Prologue

"The most dangerous opponent for a master is a novice. Therefore, seek to be a novice in all things."

– Isabella the Mad, only general to ever defeat Theodosius the Unconquered on the field

Anaxares, to his surprise, was still alive.

Perhaps his utter irrelevance in the grand scheme of things had seen him spared, he pondered, but such a thought was too optimistic. More likely the kanenas had all assumed another one of them was going to trigger the stone in his stomach and one would get around to it whenever they remembered. His impending death was such a certainty he no longer spared any time troubling himself over it – what point was there in cursing the river when you were already drowning? At the very least his last days would be interesting, in a truly horrifying manner. The Tyrant of Helike had seemingly adopted him as a pet of sorts, naming him an official advisor to the crown and now dragged him along wherever he went. The villain was amused by his calm. Calling the contraption the two of them were currently on a litter would have been a misnomer: the boy had essentially built a massive dais, slapped a throne on it and now had it carried around by porters everywhere.

A pavilion could be added to cover the surface when weather demanded as much and tables were positioned to allow for the taking of a meal should the Tyrant demand it. The wretched labour involved offended his sensibilities. Foreign Slavers Will Be Known By Their Wicked Works, he added out of habit. May They All Choke On Ashes And Also Snakes. The villain had tried to have a smaller, noticeably cheaper throne put next to his for Anaxares to sit on but the Bellerophan had flatly refused. He'd claimed a wooden stool for the people and discreetly carved the sigil of Bellerophon – three peasants waving pitchforks – on the side. The small act of rebellion had been deeply satisfying, if utterly meaningless. Not, he decided, an inept description of his own existence.

"Finally," the Tyrant said, "we're getting decent weather."

Anaxares looked up at the massive storm clouds gathering and cocked an eyebrow. The lands between Helike and Atalante were known for the occasional bouts of week-long rain and storms, blown south from the Waning Woods and the madness that passed for nature over there. The Fae toyed with the winds and the sky the way men did with their clothes, and the farms beneath them paid the price.

"It will be harder for your army to retreat in the mud," Anaxares said.

He knew next to nothing about strategy – in Bellerophon the only people allowed to read books on the subject were the citizens who drew army positions, and even they had the knowledge erased from their minds past their term of service lest they Use It In Horrid Rebellion Against The People – but so far the Tyrant's campaign against Atalante had not impressed him. For one, there'd been no battles. The famous Helikean army had marched east towards Atalante, whose farmers had already emptied their fields, without contest from the enemy. The Atalantians had remained behind their walls as the emptied their treasury buying up all the mercenaries in Mercantis they could afford, only taking the field after they outnumbered the Helikeans two to one. Twenty thousand men had then dutifully marched towards the Tyrant, who had immediately taken his army back through the farmlands he'd just gleefully set fire to.

"Oh, we're done retreating," the Tyrant said cheerfully. "I'm bored with it now. Got what I need anyway."

Anaxares pulled at his third wineskin of the morning, trying to wash down the taste of impending doom. The Tyrant disapproved vocally of his drinking habits, but the man's servants kept bringing him skins anyway.

"As my advisor," the boy said, his bad hand visibly shaking, "what would you advise me to do now?"

Just being called that qualified Anaxares for thirty-three different counts of treason by Bellerophon law. Fifty-something, even, if you counted all the articles about foreign collusion separately. His remains would be on trial for years after the initial execution.

"Return to Helike, slit your own throat and let your replacement beg the mercy of the League," he replied without missing a beat.

"You're a terrible advisor," the Tyrant complained. "I should have you hanged."

Anaxares shrugged.

"If that is your wish."

Less painful of a way to go than internal organ crushing, he assessed.

"You haven't gotten tedious yet," the boy mused. "I guess you can live."

"I am, of course, relieved and grateful," the Bellerophan deadpanned.

"You should be," the Tyrant said cheerfully. "I'm so merciful, it's why my people love me so much."

As far as Anaxares could tell, the reason Helikeans 'loved' the Tyrant was that they had been told they did by men with swords and grim faces. The army, though, did seem genuinely loyal. Not surprising: whenever a Tyrant took the throne, they started invading everything in sight. The last one to hold the Name had broken the desperate alliance of Stygia, Atalante and Delos before the southern Proceran princes had intervened and put her down. Glorious war had been waged, victories tallied, and within a decade all the borders had returned to what they'd been before the woman had claimed the crown. Named or not, one could not change the face of the Free Cities.

"Admittedly there is no other claimant to the throne, since your nephew's death," the diplomat said instead of rehashing the histories.

"Pretty idiot got himself shot by an orc, of all things," the Tyrant said delightedly, the red in his eye deepening for a heartbeat. "He always talked too much, it's how he lost the throne in the first place."

The Bellerophan's eyes sharpened with interest as he swallowed another mouthful of wine. The Tyrant's seizing of the throne of Helike had been one of the most unexpected diplomatic developments of the last decade, in the Free Cities, but precious little was known about. A boy that had been by all reports a nonentity before the coup had in a single day taken control of the city and the army, killed the king in his own bed and purged his nephew's supporters brutally. The nephew in question had fled the city with most of the young nobility and his surviving loyalists, becoming the Exiled Prince in the process.

"Talked too much," Anaxares repeated, leaving the tone questioning.

"See, Dorian's father was a lot like mine," the Tyrant said. "Drank too much, dallied with servants, let the nobility and the army run things. Everybody liked that state of affairs. Dorian, though? He was just so pretty and so good."

The bitter hatred in those words almost fouled the air.

"Now, the old guard didn't care much for him. But their heirs? The swarmed him like flies a corpse. Hung on to his every word, his promises of reform and a better Helike."

The Tyrant seemed almost amused at the prospect of the betterment of his city-state, as if such a thing was unimaginable.

"They figured out eventually that when Dorian took the throne, he was going to be an actual ruler," he snickered. "Their own children would back him in this. Now that angered them quite a bit, Anaxares. If you steal power and keep it for long enough, eventually you start to think you have a right to it."

He waved his good hand expansively.

"So they looked at the only other child of royal blood," he said. "Approached me. And I said: why not?"

"They thought they could rule through you," the diplomat said. "A mistake of some scale."

"Most of the I fed to dogs," the Tyrant smiled, that flash of sharp pearly teeth. "The others fell in line."

"You were twelve years old," Anaxares said, feeling old. "And already Named."

"I wasn't the Tyrant then," the boy said. "Just Kairos. Can you keep a secret, advisor?"

"No," the diplomat replied immediately. "I will report everything you say to the kanenas at the first opportunity, before my summary execution."

The villain grinned.

"Treachery is pleasing to the Gods Below," he said. "There's a crypt in Helike, under the palace, where the first foundations of the city were laid. There's a creature there, lying under a tomb of stone sculpted to look like someone holding a sword. There is a crack in the side just large enough that you can hear the thing inside whisper, if you press your ear to it."

Anaxares would have shivered, if years of walking with death in his belly had not effectively burned fear out of him. The words were casually spoken but the description felt more vivid than it should have. He could smell the dusty air, feel the unsettling whisper of an abomination against his ear.

"I don't know what it is. My father said it's the first king of Helike, still straddling the line between life and death," the Tyrant said. "The king, though, once said it is the god who once owned the ground the city was built on – tricked into the tomb and forever bound to give us advice."

"Advice?" the diplomat repeated.

"Prophecies," the boy said. "All of royal blood can ask one question if it, in our lifetime."

"And it told you you would rule?" Anaxares guessed.

The Tyrant laughed.

"It told me," he said, "that I would die when I turned thirteen. That there was nothing I could do to change this."

The boy smiled.

"It was," he said, "a great gift."

Looking down at his shaking hand, the Tyrant seemed lost in memory for a moment before he gathered himself.

"We spend so much of our lives, Anaxares, shackling ourselves. Avoiding doing this and that because others would frown upon it. Because it is wrong and wicked and unworthy. Once I knew there was only death ahead of me, I started doing what I wanted. I ceased censuring what I was to please others."

"The drow believed the same as you, when they embraced the Tenets of Night," the Bellerophon said. "And look at them now, Tyrant – packs of savages inhabiting the ruins of an empire. Censure Is Just, Law Is Necessary."

Glory To Peerless Bellerophon, Whose Laws Are That Of The People, he added silently.

"Your city is the mutilated remains of a people," the boy said. "That you wielded the knife yourself is the only thing setting you apart from the rest of Creation."

"We have no rulers, in Bellerophon," Anaxares said.

This time there was no need for him to speak the words taught to all of them as children, the capitalized praises learned before one could walk. This, he believed for himself. Because the Republic was flawed, deeply flawed, and he could admit this to himself even if he deserved death for it. But what it stood for was... greater than the sum of its faults.

"No crowns. No nobles. No Names. This is not an accident, Helikean, it is a statement. We are all of us free or we are none of us free. There is no middle ground."

"You've lived a heartbeat away from death all your life," the Tyrant said, "and still you don't quite get it, do you? You Bellerophans just traded one tyrant for fifty thousand. You don't get to decide who you are. Others do that for you."

The boy rose to his feet, stretching out gingerly. He looked almost fragile, thin and sickly under his red silken robes.

"When those nobles and generals came to whisper treason in my ear," he said, "I did not hesitate. Because I felt like usurping a throne, because I hated Dorian. I was curious to see if it could be done. I was going to die soon, anyway, and what did I care what followed that?"

Anaxares was not a warrior, or a large man. He was thirty and more familiar with wine than a hard day's work. For all that, looking at the boy, for a moment he was convinced he could snap his neck almost without effort. That the bones would break like a bird's, shatter like glass. Then he saw the eye, the damnable red eye, and the Tyrant was a looming titan looking down on him.

"So I did it," the boy hissed. "I crushed them and I stole the crown and I called the would-be puppeteers to heel. And when I turned thirteen, sitting on my throne as the Tyrant of Helike – I did not die. Because Fate isn't a path we must follow, Anaxares, it's a tug-of-war between the Gods."

He leaned closer.

"And sometimes, if you put your hands to the rope, you can tug it your way," he whispered.

The Named withdrew with unnatural agility, laughing. The intensity there had been to him was gone like mist in the sun. The Tyrant ripped out one of the banners that flew at every corner of his dais – his personal heraldry, a leering skull with a red eye on gold – and leapt down onto the wet grounds. The porters who'd been carrying the dais hastily slowed, not daring to drop the entire thing even as their muscles creaked lest their ruler be splattered with mud.

"Come along, advisor," the boy said. "We must speak with my general."

Anaxares followed. The soldiers, hard men and women in scale armour with swords and shield, turned into awed children whenever they saw the Tyrant. Some reached hesitantly for the hem of his silks, which the boy tolerantly allowed. There was no sign of discontent among them even after the pantomime that had been this campaign: in Helike, Tyrants did not fail. Not without betrayal or half the world set against them. They would follow the little madman into the fray without hesitation or doubt. The general they were seeking found them first, riding towards them. A woman, the diplomat saw, then his gaze lingered on her throat. Not that she had always been that.

"Sire," the general said, dismounting hastily and kneeling.

"General Basilia," the Tyrant said, patting her armoured shoulder affectionately. "The army is to cease retreating immediately."

Something feral flashed in the woman's eyes.

"We are to prepare for battle, then? The enemy is half a day's march away, we can still set the grounds."

The Named chuckled.

"There is no need to array our soldiers for a fight," he said. "Stay in a column. We will be marching on Atalante before nightfall."

She almost hesitated, Anaxares saw, but did not protest. Loyal, this one. To a boy more than half mad. Gods save them all. He should have brought the wine.

"As you command, sire," she said. "There is a farm not far from here, should I prepare it to accommodate you?"

"No need," the Tyrant said. "My advisor and I will be awaiting our friends on the field."

Without even the semblance of an explication, the boy strode away with the standard resting on his shoulder. The diplomat sighed and made to follow but he was stopped by the general, who put a gauntleted hand on his shoulder. She glared down at him.

"If he dies," General Basilia said, "you will follow him shortly. Screaming."

"Nine," Anaxares replied.

"What?" she said.

"The number of times I've been threatened with death today," the diplomat clarified. "Will we make it to ten before noon? It is an auspicious number, in Bellerophon."

He strode away after that, while she was still too surprised to protest. He found the Tyrant alone in a sprawling field of grass, gazing ahead. The boy hummed, as he approached.

"And now?" the diplomat asked.

"Now we wait," the Tyrant said.

It was mid-afternoon when the forces of Atalante arrived.

They were a sorry bunch to look at, compared to the soldiers of Helike. Citizen levies armed with spears and shields and decked in hardened leather, city and caravan guards who'd traded cudgels for swords, unarmoured conscripts with javelins and slings. Only the cavalry looked professional, nobles with long lances and chain mail. The mercenaries looked more fearsome, infantry from all parts of Calernia that dwelled in the mercenary villages surrounding the shores of Mercantis until hired by patrons. There were Ashurans there, he saw, with their curved bows and ornate armours. Levantines with painted faces and hooked swords, even Callowan knights with long banners who must have survived the Praesi purges. Behind him, the army of Helike remained in an orderly column and did not move. The commanders on the other side ordered a halt, but after most of an hour passed without anyone moving orders began being screamed along the Atalantian lines. In good order, the enemy began to advance again.

"They're not even sending an envoy to talk with me," the Tyrant complained.

"You murdered the last one," Anaxares said.

"It's still very rude," the boy said, rolling the wooden shaft of the standard between his palms. "They ought to have better manners than that."

The diplomat watched twenty thousand soldiers marching in his direction and wondered which one would kill him. Hopefully one with a sword. Spear wounds tended to kill slowly, he'd been told, unless something important was pierced.

"Last night, Malicia's hounds set foot in Penthes," the Tyrant said conversationally.

"May The Ground Open Up To Swallow The Base Penthesians," Anaxares replied out of habit.

"The city will be eating itself alive before a fortnight has passed," he said. "Nicae won't move until they've grown fat with Proceran silver and 'mercenaries', Delos will be dealing with the Stygian phalanx moving north. That leaves only our dear Atalantian friends and their escorts."

"Who you have decided to fight," the diplomat said. "Without your army."

"Oh, I could have had General Basilia tear those poor fools alive, if you'll forgive my language," the Tyrant said. "It wouldn't even have been very hard. That's how the Praesi do things, nowadays. Let tactics and preparation carry the day."

The frail boy's lips curled in distaste.

"And to think they were once the greatest among us."

"The Dread Empire is the most powerful it has been in centuries," Anaxares frowned.

"And their Empress plays shatranj with the First Prince across an entire continent, winning more often than not," the Named said. "For all that, they've lost their way."

The Bellerophan raised a sceptical eyebrow.

"It's not about winning, Anaxares," the Tyrant said. "It's about how you win."

The standard rolled again between the boy's palms as the enemy host crept ever closer.

"Even now, if I gave General Basilia the order I believe she could win this. It would be a victory, yes, but would it be a victory for Evil?"

"You are a villain," the Bellerophan said. "A victory for you is a victory for Evil."

"A mere clash between armies? No," he said. "It takes more than that. The war I am fighting has little to do with steel: I am soldier for the Gods Below in the game that will settle Creation. A point has to be made, a sense to the story."

"And what is the point of us standing on this field, watching death arrive?" Anaxares asked.

"Twenty thousand men march to end me," the Tyrant said. "They will break, because they are in my way. Watch, diplomat, and learn."

The boy drove the standard into the ground, flying his banner of one in the face of the host that spread across the plain.

"I am Kairos Theodosian," he laughed. "Tyrant of Helike. And I say that my Rule extends to even the sky. Come, servants of the Heavens. The Age of Wonders is not dead yet. Not while I breathe."

The cloud above thickened, more black than grey now. For a long moment nothing happened, and then lightning struck the soldiers of Atalante. Thunder clapped, the sky danced to the whims of a madman and Anaxares watched the largest army he had ever seen break apart at the seams. The Tyrant of Helike stood there, smiling.

His hand no longer shook.

Letouriste

Thanks! Have been waiting;)

*erraticerrata*

So Book III begins.

First update of the month, so here's the usual extra chapter (also linked in the extra chapter tab on the side menu):

<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2017/02/08/reign/>

It's titled "Reign" and is from the POV of Dread Empress Malicia. There's a new colour map in the "Art, Maps and Other" section, representing the political borders of all Calernian surface states.

jonnnney

I'm curious. Are the green parts in Praes, Levant, the Titanomachy, and the Kingdom of the Dead just meant to show forest or are they independent areas full of fey like the waning woods?

*erraticerrata*

Forest.

danh3107

Wew, I was dying there for a while.

Nanrotinan

Was I the only one refreshing the page for the past 2 hours every 20-30minutes? Looking forward to Wednesdays again!

darkening

Wow. That was one heck of a way to start the book. I can't wait to see how things ramp up from here. Thanks for the chapter.

RandomFan

And I remember the real reason why I hate the heroes yet again. Because for all that the villains love bland platitudes as much as the heroes, the heroes always get the trite ones. This is the ever-cliche zealot, but it's one that realizes his madness, and revels in it.

I'm curious about hell, though- in a world where it's a provable concept, why do so few ever think about it? Is it because heaven is just as bad in any who'd be a villain's eyes, or something else?

erraticerrata

I'm not sure where you're getting the hero hate, since none made an appearance in this chapter?

As for the Heavens/Hells that's a more complicated issue. Technically the Hells is where the devils are and the Heavens is where the angels are, in a physical sense. Good and Evil cultures believe that their souls go to their respective Gods after they die, unless angels/devils have a claim to them, but no one has ever passed on to the other side and remembered what was there so there's still a degree of uncertainty. Faith would be a pretty meaningless concept if the afterlife was a physical certainty.

RandomFan

It's just a lingering grudge against the lone swordsman. Destruction is made more insulting if the other party refuses to admit that's what they've done, and even in the end, he didn't *repent* of the right things. I don't know, maybe i'll get to see a truly good & competent hero this book- but most of the heroes in the last one failed one of the two.

Even the most destructive of villains have a more interesting perspective relative to the devastation inflicted, which just makes the grudge stick. Even heiress.

Lamora

Calling it right now. The Tyrant has already usurped Bellerophon in some way which is the reason that Anaxares hasn't been murdered by his mages – either by corrupting the mages or by some other explicitly Evil way. I base this on the way that the story keeps touching base on the fact that he's not dead yet from his stomach stone being strange – there's nothing special about Anaxares, so it ought to be something on the other end.

As another slightly more out there callout, I'm gonna say that Anaxares either is in line to gain a Name or the Tyrant is maneuvering him to be, so he can have another Named on his side. Probably something that's a perversion of his own ideology, like Oppressor or something. It's doubtful the Tyrant is keeping him alive purely as a whim.

Nivek

Diplomat

George

Oh wow, yeah, that's used to identify him a whole he'll of a lot.

.

I thought he would be called Advisor though since the Tyrant kept calling him that

dalek955

The Name of Chancellor is empty, and Praes doesn't want it anymore.

Letouriste

Hum? To me that looks like EXACTLY he did that purely on a whim,impressed by his reaction,finding some commun ground with him on his way of life.You're not a villain if you don't have people to show off around you:D...well that's not true but you get the idea;)

For belerophon,the key is the opinion of the mass,without ruler or people more knowledgeable than others this is easy to manipulate the opinion of the crow for your purpose.

Here Tyrant spoke about malicia:I think she somehow have way to influence this city.

Euodiachloris

Or, the Tyrant has worked out how to hack the magic connected to both the stone and the psychic (or whatever) connection with the kanenas back home. I think a hack job would be a good first step to corrupting he whole system, no?

nick012000

One of his Aspects is Rule, and he can use it to control even things like the weather. I wouldn't be surprised if he decided to take control of the stone so that he can set it off at his whim and ensure that it does not go off before then.

stevenneiman

My guess would be that he figured out some dramatic way to threaten the kanenas. We know that they have mind-reading powers, and I wouldn't be surprised if they decided not to do anything that might piss him off after a guided tour of the inside of his head.

Alternatively, he might have somehow taken over Bellerophon already. After all, they are used to taking orders and he has an Aspect that seems to be based entirely around doing that.

Jonnnney

It might be a proximity issue. When Anaxares was introduced it was mentioned that two of the 10 diplomats were kanenas and those two were the ones that he had to worry about, if he still had the ability to worry. The tyrant could have simply killed those two, rendered their connections null and void, or threaten to kill a large number of Belerephon citizens if Anaxares was killed.

The ability for individuals to read someone's mind from halfway across the country would be a bit overpowered in this universe because it would be simple to just make the connection between two servants and use them for real time communications anywhere in the world.

JackbeThimble

That seems like a weird choice. The only skills Anaxares seems to have are drinking, Doublethink and (presumably) poker, doesn't seem like someone who would be very useful as a minion. Also according to Black the thing that separates the Named from the NPCs is the sheer will to impose their will on the world. It's pretty obvious how The Tyrant earned his name but Anaxares seems like the polar opposite of a named.

Jon Babineau

On the other hand, sticking a Bellerophon(ian?) who pride themselves on not having Names with a Name is right up the alley of this guy.

Maybe create one for him somehow, something faceless and unimpressive. The Republican, or something.

Nivek

The thing that makes a Name is the power of a single choice. Anaxares chose to surrender fully to The Will Of The People during the poisoning's aftermath and became unnaturally calm when he did so. Also the story and culture of Bellerophon would support such complete surrender as the trigger for a Name

Kylen

I personally believe that his Free City is keeping him alive as a sort of viewing camera to keep an eye on what the Tyrant is up to.

JackbeThimble

Their anarchic system would seem to work against that kind of forward planning, unless all of the monitors came to the same conclusion it seems like it would only take one to decide to kill him and any who spoke against the decision would probably be opening themselves up to accusations of treason. I think it's more likely that whatever it was that protected the Tyrant from certain death has somehow extended it's protection over Anaxares.

Naeddyr

Personally, I think they just like good old Anaxares. As far as we know, he's full-on republican through and through, a jaded and blotchy believer, but a believer nonetheless.

pyrohawk21

Just a question, but what 'exactly' did you mean with the following couple of sentences?

'A woman, the diplomat saw, then his gaze lingered on her throat. Not that she had always been that.'

I've got several possible ideas, and they're probably good ones... Just wondering if it's 'Plot Important' or background information that hasn't been revealed yet but can at any time, or has been revealed but I've missed it.

Also loving this story 😊

erraticerrata

General Basilia is transgender and Anaxares noticed the Adam's apple.

nick012000

I assumed that "she" was just a eunuch, given the Ancient Greece theme that they've got going on.

nobodi12

I was assuming he saw a scar on the neck. Like the general had his head cut off and placed on a body he liked better.

Yitzi

Question: How does gender reassignment work on Calernia? Their tech level doesn't seem to be up to the task of hormone replacement, I don't think surgery alone will have the proper effect, and a magical solution (i.e. a transformations spell) seems like it would remove the Adam's apple as well.

Cicero

glad you are back, that was an nice opening chapter.

Cicero

on second thought, the tyrant and the diplomat are my favourite characters at the moment, since their stories to a degree mirror my own life. Weird how that goes.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

You must live an insanely unique life

Letouriste

...he's not the only one:/ me too can feel a kindred spirit in these characters:)

Morgenstern

Told that he will die in such and such a time // told that he will die whenever, expecting it any moment -> freedom in knowing death could happen any moment.

Not really "insanely unique" at all. You're just latching onto the wrong things it would seem. Death could happen to any of us any minute - there are many people who realize this, even when not seriously ill. But we do have things like e.g. cancer or birth defects that make doctors tell you you will probably not live beyond point X. People with such an illness will realize this truth even more easily, even though anyone can realize that they could at any moment of their lives have some accident happen to them. Car crash. Household accident (you won't believe how common those are..). Heart failure.. Whatever.

ayon96

Hi!

I have some questions.

On epilogue of book 2, Bard said she knew how lone swordsman story would have been in the future but wasn't he going to die since he summoned the angel.

And how strong are gods?

In Beast cursed killed a god and in this chapter there's a god trapped under Helike. Can Named really defeat a God? Compared to other things, how strong are they?

Iconochasm

There was some talk earlier, with the captured Deorai the woman at Summerholm, about a distinction between Gods and God's. Warlock has dissected several of the lower-case variety.

Iconochasm

"Gods and gods." Stupid presumptuous autocorrect.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

The Bard was explaining how Swordsman's life would have gone had he not taken a Name, IIRC

stevenneiman

The Gods (capital G) are the beings that originally built Creation. As I understand it, the only practical limits on their power are that they have trouble with other Gods and that they have agreed not to interfere too much in mortal affairs directly, leaving the matter in the hands of Named and their angels or demons and devils.

The other kind, gods (lower-case g) are beings that presumably are created by the cultures that worship them, such as the war spirit of the Broken Antler tribe. While they have power greater than most Named in most situations, with clever planning, sufficient power or narrative appropriateness (or some combination of the three) they can be brought down. I think they have power roughly on level with demons, though it is hard to judge from so little data on either group. Compared to that, the Gods have power that even angels pale in comparison to.

Aisaaax

I know it's super-late to give feedback, but I dislike the recent influx of interludes.

The narration picks up speed... And broken by an interlude. It picks up again... 2 chapters, and another interlude. Then 3 in a row.

Don't get me wrong, they're interesting in their own right. But they break my immersion in the story A LOT.

Hopefully, you don't overuse them like that later.

Tobias Arboe

Spelling mistakes:

"the boy had essentially built a massive dais"

"the boy had essentially built a massive dias*"

"Most of the I fed to dogs,"

"most of them* i fed to the dogs"

Naeddyr

dais is the correct spelling.

crazedmoth

And them is the correct word. The corrections are apparently the ones without asterisks.

Abaddon

No... The corrections are the ones WITH asterisks. The first example in the top comment just has the spelling from the story listed second with an asterisk for some reason. I'm assuming it's just a typo though since there's no need to assume which is which. The writing in question is just a quick scroll up and If you go look you'll see that "dias" and "the" are what's written in the chapter. That would make "dais" and "them" the corrections.

Gunslinger

Yes, Wednesdays are fun again. I love the Tyrant. Such a mad lunatic. Also what an op ability. Can he also command the gods below to cause earthquakes?

MagnaMalusLupus

The ability is powerful because he follows the groove worn into reality by his Name more closely than perhaps any other (that we've seen so far). He drinks deep from the well of Evil and finds it much to his tastes. He and Heiress would likely get along uncomfortably well.

NerfContessa

Especially if you look to the future and Kairos läßt words.

Remember this moment then. And enjoy it while it lasts.

Stop with the spoilers!!! You, Capt. Obvious, and someone else i can't think of right now are freaking ridiculous. I get that your post is 2 years old and this comment is mostly in the hopes that EE will delete your posts and that anyone who sees this going forward will choose NOT to post spoilers. It doesn't matter how vague they are, nobody enjoys them. Ffs... If you have to talk about how these early chapters relate to things later in the story go to Reddit or something(You know, places designated for those discussions? Places that have features such as hidden comments and posts until you CHOOSE to click on and look at them, spoiler tags, and active moderation that removed spoilers put in inappropriate places...), not here! It's insane how inconsiderate and rude a few people are on here. Between the people already mentioned and Warren Peace's dismissive, rude, and just generally hostile replies i amidst don't want to read the comments. I like to see what others were thinking at the time each chapter was posted though. It's getting to the point where I might just skip it though and that sucks. It's not cool that my(im gonna go out in a limb here and guess other people's as well.) enjoyment of the story is lessened because you just HAD to post your spoiler in response to a 3-6 year old comment. Why? It's not like the person your relying to is gonna read and engage with your response(Yes,I get the irony. Again this is mostly posted in the hopes that people who are tempted to do this in the future realize what a dick move it is and decide not to do it.).

haihappen

I don't think he necessarily commands the weather. As he said, he especially retreated with his army until there was a storm. This seems more like a move a bard would play: The villain, alone against an army, with a storm in the sky. OF COURSE lightning would strike.

But, his "Rule" (assuming its his aspect) could potentially extend not only to the people of his domain, but also earth and sky. That would make everything written a foreshadowing to a part of the plan: how that piece of land is haunted by storms often and he retreats only when their numbers were swelling to their limits.

He is like an mad evil bard. Using story tropes to instil fear and awe; Overcomplicated plan with a myriad of steps; manipulating everything to set up a grand stroke.

I kinda like the tyrant. As mad lunatics go, his motive and actions are somewhat relateable.

Also, the story would not be half as funny or interesting if the POV was the Tyrant himself. Anaxares is the designated witness, both by the Tyrant and the author.

stevenneiman

His Aspect is Rule. He explicitly stated that what was going on here was his command extending to the sky itself, and considering that he hasn't actually lied to anyone thus far I'm inclined to believe him.

Mental Mouse

Basically, he could only do something like calling down lightning, when it's suitably dramatic – that is, when he has a Story behind him. Given that, then sure, he can Rule the sky.

JackbeThimble

Clearly the Atalanteans should have known better than to send a ragtag army of conscripts and mercenaries against a professional army lead by a Named with only 2:1 odds. Not sure what they were thinking.

Letouriste

Well,given they are obviously not trained to war(apart the mercenaries,and they don't have command) I feel that's right in their alley to underestimate a named...

Jonnnney

I'd guess they were thinking, "I don't care about the lives of these conscripts and I only have to pay the mercenaries if they live. So I'm gonna send them out to weaken the Tyrant enough for him to be eventually defeated."

Even if the Helike army had won they still would have lost soldiers and they don't have the money or the people to replace those loses and Procer is eventually going to intervene directly.

stevenneiman

I don't think he has any influence over the Gods Below (who aren't allowed to interfere so directly as to control the weather). His power is to Rule, and he applies it directly to whatever is necessary to see his will to reality. All that happened here was a perfectly mundane but powerful storm, that appeared exactly when and where it was supposed to.

Euodiachloris

He nudged it into being Extra, Supremely Dramatic With Double Whammy™ care of his Name skills. 😊

Morgenstern

I'm not sure he even "called up" the storm – he might simply have gambled for a natural one, retreating until one was there ... and then used Rule on what was there, to designate who gets hit by the lightning. Much less "OP" (as some here think), if so.

Naeddyr

Welcome back, I missed you.

Shequi

Yay! It's back! Interesting prologue. So the Tyrant is *not* a practical evil Villain, but has more in common with Heiress and the Truebloods... and even a reason of sorts for it. Fascinating.

stevenneiman

The Truebloods are weak because they mix the ideologies. They think that if tradition is powerful, it will be even more powerful if they guide it with modern pragmatism and strategy. Kairos is an example of how the true power of traditional villainy comes from rejecting that pragmatism, and that it can achieve awe-inspiring results when it does. He just got Creation itself to destroy his foes for no more reason than because he told it to, and nothing the Truebloods have been trying has come close to that level of power.

Meanwhile, Black and Malicia have used pure pragmatism to render that level of power unnecessary, and achieved more subtle but equally potent results. The Truebloods fall short when they try to top the one Tyrant's raw power and madness, and the other Tyrant runs rings around them when they try for pragmatism and cleverness. They won't commit to one or the other, so they'll never succeed.

alianok1

I like how the ending of both chapters are similar but different, so is the Age of Wonders still going on?

Jon Babineau

The Tyrant sure thinks it is. Bring on the flying fortresses and invisible tigers!

Draconic

Thanks for the new chapter! It's been too long since the last one.

Also, there is something that's been bugging me for some time: Are Dread Emperor Traitorous (mentioned in book 2 chapter 8), and Dread Emperor Treacherous (mentioned in book 2 chapter 1) the same person? They seem remarkably similar, so it could be either a misspelled name, or two emperors, who chose similar names. I think Traitorous appears only in the quotes at the beginning of chapters, while Treacherous appears only in the chapters themselves.

Kylen

That's a good question. Maybe they are the same person, given we have evidence of a Emperor who was plotting against himself.

Dragrath

People are saying the Tyrant and the Heiress would get along but would they really? Conventional has little in the way of allegiance after all how much have the courts of Praes spent spilling their own blood?

Either way it is an interesting start curious how things will go there feels like far more variability at play than the last book had at this point...

Kirroth

I think that Tyrant and Heiress would have a strong aesthetic appreciation for the other's expression of Traditional Evil. But the thing about Traditional Evil is that it's about the obsessive pursuit of individual aspirations. Any alliance between the two would last exactly as long as their mutual goals aligned, be that a truce of an hour or a decades long political marriage. Then the simultaneous multi-layered Sudden Yet Inevitable Betrayals would go off.

Euodiachloris

I think the Tyrant would beat Heiress to the punch. He's way better at reading the room... And, the weather outside it, too.

JackbeThimble

Ideologically they appear to be aligned with each other but their personalities are pretty much polar opposites: Heiress is all about the schemes within schemes and a perfectly maintained mask that she never lets slip for a minute, whereas the Tyrant's whole character is based on spontaneity and seizing the evil day no matter the consequences.

stevenneiman

I don't think they are really that similar in end goals. Heiress uses the power of Evil as a tool in order to further her own ambitions of personal gain and success. Kairos detests that kind of thinking even more than Good, and crusades in the name of Evil for its own sake. I think he would rather go out with a bang and leave a scar the world will never heal from than rest on his achievements, while Akua is likely to go out that way but would never willingly sacrifice anything for a goal that doesn't benefit her personally.

DarkoNeko

"Most of the I fed to dogs," > them ?

...

Holy shit, he literally commanded a divine strike. Ho-ly-shit.

nick012000

So, I've been thinking for the last couple of weeks: under the paradigm of the world of A Practical Guide to Evil, America would be an Evil nation, wouldn't it? As Malicia thought in the previous chapter, "Ambition to rise was the beating heart of Praesi identity, it was who they were," and the same is true in America. It's a fundamental part of the American identity that anyone can rise to wealth and power, if they've got the skills and drive to do so. This is not quite true, of course, given how the wealthy and well-connected elite have acted to secure their wealth and power against usurpers, but that's now what the national legend is, and the hypocrisy of it also suits Evil anyway.

On a more day-to-day level, we've got a culture of conspicuous consumption that encourages people to follow their base desires and buy buy buy. Buy on impulse, buy to display status, buy to satiate their desire for food or sex or luxury. Oftentimes, we even approach our religions or relationships with other people that way – corporations refer to their employees as “human resources” for a reason, and our strong culture protecting of protecting “freedoms” means that there's strong cultural forces pushing against judging people for their personal lifestyles and choices. Like the Tyrant said in this chapter, “Avoiding doing this and that because others would frown upon it. Because it is wrong and wicked and unworthy. Once I knew there was only death ahead of me, I started doing what I wanted. I ceased censuring what I was to please others.”

And then you've got the Elites, who build fences out of regulations to hamstring small competitors from becoming threats to their positions. Whose political elites in Washington are all on the take – only really varying who they're on the take from. Who constantly grasp for more, more, more – more power, more money, more authority, maybe even more children to rape if you believe the rumors about pedophile rings in DC.

Also, since I just thought of it while I was taking a shower: Even the American military fits into the Evil mold, with its reliance on gadgets and gizmos instead of boots on the ground. It's a large part of why the earlier parts of the Iraq War were such a clusterfuck.

Morgenstern

... of American ideology, NOT actual identity (anymore). There's a difference... Realistically, the game has been rigged for decades and the American Dream seems mostly dead or undead.

Morgenstern

Thus... i wouldn't use “identity” because that coalesces more around what really is there.

In the rest, I very much agree with you 😊

Ethesis

I'd love to have the diplomat discover the Tyrant had removed the stone.

This is such a great opening chapter.

James

I presume that the kanenas have authority to order other kinds of death, in response to stone tampering.

CorpseMoney

Goddamn I love this series.

I didn't expect to find the story on the part relating to the diplomat and the tyrant to be that interesting and unique to read though.

Maybe I am just more of a sucker for war stories instead of individual battles that have been more often in the last few chapters.

I hoped there is more story parts about them in the future though.

Louise

Oooh, hello again, Erraticerrata! Welcome back... and thank-you for bringing back your delightful story.

linnilalartyr

This Bellerophan guy is intersting somehow.

Why I always laugh when he mention his italic character thought is weird to my ownself.

Which I should feel pity for him when his will is not his and must thought for the people.

But that habit is hilarious somehow.

And this line of the tyrant to the punch. Oh~~~~

"and still you don't quite get it, do you? You Bellerophans just traded one tyrant for fifty thousand. You don't get to decide who you are. Others do that for you."

Exec

"His remains would be on trial for years after the initial execution."

That's such a hilariously dark line, Anaxares is a really fun POV character.

A part of me hopes that he survives this entire war against all odds, just because he's so certain of his demise. The Gods seem to like that kind of irony.

Aotrs Commander

Showmanship.

I respect the Tyrant. He's not as cool as Cat or Black, but frag damn if he doesn't have that wonderful, cheerful sense of style and presentation. Sure, he's argueably just as bad as Akua, in impracticality, but he has that special something she doesn't.

burguulkodar

Love the Tyrant. What is it with evil children that attracts me, I wonder? But he is bold, rebel and daring, and I like it. A lot.

So for all intents and purpose Villains like Heiress and Kairos get a buff simple because they follow the traditional villain formula in that it's almost nonsensical in how they achieve results. Even if it doesn't make sense you do it because you're a villainous soul like Overlord? Matter of fact a lot of the Dread Emperors and Tyrants remind me of Overlord.

Chapter 1: Right

"Do not make laws you do not intend to enforce. Allowing one law to be broken with impunity undermines them all."

– Extract from the personal journals of Dread Emperor Terribilis II

Evening Bell had just rung and the room was now lit with candles.

Most of the Southpool eldersmen – the ones involved in my little visit, anyway – had extended invitations for me to stay in their own homes, but I had politely declined. Governess Ife would have those under watch, for the first time in years. After the Conquest eldermen assemblies had been made toothless by the near-absolute powers granted to Imperial governors, an abrupt fall for men and women who had once been a power to rival the guilds and the nobility. Their newfound irrelevance had allowed them to survive the discreet purges that had gone through all cities under direct Praesi occupation, which the governors were only now learning had been a mistake. A mistake driven by culture, as it happened. There was no equivalent to eldermen in the Wasteland, where power inside the larger cities was always in the sole hands of the ruling High Lord. Black had apparently been of the opinion that time would smother the institution on its own without any need for blood: Callowans born without having ever known the assemblies would not be inclined to defer to them, particularly when their old powers were in the hands of others.

He'd only been half-right. In Laure – where the guilds and House Fairfax had always been much stronger – the assemblies were already dead and buried before I was born. In Southpool, though, it was a different story. The Counts of Southpool had long been weakened by their proximity to the seat of a beloved monarchy, and the city was not strong enough in trade for the guilds to have a major presence. Governess Ife, now on her third mandate ruling the city, had found the opposition to several of her toll stations and extraordinary taxes to be strong and exceedingly well-organized. There had been riots, and at first she'd backed down after manoeuvring so the manner of it would not make her lose face. Then she'd quietly begun eliminating the most respected of the eldermen, breaking the assembly's influence one corpse at a time. Like most forms of Callowan resistance after the Conquest, the enterprise had been doomed from the start. The eldermen of Southpool were now a pale shadow of what they'd once been, unable to mount any opposition worth the name.

But oh, they wanted to.

When I'd had Ratface contact them through intermediaries, they'd accepted my offer without even listening to all the terms. They were lucky I wasn't out to screw them, because it would have been child's play. I wasn't exactly a great admirer of eldermen assemblies – the way eldermen were appointed by the vote of other eldermen made them too much like a knock-off nobility for my tastes – but I needed a check on the authority of governors and they were my most palatable option. It was better than letting the guilds have the reins, anyway. Fairfax kings had spent centuries locking the guilds out of direct political power, and in my opinion they'd been right to. Whenever the guildmasters got a scrap of authority they immediately used it to forced every commerce they could under their thumb, which filled their coffers but also broke smaller traders. Harrion, the owner of the tavern I'd once worked at, had always held the guilds in disdain. He'd been one of the few people in Laure I'd actually liked, so I supposed his opinion might have coloured mine.

The tavern I was currently hiding out in reminded me of the Rat's Nest quite a bit, actually. The wooden walls were just as rickety, the floor creaked like a dying man and the smell of soured wine and vomit was so ingrained it would remain even if the place was put to the torch. I'd preferred dipping in the lake to using the only bathtub they had here, judging I'd come out of that adventure rust-tinged. I hadn't drawn attention in doing so: like in Laure, most everyone living by the lake used it to bathe. Without armour and with only a knife for weaponry, I'd been able to keep my presence quiet. Deoraithe, even half-bloods, were rare outside of Daoine but in this part of the city people knew better than to ask questions. The only reason I'd gotten a few looks was currently entering my room, closing the door behind him. Hakram had put on a cloak but there was no hiding his height or his fangs: Adjutant was the tallest orc I'd ever met, with only Juniper coming close.

"I have it," Hakram said, taking out a thick leather-bound book from under his cloak and dropping it on the table.

I put aside The Death of the Age of Wonders, the treatise I was now reading for the second time. Written by Dread Empress Malicia, I'd thought I could glimpse something of how her mind worked through her words. All I'd gotten, though, was that she was a firm believer in checks and balances when it came to the nations of Calernia. That a woman who'd claimed the Tower could believe foreign alliances should be determined by shared interests instead of alignment to Good and Evil was a fascinating departure from the norm, but it taught me little about Malicia as a woman. Dismissing the thought, I cast my eyes on the book Hakram had brought and flipped it open. Columns of numbers and words, scribbled so poorly even my own handwriting was legible in comparison.

"Won't that make for pleasant reading," I sighed.

"I already took a look, it's why I'm late," the orc said. "Here, let me."

He moved the pages with a carefulness that was almost comical, given the size and thickness of his fingers. About halfway through he ceased, and laid a finger on a particular number. Three thousand golden aurelii, spent on...

"Furniture repairs," I snorted. "Maybe she does have a sense of humour."

"I've found the carpenters that supposedly did the work," Hakram said. "Elderwoman Keyes knew them. I have sworn statements they did no such thing."

"And we have the ledger from the Guild of Assassins, accounting for the three thousand aurelii," I said quietly. "That should be enough."

Barely a fortnight after claiming my fiefdom in Marchford I'd tasked Ratface to get in touch with all the so-called Dark Guilds of Callow, the criminal mirror to the merchant organization. I really shouldn't have been surprised he was already on speaking terms with all the major ones. The Assassins had been reluctant at the idea of letting me claim a ledger, even if it was to be used against a Praesi. Black had tacitly sanctioned the existence of all the Dark Guilds after the Conquest, preferring limiting them to quotas rather than attempting an eradication that would drive them into the arms of heroes. The Assassins had quibbled until I'd offered them a calm reminder that Tribune Robber could be pulled from his current assignment at any time. The malevolent little shit was starting to have a reputation and I wasn't above using it for my purposes. Still had cost me a small fortune to buy the ledger off of them, which mattered a lot more now than it would have a year ago. Marchford was haemorrhaging coin with no solution in sight, but that was a problem I'd return to chewing on tomorrow. Tonight I had a governess to deal with.

"She didn't have time to cook the books?" I said. "Better than this, I mean."

"She let Heiress' people take care of the official ones," Hakram said, amused. "But she didn't trust Akua with her personal records."

Ah, Praesi backstabbing. The gift that kept on giving.

"You worked quickly," I praised.

He shrugged.

"I knew what we needed, I just had to Find it," he said.

I hummed. Adjutant's second aspect, one I still wasn't sure what to think about. There was no denying how useful it had turned out to be – Hakram now frequently stumbled onto exactly what we were looking for, as long as it was feasible for him to do so – but relying too much on aspects was a good way to earn a one-way trip to the graveyard. I'd encouraged him to use it sparingly, but the both of us were drowning in responsibilities these days: there was a reason he'd come into the aspect in the first place. I changed the subject to more current concerns.

"The Gallowborne are in the city?" I asked.

"As of an hour ago," Adjutant said. "They'll be noticed soon, if they haven't been already."

"I don't mind if word spreads," I grunted. "It'll discourage Ife's household troops from getting any ideas."

The eldersmen had assured me that the city guard would stay out of it, but Ife's own men were from the Wasteland. The governess was from a family sworn to the High Lords of Nok, with minor but very old holdings – held since since before the Miezens kind of old. That tended to breed unusually strong loyalties in Praesi.

"One last thing," Hakram said. "Heiress' envoys, they're led by an old friend of ours."

I raised an eyebrow.

"Can't be Hawulti, she hasn't set foot in Callow since our pleasant chat in Liesse," I said.

As the heiress to Nok, the Soninke would have been the natural choice for an envoy here.

"Fasili," the orc said. "Slow learner, that one."

The heir to Aksum. Apparently his aunt bluntly stating he was expendable in a scryed conversation with me had driven him even deeper into Heiress' camp. Unfortunate, that. Aksum sat on half a dozen emerald mines, the largest in Calernia, and it had grown rich off of them. Fucking Praesi, rolling in gold and gems when Marchford wasn't even breaking even.

"Let's gift him a reminder, then," I said. "Come along, Adjutant. Let's have a talk with Governess Ife."

The ranks of the Gallowborne had swelled in the six months that had passed since the end of the Liesse Rebellion. They were not a single company any longer: they numbered four hundred at the moment, the members still handpicked by the former Captain Farrier – now a full Tribune. Still, after a conversation with Juniper I'd forced his hand when it came to selection: there were Praesi now, if only a few, and orcs. Keeping anybody but my countrymen out of the ranks of my personal guard would have sent the wrong message, on that much I agreed with the Hellhound. About seven out of ten were still Callowan, though, and some of those recruits were fresh off the battlefields of the rebellion.

Not all of them had fought on the Empire's side.

The first time I'd gotten a report that a former member of the Countess Marchford's retinue had tried to enrol in the Fifteenth, I'd poured myself a stiff drink. My initial thought that this would be an isolated occurrence was quickly proven wrong, as hardened soldiers who'd been ready to run out the Empire not a year ago kept on flocking to my banner. Juniper had been of the opinion that they should taken in and then dispersed across the legions that garrisoned Callow, never allowed to gather enough they would be an issue if they rebelled again. Aisha had been more nuanced, suggesting that folding some into the Gallowborne first as a sign of goodwill would gain me approval with the people of Marchford. It was Ratface who'd been the dissenting voice. Take them all in, he'd said. Otherwise you've a city full of veterans with no one to fight for. Yet. He'd been right. The others hadn't liked it but I'd put my foot down. The Fifteenth filled its rank to the brim before the first month had passed, which was when the first problem had come. We had our four thousand men and still recruits kept showing up.

Word had spread outside of Marchford, and the retinues of half the lords and ladies who'd fought in the rebellion had come to my city. I could not scry Black to ask him for advice, as he was in the Free Cities at the moment and scrying spells tended to break up over the mountains, but to all our surprise it was Nauk who found a solution. Or rather, failed to see where the problem was. Why do we give a shit if we're over four thousand? he'd said. Our charter's incomplete. Every legion, when founded, was granted a charter by the Empress – truthfully the Black Knight, but he did so in her name. It granted the soldiers right to pay, specified right of recruitment and formalized the right to be equipped by the Imperial forges at Foramen. It also specified the size of the legion. The Fifteenth though, unlike any other legion in living memory, had been raised as a half-legion of two thousand legionaries. That part of the charter had been left unspecified as a consequence, which Nauk took to mean there was no hard limit on our numbers.

A reminder that Black always, always played the long game.

The Fifteenth Legion now consisted of a little over six thousand men and was still growing. Juniper had hastily brought in recruits from Praes to balance the composition of the legion, but now over half was made up of Callowans. My general regularly made pointed comments about their conflicting loyalties, and she was right to. I'd realized too late that those men and women had not stopped fighting for their rebellion: they simply thought they'd joined the banner of a quieter, more successful one. In Praes, these days, I was seen as a symbol of the permanence of the Tower's rule over the former Kingdom. In Callow, though? Countess, they called me, but I knew that some of them really meant Queen. This was trouble, in the same sense that fire was warm or Heiress was a megalomaniac. Regardless, if there was currently an advantage to having recruits pouring in from all over Callow it was that some of my Gallowborne were familiar with Southpool. They knew their way around the palace.

"We'll have control of the grounds before you get to the hall," Tribune Farrier said quietly from my side.

The two of us were peering at the silhouette of the former residence of the Counts of Southpool. My personal guard has moved swiftly and professionally to secure the palace, after a relative of the eldermen had unlocked a servant entrance. The Gallowborne would be outnumbered, but it was unlikely it would actually come to a fight tonight. Their presence was largely meant as a deterrent for when desperation struck. And even if it comes to that, they've fought harder things than men. After Marchford and Liesse, there was precious little that would make the Gallowborne flinch.

"Try to avoid incidents," I said. "I'd like this to go as cleanly as possible."

Or I'd have to answer to the Ruling Council for the mess. While I did own a winning coalition of the votes there, I was not beyond questioning. Baroness Kendal – Anne, as she insisted I call her now – had not lost her principles with her surrender and Sister Abigail abhorred violence of any sort. The two Praesi members had been uncomfortable at the idea of what was going to unfold here tonight, though both were owned by High Lords opposed to the man who owned the governess. That had been enough to make it a unanimous vote, without the appearance of Malicia's representative. The Dread Empress had sent a messenger to cast her vote anyway, without saying how she'd known what the motion put to the council would be.

"My officers are steady," Tribune Farrier said calmly. "There'll be no fuckups, Countess."

"I've come to expect as much, John," I said, clapping his shoulder.

He blushed. He always did, when I called him by his given name. A part of me was still girlishly delighted I could have that effect on people.

"Forgive me," he said, "but I still believe you should take a full line."

"There's no one in that hall for me to be afraid of," I said amusedly. "A tenth is more than enough. Besides, Hakram will be there."

"With all due respect, ma'am," he said, "Lord Adjutant is a target too. It's been a month since they tried to knife him, we're overdue another attempt."

If you'd told me two years ago that assassination attempts on my closest friend in the world would become a somewhat tiresome routine, I would have been fairly sceptical. And yet, here I was, wondering how far the next hired killer would make it before someone but a crossbow bolt in them. The last one hadn't even made it past Apprentice's wards before getting put down. Robber had managed to get a betting pool running without having been in Marchford for months, I assumed through the magical power of being a vicious little bastard. Hopefully the next one would make it past the second line of defence, I had twenty denarii riding on it.

"A tenth will be enough," I repeated dryly. "Hakram, how are we looking?"

A green cabinet with a cloak slapped on top it, also known as Adjutant, stirred in the distance.

"Like we could use a bath from a place where fish don't swim," he said.

"That's insubordination, it is," I complained.

"I'll get away with it," he shrugged. "My commanding officer's a soft touch."

"I'm surrounded by insolence, John," I solemnly told the tribune. "What did I ever do to deserve this?"

"I'm told you flipped off an angel," he replied frankly. "That'd probably do it."

"That's..." I started. "Well, kind of true I guess. Still."

I strode away, my escorting tenth falling behind me seamlessly as Hakram came to my side. The tall orc had put on his legionary armour before we set out, making the cloak even more useless a disguise than before. I'd not bothered with plate myself, keeping to a simple cloth tunic dyed in pale blue. The cloak, though, was the one I was becoming known for. The same one Black had given me years ago, now adorned with strips from the standards of the enemies I'd beaten. It swirled dramatically behind me as I kept a quick pace towards the banquet hall of old fortress of the counts of Southpool. I had a sword at my hip, now, as well as the knife I'd taken my first life with. Overconfidence had killed more powerful villains than me. The Gallowborne had cleared the corridors of everyone when they'd seized the palace, so we moved without contest. The hall I was looking for was easy enough to find, as it had once served as the room where audiences were held: it was dead at the centre of the structure. The doors to it were already open, though I whimsically wished they hadn't been. This reminded me of another night, in Laure, when I had been on the precipice of the changes that would lead me where I now stood. A lifetime ago, it felt like.

By the sound of it, the guests had yet to notice anything was going on. I made a note to compliment Tribune Farrier on the efficiency of his men. I strolled into the room casually, casting a steady look around. Twenty people in attendance, with Governess Ife at the head of the table. Servants stood to the side in silence, in the Praesi way. Most of the guests were Callowan, though I recognized Fasili as the governess' right side. A Taghreb sat by him, a young woman I did not know. Hard eyes and a scar on her face hinted at a retainer, and one not unfamiliar with violence. Three of the eldersmen I'd struck my deal with were in attendance, clustered near the end of the table. Like servants. They were the first to notice our presence, as Hakram pulled down the hood of his cloak and the Gallowborne fanned out behind me. For another few heartbeats the conversation continued, then awareness spread and the hall turned silent as a grave.

"Get out," I said. "Now."

When Black had stood in my place, he'd used his Name to spread fear in the crowd. I didn't bother, though I'd finally managed to learn the trick to it. The Callowans rose in barely-veiled panic, streaming by the blank-faced silhouetted of the Gallowborne as they fled. Fasili and his retainer only rose after he finished his cup of wine.

"Governess," the heir to Aksum said, slightly bowing his head. "Always a pleasure."

"The pleasure is all mine," Ife replied with a gracious smile. "Until next time, Lord Fasili."

The Soninke moved unhurriedly, pausing before me.

"Lady Squire," he said icily.

The Taghreb retainer cast a wary eye on me, hand falling to the sword at her hip.

"Fasili," I said. "Do be careful on the way back. I'm told Liesse has a banditry problem."

"A temporary state of affairs," he said.

"More than you know," I smiled pleasantly.

I turned back to the governess, eyeing her curiously. A middle-aged Soninke, her frame still hinting at the slenderness of her youth but now grown thicker. Her eyes were not quite golden but very close. A sign of old blood, Aisha had told me.

"Lady Squire," she greeted me. "You honour me with your presence."

"Governess Ife," I said, grabbing a seat and dragging it at the end of the table facing hers.

The sound of wood scraping on stone almost made her wince. I plopped myself down, then fished out the dragonbone pipe Masego had gifted me. Calmly, under her befuddled gaze, I stuffed it with wakeleaf from a small packet I got from a pocket sown into my cloak. I produced a pinewood match and struck it on the table, lighting the pipe. I inhaled a mouthful of grey smoke and spat it out, carelessly tossing the match into an abandoned cup of wine. There was a long moment of silence, broken only by Hakram failing to entirely smother a chuckle.

"Should I arrange for the servants to bring you a meal?" the Soninke finally said. "I have some of the finest cooks of the provinces in my employ."

I inhaled the smoke, then let out a stream of it. The wakeleaf had become a guilty pleasure of mine, in the last few months. Aisha usually sprinkled a handful of leaves in her tea, as they sharpened wit, but Apprentice had informed me they could be smoked as well. They were, unfortunately, quite expensive. Grown only in Ashur, having been brought from the other side of the Tyrian Sea when the Baalites first founded the cities that would become the Thalassocracy. I used them sparingly as a consequence.

"The night I first became the Squire," I said, "I stood in a hall much like this one."

There was another long silence.

"The story is well known, in some circles," she said, face without expression.

"Mazus wanted to be Chancellor," I mused. "Ambitious, though back then I did not understand exactly how ambitious he truly was. I do not think you suffer from the same flaw, Governess Ife."

"I do not understand your meaning, Lady Squire," she said, eyes wary.

"Greed, you see, I can tolerate," I said. "There's probably been rulers that didn't skim off the top, but I imagine they were in the minority. It's an old sin, that one. As long as it doesn't get out of hand, I can live with it."

"An enlightened attitude," the governess murmured. "If your visit is meant to be a... reminder of the virtues of moderation, your warning has been received."

Hakram calmly placed the ledger on the table, pushing aside a plate filled with pheasant. I would give this to Governess Ife, the fear only showed in her eyes – and even then, only for a moment. I spewed out another mouthful of smoke, letting the haze wreath my face like a grey crown.

"A thousand aurelii a head," I said. "A point in your favour, that you bought Callowan instead of importing specialists from the Wasteland. Even if what you bought is murder."

"I've no idea what you are referring to, my lady," she said.

"We have the matching ledger from the Guild of Assassins," I replied.

Ife closed her eyes.

"My term is at an end, then," she said calmly. "I will be gone by the end of the fortnight. Will the replacement you have chosen require quarters before that?"

"So you don't have a mage in Laure," I said, cocking my head to the side. "Not one that can scry, anyway."

I inhaled from the pipe, letting the wakeleaf quicken my blood. I'd thought, that same night in Laure, that when the time came I would enjoy this. That it would feel like justice. It feels like killing, I thought as I blew the smoke. And less cleanly than if I'd used a sword.

"As of last night, the Ruling Council has determined that acts committed as an Imperial governor fall under the jurisdiction of Callowan authorities," I said.

She was a clever woman, the governess. She did not need for me to explain it any further.

"It would be a mercy," she said, "to allow me poison."

"It would be," I agreed quietly. "But this is Callow, Governess. We hang murderers here."

The Gallowborne moved forward.

"String her up," I ordered.

She did not struggle as my soldiers took her away. I closed my eyes and leaned back in the seat. Eventually my pipe ran out and I emptied the ashes on a cooling plate.

"It was necessary," Hakram said.

He was standing behind me, close enough to touch. He didn't though. He knew me better than that, had seen me in this kind of mood before.

"When's the last time we did the right thing, instead of the necessary one?" I asked tiredly.

"You think this wrong?" he said. "She commissioned murders, even if she did not wield the blade herself. By our laws, she has earned death."

"I don't think it was personal for her," I said, eyes drifting to the ceiling. "She was just consolidating power. Like I'm doing right now, Hakram. If she deserves to hang, don't I?"

"She was breaking the law," the orc gravelled. "You are enforcing it."

"The only reason I don't break laws anymore is because I make them, now," I scoffed.

Adjutant laughed softly.

"And that disturbs you?" he asked. "You have toiled to earn that prize since before we ever met."

"There's nothing right about this," I finally said. "I didn't win tonight because I'm better than her. I'm just more powerful. I have a bigger stick, so I decide how it goes."

"Humans," Hakram mocked gently. "You speak that as if it were a tragedy, instead of the first truth of Creation: the strong rule, the weak obey."

"I thought," I said quietly, "that we could be better than that."

"Justifications only matter to the just," he gravelled.

I half-smiled. My own words, thrown back at me. And yet...

"I burned men alive, at Three Hills," I said. "Hundreds of them."

"Your enemies," he said. "Soldiers."

I let out a long breath.

"I have done, Hakram, terrible things," I said. "Ugly things. I'll do more, before this is over. If it is ever over."

Once, when we'd talked under moonlight, the orc had compared trying to change the world to pushing a boulder up a mountain. And then watching it roll down the other slope. It doesn't work that way, though, I thought. There is no summit to the mountain. You just keep pushing until your body gives, and you're the first thing the stone crushes on the way down. If that was all it could be, though, if all you could ever do was buy some time...

"I made those decisions for a purpose," I said. "I did not cover this land with corpses just to change the flavour of tyranny that rules it. If I don't make it better now, when will I?"

I clenched my fingers, then unclenched them.

"We hang murderers, in Callow. Even the ones Black struck deals with."

I slid back the pipe into my cloak.

"Get a message to Ratface," I said. "He is to prepare for the dismantling of the Guild of Assassins."

If any of you are interested in light novels and chinese web serial (which I'm guessing will be quite a few of you, given how often the Guide pops up in the redsits dedicated to both of those) I'm giving a shout-out to a site called volare novels, which translates quite a few of those.

If you're looking for something in a similar vein to the Guide, though of course with the usual transmigration/reincarnation shenanigans so common in the genre, then Poison Genius Consort (<http://volarenovels.com/poison-genius-consort/>) or Great Demon King (<http://volarenovels.com/great-demon-king/>) are some you might find interesting.

George

Thanks for the recs, and for another amazing chapter!

Alegio

Thanks, i have Belén looking for something good to tras 😊

Alegio

Good to read* freaking autocorrect :v

Vortex

I love novel translations from Asia and I have actually plugged your web serial a few times on the subreddit that handles them: /r/noveltranslations.

If you enjoyed poison genius consort, take a look at lightning empress maid. It's something I found recently, and enjoyed greatly. There is a lot of stuff that is pretty similar to poison genius consort on there too (descent of the Phoenix, genius doctor: black belly miss, and a few others) but I thought lightning empress maid was fun, light, and original.

<http://www.novelupdates.com/series/lightning-empress-maid/>

linnilalartyr

I super like Poison Genius Consort. It's pretty good.

Gunslinger

Epic stuff. I love how well Catherine has come into her role. Also what name will Robber come into? He can't be an assassin cause of The Assassin. Maybe a new Role that's a claimant role to Assassin

PingleBerry

Thats what he wants you to think

Jon Babineau

That Fucking Crazy Goblin.

It doesn't roll off the tongue as easy as Squire, but he's happy enough with it.

Hakurei06

He may be the first in Creation to turn Little Shit into a Name. Hmm, I'm not sure if there's a precedent for a three word name, so I'll leave it at that.

RoflCat

@Hakurei: He's 'Robber', as Hakua mentioned it's a thief name.

Thief -> Assassin

And given that 'story' can be made into a Name (as Akua seems to be doing), Robber might as well become Eyehunter (instead of headhunter)

Wouldn't that be something?

Warlock (Masego)
Assassin (Robber)
Captain (Hakram)
Scribe (Rat Face)

A part of me think Ranger might finds Catherine intriguing if she ever meets with Captain and hear of that "she's like Black and Hye's child" comment.

Under the Dread QUEEN of Callow.

Euodiachloris

I think just Crazy Bastard will work... xD

George

Ah cmon, it's gotta be Robber. The question is if, once we are certain by some means that he's claimed that Name, we ever find out just *when* he claimed it!

Dragrath

That requires him to not have a name already remember the words of Black.

"I suspect they do have names" The goblins are secretive very so if they had a name they would likely never use it unless they had to and in that case no witnesses...

Mike E.

We've been told by the author that the person holding the Name Assassin has been seen on screen. They just weren't identified as such...

darkening

Assassin being robber would require a rather high level of mobility as assassin was at the gathered rebel army to kill off the rebel's crown claimant shortly before the battle of liesse. Teleportation has been stated to be impractical, and while name shenanigans are possible, as black said about the Bard, powerful abilities like being able to show up wherever you were needed to assassinate someone would have an unpleasant price.

mgmtheo

So very very happy to be back with Catherine again. Robber also continues to be one of my favourite characters.

Emposter

"I part of me was still girlishly "
Only error I saw on my quick read through. Either "I was still girlishly" or "Part of me was still girlishly". I suspect it started as one, then you deleted it and wrote what's currently there.

Shequi

Another: "before someone but a crossbow bolt" should be "put" of course.

WealthyAardvark

Typo:

loyalties, and Missing space

Lamora

That's because Robber was Assassin the ENTIRE TIME, BABY.

Soronel Haetir

Given Assassin's duties I would think Robber's position with Cat would be awfully limiting. Assassin needs to be able to move around without comment. And that means not holding positions where those around them in a military chain of command would note an absence. Robber might not be right with Cat this moment but he's been tasked with a job by Cat.

For example, at the end of the last book we know Robber was supposed to be somewhere around Liesse but we were also told that Assassin would take care of the former Baroness Dormer if she refused the appointment.

I tend to think Assassin is Lieutenant Abase (the Blackguard officer we've seen a couple times), though that to is a limiting position in terms of freedom to move around. But at least being in a personal guard rather than the Legions proper would likely mean there is a somewhat looser chain of command, or he simply reports that he has been detached by Black for some task.

Soronel Haetir

Another factor that I believe cuts against Robber actually being Assassin is the way Cat met Robber at the War College. That seems like a posting that would tie a person to one place far too much. Robber had been there for weeks or months at least (probably more as he did graduate). A student at the college isn't likely to be able to ditch classes to go off on other business.

And while a Name can keep someone looking young there are still signs of age. I seem to recall a statement at some point that Robber looked young even for a goblin out in the world.

danh3107

It only gets harder as you climb the tower Catherine, it only gets harder.

Hakurei06

Nah, the first step is the hardest, they say. This is just rest... drudgework.

Hakurei06

Blegh... that was terrible.
**The rest is just... dudgework.

kgyl21

"before someone but a crossbow bolt in them" ^put^

Letouriste

Interesting chapter:)
Guys, forget about robber awakening a name, he is badass enough like that, he don't need that... apart maybe at the end of the novel, like nauk maybe;)

nipi

Hell probably "bump" into someone in a dark alley, stab them and take their name. Which so happened to be Robber.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

An error that no one else bothers to point out that drives me fucking mad:

[Blockquote]"I made those decisions for a purpose," I said. "I did not cover this land with corpses just to change the flavour of tyranny that rules it. If I don't make it better now, when will I?"

I clenched my fingers, then unclenched them.

"We hang murderers, in Callow. Even the ones Black struck deals with."[/blockquote]

WHO SPOKE THE SECOND LINE?????

The context suggests Catherine, but the formatting says concretely, without any doubt that it was Hakram. I do not think the author means for Hakram to say that line. This story is chock full of this error and it stops me in my tracks every single time, because I need to THINK about it, figure out who was actually speaking, then go back and reread to get into the flow again. It's a really simple thing to get right, and it would go a long way toward making this story look professional.

Here's one possible correct way to write it (out of many possibilities). This changes the original text the least, though there might be other ways to get closer to the author's original intent:

[Blockquote]"I made those decisions for a purpose," I said. "I did not cover this land with corpses just to change the flavour of tyranny that rules it. If I don't make it better now, when will I?"

I clenched my fingers, then unclenched them. "We hang murderers, in Callow. Even the ones Black struck deals with."[/blockquote]

Making it all one big paragraph is another possibility. Re-formatting completely creates dozens more.

George

Personally I think it's clear and that the story is a lot cleaner and smoother to read without tags on every single piece of dialogue.

KageLupus

Actually, if you look at the rest of that scene I am pretty sure that there is an indicator every time the speaker switches. There is also an indicator that Catherine is still speaking after a longer thought, on the order of a full paragraph. Cat says something, has an extended thought, and then says something else with an "I said" thrown in to keep the flow going.

But right at the end there she says a line, makes a gesture (that only takes a single sentence) and then continues her statement. It read as pretty obvious to me that Cat was speaking the whole time at the end there, and breaking it up into several short statements like that gives it more of a punch.

Alexander LeakingPen Hollins

no, action paragraph followed by new dialogue is ALWAYS supposed to be a new paragraph. We haven't been given any indication in text or dialogue that there is a new speaker, we assume it's still Cat. The formatting does NOT say otherwise. Not sure where you learned this "rule" but it's incorrect.

Julie Boraks

Soronel Haetir

"Find" sounds an awful lot like "Seek". Actually Find might be even better, Seek doesn't imply anything about coming up with an answer.

nipi

Find also happens to suggest that it should be out of the nameds control. You can actively Seek something but you cant actively Find something, it just happens if and when it does. Its a "passive skill".

maresther23

This is going to explode hilariously in Squire's face. She really is being brutal in her ruling, I wonder if so much blood is necessary for consolidating her power.

Morgenstern

So right now Malicia was right in her judgement of the first (few) year(s) of Cat... which should make her plans for Cat work, if not for (seemingly at least) the horrible mistake of underestimating Heiress, thinking that only Tasia is a real problem or that Heiress is probably even just a minion of Tasia. But hey, Black is making a leap of faith in Cat's favor, saying she learns best at/in/from(??) "the deep end", he made the decision to go away after all, thinking all while be fine anyway [just push Cat into the cold water, without even teaching her how to swim – she'll come out of it eventually, even if that means walking on the ground of said water until she finally gets out again at the shore, instead of via floating on top by swimming...], so that would seem to fit together again, click-clack, perfect fit, showing what Black was thinking about with that 'perfect team, being complements for each other' thought about how he makes the leaps of faith and Malicia sees things he doesn't, filling the hole in the plan that the other leaves (if they do).

Or maybe Malicia has started to see more in Cat, too, trusting Black's judgement and thus feels fine in using her to solve the Problem Named Heiress, to solve the other problems that need solving, who knows...

Alexander LeakingPen Hollins

Urthor1996

Ah the moment the story reminds you, that an angel won't let beeing mugg- er forced into giving out the rightful price on terms not dictated by himself, is nothing they seem to like...

"... even those Black struck deals with..." huh this one is very interesting to...

This story just doesn't really get worse, as most others do.... looks like this will be going for a while longer~

cdos93

Careful Cat, this move sounds suspiciously like throwing rocks at a hornet's nest

Euodiachloris

Nah. Assassins are worse than hornets. <_<

Morgenstern

Yeah, well, Black seemed to be absolutely fine with her "kicking the hornet's nest", *knowing* what she does, so... 😊

stevenneiman

"Whenever the guildmasters got a scrap of authority they immediately used it to [forced->force] every {bit of?} commerce they could under their thumb"

"All I'd gotten, though, was that she was a firm [believe->believer] in checks and balances"

"the blank-faced [silhouetted->silhouettes] of the Gallowborne"

"I have done, Hakram, terrible things" I don't actually know if this is grammatically correct, but I think it would read much better if "Hakram" was at the end of the sentence.

Well, this is going to be a mess. It's one thing to bully the nobles with Black's support, and quite another to try and defeat a group specifically trained to kill and avoid detection acting against his wishes. I understand her reasoning, but this is going to be messy, painful, and dangerous. I wouldn't be surprised if at least one of her close friends gets killed doing this.

Morgenstern

One awful mistake I see in her is STILL not seeming to think the long route out, not even close.. and not being innovative at all. She's still scraping by via making do with what is there and using the old stuff, trying out the mantle, but not making it hers. Exactly why I keep repeating that she is not ready. Just mimicking the few scenes she knows from Black's past is not enough. Just taking pieces here and there from societies that have come before, when she finds they are yet the best ones she saw, even if they are not fully to her liking, is just wrong, too. Why not make NEW assemblies, but take the old ones that she already SEES are not quite “the right thing”? She’s not there yet. The vision is still lacking. And it’s starting to tell, imho and will do so very quickly. Countess/Queen versus her actual position is going to be a pain in the ass. Just harassing Akua, but not doing more, too. Etc. etc.

But hey, of course – it’s necessary we go down the drain and/or rabbit hole again, this is only the start of a new plot arc, after all and Cat is supposed to develop, all fine.

[ I just refuse to follow all the hints of her replacing Black immediately, pointing out how she has still (a long) WAY to go the foreshadowing would end in to up the ante for her. There are so many, many NEW and much nicer angling points that have already cropped up by now, how shit could hit the fan in new fun ways. Much more interesting than just killing off Black/Malicia and let her deal with that, jumping over godsknow how many steps leading to an actually FITTING moment in time where that might happen. If one needs it at all... I can’t stop thinking of how the position of “knight” is something that you *usually* rather end up in by being *appointed* to it, either by the knight who trained you (on-the-field-appointment) or some much higher authority figure, like kings and empresses... for deeds done; and not by your trainer/mentor dying, which is normally the rarest case scenario when it comes to knights... One way or another – she’s not there yet. She’s gone over to not just learning, but now trying to mimick – but the true step would be finally finding her own way, coming into her OWN, as the saying goes. Not just following in someone else’s steps and mimicking them. Also, if the Girl Climbing the Tower should not just be a song for Malicia, but actually more (and not just a wrong interpretation).... Knight is not necessarily what Cat should become at all, even though she starts out as Squire. Transcending would seem to be a good idea for her, what with her breaking the rules etc. etc. ... 😊 (In general, I mean, no matter if Black dies along the way or not, even though I would feel it highly inappropriate and thus disappointing if she should do so *already* instead of just being out of the way for a bit, so she can develop some on her own.) ]

Ninja

This strikes me as a mistake. Going after a shadowy group of masterful killers when their hold on power is not yet secure strikes me as very unwise.

Soronel Haetir

Maybe if the guild of assassins were competent, but I have the idea that they are just as wrecked as everything else Callowan. After all they have been limited to soft targets for the last 20 years (if they had gone after ruling Praesi Black's forbearance would have disappeared).

nerfworld

Well at least she got more men, cause squire will need them to drag heiress out of Liesse when she makes her move

But killing that guild will be a bad idea since they may agree to join heiress and that one already has enough black op teams running about causing havoc Think thief still around stealing things in matchford?

Morgenstern

There are other ways to disassemble that guild than just kill them off one by one, though... although this chapter so far does not quite give the impression that they are thinking of much else. Still...

Kylen

This was a great chapter. I love it when the Crew is being playfully insubordinate with Cat, because it shows they care, at least a bit. I'm not sure why they are going after the Guild, but I'm sure she has a longer ranged plan. Can't wait for next week's chapter.

Morgenstern

Has she?

I dunno, maybe the author WILL pull another stunt of things-happening-behind-the-screens-only again... He did do it once already what with Cat's "I'm the Queen (if just for a second), haHA"-triumph, where we never got shown much of her thinking about why Heiress is targeting Liesse exactly and combining it with the mention of something to [bind names..?] there plus the ritual Will was attempting, barring that one sentence of her thinking about the mention of sth. like that being in Liesse and then her following towards Will's summoning place that seems to be the target of Heiress, too (which might have happened without all the other implications coming together, as it was presented, we never got the full bunch to surprise US instead of just the enemy)..

...but... it feels a bit shallow to pull that trick twice *in a row (of all things)*.

Would be nicer to be able to piece the hints together beforehand this time, including necessarily a few more hint drops of her ACTUALLY planning something and the direction of it (instead of pulling planning-happend-behind-the-scenes out of the hat only in the very end), for a change – diversity is ‘the salt in the soup’ for ongoing readability, after all. 😊

Morgenstern

And so far, she does not *give off the impression* (to the READER (at least not to me)) that she has thought that far ahead and actually knows what she is doing there already. The impression this chapter gives off is one of general scrambling and scrabbling to find purchase, find a way, and not drown in the cold water she was dumped in (of her own volition, but still... she IS inexperienced in ruling – and (I’d say) it SHOWS).

Like she is not sure herself right now, what she even WANTS to do with all the new power she’s got (anymore, if she ever had... as I said before, she didn’t seem to have much of a plan what exactly to do after her subversion succeeds and she DOES get in a position of power beyond a muddy “i wanna give Callowans some more influence over their own lives back and make life better in general”, no big idea HOW to do that) – and right now she seems/feels even unsure what the “right thing” would even BE... much less how to achieve it.

[ Which would rather fit expectations... she’s still in training, after all, further along than the two year span would normally suggest, but still... she’s SO not finished there – and we need a new heap of problems for the new arc, after all, and further development options 😊

If there should actually be once more more of behind-the-screen-not-visible-to-reader-stuff going on again in HER circle, not just the Calamities’ ranks.. Well, it would seem a bit.. hm... not quite so believable as other things and even less satisfactory if she makes it in the end, seeing how Cat has been presented as this ‘massive underdog scrambling along without plan, acting on events, not planning them, for the most part’ and not as the ‘big thinker’ (yet), only as someone STARTING to think, what with the example of Black (and Co.) presented to her and nudging her along.

Expectations MATTER. Of course there are ways surprises are nice, too, but – as I said. The whole it-was-all-behind-the-screens-approach does not really come off all that well, at least not easily, and not twice in a row. Readers generally don’t seem to like being played for stupid very much and “only-behind-the-screens” instead of pulling of hint-dropping and STILL leading us in a wrong direction and surprising us with the big reveal rather DOES play us for stupid, because it only succeeds by withholding stuff, not giving us insight, cutting out natural POV-scenes, seeing how we’re mostly following the protagonist, DO (seem to) get quite a lot of her thoughts – not giving us the important ones, not even in decisive, but ambiguous hints, seems rather assholery... Most of us seem to like at least having a decent CHANCE to figure things out. ]

Morgenstern

To sum up: It's a thin line to tread.

If Cat DOES already have a bigger plan and better grips on the situation/future implications – she should at least be HINTED AT to have it. The “I will do a lot more bad stuff before the end” goes in that direction, but all the rest of all this “necessary vs. right thing” and blahblah “should it not apply to me/us too” blahblah “laws must be followed, but i never did it” blahblah... “don't like the elder assemblies, but they're my best shot (i cannot think of anything else, least of all new things to bring up on my own)” blah blah ... it's so very muddled, it very much gives of the impression she does NOT have a real plan, but it's more or less just grabbing around in the dark and toying with a multitude of ideas, but not real PLAN, not even in simple but coherent outlines beyond the way too general “make life better for Callowans” / “rule of Callowans”. The How is missing too much / presented as being way too muddled and her being unsure about it instead of “haHA, i have a plan, but i won't reveal it that easily, try to find it in my tiny remarks here and there”.

Shawn Panzegraf

I don't believe dismantling the Guild of Assassins will blow up in Catherine's face because of one statement on her part. “If I don't start making things better now, when will I?” This fits Catherine's “story” *perfectly*...as such it strengthens her Name/ Role, and the meta power behind the Names themselves. We've already seen a hard example of Story trumping Names. Catherine's “Enemy, Sword in the Stone, Claim” Story squashed both the Lone Swordsmen and Heiress, THEN went on to power her through Mugging the Choir of Contrition.

So long as Catherine is acting in accordance with her overarching Story (Referred to as Working Within/Gaming the Dread Empire to Reform Callow) Catherine won't come to grief by the hand of Fate. In fact, had she FAILED to move against the Assassins because Black made a deal with them, Catherine would've been weakening her story by allowing an element of the post-Conquest Praesi status quo to remain intact. Then Creation might well have bitten her, predictably via the Assassins still being around.

There isn't one example in the Guide of a Named taking definitive action that supports their Story Narrative of that Named coming to grief by it, without “Half the world being set against them.”

Look at the fall of all the major/competent Dread Emperors that have been mentioned. Massive force is all that brought each down. Catherine isn't immune to that level of force, but failing that, so long as she holds tight to her Story, she's bulletproof. No single Hero, no single Villain will ever pull her down.

Unless it's the Bard...but it won't be by direct action in that case. It would be the Bard being clever enough in a meta sense to arrange for the massive force required to topple a Name in the full cry and glory of their power.

Look at what the Tyrant just pulled. Simple declarative belief, backed by ironclad action that proves his "faith" in his Story was all it took to turn the SKY into a weapon of mass destruction.

The same has gone for Catherine numerous times. By military strength alone, Marchford should've been the end of the Fifteenth. Instead Marchford became a pretty strip of cloth on her cloak and a step built for her to climb the Tower.

Shequi

I'm willing to bet that Ratface will salvage some parts of the assassin's guild for his own use.

Morgenstern

It would seem rather likely that some of her circle have a better idea of "dismantling" the guild than just killing all its members off... 😊 Catherine has, so far, not been the "biggest planner there is", that's more of a job for others, at least in helping her along to find out what is going on and then formulate a plan for it. The Big Reveal in the last book (sword in stone story) seems to have come off by a combination of asking Masego behind the screens and Black pumping her with stories to lead her along to understanding of how stories work – and thus how they might get used and/or influenced or even transcended. I don't see her actually having done that on her own or doing it on her own in the future, as of yet. Way to go, Cat – but ... way to go. And a good thing that is. Progression should take time. Character development should not simply come along in fits and starts and via deus ex machina, tadaa, she suddenly can... a bit of that strewn in here and there is fine, but stories live on coherence and believability, after all. Too much of it and there goes your belief, replaced by stopping out-of-story and "what!?" and "OP" comments. 😊

Morgenstern

So far, Cat has been presented more as "thriving on chaos" and only LEARNING to actually plan (much more so: longterm), besides her one or two great ideas, which ... well.. remain(ed) in cocoon stage so far. Her ideas should unfold into plans and the giant awful badass “butterfly” with her, imho. Big term plans are still in the hands of other characters and/or well they SHOULD be.

Shawn Panzegraf

I forgot:

Magic stones in the bellies of Bellephronese diplomats, activated by mental command...done via simple mages and not Named? I think the way the spell works is they get the diplomats to swallow a stone, the Diplomat BELIEVES they know what the stone does because they've witnessed it splatter so many other Diplomats, or heard of it splattering them.

The spell uses the belief of the Diplomats in the ability of the kaenanas to cause their death to actually cause their death. If the Diplomat stopped believing the stone could kill them, the magic isn't there to actually kill them.

Erratic, care to comment?

Morgenstern

Instant side thought: If all murderers get hanged in Callow... what about her own? Thinking of Robber and his crew murdering travellers on their way to Akua, anyone? 😊

Chapter 2: Might

“We make the shepherds kings at the end of our stories because they already know how to lead recalcitrant, bleating creatures of limited intellect.”

– Prokopia Lekapene, first and only Hierarch of the Free Cities

Laure had not had an Imperial governor since the unlamented death of Mazus.

The former capital of the Kingdom had been put under martial law while the bastard was still swinging from a noose in the market place, but no replacement had been appointed afterwards – the Empress, as I understood it, had used the possibility of the appointment to effect a little spring cleaning at court. The final body count had been comparable to that of a small battle, with even the Truebloods discreetly clawing at each other through intermediaries as everyone tried to place a relative or dependent at the head of the richest city in Callow. It had come to nothing when the Liesse Rebellion had begun, as there had been no question of ending martial law in Laure while the south was in revolt. The issue of what to do with the city had ultimately become the subject of the very first meeting of the Ruling Council, and it had revealed how the lines would be drawn between its members.

There were, theoretically, seven members. Black was one, the designated head of the council and the only member with the right of veto – which he had given to me along with his vote. Baroness Anne Kendal was another, the first appointment I'd made. Sister Abigail of the House of Light was the third, a septuagenarian who'd served as a travelling sister for thirty years before settling in an abbey near Ankou in her middle age. She'd been one of the most vocal members of the House to advocate against armed rebellion after the Conquest. She still had, Black had informed me, been put under surveillance by both he and Malicia by sheer virtue of having so many connections across Callow. The House of Light did not have a true hierarchy but some of its members were more influential than others, and Sister Abigail was in the highest tier even among those.

Hakram had also choked the life out of her great-nephew at Three Hills. He'd been the priest who'd prevented us from scrying the Silver Spears, having volunteered to serve with the mercenaries as a liaison for my predecessor in ruling Marchford. The way she seemed to genuinely hold no grudge over the events unsettled me, I had to admit. Priests who'd been under the vows for long enough were always... unearthly but Sister Abigail was in a league of her own. I'd never seen her be anything but the picture of health and Ratface had told me she'd healed a bleeding gut wound in the cathedral without breaking a sweat. There was power behind the doting grandmotherly smile.

The two Praesi with seats were like night and day. Murad Kalbid was sworn to the High Lady of Kahtan, a distant cousin who'd married into a lesser family, and was exactly what Callowans picture when they thought of the Taghreb. Desert-lean and with tanned skin like leather, the middle-aged man had a closely-cropped beard and moustache that made his dark eyes stand out. I'd never seen him without a sword at his hip and he could light candles with nothing but a word. Satang Motherless, as the Soninke was apparently named, was the survivor of a succession dispute in Aksum who'd come into the service of the High Lord of Okoro. She seemed to me a lesser take on Heiress, when it came to appearance, with cheekbones not quite as high and curves not quite as full. Her hair she kept in a series of braid the way Apprentice did, though without the magical trinkets. There was a red mark on her cheek that looked like three lines, and I couldn't tell if it was a tattoo or some particularly vivid birthmark. Whatever it was there was sorcery in it.

The two foreigners had wasted no time in striking an informal alliance, working together to nudge the Council in directions their patrons would approve of. Early on they'd tried to suggest that properties seized from the nobles who'd fought in the rebellion should be put to auction under Murad's supervision, supposedly to raise funds for the reconstruction, but I'd stamped the notion down hard with Sister Abigail's support. Half the treasures would be gone before the first sell was ever made, packed in carts headed for the Wasteland. Aisha was convinced Satang was in communication with Heiress, but I was not so sure. Nothing concrete had been dug up by my people, though admittedly what passed for my spy network was barely out of the cradle. I'd still have to act as if she was, just in case. I knew for a fact Akua kept close eye on the proceedings here in Laure, to prepare for the blows before I could land them on her. So far I'd only tightened the screws by stripping the Liesse governorship of lands and by passing a decree that banned any Callowan official from summoning or dealing with devils, but I wasn't done. Not until she crawled back to the Wasteland, or preferably straight into the Underworld.

The last and seventh seat was for Malicia's personal representative, and had gone unfilled. The Empress had sent messengers to cast her vote on occasion, so far only for issues that related to the scope of the Ruling Council's authority over Callow.

Tonight's session would be light, in theory, with only my own accounting of the events in Southpool being a topic after we received the monthly report from the magistrates that now ruled Laure. Baroness Kendal had been tasked with overseeing them personally after the appointments were made, but the two Praesi had insisted on a regular report to the council. They weren't entirely wrong. I doubted a woman like Anne Kendal would try to fill her pockets with bribes but General Orim still garrisoned the city and he'd been openly sceptical about a former rebel being given power over his legionaries. Being able to say there would be oversight by Wastelanders and myself had gone a long way in soothing those ruffled feathers. Compromises, I grimaced. I'd had to make quite a few of those lately, and I didn't like it. I missed Black, to my dismay, and more than the man I missed his advice.

The room the Ruling Council used for its sessions had once been the private meeting room of the sovereigns of Callow. The Queen of Blades once sat in that same seat I called my own and so had Jehan the Wise. So had the likes of Mazus, later on, but that era was over now. It was tastefully decorated – marble floors with hexagonal tiles and old wood panelling under a beautifully painted ceiling – but I wasted no time on the sights before heading for my seat at the head of the table: the other members were already there. All six of them. So the Empress finally sent her representative, I thought, studying the woman in question. Soninke, dark eyes betraying a common birth and no callouses on her palms. Not a fighter then. Probably a court appointee. Neither of the other Praesi in the room seemed to know her and that clearly made them uncomfortable. As it should. Wastelanders were afraid of Black in the dark of night, I'd found, but they were always afraid of the Empress. She'd given them reason to.

"We've a newcomer, I see," I said, taking off my riding gloves and setting them on the table.

The representative rose from her seat and gracefully bowed.

"An honour to make your acquaintance, Lady Squire," she said. "I am Lady Naibu, representative for her Most Dreadful Majesty on the council."

Lady Deputy, in Mtethwa. Ime's sense of humour still made me wince from across an entire empire. I really shouldn't have expected any better of a woman who thought calling herself patience would lend her mystique.

"We're pleased to have you with us," I half-lied.

Not that convincingly, if the way Sister Abigail discreetly coughed into her sleeve was any indication. Baroness Kendal smiled pleasantly, murmuring courtesies at the newcomer from her neighbouring chair as Naibu sat and I settled into my own seat.

"I didn't see the magistrates waiting outside when coming in," I said. "Was their report already given?"

"It was delayed until tomorrow, Lady Squire," Setang said. "There's been news of greater import from Dormer."

I raised an eyebrow. Anne Kendal's former barony had been one of the first governorships to be filled after the rebellion – she'd suggested one of the town's eldersmen for the first mandate, to smooth the transition when a more long-term appointee was found, and after having him looked into I'd seen no reason to refuse.

"There's been a Fae incursion," Sister Abigail said. "A handful of Summer court fairies snuck into the town after finagling an invitation, then forced the people to dance until a priest drove them off."

I blinked slowly. The Fae? They never left the Waning Woods. Dormer was one of the Callowan holdings closest to the woods, certainly, but it was still a few days of riding away. The only known gate into Arcadia was near Refuge, and- I stopped cold. That was no longer true, was it? Masego had speculated as much months ago and he'd confirmed it since: when the demon of Corruption had lingered in Marchford, it had weakened the borders between Arcadia and Creation. Nothing had come through, so far, but... Shit. I need to talk with Apprentice.

"There were no dead, as I understand it," Murad said, facing the sister.

"A handful of sprained limbs was the worst of it," Baroness Kendal replied, drawing his attention.

"Then there should be no need to lower the taxes due," Setang smiled.

The segue was too smooth for the two of them not to have planned it.

"The priority at the moment should be making sure the Fae don't come back," I said sharply. "There's no legion garrisoning the region, if some of the fairies into the rougher stuff come knocking they'll be vulnerable."

"I am told the Fifteenth regularly holds field exercises," Naibu spoke up, the first time since the conversation had begun. "Perhaps one might be arranged close to the town."

I eyed her cautiously. I'd been thinking of saying as much, but hearing the words coming from an unknown had me rethinking it. My men would be close to Heiress' wheelhouse, if they went there, and if she hadn't cooked up some nasty tricks since we last met I'd eat my godsdamned gloves.

"I'll speak with General Juniper," I finally grunted. "It's placeholder solution, regardless. The Fifteenth is based in Marchford so if this become an unstable border there'll be a need for a more permanent presence."

"Reaching out to the Lady of the Lake might yield answers as to why it happened," Sister Abigail suggested. "She's said to know Arcadia better than anyone alive."

I knew the Empire was in diplomatic contact with Refuge, but I honestly had no idea how that contact was maintained. Scrying that close to a gate into Arcadia would basically be sending a written invitation to the Wild Hunt but surely they couldn't be sending messengers on foot every time? Less than half of them would actually make it to Refuge: those entire woods were even more of a death trap than the Wasteland. I didn't want to admit to ignorance in front of those people so I smiled knowingly instead, meeting Setang's eyes until she looked away. When in doubt, pretend it was always part of the plan.

"Measures will be taken," I said vaguely.

That should keep them guessing. No one else seemed to have anything else to add, so Baroness Kendal suggested we adjourn for the night – my own report on Southpool could wait until tomorrow, when we saw the magistrates. It was a little abrupt considering how little we'd talked but they'd grown to know a little of me in the last six months: whenever proceedings got too tedious or I had other business I tended to end the sessions early. Council members rose one after another, bowing before asking my leave. I gave it absent-mindedly, eyes on Naibu – who was still seated. Well now. That promised to be interesting. Sister Abigail was the last to leave and she closed the door behind her, leaving only silence. I was about to speak up when Malicia's envoy suddenly twitched. Not just a little, too: her entire body convulsed before stilling suddenly. A heartbeat hadn't even passed before I was on my feet, sword in hand.

"That won't be necessary, Catherine," she said, voice eerily calm.

The Soninke held herself differently now. Straighter in her seat, hands folded primly into her lap. There was command in her bearing.

"Your Most Dreadful Majesty," I said.

The meat-puppet smiled approvingly.

"Deputy, is it?" I muttered. "Someone had fun with that."

"This is a flesh simulacrum with a semblance of personality inserted," Malicia shrugged gracefully. "One of Nefarious' rare slivers of brilliance. It serves my purposes better than coming to Callow in person."

I sheathed the sword slowly.

"Are you always in there, or..."

I gestured vaguely.

"Do not ask that question if you want to sleep well tonight," the Empress smiled. "Suffice it to say, anything my deputy hears will eventually come to my ears. You may consider her opinions to be mine for all practical purposes."

One of those days, I was going to come across something from the Tower that wasn't the stuff of nightmares. But not today, evidently.

"I take it there's things going on I don't know about," I said.

There was a safe bet if I'd ever made one.

"You are not incorrect. First, however, I bring news from the south," Malicia said.

I perked up at that. Black had been in the Free Cities for a few months but word trickled up to Callow slowly. Whatever I heard was always late enough to be largely irrelevant.

"Last I heard he was in Penthes," I said.

"There are currently twelve claimants to the title of Exarch in the city," the Empress informed me amusedly. "A little excessive even for him, but they are effectively out of the war until the matter is resolved. At last contact he was headed for Nicae, but with the latest developments I believe he'll turn to Delos."

I raised an eyebrow.

"It hasn't fallen?" I said. "I thought the Tyrant was marching on it."

It had drawn quite a bit of attention when an unheard-of villain had come out of nowhere and grilled the third of an army on his way to Atalante. Said city-state had been sacked and conquered a few weeks afterwards, its armies dispersed in the field. Apparently half the mercenaries Atalante had bought turned to banditry after the defeat and had then been press-ganged into the Tyrant's army one band at a time. The Named and his army had moved towards Delos afterwards, which was the last I'd heard.

"The initial assault was repulsed," Malicia informed me. "The Tyrant is sieging the city with his... usual flair."

The last part was spoken with distaste.

"The man basically tore through an army on his own," I said slowly. "And he was slapped down by a place known for its scribes?"

"There are heroes in the city," the Empress said.

Well, shit. That explained why Black was headed there, too.

"I don't suppose we know the Names?" I asked.

"The White Knight is one," she replied. "And a woman I believe you know, though she goes by a different name now: the Wandering Bard."

I cursed. White Knight sounded ominous like all Hells, but the Bard was a pest I was more familiar with.

"Well, she was bound to turn up eventually," I said. "That's going to be a mess."

"There are at least three others, but on those I've yet to acquire anything concrete," the Empress added.

Five heroes. The usual number, when something was going to go horribly wrong for villains. Was there a specific term for that, I wondered? People used cluster for fish and herd for sheep, there had to be a term for heroes. A murder, I snorted. Or maybe a gaggle, like with cats. So Black was going to be stuck dealing with a full gaggle of heroes. That ought to make his year.

"Procer's still staying out of it?" I said.

"Dearest Cordelia has been sending her disaffected soldiers to Nicae," Malicia said. "More than ten thousand already and the number grows by the day. More importantly, she convinced Ashur to lift its restrictions on Nicean commerce – so they can actually afford to feed them. The fulcrum of the war will be the battle that host fights, the current conflicts are merely setting the stage."

"Keeps her too busy to sniff around Callow, at least," I muttered. "Small favours."

The Empress took a hand off her lap and rested her chin on the palm, somehow managing elegance in a body not her own.

"Callow is what brings me here as it happens," she said. "You've been rather busy of late, Catherine."

That, I reflected, did not seem like the beginning of a pleasant conversation.

"Still learning the ropes," I said. "There's so much to do even three of me wouldn't be on top of things."

"Delegating to Baroness Kendal was the step in the right direction," Malicia said. "Continue to find trustworthy individuals and invest them with authority."

I cocked my head to the side.

"Not a lot of those around," I admitted.

Most of the people I could rely on were in the Fifteenth, and I couldn't keep piling civilian duties onto them. Their workload had already expanded massively with the way the legion had swelled.

"Then find leverage on people you do not trust and use them regardless," the Empress said. "Murad has children in Kahtan and cares for them. A scare there would keep him in line. He has experience commanding a city guard and you need someone to head Laure's."

"I'm trying avoid importing leadership from Praes," I said, trying to keep my tone not accusatory..

"The Empire decapitated Callow's ruling class two generations in a row," Malicia noted. "Train replacements, by all means, but you need people filling positions now. Through your actions you've begun to centralize authority in Callow without crafting an administration that can wield that power. The result of that can only be anarchy."

I swallowed. I was, well, out of my depth here. The Empress sighed.

"You are young, younger than ever we were when we seized power," she said. "I do not expect immediate flawlessness of you. What I can teach you, I will."

She leaned back into her seat.

"Let us go over your actions in Southpool, as an exercise," she said. "What do you believe the common perception is of what happened there?"

"A corrupt Praesi governess was removed," I frowned.

"Forcefully," Malicia said. "Strung up in front of the fortress gates for all to see."

"The Empire isn't exactly shy about making examples, as a rule," I said.

"In exceptional cases," the Empress said. "Governess Ife was not one. Removing her was necessary for your purposes, but the manner was incorrect. You should have had her assassinated discreetly and moved in your replacement."

"If she just disappears then the point doesn't get made," I grunted.

That whole matter was still like an itch I couldn't scratch, and going over it wasn't exactly my idea of an agreeable evening. I listened anyway: the Empress hadn't managed to command a pack of wolves like the High Lords for over forty years by looking pretty. If she had advice, it was worth hearing.

"It is made to the people it is meant for," Malicia disagreed. "More than that, think on what the people of Southpool saw. Wasteland nobility, hung like a common Callowan criminal."

"She acted like a common Callowan criminal," I said, temper flaring as I struggled not to raise my voice.

"Every eye on Callow is on you, Catherine," the Empress said. "You are the person setting their cues. If what you employ is violence, in violence they will follow. Against all available targets."

I rubbed at the bridge of my nose, then grunted.

"Fair," I said. "Riots against the legions aren't what I was going for. Still, I don't have assassins to use. My closest equivalent is..."

"Currently checking the progress of your opponent," Malicia completed for me, when I let the sentence trail. "The natural tool for you would be the Guild of Assassins, but you've other ideas."

I grimaced. Of course she knew. No part of that had been a question.

"In the future," she said, "have your mages use a more advanced version of the scrying spell formula. Apprentice will know several. The one you currently use is exceedingly easy to listen into. Heiress certainly has been, among others."

That she wasn't being smug about it actually kind of made it worse.

"Their existence as an entity breaks Tower law," I said defensively.

"There has never been nor will there ever be a nation without hired killers," Malicia replied. "You might, at best, disband the organized aspect of it for a few decades. The trade will still be plied as long as someone has a knife and another has coin."

"So I should just allow a pack of murderers to do as they want because people are assholes?" I retorted. "What's the point of even having a law against it then?"

"The purpose of law is not to define right and wrong, it is to regulate behaviour," the Empress said. "You are a ruler now, Catherine. Your only concern should be control."

She shrugged languidly.

"If you deem it necessary to assert greater control over the Guild of Assassins, do so," she said. "But attempting to destroy it entirely would set you on a collision course with all of the Dark Guilds. You cannot rule a realm if you are at war with every institution in it."

"Are you ordering me not to disband them?" I asked through gritted teeth.

Anything short of that wasn't going to make me back down. The simulacrum the Empress was possessing studied me for a moment.

"No," she finally said. "If you fail, it will be a learning experience. If you succeed – well, I have been faced with the occasional surprise over the years. I will warn you, however, that you do not currently have the resources to face them."

I grimaced. Marchford had been one of the richest cities in Callow, before the rebellion. Before a demon had set camp for a few days over the silver mines, filling the streets with disaffected miners and their families. There was a reason enrolling in the Fifteenth was so popular at the moment. With bridge that was the main trade route in and out of the hills only just freshly raised after the Silver Spears had torched it, trade had yet to pick up. And that wasn't even counting on the gaping hungry maw that was rebuilding the devastated city. I was beginning to regret having told Robber to torch that manor, since I'd been supposed to actually live in it.

"Apprentice told me the mines will be purged of contamination within a few months," I said. "It'll be easier after that."

"Upon you return to Marchford," Malicia said, "you will be presented with an offer by the Matron of the High Ridge tribe. It could prove a solution to your woes, though you should think long before accepting it."

I frowned. High Ridge? Pickler's tribe, that, and the reigning Matron would be her mother. Ominous.

"Make haste back to your holdings, Catherine," the Empress said. "You'll find greater trouble there than you know – your bastard has been surprisingly competent in suppressing rumours."

The meat-puppet leaned forward, the Dread Empress of Praes looking through it.

"But above all, do not think for a moment that Heiress being silent means she has forgotten you. You might be a legacy, Catherine Foundling, but then so is she."

Lady Naibu twitched, then went still. The only sign of life there was the steady rise and fall of her chest.

"It's going to be one of those years, isn't it?" I sighed.

Well this was ominous. Very, *very* ominous.

Gunslinger

The plot thickens indeed. Poor Cat, having to plod through politics.

On a side note vote for the Guide if you like it on topwebfiction.

metroderus

The protagonists are all so consistently likable that I occasionally find myself viewing them and rooting for them in the same way I would for protagonists from more traditional stories. Then along comes a delicious moment of “telecommuting via almost-mindless flesh puppet” to make the skin crawl and remind you just what this Practical Guide is for.

George

Huh, I root for them full time and whole-heartedly

nehemiahnewell

Eh, Flesh-puppets aren’t any more horrifying then The Wandering Bard. I mean, they aren’t LESS horrifying either. They exist at exactly the same level, since their nature is so similar.

Euodiachloris

The Wandering Bard: Flesh Puppet meets Time Lord via the Master-style hijack/possession route. 😊

Morgenstern

I don’t see why mere flesh would make the skin crawl. If it were a PERSON that was made into a mindless puppet, yeah... but as far as I understood it, it is a CONSTRUCT. No real person in there and never having been in there... No problem whatsoever. ( I never quite understood the taboo around corpses, either, to be fair... Yeah, I get the emotions for which it might be a focus point for some time, while people grieve for the person that was once in there, but... a corpse is just dead meat. Nothing more, nothing less. We EAT meat every day... most of us anyway. )

Cpt. Obvious

Agree on the “just meat” part. But in my opinion it depends on how this particular meat puppet was constructed. I see basically three ways to make a meat puppet. The simplest probably is to start with a still living body, and here there's opportunity for some less nice things such as how the body was sourced. It's not too common to find a still breathing body with no one home. It could be a body of someone who died in a fight but they managed to keep the body alive after the original owner vacated the premise. But given this is Praes, I think it would be easiest to buy a deathrow prisoner and evict the original owner.

Another possibility would be to Frankenstein a body from spare parts. Though that would require an artist to avoid creating a really horrifying meat puppet.

Finally it might be possible to simply create the meat puppeft from magic, but I really don't think that's the case here as it would be incredibly "expensive" to do it that way.

danh3107

I guess it can only get worse, let's see how Catherine handles it.

JackbeThimble

The quality of the editing has definitely improved in this book. I only noticed one typo in my first read-through of this chapter.

Catherine had better vet her Callowan Gubernatorial candidates very carefully, the first time there's a major scandal involving one of them having their political opponents murdered or enriching themselves off the taxpayers she's going to be in a very awkward position.

If she needs to find competent bureaucrats to run her central government the obvious first place to look would be the church, since they're an institution that already has a certain amount of trust from the general populace but are extremely unlikely to maintain their power under a different Regent. They would also be qualified to enforce her proposed ban on diabolism.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

The sentence "I was, well, out of my depth..." reads awkwardly. I assume both commas should get deleted, but I can't really tell what the author is going for there.

Barthumphries

Probably that the main character was, well, out of her depth. 😊

Abaddon

I think that sentence reads perfectly fine. Try saying it to yourself out loud. Having a slight pause or hesitation before and after "well" feels and sounds natural to me.

(I'm going to use "-" to separate the different parts of the sentence here.) If the sentence were structured the way you are reading it as, "I was well out of my depth." it would break down like this: 'I- was – well out of – my depth.' whereas the way EE wrote it and, I believe, intended it to be read, "I was, well, out of my depth." the sentence breaks apart like so: "I – was – well – out of – my depth."

In the first example(Which is a valid interpretation, just not the intended one I think.), the word "well" is used as an adverb. According to these definitions given in the Merriam-Webster Dictionary:

5 – to a high degree
"well deserved the honor"
"a well-equipped kitchen"

6 – FULLY, QUITE "well worth the price"

10 – b: in all likelihood INDEED
"it may well be true"

13 – Without doubt or question
CLEARLY
“well knew the penalty”

And,

15 – to a large extent or degree
CONSIDERABLY, FAR
“well over a million”

In the second(The original and intended usage.) example though, the word “well” is used as an interjection:

1 – used to indicate resumption of discourse or to introduce a remark
“They are, well, not quite what you’d expect”
“he says, gesturing at, well, all this:”
“Many of the legions who dressed fantastically, scantily, or both treated the festival as, well, a festival—a reason to carouse.”
“But that linear journey can come to feel, well, a bit plodding.”

There are a lot of minor ones centering around single letters missing or being wrong. Your brain is probably doing the autocorrect there, though. Sad that mine almost never those that – except, even more annoyingly, when looking at my own texts while writing and often even shortly after, needing distance to un-do the autocorrect there... -.-

Morgenstern

yeah.. like that. GAH. “almost never DOES that // corrects those”... classic mix-up.

The Archdevil

Man, Malicia just knows everything. Makes me wonder if Amadeus has Scribe sending her intelligence reports. And the flesh-puppet must be fun, though I would love how it works.

Unoriginal

She doesn't need intelligence reports from Scribe/Black. She has her own very powerful spy network and I think (I haven't checked in a while) that its implied to be better.

The Archdevil

Fair enough. The established spy network of a villainous empire would probably be better than Black's fledgling-by-comparison network that Scribe runs for him.

nipi

It was mentioned that Malicia can see through the eyes of rodents and crows – her agents.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Wait, seriously? Where the hell was that? I don't remember that at all

Barthumphries

No, she specifically thought that her spy network wasn't as good.

Letouriste

You guys have forgotten "lady patience" right? The spymistress of the empire;) she have her own network for helping malicia...still she is probably less skilled than scribe.

Morgenstern

Ime was implied to have gotten Malicia more info about the Free Cities and what's going on there than Scribe did for Black. Although, maybe he just wasn't interested in that back then... who knows.

Naeddyr

> She still had, Black had informed me, been put under surveillance by both he and Malicia

by both HIM and Malicia

Rule of thumb, if you have a pronoun and a conjunction and you don't know what case to use, just simplify the conjunction phrase and see what comes naturally. It's not "put under surveillance by he" when it's just the single pronoun, so it shouldn't change. Burn the style guides, do not fear them! Listen to your heart, cut the words down until they obey. Hypercorrectism is a nagging worm in your mind, do not listen to it.

Morgenstern

It's like the odd "xy and I" every so often. I am quite sure that is usually used as "xy and ME", too. Or did I just encounter the wrong sources for that (I'm not much for Brits' English, though) 😊

nick012000

Maybe Cat should consider turning the Guild of Assassins into something like the Morag Tong from the Elder Scrolls series: a government-sanctioned guild of executioners that act to remove problematic elements in society. If a minor nobleman rapes a peasant's daughter, the peasants could band together and pay to get the nobleman offed. If a group of bandits is attacking a noble house's merchant caravans and they don't have the resources to take care of them, they can hire the Morag Tong. And so on, and so forth.

Dan Lawrence

I can't help noticing that Catherine currently has a difficulty getting accurate local intelligence due to a feeble spy network, and that the local guild of assassins would likely make for an excellent recruiting ground for spies.

Instead of shutting down the guild entirely she should just carefully turn them into the Callowan secret police. A little training in advanced spycraft from a few Praesi spies, some proper uniforms and a salary. I'm sure not all of them will sign up but you'd get enough with the right approach.

nipi

Problem is you need to be able to trust your spies. Otherwise you are just creating a bigger problem for yourself.

Morgenstern

Yeah, Black Ops / Intelligence Agency of her own (probably not all of them... some will be ... "beyond saving", but yeah) was exactly what I already thought last chapter... 😊

Morgenstern

And/Or "Secret Police" (kinda summed that up under Black Ops, though). Nipi is right about the inherent problem, of course. But I'm sure there's a myriad of ways out there how they could be MADE ... trust-able, if not trust-worthy. Why, oh why, do I have to think of Apprentice now, again? ^^

vexingvision

I would absolutely buy a book only containing the leading quotes. They're so well done, delicious and clever.

Letouriste

Thanks for the update! Did she forget asking Malicia about the way to contact Refuge here?

Euodiachloris

Not much point: Malicia was basically there as the topic came up. She knows how to get word to Ranger; and, she knows Cat doesn't know. In short, a message is getting to Refuge. 😊

Letouriste

Oh! You're right:)

But still, she needs to find a way for herself soon, her web of diplomacy is really thin.

Morgenstern

Second that. Then again, Cat is not much for diplomacy so far. First (few) year(s) and all that, just like Malicia predicted... at least so far. 😊

Euodiachloris

Malicia didn't need to say it. But, there were a few sections talking to Cat where I could practically feel her amusement at the mini-younger-Amadeus in the room. 😊

ereshkigala

First time commenting, so this will be about Cat's glorious career as an evil warlord so far and other plot-related stuff.

1) You've managed to give Cat a great balance of frequent brilliance to show she has great potential, just as frequent bull-headedness to show she's still a teenager, and the occasional gross stupidity that makes for a believable main character without the experience of other players in the field. Good job!

2) If anything, your characterisation of other individuals is even better, whether they are Cat's friends and subordinates, or her superiors and enemies. No character is flat, which is a great achievement for any literary work. Everyone is a person, even if they have blatantly stereotypical roles.

3) When it comes to the meat of the story, the unfairness of protagonist (usually good) vs antagonist (usually evil) roles, I find it rather ironic that Cat is on the side of Evil that wants to break the unfairness when she is essentially in a protagonist's position. For all the challenges she faced, Fate still conspired to grant her victory in the end. The way coincidence stretched to extremes to give her the tools to win, from her very first encounter with Black to the way her initial defeats initiated a pattern of three that guaranteed some victory, make her hypocrisy a bit annoying.

4) Am I in the minority that I want to see Heiress succeed or at least survive, and have her and Cat either be forced to genuinely cooperate to avoid being overwhelmed by heroes in the future, or have them as semi-hostile rulers of their own nations by the end of the story? Akua outsmarts Cat a half-dozen times and loses mostly because of Role shenanigans, after all...

Letouriste

Fate? You're wrong, fate is AGAINST her.

She have a supporter(hint when she resurrected) but everything apart that is on her own.

Her meeting with black and the rest is fitting with a story, not the only one still.

Akua is not as smart you think, she just is persuaded she is. Also, she is the one to use the most role shenanigans for her, not cat.

Nivek

Actually, it's implied that until she finished the patterns of three with both Lone Swordsman and Heiress she was functionally immortal. The force that brought her back was probably the second pattern of three. Also Fate doesn't care which side wins, Fate is the wager not a side (see prologue of book 1).

It is probable however that Cat's habits allow for her to draw from both sides of the pattern since she always seems to pull the most outrageous of her stunts at the very start of the fight for the villainous-shock-and-awe aspect of the story before killing the heroes with a non-magical sword for that underdog protagonist value added to the story at which point she either forces/bribes the non-Named to surrender or destroys them with a dramatic flourish (such as a wall of fire) for some more villain points.

naturalnuke

A gaggle is a group of geese.

A clutter (or clowder) is a group of cats.

naturalnuke

Heh, a clutter of heroes...

Euodiachloris

Well, with those like the Wandering Bard falling off shingle, the Bumbling Conjourer just... bumbling into things and every last grandstanding loudmouth Hero o' Helmetless Ham, "a clatter" would be more accurate. XD

stevenneiman

Joke aside, I'm pretty sure the proper term would be a "band" or, in a more RPG-influenced world a "party".

Unmaker

What do you call a group of people who always bicker but tighten ranks and attack when there is outside danger?
A family of heroes.

Morgenstern

"Band, Cat, it's called a band." was my initial reaction to that one. Although gaggle etc. are, of course, much funnier. Simply "group" also works..
(Sidenote: I've never heard "family" being used in any RPG so far, since over a decade, but that is probably region-specific?)

Barthumphries

Lord of the Rings Online uses the term kinship instead of guild. Fellowship for a small group.

danh3107

Erratic has a history of messing up animal names, a female goat being called a doe...

I mean honestly

Morgenstern

Is there any specific word for a female goat? o0 I was under the impression the word was simply.. well. Goat. o0 Funny how I either never noticed that one or don't remember it... one would think a brain like mine would, it tends to push out relevant info and collect such trifles like this one =P

Morgenstern

Relevant info meaning real-world info. Job stuff, names, numbers.. Stories and almost everything in it obviously count as collectables ^^

ereshkigala

Dunno if my first comment went through – I can't see it for some reason. In any case, here are some more general thoughts;

1) Are Malicia and Black making a mistake when they discount magic from the Age of Wonders in their worldview? Sure, the invisible tiger army was stupid, and the turn-to-giant-spider or steal-the-weather thing didn't pan out for some of their predecessors, but why are more useful bits of magic not used? A flying fortress for example would be a massive tactical advantage if practically used. Just fly over an enemy army or fortress out of weapon range, and shoot down at them. Spears, rocks, goblin munitions; if it is falling from a mile high the difference is mostly academic. And if making a flying fortress is an enormous expense in sacrifices because of how powerful the magic has to be, why not make a flying room instead? Just a metal box a few yards across just small enough to not need sacrifices to enchant with flight. Then have Warlock and a Legion's worth of mages (as in, several hundred) produce them one at a time. Usable as individual siege weapons and aerial scouts, or as a flying fortress when assembled together. And if an enemy is really giving them a hard time, load a flying box with a few tons of Goblinfire, fly it over their city, then let it drop. No way to defend against it, and when the goblinfire is charged up by eating the flying spells themselves, it will spread to burn the entire target city to the ground. Weapons of Mass Destruction are always good.

2) With the exception of goblins, the Legions of Terror still use mostly human military doctrine. IMHO, they aren't using non-human soldiers and creatures to the fullest. How about this;

a) Give the Ogres bows or crossbows. At the same range, an ogre should be able to launch a missile dozens of times heavier than a human. Or, for a less heavy missile, have two or three times the range. Basically every ogre could be a ballista. A hundred ogres from one legion could shoot dozens of times before a human enemy army could get into range, inflicting heavy casualties. And once they get into normal ranges? Shoot goblin demolition charges at them. I mean, there are humans that can throw spears 200+ yards with an atlatl. An ogre could send a similar weight much further.

b) Orcs are significantly stronger than humans, but are also taller. They can see over a front-line of humans and better support them. Instead of putting them in the front line, put them in the second with a front line of humans. The human warriors would have close-combat weapons and heavy shields, while the orcs would have spears with more reach than a human army could use. This double line would be highly effective in defending against close-range attacks, especially against armies that don't have non-human warriors.

Nivek

As best as I can tell, the practical villains refuse to trust "reusable" magic weapons (for good reason) since if somebody depends on the magic superweapon then it will fail or be turned against them at the worst possible time. One-offs like goblin munitions or suicide goats don't get turned against the sender since they are already exploded. And even those get duplicated/looted and used against the inventor a lot (Martial Sacker lost an eye to sharpeners, Heiress used a munition-filled ghoul during the climactic showdown at the sword-in-the-stone).

stevenneiman

As to Age of Wonders magic, Fate makes it basically useless. Winning isn't a matter of superiority, it's a matter of there not being a story about you losing. If she made use of that style of weapons and tactics she might get a few victories in but she would then lose to the first batch of heroes that showed up. At best she could hope to relive the life of Triumphant, complete with exactly the same ending that she died without having accomplished anything lasting except that people still curse her name.

That isn't the main reason though. The main reason is the same one that Kairos didn't just let Basilia stomp on his enemies for him. It would have worked, but it would not have been appropriate. To Malicia the Age of Wonders is dead, and every victory she wins by diligence, competence and pragmatism is one more step in the dance on its grave.

Morgenstern

Flying discs weaponized: Ill just say this much: Wind.
There HAS to be a hero with "wind magic" that can simply turn it aside or even do the "return to sender"...

Morgenstern

On further thought... there actually was a lot of mention already about how heroes and villains make wind with their SWORD attacks already, so much that they push back people with it.

NerfContessa

Well, that is a view of her I haven't thought about yet.

Ouch, but not wrong...

Ishot4living

Hmmm, a hanging of heroes? At least that's how Catherine would love to hear it I dare say 😊

Unmaker

Given Black's and Assassin's penchants: A sheath of heroes. Because they always end up with knives in them.

stevenneiman

Well, Willy never did. He just wound up hard to clean off Cat's boots.

Void

Ok this bugs me, but Catherine grunts a lot. It's her standby, and I can't unsee it.

Barrendur

@Void: Grunting, and humming! That's been true of *everyone* in the book, not just Catherine, and it's been a problem from the very start. Well spotted.

Morgenstern

Grunting = the occasional "hmpf". People DO tend to do that a LOT in real life. Just sayin'.

MagnaMalusLupus

She's not meant to be a talker; a point she has made several times. It is very appreciate for such a person to use more emotive than verbal responses.

Z

Sadly Cat is not as humorous now as she used to be though at the start of the chapters, she seem more depressed and mature now.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

At least she didn't murmur...

Barthumphries

At least she didn't tug her braid... Nynaeve.

beleester

The term for a group of heroes is obviously an adventuring party of heroes, isn't it?

stevenneiman

"She'd given them reason to {be}"

"after having him looked into {him} I'd seen no reason to refuse"

"It's {a} placeholder solution, regardless"

"Last I heard [he] was in Penthes" He who? I'm assuming you're talking about Black due to the fact that the next line relates to putting a city out of the fight by arranging a diplomatic mess.

"It had drawn quite a bit of attention when an unheard-of villain had come out of nowhere and grilled the third of an army on his way to Atalante." I'm honestly not sure what this is supposed to mean

"With {the} bridge that was the main trade route in and out of the hills only just freshly raised"

Well, it's interesting to see that Malicia isn't just going for instant solidarity with Black. I really wonder how this is going to turn out.

Bart

The prologue for this chapter where the Tyrant called lightning down to burn the opposing troops.

Lampshade

I don't understand her fixation with the assassins. It just seems so . . . random.

stevenneiman

They're people who have basically been allowed to live exempt from the rules because it would be inconvenient to oppose them. Mazus was like that, and took immense joy in his death. If she can't bring down the assassins by herself, then she might as well admit that everything she's done was pointless because all she can do is come crying to Black to fix her problems whenever anything goes wrong.

Shawn Panzegraf

I think I'm having a crisis of faith in the Guide:
I thought commitment to their Story was a Named's best friend.
The Tyrant's action against the army of Atalante seemed to drive that point home if the Angel-mugging hadn't.

So Cat goes after the Assassins for her Story reasons, and things get worse? Or is this the adversity Creation puts up as the "test of faith" in her Story? Doing the not-expedient thing of trying to dismantle the Assassins Guild when she really doesn't have the means to do it effectively would seem to be at least akin to the Tyrant leaving his army out of the battle with Atalante's forces. Cat is trying it to reform Callow from inside Team Villainy.

Or is this a case like the Tyrant was criticizing during his murder of the envoys. Cat speaking the words and missing the meaning? That doesn't seem right to me either though.

Anyone have a possible explanation here? (Beyond the obvious, no Name mechanics involved, it was just on balance, as "Malicia" said a bad idea to try and take them down because something like the Assassin's Guild is necessary to the workings of such a society, I mean.)

jonnnney

Her reasoning isn't valid for a villain so she doesn't get to cheat the rules. She isn't taking out the dark guilds because it would help cement her power, cow the populace, or because they might oppose her in the future. She isn't even doing it because she wants them to die. She is doing it because it is the right thing to do.

Even more she is going against a fundamental aspect of her story. Last chapter she said:
"I did not cover this land with corpses just to change the flavour of tyranny that rules it. If I don't make it better now, when will I?"

She is trying to justify her actions to Hakram and justification only matters to the just.

Letouriste

She's speak more to herself there and I don't think she try to justify anything, she just reawaken her will and original motivations

stevenneiman

There's a difference between justifying yourself and just getting back on course to actually do what you came to do.

stevenneiman

The thing is that Tyrant of Helike (or at least Kairos' take on the Name) is a dramatic one, while Squire is a humble and tactical one. Kairos can shake his fist at the heavens and come out on top because that's what his job is to do, especially when it sets the stage for the heroes to come in and screw everything up. Whether he has the means up his sleeve to derail a heroic epic with his Name on it is a question for another day, but right now he is in his element and at least with the way that he interprets his first Aspect he is tapping it like a keg.

On the other hand, Cat is doing something that is from a tactical perspective a mistake (antagonizing a powerful enemy force that she is ill-equipped to counter) and besides her Name is much more realistic which means much more difficulty whenever she tries to do anything. Also, while this might have been a low-level Struggle before, she isn't Taking anything and her other Aspects haven't been revealed. Her Name wins on the open field by superior tactics, and she's not going to have an easy time of using it to fight an enemy like the guild. Of course her interpretation of the Name is all about slogging through uphill battles she's unprepared to face, so she still might pull it off. Ironically in order to have a chance she needs to not have a chance

It's weird that Cat would think that the tyrant is an unheard-of villain given that he is named, is a lord over one of the free cities and how he had acquired his name and power.

jonnnney

Well Cat is in a fairly unique position of having met most of the Calamities. Plus her mentor has been repeatedly chided for overthrowing a free city while drunk. It probably takes a lot to be considered a well known villain in her book and ruling the free city isn't a point in his favour.

stevenneiman

She's used to thinking of the Free Cities as so mired in internecine conflicts that as a whole they cancel themselves out and are unimportant. If she thinks about them at all.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

I thought they were referring to **THIS** iteration of Tyrant specifically, not the general idea that **a** Tyrant is in charge. The current iteration is less predictable than the usual, I gather.

Morgenstern

I see an entirely different reason there: He only cropped up very shortly ago in a rather far-flung region. When even Black isn't quite sure about what exactly is going on over there in the outro(? intro??), and Malicia has to inform him... how the hell should CAT know? She had a LOT going on lately and NONE of it had to do with the Free Cities. She is NOT a ruler yet and is VERY concentrated on Callow. That is, btw, exactly the point made here in this chapter... (so glad you confirmed that, dear Erratic, yay!)

Shawn Panzegraf

Thanks,

I didn't consider that Cat was justifying. That DOES weaken her story. As to the other point, doing it because its right instead of for a "Villainous" reason, that IS Catherine's Story. Using authority earned from within the Praesi system to effect meaningful positive change for Callow. Or said another way, finding a way to make life in Callow good for the people without the necessity of a successful Rebellion against Praes.

Malicia and Black even conversed on as much, with Black saying "You know, if she wins we're going to have to allow her the power to make the reforms she wants to make. Else we become the next obstacles in her way." (To paraphrase), and Malicia agreed.

In this case though, I think you hit the crux of it with her decision being essentially a matter of Justification, Jonnnney. Cat can be right on one front, and wrong on another in accordance with the internal logic of her story and have the two decisions "cancel out"...leaving her with the result she'd get without Names/Stories factored into it.

Good catch Jonnnney 😊

Morgenstern

She basically had a return to old wavering boohoo in the last chapter. That never goes well in a 'verse so bound to story and *believing* in it/yourself...

Morgenstern

Last chapter she actually reminded me of the Lone Swordsman. Wondering if she took something more from him than just an Aspect until it fades away... All that lamenting and ALMOST being contrite, at least wavering what is actually the right thing, being unsure blahblah... SO Will. o_ô

ereshkigala

On the assassins and other Dark Guilds, why not simply blood-oath them to her? Come to think of it, why didn't Malicia and Black blood-oath all the nobles to them after their victory? You don't have to kill the enemy when you can implant them with suicide triggers or the magical equivalent and force them to work for you.

nipi

Because if she tried to get blood oaths then things would have gone the same way as described here: <https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2017/02/08/reign/>

Euodiachloris

Thieves and assassins tend to be pretty good at rules lawyering, so it'd work for all of five minutes. <_< Chaos: ignoring boundaries as they please is part of the package. 😊

The better way would be an appeal to avarice (or, at least, not tipping the board over), Vetinari-style. 🤪

stevenneiman

Which they both did with general success until now, but might run into problems now that Cat's got her hornet's-nest-kicking boots on.

Ethesis

I am really curious to see if Kat breaks the typical mold and doesn't ignore good advice.

That would be original.

Letouriste

What? You didn't read book 2 right? This is EXACTLY why her troops love her (well she is badass and loyal too), she doesn't hesitate to listen and change her opinion on matters.

Shawn Panzegraf

There's a way for Catherine to kill two birds with one stone, Though I don't know if she can do it given her current wealth-related woes. Turn the Assassins and Thieves Guilds into the intelligence and enemy subversion network she currently lacks. She'd need to win their loyalty and keep them paid, but these kinds of challenges aren't even near the same difficulty as wiping the Assassins out.

Robber can't do everything. Even the effectiveness of his harassing Heiress's new followers was on the wane as of a few Chapters ago. I'm genuinely curious what will happen next now.

(Though still quite afraid Cat will soon be thrust into one more position of power she wasn't expecting)

Letouriste

The way I see that, she need to not kill some assassins who chose to be loyal to her and finish the others

Hi! Thanks for the chapter!

Two things!

1. I really love those quotes you put at the beginning of every chapter.
2. Is he Setang or Satang?

Hakurei06

Fun fact, those quotes are known as Epigraphs, and most herein also qualify as epigrams.

"Setang" means "handlebar" in Indonesian and "Satang" is a Thai currency worth 0.01 Baht, according to that google search, google image search, and google translate tell me. A Satang strikes me as a rather terrible name to give your child (I suppose it's rather like Penny), but at least makes more sense than "handlebar".

Morgenstern

*lol

For a second there, I actually read that as an English-German mix-up =P Handle-bar = sth. you can handle (bar = able) 😊

Sailorleo

Penny as a name has nothing to do with coinage. It's a diminutive of Penelope.

Interlude: Gate

"Oh, I get it. The real treasure was the people I had executed along the way!"

– Dread Emperor Irritant I, the Oddly Successful

"Something's coming through," Kilian said.

Dawn was beginning to warm the stones of Marchford's central plaza, but there would be no bustle of humans today. There hadn't been for half a fortnight: the Hellhound had closed off this entire section of the city and garrisoned it heavily at Apprentice's recommendation. Nauk brushed off a speck of ash from the stripes on his shoulder that now marked him a legate of the Fifteenth, irritated at the way the burnt wood got everywhere. The very redhead who'd just handed him the latest bit of bad news had ordered for braziers full of holly and apple tree to be set up in all four corners of the plaza and kept ever-burning.

"How big, this time?" the orc asked.

The Senior Mage muttered in the mage tongue and squinted at the runes that formed in the air.

"Still minor," she said. "The frequency is increasing, though. They're building up to something."

Nauk spat to the side.

"Those are scouts, Kilian," he said. "Like a clan would send before a killing raid. They're looking for weaknesses."

Spikes of iron had been hammered into the stone in irregular patterns on the first day to make it harder for the Fae to step into Creation, but the border had been getting thinner with every dawn anyway. Juniper had prudently ordered that containment wards be set up around this section of the city before moving in legionaries, deploying most of the Fifteenth's mages to attend the defences. Nauk had been put in charge of manning the defences with his jesha of two thousand, the largest combat deployment of the legion since the Liesse Rebellion. While Kilian went around marking stones and muttering to herself with her posse of mages following, he'd looked for more pragmatic means of making sure anything that wandered into the plaza didn't make it any further.

Pickler had set up half a dozen engines of her own design on the rooftops that offered the best lines of fire, sappers huddling around them in quiet clusters even now. Fortifying the alleys was old hand for his legionaries, after the battles of Marchford and Liesse, but Nauk wouldn't bet on stone doing much to hold back fairies. The scrawny little shits were basically magic poured into a body, as he understood it, and he'd seen the kind of damage a properly motivated mage could wreak. Grabbing his now-cold mug of tea from the table where he'd left it, the large orc rose to his feet and drained the bitter brew. Drinking leaf water still struck him as the most absurd of human habits, but unlike a good slab of meat the tea wouldn't leave him indolent afterwards. One of the first lessons they taught young raiders, in the Waxing Moons: always hit the enemy after a meal, if you can. They get sloppy and slow.

There was no great flash of lightning or pretty lights, when the fairy entered Creation. A slight shimmer in the air, then a sparrow was flapping its wings at the centre of the iron spike maze. It narrowly avoided running into the iron-wrought invisible wall that had flattened the first of its kind to come through, skilfully weaving around it. Nauk left behind the informal command centre of his jesha, well behind fortifications and lines of legionaries, and strode to the edge of the plaza where he could get a better look. The fae-sparrow began threading through the maze, unaffected by any wind born of Creation as it flew.

"They've been watching from the other side the whole time," Kilian said quietly.

Nauk had already deduced as much yesterday: the fae never made the same mistake twice. Kilian's course track at the College had been the magic one, though, so he wasn't surprised she hadn't gotten her hand in the broth until now.

"No mischief in this," the orc said. "They're not behaving like tricksters. Something bigger and meaner is telling them what to do."

"My wards wouldn't even slow the Wild Hunt down," the redheaded mage said. "So there's that, at least."

"Don't know shit about fairies," Nauk admitted.

Which wasn't entirely true. He had an old family recipe for braising them with southern spices, but Kilian was quarter-fae and might be displeased by the revelation. Humans always got all offended when orcs mentioned eating other humans, like eating each other wasn't the most natural state of Creation. You'd think they'd never eaten a rabbit, by the way their hackles got raised.

You just had to accept that, to the Clans, everyone else might as well be rabbits.

"The Tower might have reliable records about them, but anything we have is useless," the mage said, brushing back a strand of her short red hair. "Whichever is lord and lady of what might change thrice before one of our days is over. There's supposedly four Courts of Arcadia – one for each season – but the delineation between them isn't clear. They don't all exist at the same time, either."

"That sounds like a problem for General Juniper to figure out," Nauk said cheerfully. "And the Boss, whenever she gets back."

"She's only a few days away now," Kilian said absent-mindedly.

The orc eyed the human amusedly until she coughed to hide a blush and looked away. He had a feeling there'd been precious little military business discussed during that scrying session. It was an open secret in the upper echelons of the Fifteenth that Kilian and Cat were involved, though only among officers who'd been there since the founding of the legion. The fresh blood wasn't trusted yet. Nauk didn't have much against Callowans – they were steady in a shield wall and they died spitting in the enemy's face, so there was spine to respect – but he wouldn't be trusting any of those boys until he'd shared a proper battle with them. There was an unspoken line in the sand between the legionaries who'd fought in the Liesse campaign and those who hadn't, one that had overtaken the weaker lines once drawn by race.

The sparrow made it out of the maze after a little while more, landing on the ground. The bid's form shimmered and in its place came a kneeling man wearing silken robes all in shades of blue. Pale-skinned, like the locals, though fine-boned and taller. He was the first one to make it all the way through, and that did not bode well.

"Get that thing out of my backyard, Kilian," Nauk ordered. "Before it can make a mess."

The Senior Mage raised a hand, then made a fist. There was an eldritch crackle and the smell of ashes spread across the plaza as thin spikes of light gathered around the redhead's hands. The fae's silhouette twitched, but it did not disappear. Kilian gritted her teeth.

"O lords of iron, bar my gate through your embrace," she barked. "Choke it that trespasses, smother in coils unmoving."

The twitches identified until there was a sound like bone breaking and the fae dispersed into thin air. Kilian panted for a moment afterwards.

"They've got a foothold," she said. "Prepare for combat."

"Finally," Nauk grinned, rolling his shoulder with a loud crack.

The legate cast a look at the legionaries forming a steel-clad circle around the plaza, dug in behind wooden spikes and fields of caltrops.

"UP AND AT IT, YOU WHORESONS," he called out. "THEY'VE COME KNOCKING."

All around the formation swords were drawn, shields raised and crossbows armed. The veterans who'd defended this very city from devils now ready to give the boot to the latest idiots to believe they could get a slice of Catherine Foundling's fiefdom. That was probably the best part about following Squire, Nauk thought. There was always someone trying to knock her off and they made the most hilarious faces when fed their own entrails.

"Outer boundaries are holding for now," Kilian said quietly. "My mages are feeding the wards, though, so don't expect magical support."

"I brought my own support," Nauk said, baring his teeth at the spindly scorpions Pickler had built.

Whatever arcane bullshit had been making it hard for the fairies to cross was gone now, the orc saw. Before there'd never been more than one coming across at a time – the only time two cats had manifested, they'd disappeared before even touching the ground – but now he could count at least three dozen shimmers in the air. The twinkly bastards must have been out of sparrows, because what came out was over thirty tall men and women in splendid court dress. Long-sleeved tunics of frost and woven shadows played off dresses of snow and bones, the fae wearing them even more striking than the otherworldly clothes. They were not humans, Nauk thought. Their faces were too long, their eyes too large and bright. Their teeth were the teeth of killers, not prey. Shades of skin went from dark as ebony to driven snow, not a single one of them resembling another. All were armed. Spears of bone and bronze, swords of translucent ice set with lapis-lazuli, even a few bows of dead wood whose string appeared to be crafted from wind.

"The Fair Folk," Kilian said, tone halfway between longing and fear.

"Twits should have worn armour," Nauk grunted, unimpressed.

One of the ladies idly touched an iron spike with her foot. It shattered like glass. So much for that line of defence, the legate thought.

"Lovely children," the same fae spoke, tone carrying everywhere without ever being loud. "Who speaks for you?"

Nauk pushed aside the legionaries in the front line and made his way through. Kilian followed, hands hidden behind her back. Some of the legionaries had almost dumbstruck look on their faces, the orc saw. Mostly humans. There'd been something lilting in the fairy's voice, like a buzzing in his ears, but after years of dealing with the Red Rage it might as well have been tickling.

"Legate Nauk of the Fifteenth Legion," the orc introduced himself.

He'd stopped sixty paces away, though he still felt exposed so far from the shield wall.

"Senior Mage Kilian, of the same," the redhead added a moment later.

The fae's gaze lingered on the mage, but turned to the orc soon enough. She smiled in a way that was probably meant to be enchanting. She might have succeeded, if she didn't look like a skinny pale pack of twigs in a dress. Nauk like women a little greener, and with a talent for engineering.

"So strong," the fae praised. "So wilful. This will be a day to remember."

What was it with supernatural creatures and thinking creepy worked for them?

"You got a name?" the orc asked.

"I am the Lady of Snags and Bones," she smiled. "The-"

"You're trespassing," Nauk interrupted flatly.

She looked a little miffed at that, the first time her mask of perfection was marred.

"This land belongs to the Lady of Marchford," he continued. "You're walking her street and breathing her air, without permission. Fuck off."

It might have been for the best he'd never taken any of the diplomacy classes, Nauk mused.

"Ah, but we like it here," one of the men said. "I think we'll stay."

There was a round of perfect laughter from the rest of the fae. The man strode forward and bowed theatrically.

"I am-"

"I don't really care," Nauk admitted bluntly.

"Nauk, let the man finish," Kilian chided. "We'll need more than one name for the report."

"There will be no report," the Lady of Snags and Bones smiled. "This place belongs to Arcadia now, and we do not bother with such bores in the Land Resplendant."

"You must have many questions, Legate Nauk," the man said in a conciliatory tone. "We will help you in this."

"Only the one, really," the orc said.

"Ask us, dearest one," the woman encouraged.

"Iron," Nauk of the Waxing Moons said, baring sharp fangs. "Does it spoil the taste?"

"Pardon?" the man said, blinking in surprise.

"For when you end up in the cookpot," he explained.

Kilian finished casting the signal, the number five in Miezan numerals forming out of fire above them, and the scorpions began spitting out bolts of cold iron. The orc unsheathed his sword and began backing away as the first wave of bolts speared a handful of fairies, dragging out horrifying screams as their veins turned dark and pulsing all over their bodies. Now, typically speaking, would have been the dead moment between two scorpion volleys when the sappers reloaded the engines. These were not the classic design of the Legions of Terror, however, they were children of Senior Sapper Pickler of the High Ridge tribe. Bolts dropped down from wooden magazines, a lever was cocked and the scorpions fired again.

"LEGIONARIES, FORWARD!"

Commander Jwahir, one his Senior Tribune after – well, even now thinking of that too much was likely to make him lose control, so he forced his thoughts out of that path. Jwahir's voice had been the one calling out, the Taghreb well-briefed on their defensive plans and her role in them. Even with the steady stream of scorpion fire coming from the rooftops, the fairies were not pinned down. Immediately they scattered in all directions, which unfortunately involved down the path of Nauk's own retreat. The so-called Lady of Snags and Bones was one of two that did, as well as some dark-skinned fae with a long barbed spear.

"This could have been painless for all of you," the Lady mourned, advancing with a sword that could have been either crystal or ice.

A crossbow bolt from the ranks sailed straight for her neck and she batted it aside without even looking.

"I feel like this might be the weak part of this plan," Kilian said, hands quickly tracing runes in the air even as she retreated with him.

"Don't be a killjoy," Nauk said. "How often do we get to kill anything ourselves, these days?"

"Us killing them is the weak part," the mage replied.

The Lady leapt forward like a great cat but the orc was ready for her. His rectangular legionary's shield caught the translucent blade and it bounced off the red-painted steel, though not before heavily denting the surface. Nauk had been a heavy before being an officer, so he wasn't armed like a regular: his longsword swung before she could retreat. She ducked under the swing with a mocking laugh, scoring a blow on his greaves that frosted over immediately. Fucking fairies, now he'd have to requisition another set. Kilian would have been in more trouble than him, since she didn't have a shield of her own, but when the other fae came for her she barked out a word in the arcane tongue and lightning flashed. The fairy parried the bolt of electricity with its spear without missing a beat and went to run through her throat only to hastily retreat when the lightning swung around and went for him again.

New trick, that. Her talks with Apprentice must be paying off. Feet steady, Nauk continued retreating with his shield up even as the Lady continued to assault him. She was too nimble for him to get a proper hit in, especially when wearing a full set of plate. Kilian kept her opponent away by weaving her streak of lightning, constantly murmuring under her breath even as she broke it into separate pieces and finally managed to sink part of it into her opponent's shoulder. The fae twitched uncontrollably, skin burning until a volley of crossbow bolts from their left put him out of his misery.

"You cannot defeat the Court," the Lady of Snags and Bones snarled, face turned ugly by hatred. "We will not die, will not relent, until we have our due."

Her strike sheared off the upper third of Nauk's shield but the legate smashed the rest into her stomach. She flinched, which bought him just long enough to toss the useless thing at her head. She batted that away easily enough and even managed to catch his downwards swing with her sword. Muscles flexing, Nauk tried to force his blade down. Useless, he realized. Even one-handed she was stronger than him and worse her pretty little sword was digging into goblin steel. A crack appeared, then the longsword shattered as she smirked triumphantly. She thought he was unarmed, now. Orcs are never unarmed. He lunged forward and his fangs sunk into her throat, his useless remains of a sword clattering against the ground. Nauk ripped out a chunk and pushed on the the ground, swallowing bloodless flesh as the Lady screamed. Ugh. Tasted like bad pork. A spear of flame erupted from Kilian's hand and dispersed the Lady of Snags and Bones for good.

"A gorget would have covered the throat," Nauk told the puddle of water. "That's why we wear armour, you bloody glittering amateur."

The closing wall of shields and the crossbows fired from behind them had managed to pick off the fae not run through by Pickler's repeating scorpions. The Fifteenth Legion was, once again, master of the field. Nauk returned for lines as cheers spread, Kilian at his side.

"We'll need to send Juniper a report," he said. "First incursion was repulsed, but it won't be the last."

As if to prove him right, a sharp keen immediately erupted in the centre of the plaza. He glanced back, and the way there was only a single shimmer in the air was not as reassuring as it should have been.

"Kilian," he growled urgently.

The mage was already looking at her warding runes, face pale.

"There's nothing I can do to stop that," she spoke in a low voice. "Nauk, whatever it is it's huge. It has a bigger draw on the wards than the last band put together."

The moment he was behind the shield wall he began barking orders. Whatever was crossing, they were hitting it with everything the moment it was corporeal. He'd been expecting some sort of giant winter monster, but what actually arrived was a single woman. Decked in an armour of twisted dead wood from head to toe, her long dark hair was the only part of her visible under the helmet – save for the eyes, an eerie unnatural blue. A sheathed longsword was at her hip and a spear made entirely of bronze was in her hand. The fae glanced at the storm of arrows and bolts headed for her, then tapped the bottom of her spear against the ground. Frozen out of the air, the projectiles fell in useless piles.

"We may have a problem," Kilian said.

Mist rose from the bolts on the ground, obscuring the field of vision. Nauk's officers were not prone to panic, though, and ranks tightened quietly. The mist thickened, then began swirling. Wicked-looking shards of ice began to form in the whirling mess and the legate grimaced at the idea of that spell hitting his lines. One of which, he noticed with a flare of anger, was splitting in two. A single man in robes passed through them, scowling heavily at the growing storm even as the ranks closed seamlessly behind him. Dark skin, spectacles, could stand to lose a few pounds. Apprentice had finally decided to intervene. The Named strode into the storm, tracing symbols, and a heartbeat later it erupted into a column of steam. The fae stood unruffled where it had been, pointing her spear at the Soninke.

"Do you have any idea," Apprentice snapped, "how many experiments I've had to put on hold to come here?"

Nauk choked out a laugh. The warlock's get was in a mood – this was going to hurt. A dozen blades of ice formed in the air in front of the spear and shot off in Apprentice's direction, so swift they were but pale blurs. The mage extended a hand and they were yanked to the side, passing to his left before turning around his back and forming into a single large spiked sphere as they returned to the sender. Kilian let out a sharp breath. The orc glanced at her curiously.

"He rewrote the formula halfway through," she said.

"That's nice," Nauk said.

"Nauk," she said. "That's like... solving an equation with blind variables, replacing those variables with the values you want to get an entirely different result and doing the whole thing in the span of three heartbeats."

She sounded admiring, and more than a little envious.

"There can't be more than six people alive today who can do that," she said.

"Look, now he's making a friend," Nauk contributed helpfully.

The fae was hovering in the air now, desperately trying to reach for its sword even as Apprentice glared at it.

"Whoever sent you is still listening, right?" the Soninke said. "Allow me to make this perfectly clear: if you interrupt my research again, you will be the next test subject."

Apprentice closed his fist and the fae wrenched into a ball with a sick crunch before falling to the ground. The Soninke was already walking away, complaining under his breath.

"I will abuse my rank to get out of writing the report for this," Nauk informed Kilian, making a tactical retreat before the redhead could protest.

That was so fucking cool holyshit

Let's hope Nauk kept that badass crystal sword for himself/Squire.

NerfContessa

Yep.

Never disturb the local scientist superpower.

ayon96

Will there be an extra chapter?

erraticerrata

Extra chapter will be out tomorrow. Well, today depending on where you live. I was out of the country for a week so it's been delayed a bit.

For the curious, it's titled "Crowned" and it's from the POV of Cordelia Hasenbach, the First Prince of Procer.

Emposter

Great chapter, nice to see some some more of Nauk and Killian! Deeply looking forward to next week as always.

Only error I found in my read through:
"The twitches identified until there"
Should be intensified I'm pretty sure.

Only other thing I noticed was the comment about the scorpions reloading mechanism.

"down from wooden magazines,"

Personally, I think it would sound better(or more... historically 'themed' so to speak) without 'magazine' being used. Something like "a wooden housing" conveys the same concept, while being a little more dated.

Able Company

Almost sure it was stated Dwarves used guns or gun like tech, so magazines could still fit. That being said magazine in the pretext of ammunition storage is a fairly old and dated concept: usually a large container or storeroom for explosives.

Gunslinger

Yee gods. Badasses abound in this series. I'm so glad Apprentice is on the good(or evil?) team (atleast for now).

Also gentle reminder that one can vote for the Guide on topwebfiction

The Archdevil

Apprentice is getting a lot more powerful a lot faster than I expected.

Euodiachloris

It's amazing what feats the man from Porlock will make you do.
;P

Mental note to self: never interrupt Apprentice unless bribery is in hand. And, it had better be the best biscuits and the really good china. 😊

1shot4living

Such as an angel in a plus size petri dish 😊

The Archdevil

While an angel is a good start, I feel Cat would take it even further with the bribery and give him an entire Choir. Contrition maybe?

1shot4living

Go big or go home indeed. In a villain's world, there is no such thing as overkill, just not enough backup plans.

Nairne

Justice is coming so no need to go calming for contrition

stevenneiman

Frankly this wasn't a place where it was appropriate for the Legion to lose, and Masego is in line to succeed the guy who has a collection of the corpses of gods.

Aimless

Could you point me towards where it was mentioned that Warlock has the corpses of multiple Gods?

Kilimandaros

"There's a difference between Gods and gods, child," the Calamity murmured, "and I've more than a few of the latter's corpses in my laboratory." Chapter 12: Reproval (Book II)

naturalnuke

Beautiful.

Akim

His Fathers would be so proud 😊

And Nauk personally not only killed a Named but also a Fae ..
That are some big notches for his sword

samshadar

Well, for his next sword anyway... 😊

Euodiachloris

He did better than that: he got one to pause, blink and double-take. When you disconcert the trolling-is-in-our-genes species, you've doing banter right. XD

Shoddi

Let's not forget the rather large and nasty devil he picked apart while riding the Red Rage like a surfboard.

stevenneiman

Of course, the literal notch in his sword now goes all the way through, but those are easy to replace.

JackbeThimble

I don't think the Fey count as having Names, unless you're referring to the Exiled Prince?

ereshkigala

Awesome. It would have been even better if the bantering fae had been interrupted by invisible crossbow bolts, but you can't have everything.

Letouriste

Thanks for the update! A really good chapter!
Some exposition of growth and some badassness;)
Not much to say apart I wish your story gain more coverage:)

nipi

"Dark skin, spectacles, could stand to lose a few pounds. Apprentice had finally decided to intervene."
Damn! Apprentice has gotten chubby. Thats what happens when you stay locked up in your magic tower.

Jdub

Apprentice has always been described as chubby. He's probably lost weight on the campaign if anything.

cdos93

Senior Sapper Pickler: Inventor of the Chu-ko-nu.

And I'm calling it now. Heiress -in her infinitely conceited stupidity- has decided that since Demons and Angels have both failed, she may as well strike a bargain with the Fae.

Euodiachloris

*winces* Devils and demons are bad, but only those with a yen towards a fate worse than a fate worse than death try that. 😊 I don't think she's that thick. Problem is, she might just be that conceited. -_-

And, if anybody knows how to use others' hubris, it's the fae.

Always strike deals with the Fae, it's an exceptional idea!

Gunslinger

If they're anything like the fae from the Pact web novel I'd feel really really sorry for her.

Unmaker

Even easier: just weaken the walls to Arcadia with long-term sorcery and let the fae do what they do naturally. No need to bargain, no need to be anywhere nearby when it happens.

stevenneiman

"The [bid's->bird's] form shimmered"
"The twitches [identified] until there was a sound like bone breaking and the fae dispersed into thin air." I have no idea what that word was supposed to be, but I'm pretty sure it wasn't that "a few bows of dead wood whose string appeared to {be} crafted from wind."
"So [wilful->willful]."
"Commander Jwahir, [one] his Senior Tribune"

"Immediately they scattered in all directions, which unfortunately [involved->included] down the path of Nauk's own retreat."

"It has a bigger draw on the wards [that->than] the last band put together."

I love how Masego's only problem with being called in to fight against an abomination from beyond reality is that it interrupts his experiments. That bit at the end was certainly a threat just about anyone would take seriously though.

REREADERS COMMENTS BELOW. CONTAINS SPOILERS
Probably best not to read if you are reading this story for the first time, but hey, I'm not your boss, you do you

Interesting to reread the description of the Fae we get here in the context of the later chapters. Here they mention there being potentially 4 courts, but so far we've only seen Summer and Winter. Also the wild hunt is mentioned here and in earlier chapters but not much afterwards.

(Side note, I'm confused by the relationship between the Elves and the Fae. I thought earlier they were the same thing but maybe not?)

The description of Killian looking at the Fae with longing hints at the later plot of her wanting to perform the ritual to become more Fae. Maybe shes less comfortable with her mixed blood than shes let on.

Apprentice gets a good moment. Whats the opposite of worfing? Turns up to kill off big scary enemies very easily.

Heroic Interlude: Arraignment

"Sixty-seven: putting an arrow in a villain during their monologue is a perfectly acceptable method of victory. Heroes believing otherwise do not get to retire."

– Two Hundred Heroic Axioms, unknown author

Delos was organized in tiers. It reminded Hanno of the city he'd been born in, Arwad. Smaller than Smyrna, the capital of the Thalassocracy, it had been even more strictly regimented than the larger city. There were differences, though, that grew more apparent the longer he spent here. In Arwad people lived and died in the citizenship tier they'd been born to, while in Delos positions in the Secretariat and the attending privileges were... fluid. The city itself was arranged to reflect this: behind the walls, districts were built on clockwise platforms that spiralled higher and thinner until they reached the House of Ink and Parchment. The district where one lived was determined by committees of Secretariat, the arrangements subject to monthly review according to performance and seniority. A botched report could see you lowered by a district, reaching fifty years in the civil service could earn you a manse in the shade of the city's centre of power.

The way the city had been built had made it easy to defend in the siege. The Tyrant's forces had broken through the gates once and found the lowest district turned into a killing field, the stairways up to the second district collapsed or barred as the walls of the houses above effectively became a set of inner walls. The Helikean madman had nearly won anyway. It was not his professional army he'd sent as the first wave: only mercenaries and forced conscripts from the people of Atalante. The sheer disregard the Tyrant had spent their lives with had almost managed to buckle the defences, until Hanno had intervened with his associates. Revealing there were heroes in the city had been tipping his hand early, but it was better than allowing Delos to fall. Blooding his team had been necessary, anyway. The sisters had never seen full scale battle before and the Valiant Champion had only ever worked alone. What the Bard did or did not know was buried under a sea of bad liquor, but to his understanding her Role was not meant for fighting.

As for him? To be the White Knight was to be an instrument of war in the hands of the Heavens. His years in the Chamber of Borrowed Lives had shown him the Role behind his Name, even as his skills grew, and made his hazy understanding of this into an irrefutable fact. Hanno was the veteran of a hundred battles, each more desperate than the last, but he'd not spilled blood himself before that day. Or perhaps he had. The sorceries of the Gigantes were beyond the comprehension of men, even those touched by the Gods Above. The Tyrant's response to the repulsing of his first attack had been... unexpected, though not entirely unforeseen. The walls of Delos were sixty feet high and almost half as deep, the most impressive curtain walls in the Free Cities by a fair margin, which made the city brutally costly to assault. The villain, instead of preparing to starve out the defenders, had instead built a set of large stone towers and filled them with siege engines.

The Secretariat had been sceptical these could be a threat and denied him the permit to launch a sortie to disrupt the construction. The Bard had run around their table and tipped over their inkwells in protest, which had gotten all of them thrown out as well as fined for "disruption of order", "miscreantism" and "wanton waste of Secretariat resources". Hedge and Ash had been quite displeased with her afterwards, but the White Knight did not judge. The Tyrant, once the towers were built, had linked them with rope bridges and brought forward the prisoners. Six hundred and sixty-six per tower, men and women and children from Atalante. And just like that, as Hanno watched from the walls, the Tyrant had them butchered like animals. Sacrificed so that the ground around the towers would rise into the air, floating until it was above the height of Delos' walls. They'd been bombarding the city ever since, night and day. The Hedge Wizard, tanned face paling in horror, had tried to compose herself by noting Praesi mages would have done better. They'd only have needed half as many sacrifices per tower.

They'd lost the first district again a fortnight later after Helikean infantry forced the gate under the cover of siege engines, and if the Champion had not fought her way through the host until she could hold the gates by herself for a bell the city might well have fallen. Hanno had led the counterattack of the beleaguered defenders from the ranks, the Ashen Priestess covering the host with her power so that any wound not mortal would heal within moments. It still might not have been enough, had her sister Hedge not hypnotized the Helikean officers into giving a hundred contradicting orders to their men. The Tyrant's soldiers had been driven out, then the iron gate melted and fused with the stone so it could no longer open. It would not be enough. Hence why Hanno was here on the walls, waiting for a permit.

"You could at least look like you're brooding," the Wandering Bard complained. "At best you're contemplative."

Aoede's feet were dangling off the walls, her ever-present flask in hand. He could smell the hard liquor from where he stood, the breeze carrying it like some toxic fume. The Wandering Bard looked like a hundred other girls from Nicae, full-figured and with dark curls going down to her back, but the stained leathers and the lute slung over her back set her apart. So did the way her liver had yet to kill her. Every Named learned the trick to burn poison out of their bodies early in their career and it could be used to sober yourself up, but as far as he could tell she didn't use it. Interesting, though not as much as the way she sometimes moved between places faster than should be possible. Aoede often acted the fool, but she knew too much to be harmless.

Of all the heroes in his band, she was the one he was wariest of. The others had their motivations worn on their sleeves, but the Bard? Behind the haze of drunkenness there was an intent he had yet to figure out.

"Brooding is pointless," Hanno said in tradertalk. "If something distresses you, act upon it. Otherwise you surrender all right to complain."

"So speaks the Choir of Judgement," she said. "Though you're fairly moderate for one of theirs. Most would have executed the upper Secretariat and taken command of the siege after our little tower episode."

He eyed her silently for a moment.

"I do not judge," he finally said. "That is not my Role."

"You're going to be a fun one, I think," Aoede grinned.

Hanno wasn't quite sure how to take that, so he let the matter go.

"Do you have a reason for seeking me out?" he asked.

"Secretariat just validated your permit," the Bard said. "Tonight's the night."

The White Knight looked upwards, at the floating towers and the people manning them.

"Good."

The earth under the towers gave a dim red glow in the dark, though it was not enough that torches and magelights were not used all over the floating platforms. The moon was near-gone tonight and behind clouds to boot, so the dark silhouette of the massive eagle was not greeted with shouts of alarm. Hedge was as graceless in this form as when she was human, but she managed a landing at the feet of the easternmost tower without crashing into the wall. The other three heroes riding her back, tied to it with ropes, slid down quietly. The Bard was gone again, no one knew where. Hanno adjusted the longsword at his belt when the moment he touched solid ground and put on his barbute. The solid steel helmet with the T-shaped opening lacked the protection of a visor, which most warriors preferred when wearing plate as he was, but the White Knight preferred the better visibility. The Champion and the Priestess came to his side a moment later.

Though they were both women, the two were a study in differences. The Ashen Priestess was tall and slender where the Champion was short and bulky, the first aggressively serene where the second always wore a sunny smile. The only commonalities were the tanned skin common to Levant and the Free Cities as well as his own native Ashur and the dark hair – though Priestess wore hers short while Champion kept hers in a thick braid that reached halfway down her back. As befitting of a martial Named the Champion was decked in plate even thicker than his own, her helmet forged to look like a snarling badger. Ash, as her more gregarious sister insisted she should be called, wore a mere coat of silvery mail covering a padded tunic. He could feel the power wafting from it, though it was not sorcery. Names like the Priestess' relied on the magic of priests instead of mages, that gift of the Heavens that wove miracles beyond understanding.

The shape of the massive eagle shuddered, then collapsed into a kneeling woman. The blood relation between the Hedge Wizard and the Priestess could be seen with even cursory examination, the two sisters sharing much of the cast of their face as well as their build. The eyes were where they differed the most. Ash's hickory-like eyes were common in the Free Cities but Hedge's eclectic arcane bag of tricks had come at a cost: one of her eyes was blue, the other a vivid shade of yellow. The mage's colourful patchwork robes were covered with barely-visible arcane symbols and more pockets than she could possibly be needing. Hedge stayed kneeling for a moment, then coughed out a few feathers.

"Gods," she gasped. "I'm going to be craving rabbit for weeks."

Champion helped her up to her feet, then clapped her back. Hanno saw the mage repress a wince.

"Eagle trick, very great," the Levantine heroine said, her tradetalk heavily accented. "Witch can have many rabbits after victory."

"Wizard," Hedge corrected absent-mindedly. "It's a genderless noun."

The Champion ignored that as cheerfully as she usually did.

"We shouldn't linger," Priestess said. "We'll be seen."

Hanno cleared his throat quietly to draw their attention.

"Swiftmess will be of the essence," he said. "If they cut the bridges between the towers, this will get much more difficult."

"Kill invaders quick," the Champion agreed. "Then go back for parade."

"You can fill out the paperwork for that, if you want one," Hedge muttered under her breath.

The White Knight grimaced at the thought. It would take at least a fortnight to get the form to request the request form.

"You know the plan," he said. "Let's end this for good."

They moved seamlessly, what they lacked in experience made up by the instincts of their Names. The door at the bottom of the tower was barred but the greataxe the Champion used – almost as tall as she was, and used single-handedly with her large shield on the other hand – smashed it down with a single swing. The hall behind it was swarming with Helikean infantry but Hanno did not waste time engaging them. The Priestess and the Champion would take care of it. Calmly unsheathing his longsword, the White Knight headed for the stairs. A cluster of soldiers tried to get into his way, shields raised, but a trickle of power to his legs had him smashing into the mass of them like a trebuchet stone. They scattered under the impact and Hedge hurried behind him, dropping a ball of multi-coloured light in their midst that exploded into bindings. His first kill of the night came when a spearman atop the stairs thrust the tip towards his head. The flat of his blade slapped away the shaft, then a twist of the wrist buried the point into the man's throat. Without stopping he flicked out the sword, the Wizard pushing the body below when it fell on her.

Hedge's assessment had been that the ritual room would be close to the middle of the tower and she was proved correct: a heavily barred iron door with glowing runes on it was the only thing on the second level. Letting the Wizard finagle her way through the wards would have taken too long and he could already hear soldiers rushing downstairs, so Hanno drew on his Name. The Light flooded his veins, harsh like a desert wind hollowing out his insides, and it wreathed his hand in a gauntlet. He punched through the iron like it was parchment, ripping out the bar holding the door in place on the other side.

"That's one way to do it," Hedge said.

She hurried inside anyway. The room was covered with ritual symbols, painted in what he was fairly sure was blood. In the centre, surrounded by a pentagram whose every corner bore line joining the broader web of runes, was a single perfect disc of obsidian.

"Stoneglass," the Wizard grimaced. "Of course they'd use the most unstable kind of anchor available."

"Is this a problem?" Hanno asked.

"There's a not insignificant chance the ritual will blow up instead of converting," she said.

The White Knight frowned.

"How not insignificant?"

"Eh," Hedge said. "It'll work out. Probably."

He did not think that had been meant to be reassuring, which was good because he was not reassured in the slightest. Before he could reply, the mage muttered something under her breath and strode into the symbols. Immediately a dozen orbs of red light appeared in the air, but the Wizard snapped her fingers and a bluebird slipped out of her sleeve, wings flapping as it chirped merrily. A dozen rays of fire instantly incinerated it, but by the time its ashes fell to the ground Hedge was barely a foot away from the disk. A spherical barrier of transparent force formed around it but the Wizard whispered an incantation and it started flickering until it disappeared entirely. She deftly placed a polished pebble on the disk and backed away hastily.

"We don't have long," she said, absent-mindedly producing a little mirror to catch a ray of fire and turn it back against the orb that had shot it out. "Are the others done?"

Hanno cast an eye down the stairs. There was a plume of ash as Priestess dispersed a man out of existence with a word, and not a single person or object in the vicinity of the Champion remained unbroken. She, at least, seemed to be having a good time.

"More or less," he replied.

He whistled sharply, drawing their attention. The Champion waved, Priestess sighed and immediately began making her way up. Hanno's attention turned to the stairs leading above and he frowned. He'd heard soldiers earlier and prepared himself to cover Hedge's back, but none had arrived. That was not a good sign. The White Knight put a spring to his step and emerged on the third floor, which was abandoned. There was a pair of unmanned ballistae and racks full of projectiles as well as a set of stairs leading to the roof, but no enemies. The threshold to the side led to the rope bridge linking this tower to the next one and he immediately moved towards it. The arrow whistled an inch to the left of his head, the soldiers on the other side of the bridge already in formation. That was no issue, but the way two of them seemed prepared to cut out the bridge was. Instead of pouring more reinforcements into the fight below, the Helikeans had retreated in good order and positioned themselves to cut off their losses if necessary. How unpleasantly competent of them.

Barely a heartbeat had passed since the arrow clattered against stone and Hanno's mind quickened. He would not make it across the bridge in time, which would endanger the entire operation. He would not make it across the bridge in time on foot. The White Knight was moving forward before he even thought of it, Name pulsing inside of him. The winds howled through his veins, carving their marks.

"Ride," he whispered.

Light roiled violently by his side, taking shape and flesh until a horse stood – without breaking stride Hanno hoisted himself on it, extending his hand so that the lance of light would form inside it. The horse moved swifter than any mortal mount could have, across the rope bridge within three breaths. The lance pieced through the first soldier's torso, flesh wafting smoke, and a sword stroke sent the other one's head tumbling to the ground. He'd moved quickly enough the Helikeans were too surprised to immediately attack. Hanno let go of the lance, allowing it to disperse, and the horse's hooves caved in the head of the man at the centre of the enemy formation. A heartbeat later the mount was gone and he dropped to his feet, landing gracefully even in plate.

"Fucking Hells," one of the archers in the back exhaled, knocking an arrow.

The longsword cut through both the bow and his throat in the same swing.

"Retreat," an officer barked. "Collapse the next-"

He swallowed his tongue before he could finish, clawing at his throat as he choked. Hedge had caught up. There'd been twelve soldiers, before he'd crossed the bridge. Now there eight, seven when he caught a man's blade and broke it before his hand snaked out to grab him by the neck. His grip strengthened, the cracking sound heralding another death. These were Helikeans, though. The descendants of the same soldiers who had waged war on the mightiest nation as a single city-state and forced the man to surrender or see Salia burn to the ground. They did not flinch or fail. One allowed his blade to run him through to keep it stuck as the two remaining archers took aim again – only for the first to twitch, then disperse into a cloud of ashes that had the other coughing. Priestess had arrived. By the time the Champion had crossed the bridge with her axe raised, there was no one left alive on that side of the tower. The other two heroines made their way more slowly.

"Kill everyone," the Levantine complained. "Like hog."

"What do pigs have to do with this?" Hedge blinked.

"She means we hogged the kills," Ash said.

"Yes," Champion agreed enthusiastically. "You all big hogs."

"Would you stop calling me a-" Hedge began, tone irritated, before Hanno cleared his throat.

"You can take point, Champion," he told the short woman. "We need to get to the westernmost tower and fast."

There were seven towers, in all. The Wizard's overtaking of the ritual on this one would take care of roughly half, but for the destruction to be complete they would need to do the same on the other side. They were on the third story now, where all the rope bridges would lead, so at least there would be no need to move around. That did not simplify matters as much as Hanno would have thought, as he found out. By the time they cleared the third tower, the one they'd landed on had begun to move. There was a deafening sound as it rammed itself into the second tower, half-collapsing but continuing to push it into the third one. At the fourth they found the bridge out already cut when they arrived. Hedge would not be able to turn into the giant eagle again until dawn, and she lacked another form that would carry them all. Priestess managed to craft a thin line of solid light for them to walk across while getting peppered with arrows. The Champion took three in the chest but her Name was remarkably robust: it barely slowed her down. Less than an hour had passed when they arrived to the last tower, but it had still taken much longer than he would have liked.

Behind them three towers had impacted into one large ruin, but the central one was barely touched. Hedge would have to add some momentum to the conversion on this side if they wanted to break the central tower, which she informed him would increase those "not insignificant" chances of blowing up. The seventh tower was already deserted when they arrived, the rope bridge that used to lead to it having been cut from the sixth tower's side. Magelight could be seen shining through the stairs that led below.

"This is a trap," Priestess said.

"Not even a subtle one," the Wizard added.

"We mighty," Champion argued. "Trap feeble and dim, like Procer soldier."

"It doesn't matter," Hanno said. "We need that tower moving."

And so down they went. There was no iron door here, only a single hall that took up the entire inside of the tower. A banquet hall, as it happened. There was a long table set there, set with a feast that would have fed three dozen people – and it was still warm, by the looks of it. There were five seats set, and one was already filled. The Bard waved.

"You lot really took your time," Aoede said. "I've been here like, forever."

The only other person in the room laughed. Behind the table the same ritual array that Hanno had seen before was reproduced in painstaking detail, save for one difference: at the centre of symbols, the obsidian disk was set on a ridiculously gaudy throne flanked by leering gargoyles. One where a boy was lounging lazily. He couldn't have been more than seventeen, but he looked frail for that age. His limbs were thin and his skin unhealthily pale, his body topped by wispy brown curls bearing a crown of gold with jewels set in them. The boy had a sceptre of ivory across his lap, with a roaring gold lion's head. The Tyrant of Helike smiled at them, his ugly red eye twitching.

"So you'd be the White Knight, then," the boy mused. "And sundry sidekicks. By all means, sit. I've had a meal prepared for you."

"The wine is great," the Bard said. "Fruity, with a hint of arsenic."

"You've had enough of it to kill several villages," the Tyrant commented. "I'm actually impressed."

"Pheasant look good," Champion said.

"Poisoned," Hedge hissed at her in a low voice. "The word you're looking for is poisoned."

Hanno ignored them, calmly making his way down the stairs. The villain stirred on his throne, looking at him.

"Is this the part where you rail at my Evil ways?" he asked. "I've been looking forward to that."

"I do not judge," the White Knight said.

The silver coin appeared in his open palm, as it always did. As a child, Hanno had seen the laws of men fail. He'd believed in the citizenship tiers, before he'd seen what they did to his mother. And yet Ashur was on the side of Good, was it not? So many places across Calernia were, and yet injustice was rampant. The thought had tormented him, as a child. How could one tell which laws were just and which were not? Picking and choosing was... imperfect. One's discernment could never be flawless. It was constrained by the events of one's life, the limits of one's intellect. Hanno could have, he supposed, destroyed the laws he'd seen destroy his mother. But what would he have replaced them with? His own beliefs, as fallible as those of the men and women who'd crafted the laws he railed against? That was not rectifying an evil. It was replacing it with a different shade of the same. But he'd found an answer, hadn't he? He flipped the coin, watched it spin in the air. It landed on his palm. The crossed silver swords, not the laurels. The Seraphim had rendered their judgement.

"Kairos Theodosian, Tyrant of Helike," the White Knight said, tone eerily calm. "The Choir of Judgement has looked upon the sum of your existence, and found you wanting."

Heat flooded his veins, lighting up his senses. For once, everything felt right.

"The verdict is removal from Creation."

The boy cackled madly.

"Now that's the stuff, hero," he said.

The Tyrant rose to his feet, twirling his sceptre.

"Bard, play something ominous," he ordered.

Aoede raised a finger, drained the rest of her cup, then picked up her lute. Every other time she'd played in front of Hanno it had sounded like she was committing musical murder but this once, the song ran true. Deep and urgent and dark, like death circling. He almost shivered.

"Your soldiers are dead," the Priestess said, standing by his side.

"You are alone," the Wizard said, hands already tracing runes.

"Your skull make cup," the Champion enthused. "Get me many lovers."

The boy grinned, red eye burning.

"I am the Tyrant of Helike," he said. "Dead or not, they are in my service."

The villain's sceptre pulsed gold and made a sound like a gong ringing. Hazy silhouettes formed in ranks in front of him. Soldiers, all of them. Ranks upon ranks filled the room and they unsheathed their swords, strung their bows. Lances were raised and horses whinnied.

"Shit," Hedge cursed to herself. "We got monologued. Never let them finish the monologue, Hedge, that's how they get you."

The soldiers moved and the White Knight charged. There was a sheen of light to his sword, and not even spectres were beyond his ability to cut. He sidestepped a lance, cut through the apparition's belly and carved through the head of the man-at-arms behind it. The heat built up inside of him, spilling out in motes of power as he killed his way through the host. The Hedge Wizard spat out a stream of smoke that enveloped the spectres in front of her as Priestess wove a circle of sunlight around her that burned the soldiers whenever they neared it. The Champion bashed a spectre's face with her shield, apparently indifferent to the fact that they were intangible. She was not, as far as he could tell, even using her name. The Tyrant's crown lit up and shot a beam of red light at him, because naturally the madman would turn his regalia into a magical weapon, and Hanno grit his teeth as his plate began melting. If it was not lethal, then it was just pain and obstruction. Those he could deal with.

Hedge threw a small ball of fur at the Tyrant that turned into an angry ferret, distracting enough by clawing at his face that the beams ceased. Now would be the time to call on another of his aspects, he knew. But even with the villain distracted, spectres kept appearing faster than they could be killed and the Champion was beginning to get buried. The moment she was, the sisters would be under assault and it was all downhill from there. There were on the Tyrant's chosen ground, and Hanno had seen enough heroes die in the Chamber to know how this would end.

"Hedge," he called out. "Crash the tower."

"We're still in the tower," she reminded him.

"Yes," he said patiently. "There's no way we could survive that. Therefore we will."

"Do it, Alkmene," Priestess hissed. "We can't keep this up."

The Wizard cursed again and leapt forward, turning into a sparrow before she hit the ground. She began rising in the air but archers took aim and Hanno hurried towards her – too late, he'd be too late. One after another, the arrows clattered uselessly against the Champion's great shield as she charged through a spectre to get there in time. Casually, she decapitated an apparition and kicked the intangible body into another. The sparrow flew through the melee, weaving around swings and arrows to land in a crash on the obsidian disk. The Tyrant threw a now-dead ferret at her, but taking the stoneglass off the throne had been enough. The tower, after a heartbeat, began to fall. The villain frowned thoughtfully.

"I had something for this," he said. "This tower will be your grave? No, Anaxares said that was second-rate. This isn't over yet?"

The gargoyles flanking the throne animated and began flapping their stone wings, grabbing the Tyrant by the shoulders. The dragged him upwards, heading for the stairs. The boy suddenly inhaled.

"Oh! I'll get you next time, heroes!" he said shaking his fist in their direction.

By the time the villain was out the hall, which was still falling, the spectres had dissipated into a thick mist lingering on the ground. Hanno waited until the Wizard had turned back into her proper form.

"I don't suppose putting the disk back will end the freefall?" he asked.

"With the momentum we have going?" she grimaced. "It'll blow up in our faces instantly."

The White Knight sighed. So much for the easy way.

"Everyone, gather close," he said, reaching for his Name.

They did. Hanno closed his eyes and gathered his power, waited for the beginning of the impact that would signal they'd touched the ground.

"Wait, how are you not wounded?" Hedge said. "I saw you take hits."

"Witch not so smart," Champion said. "Ghosts no real, can't hurt."

"Ignorance is not a magical power," the Wizard yelled.

The White Knight felt the shudder under his feet, and instantly released all he'd gathered. The world went white.

JackbeThimble

So Calernia gets some competent heroes at last, and we get some real action for the first time this book, excellent chapter.

I remain a bit perplexed by the story structure here, with the main plot apparently playing out hundreds of miles from the protagonist.

Cir_C

I think it is setup for Black vs White Knight which will have deep ramifications for the story going forward. Seems like with Catherine being the Squire and all she will get swept up in their conflict and maybe she will be forced to make her Choice, the only Choice that truly ever matters...

Theo Promes

I don't think so – these guys are competent, yeah, but they play by the rules, like the tyrant. heroic action to break the siege, epic showdown with the evil overlord, escape by the skin of their teeth out of the falling tower. Black is someone who breaks the rules, so unless there are mitigating circumstances, I'd expect the calamities to wipe the floor with these heroes, they don't have nearly the same experience. Remember what the actual fuck ranger gets up to when she's bored, and we are talking about four of her party mates...

Cpt. Obvious

Ranger is on another level if you are looking at skills and power. She's many centuries old, if not millenia, and the legend other legends grew up hearing about. Remember when Captain went for a week long rampage? Grew larger than a three story house? Remember how Ranger played with her to keep her from killing to many civilians in Ater? She held back so she wouldn't kill Sabha by mistake. She didn't even use her Name powers...

Ranger is more dangerous than the rest of the Calamities together if you are only looking at straight up fighting.

What makes the rest of them so dangerous is Amadeus leadership and mind, not to forget their strong loyalty which is all but unprecedented among Villains.

nipi

I think all heroes except for the White Knight and Bard will perish. And they will find their way to Cat once the Tyrant is dead.

Personally I think the Tyrant will try to kill Black. Maybe in some grand plot to kill the Calamities and heroes in one fell swoop.

Letouriste

You're wrong cir ce, she already made her choice long ago. She's a bad guy on the evil side...I wondering if the act of killing your mentor is powering your name...in particular if the relationship between them is deep.

Euodiachloris

I'd be really interested in that particular coin toss when it comes to working as Team Black-and-White vs Evil Classic. Because Black and White are equally unconventional takes on the usual expectations of their Roles at this point in time, if in different ways.

Because I very much doubt that the majority of White Knights have had "I do not judge" as the root of their conviction before... 😊

Cpt. Obvious

Hanno is a hypocrite! He claims he doesn't judge and that he is leaving that to the Choir of Judgement. Thing is that Judgement can see everything about whoever they are passing judgement on and are never making a wrong judgment.

Sounds great, right? Or does it?

This is Judgement with a capital. Judgement doesn't weigh good against bad, it doesn't see gray, just black and white, guilty or innocent, and the verdict is live or die, no second chance ever.

And Hanno knows that. He also knows that very few are perfectly innocent. Almost everyone has done something that weighs on the side of Evil. It doesn't have to be much. If he flipped that coin for everyone he met a lot of good people would die. So he only uses it when confronting someone he believes is evil. So he does judge. He judged that the Tyrant was so Evil that he flipped the coin knowing what the verdict of the Choir of Judgement would be.

So Hanno definitely passes judgement on the people he meets.

intermediarywebserial

It feels set-up so that he finds someone who lands on the laurels, like maybe Squire, but even Squire knows the shit she does.

Jeffery Wells

It's setting the stage for the next phase. Black and the Calamities's role as precursor and guide is basically complete, but they are now in the way for the next generation to rise. Traditionally that would be solved with murder, but for Catherine to murder Black to get his Name would ruin her character. My guess is these events are leading to Black's death, so Squire can transition and gave the larger war that is building.

Also, it can't be all action all the time for the protagonist. We've gotten to the boring part of her story, where she figures out how to be a competent ruler, and the heroes side story allows for time skips without being jarring.

Misza Mojcysz Schmidt

That's because they weren't eradicated at the start of their carriers. Lone Swordsman and company were a n00b team, that's only a good foe to n00b villains like Squire and Heiress, not Calamities.

danh3107

That was so horrendously cliché it looped back around to being entertaining. How do you do it Erratic?

Naeddyr

That's easy: you write something so cliché, so troperific that is actually *loops back around to being entertaining*!

Letouriste

Hahaha

Euodiachloris

You left out "but, only with deft handling". 😊 Because, when it comes to Hammer Horror levels of campy cliché, you really need to know how to handle the volatile things, or they blow up in your face. XD

stevenneiman

It's easy. Just have everyone in the story acutely aware of the fact that it's all cliché. On one hand we have a hero specifically planning on the fact that if something is obviously impossible for any of them to survive they will get through it unscathed, and on the other a villain so trope-aware that he not only plans out his hammy one-liner but also requests dramatic background music.

JackbeThimble

So Delos' White Knight is also Harvey Dent?

Nairne

Yea. While we have Cat in the role of the Dark Knight. See? Even the naming fits (somehow). Seriously though, I can see how she flips responsibility on the White Knight. Flip a coin, butcher a bunch of people, leave dealing with the aftermath to someone else. Because they will definitely have a better solution, and he can essentially wash his hands of any flaws and problems that may arise from that.

nipi

Well Harvey Dent was the White Knight before becoming Twoface.

And Cat will be whatever Callow needs her to be.

Morgenstern

Uhm... if I remember correctly it was the Joker that gave Harvey Dent the coin tick while making him into Twoface... no?

Basically, the White Knight IS already Twoface, unless the coin toss is actually meddled with by Heavenly Powers That Be (he did say something of laurels – although... that doesn't necessarily have to mean there are even laurels on THIS specific coin, come to hink of it ^^). Would be funny if the coin actually stopped effing working with someone he really, really would have liked to kill (even though he "doesn't judge") and/or if he could be made to doubt what he did so far... aaaaall those lives taken for a coin toss, my ass, yeah.

darkening

"There's no way we could possibly survive that. Therefore we will"

heh, I love how important genre savviness is in this series. And the tyrant is *such* a great character. Can't wait to see what he'll do next, I mean, half of creation isn't arrayed against him, so he can't fail yet.

Cir_C

At first I was a little bummed that this was an Interlude, but somehow this ended up being really great set-up for the White Knight and his harem, though it seems like he also isn't interested in any of them romantically, which is also a trope just the same. What the Guide is really good at is taking the obvious tropes from various genres and make them so obvious that they then have a completely original feel to them because they are super important to the background lore.

And this talk of Names vs Roles I think is incredibly important to the background lore/story that is at play throughout and beyond the events of the Guide. The White Knight, for instance, is the Name a person takes up/comes into, which in-universe gives them limited super powers, either active powers called Aspects or the passive powers like the ability to detox poisons as mentioned in the chapter, and marking them out as individuals of some import in the greater story. But even beyond that, what Role someone plays in that larger story seems to be far more mercurial and even more powerful and influential but in a subtler way. I think the best example of this is Black vs. the previous Black Knight. Black remarks that he really can't get much power from his Name, he can maybe manifest a spear-sized bolt of Name juice to use as an attack whereas his predecessor could summon a massive storm of Name power to fight. Yet, it is Black who has helped lead the most sustained period of Praesi military success in generations and has proven to be one of the most capable individuals in the story. This leads me to believe that this is because Black's Role in the Guide itself has caused this to be the case. And what is his role? His Role is the Mentor to the Protagonist, Catherine, not merely a stock Villain or a backwater warlord as Black himself once said. It is more important for a Named person in the Guide to be in tune with their Role than their Name, it is what provides them with strength their Name couldn't even hope to measure up to. I posit that this is just further demonstrates that Guide is at once a fun and engaging story but also a brilliant commentary on the nature of story-telling, by exposing and internalizing the meta-narrative devices authors use, the Guide becomes in truth a Practical Guide to Story-telling just as much as to Evil.

But I must admit I'm just shooting from the hip and wouldn't be surprised if I wildly over-thought all of this...

AVR

Black was a great general before Catherine made her way on to the scene. Focusing on what works rather than on what powers Names seems to have made him great.

Kairos the Tyrant seems to be the opposite. He's thrown himself into the role which powers his Name and can summon an army of ghosts in moments without even being out of breath afterwards. It doesn't bode well for him long term.

Hanno the White Knight seems to be between the two. More power than Black, but not army or storm-summoning level, he summons a magic horse and fights well, and apparently he can protect a small close group from massive damage when he is prepared and has the story on his side. He seems less devoted to his role than the Bard expected, anyway.

Wrt. Black: You can also look at it as he was living through his own backstory, while being one of the protagonists at the same time (The champion and love interest for the innkeepers daughter on her way to become empress).

It is a story telling classic to branch a story with younger characters while showing more senior characters in more of a support role.

Daemion

"Ignorance is not a magical power" ... it is, if belief shapes stories and reality is a story.

I quite like the new heroes. Competent, somewhat funny and they don't have that holier than thou attitude of the previous batch. The Tyrant is just having fun and doing whatever he wants for the hell of it.

And soon the Calamities will walk into all of that. It'll be explosive. 😊

mgmtheo

"Praesi mages would have done better. They'd only have needed half as many sacrifices per tower."

Good to see Imperial efficiency is well respected. Can't have the filthy do-gooders getting the wrong ideas.

agumentic

"Sixty-seven: putting an arrow in a villain during their monologue is a perfectly acceptable method of victory"

The reverse is also true, as we all seen.

nipi

No killing a hero is never acceptable. That's why that job falls to villains. However doing so during a monologue is effective all the same.

Burnsy

Hey, now these guys actually seem like a likeable, competent group of Heroes. The Tyrant is really committed to stereotypical villainy, but he makes it work.

The Calamities are going to rip these poor sods apart.

Also I notice that the naming scheme for Heroic Interludes has switched from fencing terms to legal ones. That's interesting, wonder if the naming scheme for Villainous Interludes will get a shake up too.

Brent Chance

The theming on the interlude names is likely due to:

- A fencer being a type of Swordsman.
- The White Knight being an agent of Judgement.

Burnsy

I assumed so too, although its interesting that Cordelia's interludes also got fencing terms last book. Following the pattern I'd have thought that her's would be based on something like chess terminology. Maybe EE just bases it on the main Hero/Villain that Cat will be facing?

This is just me musing and rambling, by the way. I just find naming patterns interesting, like the "All According To..X's Plan" arc in Book 1.

stevenneiman

Burnsey: Actually, the second interlude for Cordelia was called Precipitation, implying possibly a weather theme for her interludes. I can't recall what the first one was called.

Burnsy

Ah, but that was a regular old Interlude, primarily Anarxes. And since it was about the Tyrant and called 'Precipitation' and then he did that whole mass destruction thing with a storm in the prologue, it was probably foreshadowing that.

Morgenstern

> The Calamities are going to rip these poor sods apart. <

I sure hope they do. =D And if one of them SHOULD die in the process, I seriously hope they get a DESERVING end and not just some shitty offing by hero because hero. That would suck so much, this being a story NOT about the "Good Heroes", but one making most all of us rooting for the other ones who are the real protagonists, in main and side story, as well as the ones driving this whole story of "new Practical Evil" and how to do it... (and winning!? We hope...)

Morgenstern

Hm.. come to think of that... after all the description of Scribe's relationship with Black and all the foreshadowing for "Black's demise now, in a week, a month, or a decade"... and her not being truly one of them (according to the "Dramatis Personae"), but only closely related, probably not really Evil either... I can totally see her doing the Page move, where Page didn't succeed... popping up in front of Black to take the killing stroke in her own breast – and fucking things seriously up in other respects because of one less Spymistress being around that was rather important to the whole Black('s) organization... Well, or simply dishing out one hell of a revenge right-back-at-you. 😊 (And whatever would Ranger do? Or Malicia.. or the other Calamities.. this would seriously not just involve Cat, not by far... She's nowhere near either unless the fighting moves to Callow once again, because she is there...)

On the other hand... if Cat can resurrect herself... I'm seriously wondering and have been for a while why Black has the extra title of "Carrion Lord"... we didn't yet get an explanatory flashback for that one. =/

Morgenstern

I mean, yeah, of course, it might just be that he has left such a massive trail of corpses in the past... but that would be a rather lame explanation for such an extra name. Also, higher necromancy seems to be quite common in the higher ranks of Evil, not just by the examples of Gods-know-how-many former Tyrants/Emperors/Empresses... always destroy the corpse and make sure they cannot rise... But yeah, this new hero bunch now has an Ash priestess... it just won't fit in my head that of all the tropes this trope of the villain coming back should NOT apply, if they The Practicals even fall at all, what with this being THEIR story, too (and not just Cat's, judging by the title, whatever the character summary says about "main protagonists" and listing all the older ones only under "Praes").

Morgenstern

Hm... further thought: We have some a multitude of hints by now that "the Uncivil Wars" are incoming – somehow I for one seriously doubt that is all just about civil war of the Free Cities against each other, and very much suspect that we will also see an civil war in PRAES upcoming. That, though, is the exact silver lining Black has hinted at in the extra-chapter on his and Malicia's meeting, that he simply does not dare to hope for (yet), because we all know how the Gods like to smash such hopes and overconfidence... better to prepare for the worst. War against the Truebloods would be directly down Black's alley, though – and Catherine is very much steering that way, if you ask me (as is Malicia in using Cat to probably get rid of Heiress and to get rid of Tasia in the process (potentially by other means, though), too). Heiress and Cat seem absolutely destined to clash again. And what can that mean other than a war against the nobles backing Heiress? If Cat doesn't totally fudge it because of Fae invasion, vengeance is finally incoming... and that will mean a carrion trail... unless we should surprisingly really see only a sociopolitical clash because of "seek new allies" blah. Somehow I doubt that will go over all that well, though. Especially with Cat being so unsure of what exactly even is her alley there and how to make it work and then the Fae meddling on top, stacking cards against her once more and FOR Heiress in giving her time to get that much closer to her goals. All is hinting at a culmination of Nobles' Plans in the span of one year. I don't see even Malicia getting past that through only diplomacy, however brilliant and ruthless, and embarrassing her opponents to de-fang them. The title theme "Uncivil Wars" would seem to second a BRUTAL clash, militarily-so, not only politically backstabbing-wise. Simply defusing that after all this foreshadowing and with the background of the other two books? I don't see it that working quite well. It would be too little badassery and shit-hitting-the-fan in there, if all just ends in a tiny logical puff and "all is well without (actual) war"...

The quietist

Gotta say The Tyrant might be my new favourite character. He just seems to enjoy his Role so much he really is having "a jolly good time".

nipi

Exactly! Come now and enlist in the Helikean army! Places in the front row guaranteed.

Euodiachloris

Pass. Although, I might choose the Role of Cannon Fodder if the alternative is Seeker of Licenses and Forms in Triplicate by Last Monday. 🤪

Burnsy

Double posting but I was struck by a sudden train of thought and I need to get this idea/theory now. This also got massively out of control and rambly, apologies.

So I was thinking about how these guys seem more like an actual heroic party, while Willy's guys were, frankly, a complete mess. Then it struck me, William was The LONE Swordsman. The fact that he was running around in a five-man band instead of going solo was even something Cat complained about. He was never supposed to be a leader, he wasn't meant to be the protagonist in the story the Gods had planned, Cat was!

According to the Gods plan, Cat was supposed to choose to become a hero the night that she became the Squire. Her story was supposed to go something along the lines of; making a heroic escape from the Black Knight's villainous clutches, fleeing to Summerholm and joining up with the Lone Swordsman.

The two of them fight and kill all the Squire claimants (accidentally ensuring that Heiress becomes Amadeus's inheritor) and then run off and join up with the rest of the heroic crew. Eventually Willy slinks off to do his broody loner thing while the rest of them go on some adventure that bonds them forever etc

The thing is, Cat's whole thing with the 15th was taking a bunch of talented people with crippling flaws and helping put them in positions where they reinforced each others weaknesses and became a greater whole. Instead of fostering division like William, she'd have got the Bumbling Conjuror, Thief, Hunter and TWB working together as a real team.

Then in the end of the Book 2 equivalent she and her group become the first to kill a Calamity in Summerholm and then head South to fight Heiress, Apprentice and the Fifteenth Legion. They team up with the Exiled Prince, setting up for them to help reclaim his throne in the Book 3 equivalent, and then William sends word that Heiress has summoned and unleashed a demon and they race to Liesse just in time to fight and defeat her. Apprentice escapes, swearing revenge, and William summons the angel of contrition. Cat ascends to the Queen of Callow and begins preparations to lead the next Crusade.

That was the plan anyway. Unfortunately for the Gods, Cat said screw that and now they have an incipient Dread Empress waiting to climb the Tower.

Jaertin

I like it! Explains why this White Knight got Hyperbolic Time Chamber training. Cat was supposed to take up the mantle of White Knight and lead the Callow adventurer party, and eventually take down Amadeus. Then suddenly they were short a White Knight and the heroic party was in shambles with Lone forced into the wrong role.

I think the Lone Swordsman was supposed to be their Sixth Ranger, Mamoru type person. The guy who shows up conveniently when the fight is turning against the heroes, then leaves, and is mysterious/more morally ambiguous than the main party. Probably supposed to be Cat's love interest too.

Jaertin

Come to think of it, I suspect Apprentice was also "meant" to join the heroes. Heiress already has magical means so he's not a great fit with her. The Bumbling Conjuror, however, was an obvious filler, and a filler means something else was meant to take that place. It even fits thematically, if Apprentice joins the heroes then with him, Cat and the Hunter you have three students turning against their evil masters. That might be a significant pattern in addition to generally making the heroic party the anti-calamities.

Even Apprentice's half-demonic upbringing works in eventually making him the Merlin to Cat. Of course realistically Apprentice would never turn against his loving parents, but the Angels are noted to have a very poor understanding of human nature.

stevenneiman

I had noticed the bit about how bad Angels are with people skills too. Supposedly there are tons of stories about demons trying to masquerade as humans and being found out by some fundamental misunderstanding of human nature, but so far demons are two for two with trying to trick humans (the corrupted pony and the fake demon), while the Heavens are zero for one with their failure to convert Cat. They even had the advantage that it took a while for her to even make her own decisions before she could choose to stand up to them.

Yitzi

I'm not so sure that Cat isn't following the plan. After all, she did say near the end of book 2 that she felt that Creation itself wanted her to succeed, and that doesn't really fit if she's not playing her proper role (and quite an important one). She's now essentially on the fence between the two sides...and in a setting like this, that is quite a significant position.

Dianna

That is an interesting thought. Cat is on the fences between the two, and Oh look here is the White knight and the Black knight. Both competent, both reasonably likable... I too almost think it will be like her first name dream all over again, having to choose between the sides, except in that instance, Cat basically told both of them their way wouldn't cut it, as well as telling the angels to shove it.

So while it might be an interesting thought have her, say, have to choose between the White and Black knight, she has already made her choice.

Burnsy

True, but I think the angels wanted her to win against Heiress because, you know, the demon summoning. Then she says suppose to be Mafie Contribute, Queen of Blades, Crusade, yadadada.

The gods above are basically a bunch of GM's desperately trying to railroad Cat back into the plot they had planned.

"What the fuck she didn't die?? We buffed the Lone Swordsman, nerfed her and set up a rule of three to give him stat bonuses. How the fuck is she still in the game?"

"No look, it's fine, we've sent an Angel of Contrition, she'll be back on track in... what do you mean she rolled a nat20 on her intimidate check!?"

Son of Arathorn

Haha! Wouldn't a DnD in this setting be so glorious tho? Stay bonuses for how in tune with your Role and Alignment, Unique Aspects approved by the GM according to prior, and the setting is wonderful. Anybody want to do this?

stevenneiman

That wasn't a grand plan for her to succeed, just her Name trying to finish its pattern of three with the LS. Of course then Akua went and screwed it up with her pet abomination and again by providing Cat with an "enemy" for the Sword in Stone trick. For a supposed archnemesis, Akua has a strong habit of accidentally helping Cat. First she maneuvered Cat perfectly into a position where all she had to do was pull off an impossible victory in the eleventh hour against non-Named, and threw in an awesome tactician ally to balance some of Cat's weaknesses at no extra charge. Then she played the bad cop to let Cat win desperately-needed support as the good cop twice, then she passively pulled Cat's ass out of the fire just by needing to beat her for the pattern of three, then she fixed Cat's Name and gave her a chance to get a sweet new set of Aspects when her extra trump card backfired (while also throwing away that mandatory victory unused), before finally providing the enemy required for Cat to steal her resurrection and defeat the Lone Swordsman once and for all. She's less of a fearsome threat to Cat's objectives and more like some kind of annoying Santa claus.

Dragrath

I love the argument you guys brought forth very convincing, but don't forget there are more than the gods above and their angels 😊 The powers of villains come from the gods below so Cat could very well have been breaking someone's plan yet still following a "plan". As after all, we have seen so far that the gods below want mortals to do their own thing rather than follow a script thus bonus power for add-libbing the story 😊

cdos93

oh wow, that makes a ridiculous amount of sense. The new heroic party also draws parallels with the "intended" group of heroes. To use the 5 Man Band trope:

Cat/White Knight as the Leader – pretty self explanatory
Thief/Hedge as the Lancer – foil to the leader. Thief would be the Han Solo type Lancer only interested in money at first, and Hedge is the Snarker in Contrast to the strait-laced Knight
Hunter/Champion as the Big Guy – The melee expert in each group Conjurer/Ash as the Smart Guy – Pretty obvious, being the magic casters of the group.
Wandering Bard as The Chick

NerfContessa

If you're a Sith, sure.

Cat ain't though calling her The Cat Sith wins many a pun contest.

Luve the hedge witchzard btw.

stevenneiman

Interesting thought. I don't know if the plan was that precisely laid out, but it does make sense as an alternate timeline where she took part in all the same battles and won for the other side. It would also fit with the fact that she has the new Aspect Take, if it could have somehow worked retroactively to allow her to keep the allotted victories and spend them elsewhere.

Personally, I think it's more likely that what she did was throw off the Lone Swordsman such that he never had the narratively appropriate moment to win. She pushed him into a leadership role that put his Name on the fritz, and then managed to play Akua and William against each other such that their assigned victories basically canceled out. Finally, she turned the two idiots against each other one last time so that she could steal the sword in the stone, and with it William's moment of victory. Now she has not only the power and authority to rule Callow, but the stolen will of the heavens ensuring that she does, and villain or no she has the will of the people to support her claim and make this a story about her ultimate triumph. In a way she draws power from not only being the heir to Black and Malicia's pragmatism but also the power of both Good and Evil, and a Name that despite its weakness is designed to handle either and theoretically both. It's also a transitional Name, which means that she has the chance to grow into some new Name, though I'm not sure what it would be called.

Dianna

The Gray Knight? Catherine the Gray? Or maybe just The Knight? Not sure if the world could handle such blatant Neutrality. Though Ranger and Archer don't seem to have any particular alignment.

