturers. Probably the same will happen with some of the non-Named.

However, new Named would go – because it will make them better at what they do. Oh, sure, there'll likely be issues getting new Evil Named to attend in the beginning ... but the Accords will also start to reshape new Evil Named towards being practical Evil types, not the classic or old school Evil types.

Mental Mouse

The next chapter seems to cover that.

Aotrs Commander

Reading through this chapter, I was thinking to myself, "if this is implimented, this reads like the backstory worldbuilding of your other typical fantasy stories with the strange rules of conduct and evferything..." It's not often you get to see it get SET UP.

Now, while everyone ELSE immediatly jumped to anime and Harry Potter, I thought of the Heralds of Valdemar and their academy.

We should be so lucky if EE decides to go all Mercedes Lackey on us and spend decades writing up and down the timeline! (Valdemar is, I think just about the most complete history of a world I think I've ever personally encountered; even in an RPG world like say Golarion, the history is mostly just history to the "now."

The academy would certainly give the room for future expansion.

But one thing that Paizo's Golarion has taught me is that the best world building always says about a place (or an organisation or whatever) "what sort of adventure or story could you have there?" Even if the adventures are intended never happen, the space for them tends to catch people's imaginations. And this is just as true for non-RPG things – case-in-point, even if EE has no plans for a sequel, just look at how engaged everyone is with just the idea.

Rup

.this is not a chapter
..it's like a blueprint of sequels and fanfics 🥰

Shveiran

This was a lot less tense than I anticipated, and unfortunately also a bit less detailed than I hoped. The enforcement part and the "who does what" interest me deeply.

On the other hand, I saw Cardinal coming as an independent enforcer... I did not foresee that school, and yet in hindsight it's so obvious! It fits Cat so nicely!
This is the best kind of twists.

MOAR please.

Though this time there is a certain anime vibe, admittedly.

TheAtomicOption

once again, in the last lines, Amadeus shows why he's the best character in this entire story.

Soronel Haetir

So long as the Names themselves don't change (which I could well see this system accomplishing) I have a very hard time seeing the current holders going along with this, even when they don't personally hold political power.

A simple example, the whole being-forced-to-attend-school bit, for someone like Hakram with a Name intimately tied to helping a particular other I just don't see that person being willing to take time away from what they see as their role that was so important that it coalesced into a Name. I could even see the forced attendance shifting such a person into someone aligned against the Accords themselves if something happened to the anchor while the second were away at school.

Names are first and foremost an act of will, suborning that will to what some other person (or group of them) thought was a good idea just sounds like a non-starter.

werafdsaew

> particular other

Will also attend, for the same reason why most Name would naturally attend with no prompting.

Soronel Haetir

That's fine if the pair come into their Names at about the same time but it seems unlikely that an assistant role would come into being while the primary is in school. And a primary Named doesn't seem all that likely to set aside whatever need drove them to take on a Name just so their second could go learn.

Andrew Mitchell