Euodiachloris

When you've got a figure who tests anybody, regardless of status or allegiance by basically saying "screw convention: come at me if you think you're hard or canny enough" – you're in uncannily Green territory. Which, is technically, in Blue and Orange Morality and, therefore, doesn't actually give a flying fig about the whole Black vs White thing. 😊

Interestingly, Cat seems to have a faeish thread to her tale: she's bedding a faeblood lass, and is in the process of telling a bunch of trueborn fae to go screw themselves: her turf! "Mine! My own! My duty, my view, my people, my word! I keep what I own by whatever means I can!" is the very heart of Green. 😊

Pretty much, except he may or may not have the choir of judgement vetting them before they he does the wetwork.

Pretty sure the Choir of Judgment is in on it though and I would put it at 50/50 chance that if so no one had been found innocent as of yet.

nehemiahnewell

He didn't kill "the upper Secretariat" because "he does not judge." I think it's safe to say that judgement is discerning.

Unoriginal

Replying to myself here, but @nehemiahnewell we don't know if he flipped the coin or not. Maybe he didn't, maybe he did. But honestly it sounds just like a being of extremes to judge almost anyone as wanting and unworthy or at the very least in need of tough love.

nipi

Apparently ignorance is the greatest power of all. The madman who believes that nothing is real will be invincible.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Indeed: just look at how quickly Catherine is gaining powers thanks to the controlled ignorance Black has been fostering.

malphasius

It seems like certain stories or patterns are locked into Creation itself. The last two books it has been the pattern of three that gave Cat so much trouble. How much do you want to bet that there is also a rule of opposites. Meaning that with both the Black and White Knights in the same general area they will have to have a one on one showdown. Of course knowing Black he will find a way to subvert this.

stevenneiman

Depending on the direction the story goes, it might be that Black dies setting up a way for Cat to defeat the White Knight. Suddenly, vast responsibility and power will be placed on her beyond what she expected, and she will have to figure out a way to cope. Maybe she'll even end up killing both Knights and claiming their Names, though if she did she would need to prove that it was what Amadeus wanted or she'll have the other four and a half Calamities and possibly the Dread Empress looking for payback. Not a good position for anyone to be in, even if they did somehow end up with two Names at the same time. Probably more likely that she takes on the mantle of Black Knight and just kills Hanno. We'll just have to wait and see.

Dianna

I think it is pretty clear that Cat is going to be the next Black knight, she had her chance to go good last book. As for two Names? How would that even work? Names are Roles, they signify the part a person plays in a story. I don't think anyone can have two Names at once, especially two Names so obviously opposed to each other. You can't be an offensive force for good, and an offensive force of evil at the same time.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

"You can't be an offensive force for good, and an offensive force of evil at the same time."

Sure you can, if you're offensive enough,

Morgenstern

"It takes a NOVICE to defeat a master." – If Cat would suddenly be pushed into the next name by Black dying ... no longer novice. To hell goes all that nice foreshadowing (even though that might have been purely meant for un-Named Cordelia against Empress Malicia, but... it didn't feel like it..).

But maybe I'm just turning a willfully blind eye there, because I feel Cat **already** getting into Black's name as horribly inappropriately way too early. And I effing hate the "Mentors have to die" shit. Especially when Cat is NOT a hero for whom this trope was made for...

Morgenstern

Names are Roles? Nahnahnah... now you're mixing it all up. Names and Roles are definitely NOT the same thing. Otherwise you'd never need two names for the same thing and that would just be bullshit.

Letouriste

"Wizard," Hedge corrected absent-mindedly. "It's a genderless noun."

I'm just seeing too much in this or you made a feminist character?^^

In any way this chapter rocks:D really funny. I've particularly liked the banter(of course) and the depiction of Delos;)

Did the white knight see each recent hero death? He talked like he had see hundred of downfall of heroes...

You managed to make a good heroes group:) well,that's probably not as hard than their contrepast given there are a lot of inspiration for that everywhere:)

erraticerrata

Merriam-Webster's definition of wizard: "1. One who practices magic; a sorcerer or magician". No mention of gender there.

stevenneiman

I don't think she so much a feminist as just offended by having the incorrect term applied to her. Consider how Masego would react if someone called him a warlock, with or without capital w. Besides, there's a fair chance that witch has a Evil connotation given its negative use in the real world and the fact that the Exiled Prince called Cat one despite her lack of any magical talent whatsoever.

Soronel Haetir

I'm going to laugh so hard when he flips his coin judging Cat and it turns up laurels and then he stands there confused and is killed.

Dianna

I think that means he has to try to take her as his Squire XD. Oh god that would be fun to see.

Naeddyr

There are so many ways this could go, trickery-wise too, depending how integral their "virtue" is to an angel. If Judgement really IS Judgement and IS just... Ho boy. All sorts of shenanigans can be arranged, ALL SORTS OF.

Conversely, if the choirs are just in-name-only or more political in nature (ie. the angels CHEAT), then that's a way to bring a paladin to fall through doubt...

stevenneiman

Or Cat will find out about the coin and just tell Masego to create an illusion of laurels. Then run him through because he doesn't think he's allowed to fight back. Alternatively, convince him to check one of his allies and then do the opposite illusion and make him kill them. That would probably be even funnier.

1shot4living

Or Cat with some Name trickery makes it land on its side. Shenanigans ho!

The Warren Peace NFL Report

I don't think the coin flip would be laurels. More likely for it to land on the edge and balance there. The second part of your comment could still apply

Son of Arathorn

Triumphant! (May she never rise) I can't wait for the patreon to get enough slaves, 1 chapter a week isnt enough for my addiction. On a side note, I wonder if Ratfaces Ex will ever return? I feel like this is the calm before the storm, watch out White Knight, you've never faced a villain like this: "Unleash the goat!"

Morgenstern

Eh? Ratface's Ex = Aisha? Return from where/what? o0

Morgenstern

Confused because as far as I know she's never been gone. Or did you just mean "more text for her"?

GeneralChaos

Ratface's Ex is the name of an undead explosive goat from the first book. The name the sappers actually uses is "Aishadn't Have Done That" or something, but Cat is anti-pun.

"Hanno adjusted the longsword at his belt [when] the moment he touched solid ground and put on his barbute."

"a pentagram whose every corner bore {a} line joining the broader web of runes" I assume it should be that and not "lines"

I really wonder whether Kairos has figured out some way to avoid losing like a classic villain or if he's going to die like Triumphant (may she never return) having won great victories but ultimately unsuccessful. He seems like he might be setting up a pattern of three with the way that he fled the scene defeated with a cheesy one-liner, but that would probably be spoiled by the fact that he was defeated by multiple enemies rather than a single nemesis.

He's far too trope-aware to not see where this is going at this stage, but at the same time he has yet to do anything to protect himself from a Heroes triumphing in the eleventh hour. Anything we know about, at least. He seems to dislike blindly following any preset patter, but at the same time he has thus far been acting like a massive ham and doing nothing to avoid the cliched path to defeat.

ficial

Going to be interesting when the heroes eventually fight their way to Cat, the coin is tossed, and it comes up Laurels.

If the white knight said he fought more than a hundred battles in his experience, so, does that mean that Black and co had fought a lot, a lot more? I mean a villain's life span is naturally longer than a hero's. And Black did say that his group had put down a lot of heroes even in just a year. (But I forget the exact statistics already.)

Soronel Haetir

Black said that he has personally killed 23 heroes (or heroines) and orchestrated the death of more than three times that. I'm not sure where you think you saw a yearly stat.

Morgenstern

There was a kind-of "yearly stat" for CAT, about what she achieved in just two years... maybe the confusion stems from there?,

Shawn Panzegraf

1) Black is going to die. He's said it himself, and knowing his end isn't exactly far off is, I think a big part of why he's gotten so paternal with Cat. He heard and acknowledged Malicia saying that was a weakness of his, one he's turned into a kind of strength, but still a weakness. Yet he doesn't change what he's doing. Malicia told Cat that Black is going down. She even gave Catherine a rough expiration date for Black. I believe Malicia is trying to save Black. Since he's going to die because he did all the wetwork when he was helping Malicia consolidate power versus the Truebloods, Malicia is out to finally destroy the Truebloods by taking down Heiress's mother, and with her the rest of the Truebloods. The fact Malicia is willing to risk Heiress reaching an endgame that would end Malicia's regime says a lot about her loyalty to Black, despite the crippling fear she constantly wrestles with. However, Malicia is pragmatic enough to realize there's a good chance she can save neither Black or herself.

In subverting the pattern of Evil Classic Dread Emperors/ Empresses, Malicia is doing something none of them ever did. She's actually putting effort into trying to ensure Praes remains in New Evil hands if/when she and the Calamities fall. Rather than allowing the New Evil Legacy created by her and the Calamities to vanish in the hands of the next Evil Classic asshole. Don't believe for an instant Malicia isn't aware Cat's been hearing "The Girl Who Climbed the Tower." So long as Cat doesn't try to cut down Malicia's time as Dread Empress, I don't believe Malicia is opposed to Cat taking over. With the Truebloods gone it could be doable...and, assuming Cat proves she can handle Callow, I see no reason why Malicia wouldn't consider Cat a viable New Evil heiress (little "h"). This is supported by Malicia taking so much interest in what Cat wants, and stepping in to help advise her/avoid making missteps in Black's absence as much as Cat will allow.

2) The White Knight was built by the Heavens to be the end of New Evil. All that experience watching thousands of conflicts between Heroes and Villains that resulted in his being so genre-savvy. It smells of an attempt to create knockoff "New Good." Except the Heavens really don't know how to take their hands off the steering wheel. Hanno might've got it done. Hanno as Grand Bitch of the Heavens is a dead man walking. Hanno has the goods to absolutely wreck the Tyrant and any other Evil Classic he runs across. He has the goods to be a pain in the ass even to New Evil, but while he might bring down Black and the Calamities, he'll fail to close the deal when Cat comes to bat (Not just because she's the Protagonist either. Did anyone else sense the disconnect in Hanno? He's basically JUST the White Knight. He "White Knights" to White Knight, as a result of his early negative experiences. He doesn't seem invested in anything as a person beyond playing his Role...just like the Tyrant.)

3) I kinda feel sad for Heiress. She's doing all of this to free her father and herself. Yes, she's an awful person...but she's falling into that Evil Classic trap of thinking she'll still be able to enjoy/savor any victory she achieves no matter how many lines she crosses, and of course she wouldn't be able to even if Cat wasn't going to ultimately stop her. None of that means I won't cheer when she GOES DOWN IN FLAMES, but yeah a little sad for her.

4) I'm not sure Cat will become the Black Knight this book. If she does it'll probably be fairly close to the end of this book IMO. There's definite ambiguity in her being Black's heir, yet the whole Girl Who Climbed the Tower thing. Don't really know what the two possible (or perhaps successive) paths mean.

(Anyone else have theories on the Black Knight/Future Dread Empress alternate/successive path issue?)

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Wait... "crippling fear?" Malicia? Sorry but either I completely missed something really important, or you completely imagined something really important

Morgenstern

Nah, it was absolutely mentioned directly in the story... how Black would have called on Wekesa to take the asshole down who put her in his seraglio and must have repeatedly raped her for fun, ending up in her being heavily traumatized and having absolute angst about ever being that helpless and out of control again, ending up in the assumption (it seemed to be Black's POV, more or less, but possibly inserted with some third person know-it-all...) that Malicia is all about CONTROL. She doesn't do leaps of faith – Black is necessary for that. He did the leap for Cat and Malicia seems to have trusted him on this, which enabled Cat proving herself – to become a fine new tool in the Empress's accessory, it would seem. Of course, if Cat is sticking to Malicia's plans for her (or even Black's plans for her)... is dubious. 😊

Morgenstern

Something along the line of "they wanted to see her old laugh again and see the fear in her eyes vanish", and how Black wouldn't even had to have asked Wekesa (Warlock) bc. in his own way Wekesa loved her, too (and then that line about her eyes and laugh).

Morgenstern

(And how Black's way would not have been poison, but calling on Wekesa for the most horrible way ever to take someone out. But having felt he needed to leave that victory to Malicia's own hands.)

Barthumphries

It could be something like Black Catherine the White Knight. You know, like the Los Angeles Angeles of Anaheim: https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Los\_Angeles\_Angels\_of\_Anaheim Their primary website lists them as the "Los Angeles Angeles". However, for legal reasons they have to be known as the city that they're actually in (Anaheim) so that's still part of their legal name. Los Angeles and Anaheim are in different counties in CA and everyone in CA knows they're absolutely not the same place, but most people outside of CA don't know the difference. It's like thinking that New York and New Jersey are the same place.

Anyway, why not claim both names? Just because nobody's done it before, why should that stop her?

RandomFan

I think someone has probably done it before, if it can be done, and would be able to tell you exactly why taking a villain and hero name at once is a bad idea. Two neutral or good names is fine, though.

RandomFan

Well, still implausible and likely to end badly, but vastly superior to two opposing names, and also to evil names. evil doesn't play nice with anyone, not even itself.

Barthumphries

Perhaps if she sold out as coopting the good name... If she were to **Take** the good name. 😊

stevenneiman

Oh no, you were stronger than I thought, how could I be defeated so easily, etc. Toodles!

Morgenstern

Hedge stayed kneeling for a moment, the[n] coughed out a few feathers. (needs the "n" in there)

There'd been twelve soldiers, before [...]. Now there [were] eight, (needs the "were" that is missing)

Morgenstern

You know, it would be fun to see the White Knight getting wind of the succession plans of Black/Malicia for Cat (what with that "only a novice can...")... and then come for Cat to get their New Deal of Disturbing the Balance of the World undone. Failing, of course... I could totally see that, as the Bard is all about THAT and seems to dislike/fear Cat the most, while not being all that concerned about the trouble of the different realms.

(Especially if this is supposed to be some kind of New Deal for (the) Good – it totally makes sense, if you're ruthlessly-ends-justify-the-means and AngelsWantYouToBringJudgementToThatAndStopEvilMasterplan (which necessarily NEEDS the second generation, on whom all eventually hinges!) to go for the *apprentice(s)* first, the supposedly still-weak guys that are despite being yet-weak meant to succeed and bring about the longterm-generations-plan WHILE they are still (supposedly) weak. Pragmatical move is to off the weaker help first and only THEN go for the big ones behind them, when they have less help, after all.)

Morgenstern

On an off-hand note: I'm really waiting for the Dead King and probably the Chain of Hunger, too, to make his/their move in this book, after all that foreshadowing when it comes to them... they HAVE to be up to something ... or there has to be a reason why they're not ... "coming out to play" currently (although... maybe it might even have to do with the Arcadia/Fae or, if on the hilarious side, Triumphant supposedly being in Hell, too, where the Dead King has obviously already moved in, at the very least having barged through the front door).

Morgenstern

I'm also interested in finding out if Ranger will pop up somewhere again. I mean with all that Chaos incoming... there's gotta be something of interest to HER, too, hasn't there? I don't really see her not coming to help in the last moment for Black, for example – or at least going after someone responsible for revenge (Scribe, too, btw...). Hm. So many contingencies... Black's death would cause so many OTHER ripples, I can't help but feel that would upset the whole main plot (as far as what it seems to be so far) for THIS book, besides the whole Cat-is-not-ready-point, because it would draw in too much other stuff/people besides Cat. *headscratch

But who knows, maybe you actually do have some genius plan to put it all in line and I just fail to see it for being partially blinded by the Shiny Badass Bastards One Can't Help But Root For Them hypnosis employed for greater shock effect when the Dump *does* come early... *shrugs

But yeah, my main point for ranger was “worthy targets”, what with that extra chapter on her we got. In all THAT, there really should be worthy targets, no?

Morgenstern

*ahem

(Yeah, Badasses You Can't Help But Root For 😊 – applying to her, too *g* Their thought child is certainly *getting there*, I have no doubt. Just on the road yet.)

I do so love a good pure evil villain. Call it a foil, call it a palate cleanser; either way, it works quite well.

Chapter 3: Demesne

"You can never have too many tiger pits, Chancellor. That's the same lack of vision that has people say "that's too large a field of energy to absorb" or "calling yourself a living god is blasphemy"."

– Dread Emperor Malignant III, before his death and second reign as Dread Emperor Revenant

Marchford had come under attack during my absence.

That much became clear as soon as we got in sight of the city. There was no dramatic plume of smoke announcing it but the way the Fifteenth had been deployed was sign enough. The outskirts of the city were untouched but I could see from a mile away that the central plaza had been heavily fortified and was manned with soldiers and siege engines – all of them pointing towards the inside instead of the outside. Juniper had managed to keep life going outside of the restricted zone she'd carved out in the middle of Marchford, to my approval, but that she'd even needed to do this much was telling. I'd learned much about Legion formations, over the last year, and what I was looking at was standard practice for a long-term static defence. Whatever fight had been picked it was not over, even if there was nothing to see right now. Just when things had been starting to pick up for the city, I glared. Typical.

Zombie the Second kept a slow pace, as I was the only mounted member of my party. The Gallowborne were infantry through and through and Hakram, who I would have preferred to be mounted, could not be. Orcs panicked horses just being being close, unless they were trained war destriers. Those were in a short enough supply that any the Legions of Terror could get their hands on were sent straight to Thalassina. The Thirteenth Legion was garrisoned there and, having been raised out of Callowan rebels and criminals, actually had a cavalry contingent. The knights of the Kingdom could have eaten that bunch for breakfast and still been hungry, but compared to the orc wolfriders that represented the Empire's only other mounted option they were still a vast improvement.

"That's two rings of defence," Hakram said. "Whatever tickled the Hellhound was nothing to sneer at: she usually prefers stacking the first line to defence in depth."

Which meant Juniper had to face the serious possibility that her first line of fortifications would be swept away by the opponent. There weren't a lot of forces on Calernia that could threaten a hardened wall of legionaries backed by mages and siege engines. Most of them were supernatural in nature.

"You lost a month's pay, then," I said, squinting at the city ahead. "That's too blatant to be Heiress' work."

"Whoever physically assaulted the city could be a catspaw for her," Hakram said smugly. "It's impossible to prove she wasn't involved."

I cursed under my breath. That was the same as people blaming Assassin whenever any prominent figure died – it could be true, in theory, but how the Hells would anyone know?

"You're never going to win, either," I pointed out.

"Until I do," Hakram grinned toothily. "Just a matter of time."

I'd put money on heroes, myself. They always turned up at the most inconvenient of times, and just when Marchford was beginning to have some breathing room would have definitely qualified. No head was on a pike by the road, though, so I could safely assume no hero had gone into my city and committed suicide by Hellhound.

"Did anyone have fairies?" I said.

"Ratface," Adjutant said after a moment.

"I hate it when he places bets," I muttered. "He always knows more than he's letting on."

We'd had to form the pool on the down low, since Juniper frowned on the practice. Something about it diminishing the dignity of officers. The general couldn't technically punish me for anything, but she insisted on hour-long meetings about patrol routes and drills whenever she caught me involved. The Hellhound's sadism knew no bounds. I cast a look at the column of Gallowborne following behind, then sighed.

"Let's pick up the pace," I said. "The sooner I hear the reports, the sooner we can take baths."

Hakram frowned at me.

"I washed in the river not three days ago," he said.

"So now you smell like river and wet dog," I said, spurring on Zombie before he could reply. "Soap, Adjutant, soap."

It was rare enough I got to have the last word these days I savoured the feeling all the way to Marchford.

A patrol met us outside the sight of the city walls, or at least the promise of walls. After I'd had the parts of the city wrecked during Battle of Marchford made liveable again, getting some actual defences for my home built had been a priority. I'd charged Pickler with designing and building the fortifications months ago and she'd had a shiver at the words I was fairly sure was a sign of arousal for goblins – her eyes had gone a little wide and fluttered, too. The first plan the Senior Sapper had drafted would have turned the city into the same kind of army-breaker Summerholm was meant to be, but I'd sent her back to the drawing table after a quick look. Marchford was not a border fortress and while it was to be the seat of the Fifteenth it would live or die on trade. Which her seven overlapping rings of walls and bastions would complicate a great deal: no real thought had been given to civilian streets and arteries, or even housing districts. The second draft had been much more reasonable.

The towered curtain wall around Marchford she'd sketched was nothing too fancy, but where the Talbot Manor had stood before I'd had it torched would become a proper fortress. Permanent barracks were added to accommodate the Fifteenth, with access to training fields for drills and mock battles. That draft I accepted, and mandated she start working on when feasible. That was the first rub, unfortunately: being feasible. Her sappers had been needed to repair the bridge in and out of Marchford, and when that was over simply would not have the numbers to undertake as large a project as building the fortifications for an entire city. Not if I wanted to be done before a decade has passed, anyway. That wasn't acceptable: the entire reason I needed those walls now was so that when Heiress tossed her next abomination at me my soldiers would have something to stand on.

The obvious solution was drafting hand from the rest of the Fifteenth, but Juniper had flatly refused. It was one thing to keep sappers busy in peace time, another entirely to draw from the rank and file for a civilian project. Especially when she was integrating a massive influx of Callowans and other fresh recruits into the Fifteenth, trying to turn them into a cohesive fighting force. Fortunately, Marchford was a mining city. There was available skilled labour, which at the moment milled around aimlessly or enrolled into my legion to make ends meet. That was the second rub, so to speak. Those miners would need to be paid. I was, sadly, close to broke. There was not enough trade coming in to fill my coffers, and raising tariffs on what was currently coming would just kill it off entirely. Taxing a city who'd effectively been sacked less than a year ago and of which a third of the population had lost their income when the mines closed – courtesy of Heiress fucking me over with a demon whose corruption was still far from gone – was a good way to have revolt on my hands. I still drew my pay and so far had done little to spend it, but it was a drop in the bucket compared to what was needed.

The only saving grace here was that my legionaries also drew pay from the Tower and had nowhere to spend it but Marchford. That had slowed the bleeding some, though there was only so much that buying ale, whores and grub could do for a city. In the end I'd had Pickler outline the foundations for what would be the city walls and freed her to take care of the bridge. We needed the trade more than the defences, right now. Staring at those ropes and pickets put me in a foul mood, a reminder that soon I'd need to either borrow coin or effectively go bankrupt. I'd ordered Aisha to look into my options before I left for Southpool, so maybe she'd have good news for me. That'd be a first.

I dismissed the patrolling legionaries without bothering to ask questions about what had happened to the city, heading straight for the guildhall Juniper had appropriated during the Battle of Marchford and never returned. On the way there, after having sent off most of the Gallowborne back to the barracks for well-deserved rest, I was presented with the sight of a tired but still ridiculously pretty redhead escorted by a gaggle of mages.

"Lady Squire," Kilian smiled.

I spurred on Zombie instead of replying, scooping up my Senior Mage by the waist and setting her in front of me before she was even done squeaking in surprise.

"Cat," she protested. "We're in-"

One arm still wrapped around her waist, I leaned forward to interrupt her with a kiss. She smiled against my lips before sliding a hand around the nape of my neck and replying in kind. Teasingly, I bit her lip before withdrawing when we were both out of breath.

"Kilian," I finally said. "I missed you."

She rested her head against my breastplate, for once the fact that she was slightly taller than me not apparent.

"Missed you too," she muttered. "Even if you're making a spectacle of us, you utter brute."

Hakram cleared his throat loudly, because he was the most inconsiderate creature ever spawned in Creation. I ignored him, pressing my lips against the crown of Kilian's head and already craving something stronger. I hadn't seen my lover in two months and to say I'd missed her would have been something of an understatement. Hakram cleared his throat again, louder.

"We're having a moment, you sack of sentient manure," I said.

"Good afternoon to you, Senior Mage," Adjutant said, cheerfully ignoring my insult.

"Lord Adjutant," Kilian replied, with as much dignity as she could manage while wrapped in my arms.

"I see you've been abducted by some sort of barbarian warlord," the tall orc mused. "Whenever you manage to free yourself from captivity, I imagine we'll be needing you for the staff meeting with General Juniper."

The redhead wiggled in my arms and reluctantly I allowed her to slid off the horse. Zombie the Second took all of this rather placidly, staring at a food stall on the other side of the street with greedy eyes. Kilian coughed, got her pixie-cut hair in order again and composed herself.

"I was actually sent by Juniper," the Senior Mage said. "The general staff was assembled for a meal, so she's extending an invitation. The most pressing reports could be handled at the same time."

I grimaced. Well, no sense in delaying it. I could go for a bite anyway, there were only so many times you could eat standard Legion rations before wanting to jump off a bridge. Oh, and I'd get a real bed tonight. Gods that would be nice. I snuck a look at Kilian, drinking her in even if legion gear was the opposite of enticing. With a little luck I might even have company in that bed, and I was looking forward to that a great deal more than sleep. After I'd learned that our scrying sessions were very likely being listened in on I'd curtailed, uh, certain activities we'd sometimes indulged in when time allowed.

"You're staring, Cat," Hakram said.

"Am not," I lied.

I slid off my saddle and handed Zombie to one of the Gallowborne. Kilian smiled and began moving, Adjutant and I following.

"Killjoy," I hissed at him under my breath before we caught up.

He grinned back unrepentantly. One of these days, I promised myself, I was going to get a minion that didn't give me lip.

"No wonder you're so small," Nauk said. "Look at the size of those portions."

I pointed my fork at him over my bowl of oxtail stew and sambusa.

"I will end you, you ugly green gargoyles," I promised. "Don't think I won't just because you're a legate now."

Hune rumbled in approval.

"His commander would handle the paperwork more quickly, if she had his rank," the ogre said.

There were no seats capable of accommodating someone the other legate's size, so in the end someone had taken off the back of a stone bench and dragged it inside. Unlike the rest of us, who were taking our portions from the communal bowls, Hune had been brought her own. Considering her side dish of koshari was larger than my torso I could see why.

"I'm not doing the forms for it, if you murder him," Aisha said, daintily picking at her plate from her seat at Juniper's left.

"They'll be handled promptly, don't you worry," I said, and Hakram cursed under his breath.

He should, since they would most definitely end up on his desk instead of mine. The Hellhound speared another slab of uncooked red meat with cumin from the bowl only orcs were using and dropped it on her plate.

"Don't start murdering officers, Foundling," the general said. "I'm told it's habit-forming."

That was almost a joke, and I still wondered at how the orc was willing to unbend even that much in private. Never when anyone but the general staff was there, but it was still like night and day compared to when the Fifteenth had first been formed. Going through the Liesse Rebellion together, all the desperate battles of the campaign, had warmed her considerably towards me and the officers who could once have been considered my "faction" in the Fifteenth. Those old lines were long gone, now. Like Captain had once told me, showing proficiency at violence was the quickest way to earn an orc's respect. Ratface and Kilian were chatting with Pickler further down the table but I refrained from sending a longing look in that direction. There would be time enough for that after we were done eating. I dipped the sambusa in the stew and bit off a piece of the meat-stuffed pastry. Still warm, I hummed in appreciation. Someone had gotten their hands on a decent cook from the Wasteland.

"So," I finally said. "Looks like I missed a battle."

The amiability – or what passed for that with Juniper – slid off my general's face the moment the subject was broached.

"A single skirmish, so far," the Hellhound said. "Fae crossed over from Arcadia in small numbers."

Further down the table, Ratface smothered a grin. The bastard, in all senses of the word. He'd be filling his pockets deep with that one.

"Do we know why?" Hakram asked.

The conversation in the back had petered out when I'd begun the formal part of our meal, and Kilian was the one to field the question.

"They're claiming the land for Arcadia," she said. "Exactly how far their definition of 'the land' extends isn't clear at the moment."

I fished out a piece of ox and popped it into my mouth, chewing thoughtfully and wiping my hands on the cloth afterwards.

"That's a problem," I said. "I'm already using that land."

"We think they're Winter Court," Nauk said. "They used ice, anyway, and they were arrogant little shits."

"They're all arrogant little shits," Juniper grunted. "Wouldn't be fairies otherwise."

Sometimes it was reassuring to see that the vast majority of my officers were even more terrible at diplomacy than I was. Made me look better than comparison, at least.

"No negotiations were attempted so far," Aisha said, the exception to that last thought. "That does not mean, however, they are impossible."

"They did not seem inclined to negotiate, Aisha," Kilian said mildly. "Otherwise we would have tried."

I raised an eyebrow. She must have been on the scene herself, then. I would have been worried, but the redhead knew how to take care of herself. She might lack in power compared to some other mages, but she made up for it in swiftness and control.

"I believe the terms used by Legate Nauk after the introduction were 'fuck off'," the Taghreb said, tone sardonic.

I shot the orc in question a look. He grinned, then shrugged. Well, Nauk had always been more of a blunt tool than precise instrument. There was a place for that. Sometimes it wasn't about how fancy the trick was, it was about how hard you could clobber the other guy. And as far as clubs went, my legate was among the finest.

"Dealing with fae is like dealing with devils," Ratface said. "They always screw you on the technicalities."

"I'm not taking the option off the table," I broke in. "But at the moment, that's not the situation we're looking at. If they're invading our priority is clear."

"Defences," Juniper growled with approval. "Our mages have set up wards, but the reports are the border between Creation and Arcadia is thinning regardless."

I glanced at Kilian, who grimaced.

"That is beyond my knowledge," she admitted. "Apprentice might know more."

"I notice he's not here," I said. "What's he been doing all this time?"

"He cleared out the strongest of the fae to cross and threatened them not to attempt it again," Hune said. "He did not leave his tower before, and has not since. It borders on dereliction of duty."

The ogre's tone was thick with distaste. Masego, I sighed internally. How are you worse at making friends than I am? Not, I would admit, that Hune was the cuddliest of my merry bunch. She didn't speak much and was easily irritated. I'd had her under my command for about a year and still knew next to nothing about her. Hakram, usually a fount of useful gossip, had nothing to tell me about her either. Quiet, competent, never socialized much even at the College. Nothing I hadn't observed with my own eyes.

"Lord Apprentice is not officially part of the Fifteenth Legion," Juniper said, in the tone of someone who'd had to make that point before on several occasions. "He has no obligation to us."

"I'll talk to him," I said. "Assuming he can't contribute, what do we have on our side of the field if the fae come back?"

Pickler rocked in her chair, which I noted with amusement was stacked with cushions so she'd sit about the same height as the rest of us.

"My sappers have built two rings of fortifications around the plaza, using the existing houses as props. We've installed cast iron foundations on everything, which Senior Mage Kilian informs me should afford them some protection against fae magic," she said. "To target the fae themselves, I've had scorpions of my own design installed and nailed to the rooftops. One of the invaders used strong winds during the incursion, which would limit their effectiveness, so I've also had catapults loaded with sharper-filled iron balls placed behind the second ring."

Pickler seemed as if she wanted to say more, but one look at Juniper and she rethought the notion. I checked with a glance and, predictably, Nauk looked like she'd just slipped him some tongue. Ugh. I should not have inflicted that image on myself.

"We need to consider the possibility those fortifications might be made permanent," Juniper said, thankfully claiming my attention.

"We'll need to redirect civilian traffic through different streets if that's the case," Ratface said. "The plaza sits in the middle of the main artery in and out of Marchford."

I sighed.

"Start looking into it," I ordered. "Wishful thinking isn't going to make this go away."

The Taghreb bastard raised an eyebrow.

"Well," he said, "if you believe some of the stories..."

I looked at Aisha.

"Him you'll do the forms for, right?"

"They're already filled just in case," the Staff Tribune replied without missing a beat.

"Defence is all well and good," Nauk grunted. "But you don't win wars from behind walls."

"Can't send scouts into Arcadia, Legate," the Hellhound said. "Not with the way it warps time. The logistics would see them dead or the information gathered useless."

"So don't send scouts," the large orc said, baring his teeth. "Send an army. We happen to have one of those lying around."

"We don't know enough to commit to that at the moment," I said. "For all we know, this could be a minor incident that will never escalate."

There was a moment of silence at the table. Hakram was the first to snicker, which broke the dam. Laughter splattered over the room, ebbing after a few moments.

"I'll talk to Apprentice, see what he knows," I said, still smiling. "Anything else that's urgent?"

"No Legion business," Juniper said, and that was that.

We dug into the meal properly and I allowed the renewed sounds of chatter to wash over me. It was, I thought, good to be home.

I love how comfortable they are with each other

Nafram

hmmm, this chapter was rather short, I suppose it was necessary though, since it seems to be the tie-in kind, now that Cat's in Marchford, the more interesting parts, such as Pickler's mother and whatever Masego has been up to can begin

Euodiachloris

Oi, you forgot her first love! I think I know how Pickler and Engineering are getting along, but the details were rather sparse! Could stand to see them together, rather than reported on! 😊

Daemion

Awww, Cat just broke the Gallowborn's little hearts. They were crushing so hard on her and she is now obviously no longer single.

Letouriste

Well I sure they already know long ago, that's a secret and all but the Gallowborne is protecting her tent 😊.

"Squire stopped before her men were too bruised to walk, clapping them on the shoulder amicably before dismissing them. Ratface idly wondered how many of them were already in love with her. Her relationship with Kilian was not common knowledge – he'd made sure of that – and Named always attracted admirers the way carrion attracted flies."

It's not common knowledge, not even among the Gallowborn.

Morgenstern

Well, after THAT it IS common knowledge, rest assured. 😊

Yes, soldiers react with heartbreak to two women making out.

Morgenstern

Heh. Right back at you. Me like. And so truuue.

The Archdevil

I almost wish I was in the Legion, but then I stop to think, and I'd have died to a demon in Marchford. Or one of those knights before it.

These things do not match.

The Archdevil

Were they mounted cavalry? I can't remember. I just call any armored warrior on horseback a knight. Station and status mean nothing to me.

I have some difficulty to understand the banter in this chapter:/ My English is not as good I thought before^^...or is this my humor?

The Warren Peace NFL Report

What specifically were you wondering about?

Letouriste

Don't know anymore, looks like I improved my skills a lot since two years ago.

Alegio

Finally we got Cath back and in one of my favorite situations, gossip time with the officials.

And... time for cath, hakram and masego to go tourist on arcadia? normal people cant be there so I guess they should be sent to scout.

Euodiachloris

I think a certain part-fae could risk it. If she doesn't mind maybe gaining permanent wings. Going to Arcadia itself would probably trigger certain genes into getting their arses properly in gear. 😊

Morgenstern

That seems more like a horribly fast route towards killing Kilian off, though. Not only because racism might be a thing for the fairies, too, giving them even more incentive, if they learn about that quart, but because she is an un-Named humanoid who has already shown herself as standing on the wrong side during that first incident. (Unless that should give her protection by the other Courts, but... seeing as the one who tried to get through at this border here... they are probably directly on the other side, closest ones to the border... have fun trying to get protected by anyone in those circumstances, much more so, if you should have been thinking of her going in there ALONE...)

Euodiachloris

Wut? Why alone? *confused*

gianoria7

Thanks for the chapter 😊

I wonder what Cath could take from a fairy...

And I suppose it is completely impossible that having to fight Fae might help Kilian awaken her Fae blood. Yep, totally impossible.

Gunslinger

The banter between Cat and her officers is one of the joys of this series. Also are those new clues we are getting about Robber's possible powers?

Unmaker

The calm before the storm. And Cat has enough enemies that her rather public liking of Kilian just paints a large bullseye on Kilian's head. The smart players knew anyway; now even the dumb ones will know.

And a thought from last time that I want to post before it potentially becomes a reality:

The Tyrant was faced with certain death (supposed infallible oracle predicting his doom). He avoided it by becoming a Named. Anaxares is faced with certain death (kill switch operable by many, many people who have reason to kill him). I think the main reason the Tyrant kept Anaxares alive so far is the Tyrant sees the parallel and is waiting for Anaxares to get fed up and maybe gain a Name himself.

Thanatos

Unmaker, you're here as well? I haven't seen you around much in years 0.0 Great to see you again

The Warren Peace NFL Report

I read the oracle's words as being more "what he needed to hear" than "literal prediction of future events." But your possible explanation is as good as any and better than most. Expecting Anaxares to gain a Name isn't even necessary, the parallel itself potentially explains a lot.

Morgenstern

What with the many signs of serious illness left on the body of the Tyrant, I would very much second the notion that he only avoided death via becoming Named, which is known to prolong one's lifespan, help against poison, ensure you never get ill again... he still is stuck with such heavy symptoms, he surely had a death-ensuring illness (when it comes to humans) before. 😊

Mental Mouse

No, it is literal prediction, but the exact wording was trickier than Tyrant has revealed yet. We'll see it in one of the bonus chapters.

PS, side confusion:

"She might lack in power compared to some other mages, but she made up for it in swiftness and control." Wait, what!? Kilian!? She was described as the one with the MOST power in the Legion, what with the wielding non-standard lightning spells and NOT having much control, what with her fairy genes trying to get out every time she went all-out... Did that now change around, after conversations with Apprentice?? oO Or is "some other mages" simply not pointing at Legion mages AT ALL, but at the really powerful ones?

Chapter 4: Developments

"The viper that bites a Matron dies poisoned."
-Taghreb saying

After the table was cleared most of my officers went with it. They had duties to attend to, after all. While Juniper wasn't holding the legion to wartime duty rosters, the influx of fresh recruits in the Fifteenth meant the usual peacetime hours were far less than what was currently being demanded of them – especially with a budding portal to Arcadia in need of garrisoning. Of the four that remained seated at the table when servants brought wine, only two were a common fixture at these little meetings. Ratface and Aisha effectively ran what passed for my network of informants, through his underworld connections and her relatives in the nobility. They'd done well, in my opinion, but they were going up against spymasters who'd had decades to place their own people or outright inherited a web of informants from their predecessors. Spies were among the most precious parts of a noble's inheritance, in the Wasteland.

Pickler, on the other hand, was a rarity. As much because she had no interest in these things as because she rarely had anything to contribute. That she'd stuck around would have surprised me, had I not remembered the Empress' warning: I was going to be presented with an offer by the Matron of the High Ridge tribe. Pickler's mother, allegedly estranged. I didn't know much about that situation save for assurances I'd received that having Pickler in the Fifteenth wouldn't mean a Matron would be looking to slide a knife in my back. Robber, usually maliciously eager to gossip, had been tight-lipped when I'd brought it up. Goblins always closed ranks the moment you brought up anything relating to what went on inside the Grey Eyries. Still, I could guess at the shape of it. Pickler's open and vehement distaste for politics could not have gone over well back home, or her lack of interest in anything that didn't involve building new and improved ways to kill people.

Kilian was around more often, as my Senior Mage. Since she had a finger in everything from our magical defences to setting up scrying channels her input was occasionally needed. And with Apprentice so often holed up in his tower these days, she served as our expert in the supernatural when he wasn't around. Her knowledge wasn't nearly as expansive, I had to admit, but she'd placed highly in the War College's mage courses for a reason. Where Masego would have a tailored solution to any problem we encountered, Kilian simply hammered in obstacles with group rituals and repeated spellwork. Less elegant, maybe, but I didn't want my legion to ever become too dependent on Apprentice. When it came to fights he'd be at my side more often than not, and it wouldn't do for my mages to become ineffective whenever he wasn't around. There was a reason my teacher deployed Warlock as a combat asset on his own instead of the leader of other mages.

That made for six of us in the room, if you counted Hakram and myself. There'd never been any debate about Adjutant being there, of course. At this point not having the tall orc at my side felt like I was missing a hand. I'd noticed over the last year that Hakram rarely spoke in meetings, not unless he wanted a point clarified for my benefit, and did not often venture his own opinion. Sometimes he gave it to me in private afterwards, but more often than not he simply kept his peace. Hakram listened and waited and when I came to a decision he saw that turned into a plan of action. It made it easy to rely on him, that I knew he had no objective – hidden or not – he was working towards. Of all the people I was close with, he stood alone in this. I accepted the cup of Vale summer wine Ratface poured from the carafe, allowing myself to savour the taste. It was a little early in the day, admittedly, but I was going to need a godsdamned drink if we were going to talk about the mess currently known as Marchford.

"So, watcha got for me," I prompted.

The two Taghreb traded looks. For all that their relationship had apparently imploded years ago, in my experience they actually got along fairly well. Ratface inclined his head and Aisha cleared her throat.

"The upheaval in the Wasteland continues," the Staff Tribune said. "The mass defections started by the High Lady of Aksum, while slowing in frequency, have yet to end."

I grinned. It always put me in a good mood when I heard about the Truebloods get the bad end of the stick. Not long after I'd extorted three high nobles into backing the creation of the Ruling Council, one of them had officially withdraw from the Truebloods. High Lady Abreha of Aksum, the cackling old bat who'd cheerfully betrayed her fellows the very moment the wind had turned. Though she had not joined the Loyalists, Malicia's faction in Praes, losing a High Lady had started an avalanche of setbacks for the Truebloods. Lesser nobles had begun withdrawing their support or been assassinated by successors who did before a fortnight had passed. While few of them changed their allegiance to the Loyalists, the humiliation for the remaining Truebloods had been both public and potent. I'd watched all of that unfold with no small amount of glee.

"The most recent defection was by a lord directly sworn to Wolof," Aisha said. "As High Lady Tasia is the head of the Truebloods, the loss of face involved was massive. Rumour has it she could not afford to match the bribe offered by the Empress, which has... interesting implications."

I let out a whistle.

"We've confirmed Heiress has made no attempt to send any of the revenues collected from Liesse to the Wasteland," Ratface added. "Cat, I think there's a wedge there."

"Praesi stabbing Praesi in the back," Pickler said derisively. "There's a surprise."

Aisha raised an eyebrow.

"An interesting comment, coming from a goblin," she said.

Pickler shrugged, then looked away. That was as much as she seemed to want to get involved, at the moment.

"And all these unaligned nobles, what are they doing exactly?" Hakram asked.

Aisha smiled, then gracefully sipped at her wine. I could see no hint of her teeth as she did – that was Praesi etiquette for you.

"They are no longer unaligned," the Staff Tribune said. "High Lady Abreha has begun to gather them under her banner."

"The Moderates, they call themselves," Ratface added.

I raised an eyebrow.

"That's a promising name, but I'm not getting my hopes up," I said.

"The Moderates oppose certain of the policies championed by the Empress," Aisha said, "but do so without the undercurrent of opposing the Empress herself. They're growing as an alternative to the Truebloods for nobles who disagree with certain recent reforms."

The approval in her voice was not masked in the slightest.

"So they're the good, polite racists," Pickler said bitingly. "There's a relief, I thought there were only bad, rude ones."

"One does not need to hate greenskins to realize breeding restrictions on the Tribes are necessary," Aisha replied, tone aggressively mild. "Or to believe that orcs chieftains being made nobility would disrupt a very delicate balance of power."

"It probably helps, though," the Senior Sapper said with a flash of needle-like teeth.

"That's enough of that," I said quietly. "Pickler, you know Aisha's not one of those nobles. She's never treated you anything but politely. Aisha, half your people would accept making a bridge out of dead goblins as a decent way to save on stone. She's not swinging out of the blue."

The Taghreb noble's face went blank, but she inclined her head. Pickler grabbed her goblet and drank.

"I do love these little chats of ours," Ratface said. "But I believe there's one last thing for you to mention, Aisha?"

The lovely Staff Tribune cleared her throat.

"Infighting between the Truebloods and the Moderates has already begun, but their agents at court do agree on one prominent matter," she said.

Well, that ought to be good.

"I'm on the edge of my seat," I said drily.

"To be blunt," Aisha said delicately, "that point is you. You are worrying them."

"She's had knives at her back since she became the Squire," Hakram said calmly. "What makes this unusual?"

"When you were merely the Squire, Lady Catherine, you were a minor threat with the potential of turning into a larger one," the olive-skinned aristocrat said. "Your coming to command the Fifteenth, while unfortunate, was not judged overly alarming. That changed, however, when the Fifteenth kept growing."

"They think you're amassing a private army to come knocking at their doors," Ratface grinned nastily. "Their tender noble hearts are all aflutter at the notion."

"That's absurd," Kilian spoke up from my left. "We don't have nearly the men for that. We're what, six thousand now?"

"Seven thousand as of the census last week," Aisha said. "By my estimate, we'll be eight thousand come summer. The size of two standard legions."

"I don't have the corresponding number of mages under my command," the redhead frowned.

I frowned, then pieced the discrepancy together.

"Mages are required to graduate from the College before service," I said. "We've been taking in Callowans."

"There simply aren't that many mages available for us to bring into the fold," Aisha agreed. "Many went to the Fourteenth when it was formed, and there are rumours a Sixteenth is about to be raised."

That, I realized with a grimace, was a problem. A lot of the legion military doctrine rested on the fact that mages and sappers would be available in proportionate numbers to the amount of regulars. No wonder Juniper was insisting on drills so much. She was going to have to revise her tactics entirely before we next got into a fight.

"I don't suppose any of you have a workaround?" I asked.

"We could recruit from civilian talent," Aisha said. "That would bring complications, however."

"Good mages in the Wasteland have patrons," Ratface said. "They're not allowed not to."

"And they'd need to be trained to Legion standards," Kilian murmured. "We don't have the facilities for that. Not to mention using the War College's methods without sanction would be low treason, at the very least."

"Joy," I muttered. "Think about it anyway. If you have a stroke of genius, you know where my door is."

Hakram set down his wine with a metallic clink.

"Practically speaking, what does the nobles being worried about our numbers mean?" the tall orc gravelled.

Ratface shrugged, looked at the other Taghreb in the room.

"Support for the only visible check on your power," Aisha said.

"Heiress," I said.

Well, wasn't that a treat. It would have been too much to hope for I'd be allowed to expand my ranks without there being consequences, I supposed. I passed a hand through my mess of a hair, which I'd taken out of its usual ponytail for the meal. It would need combing soon. Kilian nudged me with her knee under the table, smiling.

"We'll find a way," she murmured. "We always do."

I pressed a kiss against her shoulder as Ratface rolled his eyes and Aisha politely looked away. Acknowledging the sight of emotions in others was impolite, for Praesi, unless you were deeply intimate with them and behind closed doors. Pickler was looking at us like she would some sort of strange chimera, more puzzled than anything else. The goblin notion of romance, as I understood it, was rather different from the human one.

"That's one," I said. "Ratface?"

"Are we done already?" the Taghreb said. "It was just getting interesting."

His lips tightened immediately afterwards, swallowing a whimper, and Aisha smiled. I suspected he was going to be limping out of the room when we were done. The bastard coughed.

"I've placed people in the lower rungs of two of the major Dark Guilds," he said.

While there were apparently quite a few minor criminal associations that styled themselves guilds, there were only three in Callow that really deserved the name. The Assassins, the Thieves and the Smugglers. The Thieves had been the ones to make it through the Conquest the least affected, and the first to strike a deal with Black. Their activities were tacitly allowed as long as they didn't threaten Praesi interests, in exchange for a few concessions. The only really important one among those was informing on any resistance group they came across. No wonder my teacher hadn't been actually challenged by one of those in the two decades he'd run Callow. He really had eyes everywhere, didn't he?

The second guild, the Smugglers, had not gotten away unscathed. Not because the Tower had tightened the screws, at least not in the usual sense. They'd been making a fortune out of importing Praesi luxuries before the Conquest, but their roles as middlemen had become unnecessary when actual trade routes had opened. Making it worse, quite a few drugs and substances that had been illegal under the Kingdom were nothing of the sort under Praes. After floundering for a few years, they'd managed to find a niche in importing foreign luxuries through Mercantis while bypassing tariffs – the Wasaliti, after all, was no longer patrolled by war barges. Their following attempts to get weapons into Callow had been met by the assassination of half their leadership, and they'd taken that warning to heart. Since they'd restricted their activities to what wouldn't earn Black's attention, offering a cut of their profits in penance. They were a pale shadow of what they'd used to be, though, by far the weakest of the three guilds.

The Assassins had happened upon a middle ground between those two, neither crippled nor largely untouched. Their more patriotic elements had been purged by the Named who exemplified their trade, leaving only hardened professionals behind. Those had shown no qualms in cooperating with the Tower and even some Imperial Governors, though assassinating Praesi without unofficial sanction had been forbidden. While not as numerous and entrenched as it had been before the Conquest, the Guild of Assassins had settled comfortably into its new role. They had, if anything, thrived under the rule of officials coming from a culture where their trade was not only accepted but held in some esteem. Few nobles of the Kingdom would have ever contracted a Dark Guild for work, after all, but Praesi were not above employing local talent when bringing in their own specialists would have been too costly.

"The Smugglers were easy enough to infiltrate, since I've had indirect dealings with them in the past," Ratface said, shaking me out of my thoughts. "As for the Thieves, getting a foot in was doable but rising in the ranks will take years. They tend to operate in local cells."

"You couldn't get anyone in the Assassins?" I asked.

The handsome Taghreb shook his head.

"They recruit by invitation only," he told me. "Murder convicts, mostly, taken in by spiriting them out of prison before they hang."

I made an understanding noise. That would make it tricky to get anyone inside. If Black had managed the feat, he'd never told me.

"Got anything out of it so far?" I said.

"Nothing all that useful, though one piece does stand out," Ratface mused. "The Guild of Thieves has recently had a change of leadership. Their 'King of Thieves' was overthrown."

"A shadow war across Callow would have been noticed," Hakram said.

"They don't operate like that," the Supply Tribune said, shaking his head. "The person in charge is whoever has some fancy crown. Any member of the guild can try to steal it."

I raised an eyebrow. That seemed like a horrible way to run an organization, considering anyone close to the guildmaster would be tempted to steal it. Besides, all it took was for an idiot to get lucky once and you'd have a fool at the helm. Aisha made an approving noise and I glanced at her. Ah, of course she'd think well of it. Praes was run on basically the same principle, only with more murder and demons.

"Keep an eye on them," I finally said. "I'll want to know where they stand when we move on the Assassins."

Ratface nodded.

"Speaking of," he said, "I found out what you wanted. They've none or negligible presence in Marchford."

"Well, I was due something uplifting," I muttered. "Any idea why?"

"The Countess Marchford hated them deeply," Aisha said. "She cleared them out of the city a few years after the Conquest, after they killed her husband and infant son."

I leaned forward in interest.

"How?" I asked.

"She torched the entire city quarter they operated out of," Ratface told me grimly. "Had anyone that crawled out of the ashes drawn and quartered in the public square."

Well. Not exactly something I could replicate across Callow. Horrifying as that method was, I couldn't help but be somewhat impressed. Elizabeth Talbot had not been one to fuck around, when she wanted something done. The Duke of Liesse had no business ever getting near a throne, but the Countess Marchford would have made the kind of queen that took more than a page in chronicles. Not all of it good but, Hells, who was I to throw stones?

"My turn?" Pickler asked impatiently.

I looked at the two Taghreb, but neither of them had anything to add.

"Good," the goblin muttered, then straightened in her seat. "Lady Foundling of Marchford, I bring an offer from Matron Sever of the High Ridge tribe."

I watched my two Tribunes from the corner of my eye. Ratface looked surprised and concerned. Aisha's brow rose, until her eyes widened in understanding. Then her face returned to pleasant and unreadable. Something that passed through Court at some point, then, I thought. I'd been under the impression goblins stayed out of Praesi politics, so my curiosity sharpened.

"I've got an official letter for you to gawk at," Pickler continued, discarding ceremony as quickly as she'd taken it up, "but the gist of it is this: the High Ridge tribe and its allies would like to establish a goblin settlement in your lands."

I blinked.

"What?" I said, for eloquence was one of my foremost virtues.

I paused.

"Is that even legal?"

"The Empress reinstated breeding restrictions to show favour to the Moderates," Aisha said quietly. "In a gesture of goodwill, however, she allowed the establishment of a new goblin tribe for the first time in two hundred years."

"Matrons fought over the right like a bag full of angry cats," Pickler shrugged. "Mother's the most vicious old bitch of that pack of vicious old bitches, though. She ended up on top of that pile of bodies."

"There's never been a goblin settlement outside of the Grey Eyries before," Hakram said, sounding surprised.

I glanced at him.

"Foramen," I reminded him.

"Foramen has been ruled by humans since the Miezani occupation, even if goblins work the forges," the tall orc replied.

That... might be true? I really had no idea. Praesi history not related to the Tower wasn't something I'd read a lot of. Anyway, no point in quibbling since odds were he was right and this wasn't the most salient issue at the moment anyway. My eyes returned to the Senior Sapper.

"That's an," I started, looking for the word, "... interesting offer."

"She doesn't expect you to accept out of love for goblinkind," Pickler said, amused. "She's offering for the goblins in question to build fortifications for the city, free of charge. The tribe would occupy the designated land but pay rent for the privilege, as well bribe you generously for your generosity in considering the matter. Everybody knows Marchford's ledgers are bleeding like slow raider."

I felt it safe to assume the raider in question was bleeding because he'd been too slow to dodge a knife. That expression told me a lot about how what living in the Grey Eyries would be like.

"I've been looking into ways to fill the coffers," I said, glancing at Aisha.

The lovely tribune shook her head.

"While I find the notion of a tribe of goblins within sight of where I sleep horrifying, none offered terms you would find acceptable," she said. "There's quite a few families willing to make a loan, and some are even willing to forego interest. All want a governorship as part of the deal."

"Come on," I griped. "There's got to be at least one that just wants to fleece me."

"With almost no remaining Praesi governors, anyone who could secure such a post under your reign would gain a massive advantage against their rivals," Aisha said. "None are willing to forego that chance. I have, however, accumulated some funds when they attempted to bribe my intermediaries. The appropriate portion was added to your treasury."

"That's something, I guess," I said, reluctantly amused.

The mirth died quickly enough when my gaze returned to Pickler.

"You talked about rent," I said. "Not a grant of land."

"While swearing fealty to you would have been hard enough to swallow," the Senior Sapper said, "The possibility that one day a male descendant of yours might rule Marchford pretty much killed that idea."

She shrugged.

"They're not wrong," the yellow-eyed goblin said. "It'd be pretty disgusting for a Matron to take orders from a man."

"I'm feeling somewhat insulted, right now," Ratface mused.

Pickler eyed him pityingly.

"You're a fine warleader, Ratface," she reassured him. "You're just not cut out for important matters like ruling or raising children. Men are too emotional for those things, it's not your fault."

"Matrons have taken orders from Dread Emperors," I pointed out, morbidly fascinated.

I'd always known the Tribes were a matriarchy, but I'd never actually seen that in action before. Pickler was a clever, intelligent and talented officer. Who'd somehow come to believe that barring half her people from leadership positions could be anything but shooting herself in the foot.

"Tyrants don't count," she said, eyeing me sceptically. "They're Named. They're not like other men."

"So you're telling me an entire culture recognizes me as objectively better than Ratface?" Hakram said, leaning forward.

I snorted.

"You're a traitor to your gender, Hakram," the Taghreb said. "For shame. Where's the solidarity?"

"I recognize you're objectively better than Ratface," Aisha told Hakram. "I'm sure I could get a petition passed around to collect broader opinion."

"So I'm to leave this room both without all my toes unbroken and my dignity?" the bastard mused. "You people are animals."

Pickler sneered in the general direction of the gallery before returning her attention to me.

"Think it over," she said. "Left the letter in your affairs, since I didn't want to bother remembering all the legalese. They'll expect an answer soon."

I nodded slowly. I had no intention of agreeing to anything before talking it over with a few other people, anyway. That the Empress had allowed this at all meant she tacitly endorsed the idea, but scrying her for a conversation wouldn't be a bad idea. Getting Black on the other side of a bowl would be even better, but I had no real way to contact him. Pickler slid down her pile of cushions and saluted me before stalking away. Aisha and Ratface took the hint, and made their exit not long after. Hakram was polishing off the rest of his wine, so I turned to Kilian. Who was already looking at me, I was pleased to see.

"So, Senior Mage," I said. "When do you get off duty?"

"I've no responsibilities until afternoon tomorrow," she replied with a smile.

I raised an eyebrow.

"How'd you manage that?" I asked.

"I forewent my free days for the last month," Kilian said. "Though I did manage to walk the city a bit before that."

"Oh?" I said, fingers toying with the edge of her tunic.

"Found a little shop in the merchant district," she said idly. "They do very interesting things with lace."

My breath caught. Smiling impishly, she leaned closer.

"I'm wearing one of their creations right now," she murmured.

I rose to my feet.

"And we're done here," I announced.

Catching Kilian by the hand I immediately headed for the door but paused when I passed by Adutant.

"Hakram," I said. "My buddy. My friend."

"Cat?" he replied bemusedly.

"I've been sleeping in an empty bed for two months," I said. "If someone knocks at my door before noon tomorrow for anything short of an invasion, I will have them hanged."

Kilian snorted, and we were out of the room before the orc could reply.

I woke up in the middle of the night.

The armful of redhead at my side was still asleep and my pillow was decadently soft after having been on the road so long, so I closed my eyes and buried my head back into it. Someone banged on the door again, more urgently this time. I cursed, then got up. Kilian's eyes fluttered open.

"Cat?" she asked sleepily.

"Go back to sleep," I said. "I'll be back in a moment."

I almost went to open the door before remembering I was naked. Picking up a shirt from the pile of dirty clothes I really needed to have laundered at some point, I slipped it on. The asshole on the other side of the door banged again. Adjusting the shirt to it covered my thighs, I made my way to the door and wrenched it open. On the other side, a legionary with lieutenant stripes stood with his hand raised.

"What?" I hissed at him.

The Soninke took in the sight of me dishevelled, half-asleep and entirely furious before gulping nervously.

"Lady Squire, the Winter Court is attempting to invade the city," he managed to get out. "General Juniper sent me to wake you."

I sighed, then rubbed the bridge of my nose. One of these days, I was going to learn to keep my fucking mouth shut.

Nah. I think it was the Cosmos who sent the Fae a gilt invitation... after it stopped cackling. Probably also embossed. With curilcues. 😊

Cat didn't just tempt fate, she practically advertised.

Well, she is doing what plots in stories always happen to do. And this world revolves around stories.

danh3107

I can't think of anything particularly witty to say....

But damnit Cat getting rid of the Assassins will bite you in the ass.

On the other hand the Goblin plan most definitely will, but she needs the funds.

What a web what a web.

Oh and Faeries at the gate, better go kill them.

stevenneiman

Not really. If the land is a lease and not a grant, then their use of it is tied to her or at least someone who continues her policy. If they kill her off without the ability to be absolutely 100% certain that she didn't have a mechanism in place to kick them off the land in the event of her suspicious death, they would be evicted from the territory. That would be both expensive and embarrassing if they had what would be basically a full city at the time.

Also, they know that Black will be very displeased if they do anything to harm or even seriously inconvenience her.

One more thing is that they have problems with insufficient mages and sappers. Reaching out to the goblins might not do anything about the mage deficit, but it's bound to make it easier for them to get more sappers in the long run.

One filthy greenskin

She already has a tribeful of replacements coming soon.

Ploogle

She really should have seen that coming. She should start saying stuff like, "Don't bother me unless Heiress is dead," that'll put her gift to good use.

Haha loved the ending there. I knew the moment she said that to Hakram that there would be an interruption. Can't wait to see Cats new powers in action.

I recognize you're objectively better than Ratface," Aisha told Nauk. I'm assuming that should be Hakram.

Also @erraticerrata would you be okay if I (or anyone else really) kept plugging the topwebfiction.com link every week? Make it a thing like they do for Twig.

Sure, go ahead!

The quietist

How's Twig doing atm? I stopped following a few months ago when i was buried under work and Sy was having an extended breakdown in New Amsterdam

Gunslinger

I am currently on Arc 5 actually so I don't know what's up ahead. Sorry its finished.

BryceWilliam

ProdigyNevling

It's heading towards the end now. I would recommend catching up since the finale is near which is fun to catch. Idk why BryceWilliam would lie about it but he did. Traditional Wildbow ending is happening.

Thanatos

What? No. No, it isn't finished. Close to, but it's not over yet.

To answer OP, Sy is steadily losing control over the do's and dont's of his hallucinated mental constructs, to the point where he can't tell who's real anymore and who's not. With him having to lead his army in that state in a brawl with Helen's big brother, it's very interesting indeed.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Readers have been claiming Twig was "almost done" since arc 5. I don't even care if it's a consensus this time, I'll believe that shit when I see it.

I've been taking a break from Twig while catching up on Iron Teeth, which has been surprisingly good. Last I saw, they had seen Helen's brother but not engaged him. Can that much really have changed in just a few chapters?

stevenneiman

You should probably post the link each time you do.
For this one, <http://topwebfiction.com/>

Gunslinger

Also we haven't see Robber in a while so I'm guessing he's now the new King of Thieves. Of course it might be against Legion regulations though.

Cicero

You forgot that there is still a heroic thief on the prowl, i find it more likely that she has taken the crown.

stevenneiman

Yeah, I think BC and LC were the only Named of the original band who actually died. And WB, sort of.

Thanatos

Don't forget the campy spearbearer who died fighting the demon at Marchford. I liked that guy.

Letouriste

Thanks for the chapter:)

I'm surprised cat didn't think about how convenient the thief system is. She just have to send someone infiltrate the guild, one of her minions, and next help him to take the crown and she get a whole guild at her feets;)

Then she destroy the guild from inside and reforme the better members in her own men.

A simple plan, probably complicated in the making but that should work.

I also think this Gobelin migration is perfect for the robber/pickler ship

They just can defect in this tribe together.. furthermore the members will principally be from their tribe anyway.

Cpt. Obvious

As I remember it Pickler and Robber are from different tribes. Robber is definitely from the Stonebreaker tribe. At the moment I can't remember what tribe Pickler comes from, only that it's not the same as Robber.

Also Pickler isn't really on speaking terms with her mother and hates the whole tribal system and the Matrons in particular. If she has any tribe today it's the 15th. Still there seems to be some kind of genetic programming going on that makes it hard for goblins to rebel against the tribe mentality. Or it's the Gobbler that brings them in line with the rest of goblin society. That last would however seem to be going against the spirit of the Gods below as it's been presented. Directly controlling the subjects is more in the Gods above ballpark.

But the same is also seen amongst the Orcs. Though they seem to have an easier time resisting their genetic programming. Though they do tend to resort to snacking while fighting.

My point being that I'm not certain that Pickler would welcome having her mother set up a new tribe anywhere near Marchford as it's now home base for the 15th.

Cap'nSmurfy

Oh Cat when will you learn? Once again, Cat forgets that she's Named. She made the odds of invasion 100%

gianoria7

Cat should have known better than to say such taunting words... No doubt it will give the Fae some advantage considering the rules... Even worse if there are named Fae(I have no idea if they have names but if they do I'm sure one will attack because of Cats declaration... )
Some Fae gotta pay 😊

Names are a thing of Creation, and the fae are not. So no, I don't see how or why that would be possible.

Nerazim Praetor

I thought Arcadia was technically part of Creation but kinda not really?

Nerazim Praetor

I honestly hope learning to keep her mouth shut is the last thing to happen in this series.
Like, the last chapter would have someone saying "by the gods, Squire learned to keep her mouth shut"

JHajek

Hi, I made a map of Calernia. It's my first time making one, so I hope you will like it (if not tell me why 😊). Do you think it can be posted with other maps? Thanks for any reply.

Here is the link: <https://ibb.co/gtrBAa>

PS: I will make this comment once more after the next chapter is posted to let more people know about it. Dont be mad, please... 😊

Barrendur

@JHajek: Wow, that map looks incredible! It's very appealing visually... but as I am just a reader here, I can't really comment on its accuracy.

*I* like it a lot, for whatever that's worth 😊

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Before it gets confirmed as true or false, I have a theory about who Assassin is. E.E. confirmed he has appeared on screen, and I'm making the leap to assume he has had speaking lines as well.

I think Assassin is the one member of Black's personal guard that Cat has spoken to on at least two occasions. It's just something that my subconscious spat out at me while reading a different story, so I have a fairly high degree of confidence despite the fact that I'm a bit hazy on WHY I think so. My best retroactive explanation is that there's not really any other reason for those conversations to have happened, so they kind of stick out.

What do I win if I'm right? Can I get a cameo somewhere? =)

Morgenstern

" Getting Black on the other side of a bowl would be even better, but I had no real way to contact him. " – That's the idea, darling Cat – NOT always asking him, but doing things on your own. 😊 As anyone can see, absentee (but-not-dead, just far-enough-away) mentors work fine for that. ^^

Nick

Isa Lumitus

I've got a crazy idea for Cat: Accept the offer from the goblins, and give them the city of Marchford. Let the Fae incursion be THEIR problem.

I seem to recall reading something about the virtues of using your problems to solve each other.

Chapter 5: Beachhead

"Look at how edible you are. You're basically asking for it."

-Warlord Grog the King-Eater, addressing the king of Okoro during the sack of the same

"So what are we looking at?" I asked.

I took my helmet when Hakram offered it, clasping the chin straps as I checked the longsword sheathed at my belt. The moon was out in full, but it was hard to tell given how many torches there were out in the streets. Legionaries were evacuating the citizens of Marchford according to Juniper's prepared plan as we made our way through the streets, half the Gallowborne behind me. The rest was still assembling under Tribune Farrier. They'd catch up eventually. I wasn't sure whether I'd want them to follow me into the fray, anyway, but if nothing else they'd be able to bolster our lines.

"The first defensive perimeter collapsed almost instantly," the tall orc said. "Hune's men dug in behind the second one, but they're out of their breadth here."

I could see the blizzard that had overtaken the central plaza of my city even from where I stood, a column that went high into the sky like some cheap snow imitation of the Tower, so Adjutant's words struck me as a bit of an understatement. I'd pit the Fifteenth against anything that had feet or claws, but you couldn't stab the weather. Well, they couldn't anyway. I might be able to work something out. In my experience, you could stab pretty much anything if you tried hard enough. Now there was a decent motto for the freshly-founded Noble House of Foundling. If I ever got around to having any descendants – and I wasn't planning on it, at the moment – I'd have it put up on a spiffy banner for when they inevitably got into a fight way out of their league. A legacy to be proud of.

"No shit," I said. "I meant what kind of forces are they fielding?"

"Infantry," Adjutant said. "Every single enemy soldier should be considered a mage, and their weapons look primitive but they have no trouble cutting through ours."

"You'd think people would get tired of that gimmick," I sighed. "Anyone looks like they're in charge?"

"Not as of the last report I got," Hakram replied. "I'm guessing if there's a leader they're either still in Arcadia or hidden by the storm."

We turned the corner, a line of legionaries moving aside with hasty salutes so they wouldn't get in our way. I nodded absent-mindedly, not really paying attention.

"They have wings, right?" I asked, making a gesture that was meant to represent flapping butterflies but came across as mildly obscene.

"That's how they overran the first perimeter," Hakram agreed soberly. "Headed straight for Pickler's scorpions to take them out then spread across the rooftops. Hune moved crossbowmen to box them in, it's working for now."

That did not feel like a long-term solution. Eventually they'd find a way to get through and there was no way I was allowing a bunch of fae to run wild in Marchford. Gods, just thinking of the cost of rebuilding after a rampage was enough to make me feel faint. Why were my enemies never considerate about collateral damage? Admittedly I'd ordered Marchford Manor torched myself, but I sure as Hells wasn't taking the blame for the devils and that walking horror Heiress has set on the city.

"Mages can't do anything about that?" I said.

"They're busy making sure the blizzard goes up instead of covering the city," Adjutant said. "They're working on shutting it down entirely, but whatever's making it packs a punch."

"Have you-"

"Sent a runner to Apprentice before I even caught up to you," the tall orc interrupted me.

Hakram, you prince among men. Always on the ball. If there was someone could make this mess less of a mess – or at least someone else's mess – it was Masego. I wasn't all that eager to head into a snowstorm without someone who could make fire at my side, truth be told, cloak over my plate or not. If the Fair Folk wanted to make it snow, I wasn't above retorting with a whiff of the ol' brimstone. We were close to the plaza, now, and I could feel the temperature steadily dropping. Joy. The two of us slowed when a legionary popped out of the woodworks and immediately headed in our direction, dropping a knee when she got in front of me.

"Countess," the young Callowan said.

"Up," I ordered. "You were sent for us?"

"Legate Hune conveys her respect and would like to inform you the southern part of our formation is close to collapse," the light-skinned girl said.

Gods, how old was she? Seventeen at most. Barely two years younger than me but she felt like a kid, all bright-eyed and bushy-tailed and one bad day away from getting on a battlefield she wouldn't walk away from.

"She has reinforcements headed there?" Hakram asked.

"We're stretched thin until Legate Nauk moves his men into place," the messenger replied. "She fears what she can spare will not be enough."

Well, fuck. Hune had three thousand soldiers under her command – one time and a half the size of what a kabili should be – and she was still hard-pressed? Given the relatively small size of the area she had to contain, that meant the fae were tearing through her men like wet parchment.

"We're close," Hakram said, eyeing me.

"We're going," I replied. "Tell the legate as much."

The girl got to her feet and saluted as I turned to the Gallowborne behind me. The officer at their head was an orc, one of the few in my personal guard.

"Lieutenant Sark," I called out.

"Ma'am?" the officer replied.

"Send word to Tribune Farrier: we're headed south. He's to back up the lines there immediately. Same for your men."

The greenskin eyed me calmly.

"You'll be going into the storm, ma'am?"

"Looks that way," I grunted. "Gotta get at whatever's in there."

He grinned, showing off yellowing fangs.

“Good hunting, Warlord.”

See, stuff like that was like I liked having orcs backing me. No insistence on coming along or waiting for Apprentice, just an encouragement to go out and kill things that wanted to kill me. I didn't waste time on any further talk: we moved double-time for where the enemy assault was apparently the strongest.

Legion doctrine for static defence was fairly straightforward. Establish a shield wall of heavies everywhere without walls, place sappers and mages behind it to disrupt enemy formations. Most of the killing was actually behind the melee, by bolts and fireballs shot into the massed enemies. Unfortunately, both the Miezan legions and the Praesi inheritors had crafted that tactic relying on one assumption the Fifteenth was currently paying for: that they would have more or better spellcasters on the field than the enemy. The Empire was the only nation on Calernia with a formal mage corps in their army, so they usually had at least twice the number of spellslingers the enemy did if not more, and the Miezan empire had been built on sorcery the likes of which had never been seen before or since. Neither nation had ever tangled with the fae, and it was showing.

Instead of the orderly shield wall I was expecting, I was currently looking at half a dozen clumps of legionaries desperately trying to fight off the enemy while fairies darted past them to take a bite out of my panicking sappers. The sharp cracks of munitions and disorderly crossbow fire announced the death of a few more of my goblins every few heartbeats. I was confused at how the fae could have managed to break a shield wall without one of their own until the first time I saw some dark-skinned man dressed in furs glow as he spoke and a human walking out of formation as if in a trance, just to get speared through the throat. The Winter Court was falling on my men like a pack of wolves, using ice and illusions and charm to break them apart and pick them off one at a time. The defensive formations of Hune's men were not a rampart so much as a buffet the enemy could choose from at will.

Most of the fairies were shaped like eerie humans with wings, though not all. Wolf-like hounds made of ice and shade wove in and out of sight, tearing out throats and mauling men over their shields. The only saving grace of that disaster I was watching was that it wasn't also in the middle of a blizzard. Silver lining, eh?

“That is not how I saw my night going,” I admitted.

“They're probably smarter than devils too,” Hakram growled with distaste.

My longsword came out of its scabbard without a sound and I move forward with my shield raised. Adjutant's axe and scutum immediately moved to cover my left flank as the Gallowborne spread out in ranks behind us. Hune's sappers took cover behind them as soon as they could, retreating with relief, and then a heartbeat later I was in the thick of it. A pale-skinned woman in a flowing blue dress that shimmered like a mirror leapt in my direction, a bone sword in hand. I breathed in, breathed out, and felt my Name stir. The beast grinned, eyes opening: my veins warmed and the world slowed. Hello, old friend. Would it be strange to say I've missed you? The sharp point of bone was headed straight for my throat, uncaring of the gorget protecting it, and I wasn't taking the risk of letting that blow land. The flat of my sword lightly tapped the fae's wrist, nudging the strike away, then with a flick of the wrist came around to tear straight through my enemy's throat. I had at no point ceased moving forward. A heartbeat later, the fae's headless corpse fell to the ground behind me.

Weeping Heavens, it was good to be back in the field.

To my left Hakram sunk his axe into the head of a shadow hound, hard enough shards of ice flew and its muzzle hit the ground. With a grunt he tore it out, then brought down an armoured boot on the creature's neck to make sure it wouldn't get up. I could feel myself smiling, the battle-joy taking hold of me. Gods, after all this talking I'd been forced to do lately it was such a delight just being able to hit something. The Gallowborne were advancing steadily behind us, picking off any fae trying to charm them with crossbows before they could get too close. The fairies swarmed in the air above them, but my personal guard was made of sterner stuff than that. They'd been through Marchford and Liesse: a bunch of fae weren't going to make them flinch. I left them to it, moving towards Hune's besieged legionaries. Ragged cries of "Fifteenth" came when they saw me, and they threw themselves back into the fray with fresh ferocity. That drew some attention. The fae, strange translucent wings flapping, hovered in front of me. I genuinely could not tell what gender it was, if it even had one.

"Let go of your weapon, sweet one," it crooned.

My shield smashed it in the face, breaking its nose with a brutal crunch. Huh, so fae did bleed red. You learned something every day. I started speaking again, so I hit it again with morbid fascination.

"Here, have it," I replied drily, ramming my sword through its chest.

"Don't play with your food," Hakram chided absent-mindedly.

His axe went clean through a wild-haired fae with two spears of shadow, then when it fell the bottom of his shield came down on her head repeatedly until it was nothing more than bloody pulp.

"I'm not impressed with the calibre so far," I said. "Enemies that weak shouldn't have broken our lines."

Immediately after saying that, I hunkered behind my shield and braced for impact. The tip of a bronze spear punched through the steel, an inch away from my right eye, and I grinned. I'd had a feeling that would hurry things along. I ripped my arm out of the leather straps binding it to the shield, stepping back as I took a look at my opponent. Male, wearing an armour of twisted dead wood. Couldn't see much of him aside from long dark hair and entirely blue eyes staring at me like I was an insect. Eh. I'd gotten more scathing disdain from Praesi nobles, he'd have to step up his game if he wanted to make a dent. There was a bronze sword at his hip, still sheathed. I flicked my wrist and the contraption of steel wires Pickler had built me triggered, dropping my knife on the palm of my gauntleted hand. If I triggered it differently, it could even shoot the knife like an arrow. My Senior Sapper made the best toys. There were another three fae decked in the same armour at the new one's side, fanning out to flank Hakram and I.

"Nauk described a female with the same gear as responsible for the last blizzard," Adjutant said, hefting his axe over his shoulder.

"Four heavy hitters, then," I frowned. "Someone's looking to make an impression."

The first deadwood soldiers ripped his spear out of my shield, then laughed. It wasn't a human laugh, or even a person's. It sounded like the ice of a lake cracking come spring, like frost sharply spreading over glass.

"Children," he mocked, and though he was speaking no language I knew I understood him perfectly. "We are the footsoldiers of Winter. The Sword of Waning Day. Die screaming."

"Oh hey, a pack of flunkies with a fancy name," I deadpanned. "Never slaughtered my way through one of those before."

They moved as one. Before the first exchange was even done I was very, very glad I'd scrapped with the Hunter before. I'd had precious little training against opponents using spears save for my fights with the hero, and if I hadn't learned to read movements from that I'd likely have earned a gaping hole through my shoulder within the first five heartbeats of the fight. The two deadwood soldiers who focused on me were quick, light on their feet and worst of all they knew how to work together. Soldiers, I decided, might not be the right word no matter what they called themselves. They were like hunters, harrying a prey into position so the finishing blow could be struck. Unfortunately for them, they were going to have to reconsider their position in the food chain of Creation. I closed the distance with the one who'd spoken, getting in up and personal where his choice of weapon was more hindrance than help. I nearly ate a bronze shaft in the teeth but instead ducked under it, sliding my knife into the armour about where his lower ribs should be.

The goblin steel bit into the wood but failed to punch through. Not regular wood, then. Everybody always got these fancy enchanted things, it was godsdamned unfair. I had to dance away when a spear tip pierced through where the back of my leg was a heartbeat before, then sharply twist my footing when when the first deadwood soldier went for my throat. They were too quick, I thought. In plate I wasn't able to keep up, and my armour might as well be silk for the difference it would make if they landed a hit. I heard Hakram bellow and glanced in his direction: he had a spear through the leg, though he'd traded that for his axe buried in one of the fae's neck. Right between the helmet and armour. It did not slow the enemy down, to my dismay. The deadwood soldier simply ripped out the axe, tossed it away and unsheathed her sword. Adjutant spat to the side, threw his shield in her face and took the spear out of his leg. He did not look concerned in the slightest about how he was bleeding.

My momentary distraction was costly. I saw the spear blur from the corner of my eye and hastily slapped the shaft to the side with the flat of my sword, but I'd missed the other one: it punched straight through my plate, then my knee, then entirely through and into the pavement. I was stuck where I was like a bloody pig on a spit. The soldier who'd hit me unsheathed his sword as the other one, the one who'd spoken, drew back his spear as it became coated with frost. This was the most pain I'd been in in over a year, and for a moment I focused on biting down on a scream. Then I watched a frosted spear head moving with unnatural swiftness towards my head, the whole world narrowing down to that one threat. I was not going to be able to dodge that, I knew. All the lessons I'd learned from some of the most celebrated killers of our age flashed through the back of my mind, but I pushed the aside. Eyes crossing as I followed the trajectory of the spear, instead of trying to move my body I bid my time and then bit. I caught the very end of the point between my teeth.

If Black ever heard of this, I thought, he was going to drill me until I died. The fae shifted his footing to simply push the spear forward – which would be very, very bad – but I spat it out and parried the sword blow from his partner. This was going to end very quickly if I didn't start moving again, so I flicked my wrist at the sword fae and forced it to duck smoothly under my thrown knife while with my now-free hand I tore out his spear, flooding power in my arm to compensate for the poor angle. Bleeding like it was going out of style, one leg hanging loosely and pretty much useless, I eyed my opponents.

"She struggles still," the sword fae noted in voice that sounded like a deer's death rattle, like an owl swooping down.

"Title of my memoirs," I gasped. "On that note: Rise."

Thick chords of shadow spread across my body as my wounds closed. A little more of that bundle of power inside me faded away. Luckily I hadn't had to use much of it so far – I doubted I'd run into anything as useful to Take anytime soon. The sight of my wound disappearing in the span of heartbeat, healed perfectly, was enough to give the fae pause. The healing wasn't painless, of course, it hurt just as much as the wounding had because the Choir of Contrition was obviously a bunch of bleeding sadists. That moment of surprise cost them. I forced power into my legs and in the blink of an eye I was on the deadwood soldiers with a spear, ramming his buddy's own weapon through the small chink between his wood breastplate and the lower parts of his armour. The creature gasped in pain but I ignored it, twisting to meet the assault of the other fae. The sword was angled for my throat, which was smart of him: I'd just conclusively proved that hacking away at my limbs was useless. Nothing short of a killing blow was going to stop me. Unfortunately for him, sword blades going for me was something I was intimately familiar with. I caught his wrist, twisted it sharply and forced him to his knees. A hard stroke was enough to send his still-helmeted head tumbling to the ground. I glanced at the one with the spear through the belly, saw he was on his knees desperately trying to take it out.

"A year ago," I said, "that struggle comment would have been a great set up."

The point of my sword went through one of the eyeholes, came away wet with blood and some silvery fluid that turned into smoke. I got ready to back up Adjutant, but he'd apparently turned the situation around. He tossed the corpse of one soldier at the other and, taking the spear by the shaft two-handed, began to brutally beat down the still-living fae.

"Hakram," I muttered. "That is not how you use a spear."

The fae tried to retreat but I kicked it in the back, having approached quietly, and Adjutant brought down the spear – without even needing to turn it around, since he'd been holding it upside down – to pierce the creature through the throat when she was down. We caught our breaths for a moment, him still bleeding and me feeling my Name's power simmer down without an opponent to take it out on.

"I can't help but notice the blizzard hasn't gone away," Adjutant finally said, bending over to pick up his axe.

I eyed the raging winds ahead warily. Behind us my legionaries had managed to get their line in order, only to be entirely relieved of pressure moments ago when the fae started fleeing back into the blizzard. While giving Hakram and I a very wide berth. That showed a remarkable understanding of how that fight would go.

"Could be there's another one inside," I said.

"Ten denarii there's something even nastier in the middle," Adjutant said.

"That's not a bet," I said, "that's you stealing my hard-earned salary."

I sheathed my sword.

"The one who talked," I said. "He said something that troubles me."

"We are the footsoldiers of Winter," the orc quoted softly.

"If they're not lying," I said. "If those were really the rank and file..."

"How strong will an officer be?" the orc completed.

What did that even make the fae my legionaries were having trouble with? Skirmishers? Or civilians, I thought, and the shiver that went up my spine had nothing to do with the cold. Nothing here was adding up. I didn't know much about the fae, but if they'd attempted to invade Creation before someone would have fucking written about it. I refused to believe there could be several hundred books about the godsdamned Licerian Wars, which hadn't even happened on this continent, and not a single one about 'that one time Arcadia poured out as an unstoppable flood of death'.

"There's other gates in and out of Arcadia," I said. "And they don't seem to have trouble like this. There's fae in the Waning Woods, sure, but they don't invade places as an army. Refuge is a day's walk away from a gate and they're still on the map."

"So why, then, is the Winter Court sending soldiers here?" Hakram asked. "Is it because this isn't a proper gate?"

A wave of warmth washed away the cold a moment before someone cleared their throat. I turned.

"I'm rather curious about that myself," Masego said. "And I know where we can find answers."

Now I'm wondering about heraldry for the noble house of Foundling... A goats head on a green field? Motto: luctor et emergo (struggle and emerge)?

The Old Hack \(@The\_Old\_Hack\)

I am now snickering madly trying to imagine how you could heraldically represent an exploding undead goat. Thank you.
*snicker*

Vin

Goat Skull surrounded by green flame (goblin fire) is my guess. Or something akin to that. Maybe a skeletal/rotting goat standing majestically on a hill surrounded by green flame?

General Chaos

Very, very late, but use a gif. I'm pretty sure magic can do that.

Naeddyr

A goats head flammant on a field of vert?

She needs to find a human male with whom to make a noble household to rule callow!

Cpt. Obvious

She's got thousands of brothers and sisters. The Foundling's are not a small family...

Gunslinger

It's great to finally see Cat let loose again. Hopefully she hasn't gone soft. I wonder what happened to the Hashmallim's sword though?

On a side note, do vote for the guide on topwebfiction (<http://topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil>).

Unoriginal

She wont use it, (the sword), Cat reflects on Black mentioning somewhere that heroes and villains using magical weapons to get a leg up eventually have it fail on them at a critical time.

Letouriste

She is using the sword, it lost all his powers and is now just a sharp blade

What Letouriste said. Was directly described at the endfight of the last book. 😊

greatwyrmgold

No, it's a cool really sharp blade. Also deliciously ironic.

God I loved everything about this chapter. They Fae tactics were brilliant.

1. Create favorable terrain, i.e the blizzard.
2. If your troops lack discipline and real formations, disrupt your enemies instead.
3. Cheat like motherfuckers.

Oh man that was cool

danh3107

*the Fae

that was embarrassing

The Archdevil

This wasn't the Fae creating a beachhead in Marchford. This was the Fae opening the door for Squire, Adjutant, and Apprentice to establish a beachhead in Arcadia.

There's gonna be a lot of dead elves when all is said and done. And possibly two new Aspects for Kat, to go with Take.

TheCount

like Keep and Share?

...If she can't Keep rise and Share it with her legionaries...

*shiver* the Praesi nobles would go to open war against her the moment they find it out ("°A°")

Nairne

The Gallowborn would take on a whole new meaning. The Undying Legion.

Manuel Cao

Would she get two new ones or just one? I get that she lost Struggle since that was her own aspect but I thought the Squire always has Learn. Wouldn't she have gotten that one back since it is inherent to the Squire?

gianoria7

To Manuel Cao:

I don't think they always get Learn.

It's just that anyone who becomes the Squire first has to learn a lot of things. So they obtain Learn to help. In fact, it's generally the first Aspect that is obtained (like in Cath's case)

In Cath's current case, however, she doesn't need to learn as much as before, so she doesn't need her Name to give her a crutch for learning.

So I don't think that she will regain Learn.

It's the same for Struggle.

She isn't struggling as much as before, so she will probably gain another Aspect instead.

As for what kind of Aspect she could get from invading Arcadia, I don't know what it will be, but I'm sure it will be bad for the Fae.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

There is a video ad for 'Humera' which is autoplaying here. I don't care about autoplaying video ads much, but when it takes control of the scroll, shunts the page to the bottom, refuses to let me scroll up and read the chapter, and loops to do it repeatedly, that I have an issue with. Plz fix, I like not having to use adblock here.

stevenneiman

The reason why Refuge doesn't get Fae invaders through the gate is probably because they don't want to remind Hye that they exist. Apparently that went badly for the Wild Hunt, and I'm pretty sure that they're fairly high up the food chain.

stevenneiman

Oh, and

"but they're out of their [breadth->depth] here." I'm pretty sure the term refers to drowning, but in any case "out of your depth" is the common form.

"[one time and a half->one and a half times] the size of what a kabili should be" It might be correct as-is, but it would read smoother the other way.

"See, stuff like that was [like->why] I liked having orcs backing me."

Morgenstern

Well... one explanation that instantly crops up in my mind there is that Hye didn't care if the Fae tried to make her forget... and "someone" is now rampaging in Arcadia and the Fae coming out here are actually fleeing through that one rip in the fabric that happened to be luckily close by =P

On the other hand, maybe they're just pissed that someone made a rip in that wondrous fabric that they did NOT commission...

my thoughts precisely! Now i have to actually wait for updates and stuff...

Morgenstern

" I was very, very glad I'd scrapped with the Hunter before. I'd had precious little training against opponents using spears save for my fights with the hero, and if I hadn't learned to read movements from that I'd likely have earned a gaping hole through my shoulder within the first five heartbeats of the fight. "

And people keep saying you can't learn from a fight directly. 😊
[ Yeah, I know, it was more about the Aspect "Learn" blahblah, but it just reminded me soooo much of Hye's chapter... 😊 ]

Lrse

When did she switch to using a longsword? Was this remarked on anywhere?

Jago

Probably since she had extracted the Lone Swordsman longsword from the stone. Even if it has lost its magic it still is extremely sharp and using it make a statement too.

Alex Walters

Refuge is still on the map because even the Fae don't want to poke Ranger.

Schumi23

"I started speaking again, so I hit it again with morbid fascination." probably 'it started speaking again'?
Loving the story so far 😊

Chapter 6: Backlash

"One learns more from defeat than victory. Therefore, fear the general that has never won a battle."

– Isabella the Mad, Proceran general

Masego hadn't changed a bit since I last saw him. Tall, dark-skinned and boyishly chubby under his loose clothes. His spectacles were fogged by the cold. He'd put on a thick cloak and his trinket-threaded braids were covered by... I was honestly at a loss as to how to describe that abomination. Knitted colourful yarn vaguely shaped like an ugly hat trying to devour an equally awful hat?

"I'm sorry. I'm happy to see you and all but what is that?" I asked, pointing at the inanimate creature squatting over his head.

"My father knitted it," Apprentice replied, tone defensive. "Didn't want me to go out in the cold with my ears uncovered."

I almost asked him which father had committed that crime against anyone with eyes, but I wasn't sure whether that thing would be more disturbing if made by the Warlock or by an incubus, so I refrained from finding out. Probably the incubus, I morbidly thought. Warlock had always been impeccably dressed every time I saw him. Even the occasional casual worse-than-death threat hadn't been enough for me to stop noticing how ridiculously attractive the man was. Between him and Malicia, Evil had the whole hot and dangerous thing covered. Though Kilian was all I needed, of course, I loyally added afterwards. Certainly much less likely to kill me, and I'd come to learn that was not a given in relationships when you were a villain.

"Catherine," Hakram said.

"I'm here," I hastily replied.

"Masego, you've got something?" the orc prompted.

"Yes," the Soninke mage said, pushing up his spectacles. "The anchor for the blizzard is further inside. I've narrowed down a location."

"You can't just break the spell from here?" I asked.

"It's not a spell. And spells cannot be broken, only dispersed," Apprentice said. "This blizzard is pouring out of Arcadia through a semi-stable gate."

"Shut the gate, shut the weather," I said. "Got it."

"Possibly," the bespectacled man said. "It depends on how strong the bleed over from Arcadia into Creation was."

"I'm not having permanent winter in the middle of my city, Masego," I said. "Broke, demon-tainted and covered in ice is where I draw the line."

"We take the hard stances," Hakram said gravely.

The prick. I was about to reply when I caught sight of movement ahead in the storm. Within a heartbeat my sword was back in hand and Adjutant's axe raised.

"We'll revisit that later," I said, taking the lead and moving into the blizzard.

"I'm a rebel," I heard Hakram tell Masego in a pleased voice.

"And you cheat at shatranj," Apprentice replied peevishly.

"I don't even need to, with you," the orc said.

I sighed. Did heroes have to deal with this much bickering? At least neither of them were prone to monologues, there was that. The howling winds and the snow they carried were blinding but not a problem for my little crew: a bubble of translucent blue power formed the moment we entered, courtesy of Masego. Between that and the warmth he was radiating, this was almost comfortable. Almost. No sight of the movement I'd glimpsed, which I naturally took as a bad sign. Just because I couldn't see more than a few feet ahead didn't mean the fae could not. For all I knew they were quietly surrounding us even as our boots crunched in the snow. Stealthy we were not.

"Masego," I said. "If we were surrounded, could you tell?"

"Yes," he said. "With the right instruments."

I paused.

"Do you have the right instruments?" I asked.

He blinked behind his spectacles.

"No," he said. "With the amount of fae magic flooding the area the best I can currently do is locate the direction of the gate."

"How long have we been walking?" Hakram frowned.

"I can't tell," I said. "That is probably not a good sign."

"Time dilation inside Arcadia varies wildly from place to place," Masego contributed helpfully. "In some sections a night could last a century in Creation, in others merely a few heartbeats."

"We're not in Arcadia, though," I said. "Right?"

Apparently howling winds did not make awkward silences any less awkward. You learned something every day. I glanced at Apprentice.

"Masego?"

"We're close to the gate," he said.

"Masego."

"Should be there soon," he said.

"Masego."

The chubby Soninke cleared his throat.

"I cannot tell," he admitted. "To my senses it feels like we are, but that shouldn't-"

With a quiet ping the javelin punched through the shield bubble and would have taken the mage in the throat if I hadn't snatched it out of the air by reflex. I glanced down at the weapon. Bronze, covered in runes. That were glowing. I managed to throw it away a moment before it blew up in shards of metal and ice, some of the shrapnel scoring lines on my cheeks.

"We come in peace," I blatantly lied, calling out into the storm with a sword in hand.

Hakram tried to turn his laugh into a cough.

"Catherine," Masego said, "the fae are unparalleled masters of deception. They're not going to fall for-"

The blizzard cleared ahead of us, revealing a slender silhouette. A man in a scale armour of woven dead wood and obsidian, horned helmet covering his entire face – even his eyes – save for his chin and mouth. The pale skin revealed under was pale as a corpse's. A spear in hand, he sat astride what would have been a long-legged shaggy horse if not for the long horn protruding from its forehead.

"I hate it when you do that," Apprentice muttered.

"Good evening, Lady of Marchford," the fae said.

My wariness immediately went up a notch. The lesser fairies hadn't quite managed to sound human when they'd spoken, too melodic and sing-song to be entirely mortal. The deadwood soldiers hadn't even tried, magic and images dripping from every word. This one, though? He sounded like a person. The most dangerous monsters were always the clever ones.

"That's me," I agreed. "And you are?"

"A Rider of the Host," he replied politely, inclining his head. "A pleasure to make your acquaintance."

I could feel the capitalized letter in that, the same way you did when someone spoke a Name. This was not headed in a pleasant direction.

"Rider, then," I said. "I don't suppose you're moving people behind us as we speak?"

"You have my word no fae will attack while under truce," he replied calmly.

That wasn't a no. I glanced at Masego, who nodded sharply. Whatever was coming at our back when negotiations inevitably broke down – and if I was being entirely honest with myself, there was no real chance they would not – he'd be the one to handle it.

"So you're in charge of the fae invading my city?" I said.

"I was given command of this host," the Rider said.

Eh, close enough. The way he'd worded that instead of giving me a yes or no probably meant he was omitting something, but the intricacies of fae politics were something I gave a remarkably low amount of fucks about. Do not make me learn fae politics, you bastards, I silently thought. I can barely handle the human ones.

"I don't suppose you'd just scamper back into Arcadia if I asked?" I said.

The Rider smiled, revealing a mouthful of milky sharp teeth.

"Are you offering a deal, Lady of Marchford?" he said.

"Gods, am I ever not falling for that one," I muttered. "Look, whatever you are. I could drum your sorry excuse for an invasion out of my backyard, but I'll take losses doing it. No getting around that. I've got other cats to skin, so why don't we just call it a night and both walk away?"

"That sounded like a threat," the Rider noted.

"It was," I replied frankly. "You're probably some sort of force to reckon with back in Arcadia, but this is my wheelhouse. I've walked away from the corpses of scarier stuff than you."

"Lady of Marchford, this is home," he said, smiling.

"Catherine," Masego whispered.

"I'm a little busy at the m-"

I bit down on that. Last time I'd passed on Apprentice's advice in a bad spot I'd walked right into demon fun time, swiftly followed by the screaming soul surgery interlude. Learn from your mistakes, Foundling.

"Yes?"

"Remember that question you asked me?" he said.

I nodded.

"We are," he whispered. "They took across a shard of Arcadia."

Oh, this just kept getting godsdamned better.

"Rider, did you pricks fairy-land the middle of my city?" I growled.

"The truce is over," the fae replied.

The blizzard swallowed him instantly.

"So that's a yes," I said. "Gods Below and Everburning. You bastards are starting to catch up to Heiress on my murder list."

I didn't hear them coming, because they didn't make a sound. It was the kind of instinct my Name gave me, the same that allowed me to catch an arrow in flight or roll out of a building on fire before it collapsed – both of which had happened to be depressingly often since I became a villain. A slender wedge of mounted fae ghosted out of the howling winds, spears at the ready. Like the Rider who'd spoken to me they were astride the murderous-looking cousin of a unicorn, though their own armours lacked the obsidian that had been on the last one's. Maybe he had been in charge. My eyes narrowed at the sight of their hooves never leaving a mark in the snow. I wouldn't put that above them, really, but more likely... My wrist snapped up and a spear of shadow coalesced, tearing unflinching through the wind and straight through the lead rider's chest. He dissipated, the lot of them just a cold mirage.

"Cat," Hakram said, tone alarmed.

My eyes swivelled where he was pointing his axe, to our left. Another wedge of mounted fae. A trickle of Name power drifted up to my eyes, forcing them to sharpen in the poor light. They weren't leaving a trail either. Which meant... And would you look at that: another silent wedge was coming up from our back. They, one the other hand, were leaving hoof prints. The answer seemed clear, which two years of dealing with Akua Sahelian had taught me meant they were probably fucking with me. I formed another spear of shadow and swivelled to throw it to our right, the only avenue that they weren't visibly using. A heartbeat later the faint silhouette of a rider ducking under the spear, pressing against her mount, flickered into visibility for the barest moment. There you are.

"Brace yourself," Apprentice said.

Blinding blue light flared up, his bubble turning into a broad rectangular panel straight in their path. The rider at the tip of the wedge, still closely pressed against her mount, guided her unicorn into leaping over it. And hit another panel with a dull thump, this one entirely invisible. I snorted. That was a new trick. The two wings of cavalry split smoothly, beginning the way around before the lead fae had even hit the ground. The blue panel's glow intensified before it blew up, detonating in a flash of heat and light.

"Masego, can you tell me where the talker is?" I asked.

"Behind them," the Soninke replied without missing a beat.

"That's where I'm going, then," I said. "You boys try not to get yourself killed – I'm pretty sure I can't afford a double funeral."

I began moving before they could reply. I'd barely taken a dozen strides before the protection of whatever ward Apprentice had going on ceased, the wind almost battering me down. I'd gone through the middle, since it was the clearest path, but the riders in the back of the two columns peeled off and went straight for me. So much for the easy way. That made one, two, three... eight in all. Joy. I was going to be feeling this in the morning, wasn't I? Stilling my breath, I stood my ground with my sword in hand. I'd been taught to deal with mounted men, though not fae. The only dangerous part of a lance is the tip, Black's voice reminded me. Watch the horse. Cavalry tramples what it can't skewer. These were spears, not lances, but the principle held. The riders were used to hunting together, I noticed. They silently adjusted their angles so they wouldn't charge into each other if I managed to avoid them.

Whatever sorcery had made them almost invisible was gone, but I was smelling a rat. So far they hadn't once used a straightforward attack, there would be more to this. Frowning, I formed a small orb of shadow and shot it at the leftmost rider – who guided his mount a little to the side to avoid it, never breaking stride. Not a fake? There was a flash of flame behind me as Masego got serious and my question answered himself: only half the riders cast a shadow in the sudden light. Gods, I was already starting to hate fighting fae. So, how did one dodge a blow they couldn't see coming? Don't be where it hits, if Captain was to be believed. I'd been taught that lesson one hammer swing at a time. Name power trickled into my legs and I pushed off, sending a spray of snow behind me. I kept a low profile, eyeing the spears headed for me across a loose half-circle, and shifted tracks to head under a unicorn before I could be turned into several bloody pieces of Foundling. My sword flashed up, opening the creature's belly as I slid under it and I winced as the ice-cold water that flooded out of the wound.

I landed in a sprawl behind the faltering beast, forcing myself to my feet and running in the direction Apprentice had told me. I could feel the riders wheeling around for another charge behind me and resisted the urge to blindly shoot a spear of shadows in their direction. My well was deeper since my Name had been restored, but there were still limits to what I could draw on. I couldn't afford to waste too much power on longshots, not with a hard fight ahead of me. Now, running away from a mounted killer with your back to them and flat fields around you was about the single worst position you could be relative to cavalry. I was not unaware of this, of course, but standing my ground back there with the other two at my side was a losing battle. Our bag of tricks was nothing to sneer at, and had only grown since the Liesse Rebellion, but there was only so long we'd hold our own against creatures that were literally defined by trickery.

No, the way to end this was ahead of me. Cut the head of the snake, other assorted and vaguely violent metaphors. The riders behind me would catch up soon enough, but I was banking on that changing nothing. The silhouette of the Rider of the Host was hard to make out, even with Name sight, but it was there. On a hill, overlooking the scrap and radiating genteel disdain. Yeah, that one had all the little marks of nobility to it. Even in Arcadia, some things were the same. I got to the foot of the hill before the enemy caught up. Glancing at the Rider, I was considering my options while the spears got ever closer when he spoke up.

"Enough," he said. "I will deal with this. Break the others."

Ah, there it was. I did love a bit of hubris in my opponents. I'd mouthed off to the big bad fairy and gotten in front of it, of course it was going to want a piece of me. And it wouldn't want its underlings to get involved, because it was making a point. Probably not about honour, with the fae, but arrogance would do in a pinch. I wasn't picky.

"Yeah, good luck with that," I said. "Last time I saw Masego get pissy he torched a demon so hard it melted the stone under it."

"We are not demons," the Rider said, raising his spear. "We are not mindless abominations. Our existence has purpose."

"You're also supposed to have brains," I said. "So I genuinely don't understand why you're making a mess here. Even if you somehow manage to beat my men, you have to realize the Empire is going to throw all you until you break."

"These matters are beyond your understanding, Lady of Marchford," he said.

"I'm going to enjoy punching that line right out of your mouth," I replied cheerfully, baring my teeth.

The spear lowered, the Rider charged and my Name howled in joy so loudly it drowned out the wind.

First update of the month, so as usual there's an extra chapter. This one is titled "Usurpation" and is from the POV of the Tyrant – though before he became that.

Link here for the lazy, though as always it'll be in the extra chapters tab:

<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2017/04/05/usurpation/>

keldernael

Don't take too bad the criticism on the Tyrant chapter. I love when you add to your world with characters not directly linked to Praes. Kairos is interesting with his different kind of Evil.

Concerning the third book, I hope that Faerie will be only a part of the story. Or you could make a shorter part like book One.

I collected all your chapters in a file to read on my iPad, and I found a few statistics :

Book One with 30 chapters (28 +P and E) has a length of 150k words ;

Book Two with 62 chapters (49 + 11 interludes – P and E) has a length of 260k words ;

Book Three for the moments has 9 chapters (P+6 +2I) and 35k words ; and finally the extra chapters (8) have 30k words ;

Total 475 000 words, 100k less than War and Peace, and 6k less the Lord of the Rings; You have only two years since the prologue of Book One.

Thank you for your work.

It works if you treat "fairy-land" as a verb and that's how I read it myself.

thanks for the chapter!:) )

i'm not understanding the criticism i've read about this chapter on the bonus/special one.

this chapter looks just fine to me, that would be perfect with more tension but the enemy and the timing for that is off anyway;)

maybe later if the fae are revealed having interesting goals.

mordered

And another good chapter, gods above and below, I love the setting of this story, the way you've structured it and your writing style. I really liked the bonus chapter as well. I'm always looking forward to a new chapter every week and I really missed it when you were gone between books. Looking forward to next week.

Kind regards from your fan in the Netherlands,

Jeff

I love this story more and more as it progresses. The banter is great. Keep up the great work.

I'm curious as to the fae's motives in invading. Hopefully we'll get some insights there.

Morgenstern

Second that. Nice chapter; see nothing wrong with it, so I'll directly state that, as others seem to have commented negatively on it. o_ô

Morgenstern

[ I'm, obviously, not on the next page yet... 😊

Were they complaining about the other action in the Free Cities and the Calamities, most of all, getting too little limelight? Would be about the only thing I'd complain about. They ARE, after all (Black most of all), the "other" protagonist(s) of the story, and if you don't just do flashbacks, but actually have them act *in the present* people rightfully expect to get more of a mix of present-action A and B to lead them together more quickly and not action A drawn out seemingly way beyond the same time it should take by giving it less scenes (more behind-the-screen action and jumps in time I'd guess, but that's the *impression* one gets anyway: while B is going on over months, A feels like it cannot be more than a week over there, but that week is strung out across all those months B takes) when B gets massively more scenes).

But I'd second that decreasing their screen time IS about the only move one can pull (short of turning them into the dumb guys) that one can decrease reader rooting for the OTHER protagonists and possibly even more than for the one so designated... and that is about the only thing short of turning them into really dumb or otherwise unlikable guys (which does not fit how they were presented so far and would break reader consent) to make them more... redundant. Speaking of redundancy, the one that has come most fully into their role and filling about the same space as his older counterpart (Wekesa/Warlock) is Masego/Apprentice. My money is thus on Warlock to fall first, IF any Calamity should fall at all at this point. We ARE, after all, obviously still in the "get to know the world" part of the whole story, still in the "apprenticeship" part instead of the "moving around as actual 'hero' (pardon the word..) of the story in their own right" part, and even the starting part of "trouble in the homeland" can be argued to not be finished at all, because Cat's "getting to know the world"-storypart is obviously so far done by STILL bringing up new trouble invading her homeland. That would, actually, argue for NO Calamity falling AT ALL at this point, no matter what the word count is, it seems to just mean that the series is longer / more fully developed in detail, thus taking up more words, than other series that are done in e.g. a trilogy of lesser book spine width.

So, as far as storybuilding is concerned.. reader expectations matter, these chapters/books feel far shorter than they are in wordcount-sense 😊 The story hasn't moved along enough yet to go on killing off Calamities, even if people start talking about the plot inexorably seeming to hint at that incoming somewhere along the line, as the usual thing to do when you have an older troupe vs. the new party that is meant to succeed them, no matter how, the older ones get "replaced" by the new ones, because somehow many people cannot imagine both being around for very long at the same time, that is: once the new party has actually transitioned into being FULLY developed, giving off much the same vibes (if maybe differently distributed between them), thus ending up in redundancy WHEN you get to the point where you would basically have one Role doubled into two people. Barring Masego, I don't see anyone of the "new troupe" even really close to that stage yet. Not even Cat, who is still mimicking, as I have said already elsewhere. ]

It occurs to me that conscripting a few dozen fey would get rid of their mage shortage rather quickly.

Barthumphries

You realize what the whole point of this is, right? Catherine wins, beats the fairies, but she comes back three years after she went in. In the meantime, Heiress will have taken full control of the entire region and Catherine's overfull legion will have been broken up to help fill other legions (especially the new legion that's being formed).

And in the meantime the whole situation at Court will have changed and Black will officially be on the outs. He'll still be friends with Malicia, but she won't be able to openly be friends with him.

And all because Heiress helped open the gate and promised to give the faeries part of Callow if they win. See, if the fairies win, then they beat Cat and they get an area that isn't Praes so she won't care. If the fairies lose, then Cat gets at least a couple years of her life sucked away so either way Heiress wins.

Letouriste

What would be the point of the time skip then?

Also, if I remember right heiress and her mother will soon start each of their plans so they don't have a need to trap her more than a few month anyway.

In three years this story will probably be already finished given the pace of the plot.

The way I see that:

- like someone upside said maybe that will lead to an alliance with faes 😞

- the fae have some plans and will be an major actor in the futur wars

- the fae are crap and will just be used like a political blow toward her (like look at this fail of governor! Remove her from her post!)

- maybe a new character will appear in this fight against the fae, a runaway one, a diplomate fae (lol), a person causing havoc in fairy and leading fae toward fleeing.

Barthumphries

"What would be the point of the time skip then?"

To set Catherine back, to give her further obstacles to overcome. To better let her see who's her friend and who was an ally of convenience.

Cap'nSmurfy

I'd say you're right about her losing some time, but 3 years is far too much. A few months at most maybe. Remember all the plans are coming to a head in less than a year, no way Catherine's just not going to be there. Arrive at the last minute maybe (though thats really more of a hero thing)

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Oh, so that's why Masego wasn't sure they were in Arcadia. He could tell they were, but he "knew" they weren't.

I forgot to say it a couple chapters ago, but what kind of name for a goblin is Sever? Either it was meant to be Severer, or it doesn't have to be a noun who does a verb. That kinda detracts from the Awesomeness of the Gobbler imo, a lot of the interesting implications of that name just went *poof* =(

So are we going to see a goblin named Tomer or Johner or Amyer now? Or maybe it means she's from Sev?

Chapter 7: Elaboration

“Ah, but being defeated was always part of my plan! Yet another glorious victory for the Empire.”

– Dread Emperor Irritant, the Oddly Successful

We'd gotten the usual banter and I'm-going-to-kill-you, no-I'm-going-to-kill-you posturing out of the way, so it was now time to get to the stabbing. Admittedly my favourite part, especially when I wasn't taking on a hero. This sad sack of smugness might pack a punch, but he wasn't carrying a solemn promise of victory handed down by the Heavens. If I started chopping of limbs he wasn't going to get back up with an irritating one-liner about Evil always being defeated. As good ol' Willy had learned in the end, that wasn't always true anyway. Sometimes Evil snatched a last moment resurrection, stomped in Good's skull and went dancing with a good-looking redhead afterwards. Probably not victory the way the Gods Below or the average Dread Emperor conceived it, but I wasn't going to be taking life lessons from people who'd thought the invisible army plan was a good idea.

The Rider didn't seem to bother with the same tricks his minions had used, devouring the slope on the way down faster than I believed was actually possible. It occurred to me that most everyone I fought had cavalry while I had to make do with a pack of malevolent goblins, which struck me as pretty unfair. Before I could further lament the fact, I had to unsheathe my sword and brace myself for impact. It would have been a mistake to think of the Rider as a mere lancer, I decided. For one, his murderous unicorn effectively had a second spear jutting out of its forehead. More than that, unlike most horseman, killing his mount was unlikely to slow him down much. The way he'd introduced himself had me guessing he was in some way linked to the state of a horseman, but I doubted taking care of that would knock him out of the fight. Creatures that introduced themselves with fancy titles usually had some power to back up that presumption. That or they died early and bad.

Eyes calm, hands steady, I watched the points of the spear and the horn come for me. The spear would be the dangerous one: it wasn't like the unicorn could twirl around the horn for a second go once it was past me. I hoped. Letting out a long breath, I adjusted my footing to be able to dash forward without missing a beat just before the Rider got in range. The horn I ducked under, the spear I narrowly avoided – it scraped my left pauldron – and I made to slide under the unicorn to open its belly. The back of the spear hit me right above the nose, knocking me down as I cursed. I rolled to the side, but not quick enough: the unicorn's hooves came down and caved in my breastplate. Strike one for my plate being anything more than expensive dead weight today, since that could easily have been my ribs. I hated breaking ribs, half the time shards got into my lungs and I ended up coughing blood.

I managed to swing at the spear point before it took my throat, knocking it aside, and rolled before the unicorn could continue dismantling my plate. That thing was being way too bloodthirsty. Sure I hadn't been a virgin for a few years, but there was no reason for it to take who I brought into my bed so personally.

"Look," I gasped, managing to get on my feet and hastily backing away from a swing. "He was a fisherman's son. They swim all the time, do you have any idea how fit they look?"

Murder made horse was not impressed by my protests, if the way it tried to kick me was any indication. The Rider, what little of his face could be seen expressionless, fluidly adjusted his hold and slapped down the spear at my head. Too fast for me, when I was still sidestepping his mount. It dented my helmet, which was a much more acceptable loss than my skull. I took back everything unpleasant I'd said about my armour today. The second strike I parried, but his handhold shifted again and he twisted deftly hitting my sword out of my hand. All right, this was headed nowhere. If I didn't want to end up an expensively armoured corpse I was going to have to change the beat to this. Before the third strike – this one a lunge – could put me further on the back foot, I managed to get back in front of the unicorn. Predictably, it objected to this state of affairs and with a whinny took a step forward to put its horn through my throat. I was still unarmed, but I did have two free hands.

My gauntleted hands closed around the horn and I sharply pivoted. Lift with your legs, Cat, I reminded myself. Before the Rider could rearrange my presented spine at spear point, I flooded my limbs with power and pulled. For a single glorious moment I lifted the unicorn, swinging it forward like some kind of wildly failing mace until it reached its apex over my head. At which point the horn snapped. This had not, I mused, been one of my better plans. Below getting into a verbal fight with Heiress at the Tower, though still above letting William go at Summerholm. I hastily threw myself out of the way, seeing the Rider gracefully leap off his mount from the corner of my eye. The moment I got back on my feet I aimed my arm at the downed unicorn – which looked like it had broken a leg on the way down, good for me – and snapped my wrist. The backup knife shot like an arrow, sinking right into its eye. Pickler, you queen among goblins. I can't believe I argued with you about a second knife being overkill.

I stepped back and picked up my sword, adjusting my cloak around my neck.

"Let the record show I'm not above murdering a unicorn if it looks at me funny," I announced.

The Rider glanced at his dead mount indifferently.

"A worthy effort," he conceded. "If ultimately futile."

I paused for a moment, too many scathing replies on the tip of my tongue for me to be able to settle on a single one, but I ended up having to back away when he tried to run me through. I blinked in surprise: he'd been fast, on the unicorn, but this was something else. Quicker than even the deadwood soldiers had been, and they'd been in a league above me. Was that part of the fae package, then? Sorcery and tricks and swiftness. Not great on the staying power, but if they killed you before it became an endurance match that was hardly a problem. The fairies would be useless as tits on a sparrow if they ever tried to make a shield wall, but that wasn't the way they fought at all. It was like fighting an army of skirmishers, all of them mages, with a backbone of heavy hitters behind them. That was not a good match for the Fifteenth, or even the Legions of Terror in general.

Sword in hand, I circled the Rider silently. Another flicker and the point was skidding off my arm, leaving a long scar on the steel – I tried to catch the shaft with my free hand but it retreated too quickly. All right, so finesse wasn't going to get me anywhere. Closing the distance should have been my solution, but I was wary of getting that close to a creature so much faster than me, spear or no spear. I was going to have to take a hit, I realized with a grimace. I could walk it off if it didn't hit anywhere too lethal, and while his weapon was in my guts it couldn't defend. I missed the days when the initial parts of my battle strategies hadn't involved getting my stabbed instead of my opponent. Stepping forward, I kept my eye on the spear. That proved to be a mistake. The Rider took a hand off the shaft and a heartbeat later a gust of chilling wind slammed into me.

I dug in my feet, but it wasn't enough. The wind intensified and I was sent flying upwards, like I'd been smacked by a god's invisible hand. The world spun around me but I kept just enough awareness of my surroundings to notice the four javelins of dark ice forming in a loose lozenge ahead of me. About where I would be in a few moments, I assessed with strange clarity. And it was a sucker's bet that whatever made that ice darker would enable it to punch through plate. Well, couldn't have that. Fortunately, I still had a few tricks I'd learned since Liesse I'd yet to unpack. My Name flared, in the way it did whenever I formed a spear of shadows, but I went for something more... tangible. The darkness pooled together into a circular pane right in my trajectory, and I twisted so that I would hit it feet first. It was not quite as steady to the touch as solid ground, but it would do. I allowed my knees to bend when I hit the pane and effectively threw myself back down in the opposite direction.

The first ice javelin skimmed the edge of my gorget and I winced. I half-turned, still falling, and saw that two other projectiles were going wide. The last one was headed for the middle of my back, though, which was less promising. I formed an orb of shadow in my palm as it neared and shot it straight into the point at the last moment – the javelin exploded into shards when it hit, and I braced myself for my coming reacquaintance with the ground. Optimism, that. Instead I turned back to face the sight of the Rider with translucent wings sprouting off his back, just as his spear punched through the plate covering my belly. I gasped in pain, writhing around the point, and he tore it off without missing a beat. Kicking me away he fluttered back and I landed bleeding on the ground. My knees gave and I ended up in an ungainly crouch.

"Rise," I croaked.

Nothing happened, and panic welled up.

"Rise," I repeated.

No, it was working I realized. Just slowly. The wound began to close at a snail's pace, and I could feel it drawing much deeper from that bundle of power than it should have. Shit. Black had warned me, hadn't he? Borrowed power always turned on its user.

"Your lack of understanding of your own aspects is a marvel to behold," the Rider commented.

A flicker and he was in front of me, palm thrust out. I forced myself out of the way of the gust of wind, hissing at the pain of my still-closing wound.

"Thrice gifted is your Name," he said, idly circling me. "Thrice used can your stolen power be, from dusk 'til dawn."

Well, that was useful to know. Would have been even better to know it before I'd gotten myself run through twice, but beggars can't be choosers.

"Thanks for the tip," I grunted. "While we're at it, I don't suppose you'd care to tell me your nefarious plans?"

I readied myself for another rousing round of Catherine-tries-not-to-die, but the attack never came. The Rider was twitching, mouth twisting in discomfort.

"Since you are about to die anyway," he said reluctantly, through gritted teeth, "I might as well reveal the depths of your failure."

Wait, what? That never worked. Not even with Heiress and she lived for this stuff. It certainly didn't look like he wanted to tell me any of this.

"This struggle is but a distraction," the Rider said. "You are meant to waste time and die here while the true war is fought in Creation."

Masego had told me once that Arcadia worked according to different rules than Creation. I'd only been pretending to listen when he'd been talking about how that affected the creational laws governing the flow of time – which was, apparently, a classical element. I really needed to learn what those were at some point – but one part had actually been interesting enough I'd tuned back in. Arcadia was, in a lot of ways, rawer than Creation proper. In Creation stories bound only the Named, but in Arcadia everything was a story. It was why everything was so changeable. I was standing in front of an enemy clearly winning against me, at his mercy, and had just prompted him to gloat and reveal his plans. So he had. Even if he didn't want to.

"Alas, I am in despair," I badly lied. "Tears, woe is me. Why would you do something so wicked?"

The Rider cursed in a tongue I could barely process as spoken.

"If Summer is at war, so must be Winter," he said. "The boundaries have been thinned, the host will be assembled."

I squinted at him.

"You're insane," I said slowly. "You'll... never get away with this?"

The fae looked at me, then at the dead unicorn. There was a long moment of silence. Then he bolted. Just... legged it, as fast as his little fairy feet could manage. I frowned, then raised an arm. I formed a spear of shadows and shot him in the back. The Rider cursed again, though he managed to avoid most of the damage – all I did was clip his shoulder. That might be more of a problem than I'd thought, though: one of his wings burst into existence, then out. Huh. Was this what being a hero felt like? No wonder they were always so overconfident. I caught up within moments. For all that some intangible tide had turned in my favour, he hadn't gotten any slower. The spear wove elegantly around my sword, but instead of letting him drive me back I forced my way close. His palm shot off, but I was in no mood for a repeat of the flight adventure. I punched his hand, which while not the most elegant of solutions still broke a few fingers with a hard crack. The Rider turned his wounded shoulder to me, and the wing formed a moment later.

I was blown back like I'd been hit by a blast of pure unformed magic – my occasional spars with Masego had taught exactly what that felt like, in unpleasant detail – but pivoted on myself and used the momentum to take a swing. I hacked into his elbow, tearing through the wood and obsidian scales, before having to raise my arm to block a swing of the shaft. I almost made a comment about how the tides had turned, but bit down on my tongue at the last moment. Gloating was for amateurs, and here in Arcadia might have very final consequences. My gauntlet was half-crumpled but that didn't hurt any less when I swung again, decking him in the face. He flinched back and my sword came down again. Cleaved straight through the elbow this time, the limb flopping to the ground. The lack of blood was a little off-putting, but I didn't break my stride.

My leg swept his as I rammed my pommel into his chest, but I realized a moment too late that wouldn't work on this kind of an opponent. His good wing burst into existence, getting back on his feet, and he slammed the bottom of his spear into my chest. Gods, I was basically wearing scrap metal at this point. Even knowing how that had ended up for the Exiled Prince I was tempted to get an enchanted suit of armour. Might not get my ass killed if I used it only the once. I smacked at his hands with my pommel and he dropped the spear. Within a heartbeat a sword of frost had formed in his hand but an orb of shadows had formed in mine: I rammed it through the spell, dissipating it before it could form properly. I heard a grunt and in a spray of crystal-clear water a forearm emerged from the stump to replace the one I'd cut off. Well, there went attrition tactics. I went for a killing stroke instead, side of my sword smashing into the side of his neck.

There was a spray of scales and he fell: I stepped back to adjust my stance for a deeper blow. Both wings flickered into existence, and before I could hit him agains he shot off into the sky. Well, shit. It figured that if he could grow an arm back he could fix whatever I'd done to the shoulder. I was debating how feasible it would be to make a series of shadow platforms to pursue – not very, it ate through my reserves like you wouldn't believe – when a rope of green smoke slithered its way through the air until it coiled around his foot. The Rider hacked at it with another ice sword but it just went through, cleaving through his boots and doing nothing to the smoke. Which was pulled a moment later, smashing him into the ground like a falling star. Hakram idly walked up to him, burying his axe into the skull repeatedly and with great enthusiasm. I turned to eye Masego, who dismissed the green smoke rope with an idle gesture.

"Catherine," he greeted me calmly. "I see you're still alive."

"Arguably my best skill," I replied.

The dark-skinned mage blinked.

"Catherine you died. Not even a year ago," he said.

I might have insulted myself by accident there, I reflected. I cleared my throat.

"Your guys are taken care of?" I asked.

"Most," Hakram replied, wiping sweat off his brow as he joined us. "Some fled."

Kill-stealer, I mouthed at him. He grinned back unrepentantly.

"I meant to take a prisoner for interrogation, but they were not inclined to cooperate," Apprentice said.

I glanced at the corpse of the Rider. With all three of us we might have managed to capture him, but given how dangerous he'd been that would have been risky. Probably for the best he'd gotten the orc treatment.

"I learned a few things from this one," I said. "This whole fight was bait. They want us to wander around Arcadia while they mass for an assault on Marchford."

"I suspected as much," Masego shrugged. "We're no longer in the shard."

I frowned.

"How d'you figure that?" I asked.

"We're not surrounded by blizzard, for one," he said. "And I cannot feel the boundaries of the shard anymore. We're in Arcadia Resplendent, that much is certain."

I sheathed my sword, trying to hide my surprise. He was right, about the blizzard. It was still windy out but visibility was clear. I hadn't even noticed. When it had gotten easier to move I'd been paying attention to the fight, and must have unconsciously chalked it up to my Name taking care of the problem.

"He said something else that caught my attention," I said. "Something about Winter having to be at war when Summer is."

Hakram looked vaguely pained and I felt with him. The idea of there being a whole other breed of these guys out for our blood wasn't exactly thrilling. Masego looked pleased, naturally, because he wasn't going to have to rebuild a city that was broke, demon-corrupted, iced in and on fire. I did not care for the way that list kept getting longer.

"That explains a great deal. The Courts of Arcadia are named after the seasons, but they have nothing to do with those same seasons on Creation," Apprentice said. "Consider them more like states of mind. When Winter and Summer become the two existing courts, it means Arcadia is at its most contrary."

"If they're pissed at each other," I said, "why is Winter making itself my problem?"

"Symmetry, Catherine," the bespectacled man enthused. "If Summer is at war with an enemy exterior to Arcadia, Winter must be the same. I would say there is no personal enmity behind this invasion, not that fae can truly be personal about anything. The weaker boundary at Marchford simply made it the obvious target."

"Stop sounding so cheery about creatures trying to murder us," I requested, then shifted uneasily.

Back in Laure, the Ruling Council's session had been delayed to talk about an incident in Dormer: a handful of Summer fairies making a mess down there, though not a large one. The picture that was putting together was not one I liked at all.

"How likely is it that the courts could be targeting the same enemy?" I asked.

Masego blinked.

"Impossible," he said.

Oh, good. That made the mess even more complicated but I'd take it.

"Though, of course, from the fae perspective no nation as we know them would be considered the 'same enemy'," he added absent-mindedly. "Making the distinction largely academic."

Don't punch him, I told myself. You still need him to get out of this place.

"Should have led with that, warlock's get," Hakram said, tone amused.

"Oh," Masego said.

He glanced at me reproachfully.

"It was a very poorly-phrased question," he said.

"Quit while you're ahead," I advised. "All right. Fine. So Winter's going to keep attacking as long as Summer does, and we have no idea why it's attacking or even who specifically."

"If I was trying to keep you busy and had an understanding of the fae mindset," Hakram said. "I would provoke a war with Summer, knowing Winter would be forced to mirror the action. Likely at Marchford."

I sighed.

"Heiress," I said.

That did sound right up her alley. As Governess of Liesse, even if Summer was at war with her city specifically, I'd still be forced to protect her from the consequences of her actions. It was my duty as a member of the Ruling Council, and her city was full of Callowans to boot. Meanwhile I'd have to deal with an assault on my demesne from an entirely different court, eroding the strength of the Fifteenth while simultaneously forcing me to use other means to deal with Summer. It was the kind of overly complicated plot with massive potential for backfiring that was her bread and butter. Hells, she might as well have signed the whole thing. I clenched my fingers and unclenched them.

"Winter's got a boss fairy, right?" I said to Masego.

"There will be a king or a queen, yes," he agreed.

"If I punch it until it dies, that feels like a problem solved," I grunted. "If Winter stops attacking then Summer would have to as well, no?"

The chubby mage frowned.

"I'm not sure," he admitted. "Possibly. Regardless, Catherine, if you attempt to fight the ruler of a court you will get killed. Those creatures qualify as a god by most measures."

"Dying's never stopped me before," I said.

"We lack angels to loot for a resurrection, this time," Hakram said. "Cat, there's no need to go at this alone. This is bigger than us. The Tower needs to step in."

If Malicia gets involved I'm tacitly admitting the Ruling Council can't run Callow without her help, I thought. I bit my lip. I'd need to think on this more.

"First we get out of here," I finally said. "Masego, you said we're no longer in the shard. Does that mean we can't leave the same way we came in?"

"We'll need a gate to step through or a fairly powerful fae to open a path," he said.

"Do your thing, then," I said. "Where's the closest gate?"

"Explain the fae to me, Apprentice," he muttered. "Find me a gate, Apprentice. I could be taking apart a pocket dimension right now, you know. They never ask for anything."

He just beginning to trace runes in the air when Hakram cleared his throat. I looked at him, then the direction he was pointing at. There were snow-covered hills as far as the eye could see, with the occasional thicket of dead trees and a few distant mountains. There was also a path now, paved in ice. It snaked across the hills towards what looked like a glistening city.

"That wasn't there a moment ago," I said.

"We weren't looking for a gate a moment ago," Apprentice said.

"Gods, I hate this place," I cursed.

I eyed the road, which began atop the hill just beyond us and looked as pristine as if it had just been built. For all I knew it had been.

"We're not using that," I said. "That is an insultingly obvious trap."

Hakram clapped my shoulder, amused.

"It would be an easier walk than the snow," Masego said, just shy of complaining.

"You could use the exercise," Adjutant said, nudging him.

I blinked. If Hakram was next to him, then who had – I went for my sword, and someone laughed.

"You lot are terrible at not getting killed," Archer told me cheerfully, hand still on my shoulder.

"You lot are terrible at not getting killed,"
I mean apart from Cat they have all never died, and Cat came back so even that doesn't really count.

Barthumphries

Called it! And I was wrong. I figured Heiress started the fae invasion to cause a time skip... Which I might still be right about... But probably aren't.

danh3107

That was.... FUCKING COOL

You manage to take my expectations and turn them on their at every turn. Brilliant

Archer showing up as she did isn't a coincidence (obviously in this story), I have a feeling what may become the new calamities is getting their start right now in Arcadia.

(I'm squeeing really loudly right now)

Naeddyr

NOW we're back in form and cooking with green fire!

So, does anyone think "Summer" is Good-aligned and vice versa? Might be nominally so, at least on a superficial masquerade level, which is why Heiress' actions have basically assigned Cat the role of 'Good' in a sort of play enacted in Arcadia.

But she's dabbling with forces she does not understand! you say, and it is indeed so. We might see Cat going through a sort of dream-quest acting out the What Could Have Been version of herself, except not y'know mind-controlled fanatic Queen Purge-All-Evil IV.

The Archdevil

Why does Summer have to be good aligned? They're attacking a city of Callowans, probably mostly civilians, while Winter is attacking a fortified city defended by a Legion of Terror, which serves the biggest Evil empire we know of. Not to mention the defenders have fought off a demon from the Planes Below before.

If Winter's attack is indeed just a balancing action since Summer is attacking, maybe they chose Cat's city not just because it's a weak spot in the border between Arcadia and Creation, but because the defenders actually have a slight chance of rebuking them, which would mean Summer would have to halt their attack as well in the best case scenario.

Euodiachloris

They're Fae: they don't do Good or Evil. At best, you get Protagonist-Antagonist pairings or just plain Foils with a long-term Frenemy thing going on (and, pity the poor blighters caught between 'em). 🙄

Fae are Blue-Orange to the point of sociopathic cat-hood, and are always Outside Context in an Eldritch Abomination way. It's what makes them tick. 😊

stevenneiman

That would make sense. Monologues to clearly helpless and defeated enemies are a very Evil thing, and the Rider was compelled to give one just because he had the upper hand. Of course, their version of Good and Evil is probably even more blue and orange than that of the elves.

Interesting that this is the second time she's ended up using Good stories to defeat Evil enemies while still upholding Evil objectives herself.

Morgenstern

Nah... he had one because Cat nudged him that way, it would seem. Fairies are kind of the literal type in many stories... throw them buckets of sand to count, give them requests they have to fulfill etc.

Morgenstern

Wait, what? Since when is Cat upholding Evil objectives using Good methods instead of upholding Good objectives and going the Evil way to get there? oO She subverts Good rules/actions occasionally, USES them, yeah, but the plan of action is basically Evil, I'd argue, while her endgame wishes are Good. What with wanting to save a country full of people by killing off some thousands of them and all that...

naturalnuke

It was at that moment the The Rider realized, he'd fucked up.

The quietist

Calling it now the city is Sanctuary and Cat is gonna meet Ranger. Should be fairly sweet.

darkening

Sanctuary isn't in arcadia. Though it has a nearby gate which leads to a lot of fae being around.

Morgenstern

Well, we don't know if the Gate there is not actually what seems to be the city gate, just that it's the Gate leading out of Arcadia, which means the city IS on the other side, in Creation... Sanctuary could be a perfectly acceptable solution to that conundrum.

Shequi

Yay! Archer. I knew she was far too cool & well-defined to not show up again.

Letouriste

I didn't expected much from this chapter but it's great:)
Well,I'm not sure I understood everything,name shenanigans can be pretty complicated and you throw several at the same time^^

Jnnnnnkzn

I have a feeling that somehow the snow will end up on fire. Catherine hasn't burned anything to the ground recently, and it's kind of a thing she does. I don't know how she will achieve it, but I am imagining a flummoxed Apprentice trying to explain how she should stop ignoring reality so effectively.

And it doesn't count if the flames aren't green.

I could almost feel pity for Heiress if she did trigger this. Messing with the Fair Folk? If they think you are playing their game well enough to approach their level (well, the basement, at least), they make sure you can't ever stop, especially if you desperately want to because all you value has become ashes around you.

Because it's fun! 😊

Morgenstern

Does as of now. 😊

Zaits

Just finished my reread of the first two books, so I have two questions: one for the readers and one for the author.

1) If the White and Black Knights are meant to be each other's counterparts, it has to reflect on their respective retinues. Now, I recall someone calling White Knight's party a harem, but since a romantic interest being displayed on-screen isn't a requirement, the same logic could be applied to Black. I would argue, though, that he subverts the harem setup as he does everything else. His inner circle includes:

Sabah, who has Obey as an aspect, but has accepted never becoming a central character on her own, and is married for about two decades;

Eudokia, a Delian who followed Black into Praes and is personally loyal and protective to him nearly more than the other Calamities, but is apparently content with the current state of affairs and is well aware and pleased how much her stereotype of overly attached nerdy girl creeps people out, invisibility or not;

Wekesa, a gay best friend, happily married (though Black did offer to kill Tikoloshe);

Hye, the only person he has romantic feelings towards. Also, healthy relationship from the start is the best subversion;

Alaya, uncannily close to being his childhood friend (making a promise under the stars, holding hands, having a harmonic understanding of each other both in public and in private, undergoing a tragic twist of life in his absence etc.); and an unnamed as of yet Assassin.

I forgot where I was going with all of this, but if Ime is wrong and Assassin is a woman (who had appeared on screen in first two books), who would that be?

2) Regarding the worldbuilding: in the comments to "Countdown" EE has mentioned that Hell's counterpart to angels are devils, and demons are more of a natural disaster. Does the Heaven have anything to counterbalance the demons, then?

Sorry for the wall of text.

Daemion

As I understood it, Angels are few in number but individually quite powerful, while with the devils and demons it's more about quantity. So they are in balance.

Morgenstern

Assassin is supposed to be more closely related to Malicia instead of Black, but that might all be a set-up, after all... although Black asking Assassin to take him out, should he ever become a threat to the Empire would fit with him sticking to Malicia, too, not just very close relations with Black (more "normal" friends would rather balk at the idea, I guess, but.. Assassin..).

I was actually wondering if Ime has shown up in Book I already... But I'll really have to go take a look at all that and simply write down characters/names to get a full list to look at. One wouldn't really expect someone quite that important, but that can be subverted as perfect distraction, too.

Morgenstern

*ahem

" sticking with 'him' (or her.. = referring to Assassin) "

NerfContessa

Few chapters made me laugh so hard as cats accidentally heroing the fight with Rider...

Morgenstern

Also, another one I always wondered about was this strange... advisor figure ... on the Goodside. Though that might have been meant to simply be one of the Countesses or even Cordelia?

Have to reread... I think there was some "reveal" although it might have been a faked reveal... hmmm....0

One: Winter is basically Unseelie, Summer is Seelie. I SERIOUSLY doubt Erratic is trying to reinvent the wheel by going with all-original Fae mindsets, especially while using so many of the Sidhe characteristics. Neither are "Good"...but with Summer/Seelie humans tend to have a slightly better chance of being offered an out-at-a-cost rather than the near-certain horrific death of being hunted down by the original Wild Hunt (Unseelie) or the Hounds of Annwyn (major Unseelie lord, prototype from which the Wild Hunt legends eventually evolved).

Humans tend to consider the Seelie "Good" for this reason, and the Unseelie "Evil"...but it is WAY more complicated than that. For instance, say you manage to avoid your near-certain death at the hands of a major Unseelie Fae...in legends they often do stuff like give you blessings that make you into a virtual demigod back among humans...or come and rescue you in epic fashion when all hope is lost. Things the Seelie almost NEVER do. (Ie: It is remotely possible to earn the respect, or at least the affection of a master for a treasured pet from some of the Unseelie. The Seelie's "Good" characteristics run skin-deep, no more.

The Dresden Files do an EXCELLENT job of illustrating how Seelie/Unseelie, Summer/Winter work..there's a bit of original spin there with the Unseelie being engaged in a war against Eldritch Evil Abominations to defend humanity...but otherwise Queen Titania and Queen Mab/The Queen of Air and Darkness are TEXTBOOK Fae. Even down to the taking of champions/consorts from human stock.

I think Erratic may be doing a bit of original spin themselves... but it seems fairly nose-on for the Sidhe Courts.

Two: Arcadia itself is the truly original material here. It seems to run a bit like a legendary Fairyland, but much more like an original part of Erratic's very original story setting. The stuff about everything being a story in Arcadia is gold IMO.

Three: I ADORED the small info-dump from the Rider about how Cat's Take works. That was done with some absolutely beautiful writing. As was Cat's manipulation of the everything-in-Arcadia's a story, and the Rider's reactions. Cat's genre-savviness made a very cool appearance as well when she bit down at the last second on making a comment about the tides having turned.

Awesome material. Loved this chapter.

danh3107

Well said, I really want to see Erratic's take on "Mab" and "Titania", the Dresden Files can be a hard act to follow in some respects, but I love this version of arcadia so much more than the nevernever.

"Tides have turned" = superbad comment when said when YOU are being struck *lol

["Catherine," he greeted me calmly. "I see you're still alive."

"Arguably my best skill," I replied.

The dark-skinned mage blinked.

"Catherine you died. Not even a year ago," he said.

I might have insulted myself by accident there, I reflected. I cleared my throat.]

This section of dialogue is pure comedy gold.

Gunslinger

This chapter was comedy gold.

"That thing was being way too bloodthirsty. Sure I hadn't been a virgin for a few years, but there was no reason for it to take who I brought into my bed so personally."

"Alas, I am in despair," I badly lied. "Tears, woe is me. Why would you do something so wicked?"

I like the bit about stories being more important in Arcadia. It ties in really well with the Faerie mythos and once again genre-saviness saves the day. Book 3 started out slowly but it's been slowly ramping up the awesomeness (Archer's introduction is great).

On a side note, I'm so tired of Cat having to constantly react to Heiress' plots. I enjoyed the beat down she got in the finale of book 2 but I'm waiting for her final day.

P.S: If anyone is still reading this do consider voting for Practical Guide to Evil on topwebfiction.com/vote.php?for=a-practical-guide-to-evil

Morgenstern

I'm more waiting for Cat taking the initiative and making *Heiress* react for a change, not necessarily the end right there..

So, Take is now officially a replacement for Struggle, only instead of coming from an established tendency to get into uphill fights it stems from an established tendency to win uphill fights, and instead of activating once per day it can be used three times. Kind of a relief that it's not just a borrowed piece of power that would eventually run out completely in the least convenient moment.

That raises a question: since Catherine is still a Squire and still in a position of apprentice to Black and Malicia, so Learn is still up her alley. Ranger has her own Learn, and so we know that at least this aspect can vary depending on the person. Catherine got jumpstarted by Black personally as a Squire who didn't know languages, swordfighting or politics necessary to become a fully realised Named, lead armies or rule Callow, so her variation lets her memorize and comprehend anything as long as it's being taught to her consciously. Hye is a half-elf, naturally strong, taught by the same woman who trained the Emerald Swords. She also inherited her father's adventurous streak, so her Learn presumably can pick mainly fighting-related skills, though in any situation. Now Catherine has everything she has initially bargained for (an army, free reign over Callow, public appreciation), but every potential mentor of hers is away, she's in a situation that becomes increasingly over her capability to manage, and if I understand Heiress' plan's timeline correctly, she's rather pressed for time. What would Learn look like if she got it now?

Dragrath

Of course Heiress is behind it... she never lets a convoluted high chance of failure plot slip her by all intents releasing Eldrich abominations to keep Cat out of her hair while she does who knows what...

I really wonder what her full plot is so far we know she is a daddies girl scheming to beat her mom the tower Cat (as well as who knows what else) and seems to be gunning for some outside the norm role by trying to deal with every variety of Eldrich horrors.

Also love how Arcadia literally follows any and every story suggestion genre savyness is really the only thing that can save Cat here as faeries OP as expected for the orange-blue type moralities

I have gone to the trouble of actually going back to the chapter where the Lone Swordsman died, because I couldn't let these complaints that he somehow died "unfairly" or "irrelevant" and "being presented as a mook" stand, to face them off with DIRECT EXCERPTS. Here you go:

William, covered in soot, EYED ME WITH HORROR.

"All according to plan," I lied.

"You're dead," the Lone Swordsman said. "I cut your head off."

"Eh," I shrugged. "I got over it."

I paused.

"Also, YOU WERE SUPPOSED TO REPLY--"

[He is obviously too SHOCKED AT THE MOMENT by her "resurrection"!]

---

"I am the heiress to the King of Callow," I interrupted calmly.

"There is no King of Callow," the Lone Swordsman said.

"Yet a man rules it, and I am his chosen successor," I said.

William took the opening to dart for the blade, wrapping his fingers around the hilt and tugging it out. It did not move. His eyes turned to me, SCARED for the first time since I'd met him.

"It isn't yours anymore," I said.

"It was granted to me by the Hashmallim," he said.

"It's a sword in a stone. You did that yourself, with no one forcing you," I smiled. "It's a symbol, now, in a story about Callow."

"She's an orphan," Heiress said quietly, aghast as the situation sunk in. "She's the Squire."

[It would seem that "Squire" is also an opening to become King/Queen, because it's the base station for a noble to become a knight, which works via the route of having to train as squire first...

More than just Black (the knight training her! and if Names are taken that way – the one she is meant to succeed eventually!) ruling Callow right now... (even if not in the *name* of king, he effectively IS its current ruler)]

The Lone Swordsman was so fast on the move he almost blurred to my Name sight, even damnably faster than when we'd gone for our last round. THIS TIME, THOUGH, HE WASN'T PREDESTINED TO WIN. [SHE *IS*, right now!] That made a difference.

I stepped around his blow BUT ATE HEIRESS' SPELL RIGHT IN THE FACE: some kind of dark shroud that stuck around my eyes. I flared my Name, clearing it up some, but it was hard to make out William's sword as he swung again. I TOOK THE HIT to the shoulder, at this point utterly indifferent to the fact that it bit through steel and into my flesh.

"STILL DEAD," I reminded him, forming a burst of darkness around my hand and slamming it into his chest. He went flying and I ran for the sword.

William's boot hit my back and I was sent sprawling but he'd made a mistake: I fell forward, and Heiress' next spell hit him instead. He yelled in dismay as a swarm of something sounding like bees gathered around him and I took my fraction of an opening, falling belly first right in front of the altar. Heiress cursed, then actually tried to curse me, but I grinned in triumph and my fingers closed around the hilt of that fucking sword as people kept trying to kill me with.

[HERE HEIRESS AND WILLIAM ARE EFFECTIVELY CANCELLING EACH OTHER OUT in trying to get to Cat – AND they have ""ACCIDENTALLY"" (SEE: PREDESTINED TO WIN!!!) KNOCKED HER *INTO* the altar instead of just down.]

Gods, it burned even through the gauntlets. There was a heartbeat of pure pain and then it felt like I'd just gotten a bright stick to the face. There was warmth, and everything went white.

I was standing alone in a featureless plain.

[ -> EFFECTIVELY TAKEN OUT OF WHERE SHE WAS FOR A SPELL!!!]

---

"You can't cheat me," I laughed. "You're not the Gods. You're part of the story too. You have to follow the rules."

I opened my eyes, looking up into the perfect blankness.

"And if you won't give me my due," I said. "I'll Take it."

They shrieked but the power flowed into me. I felt my body spasm. My heart beat. My blood flow. The plain blurred, collapsed into me as I laughed.

I WAS STANDIN IN THE CHAPEL AGAIN; ***THE LONE SWORDSMAN'S SWORD THROUGH MY BELLY*** [!!!!]. William's green eyes stared into mine, my hand on his shoulder as I used him to stay up. It was a strangely intimate pose.

"WHAT IS THIS, Squire?" HE WHISPERED.

I RIPPED OUT THE THING INSIDE OF HIM, took it for my own. HIS SKIN TURNED PALER; HIS FACE BLOODLESS. [She is RIPPING OUT HIS GODSDAMNED ASPECT – and as she did, when her Name was ripped out, for a few precious seconds HE CANNOT ACT. Besides, HIS SWORD IS STILL STUCK **IN HER**!!!]

"Rise," I replied.

The sword was still in my hand, the blade that has once been his. I rammed it into his neck, biting deep as he fell twitching to the ground.

Now tell me how that is the Lone Swordsman being meek and “not even TRYING” to do anything about his situation or “at the least not being his usual self while doing so”. He DID hit her. IF SHE HADN’T BEEN DEAD ALREADY ***AND*** PROTECTED BY THE NEW NARRATIVE OF PREDESTINED RULING OVER CALLOW (!!!) PLUS **HER RIPPING OUT ONE OF HIS ASPECTS** – he WOULD have killed her (again). He might have gone for her head a second time, I concede that. But please re-read here in excerpt, how he was UTTERLY SHOCKED and JUST SAW THAT CUTTING HER HEAD OFF DID NOT WORK the last time, either.

And the very end – is ALL ABOUT HIM BEING “turned into a pillar of salt” BY THE SHOCK OF HIS ASPECT BEING RIPPED OUT ON TOP – plus her, at the moment before, when he buried his blade in her and hit the belly instead of something vital, still being DESTINED TO WIN for a few precious seconds, even if the Queen title faded away before she truly got it (which would have turned it into her new Name).

Morgenstern

The “orphan” part of course implies further that she actually COULD BE the “hidden princess/prince” that is so very common in stories – who will be the only one to be able to “take the sword out of the stone”.

(Hey, this might even explain why (or at least would fit with the fact that) “Take” was the Aspect she got!!)

So three things combine for her claim: Being Squire who can obviously become a lot of Noble Titles; Her being apprenticed to the *Black* Knight who *currently rules Callow in effect*; her being an ORPHAN who just COULD BE, potentially, the royal child hidden in an orphanage.

Well, actually fourth and fifth in the line, of course: The sword in the stone (stuck there for William’s ritual, but it is NOW, nonetheless, a “sword in the stone”, literally – and thus can be used as such figuratively) as well as the William-backed claim that “this is still Callowan soil”, directed against Heiress ruling this piece of land as now being part of HER domain, of course, but STILL enabling the metaphor being ALSO used in OTHER ways, ENABLING THE WHOLE TRICK.

Neither Heiress’ action NOR William’s, for that matter, was meant to give her this opening or even made with that as even a slight thought-in-the-back-of-their-head (they might have at least taken other precautions if they had even remotely thought of it – but not having seen before that such a twisting/ subversion would be possible DOES NOT MAKE THEM DUMB – it simply makes them LESS GENRE-SAVVY // TOO FOCUSED ON THEIR OWN IDEAS; and, funnily, they probably NEEDED THAT FOCUS for their ideas to work – just like Cat is here superimposing her own Will by focusing on the OTHER theme/trope for a story).

I bet if they had not been too flabbergasted at this SUDDEN TWIST, they could have found ways to NEGATE that, again, by further subverting it. But IT TOOK THEM JUST A MOMENT TO FULLY REALIZE THE IMPLICATIONS – AND THAT MOMENT WAS ENOUGH. Simple as that. In a World of Stories – this is what CAN happen. NO FAULT OF THEIRS.

Morgenstern

Oh, and here's the last thing you should focus on: Heiress did not succeed in taking this piece of land FULLY out of Creation – she MOVED IT INTO ARCADIA!!!!

Now, what did we just learn what Arcadia is all about??? Correct – that it is EVEN MORE based on stories. That fairies have to RUN, when someone REALIZES they can TWIST THE STORY in their favor by USING THE RIGHT WORDS / setup. So, the final straw breaking the camel's back here is in it being ARCADIA OF ALL PLACES.

Morgenstern

Belief Matters.

(BTW, *our* wishes as the “Gods” of the Story, being the Readers, could be argued to have helped further. Of course, we have been set up by Book I as introduction to WANT to have Cat and Co. succeed because it is HER/THEIR story.... author playing the Guideverse and a bit of a Guide/Leader in that respect, but there you go... We overwhelmingly WANTED her to succeed, too. And thus she did, at least if you want a still more metatext-philosophical-version of events [anyone know “Sophie’s World” (i hope that is the correct title) by Kierkegaard? there, too, the characters are trying to turn the very events of the BOOK, later realizing that they are in a book and eventually, maybe, even managing to get out of it..). Just like shit hits the fan all the time, because WE want/heavily expect by now Action and Badassery...)

Morgenstern

[ If that latter assumption by me is correct, the Calamities (or at least Black) should be very safe as of now, seeing as the majority of commentators here is not ready for them/him to die, no matter all the hints that they/he might and EVENTUALLY likely will, no matter what we wish ... with some hope left that there might actually be another trick way out of all that mess – and don't we root for it... 😊
The only thing turning that around on its head would, of course, be more comments in the direction of “xy MUST die”, “more realism please” etc., which could, in that version of storybuilding, actually change the genre midterm, while the author himself, alone, would not be “allowed” to do so (not if he doesn't want to disappoint his readers, the REAL Gods of such a setting). ]

Morgenstern

( In other words... the author would be playing Fate, while we are the Gods that determine what Range of Fate Is Even Allowed At All. )

jonnney

Small note. The Chapel was never in creation. It was the corpse of an angel in a dimension created by Triumphant, meh return if you want. Heiress merely moved/manipulated the dimension to accelerate the passage of time and capture the angel. In fact we know that it wasn't the same time change affect as Arcadia because time passed at roughly the same rate in the outside world.

Also, you're using way too many RANDOM capital letters. It is almost painful to try and read what you're posting.

Vysirez

I was quite pleased with the way you handled things at the end of book 2. Specifically because Cat actually managed to make some successful plans for once. With a couple small exceptions, until the end of book 2 all of Cats plans were fairly worthless and she basically brute forced her way through things. Was somewhat disappointing, but you turned it around a bit at the end of book 2. I hope the trend continues.

Coming to the reason for my review here, I have to say I struggle a bit with the wide variance of 'power' levels in the story. It has become basically impossible for me to predict how well Cat is going to do in a fight. One chapter she is killing powerful devils without taking a hit, next chapter she is getting stomped by a fae of indeterminate ability. Having no way to judge my expectations poisons the story a bit for me. Not a lot, but a bit.

cburschka

Luckily there is one thing Cat is even worse at than staying alive, and that's staying dead.

Villainous Interlude: Chiaroscuro

"It is a shallow soul who fights to the cry of 'might makes right'. The truth is more concise: might makes."

– Dread Emperor Terribilis I, the Lawgiver

When young mages were taught the limits of sorcery, one of the first principle they were introduced to was that of Keter's Due.

The largest sorcerous event ever to take place on Calernia was the creation of the Kingdom of the Dead by the king known to history as Trismegistus: a single man had, within the span of ten hours, cursed to undeath the entire population of an area comparable in size to the Wasteland. Though of course details were sparse, given that this had transpired before most of the continent was literate, through the higher order of mathematics introduced by the Miezans it was possible to piece together the broad lines of what had unfolded. Though High Arcana essentially bypassed the need for direct conversion and sympathetic links that limited lower sorceries, even those mysteries could ultimately be understood through numbers. A recent understanding, that. Early magic had been limited by capacity to channel power of individuals, the mental and physical exhaustion they could take before the continued manipulation of the laws of Creation burned them out.

The Taghreb had attempted to go beyond those limits by breeding with supernatural creatures more apt at using sorcery, most notably the djin. Limited success was attained: to this day, mages born to the southerners were on average more powerful than those born in the rest of the Empire. The Soninke solution had been less... carnal, and ultimately more successful: behind the walls of Wolof, the first ritual magic of Praes had been born. Those early rituals were brusque and inexact, relying heavily on human sacrifice to make up for deficiencies in what was not yet known as spell formulas. It was still a massive improvement over individual forms of sorcery, though this superiority was ultimately the reason further progress stalled: already having an edge in spellcasting, the ancient Soninke kingdoms sought to lessen weaknesses instead of improving a strength. A mistake that cost them in the War of Chains.

As in most things magical, the Miezian occupation changed everything. The foreigners from across the Tyrian Sea brought across with them Miezian numerals and the Petronian theory of magic. Though in many ways inferior to the Trismegistan theory later adopted by the Empire under Dread Emperor Sorcerous, the Petronian theory turned the ramshackle artistic ritual efforts of the Soninke mages into a proper method. The energies released by human sacrifice or other means of fuel began to be quantified and measured, matched to the requirements in scale and effect of what the mages set out to achieve. Which ultimately led to the discovery one of the great limits of sorcery: in the span between the release of energy and its conversion into a spell effect, whether it be ritual or individual, some of that energy was lost. Worse, that quantity of energy was not fixed but proportional to the total sum of energy released.

What was actually wasted varied from a tenth to fourth when it came to individual casting, but could go up to seven parts out of ten when it came to rituals. Though advances in spellcrafting and the theft of the entirely different Baalite spell formulas inherited by Ashur managed to lower that proportion, no spellcaster had ever managed to get the waste under a tenth in any form of sorcery. That tenth was colloquially known Keter's Due. To turn an entire kingdom into undead, the Dead King in his capital of Keter was forced to open a stable and permanent portal into one of the Hells. And while nine tenths of that energy was properly channelled in ritual, the remaining portion turned the city of Keter into a warped ruin of anomalous magical phenomenon. The problem of Keter's Due was that it limited what could be accomplished by ritual magic if you were in any way invested in where it took place. The larger and more powerful the ritual, the more dangerous the waste of power released.

Akua's intentions were of titanic scale, which meant this was a titanic problem.

Turning Liesse into a ritual array had been achievable, especially after the widespread sabotage of all major infrastructure that had followed her taking stewardship of the city. Who exactly was responsible for that, she was still unsure. It had been too subtly wrought to be Foundling's doing, and too moderate a retaliation to be the Lord Black's. That left the Empress, but there was no way the woman would have allowed her control of the city if she actually knew what Akua intended. Her best guess was that she had not been the target at all, which was somewhat amusing if an irritation. Even with that interlude, Akua had been satisfied with the gain she'd made in the rebellion. Liesse's wall ran with old and powerful wards, and the city had been built by the corpse of an angel. Tying both those assets into her own project had been a highly stimulating magical puzzle, one she'd been working on since the age of thirteen. And she had done it.

Akua was genuinely regretful that there was no one should could trust enough to boast of the achievement. It might be the single greatest accomplishment of her life. It was, though, somewhat of a comfort that eventually every living soul in Calernia would tremble at the mention of it. Powering the array had been the first issue, and one she'd come very close to solving at the Battle of Liesse: imprisoning a Hashmallim would have given her everything she needed and more. Unfortunately, Foundling had turned the Lone Swordsman's blunder to her own purposes. Akua was not a debutante trying to pull off her first poisoning, so of course she'd had alternatives prepared. Fuelling anything of this size with demons was asking for trouble, considering the Due, so she'd had to look into gods. Securing the entity that dwelled in the heart of the Greywood had proved unfeasible, but her second target had panned out. Mostly.

The seventeen conduits she'd had her agents acquire – to the cost of many, many lives – were kept under enchanted sleep in chambers below the Ducal Palace. The seeking rituals she'd done had revealed that the entity they were bound to was artificial, not a natural force, but that made no real difference. According to her calculations it was even more powerful than the Hashmallim had been, which was a boon as well as a curse. When a stable binding was established and she triggered the array, Keter's Due would effectively wipe Liesse and its immediate surroundings off the map. That was not an acceptable result, since she would be on the premises and fully intended on staying human. That was arguably the brilliant part of what she'd achieved with her array. She had found a way to still use the waste energy, what could be construed as a pre-conversion escapement that effectively negated the downsides of such a large ritual. Given the scale of the entity she'd found, however, she'd had to revise her schematics and broaden the size of the array's escapement.

That meant more stone needed, more time and an ever-growing list of liabilities.

Secrecy was paramount: the moment the Named of the Empire became aware of what she was making they would immediately move to destroy her. Though she'd prepared Liesse for assault, Akua was not ready to face the full might of the Legions of Terror. Her infiltration and co-option of both the Scribe's and the Empress' spy networks in Liesse was a temporary state of affairs. The longer she had to falsify the information coming out of the city, the higher the chances her agents would be caught and purged. Already Malicia had flushed out the first level of her infiltration, and even if she was abroad Scribe would catch up eventually. The Webweaver was a tool, not a player, but she was a very effective tool. There were, of course, more pressing threats. The worst of which had been unleashed by Foundling, who seemed to have a bottomless bag of talented lunatics to throw at Akua's plans.

The heiress to Wolof was about due another of her backers coming to a grisly end, so her mood was already cautious when she allowed Fasili into her solar. There was no point in shuffling the parchments on her desk – she knew better than to keep anything compromising where there weren't two dozen highly lethal wards forbidding entry to anyone but her. There were only seven safekeeping this room, a mere warning by Praesi standards. The Soninke bowed after entering, lower than he should to anyone not the Empress. Fasili was a fair hand at flattery, a skill helped along by the stunning good looks bred into all highborn Praesi.

"Lady Akua," he greeted her. "Gods turn a blind eye to your schemes."

"Lord Fasili," she replied, affecting warmth.

She didn't particularly care for him, though he was useful. Having the heir to the High Lordship of Aksum on her side opened doors and brought resources, even if he was semi-openly feuding with the woman who actually ruled that region. If she'd not been Named he would have been sizing her up for a dagger in the back to afterwards usurp control of her own faction, but as it was she was untouchable. That didn't make him trustworthy in the slightest, but it did mean he was not a rival. He was a danger mostly to her other supporters, squabbling for the position as her right hand. For now, there was no need to deny him the perception that he was.

"I bring unfortunate tidings," the man spoke in Mtethwa. "Another patrol has been destroyed."

Surprising, the Named thought. After Foundling's goblin had begun killing off her patrols she'd ceased using Praesi and had instead conscripted Callowans, knowing Squire would be reluctant to kill her countrymen. Maybe enough to recall her tool to Marchford, if he killed a few.

"She has gained in ruthlessness," Akua said.

There was an undertone of approval to her voice. She'd learned the hard way not to underestimate the other woman, and seeing Squire adopt the more enlightened attitudes of the Praesi did not entirely displease her. It did not benefit her, of course, but Akua having strong enemies meant that Evil itself was strong. A skilled enemy was often more useful than an inept ally.

"Though you are no doubt correct," Fasili said, "in this instance the deaths lack the marks of the other's agents."

Akua's lips quirked the slightest bit at the word the man had used. Other. Nyengana, in Lower Miezan. The connotations did not carry across the languages. It meant not us, therefore inferior. Not other tongue on Calernia offered such a broad selection of terms to convey contempt as that of her people. The amusement was, however, fleeting.

"But it does bear marks," she prompted.

"A survivor was left," Fasili said. "He claims their patrol fell prey to a hunting party of fae from the Summer court."

Akua's face remained the picture of serenity.

"Not unexpected," she smoothly lied. "Though ahead of my predictions."

The fae? What in the name of the Dark Gods were they doing so far out of the Waning Woods? She'd been aware that Foundling was having trouble with the Winter court since the very first incident – the bastard Taghreb with the odious name Squire had running her spy network, though a talented amateur, was still an amateur – but she'd chalked that up to unforeseen side effects of using a demon of Corruption. Even Triumphant, may she never return, had only used those sparingly. Within a decade the thinning of borders would have fixed itself without any need for intervention, and if it kept Squire busy until then all the better. This, though? This was not a coincidence. If both courts were making a move on... Well, what they were attacking was the crux of the issue here, wasn't it? It was unlikely to be the Empire, which left the unfortunate possibility it could be Callow itself. That could be problematic, given that almost the entire extent of her resources was tied up in the former kingdom.

The heiress to Wolof delicately grasped her decanter of Praesi wine and poured herself a cup, then one for Fasili as well. The other Soninke bowed his head in appreciation and took a seat when she wordlessly invited him to. He discreetly passed his palm over the cup before taking it in hand, skilled enough that the alchemical pellet of lesser antidotes made no sound when it sunk into the wine. For all that High Lady Abreha seemed to think little of her heir, Akua had found him to be everything a noble of Praes should be: ruthless, patient and subtle. He'd already arranged the disgrace of two possible rivals for his position since he'd returned to her court, in both cases through a dizzying series of catspaws and intermediaries. If she'd not had two devils discreetly tailing his every move, she might even have missed some of the intricacies of his plots. As it was, Fasili was in the palm of her hand. She knew who he was sleeping with, who his enemies were and where his coin was kept. It would be the work of a slow afternoon to destroy him, if the mood ever struck her.

She wouldn't, of course. The other Soninke was a talented commander of men – though not as talented as Ghassan had been, before Foundling had ripped out his soul – and his schemes occupied enough of the players in her court that they had no occasion to dig too deep into her own activities. He'd made one attempt to investigate that himself, but the man he'd bribed to transcribe her architectural plans had been made to disappear the same day, along with the entire chain of intermediaries used. The message had been duly received and no further attempt ever made. Akua did like to deal with intelligent men: she never had to repeat herself. Sipping at her wine – her own pellet had already been at the bottom of the cup when she'd poured – the Soninke allowed herself to enjoy the taste of home. This particular one was from the outskirts of Nok, the grapes grown there tinkered with over centuries so they would pair well with the taste of antidote.

It was something of a faux pas among the nobility to serve wine where one could taste one's precautions.

"We'll narrow our patrol routes and double the numbers deployed with each," Akua said.

Fasili inclined his head, allowing the faint trace of a smile to touch his full lips. He would be amused, Akua thought. Like most war-inclined aristocrats in the Wasteland, the man knew the deployment doctrines of the Legions of Terror inside out even if he'd never stepped foot inside the War College. This particular measure was straight out of the treatises penned by Marshal Grem One-Eye, as they both knew. Most Wastelanders never bothered to read those, preferring to settle for what had been written by the Black Knight who, even if Duni, was still Praesi. Neither Akua nor Fasili, however, had been inclined to pass on the insights of the greatest military mind of their age simply because it had been born inside a greenskin body. Though Malicia's dismissal of everything the Empire stood for was a mistake, it would be just as much of a mistake not to learn from the successes she had gained from a degree of practicality. Talent must be used wherever it was found. That much the Dread Empress had divined correctly.

"I've been given to understand that the Moderates are gaining ground," Fasili said, tone casual. "Rumours imply that High Lady Amina might formally withdraw from the Truebloods."

Which would mean Foramen and the Imperial Forges were not longer aligned with Akua's mother, cutting off another means of influence for the Truebloods. High Lady Amina was owed half a tenth of any profits made by the Imperial Forges, making her one of the single wealthiest individuals in Praes. Losing those coffers – as well as the knowledge of the quantity and location of any armament made in the forges filling them – would be a major blow. The Named sipped calmly at her wine, then arched an eyebrow.

"Inconsequential," she finally said.

Fasili managed to hide his surprise well enough that the only detail to betray it was the slight widening of his eyes. Akua watched the gears grind behind that handsome face, almost amused. If she was not bothered by the Truebloods falling apart, it meant that she was no longer dependant on them for backing. The implication there being she'd either struck deals with individual members of the faction that made their affiliation irrelevant – which she had – or that she intended to strike out on her own. Which she did, in a manner of speaking. She would not turn away the allies Foundling's reckless accumulation of troops was gaining her, but the days where her efforts had been an extension of her mother's designs were coming to an end. It would be strange, to stand without the protection the woman had afforded her all these years even if she hated her. Strange and exhilarating. The cage was finally breaking.

"Do you ever get tired, Lord Fasili?" Akua asked suddenly.

The man blinked.

"Of?"

"This," she said, tone whimsical. "Of what we are. Of what we do."

There was wariness in those eyes now. He was wondering if she was trying to entrap him in some way, to make him misstep so that she could bind him closer to her will. Akua could have told herself she didn't know why she was speaking with this man, someone she could use but not trust, but that would have been lying to herself. Because Barika is dead. The pang of loss there surprised her, as it always did. Praesi did not have friends and confidantes, she'd always been told. They were too obvious a target, too large a liability. And yet on most days she still turned to her left to share a thought, only after realizing that the girl she would speak to was long dead. Barika was not the costliest loss she'd incurred at Liesse, but it was the one she felt the most often.

"Never," Fasili replied. "My line is that of kings and Empresses. It would be a disgrace to reach for lesser prizes."

In most cultures, Akua mused, one of her closest allies admitting to wanting a throne he believed she herself coveted would have been cause for a rift. For Praesi, though, it was duly expected. Ambition was bred into them before they were even born. Each High Lord and Lady saw to it their inheritors were more beautiful, more intelligent, more powerful than their predecessors. Some families had eschewed the Gift in their ruling line, for necromancy and diabolism often complicated the succession, but those that hadn't always brought in the most powerful mage they could secure. Praesi aristocrats were expected to always look forward. If they could not claim the Tower or a Name, they were to strengthen the family and prepare the grounds for their successors to surpass them. For any trueborn Praesi to not attempt to reach the heights their ancestors had touched, to never try to go even further, was... blasphemy. Turning your back on everything that had come before you, all that set you apart from those beneath you.

Fasili Mirembé has assessed he could not currently claim the Tower or become an independent force through a Name, so he had aligned himself with Akua. Through this he sought to better his position, gain material advantages and favours that would allow him to either further the interests of Aksum or his own. Most likely he intended on being her Chancellor, if she became Dread Empress, and bide his time until he could knife her and become the Emperor himself. None of this offended her. Ambitions like these were what kept her people sharp, what set apart Praesi from the rest of Calernia. Akua's people never settled for what they had been born with, never allowed themselves to stagnate. The Dread Empire had gone through hundreds of different faces and iterations before it had conquered Callow, but in the end it had. Because the Kingdom of Callow had been the same since its foundation, while Praes shifted with every Tyrant. And now Dread Empress Malicia wanted to kill the very soul of their nation.

Borders set in stone, never to advance again. The wonders of sorcery that were the envy of the continent, suppressed or abandoned. The High Lords, the very whip that drove Praes to improve, neutered into irrelevance in a fate more insulting than mere extermination. Centuries of toil to make the orcs a warrior caste incapable of functioning without the Tower thrown to the wayside by granting them authority. The goblins, who would always answer to their Matrons above anyone else, allowed to sink their claws in the Legions of Terror. Oh, Akua knew what was being done. Malicia and her Knight were making Praes a nation where the power was in the hands of institutions, not Named. An Empire that was no longer malleable for every Tyrant to make into whatever tool they needed to overcome the forces of Good. A fixed monolith, bound together by a philosophy that was none more than the absence of philosophy. A nation that did not stand for anything but standing.

"Do you know why the Truebloods are losing, Fasili?" she asked.

"My great-aunt has splintered the opposition," he replied immediately. "Without a united front, Malicia cannot be overcome."

Akua smiled, the open display of emotion making him uncomfortable.

"They were never going to win," she said. "After the civil war, when she set aside Black's cold hate and refrained from a war of extermination against the nobility, we came to believe the Empress was one of us. That she played the Great Game."

"Iron sharpens iron," the other Soninke murmured.

And the sharpest iron takes the throne, she finished silently. Praes would always be strong, for only the strongest could claim the Tower. Every child that mattered was taught this from the cradle.

"But she doesn't, Fasili," Akua said. "This whole time we've been trying to win the same way we did with the Maleficents of the Terribilises of olden days. Acknowledging she has touched greatness but knowing that to grow again the Empire needs a fresh Tyrant. One still hungry."

"The Empress has achieved more than almost any before her," Fasili conceded reluctantly. "It is then her due to keep power longer than almost any before her. This changes nothing. In time she will lose her way and be overthrown."

"She won't be," Akua said. "Because while we schemed for advancement, to be her successors, she has waged a war of destruction on us. And a few months ago, she won."

The dark-skinned woman brushed her hair back, though it was perfectly styled.

"She barred the office of Chancellor, the most important ward against reigns that linger," Akua began to enumerate. "She opened the highest ranks of the Legions and the bureaucracy to lowborn and greenskins, smothering our influence there. With Callowan grain she has made field rituals irrelevant, severing the bond that kept the lesser nobility dependant on us. Trade with Callow has established sources of wealth we do not control, ending our ability to win through coin. All we have left is the court, where we claw at each other for ever-lessening gains and she smiles down at the corpses."

Fasili had gone very, very quiet. He eyed her with barely-veiled horror.

"She's not trying to win the Game," she said. "That wouldn't matter. No one can win forever. She'd trying to end the Game."

"Then we must rebel," he said. "Now, while we still can. If you bring this to the attention of the High Lords, they will back you. To do otherwise would be folly."

Akua drank daintily from her cup.

"They already know, Fasili," she said. "The hard truth of it is that if we wage war, we will lose. We cannot beat the Legions, and the Legions are loyal. Lord Black will not turn on his mistress and the Warlock bound the soul of the last envoy to a chamber pot. The Truebloods attempted to win through guile, and they have failed. My mother clings to her crumbling plans and grows desperate, while the weak-willed among them seek to surrender."

She met his eyes calmly.

"For that is what the Moderates are: a surrender. Do not think otherwise for a moment," Akua said. "In exchange for survival and scraps of influence, they turn themselves into coffers and spell repositories for Malicia to plunder as she wills."

"I will not allow my blood, a line that goes back to the War of Chains, to be used as a fucking court ornament," Fasili barked, eyes burning. "Evil does not surrender. Evil does not bow to inevitability. We spit in the eye of the Heavens and steal our triumphs."

Akua allowed the unsightly display of emotion to pass without comment. It was not unwarranted, when one learned one's entire way of life was teetering on the edge of destruction.

"I never believed in the Trueblood cause," Akua admitted idly. "At the heart of their movement there was a sliver of hypocrisy. They believed their ways are superior, and therefore they should lead Praes. But if their ways were truly superior, would they not already be ruling?"

"Their ways," Fasili repeated, eyes narrowed. "You speak as if they are not yours as well."

"You've read the treatises of Grem One-Eye," she replied. "So have I. Would your parents have? I know my mother did not, and many consider her mind as sharp as the Empress'."

"There is a difference between reading the words of the foremost general in the Empire and discarding everything we are," the other Soninke flatly retorted.

"The duty of our predecessors was to make us more than they were," Akua said. "They have succeeded in this: that is why we see a brilliant tactician instead of mouthy greenskin brute. For ages we've sought to forge better bodies, better sorceries, better minds – and yet we fight the same ways we've done since Maleficent first took a dagger in the back. We improve capacity without ever addressing perspective."

"If that were true," Fasili replied, "we would not be having this conversation."

"We're not having this conversation because of our families," the dark-skinned woman said. "The Empress is the one who forced our eyes open."

"The Empress would see us eradicated," the heir to Aksum hissed. "And she is succeeding."

"And for that," Akua replied quietly, "We owe her much. Fasili, when was the last time that we were truly in danger? Not of losing the throne to another of the great families or of failing another invasion. When was the last time the High Lords and Ladies faced extinction?"

The man bit his tongue, then actually thought.

"The Second Crusade," he said. "When the first revolt against the crusader kingdoms failed."

"And from those ruins rose Dread Emperor Terribilis II," Akua said. "One of our greatest, and a Soninke highborn. He did things differently from his predecessors and turned back two Crusades."

"And so we should surrender to our superior on the throne?" Fasili said bitterly.

"You miss my point," she said. "We flirted with destruction and we became better. Seven hundred years have passed since then, Fasili, without ever being in such a situation. We've become soft since then, narrow-minded. Arrogant."

She smiled thinly.

"And so the Hellgods put us through the crucible again," she said. "Adapt or perish. Are we relics to be discarded, or the beating heart of what it means to be Praesi?"

"We're not done," he said. "We're never done."

"My mother," Akua said, "would have me be the swan song of Praesi villainy. The last stand, raging against the dying of the night. But our parents succeeded, Fasili. They made us better than them. We can learn."

"Take what made them successful," the man said slowly. "Make it ours."

"Praes is a story," she said. "A Tyrant to lead us. A Black Knight to break heroes. A Warlock to craft wonders. A Chancellor to rule behind them. And an Empire like clay, to shape into the tool they need: an entire nation built to empower the ambitions of a single villain."

"Our Empress rules," he murmured. "Our Black Knight leads. Our Warlock crafts nothing and our Chancellor is nothing. All the while the Empire calcifies into institutions, impossible to move."

Yes. Finally, he was beginning to understand. None of them were acting as they should, not in the way that mattered. Malicia was more Chancellor than Empress, Lord Black had reigned as king in all but name for twenty years and the Warlock learned without ever building. They were trying to change the story but oh, they had not thought that entirely through had they? Because once the changes began, they were no longer in control. Anyone with the right power could shape the story too. Akua looked at them, and she did not see rulers. She saw stewards. They had made themselves to be administrators, and in Praes those ever only had one function: to enable the designs of the villain above them.

"Foundling came closest to understanding," Akua said. "It's how she beat me, at Liesse. It wasn't her Name she used."

Akua drained the last of her cup, gently put it down on the desk.

"It's never been about the Names, you see," the Diabolist smiled. "It's always about the Roles."

Ashan

Well, that's ominous. So the Calamaties have been trying to change the story by adjusting their roles in the story so that Evil can win, and Akua is trying to twist the story to reassert the administrators (the roles she believes them to have taken) as underlings to the Tyrant/ruler, which she's trying to take for herself as Diabolist.

danh3107

God, Akua is incredibly evocative, brilliant and utterly loathsome at the same time.

Great stuff all around

Cir_C

Ooooo this means that my theory about Roles being what truly mattered in the Guide is essentially confirmed. I will have to wait a bit to really understand the implications of this...

jj_simpson

Would you refer me to where Roles are mentioned previous to this, please? I honestly can't recall hearing that term before this chapter.

Cir_C

The one that really got the ball **ahem** rolling for me was the Heroic Interlude Arraignment, there were many vague statements made by the White Knight about his role as having an even greater importance than his name. We are not far enough in yet to draw any kind of serious conclusions about roles but we are getting there.

Shequi

The quotes from the Book of All Things include the line that Roles came into being and were gifted with Names by the gods.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

You're going to have to reread all of book 1 then. Roles are discussed alongside Names rather frequently

Nairne

I look forward to seeing how Akua will lose (I hope Cat will turn her scheme to her advantage).

Levi Kalden

I think the reason she will eventually lose is not a faulty in her plans but simply the fact that she is a classical villainess. And from all the dread emperors before we know evil always loses

Esryok

Did Akua just monologue herself into a name transition?

Letouriste

Fitting for a villain right?^^

she vocalised her goal, her path and her role awoken. Brilliant.

Byzantine

It could have happened awhile ago.

Notice she is never called Heiress the entire time.

Morgenstern

Heh. I wonder if the author just grabbed the name "Diabolist" from what commentators were suggesting as the one he most liked or if they were simply right. ^^

tynam

The narrative expressly tells us at the end of book two that Heiress' most important goal in the Liesse campaign was to get her name associated with demons and devils. So it was pretty clear all along.

Euodiachloris

Let me guess: Heiress nor fully understanding the nature (and provenance) of what she's tapping into for power = Bad News. 😊

Letouriste

That new entity? Yeah, feel troublesome;) I expect cat turning that in her advantage.

beleester

I feel like that's part of the job description for a Diabolist. Using, and inevitably mishandling, the Things Man Was Not Meant to Know.

Euodiachloris

True... 😊

Letouriste

"The Dread Empire had gone through hundreds of different faces and iterations before it had conquered Callow, but in the end it had. Because the Kingdom of Callow had been the same since its foundation, while Praes shifted with every Tyrant. And now Dread Empress Malicia wanted to kill the very soul of their nation."

Haha, like if the nobles have anything to do with the conquest;) All that is on commoners

RandomFan

It was on the nobles before. Perhaps it will not be now, perhaps that is the future Malicia is building- but there's no way Heiress will see that, when she's the embodiment of nobility. Without that, you see a power vacuum where you should see an attempt to increase the number of heirs to the throne.

Whether the goal is to build a structure for their heirs to step in and take over when they fail, or to build a structure that will last even after the tyrants fail is irrelevant. Both look like mere stewardship to Heiress, because of the blinders that she must have to acquire this name.

Black, at least, must understand that struggle is at the heart of villainy- even if he'd make all such struggles external if possible, he understands that strife is the crucible of potential.

Евгений Пермяков

My wild guess is that change of narrative may be even deeper than that. What if instead of a story about villain and heroes on personal scale, Malicia builds a story about Empire ? The legions are definitely a move in this direction, forging a single entity where normally a set of personal armies of nobles would be. And with the narrative changed from heroes and villains into conquerors and conquered, the inner struggle would be a minor detail and easily stomped.

RandomFan

That seems more of a hero's speed, honestly- the hero's story is often that the hero is merely the medium for the kingdom's or god's ambitions, with the possible exceptions of the ruling class heroes.

Letouriste

I think akua will win this,taking the Throne and kill malicia. Malicia is too focused on her rival for seen clear the extend of akua.

My guess is she's know what akua do but underestimate her,letting her grow too much and now this is too late.she will lose when she is winning for real,typical villain.yeah typical villain,malicia is transforming in something different,she create an opening for her back.

Before this chapter I expected malicia to be be the next boss and the story finishing by a fight against the good coalition with cat empress...but now I see more a show-down with akua until the end:

- akua on the throne
- akua destitute but surviving=>cat don't gain the empress title
- cat fighting the good coalition with black
- black dead or crippled,out of the main plot
- cat win but let an opening for akua
- cat and akua showdown
- cat win,new empress of a big ass empire and performing differently

jonnnney

Akua is not interested in the throne. She sees Malicia becoming an administrator who is managing a country that has no designs to grow, no longer the empire of Praes. Rather than fight her directly she seeks to utilize the power structures created by the Calamities and rule over them at a higher level. She likely seeks to rule all of Calernia with Praes and Callow as mere provinces in her new empire.

What would really surprise me would be if Akua is correct is assuming that Malcia and Black don't want to ever expand the borders of Praes. I had always assumed that once Callow had truly become a part of the Dread Empire the combined forces would start swallowing up free cities or individual principalities. Black seeks to win in such a way that 500 years later heroes will know that one time having your victory being ordained by heaven simply wasn't enough. He doesn't really achieve that merely by controlling Callow. The Dead King has ruled his kingdom unopposed for something like 2500 years, but his borders don't grow. An empire that constantly conquers, corrupts, and then converts to evil is something that would strike fear in even the most devout Heroes.

beleester

I'm betting on Akua taking the throne as a final boss, with Cat bringing her down. And possibly putting Black or Malicia back on the throne, because this story has been all about twisting protagonist tropes to support Evil, and "restoring the rightful King" is totally a heroic narrative.

I'm also going to place a bet that she collapses the Tower in the process, because villains always have a collapsing lair, and because this whole story has been about smashing the system of "Good vs Evil," and that would be the perfect way to say "No, we aren't that sort of nation any more."

Yitzi

If Roles matter more than Names, then does that put Cat more on the side of Good than she realizes?

more like neutral.

The way I see that, her role is unification in every sense of the term.

Meaning she will integrate both evil and good in a single entity, way more powerful than before.

Her role is changement in the very balance mechanism, a big fuck you for the majority of the gods (apart one maybe).

The combined empire will start on the evil side because that always how that work (evil=revolution, conquests etc..., we have our very nations build on this)

(Good=stabilisation and strengthening of the people, evolution).

Rq

My take on it is that Cat has filled the role of the true Black Knight. (Just like Akua seems to be sidling into the role usually occupied by warlock, with the creation of this array). She's been breaking an awful lot of heroes in a short span of time. Almost every major battle she's in seems to see a hero bite it or at least get horribly mangled.

Post drawing the sword out... I'm not sure. She doesn't seem to be lined up to fight heroes the way things are going. She might have actually changed the role, or be in the process of changing it. Need more data to be sure.

Gunslinger

Poor Akua really misses having someone to monologue to. Any guesses what the entity is? I thought of the Deoraithe nature spirit but that isn't an artificial one. Or was it created in the aftermath of the elvish purge?

The interesting revelation here is that the fae invasion is not Akua's plot. Directly at least.

Zengar

I think the Summer invasion is probably a side effect of the magical backlash that Heiress THINKS she has channeled to her benefit.

jonnney

My guess is the Summer invasion is the Forever King up in the Golden Bloom doing whatever he can to stop Diabolist from achieving her ultimate goal. He was able to move his entire kingdom to Arcadia merely to avoid the possibility of a fight with Triumphant. He and his followers are likely the individuals with the greatest ability to control the actions of the Fae. Ranger and her followers mostly just hunt them.

It wouldn't surprise me if the Deoraithe God is the spirit of the forest in the Golden Bloom displaced from that land along with its original inhabitants. It is the forest itself that isn't allowing the elves to have children, that sounds more like the actions of an entity that controls the forest rather than the trees themselves.

Letouriste

Maybe the trees are sentients, like ents for example or their lesser brethren.

Shequi

Akua's entity is whatever it is that the Deoraithe Rangers are bound to. Her 'conduits' are presumably Rangers themselves.

Euodiachloris

Wouldn't surprise me to learn that the "god" is actually a Summer Fae who filed their own serial numbers off a bit as a lark/disguise/entertainment/way to stay in that part of reality – and, it backfired. Or, at least, somebody related to the Summers.

After all, if Winter captures them before Summer rescues them... things get interesting! And, somebody mortal deserves spanking for using them as a battery! Eh, we don't know exactly whi... all of the region, then? Sure, that'll do! 😊

What exactly is the difference between Roles and Names?

Jeffrey Gassenheimer

A Name is what you are called in a story, a role is what you do in a story (speaking in a narrative sense)

The Warren Peace NFL Report

That’s a name, not a Name.

RoflCat

From my understanding, essentially:

Names – Your job titles, giving bonus towards doing your job (and possibly causing you to have certain quirks like Masego's OCD to be precise)

Roles – The positions in the plot, which relate to the state of Creation and less on individuals.

Using Akua's example for Black, his Name is Black Knight, but his current Role is more or less Dread Emperor.

Which is what Akua learned from seeing what Cat did back in Liese.

She's Squire (Name), but by using the situation to her advantage, she put herself in the Role of the one who pulls the sword from the stone, instead of the usual Role of "The Black Knight's Squire/successor" (which is something Heiress would've/could've become)

stevenneiman

A Name is a bundle of power and importance. A Role is the purpose that the Name is expected to serve. For example, the Black Knight's Role is to lead the Legions of Terror against Praes' enemies, the Squire's Role is to attend and serve a Knight while learning how to do their job, and the Role of the Wandering Bard is to observe, bear witness, and push the narrative along without acting overtly.

A Named can sometimes make some choices about their Role, like how Cat chose to make hers involve using brute force to do what needed doing, but she couldn't choose to, say, make her Role independent of the Knights or magic-based.

What Akua was referring to may have been that Cat is trying to make part of her Name be about serving as a popular figure who protects the people of Callow from both the callousness of Praesi Villains and the fanaticism and carelessness of Heroes. In the battle of Liesse, she was doing both since she faced on one side a Hero willing to mindrape the entire population of a metropolis in order to win a victory for Good, and on the other side a Villain whose exact goals were unknown but certainly wouldn't have been beneficial to the people of Callow.

Euodiachloris

That's the thing about a Squire. They need to be able to serve the whatever the Knight they are in service is dedicated to and learn whatever they can from them: no more, no less. And, Amadeus has quite purposely given Cat a lot of leeway to learn her trade while she adapts Callow to the Empire. And, visa versa. Something Cat has been predisposed to do from day one. 😊

Her Role is basically to serve him until she can either surplant him... or she finds another Role of her own. 😊 Any bit parts she plays doing this? File it under "training". XD

arancaytar

I guess she isn't Heiress anymore, then...

Lucas

She is kind of going over her head huh? And she doesn't seem to see the stories as we, she doesn't see that evil is always losing but that evil is always changing?

Well nice chapter.

"[to->at] the cost of many, many lives"

"[Not->No] other tongue on Calernia offered such a broad selection of terms to convey contempt as that of her people" alternatively, "not another"

"A fixed monolith, bound together by a philosophy that was [nore->no] more than the absence of philosophy."

The bit about wine flavoring gave me quite a laugh. So very Praesi.

I'm not too worried about this though. Akua might recognize that the Calamities have beaten the nobility by changing the game, but here she is relying on vast sorceries powered by the sacrifice of a god. She might as well be claiming to be clever and original because she's the first one who thought to put an invisible army of sapient tigers IN a flying citadel. For all her talk, she's more Sinestra than Truimphant (may she never return).

agumentic

It makes sense though. She can't bring the game on the old track like Trueblooded tried, doesn't have resources to match Malicia in a thousand little contests for power like Cordelia does, and won't be underestimated if tried to rebel the same way Calamities did. But one well thought-out grand plan that can be put through the final stages in a small no-spies time window when it's still seen as something far-fetched and ridiculous, instead of a real something that can happen? Can happen, and really the only way for her to get power and survive.

beleester

I think she **wants** to be a Sinestra. The Praesi nobility thrived in a setting where the Dread Emperor raised flying fortresses full of invisible tigers to conquer the world. It wasn't a long-term winning strategy, but it kept the "Great Game" going.

I think the way she's "changing the game" is by recognizing that there's no reason the **Warlock** has to be the one who raises vast sorceries, or that the Empress needs to be the one in charge of conquering the world. There's a vacancy in the story which she can fill as the Diabolist. It's like a "reboot" of the setting – same old song and dance between Callow and Praes, but now with a Diabolist.

(Also, on a meta level, the protagonists in this story are trying to bring an end to the Great Game, the constant conflict between Good and Evil, while the antagonists are trying to continue it by various means. So in some senses, she's **already** taken the role of the Big Bad.)

nick012000

Also, random thought: Cat's going to stumble across Heiress's spell totally on accident when she shows up to protect Liesse from being attacked by the fay, isn't she?

Morgenstern

Yup. Although the "totally on accident" is not really an accident, if it's the side effects of Heiress' array setup that draws the Fay and thus Cat, because of unleashing the ONE thing that was sure to snoop around that weakened border due to Heiress' releasing the demon... biting its tail again, that snake, and once again not truly realizing it, because of having their mind on greater things... 😊

Although I'm missing the whole "I'm gonna break Creation" avenue here that Heiress was on before. Now she just seems to be gambling again at the Role of Leader that Malicia does not SEEM to fill, from Akua's/the Diabolist's oldschool point of view as she is STILL thinking in the old terms... classical. If any muddling is taking place at all as far as that is concerned, then the Calamities are actually *sharing* in their actions, but Black IS following Malicia's lead, after all, as we saw/heard once more, rather clearly and directly, in their last chapter just between the two... so Malicia IS doing the leading, at least mostly, although she relies on multiple advisors, too, picking and choosing from their advice, just like an Empress would be thought to do, after all. She's also wrong about Warlock, imho. Wekesa HAS created things... he just hasn't presented all that much BIIIIIG and hilarious stuff to the public, like invisible tigers. He's more into pocket dimensions (linking multiple of them for his "one" tower), mutations, genetic engineering etc. – flying, firebreathing, biting pigs only being an unwanted side effect... 😊 If that isn't creation, I don't know what is.... And Black not doing hero destruction as he should? Bwahahaaaha... 23 by his own hand and thrice that number in other ways, was it....

Akua seems to have picked up on "finding talent in whichever form it presents itself", which is an interesting tidbit, because the combatting of racism by Black's and Malicia's big plan(s) and actions seems to be working not just on their own affiliated, but also on the Truebloods' children. But, so far, she doesn't seem to take that tidbit and turn it into much of anything useful (besides taking Callowans in the very lowest places, as patrols to be killed off...).

Chiaroscuro and its definition fit perfectly into the theme of how viewpoint, once again, is shown to influence a lot what anyone sees. Although, there's probable still more to it, it's also about the "light" and "shadow/night" (Good and Evil) mixing that the Black/Malicia's troupe is all about. One that Akua seems to be disinclined to continue, which is just another kind of racism, in a way. She sees that she should adapt – but she is taking away the wrong lessons (mostly), reverting back into the old power grab and being all about POWER, even in her theory/dream of making the institutions her own, leaving them intact (which, btw, is in HER view presented here equal to negating the advancement she wants, curiously enough, because she equals it to stand-still; let's just say her own view is very muddled and occasionally paradoxical – but hey, then again, that's just NORMAL for a helluva lot of real-life worldviews, so... fitting).

Morgenstern

tidbit-addition: Basically, Malicia has simply *incorporated* the Chancellor role into her own. She rules AND leads. Which is, by the way, a VERY artificial distinction. The two words basically imply much the same... a good ruler better also be a good leader and not only rule by handing out orders and suppressing others, but inspiring them and being an example. Hey.. now that I wrote that... do you note how Malicia has inspired even Akua, at least to a certain percentage...? 😊 *g

Roger W

“no one should could trust” she could?

Zaits

Back to the early mention of a spy in the ranks of the Fifteenth, I'll have to note that no senior officer mentioned had died as of yet. Nilin doesn't count precisely because he was placed to support Nauk and avoid scrutiny of Black's background checking agents.

I mention that because it's stated in this chapter that creature blood (specifically, djinn) allows for better capacity in sorcery. That brings the question: what if Aisha gets more than just passive bonuses from it? We already know that she'll survive the Uncivil Wars, so if my theory is correct, she'll either turn her coat in the end or gets away with it, unnoticed.

agumentic

Reading about Akua gives me almost perverse pleasure, like one can get from cutting himself.

Phantom

Despite all that is happening , I actually finds it interestingly unexpected that everyone thought the Heiress knew what is going on with the Fae while she is actually having no idea about the Fae at all.

Byzantine

I suspect whatever she is trying to use as a power source involves the Fae in some way. And they aren't happy about it.

It would be very interesting if someone managed to get the Summer and Winter courts to attack the same enemy at the same time. Given they can attack the same country it seems like it could be done.

Ploogle

Hmm, possible. They can't attack the same enemy, there must be some way of differentiating the two. In this case, Heiress now Diabolist and Cat are of the same empire, but of opposing factions. Therefore they aren't on the same side.

Morgenstern

Well, if that "enemy" is meant rather individually... one could direct the PERSON behind xy, while the other attacks the organization of said person, as they are not the same (person(s))...

Morgenstern

Ehrm... what did I just write? o0 direct = should be "target"... Ehrm.

Naeddyr

"Of fucking COURSE it's got to be Heiress" is a pretty powerful instinct to have.

Cpt. Obvious

Well, it's unsettling how often it is correct.

Tolk

Your Interlude is as eye-opening as ever. So, Diabolist huh? She's gotten the jump on Squire in name advancement at least. Cat's going to need Archer to stick with her to have a chance I reckon.
Thanks for the chapters.

Euodiachloris

I dunno. She seems to have firmly latched on to the "summon and torture things bigger than your head" part of Diabolist. I don't see the longer term advantages in that Name, whatever Role she uses it for, for some reason. < < Warlock as a Name at least gives some scope to take or leave the things what can out-think you (or, in some cases, give them the chance to indulge their parental instincts for mutual happiness: whichever). 😊

Morgenstern

...aaaand – I caught up. *gulp
Oops.

Only the nobles can have poisoned wine especially made to taste good with the antidote.

arancaytar

I like how the Praesi have taken Chronic Backstabbing Disorder to the point where wine isn't poisoned because you want to harm someone; it's just poisoned as a matter of general etiquette.

Raza

Just woke up the morning after reading this and realized...

We've been explicitly told by Masego that unless the White Knight or the Black Knight dies, Cat is out of luck for a name advancement. And of course, we have those fighting each other next chapter, to get our thoughts invested (which is as far as I've read so far). But the exact phrasing Akua used here before claiming a *new name* to fill the role-gap left by Warlock, leaves one other role gap just like it: the one traditionally occupied by the Black Knight.

Now I've been thinking – and probably many of you with me – that neither the Black nor White Knight position really fits Cat. So I'm betting that a) Black fill find his ability to kill heroes permanently diminished, because his role in the story in that regard has gone to Catherine; b) neither the Black Knight nor the White Knight die in that exchange, and b) Catherine will claim the Grey Knight Name and handle the heroes, matching Heiress-Diabolist move in claiming a new name from the void of an empty role.

Raza

In fact, I'll go one further. Akua just said that Black and Malicia 'didn't think this entirely through', which seems like betting on a crippled horse. Akua's list of the classic Praesi roles leaves one Warlock-shaped and one Black Knight-shaped Role open; Warlock took on Apprentice, Black took on Squire, and despite Black's words on the subject I'm still not sold that either of them wanted to be replaced *themselves*.

That just leaves me the question of why Malicia didn't nip Heiress in the bud; if she understood this mechanism, she'd have to have understood that Heiress was a volatile piece on the gameboard. And Malicia has basically told Cat that she knows what Heiress wanted the Hashimillim(sp?) for, despite Akua thinking that if the tower knew her plans for Liesse, she'd be violently and immediately taken out.

*glassgirlceci*

Rarely do I both love and hate an antagonist to such an extent. Akua is infuriatingly competent, and while I can respect that from a storytelling perspective, I can't help but want to see her die in a Catherine-induced beatdown.

WuseMajor

Honestly, my favorite thing about this chapter was the rather subtle point that Squire assumed the whole Fae plot was a scheme from Heiress... and then we get this one and find out she has less info about the Fae than Squire. Which is just kinda funny.

Goodpie2

For *fuck's sake.* You have more interlude chapters than plot ones at this point, for the love of Christ. *Stop it.*

Lynn

if cat and akua ever managed to put aside the past, curb akua's racism, and work together... gosh, they would be a force of nature. the brightest minds from two entirely different mindsets, working together; terrifying to think about. luckily, akua is a raging racist so this reality will never come to be, and we get to watch catherine curbstomp her.

Heroic Interlude: Appellant

"One hundred and twelve: always be kind to any monster held in a cage by your nemesis. When it inevitably gets loose, it will remember the kindness and attempt to destroy the villain instead."

– "Two Hundred Heroic Axioms", author unknown

A series of explosions rocked the machine and the enormous drill ceased spinning.

Though the Lowest Plaza still had a massive gaping hole in its centre, Helikean soldiers were no longer pouring out of the tunnel: when the Tyrant had fled, swearing 'eternal and unholy revenge', they'd begun retreating in good order. Hanno let out a sigh of relief. He'd not needed to tap into any of his aspects to turn back the breach, but after unleashing his Name so many times he was starting to tire. Ash was already making her way through the Delosi soldiers, curing anything short of death with a touch and that semi-permanent frown. The Ashen Priestess was admittedly one of the more combative healing Names: it should perhaps be expected that her bedside manner was rougher than that of the average priest. The White Knight wasn't exactly displeased. His memories told him that the all-loving types often had difficulty dealing with the realities of war, especially those sworn to Compassion. Their inability to reconcile the way Creation was and the way it should be could lead to some very ugly breakdowns.

The Champion was currently collecting "trophies", hacking off the tip of swords so she could make rings out of them to add to her necklace. There were already enough of those that the thing could be considered an additional layer of mail around her neck. A somewhat grisly ritual by heroic standards, but that was always the way with Levantines. The heroes that had founded their nation had been rebels fighting the Proceran occupation, after all, and they'd been much more willing to bloody their hands than the average Named on the side of Good. Hanno sheathed his sword and took off his helmet to wipe his brow. Hedge crawled out of the wreckage of the machine moments later, covered in soot from head to toe. She'd gone in there to blow the runic array powering the drill while he held the line, and one again gotten off essentially untouched. Hanno wasn't surprised: there was a reason he kept sending her on the riskiest ventures.

As long as the Hedge Wizard and the Champion kept bickering 'amusingly', they were essentially untouchable. Their heroic band would be much too grim if they died, too dark for the amount of absurdity the Tyrant kept injecting into this siege. The White Knight eyed the giant drilling machine belching smoke and sighed again. Well, the flying towers had been a wash so he supposed it made sense for the Tyrant to try underground afterwards. Usually even villains hesitated before trying that route, since there was always the risk of running into a dwarven tunnel, but this particular monster was a reckless one. Almost too reckless, he'd begun thinking of late. Every assault that had been made on Delos so far did have a decent chance of succeeding, but they were also all half-baked enterprises. It was like victory and defeat didn't particularly matter to the man planning the operations, which was somewhat worrying. If taking Delos wasn't the way the Tyrant got what he wanted, what was?

Delosi officers began arranging crews to drag away the broken machine and cordoning off the hole in the ground until it could be properly filled. The Secretariat's armed forces were not particularly strong, in his opinion, but they were well-organized and had superb morale. Delosi believed that the decrees of their Secretariat were the will of the Heavens, so whenever they were deployed they would not break regardless of casualty rates. It had not been unusual for half a battalion to be wiped out on their first deployment, in the first skirmishes of the war, and yet the same men and women who'd been through that grinder did not hesitate going back to it the following day. He could respect that, the act of putting your faith in something larger than yourself. In this case it was somewhat misplaced, of course. The Secretariat was an institution made my men, and so held the flaws of those men. To find infallible judgement, one had to look higher. Hedge made her way to him, patting away the soot with a lack of method that spread the unsightliness more than got rid of it.

"That should be it for a fortnight, at least," she said. "Unless he thinks up another machine."

"He's tried above and below," Hanno noted. "We should expect a dimensional shortcut next."

The Hedge Wizard snorted, her mismatched eyes shining with anticipation.

"If he's going to meddle in Arcadia that problem might just fix itself," she said. "The Courts are on war footing; they'll be shooting everything that moves."

"The first step always works, Hedge," he reminded her. "It may backfire later but it's a virtual certainty he'll make it into the city."

The dark-haired woman grimaced.

"That sounds like you're asking me to do ward work," she said. "Breaking those I can manage, White, but making them? That stuff is hellishly complicated and it blows up if you get even one number wrong."

Hanno had been about to suggest a mere alarm measure instead of something more taxing when he saw Delosi troops coming down from the upper levels. The White Knight felt curiosity rise when the officers among them ignored the efforts of the other soldiers and headed straight for him. The highest-ranked among them, a weedy woman with a commander's insignia branded on her breastplate, came forward and saluted sharply.

"Lord White," she greeted him. "There's been an accident."

"A large one, for a commander to come inform me personally," he said.

"There was a fire in the House of Ink and Parchment," the commander said. "An entire wing collapsed. Casualties involve several members of the Secretariat."

Hanno's eyes sharpened.

"Which ones?" he asked.

The commander didn't know since she was not high-ranking enough to be cleared for the information, as it turned out, but she'd been provided with a list. For once Delos' obsession with records was saving time instead of costing it. The olive-skinned hero scanned the scroll, skipping the names of anyone not ranked Secretary – anyone below that had no real influence in the city. Secretary Colchis, Secretary Mante, Secretary Theolian. Secretary of War Euphemia. Every single high-ranked member of the Secretariat who'd at any point spoken in favour of Delos continuing to intervene in the war past the siege.

"That fire was not an accident," he said quietly. "It was enemy action."

Hedge looked at him grimly.

"You think the Tyrant used the assault as a distraction?" she asked.

"Wasn't our Kairos who did this," Aoede said.

Hanno released the handle of his sword. The Bard had not been there a moment ago, but in between a single blink of his eyelids she had... filled the space. Arm slung over Hedge's shoulder, the Wandering Bard for once wasn't smiling.

"You should have some memories about this," Aoede told him. "This is-"

She never got to finish. Of the twenty-odd officers that surrounded them, over half had weapons in hand: the Bard vanished before a knife could take her in the belly, wielded by the very commander who'd brought him news.

"Stand down," Hanno barked, blade in hand.

In the span of a single heartbeat the hero noticed three things. First, all the officers with their weapons out looked horrified. Second, there was the faintest trickle of power inside them. And third, they were now turning their weapons on themselves. The White Knight dropped his sword and wrestled down the commander before she could slit her own throat, but Hedge was not so quick. The others dropped to the ground, dying or dead, before anything else could be done. The commander stopped fighting back after a moment and he only just managed to keep her from biting off her tongue. Name pulsing, Hanno focused on the power he'd glimpsed. He managed to feel five layers of something before it was gone, washed away before he even tried to make it disappear.

"Commander," he said calmly, releasing her mouth. "Are you with me?"

The woman blinked.

"Lord White?" she croaked. "Why am I on the ground?"

Hanno got back to his feet, helped her up.

"Can you remember anything unusual that happened to you today?" he said.

The officer paled.

"No," she admitted.

"She wouldn't," Hedge said quietly. "Someone Spoke to her."

The Ashuran glanced at his companion.

"You've seen this before?" he asked.

"I know the theory," the Wizard replied. "Five orders. One to wipe the memory, one trigger, one act and two contingencies."

This... he'd seen this before. Fought this before. The White Knight closed his eyes, breathed in and out until his heartbeat slowed and then ceased entirely. In that moment, his mind filled. A thousand lifetimes he had lived yet not lived, spread across centuries. Hanno focused, filtered through two points: compromised officers, high-tier leadership crippled. Seventh Crusade, White Knight. No, opponent was the Dead King. First Proceran War, Good King. No, this wasn't bribery. The Paladin, fall of the Blessed Isle. Conquest. Commander of the vanguard and the western flank assassinated, had to be replaced by officers less seasoned. Every outpost off the Isle gone dark. Sentries made unable to see the placement of goblinfire at the base of the walls. His heartbeat returned.

"Calamities," Hanno spoke. "We're fighting the Calamities, and they're about to attack."

There was a sensation in the back of his head, like a lever being pulled, and a ward covering the Lower Plaza awoke.

A faint smell hit his nostrils and soldiers began dropping like flies.

Alkmene wasted a good two heartbeats looking at Hanno like he'd just murdered her puppy. The Calamities, as in those scary Praesi fuckers up north with a graveyard full of heroes behind their lair? Shit. Shit. Words stronger than shit, which were not coming at the moment because oh Gods they were all about to die.

Productive panic, Hedge, she reminded herself. Productive panic is how we survive. They were now inside a ward, which had been remotely triggered and until now had been hidden behind the much larger magical emanations coming from that godsdamned drill from the Hells. Alkmene tested the strength of said ward with her mind and found she might as well be trying to bring down a wall by pelting it with pastries. Modify it? And now the back of her eye was itching, just from a light probe. Whoever had designed that pattern was a vicious bastard and a half. All that was left was alleviating the effects, then. Her teachers had always taught that that a Gifted faced with a ward could only do three things: break, modify or alleviate. By the looks of it, this one was a straight translocation ward that was bringing in some kind of gas at a fixed rate.

Hedge pulled up a scarf from under her robes and covered her mouth. Most poisons could be outright ignored by Named and the rest could be burned out with a trick, but quantity ingested did influence how well that worked. From the way all the Delosi were stiffening and falling to the ground so quickly, this was not a weak brew. Not magical in nature though. That made things easier. Muttering a word of power, Alkmene created a ball of air in the middle of the plaza. The translucent sphere began spinning, sucking in the gas as fast as it could. She kept murmuring and it kept expanding, devouring more and more. Wouldn't save many of the soldiers, but it would at least make sure their band didn't go into the fight with enough paralysis poison in their lungs to kill a dozen oxen. Ash, in the middle of the incapacitated men, slammed her staff against the paving stones. There was a pulse of power and the people on the ground began breathing again, turning this from a massacre to a crippling blow. On the other hand, by doing that she'd... Hanno was running towards her sister faster than anyone in plate should be able to, but he wouldn't get there in time.

A red wedge immediately opened up in the sky above Irene and a burning rock the size of a house fell through.

Alkmene cursed, flicked her wrist and sent the ball of air straight at the projectile. For a heartbeat it seemed like it would push it back, but then with a pop the spell gave. It was just enough of a delay that her sister was able to prepare herself, thank the Gods. Before the pocket meteorite could smash her into paste Irene was swallowed by a cloud of ash that swirled around her before spearing upwards. The rock itself turned into ash when it made contact, hitting the ground and obscuring the entire plaza in a thick cloud. Alkmene sharpened her eyes just before visibility went and winced at what she saw. Irene's eyes were already grey, which was a bad sign. She'd already used too much power. The Hedge Wizard set that aside the moment she began to feel another spell being crafted, and looked upwards. There was a ball of opaque blue light hovering in the sky above the city, a stable shielding ward. The Warlock, she realized with a dry swallow. She was going to have to fight that. What had her teachers called getting into a mage's duel with Praesi again? Death by stupidity, she remembered. But godsdamnit, she'd have to anyway. If the Warlock was busy with her he wasn't smashing everything down here to bloody chunks. Alkmene cursed again and fished out three tiles from her pockets.

She threw them ahead of her, watched them form three steps hovering in the air.

"You don't have to win, Hedge," she encouraged herself. "Just, you know, not get horribly killed. It's all about the standards."

Nervously laughing, she began the climb up.

Even as the ash billowed past him, Hanno replayed the sequence of events of the last sixty heartbeats in his mind. Nonlethal but dangerous ward that affected mundane soldiers, triggered as the opening move. Their spellcaster moved to mitigate the damage, taking herself out of the equation. Their healer then attempted to heal the affected, leaving herself wide open for retaliation while the other two fighters in their band were too far away to intervene.

Had the Ashen Priestess been a common healing Named, that projectile would have killed her instantly.

They'd almost lost a fourth of their fighting strength before the first exchange was over, and that realization sent a shiver up his spine. These were not military tactics, they were hero-killing tactics. Targeting people in their charge to make them expend effort, then immediately striking their weak point with overwhelming force. Their opponents were not only used to fighting heroes, they were used to fighting bands of heroes. The White Knight calmed his mind. There would be three of them. The Warlock was in the sky, and Hedge was moving to distract him. Now he needed to find the Captain and the Black Knight before they could take one of his companions out.

"Ash," he called out. "Champion."

"We here," the Champion yelled back.

"One, five," a man's voice calmly said. "Brazier."

Magic flared in the distance and the place where the Champion's voice had come from burst into flames. The light was enough for Hanno to make out a lone silhouette to his left. A man. Short, in plate with a heater shield and a longsword. The White Knight, without making a sound, headed in that direction. With a burst of speed he emerged behind the man and rammed his blade in his back — only to pierce through shadows that collapsed into a pool before snaking away along the ground. There was a faint whistle and he ducked under a crossbow bolt, almost missing the second one aimed at his knee. He managed to parry that one at the last moment, though it marked his armour. The hero could still feel the presences of Ash and the Champion, dimmed. They were still alive, though the fire had hurt. Gritting his teeth, he made his choice and followed the shadows.

They were swift, but not swift enough to outpace a hero on foot. After a few moments it became glaringly obvious he was being led away from the plaza, towards the second level of the city. The sound of fighting erupted behind him, the Champion hooting in joy, but he'd have to trust they could handle themselves. Leaving the Black Knight unattended with an ash cloud as cover was just asking for one of them to die. Hanno found steps under his feet, a sure sign he was leaving the plaza, and shortly afterwards felt the pressure over his shoulders vanish: he'd left the bounds of the ward. The ash cloud behind him, the hero looked for his opponent and found him almost instantly. In the middle of the avenue stood a man, in a bare suit of plate that had the marks of frequent use. His shield had no heraldry painted on it, his sword went without decoration. The only splash of colour was those unsettlingly pale green eyes that could be seen through the slits of the helm.

"You're a long way from home, Black Knight," Hanno said.

The man did not reply. He moved forward, shield raised. The White Knight felt the Light flood his veins, scouring his insides, and with hard eyes met the enemy.

The enemy had made a mistake when they'd chosen poison as their means of attack. The method had been clever enough, Irene would concede, as the sheer quantity of poison had made it hard to counteract. Now that she had this much ash to work with, however, it was child's play to neutralize the effects. After absorbing the airborne toxin with it she'd directly targeted the enemy ward with her power, since Alkmene was apparently incapable of doing as much. Hammering blindly at sorcery with miracles tended to lead to unpredictable side effects, so instead of destroying the ward she'd erased the part that was bringing in the gas. Or at least she'd begun doing that, before nine feet of plate and muscle with a giant hammer had come for her head. How they'd not seen or heard the behemoth approach, given that the ash cloud had settled on the ground by then, was beyond her. Likely the woman's Name was involved. Regardless, the Champion had stepped in before her earthly body could be made an earthly corpse.

"You not just big girl," said heroine enthused, narrowly avoiding a swing. "You biggest girl."

"I'm flattered," the Captain replied politely. "But also thrice your age and married."

The Ashen Priestess had never thought much of fighting banter. If you had breath for it, you weren't trying to kill your opponent hard enough. The Champion was more or less holding the enemy at bay for now, so she focused on the ward again. She could see why her sister had found the structure troublesome: there were little patterns that would make even looking at it dangerous for a mage. Doing so through the lens of a miracle, however, meant it could not touch her. Irene began sharpening her power into a chisel again, breaking one rune after another. Her soul was only loosely attached to her body by a chord, high in the sky as she continued chipping away at the ward. The Priestess smiled as she wiped another cluster, then felt the chord being tugged. Looking downwards she saw the Champion's shield getting caved in by a hammer blow, quickly followed by the heroine getting punched in the face. Both hits she had gotten by standing between the villain and Priestess' immobile body. Irene had seen the Champion laugh off a horse's kick, but after that punch she spat blood before forcing the Captain back. She then unkindly slapped Irene's body in the face a second time, the chord forcefully dragging the heroine back inside at the impact.

"Ashy," Champion grunted as the Priestess blearily opened her eyes. "Get your miera joint. This no stroll in park."

Irene eyed her companion in confusion before she caught the meaning. Get your shit together, Rafaella had meant.

"The ward's out of play," she said. "I'm back."

"Good," the Champion said. "Two-time big girl now."

Said 'girl' was not currently attacking them, Priestess could not help but notice. The Captain was not wearing a helmet so the studded earring in her left ear was quite visible. And currently glinting with sorcery.

"Confirmed," the Captain said. "Going full tilt."

"I no like sound of this," the Champion admitted, throwing away her crumpled shield and hoisting her axe.

"It's nothing personal," the villain said. "I was given an order, and now I Obey."

The moment she spoke the word, her presence in Creation became heavier. Aspect. Well, that was going to be troublesome. The Ashen Priestess reached for her miracles as the Captain blurred into motion.

Hanno's sword slid off the shield and he backpedalled to avoid the blades that would have scythed through his knees. At least now he knew how the villain had shot two crossbows at him earlier: the Black Knight's shadow extended into two tendrils behind his back, the two of them wielding swords simultaneously to the villain's own movements. The sheer amount of fine control that had to go in that was staggering, not that the hero had time to stop and stare: even with the Light sharpening his reflexes beyond human capacity he was having trouble coming close without taking a hit. The first time the villain had revealed the tendrils he'd waited until their blades were locked before plunging two blades straight into the White Knight's neck: they'd gone through the gorget and would have gone on to his spine under it if he hadn't detonated the Light beneath his skin to blow them back. The burns from that were painful, and unlike other wounds wouldn't start healing given enough time.

Hanno breathed out, having a little space, and timed his advance. The first shadow-wielded sword skimmed his shoulder as he shot forward, trailing sparks. The second came down in a swing but he rolled forward, landing on his feet just in time to parry a lunge that would have gone straight through his eye. The White Knight slapped away the shield, flicked his wrist, and with wide eyes saw the fuse on a clay ball reaching the bottom. It exploded in his face, throwing him back. Before he even landed on the ground the Black Knight was behind him, shadow tendrils swinging swords at the height of his neck and torso. Gritting his teeth, Hanno detonated the Light on his side to stop his momentum – it blew straight through his plate. He took a shield bash to the face, blinding him, and then felt a blade go straight through the elbow joint of his sword arm. Biting down on a scream, he reached for his Name and let out a pulse of blinding light. By the time he was steady again, the Black Knight was twenty feet away and the shadow limbs were aiming crossbows at him.

The hero moved his blade to the hand with a functioning elbow behind it. He wasn't as good with his left as his right, but it was a near thing. At the moment he could only see two shadow tendrils, but Hanno wasn't falling for that again. He'd seen a third one hiding those goblin munitions behind the shield, after knocking it aside. The crossbows drew back, however, when both Named heard the sound of marching troops coming down the avenue leading up to the third level. Reinforcements, the Ashuran thought. Alone against the villain they would be wheat waiting for the sickle, but with him too? No matter how many limbs the Black Knight had, he only had one torso. The Delosians spread across the length of the avenue in a shield wall, bowmen setting up behind them. The villain's limbs retracted and he patiently waited for the soldiers to approach. What was he... No.

"Retreat," the White Knight bellowed.

"Two, five through eight," the green-eyed man spoke calmly.
"Half."

Hanno felt magic flare in the distance and saw the villain flatten himself against the ground. He followed suit, and a heartbeat later felt the warmth of a spell pass above him. He got back on his feet as soon as his senses told him the danger was past, jaw tightening when he saw the aftermath of the sorcery. Every soldier in the avenue had been cut through at the waist as if by a giant blade. Blood and viscera stained the stone even as the men twitched away the last of their lives.

"Warlock, you have bled," the Black Knight said. "Walls were damaged. Recalibrate."

Some of the houses had been sliced through as well, Hanno saw, but he was far past caring. He'd just seen two hundred men butchered like animals quicker than you could fill a glass. The White Knight breathed out, mastering his fury. I do not judge. To take justice in his own hands was surrendering his blade to chaos. Only the judgement of the Heavens was not limited by the shackles of mortal perspective.

"Ride," Hanno hissed, running.

Light howled into existence, sharpening itself into a steed that the White Knight mounted without missing a beat. His sword returned to its sheath as he devoured the distance, a blinding lance of light forming in his extended hand. The Black Knight cocked his head to the side and the shadow tendrils extended from his back. Hanno waited for the swords, but instead they extended even further and pushed the villain off the ground like giant spider legs, tossing him towards a rooftop to the left. By the time the Ashuran got to where the villain had stood there was nothing left to charge. The mount disappeared a heartbeat later and the lance with it, Hanno landing on his feet. His gaze turned to the rooftop, where the Black Knight was studying him.

"Two, six," the man said. "Pitch."

Everything went dark just as the tiredness from using the aspect hit him.

"Oh, come on," Hedge yelled as she started falling.

It had been bad enough when little dots of red light that burned straight through everything began pursuing her, but now this? There was no way using giant snakes made of flames as a mobile semi-sentient defence could be considered reasonable. Mages used those as a fancy knockout-punch, not decoration. She only had two tiles left — that little dot surprise had punched straight through one before she learned what they did — which meant she wasn't so much ascending as leaping from one stair to another. While at least a league up in the sky, pursued by killer lights and very insistent giant fire snakes. Normally the absolute sheer terror knotting up her guts would have been crippling, but having come within an inch of death seven times within the last few moments she'd punched straight through that ceiling of fear into another realm of fresh and previously unexplored horror. She was never going to use a staircase again, and anyone who tried to make her was going to spend the rest of their life as the ugliest frog she could manage.

The Hedge Wizard summoned the two tiles back to her, shoving one under her feet hastily so she'd stop freefalling. The dots were slow enough they'd take a bit to catch up, but she was now officially back in snake trouble territory. The odd-eyed woman winced as she saw the spell construct's jaw unhinge. Just before it closed on her she muttered a word of power and both she and everything she touched turned into flame, just long enough for the snake to pass through her. She came out of it wearing fuming robes and knowing she was running out of tricks to survive that. Her Name allowed her to use and understand sorceries so wide in scope and different in nature that it was effectively impossible for anyone else to know them all, but it did have one glaring flaw: she could never use the same trick twice the same day. Her bag wasn't running low, at the moment, but it was certainly running low with things she could use to avoid giant flaming snake death. This was, she reflected, a bit of a problem.

She wouldn't be able to keep this up much longer, while the Warlock did not even seem to be running his actual defences. Could he even, from inside that bubble ward? He'd been casting area-wide magic sporadically, but she wasn't actually getting any spikes in magic from in there when he did. There was actually a non-negligible chance he was just triggering distant wards while overseeing the battlefield. The most direct action he'd taken so far was the pocket meteor, and that was before she'd found him in the sky. So if I break that bubble, I might be disrupting their entire plan. That was the kind of risk she had to take, horrifying as that notion was. Alkmene did not think they were going to pull through this otherwise, not with how dim she could feel the others getting. Hanno was getting the worst of it, she sensed, but whoever Champion was scrapping with was delivering a hell of a beating. Hedge gingerly rolled her shoulders, watching the swarm of light dots approaching.

The wizard summoned her free tile to her hand and tapped the one she was standing on three times. It broke her heart to destroy an artefact she'd made so recently – because of their equally recent flying tower fiasco, as it happened – but it was marginally better than getting destroyed herself. The tile began lengthening and she ran down the length, feeling it becoming more and more brittle the longer it spread. Halfway to the bubble it shattered under her feet. She managed to get the second one in place before beginning to fall, angling it so it served as a sloped ramp.

Immediately she began sliding off but another word of power had her soles sticking to the surface, allowing her to start running upwards. Not, unfortunately, fast enough to lose the dots. Hedge muttered under breath and flicked her wrist: a ghost image of her, reproducing her magical signature, began running away across thin air. The dots weren't sentient at all, unlike the snakes, so it would be enough to fool them.

One of said snakes managed to loop back to her right before she got to the bubble, though, leaving her only an instant to make her decision. She went with the risk, since her last tile was already beginning to break. She leapt on top of the bubble and pressed herself against the ward, hoping to all the Gods the snakes had been designed not to collide with the bubble. The fire construct veered away at the last moment and she clenched her fist in triumph. Not dying, her favourite kind of victory. Immediately she began tinkering with the ward beneath her. Unlike the first one they'd been hit with, this one had been designed to weather a beating instead of being hard to modify. Small favours. No doubt the Warlock already knew she was there, so her window would be very, very small. Huh, this was actually massively strong. She could have unloaded her entire arsenal at this and barely scratched it. Were the villains under the impression she was a slugger kind of mage?

With a smile of triumph, she switched the last two runes, preparing the fae flame even as a circular hole in the bubble opened.

There was no Warlock inside.

There was, however, an unstable elemental matrix that had only been kept from exploding by the containment ward.

"You utter asshole," she managed to say before it blew up.

The warhammer came down and shattered Champion's shoulder, then spun to turn her left kneecap into powder. The Captain did not even attempt to kill the downed heroine this time, going directly for Irene. She'd learned from that initial mistake.

"Heal," the Ashen Priestess murmured.

The shoulder snapped back into place, the knee yanked itself up and the Levantine woman got back on her feet. Irene had been tapping into her aspect for over half the fight and it was starting to take a toll. The wounds healed themselves more slowly now, and not as fully. Given how absurdly tough the Champion was she was able to walk it off anyway, but it was a game of diminishing returns. In more ways than one: the Captain's hammer came down on the box of light surrounding the Priestess three times before Rafaella was able to engage her again. After the third blow the box thinned, and Irene was certain if the villain had time for a fourth it would outright break. If it did, she gave it half and half odds she survived the experience. Unfortunately the Champion now got back into the fight a little slower every time while Captain showed no sign of tiring. Whatever aspect she'd used earlier wasn't empowering her by much, but it wasn't running out. This had effectively become an endurance match, which villains weren't supposed to be able to win. They would this time, though, because the Calamities had hit when their band was fresh from turning back an enemy assault.

That did not feel like a coincidence.

"Champion," Irene called out.

"Small busy right now," the Levantine replied, ducking under a hammer blow.

The mere force of the swing was enough to kick up a cloud of ash behind them.

"I need you to buy me sixty heartbeats," she said.

"Also want moon and stars?" Champion complained.

"It's that or we die," the Priestess frankly replied.

Rafaella smashed her battle axe into the behemoth's plate, driving her back a step and cracking the metal.

"Dying not good," the Levantine conceded.

The Captain leapt back.

"I need Burden in, um," she said. "Big square in the middle."

There was a pause.

"I'm not Black, Wekesa," she retorted irritably. "I don't keep track of where everyone goes all the time."

Thirty heartbeats left. She could make it. Her aspect continued ebbing as she pushed another one to the surface. That was the limitation on Heal – she could keep it going, but making it stop took time. There was a flare of magic in the distance and suddenly the box flared into existence above her head. A moment later it broke and massive pressure forced her to her knees. Champion was still on her feet even if she was buckling, she saw, but Captain seemed almost unaffected. The hammer rose and she blurred again.

"Oppose," the Champion laughed.

There was a sound like a crack made in the weave of Creation and the pressure lifted. Rafaella's axe smashed into the head of the hammer that would have split open the Priestess' head, the impacts perfectly matched. Both weapons flew back and Captain warily stepped away.

"Ignite," Irene croaked out.

All over the field, the ashes began smouldering. She could feel them pulse in harmony with heartbeat, as much a part of her as any limb. The heat rose and the ashes began rising into the air, forming into spears. The Captain took a look around, then cracked her neck.

"Been a while," she said. "It won't be gentle."

The villain's eyes turned blood red, her body convulsed and she began shifting. They were, it seemed, not yet out of the woods. Worse, the woods were starting to look rather hungry.

This was not working, Hanno thought as the blade sheared through his cheek. The wound began to heal almost immediately, but his Name didn't replace blood. Of which he had lost too much already. The White Knight's eyes narrowed when he saw his opponent giving ground. He was hearing something. Was the villain ordering another strike? Hanno sharpened his hearing, catching only the last words.

"Listen closely."

Then the munitions detonated. The hero hissed, involuntarily clasping his free hand to an ear. The man had used the elongated sticks that made light and noise earlier, but this was different — it made only noise, but was horribly loud. In that moment where pain filled Hanno's thoughts, the Black Knight made his move. The olive-skinned hero brought up his sword in time to parry the first strike and sidestep the tendril-moved blade that would have sunk straight in his carotid. But he took the shield bash to the face, and then the other shadow-wielded blade went through the slight space between his breastplate and the lower parts of his armour that only mail covered. The sword chipped on the rings, but it tore through his guts anyway. The sword in the villain's hand drew back, and in that movement Hanno read his death. It would take him in the eye, killing him in a way no Name could prevent. The world slowed. It wasn't about power, the White Knight knew. He'd gauged how much both their names could throw around, and he trumped his opponent handily. It was the disparity in skill and experience. Hanno did not have any tricks his opponents had never seen before, and he had not seen most of his opponent's.

That had always been going to be the way, he'd known from the start. He would have to go against villains who'd been around for decades longer than he, who'd been accumulating power and skill long before he'd even been born. It was why he'd left for the Titanomachy instead of going north to die like the others. I am not enough, but I am more than me. The Light flooded his veins again where it had started to ebb and he silently spoke the word he needed to.

Recall.

They flooded through his mind until he sorted them by height and build. Knight Errant. Hanno's body moved by itself, the reflexes of his Name replacing his own. He leaned backwards, the tip of the villain's sword passing just above his nose, and his hand closed around the grip of the sword in his gut. Ignoring the struggling shadow tendril, he hit the Black Knight in the chest with the pommel. The impact bought him a moment he flawlessly used to spin around his opponent. The very instant they were back to back he slapped away the tendril-moved sword that would have taken the back of his knee and with two swords in hand stepped away from his opponent. The villain did not miss a beat, stepping into a lunge that Hanno turned into a parry that knocked the sword out of the man's hand. It did not stop him: a tendril caught the sword and swung for this throat as the other one slapped another blade into the palm of his armoured hand. No, this wouldn't work either.

He touched the flood again. Righteous Spear. Tossing away the villain's weapon, Hanno felt the sword in his hand flare with light and turn into the spear he needed. A parting gift from the Gigantes, a weapon that could be whatever his Name required. The barbed tip of his spear flicked towards the villain's throat but bounced off the shield. The Black Knight immediately closed the distance and Hanno spun with the man's swing, shaft of the spear coming to knock down the side of the shield before he spun back to – to have the shaft be caught by a shadow tendril. Weapon forced out of his hand, Hanno touched the flood again. Sage of the West. His armoured gauntlet expertly caught the side of the shield and he leveraged his weight to slam it into the villain's own helm. The man was caught off guard long enough for Hanno to slide under his guard and flip him over his back. He pivoted smoothly to hammer his heel into the villain's helmet but the side of his greaves was caught.

"Destroy," the Black Knight said.

The life he'd been tapping into... disappeared. Like smoke. He was the White Knight again, standing awkwardly with his foot in his opponent's grasp. The villain grunted and smashed him into the ground like rag doll. Tendrils of shadows with two dozen of the clay balls from earlier wrapped around him, all lit. Hanno touched the flood again. Thief of Stars. He slid out of the bindings, though the edge of the explosions caught him. He was tossed to the ground, landing in an ungainly sprawl. It wasn't enough. He'd have to... The coin appeared in one hand as his weapon reformed in a burst of light in the other.

"Burn," an indifferent voice ordered.

The stream of flame caught him in the chest. His plate was of the finest steel that could be found in the Free Cities and still it boiled in the blink of an eye. The force behind the flames was brutal, driving him into the pavement as the stone scorched and cracked around him. Mercifully, it ceased. The time to worry about the state of his body after the fight was past, Hanno acknowledged. He breathed out and let the Light fill him. He'd lost hold of the Thief, now the White Knight once more, and his body hoisted itself back to its feet. Flesh a tapestry of red and black, he stood to face his enemies. There were two, now. The Black Knight and his sorcerous accomplice. A tall black man in burgundy robes, currently eyeing him with distaste.

"Wekesa," the Black Knight said. "The Wizard?"

"Survived the blast," the Warlock replied. "Currently chasing my second fake."

"Then why are you here?" the other villain asked.

"The Tyrant is retreating."

There was a heartbeat of silence.

"You're certain?" the Black Knight said.

The sorcerer rolled his eyes.

"No, I confused them with the other besieging army that's leaving," he deadpanned.

"A backstab I expected, but a retreat?" the Knight murmured, then shook his head. "Are any of them on their third aspect?"

"Sabah's got her two on their second, the Wizard hasn't even used one," the dark-skinned man said.

The Black Knight sighed, then sheathed his sword.

"We can no longer win this," he said. "Full retreat."

"They're on the ropes, Black," the Warlock said.

"Yes," the other villain agreed darkly. "We have them cornered, with all their trump cards left. That is not a story that ends well for us."

"You're not getting away," Hanno and the Light said.

The Warlock glanced at him then smiled unpleasantly.

"Well, you say that, but..."

Everything went dark again.

It was night out when Irene finally hit her limit.

Hanno would survive, which was what mattered. The magical burns had been nothing she hadn't seen before, if never quite so severe, but there'd been some things she could not fix. There were two patches of skin gone almost stone-like on the side of his neck and a few others on his side that seemed able to simply ignore her miracles. It was like the Heavens saw nothing there that needed to be healed. She'd have to ask him about it, when he woke up. Her sister was sprawled across a chair behind her, looking exhausted, and the Champion was snoring away loudly on the only other bed in the room. She didn't begrudge the Levantine that in the slightest: she'd had most bones in her body broken at least three times, and Irene had not had the power left to both soothe away the lingering pains and deal with the White Knight's wounds. Washing away the last of the peeled-off skin with the wet cloth, Irene dropped the resulting mess in the water bowl by her side.

"He's rather plain for a hero, isn't he?" Alkmene said quietly, studying their leader.

"That speaks well of him," Irene replied, dragging herself up. "Means he's not vain."

She brought a short stool next to her sister's seat and with a sigh dropped her head on Alkmene's arm. The odd-eyed woman stroked her hair affectionately.

"You know what I mean," her sister said. "Look, we didn't change much when we became Named but there were some changes. I'm a little thinner. You're taller than me by at least an inch more than before."

"That's because he's a Judgement boy," the Bard said.

Both sisters flinched at the interruption. Aoede was sitting by Hanno's bedside, pulling at a bottle of rum.

"Where have you been all day?" Irene asked flatly.

"Nowhere," the Bard grimaced. "They've figured out a few things."

It would have been impolite for either of them to pursue this any further, unfortunately. One did not simply ask another Named how their Name affected them. The answers tended to be intensely personal, and sometimes forcing an answer could have grave consequences for everyone involved. The olive-skinned woman brushed back her curls, waving her bottle.

"But like I said, it's because he's a Judgement boy," she continued. "The Seraphim don't have a lot of tolerance for self-delusion. You're taller 'cause in your head you were that much taller than your sister. Irene is thinner 'cause she never thought of herself as going to keep those pounds."

"That's fascinating," her sister said blandly, reaching for a pitcher of wine and pouring herself a cup. "And you didn't warn us the fucking Calamities were coming to town because?"

"Here's a warning, since you want one. Don't drink that," the Bard replied easily Irene frowned and her sister pulled away her hand from the cup like she'd been burned.

"Why?" the Priestess asked.

"There's five Calamities," Aoede said. "You've met three. One's retired. And the last one is..."

"Assassin," Irene whispered, eyeing the cup like it was snake. "It's poisoned?"

"And just when the both of you are flat out of power to burn," the Bard said admiringly. "None of us ever saw a whisk of him, and he's still come closest to killing a hero today."

Priestess found her hands were shaking.

"They've learned to work around me some," Aoede said quietly. "There's rules. I knew they were coming but not when."

Irene waved away the unspoken recriminations they'd been offering. The Bard was not the enemy.

"Merciful Gods," Alkmene muttered. "This has not been our day."

"We've got some time before Hanno is back on his feet," Priestess said. "We can rest a bit."

"Seven days and seven nights before he wakes," the Bard said. "Only one thing to do until then."

"And what's that?" Irene asked, raising an eyebrow.

The bottle of rum landed in her lap.

"For once," the Ashen Priestess said, bringing the bottle to her lips, "I think you might actually be right."

Jesus Christ Almighty only Begotten Son of the Father Most High

I'm running out of titles for Jesus, that's when you know I'm shocked.

This chapter was.... Utterly utterly brilliant, action-packed, intriguing, heart pounding, intoxicating and it left me completely breathless.

I love this story so much, and we saw the Calamities in action.

I'd say I'm at a loss for words, but I keep typing so clearly that's not the case. If/when you publish these as a book set I'll be the first person in line.

naturalnuke

THE MYTH, THE LEGEND!

I highly enjoyed this.

boballab

And just think it was 5 hero's and only 3 Calamities, if Ranger and Assassin took part of the fighting the heros would have died.

Morgenstern

Well, Assassin obviously did take part in the end, but the Bard cheated again, and so no hero died at all. 😊 Guess Assassin really is not for sneaking in multiple methods of death at once? Somehow, I would've expected more in that one tiny aspect of this chapter, after all it was building up to. After all, there are five heroes in the room, even though the Priestess is the obvious first target to get rid of. And only ONE method to kill her employed? Seriously... Assassin needs to go deeper into their trick box.

1shot4living

You get the feeling that Assassin was just "doin it for the LOLS"

Morgenstern

Still absolutely LOVED this chapter, of course. 😊

erraticerrata

Assassin doesn't ever participate in melees like this one. There's a reason some people in the Empire believe there's no such Named, just a very talented cadre of killers answering to Black.

Morgenstern

Thanks for the clarification. As far as I am concerned, I didn't speak about melee/action sequences, when it comes to someone named "Assassin", just to ensure that does not get misunderstood. 😊

nick012000

Hey, now, I wouldn't underestimate someone just because they're named Assassin. Just take a look at the Savior of France, after all.

Dragons are simply bigger sparrows, after all. 😊

jamesc9

On a search for "saviour of france" "assassin" I find this discussion:

and I'm struggling to understand it..

Could you fill me in, please?

GunnarS14

Basically, when the game was first released in Japan, it was much harder to level everybody up. Since Sasaki was a 1 star rarity, he was much easier to strengthen. Also most other low rarity Assassins weren't just straightforward offense, and so were less useful. Most common enemy in the first Singularity outside the tutorial were dragons, who were classed as Riders, which are weak to Assassins. So, easier to obtain and level up Servant whose effective against the most common type of enemy in the area and is also from the original Visual Novel meant he was used by almost all players at this time. This region was France, so he was the one who "saved" France by letting all the players actually beat the region. All the memes spawned from this.

Ginger

Me second

auwildthing

Totally agree, loved the snakes and ladders too.. lol

Austin

This is easily in my top 3 favorites stories I've ever read, and I've read a LOT of stories

Nemesh

That was one of the best interludes yet. Thank you

samshadar

Gods below, what a chapter! This was incredibly powerful, easily the best I've ever seen a fight described in any book I've read. Congratulations! 😊

PingleBerry

000000HHHH YEAH! On other notes, you have your first fanfic for this story on SB

erraticerrata

Saw that, yeah. I'm on Spacebattles most days, so I actually came across it even before the thread started redirecting traffic to the site. Figured the first one would be a crossover with Worm.

Well are you going to give us a link or do I need to start googling it myself?

random\_human

"Their heroic band would be much too grim if they died, too dark for the amount of absurdity the Tyrant kept injecting into this siege."

So that's interesting. Does the setting or certain stories have their own set tone? Because Shoo Out The Clowns is a tried and true technique to make a story darker.

And are hero-killing tactics so rare? I know that in the stories that we are 'spoofing' they aren't but these are laws of reality. Genre-savvy is expected here, unlike other stories where villains have every reason to believe they are in a sensible world. I find it hard to believe only Black and Cat have had the bright idea of working around common tropes.

The Archdevil

There's having an idea to work around cliches like monologuing, and there's putting it into action. When all is said and done, it's not the Name that matters, but the person behind it. Most wouldn't have the willpower to reject their Role, and would eventually find themselves performing the very cliches they hated and wanted to avoid, without even noticing.

random human

I actually really dislike the idea of Black and Cat just being Randian Ubermensch superior to all others in history. Maybe I just read too much fanfiction but it's very repulsive to me. So I'm hoping that there's another reason for it.

And I'm not sure I follow your idea. Cliches do not just rise out of the ether, they happen because they make sense in-universe. Even here there's nothing to suggest that a magical force compels someone to act a certain way, rather the opposite is true. It's just the laws of probability here are forcing certain story elements to crop up. They do it because to them it's the sensible thing to do because they genuinely believe the moral that they think the story is telling, villains and heroes alike.

And it's part of why I so heavily dislike the idea of Black and Cat just knowing better than all of them.

1shot4living

Black and Cat aren't the only ones though, only the beginning of a new era perhaps if you consider that the White Knight as well as the Diabolist have been very aware and even manipulating the story to suit them, they are not alone, perhaps just the most visible from our perspective.

Iconochasm

They're not the only ones. Remember the old Dread Emperor who forbid the Legions from engaging when they were assured of victory? That example really demonstrates that it's not just about doing what seems reasonable. What seems reasonable will often fail, due to the narrativium the universe operates on. So a competent Named will operate a meta level above that, like Black backing off there, or when the White Knight relied on their certain doom in the falling tower to get them out alive. The "special" factor for Black is that he's trying to operate on a meta-meta level, manipulating the Names themselves.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

There's nothing to suggest a magical force is compelling people to act a certain way? Uhhhh excuse me, but just a couple chapters ago Mr. F. Rider was compelled to share his diabolical plans when he clearly didn't want to. The concept you prematurely dismissed is actually a major driving force in this world

The Archdevil

Were you responding to me or OP?

Zach

This was explicitly because Arcadia operates under different rules where people are bound even more tightly to "the narrative" than in Creation (which Arcadia is not a part of).

RandomFan

Yes, but in order for Shoo Out The Clowns to work, you need to take them out on both sides. If the story goes that dark, either the tyrant needs to change his tone **first**, or he's going down along with the comedic relief. In other words, the heroes are matching the villian's tone appropriately, and that offers protection in this genre. In a more serious one, dark and gritty doesn't cover for dark and gritty, but the story doesn't want a joke villian when it goes dark and gritty.

I don't know if it's ever stated they're **rare**, but the tyrant doesn't care to use them, or at least not in nearly as overt form as black-and-the-rest are. Plus, even if it's not a new idea, they might not have had a chance to go up against them before. I'm not sure it's the novelty that leads to the horror and effectiveness, though.

The calamities probably have put more time into this than most villians we've seen. Praesi don't seem to have local heroes in any real numbers; I would not be surprised if most villianous lands are in the same position. The calamities have had more chances to fine-tune their hero-killing procedures than most villians get. They may be no triumphant, may she never return, but they're still a villian group that managed to conquer and hold a heroic kingdom, without killing everyone and everything inside first. Very little will give you more experience fighting heroes than that.

As for why the White Knight sounded horrified, it was probably a "they aren't just attacking at random, they're after *us*" realization.

erraticerrata

No tactics the Calamities used here are ground-breaking by Named standards. Plenty of villains have targeted mortals to bait heroes before, splitting a heroic band in several different fights is a staple of fantasy, ect. What scared the White Knight is more the professional manner in which those tactics were employed. No monologues or warning shots, no posturing. They went for the throat from the onset.

Lucas

Also, there is something that compels them to act accordingly with their roles right? Like the apprentice has to answer even stupid questions.. and we saw other examples, like in Arcadia

stevenneiman

The tricky thing is that most Villains who are aware of the narrative either decide to just have fun since they can't win, or else their frustration with the way the game is rigged against them drive them onto the exact paths that they lose by. Also, most of them don't really truly expect to win, like how Akua claims to be playing for keeps but is acting like Sorcerous or Sinestra. Most Villains in the end have a very distorted understanding of what victory really is, as evidenced by the fact that their most feared Tyrant who even had winning in her title, didn't do anything except make a big mess before she died.

Cpt. Obvious

If by "except make a big mess before she died." mean conquering all of the continent of Calernia (except for the Titanomacy perhaps?) before being back stabbed by her "allies", who then squandered it all away. Then you're not wrong.

Cpt. Obvious

Oh, forgot about The Golden Bloom, The Everdark, the Kingdom Below, The Chain of Hunger and of course The Kingdom of the Dead. She didn't conquer those.

Cpt. Obvious

Hero killing tactics are probably not all that uncommon, but the Calamities are!

Traditionally a Band of Five is a Hero thing. They band together in order to defeat the Evil Villain who has killed every Hero who has tried to free Creation of their taint. And after their victory, because in the stories Good always does, they may stay together or go their separate ways.

Villains on the other hand are usually too arrogant, greedy and unstable to work together. Not to mention that Villains forming a Band of Five and actually help each other to cover each other's weaknesses or enhance others strengths is incredibly rare.

The Calamities being a Band of Villains that has no backstabbing going on, appears to not only tolerate each other but actually be the best of friends prepared to risk their lives for each other is unprecedented. And they've been developing and using Hero killing tactics for more than forty years by now.

So yeah, their Hero killing game is pure Next Level.

nerfworld

Huh, so the bard is backing these guy to distract Black and crew away from what Diabolist is doing?

And is she still giving villainy tips to the tyrant?

Letouriste

Uh? What?

Jonnnney

I'm not sure how much control over who she is backing. Don't know how many other groups of heroes there even are on the continent of Calernia and the bard might not exist when not part of a group. I do agree that she wants Diabolist to win because her story ends in failure. If two great evils, Calamities vs Diabolist, clash in an evil empire and the evil with more destructive potential loses it changes the story even more. I'd guess that every previous time such a conflict occurred in Praes the more evil won.

boballab

I think everyone is missing the point still getting tied up in the Name and forgetting the Role even after Akua explaining this. Black is actually changing the story because while he has the Name "The Black Knight", he is actually filling the Role of "Tyrant", The Warlock is doing the same thing. If Black succeeds in changing the story then what is known as "Good" will be destroyed forever or at least changed as well. That is why the Bard wants the Diabolist to win because the Diabolist is a villain of the original story and in the end "Good" will triumph over "Evil". Black is not just a temporary threat to the Gods Above as all the villains that came before him were, he is an extensional threat to them and all that rely on them.

lightdefender

Well, damn.

I know the Calamities retreated in the end, but damn. At first I said do not piss off Wekesa, but pissing him off may be more survivable than giving him time to PLAN.

1shot4living

Planning? Definitely some A-Team vibes going here. "Give me a minute, I'm good. Give me an hour, I'm great. Give me six months, I'm unbeatable," and all that jazz.

Euodiachloris

It just highlights why William's zany scheme to try killing an isolated Warlock wasn't that crazy. Sodding difficult and several shades of dangerous, sure. Particularly when the Bumbling Conjuror was the only real counter-mage on Team Nominal Hero. But, when reading this, it's abundantly clear that that tactic was always going to be a walk in the park compared to taking on Team Calamity at almost full strength.

The Quietist

Sheeeeeeeeeeeit, that was beyond fucking cool. The chapter really hammered home just why the Calamities are so fucking terrifying. Also White Knight power OP plz nerf, now I get Black bitching about reality favoring Good. Though Hanno is smarter than most Heroes to have gone south to train first as opposed to getting hilariously stomped by heading straight into the fight.

haihappen

Yeah, the White Knight, or at least this one, seems to have a reserve of previous iterations that he can call upon, and he just burned through several of them. If he can still Recall them then he is OP.

But I think the White Knight is so powerful because the powers aligned to oppose him are powerful. StrongAsTheyNeedToBe comes to mind.

The quietist

I wonder if Ranger will end up fighting White simply because it gives her an opportunity to fight every BAMF ever rolled into one.

Morgenstern

That would actually be very fitting and hilarious. Though, if the White were really OP, he just might end up being the one to finally kill Ranger (which probably wouldn't end well for anyone)...

kinigget

so this is what full-scale battle between Heroes and Villains looks like...

I am **not** disappointed

I can only **imagine** the kind of terror Cat will be when she reaches this level

Not a robot

So I just realised that the Calamities really are the villains here. I might be rooting for Cat, but I'm not rooting for Black or Warlock and certainly not for Praes in general. What Wekesa did to those soldiers was utterly monstrous, and I found myself hoping White would win this one.

nick012000

Not really any different to what America does to terrorists. Wekesa just did it with precision-guided magic instead of a precision-guided bomb.

RandomFan

Wekesa? Seriously? All he did was kill them- exactly like the heroes did when facing the tyrant's forces. No more trauma, no more horror, just a more effective killing. 200 in a single strike or in 200, who cares? they're dead either way, and it's just as valid either way. Note that black's reaction to the building's destruction was "recalibrate- you have bleed" which I interpret to mean that the attack only meant to kill the soldiers not destroy the structures.

I agree that something monstrous happened: Black's mind control was monstrous, though at least they weren't awake down there. Treachery followed by suicide is still a horrible thing to force on them though.

Attacking the government directly might have been, but that's fair in war, at least.

Quite frankly, this was entirely tame for villains, and was kinder than the entire angel plot, which a hero was responsible for. It probably was kinder than any plot the Lone Swordsman pulled, actually. They're monsters, but I'm more impressed with their restraint than ever before.

Oh, I know that very well. It wasn't what he did, exactly; it was just the utter disregard for human life it showcased. Yes, lots of people die horribly in battles, but this wasn't a battle. This was a means to an end, a showcase of power, and ultimately entirely unnecessary. I'd feel exactly the same if a Hero did the exact same thing against the Legions, but the White Knight showed, in his outrage, more moral fiber than I've seen in most of the story.

M

>ultimately entirely unnecessary

If Black didn't kill those soldiers, they would have killed him, or forced him to retreat. How is that unnecessary?

Tolk

@Not_a_robot you do realise those troops were preparing to get themselves slaughtered in an attempt to kill Black right? You don't even need to consider Wekesa's love for Black when he attacked enemy troops that weren't retreating from such a battle where they are so outclassed; they were advancing instead. Sure, I'll give those troops props for that, because your morale has to stay so high to actually fight a Calamity without a Name. Getting in the middle of that fight seems like a bad idea to me though.

I'm not saying the Calamities aren't Evil, but I am saying that calling Warlock Evil for killing enemy troops also means you should call Good Named magic users Evil when slaughtering enemy troops enmasse.

boballab

Oh dear God, what was done is what happens in a war and that was a battle in a war. Also you want monstrous? That is the God's Above the so called "Good" Gods since they care less what happens to their tools, err I mean heros. Look at what happened to William the Lone Swordsman he was used and abused by an Angel just as all the heros are. The whole of creation that is Calnerna is nothing but a game to the Gods (both above and below) that is why neither side truly wins, it just cycles back and forth and the slaughter just keeps going on and on. Unlike all the fools that came before him on both sides Black realizes this and is trying to break the cycle

Zachary A Sloan

I think the issue in this particular conflict is that it wasn't even accomplishing anything other than "vaguely hoping that boosting Kairos would be good for the Dread Empire, because Malicia said it was a good idea."

Black's biggest weakness is blindly trusting Malicia. The things he decides himself are almost always good ideas that would be a net positive (merging Callow and Praes, killing off the Praes nobility, empowering greenskins, etc).

Euodiachloris

Think about your average Fantasy Epic or Space Opera: now, think about all the green-, blue- or greyskins who get down down as simply mook filler. When you actually look at what happens to them, it's pretty brutal. But, it doesn't matter: they were Bad Guys™ and we don't need to expend worry over what happens to them or those they leave behind. 😊

Bet you wince at '50s Westerns for mowing their horribly caricatured "redskins" down the way they do with the gungho, "Ain't we being gritty but admirably heroic, salt-of-the-earth anti-heroes to look up to for standing against the tides of barbarism?" vibe constantly jabbing you in the ribs when they casually commit genocidal acts against people on-screen. 😊

*just points at most Modern Warfare shooters without adding anything more* Well, Spec Ops: The Line gets a pass. 😊

Or, how about the Ur-epics of White Knights and Scheming Viziers: the romances written about the Crusades. The Song of Roland is horrific when you realise what the merry band of who you're supposed to root for is actually doing to their "vile" enemies simply because most of them are supposed to be heretics (which most aren't: you have to believe in a specific dogma to cast aside or deface the thing before you can technically be a heretic – not believing it from the get-go just makes you of a different faith). <_<

Heroes doing horribly gruesome things to their opponents either for the fun of it or out of sheer pragmatism in warfare goes even further back than Homer. But, it's OK if they do it: they're on Our Side™. 😊

Letouriste

Monstrous? In which way? The death was really quick.way better than ripping their souls or burning them right?

Letouriste

Oh I see.that's the disregard for human life? Wait,wtf???
You talk about warlock here! The very same man dissecting living and dead creature in his lab,inheritor of demon sumoners and often seen playing with souls^^.
Of course they are villain! And don't forget wekesa,assassin,black,ranger and miss gigante are not considered as dangerous than scribe;)

Not a robot

Which is exactly why I am not in a hurry to read an interlude from Scribe's perspective, as I'm pretty sure murder is just a means to an end to her more than anyone else. And yeah, I know he does, but that's Evil on a more... whimsical level.
This is planned and organised for seemingly no other purpose than being as big an bastard as possible. I still like the characters, I still respect them, and I don't hate them for it. I just now realised that, whatever my opinion of them, they are absolute monsters and I get why Good is always so reluctant to work with Evil.

Morgenstern

BTW, the sooner one side stops the other – the sooner this war is ended. Which seems to be exactly what the Calamities are all about. It is rather the OTHER side here that wants eternal war where no one can win, personified in the Role of Bard...

Morgenstern

Uhm. Sorry? Black and Wekesa were doing a PRECISION strike during WAR. Black chided Wekesa on ACCIDENTALLY raising risks to get ANY civilians at the same time (those houses that might have been evacuated or NOT, bc. sb. always stays behind, refusing to go...). It doesn't get any LESS evil, if you're actually in a fantastic war about forces that cannot be made to find a peaceful compromise, because the opposite side is out to effing *kill you*. Letting that band of heroes romp free will kill MORE "simple soldiers" and civilians than anything else.
You seem to be forgetting the part where the Heroes mass-killed the forces of Tyrant without blinking an eye – plus bringing down those fortresses on the very city they are "defending"...
AND inviting Villains to go there. Instead of meeting the Villains out-of-city... Why aren't you speaking of the fact that this band of heroes failed to meet the enemy army BEFORE it could engage the city? It is NOT as if they weren't there already. The whole book started out with the heroes BEING THERE ALREADY. And yet, the Calamities managed to go to that city first, with enough time to implement all those traps before the heroes ever arrived, it would seem.

Somehow those heroes are not very good at planning to spare either soldiers or civilians or they would simply REFUSE to let mere humans take part at all, but put them far, far, FAR away from where the action is likely to take place. Black and Co. do NOT seem likely to go for those humans simply to anger the heroes. They are only going for them *when it makes sense*, when the Heroes *are there and will defend them*, thus draining the Heroes' resources.

And I'm not entirely sure even Tyrant would go for mere humans for sheer laughs. He seems to be very much about going up against HEROES. Even though he might have some package for all the humans laughing at him, being mean to him, or pitying him...

I'm almost sure, that ray of destruction (or whatever it was) that Wekesa cast to cut those soldiers in two was not even meant to actually get the civilians – it was counting on the effing Hero being THERE who can summon a horse to stand in front of them.

Only he didn't do it, the ruthless "hero" molded after their fashion.... Which effectively means that the part of changing the Guideverse into a more real setting is already succeeding. It's definitely not just people like Black or Cat on one side, it has already changed the very (leading) Heroes of this story, too. Only Bard does not seem to realize or want to realize it – or is still counting on turning the wheel back by having this Practical heroes band triumph over Practical Evil only to be met in turn by the Oldschool Evil (which is, as we have already learned, though, *not quite* simple Oldschool anymore, EITHER, so yeah, I personally think Bard is overlooking a few things, just as Akua is and Malicia might be and others are). The Change is Already In Progress. Has been for some time, it would seem.

Morgenstern

Uhm yeah.. that "BTW" comment should have come here, *after* the other one. o_0

Morgenstern

Basically: Both sides don't give each other one tiny scrap in general as long as they are about war and exterminating the other side. Goes to show how horrible war is, but definitely not how horrible at least being practical about it is.

The US so-called precision strikes in war are not that at all in too many cases and that is why they are so horrible, not the other way round. The problem is the defining of any male of fighting age as outright "enemy" instead of actually trying to get the real enemies. They are killing way too many civilians.

I don't see Practical Evil doing that here so far.

Morgenstern

I am not contesting the notion of Warlock (including Apprentice) being uncaring about sentient life and thus "monstrous", what with all the dissecting, trying to break the whole world etc. as in "science, baby – it doesn't care about you and it transcends any morality". Just to prevent someone reading this into my words. 😊

Zachary

The problem is that this war is a really dumb one to get involved in. This isn't really equivalent to something like the Conquest (where forcibly merging Praes and Callow was actually a pretty reasonable thing to do given a deeper understanding of why they keep going to war). They're blindly boosting Evil-aligned Free Cities out of the assumption that this will somehow help hinder Procer.

Basically, more harmful acts require greater justification, and the justification for this military involvement is pretty weak. That being said, there's nothing wrong with their specific acts during the attack.

Vortex

We have seen a lot more sacrificed for less. I would point you to the lone swordsman calling up a rebellion that had zero chance to succeed and gave heiress an opening to unleash a demon of corruption. And then trying to sacrifice a whole city of civilians to an angel of contrition.

stevenneiman

He humanely and efficiently killed enemy combatants who probably would have died from slower wounds if he hadn't. Recall that William was perfectly willing to mind rape thousands of innocents and that Good was willing to put the stamp of approval on him doing so. And that Hanno kills people for the same cause and similar leadership, then claims that he doesn't have any responsibility because he was "just following orders".

This band (except for the Bard) might be pretty decent as heroes go, but don't forget for a moment what their side stands for and who they tolerate as allies.

stevenneiman

Oh and remember that despite his "Just following orders" schtick, Hanno is happy to cut through his own army of foes without even checking them, just because he assumes they aren't important.

Also, remember that the only things he really fights for are tradition and authority, not people for their own sake.

Solaire

@Not_a_robot

I find it redundant that you actually read that far till now just to complain about not liking a Villain doing Villainous things on a story based on Villains.

Also, to point out, many many chapters before, Cat Already pointed out that Black is a monster when he hanged the rebels in front of her, just to show her what villains can do. If you felt uneasy about villain killings, it is more obvious to make a comment to complain at that chapter than here.

Euodiachloris

Seems the walking Role of Trope Enabler which is the Wandering Bard doesn't currently handle subversion or deconstruction all that well...

I think the Calamaties are on to her quite specifically, somehow. And, she might only now be aware of that. 😞

Not\_a\_robot

She hasn't been good with Subversions since the beginning, and that might be the thing she's only now realising.

Morgenstern

As I understood it, she is specifically aware of how they can slap her out of existence for some time by doing it three times over, like Black did when she popped up at the "battle" with the "rebel host" in Callow. They seem to have done that here, too, if I got the insinuation. That might be why she didn't warn the Heroes of the Calamities' coming.

Or maybe the Bard is simply (also) limited to ONLY being allowed to talk of something, when it actually happens / the Bard is sure of the exact circumstances (as she was talking about herself knowing they would come, but not WHEN/WHERE exactly). Maybe she is prevented from talking about it at all, if she can't give the details, but only "vague prophecies". She's not a Prophet, after all, but someone who is defined to "recount" the story.

1shot4living

Perhaps it is a part of her role, as a Bard she can tell the story as its happening or even about to happen to provide a good moment of suspense and such, but providing spoilers would ruin the story?

stevenneiman

I don't think they're after her specifically, but they're trying to kill what she stands for and lives by, which has much the same effect. More so even, given that dying of stab wounds probably wouldn't harm her any more than dying of alcohol poisoning did.

veteranMortal

Why does everyone forget about Scribe?

Pretty sure Scribe is at least as dangerous as the others...

gianoria7

One of the reasons she is so dangerous is that everybody is underestimating her.

This is why she is the most dangerous Calamity.

Morgenstern

"Forget"ing her, I would suppose. Going unnoticed seems to be THE key feature we know about her so far. Goes in line that everyone IS "forgetting" about her. It's one of her Aspects.

Morgenstern

(Or sth. the like.)

erraticerrata

Scribe's not technically a Calamity, though she is affiliated with them. The "official" members are those listed by the Bard.

Morgenstern

Aaaand that too, of course. ^^ But seeing how the question was posed about "forgetting" her... 😊

Morgenstern

I'd wager we can count her as "calamity" lower case, though ^^

stevenneiman

@Morgenstern I would guess something like Fade, for the way that she can fade from the memories or at least the attention of anyone she doesn't want to realize how dangerous she is.

Then maybe something like Manage to allow her to keep on top of so much more than anyone else could handle without missing anything, and I have no idea about her third Aspect. Remember that Aspects are always a verb relating to what the Named himself or herself is doing, and I assure you that the Scribe is not forgetting anything.

Morgenstern

I thought of "Forget" as a command to others, in that case, obviously. You're probably right about it being more about what the person using it does, though. 😊 Thinking how the Tyrant has "Rule" to use it on other/sth. else as one instantly reminded hint. I'd have to re-check the whole books, though, to feel really, really sure. ^^ (Maybe it's all the university studies, but I make rather sure to never take anything for granted, much more so when it comes to assumptions on fictitious works – which do, however, have the great asset of being able to actually be clarified once and for all by the author, should they so wish. For that one story as it is, at least.)

cardizzle

I'm fairly sure Scribe is Assassin.

The quietist

Not so sure myself remember Scribe being amused about how Assassin would be pissed he'd missed some of that cult in the sewers. I can imagine they might be romantically involved though, or at least friends. My only theory about Scribe is that she's Delosi, especially since she mentioned she and Black met in the Free Cities.

cardizzle

I don't remember a sewer cult.

stevenneiman

I rather doubt it. Aside from one key skill (being ignored and underestimated), their Roles and skillsets are very different. Scribe works as an administrator, and her great weapon is her ability to control the Praesi bureaucracy in ways that nobody else can and allow herself and her allies to use the substantial resources of the Dread Empire to deadly effect. She's also a sort of villainous Bard, able to travel wherever she needs to be and see and understand whatever she needs to, but unable to act directly. The difference is that she has that power over the paper trail where the Bard has it over the story.

Assassin's abilities might be equally subtle in their own way, but much more personal and much more direct. Scribe arranges for people to be killed and other things to be done, and Assassin just kills people.

Of course I try not to be too certain about any of this, as the story has come up with plot twists and reveals more surprising than that in the past.

Joebobjoe

They're in bureaucratic hell. Scribe is the most dangerous calamity for where they are.

---

Alright, there's a certain thought that's been bugging me since the dialog about patterns for Praes and Callow as a whole: why Names? The divine interference, while technically unlimited, is shown to target separate individuals, not entire nations or professions. We already know that different species like elves have a different imprint on the Pattern, and that it can affect numerous people at once, so something like more pronounced national stereotypes wouldn't be impossible.

My theory is that the Gods' opinion about what happens in the Creation mostly concerns The Choice That Matters. From the point of view of an average person society as a whole is a pressing, but vague concept, while a charismatic Named can change his ways. Since people trust first and foremost other people, and give the more abstract opinions only as much credit as the one who expresses them, a Named can be as convincing as a close friend or a family member, all without coming in direct contact with the audience, only as a story.

This is why stories are so important for Gods both Above and Below: they describe what sways people's hearts and cliches allow them to predict what will happen next and how it would affect The Choice. Just as Lone Swordsman noted, heroes and villains are meant to inspire, and tropes allow for long-term planning where a broader stereotype would leave more room for interpretation or attract less attention. Emperor Treacherous is exactly the kind of person to win a civil war or a presidential election and grow even more popular for it, despite not being much of a winner in general.

Think about Arcadia, a world shaped more by perception than physics and created to accommodate souls in corporeal form: it's a place where without reality to counterbalance them behavior is enforced by the tropes. A person is exactly as powerful as they are plot-relevant, Arcadia even lives on Webcomic Time (presumably attention-based). It's not a stretch to imagine that outside of it people's choices are being influenced too, especially in the matters of faith.

Yitzi

I have a different theory about the Names: The whole “creation as a cosmic wager” deal reminds me a lot of Eddings’ Belgariad setting, where matters were likewise settled via choices and contests between agents of Light and agents of Dark.
(This is why I find Cat’s position “on the fence” to be extremely interesting.)

Mike E.

Damn, the Calamities are very well-rehearsed working together to have what appears to be a library of contingency plans to be enacted with a simple set of codes. That was insane to read. The POV jumping took a few reads to figure out properly though.

Letouriste

Yeah, the professional feeling is really well made:)

Gunslinger

Holy shit this was epic. I’m a bit disappointed that the heroes all came out alive. Also wekesa was impressive as usual it’s black that really shined. Fucking hell he totally wrecked the white Knight.

maresther23

Captain fought two Named at the same time.

Euodiachloris

She dished out impressive pwnage. Using only one Aspect, and even resorting that one midway.
To all intents and purposes, she may’s well have gone into that fight complaining of backache. 🤪

stevenneiman

In fairness, only one of them was a martial Name and she had to resort to a dangerous trump card to come out on top. Even so, that was awesome.

Gunslinger

Indeed, I guess my disappointment is the same one as Black. The general unfairness of the universe that gives heroes Trump cards.

Letouriste

In all the fight the heroes looked outmaneuvered, so much I expected them to all die...and then you reveal they all still have trump cards:o

And how the hedge magi managed to flee the explosion without using an aspect?

Well,Thanks for the chapter anyway that was good:)

Jonnnney

She said she had a few things left that would defend against giant flaming snakes. I'd imagine those same defenses would work against an explosion.

maresther23

"The first step always works"

Tyrant first step: drill underground

Effect: breach Delos defenses

Black first step: kill the leaders of Delos

Effect: take the city out of the war

Shequi

So... does that initiate a Pattern of Three between Black and White, beginning with a Draw?

The knowledge of how many times a day a Named can call upon their Aspects clearly drives Black's tactics in Named combat.

boballab

"So... does that initiate a Pattern of Three between Black and White, beginning with a Draw?"

No, the Pattern of Three doesn't begin with a draw, it begins with a victory for the Villain and the Hero escapes with his life because the Villain monologues. Remember that is what happened to Cat, she beat William and then didn't kill him, letting him escape. Their second battle ended in a draw and the third ends in William's victory (That is why Cat let her head get chopped off).

Morgenstern

I rather doubt "let" is the correct impression here.

She prepared for the contingency all right, by preparing to be raised and use what she had coming instead of simply going down "doomed" as she was (or rather: seemed!). But it was the skill of Will that lopped it off, not the story, even if you take those "pattern of three" thingy for real (which I can't really do, because the count doesn't add up for me). Also her believing in that pattern and only preparing for defeat, not victory might have shifted things a bit (her going into a DUEL at all, while she know she's not as good as him...), as somebody else said quite a few chapters ago.

Morgenstern

So, in a way, it was also Cat being stupid (plus Will simply being good at fighting)... I don't get why people keep seeing Cat as somehow being OP or too savvy or whatever, as long as she always has those repeatedly grinding-on-the-nerves lapses of good sense, turning events only by a hair's breadth via luck and hilarious-overplanning /-at-the-moment-last-ditches instead of being actually practical.

Solaire

Well, Black is actually "won" over White but he let White go despite having "assured" of victory. This setting is quite similar to Cat's when she let the Lone Swordsman go when she can kill him too.

So there is actually a high possibility of the Pattern of Three happening unless there is some other reason to convince this is otherwise.

boballab

The situations are not the same. The first meeting between Cat and William was single hero vs single villian. This is more similar to Cat and William's second encounter which was a draw: Group of villians vs a group of heros. Keep in mind in that draw a hero did die, so no this wasn't a Black "victory" over White.

NerfContessa

Yep.

Other stories should look at exactly this chapter for epic yet intelligent forces fighting.

Nough said.

Solaire

Either you have not worded it right, or you had simply confused the settings and what is necessary to logically win or lose. Also to note, even though Black and White are fighting in groups, Black vs White and fight each other individually during their battles. Also another note, during Cat's first win over the swordsman, they are not fighting alone too, there are other claimants involved in the battle too.

boballab

You keep missing the obvious: the Black v White fight was planned and fought as nothing more than as a part of a group battle and again is in no way similar to the first Cat v

William fight. Black's whole fight was based on what the others in his group were doing against a group of hero's. Black even states at the end of the fight to Wekesa, there is actually no way for them to win at that point: "Yes," the other villain agreed darkly. "We have them cornered, with all their trump cards left. That is not a story that ends well for us."

If Black had not pulled out at that moment the villains would have been defeated, the best they could get is a Draw.

Now lets look at Cat's first fight with William. Cat wins the fight, William uses his Trump cards early and Cat was not part of a Named Villain team (She was looking for Rebels on her own Book 1 Chapter 11 Sucker Punch) and neither was William part of a Hero Band (He was forming a rebellion in the city), she was working alone and so was William. Hell it was her fight working with William that secured the Name Squire (Book 1 Chapter 12 Squire). As you may have noticed Black already has his name and him and White didn't fight on the same side. Also unlike the fight between Black and White, William was at Cat's mercy and she let him go by pushing him off the wall and into the river just as Black got there. Bottom line the first fight between William and Cat was nothing like the fight between the Calamities and Whites Hero Band.

Now lets look at Cat's second fight with William which was a Draw. Cat enters the fight with Hakram already earning his name (Adjutant) and Warlock and Apprentice already in the city. William had Thief, The Wandering Bard, The Bumbling Conjuror and Hunter (Book 2 Chapter 5 Recognition and Chapter 8 Reversal). The fight starts with 3 Named Villains against 4 Named Heros in Chapter 8 (Warlock isn't in at the beginning). Now here is one of the few differences between the fight we see between the Calamities/White's Band and Cat/William round two: The Hero's attacked the Villains in Cat/William round two and it is the opposite with Black/White and that matters since the attacker in both cases had to retreat and get a Draw or they would have lost. The second difference it that in Cat/William the Hero's stayed too long monologuing and Warlock appeared (a trump over what William was doing) and killed the Bumbling Conjuror forcing the Hero's to run for it and leaving a wounded Hunter to be captured (Spent Hero's/Fresh Calamity). In the Black/White group fight no one died on either side because Black recognized that if they stayed a Hero would use a trump to kill one of them and or get them captured so he wisely didn't banter and retreated. Black didn't make William's mistake from Book 2 Chapter 10 Release that you have been wanting him to make.

I think it might actually have been a loss for Black against Kairos. He was the one on whose account everything actually happened since he gave Black the setup and then forced him back by retreating.

I really do wonder what his game plan is, since his whole backstory of rejecting tradition seems to speak against him blindly following Evil's agenda the way his nephew followed Good's, but at the same time he's spoken out against Malicia's attempts to break the wheel and he acts deliberately cliché.

KageLupus

The Heroic Axiom at the top of this chapter reinforces something I have been thinking for awhile now: The side of Good is chock full of people who hardly count as such at all. The axiom is saying "Be nice to the villain's caged monster, because it will be useful to you if you do so". Not because that monster is imprisoned, or wasn't given a choice, or any other reason you would expect from a Good person. Instead, it just says to be nice because it will be useful. That kind of pragmatism falls into the same grey area that some Villains operate in.

William was a perfect example of this. He was labeled as an Anti-hero for doing things like torturing prisoners just to leave a message. Not for information, not because it was a distasteful thing that had to be done to save the day. He wanted to demoralize and terrorize his enemy and was willing to cross any line to do so. That is the textbook definition of a terrorist. But because he was given a mandate by Heaven he was considered a Hero, regardless of how he acted.

Basically, it feels like everyone in this setting looks at someone like the current Tyrant of Helike and says "That is what a Villain is, and look at how Evil he is. All Villains must be the same." So Catherine gets lumped in to the same bucket as these crazy Villains, even though all she wants is to make things better for her country. She was just as willing to go to war over it as William, but because of which side she started on reality as a whole puts her at a disadvantage.

Morgenstern

Heroic Axiom: I guess more people are also wondering about how "the beast" perfectly fits our formerly "Cursed" and the one treating "it" nicely being Black? Someone seems to have read that book and taken it to heart. 😊

(As far as the backstory that we so far saw is concerned, btw, I can't shake a lingering "smell" of "Peasants Out For Revenge/Retribution" plot, anyway, them taking on any Roles/Names that they can get their hands on... doesn't necessarily always end in a path down the slope. "You're the one who named me evil before I ever did any villainous deed, don't wonder if..." and so on and so forth. "Them" including quite a lot of people, of course, in a world where "Fate" tries to put people in templates that don't quite fit much of any actual person. Stereotypes and labels almost always fall short.)

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Congrats, KL, you have discovered one of the central themes of the story!

Morgenstern

" The heroes that had founded their nation had been rebels fighting the Proceran occupation "

So... one can get Heroes cropping up *against Good*? I mean, we knew already that Good nations will fight against each other, too, but I never quite saw Heroes involved or even cropping up from that. So Heroes against Heroes should also be a thing, too, not just Villain against Villain; basically "anything goes"? Interesting.

stevenneiman

This reminds me of a thought about a setting I'm designing for GURPS.

"When our noble allies of other races fight against the encroaching darkness, that's glorious. But when our petty backwater tyrant makes a land grab against them, that's also glorious."

jonnnney

It has been mentioned by Black that one of the great powers of the world is lead by both a hero and a villain, so yeah anything goes. Good fighting good is how the original Kingdom of Callow came into existence. The Queen of Blades conquering the Duchy of Daoine.

Morgenstern

Captain's stud being visible: BAAAAAD mistake. (No, I haven't read the full chapter yet, but no matter if in this one or some chapters following... the instant-communication having been seen is gonna hurt at one time or another. Might even get *influenced/twisted* instead of just being shut down. Ouch. Very ouchy.)

Morgenstern

update: Seems this will be upcoming. Or the Heroes seriously did not notice and Bard was not there, which would be rather hilarious. But somehow I can't see that not getting used somewhen and ending in Shit Hits The Fan and only scraping by and getting out by hair's breadth, probably even one of them dying because of it.

erraticerrata

You're assuming, of course, that the stud is the actual anchor for the scrying spell.

Morgenstern

I wouldn't necessarily call it an "anchor", but at the very least a kind of "inlet" to meddle. Unless that is just another nice trap like the ones prepared for the Wizard in this chapter, of course *g

Morgenstern

Maybe it's because the thing is so very reminiscent of those tiny in-ears people apply in the real world and I have read too many stories using such real-stuff-into-fantasy-conversions *shrugs

Morgenstern

Many other systems, of course, do not need any actual material for telepathy *shrugs*
It was just the first thing instantly coming to mind. Maybe that's what it's aimed at – more's the fun then for us, when the Heroes should have the same instinct. 😊

Morgenstern

Warning: Massive post incoming.

I'm (obviously) not really good at "cutting it short". Far from it.
So, I did the CONSCIOUS thinking this time, because it bugged me, especially since you yourself reacted to it... thus: clarification incoming. (That is, I HOPE I do not muddle it even worse, but I don't think so.)

Morgenstern

Okay, so I thought it more or less through, far as I got, consciously this time, seeing as you already "jumped on that" and "I still don't quite get it". "it" meaning magic in the Guideverse in more general thinking, too, I guess (or so I feel). 😊

– First and instantly arising question:
What is the actual definition of an "anchor" (in magic) for the Guideverse?

Just anything in terms of physical material to be in specific places one needs for some spells to work? Some integral part of the spell/ritual? (Like Apprentice needing the hearths for the warding spell.)

[With the exclusion of physical materials = ingredients used up by the ritual, of course. It obviously has to be sth. that has to *stay (inviolable)* on the spot or the spell would, seemingly, break (or worse).]

– ** [1] Scrying, the out-of-story considerations to my while-reading-reaction : **

Usually denoted as sth. to actually SEE in(to) other places; spell massiveness defined by 1) how far you scry, 2) the quality of scrying (including other senses as another quality thing possible to add) [as the basic things] and 3) security of scrying, 4) tricks of the trade: what materials, formulae etc. to use to make it safer / less costly [as the additional / optional ones]; and all of that WITHOUT an anchor at the place you want to scry, just using a bowl of water as the most common basic “ingredient” almost everyone knows as a device for scrying from some story. Most stories I know never ever use any anchor for scrying (least of all in the place you want to scry, if anything you have to have been to that place before or know someone there that you scry), although they might use wards to prevent others from scrying back or doing other stuff through your connection (if they detect it, which is always a possibility).

Not sure, if / how / to which extent this “usual definition (by other stories)” applies in/to the Guideverse, seeing how you answered that I am assuming an anchor for *scrying* when I was talking about my first (unconscious) impression). [Some more thoughts on “anchors” in that respect below.]

I can now say, after consciously thinking about it, what (in)formed that *first impression* (without actual thought, just as direct reaction during reading) that cropped up from that – which was actually NOT one of *scrying* (as in the “usual” definition I know) *at all* [ = thus my confusion and still-confused re-comment when you started talking about *scrying* as answer to my comment ] :

1) seeing how the Calamities all TALK to give info to Wekesa what to do where
2) seeing the stud on person (while the other two have sth. to prevent seeing a possible other stud on them, unless I was mistaking Wekesa having long hair over his ears and Black wearing a helmet) [more on that below] = in combination with fact 1)

= adding up to instant reminiscence of those in-ears that professionals in OUR "real" world use 😊 [too many movies? ^^]

Seeing how you answered, that was probably simply a massive mix-up my brain did by connecting two inherently unconnected tidbits of this chapter. *shrugs* It does that sometimes, latching on to wrong things and creating confusion. 😊
(Sidenote: Isn't that what makes for use for surprises by authors all or at least most of the time, if hints are strewn in at all = i.e. when not just relying on readers simply *not knowing*? ^^ The mistaking-/confusing-things I mean.)

*** Further thoughts due to that : ***

– ** [2] If Warlock SAW it all (*)– why the hell would he need any talk by them *at all*? **

( (*) = that's what scrying implies to me (as the first most basic thing you ALWAYS get when scrying, even with the most basic version of the spell) – is it, though, in the Guideverse??

It *did* SEEM to be all about seeing as the first thing judging from the first two books, and then potentially hearing/talking/listening in as the second, but the seeing being there *all the time* as the underlying concept you cannot remove. = If there is no seeing, it is no scrying, but sth. else.)

Secondary notion: Might be because he's not meant to instantly do stuff on his own when he sees fit and informing them, but only acting on requests?

That might fit with actual scrying-as-I-know-it (see term definitions above), i guess.

I still don't *quite* see why they would need those numbers for *that*, hmm....

> Third/Fourth notion:

– Might just be meant to be confusing to enemies... (doesn't "feel" quite right on first look, though, but that might be intended.) Potential hint for that: Some place in the back of my brain seemd to register that some number cropped up at least twice, which just might not make sense at all, that is: if thinking of actual specific mini-regions of the city, denoted before-hand [sorry lacking the correct word/term for that right now... like when you make many parallel and diagonal lines over the map to get tiny spaces?].

– UNLESS, of course, we are speaking about / thinking of simply using clock-numbers meant to designate the direction around the person speaking = no confusion there, totally makes sense.

[back to professionals' method, with a slight twist of not using assumed in-ears for *talking only* ^^ – although i AM wondering then, if there are any actual clocks like we have (they use some other counting for time in the legions at least) and/or how many numbers are on *those* then... or anything else that would serve as idea-giver for that notio. unless you simply denote directions and the start for that at random, starting a normal count from 1 (up to whatever, depending on how many you can think of) at this random starting position.. it just might be sth. intuitive (minus what you choose as starting position), i guess. what's directly in front of you for the start maybe? behind, left and right are rather normal directions on top, fine calibration in between those usual directions being the problem.]

Sidenote -Telepathy:

Misapplied term by me, wrongly coming up in the first confusion due to your coment, when I was scrambling for a term to show I was NOT thinking of scrying at all, sorry. Would have meant the same problem/question(s) cropping up.

I was *thinking* of that D&D spell (also used in many other RPGs/stories, far as I know) that lets you TALK (not *think*) to each other over such-and-such a distance "as if you were standing right next to each other" (so even possible to only whisper). Cannot currently for the life of me remember the name/term for *that* thing. =/

– ** [3] Scrying in general: **

I was, so far, obviously actually of the unconscious impression that scrying did NOT always need magical "anchors", but that such anchors were used to further safeguard the scrying to make it a two-spots-only-connection as far as possible (so that only people at the two spots connected by the "anchors" (e.g. the mirrors used in one example) can see/listen in). Far as I can relate back, if that is a mis(in)formed impression it cropped up due to the scrying on the battlefield of Marchford where there was a room full of the "usual"-seeming bowls of water with a spell on them known from other stories that *simply let you look at something* (probably even without hearing yet?) WITHOUT any anchors needed at the spot to which the image in the water connects. If the mages had to implement anchors in those spots, it either was simply not mentioned (probably in the assumption that we all knew about that by then) or I simply missed it.

> Problem arising if anchors are needed for the most basic version of that: What happens if those anchors are found?

Simply remove such an anchor, influence it, use it... ??
(Are we to assume that there are almost always heavy wards against that? Spells to hide them, that do not themselves crop up on "magical vision" (which would, obviously, defeat the purpose..)?)

– Secondary thoughts to that:

> Shouldn't such anchors BE (normally) find-able by beings who are supposed to be magical ones, potentially able to somehow "sense" magic or be "visual" in their version of seeing, like mages can usually switch their sight to "magical sight" at will in other works? I.e. the anchors being a) magically active and b) part of the ritual/spell?

[where b) brings up the idea for there probably being some way to influence/use this.]

[ For an on the spot notion: I am thinking of at least that one demon as one thing coming to mind. Why did it not notice and attack those anchors, if there WERE anchors, *had to be* by that understanding? Hindered by being in that horse and then "not of import" anymore anyhow? Trying to stay in hiding and not risking being exposed too soon by knocking a few things over as a panicky horse might? There might have been other occasions as well, I'd have to go back first, though, to check. ]

> Or is that simply *not possible* in the Guideverse??
Or at least "not easily", "not by just anyone", but only the VERY highest order of magic(al) users/beings?

= If anchors are absolutely necessary (things on the spot you want to scry) and cannot be more or less easily detected on top, that would be a deviation from what I know of magic in all the other stories ( = thus assume "as the usual" as long as stuff is not pointed out as being different in the Guideverse, either explicitly or by example) and thus probably a case of "you wanna point that out somehow" (in-work or out-of-work) for the reader.

Unless I read all the "wrong" stories (for that), of course.

– ** [4] Captain's stud, other possibilities cropping up as instant ideas: **

– Might just be some personal item (maybe a gift from her husband? or some memory thingy from her past, who knows).

(Which would, thinking of sympathetic magic (what I know of/ as such... if that can be applied to the Guideverse at all), of course still mean it can be used against HER, in the worst version even to control her, if ever acquired by some of their/her enemies.)

– Could be related to her control over “the beast/rage”. Though I personally would rather doubt that, even more so after that story of her defeating a god (lower case) to drag away its knowledge of how to use the rage instead of one’s consciousness being eviscerated by rage’s rampage. Would already doubt it by Black seemingly being able to wake her out of it even before that – although that simply might be something else. No other people so far seemed to be able to do that, after all, in that chapter of her going on rampage.

– Keeping in mind my seemingly-DIFFERENT understanding of “scrying” beforehand, me thinking of an entirely different spell, in my first version (direct reaction while reading) I was not thinking of what I understand a magical “anchor” is, but rather some kind of “enhancer” / “securing ward” to the connection, even more so as an afterthought when thinking about what it could mean if the spell base were scrying and not something else.

I guess my first impression-connection of action-movie “in-ears” just might equal an anchor, though? Not sure... The mind-jump between magical anchor and device for listening is not really easy for me to make, somehow. To me, it feels more like such a device in a magical world would be some far-flung extension of the original spell, NOT a direct part of the spell itself – but still something that one can use. (#)

* Anyway, what I was thinking of back then was more along the lines of the following (assuming it was some more removed device, not an anchor (as far as I understand the term “anchor”)) : *

Especially to simply listen in, of course, assuming someone would take over the post of “observer and tactical director” on the other side, of course. But I was more thinking of tampering with the device to try to turn it into listening in even when they are not consciously using that device to convey anything or use it as sympathetic-link for actually scrying on them or something. Simply listening in and trying to act on it, if you understand the code, is, of course, already doable in a mundane fashion by their opponents as they TALK. Obviously more or less LOUDLY so.

The most extensive usage in that thought, of course, still being tampering with the original spell/ritual via following the link back to its source and potentially modifying it (very, very hard, difficult, time- and energy-consuming, though, I'd have said, but someone just might have what it takes and be perseverant enough),

– e.g. as one basic thought: adding in own, wrong orders that seem to come from one of the people linked that way..

(one might avoid all the hassle of meddling with the spell/ritual at all, if one could get one's hands on the original device directly, was one of my basic ideas, if one has what is needed to POSE as the other person to use it (if a more basic thing: simple voice mimicking should do..); but the same might be done magic-wise, I guess, if one has the juice, knowledge, and experience for it, but why the hassle..)

– OR at least (#) stopping it from working; maybe shielding specific people or regions from being reached that way.

(#) Could likely simply destroy the device for that effect, of course ( = being my very first thought for how to abuse such a device), if you can reach it manually or target it with a destructive spell. Which should already cause some havoc, if someone is suddenly taking out of the connection and thus cut off from the command center, kind of.

Morgenstern

... and I definitely have to go back to Book I, for the very first scrying scene when Cat got an introduction. ^^

I do remember it as being some heavy-duty-scrying bc. of who was talking (and probably in which situation), and sure, that felt like there were "anchors" (or rather wards??) there, but I don't remember it conveying that such had to be there *all the time*, not only for two-way-"holo"-talk-"as if there in person"-with-heavy-security. (#)

Guess I have to revisit the other scrying scenes, too, because they mostly seemed rather different. The pools in the first scene with Black seemed like just another (bigger) way of the mirrors Heiress used – thought it was different from normal, more basic scrying. But after much and much thought something about "the same material" and tiny stones is scraping at the back of my mind... Might be one of those "repeat, repeat, repeat" things, because it's such a long time in between plus going against "the normal"? My memory is not perfect, either, though I do seem to tend to memorize more than other people (or simply other things, who knows...). I guess it's also different if it's your own story versus someone else's. My players on my gaming table *always* remember less than I do – but, then again, I have the whole background, they do not; I know what to focus on, what's really important and what is just diversion – they don't. I guess there is some similarity here to players at a gaming table in that respect when only reading a book, especially if stretched out over a long time (I have never read much web serials so far, this is more or less my first, at least the first I actually kept on reading and didn't drop because of the waits), so that might be just what is happening to me here, right now.

( (#) The latter might fit this here situation, though, come to think of it.

Simply didn't think of that before, though; as I said, I didn't think about it being scrying at all, but just Warlock having made gimmicks so that the others can speak to him and he doesn't need the upkeep of yet another spell (no 2-way-speaking and only speaking, not seeing for those gimmicks), potentially at a price for the lower cost (e.g. security measures, like, I thought so far, scrying in a more basic version; maybe I just got scrying horribly wrong there, clinging to the old known definition that refuses to be thrown out ^^).)

Morgenstern

" Unlike the first one they'd been hit with, this one had been designed to weather a beating instead of being hard to modify. Small favours. No doubt the Warlock already knew she was there, so her window would be very, very small. Huh, this was actually massively strong. She could have unloaded her entire arsenal at this and barely scratched it. Were the villains under the impression she was a slugger kind of mage? "

Yeah, I guess their intelligence service wouldn't be so very bad to not even know her Name that she has been openly addressed with. Hedge wizards are not known for being Archmages, after all. Nice trap, so very inviting to its intended victim. 😊 I'm celebrating this chapter so much right now ^^

" There's five Calamities," Aoede said. "You've met three. One's retired. "

Huh. And people think Villains/Heroes never (much) get to retire, huh?

erraticerrata

Ranger retiring as a Calamity doesn't mean she gave up her Name.

Morgenstern

Huh? Ah. You're talking Name-wise.

I wasn't really thinking of that, here. More of "retiring" (switching ... "jobs"? life-choices etc.) in a more general sense. Yeah, she obviously did not give up her Name. But it would seem to be ever more in evidence that one can switch roles, and probably then even Roles?

Morgenstern

Seeing how Ranger never gave up hunting... that role/Role speculation, too, might simply be a misassociation because of one word, of course. *shrugs

---

Anyway, aren't the speculations half of the fun? 😊 I like how you don't spell things out too openly and mostly avoid direct statements affirming or outright denying anything. 😊

Personally like all of that stuff: surprises because something is incoming that I never anticipated as well as being able to go back and find hints afterwards and also my suspicions being confirmed as true. The best is always a good mix of the three. =)

General disclaimer:

What I do in my comments (besides typo spotting, if the mood strikes me for those) is just some observations and a lot of speculation, simply because I cannot help the thought machinery going ticking on some stuff, even if it's occasionally just some puns incoming 😊 [ My rambling during the last few chapters' comment sections is also just one of "likelihoods" at most and trying to make general comparisons to other stories and stuff I saw go down; I always try to keep an open mind, personally – just because I don't think something likely (even if as in "not likely to persuade me") doesn't mean I don't like the occasional (positive) surprise of someone pulling it off anyway. Only that I'm a sceptic about some things (which still includes a potential of "curious how you would pull that off (potentially including: without xy)").

So in case of author reading in: Take it with a grain of salt, in case you should be reading those, too. I'm more talking to/with other readers (and occasionally even just rambling on on my own to get that whirlwind in my head to slow down a bit (oops)).. in some cases I might simply be procrastinating/relaxing from other stuff by occupying my mind with, well, other stuff than that stuff ^^ > If I shouldn't... just say so. I can always just do it with wordpad in my PC and never post it anywhere..

But it's always nice to get the occasional tidbit/hint (or even diversion ^^) out of the author, of course, just because ^^ Gives me the feeling you care about us, which is heartwarming. =) ]

Stephen R. Marsh

Interesting that both the Tyrant and the other army both betrayed them and left them in the lurch when they could have pressed forward and won.

Morgenstern

Well, Oldschool Evil wants the reputation for themselves, no?

It would also have ruined his “see you later some other time” (or sth. the like), that only works as trope move, if you actually DO leave, not stay and get back into the fray immediately (those chapters seem to be supposed to very much right after one another (#), if the heroes are “in somewhat bad shape already” because of the last move against Tyrant), if he wants to set himself up for a Win over those same heroes and not just losing because of “over-staying” and losing due to “perfectly good win chances”.

( = Probably even the same thing Black saw and thus called the retreat, only Tyrant made his move earlier; Tyrant might even have been at a viewpoint where he could better overlook how the battle was going, if you credit him with enough intelligence to see the same thing coming – not being in the middle of the fray enabling him to simply see this a few moments earlier than Black who was right in the fray).

The other Villains might just say them more as rivals. And Tyrant might just even label them under “those shitty people with so-called empathy”, because they are restrained/practical evil, which also calls for going against them.

Tops, “Villains will always stab Villains in the back, even during fights with Good/Heroes” was recounted in-story as THE ultimate trope for (Oldschool) Evil, for explaining why the heck they always lose. They keep NOT closing ranks during major fights with Good (who seem to *always* close ranks, as soon as Evil gets involved and it isn’t just “bickering” (wars) between Good nations for national reasons, territory/power...).

Which sadly makes for shitty pacing (at first impression / during the first seven chapters), btw, because Cat’s story seems to be months, while these interludes happen in mere days, **it would seem****.

I am quite sure, after this chapter as the utmost stone in the board for that (what with the Calamities' preparations obviously having taken place behind the screen) that there was one big months-long gap between the Tyrant killing diplomats, preparing to attack other cities, and then the flying fortresses plus this one. Problem being that the hints for that are somehow too obscured in the first few interludes, or so I feel. I had to reason out-of-story that it must be so, but the lack of a tiny bit more info during story made itself felt as nuisance factor while reading, because it shunted me out of the story.

Morgenstern

Gack... -.-

" The other Villains might just say them more as rivals. " >
"say" = "see", of course..

ben

Great chapter! The fighting was excellent, but just as much I loved how there were also lore drops all continuing from the words of Heiress at the end of last chapter "it's not about the Names, it's about the Roles."

Like, Black and Wekesa discussing whether something is winnable based on aspect usage, and Aoede pretty much outing herself as The Most Important Hero on the side of good. Because of how she Tells things, including The Story, I feel like defeating her is the ultimate end game if the Calamities and the Empress want to change the story permanently. I hope they and/or Squire manages it because that's going to be impressive to watch.

blitzbasic

"You're a monster, aren't you?" I spoke softly into the night, looking at him from the corner of my eye.

He smiled. "The very worst kind," he replied.

Thank you for reminding us who the bad guys in this story are.

Morgenstern

He. I like how that comment can still be turned both ways. *g

Sad pun: Can't shake the immediate real-world feeling of how simple humans can be the worst kinds of monster..

Morgenstern

Gotta say that whole discussion about war, the "action(s)" that we love in stories, and how did what and what is more horrible, was turning rather “real world” rather quickly. Which, if I’m honest, doesn’t feel like such a good thing. It’s not that we would want such things in real life, now would we...

Somehow I don’t wanna read stories that way. “Action”, war, killing etc. are all interesting in stories, imho, because we KNOW that they are only “in story” and *because* we do not have those things around us right now and *because* the people portrayed as “fatalities” or even “collaterals” are .. well. Not real people. Including not rounding them up to be real people. It would never serve for escapism otherwise. =/

It’s enough if such thoughts crop up in the back of my head during reading. I really don’t *have to* have them come out outright in discussions on top of that and ruining the fun feeling of the story. Guess I’ll stay off the comment section for the next few chapters, this is turning to serious for my taste at the moment; can’t stomach this more than once in a while. It’s not as if we didn’t have actual war looming on the horizon in the real world... I really don’t need the turn into over-dark and bitter in stories on top of that all the while. Sometimes is okay. But not every turn when hilarious (seemingly? made to look-)unrealistic action sequences happen. I thought they were meant to be entertaining and given you some shiver, but an ultimately *pleasurable* one...

Morgenstern

Ehrm... ” and how did what and what is more horrible” -- “how” should have been “who” dammit.

Morgenstern

... and “given” was meant to be “giving” argh.

stevenneiman

Uh, the guy who’s literally using the exact same logic as the nazis tried at the Nuremburg trials to justify his penchant for killing?

Morgenstern

“Just following orders”?

The White Knight then? Or Captain? They obviously both do.. 😊
She even has it as an Aspect... *g

blitzbasic

Following orders is not a bad thing if the people that give the orders are good. The White Knight doesn't follow orders to escape the responsibility of his actions, he does it because he doesn't trust his own judgement to be just.

Morgenstern

Because it cropped up so very much this time (and I ended up clicking on the TV tropes link about this series):

(I will not be reading this for quite a few days, taking a real-world-break from this, but I assuredly WILL come back for answers when I'm in the mood again; I am very much interested in opinions to see what the variety of perception is here, as I think we do have a rather large variety, judging from the discussion this chapter.)

Tofuuu

Great chapter! I've been binge reading this because it's so good. I think i'll be rereading this. Also just a suggestion, could we get like a page for all the quotes? It's hard to remember which chapter to look for them. Not just the start of the chapter quotes some lines are really well delivered too! it sends shivers up my spine I'd be happy with a page dedicated for them.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Geez, at first I was intimidated seeing there are already 100+ comments on today's chapter, but it turns out most of them are from the evil banker Morgenstern.

I was expecting Warlock to die this battle, I thought Akua doomed him when she called him out last interlude.

Euodiachloris

Maybe she would have. Except, she's a little wrong. The guy is highly creative in an area traditional for Warlocks: cheesing the opposition using remote spell-constructs built around nested trolling.

Seriously, that was some epic-level, dangerously arcane Heath Robinsonism he had going on there. Sheer artistry. 😊

jonnnney

Akua effectively stole his role in the Empire of Praes. Specifically the creator of evil wonders. I think she was successful because Warlock doesn't seek to destroy the good half of creation. Rather he seeks to understand, manipulate and then break all of creation. I think the Apprentice said it best in Chapter 37:

"Fuck the Gods," he said, calmly. "Every single one of them. I can respect what you and Uncle Amadeus are trying to accomplish, I really can – but you're looking at the other prisoners, when you should be looking at the bars."

I think this is the main thing that Diabolist fails to realize. Most Villains are champions of the Gods Below in a war against half of creation. The Calamities and their successors aren't just being evil in a different way. They are fighting to change the base concepts/assumptions of the war and by doing so they are challenging all of creation, not just the good. This empowers them to achieve what few other villains have accomplished, but it leaves the traditional Praes roles open for others.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Appellant (n), law: a person who applies to a higher court for a reversal of the decision of a lower court.

I thought that was pretty unsubtle, but I'm not actually sure how it applies to the chapter.

Nafram

Well, is it just me, or did Black just set up a Pattern of 3 in his favour?

Considering that the Calamities went there with the express purpose of killing the heroes, which they completely failed, revealed themselves and some of their capabilities, failed to take the city as a secondary objective AND we're back stabbed by their allies, not to mention that they lost the element of surprise and failed to ensure that Delos left the war, with Black even outright saying that it was impossible to win that?

In short, the Calamities, while impressive and shown to be superior to the Hanging of Heroes they faced, failed to accomplish any of their objectives and lost key advantages, while the Heroes successfully repelled the surprise attack without any Hero casualty nor any permanent wounds and now aware that the Calamities are there and that they assassinated some key members of the Secretariat.

Clearly, this was a loss for the Calamities

Solaire

Now that you have said it, I am actually disappointed that how impressed everyone were at the Calamities despite their obvious unsuccessful attempts.

nobodi12

what was that thing about the coin? The one in White Knight hand?

Cap'n Smurfy

He uses it to judge people Two-face style. See his previous interlude for details.

Shawn Panzegraf

Here's a fundamental question I'd really love to see answered. In the Guide Prologue, the two Factions of the Divine later identified with "Good" and "Evil" respectively are spoken of in equal terms. It states all out conflict between them would have wiped out Creation. Then goes on to state both sides willingness to engage in the Wager thought of as "Fate."

We fast-forward a bit, and certain grooves get carved into Creation through the repetition of these patterns. From these recurrent pattern/grooves, we get Names/Roles.

So, how did we start from a point of relative equality between Good and Evil, and then end up where Good gets all the OP-reality cheats. All the narrative-defying miracles, and assists from the upper echelons of their pantheon?

From the way Black and Malicia burn to create an example to the Heroes of a time when being Good JUST WASN'T ENOUGH, we're given as the audience to understand that if it hasn't always been this way, it's been this way for so long that even accessible scholastic resources don't tell of a time when the metaphysical shoe was on the other foot.

Why does Good default to the more powerful position? To keep with theme, one would expect for every Angel who interferes to create a Hero, an Arch-Devil would be doing the same with Villains. Did the Gods Below almost immediately decide they didn't care if Good swallowed Creation?

I mean the One Choice that Matters itself can get heavily skewed. Many people with the will and the inherent personal moral ambiguity to go either Hero or Villain could easily be swayed to the side of Good not because they believe in Good, but because Good clearly has more and more consistent advantages to hand its followers.

I adore the Guide. I'm Team New Evil all the way. Yet a lot of times when I look at the story and think of a Yin/Yang symbol, visually it feels like instead of being equal spirals, in the Guide the White Spiral would be 66.6% of the material, and the Black Spiral the remaining 33.333%

I don't get why Good gets to alter reality willy nilly. (Now they're packing hundreds of Doctor Who-like incarnations in the White Knight's head to make up for the disparity in skill, talent and experience.)

If, every time Evil pulls itself up a rung with huge effort, by dint of special individuals of enormous commitment and will. Good gets to pack hundreds of unearned lifetimes of experience into a White Knight who is the quintessential Villain and just doesn't know it. How does the Wager ever resolve in anything but lasting victory for Good...eventually?

I mean I could understand if there'd been an epoch sometime thousands of years prior, where for centuries Good got the short stick from reality. It'd be cyclical. Symmetrical even.

Either way, it won't dampen my love for the Guide. Adored this last chapter. Just something that's been gnawing at me a long while.

Barthumphries

Because most people don't like tragic stories. By and large, they don't sell. So any story worth telling basically has to allow good to win, in some way.

"So, how did we start from a point of relative equality between Good and Evil, and then end up where Good gets all the OP-reality cheats."

Because otherwise Evil wouldn't deserve to win.

nick012000

Because the Evil gods were about people being free to follow their own path, while the Good gods were about people following their will. It then logically follows that the followers of Good are then subject to much more interference and receive much more support than the followers of Evil – if the Evil gods interfered like that, they'd be undermining their own positions.

Solaire

@Shawn Panzegraf

Damn, now that you said it, it almost made good in general seems like the old school evil where "the wonders of evil" still exist. This almost made me thought that Black is planning to do something like that, by turning good to seem like something evil.

Phantom Renegade

Keep in mind everything I'm about to say comes from a feeling that I can't quite put to rational argument.

I feel there is a balance but it's an asymmetric one. Consider Praes in all its previous iterations, a Dread Emperor(ess) rises to power, creates a evil wonder, no doubt draining the empire of many of its resources, uses it to get some early victories and then inevitably gets turned back by the forces of Good or backstabbed or something like that.

How did Praes not get itself completely eradicated by the forces of Good when it's always putting itself in a vulnerable position?

There must be some dynamic of characteristics between Good and Evil that allows this ebb and flow to continue unimpeded, it might be that on average Villains are more competent than Heroes and so heroes need the divine intervention to even things out, in fact Villains Wonders might themselves be the counterpoint to the Heroes' divine intervention.

It might also be that Evil is more inherently alluring than Good thus ensuring that Evil's ranks are replenished faster and would kind of be in theme with there being an endless number of devils and demons but a fixed number of angels.

Also considering your argument of:

"Many people with the will and the inherent personal moral ambiguity to go either Hero or Villain could easily be swayed to the side of Good not because they believe in Good, but because Good clearly has more and more consistent advantages to hand its followers."

It might be that in the Tropes being enforced by creation a person who decides to go to the side of Good not because they believe it is the right thing but rather because it afforded him or her more advantages would actually be pushed into the side of Evil.

Either way it might simply be that the balance feels skewed because we are reading from the PoV of Villains when they are in a high point and thus constantly at risk of being overthrown by Good. It'd probably feel the other way around if we were reading from the PoV of a Hero claimant who kept surviving by the skin of its teeth in Praes occupied Callow, dodging plots deadly plots from the Calamities and Scribe that keep popping up left and right.

BarthHumphries

Because Good always quits early.

Think of every heroic movie you've seen or book that you've read. The evil kingdom has risen up, and Good goes and cuts off the head of the snake (sometimes literally, sometimes metaphorically). Then they rejoice and go home, able to live their lives in peace. Only that doesn't really eradicate the evil kingdom. And it may be more of a detente than a peace.

For instance, take Russia and the USA after WW2. Even after the wall fell, and we became good friends, is there anyone who doubts that Putin would invade the US in a heartbeat if he thought he could get away with it? No, of course not. Well, maybe Trump, but I digress.

Kylen

I personally enjoyed this chapter silly for showing a MUCH higher level of power and skill than we're used to seeing. It shows you the playing field BK and associates are playing on, which is leagues from Kat and Co.

Shawn Panzegraf

I get that the Gods Below were about mortals choosing their own direction, as opposed to those Above believing mortals "needed to be lead to greater things."

That said, the Gods Below making firepower available to Villains those chose to seek it wouldn't at all undermine their position IMHO. If the Villain(s) made the choice without any interference from the Gods Below to seek and gain power from them, that Villain would still be acting as a free moral agent (What they espoused in the beginning.)

As for the PoV being different if we were watching a Hero narrowly survive in Evil-dominant Callow, the parallel doesn't work. ALL Heroes are given strength, talents and resources that handily trump their Villainous counterparts.

Likewise for the argument that Evil may be Quantitative while Good is Qualitative: If such were the case individual choice would be largely irrelevant. It wouldn't have taken this long for mortals to catch on that the Heavens are always going to cheat while the Hells lie largely quiescent.

I'm totally for Good having its own advantages, but this "Creation itself is out to get all Villains" takes it a bit far IMHO. Again, it's like the Gods Below are utterly indifferent to their own cause. Could also understand if they didn't lend support in anything like the same ways, but did lend it.

At one point Good and Evil were only deterred from direct conflict by the certain knowledge total destruction would result. So now we have the following situation:

Good and Evil each choose one chess player of amateur skill. Good puts an earpiece in their player's ear, allowing a concealed chess grandmaster to coach the amateur playing for Good. Evil sees this, but Its response is to allow the game to continue as-is, good-cheating included.

I guess what I'm ultimately saying is this: DESPITE his hundreds of Time Chamber-granted incarnations, the White Knight was still losing out, so great was the skill disparity. STILL the world-narrative saves him. Cheat Mode+ wasn't enough, but Good pulls it out anyways.

How does that say anything meaningful about the choices made by Hanno, Champion, Hedge Mage and Ashen Priestess? With everything handed to them, plus genre-savviness supplying them with outs regularly, where's the downside in their Roles? It's less Heroes V. Villains and more Villains Vs. A Creation Hostile to Them, with Heroes nothing more than the equivalents of white blood cells.

It makes it that much harder to feel like the Villainous achievements matter, when its clear there is absolutely no upper limit as to what the Heavens will endow their tools with the continue enforcement of the status quo.

If it's about the narrative in a meta-sense, the world would be inherently Evil-slanted. Look at Cordelia (First Prince of Procer) own situation. Even after she proved the Pravis Bank was of Praesi origin, her peers kept going to it for gold to continue the civil war.

alegio

Daaaaaaaaaamn dude! With this I am now scared of the calamities, not because of their powers but that sheer efficiency with which they fought the heroes. Blacks fighting style is the most ruthless thing I have ever seen, the white knight said so himself, he was stronger but black was using his name in a more efficient way.

And this is why black will always be my favorite villian.

arancahtar

Damn. Watching the Calamities from the other side is terrifying.

Captain Napalm

Believe the hype. That was amazing.

cmonman

Hard to take the White Knight as seriously as Black when he has an aspect as limited and ineffectual as Ride. A good name-powered-leg-jump could avoid that as easily as Black's shadow trick. And so could numerous other things for that matter.

Cestarian

I don't why web novels always do this, but I fucking hate interludes, and placing them to create a cliffhanger is an insult to all your readers, placing more than 1 in a row is also an insult. I don't know what moron first thought of this, but it's a hell of a good way to get people to skip over chapters out of annoyance.

The Occupant

I like these heroes. Unlike Willy most of the time (freeing the slaves soldiers was one of the exceptions) they actually act pretty heroic.

Poetically Psychotic

That was fun.

Levi Kalden

Heroes are fkn anoiing they won't die

vuthuha912

Great chapter. It was fun.

Even when I know that proxy wars are a part of warfare, it is very tiring to see.

The first attack while terrifying, has some problems. To start, you show your hand too early, when you strike, you should aim to finish off the opponent with overwhelming strength immediately so that they aren't prepared. The next fight is going to be hell as the opponents have time to prepare better.

If the army is retreating then this is not a band of heroes being cornered anymore, can't we just try to kill one of them, please? Hanno is lying right there, it is weird that you don't cut his head off immediately. This is a classic horror movie character mistake. You double tap.

Just one attempt at killing your opponents is not great, send multiple. It is vital in war that you keep your opponents on their feet so that they're mentally pushed to the breaking point.

Lynn

i've always thought it was such bullshit that hero's are so blatantly favored by the gods and names over villains, but now, after seeing that, i'm beginning to think they need such favoritism to make things a fair fight. what villains lack in raw power and support from godly beings, they make up for in skill, cunning, and smarts. it was fun to see the calamities at work.

Chapter 8: Lies

"Invading? Good Gods, of course not. We're merely manoeuvring."
-Dread Empress Sinistra II "the Coy", after being hailed by the garrison of Summerholm

Archer hadn't changed at all since I last saw her. Fine white chainmail went down from her throat to her knees, splitting in a skirt. Over it she wore a long leather coat that came up in a hood that was currently down. The dark green linen she'd covered her face with last time had not been brought up, leaving open her exotic dark ochre face and hazelnut eyes. Only people across the Tyrian Sea had that skin tone: not the Baalites or the Yan Tei but those from some faraway land whose inhabitants were known only as the tigermen. The pair of longknives at her hips were sheathed and her ridiculously large longbow still strapped to her back, along with a quiver full of arrows closer in size and thickness to javelins than anything else. Even under the armour faint curves could be glimpsed, and there was no denying she was almost as good-looking as she thought she was.

"Lady Archer," Hakram greeted her respectfully.

She'd pretty much mauled him effortlessly on their first encounter, which tended to leave positive impression on orcs. I brushed off Archer's arm, frowning at her.

"Why are you here?" I asked.

She ignored me, to my irritation. Huh. I wasn't used to people doing that anymore. Whether they were my enemies or my friends, everyone paid attention when I glared these days. That had a way of happening when you'd killed as many people as I had.

"Sweetcheeks," she grinned at Masego. "How are we?"

"Less than pleased by the appellation," Apprentice replied.

"It's a compliment," she assured him.

"Stop verbally molesting my people and answer the question," I said.

She glanced at me, still grinning.

"What's the magic word?" she prompted.

For a heartbeat, I seriously debated ordering Masego to cast something on her. Nothing lethal, just unpleasant. Her hair turning into snakes, maybe. Would that be magic enough for her? Ultimately I sighed. This wasn't worth getting into a pissing match for.

"Please," I said.

"Well, since you asked nicely," Archer shrugged. "I was headed for your little city – what's it called again, Marching, Mossboard? – when I spied with my little eye a bunch of very lost villains."

She knew what the name was, I thought, meeting her eyes. She knew I knew she knew what the name was. She was just pulling my strings because she could. It was good to know that even if the better part of a year had passed she was still a major pain in my ass.

"You are the poison ivy of people," I told her. "Why were you headed for Marchford?"

"Your boss called in her marker for the Hunter incident," Archer replied. "Asked Lady Ranger to send a fae expert."

I smiled thinly.

"So where are they?" I said.

Hakram snorted. Masego looked like he wanted to inform me Archer was the expert even if he knew I was being sarcastic, but barely managed not to.

"That's hurtful, it is," she said, sounding pleased. "My turn to ask the questions then. Why in the all the bloody Hells are you lot this deep in Arcadia?"

I blinked.

"How deep are we, exactly?" Masego asked.

"Not as deep as yo could be, sweetcheeks," Archer replied without missing a beat, wagging her eyebrows. "But to put it in laymen's terms, you're pretty close to Skade."

"The seat of the Winter Court," Apprentice said, sounding surprised. "That shouldn't be possible, we haven't wandered long enough."

"This place seems to have a very loose definition of possible," Hakram grunted.

"The orc gets it," Archer said.

"There's rules even in Arcadia," Masego said flatly.

"The rules in this neck of the woods are whatever the King of Winter says they are," the woman shrugged.

"The implication being that the King wants us in Skade," I said quietly. "That's going to end well."

"Yeah, I meant to ask," Archer said. "What did you guys do to piss off the Winter Court? Did you abduct some of their people?"

"We didn't do anything," I complained. "They just showed up one day, started invading my city and got really condescending about not telling me why."

Archer rolled her eyes.

"A few warbands is hardly an invasion," she said.

"Squire's not exaggerating," Hakram said. "They've stated their intention is to conquer Marchford."

The ochre-skinned woman raised an eyebrow.

"That's... unprecedented, as far as I know," she said. "Fae mess around with mortals outside Arcadia all the time, but they don't stay there as a rule. Are you sure you didn't piss them off somehow?"

"I honestly can't think of a way I would have," I replied.

"Huh," she said. "Well, you're still lucky in a way. You're stuck with Winter and they're shit at fighting. Whatever poor bastard is stuck with Summer is in for a rough ride."

"The ones I've fought so far weren't pushovers," I said.

"If you'd been in a scrap with the host of High Noon you'd have a lot more holes in your armour, Squire, and they'd still be smoking," she said. "Summer's the season of war. They always win the round against Winter if it gets to a pitched battle."

Ah, the familiar feeling of being in over my head and yet still glimpsing another peril over the horizon that would be even worse. I was depressing how used to that I'd gotten.

"That's a nightmare for another night," I said. "If you were headed for Marchford then you know a way out of here?"

"Sure," Archer said, and pointed towards the city.

It was still insolently glistening, but at least I had a name for it: Skade. It was also apparently the seat of the Winter Court, so the way my instincts had been screaming trap, trap, this is a trap was once again justified.

"Do you have a way out that doesn't involve us dying painfully?" I asked.

"I was headed towards a gate before I saw the lot of you," Archer said, "but that's meaningless now. This close to Skade we're going wherever the King wants us to go."

"So if we walk in the other direction..." Hakram said, trailing off.

"We'll get back here in a few hours," she said. "Though if he's pulling that sort of stuff at least he'd not meddling with time."

I sighed. Was I ever going to meet some sort of all-powerful creature that wasn't a real prick about it?

"So to Skade we go," I grunted.

Archer nodded.

"Better keep off the road," she said. "Otherwise they'll see us coming. Wait until night time and try to sneak through?"

I clenched my fingers, then unclenched them.

"We're taking the road," I said. "Apprentice, you have parchment and ink?"

"Oh thank the Gods," Masego muttered, then cleared his throat. "Yes, I do."

"We're going to caught pretty early," Archer pointed out.

"Caught?" I smiled. "Why, we're not hiding. We were, after all, invited."

About an hour in we ran into a hunting party. Not in the sense that they were hunting for us, but in the way that Callowan nobles hunted deer and rabbit. There were a dozen fae, all mounted on too-perfect white horses, but among those only four mattered. Two men and two women, colourfully dressed where the others were in drab blue-grey and armour. The nobles – for I was relatively certain that was what they were – immediately took the lead and diverted their party towards us. Of them the first to speak was a man dressed in a tunic of woven shade and starlight which hurt to look at if I did it for too long. My companions spread out warily, but as I'd told them to did not reach for their weapons.

"Well well well," the noble began. "What have we--"

"Finally," I interrupted. "You there, the ugly one. Dismount immediately and give me your horse."

I was careful not to point at any guard in particular, letting them decide among themselves exactly who I'd been speaking to. There was a flicker of surprise across all their faces. This was not, it seemed, going the way they'd thought it would. Good.

"Pardon me," the man said. "But what did you just say?"

"I ordered your attendant to give me his horse," I corrected haughtily. "I have to say, the reception so far has been most disappointing. I expected envoys to meet us at the border, not for us to have to walk like peasants."

"You are mortals," one of the ladies said, tone bemused.

"I am the Lady of Marchford," I sneered. "Here at the personal invitation of the King of Winter. Obviously you were sent to welcome us, so surrender horses for myself and my retinue. We've wasted enough time."

There was a heartbeat of silence as they all stared at me. I offered back my best impression of Heiress, silently conveying that to such a hallowed personage as myself their mere presence was almost offensive. One of the ladies smiled, her teeth looking more like a crescent moon than bone.

"We welcome you to Arcadia Resplendent, Lady of Marchford," she said. "I am the Marchioness of the Northern Wind. Please forgive the manners of my uncouth companions."

"There is nothing to forgive," I said, my frown heavily implying that there was.

"It will be our pleasure to escort you, my lady," the man who'd not spoken added. "Though it pains me to be so direct, may we see the King's invitation? Since Winter has gone to war, none are allowed to wander without one."

"Of course," I replied dismissively. "Servant, show them the invitation."

I gestured at Archer, who raised a mutinous eyebrow at me.

"Do not tarry, sullen wench," I said, savouring every syllable. "Or it's a smart blow to the ear for you."

She glared at me and grit her teeth but took out the folded sheet of parchment, handing it to a guard. Said guard rode closer to the nobles and presented it. They looked at the parchment, then at us, then to the parchment again. It was fake, of course. I'd known it would be pointless to try to forge something that would pass muster, since we had no idea if invitations like that even existed and what they would look like if they did. So I'd gone the other way and made it a ridiculously obvious fake. It was even signed 'the King of Winter', since none of us knew what his actual name was. I could see the nobles wanted to immediately call us out on it, but they hesitated. I smothered a grin. It was just like dealing with Praesi. It was a transparent lie, so naturally there had to be something they were missing. Was it a trap aimed at them, perhaps? A true invitation made to look like a fake so they would offend and give pretext for execution?

"This is a false invitation," the first fae to have spoken finally said, tone wary.

My companions stirred, preparing for a fight, but I'd bluffed with thoroughly empty hands often enough to know not to react.

"Aleban, don't be obtuse," the Marchioness laughed. "Of course it's true, look at the signature."

Aleban looked about to protest, then his eyes suddenly narrowed at the Marchioness. The other male fae began to grin nastily and the other woman steered her horse subtly away.

"Since the Marchioness of the Northern Wind states it is true, then it must be," he said sneeringly. "I am sure His Grace will be pleased when you bring them to him for audience."

"Oh, I would never dare overstep my station in this manner," the Marchioness smiled. "The Lady of Cracking Ice is the darling of the Court, surely her hand is best suited for this task."

Said Lady had been the one edging away and even as her face went thunderous as the sudden swerve in conversation I could not help but notice she was quite stunning. Most fae were subtly wrong, with faces too narrow and eyes too large, but this one was outright ethereal. I was almost reminded of Kilian by the cast of her face, though she had sharper cheekbones and paler skin than my lover.

"I simply could not claim this privilege in the face of so many nobles of superior rank," the Lady demurred. "The Baron of Blue Lights humbled us all with his singing last night, surely introducing such hallowed guests would be another feather to his cap."

"You are too kind, my lady," the fae who'd been grinning replied smoothly. "I am but a paltry courtier compared to the might that is the Duke of Sudden Rime. Would it not be best for him to have this honour?"

Aleban, who was apparently a duke, smiled serenely.

"You are too humble, my good Baron," he said. "No one but you is a match for this task. Do you not agree, Marchioness?"

"Oh, most definitely," she said, deploying a fan of pure ivory with a flick of the wrist and hiding her vicious smile.

"It is agreed, then," the Lady of Cracking Ice murmured.

See, that was my favourite part of dealing with schemers. They always thought too deeply, and when it made them uncertain they immediately began passing the potential backfire to someone else. Fae were supposed to be the trickiest creatures in existence: if there was even a speck of uncertainty they'd make sure none of the fallout could mar the hem of their dress. We weren't out of the pit yet, of course. Even if they went along with it now that didn't mean they wouldn't turn their cloaks the moment we entered Skade and claim they'd been toying with us all along. Got us in the city, though, and that was the first step.

"All of you show me such favour," the Baron said calmly. "I will not soon forget it, I assure you."

The guard returned the 'invitation' to Archer, who looked like she really wanted to stab someone in the face. I hid my glee behind a dignified façade. Ignore me, would she? My vengeance would be as swift as it was petty. Our escort ordered guards to dismount and I paused a moment when I realized that unlike mortal riders, none of them used spurs or even a saddle. There was just a beautiful silk blanket. Not using the horse for a getaway then, I thought. I was a more than decant rider these days, but I'd never tried it without a saddle. My companions mounted after I did, with varying degrees of success. Hakram was pleased his horse hadn't begun blindly panicking the moment he approached and Archer was a better rider than me by the looks of it. Masego, on the other hand, was hugging his mount's flanks and looking pale.

"Apprentice," I said, bringing my mount to his side.

"This is unnatural," he muttered back. "Mages walk or fly. This horse business is just asking for a broken neck."

"Sounds like you've got it under control," I lied.

"Is there an issue, Lady of Marchford?" the Baron asked.

I smiled blandly.

"None at all," I said. "By all means, my lord baron, take us to Skade."

"It will be my pleasure," the fae replied darkly, to the amusement of the other nobles.

We set out down the road, the fairies leading the way, and Archer rode closer to me.

"Sullen wench?" she hissed.

"You're right," I replied pensively. "That was a bit much. I take back the sullen."

I'd seen quite a few beautiful places, in my time.

I'd seen the Silver Lake under moonlight, when it was most deserving of its name. I'd seen the royal palace of Laure, stone and tapestry and centuries of power. I'd walked the halls of the Tower, where opulence was a given and horror lurked behind every drape. Even the Wasteland had been beautiful in its own harsh way, flickering from storm to blinding sun in the span of a bell. None of them held a candle to Skade. Arcadia was not Creation, and so not bound by its rules. The Winter Court had taken this to heart when it had built its seat. Archways carved from snowstorms, streets made of solid glistening water and even auroras turned into lanterns: it was madness, but a madness utterly bewitching. I could see trees made of ice with leaves of stone that shook in the breeze, bridges of mist linking towers that were solid a moment and gone the next. The gate into Skade was an archway of ever-shifting ice, a high relief that changed the stories it depicted with every look. And in front of it, in two unmoving rows, stood Swords of Waning Day. The same soldiers I'd fought in Marchford, made a silent honour guard. Our party rode up a gentle slope, headed for avenues inside.

Then the first soldiers unsheathed their swords.

For a moment I panicked, but kept my face calm. If this came to a fight we weren't making it out alive: Hakram and I had struggled enough with two, two hundred were far beyond our capacity to handle. Any notion they were taking those out for a salute was dismissed when they turned towards us. No, I noticed after a moment. Not us. Archer. Who did not look particularly surprised.

"Soldiers, what is the meaning of this?" the Duke of Sudden Rime asked.

"This one smells of the Darkest Night," one replied, pointing his sword at Archer.

The woman cleared her throat, gave me a sideways look.

"The Lady of the Lake has visited Skade in the past," she said. "She, uh, might have left an impression."

The deadwood soldiers hissed like angry cats when she mentioned the Ranger's title. From the corner of my eye I could see the fae nobles exchanging glances. They looked surprised, then cast very wary looks in my direction. Oh, right. I'd called a pupil of the Ranger a sullen wench and threatened to slap her around. They had to be wondering who the Hells I was to be able to get away with that. I smiled prettily in their direction, which seemed to unsettle them even more.

"She's with me," I said. "And will not fight unless provoked."

"Her mistress took the Prince of Nightfall's eye and set it on a ring," the soldier barked.

"It makes for very tasteful jewellery, if that's any consolation," Archer said.

"So this is what dying stupidly feels like," Hakram mused.

"I'm sure Lady Ranger will give it back if he asks nicely," I lied. "Regardless, Archer is part of my retinue. She is not to be touched."

"Who are you to-" the soldier began, before a fracture line ran along the length of his body.

His eyes widened, then he fell into a shower of shards.

"I am bored with this interlude," the Lady of Cracking Ice said. "Shall we proceed?"

We did, and the soldiers gave us a wide berth. I leaned towards Archer.

"And Summer is worse?" I asked.

"Way worse," she said grimly, then lowered her voice. "So we're in the city. What's the plan now?"

"The situation is fluid," I replied. "We're keeping our options open."

"I was afraid you'd say that," Hakram cursed.

I smiled winningly at my companions.

I like this. Nice to see Cat is learning that she can't solve all of her problems with a direct fight. Seems to be a theme of adopting the skills of her enemies and turning it against them,

She always been like that:/ remember the time she talked with Something about arrogant elves playing along with a Villain is just highly entertaining. And the pettiness Cat has towards Archer makes it even better.

Necro posting!

Small correction. These are Fey, not Elves. The Fey are not of Creation but Arcadia. The Elves on the other hand are of Creation. They are not really related. Hye, also known as Ranger and The Lady of the Lake, is half Elven, while Killian is a quarter (or was it an eighth?) Fey.

Is Cat actually hoaxing the Fae?

Okay, I can't really see that ending in any good way at all.
Well, it's awesome, so who cares 😊

I wonder if they're actually going to meet the WInter King.
And how he will react to the fact that he "invited" the Squire..

Summer is way worse than Winter.

...
I don't know why, but this revelation makes me happy.

Letouriste

This is the thing with villain;) always marching to their obvious death and miraculously surviving with a defiantly one liner...looks like a lot like heroes like that.

Rey d`Tutto

Fae are neither Good or Evil, it's more Hot vs Cold/Orange v Blue.

jonnnney

The Winter King did invite them. They are going to Skade because the King of Winter wants them to go to Skade. He didn't use a written invitation, but he also didn't give them a choice.

Cat is hoaxing the Fae that are currently guiding her. I'm guessing she is trying to find a way to play the part in a story that has a happy ending.

The names of the group are Squire, Adjutant, Apprentice, and Archer so she could pull off the part of a group of heroes fighting in defense of their kingdom.

The King of Winter declared war on Marchford and then "invited" the countess to his court. This could easily lead to a peace treaty or joining together in a war against Summer. She is the Queen of Callow so she could increase the size of the Wanning Wood or give the fae access to a certain Duchy in the north that is trying to make a fuss over being ruled by her.

The fae are bound to their roles in the story, Cat isn't. It shouldn't be too hard for her to find a role that suits her.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Is it weird that they would euphemise "please" with "the magic word" in this world, where there are so many other, more prominent & usually dangerous ACTUAL magic words? It seems like a tragic accident just waiting to happen. Imagine asking Masego to say the magic word. There's no telling what hell he'll unleash!

Tolk

Lmao. Winter's weaker and Summer's stronger? So that's a "weaker" Fae noble? GG guys, they're done for.

stevenneiman

I think that the Winter Court is more prone towards scheming and the Summer Court is more prone towards direct violence. They seem to have a connection to Good and Evil, and it is generally the role of villains to scheme and plan behind the scenes only to be foiled when their schemes come to fruition and the think themselves ready to face the heroes on the field of battle.

Unoriginal

Bavarian Fire Drill combined with gigantic ovaries seems to work on the fey. Wellllll, time for things to go horribly w-right.

fp

This chapter was especially amazing. I was laughing pretty much the whole time.

Barrendur

*These* elves strike a deeply familiar and authentic chord for me. I'm an English-born American, and the Summer and Winter Courts of Faery are something I recognise from folklore, fantasy and fragments. They aren't the chauvinistic, androgenous beauties of Tolkien's world, largely indifferent to the doings of the Younger Races – no, these are the faery queens of 'Tam Lin' and 'La Belle Dame Sans Merci', and murdering knights like Long Lankin, eerie and sinister figures intensely interested in humans... usually to the humans' cost. These elves emerge from under the hill on All Hallows Eve, or from amongst the standing stones to carry off fair young men and women, or murder babes in their cradles. Several 1970s (and later) English bands released songs based on, inspired by or created whole-cloth from ancient legends of the sorts of elves Erraticerrata is depicting: Steeleye Span, Fairport Convention, Jethro Tull and Tempest. It's worth checking for bands and songs on YouTube.

Letouriste

Well in fantasy we call them "fae" And not elves, they are distincts and often present in...non American fantasy(yeah America pretty much kill folklore of others countries so this is always elves, dwarfs and dragon everywhere)

danh3107

They're distinct in present in American fiction too, you know, like this story.

Letouriste

Thanks for the chapter :) read this while listening some valse for the first time in years, really fitting ^^

cdos93

Ballsy move Cat.

This... this is the kind of logic which results in cities being taken with nothing but donkeys and copious amounts of alcohol.

stevenneiman

And the other Calamities never shutting up about it.

Ishot4living

You think if we Beg the Author he'll have Cat get hilariously drunk while winning this?

Kai Merah

Oh, good lord, I love Cat. So very, very much. Was grinning madly this entire update.

Unmaker

So the way to get to fae is to use the 'big lie' technique? Surely they have used that before, being the master manipulators they are.

Ed

I think it's more "tie them into your story in the way you want" than big lie. It's becoming more and more apparent that the story has more power than most realise and it seems those who are more "fantastical" are tied tighter to the stories aims.

stevenneiman

Awesome chapter. I especially loved the part about how she actually signed the "invitation" with the words "the Winter King" because she didn't know his name and she still got in with it. And how even when they knew she was lying, they spent only a few seconds deciding to allow it followed by a much longer time playing hot potato with the blame for doing so. And I am yet again reminded of how for all the annoyance she causes, Akua has actually helped Cat along tremendously. Not only has she always helped Cat earn the approval of the people of Callow by playing the bad cop, but when Cat needs to act like an arrogant prick she couldn't have hoped for a better role model. Or Role model, as the case may be.

arancaytar

Refuge In Audacity is hilarious when it works.

arancaytar

> a more than decant rider

A decant rider is one who swiftly pours out of their saddle, I'm guessing.

Mash

Was that 'Sullen Wench' bit a reference to the show Archer, or was that just the happiest coincidence of all time?

Cpt. Obvious

Yes!

(Oh come on! That was an open goal. I'm just amazed no one else got suckered in before me.)

dalek955

I suspect that the Lady of Cracking Ice isn't really just a Lady.

The Marchioness refers to her as "darling of the Court". She's extra beautiful, at least by fae standards. Higher-ranked fae go along with her suggestion for who should end up with the hot potato. She's powerful enough to disintegrate a Sword of Waning Day without even gesturing, and Masego later notes that she was the strongest of the party by an order of magnitude even though the competition includes a Duke.

I think her role in Arcadia's stories is that of lost royalty or a child prodigy. In that case, her actual power level could be that of a Duchess or even a Princess, with her title as a mere Lady being basically window dressing indicating her youth or humble origins.

Chapter 9: More Lies

"Gentlemen, there is no need to worry: our plan is flawless. The Emperor will never see it coming."

– Grandmaster Ouroboros of the Order of Unholy Obsidian, later revealed to have been Dread Emperor Traitorous all along

A few years ago I would have been able to enjoy the beautiful madness that was Skade as we rode through it, but being apprenticed to Black had ruined me. Now I was wondering how a city with a population of a several thousand could manage to feed itself when all the fields around it were covered in snow. Or who cleaned the streets for them to remain this pristine. Were there fae street sweepers? If so, were they available for hire? Marchford didn't look nearly as nice. And that was without even getting into the logistics of running a monetary system when everyone and their sister could make illusionary coin. Unless all coin was illusionary? This entire race was giving me a headache just to think about. The rest of my companions seemed more concerned with getting their bearings, which I already knew would be pointless. I'd looked back after we turned a corner twice now and found an entirely different street behind us, the second time even on a different floor. The seat of the Winter Court was nearing Tower-levels of mindfuckery, though at least it wasn't also full of death-traps and demons. I hoped.

Archer's casual assessment of the Winter King as "pretty much a god" wasn't a significantly better alternative, but I'd take what I could get.

If I was getting out of this with most my organs on the inside, it would be by picking a story and sticking to it. The fact that'd I somehow wiggled my way into being the heroine when facing the Rider of the Host likely meant Arcadia didn't care for my being Evil so long as I acted heroic. That broadened my options a great deal. There were at least half a dozen tales about some clear-sighted commoner with a Good heart walking into the court of Callow and unmasking the schemes of wicked courtiers trying to trap them, though my introducing myself as the Lady of Marchford might have killed that in the crib. Trickster stories, then? Trying to outwit fae at the game they'd allegedly invented struck me as asking for an invitation to a feast that lasted a century, but with the story on my side I might pull through. Sadly, I hadn't been abducted by a fairy queen with designs on my virtue so professing my pure-hearted affections for Kilian would be of no use. To be honest I wasn't great with temptation anyway. Wouldn't be sleeping with one of my senior officers if I was.

"Catherine," Hakram said in a rasping whisper. "Watch."

I glanced at the tall orc, then around us. We were riding through a marketplace of sorts, filled to the brim with hundreds of fae. Stalls that were riots of silk and pale wood offered an array of wonders for perusal. Some one-eyed old man with skin dark as a Soninke's was offering a bottled wish, moonlight made silver and the heart of a once-good woman, all set on an elegant quilt of woven winds. Fares just as absurd stretched as far as the eye could see, the entire plaza much too large for the width the surrounding walls suggested. I saw Masego eyeing what a peddler promised to a drop of the blood of the Forever King with sharp interest, so I kicked his foot. He jumped in surprise and then coughed in embarrassment.

"You start buying things here and you'll leave with a dozen different fae owning a slice of your soul," I hissed.

He looked mulish.

"It's not like I'm using all of it," he whispered back.

That was the single most Praesi thing I'd ever heard him say and rubbed the bridge of my nose in despair. You'd never find a Callowan selling their soul like that, I thought irritably. Well, except that one time I'd become a villain. So maybe sometimes you found Callowans selling their souls like that, but in most cases

I felt like my opinion held up. I glared at Masego anyway, until he gave up with a huff.

"Don't you pout at me, you're a grown man," I muttered.

When had I become the voice of reason? People were supposed to talk me out of things, not the other way around. Still, this felt dealt with so I turned my attention back to the marketplace. Hakram wouldn't have been interested in the wares here, I was sure. The orc take on having an economy was raising cattle, looting other clans and the occasional bit of barter. Aside from books and booze there wasn't much in Adjutant's tent and I would know: I riffled through his stuff at least once a month when I got bored. So what had he been trying to point out to me? I began paying closer to attention to the fae themselves instead of what they haggled over, but how they were dressed wasn't what caught my attention. It was how they behaved.

Two fae bargained over a silver chain almost perfunctorily, going smoothly back and forth until it became clear the man – who looked like a noble fallen on hard times, his robes threadbare and his hands without rings – could not afford the chain. At which point he publicly bemoaned his lack of wealth, going on twice as long as he had while bargaining. There was something wrong here, like they were acting instead of truly talking. Further away I saw a gorgeous but common woman hacking off her beautiful golden locks and offering them in exchange for a precious stone, and that was when it finally clicked. On the other side of the market place I found an earnest-looking man pawning off an heirloom ring missing its jewel in exchange for a pretty ivory comb. It was an old tale, one children in Callow grew up hearing about as a warning about blind good intentions. They're going through stories, I realized. All of them. There wasn't a single outcome here in the hundreds of conversations taking place that wasn't already set in stone.

It was enough to make me shiver. They might almost look like us, but the fae were other. Something apart, obeying completely different rules. An entire people of actors going through the motions since before Creation even existed. How many times had they gone through their stories, I wondered? If Roles were grooves worn into Creation by repetition, accumulating power by repetition, then these were an entire race of Named. Everyone from the chimney sweeps to the king himself, following along the paths set for them. And now I'd just walked into the midst of that with a lie on my lips, throwing myself headfirst into a maze of interwoven tales that went back unbroken since the dawn of existence. Gods Below, this was more dangerous than I could have ever dreamed of. I forced a smile on my face and sat ramrod straight on my horse as we passed through the market. I met Hakram's eyes and saw fear there to mirror mine. We're in over our head. More so than usual.

"This must be where we part, Lady of Marchford," the Duke of Sudden Rime announced.

I could see interest and fascination in his too-blue eyes as he watched us, having long chased away his initial distaste at our presence. For all that he was more than willing to pawn off responsibility for us to the Baron. Was this a story as well, I wondered? There might not have been an exact precedent for my actions today, but if another tale was close enough they might have moved towards it. Or perhaps not. Their arguing over who'd be responsible for us had felt too organic, not at all like the haggling fae behind us. It had felt like they'd been genuinely unsure of the outcome, no matter how smoothly the conversation had gone. Still, how much could I rely on that impression? Fae were some of the greatest liars to ever exist. There were too many unknowns at play here for me to get a good read on the situation.

"I am most certain we will meet again," the Marchioness of the Northern Wind said, flashing hungry teeth. "I look forward to it eagerly."

"I'm sure our dearest Baron will take great care of you," the Lady of Cracking Ice added, smiling at the fae in question.

"Your reception has been most graceful," I replied, careful to avoid even the implication of debt.

The nobles tittered and rode past a house of stone too white to be anything of Creation, disappearing the moment they turned the corner. The Baron turned to us, face expressionless.

"As I've not been given instruction by His Majesty to bring you under his roof, it seems you will be settling in the guest palace," he said.

"That will not be necessary, my lord baron," a voice intervened.

The fae nobles we'd encountered so far had been sharp-faced with even sharper tongues, but none of them had struck me as made for strife. Intrigue yes, and cruelty absolutely but fighting? None of them had the silent assurance of someone used to taking lives. This one, though, looked like he'd been made for war. His mount was ebony, and I did not mean that in a poetic sense: the horse was sculpted out of dark wood, polished so perfectly it could have been black marble. The man himself was wearing a sober long-sleeved tunic with buttons of shade, the sword at his hip slender and without a sheath. I could feel the power in it, and not mere sorcery: it felt like sharpness made object, a principle made into thing. His skin was pale and his cheeks freshly shaved, thin red lips forming a permanent scowl. A black silken blindfold covered one of his eyes, silvery writing sprawled across it. I'd never seen someone who fit the turn of phrase of being raven- haired better before: just looking at the dark locks I could almost hear the flap of wings.

"My Prince of Nightfall," the Baron of Blue Lights replied, bowing low.

"That ought to end well," I muttered.

The prince's eye flicked in my direction at the words, meeting my stare. I matched his gaze and found myself peering into darkness, a night so dark no stars would ever grace it. I began to drift from my body until I reached for an older memory, one branded into my soul. I felt my back snapping again, my bones grinding to dust as the weight above spoke a single word: Repent. I've stared down Hashmallim, fairy, a little dark isn't going to cow me. Night is when villains rule. I found myself on the horse again, the Prince of Nightfall smiling amusedly.

"His Majesty sends his regards, and grants these awaited guests the use of the Still Courtyard until they can be properly received," the one-eyed creature spoke.

"A great honour," I said, which for all I knew could be true.

Well. Fuck. I'd never seriously hoped the Winter King wouldn't know we were in the city, but him sending what looked like his Court's equivalent of one of the Calamities had not been the plan. Not that I had a plan, per se, but this definitely wasn't it. Having Aisha along right about now would have been great, since my companions might all be Named but between the lot of us all we knew about plotting would barely fill a page. Written large. There might even be illustrations.

"I look forward to your attendance of Court on the morrow, Baron," the prince said, the implied dismissal clear.

The Baron of Blue Lights bowed gracefully a second time, eyes lingering on us before he left. Confusion and fear were plain in his gaze. I feel for you, my friend, I thought. There's probably someone out there who knows what's going on, but it's sure as Hells not either of us. I nodded politely at him and Hakram elbowed Masego so he'd do the same with the rest of us. There was a long moment of silence with only the five of us in the street. The Prince of Nightfall smiled at Archer, somehow conveying a few centuries of hatred in a mere quirk of the lips.

"Did you know, girl, that I once swore if your mistress had a child I would feed it to her?" he idly said.

"The Lady of the Lake isn't one for children," Archer replied with a friendly smile of her own. "She much prefers jewellery."

While I admired the guts behind mouthing off to the immortal creature that had night for eyes, I kind of wanted to throttle her right now. We don't taunt the monster, Archer. Not when it's already out to get us. Oh Gods, was this what it felt like being in charge of me? The balance of appalled and impressed was miraculously even. How had Black not had me killed off by now?

"While I'm sure you and the Lady of the Lake have a colourful history," Adjutant said, "we are all here under the banner of the Lady of Marchford."

It was a sad day when the orc in a group was the closest thing you had to a diplomat. I yawned in an almost offensively fake manner to change where this was headed.

"Alas, I am but a feeble delicate young girl and travel has tired me," I said. "Is the Courtyard far, Your Royal Highness?"

"Ah, I forget myself Lady Foundling," the Prince said. "You are well known for your... frailty, after all. It was untoward of me to delay."

There was enough sarcasm injected in that single word to poison a well. I was reluctantly impressed.

"All is forgiven," I drily replied.

"If you and your retainers would follow me, I will lead you to the Courtyard," the one-eyed fae said, his horse moving into a trot without prompting.

We trailed after him and I gestured for Archer to come closer. She leaned in.

"I thought the whole changing-seasons motif meant fae are reborn when their Court comes around again," I said quietly. "Like a cheap cousin to reincarnation."

"It does," she agreed.

"Then he's missing an eye even now because..."

She nodded.

"Every time?" I whispered.

"She likes the ring," Archer shrugged.

Whoever had first said that Named became crazier the older they lived clearly had something of a point. It wasn't long before we arrived at the Still Courtyard, though my guess was that it wasn't because it was all that close. More that everything in Skade was close, if you were high up enough the fairy food chain. The Prince of Nightfall was royalty, if the title was any indication, but what exactly that meant I was unsure. Was he related to the king? I wasn't sure whether fae could even have children if they didn't have them with mortals. The Still Courtyard was a low-hanging square building with a front of ornate greenwood pillars and bare stone steps. Through the arched entrance I could see the courtyard it was named after, a pristine garden of untouched freshly-fallen snow. A dozen blue-attired servants were already kneeling outside when we arrived, none of them daring to look up. They didn't even register in the prince's eyes, as far as I could see.

"I hope your rest will be peaceful," the raven-haired fae said.

Ah, implied threats thrown our way by someone who could kill me with relative ease. He was making this feel like home. The Prince cast a look at Archer, then moved on.

"I will see you all in Court on the morrow," he added. "Until then, Lady of Marchford."

"Looking forward to it, Your Royal Highness," I replied with insincere enthusiasm.

The Prince of Nightfall rode away without glancing back, leaving us and the servants alone. They were still kneeling, so I cleared my throat.

"So," I said. "About those rooms."

They rose, and as I peered at them I saw they were... hesitant. Not afraid, I decided, but unsure of what they were supposed to do. They're not used to having guests, I thought, or maybe just not mortal ones.

"I am the steward for this courtyard, Hallowed Ones," a female fae said, bowing before us. "We are honoured by your presence and have arranged chambers for your leisure."

I thought about asking for her name but held myself back. No, it wouldn't do to get too involved: I might be stepping into a story by accident. I looked down at my armour, which was sadly full of holes where people had taken it upon themselves to stab me, then at Hakram's similarly scarred set of plate.

"I could use a nap and a bath," I said. "How about you lot?"

Apprentice leaned forward on his horse.

"Does this courtyard have a library?" he asked.

Well, good to see he still had his priorities on order. I swore on all the Hells, if Masego landed at the bottom of the sea the first thing he'd ask the mermans was if there were any books around.

"It does, Hallowed One," the steward said. "Maeve can take you to it, if you so desire."

Maeve was, from the look of it, a very pretty servant with a low neckline who was now smiling invitingly at Apprentice. Another servant looked at her, then Masego and his face turned thunderous. Well, I mused. If there was anyone among my companions I could feel pretty safe wouldn't get involved in some deadly fae love triangle, it was Apprentice. Masego gingerly got down from his horse and immediately headed inside, gesturing for the servant to follow him.

"See you later," I called out, then sighed. "Someone stable that horse. We're only borrowing it."

"I could do with a nap," Hakram admitted. "Feels like I've been awake for days."

Odds were decent we had been.

"You should also take a bath," I encouraged.

The orc wrinkled his nose.

"I washed myself in the river when we were returning to Marchford," he said.

"He smells like blood and sweat," Archer commented. "It's quite nice, actually."

"See, Archer likes how you smell," I told him.

He grunted in displeasure but silently conceded the point, dismounting as the Named in question turned to look at me.

"What was that supposed to mean?" she said.

"You live in the woods and I've only ever seen you wear one outfit," I replied frankly.

"You could see me out of it, if you asked nicely," she winked.

"We've been over this before," I said, dismounting and handing off the reins to a servant.

"Sadly," Archer sighed, doing the same.

We made our way inside, pausing as we passed the threshold. There was no sound. In a city there was always noise in the background, people talking or working or the hundreds of different that kept it all going. Even out on the field, you heard animals or wind or the gurgle of water. Here there was only silence so absolute the sound of my breath felt like someone screaming. The Still Courtyard, huh. That would take some getting used to. Ahead of us the footsteps of the servant leading us to our chambers were soundless, and the entire thing made me uncomfortable enough I felt the need to keep talking.

"So what's with your 'hitting on everything that moves' habit," I said. "You realize that even if you showed up naked in Masego's bed he'd be more likely to ask how you got your scars than anything else, right?"

"Nah, I just like fucking with him," she admitted with a grin. "He gets so confused and offended."

"I don't," I said, "and you keep offering."

"Twice isn't exactly a lot," she said, rolling her eyes. "Still, let me put it this way. How long do you think you'll live, Squire?"

"I'm a villain," I said. "So theoretically forever."

"I didn't ask for the Evil manifesto," she said. "We've had villains in Refuge, I know the speeches. What do you think."

I shrugged.

"If I make it through the next few years, maybe another twenty after that?" I guessed. "Depends on the opposition I end up getting."

"We never have a guarantee we'll make it through the first story," Archer said quietly looking ahead. "Named have more of everything – power most of all, but also danger. I could die tomorrow or in ten years, but sooner or later I get an ending. And when I do, I want to have lived as much as I could."

I could see where she was coming from, honestly. There were a lot of perks that came from being Named, even if I hadn't partaken in most of them. Got that as much from my own sober inclinations than Black's outright austere example, I figured. You only needed to crack open a history book to see a lot of Black Knights and Warlocks had sown their wild oats with enthusiasm. Hells, Masego's father was married to an incubus. Dread Emperors and Empresses outright had a seraglio, even if Aisha kept assuring me sex wasn't a large part of that. As for heroes, well, good-looking and righteous was a pretty common type for a lot of people on Calernia. If anything heroes were more likely to end up in bed with another hero than villains were with other villains. I was hardly chaste myself, but sleeping around had never appealed to me past my initial fumbling attempts to learn what I liked. What I had with Kilian mattered to me as more because I could trust her than because she was delightful in bed. Trust was a lot more precious to me than sex these days.

"You're actually quite prudish for a Callowan," Archer said. "Your people are a lot more salt-of-the-earth as a rule."

"I wouldn't use Hunter as a measure for Callowan mores," I snorted. "That outfit was a little bare by anyone's standards."

"Those leather pants, though," Archer sighed fondly. "He had an ass like you wouldn't believe."

I wasn't exactly eager to discuss the merits of the buttocks of a man whose hand I had hacked off after beating him savagely, so I wisely decided to go into my rooms when the servant showed them to me. The ochre-skinned girl took the hint, following another servant to her own. My guide was the steward from earlier, and before I could even take a look around she knelt at my feet.

"Hallowed One," she said, looking down. "An invitation awaited you when you arrived at the Courtyard. May I give it to you?"

I was genuinely tempted to say no and see what came of that, but kicking the hornets' nest could wait until I'd had a bath.

"Sure," I said. "It was sent specifically for me?"

"An invitation is always sent to the Courtyard, Hallowed One," the steward said hesitantly. "It's simply that usually we... do not receive guests, in this part of the season."

And just like that today's game of this does not feel like a coincidence in the slightest had found a winner. Eyes still on the ground, the fae offered me a scroll with a seal of frost on it. It would have looked natural if not for the emblem that could be glimpsed in the ice. What the emblem actually depicted I had a hard time understanding, the image blurring under my eyes and the words Duke of Violent Squalls coming to the front of my mind whatever I did. Fancy.

"There's a bath adjoining the room?" I asked.

"Whatever you require will be found," the steward said.

Close enough to a yes, I figured.

"That'll be all, then," I said.

Time for a bit of light reading, I supposed.

Interesting interesting, and another week to wait and see how it turns up.

Woe is me, my suffering unparalleled on this earth.

With fae? Both... with a side of terrific (all senses of the word) and an option on fantastic (all senses of the word). 😊

AVR

The bit about her being sure that Apprentice would be the one person who wouldn't get into a deadly fey love triangle suggests there'll be some sort of mess there.

Probably finding out why Winter is invading is a definite opportunity though.

Euodiachloris

I think the various romantic plotlines and tropes are about to stumble into the solid reality of wherever-on-the-spectrum-he-is combined with his chronic asexuality and find themselves breaking a toe or two. 😊

Morgenstern

Winter seemingly does not want to be at war, they only do what Summer has started, remember? More opportunity, if you ask me. But of course, things (hindrances, rules etc.) being what they are, there IS a lot of danger there, probably. Make a misstep and that's it, Winter will WANT to be at war. And they quite probably cannot outright make any peace initiations, if I'm guessing correctly, because only the one who starts it can probably end it and not the one who has to follow. I'm quite sure, though, that it is actually in Winter's best interests, if Summer is stopped from doing what it does and thus that someone is given a hint at what they have to stop (the reason for the attack) for that to happen. Arcadia never seems to WANT to invade reality, we have been told. So if that is true... Winter is desperately trying any backways there are although they are slippery as a shitload of ice (just had to ^^).

Naeddyr

Less cackling all around this time. Awaiting more cackleicious hijinks later! Thanks for the chapter!

Oh who am I kidding? Of course the Prince of Nightfall was chortling on the inside at Cathrine’s slip-of-the-tongue. FURK!

Morgenstern

I’m actually more concerned about the “we’ll see each other again” and the –“That ought to end well,” I muttered.– at the moment, that is, about the question whether things are taken literally or if sarcasm counts towards Things That Are Stated WILL Happen.

Morgenstern

“All is forgiven” might not be such a bad thing, if one remembers how (if correct) *Summer* started the war and Winter is only following (if that is correct). Winter and Marshford should definitely make amends somehow, if this whole Arcadia on war plotarc should find a positive end. 😊
(If Winter should, contrary to my beliefs so far, be able to turn the thing around on their own, i.e. stop mirroring and force *Summer* to mirror them... that would be a big-puff-solution, hot air coming from the whole war-balloon. But I would guess it takes a lot more than that. Wouldn’t be “interesting”, storywise, otherwise, now would it? ^^)

Morgenstern

Things to be potentially concerned of, mini-addendum: Add to the list that she outright stated she's a villain – here, of all places.

gyndroid

I mean, does it matter? This isn't pact, she and the fae can lie all they want. I'm not sure the difference between lying and promises, of course, and Catherine seems concerned about the latter.

taborask

I'm a little confused, are the Fae and elves different species? Or are elves simply a particular kind of fae that happen to live in the mortal world? The latter doesn't really make sense with the Bard's comments on there being an elven nation somewhere though

Euodiachloris

All and neither. 😊

ryubosj

Elves and Fae are different

Morgenstern

Far as I understood, the modern fantasy rule applies: They are definitely not the same, but whole different races (that might be somehow related and “akin” in some ways at least, though).

Cpt. Obvious

Noticed that part about playing these roles since before Creation? Arkadia is older than Creation and so are the Fey.

Elves on the other hand is of Creation. They didn't exist before the Gods shaped Creation, so they are not related to the Fey any more than humans are.

Look at Arkadia and the Fey as the prototype the Gods created before Creation. It was too perfect, the Fey too bound by the stories. They kept repeating the same pattern over and over again with no room for change in any direction.

So the Gods moved on making Creation. There's still stories but the people are not as tightly bound. They can decide to break a pattern, though it may cost them. Still it makes it possible for the Gods' experiment to play out. Is obedience or freedom, order or anarchism, good or evil the more successful path?

Shequi

The sheer level of ominousness is overwhelming.

Before I start reading the story I must say that dread emperor traitorous is probably my favorite emperor. And one day I hope to be as great in the art of trolling entire nations as he is.

Hello Erraticerrata,

A friend of mine, who has been following this story since book 1 chapter 3, has just gone into a Hospice for palliative care. She is no longer able to read the story any more as her vision is starting to fail, but loves work. Is it ok if I make a handwritten copy of this for her so that her carers and family (as well as myself) can read it to her?

Thank you.

erraticerrata

Of course!

joanneeve

Thank you so very much.

The Aimless Passerby

...couldn't you just print it out? Right click on the webpage and select Print.

joanneeve

Yes, but she is using the novel as a goal to stay with us. And she loves hand written letters and such. And this way her children have something special when she does leave us.

alegio

Just finished reading, and I must say:

1. I knew they were all named since the start!!! Beings that exist inside a loop of repeating stories inside the meta based story? Yep it had to happen.
2. Catherine is finally getting her turn to exploit all those heroic tropes she always hated, this will be fun.
3. Ranger steals the eye every year? Or beacouse of the time-fuckery of Arcadia the change of seasons is diferent? If it actually is every year then Ranger is even more of a monster than what I thought.

joanneeve

We have not yet really met her in the story and I love her more and more.

Gunslinger

We did get her interlude. If you haven't read it yet, you should. It's phenomenal.

joanneeve

Gunslinger,

I have read this story through several times. And yes we have met her, twice in fact, however we have not yet met her since she left the side of Black. Considering how awesome Archer is, Ranger must be amazing.

Morgenstern

Random sidecomment: I found that "they're all Named" idea really funny, because it seems to mirror the exact idea I encountered in some RPG game, where you get to decide whether to save them and their stories or make entirely new stories to save 'em (if you save 'em). ^^

Nicole Weaver

The faerie court changes seasons based on a variety of things... boredom, a great victory or a great defeat, an underling pulling off a coupe and crowning themselves ruler of the new season.

Its not the seasons of a year as we understand it. It could be hundreds of years or a decade, at least if the author is loosely using faerie lore (and it appears they are)

arancahtar

I can't really see Fae using any kind of "normal" economy. Maybe they just have an insanely complex unwritten system of favours and other non-quantifiable exchanges?

arancahtar

Also the part where she grabbed a unicorn by its horn and threw it was probably a bit exhausting.

Morgenstern

At the moment, I'm still a bit concerned about that part. If sarcasm should *not* count, she just made herself weak, after all... that might just come back to bite her in the ass.

Nicole

Sarcasm and falsehood are usually fine when dealing with the fae. Its actions that start to carry weight. Remember, its all about the story to them and stories are more exciting with humor, sarcasm and wit. So this didn't weaken her, if anything her games so far have drastically increased her power in relation to the fae.

I'm very excited to see what the Winter King has in mind. A creature like that is probably going to be a cross between a good fantasy writer, a politician, a storyteller, a manipulator and of course very physically/magically powerful.

Black would make a good Fae King, since he understands and uses the elements of a "story" to win his fights and kill heroes.

arancahtar

As they're on opposite ends of the alignment spectrum... would that count as Squire corrupting the innocent hero, or Archer redeeming the villain? 😊

Miaow

Archer isn't a hero. This was made clear in the demon of corruption arc. Presumably it wouldn't be any different from Black and Ranger going at it, if Squire started sleeping with Archer.

Morgenstern

Quite probably none of those. Sex does not entail "more", emotions and such, necessarily. 😊 Why should it entail such a big story mechanic?

gianoria7

I'm pretty sure Archer is Neutral, and not Good.

Letouriste

The plot is giving me headache, too many possibilities here, so I will just say:

I am pretty sure that Maeve is a common fae name in stories and such and is usually associated with ice, darkness. Also fae with that name are generally a queen/ridiculously powerful. So... a possible friend trapped in the dungeon by the evil rulers or, because Catherine said Masiago was unlikely to get caught up in a love triangle he will obviously get trapped in one with the king's possible wife or maybe his daughter or something.

Nicole Weaver

The servants are at her service... my first request "fix my armor." It could easily be argued such is due a guest and is not a gift, merely what a guest is due.

Chapter 10: Entrance

"No one ever won a war by being shy."

– Queen Elizabeth Alban of Callow

The door didn't make a sound as it closed. I was in a pretty little antechamber decorated in shades of wood, leading into a large bedroom. I eyed the featherbed with untoward intentions, noting it was twice as large as my own in Marchford. Silk covers and enough pillows for three people: this was exactly the kind of staggering decadence I'd been promised when I'd hitched my wagon to the Evil horse. Instead I had to deal with goblins who couldn't keep their knives in their pants, half the Empire out for my blood and a demesne whose ledger ran so red it looked like it was bleeding. All of which I had to handle while sleeping in woollen sheets, to add insult to injury. There had to be someone I could lodge a complaint with. Hells, maybe that could be the first thing I ever prayed to the Gods Below about – how about some grapes and oiled up manservants, you stingy fucks?

With a snort I unbuckled my belt and sheath, tossed them on the covers. Normally getting out of my plate was a job best fit for two, but I'd been stabbed enough today it had gotten a great deal easier. I got rid of the greaves first, then the gauntlets and then fiddled with the breastplate and pauldrons for a while. By the end of it I had a lovely little pile of goblin steel full of murder holes on the ground, and with a sigh of pleasure I got rid of my armoured boots. The smell was ripe, so I tossed them as far away as I could. Being Named got me out of many of the little ugly details of life – didn't get sick anymore, tired much slower and I hadn't had my monthlies in about two years – but it did nothing for sweat. Or what the inside of a boot smelled like after a hard day of fighting.

The aketon I placed on the bed, leaving me in only a pair of heavy cloth trousers and able to breathe comfortably for the first time in what felt like forever. I passed a hand through my hair, tugging off the leather ring keeping it in a ponytail. I grimaced at the sensation of sweat long gone cold, then forced myself to get up instead of just dropping on the silk to lie there like some sort of moaning spineless mollusc. There was an archway into a side room to the left, so I picked up the invitation scroll and padded that way. Strange how even this far into a land of ice I barely felt the cold: I was fairly sure that wasn't my Name at work. Who knew, maybe even fairies got gold. To my pleasure I found a low bath set in a quaint little square of stone, already drawn. The water was limpid, almost impossibly so.

It also did not seem to be warm.

I got closer and dipped a toe inside, flinching at the wintry temperature. Yet after the moment the cold started to feel refreshing. Purifying, almost. Huh. Well, it wasn't like I had alternatives. I placed the scroll by the edge and got rid of my trousers, gritting my teeth before sliding into the bath all at once. The sudden cold was overwhelming for the first few heartbeats but when I got used to it the sensation from earlier returned. It was rather calming, really. I ducked under the surface to rinse my face and hair, shaking underneath before coming back up close to the side. Carefully I broke the seal on the scroll having shaking my hands off the worst of the droplets, watching the frost dissipate. Inside was an invitation, like the steward had stated. Not directed at me specifically, I noted, but at whoever was in the Still Courtyard.

Whoever that usually was, they were pretty far up the food chain. The language was both elaborate and ingratiatingly polite – and given that it was the Duke of Violent Squalls who'd sent this, that probably meant this was for royalty. Or not, I frowned, reading the lines again. No mention of royal title was made, but some of the phrasing implied the receiver was foreign. Regardless, it was an invitation to a ball held in the Duke's palace in the city, after nightfall. A masquerade to boot, because evidently I'd stepped into a shady Proceran romance. At least Hakram would be at home, I thought with a grin. He had like three of those stashed under his bunk. The one I'd thumbed through involved a lot of corsets being manfully ripped off and longing sighs all around. It was a sign of my deep love for the orc that I hadn't told Robber about my find.

I set the scroll aside and leaned against the side of the bath, closing my eyes with a sigh. The Winter King, I decided, would have more than one place to stash guests until he could receive them. It was not a coincidence we'd been sent to the one where there would be a vaguely addressed invitation waiting for us. We – I – had been meant to get this. More than that, the way I'd lied through my teeth to get us into Skade had either been expected or was something the quasi-god ruling this place intended to use. For his advantage, probably. That was usually the way it went. What in all the Hells the ruler of half of faekind would want with a Squire from the Dread Empire was where I was drawing a blank. The Winter Court had staked a claim on Marchford, sure, but I was beginning to grasp it was more complicated than that. For one, if a noble of the calibre of the Lady of Cracking Ice had stepped into my city there would be corpses from wall to wall.

Instead we'd gotten a few of their soldiers, a single group of riders and a bunch of aristocrats that must have been hilariously low down the pecking order for them to be taken out by mere legionaries. I didn't mean to sell the Fifteenth short: there weren't a lot of forces in the Empire or out of it I wouldn't pit them against. They were highly skilled professional soldiers led by the most talented tactician I'd ever met, with the core of their troops blooded against devils and heavy cavalry. They were not, however, equipped to stand against a host of demigods who could warp the landscape with an idle thought. No, if the Winter King had been serious about getting a foothold in Marchford right now he'd have one. Actually taking the city, then, had not been his objective. If you know the means and the results, you can grasp your enemy's intent, Black had taught me.

The attacks had been the means. The results were that I'd sallied out to fight the fae, by necessity stepping into Arcadia to shut down the door on their fingers. There was a distinct possibility, then, that getting me here – whether that was Arcadia in general or Skade I could only guess – had been the entire point of that affair. I took a moment to master my rage at the thought. I had no way of knowing how many casualties we'd taken on the second attack, but the number would not be small. My soldiers, killed just to get my attention. I breathed in and out until I could think beyond murdering my way through everyone responsible for that. All right. We'd been pushed towards Skade by the Winter King, and after getting there had been directed to the Still Courtyard. I was willing, for now, to assume that had been the plan. I'd been neatly guided to the city, every step thinking I was bluffing my way out.

At the Courtyard we'd found an invitation waiting for us, meant for someone of high rank but perhaps not of the Winter Court. I was pretty sure mortals didn't usually come this deep into Arcadia unless they were as ragingly insane as the Lady of the Lake, so odds were this invitation was for another fae. That meant the Summer Court, and wasn't that just another kettle of equally murderous fish? The Courts were meant to be at war, I knew, but somehow they were not. Summer was out there making someone regret their decisions and Winter was puttering about in my backyard – yet even with that difference from the norm, the stories were unfolding. Like they had in the marketplace, everyone going through the motions and always leading to the same outcome.

"He wants us to play someone else's role," I spoke into the empty room.

We'd been summoned to fill the shoes of some Summer fae, inserted into a story we didn't know the plot of. Why? And that was the question, wasn't it? Two people out there were playing shatranj on a board I didn't know about, and once more I was a pawn. I wouldn't be finding any answers in a bath, though, so it was time to go. I hoisted myself out, reaching for the cloth set aside on a bench to dry myself. I raised an eyebrow when I saw my trousers had disappeared, setting the cloth on my shoulder and heading for the bedroom. My armour was gone as well, I saw, as was everything but my sword belt and cape. Neatly placed on the bed was a dress of green brocade with accents of gold thread, along with an ornate fox mask of gold with green accents.

I tried on the dress as much out of curiosity as because I wouldn't be going out naked in the corridors to ask for my plate back. It fit perfectly: sleeveless, high-collared and going down to my ankles, it was the single most comfortable thing I'd ever worn. A looking glass made of ice to the side told me the cut was hinting at my having cleavage in a way that was slightly less than honest. I could move easily in it, though bending over was tricky – still, no more than it would have been with armour on.

"Well, it wouldn't do to show up at a masquerade in plate," I murmured.

I buckled my belt around my hip, adjusting so my sword would be easy to draw. Looking for something to replace my boots I found exquisite crystal slippers. Not happening, I snorted. Those would be impossible to fight in. The pair of supple leather boots by them was more to my taste, as were the green silk thigh-high stockings inside them. Hadn't worn anything this nice since I'd gone dancing with Kilian in Laure, I thought, and decided I was definitely stealing all of that when I bailed out of Arcadia. The cloak settled comfortably around my shoulder, Hakram's handiwork of striped banners flourishing behind me as I turned to pick up the mask. I left the room to look for the others, blinking when I saw out the window that night had already fallen. How long had I been in that bath? Stupid question, Catherine. Like time means anything here: Could have been in there just long enough to dip your toe and it'd still be dark out.

Archer's rooms had been just further down the hall so I checked there first, but the door was open and no one was in. I wandered a bit before running into a servant, who after the obligatory kneeling and abject submission guided to me to the library – I was apparently the last out and all the others had gone to Masego. Library, as I found out, was something of a misnomer. Though the walls were covered with stacks filled with volumes, the amount of plush chairs and tables made it clear this was meant to be a room where people were received. Small orbs of fairy flame floating like chandeliers lit up the place with a subtle blue tint. Apprentice was easily found: he was alone on his chair, an orb floating right above his head as he paged through a manuscript. Two piles of volumes flanked him and he paid no attention whatsoever to the others.

This was the first time I'd ever gotten a good look at Archer, so I paid close attention. My guess that she was stacked underneath the layers seemed to have been right on the nose: her grey vest and white shirt curved noticeably. Over it she wore a long woollen coat of darker grey, embroidered with gold patterns along the border that matched the exact shade of the gold on my dress. Long grey trousers ending in soft leather shoes, her neck covered by a carelessly arranged silk scarf matching the coat. I could see the handle of her longknives peeking out, but of the bow there was no trace. She had a thinner face than I would have thought, and a remarkably slender nose. Hazelnut eyes met mine, going up and down my dress with a grin. Yeah, I'd seen that one coming.

I almost laughed when I saw Hakram. He wore a dark velour doublet and matching trousers that made it clear exactly how broad his shoulders were, but the amusing part was the cape: black fur with pure white bordering, it made him look like Creation's fanciest warlord. The axe – not his own, it had been broken earlier this one was too silvery to be his after repair – hanging off a leather ring at his belt lent him a slightly more martial appearance, as did the thick leather boots. The skeletal fingers that had seen him called Deadhand by his own peeked over the edge of his sleeve, unnaturally still.

"There were golden earrings and white war paint," he said in an aggrieved tone. "War paint, Cat. What is this, the War of Chains? No one's used that in centuries."

"I'm sure you'd make for a very costly hour at a brothel," I reassured him.

He groaned and covered his eyes.

"I always did wonder if orcs have the same... machinery down there as we do," Archer said with a shit-eating grin.

"We're not having the 'what do orc genitals look like' talk," Hakram replied firmly.

"I have a book, I'll loan it to you," I told Archer.

She raised a perfect eyebrow.

"Got curious," I shrugged. "And he gets all irritable when asked about it."

"Masego never changed," Adjutant said, desperately changing the subject.

We all turned towards Apprentice, who was still reading.

"I think he's under a silencing ward," I said with a frown.

I took out the the invitation scroll and tossed it at the dark-skinned mage's head. It hit him right in the glasses and he nearly jumped out of his skin, dropping the book and hastily dispersing the spell around him.

"Oh, is it time to leave yet?" he asked.

"My guess is that will be whenever we decide to go," I said, "but we've got places to be. Go get ready."

That got some attention from the others.

"The invitation?" Archer asked.

"We're going to a masquerade," I said. "To find out exactly who we're supposed to be."

"That seems counterproductive," Masego pointed out. "We'd be wearing masks."

I wasn't sure if I was just terrible at the vague-but-meaningful announcements or Apprentice was that much of a pain, but clearly my technique needed work.

"Did you notice how we're all wearing different clothes, Masego?" I said.

He paused, pushed up his spectacles.

"Yes," he lied.

Archer coughed into her hand, failing to disguise her laughter.

"I'm guessing there's a fancy outfit in your rooms," I patiently told Apprentice. "Go put it on."

"My robes are clean, if that's what you're worried about," he said. "There's a self-cleaning enchantment on them."

So that was why he never used the Fifteenth's laundry chains. I'd always assumed he had some poor – literal – devil handling it.

"We also have masks," I said, bringing up my own.

I glanced at the others, who didn't seem to have their own, and Hakram gestured a table in the back. Theirs were there: a black obsidian bear for Adjutant, and a gold-and-grey falcon for Archer. Apprentice snapped his wrist, whispering a word in the mage tongue, and a thin blank carnival mask of ice formed over his face. It accommodated his spectacles perfectly, at least.

"Fine," I said, "have it your way. But don't come complaining to me if the fae make fun of you."

"Do I have to talk with them?" he asked very seriously. "I'm not even close to finished with these."

He rapped his knuckle atop the pile of books to his left to clarify. I bet the Lone Swordsman never had to deal with shit like this, I thought irritably. Killing him had been an act of justice just for that.

"You can bring one," I said. "And only read when someone's not verbally trying to entrap us into something lethal."

He muttered under his breath. His fathers had spoiled him, I thought. I didn't want to make assumptions here, but I was betting on the incubus for the worst of it. He was probably a soft touch when it came to discipline. The matron at the orphanage always spanked us if we made noise after lights out, now that was a firm hand. I took back the invitation and adjusted my cloak.

"All right, you sad excuse for a band of minions," I said. "Gird your loins, we're going on a magical adventure."

Archer clapped, painfully slowly.

"I'm guessing the speeches aren't why they put you in charge," she said.

"Last time we went on an adventure I ripped out someone's soul," Apprentice said. "Do I get to keep it this time if we do it again?"

"Hakram?" I asked despairingly.

"Have you seen how tight those trousers are?" he grunted. "Doesn't get more girded than that."

If we all got killed, I better go last. I felt like I'd earned it.

There'd been a carriage waiting for us outside the Courtyard. Four white horses and a coachman who'd bowed to us as we claimed the seats inside. I'd gotten Hakram on my side, making the tactical decision to sacrifice Masego behind if Archer got grabby. I peered out the window, watching Skade in the light of ever-present fairy lights. I didn't recognize any of the streets we went through from earlier, though that didn't mean much. The night sky above us was just as confusing: now and then I got a glimpse of the stars they way they looked above Callow, but most of the time they were entirely foreign constellations. The way they kept changing between every look probably didn't help. We were quiet on the way to the duke's palace, only stirring when we began to hear music in the distance.

A beautiful voice was singing, though I couldn't make out the words yet, accompanied by what seemed like a set of string instruments. The carriage eventually slowed and I waited patiently until servants came to open the doors for us. I stepped down onto a woven blue carpet leading to a set of stairs, moving aside to make room for the others as I stared at the Duke of Violent Squalls' palace. Gods Below, it was made of wind. Walls and stairs and columns, sculpted out of every stirring wind that looked like a physical thing. Boreal lights shone like lamps and I could see more of them inside, in a grand hall. A servant attempted to take my cloak and I waved him off as the others caught up to me.

"Stable and self-sustaining," Apprentice murmured. "Interesting. I don't think it could be reproduced outside Arcadia, but the underlying principles..."

"Think about that after we've made it through the night," Adjutant said.

Archer finished adjusting her falcon mask over her face and gallantly offered me her arm. I rolled my eyes and strode forward. Servants parted for us, bowing low, until we reached the summit of the steps. There a man with spectacles was holding an unrolled scroll in his arms, discreetly peering at us through the glass. An announcer. So much for the masks hiding identities. I slowed in front of him and he began to speak, then closed his mouth. He looked panicked for a few heartbeats before clearing his throat.

"Lady Catherine Foundling of Marchford, the Squire," he announced.

I looked at him, then suddenly ripped the scroll out of his hands. I ignored his protests and scanned through the list of names until I found where he'd been looking at. Four names, the most important of which was the first: Princess Sulia of High Noon, envoy for the Summer Court. I gave him back his list.

"Fuck," I said feelingly.

Archer was announced as 'Lady Archer of Refuge, first pupil of the Darkest Night', before catching up to me.

"What do you know about how wars start between Winter and Summer?" I asked her.

"They have several reasons, never use the same twice," she replied.

Behind us Hakram was announced as 'Lord Adjutant of the Fifteenth, the Deadhand'.

"Is one of them some princess called Sulia getting her ass killed at truce talks?" I asked.

The other Named frowned.

"That rings a bell," she said. "But I think she gets captured. Trap?"

"Isn't it always?" I grunted.

Masego joined us after his introduction of 'Lord Apprentice of the Wasteland, Son of the Red Skies'. We all clustered at the threshold of the entrance hall for a moment.

"Problem?" Hakram said.

"We've taken the place of diplomatic envoys from Summer in a story," I whispered.

"That doesn't sound good," Apprentice said. "I suppose it's a good thing we have you along."

I glanced at him.

"What's that supposed to mean?"

"You're very good at murdering our opposition," he said, genuinely believing he was giving me a compliment.

I occasionally forgot Masego had been raised by villains. For him that probably counted as praise.

"You don't know for sure I'm going to kill someone," I said.

"Not gonna lie, I'll be disappointed if we don't," Archer noted.

"I've done diplomacy before," I continued.

"I don't think extorting the High Lords counts," Apprentice said.

"Or looting that angel," Hakram added.

"I think bullied might be more accurate," Masego said.

"If you guys keep this up I can guarantee you someone's getting killed," I said.

"That's the spirit," Apprentice said, patting my shoulders. "Now let's move along, Catherine, we're blocking the way. You really need to pay more attention to your surroundings."

He strode into the hall before I could come up with a reply, still gaping. The others followed, Archer turning back only long enough to give me a mocking grin.

My first chapter after finally catching up, and it's amazing! I love them all so much.

Teal

Mine too!!

shimizubad

First time being first, normally there's tons of comments before I finish reading. Love the story, but I don't normally know what to comment.

shimizubad

Damn, minutes late to submit

The Aimless Passerby

Don't start with that crap here.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Well maybe you shouldn't have left a comment then?

letouriste

anyway, getting first is not so hard. the posts are out the same day at around the same hour every week and there is not any F5 army or cultivators here.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

I'd like to think no one here is trying to get the first comment because we're all more mature than 12 year olds, but apparently not 😊

Grow the hell up! Post because you have something to say! There is no other reason to do so.

shimizubad

Calm down, and sorry. I wasn't trying being first and I don't normally comment if I don't have anything constructive to say. It's just that it wasn't showing any comments and I thought "well, why not". I don't Normally comment here because by the time that I start reading there's already tons of comments and everything I had to say had already being said. This time I was already tired enough that I oversimplified what I wanted to say and now that I read my comment again I really sound like a 12 year old sacreaming for attention.

Now a tip: I noticed that some trolls started doing it just to see people pissed. You know what not to do with trolls, don't you?

knockoffnikolai

Don't worry about Warren NFL Peace Report, they tend to be abrasive at everyone. It's nothing personal.

Lucas

Thanks for the new chapter 😊

I was dying at "Last time we went on an adventure, I ripped out someone's soul. Do I get to keep it this time?"

Masego always makes the chapters better.

sheer_falacy

That was beautiful.

"What do you know about how wars start between Winter and Summer?" I asked her.

"They have several, never use the same twice," she replied.

That doesn't quite line up. Also, "never use the same twice" doesn't really work with Cat trying to figure out what's going to happen to her.

JackbeThimble

Since book 3 started there's been something strange about Catherine's voice. This hasn't affected the interludes but the main plot chapters have gotten much more wordy than they need to be, constantly going off on stream-of-consciousness tangents that don't really add anything to the story and are actually kind of repetitive and annoying. This hasn't been as noticeable in the last few chapters since they've mostly been action and worldbuilding but even so I feel like the past 10 chapters have been at least twice as long as they needed to be. There is also a tendency to add lots of unnecessary detail (like was it really necessary to spend two paragraphs describing the process of getting undressed and going to the bath?). I remember a similar thing happened in the later chapters of HPMOR and Worm and eventually it got so bad that they became almost unreadable. Maybe this is like a common step in development as a writer, once you hit your stride where you no longer have to worry about producing you find yourself going crazy and overdoing it? Something to consider anyway.

letouriste

maybe you see too much in this, this is the place of stories. cat taking a bath have probably several meanings here^^.also, this is possible the clothes will impact the next few chapters in a way so they are important.

lennymaster

I believe you worry too much about the quality of the story dropping. Most of these tangents either serve as world building, setting the mood or adding humor, all of which I think are important. I do however believe that these take up more of the chapters and slow down the pace of story development as well as stretch out passages between action scenes. In the long run probably good, since it rounds out the books with high quality writing, however annoying in the short term it may be to some.

I believe this development stems from erraticerrata preparing for reaching the 350$ donation goal on patreon and thus the additional Monday chapter release. The counter is after all already at 301$. Maybe in a few months time we can all enjoy twice the amount of Guide per week.

Question to erraticerrata at this point, although it has most likely been answered at some point, I am simply too lazy too look, when will you publish this amazing series?

Nicole

I love how hilarious the banter and thoughts are. It is a bit different, but I feel like its a good different 😊

amy

no, no... they're not getting "longer than they need to be...", it's just that the narrator is getting to know us better. that's why today's quote was about shyness...

taborask

I really agree with this actually. My biggest complaint about WildBow's writing has always been that his characters go off on incredibly long tangents explaining every detail of their decision processes to one another. I stopped reading Twig when it got so bad that entire chapters would consist of about 5 minutes worth of story, since everyone was engaging in thematically inappropriate monologuing the whole time.

Erraticerrata isn't anywhere near that bad yet, but I've definitely noticed him heading in that direction.

James, Mostly Harmless

I suspect that this is a case of the Winter King tried to hold a war, but nobody came because Summer is going after Heiress ...

letouriste

hum...from what we know summer have a stronger army so that don't make much sense to provoke a war from their side.

Morgenstern

The "Summer's envoy getting captured" would seem to imply exactly that having happened at least once, though.

kinigget

Cat's idea of diplomacy does tend to be "do what I want and maybe I won't stab you" if the Winter King thinks she's going to fall into the role given to her then he *clearly* doesn't know her very well

Euodiachloris

I shudder to think what roles he's trying to stuff Hackram and Masego into. Archer? Meh. Ranger's trained her... she can probably deconstruct it in her sleep without unpicking what passes for reality around her. ;P

Cpt. Obvious

Can you see Masego pay enough attention to a story that he will play any role other than Masego, Apprentice, son of Warlock and pissed off because they keep disturbing him when he's reading?

Nicole

I would imagine as powerful as the Winter King is, he specifically looked around for someone who fit the role best... and we know summer is warlike. Catherine might very well be a mirror image of the envoy who was captured.

letouriste

thanks for the chapter, liked that:) all the chapter felt significant and the masego bit was really funny^^

Shequi

You just got sassed by Apprentice, Cat. That's gotta sting.

Shawn Panzegraf

I don't think the Fae look at their Court wars from any rational standpoint like "Summer is the season for war, so they're stronger." As Cat said, the Fae are like a race of Named invested in telling/re-telling their stories. I don't think the results of the stories they work their way through matter to them nearly so much as the acting them out.

I really adored the passage where Hakram pointed that out to Cat when they were passing the market. That encapsulated the Otherness of the Fae, and likely set the tone for what's going to happen in the larger sense here.

As for being overly wordy...it's the deeps of Arcadia. Probably one of, if not THE most exotic locale the story will feature. I feel it more than merits the extra descriptiveness to effectively convey that sheer Otherness which infuses Arcadia in general, and Skade in specific here. I mean what's the point of characters visiting an intensely magical, reality-optional locale if that doesn't carry across to the reader's sensibilities?

Cpt. Obvious

Also remember that Fey can't die in Arcadia. Or rather they can die, but will resurrect the next time their season starts over. But as Arcadia makes as much sense as sneakers on a fish Winter and Summer both exists at the same time just so they can make war on each other.

Remember that little tidbit about Ranger ripping out one of The Lord of Squalls (I think it was) eyes and setting it in a ring?

Archer was telling the others about how the Fey resurrected every winter in Arcadia. The fact that he still didn't have that eye implied that the loss of the eye might carry over when he reforms. But Archers comment about how much the Lady (as in Lady of the Lake) liked that ring suggests that Hye actually travel to Arcadia every Arcadian winter to rip that eye out again. There's a reason Ranger isn't particularly welcome in Arcadia. Not that she seems to care much...

Soronel Haetir

It sucks to get shoved into a play when you don't know your lines (or even whether you are the hero or villain).

alegio

I believe that these chapters where the Nameds just talk among themselves and build their characters are probably my favorites, only way to get better would be with a certain goblin tribune that collects body parts, but one cant have all in this life.

And the way Cat has been "collecting" her gang of Nameds makes me think that in some time Heiress will end up joining. Seeing how she by now should have her own group of nameds to oppose Cats and how the groups most glaring weakness is around the social part.

Morgenstern

Aisha, though. 😊 Plus Ratface for the more dubious parts of society..

stevenneiman

I don't see it. Akua is defined entirely by the parts of Praesi culture that Cat and Amadeus are trying to remove, and she's too stubborn to see the truth that their style of practical evil is better. Besides, she's just too much of a loose cannon and all of her most useful skills require her to remain such.

Unmaker

"You can bring one," I said. "And only read when someone's not verbally trying to entrap us into something lethal."

Translation: He won't even get past the title page.

In the heroic interlude, it was stated that:

As long as the Hedge Wizard and the Champion kept bickering 'amusingly', they were essentially untouchable.

I am wondering if a similar principle applies here when Cat plays straight 'man' to her subordinates' comic foils. If that were true, you would think that Black and company would be using the principle. But I can't imagine Black actually playing straight man or comic foil.

maresther23

Have we read the same interludes? Black and Captain bicker like siblings. Black and Warlock have an ongoing prank war using names. Black and Malicia spend their time with word games and evil plots. Ranger ignores all the inanity around her. Scribe is the ultimate straight woman ever. They are hilarious.

stevenneiman

And lets not forget about the goats and the dragon, or that time he toppled an kingdom drunk.

stevenneiman

Scribe and Black also has the same unspoken and unrequited love as Page and Exiled Prince, but not quite so painfully obvious. In other news, I really wish I could edit my comments on wordpress rather than having to look at my typos and know that they will persist for all eternity.

I love this series haha yeah dangerous role you got placed in Kat... Yeah the otherness of this place really hits home with these details the fae telling out stories the sudden plot driven changes happening in a mere instant as the story calls for yeah unnatural and dangerous.

I can't wait to see how Kat messes up the story 😊

Though yes she will have to be really careful as the Fae are OP as hell... Yeah straight up fighting isn't liable to be effective unless the "plot" of this story calls for it...

Chapter 11: Swerve

"Only if it's 'being executed'."

– Dread Emperor Terribilis I, upon being asked for a last request by a hero

There were hundred of fae inside, each more glittering than the last. I'd seen the court of Praes and the opulence of its nobles, but this was a Court. That capitalized letter mattered. These immortal creatures had been at this game since the Empire was nothing but a madwoman's dream and the difference showed. We'd gone through the duke's antechamber and entered what must be the reception hall, keeping together as we did. Hakram being at my left had a reassuring weight, like having a shield. Our entrance had made a stir but we weren't immediately approached: all we got was a myriad of discreet looks as fae murmured over their drinks. Archer took wine from a tray of silver cups, ignoring my disapproving look as she tasted the glittering liquid and hummed in approbation.

"Good stuff," she said.

"Don't get drunk," I warned.

"You know the poison trick works for flushing out liquor, right?" she said.

"And if this was wine from Creation I would have kept my mouth shut," I said. "It isn't."

"Eh," she shrugged.

And on that bit of stunning eloquence we silently agreed to let the matter go for now. Given that I'd seen her guzzling down hard liquor instead of tea for breakfast last year, I was willing to bet on Archer being able to hold her drink better than most. Anyway, I had more pressing cats to skin than trying to make a sober woman out of this one. The reception hall had half a dozen interwoven stories of the same wind-material this entire place was made of, all centred around the ballroom floor in the middle of the ground level. Which was, for now, empty. Or almost – I'd finally found where the music came from. There were seven fae on a podium against the wall, most of them playing instrument but a single one singing the words I still couldn't make out even this close. Magical shenanigans, I assumed. The melody was sad and I could hazard a good guess as to why: all of them were clapped in silvery chains and looked like they'd gone a few rounds with an Imperial interrogator. And not one of the nice ones.

"Those aren't Winter fae," Hakram said, watching the same people.

They were most definitely not, I grimly thought. Their clothes were in tones that matched the décor but they themselves stood out. There was a warmth to their being that all the other fae around them lacked, a softness to their silhouettes: to my senses they felt like candlelight while the guests felt like ice. Summer Court prisoners. I was beginning to glimpse a shape here. I was in the shoes of a Summer princess, likely part of a diplomatic mission of some sort. After coming to a masquerade thrown by a duke, I would then run into some of my fellow Summer fairies who'd been forced into servitude and cruelly beaten. Someone was trying to goad me – the role I was in – into doing something unwise. Interesting that the princess would be expected to save them, though. Summer wasn't as prone to tormenting mortals in the stories as Winter, but they weren't exactly paragons of kindness either.

"That's where we're expected to go," I murmured. "So let's go elsewhere. Any of you know anything about mingling with aristocrats?"

"Smile and pretend you're listening," Masego said absent-mindedly. "If there's a lull in the conversation say how interesting with a mysterious look."

"So that's a no," Archer said amusedly.

Well, she wasn't wrong. I took the lead and went to the left. The others followed. Entering one of the side galleries seemed to have been an unspoken signal that we were fair game for conversation: all the guests who'd been keeping their distance began approaching. I wasn't the only target, it swiftly became clear. Or even the first one. Some green-haired woman with eyes that looked like jewels struck up a conversation with Masego about magic and I gave it up as a lost cause the moment the words "partitioned stable matrix" were spoken. As far as temptations went that was one was mostly harmless, so I left him to it. Archer was approached by tall grinning dark-haired twins – of different genders, I thought, but it was hard to tell which was which – bearing bottles of liquor that looked harder than wine. They're tailoring themselves to what we want, I thought.

"Lord Hakram, I believe?" an older fae coughed out. "You have the looks of an orc from the Howling Wolves, if I may be so bold."

Adjutant raised an eyebrow.

"I am," he gravelled.

"How nostalgic," the noble smiled gently. "It has been ages since I've encountered one of your kind. I had the pleasure to visit the Antlered Field when the one called Kharsum became Warlord."

The tall orc leaned forward unconsciously.

"You saw the election of the Unifier?" he asked.

"Oh yes," the fae said. "Always a lively affair, orc statecraft. I've watched battlefields littered with fewer dead."

I'd been wondering what take they would use with Hakram. Orc history made sense. His people had lost so much knowledge since the War of Chains and the occupation that followed. Every bit of lore from back then was worth more than gold to his people, another piece of stone to add to a mosaic that was still more bare than filled. He glanced at me and I nodded. Sticking together wasn't making us any gains at the moment, we'd have to wait and see what the flow of the story was. I was rather curious what angle they'd assail me with, truth be told. Unless they could find me a practical way to turn the Imperial governorship system into a functioning nation-state, they didn't have much to distract me with. The answer came in the form of the Baron of Blue Lights – one of the nobles who'd escorted me into the city – strolling casually in my direction. When we'd last met he'd been wary but interested. Now he looked at me with open hatred.

"Antagonist, are you?" I said with a smile before he could get a word in.

He blinked, face going entirely blank for a moment. Like his entire being had shut down. You lot don't like it when I don't speak my lines, do you? I'd found my first lever to pull. Wouldn't get me through this mess, but it was something I could use.

"Do you enjoy the singing, my lady?" he said after a moment, defaulting back to sneering.

I'd seen Heiress pull better sneers than that, I thought with amusement. He wasn't even silently finding the very concept of my existence distasteful. Second-rate performance.

"Not one much for music," I said. "Also beating the performers seems in poor taste, but that's just a personal preference."

"Captives have no rights," he said.

"I mean you guys haven't signed any of the Calernian treaties about prisoner treatment, so I guess you're factually correct," I mused. "Not that the Empire has either, mind you. The whole blood sacrifice thing would be a breach of terms I imagine."

The Baron seemed completely at a loss as to where to go from there.

"They will all be whipped if one misses a note," he tried.

"That's nice," I said. "Does everyone take a turn, or is it just the one torturer? Never whipped anyone before so I don't want to make a fool of myself in public."

I wondered what it said about me that I was beginning to enjoy myself. Obviously there'd been an assumption here that on moral grounds I would object to the Summer fairies being chained up and tormented. Swing and a miss, that. Not only were those musicians essentially immortal creatures that would come around again next time Summer happened, but they were also not mine to protect. Now if it had been members of the Fifteenth or Callowans on that stage, he'd be choking on steel right now. My motivation to save fae from fae, though, was effectively nil. I'd been taught the hard way, after all, that if you tried to save everyone you only ended up getting more people killed. I wasn't unfamiliar with hard choices and this... simply did not qualify. I wasn't risking my life or the life of my friends for ultimately meaningless fairy schemes. Villain, Baron, not hero. I get to pick my fights.

I patted the Baron of Blue Lights on the shoulder and left him blank-faced behind me. I idly wondered whether my refusing to bite I had killed the trap entirely, or if I'd merely survived the first volley. Probably the second one: my luck was the stuff weeping despair was made of. And just to confirm that shining sliver of pessimism, lounging by a pillar I saw the Prince of Nightfall eyeing me wryly. I grimaced. This one wouldn't be as easy to fuck with.

"Enjoying the masquerade, Lady of Marchford?" he said.

Predictably, the man's mask was a raven. I got the less than reassuring feeling that it was watching me independently of the wearer's eyes. I leaned against the railing by his side, watching the empty ballroom below.

"It's been enlightening," I replied. "Pretty obvious trap, for entities supposedly cunning made flesh."

"A well-laid trap does not rely on surprise but on the opponent's nature," he said.

A servant with a plate approached us. There were two pipes on it, both already lit: one smelled sweet and musky, and the Prince grabbed it. Ground poppy, if I was not mistaken. The other had the distinct sharp tang of wakeleaf, a personal vice of mine.

"Is it poisoned?" I asked the dark-haired fae.

"If I ever decide I want your life," the Prince said, "poison will play no part in your death."

"That's not a no," I noted.

"It is not poisoned," he sighed.

I took the pipe. Would be a shame to waste the stuff, especially when I could so rarely afford it these days. Ashur had raised all its prices on the merchandise imported by Praes after war blew up in the Free Cities, and the island was the only place where it was grown. I inhaled with a little sigh of pleasure and blew out the grey smoke.

"Your King picked wrong when he baited me into coming here," I said. "Whatever it is you're after, you're not going to get it."

"That's the beauty of it, Lady Foundling," he smiled, face framed by a cloud of poppy. "What we want is what you want. Our victories are one and the same."

So the Prince was in on whatever his boss was up to. Good to know. I wasn't deluded enough to think my idle talk had been enough to trick the man into revealing that, so the implication was that the Prince believed it didn't matter if I knew.

"Where's Princess Sulia, right now?" I asked suddenly.

He chuckled.

"Setting fire to the south of your little kingdom," he said. "Even for one of us, the Princess of High Noon has a beautifully simplistic view of things."

I inhaled again, let the wakeleaf warm my blood and sharpen my wits. The idea of an entity with the same kind of power I could feel emanating from the Prince being loose in Callow was horrifying beyond words, but I could not flinch now. I might never get another occasion half as good to gather information.

"Now I get that you think you can mess with me," I said. "I'm just a wet-behind the ears Named with a single aspect."

The Prince of Nightfall blew a ring of smoke, raising an eyebrow.

"While my role has little to do with intrigue, that is an exceedingly poor lie," he said.

I kept my face calm. Could he really tell? Masego would know, but he also knew better than to say anything. I'd learned from the fights of the Liesse Rebellion that aspects were trump cards to be used sparingly and best kept hidden – the Lone Swordsman had known about Struggle before our second fight and used it against me, which he wouldn't have been able to if I'd kept it quiet. I'd taken in the lesson and kept what I'd gotten in the aftermath of the Battle of Liesse close to my chest, the edge hidden until I could use it to crush Heiress.

"No idea what you're talking about," I lied. "Anyway, like I was saying, messing with me is one thing. Invading Imperial territory like the Courts have been doing, though? That's another. There's bigger fish in that sea, and you're pissing them off."

"Your Calamities are away," he said. "And even if they were not, their finely crafted defences were not meant for us."

Two things I could take from that, I thought. Either they'd struck Callow now because the Empire's most dangerous villains were all abroad save for the Empress – who had to stay in Ater – and they expected whatever they were after to be achieved before the Calamities came back. That or they genuinely believed they could take on Praes on its traditional battlefield and win. Of that, I wasn't convinced. When push came to shove there weren't a lot of drastic measures the Dread Empire was above taking to get a win. While in Arcadia the Legions would get wrecked, but on Creation the fae were weaker. And if there was a Calernian nation with the magical know-how to make real trouble for the Courts, it was definitely Praes – or the Kingdom of the Dead, I supposed, but you'd have to be a special kind of stupid to take a crack at that. Entire Crusades had been annihilated without even reaching Keter.

"It's still a bad fight to pick," I said.

Another servant with a plate of pipes came by and the Prince traded his for a fresh one. I glanced at the second hit of wakeleaf.

"Is it poisoned?" I asked again.

"No pipe you will be offered tonight will be poisoned," the dark-haired fae said irritably.

I took the second one. There was a still a bit left at the bottom of my current pipe and the waste broke my heart, but I couldn't know if I'd get another offer.

"The first time I ever stepped into Creation," the Prince of Nightfall told me, pulling at his pipe, "I found it a brutish, ugly thing. A pale imitation of Arcadia painted with lesser pigments. While my fellows rejoiced across the fresh playground, I began to withdraw."

The longer he spoke, the colder I felt. Not the sharp bite of winter, I decided, but more like the cool air that spread after sundown. I tugged my cloak closer around my dress.

"I paused after coming across a fox," he continued with a smile. "It had fallen into a trap laid by one of your ancestors, you see. A snare that caught its foot. It knew it would die, if it remained there."

I frowned.

"It chewed off its foot," I guessed. "The smart ones do that sometimes."

"Yes," the Prince of Nightfall agreed. "And it escaped. An insignificant animal, yet it could do something that would never have occurred to any of us."

Oh Gods did I not like the sound of that.

"You're chewing off your foot right now," I said.

The dark-haired fae blew out a thick stream of smoke ahead of him. He leaned forward suddenly, and right in front of my face clacked his teeth mockingly.

"Our teeth are a great deal sharper than a fox's, Lady of Marchford," he said. "Beware you don't get chewed."

Dropping his pipe onto a servant-held plate that hadn't been there a moment earlier, the Prince of Nightfall sauntered off. I let out a long breath and stilled the trembling in my hands. I took another pull of wakeleaf and closed my eyes. Hello fear, my old friend. It's been a while, hasn't it? I spewed out the smoke and opened my eyes to find another fae leaning by my side. Tall, like most of them, and so pale he might as well have been made of snow. He was closer than was strictly proper and his hare mask did not hide the affection in his eyes. I'd seen the first of my antagonists, I thought. Looked like it was time to meet an ally.

"My lady, this is a trap," he murmured softly.

"No kidding," I said.

"The Duke of Violent Squalls means to entrap you," he said. "Soon he'll make a scene to trick you into a wager. You must not rise to his provocations."

I sighed.

"What's your name?" I asked.

His face went blank. I was supposed to know him, then. Which meant the Princess of High Noon had friends in Winter. I glanced at how close he was standing to me. Maybe more than a friend, even. Wasn't that the stirrings of a proper tragedy? Woe was them, love from across opposite sides. Gods Below, even William had known better than that.

"I am Prospin, the Count of the Last Gasp," he said stiffly. "As you well know."

"Tell me about this wager, Prospin," I said.

"My lady, you can't," he implored, reaching for my hands. "It would destroy me to lose you."

Oh yeah definitely more than a friend. I took away my hands before he could touch them.

"I'm sure you'll survive," I replied drily. "Now tell me about the godsdamned wager."

"How you toy with my affections," he lamented.

The Princess of High Noon liked them clingy, apparently. Took all kinds.

"In exchange for the freedom of the musicians, the Duke will ask that you wager your voluntary captivity," he said.

"How's the wager settled?" I asked.

"Duels, for you are a creature of war," Prospin said. "He has three champions ready."

Creature of war, huh. I guess we did have that in common, the princess and I.

"Terms of the duel?" I prompted.

"Death or surrender," the Count whispered.

I clenched my fingers and unclenched them. I could work with that.

"My lady, they are ready for you," he said. "I beg of you, do not give them what they want."

And there was the truth, wasn't there? They'd been ready for me since the beginning. Every move I'd made since the first attack on Marchford had gotten me deeper into their plan. It was an infuriating feeling, and I got quite enough of that from Black already. Except my teacher wasn't here: there was no safety net under me, no monster looking over my shoulder and smiling at my enemy. If I fell here I'd break more than bones. The thought only refreshed the fear from earlier and that was unacceptable. I would not be cowed. I would not be made their puppet in this eldritch game they were playing. They wanted to push me around? Fine. Now it was my turn, and I was going to push back. I'd been drawn into their tempo for too long, and that was how you lost fights. At best I'd manage to crawl away to survive, and that just wasn't enough. Not when I'd have dead soldiers to buried when I returned. They were owed better. If I couldn't solve a problem, well, I could always make it their problem.

"Which one is the Duke of Violent Squalls?" I asked.

"My lady-" the Count began, but I had no patience for it.

"Prospin," I said. "You can either tell me, or you can go over this railing before I ask someone else."

The fae's face went blank.

"He's the man by the ballroom floor," he said after a moment. "At the centre of the cluster of nobles."

I glanced down and saw the group he was talking about. The Duke wore a grey doublet with cuffs of wind, same as his palace, and his mask was shaped like a wolf. His cronies were tittering at something he said.

"Thank you," I told the Count absent-mindedly.

I walked away without bothering with any further talk. On my way down I passed by another face I recognized, the Lady of Cracking Ice, and she offered me a nod. I looked at the beautiful white gloves she was wearing and smiled a feral smile as I came closer. By her side was a distinguished-looking man in armour, the sight of whom had me adjusting my thought.

"I need to borrow something for a moment," I told the man, reaching for his gauntlet.

I got it off his hand before he could properly react – it was largely ornamental, held there only by clasps – and got moving before he could protest, throwing a 'thanks' over my shoulder. The Duke of Violent Squalls and his cronies hadn't moved, the man in question with his back turned to me as he replied to another noble's question. I was maybe three feet away from him and he couldn't be bothered to pay attention. Well, that was just asking for it.

I judged the gauntlet's weight, then tossed the chunk of metal as hard as I could into the back of the duke's head.

It hit with a beautiful thunk. The fae yelped and I could feel the gaze of every single person at the masquerade going to us as he turned to face me with rage in his eyes.

"Evening," I said, puffing at the pipe. "Don't think we've been introduced. My name is Catherine Foundling, and I hear you want to throw down. Let's get this going, shall we?"

I blew the acrid smoke in his face for that extra touch and decided, why the Hells not?

"Bitch," I added.

The entire hall was silent as a grave, save for the sound of Archer's belly laugh.

danh3107

Did Catherine just call a powerful evil fairy bitch?

God I love this story

The Warren Peace NFL Report

"Bitch"

Well good thing she had the wakeleaf powering her wits. So eloquent!

benthelynx

So good. Daft. Predictable (of her). But good.

Griff

Holy shit, I think Catherine is actually the most badass character out of all the webserials I've read.

Bullies angels, and now even fae? All with her big ol' "fuck you, and fuck this" attitude? That's just great, your writing is fantastic.

PingleBerry

This is probably not going to end well...for the Fae

Captain Amazing

The Fae are actually aware of Catherine's nature, or at least the king and Nightfall know. I'm pretty sure Nightfall almost explicitly said he wanted her there to remove the part that was hobbling them. Traps play upon people's nature after all. I think that duke is some sort of political rival the king wants removed.

B

I don't think so. Every interaction with the fae in this section has reinforced that they are part of an ever repeating story. Even if the Duke is a rival to the King, he wouldn't care. The King will always be the King or at least return so before the next cycle as that is what the story requires.

As the prince said, what the King and Prince want is to break their chains that force them to replay the same story over and over again. So what I believe their goal is is for Catherine to win the three duels thus transferring control of the prisoner Summer Elves to Catherine. Bound to Catherine and in the mortal world, I suspect they won't pop back to where ever they were supposed to be at the start of the next cycle thus breaking this story.

RandomFan

Or just carve a new path. Fae are creatures of tales and stories, but if there is a second way the story goes, perhaps that second way will be an option for every reprise of the tale? A weaker, softer, harder path, but... They might just want her to carve new ruts, and the price doesn't matter.

Hakurei06

The question here is whether or not this duel counts as enforcing the story or derailing it.
I wonder who's going to be Cat's second?

philosophize70

"...what the King and Prince want is to break their chains that force them to replay the same story over and over again."

Which is essentially what the Empress and the Black Knight have been doing. Coincidence? I don't think so.

Morgenstern

And here I thought she would finally break the story and see what happens THEN, by NOT falling for it.... instead she just makes her own version of it, as far as I see. The duel(s) is(/are) part of that story. Where's the VILLAIN now?? She could have simply refused to make that wager, let the captives die / see if they actually kill em – and if they do, refuse to make a fuzz because of it and demand retribution. Now THAT would have broken the story. This? Not so much. At least it doesn't feel like it (as of yet), but rather felt like it just re-confirmed and even strengthened it by putting her own twist on it (only) and not breaking it. o_ô

I'm admittedly confused right now about where this is going, so I hope there is some other twist now coming up that will actually surprise me, seeing how this didn't go at all like I thought it would/should ^^

jonnney

I don't think the King is always the same King. If that were the case then Archer would have known what name to sign at the bottom of the fake invitation in chapter 8. It is likely that the titles remain the same, but the individual fey holding said title changes from time to time.

I agree that the Prince and the King would like to break the chains that force the repeating of the cycle. Their motivations could simply be freedom from the story or something mundane like holding onto their current power. They are able to do so now because the summer court is away and these Villains are capable of changing the story on the fly.

It is important to note that while there is a cycle of rebirth the story itself changes with each retelling. As Archer said they never use the same reason twice.

stevenneiman

@Morgenstern there's a concept in martial arts called purposeful compliance where you respond to an attempt to move you by going along with it and turning the energy against your attacker instead of resisting like they expected. Cat's doing the same thing here, by moving the story along at her pace rather than letting the fae try to push her along. Considering how incompetently they tried to pidgeonhole her, their real plan probably involved her subverting the whole story.

Naeddyr

Oh you've raised my cackles again. This is a great arc, please no switching away to anyone else!

erraticerrata

Until the arc is resolved there will be no other POV.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Raising your cackles isn't actually a thing. You might as well have said this dings my phlebotomy

1shot4living

This tale doth mightily ding my phlebotomy. Another!

Naeddyr

Congratulations, you almost got a joke.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

And you almost made one

Syndic

I... think I know how Archer feels right this moment. Because I'm reasonably sure her laugh was just like (a more female version of) mine^^

Nicole Weaver

I am waiting for Catherine to make off with the power of a fae. They think warping reality is fun and I am sure Catherine will enjoy more fully playing a fae role 😊

The fae would be terrified of her like they are of no other mortal.

MagnaMalusLupus

Not sure I agree with that. The fey all have the power of a Named, as they are all much more tightly bound to the Story than other beings. Cat's whole thing is that she not only rejects but rebukes the Story at nearly every turn. She's riding along the edge of her Name in the same way Black is, and I don't think that power that drags her more heavily into stories is something she wants. We've already seen how easily the Rider was forced into a story, knowing full well it would lead to his death; Cat has enough genre savvy to know what problems that can cause.

Tagline

This made me think back to the metaphor of a fox chewing it's paw to escape the trap. Calling it now that the fey are planning to use Cat to break out of being trapped by the story, since she defies and subverts it constantly, especially with the way the chapter ends.

Nicole Weaver

Sorry, by "playing a fae role" I meant "using the magical and reality warping power of the fae to break their stories too. Fae seem to only have one aspect, so I think she can Take it then do to their stories what she has done to her own.

for the 'stories/floors/levels' thing, I like the phrase

stevenneiman

A powerless (but entertaining and relatable) underdog facing down a clearly unbeatable enemy? We all know how this goes.

Gunslinger

This fae arc has been phenomenal so far. My only complaint being that we don't get chapters more frequently.

nick012000

>"It is not poisoned," he sighed.

>"No pipe you will be offered tonight will be poisoned," the dark-haired fae said irritably.

Odds that the Prince of Nightfall was thinking something to the effect of "Fucking Praesi" right then?

Morgenstern

One thing I didn't quite get there, though, was why she wouldn't think about the possibility that he simply might be *lying*, too. Not Praesi enough? Or somehow assuming that being part of a story somehow equals not being able to lie? Doesn't make much sense to me that the latter should apply... *shrugs

danh3107

In most stories Fae are incapable of lying.

jonnnney

The fey are tricksters they are willing to speak half truths and sins of omission, but lying outright would simply be too easy. Plus it seems that if you lie in Arcadia you merely change what is actually true. So, for all intents and purposes, if the Prince says the pipes aren't poisons then they can't be poison.

stevenneiman

@Jonnnney I bet you're right. Which probably means that he was sighing because she managed to make him give up on poisoning her via pipe.

Barthumphries

The problem is that what you say in the realm of the fae is also generally true. She said she only has one aspect. He asked if she was sure and she doubled down. Odds are that when she reaches for her second aspect, it will be temporarily unavailable because she herself confirmed that she only has one aspect.

Alexander Leaking Pen Hollins

Oh no, she might still get poisoned by a pipe. No pipe OFFERED. TO HER. will be poison. Should she happen to find a try with some pipes and snag one off it, well... or take someone elses.

Shawn Panzegraf

Actually, the Duke might well be a paper tiger. (At least compared to say, the Lady of Cracking Ice). If his primary Story is this one, his Champions do his fighting with the Princess of High Noon. Catherine pulling him into a fight might be the physical equivalent of the blank-face she gets when her statements conflict with the Princess's role that they would have Catherine play.

Not that this gets her completely out of the woods. As we saw with her fake invitation, high-level Fae seem capable of deviating from story. It's just not their "natural state" I guess you could say.

Whatever the case, what Catherine did seems like both the right AND the wrong move. Breaking away from the Story where she gets captured in Sulia's place was necessary, and will likely give her some advantage with the Duke. Unfortunately, as the Prince of Nightfall predicted, Catherine has fallen into the meta trap due to her own nature. The King and Prince are playing a deeper game than this Story, after all.

This might actually lead somewhere good for Catherine. Despite the fact the Fae are all about their Stories, there likely is some ACTUAL animosity between the different Courts. Animosity that finds no real expression in retreaded Stories. Catherine being a Villain, and the Winter Fae being the "Dark Side"...would seem like there's some potential for alliance there in helping her sort out at least Marchford's woes.

Though it disturbs me profoundly the Prince of Nightfall knew Catherine's hiding a second, probably recently-developed Aspect. That's some pretty inside knowledge for beings existing outside Creation. Catherine must be important to their goals indeed.

Morgenstern

I find it not surprising at all for a being of pure MAGIC that they would be able to see Aspects just like Masego is *shrugs

Morgenstern

So *that* tidbit would not be any cause for that conclusion in my book. There are others, of course. 😊

jonnney

After regaining her name Catherine gained her first aspect in a matter of hours. She has now been ruling half an empire for months and controls arguably the most powerful single legion/ army on the continent. The deduction that she has gained another aspect in all that time is easy to make.

Nicole

I am trying to remember what a 2nd aspect of hers is? I know the last 3, but this time around I only remember Take. Did I overlook an aspect? She even thought to herself she is lying, so I think I did miss something.

Darkening

Pretty sure it's a secret from the readers for the moment too, she's been hiding it.

Morgenstern

Conclude I'm really, really curious about the next (few) update(s) by now, to finally get to now where all of this is actually leading. =D Damn... having caught up sucks XD

Unmaker

What was said about motives was:

Prince: "What we want is what you want. Our victories are one and the same."

Prince: "An insignificant animal, yet it could do something that would never have occurred to any of us."

Catherine: "You're chewing off your foot right now."

You interpreted that as:

"what the King and Prince want is to break their chains that force them to replay the same story over and over again"

Which makes sense, and is a very interesting variation on how the Calamaties are trying to change the story of Praes. And if they have watched Catherine they know she is of the same mould, i.e. she uses and abuses stories rather than blindly following them.

The critical questions are:

What story are the King and the Prince trying to break?

How do they expect to use Catherine?

Will Catherine go along with this?

~!@#$$%^&*()_+

Meant to be a reply to B.

Shmeezy

The fae wanted Catherine to avoid the duel completely. It would break them out there cycle of endless wars with the summer court, and free them up to do something else, possibly wage war on creation. She's throwing a wrench into things as per usual.

Btw great story man, I just caught up.

amceres

Why are people assuming that Catherine avoided the trap?

Prior to speaking to Prospin, she literally said that she wasn't going to risk herself in order to free the Summer musicians. Then, she talks to someone who begs her not to do (what she wasn't planning on doing anyways), and she initiates a duel. The fae know Cat pretty well, it seems.

Aren't fae famous for setting up bets that they can't lose? That could mean, bets where they benefit regardless of which party wins... My thought: the Princess has always won the duel, so they arranged for someone to take over that isn't constrained to the story. If Cat wins, then, somehow having a human "own" summer fae is useful for the winter fae (as said by B). If Cat loses, then the winter fae have beaten the Princess...

George

The fae not losing doesn't mean Cat loses. The situation isn't zero sum. So she doesn't have to subvert the King's plans, only navigate them to a win-win scenario.

julienbrightside

That ending had me laughing out loud.

burguulkodar

Ouch. Moving to your own Tempo. As a fencer, I know the value in this. The point is not about creating a new game or story, but to move into your enemies' calculations whenever they did not expect you to. That can lead to some surprising victories.

Poetically Psychotic

"Thank you," I told the Count absent-mindedly.

Foolish foolish little mortal. Do you know what thanking a Fae implies? Indebtedness. And you were doing so well up til now.

Lemon

I'd just like to note that "Anyway, I had more pressing cats to skin" might be the best line I've ever read.

Chapter 12: Double Down

"It admittedly took me a few years to make my peace with the fact that Lady Foundling's take on diplomacy is essentially to bring a bottle of cheap wine and a sword to the table, then remind the interlocutor that while the wine might be awful it is still arguably better than being stabbed."

-Extract from the personal memoirs of Lady Aisha Bishara

"You insignificant insect," the Duke of Violent Squalls barked.

I smiled pleasantly. So it could work. The Duke was addressing me directly instead of the role of the Princess of High Noon, which I needed him to do badly if my plan was going to succeed. Well, plan might have been a little too ambitious of a word. I was following my instincts, which while usually leading me to breaking someone's bones also tended to get me out of corners in more or less one piece. I could not win this if I played out their story, I knew. I would be quite literally fated to lose. Time to drive the cart off the road. Chaos had always been where I thrived, and no people were so ill-equipped to deal with it as the fae.

"That hurt my feelings, it did," I replied, rolling my eyes. "We going stand here trading insults all night, or we going to talk terms?"

"You give me insult in my own home and speak of terms?" the Duke hissed. "I should destroy you where you stand."

I could feel wind starting up in the ballroom, the hem of my cloak stirring with it. There were probably Names that gave you a precise read on how much power an opponent could throw around, but sadly Squire wasn't one of them. All I got was that he was a glacier compared to the icicle of the average fae, not that far beneath the Prince of Nightfall himself. Joy. That was, I mused, the first hint that Duke or not he probably had a large role in the story of the Winter Court. Was the Winter King trying to use me as a catspaw to get rid of an enemy he wasn't allowed to touch? Unlikely, I finally decided. While I was supposed to get into conflict with this one, the dispute was also supposed to be resolved by champions. My hacking his head off wasn't supposed to be in the cards.

"You won't, though," I said. "Because I'm a guest and the lot of you are all about rules. That's a fairly big one, as I understand it."

"You will not be my guest forever," the Duke of Violent Squalls said coldly.

The wind his cuffs were made of turned furious without his visibly doing anything to cause it. I'd need to have a talk with Masego about how having the aristocratic title to something something worked, practically speaking. Might be a way to sever that. Without his magic the fae was just a man in fancy clothes, and I wasn't above stabbing those when it got me what I wanted.

"Somehow I doubt that getting into a pitched battle in the streets of Skade is going to go over too well with your king," I said. "I'm his guest too, remember?"

"If you think that makes you untouchable, you are severely mistaken," the fae said.

"You'll still get a slap on the wrist," I smiled. "And I get the feeling that a king's slap around here tends to... leave marks."

Around all us, all the faces of the fae I could see were blank. They just stood there in utter silence, not so much as breathing as they watched it all unfold. It was like standing in a hall full of statues.

"I'm a kind soul, though," I lied. "So I'm offering you a way to seek redress that dodges the issue."

"A formal duel," the Duke said, pale lips stretching to reveal teeth of ivory. "Yes, that would be acceptable. Crushing you under my heel will be most satisfying."

And now I have you, I thought. No champions, just the immortal monster and me in a ring. With a little prodding he'd eagerly left behind the story of the Princess of High Noon becoming captive and walked into entirely uncharted territory. I did not pick that word by mistake: there was no map we were following, here. No story. Which meant, I figured, that I could insert my own. How do you beat someone you can't beat? I mused, remembering rocky fields in a land that right now felt so very far away. More innocent days, those, when I'd been playing at war instead of waging it. But I had not forgotten the most important lesson I'd learned from the War College: don't win according to the rules, win despite them.

"So all that's left is settling on the wager," I said.

The Duke's lips stretched even further into an ugly rictus.

"If you lose, you will cede me the soul of everyone under your command," he said.

"I'm not under her command, for the record," Archer called out from an upper level.

I gestured rudely in her general direction without bothering to turn.

"Sure," I agreed. "What I want is-"

"Yes, yes," the Duke said, waving his hand dismissively. "The Summer fae can have their freedom."

"Those poor bastards aren't my problem in the slightest," I said with a raised eyebrow.

I tapped my third finger, eyeing his own hand. The piece of jewellery responsible for the seal on the invitation I'd received could be glimpsed there, a ring of white wood set with a flat opal positively reeking of magic.

"Your signet ring," I said. "I want it. I also want to have always had it."

"That is a heavy price for you to demand," the Duke sneered.

"You just asked me for a few thousand souls, jackass," I replied flatly. "Don't whine about trinkets, it's unseemly."

"Your death," he said, "will not be quick."

"I'm hearing a yes," I said. "Anybody else heard a yes?"

"I agree to the terms of this wager," the Duke spoke through gritted teeth. "Since you are so eager to die, let us proceed. Will the ballroom suffice?"

I grinned and wagged my finger.

"I spent all day travelling," I said. "A delicate flower such as myself needs rest before strenuous exercise. You wouldn't be trying to cheat, would you?"

I gasped in mock-surprise.

"I thought better of you, Duke," I said solemnly.

"Dawn, then, on the Fields of Wend," the fae replied with a sneer. "My honour will not suffer for a longer delay."

"You should put it out of its misery, if it's suffering that much," I replied, because I had never learned to quit while I was ahead. "Still, I agree to your terms."

I mentally added to my list the need to find out exactly what those Fields were. Sounded like it might be important.

"A spot of entertainment before Court," the Duke of Violent Squalls smiled. "How refreshing."

I would have cast aspersions on a place that counted blood sport as entertainment, but considering I'd made more coin in Laure from the Pit than the Rat's Nest a saying about stones and glass houses came to mind. Although, frankly, someone who could afford to live in a house made of glass could probably do with a few rocks thrown at them. If anyone got that rich there were bound to be a lot of peasants starving in the background. I had nothing more to gain from continuing the conversation, so I suppressed my urge to get the last word and strolled away. My pipe had gone out, I noticed with a sigh. Typical. Before I made it more than a few feet away all the fae around us started moving again, like a spell had suddenly been lifted. Whispers flared up immediately, but I wasn't intending to stick around and learn what they were. I found Hakram hastily making his way down the stairs without needing to look for long, dragging a protesting Masego along as Archer watched on in amusement.

"Well," Archer said. "That certainly livened up the party."

"Glad I could be of help," I replied sardonically.

"You were had," Adjutant gravelled.

I raised an eyebrow. Masego let out a little noise of understanding.

"Everyone under your command," Apprentice said. "Given your position on the Ruling Council of Callow, that could be argued to apply to every soul in the former kingdom as well as the Fifteenth. Oh dear."

I blinked. Shit. Hadn't thought of that. I'd been more or less at the head of Callow for a year now, but it had never quite sunk in that I wielded the bastard cousin of a queen's authority. I still thought of myself as Catherine Foundling, the Squire, not anything more.

"He couldn't really collect on that, could he?" I said.

"With that large of a debt owed him, the Duke could likely be able to come into Creation in the fullness of his power," Apprentice said. "After that, I have no real notion. It would be unprecedented as far as I know."

"The Calamities would smoke him before it got to that," I frowned. "And Ranger can take the Prince of Nightfall even in Arcadia, she could handle him."

"I'm not sure she would," Archer said. "Depends on her mood at the time. A duke might not be enough of a challenge for her to bother."

"She'd just let a few million people get their souls stolen?" I said, appalled.

"You're the one who just wagered them," Archer pointed out. "The Lady of the Lake is beholden to no one, Foundling. The suggestion that she is would go... poorly."

Huh. I'd always like the stories about Ranger best when I was a kid, but that put them in a different perspective. I passed a hand through my hair.

"I'm not going to lose, regardless," I said. "So it doesn't matter."

"You have a plan," Adjutant said.

"Something like that," I agreed. "Need some time to set it in stone, hence why I delayed. We need to get back to the Still Courtyard."

"Already?" Archer complained.

"Actually, I have an assignment for you that doesn't involve," I said.

"Sounds serious," she said.

"Try to find out anything you can about the Duke of Violent Squalls, while you're drinking yourself to death," I told her. "And I do mean anything you can. Even small details could be useful."

"That seems like something that should have been done before you threw a gauntlet at him," Archer noted. "Though, praise where it's due, funniest thing that happened all night. And I include Adjutant's clothes in this."

"Glad to have you on this team," I said with a sigh. "Masego, on our way out I need you to have a good look at the Duke. Pay close attention to what he looks like."

"I've seen him in my spectacles," Apprentice said. "Anything more is unnecessary."

So those could do more than just see sorcery. That was useful to know.

"Let's go," I said, giving the fae a last glance. "We're wasting daylight – and don't you godsdamned dare to correct me, Masego, it's an idiom."

He scowled all the way back to the carriage.

The moment a ward came down to prevent fae from eavesdropping on what would be said inside the library, I turned to my two companions with a winning smile.

"All right, gentlemen, I have work for you," I said.

Apprentice took off his spectacles, laid them on the table.

"I imagine my task has something to do with why you asked me to look at the Duke," he said.

He murmured a few incantations and tapped a finger against the left rim. A wispy image of the the Duke of Violent Squalls formed above the spectacles. With a flick of the wrist, he made it rotate. I leaned forward to have a closer look: I'd stood in front of that very fae, and I couldn't recall that much detail about the clothes he'd worn. I let out a low whistle.

"That's something," I said. "How good are you with illusions?"

"Not my field of specialty, but anything possible with Low Arcana I can achieve," Masego replied casually, as if he hadn't just stated he could match the work of over nine tenths of the mages in Calernia in a fairly difficult branch of sorcery.

"I need you to make me a glamour," I said. "One I can wear."

"Now does not seem the right time for you to develop a sense of vanity," Apprentice said.

"I need you to make me look like I'm related to him," I continued, ignoring the aside.

He hummed.

"I'll need an anchor to inscribe the Working on," he said. "Using anything of Arcadia will make it particularly effective, which should improve the quality of the result."

"Get one of the servants to find you something, then," I said. "A necklace, if possible, one I could wear under my clothes."

He nodded absent-mindedly, clearly already thinking of the logistics of what I'd asked him to do. Masego with a puzzle would not pause to ask me why I wanted to look like I was related to the fae I was going to kill, but I could feel Hakram's eyes on me even as Apprentice rose to his feet and left both the room and the ward behind him.

"The signet ring, that you will 'always have had'," he said. "Looking as if you were a daughter of his blood. These are not coincidences."

"Which leads me to what I want from you. I need you to Find me a story about patricide in one of these books," I said, gesturing at the stacks around us.

Hakram cocked his head to the side.

"Daughter who never knew her parents kills a duke, only then realizing that the signet ring on her hand matches his livery," the orc said. "Fate led her to kill her father. A tragedy, but one that sees the daughter a duchess at the end in a hollow victory."

Ah, Hakram. If I had a hundred people with minds as sharp as his Callow would run itself.

"That's the idea," I agreed softly.

"The part I'm missing is why you would want to be a Duchess of Winter," he said.

"We've gotten in a place where think that what we want out of Skade is to leave it alive," I said, plopping my elbows on the table. "Arcandia, it makes it seem like everything outside is distant. But we entered it for a reason."

"To shut down Winter's invasion of Marchford," Adjutant said.

"Winter can't invade Marchford if Marchford is part of Winter," I murmured.

"That's..." the orc began. "Cat, there's risks. And there will be consequences. As long as you rule the city, it will have ties to a Court that places in Creation usually don't. We have no idea what that could mean."

"We have a fucking portal spewing blizzard where my marketplace should be, Hakram," I replied tiredly. "That ship has sailed. The fae are there and they're not going anywhere. If I'm one of their aristocrats, at least I get to make rules in my demesne."

"The Empress will have some things to say about one of her cities also answering to the King of Winter," he gravelled.

"She won't like it," I agreed. "But I think she'd like a slugging match with Winter even less. Praes can't afford that right now, not with Procer lurking at the gate. She's a practical woman, when it comes down to it. You've seen the kind of heavyweights Winter can deploy, if they need to. You really think the Legions can handle that?"

"The Legions of Terror can kill anything in Creation or out of it," Hakram replied without missing a beat.

The ironclad certainty in that voice was a thing to behold. That was something I was only beginning to understand about orcs. I'd once thought that they just separated everything into ally or enemy and that it lent them a certain clarity, but it ran deeper than that. Orcs were slower to come to a belief than humans, but when they did that belief would not waver. Hakram had decided I was worth following, and that certainty had carried him all the way into a Name. Never mind that no orc had held in in over a millennium. Juniper also believed that the Legions of Terror could take on any opponent, and so she'd crushed mercenaries and devils alike with mere cunning and ruthlessness, playing them every step of the way. They were both exceptional individuals, but I could see a trace of what drove them in all the orcs I knew. I thought of what the Clans would have been like, at the height of their power, and almost shivered. A hundred thousand orcs, knowing deep in their bones that their Warlord could not be beaten. No wonder the Soninke had been terrified of them for centuries, that the Deoraithe had raised a giant wall spanning leagues just to keep them out.

"But casualty rates would be high, until we found the proper method," Adjutant finally conceded.

"Hold on to that thought, Hakram," I said. "When we get back home, I'm pretty sure we'll need to clear out the host of Summer."

"That'll be a fight to remember, when we're old and grey," Adjutant replied, baring his fangs.

In that moment he reminded me acutely of Nauk, and I felt a pang. I missed them, I realized. My little band of misfits. Juniper and Aisha, Ratface and Pickler – and Kilian, most of all. Hells, I missed Black, the man that was so very carefully not-my-father, whose approval I craved as much as I feared it. The sermons at the House of Light had never said Evil would feel like this. Like a family, the only one I'd ever had. Maybe that was how the Gods Below got you, I thought. They made you love people who could do horrible things just enough that you'd forgive them for it.

"Let's make sure we live that long first," I finally said. "The Duke is going to plaster me all over the floor if we don't cheat. Find me my story, Adjutant."

"And then?" the orc asked.

"And then," I smiled, "we're going to bullshit so hard it becomes a prophecy."

First update of the month, so extra chapter. The continuation of the last one, titled Warden II. It's in the Extra Chapters tab, but link for the lazy: <https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2017/05/31/warden-ii/>

naturalnuke

I Love It!

Shequi

I swear, I thought you'd switched narratives again. Then I realised that you were doing the first update of the month thing, even though it's actually the last day of the month.

Nicole Weaver

You are amazing. You have me excited and cracking up and apprehensive all at once. Thank you 😊

PingleBerry

Ohhhh Cat... you cheating devil.

danh3107

"And then," I smiled, "we're going to bullshit so hard it becomes a prophecy."

Beating the fae at their own game, bullshitting

God erratic, you top yourself seemingly every week.

Matthew

"We've gotten in a place where think that what we want out of Skade is to leave it alive," I said, plopping my elbows on the table. "Arcandia, it makes it seem like everything outside is distant. But we entered it for a reason."

I'm pretty sure that it's supposed to be

"We've gotten in a place where I think that what we want out of Skade is to leave it alive," I said, plopping my elbows on the table. "Arcadia, it makes it seem like everything outside is distant. But we entered it for a reason."

Hakurei06

I'd need to have a talk with Masego about how having the aristocratic title to something something worked, practically speaking.

physical phenomena?

KageLupus

No, Cat has it right in this sentence. All of the nobility shown so far have followed the pattern "aristocratic title to something something". Duke of Violent Squalls, Lady of Cracking Ice, etc. Cat is just poking fun at their naming scheme here.

Barthumphries

Looks like this is the top typo thread. Ok, this first one is a long one – I think there's a missing word in the end of the third paragraph:

"Something like that," I agreed. "Need some time to set it in stone, hence why I delayed. We need to get back to the Still Courtyard."

"Already?" Archer complained.

"Actually, I have an assignment for you that doesn't involve," I said.

"Sounds serious," she said.

That doesn't involve what?

Also:

Never mind that no orc had held in in over a millennium. Change the first "in" to "one".

Captain Amazing

Aww. My theory was explicitly shot down. This makes me both happy and sad at the same time. Back to reading.

letouriste

mine was confirmed:p well that didn't amounted to much^^ varoksa

So are we going to get the Winter Knight maybe? we already know there can be neutral names.

M

>“The part I’m missing is why you would want to be a Duchess of Winter,”

Capital letters, clearly a name, if not Name.

James, Mostly Harmless

Kat becoming a Duchess, even if not The Duchess, is going to have interesting implications and effects in Callow.

James, Mostly Harmless

She could certainly match Harry snark for snark, although she is not his equal as a mage! But Mab would be very unhappy ...

letouriste

“prophecy” O.M.G i got chill here,i know this is not a Prophecy and she was just saying but still,got me imagining scénarios so awesome that word don’t make that justice.

i want MOAARR

Steamer rducks can fly bro:D bloooooooooooooooooooooo

r0000000aaaaaaarrrrrr

_____

(yeah i'm hyped :p)

Naeddyr

Oh nooo, now that she's got a plan, it can go all sorts of wrong!

---

Yeah, even without the whole “a plan explained onscreen has to fail” thing, she’s trying to invoke a tragic plot a la Oedipus through time paradox, glamouring a face everybody already knows and beating an immortal master of winds.

Even if the tragedy doesn't turn "father unknowingly kills daughter" way rather than "daughter unknowingly kills father" or if she doesn't become her own grandmother, she can still end up dooming herself through some unforeseen implication of the plan.

Morgenstern

Might all depend on *what else* that story Hakram will decide on has in it, if that's how things actually work in Arcadia.

Anyways – great surprise. Loveyloveydovey. I LOVE working surprises. =)

Barthumphries

Ok, if she's always going to have had the ring, then I figure she will have always had it. So I did a Google search in previous chapters and found this:

<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2015/06/10/chapter-11-sucker-punch/>

"Not that kind of work. I'm looking for a ring."

Well, technically, she was looking for a fighting ring. But still, seems suggestive taken on its own, doesn't it? If, during the fight, she "remembers" every statement in her life like that, it just might help her win by confirming her role in the story.

Also, there were some typos in that linked chapter – I posted a comment about them there.

Joebobjoe

Squire, you're forgetting the reason Winter went to war in the first place. The Courts must remain balanced. By doing this you're giving The Diabolist a nice Summer home with minimal effort on her part.

Shoddi

Interesting point. If Katherine's succeeds, it could allow the fae to wage a proxy war in Creation between Kat's Winter and The Diabolist's Summer. Of course, I'm presuming that to keep the balance, Akua would become (by choice or force) Summer's proxy. If that is the case, I wonder how much clandestine (or overt) support each court would offer?

Great writing. Please keep it up!

Morgenstern

Yeah, still wondering about that, too. Does the plan within a plan (within...) go so deep, what with the Prince/King playing on her very nature that they foresee this and somehow need her to act as however-nominal agent of the Court of Winter to do something about Summer? Or do they just not care / are fine with what's going on (them suddenly invading "reality", what they never even seemed to want to do so far), no plans to stop Summer's invasion/the reason for it, after all, but maybe even opposite interest in their own mirroring invasion?

I wonder what the implications for a change of seasons/Seasons/ phases are, if that should work and what you suggest be the mirror effect... what happens if the Courts get past the mirror effect? Do they go to war with each other again? What other s/ Seasons are there? Questions upon questions... "come back next time". =D

taborask

Plus, we have no idea how becoming a member of the winter would change Katherine. Clearly the fae aren't iron bound to follow their prescribed stories, but that doesn't mean she won't be suddenly shackled into participating in them to a certain extent. Unpredictability is probably her greatest strength, and it seems like that's exactly what fae lack the most.

This really, really seems like a bad plan even in the best case scenario, unless she intends to pass of her duchy to another fae and create a new title for herself that won't be as bound by their laws

Nicole Weaver

The 2nd aspect of her name seems to be something like "Subvert." The fae are bound to stories by their nature, not their power. I am sure there will be complications, but from what I have seen, Catherine is going to be free to act, but with consequences if she acts too far outside the fae stories.

Regardless, this would drastically increase her power. Also, recall the Summer Court is already in creation and doing decidedly un-fae kinds of things... I think this move on Catherine's part will bring her equal to Heiress again. It sounds like she already has power over the Summer Fae.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Ways I would describe Akua:

1. Heiress
2. Schemer
- 2b. Cat's "personal" antagonist
4. Aristocrat
5. Magic user
6. Trueblood
7. Diabolist

It's confusing to me to hear her being referred to as "the diabolist," that just doesn't seem like an important facet of her character at this point in the story. Especially since she's sworn off the practice for pragmatic reasons, for the time being.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

That's amazing the character is so complex, though. To come up with seven attributes describing characters from the Phantom Menace, for example, I'd need seven characters!

Q

You are taking one extreme but not the other. With cat part of the winter court, winter is no longer at war with reality and are free to go back to Arcadia and by extention summer will do the same but cat will be part of the court while Akua won't have secured a place as a summer aristocrat.

I'm interested in knowing what the usual end is to the winter summer story. The prince compared himself to a fox chewing off its own leg. If winter normally loses to summer, which is possible considering they seem to be the bad guys in the story about the princess, they may be roping in cat so that they can change their story and defeat summer.

csimple

Doesn't parse well for me:

"That was, I mused, the first hint that Duke or not he probably had a large role in the story of the Winter Court"

"Whispers flared up immediately, but I wasn't intending to stick around and learnr what they were."
learn

"Actually, I have an assignment for you that doesn't involve," I said.

– Seems incomplete

"Arcandia, it makes it seem like everything outside is distant. But we entered it for a reason."
Arcadia

*****

Great Chapter.

Okay, I call that Cat will get all her three aspects within the third book, seeing that Squire is a transitional name, and we would be following Cat for the role of [some_color] Knight, and then aspects for that, and then big final fight.

Unmaker

Having a Duchess of Arcadia more or less permanently in Callow will allow (maybe require) the Summer Court to do something similar.

I don't know why several commenters think Diabolist has the same sort of 'deal' with the Summer Court – fae aren't demons and in order to get the Diabolist Name, Akua probably had to do something heavily demonic related. I get that Keter's Due for Akua's actual spell may have been the breach to Arcadia (the previous story hinted fairly heavily that way), but what reason does Summer have to deal with her? If anything, Cat getting to be a Duchess of Arcadia without Akua getting to be Summer nobility would be more balanced – right now Akua has three fairly clear advantages over Cat: 1) major political power, training, and acumen, 2) Named-level sorcery, and 3) a full Name rather than a transitional one. Cat having a high court fae title would balance some of that.

If any race can be said to be half way to being all Named, it would be the fae: their titles look and sound like Names, they run on stories, and they have magic that can resemble Named powers. So I am going to go out on a limb and guess that, if Cat gets the actual title Duchess of Violent Squalls, it will actually turn into a Name. She still has a transitional Name after all.

Nicole Weaver

the reasoning is the summer court are loose in creation pretty much right where Heiress is based. I wasn't aware she has become a Name of Diabolist (and I don't recall it being stated anywhere). I think someone just called her a diabolist because she messed with demons once or twice.

With Summer Court loose and at war, it seems a safe bet Heiress is to blame. It's a pretty short leap to think she has an alliance and is ordering them to attack Callow to punish Catherine and because Winter would then attack more directly.

nipi

Umm a while back some of Heiresses minions were attacked and she wasn't aware that the fae were around before then. It's highly doubtful that she intentionally drew them into creation. More likely that the fae have an interest in stopping her or maybe they want access to the artificial god or whatever Heiress wants to use to power her grand scheme.

letouriste

Diabolist was Named like that in the interlude a few chapters ago.

and no, she was surprised and annoyed by fae coming so that's not part of her plan neither...at least for now

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Exactly. There are some commenters who are often insightful, who can help you understand the story, then there are a frightening number that seem to jump to random conclusions and speak confidently as if their guesses are confirmed facts.

Sorry if I'm picking on this one commenter in particular.. Perhaps you're not a native English speaker and this is a learning experience, like "sometimes a cigar is just a cigar"

Nicole Weaver

It says your comment is responding to me, but it doesn't seem to be due to the way it is phrased?

The Warren Peace NFL Report

I really don't remember Akua being Named Diabolist, and that would be a really, REALLY big deal that I'm pretty sure I would remember.

Barthumphries

She'll just add it to her collection.
Squire (eventually Warlord) Cat, the Necromancer, Ruler of C-Town, Duchess of Wintery Something.

taborask

Public service announcement: we're only $32/month short of the next Patreon goal where we'd get 2 chapters a week. If anybody isn't a patron yet, now would be a good time!

nipi

"Although, frankly, someone who could afford to live in a house made of glass could probably do with a few rocks thrown at them. If anyone got that rich there were bound to be a lot of peasants starving in the background."

Crap! We've got skyscrapers and shit.

And a third-world with resource curses.

nipi

"Not our peasants! Everything is fine here" *waves the argument away and adjusts his blinkers*

LostDeviljho

Okay, but if this actually works does that mean Cat will have retconned herself into being part Fae?

The Warren Peace NFL Report

...at which point Masego's glamour becomes permanent? That's going to be one distraught Killian...unless Killian has *always* known Cat to look like that. This could get confusing.

Nicole Weaver

Oooh! That is a fascinating potential complication. Now I am excited to discover how much Killian is affected by her heritage. 😊

glassgirlceci

Omg I can't think of a way to say how much I fucking love this. But I do.

Skythe

I thought fae were supposed to be the greatest liars in all of creation or something?

vuthuha912

It was very funny how Cat approached this whole story thing. It is like she has a natural understanding of storytelling that most people don't have.

She would make a nice writer or mangaka in a Modern AU with Black as her professor and all her friends as inspirations for different characters in her stories. Let's have a Monthly Girls' Nozaki-kun AU with the whole cast.

Chapter 13: Forgery

"The heart of warfare is deception. Therefore, the generals who can deceive even themselves are invincible."

– Isabella the Mad, Proceran general

Researching the old fashioned way would have taken much more than the single night we had. Much, much more: after a while I noticed that every time we took a book from the stacks and looked away, another one appeared in its place. Hopefully Masego hadn't noticed that, or I'd never be able to convince him to leave. Already telling him that we couldn't loot the library on the way out was going to be a bloody chore, I wasn't eager to fight that battle twice. In the end, we relied on Hakram's aspect to get our results: Find. There was no denying how useful that trick had proved to be since he'd come into it, but I remained wary. That was always the trap, with Names: they gave you an advantage that would enable you to crush all your enemies, if you just... kept leaning into it. And it was always so very tempting to, wasn't it? The more you used it the more effective it became, the stronger the advantage got.

I'd become so used to relying on Learn to, well, learn things that when I'd lost the aspect after Liesse I'd found myself almost crippled. I'd been teaching myself the Old Tongue, the Deoraithe language, before the dust-up with Heiress. When I'd gone back to the books afterwards I'd found to my dismay that I was going to have to start almost from the beginning. The information in my head was incomplete, like I had learned vocabulary lists by rote instead of actually figuring out the language. Almost a year later, I wasn't even even fluent. Back when I'd had Learn, I would have spoken like a native in six months while barely putting any effort into it. Black had been right, as he often was: people who depended on their Names for results fell apart when robbed of those powers. If you use your Name instead of skill, you never develop the skill. There was a reason my teacher had taught me swordsmanship the hard way.

That was the axe I had to grind with Find. When Adjutant used it, he found in a matter of hours answers that would normally have taken us weeks. It handed us solutions, and if we ever started to rely on that we'd be screwed the first time we ran into a hero that could shut it down. We'd played with the aspect nonetheless, to figure out how it worked, and found it wasn't without limits: the information he looked for had to be at hand and the need for it clear. As far as I could tell, he wasn't warping Creation to get us what we needed. He was using a weaker version of Providence, the golden luck that always had the very thing they needed land in the lap of the heroes at the best possible moment. Masego had theorized that what the aspect actually did was tinker with the odds, essentially making something that could possibly happen much more likely to actually happen. Adjutant wouldn't ever be able to point a spot on a map and have that location be full of ancient magical weapons, but he could crack open a book at the exact page he needed to read.

I'd worried that the library might not have the story we needed, but the refilling stacks effectively killed the fear. Here in Arcadia, an aspect so subjective in nature was massively more powerful than it would have been in Creation: reality was more fluid in the realm of the fae.

His first attempt found us a story about a shepherd from Summer killing a Duke of Winter in single combat with a sling, winning the battle for Summer. It had a familiar ring to it. It was an old and popular tale in Callow that we'd first gained the Red Flower Vales by a shepherdess killing a Proceran prince with the same weapon when the prince tried to steal her flock. Dead princes always made for fireside favourites, in my experience. Callow had not forgotten the the Proceran betrayal after the Third Crusade. The story was not, however, what we needed. Hakram narrowed his search on the second attempt and found something more to my liking. A boy from Winter becoming a soldier to escape a prophecy he'd kill his own father, only learning too late his mother had had an affair with a Lord of Summer after killing the very same man on the battlefield. That had a shape we could use. It lacked the inheritance, but it stacked the odds in the favour of the long-lost child.

He tried again and found something even closer. A prince of Winter abandoning his own daughter in the wilds for she was fated to kill her father, only for her to be found by a childless prince of Summer and be raised as his own. Killing her birth father on the field, she became a Princess of Winter only to find the horrible fate still dogged her: she was sent as as the champion of Winter to settle a duel, only to find the man who'd raised her to be her opponent. This evidently being a tragedy, she won again and destroyed everything she'd ever loved. Grim, but I could work with that. Stealing bits from both parricidal stories to craft it into a fresh one should do the trick. I leaned back into my seat with a servant-provided cup of wine, Hakram frowning at the pages as he read the third story once more.

"Prophecy's the important part," I said.

"We don't have one," he pointed out.

"So we make one," I replied.

"I don't think scribbling 'Catherine murders a duke, gets a duchy' on a parchment will get us anywhere," the tall orc grunted.

"When I fought the Rider of the Host," I said, "he trapped himself into a role. Had to reveal things to me because of it. I think that has long as the fae recognize it's a story, they're bound by it – no matter how obvious a lie it is."

"So we need the fairies to know there's a prophecy, one just good enough to pass as true," he said. "That's... problematic. We'd need that knowledge spread before the fight."

"Apprentice would be able to make a scroll look old and magical," I said. "There's no reason we couldn't make a dozen fake scrolls and throw them through the windows of high-ranking members of the Court tonight. The Duke himself doesn't have to be warned – ignorance is part of the tragedy."

"Still feels thin," Hakram gravelled. "You can make yourself look like his long-lost daughter and it'll help, but we need more."

"A tragic element," I said, thinking out loud. "It doesn't have the right weight if I genuinely don't care I just stabbed my 'father' to death."

I sipped at the wine again, wondering at how it tasted exactly the way Vale summer wine did at the peak of summer when served cold, the heavy heat making it the sweetest thing you ever drank. No wonder Archer had kept hitting the bottle.

"I could have Apprentice put the belief in my head that the Duke is actually my father," I reluctantly said.

Hakram grimaced.

"I like Masego, Cat, and I doubt there's a better mage in the Empire save for Lord Warlock – but messing with memories is always bad business," he said. "You weren't conscious when he operated on your soul. It... wasn't pretty."

Mostly I remembered searing pain and a lot of screaming, so I'd take his word for it. Masego had saved my life, that day, but the process had been less than pleasant.

"We'll shelve that, then," I said. "What else do we have?"

I was an orphan. That was a prerequisite for any of this to be able to work, I thought, but I couldn't make more of it. I was the Squire. That had been my trump card in Liesse, given the roots the Role had in both Praes and Callow, but in Skade there was no ground to gain from it.

"The Winter King brought us here," Adjutant suddenly said.

I raised an eyebrow.

"So he did," I agreed.

"Set aside the story for a moment," the orc said. "We're here because he wants something from you."

"We don't know what that is, though," I said.

"A hungry warrior will trade his sword for meat," he quoted in Kharsum.

If you need something bad enough, you'll take even a terrible deal. In other words, we had some kind of leverage on the King. The Prince of Nightfall had compared the Court to a fox gnawing off its own leg – there was desperation in that image, not just viciousness. Pretending we had an immortal winter god's backing when getting into a fight with an immortal winter lesser god felt like fool's gamble, admittedly, but hesitation was the province of the slow and the dead. Fuck it: I'd already faked the king's signature to get into Skade in the first place, after all. If he'd wanted to turn the screws on us for that, we'd already be screaming.

"I have three things," I murmured. "A prophecy, an heirloom and the word of a king. Now that has the right weight to it, don't you think?"

Hakram shivered and I smiled.

"You look the way bad decisions feel," Archer told me.

It was past midnight when the ochre-skinned girl swaggered into the library, reeking of liquor and throwing herself onto the table in an ungainly sprawl. Masego, who'd been finishing up the eighth fake scroll until she'd put her hand over it, sighed and moved his work to another table. I picked up a book and dropped it on her face as my reply, though even drunk she had the reflexes to snatch it out of the air. Archer wasn't wrong, exactly. After Apprentice had given me the silver chain enchanted with the glamour I'd had a look in the mirror and winced. Kilian pulled off the fae blood, but it could be kindly said that I did not. My features were already sharp and constant fighting had put muscle to my frame, so the exaggeration of both traits with a few fae features thrown in made me look like a pile of harsh angles forced into a person's shape. I did, however, look like I could be related to the Duke of Violent Squalls. That was the part that mattered.

"I'm hoping you have more than insults to give me," I said.

Archer rose to a sitting position with a tired moan, dangling her legs off the edge of the table.

"You picked a fight with a bigwig," she said.

"He's a duke," I said. "That was given."

"He's the duke, Foundling," she said. "Look, you know it's not the same king or queen in charge of Winter every time the season comes, right?"

"I'd gathered," I said.

"The role can go to all the fae that are right now princes and princesses," Archer said. "They have different natures, so the story of Summer and Winter can unfold differently according to who has the crown on both sides. That's why sometimes one Court wins and sometimes the other. Outcome's decided the moment the story starts."

"He's not a prince, though," I pointed out.

"He's just as bad," the other Named said. "Whenever you have a Winter ruler trying to avoid the war, he's the one that fucks it up. He's the cornerstone for the war happening anyway."

"So if he threw his masquerade..." Hakram said, trailing off.

"Then the current King is trying to avoid a war," I finished. "The Duke's important."

On the bright side, the odds of my getting away with pretending the King of Winter was backing me had just significantly improved: I'd be ridding him of a nuisance.

"So even for a duke he's going to be a bastard and a half to kill," I said.

"That's the word," Archer agreed. "Things I have also learned: man's not married, he's got a bunch of minions on his side and he uses what wind sorcery would be if it was actually useful in a fight."

"Wind sorcery is very useful," Masego disagreed without ever looking away from the scroll. "It lacks the offensive abilities of some other elemental spells, but it has few equals when it comes to dictating and restricting enemy movement."

"It feels like you're to disagree with me," Archer said, "but your words prove my point."

"It's the basis for scrying, you ignorant thug," Apprentice snapped.

"Ooh, scrying," the woman replied, rolling her eyes. "That'll tip the balance in a fight with a Named."

Gods, I missed Juniper. Nobody squabbled this much when she was around to glare. People without strong opinions didn't become Named, I knew, which was why you could never have a band of them in a room without it coming to some arguing. It didn't help, though, that Archer's mission in life was to be the piece of gravel in everyone's boot and that Apprentice was exceedingly easy to rub the wrong way.

"This conversation's postponed until we're back in Creation," I ordered. "Archer, I know you have a fascination with asses but you don't need to be so much of one. Apprentice, you know if you let her irritate you she's going to keep pulling your pigtails."

"But she was wrong," Masego muttered mulishly.

Archer hid a grin behind her hand and I moved to change the subject before they could start again.

"Heard anything about the Fields of Wend?" I asked her.

"There's a lake outside the city," she replied. "With shifting glaciers in it. They use it to throw balls sometimes."

Not, I thought, a good battlefield to fight against someone who has a knack for using winds. Not that any place in Winter was, to be honest. Still better than a closed space like the inside of the palace had been, especially since the damned place had been built from the Duke's power.

"Well, that ought to be interesting," I said.

"So now we wait for dawn?" Archer asked. "I might actually die of boredom, Squire."

I glanced at Apprentice.

"How long until you're done with the scrolls, Masego?"

"Give me an hour," he replied absent-mindedly.

"Stay awake, Archer," I said. "I have something for you to do after this."

"Tell me it doesn't involved paying attention to what people are saying again," she implored.

"I want to to break people's windows by throwing lies at them," I replied.

She grinned.

"Sometimes, Foundling, you say the sweetest things."

I managed to grab a few hours of sleep afterwards. Enough that I was fresh, anyway. I could have slept longer but my mind was awake so instead I found myself trudging to the courtyard this place was named after. Servants popped up out nowhere, not unexpectedly, and I sat by the edge of the snow with a steaming cup of tea and a pair of sweet apple turnovers. I'd say this for the fae, they cooked better pastries than anything I'd tried back in Creation. By my estimate there was still about a bell left before dawn, so I took my time eating. I heard footsteps behind me, a sure sign one of my companions was also awake: the fae didn't make noise. Archer plopped herself down, leaning back against a wooden pillar. She had a plate of cold cuts and yet another bottle of wine, I noted with dark amusement. I wasn't sure it was possible to empty the cellars of Winter, but she was certainly giving it a gallant effort.

"Did you even sleep?" I asked.

"Couldn't," she replied. "I'm too curious about what's coming."

I hummed. If all went well she wouldn't need to fight anyway. Besides, even if she'd been up all night she didn't seem tired in the slightest. I wasn't actually in the mood for conversation, so I let silence reign as I drank my tea and nibbled at the pastries. Couldn't muster much of an appetite – never could before a fight, though during I always ended up feeling hungry.

"So what's your deal, exactly?" Archer said suddenly.

I eyed her sceptically.

"My deal?" I repeated.

She scarfed down a piece of meat before replying.

"Every Named has one," she said. "Lady Ranger wants to break anything that thinks it's stronger than her. Your mage wants to open up Creation to see what the gears look like. The orc wants to murder everything in your way."

"And you?" I deflected.

"You already know what my thing is, Foundling," she smiled. "I want to live large, so I can die without regrets. You, though? I can't seem to get a read on you."

Funny thing, this. I was more used to being on the other side of the conversation. I'd had one just like this with Hakram, what felt like years ago. Then another with Masego, when I got a glimpse at the detached mania that lay at the centre of him.

"People don't usually ask me that," I said. "Don't need to. I'm pretty straightforward, when it comes down to it. All I want is to dig Callow out of the pit it's in."

She raised an eyebrow.

"Aren't you the Tower's lieutenant there, nowadays? Seems like a done deal."

"You'd think so, wouldn't you?" I grunted. "I have the reins, within limits. I won. Pit's still there, kingdom's still in it."

Archer eyed me, expression unreadable.

"So that's really all you're after?" she said. "Picking up a half-crown for the land you were born to?"

I smiled mirthlessly.

"Disappointed, are you?" I said.

"You're the heiress to people who changed the face of Calernia," she said, not denying it. "And I don't mean conquering a kingdom – who gives a fuck about where borders are drawn? That comes and goes. When the Lady of the Lake was with the Calamities, they broke a story old as dawn. Just picking up a lesser piece of that is... small."

The word was spoken with distaste.

"Last year," I said, "I crushed the skull of a man who thought he was a visionary. He wanted to save Callow, he insisted. Thing is, I don't really believe you can save people anymore. I tried that and it doesn't ever quite seem to work right. I think it's because it doesn't matter, if they worship at the House of Light or sacrifice at some dark altar – most days they're just people, and those are the same everywhere. They till the same fields, pay the same taxes, marry their neighbours and die fat if they're lucky enough."

"Named are more," Archer said. "We're the brighter flame: the people who can actually change things."

"Are we?" I smiled. "The part of the Conquest you pay attention to is the Calamities sweeping all opposition aside. You think that's because they were mighty, but that's not the part that matters. They were figureheads, enablers. Praes won because it had grown as a nation while Callow had not."

"The Empire grew because villains made it grow," she replied flatly.

"And don't you think it's telling the most successful villains since Triumphant put their efforts into reforming institutions rather than building a bunch of flying fortresses?" I asked. "People won that war, not Named. Malicia and Black, they're brilliant – but there's been a lot of brilliant Named over the centuries, on both sides. What makes those two different is that they know change comes from the bottom, not the top."

"That's..." she hesitated.

Heresy, she wanted to say. That it went against everything we knew. History was forged by the hands of those that stood out and crowned themselves with power, those precious few even the Gods recognized as apart from the masses. Except that's a lie. A thousand Dread Emperors and a thousand Kings, but nothing ever changed – until what lay behind them did. It's not the tip of the blade that kills, it's the force that drove it into your belly. That was, I was beginning to grasp, what I'd done wrong in Callow. I'd fought to put all the authority in my hands with the vague notion that I could fix it all afterwards, but how was that any different from what the Lone Swordsman had been doing? There were people all over the Empire who could make things better, if they were allowed to. And if there were forces trying to stand in the way? Well, I was a villain. The parts of Creation I did not like, I would break.

"Right now I have an enemy in Liesse who thinks by sheer will and ruthlessness she'll drag Praes back to a golden age that never existed," I said. "I'm not worried about her, deep down, because even if she claims I'm the one going against the grain she's the one fighting the tide."

I broke off a piece of turnover and popped it into my mouth.

"Last spring, a little boy gave an orc a crown of flowers. There's something beyond any of us happening in the Empire, right now," I said. "Malicia and Black think they control it, but I don't think they do. They're watching the story when what's important is the people telling it. They want me to part of the machine they're built, but I don't think that's my role."

"Then what is?" Archer asked quietly.

"When heroes and villains come knocking in the name of fate," I spoke, tone calm and measured. "When they try to drag us back to where we were by force with a Choir behind them or the host of some howling Hell – I'll kill them all. Every last one of them."

Softly, Archer laughed.

"Ah, Foundling," she murmured. "I was wrong about you – you're not boring at all. You're just as mad as the rest of us."

I looked up at the sky. Night was dying.

"Drink up, Archer," I said. "Dawn's coming and we have a god to rob blind."

Darkening

Hm. Great speech by cat here. Looking forward to what she plans to do in the empire once she's back, seems she plans to empower some groups that might make a difference. Fun as the fae are, I really want to see where things go back in callow.

And Archer says Cath dreams small, while everyone is trying to be great, she aspires to bring greatness.

xacual

I just caught up with the story this last week and decided to comment on this new chapter. I feel like Cat's plan here will go off without a hitch, but it will be the aftereffects that get her.

From what I recall, Kilian's fae grandmother was probably a member of the Summer Court if her hair going fire and vivid green eyes have anything to say about it. So what would happen if we have a now Duchess of the Winter Court having a lover that belongs to the Summer Court? I feel like it would turn into some kind of tragedy. Also feel like it might be the impetus that sets off Kilian getting a Name.

MagnaMalusLupus

What I'm thinking also might happen is that Cat's glamour might stop being a glamour; if that ring is going always have been hers, her looks might too.

stevenneiman

I could easily see either one of those happening. On one hand becoming one of the Fae doesn't shouldn't be possible, but on the other hand she's trying to BS her way into a story where she already is one, in a land where BS is power.

On the other other hand, I feel like it's going to make quite an interesting mess if Cat ends up getting assimilated. That would not go well for the Fae at all.

Ad Astra Major

Not to be overly critical, but as a canary in a mineshaft signal that I think the story's lost the plot a little bit, I'd like to say that the deconstruction of tropes has always been a strength of this story, and the main thing that kept it intriguing early on.

Recently the focus on Roles instead of just Names, and in particular the fae characters inherent need to comply with them is starting to feel like just a big convoluted lampshade hanging on what's essentially a story arc that's being driven by exactly the kind of narrative tropes that previously the story was deconstructing and Cat was focused on subverting.

Cat's no longer the determined urchin willing to consider the methods of villains in pursuit of noble goals, she's just another villain scraping and fighting for power within the Empire. She says she's doing it because she sees something worthwhile to protect by fighting the other factions within the Empire, but is that really any different from any of those self-same factions that want to see their people ascendant?

This whole arc, meanwhile, has been her playing at fae Court drama being driven by a the obscure aims of the King of Winter, and what feels like page space filling entertainment coming as a mix of banter between the party, descriptions of the exotic landscape of the Winter Court, and meta-parody of typical fantasy plots.

It feels lacking in character development, and more like distraction from the actual plot, meant to just take Cat off the board while Malicia and Cordelia play intrigue games. Cat appears to have picked up a new angle to take in her pursuit of power at the end of this chapter, so hopefully that will play out further once we're back out of Arcadia but I kinda wish she had had this insight about two chapters into the process of managing the ruling council and we could've seen all that playing out in place of this arc.

Vortex

I would suggest that it is the first sign of a weak story that you can predict every last thing about it. If the story does nothing but subvert and deconstruct tropes I would get bored of it eventually as the same thing happens over and over. I think it's okay to go on a different direction once in awhile even if that way leans heavily on trope.

Ed

You're kinda right, Cat is no longer the determined urchin, because she isn't. She is the utterly determined commander of a significant force with loyal and quite powerful people following her, you know things that have developed over a bit of time for her. Wait what is that character development? Well fuck me with a ditch digger.

Right at this point in time she is attempting to avoid having the part of the world she is in charge of, you know commander, significant forces etc. To avoid having that overrun by a massive Fae incursion which would incidentally kinda kill all her forces and also all the people she has a responsibility for. And also kinda end the story, though being killed hasn't been all that permanent before for her so it may but tragedy of that level is not really where I'd like to see this story go. If it did however I'd still read it, because you get writing like Cats monologue at the end of the chapter there.

Cat becoming entangled with beings so far above her power level and beating them because she refuses to lose? That is how this story has gone from the very first chapter and that is how it is still going.

jonnney

If anything her epiphany about the the best way to improve Callow is coming too soon. She is an orphan pit fighter who had a few months of training from Calamities, a few weeks of training in a military academy, and a year+ of acting as a general of a legion. The idea that she could figure out both what the Empress and Black are doing and then how to apply the process to Callow in a few months of governing full on Mary Sue territory.

It only makes sense that she can come to this realization because she is dealing with the alien minds of the fae.

Matthew

I think it makes sense. The importance of institutions vs. Named is something Black has probably been drilling into her for her entire training. He made her read Agricultural atlases.

This isn't an idea that Black was hiding. I also have to imagine that while she's been in charge of Callow, she's been asking Black a lot of questions. He probably gave her an introduction since he use to run Callow. He set up all of the institutions in Callow. It makes no sense that he wouldn't tell her the philosophy behind everything he's done in Callow for the past 2 decades and ask her to think of improvements.

1shot4living

Also, Name shenanigans. Remember, they're all mad here.

jonnney

@Matthew

Well Black went to the free cities within a week or two of Catherine becoming the quasiqueen of Callow and scrying doesn't work over mountain ranges because of plot reasons. So while Catherine has many questions about ruling the only guidance she has received from the calamities is a few conversations with Malicia's meat puppet.

Black might not be hiding the theory behind the reforms, but he can't just spell it out for her. It doesn't match his teaching style and it doesn't allow Catherine to forge her own path. Yes he gave her the atlas and a children's book, but that is all he gave her. If he tells her what to do the story of Callow doesn't change.

callmesteve

I disagree with the OP here. She's been fighting and learning for about as long in-world as we've been reading this. I don't doubt that Black has been talking about this out of scene with her, and we can tell that he's been pointing her at it for quite a while. Heck, that scene where she beats Heiress in book 1 is starting her off on this. It might be to deal with Names or Fae, but Foundling is also very far from stupid. Also note: She may have figured out the why, but the how is much harder.

I have no doubts that the author will pull a [b]glorious[/b] plot twist at the end anyway.

I think that what you are complaining about is an inherent weakness of the serial format, arcs that are a little bit off of the main story thread seem to drag and be lasting forever, but if you were reading it in a published format it would be a quick side jaunt.

Uh. Careful there, Cat. Follow too closely a story that ends with the heroine killing her surrogate father, and methinks Warlock will have some words for you.

stevenneiman

Oh dear. That's a very good point.

maresther23

It might actually help, Fate hates repetition, and if she already killed her Father...

M

Black was very careful to **not** become a father figure to Cat. I think it was even explicitly stated at one point.

esryok

2.12 – Reproval

I was perfectly fine with having no idea who my progenitors were – parents were more of an abstract concept for me than anything else. If anything the closest thing I'd ever had to a father figure was Black, and wasn't that a terrifying thought?

2.14 – Situation

"Catherine," he greeted me warmly.

I found myself engulfed in a hug I leaned into, against my better judgement. I had missed him, much as it pained me to admit it.

2.49 – Triumph

Warlock had said that one day I would have to make a choice, and I believed him. And when that day came, when the knife was in my hand, I knew that if I killed [Black] I'd miss him. As a teacher, as a mentor, as perhaps the closest thing to a father figure I'd ever had.

I believe Black's efforts were insufficient.

pyrohawk21

hahahaaahaaaHAAHAAAAHAAAAAAAAA!

Oh man... Cat's going to be a NIGHTMARE in the future to those trying to protect the existing world order. She has found the role she wishes to play, and whilst it is heresy against everything people have believed before, may eternity and existence help you if you go against, for all of the Heavens and the deepest pits of hell will not.

Because Cat is the Guardian of Progress. And nothing will stop her from destroying you if you attempt to stop Progress from occurring.

nick012000

You know, for all the scorn heaped on the flying fortresses by those in the New Villainy camp, I think they really would be a significant force multiplier to any nation that possessed them, as long as they didn't grow to be dependent on them. America keeps the world's strongest Air Force in the world for a reason, you know. Flying fortresses can't replace boots on the ground, but they can **supplement** them if used properly (most likely in a logistical role).

Same thing for things like the invisible tiger armies; they obviously can't replace the legions, but they could supplement them by doing the things that they can do that the Legions cannot (namely, acting as deadly night skirmishers). Heck, even the Knights of Callow fall into this sort of area.

By spurning such obviously useful auxillaries to their Legions, they're effectively turning down power out of ideological reasons, and that's basically heresy, both to Evil in general, and to their philosophy specifically: they're acting like hypocrites.

Bubba HoTep

Either the side of Good has good anti-aircraft spells, or flying fortresses require unmanageable amount of fuel, fuel being human sacrifices of course.

GiantTurtle

I feel like you're forgetting some of the history, and the wider context. For starters, the intelligent tiger army was an outright failure, with the tigers turning on the empire pretty much straight after they were created, and achieving nothing of note.

The flying fortress, though effective (I believe it was instrumental in the last successful invasion of callow before the calamities?) would be an absolute guzzler of human sacrifices, if the Tyrant's floating siege towers are any indication. More importantly, it was the flagship of the current Tyrant, and almost certainly deeply infused by Name fuckery. This brings the empire into over reliance as it becomes part of the Tyrant's story, and hence, Hero-bait. This is exactly the kind of reliance that Black warns against with enchanted weapons, and we see in this chapter with Hakram's Find. These things can all be powerful, but ultimately lead to their downfall.

None of this is to say that Black & the Calamities haven't made attempts to supplement their power: they've seriously strengthened the legions by incorporating the orks and goblin munitions, and possibly even the ogres as shock troopers (not sure about that). The point is that they've been careful to avoid infusing their powerbase with their name, which is a fatal mistake in this world, at least for villains.

I wouldn't be surprised if the calamities had considered these options, and judging by the use of the blood magic and meat puppets, they've found some to their liking, that they can incorporate. My bad if any of this is inaccurate, I was working from memory.

Unoriginal

They aren't, stories are dangerous things and they can't risk picking up parts of stories that end with the villain's defeat, they have to forge a new path and this is recognized in the text previously.

And about the knights, twofold reasons: First, they do want heavy cavalry with similar capabilities to a knight but that comes with fundamental problems along the lines of What breeding stock would they use.

Furthermore, A chivalric order is not the route they want to go about it in either, they would have to rebrand it to be something other than, well here's an example: Knights of the Rose Order or whatever overblown purple-y prose name was picked

beleester

From what we've seen of the Tyrant's fortresses, there seems to be two big issues:

1. They're expensive to produce (like any castle), and on top of that, they require major-league ritual magic with lots of sacrifices.

2. They require a magical anchor that can fail catastrophically if, say, a ragtag band of heroes stages a daring raid on them. In general, the New Villains don't like to rely on magical items that will always end up failing them at the worst possible moment.

As for the sentient tigers, the problem with them was getting them to obey orders. Invisible tigers are fun to unleash on your enemies, not so fun when they start gnawing on your own troops.

(The sentient tigers and the invisible army were actually two separate villainous schemes, but combining the two sounds like it would only make the problems worse.)

stevenneiman

The problem is that it's a fundamental part of the story that any villain who relies on fancy magic will have it backfire or be cut off at the worst possible moment, granting the heroes a victory. While all of those magical solutions could be useful under the right circumstances, most would need substantial investments and a certain degree of reliance to be better than conventional solutions. Use flying fortresses for logistics, and any time it would actually do something carts wouldn't a team of plucky heroes would just come along and destroy your fortress, leaving your troops to starve. Also, the invisible army and the tigers were separate incidents, and I think the problems were that the invisibility magic didn't work and the tigers deserted.

jonnney

Meh, the tyrant of Helike had like 7 flying fortresses and all it took was a few hours and a group of newbie heroes to take them down. Having an army in a castle in the sky is nice until the castle falls from the sky.

You want air support? Send in the Sovereign of the Red Skies. Ain't nothing gonna be flying up there.

You want deadly night skirmishers? Send in the goblins they can slit throats and blow shit up.

nipi

"Killing her birth father on the field, she became a Princess of Winter only to find the horrible fate still dogged her: she was sent as the champion of Winter to settle a duel, only to find the man who'd raised her to be her opponent."

Are you sure thats the story you want to go with Cat? You do remember Warlocks warning about betraying Black?

Nicole

Somehow I doubt trying to lock her into a story will work very well. She already died as a "loss" just to make sure the end still happened the way she wanted.

Dana

She's planning to become the daughter of a Fae & a powerful member of the Winter Court. Why wouldn't it work? She's sticking her head in the noose.

permeakra

So, Steal, Break, and Kill? Girl, that's hardcore. And you aim to be the antithesis of the Bard... This is going to be interesting.

Akim

Yeap.

The Bard still thinks Malicia is the enemy.

And Catherines goal makes her the spiritual successor of Amadeus.

His goal was to rip out the gods heart and show it to them bevor he kills them and breaks the mold.

He taught Cat to see the stories, to be a writer instead of teaching her his own Role to inherit.

This is what this Arc is about.

Cat entered the Realm of Story to learn Writing by choice instead of instinct.

Rq

We know she has take, and break seems very very in character, but I don't see kill as being an aspect for her. My money is on "inspire" to parallel Blacks "lead" the way take and (presumably) break parallel conquer and destroy

stevenneiman

My thought is Choose. It would allow her to perform such feats as resisting influence and mind control, and possibly also to break free from the story for a few key moments, like when the story calls for the bard to escape instead of getting killed.

sheer_falacy

I think some kind of resistance to influence and mind control would be very appropriate. In the whole story, probably the things that pissed her off the most were when Black mind controlled her not to interfere with the hangings and later when she realized that the only reason she cared at all about the hangings was because her Name was trying to force her into a redemption arc. She really hated both of those.

permeakra

"Kill" is what she declared, and the law of narrative is that statements come back to bite you in your ass.

---

This level of determination makes me think that even if Cat loses her try at Dread Empress' crown and ends up a disembodied head in the Hall of Screams, she'll just lead a revolt to give Praes its first "democratic government".

Applemonkeyman

Shequi

What Hakram's multiple attempts at Finding her a Story tell me is that there are a lot of potential branches that Tale can take. She needs to be very careful or she will end up in one with an ending she doesn't like at all.

Nairne

That's why she is stacking the "facts" in her favor. The heirloom, the prophecy, etc.

Though I admit the prophecy part could be weak. Although, most traditional stories end with the prophecy fulfilled so it could work. It could also be the kind of wishful thinking that drags her into deep shit, and we still haven't seen her in that kind of situation in this book. Half dead and escaping the fire she created in the first book or full on dead and having to scrap for a win against both Aqua and William (I admit it went decently well for her, but it was still a pretty close thing), losing Seek to the corruption devil (demon? having a hard time remembering which one it was), take your pick. Cat just has a knack for being thinking she is on the bottom, just to make a wrong step and fall into an even deeper and darker ravine. Still, as they say, the Goddess of Fortune waits in the deepest hell (or if you like that analogy, then think of Pandora's Box).

It all depends on how much she prepares and how well she can execute, and improvise (and I bet she will have to because she doesn't have enough time to read all the stories).

stevenneiman

Devils are the small fry, which there are an infinite number of and I think also infinite varieties of. Demons are the big guys, whose presence is enough to turn the tide of battle of defeat entire armies.

George

Devils get stronger with age; there's a really powerful ice one that Apprentice has a contract with.

Dylan Tullos

I've been reading this story for a while, but this chapter helped me realize some things that I hadn't quite been able to put into words earlier. I was impressed both by Catherine's understanding of how power comes from people at the bottom, not just those at the top, and by her failure to think through the logical consequences of her thoughts.

The people of Callow do not want to be ruled by foreigners. Even when they're not particularly fond of their own nobility, their lords and ladies are still Callowan, not Praes. Countess Marchford is many things, but no one could call her a puppet of Praes, dancing on the Dread Empire's strings; Catherine Foundling, on the other hand, is the Black Knight's Squire, a loyal servant of the Dread Empire. Rule by her is rule by Praes, no matter how she tries to disguise it. Malicia and Black can give her as much rope as they please, but at the end of the day, she jumps when Black says "Frog".

The Dread Empire slaughtered Callow's army. Their Governors robbed the country for years, and their soldiers murdered not only those who rebelled, but their families. Every one of the fifty people that Black hanged at the inn had friends and distant relatives, and none of them are going to forget that Catherine Foundling murdered their loved ones. The next generation of Callowan heroes aren't magically going to support Praes because one collaborator saved a city from the devils that another faction of Pres unleashed on them. Black seriously underestimates the human ability to hold a grudge, especially against foreign invaders with a radically different culture.

Catherine talks about how a little boy gave an orc a crown of flowers, but that orc would have crucified the child in an instant if Catherine gave the order. The Legions have been killing traitors, and the families of traitors, for a very long time. A single moment of joy and gratitude can't erase that legacy, and it can't erase the knowledge that your "savior" would torture you to death if their superior officer told them to.

Time and time again in history, we see tyrannies fall not when they are at their most oppressive, but when they are seeking to reform and loosen their grip. The people they rule still remember the bloodshed and terror of the old days, and they no longer have the same overwhelming, constant fear to keep them in line. Catherine thinks that "democracy" means progress in the direction she wants, or at least a direction she's comfortable with; but if the people of Callow actually had a vote, they'd string her mentor up on the gallows and put her right next to him.

agumentic

Except people of Callow already think that Catherine Founding is "one of ours" in the end. For every killed traitor there is a Fifteen's soldier and his family and friends, a servant of a Baroness Kendal, someone from Marchford or just a Callowian who is afraid to speak out.

Peasants may prefer Callowan nobles (though that could be argued), but the efficient suppression left them no open way to rebel. But now they don't need to – because they can just support Catherine Founding, who is surely leads a quiet rebellion, reading her forces until their's weakness to strike. She even managed to put one of the better leaders of Liesse's rebellion – Procerian plot, that – into the ruling council, and accepts rebellion's soldiers into her legion. She protected a town against a horrible demon, released by the actual Praesian noble, and even turned away from the execution before being order by Black Knight. Every good thing that comes from the government is probably her idea too. What more arguments do you need? She is certainly on the Callow's side, outsmarting every enemy.

People will go for surprising strides to explain the conflicting ideas in their heads, such as "Praes is bad" and "My life's getting better" and "Non-noble Praesians are not that different or bad when you get to know them" and "If I openly rebel, I'll die". Cat offers a very good solution for that conundrum, for all the above reasons.

Euodiachloris

She might be Evil, but she badass and she's our Callow-branded form of Evil. Cut her open, and see "Fuck You, I'm Laure" written all through her.

Letouriste

Hum...your cat is pretty much in agreement with our time;) This is exactly the philosophy building up everywhere in democracy these days.the enemy being most corporations,the sheeps trusting flowering words without thinking much(in politics and religion) and the people lacking access to modern education and basic ressources.

Here the first two are Names and people living in the past(you shown that when only the veterans were willing to participate in the rebellion,not the young people) and the third is people in procer.they know only warfare for so long and are short-sighted

maresther23

Down with the Great Men Theory!

Dylan Tullos

Agumentic, Catherine asks one of her own Callowan soldiers what he thinks of the Empire and the Empress. His response is a four-letter word. As far as I can tell, no one in Callow is loyal to the Dread Empire; some people are willing to fight the Legions, and others aren't, but there is no substantial "Team Praes" faction in Callow.

Procer certainly supported the rebellion, but the First Prince can't make peasants rebel if they're happy under the Dread Empire. Any attempts to label the rebellion as a "Proceran plot" will be roughly as successful as the unending Soviet efforts to claim that every independence movement in the Baltics was the product of the CIA. Whatever Praes says, the rebels know full well that they chose to rise, and that they would do it again if they thought it would work this time.

The narrative of "Catherine Founding as secret rebel" only works until it becomes obvious that she's not going to rebel. Then she's not a hero, just another collaborator in the service of the Black Knight. Given how hated Black is throughout Callow, her close association with him is only going to undermine her legitimacy over time. No one is more despised than the man who conquered the Kingdom and murdered the families of rebels, and Catherine is his handpicked apprentice.

All those non-noble Praesian legionaries seem like nice folks, but Callow's people still remember how they hanged little Alice. She was only nine at the time, but her da was a rebel, and the sergeant dragged her to the gallows and strung her up right next to him. Every time that nice sergeant gets a drink, the barkeep remembers how she pulled the lever and murdered his daughter's best friend. That's not the kind of memory that goes away because someone tips generously and tells drunken stories about how much they miss their family.

I agree that people will go to surprising lengths to construct a consistent narrative out of inconsistent facts. But the fundamental narrative is still resistance; finding a way to free Callow, put the Black Knight's head on a pike, and hang every Praesian legionary from the nearest tree. If Catherine wanted to be part of that narrative, she could try to make herself Queen. If she chooses to ignore what the people of Callow want, she'll be discarded in favor of a new champion.

Catherine is trapped in her own narrative, where the blood feuds of centuries, prejudice against worshipers of Evil, and xenophobia about orcs and goblins can be magically set aside because she has better ideas. She thinks that she's fighting the Gods, and she might be able to win that battle. The battle she can't win- the battle that it's absurd to even try to win- is the one where she sells Callowans on the idea that being subjects of the Dread Empress is something they want.

esryok

Could go either way. I doubt we'll see a full scale rebellion again, for a couple reasons:

1. There is no critical mass of rebellious people left in Callow

– There was **just** a rebellion which saw many of Callow's die-hard patriots die hard at the hands of Black.

– The political narrative of "Cat/Praes is the worst" has been muddled by Black's long efforts to maintain apathy in the latest generation and Cat's own actions, e.g. establishing the ruling council, sparing Baroness Dormer, and saving Marchford and Liesse from hellspawn. Folks need a clearer sign of Evil to rally against her.

2. There's nobody to rally behind.

– The only nobles of note left in Callow are the Countess of Marchford (Cat) and the Duchess of Daoine (not trusted by the rest of Callow).

– If we believe Black, there won't be any new Callowan heroes until Cat fails in her Role.

3. The Narrative won't allow it.

– We just had a rebellion. It's too soon for a sequel.

– Cat is positioning herself as the protector of Callow. A tragedy about her failing to protect Callow is more satisfying than a tragedy about Callow not giving her a chance to do so.

So if Cat goes down I think it'll have to be from the Tenth Crusade and the House of Light's condemnation. Or fallout from Winter's/Summer's meddling. Or the Guild of Assassins murders her. Or Masego betrays her 'cause something something corruption. Or the High Ridge tribe screws her over. Or Akua turns Callow into a new layer of Hell.

Oh what lovely choices Fate has.

jonnney

What Catherine is really doing is selling Callowans on the idea that a Meritocracy is better than a Monarchy. In the old Callow non-named peasant can never be a baron, count, or king no matter how skilled they are or how hard they work. In the new Callow a skilled non-named peasant who works hard enough and long enough might become the governor of a province. She has broken the Aristocracy, given the every man the opportunity to raise himself up from obscurity, and improved the quality of life of everyone in the country.

Would you rather live in an evil empire with a high quality of life and the opportunity for advancement or in a good kingdom where you're born poor and you die poor no matter how hard you work?

permeakra

Erg, dude. It is a medieval-style world. Meaning that for 90+ % people the world ends beyond plains of their village and their lord is a representative of God on Earth. Meritocracy is not a thing there.

Cities? There are some people their that would like meritocracy in a form of plutocracy to take place, because they have money.

And other people? They don't give a damn.

Rhino

Plup~

So, to begin with, french speaker here. I blame any occurence of bad english and/or insufferable arrogance on my origins.

Anyway, I finally caught up with the story after a year of on-and-off reading, and I thought that I had to tell you how much I loved it. Cat is imo a great protagonist, her allies are a lovable bunch and you genuinly made me laugh a few time (for context, it's not something that happens that much to me, and you did it through another language). So, yay to you !

As a sidenote, as a bisexual I was very, very happy to come across a main character who is one. So yeah, my liking of Cat may not be that obective, but this the first time in my life that I can indentify myself sexually with a protagonist, so sue me. Double yay to you !

Finally, I currently have a FATE pen&paper rpg campaign inspired by your take on Names, Roles, Aspects and Fate (heh) running strong for five months now. I put together a bunch of genre-savvy fantasy geeks, and we're having a great time. Triple yay to you !

Anyway, keep going strong, hope you are having as a good time writing his story that I'm having reading it.

Yitzi

"The Gods disagreed on the nature of things: some believed their children should be guided to greater things, while others believed that they must rule over the creatures they had made."

I'm starting to suspect that these might not correspond to Good and Evil per se, but rather that Good and Evil are both of the "rule over the creatures they had made" persuasion...and Cat is the champion of the other side.

Letouriste

Yeah, i had this impression when she resurrected herself: maybe some god helped her and encourage her in the background.

The way creation is now the "rule over" faction probably hurt badly the other side.

Procer is on the other side, they don't depend of heroes, but they are way too late and underdeveloped. their first prince is a warmongster and the population have Been oppressed for one or two generation, only been used for dumb war.

Maybe that god faction is struggling right now and need cat to change things

jonnnney

Remember the opening to the Prologue is a quote from the "Book of All Things" which is essentially the Bible of the good gods in Callow. It is going to be biased against the Gods Below.

Dana

No: the champion of the "not rule over their creatures" side is obviously Cordelia. She doesn't have a Name. Cat does. Cat lost the game at the beginning of the story.

Stephen R. Marsh

Can't wait until Cat has to save Heiress from the champion of summer ...

That is the real twist, of course.

Dylan Tullos

ersyok, the question is not "can Black terrify Callow into obedience?". The answer to that question is Yes, at least most of the time. The question is "Can Catherine make Callowans feel like they're okay with being part of the Dread Empire of Praes?"

The entire mythology and culture of Callow is built around hostility to Praes. Their great Heroes and Kings fought against the Dread Empire, and every child grows up hearing stories of the people who refused to surrender to the forces of Evil. The only difference between active rebels and obedient subjects is the belief that Callow can win; if they thought they would prevail, the country would rise up in a heartbeat.

Black can win battles, and he can terrify people into submission. But he can't make Callowans into Praesi, and he can't make them forget their culture or their long, proud tradition of resistance to the Dread Empire.

Catherine is casting herself as the protector of Callow. The real tragedy won't be her failure to protect Callow; Catherine is good at violence, and he knows how to fight outside enemies. Catherine's great sin and failing is hubris, and it should be her downfall. She always thinks that she can fight harder and win through, that she can beat any foe. But when the people she seeks to protect are her enemy, when ordinary Callowans finally realize that they don't need Heroes and rise up on their own, Catherine will finally see that she can't protect her people from their own choices.

Soronel Haetir

Except that those stories aren't being told nearly so often (or openly) as they once were. Black has been in control of the education system for a couple decades now, the people just having kiddies of their own are the first to have gone through that entire system. And you can be sure that Callowan schools under the Dread Empire are not telling any history of successful resistance. They are instead playing up every bit of corruption, self-dealing and uncaring attitude that the now-dead nobles displayed. And also being sure to point out how taxes are so very much lower now (remember, that is why Black was angry with at Mazus – Mazus was making people care again).

Unoriginal

Parents teach their kids stories and not every child goes to an Imperial school keep that in mind, yes it's a logical assumption that is happening but the process would take generations and they don't have mandatory schooling for everyone.

Also, this is a high fantasy setting, Information and stories can't just propagate online like what those of us who have grown up in the internet age expect.

jonnnney

Actually the answer to the question, "Can Black terrify Callow into obedience?" is no. Black does terrify most Callowans, but he achieves obedience through apathy not fear. If he only ruled through fear then there would be a rebellion every year and every new hero would have immediate backing from the populace.

The culture of Callow isn't just hostile to Praesi. It is hostile to the Principality for when they treated it like a protectorate after the crusades. It is hostile to the Golden Bloom due to what the elves did to the Deoraithe. Callow is better than the rest of the continent.

Why would the ordinary people of Callow rise up? They don't need heroes, but they still need rulers. "Our lives are significantly improved by these heroes, but we don't really need them. Lets murder all of them because of reasons!!!!"

M

Black has a spy network. Networks like that are basically designed to break cultures over time. Take Catherine-she grew up in Laure , and as such was influenced by Callowan sulture, but her first thought when she desired a stronger Callow wasn't about starting a rebellion, it was about joining the legions.

Callow's culture is already massively changing, and that's what makes Black such a great... not!villain for me.

Dylan Tullos

In a peasant society, education usually isn't about school. Farm kids work during the day, and they learn their lessons from their parents and older family members. The stories that their parents and grandparents tell them shape their worldview, and they're not going to prefer some Praesi bureaucrat's version of history to their own granddad's story of the final battle against Black.

This is Catherine's fundamental problem. She's not just trying to say "you can't beat Black." That's an easy narrative to sell. She's trying to say "you want to join Black." You want to join the man who murdered your great-uncle, who hanged your next-door neighbor and his entire family, who put his boot on Callow's neck.

It doesn't matter how corrupt or despicable Callow's nobles are. Absence makes the heart grow fonder, and it's easy to forget how much you hated the old Baron when he died bravely fighting against the Praesi. Whatever the Praesi tell them, Callow's people remember the Queen of Blades. They remember the First Crusade, and the fall of Dread Empress Triumphant. Erasing the memory of a culture is almost impossible, and it's even more difficult when everyone knows what you're trying to do.

For thousands of years, Callow fought against the Praesi, and they won more than they lost. That legacy matters. When Black tells them to forget, to submit, to admit that they're inferior and that they can't possibly resist the Dread Empire, it just makes them more determined to hold on to their identity as a people. The last rebellion had little chance of success, pitting an army of farmers against the Legions of Terror and an untested band of heroes against the Calamities, yet thousands rose anyway.

I'm trying to imagine a narrative that would make Americans happy to be ruled by Russians, or Russians happy to be ruled by Americans. I can't think of one, and the rivalry between America and Russia is a historical eyeblink compared to the endless conflict between Praes and Callow. Even the Gallowborne, who joined the Legions of Terror to avoid being hanged, have too much integrity to buy what Black is selling. Catherine may be the only Callowan who wouldn't rise up if she thought that she could win.

Propaganda works best when it's reinforcing beliefs that already exist. Low taxes are nice, and nobles can be awful, but Callowans aren't eager to believe that they'd be better off as a province in somebody else's empire. They aren't enthused about a chance to bend the knee to people who think murdering an entire family is an efficient way to punish one person's treason. Black's agents can talk all they want, and people will smile and nod in public, but the stories they tell behind closed doors are stories of Heroes, not tales of good collaborators who did as they were told.

Soronel Haetir

Perhaps if Black's goal were actually getting the Callowans to like the Empire I would agree with you. But up to this point his aim has been much less ambitious, apathy is good enough for his purposes. Apathy ensures that the Callowans won't rebel, once that apathy is deep seated enough then would come time to make the peasants actually choose the Empire. It's no accident that the first serious Callowan rebellion kicked off after a Preasi governor got greedy.

Changing the minds of Callowans is likely Cat's long-term job (at least as Malicia and Black see things).

Dylan Tullos

There are different kinds of apathy. One form is "Who cares who's in charge?" Callow doesn't have this form of apathy. Twenty thousand peasants rose with Countess Marchford; you don't get that kind of rebellion out of people who aren't concerned.

Another form of apathy is "Why bother, nothing's going to change anyway." This is quite powerful in Callow, and it explains why more young people didn't rise. They don't remember an independent Callow, and they're used to thinking of the Legions as invincible. This kind of apathy is powerful, but it's also fragile. If the Exiled Prince had beaten Catherine, all of the fence-sitters would have seen that the Empire wasn't invincible. The problem with using fear and despair as motivators is that your first major defeat will show the people who still hate you that you can be beaten.

The greedy governor was just the trigger; Callow's people were looking for an excuse and an opportunity to rebel, and they would have found it sooner or later. Despite all of Black's work, they were still willing to rise up decades after their conquest and occupation.

Catherine is Black's apprentice. Right now, the people of Callow are eager to see one of their own in power, and they're anticipating the day when she betrays her masters and drives the Praesi out. In the long term, her continued loyalty to Black will take away any legitimacy she has in the eyes of her people.

Convincing a nation that they should be happy with rule by an alien culture, especially one they have a long, proud history of resisting, is never an easy job. The Gallowborne lieutenant says it best when Catherine asks him what he thinks about Praes. "F*** the Empire," he said, spitting to the side again. "F*** the Tower, and f*** the f***** Empress too." If that's the reaction that Praes inspires in a man who serves in it's armies, they're a long way from apathy.

jonnnney

How many times are you gonna post the same comment that ignores fundamental aspects of the story and the nature of the world the story is in?

Book 2 Prologue

"We are running out of options, uncle," Cordelia admitted. "The longer we delay, the more the Empire strengthens their grip on Callow. The reports are unanimous: outside the cities, most of the Kingdom no longer cares it is under occupation. They do not think the Legions of Terror can be beaten and the standard of living for the peasantry under Praes is better than it was under the Fairfax dynasty. They have no stomach for rebellion and if we wait a few more years I am afraid they might actually resist an attempt to liberate them."

You might think you can compare Americans to Callowans for some strange reason but it is TRUTH in this world that most of the kingdom does not care that it is under occupation.

Dylan Tullos

The main plot of Book 2 is Callow rebelling against the Dread Empire. Thousands of peasants decide to risk their lives fighting against the Legions, knowing that they're going up against the armies that conquered Callow and the Calamities who slew their greatest heroes. That's curious behavior for people who "don't care that they're under occupation".

Large numbers of Callowans want to rebel against Praes when the Dread Empire is at its strongest, when their harvests are good, and when the rebellion is being led by a Hero whose leadership skills are practically nonexistent. Clearly, the rebels aren't "apathetic" about who runs their country. As for resisting liberation, Callow has bad historical memories of being "liberated" and turned into a client state of the Principate. They're not interested in changing from a province of Praes to a province of the Principate, but that doesn't mean they don't dream of being free from foreign occupation altogether.

Peasants are never fond of foreign armies, and they're justifiably scared of rebellions that could lead to the Legions burning their crops and hanging their children. The real test of loyalty isn't "Are they willing to obey when we'll kill them if we don't?" but "Will they be loyal if we take the army away?". "Loyalty" inspired by fear of consequences and the apathy that comes with despair are not remotely the same thing as actual contentment. If people weren't concerned about who was in charge, Black wouldn't need to have an army on hand to keep his boot on Callow's neck.

You keep saying that Black doesn't rule through fear, that Callowans don't really care who's in charge. If that's the case, why does Praes need Legions to garrison the country? Couldn't they just take the soldiers away and have Callowans remain loyal without Legion swords at their throats?

Taking one quote out of context ignores the larger narrative: Callowans hate Praes, and they hate being occupied. Lieutenant Farrier serves in the Fifteenth, fighting for Praes, and his feelings about the Dread Empire are expressed in one four-letter word. He's not resisting because he thinks that the rebellion is doomed, not because he "doesn't care". If he had Malicia and Black at his mercy, he'd put their heads in a noose and watch them kick.

I'm surprised that you would accuse me of ignoring fundamental aspects of the story when half of Book I and most of Book II are about Callow rebelling against Praes. You say that the truth is that Callowans don't care about the occupation, but I guess all of the thousands of peasant rebels who fought with Countess Marchford and the Lone Swordsman didn't get the news.

M

Plot of book 2 isn't Callow rebelling against the Dread Empire, it is about an antagonist to Cat failing to start as massive rebellion against the empire as he wanted to. If you want, it's about old Callow (swordsman, heroes, rebellion against occupation) against the new Callow (Catherine, villains, we are a province of praes now). And the new Callow won. That story arc is done, settled, finished – Callow won't rebel until Catherine either completely fails in her ambitions or gets new ones.

As for the quote from the captain you keep mentioning... That was before the battle with the devils, when Gallowborne hated Cat. After, they were seen fanatically defending her against any criticism. Think that signifies change in opinions too?

permeakra

>to hold on to their identity as a people.

You assume that there is a nation of Callowan people.

There is not one. Nations are a thing of industrialized period, because they are not a thing if there is no mass media and mass culture.

MetruX

Well, to compliment the others who are speaking of the rebellion, I must say some simple differences from this world to our own, since from a common reader vision it won't appear.

First and foremost, this world is ruled by actual Gods who intervene in the world, not directly, but through a kind of subtle mind control. We see it in heroes and in villains, it is very prominent, but you forget that EVERYONE is influenced by them, just not as much as the Named. When a Hero appears and say aloud "I WILL free this kingdom!" the people will rally. They will feel the will to rally and rebel, even if they were fine before, and will account it to the Hero's charm. Besides, the percentage of population who rised to the war was trully small, evermore if you notice how half the troops were the, previously, almost destroyed military of the kingdom. Thus, the first point is: the story shapes people in this reality ALOT more than in our own.

Secondly, I must notice how death is differently viewed throughout the ages. In the beginning, death was common, we struggled to live each day. We evolved, and life got easier. Then, we started killing each other more and more, since the world around us couldn't give us that much danger. Finally, war became a relative rare thing, medicine allowed us to commonly outlive the old nobles, and even punishing of crimes has become lenient. We now see death as something trully atrocious, that should not happen and will be seen once in a couple of years, usually in someone that you don't know very well. Now, looking at the picture in the world of this story... Death is commonplace. You have a war every once in a while, there are plagues and magic, monsters, devils and fae, even angels and Named bringing death all the time. Even if you live without war, pest and famine, you will still know people who died to hazards or to Named shenanigans. When you see death every month instead of every couple of years, it looses part of it's importance. Thus, the second point is: these peasants may very well not care half as much about these death's than we would, ESPECIALLY when the new way makes things better, with less deaths and suffering.

Thirdly, you must see that the Story of every place in here is NOT shaped by theyr full history, only by the Role that this place takes. What does this means in practical terms is that when this Role is broken, a time of Change will come, not only in the way of life, but on the way of thinking and feeling. What Change this will be, will depend on who holds the rein and molds this place. This is precisely why Black can't make it himself and neither control Cat into doing it, it must come from within the kingdom, since Callow is not completely part of Praes. As long as she is the one making the choices, and doesn't fail in her purpose, the whole reality will slightly bend to have her way, until it fixates in a new Role for Callow.

Lastly, but not least, although it's not story related, I am not a native english speaker, thus there may (and probably will) be errors in this big text. I hope you don't put it against my arguments, since my errors come from this lack, and not of another kind.

Dylan Tullos

MetruX:

Your mastery of English is considerably better than my mastery of any language but English. I shudder at the thought of a native Spanish speaker reading one of my old posts in Spanish.

I agree with much of what you're saying. Names and Roles do change the nature of reality, and both Praes and Callow are forced into a Story. The problem that Black and Catherine have is that the Story the Gods tell favors the status quo. Triumphant can conquer the continent, but in the end the world unites to bring her down. Though I do believe Triumphant was far more capable and successful than practically all of the other Tyrants, she had the Story working with her in the first part, helping her to conquer the whole continent. Once she won, the Story turned to the side of Good, since Evil can't be allowed a permanent win. The more she tapped into the power of Narrative, the more vulnerable she became to the underlying belief that Evil has to lose in the end.

If the villain won, there would be no story. The First and Second Crusades conquer Praes, but in the end Terriblis II drives the crusaders out of his Empire. Terriblis II was also a capable and brilliant ruler, but he did not win entirely through his own ability any more than Triumphant lost entirely through hers. The Story wanted Praes to lose, but if it disappeared, there would be recurring villain for the next chapter. Black complains that the deck is stacked against Evil, but the deck is actually rigged in favor of repetition; Evil invades, Good drives them out, but Evil is always allowed to return to their den and plot the next invasion.

Right now, the Gods seek to free Callow so that the Story can continue, with Praes invading every few years. They're like an author who always wants to reset the world of their story to the way it was, and while they haven't succeeded perfectly, they've largely managed to keep Callow and Praes locked in the same old cycle. Black seeks to break that cycle, but he can't do it as long as the Story the Gods tell has power.

Black has great power, but that power is limited by his Role. His solution is to share power with the Legions and their commanders, ordinary people whose rules aren't prescribed by the narrative. Though they have less power, they have more agency, and they can prevail where Black and the Calamities could not win on their own.

Black isn't just interested in finding a new Role for Callow; he wants to break the Roles and the Story altogether. In the long term, this means putting more and more agency in the hands of unNamed, like the Legionaries and commanders who conquered Callow. Any change that provides more agency to ordinary people weakens the Story, which is all about Named.

The problem with weakening the Story is that Black doesn't get to pick and choose. Callow relies on Heroes because they've always had lots of them, but Procer has only one Hero, and their government and military don't depend on having Named in charge. As Callow becomes more like Procer, they won't need Named to tell them to rise up, and they'll become more capable of thinking and planning for themselves.

If Black succeeds, and the Story weakens, then Callow will behave less like a Good nation and more like an ordinary nation. And ordinary nations hate being occupied by foreigners who come from a radically different culture, much less foreigners who are actually members of different species.

Black's two goals are to break the power of Stories and to add Callow to the Praesi Empire; unfortunately for him, those goals are largely incompatible. As soon as Praes suffers a military defeat or another round of civil wars, Callow will rise up and reclaim their independence, whether they have a Story behind them or not.

nick012000

I really doubt that. The whole point of Squire's Story is that she's turning Callow from a Good nation to an Evil nation, by amplifying their negative traits, most notably their stubborn independence. The next time the forces of Good come knocking, if Squire's been successful, the people of Callow will go "fuck off" and rally behind her, regardless of whether or not they're still being ruled by the Tower.

Aarik

Minor... Nitpick? Random fact?

The story of David vs Goliath has a bit more to it that gets overlooked to turn it into a faith allegory or a bigger harder fall thing:

David was offered the standard armor, shield, sword setup thing Goliath was using for their dual-

And David went "Wait, I'm not a soldier, I don't know how to use this shit, I'mma bring the sling I've been using to kill wolves for years instead, I know how to use that."

The story was about not fighting your enemy where they're strong. David fought using the tools he was best at, rather than what was expected of him. That's how the big nation's get you, they trick you into trying to fight them the same way they do, 'fairly'/'honorably' where they have all the advantages.

Also a little bit of not trying to be what you aren't.

Dylan Tullos

nick012000, I think that Callow's stubborn independence is a fundamental trait which isn't really Good or Evil. Callowans fought against Praesan and Proeran occupation, even though one nation is Evil and the other is Good, because neither nation was Callowan. I don't see how a strong sense of independence is inherently an Evil trait, or how that independent streak could somehow become compatible with accepting rule by the Tower. Poles don't like being ruled by Russians, but that doesn't mean they like being ruled by Germans, either. The single biggest obstacle to Catherine's legitimate rule is that she's a vassal of the Black Knight and a servant of the Tower; as long as she retains those qualities, she has no leg to stand on when she accuses others of being foreign puppets.

Black's long-term plan is to weaken the power of the Story and the Named it creates. As the Story grows less powerful, the automatic tendency of ordinary people to rally behind their Named grows weaker, and those ordinary people gain more agency. Most of Black's top people are personally loyal to him, not to the Name of Black Knight, and they wouldn't automatically support his successor.

As Callowan Names grow less powerful, Catherine won't be able to rely as much upon the automatic rallying effect. She'll have to provide good reasons for the people of Callow to stand behind her, defending the Tower against the Procerans, and the use of the words "defending the Tower" will automatically inspire Callowans to reject her. Lieutenant Farrier serves in the Gallowborne under Catherine's personal command, and he wouldn't throw a copper to Malicia or Black if they were starving in the gutter. If she can't inspire her own soldiers with any sense of loyalty to Praes, then she has no chance with the larger population.

M

You do realise that Farrier quote is a wee bit out of date by now?

esryok

"The single biggest obstacle to Catherine's legitimate rule is that she's a vassal of the Black Knight and a servant of the Tower; as long as she retains those qualities, she has no leg to stand on when she accuses others of being foreign puppets."

I'm not so sure about this. Catherine is indeed subordinate to the Tower and a part of its power structure, but neither she nor the other Callowans we've seen regard her as acting in the best interests of Praes. Her efforts may well turn out to the Empire's benefit, but this is a side effect of her actual goal "gain control of institutions within Praes to improve the lives of Callowans."

Callow is, apparently, legendarily insistent on holding grudges. For this reason I agree that Cat still has a lot of work to do to properly preserve the Callow as a nation within the Empire, on par with the Soninke/Goblin/Orc/Taghreb nations. But I continue to disagree that her approach is fundamentally incorrect. It's looking good so far.

Dylan Tullos

M: The Farrier quote would only be "out of date" if he'd said anything to suggest that he changed his mind. As far as I know, he hasn't. The Gallowborne were enthusiastic about defending their own people from devils summoned by a cackling Praesi aristocrat. That doesn't mean that Farrier or his people have changed their minds about Praesi in general, or that Farrier's "F*** the Tower" attitude has gone away.

esryok, it's very easy for an approach to look good when the Empire is strong and the harvest is abundant. The real test of success is how Callowans feel about the Praesi when the Empire looks weak or the harvest fails.

Many Callowans view Catherine as acting in Callow's best interests. Many of the Legions view Catherine as acting in the Dread Empire's best interests. What happens when those interests don't overlap, when Catherine is faced with a choice between doing what's best for Callow and doing what's best for the Praesi?

Black told Catherine that Praes's population is still growing. Sooner or later, food imports from Callow, Procer, and the Free Cities won't be able to keep up with the constantly expanding number of mouths to feed. At that point, Praes will have to either reduce their own population by sending hordes out to fight and die, or start taking a larger share of the Callowan harvest. The first option would destroy the Legions of Terror, reducing them to the ineffective mobs that Praes used to rely on. The second option would motivate Callowan resistance, since the Praesi would be starving Callowans to ensure that they had enough food for their own people. Think of the Irish Potato Famine, except there wouldn't be any blight or disease, just a steady stream of food flowing south while Callowan cities go hungry. I can't think of anything more likely to destroy Catherine's status than being forced to choose between the well-being of her Callowan subjects and her Praesi masters.

The solution will have to be to cut down on the Praesi birthrate (well, the **actual** solution probably involves lots of death during the "Uncivil Wars" but I'm pretending we don't know that for the sake of discussion).

Previous attempts failed because the Praesi narrative relied on the unrest created by population growth, but if Cat & the Dark Council are successful in weakening the existing "Praes grasps, Callow is grasped" story then Malicia might be able to implement population controls and have them stick.

Dylan Tullos

esryok:

I'm still somewhat puzzled about the origins of the "Uncivil Wars". We know that the Truebloods are crippled and steadily losing power, and that the Legions are dedicated to Black. The only real threat to Malicia's power must be Heiress/Diabolist, and I don't know what she's up to. I suspect it's going to be big and successful, though; we can't have "Uncivil Wars" unless Heiress successfully destabilizes a Dread Empress who is currently at the height of her power.

Civil wars or foreign invasions are ultimately short-term solutions, so the only viable option in the long term is the population control you mention. Maybe Malicia's roundabout approach to solving the problem will work, but I foresee problems with Praes liking conquest too much. Population control is hard and unpopular, while conquering other nations to steal their food is the Praesi way.

I feel that the Wandering Bard has a good point; all of the "practical evil" is a direct result of having Malicia and Black in charge. Any system that relies on a handful of people is fundamentally unstable, so I'm curious to see what Malicia and the Calamities are doing to prepare the system for their own deaths, and ultimately Catherine's death. Lasting peace and stability can only be achieved if Dread Empire Foolhardius doesn't take over and declare war on everyone, which is a very likely eventual outcome if we look at Praesi history.

If Catherine and the Calamities win, I want them to win the hard way, with capable opponents and dramatic tension. I feel that Catherine has been winning for too long, and that she's due for a serious defeat soon, just to remind her and us that you can't always win through bravery and determination. This story frequently reminds us that only Heroes get to win the easy way, and I want the Calamities and Catherine to go up against enemies who are their equals or betters. So far, I can't think of a single true, lasting defeat that Team Calamity has suffered, and I want that to change. Invincible Villains are just as uninteresting as Invincible Heroes.

lennymaster

You forget that Black is already weakening the the Story and thus Tropes like the one that Evil always loses and that especially in feudalistic times like these people did not care the least about who ruled them as long as they were not hungry, aswell as the fact that callow already lives now for more than TWENTY YEARS under preasi rule.

Also if you think that even a single one of her victories was easily attained, that even a single one of her plans went down without a hitch and she did not have to make plenty sacrifices, (the left side of her face wich is still completly numb and her permanent limp just to name a few) then you either have not really read the story or you have a really scewed view of what hardship means.

I do hope that erratica will not be convinced to have Cat suffer into one foul tasting victory after another as so many authors do these days.

Not every fight needs to grind our protagonists into the dust to be plenty dangerous and entertaining.

Dylan Tullos

lennymaster:

"Evil always loses" is getting weaker. That doesn't mean that it's being replaced by "Evil always wins".

If you believe that Callow doesn't care enough to rebel, and Callow then rebels, you should revise your theory to fit with the facts, instead of insisting on the impossibility of something that already happened. Half of Book I and most of Book II focus on Callow fighting Praes; clearly, twenty years under Black's tyranny hasn't quite managed to break Callow's spirit.

One form of hardship is losing. Catherine hasn't done a lot of that so far. Another form of hardship would be losing friends or loved ones. Who has Catherine lost?

Every fight doesn't need to be impossibly hard. But there's a reason that most stories feature underdogs struggling against the odds, or at least have antagonists who are equal in strength to their protagonists. The Calamities are much more experienced and capable than the Heroes they go up against, and it robs their conflict of dramatic tension. In the same way, pitting Catherine against a strawman like the Lone Swordsman diminishes her value as a protagonist; beating up chumps just isn't as impressive as going up against real opponents.

LostDeviljho

A thought on the "Uncivil Wars" thing: Civil wars would be something that happens during a period of instability. Instability like, say, one of the two figureheads of the current empire biting it.

We have the White Knight *and* the Black Knight in the free cities right now, and that's obvious Nemesis material. They've clashed once already. They'll probably clash again. Maybe even three times.

You see where I'm going with this?

And losing Amadeus would be a real loss, not just for the Empire, but for Catherine. He's a... well, not father figure, that's been stated several times at this point, but he is a mentor for her, one who she actually likes, and depends on for guidance more than a little bit.

(The other option for someone to lose is Killian, and I don't even want to think about that.)

JustSomeoneRandom

Are you aware that people have been mentioning the gallowed fiercely defending Cat now. Ferrier also supported Cat and her ideals after the demon fight. Yes, he still hates the praesi. But he is currently on Cat's side when it comes to getting Callow out of the pit it's currently in. In a less radical way than the Adjutant, he is a supporter of Cat's way, not a begrudging follower that will try to escape at the nearest chance. Black was doing something similar to what the Roman empire did when they assimilated a province, he gave them a mostly better life and only required them to follow Praesi rules in return. The remainder of Callow that was dissatisfied enough to rebel was already small, and with Cat solving the mistreatment by integrating Callow as a proper province, most of what was left after the rebellion failed is now growing closer to acceptance. Heck, even during the rebellion the rebels were unsatisfied with the volunteers. The majority was already apathetic and Cat is giving the rest a banner to rally behind. Cat isn't a traitor in their eyes, she is their best shot at a better Callow for some, an example that this meritocracy might not be all that bad for others and just a new person in charge of taxes for the rest. Callow still isn't happy with how things are going, but they aren't angry anymore either.

It's speeches like this that makes me think Cat is going to break yet another part of creation, that of her own Name. Instead of succeeding the Black Knight, or even the White Knight, I fully expect her to make a new title, the Grey Knight. Neither truly Evil nor truly Good, the champion of the masses killing villains and heroes alike to allow people to make their own way. I think it fits what we've seen so far of her personality and goals. Cat might even be enough to break the pattern of stories (Good vs Evil) entirely, and usher in the age of neutrality where the sentient races are truly free or make their own world.

NPC

I haven't posted anything for a while but I feel the need to weigh in on the integration of Callow debate.

1. The South of Callow didn't explode in popular Rebellion. The Lone Swordsman, an army of mercenaries, and the Duke of Liesse invaded then the remaining knight and nobles rallied to their banner. While I have no doubt many of the levies were dissidents from across Callow but on the other hand how many were local farmer ordered to be there by the local nobles? Remember those same nobles who rose in rebellion were never removed from power in the South of Callow after the Conquest. Meaning the South was probably the least indoctrinated and least policed part of Callow.

2. The rebellion of Liesse might be an indicator of strong support for rebellion remaining in Callow, true. But it could just as easily be the last gasp of a failing cause. Remember the last of Callow's Knightly Orders were murdered in their sleep and the nobles turned on each other while the commoners sold them out to save their own skins. That's not exactly the heroic doomed last stand stories are made of to motivate the next generation.

3. The Lone Swordsman took Marchford in a surprise attack in the Epilogue of Book I. Not a popular uprising. An interesting fact to remember.

4. Remember perspective is important, what one person's eyes sees as the truth maybe very different from another's. Catherine's from Laure, the old capital of the Kingdom of Callow and a major center of trade. She, other city dwellers, and the more educated high classes no doubt have a skewed perspective of how much people care about the old Kingdom as they were the ones who benefited from it at least in terms of prestige and power. Furthermore it sounds like many of the ex-soldiers of Callow joining her Legion are probably in the same boat, city dwellers or from families with high levels of education, not peasants with farms and families to go back to. Meaning they might not be the most reliably way to judge the mood on an entire nation.

5. The former Marchford soldiers are even more suspect as a good indication of the mood of Callow because they are from Marchford, one of the Southern cities not under direct governorship but rather ruled by a very competent noble with good reason to hate the Empire. Furthermore due to being on the wrong side of the rebellion, now they have to either go into exile as mercenaries uprooting their families and leaving their home behind or serve a new Named Countess who might or might not be loyal to Praes. They might not want to fight for the Empire but that doesn't necessarily mean they want to fight against it either. Furthermore there's always the possibility of group think, maybe they think by hating on the Empire their sending a message to

Catherine that they are personally loyal to her alone or they're trying to say that they're behind her whether she reaches for the Crown of Callow or the Tower. Again perspective factors into this, Catherine is worried that her power base is fractured while the First Prince of Procer laments that Callow has already been corrupted, who's right? We don't know because we only have perspectives, not facts. Even the few facts we get are colored by the persons presenting them and methods used to gather them.

6. I would recommend not trying to apply modern ideas of nationalism to a medieval setting, a fantasy setting, and especially not a medieval fantasy setting. Nationalism is a fairly new thing in the grand scheme of things and peasants are unlikely to have anything more than a vague idea what goes on the next town over.

7. Population distribution is important to remember. Maybe this setting has enough magical healing, fewer plagues, and advanced farming techniques to support large cities but for the vast majority of human history you needed at least 90%, if not 95%, of the population working the fields just to have enough surplus food to support the other 10%. Again city dwellers, former soldiers, and the upper classes will have a different perspective of Callow than ignorant peasants and it's very likely that those ignorant peasants outnumber the former by several orders of magnitude.

8. The author has repeatedly foreshadowed that unrest will never go away. The tensions between the Soninke and Taghreb, the feuds between the Greenskins, and most importantly the Dukes of Liesse who never forgot they used to be kings in it's own right before conquered by Callow. The possibility that if times get too hard that Callow will dust off old heraldry and reach for hidden weapons will always exist and that will never go away. You just need to suppress it militarily, convince the population that they're better off under you, or make them think they have a stake in the Empire.

9. I think many people underestimate cognitive dissonance in humans. We have an amazing ability to lie to ourselves especially when our pockets are being lined and we are given a target to hate. See the economic prosperity Callow has enjoyed with unrestricted access to Imperial trade routes and ports, for the next target to hate look across the mountains to Procer. Or did you think Black and the Empress didn't know what they were doing fanning the flames of civil war in the Principate?

10. The biggest problem in integrating conquered territory is usually racism. The conquered get abused by new nobles, greedy administrators, and occupying soldiers; then excluded from government, commerce, and military service. It's a long slow process, that often fails, to get over it which is why Black started on it right away. The Thirteenth legion wasn't just raised to cobble together some cavalry, save on manpower, and intimidate the South of Callow. Or did you think it was an accident the author mentioned Callow veterans from the Thirteenth legion were teaching in the academy and running business in the capital. They have been working at this scheme for more than twenty years.

Sorry for getting so wordy. Any chance of a discussion forum? If one already exist could you point me to it.

Dylan Tullos

NPC:

Thank you for making so many good points. You're right to draw attention to the fact that we are limited by perspective, and you're correct in pointing out that rebellions are often too complicated to fit into a simple narrative.

1. Plenty of rebellions are triggered by the arrival of foreign help, and I don't think Procer's assistance says anything about Callow's feelings one way or the other. However, you're right to remind out that plenty of peasants show up because that's what they do when the local noble calls them up. Understanding motivations is always complicated; when a Praesi legionary asks, everyone is a loyal subject of the Dread Empire, and when your local knight asks, you're ready to die for Callow. Discovering true opinions is not easy when there's so much pressure to lie.

2. Black does an excellent job defeating the rebellion tactically. He makes their defeat inglorious and hideously one-sided. Whether he'll be able to defeat the larger spirit of rebellion...well, the jury's still out on that one. Black is a master of winning battles, and even wars, but winning the peace is harder.

3. Given how thoroughly the Eyes of the Empire seem to have infiltrated any local resistance, the Lone Swordsman was smart to rely on a surprise attack instead of a popular uprising. No evidence either way. Again, it's really hard to tell what people are actually thinking when there are men with swords who might stab them if they say the wrong thing. Cheering the current winner is usually the safest approach, and it's difficult to determine who's a true believer when so many Callowans are doing their best not to get stabbed.

4. These are really excellent points. No one really asks peasants what they think; instead, they tell them what to think. I'm not sure how you could even get an honest answer out of the peasantry at this point. Praise the old Kingdom too much, and you could draw the attention of the Empire's Eyes; praise the Empire, and the local rebels could mark you for death when the rising begins. Better just to complain about the weather.

5. I was actually referring to the Gallowborne, not the former Marchford soldiers. The Gallowborne volunteered to serve the Praesi as soldiers because the alternative was hanging, but they aren't exactly fans. It's worth noting that Cat's answer to Lieutenant Farrier's condemnation of the Empire is that "well, they may be evil, but they make the trains run on time." This is somewhat unsettling; yes, the Praesi do have a better system of economic management, but they also use death row prisoners as human sacrifices and murder entire families when one member rebels.

6. I wasn't applying a modern idea of nationalism, but a medieval one. Medieval peasants didn't get particularly upset over what lord ruled them, but Christian peasants wouldn't exactly be overjoyed to find themselves under the rule of Satanists. Since Praes openly worships Evil, it's not just a matter of whether you pay taxes to Lord A or Lord B. And Callow clearly does have some sense of national identity, since they don't like the thought of being ruled by the Good-aligned Procer. All of the text evidence suggests that the Callowan idea of nationalism, though very different from the modern form, is alive and well. Even Black's plan involves using a Callowan Squire to harness that nationalism rather than trying to wipe it out.

7. Yes! And I suspect that many peasants are focused primarily on getting the harvest in and praying that armies stay far away from their village. They can still be anti-Praesi, but they're not going to have the time or energy to rebel without either provocation or outside help.

8. The key problem with Praes's current setup is that it relies too heavily on the military option. Legitimate governments can handle setbacks, but the Praesi response to a defeated Tyrant appears to be either assassinating them or turning them into a puppet, and Callow's relative quiet is far too conditional to be stable. With a huge and capably led rival staring at them across the border, Praes needs actual unity, not the kind you impose with a knife to someone's throat.

9. The problem with aiming hatred at Procer is that both they and Callow worship God, while the Praesi are demon-summoning enemies who have invaded Callow seventy times throughout their long history of warfare. Religion often fills in for nationalism in more medieval societies, and Praes's ongoing worship of Evil undermines any attempt to retarget Callow's xenophobia.

Cognitive dissonance works both ways. Even as Callowans become more prosperous, they're not going to fall over themselves giving credit to Praes. It's very easy to enjoy the increased benefits of peace and good economic management while insisting that those Evil-worshipping monsters can't possibly have anything to do with the good times.

10. Yeah, Black is smart. As long as Praesi rule Callow directly, they'll always be a conquered, rebellious province. Only a Callowan can convince other Callowans that they're not going to be second-class subjects forever. A successful transition from occupation to ordinary times needs Callowan legionaries and administrators.

NPC

What is this, a logical argument on the internet? *faints*

I think your making a rather big assumption in the role of Good, Evil, and the House of Light. You equated Praes to Satanists and Callow to Catholics but I don't think that's quite right. These little to suggest that the House of Light preaches, indoctrinates, or persecutes in a manner to provoke such a drastic response from the population of Callow. In fact, I thought the House of Light seemed a bit weak as far as international religions are concerned.

I think a better example of the Good vs. Evil split would be the wars of religion in Europe between the Catholics and Protestants centered around the Holy Roman Empire. What started as a righteous struggle to determine the faith of the Empire turned into a series of increasingly political wars that served the geopolitical goals of the rising great powers while religion was reduced to a tool of the Kings and a casus belli for their wars.

The following paragraph is pure supposition on my part and not part of the argument. I equate Empress Triumphant's conquest and cruelty as the Saint Bartholomew Day Massacre that sparked the hatred, but time has passed and wars have been fought, hatred has dimmed and trade and self-interest have risen. Now what Empress Malica needs is a France, a Catholic (Good) nation to betray it's religion's collation for it's own self interest. Because on the Continent a nation with Praes's wealth and magic, Callow's farmland and population, backed by professional legions would be able to secure a lasting hegemony so long as everybody else doesn't gang up on it.

Of course most stories start with an underdog, but what most authors fail to do is make the protagonist at some point stop being the underdog, or at the very least stop being as much of an underdog, because after a while having your maincharacter getting their ass handed to them at every turn but still somehow accomplishing ANYTHING stops making sense.

And so they either always let their enemies escape, usually thanks to a completly brainhaired redemption/mercy moment from the protagonists side, to come back bigger and badder then ever before or by giving the antagonist a ridiculous amount of luck and/or foresight.

Sometimes they just give them constantly bigger and badder enemies to fight without ever letting them face a weaker one just to show ho much they have grown.

And The Lone Swordsman was defenitly not a pushover, just because his cause and goal where idiotic in Cat's eyes does not mean he was not dangerous.

After all he killed Cat in their last to final round, wich she counted on thanks to the rule of three.

She was simply smart enough to use the resources at her disposel, namely Apprentice, and prepare for that eventuallity. In a way that posed a massive risk to herself, her followers and her plan, after all any half decent mage with a bit of time could haver very easily messed her undead body up in a bad way. Considering her words, this outcome was only one of several she prepared to deal with. And only then she managed to kill him.

Does anybody still clame that her fights and victories were easy ones?

Dylan Tullos

lennymaster:

Most authors introduce new enemies that "level up" with the protagonist. That way, we get to see progress when they face last season's enemies and easily defeat them, but the protagonist doesn't just get to curbstomp this season's Big Bad.

If the author wanted to make the Lone Swordsman formidable, he should have had him beat Catherine in their first encounter. Instead, Catherine beat the Lone Swordsman, spared his life, and branded instructions on his Name as part of her larger plan. She didn't even treat him as a rival who needed to die; to Catherine, the Lone Swordsman was nothing more than a stepping stone on the path to victory. That's pretty much the definition of a "pushover".

William only beat Catherine in the third round because of the "rule of three", and even then it wasn't an actual victory. Catherine had already established her ability to survive fatal wounds in their first fight, and both necromancy and soul traps are known tools in this universe. A smarter adversary would have picked up her body and taken it with him to burn it, rather than repeating the mistake he'd made in their first encounter. That "victory" cast William as the idiot villain who insists that there's no need to look for a body because the hero couldn't possibly survive the fall. In a universe with zombies and vampires, burning the corpse is a reasonable first step, and cutting a head off is nothing more than an inconvenience. After underestimating Catherine once, there was no possible reason for William to make the same mistake again.

When the protagonist is smarter, tougher, and more charismatic than their enemy, it robs the story of dramatic tension. Catherine's fights and victories against the Lone Swordsman are easy because she's smarter than him, plans ahead, works well with others, and takes advantage of his overpowering stupidity. She's also better at fighting. Whenever they talk, she gets to be clever and funny, while he mutters strawman lines that even his own allies make fun of.

Antagonists can maintain credibility if they lose. They can't maintain credibility if the protagonist beats them up and lets them go, then outmaneuvers them at every turn. Nothing could be easier than beating a Hero who doesn't inspire loyalty in his friends and who can't kill you properly when the Story itself is conspiring to help him.

lennymaster

One, she is a Villian, anybody that is not somehow emotionally connected to her is considered either an adversary or a stepping stone.

Two, he very much tried to cut her body into many little pieces, he merly failed because Apprentice and Adjutant managed to drive him off.

Three, Cat may have been smarter then William, but he definitely was the better fighter, as shown in their second confrontation in Summerholm, were she merly accomplished a draw by the skin off her teeth until Warlock showed up. There the rule of three very possibly saved her ass. And neither was Cat in any way good either in planning ahead, like forcing her third Aspect in the presence of a Demon, nor in working well with others, she repeatedly made plans and manipulated her allies into positions to help her go through with her goals without ever telling any of them about it, because she did not trust them enough.

She merly got better by learning through those mistakes.

Four, you completly ignore Heiress, who shemed Cat into the ground in all occasions BUT the one in Liesse, where she still acomplished her primery goal, as she herself stated. Some might have argued that Heiress was beaten shortly after Cat defeated Will the first time in Summerholm, until the moment Cat figured out that that was merly a ploy by Heiress to make Cat overestimate herself.

Five, yes, the whole point off the book is to show that Heroes are oftentimes, not always but many times, worse in most regards than their countering Villians. But they still win, over and over and over again they win. They are considered Heroes despite going to much futher lengths and dipping just as deep into morally grey waters as the Villians. And still they get the praise and the respect of the population despite never actually changing anything for the better but rather keep hold of the status quo no matter the price of doing so.

Like Batman who never kills, but beats people into bloody, oftentimes permanently disabled pulps and considers himself better than his enemies.

The Black knight makes it repetadly clear that he would not mind so much being beaten fairly by people who actually deserve it, but Heroes win often only thanks to their prophecies, their their ridiculous Artifacts, the power of love/friendship, mercy and Mary Sue like powers of reality manipulation. that is one of the pillars of this story world, Heros that get their victories handed to them by the literall GODS insted of actually acomplishing them.

The White Knight for example is, as stated by Black and himself, more powerful then his decades older counterpart.

Dylan Tullos

lennymaster:

1. "Adversary" and "stepping stone" are perfectly acceptable ways for a Villain to view most of humanity. If they're going to have a serious enemy, though, they need to be more in the "adversary" category than the "stepping stone" category. The Lone Swordsman's overwhelming failure against Catherine makes it impossible to view him as a capable foe.

2. I believe my complaint against the Lone Swordsman was his unfortunate tendency to fail in stupid ways. In his place, Catherine would have had some method of disposing of a body quickly. Fire would work nicely. If you're fighting a zombie who already came back from the dead once, cutting their head off is more of an opening move than a finishing one. One smart idea would be to take Catherine's body with him. If she's too heavy, he could take Catherine's head with him. That wouldn't slow him down too badly, and it would make it a lot harder to bring her back functionally.

If I can come up with that plan in two minutes, William could have come with something as good or better in the time he had. Necromancy is a real thing in this world, and failing to plan for it is planning to fail.

3. Catherine is surrounded by a team of capable, loyal people who make up for many of her flaws. And she is capable of planning ahead; look at the way she anticipated her defeat in the third encounter and arranged a soul trap so that "decapitated" wouldn't equal "permanently dead".

4. Catherine forced Heiress to run in their first battle. Even if it was a trap, Catherine won the War College contest handily, used her legion to beat Heiress's demons, and watched as her mentor forced Heiress to stab herself. I specifically recall Heiress thinking about how she underestimated Cat, and failed to achieve all of her objectives except taking control of Liesse. Catherine literally broke every bone in Heiress's body, executed one of her closest supporters, and came out covered in glory as head of the Ruling Council of Callow. If that's defeat, I think victory is overrated.

5. I'm not objecting to morally grey or even downright evil "Heroes". I'm objecting to incompetent Heroes who get outsmarted and beaten down at every turn. There's nothing wrong with having the "Heroes" defend a corrupt status quo, but making them be chumps robs the work of dramatic tension.

The Story of this universe is rigged in favor of Heroes winning in the end. Story or no Story, Black has put dozens of Heroes in the ground. He didn't do it by fighting "fair". When he complains about how Heroes play the hand that they're dealt, Black sounds fairly ridiculous; they didn't make the rules, and Black would be the first to say that you should use whatever advantages you have ruthlessly and without hesitation. That's what he does, after all.

If I was fighting against a foreign invader and supernatural forces offered me overwhelmingly powerful weapons, I wouldn't hold back because the commander of the invaders thought I didn't "deserve" such an unfair advantage. A victory handed to you by the Gods is still a victory, while a defeat won through your own merit and determination is still a defeat. Black invented the saying, "One grace, victory. One sin, defeat." He doesn't get to complain about how Heroes fight to win.

In terms of raw Name power, almost everyone is stronger than Black. He tells us that his predecessor could knock down a tower with a flick of his wrist, while Black can't do more than useful tricks with shadows. The Tyrant of Helike can rain lightning from the skies, so clearly it's not that Villains are universally less powerful than Heroes.

Black's "weakness" is that he refuses to rely on his Name. The Tyrant can summon storms because he is dedicated to his Role in the Story, and the Lone Swordsman can heal himself endlessly because he's equally committed to the plan his Choir laid out for him. Black lacks power because he has independence, because he refuses to draw too much upon powers that would gradually trap him in Someone else's story like a train on a track, immensely strong but incapable of choosing his own course.

Most Villains get their victories handed to them by the Story just as surely as Heroes do. The Tyrant of Helike slaughters an enemy army with no more than a few words; he doesn't "earn" his victory any more than the most overpowered Hero does. The only difference is that the Tyrant inevitably wins in Act I and II, while the Heroes will inevitably win in the end. As long as he plays his role properly, he'll manage to escape certain death and overcome impossible odds until the Heroes stop him just as he stands on the brink of total victory. After all, it wouldn't be a good Story if none of the villains scored any victories along the way; they have to lose in the grand finale, but the battles in between are actually rigged in their favor, helping them to win until the time is right for them to lose.

While your arguments still do not convince me, it is hard to argue against them.

I have the conviction, that should the story continue as you think, then one of two things will happen.

Either Cat will lose most of her power, army and support, which she then will continue to either win back, a nearly impossible (unrealistic so) feat, or find a way to still accomplish her goals, which would make all her previous battles and sacrifices mostly hollow ones.

Or by losing someone, maybe even several of the few people close to her. The logical persons would be Black, which would be quite sad but also to some degree fitting, or maybe even more likely Kilian. Losing Kilian would be extremely depressing, if for no other reason than the one that their relationship is one of the smoothest and most elegantly introduced and maintained ones that I have ever seen. Most authors either completely overblow this small, at least in something that is not primarily a romance, but still very important story element, or make the reader not care the least for the protags love interest. There were even quite a few ones I would have massively preferred if they had never been introduced in the first place. Kilian however shows her enormous importance to the small nonetheless necessary levity for the story not in how often, but rather in what senses she is either present, mentioned or thought of.

Nonetheless I thank you for this frustrating though fascinating discussion and hope to continue further ones in coming chapters.

P.S.: A few great examples for several different aspects of story building for avid readers would be; for both character development and well evolving romances Laurell K. Hamilton's Anita Blake, at least if explicit sexual content does not bother you.

David Weber's Honor Harrington for an amazingly well developed world.

Aleron Kong's Chaos Seeds and J. L. Langland's Demons of Astlan for amazing comedic moment in an otherwise serious story.

A Practical Guide to Evil is however THE ONE STORY I have EVER read that has managed to develop all these aspects into one such amazing whole. Thank you erratica!

Sorry I didn't reply directly. For some reason, the "Reply" section was missing from your post when I brought it up.

I've already reported you to the moderators for using reason and facts. Everyone civilized knows that proper Internet discussion involves misspelled profanity and repeated use of the phrase "lol". Please get it together before we're forced to drive you from this forum.

While the House of Light doesn't seem terribly organized as religions go, their teachings still shape the beliefs of ordinary Callowans. Cat doesn't rank among the most devout people, but she remembers them denouncing the Gods of Evil and the demon-summoning Praesi. As an organized power base, the House of Light does not seem formidable; as a cultural influence on the minds of young Callowans, it does important work in shaping the beliefs and values of the country's people.

If you spend your childhood hearing stories of saints and heroes who fought the Praesi, you're a lot more likely to identify with the Resistance rather than the occupiers. Whether that identification turns into active resistance depends on individual personality and circumstance, but the "Callowan Heroes fight Praesi Villains" narrative is clearly present and powerful. Black even seeks to use that narrative, casting Catherine as a Callowan Hero against Heiress, the embodiment of Praesi Villainy. He seems to like judo as a fighting style, redirecting his enemy's strength and seeking to turn it into a weakness.

Your Thirty Years War comparison is excellent. Black and Malicia are clearly trying to steer Praes in the direction of pragmatic nationalism, "Evil" in the sense that they're willing to do anything to secure their nation's power, but not "Evil" in the oddly principled manner of Helike's Tyrant. They don't want their neighbors to see the Praesi as an existential threat, and they're fine with their subjects worshiping the Gods Above as long as they pay taxes and do as they're told.

The only flaw in the Thirty Years War comparison is that Cordelia Hassenbach refuses to fall into Malicia's trap. Instead of seeking to expand Procer's temporal power, she is forming alliances with old rivals and enemies against Praes, ignoring old territorial ambitions and showing the continent that Procer is committed to a principled foreign policy. We get to see her thoughts, so we know that it's not a trick, that Procer's First Prince is genuinely committed to her role as Warden of the West. For Cordelia, this war is a righteous struggle against a nation that sought to destroy her own, and her ability to set aside national rivalries in the greater cause of Good makes her Praes's most dangerous enemy.

I completely agree that Malicia needs to make this about power and secular ambition, not Good vs Evil. As you say, she needs a country to backstab the Good coalition, just as France did in the Thirty Years War. It was necessary for Malicia to destabilize Procer if she wanted to occupy Callow, but one unfortunate consequence of her decision was the creation of Cordelia Hassenbach. The First Prince combines practical statesmanship with an absolute determination to tear down the "Practical Evil" that poured gasoline on the fire of Procer's civil war, and even the new Legions of Terror can't fight the united armies of Good.

Procer seems to be as big as Praes and Callow put together; the Principate's weakness is their fondness for political bickering and civil war, not a lack of soldiers or money. Formidable as the Dread Empire is, I don't think they're inherently stronger than the Principate, though Black's Legions of Terror seem to be higher-quality than any other mortal army on the continent. (On an unrelated note, I think there are serious problems with the design of the Legions, but that's a minor point. This story isn't about creating an effective military doctrine for a fictional universe.)

I like the comparison of Triumphant to the St. Bartholomew's Day Massacre. It's not forgotten, but it happened long ago, and present-day rivalries tend to overshadow old memories. Malicia needs to keep those rivalries going, to help Good nations forget that they once stood united. Cordelia needs to make peace, to end old feuds and remind the nations of Good that they once stood united under a Crusading banner. As for which of them will succeed...well, the story's not done.

Thanks! I'm really curious to see how things work out, and I appreciate both your perspective and your book recommendations. I read the Honor Harrington books way back in high school, and I enjoyed them greatly. I will check out Kong and Langland's writing at the next opportunity.

Chapter 14: Trick

"I can't beat your band of heroes, true, but what if there were another eight bands also out for my blood? Ha! What are you going to do, form a line?"

– Dread Emperor Irritant, the Oddly Successful

I took one look at the Fields of Wend and started cursing in Mthethwa. Lower Miezan just didn't have that register of pure spite the Soninke tongue did. A mile of glaciers lay at my feet, their differing heights and shifting movements filling the air with the sound of fracas every few heartbeats. Named or not, if I got stuck between two of those I'd be a woman-shaped pile of broken bones. I was really hoping the prophecy of lies was going to work out, because if it didn't it was going to take Hakram most of a day to find all the bloody pieces of what was left of my body.

"You got fucked on the arena," Archer noted cheerfully. "And not even in the fun way."

"I'd noticed, thank you," I replied crabbily.

The only saving grace of the Fields was that the uneven relief would make it easier to take cover when the Duke of Violent Squalls started throwing a storm and a half at my head. I was very, very glad I'd decided not to wear armour. I wasn't so good a swimmer I'd avoid sinking to the bottom if I slipped. My plate had been repaired by the servants and set out for me, but I'd chosen something lighter instead. Grey trousers went down into the same pair of good boots I'd taken to the masquerade, over them a thick gambeson that went down to my knees. After my last few scraps with the fae I'd learned that my plate served only to slow me down. The sword at my belt rested comfortably, the handle veiled by my usual cloak. I'd gotten little use out of the garment and its supposedly spell-resistant abilities since Black had gifted it to me, but today seemed a good day to bring in an additional precaution.

The four of us had taken the carriage to the duelling grounds and found quite a crowd waiting for us there. More fae were in attendance than there had been at the masquerade, though by the looks of it they were still all aristocrats. Before being a pain in my ass, Archer had taken the time to discreetly point out the handful of fae she'd bombarded with prophecy the night before. At least one of them had the scroll on his person, idly toying with it as he watched us. Would it be enough? I had no idea. Masego's glamour amulet was nestled safely under the gambeson, and I'd been met by a sea of blank faces when I'd arrived, until they all resumed normality. I couldn't know whether that meant they'd bought it, but it was too late to back out now anyway. The crowd parted for us effortlessly until we came to stand by the Duke himself. I eyed him carefully. The bastard was in armour, unlike me. Plate of what seemed like actual silver – though I wasn't enough of a fool to hope the metal would be as soft as it should be – and a cape of blue silk dotted with pale hellebores. He had a falchion at his side, ornately jewelled, but no shield. Mage, I thought. Free hand needed for spellcasting.

That was good news of a sort: it meant that he couldn't simply command the winds with a thought. Possibly. Relying on that assumption might just get me killed, so I'd have to fight as if he could until proven otherwise. A fae I'd met before, the Lady of Cracking Ice, smoothly stepped between myself and the Duke.

"Since we've all arrived," she smiled, "we can begin the proceedings. At the invitation of the Duke of Violent Squalls, I will be serving as the officiant witness. Does the Lady of Marchford have any objections?"

"None," I said.

"This is pleasing," she said. "As is custom, I must ask you if the grievance between the two of you can be resolved by any other manner."

"No," the Duke of Violent Squalls spoke carelessly.

"He could kneel at my feet and beg for mercy, then I'll consider it," I suggested.

Wind picked up sharply around us as the fae aristocrat glared hatefully at my face.

"Didn't like that, did you?" I mused. "That'd be a no, then."

"Very well," the Lady of Cracking Ice said, sounding amused. "The terms set by the offended party were death or surrender."

"I withdraw the outcome of surrender," the Duke spat.

"This is quite irregular," the Lady said with a frown.

"I'll allow it," I shrugged. "Didn't intend to let him surrender anyway."

"Since both parties are in agreement, it will be so," the Lady conceded. "Participants are to make their way to the Wending Heart and stand at their respective edge. The duel will begin when the blue light above your heads shatters."

I glanced at the Fields. What she'd called the Heart was easy enough to find: it was the tallest of the glaciers, topped by a perfectly round platform of maybe forty feet in diameter. There was already a shining blue orb hovering over it. I watched the glaciers around, getting a read for the movements: staying on flat ground with someone who controlled the wind was a death sentence. Ranged combat was no specialty of mine, but if I wanted to live long enough to make it to close quarters I'd need some form of cover. Hakram clapped me on the shoulder.

"Wade in their blood, Cat," he said.

"That's the plan," I replied.

I cast a look at the other two.

"If you have to die," Archer said, "die loud."

I would have settled for a 'good luck' but that wasn't really her style, was it?

"Get it done quickly," Masego told me. "I've experiments that should not be left unattended for too long."

"Love you too," I mouthed back.

Rolling my shoulder to limber it up, I began my trek to the Wending Heart. Time to find out whether the magical power of lies could kill a man.

There was enough snow on the glaciers that the way wasn't too slippery. I was more sure-footed than a mortal had any business being, regardless. Couldn't remember when I'd last tripped or slipped on anything, though even before becoming the Squire I'd not been prone to clumsiness. Probably because I was short, it saddened me to admit. No need to adapt to growing limbs if they stayed the same length.

"It will be most amusing to make a plaything out of an entire kingdom," the Duke spoke as we moved. "No fae has ever possessed such a bounty of souls."

He walked so lightly he didn't leave footprints, I'd noted. It was doubtful I'd be quicker than him, armoured or not.

"You know, I keep hearing about you Winter fae being great at mind games," I said. "But so far? Not impressed. I've had better quality trash talk from orcs and I'm pretty sure that Heiress could make you cry, given half a bell."

We both made the leap to the Heart, his landing admittedly more graceful than mine.

"Why bother with such games?" he said. "You are outmatched beyond your understanding."

"Not the first time I've heard that line," I laughed. "Usually the person speaking it is dead before sundown."

I took the northern edge as he strolled to the southern one. Behind me a lower platform of ice was idly drifting, maybe fifteen feet below. There were a few spires on it that would do nicely as a shield until I could find a good angle to approach. I unsheathed my longsword as he did the same with his falchion, sneering, and with a loud crack the blue orb above us broke. Before I could so much as blink wind howled, and I was casually tossed off the Heart. For a heartbeat I watched the distant ground under me and, with cold detachment, considered that this wasn't exactly a great start. Even as I began falling I saw a large globe of air forming around me and made the decision that I wasn't sticking around to find out what that would do when completed. My Name flared and I formed a circular pane of shadow under my feet, leaping off it towards another glacier.

I landed rolling in the snow, arrows of wind hitting the ground behind me and spraying ice everywhere. Archer might have undersold the whole wind magic thing a bit, I thought. I cast a look backwards the moment I got back on my feet and saw the Duke was standing at the edge of the Heart where I'd begun the duel. And he was lazily pointing a finger in my direction. Great. I made a run for it. Two glaciers to pick from: what looked like a barren peak of ice or another flat platform below. I picked the platform – better line of sight – but when jumping down found myself hurtling towards a wall of perfectly still air. Ugh. Wind magic was good at restricting movement, Apprentice had said. The understatement trend continued. I hated fighting mages, it was all tricks and no slugging and slugging was what I was best at. I forced myself to twist in the air and landed feet first on the apparently-solid wall, allowing a trickle of power to go down my legs so I could throw myself at the ice peak instead of falling into the waters below.

I hit the ice with a grunt and plunged my sword into it so I wouldn't just start slipping, hanging by a single hand. Another trickle of power into my arms and I spun on myself, tearing out the sword and landing more or less on my feet at the top of the peak – just in time to duck under a sharp-looking sickle of wind. The Duke of Violent Squalls was no longer standing at the edge of the Heart, I saw. That was a mixed bag. On one hand, he no longer had high ground and a good field of vision. On the other, I had no godsdamned idea where he was now. I got an answer when the peak under me exploded in a shower of ice and I caught the glint of a moving blade in the spray. Below, and behind. The falchion sliced through my cheek, missing a deeper wound only because my footing had quite literally been shattered. I bit down on the hiss of pain and swung blindly at the silhouette of the fae – but he was gone before I could get even vaguely close.

I landed on what remained of the peak with my cloak over my head to shield from the falling ice, managing to vault to another glacier before a wind spear the size of a ballista's bolt tore through the ice under me and collapse the whole thing. Shit. If I got hit by that, I wasn't walking away from it. I kept moving even if I didn't have a precise destination in mind: so far every time I'd slowed for more than a moment I'd been hammered by magic. All right, so this was like fighting an extremely mobile armoured mage without any need for incantations, who could very likely fly as well and would be unaffected by the terrain. I'd, uh, had better days. Here's a rule for not dying stupidly, I remembered Captain telling me. Never give a mage room to set up. The longer they have, the more dangerous they get. The few spars I'd had with Masego had only reinforced the notion. If I wanted to avoid further nasty surprises I needed to know where the Duke was.

"Gods Below, this is going to hurt," I muttered.

I climbed to higher ground and crouched, waiting for my enemy to catch up. The first strike I saw coming. A cylinder of wind with ice shards inside formed ahead of me and began spinning ever faster, shooting out a volley of glinting ice spears that tore through the spot I'd been in a moment earlier. The second, though, I did not. The entire glacier I was standing on broke in half and even as I moved to the left side the Duke of Violent Squalls came out of the waters below, like an arrow adorned with translucent blue wings. He was carving his way up with his falchion, now wreathed in a wind version of the weapon that was three times the size of the original. I let the reflexes of my Name take over, stepping back: If I'd been a heartbeat slower, I would have lost an arm. As it was he ripped his way up the side of my body and straight through the clavicle. The wind weapon blew up a moment later, tossing me onto another glacier before I could strike back. I managed to land on my feet, sliding back and blood flowing down the mangled gambeson.

"Rise," I said, the aspect coming to the surface.

I'd gotten what I wanted, but the pain wiped away any notion of smiling at that victory. I'd touched the edge of his cape while he was carving me up, slid a thread of my Name's power into it. A variation on the trick I used with the bone contraptions crafted to trigger goblin munitions, though this had been much more delicate. If I focused I could get a vague sense of where that bit of power was, since it was as much a part of me while away as it had been before. And right now, it was circling around my left. The flesh knitted itself back together as the aspect I'd Taken from the Lone Swordsman did its work, though it pained me that I'd had to use that card this early in the fight. It would be diminishing returns, from now on, and I could only use it another two times. My feet padded against the snow as I focused to keep a read on where the Duke was, astonished by how quickly he was getting around. Just ahead was an ice spire, and in about three heartbeats by my estimation he'd be behind it. I blew out a steamy breath and called on my Name, fashioning a spear of shadows that shattered the spire in a heartbeat.

Let's see how he dealt with being on the other side of that. I'd been moving before the spear had even left my fingertips, so I came out of the mist just as the Duke was turning in my direction. I swung with a grunt of exertion, tip of the blade managing to cut through the tip of his nose as he smoothly leaned back. With a flick of the wrist I reversed the strike, hacking through the edge of his right eye just before our bodies impacted. He screamed in anger as we rolled on the ground. Unlike the fae, I knew how handle myself to come out on top when we slowed. Not much of a scrapper, this one. I slugged him in his bleeding face as I drew back my sword, the sound of my fist crushing the bones of his nose the sweetest of melodies. A burst of wind threw me off him but I managed to have it put me back on my feet, immediately going back on the offense. He swung his falchion without even trying to hit me, the displacement of air caused by the strike magnified until it became a squall that knocked me off my trajectory.

I adjusted my angle without flinching and hacked down at his shoulder. I grimaced before the strike hit: I'd misjudged my strength, that was going to hit plate instead of neck. To my surprise, my blade cut straight into the silver-like metal. I felt flesh give underneath, if not deeply. My sword, unfortunately, was now stuck. His free hand pointed towards my chest and the spear of wind that impacted me a moment later blew me straight off my feet. Along with breaking half my ribs and puncturing a lung, by the feel of it. I managed to keep enough of a grip on my sword that it came with me while my body hit a wall of ice behind me with a dull thud. I coughed out blood, feeling the lung he'd struck beginning to fill already. Hells, that magic hit like a horse.

"Rise," I rasped out.

Slowly, almost reluctantly, I felt the wound beginning to heal. It felt like getting stabbed all over again, Merciless Gods. I managed to push myself back to my feet anyway. The Duke's hand was on his armour, looking appalled. And scared, I saw, for the first time since the duel had begun.

"What madness is this?" he barked. "You do not have the power to even begin to touch my armaments."

I wiped the blood off my lips and grinned red.

"Guess it was just meant to be," I said.

Strike one for the power of lies. It wasn't handing me the victory in a handbasket – the fake prophecy hadn't been well-crafted enough for that – but I'd touched the story just enough I could twist it. That there was a chance for me to win. The hole in my lung closed, though my ribs still felt like a clan of orcs had been stomping on them. With only one good eye left and a broken, blood nose the Duke had come out ahead but he no longer looked so pristine. With a snarl of rage, he flicked his hand upwards and I took that as my cue to make a tactical retreat. I jumped atop the wall behind me and legged it to another platform. Good instinct, I saw a moment later. Winds roiled in a circle enveloping the entire width of the glacier then came down like the hand of an angry god – the entire mass broke like glass and sunk under the water, sending waves in every direction that had the glaciers rocking like ships in a storm. The Duke of Violent Squall had not moved, wings keeping him aloft in the air as his eyes searched for me. Deciding that running the Hells away was the better part of valour, I ducked behind an ice spire and continued my escape.

The sliver of power in his cape told me he was on the move a heartbeat later, when I concentrated. Going under the water again, I thought. Running out of tricks, was he? Or perhaps fae weren't allowed to be too creative. If they could make too many decisions, their stories might not unfold as they should. I gauged where he came out of the deep and moved to flank him. I felt the Duke pause and smiled. I'd done enough damage the creature was wary now. He seemed to be hiding beneath a glacier's cliff, so I crept quietly atop and only allowed a trickle of power into my legs when it came time to leap, teeth bared and sword high. Another eye, I thought. If I could take its vision away this would become a great deal easier.

I realized I'd fucked up about halfway to the ground.

The Duke of Violent Squalls was not under me, waiting to get stabbed. His cape, however, was. Trap, and I'd literally leapt at the occasion of falling into it. A globe of air, the same magic he'd used early in the fight, formed around me. A heartbeat away from my feet touching the ground the air solidified, trapping me like a fly in amber. I stayed there hanging, barely able to breathe, as a spire of ice shimmered and revealed itself to have been the Duke. The snow-pale fae smiled and idly waved his hand, the globe shrinking closet to my body before rising higher in the air, taking me with it.

“Sooner or later,” he said, “vermin gets caught. Shall we give them a spectacle worthy of my name, Lady Foundling?”

His wings beat and he took me back to the Heart still in his globe, landing fluidly on the ground as I hung in the air above him. I could feel the fae on the shore watching us, though I couldn't see them. The Duke has positioned me as if I was still about to fall on him, a mocking smile on his face. Four spears of ice rose were carved out from the ground by roiling wind, rising to align with my shoulders and knees.

“Did you think resembling my form would make me hesitate?” he asked amusedly. “Let me disabuse you of the notion.”

In that moment I watched his eyes and saw his entire concentration had gone into manipulating the spears. That was the thing with magic: no matter how old and bad you were, it was impossible to cast more than one spell at a time. He was invested, and withdrawing from that would take a few moments. The Beast laughed, standing behind my shoulder and baring its fangs. I could feel its warm breath on my cheek, feel my Name pulsing with it. For a moment I almost forced myself to speak, to ram a cheeky reply down his throat, but I pushed down the urge. Monologues are for amateurs. The spears began moving, slow to my eye, and I reached for the second bundle of power inside of me. Heat flowed through my veins and in the back of my head I heard a snapping sound, the very same the Penitent's Blade had made when I'd broken it over my knee. I'd thought about keeping it, after Liesse. When it was just a very sharp sword. But then the day after it had become light as a feather, for angels were not prone to metaphor, and I had seen my death writ on its edge. So I'd broken it, into a hundred pieces I'd had scattered over rivers and lakes so it would never be forged again.

It had not been an act without consequence.

“Break,” I croaked.

For an instant all I felt was my will pushing against something infinitely larger. If the Duke had fought me, I grasped, I would have been swept away by the tide effortlessly. But he wasn't fighting me. Magic was will, and his will was in the spears. The globe shattered, the Beast howling in approval. I'd been caught with my sword raised to strike and though the momentum had been blunted that was again how I began descending. Panic went through the fae's eye and a hastily-redirected spear caught me in the shoulder – but it was the wrong one, I laughed – then another tore through my side and finally my arm came down even as the ice tore through flesh and bone. The tip of the blade punched through the silver armour and straight through the heart.

"You," he gasped.

"Me," I replied, taking all that was left of my Name and pouring it into the blow as I scythed down through his body, cleaving it in half.

Icy red water poured out of the gaping wound and I ignored the pain from my shoulder long enough to raise my blade one last time, meeting the Duke's eyes as I struck. The head flew. I let out a groan of pain and exhaustion as I dropped to my knees. Shit. I'd been spending power like coppers throughout the entire fight just to survive, and now the well had run dry. Couldn't even muster my last use of Rise, it was slipping through my fingers. I groped blindly for my hand and found a signet ring there, gurgling out a triumphant laugh. With an ugly gasp I broke the spear that had bit deep in my shoulder, leaving the ice inside and haltingly getting to my feet before trying the same with the one in my flank. My fingers were too weak – I botched the job and cried out when the ice dug deeper into my flesh. I saw the fae on the shore, vision swimming, and almost wept at the idea of having to make my way back there. Worse, the Heart was still rocking from the massive blow the Duke has struck earlier with his magic, though it was almost unnoticeable now. I paused. Entirely unnoticeable. The hair on my arm rose. Something was wrong. I looked down at my blade and dropped it in surprise. The red droplets falling from it were staying in the air, frozen. And now that I'd dropped it, it was staying still as well.

The Duke? Was this a variation on the globe from earlier? If the Duke wasn't dead – no, he had to be. Otherwise I wouldn't have the signet. There was a sharp snip from behind me and I turned. There was someone sitting at the edge of the Heart, a piece of ice and a knife in hand. He – it was a man, slender and dark-skinned – was carving the ice. His hair was long and dark, coming down in waves over his shoulders. On his brow I glimpsed a crown, fashioned in grey dead wood and weeping blood-red sap. He turned to me and a single glance was enough to have me fall to my knees. The ice in my shoulder burned, until the pain left and a strange and terrible clarity replaced it.

"Catherine Foundling," the King of Winter spoke.

The words were not words. They were mountains old as dawn ground to nothingness one season at a time, they were ice so deep in the heart of the world it had never seen the light of day. My ears were bleeding.

"Come, sit," he ordered. "It's time we had a little chat, don't you think?"

Soronel Haetir

Well, isn't this going to be a fun conversation.

Euodiachloris

I think "eep" is the appropriate response. Well, normally. Cat, however, is probably going to stick a foot in her mouth. 😬

godkiller999

JackbeThimble

Don't feel too bad your grace, you were never more than a glorified side-quest anyway.

PingleBerry

Eheheheheheh. Dis gun be gud.

Naeddyr

Ruh roh.

Naeddyr

Good chapter, things happening, quick and nice.

sheer_falacy

Alas, so much for "We do not kneel". I guess some things are a bit harder to resist than a Dread Empress.

1shot4living

Do you think a "superhero landing" would count as kneeling?

Sadpanda

Well the Fae Kings are gods. Emperor/Empress is nothing against that.

Paradim

She might be *required* to kneel, now. If she's become a Duchess of Winter through this scheme, doesn't that put her under the authority of the King of Winter?

RandomFan

As long as you deny it as a gesture of respect and sell it as one of exhaustion instead, it doesn't count. Alternatively, there are details to kneeling besides falling to your knees, though I do not know what they are.

I'm assuming you're talking about the one in front of the king of winter.

Letouriste

Kneeling generally involve only one knee in ceremonies and the like, with your hands on the heart or somewhere on your head or shaping something complicated or behind your back etc...

Nobody fall on his two knee except when you have something to forgive...I think...^^

The we do not knee is from black anyway

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Yes, "WE" do not kneel was from Black. What part of WE are you missing

benthelynx

And one could still see the ice of her fathers spear in her.

danh3107

There goes dear old dad, and he was replaced by a scary as hell super fairy.

Winning?

esryok

I wonder if Cat will still be the Duke's abandoned daughter the next time the court reforms. And what if it's a cycle where he is meant to be King of Winter? Can she come back, murder him (there's a groove in Fate now!) and become Queen?

George

He's always Duke; the Princes(ses) take turns at King.

nipi

Remember the "as if it always were so" part of the bet.

Cpt. Obvious

I'm a bit uncertain of the consequences here. On one hand Fay are said to be resurrected every time their season comes around. At least as long as they are killed in Arcadia. On the other hand its been implied that a Fey killed outside of Arcadia will be truly dead. It's also pretty obvious that they retain their memory. That should mean that they've all died innumerable times and know well that they will resurrect. It would also explain why they are so willing to go to war, as dying or getting mutilated is just an inconvenience.

But this Fey were scared when Cat started to get the upper hand. That does not compute if he will resurrect as usual.

It has to have something to do with the bet, or he knows that the King will take this chance to eliminate this Role, perhaps by ceding his Role to Cat. And as she's not of Arcadia she will not reset the way the Fey does which would effectively mean he will stay dead.

So I'm guessing he's not going to be around when the winter court is reset next time.

Whatever the case Cat has effectively created a new story which has to be a novelty for the Fey.

Nairne

The chapter really made me smile.

taborask

Arg, can't believe we have to wait a week to see where this goes

Komploding

Pure awesomeness, I can hardly wait for next week!!

Cooper

Take and Break, eh? I suppose the third aspect will be Bake a Cake :p

Bake could actually be fun though, especially without that pesky Manton limit. Uhh, Make is decent. Quake is a good one, but then you end up directing shields. Rake is technically a verb.

But the best two options by far are Fake and Wake. Wake is extremely ominous/powerful, imo – the one I would be most terrified my opponent having in a fantasy narrative, even more than the canonical Take and Break. However, a lot of the scariness comes from Waking things that are greater than yourself to fight some portion of your battles for you, which seems fairly antithetical to Cat's tale. Fake, on the other hand, fits her personality and actions to a T, and could be quite strong without being *too* boring in application.

nipi

Or Wake as in her wake?

Im still waiting for her to get a power or something that involves green flames 😊 I mean Heiress intentionally made it so that people would connect her to demons but Cat has been connected to goblinfire.

dalek955

My brother and I have been puzzled as to how Heiress made that work. What people actually saw was "Heiress uses devils. Heiress uses demons. Catherine Foundling gives her a spanking and takes them away because she's not mature enough to handle them."

beleester

Stake. As in "Putting something up for a bet". As in "making desperate gambles that put your whole kingdom at risk and hoping you'll find a way to cheat afterwards" which is Cat's main MO.

stevenneiman

I kinda doubt that it will be a rhyme, but if it is that would make a lot of sense.

Anonymous

What about 'Create'? She's trying to 'create' a new world (as in, forging a new way (or story, if you will), not literally creating it) where people aren't simply tools of the Gods and Named.

Shequi

There's also Slake, as in "to Slake a thirst"

Shequi

So Cat has the aspects "Take" & "Break".

I'm kinda hoping that her third aspect rhymes too.

Interesting that she got it by making an actual decision too; I had wondered what happened to The Penitent's Blade, and now we know.

It's also as entirely negative effect; it can only destroy. What does that say about Cat's personality?

---

While gaining two aspects in mere hours after reclaiming her Name might seem unfair, there's a couple of reasons it might have been sensible. First, she reclaimed it by holding onto her Role in contrast to Chider having essentially none of her own. When the Name is back, she's no longer Learning the ropes, and soon wins Take as a replacement for Struggle. She's still as entrenched in her Role as before, so there's a possibility to establish another aspect.

Second has only become clear in this chapter, as there's a parallel to Black's assessment of Catherine as "something that would use what it could not break and break what it could not use". This is core of her Role as a ruler of Callow, and she solidifies the second half of that principle by not doing the stupid thing and breaking the sword herself instead of letting the Hashmallim to decide when it would happen.

I'm actually interested in what the third part of that Role, since the problems piling up on Cat's table and the unclear as of yet direction the Callow would take (former rebels seeing her as a queen, goblin settlements, the governorship system etc.) will need being stated clearly by the end of the book. How do you think would Callow evolve (historical examples of permanently occupied kingdoms are optional) and what third aspect would it give her?

nipi

"Destruction always comes before creation." I wonder what shell Make of the things she Takes and Breaks.

Euodiachloris

"Fake" springs to mind...

The quietist

Could the third aspect be Make? She Takes Callow, then she Breaks the old power structures, and Makes them anew. This actually works with the broader Roles metaplot, this is what her mentor did and this is what she will do in turn as she takes his role in fate.

narcoduck

"It is a shallow soul who fights to the cry of 'might makes right'. The truth is more concise: might makes."
– Dread Emperor Terribilis I, the Lawgiver

---

Break looks an awful lot like Destroy, though given the word used I guess this direct contest of wills can result in either of the sides breaking. I'm glad that she still has Rise, though, it might still come in useful, even if Akua had seen it and wouldn't count on a nonlethal wound doing the trick.

>and I had seen my death writ on its edge
I know she probably meant magic item backfire, but I can't help but think that breaking it into hundred pieces and throwing them in water just means some fortunate hero (or a hundred) will stumble on one of them later.

>I can't help but think that breaking it into hundred pieces and throwing them in water just means some fortunate hero (or a hundred) will stumble on one of them later.

Senbonzakura Kageyoshi.

1shot4living

Remember that she's still Squire, so she doesn't have a top tier Name yet, so it could be that Break is a lesser version of Destroy, or it could be that Break simply fits her Role, as you can't make anything from something you completely Destroy usually.

Nicole

I'm super curious when she steps past Squire if she will get upgrades to her current powers, or totally new ones. I know Black mentioned that he had to learn his powers as Black Knight and he was the Squire as well, but it might mean that the upgrades changed them a bit? idk, but its going to be fun to find out 😊

agumentic

Why do I have that lingering "uhoh" feeling now and cannot stop thinking of other shattered swords that were reforged after all?

alegio

Happy B-day! 😊

ICSM

So, Take and Break.

The third one is gonna be something like Use, or Exploit, isn't it? Because that pretty much sums up our Foundling's M0. She takes what she wants, breaks it, and then uses the bits and pieces she needs. That's what she did with the angel, that's what she did with her own body with all that necromancy stuff, and that is what she just did with Fae nature.

Lumi

yay I finally caught up! go cat! yay fairies! I love stories with fairies.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Oh, then you'll love my story too, then:

It was a dark and stormy night. And fairies have taken over the elementary school, so there was no school tomorrow ever again! The end.

It's so great knowing I have a fanbase now

Aonar Faileas

So if Cat is the Duchess of Violent Squalls now, does she get fancy wind magic? 😊 (Was honestly kind of hoping/wondering if we'd get to see if she could Take Fae magic....)

alegio

I love how everyone knows that Cat had no way of actually defeating the duke and outside interference (Whether it was fate or the fairy kings schemes) was the only think that let her win.

And Break? Black will be SO proud of his little villian after knowing she defeated the fae demigod with a power like his own. (Even more than he already is)

Nicole

Black doesn't destroy, he subverts. He brings stability. I expect sooner or later her opposing aspects to put them into direct conflict.

M

One of Black's aspects is literally "Destroy".

Nicole

M, i'm not disputing that. I'm just not sure he is going to be excited to know she has the abilities she does. She can Take even one of his own abilities and break one other one. He knows (he has shown it and so have the other calamites) that a conflict is essentially expected at some point.

Its interesting that one of her powers mirrors his, but its probably the one he will be least happy about. 😊

Shawn Panzegraf

How about this for a Third Aspect: ***Remake*** It fits better into the entire "something that would use what it could not break and break what it could not use" than a simple "Make" (which, BTW, sounds entirely too positive/constructive to be a Villainous Aspect).

Remaking something flows in the same vein as Take, but with far more flexibility and utility in a variety of situations. Cat would benefit enormously from an Aspect effective in combat, social/political settings, and for utilitarian needs. Plus it could help address her gaping ranged combat deficit. Mage lobbs a fireball at Cat, she *Remakes* said fireball and does a return-to-sender with the former fireball now being something much more horrific.

With regards to the results of her victory in the Duel Vs. the Duke: The Prince as much said he and the King are seeking an expanded level of freedom from the Stories. Having Cat as a Duchess (while doing something practical, like "suggesting" she appoint a Steward/Seneschal to stand in for her in Arcadia on a day to day basis) likely gives the King and the Prince exactly what they were after. I could actually see Cat getting some Fae mojo out of this. If she's nominally one of the King's subjects, and has the Fae "pedigree" of power (though not at the Duke's level of course. It'd have to be in line with Cat's prophecy of lies)...that might well be the metaphysical license that lets these Winter Fae come and go in and out of Arcadia as they wish.

Just a theory. It'd be nice to see Cat pick up some tricks that go beyond her Name. Other Villains have done it with their fell sorceries and the like. Why not? Plus it would be a nice balancing agent plot-wise against what Heiress has cooking. Not to mention the Winter side just feels like it aligns more thematically with Villainy.

Nicole

Since the fae changes aspects/roles, it makes sense the power would be kept in an item, like a ring 😊

Naeddyr

Oh yeah, Cat.

'Break'? Seriously, that is not constructive!

Literally 😊

Anyhow, other rhymes:

Take, Break and Remake
Take, Break and Make
Take, Break and Shake
Take, Break and Heartache

TheCount

Thanks for tha chapter!

I think Cheat or Gamble would fit her nicely. She DID cheat Dead, the rules of Usurping a name, an Angel and the Creation after all, into standing up after a deadly dual she lost, reclaiming the powers she lost, stealing a resurrection and tricking the rulership of a kingdom respectively.

She also likes to gamble at important times like at the end of the last war in the warcollage, claiming power near a demon of corruption and now this! Putting the citizens of her kingdom and her subordinate's life up to a duel as a bet for a fancy magical ring and her own life.

As for the rhyme of the powers, that's not so important (but a nice touch if you can pull it off), no other Named had rhyming powers/aspects.

lennymaster

That is not just a ring, that is THE signet ring of the House of Violent Squalls if I remember right. And that she has as if it ever were so.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Her next aspect will be Cake.

As in, "you're not a hard opponent, you're Cake," and her opponent wilts.

Barrendur

@ erraticerrata

A wonderful chapter; appropriately mythic but simultaneously metafiction-y, as the fae themselves seem to be, and the characters (with an awareness of Names and Roles) must be. It's incredibly good stuff! 'A Practical Guide to Evil' is the best (most sophisticated, most imaginative, most interesting/best constructed) of the dozen or so web-serials I read weekly. Thank-you.

By the bye, the "handle" of a sword or similar weapon is properly called a HILT, and "spoke" is not grammatically synonymous with "said".

** "Catherine Foundling," the King of Winter spoke ** should be ** ...the King of Winter SAID.**

"Spoke" is used to say that someone said something; "said" is used to say their actual words. Ex: I SPOKE, and what I SAID was, "Blah blah blah."

Nicole

I have the impression it was meant specifically as "spoke" due to the description that followed, It was just put in a separate paragraph, rather than kept in the same one that might have appeared more proper to show the weight of his words-as-actions.

Yitzi

Learn, Struggle, Seek, Take, Break. Is it just me, or are they getting stronger?

Soronel Haetir

Well, she did get a second chance at the aspect thing, so now she has a much better idea of what is useful.

And there is another power-up coming if she manages to make the transition to Knight.

I suspect there aren't many that get to go through three names (even if one is a do-over).

Phantom Renegade

Eh Seek seemed, from the little we saw of it, like it'd be on par with her current crop of aspects. Probably a good thing she didn't keep it though, they're already having trouble not using Find, Seek would for sure lead to a unexpected downfall.

Probably a matter of maturity, knowing how to set things up and guide events so you don't repeatedly find yourself in situations where you need to use an aspect to get you out of a jam. I just hope our favorite orc doesn't get too hurt when it all comes crashing down.

Byzantine

Seek seemed to be a version of Path to Victory.

But in this world that may not be a good thing, because an aspect like that being turned on it's wielder would be an inescapable death sentence.

Morgenstern

...and YAY for this chapter. Just to have said that, too. Just about all we were increasingly made to want over the last chapters 😊

Nicole

I find it interesting. Her previous powers were things that lasted. Her new ones appear to be one-shot type powers (or limited use in the case of Take).

One other thing I noticed, she has now used Rise 5 times. She came back with it first, then used it in a later battle. Then used it like 3 times here. I'm not sure how that fits with the "3 uses" bit the fae told her.

agumentic

3 uses in one battle, as I understand.

Nicole

Hmmm, interesting. If that is how it works, why would she ever want to Take another power? Battle healing is basically the best thing she could Take as often as she is busted to bits.

I suppose it is still a great way to give her a power that villains don't really have a access to.

thanks for the clarification

M

Taking a power means that your opponent can't use it, presumably. Making a hero do with only 2 aspects is a very good power.

Letouriste

3 per day i think, we got information about that in the first fight with the fae soldier

Byzantine

She wouldn't want to Take another power.

But powers stolen through Take are incomplete, eventually she is going to run out of "Rise" entirely. In other words there are two different bars – one is the limit she can use in a day and one is the limit before it runs out entirely. So consider it like having batteries: She can use up to 3 batteries a day, but eventually the pack is going to run out entirely.

Gunslinger

Fantastic chapter. I wonder how break can be used. Is it break physical objects near her? Can she break armies? Spirits?

The best news though is that we only have to wait till Monday now that the second Patreon milestone hit.

chris S

I've been thinking about it and Break is a really scary Aspect in it's potential purpose. Imagine the "non-standard" ways you could channel it. Breaking enemy lines. Breaking fortress walls with but a word. Breaking someone's will.

Breaking the Rules that Good and Evil run by.

Dylan Tullos

chris S:

Break is a really scary Aspect. Like most immensely powerful weapons, though, it needs to be handled very carefully.

When Catherine uses Break, something is going to break, but there's no guarantee that the right thing will be broken. If she locks swords with an enemy and speaks Break, her blade could be the weaker; if she locks wills with an enemy and speaks Break, her will could be the weaker. Sometimes you Break the Rules...and sometimes they Break you. Vague Words of Power are often immensely useful and powerful, but it's dangerous to use a command whose effect is so uncertain.

Nicole

Its some interesting logic (and fun!), but I do not feel your conclusions are warranted by the text. She has used it a single time and only the thing she wanted to break actually broke. So far Name aspects seem to do exactly what the user wants (at least for villains). I expect that will continue.

TheCount

He is right though.

"Break," I croaked.

For an instant all I felt was my will pushing against something infinitely larger. If the Duke had fought me, I grasped, I would have been swept away by the tide effortlessly. But he wasn't fighting me. Magic was will, and his will was in the spears"

Its really IS a contest of wills, but she can probably break most things easily...

Although, the force of belief still remains a mystery to see. (example: A wall, with those on the otherside and on it beliving is unbreakable, as it never broke in history, even if the enemy got in the city, the wall never broke, they either climbed it or got through the gates (or underr the wall))

The Warren Peace NFL Report

I had a hard time imagining this setup. There are several different glaciers, and enough water to swim in. So the Heart was a lake on top then? What were they walking on? I have spent a fair amount of time on actual glaciers, I feel that knowledge is probably working against me here.

---

Just a lake with chunks of ice big enough to be called glaciers, shifting and standing apart enough that jumping from one platform to another and diving between them are both feasible options. There's a reason Lady of Cracking Ice is the witness at this fight.

MagpieJack

I think it's more like a lake with lots of large floes (and/or small icebergs) floating in it.

Dylan Tullos

Nicole:

Rule of Cool! Even if my wild guessing is entirely unjustified (and it probably is), it would be sweet to have Break backfire on you at the worst possible time. I like the thought of a double-edged Aspect, though I agree that there's no real text evidence for it.

Nicole

Hehe, I agree... though I like our Squire enough I just want to see her keep steamrolling everything that gets in her way 😊

AMC

What do you mean "no real text evidence"?

Cat spent 50% of the library scene last chapter warning us about unfaithful Aspects. (And previously, though I don't remember where.)

Isn't the "backfiring Aspect" supposedly one of the mechanisms that The Story uses to make The Villains lose?

taborask

I don't think there was ever discussion of the Aspects themselves backfiring. The concern is more in line with the issue with magic armor, in that it allows for more opportunities for somebody else to hijack the narrative and use it against you.

Nicole Weaver

Less backfiring aspect and more dangerous weaknesses. Like talking too much at the point of victory, or crushing the heroes without letting them fight back.

We saw when the calamites went after that group of heroes. They treated aspects like unbeatable trump cards and tried to get the heroes to exhaust their trump cards before striking a fatal blow.

Daniel

Dread Emperor Irritant sounds hilarious.

Byzantine

Based on all her quotes "The oddly successful" is a good description. She basically pulled what Cat does. On everyone. All the time.

For example I suspect those poor Heroic parties ended up fighting each other.

Shawn Panzegraf

The more I think about it, the more I'm sure Cat gets something solid and measurable out of this victory. My hunch is that she believes retroactive ownership of the Duke's Signet Ring will give her sufficient clout with the Winter Fae to either expel them from Marchford, or redirect them against Princess Sulia's forces wrecking the area around Liesse.

Given that Fae authority seems tied to the power of the individual Fae aristocrats, I'm not sure how Cat could have political clout within the Winter Courts whilst otherwise remaining unchanged. I'm sure it's doable, but it's definitely not how I hope it goes given that Heiress is powering up, Cordelia is bordering on launching her Crusade, and the White Knight is OP beyond the telling of it with his ability to essentially become the situationally perfect Hero at the drop of a hat.

Set against all that, I don't think some innate wind magic would unbalance our beloved Squire in the least. Of course like every other success since becoming the Squire, new Fae mojo should come with its own complications.

What does everyone else think?

Byzantine

She said what she hoped to get out of it last time: She just created a story and by the right of the story she **is** part of the winter fae now, so they can't attack Marchford to even out the balance because it already belongs to them.

dalek955

Scene-setting should probably mention that the glaciers are floating on water, rather than driving around on the land that "field" implies.

Also, I seem to recall Cat's last fight against fae (the Rider) demonstrating that armor is not useless.

TheCount

The Fae weapons still go through mundane armor quite easily, but she needed the extraspeed now that the armor would have negated with its weight.

arancaytar

New aspect, and it even rhymes!

Take it, Break it, Booty Quake it.

ArkhCthuul

Well, restarted reading after a hard won battle of leaving this story time to get elongated, and wootshed through the last chapters like nothing.

This one is amazing both in execution and portent, now I'll utilize the fact I haven't yet caught up and enjoy the conclusion. 😊

arancaytar

We're well into No Man Of Woman Born territory here, Cat. If you try to break a legendary weapon to prevent it being used against you, you're just tempting narrative causality even harder.

Chapter 15: Bestowal

"Most live out their days on an isle of vapid ignorance, shying away from the dark and hungry waters that surround it. To seek power is to brave the tides, but one who does should not expect to see those shores again."

– Translation of the Kabbalis Book of Darkness, widely attributed to the young Dead King

I forced myself back to my feet. This was too close to kneeling for my tastes. The movement came easier than I'd thought, easier than it should have – whatever he had done with the ice, it had strengthened me. For however long it would last. Fae gifts were notoriously fickle things. The King was carving his bauble of ice, ivory knife shaving off one sliver after another another. The sound was almost deafening, in the silence that had grasped this world. I made my way to the edge one step after another, almost slipping as I sat down. My bare hand held onto the ice and I managed to settle by his side without tumbling down into the waters, pushing down a groan of pain. The ruler of Winter casually allowed another sliver of ice to fall down, indifferent to my struggles. I opened my mouth, then closed it. I'd stood before entities as powerful as this one before, but for once I was entirely unsure what to say. Not cowed, perhaps, but so aware of the current frailty of my existence I might as well be.

"You did well with Auster," the King said.

I could still hear echoes to his voice that had me cringing, but it was not as brutal as it had been easier. I wasn't seeing things instead of hearing words, at least. Had he restrained himself, or was I getting used to it? The second thought almost had me shiver. Some changes could only come at a price.

"First time killing a Duke," I croaked. "Wouldn't recommend it."

My throat was scraped a little too raw to manage flippancy properly, sadly. My attempt at humour fell flat – looking at the King's face for too long hurt my eyes, but from what I glimpsed there was no trace of amusement.

"Larat believed you would avoid the tale entirely," the King said. "But he is a creature of war, mine own Hound of Winter. One does not rely on the Prince of Nightfall to trace the path ahead."

The lack of depth perception probably didn't help his case, I thought, and the almost chuckle that escaped me set my lungs aflame. Gods, that was not a pleasant feeling. I needed to get run through less often.

"You backed me in a corner," I said.

"And this offends you?" the King of Winter said, sounding amused for the first time. "Submission is ever the lot of the weak. If you would rage at anything, rage at your own impotence."

I hacked out a mocking laugh along with what might just have been a chunk of my lung. The bit of flesh stained my lips red as I spat it out, like rouge paid for in blood.

"I'm not," I said. "Impotent. Wouldn't be here if I was. You need something from me."

"Ah, mortals," the creature fondly said. "Always you seek to bargain until the very last breath. Your kind is a wonder."

I'd always believed, deep down, that if I ever met a god it would be about this condescending. I was darkly pleased to be proved right.

"I already took what I need," I said.

"You took what I allowed," the King replied. "Do not mistake allowance for triumph."

Even with the clarity the ice had forced on me, I was exhausted. It had taken every scrap of what I had to get me through the fight with the Duke taking only three lethal wounds – never before had I ever spent that much power so quickly. His power had not made me better, not really: it just felt like I was too tired to sleep. If I'd been having this conversation with Heiress I would have called what was being said posturing, but what need did the fucking King of Winter have to posture with me? He could end me with a thought. He was in a league so far above my own even trying to grasp the difference between us might kill me. And Ranger fights things like this for sport. Merciless Gods, what kind of monsters had Black gathered under his banner?

"I'm too close to the grave to play this game properly," I said. "I lied my way to a claim. Are you going to deny me?"

He laughed. It sounded like wind against dead branches, like blood freezing inside a still-beating heart. I could feel the bones in my neck creak, feeling so fragile a single snap would break them.

"This is Winter, Catherine Foundling," he said. "You own what you kill."

"Then you'll stop attacking Marchford?" I asked.

"That purpose has already been served," the King said. "We are now part of the dream you call Callow."

And that settled that. I'd achieved what I'd set out to achieve, though I knew there'd be a price coming. It left an unpleasant taste in my mouth, the way this had all gone down. I'd been played since the beginning by something so much more dangerous than me that there was no retaliation I could deal out. The leverage I'd thought I had was enough to keep me alive, but nothing more – and pushing it would likely get me killed. I sat there next to a god, and prepared to make a mistake. I'd once thought that Masego's need to always be exact was because he was the Apprentice, but that wasn't entirely true. He'd had that tendency before he became the Apprentice, I now believed. Archer had led me to the greater truth: Named, whatever their Name, were more. We were larger in everything, and when we grew our flaws grew as well. Urges that had been ignorable when we were mortal no longer were. Black would always seek victory regardless of the costs, Archer would always indulge in what appealed to her and me? I'd once thought it was my reckless streak that had grown into the flaw that would get me killed, but that wasn't quite right. It was that the part of me that would have been able to bite its tongue was long buried. My mouth opened, knowing I was about to commit a blunder. Because this wretch of a god had killed some of my people, and I could not let that go unanswered.

"You killed my men," I said. "When you sent your fae into my city."

"Your men would have died," he said. "What does it matter, that it was my doing or that of time?"

"You robbed them of the life they could have lived," I replied through gritted teeth. "You took from them. A debt is owed."

"Their existence weighed less than wind," the King said. "Nothing can be taken from nothing."

"This is not a bargain, King of Winter, it's an oath," I hissed. "One day, we'll meet again. Not tomorrow, not next month, not for decades. After your game's played out. After I've learned to kill gods. On that day, I'll come to collect."

"Will you?" he wondered.

It did not even take a heartbeat. Instantaneous would have been wrong still – it had always been the case that the water in my eyes was frozen. I felt blood running down the side of my face that should not be feeling anything at all. My bad leg, the one that still limped when I tired, twisted and broke with a sound like dead wood snapping. I heard the whistle of wind, more deafening than a hundred thousand horns, and after a flare of pain that dragged me to the edge of unconsciousness I heard nothing at all. I choked on my own tongue as frost spread over my skin, robbing me of the last of my senses.

"If I were a prince," the King told me, "I would be the Prince of Bleak Solstice. Some of that remains even under the Deadwood Crown."

I was a prisoner in my own body, the only sensation left to me the feeling of his fingers tipping up my chin.

"I could inflict on you every pain you've ever felt and some you cannot even conceive of," he said idly. "But you are of no use to me broken. One of those flitting around is quite enough."

His thumb ran its way up my cheek until it rested under my eye, and his other hand came to match it on the other side.

"You are in need of a reminder, Catherine Foundling," he said, "of the difference between bravery and ignorance."

The King clucked his tongue.

"No, not the eyes," he said. "Yours are too dull to make a fitting ornament. Something, perhaps, a little more pointed."

He withdrew from my face and the relief lasted for barely a moment before I felt his hand tear through my chest. I screamed soundlessly as his fingers closed around my beating heart, ripping it out like he was picking lint from cloth. The sorcery that had blanketed my senses lifted like a veil, leaving me on my feet with the King standing in front of me. I could see my heart in one hand, frozen black and solid. In the other was the bauble he'd been making out of ice, now a perfect carving of the moon. He thrust it where my heart had been, flesh closing around it as he withdrew and it began beating.

"I recognize you as heiress to the Duke of Violent Squalls," he said. "Made by prophecy, heirloom and the word of a king. Your inheritance, claimed by rite of blood, is confirmed."

I gasped for air, feeling the blood in my veins cooling further with every passing moment.

"Catherine Foundling," he said. "I name you Duchess of Moonless Nights. I grant you the seat of Marchford, and on these sacred grounds claim your fealty."

My surroundings ebbed away, replaced by deep and bottomless darkness. I stood there unmoving, seeing only the dark-skinned king and the blood-red sap dripping onto his brow from his wooden crown.

"I demand no fidelity and offer no respite," the King of Winter laughed. "I demand no faith and offer no protection. I give you slight and deceit, I receive hatred and betrayal. The Court of Winter receives you as one of its own, 'till your last desperate breath clawing at the dark."

Power pulsed in my chest, spreading through my veins. I felt the third part of my soul, the missing aspect I had yet to forge, fill with something old and too large to comprehend.

"I stand by my oath, dead thing," I rasped. "Before my days are done I will see you unmade."

"Then you are a Duchess of Winter in truth," the King grinned, teeth like stolen moonlight. "I charge you with the defeat of Summer, Catherine Foundling. I charge you with the making of peace, exacted from the battlefield."

He leaned forward.

"You have six times the coming of your title, or your heart is forever mine," he said.

Hands rose to my face again, to my eyes.

"Now sleep," he said, "and dream."

Fingers pulled down my pupils and darkness took me.

Dawn does not exist, then it does.

I see two cities and two lands around them. One is made of plenty, orchards of fruitful trees and fields of green. Juice runs down the chin of children as they bite into peaches, playing under the sun by pale walls. Colours for which there are no names yet fill half the world, proud lords and ladies clustering at the feet of a crowned and faceless silhouette. In its gaze is Summer, the heat that burns and hangs in the air like vapour. The other land is ice and illusion, and there nothing grows. Wind howls and creatures die under knives of obsidian, the warmth of their blood staining lips and chasing away, for a single blessed moment, the cruel bite of the chill. There the games of the children are vicious, for victory can only come from the defeat of others. At the heart of a maze, lords and ladies with smiles treacherous cluster at the feet of a crowned and faceless silhouette. In its gaze is Winter, the cold that that devours and leaves only absence behind.

War does not exist, then it does.

The hungry reach for the bounty of the full and this brings strife, as their taking is not gentle and this offence cannot go unanswered. Clarion calls make the sky shudder, for the host of Summer is a thing of might. They come in silk and steel, red pennants stirring in the wind like the promise of blood to come. Where they go noon follows, relentless and unforgiving as its heralds. Winter is not announced. It creeps like a snake in the dark, a slithering host of shades and clawed things that want, want until it hollows them out. They wear dead things and wield sharpness torn from the ground, eyes covetous under the blanket of night. None are valiant in the dark but all are desperate. Justice, the hooves of white winged horses thunder as they take flight. More, the blue-eyed things on horned horses whisper back, slender lances glinting. There are cries and screams. The moon falls, burnt black, and as it breaks the world Summer triumphs.

Noon spreads across two lands. Nothing is left of the hungry but ashes, trampled contemptuously. Ice melts away, leaving behind bleak black earth. The world is made a festival and Summer prospers, ripening again and again. The proud grow ever prouder, until the first fruit spoils. The sun does not rest and the land buckles under it. Pride turns to arrogance and under red pennants lords and ladies spill blood, turning on each other. Only one can have most, and none have ever tasted defeat. The land is scorched but there is no relief, for Summer advances and does not know retreat. The red haze hangs in the air like sickness as stomachs go from full to bursting like the fruits gone overripe, fire and steel claiming all until only the crowned and faceless silhouette remains. It remains seated on the throne as yellow leaves and roots claim the world, facing the sun until only a seared carcass remains.

This is the truth of Summer: everything burns out.

Green sprouts from bleak black earth, and from this harvest a city grows. Spring has come. In the other land yellow turns to orange and brown, leaves falling to the ground as the land is finally freed from agony. Autumn has come. From those remains grows a city, feeding on what little there is to offer. One land grows to plenty, the other dies a slow death. The sun rises, ice spreads.

The story comes again.

The hungry reach for the bounty of the full and this brings strife, as their taking is not gentle and this offence cannot go unanswered. Clarion calls ring out, but they are silenced. The serpent slithers into the heart of Summer, offering peace and hidden fangs even as its hunger sharpens behind honeyed words. Poison spreads in the blood and champions die, for not even the mighty can overcome the many soft deaths of Winter. When the host of Summer comes it is gaping and limping, fresh to a war that came unannounced. Justice, the hooves of white winged horses thunder as they take flight. The shades laugh as they devour them. More, they whisper back to the dead. The mighty die slow among their red pennants, striking at smoke and mirrors as snow begins to blanket the world. The sun grows ever paler until it falls from the sky, shattering as it breaks the world and Winter triumphs.

Night spreads across two lands. Proud corpses are clawed to bloody bone as the host clad in death and theft spills forth. Juicy peaches are ripped from trees and bitten into as the trees that bore them wither and die. Ice snakes across once-green fields made bare by the hungry. Winter feeds, feeds until it can almost understand fullness. It is not enough. Pale and gloried walls are torn down, pennants drained of colour until all is bare and empty and still the host wants. There is less and less while there are still many so vicious games are made ever more vicious for in the end there will be only one mouthful left, and only one mouth to devour it. The night deepens and desperation does with it, as bleak winds and starvation take what murder and betrayal does not. Not even feeding off each other is enough. Then only the crowned silhouette on the throne remains, unmoving in the cold as it tries to feel something, anything and dies an empty husk.

This is the truth of Winter: we all die alone.

The cold turns on itself and a remnant of a remnant frees itself from the ground, green sprouting from the bleak black earth. From this harvest a city grows, for Spring has come. In the land that was once Summer, the bare bones of what was once plenty are gnawed on. A city of the dying forms around the little turning to nothing, for Autumn shapes itself out of the coming of absence.

The story comes again. In the end, there is no end.

I wasn't sure exactly when I crossed the boundary from sleep to wakefulness. There was no transition, no burst of awareness. I was not awake, then I was. The thought had me shivering. I was under quilt, in a bed more rough than soft, and wearing clothes I didn't remember putting on. I rose to a seat and found myself surrounded by bare stone walls that were somewhat familiar. There were sounds coming from outside, but one closer: in a corner of the room, slumped in a chair, Hakram was snoring. Marchford, I realized. I'm back.

"Catherine?"

I glanced at the door as Adjutant jerked awake at the noise. Masego was at the threshold, looking somewhere in the middle of relieved and worried. I brushed back my hair absently.

"So," I said, "There's now a god on my murder list. Someone be a dear get me a drink – it's going to be a rough few months."

danh3107

I don't think I have any words to describe how the summer and winter imagery moved me.

Bravo

Darkening

I am in full agreement. That was exquisite.

Nicole Weaver

Me as well. Incredible

Morgenstern

Yup. Yummy. Moooooore... don't leave us craving, but we all know you will. ^^

ArkCthuul

I can only agree, deeply moving and flawlessly executed. The whole chapter was marvelous, and Catherine Ice Heart,... Wow, just wow....

godkiller999

What would have happened if Cath already had all her aspects?

nehemiahnewell

She wouldn't have fit, probably. She could take the tale because there was room for it in her own story.

intermediarywebserial

Regardless, not like she has much time to use it:

"You have six times the coming of your title, or your heart is forever mine,"

Only six years for success. No time at all to the King of Winter. Let's hope it's enough.

theart0fwar

No! Six time the coming of her title, moonless night, to defeat Summer. Six month to stop the invasion on the other side of Callow.

Morgenstern

Or, just as probably, the aspect would have been murder and gotten eaten by what took its place *g

Morgenstern

murdered. argh. damn you non-existent edit function, damn you.

Gunslinger

This was fantastic. Not just the prose, but the imagery of it. Just brilliant.

The implications of the events are pretty dire.

1. I'm worried about the relationship between the cold hearted winter queen and the fiery half faerie.
2. Catherine has only 3 years to kill the Winter King?
3. What is with the italics when she makes the i will see you unmade oath? It's not her 3rd aspect cause it's not bold. Also the text says the aspect was filled up making me wonder if she gave up that aspect for winter powers.

inkthief

Where did you get the 3 years from? She got a deadline of six moonless nights so about 3 months to make peace with summer. She won't be duking (lol) it out with the WK until decades at least.

inkthief

Sorry, meant 6* months, not 3.

Gunslinger

Ughh sleep deprived commenting. I thought it meant 6 seasons or cycles of winter.

Morgenstern

Huh. Right. That just might make more sense...

I thought she's got six times her Title, meaning six times the story unfolding, six attempts to succeed in the story that ever comes again... hmmm...

Morgenstern

You know, because of six resurrections and six times of getting (to be) her Title anew.

Morgenstern

You're not all that mistaken Gunslinger. That interpretation IS there, not just from sleep deprivation. 😊

haihappen

Most likely not 3 Years.

She is the Duchess of The Moonless Night. So she has 6 times that her title comes, i.e. a moonless night. If the Moon cycle works the same as in the real world, this would mean 6 coming of the new Moon phase in the moon cycle, i.e. approximately 5-6 months.

BUT, in a note: The King of Winter did not specify whom she had to meet on the battlefield to end the war...

RoflCat

I think that's what he's banking on, for her to break the cycle of Summer and Winter, given her...history of breaking things like this.

So that Winter King will not die alone with nothing, nor will Summer win and destroy all that is Winter.

She is part of Winter now, but at the same time she's also not a Fae, so he's likely expecting her to use that non-Fae mindset to break the current story and forge a new one, possibly something in... 'cycle' that would allow the king to remain.

My guess: She break the cycles from Summer-Winter -> Spring-Autumn into the normal seasons (Spring->Summer->Autumn->Winter) that ebbs and flow their populations.

It does break the actual 'war' between Summer and Winter since it's a clear cut on who'll win in their season, but each side will still gain their victories over time and the story will remain the same.

In Summer, the hosts of Summer slaughter the hosts of Winter, slowly expanding their area

In Autumn, the hosts of Summer weakens from the poisons

Winter resorted to using in their disadvantageous stage

In Winter, the hosts of Winter slaughters the hosts of Summer, creeping back over the land.

In Spring, the hosts of Winter turns on each other over the 'last bite' and their numbers dwindle while Summer gains the time to rebuild

vietnamabc

Hum I wonder what would happen in 3 years, from 2.15 Black also became a knight after 3 years and then he wrote the journal. Coincidences?

Also I got very strong vibe of future Winter Knight here, no need to wait for that old pale Duni man to croak.

Metalshop

I love that her villainous fatal flaw is mouthing off to the powerful.

Quest

Not quite Hubris. Audacity?

ayon96

Patreon pledge reached it's goal. So, are there going to be twice weekly updates?

taborask yeah, but he said they wouldn't start until july

nerfworld

So the story of callow and praes is similar to the relationship between summer and winter? the one with surplus and the desperate taker? and ultimately the empire will be forced to expand again to sustain it population

James, Mostly Harmless

To expand on Nerfworld's point, both relationships are similar to to the relationship between good and evil. If Kat can succeed in making peace between Summer and Winter, she may be able to deal with the other relationships.

Morgenstern

Yeah, because achieving balance there could mean just finally enough to fill the bellies of all and peace everlasting. But seriously – is that something one would expect of a villain story? Not sure if even practical evil can achieve that much... Hmm...

Shequi

That makes it very interesting that Winter has made itself part of the story of Callow, which is the land of plenty in the Praes-Callow tale.

As the Black Knight once said, the pattern is for Praes to grasp, and Callow to be grasped; but of course Callow has occupied Praes in the distant past, which fulfills the "Summer wins" version of the tale.

Alegio

I totally love Cath, she is awesome... But why does she never asks for help!? I understand she wants to do things her own way but still, she has some literal god slayers that would gladly help her! I wish at least once she would ignore that pride and ask Black to crack some skulls.

Letouriste

Black is away, he CAN'T help for now.

Morgenstern

Yeah. And that includes Captain, the one who slew a god, not God. 😊 I wonder into which category the Kings/Queens of the Fae fall.... hmmm...

Dianna

Who knows she might. My hope is that we finally get to have a meeting between Cat and Ranger (arranged by Archer). That would be fantastic, and make sense as Ranger probably has the most experience God and Fae killing.

stevenneiman

Black needs her to learn and grown, which means that he can't fight her battles for her. The Ranger would do this sort of thing for the fun of it, but it's questionable whether she would do it for a genuine reason if someone asked. Besides, her goals aren't mutually exclusive with Black's but they aren't the same either, and she needs accomplishments like this to give her story weight before she tries to do the things she needs to do.

Gunslinger

Lot's of cool replies to this. I just want to add another point is that she might not want their help because it would hurt her agenda. She needs to prove that she can lead her own vision of Callow and that cannot be done when you call warlock for every problem.

Letouriste

Thanks for the chapter:)

I had something to say but I forgot before i finish reading^^

That just show how your story is entrancing;)

James, Mostly Harmless

Now both Kat and Heiress are running around with their hearts outside of their bodies. I have a feeling that Heiress's heart is easier to get to than Kat's!

nipi

Was Heiress missing a heart aswell? I thought it was just her soul that was absent from the body.

M

Well she is a heartless bitch regardless.

Letouriste

Heiress is not heartless,she would not love her father so much if she was.she is just ruthless and ambitious...remember her sense of loss when her confidante got killed?

An heartless person would not feel that.

---

Cat: "Are you sure this will work?"

The King: "I have no idea!"

arancaytar

Don't be such a baby. Hearts grow back!

(no they don't)

The Archdevil

Has Cat been übercharged? It's about time.

Q

What I'm wondering is Cat's title of duchess of moonless nights sound very close to the names of the princes. Prince of nightfall. Prince of bleak solstice. The other fae high nobility have name that are more physical things. The lady of cracking ice the Duke of violent squalls. The duchess of moonless nights sounds in line with possibly being the princess of moonless nights.

---

"The moon falls, burnt black, and as it breaks the world Summer triumphs"

Get some cover from the sun, and Cat's title will be active more or less permanently.

Mental Mouse

There's also a lot of foreshadowing here...

Given how devils were described in the story to be born as personifications of a concept that are bound by their nature to keep close to it, and that they are summoned by diabolists to be used as tools related to those concepts, it looks like the Fae are doing the opposite of that, summoning humans from much bleaker Creation to cut some corners their stories don't allow. The behaviour not bound by one's nature must look at least as alien to them as behaviour that is looks to humans.

Of course, following this analogy, the King may or may not know that he essentially summoned a demon. He gave her his previous title, which is maybe enough to tell his name, but there's nearly nothing else to Cat's advantage right now, so short of baiting Summer into a raid on Skade she's not getting her heart back any time soon.

On a side note, given how he measured time given to defeat Summer in moonless nights, did he just turn Catherine into some backwards werewolf? This is how one loses their medical license!

narcoduck

Haha, what. Is she going to turn into her Fae disguise during every new moon? Actually...

stevenneiman

The thing that makes his game so dangerous is that he brought someone into the land of stories whose best skill is ensuring that her enemies' stories end badly, after making an enemy of her. And then he compounded his error by giving her a time limit to get payback, meaning that he now has 6 months to live.

M

You seem to be implying that he **isn't** suicidal.

Darkening

No, he gave her a time limit to bring peace to summer and winter to get her heart back. She can take as long as she likes killing him once that's done.

Nicole

Failing to get her heart back doesn't mean she will die. It likely means she will have less or no free will, but that isn't quite the same as dying.

Panster

That was some really good writing. Wow.

Eduardo

Poetic. Nice prose. Thanks.

Aaron

"That purpose has already been served," the King said. "We are now part of the dream you call Callow."

**flails wildly**

I thiiiiink, though I'm not sure, that this is the King more or less saying he wants to use Callow, or more specifically the idea of Callow as a weapon to break the chains of the narrative that Cat is wielding, as a way to break the Fae out of their own narrative cycles.

Which means he **needs** Catherine, which means she is going to kill the shit out of him and it'll be awesome.

(Really, he should have just paid it back. A loan of soldiers, years for years, to pay back the debt seems like it would have cost him very little and gained him not being murdered by Catherine later.)

nehemiahnewell

Ah, but Winter is murderous and backstabbing. I think he bound her closer to Winter by making her his enemy. What does he care if he dies in the doing? He's tired of this, all of this, and it won't even end.

stevenneiman

Good point. He did comment that she was truly of winter after she swore to kill him. And now that I think of it, he might very well be a death seeker who deliberately ensured that he would be dead for real in six months.

Random Fan

Yeah, making her murderous and backstabbing is probably a winter thing, where summer is murderous and facestabbing. I think there's more to it than that, though.

Keep in mind "you own what you kill"; I suspect he is trying to tie her in even further to the narrative-breaking plans-killing him might not land her the crown, but I would be entirely unsurprised if it won her his principedom. Others have said the name sounds like a prince(ss)' name already, so It would be a quite plausible secondary plot for Pyrrhic victory. I doubt his primary goal is his own death, but he might surprise me. Certainly, he has been provoking her, and while attributing intent to the fae is inherently risky, if there is a purpose it would be unsurprising.

@stevenneiman: I don't think the six-month time limit is to bring about his death, but peace won from the battlefield. Though bringing about his death probably would manage to take back the heart without compliance with his terms.

Nicole

In the story the King of Winter and the King of Summer haven't died. The King endures. He has no reason to believe that she will succeed in killing him and if she does, she becomes the Queen of Winter as the cycle has always been...

Dragrath

Yep Catherine truly has gotten herself in over her head like always that is got to be an aspect tied to her name. Only 6 months to resolve what the Fae have never been able to achieve as it is in opposition to their nature... Lets hope that the now Fae part of her will not make that impossible... Lets remember that her lover is descended from Summer...

Byzantine

Fae are forever bound to their stories.

They cannot find peace because they have no story which end "happily ever after."

Cat has to *make* one. It may just be an impossible task, or it may be the start of everything changing. If Cat can break the story of the Fae I suspect the Gods themselves are going to suddenly start paying very close attention.

Actually, Black states in 2.15 that her grandmother rode with the Wild Hunt.

The Archdevil

Kilian's grandmother rode with the Hunt, not Cat's.

Morgenstern

Kilian's grandmother riding with the Wild Hunt seems like exactly the thing he is referring to, pointing out how her "being from Summer" seems wrong, as the Hunt seems associated to Winter (or none?) ... 😊

Ming

Was the "pulled down my pupils" deliberate? As opposed to "eyelids". Because that was a delicious piece of imagery.

Shawn Panzegraf

This is entirely doable,
The Fae are considerably weaker in Creation, while still bound by their Stories. Also, Princess Sulia has been described as simple-natured even by mortal standards. Putting one over on someone as arrogant as the Prince of Nightfall (who, let's not forget, completely failed to anticipate Catherine's chosen course of action himself) shouldn't be impossible by any means.

I thought this was what the King was up to. I just didn't see the "meet my time limit or your heart is mine forever" ultimatum coming.

The Fae story would be horrifying enough if it was just Summer always being Summer, and Winter always being Winter in this Eternal War. The fact Summer becomes Winter and Winter becomes Summer, and still the War seesaws back and forth through endless Cycles....The Fae can do all the arrogant sneering about Glorious Arcadia they like, but in point of fact Arcadia is too Hellish even for the Gods Below.

Heh, the Gods Below likely chose at the Dawn of Creation to rent out Arcadia and live in the Hells, the Hells being the cushier digs and all.

redaeth

6 months, half a year, from winter to summer or back again. That is pretty poetic right there.

arancahtar

Not hard to see the parallels between the eternal war of Winter/Summer and the eternal war of Praes/Callow. "More" – "The Pattern for Praes is to grasp."

Catherine (just like Black) means to break one of those, and has had a surprising amount of success. Yet the other seems pretty unbreakable. You can't end the seasons – what would that even mean? So the analogy has to end somewhere.

Unmaker

"But you are of no use to me broken. One of those flitting around is quite enough."

The king is saying that there is a broken power (Name?) moving around. That doesn't sound like anyone I can think of: none of Cat's crew are obviously broken, Heiress seems villainously whole, Black's crew are definitely all there, the Heroes are OK, the Tyrant is healthy despite the prophecy of his doom, etc.

Any ideas?

Phantom

My guess is most likely ranger, she is crazy and also seemed to have only one or two aspects.

beleester

Ranger has three – Learn, Perfect, Transcend. We saw them in her interlude.

Morgenstern

I thought he was referring to the Prince of Nightfall.... *shrugs

Morgenstern

Or the Duke of the Violent Squalls that she broke by killing him, probably even more likely.

chris S

““I recognize you as heiress to the Duke of Violent Squalls,” he said. “Made by prophecy, heirloom and the word of a king. Your inheritance, claimed by rite of blood, is confirmed.”” so.... Catherine is -at least temporarily- part fae now (potentially, due to the way magic and stories work in Arcadia).

Are we going to see some interesting new magic feats arising?

Nairne

Well, the third aspect got replaced by, how it was put, “something old and too large to comprehend”. Who knows what kind of perks and downsides that fact has.

MagpieJack

My guess is that it's Winter itself that settled in.

Perk: Is not, technically, an Aspect. Promising that “I solemnly swear not to use my Aspects against you” allows her to blast people with Fae ice. A ritual disabling or dulling Aspects won't affect her Winter powers. Narrative conventions like “the first to use all three aspects in a duel loses” may also not apply fully.

Downside: Makes her susceptible to Fae conventions, anti-Fae magic and etc. instead. Another possible con is that since she never earns a third Aspect she doesn't transition properly from Squire to... whatever she ends up as (I've got money on "not Black Knight"). Bonus downside: Killian has Arcadiand blood and, being a red-head, is almost certainly Summer court. This comes with ALL SORTS of potential issues starting with are they even allowed to bang anymore.

Bookworm

Fun stuff. Just want to point out that she is going to have the winter king "unmade". That was her oath. Not kill. Not murder. She is going to send him to oblivion. It makes me wonder how the story of the Fae would balance with the gaping hole an absent Prince, with all of the stories and interactions attributable to him, would make from being unmade.

Darkening

It's Winter, land of treacherous ambition. There'd probably be a whole slew of promotions seized and you'd end up with one less random townsfolk or something.

Nicole

I am getting the distinct feeling that Cat is going to have a fun legacy. Like that Empress they all swear they hope stays in hell. When they mention Cat, its going to be like "Catherine Foundling, may the world not fall apart."

I'm sure there are better ones too. Anyone have some fun ideas for what will be tacked onto her name in the centuries to come?

knockoffnikolai

You are assuming there will still be a world after she's gone.

nineran

Anyone else creeped out by how the King refers to Callow as a dream ("we are now part of the dream you call Callow."), tells Cat to Dream (and she has a vision of summer vs. winter) but then she allegedly wakes up, only she can't remember that moment of transition that breaks the dream from reality? I'm having inception flashbacks: does the ice-heart mean that (she's fae enough that) she can now only dream of being in Creation while sleeping in Arcadia (except possibly on new moon nights?) until she earns her heart back?

Also Winter ranks theory:

Given that rank of nobility is listed as the X of Y where X is current rank (baron, duke, prince). Could Y indicate how high that X can go, with:

Physical things being capable of less high rank than non-physical things, both in descending order by frequency of occurrence? e.g. cackling ice < violent squalls < nightfall < moonless nights < bleak solstice?

Thoughts?

Also, interesting that both nightfall and moonless night don't have an adjective...

(and of course, I could be overanalysing).

Pbnj

Hmm....I'm thinking it's the uniqueness and nature of the referenced event that reflects the power of the title as well as how often it changes hands.

For example: Volent squalls can be frequent yet powerful, but who's to say that the fae holding the title today is the same as last week?

Vysirez

I struggle with the continued extreme levels of power you describe. It is extremely hard for me to see how Ranger can walk all over the fae as she does, doesn't really matter how good you are with a sword if your opponent can control reality.

That aside, Ranger is evidently just that good, so I struggle with Cat ever being significant when compared to the likes of Black and Ranger. More and more it feels like Cat wins/survives because she's the protagonist, rather than by any ability or action of hers. I say win/survives since most of the time she doesn't win, she just survives.

I love stories where it feels like the protagonist is fighting above their weight class. You managed to get that at the end of book 2, however the rest of the time Cat's opponents feel so far above her that no longer feels like she's fighting above her weight class and winning, but that she is winning by author fiat. Not that it really seems like she's winning all the time, often she survives whatever is going on, but serves only as the pawn of whomever is currently using her. I guess you might manage to have her pull another win at the end of this book, but if she spends all her time stumbling around only getting a real win at the end of each book, I doubt I will stay interested. Not sure yet if that is how things go, but it's trending that way.

Your characterization and dialog are great, just some of the other stuff I'm struggling with.

Helot

I think it has something to do with the tier of their Name. Squire is a first tier name. It transitions into Black/White Knight (or possibly something else?) Ranger is probably not a first tier name.

What happened to Catherine is that her Tier was reset, so she's starting over. Problem is, everyone is already used to her being a three aspect squire, so when she's back down to one, she feels weak, and it looks as though she should be losing constantly.

However!

Catherine isn't relying on her Name to win. She's relying on her Role. A Squire is someone being trained by a Knight, so her Role is to follow in the footsteps of her mentor... who just happens to be a badass Calamity, regularly taking out threats that should kill him.

By utilizing her Role over her Name, she's punching above her weightclass, if her opponents are using their Name instead of their Role.

You can see her that she was completely outplayed by the King of Winter. He even references her wording of 'Prophecy, Heirloom, King's Word' when he swaps out her heart. And the fae she replaced will just be back, once the seasons turn again 6 times. The Duke isn't out, he's just down.

As a side note, this whole situation feels a LOT like Harry Dresden from the Dresden Files. Summer/Winter interactions, Power Granting, just she's not as good as him at messing with Fae.

That "six times the coming of your title" isn't six winters, it's six new moons. That said, her oath also has power....

Exec

Fascinating chapter.

The way that Summer and Winter relate to Praes and Callow is interesting... is there a different version of Arcadia in each part of the world, each with its own repeating story that matches the 'surface'?

Or is this just a way of showing that Callow and Praes, Summer and Winter, Good and Evil are all the same story repeated in infinite variations throughout every being and land made by the Gods?

Really makes me curious about how the other continents fit, like the massive Elf Kingdom, the Gnomes, Yan Tei, etc.

That will be touched on later.

Yep, just spotted that on my reread.

“ ...side of my face that should not be feeling anything at all. My bad leg, the one that still limped when I tired...”

Wait, so she still had the numb face and limp? I would’ve thought resurrection fixed those, or maybe Rise. Especially since they weren’t brought up again as a problem since. Unless it’s Name shenanigans; she believes those injuries are part of her therefore they are and thus weren’t something to be “fixed”? Too old and therefore not repaired even by the super healing that is resurrection? Or she really doesn’t have them and he was just making her relive the memory of them as proof he could?

So kinda sorta joining up with Winter, but not really. And being tasked with fighting Summer on their behalf. Love the writing, but is this turning into a Dresden novel?

OceanFlex

I’m really hoping Squire’s next name is Moonless Knight. It would be a pun, which she hates, but that makes it better. Plus, that crescent moon she has for a heart for now is mighty symbolic, and who knows how long Winter will be bound to Callow now that a Lady is also a Duchess.

Villainous Interlude: Proscenium

"We should never forget that for a great evil to be defeated, a lesser evil must first become great."

– Queen Eleanor Fairfax, founder of the Fairfax dynasty

Liesse was under siege, though forces had yet to deign test her walls. With the Summer Court having seized both Dormer and Holden, the two Callowan cities closest to the Waning Woods, the Empire had abandoned the south and begun mustering north of Vale instead. With fae hunting parties scouring the land coming from the west and the east, Akua had been forced to rely on her own wiles to keep her territory safe. Summer was holding court at Dormer and the true threats had yet to take the field, but even lesser nobles of Arcadia were dangerous enough. Unlike those of Winter, they would not control and subjugate the population: all those who did not immediately bow to the Queen of Summer were destroyed a riot of flame. Which was rather unfortunate, since Diabolist still needed southern labour to finish her work in Liesse. The fae were not being accommodating of her timetable.

Gathering a force of her own to field had proven tiresome, though she'd been granted an unexpected boon. Since she'd publically sacrificed the last mercenary force she'd hired in Mercantis – not that the merchants had particularly minded, after she'd paid up her very expensive penalty fees – hiring fresh blood had been difficult. The war in the Free Cities had ensured the most reputable companies were already all being employed by one side or the other, anyway, leaving behind only the dregs. Levantine raiders too savage for that already savage nation, a company of unreliable drow exiles and, amusingly enough, Helikean soldiers who'd been enemies of both the Exiled Prince and the ruling Tyrant. The last of those three were the steadiest, but they numbered only a thousand.

The boon, she had engineered herself with the gracious help of Mother and Dread Empress Malicia. Even as the south of Callow went up in flames, the Wasteland had gone to war with itself. After High Lady Tasia of Wolof had defaulted on several payments owed the Tower for granted privileges, Akua's cousin Sargon had immediately attempted a coup. Normally he would not have dared: it was one thing for Cousin Sargon to set himself against Mother, another to attempt the theft of the due of a Named. But the Diabolist had sent him a discreet message, conceding to his claim in exchange for several concessions involving gold and sundry favours. Armed rebellion exploded in Wolof before the day was out. Sargon had won the initial skirmish after deploying a dozen powerful devils, at which point Mother had responded by unleashing a demon on his men. The mess that ensued escalated in brutality.

Dread Empress Malicia sent in all the Legions garrisoning Praesi territory to restore order even as what remained of the Truebloods watched the greatest among them being cornered like an animal. Akua had, naturally, reached out to the most prominent members left. Gold, men and mages had flowed to her territory as Holden fell to the Summer Court and she became flanked on both sides. Including her mercenaries, Akua now had slightly over ten thousand soldiers under her command. Of them almost a tenth were mages, though only a handful of those could touch High Arcana. Still, it had been an effort to keep the delight off her face: oh, the kind of things she could make with this many spellcasters at her disposal.

And she would have to make them, of this there was no doubt. No reinforcements were coming for the foreseeable future. The legions of the Wasteland were busy keeping Wolof contained, and would not be able to march anywhere for months. There'd been talk of some of the legions guarding the Red Flower Vales under Marshal Grem One-Eye coming south as the orc himself took operational command, but Proceran movement on the other side of the border had smothered that notion in the crib. Cordelia Hasenbach might rule over a mongrel nation, but Akua had to give her this: she was a fair hand at the Great Game. With One-Eye and his men remaining to prevent an invasion by the Principate, command had fallen to Marshal Ranker in Denier – who'd also had to decline, as the Duchy of Daoine had declared full mobilization of the Watch and refused to give any explanation.

That left General Istrid with seniority, and she'd stripped Summerholm of its garrison before marching south to muster all she could north of Vale. As a crowning irony the single largest army in Callow, the Fifteenth under General Juniper, was forced in a defensive position at Marchford and unable to participate. The gate into Arcadia could not be left undefended: the Winter Court might just decide to establish a beachhead of their own, and not even Praes could withstand the pressure of two Courts running rampant. Until Foundling reappeared, her people were paralyzed. It had been most amusing to see everything Squire had built over the last year collapse the moment she was gone, Diabolist had to admit. Upon hearing word of Squire's disappearance into Arcadia the Praesi among the Ruling Council had swiftly struck a deal with the Guild of Assassins and seized power in Laure before declaring martial law across Callow – a move greeted with widespread rioting in the cities.

Best of all, when the usurpers had first accessed the treasury they'd found absolutely nothing: the Guild of Thieves had already emptied it in full, and to add insult to injury taken a tithe of a tenth from every Imperial Governor's own funds. Callow had descended into utter anarchy and in the chaos Akua's own hands were freer than ever before. She held the only remaining stronghold in the south, her workforce had swelled with refugees and until Summer was dealt with she was essentially untouchable no matter what she did. The Empire could not afford for her to rise in rebellion, not with this many wolves at the gate. The situation, Diabolist thought, had fallen into her lap like a gift from the Gods Below. The dark-skinned woman strode the smouldering battlefield where her forces had prevailed not an hour past, Fasili trailing her dutifully. He'd been in command for the engagement, the largest one her army had waged so far.

"Fewer than two hundred casualties, Lady Diabolist," the other aristocrat said. "The revolving wards were a success: all their heavyweights focused on breaking them rather than firing mass magic at our troops."

The conversation would be a very different one if the new wards had failed, Akua thought. There'd been a Count among the catches of the day, and if one of those had decided to decimate her ranks she'd have lost at least a fifth of her soldiers. What the fae of Summer lacked in subtlety, they more than made up in destructive power. The very reason that her mages had been instructed to capture instead of kill, at it happened.

"I want their corpses raised by nightfall," she ordered. "Form a separate unit from the unded, under a cadre of necromancers. I expect their ranks will swell before this is over."

"It will be as you say," the other Soninke nodded.

"As for the wards, I've been told one of them was fractured," the Diabolist said. "We'll need to refine the concept."

"Your First Mage is already designing improvements," Fasili replied. "We won a great victory today, my lady. Fae with titles of this magnitude are hard to kill, much less subdue."

The Diabolist's lips quirked the slightest bit at the words. Fasili would take it as approval of his flattery, but the truth was different: it had been a very long time since any Praesi had a First Mage. The title had fallen out of favour when the Name of Warlock emerged: being the most powerful of a High Lord's spellcasters had been judged to be meaningless when there was the greater accolade of a Name to be claimed. Her revival of the title had been for largely personal reasons, though she did approve of the tribute to ancient custom.

"The Count of Golden Harvest," she said slowly, savouring the title.

"And two Baronesses," Fasili added with a vicious smile.

Fewer than a hundred fae without court titles had also been caught, though they paled in importance compared to the other three. They would be useful fodder, true enough, but for some rituals quality was required over quantity. Leaving behind the sea of tents her soldiers were setting up for the night, the two of them made their way to the wide flat plain to the side of where the battle had taken place. There were four massive wards in place there, her mages milling around them like busy little bees. The largest held all the lower-ranked fae, shackled in iron and badly beaten. Though much weaker than the titled fae, their number alone was enough to make them dangerous: a hundred and fifty mages maintained the ward in rotating shifts to ensure no concerted attempt could be made to break the glowing sigils hanging in the air that kept them prisoner. The other three wards were not so heavily manned: they held one of the high-ranked nobles individually each of them under three times three bindings, all interlocked and reinforcing each other.

It was around the wards imprisoning the Count of Golden Harvest that a greying Soninke with a closely-cropped beard was kneeling, fingers dancing nimbly across a set of runes floating in the air. Akua studied them curiously: High Arcana, all of them, yet she did not recognize all of them. She was not surprised. Brilliant she might be, but she was still young and Dumisai of Aksum had spent a lifetime plumbing the depths of sorcery. A moment later the runes rearranged themselves before disappearing as a hum of power came from the ward surrounding the Count. The fae grunted in pain, drawing interest from the mage close to him.

"Is it physically painful to have more than nine tenths of your power restrained?" he asked in Mtethwa.

"I will see you made ash for this insolence, sorcerer," the Count of Golden Harvest hissed.

"Your threats are of no academic value, creature," the man noted. "This is most unproductive."

"First Mage," Fasili interrupted, his head dipping in respect.

The sorcerer jerked in surprise, only then realizing he had company behind him. He smiled at Akua's right hand man hesitantly.

"Good evening," he began, then trailed off. "... You."

"Lord Fasili Mirembé," Akua provided, too well-practiced to be openly amused..

"Yes," he said. "That."

"Papa," the Diabolist greeted warmly as her father rose to his feet.

"Mpanzi," the older man smiled. "Lord Warlock's research appears to be accurate. From what I've seen fae are made of the same matter than Arcadia itself – there is no difference at a fundamental level between one of them and, say, a stone taken from there.”

“How dare you,” the Count said angrily.

Her father absent-mindedly waved a hand and a gag of blue runes appeared in the fae’s mouth, stuffing it shut.

“Your ritual is prepared, before I forget,” he said. “Very good materials you’ve secured. Conversion rates for fae will be much higher than with human sacrifices.”

“That will be all, Lord Fasili,” Akua said, half-turning towards him.

“By your leave, Lady Diabolist,” the other Soninke bowed.

He cast an irritated glance at Papa before leaving, but there was no true heat there. Her father’s absolute lack of ambition in matters of authority made him the opposite of a rival and her known fondness for him meant he was too costly to retaliate against for a slight as minor as the one he’d been handed. No doubt an officer would be on the receiving end of Fasili’s irritation before the night was over. One of the drow, most likely. They found it difficult to take orders from a man, even if that man had given his allegiance to a woman, and Praesi highborn did not have much tolerance for insubordination.

“He seems a very reliable young man,” Papa said, watching him walk away.

He would have you dead within an hour if given leave, Akua thought. Her father had spent his entire adult life under the distant, if vicious, protection of Mother: he’d never had to develop the kind of nose for enmity that most powerful Praesi mages needed to survive. His judgement in these matters was... lacking. In most people Akua would have considered this a crippling flaw, but in truth she preferred him like this. Unaware of the dangers lurking around him, able to do what he loved without worry. She could keep him safe from the scavengers. Diabolist had made it very clear to her subjects that Dumisai of Aksum was not to be touched: feeding a scheming minor noble to a swarm of imps in full view of her court had made that point very thoroughly.

“He has his uses,” Akua conceded.

Papa nodded, already visibly bored with the avenue of conversation.

“With today’s lot you’ve almost two hundred of the lesser fae,” he said. “That should be enough for a Lesser Breach.”

The term was fairly technical, and few aside from Praesi mages would have known its meaning. Diabolism was, at its heart, a branch of magic concerned with the summoning, binding and contracting of devils. And demons, of course, though resorting lightly to such creatures was the path to fates worse than death. Her people had practiced this kind of sorcery since days predating the Miezan occupation and while it had originally been a means for a single practitioner to gain power or knowledge, under the Empire it had become developed as a tool of war. Dread Empress Triumphant – may she never return – was widely held as the greatest diabolist to ever live, above even the Dead King. She'd summoned and bound entire legions of devils, put demons at their head and her bindings had been so well-crafted they had held for centuries after her demise. To raise an entire hosts of devils, as she had, means other than summoning them one at a time had to be used: the amount of wasted time and power would otherwise be massive.

The method to get around this was called a Breach: a portal into one of the Hells would be opened, with a mass binding woven into it. Any devil crossing into Creation would be subject to said binding, allowing for a degree of control – though a much looser one than if the binding had been designed for a specific entity instead. Convention divided Breaches between the Lesser and the Greater. Akua herself had used a Lesser Breach at Liesse when deploying her army of devils until the mages of the Fifteenth shut it down, fuelling it with the lives of the Stygian slaves. A Lesser Breach was temporary and unstable by nature, impossible to maintain for long. A Greater Breach was a different matter entirely, and only one had occurred in all of Calernian history: the Dead King's ritual in Keter, which had opened a permanent and stable portal into one of the Hells. Little progress had been made since then in understanding exactly how the Greater Breach had been made, though Diabolist had come to understand some part of it.

"More fuel would be preferable, but I don't have the time to spare," Akua said. "I'll have to do with limited numbers and make second Breach when we've the fae for it."

"You'd get more meat for the expense if you went lower than the Thirtieth Hell," Papa pointed out. "As it is a seventh of that power goes into the Due."

"Foundling made it very clear during the Rebellion that a well-trained army will tear through anything lower than the Thirtieth, given time to prepare," Diabolist replied. "The Summer Court is in a league above what her forces were back then. If I want the devils to survive the first engagement, I can't use chumaili or kichabwa."

Her father hummed, mulling it over.

"Well, you won't get many walin-falme but you can be sure they won't die easy," he said.

The term meant imperial guard, in an archaic dialect of Mtethwa. The devils were old favourites of Tyrants seeking to invade Callow, preferred to more bestial breeds for their above average intelligence and ability to use forged armaments. They were also noted for their resistance to fire, though it was difficult to model how effective it would be against fae flame. Their leathery skin and deformed bat wings had many mages speculating Dread Emperor Sorcerous had used them as breeding stock to create the much larger winged monsters that were used to access higher levels of the Tower, and would allow them to answer fae flight on the battlefield. It was a shame, truly, that she would not get more than four hundred of them from the Lesser Breach. Their inaptitude for tactical thinking was perhaps their greatest weakness, and the reason they usually served under the command of the Black Knight of the era. Akua lacked such a commander however, which was why it had been so important to capture the high-ranked fae. The Lesser Breach could wait until the prisoners had been brought back to Liesse, but Diabolist intended to summon her officers tonight.

"The Count first," she said.

"For the best," Papa agreed. "He'll be the most exhausting."

The two of them strode into the ward keeping the Count of Golden Harvest contained, the thick and heavy magic washing over their skin. Her father flicked his wrist and the gag in the fae aristocrat's mouth dissolved.

"You court your doom, mortals," he said harshly. "My Queen will have vengeance for what happened today."

"There is a theory by a very clever man," Papa said, entirely ignoring the threat,, "that fae can die in truth."

"Your ignorance rivals only your arrogance, sorcerer," the Count sneered.

"Slitting your throat returns you to Arcadia, to be born again," her father continued. "But, ah, fae are made of power are they not?"

"We are Summer incarnate," the creature smiled. "You will all burn under the sun."

"Yes, power incarnate," the greying man said admiringly. "What happens, then, if this power is used up?"

"No mere insect can undo the workings of the Gods," the fae said.

"I do not believe," Diabolist said, "that we have been introduced."

The Count glanced at her with contempt.

"I know what you are, cursed one," he spat. "Defeat is carved into the bones of your kind."

"My name," she said, "is Akua Sahelian. I am a villain."

"The pale imitation of an ancient enemy," the fae mocked.

"Oh yes," Diabolist agreed softly. "That is exactly what I am. The Enemy, they call us in the West. I am the last of a line unbroken since time immemorial. My kind has usurped the mantle of gods, stolen secrets from beyond Creation and turned kingdoms into sea. I am Praesi of the old blood, fae. You should kneel in awe."

"You are the dying ember of a fire long gone," the Count sneered. "Soon to be put out by the might of Summer."

"You think you know might?" Akua laughed. "I will turn your blood to smoke. I will feed the horrors that crush your bones with the sound of your screams. The hearts of your children will raise my fortresses to the sky and make my ships sail on solid ground. You may have been godlings in your wretched home, but you've stepped down from that pedestal – and down here, we bleed the likes of you over altars. Your poor, misbegotten creature. You actually believe you have a chance."

Her Name pulsed beneath her skin even as her eyes turned cold.

"But you're in Creation now, Count. Here be monsters."

The Count smirked.

"Do you seek to frighten me, child? Summer does not know fear."

Akua slowly unsheathed her knife, resting the wickedly sharp edge on the side of the fae's throat. He looked into her eyes, undaunted. Diabolist smiled.

"No, not yet," she murmured. "But I will teach you."

Mmm. He seemed a relatively harmless duffer before, now he's shown to be near as much a sociopath as the rest of the Evil nobility.

The most interesting line there IMO was – “The pale imitation of an ancient enemy,” the fae mocked. – it does suggest the fae are on the side of the gods, confirming a less definite line earlier.

Also Cat's second thoughts about gathering power to herself seem to have been proven correct.

I kinda would have agreed if he hadn't so gleefully agreed to open a rift into hell. As it is, the question should be if he didn't orchestrate this. His wife/jailer/patron is replaced with his daughter/protector/patron, and now he gets to experiment with things that will kill a bunch of civilians. And he won't take any blame, because Akua is crazy. But would she be so crazy without his influence?

danh3107

What a shitshow, Cat has her work cut out for her when she gets back. Man do I hate Akua, but she is really fun to read.

See you next week erratic

Nairne

I really agree. I hate her but she makes it a profound type of hate. The type that will be missed when finally vanquished.

Darkening

Man, I don't like giving credit to Akua, but her speech to the fae at the end was pretty great. "You're in creation now Count. Here be monsters." I'm a sucker for a good villainous gloat. I can't wait for the collective "oh crap" when Cat gets back and starts beheading the folks that screwed things up for her back home.

A few chapters before Catherine went into Acadia, she received a report that the Thieves Guild had a new king, as someone had stolen the crown; I would wager rubies to apples that the new king is the Thief. Because Cat can't catch a break.

Could be. I seem to have missed it.

Or maybe Ratface and Robber emptied the treasury (that was already mostly empty) and robbed the governors.

Oh well. Cats always broke. Shes even got a close aspect of it to her name.

Barthumphries

And, side note to that, someday an enterprising group of heroes will chat with a new angel and learn exactly what happened. And then they will go on a mighty quest to recover and reforge that feather/sword which Cat Broke. And they'll actually recover two shards, but then they'll run into the quiet assassin that Cat paid to watch some other shards, and the assassin will go get Cat, and Warlord Cat, the Necromancer, Queen of Callow, Duchess of Moonlight Nights, Empress of Praes, will descend on that little band of heroes will all the might of everything that she has, then rescatter the pieces that were gathered.

Either that or some Praesi villains will start regathering the pieces.

Looks like it is once again going to be a three-way fight when Cat comes back!

There is a theory by a very clever man," Papa said, entirely ignoring the threat, "that fae can die in truth."
– Pretty much sure it is the Warlock, and if Warlock knows it, there is a good chance Apprentice knows it. And if both Apprentice and First Mage knows it, I am predicting fae-killing maneuvers by power draining!

That also raises the question for me, when Cat killed Duke, was it perma-kill or will Duke be reborn when the cycle resets. If it perma-kill, and Cat is now permanently part of Winter Court, then the story could not go as usual. [It was said that Winter/Summer story ending is decided the moment their Kings are chosen] Maybe someone can correct me if I am wrong?

nipi

The duke will probably be reborn. Probably not as a duke tough. Remember the "as if it always were so" part of their bet. Cats stuck in the Winter court for the foreseeable future.

Cpt. Obvious

Up until now (and this is my second read through after the series was completed) I've believed that Fey dying outside Arcadia were dead as in permadead. Apparently that was wrong.

But that also makes it sound as if I was right in theorizing that Ranger makes a trip to Arcadia every time the winter court resets. And she does that to find the Fey she ripped an eye from.

So my theory is that every time the reset happens that eye disappear from the ring she set it in, and so she goes to collect it again. That would explain why Ranger is so hated by the winter court. And she must really like that ring...

Now to the question about the count of squalls or what he was called. I'm not sure he can be resurrected. At least not until Cat dies or in some way loses the Fey title. And if he's resurrected it certainly won't be as The Count. Remember that apparently he was the primary opposition to any King that try to avoid starting the war with the Summer court. But that title was bestowed on Cat, and though she's now of the Winter court she's not of Arcadia and won't be bound to their cycles of resetting. So even if that Fey is resurrected he won't be a threat to Cat or to the King's plans.

[The "Her bindings..." section of this sentence is, as-written, an independent clause, and needs to be combined with a proper comma + conjunction or separated into another sentence, as I've suggested here.]

>Which was rather unfortunate, since Diabolist still needed southern labour to finish her work in Liesse.

Interesting how her name in narrative went from Akua to Diabolist between paragraphs, there. This section is from her POV, so I wonder what prompted the switch in self-reference? I've noticed that Cat never thinks of herself as Squire, which is probably tied to her whole narrative arc about Named not actually mattering. But with Akua, it's more mixed, and I'm not sure how much of that is simply out of a desire to mix up the verbiage for referring to her and how much is significant self-reference.

cookiehunter

also i think he got a typo where it is stated that the council took over Liesse and it should be Laure

jamesc9

The Council is Cat's (former and future) administrative body. It can't have taken over Liesse, because that's full of Akua. Laure is the former capital, so if I was going to take something and work outwards, it's a potentially good pick.

Happy birthday to me. And as a gift... I get to see Heiress "winning". Oh, excuse me, Diabolist.

Man, when this first started, I was expecting the whole "war with the fae" to be something minor. They invade, get driven back, and events move on. Instead, they are proving that Callow's destiny to be invaded over and over is embedded deeper than we might have thought. Arcadia embodies stories, and this seems to me like the world countering Cat's attempts to change Callow's story.

And, just like that, the Uncivil Wars are officially open! Given how even a last-moment demon summoning was enough to stall most of the legions for months, the lengths Malicia went through to delay this mess are understandable. Sahelians' divorce has been as ugly as it gets without openly confronting each other.

I honestly don't know, where will the Squire go first: to Liesse, where most of the fighting happens, to Laure, where her support and financial foundation has been gutted recently, or to Dormer, where her heart lies.

Also, how the hells is capturing a Summer fae easier than killing them?

Morgenstern

Uhm.. you seem to have misunderstood a sentence in this chapter or two... It was explicitly said that capturing them was much HARDER than killing them... o_ô

---

Ah, I thought that sentence implied that the wards would have failed if they went for the kill. I read it again and I don't know where I took that from.

H.

Yep, between the Callow civil war, the Free Cities war that Black's dealing with, this Praesi civil war, and Callow broken *again* with the war against the fae, we now have enough wars for it to count. In fact, if this current one is Summer vs. Winter, then they have indeed all been civil wars.

beleester

Liesse or Dormer. She needs to both make peace with Summer, and kill or thwart Diabolist's plans. And those feed into each other – by stopping Summer from invading, she removes the fuel for Diabolist's summons. She does need to secure the rest of Callow and the Ruling Council, but the damage has already been done and there's no clear target for her to smash, so I'm not sure what she'd accomplish there.

Perhaps Dormer, then Liesse – cut off the Summer invasion, then race to Liesse to shut down Diabolist's plans. Gotta save the final boss for last.

Except Catherine has a six-month timer, and that implies that she won't be able to stop the invasion for quite some time.
Hmm...

Darkening

Y'know, if a couple hundred low fae and 3 nobles are barely enough or an unstable temporary portal to hell, what the heck did the dead king sacrifice to make the greater breach in the days when sorcery was even less efficient than it is today?

---

Well, his sorcery is as efficient as it gets, since its efficiency of 9/10 is an absolute ceiling for singular casters, as stated by Akua in Chiaroscuro, as opposed to rituals being less efficient in general and hers specifically getting only 6/7 out of these lower fae sacrifices. Singular casters being more efficient is probably the reason as to why she's summoning "officers" herself.

The Archdevil

A whole country full of people, whom he then raised in undeath to invade said Hell.

Nairne

I believe it was mentioned somewhere that the Dead King masterfully used the power that goes to the Due as it is called (the so-called waste during a ritual), so it's probably that.

beleester

No, the Dead King couldn't avoid the waste, which is why his kingdom is sort of Mordor-ish. <https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2017/04/19/villainous-interlude-chiaroscuro/>

"And while nine tenths of that energy was properly channelled in ritual, the remaining portion turned the city of Keter into a warped ruin of anomalous magical phenomenon. The problem of Keter's Due was that it limited what could be accomplished by ritual magic if you were in any way invested in where it took place. The larger and more powerful the ritual, the more dangerous the waste of power released."

Morgenstern

So. After this I am waiting to see what exactly the Dead King has done in all those years... to the Hells. The ones that Akua is now trying to access.... I'd be a bit disappointed, if that should not mean things going awfully wrong from a totally unexpected side, because she once again underestimated someone she should not and/or simply "forgot" / has a blind spot in certain places.

Besides Cat coming back with Winter at her back, of course. Aren't we all gonna enjoy seeing what's in the bag for those scumbags doing exactly what everyone feared they would the second no one is there to directly control them?

( Although I surely AM a bit disappointed in that specific regard – if Akua's point of view should be inherently true in the news she gets from all over Callow, that is – that Cat's troupe members that did stay behind seemingly did absolutely nothing to stop that freak show of Praesi trying to take over... =/ )

Morgenstern

Or, who knows, maybe the old Dread Empress everyone wishes to never return actually does rule over there and/or battle the Dead King for the crown over there ^^ ... maybe, tiny tiny maybe we will see bits and pieces of her rule return, if Akua sets them free? Probably too much to... [insert-word-of-choice] for, though. ^^

Morgenstern

Although it would be hilarious. It seems much more of a figure of speech, though. A legend built afterwards, but never true. Although, if legends CAN make things true in this world? Uhoh... I see some endgame baddie alright. ^^

The Archdevil

I just remembered this. Back during the College war games, I believe during the 5-way melee, Cat heard either Robber or Pickler humming the Girl who climbed the Tower, and one of the verses keeps coming to mind. It was something about Shining on a Moonless Night. Which back then, none of us picked up on. But now, that line has a pretty clear meaning.

=====

It's actually about the opposite phase:

They say the third step is the cruelest
Walk when the moon is at her clearest:
Love ends with the kiss of the knife,
Trust is the wager that takes your life

Drama incoming. I'm afraid to see just what has Cat missed (or, more probably, what ties she'll have to sever to keep climbing).

Burnsy

So in no particular order, things Cat will need to unfuck/fuck up in a spectacular fashion after she gets back:

Rioting in Callow
Chaos in her own army
The goblin settlement
Diabolist
Diabolist's mercenary/trueblood army
Diabolist's demon army
The Summer Court
The Queen of Summer
Killian
Thief
The Thieves Guild
The Assassins Guild

And Black and the Calamities are off in the middle of a threeway with the Tyrant and the White Knight.

And there's whatever schemes Malicia/Cordelia are cooking up that she'll inevitably get caught up in.

Gods Above and Below can this woman ever catch a break?

"Today we set aside Good and Evil. There is only one sin, defeat. There is only one grace, victory." – The Black Knight, at the Field of Streges

"For whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap." Galatians 6:7

If Heiress loses, then she's a traitor that deserves a slow and painful death. If she wins, then she needs no justification. This, in the end, is why the Praesi can never build anything that lasts. Whatever Black accomplished- whatever he told himself- the Praesi are trapped in the Story. Not just by the Gods, but by their own culture, their worship of strength above all else.

Heiress is wrecking everything Black built, shattering Callow's peace and endangering Malicia's grip on the Wasteland, and yet all will be forgiven if she wins. The Praesi love their power games so much that they'll accept an Empress who wrecked their Empire just as long as she succeeds in taking the Tower. Just as it is in Callow's nature to be grasped, it is in Praes's nature to grasp...and when Callow is in their hands, the only worthy target is their own rulers. They can't stop fighting for power, even when they could lose everything they've built.

For all of Black's cunning, his endless plots and schemes, his attempts to pit his brilliance and leadership against the culture of his own people, he was building on sand. And when a man builds on sand, his house may stand strong for a few years, or a decade, or even his own life. But in the end "the rain descended, and the floods came, and the winds blew, and beat upon that house; and it fell: and great was the fall of it." (Matthew 7:27)

It's more like, Trump just won the Presidency. I didn't vote for him, and our country is now doing worse as a result... but maybe if I go cosy up to him then he'll name me to some lucrative Cabinet position. The Praesi are pragmatic and entirely willing to make the best of a bad situation. And, maybe, after I'm named to a Cabinet position, I'll get some good press for how I handle things and I can make a run for the Presidency in 3 years...

Dylan Tullios

Alex Straughan:

"It had been most amusing to see everything Squire had built over the last year collapse the moment she was gone, Diabolist had to admit. Upon hearing word of Squire's disappearance into Arcadia the Praesi among the Ruling Council had swiftly struck a deal with the Guild of Assassins and seized power in Laure before declaring martial law across Callow – a move greeted with widespread rioting in the cities.

Best of all, when the usurpers had first accessed the treasury they'd found absolutely nothing: the Guild of Thieves had already emptied it in full, and to add insult to injury taken a tithe of a tenth from every Imperial Governor's own funds. Callow had descended into utter anarchy and in the chaos Akua's own hands were freer than ever before."

Next time Catherine promises them that things will be different, Callowans will know what her promises are worth. The Praesi robbed the treasury, seized power, and right now their legionaries are putting down riots by cracking heads. The idea of a united Dread Empire, where Praesi and Callowans would be equals, is officially dead. In some ways, it's worse than it was before Catherine took over, because she promised Callowans that their new Ruling Council would protect them from Praesi exploitation. Now that the Ruling Council has completely failed in its duty, they won't be eager to trust them the second time around.

Black's greatest success seems to be the conversion of the orcs to Team Practical Evil. The goblins have dubious and unclear loyalties, and I'm not sure about how Praesi commoners feel. We haven't seen that much from their perspective. Also, I don't think the Legions are representative; as members of Black's personal fiefdom, they're much more likely to be loyal to their patron than random peasant farmers whose main concern is probably "plant the seeds, pray to the Dark Gods for rain". As several posters pointed out earlier, pre-literate societies tend to encourage a high level of disinterest in politics.

Callow, though, has most definitely not "forever changed" the way they view the Empire. Right after Catherine promised that things would be different, the Praesi backstabbed them, confirming every historical Callowan belief about Praesi treachery. There are a whole lot of rioters in the streets right now, and they're not celebrating how happy they are to be part of the Empire, or talking about how much has changed. They're fighting against a Praesi occupation that proved for all time how dishonest and vicious the Dread Empire is. Good luck convincing them that they want to be good subjects of the Dread Empire now.

BartHumphries:

I agree about Praesi pragmatism, but it's important to remember that the support of the Praesi nobility is vital to maintaining or overthrowing the existing Tyrant. Malicia hasn't "won the Presidency", but she has backers who want her to win. They want seats in her Cabinet, or restored power to the nobility, and they're willing to undermine the stability and power of the Dread Empire for their personal benefit or the status of their class.

The main concern of the members of the Praesi ruling class is their own wealth, prestige, and power. Many of them are willing to see the Empire grow weaker, as long as they can grow stronger. Malicia has been a very "good" Dread Empress. Her partnership with Black led to the conquest of Callow, and her reign has seen the reform and improvement of the Legions of Terror. Praes is stronger under her rule than it has been for centuries, so it's not like a coup is necessary to restore the glory of the "old days". They've only conquered Callow twice, and one of those times was

If the nobility was willing to support her whole-heartedly, Heiress/Diabolist would not be in a position to threaten Malicia's rule. In this context, "winning the Presidency" has very little to do with popular support, and a great deal to do with having backers among the High Lords and Ladies. Heiress's supporters aren't removing a weak Empress from power; they're disrupting a strong Empress at a time when Praes faces a very real threat from a resurgent Procer. They're ultimately less concerned about the Dread Empire's success than they are with their own possibility of gaining a "Cabinet seat", or even a chance at the Tower itself.

These people aren't just accepting a bad situation and doing the best they can personally. They're creating a bad situation for Praes in the hopes that they can advance personally, even if it means endangering their grip on Callow or even opening the Dread Empire to outside invasion. Like the Proceran princes who happily plunged the Princedom into civil war, the ruling class of Praes ultimately views their game of thrones as more important than their nation's success.

Dylan Tullos

Edit to my earlier comment:

The Praesi didn't rob the treasury, the Guild of Thieves did. However, they did still take over the Ruling Council, declare martial law, and show all of Callow that the whole "voice in your own affairs" thing was just another Praesi lie.

M

Eh, I do not think it is so dire. Sure you can spin it as Callow being betrayed by Praes once again, but you can also spin it as those particular Praesi betraying Catherine directly, giving Cat an option to get her rulership back with full support from Callow and not separating from Praes.

Barthumphries

The important people will realize that, but the common people might not. And there's a lot of them. And quantity alone contributes at least something to quality.

M, BartHumphries:

The "Reply" button isn't working right. It won't let me put my post directly under yours.

M:

Callow is under martial law, the people are rioting in the streets, the Praesi on the Council have usurped power from the Callowan members, and the treasury is empty. Oh, and the Summer Fae are invading. Sounds pretty dire to me.

The whole justification for the Ruling Council was that Callow would finally have a voice in its own government, and that Callowans and Praesi could live side by side as peaceful subjects of the Dread Empire. As soon as Catherine disappeared, the Praesi members seized control of the Council and declared martial law.

Callowans aren't interested in making nice distinctions between "good Praesi" and "bad Praesi". What they see is that the Praesi are treacherous snakes who can never be trusted not to seize power at the first opportunity. The only thing worse than refusing to make any concessions is making concessions and then betraying them, and that's exactly what the Praesi did.

Catherine made promises that she couldn't keep. She created a ruling Council, and it fell apart. She promised an end to martial law and direct Praesi rule, and now the country is back in the hands of the same Praesi nobles she promised to liberate it from. Clearly, she's powerless to effect real change, and even the Callowans who support Catherine can feel justified in rising up against the Praesi liars who betrayed Callow's brief hope of change.

BartHumphries:

The common people are fundamentally right. Praes did betray Callow, and Catherine and her allies within the Dread Empire weren't able to stop them. Whether their failure was caused by malice or simple weakness is irrelevant; they didn't uphold their part of the contract, and now the Praesi nobles are in charge again.

The thing about social contracts is that they're both very powerful and very hard to repair. The previous social contract was "Do as you're told or we'll crucify you". Obviously, this wasn't a popular contract, but it was simple and honest enough; the Praesi were evil monsters, and they acted like it. When Catherine came around, though, they started saying that they cared about Callow, that they wanted to give Callowans a chance to rise within the Dread Empire and have a real say in how their country was governed.

Malicia and Black revised the old contract, where the people of Callow were a conquered province under military occupation, and they tried to replace it with a new contract, where the people of Callow were a loyal province of the Empire with local autonomy and government in the hands of their own people. That new contract failed when the Praesi members of the Council seized control and declared martial law.

In this case, failing is much worse than not trying at all. As long as the Praesi were just foreign tyrants, it was possible for them to turn over a new leaf and try to persuade Callow that change was possible. Once they announced a change, then went back on it, it became much harder to sell the same story to Callow a second time. It's like a criminal promising to change his ways; the first time, people might believe him, but they're a lot less likely to buy his repentance if he goes back to crime as soon as he's out of jail.

In regards to perception of Praesi as liars the solution is quite obvious: kill the current Praesi stirring trouble and work with new, properly intimidated ones. Between Truebloods falling apart, Akua pulling together the rest of the forces they loaned her (for what, by the way? Political favors?) and the loyalists being the ones who enforced the martial law, a clearing of the house might be arranged.

In Praes, the Empress is preparing to finally crush High Lady Tasia, who is already in the desperately-summoning-demons stage. In Callow, meanwhile, Cat is in her right to remove the Loyalists in the ruling Council, and if asked, tell the Empress "I tried to include your supporters, they attempted a coup the second I turned away". The only Praesi with political influence in Callow will be the Diabolist, and the first stage of the plan always works, so let's hope that whatever ziggurat she's building will misfire noticeably, but not too devastatingly, so she can be made a scapegoat.

--:

One of the underlying problems with the Praesi mindset is the belief that structural problems can be solved by killing people. It's like curing a plague by treating each individual victim, while ignoring the underlying causes and the method by which the plague spreads.

Praesi culture is the plague. Malicia and Catherine can kill one or ten or a hundred nobles, but their successors will have the same culture and belief system. It's not like no Tyrant has ever purged the nobility before, yet every time the people who take over adopt the mindset of their predecessors. No matter how many times they're intimidated into behaving themselves, they'll always be on the lookout for a time when they can backstab their way to power.

As you point out, the Praesi nobles on the Ruling Council were "Loyalists", which means that they were willing to do as they were told as long as Malicia and Catherine seemed strong. The moment they showed weakness, the nobles pounced. Their behavior shows us that there are no true noble "Loyalists", just opportunists waiting for the right moment.

This is the start of the "Uncivil Wars" period. Based on that title, we have good reason to suspect that Malicia isn't just going to put down High Lady Tasia, that Catherine isn't going to smash Diabolist, and that things are going to get a whole lot worse. But even if they didn't get worse now, even if Malicia and Catherine were able to restore order, it wouldn't matter. Praesi backstabbing and nastiness are based upon centuries of ingrained tradition, while their current practicality and reasonable behavior are based on Malicia and Black making them behave.

Malicia will die. Black will die. Catherine will die. No one can rule the Dread Empire forever. A long time ago, Bard told the Lone Swordsman that Praes's current practicality was a short-lived thing, a brief instant in a long history of impractical cruelty, greed, and arrogance. While Malicia and Black focused on institutions, the underlying culture remained the same, unaffected by their reforms.

Maybe Black is right to think that he can fight the Story, that he can defeat the Narrative, but he can't fight against the hearts and minds of his own people. In a society where common soldiers sing "The Girl Who Climbed the Tower", where every man and woman can dream of ascending through murder and treachery, there can be no lasting peace. There is no Imperial dynasty, no rule of law, only an long line of Tyrants who murdered their way to the throne before being murdered themselves. Even if they had no other reason to rebel, Callow would be better off leaving just so they wouldn't get caught in the middle of Praes's endless civil wars.

Callow knows this. Malicia may be willing to make promises, but her successor won't keep them. Her governmental reforms will die with her, and Callow will be back under the boot of a Tyrant who will view them as a conquered province to be looted, a subjugated people to be terrorized into compliance. If they revolt soon, when Praes is in the middle of the Uncivil Wars, they'll have a chance to win and keep their independence. If they wait too long, they could spend generations living under Malicia's successors, who are very unlikely to be as practical as their current Dread Empress.

draxsiss

its interesting, I could see the Dead King declaring war on Akum, Just becuase he is activly engaging in a war with demons he might see her as a "problem to nip" (although my personal side theory is he had a similar offer to Cat to be the unknown savoir as a bonus name or something when he decided to just solely go after demons) Things are shaping up great I look forward to the next chapter.

nineran

I think I've missed something.

Cat's aspects were: Learn (she mentioned she didn't learn languages as quickly anymore), Struggle, and something that she never knew that got cut away but the spot for that Aspect returned when she did the Angel quest.

Was that a complete refresh? Originally I thought Take was this new third aspect, but it appears that it is instead replacing Learn. What happened to Struggle?

Cat's aspects NOW are: Take (currently using Rise), Break (? it's formatted like an aspect, and there were 'consequences' to breaking the Penitent's Sword, and the Duke's globe), and Winter's-Duchess-of-Moonless-Night.

BUT she tells the prince of nightfall: "I'm just a wet-behind the ears Named with a single aspect." Cat lies, but Cat doesn't usually lie without the narrative around the speech indicating a lie... so what am I missing?

No, her Name was completely reset upon being returned from Chider. She lost Learn and Struggle (Seek was cut away back when the demon got to it), but since she was just as immerced into her Role as before, she restored two aspects in a matter of days.

Take is a replacement for Struggle, only instead of coming from an established tendency to get into uphill fights it stems from an established tendency to win uphill fights, and instead of activating once per day it can be used three times.

She lies about Break because it's her secret weapon, and pulling a trump card so early in a story would mean it will not have as big an impact later.

Author Unknown

Great chapter.

How much time has passed in Creation while Cat has been away? It's going to be really interesting to see people scramble to prove their loyalty when Cat comes back and they find out she is even more bad ass than before.

Dylan Tullos

By definition, "loyalty" is something you have when there isn't a sword to your throat. The main lesson Catherine is probably going to take away from this is that you can trust a Praesi noble just as long as the sword is at their throat, and not a moment longer.

Typo / continuity note I noticed on a reread – Akua has an offhand thought about Fasili possibly taking out his anger on an officer, probably a Drow. The description given doesn't seem to fit with how we later learn Drow to be like.

I noticed that as well! I figure this must've been before the Everdark got fleshed out. Seems the original concept for the Drow was probably closer to what they are in traditional d&d fantasy. I'm glad EE went with what they did though.

Villainous Interlude: Stormfront

"The covenant of the hungry lasts as long as the meal."

– Taghreb saying

Anaxares was having a tea party with monsters.

A civil one, he had to admit. The ridiculously large and opulent table – it was Ashuran pearwood, he was fairly sure, which meant it was worth a small castle – had been set on a platform in the morning, long before the Black Knight had actually arrived. There were jewels set into the surface of it that glinted the same no matter what light fell on them that he believed would be able to shoot out beams of energy if the Tyrant spoke the right incantation. At least the whole thing wasn't floating. The boy had suggested all of this should be happening with the platform a hundred feet up in the air, but Anaxares had flatly informed him he wasn't setting foot on anything that wasn't touching solid ground. After the usual round of inventive death threats, the Tyrant had conceded the point and instead had gargoyles place over all four corners. At least one of them was badly failing to pretend it was still inanimate. Anaxares had thrown a biscuit at it earlier, just to see what it would do.

Glare at his back when it thought he wasn't looking, apparently. Foolish creature, all Bellerophans knew you should always assume someone was looking at you. The Kanenas See All, For Their Eyes Are The Eyes Of The Law And The Law Is Omniscient, he added dutifully. Kairos had put on a version of the Helikean infantry armour that was made of pure gold, with pauldrons he suspected were actual real skulls. All three people at the table were politely pretending they could not hear the hissing angry ghosts bound inside said skulls. The Tyrant had tried to dress him up in silks but Anaxares had ignored the servants and instead continued to wear his old diplomat's robes, which he made a point of washing himself. They were beginning to look rather frayed, but accepting clothes from the boy would count as Taking A Bribe From A Foreign Despot. Him aside, the two villains sitting across each other were a study in contrasts. Studying Named as openly as he was always a dangerous business, but Anaxares was already a dead man. What was left to fear?

He'd expected the Black Knight to be some tall muscled Soninke, but the villain was short – shorter than the Tyrant, if not by much – and pale like a Callowan. He'd not believed that particular rumour to be true. Weren't the farmers on the side of Good? It was hard to tell what his build was under the plain plate he wore, but it was obvious that though he was no slab of muscle he was an athletic man. In opposition Kairos Theodosian was so thin he looked almost sickly. Like most people of the Free Cities the Tyrant was tan and dark of hair, that last part one of the few things the villains had in common. It was the eyes, though, that set them apart the most. The murderous red eye of the Tyrant looked upon everything with warm poison while the pale green gaze of the Black Knight was cold, unmoving detachment. They were two different takes on an old breed, these villains, and though their faces were pleasant and smiling Anaxares could smell the violence wafting in the air like summer heat. The Praesi set down his cup on the saucer, Nicean porcelain clinking softly.

"That was the purest arsenic I've ever drunk," the Knight said. "My compliments to your alchemists."

There was a reason Anaxares had left his own cup untouched. Unlike these two he couldn't be expected to walk off a mouthful of poison.

"That's very kind of you," the Tyrant beamed. "We tortured the secrets of substance refinement out of a Taghreb exile a few decades back, so really it's all thanks to the Empire."

The two of them were still smiling. Anaxares would have shivered, if terror had any point to it.

"I see you've set your table with fire rubies," the Black Knight noted. "A nice touch. I might lose an eye if you triggered those without warning."

"Burn," the Tyrant suddenly barked, leaning forward.

A heartbeat of silence passed and nothing happened.

"You could have flinched, at least," the boy pouted.

The Black Knight smiled serenely, drinking another sip of poison.

"Shame the rest of the Calamities couldn't come," Kairos said, whimsically changing the subject.

"It would have been most impolite of me to enter your camp without some precautions," the green-eyed man said.

"Are you implying I would murder an ally in broad daylight for no good reason?" the Tyrant said, aghast.

"You would," Anaxares said.

"I could state it outright, if you'd prefer," the Black Knight kindly offered.

The crippled boy tried to drum his fingers on the table casually, but his hand was shaking so badly it looked more like he was thumping it. The ghosts bound to his armour screamed angrily, the sound strangely muted. The diplomat was beginning to find it soothing, to be honest. He felt too weary to scream in horror himself but having someone else express the sentiment was gratifying.

"Don't," Kairos finally decided. "My most trusted advisor took the fun out of it."

Green eyes turned to study said advisor almost curiously, to the man's dismay.

"You are Bellerophon, correct?" the Knight asked.

"You already know the answer to that," Anaxares replied, picking up a biscuit.

He'd been assured those weren't poisoned, so he broke off a piece and scarfed it down.

"It's been a subject of debate as to why you are still alive," the pale-skinned man said, not denying it.

His eyes flicked at the Tyrant, who shrugged.

"Haven't done a thing," Kairos said.

It was actually hard to tell when the Tyrant was lying, in Anaxares' opinion. He did so frequently and about matters both mundane and important without rhyme or reason, which meant establishing a baseline for truth and lies was difficult.

"Thinking too much about why is the curse of unenlightened peoples," the diplomat asserted. "Peerless Bellerophon Is Always Correct For The People Cannot Be Wrong, May They Reign Forever."

"I love it when he does that," the Tyrant said. "It's like they're whispering sweet propaganda straight into my ear."

"Bellerophon does have a surprisingly effective indoctrination apparatus," the Knight agreed.

Spoken like an Enemy Of The People, Anaxares thought with a frown.

"So why are you haunting my doorstep, Black Knight?" Kairos suddenly said.

There'd been no transition from pleasantries to business, no hint or warning. The Bellerophon had seen him do this many a time now, with almost everyone he spoke to. He was not sure whether the quicksilver change was meant to unsettle whoever he dealt with and gain him an advantage or if the Tyrant was genuinely that unstable. It might, he suspected, be both.

"We meant to speak with you in Delos, but events conspired against it," the other villain replied.

As a career diplomat, Anaxares could admire how well-crafted that sentence had been. The use of the word conspiracy would imply fault, while on surface absolving responsibility – a counterpart already on the defensive would feel bound to offer explanation. A shame that tactics like those were worthless against the Tyrant. The boy, after all, was mad.

"Your play there spoiled my amusement," Kairos complained. "I was a sennight away from making a dragon from the bones of their fallen. I was going to crash it into the citadel and demand their surrender."

"You would have been repulsed," the Knight said, and it was spoken like a fact.

Considering every assault by Helike on Delos had met that exact fate, Anaxares believed him to be entirely correct.

"That's the problem with Praesi, these days," the Tyrant replied with an unpleasant smile. "You worry too much about things like victory and defeat."

"No worry would have been necessary on your part," the pale man said. "Victory would have been yours if your host had assaulted the walls instead of retreating."

"And how boring that would have been," Kairos said. "I take no hand outs from the Tower, Carrion Lord."

"We have enemies in common," the Knight calmly pointed out. "Dismissing the possibility of common striving against them is counterproductive."

Kairos cackled.

"You don't have a pattern of three against the White Knight, do you?" he said.

The Praesi's face was blank, a wax mask without expression. Then, slowly, his brow creased.

"Neither do you," he said.

"Someone's hourglass is running out," the Tyrant grinned, sing-songing the words as his red eye pulsed. "Regretting taking that apprentice, are we?"

"My decision has never been more justified," the man disagreed serenely.

"Spineless," Kairos stated with thick contempt. "You lack rage, Black Knight. If you were any more resigned to your fate you'd be licking the boots of the Heavens."

The Knight did not seem particularly offended by the insults. He did not seem, Anaxares, as the kind of man who could easily be offended. It would have been most unpleasant to negotiate with him.

"There is a difference between acknowledging the possibility of failure and embracing the outcome," the Praesi said.

"That you even accept the chance of defeat is disgusting, if you'll forgive my language, much less that you plan for it," the Tyrant hissed. "You are a villain. We do not go gently into the night."

"There are graveyards full of men who thought the same," the Knight replied. "They died having accomplished nothing."

"You're scribbling on sand and calling it a legacy," Kairos mocked. "Nothing that happens before or after you matters – only the decisions you make now. And those I see you make? I find lacking."

"Means are irrelevant," the Black Knight coldly said. "Results dictate all else."

"I despise you and everything you stand for from the bottom of my heart," the Tyrant enthused. "Shall we work together?"

Anaxares quietly choked on the biscuit he'd been nibbling at, entirely ignored by the other two.

"That would be best," the green-eyed man acknowledged. "The Empire is not interested in direct intervention. Resolution by local actors is preferable in Her Dread Majesty's eyes."

"What you actually want is for Procer to lose their pretext to go a'crusading," Kairos laughed. "So what's the plan, my dearest friend? Peace with Nicae?"

"Cessations of hostilities between League constituents would allow you to turn your attention elsewhere," the Black Knight replied. "There are no real gains left for you to make."

"And just by coincidence, that 'elsewhere' happens to be eyeing your borders," the Tyrant mused.

"Aligned interests are not the same as subordination," the other villain said.

"Not all that far, though," Kairos said. "Regardless, Nicae's not interested in peace right now. They're growing too fat on Proceran silver and soldiers."

"Stripping them of that fat would make them reconsider their position," the Knight said.

"One last battle, eh?" the Tyrant laughed. "That could be interesting. But they've so many heroes, my dear friend. I'm terrified of what those could do to me. I'm only one boy, after all."

Kairos had not even attempted a token effort to make that lie sound plausible, the diplomat noted.

"We intend to engage the White Knight and his companions again," the pale man said.

"I feel safer already," the Tyrant grinned toothily. "It's so nice, having friends."

The Black Knight nodded, unmoved.

"Scribe will be in contact with you shortly," he said, rising to his feet.

The boy waved away the notion, unconcerned. He waited until the Praesi was at the edge of the platform.

"Black?" he called out.

The man glanced back.

"I'm going to betray you, you know," the Tyrant promised.

The thing that looked back at the boy then was not a person Named or not. Humanity had slid off that face like water off a clay mask, leaving behind absolutely nothing – the thing behind those eyes was coldly taking their measure, calculating the span of their usefulness and the death that would follow it. Carrion Lord, they called him, and the diplomat finally understood why. Why this... thing could cow the third of a continent.

"You will try," the Black Knight replied. "They always do."

The diplomat had expected them to leave after the other villain exited the camp, but they remained at the table. Kairos was still drinking his tea, exaggeratedly holding up his little finger so it never touched the cup.

"What are we waiting for?" Anaxares finally asked.

It was the crown of noon, and staying in the sun this long always gave him a headache.

"The counteroffer," the Tyrant said.

The sound of the teapot's lid being raised drew his attention a moment later. There was a woman leaning over it, from the Free Cities by the looks of her. Long and curly dark hair, curvy under her leathers that he could smell reeked of spirits even from where he was seated. The stranger had a silvery flask in hand and was pouring what looked like Proceran brandy inside the teapot – she didn't stop until it started spilling over, only then pouring herself a cup of 'tea'. Nine tenths of that had to be liquor, he thought. And it was probably still lethal to drink, not that it stopped her from gulping down her her cup and messily wiping her lips with her sleeve.

"I don't know where you get your arsenic, Kairos, but it's the good stuff," she said. "You can really taste the almonds."

"Anaxares, this is Aoede the Wandering Bard," the Tyrant smiled fondly. "She's here to manipulate me like she did near Delos."

"You're a heroine," the diplomat said, face creasing in surprise.

"I'm starving is what I am," the Bard complained. "Hand me a biscuit, would you?"

Anaxares did, too baffled to object.

"Did you have fun with the Big Guy?" Aoede asked with her mouth full.

"You were right," Kairos said. "I want to kill him so very much."

"Yeah, he doesn't really play your kind of game," the Bard said. "Who's this charming fellow, by the way?"

She was pointing the remnant of his biscuit at him like a wand, hand wavering as she poured herself another cup of of tea-flavoured liquor.

"This is Anaxares, my most trusted advisor," Kairos grinned. "I abducted him. He's not very happy about it."

The dark-haired woman squinted at him, slurping her cup loudly. For a moment Anaxares could have sworn she was entirely sober and studying him with a piercing gaze, but then she choked on the liquor and the moment was gone. She thumped her own chest until she stopped coughing, spilling biscuit crumbs everywhere.

"You're a class act, Tyrant," she said admiringly, still breathless. "Haven't seen anything that brazen since Traitorous."

"Flatterer," Kairos replied. "Now, speak treachery to me Aoede. Treachery most foul."

"Right," the Bard said, putting her cup down and leaning against the table. "So obviously I'm trying to trick you to your death here."

"As is only right and proper," the Tyrant agreed.

"So here's something for you to consider," she continued. "You should off a Calamity."

"Or not," Anaxares suggested mildly. "We could, in fact, not do this."

"Tell me more," Kairos ordered.

"So your grand plan, it's not really a plan," the Bard said. "It's a juggler's philosophy."

"I've no idea what you could possibly mean," the Tyrant smiled.

"First step always works, so always have a first step going," Aoede said. "Now, a lesser soul would say all that will accomplish is destroy more and more of Creation until it all collapses on your head because you missed a beat."

"The part that matters is the dance," Kairos smiled. "Not the bow at the end."

"And I applaud that, I really do. Here's the thing, though," the Bard said. "You're running out of enemies, Kairos Theodosian."

"I can make more," the Tyrant pointed out.

"Lesser ones," Aoede shrugged. "Not a lot of heroes running around at the moment and you've already slapped around most of the League. You need to expand your roster, my friend."

She added an exaggerated wink after calling him that, to the Tyrant's visible delight.

"So I backstab Praes, if you'll forgive my language," he mused. "Alas, killing a Calamity also helps the horse you have in this race."

"You don't need to wield the knife yourself," the Bard said. "Use my heroes against them, just blatantly enough the Big Guy knows what you did."

"It is lesser treachery that you peddle, then," Kairos replied, tone disappointed.

"That's where you're wrong," the dark-haired woman slurred. "Point isn't to make the Calamity die, it's to make an enemy of Black. He loves them like family, you know. You need to hurt him at least that deep if you want him not to let go of the grudge. Anything less and the moment he's back in Praes you drop off the stage."

"This plan involves making an enemy of one of the most dangerous men on this continent for no tangible gain," Anaxares said. "It is not a good plan."

"Don't be foolish, advisor," Kairos said. "Making an enemy of one of the most dangerous men on this continent is the point of the plan, not a side-effect."

"And to think you said I was bringing lesser treachery to the table," the Bard said shaking her head. "I'm wounded, Kairos."

"I'm deeply sorry," the Tyrant said. "As an apology, let me offer you this: nocere."

The jewels on the table immediately lit up and shot half a dozen beams of scorching red light at the Wandering Bard, who disappeared into thin air before a single one of them made contact. There was a long moment of silence.

"She's playing you," Anaxares pointed out, aware it was blindingly obvious but believing the boy could use a reminder.

"Oh yes," the Tyrant smiled, and his eye pulsed red. "Just imagine the kind of enemy she'll make, when I betray her too."

We're on the new update schedule, which means updates both Monday and Wednesday now. First update of the month, so extra chapter night. This one is titled "Raid" and is from the POV of Robber, set while Catherine is still in Arcadia. It's in the Extra Chapters tab, but link as usual: <https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2017/07/03/raid/>

Naeddyr

Hurray!

Great two chapters so far.

dusting

Oho, so you guys actually do more than once a week.

I do apologize for this rudeness but i have never bothered to look further into you than reading this story, so i have no knowledge of how to address you and your team.

I do hope you can forgive this slight.

Now to the all important part.

How much money do i have to throw at you to make it three times a week?

If at all possible, which i sincerely hope.
Mfg Dusting.

erraticerrata

There's a Patreon goal for three updates a week. I'd mean I could write full time, too, which I'd quite enjoy.

Letouriste

Yay!!! Can't wait the day you can make this kind of writing full time;) Sadly I can't help for now, I badly lack money:(

Fulmi

They're all as mad as a hatter and i love them all

Bubba HoTep

I really hope Anaxares survives. Doublethink spouting Homo Soveticus are my kind of people

Petya

The Free Soviet People Are Deeply Offended By Your Blatant Lies, Poor Fool, Sick With The Plague Of Capitalism.

MrPicklesAndTea

I'm trying to remind myself that the topic here is doublethink because I'm having an apprentice moment where I want to tell you that you just called this guy poor, but sick with capitalism.

Paxton Johnson

i mean, capitalism is the cause of poverty and income inequality

o v c d e r ^

2 updates per week? Wow i never knew i needed this so much in my life :^)

1shot4living

I second that, best surprise I've had all year.

Anna

I'm screaming with delight!

Renasma

I might cry happy tears. You're my favourite thing im reading right now and more updates will be awesome

vietnamabc

Come on Akua, make a proposal stat, he is rightly your type of man.

Also not cool Bard, collaborating with Evil like that wouldn't endear yourself to other Heroes. From "Raid" I expect Thief wouldn't mind giving Bard a smackdown.

Yeah, in Lone Swordsman's band she was far more subtle. Then again, she was the one who told William that putting Ophon in the charge of defense was a good idea, and baited Exiled Prince into Squire's crossbow range (admittedly to avoid him being corrupted along with the rest of Silver Spears).

The quietist

Shit I hadn't even clocked those particular manipulations...

Letouriste

I think she tried to give him a chance to win. Cat was not strong at that time so he could succeed if he was less careless

stevenneiman

Hadn't realized that avoiding him getting corrupted might have been the reason why she had the Prince killed. That makes a lot more sense now.

JackbeThimble

I don't buy that that's the reason why she wanted the Prince dead (or even necessarily that she did). The bard is pretty consistent about always backing the classic evil against the practical evil. Everything we've seen of her indicates that she would have considered the collateral damage from a corrupted Exiled Prince acceptable if it made a bigger headache for Squire, Black and the Empress. Especially since the most likely result of that would be heiress enslaving all of the Silver Spears and the Exiled Prince.

Cpt. Obvious

The Wandering Bard loves her stories, and the Practical Evil gang threatens those stories. With Villains starting to adlib it gets harder to know what people will be doing next.

Jonnnnz

So, the smart villains are building stories for themselves to reflect successes of legends, the Tyrant as Traitorous who eventually killed himself as the ultimate betrayal, and Heiress as the Dead King who conquered a hell. Do they really not see how this will end? The Tyrant dead, Heiress in hell for eternity, both by their own hand? Villains of legend lost even as they won (excluding perhaps Triumphant, who may have won even as she lost)?

Dylan Tullos

The Tyrant wants to burn bright. If he dies early, he's already lived longer than he expected to. For him, "winning" is a journey, not a destination, and he'd rather cackle and hatch mad plots for two years than do steady, boring work for twenty. Kairos is the anti-Black; he sees how things are going to end, and he welcomes it.

Heiress would probably be quite happy ruling a Hell for eternity like the Dead King. I see him as one of the great winners, a villain so successful that he established himself as an immortal ruler of the underworld. I wouldn't call him a "loser".

Triumphant seems to have something of the Tyrant's mindset. She conquered an entire continent, but she made so many enemies and inspired so much fear that half of the world united to bring her down. She "won" in the sense that she became a legend, but her strategy is closer to Kairos than Black. Though she seems to have been practical and highly successful as a conqueror, her methods of rule ensured endless rebellion, and she made Praes so terrifying that traditionally neutral powers intervened to help Calernia defeat the Dread Empire.

JackbeThimble

And Black modeling himself on Terribilis II

---

Seriously, since when is Bard so bold? I thought that stuff like the same personality being behind all her faces ("Haven't seen anything that brazen since Traitorous.") or her advice never doing anyone good ("So obviously I'm trying to trick you to your death here") was more obscure Name lore. How broadly is stuff like the pattern of three and first step of the plan really known?

maresther23

Bard OP pls nerf

RandomFan

She's so bold when it works out, of course. The Bard knows the script, and she knows the ones that end in her favor. There's only so much deck-stacking she can manage, but there's a lot she can pull off.

Trying to use cunning ends poorly on the Tyrant, trying to use blatant truths that happen to play her as close to a villain as she can is incredibly effective.

Pattern of three is standard name lore for people who actually have mentors, experience, or been looking into it- Black's trying and/or tried to have Squire manage achievements in ignorance, otherwise even she would have known it, I suspect. Same with first step of the plan, though that might not actually be **true**.

Her advice never doing anyone good (citation, please? there are a few times she seems to give good advice?) and the same personality being behind all her faces is probably obscure named lore, but revealing all the ways that this Bard is not good is a great tactic to bring to dealing with him. He is on the Side of Evil, not victory. He doesn't mind losing. He doesn't mind it at all. If the heroes have to play dirty to take him out, that's a greater victory than a true triumph.

stevenneiman

One small correction: Even Cat knew about the Pattern of Three. The thing she was never told about was how fast she was supposed to grow, which she is still reaping the benefits of being ignorant of.

RandomFan

Cat didn't learn about it until accidentally getting herself into at least one, though. If Black had been less of a sink-or-swim mentor, she'd have found out sooner.

JackbeThimble

Examples of Bard giving bad advice:

1. Telling the Exiled Prince to challenge Cat to single combat leads directly to him getting killed and the Silver Spears getting routed at Three Hills
2. Telling William to put the unsullied commander in charge of the defense in Liesse leads to the defense collapsing when he's killed by Heiress' ritual
3. Telling William to summon the angel almost leads to Heiress capturing it and actually leads to Cat surviving her pattern of three.

If there are counter-examples please mention them, I can't think of any.

stevenneiman

Kairos' character is based on the idea that he already knows everything he would need to know to come to sensible conclusions and make workable plans, then he doesn't because he's crazy and he wants to make a mess of things more than win. I would assume that he would already know about what the Bard is, and would be more prone to going along with the Bard's suggestions (at least partway) because he was entertained by her honesty in manipulating him.

And the Patters of Three have their power BECAUSE everyone knows about them.

Gunslinger

Wohoo, two chapters a week!! Loved both of them, but I loved how brazenly crazy the Tyrant is. He's essentially a walking fuck you to all of creation.

mavant

For years I've claimed I would not wirehead given the chance, but here I am wishing I could have this on an IV drip forever.

Captain Amazing

This is, genuinely, one of the most impressive chapters I have ever read. The Bard showing up without immediately saying it was her, Anaxares' simply amazing one-liners, the little details that set the scene: I had to stop multiple times because I broke out in hysterics. Well done.

darkening

With all the build up about anaraxes still being alive, I'm expecting something amazing

knockoffnikolai

A message from the future: YOU WILL NOT BE DISAPPOINTED

Letouriste

That tyrant...you can't hate him^^

He is way too playful for that.he has something really grand about him.

Even if he betray you,you can't even be angry at him...how unfair is this?

stevenneiman

I feel like he's supposed to be somewhere between Dread Emperor Traitorous and Dread Empress Triumphant, may she never return.

stevenneiman

"the Tyrant had conceded the point and instead had gargoyles [place->placed] over all four corners."

"not that it stopped her from gulping down [her] her cup"

Aotrs Commander

My frack. I think the Tyrant must be reaing the Evil Overlord's Handbook to *specfically do the opposite.*

I can only tip my hat to his gumption. I mean, he's going to die horribly and rightly so, but it should be fun to watch.

(Maybe not so much if he actually kills a Calamity, though; I like tose guys and girls....)

burguulkodar

I like the kid, but he's a bit off even my range of evilness here. I don't know, betraying everyone that's around you doesn't seem practical

mr_squiggle

I think you're mixing up arsenic (some compounds smell of garlic) and cyanide (can smell of bitter almonds).

jflb96

Apparently you have to have the right genes to get the cyanide/almonds link. It's something like 20-25% of the population, I think, that or it's 75-80%.

Either way, I can confirm that powdered cyanide didn't smell all that much of marzipan when I was working with it, though that might've just been everything else in the mix.

jflb96

I'm glad that someone said this, so that I don't have to.

Apparently it's a genetic thing to have cyanide smell like almonds, though I can't remember whether it's 20-25% with or without the right genes. Either way, I think I'm in the without group, as I don't remember any particular scent of marzipan.

zafyrusowo

I'm starting to really love the Tyrant, he's such a intentionally irrational character, and Anaraxes' replies are always amusing as well

Fewl

Those Who Succumb To The Temptations Of Capitalism Shall Only Ever Be The Most Impoverished Of Us All, Until They See The Truth Of The Will Of The People.

vuthuha912

Very cute the meeting between Tyrant and Black. Two shorties discussing murder and ideology.  $\geq v \leq$

Onos

So I dunno if anyone has pointed this out already EE, but arsenic ain't almondy (that's cyanide) but can occasionally be slightly garlicky.

Chapter 16: Shambles

"See, this is exactly the kind of trouble I'd be avoiding by mind controlling the entire world. You fools are making my point for me, can't you see?"

– Dread Emperor Imperious, shortly before being torn apart by an Ater mob

"That's not the good news face," I said.

There were only three of us in the war room: Juniper, Ratface and myself. We'd have a real staff meeting later today or tomorrow, but for now I'd kept the people to a minimum. When the whole family was at the table discussions tended to take longer, and for now what I wanted was a solid notion of what had happened in Callow while I was gone. And, to my unpleasant surprise, I'd been gone quite a bit longer than I'd thought: three months as of the morning I woke up. Considering Summer had already been probing the borders when I'd left and being well aware that Heiress was going to go full bastard the moment I disappeared, I was not expecting a basket of flowers. Yet the sheer dourness on the Hellhound's face gave me pause. I glanced at Ratface – he wasn't looking any happier. Well, at least it was unlikely to be worse than having my heart stolen by an angry Winter god. Weeping Heavens, let it not be worse than having my heart stolen by an angry Winter god. I firmly believed that was not too high of a bar to set for this conversation, but already I was getting the beginnings of a headache.

"Everything's fucked," Ratface flatly contributed.

"Fucked how," I prompted. "That's the important part."

"Military affairs first," Juniper said. "We are at war on at least two fronts, possibly up to five."

I missed the days when two mortal enemies had been the upper limit, not the starting point.

"Summer," I counted out. "Heiress?"

"Diabolist," Ratface corrected grimly.

"She transitioned?" I said. "Shit. I had my money on her aiming for Dread Empress off the bat."

"You weren't the only one," my Supply Tribune said. "Everybody's wondering what her game is, right now."

"A lot of people dying, if I had to venture I guess," I grunted. "All right, Juniper, lay it on me. Summer. What are we dealing with?"

"We don't have hard numbers," the Hellhound replied. "Trying to scry them lost two mages their eyesight."

The dream I'd had before waking up in Creation was still fresh in my mind – it didn't feel like a memory, something that would fade in time or become less vivid. A Name dream was the closest equivalent I could come up with, and even those didn't feel quite as... tangible, afterwards. Considering some of the things I'd seen Summer do in that sequence, I wasn't all that surprised scrying them was dangerous. It must have been like staring straight into the sun.

"But you have guesses," I said.

She nodded, and tapped her thick fingers against the map spread across the table to get my attention. There were two red stones set in southern Callow: one on Dormer, the other on Holden. Considering those two were the closest Callowan cities to the Waning Woods, why they were marked as Summer strongholds needed no explanation.

"We've received intelligence from General Sacker that was collected from refugees of both cities," Juniper gravelled. "One of them was former Royal Guard, so we can put more stock in her assessment of force numbers. At least five thousand both times, and we're fairly sure it wasn't the same army."

Ten thousand godsdamned fairies. No wonder she'd looked like someone had shot Aisha, earlier. Even the few hundred lesser fae we'd had to contain in Marchford had inflicted rough losses on the Fifteenth, and unlike those poor expendable bastards Summer would have titled fae leading their hosts.

"Have they moved since taking the cities?" I asked.

"No," my general said. "Not on any large scale, anyway. They're sending raiding parties but nearly all of them are headed towards our second problem."

The orc did not need to point at the black stone set over Liesse for me to know what she was talking about.

"She shouldn't have any forces to speak of," I said. "I had the Ruling Council strike down her right to anything but a city guard."

And her own personal retinue, a privilege granted to Praesi highborn that not even I could touch. Given her high birth the number allowed was not negligible – a thousand men – but still very far from an army.

"She doesn't care about the Council anymore," Ratface said. "No one does, Cat. But we'll talk about that mess later."

A trickle of the fury that went through me at those words must have shown on my face, because when the dark-eyed Taghreb looked at me he paled. I took a long breath, calming myself. It did not escape my notice that the temperature in the war room had significantly cooled. Joy, another power that'll start backfiring if I don't learn how it works, I thought. Just what I needed.

"She's hired mercenaries," Juniper said. "Levantines, Helikeans and allegedly some drow."

"The last bunch she hired was wiped out to the last man," I frowned. "By us, even."

"She scraped the bottom of the barrel in Mercantis," Ratface said. "But over half her people are from the Wasteland and those will be reliable. She's pretty much taken over the Truebloods."

"And her mother's done nothing about this?" I said, surprised.

"Her mother is fighting her own war in Wolof," the tanned man replied. "Against a nephew trying to overthrow her and the Legions trying to contain the angry beehive the city turned into."

"The Empress intervened," I said.

"With a light touch," Juniper grunted. "But she can't allow the kind of summons they're throwing at each other to spill out into the Wasteland. There's reports of a demon being used."

I didn't ask what kind – any kind was bad enough. That meant no reinforcements from Praes, which was as much a relief as it was a problem. We'd be on our own for this.

"Praesi," I said. "So, household troops and mages?"

"A lot of mages," Ratface said. "And with Liesse currently packed with refugees, I don't need to tell you how bad that could get."

"If she so much as sacrifices a single man she's rebelling," I coldly said.

"She's already rebelling, Foundling," Juniper said. "She's been summoning devils to pit against the fae – your Council made laws against that. And you don't assemble an illegal army of ten thousand if you intend to return to the fold afterwards."

"She's reached her end game, then," I muttered. "Fuck. It's always trouble to fight Praesi when they're cornered. Everybody knows that."

There was no longer any debate about whether or not Heiress – no, Diabolist, I needed to remember that – was ending up on the chopping block by the end of this. She'd given me an excuse to see her head on a pike and she knew I would not allow it to pass me by. Which meant that, by the end of her play she intended to be beyond any sanctions I could inflict. Was she trying to carve out her own kingdom in southern Callow? That would be building on sand, she was hated there.

"All right," I finally said, still digesting the news. "Those two are covered. Now what's the rest?"

Juniper glanced at Ratface, who shrugged then cleared his throat.

"Duchess Kegan has put the Duchy of Daoine on war footing," he said. "She's mobilizing both her army and the Watch, and she's refused to explain why."

"Oh come on," I barked. "I already conceded Council authority doesn't extend to Daoine. What the Hells more does she think she's going to get by rebelling?"

"We don't think she's rebelling, not since last week anyway," Juniper said. "She's imprisoned Praesi in the duchy but she hasn't killed them and she hasn't declared war on the Empire."

"Deoraithe don't declare war," I replied flatly. "You realize there's a one going on when you're neck deep in Watch."

"I said the same thing, but then Robber returned from the south," Ratface said.

"Special Tribune Robber," Juniper sternly corrected.

Considering how much grief she'd given me over promoting the goblin, I was more than a little amused she was now insisting on the proper address. It wasn't that she'd disagreed that Robber with a detached cohort would bleed Akua's forces in the south, the orc was well aware of what the vicious little bastard could do. But removing an 'insubordinate wretch' like him from the usual chain of command and the supervision it entailed had not sat well with her. She was Legion to the bone, though: now that he had the position she wouldn't let anyone dismiss the respect it was supposed to carry. Not even Robber himself, much as he tried.

"Yes, Special Tribune Robber," Ratface said, barely refraining from rolling his eyes.

He was going to be paying for that later, by the look on the Hellhound's face.

"He broke into Liesse with a tenth," the Supply Tribune continued. "And found out the Diabolist has Deoraithe stashed below the Ducal Palace, at the centre of some sort of array."

I raised an eyebrow, reluctantly impressed.

"Her laboratory had to be a regular fortress," I said. "He managed to get through the wards?"

"Not exactly," Juniper growled.

"He ran into the Thief," Ratface said, eyeing me carefully.

"She was bound to turn up eventually," I sighed. "I'll get furious about her meddling when I can spare the time. So, captive Deoraithe and the Duchess mobilizing her troops. Might not be rebellion, then."

"We can't afford the risk that it is," Juniper said. "Marshal Ranker pulled the Twelfth Legion from Summerholm to reinforce her at Denier in case she needs to deny the crossing."

Ranker would be horribly outnumbered, I frowned. Eight thousand legionaries against what, a conservative estimate of twenty thousand at least a fourth of which was Watch? Ranker's Fourth Legion was heavy on the sappers, since the core of it had been raised from the tribe she'd once ruled over as Matron, but there was only so much preparation could do.

"Marshal Grem should be in charge," I said. "What has he been doing?"

"He deferred operational command," the Hellhound gravelled. "He's need in the Vales."

"Which brings us to our fourth problem," Ratface said. "The Principate is moving."

"Godsdamnit," I cursed. "Is there anyone who's not trying to invade us right now?"

There was pause.

"The Golden Bloom," the Taghreb said.

"Don't you bring the fucking elves into this, Ratface," I said. "We already have a net surplus of genocidal maniacs."

"The Tower's used the emergency channels to inform everyone of general rank or higher that the Golden Bloom is phasing out of Creation," Juniper told me.

I rubbed the bridge of my nose.

"Last time they did that was was when Triumphant was kicking around, right?" I moaned.

I ignored the twin 'may she never return' the other two spoke, while pressing their knuckles to their foreheads.

"That's not a no," I decided. "And just like that, Diabolist kicks up the priority list. Fucking Hells."

"Most likely, yes" Ratface grimly agreed.

"If One Eye's staying at the border, that means we have three full Legions sitting this out," I said.

The First, Tenth and Eleventh. Considering a dragon and a vampire ran the last two, I could at least find a silver lining in the fact that their absence would limit collateral damage. Two thirds of the Tenth Legion were undead mostly because General Catastrophe had the nasty habit of torching his own soldiers as well as the enemy. What that would do close to a major city I preferred not to think about.

"The Marshal has sent word he does not believe the Principate seriously intends to make an invasion attempt," the Hellhound said. "The two principalities at the border assembled their armies, but they don't have the men to breach the Vales."

"They're just acting up so our Legions can't leave," I grimaced. "We could call that bluff."

"We can't afford a slugging match with the First Prince when our own backyard's on fire, Cat," Ratface said. "She gets to have this one."

How lovely, that the old trend of Procer screwing over Callow continued no matter who was in charge of it. There were some permanent constants in Creation, like the Tower being a pile of horrors beyond human understand and the Principate always being run by a bunch of rapacious assholes. One of these days, Cordelia Hasenbach and I were going to sit down and have a nice little chat over the subject. Knives might be involved.

"So your mother's in charge of Imperial response, then," I said, eyes flicking to Juniper.

"General Istrid," the orc replied, galarling, "has seniority. She's currently mustering north of Vale. Her own Sixth Legion has been joined by General Sacker's Ninth already. The Fifth under General Orim is supposed to be joining them, but has been delayed."

Orim the Grim and his boys served as Laure's garrison, so I supposed we'd arrived to the part of the conversation where I was going to get absolutely livid.

"Tell me," I ordered.

Ratface swallowed loudly.

"Foundling," Juniper said. "Your shadow's moving. Cut it the Hells out. It's not the Supply Tribune's fault your Ruling Council collapsed."

Surprised, I glanced behind me and found my shadow still as it should be. I raised an eyebrow. Juniper wasn't the type to exaggerate, so I'd take her word for it.

"Sorry, Ratface," I said. "Picked up something in Arcadia, it's making my Name act up."

The Hellhound's eyes narrowed.

"Is that why you've turned into a botched weather ritual?" she asked. "Learn to control it before we march. If you can make ice at will it has useful implications for our supply train."

Only Juniper, I mused, would respond to my usurping a part of Winter by trying to make me into the Fifteenth's personal magic coldbox. I coughed to hide my amusement.

"I'll get right on it, General," I said. "Tell me about Laure, Supply Tribune."

"Approximately two weeks after you disappeared into Arcadia," Ratface said, "Murad Kalbid and Satang Motherless executed a coup in the capital."

I closed my eyes and counted to ten. I'd tried, I had, to involved Praesi in ruling Callow. I'd held up my part of the deal I'd struck with the High Lords on the Empress' side. I should have remembered that even if they were Malicia's tigers, they were still fucking tigers. They'd always strike when they smelled weakness.

"And they succeeded?" I asked, eyes still closed.

"The two Callowan members of the Council are gone," the dark-eyed man said. "Sister Abigail was killed in broad daylight, allegedly by members of the Guild of Assassins. Baroness Kendal was wounded, but she managed to flee and no body was found."

I opened my eyes.

"Her Dread Majesty's representative?" I prompted.

"Disappeared," Ratface said. "If anyone knows where, they're not telling. The usurpers are turning over every rock in Laure looking for her so it's probably not their doing."

"Oh, they're not going to be finding that woman anytime soon," I murmured. "So they murdered their way to the top, like good little Wastelanders. Then they declared martial law?"

"Across all of Callow," Ratface agreed. "There's been rioting in every major city as a consequence."

I cursed in Kharsum, which had the Hellhound frowning. She kept telling me my accent was horrible, more offended by that than the rough language.

"How bad?"

"Bad enough General Istrid is mustering outside Vale because she believes if she tries entering the city she'll have to take it by force," Juniper said.

"The governors you appointed, the Callowans," Ratface said. "They're denouncing the current Council as illegitimate and refuse to answer to Imperial authorities until you 'restore order'."

"They weren't sure I would come back," I groaned.

"Neither were the usurpers," Ratface said. "They took a risk by making their move."

I chewed over that for a while.

"Why's Orim stuck in Laure?" I asked. "Those two are treacherous pricks, but they aren't idiots – after the initial riot they should have lined the pocket of the Guilds to calm things down in the city."

"They don't have the treasury," the dark-haired man said, sounding amused. "When they tried to take it they found the vaults empty."

"Then who the Hells has it?" I asked.

"Guild of Thieves," Juniper informed me. "They left a note."

"They have to know they're declaring war on me by doing that," I frowned.

"Special Tribune Robber found the source of their courage in Liesse," Ratface said.

I blinked. Before I'd left, he'd told me that the Guild was under new management: a new King of Thieves had taken their reins. No, not a king – a queen.

"Thief," I hissed. "The Thief did this. She runs them now?"

"As far as we can tell," Ratface said. "She, uh, passed a message through the Special Tribune. If you have an issue with what she's been doing, you can take it up with her in Laure."

I narrowed my eyes at him.

"You're leaving something out," I said.

"She was rather unpleasant about the phrasing," the Supply Tribune replied frankly.

I decided not to push. I was pissed enough as was and more anger wasn't going to make me think any clearer. I leaned back in my seat and closed my eyes again, thinking this through. I had six months to either break the Summer Court or force a peace settlement on them. I hated the thought of giving Akua any longer to prepare, but bloodying my army on the walls of Liesse when there were still flame-happy demigods wandering the countryside would be a major blunder. I couldn't just march the Fifteen south, though. I needed General Istrid's army in the field, and they weren't moving until the Fifth Legion joined them. Juniper's mother was reckless but not even she would take on Summer with only eight thousand men. So that meant I had to clean up the mess in Laure before taking care of the rest. Opening my eyes, I set my hands on the table.

"I'll need Nauk and his men ready to march," I told Juniper. "And Robber's cohort. Laure takes priority for now."

"We'd be thinning the defences around the portal," the Hellhound said.

"We're emptying them," I said. "Winter's dealt with, at the moment. I bought us at least six months until anything goes down."

Six times the coming of my title, the King of Winter had said. Overly dramatic phrasing but at least I had a number.

"Then the rest of the Fifteenth be moving as well," Juniper said.

"Six months, Hellhound, is also our timetable for wrecking Summer," I said. "I hope you've been thinking about ways to kill fae."

"Oh, Foundling," the orc replied happily, baring her teeth. "I have been thinking of precious little else."

I was not too proud to admit to myself that Juniper scared me a little, sometimes.

"Give Nauk two thousand men," I told her after a moment. "That should be more than enough. That leaves you a little over full legion to work with, no?"

"More," my general replied. "As of yesterday's census, the Fifteenth Legion now numbers eight thousand soldiers."

I blinked.

"What?" I spluttered.

"The south is literally on fire, Cat," Ratface said. "And we have a reputation for both taking in Callowan soldiers and killing anything that invades the region. We've had a lot of recruits pouring in."

"As well as some less desirable individuals," Juniper added coldly. "The nephew of the defunct Countess of Marchford showed up last month."

I raised an eyebrow.

"He tried to take back the city when it was under fae siege and occupied by what's pretty much two full legions?"

Nobility wasn't as inbred in Callow as it was in the Principate, so that level of blatant idiocy was a little surprising.

"He's renounced his claim on Marchford publicly, actually," Ratface said. "Says he wants an audience with you, won't talk to anyone else."

"He's in a cell," the Hellhound said. "I've no patience for agitators."

"I'll look into it," I said.

Another thing for the list. There either needed to be more hours in a day or I needed to find a way to get rid of sleep entirely.

"We'll have a more formal meeting to plan our operations, but get Nauk ready to go as soon as possible," I said, rising to my feet.

I made to leave, but turned when Juniper called out.

"Foundling."

I met her eyes.

"Catherine," she said, more softly. "What happened in Arcadia?"

"You'll get the whole story when everyone's there," I said. "But in short? I fucked up. The Winter King was playing me before I ever stepped foot in there."

I clenched my fingers, then unclenched them.

"Doesn't matter," I finally added. "I think I got what we need to win this war."

The hourglass had already been flipped and time was slipping away. What I'd thought I needed was more of it, but I might have found a way around the need. I was the Duchess of Moonless Nights, nowadays. And Apprentice had once told me that high-ranking fae could open portals both in and out of Arcadia.

---

jor

out of arcadia?? hmmm....

Morgenstern

No longer needing to "convince" some fae to open a portal for them, like Black and Warlock had to.... 😊 That is, if she can find out HOW and get the grips on it. Apprentice sure has the technical know-how, but implementing it might be a bit more difficult. Still.... portals. =P

intermediarywebserial

Damn, I thought six times the coming of her title was referring to the seasons, so at least three years, but I guess not.

Ethan Smith

So did I – But then that was probably too generous. Unless of course that IS what it meant and she assumes it's 6 months which would be quite funny

DC

Only caught this on a reread: Moonless nights presumably refers to new moons (when the entire moon disappears), so six of them is six lunar months.

xacual

Since Cat is a Duchess of Winter, can't she enlist some of the lower nobility to come with her? I can't really see a reason why she couldn't.

Gunslinger

I'm not sure she'd want more fae in creation though. Give them more of a foothold than they already have

---

Interesting idea: can she open something like a Lesser Breach? I realise that rules for crossing over from Arcadia are different than the ones for Hell (if anything, Arcadia is a similar position to the Creation as the Creation is to Hell), but maybe there are ways to bind Fae?

Haihappen

I second that idea. Perhaps Masego can whip up a binding around the portal? Caveat: Binding lesser nobility sworn to other higher lords&ladies could result in "ruffled feathers". Apart from that, Is there a reason why the fae would even USE that portal? It surely has "By entering this portal, you accept the term and conditions" written on it.

OmniscientQ

Bah. Nobody ever reads the EULA

vietnamabc

Ah the sudden but inevitable betrayal. And so the Uncivil War begins.

danh3107

If Cat can summon some Deadwood soldiers on command, or even lesser nobility, I'm going to start cackling like a madman.

Haihappen

I guess she would be able to persuade some, if, and thats a big IF, the King of Winter did not issue a policy of not interfering with his little plaything.

He surely has an endgame that may not be apparent, apart from being a suicidal immortal.

Of course, by persuading, I mean "bribing", and she should be very careful about the sort of promises she makes.

Gunslinger

And so it begins. Lots of cool touches in this chapter such as Cat scaring poor ratface. I can't imagine how scared the rebels would be once they find out Cat is back. She might hand them over to Apprentice to play with.

On a side note the second last line doesn't make much sense – "What I'd thought O needed was more of it, but I might have found a way around the need."

Nairne

It's about time my friend. She is probably thinking about opening portals to move her army.

Vamair

This "O" is a small portal.

Morgenstern

It's a typo... O is directly next to I... o_ô Just in case someone actually hasn't noted although I would guess that was not the problem with understanding the sentence? Yeah, it's about her probably being able to now open portals and thus *maybe* move a lot of people a lot faster (through Arcadia), as she is now of both planes. Unless, of course, they should somehow get lost in Arcadia on the way and lose time instead of win it (thinking of how Cat has lost three MONTHS in there during her little visist)... Seems the time can get faster AND slower in comparison, which is pretty shitty for such plans. It tends to come back to bite you when you least need it... ^^

Renasma

Hype.

Nicole

Ooooh, I love it!! talk about the ability to sneak attack! Wow!
(at least against non-fae)

I am soooo curious about all the new powers Catherine picked up.
Edge of my seat!

Excellent chapter 😊

Nairne

While that's a very interesting point, I'm more interested in how she will dispatch her enemies.

Suddenly two chapters a week seem like not much (still better than one though).

Morgenstern

... and non-MAGES, you seem to forgot. Akua has a heck of them, so it will definitely not work against her. Probably not against the other Praesi either. Might come in handy against Procer, though, when that jar of pickles is finally opened.

Dragrath

The question is if Akua's forces are still mages. I wouldn't be surprised to hear she underwent something akin to the Dead Emperor guy(forget exact title/name oops) and converted her entire domain into a literal aspect of the hells as well she is a freaking Diobolist now... 0_o Luckily she is probably focused on currently sacrificing Summer by stealing their very existence as fuel for demonic rituals...

JC

Catherine Foundling? Or Jeff Bezos?

Both seem to have learned the power of supply chain management.

Kingbob12

Goddamn. Kat is gonna end up going full Calamity at this rate.

Morgenstern

Power- and intimidation-wise, probably. 😊

I'd argue there's still some more lacking in terms of character, plans, hero-offing tactics etc., though 😊

Morgenstern

But yeah, I definitely like where this is going and HOW. =)

Nairne

Thanks for the chapter.

Tempestiel

Just a thought, maybe the elves are bugging off because Cat's on a warpath? 😊

Haihappen

And before this is over, something or someone is gonna BURN. Hmm, how to kill a god made of magical energy? What substance to we know eats magic? *cackles away*

Anna

Cat is thinking with portals! :v

Haihappen

She needs to learn how to kill gods. For Science!

Nairne

I'm sure that would be the reason for Masego, Science (ehm, Curiosity?). For Cat it would be more like Applied Science 😊

Burnsy

There are two Legions commanded by a vampire and a dragon?? Has that never come up before? That's awesome.

I wonder what those particular creatures are like in the Guideverse. We've seen pretty unique spins on most stereotypical monsters so far, so I'm looking forward to those two appearing in story at some point.

Also I adore Cat. She's so entertaining to watch, I can't wait to see her rampaging her way across Callow.

Morgenstern

It HAS been mentioned before. Somewhen already in the first book, I think. 😊

jonnney

I believe the dragon is the one that Black famously negotiated with. The undead legion was mentioned when Black was taking apart the rebel army.

Here is a list of the legions if you are curious.

http://abridged-guide-to-evil.wikia.com/wiki/Legions\_of\_Terror

---

So, Catherine thinks she has at least one advantage: a way around to spare time that consists of having the Fifteenth march through Arcadia. This way, she can come ahead of the deadline and solve all her problems in less than six months.

What are the chances that she'll run into the elves instead?

ICSM

Like, one in a million. Which makes it a sure thing.

---

Especially since actually pulling it off would allow her to catch a break.

Haihappen

Actually, Moving her Army through a portal to finish her objective ahead of schedule would result in them arriving in the nick of time for dramatic effect. Because the elves are not only big on the narrative imperative but also huge drama queens.

JackbeThimble

The elves seem to be pretty strategically conservative. Picking a fight with a team of villains backed by half a legion and led by a de jure Fey duchess in Arcadia seems like it would involve quite a few irreplaceable casualties, especially since she's the enemy of their enemy anyway.

Cpt. Obvious

After some of what the Wandering Bard said to the elves she talked to outside of Liesse it appears that the elves is in a bit of a bind.

Though they apparently are unaging, or so close to it that it's not worth arguing about, their population is in decline as ever since they occupied The Golden Bloom there haven't been a single birth.

The Elves being isolationist racist supremacist assholes they wouldn't think of asking for help, or consider the idea of having made a mistake in settling in the bloom. So phasing the entire Golden Bloom out of Creation is probably a defensive move. Though I doubt even Robber could get one of them to admit that the Deorithe mustering their army is in anyway troubling to them.

Oaden

So is there a accepted means of pointing out the minor spelling errors (like the o instead of I in the last paragraph)

Cicero

"General Istrid," the orc replied, glaring, // should be glaring right?

nipi

"And Apprentice had once told me that high-ranking fae could open portals both in and out of Arcadia."

So she can now basically teleport armies across creation, Yes? Cant wait until Hellhound sees this.

Euodiachloris

Catherine Foundling: orphan, baby Calamity, undead-munitions-raiser, demon-killer, angel-scammer, Callowan noble, Winter noble, creepy shadow-maker, teleport-spammer... walking supply chain refrigerator. xD

Haihappen

Also, her heart is Frozen, and she just can't Let It Go. Wait until she starts making snow and ice golems, filled to the brim with munitions and goblinfire as by the Foundling trade mark.

Nairne

Can't let it go. I wonder if that could become an aspect 😊 (probably not, as it's a sentence, but maybe "Keep"?).

mavant

Now you're thinking with portals!

Shawn Panzegraf

Am I the only one wondering if the Second, Third, Seventh, Thirteenth and Fourteenth Legions are ALL tied up in the Wasteland? Even going with the lower number mentioned for Sacker's Eighth Legion of 8,000 to a Legion, that's 40,000 Legionnaires with the effective operational command structure to be deployed against 4-5 different targets. I get that the craziness going on with the attempted coup in Wolof against Diabolist's mother is a big deal, but FIVE Legions big a deal?

I suppose if Malicia has deployed Two Legions on each side of the Wolof internal feud to contain their Demon and other summonings, that'd be four of those five Legions tied up, and maybe the fifth of those not otherwise engaged Legions is keeping Ater itself secure?

Thirty-two thousand men seems like a lot for containment of Wolof though. What does everyone else think?

Kilimandaros

Legions are four thousands strong, only fifteenth is eight thousands strong because of previous half-legion shenanigans. "even she would take on Summer with only eight thousand men" meant two legions: Istrid's 6th and Sacker's 9th. So it makes 20 thousands in Wastelands, 24 if you would also count 8th Legion (it isn't listed in this chapter, you mistakenly listed it as Sacker's). 24 thousands in whole pre-conquest Praes, we can't really say how many might be needed somewhere else than Wolof. Problem is that 4 thousands of them are from green 14th Legion and 13th is heavy on cavalry which isn't exactly useful in cities. However it still minor problems, big problem is that they are there to suppress not to burn everything to the ground. What can be a bit troublesome when thousands years old lineage of mages is infighting without pulling their punches.

jonnnney

I'm guessing Wolof is merely the most pressing concern rather than the only concern. I'd be surprised if there wasn't a legion keeping an eye on the Goblin tribes at all times and another in the Greenskin Marshes keeping an eye on the Watch/Orcs. They mentioned the Empress is using a light touch, so I would say two legions keeping the Hellspawn out of the Wasteland.

Archon

Six times the coming of your title does not sound like a time limit. It sounds like a use limit...

RandomFan

Duchess of *Moonless Nights*, not the calling on her new Fae-heir powers. She has Six *moonless nights* to bring peace from the battlefield before she loses her heart forever.

It's not a use limit. Or if it is, it's fae trickery where it's masked as a time limit.

RoflCat

I mean, given how the duke summoned squalls for his use, maybe it is ALSO a use limit.

As in when she uses her title in combat, it would also turn the location into a moonless night.

Alternatively her power spikes under moonless nights.

But hey, maybe that'll be how she gets back at Winter, by binding Arcadia to the concept of time. Instead of the Summer vs Winter being like a match of DotA or similar game that after the victory is decided the players all leave the game, then Spring or Autumn take over as the clean up crew. Make the cycle of season binding over the fae, so rather than a match that resets after reaching a conclusion, it's a cycle that never ends.

In Summer/Winter, their respective Court advances. Then in Spring/Autumn, the advancing Court loses their momentum. (and the current ruler may change here)

Captain Amazing

I had thought she needed to be the Duchess of 6 more duchies, but your explanation makes much more sense.

agumentic

"Sister Abigail was killed in broad daylight, allegedly by members of the Guild of Assassins"

Since no one else said it – RIP Abigail, we hardly knew ye. You seemed like a pretty cool old church gal.

stevenneiman

"You realize there's [a] one going on when you're neck deep in Watch"

"the Tower being a pile of horrors beyond human [understand->understanding]"

Well, this is a number of fine messes Cat's in now. I wonder if Kairos' plan to piss off Black is going to work.

amc

anyone else worried about how time in Arcadia doesn't necessarily map to time in "reality"? Cat could take her legion on a "shortcut", and show up 15 years later (or before!)

Dragrath

Yeah though the before part could be interesting and there is a question if her new title/role in winter might allow her influence over how Arcadia messes with time, which like everything else in the realm surely follows story rules to the ultimate extreme meaning arriving exactly when the plot for a spun story calls for it. So presumably learning how to spin stories of Arcadia will be a means to control that time dilation...

jonnney

I'm getting the feeling that the King does at least nominally want Cat to succeed so I'd say that the timing isn't gonna fuck her up too bad. Plus Black and Warlock managed to reverse the time shenanigans so it isn't a stretch that Apprentice could do the same.

Darkening

Time flows faster or slower depending on how the wind is blowing or the whims of powerful fae, but I don't believe it can run backwards.

Captain Amazing

I think it's become clear now that Foundling's group is starting to mimic the setup of the Calamities.

The Squire, the student of Lord Black.

Adjutant, her fiercely loyal second in command for Captain.

Apprentice, son and protege of Warlock.

Archer from Refuge, student of Ranger. (Notice how she tries to get in Catherine's pants?)

Finally, Thief, the embodiment of a criminal profession and ideological outsider, for Assassin.

It's uncanny and virtually has to be Role shenanigans. Black now has literal replacements in place should he fail.

Gunslinger

Huh, pretty interesting. The Thief is A hero though. I doubt she'd be part of cat's entourage

Darkening

We'll just need to make Robber a Name then.

Nairne

That's a pretty poor distinction. I'm more inclined to believe Thief is more like Hunter. A name very slightly on the Hero side of the border.

Allison

I want Robber to be a Name so badly. Just think of the repercussions!

Gunslinger

At this point I suspect erraticerrata is just teasing us and will never make him a name. I can get that though, the sheer awesomeness of a named Robber would shake creation

maresther23

He already has a name. It is all all sneaky and hidden because of his culture. One of his aspects is Invincible.

alegio

I go out and stop reading for 2 weeks and.. well, s"!t happens.

Giving Heiress the name Diabolist is something I had not thought about but in retrospective makes lot of sense. She became the heiress of the old villians ways, demons, rituals, sacrifices, all that is what she now is trying to represent.

Nairne

I guess it's a contest between the old ways and the new.

callmesteve

Some chapters are missing from the ToC: The backstories of Captain and Warlock, and probably others. I wanted to re-read those for the shock-and-awe factor, but darn if I can't find them.

erraticerrata

They're in the Extra Chapters tab, which is separate.

vuthuha912

The response from the Praesi member of the ruling council is shameful, to say the least. They collapse at the first sight of trouble. The sheer stupidity of attempting a coup when your southern regions are on fire. What is the logic exactly? Do they even want to keep Callow or not? I wonder why Malicia should give any Wasteland nobleman position on the ruling council. Just choose some normal bureaucrat who actually knows their job and can work with others. It is important that they don't flinch at the first sight of trouble. Publicly condemn the rebels, organize aid for the refugees, evacuate people from the nearby area, and collaborate with the House of Light for godsake to stabilize and heal injured refugees. Didn't even attempt to organize a response? Do any of these people know the basic principle of ruling?

If you are not capable of defeating the enemy and keeping your gain then there is no point in attempting treachery. What are they going to do after successfully taking over? They are surrounded by enemies with no clear way of retreating. And they just throw a golden goose away for such small gain as a year or two of taxes. This is an opportunity to unify the council and further integrate Praes and Callow. They threw it away. With that performance, Malicia would be an idiot if she let these people in any public office ever again. I swear logic and long-term planning slide off these people like water off a leaf.

These actions are treasonous. They went against the long-term interest of the empire for personal gain. Just execute or exile them, banish the family, confiscate their property and ban any member from 3 generations of that family from taking public office. I heard incompetence run in the blood. Let that be a deterrence for incompetence, cowardice, and disloyalty in your government.

Chapter 17: Allegiance

"There's a natural hierarchy to the world, Chancellor: there's me, then my boot, then all of Creation under the boot."

– Dread Empress Regalia

It felt good to be back in plate. It felt even better to know that I'd be facing opponents that could actually be deterred by armour – no more of this 'fae blades cut through everything' bullshit. It'd been like fighting a hundred less competent version of the Lone Swordsman, though admittedly with much less lecturing thrown around. Small favours. My cloaks swirled behind me as I walked down the stairs, the most recent addition to it glimmering even in the dark. How Hakram had managed to get his hands on a piece of the Duke of Violent Squalls' clothes I had no idea, but the wind-like cloth had been added as another mark of victory to my name. A third of the black cloth was now covered by stolen banners of dead men. How many years, before there is no black left? At the rate I was making enemies, not many. If I survived the year, odds were Akua Sahelian's would be joining the lot. There was a thought to warm my absent heart.

It was cooler, underground. There'd been two sets of goals in Marchford, before I'd taken the city back in the rebellion. The cells for petty criminals, near the centre of the city: the ones I was currently in. The other had been for highborn prisoners, in a wing of the Countess of Marchford's manner. The very same I'd had Robber put to the torch purely to piss then-Heiress off. If I'd known back then I'd have to pay for rebuilding the godsdamned thing, I might have held off. The awareness that I'd ordered that manor burned followed me into the dark. The man I was visiting, after all, had once called that seat of power his birthright. Elizabeth Talbot did not have any children, but she had a whole tribe of relatives. Her designated heir was her brother's son, Lord Brandon Talbot – who'd been among the rebels broken by Black but had managed to escape and survive.

From the fact that his head had not ended up on a pike in the following months, I assumed neither my teacher nor Malicia had thought him worth the effort of hunting down. With that in mind I'd expected to find a living example of every noble wastrel tale waiting down in his cell, but the reality was different. Brandon Talbot was a man in his early thirties, powerfully built with a thick beard and long hair held in a ponytail much like mine. He was seated on a stone bench in the back, managing to make the position look almost dignified even if his well-tailored clothes had obviously not been washed in some time.

"I was beginning to think I'd been forgotten down here," the man said.

"No such luck," I replied.

I glanced around. There was a table and seats meant for guards, under a pair of torches, and I claimed one of the chars. Turning its back to the prisoner, I straddled it and propped up my elbows atop it. He was staring at me, I saw, a strange expression on his face.

"Taking a good look?" I said.

He blinked, then shook his head.

"I mean, I'd heard," he said. "But it's another thing to see it. You're so young."

I hid my surprise. Usually, at this point, my enemies offered up banter. Or a denunciation of some sort. Maybe a dig at my height, which made stabbing them afterwards a sort of justice.

"Age stops mattering, when you become Named," I said.

"Age always matters," he disagreed softly. "There was a time this country didn't make soldiers of its children."

I smiled thinly.

"And then we lost," I said. "A lesson learned."

"Of all the things we lost back then," Brandon Talbot murmured, "I think I might grieve that one the most."

"Is that why you came here?" I asked. "To tell me of the past glories of the Kingdom?"

"The Kingdom died," he said, tone sad. "Once on the Fields of Streges, and again when the Carrion Lord snuffed out the dream last year."

"It was not a Callowan dream," I replied harshly. "It was a Proceran one, bought with the First Prince's silver."

"Oh we all knew that, deep down," Lord Brandon admitted. "That we were being used. But we glimpsed a world that was more than waking up every morning with the Tower's boot on our throat. It was not a bad dream, Countess Foundling."

"Lady," I corrected. "Lady Foundling."

He peered at me, dark bangs and darker shadows framing his face.

"Are you really?" he asked.

"To you?" I said. "Yes."

The man laughed.

"You think I'm your enemy," he said.

"I think you committed treason," I said. "I've hanged men for less."

"And yet here I am," Lord Brandon said. "Without a rope around my neck."

I smiled mirthlessly.

"It would be a very grave mistake," I said, "to confuse curiosity for mercy."

"But you are curious," he said. "Most would have sent me to the gallows without even an audience. Your orc certainly wanted to."

"General Juniper would have been well within her rights to give you a traitor's death," I replied harshly.

"I'm not trying to speak ill of your friend, Countess Foundling," he said, waving away the notion.

Blue eyes considered me carefully.

"She is your friend, yes?"

"Something like that," I said.

"And yet they say you fight for Callow," Lord Brandon mused. "Most would think those two things irreconcilable."

"But not you?" I snorted. "If you're looking for a pardon for that concession, you're knocking at the wrong door. I'm eighteen, not an idiot."

He did not entirely manage to hide his surprise when I mentioned my age. Oh fuck him, I thought. I wasn't that short. I'd been almost an inch taller than Black before he left, it wasn't my fault I was surrounded by godsdamned giants all the time.

"What do you want, Lord Talbot?" I said. "You had to know you'd end up in a cell if you turned up here."

"I want you to save Callow," he said. "While there's still some of it left to save."

"Always the cry of the highborn, isn't it?" I laughed, darkly amused. "Bring it back the way it used to be! When everything was perfect because we were rich and powerful and we ran the fucking show."

"This land was at peace, once," he said.

"I keep hearing people talk about bringing back the Kingdom," I said. "Like putting a crown on some Fairfax relative would magically fix this fucking country. You all act like everything was perfect before the Conquest, like it was some never-ending golden age. It wasn't. I've read the records, and what you're trying to resurrect never existed. All a rebellion won would accomplish is slapping a fresh coat of ruin over a bitter truth: all that's changed is whose palace the taxes build."

"If you hold us in such contempt," he said, "why claim to fight for us?"

"Because there's a difference between Callow and the Kingdom," I hissed. "One is people. The other's gilding. People I'll draw my sword for, every time. The rest can burn. It's not worth a single drop of godsdamned blood."

"The people are dying, Countess," Lord Brandon said.

"So they are," I conceded tiredly. "And so I go to war again."

"I don't mean the fae," the noble said, shaking his head. "Or even the butcher you gave Liesse to. Callow is dying. Our way of life. Another fifty years of this and we'll be light-skinned Praesi, save for a few bitter enclaves."

I didn't reply, because he was right. I knew he was, and worst of all I didn't have a solution. Because the monsters were as cunning as they were powerful, and they had been playing this game since before I was born. Winning it through schools and trade and the featherweight of apathy. It was one of the first thing Black had ever told me: he didn't need people to agree, just not to care. And it was working, wasn't it? During the Liesse Rebellion, no holding north of Vale has risen. So few soldiers had answered the Duke's call that he'd needed to bolster his forces with mercenaries. The dream the noble said my teacher has snuffed out had been a feeble thing from the start: peasant levies ordered into the field, barely held together by household troops and foreign soldiery. And before the war was done those same levies had delivered the same nobles who'd called on them at the feet of Black, bound in chains. Fear, I knew, had driven them there. But also more than that: no one in that army had really believed they could win anymore. Some hadn't even been sure they should.

"I know," I admitted.

"But this is not your design," Lord Brandon pressed, leaning forward.

His eyes were alight, almost fervent.

"I'm trying to find a path between destruction and rebellion," I said.

"The let us be Callowans," he said. "Changed, perhaps, but still us. There is still a spine under the boot, Countess. There's still a flicker of the flame no matter how many times they stamp it out."

"Those are pretty words," I noted. "I don't trust pretty words, Talbot. I trust practical measures. Tangible things I can work with."

"Bring back the knightly orders," he said.

I stared at him for a long moment. The knights of Callow, huh? Even over twenty years after the Conquest, their silhouettes were still branded behind the eyes of children who'd been born long after the last of them were disbanded. For a lot of people, the knights were Callow, just as much as the bells of Laure or golden fields spreading as far as they eye could see. They were also a basketful of military orders disbanded by order of the Dread Empress because they were a direct threat to Praesi hegemony.

"I don't have the authority to repeal Tower decrees," I said.

"Not lawfully," the noble said very, very quietly.

It still rang loudly, in these rooms empty save for the two of us. Treason had a way of doing that. I looked at him, and finally understood what I was sitting across from.

"You're not an agitator," I said. "You're an envoy."

"So I am," he agreed softly. "We've watched you, Countess. Seen what you preach more than empty words."

I'd been playing this game for too long to be fooled by flattery.

"Don't lie to me," I said. "You're not coming to be because you think I'm worthy. You're coming to me because you're desperate. Because in fifty years, we'll be light-skinned Praesi – and if I die, you're not getting another Squire who gives a shit about Callow."

He did not deny it. I allowed myself to see it, for just a moment. Knights come again, and this time on my side. Not riding down my legionaries. With Summer and the Diabolist ahead of me, the thought was horribly tempting.

"How many?" I said, mouth gone dry.

"You have not agreed," Lord Brandon grimaced. "You must understand that–"

"You're asking me to cross Dread Empress Malicia," I said, tone like steel. "If you think you grasp even a fraction of how dangerous that woman really is, you're a fucking fool. How many?"

The man studied me in silence for a long time.

"Two thousand," he said. "More may emerge if you don't butcher us in our sleep."

Two thousand. Gods be good.

"The Duke of Liesse didn't even have that much horse," I said faintly. "And Black had most his knights killed in their sleep."

"Those of us that rose with Gaston of Liesse went to die, Foundling," the noble murmured. "Reaching for that dream, one last time. It was the old, the tired, the despairing. The rest of us stayed hidden. To teach old ways to the young, and wait."

Half the houses in the city will have swords and spears stashed under the floorboards or hidden away in the attic, I'd told Juniper the first night we spent in Marchford. Because this was Callow. Because we'd carry a grudge for ten generations, if that was how long it took to even the scales. Because those who wronged us always, always paid the long price no matter what it cost is. And now I'd just been told that two thousand knights were hiding in the countryside, biding their time. Under Black's nose, for years. Pride in my countrymen warred with horror at the thought of what could have happened, if they'd all risen. Praesi thought they knew about patience but they'd only been invaded the once, and not like us. We've had wolves at the gate since the First Dawn. It taught us hard lessons and oh, look how well we've learned them. I was more moved by the thought than I cared to admit.

"How quickly can you gather them?" I croaked.

Lord Brandon kept his face calm, but his eyes betrayed him.

"Two, maybe three months," he said.

"You'll be part of the Fifteenth," I said. "Under General Juniper. Anything less is declaring war on the Tower."

"It is a lesser yoke," the dark-haired man said, "than the one currently choking us."

I rose to my feet, feeling faint. I could feel the Beast's head leaning over my shoulder, its warm breath heating my cheek. It was grinning.

"I, Countess Catherine Foundling of Marchford," I said, "do order the creation of the Order of Broken Bells and charge Lord Brandon Talbot with gathering men under its banner."

The man looked about to weep, and softly nodded.

"You'll be out within the hour," I said. "Get me knights, Talbot. Before it's too late."

"I don't like this," Juniper said.

It was almost noon. Leaving the orc to hover behind me, I put a hand against the glass and tried to feel warmth. Nothing. I was so cold to the touch these days that my breath should come as vapour. I stared at the sun and idly thought that the conversation that I was about to have would have better fit the night.

"Are you listening, Foundling?" the general growled. "I don't fucking like it, this inner circle shit. We're a legion, not a gang. Officers of the same rank get the same briefings."

"What I have to say isn't for everybody's ears," I said.

"Hune should be there," the grim-faced orc continued as if she hadn't heard me. "She's my second, not Nauk."

"I trust Nauk," I replied without turning. "Hune is a blank slate."

"Then have one of your little talks with her," the general said. "Like you did with Ratface and Aisha."

I snorted.

"Jealous we never had one?" I teased, sounding more light-hearted than I felt.

"Please," she dismissed. "I already see too much of you as is. Couldn't stomach more."

Before I could summon up a reply, my 'inner circle' began piling in. They'd come as a group, it seemed. Only officers for this one: Masego was holed up in his tower, seeing to the experiments he'd left in the hands of the assistant he's stolen from Diabolist, and Hakram was keeping Archer busy in the sparring yard. Leaving her to her own devices would just lead to more property damage I couldn't afford to repair. Nauk was the first in, from the sound of the steps. Robber and Ratface came in bickering about 'misappropriation of Legion resources', which I'd probably have to look into at some point, and Aisha's presence could be deduced from the dainty sigh that followed them. Pickler was light-footed and silent, but my ears were more than mortal now. Kilian wasn't here. I owed it to her to tell her when it was just the two of us.

"Boss," Robber called out. "Do I not even get a 'good murdering, you filthy goblin'? I really feel like I've earned it."

"The filthy in particular," Aisha commented.

I turned to look at the officer's I'd had at my side since the College, who'd followed me through a rebellion of my own making and bled in my name. I did not manage to smile.

"Oh shit," Ratface cursed.

He'd always been a perceptive man.

"About an hour ago," I said, "I committed treason."

There was a heartbeat of shocked silence, then the room exploded. Aisha's face had gone blank, Juniper looked furious and Pickler somehow managed to be bored in the face of a blunt admission of sedition. Nauk was grinning and thumping the table. Ratface's face was darkly pleased and the noise covering all the rest was Robber's loud, shrill laughter.

"If I may request specifics, Lady Catherine?" Aisha politely asked.

Well, I wasn't back to Lady Foundling or Lady Squire. That was something.

"Yes, Foundling," the Hellhound barked. "Tell us more about the forveala'sak treason."

I didn't know the Kharsum term she'd put in there, but by the look on Nauk's face it must have been truly filthy.

"I've founded a knightly order," I calmly said. "And released the former Countess' nephew to fill its ranks. I'm told we should have two thousand riders within three months."

Not a single hint of her thoughts touched Aisha's face. Ratface leaned forward, face eager.

"Are we rebelling?" he asked.

"You shut your fucking mouth," Juniper shouted. "We're not rebelling."

"Not unless the Tower forces me to," I replied frankly.

"Fingers crossed," Nauk laughed loudly, like I'd just handed him a bag of rubies.

"How many cousins and uncles do you have in the Legions, Nauk?" Aisha asked him, tone emotionless. "Think for once in your life."

"Now," Juniper interrupted, turning to me. "Now you choose to pull this shit, when the horde is at the gate."

"That is the best time to pull something like this," Pickler clinically said. "The Tower can't afford to antagonize us. Not if it wants to hold Callow."

"So we're going rogue," Robber grinned malevolently. "About time. I was getting tired of playing nice."

"I will not see the Fifteenth turn on the Empire while I breathe," Juniper said and her voice was like bedstone.

That killed every smile in the room. There was no longer any anger in her voice, I heard. She was beyond that now. She was looking at me and I'd ever only seen her with eyes that cold when she was thinking of how to destroy an enemy. I'd learn to read orcs, since my days in the College, but even if I hadn't I'd know exactly what I saw on her face: betrayed. She felt betrayed, by someone she'd thought a friend.

"Juniper," Aisha spoke softly into the silence. "Listen to her. Don't assume."

The Hellhound shook her head.

"Is that what this has all been leading to, Catherine?" she asked, and the genuine grief in her voice tone cut me like a knife. "Recruiting Callowans. Subverting officers. Gathering Named Were you trying to ease us into treason before we ever began?"

Her voice shook.

"Was it just so you could carve yourself a kingdom?"

"Hellhound," Nauk said, and for once his voice was soft. "We all knew this was coming. From the beginning."

"Not like this," Juniper said. "Not like this."

"I'm not rebelling," I told her, meeting her eyes. "I'm not asking you to fight your mother, Juniper. Or you your family, Aisha. But things can't continue as they've gone on. Not anymore. Not after all the lines they've crossed."

I clenched my fingers, then unclenched them. Gods, why did I have to feel so cold? My gaze swept across the room.

"There's something sick in the Empire," I said. "You've all seen it. Some of you have felt it first-hand. Merciless Gods, the people ruling the Wasteland think half the people in this room are cattle."

"And you think raising a banner will change that?" Pickler said, eyes hooded. "You're good at killing, Foundling, but you can't kill a thousand years of hatred. Your sword is of no use there."

"If the people in power can't even stop killing their own," I said quietly, "why are they still in power?"

I felt the shiver go through the room. Was this what William had felt like, when he'd first spoken to his rebels behind barred doors and shuttered windows? That weight, power and responsibility both. It would kill me, if I was not careful, like it had killed him.

"We've taken oaths," Juniper said. "All of us, and you too."

"Yes," I agreed. "I swore. To the Legions. To what Praes says it is."

I stared her down.

"Do you think the High Lords live up to those oaths?" I asked. "I look south, and I see the highest among them rebelling for the second time in two years. Twice she's walked away with a warning, free to bleed us again. How many of us do they get to kill before we say enough?"

"They'll never stop," Ratface whispered fervently, addressing everyone and no one at all. "You know that. They'll never stop unless we make them."

"And how many people will die, for that better world?" Aisha asked quietly.

"Mountains," I replied. "But for once, it won't be us doing the dying."

The beautiful Taghreb closed her eyes, let out a deep breath.

"Emperors rise," she said. "Emperors fall. The Tower endures. Gods forgive me, the Tower endures."

I did not allow myself to feel joy. This wasn't over yet.

"Beautiful things, ideals," Pickler said. "But I'm a goblin, Foundling. You can't eat principles. You can't carve a tunnel with them. They don't win wars."

Robber let out a whisper of a laugh, and my eyes immediately went to him. I'd never heard him a noise anything like it in all the time I'd known him. It had sounded, I thought, almost wistful.

"They kill us," the Special Tribune smiled, "for sport."

Pickler turned to face him, face flickering with dismay.

"Robber-"

"Listen to me, Pickler," Robber said. "No, actually listen for once. The Matrons, the High Lords, the whole fucking lot of them. They've had the crown for centuries. They're fat, now. Lazy. They think they own it. You know what that means. You're a goblin, right? They don't get to play if they're not willing to bleed."

"We can't win this. We can't beat them," Pickler hissed angrily, but her voice broke after. "I will not let us die doing the right thing. We are going to grow old, all of us. I will not – I don't-"

"We can," I said softly. "You know that already. It's what scares you. No shame in that. I know what's ahead better than any of you, and I'm terrified. It'll be blood and mud and grief, but don't think for a moment we can't do it."

The Senior Sapper took her hands off the table brusquely, to hide their shaking.

"It'll be to the death, Foundling," she said, amber eyes flicking away. "To the death. Do not start this lightly."

She sagged in her seat afterwards. Ratface's eyes sought mine and he chuckled.

"I always thought I'd die railing at them, you know," he said conversationally. "Just another corpse for the pile."

He paused, body shaking with nervous energy.

"I was brought into this war when they tried to murder me in my bed," he said. "You never needed to ask."

My eyes went to Nauk, who'd gotten up to lean against the wall. His arms were clasped and there was something hungry in his gaze.

"To the end," he said, fangs bared. "I made my choice before I knew it was a choice, Callow. To the bitter fucking end."

And just like that, there was only one. Juniper was close, had been this whole time, but she'd not moved in a while. She came closer to me, spine straight but shoulders tight.

"Swear to me, Catherine," she said hoarsely. "Not my mother. Not any of them. That they won't be the enemy."

"I swear," I told her, and offered my arm.

For the second time in our lives, she took it.

"Warlord," she whispered, and it sounded like an oath.

It should have felt like a victory, I thought. All I felt was cold. Gods, all I felt was cold.

HTJ

Eh. Treason for some cavalry?

Seems iffy.

WirelessGrapes

I think it's sorta kinda treason to prevent a future war. Cat's playing the long game now, similar to how Black did it. Take them now, to prevent them from rising up later.

Honestly, if Black can see what Cat's doing, with the continued 'cutting out the rot of Evil', I can see them letting it go. Not joining, gods no, but letting other people fight them. If they have to fight the Calamities, it'll be a while now.

sheer_falacy

It's not just getting her cavalry. It's getting her cavalry that would otherwise fight her later, so it's net 4000 cavalry. And as Pickler points out, it's at the perfect time, for the same reason that it was the perfect time for Diabolist to pull off her bullshit. Praes is distracted, all of the other legions are busy, and there are multiple enemies of both Catherine and Praes that desperately need to be dealt with to the point that they can't really fight someone who is fighting those enemies.

Still very dangerous, and I'm surprised at the treason happening now since it hadn't really come up until the meeting with this noble who she didn't like very much.

Naeddyr

Yes, it doesn't get her just cavalry.

It gets her *Callow*.

Alex Straughan

2,000 of the worlds best heavy cavalry is not "some cavalry"

Also, even more important is the story they come with.

When all hope is lost, the Knights of Callow ride to the rescue!

Sean

Its not "some" cavarly, its 2,000 of the most elite heavy calvery in the world. It will earn her fierce loyalty from all Callowans and serve as an INCREDIBLE bost of morale. The 15th is some 8,000 troops, those 2,000 are a 25% bost in man power.

More importantly, they're essentially comming from nowhere. Throwing off all her opponents calculations.

Thats not even getting into what those knights represent.

JackbeThimble

If they can provide anything like 2 thousand heavy cavalry? Empires have been conquered by less.

stevenneiman

It's not just the cavalry, though two thousand mounted knights for her rather than against her is certainly nice. It's about what it was always about for Catherine, which is making Callow into part of the Empire, and a valued and respected part.

nipi

2000 highly trained heavy cavalry used correctly might be as good as 20 000 infantry.

As I understand it resisting chavalry charges required tight ranks and a strong nerves. Chavalry truly shined when the enemy ranks broke. Cat has goblin munitions and mages to help that along.

Poetically Psychotic

Normally cavalry is best used for harassment, scouting, and crushing routed forces, because a cavalry charge is too easily broken or robbed of momentum. But in a continent without firearms of any kind, widespread use of explosives, or even *pikes*... heavy cavalry is going to be an absolute *nightmare*.

raudhbjorn

You make the mistake of this King that this isn't what Black and Malicia had planned all along. The Empress NEVER steps down. Someone HAS to topple her off the throne and in order for their plan to succeed, it has to be Cat that topples her and that means it HAS to be treason.

Jeffery Wells

It's a lot of cavalry.

MJ topic

Treason for a symbol of Callow. For a symbol of new era.

corrado alamanni

She needs troops the empress is at fault for not keeping her nobles in lines. Fuck her

The Archdevil

And so the Uncivil Wars truly begin. Gods Below, it's been far too long in the making.

H.

No, we're well into them already.

1. Liesse rebellion
2. Free cities war
3. Wolof uprising
4. Cat, for Winter & Callow vs. Summer

Also, these aren't war *yet*:

5. Diabolist
6. Daoine is mobilizing
7. Cat defying Malicia by accepting knights
8. Ruling council coup in Laure

And all of them civil wars.

Shequi

The first battle of the Uncivil Wars was Three Hills, if I remember one of the snippets of Aisha's memoirs correctly.

RoflCat

@Shequi: The Uncivil Wars related quote from Aisha's memoir was about the seed they sown in Liese (Heiress)

Three Hills was forging Fifteenth into the unit it will need to be to face what comes in Marchford.

Letouriste

Yeah you're right

danh3107

"Warlord," she whispered, and it sounded like an oath.

I love Orcs, I love them so fucking much it's unbelievable

WirelessGrapes

Wai-wai-wai-wai-wait.

Did Juniper just get a fucking name?

danh3107

She was calling Cat Warlord, as most of the Orcs do. It's incredibly significant because it's one of the few times Juniper doesn't call her Foundling or Cat.

It also has immense significance for Orcs, as the Warlords were almost like walking divinity to their people.

*wirelessgrapes*

Ah, makes sense, the only other time I remember seeing that was when Hakram got his Name officially. Thanks for the clear up.

*Arno van Sinderen*

It would be a rather amusing subversion of all expectations if Cat became Warlord instead of Black/Grey whatever knight

Bcurly

Well, she is known for killing people and burning things

*Ethesis*

I'd love it if that became her new name.

Hakurei06

I'd argue for a transition into Green Knight, especially with her recently becoming a literal force of nature, if it weren't for the fact that she's part of the Court of Winter.

Actually, now that I think about it, If she manages to kill the literal fucking King of Winter, it's not unimaginable that she forges a Spring Court from the ashes or in preparation.

JackbeThimble

We have a fairly firm word of god that Catherine isn't going to be The Warlord.

Cpt. Obvious

I think I remember it being said that Amadeus also has been called Warlord by orcs. In his case I think it was Grem One Eye who started it. Which makes it kind of fitting that Juniper was the first to name Cat as Warlord back when she was recruited into the 15th, if I remember correctly.

Cpt. Obvious

Or was it Hakram?

Nairne

No no. She just acknowledged Cat as a Warlord, albeit reluctantly.

Kingbob12

The Orcs and the Goblins are so wonderfully vicious and loyal. Goddamn do I love each and every one of them. Robber and Nauk above them all though. Those two are fucking amazing.

HandyCapped

Goblins? Loyal? The goblins under Cat are special cases under the Special case, with the capital S. Normally, their only 'loyalty' is directed to the Grey Eyries, and even that is represented only in the hierarchy in their vicious power struggles of cloak and dagger.

vietnamabc

Hey Mr.E, any chances you have been playing Tyranny? Because I think Malicia is relying on Catherine to rebel because it is impossible to achieve her and Black's goal by obeying, therefore by rebelling she will stay loyal. Not by molding Callow to Praesi but rather adopting Callow virtue to Praesi.

obsidianorangutan

Alternatively, Foundling killing off the bluebloods gives Malicia plausible deniability. If she succeeds great, one of the biggest oppositions to her rule is eliminated. If not, then Kat was a illegitimate rebel who she can condemn

Dragrath

Aye good argument you two, I think that puts things aptly. They need an outsider to pull off a role they could never reach as for a villain to win they need to even more blur the bounds of good and evil which is hard to do when Moreover she can succeed where they can't because she isn't just yet another Praesi but a Callowan that has adapted to the Praesi. And agreed on the plausible deniability. as it really is a win win situation from Malicia's point of view. Granted that seems to be the kind of machinations she goes for so it is to be expected.

HandyCapped

Remember, everybody, that Cat was never in on the machinations of those two. They were grooming her to be the autonomous ruler of the vassal state of Callow under the curtain of Praes all along, and what is a better way to achieve that, but to revive the greatest representation of Callowan pride and to interconnect that with the might of Praes? Callow will retain it's fire, but march under the "correct" flag.

Considering this and the grudge with the antagonistic system, that the two schemers harbor, in addition to Cat's own disposition, the future of her being transitioned into the role of a Grey Knight seems all the more likely, despite my suspicions against the exact wording of it.

ayon96

Awesome chapter!
By the way what were heiress's aspects?

ayon96

I know what's head(ahead) better than any of you, and I'm terrified.

nehemiahnewell

Was that a term of respect, or did Cat just graduate from Squire? With her cloak woven from portents of fallen, or maybe conquered, enemies, it would fit.

George

Term of respect IMO – not enough foreshadowing for it to be a transition.

Alex Straughan

It's the second time shes been called warlord.
Perhaps you mean she needs three?

Mental Mouse

It's more that Warlord would be an orcish Name, not a Callowan one. Hakram could conceivably transition to Warlord, but Cat can't. Any name she gained would be a Callowan one.

Trying to avoid being too spoilery: Under her own power she'd apparently have leapfrogged clear over her mentor's Name. With Winter, she's about to jump the track entirely.

Mental Mouse

Bah! I could've sworn we had spoiler tags, but apparently not.

nextgidea

The road to hell is paved with good intentions.
Oh wait, we are Evil, and the whole point is to Do Wrong Right.

An excellent chapter as usual, with character reinforcements. Also, we get to see a new character, I wonder how would Lord Talbot would fit in "inner circle" of Kat.

****

Some typos:

There'd been two sets of goals in Marchford, before I'd taken the city back in the rebellion –
Goal → gaol

I claimed one of the chars → chairs

I know what's head better than any of you, and I'm terrified → head – ahead

The Senior Sapper took her hands of the table → off the table

Laferno

Gaol is an archaic spelling for jail. Not a typo.

Hakurei06

Yes, and the argument here is that "goal" in this context is a typo thereof.

Digitize27

It's not archaic, it's the accepted British English term.

stevenneiman

"There'd been two sets of [goals->gaols] in Marchford"
"And Black had most {of} his knights killed in their sleep."
"I turned to look at the [officer's->officers] I'd had at my side"

Naeddyr

Ooooh shiiiiit.

Well, I think this is still part of Black's and Malicia's or Black's or Malicia's plan. They're pragmatic.

But man, this really shows the corrosive and corruptive nature of the temptation of Good. To turn Cat so easily, within five minutes of talking! Brandon is a silver-tongued rogue.

Oshi

If you think for a second Cat's done any of this with Good in mind then you'll be surprised when the knife is in your throat. She chose the path she has always been on. The knights are just another set of tools. She will be Empress.

vietnamabc

Treason!
No, this is patriotism!

Letouriste

The funny thing is these two words are often one

*Mental Mouse*

"Treason doth never prosper, and why is that? Forsooth, if it prosper, none dare call it treason."

NerfContessa

Indeed

Aside from being a bit too fast this is Ana mazing chapter.

And so it begins...

edrey

and where is kilian, she should be in first line

Letouriste

Explained in this very chapter;)

The quietist

Making a really long term prediction is that start of this book/end of the next one sees Callow more or less resurrected but Hasenbach getting her crusade unable/unwilling to admit its validity.

○ =     = '     , = ,     ~ ~ ~

That seems like a decision they will regret sooner or later.

Naeddyr

Rereading this chapter slowly actually gave me chills, twice.

Now, what will the Order of the Broken Bells wear as their color?

White? No, that won't do at all.

Black? Possibly. Show them which side they're on now.

Or... Green?

I still think Catherine is bound to be the Green Knight, the fae knight who goes to a wedding and gets her head chopped off in order to win a bet and get the other guy's head chopped off.

Naeddyr

Another prediction: Catherine is totally going to subvert Thief. That role just seems perfectly suited for twilightallegiances, and she seems like a pragmatic lass.

---

I can't wait for Robber to call them castrates.

Shequi

Bells are usually cast in Bronze. So that, for their colours?

Naeddyr

Bronze can have a (jade) green patina, too. 😊

Hakurei06

I think she can manage it if she's able to put a literal end to winter and forge the Court of Spring from its ashes. Better still, if it means Summer petering put into Fall (not Autumn, Fall. Names have power)

Mental Mouse

> I still think Catherine is bound to be the Green Knight, the fae knight who goes to a wedding and gets her head chopped off in order to win a bet and get the other guy's head chopped off.

She already did that once. And arguably again in the Winter fight, thanks to her stolen Rise.

Renasma

I have so much hype for that one word. It is the best title. There's so much implication. I squeed.

Warlord.

Nauk was the only one more outspoken about his allegiances: the other orc had decided that Cat was the warlord of their generation, and as far as he was considered that settled the matter. Every matter, really. Good orcs did not question their warlord, though they ripped out the guts of anyone who did.

---

Given how she's planning to change all of Praes, presumably including nobility, Im personally hoping for High Lady of Marchford.

RoflCat

Still think Dread Queen of Callow.

Not Empress.

Letouriste

She try to uproot the nobility so queen is out for me.dread do not suit her much right now....maybe a mixte of dread and a good thing+empress+her speciality(something like defying,visionary,selfless?^^ probably not the last one:D)

But the way that go,I expect something akin a republic but with less bureaucratic bullshit and the tower still there but changed.more power for communities too...an assembly looks good,something akin what cat already tried for callow but with all sides represented this time:goblins,orcs,daoine,trolls etc...

Thebes

At least her Name is happy with her decision.

cmcd

"The people are dying, Countess," Lord Brandon said.

"So they are," I conceded tiredly. "And so I go to war again."

What an awesome line. Well done :).

---

Just how did Hakram stich a piece of wind to Cat's cloak? I can buy that he Found the piece that had a sliver of her power in it, but then what, whistle in the needle?

Also, nice job calling all the officers that are confirmed not to be a spy and then folding them in one by one to peer pressure Juniper. This oath better not be in vain, or EVERYONE will remember it.

Dianna

Something to note. Cat wondering how long it will be before there isn't any black left in her cloak. Like she is becoming less and less black, or perhaps, less like Black. I personally don't think she will become Black Knight, her story is too much treading the line between good and evil. In her first trip inside her name, she didn't side with either the Good or the Evil versions of herself.

Also, the Fea are bound by the stories of creation, good and evil in constant battle, summer, and winter in constant battle. It would seem to make sense that to make a peace between them, you would somehow make a peace between the Good and the Evil. I am also on the ally with Thief train since it would only help the whole making a peace idea.

nehemiahnewell

Eh, I'm pretty sure she's solidly evil. I suspect a moment of waver, a time when it becomes uncertain, but that she recommits.

That said, I do expect her to take a different path then the Black Knight.

Letouriste

Her name is evil ,her role is not.

Moginheden

Her name is Squire. That is a transitional role that can become the White OR Black Knight. She was recruited by Evil, but nothing in her Name or Role is forcing her to be evil. When her name backlashed against her, it was because she was setting up a narative where she was destined to fail, not because she was doing good, or even switching sides to Good.

Black and the Empress would have an issue with her switching to Good, but her Name and Role would be fine with it. (I also think Black and the Empress would be fine with bringing back the knights as long as their loyalty can be chained to thw Tower. They might have to take action agaist Cat due to politics though.)

Personally I see Warlord as her eventual Name. It is an Orc Name, but if enough Orcs believe in her, she might get it anyway. (Names are linked to belief and people repeating the story)

Kilimandaros

@Moginheden:

Black and Malicia's main problem with knightly orders is also important reason why Catherine choose to establish one – they are essential symbol for people of Callow. As long as Foundling's story of rebuilding Callow (not as a Kingdom, but part of Praes) is still on, Order of Broken Bells is acceptable (even if not exactly legal). Of course it's passable only because current situation is quite dire, but in the overal view they are problem because they could delay or even stop transformation of Callowan into fair skinned Praesi.

About Cat becoming Warlord, Erraticerrata directly stated that it's orc Name and thus Catherine can't become one. It's like no Praesi mage can become Wizard of the West. And even if collective faith of orcs could elevate non-orc to Warlord title it would need some more than few hundreds orcs in Fifteenth. I very much doubt that in the Steppes or even other Legions Catherine Foundling is thought of as Warlord.

KageLupus

As soon as this book started off with the Black Knight going off to fight the White Knight, I thought it was pretty obvious that Cat is getting set up with a choice. The Squire graduates to become a Knight after the old Knight dies.

So Black and White end up offing each other nearly simultaneously, and then the Squire has two paths laid out before her. Follow in her mentor's shadow (heh) and promote the Praesi ruling of Callow, or become the shining beacon of the people that Callow needs and try to turn the table on the Empire.

But Catherine is not known for accepting choices thrust on her if they don't suit her plans. So she tells all of Creation that there is a new page in the book, and she will make her own story. A Black Knight that uses institutions and cares for people. A White Knight that sets aside pretty ideals in favor for practical concerns.

Pragmatism made flesh and steel. A Grey Knight, willing to sink to the depths to achieve her lofty goals.

Dianna

KageLupus

Beautifully put, that last bit, and a very good argument. I must have missed where it was stated Cat couldn't be Warlord. We will see what she becomes.

Gunslinger

Nearly missed the chapter, still not used to Monday releases. And what a chapter it was!! Fantastic stuff. Junipers oath at the end was the killer.

Also typo corrections:

goals should be gaols

Manner should be manor

All a rebellion won > All a rebellion win

Seen what you preach more > Seen that you gathering Named Were > gathering Named. Were

Author Unknown

"Is that what this has all been leading to, Catherine?" she asked, and the genuine grief in her voice tone cut me like a knife. "Recruiting Callowans. Subverting officers. Gathering Named Were you trying to ease us into treason before we ever began?"

Now Hellhound, that's just uncalled for, Cat doesn't make long term plans, or plans in general unless 'wing it' counts as a plan.

Naeddyr

Letouriste, I earlier had an amusing thought about republics and Cat. I would love poor Anaxares becoming part of the party and cynically showing off how the Power of the People Is Not Bestowed From Above and so forth to nudge her, even if just a bit, towards a republican form of Callow.

Blinks

Two thousand heavy horse, now there's an interesting thing though making use of them could prove tricky. Cat has spent most of her time as an infantry commander and utilising cavalry is it's own special set of skills never mind integrating them with the rest of her command.

Name wise i expect her to make her own.

AMC

Undead cavalry horses, anyone?

Komploding

The story seems to be set at a turning point in this worlds history, i.e. The stories about which life revolves in this world are heading into uncharted territory.

This is shown by black and Malicia taking the empire in a new direction (deviating from traditional evil), Heiress transitioning into a new name (Diabolist) and most recently by the Winter court itself. (The fair courts are said to follow grooves worn into existence since the dawn of existence itself, never deviating or halting, and yet now, Winters Duke (who is a keystone in Winters narrative) is dead and his seat of power claimed/given by/to a mortal.

This strongly points towards Cat getting a new and unprecedented name as she seems to be the main linchpin in all of these events. I find it likely that her full name will come to reflect all this, Perhaps she will become a knight and then transition yet again, after all why not something unprecedented for a new age? Maybe it will have something to do with ushering in a new age? Founder perhaps rom foundling?

She (Cat) has the true loyalty of Orcs and yet is not one, only Black has done this, the Goblins want to trade and at least interact with her (I imagine this will be expanded on in later chapters), she (Cat) is tied to the Tower, the epitome of Evil and yet is doing something morally Good (saving the people and soul of Callow), also she has been noted to look vaguely Deorithe on top of being figuratively tied to the King of Winter with a story interacting with Summer (as a bonus her paramour has summer fae blood). So to recap, she has ties to Good, Evil, Orcs and Winter. Ties to Summer, the Deorithe and the Goblins have been hinted to come/be expanded on in future.

If this isn't entirely unprecedented in this world's histories I don't know what is

I don't know what is.

Sorry for the long post, I started writing and got carried away, thoughts?

Dylan Tullos

It's important to acknowledge when you're wrong, and I was wrong.

I said that Catherine couldn't possibly convince Callow to trust her after her Praesi allies backstabbed her. I said that there was no way to recover after failing to keep your promises.

I was right to say that recovery was impossible. A Ruling Council that includes Praesi nobles is now completely impossible. But Catherine didn't try to recover, to restore the previous bargain. She escalated.

By declaring war on the Praesi nobility, Catherine is showing Callow that she's strong enough to defend her country from outside threats. By restoring a Knightly Order, she's also showing Callow that she's determined to protect her country's culture and traditions.

Callow will never be reconciled to Malicia or Black. They could never be loyal to a woman who was merely Black's apprentice. By declaring war on the Praesi nobility and resurrecting a knightly order, though, Catherine isn't acting like a puppet of the Tower. She's acting like a Queen.

Callow has a Callowan ruler right now, the Fifteenth is mostly composed of Callowans, and they're going to war with most of the Praesi nobility. If Callow is finally rid of Praesi occupation, a more lasting alliance might be possible. As long as the Praesi don't have direct control over Callowans, I think most people could live with a distant overlord.

How do you sell Callowans on the idea that there are "good" and "bad" Praesi, rather than just bad Praesi? You fight a war against the Praesi, which is always popular, and you recruit "good" Praesi to help. If they get practical independence, knightly orders, and a chance to kill lots of Praesi, I suspect that Callowans will forgive the fact that Catherine is still technically sworn to the Tower.

*sigh*

Not gonna jump to too many conclusions, but for the first time in this entire series, I'm a bit disappointed in Cat. This may have been the wrong decision to make, I fear, save for maybe the purely military level.

But then again, I start to wonder if the point of Names was deliberately to ensure that the countries are basically Names in and of themselves, deliberately engineered by the [expletive] pantheon to always be self-sustaining and push people into it (or nudge strongly)... And Cat may even have made herself Story-vulnerable by tying herself up to the fae like she did, so... I certainly wouldn't put it past this series, at any rate – she's been unwittingly caught by this exact sort of manipulation before once, after all (the incident with the Swordsman, black and the hanging rebels).

We will have to see what Malica and Black's reaction will be, and whether they will immediately scream traitor. I would really like to hope they do not, but we shall see.

Started reading this series recently.. This right here? This is a powerful chapter.. Really caught my attention. Well written and well done.

Me

Bloody hell this chapter, the end with the 'inner circle' meeting? I wanted to cry.

Martin Hrádela

The end with Juniper was really powerful. I was on the verge of tears :).

I know im late to the party but I feel this was a long way coming. The empire weakened, her gaining a new power from Winter, even if the cost is great and the hinting about the callowans hiding arms and holding grudges, the knights of callow being so heavily mentioned as well as the hints with the inner circle. It had to be a part of Blacks plan as well at least somewhat.

Cat has to have a new Name, too many things are a "pivot" at the moment. Maybe some variation of Knight. Grey, Green, Winter. But i feel it will be something else entirely. She is the protagonist in the Story of stories after all :).

Chapter 18: Crack

"Kingdoms don't die on battlefields. They die in dark, quiet rooms where deals are made between those who should know better."
– King Edward Alban of Callow, best known for annexing the Kingdom of Liesse Masego's mage tower did not even attempt to look like anything else. It was at least a hundred feet tall, for one, which was taller than some keeps I'd come across. But that alone could have been the work of masons. The moat surrounding it was a different story: twenty feet wide and circling the building, it held no water but instead pitch-black darkness. No bottom could be seen, and a few months back I'd dropped a stone to see if it would do anything. As far as I knew, it was still falling. Apprentice had been particularly cagey about telling me exactly where the Hells it led, if anywhere, but that was in part my own fault. I'd flatly forbidden him to proceed with his original notion, which had been to fill a normal moat with giant fire-breathing lizards. Not dragons, he'd been very insistent in telling me. They didn't have wings, and weren't nearly as large. But the idea of those things inevitably getting loose and either rampaging across Marchford or making a lair in one of the silver mines had led me to put my foot down.

He'd been very snippy about it.

There was a single stone arch leading across the moat to the dark iron gate in front, wide for two people at a time at most and bare of any railing. There was a reason I picked messengers that weren't faint of heart when trying to get in contact with him. I tread across carefully. The entire surface of the tower was covered in grey mosaics and leering carvings of obsidian, which he'd assured me were there for purely magical purposes. He'd thrown enough magic babble at me to justify that point that I was pretty sure that he just really liked how it looked. Being raised by a devil and a villain had let my friend to have some fairly specific tastes in architecture, sadly, which could be best described as 'nightmare trying to seem friendly and failing'. The iron gate was covered in runes, and there was no knocker. In the centre, an iron-cast wolf's head stood out from the surface and animated when I arrived. There was a devil bound inside, I knew, though Masego had tried to not say as much by referring to it as 'an entity from a secondary realm of existence'.

"A visitor," the wolf said. "Only the worthy may gain entrance here. To prove your wit, answer me this riddle—"

"Answer mine first," I replied flatly. "Who's going to find out if my punches can dent iron if they don't open right now?"

The wolf paused.

"That is now how this usually goes," it complained.

"I get that a lot," I smiled thinly.

"Your name is on the allowed list," it said. "You may enter."

There was a pause, then it added uncouth barbarian in a loud whisper. I flicked its eye out of spite even as a doorway opened on the surface, ignoring its yelp and string of curses. The lowest level of the tower was much like any entrance hall decorated by a Praesi with too much gold to waste, though there was one major difference. Namely, the winged tapir that was fleeing down the stairs with loud shrieks as a dark-skinned woman in robes ran after it. It'd been a while since I'd last seen Fadila Mbafeno. Once one of Akua's minions, I'd nearly killed her in Liesse before Masego intervened and said she was too talented a practitioner to waste. He'd extracted an oath from her to be safe she wouldn't turn, in the early days, though she'd since been freed of it. Those kinds of binding magical oaths caused some fairly vicious side-effects if allowed to linger for too long. There was a burst of blue light from the Soninke's hands and shining chains emerged from her sleeve, wrapping around the shrieking tapir and forcing its wings and feet to stop moving. She grunted in effort when dragging it back to her. I cleared my throat and had to admit I found the look of surprise and panic on her face when she realized I was here delightful.

"Fadila," I said. "Keeping busy, I see."

The winged tapir kept shrieking at the top of its lungs until she kicked it, at which point it moaned plaintively.

"Lady Squire," she said, panting. "Some of the specimens occasionally get... rowdy."

I snorted.

"First time I met Masego," I said, "he was catching a fire-breathing pig with wings."

I squinted at the tapir.

"That doesn't breathe fire, right?"

"He does not," Fadila replied, trying for poise. "Which has very interesting implications, considering the amount of sorcery he's been exposed to."

"I'm, uh, sure it does," I lied. "Masego should be expecting me."

"He's set up the scrying room on the second level," the Soninke said.

Oh, good. Then he'd found a way to get in contact with Black like I'd asked him. Apparently it was possible if we took advantage of the relay system the Empress used to receive my teacher's reports, but he'd told me piggybacking on that without killing some of the mages involved would require some finagling.

"You have fun with this abomination of nature, then," I said cheerfully, passing her by.

The tapir was licking her feet in what I gauged to be a gesture of appeasement, but she didn't seem moved by the offering. By the time I was nearing the second level the shrieking had started again. The door to the scrying room was already open, so I wasted no time in going. This wasn't the kind of place where it was healthy to wander, no matter what Apprentice insisted. The man in question was kneeling in front of a wall covered entirely by polished silver, the work so finely done it worked as a mirror. He muttered something under his breath and the silver shone for a heartbeat before dulling.

"Figured it out?" I asked.

Apprentice rose to his feet, brushing off his shoulder.

"If I shunt off enough of the Due into a dispersal ward, the weight shouldn't cascade," he told me.

"An obvious solution," I said, pretending I knew what any of that meant.

He eyed me sceptically but didn't bother to call me out.

"I can initiate the connection at any time," he said.

"Before you do that, we need a little chat," I said. "I don't want to keep you in the dark, so I'll just state it outright: I might have dabbled a bit in treason."

"Dabbled?" he said, frowning over his glasses.

"You know, dipped a toe in the treason pool," I said.

"I wish you would have told me beforehand," he replied. "Now I'll need to rework Marchford's ward pattern to be able to face advanced scrying rituals."

I cocked my head to the side.

"That's it?"

"Oh no, treason," he said in a mockingly high-pitched voice. "No villain has ever done such a thing before. All my extensive interest in Imperial politics is now put in danger."

I snorted.

"What's that voice supposed to even represent?" I asked.

"How little I care about any of this," he replied frankly. "I'm sure you'll find some compromise with Uncle Amadeus, and the Empress probably knew you were going to do this before the thought ever crossed your mind."

The bespectacled mage pressed his hand against the mirror-wall, spoke a word in the arcane tongue and idly made for the door.

"Now, if you'll excuse me," he said. "I think one of the tapirs got loose."

"Stuff like this is why you don't get to have giant fire-breathing lizards," I called out.

"You have no standards, Squire," he complained one last time before closing the door behind him.

The wall had been pulsing this entire time, but with a silvery ring an image came into focus. Pale green eyes met mine as I leaned against a table. Black's brow rose in surprise.

"Catherine," he greeted me. "Masego tapped into the relays?"

"The technicalities went over my head, but yes," I said. "Hello, Black. It's been a while."

"It has," he agreed calmly. "I expect you've a reason for this. We'll have to rebuild the entire network now – this will have sent flares for anyone looking."

"This morning," I said, "I founded a chivalric order."

The pale man did not seem particularly surprised, though it was always hard to tell with him.

"I wondered if they'd get in touch with you," he said. "I assumed they already would have, if they were ever going to."

I blinked.

"You knew there were knights in hiding?"

He seemed amused.

"I am not without Eyes, even in the south," he said. "Though I can't say this strikes me as a wise decision. Making such a bold move for a few hundred men in cavalry is inviting backlash for limited gain."

"Two thousand," I said quietly. "Likely more."

He wasn't openly shocked. He had too much control for that. But his face went blank, for a heartbeat, and that was the closest thing he'd ever show.

"I miscalculated," he said, and I could see his mind working furiously behind the calm. "No centralized organization – ah, relying on local support. Cells with no contact after the initial founding. Whoever came up with the notion is most likely dead by now. What a waste."

Only Black, I thought, would go within moments from realizing he'd been outsmarted to being saddened at the loss of such talent.

"I thought you'd be angrier," I said.

"Angry?" he mused. "You'll have folded them into the Fifteenth, if I'm not mistaken. You've obtained half a legions' worth of the finest heavy cavalry on Calernia for the Empire. Pleased would be closer to the truth, though doing this without Malicia's sanction will bring trouble."

I frowned.

"She wouldn't have given it," I said.

"Not without exacting concessions in exchange," he said. "Which you'll have to make anyway, unless you intend to wage war on the Empire."

His eyes narrowed a fraction as he studied me.

"If that is your intent, giving me prior warning was a mistake," he said.

"I don't want to fight you," I confessed. "But I don't think you'll like what I'm about to do."

"You know where I draw the line," he reminded me.

"I'm not going to oversee the eradication of my own people's culture, Black," I said.

"Then don't," the dark-haired man frowned. "I take no issue with Callowans having a way of life, only the aspects of it that threaten Imperial control."

"Imperial control is what got us here in the first place," I flatly replied.

"An independent Callow is not feasible," he said carefully. "You know this."

"I know," I said. "But if this is going to work, there's going to be a need for heads on spikes. The rot needs to be cut out or we'll be here again in five years."

"You've more immediate threats to deal with than the Wasteland," he said after a moment.

He was not disagreeing with me and it was enough to have me shiver. He'd told me, once, that after the civil war that saw Malicia crowned he'd wanted to get rid of the Wastelands' nobility. It was the Empress who'd stopped him. I wouldn't be going that far, but – he was not disagreeing with me.

"I do," I said. "But after..."

"After," he agreed softly. "When I return."

His image on the wall turned and I heard someone speak to him.

"Then block it," Black said. "Before they can-"

The mirror-wall dulled, my teacher's profile disappearing without warning and leaving only my face looking back at me. I breathed out slowly. So I wasn't burning this bridge by doing what I intended to. Relief flooded me as I closed my eyes. I stayed there for a moment, and eventually I thought back to an evening long ago, on a balcony where a storm was gathering. I'd asked Black a question, back then and I could still hear his reply like he'd just spoken it. When they get in your way? Step on them.

Of all the lessons he'd taught me, I thought, I had learned that one best.

"So are you going to tell me why you made sure I wouldn't be at that meeting?" Kilian asked.

We'd come to share a wineskin by the ruins of had once been Marchford Manor, the blackened remains swept away months ago by Pickler's sappers. Rain and wind had scattered the ashes, leaving behind only the remains of the garden and the gaggle of statues that had filled it. The two of us were seated on a scorched stone bench, its once-elaborate carvings now hidden by soot. I passed her the wineskin and watched my lover drink from the Vale summer wine. Night had just fallen, the moon slowly climbing to its apex. I hesitated for a moment, then forged on.

"I've gone against the Empress," I said.

The quarter-fae was lovely, in the shade. Her red hair had grown long enough it bordered the limit of what was acceptable by Legions regulation, framing her pale face and hazelnut eyes like a tongue of flame. Kilian set down the wineskin after a moment.

"The noble Juniper put in a cell," she finally said. "He talked you into something."

"I've been headed there, I think," I said, "since the moment I learned there was a coup in Laure."

"There will be consequences to that," the redhead softly said.

"There would be consequences to doing nothing," I replied. "I chose the ones I could live with."

She remained silent for a long time. I could feel her, now, in a way that I previously could not. The bundle of power inside of me sang out when it came closer to the smaller sister-thing inside her. I no longer needed to hear or see her to know when she was in a room.

"You've never been very good at compromise," Kilian said.

I frowned.

"I've done almost nothing but for the last two years," I replied.

"You compromise," the lovely mage said, "when the other is stronger. And you are no longer powerless."

"I'm not sure what you're saying," I admitted.

She smiled gently at me.

"Why did you not tell me with the others?" she asked.

"I thought I owed it to you for it to be just the two of us," I said.

She drank another mouthful of wine, then passed me the skin.

"Catherine," she said. "Don't lie to me."

"I'm not-"

"You didn't want me in that room," Kilian said calmly, "because if I left you over this, you didn't want it to happen in front of the others."

I very nearly denied that. But instead I took the wineskin and drank.

"The thought might have crossed my mind," I said.

"I'm not sure whether I should take that as a kindness or an insult," she murmured, looking up.

It'd been a long time since I'd last felt without so much as a speck of control over a conversation. I hadn't missed the feeling.

"When we started this," Kilian said. "I knew I'd always be third in line. Behind Callow, behind the the Fifteenth. On a good day, if duties allowed, I might wiggle up to second. But not often."

I felt my stomach knot.

"Kilian, I know we haven't spent a lot of time together lately. I've not been able to-"

She leaned into me and pressed a kiss against my shoulder.

"I'm not angry about it, Cat," she said. "I just told you, I knew that from the start. But you're leaving me behind. That's just a fact."

"I'm not," I insisted.

"I have fae blood," she said. "But you took two people into Arcadia, and I wasn't one of them."

"Kilian, it was dangerous," I said. "The kind of things I do in places like that, the kind of risks I take, they're..."

"Too much for me," she finished after I hesitated. "Because I'm weak."

"You're one of the best mages in the Fifteenth," I said.

She chuckled wearily.

"And what does that matter, when you have the Apprentice at your side?" she said.

"I don't share a bed with Masego, for one," I sharply replied.

"Is that what I'm to be remembered as, then?" Kilian said. "The girl who warmed your bed on your way to power?"

"That's not what I meant and you know it," I said. "I trust you."

Her eyes met mine.

"Then why wasn't I in that room?"

I looked away first.

"Just because I was afraid doesn't mean I don't trust you," I said. "I've told you things I've never told anyone before, Kilian."

"And I love you for that," the redhead smiled. "Even though it's stupid and dangerous and it might just get me killed."

The rush that came with her saying those words had never dimmed and I gloried in it for a moment. But then the smile went away.

"But now I think of the conversation you had with them, earlier," she said. "And I know you made a decision. You needed to convince all of them, and there was a risk I could distract from that effort. So you made the call."

She sighed.

"You know, I think the better part of everyone you love in this world was in that room," she mused. "And you manipulated them anyway. I don't believe you had that in you, when we first met."

You're wrong, I thought. I'd just never had a reason to use it.

"I'm glad you do now," she murmured. "We'll need it to survive the coming months. But I have to think of myself too."

"I thought you were happy," I murmured. "With us, with-"

Me, I left unsaid.

"I am," she said, laying a hand on my cheek. "But you're leaving me behind, Cat. And the kind of things I would have to do to catch up would end us anyway."

"I don't believe that," I said.

"As long as I don't control my blood," she said, "My magic is shackled."

"Masego could find a way," I said.

"He already has," she replied. "It's an old ritual. It requires sacrifice, and would make me as a full-fledged fae."

"Kilian, I'd put half of Winter on an altar if it helped you," I honestly said.

"It would require humans as a stabilizing element," she added quietly.

My heart skipped a beat.

"You can't seriously be considering that," I said.

"It could all be done lawfully," she said. "It would be costly to buy the death row prisoners, but demand has lessened and I've the funds for it."

"It's not about the law," I hissed. "It's about decency. They're people, not things."

The redhead chuckled softly.

"You can take the girl out of Callow," she said. "But not Callow out of the girl."

"You're Duni," I said.

As good as Callowan, in most Wastelanders' eyes.

"They make that distinction, not me," Kilian said, tone hardening as she withdrew her hand. "I am Praesi, Catherine. It's not any more a crime for me to love my home than you yours."

"This isn't about where we're from," I replied, aghast. "It's about human sacrifice."

"And how many of us will die so you can make what you want out of Callow?" she said tiredly. "I don't see much of a difference. At least it's strangers I would be using."

"There is," I started, but stopped when she lay a hand on my shoulder.

"I don't want to have this fight, Cat," she said. "If I did I would have brought up the notion when I first learned of it. I'll just say this: if there's anyone who should be able to understand how hateful it is to have a yoke around your neck, it's you. To just be... less than you could be."

"There's lines you can't uncross," I said.

"And how many of those have you left behind?" she replied quietly, rising to her feet.

My stomach dropped.

"That's it?" I said. "Just like that you're leaving me?"

Because I won't condone bleeding people like animals, I bit down on. Kilian's face was hard to read in the dark, but there was no joy on it.

"No," she finally said. "But I need to think. About what compromises I'm willing to make to make you happy."

She passed a hand through her hair.

"I'll be sleeping in the barracks from now on," Kilian said. "Take care of yourself, Catherine. It only gets harder from here."

I watched her walk away in silence, and kept watching long after she was gone. Eventually I looked up at the moon, and wondered if I was even still capable of crying.

xacual

I wish I could say I was surprised that this happened, but I'm really not. Cat has some really big hypocrisy in her that she's willing to do harsh, even terrible things herself, but she doesn't like the idea of Kilian doing the same. I mean, is this really any different than her sending Robber after any of Akua's people? You could say Robber was killing enemy combatants, but death row prisoners are going to get killed anyway. So be practical Cat! Let them have some use before they're gutted anyway.

Personally I'm more interested in the aftermath of that ritual. If Kilian becomes a Fae, which I said in a previous comment before would probably be a Summer court one, it will create an interesting story of the “star-crossed love of a Summer Court Fae and a Winter Court Noble”.

Something like that anyway. I just want to see Kilian get a Name of some kind to be honest.

xacual

I realized something after rereading the last few chapters but Cat here is denying Praesi culture. Praesi culture has always used human sacrifice as an acceptable means to an end. We learned a while ago that every Praesi city does a ritual every year to make sure the little arable land they have near the city is usable. To Praesi, a human sacrifice is nothing astounding. I'm sure if she had brought it up with any of the officers, they'd wonder why she was making a big deal about it.

So what I'm saying is that, if Cat really is serious about what she's doing, she's going to need to reconcile Praesi's culture with Callow's even if it means she might have to accept some practices she doesn't like.

JackbeThimble

Not necessarily, part of having a truly federal system is that you don't always have to live side-by-side with people you don't like. It's entirely possible to get human sacrifice banned in Callow while it remains legal in Praes. It's also worth keeping in mind that the main reason human sacrifice was so common in Praes was that it was necessary to grow food. Now that they essentially have a free-trade zone with Callow this will become less and less necessary and human sacrifice may become less common or disappear altogether through simple economic forces.

xacual

I don't know. I mean there's a ways to make human sacrifice more 'ethical' without abolishing it entirely. Like offer prisoners the chance to take part in a ritual, but in exchange their families will receive some money or things along that nature. Plus I mean that's only one example of human sacrifice magic that we know of. I'm sure there are tons of other good and bad examples.

I just can't help but see Cat as being hypocritical about it since she really has no claim to any kind of moral high ground after she had some guy's soul ripped out of his body.

Mental Mouse

Cat never liked human sacrifice, even when it was used to save her own life.

usernamesbco

She's okay with executing people, but not using their deaths for something practical? Still sounds like hypocrisy to me.

corrado alamanni

Killing for retribution is different than killing for convenience.

Like killing a murderer or also eating a murderer to not waste the meat

Cpt. Obvious

Yet she is well aware that both goblins and orcs consider eating an enemy perfectly normal. Hakram even has a thing for eyeballs, raw...

Levi Kalden

I think she has a problem with putting their lives above her own in a fashion of killing them so she can live or even just for convenience. It's not quite logical but Moral never is

Jago

And the "star-crossed love of a Summer Court Fae and a Winter Court Noble" tale was one of those Hakram and Cat used to spin their tale in the Winter court.

I suspect it will go that way, and it will be (or at least try to be) a tragedy.

Maybe Cat will be able to subvert it.

stevenneiman

I think part of it is that she viewed Kilian as a wholesome escape from the ugly choices her life had become filled with, and even if it was a tiny thing compared to the choices she's chosen for other people to pay herself, seeing Kilian forced to make such a choice ruined that. It's not fair, or reasonable, or rational, but that's just how emotions are.

corrado alamanni

The first step toward the tower

vietnamabc

And we got the first couple fight. Dunno why we need specific human sacrifice, I thought it would be something like Name Dream, something you chose for yourself ala Dresden Files' changelings.

RandomFan

Fae are higher on the chain of power than humans. Magic seems to require a name to get power quickly, or earning power. The fastest way to do the latter is sacrifice, I regret to inform you. The most cost-efficient sacrifice seems to be humans, though other stuff is more effective apparently.

nipi

In the last chapter we learned that fae are a much more efficient sacrifice than humans though.

jonnney

I'm guessing the fact that human sacrifices yield less power is the reason human sacrifices are needed along with fae sacrifices. The energy released from a human sacrifice is a known quantity while the energy from the fae sacrifice would be hard to predict. With such a complex ritual there needs to be a few known constants to balance against the many other variables.

agumentic

Huh. Well, I never felt like that particular relationship was built to last, so not really surprising. Would be a pleasant surprise if it works out though. I also don't really think there's anything wrong with sacrificing death row inmates, but I see how arguments could be made against it.

Jackbethimble

If you're gonna have a death row you might as well make use of it right. More controversial would be sacrificing the terminally ill (in exchange for an agreed-upon payment to next of kin of course)

nipi

Unless ofcourse the sacrificing affects the souls of those being sacrificed.

JackbeThimble

As far as we know there's no way to determine whether souls even exist after death unless they're captured somehow, so whether that happens would mostly be a matter of religious belief.

nipi

Pretty sure the people in the story know souls exist. Cat having a piece of her soul cut out, Masego saying he isn't using all of his soul anyway, former emperors becoming wraiths after their death, the existence of Hells, etc.

JackbeThimble

Word of god says no one knows what happens to souls after death.

stevenneiman

The issue might be something about a slippery slope. If it's OK to profit from killing death row inmates, then whether or not she does it deliberately the supply of sacrifices is going to be a part of her decisions about laws and punishments. That means that if she allows it at all, there's at least a risk that it will mean killing people specifically to provide a power supply.

JackbeThimble

She could just ask Killian to go back to Praes for a weekend to get her sacrifices.

Soronel Haetir

I am more than a bit surprised that Cat is so against using prisoners for this. I could have easily seen her balking at specific individuals but not at the process itself.

sheer_falacy

Remember how she reacted way back, after her first fight with the Lone Swordsman. Some prisoners were killed to keep her alive, and she was unhappy with it. Some of that was her name being unhappy with her "redemption arc", but some of it was just her. It's a somewhat odd moral for her to have since she's certainly done worse things, but it is consistently a moral that she has.

Soronel Haetir

Okay, I was mixing two episodes that were temporally close: Cat's queasiness with executions being used to personally help her (being healed after the squire-claiming fight) and her outright anger at the time over the executions of the traitors. A large part of the latter was Name-driven and once Cat realized that she was even more pissed about her head being messed with than she had been with the hangings. I was sort of mentally bleeding my expectation of her reaction to a repeat of the hangings over onto the healing.

nipi

Its a strong callowan moral taboo she is displaying. She has struggled with the fear of becoming praesi instead of being callowan. Im not surprised at all.

Hakurei06

I'm reminded of the verse of a song...

They say the third step is the cruelest
Walk when the moon is at her clearest:
Love ends with the kiss of the knife,
Trust is the wager that takes your life

Gods know how the rest of that went, anyway.

lennymaster

Does anybody remember in wich chapter that song was identified as "The girl that climbs the tower"? I think it was the one in wich she had the Talk with Hakram, but I cannot be shure.

Bob

Chapter 49:Triumph. Book 2.

The Archdevil

It was a meeting with Black. He was reciting it, I believe, when she came out of the bath.

nineran

I'm fairly certain it was later removed.

danh3107

I uh, don't have a witty comment to make here. This just kinda sucks for Cat.

Voice of Reason

Honestly, I hope they break up. Though I love this story, I've never really liked this romance with Killian.

letouriste

really? they were pretty nice together;) personally,i think they will come back together later.

stevenneiman

I thought that they were a cute couple, and that their relationship was as well-written as the story in general. My one worry is that the reason that it went so well before was because relationship problems and assassinated lovers are hero business, and now suddenly she's having relationship problems as a result of thinking like a hero, which means that her story might be weakening. Fae powers and a new cavalry division notwithstanding, this is not a good time to lose the advantage that her strong story has afforded her in the past.

Eve

Personally, I never enjoyed the relationship. The fact is, Killian, kind of didn't have much of a personality. "She was hot when she was mad." Otherwise, she was pretty much just there to be there, and be a girl who was in a relationship with Cat.

You literally can't even try to describe her personality beyond that much. Maybe their relationship was written alright but it wasn't interesting personally, since it just went through the motions of an relationship and didn't seem to amount to anything.

I hoped it wouldn't come to a fridging situation because Killian deserves that much. But I really wanted them to break up eventually. Organic relationship progression.

This is ideal for me, because frankly, this makes her more interesting, and I would prefer a clean break as compared to drama over and over again. Fingers crossed.

beleester

I think making the hero tropes work for her has turned out pretty well so far. Aside from the whole business with the Sword in the Stone, Cat is very focused on protecting civilians in her territory against anyone who threatens them, hero or villain. That's when the narrative (and the audience) has been most on her side.

If anything, I'd read it the opposite way – the fact that she's having relationship problems is an indication that her hero story is still going strong.

Jackbethimble

I think Archer's getting some very memorable drunk texts tonight.

Jonnnney

Let's hope they can come to a compromise and sacrifice Praesi nobility instead of prisoners.

letouriste

akua have some in liesse right? i remember a little whisper cat gave to her last book;) if this is enemy i think cat can deal with this

letouriste

what a big death flag:o now i can easily imagining their story finishing in blood,killian blood.

btw,killian fae side is related to summer or winter? i thought that was summer but this chapter made me doubt about that.

H.

She calls down lightning, which I think would be Summer? I don't really know.

nipi

Hint: redhead

nipi

Her bloodline was also somewhat fire resistant if Im not mistaken.

JackbeThimble

Nipi I think you're thinking of Aisha

xacual

If you go back to volume 1 where she goes all overboard with magic, her hair went fire looking and her eyes turned bright green.

Jonnnney

Remember the spring and fall are also options.

---

Dread Emperor Obvious to the rescue! Black mentioned that her grandmother rode with the Wild Hunt, which comes from Winter. Lightning is a standard spell, fiery hair is more likely to be a "fae Courts are states of mind" thing.

Also, will she have to lock herself into a story, bow to a Court, or shorten her lifespan to that of an average fae's while in Creation?

JackbeThimble

Where was it stated that the Wild Hunt ran with winter? (Not saying it wasn't, I just don't remember it).

æw3

As sad as I am for cat, I can't help but agree with Killian.

Vamair

I wish they go on with that ritual. Not just declining seems a bit like hypocrisy, but also now that Catherine is considered a Winter Fae and Killian is supposed to be a Summer one, things are going to get even more interesting.

nipi

Somehow I think the Winter King knew about Kilians fae bloodline. Might be an important bit in his grand scheme. Leading Cat to create a new story that he desires?

danh3107

Thinking about it again, this is basically a perfect chance for Archer to get in Cat's pants.

kinigget

Killian is right, of course. Cat's never been very good about compromising her principles, and this is a big one

But here's the thing though: not only would it let Killian "catch up" and once again make her an equal partner in their relationship, it would give the 15th their very own Summer fae, and while that might clash with Cat's new Winter nature, it would leave then in a decidedly stronger position over all

Cat has always prided herself on her pragmatism, but this is a core value, the kind of line that can not be crossed lightly

Of all the things she's done that she can't take back, this might just be the hardest

Kilimandaros

They could never be truly equal partners in their relationship. No matter how strong Killian becomes she still will be Catherine's subordinate. Killian is professional soldier and while becoming Named probably allows to relinquish the duty, I really doubt that even Legions have regulations about status of soldier who transcendent humanity to become full-blooded Fae. Even if she were to become Named (which is doubtful if she was to become full-fledged Fae, not to mention her redundancy with Masego), she still has no way to attain Catherine's status. Of course it's all under condition that equality in relationship is desired outcome and it's based on their personal power/status.

kinigget

True as far as it goes, but this is all about power, and becoming full Summer Fae would erase a huge chunk of the distance between them

Killian is feeling powerless and useless, this would help *her* feel like she has an actual purpose again

Mental Mouse

It has been mentioned that the Praesi generals include both a dragon and a vampire.

NerfContessa

Exactly.

Honestly, cat even in the recent Ost chapter you haven't done something 2ith that... Dissappointting, small but still.

Shequi

Wow, hell of a mood whiplash between the first half of this chapter and the second, ee.

Luis

I think the problem is human sacrifice has meaning in this world. It's not just blood and bone you use up but maybe a human soul.

What makes human sacrifice and demonic taint so abhorrent is that irrevocably alters or destroys the soul.

You can kill a man or torture him and you will be a monster with a little M, you start trafficking with demons, and human sacrifice and you move on to big M territory especially for something as transient and mundane as power.

Duckie

Now the question is, if she does go threw with it and become a real fae... If she is indeed Summer like the most obvious sign points too. Will the fact that Summer and Winter don't mix well together in general cause them to fight... Or will their star crossed love be what ends the war story between the two sides? It's not an unheard of tale of such love ending wars after all.

vietnamabc

So the twist is Kilian became Summer nobility and their marriage will join the two court?

JackbeThimble

Archer: Hey squire, how's it going?

Squire: Someone tore my heart out of my chest and replaced it with a ball of ice. Oh and also my girlfriend left me.

Archer: So... you're single now?

Dianna

So anyone else get a feeling of impending doom when Black said: "When I get back"?

That just feels like the sort of thing people Who Aren't Coming Back say. Good luck Cat, because without him, some tell me you will end up fighting his precious Alli.

Dianna

*Something Tells me* 🤪

The Warren Peace NFL Report

I actually like it better the first way

---

Yeah, especially after that interruption. Someone tracked his connection, which either means someone was listening in (heroes or nobles, the latter possibility more worrying) which means an outside party knows about Broken Bells (and I'm still astonished nobody made an emasculation joke yet); or given the "Then block it, before they can-" bit, it's more likely someone's been scrying on the Calamities, which means the heroes are on their doorstep. Alternatively, Cat mentioned that it's not advised to scry close to the Waning Woods, since the Wild Hunt can pull a Candyman and pop out of the scrying bowl, and the connection between Marchford and Nicae went straight over that forest.

Morgenstern

Not really. I actually got a rather sinister foreboding sense of enjoyment about the "When I get back". People say that all the time. The ones that don't AS WELL as the ones that DO. My personal sinister-ly joy was about the thought of either of them finally getting what both want. Getting rid of the darn backstabbing Praesi nobles like Black wanted to do from the start. In my mental picture for that split second, he was somehow someone Cat gave the free pass to do so ^^ Instead of him sending her... One or the other way, I'd be rather disappointed if HE died so soon. As I said somewhere else, it's time for Warlock. But not Black. At least not yet. Because Cat is getting there, but not there yet, so we'd have an audience's darling hole, which can be even worse than any plothole.

Morgenstern

sinister* (momentary) joy

The stuff that happens to your grammar, if you think of two versions of the sentence at the same time... duh. -.-

Morgenstern

But yeah, I guess this author might just pull off even that without killing the mood. 😊 So I'm more or less up for anything, but still keeping my fingers crossed for Black, because I like him so, so, SO much. ^^°

taborask

I'm surprised Cat being Winter nobility now hasn't come up in the last 3 chapters. You'd think she'd have mentioned it to somebody at least, like, once

kgyl21

"Being raised by a devil and a villain had let my friend" ^led^

"That is now how this usually goes,"
^not^

Kadath

Also, point of order: Cat was gone for 3 fuckin months, comes back with a chunk of Killian's Arcadian opposite lodged in her, and expects Killian to just roll over and be a comfort woman. I'm not exactly surprised this is how it turned out, given that Cat's more emotionally intimate with Apprentice than her own girlfriend lately.

Phantom

Cat keeps call and see herself as a willing villain in the past, and yet now she denies something she had already done a lot of times, killing others for her goals.

That seemed so contradictory, I hope it is not going to advance forward as a gaping plothole in the future

Tyson Tiatia \(Imagination\)

"You can take the girl out of Callow," she said. "But not Callow out of the girl."

Callow is, fundamentally, one of the 'Good' nations. In a world where people (collectively, not individually) are explicitly divided into Good and Evil, there will inevitably be differences in culture and values that seem hypocritical or odd from an outside perspective.

To the Praesi, human sacrifice is just another thing that's done. It's practical, effective, readily available (if expensive) and so is judged in terms of cost-to-benefit. If a Praesi is arguing against human sacrifice, they're likely to be arguing based on the cost, the efficacy, or the trouble of going through the process. They'll never use the argument, "Because it's wrong."

The Callowans have the opposite view. "Human sacrifice is evil." This is a statement which is presumed to be intrinsically true. There is no situation where this statement is not considered to be true. Evil is Evil is Evil; it's a tautology. Callowans are Good, therefore Evil is bad, Human sacrifice is Evil, therefore human sacrifice is bad.

Our dear Squire may be a Villain, and she may have sided with the forces of Evil. When she considers her actions objectively (or as close as she gets to it) she states that she is a Villain, and her actions certainly support that.

But if you look at her whole mentality, she really embodies a well-known saying: She may be Evil, but she hasn't internalised Evil; She's a villain, but deep down she's still thinking of herself as the hero of the story (of Callow).

tl;dr – Cat's central character arc is that she is an Evil Villain with Good values and a Heroic mindset. This is one of the glaring examples of that inner conflict in action.

Blinks

Because stories are important, how you and others see you are important in our world but far more so in this one. Heiress shifting herself over to Diabolist shows this better than anything else.

Human sacrifice isn't just a matter of principles or simply a minor line to cross. She's killed people before, they were going to die anyway, it's for the best. Those are excuses in a world where good and evil are legitimate and actual forces. It's another step down a very very dark road and while Black and the Empress show it's possible to do so and not devolve into cackling loonacy their sheer effectiveness shows just how rare that is.

CorpseMoney

The whole thing with Killian was tiresome to me from the beginning, all the references to their relationship. Stereotypical strong black lesbian bored the fk out of me, i like villains which is why i read the story. yasss get more cold, and ruthless, fk love, and feelings.

TheTowerRemains

Neither of them are black, Catherine is callowan and as referenced here Killian is Duni, or a pale skinned praesi from the callowan border.

---

Catherine is Deoraithe, who are black totally-not-Irish with a grudge against elves. I agree that it still doesn't make Cat "stereotypical strong black lesbian", but some stuff like gender not being a thing in Helike or the male-to-female ratio in militaries (or is this a universe where a gap in physical strength between unNamed men and women doesn't exist? Nothing else indicates that, but still) feel tumblr-ish. Not in ideological sense, I just feel that there must have been more organic way to work all that into the descriptions, or just to be more subtle and trust readers not to be idiots and connect the dots themselves. Then again, most stories that make a point out of it do it more hamfistedly, so maybe that's just me enforcing the oppressive culture or whatever.

Eve

Oh boy, this is a little... I have problems with their relationship but neither of them are black, not that it would matter.

My own issue is with Killian's personality, and how little she interested me personally. If you have a critique at least try to make sure you're basing it on actual parts of the canon.

Blinks

Killian is basically the "oh yeah, the girlfriend, i forgot about her".

She doesn't really register all that much.

Basically she's Cat's introduction to evil before she goes all in and starts making out with Diabolist.

Shawn Panzegraf

I wish this had been framed with Killian taking the initiative. Rather than Killian deciding to go through with the ritual and that defaulting to being the end of her and Cat, or not going through with it to make Cat happy, I would've liked to see something like this:

Killian: I know how you feel about human sacrifice Cat. Just like you know I do NOT feel the same way about it as you do. I've told you I'm tired of being less than I could be, and anyways if I keep settling for less the process of you leaving me behind simply continues. So, rather than asking me if I'm leaving you, you need to ask yourself whether you're leaving me if I go through with this. I'm having a very hard time with you placing more value on the lives of convicted murderers than on us, so until you've answered that question we need to be apart.

All through the conversation Killian is laying out the reasons she feels strongly about this. It felt like Cat didn't listen to anything except the morally debatable point of human sacrifice. (Which, for the LIFE OF ME, I cannot understand why she would kick up such a fuss when the sacrificees are *already* condemned to die. If this were a question of Killian being responsible for taking lives that otherwise would not be taken, this would be a more valid debate. What Cat is essentially saying is "It's better to get absolutely no benefit from ending the lives of killers" and calling that being anti-human sacrifice.

Cat is so gung-ho to preserve Callowan culture. Telling Black to his face she won't oversee the eradication of HER culture. Yet she offers none of the respect for Praesi cultural mores that she wants the Praesi to demonstrate toward Callowan sensibilities. The hypocrisy, as others have said, is a bit thick.

Personally I'm dearly hoping Killian just goes ahead and does it. It's easy to say you'll cut off someone you love for doing something you're against. Harder to do, especially when what you're against isn't something traditionally bad for a relationship. Like cheating etc etc.

ArkhCthuul

Well, nthatnwent downhill fast, as expected. Though I did hope someone would bring up l cats new nature, maybe even herself.

Isn't it possible that swearing fealty to a high ranked Noble would be enough to make Killeen far?

Cat is a Duchess after all, mayhap THE Duchess....

arancaytar

The ship! 😞 😞 😞

arancaytar

Isn't Kilian related to Summer?

Not that Cat expected to go there when she originally set out, but in that case wouldn't it have been a spectacularly bad idea to take her into the Winter court?

glassgirlceci

No 😞 kind of pissed at Cat for being so hard-headed right now. I was afraid this would happen...

Cestarian

Aww poor Catherine, she's such a freakin hypocrite tho. She did fuck up by not having Kilian in the room when she told everybody about her treason though, must be regretting that a whole lot right now.

I wonder what effects it'll have on her though, Kilian has always been her anchor to sanity, the only shoulder she trusts enough to lean on. Losing that, and at such a desperate time, it would break most people...

But at the same time, I don't think she wants Kilian to become a fae, that thought probably scares her a lot more than the idea of her using a sacrifice to do it. She'd be an incredible boon to the fifteenth as a fae, almost a rival to apprentice even. But Fae have a reputation for not living very long when they're in creation if I recall correctly. It's what would scare me the most anyhow.

Aotrs Commander

Well, Faith (mostly) restored, since the first thing Cat did was go tell Black. And Black reacted in the way I really wanted him to; rationally.

(Why I try not to rush to judgement...)

But, Cat... Duck, you are pretty much going to go and execute a load of people right next. Why in the merry hells are you taking objection to that sort of thing serving more than ONE purpose? Practical Evil is your whole schtick.

I mean, ye gods, it's not like that a large percentage of your army literally eat the corpses of your enemies or anything. You are, frankly, being a bit of a hypocrite, and a little bit arrogant and now I'm more worried than ever that the fae-ening has had some really bad effects no-one has realised.

Gobbler

So, you can cause the death of thousands for your ambitions but she can't kill a few death row prisoners to fix herself? What a hypocrite.

vuthuha912

Well. Black should be thinking about trying to build a cavalry force in Praes right now or I would be very disappointed. Come on. Genetics alters the horse so they can survive in Praes' s environment, borrowing some trainers or transferring some legionaries to Callow to learn about cavalry would be great. May be designated some areas for breeding and taking care of the new horse breeds.

I wonder what was stopping him from experimenting on horses since he obviously can buy one. Camel cavalry should be a great counter to horse cavalry since camels can survive in the desert. Maybe, we can create a camel through magic genetic altering somehow. You make man-eating tapirs but not magic desert horses?? Praes is weird.

Does Black have a sort of PTSD with magic animals due to the sentient tiger army and man-eating tapirs business? If Black and Warlock are trying to create camels while those camels turn out horribly? Maybe fate is stopping Praes from getting its own cavalry forces. I wonder if the DE's previous attempts at magic animals have turned the story into a complete death trap for future villains.

Chapter 19: Order (Redux)

"In the aftermath of a rebellion do not execute merely those who rebelled. Remove those that remained uncommitted as well, for any power not bound to you is a threat."

– Extract from the personal journals of Dread Emperor Terribilis II

The gate opened into Fairfax Square.

A year ago, this plaza had been filled to the brim with people come from all over the north of Callow to see the Empress bestow her rewards upon the victors of the Liesse Rebellion. Now? It was night-empty, though that had as much to do with the hour of the night as Laure's recent... troubles. I'd thought about trying to open the portal directly into the Whitestone, since it was much closer to the palace, but ultimately decided against it. Even after experimenting with the power under Masego's guidance it was still a roll of the dice where I'd carve a way out into Creation: better to take the widest place I knew in the capital and limit the risks. As for the time, well, it was much easier for me to open gates when it was dark out. My title in Winter likely had something to do with it. Not that even darkness seemed to affect the hard limit I'd found to my power: I could only open a portal once a day before my body began to revolt against the amount of fae power coursing through my veins.

Pushing myself to a second opening had hurt enough I'd not tried for a third. Having most liquid in my body freeze might very well have killed me, if not for the healing power I'd stolen from a hero and Apprentice's immediate and panicked help. The coming of dawn seemed to wipe away the slate when it came to fae sorcery in my body, for some arcane reason, which was my most promising lead around the limitations so far. But given how dangerous toying with this power had turned out to be I was much more inclined to let Masego run the calculations in his tower than try more direct experimental methods. What I'd stolen in Winter, I had been forced to admit, was not without limits. No matter. It was still a massive advantage over all my opponents. Zombie the Second's hooves clacked against the stone as I emerged first from Arcadia into the deserted heart of Laure. Legionaries followed in good order, their armour touched with frost even with the furs they wore over it.

"Three days," Nauk said, striding to my side as his soldiers spread out. "Three days, Catherine."

My horse stirred uneasily as the presence of an orc so close, but I stroked his neck until he calmed. Even mounts raised with greenskins never got entirely accustomed to them: there was just something wrong about the way orcs smelled, apparently. Considering that anything that moved qualified as meat for the cookpots, according to the Clans, I couldn't really blame them.

"I don't think all our crossings will be so uneventful," I replied.

"I don't care if we have to fight a running battle every time," he laughed. "It was a month and half's journey, if we marched my people halfway to the grave. The Fifteenth's the fastest army in Creation now. Hells, we barely even need a supply train."

"The fastest inside the Empire, maybe," I said. "I wouldn't try to portal anywhere I haven't been before."

"The warlock's get said he'd be able to run the numbers for it," the orc legate said.

"Masego was raised by a vicious creature of pure Evil and also a devil," I said. "His definition of safe is a little skewed. I'm not using his model unless we get really desperate."

"So in a few months, then," Robber grinned.

I'd heard the goblin approach, for once. I was getting used to his skulking.

"You never know," I sighed. "We could get through a single year without drowning in the deep end."

"Just wouldn't be the Fifteenth if it we were fighting battles we're supposed to win," Nauk contributed.

That was so sadly true I didn't bother to deny it.

"Hakram?" I asked the Special Tribune.

"With the rear guard," he replied. "We've had some curious little bastards coming closer."

I grimaced. While no Winter fae had made contact my sentries had reported silhouettes in the distance keeping an eye on us. I doubted any of the big ones would bother to come in person, but until I knew whose underlings those scouts were I'd have to tread carefully. I might be a Duchess but I was a Duchess of Winter. As usual, the side I'd ended up on was the one known for vicious infighting. I watched the legionaries move into a defensive formation across Fairfax Square and drummed my fingers against my saddle.

"Robber," I said. "Hunt me some rats. I want anyone aligned with a Dark Guild in my city in custody, and soon."

The goblin's eyes glinted malevolently in the dark.

"And if they don't want to come along?" he asked.

"You're operating under my authority," I replied. "Use whatever means you deem necessary."

The chuckling sound he made was so unpleasant it should have counted as a crime.

"You'll have them by sunup, Boss," he said, saluting so sloppily I barely recognized the gesture.

He whistled sharply as he trotted off, his merry pack of killers popping out from the ranks to assemble around him. They looked like ugly green imps, I thought as I watched them, but they acted more like a pack of wolves – clustering around the nastiest among them, eager to sink their teeth into something.

"General Orim will have the city under martial law," Nauk said. "That means patrols in the street."

"Adjutant will be handling the Fifth," I grunted.

In part because of all the men I had with me I trusted Hakram the most not to get into a pissing match with another legion, in part because he was the Adjutant. The importance of Hakram being the first orc Named in centuries had been piled on over by the messes we kept getting ourselves in, but it was no small thing. His kind looked at him with something like a worship, an old dream given new flesh. Orim the Grim was an orc of the Lesser Steppes: by my estimation, being faced with an orc with a Name instead of a Callowan girl with the skin tone of the enemy he'd spent half his life fighting would make him more apt to listen. My few past conversations with the man had been stilted, if polite, so there was no relationship to call on from my side. It was coming to regret, these days, that I'd not cultivated closer ties with the generals and marshals that served in Callowan territory. Having a better idea of the kind of people they were would have been useful in planning my actions.

The Gallowborne were the last to leave Arcadia and immediately they closed ranks around me. Tribune Farrier cast wary eyes around us, seeking out danger in the shadows. His inability to follow me in Arcadia had made him even more stubborn about my being accompanied at all times, which I hadn't thought was actually physically possible. Getting him to close the rear guard had been like pulling out nails with my teeth. Hakram took the tenth that I'd put under his direct command years ago – Sergeant Tordis' men, though she was now a Lieutenant – and after offering me a nod from a distance headed west through the streets. The largest barracks in the city were close to the wall there, and that would be where General Orim had his headquarters. Hopefully he'd manage to handle that situation before it became a problem. I was, after all suddenly dumping almost two and a half thousand soldiers into a boiling pot that had already tipped over several times.

"Royal Palace?" Nauk said.

I nodded.

"Pass word down to your people," I said. "If they see any Praesi in this city that are not part of the Fifth, they are to put them under arrest."

"They won't like that," the broad orc said.

They weren't meant to.

"They get one chance to surrender peacefully," I said mildly. "If they resist? Kill them."

The legate grinned.

"Aye," he gravelled. "That we will."

Nauk's kabili of two thousand split into five groups of two cohorts, marching down the major avenues leading up to the Whitestone. The full cohort of Gallowborne remained around me as we took the centre of the formation with my legate's own four hundred in front of us. It wasn't long before we started getting attention. People peeked at us through shuttered windows, still too afraid to break curfew to come out. It was hard to read the mood of a city in the middle of the night, but fear was what I was getting. With the fake Ruling Council and the Fifth Legion openly at each other's throats, that was more than understandable. We encountered our first patrol a quarter hour in – drawn by ripples we were causing in the city, a pair of lines from the Fifth came to see what was happening. They ran into the leftmost wing of our formation but were sent straight to me for an explanation. The Soninke lieutenant in charge saluted hastily when she realized who she was dealing with.

"Ma'am," she greeted me. "Lieutenant Tomuka, Fifth Legion."

"Lieutenant," I replied pleasantly. "You may continue with your duties, though I believe you'll be recalled to the barracks soon. The Fifteenth is taking over."

"We, uh, weren't aware you were going to be coming, ma'am," the Soninke said. "Our scouting lines didn't report a force headed for the capital."

"They wouldn't have," I simply said. "Before you return to your patrol, I have a few questions for you."

"I'm at your disposal," she grimaced.

"The usurpers in the Royal Palace," I said. "How many men do they have at their disposal?"

"Five hundred, by our latest estimate," the lieutenant said. "They've barricaded upper Whitestone and forbid access to even legionaries."

I raised an eyebrow.

"And General Orim has allowed this?"

"The general says as long as they're holed up in the palace we won't have to put down any more riots," she replied frankly. "It's not worth making an issue about."

I leaned back on my saddle.

"Only five hundred, Nauk," I called out. "We go in hard."

Loud orcish laughter was my only response. I glanced down at the uneasy lieutenant.

"I'd suggest sending a runner to any patrols in the area," I told her. "Wouldn't want anybody caught in the crossfire."

"I'll kick that up the ladder, ma'am," the Soninke said noncommittally.

Oh well. It didn't particularly mind an audience, truth be told. It might remind General Orim exactly who he was dealing with, when we sat down to have a little chat.

"Dismissed, Lieutenant Tomuka," I said, spurring Zombie the Second ahead.

A single line of Gallowborne broke from formation to follow me as I headed for my legate. Even when surrounded by other legionaries they didn't feel I was quite protected enough, evidently. Nauk was in hushed conversation with one of his officers, a Taghreb with the marks of a commander on her armour.

"Nauk," I said, interrupting him. "Scout reports."

The orc turned to me after clasping his second-in-command on the shoulder.

"Three barricades," he said. "About a hundred people on each. We're assuming the rest will be inside the palace."

I hummed. It would be smarter to wait until we had some flanking positions before making an assault, but I wanted this done with as quickly as possible. These people were too unimportant for me to be able to spare much effort on them. I doubted the enemy had anything in their employ that would be able to handle an assault by legionaries, anyway.

"I'll take the central one with the Gallowborne," I said. "Staggered hit on the other two."

"You're hogging the good stuff, Cat," the orc complained.

"Well, this ought to make up for it," I said, "If they don't surrender, Legate, I want you to make a point."

"We flagging them as not citizens, then?" he pressed eagerly.

By Legion regulations, Imperial citizens – even those in rebellion – could not have their corpses eaten after death, unless their will specifically stated otherwise. Even at the height of the Liesse Rebellion, the people who'd taken up arms had qualified as citizens. The Tower, after all, claimed all of Callow as its own.

"By my authority as the acting head of the Ruling Council, I strip any hostile forces inside Laure of their citizenship," I replied after a moment.

That was a way to get my point across, sure enough. Corpses with their faces chewed off and missing limbs might well appal most of the city, but it would send a message to the High Lords: fuck with Callow under my watch and I'll take the gloves off. It was about time they started catching up to that truth. The Taghreb commander paled at my words, but she knew better than to comment. I glanced at Tribune Farrier.

"Muster your men, John," I ordered. "We're taking the lead."

"Gladly, Countess," he said, a hard look on his face.

Farrier had never thought much of Praes, and though he'd come to have a rough sort of camaraderie with the men and women of the Fifteenth his opinion of the Empire at large had taken a sharp nosedive when news of what had happened in Laure spread. He'd made it abundantly clear in the past that he followed me, not the Tower, and he'd not changed that stance by an inch in the months since that declaration. Nauk's cohort split to allow us passage and I led my personal retinue forward at a brisk pace. It wasn't long before we entered the pale facades and sprawling gardens of the Whitestone, and from there it was only a matter of time before we ran into the barricade.

The Ruling Council's hirelings had picked a good spot. I'd give them that much. They'd propped up crates and carts between an iron fence surrounding a garden and the high wall of what must have once been a noble's compound. The avenue was narrower than most, and I could see from atop Zombie that even at this hour the barricade bristled with pikes and crossbowmen. The latter of those weapons was as clear an indication of the origin of the soldiers as the skin colours I could discern in the dark: Callowans and most other Calernian nations fielded bows, not crossbows. And certainly not the lever-action crossbows whose designs were the work of the goblins of Foramen's Imperial Forges. Household troops, then. Not mercenary pushovers. I set Zombie at a trot, gesturing for the Gallowborne to stay behind as I closed in on the barricade. I could see the enemy soldiers stirring, crossbows being brought to the fore.

"Disperse, citizen," a man's voice called out. "By order of the Ruling Council of Callow, this section of the city is closed off."

A Taghreb had risen atop a crate, and he'd been the one to speak. An older man, scarred and with a curved scimitar at his hip. He looked liked he could be Aisha's uncle, though one from the ugly side of the family.

"There is no Ruling Council," I said. "Only two Wastelanders who illegally seized power and botched it so badly they have to hide from rioters."

"General Orim acceded to our demands to stay out of this area," the man replied impatiently. "You will be written up for disobeying orders if you press us any further."

I snorted.

"Look at the symbol on the shields of the men behind me," I said. "Do they look like they're part of the Fifth?"

A golden noose on a field of red was what he'd find. My personal retinue had not existed for long but there were few people in Callow who wouldn't recognize their heraldry. They'd made something of an impression, in Marchford and Liesse.

"Gallowborne?" he said. "The Hells are you doing this far north? No matter. The Ruling Council passed a decree forbidding entrance into the city to any legion but the Fifth. Your presence here goes against the Tower's law. Your general should fuck off south to play with the fairies."

"If Juniper was in command, we wouldn't be talking," I said. "You'd be eating your third volley. But I'm a soft touch. You get a chance to surrender before I string you up above the city gates."

The Taghreb laughed.

"And who do you think you are, girl?"

Huh. It'd been a while since the last time someone hadn't recognized me. Or basically fed me a line just asking for a witty retort. If I'd been in a better mood, I might just have toyed with him a bit. I wasn't. I wasn't angry either, just... irritated. That I had to lose hours dealing with the greed and stupidity of short-sighted fools when I should have been dealing with the monsters torching my homeland.

"Countess Catherine Foundling of Marchford," I said. "The Squire."

"And I'm the fucking Empress," the Taghreb mocked. "I'm just hiding the tits under the-"

I called on my Name, forming a spear of shadows, but something... bled into it. The power I'd gotten from Winter, the one that had grown tendrils into my soul when I became the Duchess of Moonless Nights. I abandoned that working and turned my will to the enemy commander instead. Shadows coiled around his neck, coming into existence, and there was a sharp sound. His head popped off his body and fell to the ground where it shattered into shards of ice. Well, that was new. Not worth having my heart literally ripped from my chest for, but it would come in useful.

"I've got another half-dozen titles," I continued calmly. "I won't bother to list them out. Now that idiocy killed your commander, who's in charge?"

"Fire, you fools," a woman's voice hissed. "Before she kills us all."

"The hard way it is, then," I sighed. "GALLOWBORNE, FORWARD!"

I formed a panel of shadow in front of me to catch the crossbow bolts, frowning at how easy it was. It didn't take any less power than it had before, I noted as the steel-tipped projectiles thudded into the makeshift shield. The well was just deeper than it used to be, deeper than it should be in a transitional Name like mine. Weaker than the kind of power I'd felt in the Duke of Violent Squalls, but not by that much – and wasn't that a terrifying thought? That kind of a gain never came without a cost, and I wasn't sure what I'd be paying with. If I ended up losing my soul because of fae shenanigans, I was going to be pissed. I just knew that stealing it back would be horrendously difficult, and I didn't have the time to spare to murder my way back into a semblance of humanity with all the other things going on. The enemy didn't bother shooting at me again after it was made abundantly clear they might as well be aiming at a wall, instead aiming their crossbows at the raised shields of my retinue.

I wasn't having any of that.

Dismissing the shield, I called on the power a third time. I'd shot bolts of shadow out of my hand before, and even learned how to strengthen or weaken them: this time I poured as much as I could into the working without it blowing up in my face, and loosed the projectile at the foot of the barricade's centre. The resulting explosion of wood and screams had me blink in surprise: I'd essentially pulverized three feet of barricade and assorted people with a gesture, and I wasn't even winded yet. Yeah, definitely sitting down with Masego to have a talk about this.

"Plug the gap!" the same woman's voice called out.

"Fire," Tribune Farrier's voice calmly ordered.

My own people's volley did little more damage than the sporadic fire they'd been subjected to – it was hard to hit a target holed up behind cover, even a panicking one – but it did what it had been meant to: suppress the enemy before the first rank hit them. I spurred Zombie forward into the gap I'd created, where the enemy was trying to form a line, and didn't even bother to call on my Name. My warhorse trampled his way through the fledgling formation and I spilled a man's brains on the ground with a measured stroke of my sword. There must have been ten soldiers around me, but they were tired and scared and facing a Named. Well all knew how it was going to end. Within heartbeats the Gallowborne were at my sides, methodically butchering their way through the Praesi troops. Pikes and crossbows were no match for veteran sword and board infantry like my retinue on the best of days, and even less since I'd taken to occasionally drilling them myself. The skirmish was quick and brutally one-sided, the back of the enemy formation beginning to run for it before the front even collapsed. I waited for us to have seized the barricade properly, then picked out Farrier from the crowd.

"Tribune," I said. "Send a runner to Nauk. The centre is secure. The Fifteenth is to advance on every front and converge on the Royal Palace. Leave a detachment behind for our wounded."

I glanced at the rest of my personal guard. They were not, by the looks of it, particularly thrilled by the victory. There'd been nothing to this fight but whimpers and dead men. Like the seasoned professionals they were, the Gallowborne went around finishing off the enemy wounded as the meat of the cohort resumed formation.

"The rest of you, with me," I said. "Let's get this over with."

I led and they followed. The outer gates to the Royal Palace were wide open, and its grounds freshly tread. Evidently the runners from our last engagement had made it here ahead of us. The gardens were similarly deserted but up ahead I could see where the remaining forces of the Ruling Council were waiting for us. Crossbows were peeking out of windows on both levels of the main hall and the large gates in front were closed. Probably barricaded from behind. I trotted up ahead again, and ignored the hesitant hail from a window to the left. Cloak streaming behind me, I guided Zombie to the bottom of the marble steps and stared at the massive bronze gates.

"Break," I said.

My Name flared even as the metal crumpled like parchment under my eyes, falling apart with a sound like a gong being struck. In the hall behind, two dozen soldiers stood shaking and pale.

"Surrender," I ordered. "I will not tell you twice."

As the Gallowborne silently spread their ranks behind me, soldiers began dropping the swords. In the windows crossbows dipped as men retreated and the poor fools in front of me knelt. Farrier came to my side and I addressed him without looking.

"The two usurpers will be inside," I said. "Secure them."

"By your will, Countess," he murmured.

I got off my mount and offered the reins to one of my soldiers, dismissing John's strong suggestion that I take an escort with a sharp gesture. They would be more hindrance than help where I was headed. Ignoring the terrified soldiers as I strode into the palace, I headed straight for the heart of what had once been the seat of power for the Fairfax dynasty – and the Albans before them. The room where the Ruling Council had once held its sessions was deserted, and the door to it locked. Nothing the strength of the Named couldn't force open. It was evident by even a short look that the luxurious room hadn't been used in some time. The two Wastelanders must actually have been arrogant enough to have used the former throne room for their audiences. Idly taking off my helmet and shaking loose the hair under it, I set down the chunk of goblin steel on the table with a loud thunk. My gauntlets soon followed it, thrown carelessly as I headed for the chair at the head of the table. I paused there, my hand on the arm of it.

"I've felt you looking since the moment I left Arcadia," I spoke into the gloom. "Come out."

The woman slipped out of the deeper shadows in the corner, idly strolling to the seat on the other end and plopping herself down on it.

"Evening, Squire," the Thief said. "Fancy meeting you here."

danh3107

Cat is getting shit /DONE/. Now that's what I'm talking about!

---

I'll perhaps say a blasphemy, but all things considered I like the reaction episoded more. Maybe Wildbow's writing has spoiled me, but an other person's point of view is a thing that epic victories such as in Liesse desperately need. I was even somewhat disappointed when Augur's prediction interrupted Klaus Papenheim in the middle of his asesment of the rebellion, since he had just dismissed Squire as a secondary villain sent by Black Knight to hold back the Exiled Prince, so he'd have no good explanation for Black's stretching the duration of the rebellion. He'd probably just tell that Black Knight's getting too sure in his victory, and file the Prince's death under consequences of having to fight three Named, but it would still help not to be immersed in Catherine's perspective too much. It's part of why I wait for every first Wednesday of the month on the edge of my seat.

nerfworld

Quick showdown

nehemiahnewell

These aren't real opponents, on a narrative level. Or even a practical one. They haven't successfully consolidated anything.

letouriste

the true opponent here is thief and cat know that well;) ok "opponent" is kind of a stretch given this is obvious they both want close a deal

Darkening

I find it very odd seeing Thief confronting Cat face to face. I'm pretty confident Cat could take Thief apart without half trying if it came to a straight fight. Soooo. What's Thief got planned :/. An alliance against Diabolist maybe? I'd bet the thieves' guild has members inside Liesse, and Thief could probably be a pretty nice asset for any sneaky business needed. Cat's named team *has* been missing an Assassin equivalent to truly match the calamities.

nerfworld

Got my money on cat killing thief and robber getting the name

Author Unknown

Robber as an assassin would be awesome.

"Squires Assassin has struck again."

"He has, had, plenty of enemies. How do you know it was Squire?"

"All the silverware is missing."

Luxuria Tenebris

"All the silverware is missing."

That can still be Thief

The Archdevil

"All the silverware is missing"

I'm pissing myself.

Shequi

Cat could definitely kill Thief in a straight fight, which is why Thief would never give her a straight fight.

George

Why would there be a straight fight, though? I'm pretty sure Thief could still escape. Something like this isn't how a Thief dies; a Thief dies when they get caught.

sheer_falacy

I love Cat ruminating on just how darn inconvenient it would be to lose her soul. Ah, villains.

Also, these guys really are a special kind of stupid to rebel like this. Like, I'm kind of astounded that they were able to reach any kind of balance with Orim – it seems like even without a Named, proper troops could ruin these guys. There really was no possible way for them to survive this.

Imagination

Remember, it's not just the usurpers and the legion in the city, there's a hell of a lot of townsfolk as well. And the townsfolk are NOT happy about this.

Orim has 4000 soldiers, but he has to police the entire city and maintain the rule of law while the usurpers only have to hold the important entrances. If Orim diverts too many of his soldiers, well, that's what all the riots were.

letouriste

they would have succeed this with the money;)
they lost everything because of thief.also,maybe they could have made a deal with malicia when the city calmed a little.
they didn't expected cat to come so quickly,or even come at all.

mupi

Looked at from Orim's perspective, the 'usurpers' are merely continuing the Praesi tradition; thus without some kind of direct word from Authority (ie, Black or the Dread Empress), he's unlikely to actively work to thwart them. With Cat back in the picture as Squire, he'd be reluctant to cross Black, and thus likely to (at least reluctantly) follow her orders as well.

Spinner335

Damn, that was awesome, by the way does anyone else think that Robber is going to kill Thief and in doing so somehow steal her name?

Warren Peace

That sure seems to be a popular idea around here. I don't see it though, I think Thief is pretty secure in her Name. Besides, as we've already seen, Robber isn't inclined to attack Thief in the slightest

Imagination

I feel like this statement embodies Cat's entire mentality when it comes to people messing with Callow.

Frank Baumgarten

Hello, i was wondering (since i prefer to read on my kindle instead of a screen) if there is a ebook version of this available? Or if anyone else is interested in one?

---

All right, I'm back from my third reread and it's as good time as any to bring up a subject I've been thinking about for a long time: Akua Sahelian is an unreliable narrator that makes shit up more often than not (at least when she's thinking about her plans).

She's not a person whose words can be trusted easily in the first place; if her first reaction to the fae invasion is any indication, her instinct is to put up a poker face and pretend everything is going according to the plan. However, she also seems to think that way.

Back in Book 1's epilogue Heiress regrets that she now has to be at cross-purposes with him, since Catherine became a Squire instead of her and so should be removed (also believing that Black is too pragmatic to hold a grudge, implying he has to gain something from siding with her that is worth losing his chosen apprentice). Her master plan is foreshadowed in the same episode as something that would allow her to take over the Creation through the Name she'd transition into.

Later, in Coup de Théâtre, Akua makes a couple of amusing mistakes like dismissing Scribe as non-threatening and talking with the Bard (in the same breath with thinking about her words being lesser form of Speaking), but more importantly, she starts articulating her running theme of trying to bring back ye olde evil ways while calling Malicia the reason that the Empire stagnates.

In the second epilogue Heiress states that she never intended to kill Squire, and that she wasn't going to deal with Lord Black from anything but a position of power. Also, she's calling the nemesis plan a work of two years, when she stated in Coup de Théâtre that she's been setting up the pattern of three for a year, but I'm writing it off as a typo.

In the current book most contradictions are so far ideological in nature, so Akua is probably doesn't really lie to herself as much as she's keeping to the ideology she's been raised in. Still, I'm gleefully expecting the moment when she notices that even the phrasing she used for describing the Praesi dream, "to always look forward", is the same she used for Malicia, and she's the one who's been held back by the calcified institutions.

Feedback

Robber is no Thief material. That is too subtle, too silent for him. He does not steal, he plunders, he robs.

nerfworld

That is stealing, i mean there the black and white knights so "thief" is just the good version of the dastardly robber

haihappen

Oh Robber, ye nameworthy piece of insubordinate death. What name shall you get?

Bandit? nah, sounds like some highwayman stuff.

Brigant? too tame.

Predator? hmm, close, getting somewhere...

Raider! (Or Reaver) How about that?

Perhaps with a nice shady adjective?

Shady Raider!

MagnaMalusLupus

@haihappen From what we have seen so far, all villainous names are single words, with the sole exception of Black Knight (which exists as counterpart to White Knight) where as all Good names we have seen are two words, with neutrals trending towards one word. The only possible exception to the two name hero thing that we have seen so far is the Paige, who might have had an adjective we just weren't told, or more likely was a Good aligned neutral, like Hunter.

The Archdevil

Dread Emperor/Empress. That is a name, not just a title.

MagnaMalusLupus

@The Archdevil the actual Name associated with the Dread Emperor/ess is actually Tyrant, which has been mentioned several times.

erraticerrata

That is incorrect. Tyrant has been used as a gender-neutral shorthand, since it's an archaic version of the Name, but the Name is Dread Emperor/Empress.

MagnaMalusLupus

I stand corrected by WoG and my theory lies dead; maybe as a contrast to the Good King/Queen, but that feels flimsy.

Blinks

I dunno, thief would seem to be more of an inbetween. Much like Ranger, can go either way.

Hmm, do you think Catherine can just... take the treasury's contents from Thief?

MagnaMalusLupus

Maybe, but she might have to *Take* Thief's aspect to do so, and I really doubt she wants to give up *Rise* any sooner than is absolutely necessary.

Another awesome chapter, thanks.

Soronel Haetir

Unless she can get the time shift under control I see the ability to open gates from Arcadia as being an extremely dangerous move. Okay, so you end up on the battlefield you wanted, but it's months too late, your allies have already been slaughtered.

Nastybarsteward

Could Robber become an evil replacement for the Hunter Name..?

Could we have a more goblin sounding Name maybe?

He is one of my favourite characters, something in me revels in the pure joy he gets from being the most vicious, nastiest, deadly, malicious, lil bastard out there, and the sheer depth of artistic creativity that he puts into his work.

True commitment. ;D

Morgenstern

"My horse stirred uneasily as the presence of an orc so close, but I stroked his neck until he calmed." (AT instead of "as")

But... wait a second... ZOMBIE THE SECOND *stirs uneasily* at the sight of an orc??? That doesn't make sense... Zombie is a meatsuit led along only by her will. No zombie horse should have such reactions any more, imho. o_0

Imagination

That would be because Zombie II is still alive. It was mentioned at the end of book 2, I think.

Morgenstern

Oh dear. She really didn't turn it yet? Huh. Tender spots all over. Then I'll be waiting for the moment this comes back to bite her... ^^

Cpt. Obvious

No that's Zombie III or IV...

Morgenstern

And thanks a lot for the clarification. I was really stupefied for a second there.

Shawn Panzegraf

What time shift? When Cat opened the Portal into Laure, Nauk was exulting that the trip only took three days. A trip that even at death-march speeds would conventionally have taken a month and a half. Unless something very untoward happens (like when Cat actually begins fighting the forces of Summer), I think we've seen the last of Squire coming off the loser due to Arcadian time distortions. Remember, the Winter King wants his agenda furthered. Cat and the Fifteenth ending up irrelevant to current events because they lost months while marching through a Portal that Cat opened is far too banal a failure to further anything the King wants.

Lucas

Great chapter. Thank you 😊

Morgenstern

After finally having read the whole chapter: ME LIKE. Cat is finally learning how to make an entrance ^^ And I really like her progression. She's getting closer. Poor Ali. Maddie will so like this – and then again, probably not. Hmmm...

arancaytar

... I thought orcs took great pride in eating their meat raw, actually.

d0m1n1c

I don't understand why she's against human sacrifice, but OK with ordering Orcs to eat people; her line last chapter about human sacrifice bleeding people like cattle seems contradictory with her embracing of Orc dietary custom.

intermediarywebserial

Ah, I get it. She can have good soldiers' faces eaten, but sacrifices of death-row inmates is too much. GG.

Cpt. Obvious

Me thinks people are trying to hard at being logical.

We all have illogical hangups. One of Catherine's just happen to be human sacrifice. In most modern societies murder is not considered acceptable. Yet death penalty is still accepted in some places even knowing that innocents has been and continues to be executed occasionally. The laws says that the death penalty is only to be used when there is no doubt the accused is guilty. And yet mistakes are made and innocent people are executed. Is that really not the same thing as murder?

If you go looking using nothing but logic there is a lot of things that fail to make sense. Cat having an aversion to human sacrifice while still not being above nailing people betraying her trust to crosses is just one more of those.

Chapter 20: Skew

"An alliance of victors is like a hearth in summer."
– Julianne Merovins, tenth First Princess of Procer

I'd met a handful of heroes since I'd first become the Squire, and Thief was one of the harder ones to place. She was, quite blatantly, an egotist. Yet she lacked some of the traits that were common with the more arrogant heroes: both the Lone Swordsman and the Exiled Prince – the Prince in particular – had been almost unnaturally handsome. The appearance of a Named usually changed to reflect how they thought of themselves, after all. Yet Thief was not particularly good-looking, I noted as I studied her. Maybe two inches taller than me, she was a skinny woman with short dark hair and blue-grey eyes. The leathers she always wore had been cut for her frame, but weren't particularly tight: much like me, she'd have little to show for it if they were. Most of all, she lacked the weight to her presence that I'd come to associate with powerful Named. William, for all his flaws, had been able to mesmerize a room full of rebels with but a few words. I had a hard time imagining Thief ever doing the same.

"You sure you should have taken off that helmet?" the heroine smiled. "You've seen how costly a mistake that can be."

I withdrew my hand from the arm of the chair, and slowly sat down. The seat wasn't made for someone wearing plate, evidently, and it groaned under the weight of my armour.

"We going to play the threat game?" I asked bluntly. "Thief, I could have killed you with a hand tied behind my back last time we met. I've since murdered a demigod for power. We both know how that fight goes."

The other woman's eyes turned cold.

"A fair fight, maybe," she said. "I'm not in the habit of having those."

I snorted.

"And I am?" I replied. "Look, I'm as willing as tangle as the next villain but if I get an occasion to put a shot someone's back in the dark, I'm sure as Hells taking it."

"How remarkable," she sneered.

"Well, I have been spending a lot of time with goblins lately," I said. "But I gotta say that putdown's a little rich, coming from someone whose entire Name is about theft."

Thief smirked.

"Oh?" she said. "Is someone displeased their treasury's gone?"

"I am," I smiled thinly. "I'm about to have to find food and lodgings for at least a hundred thousand refugees while also running a military campaign and I don't have the funds for any of it."

"The Tower will shell out the gold," Thief dismissed.

"The Tower's putting down internal troubles, and I'm about to spit in its eye," I said. "It's not going to be giving me a single copper for the foreseeable future."

"Villains stabbing each other in the back at the first sign of trouble," the heroine grinned unpleasantly. "History does tend to repeat itself, doesn't it?"

"I'm not-" I began, then stopped. "Oh fuck you."

She blinked in surprise.

"Who do you think you are, exactly?" I asked.

"A heroine, villain," she replied.

"Someone tried to mind rape a city of a hundred thousand last year, Thief, and it sure as Hells wasn't anyone on my side," I barked. "You think being William's minion for a few months gives you a pass to be an asshole forever and still have the moral high ground? Think again."

"I spoke against that," Thief hissed.

"Words are wind," I said. "You could have taken a stand. You didn't. So much for heroism, eh?"

"I might have made mistakes," she said through gritted teeth. "I'll own up to that. But you know what I'm not, at least? A godsdamned collaborator."

My face blanked. I'd been called a traitor before. By a crowd in Summerholm, when I was fresh into my name, and by the Lone Swordsman in the months that followed. But it was the first time anyone had actually called me a collaborator to my face. No doubt quite a few people had thought it in the past, but I'd never actually heard it spoken out loud. It stung more than I would have liked, even now. Things with a grain of truth to them usually did.

"I took the path that damages Callow the least," I said.

"You took the path that involved selling your soul to the Hellgods," she replied flatly.

"I got a close look at the Hashmallim, in Liesse," I said. "I think you think your side's any gentler than mine, you've been listening to stories too much."

"My 'side' hasn't stolen an entire fucking kingdom," she snapped.

I shrugged.

"And what's it done to free it since?" I asked.

"It rebelled," Thief said. "And you murdered the people that did. I'm sure they felt very saved."

"You think putting a crown on Gaston Caen would have helped this country?" I said, leaning forward. "Gods, Thief, the man fled into exile before the first legion was in sight of Vale during the Conquest. He was a bloody coward and the First Prince owned him down to his toes."

"So you say," the heroine sneered.

"So the facts say," I coldly said. "You think she poured that much silver into a doomed rebellion so an old rival of the Principate could be restored? She wanted a western protectorate to push back Praes, that's all there was to it."

"Elizabeth of Marchford would have been queen," Thief said. "She would not have settled for that."

"You think she would have had a choice?" I pressed. "After Praes burned the land on the way out, who would have leant the coin and crops to keep Callow alive through the winter?"

"That would have been the Empire's fault," she hissed.

"Gods Below, am I tired of hearing about fault," I shouted.
"Fault and blame and Good – none of it fixes any of this. If you want a solution, you deal with realities. With what exists, not the pretty little world that 'should be'. Praes would have acted in its interest, and that meant torching the country. Procer would have acted in its interests, which was making us a protectorate. Anyone who plans without acknowledging that isn't planning, they're lying to themselves. That's what I can't stand about the lot of you. Do you think doing the right thing is enough? Fuck you. I've had to bloody my hands to get this far, Thief. I didn't enjoy it, and some of the things I've done will haunt me to my grave. But the only clean victories are the ones in stories. Preach all you want, I have gotten things done."

I panted, out of breath, my tone quieted.

"Which of you pricks on the other side can say the same?" I asked.

"Sometimes you have to take a stand even if you know you can't win," she said.

"That's pride talking," I replied. "That's killing people for your principles, and I can't think of anything more selfish than that."

Thief laughed bitterly.

"You know, there's truth in what you say," she admitted. "But none of it would have mattered if you were a heroine."

I'd been at this game long enough that the surprise never made it to my face.

"William was never meant to lead," Thief said. "He was terrible at it. But I look at the party we had, and can't help but thing there was always supposed to be one. All of us were born in Callow, except for the Wandering Bard – and I'm not convinced she was supposed to be a part of it. One Named for every Calamity, if you'd been on the side of Good. And we've all seen what you can do with an uphill battle."

"I know them, the Calamities," I said. "I know what they can do better than most. It wasn't a fight that could be won."

"The Heavens have a way of evening odds," she said.

"Prayer is what people rely on when they've run out of plans," I replied. "I've no patience for it."

In this, at least, I was truly Black's successor.

"What you've built is collapsing," Thief said.

"By the end of the year, there will be no Praesi governor in Callow," I said.

"I'm not talking about the governors," she said. "I'm talking about the Ruling Council."

"It's done," I said tiredly. "I tried, it failed. Come sunup the two of them will be dead and I'm not surrendering that authority ever again."

The heroine frowned.

"You're naming yourself queen," she said.

"Vicequeen, most likely," I said. "A ceremonial title: I can't run the country if I'm waging war abroad, and it's become clear I'm not great at it anyway. I'll name a Governor-General to handle everything and keep power in name only. The Tower won't accept anyone but a villain at the head of Callow."

Thief stared at me for a long time.

"What do you want, Squire?" she said. "I thought you'd come here to threaten me or force a fight, but that's obviously not the case. Why are we here?"

"A tenth," I said.

The heroine blinked.

"What?"

"You get to keep a tenth of the treasury," I said. "The rest goes back in the vault."

"Are you trying to bribe me with coin already in my possession?" she asked.

"Bribe, no," I said. "I'm hiring the Guild of Thieves."

"We're not for hire," Thief said.

"Fine, I'm giving you a 'gift' for anticipated services, then," I grunted. "Do I need to wink, or are we on the same page?"

"That's not-" the heroine stopped before finishing her sentence. "What do you want to hire us for?"

"The Empress and Black have networks of informants forty years in the making, backed by the Legions of Terror," I said. "The First Prince has a hundred thousand battle-hardened veterans and the wealthiest nation on Calernian at her feet. If I want to play in the same league, I need talented people and I need them now. Your people are criminals, but they're criminals with presence in every Callowan city and a fountain of foreign contacts. Right now I only have eyes in the Legions and the Wasteland – I'm blind everywhere else and it's already cost me."

"I'm a heroine," Thief reminded me.

"If William had stuck to killing criminals in the streets of Summerholm, I would have given him a salary and a godsdamned badge," I replied frankly. "I work with the monsters because they give me the means to do what I need to, not because I have any illusions about what they are. I don't fight heroes out of principle, Thief, I fight them because they keep trying to kill me and make a mess of Callow in the process."

"And if I don't cooperate?" she asked lightly, but her eyes betrayed how serious she was.

"This is the part where I say 'if you're not an asset, you're a liability', right?" I sighed. "I get back the treasury, is what I do, because I need it. And then as long as you stay out of my way, I will politely pretend you don't exist."

I smiled thinly.

"And I think you will," I continued. "Stay out of my way. It's not like you want any of my opponents to win instead: I'm the lesser evil. Besides, in case you hadn't noticed, there's wolves at the gates. I don't have the time or energy to spare on pointless pissing matches."

The Thief stared at me in silence. I met her eyes without flinching.

"Assassin tried to recruit me, when I first came into my Name," she suddenly said.

"I'm told he's a regular bundle of laughs," I replied.

"The conversation couldn't have lasted more than a quarter hour," Thief said. "To this day, I shiver when I think of it. That... thing was death made flesh."

I wasn't sure where she was headed with this, so I kept my peace.

"And yet," the heroine said, "I think you might just be the most dangerous villain I've ever met."

"You've never met Black," I said.

"It's not about power," Thief replied. "You make it easy to want to follow you. Because you make sense, because you get results. I should try to kill you tonight, because if I don't you might just damage Calernia beyond repair."

"Will you?" I asked.

Silence reigned.

"Baroness Kendal is still alive," Thief said. "She was wounded, but took refuge in the cathedral. The priests are hiding her."

I nodded slowly, then rose to my feet.

"I'll need the treasury back in the vault before I leave," I said.

"Minus our tenth," Thief smiled bitterly, looking up at the ceiling.

I made for the door, passing her by.

"Squire," she said. "No, Foundling now I suppose. If you ever become what you say you're fighting..."

"Then more dangerous people than you will be putting me down," I replied, and walked away.

I got the last word, I thought, largely because she had nothing to reply to that.

"Lady Squire," Orim the Grim greeted me.

He'd been sleeping until recently. I'd learned to tell the signs, with orcs – the voices got a little deeper, and they showed their teeth more often. The general was almost as tall as Hakram, who was unusually so for his kind, and his skin was of a yellow-green I'd only ever seen in goblins before. It was uncommon in the Lesser Steppes, I knew: almost all my legionaries from there were of a green so dark it looked like black. Of the man himself, I knew little. When it had become clear he'd remain one of the important people of Laure for the foreseeable future I'd asked my own orcs about him, but gotten only vague outlines. Juniper had told me he'd been chieftain of the Silent Men before Black recruited him halfway through the civil war, one of larger clans in the Lesser Steppes. Nauk had remembered he'd been known for his warring with the Deoraithe of the Wall, and all Hakram knew was that he'd once wiped out an entire smaller clan in a single night for having stolen some of his cattle. I wasn't surprised, considering the cognomen his legion had earned during the Conquest: Exterminatus.

The Fifth had been under Marshal Grem's command during his assault on the Wall, a campaign undertaken to make sure none of the Deoraithe would be with the army of Callow at the Fields of Streges. After taking one of the forts, Orim the Grim had put every soldier in it to the sword as keeping any prisoners would have slowed his march. That had happened a long way from Laure, though. In the capital his reputation was as a fair but distant commander who would not hesitate to resort to violence if pushed. His open enmity with the late Governor Mazus had won him some esteem, since the Fifth's legionaries had made it a point to put the governor's men in their place whenever they could. I'd been raised to the sight of big armoured orcs punching the teeth out of city guard who overstepped, and it had gone a long way in teaching me to see greenskins were not the enemy. A long time ago, that. My ascension to the Ruling Council has not granted me any better insight into the man, since he'd withdrawn from any relation to it after ensuring the Fifth would not have to obey any orders from its members.

"General Orim," I replied.

The room in the barracks was almost bare, a sure sign the orc didn't use it regularly. In my experience greenskins like to decorate with trophies from victories anywhere they stayed longer than a few weeks. The Fifth's general staff was nowhere in sight: it seemed Orim had grasped that this wouldn't be that kind of meeting. Save for a table with a jug of some dark alcohol – almost empty by now – and two cups to accompany it, there was little of note here. I'd not been offered any of the drink, and had not asked: orcs drank liquor hard enough to leave holes in whatever it touched. Something about their stomachs taking to alcohol differently, Hakram had told me. As it happened said orc was seated at my side, across from the general. He polished off the rest of his cup and let out a pleased little sigh.

"Callowan drink just isn't the same," Adjutant said.

"They make passable wine in the north," the general replied amusedly. "But nothing close to brannahal."

My eyes narrowed. I did not recognize the word. It was from an older dialect of Kharsum, I thought, but aside from the part meaning fire I didn't recognize the rest. As for the mention of the north of Callow, I almost grimaced. 'Wine' to the north of Ankou was actually a heavily concentrated version of brandy made by farmers and cattle-herders out in the field. It was said that in a pinch it could be used instead of lamp oil.

"Deadhand tells me you're to handle order in the city," Orim suddenly said.

Coming from a Praesi, the way he'd been called by his nickname instead of his Name would have been an insult. From an orc, though, the meaning was different. The Clans didn't really have titles aside from chieftain. Even their rare mages did not get much distinction from the mass. Orcs who distinguished themselves in some way earned a nickname, and for someone not sharing a clan to use it was a mark of respect. Evidently Adjutant had made some inroads here while I'd been busy in the city.

"I have the usurpers in my custody," I said. "I'll be executing them publicly come morning and re-establishing a civilian government afterwards."

"We're under martial law," Orim gravelled.

"We don't have the soldiers to waste to enforce that," I replied calmly. "I need you with General Istrid as soon as possible."

"She knows the people here, general," Hakram said. "If she says the peace will hold, it'll hold."

The older orc conceded the point with a grunt.

"Where is the Fifteenth headed?" he asked.

"I've sent Juniper south," I said. "She'll be gathering additional men as she goes."

"She should be marching to Vale," the orc bluntly stated. "To put her soldiers under her mother's command."

"That won't be happening," I replied frankly. "The forces will remain divided for the campaign."

"Ruling Council's dead," Orim said. "And it didn't have authority of the Legions when it was still breathing."

"I am the Squire," I coldly said. "Her Dread Majesty is preoccupied with Wolof and Black is abroad. My orders are not to be gainsaid."

The general's face went stony.

"Knightsbane's fought two wars and a hundred skirmishes," he growled. "So have I. What do you have under your belt, three half-baked battles? The soldiers should go to Vale."

"I could make this about power," I replied idly. "We both know that using a sliver of power I could order you to drown yourself and you would. But I don't need to. I have information you don't. The chain of command is clear. Do it."

The orc was twice my size. Scarred, bursting with muscle and capable of popping a man's neck off his shoulders with his bare hand – and yet he knew better than to try to loom. Orim glanced at Hakram and saw only ice there. Adjutant had picked his side long ago. The general scoffed, but did not push any further.

"You'll have orders for General Istrid," he said, tacitly offering to carry them.

"Juniper is already in contact with her by scrying," I said. "The Knightsbane will be marching on Holden as soon as your men arrive."

The older orc frowned.

"We're pretty sure the fae can portal from one stronghold to the other," he said.

"They can," I confirmed. "We'll be splitting their forces with multiple assault so you don't bear the brunt of it."

"And you think they'll just let General Juniper leisurely stroll south?" he sceptically asked. "They've raiding parties out."

"And the Diabolist has an army out in the field," I said. "So far the Summer Court has refrained from hitting Liesse. I've sent two Named down there to remedy to that. Akua Sahelian will have to be dealt with after the fae are repelled, and I don't want her forces fresh when it happens."

Apprentice had been less than pleased at being partnered with Archer, but sending either one on their own would have been a disaster.

"My detachment will be stabilizing Laure, then we'll move on," I continued. "To Denier. I mean to free Marshal Ranker's legions if I can."

Orim's dark eyes lingered on my skin, the visible reminder that I was at least half-Deoraithe by blood.

"Kegan's not to be trusted," he said. "She was never comfortable under the Tower – the Fairfaxes allowed her to run things the way she liked without even tribute."

"I know what she wants," I said. "That gives me leverage. And twenty thousand men is nothing to sneer at, if they can be pointed in the right direction."

"Rely on them and you'll get a knife in the back," he gravelled.

"The correct word is use, not rely," I said. "When can I expect you to move out?"

He mulled over it.

"Two days," he said. "Supplies are mostly ready, but I want them prepared for a hard march."

I nodded.

"We should be gone, by then," I said. "Until we are you can liaise with Adjutant if you need anything. I'll be busy pacifying the capital."

He saluted, reluctantly, and I pushed back my chair.

"Hakram?" I prompted.

"I'll be in touch, general," Adjutant said.

We left together. I still had over a bell before dawn, by my reckoning, but I'd need to sleep at some point. And when I woke up, I'd have to make sure the largest city in Callow didn't start rioting the moment my legionaries left. Joy.

danh3107

Making deals with Thief seems like a recipe for betrayal, but considering who Cat has dealt with...

She's less than an amateur, hopefully this plays out well.

agumentic

She's still a hero, even if neutralish, so she won't stab someone in the back after a deal, not without believing it'll be for a greater good. And Cat is extremely good at making it look like loyally working for her is for a greater good, more so because she believes and works for it herself.

JackbeThimble

I don't think there's any hero rule against deception. Even if there are hero rules I'm pretty sure she's already breaking several by committing to any kind of long-term collaboration with the Evil Empire.

Duckie

Not to mention her name is Thief... Even an honorable thief still bends the rules to fit their goals. Other wise they wouldn't be a Thief. Deception and rule bending and stealing is what a Thief does. Robin Hood is considered a hero of sorts, but in the end all he did was steal the wealth of the rich. It doesn't matter what he did with it, because in the end he still stole it and thats regardless a bad thing to do. Basically i'm saying if any Hero Name can use deception and rule bending and still be considered good, its the Thief.

therealgridlock

Technically Robin hood was the (duke?) Of the area, he actually owned the land, the sheriff was embezzling those funds against the king appointed ruler's wishes.

This is often overlooked in the telling to just emphasize silly communist propaganda, but the fact of the matter is that Robin hood had a mandate to see to the proper management of that land and it's people, and he was fully within his rights to stop a corrupt sheriff from illegally levying heavy taxes against his people.

Believe it or not feudal law wasn't all one way, the peasants still had rights, and could seek redress if they wanted to.

Don't believe communist propaganda.

Casscabbage

Yeah, you're right. The feudal system was so great. Anyone saying otherwise is a dirty commie.

agumentic

It's not that there's rules against deception, it's more that the stories don't really go that way. There's stories about heroes outsmarting villains, there's stories about heroes toeing the line of honorable things, there's even stories about heroes agreeing to work with villains to undermine them. But, I really can't remember the story that goes: "And then the hero stabbed the villain in the back, after dealing with them in good faith and villain never going against letter or spirit of their word".

Thief is the hero that can bend the rules of "good" and "bad" a little, but it's because they still work for what they think is good, in the end. And Cat makes it look like working with her fits this line of thinking far better than working against her.

Still, I am not completely discounting the possibility of betrayal – Thief can decide that Cat took one step to far, or after a big talk from some hero – say, White Knight – she decides that working with Cat is wrong, but I mark it as unlikely.

corrado alamanni

This is what i want to see heroes who both help and moderate her

xacual

So Archer is still working with Cat and the Fifteenth? I hadn't really expected that without some kind of scene saying so. I mean the Winter Court thing was handled, so I thought there would be some scene with Cat talking Archer around to helping with Diabolist and the Summer Court.

zaddek

I actually thought something similar until I reread the most recent chapters. I'm pretty sure that Archer was actually sent to help Cat with the Summer Court but got pulled into the Winter mess when she met up with Cat in Arcadia. Winter probably hadn't even attacked yet when the Empress called in the marker with Ranger to get Cat a fae expert. So I'm pretty sure Winter was a freebie for Cat.

JackbeThimble

I doubt it took much persuading to get Archer to go after Diabolist. She has a serious grudge against Akua for getting Hunter killed in Marchford and a big part of her motivation seems to be trying to prove that she's just as badass as Ranger so generally speaking she probably tends to move towards any big fight she sees brewing, whether or not she knows or cares what side she's on.

Nairne

Plus Archer did mention that Cat is interesting (sort of, I think the exact wording was a little different).

Shequi

And Cat is suddenly single, and Archer is a terrible flirt...

Nicole Weaver

We already know how independant Ranger's people are. Archer fulfilled her orders and now seems a bit curious what cat is up to. As well as enjoying herself dealing with the monney wrenches cat throws in everyone's way. I expect Archer to stick around until things get boring again 😊

Euodiachloris

And, hey: more Fae and Tower politics to stymie on top of a good fight. What more could a girl who doesn't like either ask for? 😊

I can see why Archer has decided that sticking to the sociopolitical grenade that Squire currently is is good for a laugh.

Nicole

Euodiachloris, right? That and she seems to consider Cat a potential conquest. The 15th is just a barrel full of fun for her 😊

boballab

If you haven't noticed Cat is forming her own version of the Calamities and their Names are mostly transitional. Cat's Squire to Black's Knight, Adjutant and Captain, Apprentice and Warlock, Archer and Ranger. Robber might be the counter part to Assassin since that is what he has been doing for Cat and Aisha might be the counter to Scribe (Remember she has been keeping Cat's history and is one of her spymasters).

JackbeThimble

RIght now it looks like Thief is probably the counterpart to assassin with her and Adjutant sharing the role of scribe

Cpt. Obvious

Thieves may or may not be murderers, assassins are. So far i don't get Assassin vibes from Thief. Remember that she infiltrated Liesse, and pulled a knife on Robber to stop the goblins, minions of Evil, from killing the Praesi guards, more minions of Evil. That doesn't make me feel like Thief has the making of a assassin in her.

In her own name she does seem quite capable. Remember that she was able to steal a fleet of ships and barges only to throw them down in front of the gates of Liesse. That's a pretty powerful ability if used intelligently.

JackbeThimble

Have we ever covered what happens when a hero or villain switches sides? either intentionally or as a result of falling/redemption? If there's some special consequence for a hero acting evil I feel like Thief is risking it here.

BryceWilliam

I think with a Name like Thief you get to toe the line a little bit.

Jonnnney

Heros and villains can work together long term. Black once referenced the fact that one of the world powers that helped defeat Triumphant was run by both a hero and a villain. As long as they mostly keep to their own moral code there isn't going to be any good vs evil side switching.

RoflCat

Given how Cat took the Role of a hero in Sword in Stone against William, my guess is nothing so long as it doesn't goes against their Name.

Thief, like Squire, seem to be a Name that can go either way (or to give another example, Ranger herself is 'neutral' but she took side with Evil during Conquest)

Not to mention that even if she is a Noble Thief, what Cat is having her do should still be within the acceptable range of her Name (gather info for the benefit of Callow)

George

Didn't Catherine lose power for a while when she went outside her Role? Same thing for Thief, I imagine, though her Role is much less about doing the 'right thing' than a role like White Knight.

alb

awesome chapter, it gets better and better! Thanks for writing

JackbeThimble

There's no way Malicia's going to stand for this, if the Imperial governorships are abolished it's not just a massive insult that the Empress can't let stand without losing face, it will seriously decrease the empress's own power over Praes since so much of her influence among their nobility comes from controlling the lucrative governorships. it will also sever the biggest institutional bond between the two countries, essentially turning them into de facto separate states, and remove the only real incentive the Praesi nobles have for supporting the occupation in the first place. Either Cat will have to offer some kind of compromise (maybe they could give landed noble titles to Legion veterans or a mix of veterans and younger praesi nobles) or war is basically guaranteed.

Kilimandaros

Currently Malicia has no way of waging war with Catherine, doing so would pretty much lose her Callow for near future. Between Calamities abroad, nobles fighting in Wolof, First Prince lurking behind the border, Deoraithe mobilizing the troops, Summer Fae raiding south of Callow and Diabolist pretty much rebelling against the Tower she can't antagonize the Squire. Catherine is her best shot at restoring order in Callow. Imperial Governors pretty much all died or are going to die (Akua) so Catherine declaration doesn't really mean anything – even if Ruling Council was to be re-establish Catherine had the power (4 out of 7 votes) to avoid making any new Praesi governor anyway.

Noble titles for Legion veterans is pretty much sure way to antagonize Truebloods, so I can't see how it would work for Malicia. They fought against making orcs from steppes nobles, so how would making orcs, goblins and Callowans nobles make any favour with Truebloods or Moderates?

JackbeThimble

The war isn't going to last forever. Catherine may be the man on the ground now but she has to reckon with what malicia will do once the war ends. The Legions aren't all orcs, goblins or Callowans. Not even most, there's plenty of Taghreb or Soninke especially among the officers, not that what the Truebloods want is going to matter once since they're about to be exterminated.

lennymaster

If you have not noticed, the Truebloods are becoming more and more obsolete. Malica even managed to bleed the most powerfull and richest, their inoffical leader, Diabolists mother, dry of funds and support over the last twenty years and is still working to get more and more power into the hands of institutions. Replacing them by lifting veterans up to nobility from the legions might well be Malicas plan. After all the Preasi thriving to never look back and always reach higher makes it impossible to entirly wipe out the station of noblity, but weaken it and fill it with loyal subjects, why not?

George

A Catherine who is going against Malicia doesn't have four votes on the Ruling Council, because Malicia's puppet was one of her four.

That's ignoring that the composition would be renegotiated, of course.

JackbeThimble

George: That's the point, Catherine just said she's going to abolish the ruling council the old fashioned way, essentially declaring herself the sole power in Callow without any clearance from the Empress.

sheer_falacy

Malicia's puppet wasn't one of Cat's 4 votes on the council. It was her, Black (who delegated to her), and the two Callowans. Then there were the two Praesi who decided to commit complicated suicide and Malicia's representative.

Jonnnney

If it means the tributes continue to flow, callow kneels, and no heroes pop up to usurp the tower's rule I'm thinking she's fine with it. Also if you think Malicia didn't see this as a possibility then you REALLY don't understand the name of Dread Empress.

JackbeThimble

The tributes don't continue to flow if she lets her vassals get overmighty. If one of your subjects gathers a massive personal army, controls the entire civilian government of one of your largest provinces and has much more support from the people there than you do then they have the power to rebel any time they want, no ruler can tolerate this situation for long if they want to remain a ruler.

jonnnney

Yes, IF Catherine rebelled then Malicia would put a stop to it real damn quick, but Catherine is the disciple of the Black Knight and Cat knows the costs of going against the calamities. Even more if Catherine is going to get her way she is going to have to agree to several concessions from the Dread Empress. Once Cat starts to renege on any of the concessions Malicia will know Cat is rebelling.

Also, you are failing to see how Malicia benefits from strengthening Catherine. A strong Callow in subservience to the Tower via a disciple of the Black Knight is terrifying to the High Lords. Once the Diabolist is gone the Praesi are going to have to decide whether they want to focus on fighting the reforms which weakens the Empress or strengthening the Empress in order to keep a hold on Callow.

Nicole Weaver

Well, we know from Black's tutelage the Tower basically wants Callow for its ability to export food. If Cat can convince them she is loyal to the Tower, perhaps they can set up a prisoner-for-food program that gives the Tower what it wants and lets it focus on its current enemies.

Its also important to remember that Cat has an intermediate title. If things go south, she just might decide Empress is her next step.

George

I think powerful Names require you to fit yourself to them to be claimed; I don't think Catherine could be Dread Empress and not be more Evil than she is right now. I don't think she could successfully claim that Name then go on to successfully make things better for Callow long term.

Cpt. Obvious

Necroposting... Yeah I know it's considered bad form, so sue me.

It's been shown that both Black and the Malicia HD have plans for Cat. But it's also been hinted that they are not the same plans.

It appears that Black is looking to be replaced as the Black Knight. His plans are long term and meant to keep on ticking over long after he is gone. He has turned himself in to the boogeyman, his name being the stuff nightmares are built on. And as feared as he is amongst the enemies the Praesi nobles fears him even more. As they see it the only reason that he hasn't wiped out all Praesi nobles is because Malicia has stopped him from doing so.

But he see a future where the nobles are inconsequential and the Empire is stable, and that future has no place for Amadeus as the Black Knight. He, and the rest of the calamities are too monstrous for that future to have any chance of surviving. Instead he is grooming Cat so she will be his successor, and while fully capable of taking over all of the responsibilities of being the Black Knight she will be a uniting force not because everyone is deathly afraid of her but because she is a straight arrow whose word can be trusted once given. Sure, stab her in the back if you want, just know she is considering death as a less than optimal state and has bullied angels, the spear point of the gods above, into resurrecting her. Also Robber tends to go hyperactive when she dies, and even amongst goblins he is considered to be something of a homicidal maniac. But he will probably be saving you for her to take care of once she gets better.

As scary as he intend for her to be she will still be someone most Praesi will be looking up to. After all she has come all this way going from not knowing anything about her parents and being brought up in an orphanage in Callow to pacifying Callow and rooting out the treasonous nobles.

Add to that the Dread Empress rising from serving wench to the longest ruling Dread Empress of the greatest empire of creation, at least as far as the people of Praes knows.

These two will be evidence that it is possible to better your station in life. This jams with the Praesi drive to better their situation. And for once the dreams are not only for the nobles.

What Malicia's plans are is harder to guess, but it almost seems she's grooming Cat to take the throne. After all giving Cat stewardship of a bleeding citty, the fifteenth and making her set up the council for her old hometown are things that will teach Cat the art of ruling. The Black Knight certainly isn't the Name of a ruler, while Dread Empress most certainly is.

While they are both grooming Cat there is little chance that they are looking at the same endgame plan, and so far none of them has asked Cat what she thinks about it. And given the way plans, others and her own, tend to crumple whenever she's involved I feel it's a safe bet that there are going to be some interesting times ahead for those who survive, or get resurrected or turned into undead abominations of nature, Cat doesn't discriminate the undead..

Shequi

Cat hasn't said she's abolishing the Imperial governorships; she's said she's just not going to let Praesi hold them, I think.

JackbeThimble

Same thing from Malicia's perspective, if she can't name her governors (or is forced to pick from people who will almost automatically be more loyal to catherine than herself) then she's effectively lost control over Callow and a lot of her leverage with her own subjects in Praes as well.

Morgenstern

Ehrm. I'm pretty sure she said in this very chapter that the Ruling Council did not work out – and that will be that. She will appoint ONE governor who only holds power in name (in her absence), and become Vicequeen herself... So, Queen after all...

jonnnney

@Jack

Malicia has already given up the right to appoint imperial governors when she gave Catherine a majority vote of the ruling council. Effectively the Empress has little to no control over ~half of her big cities, but as long as the illusion of control remains then everyone is placated.

@Morgen

A single person can't run an entire kingdom which takes months to cross. There still needs to be local rulers in each of the cities/provinces. Whether these local rulers be dukes, princes, governors, city councils, or what have you they need to exist in order to maintain a level of control. Prior to Catherine's trip to the winter wonderland these local rulers were called imperial governors and answered to the ruling council. After all the trouble has been dealt with I'm guessing these local rulers will still be called imperial governors and they will be answering to a General-governor who answers to Catherine who answers to Malicia.

Ward

Love from a dumb phone

Metalshop

Can I just say I love how much political wrangling Cat does? The fights and the magic and the weird societies are all really cool, but my favorite part is honestly watching her try to kickstart a functioning country.

George

Yeah I think it does an amazing job of grounding and providing context for all the sweet magic.

Also I live for lines like 'dipping a toe in the treason pool' and 'I lied.' tags.

Shequi

So, wild mass guessing time: What will the 15th's Cognomen be after this war?

The Archdevil

"Kill them, take their shit!"

JackbeThimble

Demonslayers

jonnnney

"Fuck the gods"

Kilimandaros

Pretty sure that both "Kill them, take their shit!" and "Fuck the gods" can't really be cognomen, some kind of warcry maybe, but not a cognomen. Demonslayers also didn't really match, because they didn't kill even single demon – Akua recalled it to the standard.

beleester

Devilslayers, then. They certainly killed plenty of those.

The quietist

Demonslayers strikes me as a bit too heroic/showy of a name, think about the ones we know so far- Regicides and Ironsides the former is a criminal term and the latter a sort of bleak defiance. Maybe the Coldhearts for obvious reasons plus they're going to kill a lot of Summer Fae.

nick012000

So, it looks like the guy who said a while back that the Lone Swordsman's party was meant to be Squire's hit the nail on the head.

What's more is that it looks like it's turning out that way regardless: she's just recruited Thief and Archer, and she has Apprentice to fill the Role of the Bumbling Conjuror, and Adjutant to replace the Hunter. That makes five Named in her band.

If the Wandering Bard fills the mentor Role the way she seems to, then that means that Cat has someone to fill that Role for her as well: the Black Knight.

Letouriste

Kinda disappointed by the chapter^^ just two discussions and, even if they are important, are not the most thrilling.

If you were still on a one chapter by week schedule we would still be hungry.

Anyway, I find myself craving for more the days where you don't post anything so I guess the book is starting to roll for real

Naeddyr

I prefer these kinds of talking chapters (that aren't infodumps) to multichapter fights because in these, things happen and get done. I mean, in the last few chapters we've had huge, huge changes to the status quo, starting from the end of the fight with the Duke, and it's mostly been talking and wrangling.

Dianna

Same, I love the fights but live for the politics and banter. I love how competent Cat is getting at both.

James, Mostly Harmless

Thief is right in a way, Cat has the right background to become a hero which is why Black was having an eye kept on her while she was still in the Orphanage. But Thief is also wrong per Book 1

Chapter 4 (<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2015/04/22/chapter-4-name/>): ““I was wrong,” Black said, though he didn’t sound like he was admitting an error. “You never could have become a hero. You lack the mindset for it.””

Blinks

You know, i read that section again and the one following it and what really stands out to me more than anything else is that she didn’t actually accept either side.

She killed her evil side and denied her good.

I think i’m more and more starting to buy into the idea that she’s simply not going to be either black or white knight but something else.

George

Yeah, I see a bit of a chance at Black Knight just because the current one may have changed the Role a bit, but I think we can safely discount White Knight, Warlord, and Queen of Callow in favor of erratic doing something clever.

---

I recall there being a Name called Knight Errant (White Knight used his skills in his fight with Black). Do you think that might be it?

Dianna

George. I feel similar about her rejecting both sides. In the comments, I have heard the term Gray Knight, and Green Knight, passed around (Though don’t ask where they got Green from). But I have to disagree with you on the name “Warlord” right now that feels like it could be being foreshadowed, given all the orcs are calling her that. Then again it might not, who knows. But what is Cat if not a Warlord (or Warlady)? She gains power mostly through her ability to kill stuff, and she uses war to gain even more power. That was the whole point of letting The Lone Swordsman go, to start a rebellion and gain power. She is doing the same with this war, though she didn’t plan for it this one to break out, she is still using it for leverage to gain yet more power.

The Archdevil

Gains power through her ability to kill stuff, has power over Cold now, frequently animates her own body, causes conflict where many die. Possibly Necromancer name?

B

I don't know if Cat will ever actually get a full Name. Her staying with a transitional name and still coming out on top is just the sort of spitting Fate in the eye that would be thematically appropriate for Cat.

Cat's purpose in this story is to be a breaker of Fate. Black cracked the foundation by tweaking the Story, but it's Cat who will shatter the grooves in Creation established by the Gods by using Good and Evil as she needs and rewriting the Story to suit her purposes. She's neither Good nor Evil because those are terms defined by Fate. Despite the guarantee that Cat will use whatever full Name she receives as she pleases, her accepting a full Name kind of feels like a slipping back into the grooves.

Tide of Khatanga

I think she'll be Black Knight. The way the story repeatedly reminds the reader that Squire only leads to Black or White Knight, it tries quite hard at foreshadowing a twist. So much that I think Cat becoming the Black Knight as initially planned will, in fact, be the twist..

The way her story is shaping up, she can't be Warlord or that kind of stuff. She's not about commanding and ruling, she's about fighting. Her legend tells about that time she torched a city to flush out a hero. About how she punched down an ogre, a castle gate and a fortress-sized devil, in no particular order. About how she battled a demon and won. About how she broke an angel to her will. About how she killed a highborn Fae in duel. She isn't known for her command (Juniper is the one commanding anyway) or her rule. She's known for picking impossible fights and winning.

If the word wasn't so firmly associated with Good, I would say she's heading towards Paladin (which is roughly covered by White Knight here). But she's a villain and the closest evil counterpart is Black Knight. The Name is just a coat over the true player that is her Role anyway.

Dragrath

Dianna I think the Green Knight comes from the legends of King Arthur but I don't think it really fits as the Green Knight is a Judge or tester of the character of The knights of the Round and in legends It just doesn't match Cat at all.

Shequi

She's already a Knight.

A Moonless (K)night...

The quietist

Agreed, though perhaps if she had become a hero she would have done a Black i.e. shift her role down a pragmatic institutional path i.e. no final battles one on one in fiery castles. Which would mirror the broader pattern as one side evolves changing the other in turn.

Euodiachloris

Note to self: add Orcs to the list of people to never get into a drinking match with.

I'm pretty sure they can handle pure ethanol. 😊

Vortex Magus

Typos:

>Praes would have acted in its interest, and that meant torching the country. Procer would have acted in its interests, which was making us a protectorate.

Praes would have acted in its interest, and that meant torching the country. Procer would have acted in its interest

(They're both singular nations, so "interest" should be either singular or plural – the same for both of them)

>"William was never meant to lead," Thief said. "He was terrible at it. But I look at the party we had, and can't help but thing there was always supposed to be one.

"William was never meant to lead." Thief said. "He was terrible at it. But I look at the party we had, and can't help but thing there was always supposed to be one more hero.

(Pivotal sentence confused me for a bit!)

Vortex Magus

>"The First Prince has a hundred thousand battle-hardened veterans and the wealthiest nation on Calernian at her feet.

Calernia?

(I'm pretty sure the continent's name is Calernia, right?)

George

Yeah it's Calernia. Could say wealthiest Calernian nation, of course.

Morgenstern

Calernian "soil" is what I read as missing. Unless one just corrects it to "Calernia".

Morgenstern

Ehrm..

"William was never meant to lead," Thief said. "He was terrible at it. But I look at the party we had, and can't help but thing there was always supposed to be one."

You corrected the thing that needed no correction ("one" refers to LEADER, the role which William was *not meant for*.) and your mind seemingly autocorrected = overlooked the one glaring typo: "thing" should be "think" in this sentence. 😊

Vortex

Eh I am pretty sure that if she had said "William was never meant to be leader" then yes you would be correct. But "William was never meant to lead" makes the implied "one" different and it is necessary to specify that there is "one more leader" in the sentence.

You are totally right about thing -> think though LOL

Shequi

I think by "there was always supposed to be one", she means one party.

Laferno

"[I think you think your side's] any gentler than mine, you've been listening to stories too much." -> "If you think your side's]..."

"We'll be splitting their forces with multiple [assault] so you don't bear the brunt of it." -> assaults

And you think they'll just let General Juniper leisurely stroll south?" he [sceptically] asked. -> skeptically

Shequi

Sceptical is the correct spelling. Skeptical with a k is a US-specific neo-usage. I'm sure ee has said somewhere before that they are used to Commonwealth English.

Barthumphries

Well all knew

Ren

And just like that, we have our fifth Calamity equivalent.

Squire – Black Knight

Apprentice – Warlock

Adjutant – Captain

Archer – Ranger

Thief – Assassin

Dianna

Maybe, maybe, though in my heart Robber will always be on the list of Named in the Jr Calamities. Theif can never truly fit into the bloodied, broken, and ravaged place He ruthlessly ripped out of our hearts.

jonnnney

There are 6 calamities. Given Thief's squeamishness about killing guards and her becoming the spymaster for Catherine I'd call her the Scribe equivalent.

I'm still holding out hope that Robber gets a name and becomes the Assassin equivalent.

Cicero

is he not already one? i think in one of the interludes akula described him as a named one. And goblins do not talk about their names.

Jonnnney

It's unclear atm. There have been allusions to him having a name, but his personality and power don't match up to them. His encounter with thief showed his limited strength and he thoughts about Pickler and his fear of the matrons regarding the stone tongue makes me think he lacks the strength of personality to be a named.

narcoduck

Vice Queen? That's interesting considering what Akua is railing against in her interlude.

"Praes is a story," she said. "A Tyrant to lead us. A Black Knight to break heroes. A Warlock to craft wonders. A Chancellor to rule behind them. And an Empire like clay, to shape into the tool they need: an entire nation built to empower the ambitions of a single villain."

Foundling to lead, her 15th Legion with a Knightly Order to break Creation, Apprentice to defy the Gods, and a Governor General to rule behind them. Where Praes calcifies, Callow bends to the whim of a waif of a girl to become something new.

Shawn Panzegraf

First,

At this point there have been MULTIPLE 1-on-1 conversations between Black and the Empress where Black points out Catherine's STORY of working within the Praesi system to rebuild Callow is his Callow Endgame, meant to exterminate even the POSSIBILITY of new Heroes rising in Callow "Unless Foundling loses her way." Malicia has agreed, or at least gone along with Black on this every single time it has come up.

Second, Malicia (just like Black) is ACUTELY aware that Black's time as the Black Knight is coming to a close. She was aware of that (and told CAT as much during their FIRST personal meeting) and that's why she was so keenly interested in finding out "What does Cat WANT?"

When you announce in a matter of fact way that the Black Knight's expiration date is nearing to the individual who traditionally succeeds the Black Knight as the new Black Knight, you're already looking to the future.

Three, Malicia has made it clear to Black where she draws the line at the free hand she's given him to mold Squire as he sees fit. Black, in turn, and as he just recommended Cat by scrying mirror has made it clear where HE draws the line. Cat hasn't crossed any of those lines...what's MORE:

Fourth, Black AS MUCH AS STATED that when he returned, he and Cat would go on a good old fashioned put-noble-heads-on-pikes reaving. It was even freaking CAT out, how far Black was telling her he was willing to go so long as she understood Callowan Independence wasn't in the cards.

Fifth, the Dread Empire judges by results. If this all blows up in Cat's face, of course she's a treasonous bitch for claiming partial autonomy over Callow and forming a Knightly Order. If, on the other hand, the Fae are repelled, Diabolist is dealt with and Procer is kept on their side of the border, there will be public laurels for Cat, and private concessions to the Tower for going rogue in a limited way. Behind the scenes however, Black and Malicia will approve of her effective seizing of the initiative to, as Cat say, get things done.

Or at least that's how I see the various chapters implications.

jonnney

That's pretty much how I am seeing it.

Soronel Haetir

"An alliance of victors is like a hearth in summer."
– Julianne Merovins, tenth First Princess of Procer

I thought even the female leaders of Procer were styled "Prince". Certainly the current holder of the role has made a point of being addressed as 'Prince'.

Shequi

That's a Rhenian usage. Cordelia insists on "First Prince" because Prince is the official form of the title – even for female rulers – in Rhenia.

That's explicitly mentioned in the Prologue to Book 2: <https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2015/11/04/prologue-2/>

Fantasyaddict

Hi, I've read your entire series so far, and love it. I think with a good edit and ending book 1 early you'd have a great book to release. 1 significantly better than most of the self published fantasy novels out there. I at least would buy it in a second.

Reveen

Pretty disappointed Thief doesn't have anything of substance to say in response to Squire's rant. You'd think she'd be a little bit sharper and be able to find a chink in her rhetoric to point at.

---

Cat's rhetoric is not that solid, given how much of it relies on promises, but between being the only major player in reach that doesn't want Callow on fire, and Thief's own mindset of a rascal that meddles with the right people to get away with it, the more she objects, the easier is it to undermine both her only feasible option and her “at least I’m trying” moral high ground.

Cat doesn’t build a solid argument, she probes for Thief’s objectives and morals, and then proposes a course of action that would allow her to keep hold of them, loosely.

Dylan Tullos

Cat’s argument is simple, practical, tailored to her audience...and wrong.

Unlike Cat, we’ve actually seen inside Cordelia Hassenbach’s head, and we know that she isn’t interested in expanding Procer’s borders. The First Prince seeks peace among all Good-aligned states, and she would be glad to have a strong, independent Callow as an ally.

Cat has a skeptical view of Procer, and history justifies her skepticism. She can’t know that Cordelia came to power with a genuine commitment to serving the cause of Good, not increasing Procer’s secular power. If Black and Malicia are “Practical Evil”, Cordelia is “Classic Good”; she’s willing to play the game of thrones, but she keeps her eye on the larger goal, and never forgets that the Princedom has a larger role to play in the battle between Good and Evil.

As Cat’s strength grows, a rebellion against the Tower becomes more and more possible. Most of the Fifteenth is Callowan now, and most of her new recruits are former rebels. Callowans are learning the methods of the Legions, developing the knowledge and experience they’d need for a successful uprising. If Cat manages to make peace with Summer and thwart Akua’s plan (big ifs), she’ll have a substantial, battle-hardened army trained in Legion methods and entirely willing to kill Praesi on her command.

Black is placing a great deal of trust in an apprentice who isn’t loyal to the Dread Empire. The day will come when Callow’s interests no longer converge with Black’s plan, and the First Prince will be ready to lend her aid to any Callowan rebellion.

(Also, I just realized his plan to eliminate Callowan Heroes isn’t going to happen. Cat just resurrected a Knightly Order, and she’s rejected the idea of Callowans as light-skinned Praesi. We may see a return of traditional Callowan Names under Cat’s command, but it looks less and less likely that they’ll go away.)

Dylan, but Cordelia isn't just forging an alliance of Good nations, she's doing it to launch the tenth crusade. It's stated in the first interlude where she appears, that a war abroad is her only way to both consolidate the principalities and to keep the otherwise unemployed soldiers out of her rivals' hands. Her motto is "We are the wall"; leave her to stew in peace for a couple of decades, and she's not the wall anymore.

Dylan Tullos

__, I am sorry if my reply is out of order. The "Reply" button doesn't appear on your latest post, so I can't be sure that my post will appear under the comment I was responding to.

Yes, the whole point of forming an alliance of Good nations is to launch the Tenth Crusade. But the Tenth Crusade isn't going to involve Procer invading the Dominion of the Levant, or turning Callow into a protectorate, or any of the territorial adventures that they're so historically fond of. Cordelia Hassenbach has accepted that Procer's borders are just fine as they are, and she's not interested in expanding at the expense of her neighbors.

Thanks to the Tyrant Kairos, Procer has a partial solution to at least one of its problems. Cordelia has been able to ship off thousands of her soldiers to serve as mercenaries in the Free Cities, where they can serve Procer's interests rather than being an ongoing problem. She's acting as "the wall" against Kairos, who adores playing the part of the villain, and reinforces her Good vs Evil narrative just by existing. A long peace would be bad for Cordelia's status as the Warden of Good, but it doesn't seem likely right now.

Unlike Black, Cordelia is just fine with a strong, independent Callow. By accepting that Procer doesn't need to grow its territories, she's opened the door to being a real ally, rather than an imperial power that needs to control Callow. What would be the problem with a Tenth Crusade that liberated Callow, drove the Praesi back to the Wasteland, and ended Malicia and Black's reign? Catherine would have a chance to rule a stronger, more functional Callow without Praesi interference, and she'd have an allied nation whose cultural ethos isn't based on compulsive backstabbing. That doesn't seem like a bad thing to me.

"What would be the problem with a Tenth Crusade that liberated Callow, drove the Praesi back to the Wasteland, and ended Malicia and Black's reign?"

<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2016/10/12/heroic-interlude-prise-au-fer/>

The first crusade was a good one. The second crusade was “crushed into dust”. The third “ended in disaster and the end of the crusader nations – to further compound the disgrace, a weakened Callow was occupied by Procer in its wake. The Fourth Crusade, a last-ditch attempt to reclaim Praes, was drowned in such a sea of blood by Terribilis that never again was a crusade to turn East.”

After that, the four following crusades never attempted to fight the “Evil” Tower and Praes, they instead all turned against the truly greater evil, “the Dead King and his realm of horrors, a monster who called even devils to heel.”

Then he waxed on about the seventh crusade. Strangely enough, although there have been nine crusades, William only reminisces about 8. I’m not sure what happened during the ninth crusade.

Anyway, the tenth crusade might sweep towards Praes, because “Malicia was no great warlord, not the way Terribilis had been, and her greatest general was getting old.” But someone has to kill the Black Knight first.

“The First Prince of Procer was plotting a Tenth Crusade, holed up in her capital, and William would give it to her. But it would not be a Proceran enterprise, and it would not end with Callow as her protectorate. The rest of Calernia would not stand for that sin being committed a second time.” Or would they? You’ve heard of the golden rule, no not that one, the one that says, “He who has the gold makes the rules”? After the First Prince retook Callow, and had beaten back Praes, would the rest of Calernia really have the strength to stand up and tell her, “No”? Not to mention, pretty much all that fighting would happen in Callow. Most of Callow would be decimated, most of its cities would be destroyed, and then how would ruined Callow be expected to protect itself? No, she’d have to claim it as a protectorate, even if but for a “temporary” time, or it’d just get retaken a few years later.

Barthumphries:

The First Crusade defeated Triumphant, and in the Second Crusade, it was the Praesi, not the Crusaders, who were “crushed into dust”. Heiress mentions the aftermath of the Second Crusade as the moment when the Praesi came closest to their destruction as a nation. Terribilis II managed to save the Dread Empire from division into crusader states and cultural obliteration. He defeated the Third Crusade, and destroyed the Fourth so utterly that no Good nation ever tried to occupy Praes again.

As you say, every other known Crusade has been against the Dead King. I assume that the author's failure to mention the Ninth isn't an oversight, and that there's something unusual about the last Crusade in Calernia.

Since we have the benefit of seeing inside Cordelia's head, we know that she doesn't want to occupy Callow. Cordelia is focused on Procer's role as the Warden of the West, the defender of Good. An occupied Callow would be a constant source of discontent and rebellion, a weakness that would give Praes an opportunity. A strong, independent Callow, allied with Procer against the Dread Empire, would allow Cordelia to complete her Grand Alliance of Good vs Evil, shutting the Praesi up in the Wasteland.

Cordelia lives in the north of Procer, facing off against the Chain of Hunger, with the Dead King always waiting for a chance to invade. Her primary concern isn't "how can I expand my territory"; it's "how can I protect my people". She would be glad to rebuild Callow, no strings attached, so that the Kingdom can return to its historical role as the guardian against Praesi invasion, freeing her people to return to their historical role as the guardian against the Chain and the Dead King.

Catherine is used to the princes of southern Procer, who are shielded from Praes by Callow and from the Chain and the Dead King by the northern realms of Procer. The southern Princes are safe from the forces of Evil, and they're frequently willing to weaken the cause of Good if it increases their own secular power. After all, it's not their lands which are going to get invaded. Cordelia comes from an entirely different situation, and her focus is on working together against Evil, not backstabbing fellow Good nations.

The question isn't "Could Cordelia turn Callow into a protectorate?", but "Does she want to?". Since we've seen inside her head, and know that the First Prince is genuinely committed to avoiding Procer's past mistakes, we can see the possibility of a real alliance between Procer and Callow. Cat can't see that possibility, but it's real, and if she ever gets to meet Cordelia, she could learn of an alternative to her current arrangement with Black.

Barthumphries

"Does she want to"

No, the real question is, "Would she have to?" I don't think her allies, and her people, would be just fine with donating lots of resources to a land on the brink of starvation.

Basically, it would be like West Germany after WWII (where a couple slices of bread might be all the average person had to eat for a day, and with all their factories destroyed), but with Hitler still alive in East Germany. Sure, the American people were fine with shipping millions of dollars in food aid, and military aid to thwart Russia but would her people feel the same way, especially with "Hitler" (i.e. Malicia) still alive in the country next door? Probably not.

Dylan Tullos

BartHumphries:

Cordelia wouldn't convince Procerans to rebuild Callow out of the pure generosity of their hearts. They would pay to rebuild Callow so that Procer would have a powerful ally standing between them and the Dread Empire. As we've seen in the Free Cities, Procer is willing to give huge sums of silver to their allies so that the Good-aligned Free Cities can hire mercenaries to fight the Tyrant. There's no meaningful difference between giving the Free Cities money to hire mercenaries and giving Callow food and aid in rebuilding. In both cases, Procer is acting for practical reasons, supporting an ally so they'll be strong enough to fight Procer's enemies.

Having Malicia alive and in charge of the Dread Empire makes Cordelia's case simpler. If their main enemy is still a threat, it only makes sense to ensure that the state that traditionally halts the Dread Empire is capable of doing their job. Every copper they spend on food now is a copper they don't have to spend on armies later. As long as Cordelia frames her arguments in terms of "rebuilding Callow's armies" rather than "helping Callow's people", she'll be fine. It just so happens that rebuilding Callow's armies means helping Callow's people, since it's difficult to recruit peasant levies when their families are starving to death.

America didn't pour wealth into West Germany because Americans were all nice people who felt for the poor Germans; we paid to ensure that our client state would be strong and stable enough to resist Soviet influence. Procer would pay for a Callowan army that could resist the Legions, freeing Procer from the need to fight the Dread Empire on their own. No charity or goodness is required.

Is it intentional that Cat's mooted title of 'Vicequeen' is just a letter away from Ice Queen? I mean now that she's single it could also be argued that she's building her kingdom of isolation. She also still has the power to rise like the break of dawn...

If she starts telling herself to let it go, or breaks into song then I'm calling it.

Imagination

I'm personally still amused that the 'Gallowborne' are only one letter away from the 'Callow-born'

DocTao

Is there a possibility that Cat is gonna get the Chancellor name? If we think of a name as a thing with its own motives, that one has been repressed for a while, must be dying to get on the field. Work with and at the same time oppose the Tower.

@Erraticerrata:

Thank-you! Fantastic chapter, and the "where do you stand?" exchange between Cat and Thief was so good – squee! Vivid, meaningful dialogue between two well-realised (well, Thief a bit less-so) characters, consistent with their histories and personalities... ooh. And It was incredibly satisfying to see how Cat's actions match her intentions, and how it hurts when she fails... and I do like the fact that Thief is revealed as a bit of poser; like real-world Liberals, she just never thought the implications through. Doing the right thing and failing is nothing more than a grand gesture; it's neither heroism nor useful.

George

It might be better to keep real world politics out of things, in my opinion.

nehemiahnewell

One thing that worries me...

" "And the Diabolist has an army out in the field," I said. "So far the Summer Court has refrained from hitting Liesse. I've sent two Named down there to remedy to that. Akua Sahelian will have to be dealt with after the fae are repelled, and I don't want her forces fresh when it happens." "

She's turning to deal with Akua after she deals with summer. If she had to deal with Akua on the way to dealing with Summer she would be garentteed a win – it would be the first step, and villains always win the first step. But dealing with her afterwards is consolidating her victory. Squire tends to win the conflict, but is thwarted in the afterward in a way that leads to more conflict.

Likewise, Akua had a big step up, so Squire to Diabolist was Squire as the underdog. But now that she's the Duke of Moonless Night they're once again peers.

Squires path to the top isn't complete yet, she's still in a transitional name – I could see her defeating her peer and rival for the final time if she was on her final name, but she's still in a transitional one, and Akua has some sort of plan to ascend further.

I'm sort of done with her, but I suspect Akua will find a way of swing it where her actions might break the letter of the law... but so did Squires. Both of them "had" to do what they because of the situation. Squire was just warned she'll have to make concessions because of resurrecting the Knightly Orders. I think Akua is that price.

She'll be able to swing her actions as for the glory of Praesi even if against the letter of the land. And as Squire did the same it's all ok.

George

Wasn't taking this city the first step?

nehemiahnewell

Nah, it was prep work. These weren't 'real' opponents. If thief decided to make it a fight, sure, but she fell in line. It's just like how Tyrant killing everyone but Anaxares didn't count. It needed to happen for Tyrant to make his war, but didn't really count as part of it. Just prep work.

Well, that's my viewpoint.

But by putting her off till after and raising the Knightly Orders, I think she's given up this chance to get rid of Akua.

George

I think keep work happening off screen is usually what the first step is, and that that's why it always succeeds.

BartHumphries

"But by putting her off till after and raising the Knightly Orders, I think she's given up this chance to get rid of Akua."

I think it's clear now that Diabolist is her counter, the antagonist to her protagonist status, her archnemesis. I agree, I don't think she's going to be getting rid of Akua any time soon. I think it's going to be like The Princess Bride:

(spoiler alert)

Kid: "Who gets Humperdinck?"

Grandpa: "I don't understand."

Kid: "Who kills Prince Humperdinck? At the end, somebody's got to do it! Is it Inigo? Who?"

Grandpa: "Nobody. Nobody kills him. He lives."

Kid: "You mean he wins? Jesus, grand-pa, why did you read me this thing for?"

Grandpa: "You know, you've been very sick, and you're taking this story very seriously. I think we'd better stop now."

Grandpa gets up as if to leave.

Kid: "No, I'm ok. I'm ok. Sit down. I'm all right."

As much as I'm annoyed/angry that Diabolist might not die and otherwise get what's coming to her, the narrative structure of the story might just keep bringing her back. Ad just because she lives doesn't mean that she wins. 😊

PS What's the update schedule for this story now? I thought I heard something about twice a week?

I finally caught up, so have a brief review.

It would, I think, be foolish to strenuously avoid comparisons between this and Worm, but for my part I think you've surpassed it. There's several points that I appreciate where you've improved upon it; for one, it's gratifying to see such firm acknowledge of the evil that Catherine has signed on with, and the cosmology that you've laid out seems to preclude the kind of late-story ludicrous power scaling that made Worm fall apart for me.

It's also very telling to me that you aren't afraid to let Catherine simply /lose/. Worm threw obstacles at Taylor so she was always threatened, but she never precisely suffered a serious setback or out-and-out defeat. Leviathan was fairly emblematic of the tempo of her story; Brockton Bay was laid to waste, but that was framed as a bloody victory rather than calamitous defeat, because Endbringers had been built up as that big a deal.

Catherine has had more of a mixed track record. She's had her spectacular wins, but she's also had occasions where in the course of the campaign she's tried something and simply failed. Gambled and lost. Her enemies have outsmarted her, or been more powerful than expected, and she's been forced to abandon her objective and retreat, her only victory of the encounter that she kept it from turning into a rout.

This speaks to a confidence in where your story is going, a desire to avoid pointless escalation, and an understanding of the need to actually plan things out.

Not to say it's perfect. Chapters could, I think, benefit from a sentence-by-sentence read-through to address some technical failings, but unfortunately I'm not really the person to do that, and equally I understand the limitations of your schedule. That said, I am very happy with what I've read so far!

Dylan Tullos

Tal Morgan:

When has Catherine lost?

She defeated her rivals for Squire in Act I, beat the Lone Swordsman, and won the competition for control of the Fifteenth. In Act II, she crushed the Exiled Prince and his Silver Spears, defeated the demonic incursion, and killed the Lone Swordsman. She even beat Akua to within an inch of her life.

The biggest setback she had was the collapse of her Council, and she's recovered instantly from that, executing the Praesi usurpers and essentially declaring herself Queen with Black's support. I can't think of a single fight that Catherine has actually out-and-out lost.

The Calamities are even worse. If this story was told from a different viewpoint, they'd be fantastic antagonists, terrifying monsters who have killed a graveyard's worth of Heroes. Since they're protagonists, though, they destroy dramatic tension. Black is obviously smarter and more capable than all of the Heroes he goes up against; during his fight with the White Knight, there wasn't a single point where I felt that he was in danger of death or even serious injury. He dominated the fight, and at the very moment when the Story might have swung things against him, he simply disappeared.

Much as I enjoy the world and the story, the author writes "Heroes" who are far less intelligent and formidable than their adversaries. With the single exception of Cordelia Hassenbach, who seems to be a worthy opponent for Malicia, none of the heroes we've met are real challengers for Team Practical Evil. Though he's far superior to the Lone Swordsman, the White Knight is hardly a match for Black, and his team, though earning high marks for banter and general awesomeness, were effortlessly outsmarted and outfought by the Calamities.

On one hand, we have a team of Villains that have worked and fought side by side for decades, veterans of at least two major wars and a hundred smaller skirmishes. On the other hand, we have a plucky, adorable team of Heroes that fights hard and does well against Kairos's Classic Evil. Fun as they are to read about, I never feel that they have a chance against Black and company, which means the only real tension comes from the conflict between Classic Evil and Practical Evil.

Maybe I'm forgetting some important defeats, but so far I haven't been impressed with the quality of Catherine's Good-aligned opposition. So far, they've either been supremely incompetent (Lone Swordsman) or simply not that threatening (Thief). For a protagonist's victories to be meaningful, they need adversaries who are formidable. Akua has stepped up in that regard, but there hasn't been a single Hero who genuinely seems to be close to Catherine's equal, and that shortcoming weakens the story, limiting Catherine to easy victories over chumps like the Exiled Prince and the Lone Swordsman.

nehemiahnewell

Yeah, and Akua has the problem that she's the explicit champion of a failed path, and is so anti-charismatic that you can't even pseudo-root for her.

Tal Morgan

"When has Catherine lost?" She's never lost a story arc, no, but there are definite occasions such as when she attempted to unlock her third Aspect early, or sallied out to try and rescue her wounded from the freshly-released demonic incursion, where she has simply tried something and failed.

Dylan Tullos

nehemiahnewell:

Yeah, Akua is not the kind of villain people love to cheer for.

With the vital exception of Cordelia Hassenbach, I feel like we're being robbed of alternative perspectives; Cat never really runs into anyone who can argue with her or convincingly present a different point of view. Most of her officers worship their Squire, and the Heroes she's encountered so far are either incompetent (Exiled Prince, Lone Swordsman) or not particularly good at big-picture planning (Thief). I'd like to see some perspectives from people who don't play on Team Squire and aren't inept or megalomaniac villains. White Knight is promising, but he's focused on Black, not Catherine.

nehemiahnewell

His surrender of personal responsibility is so abhorrent that it's basically impossible to have a meaningful discussion with him unless you're full in to divine command theory territory. He himself won't engage with it, giving up responsibility to others.

You just saw her rebuttal to his argument. She's met an angel, and doesn't see them as morally superior to Man. Quite the reverse, she finds them evil brainwashing monsters unworthy of respect in a personal sense.

There can be no discussion at that point.

Dylan Tullos

nehemiahnewell:

Oh, I'm definitely not defending the Lone Swordsman. The only possible justification for his actions is that he went insane after he murdered his sister, wandered into the wilderness, and fell prey to an angel who was looking for a mentally fragile Callowan to use as a human sacrifice. The other Heroes in his band seem more or less human, while William thinks, talks, and acts like a badly programmed robot.

The problem is that the Lone Swordsman is incapable of making rational arguments because he's been brainwashed by an angel. If he was a functional human being, he could point out that Black and Malicia are ultimately going to die. Sooner or later, an old-school villain is going to become Tyrant, and they'll be able to use the professional Legions Black built to engage in the traditional Praesi hobby of trying to conquer the world. Unless Catherine wants Callow to eventually end up under the rule of Akua, or someone like her, she needs to find a way to break away from the Dread Empire.

That's just one argument, and it's not hard to find others. The current crop of Villains in Praes is exceptional. They're the only ones since Triumphant to actually conquer Callow, two successes out of seventy attempts. Clearly, Callowan independence isn't impossible; Catherine's defeatism is a product of historical ignorance and well-founded fear of the current Legions. But successful rebellion is just a matter of waiting for the inevitable Praesi civil war, and rising when the time is right. If William had the good sense to stage a rising when Akua made her move, with the two thousand knights Catherine just recruited, he could have liberated Callow while Black was distracted in the Free Cities.

I said earlier that Catherine never loses, and I think that's true. But she never really wins, either. No matter how many people she kills and victories she wins, Foundling is building on sand. Praes isn't going to change if she kills a thousand aristocrats; their replacements always be looking for another chance to rise, to seize power in Callow. Malicia will die, Black will die, and the Calamities will die, but the culture of the Dread Empire will live on.

Breaking is easy. Building is hard. So far, Catherine has broken everyone in her path, and she's built...nothing. The Ruling Council is dead. Callowan trust in the Dread Empire is nonexistent. Her own success comes from the fact that Callow sees her fighting the Dread Empire and hopes that she'll eventually lead a rebellion. Praes views Callow as a conquered province, just as they did at the start, and Callow views the Praesi as foreign invaders, just as they did at the start. All of her battles and duels and victories have brought her here, and she's still trying to build a functional nation with a sword, insisting that enough violence can magically solve all of the problems she doesn't have real solutions for.

nehemiahnewell

I was actually talking about White Knight with his coin flip. He might be better than the Lone Swordsmen, but his surrendering of personal responsibility is if anything even more absolute.

Chapter 21: Example

"To conquer until all of Creation is desert or province: that is the ideal of Praes. Mock their failures if you must but do not ever forget their victories.”

– King Albert Fairfax of Callow, the Thrice-Invaded

The sword tore through flesh and bone with a meaty sound, sending the guard's head rolling on the ground. A waste – Black would not have pursued him, had he fled. Shaking the blood off his blade with a flick of the wrist, the green-eyed Knight stepped deeper into the Pirate Queen's sanctum, feet burdened with grim purpose.

“Amateurs,” Ranger said from his side. “They didn't even have a proper watch.”

“They thought they were safe,” Black replied.

“They won't after tonight,” Warlock added. “If any of them survive, anyway.”

The chatter was unnecessary, but he'd long become used to Warlock's cheerfully morbid comments enough that it barely registered. Still, he traded a half-amused, half-exasperated glance with Ranger. They met another corsair on their way to the throne room but this one did not even get to open her mouth before Wekesa turned her upper body into ash: dealing with the pirates was child's play after a year of back alley dogfights with his rivals and the Order of the White Hand, not to mention the civil war that followed. Not a reason to get sloppy, but overestimating an enemy was just as dangerous as overestimating them. By the time they reached the doors to the Pirate Queen's own throne room the sounds of the mess outside had started to drift up to their ears. Curses and screams of terrors tore through the night's quiet, the same reaction Captain always elicited when she dared to cut loose. Black pushed open the driftwood doors in front of him without breaking stride, ready to finally put an end to the night's slaughter.

“They sent the Black Knight and his death squad for little 'ole me? Guess I should be flattered,” the Queen laughed as she rose from her throne and unsheathed her cutlass. “So which of you feels like dancing with death, children?”

Ranger sighed and shot the Queen in the leg, arrow knocked and flying faster than you could take a breath.

“Is it me or does that never get old?” Warlock mused. “They always get the funniest look on their faces when we won't play along.”

The Pirate Queen dropped to the floor with a hoarse cry of pain, clutching her leg. Black wasted no time closing the distance and kicked her cutlass out of her hands.

“You are correct,” he said. “I am the Black Knight.”

"Do you have no honour –"she started.

"No," Black replied, crouching to be of a height with her.

"Drop the knife, Pirate," Ranger called out. "Otherwise the next one goes through the eye."

There was the clatter of metal on the ground and the Queen let go of the blade she'd pulled from under her tunic, grimacing.

"Fine, you lot are big and bad," she snarled. "You made your point. Why am I still alive?"

"Because you set half of Thalassina on fire a few months back," Black said.

"You going to parade me around Ater 'cause I've been a bad girl?" the pirate asked with an ugly smile. "And to think I'd heard you were dropping the old way bullshit."

"You misunderstand me," the Black Knight replied. "It takes talent, to execute an operation of that breadth."

"You should work on your recruitment pitch, love," Queen sneered. "I'm feeling a mite uncooperative at the moment."

Black's eyes hardened.

"Your prize ship has been sunk. Most your lieutenants are dead. You are kneeling on the floor of your very seat of power," he murmured. "Bringing you to this took me four people and a rowboat, Pirate. You asked me what my point was? This is it. Do not make me repeat myself."

"Fuck it, and fuck you," the Pirate Queen smiled. "I'm not flying an Imperial flag, and I'm sure as Hells not gonna take orders from the Tower. Do your worst, boy – I've laughed in the face of harder men than you."

Warlock's eyes became wreathed in fire and the dark-skinned man stepped forward, but Black held up a hand to stop him.

"You call yourself the Pirate Queen, but I've noticed your crews sometimes refer to themselves as corsairs," the Black Knight said.

"You trying to bore me to death, Knight? I'll give you points for originality,"

"Unlike pirates, corsairs are known to sometimes operate under official sanction," Black said. "Not as part of a nation's navy, but as... auxiliaries of a sort."

The Pirate Queen eyed him dubitatively.

"If we're not raiding Praes then who?"

"By the end of the week word will spread to the Free Cities that the pirate threat has been dealt with," Black smiled coldly. "I expect merchant shipping to Thalassina to resume soon after."

"Well look at the balls on you," the Queen whistled. "Won't they just bail again when I start boarding their boats?"

"Not if you confine yourself to a handful of them per month," Black said. "A risky business, certainly, but there will be enough who think the payoff worth it. The Dread Empire would, of course, collect a cut in exchange for the right to operate in its waters."

"So you want my ships on a leash, is that it?" the pirate sneered. "What if I say no?"

The green-eyed man laid the flat of his blade on his knees.

"That is your prerogative."

There was a long moment of silence as the Queen mulled over the offer. Sighing, she finally spat in the palm of her hand and offered it to the man in front of her. Black spat into his own without batting an eye, ignoring her puerile attempt to crush his fingers when they shook on it. He rose.

"A woman named Scribe will come tomorrow to work out the details of the arrangement. A pleasant evening to you, then," the Knight said as he sheathed his sword. He made for the door, but before he could pass the threshold the Queen called out to him.

"Knight," she asked. "If I'd said no, what would you have done?"

"Used your head a prop when making the same offer to your second-in-command," Black replied, not even bothering to turn as he strode out of the Pirate Queen's throne room.

There was no slow transition between sleep and wakefulness. I was one, then I the other. I rolled out of my sheets still tired and padded across the room to the window. Dawn had come a gone hours ago, by the looks of the sun. Grabbing a blanket from a seat, I wrapped myself in it but found it did nothing to hinder the cold. It wasn't coming from outside, I supposed. Breathing out quietly, I stared at the gardens sprawling below and considered the Name dream I'd just woken up from. It'd been a while, since I'd last had one of those. I'd known for years that Black had handled the pirates based in the Tidelesse Isles after the Empress ascended to the throne, but that there'd been a Named involved was not common knowledge. Considering that the pirates had first come from a Praesi fleet smashed by the Thalassocracy one at port, that they'd eventually be forced back into Imperial service was darkly amusing. The history lesson wasn't why I'd gotten the dream, of course. I had decisions ahead of me.

Robber, by now, would have prisoners from the Dark Guilds. If there were any from the Thieves I'd have to release them, but that still left the Smugglers and the Assassins. Months ago, I'd thought to dismantle the Guild of Assassins. Even before Ratface had laid out the logistical difficulties of that, I'd had a little chat with the Empress on the subject. Pointless, she'd called the entire enterprise. I still disagreed with her. There was a difference between a handful of men and woman who killed for coin spread all over Callow and an organized guild of them. The part she might have been correct about was that the amount of time and resources I'd have to sink into this far outweighed the gains to be made – namely, the absence of a godsdamned gang of killers for hire in my homeland. The situation had changed since she and I had talked: back then, all I'd had to worry about was Heiress plotting in the south. Now I had other cats to skin than a guild that probably killed fewer people in my territory every year than roadside accidents.

My Name was urging me to make vassals of them. Pretty bluntly, too. I clenched my fingers and unclenched them. It wasn't a decision I was willing to make before looking one of them in the eyes. I turned away from the window. Breakfast, first, and then a show. Hakram should have organized everything by now.

"It's not a Praesi invention, you know," Adjutant said.

"Huh," I said. "That's surprising. They're the ones famous for it."

The sun had melted any traces of frost our passage had made in Fairfax Place. Not that anyone would be able to see them anyway: the plaza was packed to the brim with the people of Laure. Hakram had to place criers at street corners to arrange as much, since just nailing parchments announcing the mandatory presence would have been largely pointless. The overwhelming majority of people in the capital couldn't read, and it was still one of the most educated places in Callow – some of the Fairfaxes had encouraged scholarship, though never to the extent of funding academies like they did in some of the Proceran principalities. I imagined that kind of expense would have been hard to justify when the Legions could be marching on Summerholm at any time. It was impossible for a crowd this size – there must have been twenty thousand people in the plaza alone – to be silent, but it was quiet. The appearance of my legionaries had been so sudden no one knew quite what to make of it.

"Miezans brought it with them over the sea," Hakram told me. "It was the punishment for rowdy slaves."

The tall orc was standing besides me, so I could see the displeasure on his face as he spoke. Considering orcs had made for very popular slaves in the Miezan Empire, I could take a guess as to why.

"So when Triumphant was using it, it had... implications," I murmured.

Adjutant refrained from adding 'may she never return' though his hand twitched when he suppressed the reflex of bringing his knuckles to his forehead.

"I'm telling you this because the High Lords will think it's part of the message you're sending," the orc said.

I nodded. The both of us watched Nauk's men drag the usurpers to the tall wooden crosses we'd had placed in the middle of the plaza. Satang looked numb, but Murad was struggling against the pair of Callowan legionaries forcing him to move. One of them lost patience and cracked a gauntleted hand across his mouth, drawing blood. The two Praesi were hoisted up the cross, and then an orc brought out the iron spikes and the hammer. Satang's hoarse scream filled the plaza as the legionary nailed her first wrist down.

"You are rowdy slaves to me," I muttered. "Well, that ought to get their attention."

"They'll be pushing to censure you through the Imperial court," Hakram said.

"The Court I have to worry about isn't in Ater," I replied.

Another gut-wrenching scream echoed as the work on Murad began.

"Breaking entirely with the Tower would have consequences," Adjutant said. "Ones we are ill-equipped to handle."

"I'll be calling myself a vicequeen, no a queen," I said. "There's an implication there I still answer to Her Dread Majesty."

"You're claiming a territory as large as Praes as under your direct command," Hakram pointed out. "You'd be more an ally than a vassal."

"She'll get tribute and soldiers," I said. "She struck the same deal with Daoine."

"You're not this thick," the orc gravelled. "Don't pretend."

Callow wasn't Daoine, of course. Its fields fed the Wasteland and its population was near the size of Praes'. There was a difference in the balance of power – Malicia could not allow me to just declare the de facto independence for a territory this large. It would be a major loss of face, influence and wealth for her. She would likely have to deal with internal rebellions if she was somehow convinced of the notion.

"I'm done letting High Lords having a say here, Hakram," I said.

"Please," Murad screamed, but the legionaries forced his legs together and drove a spike through the flesh and bone.

"Then find concessions to make," Adjutant replied. "We'll have around twice our number in legionaries on the field by the end of this. Fighting them would not end well, and the Empress will give the order if you leave her no other choice."

I conceded the point with a sullen grunt. Kilian hadn't been wrong on one thing: I had tired of compromise. The last spike tore through Satang Motherless' ankles and the legionaries wiped the blood off their armour with calm professionalism before moving away. The two Wastelanders hung from their crosses limply. Time for my part, then.

"The Ruling Council is officially dissolved," I spoke, weaving a thread of power into my voice so it would carry for blocks. "As of this moment, I take command of Callow until martial law is lifted. A Governor-General will be appointed shortly to oversee Laure."

I paused to let that sink in.

"You may disperse," I finished.

I allowed my eyes to scan the crowd. This was, in essence, the pivot of my presence in the capital. If a riot ensued everything was gonna go to shit – I'd need to leave behind a garrison and it was all down here from there. The scene with the two usurpers had been as much to sate them with blood as to offer a reminder: rebels died ugly deaths. Silence, the kind you only got in a church, reigned supreme. Then the first man knelt. From there it was like an avalanche. Within heartbeats, there was not a man woman or child standing in Fairfax Place. I breathed out slowly, then composed myself.

"Take me where Robber keeps them," I ordered Hakram, and we left without a word.

Going back Dockside was oddly nostalgic. I'd earned coin for blood here, back in the day. Would that the trades I made were still so innocent. The warehouse belonged to the fishermen's guild, though they were more a loose association than one of the true powers claiming that same name. It smelled of salt and dry fish, the reason why becoming obvious when the two of us entered: rows of bluegills and widemouth basses were hanging from the ceiling. I vaguely knew the salting was done different in other parts of Callow, but Laure was known for its particular take on the process. Southpooleans insisted their way of doing it was better, but they were just as wrong about that as they were about everything else. That was the lightest thought I allowed myself before painting blankness over my face. Weakness had no place here. There'd been legionaries standing guard around the warehouse and what looked like at least half Robber's cohort was spread inside.

Crossbows out, they kept an eye on the two dozen Callowans who'd been dragged out of their beds last night and brought here without an explanation any more elaborate than a kick in the back if they weren't moving fast enough. None of them were tied, I saw, save for a single pair. A man and woman who looked – and smelled liked tanners – but had an entire tenth of goblins keeping an eye on them at all times. Robber strutted up to me, a bit of blood on his lower lip, and massacred yet another salute.

"I've got a treat for you, Boss," the Special Tribune announced.

"It better not be a corpse," I said.

It was always a godsdamned corpse with him. He was like the world's most murderous cat, only it was worse because he was supposed to have a conscience. Or whatever the goblin equivalent of that was. Probably more knives.

"I would never," the yellow-eyed wretch said, deeply offended. "I'm a tender, gentle soul. I'm just misunderstood."

"I saw you eat a man's finger once," I said.

"Well, he was dead," Robber shrugged. "Wasn't like he was going to be using it."

He made sure to pitch his voice high enough to our guests would be able to hear him. I used to wonder whether he did things like for entertainment or for interrogation tactics before I'd realized there was no real difference between the two for him.

"So what have you got for me," I asked.

Engaging him would only keep sending this conversation spiralling further into madness and mind games.

"Smugglers' Guild," he said. "All except my present. Those two 'tanners' with enough steel and poison on them to kill a small village."

I raised an eyebrow.

"How'd you find them?" I asked.

"Ratface had them marked as potential members in his briefings," the goblin said. "We only had to kick the door and run in screaming to check if they actually were."

I resisted the urge to rub the bridge of my nose. Results, Catherine, I reminded myself. He still got results.

"Anybody high ranked?" I said.

"Top two Smugglers in the city," he said cheerfully. "Was going to torture that out of them, but they kept telling me. They seemed to think it would make us release them."

"Black tolerated their activities," I said. "They're not used to Legion attention."

To my teacher it had been more valuable to keep an eye on what was being brought into Callow illegally than to curtail their activities. Knowing him, he'd probably considered their dodging fees and tariffs like a payment of sorts.

"The were sloppy," Robber grinned viciously. "If that's the best criminals your people have to offer, it's no wonder you turned to Praes to get things done."

"We've a hole in the budget," I warned him. "Don't think I won't sell your hide in Mercantis for a few coppers."

"Please," he cackled. "I'm the official footrest of the queen of Callow. I'm worth at least a couple silvers."

I managed not to grimace at that, but it was a close thing. Not the footrest thing, that was an old joke between us, but this 'queen' business. That was a warning from him, that the rank and file of the Fifteenth expected for me to have a crown by the time we'd cleaned up the mess. Balancing the next few months was going to be like walking a tightrope. I allowed him to waddle away like he'd won. Little 'victories' like that usually kept him happy for a day or two, and when he was in a good mood he got into much less trouble.

"The assassins are watching you," Hakram said quietly.

I knew better than to look.

"Let's talk to our guests, then," I grunted.

I gestured for the goblin cohort to get the prisoners moving, seating them on a row of wooden crates. A few of them recognized me, apparently, because the moment I got closer they spoke up.

"Lady Foundling," a man in his fifties called out. "I must really protest. This is entirely unnecessary! We could have met at our offices-"

I glanced at the lieutenant standing behind him. She grinned, then smashed the copper bottom of her crossbow into the back of his head.

"Let's make one thing perfectly clear," I said. "This is not a courtesy visit. If you want to walk out of this room alive, I would discard the notion that you are in any way protected by the deal you made with Black."

I turned cold eyes on the crowd, saw a few shiver.

"I am not him," I said. "I have different expectations of you."

Sharp laughter came from further down the line. It was a woman, in her twenties with a missing eye. Looked like she'd been in a few scraps.

"Posturing," she said. "You don't have the balls to go against the Carrion Lord. We all know who you answer to."

I studied her for a moment.

"Choke on your tongue," I Spoke.

Her eye went wide. She tried to breathe but couldn't hand desperately clawing at her throat. You could have heard a pin drop in the warehouse, by the time she fell blue-faced to the ground.

"I trust," I said, "that there will be no more of that."

Several of the Smugglers had pissed themselves. I wrinkled my nose in distaste. Robber was right, they'd gotten soft under Imperial protection.

"Callow is at war," I said. "You have been called upon to serve."

The man from earlier – he must have been the local head – nodded in abject submission. His hands were shaking.

"Anything you need, Lady Foundling," he babbled.

"You'll be sending representatives to the Fifteenth," I said. "They are to put themselves at Supply Tribune Ratface's disposal and obey his every order. And while you do that, gather rations for an army on the march. You'll be keeping my army supplied through the Wasaliti on its way south. I've no patience for parasites while the country is under siege."

That should allow Juniper to manoeuvre the way she needed to. Marchford just didn't have the supplies for an extended campaign, and with both the war in Wolof and General Istrid gathering legions near Vale there would be no time to requisition what we needed. I turned to the two assassins, who'd been watching all of this in silence. They were not scared, I saw. They weren't from a breed as easily unnerved as the smugglers.

"Neither of us has the authority to grant any demands you could make," the man among them said.

"Not even the head of our Guild in Laure would," the woman added, then shrugged. "Kill us, if you must. It makes no difference."

"You can carry a message," I said. "That will do."

"And you think the Guildmaster will listen?" the man said, cocking his head to the side.

"We have watched your men try to find us," the woman told me. "Prune branches if you can. The tree will survive."

I'd asked Ratface, a few months ago, to find me the Assassins. So I'd be able to wipe them out in one go. The anger that had driven me back then – the righteous indignation at the concept of a band of killers being allowed to run amok Callow without consequence – was not as sharp at it used to be. I had no spite left to spare for mortals, not when I was set against forces who thought of ripping out my heart as a mere warning.

"I won't kill you," I replied softly. "Oh no. I'll drag you back to Marchford, and then I'll let Apprentice rip out the information I need from your minds."

The woman's body stiffened ever so slightly.

"You'll most likely survive that," I casually continued. "Though not unscathed. What's left of you, I will trade to the Winter Court for a favour. They do enjoy their little games, the fae."

I felt the room cool around me.

"I doubt you will, though," I said. "Winter tends to play rough."

"Striking at us would take men you need elsewhere," the woman said.

The male assassin's eyes flicked towards her, then he sighed.

"A message can be carried," he conceded.

"Tell your Guildmaster that he's on notice," I said coldly. "His actions over the next few months are what will determine whether

I go through your ranks with fire and sword and all the things that are worse I've refrained from using."

The woman nodded slowly.

"And the terms?" she asked.

"You take a contract in Callow, it goes by my desk," I said. "There's so much as a shoemaker that dies without my approval and I rip you out root and stem. You don't need to worry about running out of work, though."

I smiled thinly.

"I have a list," I said. "It will grow longer, before all is said and done."

The man considered this for a moment.

"And should the Guildmaster acceded to your request, will you handle the matters directly?"

"I'll be the one handling you," Adjutant said from my side. "Won't be hard to find. There's not a lot of orcs with one of those."

He brought up his bone hand, displaying the fingers. It made the assassins visibly uncomfortable, hardened as they were. They were, after all, still Callowan. Necromancy was the Enemy's tool, and one of its most unpleasant ones.

"You're dismissed," I said, gesturing for the goblins to untie the assassins.

It wasn't enough to worry about this war. I had to worry about the one after that, and when the High Lords knocked at one gate and Procer snuck through the other? There would be a need for ill-gained goods and dead men. All it cost me to get them was a principle.

I was fast running out of those.

Getting some major Black vibes Cat, which is what the dream was supposed to do I reckon. Up the tower we go.

godkiller999

Cath is slowly losing all her mercy, it's kind of beautiful to watch.

stevenneiman

This wasn't about mercy, or at least not mercy granted out of respect for life. This was about being willing to work with a tool that she disapproves of.

Gunslinger

Umm, Cat's brutality this chapter made me feel a bit uncomfortable. That smuggler lady was probably a right piece of shit but gods that was a nasty way to go. I guess it's par for the course, she is after all heartless now ....

Type

Well all of squire's remaining compassion seems to have been frozen, with her heart. Definitely EVIL now.

ryubosj

now if only Killian would ask for those slaves again.

overestimating enemies is as bad as *underestimating* them

*They* were sloppy

And I was fast running out (cut of principles)

"overestimating an enemy was just as dangerous as [overestimating->underestimating] them"

"Used your head {as} a prop when making the same offer"

"Dawn had come [a->and] gone hours ago"

"pirates based in the [Tidelesse->Tideless] Isles"

"I'll be calling myself a vicequeen, [no->not] a queen"

"[The->they] were sloppy"

"She tried to breathe but couldn't hand desperately clawing at her throat." I'm not sure exactly how this sentence was supposed to run

I don't know if the last line was edited since you posted, but as it is now it is clear and correct.

wirelessgrapes

Cat's given up a lot here. She's finally given up her dream of being the Hero. She's finally given up the ideals she had for Callow. She's finally given up the idea that she can save everyone. Now, all she wants is for the most of her people to have the best life possible. And she's lost a lot of compunction to get it.

letouriste

finally? she given up on the hero bit since some times now^^

Meaning-loss/change typo:

" Not a reason to get sloppy, but overestimating an enemy was just as dangerous as overestimating them. "

The second one should obviously be "UNDERestimating", not "over..".

Darkening

I think the first one should be underestimating, not the second actually. Since he's commenting that it's a good thing Warlock's taking them seriously despite not being an actual threat.

Should be "...who looked – and smelled – like tanners, but had..."

Might be that she is doing all of this because she lost her heart, her conscience.

ALKATYN

Great chapter overall. The recurring theme seems to be ruthless pragmatism. Will be interesting to see if this leads Kat to a heel face turn somewhere along the way, makes an interesting contrast with her reactions to Black back in book 1.

You could explain it as a side effect of the ice heart, but that seems cheap narratively. But could make a nice moment with her justifying it that way but realising it was all her.

Re the assassins, one problem with her deal is she has no way of verifying that they are giving her all of their contracts. They could easily give her a bunch and leave out ones she'd disapprove of.

Other random thoughts:

- * Surprised she hasn't experimented with her Fae powers more, but maybe that was offscreen.

- * More focus on Robber lends credence to speculation he will get a name. Personally find him a bit irritating, he works okay as a contrast to others but the continuous cruelty gets uncomfortable. Though I suppose that in itself could lead to a conflict where Kat has to reign him in, or he gets his own character moment.

- * I'm still not totally clear why it's assumed she's rebelling against the Tower and getting her own crown. Other than recruiting the knightly orders everything she's doing is consistent with what you'd expect a villain general to do. (Yes she killed some Praesi, but they were blatantly rebelling,). You'd think she could justify 90% of what she is doing with "The empress commanded me to keep control of Callow for the Empire, I am doing that by whatever means necessary."

- ** Also unclear why her non-Callowan soldiers don't seem very fussed by the possibility she is going against the tower. Yeah she's popular with the troops, but they all served the Empire before her, and should be well aware of the normal consequences of rebellion.

Naeddyr

I think the reactions of the Fifteenth and the citizens is just... they can feel the story, and all signs point towards Catherine the First.

nick012000

I think it's more likely that the Praesi are expecting her to wind up either Dread Empress or in the hall full of decapitated heads on chains.

Blinks

...Catherine the Great?

Jonnnney

Grasping for power is what a villain does. Her mentor is known in Callow for the invasion, but Black is best known in Praes for the successful rebellion.

The officers of the 15th, besides Juniper and Aisha, all have ample reason to hate the high Lord's of Praes and love Catherine. The rank and file have seen her defeat Demon, Angel, and Fae. They would follow her to the gates of hell itself, rebellion against the tower is a small all things considered.

Cpt. Obvious

Her freshly brutal pragmatism isn't so hard to explain. She had set up a system to govern Callow, and the moment there was even a chance she might get caught or killed in Arcadia these two Praesi took out a contract on the Callowans in the counsel. The Priestess was murdered in broad daylight and the noble was wounded but managed to get away. Both of these Cat was friendly with, so taking out a contract on them makes it personal. To make it better the assassins guild handled the contracts, and only months earlier she'd been talked out of trying to drum them out of Callow. So she's partly blaming her self at least a bit.

The smuggler woman poked the bear at a very bad time. She's been trying to be fair, to allow the smugglers guild to continue operating as the act as enablers and actually generate more legal trade. But instead of cooperating people has seen it as a sign of weakness and that Black is controlling her. If they think they can laugh in her face without consequences then she has to show them that they are wrong. And as they are a guild of criminals they have to be aware that there are monsters here who can kill them as easy as breathing.

The Archdevil

People keep speculating on whether Cat will become the Black or White Knight. Why hasn't anyone suggested the idea that she Takes both Names, Breaks them, and might use her third unclaimed Aspect to merge the pieces into a single Name of Knight. After all, "she will use what she cannot break, and break what she cannot use."

lennymaster

I think it more likely that she becomes Warlord. Adjutant called her that the moment he became Adjutant and now Juniper called her that as she agreed to be part of Cats quasi rebellion. Now all we need is a non orc (maybe Robber when he comes into his name? Or even a Callowan like the captain of her guard?) calls her that.

The Archdevil

except Warlord isn't really a Name, per se. It's a title given to the being an Orc will follow to the Hells and back, because they exemplify everything an Orc wants in a leader. If I've read the story correctly, that is.

Not\_a\_robot

Them calling her Warlord/Warchief was significant because in their culture, Warchief were demigods deserving of absolute obedience, who you could unquestioningly follow to lead you to victory. It said more about the respect they hold for Cat than about her future Name, I think.

Jonnnney

Black mentioned that Warlord was a name common among the orcish tribes prior to their enslavement.

I personally think the name is unlikely for Catherine. It is more likely to be what Deadhand was for Hakram. A title that gives her the power to forge her own name.

MagnaMalusLupus

Directly from the chapter where her heart is replaced Cat mentions that the bundle of fae power took up the third aspect slot.

“Power pulsed in my chest, spreading through my veins. I felt the third part of my soul, the missing aspect I had yet to forge, fill with something old and too large to comprehend.”

Now maybe I’m badly misunderstanding this, but I’m pretty sure that suggests that her third Aspect is now ‘Duchess of Moonless Nights’, and I really don’t think she will be getting another aspect as Squire. How that will affect things if/when she transitions will be interesting.

Mike E.

I love these little sidebars showing the various Calamities working together. A very finely meshed team.

This was awesome:

“Your prize ship has been sunk. Most your lieutenants are dead. You are kneeling on the floor of your very seat of power,” he murmured. “[B]Bringing you to this took me four people and a rowboat[B], Pirate. You asked me what my point was? This is it. Do not make me repeat myself.”

benthelynx

Excellent chapter. If you ever start another story, I’d love to see Callow in five hundred years – whether it is The Light That Was Extinguished, The Darkness That Holds Back Horrors or The Light Revived.

Not\_a\_robot

I find the constantly lessening value Catherine places on human life a very interesting journey to follow. I can, surprisingly, completely understand and agree with every action she has taken this chapter, but I'm curious where she will end up eventually.

Jonnney

It is interesting to me that commenters are making such a big deal about Catherine brutally killing one uppity smuggler. Prior to her winter wonderland excursion she was planning on having every member of all three guilds put to the sword.

ryubosj

The point for me is that a couple weeks back we had Kat objecting to Killian killing people, however here we have her doing something much worse to someone who isn't a soldier or a death row prisoner.

letouriste

i wonder if her current ruthlessness and aggressivity would not be linked partly to losing her heart?
she is cold now;) maybe in 6 months she will recover from that and start to balance more her actions

Sean

Long ago I concluded that Foundling would win. The only question is, at what cost? Will she end up atop a throne, acting as cruel and ruthless as any Dread Empress. Or will she be a benevolent dictator?

arancaytar

Cat, you just gruesomely executed two criminals for political purposes.

I mean, style points for acting like the team you're on, but exactly what was your objection to Kilian's use of ritual sacrifice?

amc

I love Cat, but no one will seriously suggest that she's not a hypocrite.

arancaytar

Darth Vader approves.

alegio

Every chapter Cat is getting to be more and more like Black. Which is not really that surprising seeing how he is not only his mentor but pretty much his adopted father by now, but still if things keep going like this everything will go either really good or really bad.

And is it just me or does Rober getting more and more screen time feels like hinting for a new name? Dunno, it could be just Erraticerrata giving us readers a little love with our favorite little killing machine, but still could be something.

Shawn Panzegraf

See, I agree with Arancaytar: Cat gets off Killian's back about the human sacrifice needed to unshackle Killian's magic and become full Fae, she gets her love interest back, and more importantly the two might actually work as a loving Villainous couple in much the same way Warlock and his Incubus work. Killian as a full-Fae would make her relevant again, especially given the current situation. The two sticking together and supporting each other through fulfilling the Winter King's demands would flesh Killian out and give Cat essentially another pseudo-Named as an asset.

The bit Erratic wrote about Cat being able to FEEL the kinship with Killian's Fae side, and how it sang out to her was beautiful. I really, REALLY hope that Erratic relents and has Cat experience a moment of realization concerning how hypocritical she's being. Black has his deeper-than-Names/Roles relationship with Malicia.

Discarding the relationship aspect of the story, especially when the big thing that draws Cat to Killian is that she can trust her and be herself around Killian denies the narrative window into showing Cat during brief unguarded moments of stolen happiness. I felt, and still feel their relationship added another dimension to the story.

On another point, Cat's internal thought about "Having no spite left for mortals, when she was set against powers that considered tearing her heart out a warning" was a PERFECTLY handled look at just how deep down the rabbit-hole Cat's some. How she's moved into being a Player in the Big Picture. While Hakram's warnings about what Callow represents to the Empire, and the danger Cat is exposing herself to by essentially treading on the spot where her mentor draws the line with Cat's idea of being Queen and an essentially almost-Ally-rather-than-Imperial Province plan for Callow really paints the picture of what's currently happening for us readers without it becoming Infodump-Exposition. Hakram's exchange with Cat conveyed the necessary exposition, but did it in a very smooth/natural/organic manner of delivery Erraticerrata should be praised for.

Getting necessary exposition to feel like dialog that naturally belongs in the narrative isn't nearly as easy as it might look to some.

All of this said, while the recent setup content has been well done and absolutely necessary post-Return from Winter. I'm hoping the transition from setup to more dynamic events is handled as well as the setup has been. Though now that issues of Thief and the usurpers in Laure are handled, it isn't very clear what Cat's next/immediate objective is going to be. From something a couple Chapters ago I was thinking something got mentioned about working on things with Daoine/Duchess Kegan, as part of Cat's efforts to free up more Legions.

Everyone else's thoughts on Cat's next move?

Simpli

Maybe it is just me but...the more and more things are going on, the more I would love for our "heroine" to fail – and that badly. For now things have been going on, good or bad with a few collapses and lapses, more or less in the way Catherine wanted/ was able to form.

Maybe it is just my love for the Dread Empress and First Prince little plays – but I would love to see Catherine fail in her "rebellion" and trying to change the whole system of Prae etc. because if she succeeds...wouldn't that just fit to the way heroes work in this world? Or in most other stories and novels of such kind?

I would like her to fail because she might run into problems she can't just overpower or cheat, because there are forces bigger, badder and more experienced than her. Not a final setback but one that puts her own still "young" position into perspective.

I now have a theory, Cat took the deal with for her resurrection, She already agreed that queen will be her transitional name and this is just her journey to get their, Their was more left unsaid in that transaction and they deliberately kept us out of the loop.

For the first time, Cat was actually *scary* here. Like, Black scary. I approve. The fae presence in her soul, I hope that stays even when she gets her heart back because the girl was overdue a power up, for real.

Chapter 22: Govern

"We do not forget."

– Official motto of the House of Iarsmai

I hadn't set foot in a House of Light since becoming the Squire, though to be fair my attendance at the daily sermons had always been shaky. This wasn't just any house, though: it was the Alban Cathedral, the beating heart of the faith in Callow. There were hundreds of brothers and sister here at all times, and Praesi occupation had done nothing to change it. The priests, after all, had not taken part directly in the fighting for the capital during the Conquest. They'd healed any who went through their doors, but none had taken the field. The House of Light did not concern themselves with who ruled the land, only the souls of the people who lived on it. Or so they liked to say. Some priests were more politically-inclined than others: a few of the sermons had been very harsh on the subject of Evil and its servants, though they'd always refrained from outright preaching rebellion. That was the line Black had drawn when conceding freedom of worship in the conquered kingdom.

The main hall was filled with beds when I entered, though thankfully most of them were empty: with the end of the riots, the influx of wounded had ceased as well. I left the Gallowborne outside, and for once Tribune Farrier did not protest: the idea of being at risk here was as absurd for him as it was to me. White-robed priests stirred when I strode in, with an older woman coming forward. She did not have any marks distinguishing her from the others – the brothers and sisters had no ranks, and seniority did not always mean authority – but the simple fact that she was the one headed for me said it all. She had Deoraithe blood, I noted. Too pale to have both parents from the Duchy though. The sister bowed.

"Sermons have been suspended for a sennight, my lady," she said.

"The it's a good thing I'm not here for one," I replied. "Take me to the baroness."

She smiled with feinted confusion and began to answer, but I cut her off with a sharp gesture.

"I'm Catherine Foundling," I said.

"I am aware, Lady Squire," she said.

"Then you should know deceiving an Imperial dignitary while the city is under martial law qualifies as treason," I said. "Don't make that mistake. It would get ugly for both us, and I'm not here to hurt her."

"The cathedral offers refuge to all," she insisted.

"Look outside, sister," I said tiredly. "There are no refuges left. Don't make me ask twice."

She looked like she'd bitten into a lemon, but didn't protest again. There were catacombs under the cathedral, every child knew, but people not sworn to the House of Light were not allowed to set foot in them. Most of the Fairfax dynasty was buried there, save for the few whose heads were in the Hall of Screams. I hadn't known for sure there were rooms other than the graveyard carved out in the foundations, but it was easy enough to suspect. They had to keep the food somewhere, not to mention the more contagious patients. Baroness Kendal was in one of the rooms that served the latter purposed, if I had to guess. I could feel power coming from the walls that made me uncomfortable, had the Beast raising its hackles underneath my skin. The whole cathedral was full of it, but it was particularly pure down here. I wasn't surprised, considering I could be more than twenty feet away from consecrated grounds. The sister knocked at the door and the baroness herself opened it, her arm in a sling.

"Lady Catherine," she said, blinking in surprise.

I looked at the priestess.

"You may go," I said, and it wasn't a suggestion.

She didn't enjoy that, but I didn't particularly care. I turned to Anne Kendal, taking in the sight of her. She was still pale, and not in the pretty way she usually was – it was the pale of someone who'd bled too much, not the ivory of good breeding.

"May I come in?" I asked.

"By all means," she replied, moving out of the way.

The room wasn't much to look at. A cot and a small table covered with fresh linens. A water basin in the corner, and an open book on the bed: something religious, by the looks of it. The baroness closed the door behind me.

"I'd invite you to sit down," the baroness said, "but I seem to be short on furniture."

"I don't intend to stay long," I half-smiled. "You should sit, though. You still look like you're recovering."

"The assassins punctured by lung and cut into my spine," she admitted. "Even the touch of the Heavens has been slow in working."

Gods. I hadn't thought her wounds had been that bad. No wonder people thought she was dead. And I'd probably let the people who'd done it go not a bell ago. The taste of self-disgust was thick on my tongue.

"I was aware of the risks when I accepted your offer," Kendal reassured me, misinterpreting the look on my face. "Praesi play for keeps."

"Don't they just," I muttered.

So did I, these days. I had a fresh batch of corpses in the city to prove it.

"I'd heard the Fifteenth had arrived, but I hardly believed it," the baroness, smoothing a silver curl back as she sat on the bed. "They'd have had to leave months ago."

"We went through Arcadia," I said.

She stared at me like I'd just grown another head.

"That's... possible?" she said.

"If you're a Duchess of Winter," I replied.

She looked genuinely unsure what to say at that. I forgot, now and then, that the kind of eldritch places I went and the many different creatures that tried to kill me in them were just legends to most people. Stories they never expected to see take flesh. I'd lost those kind of certainties: if it could be real it was and it was probably after my head for some godforsaken reason.

"Will you be using that as your title?" she finally asked, which she probably felt was relatively safe grounds.

"I'm leaving that up in the air until I've had a chat with Her Dread Majesty," I said. "I don't suppose the priests carried word of what happened today?"

She shook her head.

"They say isolation from the worries of Creation will allow me to heal quicker," she said.

"Ruling Council's dissolved," I said. "I stormed the palace last night and had Murad and Satang publicly crucified just before Noon Bell."

"Gods save us all," she whispered, closing her eyes. "It is ill-bred of me to say as much, but they deserved to die. Not this painfully, but they did."

"My legionaries will put them out of the misery after sundown," I shrugged. "Point will have been made by then."

That was as much pity as I was willing to expend for those two. I only had so much to spare, and there were many souls more deserving of it.

"If I may ask, who rules Callow then?" Kendal asked, eyes fluttering open.

"I do," I said. "But I'm going off to war for Gods know how long. Congratulations, Baroness Kendal: you've just been appointed Governess-General of Callow."

She eyed me carefully.

"There is no such thing," she said. "And if there was, the Empress would frown upon it."

"The Empress will have to cope," I said. "And I'll have to give her something for it, I'm sure. No doubt she'll have her price ready when we speak."

"I suppose I should thank you for the privilege," she finally said.

"Don't thank me," I said. "I want you to turn this country into something functional while I go off to kill the people burning it down. I'll leave you my seal – that gives you authority over everyone in Callow who's not in the Legions."

"The city must be in shambles," the baroness sighed.

"Heal quickly, Anne Kendal," I said. "Your home needs you, and so do I."

In the end, it took two more days before Laure was settled. The appointment of the Governess-General was met with enthusiasm by the city – she was well-known there and better liked – and quiet distaste by the legionaries of the Fifth. None of them had forgotten that she'd once been the Baroness Dormer and one of the foremost nobles of the Liesse Rebellion. That she had been made the highest-ranking person in Callow after myself was a bitter pill to swallow. They'd just have to deal with it: I didn't have anyone else remotely as competent and trustworthy at my disposal. That made for one fire mostly put out, so on to the next: the Deoraithe. I'd used the Fifth's mages to scry Marshal Ranker and inform her I would be headed for Denier immediately, though I couldn't give her a clear date of arrival. It was a good thing I didn't even try an estimate, because this time travelling was... difficult.

What I took my soldiers through did not look like Winter. Or Summer, for that matter. Unless I was mistaken we'd marched through the borderlands between both. It had been deserted on Winter's side, but on the last few days of the journey we'd begun to see larger and larger patrols from Summer gathering in the distance. It took us a week, in the end. Still shorter than it would have taken us through Creation, but inexplicably longer than it took us to get to Laure from Machford. There did not seem to be any rhyme or reason to the time spent in Arcadia, and my control on it was erratic. I'd barely needed to do anything the first way through, but on this one not getting stuck for months had been a constant struggle. I did not believe our third way through would go uncontested.

The gate opened a full day south of Denier, since I'd never been in the city itself. I allowed my legionaries a bell to recover on these less-treacherous grounds before beginning the march anew. My two and half thousand men came in sight of the city's walls on the evening of the following day, though the Marshal's scouts found us long before that. I didn't bother to meet them in person – Nauk served as a go-between while I spoke with Hakram. When it came to Legion gossip, Adjutant was without equals.

"So," I said as Zombie trotted at his side. "Fourth Legion."

The tall orc shot me an amused look.

"Cognomen Blackhands," he said.

"I already knew that part," I complained. "Everybody knows that."

"They don't usually know where it's from," Hakram gravelled.

"Ranker was the Matron of the Hungry Dog tribe, before she took up with Lord Black. She took all goblins of age with her into war and sent the children to half a dozen other tribes."

I whistled, reluctantly impressed.

"That's a hell of a bet to make," I said. "He was still an up and comer back then, and the Empress a relative unknown. Still doesn't tell me where that cognomen is from."

"Hungry Dog tribe had a ritual, when time came to choose their matron," Adjutant said. "All the candidates put their hand in a brazier – the one who kept it the longest got to rule."

"High pain tolerance doesn't mean good leadership," I grunted.

"It's about who was willing to suffer the most to get it," the orc said. "I can respect that. Ranker kept her hand in there for half a day, long after everybody else had abandoned. Her left hand's a blackened ruin, and she's refused any healing ever since."

"And they named an entire legion after that?" I frowned.

"Officers in the Fourth kept the tradition," Hakram said. "Even those not goblins. Most of them take healing afterwards, but everybody has to be willing to burn for power."

"That feels like it should be against regulations," I said, then glanced at him. "... is it?"

The thing with being Named was that rules only applied to you if you allowed them to. For example, my relationship with Kilian was technically breaking a rule about fraternization – she was under me in the chain of command. I'd learned the most important of the regs, but some of the smaller ones I'd, uh, only skimmed. In my defence, there were a lot.

"It's skirting the line about voluntary injuries," the orc replied. "That can qualify as desertion, if you're not careful. But the Marshal's been with the Carrion Lord since the beginning. Those that were get to run their legion however they want."

A woman used to getting her own way, then, and one of the three highest-ranked military officers in the Empire to boot. I narrowed my eyes, thinking back to an old Name dream of mine – she'd been with Grem One-Eye and Istrid during the civil war. That'd been what, thirty years ago? And she'd already been a matron candidate before that. I wasn't clear how old you had to be for that, but at least ten years old felt like a safe bet. Considering it was rare for a goblin to make it past thirty-five, that Ranker was at least forty was notable.

"How old is she?" I asked.

"Near sixty," Hakram said. "And no, nobody knows how she made it that old. Most common guess is that Lord Black had rituals done to extend her lifespan."

"He doesn't like using blood magic," I frowned, as there was no real question about what kind of a ritual could be used for such a purpose. "He would have needed a very good reason."

"She's the most powerful goblin in the Empire, bar none," Adjutant said. "And she's a vocal advocate for the Tribes being involved with the Legions. Pickler says a lot of the Matrons were in favour of going isolationist after the civil war."

I raised an eyebrow.

"They made a lot of gains when Malicia won the throne," I pointed out. "Breeding restrictions were lifted and they pretty much run the Imperial Forges."

That part hadn't been taught in the histories back at the orphanage, but it had been in the pile of books Black had dropped into my lap when I first became the Squire. I'd taken me a few years to understand that those were meant in part to be a primer to Imperial politics – by learning how all the major players had gotten where they were, I could get a read on what they wanted. Before the civil war the High Lords of Foramen had owned all the forges in the city, though they'd used goblins as labour. Malicia had given ownership to the Tribes and only allowed High Lady Banu to take a cut from the proceeds. A significant one, but it'd been a sizeable blow to her power base. I'd not been surprised to learn that she was part of the Truebloods.

"They've always had a bend that way," Hakram shrugged. "And no one gets involved with the Tower for long without getting burned. I can understand wanting to take their win and go home."

I hummed.

"So she's a key player, then," I said. "If she goes, the Matrons she'd keeping in check get bolder."

"She's not someone you can bully, Cat," he warned. "She's run Denier for twenty years and the Fourth is rabidly loyal. Get on her bad side and even our goblins will get restless. She's to the Tribes what One-Eye is to the Clans."

The looming figure of an era, he meant. Even Juniper got star struck when she spoke about Marshal Grem, and she was not a girl who impressed easy. I allowed the conversation to ebb as I considered what was ahead of us. Duchess Kegan who'd raised her army of twenty thousand was only half the problem I had to deal with. I knew what the Deoraithe wanted, and our shared enemy was common ground enough I was more or less confident I could point her in the right direction. The question was whether I could make Marshal Ranker buy into the notion. Marshals weren't just the Imperial officers with the authority to command several legions: they had a broader responsibility put on them.

One-Eye was charged with securing the border with the Principate, Marshal Nim with keeping peace in the Wasteland. Ranker was meant to keep the Duchy of Daoine in check, positioned near the best crossing of the Silver Lake's tributary to slow the Deoraithe down if they rebelled. I had, theoretically, the authority to give her orders. But her responsibility to keep an eye on Daoine came straight from the Tower, and that meant gave Ranker at lot of leeway. Malicia's orders came before anyone else's, no matter the circumstances. I remained silent all the way to the city, but no solution presented itself.

Denier was a sleepy little city, about the size of Summerholm but nowhere as heavily fortified. It had rarely ever seen fighting: whenever the Empire had bypassed Summerholm and crossed the Hwaerte, they tended to go straight from Laure. The city had been stormed during the Conquest, but it had surrendered after a token resistance — it was in no way capable of resisting the likes of what Praesi sappers could unleash. Its only real military importance came from the fact that it stood near the easiest crossing into Daoine. Higher up the river the harsh currents made navigation tricky and the making of a pontoon bridge nigh impossible. The waters west of the city were almost lazy in comparison and full of large mud banks. There was no bridge into the Duchy, of course. That no such thing would be built without the sanction of the Dukes and Duchess of Daoine had been one of the conditions written into the treaty that saw Daoine folded into Callow after the First Crusade. No Fairfax had ever dared to go back on that word, even when the northerners flouted the authority of the throne.

The greatest general in Callowan history, Elizabeth Alban, had famously attempted to invade the then-Kingdom of Daoine. By the the Queen of Blades had already proven her ability by occupying three principalities of what was not yet the Principate, crushing a Liessen rebellion and turning back a Praesi invasion. The expectation had been that, within a few months, the Deoraithe would be made subjects of Callow. Instead she'd had to slog through the countryside for two long years, losing thousands to ambushes and night attacks while her supply trains disappeared. Historians usually noted that given another year she might have won anyway by forcing a decisive battle at the capital of Daoine, but the invasion had collapsed when the Praesi had crossed the border again under Dread Empress Regalia. After the Wastelanders were defeated and the Empress killed as her flying fortress crashed into Laure, the Queen of Blades had begun planning a second invasion.

So the Watch had murdered her in her bed, in her own seat of power.

No ruler of Callow had ever forgotten that pointed warning. Had half the population of Daoine not been wiped out by Dread Empress Triumphant when she took the continent, the Duchy might very well be a sovereign nation to this day. A combination of worries about Praesi resurgence even after Triumphant died and Eleanor Fairfax's deft diplomacy – helped along by her famous 'friendship' with the Queen of Daoine – had seen the kingdom made a duchy, though one so removed from the authority of the throne it was effectively a vassal state instead of truly a part of Callow. That state of affairs had been maintained after the Conquest, with regular tributes and fixed war time obligations being signed over to the Tower by treaty. My short-lived Ruling Council had changed nothing in that regard: Duchess Kegan's envoy had flatly refused any notion that they were subject to its authority and I'd recognized that as a fight I couldn't win. And wasn't even sure I wanted to, to be honest. Daoine had always gotten on just fine on its own. Don't fix it if it ain't broke.

The gates were open for us when my soldiers finally made it to Denier, ranks of legionaries atop the walls watching us. I rode in at a brisk pace, and only reined in my horse when a Taghreb with the markings of Staff Tribune headed in my direction with two lines for escort. I quietly ordered the Gallowborne to allow them passage, though Farrier saw to it they immediately surrounded the legionaries of the Fourth when they got lose.

"Lady Squire," the olive-skinned man greeted me, sharply saluting.

"Staff Tribune," I replied. "You look like a man carrying a message."

"Marshal Ranker asks that you attend to her immediately, ma'am," he said.

I cocked my head to the side.

"My men are not yet settled," I said.

"I would handle this myself, my lady," he said. "The Marshal would like you to that within a bell Duchess Kegan will be crossing the river with a party to treat with us. If you're to be part of the conference, you will need to be briefed."

I smiled at the Taghreb, cursing viciously inside. Well, there went my plan to work on Ranker for a day or two before talking with the Deoraithe. One of these days, I was going to force Fate into a physical manifestation and then I was going to stab it.

The Archdevil

Very. If you can afford it, get a couple sand bags you can hang from trees or something, a combat knife, and just go wild. It's very therapeutic, not to mention a great workout.

dalek955

Wouldn't stabbing sand wear out the knife?

The Archdevil

you aren't stabbing the sand, you're stabbing the bags. The sand is to hold the bags still enough to stab.

This is actually incorrect, extremely so.

This kind of "venting" is as counterproductive as it gets. While you may experience a small relief in the short term, in the long term, it serves to only INCREASE your restlessness and violent impulses.

I would strongly recommend not trying this.

Dragrath

I'm still willing to bet on blacks assertion that he thinks Goblins do have names only they keep them secret like everything goblin's do. Ranker with those accomplishments and an age twice that of a Goblin's lifespan? Along with Robber those are two very high profile goblins with all the signs towards having possible names.

Letouriste

Robber don't have a name.he would not be in the legions otherwise.and I think male goblins can't have Names,period.

darkening

Orcs didn't have names for ages and now we have adjutant. Things change. That said, I doubt robber has one yet. I imagine apprentice at least would notice.

delspaig

Maybe he did notice and just didn't say anything?

"What? Of course the goblin has a Name, I assumed you all knew already."

Morgenstern

Uhm.. what exactly is your grounds for thinking Robber could not be in the legions, if he had a Name (that was kept secret)? There IS something special about him, something that makes him (as a MALE who CANNOT rule, as old goblin tradition dictates) incompatible with the *tribes* – which is exactly WHY the matrons decided to let him go (or, basically, shunt him off) to the legions... I see no problem there, in either case, him having a (secret) Name or not...

Morgenstern

On the contrary – the legions are the ONE option he has, where he IS allowed to lead... even female goblins, at least in theory, because "Legions standards and not tribe standards"...

Theo Promes

There seem to be plenty of ways to extend lifespan if you are, uh, willing to make sacrifices... if Ranker was a named, I doubt they'd be sitting around guarding a river, that seems like a waste of name power, considering the way the calamities and cat get used to further the empire's agenda.

Robber, however... I wondered about that a couple times as well. He seems awfully good at what he does, and a natural leader of his people, and really good at surviving all sorts of things he really shouldn't. Also there is a certain parallel between his story and cat's, both are coming from nothing and spitting those with power in the eye before stabbing them in the kidneys... Usually named seem to be aware of one another, however we know that isn't true for the sneakier sorts (like assassin) and it would be fitting for a goblin anarcho-murder specialist Named to have that aspect no matter what. Maybe al of them have it, as you suggest.

Soronel Haetir

Except that Named tend to live longer by simply not aging. The Calamities are great examples of this, they still appear mostly young (other than perhaps an aged tiredness to their eyes).

Morgenstern

Not exactly necessarily true. Remember: Names look as THEY think of themselves, as THEY themselves think they SHOULD look. Who's to say Named cannot "age" in looks, if they start thinking of themselves as BEING older instead of having those indoctrinated "Named don't age" thoughts? If THEY think it appropriate and think of themselves that way... I would think they WOULD look that way, if the mechanism is truly all about their SELF-perception. *shrugs

What will Cat grow up to be? Or, more practically, what is Squire about to transition into? If this was a hero's tale, perhaps Champion. Except we've seen her, and she's kinda laughable. Protector? Guardian? Both too hero-like.

What's the story that we tell about Cat? Here's an orphan that smashes everything in her way in order to get what she wants. She's loyal. She cares about her responsibilities. She thinks out of the box.

If only we had Knight-Commandants. Or Knight-Protectors. Or Knight-Generals (ok, maybe not that one). Oh well, the chivalry orders are dead. Or maybe not 😊

But while they live (and if they were revived) could they be sworn to the Lady of Callow? A Praesi title on Callowan soil?

Chapter 23: Reassessment

"From small slights, long prices."

– Deoraithe proverb

For all that the marshal's envoy had impressed upon me the urgency of the situation, I found myself waiting. The balustrade overlooked an inside courtyard, and from my perch I watched the soldiers milling below. I'd left a line of the Gallowborne down there along with Robber and a line from his cohort. My personal retinue wouldn't be mingling with the goblins, but the Special Tribune and his men were not so distant. They were, perhaps, a little too friendly. I winced when Robber rolled all over the paving stones, clawing at another goblin's eyes and cackling loudly. Their sharp nails drew blood on each other, but aside from my own visibly horrified Callowans none of the legionaries seemed anything but amused. The other greenskin was larger – likely from a Matron lineage, then, since those were supposed to be bigger and smarter than other goblins – but my own bastard was younger and more vicious. It ended with him sitting atop his opponent, licking the blood off his fingers to the cheers of all the goblins in the courtyard.

The door my back was turned to opened silently, but my senses had gotten even sharper since Arcadia. I could feel the air moving, almost, and the soft creep of leather boots headed for me. The only other person in the room came to stand by my side at the balustrade, deftly climbing atop a stone seat so they'd be able to lean their elbows against the edge like I did. I didn't show surprise, or even bother to turn around. I already knew who it was, and years of dealing with Robber had taught me the dangers of allowing a goblin to set the beat of a conversation.

"Tribe?" a soft voice asked.

"Rock Breaker," I replied.

Marshal Ranker chuckled, the sound a dry rasp.

"I can see why a barren old bitch like Weaver would get rid of him," she said.

Only then did I glance at the small, wrinkled old woman that was one of the three most important commanders in the Legions of Terror. Marshal Ranker's skin looked like leather left out too long in the sun, all cracked and dry and a brown-green that was unpleasant to look at. Her face was a curtain of heavy wrinkles leading to thin brown lips and a pointed chin. Her eyes, though, had me wary. Deep set and dark, with small threads of red in the sclera. This one was ancient, by the standards of her people, and old goblins were either dead or exceedingly dangerous. The infamous blackened hand her legion was named for was curled and unmoving, looking crippled for good, but I knew better than to take anything shown by this woman as face value.

"Her loss," I said. "His record speaks for itself."

The goblin clicked her tongue.

"That boy learned his lessons too well," she said. "We tell them they're supposed to be fearless, but that's a lie. They're still supposed to be afraid of us."

Of the Matrons. I didn't know much about the Tribes, not that anybody did, but what little I'd learned from Robber and Pickler had not endeared their ruling class to me. It had always been absurd to me to wrest authority out of the hands of the capable because of some arbitrary objection to those capable individuals having bollocks. If there was one aspect of Black's philosophy I had wholeheartedly embraced, it was that power belonged in the hands of the competent – wasting talent out of petty bias was to lessen all those involved.

"Fear's never enough," I said. "Not on its own."

"Empires have been built on less," the Marshal snorted.

"Not this one," I said.

There was a pause.

"And yet you crucified them," Ranker said.

"They crossed me," I replied. "Some fear was required."

I got a bark of harsh laughter for that.

"Marshal Ranker, of the Hungry Dog tribe," she finally introduced herself.

"Catherine Foundling," I said. "Duchess of Moonless Nights."

"I'm aware," the goblin lightly replied. "As I'm sure you are that you've had crossbows pointed at you since you first stepped into Denier."

I smiled wryly.

"You're not going to mention the fact that this entire room is rigged with demolition charges?" I asked.

Smell was a sense as well, and I'd learned to recognize the sharp tang of goblin munitions.

"Much like you weren't going to mention you sent your Adjutant to poke around the city," she replied.

"He's not a spymaster," I shrugged. "Just a friendly orc who likes to share a drink."

"The dangerous ones always smile," the Marshal said.

I snorted.

"I've been advised you're not someone to trifle with," I told her.

"I considered trapping your little crew in an avenue and setting the whole thing aflame with green," Ranker casually said. "Your tiff with the Empress has poor timing. But that would trigger another uprising, and that'd be even more trouble than you."

The sheer nonchalance she'd just admitted that with was chilling, but I was no stranger to cold these days.

"All I'm doing is hacking off the dead wood," I said. "And there's a great deal of that. You've been around long enough for-"

"Save me the speech, Duchess," the goblin interrupted cuttingly. "I'm not one of your lapdogs, and whatever hopes you're peddling I don't care for. I'm a fucking Marshal of the Dread Empire, kid. I know where my loyalties lie. If it comes to it, I'll kill you if only to spare Amadeus the pain of doing the deed himself."

"The way things used to be done in Callow won't work anymore," I said. "You have to be aware of that."

The Marshal hacked out a laugh.

"And whose fault is that? I read Sacker's report on Summerholm. The Liesse Rebellion is as good as your doing. You set up that highborn chit in the south who's giving us trouble now, too, and to add insult to fucking injury you're taking advantage of an invasion to make a power grab," she said. "As far as I'm concerned the only difference between you and those poor bastards you nailed to crosses is that you have a bigger stick and catchier battle cry."

"I actually have a purpose, unlike those 'poor bastards'," I replied coldly. "And I'll see it through no matter how much wailing comes from the gallery."

"I've been threatened by scarier Named than you, Duchess," Ranker said. "And I'll say this for the Chancellor – he wasn't dumb enough to do it in my own territory. You've risen quickly, and we all know how that story goes. The fall comes as quickly, and twice as hard. Take care not to drop your carcass on anything I care about."

I sighed.

"Are we just going to stand around trading veiled threats all day?" I said. "I was under the impression Duchess Kegan was headed our way."

"There is no us," the Marshal said. "You're one conversation gone south away from rebellion. And you have some sort of plan for the Deoraithe. Out with it. If it has to come to steel, let's get it out of the way."

"You wouldn't leave this room alive if it did," I said flatly.

Ranker eyed me with those dark, deep-set eyes.

"No," she agreed. "But neither would you."

I'd seen that look in the faces of people before. William's, when he'd decided to call Contrition onto Liesse. Akua's, when she'd told me she would collapse the dimension were were in if I refused to negotiate. Ranker wasn't Named – she lacked the feelings of power and weight both – but she did have that kind of resolution to her. She would, if she found my intentions unacceptable, rather bring down this entire place on our heads than allow me to go through with them. I'd never had that goblin razor-sharp fearlessness turned on me before, and it wasn't a pleasant feeling. Could I kill her before she even spoke an order? I had no doubt. I shouldn't, though. There was nothing to gain from it, and it worried me the urge was there. Kilian's soft accusation that I hated to compromise came back to my ears, along with the bundle of things I still felt about that conversation I'd set aside rather than deal with. Had I become too used to getting my way? Or maybe it was subtler than that. I'd won often enough that the idea of losing even in a small way had me reaching for violence. Because Ranker would be beating me, by coercing me into revealing my hand like this. That was a fact.

The surrender of control rankled. I'd stayed in this room even after smelling the munitions because I'd believed that whatever measures she had taken they wouldn't be able to kill me. I'd done that even after being told by the person I trusted most in the world that I was dealing with a real threat. Stupid. More than that, I'd been arrogant. Ranker had survived the death of more powerful villains than me. This isn't a mistake I would have made a year ago. I would have liked to blame this on my Name, on whatever the Winter King had done to me, but that felt like a cheap excuse. I'd gotten so used to reaping the lives of non-Named like wheat I'd stopped seeing them as truly dangerous, and that was the kind of conceit that got people killed. I wasn't in a small pond anymore. I'd reached the sea, and the things that lurked in it would gobble me up if I didn't start stepping more carefully. I breathed out. Decide on your objective, I told myself, returning to Black's old mantra. Decide what lines you're willing to cross to get to it. If I retreated here, all I lost was pride.

Perhaps I could use a little less of that.

"I want take Kegan's army through Arcadia," I said. "And use it on my enemies. The fae first, then Diabolist."

"And why would she agree to that?" the Marshal asked.

"Because I know what she wants," I said. "And I can help her get it before it's too late."

The wrinkled goblin looked down at the legionaries in the courtyard.

"We can deal," she finally said.

We met the Deoraithe at nightfall.

Only ten of them came across the fishing boat, but they did not need to be any more: nine of those wore the brown-grey cloaks of the Watch, longbows strapped on their backs and longswords at their hips. I'd never fought a full-fledged member of the order once charged with manning the Wall protecting Daoine from orc incursions, but I knew better than to underestimate them. Even the half-baked observer they'd sent to the Lone Swordsman's side had managed to put an arrow in my back barely an inch away from my spine. I still had the scar, a pink puckered star on the tan skin of my back. The tenth, then, must have been Duchess Kegan Iarsmai. The woman was short – though still taller than me – and learn, with always-moving brown eyes and the stride of someone used to others following behind. She wore no highborn clothes, only hardened leather armour with the crest of her house on the chest. The Duchess had forgone a helmet, allowing her long dark curls to stream down her back. She was not ugly, but neither was she pretty: her features were hawkish and her middle-aged bearing carved of sternness.

Our side of the negotiations was less uniform in nature. Marshal Ranker had taken a tenth of hardened Soninke and Taghreb regulars with her, while I'd picked a tenth from the Gallowborne. Callowans, mostly, but also two orcs. They were ten steps behind myself and the sole goblin on the scene, and the looming silhouettes of the Watch stayed at the same distance when the Duchess advanced. She glanced at Ranker with open dislike, then frowned at the sight of me.

"'Evening," I said. "I'm-"

"Lady Catherine Foundling," Kegan cut through. "We have paintings of you. Marshal, I was not made aware there would be a Named tonight."

"A last moment adjustment," Ranker replied. "But not unfitting. She does have to authority to treat with you."

The Duchess turned her eyes to me.

"Daoine is not subject to the Ruling Council," she said bluntly. "Nor will it ever be. Our tributary arrangements with the Tower need no broker."

"Not what I'm here for," I said. "I hear you have an army assembled on the other side of the river."

"That is none of your concern, Squire," she said.

She glared, at both me and Creation in general.

"Ancestors save us from meddlesome children," she muttered in the Old Tongue.

"I also speak that," I replied in the same.

She offered me a sneer.

"Poorly," she replied.

Ouch. That actually kind of stung. Wasn't my fault it was a hellishly complicated language. Even Alamani wasn't as bad, and people from other parts of the Principate preferred speaking Lower Miezian than learning the language.

"You're not crossing, Kegan," Ranker informed her.

"You think a second legion and whatever the Carrion's Lord apprentice brought will be enough to stop me?" the duchess coldly replied. "No amount of traps will be enough to turn me back. I am due, Marshal."

"It would be," I shrugged. "I've beat worse odds, Watch or no. But I'd rather avoid a fight."

"Then get out of our way," the Deoraithe hissed. "My debt lies not with the Tower."

"I know," I said.

"So how many did the chit take?" Ranker asked. "Twelve? Fifteen? Surely not twenty. You can't have gotten that soft since the Conquest."

"The man who beat us at the Wall is a long way from Denier, goblin," Kegan said. "Do not make me teach the two of you what we have learned since those defeats."

"You won't get there in time," I said, and her eyes went back to me.

"You know not what you speak of," the duchess said.

"I know Akua Sahelian a lot better than you do," I smiled thinly. "You'd have to march through the entire span of Callow, and if you force the crossing you'll be doing it with the Empire harassing you the whole time. She knows that. She planned that. By the time you get to Liesse, she'll have finished whatever ritual she's cooking up."

"I wanted answers from you, but I already obtained them," the Marshal said. "What we have now is terms."

"For what?" Duchess Kegan asked.

I rolled my shoulder, delighting in the crack.

"Allowing you to use my shortcut," I said.

salamence

Oh man oh man oh man. Loved the scene with Catherine and Marshall Ranker. Catherine's pride took a hit, but she could lose some of that and get better. I'm also glad to see she hasn't lost sight of the greater picture.

Like she said, "If I retreated here, all I lost was pride. Perhaps I could use a little less of that."

vietnamabc

This is ridiculous now with so many factions and power blocks, which is exactly what happens in civil war. Chaos is the ladder in full effect here.

Kingbob12

Ahhh, nice to see Catherine is relearning a little bit of humility. Might just save her life one day. The goblins are so fascinating, short lived, brutish little things. Full of cunning and steel, no doubt, but brutish all the same.

I imagine this is what an Elf might feel when watching humans. How strange a feeling this is, to be an elf.

Gunslinger

I'm also surprised Ranker is so loyal to the empire, rather than the Matrons/Goblins. I suppose its the same kind of loyalty Kat gets from Robber.

Letouriste

No no no you got that all wrong. her loyalty goes to black... well goblin loyalty is strange but I'm...thinking this is that

Cpt. Obvious

I'd love to learn just what went down between Amadeus and Ranker. Not even the goblins in the Legion dare to go against the wishes of the Matrons. Yet Amadeus managed to convince the Matron of the largest tribe, the Hungry Dog tribe, to disband it to instead take a post in the Legions?

Well there's Sacker also, another mystery former Matron, though from what I remember being said she's a lot closer to the Matrons and thought to be more or less in their service. Kind of their unofficial envoy.

But Ranker seems to have broken cleanly with the rest of the Matrons and switched her allegiance to Black, or perhaps rather to Amadeus.

There's a story there, I'm sure of it...

Naeddyr

Thanks for the chapter!

So, no bets on whether Cat is actually leading the Duchess to a situation that is going to go totally out of control with fae armies left and right with devils as the sidedish.

Gunslinger

Haha Ranker is awesome. Still admirable that Cat decided to back down instead of making it an issue of pride. I wonder if there is any hard feelings about the Daoine observer. Wasn't she supposed to be one of the Duchess' relatives?

Also if you like the series vote for it on topwebfiction ..

Thanatos

Careful with that – the Duchess' official House motto is, as we learned last chapter, "We do not forget". I presume we'll learn the meaning of that within the foreseeable future.

danh3107

Careful Cat, hubris is just as likely to kill you as a hero or stupidity.

Ward

Love from a dumb phone

Austin

There you are again Ward! That's the third place I've seen you now!

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Psst, he can't see this!

lulol

Catherine needed the reminder.

Hrky

Hahaha, amazing!

xacual

Feels weird to have Akua's appointment placed on Cat's lap when she had nothing to do with that. Is Ranker actually that stupid? Also how does Ranker know about the lot she had crucified only a day or two ago? Conversation between the goblins?

jonnnney

Cat sent a letter of recommendation to the Empress in support of Akua appointment. More importantly, Catherine failed to kill her rival in Liesse.

Mages would have communicated the information about the crucifixions to all of the legions at the very least. You don't crucify someone with the goal of keeping it a secret.

darkseven

Here's hoping Catherine wins Ranker over. I'm also hoping Catherine works things out with the Dread Empress, or things are going to get kind of messy.

edrey

southpool, it wasn't denier, the cty, ranker really is great

chris S

Didn't Cat say in an earlier chapter she didn't expect to get through Arcadia the third time uninterrupted?

I'm fully expecting them to get attacked by fae if they use Arcadia to get to Diabolist

Letouriste

Yeah...and she plan to use that twice more at the very last.probably way more

crazedmoth

And hopefully after the Summer Court are defeated in Creation they won't trouble her again in Arcadia.

crazedmoth

I think that's kind of the point – Cat did say she would be using the Duchess' army against the Fae as well as Diabolist, after all.

Morgenstern

Which is all the better, because it would fit the Winter King's requiremens of pummeling them into submission and only THEN revealing that they are there to HELP... 😊 *g requiremenTs. argh. -.- ALWAYS just after you clicked the "send" button. -.-

Morgenstern

AVR

Or worse, delayed. The second trip took longer than the first despite crossing less distance. The third could be longer still.

reveen

It's cool seeing people shutting down Catherine's wannabe Iron Lady schtick. "Just shut the fuck up and tell me what you want". Should have been Thief's reaction to her though IMO.

alegio

I dont know why, maybe it was just me, but this chapter didnt feel as fluid as the others. Not really forced but just not as fluid as the others

stevenneiman

"She does have [to->the] authority to treat with you."

I quite liked the way that Cat got her unpleasant reminder to take people seriously even if they don't have Names. You'd think she would have learned it from what happened to that one goblin (Chider? I don't remember for sure) that thought she could beat Cat just because she had a Name and Cat didn't at the moment.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

What the hell is Ranker saying in this paragraph? Chits? Ten or twenty WHATS? I don't get this:

"So how many did the chit take?" Ranker asked. "Twelve? Fifteen? Surely not twenty. You can't have gotten that soft since the Conquest."

Darkening

Chit is a derisive term that she's using for Akua. And twelve or fifteen Watch members I believe since akua mentioned kidnapping a bunch of people linked to some artificial spirit and we know the watch are linked to some sort of spirit that empowers them.

Interlude – Apprentice

"The source of wonder and horror is the same, and the boundary between them thinner than you would think."

– Dread Empress Sanguinia I

"That is a Count, I believe," Masego announced.

Father's spectacles were of no use at this range, so he'd had to use his Name. An aspect, more specifically – Glimpse. Apprentice disliked relying on the power conferred onto him by the Gods Below, as he'd always considered it something of a crutch that would cripple his ability to improve his casting without such means, but he could not deny the abilities it lent him had their uses. Even from a mile away, behind a set of obscuring wards, he'd been able to gauge the forces animating the Summer fae. The intensity and breadth of those forces were inferior to those of the Dukes and Duchesses he'd observed in Skade but superior to those of a Baron. There were outliers, of course. The Lady of Cracking Ice had been by an order of magnitude stronger than the other nobles accompanying her in the initial meeting even though her title was the lowest. He suspected the rough equivalent of Roles that was carved into the consciousness of fae was the true factor behind the power those entities could muster, but without proper investigation it was impossible to turn this into a credible thesis.

Regardless, this particular fae seemed to have the power common for one titled Count. The power of his Name keeping his eyes from blinking, Masego studied the fluctuations in the forces. A shame the Count was not in range of his spectacles. One of the enchantments on them helped him quantify the energies at play in a way his aspect simply could not. Still, the actual forces did not seem greater by a significant margin than those of the same-titled Winter fae he had studied. The qualitative difference that allegedly allowed Summer to win every time open war was waged between those Courts must have come from a different source. Nature of the energy, perhaps? The symbolic properties of fire and ice as per the table of classic elements were cleansing and preservation – typically, aggressive properties won over defensive ones when diametrically opposed. Could it be that simple? The dark-skinned mage itched for ink and parchment, but it would have to wait.

“I told you,” Archer crowed. “We just need to keep shooting stronger ones in the head and eventually a big one will show up.”

“That is a vast oversimplification of still poorly understood social dynamics,” Masego replied peevishly.

“You know, really smart people don’t actually need to use long words,” the ochre-skinned woman grinned.

That was such a brutal insult that Apprentice remained too appalled to reply for a solid thirty heartbeats. By that time, Archer had strung that ridiculously large longbow of hers. Even with the power of his aspect having faded away, Masego could see the sorcery worked into it. The wood, already magical in nature and likely from the Waning Woods, had been further strengthened and so had the string. It was, in his estimation, physically impossible for anyone but a Named to successfully draw that bow. Even then, what the woman was preparing to do seemed rather dubious.

“He’s a mile away,” Apprentice said. “There is a breeze. Longbow range is, at best, four hundred yards. Useless against armoured targets past two hundred. The distance you are aiming at is over four times that.”

“That’s very impressive,” Archer grinned. “Learned all those pretty numbers from a book, did you?”

Masego had, in fact, learned those numbers from a book on military tactics he’d borrowed from Hakram. He coughed to hide the blush that touched his cheeks at being caught out.

"For a mortal, those numbers matter a lot," the woman said, eyes hooded with pleasure. "For a Named, they matter a little. For me, though?"

Her grin turned sharp.

"If I can See it, I can kill it."

Vision-driven aspect? Given her Name, it was only logical. Masego's train of thought was interrupted by the sight of Archer on the move, and for an instant that was all that filled his mind. He'd fought at this woman's side before, but he had never witnessed her in action with a bow – only seen the arrows she shot. Archer moved so swiftly he saw only a blur, string taut and then loose as the first arrow flew. Another two followed before a heartbeat had passed. Merciless Gods. His eyes followed the last arrow, studying the properties as it flew. They were silent, and so clearly enchanted. No, he realized, not enchanted. Made of material with natural sorcery. Inherent properties, he understood with a sharp intake of breath. Silence, and some kind of amplification. Sharpness or penetration, he could not tell. It did not matter. Most defensive wards relied on the assumption that any projectiles targeting them would be either entirely mundane or have an active sorcerous component to them, more commonly called an enchantment. The arrows Archer had used would sail right through those, qualifying as neither by the strictures of sorcery. Mage-killers. That was what those projectiles were.

As a child he'd often lingered around Father and Uncle Amadeus whenever they used Imperial business as an excuse to have drinks and bicker, and one of his favourite games had been 'could you beat'. He'd demanded a plan for the two of them to vanquish everyone from the Dead King to a company of legendary heroes, and always been given an answer. Until he'd asked them for the plan to fight Ranger. The two of them had traded looks, and then his uncle had smiled over his cup. Don't, he'd replied. Watching that woman's foremost apprentice at work, he was beginning to grasp why. The Count didn't realize he was being targeted until the first arrow took him in the chest. Fire flared as he fell, but the second arrow nailed his shoulder to the ground anyway. The third went through his left knee, immobilizing him for good.

"Do your stuff," Archer said, waving her hand like she'd not shot a godling thrice in broad daylight.

Masego gathered enough concentration to activate the dispersed components he'd left around the area where'd they killed the last two patrols. The Count rose into the air, shackles of chirping light forming around his limbs. That should keep him prisoner for the duration they needed, and so the first step of their plan was complete. Apprentice dispersed the obscuration ward around them, since neither of them were using their Names anymore, and began the walk to their prisoner. It'd been over a month since Catherine had sent them south to 'bait the Summer Court into attacking the Diabolist'. Masego had been assured that the notion made strategic sense, not that he particularly cared. Only now did he realized that Catherine had used his eagerness to secure some high-quality fae specimens to rope him into doing actual work. Truly, she was becoming more ruthless every month. That was how he'd been talked into going south, anyhow, but he'd wondered why Archer had acquiesced and asked her as much. She'd been sent as a fae expert on loan from Refuge, not a soldier to be used in the Squire's wars.

"Eh, just staying with the army would have been boring," she'd replied. "Hakram's not even around to spar with anymore."

Adjutant had informed him over one of their nightly games of shatranj that those 'spars' mostly consisted of Archer beating him black and blue until she felt like having a drink, which thankfully was frequent. He believed the orc. The foreign-looking woman had brought more drink than rations in her haversack on their trek south, and insisted they stop at villages to replenish her stock.

"That seems like a thin motivation," he'd said.

"The idea of screwing over Sahelian does give me the good kind of shivers," the woman had admitted. "And, well..."

Ah, he'd thought. He could understand the unspoken reason as well. As a boy he'd sometimes wondered why his father did not lead the Calamities. He was the most powerful among them, after all, capable of wiping a city off the face of Creation in a single night. He'd always liked Uncle Amadeus, but like did not usually enter the equation when it came to villains. The strongest held command, that was the natural order. Now, though? He'd learned better. Masego could probably kill Catherine, if he truly put his mind to it. Two days of preparation required at least, but it was doable even with the power she'd gained in Arcadia. He didn't want to, though, and not just because taking up her burdens would be atrociously inconvenient to his research.

She had a way about her, that... It was hard to explain. Sometimes he thought of it as akin to the way smaller celestial orbs circled around larger ones, but that ignored some fundamental aspects of it. It was warm and nice and almost addictive, being part of the family around Catherine Foundling. That heady sense of belonging, the way that when she talked you believed there was nothing you couldn't do. Apprentice did not enjoy 'adventures', as a rule, but he believed his life would be lesser if he'd not followed Squire on them. And so he did not ask any further questions of Archer, because neither of them would be comfortable with where that conversation would take them. Some things were best left unsaid, and in the end he was not inclined to bare much of himself to this stranger. For all that it was nigh impossible to get the woman to shut up, Masego still knew next to nothing about her or what she was capable of. This was not, he thought, a coincidence.

They hurried on the way to the Count. His scrying ritual, adapted to notice the outskirts of the presence of fae instead of looking at them directly and facing the full backlash, had told him there were no patrols closer than half a day's march. Still, their actions today were as good as lighting a beacon for anyone looking for them. They needed to be gone before anyone came looking, if this was to work. Which he wasn't sure it would. Neither of them, as it turned out, were particularly good at planning. Apprentice usually let Catherine and Hakram handle this sort of menial work, and Archer had admitted that her plans usually didn't go much further than 'fight the enemy until it died'. He'd agreed to sharing a drink with the woman only once on their way south, when they'd come up with their plan to push Summer to attack the Diabolist. They'd tried to guess why Liesse had not been attacked yet, when the two cities to its flanks had already been taken by Summer. Masego had eventually mentioned the ancient but powerful wards protecting the city, and the other Named had agreed that those would give fae pause. They were, after all, exceptionally sensitive to boundaries.

They needed, therefore, to make it easier for Summer to attack the city. Sadly, neither of them knew anything about military tactics. Apprentice had, however, made a comprehensive map of the wards in the walls of Liesse before the battle of the same name. Leaking that information should help, they'd agreed. So he'd written it down on a parchment, they'd located a small fae patrol and handed it to them. Or tried to, at least. The fae captain had ordered them to immediately kneel and swear allegiance to the Queen of Summer or be destroyed, Archer had offered them a drink instead and they'd rather taken offence to that. A quarter hour later, they had five fae corpses she'd had to kill with a broken bottle and they weren't anywhere closer to their objective. They'd tried again, attracting another small patrol and just leaving the scroll with the information on the ground while hiding. The fae had torched it and ordered a search of the region. Five other corpses later, they'd agreed that diplomacy did not seem to be working. Alternatives were needed.

Wondering what Father and Papa would do in a similar situation Masego had arrived to the conclusion that capturing a fae and rewriting their mind so the information was inside it before releasing them to the Court was the most expedient solution. Archer's suggestion that they just carve all the details on the corpses of the fae was clearly flawed, since there was no guaranteed they wouldn't just torch the corpses on sight like that had the scroll. They'd ambushed a third patrol, keeping the captain alive and Apprentice had taken out his tools to tinker with the forces that passed for the creature's soul.

Frustratingly, there hadn't been enough room. As entities who did not learn, per se, there was no space inside the mind of the fae for much aside what was already there. Carving out some unnecessary things like the ability to see or the knowledge of how to use sorcery had resulted in unmoving bodies with blank eyes. Worse, apparently removing the ability to move stopped them breathing as well – that was just poor design, he'd complained. Archer had suggested they abduct several captains and spread the information across them, but that would both take long and risk more inaccuracies the more operations he had to do.

"We need a bigger fish, then," Archer had suggested.

"We're in a landlocked region of Callow," Apprentice had reasonably pointed out.

She'd called him a condescending pedant, he'd called her rampantly ignorant and they'd eventually agreed that a more powerful fae was needed. Simply flaring their Names wouldn't work, since for all they knew it might draw an entire army. Archer had then introduced the notion of ambushing a patrol and then remaining close by, then killing the fae who came to investigate until one holding a sufficient high title showed up. He hadn't liked the plan, but been unable to come up with a better one. A sennight later, here they were looming over an imprisoned Count. The fae glared at them, only barely conscious.

"How dare you-" he started, but then his mouth closed.

Masego tied off the spell structure and left it active to keep the creature silent. He was in no mood for a rant, not when he had to do such a delicate operation. Reaching into the pocket dimension he'd created after the rebellion, Apprentice took out the leather pack holding his tools in place and casually created a pane of force to hold it. Humming lightly, he took out what looked like a knife so thin it could not possibly cut anything. He looked at the fae and patted the man's shoulder reassuringly.

"Don't worry," he said. "I'll cut out the part that dictates pain very early. It shouldn't hurt at all after that."

"It's much less creepy when they don't scream," Archer noted approvingly.

Masego got work.

Well, it had worked. More or less. The two of them were hiding in a bush under an obscuration ward, watching the host of Summer spread to surround Liesse. The Diabolist had seen them coming, which had interesting implications. Either Sahelian was using the same indirect scrying he was but more accurately, or she'd found another way entirely. Most likely the second. Wolof had many secrets in its vaults. Regardless, they knew the Diabolist had been aware of the fae headed her way because the army she'd had on the field had retreated behind the walls and was now manning them. As well as a truly impressive amount of devils, Apprentice noted. She must have used a Lesser Breach to gather so much on a short notice. Her skill with sorcery continued to impress. The two Named watched the host of Summer spread across the plain, for it was a sight to see.

Ten thousand fae, he'd estimated. Entire regiments of ivory-armoured fairies stood ramrod straight, spears held high and a river of banners and pennons fluttering in the wind amongst them. Archers armed with longbows of pure white wood stood behind them, feathers not of any creature known to Creation fletching their arrows. Not a single one of them could be called anything but young and beautiful, the ardour of war wafting off them like a fume. Fae bearing trumpets of gold and rubies stood in every regiment, ready to let out the clarion call of conquest that lay in the heart of every Summer fae. A thousand knights in silvery plate sat astride winged horses, long lances and shields of exquisite make in their hands. They were forming in a loose triangle behind the infantry, their mounts stirring eagerly. The nobles stood out starkly from the rest, colourful figures made of fire, steel and silk that warped the air with heat wherever they stood. No two sets of plate they wore were the same, every one a masterpiece that would have made a mortal craftsman weep to look at.

The defenders were no less dreamlike to witness. Praesi soldiers wearing the distinctive colours of the family they were sworn to on their tabards manned the few bastions on the wall, their chainmail blackened dark as a crow's feathers as was the custom in the Wasteland. Their armaments were sharp goblin steel, the finest blades of Calernia put in the hands of men and woman trained from birth to use them in the service of their lord. Between them stood rows upon rows of walin-falme devils. Tall and with the dark leathery skin of bats, they wore plate marked with the brand of Wolof: red and black, a curving golden lion inside the splash of colour. These bore spears and axes of cast iron, the metal known to be the ugly death of fae. Spread amongst all of these were small clusters of Taghreb and Soninke in tailored robes, panes of lights inscribed with runes flickering around them. War-mages, the finest the Wasteland had to offer. This was not an army that would go gently, not even against the strength of Summer.

It was a host ripped straight from the old days of blood and darkness, when all of Calernia had feared the sound of Praes at war. It was an ancient dream, this one, but Masego's fathers had taught him better than to love it.

"I forgot to ask before we left, but do we actually want Summer to win?" Archer asked, chewing on dried meat.

Masego blinked, shaken out of his thoughts. While he'd been spellbound, his companion seemed less than impressed.

"You weren't paying attention during the briefing?" he said.

"Nah," she admitted easily. "I figured you would."

Apprentice cursed.

"I thought you would," he admitted.

"It's their fault for making it boring, really," Archer said.

"They kept talking about logistics and supply trains," Masego agreed bitterly. "I don't want to know anything about those, Hakram."

"I mean, just guessing here," the dark-eyed woman said. "Foundling wouldn't want all the people inside butchered right?"

"I think not," Apprentice said. "She gets irritated about people killing Callowans unless it's her doing it."

"So we don't want Summer to win," Archer pointed out triumphantly. "They do tend to burn stuff a lot. And people. I don't think they understand the difference very well."

"Everybody burns people, it's a common execution method across Calernia," Masego replied absent-mindedly, trying to remember anything about the briefing aside from Adjutant's voice droning and Catherine drinking too much. "I think we may want them both to lose."

"Is that something that happens?" she asked, sounding puzzled.

He glanced at her.

"Have you won every fight you were in?" he asked sceptically.

"Well, no," Archer said. "I spar against the Lady Ranger. Never landed a blow on her unless she allowed me."

Apprentice drew on his extensive military experience, which consisted of three battles where he'd largely spent his time setting people on fire or exploding them when Catherine asked.

"I think it's like shatranj," he mused. "You know, towards the end of the game when most pieces have been taken. We want them both to lose pieces."

Archer glanced at the city and grimaced.

"I think we may have given Summer a bit too much of an advantage," she said.

Masego followed her eyes and paled. One of the fae, on a winged horse, had ridden up to the city walls. The volley of arrows shot at her burst into flame and scattered into ashes long before they got close, and it only got worse from there: a torrent of heat formed in front of her and impacted the walls, beginning to melt the stone. Well, that was one way to beat the wards. They could not be held back by the boundary if there was no boundary.

"This is bad," Archer decided.

The Diabolist, though, did not flinch. A heartbeat later Apprentice's ward shivered as a large-scale ritual triggered. The waves of sorcery coming from Liesse were almost enough to scatter it, though when he had a Glimpse at the city he saw this was but a sliver of what had been at play. Slowly, Liesse and the ground under it began to rip their ways out of the soil. And only this much wasted power? he thought. At least a mile around the city should have been turned into a wasteland, for something this large. The Diabolist seemed to have managed to keep it all within a hair's breadth of Keter's Due, which meant this working might have had the single most efficient ritual array in Praesi history. He was itching to have a look at it even as Liesse rose into the air and kept rising, tons of soil falling out from under it. He could almost see the array itself, what had gone into activating it. This was no mere blood sacrifice, she'd used fae to fuel it and, just for a moment, the Apprentice touched something greater than himself. A larger truth still beyond his understanding, a mystery in the almost religious sense of the term, and though he could not grasp it just witnessing part was almost enough to... And then the moment was gone. He was shivering and more excited than he had been in years. He'd nearly transitioned into another Name, just by looking at this. He was close. In the distance, the host of Summer lit up a thousand bright colours as their wings formed. The soldiers and devils on the walls prepared to meet the assault.

"We have, technically, accomplished the task we were sent south for," Masego said.

Archer looked at the army of Summer taking flight.

"Retreat?" she finally asked.

Streaks of sorcery filled the sky with sounds like thunder. As devils spread their wings and the battle began in earnest.

"For now," Apprentice said. "We'll be back."

erraticerrata

First update of the month, so extra chapter. This one is titled Deadhand and from (predictably) Hakram's POV. It's in the Extra Chapters tab, but link here as usual:

<https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2017/08/02/deadhand/>

danh3107

H-o-l-y SHIT, that was fucking cool. Also an interesting introspection into Masego's mind.

And it's only the first chapter of the evening.

Erratic, I think I love you

Morgenstern

Second that.

I especially liked the part about Masego being soooo *close*. Probably a bit because it had that satisfying ring of "yes, finally it's being confirmed", but also because the moment was just so nice. 😊

nineran

I noticed the "almost religious" and have been thinking about what magical person would cross dimensional lines, work with or study reality, and for it to be almost religious, but not traditional good. I can only come up with "Occultist" or "Shaman".

Thoughts?

Ethan Smith

Hmm I could see Occultist – I've been trying to think of what Cat could transition to beside Black/White/Maybe Grey Knight damn that was epic. Also, masego transitioning? iiiiiiinteresting. Love his interplay with archer, they are like laurel and hardy with superpowers. And a weird take on ethics.

Theo Promes

nehemiahnewell

Huh, I wonder what name Masego almost seized and if he will achieve it.

Also, I was in stitches through the 'do we want them to win' conversation. I will never look at those two the same again.

Darkening

I forget Masego's a Villain sometimes, and then I see him rip out someone's soul or flay the mind of a demigod. Hm. Wasn't expecting Masego to change Names while Warlock is still around, wonder what name he's approaching.

Darkening

Also, I feel like Diabolist might have a better chance at recruiting him if she tried it again now...

Letouriste

Nope. he said in this very chapter that being near cat make his life MORE meaningful. diabolist don't have much to attract him with, and I think his loyalty is set now.

Darkening

Yeah, he did say that, and then he saw a work of sorcery from Diabolist that inspired awe and wonder in him and nearly made him switch to another name. I doubt he **will** switch sides, since he does like being around Cat, but never forget he's a Villain at the end of the day.

Letouriste

He could just capture her and rip the knowledge from her brain.

But I think he doesn't need her for transitioning because the cause is likely the powering fae ritual itself. he could just recreate something close with his own fae captives.

Vamair

You can notice Catherine hasn't got a single Named with an actively villainous Name among her peers. Apprentice, Adjutant, Archer, Squire, all of them are neither villainous nor heroic or can transition into both (unlike villainous Warlock, Assassin, Black Knight, Empress, Tyrant and heroic Exiled Prince, Lone Swordsman and Wandering Bard, White Knight, Champion, etc.).

It feels like they're going to cut themselves a third role in the tales.

Also, if an Apprentice transitions, Kilian can become a new one. Not sure that she will, though.

Misterspokes

Dread Empress/ Emperor is the Name...

sheer_falacy

Everything about this chapter was amazing. I love their utter failure at subtlety, how polite Apprentice was while rewriting someone's head, and their debate about who they actually wanted to win.

And I do hope that Akua is doing something more interesting than a flying city. Yes, it's a classic and she's a huge fan of that sort of thing, but the Dread Emperors and Empresses who are really remembered are the ones who did absurd things that no one had done before. No one remembers the name of the second Dread Emperor to turn themselves into a giant spider, after all.

arancaytar

Their dialogue is one of the funniest parts of this series 😊

nick012000

Apprentice/Archer OTP.

Dimensional

A flying city is cool and all, but.. it's a lot less useful against some one who is bringing an army through Arcadia (well at least it after the wards have been removed by a convenient attacking army). Now given said army is coming through Arcadia so will only arrive with just enough dramatic time to stop whatever shenanigans are going down, but narrative story based travel time beats flying citadel I think.

Darkening

I'm guessing she's going full out and planning to do an Ascension (descension?) ritual on a flying city guarded by sentient invisible tigers and giant spiders.

MagnaMalusLupus

On the subject of possible names that Apprentice almost grasped;

- Arcanist
- Sorcerer
- Magus
- Primalist
- Archmage

dalek955

Loremaster
Savant
Thaumaturgist

nehemiahnewell

Considering his quest to break the working, the Illusion, of Creation and see beyond. To challenge the Gods he feel are no better than him, and how he almost saw something of the true nature of reality... The Gnostic sounds like a possibility to me.

Trikki

Maybe a Name that indicates his desire to understand everything about the workings of Creation.

– Scientist

– Savant

– Heretic (Though if it's the Gods who are handing out Names, I wonder how likely this one is... In this chapter Apprentice mentions his dislike of using his Aspects, but he still felt close to Ascension, so going against the Gods Below might not affect getting Names)

Warren Peace

If it was a Name he WANTED, he would have taken it. Therefore it was probably a Name he didn't particularly want. That's what MY Apprentice would do, anyway.

nineran

YES! This is what I was trying to do, too.

I like Arcanist, Magus, Primalist and Loremaster. I'd like to add Occultist to the hat.

With these alternatives available, I can't really see Shaman anymore. I can't see Masego being about bodily fluids.

Savant, Thaumaturgist, Diviner are all too... good. I think we've seen a White Sorcerer and a White Wizard in this series.

beleester

Typo near the end: "the host of Simmer"

I'm a little underwhelmed by Diabolist's plan so far. Basically it's the old flying fortress, but bigger. If this is a story, it's one of those cash-in sequels that doesn't add anything new.

I hope there's something more to the working. Maybe she's going to pull an Ultron and drop the city top of her enemies? Or maybe she's going to take the city into orbit? (That would be a little out of genre, but at the same time it's so totally Bond Villain that I want to see it.)

nehemiahnewell

Isn't her whole thing her unwillingness to admit the old ways were nothing more than dramatic failures, her desire to turn back the clock?

Dragrath

Kind of she wants to convey that the old ways mattered i.e. will build into success eventually or something like that. But I would be disappointed if she didn't have more than a flying city so hopefully she has more than just turning back the clock 😊

stevenneiman

"Her skill with sorcery continued to [impressed->impress]"
"this [workingl->working] might have had the single most efficient ritual array in Praesi history"

She's a traditionalist, but to the methods and the ideals of old Praes. So yes, this is a flying fortress but you can bet a thousand human sacrifices that's not all she's up to.

Hai

Given that Akua developed a way to safely channel Keter's Due, and that she is sacrificing both copious amounts of fae and a god... What if the flying city isn't the main effect of her ritual, but the side effect?

Morgenstern

Not her. Her DAD. 😊

Morgenstern

And yeah, when I read this, I did NOT think of a flying fortress, but this being Keter's Due instead of the miles-around-devastation Masego expected. The two things were rather connected / same train of thought, after all...

Letouriste

Hum...masego want knowledge, he want being godlike and he will probably stay by cat side. so no dominating Names but still mind blowing and rebel-like+intellectual-like...any potential name goes to mind?

Transcendant?

Magister?

Void mage?

Disector?^^

I don't manage to imagine his futur name:o

Unmaker

Those two are f***ing hilarious.

Apprentice almost transitioned just looking at the work that Diabolist's father did. Why doesn't that man have a Name?

Darkening

Because he doesn't have a Cause, probably. I recall Black saying that named are named because they have a crazy strong desire and the will to go after it or something like that. And Akua's father just wants to do his research, spend time with his daughter, and be left alone. No ambition.

Sashimi

But he does have a Name? First Mage. The one no (other) Praesi wants because there are more... prestigious Names out there.

Unorignal

It's a title, not a NAME. Nonetheless, he was a potential warlock but he didn't pursue it. Instead, he spent time researching

wirelessgrapes

I know it's late and completely unrelated to this specific chapter, but this was a line from Book 2 Chapter 18 about the Silver Spears cavalry: "Gods Below and Everburning, what manner of wicked things I wouldn't do to have cavalry like that". The answer is commit sorta treason.

Just found that tidbit cool and wanted to point it out.

Gunslinger

I think not," Apprentice said. "She gets irritated about people killing Callowans unless it's her doing it."

Hahaha I love Masego

Shequi

If Masego came into another Name, then could the vacant Apprentice be a certain redhead?

Warren Peace

Great chapter! I would have thought that between them, App&Archer would be able to come up with a semblance of strategic thinking, but they were endearingly inept =)

ArkCthuul

Well, given the semireligious undertones prophet might also work.

Overall one of the funniest and scariest chapters at the same time, kudos!

Isa Lumitus

I'm just going to add my voice to the choir saying that the characterization of Apprentice and Archer were great.

I can't see them working as a couple... but the ship tease would probably be entertaining.

neodarklight

This chapter reminded me of a scene in A Geek's Guide: Corporation of Occult Research and Extermination, abbreviated as AGG: CORE, over on the spacebattles forums. More specifically, the flirting between the bloodthirsty sorcerer with no social skills and the oni warrior girl with no social skills.

cartesiandaemon

Oh gosh, that's lovely. Oh god, how did no-one get them to repeat their main goals back to them? Or maybe send a reliable non-named along with them? But I'm glad they didn't, it was so great.

burguulkodar

I love this kids. So funny! And amoral. Like really evil amoral. Fascinating.

Villainous Interlude: Exeunt

"If Creation is not mine, what need is there to be a Creation at all?"

– Dread Empress Triumphant, First and Only of Her Name

"They think they have us cornered," Fasili said.

There was laughter in that tone, the intonation he used in Mtethwa implying mocking irony – he'd inflected the word for 'think' with the same sound as the one for 'fool'. Winds were whipping at the city wildly as it rose into the sky, the power Akua had called ripping Liesse from solid ground and casting it up. The aftermath of the ritual she'd called on still burned in her bones, pulsing in time with her heartbeat. It was the largest working she'd ever undertaken, dwarfing even the two Lesser Breaches she'd made in her lifetime, and it had been exhilarating. The traces of that monstrous sorcery would permeate the region for decades to come, long after every trace of the fae currently trampling it were gone. Standing atop the highest bastion of the city gates, the Diabolist and her mortal second-in-command were watching the army of Summer splayed below. A host of legend, she conceded as she studied the glittering ranks. But she had one as well and it would not come out the lesser of this strife.

There were two princes and a princess among the ranks of the enemy, the strongest hand the Summer Court could play without sending its own Queen into battle. One of those stood head and shoulders above the others: the same princess who'd forced Diabolist to trigger her ritual early when she'd begun melting the ramparts with brute force. Given the cascading nature of the wards woven into the walls, if she'd been left at it much longer the entire outer rampart would have crumbled along with most of the dark-skinned aristocrat's army. No matter. Akua had planned to use the ritual as soon as the enemy made their move anyway, though she'd expected an assault of thousands and not a single fae. The highest caste of the Fair Folk was nothing to sneer at, she acknowledged. Among all the entities she could call on nothing but a handful of obscenely ancient devils could match their power. She had three of these summoned, as it happened, a perfectly symmetrical match. The Gods Below sometimes saw fit to hand gifts to their most faithful, and who else but she could still claim that title?

"The harvest has been plentiful," Diabolist said. "Let us reap the benefits in full."

The ritual array for turning Liesse into a flying fortress-city was not the one she'd been building for all these months, of course. A ritual so straightforward would not have required Akua to sink all the resources at her disposal into the city. No, all she'd done was activate a secondary array, one she'd originally designed as a security measure in case the Legions of Terror came calling too early. It was the reason she'd allowed all those refugees from the south behind her walls, even if like rodents they ate up her granaries: hey could serve as acceptable fuel in a pinch. Ultimately, that had proved unnecessary. She'd managed to acquire a Duchess of Summer with her traps before needing to retreat and the fae noble had been more than enough for the purpose. Diabolist preferred this outcome, as it happened. Keeping the city full of refugees should stay Foundling's hand when the hour of reckoning came. And if didn't? Well, there were always uses for such large quantities of lifeblood.

The High Lords of Praes knew how to turn massacre into power better than anyone else, living or dead.

What had finally driven the fae to attack, she wondered? Was it taking a Duchess? The reaction seemed too delayed for that, weeks passing before the attack came. Until recently they'd been content to fight her in the plains of the south, rightfully wary of the wards protecting her stronghold. Akua's instincts were that Foundling had a hand in this, but the latest news had her in Laure crucifying fools. The Diabolist had had to resist the urge to roll her eyes, when she'd heard resistance had been attempted after Squire had entered the city. As if the likes of Satang Motherless and Murad Kalbid had it in them to thwart the likes of Catherine Foundling. Akua's enemy had flaws, but she was a power worthy of the Name she had claimed and growing more Praesi by the year. A pair of castoffs from the Wasteland were nothing more than dust in the face of that. More interesting was the way Squire had been able to travel so quickly. Given Foundling's recent journey in the realm of the fae, Akua was inclined to believe she was carving paths through Arcadia to move faster than Creation permitted.

A fascinating notion that, one that while not unknown – the Calamities had done the same on occasion and there were records of heroes doing so as well – had never been used on this scale before. It was one thing for a handful of Named to hurry through the outskirts of Arcadia, quite another for an army to march through the territory of the Courts. Whatever had happened in Winter after Squire wandered inside its boundaries, she'd gained great power there. Measures would have to be taken so she couldn't pull the same trick on the Diabolist, but that was a notion for later. Today, after all, Akua Sahelian was going to war. The phrase, even as an idle thought, set her blood aflame. It felt right. It felt like she was finally touching upon what she had always been meant to be, unsheathing a blade for the first time after years of forging it. Liesse reached the height it was meant to and then ceased ascending, stabilizing in its flight. Beneath her the wings of the fae coming for her head lit up the field and the winged cavalry began its charge upwards. Clarions sounded, piercing the afternoon air like blades. The call of Summer. From the walls of Liesse, a hundred hide drums began to beat. Doom, doom, doom they announced. Praes is at war. Tremble, any who stand in its way.

"Lord Fasili," she said. "Take command of the army. I will be joining the fray."

"May you blot out their horizon forever, my lady," the Soninke replied, bowing.

There was fervour in his eyes. He too understood what this battle stood for: in this twilight of the Age of Wonders, the last true sons and daughters of Praes had taken up arms. Oh, you poor fools of Summer. Twilight is the coming of night, and night has ever been our time. We will own the dark and shape the day that comes after it. Adjusting her long crimson, Akua breathed in the wind and reached for her Name. It was pulsing inside her still, like the blood in her veins, as much a birth right as the rest. Call, she whispered inside her mind, and as her aspect rose to the surface her mind unfolded across miles. A small sliver of it inside every devil she had brought into Creation, an iron shard inside their very being that shackled them to her will. This was more than the mere bindings her ancestors had managed. It was ownership in truth, the kind of tyranny that had once been the sole province of those who climbed the Tower.

"Fly," she ordered, and every one of them heard the words. "Scatter all that opposes me."

A full thousand walin-falme spread their leather wings instantly. Her harvest had been bountiful indeed: once she'd thought she would have only four hundred to call on, but the revolving wards designed by her father had allowed her to capture so many fae she'd managed over twice that. The devils took flight eagerly, screaming promises of death in the Dark Tongue. Diabolist could have called on a flying chariot to carry her to war, but it would have only slowed her down: rising smoothly over the edge of the rampart, she strode onto the afternoon sky. Beneath her feet glass-like panels of force appeared and she strolled towards the wave of enemies filling the air. Only one other person did the same: the man who'd taught her this spell, her father. The first wave of fae rising through the air reached him before they did her, but she was not worried and for good reason. Without Papa so much as raising a hand, all the enemies that came close to him started... bubbling up under their skin, before simply exploding in bursts of flame. Smiling at the sight, Diabolist glanced at the insolent things headed for her. A swarm of ivory and steel, flying pennants of red and gold. Doom, doom, doom the drums sounded. A promise, an oath.

"Justice," the fae clamoured.

"Death," Diabolist replied, and granted it to them.

High Arcana runes light up around her, coming easier than they ever have before, and the air in front of the enemy formed into a ball that condensed for three heartbeats before detonating with a sound like thunder. A hundred fae were swatted down like flies, their bright wings winking out, and twice as many were tossed aside by the impact. Raw power pumped through her veins, her very Name feeding on the sight of her supremacy. The tide of fae swallowed her up as the enemy host headed for the walls, while in the distance the winged cavalry charged straight into her swarm of devils. The melee that ensued was brutal, cast iron in furious eldritch hands smashing into the silvery arms of the Summer Court's peerless knights. Diabolist paid it no further mind, as waves of fae were falling upon her.

"Seven lanterns, lit and smothered," she incanted. "I have spilled blood and broken bone, known the desert sun and offered pure incense."

High Arcana wove itself into her words, every syllable shaping the runes according to her will as if she were painting with sorcery.

"Howl, hunger, hollow. Threefold is my will: obey, winds."

When it came to wind sorcery, not even the finest of the Soninke could match the Taghreb. A current of bone-dry wind formed at her back, sweeping around her and gathering all the fae that had been approaching her with it. Laughing, she quickened the sweep and broadened it until the dozen soldiers she'd first caught became hundreds. The current of air, full of flesh and steel, formed into a ball above her head when her hands rose. Her fingers formed a fist and with a sick crunch metal and bodies alike shattered. Her veins burning at the power she still held onto, Diabolist flicked down her hand and flung the ball into the enemy ranks – it carved a line through them, though killed precious few.

"It seems mere soldiers are no match for the likes of you," a voice spoke from ahead.

A pale woman with golden hair, her scale armour a different shade of green in every scale, stared at her calmly. Sword in hand, she saluted gallantly.

"I am the Countess of First Bloom," she introduced herself.

Diabolist closed her eyes. She could feel the fae landing on the walls, fighting her soldiers and dying in droves as wards and goblin steel carved through them. Her mages snuffed out fae lives with streaks of lightning and darkness, sending rituals old as Wolof into the throngs of assailants. Streams of lesser devils poured out of summoning circles, a storm of shrieks and claws that died as quick as they came into existence but left behind bleeding limbs and tired hands. Deaths, so many deaths, of both mortals and fae. Every one of them permeating Creation with strands of power.

"In the name of my Queen, I consign you to death by the flames of Summer," the Countess announced, irritated by the lack of response.

Diabolist smiled.

"I will teach you," she said. "What fire truly is."

Claim, she spoke silently. Her third aspect, and the one worthiest of a ruler. In a heartbeat, all those strands of power shivered and fell under her authority. The aristocrat gathered them to her, siphoning them into the spell she'd begun crafting even as she spoke.

"Burn, misbegotten creature," the Countess of First Bloom cried out.

Heat turned to fire, a torrent of bright golden flames pouring out towards the Diabolist. She was a mighty thing, this Countess. But not mightier than a thousand deaths made sorcery. Akua's silhouette was wreathed in power, for a heartbeat, and then for a hundred feet in every direction the sky turned into a nightmare of dark flame. Not quite hellfire, but centuries of mages in Wolof had managed to craft the closest thing to it a mortal could manage. A hundred grasping hands and hungry maws of flame devoured the noble fae and any foolish soldier who'd come too close to the struggle. The golden flames that had arrogantly attempted to take her life were buried and smothered, the hellish scene lasting for thirty heartbeats before disappearing in a curtain of wisps. There was nothing left of the Countess, not even blackened bones. The Diabolist stood alone in the sky, the fae soldiers parting around her like a receding tide. She had not taken a second step since first casting. Doom, doom, doom the drums sounded.

The walls were holding, by a thread. Her soldiers died like dogs under fae spears and swords, but wherever Summer gained a foothold sorcery scoured the walls clean. The casualties were brutal, but what did she care when her dead men rose within moments to hold their blades again? Her thousand devils had lost the clash against the winged knights, but taken a toll: half her walin-falme were gone, but so was a third of Summer's most dangerous soldiers. Papa, bored with simply allowing fae to die on his defences, had gone to toy with them. Now they were fighting an enormous snake of green lightning, dispersing it with their lances only to find it forming again behind them and having left a few smoking corpses in its wake. It was only when a Duke went to duel him that her father retreated to the walls, activating a set of wards to force him back before joining the defence. The three greatest of her devils were there as well, Diabolist saw. They towered above the rest, but there was a reason they were not with the lesser devils she had meant them to command: the same princess who'd almost collapsed her walls had landed atop the rampart, and after burning clean any Praesi who came close to her had begun to fight all three at the same time.

She was, the Diabolist realized with dismay, winning. Of her three great devils the one she could see most clearly was a massive creature of rippling ebony muscle, two large sets of horns growing atop his hairless head. Jenge Kubawa, he was called. The Lord of Despair, a devil from the Twenty-Seventh Hell said to have once held back the invading army of Aksum for a day on his own, in the days before the Miezán. Akua watched the fae princess rip out one of his horns, shove it into his throat and follow through with a burst of flame that burst straight through his chest and out his back. She would have to go and handle that situation. Still, that left the two princes unaccounted for, which was even more worrying. Where were they – ah.

"A praiseworthy resistance, for mortals," a man said contemptuously, tone belying his words.

Two fae stood in the sky across her, neither of them using their wings. Without even needing to exert their power the air around them warped from the heat, idle mirages flickering at the corner of her vision. The one who'd spoken was dark-skinned like a Soninke, though his pure white hair lent him an unsightly appearance. He was, otherwise, beautiful – and his armour of burnt stone was touched with red veins that made it look like burning coal. Against his shoulder a spear of pure crystal rested. The other one was pale and dark-haired, his perfectly-cropped beard looking sharp enough to cut flesh. He wore no armour, only long robes of woven sunlight and flame. His fingers delicately clasped around a sword of pure gold, runes inscribed on the flat of the blade ever-moving. She knew better than to look in any of their eyes. Doom, doom, doom the drums went.

"I am the Prince of Deep Drought," the pale one said with a beautiful smile. "Would you be the Lady Diabolist?"

"A presumptuous question to ask, when half your party has not introduced themselves," Akua replied.

The dark-skinned one sneered.

"I am the Prince of Burning Embers, mortal," he said. "Kneel."

The weight of the order struck her like a blow, but Diabolist was indifferent. The soul he was trying to command was far, far away. She would not need it for some time yet.

"I am Akua Sahelian," she replied. "You may yet survive, if you swear yourself to me."

The Prince of Deep Drought looked sympathetic.

"My lady, though my brother spoke uncouthly the sentiment was correct," he said. "This battle is lost. Sulia will destroy your devils, your army will fail and you cannot hope to triumph against two princes of Summer. Surrender to us, and make obeisance to our Queen. You can find fulfilment in her service."

"I cannot win, can I?" the Diabolist asked.

"That is the truth," the Prince of Deep Drought agreed.

Akua smiled.

"I have two truths for you in return," she said. "I am a villain, and this is the first part of my plan."

Out of instinct, the two of them began moving. Too late.

"Bind," Akua said, calling on her final aspect.

It was meant to force devils to her will, this power of hers, but fae were not of Creation either. This and the sheer power of the entities before her limited what she could accomplish, but in the end this lay at the heart of her Name: to be the Diabolist was to hold power over creatures foreign to the world. The Prince of Burning Embers jerked, then the spear he held spun smoothly and went for his brother's throat. The other prince's eyes widened and he called on fire, his assailant evaded the flames without missing a beat as Akua willed him to do. The fight that followed was swift and merciless. She'd picked the least powerful of the two to bind, but he was clearly more used to combat: the other was a superb swordsman, but relied more on sorcery and Diabolist's puppet simply did not allow him to use it. Twice she let the Prince of Burning Embers take hits on purpose, in places that would endanger his life but not his ability to continue using his spear. It would make him easier to finish off afterwards. In the end, she did not manage to kill the Prince of Deep Drought – though the spear tore through his stomach. Feeling her control slip, Diabolist raised an eyebrow.

"Kill yourself," she ordered.

Eyes raging, the Prince of Burning Embers ran his own spear through his heart even as his brother tried to stop him. Runes lit up around Akua as she began using the massive power coming from the death of a Prince of Summer to empower another spell, casually eyeing her remaining opponent.

"Shall we revisit the issue of victory, prince?" she asked.

"Let's," a woman's voice said, and the panels of force that served as Diabolist's shield shattered like glass.

Pain tore through Akua's side as fire claimed her flank, hastily put out by a barked incantation that froze the entire section solid. Gods, how could she not have felt the princess coming towards her? The woman's hair was fire-red, her skin pale and her eyes a terrible thing to behold. Like the heat of the sun made flesh, just being looked upon by them was exhausting.

"I told you two not to get arrogant," Princess Sulia of High Noon said. "Mortals are trickier than Winter, this campaign has proved as much."

Diabolist steadied her breathing and healed the burned flesh on her side. The flames had gone straight through the armour she wore beneath her cloak, ignoring seven layers of enchantments – five of which were meant specifically to ward off fae.

"She seized him, Sulia, how could even a Named –" the other fae began, but the princess cut him off.

"We have no stories here," she said. "Except the ones they make. It is madness, rampant madness. Order must be restored. To ashes, if needs must."

"Oh, I quite agree," Diabolist said. "You have no place here. And you've delayed my plans long enough."

The Princess of High Noon eyed her, perfect face disdainful.

"I've no time to waste bantering with cattle, you'll simply have to –"

The fae royalty went still. Akua glanced at the other one – the prince was akin to a statue as well.

"Retreat," Sulia called suddenly, and the word echoed across the entire battlefield. "To Arcadia."

The dark-skinned aristocrat raised an eyebrow.

"But we were only beginning to get acquainted," she said.

The Princess of High Noon bared her teeth.

"We will return, Diabolist," she said. "We will finish this fight, once Summer is no longer being invaded. You and your compatriot laid a cunning trap, I will grant you this much."

Not even a flicker of surprise touched Akua's face. A portal opened and the two fae vanished in the blink of an eye, taking the corpse of the prince before she could do anything. All across the battle gates into Arcadia opened, the host of Summer disappearing through them without warning or explanation. Within twenty heartbeats, there was no one left in sight but her own army. There was a long moment of silence, then a cheer that shook the heavens. The Diabolist remained where she stood, before finally surrendering to a discreet bit of genuine laughter.

"Oh, Squire," she said almost fondly. "You truly are the gift that keeps on giving."

Doom, doom, doom went the drums.

danh3107

That was everything I hoped Akua's powers would be. Brilliant, an old school villain reveling in her unholy power, saved at the last by her rival.

Brilliant

1shot4living

May she never return.

Dianna

Shit... Cat what now? Brilliant Chapter btw, Akua's seems happy though, living her age of wonders dream. I hope Cat finishes up in Arcadia and kicks her ass real quick though. Can't wait for the show down.

Other thought: I am putting in my bet that Cat is going transition into the Name of Knight. An embodiment symbol of Callowan might and the ancestral protector of her kingdom.

RoflCat

Given her speech to Archer, I get a feeling she might even become something else entirely.

Like, even 'regressing' from Squire to just Orphan/Foundling, and then actively transition into whatever Name fits the situation before eventually return to just being 'Foundling'

In the same way that Akua became Diabolist by creating her own story, Catherine might just create the story of Foundling.

Her aspects would be something universal, one that might not even empower herself but rather those around her.

Dianna

I can't say that won't happen, but I don't see where you are getting her idea for her aspects. Explain? Also can you regress? Have we ever heard or seen of that? Whatever Cat becomes I feel it will be foreshadowed that it is at least possible.

To support my argument no one has the Name Knight, without the Black or White attached, so she would be carving her own story. Also, the Empress said when she and Cat met "A Squire will in time become a Knight." I trust her information and feel it a very fitting name for the protector of Callow.

greatwyrmgold

It's also an appropriate Name for a student of the Black Knight who rejects some fundamental aspects of (the local forces of) both Good and Evil.

stevenneiman

Cat might have some ability to empower other, but I very much doubt that she would lack personal power as well. I would expect one of her Aspects to be something like Inspire, perhaps.

Drejzer

I was thinking more along the lines of a Grey Knight, balancing in the edge between Good and Evil, but rejecting both.

vietnamabc

Just pure classy. Nothing better to start a day then a blood ritual.

Spinner335

Wow.....Squire is going to have a tough fight ahead of her....I suggest opening a portal above the city and dropping all the goblin fire through it.

1shot4living

I'm pretty sure that would be Black's advice for just such a situation. "A flying fortress you say? I've never seen a flying fortress that didn't look better with a bit of goblin fire on it."

Darkening

Well. Cat's gonna need to rush that third aspect and getting control of her Winter powers, because she looks completely outclassed magically at the moment in every direction. I mean, sure, if she could get close to Diabolist she might be able to keep her from using sorcery the same way Diabolist used the spear guy against the other prince, but man. Akua's throwing around some serious firepower these days. And that Princess is gonna cause all sorts of problems. Can't wait to see the fifteenth and the Deoraithe have their own scrap against the hosts of Summer. Maybe we'll get to see just why the Watch is such a big deal.

Letouriste

No need for a duel, the pattern of three is finished. Masego and his magic+archer mage killer arrow should do the trick. or masego against the father first mage and cat with archer.

Darkening

There's no *in-universe* need for a duel, but the external narrative feels like it would be fitting.

Cpt. Obvious

Masego against the first mage? Three incantations in they would be arguing all the way into the closest arcane library. They'd be cooped up for weeks if not months..

lennymaster

The power she gained by becoming a Countess of Winter took the the space in her soul meant for her third Aspect.

Misterspokes

Are you sure? Is there something I missed that supports this assumption?

goliath1303

"I recognize you as heiress to the Duke of Violent Squalls," he said. "Made by prophecy, heirloom and the word of a king. Your inheritance, claimed by rite of blood, is confirmed."

I gasped for air, feeling the blood in my veins cooling further with every passing moment.

"Catherine Foundling," he said. "I name you Duchess of Moonless Nights. I grant you the seat of Marchford, and on these sacred grounds claim your fealty."

My surroundings ebbed away, replaced by deep and bottomless darkness. I stood there unmoving, seeing only the dark-skinned king and the blood-red sap dripping onto his brow from his wooden crown.

"I demand no fidelity and offer no respite," the King of Winter laughed. "I demand no faith and offer no protection. I give you slight and deceit, I receive hatred and betrayal. The Court of Winter receives you as one of its own, 'till your last desperate breath clawing at the dark."

Power pulsed in my chest, spreading through my veins. I felt the third part of my soul, the missing aspect I had yet to forge, fill with something old and too large to comprehend.

ayon96

No it just meant the power to make the third aspect is filled with winter's power.

So her third aspect is gonna be winter related

goliath1303

"Power pulsed in my chest, spreading through my veins. I felt the third part of my soul, the missing aspect I had yet to forge, fill with something old and too large to comprehend."

To me that sounds like her third aspect was subsumed by her fae title.

Nairne

Frankly, I can see the princess and Cat getting along (as much as they is possible anyways).

Nairne

As much as it's even possible anyways.*

nick012000

>Beneath her feet glass-like panels of force appeared and she strolled towards the wave of enemies filling the air. Only one other person did the same: the man who'd taught her this spell, her father.

Wasn't Hedge Wizard doing the same thing during her fight with Warlock?

Gydd

Hedge was using a set of three levitating tiles, not walls of pure force

Also, may merely have been a referring to those in this scene- it didn't say only one other could do the same, just that there was only one who did.

Morgenstern

... this. And still cry for *him*. Because, somehow, this man has a strange appeal, despite his being obviously totally uncaring about the whole of Creation.

Letouriste

Yeah,he is nice.in a way he remind me of masego but with fatherly feelings

OldSchoolVillain

I suspect that Cat will be occupied with Diabolist, but that Apprentice and Hakram will remind the world how Dead hand truly earned his moniker.

goliath1303

By having a hand that's dead?

stevenneiman

Frankly, my money is on him having a nerdgasm with Masego, which kicks off a chain of events in which Masego creates a full Name for himself and lets Akua's dad become the new Apprentice. We already know that Masego's goals don't exactly align with those of the Warlock name, since he just learns practical combat magic as an offshoot from his theoretical expertise and what he really wants is to study magic and learn the deepest secrets of creation, so it would make a lot of sense for his new Name to be something different, allowing him to leave the Apprentice Name vacant while Wekesa was still alive.

This is supported by the fact that just watching the work of Akua's dad was enough to give him a flash of insight that almost allowed him to ascend instantly, and when they meet in person he can explain in detail exactly how it all worked. The one problem is that he actually likes Akua, so he'll probably be mad if Cat is the one to kill her, and nothing else would really fit the story.

velorien7

A beautiful chapter. We get such a perfect view of what the name of "Diabolist" really means, as well as of the dramatic old-school villainy that we've mostly only heard about indirectly.

One thing: this chapter is from Akua's POV. She wouldn't think of herself as "the dark-skinned aristocrat" any more than an Earth character would think of themselves as e.g. "the Caucasian".

Morgenstern

Doesn't mean there can't be any bit of third person POV or slight insertion of one of the enemies watching her as POV *shrugs

It's rather common to do this and most readers never notice, even though some will see it as bad style.

Iconochasm

The constant oblique references to people by their descriptions and characteristics are a mainstay of classic, cheesy fantasy. I believe EE does it constantly as both an homage and to reference the fact that PGtE is a story about stories.

stevenneiman

It's third person limited narration, which means that it only talks about what she knows and perceives, but doesn't necessarily talk as she would. If it was first person like Cat's chapters that would be a different story.

Dimensional

1st up – Diabolist calls on all of her aspects in this fight. she revels in her name and it's power. Black and all Cat has learned so far is that that is a losing strategy for a villain, as evil loses, and Name power will fail at the most in opportune time.

Call, Claim, Bind.
Interesting.

Break trumps Bind I think. But ultimately Akua must fall to Hubris of some sort – It's the Evil Way.

2xMachina

The Calamities specifically refrain from using any Aspects if they don't have to. Using all 3 is just inviting others to take you out, when there's no longer any cards up your sleeves.

Dragrath

Yeah using all three aspects is a bad move though I suspect she has sorcery based cards still up her sleeves, she still has set herself into a very bad situation.

Honestly I wouldn't be surprised if she turns herself into a devil or worse for her final trump card seeing as she is The Diabolist. Her magic rituals are what she has always relied on in the past after all.

chris S

So Diabolist uses wind sorcery eh?

Now.... who do we know that claimed fae powers from a certain Wind wielding Winter Fae?

Something tells me Akua is in for a surprise when it comes down to facing Cat.

joanneeve

Morgenstern

"We have no stories here," she said. "Except the ones they make. It is madness, rampant madness. [...]"

I really like that tidbit, reminding us how stories are MADE by humans in Creation, not just lived out (which probably does NOT only apply to Fae). 😊

Letouriste

That was kind of cute actually.they don't see the madness in themselves;)

Gunslinger

Wow, Akua is seriously OP. I wonder how Cat will handle her. Her winter powers don't seem as powerful or flexible. And come with a lot of drawbacks too.

Letouriste

"Adjusting her long crimson" what?

Tim

Cape I would guess. You're a villian walking in the air that is also a battlefield. If you're not wearing a cape something is very wrong.

narcoduck

"Twilight is the coming of night, and night has ever been our time. We will own the dark and shape the day that comes after it."

This is great considering Cat is the Duchess of Moonless Nights

Marucstitus

I bet Cat TAKES Akua's BIND and totally fucks shit up.

Misterspokes

She either TAKES BIND or gets bound...

The Archdevil

Nah man, Cat TAKES what she can use, and BREAKS what she can't. Either way, Diabolist is losing an Aspect.

coloreddragonfire

No, she TAKES CLAIM, and then CLAIMS BIND. And then BINDS CALL, because why not.

beleester

Akua's soul isn't in her body, remember? Cat wanted to have Apprentice rip out her aspects at the end of Book 2, but couldn't.

Dimensional

Actually thats an interesting point, can Cat Break whatever conects Akua to her Soul? And what would that even do?

stevenneiman

I would bet that Cat Takes Bind, uses it to hold her in place for a kill, and then when Akua tries to trigger her ultimate form that she had to die by an enemy's hand to use, Cat will Take Claim and then Claim the power before it settles on Akua. But that's all pure conjecture on both our parts for now. We'll have to wait and see.

Burnsy

You know what, one of my favourite things about this is that despite how powerful Akua is now, I can easily see how she'll inevitably destroy herself.

So much of her power is amplified by blood rituals and human sacrifice that she'll need more people for resources sooner rather than later. The more people she kills, the more enemies she makes, the more she'll need to kill for power to fight off her enemies. The cycle repeats again and again until eventually her own powers end up being her downfall.

She's the story of Evil in miniature, which honestly is probably exactly what she always wanted to be.

KageLupus

My favorite part about this chapter is right at the end. Akua is facing down two high powered fae, and that princess alone would for sure give her a run for her money in a fight. Then they all stop and run back to Arcadia because of something Cat is doing. In Akua's mind she was in a really tight spot and then Cat's actions saved her.

But Cat and Akua have completely separate goals. Catherine's whole plan with Apprentice and Archer was to have them stir up some trouble and get two of her enemies fighting each other. And that plan was a rousing success; Akua had to activate her flying fortress before Cat arrived, she lost thousands of soldiers, half of her summoned devils, and all three of her strongest demons. On Summer's side, they lost a third of their winged cavalry, who knows how many foot soldiers, a couple of mid rank nobles and most importantly one of the more martial Princes.

And don't forget, Akua dying here would actually have been a bad thing. If she died there is a chance her flying city would come tumbling down, but even if it didn't the host of Summer would have a much better chance of taking the city. Apprentice and Archer might be confused on the matter, but Cat absolutely would prefer it if all of the Callowans in that city could survive the current conflict. First she handles Summer and gets that threat out of the way, then she comes for Diabolist herself, and ideally doesn't lose tens of thousands of her countrymen in the fallout.

I would say that Cat came out the clear victor in this whole three way fight

Darkening

I'm not sure if Akua's devils actually died or if the princess just disengaged to save the prince.

stevenneiman

Not sure about the other two, but it was a fair while after the Princess eviscerated the first one that she came back to the Prince's rescue. I certainly wouldn't be surprised if she had managed to kill the other two as well.

Shawn Panzegraf

Let's also remember that Callow is now a part of Winter, or at least Arcadia, in a very loose sense so far as the King of Winter claimed. Summer's rush home might hit a snag or two before their already diminished host arrives.

If Cat is EVER going to try and extract that peace making on the field of battle from Summer, she isn't going to get a better opportunity than a Summer already seriously winded from bearding a Named Lioness in her own den.

coloreddragonfire

And now we know whose part Cat played out while she was at the ball of the Winter Fae. The princess is called Sumia here, while she was called Sulia in Chapter 11. Still the Princess of High Noon in either case, though.

stevenneiman

The Warren Peace NFL Report

When a villian relies on the maxim of the first step always working, shouldn't that guarantee that they'll ultimately lose in the end?

goliath1303

It doesn't predict or cause any final outcome. It only has to do with the first stage of any given plan and the fact that it will already succeed. After the first step the story can go any which way. Remember the Tyrant's strategy? Something along the lines of: Always have the first stage of a plan in play, then you can't lose. Of course Black told him that that would inevitably implode on him, but Akua doesn't have the same plan. Kairos is so unpredictable is because, once the first stage of whatever plan he's executing is over, he completely abandons that plan in favor of implementing the first stage of the next one. Rinse and repeat. Akua however has a Grand Plan and just happens to be genre-savvy enough to know that while she's in the first stage of it, she won't lose. Will she call in the end? Anytime after stage one, almost certainly. Is there a chance though, however remote it may be, that she becomes the next Triumphant(May she never return.) and subjugates all of Calernia? Absolutely, and it doesn't matter one bit to Akua that the chances of that are smaller than Triumphant herself making her reappearance at the head of the Hosts of Heaven, instead of leading an army of devils and demons.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Also: Akua already has all three Aspects of the name she just recently took on, while Cat's still coming into her third? Is Cat's slow growth here an effect of her accelerated growth elsewhere?

goliath1303

arancaytar

Catherine has never managed a third aspect, and Akua is already done after transitioning? Just not fair.

goliath1303

"Power pulsed in my chest, spreading through my veins. I felt the third part of my soul, the missing aspect I had yet to forge, fill with something old and too large to comprehend."

Her title as Duchess of Moonless Nights took the place of her third Aspect.

I am still in the minority wanting both Akua and Catherine to succeed, I see.

Adrian

Ok, i really hope Akua dies in this book, and dies badly, even if is evil i hope Cat kills her fathe rin some horrible way in front of her, better yet making it clear is all Akua's fault.

Max Scherer

I dont know why people like these kind of chapters. I mean it is kind of intersting to read the PoV of her sometimes, but it actually irritates me more and just is frustrating to read. I said it in the first book, but Akua is just one of these Characters i just cant stand and hate with my whole being and that her plans in this series just seems every time to work perfectly is just painful to read and not enjoyable. Granted in book two her plans with Liesse mostly didnt work, but the most important one to get the city did work, so yeah. So yeah i cant really give an objetive review and just get really salty reading this and stay with my opinion Akua should have been killed in Book 1(And i know the story would maybe be not as intersting or good, but i hat it if there is just too much fucked up for the MC. She just cant get a breack with all that is happening around the continent)

goliath1303

In one of Akua's PoV chapters didn't she says that she had something like 20 goals she was hoping to achieve by doing what she did up to, and including, setting the demon loose, joining the 15th as an auxiliary and subsequently betraying Cat, and trying to trap the Hashmallim? And she only achieved one of them. That's a far cry from "her plans in this series just seems every time to work perfectly", wouldn't you say?

Lemon

"To be the Diabolist was to hold power over creatures foreign to the world."

Uh oh, that's quite ominous. Backs up her ambition to rule Creation.

If it wasn't for Akua's last line, I would have thought Cat interrupted her endgame. Getting the fae in escalating war to power stronger and stronger sorcery with their bodies. Still going that route, though.

Villainous Interlude: Decorum

"Morality is a force, not a law. Deviating from it has costs and benefits both – a ruler should weigh those when making a decision, and ignore the delusion of any position being inherently superior."

– Dread Emperor Benevolent

Two years at most: that was how long Amadeus had to live.

Maybe only a year, if he blundered badly enough. He'd walked away from his meeting with the Tyrant of Helike knowing this, and was still exploring the implications. When no pattern of three had formed with the White Knight after their confrontation in Delos, Black had found several implications. The first was that the scope of that hero's story was narrower than he'd thought: it extended only to the civil war in the Free Cities, and as an outsider to that narrative Amadeus did not have the weight required to qualify as a rival. That possibility had been a factor in why he'd cautiously called a retreat even though the Calamities had, arguably, been winning. If they were mere side-characters in that conflict, the most likely pattern for them was to be victorious early then brutally crushed after the heroes improved their power. A whetting stone for the blades of the Gods Above, essentially. By removing himself early he would not have allowed the pattern to truly form. And yet, the premise was flawed.

The White Knight, Scribe had informed him, was not of the Free Cities. He was Ashuran, somewhat surprising given his dark skin. A little digging had allowed his spymistress to find out the man's mother had been a Soninke exile, eventually executed because of one of the labyrinthine laws that governed the citizenship tiers of the Thalassocracy. The White Knight's reason to be involved, then was not 'right of birth'. The two sisters that were part of his heroic band were themselves from the Free Cities, but neither the House of Light the Ashen Priestess had served in nor the hidden covenant of wizards her sister had studied under had been harmed by either Praesi forces or those of the Tyrant. 'Personal connection' wasn't the reason either, then. Amadeus had made sure that both those places of origin would remain untouched for the duration of the war: heroes with butchered families, adopted or otherwise, became infinitely more dangerous.

The only motive that fit was 'ethical opposition', but if that was the case Amadeus should have ended up the rival to the other Knight. He represented a larger and more active power than the Tyrant of Helike, arguably with a deeper historical connection with Evil. Unless, of course, some deeper unknown connection existed between the White Knight and the Tyrant. That theory had been buried during his conference with the vicious child from Helike: the other villain was not bound by a pattern of any sort.

Amadeus did not consider his own intellect to be superior, in the larger scheme of things. He'd been at the side of Wekesa for decades and early understood that Warlock was perhaps the most brilliant mind to grace Praes in ten generations, however narrow his interests. Only Alaya stood in the same league, a mastermind who'd been able to fill the function of two Named for over forty years with sheer cunning and ruthlessness while facing men and women who were bloody ambitions made flesh. He was not the strongest, either. In matters of brute force, Sabah could snap him in half in the span of a single breath when it came to martial might Hye stood unequalled under the sky. Black wasn't even the best at killing: Assassin's body count dwarfed his, for both Named and mortals, and had been collected without ever taking a single wound. As for Scribe, the way she'd effectively become the bureaucracy and spy network of an entire kingdom without ever having a permanent office was far beyond his capacity. Amadeus' only noteworthy talent, in his opinion, was clarity of sight. The ability to look at a situation if not without biases then with fewer of them than anyone else doing the same.

That same clarity was how he'd understood why he was not currently in a pattern of three. The White Knight was, in fact, supposed to face a Black Knight as a rival. That individual was simply not him.

Midnight bell was nearing, the villain thought as he glanced up at the starry sky. Wekesa was already asleep inside the gaudy tent he'd taken out of his pocket dimension along with most of their supplies. There would be no waking him until dawn. Sabah was napping at his side, buried in blankets up to her neck like some sort of gargantuan cocoon. Sitting on a log, Amadeus stirred the fire ahead of him with the long stick he'd carved out earlier and shaped a plan. Planning with two years in mind, he now had to destroy or neuter every major threat to the Empire before Catherine became the Black Knight. He would make a second series of schemes in the days to come with the notion of him surviving only a year in mind, but first he needed to establish what the optimal results could be. He'd once thought he had a decade left in him still and planned to have his apprentice ready to replace him in half that but the timetable would have to be adjusted. There were four fronts he would have to settle: Callow, Praes, the Free Cities and Procer. In the back of his mind gears of iron turned as his eyes remained on the dancing flames.

Callow and Praes, as it currently stood, were intertwined issues. The former kingdom was, last he'd heard, under attack by several forces. The Courts of Arcadia, the rebel forces of the Diabolist and a potential Deoraithe uprising. Alaya already had plans in the works for the Diabolist, but that was no longer enough. She had to be dead within the next six months, with minimal casualties. This much he could rely on Catherine to accomplish, and solidify her grip on Callow in the process. The Courts had been an unexpected set of pieces in this game. Amadeus had three standing operational plans for the Legions to turn back a fae incursion depending on where they crossed, but none were designed to handle a full-fledged invasion. Winter had been temporarily handled by his apprentice, but that was mitigating the symptoms instead of the root cause. It was necessary to find out what had driven both Courts to leave Arcadia and permanently destroy that incitement. For now, Amadeus lacked the information needed to make a decision. Scribe would need a few months still to find out what he wanted, so he'd have to trust Catherine to hold them at bay until then.

She should be able to, and that calibre of opponent would quicken her growth. Dealing with creatures whose power was massively larger than her own would prepare her for the fights with heroes she would be facing as the Black Knight. The nature of fae being so closely associated with patterns would also sharpen her eye in this regard, enough she would not be caught on the wrong side of a narrative easily. The dark-haired man had originally meant to train that aspect of her against the High Lords through the controlled battleground of rule over Callow, but in this case the substitute was superior to the original. The Deoraithe were a thornier issue, especially since he still did not know what had driven them to act. Alaya and he had originally allowed the Duchy of Daoine to remain untouched after the Conquest because it served as an ideal border state against the Golden Bloom, both because of the Deoraithe's rabid hatred for the elves and their limited avenues for growth. While powerful, by themselves they would never be powerful enough to be a true threat to the Empire – and their culture essentially ensured they would never seek foreign allies.

Now, though, it had been proved they could be made to move. Unless the motive for their deployment was unique and incapable of being reproduced, the odds of which were low, then it was possible for Daoine to be leveraged into action again. That made them a liability, the kind that could not be allowed to exist with a crusade on the horizon. By the end of the current unrest, Daoine would have to be either bound to Catherine definitively in her capacity as ruler of Callow or broken beyond capacity to act. If it was the second case, the best time to act would be after they'd fought battles in the south: wiping out the Watch in their own territory would be extremely costly. Destroying the army and culling the population of breeding age by four tenths should be enough. Amadeus disliked leaving a wounded enemy still breathing, but logistics dictated exterminating the entire Duchy would require too many resources and take too long. He'd send word to Grem and Ranker to assess the situation and act accordingly, if he was unable to return in time to pass judgement.

That left the more complicated issue of the relationship between Callow and Praes, or more accurately the Dread Empress and the Squire. Catherine was about to seize direct power over her homeland, which was one of the outcomes he'd considered most probable. The moment the Ruling Council had been formed, there were only two ways it could go forward: either Squire would terrify the Praesi establishment into submission or she would wipe it out entirely and become de facto queen. Neither result displeased him, as the Ruling Council had always been meant to be a crutch that would allow his apprentice to learn to rule. Given how long Amadeus had left to live, such a slow-paced process was no longer feasible: Catherine discarding the crutch by herself accelerated the process by a few months. Alaya would be furious at the loss of control, he knew, but she would be aware that Catherine ruling Callow with the backing of the population was an unmitigated victory for the Empire. Squire breaking away entirely from Praes was, after all, impossible.

That was the truth under the surface current, and why he'd never once felt threatened by his apprentice gathering an independent power base. Catherine was, after all, a villain. The Principate would not consider Callow ruled by villainous queen any more acceptable than it being an imperial possession. Strife between Praes and her kingdom reborn would only weaken her in the face of Proceran advances: as long as Catherine Foundling held power in Callow, she needed the Empire to survive. Amadeus had taken more stringent measures as well, of course. Though Callowan soldiers had been part of the Fifteenth since its foundation, he'd made sure to give her mostly criminals in the initial batch. That meant that all her closest collaborators were Praesi: her general and all the senior staff were from the Wasteland. Though being in close proximity to a charismatic Named for several years ensured their strongest loyalty would be to her, their ties to the Empire made them into counter-weights against thoughts of breaking away entirely.

Much like him, personal loyalty mattered a great deal to his apprentice. As long as declaring independence antagonized all the people closest to her, Catherine would seek a middle ground instead. Since a boundary had been set in that direction, the other boundary had to be established on the Praesi side. Alaya should already be working on a way to bind Squire to her, and would be well aware that coercion would result in permanent enmity. He did not have to bother himself with this part of the equation. Instead, what he would have to turn his eyes to was the stability of the Wasteland. Alaya's magnificent decades-long plan had finally come to fruition and destroyed the Truebloods in full. Three legions would scour Wolof clean as soon as a winner emerged from the succession struggle there, removing a nest of unrest in Praes for at least twenty years. It would not be enough. Every former Trueblood not currently aligned with these so-called 'Moderates' would have to be killed and their entire family line ripped out root and stem. Amadeus was not above borrowing the strength of Callow to accomplish this, if other legions balked at the slaughter. The Clans were loyal, and need not be touched, but he would need to have a frank conversation with the foremost Matrons and explain to them that if they made a single questionable move Wekesa would bring down the Grey Eyries on their heads. Ranker would back him in this, he knew. She'd long run out of patience with the more isolationist of the Matrons.

All of this would secure their back within a year, if handled properly, which left exterior threats. The Principate was the foremost among those. Cordelia Hasenbach had roped in both Levant and Ashur, which have her utmost naval supremacy and a quiet southern border. When Procer came knocking, it would be with everything but the northern garrisons. At least a fifty thousand professional soldiers, easily twice than in levies, and that was without counting any armies sent to reinforce by the Dominion. If most of the Legions were at the Red Flower Vales, it was possible to resist that strength as long as there was no unrest inside Imperial territories. That was not enough, he decided. If Procer retreated with enough of its force intact, the problem was only delayed by half a decade at most. The Principate had to be decisively beaten, its alliances sundered and the First Prince killed. She was, frankly speaking, too dangerous to leave alive. That meant campaigning inside Proceran borders in an offensive war, which would most likely lead to defeat given the current balance of forces.

It was time to start using harsh measures, then. Using the Calamities to destroy the capital of the Principate, for a start, should incapacitate its ruling infrastructure. Using a surprise strike to torch and poison the central principalities, the main farmlands of Procer, would lead to widespread starvation come winter. As for the Thalassocracy, if they could not be reasoned with Assassin would need to eliminate their entire two highest citizenship tiers. That would create chaos that could buy the Empire two years at least, and if Procer could be dealt with during that time the chances of Ashur resuming the war alone were low. The Dominion of Levant was too far and too decentralized to cripple in one stroke, but their ties to the alliance were also the weakest. They would not remain committed if victory did not look feasible. There were even harsher moves that could be made, of course – the Tower was still in contact with the ancient abomination that ruled the Kingdom of the Dead. But putting that devil back in that bottle after it was uncorked would be impossible, and in the long term more dangerous to imperial interests than the current Procer.

Amadeus had spent over fifty years carefully making sure not to burn too many bridges, to avoid the very kind of crusade the First Prince was assembling, but the hour of reckoning had come. The Principate needed to be so badly damaged it would not recover for a generation, if possible while leaving most of Levant's strength intact – the Dominion would not be able to resist the bait of a weakened south if its armies were still strong. Most importantly, Cordelia Hasenbach had to die. Even if another war of succession did not erupt, whoever replaced her would be part of one of the regional power blocs Alaya had made emerge. They would have powerful internal enemies to deal with, and given the nature of the Highest Assembly that meant a Principate divided in fact if not in name. All of this, though, would come next year. There was a more immediate problem at hand, the Free Cities.

The balance of power could not be allowed to swing in the favour of Good down here. At the very least, neutrality had to be forced with the Tyrant remaining in a strong position. The threat of Helike armed to the teeth at her back would force Hasenbach to keep troops in the south to dissuade an attack. Neutrality would be better than an outright victory for the Tyrant, Amadeus thought. If the Tyrant won, Procer had an excuse to wage war in the region and secure it before turning to Praes. If the balance was restored, they had a knife at their back and no diplomatically acceptable excuse to remove it. If Procer started intervening in the affairs of foreign nations, its allies would protest. Hasenbach could not afford to lose them if she wanted a crusade in more than name. And the moment the Tyrant is no longer a threat, the entire Free Cities will start viewing the troops she sent as an invasion force. The desired outcome, then, was a truce in the Free Cities with a guarantee they would not participate in the larger conflict. How could Amadeus accomplish this?

Currently, Atalante was under occupation and Delos out of the war – the removal of the more combative elements of the Secretariat by Assassin had seen to that. The strife he'd begun in Penthes was keeping them busy, though they'd still managed to repulse an attack from the ramshackle army of Bellerophon. The slave armies of Stygia, headed by their Magisters, had joined Helike on the march to the last remaining active opposition in the war: Nicae. Which was filled with mercenaries, Proceran fantassins and its own decently skilled forces. Taking Nicae out of the story, after marked but not severe casualties Nicae should fall to enemy forces. With a band of heroes backing the city, though, the situation was different. It became 'the last stronghold, besieged by the hordes of Evil'. Defeat was virtually assured as long as this remained the narrative, and Amadeus did not currently have enough authority with Stygia and Helike to properly influence their decision-making. They would have to be bypassed entirely, then.

The lynchpin of this entire situation, as far as he could tell, was the White Knight. He was the Named keeping the band together. Without him they would either disperse or lose the coherency needed to be a true threat. If the White Knight was dead, Amadeus believed he could turn the victory of the Evil-aligned cities into a bloody draw that would weaken both sides enough they could be forced to negotiate a truce. The Tyrant would be trouble – he'd already begun disrupting Warlock's scrying, which had cut off the dark-haired man's conversation with his apprentice – but he was also fickle. As long as he was presented with a more enticing game than his current one, he could be brought to the table. All Amadeus had to worry about was surviving the boy's inevitable attempts to kill him during the battle for Nicae. Contingencies were already being put in place. The key to this entire situation, then, was eliminating the White Knight. The villain poked at the flames again.

It could be done, with the right preparations. The lack of pattern would not hinder this.

"You look like you're up to no good," Sabah said sleepily.

Amadeus smiled. It was an old joke, now more comfortable than funny.

"Did I wake you?" he asked. "I apologize."

"I sleep lighter than when we were started out," she said. "We're getting old, Amadeus."

The Black Knight chuckled, sliding down the log to sit next to her.

"You've still got a few decades in you," he said. "Enough you'll see your both your children get grey hair."

"Amna's raised them well," she said wistfully. "I think of them more often than I used to, out on adventures like this."

Both time she'd given birth she'd left his side for a year afterwards to mother the children, but inevitably Sabah had left Ater to join him – he'd spent most of his time in Callow, the last twenty years. Her husband had done most of the rearing, repeatedly refusing promotions in the Imperial bureaucracy to have enough time for it. Black rather liked the man, though how his old friend had come to fall in love with that diminutive, mild-mannered specimen had long been a subject of wonder.

"I think," he said, "that our time is drawing to an end."

The large Taghreb turned amused eyes to him.

"You're not usually this maudlin," she said. "We've handled worse than the Tyrant. He's like a crippled take on Heir, only with a sense of humour."

"He really was a pompous ass, wasn't he?" Black smiled.

"Catherine's rival is worse," Sabah grunted. "I'm looking forward to the kid hacking her in a few pieces."

"It will be a learning experience for her," Amadeus murmured. "Killing the Heir was a turning point for me."

"You were softer before," Sabah agreed softly. "We all were. I still remember what it felt like back then, looking at his corpse. Like there was a storm ahead."

She frowned.

"Feels the same now," she admitted. "Like we're reaching a pivot."

I'm going to die soon, he almost told her. But he couldn't, because if he did she would fight it. Even harder than Warlock would, because Warlock understood that some things were worth dying for. Captain didn't. She had no great cause, no febrile drive to understand the nature of Creation. Sabah only wanted them to live as long and happily as they could, and if she had to cave in other people's heads for that so be it. He'd always loved that about her, the purity of the sentiment. He'd never met another Named like her, so unconcerned with their own power. In that sense she was the strangest among them.

"Do you ever regret it?" he asked suddenly. "Coming with Wekesa and I, the morning after we first met you."

She looked at him, bemused.

"We've been at this over forty years, Sabah," he said. "We've killed so many people I can't remember all the faces. We won, when it mattered, but there were dark days too. Those just don't make it into the legends."

The massive Taghreb patted his shoulder gently.

"You're an idiot," she told him, not unkindly. "You two are family. You might as well ask me if I regret breathing. Besides, if I hadn't come along you twerps would have mouthed yourself off into an early grave."

She paused.

"And you and Hye would still be pretending you still didn't desperately want to bone," she added.

"Sabah," he protested.

"Oh, she's just teaching me swordsmanship," she mocked in a high-pitched voice. "Like that didn't turn into an excuse for you two to get sweaty and handsy before the first lesson was over."

"I learned a lot from her," Black said.

"I know," she said. "Tents don't block out noise very well."

As one of the foremost tacticians of the age, Amadeus recognized that this was not a battle he could win. Retreat was required.

Besides, at least he'd never used an entire roasted pig as a courting gift, unlike some other people that would go nameless.

"I need you to do something for me," he said.

She raised a thick eyebrow.

"Eudokia tells me Procer is still sending grain and silver to Nicae by land convoys," he said.

The Tyrant, for reasons only known to him, was allowing them to pass untouched.

"We need to turn the screws on the city before it turns into a battle," he said. "The emptier their coffers and granaries, the better."

It would be easier to force them to negotiate if they were all but destitute.

"Been a while since I hunted on my own," Captain said, staring into the flame. "Might do me some good. The Beast gets wilful when I keep it on the leash for too long."

He nodded silently and left it at that. Eventually she drifted back into sleep, the two of them nestled close to the fire.

"Two years," he murmured. "It will be enough. I'll make it enough."

The Gods could help anyone who got in his way, if they so wished. It would make no difference.

Kingbob12

Man, all these Villain chapters one after the other have been so fantastic. Amadeus in particular is so cold and clinical and determined. I'm gonna be sad when he dies.

nerfworld

Damn, captain going to get ambushed hard during that caravan attack then

Darkening

Huh, yeah, that would explain why Tyrant's leaving them alone, to goad Black into sending someone after them so he can take them out. Black's scary as hell in this, seeing how casually he thinks about butchering 40% of the population of a region, having assassin murder entire castes of Ashur, etc. As much as I don't want Captain to die, since she's oddly endearing for a rampaging werewolf, seeing Black lose his cool over it would be fascinating. I'm not sure if he'd flip out or just go even colder as he worked for the Tyrant's death. Whatever happens, I'm sure I'll enjoy reading it. Was kinda hoping we'd see what's going on in Arcadia today, but this was really interesting to see too.

Misterspokes

Remember that those two castes are 9 people, 1 second rank citizen and the 8 third rank.

Roger W

Strictly, it's not 40% of the population.

It's 40% of the breeding age population. Anyone over the age of ~30 (assuming "true" peasant lives", or ~40 otherwise), and under the age of 14 is not part of that, and that's post eliminating the army, which is almost entirely breeding age. I'd say 15 to 25% of the total population. Lower the closer to "real" peasant lives as the lifespan drops and the child mortality (and hence # of children) rises.

Zach

Like Catherine has said, Black isn't a good person. He wouldn't have a problem with literally genociding the population of Procer if it allowed him to up-end the narrative of Evil always losing.

PingleBerry

SILENCE!

If you say it it might come true...

Cap'n Smurfy

Shit, Captain is definitely the most likely to die. Black hasn't noticed the Tyrants trap and she has the least connection to the new generation. Adjutant is pretty much her counterpart to Catherine and they aren't related. Warlock and Black Knight both have apprentices and from what we know of Assassin dying isn't likely. Plus she's nice, least deserving of it and wants to go back to her family. It's too tragic, therefore all but certain.

RandomFan

I just hope it's a mistake and not a betrayal. That Black genuinely didn't anticipate it. Of course, this could be a fake-out, but what'll really sting is if Black planned on it happening, and her not surviving.

The quietist

Shit I've never seen Black this resigned. Where's the rage against the Heavens? The rage to bend fate itself?

The Archdevil

Some things you can't fight against. Black's been a Villain for a long time, especially a Black Knight according to the story. He should have a sense of when he's dying by now, and him knowing a rough estimate isn't all that surprising.

RandomFan

As a villain, you get one wish. If you work hard and do it right, maybe it'll come true. But to aim for more is to ensure you lose all of them in the end. A man who chases two rabbits catches neither.

He's willing to die to ensure his victory, just like William was. There's no rage in the equation at all, just the same determination that there was before. Half turned into a prop against the other half. He's willing to die to change that.

KageLupus

Black isn't really a "rage" sort of guy. At least, not in a big dramatic way. He just sees a problem and then decides to fix it, and once those gears start turning Creation will either change or get ground into dust.

This chapter actually shows off exactly why Black is such a terrifying person. He realizes that the way the current story is playing out, he is going to die. He then proceeds to give zero fucks about that fact as it relates to him, and just starts focusing on what it means for his plans and what he needs to do to accomplish them.

Black is one of the most ruthlessly cold and logical characters I have ever read. He has an idea for how the world should be and lets nothing stand in his way of making it so. Thousands of years of Praesi history and tradition? Throw it away because it is impractical to his needs. Some country might cause trouble if left to their own devices? Murder so many of them that they are literally unable to muster an army for at least a generation. There is no solution too terrible to be considered when Black has a problem. If he chooses not to go for it it is because it wasn't as efficient a solution to the problem at hand, not because there is a line he wouldn't cross.

Isa Lumitus

What do you mean where is the rage? Black starts to think he dies within two years, and in a couple hours starts hatching a plan to kill ~100,000 people. It sounds to me that he's going on the Last Dance

That 100,000 figure is just a guess, but he's planning to basically nuke several goblin tribes, and a human city. Then he plans to cause a famine, hopefully reigniting a civil war. And then plans to kill so many people in another nation that it's crippled for a generation.

He is definitely raging against the Heavens... It's just that he's hoping Cat can finish what he started.

danh3107

There were so many deathflags raised this chapter....

Almost all of them for Captain, damn

Euodiachloris

At least she didn't hoik out a locket with a picture of the hubby and kids. 😏 She is unlikely to make it, but she's assured of making a lot of people regret waking up that morning before she goes down.

And, something tells me she could pull a pyrrhic defeat off with her death: lose, but undermine the winner by doing so. 😏

RandomFan

Of course, all Amadeus can do is build a structure and hope it lasts, in the end. It won't, not forever- but long enough to count, I hope.

Odds are he'll die without knowing whether it worked out or not. Winning in death is a very callowan notion, though- as he said, villians die cursing their enemies. He's learned a lot from them; that shouldn't surprise me. It still feels like a heroic notion, to die for something greater.

I wonder- was the heiress right, about some of them at least? That they've become mere stewards? Amadeus seems very aware that he's holding the title of black knight until Catherine is ready, at the least.

RubberBandMan

So Amadeus realizes that the White Knight is destined to struggle with a Black Knight, just not him. Which leads him to think that obviously Squire is going to change into Black Knight to fight this White Knight.

So Amadeus decides that White Knight must die, because he knows he outlives Amadeus? I'm not sure if this makes sense or if this is a logical absurdity. I know named are epic story bait, but then there is stuff like the Shining Prince and Page, who got killed without any sort of connection between them and Squire.

nerfworld

No, it cause if the White Knight has no rival among them then that may mean he will be used against Squire in the future after squire kills diabolist and has a opening for a new rival

Letouriste

He just realised the white knight is meant to be a futur rival for his squire;)

The key word here is futur, this is not set yet. so he can kill him, there is just no story around that => the last sentence where gods will go in his way refer partially to that; meaning he will fight a hard battle but he still will win at the end, because this is his way

I guess now black will not being in many stories: maybe one in the free cities if he lose something or someone: (, maybe one in the principate and his final one where he dies

Roger W

Kill THIS White Knight.
Leave a neophyte to oppose Catherine.

Byzantine

He's trying to end the story before it starts. Breaking a pattern once it begins is almost impossible, but by striking before the pattern can take hold works. It's how the Calamities have operated all along.

It won't save him, his death is destined and he can't prevent it, but it can save Catherine one hell of a headache.

usernamesbco

Sadly, he's being wrong genre savvy. Cat may be a villain, but she's a Callowan villain. Since they're historically Good it's understandable that he's missing the nuance. Aside from the obvious cultural differences I think she's going to have more in common with the darkest sort of antiheroes than the Stupid Evil villains the Empire produces. Her strongest ties to the Empire are her friends and subordinates (who are caught in her gravitational pull and already knowingly assisting her with treason lite) and Black himself. I think he'd be much less blasé about his impending death if he realized he's the only thing really binding her to the Empire.

His other blind spot is much more concerning.

"Alaya [...] would be well aware that coercion would result in permanent enmity. He did not have to bother himself with this part of the equation."

The Dread Empress Malicia is no longer his friend Alaya, and he's the only one who hasn't caught on yet. Malicia is a control freak who is not going to take Catherine's plans for Callow well, there's been SO MUCH foreshadowing on this. That statement is a death knell. She's going to alienate Cat.

"he now had to destroy or neuter every major threat to the Empire before Catherine became the Black Knight."

...nevermind his actual Name, this has definite Knight Templar Parent vibes. Which is adorable but has unfortunate implications after the duel in Arcadia. Dammit, Amadeus.

sheer_falacy

I love how analytical Black is in this chapter, but I'm kind of astounded that he doesn't consider the 5th major threat to the Empire: the Calamities. After he dies, depending on how he dies, they could easily ruin everything he's worked for. We heard what happened once when he went missing – Warlock destroyed someones soul and Captain killed a village. None of them care about Praes (well, we don't know about Assassin, but it's unlikely) – they're all tied to Black, and only Black. Heck, Captain's Name is fundamentally tied to him – I wonder if she'd become the Cursed again without him to Obey.

Actually I guess if he arranged his death to be obviously caused by Procer then that would solve one of his problems. I think 4 in 10 would be generous casualty numbers for them if that happened.

Letouriste

The 4/10 was for daoine but yeah, I think he already have contingencies for that since long ago.

Byzantine

In all likelihood he will be the last calamity standing, apart from the Empress herself. In Evil, just as in Good, when the successor finally reaches maturity the original is doomed. Apprentice is on the edge of claiming a new Name, which means Warlock doesn't have long to live. Captain just had basically every relevant death flag thrown all at once.

Assassin is likely to go out in a blaze of glory following Black's last order to him, probably with no one ever quite sure if he really died until the next claimant to the Name occurs.

Ranger parted ways a long time ago.

The Empress? She's going to be around awhile yet. Her end will likely come because of Catherine. We will see.

I'm mostly curious what will happen with Scribe, once Black is gone. She's not the type to go on a murderous rampage, but I can't quite figure out how she will die.

Spinner335

Nooooo Black don't die.

Letouriste

Hum...so now we have a good take on where the story will go and still have a lot of suspense:o
Very well written;)

o " . .

>Mfw i hand my legacy to a hero. (yea i know she isn't a hero but she probably won't end up being a villain in the most conventional sense neither, probably will be called villain by heroes and hero by villains but meh)

Rq

Alternative conclusion: Black is supposed to fight a White Knight, but not **that** White Knight.

I don't think that this is at all likely, but it does also explain the lack of pattern, and matches the faked prophecy about Catherine killing her adoptive father figure.

Morgenstern

Somehow I always thought that had a lot more to do with how THIS "White Knight" is not THE White Knight (of his time) at all, but has basically all FORMER White Knights bunched up into him. He's not really himself, not really a **person** anymore **at all**. it's all gotten burned out of him. How can someone like that EVER have any r/Rival? Seems much more like a drawback for this White Knight version that is also some kind of a merit he might be able to use against his enemies OR they against him...

Nightlurker8

Did... did he just casually send his best friend to die? thats cold man.

Byzantine

He either didn't think of it or he's considering that once he dies the calamities are going to go insane. Captain, Warlock and Assassin all need to die before him. And he knows it.

haihappen

Either the foreshadowing is really strong in this one, or we, the audience, are swimming in a sea of red herrings. Also, this screams "this is a set up!". Also, this screams "this is a set up!".

It is nice to see what decisions the characters are making based on their respective information.

My personal 2nd favourite guess: The Squire must become a Knight, but it is not ultimately determined which one. Catherine is unlikely to become a White Knight, as she lacks the mindset of a hero. The Black Knight staple also may not fit completely, as she never conquered anything, strictly speaking, she only takes up the sword to defend the people (more or less accurate...). In the Monochromatic spectrum, she is more in the middle, a very solid Grey.

Grey Knight. Unknown? Unlikely? Definitely Unconventional.

my favourite theory I will be keeping to myself 😊

Byzantine

The problem really is this world doesn't really have an appropriate name for Catherine to transition into. Grey Knight would fit her best of the obvious options but it isn't a Name as far as we know.

erraticerrata

There would be no cultural drive anywhere on Calernia to birth a Name like Grey Knight, which effectively ensure it could not come into being.

mavant

The Green Knight, perhaps? She's done the returning from fatal injuries bit.

Ward

Love from a dumb phone

Th3saint

Why do i get the feeling that if they off white then squire will get the title just to mess with everyones head, i can see it now "yes i am the white knight and a villan live with it".

Morgenstern

I at the very least agree on the VERY heavy feeling that somehow, funnily, Black forgot to take into account Catherine, when still thinking he can mold her into THE Black Knight.. she just isn't. She won't be. Hakram's late chapter made that rather clear.. Funny how someone like Black of all people seems unable to see that and plan for THAT eventuality. o_ô

Morgenstern

So I wonder... what else did he not see or simply forget or think too unlikely in his hubris? 😏

Morgenstern

Yes, hubris. Because despite his "Alaya and Wekesa are the great thinkers", somehow HE is making the plans her and thinks that will work out, come Heaven or Hells. Oh well.

Morgenstern

Random acute sidenote: I wonder how far exactly Arcadia covers this world... i.e. how far Cat can go... Anyone else suddenly having an image of HER popping up in the Free Cities (and thus, maybe, fighting this strange "White Knight" that is no person and no one W.K. of his time anymore, after all)?

Byzantine

I think the problem is there are only two possible roles for Catherine, as far as we are aware. But she isn't really cut out for either of them. Squire is neutral, and suits her best. She is a Villain, but she isn't really the type of Evil that's appropriate for Black Knight. The world needs a better Name for her, really.

Regardless, as far as Black is concerned she doesn't have an option as to what she will transition into. If something else happens he is going to be shocked.

Some thoughts and a few pet theories:

Catherine will ally/ get together with Cordelia.

They would complement each other really well, with Cordelia doing the ruling/scheming and Catherine being the fighter. Both are also more in the neutral area and pragmatic, rather than really idealistic or evil. It would also make sense story-wise, Cordelia has way to many uncertainties and possible backstabbers in her own ranks and that is not even counting the dominion. As stated in this chapter, either side winning is not really a realistic outcome, as casualties will be too high to keep away other threats.

That they are good-ish and evil-ish also should not be a problem. If i remember correctly one of the free cities has two rulers who are doing the same thing.

Second theory:

Catherine will either not be the Black Knight or become something else along the way (possibly Empress).

Simply a guess with a bit of argument in her being too good and most likely a pretty important ruler soon.

This will be really awkward if this has not been entirely planned yet, but at least the first one i would really like to see.

If it is bs, then i still say thanks for the chapter and please continue the good work, you make a lot of us really happy every week.

Cicero

If i remember Catherine aka foundling heard the same song as the current empress when she was young. The one about climbing the tower. So i find the empress theory more likely.

Twifire

catherine's growing so fast, black must die so she can take his place. if she wasn't so competent, he would have a few more years to live. instead, her unparalleled growth will enable her a much more long lasting story, and a greater empire than he has. she will not be the stragiest (and our current black knight has a name that doesn't fit his role, speaking of which,) catherine will be the sword of the empire instead, waging war and killing goodies with a blink of an eye.

edit:

Besides, f I hadn't come along you twerps would if I hadn't

Shoddi

I notice in Black's analysis of the White Knight's band of heroes, he left out the Unconquered Champion. No mention of her background or motivations, or how she fit in the group. Odd for him to overlook an enemy.

amc

maybe cat falls into another ridiculous plot device that literally bleaches her. then, she can be "white knight" and still be a villain...

but – yeah – i'm pretty nervous about the "prophecy" of killing the father figure...

maresther23

I think I can see the story Bard is constructing. One of the Calamities is killed and the rest go nuclear, so the forces of Good join together in a desperate Crusade to stop them. It does have a ring to it.

You can even ignore all the little details! If Captain was killed by Tyrant, well, Evil is petty. If the war has been planned by both sides for decades, meh. And if they make Callow a protectorate, well, they helped a fellow ally of Good. Evil needs a counter-narrative...

maresther23

Oh s... Bard is Black's foil.

Cat was supposed to be Black's foil. But instead he recruited her, completely changing the narrative of Callow Vs Praes. The Gods counterattacked, as Malicia warned him, by sending the the storyteller par excellence: The Bard.

NerfContessa

Sadly, you are correct.

And for Black not seeing ITT, well, even he can't focus everything equally...

Barrendur

@Erraticerrata: I don't know quite what narrative magic you're employing, but your story is so ENGAGING that:

A] I find myself checking the story-site several times a day, even when I know there's no update scheduled;

B] I'm almost stunned with disappointment when I come to the end of each new update (That's all? That's it? N0000000!); and

C] I think about 'A Practical Guide to Evil' even when I'm not actively (re-)reading it, and daydream myself as a character in that world.

Thank-you, thank-you Erraticerrata!

'A Practical Guide' is creative, complex and consistent. It's character-rich and has rich characters; its viewpoint is startlingly sympathetic *to* the characters (and we're NOT talking Mary Sue-style, author-compelled sympathies here); it doesn't shy away from the necessary darkness, but it doesn't revel in it (though some characters might; yeah, I'm looking at YOU, Tyrant!).

I'm 50 now, and I remember books being this good, once. It would be a tragic loss if you didn't somehow publish this.

Lamora

@erraticerrata Trivia question for curiosity, what are the other Choirs besides Contrition and Judgement? And do they have a counterside in the Hellgods?

Jonnnney

The choirs are angels not gods. Their counterside are the layers of hell. The combined might of all the angels is the same as the combined might of all the demons and devils.

Darkening

Granted, individual angels are a lot more powerful since devils are infinite and angels are not.

erraticerrata

I believe I've been asked that question before, but pretty much there's enough that listing them is pointless since only a few of them will ever be relevant to the story. Other Choirs have already been mentioned, though, notably Mercy and Compassion.

The Archdevil

I'm honestly hoping Cat breaks the pattern and doesn't kill Akua. Imagine them actually working together, Akua the Dread Empress and Cat her Black Knight. Oh, might as well throw Cordellia in there as Chancellor. A truly balanced Council of Three, with Good (Cordellia), Neutral (Cat), and Evil (Akua).

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Right, because that council of three would be stable forever! None of them would ever kill the other two!

The Archdevil

Never said it would last. Just said it'd be balanced.

Dylan Tullos

This is the fundamental problem with all of Black's plans; everything depends on him.

Malicia doesn't trust the Calamities, and they aren't loyal to her. Without Black as their leader, there isn't any guarantee that each Calamity won't pursue their own agenda, endangering Malicia's control of the Dread Empire. Scribe thinks Black should be Emperor rather than Malicia, Warlock follows Black and couldn't care less about the government of Praes, and Captain's loyalty is with Black, not the Empress (Assassin is unknown).

Just as Black can cripple Team White Knight by killing the White Knight, his own death will spell the end of the Calamities. However powerful and dangerous each Named is individually, it's teamwork that has enabled them to kill so many Heroes and survive doing it. Once Black is dead, they can be picked off one by one by whoever replaces the White Knight.

The same problem applies to the Legions. The marshals are loyal to Black, not Malicia. When he dies, she won't be able to rely on her officers anymore. How can she be sure that General Ranker isn't planning a coup? Malicia will be forced to choose between packing the upper ranks with her supporters, crippling the military efficiency of the Legions, or living with the threat of brilliant commanders who have the ability and the following to pull a successful coup.

Black is the center of the reborn Dread Empire, the man who brings it all together. Malicia can trust the Calamities because she trusts Black, and the Calamities obey Malicia because Black does. In the same way, Malicia knows that the Legions are loyal to her through Black, obeying his orders just as he obeys hers. The moment Black dies, Malicia can't trust her Legions or the Calamities. Everything Black has worked for will inevitably collapse in proper Praesi style, as Malicia seeks to control Named who aren't interested in working for her, and the Legions begin to conspire against a ruler who doesn't command the military's loyalty in the same way Black does.

The Calamities won't follow Catherine. The marshals view her with distrust, a feeling that will only grow when she declares herself Vicequeen. Too many of Black's plans relied on his personal relationships, and Catherine can't fill that hole. The more successful she is in Callow, the more the Praesi will fear her ambitions. Black is the link between Catherine and Malicia, the mutual mentor and friend that both of them can depend on. In his absence, it's only a matter of time until the Empress decides that Catherine Foundling is far too ambitious and powerful to be left in charge of Callow.

This entire chapter is Black frantically trying to avoid the fact that his death ends the current Dread Empire. Instead of standing united behind their Empress, the Calamities and marshals will all be pursuing their own personal agendas. The current setup only worked because, as Akua points out, Black was "Emperor" while Malicia was "Chancellor". Malicia could deal with the endless internal conspiracies, foreign plots, and details of government, while Black focused on the big picture, strengthening the Legions and managing occupied Callow. Malicia can't handle the duties of Chancellor and Empress, and she'll break the Dread Empire trying.

Strong systems don't rely on one person. For all of Black's accomplishments, he never achieved fundamental change. He can go out with a bang, but everything he built will start to collapse before his body is cold.

Morgenstern

Except Cat is meant to replace BLACK, in that train of thought, NOT the Black Knight, no matter what he said about that in this chapter, because of the rivalry with White Knight not coming up (which might just be faulty analysis, as THIS specific "White Knight" is not really THE White Knight, either, and so HE (too) would be the one why no r/Rivalry is upcoming)... It's about his Role and not the Name and this is not really about the Dread Empire ("as is"), if we follow that line of thought, but a Praes that DOES become overturned and made into something else. The people you worry about in that theory? They, T00, are meant to be replaced by the new troupe. So, the old loyalties of the old troupe don't really matter much, at least not for long.

The strange problem is that we see that and Black's "gears" just might have built it into his plans, but HE is still seemingly making the mistake of thinking in the wrong terms, that is – and ONLY then – if we are meant to read a "Dread" before the "Empire". But all I can find on scrolling back up is actually "Empire" *g* – that might just fit another type of Empire 😊

Precious Alaya obviously might have to go, too – unless SHE submits. Not Cat... (Although poor Aly is rather unlikely to do that, what with her history and wanting to be the one who calls the shots from now on. Anyways, if Cat survives, she's not likely to just be the sword of someone else. She has shown advances at becoming a storyteller, too, just like Black – and the real opposition / r/Rival is thus, correctly, the Bard or rather Fate, for whom Bard is just a puppet on stage. This is not about replacing pieces on the stage, this whole story, metagame-wise is about overturning the board, after all.)

---

When I say, Black seems to be forgetting Cat, I actually means those irritating tidbits of coming close to replacing him as in Name/Role, but WHILE obeying Alaya like he did – I just don't see her do it. Also, a tiny wee bit, about when it comes to his own death. She's not about to take his mantle, far as I can see, that's where he seems plain wrong. He might die, but not for that reason, and she will not take over that way, and that Empire won't be Alaya's one – even though the gears farther back, as you just formulated it, seem to turn farther than Black does consciously see, which gives him kind of a victory, but not exactly what he consciously still seems to plan for, if Cat triumphs, as she is likely to do (unless the author pulls the stunt of suddenly trying to insert a new protagonist midway through the books).

PingleBerry

Oh and I think I figured out who Assassin is.

Its Hune.(I actually think its Robbers assistant)

Probably not but I can hope guddamit.

Nastybarsteward

Still think Warlord would fit our sweet Lady Catherine better. Yes, it is a ruling name for orcs, but not so much as it was primarily a banner to war, a leader and warrior that orcs would (quite literally) kill to follow... now why does that sound familiar?

The Black Knight is a weapon in a rulers hand, fiercely loyal, but never a ruler himself.

Catherine is different and while I don't think she'll become Black, I don't think she'll be the White Knight either. But joining with the first prince at some point really is an intriguing idea.

Morgenstern

Sure is. ^^

Warlord: I actually thought the tidbit of Hakram in his chapter calling out something like "it is still an Orcish Name and can never be anything else" was quite... enticing. Screaming "break me" (this "rule"). =P

Morgenstern

Simply because isn't that what Cat is doing? Stuff that people claim is impossible to do and changing stuff that supposedly "will never (be) change(d)"? ^^

EducatedDEAD

People keep assuming that it means Black is going to die. The story has already mentioned that the Calamities want Black as Emperor, which would also prevent him from becoming the White Knights rival.

Morgenstern

That, too, is an interesting idea (although not one I personally think overly likely, nice as it might be).

But the reason might actually be twofold, coming from both sides or, if one-sided, from the WHITE Knight's side. The Heavens frigging ERASED him as a person. He is just copies of FORMER White Knights, popping into place as needed – unless the one former White Knight version comes up that Black killed before, no rivalry is possible from the WHITE Knight's side, because all the former rivals of all the former White Knights are dead, too, just like those White Knights are that got "copied" into this one... He's a copy. Tons of copies, but still a copy. How can a copy be truly narrative-worthy? He's something the Heavens/Fate seem/s to try to use, because they desperately needed SOME replacement and/or because someone ELSE has changed their precious Stories too much and they now need to cope and are currently just TRYING to cope and coming up with a rather haphazard solution...

Morgenstern

I wonder, though, why Black never thought about this tidbit here. I mean, he saw it in action and seemed to *realize* what was going on with that "White Knight" at the time – how come this does not figure into his musings, like AT ALL? =/

Mental Mouse

No, that's simply his Aspect Recall. He only gets the fighting style of other heroes, though he also has a magical weapon (a gift from the gigantes) that can shapechange to suit them. He does seem to be a depleted personality (there will be more discussion of that in the comments), but he is not actually becoming the other heroes.

Nicole Weaver

I spent the entire chapter waiting for Black to get taken out in mid thought. It just seemed like the perfect moment for arrogance to catch up to him.

Im glad that isnt how it went. I really like Black.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

I just realized: Masego has two fathers, so you would think he's adopted. But all the orcs call him the Warlock's Get, which means offspring. So: HOW DOES MASEGO EXIST?

Euodiachloris

You can be a chip off the old block without having direct biological links. *shrugs*

Roger W

Magic?

I mean, we can at least theoretically take an enucleated egg, the chromosomes from 2 different sperm, and start an embryo.

Jonnnney

He was adopted at a young age then lived in Arcadia for 5-6 years.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Can't be. In this case he wouldn't be the "Warlock's Get", then. So you're basically accusing all orcs of lying, and I think that's very unlikely

maresther23

Because when the guy that summons meteors for fun tells you "this kind is my son" you don't discuss genetics with him, you smile and say "Brilliant kid, he has your brains and his Dadas smile"

OldSchoolVillain

“Warlock’s Get” could just be their version of referring to Masego as Wekesa’s son – they don’t necessarily know or care whether he was adopted or produced traditionally.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Sure, that could be so, but considering how often the orcs repeat it, and repeat it (literally every single time) do you actually believe that? Come on. Like the author would really put allll that effort in for literally nothing.

Look up the word “get” before posting more boring explanations

Dimensional

I don’t think Catherine is going to become Black knight or White Knight. Squire is a transitional Name, but she has already been offered the transition to Queen, and her aim’s are and have always been about ruling Callow. Any name she transitions to almost must be about leadership, and both of the Knight names are not. The obvious one is Dread Empress, but Cat doesn’t want to rule Praes. The story is hinting strongly that that’s where she is going to end up but I’m assuming there will be a step along the way that is not Squire. Possibly a new name – a dark mirror of a more traditional Callow Name. Dark Queen? Fae Queen?

The Warren Peace NFL Report

How was she “offered” the Name Queen? I don’t think this ever happened. She doesn’t even have her third aspect of Squire yet, she’s not about to chage Names now

Cicero

When she took the Sword out of the Stone i think.

Darkening

The Choir of Contrition offered her the name of Queen of Callow as the fulfillment of her “redemption” storyline with William. That was a rather special set of circumstances and I doubt her transitional name really had that much to do with being given the opportunity.

Jonnnney

When it comes to the rulers of Callow and Praes you get your name once you take the throne regardless of your prior name. If you rule Praes you’re a Dread Empress/emperor if you rule Callow you’re some sort of King or Queen.

Morgenstern

How about Queen or Empress of a new Empire, losing the "Dread"?

Shawn Panzegraf

First, I think the theory that everything that Black, the Calamities & Malicia has built will fall with Black is bollocks. First, they influenced Praesi politics of all things into keeping a viable Chancellor from forming. Second, the Orcs and the Goblins are stronger than at any time prior to their societies originally being gobbled up. Third, as Black said, Malicia is intelligent enough to find a means of binding Squire to Praes without coercion.

"New Evil" has been more effective in two generations than all of Old Evil combined over centuries. That's bound to have etched a groove into Fate.

Second, I do not believe Captain will die at this time. The Tyrant will try, as the Bard suggested, but Captain's story of one faithful-from-the-heart right hand minion to Black is stronger than her story of mother tragically cut down. Black's fall will likely involve Captain cradling his dying/dead body, then going apeshit on his killers. She may well die then.

The Calamities never thought they'd stay on top forever, but they've started something. If they are clever, their fall will only strengthen that which they've given so much to.

Dylan Tullos

Shawn Panzegraf:

They didn't keep a viable Chancellor from forming. Malicia may not have the Name of Chancellor, but she has the Role. She handles the Chancellor's traditional duties, managing internal politics with the nobility and external intrigue, while Black serves as both Emperor and Black Knight, building the grand strategy of the Empire and leading armies in the field. In one of Akua's sections, she discusses how the real reason for the ban on the Name of Chancellor is to prevent someone else from usurping the Role Malicia is performing.

Goblins aren't loyal to anyone. The fact that the Goblins are stronger is a danger as well as an advantage; if the Dread Empire stumbles, the Matrons could hatch their own plot to seize power, or simply to secede. Everything we've seen of Goblin culture suggests that they prize bravery, cunning, and ruthlessness. In good times, when the Empire is strong, they'll go along, but if they sense weakness, they pounce.

Orcs do value loyalty, but it's intensely personal. Black is their Warlord, in Role if not in Name, and they'll follow him anywhere. Malicia does not command that personal allegiance. While Goblins are sneaky and backstabby, Orcs generally revere skill in battle, which Malicia lacks, and have scorn for plotting and scheming, the areas where Malicia excels. She's just not the kind of leader who can inspire their loyalty.

The Calamities win because they work together as a team. Once Black dies, there is no team. Captain is loyal to Black, Scribe is loyal to Black, Warlock is loyal to Black, and Assassin is a complete unknown. Captain is a devoted follower, not a leader, Warlock is utterly disinterested in leading, Assassin seems to work best alone, and we Scribe mostly appears when she's by herself or with Black. Malicia doesn't directly inspire loyalty in any of the Calamities; they follow Black, who follows her. Without Black, the Calamities go from a united force to a divided group with different agendas that doesn't trust the Empress and isn't trusted by her.

In terms of raw power, the Tyrant is stronger than any of the Calamities; he may be stronger than all of them put together. Old Evil always loses "in the end", but it is capable of doing immense damage before the fall. Tyrant's story of "false ally" fits nicely with Captain's story of "right hand woman". Nothing is more appropriate than an Evil leader backstabbing an ally and killing his most trusted friend.

"New Evil" has been successful because Black kept everyone working together. Without Black to keep all the different members of Team New Evil on the same page, it's only a matter of time until traditional Praesi backstabbing leads to New Evil turning on itself.

The fundamental problem with enacting change through autocracy is that everything depends on the autocrat. Black has changed things from the top down; once someone different is in charge, he doesn't have any way to guarantee that his changes will stick.

Morgenstern

Except in structures that might survive, as other people grasp at it, because they see advantage therein. Like the orcs and other people in the Legions. Like finally getting rid of the Truebloods. Like Cat going one ore more step(s) further... and people following in her wake.

It is definitely not the Dread Empire anymore that will rise out of this, like a phoenix out of the ashes (*unless* everything falls into ashes and stays there squabbling for pieces for next few decades or centuries, which might then see a turn back to the old, if some new really powerful Evil Named rise up, i.e. if the Bard, that is Fate using her puppet and the strings, succeeds instead), but something else that will keep a CHOP of the "new practical evil" soul. But not all. If he thought it wouldn't go further than that, he'd be dead wrong. But no matter this thinking or in places just the (probably/occasionally only misleading) wording – the plans Black made so far all pointed at... well.. becoming something else. Overturning the whole structures, morphing them into something else. And they seem damn pretty effective THERE. It's just the old people that won't stay, that don't really matter... time for new seeds that have been grown differently...

DocTao

The idea that Black dies might be wrong as someone above stated, transition to another name fits the facts he uses just as well. Squire will still most likely transition to Black Knight imo, because of all those named-dreams (have we looked at those altogether, with the new ones?) and all the foreshadowing. Perhaps into a different one, though in that regard, perhaps she wont progress "forward", but instead sideways, into Heirress?

The Warren Peace NFL Report

That's right, she's actually dreamed she's Amadeus, when he was already Black Knight! Not just when he was Squire. That has to be significant, that can't possibly be a normal Name dream, it wasn't even her own Name!

Morgenstern

Really? Seems like TOTALLY normal Name dream to me, what with the Name in question being Squire that is MEANT to transition into Knight and LEARN about being a Knight...

arancaytar

Black's POV chapters are just hell on the fourth wall. 😊

DocTao

Can Scribe and Assassin still be the same person or has there been an instance where this was impossible?

Morgenstern

Pretty sure there was an author comment somewhere that said Assassin is definitely a man – so, unless you’re banking on Scribe being a transgender identity....? 😊

(Might even have been outright said that those two definitely aren’t one and the same, but less sure about that.)

mavant

It seems Black is ignoring a couple of options. One is that his apprentice has already demonstrated an effective technique for surviving the loss of your name. Black could zombify, drop the title to Catherine, then continue on his merry way as an undead monstrosity à la the Dead King. Maybe he could even claim another name afterwards – Squire would be available... A second is to steer into the turn regarding his missing pattern of three. One common narrative (perhaps not in Calernia?) is of two figures who are “the best at what they do” but on opposite sides being forced to work together by circumstances like an outside enemy / greater scope threat, and in the process discovering a friendship that lasts a lifetime. The Tyrant presents an obvious candidate. Black could exploit this narrative by taking the inevitable next betrayal by the tyrant as an excuse to join the White Knight in battle (potentially saving his life at an opportune Big Damn Heroes moment).

The Warren Peace NFL Report

I lost you when you said to steer into the turn. That is really very bad advice to tell a driver, because even in the random instances where it’s correct, it’s more confusing than not. Really there is no rule of thumb for controlling a slide, besides assessing the situation.

1. Look where you want to go
2. Steer where you’re looking

Those tips will allow you to react correctly even in the heat of the moment. Yours will cause even more accidents.

But then you also think Black could be friends with Tyrant, which isn’t any better of an idea.

mavant

No, my proposal was for the Black and White Knights to be a buddy cop movie.

As I read the parts where Amadeus' thoughts were detailed, I could hear Wesley Snipes as Simon Phoenix in my head going, "That's who you remind me of: an evil Mr. Spock."

aran

IIRC we later learn that Hanno's mother sacrificed her own life to cast a curse avenging her husband, so (if this isn't a retcon) this seems to be a rare case of Scribe getting something wrong.

(Though the Ashurans *did* erase all records of her afterward, so it would be tricky to get the true story.)

Fulmi

I'll weep when Black die. He's such a an easy villain to love.

Lemon

I love how Black's focus on stories so much has made him extrapolate his death because of Creation resisting obvious bait to even make him a side-character against White Knight.

But Hanno will be a great Hero for Catherine. The way he avoids personal responsibilities with his coin would make her so angry. She might even be able to beat some sense in to him.

vuthuha912

You don't understand, Amadeus. Your friends love you and not just using you as a tool. They are not going to get over you peacefully. They are not as cold as you think.

You are thinking about giving Alaya an opportunity to befriend Cat, aren't you? The way both of you did a long time ago and the way you did with Cat. Yet, Alaya is not nearly as charismatic as you. She has the charm but not the thing that makes people love her deeply like you. Another thing is that Alaya is no longer the girl you befriends a long time ago. She no longer wants to become friends with anybody, not just Cat. Cat is not her child. She doesn't even care for Cat the way you do.

And Amadeus is blindsided by the Bard. When he met the Tyrant, he purposefully projects a cold and inhuman machine so that the Tyrant will be more likely to strike at him. The Tyrant didn't know about the love he has for others because how can a person like that truly care for anybody. Thus, logic dictates that killing a bodyguard or a demolition expert is just an annoyance. However, now that the Tyrant knows, he is going to strike where it hurts. The Bard is a true bitch, isn't she?

Heroic Interlude: Injunction

"Forty-nine: if any wizard over the age of fifty suddenly becomes evasive when asked about your parents, you may safely assume yourself to be either royalty or related to your archenemy in some way."

– "Two Hundred Heroic Axioms", author unknown

The interesting thing about morality, Hanno had found, was that it evolved across the years. Living through shards of a hundred heroes and heroines' lives had made it impossible to deny as much, though he disliked the thought that concepts like Good and Evil could be mutable. The Book of All Things, after all, did not change – neither should ethics. Yet, a few thousand years ago, most of Calernia had once practiced slavery. The ancestors of nations that now found the very notion repugnant had then been unable to function without it. Procerans, in days before there was a Procer, had raided each other for plunder and workers. The Titanomanchy had built its wonders as much by the legendary craftsmanship of the Gigantes as on the backs of a hundred thousand Arlesite slaves. Even Ashur, his homeland, had once kept a citizenship tier beneath them all where forced labourers and servants were inducted into. But over the years, that ugly reality had been... outgrown. Recognized as unworthy of all those who would call themselves the children of the Heavens.

And so slavery went from commodity to sin, and Creation was made a little brighter. There were, of course, holdouts. The drow of the Everdark still sent raiding parties to the surface to grab the unwary and spirit them below. The Kingdom of the Dead still farmed men like crops, growing them and reaping them in an even darker kind of sin to swell the ranks of its armies. In Mercantis people were sold like cattle to all those who had the coin and the inclination, the City of Bought and Sold concerned solely by the lustre of gold. But the city famous for it, the one that had perfected the art of chaining others centuries before the Miezans first glimpsed the shores of Calernia, had always been Stygia. Its slave phalanxes, the Spears of Stygia, were famous on the continent for unflinching obedience and having had fear scoured out of them by the concoctions and sorceries of the Magisters. The entire city was a den of iniquity every passing day in a way that made the worst excesses of Helike pale.

The White Knight watched the tall banner floating above the camp, gold and grey set with two pure white cranes. Redress and Retribution, they were called, the patron spirits of Stygia. Lesser gods that had settled in the heart of the city when it was first built – he knew this for a fact for he'd watched one of them millennia ago centuries ago. Golden beak dipped in blood, eyes older than her entire bloodline red with hatred that was utterly inhuman. It would not matter. She was the Sword of the Free: she would wrest her people from chains and lead them to found a city in the east. A land where no would ever rule over them again. She rose, wounded but unbowed, and fought again. Hanno blinked, chasing away the memories not his own. Over two months since he'd fought the Black Knight and still sometimes the other lives trickled through into him. He'd come very close to dying, that day. That had consequences.

"Money for thinking," the Champion said.

"Copper for your thoughts," Hedge corrected in a low voice.

"Copper is money," the Levantine replied condescendingly. "Witch wrong again. Do you no get tired of it?"

"Let's move," Hanno said, interrupting before the bickering could start in earnest. "Follow the plan."

He saw the Hedge Wizard open her mouth from the corner of her eye, but her sister thumped her with her staff. Priestess was, he had to admit, the most reliable of his companions in temperament. Though considering her competition was a drunken disappearing Bard, her actively argumentative sister and brawler who kept trophies of her kills, that might not be saying much. Still, he knew from the Chamber of Borrowed Lives that no Named who lived longer than a few years managed to avoid growing some... quirks. The power conferred onto them by the Gods shaped them as much as they shaped it. Regardless he got along with her the best. More than once they'd found themselves sharing a comfortable quiet in the back while the rest of their band bickered aimlessly. The four heroes crept across the grassy field, Hedge's spell keeping them hidden from the moonlight even as they neared the outskirts of the Stygian camp. A palisade of wooden stakes had been raised and spear-slaves patrolled behind them. He could hear them pass by, when he pressed his ear against the wood.

"Priestess," he said.

The dark-haired woman nodded. The tip of her staff traced a circle on the surface of the palisade and a heartbeat later the wood crumbled into ash. They passed through, one after another. Hanno glanced at Champion and Hedge through the slit of his barbute.

"Half an hour," he reminded them. "That's all we'll need. Retreat afterwards."

"Will make river of blood," Champion said enthusiastically from under her badger-shaped helm. "Eat hearts of enemies."

"That's cannibalism," Hedge said.

"Not so," the Levantine said. "Says in Book. Allowed if they wicked."

"The Book of All Things does not excuse eating people," the Wizard firmly stated.

"Maybe in lame Free Cities version," Champion replied sceptically.

They both turned to the Ashen Priestess, the only individual among them with an actual religious education. The heroine stared back with hickory-coloured eyes.

"I'm not humouring this with an actual response," she informed them flatly. "Get moving before I decide to make the two of you incontinent."

"Mighty Priest-Witch true monster," the Champion said admiringly before fleeing.

Hedge met her sister's eyes for a moment longer before making a tactical withdrawal, paling a bit.

"Can you?" Hanno asked, morbidly curious.

He had a trick to discern lies – it was common, for those sworn to the Choir of Judgement – but using it drew on his Name and he still had a fight ahead of him.

"I fed Alkmene an herbal concoction when were we twelve to make her believe I could," Priestess admitted, the sly shadow of a smile on her lips.

Hanno would have snorted if the situation was any less serious. They fell into step together naturally, his longer stride shortening to accommodate her own. There'd been no need to rely on his few memories of fighting Stygia in the past to deduce where the Magisters would be camped: while the entire rim of he fortified camp was rough burlap tents, the centre was absurdly luxurious and bustling with servants during the day. Without Hedge to guide them around the wards and keep them out of sight, the two of them had to be careful. The White Knight could feel sorcery, if he attuned himself, and Ash could outright see it – but neither of them were trained in picking up on the subtler effects, much less bypass them. They sidestepped an alarm ward early on, but found to their displeasure that deeper in there was another ward that circled entirely around the circumference of the camp. The Priestess could dismantle it, of course, but that would be giving away their presence. They hid in the shadows for a while instead, waiting for their distraction to arrive, and were eventually rewarded by a spray of fireworks that set fire to a dozen tents in the distance followed by a booming voice challenging the entire camp to single combat. Slaves soldiers immediately began to mobilize, and only then did the two heroes cross the alarm ward. Stealth was no longer the game, now. Swiftmess was the line of life and death.

The first Magister they found was obviously drunk, a grey-haired woman leaning against a post and breathing like someone trying not to throw up. Lean face, eyes dulled by liquor and long dark robes whose sleeves tangled with the many rings on her fingers. All Magisters were mages, and only gained the title by showing power and ruthlessness. Neither of those things mattered, when the mage could not see you coming. The White Knight's sword took her in the throat without warning, hacking straight through. A cry of surprise came from ahead, the corpse dropped and the battle began.

Green sorcery lashed out in a stream at him, but Hanno ducked to the side and broke into a run. A Spear of Stygia burst out of a tent to the side, but in a flash turned into a pile of ashes. The Magisters were aware they were under attack, now. Within moments at least a dozen more mages stormed out of the large silken pavilion in the centre of the camp, the rings on their hands glinting as they immediately began spellcasting. The Wandering Bard had told him there were fifteen in total, sent by Stygia to lead its army against Nicae. Decapitating the head of the snake was why he'd taken come with his companions tonight. A slave army without masters was as good as paralyzed, and might actually retreat back to Stygia. The more casters joined the fray, the closer to him the spells came: they stood in a tight cluster, and for all that they were wretched souls one and all he almost admired the skill being shown. Spells led into each other, herding him into harsher attacks like a horse being led to water. The Light flooded his veins, sharpening his reflexes far beyond limits as he began to weave and duck through the volleys directed at him, not even a full step ahead. Another slave tried to spear him through the side, only to be caught by the edge of a black orb that saw the man's skin contract and tear under the sudden pressure. The Magisters did not care who else died in their attempt to put him down. He'd expected nothing less from slavers.

"Ride," the White Knight said.

Light wove itself into a horse in the blink of an eye and even as Hanno deftly leapt onto its back he felt a lance of light form in his hand.

"Aspect," one of the Magisters noted, tone calm.

"Suppression," another ordered.

Fourteen jets of black light bloomed, emanating from outstretched hands, and combined their streams at him. Hanno struck at the malevolent power with his lance, but after a few heartbeats his weapon broke into shards and the power of the Magisters tore through his mount as well – the White Knight grit his teeth to ignore the pain of the feedback from having an aspect overpowered. He fell kneeling to the ground, unsheathing his sword again.

"Full attack, before he uses a second," a woman's voice stated.

Before the White Knight could react, three stakes of obsidian nailed both his feet to the ground, going through his armour like it was butter. The twelve remaining Magisters finished their incantations a moment later, fire reeking of sulphur blooming in their hands.

"We are Magisters of Stygia, boy," the woman who'd just spoken, a cold smile on her face. "Even heroes kneel before us."

The twelve spheres of hellfire hit him in the chest almost simultaneously. Hanno unhesitatingly flared the Light under his skin where the impact was happening – though that was enough to spare his flesh, their spells melted straight through his plate and threw him into a tent like a rag doll. If he'd not used his Name, there would be a smoking hole where his ribcage currently stood. With a grunt, he rose to his feet and tried to get the silk panels off his head before he could get hit again. No doubt the slaver mages were feeling rather smug at the moment, certain of their superiority. They'd been batting him around since the beginning, after all. That was their mistake. They'd used their strength on the one who, of the two present, could take a beating. All the while ignoring the other.

"Though their horses and chariots are like a river unto Creation, though their spears be forest and their sword be mountains, the Gods pass judgement unto them. Do not dread, for I bear the word of the Heavens and that word is begone."

The Ashen Priestess' voice rang loud and clear like a trumpet across the chaotic camp. Finally rid of the silk, Hanno was just in time to see the circle of blinding light form around the standing Magisters. Panic flickered across their faces for a single moment, and then the miracle wiped away the world. Even his Name wasn't enough to keep the ringing out of his ears, or prevent the blindness that burned his retinas. Ten heartbeats later, when the terrible whiteness finally left his eyes, all the White Knight saw where the Magisters had once stood was a faint shimmer of light. Of the men and women, there was not a trace. Ash was panting, leaning on her staff: this was one of the more strenuous miracles she could call on, and one that took long to prepare. Against the likes of the Calamities, attempting to use it would be a death sentence. But these had been a different breed they were facing. Men and women ready to lean into their arrogance. And for all that the miracle took long to bring forth, there was no denying the effectiveness of the harsh judgement of the Heavens meted out. The White Knight limped to his friend and allowed her to lean on his shoulder: they needed to get moving soon, but they had a few moments still. There was a flicker of movement behind them and Hanno's fingers tightened around the grip of his sword, but it was only a bird. A pigeon, to be exact, and it landed on his shoulder.

"Well, the distraction worked," Hedge said, her voice unnaturally coming out of the bird's mouth. "Maybe a little too well."

A sound like a dozen cauldrons rolling down a street resounded behind them, which from experience he knew meant the Champion was running. The Levantine came into sight not long afterwards, her breastplate splattered in so much blood she might as well have dipped it in a barrel of the stuff. The White Knight frowned when he saw no one was in pursuit. Even with the Magisters dead the slave soldiers should be continuing the fight. Why was no one following?

"Funny cripple here," the Champion announced delightedly. "Giving speech. We beat him like renting mule, yes?"

"The Tyrant?" the White Knight said.

Why was he – oh. The hero closed his eyes.

"He's taking over the Stygian army," Hanno said.

"Can he even do that?" the pigeon complained, too close to his hear for comfort.

"Masterless slaves and a ruler Name? It's basically handed to him," the Wandering Bard announced cheerfully.

All their eyes flicked to their wayward fifth member, who was leaning against a wooden pole with a flask in hand. Said hand, apparently sweaty, slipped and she nearly hit the side of her head against her support before gamely trying to pretend she'd always meant to do that. Hedge snorted, which was impressive considering she was a bird at the moment.

"Where were you, Aoede?" Ash asked.

"Seeing a guy about a thing," the Bard replied vaguely.

"You are the world's most terrible riddler," the pigeon stated. "There's no mystery, only non-answers and a blatant drinking problem."

"The point of this was to remove Stygia from the equation," the White Knight said, ignoring the byplay. "We've failed."

"But you successfully hit another point by accident, so it's all good really," the Bard told them with a smile.

Hanno frowned.

"And what would that point be?"

"Taking a tool out of the other monster's toolbox," Aoede said, toasting her flask. "That said, my lovelies, now might be a great time to leg it. You're about to have a very motivated army looking for you."

The hero glanced at Priestess, who shrugged in resigned agreement.

"Retreat, then," the White Knight said, feeling somewhat robbed of a victory.

Even as they began their flight, Hanno saw the Bard slipping an arm around Champion's armoured shoulders and leaning close.

"Do you happen to like monster stories, Rafaella?" she asked.

"Speak me more," the Levantine grinned.

Darkening

Huh, wonder if this was part of Bard's deal with the Tyrant. Also, interesting to see the Kingdom of the dead apparently has a breeding program, so there's actually an explanation for the inexhaustible armies of the dead.

Nicole

I also thought the explanation for the armies of the dead was awesome 😊

Shikome Kido Mi

It's great to know the Dead King is smart enough to avoid a common necromancer trap. I've always argued complete conversion of the population to Undead is impractical and any one advocating it is dooming their society to nothing but decay and a slide to oblivion. Even Warcraft III's Scourge kept living cultists.

You should just convert most people and have the remainder converted after they reach a certain age or die of unrelated causes while they breed new life to make new undead. It could be like retirement: work hard, raise a family, and then become an undead monster to avoid the ravages of age.

Amoonymous

Honestly, the people the Dead King keeps could quite feasibly be living in a (slightly regulated) paradise. A happy/distracted people are a complacent people after all; the slight regulations would be things to make them more effective undead (like say diets and exercise).

After all, the Dead King has uncountable undead to handle everything necessary to raise the population to a...harvestable age.

Of course it could also be hell on Calernia or anything between the two.

Veyros

Exactly like Khelt from Innworld. Everyone lives in this utopia kingdom ruled by an undead, but when they die their bones are used to make soldiers, farmers, servants, etc to serve the living.

Julian

Yeah it's basically morally ok slavery, as long as it doesn't mess with souls that is.

goliath1303

Wow, not even the slightest aren't too give a freakin spoiler warning... Thanks for that!

Shequi

I'm more and more convinced that the Wandering Bard is not a hero.

nerfworld

That's obvious, she's the stage hand keeping the actors in line and making sure they follow the script so the audience(gods above and below) enjoy the show

Oshi

None of them are Heroes or Villians. As far as I can tel they are just pieces on a board shaped to move against each other. I wonder if in the end the world will actually have Free Will...

Ravdalicious

The Wandering Bard is a hero. You just aren't using the definition of hero we got from the introduction, but rather the definition of one as we know. A hero in this world is one that strives to bring the world to act according to the plans of the gods above. It is not about innocent lives, saving countries, or other such things – those are things that happen to align with that more often than not. The Wandering Bard has literally said that she'd prefer Akua to win over Catherine, because Catherine might actually be good for Callow.

Or in D&D terms: Heroes are Lawful according to the gods, not necessarily Good. Villains are Chaotic according to the gods, but not necessarily Evil.

Byzantine

She's THE hero. Her entire purpose in existence is, at any and all cost, to make sure the Gods above never actually lose. She is their ultimate trump card.

Right now, then she has to make sure Praes loses. She doesn't care how much Evil gets done, how many suffer, etc in the process. She just needs the new brand of evil the Calamities have created to die.

stevenneiman

She's a hero, which is to say someone dedicated to ensuring victory for the Gods Above. The fact that she's willing to arrange the deaths of any who get in her way (even by accident) and to try to mindrape thousands of people doesn't make her not a hero as the Heavens understand the term.

danh3107

Champion versus Captain eh? Interesting

wirelessgrapes

It's not even a fight. Captain dominated the *fuck* out of Champion and the Priestess. One v. One results in a dead Champion. Bigger, stronger and much more experienced.

sheer_falacy

A villain going against a hero, one on one, after they've fought before and it was made clear that the villain was bigger, stronger, and more experienced?

That's a very bad story for Captain.

nick012000

Only if Champion had a training montage first.

Cicero

Remember, its about stories. And who knows better then anyone else how to craft the correct story? the bard. Hence the talk about monster stories.

Morgenstern

Now I am wondering, if the Bard has a little monster story about how to change a kinda-werewolf back into a happy little human to save it for leading its merry little life of family and love..

Cpt. Obvious

She have all the stories. Every single one. But she's got no use for happy ends for Villains. She's playing a very long game.

PingleBerry

Champion vs Captain....but which will win? I suspect its the Captain due to how this story likes to subvert things, but it could equally be the Champion...

Brian P.

I really, really want the Bard to suffer some kind of unending torment by the end of this series. Seriously, I dislike her more than the Heiress/Diabolist, probably because she's such a smug meta-player.

unorginal

That is literally her life, it's why she drinks so heavily, you don't need to wish for shit because she is living a nightmare where whenever she is not needed she ceases to exist. That and the fact that she lives with the fact that she presumably subsumes a bard everytime she takes on a new face.

Cpt. Obvious

Also for how long has the Name existed? How long would you stand seeing the same stories play out over and over again. The groves getting deeper and deeper cementing the stories until they are more or less permanent. Evil digging its claws into creation. Heroes following the rut of their Name and neither Good nor Evil getting any closer to prove which philosophy is the more successful so the game just keeps going.

And watching over all these stories is the Wandering Bard never allowed to rest from it all. Never allowed to form a meaningful relationship as she is constantly ripped out of Creation only to be reinserted where needed to nudge a Hero or Villain to follow the "correct" story. And if she were to die she just wakes up in a new body to continue her work.

How many millenia would it take before you would wish you'd never held a lute? How long before you would start drinking to silence your thoughts if only for a moment? How long before you would try to find a way to end it all?

The Warren Peace NFL Report

How was this result a good thing from the hero's perspective? What monster's toolbox?

Ploogle

Its removing a tool from Black's tool box.

nerfworld

Black remember? She told the kid that she would arrange her heroic pawns to do something that would help the kid so he could hit black hard

vietnamabc

When Black said he was the worst kind of monster, I think Bard is one too.

If a person can become a Name, what if a Name becomes a person? I think the Bard is a story incarnate so when the story is broken, she will truly die.

Cpt. Obvious

She's not story incarnate as much as the keeper of all stories. She can nudge Heroes and Villains to follow a story of her choice, but as long as there is anyone that remembers any story she will exist to guard it. So no death for the Wandering Bard as long as people keep the stories alive.

Letouriste

4 interludes at once^^ i guess we will come back to cat Wednesday?

Gunslinger

The sad thing is that I'm really enjoying these heroes. It would be cool if they'd join Cat but really doesn't seem likely.

Also the opening quote has to be my favorite axiom among the hero axioms so far.

RandomFan

I love all of them except for the Bard, because bards evidently deserve a kill-on-sight policy from now on. Even if the Wandering Bard is a dramatic outlier, it's still worth killing the rest to balance it out anyways.

Ward

Love from a dumb phone

Victor

Damn the bard's got her fingers dipped in every pie it seems. She's one cold motherfucker, . The scariest thing is that she's ruthless as fuck for a "good guy", she manipulated William into doing "what was necessary to win against Evil" which turned out to be attempting to brainwash a shit ton of people into doing an Angel's bidding and when that didn't work she was like fuck it I guess I'll just try with another Hero. Her only interest seems in beating Evil, no matter what she has to do. Scary.

Shikome Kido Mi

The funny thing is, for all that she wants to destroy the Calamities for what they stand for... The Bard is pretty much their heroic counterpart in many respects.

edrey

so let me guess, Captain dies, Black in rage attack white but he is killed, Cat becomes the black knight then she kills hanno but before, he impregnate ash and the baby is left with her sister, the wizard, then later the boy becomes white knight and kill cat, thats is the typical tragic story of revenge, too boring to say the true

Cat should just TAKE both Names and transcend into a new name

I'm guessing, from the relative positions of the cities, that the Sword Of The Free was the founding agent of Bellerophon.

Which would mean that a City nowadays dedicated to the Hellgods was originally founded by a Hero.

Dylan Tullos

That explains so much. I had wondered why Bellerephon was so fiercely egalitarian, especially when all of the other realms, Good or Evil, seem to have some form of hereditary ruling class.

I'm surprised that Bellerephon is willing to ally with the Magisters at all. Even if they do worship the Gods Below, their entire society is built around being "not-Stygia". Does Anaxeres know the story of his city's founding? Even when he thinks negatively about the Stygians, he doesn't seem to distinguish them from other Tyrannical Foreign Oligarchies that Oppose the People; if he knew the truth, you'd think that Stygia would occupy a special place in his curses.

Cpt. Obvious

Ah! But the Sword of the Free is one of the Gods below! The

Chapter 24: Vanguard

"My dear Chancellor, I didn't murder my entire family and use their blood to turn myself into an undead abomination to be told I couldn't do things."

– Dread Emperor Revenant

We'd wasted another sennight at Denier, to my displeasure. In part haggling terms with Duchess Kegan, who must clearly have been a fishwife in a past life, and in part because we were waiting on the Twelfth Legion to finish its march towards us. Those four thousand men were still led by General Afolabi, who I'd met once before when the Lone Swordsman was making trouble in the city the Twelfth garrisoned. I'd been unimpressed by his inability to handle the mounting tensions in Summerholm, he'd been unimpressed by the fact I'd launched an ambush on a hero in his own backyard without warning him. Neither of us were particularly pleased to see the other, but if I had to traipse through Arcadia I'd rather do it with thirty thousand men than twenty-six thousand. Besides, I rarely had to deal with him directly: he was under Marshal Ranker's command and his legionaries stuck to their own camp. It took us another three days to ferry the Deoraithe army across the river with fishing boats and barges, the mounting delays driving me up the wall.

The longer we tarried here the longer Diabolist had to set up her end game. I was anybody's guess how long we'd be in Arcadia, and more importantly where the gate out would be. After all, I didn't control that part. Masego had given me a very complicated explanation on the subject involving alignments, symmetry and what had struck me as a bit of religion no matter how much mathematics he brought into the mix. My own understanding was a bit simpler: my will was a needle. By opening a gate I was punching through the fabric that was between worlds into Arcadia, but where the needle had to punch through to get me out of Arcadia was determined by where I'd come from and where I wanted to go. No doubt there were sundry metaphysical implications to all of this, but if I wanted to be babbled incomprehensively at I could just buy people drinks. Hells, considering I'd basically taken control of the treasury for Callow I could actually afford that these days. Progress.

Our supply situation had been another headache, and I'd never missed Ratface more than when Ranker sent a copy of our stores for the campaign to my desk. The Marshal and General Afolabi had essentially emptied Denier and Summerholm's granaries to ensure they could operate alone for a few months, but there was a major difference between driving those supply carts down Callowan roads and through the wilderness of Arcadia. Getting the matter sorted took another two days, then another two when Duchess Kegan insisted on bringing her own carts across the river instead of relying on Legion ones. My officers learned to enjoy their wine cold, because the temperature in the room when I heard about that descended sharply. There'd been talk from the Deoraithe of keeping a different supply train instead of keeping all the rations together, but after I glared the meeting table frozen they'd 'magnanimously' declined to further pursue the matter.

And now here we were, over a fortnight after when I'd wanted us to leave, assembling the allied armies in the darkness before dawn. The largest gate I could open was an equilateral triangle seventy feet at the base, so there was no possibility of going through in ranks. It would have to be a marching column, which had prompted another round of what I refused to even call bickering. I knew bickering, it was the true tongue of all my closest friends. There was fondness in bickering, a give and take. This was just an ugly brew of distrust and spite spilling over what should have been an exceedingly straightforward manner. Marshal Ranker had wanted her two legions to go through first, and General Afolabi had backed the notion. Duchess Kegan had suggested her own infantry be the first to cross, heavily implying the goblin couldn't be trusted not to set up an ambush for her army on the other side. Ranker had then wondered out loud if there'd been enough left of the body of Kegan's younger brother to identify him after Grem One-Eye killed him at the Wall, during the Conquest. Before that could get any uglier, I'd slammed my fist on the table.

It had promptly broken, because these days I was pretty sure I could punch through iron if I put my mind to it. That wasn't worrying in the slightest.

Anyhow, that had gotten their attention. I'd told them that it was my fucking gate so my people were going through first, led by myself, after which Ranker's Fourth would follow. The Deoraithe would go through next, and General Afolabi's legion would be in charge of the rearguard and covering our supply train. Tactically speaking this entire disposition was shit and nobody liked the compromise, but apparently breaking furniture made people less prone to arguing with you on minor details. Robber had since informed me that rumours went around the camps about my temper, nowadays, but I doubted even Black would have been able to handle this level of futile squabbling with a smile. As for Juniper, well, she'd have sent them to cool their heels by digging holes and filling them at least twice by now. Gods, I missed the Fifteenth. The wretches gave me lip, sure, but at least they did whatever I asked them to without arguing for a quarter bell first. Still, here we finally were. The blood in my veins cooled and power wafted off my armour like smoke even as the gate shuddered open before me. I found myself panting when my mind finally returned to itself, leaning against the neck of my horse. I waited ten breaths for the tiredness to leave me before looking at the Gallowborne around me.

"Forward," I ordered.

We went through. Moving into Arcadia was a hard feeling to describe. It wasn't a pressure, not exactly. It was like being stripped away of a second skin you didn't know you had, leaving you feeling oddly naked even when wearing full plate like I was. I'd ridden ahead of my retinue so I had a moment to get my bearings before they caught up to me, breathing in the scene. It was night here too, but nothing alike. The fields south of Denier were cabbage and radish, mostly, while here it was long grass as far as the eye could see. A lazy breeze had the fields shivering while in the sky above us a full moon hung. I would have known we were in Summer even if I were blind, just from the irrational hatred I could feel welling up inside of me. The power I'd gained in Skade did not like being here at all, and the hatred sharpened when I glanced up at the moon. Really? I thought. The moon? My title was Duchess of Moonless Nights, so I saw the logic in it, but come on. I've fought some pretty absurd things since I became a villain, but I draw the line at the godsdamned moon.

I spurred Zombie the Second ahead as the Gallowborne came through behind me, immediately spreading out in formation and following behind me. In the distance, a few miles ahead, I could see tall and pale towers reaching for the sky. I frowned as I looked: the power I felt from that place was a mere shard of what Skade had felt like, so this was unlikely to be the seat of the Summer Court. But it was likely there'd be fae there, and the faint presence of the exit gate I could feel in the distance was beyond it. Far behind it. Shit. I'd had strong suspicions I'd have to fight my way through the third Arcadia voyage, but an expedition into the heart of Summer was beyond my worst expectations. Fighting the Summer Court in their own territory was not a recipe for success. But what choice do I have? We'd have to move quickly, before Summer could muster its entire army and strike at us. Force march directly to our way out, ignoring the fae as much as possible – getting drawn into a campaign out here would be consigning the thirty thousand soldiers I'd managed to assemble to the grave. It wasn't long before the entirety of the Gallowborne were behind me, and the moment the first of Nauk's legionaries set foot into Arcadia I began moving forward.

I wished Hakram was at my side, but I'd had to leave him back in Creation to make sure no idiocy would unfold between the 'allies' while my back was turned. The great tragedy of Adjutant was that I could only have one of him.

"Ma'am, are you certain we shouldn't wait for reinforcements?" Tribune Farrier asked quietly from my side.

"I need to be sure there's no army waiting to ambush us," I replied. "If we have to give battle when most our forces are stuck on the other side of that portal, I have no words for how fucked we are."

The dark-haired man nodded obediently, though he did not seem convinced. Since I was astride a horse I was the only one whose head was above the grass, and I allowed myself to luxuriate in the feeling of being the tallest person around for once as we moved towards the towers. My retinue moved warily in a square formation I was near the middle of, the greenery making the lines wobbly: this was not land made for marching. I could see no trace of any roads, and to my mixed relief and dismay no road conveniently appeared after I had that thought. When nearing a mile away from the gate, I clicked my tongue against the roof of my mouth. No sign of anyone, but the grasslands made it hard to gauge that accurately. There could be ten thousand fae crouched down somewhere and none of us would notice until we stumbled over them. My instincts screamed trap, though in all fairness they almost always did. That healthy level of paranoia had kept me alive through a few years of being mortal enemies with Akua Sahelian, though, so I wasn't inclined to dismiss it out of hand.

"It's quiet," one of the soldiers behind me said.

"If any of you finishes that thought, I'm feeding them to Nauk," I said sharply.

I reined in Zombie and the entire formation slowed as I leant down to hide my profile, waiting for the hammer to fall. Nothing, huh? Nice try, but I wasn't falling for that again. I waited for another thirty heartbeats and sweet, sweet vindication came in the form of a volley of arrows taking flight from our left. A trickle of power touched my eyes and my sight sharpened, gauging the number of shafts. A hundred, maybe? Not many more than that. The Gallowborne reacted professionally, falling in the testudo formation mere moments before the projectiles finished their arc. If they'd been mere arrows, that would have mostly nixed any notion of inflicted casualties. Unfortunately, on the way down trails of fire bloomed behind the arrows and they hit the shields with streams of flame. I had no room to manoeuvre, stuck inside the formation as I was, and I wasn't going to risk an arrow-catch while fighting bloody fae. I threw myself off Zombie the Second moments before a pair of arrows hit his neck and flank, detonating with burst of red and yellow flame. My mount died instantly, and I swore filthily in Taghreb. Those utter bastards.

Did these pricks even understand how much a good warhorse cost? Some of us actually had to pay for things, not just play pretend with a fucking illusory economy. They'd damaged him enough I probably wouldn't even be able to raise him from the dead: I still needed mostly intact muscled to make a corpse move, necromancy or not. Only a handful of my retinue died to the first volley, though I saw that the arrows punched through steel shields and detonated afterwards to burn even when they couldn't kill. Rising to my feet, I unsheathed my sword and ripped my heater shield from Zombie's falling corpse. A second volley was in the sky before we'd recovered from the surprise of the first and I winced in anticipation – I could see what they'd meant to do. First wave damaged the shields, second hit the unprotected soldiers. This was going to hurt. I hid my surprise when I saw the arrows fall in a half circle around us instead, though I grasped what they were actually doing the moment I saw the tall grass going up in flames. Sorcery drove the flames to complete the encirclement rather than burn aimlessly faster than I could say I really hate fighting mages. So they wanted us to stay penned up and die.

"GALLOWBORNE," I called out. "SHIELD WALL AND FOLLOW ME."

I strode to the wall of flames ahead, shield up, and let the frozen river of power that was my third aspect come to the fore. I wasn't using it – I'd not yet grasped it well enough for that – but just using the power was enough for my purposes. The fire stood three feet taller than me, but that hardly mattered: with a hiss I unleashed ice onto the flames, smothering them and carving a path ten men deep.

"Lion Devours Gazelle," a man's voice calmly stated ahead.

I charged through, the shield wall behind me, and saw silhouettes emerge from the grass even as a third volley flew at us. This one did not arc in the sky: it was shot straight forward, and though the impact was not as strong the bursting flames shot holes straight through my ranks. Pale blades like ivory were unsheathed in perfect silence as four dozen fae formed into two lines in front of me. The fae were tall and lovely, dark-haired and wearing a tabard marked with an oak over their silvery chain mail.

"Charge," I barked.

The longer before we closed in melee, the more they'd thin us out with arrows. The Gallowborne were but a step behind me as I ran, the sensation of over a hundred steel boots thumping the ground in unison sending a shiver down my spine. I felt hot breath against my neck, the Beast licking its chops hungrily. It was eager for blood, after the frustrations of the last month. Truth be told, so was I. The man ahead of me struck lightning-quick, fearless, but he was no Duke of Violent Squalls. Not even a deadwood soldier. I stepped around the blow and flicked my wrist, tearing through his neck between the helm and the mail. The face of the woman behind him was splashed with crimson but she did not flinch: she went for my neck without missing a beat. The flat of my blade touched hers, redirecting the blow, and my shield hit her in the stomach. She coughed blood and before she could react the pommel of my sword hit her in the eye – I felt the skull cave under it, but my boot stomped down on her throat and crushed it to be sure. In front of me, I saw nothing but grass. I turned and saw the same all along the line: my retinue's charge had been met for a moment, then the fae had disengaged without even attempting a proper melee, melting into the greenery.

"Oh shit," I realized.

The fourth volley killed at least twenty of the Gallowborne. They'd fallen out of formation when trying to force the fae into close range fighting. Ahead of us four dozen fae formed into two ranks, pale swords in hand. We'd been at this for perhaps a quarter hour and already almost a third of my retinue was dead or wounded.

"Shield wall," I ordered.

Lion Devours Gazelle, the unseen commander had called it. Piece by piece they eat us. The fae had perfectly grasped the weakness of my force, compared to his. We had few crossbows – a mere three lines – and no good line of sight to use it. Range was theirs, and the moment my crossbowmen revealed themselves they'd be eating a volley. Trying to get up close would just result in the same thing every time: a quick and fruitless melee followed by the Summer fae disengaging just before the archers fired.

Bleeding us one skirmish at a time, taking us on a merry chase until all that's left is a trail of corpses. By the size of the last volley and the number of swordsmen who'd faced us, I'd guess they weren't more than a hundred. We'd had double their numbers in hardened veterans when the steel came out, led by a Named. Another quarter hour of this and our numbers would be even. Another quarter hour after that and they'd outnumber us. There was nothing I could do about it save attempting to charge them by myself, and they'd just spread out to shoot at me from every direction while a handful of swordsmen kept me pinned.

"They beat us," I said, the words leaving a sour taste in my mouth.

Farrier was to my side, cheek burned red and an arrow wound on his shoulder, and I saw surprise flicker on his face.

"Countess," he said, "we can still–"

"The longer we're at this, the more soldiers we lose," I cut through. "Call the retreat."

I hadn't noticed in the heat of the fight, but they'd been drawing us further out. Towards the towers in the distance. A hundred is about the size for a heavy patrol. I'm not liking the odds there isn't an army waiting for us there, even if it's not a large one. If we went any further and they had reinforcements coming, we were as good as dead. They'd fire at us while we retreated and we'd take losses from that, but if I got stubborn here I was risking a wipe-out. I'd lost fights before. Been outmanoeuvred by Juniper, been beaten by Black's superior skills or crushed by Captain's overwhelming might. But never before had I been so harshly outclassed when it came to tactics, and I did not like the feeling one bit. So this was Summer. The season of war, I'd heard it called. I'd seen nothing like the people I was facing now in Winter, and the thought had me uneasy. These weren't warriors they were soldiers and soldiers fine enough to be the match of the Legions. We can't linger in Summer, I thought. We'll lose the entire army if we misstep even once. Farrier had barked hard enough that my men were already retreating in a semblance of good order, and I saw some of them were picking up the corpses of their comrades.

"Leave the bodies behind," I ordered, tone bitter.

"Countess, you can't possibly mean that," a lieutenant said, tone aghast.

"We can't afford to be slowed down," I said.

I watched the silhouetted of the fae in the distance, their swordsmen already dispersing into the tall grass. Getting ready for another volley already.

"We'll be back for them," I said, clenching my fist.

There wasn't much I could do right now, but there was one thing left. I reached for the power of Winter inside me, grasped as much as I could and poured it into my sword until the metal frosted. I kept taking more and more, until I felt my blood go from cold to freezing. Any further than that and it would turn to thick red slurry inside my veins. Gritting my teeth, I swung the blade ahead of me. Ice sprouted into wall ten feet high along the arc of the swing, even as exhaustion flooded me. I'd used too much tonight already and now my armour felt like an anvil on my back.

"Hurry," I said, raising my voice. "It won't slow them down for long."

By the time the fae ceased pursuit, there were barely a hundred members of the Galloworne left.

There would be a reckoning for this.

PingleBerry

Well. The Summer Court has officially joined the list of "to be fcked up"

danh3107

Hmm, man I dislike Fae. I thought I disliked the Winter Fae, but now I think I hate Summer more.

HiThere

Well, for myself this chapter has made me respect Summer. Previous encounters with summer didn't show much of their tactical side, but this encounter has convinced me there are proper soldiers among them and not just "have higher base power than Winter".

Dabba

Catherine's hipocracy is so mind-blowingly ridiculous. Im really starting to hate her

NerfContessa

First, it's hypocrisy as in being a hypocrite, not being Hypocrath, ergo a sworn doctor.

And second: what in this specific case makes you say That?

Juliet

Catherine's entire shtick so far is that she swings a bigger stick and abandons her scruples one step at a time.

She can bait hundreds of men like the Silver Spears into goblin fire, but hold a grudge for someone baiting her to charge into magical fire.

Even Hakram acknowledging he can't sleep with Torris like he used to because she's under his command now, while Cat slept with Kilian and excused it as Names getting to break rules.

Thief has already called her out on her hypocrisy, Catherine ends up proving her right – in a lot of ways, “you can't do against the empire” and then Cat proves her words were a lie, she might have needed a villain start, but if she had joined William like Thief suggested after branding his name...

Gunslinger

Damn she got her arse handed to her. If she was expecting a fae army why not go in guns a blazing with goblin explosives and such. Also how is she going to get to the diabolist?

1shot4living

Arcadia you say? A realm made of pure magic? Rumor has it goblin fire burns magic, but no one would be stupid enough to try that.... Right?

The Archdevil

Goblin fire burns magic, but can fire really be that effective against the Summer court

1shot4living

*lights match*

MarquisWhale

That might not be such a good idea.

If the Arcadia is a realm made entirely from magic, than the moment people from Creation step into it, wouldn't it stop being Arcadia? So either the premise is wrong, or something else is missing.

My guess would be that when people cross into Arcadia, they are disassembled and assembled again into magic. It could explain the uneasy feeling one gets when crossing. It would also explain why faes can't be killed in Arcadia, but can in Creation. In Arcadia, their existence is magical, and so the magic is simply cast again, while in Creation, they are built from...well, something not magic, and therefore die.

You could also use it to explain the passage of time. If you were to assume time does not flow in Arcadia, and assume in some places of Arcadia, the entire conversion takes less time than in others, let's say a day, you could say the only reason it took someone two days through Arcadia to get to somewhere is because it took one day in Creation to convert his body, no time for him to move through Arcadia, and then one day again for him to convert back.

Of course, since you are practically dead the moment conversion starts and only begin to live again when it's fully done, it would seem to you like you just passed through the gate. And seeing as time does not flow in Arcadia, you could spend what seems to be a year there, and still emerge two days after your crossing in Creation.

Of course, if one had bad luck to enter and exit in two places where it takes a year to convert, he could be but a few seconds in Arcadia and it wouldn't matter.

So if they really were all made out of magic, either goblinfire would eat all of them, or it simply wouldn't work against magic, since it has been reassembled. Otherwise you get a paradox bomb, a magic bomb that eats magic.

1shot4living

A magic bomb that eats magic sounds like the best thing since a Prince got headshot because he wasn't wearing his helmet, but I do agree with your assessment of Arcadia converting everything that passes through it into magic. Magic, the base code of the universe. This one at least.

Cpt. Obvious

A small correction. Fey that are simply "killed" in Creation apparently will still resurrect in Arcadia the next time their court is reset. This was explained in one of the extra chapters or in a Villainous interlude. Akua Sahelian mentioned it in a conversation with a captive fey. Her "solution" was to harness the energy making up the Fey's life and use it to power a ritual, and that way there would be nothing left to revive or reincarnate. We also learned that the magic the Fey consists of is identical to the magic Arcadia itself consists of.

Darkening

Guerrilla tactics, huh. Would've expected that more from winter than summer.

esryok

I feel like when Winter fought their level of coordination was just a touch higher than "everyone is doing their own thing, but all at the same time." Versus this skirmish, wherein Summer is very deliberate and working in a Juniper-esque "always select the correct tactic" manner.

stevenneiman

Winter doesn't fight on the battlefield, not well at least. Their fighting style is about deceiving their enemies and finding ways to weaken them before the battle starts. If they end up in a fair fight against Summer they die alone. Summer, on the other hand, is the season of open war. They might be arrogant when dealing with forces they can handle, but they also know exactly how to use tactics to deadly effect.

HandyCapped

Skirmishing with ranged and mobility superiorities, not guerrilla tactics. Right up their alley.

And she's not offended that they're attacking her she's offended that they just killed over half (more than a hundred) of her personal guard. The men and women she trained personally, the ones she trusts to guard her back, the soldiers she spends the most time with out of all the Fifteenth.

And they did it with such contemptuous ease that they forced The Squire and her forces to retreat without contest and without even retrieving their bodies.

This is the first and only time that Cat has ever lost completely and utterly. She achieved none of her goals, lost a significant number of troops she personally cared about, was forced to flee the field, inflicted no meaningful cost to the enemy, and by ceding the initiative and falling back like she has she's given Summer the time to marshal and respond.

No positive outcomes, lots of negative consequences. The first and only time in this entire series that the protagonist has faced a situation which is 100% a loss in almost every conceivable way.

The entire plan to strike Summer and Diabolist has just come to a screeching halt, and that has to burn.

Chapter 25: Intent

"Trust the Heavens but tie your horse."
– Callowan proverb

It was past dawn when the last soldier crossed the gate.

As soon as Robber stepped foot in Arcadia I had him prepare his cohort for scouting, but held off on sending him until Marshal Ranker's legion was through. A few quiet sentences with her and moments later a thousand goblins melted into the countryside, with warnings about fae patrols and the kind of tactics they'd deployed so far. I had a pavilion mounted for me half a mile away from the gate, surrounded by Nauk's two thousand, and settled on a folding chair while my few mages tended to the injuries of the surviving members of my retinue. I could have gone to sleep, but I still was too angry to rest and unwilling to miss anything. Instead I sat chewing on my mistake with a wineskin in hand as the reports began filtering in. There was not a soul within a mile of the gate, the scouts said. Neither was there any sign of the bodies I'd left behind, and even the places I'd skirmished at were now pristine: no sign of fire or fighting. Half a bell later one of Ranker's officers reported her line had found a road to the west that looked like it was leading to the towers in the distance.

When the sun finally rose over the horizon, it found me still in the pavilion. There'd been one last development, not too long ago: Robber's cohort had caught a fae close to the road, when confirming it led to the towers. Said towers, the report also elaborated, were actually a fortress. One whose walls were now manned. They knew we were coming. I sent word to the Marshal and the Duchess to join me the moment the hamstrung fairy was brought into camp, Hakram hovering behind me. He felt guilty about not having been with me when I'd run into trouble, as if I hadn't been the one to order him to say in Creation to supervise.

"Would have made no difference if you were there," I said.

"You don't know that," he gravelled.

"It... this wasn't about power, Hakram," I said. "I alone would have been able to cut down a third of them, if they'd fought the way I wanted them to. The Gallowborne would have wiped them out if it had been a melee. They've killed harder things than lesser fae. We fought them badly – I fought them badly, and I lost."

"You did as well as you could," he said.

"They're not invincible," I told him, irritated at the attempt at comfort. "They picked their ground, their time and the lay of the engagement. We just need to start thinking of them as a proper army instead of just a troupe of fairies, because they're sure as Hells fighting like one."

"Well said," Duchess Kegan stated, her approval a tad condescending.

The ruler of the Deoraithe was not growing on me, it had to be said. I wanted to like her, I really did, but she was like the human version of a stone in your boot. Ranker brushed past her rudely, to the highborn's irritation, and I was careful not to show amusement. I'd gotten this far by pretending to be above the bickering, taking sides would be surrendering what little advantage I had.

"Your boy caught one of them, then," the Marshal said, gingerly climbing atop a folding chair and helping herself to my wine.

She sniffed at the nozzle, hairless brow rising.

"Vale summer wine? Fancy."

She drank anyway, not that it would do much for her. Goblins were better at processing liquor and poison than either orcs or humans.

"Robber's good at finding things," I said, letting my voice carry enough that said Special Tribune would hear it from behind the pavilion flap where he was currently lurking.

"Stabbing them too," my murderous minion contributed with a grin as two other legionaries from his cohort dragged a fae heavily bruised and missing an arm.

Male, this one. More lightly armoured than the ones I'd run into, but his leather armour bore the same symbol I'd seen on the tabard of the patrol: a green oak. His remaining hand and feet were bound tightly, leaving him unable to do anything but kneel at an uncomfortable angle.

"I won't need you for the interrogation," I told Robber.

The goblin pouted, which on his face looked positively horrifying. Like a fish trying the same, but with needle-like teeth peeking through.

"Can I watch at least?" he wheedled.

"Scram," I said, and he read the mood correctly.

He swaggered away without pushing it, arms around the shoulders of his two cohorts, and I refrained from sighing at the sight. There were witnesses. The fae was gagged, so I rose to my feet to force down the cloth.

"Whose lands are we in?" I asked.

The soldier spat on my boot.

"Not the answer I was looking for," I said.

"Call back the boy," Ranker shrugged. "And send for knives."

"Torture will take time," the Duchess frowned.

"Better to move delayed than move blind," the Marshal said.

Hakram cleared his throat, drawing their attention. I glanced at him.

"You forget you have a Named leading you," the orc said.

Ah. Well, I'd never used it on fae before but considering how they were bound to stories it might actually work better than on mortals.

"Answer my questions," I Spoke.

He twitched, fighting against the order, but eventually stilled.

"Whose lands are we in?" I repeated.

"The Count of Olden Oak," the fae said.

"How many soldiers do you have?" Duchess Kegan asked.

The fae smiled sardonically and said nothing. Ah, the wording. I asked him the question as Ranker sent the tan woman a mocking look.

"Two thousand," he said through gritted teeth.

"Any other nobles here?" I asked.

"The Baron of Dawning Day."

I frowned. That was two titled fae, which struck me as too many for the middle of nowhere. Weren't most of the nobles out with the army of Summer?

"Ask him where in Arcadia we are," Ranker said, thoughts going along the same line.

"The border marches," the fae replied when I did.

The two older women exchanged looks.

"If we march a sennight to the north, what will we find?" I asked.

That was, after all, about where I felt I'd be able to make a gate out. Let it not be the city of Summer, let it not be –

"The lands of the Princess of High Noon."

I needed to start being more careful about what I wished for, I decided. I glanced at the other commanders of the army, silently asking if they had any other questions. Neither did. I shot Hakram a look, and without any need for words he stepped forward and casually snapped the prisoner's neck.

"Be a dear and drag that outside, would you?" I said.

He snorted in amusement, but obeyed.

"So we need to march deeper into Summer," Ranker said, sharp eyes on me.

"And quickly," I grunted. "They'll consider this an invasion, there's a good chance they'll recall their armies from Creation to drive us out."

"Then the fortress had to be taken," Duchess Kegan said. "We can't leave two thousand soldiers at our back, not with the amount of supplies we carry."

"Agreed," I said. "Reports said it was a castle, curtain walls at least forty feet high. Legion standard?"

The last two words were spoken looking at the Marshal, who nodded pensively.

"Mages around the siege weapons, to ward from their magics," she added. "Securing replacements out here would be difficult."

"We've no notion of how long it would take to break down fae walls with mortal trebuchets," Duchess Kegan said disapprovingly.

"I understand time is an issue, Duchess," I said impatiently, "but I'm the only one here who's tangled with them. We rush those walls and we'll lose thousands, likely to no gain."

"If you use legionaries, yes," she said. "The Watch will take the walls and open the gates. Be ready to invest the fortress and deal with the nobles."

I raised an eyebrow.

"You didn't bring any ladders," I pointed out. "Or any siege fixtures at all, for that matter."

She smiled thinly.

"There will be no need for them," she said.

I glanced at Ranker, who chuckled.

"At worst there's fewer Deoraithe in existence," she said, tone making it clear she believed this to be no great loss.

I eventually nodded. If nothing else, I'd get to have a look at why so much fuss was always made about the Watch.

"We march, then," I said.

Nauk's two thousand took point. There screens of goblins to the side in case any surprises had been laid out for us, but our advance went unchallenged until we came in sight of the fortress. It was an impressive piece of work, compared to a mortal castle, but compared to the likes of Skade it was rather mundane. Pale walls encircled four towers, whose only hint of sorcery was the way they were intertwined in a way that evoked roots. Glittering soldiers in the same silvery chain mail and tabard as the patrol stood atop the rampart, armed with bows and swords. There weren't two thousand up there, by my estimation – maybe half that – which meant they'd kept reserves. The large oaken gate opened when Nauk's legionaries ceased marching well out of bow range, a single mounted man riding out even as I frowned. Behind me the allied army spread, the Deoraithe host right behind while the two legions took the wings. I didn't even need to focus to feel the power wafting from the rider, or notice it wasn't in the league of the Winter counts I'd encountered. The baron the prisoner had mentioned? Hakram at my side, we watched the fae caracole atop his white steed and raise his lance in a mocking salute.

"You have entered the lands of Summer Eternal, invaders," he called out. "Only death awaits you here."

I heard someone striding towards me, Nauk's legionaries parting for them. I wouldn't be taking the Gallowborne with me today, not after the losses they'd incurred. Farrier had protested but his own shoulder was only held together by mage healing, and if it got broken again within a fortnight he'd be crippled for life.

"A champion," Duchess Kegan said, occupying the side of me Adjutant didn't. "How quaint."

I'd read enough about Deoraithe to know what they thought about this kind of posturing in matters of war. I didn't answer, waiting for the armies to reach their assigned positions as the fae continued yelling.

"Are all of you cowards?" the rider called out. "Will not a single of you meet this Baron of Dawning Day on the field to redeem your honour?"

"He's in crossbow range," Adjutant said. "Shall we give him a princely answer?"

I chewed over that.

"I don't trust our shots to put him down," I finally said.

"I have the finest bowmen in Calernia under my command," the Duchess said.

"Better to kill him now, so he's not on the walls to make trouble for your people," I said. "Hakram. Can you do it?"

The orc looked at the baron for a long moment.

"Shouldn't be too much trouble," he said.

"Then shut the bastard up," I ordered.

He laughed, clapping my shoulder before striding away. I felt the Duchess' gaze on me.

"A princely answer," she repeated. "Is is true, then. You had the Exiled Prince shot instead of duelling him."

"If I personally killed everyone in my way I'd never have time for anything else," I lightly replied.

She let out a sound that could be construed as amused.

"Perhaps there is some of the blood in you," she conceded.

That would have been slightly more touching if she hadn't just spent the better part of a month being a pain in my arse. If she wanted to rope me in using my Deoraithe heritage she was barking up the wrong tree, regardless. I knew nothing about my parents and to be frank I wasn't particularly curious. Whoever they'd been, they had nothing to do with the person I was now. Still, the woman did have twenty thousand soldiers under her command and they wouldn't be going anywhere after the scuffle against Akua was over. Needlessly antagonizing her would be foolish.

"All I've ever known of Daoine was through books," I said. "Oh, and one of your relatives that put an arrow in me that one time."

"You spared her," the Duchess said. "That did not go unnoticed."

Truth be told that had more to do with Black's orders than any notion of mine, but I saw no need to tell her that. That aside, wonder of wonders: for once my reputation for leaving a trail of corpses in my wake was coming in useful. People were starting to assume that whenever I didn't kill someone I did it on purpose.

"She's a talented archer," I said. "An inch to the side and it would have cleaved my spine. It'd be a shame to waste that kind of talent."

"High praise," Kegan said. "Perhaps she will live up to it today."

I raised an eyebrow.

"She's here?"

"She finished her oaths last year," the Duchess said. "The entire Watch was mobilized to put down the madwoman in the south. An unexpected turn of events, that Daoine would share an enemy with you, but not entirely unwelcome."

Well now, that was positively friendly. I'd have to be a special kind of idiot for that sudden thawing of tone not to worry me. Especially since it was happening the first time we were having a conversation out of Marshal Ranker's earshot, surrounded only by soldiers known to be loyal to me. The picture that was painting was very, very dangerous. I clenched my fingers and unclenched them. I could try to probe her intentions and beat around the bush, but that kind of game wasn't my specialty. I could cope with it in small doses, but I wasn't betting on getting the upper hand against a woman who'd ruled a duchy for several decades. Fuck it. It was sad to admit, but I had more burnt city incidents that diplomatic victories under my belt.

"You're talking a lot more sweetly than usual today," I bluntly said.

"There will be an after the war," Duchess Kegan said. "It is not too early to begin considering it."

"In my experience, people who talk that vague are tiptoeing about treason," I noted.

Her face showed no reaction. Why was everyone trying to negotiate with me so good at keeping their thoughts hidden?

"Your actions of late might be considered that," the Duchess said. "Dissolving the Ruling Council. Naming a former rebel Governess-General of Callow. Replacing every Praesi governor with a Callowan, save for one."

Denier, that. The man under Ranker's thumb had never given me an excuse so I'd had to settle for waiting out his term. I could see what she was hinting at, and I needed to shut down that avenue right now if I didn't want a third godsdamned civil war in a row to erupt the moment Diabolist's head ended up on a pike.

"Callow will stay under the Tower," I frankly replied. "That isn't up for debate. The nature of that relationship, however, will be renegotiated. I have backing in this."

The older woman's eyes narrowed to slits.

"Does the Carrion Lord mean to depose the Empress?" she asked, finally discarding the pretences.

"No," I replied, about as sure of this as I could be with someone like my teacher.

"Interesting days ahead," the Duchess finally said.

"Procer is coming," I said. "Not this year, I don't think, but within the decade."

"Offers were made, during the rebellion," Kegan acknowledged.

I'd always suspected, to be honest, but it was still an upset to have that suspicion confirmed. While I'd been fighting a war with swords against the Lone Swordsman, there'd been another war entirely going on behind the scenes. I was only now beginning to grasp the form of it, and what I learned was chilling.

"Let me guess," I said. "Independence and an alliance?"

"As well as a princess for my grandson, when they come of age," she replied.

"But you didn't bite," I said.

"Grudges incurred after the Third Crusade have yet to be settled," the Duchess said, tone harsh.

I frowned. The Deoraithe held on to slights like a drowning man to driftwood, but that still felt like too weak a reason. It wasn't like Praes hadn't taken regular runs at the Wall for over a thousand years. Hells, Dread Empress Triumphant had infamously crucified a King of Daoine for not bowing low enough.

"And?" I probed.

She hesitated, then continued.

"The Watch has guarded the Wall for a long time, Duchess Foundling, but that is not what it is meant for," she replied. "The border being quiet allows us to tend to an older duty."

There was fervour in her voice, by the time she finished speaking. The Deoraithe hate the elves. That was no great mystery. Perhaps not common knowledge, but any book about Daoine's history made a point of mentioning it – the Deoraithe had once lived in what was now the Golden Bloom before being driven out of it. Warlock had once theorized in front of me that the Watch was meant to imitate the strange abilities elves gained as they grew old, gaining through sorcery what the others were born to. Was that what she meant? That without the orcs raiding west Daoine could turn its attention to the elves?

"A conversation to finish at another time," Kegan said. "The duel you ordered is coming."

The entire conversation hadn't taken long, but in that span Hakram had made his way through Nauk's legionaries. My Adjutant had always been tall even for an orc, and I was almost certain he'd grown taller since coming into his Name. Not as broad-shouldered as Nauk or stout as Juniper, but he carried himself with a presence nowadays that had an almost physical weight to it. He'd grown into his power and it showed. Hakram no longer used the sword and shield that had been his lot as a legionary: first he'd traded the sword for an axe, then the shield for another axe in the wake of our fights with the fae. He'd told me that if we were going to keep fighting creatures that could cut through steel like parchment he'd rather carry a second blade than dead weight. The weapon the orc took in hand as he strode onto the field was more a long and large hatchet than a battle axe in a conventional sense, goblin steel forged into a haft and head he still twirled like it weighed nothing. The Baron of Dawning Day ceased his strutting atop a horse when a challenger appeared, reining in his horse and guiding it to face Adjutant.

The legionaries in the first ranks began stomping their feet and it spread like fire among the Fifteenth, goblins and orcs and men of every stripe. The ground shook under two thousand steel-shod boots, and to that harsh meter voices rose to match.

"Dead the hand and dead the man,
Sharp the blade and sharp the fang
For no matter how tall they stand
When iron rests we see them hang."

Hakram's stride went unbroken as he called out to the fae, his words drowned out by the voices and beat as to the sides of the host the other Legions of Terror joined their boots to the song. Ten thousand souls stomping as my legionaries sang their eerie anthem. The Baron of Dawning Day's lance descended and without any further taunts he charged.

"Lord or priest or knight in pale
On burning hill or dawning vale
The scale settles it all the same:
Red and broken lies the name."

Adjutant did not move, calmly awaiting the charge. My heartbeat quickened at the sight, but I trusted in him. Given his size and strength, the natural comparison among the Calamities for my right hand was Captain. I'd fought them both, though, and knew that was a mistake. Sabah was strength and swiftness unrelenting, more hurricane than woman when moved to violence. Hakram... Hakram fought like Black. Even more than I did. Patient and measured and ruthlessly brutal in motion. The lance shone brightly under the sun, but still the orc did not move. Only when the mass of muscle and steel was teen strides away from him did his hand whip out: the axe spun, blade sinking through steel plate between the eyes of the Baron's charger.

"Dead the hand and dead the man,
Sharp the blade and sharp the fang
For no matter how tall they stand
When iron rests we see them hang."

The white horse died and momentum carried it in a messy slide across the grass as the Baron deftly leapt off it and landed like a cat on the ground. Adjutant moved three steps to the side, taking his second axe in hand as the dead horse tumbled just past him. Casting his lance aside, the Baron of Dawning Day unsheathed a sword bright as the morning he was titled after. The orc awaited him patiently, unmoved by the sight. In the blink of an eye the fae was on him, sword leaving trails of light behind every swing as he furiously tried to take his opponent's life. Calmly giving ground, Hakram avoided a cleave turned into a thrust a little too shallowly: the green skin of his cheek parted under fae steel, leaving a blackened mark like it had been burnt. The Baron avoided the haft of the axe with mocking ease, but it was a distraction: Adjutant's fist caught him in the chin. Bone broke, for an orc's strike was no small thing and this orc had strength beyond mortal bounds. Spitting teeth, the fae snarled furiously and harsh light bloomed in front of him. I sucked in a breath: even from where I stood I could feel the heat of it, and so close it would have been impossible for Hakram to dodge it.

"Queen or king or Heaven's get Never unpaid goes their debt
Learn bitter with the last breath
The left hand gives only death."

When the light died out, Adjutant's smoking frame towered three feet back from where'd he'd been. He was steaming like cooked meat but unharmed. I could still feel the wisps of his Name on him, the remnants of the aspect he'd called on: Stand. He'd withstood the strike of a demon using it, once. Fae sorcery was lesser in comparison. I saw his axe had been turned to blackened scraps by the Baron's power, though, and felt a sharp surge of fear. The sound of his laughter dispersed it. He'd been driven back to the horse's side by the impact, and deftly he claimed back the axe he'd left in the mount's head. He didn't close the distance again, though, which I found strange. Though visibly shaken by the way his sorcery had failed to quell his opponent, the Baron immediately returned on the offensive. Light flared around the blade, and only then did I understand Adjutant's intent. The orc's legs lowered, the muscles of his arm flexed and his skeletal hand dug into the horse's flesh: with a loud grunt, he seized the entire corpse like a mace and smashed it into the charging fae. The Baron hastily tried to cut through the flesh, but only succeeded in parting the belly: the mass still ploughed him downwards like a fragile doll. The carcass bubbled and burst in a shower of gore as the fae emerged, panting, but there was no recovering from his misstep. The crescent blade of the axe caught him in the neck, cleaving to the spine. The orc booted his stomach to wrench the steel out, leaving him twitching in the gore, then calmly cleaved straight into his skull.

"Dead the hand and dead the man,
Sharp the blade and sharp the fang
For no matter how tall they stand
When iron rests we see them hang."

Dead. And now, just now, when the sight of it was still fresh in the eyes of the fae above? That was the moment to strike. Even as thousands of feet thundered in approval and Hakram's blood-red axe rose to the sky, I drew Duchess Kegan's attention.

"Now," I said. "Send them in now."

The older woman nodded slowly, still troubled by what she'd just seen, and drew a red scarf from a pouch on her side before holding it up. Without a sound, two thousand men and women of the Watch broke into a perfect run. Like the song had said, there were scales to settle.

And like the song had said, Summer would lie red and broken for it.

*mgmtheo*

The song is perfect, and I'm very excited to see Daoine's contribution to Cat's rise to power.

*wirelessgrapes*

Hot damn, Hakram's a fucking *orc*

samshadar

Considering he is the first orc to bear a name in a thousand years, he is *the fucking orc* 😊

pyrohawk21

Have I yet mentioned that I LOVE this story?

Because seriously, I really, REALLY do. I can not wait for it to continue. In fact, I'm probably going to be really sad when you've finally written the last book of Catherine's story.

jor

HAKRAAAAAAAAAAMMMMMMMMM!!!!!!!!!!!!

Naeddyr

What a baronous reply.

Josh

I've been catching up, really interesting story. I'm curious about why we haven't seen Killian yet. I hope Cat hasn't made an oversight that will bite her in the ass.

Letouriste

Killian is with the fifteen, marching toward liesse among the others

Josh

Ah, I must have missed that. Convenient though, do we know which side of the fey her ancestry comes from? Being her consort might be significant somehow.

greatwyrmgold

The Courts seem to rotate identities with the seasons, like how the northern and southern hemispheres change seasons yet always remain opposed. The question might not be winter or summer, but... I dunno, A or B? North and South sound a little silly.

Letouriste

She is red haired so summer for sure;)

Cpt. Obvious

As her hair tend to look like fire when she overextend Summer is probably correct, but it could also be Autumn. Lots of red in the leaves in the autumn.

danh3107

Perfect, PERFECT

I'm not sure if you imagined the tune and rhythm when you wrote that song, but I could /feel/ it in my bones.

Spinner335

Does anyone else think the song helped Harky win because songs are basically stories and they were singing about how the deadhand will see his enemies dead and with how connected the fae are to stories I feel it helped.

Matthew

That would be interesting if they can tell their own stories in Arcadia.

If they can get the Summer story to be.. "Summer diverts the Winter armies of abomination to turn on their compatriot, the diabolist, and thus stops the invasion," that's a win for Cat.

amc

this ^

stevenneiman

They already at least hijacked a story to get the Duke of Violent Squalls thing to work out, so I wouldn't be surprised if they can mess with the story of Summer, especially give the way they just drowned out their old story about defeating Evil invaders with one about Deadhand being badass.

Metalshop

It might have been helpful even in Creation. Adjutant is a new name, which seems like it means that Hakram's actions and circumstances will shape how it interacts with the world and Fate. Given that battle poems have already been established as a quasi-lost orcish art, it makes sense that the first Orcish Name in centuries would benefit from an army doing it for him.

nineran

Plus, he started this trend while reciting poetry the last time we saw him demolish an enemy in single combat (Extra Chapter > Conspiracy II). It was only about 80 legionnaires who saw him, but stories grow. He's building his story from the ashes of who the orcs were.

I also think that Sabah's story ... makes it clear that there is no more scope for the Warlord name. She ate it, for lack of a better word.

Shequi

It strikes me that pretty much every comment that Cat makes about Megan is something that most other people would say about her.

Shequi

Kegan, rather. Damn auto-correct.

Sinjako

I'm checking this site waaay too often.

nick012000

So, taking a bit from Bleach, are we, ErraticErrata?

Ceros never kill anyone, after all. They just leave them a little scuffed and smoking. 😊

Letouriste

Nothing to do with bleach:/

Btw, who is ceros? A last arc character? I stopped reading at some point in the arc, i lost interest

nick012000

Ceros are the energy blasts that Hollows use in Bleach, which are very similar to the energy blast that the Summer Fae uses in this chapter.

Thanks, I had forgotten it

Another song! Unfortunately not on the same level of the:

"The knights will get the glory
The king will keep his throne
We won't be in the story
Our names will not be known

So pick up your sword, boy
Here they come again
And down here in the mud,

The dead hand song reminds me of Kipling's "But Iron, cold Iron is the master of them all".
It is good to have songs but you can improve.

vietnamabc

Hmm so what is the differences between fae and elves? I imagine Daoine send the Watch to fight fae to train them before fighting elves.

Letouriste

fae lives in Arcadia and are made of magic or something like that.they gain power by stories,adding artificially weight to their being.

Elves are creatures of Creation and gain power by aging.they are also cowards and racists.the fae don't make a distinction between a rock,a tree and a sentient being.they accept only Named.

Letouriste

I mean the elves of golden bloom,not the others^^
I can be wrong.we don't know much on them

Darkening

WB mentioned that the other elves *aren't* racists, and these elves broke off because they were disgusted by the interbreeding and the like.

Nastybarsteward

I'm starting to wander if Hakram is to become *Warlord*...

Gunslinger

Transitioning into Warlord would indeed be fucking epic. But somehow I feel like Warlord would not be the name of someone who serves another. And I don't see Hakram ever leaving Cat,

stevenneiman

Honestly, Adjutant doesn't sound like a transitional Name to me. In some ways, he seems to have more raw power than Cat, and it doesn't seem like he's building up to anything the way Cat is. Heck, he had mundane versions of most of his Name powers from the moment he joined Cat.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

What makes you think Hakram would be a good Warlord anyway? His personality and his Role are both massively unsuited to be Warlord, and I'm pretty sure he wouldn't want to have that Name anyway. It wouldn't advance any of his goals or agendas, so what's the point? Besides being an excuse for disgusting fanboy (or girl) squeeing and gushing.

Nastybarsteward

As all of Cat's Named so far are totally different Names (although some filling similar roles) than Black's retinue, with Adjutant being a completely new Name altogether, maybe I should just stop guessing. 🤔

Cpt. Obvious

Some of the names are transitional, such as Squire which usually transitions into a Knightley name, or Apprentice that can transition into Warlock. So we know that two of the five can transition into the Names of Calamities. I also think that Archer is a Name that can transition into Ranger, but that would require that Hye is killed or that she somehow abandons the name first. And good luck with the first option.

M

Hmm. Hakram getting The Black Knight? I don't see why that wouldn't be possible.

Gunslinger

I now get (maybe) why Diabolist thanked Cat when the summer fae withdrew. That must have been about the time Cat invaded.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Thought that was obvious...

Dianna

So has anyone wondered what kind of Names we would have in our world?

Don't know why, but the one we came up with was Cashier. Their Aspects: Smile, the ability to smile through anything. Grind, the ability to do insane amounts of work no matter their physical state is not catatonic. Survive, they can come out unscathed from the most severe physical and mental abuse.

Truly, the Cashier is a Hero who fights long and hard to keep the world together.

Metalshop

Freaking. Amazing.

arancaytar

I see Cat is not the only one who likes to use mounts as blunt weapons.

Letouriste

Btw, how many gallowborne she had before the skirmish? 150? 200?

erraticerrata

A full cohort, which means two hundred men. She effectively lost over half her personal guard in that first skirmish, if you include the wounded.

Letouriste

Thank you:)

edrey

well, hakran's name is subordinate of cat's and hers is transitional, so he could change name too, right?
the elves should appear soon too, the summary said the forever king was pondering war, and the best moment is now, i hope ranger show herself soon, all overpowered people showing up other thing is that the story cat use to kill the duke said a orphan, adopted and trained by a prince of summer, kills his father, a prince of winter, become prince then kills his other father by orders of the king, so cat had the title, the order and taking the place of sulia in skade make the relationship so if cat could steal sulia power too somehow she could take by surprise the two kings, not too mention using the story of sword in the stone to become queen of arcadia, procer would really have problems with that, elves or not right?

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Wait, why are they invading the castle now? They just beat the fae champion, which stood in for the full-scale battle, right? If not, what the hell is the point of dueling a champion in the first place, if there are no stakes at all, and literally nothing is on the line (besides the lives of the participants)? What the hell is the point of the fae sending one out? None of this makes any sense.

Unless, maybe it's not supposed to make sense. Maybe it's intended to show just how badly the fae are enslaved to their customs (their cultural story).

I expected Cat's wording of her Command to "answer my questions" was going to be a problem, because she didn't specify *true* answers. I suppose it still could be, they haven't won the castle yet.

I had a fridge moment thinking about a few chapters ago, in the run-up to Squire's duel with the winter noble. It's nice that she's harnessed the power of the Story, but she's half-assing it, to her own detriment. I mean, what are the limits to that power? Could she have had Hakram Find a story where the long-lost daughter had such fighting prowess that she won "without ne'er a scratch on her form" or something? Why not try it?

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Or, maybe she finds a story where in his last breath, the Duke of Violent Squalls bestows upon her his entire fortune. Does he actually need to possess something in order to give it away, or can the Story create things into existence? If she can say "I want your ring, and I want to always have had it" and get away with it, I don't think my ideas are unreasonable.

HJPEV would be sickened by this lost potential! It's too bad Masego doesn't have the right personality to teach Squire the scientific method.

RandomFan

In the case of the story- I don't think it's that usable. Yeah, stories can exist and implausible things can happen, but you don't have perfect control over which story you're in. As long as your theoretical story runs the same basic path as the one she actually used, there's no way to control which one it ends on.

Plus, a more common story is probably more potent, and therefore worth using despite the flaws or downsides of not using the obscure variant. Yeah, that one exists, but it's going to be a tight squeeze to hit those rails in specific.

The fae might be bound to stories, but there are enough of those that at least some have will- free will, even. They can't go off the rails, but they can try to control which track the story goes along. As long as her version existed, I am almost certain that your proposed version would be impractical to ensure through any means other than actually being that competent, or a distinctive lie unique to that work. It's only when there's no story out that they're inevitably doomed- I think the rest of the time it's just "trying to use their power to tilt the narrative." In other words, I think Catherine could have won that fight, but the Catherine at the start of the series would still be doomed even with the deck stacking. After all, the orphan killing her own father isn't the only story on the table.

I think HJPEV would get one of those reminders that if the system were this simple to game, it would already be being gamed- that you can't break it in a day. Much like his batty experiments in the original work, only much more deadly and with much less potential for safe testing. That's just a prediction, though.

Dumdum

I commented earlier saying that trust the heaven's but tie your horse was an actual Muslim saying. Why did that comment fail moderation? What was so unacceptable about it? This is ticking me off more than it should probably because I'm tipsy, which I'm only mentioning so it sounds like I'm less of a Muslim so this reply has more of a chance of passing moderation. You see where I am going with this...

Morgenstern

Why moderation? Have you considered that it might just be a technical mistake that your post failed? I had that happen to one of mine before (just as I did the opposite – one of mine being doubled, somehow).. it happens.

Morgenstern

Posts normally pop up INSTANTLY here, which means there IS NO moderation...

Morgenstern

No “your post is awaiting moderation” popup usually means there simply is none. Unless a post is up for some time to then get deleted *afterwards*, which would be obvious, of course. So what happened? Post not popping up or your post getting deleted? The former means you simply had a technical problem during the attempt at posting...

Chapter 26: Advance

“You’d be surprised at the breadth of things that can be powered by the souls of the innocent. Fortresses, swords, my favourite chandelier.”

– Dread Empress Malevolent II

Calling how they moved a formation would have been inaccurate.

A tide, maybe, or wisp of fog. The grey-brown cloaks fluttered behind them as the Watch charged towards the fortress, the fae only recovering from the sight of my right hand slaughtering their champion when the Deoraithe were mere feet away from the base of the rampart. A volley of flame-touched arrows bloomed, but it was like trying to catch smoke in your hand: the flames touched only the ground and the Watch began its ascent. Duchess Kegan had said that they wouldn’t need ladders, and now I saw why. Every soldier took out a pair of steel stakes and I watched as the first to move forward leapt up before ramming his first stake into the stone. Using it as support, he threw himself up and bit into stone with his other stake. A flick of the wrist got the first stake out of the stone, and then he hoisted himself up again. Twenty feet up the wall, in the blink of an eye. Merciless Gods, I thought. I might have been able to do that, but one of my soldiers? Suddenly Daoine's dream of taking the fight to the elves seemed more than an elaborate ritual suicide.

The fae did not lose their composure, continuing to pour down arrows. At my side Duchess Kegan raised her hand again, a black scarf in hand. The three thousand remaining soldiers of the Watch, longbows already strung, released a volley of their own. The arc was perfect, almost pleasurable to watch, at though the projectiles were mere steel they scythed through the Summer fairies who'd been careless enough to leave the protection of the crenels. A burning log was tossed over the rampart but the Deoraithe did not miss a beat. Those allowed room by the angle pressed themselves against the stone and let it pass them by, and a woman whose chest would have been caved in instead leapt atop the log, using it to leap again upwards and resume climbing with her stakes. And Grem One-Eye beat them, I thought. When they were defending their own damned wall. I'd always thought that in a few years after she was seasoned Juniper would be the best tactician on Calernia, bar none, but what I saw was forcing me to reconsider. It was one thing to beat devils, another to crush this.

Less than eighty heartbeats after they'd begun moving, just after another volley shot by the Watch who'd stayed behind forced the fae to take cover, the first Deoraithe landed on top of the wall. The fighting then was not so one-sided: Kegan's monsters were quicker and stronger than humans had any right to be, but so were the fae. Longsword met longsword as a dozen footholds formed on the rampart, but the Watch had not been deployed to take the wall. As soon as the last Deoraithe made it up, the clusters moved again and disappeared into the fortress. Headed for the gate, no doubt. My turn. Nauk's men made way for me as I marched to the front of the two thousand legionaries of the Fifteenth, eyes on the still-closed gates. Adjutant joined me moments later, armour blackened by the sorcery of the baron he'd put down.

"They're impressive," the orc gravelled. "Maybe the finest soldiers on Calernia, pound for pound."

I hummed, not disagreeing. Now that the initial shock at their performance had waned, though, I felt that I was missing something. Only a quarter of Duchess Kegan's army was made up by the Watch. Why, if they were so effective? If she had twenty thousand of them the Wall would never have fallen during the Conquest. Were there requirements to being able to become part of the Watch? It couldn't be that they were all mages. Deoraithe weren't known to birth a lot of those, and no one had five thousand mages to field save for Praes – who'd bred those numbers up over millennia – and perhaps Procer, by sheer dint of its population's size.

"Resource investment," I murmured.

Hakram raised a brow.

"Legion officers and mages take half a decade to train properly," I said. "The Empire can bear that because it's rich and its population large. Daoine is a duchy, not a kingdom. They might not have the means to support too many of those – that kind of power can't come without a material cost."

Praesi were wealthy beyond comprehension and cheated with blood sacrifices besides, otherwise raising even a single flying fortress would beggar the Tower for half a decade. Deoraithe didn't have that shortcut available, though. Them grabbing people to sacrifice, even if they kept it strictly in-house, would have been noticed eventually.

"Every time one of them dies a small fortune goes up in smoke," Hakram grasped, brow creasing. "They do have the population to field a larger army than twenty thousand. A choice was made."

"Quality over quantity," I said. "They began treading that path long before the Reforms took Praes down the same road."

Duchess Kegan's hand, then, was not as strong as she had been pretending. How many years would it take to replace any casualty incurred by the Watch? She might be able to afford that in times of peace, but if she ever warred against the Empire her treasury would be bleeding out from a dozen different unavoidable expenses. If I could realize this at a glance, I had a hard time believing that Malicia and Black could not. Was that why they'd never acted like they considered Daoine a real threat? Something to keep in mind, when I next spoke with the duchess. It was not long after we finished speaking that the gates began moving, a dozen silhouettes on each side pushing the massive copper things open. In front of them the rest of the Watch had clustered together in a tight formation, and the moment the way was clear they began a smooth and almost leisurely retreat. I unsheathed my sword, raising the blade.

"FIFTEENTH," I screamed. "ADVANCE!"

The nut had been cracked open. Now the butcher's work could begin. The ranks behind were four hundred broad, following behind just short of a run as Hakram and I took point. The retreating Deoraithe split around us, a few of them ceasing their retreat just long enough to shoot arrows at fae trying to close the gates before we arrived. Fifty feet, I gauged. The soldiers of Summer behind the gate hurriedly sent a volley at the Fifteenth, the same kind of chest-height shots that had torn through the Gallowborne. This wasn't my retinue, though. It was a full jesha of two thousand, half the forces making up a regular Legion of Terror. These men had been trained to deal with mages, and without missing a beat the mage lines within the Fifteenth returned fire. A wave of fireballs flew, tailored for size instead of strength or speed: the spells taught in the War College were not the most powerful or the most effective. They were the most flexible, the formula easy to adjust for the situation. Every mage cast, and when the large balls of flame met the arrows a curtain of flame flickered across the grounds. Not a single projectile made it through. Heat licking at my face, I strode through the already-fading fire. Twenty feet.

"Been a while since we were in a scrap side-by-side," I said.

"Liesse, I think," Hakram mused. "Learned a few things since then."

"So have I," I said. "Try to keep up."

There were maybe ten feet between me and the fae when I dashed forward, sinking into my Name. I'd always found clarity in doing that, in allowing the world to slow as my perception deepened and my blade followed, but it was different now. The air no longer felt just crisp, it was cold – like a windless winter night, everything tinged with frost. An arrow flew towards my throat but my sword came up without missing a beat, slapping it to the side as I pivoted on myself and fell on the first rank of the fae. At my side a roar sounded and blood sprayed high as Adjutant began to paint in red. We hit their line like a trebuchet stone, ploughing straight through. There was no room for elaborate tactics, here, no Lion Devours Gazelle. If they didn't hold the gate, they were done for: they had to stand and fight. It would be a red gutter before long, and the gutter was where I shone. One of the fae threw tongues of flame at me and I didn't even bother to dodge them: they hit my armour head on with only hissing steam to show for it, the ice-cold steel unmarred. My shield hit the opponent in the stomach, smashing him back, and I gutted him with a clean sword stroke.

Adjutant stood at my side, sweeping the enemy aside with wild laughter as we drive deeper and deeper. There was a deafening sound behind us as Nauk's heavies impacted the fae line, orcs and humans in a tightly-locked shield wall beginning their push. This was not the kind of battle the Summer fae were meant for, I thought. Not these, anyway. Mere swords and bows were no match for the implacable advancing steel wall of the Legions of Terror. The path Hakram and I were carving through the enemy filled with soldiers, a wedge in the enemy formation that split them. Already they were wavering – the Watch had killed hundreds on their way through, and what stood behind us now was not the full strength of the enemy. There still had to be some left on the walls.

"Spargere," an officer's voice called out.

Small clay balls with lit fuses sailed above the ranks, falling in the throng of fae. The sharpers exploded a moment later, shredding flesh and bone. With a resounding cry the shield wall pushed forward and the army of Summer folded under the pressure.

"Fire," the same voice called out.

Four dozen balls of flame flew above the fae ranks. They wouldn't hit anyone, but they weren't meant to. One by one they detonated, the pressure flattening the fairies under them even if they didn't kill anyone. The fae lines wavered and again the cry sounded, the shield wall pushing forward. I'd been killing my way through anything foolish enough to stand in my way, the tip of the spear, and finally I saw only one woman in front of me – behind her was an empty courtyard, leading deeper into the fortress. There was fear in her too-large eyes. Her sword parried my blow, but her grips was weak. With a grunt I pushed down, flexing my muscles as she joined a second hand to her first and desperately tried to hold me back. Too weak. I broke through her guard, carving her from shoulder to rib across the body. After so many strikes against armour even the goblin steel of my sword was starting to dull, but with enough power behind the blow that mattered little. I stepped onto the courtyard lightly the sound of fangs tearing through flesh heralding Adjutant following me as he tossed a corpse with a ripped throat to the side. Heavies filled the corridor we'd open, splitting the fae in two, and it was the beginning of the end for them. They began to break.

"We can leave them to Nauk," I said. "We have a Count to settle matters with."

The orc nodded, licking reddened chops. The inside of the castle was still made of the same white stone, but in the shady corners I saw roots peeking through. Count of Olden Oak, huh. Might be more to the title than just heraldry. A set of stairs led to the upper keep and without wasting any more time I began the way up. We passed through an empty banquet hall without slowing, my gaze lingering at the larger and larger amount of roots I saw growing through the stone from every corner. Was this entire fortress a tree, the oak the fae noble was named for? I knew fuck all about what oaks actually looked like, having been raised in a city, so I could be looking at one for all I knew. There was another set of stairs in the back of the hall and we headed there, the both of us feeling the pressure coming from higher in that direction. We ended up in a corridor covered with living mosaics of leaves that shifted with every glance but didn't stick around to look at them: through an arc we could see a third and final set of stairs, leading to what I would have called a basilica if the the coloured glass of its windows didn't display the glory of Summer victorious.

The way up was long and sharply sloped, the stairs broad and too large to be covered in one stride. The sun shone down, but it was not illuminating stone: we were surrounded by the brown bark of an immense oak, growing in the centre of the towers we'd glimpsed from the outside. The large structure ahead had copper doors like the outer fortress, though these were wide open. The atmosphere was eerily green-tinged.

"Twenty denarii he's waiting for us inside on some kind of oaken throne," I said.

"I'm not taking that," Hakram snorted. "Twenty denarii we get a monologue about the might of Summer before the fight."

We kept moving even as we talked but the moment we rose onto the first step the strange buzz of fae wings sounded in the utter silence. From the heights of the giant tree ten fae descended on translucent wings, landing halfway up the steps with unnatural grace. Each of them held a leaf-shaped shield and a long lance of wood. I raised an eyebrow.

"So if he'd been called the Count of Plentiful Cows, would you be fighting with udders and hooves?" I called out.

The words echoed across the distance, my mockery repeating twice more before fading.

"Though crowd," Adjutant deadpanned.

The ten fae spread in a line without replying, wings flickering out of existence, and the spears rose. Since the grim-faced pricks weren't willing to save us the climb before we fought it out, we began the way up. I caught Hakram studying them carefully as we rose then punched his shoulder to draw his attention, eyebrow raised.

"Go to the Count," he gravelled. "I'll handle them."

"You've used one aspect already," I frowned. "And your other one's not much use in a fight."

The tall orc bared his fangs.

"I feel... close," he said. "To the third."

Ah, and now I understood why he'd suggested it. Iron sharpens iron, Praesi were fond of saying. They meant it as a justification for their obsession with scheming against one another, but I'd found the saying had some truth in it. For both villains and heroes, conflict drove advancement. No, perhaps that wasn't exact. Weighty actions allowed you to sharpen your Name, and conflict had a way of birthing those. Whether it was arguing with an enemy or beating them down, a Named could temper themselves. It wasn't that Hakram thought he'd stomp over all these fae – they were obviously meant to be an elite guard of some kind, no matter how ridiculous their equipment. But he believed that a dangerous enough fight might allow him to reach his third aspect.

"I don't like risking you," I said, more honestly than I'd meant it to. "Duel's one thing, this is just taking a risk to hurry something you'll get eventually."

He half-smiled, which given the size of his teeth still made him look more horrifying than sentimental.

"You can't be the only one taking risks," he chided. "And we'll need all we can bring to bear, soon. If not for this war then for the next."

I was still less than fond of this idea. It wasn't just that finding a replacement for Adjutant would be impossible, though there was no denying that was a fact. Even if Apprentice fused Ratface and Aisha into a single abomination of nature the combined talents wouldn't be able to handle a tenth of the work he did. Hakram was my friend. Gods, probably the person I was closest to in all of Creation. My first instinct was to kill anything that might threaten him and put the head on a spike to ward off anybody else who might want to try. I knew that look in his eyes, though. It was the same one he got before disappearing for a few bells and a problem mysteriously solved itself – there would be no talking him out of this no matter how much I glared.

"Wade in their blood, Hakram," I finally said, raising a gauntleted fist.

"Luck in battle, Catherine," he replied, hitting his fist with mine.

We were only two steps away from the fae, and they'd yet to move. I supposed they thought it made them look imposing.

"The way is barred," a fae said.

"So was the front gate," I replied.

I dashed forward, sending a sliver of power into my legs. Bypassing a step entirely I landed in front of the rightmost fae, whose spear immediately whistled towards my throat. From the corner of my eye I saw movement – ridiculous as they looked, they were quicker than the soldiers from earlier and better coordinated. If it had come to a scrap that would have mattered, but unfortunately for them fleeing was another game entirely. I formed a circular panel of shadow in the way of the one trying to flank me and ducked under the spear of the other, never breaking stride. Wouldn't have worked if I was any taller, but for once being so offensively short was an advantage. The shadow pane shattered a heartbeat later, but I was already on the step behind them. I glanced back and saw that none of them was deigning to pursue. Hakram ripped the shield out of the hands of one and smacked another fae's face with it, but he was surrounded within moments and the situation looked sharply to his disadvantage. My fingers tightened until the gauntlet creaked, but I forced myself to look away and continued my way up. He wouldn't have told me he could handle it if he couldn't.

I forced myself to clear my mind the way I'd been taught even as I headed up to the structure that was the crowning glory of the fortress, the very heart of the Count's domain. From the sides of the stairway – there were no rails here either, though unlike with the Tower I was willing to cut Summer some slack since at least they could fly back up if they fell – I could see roots leading up to the inside of the building. Well, that was promising. I'd seen my fair share of fucking horrors in Winter, I supposed I was due exposure to the other side of the coin. The copper gates were open, like I'd seen earlier, but as I made it to the top I finally got a glance inside. For the first time since breaching the fortress, what I saw gave me pause. It wasn't the tall silhouette of the Count that gave me pause, his back turned to me as he gazed out the green and red glass in front of him. It was the sight of the inside of the basilica, though the living wood that made hundreds of stacks filled with books and baubles was a stunning sight. No, it was the hundred corpses of the Gallowborne that hung from the branches covering the ceiling.

I let out a long, quiet breath. Fury was not unknown to me. I'd felt both boiling anger and frozen, bitter hatred since I'd become the Squire. But the sight of men and women who'd died for me trussed up like trophies in someone's sanctum killed the emotions in me. I'd seen the Carrion Lord once. The monster the tales spoke of, instead of the sardonic teacher I'd come to love. Seen the humanity in him smothered like a candle, leaving behind only a thing capable of anything if it furthered its objectives. If someone was looking at my face right now, I thought, they might just see the same thing. He'd told me, once that were the same in some ways. Maybe he was right, because right now I felt capable of being monstrous. My footsteps broke the silence in the room as I walked forward, the heartbeats of the Beast echoing in turn. It was there, I knew as well as I knew my own breath. Still as the grave, but looking at the Count with my eyes. It did not delight in the violence to come, for once. It bowed to it.

"I'd never considered any of this personal," I heard myself say, my tone without a speck of feeling. "I am, after all, invading your home. You've not participated in the invasion of Callow, and my only reasons for sieging this keep were of a strategic nature."

The Count of Olden Oak turned to face me, tall wooden spear in hand.

"But this?" I murmured, looking at the corpses of people I'd known, trained with, laughed with. "This was a choice. Those have consequences."

"Duchess of Moonless Night," the fae greeted me calmly. "You seem displeased."

"We passed civil the moment you hung up those corpses," I said. "I could torture you for this, I suppose, but that's a cheap sort of satisfaction. Meaningless, really. There's no evening this particular scale."

"Winter pretending to be righteous," the man mocked. "A farce of farces."

"I revoke your right to exist," I said, tone measured. "I will take what I want from you, and then you will end."

He opened his mouth to speak again but I shot forward. The man wore no armour, only green robes, but with fae that meant nothing. My sword came down but the shaft of the spear caught it – whatever sorcery was in the wood made it harder than steel, my blade bouncing off. I was past caring. I smashed my shield into his shoulder, but his hand came up to block it: green light shone on his palm and the momentum of the strike vanished. I gave ground, stepping back and slowly circling around him. Swift as a hawk he struck, spear aiming for my eyes, but I hit the tip of his spear with the top of my shield to knock it off course. The spear rose past my head but instantly a branch grew from it, whistling towards my throat. I blinked in surprise as it pierced straight through, only backing away in time to prevent it from severing my spine. My vocal chords were done for, but I no longer needed to speak an aspect to call on it. Rise, I thought. The wound slowly began to close even as the branch that had grown from the spear withdrew back into it. So this was a Count of Summer, I thought. I had no makeshift prophecy protecting me from this one, no shield of lies to blunt his power.

He would lose regardless.

I moved forward again and the spear whipped out, tearing a hole through my shield – a last moment adjustment prevented it from piercing through the hand that held it. He made to withdraw the spear but I focused my will and the ice welled from the steel and froze it stuck inside. I managed to swing at his face before he forced it out anyway, twisting away from my blow – I cut clean just underneath his eye. Green light came out instead of blood, bark growing to fill the wound. I was not the only one with a healing ability, it seemed. The hole in my shield froze shut with dark ice and I went back on the offensive: his growing trick was too dangerous to allow him the initiative. The tip of my blade probed his guard as I angled my feet for a thrust, his eyes flickering down to notice it. The Beast howled. When he slapped aside the thrust with his spear I was already moving, twisting the momentum into a pivot that smashed into his spear when he managed to block it again. I tore through no flesh, but the strength behind the strike threw him back a few feet. I was stronger than him, then. My title of Duchess was not entirely meaningless.

The spear snaked forward as he moved towards me, casually slapped aside. Even as it passed my flank I saw the branch grow and head for my kidneys, but I was ready for it this time. I dropped my sword and caught the bursting wood with my hand, forcefully moving it aside. Ice glistened on the lower edge of my shield, sharpening it like a blade, and I rammed that edge into his shoulder. I cut through the robe and he hissed in pain, then wrenched out the shield while throwing myself to the side before the two branches growing from the first one he'd made could punch through between my ribs. I landed in a roll, without a weapon, and the Count smirked. Green light shone the gaping wound going from his shoulder to his pectorals, bark filling it instantly. I flicked my wrist and Pickler's contraption triggered, a knife slapping down onto my palm. My Senior Sapper had made sure that there would always be steel in my hand when I needed it, her sharp little mind ever-refining the tool I'd once used when fighting the Lone Swordsman.

"You seem to be at a disadvantage, Duchess," the fae mocked.

I had no interest in trading barbs with meat. I charged again but found the distance between us had been too lengthy: the Count flicked his fingers at me, a dozen strands of green light shooting towards my chest as I advanced. I stepped aside, adjusted my angle and continued moving forward but he still had control of the sorcery: the strands struck down at my boot, roots growing from them and nailing me to the floor. My momentum cut short, I had to force myself back in order to avoid tripping. Immediately the fae struck, moving to the side my shield didn't cover with the grace of a cat. My knife wouldn't be able to do much against the spear, at this distance. You have made a mistake, I thought with vindictive satisfaction. I adjusted my grip on the knife to be the same I'd use for a sword, and then with a flicker of will from the short blade a full sword length of dark ice grew. I cut through the spear, and thought it immediately began to grow back his eyes widened.

I tore through my boot out of the roots effortlessly. I'd already proved I beat him in raw strength – arrogant of him to think he could bridge the gap with sorcery. My shield hit his stomach, knocking the breath out of him without his little healing being of any use. My blade carved straight through the wrist that held the spear, and though it grew back in bark that didn't bring back the weapon to his hand. Sorcery attempted to do so, but when it began rising from the ground I exerted my will again and froze it stuck. I cut his throat, without missing a beat. Green light filled the wound, but I was already striking again. I sliced through his eyes and he screamed, but a heavy groan sounded out behind me. I risked a glance and saw that a hundred spears of wood were descending from the branches covering the ceiling. In that heartbeat, the world slowed. I could move out of the way, give ground again and avoid the danger. But I didn't want to. I wanted to crush him under my boot, and the bone-deep hatred I'd felt when first entering Summer well up in response.

I didn't set it aside, this time. I took it, owned it, carved it into a weapon. It was mine, and it would answer to my will like any other aspect.

"Fall," I said.

The world went dark. A boundless night sky spread above us, without a single speck of light to break the black. There was a cold here that was old and merciless, and the branches that would have pierced me slowed and turned grey. The sap inside them froze and they died. The Count of Olden Oak's bark-crafted eyes stared blindly into the dark as he panicked. I could feel a flame inside him, feel it dimming with every passing heartbeat. Frost spread across his body slowly, and I could feel him on the brink of death. I smiled and the night went away, wrenching me back into the sunlit basilica. He was barely conscious now, so little of him left a child could have beaten him to death. His power would grow back, though, given enough time.

"Oh, you don't get to die yet," I said. "I still have a use for you."

What little was left of his mind smelled of fear, and it was not unwarranted.

Take, Break, Fall. Those are some nasty aspects Catherine has there. I love it.

wirelessgrapes

> "Something [inside Cat] that would use what it could not break and break what it could not use."

From the Book 2 Epilogue. Her aspects are about taking what she can use and destroying what she can't. FORESHADOWING!

wirelessgrapes

Goddamn that's a *vicious* fucking aspect

The Archdevil

May the Duke freeze for eternity as Masego's personal mana battery. A Duke of Summer has to be good fuel for rituals.

The Archdevil

Also, I love that Cat's third Aspect is an action and a Season. Fitting that it's the transition of power from Summer to Winter.

callmesteve

I second all of the above. Epic and interesting in its implications.

Nairne

A Count*

Shoddi

Leveling up a certain quarter-fae senior mage consort, perhaps?

arancaytar

I thought she balked at that because it would also require humans? Hypocritical as that may be.

Cpt. Obvious

I think the Duchess of Moonless Nights may feel this count had it coming.

HUMAN Rights activist

You can't have Human rights if you aren't real. Also

NO MERCY FOR SUMMER SCUM

Fadili

I think Cat's getting a girl some jewelery (that can be used in a ritual).

Shequi

Is she going to give him to Masego... Or to Killian?

Cpt. Obvious

Akua already proved that the Fey are pretty good ritual fuel.

danh3107

I could curse here, make an exclamation... I don't think that carries enough weight. (Imma do it anyway)

THAT WAS FUCKING METAL

Nastybarsteward

Hmmm, what would be the soundtrack for that fight me wonders?
*best evil laugh* 😊

pyrohawk21

This... was good. And Cat's third Aspect is very much here.

First is Take/Rise.

I've forgotten what the second is, can someone remind me?

And now we've had the third revealed. Fall. And it is VERY suited to Cat.

For she has always and will always face an uphill struggle. But those who think themselves above her will find that they Fall before her.

nick012000

>I've forgotten what the second is, can someone remind me?

Break.

pyrohawk21

Okay, so the second is Break. Her three Aspects actually work really well together. And considering that this is a narrative universe... Well, the three of them tell a story. And there is power in that.

First she Takes something from her opponent. Then she Breaks something they had thought would stop her. And finally, they shall Fall before her.

And the fact that Fall is also another name for Autumn, she gained it from the Winter Court and is now facing the Summer Court...

Well, there's a LOT of narrative strength behind Cat now...

Soronel Haetir

Her second aspect is Break.

nick012000

Typo thread?

Either "this keep" or "these keeps".

The Warren Peace NFL Report

There are far too many typos for a typo thread to be of any use here. A bunch of them were bad ones, where I couldn't even come up with a realistic guess about what they were supposed to say, and had to just skip them and move on.

That's the price of Wednesday chapters, apparently. Overall not a bad trade.

Darkening

Well hell. That was a thing. Interested to see an explanation for how her new aspect works exactly. Take and Break are fairly straightforward, but Fall sounds a bit more abstract. And Hakram probably has a new one too! That'll be fun to see. Hm. Wonder what she wants the Count for. She's not much for blood sacrifice like Diabolist, though given how absolutely livid he made her maybe she'll make an exception. Maybe use him to transform her girlfriend into full fae? Hm. Or maybe she wants to have masego experiment on killing off powerful fae permanently for when she goes for Winter.

stevenneiman

I recall a discussion of sacrifices to help Kilian, so I'd guess that she either wants to use him for that or she wants to hand him over to Masego and see if he has any similar insights to Akua's about the possibility of using up the power that comprises a fae so that they never respawn.

Darkening

Looking over it again, the opening quote about what souls can be used to power really makes me more confident she's gonna sacrifice him for killian's ritual. It'd be nice to have her get a little more narrative importance over just being Cat's girlfriend that she occasionally sees, and being a talented full fae sorceress would probably go a long way for that.

Morgenstern

Seeing how his power grows back... he would be far better suited as mana battery for Masego, imho. Siphon off of him forever... or until that one time you really need ALL of it. Ouch.

RoflCat

Earlier:

"Do you seek to frighten me, child? Summer does not know fear."

Akua slowly unsheathed her knife, resting the wickedly sharp edge on the side of the fae's throat. He looked into her eyes, undaunted. Diabolist smiled.

"No, not yet," she murmured. "But I will teach you."

Now:

What little was left of his mind smelled of fear, and it was not unwarranted.

Does this count as a 'win' for Catherine over Akua?

RandomFan

Akua's capable of being nasty enough that I'm sure that her victim's been taught fear too. Catherine has the record for speed, she got to skip the entire post-defeat bravado step, but Akua probably did it first, even. So I'd call it a 'draw'.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

I'd call it a victory of Akua over the summer fae, at least. They took her lesson to heart. Not sure how Cat has anything to do with it.

draxsiss

Ah but if all fey are connected at least from a narrative sense, is the only reason Cat's felt feat because Akua already taught them it?

Barthumphries

No, people in stories feel fear all the time. It wouldn't be a new emotion to the fay.

George

Oh god it's so cool!
Neat to finally learn about the Watch, and taking her third aspect is a big deal.

Metalshop

This new Aspect seems very powerful, but I'm worried that it's also the most villainous. Not that it's evil, but that it has the double edged sword built in. The most common way to invoke an Aspect seems to be some variation of "I [Aspect]" or "I will [Aspect]", so I could very easily see this aspect being extremely powerful before ultimately getting used against her.

tynam

I was just thinking the same. All the aspects we've seen so far describe something the owner does. "Fall" seems exceptionally likely to come back to bite the user.

kinigget

Now this?

This is why I read this story

Not because it's hilarious, though it is that, but simply to watch Cat become something terrifying and ruthless

And I do hope she's going to use him for what I think she is

This is how principles shatter

Euodiachloris

In which the Count learns the hard way why you should carefully analyse the specific target audience before you go for a brutal set piece. Ass + u + me (but, mostly you). 😊

BumblingBehemoth

Anyone have an idea what Hakrams third aspect will be?

Ketura

Something like Obey. He's getting it right after acting as champion for Cat and then right after taking on a group of fey so she could continue. I'm seeing a pattern of "Cat told me to do this, so I'm DOING it."

MagnaMalusLupus

Given the odds he was looking at maybe something like Prevail or Overcome. Perhaps not villainous enough though. It could be the same as Captain's Serve. We've seen duplicate aspects before, with learn on Squire and Ranger.

Nastybarsteward

Cleave maybe?

Th3saint

What frightens the count is that winter is beating summer in warfare.

Probably thought that it was a victorious last stand story because in war summer crushes winter.

Pentrose Son of John

Ah, yes, being savvy to the tale is of little use when you misidentify the story being told. I feel this is a story of Catherine coming into her Power, which means that she has an advantage, which is enhanced in Arcadia.

Nastybarsteward

There is a big difference in rank, she is a duchess, much higher than a count.

But, she is winter court which seems weaker, although as you say using proper military tactics like the summer court does is probably confusing them somewhat.

Letouriste

Yep, she is more and more villainious by chapters^^ i guess the grand final of this arc is killing winter?...would be pretty badass if she can permanently cripple both fae sides

Soronel Haetir

I worry that Break and Fall are so close thematically. She ought to be really gods-damned powerful at wrecking things but it's going to make making anything of Callow that much harder, for example.

nehemiahnewell

Yeah, they're vary close narratively speaking. Though break is more absolute. A fall doesn't have to be to death, any defeat can be a fall. On the other hand, break ends something completely. It also doesn't seem to be as hard to use. Break pits her will, and can backlash. I suspect Fall is easier to wield. I doubt she could simply Break an army, for instance, but all her opponents might Fall agaisnt her, taking it out bite by bite.

Having both aspect so close together is limiting though. Which I suppose makes sense. She's moved on from being a novice, but she's in a rut at this point. She has to break out of her current story of conflict leading only to more and worse conflict, destroying what she's trying to protect. Breaking out of it probably requires her to be more then a Squire though, to be someone who stand on their own, rather then a transitional role.

vietnamabc

About Fall, wonder what angel feels about this Aspect, I think the final transition test would be for Cat to Fall an Angel.

Black already feels outclassed because the story of the White Knight is not the one to oppose him, the White Knight I think exists here to oppose Tyrant because of the role. I think Amadeus would be defeated by Hanno and Cat would be the one to pick up the pieces and fight both Cordelia and the Tyrant.

Ash

We're told Cat will one day become either the Black Knight or the White Knight, and either way Squire is inherently a transitional Name, so whether she ends up a Knight or something completely different she won't be the Squire forever. So hopefully her next Name will be something more suited to rebuilding Callow – to create one must first destroy, etc, etc. She has to break the world to change it.

anon

We all know she's the girl who climbed the tower.

Lutrine

When Cat used Fall, the sky went black without lights. Did she just shorten her clock by making a Moonless Night?

Fork You

FYI the url of this chapter is chapter-25-advance instead of Chapter 26.

M

I am not so sure Fall is an aspect. It felt more like using Winter's power she has to do a thing, sorta like Speech. Has the same black bold style too.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Aspects are also bolded. She didn't Take anything from he guy, and wouldn't want to unless it was clearly more useful to her than Rise, which is a tall order, seeing how often she relies on it.

Soronel Haetir

It may also be that 'Fall' is not yet a complete understanding, given how the power was described during the bestowal:

Barthumphries

Soronel Haetir, if you meant to have something after the colon, it's not showing up.

Byzantine

She twisted the power of Winter into an aspect, Fall.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

You do realize that winter and fall are not the same thing, right? If this was the power of winter, maybe it would be called winter?

nehemiahnewell

She certainly tapped into it. Her Fall is a thing of death and cold. People are talking about it conceptually, about making an Angel Fall for example, but it seems more like defeat, loss, and death. I could see it killing an Angel, tainting it with mortal death, but not corrupting one.

Winter is the dead time, the still time. And when she called upon it she drowned the world in Moonless Night.

Euodiachloris

Hmmm... when you think about it, it's quite a wide Aspect. Fall (autumn), a fall, a fall from grace, to fall from a great height, to fall down, to fall upon some poor unfortunate's skull like a ton of bricks, to fall upon a surprising situation, to fall apart...

amc

I would love to see this abused:

In the middle of heroic monologue, Cat sets an anvil to *fall* on the hero's head.

edrey

Black is lead, conquer and destroy , cat is take, break and fall.
a very dark martial nature
so Black leads a new age, conquer callow and destroys the will of the havens, cat take his legacy, break the opposition and make kingdoms fall.
truly each name is a story also, i hope the interrogation to the count answer some questions too

Ward

Love from a dumb phone

Zoolimar

Somehow it reminds me of this

Barrendur

Ah no, Cat, the new Aspect should have been MAKE.

Are you more than just a Destroyer, girl? If not, then *you* will have to fall and be replaced by a Creator, if Callow is to live.

So perhaps this is a Scapegoat/Sacred Champion story; Cat destroys all Callow's foes, becoming ever more evil to do it, and finally sacrifices/destroys *herself*. Callow is reborn, purged of/preserved from the evil of Foundling/Squire/Duchess of Moonless Night/Dread Empress Retaliation(?)....

The Warren Peace NFL Report

She has plenty of time to Take a suitable aspect, if she comes across one.

tynam

It's seems very unlikely that you can build anything lasting by replying on a stolen build aspect.

Yitzi

Keep in mind: Three is a very significant number in this setting, and this is only Cat's second set of aspects.

nehemiahnewell

Yes, and again, Squire is Transitional. This Aspect means she isn't someone who can fix thing,s grow thing, nurture things, guide thing. But she isn't at a point in her own story where she's mature enough to do so. She still fights every fight, tries to win every battle, takes what she can take, and ruins the rest.

a more nuanced approach is needed, but she isn't there yet.

nipi

Not to mention that her recent one was pushed upon her. She might get a new one when she reclaims her heart.

reveen

"Are you more than just a Destroyer, girl?"

Not really.

Barthumphries

Those are her current traits. When she ranks up into a higher form (Warlord Catherine, the Gray Knight, Duchess of Moonlit Nights), she will lose her current traits and gain traits that are appropriate for her new name. Presumably, her future traits will be more conducive to nation building, after she gets into a position where such traits will be more useful than the traits she currently has for her transitional Squire name.

arancaytar

I've been waiting for the point where Catherine becomes a scarier fucker than Black, and I think we just reached it.

Jonsense

Fall (or Autumn), is the season where Summer slowly loses to Winter.

Darkening

That does seem like it might make her more effective against Summer in particular given the nature of arcadia.

julienbrightside

Finally caught up to the newest chapter.
Can't wait for more to come.

I wonder if there's a Name called Blasphemer, the power to deny miracles and magic.

Shawn Panzegraf

I had a very similar thought Lutrine,
The Winter King (and Fae in general) seem like just the kind of technicality-loving bag of dicks that would count the Moonless Night created by Cat's newest Aspect against the six appearances of it she gets before her heart belongs to the Winter King for good.

Worse, Cat almost certainly won't twig to that interpretation. Will get the thing with Summer taken care of in like three months, but by then having used her new Aspect 4-5x. Goes back to the Winter King and he says "I told you, you had six appearances of your title before your heart belonged to me. I said NOTHING about the passage of time, the seasons, or the calendar. Did you not hear what I told you when I Bestowed your title upon you?"

Which will lead in to who Cat's after, post-Akua & Summer.

Or at least that's one way I could easily see it going.

Good catch. Can you link or copy/paste what he said so I can reread it? 😊

ArkhCthuul

Very well done.

Fall. So many interpretations.

Loved the chapter.

aristobulonietoalcaraz

I had a very standardised sentiment Lutrine,
The Winter King (and Fae in ecumenical) appear like just the form of technicality-loving dish of dicks that would numeration the Moonless Night created by Cat's newest face against the six appearances of it she gets before her centre belongs to the Winter King for proficient. "

Cat's Aspect of Fall is quite similar to Divine Power Monochrome in Feng Shen Ji.

A Domain, an area of effect ability that drains energy and life force out of everything except the user (unless the user specifically targets something to avoid involving bystanders), to the point that light is dimmed and everything turns grey within the field of power.

Of course, Cat's Aspect involves ice and darkness in it.

Youghurt Pooh

Hm I am more interested what happens when cat use her new aspect Fall on something that is flying? Like something big that is up in the sky, hmm?

It will probably Fall. Haha get it?

As much as i rant in previous comments i am still reading and this right here is one of the reason. Cat is just so fucking badass and boy do i love her. That was sooo fucking epic!

Chapter 27: Expedition

"No matter how hallowed the crown, it fits only one head."
– Proceran saying

There were no maps. That was the great dangers of Arcadia, I was learning. Well, that and the fact that it was a shifting hellscape filled with quarrelsome demigods. I'd not realized until now how much planning a march depended on the maps provided to Fifteenth by the Tower: we had no idea what was ahead of us now, and any reports brought back by scouts might have become inaccurate by the time we reached the place they'd been. I knew where we needed to go – could feel it in the back of my head like an unmoving iron spike – but that knowledge came without a precise idea of the distance I needed to march. Based on the last two times I'd travelled to Arcadia I was guessing about six days, but that was a guess. We could be here for a fortnight if I was misjudging the situation. We'd set out with rations for three weeks, expecting to resupply when we met up with the Fifteenth back in Creation, and we had since... expanded our granaries. The regulations for the Legions of Terror forbade looting, but I was Named: I could overrule those whenever I wished. They were mostly meant to avoid antagonizing local populations when the Empire took territory, anyway, so I was breaking the letter more than the spirit.

And Hells, since for once in my life I wasn't fighting in my own homeland I'd ordered Robber to loot this fucking fortress to the bedrock. Taking anything heavy would only slow us down, but there was plenty of jewellery, gold and silver lying around. It would have been better to have Ratface along for that – the Taghreb was capable of squeezing silver out of stone, given a bell – but he was more useful to me at Juniper's side, preparing the second phase of our campaign against Summer. Night fell all too quickly as the armies camped around the fortress, torches and bonfires lighting up the dark. I'd claimed the basilica where I'd beaten the Count as my command centre, and it was where I'd be holding my meeting with the senior staff of the combined armies. Passing the banquet hall I'd glimpsed on my way up earlier in the day I raised an amused eyebrow at the sight of two goblins with knives prying out the gilding from the corner of the high table before shoving the gold in a bag. Enterprising lot, Robber's cohort. I decided not to ask how they'd gotten so good at ripping off precious metals from objects, since I'd really prefer not to know.

The Summer Court was torching southern Callow, it was only fitting that their own treasures would pay for the rebuilding of it. The Deoraithe were too proud to ask for a cut and Ranker was from the generation that had drafted the regulations I was breaking, so amusingly enough it was all going in my war chest.

The entire fortress had been ours a half-bell after I'd smacked down the Count, Nauk's men sweeping in and the other two Legions taking the walls on the sides when the fae there pulled back to deal with my men. Ten corpses and a bloodied but satisfied Adjutant had been waiting for me when I first left the basilica – he'd gotten his aspect, he'd said, but he'd rather keep what it was exactly under wraps for now. The fae personal guard looked like they'd been hacked to death with his axe, not some power, so I was rather interested in what had allowed him to bridge the gap. It could wait, though. If there was one thing I'd learned about aspects in the years since I first became the Squire, it was that they were trump cards best kept quiet until they could shine. The knowledge that I had Struggle, back in the day, had allowed the Lone Swordsman to plan around it. Best to leave Hakram's new weapon unknown until it could be slapped down on the table at our enemy's detriment. The officers were already waiting for me when I passed the still-open copper doors, settled around a large circular table clearly stolen from another part of the castle. It still had dried blood on it, not that anybody seemed to care. No insulting slogans had been carved on the surface, though, so it probably wasn't a goblin who'd found it. They liked to leave a mark, my little monsters.

This particular meeting had required broader attendance than the usual triumvirate of Ranker, Kegan and I: a hooded figure from the Watch stood silently behind the seated Duchess. At the Marshal's side an old acquaintance was frowning, General Afolabi. He seemed displeased that Nauk was in attendance, representing my jesha from the Fifteenth. I could see his point – as a mere legate the large orc was by far the lowest-ranked person here – but he could put his objections in a pipe and smoke them, for all I cared. Speaking of. I took out the dragonbone pipe Masego had once gifted me and ripped a small pouch of wakeleaf. I'd earned it, after today. I struck a match on my aketon and inhaled in puffs until fire caught, tossing aside the blacked pinewood. In my absence, Adjutant had been more or less in charge. Though his official rank in the Legions was technically below that of a tribune, by virtue of being Named and my right hand there was no one here who could gainsay him about much of anything.

"Done stripping the place clean?" Ranker said as I claimed the seat across from her.

I inhaled with a sigh of pleasure, then blew the smoke idly.

"Jealousy is unseemly in a woman of your rank," I replied with a smug smile.

Hakram cleared his throat.

"You all know why you're here," the orc gravelled. "Casualty reports first."

"Twenty-nine dead," Kegan said calmly. "The wounded will be back on their feet by morning."

Merciless Gods, and they'd been the ones to scale the walls. Everyone and their sister had a bloody arcane weapon, these days. It was a good thing I'd reinstated a knightly order, because otherwise I was going to be the only one on the field without some awe-striking shock troops to deploy.

"Two hundred and change dead," Nauk volunteered. "Mages are handling our wounded, maybe another fifty will need to stick with the supplies for the rest of the march."

"Less than a hundred for the Fourth and the Twelfth together," Ranker said. "The Fifteenth took the brunt of the assault for us."

Two thousand fae in a heavily fortified position, and we'd wiped them out with fewer than five hundred casualties in the span of a day. I could get used to being the one with the numerical advantage, if things went that smoothly every time.

"From my interrogation of the Count of Olden Oak I learned that these were Summer regulars," I said. "A border garrison to check Winter aggression. Half their number was stripped when the Princess of High Noon invaded Creation."

"If this is the quality of soldiery we'll be facing, perhaps this entire matter has been overly planned," Duchess Kegan noted.

Marshal Ranker hacked out a laugh.

"This was a siege, you twit," she said. "Not what those boys are meant for. On a plain with equal numbers and some nobles to back them they'll be trouble."

The hooded man behind the Duchess stirred at the insult but Kegan settled him with a glance. I watched the interplay without a word, pulling at my pipe. The wakeleaf was blunting the sharper edges of my mood, perhaps for the best.

"I agree with the Marshal's assessment," Hakram said. "They showed their mettle when they tangled with the Gallowborne: if they catch any of our infantry without crossbows or mages, it will go very differently."

"Which leads us to the crux of this matter," Afolabi said. "Where are we headed, Lady Squire? Surely you made inquiries with your prisoner."

The Count of Olden Oak was currently a guest of the Fifteenth, tied up under seventeen layers of wards and a rotating watch of mages. I'd been forced leave so many to the task that to take care of my wounded I'd had to send for mages from the Fourth.

"We're headed for the lands of the Princess Sulia, as some of you are already aware," I said. "When politely asked, our friend revealed that it'll be mostly a straight march to there. Only two obstacles in the way: a river and the keep of the Count of Golden Harvest. We're in luck for the second one – the Count is currently in Creation, along with most his troops."

"Is there a bridge or a ford?" Ranker asked, leaning forward.

"There's supposed to be a bridge, if we keep down the road that led us here," I said. "I wouldn't count on it still being standing, though. They had time to send messengers before we took the fortress."

"As long as the bare bones of s structure remain my sappers can take care of it," the Marshal dismissed.

"We'll be relying on you, then," I acknowledged, spewing out a stream of smoke. "Even if the river was swimmable we have too many supply carts for that to be valid way across."

"We should begin marching before dawn," Duchess Kegan said. "We've already wasted a day on this castle. The longer we tarry the higher the chances the armies in Callow are recalled."

None of us was eager at the idea of fighting the higher ranks of the Summer Court on their own ground. In Creation their power was limited, but out here? There were some entities numbers meant nothing again and the Princess of High Noon struck me as one.

"Forced march," Nauk grunted in agreement. "We're in their lands now. Our way to get out of this with most our feathers is to be gone by the time they'd done mobilizing."

"We'll exhaust our soldiers if we follow your... plan," General Afolabi drawled in disdain. "And risk ambush, if we move hurriedly. Legionaries dead on their feet will be ill-equipped to handle fae harassment."

"The orc is right," Duchess Kegan retorted flatly. "Better we lost a few hundreds to ambushes than thirty thousand to a hopeless pitched battle."

"Nauk," I said, and though my tone was calm it sounded out like a clap. "The orc's name is Legate Nauk of the Fifteenth Legion."

The Deoraithe met my eyes, displeased, but I matched her stare. We both knew I was in the right in this. Eventually she nodded, lips thinned.

"Legate Nauk is correct," she conceded.

I smiled mirthlessly, blowing out smoke. If she wanted to keep on good terms with me Kegan would need to watch her fucking mouth around my people.

"Whatever the pace, we need eyes ahead," Ranker spoke into the silence. "The Fourth and the Twelfth have scouting contingents. Your detached cohort under the Special Tribune can join them."

"I have another task for them that'll take them away from the army," I refused. "Consider them unavailable for the foreseeable future."

"What are they doing?" Afolabi asked.

I raised an eyebrow at him.

"The matter is sealed, General," I replied. "I will unveil it when I deem it necessary."

"This isn't the time to play mysterious," the man said through gritted teeth. "We're in hostile territory with no path of retreat. Recklessness will get us killed. Your last gamble torched a third of Summerholm, Squire. We cannot afford a repeat performance."

From the corner of my eye I saw Nauk's fist clench and he half-rose from his seat but Hakram sent him a quelling look. I drummed my fingers against the table lightly, taking the pipe out of my mouth.

"You're leading to something," I said. "Spit it out."

"Marshal Ranker has the rank and the experience to make the proper decisions," the Soninke said. "Command of the expedition should be formally ceded to her."

I glanced at the goblin in question. She didn't seem surprised, but neither did she seem appreciative. Not her idea? Hard to tell.

"No army of Daoine will ever take orders from Praesi," Duchess Kegan replied coldly.

"Marshal Ranker?" I prompted, tone light.

"You've yet to make a major mistake," the goblin said. "Doesn't mean you won't."

Mhm, there were subtleties to that reply. She wasn't disagreeing with Afolabi, but she was distancing herself from the push somewhat. Either she was leaving herself room to throw him under the carriage after using him as a catspaw or she truly had nothing to do with this.

"You fucking Wastelander prick," Nauk growled. "Do you really think you-"

"Nauk," I interrupted without looking at him. "Sit down."

He did. He'd heard me use this voice before.

"I've perhaps been too lenient," I said. "I do have less experience than most the commanders at this table, hence why I've been taking advice. But allow me to make something perfectly clear, General."

The temperature in the room descended sharply, and for once it was on purpose. I met the Soninke's eyes, and to his honour he did not flinch.

"I am in command," I said, cocking my head to the side. "Here. In Callow. Wherever we meet for the rest of your natural life. I'm not going to threaten you over this, or seek revenge for the slight. To be frank, you're just not important enough for me to spend that much time on you."

The man blanched in anger. I set my pipe on the table and slid it towards him.

"I could speak to you," I noted. "But I don't really need to, do I? Whine all you like, we both know the chain of command here. So what you're going to do instead is head downstairs to the kitchens, to clean my pipe. When you're done, you may come back and sit at the table."

I tapped my fingers against the table impatiently.

"Now," I ordered.

Choking on his rage, the man snatched the pipe off the table and strode away. That was the last sliver of attention I gave him.

"As Marshal Ranker said, we should send scouts to have a look down the road as soon as possible," I said, continuing as if nothing had happened. "Duchess Kegan, given the speed the Watch has shown I would trouble you to send a detachment of it ahead to check on the state of the bridge."

"I've a hundred used to going into the Steppes to map orc movements," the Deoraithe replied, tacitly agreeing.

It wasn't that she was cowed, because she wasn't. Neither was Ranker, for that matter. They'd both dealt with scarier villains than me, though I was playing catch up in that regard. But I'd just made it clear that, if pushed, I was willing to push back. I might still be too young for them to see me as an equal but I was, at least, not someone to be fucked with lightly. It would be enough for now. I glanced at Hakram, and he began speaking again.

"Now," he began, "for the forces we'll dedicate to guarding the supply train."

We were back on the road by dawn the following morning. The first day was uneventful, but that very night we first saw the signs of trouble to come. None of the armies involved had set up a fortified camp before dark, given the pace we were putting the soldiers through. It would only slow us down, and given that the Deoraithe did not practice the same doctrine the meat of our army would be unprotected besides. Double watch and a ring of fires had been deemed barley sufficient, but if we'd not posted goblins out we would have still missed the fae studying us in the dark. Only a handful and far out of the light cast by the fires, but to goblins the dark made no difference. No attack followed, but from then on it was clear there was an enemy force watching us. That we could only guess at the size and position of it was dangerous, given how good at ambushes Summer had already shown itself to be. The lack of attack, though, led me to a theory. Arcadia ran on stories, didn't it? More than that, on story logic. Time and distance were dictated as a consequence, unless a bigwig like the King of Winter decided otherwise.

If I was right, then it would all play out when we got to Princess Sulia's lands. One the last day, at the last moment. I spent most of the second day's march trying out the notion, thinking of how it could be turned to my advantage. No sign of the fae in daylight, though the Watch detachment Kegan had promised came back with news: they'd found the bridge. As expected, it had been scuttled ahead of us. Ranker spent an hour asking the cloaked soldiers for details before declaring she could have a bridge able to support two carts at a time up in a bell and a half. I'd eat into the day's march, but swimming was apparently not an option: the current was harsh and the river broad. When we camped out for the night I sent for a tenth of mages, half of what the Fifteenth had left – the rest had all gone with Robber. More than once during the night I wished I had Masego or even Kilian along, instead of these ones. The difference in skill showed badly. I emerged only around morning bell, exhausted, and found I wasn't the only one in that state. The fae had hit us during the night, in a manner of speaking.

A handful of soldiers had appeared at the edge of the camp and shot fire arrows at the tents of the Fourth, retreating before a response could be mustered. The damage was minimal so Ranker had originally thought this to be the work of a few reckless fae scouts, but when the attack repeated at the edge of the Twelfth's camp the Marshal and the Duchess understood exactly what was happening. Both goblins and Deoraithe were familiar with the kind of tactics a smaller mobile force could use against a larger invading one. Every hour or so fae popped out of the woodworks and shot their arrows, not to kill or even burn supplies but to keep our soldiers awake. They were eroding strength through exhaustion, and not even the Watch was able to catch up to them on their home grounds. They succeeded in their ploy, to my irritation, and there was little I could do about it. We allowed the soldiers to rest for a few hours during the afternoon when we finally reached the bridge and Ranker put her sappers to work. So far we'd been left untouched during daylight, but I was of the opinion they were trying to make us drop our guards during the day in anticipation of a strike. The other two agreed.

Attacks intensified during the third night, to my mounting frustration. We'd camped on the other side of the river in case they torched the bridge Ranker had built during the night – it was wooden – and it proved a farsighted precaution. It went up in flames mere hours after nightfall, cutting off our best path of retreat. Putting together our scout reports, we'd come to the conclusion that there were only about three hundred fae currently harassing us. A flea on the lion's back, but the lion was having a hard time getting a good night's rest. This time they went for out sentinels shortly before dawn, and we had to rouse the infantry to force them to retreat. It was on the fourth day they attacked, though not exactly in the manner we'd predicted. A full two thousand fae led by a noble tore into our scouts ahead of the column. I hesitated to sally out myself, since I wasn't sure if it was a distraction while another force readied to attack the glaring weak point that was our supply train. I sent Adjutant instead, but by the time he arrived the fae had disappeared and left only charred corpses behind. They hit our scouts twice more that day, and though I was furious I eventually pulled back them back closer to our armies.

The Twelfth had already lost two hundred scouts to the mess, and the Fourth half that. Almost as much as the total casualties we'd incurred taking the fortress, without a single scalp to show for it. Ranker wasn't a Marshal for nothing, though. That night she cooked up a few surprises for the enemy. Half past Midnight Bell the sound of buried demolition charges resounded, catching the enemy sneaking around our back by surprise. The sappers waiting on the fae quickly found themselves outmatched, but they'd not been meant to win that fight: the Watch sallied out in full to hit the fae, carving out a few hundred corpses before they managed to flee. There was a sense of relief in the camps after that when the fae didn't dare to continue the harassment that rose my wariness. Ranker's too, as it happened. They struck again at dawn, while the soldiers were still half-asleep, but at the Marshal's suggestion we'd filled the supply wagon with soldiers and when the five hundred fae recklessly going for the carts arrived they were greeted by a steady crossbow volley. This time we managed to take prisoners, and the interrogations that followed were... illuminating.

We'd crossed the domains of two nobles already in our march, both of them gone to war with the host of Summer. Warned ahead of our arrival by the messengers of the Count of Olden Oak, the skeleton garrisons left behind had followed at a distance while sending runners ahead for reinforcements. The garrisons of all the surrounding demesnes had gathered under the Lady of the Verdant Orchard, four thousand in full, and taken to delaying and harassing us until a larger army could be assembled to wipe us out. Word had been sent to the heart of Summer, Aine, and to the Queen herself. What would come of it our prisoners had no idea, but I didn't want to stick around to find out. If the Queen of Summer took the field we were fucked beyond Lower Miezán's ability to express. With a better idea of what was on the other side, the decision was made to pick up the pace. As the prisoners had said, the fortress of the Count of Golden Harvest was empty of all life. It broke my heart to leave the place unlooted, but I didn't have the men or time to spare for it. It was a calculated risk to keep marching past nightfall on the fifth night and it paid off: the fae raiders stripped another hundred men off our skin, but we managed to reach the edge of Princess Sulia's domain.

We fortified the camps, for that last night, and heavy but rotating watches allowed the soldiers to rest up before the last day and the battle I could feel in my bones was coming. Following that iron spike in the back of my head, I led the host to a wide grass plain by midmorning. This, I knew instinctively was where I could open the gate out. I took my time surveying the grounds. To the north the road continued across the plain, but our surroundings were not so uncluttered. To the west hills rose, low and round in the beginning but growing too steep to march through the deeper they went. To the east a sunny forest sprawled out for miles, the trees thick enough one could easily hide an army in there. It felt like a trap, though one whose jaws had yet to close. Last time we'd needed six hours – a bell and a half – to get the army through the gate. Which meant we had to hold this plain for at least six hours in the face of whatever came knocking. Ranker and Duchess Kegan came to join me as our armies spread across the span of grass, the three of us silent for a while before I spoke up.

"Defensive positions," I said. "When Summer comes knocking, I want them to be warmly received."

"Good grounds, for a battle," Ranker murmured. "If all you've promised comes to pass."

"Let's hope it does," I replied. "You'll be a very farsighted corpse by sundown if it doesn't."

"The sole saving grace of this affair," Kegan said.

I couldn't help but snort, but the amusement left me quickly. This was it. The day that decided whether I'd wrecked my chances at quelling the mess in Callow or not. Let's find out which of our traps has the sharpest teeth, Princess of High Noon.

Two hours later I opened the gate and we both rolled the dice.

A little terse and details-oriented, but I think it did its job pretty well and I'm excited to see how the battle plays out. The details we were given should prepare us well for the details we weren't.

Humiliating Afolabi was potentially unwise.

Letouriste

Not really the choice there:/ she can't give out command for the whole thing to work. she could have done without the pipe thing but I agree some punishment was necessary. he suggested changing commander in the middle of the campaign, which is often a bad idea

Shequi

It's the pipe cleaning that I'm referring to. Her insisting on Nauk's proper rank and title from Kegan will have been a plus point with Ranker, who probably hasn't yet been clued into Cat's total antipathy to all forms of racism/speciesism. But she then threw that away by humiliating Afolabi, who is Ranker's 2IC

amc

I worry that this Tragic Flaw of arrogance is going to get Cat in trouble. It seems like her major victories so far have come when she is the underdog of the game, and if she acts too arrogant, she loses the position that she's best able to navigate.

It's all a little like cringing at the naive heroine who goes into the dark basement alone...

But, maybe that's why Narrative Causality had to replace Struggle. Struggle is the aspect of the underdog, but Break and Fall are aspects of a major player. (Who can, maybe, afford to be a bit arrogant?)

greatwyrmgold

There were no guaranteed wise decisions to be made. Cat made a risk assessment (perhaps not objectively) and decided which risk she disliked least.

darkening

Huh. What could robber be doing with ten mages. Planning to sacrifice the count and use the power to take a shot at the princess?

The Archdevil

Maybe they're infusing Robber with his power, making him a pseudo-name. Just an explosive little surprise for the Princess.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Why leave it at Killian? Why not include Masego and Black too while you're believing things? Why not include all the calamities in this little fantasy?

MrPicklesAndTea

But we all agree that Robber stole Killian from Cat right? That goblin boy's big boy wins every time. 😊

Shequi

More than 10 mages; Nauk's Jesha of 2000 men should have 100-200 Mages, depending on the composition of the companies. If 10 Mages are half of what the 15th has left, Robber might have upwards of 80 Mages with him.

What the hell is he doing?

Wild Mass Guessing!

What's Hakram's new Aspect? Personally I'm hoping it somehow draws on the combat poetry he drew on in the fight against the Catacomb Children back in Ater.

The Archdevil

Seek and Stand so far. Maybe Overwhelm? Nah, too improbable with only a single person. Overpower is possible. He has quite often overpowered his enemies. Perform could work, since he always performs as the song say.

And Hakram took down the Summer Noble to the 15th's War Chant as well.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Shouldn't theories include why Hakram doesn't want to tell Cat for now?

Ill guess he's got Discreet, where no one can see him, and he's planning on using it on Cat during his frequent dallies with lady-orcs lol

It explained pretty fairly why Aspects are something to keep hidden. They're trump cards, and shouldn't be revealed until the exact moment they're needed. Otherwise, enemies can plan around them.

My thought is that it's Fulfill, in the sense of Fulfilling his promises. Considering the kinds of things he's promised Cat, that makes the Aspect almost as fearsome in his hands as Obey was for the Captain.

Also, @The Warren Peace NFL Report, Aspects always take the form of an imperative verb, which is to say that you could say the word by itself and it would be a complete sentence commanding an action.

Shawn Panzegraf

What I don't get is why Princess Sulia even gives enough of a shit about an army OBVIOUSLY on the march from point A to B (and it being her land, Sulia is undoubtedly aware that's where a portal into Creation can be formed) since if said army is making for that point, breaking off with Heiress was idiocy after the price she'd already paid to half-crack that nut. Finishing with Heiress, THEN turning to face Cat would've been much more intelligent, since Sulia believes Diabolist and Cat to be in cahoots.

I can grasp she might want to face the army from Creation while they're still in Arcadia, but is a home field advantage versus an army she was going to have to fight one way or another really worth wasting all the work she put into breaking Diabolist? Even assuming Sulia could deal with Cat, after doing so she's going to have to go back and essentially do the entire siege versus Diabolist over. Most of what Diabolist lost were summoned Devils... so given a week or two she's sure to have made an excellent start on replenishing their ranks.

It just seems a very weird choice to me, and not very story-ish. Sulia squared off with Diabolist at the crux moment of the siege, then...Retreat. I get why Erratic did it. She needed Sulia to bloody Cat before Cat confronts Diabolist, but unlike 99.8% of the Guide, Sulia's pull-out from the siege felt EXCEPTIONALLY contrived.

danh3107

I have to agree, they had to be aware that Cat didn't give a single shit of what was in Summer lands

stevenneiman

The thing about Fae is that they take immense pride in their homeland. Even beside defeat in a battle she could have won, Sulia would not have been willing to tolerate an invasion force trampling through their perfect fields, offing nobles left and right, and pillaging castles. A more pragmatic force would have rolled out the red carpet and led Cat straight to the place where she could fight their enemy for them (while also getting a great look at the legionaries while doing so), but for all its tactical skill Summer is still proud and irrational. Also, being saved at the last minute from what would have been an early end to their place in the story is very much a dramatic villain thing.

---

Remember how this looks from Sulia's point of view. Since they have entered the Creation, they've been fighting mostly expendable troops covering magical traps: save for illusions, it's pretty much what they usually see in Winter, though Sulia states, that mortals are, if anything, trickier. Then in the area with several recently disappeared patrols they find their brainwashed commander with the instructions on how to breach Liesse's walls. And finally, as soon as their forces have committed to the siege she feels that a Duchess tasked to defeat her has just entered her lands.

She doesn't know they aren't going on an actual campaign to Aine: she wasn't approached by a messenger, it must have either be some kind of awareness over her domain or a call from her Queen. She doesn't know that Squire and Diabolist are enemies: Summer fae don't really negotiate enough to ask stuff like "are there more than two sides in this conflict?". So far she's been fighting expendables that permanently kill fairies to summon more expendables, and suddenly she was made aware of a force that is 1) larger than her current opponent's, 2) actually invading Summer, as opposed to quietly plotting for world domination in her demesne, 3) uses genuine military tactics like siege and scouting ahead of the marching army instead of retreating constantly and sacrifice to summon to sacrifice ad nauseam.

I'm more interested in the reason for the fae to conquer Callow, since the main suspect was actually minding her own business in Liesse before the whole mess started. Was it Bard meddling to give Akua the advantage or the elves trying to circumvent Keeper of Stories' warnings&

cmomnow

Basically what a few people above said already, but it needs stressing more strongly. These are not logical or pragmatic beings. It's questionable whether they can even be considered sentient. They run on pre-written rules, like a machine or a program. Sure, summer programming would likely include good warfare practices but it seems those are trumped by higher order concerns like "Prioritise defending summer when it is invaded by a winter noble over all other things, including some ambiguous invasion of creation."

arancaytar

Not voluntarily, at that. <https://practicalguidetoevil.wordpress.com/2017/06/28/villainous-interlude-proscenium/>

And apparently, by now Akua knows that she's coming – possibly for days, depending on how Arcadia fucks with time.

Might be time enough to prepare a trap. Akua can't enter Arcadia on her own, but she definitely has lots of captives who can...

amc

Yes – there has to be some clever way for Cat to control the amount of time she spends outside of Creation... Otherwise, this “shortcut” may be extremely dangerous.

arancaytar

This is part of why Cat’s people are so unquestioningly loyal to her.

awesmepersn

I wonder if ‘Fall’ can be used in a different sense on the flying city the Diabolist has. Hmm.

kelioez

Oh, that’d be dope

Captain Amazing

I think her fae title is messing with her so that she loots Summer.

Love from a dumb phone

Shawn Panzegraf

The idea that Cat’s actual goal, as a single Duchess of Winter, would be an intensive assault upon Aine (you know, where the SUMMER QUEEN, counterpart to His High Douchiness the King of Winter is based) is brain-dead babble. An assault upon Aine would either be with all of Winter taking the field, or not at all. The Summer Queen could fry Cat’s entire force without rising from her throne if they got within fifty miles of Aine.

I can however see, if I squint, the fae story-logic of Sulia being unwilling to allow a Winter noble to go tramping through her OWN lands without offering opposition. It still doesn’t explain the violation of fae story-logic required for them to pull out of the siege at the critical moment, but narrative structure must at times trump characterization. (If Diabolist had not herself taken the field, killed a Summer Prince and then found herself confronted in turn by Sulia, I could totally get the pull-out from the siege. There wouldn’t have been a critical moment in said siege, so the insult to Sulia’s domain would take precedence.)

As someone else mentioned though, Summer came into Creation and started tearing shit up en masse for a REASON. Sending two Princes with a Princess in overall command is a massive endeavor, likely the brainchild of the Summer Queen herself. Withdrawing like this from Creation would seem to threaten that goal, whatever it might be.

I for one cannot understand why the rest of Winter is sitting on their hands through all this. Sulia has the bulk of Summer invested in this Creation-oriented endeavor. It seems like Winter is...doing nothing. I get that they're trying to change the cycle, but they could have made the success of their catspaw (Cat) more likely with a few hit-and-run forays into the Summer Marches to accustom Sulia to alarms from the homefront. It wouldn't even have cost them anything.

nighzmarquls

I think maybe winter and summer royalty are trying to lose.

King and queen working to break the board.

In spite of the pieces.

Cpt. Obvious

Problem is that if either court would triumph then the winter king loses his game. He isn't out to win. He is setting Cat up to break the story about winter and summer going to war for good.

It won't free them from being ruled by stories but it will wipe the slate clean so they can form new stories. For at least some time the Fey will not know what every day will be like, or how the day will end. He doesn't even know how Cat will try to achieve this as he was very careful not to tell her what his expectations were.

mclovin2016

Thought a bell was 1 hour, not four... oh well 😊

Cpt. Obvious

It's probably related to old marine time keeping. A shift was four hours on, for hours off. The ships bell wS used to signal the time.

It's not a perfekt fit as the bell was rung every half hour. Once for the first, twice for the second and so on. To make it easier to count the bell was rung in a parrern of two. So for third bell it would be rung twice followed by a short pause and then once more. When you heard eight bells, or four groups of two if you like, it was time for a shift change. But the day was also divided into "bells". So you had Midday bell at 12, noon bell at 4, evening bell at 8 and so on. I don't know I ever learned all the names fort the bells in English so I'll stop there rather than try to make some up and inevitably get them wrong.

OK, so I looked them up, and I had them wrong. They were called:

Middle watch 0000-0400

Morning watch 0400-0800

Forenoon watch 0800-1200

Afternoon watch 1200-1600

Dog watch 1600-2000

First watch 2000-2400

I've heard the "watches" called bells, but can't seem to find any confirmation online. Also the Dog watch was often divided into First and Second Dog watch.

Onyavar

The follow-up chapters are all already bring written, I just want to point out that I fully expect all that loot from summer to vanish back in creation. Fae gold.

vuthuha912

I don't know why but I am always angry when thinking about that highborn twit. What is he even talking about? They are fighting in the middle of enemy territory, he tries to stir up unrest among the commanders. What a fuckwit move. Don't you know that changing the commander in the middle of battle is extremely stupid. Did he want this operation to end up in smoke?

Please demote him immediately and bar him from taking military office. Don't even bother threaten him, Cat. Just punish him immediately. His stupid political move while facing a common enemy deserve an instant demotion at least. Some people might even call that treason as he has directly threaten the benefit of the Tower.

Interlude: Commanders

"When historians try to pin down Foundling's methods they point to the Battle of the Camps or the Princes' Graveyard, but those came later. After she'd learned her trade. If you want to understand how she operated, look to the Battle of Four Armies and One – from the beginning to the end, she was playing an entirely different game from every other commander on the field."

– Extract from “A Commentary on the Uncivil Wars”, by Juniper of the Red Shields

Nauk of the Waxing Moons was having an interesting day. He'd been woken up before dawn when the watch officers had been forced to break up a brawl between legionaries of the Fifteenth and the Twelfth: the enmity between Afolabi and the Boss had trickled down, and no one who'd been through Marchford and Liesse was inclined to leave any teeth in a mouth that talked shit about Catherine Foundling. The poor fuckers were lucky they'd not run into the Gallowborne when flapping their mouths: that grim collection of paleskins drew steel over things like that and didn't sheathe until the blade was red. The legate had been in a mood when he'd stepped to the scene, but Hakram already had it in hand. The men from the Twelfth were handed to their officers for discipline – and with Marshal Ranker looking over Afolabi's back no one was under the illusions they'd get off lightly – while his boys were dragged back into their part of the camp. Fighting among legionaries when in hostile territory drew sharper sanctions than just brawling: it would be a hard flogging for them. When Deadhand had said their punishment would be delayed until the return to Creation they'd smirked, but that had disappeared real quick when Hakram had added that to even it out he'd deliver the flogging himself.

Nauk fancied that the memory of his old friend stomping a fae noble by swinging a horse one-handed would scare them into acting like proper fucking legionaries for a few weeks at least.

“She made another enemy,” the legate grunted as he watched the last of them leave.

“He's Soninke old blood,” Deadhand replied. “Was never going to be a friend. He's more useful as an example regardless.”

The good thing about Hakram was that he didn't believe in kissing ass. Never had. If he said the Boss' decision to send a godsdamned general of Praes out of the room to clean her pipe like a misbehaving child had some sense to it, it meant he believed it. He wouldn't have been afraid to disagree openly if he did – not with only Nauk around to hear, anyway. The legate spat to the side.

“If you say so,” he said. “The Wallerspawns weren't moved, by my reckoning.”

The other orc's brow rose. Nauk scoffed.

“She speaks with a Laure accent, Hakram,” he said. “She's as much one of them as I am.”

"She'll still smack you in the mouth if she hears you say that word," he replied. "We have larger scores to settle than old grudges like that one. They're our allies, at least for now."

Easy for Deadhand to say. His grandfather hadn't died taking a run at the Wall. The old scrapper had been too deep in the Red Rage to retreat when the Watch came out in force, and ended up with his head on a spike for it. It might still be there for all he knew.

"Deoraithe, then," Nauk conceded in a grumble.

"Kegan's hard iron, I'll give you that," Hakram conceded in Kharsum. "But she was watching, and she'll remember next time she feels like pushing."

"Politics," Nauk snorted. "Glad you're the luckless bastard stuck dealing with those."

"Not that different from College alliances, when it gets down to it," Deadhand replied, turning to gaze out into the night. "Everybody wants something."

The legate grunted, conveying his general fucking distaste for Wasteland schemery.

"Grab what sleep you have left," Hakram finally said. "Tomorrow's a red day if there ever was one."

Nauk of the Waxing Moons grinned, baring ivory chops to the night.

"Looking forward to it," he said.

They got to the place by midmorning, and even as the rest of the armies dug in Nauk pawned off his duties to Commander Jwahir to study the grounds at his leisure. The Taghreb woman was a better hand at organizing, anyway. He'd picked her as his second for that very reason when he'd lost his brother so fucking senselessly at Three Hills. The same eerie road they'd used to get here continued to the north, supposedly reaching Aine and the seat of the Summer Court eventually. How long it would take to get there, no one had any idea. Apparently time was subjective in Arcadia, which sounded like the kind of shit the warlock's get babbled about after a few cups. Not close enough for whatever was in there to reinforce the opposition in time, which was the important part anyway. There was no sign of the enemy for now, and they'd checked. The woods to the east were empty, and thick enough besides you couldn't march in proper ranks through them. The hills to the west couldn't be marched through from the other side, as far as the goblins could tell, but that meant fuck all when the opposition had wings. If Nauk was in a betting mood, he'd bet on Summer placing a nasty surprise in there to flank them where the lines were engaged.

At least this would be a defensive engagement. The kind of fight most of their host were best at. Wallerspawm liked to let the enemy come to them and they were heavy on bowmen besides, while Marshal Ranker's gang of cutthroats had the sharpest sappers in all the Legions. As for General Afolabi's Twelfth, their cognomen was Holdfast. They'd stopped a Callowan force twice their size from making it to the Siege of Summerholm, during the Conquest, by digging in and letting them die on their palisades. After losing a full kabili at the onset of the Liesse Rebellion and needing the Fifteenth to bail them out of the mess in Summerholm, those boys and girls would be eager to wipe off the black marks from their record. They'd fight with fire in their bellies no matter what came calling. The absence of reliable information about what that would be had been a stone in the large orc's boot for this entire expedition. Apparently there was going to be some kind of princess, but what the Hells did that mean? The legate was more interested in numbers and those were still anyone's guess. The almost thirty thousand assembled here were nothing to fuck with lightly, and Nauk would bet on them to handle up to twenty-five thousand Summer screamers no matter what nobles backed them.

Thirty thousand would be dicey, though. More than that and it was going to get bloody, and not in the way the legate enjoyed. The Fifteenth had been outnumbered before, at Three Hills, and outclassed at Marchford. But never both. Even the Boss would have a hard time pulling a win from that mess if it came down to it. Speaking of. Pretending he couldn't see Jwahir looking for him with her report-face, Nauk legged it as discreetly as an orc his size could. Catherine was sitting on one of the decadent cushioned chairs they'd looted back at the fortress, lounging like a lazy cat with that dragonbone pipe of hers. Nauk occasionally wondered if she knew what even just this much dragonbone was worth: you could buy a mansion in one of the better parts of Ater for the gold it would earn at an auction. She blew out a stream of smoke as he rested his elbows on the back of her chair, the wooden frame groaning in protest.

"Nauk," she greeted him.

She spoke his name the way it would be spoken in Kharsum. It was always eerie, when she used the tongue of his people. She had a flawless heartlands accent without having ever stepped a foot there – Name fuckery struck him as the guilty party there. The legate could the side of her face well, from this close. Sharp and high cheekbones that had gotten even sharper since she'd gone into Arcadia to exact her share of hide from Winter, tan skin had had gotten ever darker with all the marching in the sun they'd been doing of late. Whether she was pretty by human standards he had no idea – she certainly had her fair share of people panting after her, though she'd ever only given Kilian the doe eyes. Nauk knew better than to ask how that had turned out. It hadn't escaped anyone's attention that the two of them had been keeping separate beds for months and that they rarely spoke directly to one another anymore.

"Cat," he growled back.

"Shouldn't you be preparing your men?"

The tone was casual, but he knew to take it seriously anyway. The Boss was nowhere as much of a hardass as Juniper, but she liked to run a tidy crew. Even those who'd been with her since Rat Company were expected to pull their weight.

"Jwahir has it in hand," he said. "I'll look it over later. There a reason you haven't made the portal?"

"I expect that they'll appear not long after I do," she replied, amused for some reason beyond him. "Better we dig in first."

"Gonna be a rough one, this," Nauk grunted. "Might take us more than a bell and a half to retreat if we're under fire the whole time. And the last ones to leave will be given a bitch of a fight."

He'd been standing close to her long enough to start feeling the cold now. Whatever she'd done in Winter it had changed her. Worse temper, though she'd never exactly been a delicate flower, and nowadays wherever she stood was always a mite frosty. Nauk didn't mind. It reminded him of home, of the Steppes in spring just after the snows melted. From his height he could see the corner of her mouth twitch. The blade-smile. Someone always ended up bleeding out on the ground before too long whenever she made it.

"Princess Sulia will be in command, on the other side," Cat said. "She was described to me once as having a "beautifully simplistic view of things"."

"Don't need to get fancy when you can torch everything all the time," Nauk said, admiration and disgruntlement warring for his tone.

"Dealing with someone like that is a lot like dealing with a hero," the Boss mused. "She'll enter the field thinking she knows the story ahead of her, because that's all she's ever known."

"I'm guessing that's not a nice story, for us," Nauk said.

"It's a story about invaders taking a beating as they try to retreat," she said. "Most likely capped with a last stand at the gate to cover the last of us fleeing."

"We taking the rearguard, then?" the legate asked.

Would be a fight to remember, that was for sure. He wasn't fond of the notion of sacrificing his jesha to cover other Legions and Wallers— Deoraithe, better he use that even in his mind, he wouldn't put it above her to be able to smell shit like this — but if that was what was needed to win the war he'd grind his fangs and take the reaming.

"Oh Gods no," Catherine laughed quietly. "Summer's going into this with the perception that our strategy is all about limiting losses. I didn't come here to flee limping, Nauk. I've come for blood."

Nauk felt his shoulders loosen and chuckled. Not because of the words, though they'd been reassuring enough, but because of the tone. Quiet. Catherine Foundling was always at her most dangerous, when she got quiet. Time to make that known across two worlds, he figured.

"The girl was right," Duchess Kegan said.

Adair shifted on his feet, watching the same sight she was. Countess Foundling had opened her gate but a half-hour ago, not long after the goblin had finished her preparations, and already the host of Summer was arriving. They were coming from the north down the road, as had been anticipated, but Kegan doubted that was the only direction they would strike from. This Princess Sulia had proved competent enough to annex most of southern Callow: she'd have more subtlety to her intent than a mere battering ram.

"About the timing only. She was wrong about the numbers," Adair said softly. "My men say over fifty thousand."

The ruler of Daoine closed her eyes, allowing herself the weakness only because no one but her old friend was close enough to see it. More than fifty thousand. They could barely afford to fight half that.

"Summer must have mobilized its full might to crush us," she finally said. "There cannot be anything but sentinels left in Creation."

"The Fifteenth and the Knightsbane's command were on the move due south when we crossed the gate," Adair noted. "She might have meant for all of us to serve as bait while they take back Dormer and Holden."

"Neither force is large enough to hold the cities, if Summer attacks afterwards," Kegan said, frowning.

"She is young," Adair shrugged. "And yet to be defeated. That breeds arrogance."

"She is not a fool," the duchess murmured. "Let us be careful to avoid the mistake of taking her for one. It would be a costly misstep to make."

And oh, what delicate dance it had been to deal with that terrifying child. Where the Carrion Lord had dug up this monster she did not know, for surely the stories about her being an Laurean orphan were a smokescreen for the truth. Obscure Imperial wards did not go on to win the kind of battles Catherine Foundling had, not after two years. Twice heroes had died at the girl's hand, devils and demons scattered by mortal men under her command, a resurrection forcefully snatched out of the hands of a descending Hashmallim. These were the signs of a legend in the making. If the Black Knight had ever been linked to one of the People, Kegan would have believed Foundling to be a child of his own blood raised in obscurity to avoid the knives of the High Lords. As this was not the case, she must have been found young and trained away from prying eyes to be unleashed as a weapon to suppress future Callowan rebellions. The villain's foresight never ceased to chill her blood, schemes decades in the making coming to fruit at precisely the right time.

Still, it seemed his weapon had gone slightly astray. She was on her way to becoming a power in her own right, and that meant she could be negotiated with. Kegan had early understood the same truth that Ranker – that rotten old bitch – clearly did: to prevent Foundling from realizing the strength of her position, the stick had to be used with only a rare carrot dangled. It was a careful balance to strike, given what they were dealing with. The Duchess of Daoine still felt her blood run cold when she remembered that slip of a girl glancing at a general of Praes, casually mentioning she could Speak to him if she wished. The implied threat had been lost on no one at that table. Cross me and I will take away your free will, easy as snapping my fingers. Gods, barely eighteen and she could already use her Name to impose her will on others. Not even the Carrion Lord had been this precocious and Kegan knew the terror of the man better than most. Her own aunt had been left an arrow-filled corpse in her own fortress when the Duni was still but a Squire, swatted down like a fly in inside of the most heavily defended fortresses on Calernia. Praes was not to be trifled with, not without very good reason.

The gruesome mantle of the Calamities was being passed to fresh Named, and though yet young these monsters would grow as dangerous as the old ones.

Adair stirred again and it claimed Kegan's attention. She followed his eyes and saw the host of the fae spreading across the plain, facing the fortifications. Around sixty thousand she counted, revising upwards the earlier assessment. There were knights on winged horses that the duchess anticipated to be trouble even if they could not use sorcery, which seemed unlikely.

"The hills," Adair murmured.

There was, Kegan saw, a single person there. In a hooded cloak, leaning back against the slope as they sharpened a sword with a whetstone. At this distance, not even the Watch could get much more from eyesight. Whoever they were, they did not seem inclined to move from the height. A chronicler? Kegan wondered. It seemed odd for a scholar to be armed, or be here at all. She was debating sending scouts to make inquiries when movement emerged at the head of the army of Summer. Two silhouettes, both mounted. One pale and dark-haired with a perfect beard, wearing robes of woven flame and sunlight. A sword rested at his hip, no other weapon visible. The other was taller and there was no doubt about her identity: the Princess of High Noon was as the tales told, hair like fire and terrible to behold. Swirls of heat marred the air wherever she moved. The Princess Sulia was bearing a banner of truce, and rode halfway between the two awaiting armies before slamming the wooden shaft into the ground. Foundling's right hand found them not long after, the imposingly tall orc with the necromantic abomination at his wrist. He nodded politely, and etiquette dictated Kegan return the same. She did so grudgingly.

"Lady Foundling invites you to join the party that will meet with Summer," he said.

"Then I will do so," Kegan replied flatly. "This is more than we bargained for."

"It always is," the Adjutant smiled, sinisterly baring teeth. "You've seen the person in the hills?"

"We have," Kegan replied.

"She instructs they're to be left alone," the orc said.

"Why?" Kegan frowned.

"The exact words were "if that's who I think it is, we really don't want to get in her way"."

"Quaint," the duchess sneered, not allowing the uneasiness she felt to show.

An ally of Foundling's? No, it couldn't be. All the Named that followed her were accounted for. And if it was a Winter fae the army of Summer would have moved to attack them. It could not be the Wild Hunt, since this was not the seasons for it – only in Spring and Autumn did these entities come into being. Too many factors were unknown to her on this battlefield and Kegan did not like it in the slightest. She joined the rest of the diplomats regardless. The Countess herself and Ranker were all of it: since the other side had not cluttered the grounds, there was no need for them to do so. The goblin's face was a mask, but the girl herself seemed remarkably at ease. Like they weren't walking to treat with demigods in the fullness of their power. Monster, Kegan thought. Only a monster would be half-smiling as they approached the fae.

"Princess Sulia, I presume?" Foundling said.

"Duchess of Moonless Nights," the creature replied.

It hurt to look at her for too long, Kegan found. Like staring into the sun.

"Word does spread fast," Foundling drawled, tone amused. "Who's the man with the sharp beard?"

"I am the Prince of Deep Drought," the fae said, and though his face was beautiful the hatred turned it ugly. "We finally meet, pawn of Winter."

The girl clucked her tongue.

"I'm at least a rook, really," she said. "There's no need to be insulting."

Was she really unaware that every time she spoke the fae shivered with the urge to kill her? Kegan wondered with dismay. Why had she even come to treat if she was only going to taunt them?

"You wanted to talk," Ranker interrupted.

It was adding insult to injury for Kegan to ever have to feel thankful towards the likes of that withered old prune.

"Surrender," Princess Sulia ordered, and there was a weight to the tone that almost made Kegan want to kneel. "All of you may still swear yourselves to Summer. Only the broken thing wearing Winter's seal needs to die today."

"It's always refreshing to meet someone who's worse at diplomacy than I am," Foundling noted, seemingly impressed.

The Duchess of Daoine gritted her teeth. Was the girl still pretending she'd not carefully used Kegan's enmity with Ranker to get her way more often than not, baiting them to argument only to come in as a "mediator" at the last moment? Not even the Carrion Lord was this smug a manipulator – the Knight had the decency not to pretend he was doing anything but taking what he wanted from you. The Princess of High Noon ignored the Named, instead turning her eyes to the sole goblin.

"You need not die pointlessly, mortal," she said. "The laws of Summer will shield you after you swear allegiance."

The goblin's burned hand clutched tight until her sharp nails drew blood on her own palm. She met the fae's eyes with a grin full of fine fangs.

"I am a Marshal of the Legions of Terror, you pretentious tart," she said. "I live by only one law: one sin, one grace. You want my surrender? Come and take it."

The fae's eyes turned to Kegan, and she'd steeled herself. She felt what Ranker must have, the crushing weight on her shoulders that wasn't even an exertion of power – the Princess of High Noon did this just by sparing a mortal a sliver of her attention.

"I am a Duchess of Daoine," Kegan replied coldly. "I answer to neither god nor men, much less the likes of you."

"Quarter will not be offered twice," the Prince of Deep Drought said, tone sad. "It is not yet too late."

"Speaking of that," Foundling said, popping her neck with a gruesome cracking sound. "If you want to avoid me beating you like a rented mule it's not too late to make peace. I'll need hostages and reparations, of course, but you can still get away with losing only a hand."

We are going to die, Kegan realized with crystal-clear clarity. We are going to die because whatever the Carrion Lord did to teach this child broke her mind.

"Did you think we wouldn't notice the Prince of Nightfall's stench wafting from the woods?" the Prince of Deep Drought mocked. "He only had time to bring a third of Winter with him. You are outnumbered still."

The duchess glanced east, where there was still no sign of anything in the woods. Had the fae been tricked, or had the scouts? There was a game at play here and she knew neither the rules nor the players.

"I'm trying to be merciful here," Foundling said, and the lie was so insultingly blatant Kegan almost cringed. "Are you really going to spit on my goodwill?"

The Princess of High Noon did and the ground where she'd spat caught fire.

"Ah well, I tried," Foundling grinned, and it was an unpleasant thing to watch. "See you soon."

The fae held to the terms of the truce, the enemy army not beginning to move before the three of them had returned to the fold. A part of Ranker was sharply curious about whether they were respecting truce terms as they were held in Calernia or whether the concept of truce as known to Calernia had initially come from Arcadia, which was widely held to have existed before Creation itself. A matter for another time. She'd slip the question in her correspondence with Tikoloshe, the staggeringly ancient incubus might have an inkling. The Marshal had planned the defences of the allied armies without the knowledge of there being reinforcements from Winter inbound, if there truly were reinforcements inbound. She'd had eyes on Foundling's little raider ever since he'd first come to Denier, and though her scouts had lost track of him after the fortress her people had noticed the large amount of mages who'd disappeared with him. Was that the Squire's plan? Using the Count of Olden Oak and some unknown ritual to pretend Winter had sent troops, faking the presence of some powerful Winter fae. Wekesa's son took orders from her, so he might have coughed out a few secrets before she set out on her journey north. That would be deep cunning and deep planning, however, and she'd not struck Ranker as that kind of villain so far.

If false, it was the kind of bluff that could easily be called. It might gain them some time, but not much and not enough to affect the outcome. The evacuation had already begun, with the supply – and loot – carts leaving first. The former Matron saw the logic in it. They'd have to be taken across eventually, and this kept as much military strength on the field as possible for as long as possible. The Deoraithe regulars were slated to go through next, with the rest of the order to be determined as the battle unfolded. Ranker had been watching the Squire's movements carefully since it had come out she had some scheme in play, but gotten little information for it. After the gate out was opened Foundling had some of her few remaining mages scry across, and established contact for a few moments before breaking off. Her own mages had been listening in, and no words or images had gone through. Ranker, she-who-has-the-bearing-of-one-of-high-rank in the stonetongue and one-meant-to-stand-above-others-mercilessly in matrontongue, had been through more red days than any other goblin alive. She'd been warring in the Eyries when the Calamities were still in their cradles, she'd killed her way through the civil war and the Conquest and a dozen minor actions besides.

For the first time in many years, though, she felt like she was walking in deepest dark. The Squire was mad, this was obvious. All Named were, the successful ones merely managed to make that madness methodical the way Amadeus and the Empress had. And even with those two, one could glimpse the cliff edge and the sharp drop that followed. Sadly, that meant Ranker genuinely could not tell whether Foundling has been taunting the fae royalty because she was confident in victory or because she was too far gone to be able to conceptualize her own defeat. Even if this Prince of Deep Draught – and Gobbler take them all, weren't these titles even more pretentious than the ones Wastelanders jerked each other off with? – was correct and there were Winter fae in the woods, unless there were a great many more hiding than the twenty thousand implied this was still not a winning hand for the allied armies. The only visible unknown factor was that madwoman in the hills, and Ranker had needed no instructions from the Squire to steer clear of that. Putting aside that nothing good had ever come of an army picking a fight with a single mysterious stranger, Ranker had seen that ugly hooded cloak before.

There were some kinds of crazy not even goblins were willing to touch, and that one definitely qualified.

The Marshal's general staff gathered around her as the fae began their march, questions painted on their faces. Aabir, her Staff Tribune, took one look at her and grimaced. He'd known her for a long time, long enough to read the truth off her if she wasn't trying to lie.

"She still hasn't told us the plan," he said. "This is madness, ma'am. How can we be expected to fight when we don't know all the forces at work?"

"It makes sense, in a way," Kachera Tribune Saddler said more cautiously. "We do not know how well fae can scry in their own realm. We cannot leak a plan we are not aware of."

Ranker raised her black hand and was granted immediate silence.

"As as I see it, there are two options here," she said. "One, Black's Name rotted his mind and he went the way of the Old Tyrant, appointing a raging imbecile as his successor. If that's the case, even if we're not dead today we'll be in a few years. There's other wars around the corner."

Procer, she did not need to say. They all had the rank to be in the know.

"And two?" Saddled asked, eyes blinking sleepily.

He was getting old, wasn't he? And to think he was merely forty.

"Two, the Squire is the kind of brilliant that walks hand in hand with crazy and stupid," Ranker said. "I'm choosing to put my faith in Black. Make your own choices, but whatever they are get ready for a hard ride. The fae mean business – expect to have two sorcerers on par with the Wizard of the West pounding us."

Dangling a bit of hope, appealing on the worship of Amadeus that had become as much a part of the Legions as the singing and the drills and then an immediate threat to prepare for. It should be enough to keep their minds on the battle. Ranker wished she could be so easily distracted, but she was too old to fool herself. She climbed onto the platform she'd had raised to get a decent view of the battle, her bones protesting the indignity before she settled on a cushion. At her sides messengers, mages able to scry and signal officers stood ready for orders. Afolabi would have a similar set up on his side of the fortifications, and he was enough of a professional his grudge against Foundling would be put aside for the battle. You poor fool, she thought. You should be more worried about her grudge against you. The girl's Callowan, they gnaw on those like bones. She dismissed the thought and turned her eyes to the battle, to Summer on the march. Ranker had prepared the plain for a hard battle, and today she would get to see how fae died.

The allied camp consisted of two ringed wooden palisades, with the gate in the centre. There was an avenue with smaller movable barricades going straight through, punctuated with two sets of rough but solid wooden gates. Ahead of the first palisade she'd had her sappers dig a trench ten feet deep with spikes at the bottom, which had unfortunately limited how much work she'd been able to order on the plain. There were weight-triggered demolition charges buried according to the Third Delay Pattern she had herself designed during the civil war, but she didn't expect to see much death from those. The lily field was what would blood them, closer to the trench. An array of pits three feet deep with a sharpened stake at the bottom, hidden under branches and dead grass. The prince and princess had retreated into their ranks for the offensive, warier than the Marshal would have thought. The chit in the south must have bled them at some point for them to be this careful. Might yet work out to her advantage, Ranker decided. The first line was the same infantry they'd seen earlier in their expedition through Summer, and it kept advancing until across seven points in that line demolition charges blew.

The spray of blood and flesh had long ceased being exciting and turned into cold mathematics, coin put into tools that killed men but could have been spent otherwise. The assessments in her unspoken records shifted with every battle. Though the damages had been minimal, the enemy could only guess at the concentration of charges and it stopped them from advancing. Right out of the farthest bow range they'd shown at the fortress, as she had meant them to. The wings of the three first ranks of the fae lit up and Ranker glanced away, their trajectory already happening in her mind. The winged cavalry in the back wasn't moving, as she'd guessed it would not. The Watch was being kept in reserve to deal with them, but it seemed that her assessment that the knights would only strike after the fight was engaged was correct. Ahead of her agonized cries sounded, so Ranker deigned return her attention closer to camp. Two for two, it seemed. The Princess of High Noon had only figured that there would be demolition charges ahead of the trench, and so sent a first wave to clear them and gain a foothold. Instead they'd gone straight into the lily field and were bleeding out like stuck pigs with the sappers on the outer wall tossed sharpeners to clear out those who'd landed on solid ground.

Now the fight began, as the second wave that had taken flight moments after the first landed in the shreds of meat and bone that were their comrades. The lily patches had been revealed, so they managed an actual landing this time. If Princess Sulia had meant for them to then attack the walls Ranker would have called her a fool, since they could have directly assaulted the walls. But that wasn't the intent at all, was it? The third wave, right behind the second, was the one to assault. The second was bringing up bows, finally in range to use those devastating fire arrows that had harassed the allied camps on the march here. The Legions fired their crossbows straight into the bowmen in good order, while the Deoraithe standing between the first and second wall sent a volley into the sky at the fae headed for the wall. A costly trade off, Ranker saw. Legion crossbowmen took their toll but the enemy fired back and fires bloomed across the palisade, hurriedly put off with sand and dirt. There were damned holes in the outer wall, and when the enemy infantry came marching in they would have breaches ready for them. As for the bloody useless Deoraithe, they barely killed a hundred. Shooting fae in the sky was like trying to shoot a fish in the ocean.

The melee at the outer palisade began in earnest, but Ranker wasn't worried about that. The legionaries would hold steady against numbers that low. The other waves in flight were more worrying, one to back the bowmen and the other the vanguard. But most worrying of all was the dozen fae that rode out of the ranks in a scattered line and raised their hands. A rolling wave of flame swept across the plain and the Marshal's dead hand twitched. One after another, her charges blew from the sorcerous heat. A field full of potholes but clear of dangers ahead of them, the fae infantry resumed their advance. The Marshal felt a grudging sliver of respect for the Princess that was her opponent. She'd been willing to send a few thousand into the grinder just to keep the enemy busy while she prepared a clear way forward for the rest. That was the kind of decisiveness that won battles. Not, however, if she could help it. Ranker gestured for one of her mages to come closer.

"All mage lines," she said. "Wave fireballs to knock the fae out of the sky before they land on the outer palisade. Steady, constant."

The order went across smoothly and the broad balls of flame that bloomed got the situation under control. Trying to kill Summer fae with fire was like trying to drown a salmon, but the impact was enough knock them down. Those that try to fly above instead ate arrows as the Deoraithe finally began pulling their weight. Outer palisade was in hand, for now, but the fae army was hungrily devouring the distance as it charged forward. That was, Ranker saw, when Winter struck. The darker half of the Fair Folk did not come announced. It moved in silence, a tidal wave of warriors adorned with dead wood and black stone that struck the eastern Summer flank like a snake. At their head a one-eyed man rode a horse of shadows, the spear in his hand glinting of murder. They were impressive to watch, but the Marshal did not care how fucking impressive they were. She watched for numbers, and found only the twenty thousand the Prince of Deep Drought had sneered at. The same numbers pulled off the flank of Summer in good order, slowing the assault some but not by enough. If these were all the cards Foundling had to play, the battle was a loss slowly crawling to them.

The wave of infantry hit the outer palisade and the legionaries buckled. Deoraithe reinforced them, but there was only so much room and the fae kept coming. Ranker could see the rest of the battle play out in her mind. They'd hold, at least until Winter began to break. Then the pressure would strengthen and they'd lose the outer palisade. And then inch by inch they would die, painting the ground of Arcadia red. Summer would lose half its army, she thought. But it would win, and only wisps of the army that had come into Arcadia would escape through the gate.

"Marshal," her Senior Mage's voice whispered urgently.

She'd not heard him coming to her side, deep in thought as she had been.

"I'm listening," she said.

"Lady Squire's mages scryed across the gate again," he said.

Ranker licked her teeth.

"Same as last time?" she asked.

"Just a contact, then nothing," he agreed, then flinched and turned west.

The madwoman was still sitting on her perch, the former Matron saw. No, what had drawn her officer's attention was the gate that had just opened in front of the hills.

"Kolo, what is that?" she said.

"A gate, Marshal," the Senior Mage replied.

"I can see that," the goblin snarled. "Where is it from?"

"Creation," he whispered.

There was a sound then, that Ranker had not heard in twenty years. A horn, but not the large horns the Legion used. The kind of blowing horn that someone could carry in hand. Once, twice, thrice the call went out. All knights charge, it meant. That call had not shuddered across a battlefield since the Fields of Streges, and the Marshal was not ashamed to admit she felt the age-old shiver when the knights of Callow charged through the gate, killing lances down as they whistled through the air. The banner she did not recognize, a bell of bronze with a jagged crack through it set on black. Three thousand of the finest cavalry Calernia had ever seen ploughed into the western flank of Summer and Ranker began laughing.

"Oh, you conniving bitch," she said breathlessly. "You never intended for us to evacuate, did you?"

Eyes bright, one of the only three Marshals of Praes rose to her feet.

"Orders," she said, facing her mages. "My dears, do I have orders."

*greatwyrmgold*

Geez. Catherine's only beaten one demon, tricked one fae, and flipped off one angel, and people already think the Calamities must have trained her from birth. If things keep escalating, people are going to say she's the illegitimate child of the Dead King and Empress Triumphant (may she never return) by the end of the series.

*Barthumphries*

She's actually Emperor Traitorous.

"How do you know that you're not actually me?"

"I don't, but if I were I certainly wouldn't abdicate to you."

"Hmm, good point."

SagaDuWyrms

I bet she's the reincarnation of Triumphant. Either that or some God got bored and decided to see what a child of The and Amadeus would be like.

NerfContessa

Hilarious.

Honestly, how do we know traitorous the 1st and his successors are actually dead?

tmeenaks

I wouldn't even be dissapointed in that case. Traitorous is my favourite emperor by far. I mean, Triumphant's cool and her her "Why not" line was undeniably great, and there was also the empress who had a pit full of man-eating tapirs if I remember correctly, but Traitorous is just so goofy. That quote from the Order of Unholy Obsidian actually made me laugh.

darkaxz

Traitorous is one of my favorites too. Him and Irritant.

MrPicklesAndTea

I can't wait for Empress Triumphant to return.

Poetically Psychotic

I actually saw this one coming, not that I expect that to make it any less awesome next chapter. What was a delightful surprise is how the other generals see her as an enigmatic and possibly deranged mastermind, rather than an engine of brute force who has become exceptionally good at applying it in just the right place. The end result is the same, but trying to plan for one when your opponent is the other will only end in misery and blood.

Bart_KF

"Quarter will not be offered twice," the Prince of Deep Drought said, tone sad. "It is not yet too late."

"Speaking of that," Foundling said, popping her neck with a gruesome cracking sound. "If you want to avoid me beating you like a rented mule it's not too late to make peace. I'll need hostages and reparations, of course, but you can still get away with losing only a hand."

We are going to die, Kegan realized with crystal-clear clarity. We are going to die because whatever the Carrion Lord did to teach this child broke her mind.

This is far from the first time this story made me laugh, but god damn was it an impressive one. Even better that this is exactly what an uninitiated witness to Catherine Foundling's Godsdamn Ridiculous Antics should be thinking right now. It fits right into the story of They Never Saw It Coming.

gamingamingaming

Wow, it's going to be so crazy when Empress Triumphant (may she never returns) returns

Chapter 28: Gambits

"I've yet to encounter a situation that couldn't be improved by a copious amount of lies and body doubles."

– Dread Emperor Traitorous

Well, it'd taken two years and some change but I was finally on the right side of a cavalry charge. And all it had cost me to get there was a lot of murdering, and that one spot of high treason.

The thoughts were flippant, but the sight before me killed the urge to continue in that vein. Three thousand knights of Callow were breaking through the western flank of the fae, taking death with them wherever they went as they carried the banner I'd named on a spur. I'd read about the chivalric orders, the men and women who had once been the pride of the Kingdom, and I thought I'd understood the kind of weight they could bring to bear. I'd been very, very wrong about that. Two thousand fae died in the blink of an eye, pierced by lances and trampled by destriers. It wasn't that the knights were gifted with eldritch power, not like the Watch. They were mortals through and through, though trained in war since they could walk. Neither were they like the paladins of the Order of the White Hand, sworn to fight Evil and made able to call on lesser miracles for it. Or so the old books said, anyway. The Order had been long buried by the time I was born, Black destroying it in an exceedingly thorough manner so that no hero would ever rise from their scattered ranks. No lost daughter of the White Hand would ever claim an old birth right and bring rebellion to Callow.

No, they were just Callowans. I watched a gout of flame splash against the breastplate of a long-haired woman and leave it untouched. Just Callowans, but no babes in the woods for it. The knights of Callow had not been forged by the old wars with the Principate, though enough of those were fought. No, they were the answer of the Kingdom to the sorceries of the Wasteland. There was a reason a Warlock could not simply wave his hand and burn a thousand of them to ashes. Clad in steel and prayer, the old song went. Hymns from the House of Light were carved into their armaments, mere grooves in steel until sorcery touched them. Then they glimmered, and magic slid like droplets off a duck's back. It was not immunity: they could still be harmed through the protection, often had been, but it was telling that when Black had thought to break them he had turned to orcs and pikes instead of whatever madness Warlock could have unleashed. In front of goblin steel, the armaments of the knights were armour like any other. There was a lesson in there. The chivalric orders had been founded to check a threat, and when the nature of that threat changed they were caught flatfooted and destroyed.

Today, though? I'd found them an enemy that could not, would not change.

"Captain Firasah," I said, and the mage at my side stiffened. "Word from the other side?"

"She has gone through, ma'am," the one-eyed Taghreb replied.

Firasah had been one of the mage officer who'd tried to scry the Summer forces when the Fifteenth had still been in Summerholm. She was one of the lucky ones – she'd excised her eye before the burns from the backlash could spread across half her face. Not all the mages had been so fortunate. She'd hesitated when I'd told her we would be scrying Winter while on the march, but as I'd thought my title shielded the mages from the frozen fury that had poured through the connection. It had done little to soothe the Prince of Nightfall's temper, when I'd found him, but the bait of Summer crippled I had dangled had been too tempting for him to resist. The lateness of the arrangement had limited what forces he could bring, though, more than I would have wished. Another ten thousand fae would have made it all much easier. He'd taken another royal with him along for the ride: the Princess of Silent Depths. They'd asked for prizes and to know my plans.

Naturally, I'd lied.

"Good," I replied quietly, closing my eyes.

I'd begun this battle thinking I was aware of every string being pulled. Winter was out for blood and plunder, unquenchable hunger in their bellies. Kegan and Ranker wanted to leave Arcadia as soon as possible, convinced this fight could only be measured in shades of defeat. And Summer? Summer wanted to crush me. To turn the quibbling mortals who'd dared step foot in their domain to ashes. I'd understood that before the other two commanders in my army, because I had an advantage they didn't. I still remembered that hard-bitten hatred I'd felt after crossing the gate, when I'd gazed upon the moonlit field. It didn't matter, whether or not it made tactical sense for the Princess of High Noon to withdraw from Creation to assail us. She had to. It was in her nature. I was of Winter, and Summer could never shy from a challenge as brazen as the one I'd issued. This battle had always been a certainty. It was a matter, then, of stacking the odds in my favour. I needed a story, or at least an engagement that had the shape of one. A larger Summer force blundering into a trap had served that purpose, leaving me only with the need to, well, make an actual trap.

So I'd spared the Count of Olden Oak, though through his actions he had earned an ugly death at my hands one day. Because a fae of count rank could open gates. Not gates like mine, sadly, but their ability to sort of step through the boundary protecting Creation could be extended to a group. Like half of Robber's cohort, along with enough mages to keep the Count of Olden Oak suppressed by layered wards. Iron knives had to be taken to him to convince him of making the gate, sadly, since the flame of Summer inside him made Speaking ineffective. Robber had been able to take care of it. He'd gleefully informed me that the College had an entire week of classes dedicated to the subject, along with the question of 'how much torture is too much torture'. The answer was apparently more complicated than I'd assumed. The goblin's assertion that it was an old cadet favourite along with the class about why 'vast and terrible powers' were not a valid reason to lack a supply train, I chose not to think too much about.

When back in Creation, his orders were to scry Juniper in a hurry. Depending on where the Fifteenth was relative to where he emerged with the Count, there could be two options. The first was that the legion would be too far too join up in time for the battle, in which case he was to simply call for the knights to ride in haste ahead of the infantry. The other was to bring all he could across and smash the fae flank according to the directions I gave him. I'd confirmed, before the beginning of the fight, that the second situation had come to unfold. On the other side of the portal that had just opened the entire Fifteenth was arrayed, and by now they would have begun to cross. So would Apprentice and Archer: the person who'd been on the other side of the scrying I'd arranged the moment I opened the gate was Masego, Captain Firasah was certain of it. Good. Then I could proceed according to what I'd meant this fight to be instead of a lesser scenario. Wiping out Summer in full here would be too much to hope for, I was aware. We were too deep in their territory for that. But if I played my cards right, I might just get what I needed to fight this war on my terms.

The thing was, when I'd left Marchford I'd been thinking of taking a force through Arcadia as a risky gamble that would allow me to steal a march on the Diabolist. After all, everybody knew fae were stronger in Arcadia. Able to use more of their power. The assumption of every commander in this war had been that I would try to fight them in Creation, where the grounds were more to my advantage. But were they really? The thought had been in the back of my mind since Laure. I could concentrate the Legions and the army of Daoine in the south and try to smash the Summer Court there, but that would be costly. We'd lose thousands in that fight, and thousands more would be too wounded to be of any use when I put down Akua. If I got Winter involved, that meant letting rapacious fae loose in Callow under the command of an entity I'd have a hard time handling, much less killing if it came to that. And even if I won, then what? Maybe we chewed half their number before they retreated having cost us twice that much, and then they would just pop out from somewhere else. The Fifteenth and whoever else I dragged with me were perhaps the most mobile force on Calernia at the moment, but the fae had the same advantage and they were better at using it.

So if I didn't want them to waltz past my army and burn Callow from the Waning Woods to the Silver Lake, I needed to dictate where they had to go. The way Juniper had done to me in our first war games, giving me her flag so she could be certain where I'd be instead of waiting out the days to a draw. The first place and moment I knew they'd be for sure? Here. Today. I had to bleed them hard here, because Arcadia was the only place where I could make their numbers meaningless. As long as I had the story on my side today, I could butcher them in droves in a way I simply couldn't in Creation without losing thousands myself. I couldn't end them here, that was true. There would be a second battle, and to be able to dictate when and where that one happened I was going to have to get a little... reckless. This was the only chance I'd get, which meant we were returning to the old standard of all or nothing. I'd never lost that bet before, and I didn't intend on starting today.

Most everything had been going the way I wanted it to, which was why I'd been less than surprised when Ranger had shown up. There was no doubt it was her: I knew that cloak for my Name dreams. I'd swiftly given orders to not provoke her in the slightest – as I understood it she refrained from killing Praesi for sport more out of courtesy for Black than any real fondness, and that might go out the window the moment someone irritated her. I'd thought she might be here for the Prince of Nightfall, to collect a second eye for her jewellery, but she'd not stirred when he'd come out. And she'd made no move against Princess Sulia, which had been my other guess. That was... not good. Were it someone else I would have presumed she was waiting for the fae to tire themselves out against each other before sweeping in, but that went against my understanding of Ranger. If she was here for a fight, she'd wanted whoever she was fighting at their peak. The longer she refrained from getting involved the more nervous I got, but what the Hells could I do about it? I was pretty sure I could take Archer, if I needed to, but the other Named had been pretty frank about the kind of margin her teacher outclassed her by.

That had pretty blatant implications about how that fight would go if I picked it, which I really didn't want to.

I opened my eyes and watched the battle. I still had cards to play, more than the opposition probably thought, but if I wanted to make this a win I'd have pick the right moment. To the east, Summer and Winter clashed. The centre of Winter's line was made up of a chunk of five thousand of my old buddies the deadwood soldiers, and they were chewing up the Summer regulars real bad. The flanks, though, were made up of the same rabbled that had assaulted Marchford – and they were taking a bloody beating. The tricks that had worked on my legionaries left other fae indifferent, and unlike the Summer fae those twits didn't fight in a proper battle line. Warriors against soldiers, I thought. My 'allies' had to take out their heavies early when the left flank wavered, a thousand Riders of the Host on their murderous unicorns charging out of the woods to slam into the enemy and take off the pressure. The winged knights of Summer took flight, though, and with matching numbers on both sides there was only one way that scarp would go. The battle in the sky above them wasn't going beautifully either.

Princess Sulia and her easily offended patsy had lit up their wings and flown above to scrap with the Prince of Nightfall and the Princess of Silent Depths, and watching that go down made me want to wince. The Winter prince opened with filling the sky with a howling blizzard, which the Princess of High Noon promptly screamed out of existence. Just screamed. Not even fire or anything. That must have been embarrassing. Watching the Summer royalty fight was giving me a notion of what it must have been like watching Apprentice and I go all out. Sulia kept the Winter royals busy up close and personal while the Prince of Deep Drought lashed out with sorcery. The Princess of Silent Depths slowed them down some when she called on some kind of power whose weight could be felt even from where I stood, bringing down crushing pressure that dented the ground under them – pulping fae from both sides in the process – and nearly knocked the Summer pair out of the sky. Didn't last long, though, and Princess Sulia retaliated by hacking her arm off and smashing the Prince of Nightfall's nose with it. I would have admired her style, if I wasn't next in line on her kill list.

It was unfolding like a lesson on why Winter got whipped whenever it came to a battle, and though they were holding for now – Silent Depths made herself a brand new arm out of ice and promptly tried to strangle the prince on the other side with it – that hourglass was going to run out eventually. Couldn't let that happen, much as I would have liked for the Prince of Nightfall to become an object lesson about why trying to use me was a bad idea. I still had a use for them.

The east was going more smoothly. Regulars of the Fifteenth were establishing a beachhead as they continued crossing, though it would take a while before there were enough to be effective. Apprentice had told me months ago he'd be able to turn fae into portal-makers of my own calibre, given a prisoner of sufficient rank, but I couldn't help but notice the portal he'd finagled was noticeably smaller than mine. I suspected there was another lecture about the ins and outs of turning fae into fodder for runic arrays on the horizon, and I wasn't looking forward to it. As for the knights of Callow, well, they'd carved their way through what must have been four thousand fae before withdrawing in good order. They would have taken more if the fae in front of them had not taken to the air instead of docilely allowing themselves to be run down. Now the Summer soldiers were attempting volleys, but even their tricky little fire arrows weren't swift enough to catch up to good cavalry on the move. The knights rode out of range, losing only score of men to the fire: heavy plate armour was nothing to sneer at, and without the fire sorcery those arrows were little different from mundane ones.

They formed up again and began wheeling around to take the fae in the back, to my delight. A few thousand Summer regulars had hastily formed a line where they'd been charging before, only to find themselves facing nothing. It took the edge off the mass attacking the walls of my camp as well, and on that side Afolabi's legionaries were teaching the fae how the Twelfth had earned its name. I might not like the man, but when it came to war he knew his business. I could already see a threat forming, though for now the advantage was ours. The fae who'd been readying themselves to weather another cavalry charge had nothing but a few hundred legionaries of the Fifteenth in front of them, and if they took it into their head to take that gate there wasn't much Juniper could do about it from her side. I'd have to give them something else to worry about.

"Captain," I said. "Get the message across: they're to meet me on the field. They just need to find the loudest screaming."

"Ma'am," Firasah saluted.

I rolled my shoulders under the plate. Shame I couldn't have prayers carved into it like the knights, but considering I'd kind of sold my soul to the Gods Below odds were all I'd get from that was charred skin. Well, maybe not sold. It'd been a little too casual for that, wasn't like I'd had a scribe make the transaction official. Pawned felt more accurate. I sent a runner to Nauk and watched as all around the central avenue of the camp barricades were set aside. Hakram came to me side not long after, fresh from the fighting on the outer palisades. His axe was slick with red and his pauldron cut straight through. His good mood was evident.

"Sortie?" he asked.

"About that time," I agreed, tying my hair in a ponytail.

I shut the claps of my helmet and slid on my gauntlets, flexing the armoured fingers carefully. Good. They might not be much help against a proper fae blade, but they did ensure that whenever I punched something it broke.

"Duchess Kegan sends word that she'll have regulars and the Watch follow," Adjutant said. "Since those winged knights aren't coming from us."

"Numbers?"

"Nine thousand total," the tall orc said. "Marshal Ranker is of the opinion that pulling off more will weaken the walls too much."

When it came to sieges, at least, I was inclined to follow the old goblin's lead. She'd been the one to mastermind the taking of Summerholm and Laure, during the Conquest.

"They're pulled as close and thick as we'll get them," I noted.

"She said the same thing," Adjutant grinned, like the ugly green cat who'd caught the bluejay. "First blooming before we begin our countercharge."

"You know, I'm sure there's a lot of things Summer is ready for," I mused. "Magic, flying fortresses, Named. Goblin engineering, though? I doubt it's one of them."

Nauk's two thousand formed into an avenue-wide battering ram, heavies at the front, and the Deoraithe readied behind them. I took the front, with Hakram at my side and the remains of the Gallowborne clustered around me. Behind us, near the centre of the camp, the sound of gears and pulleys releasing filled the air. A dozen ballista bolts tipped with cold iron screamed through air, followed a heartbeat later by trebuchet stones. The Gallowborne opened the gates wide for me, and in front of us I saw scores of fae bleeding on the ground even as the ranks ahead were punctured with rocks the size of horses. Ranker had been kind enough to soften the opposition for us, and would continue pounding at the flanks as we drove forward. Gods was I glad the fae disdained machinery.

"FIFTEENTH," I called out, unsheathing my sword. "FORWARD."

All the Hells broke loose, but for once we were the damned.

Typo thread:

"Or so they old books, anyway." I'm not sure what this was supposed to say

"he first was that the legion would be too far [too->to] join up in time for the battle"

"according to the directions I [have->gave] him"

"I knew that cloak for my Name dreams"

"[One] someone else I would have presumed [she] was waiting for the fae to tire themselves out"

"If she was here for a fight, she'd [wanted->want] whoever she was fighting at their peak"

"made up of the same [rabbled->rabble] that had assaulted Marchford"

In other news, I'm really looking forward to more of this. I'm also interested in reading about how Malicia feels about Cat's little spot of high treason though, so I'll keep reading and wait for the next chapter.

*Hakurei06*

Not sure, but wouldn't it be "for once, we were not the damned."

Since fate generally conspires to put Squire against a wall whenever possible?

The following lines are so garbled I don't have any clue what they are supposed to be:

Or so they old books, anyway

And

The goblin's assertion that it was an old cadet favourite along with the class about why 'vast and terrible powers' were not a valid reason to lack a supply train, I chose not to think too much about.

And

There should be a paragraph break between these sentences:

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Oh, and the line that begins "Ol' One Eye" is VERY confusing. I had to stop reading to try and remember how Marshall Grem got there, then I wondered if EE meant to say Ranker there, but that didn't work either. THEN finally I remembered that it was referring to one of the fae.

I think it really needs to be changed or clarified.

nineran

I think this may be a typo:

"Since those winged knights aren't coming [from->for] us."

"I knew that cloak [for->from] my Name dreams"

nineran

Also,

"I'd begun this battle thinking I was aware of every string being pulled."

this makes me think that she's about to be proved wrong, but then I see nothing to support that theory; she's talking about all the strings she knows. The only string she doesn't know about is Ranger, and that note about nervousness is a para or two away. Some rearrangement may be called for?

So, the Knights of Callow's "thing" is anti-magic armor. Makes sense for that sort of thing to work quite well against enemies that rely heavily on magic like pre-Malicia/Black Praes, and why

"What the pupil must learn, if he learns anything at all, is that the world will do most of the work for you, provided you cooperate with it by identifying how it really works and aligning with those realities. If we do not let the world teach us, it teaches us a lesson."
– Joseph Tussman

Cat is really, really good at this. She understands the levers and pulleys of the world and how to set them up for her own gain. In the Commander interlude, Juniper refers to this battle as the base for understanding Cat's methodology, while later battles will show her more experienced. What is her methodology? She understands the Role, and Narratives. She plays Xanatos Gambit better than anyone else.

"" It didn't matter, whether or not it made tactical sense for the Princess of High Noon to withdraw from Creation to assail us. She had to. It was in her nature. ""

I believe what she will eventually learn for next battles would be to push those levers even more efficiently. Right now she recognizes them and can arrange the scenes, but can still miss.

****

And this is quite necessary, seeing as though competent, she is no Tactician/Strategist on the level of Jun/Summer/Adameus/One-Eye etc. She is not exactly winning top prizes in the ruling, seeing her political structures fall down within weeks. She is not the top level fighter, and most Names can probably defeat her in a fair fight. (Though Cat has no indication of giving fair fight)

This has been a journey. In the college, Cat was thinking outside the box, and she managed to secure a draw. Only later, she started to exploit the narratives of the role and started exploiting and frankly adjusting the roles where she always emerges victorious.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

This is bullshit. What does Cat have against he-man anyway?

Chapter 29: Scale

"Ah, mortal wounds. My only weakness."

– Dread Empress Sanguinia II

This wasn't like fighting devils. Wasn't like fighting mortal soldiers either, because mortal soldiers couldn't summersault in mail and swing swords like they were feathers. We'd bloodied the fae so far but that had been through tactics, no what I'd been taught to call qualitative superiority. It was one thing to lead Nauk's heavies in forcing a gate when we outnumbered the enemy ten to one, another to charge into a sea of Summer swords and expect to come out on top. We would have to anyway. If the eastern flank was allowed to collapse, we were all fucked. The knights had bought us a lull and they were far from done with the day's bloody work, but now the Fifteenth and its allies needed to bring it all home. Summer would have trump cards of its own, of that I had no doubt. I refused to believe all they had in their arsenal was regulars, winged knights and a handful of nobles. If that were the case, they wouldn't have a history of crushing Winter in open battle. My role, then, was to force the hidden blade into the open and promptly break it.

There were probably elegant ways to do that, fancy manoeuvres and strategies, but Akua hadn't been entirely wrong when she'd called me a thug. I didn't have the time for elegant, so watering the ground with red until something came to stop would have to do.

Fire greeted us when we came out screaming. Ribbons of flame shot out like spears, shivering through the air and burning clean through steel and flesh. The tongue that would have put a hole in my belly I cut without without missing a beat, and Hakram contemptuously ignored the fact that his own shoulder was smouldering. We were the only ones so dismissive: sorcery the fae had shaped in the span of a breath stopped a shield wall two hundred wide, and stopped it cold. We couldn't allow them to pull these kinds of surprises often, I thought. We didn't have the numbers to handle those kind of casualties. They could trade three fae for every legionary sallying and still have it be nothing more than a drop in the bucket. I'd enjoyed having the bigger army on my side, at the fortress of Olden Oak, but now I was back in familiar territory: outmanned and in way over my head. I smashed into the Summer line like a runaway cart, the slivers of power I'd fed into my legs when I got close seeing me shoot forward quicker than the enemy had anticipated. I hacked my way through some poor fool's hand and threw him at the man behind him, face grim.

The hateful thing about the fae was that their sorcery was not rituals. Every one of them was at least a middling caster, and their tricks were heads and shoulders above those that the Legions taught their mages. Cutting my way into the throng had only killed the fire ribbons of the fae in front of me, the rest could have cared less. We weren't entirely unprepared, though. What few mages had not gone with Robber finished their ritual a few heartbeats later, disrupting the fae flames and allowing the heavies to finally close the distance. My insistence that Apprentice teach our mage contingents some things to deal with the fae was paying off, though they were few and no replacement at all for a caster of Masego's calibre. With Adjutant at my side, I set to keeping the fairies busy. Perspective went up in smoke as we waded into the enemy host, replaced by quick flashes of movement and steel. My shield was carved away strike by strike, ice growing to fill the gaps without the need for me to even will it as I traded glancing blows for death strokes. Calm, measured, ever going forward. This was not war, it was just a chore taken care of to the backdrop of screaming.

Nauk's voice screamed for a wedge to be made and to my sides legionaries took formation, shields high and swords piercing forward like this was just a drill on the training yard. Getting our foot in the door had been costly, I saw from the corpses and flickers of sorcery that still took lives every few heartbeats, but we had it. At this rate there would not be much left of Nauk's jesha by nightfall, but we had bought something precious with those lives: room for the Watch. The cloaked Deoraithe did not deign to use bows, this time. They took to the left of our wedge with knives and longswords, scything through the Summer regulars with war cries in the Old Tongue. The rank and file of Daoine's army poured in behind them, propping up the Fifteenth. They were no legionaries, but they were well-trained soldiers in mail with swords and shield that did not flinch in the face of sorcery. I caught all this in a glance, for it was all I could spare. The trail of dead behind me had apparently marked me as enough of a threat the fae were getting inventive.

I ran through a soldier but her charges' momentum had her collapsing on me, another three fae piling up on me as a dozen of them rose in the air and began calling on colourful lights. A few crossbow shots from the Gallowborne slowed them down, but I was too busy dealing with the writhing, clawing mass trying to pull down my shield to be thankful. The lights hit the lot of us like a dozen sharpeners, tearing through flesh and bone and blowing up straight off my feet. I was thrown against the raised shield of one of my retinue and sharply refused his hand to help me up: my fucking shield was gone, again. And my sword was bent and burned to the point of uselessness. Those pricks. I'd spat in Malicia's soup already, where did they think I was going to be getting goblin steel from now on? I sidestepped a spear, chucked the remains of my sword into the man's face and ripped the weapon out of the fae's hands. Had no idea how to use one of these, so I snapped it in half and broke a soldier's jaw with the shaft before taking her exposed throat with the point.

She had a sword, thank the Gods, so I lifted it up her corpse and took it in hand. Too light and long for my tastes, but it would do. Anyways, it wasn't technically corpse-robbing if the battle wasn't over right? Deoraithe arrows took care of the flying casters before they could have another go at blowing me up – and huh, my breastplate was actually melted and I simply hadn't noticed – so I gripped the neck of a fae trying to put a spear in Hakram's back and squeezed until something gave with an ugly crack. He grunted thanks and I waved them away, barely remembering to drop the corpse in my grip first. The Fifteenth had gained ground since the Watch had taken the field, steadily advancing as the cloaked lot essentially took care of the left flank. Watching the fights there was hard on the eyes. The Deoraithe were as quick as the fae and twice as ruthless, deaths on both sides happening almost faster than the naked eye could see. Whoever led Summer now that the Princess of High Noon was busy beating Winter royalty raw had to know they were in trouble, I thought.

Our sortie had put a knife in their bellies, and between the knights and the Watch the palisades had managed to sort themselves out. Ranker's engines were still pounding wherever the fae were thickest, and though bloody trails could no longer be seen now that they'd gotten used to it every shot still left its share of dead. The trade of corpses was in our favour, and if Juniper managed to get enough men on this side of the gate then we'd have them encircled on three sides and it wouldn't matter if they were more than us – it was the soldiers at the edge of the circle that fought, not those in the middle. They needed a win on one of the three sides, and they needed it quick because even if they unfucked one of the flanks as long as my sortie went unchecked there was a chance we'd split the meat of their army in two. If we did, they were done. So bring out your monsters, I thought. Now is the time.

The fae lines parted and I finally got to see Summer's answer to the Sword of Waning Day, the deadwood soldiers that had given me so much trouble on our first encounter. Fae tended to prefer mail, and light one at that, but these were different. Heavy plate of gold from foot to neck, thick gleaming rubies dotting it in arcane patterns. Golden armet helms atop, with the thin slit for their eyes steaming from whatever was inside. Long heater shields polished like golden mirrors, almost as if someone had tried to make a kite shield for a footman, covered their left flanks. In their right hands halberds of pure ivory were held. Was I supposed to be impressed they used a two-handed weapon with one hand? I was pretty sure I could do the same. Wherever the tread the greenery smoked and died, which did not bode particularly well. If they were half as good as killing as the deadwood soldiers, then Nauk's legionaries were going to rout. I'd taken Named to handle a few members of the Sword of the Waning Day, and there must have been at least ten thousand of these shiny bastards ahead of me.

Well, at least I knew what part of this battlefield the enemy commander was most worried about. I looked at those rubies, and the armours that seemed made of pure gold.

"Catherine," Hakram gravelled. "Why are you smiling?"

"Because by the time this is all over, I'll be able to afford rebuilding Marchford," I said.

The golden fae slammed the butts of their halberds against the ground as one, a wave of heat washing over me and everyone else I could see. The warmth didn't leave, afterwards, it hung in the air. The Summer fae in it quickened, while my legionaries grew sluggish. Oh that was just bullshit. Warlock could probably do something similar, but there weren't ten thousand of the handsome bastard. Ranker, bless her wretched goblin soul, caught the danger. She had the ballistas fire at the golden fae, a dozen bolts that should have punctured their ranks. Instead the cold iron-tipped bolts hung in the air mere feet in front of them, and slowly began to turn. That, uh, wasn't a great development.

"Dodge," I yelled.

On the bright side, they'd been aiming for Named and not legionaries. Unfortunately that meant me, and even though I flattened myself against the ground and avoided the worst of it two of them tore into the same shoulder. Gods, those things were fucking heavy. I bit my lips to avoid screaming and crawled on the ground trying to get them out as the golden fae began to advance. My fingers were twitching too much, pain continuing to roll through my body in harsh waves. It was the iron, wasn't it? You couldn't steal fae power and not expect to have some fae weaknesses come with it. Adjutant was the one who got them out of me, and I muttered Rise through gritted teeth as my broke shoulders and ribs snapped back in place and the wounds slowly started to close. The well was beginning to run dry, I could feel. Another damned liability I was going to have to deal with. Hakram's plate was dented in three places, but the bolts hadn't broken through. The sight was no comfort. He must have called on his aspect for that, and that was another advantage we'd just lost.

"Is it possible to bruise a lung?" I said, spitting a thick gob of blood to the side. "Because I think I bruised a lung."

Whatever Hakram would have replied I didn't get to hear, because I was too busy exploding. Or at least that was what it felt like. At least a few of my ribs were now more powder than bone, an entire pauldron was liquid and burning through my aketon and to add that special touch I was now falling. From the sky. Where I did not remember going of my own will. I coughed blood again but managed to shape a pane of shadow and ice under me, landing on it like a rag doll. The strange noise of fae wings in action erupted, and a dark-skinned woman in mail of jade came to face me. Her eyes were golden as the armour of the fae who'd been wrecking my day, golden as the Diabolist's. For all that, she was no Soninke. Her power filled the air so thickly I could almost taste it. Duchess, I thought. She had to be. Unlike the Summer nobles I'd fought so far, she did not talk and posture. She pointed the tip of her sword at me, and I hastily broke the panel that held me up. The air where I'd been exploded again, not in flames or light but as if the wind itself had gone mad. Another panel formed under me, and this time I landed on my feet.

"Rise," I barked.

The ribs began to fix themselves but it was slow work and Gods I might not be able to afford slowness.

"Wither," the duchess said, her voice stunningly musical.

Three panels, I judged in less time than it took for my heart to beat. That was how many supports I'd need to leap my way to her. I moved before the thought was finished, and that was the only reason I survived. The hem of my cloak was caught in the area where her power surged, and the cloth thinned and dried instantly. Considering the amount of water there was in my body, the thought of what would have happened to me if I hadn't moved was chilling. I moved faster than any mortal could have, but in the sky only the fae reigned. When I landed on my second panel she simply flew higher and pointed her sword at me again. Fuck. This wasn't a Rider of the Host I was scrapping with. If I kept this up, I was going to get killed. I unmade the panel and dropped down another fifteen feet before landing on another. We were staggeringly high, I only now noticed. That first hit had sent me up as if I'd been tossed by a trebuchet. Below us the golden fae had engaged the Fifteenth and the Watch, and the engagement was gruesomely one-sided. I needed to wrap this up quick if I wanted to have an army left by the time I broke my legs landing.

"Aren't you supposed to introduce yourself before we tangle?" I called out.

If nothing else, her title would give me a better read on what her powers came from.

"I am the Duchess of Restless Zephyr," she replied. "You are a corpse."

I wasn't particularly fond of being on the wrong side of that line, I decided. The healing power I'd stolen from the Lone Swordsman was being a real trooper about getting me back into fighting shape, but it only worked so fast. At least I was no longer in any danger of choking on my lungs. I leapt another two panels upwards to avoid getting exploded after her announcement, keenly aware that I was burning through power quickly. Even just maintaining a panel was draining, and unless I wanted my blood to turn to ice again I was going to have to find another solution.

"Would you like to make a wager?" I called out.

Come on, you're fae, I thought. You lot feed are always up for a bet.

"No," she replied, after trying to explode me again.

That was starting to get old, I would admit. Play to her nature, Catherine. She wants a kill, not a crippling. She's been throwing around hard hits since we started.

"I am going to destroy you in one blow," I lied, sword rising above my head as if I was preparing some trump card I really wished I had right now.

The Duchess of Restless Zephyr laughed. She was maybe thirty feet below me, and in the face of the flaring of my Name she smiled mockingly.

"You are no true duchess," she said. "Just a mortal playing the fool. Learn your place."

Unlike my parchment-thin deception, the ball of roiling winds that formed above her head was very much a threat. She kept feeding power into it while I tried to look like I knew what I was doing. Which I might. Maybe. It was a gamble with horrendous odds, but still better than jumping around beneath the clouds and hoping she ran out of juice before I did. Studying her face I gauged when she was about to finish preparations, the sneer and hint of triumph giving it away. If I got hit by that ball, what was left of me was going to rain all over this battlefield in little chunks. I really hoped that would hold out for her as well, because I was about to surrender an advantage that had saved my life at least three times in the last year. Her wrist began to move my fingers tightened around the hilt of the sword I'd stolen.

"Take," I said.

Her eyes went wide as we both felt the same thing: my Name claiming ownership over the winds she'd been gathering. The remains of what I'd stolen from the Lone Swordsman vanished, and instead a painful surge filled the aspect. I gritted my teeth to avoid screaming. Claiming Summer power when I was already bound to the Winter Court felt like my insides turning out. I struck down with my sword and the ball of winds followed, smashing into her and detonating. Dry winds howled all around as the arm she brought up to shield herself was ground out of existence, her tall silhouette plummeting down like a gold of old had kicked her back down to Creation. My control over the winds was beginning to wane, and I hurriedly forced them down to follow the Duchess. She'd fallen in the back of the lines of golden fae, the ground heaving at the impact, and that was where the winds unleashed the fullness of their fury. Fae were scattered like insects, the hurricane my opponent had meant to destroy me with blooming life a flower in every direction. That, I mused, should help my army get their bearings back.

Then the winds contracted, crushing whatever they'd drawn in with them, and shot back up towards me as my aspect once again became a shapeless bundle of power needing to be defined.

"Shit," I said, for my wit was peerless in any world.

I was quick to flee, but not quick enough. The ball had been popped already, but the winds were far from tender: they pulsed and detonated into a circle that had me sailing through the sky for the second time today. And was that the feeling of another rib breaking? Ah, no, just fracturing. It had happened to me often enough that I was beginning to be able to tell the difference just from the kind of pain that had me clenching my teeth. I couldn't even tell what direction I was falling in. I shaped a pane of ice in front of me but I was going so fast I just tore right through it. Another two tries only managed to slow me down and cut the side of my neck with shards. The landing was going to be problem, I mused. And this time I couldn't rely on stolen hero tricks to get me back on my feet afterwards. I was debating creating three panes in a row to see if that would do the trick when I felt my fall slow. Yanked out of the air, I started to float down like a feather until I was caught in a strong pair of arms.

"We meet again, Foundling," Archer grinned.

"Are you seriously trying to pretend you were the one to cast the spell?" Masego asked peevishly. "You're not even a mage."

I sighed, leaning back bonelessly in Archer's arms so I could stare at the braided Soninke.

"Hello, Apprentice," I said.

"Do I need to explain to you how gravity works," Masego said, "And what it does to the bones of women in plate falling from the sky?"

"I am invincible," I gravely said. "Gravity bends to my will."

Naturally, Archer took that as an excuse to drop me.

I so badly want to see Ranger in action... maybe she'll get involved if her pupil Archer gets hurt. *stabs Archer in the back* 😊

Another great chapter, had a real sinking feeling in my gut when cat lost Rise, eager to see how it pans out, and how she uses this new stolen aspect.

Nastybarsteward

Also, interestingly, when Cat gets to depend on an aspect, she swaps it out. Meaning she isn't getting too dependent and complacent on her aspects as Black taught her not to.

crazedmoth

I don't think she swapped it out because she was depending on it. She swapped it out because if she hadn't taken the winds she'd have been turned into mush.

Cpt. Obvious

She'd already used Rise two times (or was it three?) this day. At most she could get one more use of it, but then it would be very slow. Not something you'd like to depend on in the middle of a battle.

So stealing that wind power was probably the best thing to do.

darkening

She doesn't have wind powers anymore. It mentioned take going back to being formless and undefined. Maybe because it's not an aspect she's stealing this time?

---

It seems she can steal anyone's power for a limited amount of uses, it's just that Rise as an aspect has its limitation of three uses per day, but can replenish itself and is generally tailored for being used by people. In contrast to that, the wind ball was both a one-time spell (which she, as a non-mage, cannot really use) and born of a power, antagonistic to her.

RandomFan

She might have broken Take by doing that, I can't tell. It's something she shouldn't have as what she is.

Or maybe it just couldn't hold what she took, and/or it was consumed by Fall and Winter.

Euodiachloris

Catherine has been spending way too much time around the goblins, Robber in particular. Her response to seeing all that fancy armour had me in stitches. XD totally. "oh look, they are bringing shiny loot to the battlefield!" Best response to the enemy's elite deploying, ever.

Theo Promes

---

All that would disappear once Summer ends, though. I'm not sure that with all the stuff currently happening in Free Cities she'll sell all the loot to Mercantis in time.

Letouriste

She can still melt the gold and buy things in praes with that? Not many people would see the difference with normal gold

Darkening

Anyone that's ever played an rpg and seen high level enemies in tricked out gear coming after them knows that feeling. "Ohhhh, I'm gonna be wearing those gauntlets when we're done here..."

Cpt. Obvious

People have it wrong. Cat isn't the illegitimate daughter of Amadeus or anything like that. She's from matron stock, but were exiled as she was cursed at birth to look human.

It explains so much...

Take is for Call
Fall is for Claim
Break is for Bind
now the only question is – wil Cat be able to use them effectively and in the right order?
because if not, Bind will be her end.

Akua: "Your attemps to overwhelm my army are useless! No matter how many of them die, more will come to my Call!"

Cat: "Nice devil army you got there. It would be a shame if someone would just... Take it over."

_ _:

TAKE, like every other aspect, has to be used in the right time and the right way. Trying to usurp the control of a devil army that is literally connected to Akua's soul is almost definitely not the right way.

Akua is Diabolist. Fighting her on her terms, on her chosen ground, is a recipe for defeat.

@Erraticerrata This chapter is fantastically well-realised, and I'm delighted to see Apprentice again. I am wondering, though, why every nameless grunt Fae Cat meets in the battle is female. Is it significant that the "rank-and-file" Fae soldiers are women... ah, she-Fae? 😊

Syntax problem: you wrote [Cutting my way into the throng had only killed the fire ribbons of the fae in front of me, **the rest could have cared less**]... and that doesn't make any sense, though lots of people use the expression.

If someone could have cared LESS, that means they DO care somewhat, since you're saying they COULD care less than they already do. If you say someone COULDN'T care less, you're saying they care so little that they're not capable of caring ANY LESS than they do currently... in other words, not at all.

Yes, I am the grammarian about whom your mother warned you. 😎

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Sure that's all well and fancy, but part of it being an idiom is that it doesn't have to make logical sense when you break it down. People still know what it means. It's not like correcting someone saying "should of" instead of "should have" or something

LaNuup

Exelent chapter, as always. Can't wait for the betrayal of Winter, that will probably come. And I really liked the Duches of Restless Zephyr.

As the only point of critique, Erratic, you are getting sloppy with typos. Over the last few chapters small typos and sentences that changed midway appeared more often.

stevenneiman

I'm pretty sure is that the general consensus is that the King of Winter is trying to commit suicide by protagonist. He set a deadline for how long it can possibly take for their conflict to resolve, pissed her off enough to swear to see him undone, and then just left her to her own devices, and then showed that he had plenty of reason to be sick of eternity.

He's been stuck in this cycle longer than creation has existed, and win or lose in the end he's always suffered.

Besides if anyone is genre savvy its going to be a freaking ruler of the Fae. He knew what he was getting into. Maybe he thinks he can change the story before the end, or maybe he's just ready for the cycle to close.

Tal Morgan

Minor note from the historical pedant in me; if Cat knows how to use a sword, she knows how to use a spear. If you look into Historical European Martial Arts, the biomechanics of most weapons, the basic level of How Do I Sword versus How Do I Axe versus How Do I Halberd are actually very similar. The basic blows of, for example, a sword and a pole-axe are the same, it's just that a pole-axe can also use certain plays specific to it, like fencing with the butt and hooking people with the head. A spear likewise has certain plays available to it relating to its length, but the majority of it is the exact same thrust work as with a sword, particularly half-swording.

At the fundamental level, a knife is a fist except sharp, a sword is a knife except long, and a spear is a greatsword except longer.

I know, I know, you're not really going for historical accuracy here, and the specifics of medieval melee combat aren't really the focus of this story. Like I said, It's the historical pedant in me 😊

Byzantine

It's not a question of that, really. I think it's more a matter of Cat thinking of them as two entirely different things.

If she actually set about learning to use a spear she would rapidly figure out it isn't really any different, but she hasn't and so doesn't think she knows how.

Tal Morgan

Except HEMA treats it as a holistic whole right from the start, which is kind of my point. Anyone who learns how to fight in a historical manner knows that it's all one system; you don't learn to fight with a sword and with a dagger and with a spear, you learn *how to fight,* and then APPLY that to sword, dagger, spear, whatever. Your instructor will have demonstrated how it all ties together, with some advanced examples to illustrate the point.

Again, I get why Catherine thinks like this. This isn't a story that really sweats any kind of accurate mapping to real-world history, particularly not in details like this. But if it were, the kind of mental block that Cat has would be totally out of place.

Chapter 30: Riot

"The classic Callowan blunder. Sending an army into the Wasteland you can't handle if it comes marching back as undead."

-Dread Emperor Sorcerous

Magical healing felt slow and inefficient, after having grown to the heroic alternative, but it had to be said that Masego was exceedingly good at it. It was better not to think about how many people he must have needed to cut open to get there. Hopefully at least the majority of them had been dead at the time, though with Warlock you could never be sure. It was all flying pigs until he got in a mood, then it was corpses all around. Apprentice politely clapped my shoulder to signify he was done and I rose from my crouch.

"You'll need a blacksmith to truly rectify the state of your armour," he said. "But it is no longer liquid, at least."

Speaking of liquid, Archer was polishing off the bottom of a copper flask even as we spoke. The two of them seemed in a decent mood, though not eager to join the fray. Given that Summer's army could be quite literally world-ending if it got into the swing of things, I didn't blame them. I got the blood and what looked like flakes of skin off the hilt of my sword – Gods, those were probably mine weren't they? – and took a deep breath.

"All right," I said. "First we need to pick up Hakram. Before we do, Archer, could you tell me what the Hells your teacher is doing here?"

She ignored me, finished guzzling down whatever liquor she was packing and dropped the flask to the ground. It was a good thing the enemy already knew where we were, otherwise no doubt they could find out just by following the trail of those that no doubt followed in her wake.

"No idea, Foundling," she replied cheerfully. "She won't be here for the princes and princesses. She got bored with those a while back. Whatever it is, though? I recommend not being even remotely in the vicinity of her way. That, uh, doesn't tend to go well for people. And gods. And castle that one time."

It said a lot about the Lady of the Lake's reputation that I wouldn't be particularly surprised if she'd destroyed an entire keep because it had made the poor decision of being built somewhere inconvenient to her. Black had told me there were to people on Calernia against whom it was useless to think in terms of victory, where one could only attempt to limit the damage and lose the least amount of skin possible. One was the Dead King, who he'd charmingly referred to as 'the original abomination'. The other was the Ranger, whose utter disregard for odds I'd been raised hearing stories about.

"Well, I'm not intending to get in a fistfight for her, that's for sure," I grimaced. "I've recently run out of borrowed lives."

"I fear you may run out of ribs as well, if you keep at it," Masego drily said.

Now that was just unwarranted. I hadn't broken any of those in, like, at least sixty heartbeats. I was going to ask about having them reinforced with steel, though, because nowadays they were snapping like twigs.

"I can't commend your judgement but your pain tolerance is impressive," Archer added, never one to leave someone unkicked while they were down.

I flipped her off.

"Goat-daughter," she replied in Taghrebi, ridiculously proud of knowing the word.

"Masego have you been teaching her cusses?" I sighed.

"It was either that or arguing about whether Creation is a sphere again," he admitted.

I raised an eyebrow at Archer.

"I'm just saying, do you know anyone who's gone the whole way around?" she said. "Have you done it yourself?"

Apprentice twitched and I decided to change the subject before he went on a rant about how he'd proved Creation was round. I knew better than to hope he did not have three philosophers and several volumes to reference.

"We'll table that for later," I ordered. "I, uh, left Adjutant back in the middle of the melee. Anyone have any suggestions of how to take him out? Our target is east."

I ignored Apprentice's peevish murmur about how Hakram, at least, probably hadn't broken any ribs. That was a deeply unfair comparison, the orc had a whole aspect about not breaking.

"We could kill our way through," Archer suggested.

Ah, Archer. Violence wasn't her only tool, just the only one she ever bothered to use.

"I'm open to other suggestions," I prompted.

That was when the screaming began. Sword in hand faster than I could blink, I turned to look at the source of it. It was only one voice, though a remarkably loud one. The Duchess of Restless Zephyr was back in the sky, missing an arm and most the half of the body attached to it. One of her wings was pure flame, I saw, which made her flight awkward but admittedly still better than I could manage.

"I'd really hoped she was dead," I said.

"She seems peeved," Masego said, master of observation that he was.

"You could say we didn't part on great terms," I conceded.

The dark-skinned mage's eyes glimmered with Name power, peering at the Duchess.

"She's bleeding out power," he noted. "Her very frame is unstable. I expect she will detonate, left alone long enough."

Archer whistled merrily, stringing her bow.

"Never bagged a duchess before," she said.

"That'd be kill-stealing and you know it," I said.

I did not, however, tell her not to put arrows in the woman until the issue went away. It was one thing to banter with my companions, another to allow a threat of that magnitude to live even a moment longer than she needed to. It swiftly became clear that screaming at the top of her lungs was more than a coping mechanism for the fae. A pack of a hundred winged knights peeled off from the rest, lances high as they formed up around her. It would have been untrue to say I felt the weight of the Duchess' gaze, but I was pretty sure if she was capable of glaring someone aflame I'd be a bonfire right now.

"I might run out of arrows," Archer said. "The fancy ones, at least."

I eyed her quiver, which looked plain but had as much sorcery wafting off of it as all her enchanted ammunition put together.

"They're in range, for you?" I asked.

"Sweetcheeks," she grinned. "There's not a damn thing in any world that isn't."

It was talk like that that had me believing the ochre-skinned woman wasn't a villain. None of us who'd managed to live this long would so willingly dip down hubris and slip it too much tongue. Archer wasn't all boasting, at least. She nocked her first arrow smoothly and released almost quicker than I could follow. The arrow flew. A hundred yards from the fae it was buried in a wave of flame and I thought that the end of that, but moments later a single silhouette fell from its horse. I sharpened my eyes and let out a staggered breath. Right between the eyes, from at least a mile.

"See?" Archer preened.

"Archer," I tried.

"I told you," she interrupted.

"Archer they are charging," I barked. "Keep shooting."

She pouted, but smooth movements followed and arrows took the sky. I looked at Masego, who seemed more bored than worried.

"I don't suppose you have something to stop a cavalry charge?" I asked.

"It is unlikely any of my wards would do more than slow them down," he said. "In Arcadia, that is. Layering is pointless if they unmake the layers as fast as I craft them."

"Keep the Duchess busy, then," I ordered. "She has this nasty wind trick."

Speaking of the devil, the screaming had ceased. She was hurtling through the air, keeping up with the knights, and pointing her sword at us. The rider next to her toppled from an arrow through the neck, Archer chuckling at my side.

"Masego," I said urgently.

The air exploded, but a transparent box formed around it. The winds howled, barely contained.

"Interesting," Apprentice praised. "Derivative work, of course, but fae do tend to keep close to their title and Court."

The box contracted until it broke, and the wind dispersed with a hiss. Gods I'd missed having a powerful mage around. It made it so much easier not to die. Archer was ignoring us, taking apart the knights one at a time. How many had she slain, easy as swatting a fly? Twenty, maybe more. When she ceased moving, though, I cleared my throat.

"There's still some left," I helpfully pointed out.

"I'm out of mage-killers," she said.

The air exploded again. This time Masego had evolved his defensive measure: a series of transparent walls redirected the fury of the wind, ultimately heading back towards the charging fae. It dispersed long before reaching any of them, but just what he'd been able to do might be deterrent enough that the Duchess wouldn't try it again. If she'd pulled that when they were closer, they would have lost a few for sure.

"You don't have any other enchanted ones?" I asked.

"None that are fireproof," she said, calmly unstringing her bow.

Given the size of the thing I would have said something about overcompensating, but now that I'd actually seen her use it the words stayed stuck in my mouth. Skill was skill, no matter how ridiculous-looking the tool enabling it. Archer unsheathed her longknives, tapping one against her leg impatiently.

"They could hurry up, at least," she complained. "Not like we can charge back at them."

"Oh my," Masego murmured. "That could... No, first I'd have to overtake the matrix."

"Apprentice," I said, a little worried.

"Everything is going to be fine," he said dreamily, eyes still filled with Name power.

I had never more wished to have a shield. And so the three of us stood valiantly against the coming charge. Apprentice was muttering to himself, lost in his own world, Archer had taken to cleaning her fingernails with one of her blades and I was silently wishing I could just duplicate Hakram a few times and not have to rely on these two anymore. More like valiant-adjacent, maybe. I steadied my breath and adjusted my stance as the knights and Duchess angled their descent, the lot of them moving flawlessly together.

"Whither," the Duchess of Restless Zephyr screamed.

"Deconstruct," Apprentice replied, fingers dancing across a stream of shining runes.

The fae aristocrat yelped, losing control of her spell. The bone-dry winds slipped her leash, turning on her. Her wing of flame dispersed as her body turned to a husk, skin turning to leather in the span of a heartbeat. She crashed, but I couldn't spare a longer look than that: I was too busy trying not to get skewered. Flattening under the lance wouldn't work. I'd never gotten anywhere by betting against fae reflexes. Instead I sunk into my Name, let the calm wash over me and watched the tip of the weapon. The only dangerous part of a lance is the tip, I told myself, repeating Black's words. I pivoted around it at the last moment, letting the knight pass me by. Immediately I had to duck under the horse of the man behind him, sword coming up to split its belly open. I emerged drenched in blood and guts to see the third rank was too far ahead to strike me, but the fourth had adjusted its angle. And was converging on me. Apprentice came to the rescue, a sphere-like black rip into the fabric of Arcadia forming amongst the fae. It didn't seem to do much but draw them closer to it, but it should keep them busy for at least a bit.

That left the first rank, which had deftly landed on the ground and was turning back around. I heard screams and laughter to the side, which probably meant Archer wasn't in too much trouble. Even as lances turned to me, I felt an itch between my shoulder blades. I knew better than to ignore the hints of my Name, and moved before a thrown javelin could add a steel component to my spine. The thrown weapon sunk into the ground and exploded in flames, the enemy knights riding straight through the screen of fire. This, I decided, was not going to work. Even if the Duchess didn't come back from her mistake, there was only so long I could keep avoiding being run through. Especially if I had to dodge javelins at the same time. Relief came in the shape of Archer, who barrelled into the flank of the knights charging me. She was riding a horse, because of course she was. Two arrows were stuck in her mount's neck and she used them to guide it along with no small amount of spurring. That... could work. Maybe. I wasn't above fleeing a losing fight. Masego's black sphere must have petered out, because I heard the whistle of javelins let loose followed by neighs.

I was already moving, though, and the thumped into the ground behind me. There were still half a dozen knights after my hide, even though Archer was making a joyous nuisance of herself, and it was those I went for. They were on the ground now, and while the sky belonged to the fae down here they were in my wheelhouse. I ran at them, smoothly cutting the distance. They'd learned from the last time, adjusted to my speed, and when I pivoted around the first lance I found another two aimed at my chest. An exertion of will had a panel of ice forming in the way, breaking instantly but buying me a precious few heartbeats. I pushed a sliver of power down my legs and leapt at the knight I'd just avoided, colliding with him atop the winged horse. I took a hard knock in the nose and he tried to slide a knife in my ribs, but I caught his wrist and twisted it to throw him off the horse. Which was not best pleased about this turn of events. I tried to slide my feet into the stirrups, but the neighing fucker was bucking me off. And now the other knights were back at me. Great. I had to throw myself off to avoid taking a javelin in the chest.

"Fine," I growled. "The hard way."

I rammed my sword through the horse's eye as my free hand whipped up to blast a knight off his horse with a spear of shadow. I kept the power close, forcefully shoving it into the dying mount through my blade. The beast twitched once, twice, and its dark eyes went pure blue. That was new.

"Up," I ordered, and it rose back to its feet.

I leapt on, and this time there was no bucking. I looked for the others and found Archer had already retreated, and forced a visibly dismayed Masego to ride with his arms around her belly. Considering Apprentice hated even regular horses, a winged one had to be a nightmare for him. I set my mount to riding with my mind alone, the knights gathering in a wedge behind me. That was going to be a problem.

"Retreat," I called out.

Archer laughed, but at least she listened. I dug into the muscle memories of the horse I'd raised and put on my finger on the part that concerned flight. The wings extended brusquely and as I screamed it began batting its wings and we rose into the air. So did our pursuers. The feeling of the wind whipping at my face was exhilarating, but death followed close. They were already gaining. I sent the horse downwards to avoid a javelin, but when it exploded into flames the fire formed into a hawk and hurtled back towards me. Within moments a menagerie of birds was forcing me into acrobatics that had my heels digging into the flanks of the dead horse – Zombie the Third, I mentally named him – as I tried my best not to fall off. The other two caught up with me and I gestured towards our forces still fighting on the field, but Apprentice shook his head.

“The Duchess,” he said.

My arm whipped out to cut through the shaft of a javelin. I smothered the fire that came out with ice before it could form. Godsdamnit.

“Fine,” I yelled. “I’ll draw them off.”

I took a sharp right to avoid incineration, flicking my wrist to send a knife into my palm. The knights were on me. This was going to be tricky. They had range, damn them. The knight at the tip of the wedge rammed his lance halfway through into my mount’s body, but it was too dead to care at the moment. I leapt off my horse onto the bastard, desperately trying to convince myself this was a good idea. My armoured boots hit his chest and he fell off, but brilliant wings burst into existence. Right, falling wasn’t a problem for them. I managed to land on the saddle but my boots were slick with blood and it was bucking – even as I began to slide I saw the lance going for my knee. Don’t die, don’t die, don’t die. My foot landed on the tip of the lance and even as it ripped into the saddle I kicked the fae’s chin. Blood sprayed and teeth with it. I began to fall but managed to sink my knife into the horse’s flank, hoisting myself back up. The Name reflexes were barely enough to save my life, sword coming up to slap aside another lance so it just pierced through my only previous pauldron. Heat at my back, it was time to move. The wave of flame hawks was at my heel.

The horse was beginning to go down so I leapt off again, screaming every Mtethwa curse I knew and then some. The knight I impacted didn’t manage to bring up his lance in time, but he did manage to sock me in the mouth with an armoured hand. I tasted blood. My knife found his throat, and I took the trade gladly. Heat again, and so close I left the blade. I bunched up for another jump but it was too late. I was blown off by a storm of flame, what little skin I had exposed taking the brunt of it as even my plate warmed. I grit my teeth and formed a pane of ice to land on, licking my busted lip and pointing my sword at the fae.

“Taking all comers,” I croaked out. “You only outnumber what, fifty to one?”

Half the lances flickered with light and turned into swords as they fluidly formed in a circle around me. Bury me in numbers, would they? And this time with blades to take care of me if the lances failed. I panted quietly, and planned the timing. My control was still rough. As one, without a word, they charged. There would be no dancing around all those blades, Named or not. It was a good thing I didn't intend to. I watched the enemy close in and, at the last moment, broke the pane. I began falling again as the knights closed in on empty space, though disappointingly enough they were too skilled for collisions to ensue. The smoothly slid around each other even as I landed with a thump atop Zombie the Third, almost slipping again before I shoved my boots into the stirrups. I wasted no time in getting the Hells out of there. That was as long as I could buy the other two. They'd gainfully employed my many near-death experiences, I saw. The Duchess of Restless Zephyr, still unconscious, hung floating in a bubble of blue light Masego was dragging behind them with a chain made of the same. I caught up with them before the knight caught up with me: dragging the fae aristocrat slowed them down.

"I swear on all the bloody Gods, Apprentice, if you had me do that just to get a live duchess I'll bury you so deep underground you will never see light again," I yelled.

Brow creased in concentration, he waved dismissively. We fled towards the melee, where things were not unfolding as well as I'd hoped. The attack I'd stolen from the Duchess had slowed the golden fae down, but they'd formed back up and even with the Watch backing it the Fifteenth was taking a beating. At a glance, half of Nauk's legionaries were already dead. The entire line was buckling, even with the Deoraithe regulars propping them up. We managed to get in bow range before the knights were on us, and it was enough to make them break off at least for now. Close, I thought. I caught sight of Hakram swinging his axe towards the centre of our line, but he was having trouble with the enemy. They were fast as a Named, and though not as strong as the orc there were a lot of them. I guided my horse down, but Masego called out for me to wait. I watched my companions pass over the golden fae, and there Apprentice cut off the chain binding the bubble to him. A moment later the bubble popped out and the Duchess began to fall, dropping in the ranks of the golden fae. Nothing happened.

I glanced at Apprentice, who was fiddling with runes, and only looked away when I heard the world groan. Bone-dry winds formed around the Duchess' body and blew up violently, turning the fae by it into empty husks that fell apart like sand. It continued to grow, the winds scattering in every direction and tearing a gaping hole in the golden fae formation. Masego, you beautiful sack of pedantry. That might just even the field out. The dead horse smoothly flew down, and I landed in front of a gaping Adjutant as the winds whipped behind me.

"Get on," I ordered. "We're hunting royalty."

Apprentice + Archer = best buddy cops duo.

DocTao

Archer doing a Bard on the drinking game, didn't Archer invoke an aspect to do this stuff last time? Pet theory: Bard pulled a switch and Ranger there for her? No real backing from the story on that though, I don't think.

Byzantine

Names tend to invoke their aspects as little as possible, if they have any idea what they are doing.

Archer had no reason to use her aspect against these Fae as it wasn't shooting an arrow over a mile away; ie it wasn't outside her regular abilities.

Letouriste

Now she has a flying horse:D

And masego seems nearing a new name, should gain this by the end of this war I think

BumblingBehemoth

Does anyone else love the fact that we got a jab at flat earthers in this chapter?

Letouriste

Well, honestly I would not be surprised if creation is flat^^
Given this is god-created and all...

But yeah, that was funny:D

Blinks

What is Ranger doing there... then again if she's tired of Princes and Princess' then the only thing left is Kings and Queens. Could be trying for one of them I suppose.

I doubt Winter will show up but Cat is currently taking apart the greater part of Summers entire army so maybe the ruler of Summer is going to make an appearance.

alegio

"Masego, you beautiful sack of pedantry." This describes him so perfectly that I have nothing more to say.

ArkhCthuul

This chapter was very hectic and more than a little disjointed regarding overall flow.

You can do much better, even if Masego was really cool once again. 😊

Levi Kalden

I waited for Zombie Pegasus ever since we first met the fee

Chapter 31: High Noon

"My dear friends, I have a confession to make. Some creative reframing of the truth may have taken place during the planning of this coup."

– Dread Emperor Traitorous, addressing the Order of the Unholy Obsidian upon successfully usurping the throne from himself

Now, in my experience planning the ending of a lesser god required three necessary steps. The first of them was, naturally, lies. Though this once I had found no make-believe prophecy to ensure this fight did not begin and end with my being incinerated, I had prepared a few nasty surprises. The Summer Court didn't really bother to talk with mortals except to give them orders, as far as I knew, and that was going to come back to haunt them. The second step was a certain proficiency for violence, which between four battle-hardened Named we should have covered. There would be no talk of my taking on the Princess of High Noon by myself. That would return us to the whole incineration outcome, which I would confess I was less than fond of. Archer would have less of an impact using longknives instead of a bow, true, but with her and Adjutant at my side we might be able to keep the princess distracted long enough Apprentice could hit her with the good stuff. Well, Evil stuff. The labyrinthine mess that was adjusting my terminology now that I was consorting with the damned could wait to be sorted until there was less of a war going on.

With a little luck, at some point in the next decade I'd have a day where no one was actively trying to invade Callow. That was the dream, really.

The third step was having a right to that victory. It was different than the false prophecy I'd used to kill the Duke of Violent Squalls. One was, as I liked to think of it, plausible deniability. It gave me an excuse to win, if I could manage it. After all, I'd still had to stab the bastard to get his stuff. Having a right was more like fixing the scales, the way Fate did for heroes. It was still short of providence, the golden luck that dropped the laurels in the lap of the Heavens' favourites, but it was close. When I'd fought Heiress and the Lone Swordsman in Liesse, I'd walked over two Named that were each a match for me on their own on my way to take the sword in the stone and my resurrection with it. The weights of the scale had been in my favour, then. It didn't guarantee victory, but it made it easier for me to win and harder for my opponents. The signet ring had done the same thing for the Duke of Violent Squalls. I'd 'always had it', which at least in Arcadia had given me claim to the fae's power before it was physically on my finger.

Finding an equivalent for the Princess of High Noon had been the hardest part of this. I couldn't just rely on the fact that she had invaded Callow: I was, however unwillingly, doing the same to Summer. That scratched off the mark on both sides of the slate, I was betting. There were dozens of stories about hard-headed young girls facing down gods for some cause or another, but all of them about heroes. I'd wiggled my way into that sort of role before, but only when standing for a greater cause than myself. I fell short of that here. They keystone would have to be found in the way that even with my Named companions I still stood hilariously outclassed. It was an old shape, that, the underdog triumphing over the unbeatable opponent. I'd chewed on that for days, pruning story after story until I returned to one of the oldest ones I knew. From before the House of Light, when Calernians had prayed to the Gods Above and Below but also made sure to give offerings to the ancient things that strode the world. Dread Emperor Sorcerous had once famously called usurpation the essence of sorcery. There was a deeper grain of truth in that, one broader in meaning. Transgression was the essence of what it meant to be Named. Breaking the rules for your own sake or that of others. And one of the most ancient of those transgressions was the blade meant to break the Princess of High Noon. The theft of fire.

Would it be enough? I could not know. Never did, until the blades were out and chaos reigned. But I'd gotten this far by doubling down whenever the stakes were raised, and I would not flinch today.

The four of us had flown east, to where the fae clashed. Winter was not getting the better of it. The centre, where the Sword of Waning Day fought, had managed to gain ground. But the flanks were collapsing. The Riders of the Host had managed a harsh draw with the winged knights of Summer, but come out more bloodied and forced to retreat. To the sides the Summer regulars were driving back the Winter fae one step at a time, defeat already writ large. It would end with the deadwood soldiers an island in a Summer sea, collapsing when the winged knights returned to shatter their lines. While the lesser fae died in droves, the royalty that led them had fought just the same. There again, Winter was losing. The Prince of Nightfall now stood alone against the Princess of High Noon and the Prince of Deep Drought, the princess who'd been with him nowhere in sight. They were on the ground now, the armies giving all three of them a wide berth. I did not like the one-eyed prince. He'd been party to his king's playing of me, and been free with threats besides.

Watching him battle two other royals, though, I felt a reluctant sliver of admiration. I'd not been wrong, in thinking him made for strife more than any other fae of Winter. The Princess of High Noon was more powerful., blatantly so. She moved like a storm unrelenting, howling winds stirring in the wake of every strike as she crushed everything in her way. The Prince of Deep Drought had been wounded, one of his arms held to his body only be strings of red, but he wove sorcery like an artist. Flame and light and dust, moving with Princess Sulia as if it knew her movements intimately. And facing that fury was a one-eyed man, clad in a long tunic of shade with a slender blade in hand. Trying to strike him was like trying to grasp a shadow, and though he was outmatched in every way he did not retreat a single step. None of the three paid us any mind when we took the winged horses down, dismounting more swiftly than gracefully. Hakram had been pale as sheet the whole ride, and was now visibly glad of being on solid ground. I glanced at my companions, then cleared my throat. I supposed I would have to say something before leading them into the storm.

"So we're going to stab a god," I said. "I mean, we've done it before. But this one is a few places higher in the pecking order of things not to trifle with."

Archer snorted.

"But we'll win because we stand for something greater than ourselves?" I gallantly attempted.

"We do?" Apprentice asked, surprise. "What?"

"Violence," Archer suggested.

"Peace, order and the Imperial way," Hakram offered, the filthy traitor.

"We lie a lot," Masego mused. "It could be lies."

"Lies and violence," Archer proudly called out, raising a fist.

Apprentice did the same, apparently under the impression this qualified as a battle cry. I refused to grace the mutiny with a response.

"Just don't get yourselves killed," I sighed. "I don't want to have to train up replacements."

The fae royalty took notice when we joined their little tiff, the Summer fae breaking off and angling so we wouldn't be able to flank them. The Winter prince offered us a mocking salute with his sword.

"I'm guessing the Princess of Silent Depths is dead," I said, not bothering with greetings.

"That is mostly accurate," the Prince of Nightfall replied, because why would fae ever be anything but vague?

"Can you handle the sorcerer?" I asked, eyeing the Prince of Deep Drought.

"He cannot," the Summer prince sneered.

"Yes," the one-eyed fae replied with a nasty smile. "You'll be dancing with Sulia?"

"That's the idea," I agreed. "I put together a crew of miscreants and everything."

The red-haired princess eyed me like I'd tracked mud onto her priceless carpet, or maybe like I was the mud.

"They have made an abomination of you," she said. "More than mortal, less than fae. Destroying you will be a mercy."

"I get that a lot," I replied honestly.

At least in Procer, the House of Light had apparently declared me anathema to the Heavens. I knew because Black had the report framed and sent to Marchford. It hung on the wall of my bedroom across from the bed.

"Shall we begin, Granian?" the Prince of Nightfall taunted his Summer mirror. "I've been meaning to see how many limbs you can lose before dying."

The Winter fae's translucent wings burst into existence and he shot off into the sky. The Prince of Deep Drought looked at Sulia and she nodded. He followed, leaving the four of us facing the heaviest hitter the Summer Court had to offer short of its queen. Why had this seemed like a good idea again?

"I played your role, for an evening," I told the princess. "Was a bit of a bore. Had to liven it up myself."

"I was not made for intrigue," the Princess of High Noon said. "This, however? I was born for it. From it. This was a blunder, Duchess. You are attempting a story, but that is worthless if you do not have the power to carry it out."

"You think you're my opponent," I smiled coldly. "An interesting thought. Let's see where it gets you."

Three things happened in the heartbeat that followed. Princess Sulia's wings sprang to life. Adjutant and Archer charged forward. And I spoke one word.

"Take," I said.

Two columns of fire erupted from my back, not concerned by the plate in the slightest. I screamed hoarsely, but this was a necessary sacrifice. If she went up, we were done. She could just stay up there and bombard us until there was nothing left but ashes, and trying to match her up there with the horses was a good way to get ourselves killed. I felt the Winter power in my veins reacting violently, even worse than when I'd stolen sorcery from the Duchess of Restless Zephyr. These were only wings, even if made of sorcery, but the power was so much purier it felt a dozen times worse. I hastily discarded the power, heralding the first bet of this fight. What happened when I took something was still unclear in a lot of ways. Would she get the wings back even if I released them? I was hoping not, that my aspect severed the connection by appropriating what I took. If that wasn't the case, I was going to have to pull out an upset that I really needed to come later. The flames gutted out and I let out a hiss of triumph when they didn't reappear on the princess' back. This might not be a permanent state of affair, but for now it was putting our foot in the door.

Apprentice was incanting, the light of runes glinting off his spectacles. We needed to keep him uninterrupted long enough to make a difference. I'd never fought at Archer's side before, not with her using blades, but Hakram had felt like an additional limb ever since he became the Adjutant and he was used to her from all their sparring. Four blades struck as one and it felt right. Like coming home. The fae's sword clattered against mine, beginning to carve through until ice grew to stop it. The princess ducked under the swing of Adjutant's axe, pushing me back effortlessly and smashing Archer in the belly with her fist. The other Named was thrown off, but she landed on her feet and she was back into the fray within moments. Heat pulsed off the princess and cold came from me too met it. Her power dwarfed mine, but she would not win this uncontested. The three of us pressed the offensive. Without even a word needing to be said, we fell into a rhythm. I forced a parry, setting the fae up for Adjutant's strike as Archer used the opening it made to attempt to draw blood.

She was beating us anyway. Flame blew Hakram off his feet, charring his face, and without him to distract Archer was caught by the throat. I desperately wove ice and shadow around the princess' wrist, and the heartbeat it took for her to disperse it earned my companion just long enough to wriggle out of the grasp. Her breath was laboured, but at least her neck hadn't been snapped.

"Rampage," Adjutant growled.

The orc charged back into the fight, his charred skin healing. Every strike was stronger and faster than the last, until even the Princess of High Noon had to take care.

"Flow," Archer managed to croak.

It was almost hypnotic to watch her longknives move. There was no single blow, every attack coming from the last in an uninterrupted stream. She moves as she had when firing arrows, but that was comparing a candle to a bonfire. Between the three of us, we almost stood a chance. I turned a probe into a lunge that would have taken the princess in the neck, but she contemptuously moved an inch to the side and ignored it. I saw her sword rise to carve through Hakram's wrist and snapped my own, my last knife landing in my palm. I threw it at her head and the blade spun gracefully before being sliced cleanly through. The axe took her in the chest, breaking coloured mail but no skin. A boot to the stomach pushed the orc back, but he was still growing stronger. It did not slow him for long, and in the moment where the princess stood on only one leg Archer's longknives struck. The two blades came from opposite directions, one for the knee and the other for the neck. Without missing a beat Princess Sulia jumped and lay herself flat, strikes passing above and beneath her. She twisted sharply and a boot to the face shattered Archer's chin as she was sent sprawling to the floor.

Breath caught in my throat, I adjusted my wrist and pumped the entire arm full of my Name. I hit her at rib-height, the strength of the blow sending mail rings flying, and she smashed into the ground hard enough the earth dented. Her eyes turned gold-red, the heat grew, and Apprentice finally finished casting. Twenty-three sigils of blue light came into being above the princess with a loud hum, though not loud enough to drown out her pained groan. Heat shimmered around her and one of the sigils popped. I glanced at Adjutant, panting. The skin that had healed was beginning to flake off, the burns returning if not as grave as before. Whatever power had possessed him was gone, though. Archer was back on her feet, but her lower face was one large and bloody bruise. Another three sigils popped. We didn't have much longer left.

"Oh, oh," Apprentice said, watching the struggling fae with wide eyes. "I was wrong, fundamentally wrong."

Shit. That did not look good at all. The bespectacled mage laughed, looking utterly crazed.

"It cannot be quantified," he muttered. "The method was erroneous from the onset. It is all made of the same building blocs, and those blocs are a figment. Mysteries, miracles of smoke and mirrors. The godhead is not behind boundaries, it is a trick of perspective."

Power rippled across his frame, his eyes glinting with a light that had a shiver going up my spine. One of the sigils formed again, though it popped moments later.

"Apprentice," I said carefully, and he interrupted.

"No no no," he laughed. "Not that. Not anymore. Hierophant. Usher of mysteries. Vivisector of miracles."

Was that what this was? A transition in the making?

"You are a god, yes?" he smiled at the Princess of High Noon, pushing up his glasses. "Show me a miracle, then."

He waved his arm carelessly and Archer's jaw set itself back together with a loud crack. Fingers clutching something only he could see, the Hierophant brought his hands down. The sigils glowed so bright I had to shut my eyes in pain. Like a star being born. For all that, the words that drifted to my ears were calm.

"Everything burns," the Princess of High Noon whispered.

Arcadia broke. The brightness passed, and I opened my eyes to a world of endless ashes. I'd called on something of the same breed, when defeating the Count of Olden Oak, but it had been nothing but a drop to this ocean. Princess Sulia stood with restored wings, hair of flame and eyes that burned with something more. Above her raised hands hovered the sun. I could feel myself buckle from the pressure alone, my hair smouldering against my sweat-soaked scalp. Masego's spectacles shattered in his eyes and he screamed. Hakram wavered, then fell to his knees. The burns from earlier were spreading across his face. Archer's hands shook like leaves until she stabbed a longknife into her leg, the pain allowing her to not be swept away by the weight bearing down on all of us.

"You may feel honoured," Princess Sulia said. "I have ever only called on this to bring an end to Winter. The four of you will be the first ashes on this field formed of Creation."

"You're wrong," I croaked.

"Will you try to take the sun from me, Duchess?" she said, amused. "You will burn, one way or another."

She was right, of course. If I tried using Take I'd die before I finished speaking the word. I was the Squire, after all. No role stood behind me in this. But I'd meant it, when I'd told her I wasn't her opponent.

"Not that," I grinned, all teeth and malice. "There's not four of us."

Behind the Princess of High Noon a woman appeared, short-haired with blue-grey eyes. She wore loose leathers and her face was red with sweat.

"Yoink," the Thief said, and stole the sun.

BBBence1111

I can't seem to find the next chapter button, so I think commenting is in order.

This is easily in the Top 5 of stories I've read. I could start listing things I like, but writing everything is faster so I'm going with that.

And of course I catch up on a chapter that ends with stealing the sun.

Byzantine

Oh gods. What an awesome and awful place to catch up.

Welcome to the story.

Idan Dor

Alright, took me a week of reading but I read everything. That was incredible, going to patreon this.

This chapter specifically was incredible as well. It started with our boy Traitorous (who really needs a spin of novel) doing his schtick amazingly well and ended with an incredible fight and "providence" of the ancient legend of fire.

One suggestion (which might never be found, buried here as it is), the extra chapters should state before and after what they are so you won't read ahead. I suspected they will include spoilers so I only read them by doing "next chapter" and reading them at the right time, but by just looking at them, it is very hard to tell which are those one can read yet and which aren't.

Dwwolf

Gods, the GF had to ask me if I was alright....I was laughing like a maniac at that "Yoink".

dadycoool

Quite possibly the highlight of the entire Guide.

Roger W

"matcher her"

SpacyRicochet

I didn't even notice, but Catherine actually did round up her entire Calamity Junior party! Didn't even think about Thief filling Assassin's spot! Good going, Cath!

Shequi

Oh.

Oh!

That was a Pivot.

"The stories have been around since the dawn of Creation, meaning there's an endless variety of ways they can go. A pivot is a point in time or a decision where the Named pushes her story in a particular direction. It influences the kind of powers you develop."

Cat has just formed her crew of miscreants, tuned to take power from and then defeat powerful otherworldly threats.

Diabolist is *fucked*, and not in a good way.

James, Mostly Harmless

Cat's ruminations at the beginning of this chapter tells me that she needs her universe's version of the Aarne-Thompson classification systems for folk tales (see https://en.m.wikipedia.org/wiki/Aarne-Thompson\_classification\_systems). Extensive cross-referenced indices of folk tales and themes would make fighting gods so much easier for her!

Nash Equilibrium

So awesome. I bet that Warlock is feeling a proud paternal moment as his son spreads his wings, even if he doesn't inherit the Warlock name. And I'll be interested to see what happens with the Hierophant name, since it doesn't really sound like a villainous one.

The Thief stealing the sun caught me completely by surprise, and I feel disappointed with myself because I really should have seen it coming. Cat even mentioned that the story she was crafting was about the theft of fire, and yet I thought that her using Take qualified. That said it's kind of funny that Thief is planning to be the wily Coyote that stole fire for the mortals.

Soronel Haetir

And just think, with the Sun gone they are now standing on Cat's playground, that of moonless night.

Gods below.

So, we've seen new aspects from Adjutant and Ranger (I think?). Both of which are totally in keeping with their roles and general characteristics. Also Masego has made his foreshadowed Name transition. Heirophant, depending on your preferred source is a user of ancient mysterious, beings beyond our realm, etc. So makes perfect sense with his recent use of the power of Fae. Wonder if it also applies to demons, and what the difference is between his Role and Diabolist.

ALKATYN

Also this is the second time recently we've seen a transitional role "graduate" to a different role than expected. Heiress -> Diabolist (rather than say Emperess or Chancellor) and now Apprentice -> Heirophant not Warlock. Which implies lots of interesting possibilities

Firstly, since those two (and adjutant) both seem to be new roles that didn't exist before, it implies that the creation of new roles is easier than we had expected or easier now than it was in the past. Perhaps the Calamities change in how villains behave has had wider reaching effects than expected. The world is changing and Names are arising the match it.

It also adds more credence to the theory that Foundling will advance to a different new name rather than Black Knight. In fact at this point I'd be more surprised if she did the latter.

Even wilder speculation: The association with Fae she has, and heirophant seems to have as well, and her recent mixing of heroes and villains in one team may imply she is moving in a direction of unaligned names not directly tied to heavens or hells.

stevenneiman

I think it's less that Names are generally easier to create now than in the past, so much as that Black has set Cat on the path to live out a new story, and a new story needs some new characters. Of the two new Names, one of them clearly represents societal progress and social justice (proof that Orcs now actually have a seat at the table) and the other scientific progress and the triumph of reason over superstition (even when something actually is magic, it can still be scientifically understood and controlled).

Cpt. Obvious

Triumph of reason over superstition. That right there is a clear sign that Heirophant is a Villainous name. There's no way the Gods above would approve of that.

Able Company

Great world building I agree but none of these names are new

goliath1303

Umm yes, they are...

#1 Hierophant is new. Traditionally Apprentice would transition into Warlock, normally by killing/defeating whoever currently has the Name. As far as we know nobody has ever had this name before Masego.

#2 Diabolist is also new to the best of our knowledge. Normally Heiress would become something like Chancellor or Dread Emperor/Emperess, although we know from Akua's first conversation with Black that that Name is flexible and, I've assumed since reading that part, can actually transition into most Names given the right circumstances.

#3 Adjutant is definitely new. First of all Orcs have not had Names for centuries(millenia?). Grem one-eye almost gained a name, but in the end didn't quite get there. That makes Hakram the first.

Squire, Apprentice, Heiress/Heir, etc. are all Names that we know have been around for multiple incarnations and I'm petty sure Names like Archer and Thief have also been around for awhile. Since they're such common archetypes in stories, and because nobody has surprised/confused by then having said Names, it seems likely. The majority of the Names in this story are most likely ones that have had multiple claimants, but there are definitely several that have never been around before. I think that Cat & Co. forging new Stories and Roles is kinda one of the underlying themes to PGtE so it makes total sense to me that there would be a mix of old(Because stories have been around for long time and certain roles are almost universal.) and new(Because they're being passed the mantle of the Calamities. Their whole thing was changing the game.) Names.

Digitize27

And what follows the sun's theft, but a moonless night?

George

oh shit Digitize, I think you're right. Gonna be nuts.

ArkhCthuul

The punchline, or grabline? was.amazing. The chapter itself very gripping, and we.get another Name.

What more is there to want (but ten chapters a week)? 😊

amc

great! finally, a shenanigan worthy of Cat!

brendan

Rereading and actually hitting the side chapters this time, so I wanted to ask...is this the "Thief of Stars" the White Knight taps into during his first fight against Black? The way he thinks about that aspect implies that the lives he's vicariously lived weren't all in the past...

Raved Thrad

It would be really funny if "Yoink" was actually the name of one of Thief's aspects.

GeneralChaos

Dread Emperor Traitorous more like Dread Emperor Hilarious.

Misza Mojczysz Schmidt

Please tell me that Thief's aspect is not "Steal" but "Yoink"

Cpt. Obvious

Sorry, in the older comments the WoG (Word of God, ie erraticerrata, ie the author) is that Yoink isn't an aspect as it wasn't in bold.

Still I agree. Yoink would be an awesome name for the aspect Steal.

Chapter 32: Close

"Oh, on most days we lose. But once in a while, just once, it works. And those moments of perfect clarity where all the world is in the palm of your hand, a hundred thousand middling minds made into flawless assembly by your will? Those are worth all the rest."

– Dread Empress Regalia II

Well, we weren't all going to die. That was nice. If my mouthing off had been followed by Thief failing to steal the sun, I would have been real embarrassed before I got my fool ass killed. Wasn't exactly enthusiastic about a heroine with shaky allegiances getting to shove the – possibly, I wasn't sure exactly how this worked – literal sun in her knapsack, but it did beat dying horribly. So, you know, I was willing to chalk up that one as a win. The skin of Thief's hand was cracking and black by the time the orb of fire disappeared, even though she'd never touched it at all, but away it went. The moment it was gone, Sulia screamed. I imagined it was a lot like losing an aspect, and when Masego had cut out mine the process had been excruciating. She collapsed to her knees and the lights went out. The not-world we were in began to collapse, wrinkling on itself, but I was having none of that. Now, if I'd pit my power against the Princess of High Noon she would have crushed me effortlessly and then maybe allowed me a moment to contemplate the sheer stupidity of my actions before ripping out my spine. This wasn't a fight, though. Power was leaving her like a leaking sieve, and even though I suspected that even whatever was left at the end would be enough for her to beat us again I wasn't going to give her the opportunity to get her shit together.

"Fall," I said.

It hadn't been dark on the ashy plain, not exactly. It'd been not so much darkness as the absence of light. My power filled the endless expanse, propping it up and claiming the framework for itself. I saw my companions shiver in the sudden cold, now nothing more than shaded silhouettes in boundless dark. The night sky above us was without stars, but it didn't feel like anything was missing. A sky from before there were stars, I thought. In here, whatever this place was, my will was the only one that mattered. Masego spoke a word, but there was only silence here. Silence, cold and weight. I turned my eyes to the Princess of High Noon, saw her frame light up with steam as my aspect slowly smothered the power of Summer inside her. She fought it harder than the Count of Olden Oak had, slowing down the process to a crawl. Letting out a long breath, I closed my eyes and sharpened my mind. Black had first taught me the exercise when I'd begun to learn the sword, but I'd only understood its true worth when I came fully into my Name. My mind became as a blade, the way I would when I formed a spear of shadows, but I let myself fall deeper into the process. Distractions and stray fought fell away. Doubts were scoured clean until nothing was left but pure, sharp intent.

With a clear and resounding snap, the Princess of High Noon froze.

I opened my eyes and released the night. After the utter silence that had preceded them, the noises of the battlefield were deafening. A wave of exhaustion nearly toppled me, though it did not scatter my wits enough for it to escape my notice that my blood flow had slowed. A few exertions away from it to start turning into red sludge, if I was lucky. I was out of the game for hours, maybe days. But I'm not done as long as I can speak.

"Masego," I rasped. "Bind her."

Sulia wasn't dead, oh no. When I'd made the decision of fighting here in Arcadia, even with all the odds I'd stacked in my favour, I'd hesitated for one reason. The losses I would incur had to be made worth it by a greater gain. Bleeding Summer alone was not enough to drive me to make a gambit like that, not with what I was putting on the line. There were major liabilities to fighting the fae in Creation, of course, but that in and of itself wasn't a reason to fight them in Arcadia instead. The risks taken by giving battle in Summer were too high to justify the decision with just that. But then I'd stopped thinking of this battle as a battle alone, and placed it in the context of a campaign. There would be a final clash between my forces and the Summer Court, that much was certain in my eyes. And given that any advantage of mobility I had through my portals the fae had as well but better, when I returned to Creation there was no real way for me to dictate where that last clash happened. Considering the Legions were at their best on prepared grounds and anything but our best might just come short, that was not a recipe for victory. I'd understood that I needed something to force their hand, and that was why my soldiers and my allies were now dying on this unearthly field.

The Princess of High Noon was my leverage, and I'd not understood exactly how strong that leverage would be until only two royal fae had come to stand for Summer. There should have been three, which likely meant the Diabolist had gotten rid of one for me. I'd give this to Akua Sahelian: she was a horrid, cold-blooded and treacherous monster but when she put it all on the line she could slug it with the best of them. I was still going to stab her repeatedly and burn the corpse twice, of course, but I could respect the strength if not how she got it and how she used it.

Two royals meant there were two people left to lead the armies of Summer. If the Prince of Nightfall killed his opponent, and I believed he could, that left the Queen of Summer as the only heavy hitter in her court. She wouldn't be able to let that stand, not with Nightfall and a princess left to back the King of Winter. If the other court turned its eyes on her, and it was in their nature to do so, then she'd lose that fight and badly. With Sulia back at her side, she could maybe scrap out a draw. She needed the Princess of High Noon back, and needed her badly.

So if I dragged Sulia back to Creation, bound and gagged? Then the Queen of Summer could only come to take her back or face destruction. My bet was she'd come with her entire army, where I wanted and when I wanted. I honestly couldn't think of another way to bring the war to a close in the next three months and some that remained of the time the Winter King had given me, and so here we were.

Hierophant, for though the change was young already I could no longer think of him by his old Name, did not immediately reply. Over his palm hovered the shards that had once been his spectacles, and though the enchantments on them were gone there was something a great deal more dangerous to be glimpsed in them now. The last thing they'd witnessed was the Summer sun in the fullness of its glory, and that light was still alive in the glass. It might never leave. Masego left the shards hovering in the air, weaving arcane patterns, and lightly touched his eyes. He could no longer see through them, I realized. He'd glimpsed a miracle and the miracle had burned away his sight. The dark-skinned mage smiled strangely, and then his fingers dug into his face. With a scream he ripped out his eyes, blood trickling down his face as the glass shards broke again and again until they were nothing but small gains. Forming into two orbs, they set themselves into his eye cavities. There was a shimmer of heat and the blood turned to red vapour as dull glass eyes replaced the ones in his hand.

"The whole Hierophant thing was kind of attractive, until you did that," Archer said. "Way to ruin it."

"It was a fair trade," Masego said, voice pensive.

The bloody eyes disappeared without need for even a gesture, whisked out into the pocket dimension where he kept his tools.

"Seven pillars hold up the sky," he said peacefully.

There was a cadence to it, the hint of an incantation. Seven wooden pillars formed around the fallen Princess Sulia, looking distinctly physical. My knowledge of sorcery was limited, but even I knew the most traditional limits of what a mage could do. It was the kind of thing that was useful to know when killing caster, and since Diabolist was one I'd made sure to learn at least the broad strokes. It was possible to turn power into material substance, but the draw should have been massive. Comparable with teleportation, and the only people who'd ever managed that were the Miezans. Masego seemed to have done it casually, and did not look winded in the slightest. Like he'd just ignored a law. Gods, what had he turned into?

"Four cardinals, one meridian," he said. "The wheel unbroken, spokes that are not. Thou shall not leave the circle."

Four runes appeared around the fae, linked by a circle of pale light. The ice shattered but Sulia hung in the air, faintly conscious yet unable to move. I helped up Hakram from where he was still kneeling, eyes closed and breathing irregularly. He leaned heavily on me, which almost saw the both of us toppling to the ground until Archer caught his other side and steadied us.

"Careful there, big guy," she said. "This isn't the place to take a nap, though I salute your attitude."

The orc cleared his throat, but did not say anything. He was in even worse state than I was. I looked for Thief, but she was gone again. Not much about the aftermath, that one. The disappearing act wasn't so much mysterious as it was a constant irritant. I'd been known to be, uh, less than polite on occasion but at least I didn't leave in the middle of things. I felt the gaze on me before the entity it belonged to deigned to land. The Prince of Nightfall ignored us entirely, touching the ground by the Princess of High Noon and studying her with a harsh smile.

"Oh, Sulia," he murmured. "The sheer indignity. You'd have been furious it if it was one of us, but mortals? No amount of lives will allow you to wipe that shame away."

"You killed your prince?" I asked.

He turned to me me, single eye shining with amusement.

"Very much so," he said. "If the end ever comes, he will still be flinching when we next meet."

"We need to break the army," I said. "Quickly. My troops are going to begin evacuation as soon as I send the order."

"There is nowhere she will not follow you, with Sulia in your hands," he said. "You lack not for boldness. I wonder if I should be flattered, that your domain resembles mine so closely."

"Ah," I said, nodding as if I had any idea what he was talking about.

"Your third aspect," Masego said, long accustomed to my wiles. "It is... more."

The raven-haired man glanced at the braided mage, inclining his head by the barest fraction.

"You have good eyes, for one of your kind," he said.

The Hierophant inclined his head in return, accepting the compliment wordlessly. The Prince of Nightfall breathed in deeply, as if he was savouring the heat, and looked up at the sky. It was still day, I saw. The light still shone. Yet there was no sun. That might be a problem. What exactly had Thief gotten her sticky fingers on?

"I will lend a vassal to escort you back to your lines, keeping to the spirit of our bargain," the prince said. "Do not forget your end."

How the Hells I was going to manage to pay the price he'd demanded for his assistance was a headache for another day, I decided. I looked at the battle lines and saw Summer was wavering. They'd felt the defeats that had happened on a deeper level, and it was costing them something.

"We've won," I said.

"The Duke of Green Orchards will call retreat within the hour," the fae agreed. "You killed his sister earlier, and they have no champion left to match me."

I looked west, to the hill, and saw the silhouette had yet to move. The Prince of Nightfall followed my gaze, single eye narrowing.

"If she is not gone by dawn tomorrow, I will have my due," he said.

I looked at him, then shrugged.

"Good luck. Gods know you'll need it."

We pursued the enemy when they retreated, but not far and not for long. I wanted Summer thinned of all the meat I could manage before we fought them again, but I was well aware that the moment Princess Sulia had been defeated an hourglass had been flipped and we wouldn't survive the last grains running out. Masego said that, in the worst case, she could turn a journey of several days into one that would take her until nightfall. We should be able to manage that. Juniper only sent two thousand regulars across before closing the gate, the flanking force they represented taking its toll before the fae host managed to extricate itself. Mostly green recruits, I noticed. It was so very typical of my general to use a battle in goddamned Arcadia to blood her fresh recruits that I couldn't help but smile. Juniper was Juniper. I was pretty sure if we ever invaded one of the Hells she'd just treat it as tempering exercise. The knights and the Winter fae did most of the hard work in running down whatever soldiers of Summer were cut off from the retreating host, and though it was only a rough estimate Marshal Ranker sent me an officer with her best read on the casualties. On our side, nearly six thousand. Nauk's two thousand men at the beginning of the campaign had been whittled down to a bare five hundred. Most of the rest were Deoraithe regulars and fewer legionaries, though the Watch had allegedly lost a tenth of their number.

Summer, by Ranker's estimates, had lost around twenty thousand of the sixty they'd brought to the plains. Among those, over a third of the ten thousand the golden fae who'd very nearly wiped out Nauk's jesha had died. They'd suffered more from the two blasts that had been extracted from the Duchess of Restless Zephyr than mortal blades, apparently. I wasn't looking forward to another scrap with the golden ones, and fully intended on a sit-down with the Hellhound over the subject. This had been a victory, if a bloody one. We'd traded losses at over thrice dead for every one of ours. Winter, though, had not made out so well. Twenty thousand had been led here by the Prince of Nightfall, but only nine thousand would leave the field. Their cavalry was good as done, while the winged knights of Summer still had over half their numbers, and they'd lost one of the three royals directly under the King in the battle. I wasn't all that broken up about it, to be honest. A Winter that was better off than Summer but still weakened was very much to my advantage.

Our wounded had been sent through first, the slow work accelerated when Masego crossed into Creation with the Princess of High Noon and then used our other aristocratic prisoner to forge a second gate that our men could use to evacuate. I gave Duchess Kegan leave to use that one to get her people out at her own leisure, getting the Legions through the one at behind the palisades. It was quicker this time around, for a variety of reasons. One more gate, lesser numbers and our officers had managed the logistics of this before. It was past noon when the last few hundred began to file through, and sitting on the bloody grass I let out a sigh of relief. Masego was lying down on my left, dull glass eyes thankfully hidden by his closed eyelids. It would be a while before I got used to those. He had to be on this side to close the gate he'd crafted, he'd told, me and I'd decided to remain with him so he wouldn't get distracted.

"The Queen won't be able to follow us for some time," the mage said. "There are difficulties, to something that powerful crossing in Creation. They weren't meant to."

"How long is some time?" I said. "A week, a month, a year? I can't have her stuck here for too long. Not if I'm to win this war decisively."

"No more than a month," Hierophant said. "She would not be able to stay for much longer than that, either. She's too deeply intertwined with Aine."

"I can work with a month," I grunted. "I'll need around that long to have everything in place for our second tilt."

"It won't be anything like today," Masego warned.

"They always get better, the second time around," I agreed softly.

The others had already gone across. I'd told Archer I didn't mind if she wanted to go have a chat with her teacher, but the other woman had shuddered and muttered something about hunting eyes. She did enjoy her dramatics. Ranger, if that was really her, still hadn't moved. Might have been she just came to have a look? Regardless, as long as it wasn't made my problem I was glad to wash my hands clean of the whole thing. Nothing good came out of meddling in the affairs of Calamities, even former ones. I sighed, then hoisted myself back up onto my feet. Gods, I was going to be more bruise than woman tomorrow. I offered Masego a hand, but saw his fingers were tracing the grass. Casting? No, he was trying to move the green strands. And failing.

"Oh fuck," I whispered.

I looked ahead, to the gates. Maybe a little more than a hundred people left between the two of them, but none of them were moving. Frozen like statues. I'd seen something like this before, shortly before getting my heart ripped out.

"She's here," the Hierophant said, rising unsteadily.

The difference in light was so subtle I almost missed it: it was the shadows that gave it away. Even with the sun missing, the light had been cast as if coming from the something that no longer existed. Now, though, the angle was different. It all came from above. Hand shaking, I looked up. There was no sky. Only an ocean of golden flames, as far as the eye could see. Masego began murmuring softly and with a sound like a gong transparent wards formed around the soldiers still leaving. They resumed their movement for a heartbeat, until the wards shattered.

"You said we should have had until nightfall," I said. "Aine is days away, and she wasn't moving."

"No, not moving. She was casting," Masego said, regretful. "Time has been suspended across all of Summer."

I cast a panicked look at my soldiers. Shit, at the gates. The Queen might be able to cross through those. If she did, we were done. All our armies wiped in moments.

"I have never done this before," a soft voice said, awed.

In front of us stood a young girl. She couldn't have been more than fourteen. Her skin was tanned, but not like a Taghreb or the people of the Free Cities. Like a farmer, and her hands held the calluses of one who tilled fields. Her hair was a mass of golden curls, let loose without styling. She wasn't beautiful, the way some fae were. If would have taken her for some farmer's daughter, with those broad shoulders and solid muscles. Her eyes were brown, unremarkable, and when she smiled at us her cheeks dimpled.

"Is this what he saw in you?" the Queen of Summer wondered. "You change the patterns."

My mouth was dry. I had the itch to cough, but my body was still and beyond my control.

"It is not enough," she said after a moment, and the sorrow on her face was heartbreaking. "The story will correct itself. All you represent is delay. How tired he must be, to embrace this."

She sighed, then peered at us.

"There are five of you," she said.

I could not even nod.

"Born under cursed stars," she told us gently. "You most of all, Catherine Foundling. The five of you would be woe unto all you behold."

She had no weapon in her hand but I had not felt this terrified in a very, very long time.

"I will spare you this," she said. "I'm sorry. It's all I can do for you. Summer is not kind."

Hierophant's hand moved, but the Queen glanced at him and it stopped.

"If you'd had a few years, Masego," she said. "You have not seen enough."

Her hand rose and the sky fell. Now. Come on, now is when you come. She has to be why you're here. I'd never heard anything more beautiful than the sound of a sword clearing the scabbard. The sky split in half and Ranger stood between us as if she had always been there. My hands were shaking, and though I abhorred the weakness it stood for I was so relieved I could move again I almost didn't care.

"It was the Chancellor, who named us the Calamities," the hooded woman said, a single sword in hand. "The man always had a way with words. 'You are a calamity to friend and foe alike'. Only ever screamed when he died, though. I guess it's hard to be witty when getting drawn and quartered."

She hummed.

"The Woe," Ranger said, mulling over the word. "Too broad a mantle for you five now, but you'll grow into it."

"I have no quarrel with you, Lady of the Lake," the Queen of Summer said, brow creased slightly.

Just the sight of it made me want to comfort her, even remembering she'd just tried to kill us.

"Run along, kids," Ranger said, face hooded by shadow save for the sharp grin on her face. "Once is all you get from me."

"We could help you," I croaked.

The blade did not move, and neither did the hand that held it. And yet for a heartbeat I felt like my throat had been cut, like blood was gushing out. The intent had been so strong it had almost become a fact.

"I dislike ignoring my impulses," Ranger said casually. "So do not suggest that again. He would be angry, if I killed you, but we've been angry before. It passes."

"My soldiers," I said, knowing I was testing death but unwilling to leave them behind.

The Calamity shrugged carelessly.

"What are they to me?"

She couldn't have... no, not even Black would. But I looked behind me, and there was no denying the truth. The Deoraithe, the legionaries. Nothing left but ashes. She had not protected them. Only the two of us.

"You will not leave," the Queen of Summer said.

She spoke the words easily, and still I felt my bones creak under the weight. Ranger unsheathed her second sword and the pressure vanished.

"I looked for you, in Aine," the Calamity said.

"It would have been a meaningless fight," the Queen said.

The Named had already ceased to pay attention to us, I saw. She'd given us our chance, and that was all she felt she owed.

"So you had me running through a maze instead," Ranger snorted. "Cute. No maze here now, though. Too far from your throne."

"This strife is unnecessary," the Queen insisted, as if she couldn't possibly understand why this matter was still spoken of at all.

"I don't think we've ever been properly introduced," the Calamity laughed. "I am the Ranger. I hunt those worth hunting. Rejoice, for you qualify."

We fled, through the ashes of men who'd fought for me not hours ago. The gates closed, and the last of Arcadia I saw was a lone silhouette standing in a storm of flame. We'd won today, I told myself. Even with how it had ended.

I should have gotten used to that bitter taste in my mouth by now.

PingleBerry

Well shit.

Ben

I read this too quickly the first time and thought that the Queen of Summer had wiped out ALL of the combined forces (including Ranker and Kegan) other than the Named. But if I'm reading it right it's just the hundred or so that had not yet gone through the gates back into Creation. Or am I still missing something?

Rnt169

no, I think that's what happened.

beleester

There's nothing indicating the attack went through the gates into Creation.

Kingbob12

Fuck Ranger is scary. She seemed so cheery back when she invaded the Dead King for the 4th time!

Byzantine

I get the feeling the Dead King cannot die in truth, so she's just having fun with him.

And the way Black spoke of her and him. I guess he is the closest thing she has to an equal, at least in terms of sheer destructive power.

stevenneiman

He's nowhere near her league in terms of damage potential. I'm not entirely sure what it was she liked about him, though it might have been his ambition. Black might actually be the least physically powerful of the Calamities, though he's fearsome in terms of absolute power. After all, he's the leader and strategist next to Ranger herself, the guy who can call down unholy fire against his enemies and the woman who once killed a god (even if it was small g) with her bare hands.

samshadar

Byzantine was referring to Black comparing the Dead King and Ranger... I think killing the entire populace of your Kingdom and turning them into your undead servants qualifies.

goliath1303

I'm pretty sure that Byzantine was referring to this:

"Black had told me there were to people on Calernia against whom it was useless to think in terms of victory, where one could only attempt to limit the damage and lose the least amount of skin possible. One was the Dead King, who he'd charmingly referred to as 'the original abomination'. The other was the Ranger, whose utter disregard for odds I'd been raised hearing stories about."

It was part of Cat's thoughts a couple chapters back. It was after Archer told her that Ranger had grown bored with hunting princes and princesses a while ago so she had to be there for something else(i.e. the Summer queen).

RandomFan

If Ranger were- is- a villain, she'd consider herself winning, because she'd win for all of her life until the day she lost. I kinda get the feeling that's a deal she'd take, and be happy with. I don't think she has any long-term goals, though. She might, but that's not the feeling I get. She's playing, whatever alignment her name has.

Black is playing to win long-term, which is new and novel- especially since it might work. I think he's interesting, not her equal. He'll never be her equal, either, if you trust his own predictions- which is a tragedy, but perfectly legitimate.

Jeffery Wells

Ranger is chaotic neutral on the D&D morality scale. She's not a hero or a villain, she's like a force of nature. Her goals have nothing to do with good or evil, so she can spend years traveling with monstrous villains before seeing up a refuge that trains mostly heroes. It's like her morality system is perpendicular to the classic good vs evil, and it only intersects right in the middle.

Phantom

Well, given Ranger's attitude. I am more concerned with how the dead king had survived ranger four times. I give that at least he was quite capable.

Akim

Because the dead King built the best training Parours. ? And if she killed him there would be no more Carnival for her.

nipi

Well it was implied that the Dead King does change bodies.

And somehow I have the impression that he isn't much of a fighter himself. That's what the undead minions are for. So Ranger might not be interested in him per se.

Byzantine

Like I said, I'm pretty sure he can't actually die in truth, so while Ranger may have destroyed his avatar the first time she went there, it didn't accomplish anything but making him mildly annoyed.

Shequi

It strikes me that Ranger has exactly the same attitude as most Elves; Named matter, ordinary soldiers don't.

TeK

More likely is that Catherin is like a daughter to Black and Mazego is a son of Warlock, who are both her friends. If a Thief was there, she might've been evaporated.

Jtebb2

I will remained utterly convinced that Cat is the daughter of Black and Ranger until proven otherwise. Then I shall ignore that proof and maintain my belief.

kelioez

Like, the author has officially stated that they aren't, so ur really just making a fool outta urself

Cpt. Obvious

In the words of Adam Savage:

"I reject your reality and substitute my own."

The Quietist

Well then she was bored and killing time. Now she's got a new prey and is clearly in some sort of zone hence Archer commenting on "hunter's eyes" as to why she wasn't going to go say hi.

JC

How does the Ranger even do what she does?

Byzantine

She is the most powerful Named on the continent by a significant margin. Combine that with being half-elf and trained by their best. Ranger is utterly terrifying. If she is hunting you, Run. Not to get away – to limit how many people you like get killed in the process.

Darkening

Well, elves are already practically demigods, she's a half-elf... and she's a named on top of that. So that's a good base. Then there's her aspects, which lead her to perfect any skill she sets her mind to and then transcend it into something more than merely mortal skill. Sorta like how Tolkien's elves would become so good at, carpentry or whatever that they could make magic stuff just by being really, really good. But she directs all of that into killing things. Have we gotten any indication on how long Ranger's been doing this? I got the sense she was already a veteran when she ran into Black in that tavern the first time, and as a half-elf she's probably got a long lifespan.

esryok

Based on her extra chapter (Regard) she's at least 140 years old, and I get the impression it is a fair number of decades more than that.

stevenneiman

Named are all immortal until killed, so she could be theoretically any age. And yeah, between being half elf and having Aspects designed to make her grow more fearsome with each insane stunt she is probably one of the most dangerous beings in Creation. Of course, that still doesn't explain how she was able to cut the burning sky, but it's hardly out of line with her power shown elsewhere.

kinigget

Villains are immortal, Heroes can be resurrected

Those are the rules

Unless you're Cat

wigg55

BS exponential curve aspects and agelessness.

Byzantine

Sucks, but honestly she should have seen it coming, with Ranger waiting there.

There are only two things in Arcadia that hold her interest now: The King of Winter and the Queen of Summer. And this was Summer territory.

Interesting, though, she just Bound Thief to the party in Name and Story, and hence in truth. That's going to have implications, I think. Ones Thief may not be happy with, but she will deal with as long as Catherine doesn't go all murder-happy on innocents.

M

There is nothing explicitly saying that it's Thief and not Robber that is "the fifth woe".

Rnt169

As much as I would like Robber to have more screen time, I think members have to be Named??

M

You don't think Robber is a Name then?

Kirroth

On the one hand, an good group of five needs The Sneaky One. That could be Thief or it could be Robber. Thief would seem to be in the lead, but she's a Hero that got strong armed into helping out and doesn't really seem a proper part of Cat's circle. Robber is far more closely tied to Cat's narrative.

On the other hand, Cat's all about altering patterns, so I wouldn't even narrow it down to just those two. I'm even weighing odds that Diabolist is the fifth. She'd make an excellent Starscream.

stevenneiman

@Kirroth I very much doubt that she would be willing to work with Diabolist. She killed William, who was a way more sympathetic character and who at there's at least a theoretical possibility that if he renounced the Gods Above he could be a decent person, but Diabolist doesn't give that kind of vibe, in a way that makes killing her an much more attractive option. With, of course, very thorough precautions against her coming back in any form, at any time.

maresther23

Goblin names are sneaky, Black said so when talking about the Matrons. Robber has "heard the wind" and knows the music of "The Girl Who Climbed the Tower". Finally, and not least, see the moments when he says he is Invincible and tell me it is not an Aspect.

Cpt. Obvious

It wasn't in bold. Aspects are always in bold.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Robber is a name, not a Name.

James, Mostly Harmless

Ranger also bound Archer to Cat's team, which I think is a bigger deal than binding Thief.

Byzantine

It's a bigger deal in that she gave implicit permission for Archer to stay. But it isn't as major in terms of the Narrative at play.

nipi

Evil parties are always more fun with a good guy thrown in the mix. RPG wisdom. 😊

nehemiahnewell

I'm surprised that the Summer Queen is surprised. The Ranger seems as much a slave to her habits as any fae, and she knew she was prey. She should grok that, it's a mirror of her own kingdoms limited nature.

James, Mostly Harmless

I got the impression that the Summer Queen was not actually surprised by Ranger's appearance. It seemed more like she was dawdling a little so that Ranger could appear just in time to save Cat and Masego ...

Byzantine

If she was, I don't think she had a choice. Fae are bound by the story, and the stronger the Fae the stronger it binds them.

Jago

She recognized of tired is the king of Winter, and probably it is the same for her. They are retelling the same grand tale again and again, with two possible outcomes and the same pararell tales. A prison that will last forever. Sad.

jor

damnit they just too OP

Shequi

Downer, somewhat.

I wonder what the Queen of Summer is nominally Princess of when not wearing the crown.

Also, did anybody else notice that Thief now has the burnt hand motif of Ranker's Legion?

Shequi

Also also:

"The Woe," Ranger said, mulling over the word. "Too broad a mantle for you five now, but you'll grow into it."

Confirmation of what I said in the previous chapter. This was a Pivot, the start of a story for the 5 Named under Catherine's banner.

nehemiahnewell

Huh, that's interesting. You're right, she does. Even if it came from a different source, that might matter. It's an element of a story, after all.

stevenneiman

Very observant. I hadn't noticed the way that she shared Ranker's burnt hand. Of course, being a hero, she might have access to some unfair means of healing that, but on the other hand that might not work with a wound that came from the Summer sun.

Nastybarsteward

Been now they've fled we won't get to see the fight... 😞

Nastybarsteward

* But

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Except maybe in an interlude on Wednesday

Nastybarsteward

It's interesting that the queen of summer sounds rather un-fae like in appearance, even if she most definitely is in power. As Cat has become a noble in the court of winter, is it possible the queen of summer wasn't fae to start with...?

Terion

I think the Queen is Old fae. The lower fae seem to be shaped by the stories of mortals into unnaturally beautiful beings. Maybe the queen is too fundamental to be affected.

Nastybarsteward

The king of winter was still very much fae in appearance, wasn't he?

Whereas the queen of summer was a muscular 14yr old human girl in appearance.

And one who was in awe of her own power at that.

Cpt. Obvious

My first thought was that she is born again every spring, grows into her early teens as spring turns into summer, and ages as summer passes.

I might be far off the mark, but it would fit the setting as it's often how summer is depicted.

Winter on the other hand is almost always depicted as a grizzled mature or older man, with frost white beard and hair.

Shequi

Maybe she's a Changeling. That's another old Fae story.

Vortex

I imagine the queen's age would be tied to the seasons. When summer is young so is she.

Letouriste

So now masego can teleport?:D

danh3107

"I am the Ranger. I hunt those worth hunting. Rejoice, for you qualify."

And lo, did the blueballs abate and all who pined for release find satisfaction.

stevenneiman

typo thread:

"Distractions and stray [fought->thoughts] fell away"

"It was the kind of thing that was useful to know when killing [caster->casters/a caster]"

"You'd have been furious [it] if it was one of us"

"if we ever invaded one of the Hells she'd just treat it as {a} tempering exercise"

Also, I'm kinda feeling like Ranger seems a bit more overpowered than she did last time we saw her. When she invaded Keter she always seemed like she was skating along the thin edge of possible, but here she just seems like she can do whatever she wants.

RoflCat

When you keep Transcending the next bigger thing, eventually you get that OP.

I mean, back then she was simply hunting Dead King's ghost heroes.

Then during the Conquest she probably took part in hunting some of the big Named on Good (like Wizard of the West)

Heck she already has Prince of Nightfall so beat that she ALWAYS come for his eye.

And now, my guess is that whatever 'souvenir' she'll take from the Queen will help Cat defeat her later on.

zlzhou

Also "thou [shalt]"

Unmaker

It is too much to hope that Thief will drop a sun-ball of flame on Diabolist. Diabolist and her father would just figure out how to use the power somehow. It is a really good question as to what in the nine hells Thief is going to do with the stolen Sun.

Matthew

Well, if Cat is lucky, Akua will summon the "True demon of Outer Darkness" and then having a spare sun will be useful.

RandomFan

And if Cat really manages to never have a time where summoning a sun is a "good idea" or one where summoning a sun is a "best we've got" prior to that point, there is a value in plopping down a sun in the middle of winter. I doubt it'd take out a king, but off-guard, it might let her finish off a prince or princess.

Евгений Пермяков

Combined attacks, or even stealing his own Reality Marble to come as a princess or a queen when the next Winter comes? At least we now know that the titles don't refer to any actual aspects on Creation.

mechanicalrain

Victory though superior strategy, one of the best ones to enjoy. Hopefully all the men that died did so for something, and she manages to leverage the victory into actual gains, rather than the temporary reprieve from Summer of 1~ish months.

Hakurei06

It said the Deoraithe and the Legionaries, but were the knights also asked? that spells Bad News, since unlike the Legionaries she can't just recruit another 2000. Be good if the watch were cut down a bit, though.

Danica Bihlmaier

The last few hundred that hadn't gone through the portals yet... no more. Knights seem to have been gone way before that.

Byzantine

Only a fraction of the army remained on the Arcadia side of the portals, and the Knights were likely among the first to leave.

Snoogle

So the Prince of Night"fall" says that the "Fall" aspect is close to his domain.

For a Duchess of the Moonless "Night", that sounds way awesome. I can't wait to see what that could mean.

Damn, replied to the wrong comment.

Combined attacks, or even stealing his own Reality Marble to come as a princess or a queen when the next Winter comes? At least we now know that the titles don't refer to any actual aspects on Creation.

"I am the Ranger. I hunt those worth hunting. Rejoice, for you qualify."

"I dislike ignoring my impulses," Ranger said casually. "So do not suggest that again. He would be angry, if I killed you,

So Cat is worth hunting, that is interesting

Terion

I don't think she considers Catherine worth hunting. I think she just means that by default she instinctively silences anything that opposes her, in word or deed. Permanently.

The quietist

Nah just she found the offer to help insulting. This is her kill.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Your "nah" is insutingly dismissive. Especially since you're not even right.

goliath1303

That's hilarious coming from YOU, of all people...
Especially, especially since he WAS right and you're wrong.

RandomFan

Don't chide him for dismissing his peers, and then promptly do the exact same thing. His sounds more plausible to me, but both are possible. (In fact, I think both are the case in truth.)

Idan Dor

Hmmm, maybe it's the zeal of a new highly powerful opponent that makes it harder to suppress her instincts? She wouldn't have lasted long with the Calamities (or to be more precise, *they* wouldn't) if she had no way to suppress those instincts.

I am wondering about Ranger's kill count right now, she would have had no problem hunting Warlocks on the height of their power in their own fortresses. I wonder how many top heroes and villians she had hunted during her time.

I find it interesting how the King of Winter is attempting large scale changes to the story and shifting of the patterns. The Courts are somewhat supposed to mirror stories and narratives, I wonder if this is him mirroring Black's story? And if so, to what end?

Thank for the chapter, EE, it is certainly, as others mentioned, a pivot for the Woe.

Danica Bihlmaier

"very tired" was what the Queen of Summer said. The Winter King seems to want an end to the endless repetition of endless cycles and not much more beyond that.

Morgenstern

That is, if she is right, of course.

taborask

That's a really interesting way to see it. I didn't think he needed to have a reason for wanting to break the cycle, but it absolutely makes sense that this might be a reflection of the general "narrative shift" that Praes is trying to take

AndR

Nah, Ranger just tends to kill people who insult her.

The Quietist

Can't reply directly to you Warren for some reason so I'll post here. Just to say "nah" was in no way intended as insulting it was just a randomly used word... Chill my friend.

Morgenstern

"Slang" is all of how it came over to me o_ô That's the problem with written words and not being able to see facial expressions, gestures, and hear a tone, I guess 😊

George

It seemed clear to me that Ranger was talking to the Summer Queen with the first bit, then Catherine with the second bit. Personally I read it as Ranger being offended at the implication that she needed help.

Sinjako

I am desperately hoping that Diabolist is the fifth Woe. Imagine Catherine's face when she finds out reality just played its biggest joke on her. It would fit with her character development very well too. So far, she's had to a lot of nasty things, but nothing as deeply personal as this. This would be the first time she's HAD to do something that offends her to the core of her soul.

joanneeve

Cat and her are bound in a story of three that Cat is unaware of.

Thebes

I thought there could only be one pattern of three between two named.

Shequi

No. Cat and Akua's pattern of three has been completed, and "creation does not embrace tedious repetition"

lennymaster

No, I think it would be way more awesome if everyone thought Thief was the fifth member of the Woe, right next to Squire, Hierophant, Adjutant and Archer. But when she tries to betray Cat Robber suddenly stabs her and reveals himself to be one of the Woe (I think Saboteur would be a fitting Name). Originally I had pined for Kilian to be one of Cats band of killers and the love interest, but that seems more and more unlikely.

Ethesis

I had hoped she would use the bound Fay to elevate her love interest.

Mental Mouse

She's still need humans as well, which was Cat's sticking point. (Presumably this would be to keep the new fae Killian alive in Creation.)

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Why in the Hells would Diabolist ne part of this? She's not there, and no one there is even talking about her. How does your idea make any sense?

Ranger was making a parallel to the Calamities, so you want Akua and Cat to be TEAMMATES? What the hell?

goliath1303

So you say "Your "nah" is insutingly dismissive. Especially since you're not even right." In response to a fairly innocuous comment and then, LESS THAN 10 MINUTES LATER, you post this condensing reply? You have got to be the least self-aware person I've ever seen. I'm saying this to you on a public internet page, let that sink in for a minute...

ArkhCthuul

Wow...that was sufficiently.epic, even if it was.clewr that ranger.would.intercede.
Still.wow...

MagnaMalusLupus

I love this story more and more, but I'm not loving that party name; being a Calamity makes sense, as a calamity is an event, a noun, a distinct entity. Woe is an emotion, and isn't really something quantifiable; you can have 5 calamitous events, you can have 5 tragedies befall you, you can have 5 curses bestowed upon you, hells you can even encounter 5 banes of your existence, but it doesn't make much sense to say you have had 5 woes. That being said, tragedy seems a bit too heroic, curses doesn't work what with there being a Name of the Cursed, and Banes doesn't really roll off the tongue. Just a thought though, considering how much Cat has fought with literal gods and angels and such, and given the Hierophant has a direct connection to dissecting the divine, perhaps Blasphemies would be apropos. Thoughts?

beleester

Woe isn't always an emotion, it can also be used to mean something that causes you trouble. The typical phrase is "suffering from woes," e.g., "The company is suffering from financial woes after poor sales of its product."

Although you're right that it's usually an indefinite number – you can suffer from woes, but you never suffer from one woe, or five woes.

Cloudy_Mind

"Woe is an emotion, and isn't really something quantifiable". Not entirely true. Woe and Calamity are very closely associated.

Woe – great sorrow or distress.
– things that cause sorrow or distress; troubles.
Calamity – an event causing great and often sudden damage or distress; a disaster.

Snoogle

"Calamity: an event causing great distress."

"Woe: great sorrow or distress."

Black the Calamity caused Catherine the Woe.

I like this parallel.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Dylan Tullos

Am I the only one who really doesn't like Ranger? She's essentially a narcissist in love with her own cunning and ability, endlessly seeking out bigger and better challenges without any regard for the consequences to the people around her. For all of her age and experience, Ranger is a child endlessly demanding new thrills, maiming and murdering purely to avoid boredom.

I'm personally hoping that the Queen wipes her out. Ranger treats those around her like toys that exist only for her own amusement, and it's about time for her to run into someone powerful enough to stop her little game.

lennymaster

I agree with you on that one, but it would be way too boring if either of those two died.

Cat's big thing however was to build a better Callow and to kill everything, be it mortal Named or even a God to achieve that. How many Gods does she need to kill, starting with the Queen of Summer and continuing with the King of Winter, to whom she promised revenge for her dead people in Marchford, to become interesting to Ranger, especially after Black's most likely coming death?

Blinks

You're not alone in that but then i'm somewhat contrary by nature.

I want Black to get outsmarted, Ranger to lose, Warlock to be over powered, scribe to be surprised and the Empress outmanoeuvred.

Ranger, i think, has her time coming though. You don't get to be invincible like she, apparently, is. That's the kind of thing begging for a story where she loses.

Soronel Haetir

Except Ranger doesn't have any over-arching ambition. She just goes from one situation to the next looking for a good time. I see her invulnerability somewhat like how the first step of a villain's master plan cannot fail, Ranger goes beyond that by not having a master plan to begin with (of course she isn't really a villain – or a hero for that matter – just a bored near-immortal out for #1).

From the intro comment to the Ranger extra chapter about how the Kingdom Under considers Refuge a protectorate of sorts I get the feeling that even the most powerful nation on the continent isn't confident about their ability to defeat her, at least not without suffering costs all out of proportion to the gain.

Dylan Tullos

Soronal Haetir:

I attribute Ranger's survival to both her impressive skills and her ability to never be the center of a really big Story. As you point out, she doesn't have an agenda beyond her own entertainment, so she is never a suitable champion for either the Gods Above or Those Below. At some point, Good Heroes will sacrifice themselves, while Evil Villains will be destroyed by some combination of Heroic sacrifice and the collapse of their overelaborate plans. Since Ranger isn't actually Good or Evil, she isn't bound by either set of conventions.

I don't know who could bring Ranger down at this point. She's more formidable than any Named we've met so far, and if she can survive the Queen of Summer, I don't think any amount of raw power would be sufficient to destroy her. We just don't have enough information to speculate about any weaknesses other than arrogance and addiction to danger.

Nehemiah Newell

Honestly, Ranger has made several moves that could take her off the board. She's made herself a big enough player and wildcard that removing her could be the first step in several plans. She's given motivation here – she had no reason to get involved beyond amusement, and in getting involved she thwarted a god. That not the kind of wildcard any mastermind likes leaving around.

Likewise, she's helped the forces of evil a great deal. She certainly should have people wanting to bring her to justice, or revenge their murdered parents just like the other Calamities.

And her placelessness means there's no story that will be left hollow by her absence. She isn't being pulled into her doom, but neither is she protected so that she can fulfill her role in a story.

I can see her falling very quickly and unexpectedly.

vexingvision

I'm with you. I have a string dislike for god-like NPCs. Cat struggles, Black schemes beautifully, even the Bard has limitations in what she's doing.

Ranger just seems all-powerful for no other reason than she is.

Dylan Tullos

Nehemiah Newell:

The problem with targeting Ranger is that she's too powerful to fight unless you absolutely have to, and you can never be sure that she's going to end up as your enemy. Ranger is unpredictable enough to take any side, and by going after her, you draw her attention. In purely practical terms, it makes more sense to treat her like a natural disaster and hope that she doesn't wander in your direction.

In a world with a single superpower, the superpower would need to wipe her out simply to destroy a "wild card" that could threaten the proper order of things. In a conflict between two Great Powers, neither side can afford to risk driving her into an alliance with the other team. If Ranger was consistently pro-Good or pro-Evil, there would be no incentive to leave her alone, but we can see that she spends most of her time amusing herself in ways that don't help either side exclusively.

Anyone with a motive to kill Ranger for what she did as part of Black's team during the Conquest also has a motive to target Black and the other Calamities. Since they're still active, while she's mostly retired, it would also make sense for Heroes to go after them first.

It's not that there aren't lots of people who would really, really like Ranger dead. It's just that she's never first on anyone's "Must Die" list (except the Prince of Nightfall. Only Ranger could make me feel sorry for a fae). As a second-tier threat who requires a first-tier effort to kill, Ranger is effectively shielded from retribution. Those with the power to possibly bring her down have bigger concerns, and they can't ignore their chief rivals to bring down Calernia's most dangerous wild card, especially when the blowback from a failed attempt could endanger their larger plans.

That said...I really hope that you're right and I'm wrong. Out of all the characters in this novel, I want Ranger dead the most, purely because of her unique combination of insufferable arrogance and vicious, childlike motives.

Shawn Panzegraf

The Queen of Summer would sooner cut out her own tongue and cauterize the stump than speak the words she did about Cat's little group and then see them survive. She only said what she did about them being The Woe because she was utterly, completely, absolutely certain that Catherine and Masego were about to die, breaking their Calamities-in-the-making-like group.

The Chancellor named the Calamities, and look how their story has gone. The QUEEN OF FRIGGING SUMMER named Catherine's squad. It's a stronger story-base than that the Calamities received, by FAR. Knowing Stories as she does, the Summer Queen is NOT happy right now.

Much love for the Ranger.

Ethesis

Well said.

The Warren Peace NFL Report

Huh? Ranger named them the Woe, not the queen.

RandomFan

Not quite. "The five of you would be woe unto all you behold." is the Queen's words, just like "You are a calamity to friend and foe alike" is from the Chancellor. Ranger just formalized it.

Apparently part of my brain is still not okay with this story ending as a tragedy like worm was. I'm still hopeful that ultimately the very mild in which the story is cast will be broken.

RandomFan

I will gladly debate that worm was a tragedy day and night. (It was a terrible place, but Taylor won, and the world was better for her existence.) That said, I'm sure it's inevitable that we're going to see Cat lose some. Even if she achieves her goals, there will be prices.

Naeddyr

Worm: a tragicomedy.

"Ranger stood between us as if she had -always- been there."
This sentence caught my eye, did Ranger just do that elven thing where she chooses which laws apply to her but in Arcadia?

George

It seems likely she can do that, but I don't know how likely it is that she used that in particular.

Soronel Haetir

I am reminded about how in chapter one of book 1 Cat always loved stories about Ranger the best. I suspect that has changed.

Barrendur

@Dylan Tullos:

I also detest Ranger. Her arrogance is unappealing to read about, as is her apparent belief that everyone in the ENTIRE world is irrelevant (or a terrain hazard), save for her and her current target (and maybe some of the Calamities).

I've always found 'invincible' characters frustrating and tedious... especially when they murder without any *hope* of their ever being held accountable. Ranger leads a self-obsessed, pointless existence, as a (from what I've read so far) pointless character.

green

Ranger is not:

- * a Hero
- * a Villain
- * impressed with your bullshit
- * fucking around.

Little typo/continuity error EE, in a later book Masego muses that he can't close his eyes anymore but here you have his eyelids intact.

Villainous Interlude: Cadenza

"Taxes. Taxes and triplicate forms."

– Dread Emperor Terribilis I, upon being asked what powerful sorceries he would use to humble the High Lords

Warlock had eyes on it from the beginning.

Not scrying, for that could be traced, but delayed relays that caught images at regular intervals. Wekesa had formed enough alternating way stations that while it was possible to follow the trail back to the beginning, it would take months at a flat minimum. What Amadeus saw was puzzling, at the start. Procer sent decoys caravans, armed to the teeth, but those were seen through easily. He sent Sabah to hit the lone carts using lesser known paths, and these carried the ingots of silver and gold that were being fed to Nicae. The two first true caravans were ambushed and seized at the same location, which led him to a possible answer: consecrated grounds. By having blood spilled at the same hands at the same place, ritual weight could be crafted. That might signify his initial notion that this was a trap put in place by the Tyrant was correct, because the heroes under the White Knight would not lower themselves to use blood magic in this manner. Not with a man sworn to the Choir of Judgement at their head. Then the third caravan used a different path, and blood was spilled in a different location. He had, evidently, been incorrect. Reassessment was needed. Scribe had begun placing agents in the ranks of the Helikean army long before the war between League members began, and he turned to her for clarification.

"He caught my agents," Eudokia said.

"All of them?" Black frowned.

"Yes," she confirmed. "They still serve as soldiers, but any information they try to pass gets replaced by the words to a Helikean drinking song about a shepherdess and her three husbands."

The Tyrant's doing, then. The boy did like to pretend he has a sense of humour.

"Extraction?" he said.

"Even removing the soul from the bodies doesn't sidestep the issue," she said.

Name application, then, possibly an aspect. There were few sorceries in existence that could truly affect a soul in a manner more complex than cutting out parts and outside the Empire that branch of magic was not often studied. Infiltration of Helike was a resource sink, then, though one he might revisit should he need to busy the villain for a span of time. Scribe turned her focus to Nicae, at his instruction, and continued the other task he had assigned her. The fourth caravan took a different route again, and this contradicted his read of the matter. If the intent is opaque, change the perspective. Amadeus marked the locations on the map, and had Wekesa study them.

"If the next one dies here, there's an arcane pattern being formed," Warlock said, tapping a cattle path that would begin to sketch out a circle from a bird's eye view.

It was not the location where the fifth caravan was destroyed. Repetition in the face of failure, Amadeus believed, indicated either incompetence or that what was perceived as 'success' by the beholder was not the objective. The sixth caravan passed through the initial route, and he ordered Captain to let it pass. It was possible that the later caravans had been a smokescreen to draw him away from his first thought, that of consecrated grounds.

"If that's what they're doing his mages are botching it," Wekesa said. "He can still consecrate the grounds to Below like that, but if he doesn't maintain a regular pattern then it'll be so weak it'll be useless. There's a reason the old crowd uses prisoner sacrifices for the effect, it allows you to control the alignments."

"The drivers have been women more than men," Amadeus said.

"There's rituals that take gender into consideration, but not this kind," Warlock said. "And they're exceedingly imprecise, so there's no way they could take out Sabah. It's too fluid a concept to be used as a solid anchor."

That was usually the way, with cultural mores. If the intent is opaque, change the perspective. Neither consecration nor geographic location. Temporal placement? The hours where the caravans had been taken formed no useful arcane pattern, according to Warlock. Using the date by the Imperial calendar led to a dead end, but then outside Praes it was rarely used. The Free Cities counted the years from the founding of the League, but that was another dead end. The ancestral calendar of Helike was similarly useless.

"Keteran Calendar," Warlock finally murmured, peering at a table full of opened books with a cup of wine in hand.

Amadeus adjusted his thinking, bringing the corresponding numbers to mind. Nothing that seemed relevant to him.

"Take out the second killing," Wekesa said. "Then instead of using only the date as is, subtract using the year Sabah was born."

The Black Knight closed his eyes, assembled the answers.

"Spell formula," he said. "But this is ridiculously indirect."

Warlock ignored him, scribbling ink on parchment and translating numbers to runes then speculated requirements from there.

"It's not just that," the Soninke grimaced.

"It would take thousands to create even a minor effect with so weak a sympathetic link," Amadeus pointed out.

"The effect itself is how I know we're on the wrong track," Wekesa sighed. "Look, this is a projection of the illusion that would be formed if this formula was empowered."

Warlock tapped the table once, and spell light glowed softly. In front of them, a hand was rotating in the air. Only the middle finger was raised.

"This is the Tyrant's play, then," the green-eyed man murmured. "That as good as confirms it."

The combination of childish insult and advanced understanding of spellcrafting mechanics was telling. That a secondary pattern inserted into the primary one purely for the sake of the taunt was there at all was somewhat worrying. Amadeus had not been under the impression the Tyrant had mages this talented as his disposal, or such understanding himself. Another change of perspective was needed, but before that more information must be obtained. In a calculated risk, he sent Sabah to sack the seventh caravan. A different route, once more. Amadeus drank, watched the flames and thought. Eudokia came with her reports when the moon was high.

"The magisters were open to negotiations to have their army returned to them," Scribe said.

"But?" the Duni prompted.

"Distraction," she said. "They've already secured other means to accomplish this."

The Tyrant. That he'd bothered to involve Stygia at all spoke volumes: they had a role to play in his ultimate intent.

"He rules Helike," the Black Knight said. "Occupies Atalante. Has a representative from Bellerophon, struck a pact with Stygia and prepares to siege Nicae."

Eudokia nodded without a word. She'd understood the order perfectly.

"The Bard?" he said.

"Still gathering," she replied, and disappeared into the night.

Amadeus closed his eyes and thought. Eliminating theories one after another would take too long, and the caravans could not simply be allowed to pass. The longer Nicae could afford to import supplies from Ashur, the longer the siege stretched out and the longer he would have to remain. He could not afford to stay away from the Empire for that long, not with the... colourful rumours about what was currently unfolding there. To find the pattern, then, he would need to begin with the individual or individuals that had crafted it. Necessary common factor?

Understanding of High Arcana. Nothing less could be used for a ritual of this class. Still and silent, Amadeus counted. He had known seventeen individuals capable of using High Arcana, in his life. He brought up every single conversation he'd had with one of them, and sought commonalities in perspective. In the back of his mind, the gears ground. Too shallow a pool of information. He repeated the exercise, adding everything he'd ever read from an individual who cleared the condition to the process. Two days he stayed there, his companions knowing better than to disturb him. It was night again when he opened his eyes.

"Planar perception," he told no one at all.

The understanding of sorcery of that level led to a different understanding of Creation as well, one divorced from the material concerns that shaped his views. To Wekesa, for example, the lay of the land they both looked at was fundamentally different. Looking at the situation through the version of this filter he could construct, he found his answer. Height. No topographical map of the region accurate enough for his purposes could be obtained, which meant direct observation. Warlock handled it, putting together the images obtained through relays.

"You're right," Wekesa admitted. "If you look at the pattern using the height they were killed at instead of the location, I can recognize the shape."

"How many do they need?" he asked.

"Assuming I'm correct and the first killing was a decoy, four more," his old friend said.

"Nine in total," Amadeus said. "Thrice three. A killing stroke?"

"Offensive in nature, at the very least," Warlock said. "We stop shy of what they need?"

The Black Knight smiled, very mildly.

"No," he said. "I think not. They will get exactly what they need."

Eudokia found him as he ate for the first time in days, methodically replenishing his strength.

"An offer was made to the Secretariat," she said. "Penthes as well."

The pale-skinned man chewed thoughtfully.

"He aims to be Hierarch, then," he said.

How the Tyrant had managed to exert pressure on Bellerophon enough they would agree to this would have to be found investigated. Such a lever was too useful to be left solely in the boy's hands.

"Assuming he secures all the votes," Amadeus said. "Intent?"

"Broader games," Scribe suggested. "His methodology requires constant opposition."

That was a possibility, the green-eyed man thought. A straightforward one, however. That did not immediately disqualify it as a possible objective, but it was not a mark in its favour.

"Worst case scenario," Eudokia asked, changing the approach.

"Tenth crusade, involving the entirety of Hasenbach's coalition," Amadeus replied without missing a beat. "Dead King uninvolved. Chain of Hunger unable to exert strength. Drow situation unchanged."

"Kingdom Under?" Scribe said.

"In another expansion phase," the Black Knight reminded her. "They will profiteer through weapon trade, at most."

They'd left behind the question of what the Tyrant was after, and were instead studying what effect he could have on the Empire under the worst circumstances possible should he ascend to the position.

"He would be a destabilizing factor," Scribe said, and there was no greater insult in her eyes than what she had just uttered.

"One without the ability to grab land or hamper commerce outside affordable losses," Amadeus said. "By nature, even should he manage to align with Procer he will be damaging to them."

Not worth directly opposing in this, the verdict was. Not unless other information surfaced that changed the forces in play.

"I've assembled an initial dossier," Eudokia said.

Amadeus raised an eyebrow.

"Different face, but she has been active in Procer," Scribe said.

"She's behind Hasenbach?" he asked.

If the Wandering Bard had enabled the First Prince to rise, the failure in intelligence that had resulted in him being unaware of this was... massive. It put everything he knew of the Proceran situation in question.

"No recorded contact," Eudokia said. "But she was in Rhenia."

The Black Knight was too old and far too removed from the boy he'd once been to let the dismay touch his face.

"The Augur," he said. "There could be indirect influence. Anything further back?"

"No link to the Troubadour or the Magnificent Minstrel," Scribe said. "But getting anything prior to the Conquest has been... difficult."

The records had been tinkered with, she meant.

"There's no precedent for an uninterrupted stream of consciousness," Amadeus said.

"Heavier inheritance," Scribe suggested.

Name dreams writ large. It was possible. Few things were not, when it came to Named.

"A line of Wandering Bards going back for centuries, advancing some collective purpose," he said. "That is... an issue. There must be limits."

"She has never intervened directly," Eudokia said, and he waved his hand in irritation.

They'd both known what. It was a staple of bardic Names, being able to influence the story but rarely change it with their own hands. Power only through fronts, never wielded personally.

"Has she ever been linked to anyone not Named?" Amadeus said.

Reluctantly, Scribe shook her head. Given the incomplete records at their disposal, she was unwilling to commit fully to that theory.

"When attached to the Lone Swordsman, she operated within his moral boundaries," Eudokia said.

Limits to her actions dictated to the story she was bound to and the nature of its heroes. Another theory to test.

"It's her blind spots we need to find," he said. "The majority of the threat she represents comes from her awareness of our movements."

Eudokia nodded. Amadeus frowned.

"Pick a target," he said. "Assassin is at your disposal. I cannot know."

"Risk margin?" she asked.

"I trust your judgement," he replied.

No more need be said. Sabah killed, four more times. But as skilled as the mages of the Tyrant were, they were not Warlock. A single strand of hair was placed in the centre of the runic circle, and the curse meant to kill Captain found another target.

Usurpation was, after all, the essence of sorcery. After it was done, Wekesa complimented the ritual. It was, apparently, not derivative of Praesi work in the slightest though it had been designed under the shared Trismegistan theory of magic. Behind the tall walls of Nicae, the Ashen Priestess died screaming. There was no warning, and no saving her. The ritual had been performed to kill a Named much more physically able. Amadeus approved, when he learned of it. Always kill the healer first. Targeting the White Knight might not have succeeded, and of the others the Priestess was the most apt to tip the balance in a clash. Before dawn, every practitioner involved on the attempt on Sabah's life was dead. They left behind a note indicating they had taken their own lives out of guilt. Assassin's sense of humour had grown whimsical of late.

"Your reasoning?" Scribe asked, after.

"No hero was involved in the story until the very end," he said. "It was a struggle purely between villains."

"Ah," Eudokia said. "She can only see us when we stand opposed to her narrative?"

"Possibly," Amadeus frowned. "Otherwise she sacrificed a heroine for no visible gain."

"If she is bound by the White Knight's morality, she could not do so," Scribe said.

"Possibly," the green-eyed man repeated. "I am... unsettled, Eudokia."

Her eyes were still as ponds.

"The word for 'bard' we use comes from Old Miezian," he said. "Language has evolved, even in our lifetime."

"If the line were that ancient, there would be records," Scribe said. "Unless."

"Unless," Amadeus agreed softly.

Unless something was cleaning up behind them, be it their Role or the Gods Above. Such a direct intervention would allow similar direct meddling from the Gods Below, of course. Balance in spirit, if not in practice. Yet he could think of only one event in Calernian history that would qualify. The creation of the Kingdom of the Dead. Which preceded written history in Praes by centuries, by conservative estimate. If the line of 'Bards' was that old, the Heavens had been playing a longer game than any of them. The ramifications of that were beyond the scope of his understanding, a feeling he was unused to and did not particularly care for.

"It could be Triumphant," Eudokia said.

Triumphant cost us so much more than we gained. If she'd been the intervention of the Gods Below, they had let themselves be robbed by the opposition. Black closed his eyes.

"If she cannot be killed, she must be trapped," he said.

He felt Scribe nod. She sat at his side, close enough to touch but never quite getting there.

"You are tired," Eudokia said.

Innocuous words, but the deeper meaning was there.

"I am dying, I think," he murmured.

There was a long silence.

"If Catherine wields the knife, I will destroy her," she said, as if she was speaking of the weather. "And if I fail Hye will not."

Amadeus did not reply. If he'd been the kind of man to pray, he would have prayed then. But he was not, so instead the gears began to turn and he wondered how many of the people he loved he would have to kill, before it was all over.

The Ashen priestess' death being a footnote in the larger story here is pretty staggering, Black just subverted every deathflag meant for Captain and used them against his opposition, overcoming two different Named powers to do so (well three including bard).

Cat has a long, loooong way to go well, it could be a trick too, facking the dead of one heroine then making her use of her big miracle to kill them.

edrey

---

Tyrant still hasn't used the heroes to kill a Calamity, so Bard's plan is still pretty much in action.

Jeffery Wells

That's what he was trying to do, and failed. The mages were on the side of the heroes. The question is whether he anticipated this failure and this is his betrayal of Bard, or if this is just a normal failure.

Remember, first step always works, for a villain.

I'm more concerned about the resurrection thingy, to be honest... Heroes can be resurrected, right? The Priestess IS a heroine. "Useless" sacrifice? Maybe not... In some stories heroes even come back greater in power when resurrected...

Cpt. Obvious

There has to be some limits to how a Hero can be resurrected, otherwise they would be coming back a lot more often. The choirs obviously can do it as Cat proved. But I doubt just any priest or priestess can pray a miracle like that out of their Gods.

There's probably a time component to. Otherwise Hero remains would be lugged around as people were tracking down those individuals who does have a thumb with the Gods and can sweet talk a resurrection out of them. So no resurrection for the plastered conjure once his carcass has started to rott, or something like that.

My point is that resurrection is probably still pretty rare for Heroes, even if it's a lot more common than it is for Villains. Kind of obvious as it takes a divine intervention, and the Gods below pretty much takes a hands off approach to the entire God shtick.

Thinking about it I can almost see the logic. The big game is all about proving which ideology that is most successful. The Gods above se resurrection of their most obedient pawns, the Heroes, as a way to get more boots on the ground in the fight against Evil. The Gods below on the other hand sees the dead Villains as a prof that he or she wasn't good enough. And by staying dead the Villains makes place for a new crop of Villains to take their place. Eventually a new villain in the same class as Triumphant will raise through the ranks.

I really don't like it.

For all accounts and purposes she simply died for no good reason out of the blue. This was not something she did, not something her allies did. It was simply "Wham!" she dead. If it's that easy to kill named, and it was at the end of the day very easy. Then the good old D&D scry and die should have been blacks go to method from the start.

nick012000

Teleportation consumes too much power for "scry and die" to be effective. It'd probably require dozens of human sacrifices every time you want to do it.

esryok

Maybe they can't normally pull things like this because it requires Fate-weight to achieve? Her death was part of the climax of a story. I'm picturing this like rubbing two balloons together to build static: the conflict between the villain factions built up a fatal amount of magical & Name power, and then at the last moment switched it from Captain to AP.

I suspect a staged conflict would not work.
